addressed [Jackson's] particular needs does not show that the [City] was deliberately indifferent[.]'. . The Estate also contends that Officer Wilkins's failure to take Jackson to the hospital proves that the City did not train him properly. But the Estate must point to more than 'an isolated, one-time event' to prove that the City had a policy of inadequate training. . . Instead, it must provide evidence, rather than mere allegation, of 'prior instances of unconstitutional conduct.'. . And the Estate has not done so. As an alternative basis for liability, the Estate argues that Benton Harbor had a policy of failing to discipline its officers for their constitutional violations. Like the failure-to-train claim, however, the Estate must show that Benton Harbor's failure to discipline amounts to 'deliberate indifference.'. . In its attempt to make that showing, the Estate cites only one alleged failure to discipline: the case before us. One example of the City's failure to discipline, however, does not prove that the City had a policy of failing to discipline."); Atkinson v. City of Mountain View, Mo., 709 F.3d 1201, 1216 (8th Cir. 2013) ("Notice is the touchstone of deliberate indifference in the context of § 1983 municipal liability. . . Other than the single incident at issue in this case, Atkinson has submitted no evidence of excessive force by Sanders or any other city police officer. Because no reasonable jury could find the city had notice that its lack of written use-of-force policies was likely to result in a constitutional violation, the city's failure to adopt such policies does not create a genuine dispute of material fact. Atkinson has also failed to make a submissible case for municipal liability based on the city's training and supervision of Sanders. Under § 1983, 'a claim for failure to supervise requires the same analysis as a claim for failure to train.'. . Neither claim can succeed without evidence the municipality '[r]eceived notice of a pattern of unconstitutional acts committed by [its employees].'. . Atkinson has presented no evidence indicating the city had reason to believe, before the events giving rise to this case, that its training or supervision of Sanders was inadequate. Absent some form of notice, the city cannot be deliberately indifferent to the risk that its training or supervision of Sanders would result in 'a violation of a particular constitutional or statutory right.'. . Because no reasonable jury could find the city liable under § 1983, the district court correctly granted the city's motion for summary judgment."); Campbell v. City of Springboro, Ohio, 700 F.3d 779, 795, 796 (6th Cir. 2012) (McKeague, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("In evaluating the plaintiffs' failure-to-train claim against the City, the district court correctly relied on the standard set forth in City of Canton, 489 U.S. at 390. The court thus nominally recognized that the City's failure to keep up with Spike's training requirements had to (1) amount to a policy of deliberate indifference to an obvious deficiency that could foreseeably result in violation of citizens' constitutional rights, and (2) actually cause plaintiffs' injuries. The district court found that these two requirements were adequately met even though the record contains no history of prior constitutional violations and fails to substantiate a causal connection between the City's failure to keep Spike's training current and either plaintiff's injuries. These defects in the district court's analysis are particularly glaring when the real basis for Clark's exposure to liability is kept in focus—i.e., Clark's failure to respond to Spike's engagement of each victim in an objectively reasonable manner under the totality of the circumstances. In other words, there is no causal link in the district court's analysis between the City's failure to keep up with Spike's training and Clark's malevolent or incompetent failure to call Spike off in a reasonable manner. Thus although the City can be held liable for a policy of deliberate indifference to obvious inadequacies in training or supervision, the record falls short of establishing a sufficient history of canine-unit-related constitutional violations to put the City on notice of obvious inadequacies. Further, the failure-to-train theory against the City suffers from a lack of evidence causally linking any deficiency in training—whether training of Spike or of Clark—to the injuries sustained by plaintiffs. The evidence supporting plaintiffs' failure-to-train theory of liability against the City for Clark's use of excessive force is no more than a mere scintilla, insufficient to forestall summary judgment. Accordingly, in my opinion, the ruling denying summary judgment to the City of Springboro should also be reversed."); Tsao v. Desert Palace, Inc., 698 F.3d 1128, 1144, 1145 (9th Cir. 2012) ("As Tsao has stated her claim, the alleged deficiency is properly seen as one of omission. Desert Palace in effect adopted two policies, with a gap between them that created the circumstances in which Tsao was arrested. First, Desert Palace keeps records of those it ejects from its casinos, and when those people return, it arrests them for trespassing or issues them citations under the SILA program. Second, Desert Palace sends promotional offers to repeat customers inviting them to visit the casino. Desert Palace's security staff has no way of determining whether someone they are about to arrest for trespassing has in fact been invited onto the property, and the marketing staff apparently is not informed that someone has been warned never to return. Desert Palace conducts these two functions entirely separately, without any safeguard in place to prevent the situation that arose here. If any patron evicted by the security department were automatically removed from the marketing department's mailing list, for instance, Tsao would not have received invitations, and there would be no question that she was trespassing. It is this gap in communication between the two departments, this omission, that led to the alleged constitutional violation in this case. A review of our case law on policies of commission further supports the idea that, as Tsao has stated her claim, the policy at issue here is one of omission. An official municipal policy, the Court has explained, 'includes the decisions of a government's lawmakers, the acts of its policymaking officials, and practices so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law.' Connick, 131 S.Ct. at 1359. Thus under the 'direct path' to municipal liability, a policy may be facially unconstitutional, like 'a city's policy of discriminating against pregnant women in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment.' Gibson, 290 F.3d at 1185 (citing Monell, 436 U.S. at 658). Or the constitutional violation may be the result of a direct order from a policymaking official, like 'a policy-maker's order to its employees to serve capiases in violation of the Fourth Amendment.'. . There is no suggestion here that Desert Palace's overall policy is to oust unwanted gamblers even though they have been invited onto the property, that there is any such persistent or widespread practice, or that a policymaking official directed Makeley to arrest her although the policymaker knew that she was at the casino by invitation. . .As Tsao has stated her claim, the cause of her arrest is thus best seen as an omission in Desert Palace's policies—the failure to create a coordination system between security and marketing. Tsao therefore must show 'that[Desert Palace's] deliberate indifference led to [this] omission.' Gibson, 290 F.3d at 1186. To show deliberate indifference, Tsao must demonstrate 'that [Desert Palace] was on actual or constructive notice that its omission would likely result in a constitutional violation.'. . Only then does the omission become 'the functional equivalent of a decision by [Desert Palace] itself to violate the Constitution.'. . As we observed in Gibson, '[p]olicies of omission regarding the supervision of employees ... can be "policies" or "customs" that create municipal liability ... only if the omission

"reflects a deliberate or conscious choice" to countenance the possibility of a constitutional violation.'. . Tsao has not alleged that Desert Palace had actual notice of the flaw in its policies. The question thus becomes whether the risk that security personnel might arrest someone who had been invited to the casino was so 'obvious' that ignoring it amounted to deliberate indifference. Tsao has not introduced facts sufficient to make this showing. First, there is no indication that this problem has ever arisen other than in the case of Tsao herself. In considering claims based on a failure to train municipal employees, the Court has noted that 'a pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees is "ordinarily necessary" to demonstrate deliberate indifference.'. . Similarly, the absence here of any evidence of a pattern makes it far less likely that Tsao can prove Desert Palace was 'on actual or constructive notice,'. . . that its policy would lead to constitutional violations. Second, it is far from obvious that the omissions in Desert Palace's policies would necessarily give rise to this situation."); Jones v. Town of East Haven, 691 F.3d 72, 81, 82, 85 (2d Cir. 2012) ("[I]solated acts of excessive force by non-policymaking municipal employees are generally not sufficient to demonstrate a municipal custom, policy, or usage that would justify municipal liability. . . On the other hand, such acts would justify liability of the municipality if, for example, they were done pursuant to municipal policy, or were sufficiently widespread and persistent to support a finding that they constituted a custom, policy, or usage of which supervisory authorities must have been aware, or if a municipal custom, policy, or usage would be inferred from evidence of deliberate indifference of supervisory officials to such abuses. . . A plaintiff alleging that she has been injured by the actions of a low-level municipal employee can establish municipal liability by showing that a policymaking official ordered or ratified the employee's actions—either expressly or tacitly. . . Thus, a plaintiff can prevail against a municipality by showing that the policymaking official was aware of the employee's unconstitutional actions and consciously chose to ignore them. . . A municipal policymaking official's 'deliberate indifference' to the unconstitutional actions, or risk of unconstitutional actions, of municipal employees can in certain circumstances satisfy the test for a municipal custom, policy, or usage that is actionable under Section 1983. . . To establish deliberate indifference a plaintiff must show that a policymaking official was aware of constitutional injury, or the risk of constitutional injury, but failed to take appropriate action to prevent or sanction violations of constitutional rights. . . .Given the standards summarized above, we conclude that the evidence Plaintiff presented at trial was insufficient as a matter of law to support a reasonable finding that Plaintiff's loss was attributable to a custom, policy, or usage of the Town of East Haven. There are a number of different ways in which, given sufficient evidence, Plaintiff might have satisfied the burden of showing municipal liability under the standards of Monell. One would be to show a sufficiently widespread practice among police officers of abuse of the rights of black people to support reasonably the conclusion that such abuse was the custom of the officers of the Department and that supervisory personnel must have been aware of it but took no adequate corrective or preventive measures (or some combination of the two). Another might be that officers of the Department expressed among themselves an inclination to abuse the rights of black people with sufficient frequency or in such manner that the attitude would have been known to supervisory personnel, which then took no adequate corrective or preventive steps. A third might be a showing of deliberate indifference on the part of supervisory personnel to abuse of the rights of black people, which was communicated to line officers so as to give them the sense that they could engage in such abuse of rights without risking appropriate disciplinary consequences. The trial evidence was not sufficient to support a finding against the Town on any such theory. Furthermore, the district court itself found, in ruling on the Town's motion for judgment as a matter of law, that Plaintiff failed to establish a custom, policy, or usage on the part of the Town of not disciplining EHPD officers for violating the constitutional rights of black people, or that the Town created a hostile environment for black people through a practice of harassing, stopping, and interfering with them, and Plaintiff has not suggested on appeal that those rulings were erroneous. The evidence, construed (as it must be) in the manner most favorable to the Plaintiff, unquestionably showed instances of reprehensible and at times illegal and unconstitutional conduct by individual officers of the EHPD. But such a showing is not a sufficient basis for imposing liability on the municipality. To justify imposition of liability on the municipality, the Plaintiff needed to show that her loss was attributable to a custom, policy, or usage of the Town or its supervisory officials. The trial evidence failed to make such a showing. The evidence failed to show a pattern of abusive conduct (or expressions of inclination toward such abusive conduct) among officers, so widespread as to support an inference that it must have been known and tolerated by superiors. It failed to show sufficient instances of tolerant awareness by supervisors of abusive conduct to support an inference that they had a policy, custom or usage of acquiescence in such abuse. Nor was there evidence that supervisors communicated to officers an attitude of indifference to abuse so as to give the officers a sense of liberty to abuse rights. . . . In sum, Plaintiff's evidence showed two instances, or at the most three, over a period of several years in which a small number of officers abused the rights of black people, and one incident in which an officer indicated a disposition to abuse the rights of black people. This evidence fell far short of showing a policy, custom, or usage of officers to abuse the rights of black people, and far short of showing abusive conduct among officers so persistent that it must have been known to supervisory authorities. It showed no instances in which supervisors were aware of abuse, or of a high probability of abuse, but failed to take corrective or preventive action. And it showed no instance in which supervisory personnel exhibited indifference to abuse of the rights of black people. While any instance in which police officers abuse people's rights is intolerable, the question before us in this appeal is whether Plaintiff's evidence was sufficient to support a finding of liability of the Town under the standards of Monell. Notwithstanding Plaintiff's showing of some instances of abusive conduct by a few officers, Plaintiff failed to put forth evidence that can justify imposition of liability on the municipality. We therefore conclude that the Town was entitled to the grant of its motion for judgment as a matter of law, and that the district court erred in denying its motion. We therefore remand to the district court with instructions to vacate the judgment in favor of Plaintiff and to enter judgment in favor of the Town."); Doe v. Luzerne County, 660 F.3d 169, 180 (3d Cir. 2011) ("Here, the record does not support Doe's claim that the County's alleged failure to train amounted to deliberate indifference towards Doe's constitutional rights. The record does not demonstrate that any of the County's policymakers knew that its employees would likely confront a situation implicating the violation of one's right to privacy when videotaping certain activities. Similarly, the record is devoid of any evidence that there has been a history of County employees mishandling the production of training videos or videotaping in general; indeed, there is no evidence that there has ever been another incident like the one Doe experienced. . . Further, it cannot be said that a wrong choice by a County employee while producing a training video or videotaping in general will frequently cause a deprivation of one's constitutional right to privacy. . . Consequently, any alleged failure by the County to train its employees did not amount to deliberate indifference towards Doe's constitutional rights. In any event, Doe has not produced sufficient evidence demonstrating that a deficiency in the County's training program actually caused the alleged violation of her constitutional privacy right. Accordingly, we will affirm the District Court's dismissal of Doe's failure to train claim against the County."); Craig v. Floyd County, Ga., 643 F.3d 1306, 1308, 1311 (11th Cir. 2011) ("While detained for nine days in jail, Craig received sixteen evaluations from nine different employees of Georgia Correctional before he received a computed tomography scan, which revealed that Craig had air, bleeding, and fractures in his head that required neurological surgery. The district court ruled that Craig could not prove a policy or custom of deliberate indifference based on this single incident. Because Craig failed to present evidence that Georgia Correctional had a policy or custom of constitutional violations, we affirm. . . . A single incident of a constitutional violation is insufficient to prove a policy or custom even when the incident involves several employees of the municipality. . . . Craig's proof of a policy or custom rests entirely on a single incident of alleged unconstitutional activity. Craig presented evidence that several employees of Georgia Correctional evaluated his single injury. Craig complained that the actions and omissions of the employees of Georgia Correctional, taken together, not individually, amounted to deliberate indifference to his serious medical need. Like the former detainee in McDowell, Craig 'cannot point to another occasion' when an alleged policy or custom 'contributed to or exacerbated an inmate's medical condition.'. . Craig instead relies on '[p]roof of a single incident of unconstitutional activity,'. . . which is 'not sufficient to impose liability' against Georgia Correctional[.]"); Craig v. Floyd County, Ga., 643 F.3d 1306, 1312, 1313 (11th Cir. 2011) (Cox, J., specially concurring) ("I do not join the majority opinion because I am not satisfied that this case involves a 'single incident.' I do not have to count 'incidents,' however, to conclude that Craig has failed to offer proof that can support a finding that there was a custom, policy or practice of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. I therefore concur in the result and the judgment."); AFL-CIO v. City of Miami, 637 F.3d 1178, 1189 (11th Cir. 2011) ("The CIP [Civilian Investigative Panel] report does not say the city was on notice that its First and Fourth Amendment training was deficient before the FTAA demonstration and because the report itself was written after the FTAA summit, it cannot be the basis for establishing notice itself. Accordingly, the district court was correct to conclude that the CIP report was not evidence that the City of Miami was on notice that it needed to improve MPD's training on First and Fourth Amendment issues. The second report cited by the plaintiffs is a March 2003 letter from the United States Department of Justice (DOJ), which details the preliminary findings of a DOJ investigation regarding use of force and use-of-force reporting by the MPD. That letter is certainly evidence that the City of Miami was on notice that its use-of-force policies and training needed improvement. But summary judgment was nonetheless appropriate. A plaintiff must present evidence not only that the municipality was on notice of a need to train but also that the municipality made a choice not to do so. . . Because the plaintiffs failed to adduce evidence on that second point, summary judgment was appropriate."); Bryson v. City of Oklahoma City, 627 F.3d 784, 789, 790, 792 (10th

Cir. 2010) ("We conclude Plaintiff has not presented sufficient evidence to support a finding of deliberate indifference. According to the undisputed evidence presented to the district court, the City had not yet received any complaints or criticisms of any of its forensic chemists' work at the time Ms. Gilchrist concealed exculpatory evidence and falsified her test reports in 1983. Plaintiff argues we can find municipal liability despite the City's lack of contemporaneous notice of problems in the forensic laboratory because Ms. Gilchrist's wrongful actions were a highly predictable or plainly obvious consequence of the relatively short technical training period and lack of meaningful supervision for the City's forensic chemists. We are not persuaded, however, that it was highly predictable or plainly obvious that a forensic chemist would decide to falsify test reports and conceal evidence if she received only nine months of on-the-job training and was not supervised by an individual with a background in forensic science. . . Moreover, although the record reflects that most forensic laboratories began adopting better training and management practices in the 1970s and early 1980s, such practices were by no means universal in 1983, further militating against the conclusion that it was highly predictable or plainly obvious in 1983 that the training and supervision practices employed by the City and other jurisdictions would result in the violation of federal rights. Plaintiff argues we can infer deliberate indifference in 1983 based on the City's prolonged failure to take any remedial or investigatory actions even after criticisms of Ms. Gilchrist began coming to light in 1986, as well as the ease of implementing quality controls to prevent her wrongful actions. However, although this evidence may show that the City later acted with deliberate indifference to Ms. Gilchrist's subsequent misdeeds, it is irrelevant to the material question before us − whether the City consciously or deliberately chose in 1983 to ignore a risk of harm which the City had been put on notice of either by a past pattern of wrongful acts or by the high predictability that wrongful acts would occur. On that question, we find no evidence to support Plaintiff's claim. . . . We are sympathetic to Plaintiff's plight and find it deplorable that the conditions that led to his unjust confinement were permitted to continue for so long a time after the City was put on notice of the deficiencies in its forensic laboratory program. Nevertheless, we see no basis in the summary judgment record for holding the City liable in this case."); Hardeman v. Kerr County, Tex., 244 F. App'x 593, ___ (5th Cir. 2007) ("There must be a strong connection between the background of the particular applicant and the specific violation alleged. Accordingly, plaintiffs cannot succeed in defeating summary judgment merely because there was a probability that a poorly-screened officer would violate their protected rights; instead, they must show that the hired officer was highly likely to inflict the particular type of injury suffered by them. . . It is obvious that Kerr County should have done a better job screening Marrero. His omission of answers to key questions, such as whether he had previously been fired, alone should have been cause for alarm. Furthermore, had the County contacted Harlandale ISD it likely would have learned that the district fired Marrero for making improper advances towards female students. Such information may have prompted the County to rethink hiring him for a position that would place him in close proximity to female inmates on a regular basis. Even if the County was negligent in hiring him, however, that still is not sufficient to hold the County liable for the constitutional violation. . . . There are no grounds to find that the alleged rape in question was a 'plainly obvious consequence' of hiring him. Id. Even if the County had done a thorough job of investigating Marrero, there was absolutely no history of violence, sexual or otherwise, to be found. While the grounds for his discharge from Harlandale ISD were troubling, especially in retrospect, it requires an enormous leap to connect 'improper advances' towards female students to the sexual assault at issue here."); Perez v. Oakland County, 466 F.3d 416, 431 (6th Cir. 2006) (" It does not seem 'obvious,' as Perez Sr. argues (Pl.'s Br. 59), that allowing a caseworker well-trained in mental health needs and suicide [footnote omitted] to occasionally make housing decisions that affect the mental health of inmates would result in a suicide, and the lack of statistics to support this conclusion furthers the argument that there was a lack of foreseeability. . . We agree with the district court that supplying expert testimony that the County's practice is inadequate and poses a risk to inmates does not support the conclusion that the County acted with deliberate indifference to Perez's mental health needs, though it might support the conclusion that the County was negligent. A finding of negligence does not satisfy the deliberate indifference standard."); Whitewater v. Goss, 192 F. App'x 794, 799 (10th Cir. 2006) ("Plaintiffs have pointed to no evidence that Sheriff Goss was put on notice by information that the SWAT team had employed excessive force against children on prior occasions or that such abuse is to be expected absent some training not given to SWAT-team members. Plaintiffs' bald allegations of training failures contrast with the evidence presented in Allen v. Muskogee, . . . in which we reversed a grant of summary judgment on such a claim. In Allen the plaintiffs had presented expert testimony that 'the training was out of synch with the entire United States in terms of what police are being trained to do.' . . The evidence here establishes only that the SWAT-team members were trained, and no evidence was presented that the training was deficient under prevailing norms. Nor are the supervisory failures referenced by Plaintiffs such that their 'highly predictable or plainly obvious consequence' would be holding a 12-year-old at gunpoint without justification."); Doe v. Magoffin County Fiscal Court, 174 F. App'x 962, 968 (6th Cir. 2006) ("Like the municipality in Brown, the fiscal court is not liable because Doe cannot demonstrate that any policy or custom of the fiscal court in its hiring practices caused her constitutional injury. . . Adequate scrutiny of Patton's criminal record would not reveal that it was highly likely that Patton would sexually assault a juvenile or lock her in a room against her will. First, the defendants submitted evidence, which Doe does not challenge with any record evidence, that Patton's criminal record does not reveal violent crimes. Second, the crimes with which Patton was allegedly charged do not demonstrate any propensity to commit sex crimes or to imprison someone. At most, the record demonstrates that Patton was convicted of vote fraud, attempted arson, and battery against a male politician while Patton was drunk. As in Brown, Patton may have been an 'extremely poor candidate' for his job as custodian or even supervisor, . . . but his convictions do not make it 'plainly obvious' that Patton would commit sexual assault or falsely imprison someone. . . . Doe's case is not salvaged by the fact that the fiscal court and the county judge executives never performed criminal-background checks on potential employees. . . . . Doe has not pointed to any other instance in which the Magoffin County Fiscal Court's failure to perform background checks caused another to be deprived of his or her constitutional rights. Moreover, both Dr. Hardin and Salyer testified in their depositions that background checks were unnecessary because everyone knows everyone else in the county. The mere fact that one employee committed a crime does not demonstrate that Magoffin County's custom of not performing background checks was sure to lead to constitutional deprivations, especially when scrutiny of Patton's record would not have revealed that he was highly likely to commit rape or imprison someone. Because Doe has failed to demonstrate that any custom of the Magoffin County Fiscal Court was the 'moving force' behind the injury alleged, Doe's federal hiring-practices claims against the Magoffin County Fiscal Court and Salyer in his official capacity fail as a matter of law."); Crete v. City of Lowell, 418 F.3d 54, 66 (1st Cir. 2005) ("In this case, the City's hiring decision was itself legal, and the City did not authorize Ciavola to use excessive force. The process used to investigate the background of Ciavola was reasonable: it revealed the past conduct which Crete asserts links the hiring of Ciavola with his use of excessive force. The department made its hiring decision with knowledge of Ciavola's background and assurances from Ciavola's probation officer that Ciavola would 'make an excellent police officer' despite his assault and battery conviction. But '[e]ven when an applicant's background contains complaints of physical violence, including acts of aggression and assault, this may still be insufficient to make a City liable for inadequate screening of an officer who then uses excessive force.'. . And such is the case here: Crete simply cannot meet his heavy burden. There was insufficient evidence on which a jury could base a finding that a 'plainly obvious consequence' of the City's decision to hire Ciavola was the violation of Crete's constitutional rights. . .Summary judgment was proper."); Estate of Davis by and through Dyann v. City of North Richland Hills, 406 F.3d 375, 381-85 (5th Cir. 2005) ("When, as here, a plaintiff alleges a failure to train or supervise, 'the plaintiff must show that: (1) the supervisor either failed to supervise or train the subordinate official; (2) a causal link exists between the failure to train or supervise and the violation of the plaintiff's rights; and (3) the failure to train or supervise amounts to deliberate indifference.'. . . We are persuaded that there is no material issue on the record before us with respect to the question of whether Appellants were deliberately indifferent. Because this case falters on the requirement of deliberate indifference, we need not address the other two prongs of supervisory liability. . . . We are persuaded that these facts do not demonstrate a prior pattern by Hill of violating constitutional rights by employing excessive force. We have stressed that a single incident is usually insufficient to demonstrate deliberate indifference. Prior indications cannot simply be for any and all 'bad' or unwise acts, but rather must point to the specific violation in question. . . That is, notice of a pattern of similar violations is required. While the specificity required should not be exaggerated, our cases require that the prior acts be fairly similar to what ultimately transpired and, in the case of excessive use of force, that the prior act have involved injury to a third party. None of the facts highlighted by the district court indicated use of excessive force against a third party resulting in injury. First, while Hill's over-'exposed' photography stunt and his earned nickname collectively demonstrate lack of judgment, crudity, and, perhaps illegalities, they do not point to past use of excessive force. Similarly, the traffic stop, while perhaps improper in its own right, did not involve excessive force with a deadly weapon resulting in harm to a citizen in a context similar to the present case. By comparison, in Roberts v. City of Shreveport, we recently held that a habit of displaying a firearm during traffic stops does not constitute a relevant pattern with respect to using deadly force during a traffic stop. Here, there is no evidence that Hill had previously improperly displayed his weapon to a third party, or used excessive force. Second, Hill's inappropriate use of his gun during training is, at first blush, more troubling. Hill inappropriately fired his weapon in mock settings apparently much like the scene in which Hill ultimately shot Davis. However, because it was a training exercise it is undisputed that no one's constitutional rights were violated and that Hill never used excessive force against a third party. Furthermore, we hesitate in analyzing supervisory liability to place too much emphasis on mistakes during training. We are wary of creating incentives to conduct less training so as to minimize the chance that a subordinate will make a training mistake that can be used against the supervisor if that subordinate later makes a mistake in the course of duty. More to the point, in training mistakes are the fodder and 'adequately trained officers occasionally make mistakes; the fact that they do says little about the training program or the legal basis' for holding a supervisor liable. Even if a fact finder were to infer that Hill's training did not stick or that he resisted it, the incidents in training did not effect a violation of a third party's rights. On this record, Appellants cannot be deemed deliberately indifferent by failing to supervise or train differently.' footnotes omitted); Estate of Sowards v. City of Trenton, No. 03-2036, 2005 WL 434577, at * 10 (6th Cir. Feb. 24, 2005) (not published) ("In order for liability to attach in this type of circumstance, 'the identified deficiency in a city's training program must be closely related to the ultimate injury.' . . A plaintiff must 'prove that the deficiency in training actually caused the police officers' indifference' to the rights or needs of the person harmed. . . For this reason, the injuries based on the inadequacy of training claim, if any, are those stemming from the illegal entry, not the shooting. Again, the district court correctly found that the failure to adequately train was not the proximate cause of the shooting and appropriately limited the damages recoverable to those stemming from the illegal entry, not Sowards's death. The City, then, can only be held liable to the extent its failure to train caused Corporal O'Connor and Officer Scheffler to act with deliberate indifference toward Sowards's rights by entering the apartment without a warrant."); McDowell v. Brown, 392 F.3d 1283, 1291, 1292 (11th Cir. 2004) ("Mr. McDowell traces the County's liability to its failure to properly fund the resources necessary to staff the Jail. The Supreme Court has recognized that inadequate training may impose § 1983 liability on a municipality in 'limited circumstances.' . . The Court, however, refused to extend liability to inadequate hiring practices. . . McDowell is asking this Court to extend liability to inadequate budgeting practices, but does not identify any 'pattern of injuries' linked to the County's budgetary decisions, nor does he insist that its accounting practices are 'defective.' . . McDowell's claim rests upon one incident, which he attempts to trace back to a single decision; a decision that does not represent a violation of federal law on its face. Our precedent does not permit such an attenuated link. If it did, the 'danger that a municipality would be held liable without fault is high. . . The County's decision impacted this single case; it had no notice of the consequences 'based on previous violations of federally protected rights.'. . McDowell cannot establish that a reasonable member of the Board would conclude that the County's budget decisions would lead to events that occurred here. . . Although the record reflects that several deputies testified that the field division lacked the personnel to move inmates to Grady, no evidence was presented that the County's Board was aware of the health consequences involved. Moreover, the record demonstrated that the field division accomplished non-emergency transfers to Grady within a one-to-two hour window. Finally, the County's policy directed the field division to send all emergency cases to Grady by ambulance, and even non-emergency cases, if transport could not be effected in a timely manner. It was a clear, simple directive that said if you cannot transport with your resources you are to call an ambulance for needed medical transportation. With such practices in place, McDowell cannot establish or seriously dispute that the Board would anticipate that inmates would not receive timely medical attention. The alleged constitutional violation here was not a 'highly predictable consequence' of the County's failure to budget (and hence, adequately staff) the Sheriff's Office."); J.H. ex rel Higgin v. Johnson, 346 F.3d 788, 794 (7th Cir. 2003) ("Our decision in Kitzman-Kelley v. Warner, 203 F.3d 454 (7th Cir.2000) addresses the importance that an adequate link exist between the danger known to state officials and the alleged harm suffered by the plaintiff in cases falling within the 'special relationship' exception to the DeShaney doctrine, as does this case. In Kitzman-Kelley, a DCFS intern subjected a seven-year-old foster child to a pattern of sexual abuse. It was alleged that the DCFS defendants violated the child's due process rights by failing to provide adequate screening, training and supervision of the intern. We found that the deliberate indifference standard could not be met by merely showing that hiring officials engaged in less than careful scrutiny of the applicant resulting in a generalized risk of harm, but rather the standard 'require[d] a strong connection between the background of the particular applicant and the specific constitutional violation alleged.' . . Accordingly, proving a general risk of minor dangers is insufficient to warrant liability. It must be shown that there were known or suspected risks of child abuse or serious neglect in particular. . . . Against this backdrop, we cannot conclude in this case that the placement of a child with an individual who had two past accusations of child abuse that were investigated and determined to be unfounded warrants imposing liability on these defendants."); Cousin v. Small, 325 F.3d 627, 638 (5th Cir. 2003) ("Cousin also failed to demonstrate that the training or supervision obviously was inadequate and plainly would result in violations of constitutional rights. As Cousin concedes, Connick's policy and training program was adequate. Therefore, it is his failure to impose sanctions on prosecutors responsible for Brady violations that must be shown to render his supervision inadequate. Connick's enforcement of the policy was not patently inadequate or likely to result in constitutional violations. Where prosecutors commit Brady violations, convictions may be overturned. That could be a sufficient deterrent, such that the imposition of additional sanctions by Connick is unnecessary. Further, prosecutors exercise independent judgment in trying a case, and they have the legal and ethical obligation to comply with Brady. It is not apparent that these prosecutors, who, Cousin concedes, are adequately trained with respect to Brady requirements, are so likely to violate their individual obligations that the threat of additional sanctions is required."); Morris v. Crawford County, 299 F.3d 919, 923-25 (8th Cir. 2002) ("Bryan County teaches us that liability may not be imposed unless a plaintiff directly links the applicant's background with the risk that, if hired, that applicant would use excessive force. In other words, a plaintiff must show that the hiring decision and the plaintiff's alleged constitutional injury are closely connected − an applicant's background is that causal link. What then must an applicant's background reveal for a plaintiff's alleged injury to be the plainly obvious consequence of the hiring decision? . . .In sum, to avoid summary judgment, a plaintiff must point to prior complaints in an applicant's background that are nearly identical to the type of misconduct that causes the constitutional deprivation allegedly suffered by the plaintiff. This is a rigorous test to be sure. . . . Deputy Ruiz's background does not reveal that he knee-dropped an inmate (or anyone for that matter), nor does it reveal a single complaint of excessive force. Deputy Ruiz's record includes slapping an inmate at the Sebastian County Detention Center in 1996; mishandling inmates' money and property; 'mouthing off' to two fellow deputies at Sebastian County and 'invit[ing] [one of them] to the gym any day, any time ... to take care of it' in 1997; disobeying a nurse during which the nurse overheard Deputy Ruiz say 'he was going to knock that bitch out'; and acting insubordinate at work, disobeying orders, cursing other employees, failing to adhere to rules. . . . There are also accusations by Deputy Ruiz's ex-wife that, in 1997, he ran her off the road, tore a necklace off her neck, and pushed her, as well as accusations by Deputy Ruiz's girlfriend that, in 1999, he grabbed her arm and threw her, and threatened to assault her. Morris emphasizes Deputy Ruiz's past incidents of domestic violence, arguing such acts portend violence in the workplace. Both Deputy Ruiz's ex-wife and girlfriend obtained ex parte protective orders against him, but none of their claims were ever substantiated. Morris relies on Parrish v. Luckie, 963 F.2d 201 (8th Cir. 1992), for the proposition that violent or abusive behavior of any kind indicates a strong potential for violent behavior against persons in custody. We need not decide whether Parrish stands for such a proposition, however, because even if it did, Bryan County implicitly rejected such an argument in the context of municipal liability based on a single hiring decision."); Riddick v. School Board of the City of Portsmouth, 238 F.3d 518, 525, 526 (4th Cir. 2000) ("When Crute was investigated in 1989 for openly filming fully-clothed female students, it was not plainly obvious that he would videotape other students with a hidden camera nearly three years later. . . . . Put simply, the causal connection between the 1989 incident and the alleged constitutional deprivation is simply too attenuated to impose municipal liability on the Board. . . . Admittedly, in light of his subsequent reprehensible behavior, the failure to terminate Crute in 1989 was unfortunate and perhaps ill-advised. However, short-sightedness does not suffice to establish 'deliberate indifference.'"); Gros v. City of Grand Prairie (Gros IV), 209 F.3d 431, 434, 435 (5th Cir. 2000) ("[P]laintiffs cannot succeed in defeating summary judgment merely because there was a probability that a poorly-screened officer would violate their protected rights; instead, they must show that the hired officer was highly likely to inflict the particular type of injury suffered by them. . . . Rogers had never sexually assaulted, sexually harassed, falsely arrested, improperly searched or seized, or used excessive force against any third party. Indeed, the record reflects that he never committed a serious crime. Just as in Aguillard, the incident in Rogers's past that was potentially most damaging to his record − the complaint for an alleged improper drawing of his weapon during a traffic stop − was not sustained by UTA. And the reprimands and complaints that were sustained do not meet Brown's requirement of a 'strong' causal connection between Rogers's background and the specific constitutional violations alleged."); Aguillard v. McGowen, 207 F.3d 226, 230, 231 (5th Cir. 2000) ("Here, the record is far less suggestive of McGowen committing homicide than the record in Bryan County was of Burns committing battery. The record shows that McGowen threatened the mother of a juvenile with arrest, that he meddled in this mother's supervision of the child while he was off duty, and that the mother ultimately hired an attorney and threatened to obtain a restraining order against him. Colleagues at the Houston Police Department reported that McGowen wanted to 'ride where the women were,' and a female colleague stated that she did not want to ride with him under any circumstances. The record also discloses a report that in March 1990, McGowen assaulted and pistol-whipped a teenage boy who was driving his car around McGowen's apartment complex. Significantly, McGowen was neither arrested for nor convicted of the alleged assault. But while all of this may indicate that McGowen was 'an extremely poor candidate' for the County's police force, . . . the record shows not one shred of solid evidence foreshadowing McGowen's tragic killing of White. McGowen had never been formally disciplined, and his informal discipline record included only the infractions of using the police radio for broadcasting personal messages and refusing to convey information to one party in a vehicular accident. McGowen had never wrongfully shot anyone before, nor did his record reveal him to be likely to use excessive force in general or possess a trigger-happy nature in particular. Certainly, the evidence of deliberate indifference in this case falls short of the quantum and quality of evidence presented in Bryan County, which the Supreme Court determined to be insufficient. In short, even when viewing the evidence, as we must, in the light most favorable to Aguillard, the record is bereft of evidence sufficient to impose liability on the County for wrongfully hiring McGowen. While the County may have been negligent in its employment decision, the magnitude of its error does not reach constitutional cognizance. We therefore hold that the district court erred in denying the County's Rule 50 motion for judgment as a matter of law, and we dismiss the County from this case."); Kitzman-Kelley v. Warner, 203 F.3d 454, 458, 459 (7th Cir. 2000) ("[A]lthough it is permissible to base a sec. 1983 claim on a failure to screen properly a candidate for a public position, our case law makes clear that the plaintiff must allege and establish that the defendants went about the hiring process with 'deliberate indifference.' As our colleagues in the Tenth Circuit have noted, the 'deliberate indifference' standard is not met by a showing that hiring officials engaged in less than careful scrutiny of an applicant resulting in a generalized risk of harm. The requisite showing of culpability 'requires a strong connection between the background of the particular applicant and the specific constitutional violation alleged.' [citing Barney v. Pulsipher]"); Kitzman-Kelley v. Warner, 203 F.3d 454, 461, 462 (7th Cir. 2000) (Posner, C.J., dissenting) ("The supervisory employees of the state's welfare department who are sued in this case hired Philip Heiden, a college student, as an intern and assigned him to work with the caseworker assigned to Melissa. . . . Heiden was hired on the recommendation of one of his professors, and the defendants did not bother to investigate his background; had they done so, they would have discovered that he had a history of mental illness and drug abuse. After he was hired, on several occasions he took Melissa to his home and there sexually abused her. The defendants did not monitor his work with Melissa. He kept detailed notes of his sessions with her and turned them into his supervisors, but they didn't bother to read them. Had they done so, they would have discovered that he was taking her to his home, though not that he was sexually abusing her. The defendants were negligent in failing to investigate Heiden's background and to monitor his work with Melissa, but negligence, as the plaintiff fails to understand but my colleagues rightly emphasize, is not a basis for liability under 42 U.S.C. sec.1983. . . . The defendants doubtless should have been more careful and not relied entirely on a professor's recommendation, but the failure to exercise due care is precisely what the law means by negligence. It is not as if they had entrusted Melissa to someone whom they knew to have a record as a child molester; that would be an example of conscious indifference to an obvious danger, . . .but it is a far cry from hiring an intern on a professor's recommendation and then neglecting to monitor the intern. If that is reckless indifference, I do not know what it means to say that negligent misconduct is not actionable under section 1983."); Lopez v. LeMaster, 172 F.3d 756, 760 (10th Cir. 1999) ("It is not enough, however, for appellant to show that there were general deficiencies in the county's training program for jailers. Rather, he must identify a specific deficiency in the county's training program closely related to his ultimate injury, and must prove that the deficiency in training actually caused his jailer to act with deliberate indifference to his safety. . . Appellant did not meet that burden here. Appellant not only did not name his jailer as a defendant in this suit, he failed to identify him at all. That omission seriously undermines his attempt to hold the county liable for any actions deliberately taken by the jailer. Appellant has presented no evidence concerning deficiencies in training of the particular jailer involved in his case. Nor has he shown that the county had a uniform policy of providing its jailers with insufficient training in the areas closely related to his ultimate injury from which we might infer that his particular jailer's training also was insufficient."); Carter v. Morris, 164 F.3d 215, 218, 219 (4th Cir.1999) ("[A] plaintiff cannot rely upon scattershot accusations of unrelated constitutional violations to prove either that a municipality was indifferent to the risk of her specific injury or that it was the moving force behind her deprivation. . . . Section 1983 does not grant courts a roving commission to root out and correct whatever municipal transgressions they might discover − our role is to decide concrete cases. Unfocused evidence of unrelated constitutional violations is simply not relevant to the question of whether a municipal decisionmaker caused the violation of the specific federal rights of the plaintiff before the court. Permitting plaintiffs to splatter-paint a picture of scattered violations also squanders scarce judicial and municipal time and resources. As a practical matter, a case involving inquiries into various loosely related incidents can be an unruly one to try. . . In this case, Carter does not allege that the City of Danville promulgated any formal unconstitutional policy. Rather, she asserts that the City has remained deliberately indifferent to or has actively condoned a long and widespread history of violations of the federal rights of citizens on the part of its police department. But Carter's proffered evidence, mainly allegations of prior instances of excessive force and the discouragement of citizen complaints, ranges far a field of her own alleged constitutional injuries. Her approach is insufficiently precise to establish the existence of a municipal policy or custom that actually could have caused her specific injuries. On the record before us, Carter's only plausible federal claims are that Danville police officers subjected her to an unreasonable search and seizure and to an unlawful arrest. [footnote omitted] The bulk of her evidence, however, is not relevant to those claims. . . . Past incidents of excessive force do not make unlawful arrests or unreasonable searches or seizures 'almost bound to happen, sooner or later, rather than merely likely to happen in the long run.' . . Carter in essence claims that past generalized bad police behavior led to future generalized bad police behavior, of which her specific deprivations are an example. This nebulous chain fails the 'rigorous standards of culpability and causation' required for municipal liability under section 1983. [citing Brown]."); Barney v. Pulsipher, 143 F.3d 1299, 1308 & n.7, 1309 (10th Cir. 1998) ("Merely showing that a municipal officer engaged in less than careful scrutiny of an applicant resulting in a generalized risk of harm is not enough to meet the rigorous requirements of 'deliberate indifference.'. . Culpability requires a strong connection between the background of the particular applicant and the specific constitutional violation alleged. Establishing municipal liability in the hiring context requires a finding that 'this officer was highly likely to inflict the particular injury suffered by the plaintiff.' . . . Mr. Pulsipher's background investigation revealed an arrest at age seventeen for possession of alcohol and several speeding tickets. He completed a state certified basic training program, to which he would have been denied admission had he been convicted of any crimes involving unlawful sexual conduct or physical violence. Plaintiffs have presented no evidence that Mr. Pulsipher's background could have led Sheriff Limb to conclude Mr. Pulsipher was highly likely to inflict sexual assault on female inmates if hired as a correctional officer. . . . We note that the focus of the inquiry in determining when a single poor hiring decision is sufficient to constitute deliberate indifference appears to be on the actual background of the individual applicant and not on the thoroughness or adequacy of the municipality's review of the application itself. . . . Whether or not an unsuitable applicant is ultimately hired depends more on his actual history than the actions or inactions of the municipality. Take, for example, a situation in which a hiring official completely fails to screen an application and hires an applicant, but the applicant actually has a spotless background. In such cases, the Court has stated that the hiring official cannot be said to have consciously disregarded an obvious risk that the applicant would inflict constitutional harm on the citizens of the municipality when even a thorough investigation would have revealed no cause for concern."); Snyder v. Trepagnier, 142 F.3d 791, 797 (5th Cir. 1998) ("Trepagnier had admitted to two nonviolent offenses: stealing a jacket and smoking marihuana. On this evidence, Snyder's claim that the city's screening policies were inadequate fails the Bryan County test: that the plaintiff's injury be the 'plainly obvious consequence' of the hiring decision."), cert. dism'd, 119 S. Ct. 1493 (1999); Allen v. Muskogee, 119 F.3d 837, 845 (10th Cir. 1997) ("The case before us is within the 'narrow range of circumstances' recognized by Canton and left intact by Brown, under which a single violation of federal rights may be a highly predictable consequence of failure to train officers to handle recurring situations with an obvious potential for such a violation. The likelihood that officers will frequently have to deal with armed emotionally upset persons, and the predictability that officers trained to leave cover, approach, and attempt to disarm such persons will provoke a violent response, could justify a finding that the City's failure to properly train its officers reflected deliberate indifference to the obvious consequence of the City's choice. The likelihood of a violent response to this type of police action also may support an inference of causation − that the City's indifference led directly to the very consequence that was so predictable."); Lancaster v. Monroe County, 116 F.3d 1419, 1428-29 & n.10 (11th Cir. 1997) (noting that holding of Parker, that County could be held liable for hiring policies of Sheriff that resulted in rape of female arrestee, may no longer be good law after Brown.); Doe v. Hillsboro Independent School District, 113 F.3d 1412, 1416 (5th Cir. 1997) (en banc) ("When the district court afforded Doe the opportunity to amend his complaint, he could not even allege that the custodian who assaulted his daughter either had a prior record of violent crime or previously had been reported to the officials for sexual misbehavior towards students. Even in the context of resisting a Rule 12 motion to dismiss, plaintiffs have demonstrated an inability to show a nexus between any failure to check criminal background and this assault.").

See also Gonsalves v. Clements, No. CV 21-021 WES, 2021 WL 3471335, at *3 (D.R.I. Aug. 6, 2021) ("Plaintiff alleges that, as policymakers for the City, Clements and Paré were responsible for the training of Endres and McParlin. . . Furthermore, despite having actual or constructive knowledge that officers 'routinely employ force in the seizure of persons, engage in vehicular pursuits, and that such pursuits pose a plain and substantial risk of constitutional violations and harm to civilians[,]' Clements and Paré failed to issue policies or provide any training regarding 'the reasonable and appropriate use of force by police officers in seizing individuals, utilizing their vehicles in pursuit of individuals, and the de-escalation of police-civilian encounters in a manner designed to reasonably and prudently minimize the risks of civilian harm.'. .Vehicular pursuits involve split-second decisions, complicated tactical considerations, and a significant risk of injury or death to individuals being pursued, bystanders, and officers. And, like the firearms discussed in Canton, vehicles can be weaponized to effect deadly force. . . Because of this inherent dangerousness, Plaintiff may be able to establish that the risk of constitutional violations was so patently obvious or highly predictable that the supervisory and municipal Defendants are liable despite a lack of prior incidents. . . . However, that logic does not extend to Plaintiff's theories of inadequate hiring, screening, discipline, remediation, and supervision. . . 'Unlike the risk from a particular glaring omission in a training regimen, the risk from a single instance of inadequate screening of an applicant's background is not "obvious" in the abstract; rather, it depends upon the background of the applicant.'. . The lack of alleged prior incidents therefore dooms the hiring and screening claims. The same goes for the claims of inadequate discipline, remediation, and supervision. If there were no prior unconstitutional acts, there were no opportunities for Clements, Paré, and the City to discipline or correct the officers' behavior. And if there were no missed opportunities for discipline, it is impossible for a policy against providing discipline to have caused the allegedly unconstitutional acts in this case. Thus, the claims in Counts XVII and XVIII of improper hiring, screening, supervision, remediation, and discipline are dismissed without prejudice."); Waller v. City of Fort Worth Texas, No. 4:15-CV-670-P, 2021 WL 233571, at *4–8 (N.D. Tex. Jan. 22, 2021) ("Plaintiffs argue that the City should be held liable for the following five policies:

(a) the City did not require its police officers to visually verify the address to which they had been dispatched on the scene;

(b) the City did not properly train its officers that there are odd-numbered addresses on one side of the street and even on the other;

(c) the City did not and does not require its officers to verbally identify themselves when confronting citizens and prior to using deadly force;

(d) the City policy is to allow its officers to enter and search the curtilage of residences without contacting or receiving permission of the homeowner; and

(e) the City had a policy of generally pairing rookie police officers with other rookie police officers after short field training experience and thus failing to provide sufficient supervision of the younger/inexperienced officers.

. . . For purpose of this order, the Court assumes these policies existed and were promulgated by the correct policymaker. The Court makes these assumptions not because they are necessarily true, but because it is unnecessary to wrestle with those difficulties. For the independent reasons below, the City cannot be liable for these alleged policies.

1. None of the policies or customs were 'moving forces' in Hoeppner's use of excessive force.

The first requirement that must not be diluted concerns the causal link between the policy and the constitutional violation. Originally, the Court stated the policy or custom must be a 'moving force' in the plaintiff's constitution violation. . . Since then, the Fifth Circuit has interpreted this phrase as requiring the plaintiff to 'show direct causation, i.e., that there was "a direct causal link" between the policy and the violation.'. . This requires 'more than a mere "but for" coupling between cause and effect.'. . In this case, the constitutional violation was Hoeppner's excessive use of force. This is key because 'there must be a direct causal link between the municipal policy and the constitutional deprivation.'. . In an excessive force case, the issue is whether the officer's use of force was reasonable. . . It is well-established that officers are justified in using deadly force whenever they reasonably fear serious bodily harm. . . . Importantly, the inquiry focuses on the officer's decision to use deadly force, therefore 'any of the officer's actions leading up to the shooting are not relevant for the purposes of an excessive force inquiry in [the Fifth] Circuit.' Harris v. Serpas, 745 F.3d 767, 772 (5th Cir. 2014). . . Identifying the constitutional violation focuses the analysis. Hoeppner's decision to use excessive force occurred in the time between Hanlon's first radio call, before any yelling, and his second radio call for an ambulance—44 seconds. Therefore, any acts or events before that time are immaterial. It follows that the Court must ignore the case's most disturbing fact—that the officers were at the wrong house. The Court must focus solely on policies that would have affected Hoeppner's judgment in those 44 seconds. Four of the policies (policies (a), (b), (d), and (e)) do not impact Hoeppner's thinking or judgment during those 44 seconds. They do no more than set the stage for the events that followed. These policies may be 'but for' causes, but they are not the moving force behind Hoeppner's use of force. . . . For the City to be liable, the policy must be either facially unlawful or, if the policy is facially lawful, enacted with 'deliberate indifference as to its known or obvious consequences.'. . . 'Proof of deliberate indifference normally requires a plaintiff to show a pattern of violations.'. . . .The Court concludes that the policies Plaintiffs identify fail to provide a basis for the City's liability. This case is tragic and the circumstances of Mr. Waller's death are absolutely heartrending. This order is in no way an approval of the City's policies. The Court merely finds that Plaintiffs failed to produce evidence sufficient to raise a fact issue regarding the demanding standards required in establishing municipal liability."); Martin v. Hermiston School District 8R, No. 3:18-CV-02088-HZ, 2020 WL 6547638, at *23-24 (D. Or. Nov. 4, 2020) (" To demonstrate a municipality's deliberate indifference to its inadequate training program, the plaintiff usually must show a pattern of similar constitutional violations caused by inadequate training. . . .Plaintiffs argue that the School District's failure to train its employees and coaches about the requirements of the Oregon statute and regulation shows its deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of its players and their parents. The School District argues that it adequately trained the coaches to keep players out of practice and play after the player receives a concussion until the player receives medical clearance and no longer exhibits signs and symptoms. The Court agrees. . . . Defendants Bruck, Emery, and Faateete knew that an athlete who had sustained a concussion or suspected concussion should not return to practice and play without first receiving medical clearance. . . . The School District did not have to train its employees on the specifics of the Oregon statute and regulation if it met the requirements of the statute and regulation. Those requirements included requiring coaches to take annual concussion training and ensuring that coaches knew that they should not return players with a concussion or a suspected concussion to sports until the player is symptom-free and received clearance from a doctor to return to athletic participation. The undisputed evidence establishes that the coaches and other School District personnel knew those requirements.

Plaintiffs can establish deliberate indifference on a failure to train theory only if the School District knew that its training was constitutionally inadequate and continued to use the same training method despite the known or obvious risk that constitutional violations that would result from the inadequate training. . . Even if Plaintiffs could show that the employees' training was inadequate, Plaintiffs have produced no evidence that the School District's policymakers knew or should have known about a pattern of constitutional violations caused by the inadequate training and chose to continue the same course. Without that showing, Plaintiffs cannot establish that the School District was deliberately indifferent to constitutionally inadequate training. . . . Plaintiffs may establish Monell liability without showing a pattern of constitutional violations if it was obvious to the School District that the School District's failure to train would lead to constitutional violations. . . Single-incident liability is rare and found only 'in a narrow range of circumstances.'. . It was not 'so patently obvious' to the School District that failing to train its employees on the specific mandates of the Oregon statute and regulation would lead to a constitutional violation when the School District employees knew that they should not return players who had received concussions to practice and play without medical clearance. . . Plaintiffs have not established a question of fact that the training the School District provided to its employees was constitutionally inadequate and that the inadequacy was patently obvious to the School District. Consequently, the Court grants the School District summary judgment on Plaintiffs' failure-to-train Monell claim. . . . The Court analyzes whether the School District was deliberately indifferent to a failure to supervise in the same manner as it analyzes an alleged failure to train. . . Thus, to establish Monell liability based on a failure to supervise, Plaintiffs must show that the School District's failure to supervise its employees amounted to deliberate indifference to the need for adequate supervision. Plaintiffs can establish the School District's deliberate indifference by showing a pattern of similar constitutional violations caused by a failure to supervise or by the rare single-incident liability theory discussed in Connick and *Bryan County.*Plaintiffs produced no evidence that shows a pattern of similar constitutional violations caused by the School District's failure to supervise its employees that was known to the School District before Plaintiffs' alleged constitutional violations occurred. Thus, Plaintiffs' failure to supervise Monell liability theory turns on whether they can establish that this case falls within the 'narrow range of circumstances' in which single-incident liability occurs. . . Plaintiffs argue that the School District's failure to supervise its coaches and athletic trainer to ensure that they did not return a student who had suffered a concussion to play sports without proper medical clearance falls within that narrow range of circumstances. Plaintiffs have not established that the constitutional consequences of the School District's failure to supervise its employees were patently obvious to the School District. Although the parties dispute the degree of supervision that Defendant Usher should have exercised over Defendants Emery, Faateete, and Bruck, Defendant Usher did supervise them to some degree. Defendant Usher testified that he ensured that the coaches and athletic trainer knew that they should not return an athlete to practice and play without medical clearance if the athlete suffered a concussion. At times, Defendant Usher met with Defendant Emery and discussed the status of athlete injuries, including concussions. Defendant Usher sometimes communicated to coaches about whether an athlete had received medical clearance to return to play after an injury. Defendant Usher also attended some of the games. Although he could have done more to supervise the other

Individual Defendants, under those circumstances, it was not 'highly predictable' or 'patently obvious' to the School District that its supervision of Defendant Usher, the coaches, and the athletic trainer would cause constitutional violations. Plaintiffs have not established that a question of material fact remains concerning whether the School District's supervision of its employees was patently obvious to lead to constitutional violations. As a result, the Court grants the School District summary judgment on Plaintiffs' Monell claim based on a failure to supervise."); Carter v. City of Montgomery, 473 F.Supp.3d 1273, ____ (M.D. Ala. 2020) ("The record would allow a jury to conclude that the City was deliberately indifferent to its public defenders' failure to adequately represent Municipal Court defendants. The City received billing records from its public defenders so it knew how few hours they spent in court. Based on the sheer volume of cases in the Municipal Court, a jury could find that the City knew its public defenders systemically failed to provide adequate defenses in violation of the Sixth Amendment. . . Accordingly, because a jury could conclude that the City was on notice of the inadequacy of Municipal Court public defense, it could conclude that the City was deliberately indifferent to the Sixth Amendment violations and hold it liable under § 1983."); Bergquist v. Milazzo, No. 18-CV-3619, 2020 WL 757902, at *6 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 14, 2020) ("Plaintiff alternatively alleges that Cook County 'failed to properly train its police officers on the proper standard for initiating an investigation of a criminal suspect, how to seize their property, and how to preserve their property unless and/or until an order to destroy such property is entered by a court of competent jurisdiction.'. . The Cook County Sheriff's Office's failure to train and supervise constitutes a policy or custom if it amounts to 'deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the [untrained employees] come into contact.'. . Connick provides two ways Plaintiff can establish deliberate indifference to her constitutional rights: (1) through a 'pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees;' or (2) by establishing that her unlawful detention was a 'highly predictable consequence' of failing to train and supervise. . .Here, Plaintiff claims that the Cook County Sheriff's Office did not properly train or supervise its deputies, pointing specifically to Milazzo's incorrect statement that a 'judicial order' prohibits citizens from filming outside a courthouse. . . Plaintiff also asserts that the Cook County Sheriff's Office failed to sufficiently train its deputies on the proper method for detaining and searching belongings. . . At this stage, this Court finds sufficient factual content to infer that Plaintiff's alleged constitutional deprivations stemmed from the Sheriff's Office's failure to train and supervise its deputies."); Passino v. City of Plattsburgh, No. 817CV1028FJSDJS, 2020 WL 509129, at *5 (N.D.N.Y. Jan. 31, 2020) ("'Proof of a single incident of unconstitutional activity is not sufficient to impose liability under Monell[.]'. . Furthermore, in a case like this one, 'where the policy relied upon is not itself unconstitutional,' the Supreme Court held that 'considerably more proof than the single incident will be necessary ... to establish both the requisite fault on the part of the municipality, and the causal connection between the "policy" and the constitutional deprivation.'. . Here, Plaintiff does not identify any other specific instances where Defendant City police officers violated a person's constitutional right against excessive force because they were not trained in using physical force on, or otherwise subduing, someone suffering from a severe mental disturbance or under the influence of drugs. . . Plaintiff merely generalizes that, without proper use of force training, situations where officers use excessive force 'could happen daily' and making the wrong choice about whether to use force 'would frequently cause the deprivation of a citizen's Fourth Amendment rights.'. . Thus, because Plaintiff has failed to allege more than this single incident of unconstitutional activity, the Court finds that Plaintiff cannot hold Defendant City liable under Monell and grants Defendants' motion for summary judgment with regard to this claim."); Whitledge v. City of Dearborn, No. 18-11444, 2019 WL 4189496, at *10 (E.D. Mich. Sept. 4, 2019) ("Municipal liability claims predicated on some form of inaction on the part of the state actor impose a 'heavy burden on the plaintiff' because a plaintiff 'cannot rely solely on a single instance to infer a policy of deliberate indifference.' Thomas v. City of Chattanooga, 398 F.3d 426, 433 (6th Cir. 2005). Failure to train cases, the Supreme Court has explained, constitute the 'most tenuous' basis for municipal liability. . . The Sixth Circuit has articulated three elements for a failure to train or supervise claim: '(1) the training or supervision was inadequate for the tasks performed; (2) the inadequacy was the result of the municipality's deliberate indifference; and (3) the inadequacy was closely related to or actually caused the injury.' Ellis v. Cleveland Mun. Sch. Dist., 455 F.3d 690, 700 (6th Cir. 2006). 'Mere allegations that an officer was improperly trained or that an injury could have been avoided with better training are insufficient to prove liability.' Miller v. Calhoun Co., 408 F.3d 803, 816 (6th Cir. 2005) (emphasis added). Accordingly, failure to train cases requires proof of '[a] pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees.' Connick, 563 U.S. at 62. Here, Plaintiff alleges that the City failed to train its officers in several respects. As explained below, the City is entitled to judgment as a matter of law on each of these claims because the facts alleged fall short of constitutional violation."); Montel v. City of Springfield, 386 F.Supp.3d 67, 79 n.9 (D. Mass. 2019) ("While there can be no municipal liability under section 1983 without an underlying constitutional violation, . . . the Court is troubled by Montel's allegations about the limited training on mental health emergencies that Springfield provides to its police force. . . A failure to train police officers can amount to an official government policy subject to Monell municipal liability when a municipality's failure to train 'amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of people with whom the police come into contact.'. . A plaintiff can show 'deliberate indifference' by demonstrating that 'the need for more or different training is so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the city can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.'. . A pattern of constitutional violations can put a municipality on notice of a training need, but liability can also attach from a single violation of constitutional rights when such a violation was 'a highly predictable consequence of a failure to equip law enforcement officers with specific tools to handle recurring situations.'. .Given that suicide rates in Massachusetts have increased substantially in recent years, . . . and that almost all mental health providers recommend calling a police dispatcher as a first step in a mental health emergency, . . . violations of federal rights seem an increasingly likely consequence of a failure to equip law enforcement officers with the tools to handle such emergencies. When nearly half of those killed by police in Massachusetts between 2005 and 2015 were mentally ill and a third of those injured in police shootings during that time period were undergoing a mental health crisis, . . . municipalities would best take notice that a failure to train their law enforcement officers to manage safely these 'recurring situations,'. . . may amount to 'deliberate indifference,'. . . were a constitutional violation to occur."); Serna v. City of Bakersfield, No. 117CV01290LJOJLT, 2019 WL 2164631, at *7 (E.D. Cal. May 17, 2019) ("Single-incident liability for failure to train is reserved for egregious examples of municipalities electing not to train their employees, thereby disregarding the known or obvious risk that the omission in the training program would cause employees to violate citizens' constitutional rights. Plaintiffs successfully asserting single-incident theories of liability 'generally involve incidents arising from a total lack of training, not simply an assertion that a municipal employee was not trained about the specific scenario related to the violation.'. . Bakersfield Police Department officers did undergo POST training on interacting with people with dementia and did operate under a policy governing the same topic. Plaintiffs' theory of liability based on the failure to train using the recently updated Learning Domain 37 falls far short of meeting the failure-to-train standard and does not create a triable issue of material fact. Defendant City of Bakersfield's motion for summary judgment for Monell liability for failure to train is GRANTED."); Wroth v. City of Rohnert Park, No. 17-CV-05339-JST, 2019 WL 1766163, at *15–16 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 22, 2019) ("Plaintiffs contend that Rohnert Park provided inadequate training regarding the risks of positional asphyxiation, pointing out that Rohnert Park has no official policies or guidelines regarding restraint techniques and positional asphyxia. . . Moreover, Plaintiffs stress, the only mention of positional asphyxia in any Rohnert Park training materials produced in discovery is a slide from a weaponless defense presentation that states: 'There is little scientific evidence to support the notion that prone restraint results in life-threatening respiratory compromise or asphyxia .... Cannot quantify the exact amount of weight, but it is faulty to theorize weight on back, in the prone position creates asphyxia sufficient to cause death.'. .The Court agrees that summary judgment is inappropriate on this claim. First, Plaintiffs raise triable issues of fact whether officers were adequately trained. Rohnert Park does not identify any specific training that it provided officers regarding the interaction of restraint techniques and asphyxia, and the fact that officers generally received additional medical training . . . is largely irrelevant without a showing that it addressed this particular issue. Rohnert Park also relies on training that the Officer Defendants received in police academies prior to employment, as well as their compliance with statewide mandated California Peace Officer Standards and Training ("POST"). . . This training is relevant to the extent that it appears that the Officer Defendants received some instruction on these concepts during the police academy. . . But the mere fact that officers complied with POST requirements does not relieve Rohnert Park of its constitutional obligations if that training was inadequate. . . If Rohnert Park was on notice that its officials were likely to violate constitutional rights based on gaps in their state-mandated training, it was required to supplement it. But to the extent that Rohnert Park provided any training to these officers, that training actually appears to have undermined awareness of positional asphyxia. . . Moreover, the Officer Defendants' deposition testimony raises disputed factual issues as the adequacy of the training they received from Rohnert Park and other sources such as academy training. Officers expressed varying degrees of awareness of the risks of positional asphyxiation, and a jury could reasonably draw different inferences from their testimony. . . Most significantly, Officer Wattson, who directly applied pressure to Wroth for the longest period of time, testified that he had did not 'know any of the details or particulars to' positional asphyxiation, but had 'heard that in certain instances someone can asphyxiate if they're left in a face down position for 10 plus minutes.'. . A reasonable jury could find that Wroth asphyxiated in far less time. Second, although Plaintiffs do not provide evidence of a pattern of similar violations, there are disputes of fact whether the constitutional violations asserted were a 'a highly predictable consequence of a failure to equip law enforcement officers with specific tools to handle recurring situations.'. . . As another court in this district recently observed, '[i]t is beyond dispute that police officers are often required to subdue suspects and handle them while they are handcuffed.'. . The Court agrees that a jury could therefore 'reasonably conclude it is highly foreseeable that [Rohnert Park's] failure to provide guidance on the proper duration and amount of force to apply.... to the back of a prone and handcuffed suspect, would result in' constitutional violations. . . Finally, viewing the record in Plaintiffs' favor, a jury could reasonably find a causal relationship between inadequate training and the constitutional violation. For instance, a jury could infer that, if Wattson had been trained that positional asphyxiation presented a risk of death in significantly less time than ten minutes, he would have released his knee from Wroth sooner. Similarly, although Defendants suggest that the Court must focus solely on officers who actually applied their weight to Wroth, a jury could reasonably infer that any adequately trained officer present would have been able to intervene. Accordingly, Defendants are not entitled to summary judgment on Plaintiffs' failure to train claim."); Delacruz v. City of Port Arthur, No. 1:18-CV-11, 2019 WL 1211843, at *16-17 (E.D. Tex. Mar. 14, 2019) (" [T]he court concludes that Plaintiffs have failed to establish a pattern of constitutional violations sufficient to show that the City was deliberately indifferent to the risk of the use of excessive force by officers untrained in CIT tactics on persons with mental illnesses or experiencing mental health crises. In the absence of a pattern, in certain unique circumstances, a plaintiff can establish liability based upon a single violation of constitutional rights. . . . The 'single-incident' method of proving deliberate indifference is generally reserved 'for cases in which the government actor received "no training whatsoever" with respect to the relevant constitutional duty, as opposed to training that is inadequate only as to the particular conduct that gave rise to the plaintiff's injury.' [citing Littell and Peña] Indeed, this exception applies only where the need for training was 'so obvious' that a failure to do so would mean that the policymaker was deliberately indifferent to constitutional rights. . . The need for additional training is considered sufficiently obvious only when the deprivation of constitutional rights is a 'highly predictable consequence' of the training deficiency. . . .The Fifth Circuit has a well-developed body of case law regarding deliberate indifference, which suggests that the single incident exception 'is generally reserved for those cases in which the government actor was provided no training whatsoever.'. . .Here, Plaintiffs do not allege that the City provides no training on the use of force. . . . Plaintiffs have not presented 'sufficient evidence to show that the highly predictable consequence' of the City's failure to provide their officers CIT training would be the death of a patient being involuntarily committed to a hospital during a mental health crisis."); Martinez v. City of Pittsburg, No. 17-CV-04246-RS, 2019 WL 1102375, at *7 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 8, 2019) ("Based on these facts, a reasonable fact-finder could conclude that PPD's failure to provide more robust policies and training regarding the use of the carotid hold and the dangers of compression asphyxia amounted to deliberate indifference. While the Pittsburg Defendants note Plaintiffs' inability to point to any other serious incidents or death involving compression asphyxia or PPD's use of the carotid hold, Plaintiffs need not make such a showing if the constitutional violation was a 'highly predictable consequence' of the failure to train. . . It is beyond dispute that police officers are often required to subdue suspects and handle them while they are handcuffed. Therefore, a jury could reasonably conclude it is highly foreseeable that PPD's failure to provide guidance on the proper duration and amount of force to apply during a carotid hold, or to teach officers not to apply force to the back of a prone and handcuffed suspect, would result in an excessive use of force."); Aracena v. Gruler, 347 F.Supp.3d 1107, 1121 (M.D. Fla. 2018) ("Like Connick, Count II fails because Plaintiff has not plausibly alleged that the City of Orlando's failure to train officers on 'security in public places that are highly susceptible to danger, and how to enter and neutralize an active shooter,'. . . fits within the 'narrow range of Canton's hypothesized single-incident liability.'. . As discussed more thoroughly above, Plaintiff has not plausibly shown that nightclubs are at such great risk of attack that a municipality's failure to train its police officers on how to respond and even 'neutralize an active shooter' amounts to deliberate indifference. The incredibly specific training envisioned by Plaintiff on responding to and neutralizing a hypothetical active shooter without violating anyone's constitutional rights bears no resemblance to the use-of-deadly-force training envisioned in Canton. Though municipalities would be wise to train their police officers on responding to active shooters, failure to provide such training does not amount to a constitutional tort. See Gaviria v. Guerra, No. 17-23490, 2018 WL 1876124, at *7 (S.D. Fla. Apr. 19, 2018) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor the Eleventh Circuit has ever applied the single-incident liability exception."). Count II thus does not state a plausible claim."); Pollard v. Dart, No. 15-CV-4638, 2018 WL 5717850, at *3–4 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 1, 2018) ("[N]either Glisson nor Brown dictate the outcome of this case. Unlike the plaintiff in Glisson, Pollard presented no evidence that Wexford consciously chose not to adopt a policy that might prevent delays in surgery like the one he experienced. Pollard has also not presented any evidence from which a reasonable jury might conclude that Wexford was aware that its procedures for enrolling patients in surgery were causing harm or would likely cause harm to inmates. This stands in stark contrast to the plaintiff in Glisson, who was seen by multiple medical services providers that continually observed his decline in health while in their care. . . Similarly, Brown emphasizes that a plaintiff must demonstrate a conscious disregard for a known or obvious risk of injury. . . Pollard has failed to present any evidence that Wexford did so. In addition, Pollard alleges that this is a failure to train case. When a plaintiff alleges that the constitutional violation stems from a corporate entity's failure to train, the plaintiff must demonstrate that a particular training program caused the injury in question. . . A showing that one officer is unsatisfactorily trained is not sufficient, because otherwise corporate and municipal liability would be virtually boundless. . . The relevant inquiry in determining whether or not corporate liability attaches in a section 1983 action is whether or not a corporate training program reflects deliberate indifference to the rights of individuals who will be affected by that program. . . Finally, in a failure to train case, a municipality cannot be liable where the individual officer administering the policy is not liable for the underlying substantive claim. . . . Assuming, without deciding, that the delay in his surgery is a cognizable constitutional injury, Pollard does not identify any specific Wexford training policy that was the moving force behind his injury. . . . In addition, as discussed above, both the Supreme Court and the Seventh Circuit have repeatedly held that Monell claims based on a single violation are only viable in rare cases where a plaintiff can demonstrate that a corporate policy or custom would very obviously lead to a constitutional violation. Here, Pollard does not articulate or present evidence of any Wexford training policy or custom at all, much less one that would very obviously lead to a delay like the one he suffered. Pollard argues that his injury is indicative of an obvious need for better training of Wexford personnel. Even if the delay in his surgery does demonstrate such a need, neither his injury nor the record demonstrate that Wexford consciously disregarded a known or obvious risk of injury by implementing and enforcing the training program or practices in place. . . Finally, Pollard has not presented any evidence that his injury is part of a larger pattern of constitutional violations resulting from a policy or custom evincing deliberate indifference toward those whom the policy would affect. . . Because Pollard has failed to identify and present evidence of any Wexford training policy or custom that would very obviously lead to the type of injury he suffered, summary judgment for Wexford is proper."); Albert v. City of New York, 2018 WL 5084824, at *9-11 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 18, 2018) ("The Small plaintiffs make only boilerplate allegations regarding the City's Monell liability, alleging that the City 'failed to adequately train, supervise, discipline, sanction, or otherwise direct' members of its police force, including defendant Isaacs. . . They further allege that the City's policies 'have been described in excruciating detail in the various investigations and commissions into the Police Department,' without explaining which 'investigations or commissions' they are referencing. . . They argue that the City 'knew of the longstanding problem of the officers' use of firearms force during fits of road rage and while off-duty,' but provide no support for this alleged knowledge. . . '[C]onclusory ... language' regarding the City's policies is 'insufficient to raise an inference of the existence of a custom or policy, let alone that such a policy caused [the constitutional violation].'. . The Albert plaintiffs provide more detailed allegations of the City's failure to train or supervise its employees, but their allegations do not plausibly make out the necessary elements of a Monell claim. . . In their complaint, the Albert plaintiffs provide seventeen examples of instances in which they allege that members of the NYPD 'engaged in fits of road rage and unlawful use of force while off-duty.' . . The City notes that these incidents 'span[ ] eleven years,' which 'equates to less than two incidents per year—not enough to create a policy or practice' in a workforce of 'approximately 36,000 NYPD officers.'. . However, even if these incidents all took place in one year, '[a] training program is not inadequate merely because a few of its graduates deviate from what they were taught.'. . Though 'a single instance of deliberate indifference to subordinates' actions can provide a basis for municipal liability,'. . . plaintiffs provide no information about the City's response to these allegations, nor any evidence to demonstrate that the violation of plaintiffs' constitutional rights was 'a highly predictable consequence of a failure to equip law enforcement officers with specific tools to handle recurring situations.'. . Moreover, the past incidents plaintiffs include in their complaint involve a significant range of factual situations; only seven out of the seventeen incidents involved firearms as opposed to other weapons, and, as the City notes, 'it is not even clear from the allegations whether these situations involved state action, rather than private misconduct or crime[.]'. . Because the City is only liable for its employees' actions if the actions occurred while the employee was acting under color of law, the City would have no obligation to take corrective actions if the incidents occurred during purely private events. . . These allegations fall short of the stringent standard of fault' necessary to plead a City's 'deliberate indifference.'. .Additionally, plaintiffs fail to point to a 'specific deficiency' in the City's training programs that could plausibly have caused their alleged constitutional violations. Though plaintiffs cite dictum from the Second Circuit's opinion in Amnesty America that suggests that the pleading standard for a failure to train claim may be lower on a motion to dismiss, that case was decided before Twombly and Iqbal, and courts now require that plaintiffs point to a 'specific deficiency in the municipality's training.'. . The closest that plaintiffs come to identifying a specific deficiency is their allegation that Isaacs 'was not trained by defendant [City] or the NYPD to deescalate rather than engage in conflicts while off-duty.'. . But this is an 'unsupported conclusory allegation' that is not sufficient to demonstrate deliberate indifference. . . Furthermore, plaintiffs do not sufficiently demonstrate that Isaacs's actions present the kind of 'difficult choice' that training or supervision would 'make less difficult.'. . Plaintiffs describe the tragic shooting that resulted in Small's death as plainly unjustified, despite Isaacs's false belief that Small may have intended to steal his car or confront him over a prior arrest. . . But 'a blatantly criminal act ... cannot reasonably be seen as posing the type of "difficult choice"' that would give rise to an obligation to train."); Cherry v. D.C., No. CV 17-2263 (ABJ), 2018 WL 4283566, at *6–7 (D.D.C. Sept. 7, 2018) ("Plaintiff argues that even if the Court finds that the complaint does not include 'sufficiently pleaded facts as to the District's ignoring of a history of constitutional violations,' the complaint should survive defendant's motion to dismiss because 'a pattern of similar violations is not always necessary to show deliberate indifference as applied to necessary training.'. . But plaintiff's reliance on the Supreme Court's observation in Harris is misplaced. In Harris, the Supreme Court recognized that a municipality's failure to provide any training on an issue that would obviously necessitate training – such as an officer's use of firearms, and in particular, deadly force – could possibly demonstrate a municipality's deliberate indifference. . . But here, plaintiff has not alleged that the District provides no training to SPOs on the use of excessive force. Rather, the complaint states that the District provides SPOs with sixteen hours of pre-assignment training that includes specific instruction on the use of force, and that the training is supplemented by another sixteen hours of on-the-job training. . . Because plaintiff does not allege that the District failed to provide any training on the use of force, plaintiff's claim is not analogous to the potential 'single-incident' theory of liability that was described in Harris. . . Instead, as the court concluded in the Odom case, plaintiff's claim 'requires pleading additional facts that would demonstrate that the training was insufficient and that the District knew or should have known that the training was insufficient.'. . Therefore, plaintiff has not pleaded sufficient factual content to plausibly show that the District was deliberately indifferent to an inadequacy in its training, or that the inadequate training had some connection to the events that led to Smith's death. So, the Court will dismiss the section 1983 claim against the District without prejudice."); Arevalo v. City of Farmers Branch, No. 3:16-CV-1540-D, 2018 WL 1784508, at *6-8, *10 (N.D. Tex. Apr. 13, 2018) ("The Fifth Circuit 'has considered single violation liability several times, and, with only one exception in some [40] years since Monell, has consistently rejected application of the single incident exception.'. . The sole exception, Brown v. Bryan County, 219 F.3d 450 (5th Cir. 2000), demonstrates that single-incident liability requires 'an abundance of evidence about the proclivities of the particular officer involved in the excessive use of force.'. . .From these cases, the law clearly establishes that—for a failure to train claim—deliberate indifference can be established under the single-incident exception when the officer received a complete absence of training, when the officer's record provides abundant evidence of a proclivity to commit the specific constitutional violation in question, or when both circumstances are present. . . . As the court noted in Arevalo

II, '[b]eyond Brown, the Fifth Circuit has declined to find deliberate indifference in several cases where the officers in question had histories generally suggestive of future misconduct— "even where a municipal employer knew of a particular officer's propensities for violence or recklessness."'. . These decisions all instead looked for evidence concerning the officer's proclivity to commit the specific constitutional violation that had occurred. . . . [N]one of the excessive force complaints alleged the use of deadly force. Thus, as in Roberts, because there is no evidence that Officer Johnson 'had ever been involved in cases involving the use of deadly force,' not providing him deadly force training was not indicative of deliberate indifference. And given his prior law enforcement experience, training, and lack of a disciplinary record involving the use of deadly force, Officer Johnson's shooting of E.R. was not a 'highly predictable consequence' of not receiving training from Chief Fuller. . . .The court holds that hiring Officer Johnson was not unreasonable under clearly established law, despite his prior conduct. The facts in Arevalo's Rule 7(a) reply are dispositive. Again, Officer Johnson had received no prior reprimands for the use of excessive force. Each of the three internal investigations of excessive force allegations cleared him of wrongdoing. Moreover, none of the allegations involved the use of deadly force. Therefore, Officer Johnson's prior record as a DART police officer showed no 'strong connection' to his shooting of E.R."); Estate of Strong v. City of Northglenn, No. 17-CV-1276-WJM-MEH, 2018 WL 1640251, at *8 (D. Colo. Apr. 5, 2018) ("Plaintiffs' failure-to-train theory must fail. Plaintiffs' Response argues that the allegedly egregious nature of the constitutional violation makes it 'patently obvious' that Wilson and Schlenker had inadequate training, highlighting the claims that children were in the home and that shots were fired through walls, and the allegation that Strong was shot brutally and repeatedly as he lay on the floor, in what Plaintiffs characterize as an 'execution.'. . But even treating these factual claims as true, and even as deeply disturbing as are the allegations that Strong was for all practical purposes executed by Schenkler as Strong lay seriously wounded and not resisting on the floor, the Complaint fails to include any factual allegations that this incident was in fact the product of a training deficiency rather than individual misconduct, or that any of the Cities were aware of such allegedly deficient training but deliberately indifferent to its consequences."); Leibowitz on behalf of Estate of Jacoby v. DuPage County, No. 12 C 6539, 2018 WL 1184731, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 7, 2018) ("Jacoby's evidence, viewed in a light most favorable to him, does not permit an inference that any of his Monell theories could succeed, primarily because he presents no evidence that it is highly, or even somewhat, predictable that an officer who lacks specific tools to handle an individual who presents in an agitated state and refuses to cooperate in a medical assessment is likely to violate his constitutional rights such that failure to train amounts to deliberate indifference. Although it may have been obvious to the officers that Jacoby was severely obese, plaintiff has no evidence specific to obesity that would distinguish such a person from any other detainee in the same situation. For example, he proffers no expert testimony about law enforcement practices that suggest that acceptable practices in correctional or detention settings should include particular protocols for obese or agitated detainees, nor does he identify a course of training that might have made a difference here. In short, the issue in this case is straightforward. It is whether the individual defendants used excessive force against Jacoby on this single occasion in violation of the Fourth Amendment. For these reasons, the Sheriff is entitled to summary judgment on the failure-to-train claim."); Arrington v. City of Chicago, No. 17 C 5345, 2018 WL 620036, at *3-4 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 30, 2018) ("At bottom, both methods of pleading Monell claims—the series of bad acts, and the highly predictable consequence—require allegations permitting a plausible inference that the municipal entity had notice that its employees were engaging in a custom or practice of unconstitutional behavior. The municipal entity's liability then flows from its failure to take action to prevent that custom or practice from injuring the plaintiff. In this case, Plaintiff appears to attempt to allege liability under both the 'series of bad acts' and the 'highly predictable consequence' theories of Monell liability. The Court addresses each in turn. . . . In an attempt to plausibly allege a series of bad acts, the Plaintiff cites six examples of excessive force verdicts or settlements concerning actions of Chicago police officers in addition to Arrington's case. But Chicago is a City of more than 2.7 million people. . . that employs approximately 12,000 police officers . . . Moreover, the seven examples Plaintiff cites took place over a 13 year period. The Court questions whether these allegations alone are sufficient to plausibly infer that excessive force is so common among Chicago's police force that the City should have been on notice of such a custom or practice. . . Nevertheless, as is widely known in the Chicago legal community, the Department of Justice completed a report dated January 13, 2017 finding that the Chicago Police Department 'engages in a pattern or practice of unconstitutional use of force.'. . This finding was based on a review of Chicago Police Department and IPRA records concerning incidents between January 2011 and April 2016. . . Although the Justice Department's conclusion was not available to the City until January 2017, the evidence on which the report is based was readily available to City policymakers in the period of time preceding the incident causing Arrington's death. This evidence is more than sufficient to plausibly infer that the City has a custom or practice of tolerating or enabling the use of excessive force by its police officers, and that the City was on notice of this custom or practice during the relevant time period prior to Arrington's death. Plaintiff did not cite the DOJ Report in her complaint. But the Seventh Circuit has held that government reports such as the DOJ Report at issue here can be admissible evidence of municipal notice relevant to a Monell claim. See Daniel v. Cook County, 833 F.3d 728, 740-42 (7th Cir. 2016) (citing cases); see also Simmons v. City of Chicago, 2017 WL 3704844, at *7-8 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 28, 2017) (finding the DOJ Report admissible at trial on a Monell claim against the City); LaPorta v. City of Chicago, 2017 WL 4340094, at *13 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 29, 2017) (finding a report by the City's Police Accountability Task Force a basis to deny summary judgment on a Monell claim alleging that a "code of silence" exists in the Chicago Police Department). Furthermore, the Seventh Circuit has held that it is proper for courts to take judicial notice of public records on a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) without converting it to a motion for summary judgment. . . . In this case, where Plaintiff alleges that the City enables or condones a custom or practice of excessive force among its police officers, the DOJ Report citing evidence that such a custom or practice does in fact exist is a sufficient basis for Plaintiff's Monell claim to proceed.[4] [n.4 The Court acknowledges that Judge St. Eve recently rejected the DOJ Report as a basis to plausibly allege failure-to-train and failure-to-discipline Monell claims against the City. See Carmona v. City of Chicago, 2018 WL 306664, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 5, 2018). But in that case, the plaintiff alleged 'police officers illegally handcuffed and interrogated him in a hospital bed and arrested him without probable cause.'. . Judge St. Eve held that the plaintiff failed to show 'how the deficiencies described in the [DOJ Report] relate to [his] claim.'. . No such disconnect is present here, where Plaintiff alleges a custom or practice of excessive force among Chicago police officers, and the DOJ Report found such a custom or practice.] . . . .Even if the DOJ Report did not exist or was insufficient to demonstrate a 'series of bad acts' putting the City on notice, the Court finds that Plaintiff has plausibly alleged a custom or practice by the City of which excessive force is a highly predictable consequence. Plaintiff alleges that the City perpetuates the custom of excessive force among its police officers by allowing internal investigatory procedures to provide accused officers an opportunity to conform their account of alleged excessive force incidents to the evidence discovered by investigators. This alleged customary opportunity for officers to get their stories straight plausibly assured Officer Ewing that he could use excessive force in his pursuit of Arrington and not worry about being meaningfully disciplined or punished. . . .This Court . . . finds plausible Plaintiff's allegation that by allowing investigatory procedures that permit an accused officer to cover up instances of excessive force, the City sends a message to officers that it condones overly aggressive and unconstitutional policing, thereby causing officers to use excessive force when they might not otherwise if they knew they would be held fully accountable for such actions. . . . The Supreme Court has held that failure to train claims require a certain number of instances of officer misconduct in order to plausibly allege a custom or practice. . . But Plaintiff's claim against the City is not for a failure to train . . . . Rather, Plaintiff's 'highly predictable consequence' theory alleges that the City actively enables the use of excessive force by maintaining loopholes in its investigatory procedures that permit officers to conform their stories to the facts, and provides specific examples of what those loopholes are. As discussed, this is not the type of Monell claim that requires allegation of multiple examples."); Virgil v. City of Newport, No. CV 16-224-DLB-CJS, 2018 WL 344986, at *15 (E.D. Ky. Jan. 9, 2018) ("In this case, Virgil has not alleged a pattern of constitutional violations. Instead, he has alleged that the City of Newport acted with deliberate indifference in failing to train its police officers regarding 'prompt disclosure of ... evidence that exonerates a defendant following his arrest or conviction' and fabrication of evidence. . . Virgil's allegations, taken as true, fall within the 'narrow range of circumstances' that the Supreme Court contemplated in Harris. Connick, 563 U.S. at 63, 70 (holding that failure to train prosecutors in their Brady obligations did not satisfy the single-incident liability theory, but noting that police officers are not "equipped with the tools to find, interpret, and apply legal principles," absent training). In support of his claim, Virgil has put forth factual allegations detailing the Individual Newport Defendants' fabrication of inculpatory evidence and withholding of exculpatory evidence. Along with those allegations, Virgil claims that the City of Newport failed to train its officers on their duty to disclose exculpatory evidence and the impropriety of fabricating evidence. . . 'Given the known frequency with which police' obtain exculpatory evidence and their obligation to collect reliable evidence, the City of Newport's alleged failure to train constitutes deliberate indifference to the 'highly predictable consequence' of the violations of criminal defendants' constitutional rights. . . Moreover, Virgil has adequately alleged that the failure to train was the 'moving force' behind the violation of his constitutional rights. . . Therefore, the Second Amended Complaint has sufficiently stated a § 1983 failure-to-train claim."); Soto v. City of N. Miami, No. 17-22090-CIV, 2017 WL 4685301, at *10-11 (S.D. Fla. Oct. 17, 2017) ("The Eleventh Circuit has held that when a plaintiff relies on prior incidents to establish a pattern and practice, the incidents must involve similar facts to the case at hand. . . Eight of the ten incidents described in the Complaint consist of police responding to reports of missing residents from MACtown or reports of burglaries at MACtown. . . The descriptions of these incidents do not allege that the constitutional rights of the residents were violated; the Complaint simply states that the police were called to respond to the reported incidents. . . Thus, these incidents do not demonstrate a widespread pattern or practice of police officers violating the constitutional rights of citizens with mental disabilities. . . Two of the incidents described in the Complaint do include allegations of more confrontational interactions between the police and residents of MACtown. On one occasion, the police arrested a resident of MACtown who had bitten his roommate on the lip. . . The resident was transported to the jail and held overnight. . .On a second occasion, Soto alleges that 'North Miami Police responded to an incident at MACtown and tased a person with an intellectual disability.'. . This is the entire description of the incident. The descriptions of these two incidents do not include facts indicating that the police responses were unlawful or that violations of the residents' constitutional rights occurred. Thus, these incidents are also insufficient to establish a pattern or practice. . . . In response to the City's motion to dismiss, Soto argues that a plaintiff may successfully bring a failure-to-train claim without showing a pattern of constitutional violations. . . The Eleventh Circuit has recognized that "[i]n City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989), the Supreme Court in dictum left open the possibility that a need to train could be 'so obvious,' resulting in a City's being liable without a pattern of prior constitutional violations.'. . . In City of Canton, Justice O'Connor stated that '[t]he claim in this case –that police officers were inadequately trained in diagnosing the symptoms of emotional illness – falls far short of the kind of "obvious" need for training that would support a finding of deliberate indifference to constitutional rights on the part of the city.'. . Similarly, the Eleventh Circuit has held that a claim that a city inadequately trained jail employees 'to recognize the need to remove a mentally ill inmate to a hospital or to dispense medication as prescribed' does not constitute such an obvious need to train that it can support a finding of deliberate indifference to constitutional rights. . . Soto has not provided any case law holding that the need to train in a factually similar case was so obvious that the plaintiff did not need to establish a pattern or practice of similar constitutional violations. Therefore, similar to City of Canton and Young, the Court finds that the need to train in this case does not qualify as one of the 'narrow range of circumstances that a plaintiff might succeed without showing a pattern of constitutional violations ....' . . . Accordingly, Soto has failed to state a § 1983 claim against the City."); Mohamed for A.M. v. Irving Indep. Sch. Dist., 252 F.Supp.3d 602, ___ (N.D. Tex. 2017) ("[E]ven assuming, arguendo, that the City of Irving police officers violated A.M.'s Fourth Amendment right to be from arrest without probable cause, Plaintiff fails to allege a policy, custom, or practice of the City that was the moving force of an alleged constitutional violation. As already stated, the City cannot be liable for civil rights violations under a theory of respondeat superior or vicarious liability. . . First, Plaintiff fails to identify any official policy that allegedly caused the underlying constitutional violation. In the absence of an officially promulgated policy, Plaintiff must allege a constitutional deprivation that was more than an isolated incident but was caused by a practice that was sufficiently widespread to constitute a custom having the force of law. . . Plaintiff has not made these allegations. Accordingly, the court is left with an isolated, allegedly unconstitutional incident, which is generally insufficient to establish an official policy or custom for section 1983 purposes. . . .As an alternative basis for a section 1983 claim against the City, Plaintiff makes the conclusory allegation that the Irving Police Department failed to properly train and supervise its officers with respect to determining probable cause for arrest. . . Plaintiff, however, fails to allege how the City's training policy on probable cause was inadequate. Rather, Plaintiff relies on the conclusory allegation that 'Irving police officers engaged in a pattern of unconstitutional detentions/arrests at least as far back as 2006.'. . Plaintiff also makes the conclusory allegation that, at some unknown time in the past, the City's police chief allegedly acknowledged a pattern of unconstitutional detentions and arrests. . . These conclusory allegations are inadequate to support a failure to train claim. There are no allegations concerning what type of training was being provided to the Irving police officers at or near the time A.M. was arrested, or any allegations as to how the training was defective. Absent such allegations, the Complaint fails to state a section 1983 claim for failure to train."); Marlin v. City of New York, No. 15 CI V. 2235 (CM), 2016 WL 4939371, at *19-21 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 7, 2016) ("Plaintiff alleges that the NYPD failed to train or supervise the NYPD in proper policing or use of force in controlling demonstrations and protest assemblies even after negative media coverage and complaints to the Civilian Complaint Review Board (CCRB). . . Additionally, he alleges that even after receiving the complaints, the City failed to discipline NYPD supervisors and officers who received complaints . . . . Plaintiff's support for his claim that the City failed to train or supervise police officers consists entirely of conclusory allegations. . . .Plaintiff was allegedly subject to the police's use of excessive force in March 2012, which falls within the five year period from 2010 to 2014 in which there were 207 allegations of force in 179 cases that were substantiated by the CCRB. Plaintiff is entitled to discovery into when the October 2015 Report was commissioned and why. The data provides sufficient factual support for Plaintiff's claim that he was not merely victim to an 'isolated incident' but was instead subject to a pattern or practice of use of excessive force by NYPD. Moreover, I find that Plaintiff adequately states a claim that the City was sufficiently put on notice of NYPD's excessive use of force; the report's publication date is actually not relevant to the issue of notice. Even if the City was not aware of the findings in the October 2015 Report until its publication, it was put on notice by the 207 allegations of force in 179 cases substantiated by the CCRB between 2010 and 2014. Finally, Plaintiff adequately provides support for the inference that the City did nothing about NYPD's pattern of excessive use of force. Despite the number of complaints received and substantiated by the CCRB between 2010 and 2014, officers were not disciplined in over 35% of these cases. Even if the no-discipline rate itself was not known until publication of the October 2015 report, the very fact that a large proportion of officers faced no disciplinary action for unlawful conduct plausibly suggests that the City did nothing. It also counsels against dismissing Plaintiff's claim at this juncture. . . . Viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the data summarized in these publications creates a plausible inference that NYPD had a pattern or practice of use of excessive force (particularly against Occupy Wall Street protestors), that the City was put on notice of this and did nothing, as shown by its failure to discipline officers, and that the City's inaction caused Plaintiff's alleged constitutional injury."); Lopez v. Vidljinovic, No. 1:12-CV-5751, 2016 WL 4429637, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 22, 2016) ("Lopez also asserts that the City has a custom or practice of failing to train its EMS and CPD employees on the use of force. . . .To prove a custom or practice for a failure to train specifically, a plaintiff must show that the failure to train was carried out with deliberate indifference to its known and obvious consequences. . . Typically, a 'pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees is ordinarily necessary to demonstrate deliberate indifference for purposes of failure to train.' Bryan County, Oklahoma v. Brown, 520 U.S. 379, 409 (1997) (internal quotation omitted). . . . Lopez has failed to adduce evidence of '[a] pattern of similar constitutional violations,' and thus, his claim fails. . . . To be sure, Lopez does proffer some 'material' in support of his claim that the City's behavior reflects the requisite deliberate indifference. As noted above, he points to: (1) a newspaper article chronicling the increase in taser use by the CPD, PSOF [128] ¶ 15; (2) reports commemorating the dismissal of IPRA investigations into allegations of excessive force, id. ¶¶ 16-17; (3) statements by Mayor Rahm Emanuel acknowledging a 'code of silence' within the CPD, id. ¶¶ 27-30; (4) letter requests from prominent politicians encouraging the DOJ to investigate the CPD, id. ¶ 35; and (5) the alleged failure of the IPRA to investigate Lopez's own case, id. ¶ 19-25. . . . There is simply no evidentiary basis in this record for a potential factfinder to infer that there has been an increase in unconstitutional conduct correlated with an increase in the use of tasers. Similarly, nothing in the record suggests a need for more or different training that is so obvious that policymakers at the City can 'reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.'. . .Likewise, based upon the record presented here, the purported lay opinions and hearsay statements of Mayor Rahm Emanuel concerning an alleged 'code of silence' within the CPD are inadmissible. . . .The requests made by political leaders to the DOJ are similarly unavailing. The requests are inadmissible, do not concern the specific matter at hand, and were written years after Lopez's tasing. . . .Lopez also attempts to prove deliberate indifference by showing that the City of Chicago 'fail[ed] to act in response to repeated complaints of constitutional violations by its officers.'. . More specifically, he asserts that the repeated dismissal of excessive force investigations by the IPRA is evidence of deliberate indifference on the part of the City. . . Lopez's only support on this point comes in the form of statistics that indicate that 2% of excessive force investigations result in a sustained finding against individual police officers. . . Without any evidence regarding whether the 2% sustain rate accurately reflects the actions of each officer in each case, Lopez jumps to the conclusion that the 2% rate, by itself, somehow proves that the City is choosing not to punish officer misconduct. In a further illogical jump, Lopez also claims that this general failure to punish police misconduct, in turn, specifically caused his alleged constitutional injury. . . Here again, Lopez has failed to take the necessary step of presenting cognizable evidence of a causal connection between this data point and his tasing. For example, he offers no evidence that any of the officers at the scene had a history of using excessive force. Nor does he suggest that additional or more thorough IPRA investigations would have revealed that any of the officers involved here actually possessed a history of using excessive force. There is simply no 'causal link' between Lopez's injury and the data he cites. Thus, this evidence does not help Lopez resist the City's motion for summary judgment. Finally, Lopez suggests that the IPRA's alleged failure to investigate Lopez's own case is evidence of deliberate indifference. This argument is divorced from logic and the undisputed timeline in this case. Any alleged failure to investigate Lopez's own incident necessarily happened after he was injured, such that this failure cannot be used to prove deliberate indifference at the time of the injury. Lopez has not presented any evidence that 'require [s] submission to a jury.'"); Guzman v. City of Hilaleah, No. 15-23985-CIV-GAYLES, 2016 WL 3763055, at *4 (S.D. Fla. July 14, 2016) ("Ultimately, the Court need not engage in a review of these incidents for 'evidence of previous incidents is not required to establish city policy if the need to train and supervise in a particular area is "so obvious" that liability attaches for a single incident.'. . 'In establishing this form of notice, the Supreme Court referenced the proper use of firearms and the correct use of deadly force as an area that would be so obvious as to require adequate training by the municipality to avoid liability.'. . The claim here arises from this precise scenario—the use of deadly force by police officers with municipally issued firearms. The Court therefore finds that the City's alleged failure to train Sergeant Luis and Lieutenant Fernandez could plausibly have created such an obvious risk that it alone establishes the City's deliberate indifference to the risk that the officers would use excessive force against Mr. Guzman. Accordingly, the City's motion to dismiss this claim is denied."); Lemons v. City of Milwaukee, No. 13-C-0331, 2016 WL 3746571, at *22-23 (E.D. Wis. July 8, 2016) ("When a facially lawful municipal action has led an employee to violate a plaintiff's rights, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the municipal action was taken with deliberate indifference as to its known or obvious consequences. . . Deliberate indifference requires proof of disregard of a known or obvious consequence of one's action, and the deliberate indifference must be to the risk of a violation of a particular constitutional or statutory right. . . Mere probability that an officer inadequately disciplined will inflict constitutional injury is not enough; it must be that this officer was highly likely to inflict the particular injury suffered by the plaintiff. . . . In cases alleging inadequate supervision, if a program does not prevent constitutional violations, municipal decisionmakers may be put on notice that a new program is called for, and their continued adherence to an approach that they know or should know has failed to prevent tortious conduct by employees may establish the conscious disregard of the consequences, i.e., the deliberate indifference, for municipal liability. . . Similarly, a custom of failing to discipline police officers 'can be shown to be deliberately indifferent if the need for further discipline is so obvious and procedures so inadequate as to be likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights such that a jury could attribute to the policymakers a deliberate indifference to the need to discipline.'. . Also, a plaintiff may prove deliberate indifference by showing that the City failed to act in response to repeated complaints of constitutional violations by officers. . . Although the individual-capacity claims against Hegerty and Flynn are not identical to the Monell claim against the City, the claims have much in common. . . Because Hegerty and Flynn indisputably were policymakers for the MPD, all of their personal actions regarding disciplining (or not disciplining) Cates in particular, failure to track patterns of illegal conduct after unsustained findings, and failure to pursue internal discipline if the DA chose not to charge the officer can be considered regarding whether the City had a policy or custom that caused the harm to Lemons. The court can consider their conduct as policymakers alone plus as just one part of an alleged practice so well settled as to constitute a custom or usage of the MPD. . . .The court notes that in response to the City defendants' summary judgment motion Lemons has limited her argument to Hegerty's and Flynn's failures to supervise IAD and Cates properly and to discipline Cates and the MPD's practices of failing to meaningfully investigate or discipline. Thus, she does not deny that the court should dismiss any deliberate-indifference claim (whether against Hegerty and Flynn individually or the City under Monell)

regarding hiring or training policies or practices, including the hiring and training of Cates."); Doe v. Town of Wayland, 179 F.Supp.3d 155, 173 (D. Mass. 2016) ("John's allegations align with Kibbe and Baron. Although he only alleges conduct pertaining to one particular friendship—the one between Coe and Philip—he alleges multiple instances of misconduct regarding that friendship. These include: staffers' encouragement of Coe and Philip to form a friendship with each other; staffers' advocating to Sarah and Robert at multiple meetings that Philip's friendship with Coe was beneficial to Philip—including via specific affirmative representations that Coe was 'a good kid' and 'good with kids'; continued encouragement of the Coe-Philip friendship, even after learning about Coe's abuse of Rachel; and Moskowitz-Dodyk's reference to Philip's friendship with Coe as a reason for Sarah to not remove Philip from LVC [Learning and Vocational Center]. The Complaint also contains numerous inappropriate omissions from Wayland and TEC [The Education Cooperative] staff—failure to exclude Coe from LVC; failure to inform Sarah and Robert about Coe's past sexual abuse; failure to remove Coe from LVC after he sexually abused Rachel; failure to inform Rachel's parents about Coe's sexual abuse of Rachel; and failure to inform the Does about Coe's sexual abuse of Rachel—which, though not unconstitutional, offers factual support for an inference that socially engineering dangerous friendships was an official custom or policy. This systemic pattern of activity compels the Court to find John's allegations 'more akin to the serial misconduct cases than to cases implicating the single incident rule.'. . Accordingly, the motion is DENIED for Counts II and III."); Lopez ex rel Lopez v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:13 CV 1930, 2016 WL 795855, at *5-6 (N.D. Ohio Mar. 1, 2016) ("The Court agrees with defendant that summary judgment is warranted on the inadequate training allegation. Initially, although the Complaint alleged that the City failed to adequately train its officers regarding excessive force, Katsaris opines that the City failed to train its officers about the use of force when dealing with mentally and emotionally disturbed subjects. In his deposition testimony, however, Katsaris acknowledges that his opinion is based on the training he claims the officers involved received- not the adequacy of the training program itself. In fact, there is no discussion of the contents of the training program in his report. Moreover, the expert's deposition testimony impermissibly goes beyond his report and identifies new theories as to how these officers breached nationally recognized police standards (i.e, the failure to set up a barricade, etc.). And, Katsaris could not identify any similar incidents involving Cleveland police officers and a mentally or emotionally disturbed subject. Nonetheless, even considering the deposition testimony, Katsaris does not identify any failure on the part of the City that evidences its deliberate indifference. . . .Katsaris opines that the City failed to adequately train its officers about the use of force in dealing with mentally ill subjects and, hence, were deliberately indifferent to plaintiff's constitutional rights. This is an inappropriate legal conclusion that the City was deliberately indifferent. Even assuming Katsaris's opinions are admissible, the claim of inadequate training fails because plaintiff presents no other evidence of inadequate training other than Katsaris's opinions that the involved officers' actions fell below nationally recognized police standards. Plaintiff fails to present evidence (or allege) that the City 'failed to provide adequate training in light of foreseeable circumstances' or 'failed to act in response to repeated complaints of constitutional violations by its officers.' In short, plaintiff does not present evidence showing that the City's training itself was inadequate and the inadequate training was a result of deliberate indifference to counter defendant's evidence of the adequacy of the City's training which is required by the State of Ohio. In fact, other courts have held that where a municipality adheres to state standards for training, there cannot be a finding of deliberate indifference."); Edwards v. Cook Cty., No. 15 C 6935, 2016 WL 687915, at *2 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 19, 2016) ("Connick describes two ways Edwards can show the County's deliberate indifference to his constitutional rights: (1) through '[a] pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees' or (2) by establishing that his false arrest and illegal detention were 'highly predictable consequence[s]' of failing to train and supervise County employees on their record-keeping responsibilities. . . At the pleading stage, however, Edwards is not required to choose between these two methods of proving deliberate indifference. He is also not required to plead a prima facie case under either proof framework. . . With regard to the pattern method of showing deliberate indifference, the County has not cited any cases in which a Monell claim was dismissed because the plaintiff failed to allege a pattern of constitutional violations. To the contrary, the County inadvertently cites a case in which the Seventh Circuit criticized a district court for requiring a complaint to contain more specificity about pattern evidence. See Jackson v. Marion Cty., 66 F.3d 151, 152-53 (7th Cir. 1995). The County's other cases regarding pattern evidence are unhelpful because they were decided at the summary judgment stage rather than on a motion to dismiss. See Grieveson v. Anderson, 538 F.3d 763, 774 (7th Cir. 2008); Estate of Moreland v. Dieter, 395 F.3d 747, 760 (7th Cir. 2005). The other method Edwards might use to establish Monell liability turns on whether the alleged violation of his constitutional rights was a 'highly predictable consequence' of the County's failure to train and supervise employees who were responsible for maintaining accurate warrant records. . . The County appears to believe that Connick precludes Edwards from relying on the so-called 'single incident' theory of Monell liability. Connick held that 'recurring constitutional violations are not the "obvious consequence" of failing to provide prosecutors with formal in-house training about how to obey the law' because their legal training and ethical obligations enable them to make legal judgments about what Brady requires. . . This case is nothing like Connick. While it may not be obvious that licensed attorneys will repeatedly violate Brady unless they receive hands-on training and supervision, it is foreseeable that failing to train and supervise non-lawyers who are responsible for maintaining warrant records will result in citizens like Edwards being arrested on old warrants and detained for several days until a state judge quashes the warrant."); Freeman v. City of Tampa, No. 8:15-CV-2262-T-30EAJ, 2015 WL 8270025, at *5 (M.D. Fla. Dec. 8, 2015) ("Plaintiffs request the Court to infer a custom or policy because Defendant Officers' ignorance of the firearm exception suggests a failure to train on the City's part. Plaintiffs contend '[t]he fact that out of six officers, including one in a supervisory capacity, not one objected to or realized that Freeman's conduct was entirely lawful, shows that this was not a case of a single officer being unaware of the law, but a pervasive issue where no officers appear to have been trained to deal with the law abiding gun carrier.'. . The Court cannot make this inference. As such, this claim is dismissed without prejudice. Freeman may amend this claim only if he can allege sufficient facts of any prior similar pattern of incidents that would have placed the City of Tampa on notice of a need to train its officers regarding an individual's right to openly possess a firearm while fishing."); Tolan v. Cotton, No. 4:09-CV-1324, 2015 WL 5310801, at *2-5 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 11, 2015) (summary judgment for City granted) ("The Court takes judicial notice of the fact that Texas statutes provide that all peace officers in Texas, including Defendant Cotton and the other the peace officers of the City of Bellaire are required to complete training and licensing requirements of the Texas Commission on Law Enforcement ("TCOLE") before serving as a police officer. . . .The summary judgment evidence presented by the City demonstrates that the City's officers received TCOLE training, and that training was adequate. . . Documents numbered 158–1 and 158–2 (exhibits numbered 36–37), 158–7 and 158–8 (exhibits numbered 42–43), specifically detail the training Defendant Cotton received. . . . Dr. Gaut concluded that 'the need to train officers on the specific circumstances when deadly force is not appropriate is so obvious that the City's abject failure to do so constitutes deliberate indifference to the safety of the public.'. . .The facts and circumstances of the instant case do not establish that a failure to train police officers specifically on 'utilizing de-escalation techniques, including proper verbal warnings and communications'. . . and on when excessive force should not be used, the mirror image of the training on when excessive force may be used, makes the training received by City of Bellaire police officers so inadequate that it would be obvious to the City that, without providing that training, the City is rendered deliberately indifferent to the civil rights of the populace. . . .The opinion evidence of William Gaut is the only evidence Robbie Tolan has on the issue of failure to train. Because the City's officers were provided substantial relevant training, neither the 'unmistakable culpability' nor the 'clearly connected' causation requirements established by Brown . . . can be shown in this case. . . The City's policy maker has not been shown to be deliberately indifferent to a known need for training. The Fifth Circuit held in Thompson v. Upshur County, 245 F.3d 447, 459–60 (5th Cir.2001, that Fifth Circuit precedent makes clear that deliberate indifference on the part of a governmental policymaker cannot generally be shown from a single violation of constitutional rights or expert testimony."); Hinojosa v. Sheriff of Cook Cnty., No. 13 C 9079, 2015 WL 5307514, at *7 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 10, 2015) ("Hinojosa's case does not fall within this narrow [single incident] exception. Hinojosa does not dispute that Contreras received substantial training and instead contends that Contreras should have received additional training on when to use deadly force against intoxicated individuals or when a taser is involved, as well as training on a ballistic shield's resistance to sharp-edged weapons. . . In support, she cites the deposition testimony of CCSPD sergeant O'Brien, who testified that he could not recall whether any courses have been offered regarding 'what happens when someone is' tased, or 'what will happen if an edged weapon strikes a ballistic shield.'. . Hinojosa also points to the testimony of CCSPD sergeant Hartsfield, who testified that he has never trained officers 'with regard to situations involving stairways and [the] firing of a [t]aser followed by the use of deadly force.'. . As the Court explained in Connick, however, '[t]hat sort of nuance simply cannot support an inference of deliberate indifference.'. . Indeed, '[i]n virtually every instance where a person has had his or her constitutional rights violated by a city employee, a § 1983 plaintiff will be able to point to something the city "could have done" to prevent the unfortunate incident.'. . As such, Hinojosa cannot simply argue that the Sheriff should have done more, but must provide some basis for concluding that the Sheriff was on notice of likely constitutional violations and nevertheless chose, through inaction, to disregard highly predictable consequences and to violate the Constitution. That, Hinojosa has not done. Because this case is readily distinguishable from the extreme circumstances of the hypothetical posed in City of Canton, no reasonable jury could conclude from the evidence presented that the Sheriff had notice that a deficiency in its training program would obviously cause its personnel to violate citizens' rights. Summary judgment will be granted on Hinojosa's failure-to-train claim."); Pindak v. Dart, 125 F.Supp.3d 720, (N.D. Ill. 2015) ("It is undisputed that the Sheriff did not have any training or specific policies regarding panhandling, but whether the need for training or policies was, or should have been, obvious to the Sheriff remains a question of fact. Plaintiffs offer evidence showing a series of incidents in which Sheriff's deputies participated in removing panhandlers from the Plaza. . . . This series of alleged bad acts is insufficient, by itself, to establish Monell liability based on the absence of training or policies. Plaintiffs must also provide evidence that the circumstances 'brought the risk at issue to the attention of' Sheriff Dart. . . . Lacking such direct evidence of the Sheriff's knowledge in this case, Plaintiffs make two alternative arguments in support of Monell liability. First, they contend that they are not required to show actual knowledge on the part of the Sheriff because the nature of the duties assigned to the Sheriff's deputies made the need for training obvious . . . . Plaintiffs contend that in an 'open urban space,' such as the Daley Plaza, 'it was inevitable that panhandlers would be present and seek to exercise their legal rights.'. . Defendants acknowledge as much, noting that panhandlers are on the Plaza 'virtually every day.'. . When the Sheriff assigned deputies to posts on the Plaza, Plaintiffs continue, he should have realized they would come into contact with those panhandlers, and is, therefore, liable for inadequately preparing for those interactions. A jury could certainly reach this conclusion, but a reasonable factfinder might also credit the testimony that peaceful panhandling occurs on the Plaza every day and conclude that the risk of a constitutional deprivation to Plaintiffs was not obvious to the Sheriff. . . . Plaintiffs contend that 'when city policymakers are on actual or constructive notice that a particular omission in their training program caused city employees to violate citizens' constitutional rights, the city may be deemed deliberately indifferent if the policymakers choose to retain that program.'. . They maintain that the Sheriff's Department was on notice that their deference to Securitas led to the violation of panhandlers' First Amendment rights. As Connick itself explained, however, plaintiffs prevailing under this theory must show that the city's lack of training caused its own employees to violate citizens' constitutional rights. . . . In short, the court agrees with Plaintiffs that they have presented sufficient evidence to survive summary judgment: A jury might conclude that the need for training was so obvious to the Sheriff, based on the nature of the deputies' assignments, that failure to provide such training was deliberately indifferent. A jury might similarly conclude that the lack of training or policy of deference to Securitas caused the Sheriff's deputies to assist Securitas guards with Securitas' custom of removing panhandlers. But these are not the only possible conclusions that can be drawn from the evidence. A jury might, instead, rely on the testimony that peaceful panhandling occurs on the Plaza every day to infer that the risk of Plaintiffs' constitutional deprivation was not obvious to the Sheriff. Similarly, if a jury concludes that Securitas did not engage in a widespread practice of removing panhandlers, it would be difficult for that jury to find that the Sheriff's acquiescence to Securitas represented deliberate indifference to Plaintiffs' rights. Finally, even if a jury concludes that Securitas did engage in such a policy or widespread practice, the jury might conclude that Sheriff's deputies did not actively assist, but merely failed to prevent that practice. Thus, Plaintiffs' allegations against Sheriff Dart must be decided by a jury."); Williams v. City of New York, 121 F.Supp.3d 354, 375 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("Plaintiff has produced sufficient evidence to create a question of fact whether the City was deliberately indifferent to the need for additional training of officers with respect to their interactions with hearing-impaired individuals. Roberson testified that she has overseen NYPD Academy training regarding interactions with individuals with hearing impairments since 2003. The U.S. Agreement (and the events that triggered that agreement) put the City on notice in 2009 that its procedures and officer training might not satisfy its obligations under the ADA and outlined the affirmative steps that needed to be taken so that the City could reasonably ensure that its officers did not violate the rights of individuals with hearing impairments. . . Moreover, putting aside the agreement with the United States, it would be preposterous to believe that given the diversity of the population in the City of New York, the NYPD did not know full well that its officers would encounter persons with hearing impairments in connection with protecting and defending the City and that some of those people would need accommodation in order to interact with the police. Although the U.S. Agreement mandated certain changes to the training that officers received as new recruits, see U.S. Agreement § 9, Roberson testified that she did not make any changes to the training program following the U.S. Agreement. The only evidence in the record of any officer receiving relevant training is Officer Romano's training in the academy, which occurred prior to 2009. Thus, although Plaintiff, like Cash, can point to only a single prior incident where the NYPD treated a person with a hearing impairment badly, a jury could find that the single prior incident put the NYPD on notice of the need to train its officers on procedures to comply with the ADA. And, the evidence of the NYPD's treatment of the Plaintiff could be sufficient for a jury to conclude that the City was deliberately indifferent to its ADA obligations."); Gallion v. Hinds Cnty., Miss., No. 3:12CV736-DPJ-FKB, 2015 WL 3409460, at *4-5 (S.D. Miss. May 27, 2015) ("When a plaintiff attempts to show a pattern of conduct, the conduct must be sufficiently similar to prove deliberate indifference. The United States Supreme Court explored this issue in Connick v. Thompson, observing that '[w]ithout notice that a course of training is deficient in a particular respect, decisionmakers can hardly be said to have deliberately chosen a training program that will cause violations of constitutional rights.'. . The plaintiff in Connick brought § 1983 claims for alleged Brady violations and offered proof of four prior Brady violations. . . But the Court was unmoved, finding that unlike Thompson's Brady claim, none of the prior Brady violations 'involved failure to disclose blood evidence, a crime lab report, or physical or scientific evidence of any kind.'. .And because those prior violations were dissimilar, 'they could not have put Connick on notice that specific training was necessary to avoid this constitutional violation.'. .The evidence in this case is similarly lacking. The closest Plaintiff comes to proof of a pattern is the affidavit of fellow inmate Charles Lavon Gallion. . . According to Charles Gallion, he 'personally witnessed that sometimes the [medical] forms were not picked up on a daily basis and sometimes other incarcerated persons were not treated.'. . He also states that he was 'not given [his] prostate medication timely,'. .. and that 'one would have to fallout before anyone would provide medical attention,'. . . . These averments are not sufficient. First, evidence related to delayed receipt of medical requests simply proves that the County's policy was ignored. Second, Charles Gallion's account of delayed prostate medication is not sufficiently similar to provide notice to Hinds County that a medical-emergency policy was necessary for the detection of conditions like a pulmonary embolism. . . And his remaining allegations are too generic to create a jury question. Charles Gallion never identifies any of the other inmates; when the incidents occurred; how many occurred; the inmates' symptoms, injuries, or illnesses; whether their conditions would require emergency care; the duration of their conditions; or the treatment they did or did not receive under the existing medical policies that had been adopted just two months before Gallion was incarcerated. Simply put, there is not enough information to know whether the other inmates' symptoms and conditions were sufficiently similar to have put Hinds County on notice that its existing policies were deficient to detect the type of emergency Gallion presented. . . Without greater specificity, there is no way to tell whether Hinds County made 'an intentional choice' not to adopt a medical-emergency policy, with the 'obvious' likelihood that the decision would lead to 'a deprivation of civil rights.'"); Estate of Bleck v. City of Alamosa, 105 F.Supp.3d 1222, 1231-34 (D. Colo. 2015) ("Mr. Bleck does not argue, much less attempt to establish by offer of evidence, that such a pattern of prior incidents exists here. Instead, he suggests that this case presents the exceptional circumstance in which deliberate indifference may be found despite the absence of a pattern of prior unconstitutional behavior. . . This class of cases, however, is exceedingly narrow, and liability will be found only where 'a violation of federal rights is a "highly predictable" or "plainly obvious" consequence of a municipality's action or inaction, such as when a municipality fails to train an employee in specific skills needed to handle recurring situations, thus presenting an obvious potential for constitutional violations.'. . As a general matter, the Supreme Court has cautioned specifically against judicial micro-management in this area. . . .Despite these substantial barriers, Mr. Bleck suggests that this case presents such an extraordinary instance because the City failed to specifically train officers in dealing with the mentally ill. . . . Mr. Bleck focuses primarily on APD's General Order No. 02510 on use of force, which he criticizes for not addressing interactions between officers and the mentally ill. . . His reliance on this document is inapt, however, because his claim against the City is for failure to train, not for maintenance of an unconstitutional written policy. The General Order – a self-described set of 'guidelines in the use of force and in the reporting of the use of force'. . . does not itself contemplate or provide for any particular type of training. Moreover, despite whatever gaps may be thought to exist within the use of force policy specific to dealing with mentally ill or intoxicated persons, nothing therein counters the City's evidence that officers did in fact receive training sufficient to equip them to engage and deal with the mentally ill. Nor has Mr. Bleck made any other effort to demonstrate that the training APD officers do receive is so lacking in relevant substance that a constitutional violation was the 'obvious consequence' of the failure to provide more specific training. . . .More importantly, however—and regardless whether officers were trained to deal with the mentally ill vel non—the most salient fact remains that Officer Martinez's decision to go hands on with his duty weapon still in his hand was directly contrary to his training in the use of this control technique. . . It was this action that directly and proximately caused the injuries Mr. Bleck suffered. The City was not the 'moving force' behind this injury, however, because the APD had trained its officers not to attempt hands on control while still armed, regardless of the mental status of the person sought to be controlled. . . In the absence of vicarious liability, the City may not be held liable based on a single instance in which an officer acted contrary to the specific dictates of his training. Thus, Mr. Bleck's failure to train claim ultimately fails, and the City is entitled to summary judgment."), aff'd, 643 F. App'x 754 (10th Cir. 2016); Johnson v. City of Vallejo, 99 F.Supp.3d 1212, 1222

(E.D. Cal. 2015) ("After a careful review of the above described extensive record in this case and relevant case law, the Court concludes that although there is evidence of some systemic issues within the VPD, the evidence does not meet the extremely stringent legal standards required for claims under Monell. Although VPD officers shot and killed four people in the span of just three months in the middle of 2012 and Defendants deduced no pattern and made no changes in training in response, there is insufficient evidence that any of the other shootings by police resulted in constitutional violations. In order for a claim to succeed, Defendants must have been on 'actual or constructive notice that a particular omission in their training program causes city employees to violate citizens' constitutional rights.' Connick, 131 S.Ct. at 1360 (internal citations omitted). As stated, '[a] pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees is "ordinarily necessary" to demonstrate deliberate indifference for purposes of failure to train.'. . In the instant case there is no evidence that VPD officers committed other constitutional violations. Plaintiffs argue that a reasonable jury could find that the total inaction of the City and Kreins in response to this uptick of police-involved shootings of civilians, and specifically the repeated incidents involving Kenney, showed a 'deliberate indifference' to the constitutional rights of the people of Vallejo. . . However, again, the unconstitutionality of these actions has not been proven. The Court does note the difficult task facing Plaintiffs who wish to bring a claim for failure to train. As is evident by this case, the constitutionality of police conduct is often not determined by an unbiased entity until years after the conduct has occurred. Nevertheless, some evidence of constitutional violations is required to maintain the Monell claim in this case. The Court also finds insufficient evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact as to whether 'a sufficient causal connection between [Kreins'] alleged wrongful conduct and the constitutional violation[s]' exists. . . Although the evidence shows that Kreins' inaction may have been called into question in the face of repeated use of lethal force by his officers against victims who either did not have firearms or who at least did not fire them, there is a lack of evidence that this resulted in constitutional violations. Therefore, the Court also grants Defendants' motion as to the claim against Kreins in his individual capacity for supervisory liability."); Booke v. Cnty. of Fresno, 98 F.Supp.3d 1103, 1126 (E.D. Cal. 2015) ("Police interactions with mentally disabled individuals are not uncommon, and courts in this circuit have permitted Monell claims to proceed when the policy/training at issue involves interactions with the mentally disabled. . . In those cases, however, the key was an absence of both a policy and training regarding interactions with mentally disabled individuals. . . Here, SPD has Policy 418, which appears to appropriately address interactions with the mentally disabled. Further, although Cpl. Callahan's January 30, 2012 memo indicates that training had not been occurring, training through the received POST DVD's was being made available to SPD officers and the DVD's were intended to address inter alia Policy 418. These facts make this case materially different from Newman and Kirby.In sum, Policy 418 addresses interactions with the mentally disabled, and Plaintiff has identified neither deficiencies within Policy 418 nor other incidents involving SPD personnel and mentally disturbed individuals. Plaintiff has not shown an actual violation of state law, POST training mandates, or Policy 418.6. Summary judgment in favor of the City on this failure to train claim is appropriate."); Pluma v. City of New York, No. 13 CIV. 2017 LAP, 2015 WL 1623828, at *12 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 31, 2015) ("Here, the proposed amended complaint simply does not allege the kind of deliberate indifference needed to raise a reasonable inference that the City was culpable in its training or lack thereof. In attempting to articulate this theory, Plaintiff again focuses on instances of inappropriate pepper spray deployment described in the CCRB report and on the NYPD Deputy Inspector spraying a group of protesters. Again, though, this handful of dissimilar incidents occurring over the course of more than a decade is too sparse to put the City on notice that the NYPD's training program produces officers who are likely to commit constitutional violations through their deployment of pepper spray. . . Indeed, the CCRB report noted that officers were already trained regarding deployment in crowds, and the only training revisions it suggested proposed offering additional opportunities to practice aiming because officers often deploy the spray with their nondominant hands. . . The report articulated no concerns that the training would lead to problematic deployment in groups. Thus, these incidents as raised in the proposed amended complaint cannot meet the high standard required to allege that the City was on notice that its training program was so deficient that by failing to alter it, the City was essentially complicit in the violation of Plaintiff's constitutional rights."); Ewing v. Cumberland Cnty., No. CIV. 09-5432 JBS/AMD, 2015 WL 1384374, at *27-28 (D.N.J. Mar. 25, 2015) ("The need for use of force training in a jail is obvious, as it is highly predictable that failure to understand its appropriate use would result in injury to inmates and officers alike. A reasonable jury could conclude based on the frequent daily interactions between jailers and inmates that there was a high likelihood constitutional violations might recur if training was not provided. Because it was patently obvious that failure to provide training on the use of force would result in excessive force, the evidence is sufficient for a reasonable juror to conclude that Defendant's failure to train amounted to deliberate indifference. . . The evidence is also sufficient to sustain a 'causal link' between the lack of training and the injuries Plaintiff sustained at the hands of correctional officers. At the time of the incident, four of the five officers in the strip search room (Still, Pratts, Minguela, and Fazzolari) had not yet received training from the academy; and three (Still, Pratts, and Minguela) were supposed to have already received training, but Defendant had delayed it by requesting waivers from the State. According to the training log, none of the officers had attended a specific training on the use of force. Ciagnolini, Pierce, and Sciore, who were the commanding officers at the time, likewise had little training. In fact, the three of them had not had use of force training (or trainings of any kind, for that matter) in the eight years before this incident. It is patently obvious that the officers' ignorance of the rules on how and when to use force against a prisoner might have contributed to their transgression of those rules. Defendant's argument, that there is no causal link between the failure to train and the excessive use of force against Plaintiff, thus cannot be sustained."); Poventud v. City of New York, No. 07 CIV. 3998 DAB, 2015 WL 1062186, at *15-17 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 9, 2015) ("A reasonable jury could find that the City knows 'to a moral certainty' that police officers will discover exculpatory evidence, including evidence related to false identifications, there is a 'powerful incentive[ ] to make the wrong choice' not to disclose such evidence, and an officer's wrong choice frequently will cause the deprivation of a criminal defendant's liberty. . . Plaintiff cites to eight instances in which courts determined during criminal proceedings that police officers did not disclose all exculpatory material in the years immediately preceding Plaintiff's trial. Plaintiff also cites to a $1.75 million settlement in 1997 of a civil lawsuit that claimed NYPD officers withheld an exculpatory ballistics report. The eight criminal court decisions and the large civil settlement put the City on notice to a potential problem that NYPD officers were not complying with their Brady obligations. Defendants do not contest that they had notice of these alleged violations. Because Plaintiff has met his burden under the Walker standard, the next inquiry is whether Plaintiff has raised a triable question of fact as to the existence of obvious and severe deficiencies in the City's response. The City neither investigated nor disciplined the officers involved in the nine civil and criminal court matters. Although an NYPD officer could be disciplined or suspended for failing to disclose evidentiary material to the prosecution, there was no specific procedure for imposing such discipline. . . Nor have Defendants provided any evidence of an officer ever being disciplined for failing to disclose material to the prosecution, to produce a DD5, or to document or disclose material, including in Plaintiff's case. . .Plaintiff also cites to three reports that put the City on notice that it was not investigating allegations made in civil or criminal courts of NYPD officers' constitutional violations. It was not until 2010 that the NYPD developed a policy to learn about lawsuits that allege improper behavior by officers. . . A jury may find such persistent failures give rise to deliberate indifference. . . A reasonable jury could also infer a sufficient causal link between the City's policy or custom of failing to investigate or discipline officers for alleged Brady violations and the NYPD officers' failure to disclose evidence that contributed the Plaintiff's conviction and incarceration. . .Defendants' primary argument is that eight of the nine cases cited by Plaintiff are not similar enough to the instant alleged Brady violation to demonstrate a pattern of similar conduct by officers and deliberate indifference to it on the part of the City. In support of this contention, Defendants cite to the Supreme Court's holding in Connick, which dealt with deliberate indifference in the failure to train context. . . The plaintiff in Connick pointed to four convictions being vacated during the ten years before his trial due to prosecutors' Brady violations. . . .Although Defendants contend that the Supreme Court's holding regarding the level of specificity required in a failure to train claim extends to failure to discipline claims, the two claims are 'distinct theories of ... deliberate indifference.'. . Nor do Defendants cite to any case law supporting their interpretation. In the failure to discipline or supervise context, courts have required notice of similar types of constitutional violations, such as excessive force or withholding exculpatory material. But, those courts have not required the precise behaviors-such as the failure to disclose exculpatory scientific evidence-as required in the failure to train context. . . Therefore, the nine civil and criminal court matters relating to NYPD officers' failure to give exculpatory evidence to the prosecution are sufficiently similar to the instant alleged Brady violation for a jury to find that the City and NYPD were on notice. Plaintiff has met his burden in establishing that a reasonable jury could find the City was deliberately indifferent to allegations that NYPD officers violated their Brady requirements and that indifference caused him to be denied a constitutional right. Accordingly, Defendants' Motion is DENIED with respect to Plaintiff's municipal liability claim."); Stern v. City of New York, No. 12-CV-5210 NGG RER, 2015 WL 918754, at *4-5 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 3, 2015) ("Plaintiff does not allege that the City failed to screen Shammas when he originally was hired or that the City failed to train Shammas. Rather, Plaintiff makes specific factual allegations regarding Shammas's actual record and the City's actual response to that record. For the purposes of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, this is sufficient. . . Whether the facts ultimately demonstrate deliberate indifference on the part of the City to the possibility that Shammas would engage in future constitutional violations of the type alleged by Plaintiff is not at issue at this juncture. . . Defendants may be correct that as a matter of fact, the City's reaction to Shammas's prior record, which the City characterizes as not including Fourth Amendment violations, does not constitute deliberate indifference. . .But Defendants ignore that Plaintiff has alleged with some particularity that Shammas [Redacted] For the same reasons, Defendants' concern that 'any plaintiff would have a viable Monell claim each time any officer had any type of disciplinary history whatsoever' is exaggerated. . . Here, Plaintiff alleges specific disciplinary history that is related to the alleged constitutional violations; Plaintiff has not alleged, for example, that Shammas's history of tardiness and unexcused absence from work made it obvious to the City that he would engage in future Fourth Amendment violations. Defendants' reliance on Connick v. Thompson, 131 S.Ct. 1350 (2011), is misplaced. As an initial matter, the Supreme Court framed its entire analysis in Connick in the failure-to-train context. For example, the Court explained that '[a] municipality's culpability for a deprivation of rights is at its most tenuous where a claim turns on a failure to train.'. . It further held that '[a] pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees is "ordinarily necessary" to demonstrate deliberate indifference for purposes of failure to train.'. . And even notwithstanding the Supreme Court's concerns regarding failure-to-train municipal liability, the Court left open the possibility, first hypothesized in City of Canton, that a single incident in the failure-to-train context can be so extreme as to warrant municipal liability in the absence of a pattern of similar constitutional violations. . . But this is not a failure-to-train case, and Plaintiff's theory does not rest upon a pattern of similar constitutional violations by other officers within the NYPD. . . Rather, as discussed above, Plaintiff alleges that a single decision by a municipal policymaker constituted the municipal policy in this case. Connick does not squarely address such a theory, and therefore does not control in this case. Cf. Jones v. Town of E. Haven, 691 F.3d 72, 81 (2d Cir.2012) (post-Connick case analyzing Section 1983 claim based on decision or omission by policymaking official and relying on pre-Connick cases, including Bryan County and Amnesty America)."); Waller v. City of Middletown, No. 3:11-CV-01322 CSH, 2015 WL 778749, at *4-6, *8-10 (D. Conn. Feb. 24, 2015) ("Plaintiffs did not allege a pre-existing pattern of violations. Therefore, their Section 1983 claim against the City turned on the existence of a single violation demonstrating that the City was deliberately indifferent to training police officers with respect to entries and searches of private residences. To hold a municipality liable under Section 1983 without proof of a pre-existing pattern of violations, 'the unconstitutional consequences of failing to train' must be 'patently obvious' and an actual violation of constitutional rights must be a 'highly predictable consequence' of the failure to train. . . In City of Canton, the Supreme Court described, by way of an example, a circumstance in which the need to train is obvious and the consequences of failing to train, highly predictable. . . . It is difficult to read this passage and conclude that unlike the need to train officers on the constitutional limitations of the use of deadly force, the need to train officers on the constitutional limitations of searches of private residences conducted pursuant to the execution of an arrest warrant is not also obvious, and the consequences for not training, highly predictable. . . . Although Connick declined to recognize a Monell claim based on the single incident of liability alleged in that case, courts post-Connick have not read the Supreme Court's ruling as foreclosing single incident liability under appropriate circumstances. [collecting cases] The City, even in the absence of prior similar violations, knows to a 'moral certainty,'. . . that its officers will be required, for any number of reasons, to enter private residences, and that in some instances, they will be compelled to do so, without a search warrant or exigent circumstances. Furthermore, given that an arrest warrant does not bestow officers with unfettered authority to enter private residence in all circumstances, it is plausible that execution of arrest warrants presents officers with 'difficult choice[s] of the sort that training ... will make less difficult[]'. . . and that a 'highly predictable consequence' of officers making the wrong choices. . .would be 'the deprivation of a citizens constitutional rights[]'. . . . The Court therefore concludes that the prior Ruling was not improper to the extent it denied the City's motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' Monell claim against the City. The complaint states a claim under the single-incident theory of liability contemplated in City of Canton, and recognized by the cited authority post-Connick. . . . Even assuming that the single-incident liability theory implicit in the complaint could lead a factfinder to reasonably conclude that the City's failure to train constitutes deliberate indifference under Walker, Plaintiffs' Monell claim fails on Reynolds's second and third prongs. Plaintiffs have not identified obvious and severe deficiencies in the City's training program that reflect a purposeful rather than negligent course of action, and cannot show a casual relationship between a training deficiency and the deprivation of their rights. . . .Notwithstanding the fact that there is some question in the record as to whether the Officers received training on the constitutional limitations of protective sweeps specifically, the record suggests the likelihood that the Officers' received adequate training on searches and seizures incident to an arrest warrant and permissible conduct under the Fourth Amendment. The Officers' Field Manual, the 'Review Training Credit Reports' for each officer issued by the State of Connecticut Officer Standards and Training Council, and deposition testimony from the Officers' training instructor and the Officers' themselves, lend to the conclusion that City's officer training program as it relates to permissible searches under the Fourth Amendment was sound. The Court's prior Ruling implicitly concluded, contrary to fact, that the record contained sufficient evidence in support of Plaintiffs' Monell claim. In recognizing a genuine and material issue of fact that found no support in the record, the Court improperly saddled the City with the burden of establishing that its training program was adequate. The Court's ruling denying the City summary judgment on Count Two of the complaint will therefore be vacated and judgment will enter on that count in favor of the City."); Petkovich v. City of Montgomery, Ala., No. 2:14-CV-923-WHA-WC, 2015 WL 263391, at *4 (M.D. Ala. Jan. 21, 2015) ("Plaintiff alleges no facts indicating the City was on notice of a need to train officers not to fabricate evidence in criminal cases. The Amended Complaint mentions no other incidents that would have alerted the City to such a need. Furthermore, fabrication of evidence is not within the 'narrow' category of cases in which 'the likelihood for constitutional violation is so high that the need for training would be obvious.' The category is so narrow that '[t]he Eleventh Circuit has repeatedly rejected attempts to extend failure-to-train liability [for single incidents] to other law-enforcement situations, such as the use of "hobble" restraints, responding to complaints about the use of handcuffs, and the identification and treatment of mentally ill inmates by jail staff.'. . In light of Eleventh Circuit precedent, this case is not one in which a single incident is sufficient to conclude there was an obvious need for training."); Brown v. Novacek, No. 1:14-CV-00988, 2014 WL 5762952, at *7 (M.D. Pa. Nov. 5, 2014) ("Police officers certainly have knowledge of the dangers of speeding and of texting while driving. As such, even assuming that an inadequate or non-existent formal training policy on texting while driving or speeding could amount to deliberate indifference, such inadequacy cannot constitute deliberate indifference absent a pattern of constitutional violations. Accordingly, the Court will grant Defendants' motion to dismiss, because Plaintiff has not adequately plead that municipal policymakers exhibited deliberate indifference to the inadequacy of their own training program."); Flanagan v. City of Dallas, Tex., 48 F.Supp.3d 941, 956-58 (N.D. Tex. 2014) ("Under the applicable case law, there are two ways in which a plaintiff can establish a municipality's deliberate indifference to the need for proper training. The most common approach is for the plaintiff to demonstrate that a municipality had '[n]otice of a pattern of similar violations,' which were 'fairly similar to what ultimately transpired' when the plaintiff's own constitutional rights were violated. . . The second approach is the limited exception for 'single-incident liability' in the rare case where a constitutional violation would result from 'the highly predictable consequence' of a particular failure to train. . . . Based on the facts presented in Plaintiffs' amended complaint, Plaintiffs have sufficiently pled that (1) the City's training policy procedures were inadequate; (2) the City was deliberately indifferent in adopting its training policy; and (3) the inadequate training policy directly caused the constitutional violation. . . . In particular, Plaintiffs allege that, (1) due to an acknowledged and obvious lack of training in the use of excessive force, DPD officers have shot dozens of unarmed individuals over the past several years based on the DPD's actual custom of 'shoot first, ask later'; (2) due to this lack of training, Officer Staller caused Allen's death; and (3) Councilman Caraway and Chief Brown have both acknowledged the need for further officer training. . . Moreover, Plaintiffs adequately assert . . . that the City had notice of a pattern of similar constitutional violations which were 'fairly similar to what ultimately transpired' when Allen's constitutional rights were violated. . . From these facts, the inference can reasonably be drawn that the City's conduct evidences 'deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the police come into contact.'. . Further, Plaintiffs have set forth sufficient facts in their amended complaint to adequately allege that Chief Brown was both aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm existed and that he also drew the inference, to wit: (1) the large number of shootings of unarmed people over the years; (2) the number of pending internal and grand jury investigations; and (3) Chief Brown's own public statement about the need for more training. . . Accordingly, Plaintiffs' failure to train claim should not be dismissed at this stage."); Breitkopf v. Gentile, 41 F.Supp.3d 220, 254-58 (E.D.N.Y. 2014) ("As an initial matter, the record is bereft of evidence that, before March 2011, the MTA knew of a pattern or even one incident involving the misidentification of plainclothes officers and the use of deadly force by MTAPD employees, the RAND and Task Force Reports, or notice of any purported deficiencies with the NYPD Academy's and the MTA's training of its officers with respect to the use of deadly force and police-on-police confrontations. Further, it is uncontroverted that, before March 2011, the MTA trained its officers, including Gentile, on the basic constitutional limitations on the use of deadly force and how to confront plainclothes officers. . . . Thus, because nothing suggests that the MTA condoned or ignored repeated constitutional violations, plaintiff must rely on a single-incident theory of liability. . . . Since Connick, some courts have concluded that a plaintiff cannot rely on the single-incident theory where she challenges the adequacy and not the lack of the existence of training. . . . Nothing in Connick or Second Circuit precedent, however, precludes a single-incident theory if the plaintiff can show that the training provided is tantamount to a lack of training because the municipal employees have an 'utter lack of an ability to cope with constitutional situations,' . . . and 'the need for more or different training is so obvious and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights[.]'. . . This Court applies that standard. As set forth below, even construing the evidence in the record most favorably to plaintiff, no rational jury could conclude that the standard for municipal liability, under a failure to train theory or any other theory, has been met. MTAPD officers initially train at the NYPD Academy, and they receive ongoing training from the MTAPD on, among other topics, the constitutional limitations on the use of deadly force, plainclothes officer confrontations, and the corresponding written guidelines. Although plaintiff takes issue with the amount or format of the training provided to Gentile, that cannot establish deliberate indifference as a matter of law. . . . In sum, even construing the evidence most favorably to plaintiff, no rational jury could find that Gentile had 'the utter lack of an ability to cope with' the situation before him, . . . and that this lack of ability caused Gentile to misidentify Breitkopf and use excessive force. Accordingly, the Court concludes the MTA is entitled to summary judgment on the Section 1983 claim."); Geist v. Ammary, 40 F.Supp.3d 467, 487-92 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 22, 2014) ("The plaintiff argues that the need to train Officer Ammary as a School Resource Officer (SRO)—a police officer working in a school setting—was 'so obvious' that a pattern of constitutional violations would not be necessary for the City to be liable under Monell. . . Genuine disputes of material fact remain regarding whether the training provided to Officer Ammary and other SROs was adequate. . . . [T]he only training Officer Ammary received when he became an SRO was to shadow another SRO. . . Chief Hanna was aware of specialized training for officers through the National Association for School Resource Officers (NASRO). . . . Allentown did not provide this training, however, before placing its officers in a school setting or at any time thereafter. . . Officer Ammary testified that NASRO training had been discussed, but he was never afforded this training due to budgetary constraints. . . The plaintiff's expert, however, found that the City of Allentown had a budget surplus of $666,830.00 in 2011—the year Officer Ammary became an SRO at the high school level. . . This evidence alone raises a genuine dispute over Officer Ammary's lack of training, which would be material to the analysis of whether the City was 'deliberately indifferent' to potential constitutional violations. . . Evidence in the record also suggests a history of possible mishandling of students at dismissal which could amount to constitutional violations of students' rights. It was not uncommon for Officer Ammary and other officers to restrain certain students at dismissal simply to run background checks or ensure they didn't have outstanding warrants. . . These actions served to 'set[ ] the tone that police aren't messing around, that they mean business.'. . From these facts, a jury could find that it was foreseeable that a student could be injured during an arrest by a SRO who was inadequately trained in controlling crowds of teenagers and that the training that was offered to SROs was inadequate in these respects. . . . The plaintiff also alleges that Allentown police officers were not properly trained in how to use Tasers because: 1) they were not properly trained on how to aim the Tasers, and 2) they were not trained to never aim the Taser at 'sensitive' areas such as the groin. . .There is a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the Allentown police department's training on how to aim the Taser was appropriate. Allentown police began using Tasers in July 2011, just before Ms. Wilson was tased. . . Officer Ammary testified that he was trained to aim the laser at the quadrant of the person's body he hoped to hit. . . There is . . . a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether Officer Ammary was advised not to target sensitive areas, specifically the groin and back. . . Officer Ammary testified that he was only warned not to aim for the face, head, throat, or heart. . . . a jury could find that the department should have known of the potential risks Tasers posed and that the City was 'deliberately indifferent' to the risks improper training could pose. This evidence by the plaintiff raises genuine issues of fact about whether the department's Taser training was adequate. A reasonable jury could find that had the training been adequate the injury to Ms. Wilson could have been avoided."); Geist v. Ammary, 40 F.Supp.3d 467, 493-97 (E.D. Pa. 2014) ("The record raises questions of material fact about whether the Use of Policy or the Taser training adequately addressed when the use of a Taser was an appropriate use of force. Lieutenant Reinik agreed that the Taser training taught officers 'how to use [the Taser] but not when' to use the Taser. Lieutenant Reinik and Chief Hanna admit to relying almost entirely on TASER®'s materials in preparing their training program. Guidance put out by the Department of Justice warns against police departments relying heavily or solely on the materials provided by TASER®, the manufacturer, in its training of officers. The Department of Justice recommends that police departments incorporate their Taser training into use of force policies. From the record, there is a genuine dispute of material fact about whether the Allentown Police Department did integrate the Taser training into its use of policy adequately. It is unclear who developed the Department's Taser Policy and whether already known risks about Tasers were considered in crafting the policy. Officer Hanna, the director of the police academy, testified that he 'did not have any part in the creation or the development or authoring of [the Taser or use of force] policies.' Lieutenant Reinik also said he was not consulted when the policy was put into place. In addition, Officer Ammary was trained on the Use of Force Policy, which supposedly discussed use of a Taser. This training, however, was offered six months before the police department was approved for the use of Tasers and six months before the Taser Policy was added to the Use of Force Policy. Furthermore, there remains a question of whether the training materials and the Use of Force Policy provided officers with appropriate guidance on when the use of a Taser on a minor was appropriate. Lieutenant Reinik could not remember if the Taser training itself addressed when the use of a Taser on a minor was appropriate. The training simply said 'Avoid using on children' without much further explanation. When asked about the Use of Force policy's guidance on juveniles, Officer Ammary testified that the officers' priority was not on 'age or size.' Whether the use of a Taser on a child was appropriate was left to the discretion of the officer. While the department's Taser training materials do advise officers not to use the Taser on 'small children,' this phrase is ambiguous and not well-defined. Officer Ammary himself indicated that he would not Taser a child of age eleven but thought tasing a fourteen-year-old was appropriate. Why one was appropriate and not the other was unclear. Given that seven officers were placed in City schools with Tasers, the department's lack of guidance on what type of force may be used on children and teenagers and lack of guidance on when tasing juveniles was appropriate could amount to 'deliberate indifference.' There also remains a genuine dispute of fact about whether the Use of Force Policy's lack of guidance on when to use a Taser encouraged officers to overuse Tasers as a tool of force. The defendant's expert 'found no evidence that [the Allentown Police Department] encouraged the use of [Conducted Electrical Weapons (a.k.a Tasers)] in all situations.' However, the Taser firing record for the Taser used in this incident offers a different picture. The Taser used in the incident with Ms. Wilson was fired close to 150 times between the officers' Taser training in July 2011 and the incident with Ms. Wilson at the end of September 2011. Resolving all disputes in favor of the plaintiff, a jury could find that the Use of Force Policy as it related to Taser usage was inadequate in guiding officers on when it was appropriate to use the Taser as a tool of force. Evidence in the record also shows that supervisors in the Allentown Police Department were 'deliberately indifferent' to the risks this lack of guidance posed. The Use of Force Policy itself required the Assistant Chief of Police to review these incidents. Whether this sort of review actually occurred is unclear. Despite numerous incidents which had caused serious injuries to tased persons, the Police Department did not amend or revise the Policy to better guide the officers in the use of their Tasers. For example, one suspect was hit in the back of the head by a Taser probe causing him to go into a seizure. This lack of review and revision could be viewed as showing 'deliberate indifference' on the part of the defendants, after all factual disputes are resolved in favor of the plaintiff. Resolving all of these disputes in favor of the plaintiff, a jury could find that the Police Department's Use of Force policy was deficient and that this deficiency caused Ms. Wilson's injury, making the City liable under Monell." footnotes omitted); Tolbert v. Trammell, 2:13-CV-02108-WMA, 2014 WL 3892115, *5 (N.D. Ala. Aug. 4, 2014) ("Even if the claims of excessive force referenced in the amended complaint were demonstrated to have merit, they are not so 'substantially similar' to Trammell's alleged misconduct that they form a pattern of similar constitutional violations. . . The limited information in the amended complaint indicates that the police conduct complained of in at least five of the six claims occurred during arrests. . . Hypothetically, if none of those officers encountered resistence and a plaintiff demonstrated that all five claims had merit, those five claims might provide notice to the City that the BPD requires further training and supervision on appropriate force when an officer makes an arrest and encounters no resistance. However, plaintiff does not claim that Trammell engaged in substantially similar conduct. Using excessive force during an arrest when no resistance is offered differs markedly from pulling over a vehicle for no reason and shouting and pointing a gun at the passengers with no provocation. Plaintiff also does not allege specific facts indicating that Trammell himself committed other similar constitutional violations such that the City might have notice that Trammell as an individual requires further training or supervision. In sum, plaintiff has not alleged facts showing that Trammell's claimed misconduct fits within a pattern of substantially similar constitutional violations such that the City would have notice that the BPD or any officer requires further training or supervision in a specific area. Without any facts to show that the City had notice, the City's alleged failure to train or supervise does not evidence 'deliberate indifference' or rise to the level of a custom actionable under § 1983. . . Accordingly, plaintiff's § 1983 claims as against the City will be dismissed insofar as they are based on the Fourth Amendment."); Brown v. Blanchard, 13-C-0511, 2014 WL 3513374, *8, *9 (E.D. Wis. July 17, 2014) ("In the present case, the question presented in connection with plaintiff's claim against Walworth County is whether the County's failure to provide its deputy sheriffs with training on how to respond to suicide calls amounted to deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of the individuals with whom the deputies come into contact. The evidence does not indicate that there has been any pattern of constitutional violations involving the rights of suicidal persons in Walworth County, and so the question is whether the need for training on how to respond to a suicide call without committing constitutional violations (including unreasonable seizures) is so obvious that the County's failure to provide such training amounts to deliberate indifference. A reasonable jury could conclude that the County knew 'to a moral certainty' that its sheriff's deputies would be required to respond to suicide calls. . . . Further, a reasonable jury could conclude that it is obvious that training is needed to ensure that deputies do not unnecessarily precipitate the need to use deadly force during an encounter with a suicidal person. The Crisis Management Guidelines devote an entire chapter to the topic of how to handle suicidal persons, . . . and this supports the conclusion that law-enforcement officers need at least some training on what to do when responding to a suicide call. Finally, as far as the present record reveals, Walworth County provides its deputies with no training whatsoever on the proper handling of suicide calls. Thus, the jury could reasonably conclude that Walworth County has failed to adequately train its sheriff's deputies on the proper handling of suicidal persons, and that in doing so it was deliberately indifferent to the risk that constitutional violations would result. The County points out that the Seventh Circuit has held that a failure to provide special training to officers on the proper use of force against 'people who appear to be crazy' is not deliberate indifference, at least in the absence of a pattern of constitutional violations that could have been prevented by special training. See Pena v. Leombruni, 200 F.3d 1031, 1033–34 (7th Cir.1999). But in Pena, the question was whether special training was needed on the use of force against a crazy person who appeared to be threatening a law-enforcement officer with serious physical harm. The Seventh Circuit held that the municipality's general training on the proper use of force 'covered the case of the crazy assailant, giving him all the protection to which constitutional law entitled him.'. . In the present case, the question is not whether Walworth County should have given its deputies special training on when it was permissible to use deadly force against a person who appears to be suicidal. It is whether the County should have given its deputies training on how to avoid unreasonably creating the need to use deadly force against a suicidal person in the first place. Pena is not instructive on this latter question and thus does not foreclose the plaintiff from pursuing a failure-to-train claim at trial. Finally, a reasonable jury could find a causal connection between Walworth County's failure to train its deputies on how to respond to suicide calls and the plaintiff's injury. Had Blanchard received some training on strategies for approaching suicidal persons, such as those mentioned in the Crisis Management Guidelines, he might not have unnecessarily rushed into Brown's room with his gun drawn and unreasonably precipitated a deadly confrontation with Brown."); Williams v. School Town of Munster, No. 2:12–cv–225–APR, 2014 WL 1794565, *4-*6 (N.D. Ind. May 6, 2014) ("Courts have interpreted Canton and Connick to hold municipalities liable when they have failed to provide any training, so long as the matter on which they failed to train was not too nuanced. For example, in *Thomas v. Cumberland County, —— F.3d ——, 2014 WL 1395666 (3rd Cir.2014), the defendant corrections officers did not receive any training in conflict de-escalation and intervention. Following an attack, an inmate brought an action against the county and corrections officers, alleging that the county failed to train the officers in these areas. The court explained that based on the frequency of fights and the volatile nature of a prison, the predictability that an officer who lacked training in de-escalating conflicts would violate an inmate's constitutional rights was great. . . Similarly, in *Jimenez v. Hopkins, 2014 WL 176578 (W.D.Ky.2014), the plaintiff alleged that the county violated his rights under the Eighth, Tenth, and Fourteenth Amendment by acting with deliberate indifference to his medical needs. The plaintiff presented a single violation of federal rights, seeking to hold the county liable under a failure to train theory. The court explained that other than CPR and first-aid training, the county did not provide any training to its officers to look for or to be aware of symptoms of physical illness, how to recognize and respond to medical needs, how to document requests for medical care, or how to pass on medical concerns to jail nursing staff. . . The court explained that this was a recurring situation with an obvious potential for a violation. . .The courts have considered the single incident violations on a spectrum between 'the plainly obvious need to train armed officers "in the constitutional limitations of deadly force" in Canton ... and the lack of such an obvious need in Connick where prosecutors had a legal education and ethical obligations and the allegedly necessary training was nuanced.'. . The courts begin by looking at the likelihood that such an incident might occur. Here, the need to train the individuals who served as supervisors at the football games perhaps was not as obvious as Canton because Alb and Stopper were not provided with weapons. However, the purpose of having supervisors was to ensure safety and to enforce the school's policies. There certainly was a strong likelihood that situations would arise during the course of providing security that would involve the discretionary task of determining how to break up an incident or enforce a policy. The predictability that an untrained supervisor could exceed the constitutional limitations on excessive force or enforce the policies in a discriminatory manner without training was great. This is not a situation like in Connick where the government actors had prior training that would have put them on notice of what was expected of them. Williams is not asserting that the school should have provided training in a nuanced area. Rather, he is alleging that the School Town of Munster failed to provide training on how to carry out the predominate tasks the defendants were asked to perform. For these reasons, the court finds that Williams has submitted sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to conclude that the School Town of Munster's failure to provide any training on how to provide security and enforce its policies was the result of its deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of the attendees."); Hernandez v. City of Beaumont, No. EDCV 13–00967 DDP (DTBx), 2014 WL 1669990, *3, *4 (C.D. Cal. Apr. 28, 2014) ("Plaintiffs sufficiently plead a violation of Monique's Fourth Amendment rights, satisfying the first requirement for their failure to train claim. With regard to the deliberate indifference requirement, Plaintiffs cite one prior lawsuit, Valenzuela v. City of Beaumont, which was filed against the City for excessive force in the use of a different pepper spray gun device with some similarities to the JPX. . . However, a single prior lawsuit involving a different pepper spray device is insufficient to support a finding that the City was 'deliberately indifferent' to the need for more training on the JPX, especially where there is no indication that the claims in the prior action were substantiated or that the plaintiffs there were successful. . . As a result, Plaintiffs must premise their claim on the narrow exception allowing a failure to train claim to proceed where the need for additional training is 'so obvious' that the failure to provide that training amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of those that are likely to come into contact with the City police. Plaintiffs' TAC corrects the deficiencies the Court identified in the Second Amended Complaint such that Plaintiffs have now stated a plausible claim for municipal liability. Plaintiffs allege that the 'only training' on the JPX 'consisted of a one-time classroom presentation ... followed by a written test.'. . Plaintiffs allege that 'the one-time classroom presentation did not include any information regarding the constitutional implications or limitations on the use of the JPX, nor did the training include when and how BPD officers can safely deploy the JPX .'. . Further, Plaintiffs allege that BPD officers were told that 'the use of the JPX was "not a use of force."'. .Defendants are correct that neither the fact that the training was only a single day, nor the fact that the officers did not receive 'hands-on' training on the JPX, is sufficient to rise to the level of deliberate indifference. However, Plaintiffs now plead facts, as cited above, that suggest that the JPX training included incomplete and/or blatantly inaccurate information about the constitutional implications of using a JPX and the level of force that use of the JPX would constitute. Plaintiffs further allege that it would have been obvious to any reasonable officer who fired a JPX (or saw one fired) that it did not function like a typical pepper spray device, but was much more powerful than that. . . It would appear, then, that either the supervising officers gave JPX guns to their field officers without ever having fired the device themselves, or they had seen it fired but failed to provide any information during the training program on the obviously dangerous nature of the device. Either way, the supervising officers, and thus the City, can be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need for training on the dangers and constitutional implications of using the JPX because 'the need for [this] training is so obvious.'. . Further, Plaintiffs allege that the City was 'on notice by the JPX manufacturer's warnings that deployment at a distance of less than five feet will result in serious injury or death.'. . The absence of obviously necessary information, therefore, is sufficient to support Plaintiffs' municipal liability claim."); de Tavarez v. City of Fitchburg, No. 11–11460–TSH, 2014 WL 533889, *5, *6 (D. Mass. Feb. 6, 2014) ("Fitchburg and DeMoura had no policy, written or otherwise, or other training regarding the procedures to follow when an arrestee is known or suspected to have swallowed narcotics at the time of Tavarez Perez's arrest and detention. Fitchburg and DeMoura were aware of the danger of drug ingestion and that it may be successfully medically treated, at the very least because of the Ramirez arrest described above. In this circumstance, the complete lack of any training on how officers should proceed when they know or suspect an arrestee has swallowed narcotics presents an issue of material fact as to whether Fitchburg and DeMoura were deliberately indifferent to the rights of their detainees. . . Additionally, there is a question of fact as to whether some measure of training would have prevented the constitutional harm here."); Graddy v. City of Tampa, No. 8:12–cv–1882–T–24 EAJ, 2014 WL 272777, *9, *11 (M.D. Fla. Jan. 23, 2014) ("To the extent that Plaintiff relies on these four incidents by Cornelius to show that the City's supervision of taser usage was inadequate, the Court again finds that four incidents over a three year period are not indicative of a widespread pattern or practice of inadequate supervision. These four incidents, plus the 2006 taser incident by another officer that was reviewed by the IAB, are the only incidents that Plaintiff points to that occurred prior to November 6, 2008 that did not result in an adverse action against the officer in response to the taser usage. Accordingly, viewing Plaintiff's evidence collectively and in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Plaintiff has not shown a widespread pattern or practice of excessive force from taser usage. Therefore, Plaintiff has not shown that the City was put on notice, as of November 6, 2008, of the need for taser training and/or that its review of taser usage was inadequate. As such, Plaintiff cannot show that the City had a custom or policy that constituted deliberate indifference to his constitutional rights. . . . [B]ased on all of the evidence and arguments set forth by Plaintiff, the Court concludes that Plaintiff has not shown a widespread pattern or practice of excessive force from taser usage. Therefore, Plaintiff has not shown that the City was put on notice, as of November 6, 2008, of the need for taser training and/or that its review of taser usage was inadequate. As such, Plaintiff cannot show that the City had a custom or policy that constituted deliberate indifference to his constitutional rights. Without such a showing, the City is entitled to summary judgment on Plaintiff's § 1983 claims."); Jimenez v. Hopkins County, Ky., No. 4:11–CV–00033–JHM, 2014 WL 176578, *17, *18 (W.D. Ky. Jan. 13, 2014) ("Plaintiff alleges that Hopkins County should be held liable for its failure to train the deputy jailers to ensure that legally mandated health care is provided. Plaintiff's specific complaint against Defendant Hopkins County is that nowhere in the policies are the deputy jailers provided any guidance as to what constitutes a 'medical emergency or what to do in its event.'. . . In the instant case, the Court finds that Plaintiff has produced 'evidence of a single violation of federal rights, accompanied by a showing that a municipality has failed to train its employees to handle recurring situations presenting an obvious potential for such a violation.' Brown, 520 U.S. 397, 409 (1997). The record reflects that other than CPR and first-aid training, 'the County does not train officers to look for or be aware of symptoms of physical illness, how to recognize and respond to medical needs, how to document requests from inmates for medical care, or how to pass on medical concerns to jail nursing staff.'. . . The jail's personnel and procedures are structured so that the deputy jailers provide the link between inmates and medical. . . In fact, the nurses testified that they must rely on the deputy jailers to notify medical of any significant medical problems with an inmate. . . Despite this, the deputy jailers who work both the 100 walk and the 500 walk are not provided any training on how to monitor, observe, and determine potential medical needs of the inmates and how to respond to those needs. Thus, Plaintiff has produced sufficient evidence to satisfy the deliberate indifference prong."); Chamberlain v. City of White Plains, 986 F. Supp. 2d 363, (S.D.N.Y. 2013) ("While some have argued that the Connick decision so narrowed the single-incident theory as to essentially eliminate it, courts across the country have continued to apply that theory post-Connick when its strict requirements have been met. [collecting cases in police and jail context] The District Court in Wereb [v. Maui Cnty., 830 F.Supp.2d 1026, 1033–37 (D.Haw.2011)] provides a thorough and well-reasoned analysis of the Connick decision's effect on the single-incident theory . . . and in the absence of guidance from the Second Circuit on this issue, I agree that the theory is still a viable one in limited circumstances. . . .I find that the Amended Complaint plausibly alleges deliberate indifference on the part of the City under the Canton single-incident theory described above. The Amended Complaint essentially asserts that WPPD officials knew 'to a moral certainty,'. . . that WPPD officers would encounter EDPs in the course of their duties, as evidenced by the fact that the WPPD employee manual includes a section entitled 'Mentally/Emotionally Disturbed Persons.' (AC Ex. A.) The Amended Complaint also alleges that the Public Safety Commissioner for the City of White Plains was familiar with the need for a comprehensive EDP policy from his time at the NYPD. . . But the WPPD manual section on EDPs contains no guidance and no indication that WPPD officers receive any training regarding interacting with EDPs, as the policies contained therein relate solely to procedures once the police have brought an EDP to a hospital. . . Furthermore, given the extreme volatility of such individuals and the need for caution when dealing with them to prevent unnecessary escalation, it is plausible that interactions with EDPs present officers with 'difficult choice[s] of the sort that training ... will make less difficult,'. . . and that a 'highly predicable consequence' of officers making the wrong choices . . . would be 'the deprivation of a citizen's constitutional rights[]'. . . . Discovery will shed light on whether WPPD policymakers were, in fact, deliberately indifferent to the constitutional rights of EDPs, but at this stage Plaintiff has made sufficient allegations for his Monell claim to survive the City's Motion to Dismiss."); LeFever v. Ferguson, Nos. 2:11–cv–935, 2:12–cv–664, 2013 WL 3568053, *8 (S.D. Ohio July 11, 2013), aff'd, 645 F. App'x 438 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Even though this case deals with the consequences of failing to train police officers in Brady obligations instead of prosecutors, that difference does not command a different result here. As the Supreme Court has made clear, the obligation to comply with Brady ultimately falls upon the prosecutor and not on police officers, despite the fact that it is the police who are on the front line of gathering evidence, whether it be inculpatory or exculpatory. In order to comply with Brady, it is the prosecutor who 'has a duty to learn of any favorable evidence known to the others acting on the government's behalf in this case, including the police.' Kyles v. Whitley, 514 U.S. 419, 437, 115 S.Ct. 1555, 131 L.Ed.2d 490 (1995). While the Sixth Circuit has held that police officers have 'an analogous or derivative obligation' under Brady, the obligation upon police officers is to disclose exculpatory evidence to the prosecutor, not necessarily to defense counsel directly. Moldowan v. City of Warren, 578 F.3d 351, 377–81 (6th Cir.2009). The fact that the police officer's Brady obligation is 'analogous' to or 'derivative' of the prosecutor's duty is an important qualifier that brings the Supreme Court's Thompson rationale into play. While the police officer may have a duty to disclose exculpatory evidence to the prosecutor, the Supreme Court has made clear that the buck stops with the prosecutor: it is the prosecutor's duty to learn of any evidence favorable to the accused that is known to police officers. Kyles, 514 U.S. at 437. In light of the prosecutor's proactive duty to track down Brady material, the Court cannot say that a failure to train police officers in Brady would lead to the 'highly probable' consequence [of] a constitutional violation."), aff'd on other grounds, 645 F. App'x 438 (6th Cir. 2016); Anonymous v. City of Meriden, No. 3:10cv37 (MPS), 2013 WL 2254181, *1 (D. Conn. May 22, 2013) ("[T]he nature of the previous misconduct by Barnes during his eight-year tenure as a City police officer—which involved abuse of his position as a police officer during an argument with a neighbor and his sleeping at home while he was on night duty—did not put the City or Chief Cossette on notice that Barnes would sexually abuse a minor such that their failure to prevent this conduct stemmed from 'deliberate indifference' to that possibility. For the same reason, their supervision of Barnes—or any deficiencies in their supervision—cannot be seen as the 'moving force' behind the sexual assaults, the only unconstitutional conduct at issue in this case, and thus does not satisfy the causation standard under § 1983."); De-Occupy Honolulu v. City and County of Honolulu, No. 12–00668 JMS–KSC, 2013 WL 2284942, *10, *11 (D. Hawai'i May 21, 2013) ("The SAC adequately alleges the elements of a failure to train claim. As explained above, the SAC asserts numerous violations of Plaintiffs' constitutional rights, which occurred over eight separate raids on Plaintiffs' Thomas Square encampment. The SAC further asserts that each of the Individual Defendants are [sic] not only supervisors within their department, . . . but directly supervised and participated in these raids. Individual Defendants' direct oversight of the raids, combined with the pattern of alleged constitutional violations at these raids, is sufficient to suggest deliberate indifference as to the City. [citing Connick]"); Kirby v. City of East Wenatchee, No. CV–12–190–JLQ, 2013 WL 1497343, *12-*14 (E.D. Wash. Apr. 10, 2013) ("The required level of notice to demonstrate deliberate indifference is rarely demonstrated by a single incident of constitutionally deficient action or inaction. . . Actual or constructive notice of the need for a particular type of training may be plainly obvious where a pattern of constitutional violations exists such that the municipality knows or should know that corrective measures are needed. Here, as noted by the City, Plaintiff lacks any evidence of other prior incidents of excessive force involving the mentally ill, and cannot establish an ongoing pattern of misconduct. The City therefore contends Plaintiff therefore lacks evidence the City had notice its policies would result in the use of lethal force against suicidal subjects. Instead of relying upon a pattern of similar violations, Plaintiff relies on the 'single incident liability' that the Supreme Court hypothesized about in City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989) and discussed in Connick v. Thompson, 131 S.Ct. 1350 (2011). These cases left open the possibility, that the unconstitutional consequences of failing to train could be so patently obvious that a city could be liable under § 1983 without proof of a pre-existing pattern of violations. As an example, the Supreme Court in Canton referenced the obvious need to train police officers on the constitutional limitations on the use of deadly force, when the city provides the officers with firearms and knows the officers will be required to arrest fleeing felons. . . In Connick, the Court rejected the notion that the failure to provide additional training of prosecutors in their Brady obligations falls within this narrow range of potential liability theorized in Canton, in part because lawyers are trained to be able to obtain the legal knowledge that is required to perform their jobs. The Supreme Court also denied certiorari in a Fifth Circuit case raising a similar challenge to the claim made here. In Valle v. City of Houston, the Plaintiffs alleged the City was liable for failing to adequately train its patrol supervisors in crisis intervention team (CIT) tactics for working with the CIT trained officers. . . Plaintiffs presented sufficient evidence that the chief was aware of the need for training related to mental health (as there had been policy proposals previously considered) and that there were recurring situations involving mental health crises. The Valle plaintiffs claim failed because they did not present sufficient evidence of deliberate indifference showing there was an obvious need for more training. The court held that Plaintiffs could not demonstrate that the shooting of their mentally ill son was a 'highly predictable consequence' of sending the non-CIT officers in response to their call for help. Plaintiff Kirby's evidence to establish his failure-to-train theory is narrow. Plaintiff does not argue that the basic and field training police officers receive in the state of Washington is insufficient as a matter of content; Plaintiff presents no evidence of any past specific proclivities of Defendant Marshall; and it is undisputed that prior to Kirby's shooting Chief of Police John Harrison never analyzed, considered, addressed or contemplated separate training or drafting a policy regarding the mental ill. He testified that he reviewed every report of his officers and none suggested to him his officers were acting inappropriately. Nevertheless, unlike in Valle, the facts of this case involve a complete absence of any policy and the complete absence of any training in dealing with persons in a mental health crisis. Plaintiff has produced data on the relative frequency with which the City's officers encountered mentally ill people. Plaintiff also has produced police practices experts, including T. Michael Nault, who makes the observation that law enforcement's response to people mental illness has become an issue of national concern. Nault opines that due to the foreseeability of encounters with the mentally ill, 'the need for policy and training is profoundly evident' and that the City's failure to have policies and training regarding handling mentally disturbed persons and more training on the use of deadly force, failed to comply with generally accepted police practices and standards of care articulated by the International Association of Chiefs of Police and other publications. Plaintiff's experts' opinions on the appropriate de-escalation and scene evaluation practices in dealing with the mentally ill contradict the training Marshall states in his Declaration that he received and relied upon 'that once someone aimed a firearm at me or another ... this is an act of use of deadly force and I should respond immediately.' Additional evidence of 'obviousness' presented by Plaintiff includes the fact that the adjacent city of Wenatchee had a policy on encounters with the mentally ill, as well as the post-incident fact that the Defendant City eventually did in fact adopt a written policy. The court has reviewed the large body of municipal liability jurisprudence shedding light on the issue of deliberate indifference in the context of tragic encounters between police officers and mentally ill individuals. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the court concludes Plaintiff's claim falls within the narrow range of circumstances in which a City's failure to address encounters with mentally ill either in a written policy or in its training may reasonably be seen by a jury as deliberate indifference to a foreseeable need. . . Ultimately, there are questions of fact as to whether the need for additional training was so patently obvious so as to raise the City's neglect to the level of deliberate indifference; whether the failure to have a policy on such interventions would likely result in officers making choices in violation of constitutional rights; and whether these failures were the 'moving force' behind Kirby's constitutional rights violation."); Peabody v. Perry Tp., Ohio, No. 2:10–cv–1078, 2013 WL 1327026, *10-*12 (S.D. Ohio Mar. 29, 2013) ("As Plaintiffs correctly point out, because the Policy allows intermediate force to be deployed against a fleeing suspect and the Taser is defined exclusively as an intermediate weapon, Officer Bean felt justified, as did his superiors, in using the Taser, without consideration that the force could constitute deadly force. Based on the foregoing, the Court concludes that the evidence presents a sufficient disagreement as to whether the Perry Township's Use of Force Policy was the 'moving force' behind Officer Bean's alleged unconstitutional use of deadly force that submission to a jury is required. . . . Plaintiffs assert that it was Perry Township's failure to train Officer Bean regarding the Taser's potential as a deadly weapon when used against persons on elevated surfaces that was the moving force behind the Officer's alleged violation of Hook's constitutional rights. . . . In the instant action, Plaintiffs do not support their claim with evidence of a pattern of similar alleged constitutional violations. Instead, Plaintiffs rely on the 'single-incident' liability that the Supreme Court hypothesized in City of Canton. That type of liability attaches when the alleged constitutional violation was the 'obvious' consequence of failing to provide specific training, and that this showing of 'obviousness' can substitute for the pattern of violations ordinarily necessary to establish municipal culpability. . . In Connick, the Court explained that it did not foreclose the rare possibility that the unconstitutional consequences of failing to train could be so patently obvious that it would subject the municipality to § 1983 liability. . . . The case sub judice is simply not that rare case where the alleged failure to train was so patently obvious that Perry Township would be liable under § 1983 without proof of a preexisting pattern of violations. Unlike the City of Canton hypothetical, Officer Bean was trained on Taser use and the training material included information on the risks of tasing individuals on elevated surfaces. Plaintiffs' arguments are more accurately described as complaints about the alleged unsatisfactory training of Officer Bean and how that training could have been better. . . However, as the Township correctly asserts, Plaintiffs '"must do more than point to something the [Township] could have done to prevent the unfortunate incident."'. . .Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, and drawing all justifiable inferences in their favor, the Court concludes that they have failed to raise any genuine issue of material fact as to whether Perry Township's alleged failure to train Officer Bean amounted to deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom he would come into contact."); Davis v. City of New York, 959 F.Supp.2d 324, 332, 338 n.51, 342, 349 & n.107, 350 & n.108, 355, 356 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) ("This case, filed in 2010, is one of three cases currently before this Court challenging aspects of the City of New York's 'stop and frisk' practices. . .What distinguishes this case from the other two is its focus on stop and frisk practices at public housing properties owned and operated by the New York City Housing Authority ('NYCHA'). . . .Though the Second Circuit has not explicitly reaffirmed the 'constructive acquiescence' theory of Monell liability articulated in Sorlucco since the Supreme Court decided Connick, the Second Circuit continues to hold that if a practice of misconduct is sufficiently widespread, the municipality may be assumed to have acquiesced in it, even in the absence of direct evidence of such acquiescence. . . Whether or not the phrase 'constructive acquiescence' persists in Second Circuit case law, the theory remains valid under the terms of Connick: 'practices so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law' represent official municipal policy for the purpose of Monell liability. . . .The City and plaintiffs have both moved for summary judgment on plaintiffs' claim that the City's written trespass enforcement policies (as opposed to the City's unwritten practices) violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . In Connick, the Supreme Court stated: 'A pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees is "ordinarily necessary" to demonstrate deliberate indifference for purposes of failure to train.'. . This rule has no bearing on the current discussion, which addresses plaintiffs' policy theory of Monell liability, not its deliberate indifference theory. '[O]nce a municipal policy is established, "it requires only one application ... to satisfy fully Monell' s requirement that a municipal corporation be held liable only for constitutional violations resulting from the municipality's official policy."'. . . The City contends that plaintiffs waived some or all of their 'custom' theory of Monell liability by not including the phrase 'constructive acquiescence' in their Amended Complaint. . . However, plaintiffs clearly pleaded both policy-based and custom-based Monell claims, and the parties have argued these claims throughout the years of litigation. . . The City has cited no basis for concluding that the term 'constructive acquiescence' must be recited in every custom-based claim of Monell liability based on the prevalence of unconstitutional practices. As noted above, if a municipality engages in sufficiently persistent and widespread unconstitutional practices, Monell liability will attach, even in the absence of direct evidence of acquiescence by policymakers. . . . In sum, based on plaintiffs' documentary and testimonial evidence, as well as Dr. Fagan's opinions, a reasonable juror could conclude that the City has engaged in a practice of making unconstitutional stops and arrests in and around NYCHA buildings as part of its trespass enforcement practices, and that this practice is sufficiently persistent and widespread to serve as a basis for Monell liability. Plaintiffs have raised genuine issues of material fact regarding their widespread practice claim. Thus, the City's motion for partial summary judgment on this claim is denied. . . . If a jury were to find either that the City has a policy of making unconstitutional stops and arrests in NYCHA buildings, or that the City has a sufficiently persistent and widespread practice of making such stops and arrests to establish Monell liability, it would be unnecessary to reach the issue of deliberate indifference. At the same time, in turning to this issue, I must draw all reasonable inferences in favor of plaintiffs. As a result, I will assume in the following analysis, as I did earlier, that a reasonable juror could conclude that IO 23 and its associated training materials represent an unconstitutional trespass enforcement policy, and that the widespread practice of making unconstitutional trespass stops and arrests in NYCHA buildings both preceded and followed the introduction of IO 23. The only questions remaining under the deliberate indifference analysis would be (1) whether the City had sufficient notice of the unconstitutionality of its practices, either constructively through the obviousness of the unconstitutionality, or based on actual notice, . . . and (2) whether the City failed '"to make meaningful efforts to address the risk of harm to plaintiffs."'. . .Drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of plaintiffs, both questions raise triable issues of fact."); Campbell v. City of Philadelphia, 927 F.Supp.2d 148, 173, 174 & n.9 (E.D. Pa. 2013) ("[I]n Connick, the Supreme Court recently clarified the 'narrow range of circumstances' in which 'a pattern of similar violations might not be necessary to show deliberate indifference.'. . The Supreme Court explained that the Canton 'single-incident liability' hypothetical assumes a complete lack of training . . . Plaintiff here does not identify a pattern of instances—or, indeed, any other instance—in which the City's failure to train officers for non-routine, non-felony traffic stops led to constitutional violations. . . . Instead, by suggesting that 'where the need for adequate training is so obvious, the lack of training ... constituted a policy of the municipality under Monell',. . . plaintiff appears to argue for single-incident liability. Plaintiff cannot sustain a claim of single-incident liability against the City because he has failed to demonstrate causation. . . Whether a plaintiff alleges failure-to-train liability based on a pattern of similar incidents or a single incident, he must still demonstrate a causal link between the deficiency in training and the constitutional injury. . . . We note that the allegations regarding training here differ in an important respect from the hypothetically-deficient training the Supreme Court discussed in Canton. While the Canton hypothetical posited no training at all for officers regarding the constitutional limits of force, here plaintiff alleges that the training for traffic stops was deficient because although the Philadelphia Police Department did provide training in routine and felony traffic stops, it did not provide training for 'hybrid' stops such as the one plaintiff alleges occurred here. This categorical training, even if its implementation required officers to adapt, differs from the total lack of training Canton contemplated. Nevertheless, we need not reach the question of whether the lack of training identified here could give rise to single-incident liability, because, as we discuss above, plaintiff has failed to demonstrate a causal link between training deficiencies and the injury sufficient to sustain a claim against the City. . . .Plaintiff does not explain how training in non-routine, non-felony stops would have prevented the constitutional injury. . . Plaintiff suggests that the cause of Campbell's injury was Luca's decision to walk in front of the car. Plaintiff relies on Dr. McCauley's assessment that 'the deficient tactics created this very dangerous situation that resulted in the use of deadly force.'. . But as the deposition testimony shows beyond any doubt, the officers were trained to approach the vehicle from behind. . . Plaintiff concedes as much in saying that, by walking in front of the car, Luca 'violated his basic training as to staying out of harm's way even for a routine traffic stop', . . . Luca's decision to walk in front of the car was not based on a gap in training, but instead was a deviation from that training. The thrust of plaintiff's argument with regard to failure-to-train liability appears to be that the officers violated the very training they in fact received. . . .But a police officer's non-compliance with training is an individual fault and does not demonstrate the requisite deliberate indifference needed to sustain a claim of municipal liability for failure to train. . . . Plaintiff's allegations can sustain individual claims, but they cannot here sustain a claim of municipal liability for failure to train."); Ligon v. City of New York, 925 F.Supp.2d 478, 532, 533 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) ("Stated in terms of Connick's general standard for failure-to-train claims, plaintiffs have shown a clear likelihood of proving that city policymakers were on actual notice by 2011, and constructive notice prior to then, that the failure to train NYPD officers regarding the legal standard for trespass stops outside TAP buildings in the Bronx was causing city employees to violate the constitutional rights of a large number of individuals. . . Stated in terms of the three-part Walker test for deliberate indifference through failure to train, plaintiffs have shown a clear likelihood of proving (1) city policymakers knew to a moral certainty that NYPD officers, who regularly patrol in and around TAP buildings in the Bronx, would confront the question of when it was legally permissible to stop people outside those buildings; (2) the decline to prosecute forms, ADA Rucker's letters, and the hundreds of UF–250 forms that failed to articulate reasonable suspicion for trespass stops outside TAP buildings provided an extensive record of NYPD officers mishandling these stops; and (3) when NYPD officers made the wrong choice in these stops, the deprivation of constitutional rights frequently resulted. . . Thus, plaintiffs have shown a clear likelihood of proving that city policymakers should have known that their inadequate training and supervision regarding trespass stops outside TAP buildings in the Bronx was '"so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights,"' that their failure to train constituted deliberate indifference. . . Stated in terms of the constructive acquiescence standard, plaintiffs have shown a clear likelihood of proving that there was 'a sufficiently widespread practice among police officers' of unlawful trespass stops outside TAP buildings 'to support reasonably the conclusion that such abuse was the custom of the officers,' and that 'supervisory personnel must have been aware of it but took no adequate corrective or preventive measures.' In fact, plaintiffs presented some evidence suggesting that the practice of making stops outside TAP buildings without regard for reasonable suspicion might have been 'so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law.'. . In addition to the sheer magnitude of apparently unlawful stops, ADA Rucker offered testimony suggesting that prior to her legal research into the standards governing stops outside TAP buildings, she had been explicitly advising officers that it was permissible to stop a person simply because he had exited a TAP building, so long as the officer had observed the person in the vestibule first. . . Even defendants seemed to recognize that the similarities among the stops described in this case support the conclusion that officers' behaviors were the result of uniform training."); Sonia v. Town of Brookline, 914 F.Supp.2d 36, 45-47 (D. Mass. 2012) ("The Supreme Court has recently stated that failure to train claims present the 'most tenuous' form of claims brought under § 1983 because the municipality's culpability is at its lowest. . . Taken in this light, the plaintiff's claim for relief based upon a failure to train the Officers clearly fails because the allegations lack either a pattern of similar constitutional violations or a 'patently obvious' risk created by the 'always on duty' policy that would transform the Town's inaction into deliberate indifference. First, the plaintiff makes no reference to any incidents beyond the one at issue in this case. There is no suggestion in the pleadings that there has been a rash of incidents of personally involved or intoxicated off-duty cops making unlawful arrests or using excessive force. Even assuming that the Town has no training program to teach its officers as to the circumstances under which they may activate themselves from off-duty to on-duty, the Town cannot be held responsible for the Officers' actions absent a pattern of constitutional violations putting them on notice of the problem. Second, absent a pattern of similar incidents, the plaintiff's claim rests upon a 'single incident' theory of municipal liability. Plaintiff alleges that the Town's failure to train officers regarding the 'always on duty' policy created a risk of constitutional violation so patently obvious that the Town should have known that an incident like the one at issue here would occur. As discussed supra, it is extremely difficult to sustain a failure to train claim based upon a single incident of misconduct and the instant case does not rise to that level. The Supreme Court case that generated the 'single incident' theory envisioned consequences more probable and more dire than even a simple assault. . . .The instant case does not present the risk of such predictable or egregious consequences identified in Canton or confronted in Young. While there is no reason to assume that police academy applicants are familiar with the constitutional constraints on the use of deadly force, Connick, 131 S.Ct. at 1361, the failure to train Brookline cadets concerning the meaning of 'personally involved' does not predict constitutional violations because cadets possess the tools to determine when they are off-duty and when they are engaged in a dispute. Nor does it predict that cadets who are personally involved in a dispute will then assault those individuals who the conflicted police officer wrongfully arrested. Unlike the policy at issue in Young, the Town's 'always on duty' policy permits intervention by off-duty police but does not mandate it, and, far from requiring officers to carry their firearms, states that officers will never be disciplined for declining to intervene in a situation because they are not armed. While the plaintiff argues that the Town's policy is problematic because it allows activation under certain circumstances or does not expressly prohibit any activation when an off-duty officer has been drinking, 'the fact that training is imperfect or not in the precise form a plaintiff would prefer is insufficient' to establish deliberate indifference. . . Accordingly, plaintiff's allegations fail to establish that the Town's inaction amounted to deliberate indifference toward the rights of its citizens and cannot render it liable for the Officers' actions."); Patterson v. City of Akron, No. 5:08CV1300, 2012 WL 3913082, *6, *7 (N.D. Ohio Sept. 7, 2012) ("[I]f, for the sake of argument, this Court were to conclude both that there was a constitutional violation and that Lt. Schnee's investigation of that violation was inadequate, that would still not preclude summary judgment for the City. As noted by the very case plaintiff relies upon to prove municipal liability under an 'inaction' or ratification theory, plaintiff would also have to 'show not only that the investigation was inadequate, but that the flaws in this particular investigation were representative of (1) a clear and persistent pattern of illegal activity, (2) which the Department knew or should have known about, (3) yet remained deliberately indifferent about, and (4) that the Department's custom was the cause of the [constitutional violation] here.'. . As noted by the court in Thomas, there is danger in 'attempting to infer a municipal-wide policy based solely on one instance of potential misconduct.'. . . Here, plaintiff has presented no evidence of the City failing to act or inadequately investigating the use of force or the use of tasers by other officers. Without any citation to record evidence, plaintiff merely asserts in his opposition brief that '[t]his is not the first time that Akron's Police Department failed to adequately investigate its police officers' arguably excessive use of force on citizens whot [sic] had not committed a serious offense, were unarmed and posed no threat of physical harm to the officers or anyone else.'. . The Court concludes that the City is entitled to summary judgment on Count One of the complaint given the absence of this critical evidence."); Ostling v. City of Bainbridge Island, 872 F.Supp.2d 1117, 1131 (W.D. Wash. 2012) ("Plaintiffs have presented evidence that fewer than all officers receive training in dealing with mentally-ill persons, despite the likelihood of regularly confronting them. . . Further, they have argued that proper training, as presented in the Bainbridge Island Police Department's manual, would have led an officer to de-escalate the situation, which may have avoided Douglas's death. . . Plaintiffs also present testimony by D.P. Van Blaricom, a retired Bellevue police captain, suggesting that proper training would have led the officers to avoid physical contact with Douglas and request a mental health professional attend to the situation. . . While the Court considers Plaintiffs' claim indeed tenuous, they have presented evidence as to each element of a failure-to-train claim, and the Court cannot therefore decide the claim on summary judgment."); Ruiz v. County of Suffolk, No. 03–CV–3545(DLI)(ETB), 2012 WL 1118605, at *6-*9 (E.D.N.Y. Apr. 3, 2012) ("Several sister circuits have analyzed claims like that raised in Bryan County, in which the plaintiff asserted that a particular hiring decision was inadequate. In each of those cases, summary judgment was resolved in the municipality's favor. . . . Unsavory information in an applicant's past, such as prior arrests, even a prior arrest for a violent felony, and the municipality's failure to uncover that background information, is insufficient to establish an inadequate hiring claim against a municipality. . . . It is clear that these decisions indicate reluctance to hold municipalities liable for challenges to particular hiring decisions. The only circuit to address challenges to hiring procedures in general, dismissed the claim for failing to meet the strict standards for municipal liability articulated in Bryan County.[discussing Young v. City of Providence, 404 F.3d 4 (1st Cir.2005)] The First Circuit concluded that the municipality was not liable for the deficient hiring of a police officer who engaged in excessive force. . . . [P]laintiff seeks to hold Suffolk County liable for deficient hiring procedures, generally, as opposed to the deficient hiring of Lorenz and Urban as individual incidents. In doing so, plaintiff attempts to take his claim outside the Bryan County, single-incident analysis. In support of his claim, plaintiff has submitted reports from the preemployment psychological examinations given to Lorenz and Urban, which indicate that the psychologist had a number of concerns regarding their ability to handle the stresses of working in a prison. Plaintiff submitted the records associated with their appeals to the appeals committee and the cursory notes taken during the appeal interview by the only psychologist present, Dr. Gallagher. Dr. Gallagher's notes and testimony indicate that he informed the applicants of the areas of concern regarding their psychological suitability, asked them for explanations, and discussed incidents in their backgrounds, such as motor vehicle accidents and violations, prior acts of violence, and financial strains. Although the Court is troubled by the lack of standardized procedures for the appeals committee and the brief and unstructured nature of the interviews of the candidates appealing psychological reports, the Court is unable to distinguish the facts of plaintiff's claim from those in Young. If anything, the challenge to the hiring procedures that was asserted in Young was supported by stronger evidence of a pattern of deficient hiring practices than that submitted by plaintiff in this case. The plaintiff in Young was closer to establishing the causal link between systematic inadequate hiring procedures and the constitutional harm suffered by the plaintiff than the claim in this case, and yet that claim did not survive summary judgment. The Court is not bound by Young, but Young suggests that even when greater evidence of causality is provided, plaintiffs cannot sustain a challenge to general hiring procedures absent '[a] pattern of previous bad hiring decisions leading to constitutional violations.'. . .[E]ven if plaintiff's claim is analyzed under the single-incident analysis of Bryan County, this Court must grant summary judgment in favor of Suffolk County, as plaintiff has failed to 'satisfy *Bryan County'*s requirement of a "strong" causal connection between [the correction officer's] background and the specific constitutional violation alleged.'. . Plaintiff is unable to establish Monell liability, whether under the analysis for single-incident claims or general hiring procedure claims. The Court has not reached this conclusion lightly, but as the case law in this circuit and other circuits indicates, plaintiffs asserting such claims must overcome a very high evidentiary burden to survive summary judgment. The evidence in this case did not meet the Supreme Court's heightened standard. Accordingly, Suffolk County's summary judgment motion is granted."); Gaymon v. Esposito, No. 11–4170 (JLL), 2012 WL 1068750, at *9 (D.N.J. Mar. 29, 2012) ("Connick . . . strongly supports the need for police training in the constitutional limits of the use of deadly force. However, even assuming that the need for such training in this case was as obvious as under the facts alluded to in Connick and as stated in Canton, there are no facts in Plaintiffs' Complaint that allege anything whatsoever about the nature and extent of training on the part of ECSO regarding the constitutional limits of the use of deadly force with its police officers. Plaintiffs make no factual allegations in their Complaint regarding training, or more specifically, facts regarding the existence or lack thereof of a training program for Essex County police officers, the nature of the deficiencies of said program, for example in light of comparators such as training given by other municipalities or counties in handling weapons in public spaces or recognized standards for training police officers in such areas. Given that a municipality's culpability for a deprivation of rights 'is at its most tenuous where a claim turns on a failure to train,' this Court finds that, given the limited factual support for Plaintiffs' failure to train claim, it cannot survive a motion for judgment on the pleadings."); Sallie v. Lynk, No. 2:10cv456, 2012 WL 995245, at *10, *11 (W.D. Pa. Mar. 23, 2012) ("Plaintiffs' effort to shoehorn their claim into the 'single-incident' exception to Monell's notice and deliberate indifference requirements equally is misplaced. . . . In light of the initial and ongoing Act 120, firearms, and taser training that Borough officers undergo, the record is woefully deficient of evidence showing that First and Fourth Amendment violations like those in question are an 'obvious consequence' of the Borough's decision not to provide additional and more nuanced training, supervision or on-the-job review. That an officer with such training might be called upon to arrest an individual for public intoxication in front of a crowd of onlookers while another individual was being critical of the decision to do so does not present a scenario involving a 'highly predictable' danger of violating citizens' constitutional rights. Thus, in the absence of a pattern of violations in such a setting the Borough was and remains entitled to rely on the training regime in place. . . . That the Borough's officers might confront situations where they must arrest individuals in public while maintaining officer safety and handling vocal criticism of their behavior could certainly be recognized as a scenario where grey areas involving First and Fourth Amendment rights might arise. But arguing that more nuanced or better training and supervision might have produced a different outcome is not sufficient. To maintain a 'single-incident' basis for Monell liability, plaintiffs must point to a scenario or situation where it was patently obvious that the lack of pre-hiring investigation, training or supervision (or the lack of more nuanced or better investigation, training or supervision) would result in the constitutional violation of citizens' rights in the manner alleged by plaintiffs. In other words, it must be shown that it was so predictable that failing to provide such investigation, training or supervision would result in a violation of constitutional rights, that doing so amounted to a conscious disregard for plaintiffs' First and/or Fourth Amendment rights. See Connick, 131 S.Ct. at 1365. Their evidence in opposition to the Borough's motion simply fails to rise to this level. Consequently, they cannot proceed under the narrow range of 'single-incident' liability that the Court left open in Canton."); Zenquis v. City of Philadelphia, 861 F.Supp.2d 522, 533 & n.9 (E.D. Pa. 2012) ("Although a pattern of prior constitutional violations by untrained employees is ordinarily necessary to show that a municipality was deliberately indifferent to the need for training, such a pattern is not always necessary. . . Indeed, Zenquis argues that the City's putative failure to train police officers about the danger of encouraging untrained private citizens to use force to apprehend a suspect was so obviously likely to lead to a constitutional violation that a single incident of harm would suffice to establish a basis for municipal liability. . . . It is unnecessary to determine at this time whether 'single-incident liability' for a failure to train may or should apply in this case. The amended complaint alleges sufficient facts to justify further discovery as to the police conduct in this and other cases and the awareness and/or tolerance of that conduct by City policymakers. Many of the 'single-incident' cases relied upon by the City to justify dismissal of the complaint were decided upon a far more developed factual record."); Bertuglia v. City of New York, 839 F.Supp.2d 703, 737-39 (S.D.N.Y. 2012) ("The plaintiffs have alleged two bases for their Monell claim: first, the City's failure to train prosecutors to avoid various forms of misconduct, including threatening witnesses, Brady violations, and introducing inadmissible 'bad act evidence' and other improper conduct before grand juries; and second, the City's policy of lax discipline with regard to prosecutors who did commit such acts of misconduct. . . Both are viable theories of a policy or custom that can satisfy the first requirement for a Monell claim. . . The plaintiffs cite at least 15 reported cases, as well as Justice Zweibel's decision in this case, that they claim evidence a pattern of constitutional violations by prosecutors for the City of which the violations the plaintiffs suffered were allegedly a part. . . They allege that many more such decisions indicating an even broader pattern of constitutional violations are evidenced by unreported decisions that the City alone possesses. . . They allege that, as a matter of policy, the city never disciplines prosecutors for the types of misconduct alleged. . .The City in its opening brief did not address the plaintiffs' 'lax discipline' argument, focusing exclusively on the 'failure to train' argument. While the City did address the plaintiffs' lax discipline argument in its reply papers, arguments raised for the first time in reply should not be considered, because the plaintiffs had no opportunity to respond to those new arguments. . .The City argues that the plaintiffs have not pleaded sufficient facts to state a failure to train claim under the Supreme Court's decision in Connick v. Thompson, 131 S.Ct. 1350 (2011). However, the Court in Connick plainly acknowledged that, '[i]n limited circumstances, a local government's decision not to train certain employees about their legal duty to avoid violating citizens' rights may rise to the level of an official government policy for purposes of § 1983.'. . The Connick Court did note that failure to train claims are a particularly 'tenuous' species of municipal liability action, and held that they require that the 'municipality's failure to train its employees in a relevant respect must amount to deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the [untrained employees] come into contact.'. . The procedural context of Connick is very different from the procedural context of the present motion. In Connick, the plaintiff had obtained a substantial jury verdict against a prosecutor's office based on a failure to train prosecutors on their obligations to comply with Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963). The trial court refused to set aside the jury verdict and the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit affirmed. The Supreme Court found that the evidence was insufficient to support the jury's verdict, and the trial judge erred in not granting judgment as a matter of law to the defendant. . . The Court found that a history of four prior Brady violations did not constitute a pattern and that the case did not fall within the narrow range of a possible 'single incident liability.'. . This case, by contrast, is at the pleadings stage. To plead a Monell claim based on a failure to train, a plaintiff must plead (1) that 'a [municipality] knows "to a moral certainty" that her employees will confront a given situation,' (2) 'that the situation either presents the employee with a difficult choice of the sort that training or supervision will make less difficult or that there is a history of employees mishandling the situation,' and (3) 'that the wrong choice by the city employee will frequently cause the deprivation of a citizen's constitutional rights.' Walker, 974 F.2d at 297–98. As the Supreme Court explained in Connick, a 'pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees is "ordinarily necessary" to demonstrate deliberate indifference for purposes of a failure to train.'. . The plaintiffs have pleaded that the City has a longstanding, de facto policy of never disciplining prosecutors who commit specified types of prosecutorial misconduct and not otherwise training them to avoid misconduct. The City and the District Attorney's office plainly know, to a moral certainty, that assistant district attorneys will find themselves questioning witnesses before grand juries, interviewing witnesses beforehand, and being in possession of Brady material, because these are basic facets of an ADA's job. . . The Amended Complaint points to over fifteen cases where City prosecutors allegedly committed misconduct, and alleges the existence of many more such cases in the form of unpublished opinions like Justice Zweibel's. The plaintiffs rely in addition upon Justice Zweibel's forty page opinion that, they argue, documents the misconduct that took place in this case. The City has distinguished many, but not all, of the cases cited by the plaintiffs as evidence of a pattern or practice that has resulted in constitutional violations, but the City does not address the allegation that a far larger number of unreported decisions evidencing this pattern are in its possession. These allegations may be difficult to prove. But at this stage, the issue is only whether the factual content alleged by the plaintiffs, accepted as true, 'allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.'. . Here, the Complaint alleges sufficient facts to allow the Court to draw the inference that there is a history of mishandling grand jury presentations. With regard to the third prong, there is no dispute at this stage that, where an assistant district attorney commits misconduct before a grand jury that results in an indictment based on insufficient evidence, or violates their obligations under Brady, those actions will frequently result in the violation of citizens' constitutional rights. Accordingly, the City's motion to dismiss the Monell claim is denied."); Tandel v. County of Sacramento, Nos. 2:11–cv–00353–MCE–GGH, 2:09–cv–00842–MCE–GGH, 2012 WL 602981, at *19 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 23, 2012) ("Although Plaintiff's allegations concerning the County's policy of failure to provide proper psychiatric treatment for suicidal inmates who require catheters is based on a single incident, the Court believes that the Plaintiff has made the requisite showing of 'obviousness' of the constitutional violation, such that it can be substituted for the pattern of violations ordinarily required to establish municipal liability. . . Further, Plaintiff's allegation that the Jail 'has a history of failing to respond to the urgent medical needs of its inmates'. . . is supported not only by Plaintiff's own experience during two separate instances of detention, which were three years apart, but also by Plaintiff's reference to a different case pending in this court, Hewitt v. County of Sacramento, No. 2:07–cv–01037. Plaintiff alleges that Hewitt demonstrates that the County has a custom and policy of failing to provide necessary medical care to inmates. Thus, Plaintiff has plausibly demonstrated the 'practices of sufficient duration, frequency and consistency' to state a viable Monell claim against the County. . .In sum, the Court concludes that, at this point in the litigation, without substantial discovery, and where the Court must draw all inferences in favor of Plaintiff, the FAC contains sufficient allegations for the Court to infer that the County plausibly has a policy or custom of delaying medical assistance to inmates and failure to properly observe and treat inmates. Accordingly, the Court declines Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's second claim for relief."); Schwartz v. Lassen County ex rel. Lassen County Jail, 838 F.Supp.2d 1045, 1058 (E.D. Cal. 2012) ("In this case, the Court finds that, based on the allegations in the complaint, it is plausible that the failure to train was so obviously deficient that it could lead to liability resulting from the single constitutional deprivation at issue here. . . .In other words, the court can reasonably infer that, based on the particular circumstances as alleged, the facility's employees so obviously lacked training in providing proper medical care that it resulted in Decedent's death and, consequently, Plaintiff's loss of her son's companionship. Specifically, as alleged, Decedent visibly lost forty pounds; directly requested, and was refused, medical care; and previously had medical complications while detained at the Facility. These allegations are compounded by Plaintiff's assertion that Decedent's physician sent a letter explaining that, because of Decedent's severe medical condition, he should not be detained at the Facility, but rather should be placed in the care of his mother. Thus, at this stage of the litigation, absent more fully-developed facts, the Court declines to dismiss Plaintiff's § 1983 claims on the basis that Plaintiff has only alleged a single incident of failure to provide medical care."); Cardall v. Thompson, No. 2:10–cv–305 CW, 2012 WL 90417, at *8, *9 (D. Utah Jan. 11, 2012) ("Anna has argued that Hurricane City failed to adequately train its officers on excessive force, taser use, and mental health issues. She cannot point to a single constitutional violation, other than those alleged in this case, which may have arisen from Hurricane City's training deficiencies. At the same time, however, those deficiencies were arguably obvious. The evidence suggests that Hurricane City provided absolutely no training to its law enforcement on mental health issues. This is particularly troubling in light of the Tenth Circuit's recognition that mental health is an important factor to evaluate when determining the appropriate use of force. Anna also argues that Hurricane City's established policy on taser use was unconstitutional both because it left too much discretion to officers and also because it authorized unconstitutional tasings. Case law from this court states that a policy 'in which officers were trained to use only their own subjective judgment when firing a taser' would be unconstitutional. Cavanaugh v. Woods Cross City, 1:08–cv–32, 2009 WL 4981591 at *5 (D.Utah Dec. 14, 2009). Although deposition testimony by Hurricane City officers mentions that officers were instructed to rely on their 'discretion' in determining when to deploy their tasers, it is clear that the exercise of this discretion was dependent on the situation and the subject's actions. . . Such a policy, which recognizes that a broad array of factors affect what level of force is appropriate in a given situation, is not unconstitutional. There is evidence, however, to support Plaintiffs' argument that the policy was unconstitutional because it authorized unconstitutional use of force. Deposition testimony states that Hurricane City policy allowed the use of a taser when an individual was simply not responding to an officer's verbal commands. . . If this assertion is true, the policy may have been deliberately indifferent to the Graham standard. Furthermore, Defendants have stated that the tasing of Brian was fully in compliance with city policy. . . If the facts are taken in favor of Anna, this means that the policy authorized the almost immediate and repeated tasing of a nonthreatening and confused individual, which would be plainly unconstitutional. Furthermore, even in the absence of an unconstitutional written or established policy, a municipality may be held liable for actions of a policy maker. . . .Excell, as Chief of Police, was responsible for Hurricane's police policies. Therefore, to the extent that he authorized the tasings by Thompson, the city may be held liable for his decision. Hurricane City must remain a party to the case. Viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to Anna, the city's policy on tasing and trainings on mental health and tasers may have been constitutionally inadequate. Furthermore, if Excell, the final policymaker for the Hurricane police, allowed or encouraged the use of excessive force, the city can be held responsible for that action."); Wereb v. Maui County, 830 F. Supp.2d 1026, 1029, 1030, 1033-37 (D. Hawai'i 2011) ("[T]his Order is restricted solely to the question of whether an intervening change in law requires the court to reconsider its July 28, 2010 Order as to potential County liability. . . . Although the court did not specifically state it as such, the court was applying the single-incident theory recognized in Canton as a method of proving 'deliberate indifference' in a municipality's failure to train employees. . . .Much of the County's Motion argues that, after Connick, municipal liability for deliberate indifference based on a failure-to-train for serious medical needs requires a prior 'pattern or practice' of violations. But nothing in Connick itself suggests that the single-incident theory cannot apply outside the deadly-force circumstances noted in Canton. Instead, the County relies on language in Craig v. Floyd County, 643 F.3d 1306 (11th Cir.2011), that simply states ' "[p]roof of a single incident of unconstitutional activity is not sufficient to impose liability" against a municipality.'. . Craig, however, is easily distinguishable − it is not a failure-to-train case. That is, although Craig cites Connick for the established proposition that '[a] pattern of similar constitutional violations ... is "ordinarily necessary,"' it nowhere purports to read Connick as narrowing a single-incident, failure-to-train theory. In fact, courts continue to recognize a training deficiency as a possible basis for finding deliberate indifference in a medical-needs context after Connick. [citing cases] In response to the court's request for Plaintiffs to articulate their specific failure-to-train theory (or theories), Plaintiffs set forth two: (1) 'Maui County failed to train its employees on how to monitor detainees to determine if they needed medical care' (the 'Monitoring Theory"), and (2) Maui County 'failed to train its employees on the risks, signs, and symptoms of alcohol withdrawal' (the

'Alcohol Withdrawal Theory"). . .The court discusses each theory in turn, mindful that '[w]hether a local government has displayed a policy of deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of its citizens is generally a jury question.'. . That is, where the evidentiary record contains genuine disputes of material fact, a jury is to decide whether a local government acted with deliberate indifference. . . . The court concludes that Plaintiffs' Monitoring Theory remains viable, even after Connick, and is supported by sufficient evidence in the record to create a genuine issue of material fact for trial. . . Under this theory, County PSAs had no knowledge or familiarity with their relevant constitutional duties. They had no basic medical training, and no prior background in law enforcement or in prisons. . . Unlike Connick, this theory does not challenge subtleties in the County's training program and thus does not implicate Connick's concerns about 'micromanaging local governments.'. . Under Plaintiffs' Monitoring Theory, the County gave its PSAs no training on how to monitor detainees, . . . and no training on how to monitor for deprivation of 'serious medical needs.'. . Plaintiffs challenge the 'substance' of the training, not the 'format.'. . As argued by Plaintiffs, the result of this failure to train led to a practice − arguably contrary to the County's written policy . . . of not conducting any in-person physical checks of detainees, and relying on a video monitoring system that was inadequate to detect signs and symptoms of medical distress. . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the result of lack of training here was PSAs with 'the utter lack of an ability to cope with constitutional situations.' Connick, 131 S.Ct. at 1363. . . . Plaintiffs' Alcohol Withdrawal Theory, however, runs afoul of Connick. Simply put, it is too specialized and narrow − it could not have been 'patently obvious' that unconstitutional consequences would be a highly predicable result of a failure to train specifically on alcohol withdrawal. The Alcohol Withdrawal Theory is not of the same character as exemplified in Canton's hypothetical, and as reemphasized and distinguished in Connick. That apparently no prisoner at the Lahaina Police Station has suffered injury from alcohol withdrawal from 1993 until Wereb's death (assuming he died of withdrawal) suggests an unconstitutional result was not obvious. . .Post-Connick caselaw supports this conclusion. [citing cases] Allowing Plaintiffs' Alcohol Withdrawal Theory (as a stand alone theory of single-incident deliberate indifference) to be presented to a jury would raise the potential of requiring municipalities to train and screen for virtually any medical situation that might arise − diabetes, drug withdrawal, alcohol withdrawal, pneumonia, schizophrenia, hypertension, positional asphyxia, excited delirium syndrome, agorophobia (the list might not end) − and face potential liability for any gap in training on medical conditions with no prior notice of a constitutional problem. . . . [P]recluding this narrow Alcohol Withdrawal theory comports with the same policy concerns expressed in Connick when the Supreme Court explained that attacking particular 'nuances' in training 'simply cannot support an inference of deliberate indifference.'. . .Accordingly, the court will allow Plaintiffs' Monitoring Theory to continue, but not Plaintiffs' Alcohol Withdrawal Theory."); Barrios-Barrios v. Clipps, 825 F.Supp.2d 730, 752 (E.D. La. 2011)("To the extent that plaintiffs have produced particular evidence concerning Clipps's pre-recruitment arrests and traffic citations, his statements during the background check, his Field Officer Training record and his post-academy reprimand, nothing in this evidence creates any inference that Clipps had a propensity for or probability of committing constitutionally unlawful home invasion, unlawful detention, sexual assault or excessive force. . . .Plaintiffs simply 'did not produce evidence to meet the high hurdle of showing that [home invasion, detention, sexual assault or] excessive force was an obvious consequence of' the allegedly inadequate hiring, training or supervisory practices. . .Nor is there any evidence that the City Defendants actually drew such an inference, even if one might have been drawn."); Pauls v. Green, 816 F.Supp.2d 961, 972, 973 (D. Idaho 2011) ("[A]ny failure to train jailers to refrain from sexually assaulting inmates does not fall within the narrow range of Canton's hypothesized single-incident liability. The obvious need for specific training that was present in the Canton hypothesis is absent here: as discussed, jailers do not need specific, structured training to know they should refrain from sexually assaulting inmates. . . . [T]here was no pattern of incidents at Adams County Jail that would provide actual or constructive notice that allowing a non-POST-certified employee to operate the jail alone would obviously result in the sexual assault of an inmate."); Dillingham v. Millsaps, 809 F.Supp.2d 820, 848-50 (E.D. Tenn. 2011) ("In this case, there is no evidence of 'repeated complaints' about the use of tasers (or force more generally) by law enforcement officers in the Monroe County Sheriff's Department. Consequently, Dillingham must proceed under a 'single incident' theory. The Supreme Court recently affirmed that 'deliberative indifference' is 'a stringent standard of fault, requiring proof that a municipal actor disregarded a known or obvious consequence of his action.' Connick v. Thompson , 131 S.Ct. 1350, 1360 (2011) (citation and alteration omitted). Like his claim against Sheriff Bivens in his individual capacity, . . . Dillingham relies entirely upon one fact: that Deputy Millsaps did not receive a copy of the Policy Manual. This, however, is not a significant fact. In reviewing Dillingham's 'failure to train' claim, the focus should be on whether Deputy Millsaps . . . received adequate training on how to use a taser. . . . As the Supreme Court has instructed, the focus should be on the training program 'in relation to the tasks the particular officers must perform.'. . In other words, did Deputy Millsaps receive adequate training on how to use tasers, and the use of force more generally? Having reviewed the record, there is absolutely nothing that suggests otherwise. . . . In addition, it is significant that there is no evidence of past complaints against Deputy Millsaps, or other deputy sheriffs. The record does not contain any past allegations, complaints, or suits regarding force or misconduct by Monroe County deputy sheriffs prior to May 11, 2007 (the date of the car accident). While a history of past conduct is not necessary to establish municipal liability, courts are more inclined to find a 'custom' when there has been a history of complaints or similar behavior."); Tobey v. Napolitano, 808 F.Supp.2d 830, 843 (E.D. Va. 2011) ("Plaintiff has not identified any case in which Canton's single-incident theory has been actively applied to support a claim of municipal liability. Plaintiff's First Amendment claim is likewise beyond the narrow set of circumstances contemplated by the Canton Court. Plaintiff has not alleged any facts suggesting that protests in the form of passengers removing their clothes in the screening area would be recurring, or that the failure to train officers in some unidentified respect would likely lead to First Amendment violations. Nor can Plaintiff establish such likelihood based solely on his own experience or subsequent screening-area protests."); Ickes v. Borough of Bedford, 807 F.Supp.2d 306, 327, 328 (W.D. Pa. 2011) ("In order to hold Bedford liable for the constitutional violation allegedly committed by Kinsinger, Ickes must show that Bedford was deliberately indifferent to the risk that a violation of the particular constitutional right at issue would result from its training regimen. . . It is not enough for him to demonstrate that Sigler's instructions exhibited a 'deliberate indifference' as to whether Bedford's own internal requirements would be followed. . . Finally, it is undisputed that Kinsinger attempted to apprehend Ickes with his hands before using the taser. . . . Even if it is assumed that Sigler's instructions were erroneous (and that they were likely to cause Bedford's officers to use their tasers prematurely), Kinsinger did not follow those instructions when he arrested Ickes. Instead of tasering Ickes before engaging him with his hands, Kinsinger attempted to make the arrest with his hands (and sustained a minor injury to his right hand) before deploying the taser. . . Under these circumstances, there is no conceivable way that Ickes can establish that Sigler's statements pertaining to the use-of-force continuum 'actually caused' Kinsinger to violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . Ickes' attempt to categorically require arresting officers to make contact with their hands before deploying tasers against resisting suspects has no basis in constitutional law. The Fourth Amendment's standard of objective reasonableness cannot be reduced to a series of inflexible rules."); Btesh v. City of Maitland, Fla., No. 6:10-cv-71-Orl-19DAB, 2011 WL 3269647, at *32, *34 (M.D. Fla. July 29, 2011) ("The need for training of police officers carrying firearms in the use of deadly force has been found to be obvious, while a need for training to recognize mental illness requiring hospitalization or to dispense medication as prescribed is not sufficiently obvious to warrant municipal liability absent a prior history of factually similar violations of constitutional rights. . . . If the risks of failing to train law enforcement officials 'to recognize the need to remove a mentally ill inmate to a hospital or to dispense medication as prescribed' are not sufficiently obvious in the abstract, . . . it follows that the risk of failing to train police officers to flag the addresses of mentally ill persons is also insufficiently obvious in the abstract to impose municipal liability under Section 1983 absent a prior history of injuries resulting from a failure to flag residences. [citing Connick]"); George v. Sonoma County Sheriff's Dept., No. C-08-2675 EDL, 2011 WL 2975850, at *7-*9 (N.D. Cal. July 22, 2011) ("Here, there is no evidence of a prior history of violations of the kind alleged by Plaintiffs, so Plaintiffs must rely on the single incident theory. Defendant argues that the same reasoning applied in Connick should apply to the medical professionals in this case and in light of the extensive professional training of the doctors and nurses, Defendant cannot be liable for a failure to train. Plaintiffs argue that the fact that treatment and discharge of inmates was a common occurrence and involved unique issues demonstrates that the need to train was obvious within the meaning of Canton and the lack of training or policies constituted deliberate indifference. . . .Medical care of inmates who are discharged to a jail environment is quite different from that of the unincarcerated who can seek medical care on their own or get help from family and friends, and Defendant does not contend that such training is a standard part of the curriculum at medical school, in contrast to the teaching of the Brady obligation at law school. . . .Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, a reasonable jury could conclude that the single incident of a constitutional violation here was a 'highly predictable' consequence of the failure to train because Defendant treats all inmates from the prison and there were no policies or training on how to handle their discharge. Defendant argues that one incident out of 1,500 instances of treating inmates at Sutter [Hospital] over a thirty-year period does not constitute a highly predictable consequence. However, hindsight is not the proper measure for predictability. As other courts have held, Connick did not foreclose liability based on a single incident as set forth in Canton. [citing Ramirez v. Ferguson, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 34625, at * 72-73 (W.D.Ark., Mar. 29, 2011) (finding that Sheriff and Captain supervisors of correctional officers were liable for a "woeful" failure to train on the handling of inmates with mental health needs) and Meogrossi v. Aubrey, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 35254, at *36 (W.D.Ky, Mar. 31, 2011) (obvious and predictable need for even Sheriff's deputies to know how to properly conduct a warrantless search or seizure of evidence.)]"); Barker v. City of Boston, 795 F.Supp.2d 117, 123 (D. Mass. 2011) ("Based on the events that transpired in this case, the Plaintiff must show that Boston was deliberately indifferent to a known risk that its officers would use excessive force against a mentally ill individual. The facts in the Amended Complaint themselves refute any such showing. Each year, the Boston police respond to seven thousand calls involving mentally ill individuals. . . Yet, from 1992 to the present, the Plaintiff identifies only two incidents in which Boston police officers killed a mentally ill individual. . . Thus, over the course of nineteen years, or approximately 133,000 calls involving a mentally ill person, only two were killed by police officers. Moreover, the Plaintiff does not allege that the use of force in either of those two prior incidents was excessive. Such evidence cannot support the conclusion that Boston was deliberately indifferent to an obvious risk that its officers would use excessive force against mentally ill individuals."); Stefan v. Olson, No. 1:10 CV 671, 2011 WL 2621251, at *14-*16 (N.D. Ohio July 5, 2011) ("Plaintiff has presented ample evidence of customs at the Richland County Jail which served to deprive Michael Reid of his constitutional rights on the night of April 2, 2009 and the morning of April 3, 2009, the most significant example being the jail's custom of not following the written alcohol withdrawal protocol established by Dr. Williams. Had the jail followed this protocol, Reid likely would have received adequate medical treatment, thus averting the seizure that ultimately led to his death. Plaintiff, however, has provided no evidence of 'a clear and persistent pattern of mishandled medical emergencies for pre-arraignment detainees' by the Richland County Jail. . . After months of discovery, there is no evidence that anything like what happened to Reid has happened to any other inmate at the jail. As such, Plaintiff is unable to satisfy the first part of the test laid out in Garretson, supra, and thus cannot prove that Richland County is liable for the Richland County Jail's unconstitutional custom of inaction. Therefore, Richland County's Motion as it pertains to the deprivation of Michael Reid's rights through a municipal custom of inaction is hereby GRANTED. . . . Plaintiff has presented enough evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Richland County is liable for the death of Michael Reid as the result of failing to adequately train the employees of the Richland County Jail on how to deal with inmates going through alcohol withdrawal. . . . Although corrections officers were required to monitor inmates like Reid for alcohol withdrawal (especially during the night shift when no medical personnel were scheduled), the jail spent no money on training its corrections officers on how to deal with 1) intoxicated inmates, 2) alcohol withdrawal, 3) recognizing the signs and the symptoms of alcohol withdrawal or 4) assessing inmates at risk for seizures. . . . Plaintiff has also presented evidence from which a reasonable juror could conclude that the training of Richland County Jail's medical staff 'was inadequate for the tasks [they] were required to perform,' i.e., administering Dr. Williams' alcohol withdrawal protocol. . . . Sheriff Sheldon and Major Paxton each recognized that alcohol withdrawal was a serious problem the jail faced but did nothing to train jail staff on how to handle that problem. . . Since the decisions of these two men represent official Richland County policy, deliberate indifference on their part is equivalent to deliberate indifference on the part of the county."); Carter v. City of Carlsbad, 799 F.Supp.2d 1147, 1160, 1161 (S.D. Cal. 2011) ("Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Carter, a material factual dispute exists as to whether the City customarily issued tasers to untrained officers. The City's official policy states that no officer may be issued a taser unless he has been trained to use it properly. . . . However, the City has failed to provide evidence that any but a small minority of its officers were actually trained to use the X26 taser: though it is standard issue equipment, the City's records list only fifteen of its 115 officers as being trained and certified to use the X26 taser. . . . The alleged practice in this case mirrors the paradigmatic example provided by the Supreme Court in Canton of a practice so obviously likely to result in constitutional deprivations that the municipality's policymakers must have been aware of, and deliberately indifferent to, that risk . . . . The City provides tasers to its officers for the very purpose of inflicting force upon criminal suspects when necessary to effect an arrest. To issue weapons without educating officers of the constitutional limitations on the use of force creates an obvious risk that the City's officers will violate people's constitutional rights, and therefore satisfies the deliberate indifference standard. . . . For Carter to show the City's alleged practice of issuing tasers to untrained officers caused his injury, he must establish that the officer who tased him was untrained. Carter's claim fails on this third prong."); Doe v. Miami-Dade County, 797 F.Supp.2d 1296, 1310, 1311 (S.D. Fla. 2011) ("Conspicuously absent from the summary judgment record is evidence of a single instance in which the County hired a police officer applicant who was known to exhibit dangerous sexual aggression issues, or a single instance in which the County tolerated or approved of such misconduct by police officers. The plaintiff attempts to impute knowledge on the County by drawing attention to the 51 instances of sexual misconduct reported over four years. But three principal considerations cause this Court to conclude that the 51 sexual misconduct accusations are insufficient to establish deliberate indifference. For one, the undisputed factual record shows that allegations of police misconduct, including sexual misconduct, automatically triggers a formal investigation by the Professional Compliance Bureau. . . . For two, although the County concedes that at least some of the sexual misconduct complaints were sustained, it is undisputed that many or most of the claims were, after investigation, unsustained. In judging the scope or existence of a pattern of constitutional violations, the Court requires more than evidence of accusations. . . . For three, at the hearing, counsel for the County represented there are slightly more than 3,000 sworn police officers presently employed by the County. Because of officer turnover, the total number of sworn police serving at some point during the four-year span of the 51 sexual misconduct reports would have been even larger. The Court does not find that 51 sexual misconduct claims over four years − in an extremely large police force, and including many claims that were never supported − establishes a widespread pattern of constitutional abuses directly caused by the County's failure to implement different screening measures."); Adams v. City of Laredo, No. L-08-165, 2011 WL 1988750, at *10 (S.D. Tex. May 19, 2011) ("Adams has not alleged or produced any evidence of a pattern, or even another instance, of Laredo police officers using excessive force on a suspect suffering from hypoglycemia. Furthermore, this case does not fall within the 'narrow range of circumstances' where a single incident will suffice for a showing of deliberate indifference. Adams has provided no evidence that the use of excessive force is an 'obvious,' 'highly predictable' consequence of not training police officers to recognize suspects suffering from hypoglycemia. Adams has also failed to allege or demonstrate any causal link between the officers' lack of hypoglycemia training and the alleged use of excessive force during his arrest. According to Adams, when his vehicle finally stopped, the officers pulled him from his truck and immediately struck him on the head and then began to beat him while he lay on the ground helpless in a nonadversarial position. . . If true, it would certainly appear that the officers used excessive force. Adams's theory seems to be that these officers had a general propensity to use excessive force. If so, it would seem highly unlikely that prior training on hypoglycemia would deter them from using excessive force on this occasion. Even if one could postulate a remote connection between the absence of hypoglycemia training and use of excessive force by these officers on this occasion, that connection is too tenuous to satisfy the heightened standard required to hold a municipality liable under § 1983."); Langweiler v. Borough of Newtown, No. 10-3210, 2011 WL 1809264, at *6 (E.D. Pa. May 12, 2011) ("The Court concludes that Langweiler failed to adequately plead a failure to supervise claim because he did not allege any facts which could plausibly give rise to an inference that the Borough or Wojciechowski communicated their approval of Matthews's conduct. Just because Wojciechowski was responsible for supervising Matthews does not mean that he approved of Matthews's conduct. And his failure to supervise Matthews on a daily basis alone does not communicate approval. . . . On the other hand, Langweiler did sufficiently plead a claim for failure to train. He identified a certification that was a condition of Matthews's employment and alleges that Matthews did not complete the certification. Further, Langweiler alleges that he fell victim to Matthews's prior misconduct, i.e. stopping vehicles without probable cause, on several occasions, which the purported certification may have prevented. And because the Borough and Wojciechowski knew about Matthews's history, their failure to ensure Matthews obtained the certification raises an inference of deliberate indifference. Thus, unlike the supervisor in Connick, Langweiler alleges the Borough and Wojciechowski had knowledge of a pattern of similar violations. . . Accordingly, Langweiler has sufficiently pled a claim for failure to train. For these reasons, Langweiler's claim for failure to supervise is dismissed with prejudice, but Defendants' Motion is denied with respect to the failure to train claim."); Harris v. Paige, No. 08-2126, 2011 WL 1755646, at *7 (E.D. Pa. May 9, 2011) ("Although it is certainly acknowledged that Officer Paige has an extensive disciplinary record, accusations of crimes such as robbery, rape, and murder are not supported by the existing police disciplinary record. As outlined above, Officer Paige's disciplinary violations speak for themselves. They include: numerous instances of sleeping on the job, an unexplained pursuit of a motorist out of the district, wrongfully transporting a civilian home, engaging in outside employment, and other similar violations for which he was suspended for periods of time. Officer Paige's disciplinary record does include offenses which involve serious offenses such as theft and assault. However, none of these more serious allegations were substantiated by corroborating witnesses during IA's investigations of these incidents. . . Moreover, there is also no history in this record that indicates that Officer Paige had a propensity to commit the type of heinous sexual assault that he is alleged to have committed here. . . . [A]s bad as Officer Paige's disciplinary record is, it is devoid of any sexual assaults or even sexual misconduct. Thus, we conclude that Officer Paige's disciplinary record does not support a finding that the City was aware or should have been aware of similar unlawful conduct in the past, but failed to take precautions against future violations."); Young v. Village of Romeoville, No. 10 C 1737, 2011 WL 1575512, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 27, 2011) ("The Supreme Court in Connick recognized that deliberate indifference in a failure-to-train case also can rest on a 'single-incident' theory of liability. . . . Connick held that the narrow range of circumstances in which a 'single-incident' theory of liability could prevail did not encompass the failure to train prosecutors in their obligations under Brady . . . It is unclear whether, after Connick, a municipality's failure to train officers in non-lethal handcuffing techniques theoretically could lead to 'single-incident' liability in a failure-to-train case. Even if it could, Young has not made her case. . . . Young offers no evidence regarding the particulars of the training or of the supervision and discipline of Romeoville police officers, much less evidence that would permit a reasonable jury to conclude 'that such training, supervision, and discipline are so obviously inadequate as to result in the violation of constitutional rights.'. . As a result, Young cannot prevail on a 'single-incident' theory of failure-to-train liability."); Hill v. Robeson County, N.C., No. 7:09-CV-5-D, 2010 WL 2104168, at *7 (E.D.N.C. May 20, 2010) ("Robeson County's decision to hire Britt in March 2006 as an Offender Center Resource Officer was itself legal, and Robeson County did not authorize Britt to sexually abuse Hill or otherwise violate her constitutional rights. Although Britt was convicted in 1981 of manslaughter for killing his wife and served approximately five years in prison, Hill has not alleged that Britt engaged in any other unlawful or violent conduct during the two decades between Britt's release from prison and Robeson County's hiring of him in March 2006. . . Furthermore, Hill acknowledges that Robeson County hired Britt, because, inter alia, Robeson County believed that Britt had reformed and 'could identify with the people he was trying to help.'. . Accordingly, the amended complaint lacks the strong causal connection between Britt's 1981 manslaughter conviction and Britt's alleged constitutional violations in 2007. . . In opposition to this conclusion, Hill argues that Brown requires a strong causal connection only when the acts in the defendant's background are less serious than the alleged constitutional violations. . .Stated differently, Hill contends that because Britt killed his wife in 1979 and was convicted of manslaughter in 1981, Robeson County necessarily should have foreseen the alleged sexual abuse in 2007. The court rejects Hill's creative interpretation of Brown. Nothing in Brown or its progeny creates Hill's proposed per se rule of foreseeability. Rather, Brown and its progeny demonstrate that the alleged constitutional violations and the municipal official's prior conduct must be nearly identical in order to support municipal liability based on a claim of inadequate hiring."); Sexton v. Kenton County Detention Center, No. 2007-130 (WOB), 2010 WL 1050058, at *5 (E.D. Ky. Mar. 18, 2010) ("Plaintiffs argue that the county defendants are liable for their injuries because the county defendants hired Stokes without properly performing a background check, which plaintiffs argue demonstrates a propensity toward violence against women. . . . Despite defendant Stokes' criminal record, which included several convictions for non-support, driving infractions, and one misdemeanor assault charge, involving a domestic situation, plaintiffs fail to demonstrate that the county defendants knew that Stokes was highly likely to inflict the particular injuries suffered by them. . . None of Stokes' prior misdemeanor offenses demonstrated a propensity to commit rape. Thus, plaintiffs have not established that the county defendants were deliberately indifferent to their rights by improperly hiring Stokes."); M.C. v. Pavlovich, No. 4:07-cv-2060, 2008 WL 2944886, at * 6 (M.D. Pa. July 25, 2008) ("In this case, the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, assumed to be true, suffice to meet the admittedly high burden of establishing deliberate indifference and causation. The complaint alleges a pattern of similar violations that began before Pavlovich's employment with the Marysville Police Department and continued thereafter. Pavlovich's continuing pattern of conduct involved not just M.C., but fourteen other minor girls. Pavlovich used Borough equipment and his position as a police officer to directly accomplish his illegal ends. M.C. alleges that, prior to hiring Pavlovich, the Borough and Chief Stoss were aware of this pattern, which had resulted in his prior termination from two other police departments. Further, the complaint alleges that the Borough and Chief Stoss personally became aware of Pavlovich's continuing pattern of conduct through the complaints of the parents of at least three of the minor victims. These facts establish that the defendants were confronted with information which made it obvious that Pavlovich would likely inflict the particular injury suffered by M.C., and yet made the decision to hire Pavlovich. In the face of this clear and unreasonable risk, the defendants took no action to adequately supervise Pavlovich despite his repeated misconduct and the multiple complaints which should have made his constitutional violations obvious. Accordingly, M.C. has stated a claim under § 1983 against the Borough and Chief Stoss in his personal capacity."); Teasley v. Forler, No. 4:06-CV-773 (JCH), 2008 WL 686322, at * 10 (E.D. Mo. Mar. 10, 2008) ("The Eighth Circuit notes that Courts have closely adhered to the requirements of Bryan County. . . It held that a county is not liable for the excessive force of its officer where his employment records from a prior law enforcement job indicated that he had slapped an inmate, disobeyed orders, cursed at other employees, and been accused of beating his wife. . . Specifically, the Court found that the nature of these complaints did not satisfy the 'strong' causal connection needed to find that it was obvious risk that he would use excessive force. . . Other circuits also closely adhere to the requirements of Bryan County. [collecting cases] . . . . Upon consideration, the Court finds that Plaintiffs' evidence does not satisfy the strong causal connection required by Bryan County and its progeny. Here, an adequate investigation into Forler's past would have uncovered his convictions for driving while intoxicated and minor in possession of alcohol as well as his assault arrest. Many courts have held that prior incidents involving assault and alcohol do not make it plainly obvious that an officer would improperly use deadly force. [citing cases] An adequate investigation would have also uncovered that he failed the Academy psychological exam because he showed a willingness to disregard safety procedures. Complaints about ignoring safety protocols do not make it obvious that an officer will use excessive force. . . Similarly, prior issues concerning communicating with the public, as well as earning poor grades in college, do not satisfy the strong causal connection required by Bryan County. As such, Lincoln County and Torres cannot be liable based on the decision to hire Forler."); Wilhelm v. Clemens, No. 3:04 CV 7562, 2006 WL 2619995, at *9 (N.D. Ohio Sept. 13, 2006) ("In the instant action, Plaintiff claims that Carr failed to contact George Clemens's former employer, the Village of Paulding, which terminated his employment as a police officer after eight separate occasions of discipline. . . Plaintiff, however, fails to provide any evidence that had Carr contacted the Village of Paulding, she would have discovered that George Clemens would likely use excessive force or otherwise violate the constitutional rights of the citizens of Antwerp. It does not appear that Clemens was ever disciplined for the use or misuse of force. Plaintiff further contends that George Clemens's prior convictions for misdemeanor assault, criminal trespass, and driving under the influence of alcohol should have 'tipped off' Carr. While his prior convictions may make George Clemens a peculiar choice for a position as a police officer, they are not sufficient to impose liability on the Village. . . . Here, George Clemens's criminal record is similar to the deputy in Brown. Just as the deputy's assault conviction was not sufficient to impose liability in Brown, Clemens's record is not sufficient to impose liability here. Had Joyce Carr adequately reviewed George Clemens's criminal record, it would not have been 'plainly obvious' that he would use excessive force. Accordingly, Joyce Carr did not act with deliberate indifference to Plaintiff's right to be free from excessive force, and summary judgment is granted as to Plaintiff's failure-to-screen claim."); Atwood v. Town of Ellington, 427 F.Supp.2d 136, 148, 149 (D. Conn. 2006) ("The evidence in this case cannot reasonably support a finding that the Town was deliberately indifferent to the likelihood that Nieliwocki would violate plaintiff's constitutional rights by sexually assaulting her. A report of the August 2001 complaints from the two female ambulance staff members was placed in Nieliwocki's personnel file by the investigating state trooper. While it is perplexing why Stupinski failed to review the file before reappointing Nieliwocki in November 2001, particularly as he acknowledged 'he would have taken [the report] into consideration' in his reappointment decision, . . .mere negligence does not amount to deliberate indifference to plaintiff Atwood's constitutional right against unreasonable force or substantive due process violations. It is clear that Stupinski did not know about Nieliwocki's troubling behavior toward females in the preceding months when he decided to reappoint Nieliwocki. Additionally, the misconduct reported in August 2001 − which may have been suggestive of aggressive or violent tendencies toward women − was factually distinct from the February 2002 incident and would not necessarily have made it 'plainly obvious' to the Town at the time that Nieliwocki might have had sexually abusive propensities. . . Plaintiff has profferred no expert or other testimony linking the previous incident of what Nieliwocki characterized as 'mutual horse play' to a future likelihood to commit sexual assault. Moreover, plaintiff has proffered no evidence that Stupinski's practice of not reviewing personnel files when reappointing constables ever led to previous deprivations of the constitutional rights at issue here, and therefore plaintiff cannot show that the Town was deliberately indifferent to the consequences of Stupinski's hiring practices."); Estate of Smith v. Silvas, 414 F.Supp.2d 1015, 1019-21 (D. Colo. 2006) ("In addition to their failure to train claim, the Estate also asserts that the city is liable for failure to properly supervise Officer Silvas throughout his career. This claim requires essentially the same showing of deliberate indifference and direct causation as discussed above. . . In support of its claim, the Estate argues that Officer Silvas has engaged in numerous acts of misconduct throughout his long career..However, the issue always remains whether, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the Estate, does it give rise to a reasonable inference that the City was deliberately indifferent to the risk that Silvas would improperly shoot the decedent in the circumstances. . . Specifically, the issue is whether the City had notice that its actions or inactions will likely result in the constitutional violation, namely an unconstitutional or improper shooting, not simply a shooting. . . Officer Silvas has an extensive history of incidents involving guns. Plaintiff provides a litany of various events which bear repeating to the extent they are acknowledged by defendants or are supported by appropriate Rule 56(c) evidence: [court lists nine incidents involving guns, five of which resulted in deaths] . . . . With particular regard to the incidents involving shootings, the defense emphasizes that the Estate does not make any claim that the Silvas's decision to shoot in any case was unwarranted and there is no admissible evidence that any constituted an improper or unconstitutional use of deadly force. This factual background in a summary judgment context presents a difficult issue: Can a reasonable jury infer that the City was deliberately indifferent to the risk that Officer Silvas would use constitutionally excessive force by improperly shooting Mr. Smith? On the one hand it is undisputed that the City has institutional knowledge of Silvas's history of at least eight shootings, resulting in five deaths, in four separate events, as well as a record of threats and abuse. On the other hand, it is also undisputed that: (1) no shooting was ever found to be improper; (2) Silvas was disciplined; (3) he was required to take additional training concerning the use of firearms; (4) he had a history of commendable restraint in the face of two serious threats; and (5) several years had passed since his last discharge of a firearm. The bar for such supervisory liability is quite high. In City of Canton, Ohio v. Harris, Justice White noted that a showing concerning the need for more or different training must be 'so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the City can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.' . . The same standard would be applicable as to the need for more or different supervisory action in this case. . . .The issue can thus be restated: did the City of Denver have notice that its failure to further supervise was substantially certain to result in an unconstitutional shooting and choose to consciously or deliberately disregard that risk? Certainly a reasonable jury could conclude from Officer Silvas's history of shooting (and killing) individuals in the course of his police service that the City had notice that he may use deadly force. Beyond that, however, can a reasonable juror infer that the City had notice that Silvas's use of force would be so excessive as to be unconstitutional? There is no evidence that he ever improperly fired his weapon. Further, considering the discipline imposed, additional training required, and the significant temporal separation from the last shooting involving Officer Silvas, evidence is lacking to show a 'direct causal link' between the shooting and inadequate supervision. I find that, considering the evidence as a whole and drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of the Estate, the City did not have notice that it was substantially certain that a constitutional violation would occur.' [footnotes omitted]); Ice v. Dixon, No. 4:03CV2281, 2005 WL 1593899, at *9 (N.D. Ohio July 6, 2005) ("Plaintiff presents no legal support for a finding that knowledge of an investigation into the possible use of excessive force against a male inmate suffices to establish knowledge and indifference to unknown risks of sexual assault or sexual contact with female inmates. As previously stated, a finding of municipal liability 'must depend on a finding that this officer was highly likely to inflict the particular injury suffered by the plaintiff.'"); Perrin v. City of Elberton, Georgia, No. 3:03-CV-106(CDL), 2005 WL 1563530, at *11 (M.D. Ga. July 1, 2005) (not reported) ("For the decision to hire Kupkowski to give rise to a § 1983 claim, Plaintiff must show that Kupkowski was highly likely to inflict the particular injury suffered by Plaintiff. . . This connection must be strong − the specific constitutional violation must be a 'plainly obvious consequence of the hiring decision.' . . In this case, Plaintiff has accused Kupkowski of violating his federal rights by applying for the warrant using an unsworn warrant application. No reasonable juror could find that Plaintiff's evidence regarding Kupkowski's prior employment establishes that the specific constitutional violation alleged by Plaintiff would be an obvious consequence of hiring Kupkowski. Therefore, municipal liability cannot be based upon Welsh's decision to hire Kupkowski, and Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment is granted as to Plaintiff's federal claims based upon the decision to hire Kupkowski."); Christopher v. Nestlerode, 373 F.Supp.2d 503, 522 (M.D. Pa. 2005) ("Nothing in these officers' personnel records would put a supervisor on notice that Nestlerode or Kerr were likely to effect stops without probable cause or to engage in racial profiling. . . It may be true, as noted in plaintiff's briefs, that Nestlerode has a less than exemplary law enforcement record. He was admonished by his previous employer, a municipal police department, for misusing resources for his own benefit and for misconduct during citizen encounters. He lost property of a Hispanic individual who was taken into custody. . . He admitted during testimony that, if stopped by another officer, he would 'flash his badge' to avoid a citation, in violation of standard policy. Nevertheless, Hose was not informed of these incidents. . . Even if he had been, this misconduct is indicative of a propensity to violate standard procedures, not to violate the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights of citizens. However unfavorably these infractions reflect on Nestlerode's professionalism, none of them would have alerted Hose to the potential for biased policing. . . Hose had no reason to assume that officials in the department were prone to engage in such conduct, particularly in light of the training requirements relating to cultural diversity and his admonitions concerning the need for equal treatment under the law. . . . The record does not reflect a history of similar violations in the sheriff's department, the presence of racial animus among deputies, or reports of race-based offenses in the personnel records of Nestlerode and Kerr. Deputy sheriffs were trained on issues of cultural diversity, and were taught to enforce laws equally regardless of ethnicity or race. Neither Hose nor the County of York had any reason to suspect that an incident of this type would arise or that additional training was necessary."); Crumes v. Myers Protective Services, Inc., No. 1:03CV1135DFHTAB, 2005 WL 1025784, at *1, 6-8 (S.D. Ind. Apr. 22, 2005) (not reported) ("Constitutional claims of improper hiring or appointment like this are difficult to prove. They require the plaintiff to meet 'rigorous requirements of culpability and causation.' Board of County Comm'rs of Bryan County v. Brown, 520 U.S. 397, 415 (1997). . . . The information actually known to Sheriff Cottey and his department showed that Myers had a prior felony conviction for theft that had later been reduced to a misdemeanor. That information was not sufficient to signal, in the words of Brown, 'that this officer was highly likely to inflict the particular injury suffered by the plaintiff.' . . Crumes' arguments to the contrary amount to a sweeping indictment of Myers' character for honesty and obeying the law. The evidence still lacks a sufficiently specific link between Myers' background and the particular injuries suffered by Crumes. . . . In this case, Myers' appointment was contrary to state law. Myers was convicted of felony theft in 1995, which was changed to misdemeanor theft in 1996. Crumes has come forward with evidence showing that the sheriff's appointment of Myers was contrary to state law and to the local written policy. Even giving effect to the post hoc discount of the theft conviction from felony to misdemeanor, the misdemeanor conviction was still for a crime of moral turpitude. . . . The alleged violations of both state law and the sheriff's written policy are not conclusive on the federal constitutional question, but they are evidence that tends to support plaintiff's claim of deliberate indifference to the threat Myers posed to constitutional rights. . . . Sheriff Cottey appointed Myers as a special deputy in the face of a state law prohibiting the appointment, and despite the terms of his own policy prohibiting the appointment. From this evidence, a reasonable jury could find that Sheriff Cottey acted with deliberate indifference to the public welfare and to the general risk that Myers would violate constitutional rights. . . . The information known to the Sheriff's Department in this case − Myers' theft conviction and the events reported in the arrest report − presents a weaker case for causation than the evidence in Brown . In Brown, the reserve deputy was accused of excessive force. His prior criminal record included at least misdemeanor convictions for assault, battery, and resisting arrest (all in connection with a fight on a college campus). . . In other words, there was at least the common thread of force or violence linking the criminal history to the events in suit. Here, even that modest and insufficient thread is lacking. Here, the sheriff's department knew that Myers had stolen property from a store and had pursued a fraudulent scheme to exchange it for cash. That crime bears no specific connection to the constitutional violations in this case: unreasonable seizure of the person, use of excessive force, and causing unfounded criminal charges to be filed. . . . A reasonable jury could not find that an 'obvious consequence' of deputizing a shoplifter would be that the shoplifter would eventually use excessive force in the course of an invalid arrest. As a matter of law, the evidence of the special deputy's prior criminal conduct was not tied sufficiently to the use of excessive force against Crumes to allow a reasonable jury to find municipal liability."); Doggett v. Perez, 348 F.Supp.2d 1179, 1195 (E.D. Wash. 2004)("In sum, plaintiffs' evidence does not establish that Perez was less than forthright with the Wenatchee Police Department about his previous encounters with the law. Furthermore, a reckless driving conviction, a petty theft conviction later expunged, and a charge of possession of amphetamine would not have made it 'plainly obvious' to Badgley and the City of Wenatchee that 25 years later Perez might deliberately fabricate evidence against criminal defendants."); Perez v. Miami-Dade County, 348 F.Supp.2d 1343, 1353, 1354 (S.D. Fla. 2004) ("Bd. of County Comm'rs. of Bryan County is illustrative of the difficulty of proving deliberate indifference based on one single action and the rigorous standards applied. . . . Plaintiff cannot establish that it was highly likely that Defendant's failure to terminate Alsbury would lead to Plaintiff's injury even if it is assumed Alsbury struck Plaintiff on purpose. First, Plaintiff's attempt to argue that Alsbury's actions were racially motivated does not further his burden of proof. Certainly Alsbury was a racist who disliked African-Americans. He admitted this. Also, Plaintiff has presented adequate evidence demonstrating that some fellow officers in the force knew that Plaintiff was a racist. However, the Court cannot assume that persons with policy-making authority in Defendant's Police Department knew he was a racist; leap from the fact of racism to the conclusion that Alsbury intentionally hit African-American suspects with his car; or find that Defendant should have known Alsbury was likely to hit African-American suspects with his car. Simply put, while it might be unwise policy to permit racists to serve as County officers, Plaintiff has not presented evidence that a 'plainly obvious consequence' of employing Alsbury would be the intentional unlawful use of force against African-Americans. If such a consequence were really so obvious, one would expect Plaintiff to have evidence of multiple racially motivated incidences of unlawful force over the course of Alsbury's twenty-five-plus year career."); Adams v. City of Balcones Heights, No. Civ.A.SA-03-CA-0219-, 2004 WL 1925444, at *6 (W.D. Tex. Aug. 27, 2004) ("The Plaintiffs' complaint has not alleged the requisite strong connection between Guidry's or Trevino's background and the particular injury suffered. In Plaintiffs' Third Amended Original Complaint, the Plaintiffs allege that the Defendants were aware that Guidry's employment file showed that he had been 'rough with inmates' and had 'got friendly with' female inmates at his previous job. The Plaintiffs fail, however, to allege anything in either Guidry's. . .background along the same lines as the background of the lieutenant in Kesler. In fact, the allegations as to

Guidry's record fall short of what the Fifth Circuit found insufficient to support liability in Gros. The Plaintiffs' allegations as to Guidry show that, at the time of the decision to hire him, Guidry may not have been the perfect candidate for a police officer. The allegations do not, however, state a claim against the Defendants for liability based on the decision to hire Guidry. . . There are no allegations that would make it plainly obvious to an official screening his background that Guidry would be likely to commit the acts in question."); Cain v. Rock, 67 F. Supp.2d 544, 549-50 (D. Md. 1999) ("Given that the policy of cross-gender guarding did not violate Cain's constitutional rights, Cain will need to follow the more typical route to proving a Section 1983 violation. . . First she must point to an underlying violation of her constitutional rights. For present purposes, the court assumes arguendo that if Rock sexually assaulted Cain, that act would suffice as a violation of Cain's constitutional rights as a prisoner. . . Second, Cain must meet the strict standards of fault and causation to link the facially constitutional municipal policy to the alleged assault. . . . In this case, Cain has failed to demonstrate that the County's policy was the direct cause of the alleged assault. Indeed, Cain has provided little more than allegations and legal conclusions about how the policy made her more vulnerable to assaults. It is simply not sufficient, for § 1983 purposes, to show that a municipal policy put an employee in the position to commit a constitutional tort. More evidence of causation is necessary. . . . In sum, the Court finds that the County's official policies were not the cause of Rock's alleged sexual assault on the Plaintiff, and the County did not act with deliberate indifference toward violations of this type. It follows that Cain has failed to establish municipal liability for the County's official policy of cross-gender guarding."); Doe v. Granbury ISD, 19 F. Supp.2d 667, 676 & n.4 (N.D. Tex. 1998) ("To prevail on their negligent hiring theory, plaintiffs must show that Granbury ISD was deliberately indifferent to the risk that a violation of the particular constitutional rights at issue here would follow the decision to hire Talmage and Lee. . . . The only summary judgment evidence offered by plaintiffs to support this claim is hearsay testimony of Jane Doe that, at some unidentified point in time, Granbury ISD had a policy not to check into the background of employment candidates prior to hiring them. They present no competent summary judgment evidence with regard to any policy, much less any evidence that adequate scrutiny of the backgrounds of Talmage and Lee would have led to the conclusion that they would have violated Jane Doe II's rights in the manner alleged in this lawsuit. . . . Although plaintiffs present evidence that Talmage sexually abused students in Mansfield, they present no evidence that a background check of Talmage would have revealed such conduct."); Doe I v. Bd. of Educ. of Consolidated School District 230, 18 F. Supp.2d 954, 960, 961 (N.D. Ill. 1998) ("In discussing the elements of culpability and causation, the Court stated that although inadequate screening of an applicant's record may reflect indifference to an applicant's background, that is not the indifference relevant for purposes of a legal inquiry into municipal liability under § 1983. To establish such liability, a plaintiff must demonstrate that a municipal decision reflects deliberate indifference to the risk that a violation of a particular constitutional or statutory right will follow the decision. Only where adequate scrutiny of an applicant's background would lead a reasonable policymaker to conclude that the plainly obvious consequence of a decision to hire the applicant would constitute the deprivation of a third party's federally protected right can the official's failure to adequately scrutinize the applicant's background constitute deliberate indifference. . . Therefore, for municipal liability there must be a definite connection between the background of the applicant and the specific constitutional violation alleged. . . . In the instant case, there is evidence in the record to suggest that the District decided to rehire Vasquez with some knowledge that he may have engaged in an extramarital sexual relationship with a student ("my). If plaintiffs can prove that to be true, Vasquez would have been violating Amy's constitutional rights. From that, a jury could conclude that a decision to ignore Vasquez' relationship with Amy would reflect more than just an indifference to Vasquez' record, but a deliberate indifference to plaintiffs' constitutional rights, and that it was highly likely that Vasquez would do the same thing with other students that he had done with Amy. Thus, as alleged by plaintiffs, this instructor was highly likely to inflict the particular injury suffered by plaintiffs. What exactly the District knew about Vasquez's relationship with Amy when it rehired him is in dispute. Both Vasquez and Amy have denied having a sexual relationship while Amy was a student. Nevertheless, if plaintiffs can prove that upon proper inquiry the District could have discovered that Vasquez had abused Amy, it may be able to establish that his abuse of plaintiffs would have been a plainly obvious consequence of the hiring decision. Accordingly, the District's motion for summary judgment on Count II is denied."); Mirelez v. Bay City Independent School Dist., 992 F. Supp. 916, 920 (S.D. Tex. 1998) ("Plaintiff argues that Defendant's policies violate § 1983 because they do not require a background check for substitute teachers. However, it is undisputed in this case that, even if it were checked, no information could have been garnered from Garcia's criminal record that would have prevented his employment. Without such causation, Plaintiff's argument is fatally flawed."); Morrissey v. City of New York, 963 F. Supp. 270, 275-76 (S.D.N.Y. 1997) ("While there is certainly a genuine issue of material fact as to whether a failure to supervise cooperators could conceivably lead to a deprivation similar to that which plaintiff allegedly suffered, it is clear that such a deprivation is not 'highly predictable.' There can be little doubt that cooperators are under some stress, but it cannot be said that such stress is in any way closely linked to the arbitrary shooting of other individuals. This is particularly so where defendants already had a policy of not permitting officers known for violent behavior to become cooperators. . . . While training an officer not to shoot other officers may not be particularly useful, supervising him while he is in a situation generally acknowledged as stressful could prevent him from making choices which might deprive others of their constitutional rights. However, in this case, . . . there is a great deal of evidence that such supervision was undertaken. . . . [E]ven if the court were to assume that there was a pervasive failure by defendants to train and supervise their officers properly, no liability could attach to their conduct in this instance because even an extraordinary amount of supervision could not have prevented the shooting of plaintiff.").

But see Griffin v. City of Opa-Locka, 261 F.3d 1295, 1313 (11th Cir. 2001) ("Construing all inferences in favor of Griffin, we believe the evidence was sufficient for a finding that the City's inadequate screening of Neal's background was so likely to result in sexual harassment that the City could reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to Griffin's constitutional rights."); McHenry v. City of Ottawa, No. 16-2736-DDC-JPO, 2017 WL 4269903, at *11 (D. Kan. Sept. 26, 2017) ("Here, plaintiff asserts deliberate indifference based on the allegation that there are a 'high frequency of encounters between law enforcement officers and persons who are suicidal, mentally ill, or in other crisis situations and how traditional law enforcement techniques are wholly inadequate to diffuse the dangerousness of such situations.'. . In addition, plaintiff alleges that Ottawa and Franklin County deliberately have chosen to ignore the need to train their officers to cope with the mentally ill. . . Thus, plaintiff has alleged facts that, if supported by evidence and believed by the factfinder, could support a reasonable inference that Ottawa and Franklin County deliberately chose to ignore the need for training."); Brown v. Winders, No. 5:11–CV–176–FL, 2011 WL 4828840, at *6 (E.D.N.C. Oct. 11, 2011) ("Failure to train police officers regarding the requirement of probable cause for an arrest may fall within the narrow range of Harris's hypothesized single-incident liability. Plaintiff alleges that 'the illegal actions of [Pierce] demonstrate that he is completely devoid of adequate training in law enforcement ... The basic concept that forms the foundation for police action, probable cause, is either unknown to [Pierce] or simply not a consideration in the performance of his duties.'. . Plaintiff alleges that Pierce did not fully comprehend the definition, importance, or requirement of probable cause. The need to train officers about probable cause, like the need to train officers in the constitutional limitations on the use of deadly force, is 'so obvious' that failure to do so amounts to deliberate indifference to constitutional rights. . . At this early stage, plaintiff has sufficiently alleged that Wayne County Sheriff's Office's failure to train amounts to deliberate indifference. Accordingly, plaintiff has stated a § 1983 claim against Winders, in his official capacity, for unreasonable seizure in violation of plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights."); Peart v. Seneca County, 808 F.Supp.2d 1028, 1037, 1038 (N.D. Ohio 2011) ("Ohio sheriffs are the final county policy makers in the area of jail administration. . . .Peart has presented evidence indicating that Sheriff Steyer implemented an informal classification system that failed to segregate non-criminal detainees from violent inmates. . . . This evidence creates a genuine issue of material fact, such that a reasonable jury could conclude that Sheriff Steyer, by statute responsible for the safe operation of the jail, was the final decision-maker for the County as to operational policies within Seneca County Jail. A rational jury could also find that, in that capacity he knowingly implemented a policy of informal, subjective and standard-less classification that created a substantial and readily apparent risk of injury to the plaintiff. Finally, a jury could also find that, in violation of Peart's constitutional rights, Sheriif Steyer was deliberately indifferent to the danger that this conduct created. . . .As discussed above, inmate-on-inmate violence is a foreseeable and serious consequence of inadequate classification of prisoners. . . There is an undeniable link between the inadequate classification decisions here and the injury alleged, and this case falls into the narrow range of circumstances under which a 'single violation of federal rights, accompanied by a showing that a municipality has failed to train its employees to handle recurring situations presenting an obvious potential for such a violation, could trigger municipal liability.'. . .A jury could find that failure to classify these inmates goes beyond mere carelessness. As discussed above, Sheriff Steyer was aware that classification forms were not being completed. He did not supervise classifications or ensure that jail officers had appropriate training. He testified that he did not give classification any priority. Peart has thus submitted evidence that Sheriff Steyer 'at least implicitly authorized, approved, or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending officers.'"); Marcelle v. City of Allentown, No. 07-CV-4376, 2010 WL 3606405, at *5 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 16, 2010) ("The following controlling question of law is certified for interlocutory appeal: Whether the court properly applied the United States Supreme Court's decision in Bd. of County Comm'rs of Bryan County v. Brown, 520 U.S. 397, 404 (1997) in concluding that a reasonable jury could find from the record in this case that the City of Allentown's actions in hiring Officer Brett M. Guth, despite being aware of his previous driving record and then in retaining him despite the tailgating incident in 2006, constitutes deliberate indifference to the safety of the public, particularly pedestrian bystanders."); Ramirez v. Jim Wells County, Tex., Civil No. CC-09-209, 2010 WL 2598304, at *3 (S.D. Tex. June 25, 2010) ("Here, Plaintiff alleges Sheriff Lopez and Deputy Valadez referred to Deputy Martinez as 'Taser Joe,' failed to monitor the amount of taser cartridges he used, and failed to train him on under what circumstances use of a taser gun is appropriate. From these alleged facts, it is reasonable to infer that Sheriff Lopez and Deputy Valadez were deliberately indifferent to citizens' constitutional rights. [citing City of Canton] The possibility that Deputy Martinez may use excessive force against other citizens' is plausibly a 'highly predictable' consequence of failing to monitor his use of taser cartridges or instructing him on the appropriate use of a taser gun."); Montes v. County of El Paso, Tex., No. EP-09-CV-82-KC, 2010 WL 2035821, at *19 (W.D. Tex. May 18, 2010) ("In light of the evidence submitted by the Plaintiffs, a jury could reasonably conclude that, had the County undertaken an adequate investigation of Ramos's background, it would have learned the incidents discussed here, which were all witnessed by other local police offers, and which were made the subject of official complaints and federal lawsuits. . . Moreover, a jury could easily conclude that, had the County learned of some or all of these incidents, it would have realized that 'this officer was highly likely to inflict the particular injury suffered by the plaintiff.'. . The earlier allegations of misconduct leveled at Ramos bear an eerie similarity to the allegations in the instant case. In each case, an innocent person was allegedly beaten, without cause, during the course of a routine police patrol. Thus, Plaintiffs have submitted evidence supporting municipal liability for inadequate screening upon hiring, under the standards articulated by the Supreme Court in Bryan County. Summary judgment is thus inappropriate."); Kincheloe v. Caudle, No. A-09-CA-010 LY, 2010 WL 1170604, at *6 (W.D. Tex. Mar. 22, 2010) ("There is no evidence that the City ever requested a termination report from the Texas Commission on Law Enforcement Standards (TCLEOSE) . . . before it decided to hire Caudle as a police officer. The failure to investigate or follow up in any manner a police applicant's admission that he was terminated for using excessive force could also support a finding that the City was deliberately indifferent in this case. Plaintiffs have presented the Court with sufficient evidence to create a fact issue as to whether a full review of Caudle's record should have prompted the City to conclude that Caudle's constitutional violations in this case 'would be a plainly obvious consequence of the hiring decision.'"); Birdwell v. Corso, No. 3:07-0629, 2009 WL 1471155, at *7 (M.D. Tenn. May 21, 2009) ("Here, Plaintiffs have established a link between Chief Adcock's decision to hire Corso and the assault on Ms. Birdwell. Corso's Millersville personnel record contains a complaint about sexual harassment of a female motorist on two occasions after she was stopped for a minor traffic violation, and complaints about sexual harassment by him and another officer at a local business which resulted in the Chief of Police ordering Corso to undergo psychological counseling. Corso was suspended and an investigation was underway when Corso resigned from the Millersville police department because of 'complaints' made against him. Chief of Police Williams of Millersville testified at his deposition that he told Chief Adcock of Ridgetop that Corso had 'issues with women' and there were 'several instances in his personnel file.' Notwithstanding that record, and notwithstanding that Corso resigned while an investigation into sexual harassment was ongoing, Ridgetop, through its Police Chief, hired Corso. A jury could conclude that Corso was likely to engage in sexual harassment were he allowed to patrol the streets as a police officer after he left Millersville, and could further conclude that a 'plainly obvious consequence of the ... decision' to hire Corso would be that he would engage in sexual harassment of a female motorist."); Abdi v. Karnes, 556 F.Supp.2d 804, 818, 819 (S.D. Ohio 2008) ("As explained in Soward, proof of a constitutional violation does not establish that the deprivation caused injury. 125 F. App'x at 42. The Soward decision cited as an example a hypothetical situation in which officers enter a house without a warrant thereby violating the Constitution. The suspect is found in the house, breaks away, shoots one of the officers and is then killed by a second officer. The antecedent unlawful entry was wholly superceded by the intervening conduct of the suspect, thereby breaking any causal link to the original entry. . . Likewise, in Soward, the decedent pointed a gun at the officers, who responded with deadly force. The decedent's conduct broke any causal link connecting his death to any failure to adequately train the officers. Put another way, the plaintiffs could not demonstrate that a properly trained officer would not have also responded with deadly force had the decedent pointed a gun at him or her.In this Court's view, Plaintiff must show that the deficiency in a city's training actually caused the death of Abdi. . . All of the Sixth Circuit cases following Russo, involved an unexpected, potentially lethal attack upon an officer. . . The common thread in these cases is that a sudden, unprovoked, unanticipated violent assault by a mentally ill person breaks any casual link between resulting injury or death and a claim of inadequate training. All of these cases involved patrol-type officers or deputies. All were responding to exigent circumstances. In this case, the deputies routinely arrested mentally ill individuals and had reason to take precaution. Unlike the officers in the cases described, the deputies in this case had time to plan for the encounter with a mentally ill individual. This opportunity to actually use specialized techniques in encountering Abdi was absent in the other cases. As noted in City of Canton, 489 U.S. at 391, the issue of proximate cause is a question of fact and not law. The trier of fact must determine from a review of all the evidence whether the failure to train was closely related to' or 'actually caused the ... injury.'. . At this juncture, the Plaintiff has produced sufficient evidence demonstrating a genuine issue of material fact as to the issue of causation."); Pirolozzi v. Stanbro, No. 5:07-CV-798, 2008 WL 1977504, at *9-*11 (N.D. Ohio May 1, 2008) ("In this case, the Court finds that the Plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence to show that the City of Canton's police training program is inadequate to the tasks that its officers must perform. The City of Canton requires its new police officers to complete the state-mandated Ohio Peace Officer's Training curriculum and requires all of its officers to attend an annual 40-hour in-service training program, with the content to be determined by the City. . . Despite this general instructional program, however, it is undisputed that the City of Canton does not train its police officers regarding the existence of, or the risks and dangers associated with, positional asphyxia. David Clouse ("Clouse"), one of the City's police training officers, testified that, at least since 1998, Canton police officers have not been trained about positional or compression asphyxia. . . Rather than arguing that the City was unaware of this cause of death in police custody cases, Clouse attempted to justify this lack of training by stating, '[W]e don't recognize it. It's not a recognized problem. There's documentation that says there's other things going on out there, and it's not because they're in the position or it's not because officers are putting weight on them. . . . Positional asphyxia is a well-known cause of death in many police custody cases throughout the nation. . . . Courts in the Sixth Circuit have also repeatedly dealt with several cases involving compression or positional asphyxia. . . . Finally, the Court concludes that there is sufficient evidence that a jury could find that the inadequacy of the City of Canton's police training regarding the forcible restraint and its association with positional asphyxia is closely related to or actually caused Pirolozzi's death. The Defendant Officers testified as to their lack of awareness that the manner in which they restrained and held Pirolozzi, even without additional force, may have caused his death. . . .The Court therefore denies summary judgment to the City of Canton as to the Plaintiff's § 1983 failure to train claim."); Gaston v. Ploeger, 399 F.Supp.2d 1211, 1219, 1220 (D. Kan. 2005) ("To the extent that Plaintiff argues Shoemaker failed to adequately train jail personnel, Plaintiff (1) must identify a specific deficiency in Shoemaker's training that is closely related to Belden's ultimate injury; and (2) must prove that the deficiency in training actually caused jail personnel to act with deliberate indifference to Belden's safety. In this case, the Court finds Plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence that a jury could find an affirmative link between the constitutional deprivation alleged and Shoemaker's training practices and general exercise of control over the jail. Sheriff Shoemaker is responsible for all aspects of the Brown County Jail. Brandon Roberts testified that he did not receive any formal training of any type at the Brown County Jail and he specifically did not receive any formal suicide prevention training. Roberts further states that he was never given any training formally or informally relating to clues to look for to determine if an inmate was at risk for suicide. Roberts indicated that any information he did learn about suicide prevention and actions, he learned from other officers at the jail while on the job. Roberts testified that he was informally told that suicidal inmates might act depressed. Other than depression, however, Brandon Roberts does not remember any other signs to look for to determine if an inmate is suicidal. In this case, Plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence of constitutional violations by Sergeant Hollister and Brandon Roberts. Moreover, Plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence to demonstrate that the policies and practices promulgated by Sheriff Shoemaker with regard to training could very well have been the moving force behind these alleged constitutional violations. In other words, a jury could find from the evidence presented that Sheriff Shoemaker's policies, procedures, and practices reflect deliberate indifference to the . . . known risk that the jail will inevitably house suicidal inmates."); Cahill v. Walker, No. 3:03-CV-00257, 2005 WL 1566494, at *5 (E.D. Tenn. July 5, 2005) (not reported) ("Here, the five prior complaints against Officer Walker alleging misconduct of a sexual nature arguably establish a 'clear and persistent pattern of sexual misconduct.' . . A material issue of fact exists as to whether the City of Gatlinburg had actual or constructive notice of this misconduct. Because the court cannot determine whether the city government was 'deliberately indifferent' without first deciding whether the government knew of the sexual nature of the complaints, the City of Gatlinburg is not entitled to summary judgment on the issue of its alleged failure to investigate."); Jones v. James, No. Civ.02-4131 JNE/RLE, 2005 WL 459652, at *4 (D. Minn. Feb. 24, 2005) (not reported) ("Considering the Affidavits, and viewing this evidence in the light most favorable to Jones, the Court concludes that there is a genuine issue of material fact with respect to whether Sheriff Fisher acted with deliberate indifference by hiring Stoneking to transport female prisoners without conducting any further background check into Stoneking's past and whether Jones's alleged injuries were caused by Cass County's inadequate hiring. A reasonable juror could find that the plainly obvious consequence of hiring Stoneking would be the deprivation of Jones's rights."); Kesler v. King, 29 F. Supp.2d 356, 369 (S.D. Tex. 1998) ("An official may be subject to liability under § 1983 for an employment decision that 'reflects deliberate indifference to the risk that a violation of a particular constitutional or statutory right will follow the decision.' [citing Bryan County] In Defendant King's case, the decision to 'recommend' the hiring of Lieutenant Wallace, a former Texas Department of Corrections officer who had actually been convicted of beating an inmate in violation of his civil rights, carried a substantial risk that some inmate's right to be free from excessive force would be violated. No reasonable, similarly situated official in Defendant King's position would believe that hiring a man who had been convicted for beating an inmate is an acceptable risk in this context. Accordingly, the Court concludes that Defendant King is not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Plaintiffs' allegation of failure to screen."); Raby v. Baptist Medical Center, 21 F. Supp.2d 1341, 1354, 1355 (M.D. Ala. 1998) ("The evidence indicates that Alford failed to investigate [defendant officer's] background even though he was told the police department would not again hire [officer] and even though he knew that [officer] had been terminated and that complaints, whether substantiated or not, had been made against him, and even though he had access to [officer's] personnel files. Beyond showing that Alford failed to fully look into Mangum's background, however, Raby has also pointed to evidence that Mangum had been confronted about his allegedly aggressive behavior and that a person Mangum had arrested in the past needed hospitalization. Evidence of aggressiveness, especially in the context of a suspect who required hospitalization, is tied to the constitutional right at issue here. . . . The court concludes that the evidence provided by Raby meets the causal connection requirement to impose liability upon Baptist Medical Center based on deliberate indifference under [Brown]. . . . [T]he court concludes that the evidence presented as to Alford's deliberate indifference for purposes of holding Baptist Medical Center responsible for Mangum's actions is also evidence which supports a claim against Alford individually."); Owens v. City of Philadelphia, 6 F. Supp.2d 373, 391-92 (E.D. Pa. 1998) ("On the whole, the record of this particular incident, viewed, as it must be on summary judgment, in plaintiffs' favor, would support a fact-finder in drawing an inference that a systemic problem existed: that is, the record would lend support to a finding that none of the officers involved, either before or after the incident, followed the instructions contained in the training materials proffered by the City. At the very least, these failures suggest the possibility that the 1988 memorandum and the academy training had not been deployed in an effective manner. To be sure, the Supreme Court has cautioned against creating an inference of failure to train from an isolated incident. [citing Bryan County and City of Canton] However, the record in this case would support an inference that the events leading up to and following Gaudreau's suicide amounted to a good deal more than an isolated instance that could be attributed to the negligence of, or the failure to train, one employee. . . . Plaintiffs' unrebutted expert testimony and the very course of events in this case would permit a reasonable fact-finder to conclude that the City, although aware of the problem of suicide within City correctional facilities, failed to do more than go through the motions of training its correctional officers in suicide prevention and in administering first aid to a person found hanging."); Foote v. Spiegel, 995 F.

Supp. 1347, 1357-58 (D. Utah 1998) (on remand) ("Throughout the deposition testimony quoted above, not one person believed the policy required, as a prerequisite to a strip search, that a jailer possess reasonable suspicion of concealed contraband that would not be discovered through a rub search. And the reason that none of the jailers ever considers the constitutional touchstone of reasonable suspicion is that the policy clearly does not require it. There is simply no mention of 'reasonable suspicion' as a factor to be considered by jailers prior to commencing a strip search of a detainee who is not entering the general jail population. This glaring omission is, in itself, a policy decision made by the county which is sufficient to subject it to liability in this case. . . . In this case, there is a basis for municipal liability under both the prior occurrences theory articulated in Canton and the first occurrence theory advanced in Brown. The constitutional flaws with the County's strip search policy were known as early as the Cottrell decision in 1993. That case put the County on warning that gross constitutional violations were occurring under the strip search policy then in existence. Despite this knowledge, the County refused to change the policy, thereby exhibiting 'deliberate indifference' to the likelihood of future violations. In truth, however, the court believes that the County should have been aware of potential problems with its strip search policy even prior to the Cottrell case. Jail officials must search detainees many times every day. The temptation to strip search each and every such detainee is great because it may provide marginal increases in jail security. Such blanket policies are also attractive to jail administrators because they make it unnecessary to determine the existence of reasonable suspicion on a case-by-case basis. . . Davis County should therefore have realized that, if it did not explicitly forbid strip searches of detainees absent reasonable suspicion of drugs or other contraband, that sooner or later the constitutional rights of detainees would be violated. The court therefore holds Davis County liable for its failure to formulate a detainee strip search policy which incorporates the constitutional imperatives identified by each and every Court of Appeals to date.").

See also Valenzuela for the Estate of Santos v. Roselle, No. 5:20-CV-03638-JMG, 2021 WL 1667473, at *5 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 28, 2021) ("With respect to a failure to train theory, the defendants again maintain that the complaint is 'replete with conclusory,' not factual, allegations. . . Though the Court agrees that many of the complaint's allegations are either legal conclusions or conclusory statements, the plaintiff has included sufficient factual allegations to plausibly state a failure to train claim under the single-incident theory. Specifically, the plaintiff alleges that Roselle admitted immediately after the shooting that he 'didn't know what to do,' suggesting that the municipality may not have trained its officers on the constitutional limitations of the use of deadly force. Moreover, the need for training on deadly force in scenarios such as those faced by Roselle may be 'so obvious' that the failure to do so can be inferred as deliberate indifference. Notably, the Supreme Court's single-incident hypothetical—that city policymakers know to a moral certainty that their police officers will be required to arrest fleeing felons, and therefore need to train officers in the constitutional limitations on the use of deadly force—is not all that different from the scenario presented here. Based on these allegations, the Court concludes that the plaintiff has sufficiently alleged a municipal liability claim against South Whitehall Township."); Rossi v. Town of Pelham, No. CIV. 96-139-SD, 1997 WL 816160, at *16, *17, 21 n. (D.N.H. Sept. 29, 1997) (not reported) ("This court believes that Brown has no application to the facts of this case.

Rather, Brown was intended to govern cases where the municipal policy is not itself unconstitutional, but rather is said to cause a downstream constitutional violation. . . . The heightened deliberate indifference standard enunciated by the Brown court was intended to ensure that a strong causal link existed between a municipal policy, by itself constitutional, and the underlying constitutional violation in order to preclude a pure respondeat superior theory of the municipality's liability. When, as here, the policymaker specifically directs or orders the conduct resulting in deprivation of constitutional rights, there is a straightforward causal connection between the municipal policy and the constitutional violation. The municipal policymakers in this case, the selectmen and Police Chief Rowell, directed Officer Cunha to engage in the conduct that constituted a violation of Rossi's constitutional rights. Even under the most rigorous standards of causation, the causal connection between the municipal policy and violation of Rossi's constitutional rights is plain and obvious; therefore, there is no need to inquire whether the heightened deliberate indifference standard enunciated by the Brown court is met. . . . [F]or municipal policy that is either facially unlawful or directs unlawful conduct, plaintiffs need not further establish 'deliberate indifference.'. . The 'deliberate indifference' standard is a mens rea requirement that is unnecessary and redundant when a plaintiff establishes an intentional constitutional violation caused by facially unlawful policy."); Richardson v. City of Leeds, 990 F. Supp. 1331, 1336 (N.D. Ala. 1997) (concluding that "[t]he majority in Board of Commissioners definitely intended drastically to narrow the Pembaur opening.").

Compare Sassak v. City of Park Ridge, No. 05 C 3029, 2006 WL 560579, at 3-5 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 2, 2006) ("Lake Zurich argues that plaintiffs cannot state a claim based on a failure-to-train theory because on the night McGannon arrested plaintiffs he was a Park Ridge, not a Lake Zurich, police officer. Thus, Lake Zurich continues, it had no obligation or ability to train, control or discipline McGannon, and it cannot be held responsible for actions taken by former officers who are in the employ of other police departments. . . . [E]even though no Lake Zurich police officer came into contact with plaintiffs, Lake Zurich could still face municipal liability. . . . However, under the facts alleged, plaintiffs fail to state a claim based on the alleged policies, customs and practices of failing to properly train, discipline, and control officers engaged in illegal conduct. . . . With respect to the failure-to-train allegations, any link between Lake Zurich's failure to train and McGannon's arrest of plaintiffs was severed by McGannon's subsequent employment by Park Ridge. . . . Lake Zurich and Park Ridge are distinct municipalities and it cannot be said that the policies and customs of the former motivated plaintiff when he was employed by the latter. Lake Zurich's failure to discipline and control its police officers could provide no incentives for McGannon to engage in illegal activity as a Park Ridge police officer. Further, Lake Zurich could not ratify or condone McGannon's arrest of plaintiffs. . . . In contrast, even if Lake Zurich adequately trained or disciplined its police officers, that training would not prevent an officer from committing acts of abuse when subsequently employed by another jurisdiction. . . . Unlike the first alleged policy, plaintiffs' second policy, which involved Lake Zurich's concealing of criminal conduct and providing false job references to prospective employers, states a claim upon which relief can be granted. According to plaintiffs, had Lake Zurich fired McGannon, which it allegedly had ample cause to do, instead of hiding his criminal and disciplinary record, he would not have been in a position to violate their rights as a Park Ridge police officer. As alleged, Lake Zurich's manipulation of McGannon's employment record and false statements to Park Ridge and other prospective employers is more severe than official inaction in the face of a known danger. . . . Plaintiffs have adequately alleged that the Lake Zurich defendants' policy, custom or practice of concealing its officers' criminal conduct, misrepresenting their employment records and providing knowingly false job references, caused their injuries. . . . The passing of time between the effectuating of the municipal policy and the constitutional deprivation may be so great that it severs the causal link between policy and harm, but the impact of that time presents questions of degree and fact that cannot be answered on a motion to dismiss. . . In sum, plaintiffs do state a Monell claim against Lake Zurich, but only to the extent that they allege Lake Zurich hid information about officers' known misconduct and provided positive references on behalf of those officers.") with Roach v. Schutze, No. CIV.A.7:02-CV-110-R, 2003 WL 21210445, at *3 (N.D. Tex. Mar. 21, 2003) (not reported) ("Here, the plaintiffs allege that the City of Iowa Park 'knew or should have known' that withholding information about McGuinn in accord with the [Settlement] Agreement would allow him to gain employment in the future. . . The plaintiffs allege that this constituted a policy of the City of Iowa Park and was a proximate cause of their injuries. Plaintiffs fail, however, to cite any case law in support of their position that a former employer of a police officer can be held liable for constitutional violations that allegedly occurred after the police officer resigned from that department and was hired by another law enforcement agency. At most, Plaintiffs are alleging a negligence claim against Iowa Park. Plaintiffs have not stated facts sufficient to support a claim for deliberate indifference. Moreover, McGuinn was no longer employed by Iowa Park when the Plaintiffs allege that their constitutional rights were violated; McGuinn was employed by Electra at that time.").

See also Pascocciello v. Interboro School District, No. 05-5039, 2006 WL 1284964, at *6 (E.D. Pa. May 8, 2006) ("Plaintiffs argue that Interboro clearly created a danger to Michael by concealing Friedrichs's pedophilia and aiding Friedrichs in finding a new teaching position. In the complaint, Plaintiffs allege that the Fayette County school district relied upon the 1974 and 1975 correspondence from Interboro to hire Friedrichs. That correspondence failed to disclose Friedrichs's prior pedophilia. Plaintiffs argue that, if Interboro had revealed Friedrichs's pedophilia, Friedrichs would not have been hired by the Fayette County school district, let alone any other school district. In the Court's view, the allegations in the complaint allow for the reasonable inference that Friedrichs was hired by the Fayette County school district because Interboro concealed his past pedophilia. Whether the Fayette County school district actually would have hired Friedrichs if Interboro had revealed his past pedophilia seems unlikely but it is an issue that may be pursued in discovery. Therefore, the court declines to dismiss the Due Process claim on this ground.").

8. Note on "Deliberate Indifference"

In Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825 (1994), the Supreme Court distinguished the test for "deliberate indifference" established in City of Canton from the test required for culpability under the Eighth Amendment in prison conditions cases:

> It would be hard to describe the Canton understanding of deliberate indifference, permitting liability to be premised on obviousness or constructive notice, as anything but objective. Canton's objective standard, however, is not an appropriate test for determining the liability of prison officials under the Eighth Amendment as interpreted in our cases.

Id. at 841. The Court held "that a prison official may be held liable under the Eighth Amendment for denying humane conditions of confinement only if he knows that inmates face a substantial risk of serious harm and disregards that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it." Id. at 847. See also Wade v. McDade, 106 F.4th 1251, 1264 (11th Cir. 2024) (en banc) (Jordan, J., joined by Rosenbaum, Jill Pryor, and Abudu, JJ., concurring) ("[T]oday's opinion does not concern the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference standard for municipalities under Monell v. Department of Social Services of the City of New York. . . and City of Canton v. Harris[.] . . Farmer set out the deliberate indifference standard for individuals who are sued for Eighth Amendment violations, and today's opinion does the same. In setting out the standard for individuals, the Supreme Court in Farmer explained that the deliberate indifference standard for municipal liability is objective, and then rejected the use of that standard for individuals. . . Our cases view the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference standard for municipalities as objective. [citing cases]"); George, on behalf of Bradshaw v. Beaver County, 32 F.4th 1246, 1258 n.3 (10th Cir. 2022) ("'Deliberate indifference ... is defined differently for Eighth Amendment and municipal liability purposes.'. . 'In the prison conditions context, deliberate indifference is a subjective standard requiring actual knowledge of a risk by the official' while, '[i]n the municipal liability context, deliberate indifference is an objective standard which is satisfied if the risk is so obvious that the official should have known of it.'. . We do not equate the two deliberate-indifference standards here. We note only that Plaintiff cannot show the County was deliberately indifferent (under the municipal-liability standard) in failing to train its corrections officers on preventing suicide and preparing shift-change reports. Plaintiff is therefore unable to show the County had a widespread custom or policy of failing to train on suicide prevention and shift-change reports. As a result, Plaintiff cannot rely on that policy or custom to raise a fact issue concerning whether Noel was deliberately indifferent (under the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment standard) to a substantial risk of suicide to prison inmates.")

Compare Korthals v. County of Huron, 797 F. App'x 967, ___ n.3 (6th Cir. 2020) ("It is possible that even this ordinary application of deliberate indifference might not apply to the present circumstances, given Farmer's admonition against the use of the deliberate-indifference theory in excessive force cases, asserting that 'where the decisions of prison officials are typically made in haste, under pressure, and frequently without the luxury of a second chance, [the plaintiff] must show more than indifference, deliberate or otherwise. The [plaintiff] must show that officials [acted] maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm or ... that officials [acted] with a knowing willingness that harm occur.'. . This case is not about an excessive-force incident, but an argument could be made that the challenged conduct was 'made in haste, under pressure, and [ ] without the luxury of' contemplation or a reasoned decision. Therefore, under this reasoning, the deliberate-indifference analysis might be inapt.") with Korthals v. County of Huron, 797 F. App'x 967, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) (White, J., concurring) ("I write separately because, although I agree that we must reverse as to Deputy Strozeski, I am not in complete agreement with the majority opinion. The majority suggests in footnote 3 that Farmer's deliberate indifference standard may not apply in this case in light of the Supreme Court's recognition of a more demanding malicious/sadistic/willing-harm test in Eighth Amendment excessive force claims against prison officials whose decisions 'are typically made in haste, under pressure, and frequently without the luxury of a second chance.' . . I do not agree that Deputy Strozeski's situation is comparable to that of a prison official acting in haste and under pressure. Deputy Strozeski was under no immediate pressure and had hours to consider the appropriate means of escorting Korthals into the booking area.")

Compare Vandevender v. Sass, 970 F.3d 972, 976-78 (8th Cir. 2020) ("The Supreme Court in Farmer did not address '[a]t what point a risk of inmate assault becomes sufficiently substantial for Eighth Amendment purposes.'. . Our cases both before and after Farmer have addressed the question. To establish defendants' deliberate indifference in failing to protect from assault by another inmate, Vandevender 'must show that he was faced with a pervasive risk of harm and that the prison officials failed to respond reasonably to that risk.'. . . This standard has been adopted by other circuits. . . To our knowledge, no case has held that it is an improper interpretation of the general standard in Farmer, 'substantial risk of serious harm.' Indeed, the pervasive risk standard is consistent with the Court's statement in Farmer that a failure-to-protect plaintiff must show that prison officials 'knowingly and unreasonably disregard[ed] an objectively intolerable risk of harm.'. . . Thus, an issue on this appeal is whether Vandevender's Amended Complaint plausibly alleged that he and other MCF-Rush City inmates faced a pervasive risk of harm from assaults by other inmates using the stored wooden boards as a weapon. The Amended Complaint contains no plausible allegation that Latimer's unprovoked assault on Vandevender was anything other than a single isolated incident. . . . Finally, Vandevender argues that the district court erred in dismissing his damage claims before discovery could be conducted. However, to avoid dismissal for failure to state a claim, he must plausibly allege failure to protect from a pervasive risk of serious harm as defined in our cases, for example, by alleging prior incidents where unsecured tools or implements that serve a useful purpose have been used as weapons for inmate-on-inmate assaults, or previous inmate requests for protection from the risk of inmate assaults that prison officials ignored.") with Vandevender v. Sass, 970 F.3d 972, 978-79 (8th Cir. 2020) (Kelly, J., concurring in the judgment) ("I agree that the district court properly dismissed Vandevender's complaint because he failed to sufficiently plead a deprivation of a constitutional right. I write separately, however, because I would decide the case on whether the defendant prison officials were deliberately indifferent, like the district court did, and not on whether Vandevender plausibly alleged a substantial risk of serious harm. . . . Our caselaw may set the bar too high for the typical inmate to sufficiently plead prison officials were deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of serious harm in a case like this one. But because we are bound by precedent, I concur in the court's judgment.").

See Wade v. McDade, 106 F.4th 1251, 1255, 1260-62 (11th Cir. 2024) (en banc) ("In light of the intracircuit split, we granted rehearing en banc to clarify 'the standard for establishing liability on an Eighth Amendment deliberate-indifference claim.' Having reconsidered the issue, we now repudiate our dueling 'more than' formulations and hold instead that a deliberate-indifference plaintiff must prove that the defendant acted with 'subjective recklessness as used in the criminal law,' Farmer, 511 U.S. at 839, 114 S.Ct. 1970, and that in order to do so, the plaintiff must show that the defendant was subjectively aware that his own conduct put the plaintiff at substantial risk of serious harm—with the caveat that, in any event, a defendant who 'respond[s] reasonably' to a risk, . . . even a known risk, 'cannot be found liable' under the Eighth Amendment[.] . . . [A]ccording to the allegations here, Henegar's epilepsy went untreated because the prison officials at Walker failed to procure his Dilantin—that is, because the officials misstepped. So even here, where the deliberate-indifference claim can be cast in 'inaction' terms, the relevant risk is inextricably tied to the defendants' own conduct. . . . [F]ocusing on a prison official's subjective awareness of the risk posed by his own conduct—rather than more vaguely on some allegedly preexisting risk—best squares with how courts and commentators have historically understood and explained criminal recklessness, even outside the Eighth Amendment context. . . . For all these reasons, we hold that in order to show that a defendant acted with 'subjective recklessness as used in the criminal law,'. . . a deliberate-indifference plaintiff must demonstrate that the defendant was actually aware that his own conduct caused a substantial risk of serious harm to the plaintiff. . . .So, in sum, to the question we posed to the parties, 'What is the standard for establishing liability on an Eighth Amendment deliberate-indifference claim?', we answer as follows:
1. First, of course, the plaintiff must demonstrate, as a threshold matter, that he suffered a deprivation that was, 'objectively, "sufficiently serious."'. . .
2. Second, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the defendant acted with 'subjective recklessness as used in the criminal law,'. . . and to do so he must show that the defendant was actually, subjectively aware that his own conduct caused a substantial risk of serious harm to the plaintiff—with the caveat, again, that even if the defendant 'actually knew of a substantial risk to inmate health or safety,' he 'cannot be found liable under the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause if he 'responded reasonably to the risk.'. . .We remand to the panel for application of this standard to the facts of this case."); Wade v. McDade, 106 F.4th 1251, 1263 (11th Cir. 2024) (en banc) (Jordan, J., joined by Rosenbaum, Jill Pryor, and Abudu, JJ., concurring) ("[D]efendant's subjective knowledge need not be established by direct evidence or admissions. As with knowledge in other areas of the law, subjective awareness of a substantial risk of harm can be proven (or an issue of material fact created) through circumstantial evidence."); Wade v. McDade, 106 F.4th 1251, 1266-69 (11th Cir. 2024) (en banc) (Rosenbaum, J., joined by Jill Pryor, and

Abudu, JJ., concurring) ("[W]hile I concur in today's opinion for the Court, I disagree strongly with the Newsom Concurrence. And I write separately to point out the errors and dangers in that Concurrence's theory. Section I of this Concurrence explains why the Newsom Concurrence fails to account for the nature of 'punishment' in its Eighth Amendment analysis. And Section II shows that the Newsom Concurrence improperly reads 'cruel and unusual' out of its Eighth Amendment interpretation. . . . The Newsom Concurrence says that 'punishment' requires an 'element of intentionality.'. . But the state's 'punishment' is prison, and the state very much intends prisoners to stay there. (Watch what happens when one tries to leave.) The Newsom Concurrence doesn't explain why this isn't enough intent for known life- or human-rights-threatening conditions accompanying a prison sentence to be part of the punishment. . . .The Newsom Concurrence's crabbed misunderstanding of 'punishment' is related to its other analytic error: reading 'cruel and unusual' out of the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause. The Concurrence has little to say about the 'cruel and unusual' part of the Eighth Amendment. But the phrase preceding 'punishments' is critical to its meaning, not least because 'cruel' seems a more natural place to find a scienter requirement than 'punishment.'. . .Why deliberate indifference as the standard, rather than negligence or intent? The Supreme Court has suggested that mere accidents, the products of negligence, do not result from 'the culpable state of mind necessary for the punishment to be regarded as "cruel."'. . That's because cruelty inheres in not only an action's physical effects but also its emotional content. Everyone—and maybe especially a prisoner—knows the difference between an accident and the type of deliberately indifferent conduct revealing a deep disregard for his basic wellbeing. When that disregard comes from someone who is both responsible for and in control of another's health, it can only be described as cruel. Indeed, the message sent by a prison guard who repeatedly ignores his ward's pleas for necessary medical attention is not unlike the one the torturer sends to his victim upon the rack: 'I see your pain but I don't care.'. . But this also shows why prison officials' actions need not be intentional to be cruel and unusual. Imprisonment punishes by substituting control for liberty. Ordinarily, that control is accompanied by some degree of care, including medical care. But when one's captor opts not to provide necessary and available medical care, he turns the punishment of imprisonment into a cruel one—regardless of his purpose or intent in not providing treatment. After all, what difference does it make to the prisoner whether the official who controls his wellbeing intends him to suffer or simply does not care if he does? Either way, his outcome will be the same, and there is little he can do to change it. And the prisoner will, by state mandate, remain dependent for his basic needs on someone who is at best indifferent to those needs. To impose upon someone that sort of existential uncertainty is cruel and unusual; when the state does it to a prisoner, it is cruel and unusual punishment. . . . Our justice system routinely asks lawbreakers to 'take responsibility for their actions.' But the Newsom Concurrence's view of the Eighth Amendment would allow prison officials to avoid responsibility for theirs. And by letting off the hook those who actually administer the state's punishments, this view seeks to absolve all of us—judges, legislators, citizens—of responsibility for what happens in the state-run facilities we call prisons. As today's decision reiterates, our Constitution demands more."); Wade v. McDade, 106 F.4th 1251, 1271-73 (11th Cir. 2024) (en banc) (Newsom, J., concurring) ("The unmistakable linguistic fact that the term 'punishment' entails an intentionality element would seem to preclude any legal standard that imposes Eighth Amendment liability for unintentional conduct, no matter how negligent (whether 'mere[ly]' or 'gross[ly]' so) or even criminally reckless. Negligence and recklessness, after all, are expressly defined in contradistinction to intentional conduct. . . .So on a plain reading, the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause applies only to penalties that are imposed intentionally and purposefully. . . How is it, then, that we now find ourselves grinding over which among several negligence- or recklessness-based standards should govern a particular species of Eighth Amendment claim? When and where did things go so wrong? It started innocently enough, with Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 97 S.Ct. 285, 50 L.Ed.2d 251 (1976), in which the Supreme Court minted what it dubbed (and we still call) a 'deliberate indifference' claim under the Eighth Amendment. . . . With Farmer, the retreat from the Eighth Amendment's 'punishment' requirement—and the intentionality criterion that it indicates—was complete. And our own post-Farmer decisions only widened the gap between text and doctrine. For nearly three decades, we messed around with negligence-based tests—'more than mere,' 'more than gross,' etc. Today, we have wisely—and finally—brought ourselves into compliance with Farmer's criminal-recklessness criterion. It's an important step, but we—as what the Constitution calls an 'inferior [c]ourt'—have now gone as far as we can go. If Eighth Amendment doctrine is to be brought into compliance with the Eighth Amendment's text, it'll be up to the Supreme Court. As I see it, though, there's simply no denying that, as a matter of both language and logic, the Amendment's 'punishment' requirement demands proof of intentionality. . . Maybe it makes sense to hold prison officials liable for negligently or recklessly denying inmates appropriate medical care. Maybe not. But any such liability, should we choose to recognize it, must find a home somewhere other than the Eighth Amendment. We—by which I mean the courts generally—have been ignoring that provision's text long enough. Whether we like it or not, the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause applies, as its moniker suggests, only to 'punishments.' And whether we like it or not, 'punishment[ ]' occurs only when a government official acts intentionally and with a specific purpose to discipline or deter.").

See also Wade v. McDade, 106 F.4th 1251, 1265 (11th Cir. 2024) (en banc) (Jordan, J., joined by Rosenbaum, Jill Pryor, and Abudu, JJ., concurring) ("[T]here remains an important practical point. What is one to do with our post-Farmer cases using the 'more than mere negligence'/'more than gross negligence' formulations that we now discard? Despite today's opinion, district courts and attorneys will, out of necessity, continue to turn for guidance to our deliberate indifference cases from the last 30 years. They will not be able to pretend that Eleventh Circuit jurisprudence constituted a vast Eighth Amendment lacuna during that period. For example, they will look to earlier cases to try to figure out whether a right was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. My suggestion, for whatever it might be worth, is that courts and attorneys look carefully at prior Eleventh Circuit cases to see if they are consistent with the subjective component of deliberate indifference set out in Farmer. If they are consistent, then they should continue to be cited as binding precedent. If they are not, then they probably have been abrogated to at least some degree by today's decision.")

See also Stalley v. Cumbie, 124 F.4th 1273, 1288-92 (11th Cir. 2024) (Carnes, J., concurring) ("I join the majority opinion in full. I write separately to add to what it says about why we reject our dissenting colleague's position that the defendant officers were deliberately indifferent to the medical needs of a violent inmate whom they had finally been able to subdue. Immediately after the inmate was restrained the officers rushed him in a wheelchair at a rapid pace to the prison medical treatment room in a nearby dorm where they believed he could get the best treatment. It took less than five-and-a-half minutes to get him there. . . . They were not deliberately indifferent to his medical needs, they did not violate his constitutional rights at all, and they certainly did not violate any of his clearly established constitutional rights. . . .If there were any doubt about the deliberate indifference standard being subjective, it was settled by the en banc Court only a few months ago. . . . [T]he dissent fails to honor and apply Wade's crystal-clear holding that the plaintiff must establish that the 'defendant actually knew' — actually knew — that the defendant's own acts or omissions put the plaintiff at 'substantial risk of serious harm.'. . [T]here is no evidence at all in this case that any of the officers was 'actually, subjectively aware' that rushing the prisoner to what they believed was the best medical facility to treat him was conduct that would 'cause[ ] a substantial risk of serious harm' to him. . . . The dissent is mistaken to skip so lightly over the subjective requirement. We don't get to the objective measure exception from liability of acting reasonably unless and until the plaintiff has proven that the defendant subjectively knew that there was a substantial risk that his conduct would cause harm. And the plaintiff hasn't made that showing here. He has not shown that the correctional officers, none of whom was a doctor, or nurse, or paramedic, knew they were causing Villegas a substantial risk of harm by rushing him to the medical treatment facility that they thought was best equipped to provide him with care. If a defendant did not know — actually realize and know, as we required in Wade — that his conduct would cause or threaten a substantial risk of serious harm, he was not deliberately indifferent. And if he is not liable for that reason, we have no need to reach the question of whether he would be excepted from liability anyway because he acted in an objectively reasonable way. . . In any event, in the quarter of a century since the Supreme Court's Farmer decision, it has been settled that the second element an inmate plaintiff must prove to have a valid deliberate indifference claim is that the defendant prison official or officer had 'a sufficiently culpable state of mind,' which is 'one of deliberate indifference to inmate health or safety.'. . In the period between the Farmer decision and our Wade decision, we articulated the standard for that second element, the sufficiently culpable state of mind, as being something more than negligence. . . Whether the standard was more than mere negligence or more than gross negligence our decisions did not, to put it charitably, make clear. . . But our decision in Wade mooted all of that lack of clarity by adopting the criminal recklessness standard and tossing out the negligence-based standards that had plagued our circuit law for years.")

See also Sconiers v. Lockhart, 946 F.3d 1256, 1267 (11th Cir. 2020) ("Although Boxer X's holding that 'severe or repetitive sexual abuse of a prisoner by a prison official can violate the Eighth Amendment,' remains good law, Wilkins clarified that courts cannot find excessive force claims not 'actionable' because the prisoner did not suffer 'more than de minimis injury.'. . As we had not previously announced this abrogation, the district court here understandably relied on Boxer X. For the reasons we have explained, though, we must now retire the abrogated portion of Boxer X. The lack of serious physical injury, considered in a vacuum, cannot snuff out Eighth Amendment sexual-assault claims. If Sconiers can prove to a reasonable jury's satisfaction that Lockhart sadistically and maliciously forced his finger into Sconiers's anus, Lockhart's actions violate the Eighth Amendment because they constitute severe sexual abuse of a prisoner. And to the extent that the question remains, such claims are also specifically allowed in the absence of a physical injury under the current version of the PLRA."); Sconiers v. Lockhart, 946 F.3d 1256, 1270-72 (11th Cir. 2020) (Rosenbaum, J., concurring) ("I write separately to comment further on why 'contemporary standards of decency' do not tolerate corrections officials' sexual abuse of prisoners. By 'sexual abuse,' I mean coerced sexual contact that is engaged in by a correctional official to humiliate a prisoner, to maliciously and sadistically harm a prisoner, or to sexually gratify a correctional official (or some combination of these reasons). . . As we have noted, the Supreme Court has explained that 'the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishments draws it meaning from the evolving standards of decency that mark the progress of a maturing society, and so admits of few absolute limitations.'. . As a result, contemporary standards of decency demarcate when a prisoner has satisfied the objective element of an Eighth Amendment claim. . . For this reason, we must measure claims of a correctional officer's sexual abuse of an inmate by contemporary standards of decency to ascertain whether such claims are cognizable under the Eighth Amendment's objective element. Identifying contemporary standards of decency requires us to review objective indicia of society's standards, as expressed in legislative enactments and state practice' to see whether they show a 'national consensus' against a particular type of behavior. . . As it turns out, in Crawford, . . . the Second Circuit already did much of the heavy lifting on this inquiry when it conducted a thorough survey of state legislative enactments. Rather than reinventing the wheel, we lean on the Second Circuit's state-law analysis, which we summarize here. In particular, the Second Circuit noted that, as of 2015, when it issued Crawford, state legislatures had nearly uniformly criminalized sexual contact between corrections officers and inmates—the only exceptions at that time being Oklahoma and Delaware, which criminalized only sexual intercourse or penetration, and not sexual contact broadly. . . Since then, Delaware has joined the other 48 states in the majority, leaving but a lone state that has not outlawed the type of conduct Sconiers alleges Lockhart engaged in. . . And at a federal level, in 2003, Congress unanimously passed the Prison Rape Elimination Act ("PREA"), now found at 34 U.S.C. §§ 30301, et. seq. That statute represents the first piece of federal legislation aimed at the problem of sexual abuse of prisoners. . . It seeks to 'establish a zero-tolerance standard' for such sexual abuse in prison. . . . Similarly, the PLRA, as amended in 2013, expressly declines to preclude federal civil actions by prisoners seeking damages 'for mental or emotional injury suffered while in custody' if the injury was precipitated by 'the commission of a sexual act.'. . And 'sexual act,' in turn, includes, among other things, 'the penetration, however slight, of the anal ... opening of another by a ... finger or by any object, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.'. . . So now, unlike in 2006, a federal cause of action for a correctional officer's sexual abuse of a prisoner is recognized, even in the absence of a physical injury. For good reason. Groping, fondling, or touching of an inmate's private parts—as well as a whole host of other physical sexual invasions—that do nothing other than to gratify the guard's sexual desires or to dehumanize the victim can leave no lasting external physical traces. But the internal scars of such trauma can produce 'significant distress and often lasting ... harm.'. . So physical sexual assaults by correctional officers of inmates violate the Eighth Amendment because no matter how difficult the inmate is, the official is never justified in punishing him in this manner. And sexual assault is not part of the penalty we impose for conviction of a crime.")

Compare Marbury v. Warden, 936 F.3d 1227, 1233-38 (11th Cir. 2019) ("As we explain, Marbury's deliberate-indifference claim fails because he has not demonstrated a genuine factual issue as to whether the defendants were deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of serious harm to Marbury. Since Marbury has not met his burden to show the violation of a constitutional right, we need not proceed past step one of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . . Moreover, when we have held that a generalized risk of violence from a prison population could support a claim of deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm, the plaintiff has pointed to specific features of a facility or its population rendering it particularly violent. This evidence has included pervasive staffing and logistical issues rendering prison officials unable to address near-constant violence, tensions between different subsets of a prison population, and unique risks posed by individual prisoners or groups of prisoners due to characteristics like mental illness. Even if Marbury had shown a risk of generalized prison violence, he has made no allegations regarding the specific features of the prison that would make it particularly violent. . . . While we are sensitive to Marbury's pro se status before the district court, the evidence Marbury has presented regarding a general risk of inmate-on-inmate violence does not rise to the level necessary to show deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm required by our caselaw. This sparse record at most shows that inmates at St. Clair faced some risk of assaults by fellow prisoners, but we have said that some risk of harm is insufficient. Marbury has thus failed to produce evidence that he was in an environment so beset by violence that confinement, by its nature, threatened him with the substantial risk of serious harm. . . . We must therefore decide whether a reasonable jury could find Marbury's statement that he had heard from a friend that an unnamed prisoner intended to hurt him, and that he was afraid of being hurt or killed, without any further details, sufficient to make the defendants aware of a substantial risk of serious harm. While this question is a close one, we conclude that our precedent does not allow Marbury's deliberate-indifference claim to proceed. On the one hand, it is settled that 'a prison official [cannot] escape liability for deliberate indifference by showing that ... he did not know that the complainant was especially likely to be assaulted by the specific prisoner who eventually committed the assault,' as long as the official was otherwise aware that the victim faced a substantial risk of serious harm. Our caselaw also establishes, however, that officials must possess enough details about a threat to enable them to conclude that it presents a 'strong likelihood' of injury, not a 'mere possibility.' The unfortunate reality is that 'threats between inmates are common and do not, under all circumstances, serve to impute actual knowledge of a substantial risk of harm.'. . .Marbury's argument is essentially that every prisoner who tells prison officials about an unspecified threat from an unspecified inmate without more is entitled to protective custody or a transfer. But, as already explained, our caselaw establishes a higher standard for deliberate indifference. To be clear, Marbury was not required to identify the person who was threatening him by name, or even necessarily to give the defendants advance notice of a potential attack, so long as other facts put the defendants on notice that he faced a substantial risk of serious harm. It may be possible for a general threat of inmate-on-inmate violence in a prison to bolster an otherwise insufficient unspecified threat of harm. But, as already discussed, Marbury has not shown anything close to such a substantial threat from the generally violent nature of the prison environment. And because Marbury has not presented anything else that would bolster the unspecified threat, he has not met the requirement of showing deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm. . . . To allow Marbury's deliberate-indifference claim to proceed absent sufficient evidence that the defendants were subjectively aware that he faced a substantial risk of serious harm would elide the 'subtle distinction' between deliberate indifference and mere negligence. We cannot condone the failure to investigate inmates' allegations of threats or to follow policy in reporting potential threats up the chain of command. But our caselaw does not allow these failures, without corresponding subjective awareness of a serious risk of harm, to establish deliberate indifference.") with Marbury v. Warden, 936 F.3d 1227, 1238, 1243-45, 1248-52 (11th Cir. 2019) (Rosenbaum, J., dissenting) ("We do not sentence people to be stabbed and beaten. But we might as well, if the Majority Opinion is correct. . . . [A]t bottom, Marbury alleged that stabbings were the norm at St. Clair, that the prison was understaffed, that inmates were out of control and could stab guards and even the warden, that he had been expressly threatened and had reported that threat to prison officials, and that the one prison official directly responsible for helping him specifically refused to do so and instead goaded him to get a 'shank.'. . . As the Supreme Court has explained, when prison conditions allow for violence and terror to reign, 'it [is] obviously ... irrelevant to liability that the officials could not guess beforehand precisely who would attack whom.'. . Based on this principle, we have rejected the notion that a prisoner must identify his attacker to receive protection. . . . Marbury also averred many facts that showed a prison culture of unchecked violence: consistent inmate-on-inmate stabbing attacks requiring medical attention, understaffing of guards, ineffective guarding where even guards were attacked, and no corrective response to these conditions from prison officials. These allegations are enough under our precedent to establish a serious risk of harm, so 'it [was] obviously ... irrelevant to liability that the officials could not guess beforehand precisely who would attack whom.'. . . In sum, both Estes and Warren knew that Marbury was in danger and yet did nothing to help. That was objectively not reasonable. As a result, a jury could find that they both engaged in deliberate indifference. . . . Estes and Warren thus failed to take steps that could have averted the attack on Marbury, despite their being in a position to take those steps. Under our caselaw, a jury could reasonably find from this evidence that Estes and Warren caused Marbury's injuries. . . . Because Marbury satisfied all the elements for proving a successful deliberate-indifference claim, I next consider whether qualified immunity nonetheless shields Estes and Warren from suit. . . . Here, our long-standing precedent gave Estes and Warren fair notice that their inaction was unconstitutional. In Purcell, we explained that an inmate faces a substantial risk of harm if 'serious inmate-on-inmate violence was the norm or something close to it.'. . In Lane, we found that violent prison conditions could pose a substantial risk of serious harm to an inmate, even when the complaining prisoner was not expressly threatened. . . And when a prisoner is threatened, we have held in Rodriguez that even a vague threat should be taken seriously if prison conditions corroborate the weight of that threat. . . We have also noted that regular inmate-on-inmate violence requiring medical attention creates a substantial risk of serious harm. . . And for over a decade, we have maintained the commonsense notion that 'it is an unreasonable response for an official to do nothing when confronted with prison conditions ... that pose a risk of serious physical harm to inmates.'. . Given the preexisting caselaw, it is certainly fair to say that Estes and Warren had notice that in a violent environment where stabbings were the norm, it was unreasonable to do absolutely nothing in the face of a prisoner's report that he was being targeted for attack. For this reason, qualified immunity does not protect Estes and Warren. . . . Clearly, this is not a case where the good-faith efforts of an official charged with making tough decisions turned out, in hindsight, to be insufficient. When I make all reasonable inferences for Marbury, I must conclude Warren's actions were not only reckless, they were malicious. And no reasonable prison official could have believed that maliciously refusing to protect a prisoner from a known threat comports with her Eighth Amendment duty to protect prisoners from harm. Qualified immunity was never designed to protect actions like these. So Warren is not entitled to qualified immunity on this ground as well. . . The Eighth Amendment does not allow prisons to be modern-day settings for Lord of the Flies. When a prison official knows of a substantial threat of serious harm to an inmate, she must undertake reasonable action to protect that inmate. It should go without saying that refusing to help in any way—and worse yet, laughing at the prisoner's predicament and telling him to get a 'shank'—is simply not an option. Yet by declining to allow Marbury to hold Warren and Estes responsible here, the Majority Opinion condones this behavior and ensures it will occur again. I therefore dissent.")

Compare Williams v. Hampton, 797 F.3d 276, 290-92 (5th Cir. 2015) (en banc) ("If we were to accept the plaintiffs' argument that the foregoing evidence of a history of violence and the conditions within Unit 32, generally, permits a factfinder to draw the conclusion that when Hampton failed to give the two extra pellets to Taylor as she left the exercise yard, she appreciated that there was an excessive risk of harm to inmates and knowingly disregarded that risk, then liability for acts or omissions that would otherwise constitute negligence can be imposed whenever a corrections officer at Hampton's level knows that she is working in a prison with a similar history. That is analogous to a form of strict liability for corrections officers such as Hampton, and the Eighth Amendment does not support such a theory of culpability. Imposing liability because an officer such as Hampton is aware that inmates have attacked other inmates in the past would demand near-perfect foresight from prison guards. Hampton had no means of controlling how Unit 32 was used, the classification of inmates housed there, or the general policies and procedures implemented at Unit 32. Those matters were within the hands of official beyond her pay grade. . . . We agree with the Eleventh Circuit's analysis. As in Campbell v. Sikes, since the facts and circumstances of this case do not allow an inference that Hampton actually perceived the risk, the opinion testimony by the plaintiffs' expert that she did perceive or must have perceived the risk based on those same facts and circumstances does not 'provide the missing Farmer link.'. . The record is devoid of facts to support the expert's opinion regarding subjective awareness.") with Williams v. Hampton, 797 F.3d 276, 296, 299 (5th Cir. 2015) (en banc) (Elrod, J., joined by Haynes and Higginson, JJ., concurring in the judgment) ("As reflected by the superb majority and dissenting opinions, the question of whether the record contains sufficient evidence to support a finding of deliberate indifference is a close and difficult one. In my view, this case can be resolved more easily by focusing on the issue of causation, as the evidence is insufficient to support a finding that Hampton's actions caused plaintiffs' injuries. Accordingly, I concur only in the judgment. . . . Here, the causal link between Hampton's actions and the close-in-time assaults was severed not once, but twice. Hampton's failure to provide Taylor with ammunition did not influence the inmates' or Taylor's actions in any way, and even if it did, Taylor's dropping the keys was a superseding cause. Accordingly, I would reverse the judgment of the district court.") and Williams v. Hampton, 797 F.3d 276, 299, 303-04, 306-07 (5th Cir. 2015) (en banc) (Graves, J., joined by Dennis, Southwick, and Costa, JJ., dissenting) ("The question in this case is whether there is sufficient evidence supporting the jury's verdict that prison guard Sharon Hampton was deliberately indifferent when she knowingly took multiple actions that created an obvious and substantial risk of attack and injury to the inmates she was charged with protecting. Were the majority the jury in this case, I would likely conclude that there was sufficient evidence to support its verdict. But because we are prohibited from substituting our own fact-finding for that of the jury, I would affirm the decision of the district court. . . . Here, the record is replete with evidence allowing the jury to find that leaving Taylor with insufficient ammunition created a substantial and obvious risk of inmate-on-inmate violence in the yard, and that Hampton knowingly took several actions that showed deliberate disregard of that risk. . . .Hampton argues, essentially, that the jury could not find that she was aware of a risk of harm unless an identical incident in which inmates broke out of their pens had previously occurred. But Farmer makes clear that a prison official need not anticipate the specific way an attack will unfold in order for that risk to be substantial enough to incur liability. . . .Lastly, I note that this is not a qualified immunity case. Hampton pleaded the affirmative defense of qualified immunity in her answer, but she never moved for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, she did not mention qualified immunity in her motion for judgment as a matter of law, and she made only thinly-briefed arguments regarding qualified immunity in her initial panel briefs. She did not even mention qualified immunity in her supplemental en banc brief. Thus, qualified immunity could not be grounds for reversal.").

Compare McCottrell v. White, 933 F.3d 651, 670-71 (7th Cir. 2019) ("The facts, construed in favor of the plaintiffs, support an inference that the defendants acted maliciously and sadistically rather than in good faith to restore order. If the jury found both that the brawling inmates were subdued before the shots were fired and that the defendants perceived as much, then the jury could find that by purposely discharging shotguns toward the crowd or into the ceiling (rather than toward the shot box), the defendants acted maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing harm, and did so at a time when there was no need for any force. The jury would have to focus on what the defendants could see and actually did see before they discharged their firearms. But on this record, we cannot rule out the possibility that the defendants saw that the fight was over, and that the combatants had been separated and subdued before the shots were fired. Failing to accurately depict the event in official reports and failing to aim for the very device intended to protect bystanders are facts that weigh in favor of the plaintiffs' view that the officers' actions were not a good faith effort to restore order but rather were undertaken maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm. . . A jury would not be compelled to find that the officers acted with that intent, but it could so find. . . We acknowledge that the Supreme Court called for deference to prison officials making split-second decisions during disturbances. But a jury must determine whether the shots were fired during an ongoing struggle that threatened staff and other prisoners, or after the struggle was over. . . And a jury must determine why the officers chose to fire toward the crowd or into the ceiling rather than the shot box. In short, there are significant factual disputes that affect the analysis of every one of the five Whitley factors. We may not simply credit the claims of White and Williams that they believed the shots were necessary to restore order and defer to that claim when there is evidence that appears to contradict their assertion of good faith.") with McCottrell v. White, 933 F.3d 651, 671-75 (7th Cir. 2019) (Barrett, J., dissenting) ("The guards may have acted with deliberate indifference to inmate safety by firing warning shots into the ceiling of a crowded cafeteria in the wake of the disturbance. In the context of prison discipline, however, 'deliberate indifference' is not enough. The Supreme Court has drawn a clear distinction between the standard applicable to claims challenging the conditions of confinement and the standard applicable to claims challenging the use of excessive force. . . . An inmate cannot satisfy the 'malicious and sadistic' standard without showing that a guard intended to hit or harm someone with his application of force. . . . If the plaintiffs could win by showing that the guards recklessly put them at risk by firing warning shots into the ceiling after the fight on the floor was under control, I would agree that they could survive summary judgment. But because that is not the standard, I respectfully dissent.").

Compare Petties v. Carter, 836 F.3d 722, 726, 728-31 (7th Cir. 2016) (en banc) ("We heard this case en banc to clarify when a doctor's rationale for his treatment decisions supports a triable issue as to whether that doctor acted with deliberate indifference under the Eighth Amendment. We conclude that even if a doctor denies knowing that he was exposing a plaintiff to a substantial risk of serious harm, evidence from which a reasonable jury could infer a doctor knew he was providing deficient treatment is sufficient to survive summary judgment. Because we find that Petties has produced sufficient evidence for a jury to conclude that the doctors knew the care they were providing was insufficient, we reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to the defendants. . . .[T]he Supreme Court has instructed us that a plaintiff must provide evidence that an official actually knew of and disregarded a substantial risk of harm. . . Officials can avoid liability by proving they were unaware even of an obvious risk to inmate health or safety. . . The difficulty is that except in the most egregious cases, plaintiffs generally lack direct evidence of actual knowledge. Rarely if ever will an official declare, 'I knew this would probably harm you, and I did it anyway!' Most cases turn on circumstantial evidence, often originating in a doctor's failure to conform to basic standards of care. While evidence of medical malpractice often forms the basis of a deliberate indifference claim, the Supreme Court has determined that plaintiffs must show more than mere evidence of malpractice to prove deliberate indifference. . . But blatant disregard for medical standards could support a finding of mere medical malpractice, or it could rise to the level of deliberate indifference, depending on the circumstances. And that is the question we are faced with today—how bad does an inmate's care have to be to create a reasonable inference that a doctor did not just slip up, but was aware of, and disregarded, a substantial risk of harm? We must determine what kind of evidence is adequate for a jury to draw a reasonable inference that a prison official acted with deliberate indifference. . . . . [I]t can be challenging to draw a line between an acceptable difference of opinion (especially because even admitted medical malpractice does not automatically give rise to a constitutional violation), and an action that reflects sub-minimal competence. . . and crosses the threshold into deliberate indifference. One hint of such a departure is when a doctor refuses to take instructions from a specialist. . . Another is when he or she fails to follow an existing protocol. . . . Another situation that might establish a departure from minimally competent medical judgment is where a prison official persists in a course of treatment known to be ineffective. . . .If a prison doctor chooses an 'easier and less efficacious treatment' without exercising professional judgment, such a decision can also constitute deliberate indifference. . . .Yet another type of evidence that can support an inference of deliberate indifference is an inexplicable delay in treatment which serves no penological interest. . . .To show that a delay in providing treatment is actionable under the Eighth Amendment, a plaintiff must also provide independent evidence that the delay exacerbated the injury or unnecessarily prolonged pain. . . . [R]epeatedly, we have rejected the notion that the provision of some care means the doctor provided medical treatment which meets the basic requirements of the Eighth Amendment. Rather, the context surrounding a doctor's treatment decision can sometimes override his claimed ignorance of the risks stemming from that decision. When a doctor says he did not realize his treatment decisions (or lack thereof) could cause serious harm to a plaintiff, a jury is entitled to weigh that explanation against certain clues that the doctor did know. Those context clues might include the existence of documents the doctor regularly consulted which advised against his course of treatment, evidence that the patient repeatedly complained of enduring pain with no modifications in care, inexplicable delays or departures from common medical standards, or of course, the doctor's own testimony that indicates knowledge of necessary treatment he failed to provide. While evidence of malpractice is not enough for a plaintiff to survive summary judgment on an Eighth Amendment claim, nor is a doctor's claim he did not know any better sufficient to immunize him from liability in every circumstance. Otherwise, prison doctors would get a free pass to ignore prisoners' medical needs by hiding behind the precedent that medical malpractice is not actionable under the Eighth Amendment. Prisoners are not entitled to state-of-the art medical treatment. But where evidence exists that the defendants knew better than to make the medical decisions that they did, a jury should decide whether or not the defendants were actually ignorant to risk of the harm that they caused.") with Petties v. Carter, 836 F.3d 722, 734-36 (7th Cir. 2016) (en banc) (Easterbrook, J., joined by Flaum and Kanne, JJ., dissenting) ("My colleagues take it as established that the Constitution entitled Petties to an orthopedic boot, or some other means to immobilize his foot, immediately after his injury. They remand for a trial at which a jury must determine whether the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the pain his ruptured Achilles tendon caused. This approach effectively bypasses one of the two issues that matter to any claim under the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause: first there must be a cruel and unusual punishment, and only then does it matter whether the defendant acted with the mental state necessary for liability in damages. . . A court should begin with the conduct issue and turn to mental states only if the behavior was objectively cruel and unusual. And Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97 (1976), the Supreme Court's sole decision addressing the question whether palliative medical treatment (pain relief without an effort at cure) violates the Eighth Amendment, holds that palliation suffices even if the care is woefully deficient. . . . Estelle holds that a claim of deficient medical care must proceed under state law rather than the Constitution. When the prison provides no care for a serious medical condition, that counts as cruel and unusual punishment if the physicians or other responsible actors are deliberately indifferent to the condition. . . . At least three circuits ask whether the prisoner received some treatment, rather than whether the treatment was inferior (even grossly deficient). See, e.g., Inmates of Allegheny County Jail v. Pierce, 612 F.2d 754, 762 (3d Cir. 1979); Durmer v. O'Carroll, 991 F.2d 64, 68–69 (3d Cir. 1993); Self v. Crum, 439 F.3d 1227, 1230–33 (10th Cir. 2006) (discussing other cases in the circuit); Farmer v. Moritsugu, 163 F.3d 610, 614–16 (D.C. Cir. 1998). Today's decision is incompatible with the approach of those circuits, though it has support in decisions of the Ninth Circuit. See, e.g., Snow v. McDaniel, 681 F.3d 978 (9th Cir. 2012); Hamilton v. Endell, 981 F.2d 1062, 1066–67 (9th Cir. 1992). The First Circuit may have an intra-circuit conflict. Compare Perry v. Roy, 782 F.3d 73 (1st Cir. 2015), with Feeney v. Correctional Medical Services, Inc., 464 F.3d 158 (1st Cir. 2006). Still other circuits are hard to classify. My colleagues say that prisoners are entitled to relief under the Eighth Amendment when prison physicians do not employ 'competent medical judgment'. . or 'minimally competent medical judgment'. . . . That tracks state tort law and is incompatible with Estelle. Other phrases in the opinion, such as 'professional judgment'. . . and 'reasonable medical judgment'. . . also seem to be proxies for the law of medical malpractice and equally at odds with Estelle. And if we were authorized to find a 'competent medical judgment' standard in the Constitution, why should we want to federalize the law of medical malpractice? Prisoners such as Petties have a tort remedy under state law. Carter and Obaisi were employed by Wexford rather than the state. They owe prisoners the same duties as any physician owes to private patients and are subject to the same remedies under Illinois law. . . Even physicians employed by the state are subject to the normal rules of tort law. . . . Perhaps prisoners hope that constitutional claims will produce awards of attorneys' fees under 42 U.S.C. § 1988(b), while Illinois requires plaintiffs to bear their own fees, but § 1988 is not a good reason to constitutionalize tort law. And federal law comes with complications, such as qualified immunity and the deliberate-indifference standard, missing from state law. Estelle told the courts of appeals to relegate bad-treatment situations to state law, and we should carry out its approach.")

See also Robinson v. Midland County, Texas, 80 F.4th 704, 711-12 (5th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 1010 (2024) ("Assuming the facts as alleged, 'Stickel observed Hall experiencing a critical medical crisis over the course of six and a half hours and in response made the conscious decision not to request emergency assistance for Hall unless Hall lost consciousness or stopped breathing.' We conclude that Stickel's actions were not so deliberately indifferent to Hall's need for emergency assistance that it amounts to a constitutional violation. We compare Cope v. Codgill, Allen v. Hays,and Dyer v. Houston, [footnotes omitted] each of which found a constitutional violation where an officer failed to call for emergency medical care. In Cope, an officer failed to call for medical services when a prisoner strangled himself with a phone cord until he lost consciousness directly in front of the officer's eyes. . . In Allen, an officer shot the victim five times at point-blank range, watched him crash his car into a tree, and did not call emergency medical services for six minutes, despite taking the time to call for back-up. . . In Dyer, we found a plausible constitutional violation would exist if officers 'were aware that [the prisoner], in the grip of a drug-induced psychosis, struck his head violently against the interior of [the patrol car]

over 40 times' and sustained a traumatic head injury, yet failed to alert anyone. . . We have similarly found a constitutional violation predicated on a failure to provide medical care or assistance where the officer deliberately broke with the standard course of treatment. In Alderson, a guard refused to provide prescribed antibiotics and painkillers for his broken ribs; in Easter, a nurse refused to provide an inmate's prescribed medication for heart attacks. [footnotes omitted] But Stickel's situation is distinguishable from those showings of deliberate indifference. Hall was known to have breathing problems, and Stickel knew there was a prescribed course of treatment. Stickel confirmed that Hall had access to his inhaler and was within the bounds of his prescribed breathing treatments. Stickel informed his relieving officer of Hall's situation. Stickel's actions, though regrettable, are far from the indifference shown in the above-cited cases. Plaintiffs have not plausibly pleaded deliberate indifference predicated on a delay in medical treatment. The dismissal was not in error); Howell v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., 987 F.3d 647, 660-61 (7th Cir. 2021) ("Even considering the evidence in the light most favorable to Howell, the delay of his ACL reconstruction surgery caused by the collegial review process cannot be attributed to deliberate indifference. A negligent exercise of medical judgment is not enough to show deliberate indifference. Plaintiff must show a failure to exercise medical judgment at all. . . And Howell has not shown even negligence here. It is not unusual outside of prisons for patients with painful orthopedic problems to be told to try more conservative treatment, delaying surgery until it appears that nothing less will offer effective relief. Given Dr. Koth's advice to use ACL surgery as a last resort, the Wexford doctors at worst disagreed about whether the surgery was medically appropriate. A jury could not reasonably find that this choice amounted to a failure to exercise medical judgment. . . Howell argues that the collegial review process delayed his ability to receive treatment and that this delay itself was unconstitutional. . . . The problem for Howell is factual. From the very beginning, the outside specialist (Dr. Koth) was reluctant to proceed with ACL surgery based on his medical judgment concerning Howell's limited ability to recover from the surgery while in prison. Throughout the months following Howell's meniscus surgery, Dr. Trost regularly submitted requests for outside treatment and diagnosis on Howell's behalf. The reviewing doctors regularly assessed whether it was yet medically appropriate or 'absolutely necessary' for him to receive ACL surgery, frequently advising instead that Howell continue with the recommended physical therapy. Howell's situation is distinguishable from Shields, where delay made the necessary shoulder surgery impossible and resulted in a serious and permanent impairment that could have been avoided. . . Howell ultimately did receive ACL reconstruction surgery. There is no evidence that the delay resulted in permanent impairment. Not treating pain can be an Eighth Amendment violation, of course, even if it is a matter of only minutes or hours. . . But the evidence shows beyond reasonable dispute here that decisions about how best to treat Howell's knee were based on medical judgment, primarily Dr. Koth's recommendation to proceed to ACL surgery only if and when it became 'absolutely necessary.' With that in mind, the delays caused by Wexford's collegial review process do not show deliberate indifference to Howell's medical needs."); Dyer v. Houston, 964 F.3d 374, 380-81 (5th Cir. 2020) ("The Fourteenth Amendment guarantees pretrial detainees a right 'not to have their serious medical needs met with deliberate indifference on the part of the confining officials.'. . To succeed on a deliberate-indifference claim, plaintiffs must show that (1) the official was 'aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists,' and (2) the official actually drew that inference. . . 'Deliberate indifference is an extremely high standard to meet.'. . We note that some of our cases have posited a third element—that the official 'subjectively intended that harm occur.'. . A panel of our court, however, recently wrote that it 'cannot endorse [this] analysis' because it 'depart[s] from controlling Supreme Court and Fifth Circuit law.'. . In this case, the district court invoked this additional 'subjective intent' element, but that does not affect our disposition of the motion to dismiss. As we explain, the allegations against the Paramedics would fail under the established two-part standard. . . The district court's invocation of the subjective intent element, however, does affect our disposition of the summary judgment for the Officers. . . . We agree with the district court that the Dyers' complaint fails to allege facts that plausibly show the Paramedics' deliberate indifference. The thrust of the complaint is that, after examining Graham and observing his head injury and drug-induced behavior, the Paramedics should have provided additional care—such as sending Graham to the hospital, accompanying him to jail, providing 'further assessment or monitoring,' or sedating him. At most, these are allegations that the Paramedics acted with negligence in not taking further steps to treat Graham after examining him. Our cases have consistently recognized, however, that 'deliberate indifference cannot be inferred merely from a negligent or even a grossly negligent response to a substantial risk of serious harm.'. . .Measured against these standards, we cannot say the complaint plausibly states a deliberate-indifference claim against the Paramedics. We therefore affirm the district court's dismissal of those claims."); Knight v. Grossman, 942 F.3d 336, 341-44 (7th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 233 (2020) ("The Fourteenth Amendment protects against deprivations of life, liberty, and property without due process of law. The Supreme Court has recognized that 'a competent person has a constitutionally protected liberty interest in refusing unwanted medical treatment.'. . So, too, has the Court held that prisoners retain a liberty interest in refusing forced medical treatment while incarcerated. . . From the interest in refusing unwanted treatment, some courts have inferred the existence of a corollary right—the right to receive information required to decide whether to refuse treatment. See, e.g., Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 249–50 (2d Cir. 2006); Benson v. Terhune, 304 F.3d 874, 884 (9th Cir. 2002); White v. Napoleon, 897 F.2d 103, 113 (3d Cir. 1990). On at least two occasions we have reserved judgment on the existence of this right. See Cox v. Brubaker, 558 F. App'x 677, 678–79 (7th Cir. 2014); Phillips v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., 522 F. App'x 364, 367 (7th Cir. 2013). We now join all other circuits to have considered the question in holding that prisoners have a Fourteenth Amendment right to informed consent. The right to refuse medical treatment carries with it an implied right to the information necessary to make an informed decision about whether to refuse the treatment. Without crucial information about the risks and benefits of a procedure, the right to refuse would ring hollow. Together, the right to refuse treatment and the right to information required to do so constitute a right to informed consent. . . . The Second Circuit confronted the requirements for what it termed a Fourteenth Amendment 'right to medical information' claim in its 2006 decision in Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241. . . . The court highlighted four limitations on the right. The first three limitations address what the prisoner must prove to establish a violation of his right to medical information. Two of the limitations are necessary because the logical source of the right to medical information is the right to refuse treatment, so the right to medical information exists only as far as needed to effectuate the right of refusal. . . First, the prisoner 'must show that, had he received information that was not given to him, he would have exercised his right to refuse the proposed treatment.'. . Second, '[t]he prisoner is entitled only to such information as a reasonable patient would deem necessary to make an informed decision.'. . . Third, the prisoner must prove that the defendant acted with deliberate indifference to his right to refuse medical treatment. . . Neither negligence nor gross negligence is enough to support a substantive due process claim, which must be so egregious as to 'shock the conscience.' . . . This element is the one Knight more vigorously contests, arguing that imposing a deliberate indifference requirement inappropriately 'collapses the distinct right to informed consent granted under the Fourteenth Amendment into the prohibition against deliberate indifference to a prisoner's serious medical needs provided for under the Eighth Amendment.' We disagree. Knight's position misses a key distinction, which hinges on what the defendant must be deliberately indifferent to. In an Eighth Amendment claim, the question is whether the defendant was deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's serious medical need. But here, in a Fourteenth Amendment due process claim, we ask whether the defendant was deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's right to refuse treatment. Though both require deliberate indifference, the inquiries are distinct. . . . . Knight's express position below was that he 'may well have' chosen a different treatment. Even if he had submitted that view in a sworn affidavit, which he did not, it would have fallen short: saying he may have refused treatment is not the same as saying he would have. With this failure of proof, the district court properly granted Dr. Grossman summary judgment."); Garza v. City of Donna, 922 F.3d 626, 634-35 (5th Cir. 2019) ("To establish municipal liability in an episodic-act case, a plaintiff must show '(1) that the municipal employee violated the pretrial detainee's clearly established constitutional rights with subjective deliberate indifference; and (2) that this violation resulted from a municipal policy or custom adopted and maintained with objective deliberate indifference.'. . . Our court has based its Fourteenth Amendment case law concerning pretrial detainees on the Supreme Court's Eighth Amendment precedent concerning prisoners. . .Among those borrowings is our understanding of subjective deliberate indifference. In Farmer, the Supreme Court distinguished that culpable mental state from negligence, on the one hand, and knowledge and intent, on the other . . . . The Court ultimately held that an official cannot be found liable 'unless the official knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate safety; the official must both be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and he must also draw the inference.'. . Farmer therefore provides the first two elements of the deliberate-indifference standard applied by the district court, but not its third, that there be a 'subjective intention that the harm occur.'"); S.M. v. Lincoln Cty. Missouri, 874 F.3d 581, 585 (8th Cir. 2017) ("'When the issue is qualified immunity from individual liability for failure to train or supervise, deliberate indifference is a subjective standard' that requires personal knowledge of the constitutional risk posed by inadequate supervision, the basis for our conclusion that Sheriff Krigbaum was entitled to qualified immunity in Krigbaum, . . But an objective standard of deliberate indifference applies to plaintiffs' failure-to-supervise claims against the County."); Mendiola-Martinez v. Arpaio, 836 F.3d 1239, 1248-49 & n.11 (9th Cir. 2016) ("While a claim of deliberate indifference against a prison official employs a subjective standard, Farmer, 511 U.S. at 837, we recently held that an objective standard applies to municipalities 'for the practical reason that government entities, unlike individuals, do not themselves have states of mind,' Castro, 2016 WL 4268955, at*11. . . This Castro objective standard is satisfied when 'a § 1983 plaintiff can establish that the facts available to city policymakers put them on actual or constructive notice that the particular omission [or act] is substantially certain to result in the violation of the constitutional rights of their citizens.'. . .We recognize that the reason Mendiola-Martinez must show 'deliberate indifference' here (to prove her Eighth Amendment claim under § 1983) differs from the reason 'deliberate indifference' was required in Canton (to hold a municipality liable for its failure to train police officers). . . . Although Castro relied on Canton's discussion of municipal liability under Monell, rather than an Eighth Amendment claim that requires deliberate indifference, we see no reason why the objective standard of deliberate indifference we adopted in Castro should not apply to constitutional claims against a municipality like Mendiola-Martinez's. The same 'conceptual difficulty' of searching for the 'subjective state of mind of a government entity' applies."); Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1076-78 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) ("The Supreme Court has strongly suggested that the deliberate indifference standard for municipalities is always an objective inquiry. [discussing City of Canton and comparing with Farmer] We, too, have recognized that an objective standard applies. Gibson v. County of Washoe, 290 F.3d 1175, 1195 (9th Cir. 2002). To the extent that Gibson or our other cases suggest otherwise, we now overrule those holdings. . . .The County Board of Supervisors' affirmative adoption of regulations aimed at mitigating the risk of serious injury to individuals housed in sobering cells, and a statement to the same effect in the station's manual, conclusively prove that the County knew of the risk of the very type of harm that befell Castro. . . The adoption of a regulation by the County's legislative body suffices as proof of notice because the County necessarily has knowledge of its own ordinances. We have said that 'a municipality's policies [that] explicitly acknowledge that substantial risks of serious harm exist' may demonstrate municipal knowledge of that risk for the purposes of a Fourteenth Amendment failure-to-protect claim. . . Here, the ordinance adopted by the County is a policy that explicitly acknowledges the relevant substantial risks of serious harm. Accordingly, the entity defendants had notice that their customs or policies posed a substantial risk of serious harm to persons detained in the West Hollywood sobering cell and were deliberately indifferent to that risk. Therefore, we affirm the judgment against the entity defendants."); Walton v. Dawson, 752 F.3d 1109, 1117-18 (8th Cir. 2014) ("'Deliberate indifference' is a polysemous phrase. As applied to a prison official in the Eighth Amendment context, the Supreme Court has made it clear 'deliberate indifference' requires subjective knowledge: no liability attaches 'unless the official knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate health and safety.'. . However, as applied to a municipality in the Fourteenth Amendment context, 'deliberate indifference' is purely objective: 'liability [may] be premised on obviousness or constructive notice.'. . But the Supreme Court has never specified whether 'deliberate indifference' is subjective or objective in the context of a Fourteenth Amendment claim against a municipal prison official. . .Without expressly answering this question, . . . we have used Farmer's subjective measure of deliberate indifference to evaluate Fourteenth Amendment claims by pretrial detainees against prison officials. . . We recognize the potential inconsistency this approach creates: the same claim (failure to train) by the same plaintiff (a pretrial detainee) arising under the same constitutional provision (the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment) uses the same standard (deliberate indifference) in different ways depending on whether the defendant is the municipality or its employee. Theoretically, this could make a municipality liable for a risk it should have known even if all of its employees in supervisory roles did not know of the risk and are thus not liable.Despite this theoretical concern, our repeated practice of using Farmer in the Fourteenth Amendment context has been followed too long to be reconsidered here. . . We therefore conclude Walton's failure to train and supervise claims must be judged by Farmer's subjective deliberate indifference standard. Which is to say, Walton must prove the prison officials personally knew of the constitutional risk posed by their inadequate training or supervision and proximately caused him injury by failing to take sufficient remedial action."); Cash v. County of Erie, 654 F.3d 324, 341 n.8 (2d Cir. 2011) ("We note. . .that the district court did err when it instructed the jury that Gallivan must have been subjectively aware of a risk of sexual assault to find deliberate indifference in this context. . . 'Deliberate indifference' is defined differently for purposes of proving a prison conditions claim under the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment in the first instance, and for establishing municipal liability for that violation thereafter. In the former context, deliberate indifference is a subjective standard requiring proof of actual knowledge of risk by the prison official. See, e.g., Caiozzo v. Koreman, 581 F.3d at 70-71. By contrast, for purposes of establishing municipal liability, deliberate indifference is an objective standard that is satisfied if the risk is so obvious that the official should have known of it. See Vann v. City of New York, 72 F.3d at 1049; see generally Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. at 840-42 (explaining 'deliberate indifference' standard in these different contexts). Because the jury returned a verdict in favor of Cash on the § 1983 claim notwithstanding the fact that the district court's charge on deliberate indifference held her to a higher subjective standard of proof, any error in this regard was necessarily harmless."); Thomas v. Bryant, 614 F.3d 1288, 1312, 1314-17, 1326 (11th Cir. 2010) ("In our circuit, to find deliberate indifference on the part of a prison official, a plaintiff inmate must show: (1) subjective knowledge of a risk of serious harm; (2) disregard of that risk; (3) by conduct that is more than gross negligence. . . That is, the evidence must demonstrate that 'with knowledge of the infirm conditions, [the official] knowingly or recklessly declined to take actions that would have improved the conditions.'. . A prison official's deliberate indifference is a question of fact which we review for clear error. . . . The record . . . supports the district court's finding that the Secretary of the DOC and the Warden of FSP recklessly disregarded the risk of psychological harm to inmates like McKinney. Despite repeated notice from the CMA Reports of a risk of harm to inmates with mental illness, the DOC chose not to adopt their recommendation to take into consideration an inmate's mental health history, through a pre-use-of-force mental health consultation or some other means, prior to administering chemical agents. . . In light of the apparent feasibility of adopting some type of pre-force mental health consultation, as evidenced by the Federal Bureau of Prisons' use of such a procedure, and the CMA's efforts to highlight the seriousness of the problem of the improper use of chemical agents on mentally ill inmates, the DOC's refusal to modify its non-spontaneous use-of-force policy provides support for the district court's finding of more than mere or even gross negligence on the part of the DOC. . . . In sum, we cannot conclude that the district court was clearly erroneous in finding that the record demonstrates that 'DOC officials turned a blind eye' to McKinney's mental health needs and the obvious danger that the use of chemical agents presented to his

psychological well-being. . . Turning a blind eye to such obvious danger provides ample support for the finding of the requisite recklessness. Even though there are ambiguities present in McKinney's record − his mental illness was often characterized by anger, maladjustment, and violence as opposed to psychosis, and many treating professionals found that McKinney suffered no acute impairment − an examination of his entire record demonstrates that the district court did not commit clear error in finding the defendants' deliberate indifference. Concluding that McKinney satisfied both the objective and subjective prongs of his Eighth Amendment conditions-of-confinement claim at trial, . . . we affirm the district court's declaratory judgment in his favor and turn to the defendants' challenges to the district court's permanent injunction. . . In sum, creating an additional requirement that corrections staff consult with mental health staff prior to spraying McKinney with chemical agents adds but one layer to a long list of existing prerequisites to the use of non-spontaneous force at FSP that will at most affect only a few isolated decisions over the course of McKinney's future incarceration. . . . For the foregoing reasons, we reject the defendants' arguments that the district court abused its discretion in entering the underlying injunction and uphold the district court's award of injunctive relief to McKinney."); Whitson v. Stone County Jail, 602 F.3d 920, 925, 927 (8th Cir. 2010) ("Assuming the truth of her allegations, as we must, Whitson has sufficiently stated a 'deliberate indifference' claim. . . . She claims that this rape was foreseeable: two inmates of the opposite sex were isolated and placed next to each other in the back of a dark van; there was loud music; and the officers did not adequately observe, nor were they particularly concerned about, the nefarious goings-on in the second caged compartment, which was accessible only from the rear of the vehicle. Whitson alleges that by failing to provide adequate attention to security during transfers of this nature where male and female inmates are placed in a remote compartment where the safety, security and welfare of the female inmate were not and could not be adequately maintained, the defendants were deliberately indifferent to a risk of harm to her. . . . We do not resolve the ultimate issue of whether Whitson can prevail on her § 1983 claims. We are remanding so that the district court can apply the proper test. We simply hold that, assuming the truth of plaintiff's substantiated assertions, she has sufficiently alleged a deliberate indifference claim, and the defendants' lack of knowledge that the particular attack would occur does not extinguish the legal existence of her claim. . . Because the disposition of this case was fundamentally flawed, remand is the proper course. Hand in hand with this conclusion, we likewise reverse the district court's grant of qualified immunity as it was premised on the court's ruling that there was no constitutional violation."); Gonzales v. Martinez, 403 F.3d 1179, 1187 (10th Cir. 2005) ("First, Sheriff Salazar explicitly stated his Jail Administrator did not want to investigate allegations of problems at the Jail. Second, the evidence indicates the sheriff's consistent willingness to ignore inmate complaints by attributing them to attitudes of the complainants, characterizing them as 'troublemakers' or 'conjuring up' incidents to 'discredit' his deputies,' allowed him to excuse his failure to pursue the issues any further. Finally, and most astonishing, when first advised two visibly 'upset' female inmates accused two of his jailers of sexually assaulting them, he not only left the prisoners unprotected in the jail, but also in the custody and control of the very men accused of the assaults. When the women were removed for their protection, the decision to do so was not made by Sheriff Salazar, but by the District Attorney. None of this evidence is controverted, and its significance was seemingly ignored by the district court. Finally, we are constrained to note the district court misread Farmer, believing it required Ms. Gonzales to show Sheriff Salazar specifically knew Major Bob posed a substantial risk of harm to her. Rather, the Farmer Court noted a prison official could not escape liability by showing although 'he was aware of an obvious, substantial risk to inmate safety, he did not know that the complainant was especially likely to be assaulted by the specific prisoner who eventually committed the assault. . . . The undisputed evidence of the physical assaults on inmates set against the facts of Sheriff Salazar's knowledge of reported risks to inmate health or safety, including the documented lapse of security in the control room, complaints of sexual harassment and intimidation, Dominick's demotion for, as Sergeant Zudar characterized it, 'a combination of things,' as well as the presence in the record of Ms. Tefteller's letter, which she attested was handed to Major Bob, surely raise a reasonable inference that Sheriff Salazar knew of and disregarded an excessive risk to Ms. Gonzales."); Parrish ex rel Lee v. Cleveland, 372 F.3d 294, 306, 307, 309 (4th Cir. 2004) ("In the absence of particularized evidence showing that the officers actually had training or experience with the TranZport Hood and therefore were familiar with the manner in which it fit and the uses for which it was designed, it is difficult to conclude that this particular risk was obvious to the officers. Finally, and most importantly, EMT Earl, a trained medical professional, observed the placement of Lee in the van with the spit mask over his head and expressed no concern . . . . While the EMT's presence by no means immunizes the officers from liability, the fact that a trained medical technician did not recognize the risk associated with transporting a handcuffed inebriated person wearing a spit mask strongly suggests that the risk was something less than obvious. . . .[W]e have noted that an officer's response to a perceived risk must be more than merely negligent or simply unreasonable. . . If a negligent response were sufficient to show deliberate indifference, the Supreme Court's explicit decision in Farmer to incorporate the subjective recklessness standard of culpability from the criminal law would be effectively negated.. . . . Accordingly, where the evidence shows, at most, that an officer's response to a perceived substantial risk was unreasonable under the circumstances, a claim of deliberate indifference cannot succeed. [citing cases in support and in opposition] . . . . In short, the evidence shows that the officers took precautions that they believed (albeit erroneously) were sufficient to prevent the harm that befell Lee. There simply is no evidence in the record, in the form of contemporaneous statements or otherwise, to justify an inference that the officers subjectively recognized that their precautions would prove to be inadequate."); Greene v. Bowles, 361 F.3d 290, 294 (6th Cir. 2004) ("[W]here a specific individual poses a risk to a large class of inmates, that risk can also support a finding of liability even where the particular prisoner at risk is not known in advance. . . . Greene has raised an issue of fact as to Warden Brigano's knowledge of a risk to her safety because of her status as a vulnerable inmate and because of Frezzell's status as a predatory inmate."); Taylor v. Michigan Dep't of Corrections, 69 F.3d 76, 81 (6th Cir. 1995) ("Farmer makes it clear that the correct inquiry is whether he had knowledge about the substantial risk of serious harm to a particular class of persons, not whether he knew who the particular victim turned out to be.").

But see Greene v. Bowles, 361 F.3d 290, 296, 297 (6th Cir. 2004) (Rogers, J., dissenting) ("The fact that Warden Brigano recognized the existence of certain risks attendant with the placement of certain categories of inmates in protective custody, however, does not amount to an awareness of a significant risk of harm to Greene's health or safety. The Eighth Amendment requires, instead, that a warden actually recognize a significant risk of harm arising from particular facts. While the majority properly states that, in some contexts, a particular victim, or a particular perpetrator, need not be known, general recognition of some risks is not enough. . . . The effect of the majority's opinion in this case is to impose an objective standard of deliberate indifference − a position explicitly rejected by the Supreme Court. . . Although a reasonable person may well have reached the conclusion based on this body of facts that Greene was in danger, the appropriate test is whether Warden Brigano reached the conclusion that Greene was in particular danger. Greene has clearly failed to establish a triable issue as to Warden Brigano's awareness in this case.").

See also Finn v. Warren Cnty., Ky., 768 F.3d 441, 452 n.2 (6th Cir. 2014) ("We comment briefly on another jury instruction issue that was not raised below or on appeal. The elements instruction relating to the § 1983 claim did not properly instruct the jury on the subjective component of deliberate indifference, which is equivalent to 'recklessly disregarding' the risk of harm. . . Instead, the instruction told the jury that it could find deliberate indifference if it determined that the deputy jailer 'intentionally refused or failed to take reasonable measures to address Mr. Finn's serious medical need.'. . The instruction then added that '[m]ere negligence or a lack of reasonable care on the part of the deputy jailer does not constitute deliberate indifference.'. . As written, the instruction erroneously mixed the concepts of intentional and negligent conduct without ever instructing the jury on reckless disregard."); Baker v. District of Columbia, 326 F.3d 1302, 1305, 1306, 1308 (D.C. Cir. 2003) ("On appeal, Baker . . . contends that the district court incorrectly analyzed his claim against the District of Columbia under Monell . . . . Essentially, he contends that the district court erred by confusing the 'deliberate indifference' required to find an underlying Eighth Amendment violation by the Virginia defendants, which does require subjective knowledge, with the 'deliberate indifference' required to find that the District of Columbia ignored the unconstitutional conduct of the Virginia prison officials to whom it had entrusted its prisoners, which only requires objective knowledge. He contends that under Monell he may state a claim against the District of Columbia based on a policy or custom without any analysis of the subjective state of mind of District of Columbia officials.The distinction between the two 'deliberate indifference' standards was drawn by the Supreme Court in Collins . . . . Accordingly, in considering whether a plaintiff has stated a claim for municipal liability, the district court must conduct a two-step inquiry . . . First, the court must determine whether the complaint states a claim for a predicate constitutional violation. . . Second, if so, then the court must determine whether the complaint states a claim that a custom or policy of the municipality caused the violation. . . [B]ecause the district court erred by applying a subjective standard to Baker's Monell claim and resolution of his claim against the District of Columbia may depend on additional pleadings and discovery in light of the records of the Virginia proceedings, we reverse and remand the case to the district court."); Gibson v. County of Washoe, 290 F.3d 1175, 1188 n.8 (9th Cir. 2002) ("Because the Eighth Amendment's deliberate indifference standard looks to the subjective mental state of the person charged with violating a detainee's right to medical treatment, it − somewhat confusingly − differs from the Canton deliberate indifference standard, which we also apply in this opinion. The Canton deliberate indifference standard does not 'turn upon the degree of fault (if any) that a plaintiff must show to make out an underlying claim of a constitutional violation;' instead it is used to determine when a municipality's omissions expose it to liability for the federal torts committed by its employees. . . As opposed to the Farmer standard, which does not impose liability unless a person has actual notice of conditions that pose a substantial risk of serious harm, the Canton standard assigns liability even when a municipality has constructive notice that it needs to remedy its omissions in order to avoid violations of constitutional rights."); Marsh v. Butler County, 268 F.3d 1014, 1028 (11th Cir. 2001) (en banc) ("We accept that conditions in a jail facility that allow prisoners ready access to weapons, fail to provide an ability to lock down inmates, and fail to allow for surveillance of inmates pose a substantial risk of serious harm to inmates. In addition, Plaintiffs' allegations that the County received many reports of the conditions but took no remedial measures is sufficient to allege deliberate indifference to the substantial risk of serious harm faced by inmates in the Jail."); Marsh v. Butler County, 268 F.3d 1014, 1036 n.17 (11th Cir. 2001) (en banc) ("In considering the Sheriff's potential personal liability as a policymaker, we have looked at decisions involving the liability of local governments as policymakers. The local government precedents are not directly on point. The reason is that the standard for imposing policymaker liability on a local government is more favorable to plaintiffs than is the standard for imposing policymaker liability on a Sheriff or other jail official in his personal capacity in a case like this one. [citing Farmer] Still, the local government cases can guide us by analogy; if a local government would not be liable as a policymaker a fortiori there is no personal liability."); Doe v. Washington County, 150 F.3d 920, 923 (8th Cir. 1998) (noting that "the Court has not directly addressed the question of how Monell's standard for municipal liability meshes with Farmer's requirement of subjective knowledge.").

See also Bolden v. City of Chicago, No. 17 CV 417, 2019 WL 3766104, at *13-14 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 9, 2019) ("But though there is no mental state requirement for a constitutional Brady violation, there is one for a § 1983 violation, and it is something more than negligence. . . . Other circuits have held that 'the no-fault standard of care Brady imposes on prosecutors in the criminal or habeas context has no place in a § 1983 damages action against a law enforcement official in which the plaintiff alleges a violation of due process.'. . Some courts require proof of intent or bad faith. See Owens v. Baltimore City State's Attorneys Office, 767 F.3d 379, 396 (4th Cir. 2014); Villasana v. Wilhoit, 368 F.3d 976, 980 (8th Cir. 2004). Others require only recklessness. See Tennison v. City & Cty. of San Francisco, 570 F.3d 1078, 1089 (9th Cir. 2009) ("[A] § 1983 plaintiff must show that police officers acted with deliberate indifference to or reckless disregard for an accused's rights or for the truth in withholding evidence from prosecutors."). One circuit has declined to impose a state-of-mind requirement on § 1983 plaintiffs. See Moldowan v. City of Warren, 578 F.3d 351, 386 (6th Cir. 2009). The Seventh Circuit has not directly addressed the state of mind required to sustain a § 1983 Brady claim. In Steidl, the court rejected the notion that 'police officers violate due process only if they deliberately withhold or conceal exculpatory evidence from the prosecutor.'. . It pointed instead to its decision in Jones v. City of Chicago, 856 F.2d 985, 992–93 (7th Cir. 1988), in which it said that to be personally responsible under § 1983, defendants 'must … act either knowingly or with deliberate, reckless indifference.' More recently, the court noted that '[t]he Brady constitutional standard in a criminal case applies to both willful and negligent failures to disclose exculpatory evidence. For civil claims for due-process violations, though, the general rule is that the defendant must have acted intentionally or at least recklessly,' but the court found it unnecessary to decide the required state of mind to resolve that appeal. Cairel v. Alderden, 821 F.3d 823, 832 n.2 (7th Cir. 2016). Though the Seventh Circuit has not definitively held that at least recklessness is required for a § 1983 Brady claim, Steidl and Cairel give me enough reason to believe that it would."); Sanders v. City of Chicago Heights, No. 13 C 0221, 2016 WL 2866097, at *10-11 (N.D. Ill. May 17, 2016) (" 'Deliberate indifference' is a term used in both Eighth Amendment claims and constitutional actions against municipalities. . . Specifically, 'deliberate indifference serves under the Eighth Amendment to ensure that only inflictions of punishment carry liability.'. . On the other hand, the 'term was used in the Canton case for the quite different purpose of identifying the threshold for holding a city responsible for the constitutional torts committed by its inadequately trained agents.'. . Proof of deliberate indifference in the context of a failure to train case 'can take the form of either (1) failure to provide adequate training in light of foreseeable consequences; or (2) failure to act in response to repeated complaints of constitutional violations by its officers.'. . . Construing the facts and all reasonable inferences in his favor, Sanders has presented sufficient evidence to survive summary judgment that Defendant Officers violated his right to due process when Defendants withheld material exculpatory and impeachment evidence, employed unduly suggestive identification procedures to induce Armstrong's false identification, and fabricated evidence in an effort to frame him. Sanders has also offered facts that there was a history of corruption within the Chicago Heights Police Department, as evidenced by an FBI investigation into the department during the relevant time period, putting City officials on notice of the police department's inadequate training. . . Further, Sanders provides expert evidence that the City's failure to train resulted in and fostered a widespread practice upon which a reasonable, properly instructed jury could infer that the City's conduct evinces a deliberate indifference to the rights of its citizens and was the moving force behind the deprivation of Sanders' due process rights. Because Sanders has submitted specific evidence showing that there are material factual issues for trial as to Defendant Chicago Heights' liability under Monell, the Court denies Chicago Heights' summary judgment motion."); Foy ex rel Haynie, Jr., No. 15 C 3720, 2016 WL 2770880, at *3-4 (N.D. Ill. May 12, 2016) ("Simply put, a party cannot pursue a Monell claim against an officer in his individual capacity. Thus, to the extent that Plaintiff is attempting to assert a Monell claim against the defendant officers in their individual capacities, this cause of action is not cognizable. . . . Defendants argue that even if count seven is improperly titled, '[i]t is unclear if a cause of action called "deliberate indifference" can be made against individuals.'. . The Court is uncertain if Defendants' contention is that this cause of action does not exist at all or if they are arguing that Plaintiff has failed to state a claim for deliberate indifference against the officers in their individual capacities. As discussed below, any argument that a claim for deliberate indifference does not exist ignores decades of established case law. In addition, affording Plaintiff all favorable inferences, the Court determines that Plaintiff states a claim for deliberate indifference of a serious medical need against the three officers on duty at the Harrison Police Station on the day of Haynie's death.

However, to the extent that Plaintiff is asserting a claim for failure to provide adequate medical care against the two arresting officers in their individual capacities, Plaintiff's claim fails."); Giamboi v. Prison Health Services, Inc., No. 3:11-CV-00159, 2011 WL 5322769, at *12, *13 (M.D. Pa. June 2, 2011) ("The Court in City of Canton noted that the deliberate indifference standard in the municipal liability context 'does not turn upon the degree of fault (if any) that a plaintiff must show to make out an underlying claim of a constitutional violation.'. . In other words 'the proper standard for determining when a municipality will be liable under § 1983 for constitutional wrongs does not turn on any underlying culpability test that determines when such wrongs have occurred.'. . Defendants PHS and PHS Correctional contend that the subjective recklessness standard of deliberate indifference adopted in Farmer, supra, is applicable to the plaintiff's claims against them. But the Court in Farmer indicated that it was not adopting the same deliberate indifference standard as the deliberate indifference standard set forth in City of Canton for municipal liability. . . Because it would permit liability when a municipality disregards obvious needs, the Court in Farmer described the deliberate indifference standard set forth in City of Canton as an objective standard. . . The Court in Farmer contrasted it with the subjective recklessness standard of deliberate indifference that it was adopting for an Eighth Amendment violation. Thus, contrary to the defendants' argument, the complaint does not fail to state a claim upon which relief can be granted because it does not allege that they knew that their policies or customs presented a substantial risk to the plaintiff."); Pauls v. Green, 816 F.Supp.2d 961, 974 n.6 (D. Idaho 2011) ("The deliberate-indifference standard applied here differs from the deliberate-indifference standard applied in the entity-liability context. . . For individuals, the standard is a subjective one. See Farmer, 511 U.S. at 840-41. For entities, it is an objective standard. See Canton, 489 U.S. at 389-90."); Simmons v. Bd of County Commissioners for Jackson County, No. CIV-06-79-F, 2006 WL 3611821, at *5, *6 (W.D. Okla. Dec. 11, 2006) ("The plaintiff asserts that her claims against Jackson County may be established without recourse to the second, subjective prong of the deliberate indifference test. She cites Berry v. City of Muskogee, Okl., 900 F.2d 1489, 1498 (10th Cir.1990), for the proposition that only the objective prong is relevant when a plaintiff seeks to hold a municipality liable for constitutional violations under § 1983. It appears the plaintiff may understandably confuse the deliberate indifference test set forth in Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825 (1994), for establishing Eighth Amendment (or in this instance Fourteenth Amendment) violations, and the deliberate indifference test set forth in Canton for establishing a municipality's § 1983 liability for the constitutional violations of its agents and employees. . . . The objective Canton test is only implicated in this case only to the extent that the plaintiff seeks to hold Jackson County liable for the conduct of the jail's non-policy making employees. To the extent that she is seeking to hold Jackson County liable for Sheriff Roberts' official acts, it is well established that such acts are binding upon the county. . . If a jury determines that Sheriff Roberts was responsible for policies or customs evidencing deliberate indifference to jail inmates' serious medical needs, his deliberate indifference may be attributed to Jackson County. . . The defendants' argument that the Board of County Commissioners cannot be held liable absent a showing that its members themselves acted with deliberate indifference is without merit. Before the plaintiff can establish Jackson County's liability for the official acts of Sheriff Roberts, she must first establish that Sheriff Roberts was deliberately indifferent to Ms. Biddy's serious medical needs and this requires that she satisfy not only the objective prong of the Farmer test, but also its subjective prong. As discussed above, the court concludes that the plaintiff's evidence that Sheriff Roberts maintained policies and customs subjecting inmates to unconstitutional delays of medical care and failed to train jail personnel to recognize emergency medical conditions raises genuine issues of material fact with regard to the subjective prong of the deliberate indifference test.") Because numerous material factual issues remain to be resolved by the trier of fact, including issues regarding the extent to which the jail's alleged failure to provide timely medical attention actually caused the harm suffered by Ms. Biddy, summary judgment in the plaintiff's favor must be denied."); Ginest v. Bd. of County Commissioners of Carbon County, 333 F.Supp.2d 1190, 1204 (D. Wyo. 2004) ("A difference exists, however, regarding burden of proof in those Eighth Amendment cases where, as here, the plaintiffs claim that their rights were violated due to a supervisor's failure to train subordinates. In City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989), the Supreme Court held that the 'deliberate indifference' test to determine municipal liability differs from the one applicable in individual liability cases; in municipal liability cases, there is no subjective component, and the plaintiff need only show an objective risk of injury and a failure to train. . . . In short, to win their case against Sheriff Colson, the plaintiffs need to show both an objective risk of substantial harm and subjective intent − on a par with criminal recklessness − to cause injury. To win their claim against Carbon County, however, the plaintiffs need only to show an objective risk of substantial harm and the Sheriff's failure to train staff in how to reasonably address and abate that risk."); Vinson v. Clarke County, 10 F. Supp.2d 1282, 1300 (S.D. Ala. 1998) ("As a preliminary matter, it is important to note that the court's inquiry into defendant Clarke County's alleged deliberate indifference cannot take the form of the traditional, subjective analysis as established in the governing case law. . . .Proving such subjective awareness on the part of a governmental entity is not practical, and, therefore, it is necessary to apply a more awkward objective analysis to the deliberate indifference factor. . . . . Under this objective approach to deliberate indifference, the court must consider whether the substantial risks associated with unreasonably unsafe conditions of confinement were 'so obvious' that the county's policymakers 'can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.'[citing Canton]"); Earrey v. Chickasaw County, 965 F. Supp. 870, 877 (N.D. Miss. 1997) ("The actions of governmental officials, who are fully capable of subjective deliberate indifference, serve as the basis of governmental liability for Eighth Amendment violations. While the governmental entity may only need be shown to be objectively deliberately indifferent to the known or obvious consequences of a custom or policy which does not itself violate federal law, it cannot be held liable unless the plaintiff shows that a constitutional violation has in fact occurred. In the Eighth Amendment context, in order for a violation to occur, a prison official must know 'that inmates face a substantial risk of serious harm and disregard that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it.'"); Lowrance v. Coughlin, 862 F. Supp. 1090, 1115 (S.D.N.Y. 1994) ("Adopting a subjective standard, the Court in Farmer held that a prison official may be held liable under the Eighth Amendment for acting with deliberate indifference to prisoner health or safety only if the official has actual knowledge that the prisoner faced a substantial risk of serious harm and disregards that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it. . .The Farmer Court was careful to explain that this result was not inconsistent with the objective standard applied in [City of Canton] . . . . Under the objective test, municipal liability attaches when policymakers have actual or constructive notice of the constitutional violation.").

See generally the lengthy discussion of the "deliberate indifference" standard in Paiva v. City of Reno, 939 F. Supp. 1474, 1494 n.27 (D.Nev. 1996):

> The ongoing judicial struggle to explain the concept of deliberate indifference has produced intolerable confusion, the words "reckless," "conscious," "willful," and "negligent" being defined only recursively. This infinitely regressive process, with which this court has previously expressed its exasperation, Dorris v. County of Washoe, 885 F.Supp. 1383, 1386 n. 3 (D.Nev.1995) (Reed, J.), adds nothing to our understanding of the words which are our crude attempts to convey complex and subtle ideas. [citing cases] Effective communication requires some consensus as to the meaning of the words we use. The Model Penal Code, while perhaps not the model of clarity, at least approaches a useful differentiation between the various states of mind upon which our legal system relies: To act "purposely" requires the actor to envision some objective, and to act intending to achieve that objective or accomplish some result; to act "knowingly" requires an awareness by the actor of the nature and therefore the probable consequences of her conduct, or certainty as to the result of that conduct; to act "recklessly" requires an awareness by the actor of some unacceptably grave risk of injury entailed by her conduct and a decision to proceed despite her awareness of the existence of such a risk; to act "negligently requires a normative judgment by the community that the actor should have been aware of the unacceptably grave risk entailed by her conduct. Model Penal Code's 2.02(2) (Proposed Official Draft 1962). Although at first glance the concept of "deliberate indifference" seems to embody most of the same requirements as the Model Penal Code's "recklessness," the words chosen by Mr. Justice White, writing for the Supreme Court in City of Canton v. Harris, appear explicitly to reject a requirement of subjective awareness of the risk encountered by the defendant. . . To whom must the risk be "so obvious?" By whom may it "reasonably be said" that the defendant acted recklessly, or with conscious disregard for a known risk, or with deliberate indifference to the constitutional risks encountered? This is the language of negligence, requiring proof not that the defendant actually knew of the risk, but only that she "must have been aware of it." Davis v. Macon County, 927 F.2d 1473, 1482 (9th Cir.1991). Whether denominated "deliberate indifference," "conscious disregard," "recklessness," or "gross negligence," the concept is the same: In some situations, civil rights plaintiffs will not have to show subjective awareness by the defendant of the risk encountered; it is enough if the community, as represented by a jury, determines that the defendant's failure to apprise herself of the nature and degree of the risk to be encountered was itself so unacceptable as to justify the imposition of Section 1983 liability. The Harris Court itself approved the imposition of supervisory liability where, for example, city policymakers know > to a moral certainty that their police officers will be required to arrest fleeing felons [and have] armed [their] officers with firearms. Thus, the need to train officers in the constitutional limitations on the use of deadly force ... can be said to be 'so obvious' that failure to do so could be properly characterized as 'deliberate indifference' to constitutional rights." City of Canton, Ohio v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378, 390 n. 10 (1989). There exists a sharp distinction between Harris' "constructive notice" basis for local government liability in the context of a failure to train claim and, for example, the requirement of some subjective awareness of a particular risk of constitutional injury in the context of a claim of deliberate indifference by prison officials to harm inflicted on inmates by other inmates. The Supreme Court itself recognized the distinction in Farmer v. Brennan. . . .

See also West by and through Norris v. Waymire, 114 F.3d 646, 651 (7th Cir. 1997) ("[Board of County Commissioners v.] Brown suggests as we have seen that a deliberate choice to avoid an obvious danger (or 'plainly obvious,' as the Court put it, no doubt for emphasis, 117 S. Ct. at 1392) is actionable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 if the choice results in harm to a protected interest, even though the defendant obtusely lacks actual knowledge of the danger. Granted, there may be less here than meets the eye. The difference between a 'plainly obvious' and an actually known danger − the critical difference between the criminal and tort standards of recklessness − may have little significance in practice, given the difficulty of peering into minds, especially when the 'person' whose mind would have to be plumbed is an institution rather than an individual.").

See also Pearson v. Prison Health Service, 850 F.3d 526, 535, 537-38 (3d Cir. 2017) ("Because the parties agree that Pearson's medical need was serious, this appeal requires us to resolve an issue of first impression in this Circuit. We must decide for the first time whether and when medical expert testimony may be necessary to create a triable issue on the subjective prong of a deliberate indifference case. In answering this question, three principles guide our analysis. The first is that deliberate indifference is a subjective state of mind that can, like any other form of scienter, be proven through circumstantial evidence and witness testimony. . . .The second principle is that there is a critical distinction 'between cases where the complaint alleges a complete denial of medical care and those alleging inadequate medical treatment.'. . .The third and final principle is that the mere receipt of inadequate medical care does not itself amount to deliberate indifference—the defendant must also act with the requisite state of mind when providing that inadequate care. . . . In sum, because it is just as difficult for a layperson to assess the adequacy of medical care as it is for them to assess the seriousness of a medical condition, we hold that medical expert testimony may be necessary in some adequacy of care cases when the propriety of a particular diagnosis or course of treatment would not be apparent to a layperson. Nonetheless, we disagree with the District Court's conclusion that expert testimony was necessary in this case because we are not satisfied that medical expert testimony would be necessary for all of Pearson's claims, nor are we satisfied that other forms of extrinsic proof would not have sufficed.")

9. Note on Kingsley v. Hendrickson

The Supreme Court has recently addressed the question of what standard applies to claims of excessive force brought by pretrial detainees under the Fourteenth Amendment. See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2470, 2472-73 (2015) ("The question before us is whether, to prove an excessive force claim, a pretrial detainee must show that the officers were subjectively aware that their use of force was unreasonable, or only that the officers' use of that force was objectively unreasonable. We conclude that the latter standard is the correct one. . . . In deciding whether the force deliberately used is, constitutionally speaking, 'excessive,' should courts use an objective standard only, or instead a subjective standard that takes into account a defendant's state of mind? It is with respect to this question that we hold that courts must use an objective standard. In short, we agree with the dissenting appeals court judge, the Seventh Circuit's jury instruction committee, and Kingsley, that a pretrial detainee must show only that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.").

The Court suggested a number of factors that would be relevant to the determination of reasonableness of the force used, including: "the relationship between the need for the use of force and the amount of force used; the extent of the plaintiff's injury; any effort made by the officer to temper or to limit the amount of force; the severity of the security problem at issue; the threat reasonably perceived by the officer; and whether the plaintiff was actively resisting." Id. at 2473. The majority in Kingsley defended the adoption of the objective standard as consistent with Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979), which the majority said established that "in the absence of an expressed intent to punish, a pretrial detainee can nevertheless prevail by showing that the actions are not 'rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose' or that the actions 'appear excessive in relation to that purpose.'" 135 S. Ct. at 2473.

The Court stressed that an important aspect of the objective reasonableness analysis is the "deference to policies and practices needed to maintain order and institutional security." Id. at 2474. The majority also noted that "an officer enjoys qualified immunity and is not liable for excessive force unless he has violated a 'clearly established' right, such that 'it would [have been] clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . .[and that i]t is unlikely (though theoretically possible) that a plaintiff could overcome these hurdles where an officer acted in good faith." Id. at 2474-75.

Finally, the majority "acknowledge[d] that our view that an objective standard is appropriate in the context of excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees pursuant to the Fourteenth Amendment may raise questions about the use of a subjective standard in the context of excessive force claims brought by convicted prisoners[,]" but left that issue for another case and another day. Id. at 2476. The decision was vacated and the case was remanded to the Court of Appeals for a determination of whether the erroneous jury instructions, suggesting a requirement that the jury consider the subjective reasons for the use of force, were prejudicial. Id. at 2477.

Justice Scalia, in a dissent joined by Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Thomas, concluded that "Bell makes intent to punish the focus of its due-process analysis. Objective reasonableness of the force used is nothing more than a heuristic for identifying this intent. That heuristic makes good sense for considered decisions by the detaining authority, but is much weaker in the context of excessive-force claims. Kingsley does not argue that respondents actually intended to punish him, and his reliance on Bell to infer such an intent is misplaced." *Id.*at 2478 (Scalia, J., joined by Roberts, C.J., and Thomas, J., dissenting). The dissent reminded that "[t]he Due Process Clause is not 'a font of tort law to be superimposed upon' th[e] state system[,]" and criticized the majority for its "tender-hearted desire to tortify the Fourteenth Amendment." Id. at 2479.

Justice Alito dissented on the ground that the case should have been dismissed as improvidently granted. He argued that the Court should first decide whether a pretrial detainee's claim of excessive force is governed by the Fourth Amendment. If it is, then the standard would be objective reasonableness, the Fourth Amendment would control, and no Fourteenth Amendment claim would be needed. Id. at 2479 (Alito, J., dissenting).

a. Pre-Kingsley Decisions

See Dawson v. Anderson Cnty., Tex., 769 F.3d 326, 328-30 (5th Cir. 2014) (Haynes, J., joined by Dennis and Graves, JJ., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) (Judge Dennis joins this dissent for the reasons set forth herein and for the reasons set forth in his dissent from the panel opinion. Dawson v. Anderson Cnty., 566 F. App'x 369, 371–79 (5th Cir.2013) (Dennis, J., dissenting)) ("[W]e lack clarity as to which standard should apply to determine whether the use of force was excessive in this case. When a plaintiff alleges that a government official has employed 'excessive force' in violation of the Constitution, several constitutional standards are potentially applicable (the Fourth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments). Whether a particular standard applies turns on the plaintiff's status during the relevant time period. At one end of the timing spectrum are excessive force claims arising during the initial arrest or apprehension of a free citizen, which are governed by the Fourth Amendment. . . . At the other end of the spectrum are excessive force claims arising during incarceration, after criminal prosecution is complete. A convicted inmate's excessive force claim is governed by the Eighth Amendment. . . . Between these two periods, i.e., between the time a suspect is initially arrested and then is incarcerated after being prosecuted, is pretrial detainment. The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment protects pretrial detainees from excessive force. . . Although the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment protects pretrial detainees from excessive force, we have held that excessive force claims arising during a plaintiff's pretrial detainment are also governed by the Supreme Court's test from Hudson. . . . Less clear is the person who, like Dawson, has been arrested but not yet processed for pretrial detainment. We should take this case en banc to announce clearly which of these standards applies to such a person. For its part, the majority opinion does not announce or follow any standard whatsoever. It rests, instead, on the seemingly unassailable notion that law enforcement officers are entitled to use force to obtain compliance with necessary commands. . . The problem here is that this analysis overlooks a significant factual dispute between the officers, who contend that Dawson did not comply at all (thus, she refused a 'necessary command'), and Dawson, who contends that she did comply and that the further commands to 'squat and cough' 'all night long' were issued merely for sport. . . . The Hudson test considers the subjective intent of the jailers. . . Dawson alleged that the jailers laughed at her and were verbally abusive throughout the strip search. In this regard, the majority opinion misapprehended the import of the laughing and harassing. The majority opinion stated that verbal abuse by a jailer does not give rise to a Section 1983 claim. . . While I agree that verbal abuse, alone, is not actionable, the alleged statements inform the question of whether or not the commands were legitimate or for harassment and, in turn, whether force was justified to obtain compliance. In examining the 'totality of the circumstances' and whether the commands were consistent with a need for security or simply done for sport, the alleged contemporaneous comments support a conclusion that it was the latter, not the former. The facts as alleged by Dawson—which must be taken as true at this stage (even if ultimately a jury concluded they were greatly exaggerated)-suggest a level of sadism and brutality that is totally unacceptable. The majority vote of this court not to take this case en banc should not be viewed as condoning the conduct alleged here. It is not even necessarily an endorsement of the panel majority opinion. Judges vote against a grant of en banc rehearing for a variety of reasons that can include a conclusion that the particular issue is not squarely presented by the facts of the particular case. Nonetheless, this case raises serious questions that deserve clarity from this court. I therefore respectfully dissent from the court's decision to deny rehearing en banc."); Kitchen v. Dallas Cnty., Tex., 759 F.3d 468, 477 (5th Cir. 2014) ("[W]here a pretrial detainee is allegedly the victim of a detention officer's use of excessive force, as explained in Valencia v. Wiggins, 981 F.2d 1440, 1446 (5th Cir.1993), . . . such a claim is subject to the same analysis as a convicted prisoner's claim for use of excessive force under the Eighth Amendment."); Keith v. DeKalb County, Ga., 749 F.3d 1034, 1045 n.35 (11th Cir. 2014) ("Because Cook was a pretrial detainee who had not been convicted of the crime with which he was charged, the Eighth Amendment does not apply. . . Instead, Keith's claim is properly analyzed under the Substantive Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . However, 'the due process rights of a [pretrial detainee] are at least as great as the Eighth Amendment protections available to a convicted prisoner.'. . Thus, 'the standard for providing basic human needs to those incarcerated or in detention is the same under both the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments,' Marsh v. Butler Cnty., Ala., 268 F.3d 1014, 1024 n .5 (11th Cir.2001) (en banc), and 'it makes no difference whether [Cook] was a pretrial detainee or a convicted prisoner because "the applicable standard is the same, so decisional law involving prison inmates applies equally to cases involving ... pretrial detainees."'"); Shreve v. Franklin County, Ohio, 743 F.3d 126, 133-35, 137, 138 (6th Cir. 2014) ("An excessive-force claim under the Eighth Amendment requires that the plaintiff show that force was not 'applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline,' but instead applied 'maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'. . But an excessive-force claim under the Fourteenth Amendment operates on a sliding scale. Generally, to constitute a Fourteenth Amendment violation, an official's conduct must 'shock[ ] the conscience.'. . When officials respond to 'a rapidly evolving, fluid, and dangerous predicament,'. . the Fourteenth Amendment's excessive-force standard is the same as the Eighth Amendment's. . . . The video recording in this case provides sufficient evidence for a jury to find that the situation in the cell afforded the deputies 'a reasonable opportunity to deliberate various alternatives prior to electing a course of action.'. . . But these same facts also compel the conclusion that the deputies did not act with 'deliberate indifference towards [Reed's] federally protected rights.'. . That they tried to handcuff him several times before using the Taser shows that they sought to minimize the Taser's use. The deputies also warned Reed that the Taser would hurt and that he did not want to be Tased, which showed that they were trying to avoid unnecessary harm. . . . We decline to put the onus on the deputies to assess at their risk the seriousness of Reed's seizure in order to determine whether it warranted immediate medical treatment. Their decision to use a Taser to subdue Reed before taking him to the hospital might have been unwise, but it was not unconstitutional."); Scott v. Benson, 742 F.3d 335, 339 (8th Cir. 2014) ("As a resident of CCUSO, Scott was a civilly committed individual, meaning any right to medical care arises under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Both parties argued to the district court that the deliberate indifference standard from the Eighth Amendment should govern Scott's Fourteenth Amendment claim. Relying on a non-binding case, McDonald v. Eilers, Civ. No. 88–2751, 1988 WL 131360, at *2 (E.D.Pa. Dec. 7, 1988), the district court instead analyzed Scott's claim under the professional judgment standard from Youngberg v. Romeo. . . .[W]here a patient's Fourteenth Amendment claim is for constitutionally deficient medical care, we apply the deliberate indifference standard from the Eighth Amendment. . . Accordingly, the district court should have applied the deliberate indifference standard to Scott's claim."); Bistrian v. Levi, 696 F.3d 352, 367 (3d Cir. 2012) ("The Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause, however, does not apply until an inmate has been both convicted of and sentenced for his crimes. . . Thus, an inmate awaiting sentencing must look to either the Fifth Amendment's or the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause for protection. . . We have not yet in a precedential opinion recognized that an unsentenced inmate may bring a due process-grounded failure-to-protect claim of the sort that a sentenced inmate can bring under the Eighth Amendment. But it is well established that, under the Constitution's guarantees of due process, an unsentenced inmate 'is entitled[,] at a minimum, to no less protection than a sentenced inmate is entitled to under the Eighth Amendment.'. . Therefore, Bistrian—as an inmate who at all relevant times was either not yet convicted or convicted but not yet sentenced—had a clearly established constitutional right to have prison officials protect him from inmate violence."); Burton v. Kindle, No. 10-2915, 2010 WL 4487121, at *3 (3d Cir. Nov. 10, 2010) (not published) (concluding "that a pretrial detainee presenting a failure-to-protect claim must plead that the prison official acted with deliberate indifference to the detainee's health or safety."); Porro v. Barnes, 624 F.3d 1322, 1324 (10th Cir. 2010) ("holding "that the due process guarantee is the proper doctrinal prism through which to analyze the claims of federal immigration detainees who don't challenge the lawfulness of their detention but only the force used during that detention."); Clouthier v. County of Contra Costa, 591 F.3d 1232, 1243 (9th Cir. 2010) ("The Clouthiers invite us to adapt the standard suggested by Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307 (1982), and hold that mentally ill detainees have a constitutional right to mental health care that does not substantially depart from accepted professional judgment, practice, or standards. Under such a standard, the Clouthiers could prosecute their § 1983 action without carrying the burden of showing that the individual defendants subjectively acted with deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm to Clouthier. We must decline this invitation. The cases cited by the Clouthiers considered the substantive due process rights of individuals detained by the state for the purpose of addressing issues associated with their mental incapacity; they do not address the liberty interests of pretrial detainees who are confined to ensure their presence at trial, as in Bell."); Lewis v. Downey, 581 F.3d 467, 473, 474 (7th Cir. 2009) ("In some contexts, such as claims of deliberate indifference to medical needs, the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment standards are essentially interchangeable. . . . But the distinction between the two constitutional protections assumes some importance for excessive force claims because the Due Process Clause, which prohibits all 'punishment,' affords broader protection than the Eighth Amendment's protection against only punishment that is 'cruel and unusual.'. . Although the exact contours of any additional safeguards remain undefined, . . . it is nonetheless important that we identify the appropriate source of Lewis's constitutional protection against the use of excessive force . . . . At the time of relevant events, Lewis was neither a pretrial detainee nor a sentenced prisoner. He had been found guilty in a federal court and was in a county jail awaiting sentencing and the entry of final judgment. The question is whether a person in this purgatory within our criminal justice system is cloaked with the Eighth Amendment's limited safeguards against only 'cruel and unusual' punishment or the Fourteenth Amendment's broader protections against punishment 'in any way.'. . The Supreme Court has not directly addressed whether the Eighth Amendment is applicable to pre sentencing detainees, but it has indicated that the answer is no. According to the Court, 'the State does not acquire the power to punish with which the Eighth Amendment is concerned until after it has secured a formal adjudication of guilt in accordance with due process of law.' Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651, 671 n. 40 (1977). The Court later confirmed that such a 'formal adjudication' includes both conviction and sentence. . .This would mean that Eighth Amendment rights had not yet vested in Lewis, who had not been sentenced. . . The problem is that Lewis, acting pro se, alleged violations of only the Eighth Amendment, a line of argument that his appointed counsel maintains on appeal. Further complicating the issue is that defendants have not objected to the improper basis for Lewis's action − a calculated move perhaps, given that Lewis is seeking more limited protection than he might otherwise deserve. . . As we have made clear, anything that would violate the Eighth Amendment would also violate the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Thus, we conclude that although we must evaluate Lewis's claims under what we believe is the proper basis − here, the Fourteenth Amendment − we will do so only insofar as the alleged conduct would have violated the Eighth Amendment as well; we will not consider any safeguards the Fourteenth Amendment provides beyond those it shares with the Eighth Amendment. Lewis has argued only for these more limited protections."); Butler v. Fletcher, 465 F.3d 340, 343, 344 (8th Cir. 2006) ("On appeal, relying on Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979), Butler primarily argues that the district court erred in applying the Eighth Amendment standard of deliberate indifference because, as a pretrial detainee, Butler was protected by the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of substantive due process. . . . After Bell noted the difference between Substantive Due Process and Eighth Amendment protections, we have recognized it is an open question but have repeatedly applied the deliberate indifference standard of Estelle to pretrial detainee claims that prison officials unconstitutionally ignored a serious medical need or failed to protect the detainee from a serious risk of harm. . . Later Supreme Court decisions, while not resolving the issue, are consistent with this approach. . . . . [W]e hold that deliberate indifference is the appropriate standard of culpability for all claims that prison officials failed to provide pretrial detainees with adequate food, clothing, shelter, medical care, and reasonable safety."); Hubbard v. Taylor, 399 F.3d 150, 166 (3d Cir. 2005) ("The district court then erred in concluding that 'pretrial detainees are afforded essentially the same protection as convicted prisoners and that an Eighth Amendment analysis is appropriate for determining if the conditions of confinement rise to the level of a constitutional violation.'. . . The district court's error is understandable given our discussion in Kost. There, we were discussing medical and nonmedical conditions of confinement. Although we specifically stated that the Eighth Amendment provided a floor for our due process inquiry into the medical and nonmedical issues, much of our discussion focused on whether the plaintiffs had established the 'deliberate indifference' that is the hallmark of cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. . . Moreover, we failed to cite Bell v. Wolfish which, as we have explained, distinguishes between pretrial detainees' protection from 'punishment' under the Fourteenth Amendment, and convicted inmates' protection from punishment that is 'cruel and unusual' under the Eighth Amendment. . . Nevertheless, it is clear that plaintiffs here 'are not within the ambit of the Eighth Amendment['s],' prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. . . They are not yet at a stage of the criminal process where they can be punished because they have not as yet been convicted of anything. As the Supreme Court explained in Bell, pre-trial detainees cannot be punished at all under the Due Process Clause."); Board v. Farnham, 394 F.3d 469, 478 (7th Cir. 2005) ("[W]e have found it convenient and entirely appropriate to apply the same standard to claims arising under the Fourteenth Amendment (detainees) and Eighth Amendment (convicted prisoners) 'without differentiation.'"); A.M. v. Luzerne County Juvenile Detention Center, 372 F.3d 572, 584 (3d Cir. 2004) ("Given his status as a detainee, A.M. maintains his claims must be assessed under the Fourteenth Amendment. We do not dispute that A.M.'s claims are appropriately analyzed under the Fourteenth Amendment since he was a detainee and not a convicted prisoner. However, the contours of a state's due process obligations to detainees with respect to medical care have not been defined by the Supreme Court. . . Yet, it is clear that detainees are entitled to no less protection than a convicted prisoner is entitled to under the Eighth Amendment.); Gibson v. County of Washoe, 290 F.3d 1175, 1189 n.9 (9th Cir. 2002) ("It is quite possible, therefore, that the protections provided pretrial detainees by the Fourteenth Amendment in some instances exceed those provided convicted prisoners by the Eighth Amendment."); Patten v. Nichols, 274 F.3d 829, 834 (4th Cir. 2001) ("As to denial-of-medical-care claims asserted by pre-trial detainees, whose claims arise under the Fourteenth Amendment rather than the Eighth Amendment, the Supreme Court has yet to decide what standard should govern, thus far observing only that the Fourteenth Amendment rights of pre-trial detainees 'are at least as great as the Eighth Amendment protections available to a convicted prisoner.'").

See also Ewing v. Cumberland Cnty., No. CIV. 09-5432 JBS/AMD, 2015 WL 1384374, at *13-15 (D.N.J. Mar. 25, 2015) ("The question of whether the Fifth or Eighth Amendment standard applies to a pre-trial detainee's claim of excessive force is not settled. . . Traditionally, a person who has not been convicted has 'federally protected liberty interests that are different in kind from those of sentenced inmates.'. . .Under this distinction, Plaintiff, who had just been arrested that day, should be afforded the greater constitutional protection that is offered by the Due Process Clause. . . The Court, however, must also be guided by Fuentes v. Wagner, 206 F.3d 335 (3d Cir.2000), which controls in this Circuit. In Fuentes, the plaintiff, a pretrial detainee, brought a § 1983 claim arguing that placing him in a restraint chair for eight hours after he engaged in a physical fight with correctional officers constituted excessive force. The Third Circuit held that the Eighth Amendment's cruel and unusual punishment standard, not the due process standard, governed the plaintiff's claim. . . The Court made a distinction between cases involving excessive force and those challenging a detainee's conditions of confinement, noting that excessive force claims against prison guards should be subject to the more stringent standard when those claims arise in the context of a prison disturbance. . . Many courts in this Circuit have followed Fuentes and evaluated a pre-trial detainee's claim of excessive force under the standard of cruel and unusual punishment. . . And the Third Circuit has recently examined Fuentes and affirmed the distinction between a detainee's excessive force claim and a claim challenging prison conditions. . . Plaintiff argues that Fuentes does not control in the present case because force was not used in the context of a prison riot. Plaintiff cites to Jackson v. Phelps, 575 Fed. App'x 79 (3d Cir.2014), in which the Court applied the due process standard to an excessive force claim because the detainee was 'effectively immobilized' in handcuffs, foot shackles, and a padlock, and posed no safety threat to the prison guards who beat him up. . . The Court finds Jackson instructive. There is a significant distinction between using force to quell a prison riot or to stop violence from spreading, and using force when there is no real emergency. Like the detainee in Jackson, Plaintiff was by himself when he was approached by correctional officers. Although he was not handcuffed or shackled, the threat he posed was minimized by the fact that he was unarmed and surrounded by five correctional officers. Plaintiff was also beaten in a closed room; there is little evidence to suggest that he was in danger of escaping or that Defendants were acting to prevent a disturbance from spreading. In Fuentes, the court noted that a more rigorous standard applied in the context of a prison riot, because guards in such cases must react to unpredictable, spontaneous, and rapidly changing events and cannot 'be expected to draw such precise distinctions between classes of inmates when those guards are trying to stop a prison disturbance.'. . Those concerns are absent in this case. Here, five correctional officers took an unarmed man inside a secure room for a routine strip search, before the man had even been properly admitted to the general prison population, and beat him. Nothing in the record suggests that the force used against Plaintiff arose out of a true emergency situation . . .Plaintiff was in the booking process when this violence occurred, preliminary to his being held on a disorderly persons offense, still accompanied by an officer of the arresting department. Given these particular facts, the Due Process Clause appears to be the more appropriate standard by which to evaluate Plaintiff's claim of excessive force. The Due Process Clause permits reasonable restraint upon liberty as the jail admissions process is undertaken; it does not allow infliction of punishment, excessive or not. Regardless of which standard applies, pretrial detainees 'are entitled to at least as much protection as convicted prisoners, so the protections of the Eighth Amendment would seem to establish a floor of sorts.'. . The Court believes that the Fifth Amendment standard should control in this case, but it will deny summary judgment on both Fifth and Eighth Amendment grounds because even under the Eighth Amendment's 'cruel and unusual standard,' a reasonable jury could find on the evidence presented that Defendants' use of force was imposed 'maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'").

See also Cotton v. County of Santa Barbara, 286 F. App'x 402, 2008 WL 2812581, at *3 n.1 (9th Cir. July 22, 2008) (Tallman, J., dissenting) ("The majority's citation to Graham, 490 U.S. at 399 n. 11, in an attempt to argue that officers in this case had a duty to use less force simply because Cotton was in custody is misleading. First, I cite to Whitley for the unremarkable proposition that the custodial setting raises considerations not accounted for by the Graham factors. Nothing in Graham undermines that statement. In the footnote cited by the majority, the Supreme Court explained why its endorsement of Judge Friendly's partially subjective test in Johnson v. Glick, 481 F.2d 1028 (2d Cir.1973), was limited to the Eighth Amendment context and did not extend to an excessive force analysis under the Fourth Amendment. Our court's holding that the Fourth Amendment sets the applicable standards for an excessive force claim raised by a pretrial detainee, see Gibson, 290 F.3d at 1197, does not mandate that we turn a blind eye to the volatile conditions inherent in custodial settings, particularly when dealing with a mentally ill, violent offender who refused to comply with lawful directives of the jailers. The importance of maintaining institutional security should be a significant factor we consider in determining whether the officer's actions were objectively reasonable.").

Compare Hare v. City of Corinth, 74 F.3d 633, 643 (5th Cir. 1996) (en banc) (concluding that "a state jail official's constitutional liability to pretrial detainees for episodic acts or omissions should be measured by a standard of subjective deliberate indifference as enunciated by the Supreme Court in Farmer.") with Neely v. Feinstein, 50 F.3d 1502, 1508 (9th Cir. 1995) ("[O]ur Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence has never required officials to have a subjective awareness of the risk of harm in order to be deemed 'deliberately indifferent.'"). But see L.W. v. Grubbs (L.W. II), 92 F.3d 894, 897 (9th Cir. 1996) ("While Neely can be distinguished on its facts from the present case, its language (which was not necessary to the decision) is either incorrect to the extent that it approves the gross negligence standard, or it must be limited to the claims of inmate plaintiffs injured because of a miscarriage of the 'professional judgment of a [government] hospital official' in the context of a captive plaintiff.").

Compare Cope v. Coleman County (Cope II), No. 23-10414, 2024 WL 3177781, at *1, *4-9 (5th Cir. June 26, 2024) (per curiam) (not reported) ("This is the second appeal in this case, which concerns Derrek Monroe's suicide at the Coleman County Jail in 2017. In the first appeal, we held that the individual defendants—Coleman County Sheriff Leslie Cogdill, Jail Administrator Mary Jo Brixey, and Jailer Jessie Laws—were entitled to qualified immunity. Cope v. Cogdill, 3 F.4th 198, 207 (5th Cir. 2021) ("Cope I"), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 2573 (2022). Plaintiffs now return to this court to appeal the district court's grant of summary judgment on their municipal liability claims against Coleman County. For the reasons below, the district court's judgment regarding Plaintiffs' episodic-acts-or-omissions claim is AFFIRMED, but the judgment is VACATED and REMANDED for further proceedings regarding whether Plaintiffs have raised a genuine dispute of material fact as to their conditions-of-confinement claim. . . The County argues—and the district court agreed—that Cope I concluded none of the Individual Defendants violated the Constitution, so Heller and its progeny resolve this case. . . .The problem for the County is that it misreads Cope I. In order to overcome qualified immunity, a plaintiff must show: (1) the defendant violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights, and (2) 'the right at issue was clearly established at the time of [the] defendant's alleged misconduct.'. . The Supreme Court has made clear that courts may assess only the second prong if that resolves the issue, meaning we need not reach the question of constitutionality if we conclude there has been no violation of clearly established law. . .In Cope I, we reached the question of constitutionality only on the issue of Laws's failure to call EMS. . . On every other alleged constitutional violation for each Individual Defendant, we held only that the defendant had not violated clearly established law. . . Accordingly, with the exception of Laws's failure to call EMS, we have never before decided the constitutionality of the Individual Defendants' actions in this case, which distinguishes this case from Heller and its progeny. . . The district court therefore erred in holding that Cope I was fatal to Plaintiffs' Monell claims. Nevertheless, we 'may affirm on any ground raised below and supported by the record, even if the district court did not reach it.'. . . Accordingly, we turn next to the question of whether Plaintiffs have otherwise raised a genuine dispute of material fact as to their claims. . . . When determining the appropriate standard for analyzing an alleged violation of a pretrial detainee's constitutional rights, 'we must first classify the challenge as an attack on a "condition of confinement" or as an "episodic act or omission."'. . In this case, Plaintiffs assert both theories in the alternative, so we address each in turn. . . . Plaintiffs assert that Cogdill, Brixey, and Laws violated Monroe's constitutional rights, and those violations resulted from County policy. . . Thus, the question of the County's liability under an episodic-acts-or-omissions theory turns on the subjective deliberate indifference of the same officials granted qualified immunity in Cope I . . . Under the law of the case doctrine, we generally cannot reexamine any issue of fact or law decided in Cope I. . . But, as discussed previously, Cope I did not reach the ultimate conclusion of whether the Individual Defendants violated Monroe's constitutional rights, with the exception of Laws's failure to call EMS. Plaintiffs also supplemented the record after Cope I with additional evidence regarding subjective deliberate indifference, which we must consider. . . Still, Cope I's analysis remains highly relevant. We turn to an assessment of whether any County employee exhibited subjective deliberate indifference to Monroe's safety, analyzing the actions of Cogdill, Brixey, and Laws in turn. . . . Cogdill knew that Monroe had attempted suicide on Saturday. There is also evidence that Cogdill knew about Monroe's risk of suicide based on conversations with Deputy Tucker and the MHMR crisis worker. Accordingly, we conclude that Plaintiffs have raised a fact dispute regarding Cogdill's subjective knowledge of Monroe's risk of suicide. But that does not end the inquiry. Another key question in this and the prior appeal is whether Cogdill knew about the risk that long telephone cords pose to detainees at risk of suicide. In Cope I, we concluded that the existence of the Phone Cord Memorandum, by itself, was insufficient to create a fact dispute as to Cogdill's subjective knowledge of the risk posed by the cord in Monroe's cell. . . . There is still no record evidence that Cogdill had actual knowledge of the risk of the cord in Monroe's cell. To the contrary, Cogdill testified that he did not see the Phone Cord Memorandum until after Monroe's suicide. He also testified that he never paid attention to the cord in the cell or thought that it would be a safety risk before Monroe's suicide. Nor is there evidence in the record that anyone in the Coleman County Jail had ever previously attempted suicide by strangulation with a telephone cord. . . After Cope I, Plaintiffs supplemented the record with additional evidence that they argue raises a fact dispute regarding whether Cogdill 'must have known' about the substantial risk posed by the phone cord. . . . Plaintiffs must raise a fact dispute under a heavy burden, and the new evidence, even viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, does not sufficiently demonstrate Cogdill's knowledge. . . .Nor have Plaintiffs succeeded in demonstrating that the phone cord was such an obvious risk that Cogdill must have known about it. Many of the public documents submitted by Plaintiffs highlight isolated incidents of violence involving electronic cords occurring in places far from Coleman County, Texas. A subset of the documents pertains to suicides in Texas jails, but those reports are not numerous enough or otherwise so pervasive and relevant as to show that Cogdill must have known about the risk of the phone cord in Monroe's cell. As we said in Cope I, 'just because information is available to a defendant does not mean [ ]he has been exposed to it.'. . Lastly, we cannot conclude that Cogdill's actions clearly demonstrate a wanton disregard for Monroe's safety. . . . [R]easonable responses to Monroe's risk of suicide, along with Cogdill's belief—albeit unsound—that Monroe's new cell contained no obvious ligatures, preclude a finding that Cogdill exhibited subjective deliberate indifference. . . . In Cope I, we determined that Laws's failure to call EMS violated the Constitution. . . However, we do not consider that constitutional violation here because it did not 'result[ ] from a municipal policy or custom adopted with objective deliberate indifference.'. . To the contrary, the County's Suicide Plan states that '[i]f a Suicide attempt is in progress, the correctional officer or jailer will ... call the Emergency Medical Service.' Because Laws's failure to call EMS violated County policy, it cannot serve as a basis for municipal liability. . . . We note that 'taking some reasonable precautions does not mean the officer, on the whole, behaved reasonably.'. . Nevertheless, in light of the reasonable measures Laws took to prevent Monroe's suicide and his promptness in calling for backup, we conclude that his decision to follow County policy and wait for another officer to arrive before entering Monroe's cell does not evince a wanton disregard for Monroe's safety. Moreover, Laws's failure to retrieve the breathing machine while waiting for backup can only be classified as negligence, . . . which is insufficient to support a deliberate indifference claim[.] . . Accordingly, outside of Laws's failure to call EMS, he did not demonstrate subjective deliberate indifference to Monroe's safety. . . Plaintiffs have failed to identify any constitutional violation committed by a County employee that resulted from County policy. Thus, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment on Plaintiffs' episodic claim. . . . Here, Plaintiffs argue that several unconstitutional County policies caused Monroe's death, including: (1) staffing only one jailer on nights and weekends ("Staffing Policy"); (2) instructing jailers not to enter an occupied cell alone and to wait to intervene until help arrives ("Do-Not-Enter Policy"); and (3) maintaining lengthy phone cords in jail cells ("Phone Cord Policy"). . . According to Plaintiffs, the Staffing and Do-Not-Enter Policies create conditions at the Coleman County Jail under which no at-risk detainee experiencing a medical emergency at night or over the weekend can receive immediate attention, and the Phone Cord Policy increases the likelihood of a suicidal detainee experiencing a medical emergency under such conditions. Plaintiffs thus argue that these three County policies have a 'mutually enforcing effect' resulting in the deprival of all pretrial detainees' constitutional rights to adequate medical care and protection from known suicidal tendencies. . . In other words, 'the conditions themselves constitute the harm,' Scott v. Moore, 114 F.3d 51, 53 (5th Cir. 1997) (en banc), regardless of any individual's act or omission. . . Under that theory, as in other conditions cases, the Staffing, Do-Not-Enter, and Phone Cord Policies impose 'durable restraints or impositions on inmates' lives' that transcend a single act or omission by an officer. . . Plaintiffs seek damages for the harm to a single detainee, but—in contrast to episodic claims—the alleged cause of the harm is the broader 'conditions, practices, rules, or restrictions.'. . We thus conclude that Plaintiffs properly asserted a conditions claim, and the district court should have considered it as such. . . Accordingly, we vacate and remand for the district court to consider in the first instance whether Plaintiffs have raised a genuine dispute of material fact on their conditions claim. . . . The district court erred in concluding that Cope I foreclosed Plaintiffs' claims against the County in this case. Nevertheless, for the reasons set forth herein, the district court's judgment regarding Plaintiffs' episodic-acts-or-omissions claim is AFFIRMED. However, we VACATE and REMAND the district court's judgment for further proceedings regarding whether Plaintiffs have raised a genuine dispute of material fact as to their conditions-of-confinement claim.") with Cope v. Coleman County, No. 23-10414, 2024 WL 3177781, at *9-13 (5th Cir. June 26, 2024) (per curiam) (not reported) (Smith, J., dissenting) ("The majority correctly affirms the summary judgment for plaintiffs' 'episodic act or omission' claims. But it commits egregious error in vacating the summary judgment on the so-called 'conditions-of-confinement' claim. That claim, as a matter of law, does not exist, and the summary judgment should be affirmed in full. I respectfully dissent. Derrek Monroe attempted suicide by strangulation and died after jailers failed to render timely emergency assistance. Given those facts, plaintiffs' Monell claim can be classified as nothing other than an attack on 'episodic acts or omissions.'. . . Under the majority's new rule, a conditions claim can rest on any policy that merely 'imposes durable restraints or impositions on inmates' lives that transcend a single act or omission.'. . Events are characterized based on the alleged 'focus of the claim'—i.e., per its theory, a claim is episodic if the allegations 'focus' on 'one individual's misconduct.'. . That is grave error. . . . None of the three policies identified in the complaint—in isolation or combination—was sufficient to cause Monroe's harm by virtue of its 'very promulgation and maintenance. . . . In Cope I, this court considered plaintiffs' episodic claims alleging the exact same harm before us now. Cope I held, under an episodic-acts theory of liability, that such harm was the result of Laws's failing timely "to call for emergency assistance [for] a detainee ... suffering from a suicide attempt." The upshot is blissfully ironic. Under the majority's reasoning, Cope I's holding—which is binding on this panel as law of the case—would foreclose the possibility of plaintiffs' conditions-of-confinement claim. . . . The destruction that is sown by the majority extends well beyond the facts of this case. Its reasoning effectively eliminates the objective deliberate-indifference requirement for episodic claims. . . . Under the majority's newly-announced rule, claimants are but one artful pleading away from recasting their episodic claims into ones challenging conditions of confinement. The majority has therefore granted claimants, armed with nothing but their own ipse dixit, the benefit of presuming that the governmental body intended any and all harms caused by any and all of its employees' episodic acts and omissions. That is plainly impermissible, as it holds municipalities liable for the constitutional violations of its employees absent any showing of its acting with 'objective deliberate indifference to the detainee's constitutional rights.'. . . In sum, the majority has gone out of its way to keep on life-support plaintiffs' supposed conditions-of-confinement claim—notwithstanding its obvious lack of merit. Worse, the majority disposes of longstanding and well-established Fifth Circuit precedent and runs amok on the rule of orderliness. Worse still, it leaves us with an inscrutably vague rule that holds governmental entities liable for the subjective deliberate indifference of its employees. I respectfully dissent.")

See also Estate of Henson v. Wichita Cnty., Tex., 795 F.3d 456, 463-70 (5th Cir. 2015) ("When a plaintiff is challenging a condition of confinement, this court applies the test established by the Supreme Court in Bell v. Wolfish, and asks whether the condition is 'reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective.'. . .An episodic-acts-or-omissions claim, by contrast, 'faults specific jail officials for their acts or omissions.'. . In such a case, an actor is 'interposed between the detainee and the municipality, such that the detainee complains first of a particular act of, or omission by, the actor and then points derivatively to a policy, custom, or rule (or lack thereof) of the municipality that permitted or caused the act or omission.'. . The relevant question becomes 'whether that official breached his constitutional duty to tend to the basic human needs of persons in his charge,' and intentionality is no longer presumed. . . A jail official violates a pretrial detainee's constitutional right to be secure in his basic human needs only when the official had 'subjective knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm' to the detainee and responded to that risk with deliberate indifference. . . In other words, the state official must know of and disregard an excessive risk to inmate health or safety. . . .[W]e find that as to Dr. Bolin, Plaintiffs challenged only episodic acts and omissions by him and the nurses that he supervised, rather than conditions of Henson's confinement. Because Plaintiffs on appeal have abandoned a theory of liability against Dr. Bolin based on episodic acts or omissions, no viable claims are left against him. . . .Because Plaintiffs did not assert a conditions-of-confinement claim against Dr. Bolin, and because, even if they had, such claim would fail, we find that Dr. Bolin is entitled to summary judgment and the district court's order is affirmed with respect to Plaintiffs' claims against him. . . .To assess Plaintiffs' conditions-of-confinement claim against Wichita County, we apply the test established by the Supreme Court in Bell v. Wolfish. . . .With the goal of the Bell test—to identify conditions that amount to punishment—in mind, we turn to the conditions that Plaintiffs have challenged in the present case. In order to succeed on their conditions-of-confinement claim against Wichita County, Plaintiffs need to show: (1) 'a rule or restriction or ... the existence of an identifiable intended condition or practice ... [or] that the jail official's acts or omissions were sufficiently extended or pervasive'; (2) which was not reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective; and (3) which caused the violation of [the inmate's] constitutional rights. . . .Our court does not downplay the tragic death of Wilbert Henson, . . .however, 'the inquiry of federal courts into prison management must be limited to the issue of whether a particular system violates any prohibition of the Constitution.'. . Plaintiffs' evidence falls short of proving that the Wichita County jail's medical system and staffing policies amounted to punishment, in violation of Henson's constitutional rights."); Anderson v. Dallas County Texas, 286 F. App'x 850, 2008 WL 2645657, at 8-10, *12 (5th Cir. 2008) ("The plaintiffs admit that the defendant had policies in place that, if followed, would have prevented Baines's suicide. Fundamentally, the plaintiffs assert that Baines would not have been able to commit suicide if suicide precautions had been enacted in accordance with Jail policy. The plaintiffs ultimately take issue with the DSOs' and physician assistants' failure to follow those policies and procedures. This is a classic episodic-act-or-omission case. . . . Because the plaintiffs cannot prove that Baines was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment without first proving that a state actor deprived him of his constitutional rights, the plaintiffs' case is an episodic-act-or-omission case [not a conditions of confinement case]. To establish county liability for a failure to protect under an episodic-act-or-omission theory, a plaintiff must show that: (1) a county employee violated his clearly established constitutional rights with subjective deliberate indifference; and (2) the violation resulted from a county policy or custom adopted or maintained with objective deliberate indifference. . . . If a plaintiff is unable to show that a county employee acted with subjective deliberate indifference, the county cannot be held liable for an episodic act or omission. . . Even if an officer acted with subjective deliberate indifference, however, the plaintiff must still show that the county employee's act resulted from a county policy adopted or maintained with objective deliberate indifference to the inmate's rights. . . .The failure to fully staff the Jail, even if true, cannot be said to be the reason CPR was not performed because the undisputed facts show that medical officials promptly responded to the discovery of Baines. The only theory that might be connected is the failure to train adequately Jail officials, but there is no evidence in the record indicating that Jail officials failed to perform CPR due to inadequate training. Nor is there evidence in the record that the defendant should have known that its training inadequately instructed its employees either how or when to perform CPR on inmates.").

See also Serna v. Goodno, 567 F.3d 944, 949 (8th Cir. 2009) ("[W]e can discern no justification for treating a Fourth Amendment claim based upon a search differently than a claim based upon a seizure. Thus, Andrews [see infra], which addresses a seizure claim, articulates the appropriate standard for considering whether an involuntarily committed person has been subjected to an unconstitutional search."); Richman v. Sheahan, 512 F.3d 876, 882, 883 (7th Cir. 2008) ("But can a Fourth Amendment and an Eighth Amendment claim of excessive force be raised in the same case? Often no. If you are beaten to a pulp before you are convicted, your remedy is under the Fourth Amendment; after, under the Eighth Amendment. But when as in this case it is uncertain whether the act complained of is punishment, deciding which remedy is available must wait upon the determination of the facts. If the officers were removing Jack Richman from the courtroom because he refused to leave under his own steam, the Fourth Amendment governs; if they were punishing him for his contempt of court (an inference for which there is some evidence, as we have just seen), the Eighth."); Wever v. Lincoln County, Nebraska, 388 F.3d 601, 606 n.6 (8th Cir. 2004) ("While Yellow Horse involved an Eighth Amendment claim, it is well established that pretrial detainees such as Wever are 'accorded the due process protections of the Fourteenth Amendment, protections Aat least as great' as those the Eighth Amendment affords a convicted prisoner.' Boswell v. Sherburne County, 849 F.2d 1117, 1121 (8th Cir.1988). We have previously suggested that the burden of showing a constitutional violation is lighter for a pretrial detainee under the Fourteenth Amendment than for a post-conviction prisoner under the Eighth Amendment. Smith v. Copeland,87 F.3d 265, 268 n. 4 (8th Cir.1996)."); Oregon Advocacy Center v. Mink, 322 F.3d 1101, 1121 (9th Cir.2003) (holding that "the substantive due process rights of incapacitated criminal defendants are not governed solely by the deliberate indifference standard"); Patten v. Nichols, 274 F.3d 829, 841, 842 (4th Cir. 2001) ("[E]ven though pre-trial detainees and involuntarily committed patients both look to the Fourteenth Amendment for protection and neither group may be punished (in the Eighth Amendment sense), it can hardly be said that the groups are similarly situated. The differences in the purposes for which the groups are confined and the nature of the confinement itself are more than enough to warrant treating their denial-of-medical-care claims under different standards . . . . We therefore conclude that denial-of-medical-care claims asserted by involuntarily committed psychiatric patients must be measured under Youngberg's 'professional judgment' standard."); Davis v. Rennie, 264 F.3d 86, 99, 100, 108 (1st Cir. 2001) ("[T]here is precedent for subjecting the conduct of a mental health worker to a more exacting standard than that of a prison guard controlling a riot or a police officer chasing a fleeing car. . . . Davis was in the state's custody because of mental illness, not culpable conduct, and the trial court's decision to reject the "shocks the conscience" standard is consistent with this distinction. [citing Andrews v. Neer] We agree . . . with the Eighth Circuit that the usual standard for an excessive force claim brought by an involuntarily committed mental patient is whether the force used was 'objectively reasonable' under all the circumstances."); Andrews v. Neer, 253 F.3d 1052, 1060, 1061 (8th Cir. 2001) ("This Circuit has not addressed the constitutional standard applicable to § 1983 excessive-force claims in the context of involuntarily committed state hospital patients. In other situations in which excessive force is alleged by a person in custody, the constitutional standard applied may vary depending upon whether the victim is an arrestee, a pretrial detainee, or a convicted inmate of a penal institution. If the victim is an arrestee, the Fourth Amendment's 'objective reasonableness' standard controls.. . . The evaluation of excessive-force claims brought by pre-trial detainees, although grounded in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments rather than the Fourth Amendment, also relies on an objective reasonableness standard. . . .Excessive-force claims brought by prisoners fall under the protections provided by the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment. . . . Andrews's excessive force claim does not fit neatly into an analysis based on status as an arrestee, a pre-trial detainee, or a prisoner. Bobby Andrews was held in Fulton after having been found not guilty of murder by reason of insanity, and thus he was not a 'prisoner' subject to punishment. . .The Eighth Amendment excessive-force standard provides too little protection to a person whom the state is not allowed to punish. On the other hand, the state of Missouri was entitled to hold Bobby Andrews in custody. His confinement in a state institution raised concerns similar to those raised by the housing of pretrial detainees, such as the legitimate institutional interest in the safety and security of guards and other individuals in the facility, order within the facility, and the efficiency of the facility's operations. . . Accordingly, we conclude that Andrews's excessive-force claim should be evaluated under the objective reasonableness standard usually applied to excessive-force claims brought by pretrial detainees. "); Fuentes v. Wagner, 206 F.3d 335, 347, 348 (3d Cir. 2000) ("[W]e hold that the Eighth Amendment cruel and unusual punishments standards found in Whitley v. Albers . . . and Hudson v. McMillian . . . apply to a pretrial detainee's excessive force claim arising in the context of a prison disturbance. We can draw no logical or practical distinction between a prison disturbance involving pretrial detainees, convicted but unsentenced inmates, or sentenced inmates. Nor can prison guards be expected to draw such precise distinctions between classes of inmates when those guards are trying to stop a prison disturbance."); United States v. Walsh, 194 F.3d 37, 48 (2d Cir. 1999) ("Because all excessive force claims in the prison context are qualified, . . . we conclude that the Hudson analysis is applicable to excessive force claims brought under the Fourteenth Amendment as well."); Tesch v. County of Green Lake, 157 F.3d 465, 474 (7th Cir. 1998) ("[T]he Supreme Court and this Court have applied the Bell test to analyze constitutional attacks on the general practices, rules, and restrictions of pretrial confinement. . . . However, a second line of cases exists which establishes a different state of mind standard from the Bell test when the State denies a pretrial detainee his basic human necessities. Since Archie v. City of Racine, 847 F.2d 1211, 1218-19 (7th Cir.1988) (en banc), we have required plaintiffs to establish that officials acted intentionally or in a criminally reckless manner in order to sustain a substantive due process claim for their specific acts or failures to act. Under the alternative description 'deliberate indifference,' we have required plaintiffs to establish that a jail official acted with this level of intent in relation to a pretrial detainee's need for medical care, . . . risk of suicide, . . . risk of harm from other inmates, . . . and need for food and shelter."); Scott v. Moore, 114 F.3d 51, 53-55 (5th Cir. 1997) (en banc) ("In an 'episodic act or omission' case, an actor usually is interposed between the detainee and the municipality, such that the detainee complains first of a particular act of, or omission by, the actor and then points derivatively to a policy, custom, or rule (or lack thereof) of the municipality that permitted or caused the act or omission. Although, in her amended state petition, Scott complains generally of inadequate staffing, . . . the actual harm of which she complains is the sexual assaults committed by Moore during the one eight-hour shift − an episodic event perpetrated by an actor interposed between Scott and the city, but allegedly caused or permitted by the aforesaid general conditions. . . . [A]s to the discrete, episodic act, the detainee must establish only that the constitutional violation complained of was done with subjective deliberate indifference to that detainee's constitutional rights. . . In the instant case, Scott has met that burden. Accordingly, we next must determine whether the city may be held accountable for that violation. Under Hare, as we have stated, this latter burden may be met by putting forth facts sufficient to demonstrate that the predicate episodic act or omission resulted from a municipal custom, rule, or policy adopted or maintained with objective deliberate indifference to the detainee's constitutional rights. . . . At best, the evidence proffered by Scott may be construed to suggest that the jail could have been managed better, or that the city lacked sufficient prescience to anticipate that a well-trained jailer would, without warning, assault a female detainee. In either event, they do not reflect objective deliberate indifference to Scott's constitutional rights."); Rushing v. Simpson, No. 4:08CV1338 CDP, 2009 WL 4825196, at 5-7 (E.D. Mo. Dec. 11, 2009) ("The evaluation of excessive force claims brought by pre-trial detainees also relies upon the objective reasonableness standard. Andrews, 253 F.3d at 1060. Rushing is neither an arrestee, pre-trial detainee, nor prisoner. As a detainee at MSOTC, awaiting a determination of whether he is a sexually violent predator under Missouri law, Rushing stands in a different position. In Andrews, the Eighth Circuit determined that claims of excessive force brought by involuntarily committed state mental patients should be analyzed under the 'objective reasonableness' standard typically applied to pretrial detainees. . . I have previously held that a person involuntarily confined because there is probable cause to believe he is a sexually violent predator stands before the law in much the same way as a person involuntarily confined because there is reason to believe that he has committed a crime. . . Thus, the rights of pretrial detainees serve as a guide to determining the rights of a civil detainee such as Rushing. Because Rushing was a detainee at MSOTC, his allegations of excessive use of force are analyzed under the 'objective reasonableness' standard of the Fourth Amendment, rather than the Eighth Amendment. Under this standard, the use of force must be necessary to achieve a legitimate institutional interest, such as safety, security, or efficiency. . . The amount of force used must not be in excess of that reasonably believed necessary to achieve those goals. . . The relevant inquiry is whether the officials behaved in a reasonable way in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them. . . . Two recent Eighth Circuit cases have held that the opportunity to comply with an order is a key moment in Fourth Amendment excessive force analysis. . . . Refusal to comply with an officer's orders, when given an opportunity to do so, makes the officer's use of force more reasonable. . . Here, Rushing refused to comply with defendants' orders to return to the dining hall for seven minutes."); Clarke v. Blais, Civil No. 05-177-P-H, 2006 WL 3691478, at *7 & n.7 (D. Me. Dec. 12, 2006) ("Assuming the objective reasonableness standard [footnote omitted] of the Supreme Court precedent extends to claims involving the use of force to control a perceived threat or an outburst by a pretrial detainee, at least where the disturbance is limited to conduct on the part of the pretrial detainee acting alone and not part of a general prison riot, I conclude Clarke has not presented sufficient evidence to survive summary judgment. . . . This approach has not been universally adopted by the circuit courts of appeals, at least three of which have imposed the malicious and sadistic standard to claims of excessive force brought by pretrial detainees where the force was used to suppress a 'disturbance.'[citing cases from 3d, 4th and 5th Circuits] Some courts treat denial of medical care claims the same under either the Eighth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment regardless of whether the claimant is a pretrial detainee or an inmate serving a sentence of incarceration. . . . Conceivably, the subjective component might be lowered when it comes to the medical needs of a pretrial detainee. . . However, it does not appear that the objective component would be lowered for pretrial detainees; they would still need to demonstrate the existence of a 'serious' medical need."); Guerts v. Piccinni, No. C 00-3588 PJH (PR), 2002 WL 467709, at *4 (N.D.Cal. March 25, 2002) (not reported) ("Several circuits have held that the Hudson analysis also applies to excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees under the Fourteenth Amendment. [citing cases] Although the Ninth Circuit has not addressed the issue, it has used the Eighth Amendment as a benchmark for evaluating claims brought by pretrial detainees. . . The court need not resolve the question of whether the Hudson standard also applies when considering an excessive force due process claim brought by a pretrial detainee. The actions of defendants were reasonably related to the facility's interest in maintaining jail security, and given plaintiff's agitated condition and refusal to comply with orders to stand still, were not an excessive response. Defendants' actions hence did not constitute 'punishment' in the Fourteenth Amendment sense. They certainly did not rise to the level of malicious and sadistic actions taken for the purpose of causing harm, the Hudson standard."); Thornhill v. Breazeale, 88 F. Supp.2d 647, 651 (S.D. Miss. 2000) ("Through a long line of cases involving both convicted prisoners and pretrial detainees, the Fifth Circuit has fashioned two different standards of care that the State owes to a pretrial detainee. A Section 1983 challenge of a jail official's episodic acts or omissions evokes the application of one standard while a challenge of the general conditions, practices, rules, or restrictions of pretrial confinement evokes another. . . A jailer's constitutional liability to a pretrial detainee for episodic acts or omissions is measured by a standard of deliberate indifference. . . Constitutional attacks on general conditions, practices, rules, or restrictions, otherwise known as jail condition cases, are subject to the Bell test which is premised on a reasonable relationship between the condition, practice, rule, or restriction and a legitimate governmental interest.").

See also Jones v. Blanas, 393 F.3d 918, 931-34 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Jones claims that Blanas and the County violated his substantive due process rights by confining him for a year among the general criminal inmate population of the Sacramento County Jail and for another year in T-Sep, an administrative segregation unit where Jones experienced substantially more restrictive conditions than those prevailing in the Main Jail. While in T-Sep, Jones was afforded substantially less exercise time, phone and visiting privileges, and out-of-cell time than inmates in the general population. Jones was completely cut off from recreational activities, religious services, and physical access to the law library. Jones continued to be subjected to strip searches during this time. . . . Though it purported to analyze Jones's conditions of confinement claim under the Fourteenth Amendment, the district court actually applied the standards that govern a claim of cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. The court mistook the amendment that was to be applied. . . . The case of the individual confined awaiting civil commitment proceedings implicates the intersection between two distinct Fourteenth Amendment imperatives. First, '[p]ersons who have been involuntarily committed are entitled to more considerate treatment and conditions of confinement than criminals whose conditions of confinement are designed to punish.' Youngberg, 457 U.S. at 321-22. Second, when the state detains an individual on a criminal charge, that person, unlike a criminal convict, 'may not be punished prior to an adjudication of guilt in accordance with due process of law.' Bell, 441 U.S. at 535 (emphasis added). . . As civil detainees retain greater liberty protections than individuals detained under criminal process, see Youngberg, 457 U.S. at 321-24, and pre-adjudication detainees retain greater liberty protections than convicted ones, see Bell, 441 U.S. at 535-36, it stands to reason that an individual detained awaiting civil commitment proceedings is entitled to protections at least as great as those afforded to a civilly committed individual and at least as great as those afforded to an individual accused but not convicted of a crime. . . . In addition to comparing the conditions of confinement of pre-adjudication civil detainees to those of pre-trial criminal detainees, it is also relevant to compare confinement conditions of civil detainees pre-adjudication to conditions post-commitment. As the Eleventh Circuit has persuasively reasoned, '[i]f pretrial detainees cannot be punished because they have not yet been convicted, [citing Bell], then [civil] detainees cannot be subjected to conditions of confinement substantially worse than they would face upon commitment.' Lynch, 744 F.2d at 1461. Or, to put it more colorfully, purgatory cannot be worse than hell. Therefore when an individual awaiting SVPA adjudication is detained under conditions more restrictive than those the individual would face following SVPA commitment, we presume the treatment is punitive. . . . In sum, a civil detainee awaiting adjudication is entitled to conditions of confinement that are not punitive. . . . With respect to an individual confined awaiting adjudication under civil process, a presumption of punitive conditions arises where the individual is detained under conditions identical to, similar to, or more restrictive than those under which pretrial criminal detainees are held, or where the individual is detained under conditions more restrictive than those he or she would face upon commitment. Finally, to prevail on a Fourteenth Amendment claim regarding conditions of confinement, the confined individual need not prove 'deliberate indifference' on the part of government officials.").

b. Post-Kingsley Decisions

SUPREME COURT

Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1864-65 (2017) ("The constitutional right is different here, since Carlson was predicated on the Eighth Amendment and this claim is predicated on the Fifth. . .And the judicial guidance available to this warden, with respect to his supervisory duties, was less developed. The Court has long made clear the standard for claims alleging failure to provide medical treatment to a prisoner—'deliberate indifference to serious medical needs.' Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 104, 97 S.Ct. 285, 50 L.Ed.2d 251 (1976). The standard for a claim alleging that a warden allowed guards to abuse pre-trial detainees is less clear under the Court's precedents.")

D.C. CIRCUIT

Bah v. District of Columbia, No. CV 23-1248 (JDB), 2024 WL 983329, at *4–5 & n.6 (D.D.C. Mar. 7, 2024) ("Kingsley involved an excessive force claim, not a deliberate indifference claim. But a majority of the circuits to consider the question have read Kingsley to modify the subjective component of pretrial detainees' deliberate indifference claims, including failure-to-protect claims. [collecting cases] These cases generally reason that a subjective rather than objective requirement as to correctional officers' knowledge of a substantial risk to a pretrial detainee 'cannot be reconciled with *Kingsley'*s language, reasoning, and [emphasis on] the different status of pretrial detainees.'. . The D.C. Circuit has yet to weigh in. However, every judge in this District to consider the matter has agreed with the majority view and extended Kingsley's objective standard to other claims by pretrial detainees. [collecting cases] The District attempts to distinguish these cases as involving conditions-of-confinement claims generally, not failure-to-protect claims specifically. . . Yet the District offers no reason why the same reasoning does not apply to failure-to-protect claims, and various of these cases favorably cited failure-to-protect precedents in support of their reasoning. . .The District also cites Fifth Circuit cases that declined to extend Kingsley's objective standard. . . Importantly, however, these cases relied on preexisting Fifth Circuit precedent specifically addressing deliberate-indifference claims brought by pretrial detainees. . . The District has not cited, and this Court is not aware of, comparable precedent in this circuit. To the contrary, the D.C. Circuit has, albeit in a slightly different context, recognized important distinctions between pretrial detainees' Fifth Amendment rights and convicted prisoners' Eighth Amendment rights. . .The Court joins the majority view of the circuits and the judges in this District that, post-Kingsley, pretrial detainees' deliberate indifference claims should be analyzed under an objective rather than subjective standard. And the parties' sparring is limited to this purely legal question; the District assumes that Bah has otherwise plausibly alleged a predicate Fifth Amendment violation. . . Hence, the District's sole contention as to why Bah has failed to plausibly allege a predicate constitutional violation is unavailing. . . .The Eighth, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits have also declined to extend Kingsley. The Eleventh Circuit did so based solely on existing circuit precedent, . . . while the Tenth Circuit did so in part based on existing precedent, see Strain v. Regalado, 977 F.3d 984, 989–93 (10th Cir. 2020). The Eighth Circuit's analysis consisted of a single sentence in a footnote. See Whitney v. City of St. Louis, 887 F.3d 857, 860 n.4 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Kingsley does not control because it was an excessive force case, not a deliberate indifference case.").

United States v. Worrell, No. 1:21-CR-00292-RCL, 2021 WL 2366934, at *10 (D.D.C. June 9, 2021) ("A pretrial detainee's claims of unconstitutional conditions of confinement are governed by the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, rather than Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause of the Eighth Amendment. See Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 29 (2d Cir. 2017). To evaluate whether the conditions of pretrial detention violate the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause, the Supreme Court has stated that a court must determine whether the challenged condition amounts to 'punishment.'. . Government actions taken with an 'expressed intent to punish' clearly constitute punishment. . . When there is no 'expressed intent to punish,' the Court engages in a two-step inquiry. First, the detainee must show an objective deprivation of his constitutional rights. To do so he must show 'that the conditions, either alone or in combination, pose an unreasonable risk of serious damage to his health.'. . Second, the defendant must show that the official either 'acted intentionally to impose the alleged condition, or recklessly failed to act with reasonable care to mitigate the risk that the condition posed to the pretrial detainee even though the defendant-official knew, or should have known, that the condition posed an excessive risk to health or safety.'. . 'A pretrial detainee thus can prevail if she either introduces evidence of a subjective intent to punish or demonstrates that a restriction is objectively unreasonable or excessive relative to the Government's proffered justification.' United States v. Moore, No. 18-CR-198, 2019 WL 2569659, at *2 (D.D.C. June 21, 2019) (citing Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015)).")

D.A.M. v. Barr, No. 20-CV-1321 (CRC), 2020 WL 4218003, at *11, *13 (D.D.C. July 23, 2020) ("To assess whether conditions of confinement violates due process, courts consider whether the conditions 'amount to punishment of the detainee.'. . Because civil immigration detainees, like pretrial criminal detainees, have not been convicted of any present crime, they 'may not be subjected to punishment of any description.'. . In determining whether conditions of confinement amount to punishment, '[a] court must decide whether the disability is imposed for the purpose of punishment or whether it is but an incident of some other legitimate governmental purpose.'. . Because petitioners would remain in ICE's custody during the deportation process up to the point of their release into their home countries, the Court will apply this standard to their challenge to the conditions attendant to that process. . . The relevant inquiry, therefore, is whether the manner in which their deportations would be carried out is 'rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose or ... appear[s] excessive in relation to that purpose.'. . . The bottom line is that the risks of the removal process cannot be assessed a vacuum. Rather, the Court must ask whether it is reasonable for ICE to expose petitioners to the temporary risks of traveling as compared to the indefinite risks of remaining in congregate detention facilities with transient detainee populations who have not all been tested for the virus and staff entering and leaving every day. Viewed from that perspective, the Court has little difficulty concluding that petitioners are not likely to show that ICE will subject them to an unreasonable health risk by carrying out their removals with the precautionary measures ICE has committed to taking.")

O.M.G. v. Wolf, No. CV 20-786 (JEB), 2020 WL 4201635, at *9-12 (D.D.C. July 22, 2020) ("Because Petitioners are civil immigration detainees and have not been convicted of any crime, the Due Process Clause 'requires that [they] not be punished.'. . . A detainee can establish unconstitutional punishment in two ways: 1) by showing that 'the disability is imposed for the purpose of punishment'; or 2) by showing that the challenged condition is either not 'reasonably related to a legitimate goal' or 'appears excessive in relation to' that purpose. . . Petitioners make no claim that ICE detains them with the intent of punishing them. It is well established, moreover, that the Government has a legitimate interest in the enforcement of immigration laws, and that such interest is furthered by detaining certain noncitizens. . . . Petitioners' claims therefore turn on whether their detention in current FRC conditions is either 'objectively unreasonable' or 'excessive in relation' to those objectives. . . . The Court agrees with Judge Cooper and other federal district judges around the country, however, that the government's obligation to provide 'reasonable safety' does not 'require that detention facilities reduce the risk of harm to zero' during the COVID-19 pandemic. . . . At this point, ICE's performance seems to be somewhere between 'room for improvement' and 'reasonably successful,' but plenty of daylight — and likely the constitutional line — lies between those two answers. As discussed above, ICE has implemented many COVID-prevention measures, including greatly reducing the detainee population. . . . At a minimum, Petitioners have not demonstrated an obvious violation of their due-process rights. As explained below, even assuming current conditions do cross the line into unconstitutional territory, Petitioners have failed to make the necessary showing that no remedy short of wholesale release will redress their injuries. . . .Petitioners cite several out-of-circuit cases in which they claim district courts ordered release of ICE detainees in response to COVID-19. See Yanes v. Martin, No. 20-216, 2020 WL 3047515 (D.R.I. June 2, 2020); Zepeda Rivas v. Jennings, No. 20-2731, 2020 WL 2059848 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 29, 2020); Savino v. Sousa, No. 20-10617, 2020 WL 1703844 (D. Mass. Apr. 8, 2020). None of those decisions is apposite, however, because none enjoined ICE to categorically release detainees. Instead, each court held that detainees were entitled to individualized bail determinations during which the court would scrutinize 'medical risks, ... criminal and immigration history, [and] the danger if any to public safety presented by the release of that particular detainee.'")

C.G.B. v. Wolf, No. 20-CV-1072 (CRC), 2020 WL 2935111, at *22 n.31 (D.D.C. June 2, 2020) ("The parties dispute whether the standard for sustaining a conditions-of-confinement claim under the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause is the same as the Eighth Amendment excessive punishment standard. The Government maintains that Plaintiffs are required to show that government officials imposed a punitive conditions of confinement with 'deliberate indifference' to the risks posed by such confinement. Plaintiffs respond that the standard is purely objective—i.e., they need only show that the conditions of confinement are not reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective or is excessive in relation to the legitimate governmental objective. In Kingsley, the Supreme Court construed Bell v. Wolfish in determining the standard that applies to a pre-trial detainee's claim of excessive force. Although a post-conviction detainee is required to show deliberate indifference to the force used against her, a pre-conviction detainee, who may not be constitutionally subjected to punishment before a conviction, need only show that the force used was objectively unreasonable. Does Kingsley apply here? While the D.C. Circuit has not addressed the issue, 'many circuit courts have extended Kingsley's objective standard to apply to ... due process claims by pre-trial detainees.' [collecting cases] At least two district courts in this jurisdiction have extended Kingsley to due process claims brought by pre-trial criminal detainees. See, e.g., Banks, 2020 WL 1914896, at *5–6; United States v. Moore, Case No. 18-cr-198 (JEB), 2019 WL 2569659, at *2 (D.D.C. June 21, 2019). The Court is persuaded, both by the language of Kingsley and by its fellow courts, to apply the Kingsley standard here as well. Accordingly, Plaintiffs need not prove deliberate indifference.")

Jalloh v. Underwood, No. CV 16-1613 (TJK), 2020 WL 2615522, at *3 n.3 (D.D.C. May 22, 2020) ("[S]ome courts have . . . applied Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2470 (2015)—which removed the subjective component of the standard used to evaluate claims of excessive force by pretrial detainees under the Fourteenth Amendment—to claims of failure to provide medical assistance as well. See Miranda v. County of Lake, 900 F.3d 335, 352 (7th Cir. 2018) (canvassing circuit split and joining the Second and Ninth Circuits in applying Kingsley to medical assistance claims while acknowledging that the Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits have not); Banks v. Booth, No. 20-cv-849 (CKK), 2020 WL 1914896, at *5–6 (D.D.C. Apr. 19, 2020) (applying Kingsley to medical assistance claims). If Kingsley applies to medical assistance claims, then the liability standards under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments would be the same, mooting the question of which amendment governs.")

United States v. Otunyo, No. CR 18-251 (BAH), 2020 WL 2065041, at *12–13 & n.11 (D.D.C. Apr. 28, 2020) ("Several circuits have applied Kingsley's logic beyond the excessive-force context. The D.C. Circuit has not yet considered Kingsley's ramifications, but the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits have uniformly applied the objective 'deliberate indifference' standard broadly to claims challenging conditions of pretrial confinement. [collecting cases] The Sixth Circuit, similarly, has 'noted that Kingsley "calls into serious doubt"' the application of the subjective component of the deliberate-indifference test usually applied to pretrial detainees' claims.' Martin v. Warren Cty., No. 19-5132, 2020 WL 360436, at *4 n.4 (6th Cir. Jan. 22, 2020) (quoting Richmond v. Huq, 885 F.3d 928, 938 n.3 (6th Cir. 2018)).[11] [fn. 11: The Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits have declined to extend Kingsley, but these decisions—each of which devoted only a footnote to this question—provide little reason to deviate from the path set by the other circuits discussed above. The Fifth and Eleventh Circuits declined to extend Kingsley because doing so conflicted with those circuits' existing precedents. See Alderson v. Concordia Parish Corr. Facility, 848 F.3d 415, 419 n.4 (5th Cir. 2017); Nam Dang ex rel. Vina Dang v. Sheriff, 871 F.3d 1272, 1279 n.2 (11th Cir. 2017). The Eighth Circuit's analysis, meanwhile, consisted of a single sentence, which focused narrowly on Kingsley's holding without addressing the broad reasoning underlying that holding. See Whitney v. City of St. Louis, 887 F.3d 857, 860 n.4 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Kingsley does not control because it was an excessive force case, not a deliberate indifference case.").] Decisions from this Court have also applied the objective version of the 'deliberate indifference' standard to due process challenges to pretrial conditions of confinement. See, e.g., Banks, 2020 WL 1914896, at *6; United States v. Moore, 18-cr-198 (JEB), 2019 WL 2569659, at *2 (D.D.C. June 21, 2019). But see, e.g., Lee, 2020 WL 1541049, at *5 (applying the subjective version of the "deliberate indifference" standard). The reasoning of such cases is persuasive. . . Accordingly, to establish that conditions of confinement violate due process, a defendant need establish only that detaining officials know or should know that those conditions objectively constitute a serious risk to the defendant's health.")

Banks v. Booth, No. CV 20-849(CKK), 2020 WL 1914896, at *5–6 (D.D.C. Apr. 19, 2020) ("While Kingsley relates to excessive force rather than prison conditions, in making its decision, the Kingsley court relied on Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979), a case pertaining to prison conditions. According to the Kingsley court, 'as Bell itself shows (and as our later precedent affirms), a pretrial detainee can prevail by providing only objective evidence that the challenged governmental action is not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective or that it is excessive in relation to that purpose.'. . Together Kingsley and Bell provide persuasive authority that a pre-trial detainee need only show that prison conditions are objectively unreasonable in order to state a claim under the due process clause. The parties did not cite and the Court could not find a D.C. Circuit case interpreting Kingsley in the context of a claim for deficient prison conditions. However, many circuit courts have extended Kingsley's objective standard to apply to other due process claims by pre-trial detainees. For example, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit has held that, following Kingsley, in the context of challenged prison conditions for pre-trial detainees, 'the Due Process Clause can be violated when an official does not have subjective awareness that the official's acts (or omissions) have subjected the pretrial detainee to a substantial risk of harm.' Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 35 (2d 2017); see also Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1070 (9th Cir. 2016) (applying Kingsley standard to failure to protect claims by pre-trial detainees); Hardeman v. Curran, 933 F.3d 816, 823 (7th Cir. 2019) (finding that "Kingsley's objective inquiry applies to all Fourteenth Amendment conditions-of-confinement claims brought by pretrial detainees"). And, at least one district court within this Circuit has also applied Kingsley's objective standard to due process claims brought by pre-trial detainees. See United States v. Moore, Case No. 18-198-JEB, 2019 WL 2569659, *2 (D.D.C. June 21, 2019) (explaining that a pretrial detainee could prevail on a due process claim "if she either introduces evidence of a subjective intent to punish or demonstrates that a restriction is objectively unreasonable or excessive relative to the Government's proffered justification"). Based on the pertinent reasoning of Kingsley and the persuasive authority of other courts, the Court concludes that pre-trial detainee Plaintiffs Phillips and Smith do not need to show deliberate indifference in order to state a due process claim for inadequate conditions of confinement. As such, under the due process clause, pre-trial detainee Plaintiffs Phillips and Smith are likely to succeed on the merits by showing that the Defendants knew or should have known that the jail conditions posed an excessive risk to their health. And, under the Eighth Amendment, post-conviction detainee Plaintiff Banks must show that the jail conditions exposed him to an unreasonable risk of serious damage to his health and that Defendants acted with deliberate indifference in posing such a risk.")

FIRST CIRCUIT

Miranda-Rivera v. Toledo-Davila, 813 F.3d 64, 70-73 (1st Cir. 2016) ("The Supreme Court has historically reserved the question of whether the Fourth Amendment standard of objective reasonableness or a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process standard requiring a defendant to have a 'sufficiently culpable state of mind,' . . . applies to persons who have been arrested but who are not yet 'pretrial detainees' because they have not yet gone before a magistrate judge for a probable cause hearing. . . At the time of the district court's decision, other circuits were split over this question. [collecting cases]The First Circuit has not yet answered the question, although some district courts within the First Circuit have applied the majority rule. . . Since then, the Supreme Court has held that the appropriate standard for a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim is simply objective reasonableness. . . . Since Kingsley has extended the objective reasonableness standard for use of force from the arrest stage through the probable cause hearing, whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment standard applies presents less of a problem in cases like this one than before. In this case, the district court 'identif[ied] the specific constitutional right allegedly infringed by the challenged application of force,'. . . as the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable seizures. The parties do not challenge that holding, and we have no reason to do so as the alleged use of excessive force here occurred while Officers Pérez and Rivera were transporting Rojas to the police station and then to a jail cell. Given these facts, and given the authority favoring the application of the Fourth Amendment to similar factual scenarios, we apply the Fourth Amendment standard to Rojas's excessive force claim. . . . Since there is sufficient evidence to make out an excessive force claim, Pérez is not entitled to qualified immunity on the first ground. Nor is Officer Pérez entitled to qualified immunity on the 'clearly established' ground. The district court stated in a footnote that Defendants may be entitled to qualified immunity because it was unclear in 2007 which constitutional standard governed arrestees' excessive force claims in the First Circuit. We are not persuaded. The main difference between the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment excessive force standards prior to Kingsley was whether, in retrospect, we inquire into an officer's subjective mindset. However, at their core, both the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments are concerned with whether an officer's actions depart from what a reasonable officer would do, and whether those actions serve some legitimate governmental purpose. . . A reasonable officer faced with the question of what to do with Rojas would have known that using more force than necessary violated both of those standards and therefore a clearly established constitutional rule to use force in the way that the officers here appear to have done. Here, during the entire time period in which the officers are alleged to have applied excessive force to Rojas (i.e., from Rojas's arrest to his death in the holding cell), Rojas was handcuffed and did not pose a great physical threat to the officers. The record suggests that Rojas initially appeared paranoid, screaming incoherently, and that, while handcuffed, he attempted to resist being transported to the police station and being incarcerated. There is sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to conclude that the officers used force that resulted in disproportionately severe injuries to Rojas—e.g., multiple lacerations, contusions, and abrasions throughout his body—and ultimately in his death. We therefore conclude that, regardless of whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment applied after his arrest, a reasonable officer would have known that using force in the way that the officers here appear to have done in the particular factual circumstances that they encountered violated Rojas's constitutional rights. . . Accordingly, Pérez is not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim.")

Smart v. Strafford County, No. 22-CV-00436-PB, 2024 WL 4751400, at *7 (D.N.H. Nov. 12, 2024) ("Since Kingsley, several circuit courts have held that a Fourteenth Amendment medical care claim must be evaluated using an objective deliberate indifference standard, which has generally been understood to require proof only that the defendant acted recklessly rather than negligently with respect to a detainee's serious medical needs. . . Plaintiffs rely on Kingsley in asking me to follow the path established by these circuits. As I explain, however, I need not stake out a position on the issue because, even if I were to conclude that such a claim does not require proof of subjective deliberate indifference, plaintiffs do not have a triable Fourteenth Amendment medical care claim against any of the individual defendants.")

Thompson v. Howry, No. 22-CV-00151-PB, 2024 WL 4350214, at *7–8 (D.N.H. Sept. 30, 2024) ("In practice, . . . the First Circuit has consistently applied the Eighth Amendment test to medical care claims by pretrial detainees without further elaboration. . .Other circuits that have addressed the legal standard for medical treatment claims by pretrial detainees have split over whether the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389, 395 (2015), entitles pretrial detainees to greater protection than the Eighth Amendment provides to post-conviction inmates. . . In particular, the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits have held that the Fourteenth Amendment protects pretrial detainees from objective 'deliberate indifference' to their need for medical care. . . Under this purely objective standard, a constitutional violation can be found when an official 'recklessly failed to act with reasonable care to mitigate the risk that the condition posed to the pretrial detainee even though the defendant-official[...] should have known[ ] that the condition posed an excessive risk to health or safety.'. . Declining the Kingsley invitation, though, the Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits have held that the subjective 'deliberate indifference' test should apply for both pretrial and post-conviction inmates. . . In other words, these circuits have held that proving a claim for failure to provide adequate medical attention for a pretrial detainee requires a showing both of an objectively serious medical need and of a subjective deliberate indifference to that need. The First Circuit has not addressed the post-Kingsley circuit split as to whether a due process medical treatment claim can be established without proof of subjective deliberate indifference. Nor have the parties presented developed arguments on this important legal question. And, even if I were to be persuaded that a medical treatment claim by a pretrial detainee does not require proof of subjective deliberate indifference, I would need to determine whether the individual defendants were nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity on such claims. Because the First Circuit has never held that a due process medical treatment claim can be established without proof of subjective deliberate indifference, a question arises as to whether the law on this point was clearly established when the defendants failed to treat Thompson. In Sandoval v. County of San Diego, 985 F.3d 657 (9th Cir. 2021), the majority held that 'because the clearly established law prong [of the qualified immunity analysis] focuses objectively on whether it would be clear that the defendant's conduct violated the constitution, lack of notice regarding the mental state required to establish liability has no bearing on the [qualified immunity] analysis.'. . In contrast, the partial dissent in Sandoval concluded that a court was not free to ignore a change in the law as to whether subjective deliberate indifference was required to prove a due process medical treatment claim when conducting a qualified immunity analysis. . . Because this difficult issue was also not briefed by the parties, I am unable to determine on the present record whether any of the individual defendants are entitled to summary judgment on Thompson's medical treatment claims. Accordingly, I deny the defendants' motion for summary judgment with respect to these claims.")

Cox v. City of Boston, No. CV 22-11009-RGS, 2024 WL 4608587, at *2 (D. Mass. Oct. 29, 2024) ("Cox argues that the court erred in ruling that it was bound by prior First Circuit decisions in refusing to apply the objective-reasonableness standard that the Supreme Court adopted in § 1983 Fourteenth Amendment excessive force cases in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015). . . As the court pointed out, the First Circuit in Zingg v. Groblewski, 907 F.3d 630, 634-635 (1st Cir. 2018), and Miranda-Rivera v. Toledo-Davila, 813 F.3d 64, 74 (1st Cir. 2016), despite the Kingsley holding, had adhered to the deliberate-indifference standard in non-excessive force cases involving the Fourteenth Amendment rights of pretrial detainees. While the Supreme Court in the nine years since the Kingsley decision has chosen not to extend the objective-unreasonableness standard beyond its facts, the argument that it should do so is not frivolous. Indeed, the Circuits since Kingsley have found themselves at odds over the issue, with the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits aligned with the objective test, while the First, Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits have held Kingsley to be confined to excessive force claims. . . Whatever the merits of the debate, and accepting Cox's argument that the First Circuit in Zingg and Miranda-Rivera did not explicitly reject Kingsley's objective-unreasonableness test, in the absence of a squarely binding Supreme Court decision mandating a divergence, it is not within the authority of a district court to blaze trails contrary to existing First Circuit precedent.")

Cox v. City of Boston, No. CV 22-11009-RGS, 2024 WL 2186840, at *4 & n.6 (D. Mass. May 14, 2024) ("The parties dispute whether the court should apply a deliberate indifference or objective reasonableness standard in analyzing Count I. In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015), the Supreme Court held that an objective test applies to Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees. . . In the wake of Kingsley, the federal circuits are split on whether the objective test also applies to claims of failure to provide adequate medical care brought by pretrial detainees.[6] [fn. 6: Five Circuits have adopted an objective test. See, e.g., Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 35 (2d Cir. 2017); Short v. Hartman, 87 F.4th 593, 609-612 (4th Cir. 2023); Brawner v. Scott Cnty., 14 F.4th 585, 596-597 (6th Cir. 2021); Miranda v. Cnty. of Lake, 900 F.3d 335, 352-353 (7th Cir. 2018); Gordon v. Cnty. of Orange, 888 F.3d 1118, 1124-1125 (9th Cir. 2018). Four Circuits have continued to apply a deliberate indifference standard. See Alderson v. Concordia Par. Corr. Facility, 848 F.3d 415, 419 (5th Cir. 2017); Whitney v. City of St. Louis, 887 F.3d 857, 860 n.4 (8th Cir. 2018); Strain v. Regalado, 977 F.3d 984, 989 (10th Cir.

2020); Dang ex rel. Dang v. Sheriff, Seminole Cnty., 871 F.3d 1272, 1279 n.2 (11th Cir. 2017).] The First Circuit has not directly joined the issue but, post-Kingsley, has iterated that due process protections for pretrial detainees 'extend at least as far as the protection that the Eighth Amendment gives to a convicted prisoner.'. . Because Cox could prevail under either standard, this court need not attempt to resolve the issue.")

Glennie v. Garland, No. CV 21-231JJM, 2023 WL 2265247, at *6 n.14 (D.R.I. Feb. 28, 2023) ("Since Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015), some courts have questioned whether a Due Process Clause claim of inadequate medical care requires an affirmative showing of deliberate indifference as required by the Eighth Amendment or whether it requires merely that the conduct 'purposely or knowingly used against [the claimant] was objectively unreasonable.'. . However, following Kingsley, the First Circuit has continued to apply the Eighth Amendment test to detainee claims of inadequate medical care. [collecting cases] Guided by this precedent and mindful that neither Plaintiff nor Defendants have argued that the Court should apply an objective reasonableness test to the aspects of the claims that arise under the Fifth/Fourteenth Amendments' Due Process Clauses, my analysis is grounded in traditional Eighth Amendment jurisprudence.")

Silva v. Clarke, No. CV 19-568JJM, 2022 WL 1091336, at *8 (D.R.I. Apr. 12, 2022) (" While this Court has applied the objective reasonableness standard to a civil detainee's medical claim, . . . following Kingsley, the First Circuit has continued to apply the Eighth Amendment test to detainee claims of inadequate medical care. . . District courts in this Circuit have done the same. . . In light of controlling precedent (Zingg and Miranda-Rivera) and mindful that neither Mr. Silva nor Dr. Clarke has argued that the Court should apply the objective test, . . . the Court will apply the traditional Eighth Amendment two-part objective/subjective standard.")

Rancourt v. Hillsborough County, No. 20-CV-351-PB, 2022 WL 344812, at *3 (D.N.H. Feb. 4, 2022) ("Because Rancourt was a pretrial detainee, her § 1983 claims for constitutionally inadequate medical care are rooted in the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . The circuit courts disagree whether such claims are subject to the Eighth Amendment's two-part subjective and objective deliberate indifference test or the purely objective test that the Supreme Court applied to pretrial detainees' excessive force claims in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015). . . As Judge Laplante recently noted in analyzing this issue, the First Circuit has continued to apply the Eighth Amendment test post-Kingsley to detainee claims of constitutionally inadequate medical care. . . Accordingly, I agree with defendants that I must apply the Eighth Amendment test to Rancourt's claims.")

Estate of Sacco v. Hillsborough County House of Corrections, No. 1:20-CV-447-JL, 2021 WL 2012639, at *5 & nn. 42, 43 (D.N.H. May 20, 2021) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor the First Circuit Court of Appeals has extended the Kingsley holding to other contexts. In the absence of authority explicitly changing the standard, the court must rely on existing First Circuit precedent in deliberate indifference cases, which includes 'both objective and subjective components.' [collecting cases] Indeed, following Kingsley, the First Circuit Court of Appeals has continued to apply the two-part objective and subjective test to deliberately indifferent medical care claims by pretrial detainees. . . Notably, the Miranda-Rivera court acknowledged that Kingsley changed the standard for excessive force claims and proceeded to apply an objective reasonableness standard to the plaintiff's excessive force claim, but did not apply it to his deliberate indifference claim. . . Courts in this district have similarly applied Kingsley to excessive force claims, but not deliberate indifference claims. . . The court will accordingly apply the traditional two-part standard here. . . . The court recognizes there is a circuit split on whether Kingsley's objective unreasonableness standard should extend to deliberately indifferent medical care claims, with the Ninth, Second, and Seventh Circuits applying the objective standard, and the Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits declining to apply Kingsley's objective standard to detainee medical care claims. . . The court also acknowledges Chief Judge McCafferty's prediction that based on Kingsley 'it is likely that civil detainees no longer need to show subjective deliberate indifference in order to state a due process claim for inadequate conditions of confinement.' Gomes v. US Dep't of Homeland Sec., Acting Sec'y, 460 F. Supp. 3d 132, 148 (D.N.H. 2020). This statement, however, was dicta because the outcome in Gomes was the same under either standard and Judge McCafferty later 'decline[d] to resolve whether Kingsley changed the applicable standard for due process claims brought by civil detainees.'. . Absent controlling authority from the Supreme Court or First Circuit Court of Appeals, this court will not attempt to predict whether Kingsley's objective standard applies to deliberately indifferent medical care claims under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by criminal pretrial detainees. . . . Despite urging the court to apply Kingsley's objective unreasonableness standard to this case, the Plaintiff does not explain how that standard should be applied to its deliberate indifference claim. Perhaps for good reason, as the Kingsley court merely held that 'a pretrial detainee must show only that the force purposefully or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable,' and noted that this is not a mechanical standard but one that turns on the facts and circumstances of each case, and depends on a number of non-exclusive factors. . . The Plaintiff also cites Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307 (1982) for the proposition that criminal pretrial detainees are entitled to more considerate treatment and conditions of confinement than convicted criminals. . . But Youngberg involved a civilly committed individual and the quote that the Plaintiff relies on actually starts with 'Persons who have been involuntarily committed' not 'criminal pretrial detainees.'. . Quoted accurately, Youngberg does not help the Plaintiff here.")

Dunn v. Barry, No. CV 18-10581-MPK, 2021 WL 1967883, at *9 n.31 (D. Mass. May 17, 2021) ("The parties disagree on the proper standard to be applied in a medical care case: the stricter Eighth Amendment 'deliberate indifference' standard or the 'objectively unreasonable' standard articulated in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389, 396-400 (2015), an excessive force case. The First Circuit has yet to weigh in on the debate. The court need not resolve the issue since plaintiffs' claim passes muster at this juncture, depending how the facts are ultimately determined, under either standard.")

Silva v. State of Rhode Island, No. CV 19-568JJM, 2021 WL 1326885, at *4-5 (D.R.I. Apr. 9, 2021) ("Since Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015), it has been unclear whether this right means that a pretrial detainee asserting that he has been denied adequate medical care must show deliberate indifference as required by the Eighth Amendment, or merely that the conduct 'purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.'. . Notably, while this Court has applied the objective reasonableness standard to a civil detainee's medical claim, Medeiros v. Martin, 458 F. Supp. 3d 122, 128 & 128 n.1 (D.R.I. May 1, 2020), and courts generally apply the same standard for civil detainees as for pretrial criminal detainees, . . . post-Kingsley, the overwhelming majority of district courts in the First Circuit have continued to apply the Eighth Amendment standard to criminal detainees' claims of inadequate medical care. [collecting cases] . . . .With regard to medical care, the Court need not resolve whether the applicable standard is Eighth-Amendment deliberate indifference or objective reasonableness – the evidence is clear that Plaintiff's medical claim fails to meet the threshold for an interim mandatory injunction even under the more lenient standard. That is, Plaintiff has not sustained his burden of proving that he has a serious unmet medical need or that RIDOC's ongoing approach to his medical issues is objectively unreasonable.")

Dorce v. Wolf, 506 F. Supp.3d 142, ___ (D. Mass. 2020) ("[P]laintiff in this case does not challenge a discretionary decision concerning his eligibility for removal. He claims instead that the circumstances of his transfer violated his right to substantive due process under the Fifth Amendment. . . . To establish a likelihood of success on the merits, he must show that defendants' conduct was objectively unreasonable— that it was not rationally related to a legitimate government objective or that it was excessive in relation to that purpose. See Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 538-39 (1979); see also Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389, 396-97 (2015). Based on exhibits A, B, C, and F attached to the complaint, petitioner is likely to succeed in establishing that the risk was 'so grave that it violates contemporary standards of decency to expose anyone unwillingly to such a risk.'. ._ On March 13, 2020, the federal government declared a national emergency due to the novel coronavirus. . . In response, the Centers for Disease Control urged the public to observe social distancing guidelines and limit nonessential travel. Nonetheless, between June 9 and June 10, 2020, petitioner made no fewer than four stops on the journey to ECDC. He was forced to comingle with detainees from other facilities on the aircraft and during the overnight stay at the LaSalle ICE Processing Center (LaSalle). He alleges that he had no opportunity to social distance or to disinfect his surroundings despite foul sanitary conditions at LaSalle and on the eight-hour van ride to Etowah. He explains that it was 'impossible to avoid coming into contact with other people's bodily fluids in the van's bathroom because they were shackled so tightly.'. . These circumstances substantially increased petitioner's risk of COVID-19 exposure. By ICE's own admission, transfer 'creates a greater risk of detainees being exposed to, or exposing others to, COVID-19.'. . Petitioner points to news reports finding that transfer of ICE COVID-19 at detention centers throughout the country. . . He is thus likely to succeed in proving that defendants' actions were objectively unreasonable because defendants knew or should have known that the transfer posed an excessive risk to his health.")

Gomes v. U.S. Dep't of Homeland Security, No. 20-CV-453-LM, 2020 WL 3577302, at *2–3 (D.N.H. July 1, 2020) ("The First Circuit has yet to address whether Kingsley's objective test is limited to excessive force claims or applies to other due process claims brought by civil detainees. District courts within the First Circuit have reached different conclusions on this question. . . The court need not resolve this question because even applying an 'objective reasonableness' test, the lower-risk petitioners have not met their burden. The court reaches this conclusion despite the lack of any meaningful dispute that COVID-19 presents a substantial risk of serious harm to the health of even lower-risk detainees, as it does members of the society at large. . . Although 'the harm of a COVID-19 infection will generally be more serious for some petitioners than for others' it 'cannot be denied that the virus is gravely dangerous to all of us.'. . . The question is whether petitioners have carried their burden and demonstrated that—with regard to lower-risk detainees—they are likely to succeed on their claim that conditions at SCHOC remain objectively unreasonable. . . While the respondents' approach to reducing the risks of COVID-19 has not been flawless, it has been, on balance, objectively reasonable.")

Yanes v. Martin, 464 F.Supp.3d 467, ___ n. 3 (D.R.I. 2020) ("Kingsley appeared to do away, with respect to detainees, with the need to show the subjective state of mind that is a hallmark of the 'deliberate indifference' or 'reckless disregard' formulations. . . While the First Circuit has not ruled on this precise issue since Kingsley, the Kingsley standard of 'objective reasonableness' is the appropriate one to be applied to an action like this brought by civil detainees such as the petitioners. That is consistent with the determination of another judge in this district, ruling on a motion for release of specific ICE detainees. Medeiros v. Martin, C.A. No. 20-178 WES, 2020 WL 2104897, at *4 (D.R.I. May 1, 2020). In fact, the Court is perplexed by the government's assertion in its filings in this case that the appropriate standard of review is that of 'deliberate indifference.' In Medeiros, the government apparently conceded that the more generous standard of objectively unreasonable is the appropriate standard of review. . . The respondents have cited Medeiros and that exact order with approval at various points in its filing. . . The First Circuit has recently found the Kingsley 'objective unreasonableness' standard appropriate for an arrestee's Fourth Amendment excessive force claim, while applying an Eighth Amendment 'deliberate indifference' standard to medical care. Miranda-Rivera v. Toledo-Davila, 813 F.3d 64, 71 (1st Cir. 2016). But see Fraihat v. U.S. Immig'n & Customs Enforcement, Case No. EDCV 19-1546 JGB (SHKx), 2020 WL 1932570 at *22 (C.D. Cal. Apr. 20, 2020) (applying 'objective unreasonableness' standard to due process claims by ICE detainees about dangerous medical conditions). In truth, a purely objective reasonableness test and one with a subjective element of 'deliberate indifference' are likely to lead to similar places. There can be no real dispute that the respondents are and have been aware of the risks of the virus and its horrifying infectiousness. ICE, the CDC, the White House, and all manner of state and federal agencies have bombarded the public and institutions with warnings. The respondents' conduct at the facility, in taking some precautionary measures but not others, has presumably been intentional. Both formulations look at what the respondents knew, what they did, and what they should have done.")

Gomes v. U.S. Dep't of Homeland Security, No. 20-CV-453-LM, 2020 WL 2514541, at *1, *11-12 (D.N.H. May 14, 2020) ("The most pressing question at the outset of this case is whether the detainees are entitled to bail hearings pending a ruling on the merits of their constitutional claims.

The court has answered that question in the affirmative for those detainees who have medical conditions (or are of an age) that render them particularly vulnerable to COVID-19. As of May 14, the court has conducted 11 bail hearings and released 7 detainees on conditions. With respect to the lower-risk detainees, the court explains in this order why it is not yet prepared to answer the question of whether they are entitled to bail hearings. . . . The Supreme Court has not issued any decision since Kingsley directly addressing whether the purposeful or knowing, objective unreasonableness standard applied in Kingsley also applies to claims brought by pretrial detainees about government acts or omissions that deny them medical care or expose them to substantial health and safety risks. There is a circuit split on that question. [collecting cases] Nearly all of the First Circuit cases that have looked to the Eighth Amendment for guidance in evaluating pretrial detainee due process deliberate indifference claims predate Kingsley. . . Only twice since Kingsley has the First Circuit issued an opinion concerning a pretrial detainee medical care claim, and in both cases, the court applied the Eighth Amendment standard. See Zingg v. Groblewski, 907 F.3d 630, 634-35 (1st Cir. 2018); Miranda-Rivera, 813 F.3d at 74. But the First Circuit's approach to the deliberate indifference claims in those cases does not appear to foreclose a ruling that Kingsley has changed the standard. . . In the absence of binding, post-Kingsley authority, district courts within the First Circuit do not agree whether the subjective prong of a deliberate indifference claim still applies to due process claims brought by civil detainees. Some courts have continued to analyze deliberate indifference claims without considering whether Kingsley altered the applicable standard. . . One court reasoned there was 'much to be said' for extending Kingsley to pretrial detainee due process claims but declined to do so given pre-Kingsley First Circuit precedent . . . and the fact that 'whether Kingsley will ultimately be extended by the First Circuit to encompass conditions of confinement claims has no bearing on the outcome.' [citing cases] Magistrate Judge Nivison has consistently held that post-Kingsley, an objective standard is sufficient to establish defendant liability for deliberate indifference claims brought by pretrial detainees. [citing cases] Most recently, in a case in which three ICE detainees at Wyatt Detention Center brought habeas corpus petitions alleging that their conditions of confinement violated their due process rights, Judge Smith accepted both parties' agreement that 'objective unreasonableness' was the appropriate post-Kingsley standard and analyzed the case through an 'objective unreasonableness prism.' Medeiros v. Martin, No. CV 20-178 WES, 2020 WL 2104897, at *4, n.1 (D.R.I. May 1, 2020). Based on the pertinent reasoning of Kingsley and the persuasive authority of other courts, it is likely that civil detainees no longer need to show subjective deliberate indifference in order to state a due process claim for inadequate conditions of confinement. However, whether the court analyzes petitioners' due process claim through a traditional Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference standard—which includes a subjective prong—or interprets Kingsley as having altered the standard, the result is the same. Detainees who have medical conditions that place them at higher risk for serious illness from exposure to COVID-19 have demonstrated that they are likely to succeed on the merits of their due process claim. It is a close call whether lower-risk detainees are likely to succeed under either standard given the lack of COVID-19 at the facility and the steps SCHOC has taken to reduce the risk. Therefore, because the outcome is the same under either standard, at this preliminary phase of the case, the court declines to resolve whether Kingsley changed the applicable standard for due process claims brought by civil detainees.")

Medeiros v. Martin, 458 F.Supp.3d 122, ___ (D.R.I. 2020) ("Each Petitioner is diagnosed with a CDC-recognized underlying health condition that makes him especially susceptible to risks associated with complications of COVID-19. . . . It is also well known that congregate living, such as nursing homes, cruise ships, aircraft carriers, and that at Wyatt and other detention facilities and prisons, magnifies the risk of contracting COVID-19. . . . The Court does not doubt that Wyatt's precautions may be adequate to ensure the safety of many if not most detainees, but that is not the question presently before the Court. Because these Petitioners' health issues distinguish them from a typical detainee, . . . measures designed to mitigate the spread of infection, even perfectly executed, are inadequate to protect vulnerable persons like them. . . The Court thus concludes that Petitioners, absent the requested relief, are at a significant risk of irreparable harm. . . . Without a conviction, conditions of confinement may not 'amount to punishment of the detainee.'. . Conditions are constitutional, and not an unconstitutional punishment, so long as they are 'reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective.'. . Petitioners must prove that Respondents' conduct is '"not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective or that it [was] excessive in relation to that purpose."' Miranda-Rivera v. Toledo-Davila, 813 F.3d 64, 70 (1st Cir. 2016) (quoting Kingsley, 135 S. Ct. at 2473-74) (analyzing claim of excessive force); see also Banks, 2020 WL 1914896, at *5. At this stage, Petitioners have the burden of showing a likelihood of success in proving that Respondents' conduct is 'objectively unreasonable'. Kingsley, 135 S. Ct. at 2473-74. Both parties agree that 'objective unreasonableness' is the appropriate benchmark. . . .Viewed through this 'objective unreasonableness' prism, the Court finds that Petitioners have met their burden. As detailed above, Petitioners have established not only that Wyatt's congregate living increases Petitioners' risk of contracting COVID-19, but also, and of greater constitutional significance, that their underlying medical conditions increase their risk of severe complications of COVID-19. . . At this point, '[t]he risk of contracting COVID-19 in tightly-confined spaces, especially jails, [is] "exceedingly obvious."'. . Moreover, courts have held that precautions failing to ensure reasonable safety cannot be reasonable. . . To be clear, the Court is not holding that 'the fact of detention itself [is] an "excessive" condition solely due to the risk of a communicable disease outbreak ....' Dawson, 2020 WL 1304557, at *2. Rather, the Court is persuaded by Petitioners' evidence that COVID-19 has infiltrated Wyatt, and that Wyatt's increased precautions, although addressing generalized needs of detainees, 'do nothing to alleviate the specific, serious, and unmet medical needs of the[se] high-risk detainees, who require greater precautions in light of their correspondingly greater risk of severe illness if they contract COVID-19.'. . Accordingly, the Court is satisfied that Petitioners have shown a likelihood of success of showing Respondents' COVID-19 precautions are objectively unreasonable as to these particular Petitioners.")

Vick v. Moore, No. 19-CV-267-SJM-AKJ, 2019 WL 2325996, at *2 n.3 (D.R.I. May 31, 2019) ("As the question is not squarely presented, this court does not express any opinion as to whether a pretrial detainee could plead a viable Fourteenth Amendment medical care claim based on facts showing defendants' purposeful, knowing, or reckless disregard of an excessive risk to a serious medical need. See Miranda v. Cty. of Lake, 900 F.3d 335, 354 (7th Cir. 2018). Cf. Estate of Vallina v. Cty. of Teller Sheriff's Office, 757 F. App'x 643, 646 (10th Cir. 2018) (noting Circuit split as to whether Kingsley, 135 S. Ct. at 2472-74, alters the mens rea standard required for detainee medical care claims).")

Wallace v. Cousins, No. CV 14-14767-GAO, 2017 WL 551816, at *3 (D. Mass. Feb. 8, 2017) (applied Kingsley to excessive force claim but not to medical needs claim) ("Correctional officials violate the Eighth Amendment prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment of prisoners if their 'acts or omissions [are] sufficiently harmful to evidence deliberate indifference to serious medical needs.' . . The same standard applies to pretrial detainees by reason of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Ruiz-Rosa v. Rullan, 485 F.3d 150, 155 (1st Cir. 2007) (citing Burrell v. Hampshire Cnty., 307 F.3d 1, 7 (1st Cir. 2002)).")

McKenney v. Joyce, 2016 WL 6304678, at *4 & n.4 (D. Me. Oct. 27, 2016) ("The First Circuit has describe a pretrial detainee's liberty interest in non-punitive conditions of confinement as 'coextensive with those of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.' Surprenant, 424 F.3d at 18. Conditions are thus punitive if they are below the 'minimal measure of necessities required for civilized living.'. . A pretrial detainee can also establish that he has been punished 'by providing only objective evidence that the challenged governmental action is not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective or that it is excessive in relation to that purpose.' Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2473-74 (2015). . . . Concerning the Supreme Court's use of the phrase 'only objective evidence,' a condition of confinement claim against a particular individual defendant often will include an additional, subjective component (proof of deliberate indifference) in order to establish that particular defendant's liability. . . However, where the conduct in question is 'purposefully or knowingly' applied, satisfaction of an objective standard is sufficient to establish liability. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2472 (2015). This discussion assumes, arguendo, that Plaintiff's allegations describe a condition purposefully or knowingly applied by the named Defendants.")

Doan v. Bergeron, No. 15-CV-11725-IT, 2016 WL 5346935, at *4 (D. Mass. Sept. 23, 2016) ("Immigration detainees' constitutional claims status is akin to that of pretrial detainees. . . 'Pretrial detainees are protected under the ... Due Process Clause rather than the Eighth Amendment; however, the standard to be applied is the same as that used in Eighth Amendment cases.' Burrell v. Hampshire Ctv., 307 F.3d 1, 7 (1st Cir. 2002) (citing Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 545 (1979)). Under the Eighth Amendment standard, a detainee must prove that defendants' withholding of 'essential health care ... amounted to "deliberate indifference to a serious medical need."'. . Mere 'substandard care, malpractice, negligence, inadvertent failure to provide care, and disagreement as to the appropriate course of treatment' is 'insufficient to prove a constitutional violation.'. . Instead, deliberate indifference may be established 'by decisions about medical care made recklessly with "actual knowledge of impending harm, easily preventable."'")

Holloman v. Clarke, No. 14-12594-NMG, 2016 WL 5339721, at *2–3 (D. Mass. Sept. 22, 2016) ("[C]ases before 2012, when the conduct here allegedly occurred, clearly establish that an officer has a duty to intervene when another officer uses excessive force against a pretrial detainee. . . Even though the Supreme Court held in 2015 that the Fourteenth Amendment objective standard applies to pretrial detainees in excessive force cases, both the Fourteenth Amendment and the standard for failure to intervene turn on the reasonableness of the circumstances. As a result, the standard was clearly established in 2012. . . Because Holloman has alleged a constitutional violation that was clearly established at the time of the alleged conduct of Ferrarra and Maine, they are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

SECOND CIRCUIT

Lara-Grimaldi v. County of Putnam, No. 23-0040, 2025 WL 922897, at *17, *24 (2d Cir. Mar. 27, 2025) ("[T]he 'or should have known' prong of the objective standard for assessing deliberate indifference means that an officer's lack of actual knowledge is not to be considered. The district court here, in concluding that no reasonable juror could find Jackson, Napolitano, or Nigro to have been deliberately indifferent to the risk of a Grimaldi suicide attempt, appeared to find relevant the descriptions by these defendants as to their lack of knowledge or lack of belief in any such risk. The court noted testimony by 'Napolitano, Jackson, and Nigro ... suggesting that they did not believe Grimaldi was a suicide risk'; that 'Jackson at no point thought Grimaldi needed more than routine supervision;' and that 'Nigro "never knew that [Grimaldi's suicide attempt] could happen."'. . In Kingsley, the Supreme Court viewed instructions containing such references to the defendant officers' state of mind as erroneous because 'the jury was instructed to consider ... [w]hether [respondents] reasonably believed there was a threat,' which helped to 'suggest[that] the jury should weigh respondents' subjective reasons ... and subjective views about' their conduct. . . As 'that was error' as a jury instruction for determinations of fact, . . . even less is it appropriate as an element in the court's consideration of whether to grant judgment for the defendants as a matter of law. . . .In sum, a rational juror could find that Nigro testified falsely at her deposition in (a) denying her knowledge of any of Grimaldi's three risk indicia, and (b) insisting that she had performed the required routine care check on Grimaldi on the afternoon of October 28. And it could find that she falsely indicated to others that she had asked Grimaldi about her condition and expectations when in fact she had not. With the record viewed as a whole, and with permissible inferences drawn in favor of Plaintiff, a rational juror--finding that Nigro had falsely denied having knowledge of Grimaldi's three risk indicia, had falsely stated to a coworker and the Sheriff that she had asked Grimaldi about her expectation of withdrawal symptoms, and had falsely claimed orally, and in writing, and under oath at her deposition that she had performed the required routine check--could find (a) that Nigro either knew or should have known that Grimaldi was expecting withdrawal symptoms, and (b) that, by not performing the required routine check, Nigro deliberately disregarded a significant risk that Grimaldi might attempt to commit suicide. We conclude that the district court's grant of summary judgment dismissing Plaintiff's § 1983 deliberate indifference claim against Nigro was error.")

Callwood v. Meyer, No. 20-2091-CV, 2022 WL 1642558, at *3 & n.2 (2d Cir. May 24, 2022) (not reported) ("At the time of the events in this case (February 2014), this Court's standard as to the relevant prong of a Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim employed a subjective perspective, i.e., whether the defendant 'was both aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm existed, and also drew the inference.'. . On the merits, the Plaintiffs point to no record evidence that Strand—who was told merely that Hardaway was 'faking' an unidentified medical issue and who was provided with no additional detail about Hardaway's condition—was aware of facts from which an inference of substantial risk of harm to Hardaway could be drawn, or that Strand drew such an inference. . . Nor have we been pointed to evidence that Strand either observed or had reason to know that 'any constitutional violation [was being] committed by a law enforcement official' against Hardaway. . . The Plaintiffs have thus failed to show that Strand 'acted with deliberate indifference' to Hardaway's medical need. . . . Since Darnell, in Charles v. Orange Cty., 925 F.3d 73 (2d Cir. 2019), we explained that:
[A] detainee asserting a Fourteenth Amendment claim for deliberate indifference to his medical needs can allege either that the defendants knew that failing to provide the complained of medical treatment would pose a substantial risk to his health or that the defendants should have known that failing to provide the omitted medical treatment would pose a substantial risk to the detainee's health.
Id. at 87. Even under the standard announced in Charles and Darnell, however, the result would remain the same. Strand's information, provided by the officers on the scene, furnished no reason for concern about Hardaway's health. Accordingly, there is no basis for finding that Strand 'should have known[ ] that [Hardaway's] condition posed an excessive risk to [his] health or safety,'. . . or that his failure to intervene was a violation of Hardaway's constitutional rights.")

Darby v. Greenman, 14 F.4th 124, 132, 139-41 (2d Cir. 2021) (Carney, J., dissenting) ("Darby's claims arose during his time in custody, first in a pretrial setting and then after his conviction. His § 1983 claims therefore implicate the protections of both the Fourteenth Amendment, as to his pretrial detention, and the Eighth Amendment, as to his posttrial incarceration. To state a claim under § 1983 as to either, Darby must allege that he was denied treatment for an objectively 'serious medical condition.'. . He must also plausibly allege that the defendants acted with 'deliberate indifference' to his serious medical needs. . . With regard to his Fourteenth Amendment pretrial-detention claim, Darby must allege facts sufficient to support an inference that the relevant defendants acted with deliberate indifference under the objective standard: that is, that Dr. Greenman and the Doe Defendants knew or should have known that they exposed Darby to an objectively serious harm or risk of harm. . . With regard to his Eighth Amendment post-conviction claim, in contrast, Darby must allege facts sufficient to demonstrate deliberate indifference on the part of Dr. Hamilton under the subjective standard, meaning that Dr. Hamilton was aware of and consciously disregarded a substantial risk of serious harm. . . . Unfortunately, Darby's experience with such patently inadequate dental care does not appear to be unusual for many incarcerated individuals. Our Court and courts in our Circuit are all too familiar with troubling claims from inmates regarding inadequate dental care. [collecting cases] In my view, we owe incarcerated persons such as Darby care that is, at the very least, not deliberately indifferent to their serious medical and dental conditions. . . .For over four months while incarcerated at Rikers Island, Darby experienced severe gum pain from an almost golf-ball sized abscess in his mouth. He had trouble sleeping, eating, and talking, and lost twenty pounds as a result. As we have commented before, 'Any person who has spent a night tossing and turning in suffering from an abscessed tooth knows that dental pain can be excru[c]iatingly severe.'. . Although he saw two prison dentists and filed over 15 sick call requests that described his symptoms in detail, Darby received no real care for a condition that was eminently treatable by gum surgery. Instead, one dentist offered a tooth extraction; the other, a dental cleaning. I am concerned that the Majority's decision affirming the district court's dismissal of Darby's complaint may work to immunize the relevant prison officials from liability in Darby's and in other cases. In my view, the course of events specifically alleged by Darby could—if borne out by evidence—reasonably support a determination that the officials and dentists were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs. The district court erred by dismissing his complaint under Rule 12(b)(6), and I believe the Majority errs now by affirming that dismissal. I respectfully dissent.")

Charles v. Orange County, 925 F.3d 73, 85-90 (2d Cir. 2019) ("As discussed above, pursuant to the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Supreme Court has extended to civil detainees Estelle's protection for prisoners under the Eighth Amendment. . . Thus, those in civil detention, as were Plaintiffs in this case, are also afforded a right to be free from deliberate indifference to their serious medical needs. . . . In Darnell, we clarified that deliberate indifference, in the context of a Fourteenth Amendment due process claim, can be shown by something akin to recklessness, and does not require proof of a malicious or callous state of mind. . . Deliberate indifference, we held, can be established by either a subjective or objective standard: A plaintiff can prove deliberate indifference by showing that the defendant official 'recklessly failed to act with reasonable care to mitigate the risk that the condition posed to the pretrial detainee even though the defendant-official knew, or should have known, that the condition posed an excessive risk to [the plaintiff's] health or safety.'. . This formulation of the deliberate indifference standard was developed in cases involving unconstitutional conditions of confinement. In Darnell, the plaintiffs complained, inter alia, that the facility where they were detained was unsafe and unsanitary. . . Although Darnell did not specifically address medical treatment, the same principle applies here. . . A plaintiff must show 'something more than mere negligence' to establish deliberate indifference in the Fourteenth Amendment context. . . . Thus, a detainee asserting a Fourteenth Amendment claim for deliberate indifference to his medical needs can allege either that the defendants knew that failing to provide the complained of medical treatment would pose a substantial risk to his health or that the defendants should have known that failing to provide the omitted medical treatment would pose a substantial risk to the detainee's health. Whether the state knew or should have known of the substantial risk of harm to the detainee is a question of fact subject to demonstration in the usual ways, including inference from circumstantial evidence. . . . Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that Defendants were fully aware of, and violated, both Orange County and ICE policies by failing to provide them with discharge planning as part of their care. Plaintiffs' allegations, if proven true, are sufficient to establish that Defendants knew, or should have known, of the substantial risk that Plaintiffs would relapse and suffer serious adverse health consequences if they were not provided with necessary discharge planning, such that a fact-finder could infer 'reckless disregard' beyond mere negligence or medical malpractice. . . .After discovery, the district court will be in a better position to determine the precise parameters of the treatment that should have been provided; whether the failure to provide any mandated care was attributable to Defendants' deliberate indifference, mere negligence, or unforeseen and unforeseeable circumstances; and what, if any, damages were caused by any dereliction on the part of Defendants. . . But, at the pleading stage, we hold that Plaintiffs have adequately stated a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim.")

Valdiviezo v. Boyer, No. 17-1093, 2018 WL 5096345, at * (2d Cir. Oct. 18, 2018) (not reported) ("[T]he allegations are sufficient to plausibly raise an inference that the medical staff had the requisite mens rea for a Fourteenth Amendment deliberate-indifference claim. Under the Fourteenth Amendment, the defendant's state of mind is evaluated objectively. Darnell, 849 F.3d at 36. A plaintiff must show "that the defendant-official acted intentionally to impose the alleged condition, or recklessly failed to act with reasonable care to mitigate the risk that the condition posed to the pretrial detainee even though the defendant-official knew, or should have known, that the condition posed an excessive risk to health or safety." Id. at 35. Here, after Valdiviezo was dropped once, causing him to cry out in pain, the medical staff was aware that there was a risk that Valdiviezo would be dropped again. Accordingly, Valdiviezo sufficiently alleged that the two members of the medical staff acted recklessly when they ordered the detainees to pick him up again. We therefore vacate and remand with regard to this claim.")

Edrei v. Maguire, 892 F.3d 525, 529-38 (2d Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 2614 (2019) ("In a narrow ruling, we hold that purposefully using a LRAD in a manner capable of causing serious injury to move non-violent protesters to the sidewalks violates the Fourteenth Amendment under clearly established law. . . . Like the district court, we begin with the first prong. . . . While the parties agree that the Fourteenth Amendment establishes a right against excessive force, they disagree about the relevant test. Defendants maintain that the proper inquiry is whether the conduct shocks the conscience. . . They argue that this standard includes a subjective element—whether the officers behaved 'maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm.'. . . Plaintiffs counter that conduct shocks the conscience when the use of force was both 'objectively unreasonable' and 'intentional, as opposed to negligent.'. . . Kingsley offers two important insights. First, the objective standard it announced confirms that the subjective mental state referenced in Glick and some of this Court's other precedents is not a necessary showing. Second, and more significantly, Kingsley used modified terminology to describe the Fourteenth Amendment standard. Although prior excessive force cases spoke of whether the official's conduct 'shocks the conscience,' Lewis, 523 U.S. at 846 (collecting cases), Kingsley asked whether the force was 'objectively unreasonable[.]' . . . [W]e have not treated the precise factual context at issue in Kingsley—a pretrial detainee claiming excessive force—as a limitation on the Fourteenth Amendment standard announced therein. In our one case to engage closely with Kingsley, we held that its standard applied not just to excessive force claims, but also to those alleging deliberate indifference toward pretrial detainees. Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 33–34 (2d Cir. 2017). In reaching this conclusion, the Darnell Court did not apply Kingsley's language mechanically. Instead it looked to the sweep and substance of the Supreme Court's reasoning. We do the same. . . . The distinction Kingsley drew was not between pretrial detainees and nondetainees. Instead, it was between claims brought under the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause and those brought under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . . Kingsley held that excessiveness is measured objectively and then identified various considerations that inform the ultimate Fourteenth Amendment inquiry: whether the governmental action was rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective. . . To put a finer point on it, Kingsley teaches that purposeful, knowing or (perhaps) reckless action that uses an objectively unreasonable degree of force is conscience shocking. . . Although we now hold that Kingsley provides the appropriate standard for all excessive force claims brought under the Fourteenth Amendment, it bears emphasizing that this new formulation is but a modest refinement of Glick's four factor test, on which this Court has long relied. . . . Applying Kingsley's analysis to the allegations at hand, we conclude that the plaintiffs' complaint states a Fourteenth Amendment violation. . . . [P]laintiffs' allegations indicate that the officers' use of the LRAD's area denial function was disproportionate to the limited security risk posed by the non-violent protest and caused substantial physical injuries. Or, stated somewhat differently, the defendants' use of a device capable of causing pain and hearing loss was an 'exercise of power without any reasonable justification in the service of a legitimate government objective.'. . Because defendants have chosen to appeal the denial of a motion to dismiss, we are compelled to accept the allegations as true and must therefore conclude that the complaint adequately states a Fourteenth Amendment claim.") Monaco v. Sullivan, No. 16-3537-CV, 2018 WL 2670506, at *6 (2d Cir. June 5, 2018) (not reported) ("The district court held that Monaco failed to make an adequate showing to survive summary judgment on either the objective or the subjective prongs. When assessing the subjective prong, the district court applied Caiozzo, where we held that a plaintiff must show 'that the government-employed defendant disregarded a risk of harm to the plaintiff of which the defendant was aware.'. . Monaco failed to meet this standard, the court concluded, because the record contained no evidence suggesting that Packard knew that his failure to prescribe Lithium posed a threat to Monaco. On appeal, Monaco does not dispute that he would not meet the Caiozzo test. He instead points out that this Court overruled Caiozzo. In Darnell, decided a year after the district court's decision in this case, we held that a plaintiff can meet the subjective prong of the deliberate indifference test as long as the defendant 'should have known' that his action 'posed an excessive risk to [the plaintiff's] health or safety.'. . Monaco therefore argues on appeal that we should vacate the district court's grant of summary judgment because it applied the now-defunct Caiozzo standard, and a jury could reasonably conclude that Packard acted recklessly under Darnell. We disagree. Assuming arguendo that Monaco is correct that Packard's failure to prescribe Lithium was reckless, Packard would still be entitled to qualified immunity. Darnell was decided in 2017 and thus could not have clearly established that reckless medical treatment amounts to deliberate indifference at the time Packard treated Monaco. Indeed, before Caiozzo, we had never decided this issue at all. . . Because Packard did not violate clearly established law when he treated Monaco in 1998, the district court did not err in granting summary judgment on this claim.")

Bruno v. City of Schenectady, No. 16-1131, 2018 WL 1357377 (2d Cir. Mar. 16, 2018) (not reported) ("The district court's decision dismissing Bruno's deliberate indifference claim predated our decision in Darnell and therefore utilized a 'subjective' rather than 'objective' standard. . . Because this standard focused purely on the mindset of the defendants, rather than on what a 'reasonable person' would have believed under the circumstances, it is now erroneous. . . We thus vacate and remand the district court's decision dismissing Bruno's deliberate indifference claim so that it can be adjudicated under the standard adopted in Darnell.")

Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 21, 27-36 & n.15 (2d Cir. 2017) ("Among other issues, this case requires us to consider whether, consistent with Willey, and the precedents on which it is based, appalling conditions of confinement cannot rise to an objective violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause so long as the detainee is subjected to those conditions for no more than twenty-four hours, and the detainee does not suffer an actual, serious injury during that time. This case also requires us to consider whether Kingsley altered the standard for conditions of confinement claims under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . .Relying on this Court's decision in Caiozzo v. Koreman, 581 F.3d 63, 72 (2d Cir. 2009), the District Court concluded that the elements for establishing deliberate indifference under the Fourteenth Amendment were the same as under the Eighth Amendment. . . Therefore, the District Court required the plaintiffs to prove that, '(1) objectively, the deprivation the [detainee] suffered was "sufficiently serious that he was denied the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities," and (2) subjectively, the defendant official acted with "a sufficiently culpable state of mind ..., such as deliberate indifference to [detainee] health or safety."'. . In applying this test, the District Court erred in two respects. First, the District Court misapplied this Court's precedents in assessing whether the plaintiffs had established an objectively serious deprivation. Second, we conclude that the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley altered the standard for deliberate indifference claims under the Due Process Clause. . . .In Willey v. Kirkpatrick, 801 F.3d 51, 68 (2d Cir. 2015), this Court recently reiterated that the proper lens through which to analyze allegedly unconstitutional unsanitary conditions of confinement is with reference to their severity and duration, not the detainee's resulting injury. . . .The standards for evaluating objective deprivations, as articulated in Willey, thus extend to each of the nine challenged conditions of confinement at issue in this case---(1) Overcrowding; (2) Unusable Toilets; (3) Garbage and Inadequate Sanitation; (4) Infestation; (5) Lack of Toiletries and Other Hygienic Items; (6) Inadequate Nutrition; (7) Extreme Temperatures and Poor Ventilation; (8) Deprivation of Sleep; and (9) Crime and Intimidation---regardless of whether those conditions relate to a deprivation involving sanitation or inadequate nutrition. Each of these conditions must be measured by its severity and duration, not the resulting injury, and none of these conditions is subject to a bright-line durational or severity threshold. Moreover, the conditions must be analyzed in combination, not in isolation, at least where one alleged deprivation has a bearing on another. . . .The second element of a conditions of confinement claim brought under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment is the defendant's

'deliberate indifference' to any objectively serious condition of confinement. Courts have traditionally referred to this second element as the 'subjective prong.' But 'deliberate indifference,' which is roughly synonymous with "recklessness," can be defined either "subjectively" in a criminal sense, or 'objectively' in a civil sense. As such, the 'subjective prong' might better be described as the 'mens rea prong' or 'mental element prong.'. . .The Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015)---in which the Supreme Court concluded that excessive force claims brought under the Fourteenth Amendment do not require the same subjective intent standard as excessive force claims brought under the Eighth Amendment---has undercut the reasoning in Caiozzo. . . . Following the Supreme Court's analysis in Kingsley, there is no basis for the reasoning in Caiozzo that the subjective intent requirement for deliberate indifference claims under the Eighth Amendment, as articulated in Farmer, must apply to deliberate indifference claims under the Fourteenth Amendment. Caiozzo is thus overruled to the extent that it determined that the standard for deliberate indifference is the same under the Fourteenth Amendment as it is under the Eighth Amendment. . . .After Kingsley, it is plain that punishment has no place in defining the mens rea element of a pretrial detainee's claim under the Due Process Clause. Unlike a violation of the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause, an official can violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment without meting out any punishment, which means that the Due Process Clause can be violated when an official does not have subjective awareness that the official's acts (or omissions) have subjected the pretrial detainee to a substantial risk of harm. Kingsley held that an officer's appreciation of the officer's application of excessive force against a pretrial detainee in violation of the detainee's due process rights should be viewed objectively. The same objective analysis should apply to an officer's appreciation of the risks associated with an unlawful condition of confinement in a claim for deliberate indifference under the Fourteenth Amendment. A pretrial detainee may not be punished at all under the Fourteenth Amendment, whether through the use of excessive force, by deliberate indifference to conditions of confinement, or otherwise. Therefore, to establish a claim for deliberate indifference to conditions of confinement under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the pretrial detainee must prove that the defendant-official acted intentionally to impose the alleged condition, or recklessly failed to act with reasonable care to mitigate the risk that the condition posed to the pretrial detainee even though the defendant-official knew, or should have known, that the condition posed an excessive risk to health or safety. In other words, the 'subjective prong' (or 'mens rea prong') of a deliberate indifference claim is defined objectively. In concluding that deliberate indifference should be defined objectively for a claim of a due process violation, we join the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, which, sitting en banc in Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1070 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc), cert. denied, No. 16-655, 2017 WL 276190 (U.S. Jan. 23, 2017), likewise interpreted Kingsley as standing for the proposition that deliberate indifference for due process purposes should be measured by an objective standard. . . The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit concluded that Kingsley's broad reasoning extends beyond the excessive force context in which it arose. . . .Consistency with the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley now dictates that deliberate indifference be measured objectively in due process cases. . . . The defendants cite several decisions by other Courts of Appeals that have continued to apply a subjective standard to deliberate indifference claims for pretrial detainees after Kingsley. But none of those cases considered whether Kingsley had altered the standard for deliberate indifference for pretrial detainees. See, e.g., Brown v. Chapman, No. 15-3506, 2016 WL 683260 (6th Cir. Feb. 19, 2016); Moore v. Diggins, 633 F. App'x 672 (10th Cir. 2015) (summary opinion); Mason v.Lafayette City-Par. Consol. Gov't, 806 F.3d 268 (5th Cir. 2015*); Smith v. Dart*, 803 F.3d 304, 310 n.2 (7th Cir. 2015) (noting, in light of Kingsley, that the parties argued the state of mind element but that "it is not at issue in this appeal").")

Dancy v. McGinley, 843 F.3d 93, 117-19 (2d Cir. 2016) ("Williams argues that, under Section 1983, a plaintiff 'must establish that the force used was purposeful or intentional, and not accidental,' citing the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015). . . But Kingsley addressed only the legally requisite state of mind required for a pretrial detainee's excessive force claims under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . What mental state a § 1983 plaintiff is required to prove depends on the right at issue. . . . In Hudson, we 'readily' 'assum[ed]' that 'all Fourth Amendment violations require intentional actions by officers, rather than "the accidental effects of otherwise lawful government conduct."'. . But in the excessive force context, the intent in question can only be the intent to perform some action, not that a particular result be achieved. So long as the plaintiff can point to unreasonable intentional action taken that proximately caused the injury after the seizure is initiated, no additional intent to injure is required. . . .Instructing that a plaintiff must show that 'the defendant acted intentionally or recklessly' and that if 'the defendant's acts were merely negligent ... [the jury] must find that the plaintiff has not established his claim' could be understood to suggest incorrectly that an officer must have intended the results of his actions or consciously disregarded their consequences. The district court's instruction thus may have led the jury to erroneously believe that it was required to find that Williams intended to hit Dancy's face against the car and/or to injure him. . . .[T]o the extent Dancy was required to prove any intent at all, it was satisfied by Williams's admission that he applied some degree of force and did so deliberately. It was that force that Dancy claims was both objectively unreasonable and caused his injuries. The jury could find either that the injury did not actually occur as a result of the force Williams applied, meaning that Williams did not proximately cause Dancy's injury, or that the amount of force used was reasonable. What it could not do was conclude that Williams intentionally used force, but was not liable because he did not intend that the force result in the injury Dancy suffered.")

Ross v. Correction Officers John & Jane Does 1-5, 610 F. App'x 75, 77 n.1 (2d Cir. 2015) ("At the time of the challenged conduct, we analyzed claims alleging deliberate indifference under the same standard irrespective of whether they were brought by prisoners pursuant to the Eighth Amendment or by pretrial detainees under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . The Supreme Court recently distinguished between Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment claims in holding that a pretrial detainee alleging that an officer used excessive force against him in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment need not demonstrate that such officer was subjectively aware that his use of force was unreasonable. [citing Kingsley] Because our focus, in analyzing whether qualified immunity applies, is on whether the right asserted by Ross was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, we need not address Kingsley's possible implications for deliberate indifference claims brought by pre-trial detainees.")

Murrell v. Sheron, No. 21-CV-6576-EAW, 2023 WL 1970487, at *4 (W.D.N.Y. Feb. 13, 2023) (Wolford, C.J.) ("The Court found initially that Plaintiff (1) failed to plausibly allege both the objective and subjective (mens rea) prongs of a due process violation regarding his slip-and-fall at the Jail, and (2) even if he had plausibly alleged those two prongs, he did not allege that Sheron was personally involved in the alleged due process violation. . . The Court concluded that '[a]t most, Plaintiff allege[d] that Sheron was negligent in not ensuring that safety bars or mats were installed in the shower area at the Jail.'. . The amended complaint does not allege any additional facts to alter this conclusion. Plaintiff alleges only that the lack of rubber mats and safety bars 'related to the plaintiff slipped and fell [sic] coming out of the shower' and that Sheron failed 'to secure safety equipment within the shower area....'. . . This fails to plausibly allege that the lack of rubber mats and safety bars posed an unreasonable risk of harm to Plaintiff's health or safety and that Sheron knew of or should have known of that risk. The amended complaint, again, at most alleges negligence, which does not state a constitutional violation. . . Plaintiff's status as a pretrial detainee does not transform a state law tort claim into a constitutional violation actionable under § 1983.")

Bogan v. Westchester County Correction, No. 20-CV-2143 (LLS), 2020 WL 1330442, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 20, 2020) ("For pretrial detainees, the standard articulated in Darnell applies to all types of deliberate indifference claims, including claims for deliberate indifference to serious medical needs.")

Gilliam v. Black, No. 3:18CV1740 (SRU), 2019 WL 3716545, at *10-11 (D. Conn. Aug. 7, 2019) ("Although, as indicated above, the Supreme Court has ruled in Kingsley that only an objective standard is appropriate when analyzing claims of excessive force brought by pre-trial detainees, it is unclear to what extent this ruling is applicable to a pretrial detainee's claims of sexual abuse under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . I conclude that under either the Eighth Amendment standard set forth in Crawford that involves both objective and subjective prongs or under the Fourteenth Amendment post-Kinglsey excessive force standard that involves only an objective prong, Gilliam's allegations state a plausible claim of sexual abuse. . . . Following the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley, the Second Circuit clarified the legal standard to be applied to a pretrial detainee's claims of deliberate indifference under the Fourteenth Amendment. See Darnell, 849 F.3d at 29. . . There are two prongs to the standard governing a conditions of confinement claim under the Fourteenth Amendment. Although Darnell involved a conditions of confinement claim, I conclude that the same standard is applicable to a deliberate indifference to medical needs claim. . . Under the first prong, a detainee must allege that 'the conditions, either alone or in combination, pose[d] an unreasonable risk of serious damage to his health ... which includes the risk of serious damage to physical and mental soundness.'. . The second or subjective prong, also called 'the mens rea prong, of [the] deliberate indifference [standard] is defined objectively.'. . Thus, 'the Due Process Clause can be violated when an official does not have subjective awareness that the official's acts (or omissions) have' created a condition that poses 'a substantial risk of harm' to a detainee. . . To meet the second prong of a Fourteenth Amendment conditions claim, a detainee must allege that the prison official 'acted intentionally to impose the alleged condition, or recklessly failed to act with reasonable care to mitigate the risk that the condition posed to [him or her] even though the [prison] official knew, or should have known, that the condition posed an excessive risk to health or safety.'")

Granger v. Santiago, No. 3:19CV60(MPS), 2019 WL 1644237, at *6–7 (D. Conn. Apr. 16, 2019) ("Although, as indicated above, the Supreme Court has ruled in Kingsley that only an objective standard is appropriate when analyzing claims of excessive force brought by pre-trial detainees, it is unclear to what extent this ruling is applicable to a pretrial detainee's claims of sexual abuse under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . The court concludes that under either the Eighth Amendment standard set forth in Crawford that involves both objective and subjective prongs or under the Fourteenth Amendment post-Kinglsey excessive force standard that involves only an objective prong, the plaintiff's allegations state a plausible claim of sexual abuse. The plaintiff has alleged facts to suggest that Lieutenant Tosses conducted the manual body cavity search for the purpose of humiliating him rather than for a legitimate penological purpose and that he suffered physical and possibly psychological harm as a result of the search. The court concludes that the plaintiff has articulated a sufficiently serious deprivation to satisfy the objective prong of an Eighth Amendment claim under Crawford. Furthermore, if 'no legitimate law enforcement or penological purpose can be inferred from the defendant's alleged conduct, the abuse itself may, in some circumstances, be sufficient evidence of a culpable state of mind.'. . The court concludes that the plaintiff has plausibly alleged that a legitimate penological purpose may not be inferred from the manual body cavity search given the circumstances under which it was performed. Thus, the search itself may constitute evidence of a culpable state of mind and meet the subjective prong of the Eighth Amendment standard. Thus, the facts as alleged plausibly meet the subjective requirement of a sexual abuse claim under the Eighth Amendment standard. Applying the objective Fourteenth Amendment excessive force standard, as described by the United States Supreme Court in Kingsley, to the claim of sexual abuse asserted by the plaintiff, a pretrial detainee, the court concludes that the plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to state a claim that the force used by Lieutenant Tosses in conducting the body cavity search was unreasonable. . . Although the plaintiff's concession that he had ingested contraband was a serious security concern, there was at least one alternative to a manual body cavity search that was delineated under Department of Correction Administrative Directive 6.7 – placement of the plaintiff in a dry cell. Further, the plaintiff had willingly consented to that alternative, another officer or official had suggested the alternative during the search, and Lieutenant Tosses made no attempt to temper his use of force given the information available to him. Accordingly, the Fourteenth Amendment sexual assault claim against Lieutenant Tosses and Correctional Officer Evans will proceed.")

Vann v. City of Rochester, No. 6:18-CV-06464(MAT), 2019 WL 1331572, at *6 (W.D.N.Y. Mar. 25, 2019) ("'While the Second Circuit's holding in Darnell was applied to a claim of deliberate indifference to unconstitutional conditions of confinement, a footnote in Darnell indicates that "deliberate indifference means the same thing for each type of claim under the Fourteenth Amendment."' . . Consequently, district courts in this Circuit have 'applied Darnell's objective "mens rea" prong to claims of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs under the Fourteenth Amendment.'")

Swinton v. Livingston County, No. 15-CV-00053A(F), 2018 WL 4637376, at *15 (W.D.N.Y. Sept. 27, 2018) ("[A]s of 2014, the legal standard applicable to Plaintiff's medical indifference claim was not so clearly established. In particular, prior to the Supreme Court's pronouncement in Kingsley, . . . decided in 2015, that mandated the second element of a pretrial detainee's conditions of confinement claim as an objective standard, at issue in Kingsley was a claim of excessive force, not medical indifference. Significantly, the Supreme Court has yet to apply Kingsley to a medical indifference claim, and the Second Circuit did not do so until this year when it construed the second element of such claim as 'whether a "reasonable person" would appreciate the risk to which the detainee was subjected,' Bruno, 727 Fed.Appx. at 720 (quoting Darnell, 849 F.3d at 29). Accordingly, because the second element of a medical indifference claim was not clearly decided at the time relevant to Plaintiff's claim regarding his abscessed tooth, Moving Defendants would be qualifiedly immune from liability on such claim.")

Sandford v. Rugar, No. 16-CV-6187-FPG, 2018 WL 3069107, at *3 (W.D.N.Y. June 21, 2018) ("Plaintiff was a pre-trial detainee at the time of the complained-of events, and so the Court reviews his inadequate medical care claims under the more forgiving Fourteenth Amendment due process standard for a pretrial detainee, rather than as an Eighth Amendment claim appropriate for a sentenced prisoner. See Darnell v Pineiro, 849 F3d 17, 33 (2d Cir. 2017) (discussing the impact of Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466 (2015), on Eighth Amendment claims). The Second Circuit, construing the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley, held that a plaintiff asserting a deliberate indifference claim under the Due Process Clause must show that the official intentionally imposed the alleged condition, or recklessly failed to act with reasonable care to mitigate the risk that the condition posed to the pretrial detainee even though the official knew, or should have known, that the condition posed an excessive risk to health or safety. . . This intentional or reckless conduct standard requires more than mere negligence.")

Walker v. Wright, No. 3:17-CV-425 (JCH), 2018 WL 2225009, at *5 (D. Conn. May 15, 2018) ("While the Second Circuit's holding in Darnell was applied to a claim of deliberate indifference to unconstitutional conditions of confinement, a footnote in Darnell indicates that 'deliberate indifference means the same thing for each type of claim under the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . . District courts in this Circuit have therefore applied Darnell's objective 'mens rea' prong to claims of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs under the Fourteenth Amendment. [collecting cases]")

Jeffers v. City of New York, No. 14CV6173CBAST, 2018 WL 904230, at *30 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 13, 2018) ("In deciding whether plaintiffs have satisfied this standard, courts must be cognizant that the standard for assessing culpability has recently changed in this Circuit. Until recently, the standard for assessing the defendant's state-of-mind under the under the Fourteenth Amendment was identical to the standard governing convicted inmates under the Eighth Amendment. Under that standard, plaintiffs had to prove that the defendant was subjectively aware of the risk posed to the plaintiff and deliberately chose to ignore it. But in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), the Supreme Court held that this subjective standard did not apply to excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees. The logic of that decision naturally extends to other claims brought by pretrial detainees, and so the Second Circuit held in Darnell v. Pineiro that a pretrial detainee need not prove that the defendant was actually aware of the risk of constitutional injury. Thus, opinions prior to that decision may lack authority, as they may apply an inappropriately strict standard to the claims of pretrial detainees." Footnotes omitted)

Shakir v. Derby Police Dep't., No. 3:11-CV-1940 (JCH), 2018 WL 306700, at *30–31& n.33 (D. Conn. Jan. 5, 2018) ("[T]he Fourth Amendment standard of objective reasonableness differs from the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment standards. The Fourth Amendment inquiry is objective and does not look to the officer's mental state. . . To the contrary, the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment standards require that the officer acted with the necessary level of culpability regarding the unconstitutional condition. . . Additionally, the objective component under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments enunciate a stricter standard than the Fourth Amendment. . . Therefore, the precedents finding no constitutional violation under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments are not dispositive of Shakir's claim evaluated under the Fourth Amendment. In this case, construing the facts in the light most favorable to Shakir, a reasonable jury could conclude that Stankye's conduct toward Shakir created conditions of confinement that were objectively unreasonable. . . As noted previously, the Fourth Amendment requires balancing the 'nature and quality of the intrusion' with the 'countervailing governmental interests at stake.'. . Although countervailing government interests in maintaining security may require a strip search for weapons or contraband under certain conditions, a jury could reasonably conclude that, even if the strip search was objectively reasonable, the security interest does not extend after the search has been completed and no weapons have been found. Therefore, a jury could find that it was objectively unreasonable to continue to deprive an arrestee of his clothing in a cold cell during the New England winter. Notably, Stankye does not identify a countervailing interest justifying his conduct because he asserts that he did not have any contact with Shakir at the police station at all on the day in question. . . Such issues of fact are appropriately determined by the jury, not by the court on summary judgment. . . . The Darnell court notes that the Supreme Court in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), defined deliberate indifference objectively in the Fourteenth Amendment context. . . Kingsley overruled prior Second Circuit precedent that treated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment standards the same for the purposes of deliberate indifference to unconstitutional conditions of confinement. . . Some of the cases addressing stripping and cold temperatures under the Fourteenth Amendment were decided under the prior rule treating Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment claims the same. . . However, even with the Supreme Court's change to the Fourteenth Amendment standard, it nonetheless remains distinct from a Fourth Amendment inquiry because the Fourteenth Amendment continues to require deliberate indifference, albeit defined differently.")

Davis v. McCready, No. 1:14-CV-6405-GHW, 2017 WL 4803918, at *5 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 23, 2017) (medical needs case) ("Until very recently, the second, or mens rea, prong—the defendant's 'sufficiently culpable state of mind'—was assessed subjectively in claims brought under both the Eighth and the Fourteenth Amendments. . . Earlier this year, the Second Circuit held that, in light of the Supreme Court's ruling in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), the pretrial detainee must prove that the defendant-official acted intentionally to impose the alleged condition, or recklessly failed to act with reasonable care to mitigate the risk that the condition posed to the pretrial detainee even though the defendant-official knew, or should have known, that the condition posed an excessive risk to health or safety. . . Accordingly, the mens rea prong of a deliberate indifference claim brought by a pretrial detainee is now to be assessed objectively.")

Torrez v. Semple, No. 3:17-CV-01211 (SRU), 2017 WL 3841686, at *3 (D. Conn. Sept. 1, 2017) ("The Second Circuit has applied Kinglsey—which expressly dealt with an excessive use of force claim—to claims of unconstitutional conditions of confinement by pretrial detainees, and has indicated that Kingsley should be applied to all deliberate indifference claims by pretrial detainees, as well. . . . Accordingly, for a claim of deliberate indifference to mental health needs or unconstitutional conditions of confinement under the Fourteenth Amendment, a pretrial detainee can satisfy the subjective element by showing that the defendants 'knew, or should have known, that the condition posed an excessive risk to health or safety.'. . At the same time, negligent actions alone do not rise to the level of deliberate indifference and are not cognizable under section 1983.")

Youngblood v. City of New York, No. 15-CV-3541 (RA), 2017 WL 3176002, at *4 & n.5 (S.D.N.Y. July 24, 2017) (" 'Although Darnell involved a challenge to conditions of confinement, the holding of the decision is broad enough to extend to medical deliberate-indifference claims.' Feliciano v. Anderson, No. 15-CV-4106, 2017 WL 1189747, at *13 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 30, 2017); see also Darnell, 849 F.3d at 33 n.9 ("[D]eliberate indifference means the same thing for each type of claim under the Fourteenth Amendment."). . . . [A]fter Darnell, a plaintiff suing under the Fourteenth Amendment can establish a claim based on a defendant's recklessness—i.e., that he 'knew, or should have known' that 'an excessive risk to health or safety' would result. . . As before, however, more than negligence is required to hold a defendant liable.")

Wilson v. Calderon, No. 14CIV6209GBDGWG, 2017 WL 2881153, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. July 6, 2017) ("It is not necessary to reach the issue of whether the officers' conduct here should be evaluated under the pre-Kingsley standard for qualified immunity purposes. Because disputed issues of material fact exist regarding the objective reasonableness of the officers' use of force, and because the same disputed issues of fact exist on the question of whether the officers' actions subjectively demonstrated the necessary level of culpability, the officers cannot be granted summary judgment on their qualified immunity defense.")

Gonzalez-Torres v. Newson, No. 3:17-CV-00455 (SRU), 2017 WL 2369369, at *3 (D. Conn. May 31, 2017) ("The Second Circuit has specifically applied Kingsley to claims of unconstitutional conditions of confinement by pretrial detainees and implied that Kingsley should be applied to all deliberate indifference claims of pretrial detainees. See Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 35 (2d Cir. 2017) ("A pretrial detainee may not be punished at all under the Fourteenth Amendment, whether through the use of excessive force, by deliberate indifference to the conditions of confinement, or otherwise."). The Second Circuit determined that 'the Due Process Clause can be violated when an official does not have subjective awareness that the official's acts (or omissions) have subjected the pretrial detainee to a substantial risk of harm.'. .Thus, the court defined the subjective prong of the deliberate indifference standard objectively.")

Hulett v. City of Syracuse, 253 F.Supp.3d 462, 489 (N.D.N.Y. 2017) ("In Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17 (2d Cir. 2017), the Court overruled in part Caiozzo, observing that the 'subjective prong' of a § 1983 deliberate indifference claim asserted by a pre-trial detainee is 'perhaps better classified as a "mens rea prong" or "mental element prong."'. . Accordingly, the Court concluded that 'deliberate indifference' in the Fourteenth Amendment context should be 'defined objectively,' meaning that the 'Due Process Clause can be violated [even] when an official does not have subjective awareness that the officials acts (or omissions) have subjected the pretrial detainee to a substantial risk of harm.'. . In other words, rather than ask whether the defendant 'kn[ew] of and disregard[ed] an excessive risk to [ ] health or safety,' the appropriate inquiry under the Fourteenth Amendment is whether the defendant 'knew, or should have known' that his conduct 'posed an excessive risk to health or safety.'. . After carefully considering the parties' briefing in light of this standard, the § 1983 claim against Sup'r Robinson will be dismissed. Centro is a public benefit corporation, N.Y. PUB. AUTH. LAW § 1328(a), and is therefore considered a municipal entity for purposes of § 1983. . . It would therefore follow that Sup'r Robinson, a Centro employee, acted 'under color of state law' during the incident. . . But both parties' accounts of events, considered in conjunction with the surveillance video, confirm that by the time Sup'r Robinson finally exited bus 1249 to observe the aftermath of Hulett's removal, SPD had taken control over the area by calling in additional officers as well as an ambulance. Importantly, even though plaintiff contends the Rural/Metro defendants were medically negligent and/or constitutionally indifferent to his needs, there is no factual dispute over whether Paramedic Maule and EMT Dreverman actually arrived in response to that call for assistance. Therefore, under either version of the facts, no reasonable jury could conclude that it was constitutionally unreasonable for Sup'r Robinson, at that point, to stand by and/or defer to the on-scene police and medical professionals. Simply put, plaintiff cannot demonstrate that, under these circumstances, Sup'r Robinson 'knew, or should have known' that his failure to take additional action under those particular circumstances 'posed an excessive risk' to plaintiff's immediate health or safety. . . Accordingly, the § 1983 medical indifference claim against Sup'r Robinson will be dismissed.")

Daly v. N.Y. City, No. 16CIV6521PAEJCF, 2017 WL 2364360, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. May 30, 2017) ("In the past, in order to make out a successful conditions of confinement claim, both pre-trial detainees and convicted prisoners were required to show that a defendant subjectively knew of a risk and disregarded it. . . Recently however, the Second Circuit has lowered this burden for pre-trial detainees in response to the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, —— U.S. ——, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015). Darnell, 849 F.3d at 29-36. Now, a pre-trial detainee can meet this prong by showing objectively that a reasonable person should have known of the risk of deprivation.")

Grimmett v. Corizon Medical Associates of New York, No. 15CV7351JPOSN, 2017 WL 2274485, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. May 24, 2017) ("Under the second prong of the deliberate indifference standard, a plaintiff must show that a defendant acted with a sufficiently culpable state of mind. Until recently, the analysis under this prong was identical whether the claim was brought under the Eighth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment. . . In February 2017, however, following the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), and while the parties were briefing the instant motion, the Second Circuit held that the analysis differs depending on whether the inmate is a convicted prisoner or a pretrial detainee. [citing Darnell] In particular, under the Eighth Amendment, deliberate indifference is equivalent to recklessness 'according to a more exacting subjective standard akin to that used in the criminal context, which would require proof of ... subjective awareness' on the part of the defendant. . . Deliberate indifference under the Eighth Amendment, therefore, means that a prison official 'appreciate[d] the risk to which a prisoner was subjected.'. . In contrast, after Darnell, a plaintiff suing under the Fourteenth Amendment is required to show only that the prison official acted with objective recklessness, or that the defendant 'knew, or should have known' that 'an excessive risk to health or safety' would result. . . As before, however, more than negligence is required to hold a defendant liable for violating either constitutional provision.")

Brown v. City of New York, No. 13-CV-06912, 2017 WL 1390678, at *10-11 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 17, 2017) ("In his first cause of action pursuant to § 1983, Brown alleges, among other things, that Warden Suprenant, Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O'Connell, Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz, Captain Skepple, and CO Tietjen engaged in conduct that amounted to deliberate indifference to his health or safety. Brown's deliberate indifference claims arise under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment because he was a pretrial detainee at the time of the incident. See Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 29 (2d Cir. 2017). While a convicted prisoner's claim of deliberate indifference arises under the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment, this proscription does not apply to a pretrial detainee because a pretrial detainee is not being punished. . . . To show deliberate indifference under the subjective prong, 'the pretrial detainee must prove that the defendant-official acted intentionally to impose the alleged condition, or recklessly failed to act with reasonable care to mitigate the risk that the condition posed to the pretrial detainee even though the defendant-official knew, or should have known, that the condition posed an excessive risk to health or safety.'. . Therefore, the pretrial detainee must prove that the prison official acted with 'a mens rea greater than mere negligence,'. . . because 'liability for negligently inflicted harm is categorically beneath the threshold of constitutional due process,' Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2472 (2015). . . . Here, Brown has not pled facts to establish that Warden Suprenant, Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O'Connell, Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz, Captain Skepple, and CO Tietjen acted with the state of mind necessary to establish deliberate indifference. None of these individuals was present at the time of the attack, and thus none of them could have actually intervened to stop it.

Further, none of these defendants was on notice that an attack was imminent because there had been no prior altercations involving Brown, and Brown had not complained to any prison officials that he was in danger.")

Lloyd v. City of N.Y., 246 F.Supp.3d 704, 718-19 (S.D.N.Y. 2017) ("The reasoning of Darnell applies equally to claims of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs under the Fourteenth Amendment. Darnell involved claims of deliberate indifference in the context of a challenge to conditions of confinement. However, as the Second Circuit noted there, Caiozzo, the case which Darnell overruled in part involved a claim for deliberate indifference to medcial needs under the Fourteenth Amendment. Nevertheless, the Court's interpretation of "deliberate indifference" applied to any pretrial detainee claim for deliberate indifference to "serious threat to ... health or safety"—such as from unconstitutional conditions of confinement, or the failure-to-protect—because deliberate indifference means the same thing for each type of claim under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . The Court therefore reads Darnell to require that the 'mens rea prong' of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs claims under the Fourteenth Amendment be analyzed objectively: rather than ask whether the charged official 'kn[ew] of and disregard[ed] an excessive risk to inmate health or safety,' courts are to instead determine whether the official 'knew, or should have known' that his or her conduct 'posed an excessive risk to health or safety.'")

Feliciano v. Anderson, No. 15CV4106LTSJLC, 2017 WL 1189747, *9-13 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 30, 2017) ("After Darnell, the so-called subjective prong of the deliberate-indifference test under the Fourteenth Amendment has become a misnomer, as it is now 'defined objectively.'. . Consequently, as the Second Circuit itself observed, the prong 'might better be described as the "mens rea prong" or "mental element prong."'. . Although Darnell involved a challenge to conditions of confinement, the holding of the decision is broad enough to extend to medical deliberate-indifference claims. Indeed, the Second Circuit stated that 'deliberate indifference means the same thing for each type of claim under the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . Further, the appellate court noted that its decision overruled its previous decision in Caiozzo 'to the extent that it determined that the standard for deliberate indifference is the same under the Fourteenth Amendment as it is under the Eighth Amendment.'. . And Caiozzo involved a claim of deliberate indifference to medical needs. . . Consequently, even though Darnell did not involve claims of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, the Court concludes that Darnell's holding with respect to the so-called subjective prong of the deliberate-indifference test applies here. For this reason, when deciding whether Feliciano has met this prong (which the Court will refer to as the mens rea or mental-element prong as suggested by the Second Circuit), the Court will employ an objective analysis. . . . To the Court's knowledge, no other decisions in this Circuit have yet applied Darnell to a claim of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. . . Before Darnell, to satisfy the subjective prong of the deliberate-indifference test, a pretrial detainee, like a convicted prisoner, was required to demonstrate that 'the charged official ... act[ed] with a sufficiently culpable state of mind.'. . The official's mental state did not have to 'reach the level of knowing and purposeful infliction of harm; it suffice[d] if the plaintiff prove[d] that the official acted with deliberate indifference to inmate health.'. . This mental state, which was akin to 'subjective recklessness, as the term is used in criminal law,' 'require [d] that the charged official act or fail to act while actually aware of a substantial risk that serious inmate harm [would] result.'. .After Darnell, the requisite mens rea more closely resembles recklessness as the term is used in the civil context, which does not require the defendant to be subjectively aware of the harm resulting from his acts or omissions. . . Applying Darnell to claims of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, the Court concludes that a defendant possesses the requisite mens rea when he acts or fails to act under circumstances in which he knew, or should have known, that a substantial risk of serious harm to the pretrial detainee would result. . . As was the case before Darnell, the defendants' 'actions [must be] more than merely negligent.'")

Little v. Mun. Corp., No. 12-CV-5851 (KMK), 2017 WL 1184326, at *8 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 29, 2017) ("The Court recognizes that this recent body of case law [Kingsley, Willey, Darnell] has significantly altered the judicial landscape since the Parties submitted their briefing on the instant Motion. Therefore, in light of the Second Circuit's decision in Darnell, Defendants' Motion To Dismiss Plaintiffs' conditions-of-confinement claims is denied without prejudice. Should Defendants wish to file a renewed Motion that addresses Plaintiffs' allegations of excessive confinement, unsanitary housing conditions, denial of food, exposure to extreme temperatures, and denial of laundry services, they may file a pre-motion letter with the Court detailing the merits of any such motion. Additionally, as the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley revised the applicable standard for excessive force claims, Defendants' Motion is dismissed without prejudice as to the claims for the use of chemical agent 'O.C.,'. . . as well as Little's allegations that he was 'pushed in the back by [Defendant] Spears and landed on his hands and knees into the water filled with bodily waste[.]' . . . Defendants may address these claims in any renewed motion to dismiss.")

Roldan v. Kang, No. 13-CV-6889 (JGK), 2016 WL 4625688, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 6, 2016) ("The Second Circuit Court of Appeals has acknowledged that the distinction outlined in Kingsley applies to excessive force claims under § 1983, but has not addressed the possible implications of Kingsley for claims of deliberate indifference to medical needs that are brought by pre-trial detainees. See Ross v. Corr. Officers John & Jane Does 1-5, 610 Fed.Appx. 75, 76 n.1 (2d Cir. 2015) (summary order). In this case, the plaintiff's claim is one for deliberate indifference to medical needs and not for the use of excessive force. It is unnecessary in this case to decide whether a subjective component is still required for a deliberate indifference to medical needs claim under either the Eighth Amendment or the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment because it is clear that the plaintiff has failed to allege a sufficiently serious deprivation of medical care that would satisfy the objective prong of violation of either Amendment.")

Cruz v. Corizon Health Inc., No. 13-CV-2563 (CS), 2016 WL 4535040, at *3 n.7 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 29, 2016) ("The Supreme Court in Kingsley v. Hendrickson held that a pretrial detainee alleging excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment was subject to a lighter burden than a convicted prisoner alleging excessive force under the Eighth Amendment. 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2475-76 (2015). The Second Circuit has not addressed whether the Kingsley decision affects its holding that the Fourteenth Amendment and Eighth Amendment standards are the same when the claim is of deliberate indifference to medical needs, and since Kingsley courts in the Circuit have continued to follow that rule. See, e.g., Jabot v. Rench, No. 15-CV-725, 2016 WL 1128091, at *5 n.8 (N.D.N.Y. Jan. 12, 2016), report and recommendation adopted, 2016 WL 1122057 (N.D.N.Y. Mar. 22, 2016); Moran v. Livingston, 155 F. Supp. 3d 278, 287 n.1 (W.D.N.Y. 2016); Roberts v. C-73 Med. Dir., No. 14-CV-5198, 2015 WL 4253796, at *3 n.3 (S.D.N.Y. July 13, 2015). I will do so as well although, as discussed below, the outcome would be the same even if, as in Kingsley, see 135 S. Ct. at 2472-73, Plaintiff's burden were only to prove Defendants' liability objectively, not subjectively.")

Holland v. City of New York, 197 F.Supp.3d 529, 546 & n.17 (S.D.N.Y. 2016) ("In addition, insofar as Holland is also claiming sexual abuse or harassment by Jennings, the Second Circuit has concluded that 'sexual abuse of a prisoner by a corrections officer may in some circumstances violate the prisoner's right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment.' Boddie v. Schnieder, 105 F.3d 857, 860-61 (2d Cir. 1997). Although it is unclear whether, post-Kingsley, the sexual abuse claims of a pretrial detainee must still meet both the objective and subjective prongs of the traditional Eighth Amendment analysis,[17] the Court holds that Holland's allegations fail to meet both. . . . [fn17]See Harry v. Suarez, No. 10 Civ. 6756, 2012 WL 2053533, at *2 n.3 (S.D.N.Y. June 4, 2012) (recognizing, pre–Kingsley, that for pretrial detainees, 'the established Eighth Amendment framework for claims of sexual abuse by prison officials would still provide the appropriate standards for resolving plaintiff's claims').")

Colbert v. Gumusdere, No. 15CV1537-LTS-DCF, 2016 WL 1181726, at *4 n.4 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 25, 2016) ("The Court acknowledges that the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), which held that 'the appropriate standard for a pretrial detainee's excessive force claim is solely an objective one,'. . . may have implications for cases such as this one, in which a pretrial detainee has asserted a deliberate indifference claim. The Kingsley holding has not yet, however, been applied beyond the context of excessive force cases. Moreover, even if Kingsley's purely objective analysis were applied here, the Court's analysis would remain unchanged because Plaintiff has failed to allege facts that satisfy the objective prong of the deliberate indifference inquiry.")

Woodhouse v. City of Mt. Vernon, No. 113CV00189ALCHBP, 2016 WL 354896, at *10 n.4 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 27, 2016) ("This Court applies a subjective standard to Woodhouse's Fourteenth Amendment claim of deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, just as it would to an Eighth Amendment claim brought by a convicted prisoner. . . This is so despite the Supreme Court's recent decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, holding that 'the appropriate standard for a pretrial detainee's excessive force claim is solely an objective one,'. . . rather than the subjective standard that a convicted prisoner bringing an excessive force claim must meet under Hudson v. McMillian. . . However, the Second Circuit has held that 'due process does not require more than the Eighth Amendment.'. . Because 'the Eighth Amendment still requires intent[,] the Fourteenth Amendment requires no more. The Fourteenth Amendment standard here only changes if the Supreme Court changes the Eighth Amendment floor.'")

Moran v. Livingston, No. 6:10-CV-6178 EAW, 2016 WL 93402, *__ (W.D.N.Y. Jan. 7, 2016) ("The decision in Kingsley only expressly dealt with an excessive use of force claim, and existing Second Circuit precedent requires a pretrial detainee to establish both subjective and objective elements to support a claim for deliberate indifference to medical needs under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . To date, the Second Circuit has declined to expressly address whether the deliberate indifference standard has changed for pretrial detainees in light of the Kingsley decision. See Ross v. Correction Officers John & Jane Does 1–5, 610 F. App'x , 76 (2d Cir.2015) ("Because our focus, in analyzing whether qualified immunity applies, is on whether the right asserted by Ross was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, we need not address Kingsley's possible implication for deliberate indifference claims brought by pre-trial detainees."). As a result, the Court will follow existing Second Circuit precedent and analyze Plaintiff's deliberate indifference claims under both a subjective and objective standard.")

Gutierrez v. City of New York, No. 13 CIV. 3502 JGK, 2015 WL 5559498, at *7 n.2 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 21, 2015) ("The Supreme Court recently clarified that a pretrial detainee needs to show only that the officers' use of force was objectively unreasonable to prove an excessive force claim under § 1983 and does not need to show that the officers were subjectively aware of the unreasonableness of their use of force. See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 2472–73 (2015). The Supreme Court has not resolved the issue of whether a pretrial detainee can bring a Fourth Amendment claim based on the use of excessive force by a detention facility employee. See id. at 2479 (Alito, J., dissenting).")

Zikianda v. Cty. of Albany, No. 1:12-CV-1194, 2015 WL 5510956, at *14 n.5 (N.D.N.Y. Sept. 15, 2015) ("Plaintiff contends that a recent Supreme Court holding requires the Court to apply a standard other than deliberate indifference here; Defendants disagree. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, decided this year, concerned the standard for determining whether officers used excessive force, violating the constitutional rights of a pre-trial detainee. . . The Court concluded that-unlike a prisoner after conviction, who must show that an officer subjectively knew that the force used was excessive to obtain Eighth–Amendment relief-'a pretrial detainee must show only that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable' to prevail under the due process clause. . . The crucial distinction for the Court was the nature of the detainee's claims: they were Fourteenth Amendment Due Process claims, as opposed to the Eighth Amendment cruel and unusual punishment claims convicted prisoners bring in the excessive force context. . . The Court did not need to determine under the circumstances whether a 'punishment [was] unconstitutional,' and thus an objective standard could apply. . . Plaintiff asserts that a similar, less demanding, standard should apply to medical treatment claims. He points to no case law that establishes this standard, but instead contends that the Supreme Court's determination that a clear distinction exists between Eighth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment Due Process claims mandates that a new standard be applied because prisoners are subject to punishment and detainees are not. A case cited by the Plaintiff, Turkmen v. Hasty, No. 13–1002, 2015 U.S.App. LEXIS 10160 at *77 n. 34, 2015 WL 3756331 (2d Cir. June 17, 2015), noted that the 'deliberate indifference' applied to both prisoners and pre-trial detainees, but declined to address whether 'civil immigration detainees should be governed by an even more protective standard than pretrial criminal detainees.' Turkmen was decided a week before Kingsley. The Court is unconvinced that Kingsley mandates a different standard for immigration detainees than for pre-trial detainees. Kingsley did not address that question, and could not have, since the detainee alleging excessive force in that case was 'detained in jail prior to trial [.]' Kingsley, 192 L.Ed.2d at 423. Thus, the question for the Court in Kinglsey was how (and whether) to distinguish between excessive-force claims brought under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, not the general standard to be applied to constitutional claims brought by immigration detainees. As explained above, the Second Circuit has already answered the question of whether the deliberate indifference standard applies to pre-trial detainees asserting medical claims and concluded that it does. Nothing in Kingsley undermines that holding. Moreover, the Second Circuit in Turkmen did not decide that civil immigration status disrupted the deliberate indifference standard, and the Court sees no reason to abandon a standard that Courts have determined applies to persons in detention, whether convicted of a crime and thus subject to punishment or held prior to trial, and thus eligible for more extensive protection. The deliberate indifference standard recognizes the unique demands for health care in jails, and the same logic that would apply that standard to pre-trial detainees counsels that the standard apply to civil immigration detainees like the Decedent. In any case, the Court concludes that Plaintiff may prevail under the deliberate indifference standard. The Court will of course permit the parties to argue about the proper standard before trial-any changes in the controlling law should be argued by the parties in proposing jury instructions.")

Radin v. Tun, No. 12-CV-1393 ARR VMS, 2015 WL 4645255, at *9 n.18 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 4, 2015) ("Prior to Kingsley, courts in this Circuit required the plaintiff to establish both an objective and a subjective element to an excessive force claim, see, e.g., Benjamin v. Flores, No. 11 Civ. 4216(ARR), 2012 WL 5289513, at *3 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 23, 2012) (citing United States v. Walsh, 194 F.3d 37, 49–50 (2d Cir.1999)), and these courts held that, to satisfy the objective element, the force used must be 'more than de minimis,' id. (citing Walsh, 194 F.3d at 50); see Wilkins v. Gaddy, 559 U.S. 34, 39 (2010) (stating that the force used must be "nontrivial").")

Roberts v. C-73 Med. Dir., No. 1:14-CV-5198-GHW, 2015 WL 4253796, at *3 n.3 (S.D.N.Y. July 13, 2015) ("In its recent decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, the Supreme Court held that a pretrial detainee bringing a claim for excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment must meet an objective standard by showing 'only that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.'. . (abrogating Murray v. Johnson No. 260, 367 F. App'x 196, 198 (2d Cir.2010)). In contrast, a convicted prisoner bringing a claim for excessive force under the Eighth Amendment must meet a subjective standard by showing that the force was applied 'maliciously and sadistically to cause harm,' and not 'in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline.'. . The decision in Kingsley dealt only with excessive force claims, thus the Court continues to abide by Second Circuit precedent setting forth a subjective standard for cases involving allegations of deliberate indifference to a pretrial detainee's serious medical needs, which is identical to the standard for convicted prisoners under the Eighth Amendment. See Caiozzo v. Koreman, 581 F.3d 63, 69 (2d Cir.2009). In Arroyo v. Schaefer, the Second Circuit noted that due process does not require more than the Eighth Amendment. 548 F.2d 47, 50 (2d Cir.1977). That premise did not change in this context-the Eighth Amendment still requires intent; the Fourteenth Amendment requires no more. The Fourteenth Amendment standard here only changes if the Supreme Court changes the Eighth Amendment floor.")

THIRD CIRCUIT

Moy v. DeParlos, No. 22-1723, 2023 WL 3717517, at *1 (3d Cir. May 30, 2023) (not reported) ("There is some question as to which legal standard applies to Moy's medical-needs claim. Although pretrial detainees' constitutional claims arise under the Due Process clause, we have traditionally assessed their medical-needs claims under the Eighth Amendment's familiar two-prong inquiry – i.e., whether the medical needs are objectively serious, and whether the prison medical staff acted with deliberate indifference in treating such needs. . . However, in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, a case involving a pretrial detainee's excessive force claim, the Supreme Court determined that a detainee only needed to show that the use of force was objectively unreasonable. . . Since Kingsley, courts have reached conflicting conclusions about whether that objective-only inquiry applies with equal force to a pretrial detainee's medical-needs claim. See Helphenstine v. Lewis Cnty., Ky., 60 F.4th 305, 316 (6th Cir. 2023) (collecting cases and noting that courts are 'all over the map' on the issue of whether and to what extent Kingsley applies to a pretrial detainee's medical-needs claim). We need not resolve this issue, however, because Moy's medical-needs claims fail under any conceivable standard. On this record, it is clear that the prison physician (Dr. Keenan), and the prison nurses provided constitutionally adequate care.")

Rosser v. Donovan, No. 20-3278, 2021 WL 5055837, at *2 (3d Cir. Nov. 1, 2021) (not reported) ("The District Court considered the officers' use of force under the Fourth Amendment, because they were seeking to execute a search warrant. . . and under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process clause, because Rosser was a pretrial detainee[.] . . The District Court determined that '[t]he reasonableness factors under the Fourth Amendment are the same as those under the Due Process clause for pretrial detainee claims.'. .Rosser argues that only the Fourth Amendment standard should apply, because at the time of the incident he was merely an arrestee and had not yet had a probable cause hearing. We need not resolve that question because, for an arrestee like Rosser, '[w]hatever the source of law, in analyzing an excessive force claim, a court must determine whether the force was objectively unreasonable in light of the facts and circumstances of each particular case.' Lombardo v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 141 S. Ct. 2239, 2241 n.2 (2021) (per curiam) (internal quotation marks omitted) (citing Kingsley, 576 U.S. at 397); see also Jacobs v. Cumberland Cnty., 8 F.4th 187, 195 n.6 (3d Cir. 2021) ("Although the factual scenarios in the two contexts may differ, the Fourteenth Amendment standard is now almost identical to the Fourth Amendment standard.")")

Hope v. Warden York County Prison, 972 F.3d 310, 324-29 (3d Cir. 2020) ("Given the extraordinary circumstances that existed in March 2020 because of the COVID-19 pandemic, we are satisfied that their § 2241 claim seeking only release on the basis that unconstitutional confinement conditions require it is not improper. . . For these reasons, we hold that Petitioners' claim that unconstitutional conditions of confinement at York and Pike require their release is cognizable in habeas. . . .We turn now to likelihood of success on the merits. Petitioners claim their conditions of confinement violate the Fifth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution. As immigration detainees, Petitioners are entitled to the same due process protections as pretrial detainees. . . Petitioners are in federal custody pursuant to the INA and housed in state facilities, so they are protected by the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . Although the Eighth Amendment does not apply here, . . . the substantive due process guarantees afforded detainees like Petitioners are at least as robust as Eighth Amendment protections afforded prisoners[.] . . Applying this framework, we conclude the District Court abused its discretion when it held that Petitioners showed a substantial likelihood of success on the merits of their claims. . . . Though not a convicted prisoner, a detainee 'simply does not possess the full range of freedoms of an unincarcerated individual.'. . Thus, '[t]he fact of confinement as well as the legitimate goals and policies of the [ ] institution limits [Petitioners'] retained constitutional rights.'. .Important here—and largely ignored by the District Court and Petitioners—are the legitimate objectives and difficulties of managing a detention facility, . . . and the objectives of immigration detention: ensuring appearance at detention proceedings and protecting the public from harm. . . . Considering all the responsive measures specifically implemented to detect and to prevent spread of the virus, the challenges of facility administration during an unprecedented situation, and the purposes served by detention—Petitioners did not show a substantial likelihood of success on their claim that the conditions of their confinement constitute unconstitutional punishment. We therefore hold the District Court erred as to its punishment determination.")

Moore v. Luffey, No. 18-1716, 2019 WL 1766047, at *3 n.2 (3d Cir. Apr. 19, 2019) (not reported) ("In his opening brief, Moore argues that this Court 'should apply the objective unreasonableness standard adopted by the Supreme Court in [Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015)]' rather than the Eighth Amendment's deliberate indifference standard. . . However, Moore does not cite to any cases of this Court applying Kingsley to a claim of deliberate indifference to a detainee's serious medical needs. Moore also fails to explain how applying an objective unreasonableness standard instead of the deliberate indifference standard would affect the outcome of his appeal. Both standards require the plaintiff to show that the defendant was more than negligent in addressing the plaintiff's serious medical needs. . . Because Moore's claims fail under both standards, we decline to address whether we should apply the new standard here.")

Wharton v. Danberg, 854 F.3d 234, 243, 247 (3d Cir. 2017) ("Suits against high-level government officials must satisfy the general requirements for supervisory liability. In particular, supervisors are liable only for their own acts; in this case, they are liable only if they, 'with deliberate indifference to the consequences, established and maintained a policy, practice or custom which directly caused [the] constitutional harm.' A.M. ex rel. J.M.K. v. Luzerne Cty. Juvenile Det. Ctr., 372 F.3d 572, 586 (3d Cir. 2004) (quoting Stoneking v. Bradford Area Sch. Dist., 882 F.2d 720, 725 (3d Cir. 1989)) (alteration in original). This standard for supervisory liability largely overlaps with the over-detention standard—both require a showing of deliberate indifference and causation—but centers the inquiry around a policy or practice. . . . Our precedent is clear that while the detention of sentenced inmates is governed by the Eighth Amendment, the treatment of pretrial detainees is governed by the Due Process Clause. . . For pretrial detainees, therefore, there is no applicable provision more specific than the Due Process Clause and the more-specific-provision rule does not apply. A separate due process analysis is required. The protections of the Eighth Amendment and Due Process Clauses are sometimes, but not always, the same. . . We need not delve into the differences between those two analyses in this context, however. This is a suit against supervisory officials, for the creation of policies and practices. Supervisory policy-and-practice liability requires deliberate indifference. A.M. ex rel. J.M.K., 372 F.3d at 586. Thus, for the same reasons as in our Eighth Amendment analysis, we conclude that there is no genuine dispute of material fact as to deliberate indifference under the Fourteenth Amendment.")

Tressler v. Centre County, No. 1:24-CV-00456, 2024 WL 4989315, at *9 (M.D. Pa. Dec. 5, 2024) ("Recognizing that medical claims brought by pretrial detainees are substantive due process claims, not Eighth Amendment claims, judges in this district have nevertheless generally continued to apply Eighth Amendment standards to such claims. [collecting cases] Similarly, the Third Circuit has continued to rely on Eighth Amendment standards when addressing medical claims of pretrial detainees. [citing cases] Considering the above and given that both Tressler and the Individual County Defendants rely on Eighth Amendment standards, we will apply the Eighth Amendment standards to Tressler's denial-of-medical-care claims against the Individual County Defendants.")

Sanabria v. Brackett, No. CV 22-1012-CJB, 2024 WL 4827320, at *4 n.5 (D. Del. Nov. 19, 2024)("In 2014 and again in 2019, the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit affirmatively stated that it applies the same standard to a failure to protect claim made pursuant to the Fourteenth Amendment as it does to a failure to protect claim brought under the Eighth Amendment—including the use of a subjective standard for the deliberate indifference element. See Travillion v. Wetzel, 765 F. App'x 785, 788, 790 (3d Cir. 2019); Thomas, 749 F.3d at 217 n.4. In his briefing, however, Plaintiff argued that in light of the Supreme Court's 2015 decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015), the elements of a failure to protect claim made pursuant to the Fourteenth Amendment are now different from those as to such a claim brought pursuant to the Eighth Amendment in one respect: i.e., that a Fourteenth Amendment claim requires only the use of an objective state of mind standard as to knowledge of the risk in question (that the prison official knew or should have known of the substantial risk), not a subjective state of mind standard (that the official actually did know of the risk). . . Again, the Court need not definitively resolve this issue now, because the outcome of this Motion would not be impacted by any such decision. In other words, when the Court concludes below that Plaintiff has sufficient evidence to withstand summary judgment regarding his Fourteenth Amendment failure to protect claim as to Brackett, that conclusion would be the same regardless of whether a subjective or an objective standard was utilized regarding Brackett's state of mind as to knowledge of the risk in question. And below, when the Court concludes that Plaintiff has insufficient evidence to withstand summary judgment as to such a claim against Vanes, the decision would not differ regardless of which state of mind standard is used.")

McLaughlin v. Zavada, No. CV 19-422, 2022 WL 409492, at *3–5 (W.D. Pa. Feb. 10, 2022) ("The circuits are split on whether Kingsley's holding applies to other conditions of confinement claims. Some circuits have held that the same objective standard applies in other pretrial detainee Fourteenth Amendment contexts, including denial of medical care and conditions of confinement claims. See Brawner v. Scott Cty., 14 F.4th 585, 593 (6th Cir. 2021) (medical care); Hardeman v. Curran, 933 F.3d 816, 822-23 (7th Cir. 2019) (lack of access to water); Colbruno v. Kessler, 928 F.3d 1155, 1161-63 (10th Cir. 2019); Gordon v. County of Orange, 888 F.3d 1118, 1120, 1122-25 (9th Cir. 2018) (medical needs); Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 34-35 (2d Cir. 2017) (overcrowding and eight other types of degrading conditions of confinement); Castro v. County of L.A., 833 F.3d 1060, 1070-71 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc). Others have declined to do so. See, e.g., Strain v. Regalado, 977 F.3d 984, 991 (10th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 312 (2021). The Third Circuit has not decided this issue. In support of their motion for reconsideration about this issue, Defendants contend that this Court strayed from 'binding Third Circuit precedent'. . . that is set forth in Edwards v. Northampton County, 663 F. App'x 132 (3d Cir. 2016) . . . . There are several flaws in Defendants' argument. First, Edwards is not a precedential opinion and the Court of Appeals explicitly states that it has not addressed the standard governing a pretrial detainee's conditions of confinement claim in a precedential opinion. Moreover, although Edwards was decided after Kingsley, it includes no reference or discussion of it. Further, with respect to some of the case law from other circuits that the Third Circuit cited with approval in Edwards, the Second Circuit overruled Caiozzo in Darnell and in Hardeman, the Seventh Circuit distinguished Tesch, noting that it 'applied the more demanding Eighth Amendment deliberate-indifference standard, as opposed to the objective inquiry that we apply here.' 933 F.3d at 824. Defendants also attempt to rely on Bistrian v. Levi, 696 F.3d 352 (3d Cir. 2012), in which the Third Circuit stated that '"[d]eliberate indifference" in this context is a subjective standard.'. . Bistrian was not a Fourteenth Amendment due process case, however; it was a Fifth Amendment case arising out of prison officials' alleged failure to protect an inmate from violence at the hands of another inmate. The contention that the Bistrian case established the standard for Fourteenth Amendment conditions of confinement claims by pretrial detainees is directly refuted by the Third Circuit's later statement in Edwards that it had not previously addressed the standard governing a pretrial detainee's conditions of confinement claim in a precedential opinion. Defendants also cite two other Third Circuit non-precedential cases, but neither of them cites Kingsley or is on point. . . . In the Memorandum Opinion issued in this case, the Court predicted that, if presented with this specific question, the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit would conclude that the Kingsley standard applies to conditions of confinement claims by pretrial detainees. However, as noted the Court's opinion, the application of either of these standards leads to the same result--the denial of Defendant's motion for summary judgment. As noted in the Memorandum Opinion, there are genuine issues of material fact regarding the conditions at the FCP if the subjective deliberate indifference standard is applied. Defendants contend that there is no evidence that Miller and Zavada knew of the conditions about which Plaintiff complains and there is no evidence that

Smith and Lenkey—both of whom Plaintiff described as 'great guys'—failed to act to improve the situation. As noted in the Memorandum Opinion, however, while Defendants claim that Plaintiff never saw Miller or Zavada during his incarceration at the FCP, this contention is not responsive to the question of whether these individuals knew about the conditions at the prison. Defendants submitted no evidence to show that they had no knowledge of these conditions. As noted in the previous opinion, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it defies logic to suggest that neither Miller nor Zavada was aware of the conditions in the FCP that allegedly had existed for months. Among other things, Plaintiff testified under oath that while he was in the SMU, raw sewage came up through the drains. His toilet constantly leaked and could not be used for 'days on end.' Problems were temporarily fixed but then recurred. After he was moved back to the C Range, he had to relieve himself in plastic bags and sewage repeatedly ran from the upstairs cell down to C block and across the floor. According to Plaintiff, this had been going on for quite some time and was constant. The smell in the C Range was foul. At times the floors were covered with feces, that there was standing water consisting of urine in his cell and that the union asked for new boots due the existence of feces and urine on the floor. Thus, at least as described by Plaintiff, the conditions were sufficiently obvious that even in the absence of direct evidence of deliberate indifference, the circumstantial evidence in the record creates an issue of fact for the jury. Moreover, as Plaintiff argued, there is some evidence that Miller and Zavada were aware of the conditions to which he was allegedly subjected through personal observation, notices and grievances, and still took no action. Plaintiff also noted that Miller posted several video recordings on the internet detailing the conditions at the FCP, including some of the issues Plaintiff has raised here. . . The Court concluded in its opinion that whether either defendant could have acted to remedy Plaintiff's conditions remains a contested issue. Thus, regardless of the standard applied, there are genuine issues of material fact about Defendants' conduct that preclude summary judgment in their favor.")

Andrews v. Harper, No. 2:19-CV-00670-CCW, 2021 WL 6051441, at *5-8 (W.D. Pa. Dec. 20, 2021) ("Seeking to apply the rationale of Kingsley to her other Fourteenth Amendment claims, Ms. Andrews contends that she can prevail on her conditions of confinement claim (Count I) and adequate medical care claim (Count VII) by showing that Defendants acted in an objectively unreasonable manner rather than showing that Defendants were deliberately indifferent. . . Defendants, however, assert that the Court should continue to apply the deliberate indifference standard—meaning that the defendant 'must actually have known or been aware of the excessive risk to inmate safety.'. . Both parties acknowledge that federal courts are split . . . on whether Kingsley's holding with respect to the objectively unreasonable standard in Fourteenth Amendment pretrial detainee excessive force claims applies to other pretrial detainee conditions of confinement claims. . . . The Third Circuit has not decided whether Kingsley's rationale extends to other Fourteenth Amendment claims by pretrial detainees outside of the excessive force context. In Moore v. Luffey, a non-precedential opinion, the Third Circuit declined to address whether Kingsley's objective unreasonableness standard should apply instead of the deliberate indifference standard because the pretrial detainee's claims of inadequate medical care failed under both the objectively unreasonable standard and the deliberate indifference standard. . . In applying the Fourteenth Amendment to pretrial detainee claims, the Third Circuit has ruled that 'the Fourteenth Amendment affords pretrial detainees protections at least as great as the Eighth Amendment.'. . As such, even after Kingsley, courts in this Circuit have generally continued to apply the deliberate indifference standard when analyzing certain types of Fourteenth Amendment claims raised by pretrial detainees. [collecting cases] In the context of inadequate medical care claims under the Fourteenth Amendment, district courts in this Circuit that have explicitly considered Kingsley have nonetheless continued to apply the deliberate indifference standard. . . . The Third Circuit has considered the appropriate standard to be applied when a pretrial detainee asserts a conditions of confinement claim based on a failure to protect theory. Edwards v. Northampton Cnty., 663 F. App'x 132, 135–36 (3d Cir. 2016). Although it did not address Kingsley specifically, the Third Circuit noted that while 'we have not previously addressed the standard governing a pretrial detainee's conditions of confinement claim … in a precedential opinion, we have stated in dicta that the state of mind requirement for prisoners' failure to protect claims —"deliberate indifference"— applies also to pretrial detainees' claims…. and find no reason to apply a different standard here as we have applied the "deliberate indifference" standard both in cases involving prisoners … and pretrial detainees.'. . The Third Circuit proceeded to apply the deliberate indifference standard to the detainee's conditions of confinement claims with respect to the hygienic issues in his cell and the failure to implement and enforce adequate MRSA precautions. . . . Ms. Andrews' Motion in Limine seeks to extend Kingsley's rationale beyond Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claims to encompass her conditions of confinement (Count I) and adequate medical care (Count VII) claims. However, the Third Circuit has not applied Kingsley's rationale beyond the scope of excessive force claims and district courts in this Circuit have continued to apply the deliberate indifference standard to the types of Fourteenth Amendment claims at issue here. Accordingly, Ms. Andrews' Motion in Limine to Apply the Objectively Unreasonable Standard to Her Fourteenth Amendment Claims will be DENIED.")

Waters v. State of Delaware, No. 18-CV-266-RGA, 2020 WL 4501945, at *7 (D. Del. Aug. 5, 2020) ("The Supreme Court has recently applied an 'objectively unreasonable' standard to analyze an excessive force claim under the Fourteenth Amendment. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 US 389, 398 (2015). However, the Third Circuit has declined to address whether the 'objectively unreasonable' standard applies to a deliberate indifference to medical need analysis. Moore v. Luffey, 2019 WL 1766047 at *3 n.2 (3d Cir. Apr. 19, 2019).")

Williams v. Robinson, No. CV165930RBKAMD, 2018 WL 4489670, at *2 (D.N.J. Sept. 19, 2018) ("The Court notes the recent Supreme Court decision, Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), which called into question the propriety of applying the Eighth Amendment analysis to a pretrial detainee in an excessive force case. Post-Kingsley, many courts have limited its holding only to excessive force claims, and those courts continue to apply the Eighth Amendment analysis in other contexts for pretrial detainees, such as denial of medical services claims. . . Third Circuit decisions seem to suggest that the Eighth Amendment is still the continuing standard for denial of medical care claims in this circuit. See Miller v. Steele-Smith, 713 F. App's 74, 76 n.1 (3d Cir. 2017) ("[A] Fourteenth Amendment claim for inadequate medical care is analyzed pursuant to the same standard applied to an Eighth Amendment claim"); Gerholt v. Orr, 624 F. App'x 799, 801 n.3 (3d Cir. 2015) ("We have made clear, however, that the Due Process rights of a pretrial detainee are at least as great as the Eighth Amendment protections available to a convicted prisoner.") (citation and quotation omitted). As the Third Circuit has not announced a different test for pretrial detainees, this Court applies the Eighth Amendment test to Plaintiff's claims.")

Quinones v. County of Camden, No. CV1713769RBKKMW, 2018 WL 3586270, at *3 n.2 (D.N.J. July 26, 2018) ("The Court notes the recent Supreme Court decision, Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), which called into question the propriety of applying the Eighth Amendment analysis to a pretrial detainee in an excessive force case. Post-Kingsley, many courts have limited its holding only to excessive force claims, and those courts continue to apply the Eighth Amendment analysis in other contexts for pretrial detainees, such as denial of medical services claims. . . Third Circuit decisions seem to suggest that the Eighth Amendment is still the continuing standard for denial of medical care claims in this circuit. . . As the Third Circuit has not announced a different test for pretrial detainees, this Court applies the Eighth Amendment test to Plaintiff's claims.")

Stevenson v. County Sheriff's Office of Monmouth, No. 13-5953 (MAS) (TJB), 2018 WL 797425, at *3 (D.N.J. Feb. 8, 2018) ("Here, Defendants' qualified immunity argument requires analysis under the Eighth Amendment because Kingsley was not decided at the time the alleged incident occurred—to wit, a violation under the Eighth Amendment would certainly be a violation under the less stringent Fourteenth Amendment standard. Based on the prevailing case law in this district and the Third Circuit at the time, it was reasonable for Defendants to believe that their conduct toward Plaintiff was governed by the Eighth Amendment standard for excessive force, not the Fourteenth Amendment. See, e.g., Everett v. Nort, 547 F. App'x 117, 121 (3d Cir. 2013); Bornstein v. Cty. of Monmouth, No. 11-5336, 2014 WL 4824462, at *6 (D.N.J. Sept. 25, 2014). On the other hand, the same case law also clearly established that every reasonable officer would have understood, on the date of the alleged incident, that he or she cannot apply excessive force on a prisoner in violation of the Eighth Amendment.")

Davis v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 17-1381, 2018 WL 319348, at *6 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 5, 2018) ("Nearly four decades ago, the Supreme Court held in Wolfish that '[i]n evaluating the conditions or restrictions of pretrial detention ... the proper inquiry is whether those conditions amount to punishment of the detainee.'. . Although there is some disagreement among the Circuits. . . over the scope of detainees' right to be free from punishment—specifically, how the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference standard from Estelle. . . interacts with Wolfish in claims by detainees for inadequate medical treatment—the law in this circuit is well-settled. . . The Third Circuit has drawn a clear distinction between the controlling standards under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, holding that 'pretrial detainees are entitled to greater constitutional protection than that provided by the Eighth Amendment.' [citing Hubbard v. Taylor, 399 F.3d 150, 167 n.23 (3d Cir. 2005)] The Hubbard Court made clear that the Eighth Amendment's deliberate indifference standard is relevant to claims by pretrial detainees 'only because it establishe[s] a floor.'. . .[T]o determine when inadequate medical treatment amounts to punishment, courts in the Third Circuit engage in a two-step test 'distilled [from] Wolfish 's teachings.'. . First, the court must ask whether the complained of conditions serve 'any legitimate purpose.'. . If so, the court must next determine whether the conditions are 'rationally related' to that purpose. . . The second step considers whether the conditions cause the detainee to endure such 'genuine hardship' that the conditions are 'excessive in relation to the purposes assigned to them.'")

Dewald v. Jenkins, No. CV 16-04597, 2017 WL 1364673, at *4 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 13, 2017) ("Dewald contends that being denied use of a toilet amounted to cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. Again, given his pretrial status, the Fourteenth Amendment governs his claim. While the Eighth Amendment bars cruel and unusual punishment—typically deprivations of 'the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities,' Rhodes v. Chapman, 452 U.S. 337, 347 (1981)—the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause protects pretrial detainees from being punished at all. Hubbard, 399 F.3d at 166 (citing Bell, 441 U.S. at 536). Thus while violations of the Eighth Amendment will amount to violations of the Fourteenth Amendment, conditions that do not violate the Eighth Amendment may nonetheless violate a pretrial detainee's due process rights.")

Moore v. Wright, No. CV 14-991-RGA, 2017 WL 729553, at *4 (D. Del. Feb. 24, 2017) ("As a pretrial detainee, the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment affords Plaintiff a vehicle for his medical needs claim. Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. at 535 n.16. When evaluating whether a claim for inadequate medical care by a pre-trial detainee is sufficient under the Fourteenth Amendment, the Third Circuit has found no reason to apply a different standard than that set forth in Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97 (1976). See Natale v. Camden Cnty. Correc. Facility, 318 F.3d 575, 581 (3d Cir. 2003). To evaluate a medical needs claim, the Court determines if there is evidence of a serious medical need and acts or omissions by prison officials indicating deliberate indifference to those needs.")

Coward v. Lanigan, No. CV132222MASTJB, 2016 WL 1229074, at *4 (D.N.J. Mar. 29, 2016) ("The Court makes note of a recent Supreme Court decision, Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), which calls into question the propriety of applying the Eighth Amendment analysis to pretrial detainees. In Kingsley, the Supreme Court held that the standard applied to an excessive force claim for prisoners under the Eighth Amendment, which requires the state actor to have acted with a reckless disregard of the plaintiff's rights—a subjective standard—is incompatible with a claim of excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment for a pretrial detainee. . . Instead, objective reasonableness is the proper standard for such claims. . . Post-Kingsley, some courts have limited its holding only to excessive force claims, and those courts continue to apply the Eighth Amendment analysis in other contexts for pretrial detainees, such as denial of medical services claims. . . A post-Kingsley Third Circuit decision seems to suggest that the Eighth Amendment may still be the continuing standard in this circuit. See Gerholt v. Orr, 624 F. App'x 799, 801 n.3 (3d Cir. 2015) ("We have made clear, however, that the Due Process rights of a pretrial detainee are at least as great as the Eighth Amendment protections available to a convicted prisoner.")

(citation and quotation omitted). As the Third Circuit has not announced a different test for pretrial detainees, this Court applies the Eighth Amendment test to Plaintiff's claims.")

Mattern v. City of Sea Isle, No. CIV. 14-7231 JBS/AMD, 2015 WL 5445042, at *6-7 (D.N.J. Sept. 15, 2015) ("The Supreme Court recently affirmed this distinction in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, noting that while the Eighth Amendment applies to convicted prisoners, claims brought by pretrial detainees fall under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. 135 S.Ct. 2466, 2475 (2015). Consistent with the law in this Circuit, the Court will 'evaluate [Andrew Mattern's] Fourteenth Amendment claim for inadequate medical care under the standard used to evaluate similar claims brought under the Eighth Amendment.' Natale v. Camden Cnty. Corr. Facility, 318 F.3d 575, 581 (3d Cir.2003).")

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Simmons v. Whitaker, 106 F.4th 379, 387-88 (4th Cir. 2024) ("Although Simmons was a pre-trial detainee whose claims were therefore governed by the Fourteenth Amendment, the district court applied the Eighth Amendment standard and granted summary judgment because it found that '[t]he actions of the officers d[id] not evince ay [sic] malice or ill will.'. . The court determined that 'the officers used minimal force to get Plaintiff back to his cell, and used reasonable force to prevent Plaintiff from in jurying [sic] himself and to regain control.'. . That constitutes legal error. We recognize that Simmons's pro se complaint references Eighth Amendment caselaw, but pro se documents are to be liberally construed. . . .Therefore, the district court had a duty to look beyond the legal standards Simmons produced in his complaint and instead apply the law applicable to his essential grievance: the excessive force he suffered as a pre-trial detainee. The Officers argue there is no reversible error because the Kingsley and Whitley factors are substantially the same. This argument is unpersuasive. Although the factors appear similar, they can achieve different ends. Take, for instance, the district court's focus on what it considered a lack of malice. From the Whitley factors, the district court concluded that '[t]he actions of the officers do not evince ay [sic] malice or ill will' because they 'used reasonable force to prevent [Simmons] from in jurying [sic] himself and to regain control.'. . That analysis justified the district court's grant of summary judgment under Whitley, but it does not necessarily foreclose a finding of objective reasonableness under Kingsley. In other words, the court committed reversible error because it did not address the relevant inquiry.")

Short v. Hartman, 87 F.4th 593, 603-12 & nn. 7, 8 (4th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 2631 (2024) ("Several cases have squarely presented this Court with the opportunity to decide whether Kingsley applies to pretrial detainees' claims for deliberate indifference to an excessive risk of harm. So far, though, we have not reached the issue, instead resolving each case on alternative grounds. . . Leaving this question unresolved creates uncertainty in our jurisprudence and allows the issue to slip past both practitioners and courts, as happened in this case below. More than eight years after Kingsley, it is time we lay this issue to rest. . . .The Supreme Court has long recognized that a 'court may consider an issue "antecedent to ... and ultimately dispositive of" the dispute before it, even an issue the parties fail to identify and brief.'. . The question we have raised—whether Kingsley applies to the type of claim asserted in this case—is antecedent to our consideration of the district court's disposition of Mr. Short's claims. Accordingly, this issue is properly before us. . . .We now turn to whether Kingsley abrogates our Circuit's prior precedent and requires us to recognize that pretrial detainees can state a claim under the Fourteenth Amendment, based on a purely objective standard, for prison officials' deliberate indifference to excessive risks of harm.[7] [fn. 7: The Tenth Circuit has observed that 'a deliberate indifference claim presupposes a subjective component.' Strain v. Regalado, 977 F.3d 984, 992 (10th Cir. 2020). But the Supreme Court has recognized that, outside of the Eighth Amendment context, the term 'deliberate indifference' is not necessarily subjective. Instead, it is 'the equivalent of reckless[ness],' which is an objective standard in the civil law context, but a subjective standard in the criminal law context. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 836–37, 114 S.Ct. 1970, 128 L.Ed.2d 811 (1994). Indeed, in the context of municipal liability, the same term is used to describe a purely objective test. . . As the Sixth Circuit noted, 'the Farmer Court adopted the subjective component of the test for deliberate indifference under the Eighth Amendment based on the language and purposes of that amendment, focusing particularly on "punishments," and not on any intrinsic meaning of the term.' Brawner v. Scott County, 14 F.4th 585, 595 (6th Cir. 2021). Accordingly, like the Second, Sixth, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits we retain the term 'deliberate indifference' despite adopting Kingsley's purely objective standard. We nonetheless acknowledge that, to the average reader, the term 'deliberate indifference' suggests subjectivity, and that an alternative term such as 'objective indifference' may be preferable if we were writing on a clean slate.] Like the Second, Sixth, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits, we find that it does. . . . [W]e hold, as four of our sister circuits[8] [fn. 8: Notably, these four circuits all adopted Kingsley's purely objective test, without considering the question en banc. See Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 35 (2d Cir. 2017); Gordon v. County of Orange, 888 F.3d 1118, 1124–25 (9th Cir. 2018); Miranda v. County of Lake, 900 F.3d 335, 352–53 (7th Cir. 2018); Brawner v. Scott County, 14 F.4th 585, 596–97 (6th Cir. 2021). They thus recognized, as we do here, that Kingsley mandates a departure from prior circuit precedent and eliminates the need for en banc consideration of the issue.] have previously, that Kingsley is irreconcilable with precedent requiring pretrial detainees to meet a subjective standard to succeed on claims under the Fourteenth Amendment for prison officials' deliberate indifference to excessive risks of harm to the inmate. The fact that Kingsley refers broadly to 'challenged governmental action' and speaks of claims under the Fourteenth Amendment generally, coupled with its heavy reliance on Bell v. Wolfish, demonstrate that Kingsley's objective standard extends not just to excessive force claims; it applies equally to deliberate indifference claims. . . . The Supreme Court's ruling in Kingsley v. Hendrickson upends the assumption that Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause claims should be treated the same as Eighth Amendment claims. In Kingsley, the Supreme Court held that, to state a Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause claim for excessive use of force, a pretrial detainee need allege only that the officer used objectively unreasonable force. . . . Kingsley is clear: The Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause protects pretrial detainees from 'governmental action' that is not 'rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose' or that is 'excessive in relation to that purpose.'. . .Our subjective deliberate indifference test for pretrial detainees'

Fourteenth Amendment claims is irreconcilable with the Kingsley–Bell objective test. . . . Further, Kingsley repudiated the reasoning we followed in adopting the subjective test for deliberate indifference claims in the first place. Our precedent extended Farmer's Eighth Amendment test to Fourteenth Amendment claims by dismissing the distinction between the two amendments as a distinction without a difference. . . Kingsley commands the opposite. 'The language of the two Clauses differs, and the nature of the claims often differs.'. . . Now that Kingsley requires us to properly distinguish Eighth Amendment claims from Fourteenth Amendment claims, our prior precedent applying a subjective deliberate indifference standard is 'no longer tenable.'. . We cannot harmonize Kingsley with our prior Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference precedent. The only way to respect the distinction Kingsley drew between the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments is to recognize that Kingsley's objective test extends to all pretrial detainee claims under the Fourteenth Amendment claims for deliberate indifference to an excessive risk of harm. We therefore conclude that Kingsley abrogated our prior precedent. . . . To state a claim for deliberate indifference to a medical need, the specific type of deliberate indifference claim at issue in this case, a pretrial detainee must plead that (1) they had a medical condition or injury that posed a substantial risk of serious harm; (2) the defendant intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly acted or failed to act to appropriately address the risk that the condition posed; (3) the defendant knew or should have known (a) that the detainee had that condition and (b) that the defendant's action or inaction posed an unjustifiably high risk of harm; and (4) as a result, the detainee was harmed. We take this test to be the same test our sister circuits have adopted. See Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 35 (2d Cir. 2017); Gordon v. County of Orange, 888 F.3d 1118, 1124–25 (9th Cir. 2018); Miranda v. County of Lake, 900 F.3d 335, 352–53 (7th Cir. 2018); Brawner v. Scott County, 14 F.4th 585, 596–97 (6th Cir. 2021). The objective test we adopt today differs from our prior subjective test in one respect only. The plaintiff no longer has to show that the defendant had actual knowledge of the detainee's serious medical condition and consciously disregarded the risk that their action or failure to act would result in harm. That showing remains sufficient, but it is no longer necessary. Now, it is sufficient that the plaintiff show that the defendant's action or inaction was, in Kingsley's words, 'objectively unreasonable,'. . . that is, the plaintiff must show that the defendant should have known of that condition and that risk, and acted accordingly. . . We go no further. To be clear, it is still not enough for the plaintiff to allege that the defendant negligently or accidentally failed to do right by the detainee. . . Negligence was not enough before, . . . and it is not enough now.") Stevens v. Holler, 68 F.4th 921, 930-31, 933 (4th Cir. 2023) ("'[D]eliberate indifference to serious medical needs of prisoners constitutes the "unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain," ... proscribed by the Eighth Amendment.'. . However, a pretrial detainee's claim of constitutionally inadequate medical care is governed by the Fourteenth Amendment, rather than the Eighth Amendment. Mays v. Sprinkle, 992 F.3d 295, 300 (4th Cir. 2021). Although 'the precise scope of this Fourteenth Amendment right remains unclear[,] ... a pretrial detainee makes out a violation at least where [the detainee] shows deliberate indifference to serious medical needs under cases interpreting the Eighth Amendment.'. .To state such a claim, the detainee 'must allege acts or omissions sufficiently harmful to evidence deliberate indifference to serious medical needs.'. .

Deliberate indifference is a high standard and 'the mere negligent or inadvertent failure to provide adequate care is not enough.'. .The test for deliberate indifference is two-pronged and includes both objective and subjective elements. . . Appellant must demonstrate that (1) Decedent was exposed to a substantial risk of serious harm (the objective prong); and (2) the prison official knew of and disregarded that substantial risk to the inmate's health or safety (the subjective prong). Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 837–38, 114 S.Ct. 1970, 128 L.Ed.2d 811 (1994). Here, Appellees do not dispute prong one. . . Therefore, this case turns on the subjective prong; that is, whether the Individual Medical Defendants acted with a 'sufficiently culpable state of mind,' specifically, deliberate indifference to Decedent's health. . . . Significantly, we have rejected the notion that simply because medical staff have provided an inmate with 'some treatment' that 'they have necessarily provided [the inmate] with constitutionally adequate treatment.'. . Rather, 'the treatment a prison facility [provides] must ... be adequate to address the prisoner's serious medical need.'. . And 'government officials who ignore indications that a prisoner's or pretrial detainee's initial medical treatment was inadequate can be liable for deliberate indifference to medical needs.'. .This is precisely what Appellant has alleged here -- that the care Decedent received was constitutionally inadequate. Appellant has sufficiently alleged that the Individual Medical Defendants' treatment and/or attempts at treatment, were not 'adequate to address [Decedent's] serious medical needs,' that Decedent's deterioration was persistent and obvious, and that the factual allegations allege more than mere disagreements regarding Decedent's medical care. . . Indeed, Appellant alleges treatment, or a lack thereof, that was 'grossly incompetent, inadequate or excessive as to shock the conscience.'. . As such, Appellant has plausibly alleged a Fourteenth Amendment violation.")

Moss v. Harwood, 19 F.4th 614, 624 n.4 (4th Cir. 2021) ("As the district court recognized, under Kingsley v. Hendrickson, . . . pretrial detainees bringing excessive force claims under the Fourteenth Amendment are no longer required to satisfy the analogous subjective component that governs the Eighth Amendment excessive force claims of convicted prisoners. . . But as the district court also noted, the Supreme Court has not extended Kingsley beyond the excessive force context to deliberate indifference claims, . . . and neither has our court[.] [citing Mays v. Sprinkle] Because Moss has expressly endorsed application of the Eighth Amendment standard – including its subjective component – to his Fourteenth Amendment claim, we have no occasion to consider that question today.")

Michelson v. Coon, No. 20-6480, 2021 WL 2981501 (4th Cir. July 15, 2021) (not reported) ("Generally, a prisoner asserting a claim for failure to protect must prove that he was 'incarcerated under conditions posing a substantial risk of serious harm, . . . and that the prison official knew of and disregarded the risk[.] . . In Kingsley, however, the Supreme Court held that a pretrial detainee bringing an excessive force claim must prove that the prison official's actions were objectively unreasonable but need not prove that the official acted with a subjectively culpable state of mind. . . Some other circuits to have examined failure to protect claims following Kingsley have determined that this standard for excessive force claims extends to failure to protect claims under the Fourteenth Amendment. See Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1069-71 (9th

Cir. 2016) (finding Kingsley's purely objective standard for excessive force claims extends to failure to protect claims by pretrial detainees); see also Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 35 (2d Cir. 2017) (same). We need not resolve this issue here because, even if a purely objective standard applies to a pretrial detainee's failure to protect claim, Michelson failed to state such a claim against Coon.")

Mays v. Sprinkle, 992 F.3d 295, 300-03 & n.4, 305 (4th Cir. 2021) ("[E]ven though Mays's claim arises under the Fourteenth Amendment, we have traditionally looked to Eighth Amendment precedents in considering a Fourteenth Amendment claim of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. . . . Mays now argues that the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley. . . altered this deliberate-indifference standard when applied to pretrial detainees. Kingsley, he claims, requires turning the subjective element into a purely objective one. . .We need not resolve this argument as that standard would make no difference here because of qualified immunity. . . . On the night of Mays's death, it was clearly established that 'a pretrial detainee ha[d] a right to be free from any form of punishment under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . And that right required 'that government officials not be deliberately indifferent to any serious medical needs of the detainee.'. . At that time, our caselaw considered a deliberate-indifference claim to require both an objectively serious medical condition and subjective knowledge by a prison official of both the 'serious medical condition and the excessive risk posed by the official's action or inaction.'. . . In the wake of Kingsley, the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits adopted a completely objective standard for pretrial-detainee-medical-deliberate-indifference claims that requires showing that a reasonable officer would have recognized the serious medical condition and appreciated the excessive risk to the detainee's health. [citing cases] The Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits cabined Kingsley to its facts—pretrial-detainee-excessive-force claims—and continue to require subjective knowledge of the condition and risk for pretrial-detainee-deliberate-indifference claims. [citing cases] While we have not directly addressed the import of Kingsley, we did recently state that a pretrial detainee's claim of inadequate medical care requires proof '(1) that the detainee had an objectively serious medical need; and (2) that the official subjectively knew of the need and disregarded it.' Doe 4 ex rel. Lopez, 985 F.3d at 340. But there, neither party raised Kingsley and the discussion should not be read to resolve this issue. . . .The clearly established inquiry asks whether 'any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating' then-existing law, including any then-existing objective or subjective elements. . . . We had not decided whether Kingsley's excessive-force-claim rationale extended to deliberate-indifference claims by the time Mays died. And we still have not. Both before and after Mays's death, we said a pretrial-detainee-medical-deliberate-indifference claim required both an objectively serious medical condition and subjective knowledge of the condition and the excessive risk posed from inaction. . . So regardless of Kingsley, qualified immunity turns on whether 'any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating' that objective and subjective standard. . . Without allegations that plausibly satisfy both the objective and subjective elements, the officers would have a right to dismissal based on qualified immunity. . . Said another way, if the allegations show that the officers lacked the required subjective knowledge, then the officers would not have violated clearly established law. Only if the allegations plausibly show an objectively serious medical condition and subjective knowledge by the officers will Mays's claim clear the qualified-immunity hurdle. And by clearing the qualified-immunity hurdle, Mays would have also plausibly alleged a violation of his rights under the Fourteenth Amendment, whatever the standard. The officers' subjective knowledge necessarily establishes any post-Kingsley objective standard (that is, whether every reasonable officer would have recognized the serious medical condition and appreciated the excessive risk to the detainee's health. . . If the deliberate-indifference standard for pretrial detainees continues to include a subjective component (and is thus unchanged by Kingsley), then the qualified-immunity finding satisfies the constitutional-violation standard as well. So no matter if the deliberate-indifference standard for pretrial detainees continues to include a subjective component, the qualified-immunity determination resolves whether Mays's allegations establish a plausible claim. . . So this appeal hinges on whether Mays pleaded sufficient facts to show both that he had an objectively serious medical condition and that the officers had subjective knowledge of the condition and the excessive risk posed by inaction. . . .[W]e conclude that the complaint plausibly alleges that Mays had an objectively serious medical condition requiring medical attention and that the officers subjectively knew of that need and the excessive risk of their inaction. That is enough to overcome qualified immunity and survive a motion to dismiss.")

Dilworth v. Adams, 841 F.3d 246, 255-56 (4th Cir. 2016) ("After the district court issued its ruling, the Supreme Court held in Kingsley v. Hendrickson that 'the appropriate standard for a pretrial detainee's excessive force claim is solely an objective one.'. . It is enough, the Supreme Court concluded, that a pretrial detainee show that the 'force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable,'. . . regardless of an officer's state of mind[.]. . .The parties agree that the district court has not evaluated Dilworth's claim under the standard set out by the intervening decision in Kingsley. Accordingly, we remand so that the district court may consider, in the first instance, whether under the 'facts and circumstances' of this particular case, and from the 'perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene,' the force used against Dilworth was objectively excessive. . . In deciding whether summary judgment may be granted to the defendants under that objective standard, the district court should view the video of the July 5 incident and consider it along with other relevant evidence bearing on objective reasonableness.")

Rhoads v. S. Health Partners, No. 8:22-CV-1409-SAL, 2024 WL 3873760, at *10–11 (D.S.C. Aug. 20, 2024) ("In her objections, Plaintiff offers that she has sufficiently shown that Defendants Riddell and Whitaker violated her Fourteenth Amendment rights, and, thus, they are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . Indeed, under Fourth Circuit precedent for deliberate indifference claims, the violation of a constitutional right and the denial of qualified immunity usually go hand-in-hand. 87 F.4th at 615 (explaining that 'under [Fourth Circuit] precedent, qualified immunity is generally not available at all for deliberate indifference claims' since the Fourth Circuit has held '"when plaintiffs have made a showing sufficient to demonstrate an intentional violation of the Eighth Amendment, they have also made a showing sufficient to overcome any claim to qualified immunity"'. . .). However, as already discussed above, here, Plaintiff has not demonstrated a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Defendants Riddell and Whitaker were deliberately indifferent. Consequently, they are entitled to qualified immunity. In their response to Plaintiff's objections, the ACDC Defendants also point out that, at the time of Defendants' conduct, the Short test for deliberate indifference did not exist. And the qualified immunity analysis 'requires looking to the law at the time of the conduct in question.' Mays v. Sprinkle, 992 F.3d 295, 301 (4th Cir. 2021) (emphasis in original). In 2019, '[a]n official [was] deliberately indifferent to an inmate's serious medical needs only when he or she subjectively knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate health or safety.' Jackson v. Lightsey, 775 F.3d 170, 178 (4th Cir. 2014). Other courts in this Circuit have found that, for activity that pre-dates Short, officials are entitled to qualified immunity absent an adequate showing on the subjective prong of the prior test-- 'b]ecause ... plaintiff fails to show any individual defendant acted with a culpable state of mind, reasonable officers in defendants' positions would not have recognized that their actions violated plaintiff's clearly established constitutional rights.' Wright v. Granville Cnty., No. 5:20-CT-03362-M, 2024 WL 1376486 at *21 (E.D.N.C. Mar. 29, 2024); see also Patterson v. Stanly Cnty. Det. Ctr., 2024 WL 1936499 at *10–11 (M.D.N.C. May 2, 2024) (find that to preclude qualified immunity pre-Short it was not enough that a defendant 'should have recognized their actions were inappropriate; they actually must have recognized their actions were insufficient' and their response 'must be more than merely negligent or simply unreasonable'). The court finds persuasive that reasoning and concludes, when looking at the facts of this case in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the absence of evidence on the subjective prong of the pre-Short deliberate indifference test entitles Defendants Riddell and Whitaker to a qualified immunity, as well.")

Wright v. Granville County, No. 5:20-CT-03362-M, 2024 WL 1376486, at *21 (E.D.N.C. Mar. 29, 2024) ("In sum after reviewing the evidence and reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to plaintiff, . . . defendants have met their burden of showing the absence of a genuine issue of material fact as to plaintiff's claims against the individual defendants, . . . but plaintiff fails to 'come forward with specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial[.]' . . Thus, the individual defendants are entitled to summary judgment. . . Alternatively, as government officials, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from civil damages if their 'conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . In other words, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity when (1) the plaintiff has not demonstrated a violation of a constitutional right, or (2) the court concludes that the right at issue was not clearly established at the time of the official's alleged misconduct. . . As noted above, Short announces a new standard for pretrial detainee claims of deliberate indifference in the Fourth Circuit. At the time the events in question occurred, such claims, like those of convicted prisoners, required a subjective showing that the official acted with a 'sufficiently culpable state of mind,' . . .such that the Short standard was not 'clearly established[.]'. . Because, as noted above, plaintiff fails to show any individual defendant acted with a culpable state of mind, reasonable officers in defendants' positions would not have recognized that their actions violated plaintiff's clearly established constitutional rights. . . Thus, the individual defendants also are entitled to a finding of qualified immunity.")

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Carmona v. City of Brownsville, 126 F.4th 1091, 1096-97, 1099-1100 (5th Cir. 2025) ("We have discretion as to which of the two prongs should be analyzed first; but, 'often the better approach to resolving cases in which the defense of qualified immunity is raised is to determine first whether the plaintiff has alleged a deprivation of a [federal] right at all'. . . For the reasons that follow, Plaintiff fails to plausibly allege violation of the claimed constitutional right. Therefore, we do not reach the second prong (whether right clearly-established). . . .Where the claimed constitutional violation involves the Fourteenth Amendment right to medical care, Plaintiff must allege facts, which, if proved, would show Officers exhibited deliberate indifference to Carmona's serious medical needs. . . . To show deliberate indifference, Plaintiff must plausibly allege that Officers '(1) w[ere] aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and (2) actually drew the inference'. . . .Plaintiff was required to plead facts which, if proved, showed Officers were 'aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists',—the serious harm being internal bleeding in this instance—'and actually drew the inference'. . . Viewing the well-pleaded facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff—i.e., Officers were aware Carmona was involved in multiple automobile collisions, and she had visible abrasions and contusions on her extremities—Plaintiff, at most, alleged that Officers should have known Carmona was at-risk for internal bleeding. But, as discussed supra, actual knowledge is required for liability to attach. . . Because Plaintiff fails to allege sufficient facts to plausibly show Officers were subjectively aware of the risk of internal bleeding, her allegations do not state a deliberate-indifference claim. And, as noted, because Plaintiff fails to allege violation of a constitutional right, we do not reach the second prong of the qualified-immunity test—whether that right was clearly established at the time of the violation.")

Carmona v. City of Brownsville, 126 F.4th 1091, 1100 (5th Cir. 2025) (Ho, J., concurring in the judgment) ("I agree that Plaintiff has failed to adequately allege Defendants' actual knowledge of the risk of serious medical harm presented in this case. I write separately to note that, under our circuit precedent, actual knowledge is not the only way that Plaintiff could have survived dismissal. '[O]ur court has emphasized that an "official's knowledge of a substantial risk of harm may be inferred if the risk was obvious."'. . But Plaintiff fails to make this argument, so I express no view on it.")

San Miguel v. McLane, No. 22-10517, 2024 WL 747232, at *5 (5th Cir. Feb. 23, 2024) (not reported) ("[O]ur court has not decided whether the deliberate indifference or professional judgment standard applies to claims brought by civilly committed individuals alleging that they received inadequate medical care. . . Furthermore, other federal circuits are divided on the issue. . . . As a result, we cannot say that the magistrate judge plainly erred by applying the deliberate indifference standard when analyzing the claims against Bearden.")

Edmiston v. Borrego, 75 F.4th 551, 559 (5th Cir. 2023) ("Plaintiffs. . .maintain this court should . . . apply the objective-unreasonableness standard the Court adopted in Kingsley v. Hendrickson for claims of excessive force (not failure to protect) by officers against a pretrial detainee. . . But, we are bound by our rule of orderliness. . . This rule renders this objective-unreasonableness assertion meritless.")

Crandel v. Hall, 75 F.4th 537, 544 (5th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 1002 (2024) ("Plaintiffs . . maintain this court should instead apply the objective-unreasonableness standard the Court adopted in Kingsley v. Hendrickson for claims of excessive force (not failure to protect) by officers against a pretrial detainee. 576 U.S. 389, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 192 L.Ed.2d 416 (2015). But, we are bound by our rule of orderliness. . . This rule renders this assertion meritless.")

Williams by and through Smith v. City of Yazoo, 41 F.4th 416, 423 n.4 (5th Cir. 2022) ("The Supreme Court recognizes that pretrial detainees' right to medical care is 'at least as great' as that of convicted prisoners, City of Revere v. Mass. Gen. Hosp., 463 U.S. 239, 244 (1983), but has never defined the contours of that right[.] . . . We are in the 'slight majority' of circuits that apply the Eighth Amendment standard equally to denial-of-care claims by pre-and post-trial detainees. . . The minority approach grants pretrial detainees broader protections because they have not yet been found guilty.")

Cope v. Cogdill, 3 F.4th 198, 207 n.7 (5th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 2573 (2022) ("Cope argues that the Supreme Court announced an objective standard for pretrial detainees and that the standard of reasonableness employed here should be objective, not subjective. She relies on Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015). But Kingsley did not address claims regarding medical treatment. Rather, the Supreme Court held that plaintiffs alleging excessive force must show that the force was objectively excessive. . . Since Kingsley discussed a different type of constitutional claim, it did not abrogate our deliberate-indifference precedent. Thus, Cope must prove subjective knowledge. . . We recently clarified, however, that subjective intent of harm does not have to be proven.")

Batyukova v. Doege, 994 F.3d 717, 732-33 (5th Cir. 2021) ("Deputy Doege had 'subjective knowledge of a substantial risk of serious medical harm.'. . Deputy Doege shot Batyukova several times. Batyukova fell to the ground and lay motionless. Deputy Doege immediately requested assistance, which evinces his awareness of Batyukova's need for medical care. At issue is whether Deputy Doege responded with deliberate indifference. . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Batyukova, even though Deputy Doege did not personally render medical treatment to Batyukova, he immediately informed emergency dispatch that shots had been fired, that Batyukova was injured, and that she needed assistance. We cannot say he ignored Batyukova, refused to treat her, or displayed wanton disregard for her medical needs. . . In contrast is one of our decisions in which deliberate-indifference claims arose from officers' failure to inform jail personnel of a pretrial detainee's injuries when they delivered him to the jail. . . . Here, Deputy Doege immediately sought medical attention. Batyukova relies on the fact that Deputy Doege did not 'individually' provide medical care. Although that is true, a Medina County deputy did render aid. That deputy approached Batyukova, determined that she was breathing and responsive, and stayed with her until EMS arrived. . . .Accordingly, that Deputy Doege was not the officer personally to approach Batyukova does not amount to deliberate indifference. The only possibly meaningful difference between Mason and this case is the delay between the shooting and the moment the Medina County deputy approached Batyukova. At most, the delay was 15 minutes, which is the amount of time between Batyukova being shot and EMS arriving. We acknowledge that 15 minutes appears to be a long time to be left on the ground while bleeding from gunshot wounds. It does not, however, amount to a legally cognizable claim for deliberate indifference because Batyukova has not presented any evidence that the delay resulted in 'substantial harm.'. .There is no indication that the delay between being shot and being approached, either by the Medina County deputy or EMS, increased Batyukova's risk of bodily harm or death. . . Nor is there any indication that the delay caused pain that would have been alleviated had she been approached by an on-scene deputy at an earlier time. Further, the time taken to clear the scene, both initially and subsequently, is a 'legitimate governmental objective' preventing that delay from being a basis for deliberate indifference. . . Finally, EMS arrived within 15 minutes of the shooting, and there is no indication that it could have arrived any sooner. Batyukova has not shown that Deputy Doege responded to her medical needs with deliberate indifference.")

Martinez v. City of North Richland Hills, No. 20-10521, 2021 WL 742662, at *3–4 & n.2 (5th Cir. Feb. 25, 2021) (not reported) ("A challenge to a condition of confinement is a challenge to 'general conditions, practices, rules, or restrictions of pretrial confinement.' Hare, 74 F.3d at 644. When a plaintiff is challenging a condition of confinement, this court applies the test established by the Supreme Court in Bell, and asks whether the condition is 'reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective.'. . '[I]f a restriction or condition is not reasonably related to a legitimate goal—if it is arbitrary or purposeless—a court permissibly may infer that the purpose of the governmental action is punishment that may not constitutionally be inflicted upon detainees qua detainees.'. . Because '[a] State's imposition of a rule or restriction during pretrial confinement manifests an avowed intent to subject a pretrial detainee to that rule or restriction,' the plaintiff need not demonstrate that the state actor or municipal entity acted with intent to punish. . . Thus, 'a true jail condition case starts with the assumption that the State intended to cause the pretrial detainee's alleged constitutional deprivation.'. . .An episodic-acts-or-omissions claim, by contrast, 'faults specific jail officials for their acts or omissions.'. . In an episodic act or omission case, courts employ different standards depending on whether the liability of the individual defendant or the municipal defendant is at issue. . . Martinez 'must establish that the official(s) acted with subjective deliberate indifference to prove a violation of [her] constitutional rights.'. . 'Deliberate indifference in the context of an episodic failure to provide reasonable medical care to a pretrial detainee means that: (1) the official was aware of facts from which an inference of substantial risk of serious harm could be drawn; (2) the official actually drew that inference; and (3) the official's response indicates the official subjectively intended that harm occur.'. . Martinez's Fourteenth Amendment claim is a medical-inattention claim. When officials demonstrate deliberate indifference to a pretrial detainee's serious medical needs, they violate the Fourteenth Amendment. . . .The deliberate-indifference analysis under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments are the same. Therefore, cases discussing deliberate indifference in the Eighth Amendment context are applicable in this analysis.")

Baldwin v. Dorsey, 964 F.3d 320, 326 (5th Cir. 2020), 141 S. Ct. 1379 (2021) ("[T]he Fourteenth Amendment protects pretrial detainees' right to medical care and to 'protection from known suicidal tendencies.'. . A government official violates a Fourteenth Amendment right when the official acts with deliberate indifference to a detainee's serious medical needs. To prove deliberate indifference, Baldwin must show that Dorsey was 'aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists,' that Dorsey actually 'dr[e]w the inference,' and that Dorsey 'disregard[ed] that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it.'. . Finally, Baldwin must show that 'substantial harm' resulted from Dorsey's alleged deliberately indifferent conduct.")

Converse v. City of Kemah, Texas, 961 F.3d 771, 775-76 & n.2 (5th Cir. 2020) ("Since at least 1989, it has been clearly established that officials may be held liable for their acts or omissions that result in a detainee's suicide if they 'had subjective knowledge of a substantial risk of harm to a pretrial detainee but responded with deliberate indifference to that risk.'. . The sometimes confusing relationship between these two standards—qualified immunity's 'objective reasonableness' standard and the Fourteenth Amendment's 'subjective deliberate indifference' standard—has been distilled as follows: '[W]e are to determine whether, in light of the facts as viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the conduct of the individual defendants was objectively unreasonable when applied against the deliberate indifference standard.'. . A prison official will not be held liable if he merely 'should have known' of a risk; instead, to satisfy this high standard, a prison official 'must both be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and he must also draw the inference.'. . An official shows a deliberate indifference to that risk 'by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it.'. . . Farmer v. Brennan analyzed deliberate indifference as applied to federal prisoners, which is proscribed by the Eighth Amendment. . . We have held that the State owes the same duty to pretrial detainees under the Fourteenth Amendment as it owes prisoners under the Eighth Amendment—that is, to provide them 'with basic human needs, including medical care and protection from harm, during their confinement.'")

Baughman v. Hickman, 935 F.3d 302, 306-09 (5th Cir. 2019) ("We classify a pretrial detention due process claim according to whether it concerns a 'condition of confinement' or an 'episodic act or omission.'. . As is clear from our earlier explanation of the facts underlying Baughman's suit, he is making claims based on episodic acts or omissions. For such claims, 'we employ different standards depending on whether the liability of the individual defendant or the municipal defendant is at issue.'. . Both standards require Baughman to 'establish that the official(s) acted with subjective deliberate indifference.'. . . Subjective deliberate indifference 'is an extremely high standard to meet.'. . County as opposed to individual liability has the additional requirement that the 'violation resulted from a [county] policy or custom adopted and maintained with objective deliberate indifference.'. . . We conclude that there is insufficient information about Pruitt's driving and no evidence to allow a finding of Pruitt's actual knowledge that the manner in which he was driving created a substantial risk of harm. Merely negligent driving by Deputy Pruitt would not support a violation of a constitutional right. . . .For an episodic act claim relying on an alleged denial or delay of medical care, Baughman can show deliberate indifference by demonstrating that an official 'refused to treat him, ignored his complaints, intentionally treated him incorrectly, or engaged in any similar conduct that would clearly evince a wanton disregard for any serious medical needs.' [citing Perniciaro v. Lea]")

Johnson v. Johnson, No. 15-60665, 2017 WL 2390592, at *1 (5th Cir. June 1, 2017) (not published) ("The rights of pretrial detainees are protected by the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. Cupit v. Jones, 835 F.2d 82, 84 (5th Cir. 1987). 'It is well established that prison officials have a constitutional duty to protect prisoners from violence at the hands of their fellow inmates.' Longoria v. Texas, 473 F.3d 586, 592 (5th Cir. 2006) (citing Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 832-33 (1994)). In this case, the standard of subjective deliberate indifference enunciated in Farmer, 511 U.S. at 825, 832-33, is the measure of culpability.")

Alderson v. Concordia Parish Correctional Facility, 848 F.3d 415, 419-20 & n.4 (5th Cir. 2017) (per curiam) ("To succeed in a § 1983 action based on 'episodic acts or omissions' in violation of Fourteenth Amendment rights, a pretrial detainee must show subjective deliberate indifference by the defendants. . .That is, the plaintiff must show that the official knew of and disregarded a substantial risk of serious harm. . . .The concurring opinion suggests that our en banc court should reconsider Hare in light of the Supreme Court's opinion in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015). Because the Fifth Circuit has continued to rely on Hare and to apply a subjective standard post-Kingsley, this panel is bound by our rule of orderliness. . . Moreover, the Ninth Circuit is the only circuit to have extended Kingsley's objective standard to failure-to-protect claims. See Castro v. Cty. of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 2016). Even if Kingsley did require us to adopt a new standard for failure-to-protect claims, this would not change the outcome of the case because Alderson has not stated a failure-to-protect claim by alleging that any specific defendant made an intentional decision with respect to the conditions of his confinement, that a reasonable officer in the circumstances would have appreciated the high degree of risk involved, and that any defendant failed to take reasonably available measures to abate the risks associated with housing pre-trial detainees and DOC inmates together. . . . Alderson's allegation that CPCF had knowledge of his danger is not a sufficient allegation that any specific defendant had knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm to Alderson based upon his classification. Because he has not alleged that Byrnes and Spinner had knowledge of such a risk, Alderson has not linked their alleged misclassification to deliberate indifference toward that risk. Accordingly, Alderson has failed to state a claim based on their misclassification. . .Alderson has similarly failed to state a claim for supervisory liability against Byrnes, Spinner, Lance Moore, Kelly Moore, and Johnson. To hold any of these defendants liable as supervisory officials under § 1983, Alderson must allege either that they participated in acts that caused constitutional deprivation or that they implemented unconstitutional policies causally related to his injuries.")

Alderson v. Concordia Parish Correctional Facility, 848 F.3d 415, 424-25 (5th Cir. 2017) (per curiam) (Graves, J., specially concurring in part and dissenting as to footnote 4) ("I write separately because the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466 (2015), appears to call into question this court's holding in Hare v. City of Corinth, 74 F.3d 633 (5th Cir. 1996). In Kingsley, which was an excessive force case, the Supreme Court indeed said: 'Whether that standard might suffice for liability in the case of an alleged mistreatment of a pretrial detainee need not be decided here; for the officers do not dispute that they acted purposefully or knowingly with respect to the force they used against Kingsley.' Kingsley, 135 S.Ct. at 2472. However, that appears to be an acknowledgment that, even in such a case, there is no established subjective standard as the majority determined in Hare. Also, the analysis in Kingsley appears to support the conclusion that an objective standard would apply in a failure-to-protect case. . . Additionally, the Supreme Court said:

We acknowledge that our view that an objective standard is appropriate in the context of excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees pursuant to the Fourteenth Amendment may raise questions about the use of a subjective standard in the context of excessive force claims brought by convicted prisoners. We are not confronted with such a claim, however, so we need not address that issue today.

Id. at 2476. This indicates that there are still different standards for pretrial detainees and DOC inmates, contrary to at least some of the language in Hare, 74 F.3d at 650, and that, if the standards were to be commingled, it would be toward an objective standard as to both on at least some claims. Further, the Ninth Circuit granted en banc rehearing in Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 2016), after a partially dissenting panel judge wrote separately to point out that Kingsley 'calls into question our precedent on the appropriate state-of-mind inquiry in failure-to-protect claims brought by pretrial detainees.'. . The en banc court concluded that Kingsley applies to failure-to-protect claims and that an objective standard is appropriate. Castro, 833 F.3d at 1068-1073. In Estate of Henson v. Wichita County, 795 F.3d 456 (5th Cir. 2014), decided just one month after Kingsley, this court did not address any application of Kingsley. Likewise, the two subsequent cases also cited by the majority did not address or distinguish Kingsley. . . Because I read Kingsley as the Ninth Circuit did and would revisit the deliberate indifference standard, I write separately.")

Crandel on behalf of Worl v. Callahan County, Texas, No. 1:21-CV-075-C, 2022 WL 1114405, at *3 (N.D. Tex. Mar. 14, 2022) ("Like the Plaintiffs in Cope, who argued that certain defendants in that case were deliberately indifferent by housing the detainee in a cell with the means of committing suicide readily available to the detainee in the form of a lengthy phone cord, Plaintiffs here also contend the same. Here, however, there is no evidence before the Court, beyond speculative evidence, to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Hastings or Piper appreciated that Worl was a suicide risk or that the phone cord would likely be an instrument of suicide by Worl. Thus, the admissible evidence relied upon by Plaintiffs to attempt to show what the individual Defendants should have appreciated a risk of the phone cords is insufficient under the circumstances to show a violation of clearly established rights at the time Worl committed suicide or that either was deliberately indifferent. . . Negligence, and even gross negligence, is insufficient to show deliberate indifference. As stated above, 'an official's failure to alleviate a significant risk that he should have perceived but did not' cannot amount to deliberate indifference.")

J.H., by and through N.H. v. Edwards, No. CV 20-293-JWD-EWD, 2020 WL 3448087, at *31–33 (M.D. La. June 24, 2020) ("[W]hile Plaintiffs urge that the 'objectively unreasonable' or 'rational relationship' test discussed by Kingsley v. Hendrickson . . . applies, Defendants are correct that the Fifth Circuit has limited Kingsley's 'objectively unreasonable' standard to cases involving excessive force against pretrial detainees. . . Moreover, Defendants urge that this case is more akin to a failure to protect or failure to provide basic needs case,[.] . . 'The State owes the same duty under the Due Process Clause and the Eighth Amendment to provide both pretrial detainees and convicted inmates with basic human needs, including medical care and protection from harm during their confinement.'. . A prison official is not liable under § 1983 unless the prisoner shows that the official exhibited deliberate indifference to his conditions of confinement or serious medical needs. . . The prisoner must show that the official: (1) was aware of facts from which an inference of an excessive risk to the prisoner's health or safety could be drawn; (2) drew an inference that such potential for harm existed; and (3) disregarded that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it. . . A pretrial detainee's claim based upon a jail official's 'episodic act or omission' is also evaluated under the standard of subjective deliberate indifference enunciated in Farmer. . . Defendants also cite certain cases from around the country where courts have evaluated facilities' responses to COVID-19, and these courts have applied the deliberate indifference standard. [collecting cases] Plaintiffs, on the other hand, urge that their claims are more appropriately analyzed under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . Plaintiffs urge that, in light of Youngberg, the conditions of confinement for juvenile offenders—who, like the mentally ill, are not confined to punish—must comport with the purpose of the confinement, which, under Louisiana law, are rehabilitation and individual treatment. . . .Plaintiffs also urge that this is a conditions of confinement case under the Fourteenth Amendment, not an episodic acts or omissions case, so Plaintiffs need only satisfy the 'rational relationship' test, not the 'deliberate indifference' test. There is a split in the case law in the circuits on the issue of whether juvenile offenders are judged under the Fourteenth or Eighth Amendments. . . The Fifth Circuit's position in Morales appears to be the minority. . . However, the Fifth Circuit has not overruled Morales or revisited the issue. Thus, while undermined, Morales appears to be the correct standard in this circuit. Further, Swain, Archilla, Mohammed, Sacal-Micha, and Polk are strong authority that the Court should apply the deliberate indifference standard for claims brought in response to the threat of COVID-19, even for those brought under the Fourteenth Amendment. Ultimately, however, the Court need not resolve this question. Regardless of which standard to apply—the Eighth Amendment's deliberate indifference standard or the Fourteen Amendment's 'reasonably related to a legitimate interest' standard—the Court finds that the Plaintiffs have failed to meet their burden of clearly demonstrating a substantial likelihood of success on the merits.")

Umarbaev v. Moore, No. 3:20-CV-1279-B-BN, 2020 WL 3051448, at *7 (N.D. Tex. June 6, 2020) ("As numerous federal courts have recognized, 'the COVID-19 pandemic presents an extraordinary and unique public-health risk to society, as evidenced by the unprecedented protective measures that local, state, and national governmental authorities have implemented to stem the spread of the virus.'. . But, simply put, after considering the record here and with the benefit of oral argument, Petitioners have not shown that the Respondents' response to the pandemic is, objectively speaking, 'not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective.'. . That is, they have failed to show that Prairieland's implementation of CDC or other guidance (or its failure to implement further measures that Petitioners argue are needed) is 'unreasonable in light of the COVID-19 pandemic.'")

Joyner v. Grenada County, Mississippi, No. 4:19CV27-M-P, 2020 WL 2298553, at *2–4 (N.D. Miss. May 7, 2020) ("In arguing that Kingsley's objective standard should apply here, . . . plaintiffs fail to acknowledge that this is not an excessive force case, but, rather, a so-called 'failure to protect' case in which they allege deliberate indifference in the provision of medical treatment to Joyner. Clearly, a case in which a jailer is alleged to have deliberately used excessive force against an inmate is quite different from one in which she is alleged to have provided inadequate medical treatment, and it does not necessarily follow from Kingsley's holding that the Supreme Court would also apply an objective deliberate indifference standard in failure to protect cases. Indeed, the Fifth Circuit has, as discussed below, thus far declined to apply Kingsley in this context. In their brief, plaintiffs acknowledge that the Fifth Circuit has continued to apply its subjective deliberate indifference standard in Fourteenth Amendment cases brought by pretrial detainees outside the excessive force context, and they chide the Fifth Circuit for 'ignoring' Kingsley, and for failing to overrule the subjective deliberate indifference standard set forth in Hare and similar cases. . . . In criticizing the Fifth Circuit for 'ignoring' Kingsley, however, plaintiffs themselves ignore the fact that this is not an excessive force case, and their own (accurate) description of Kingsley's holding is that it established an objective deliberate indifference standard only in such excessive force cases. . . It is thus clear that the Fifth Circuit has not chosen to 'ignore' Kingsley by declining to expand that opinion's holding to other types of Fourteenth Amendment claims. . . . In their brief, plaintiffs note that Judge Graves wrote a concurrence in Alderson in which he argued that Kingsley's objective deliberate indifference standard should, in fact, apply in the failure-to-protect context, but, crucially, none of the other Fifth Circuit judges on the panel joined his concurrence. The fact that Judge Graves raised the issue in a concurrence makes it clear that the Fifth Circuit is well aware of the argument that Kingsley's analysis should apply in the failure-to-protect context, but it is likewise clear that an insufficient number of Fifth Circuit judges have been persuaded by that argument. In the court's view, the Fifth Circuit was well within its authority in interpreting the law in this manner, since, once again, Kingsley's actual holding only applies in the excessive force context, as plaintiffs themselves acknowledge. As a district court, this court is, of course, bound by the Fifth Circuit's published precedent, and Alderson makes it clear that, in cases such as this one, a subjective deliberate indifference standard applies and that the 'plaintiff must show that the official knew of and disregarded a substantial risk of serious harm.' Alderson, 848 F.3d at 419. In spite of Alderson's clear holding that a subjective deliberate indifference standard applies in the failure-to-protect context, plaintiffs essentially ignore that standard in their brief and instead frame their arguments only in terms of the objective deliberate indifference standard which Judge Graves unsuccessfully sought to persuade his fellow judges to adopt.")

Tolbert v. Gusman, No. CV 18-10053, 2020 WL 1892590, at *4–5 (E.D. La. Apr. 16, 2020) ("Plaintiffs argue that the holding in Kingsley applies broadly to any constitutional claim brought by a pretrial detainee. This position, however, conflicts with binding Fifth Circuit law. After Kingsley, the Fifth Circuit applied a subjective deliberate indifference standard to a § 1983 claim by a pretrial detainee. [citing Alderson] . . . Accordingly, this Court is bound to apply a subjective standard here.")

Nichols for the Estate of LeJunie v. Brazos County, No. CV H-19-2820, 2020 WL 956239, at *6-9 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 26, 2020) ("In the Fifth Circuit, as the parties' arguments suggest, the court's analysis in § 1983 cases varies depending on whether a plaintiff is alleging that an alleged deprivation of rights was caused by an episodic act or omission of an individual state official or by the conditions of confinement. . . . If the facts of a case are appropriately considered under a conditions-of-confinement framework, courts apply the test found in Bell v. Wolfish. . . The question under Bell v. Wolfish is 'whether those conditions amount to punishment of the detainee.'. . The court must therefore determine 'whether the [conditions or restrictions were] imposed for the purpose of punishment or whether [they were] but incident to some other legitimate governmental purpose.' . . . In determining whether an interest is legitimate, courts must keep in mind that the government's interests include not only its need to insure the detainee's presence at trial but also its legitimate interests in managing the facility. . . Sometimes challenged conditions are explicit, and sometimes they reflect a de facto policy. . . Here, since the parties dispute whether the Bell test should apply or whether, like in Hare, the court must find deliberate indifference for discrete acts or omissions, it is helpful to review the facts and legal conclusions of the primary cases upon which they rely. . . .Here, the case is at the motion to dismiss stage, and the allegations in the amended complaint indicate that a policy, or lack thereof, is to blame for the failure of the nurses to give LeJunie his medication, even after receiving his medical records, or refer him to a physician to get the medication. This seems to be an attack the 'general conditions, practices, rules, or restrictions of pretrial confinement.' Whether the evidence rises to the type of pervasive pattern the Fifth Circuit required in Shepherd or should only be analyzed under the acts-or-omissions framework like in Scott, Flores, and Olabisiomotosho will likely be determined at the summary judgment stage. The court finds that Nichols has plausibly pled that arbitrary and purposeless conditions-of-confinement led to LeJunie's death. The motion to dismiss this claim for failure to state a claim is DENIED.")

Molina v. Wise County, Texas, No. 4:17-CV-00809-P, 2020 WL 758723, at *4 (N.D. Tex. Feb. 14, 2020) ("In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, the Supreme Court held that courts must apply an objective test to excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees. . . The Ninth Circuit later extended Kingsley's objective standard to a pretrial detainee's failure-to-protect claim. See Castro v. City of L.A., 833 F.3d 1060, 1070-71 (9th Cir. 2016). The Fifth Circuit subsequently distinguished Castro, noting that the Ninth Circuit was the only circuit to have extended Kingsley to a pretrial detainees's failure-to-protect claims. See Alderson v. Concordia Par. Corr. Facility, 848 F.3d 415, 419-20 & n. 4 (5th Cir. 2017). Instead, the Fifth Circuit reaffirmed the holding of Hare v. City of Corinth, which applies a 'subjective deliberate indifference' standard to all failure-to-protect claims, regardless of whether the plaintiff is a pretrial detainee or a prisoner. . . Under this Fifth Circuit controlling authority, this Court will apply the subjective deliberate indifference standard under Hare to Molina's failure-to-protect claim.")

Ybarra-Fuentes v. City of Rosenberg, No. CV H-18-1824, 2018 WL 6019177, at *3 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 16, 2018) ("Complaints alleging violations of a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment rights are evaluated 'under one of two rubrics, "jail conditions" or "episodic acts or omission."'. . In jail-conditions cases, courts 'determine "[i]f a particular condition or restriction of pretrial detention is reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective."'. . Challenges to episodic acts or omissions, by contrast, 'require the plaintiff to prove that the official "acted or failed to act with subjective deliberate indifference to the detainee's needs."'. . Although plaintiffs prefer the jail-conditions theory because no mens rea is required to establish a claim, . . . these claims are 'rare[.]' They are limited to 'attacks on general conditions, practices, rules, or restrictions of pretrial confinement[.]' A 'plaintiff's claim [usually] faults specific jail officials for their acts or omissions because the plaintiff cannot establish the existence of an officially sanctioned unlawful condition.'. .Ybarra-Fuentes and Reyes have asserted claims based on an episodic act or omission. . . The complaint centers on the individual defendants, who allegedly failed to screen Gunter for mental illness, place him on suicide watch and continuously monitor him, confiscate his belt, or give him medications. Because Ybarra-Fuentes and Reyes challenge episodic acts or omissions, they must allege an 'objective exposure to a substantial risk of serious harm' and that jail 'officials acted or failed to act with deliberate indifference to that risk.'")

Rodriguez v. Bexar County, No. SA-18-CV-248-XR, 2018 WL 4431433, at *4 n.2 (W.D. Tex. Sept. 17, 2018) ("The Court notes that a Fifth Circuit panel has held that the rule of orderliness requires the courts in this Circuit to continue to apply this standard post-Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), unless and until the en banc Court decides otherwise. Alderson, 848 F.3d at 419 n.4. In light of this, this Court agrees with a recent decision from the Northern District of Texas concluding that the applicable standard remains the Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825 (1994) subjective deliberate indifference standard (without any intent-to-harm requirement). See Dyer v. Fyall, __ F. Supp. 3d __, No. 3:15-CV-2638-B, 2018 WL 2739025 (N.D. Tex. 2018). However, this Court disagrees that the law concerning Fourteenth Amendment medical inattention claims is not clearly established in this Circuit 'given that some Fifth Circuit cases require plaintiffs to show intent to cause harm in medical-inattention cases and others do not.' Moreover, Scogin does not argue in her briefing that the law in this area is not clearly established.")

Dyer v. Fyall, No. 3:15-CV-2638-B, 2018 WL 2739025, at *8 (N.D. Tex. June 6, 2018) ("The Second and Ninth Circuits have applied the Kinglsey standard in Fourteenth Amendment medical-inattention cases. . . The Court must therefore determine which of three possible standards governs the Dyers' medical-inattention claim: (1) the objective recklessness standard from Kinglsey; (2) the subjective recklessness standard from Farmer; or (3) the subjective recklessness standard from Farmer with the actual-intent-to-harm requirement imposed in some Fifth Circuit cases. The Court finds that the correct standard is the Farmer subjective recklessness standard without the intent-to-harm requirement. As to the Kinglsey objective standard, the Fifth Circuit has continued to apply a subjective standard post-Kinglsey, which led one panel to hold that the rule of orderliness prevents panels from applying the Kinglsey standard in medical-inattention cases until the en banc Fifth Circuit decides otherwise. . . And as to the intent-to-harm requirement, although the Fifth Circuit has required intent to harm in some cases, . . . Fifth Circuit cases more often lack the intent requirement,[.] The Seventh Circuit has undermined the Gibbs case on which the Fifth Circuit relied in Hare. . . And the Supreme Court in Farmer cast doubt on the intent-to-harm requirement. . . Thus, to survive summary judgment, the Dyers must present evidence that the officers 'kn[ew] of and disregard[ed] an excessive risk to [Graham's health or safety].'")

Dyer v. Fyall, No. 3:15-CV-2638-B, 2018 WL 2739025, at *9 (N.D. Tex. June 6, 2018) ("The confusion surrounding medical-inattention claims in the Fifth Circuit dooms the Dyers' medical-inattention claim. The officers in this case have qualified immunity, which means the Dyers can hold them liable for violations of only clearly established rights. A right is clearly established only if 'the contours of the right [are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would understand what he is doing violates that right.'. . So, given that some Fifth Circuit cases require plaintiffs to show intent to cause harm in medical-inattention cases and other do not, there is no clearly established right in the Fifth Circuit to be free from medical inattention by officers who do not actually intend to cause harm.")

Guillory v. Louisiana Dep't of Health and Hospitals, No. CV 16-787-JWD-RLB, 2018 WL 1404277, at *8-9 (M.D. La. Mar. 20, 2018) ("The Court also notes that, while not raised by Guillory, the deliberate indifference standard remains a subjective one as set out in Hare despite the intervening case of Kingsley v. Hendrickson. . . In Alderson v. Concordia Parish Correctional Facility, . . . the Fifth Circuit relied upon Hare and applied the subjective standard. Despite a concurring judge's call for the Court to 'revisit the deliberate indifference standard' in light of Kingsley, . . . the Court rejected that argument. . . Here, Guillory's second through fourth claims (failure to supervise, inadequate medical care, and failure to protect) allege episodic acts or omissions. Each claim alleges specific acts by individual Defendants, each of which resulted in harm. Guillory fails to allege any facts that indicate that his harm resulted from an explicit policy or restriction imposed upon him as a condition of confinement. At best, Guillory attempts to demonstrate an unstated or de facto policy or restriction; however, he fails to allege any facts that establish an extended or pervasive pattern of misconduct required to prove an intended condition or practice. . . Accordingly, the Court finds that the deliberate indifference standard of care is the appropriate measure of the constitutional duty owed by state officials with regard to Guillory's second through fourth claims. . . . Guillory's first Section 1983 claim alleges that the Defendants acted individually and together to establish and maintain a system they knew would result in the effective denial of care to patients with serious medical conditions. . . This claim amounts to a challenge on his conditions of confinement because his allegations are not based on the specific acts or omissions of individuals, but rather on a systemic failure affecting all patients. . .In Hare, the Fifth Circuit held that a different standard applied to conditions of confinement challenges because 'a State's imposition of a rule or restriction during pretrial confinement manifests an avowed intent to subject a pretrial detainee to that rule or restriction.'. . The Hare court held that, when considering a condition of confinement, the reasonable-relationship test outlined in the Supreme Court case of Bell v. Wolfish . . . was preferable to the deliberate indifference standard used when analyzing a claim based on an official's episodic acts or omissions. . . The Fifth Circuit explained, '[f]or the Bell test to apply, a jailer's acts or omissions must implement a rule or restriction or otherwise demonstrate the existence of an identifiable intended condition or practice.'. . After reviewing his complaints, the Court finds that Guillory has failed to allege or identify any specific policy, practice, or custom that was the 'moving force' behind the events of which he complains of. Guillory has not identified any written or informal policies that reflect the existence of unconstitutional patterns or practices. Guillory alleges no facts to suggest that any other inmate suffered as a result of a systemic failure to provide medical care. Guillory's conclusory allegations are based solely on the events in the aftermath of his attack. . .The Court finds that Guillory's allegations of systemic denial of access to medical care are not sufficient to reflect the sort of systemic deficiencies which the courts have found to warrant relief in other cases. Accordingly, the Court finds that the Defendants' Motion shall be granted with respect to the Section 1983 Systemic Denial of Access to Medical Care claim asserted against the Defendants. However, Guillory will be given leave to amend to allege, if he can, facts sufficient to support this allegation.")

Lindsey v. Hubbard, No. 1:15CV357-LG-RHW, 2017 WL 2727093, at *5 (S.D. Miss. June 23, 2017) ("Lindsey's challenge to the constitutionality of his conditions of confinement is determined by application of the test in Bell v. Wolfish, 99 S. Ct. 1861 (1979). The test asks 'whether particular restrictions and conditions accompanying pretrial detention amount to punishment in the constitutional sense of that word.'. . In determining whether a particular condition amounts to punishment, the court considers whether 'the disability is imposed for the purpose of punishment or whether it is but an incident of some other legitimate governmental purpose.' Harris v. Angelina Cty., 31 F.3d 331, 334 (5th Cir. 1994) (quoting Bell, 99 S. Ct. at 1873). Courts may infer a punitive purpose if the challenged condition is not 'reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective.'")

Cry v. Dilliard, No. 3:15CV318-DPJ-FKB, 2017 WL 2172944, at *3 (S.D. Miss. May 16, 2017) ("A slightly different standard governs the objective reasonableness of Defendants' actions for purposes of the qualified-immunity analysis here, because Kingsley v. Hendrickson abrogated the rule previously followed by the Fifth Circuit. Under the law as it existed in January 2015, a pre-trial detainee alleging an excessive-force claim had to prove the force was applied 'maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm to the pretrial detainee, rather than in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline.'")

Robertson v. Gautreaux, No. CV 16-341-JJB-RLB, 2017 WL 690542, at *4 & n.31 (M.D. La. Feb. 21, 2017) ("The Defendants argue that the Kingsley decision, a case about excessive force claims, does not apply to the Plaintiff's claims. They urge this Court to follow the Fifth Circuit case, Hare, which held that regardless of whether an inmate is a pretrial detainee or a convicted inmate, the standard for holding a government official liable for failing to protect him from inmate violence is the same—the deliberate indifference standard. . . The Court agrees with the Defendants and declines to apply a new objective standard to failure to protect claims brought by pretrial detainees. Recently the Fifth Circuit reaffirmed the Hare holding in light of Kingsley. [Alderson v. Concordia Parish Corr. Facility, Civil Action No. 15-30610, 2017 WL 541006, at *2 n. 4 (5th Cir. Feb. 9, 2017) ("The concurring opinion suggests that our en banc court should reconsider Hare in light of the Supreme Court's opinion in Kingsley ... Because the Fifth Circuit has continued to rely on Hare and to apply a subjective standard post-Kingsley, this panel is bound by our rule of orderliness.").]")

Bishop v. City of Denton, No. 4:14-CV-608, 2015 WL 8273986, at *4 (E.D. Tex. Dec. 8, 2015)("As discussed above, the Court concludes that Bishop has presented sufficient evidence to establish that a question of fact exists as to whether Porter violated Bishop's right to be free from the use of excessive force. However, Porter argues that his conduct was not a violation of clearly established law. To support this contention, Porter cites Justice Alito's dissent in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, which states that it has not been determined whether a pretrial detainee may bring a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim against a detention facility employee. . . However, the Fifth Circuit has allowed pretrial detainees to assert Fourth Amendment excessive force claims against detention facility employees. . . . If bystander liability for excessive force based on the Fourth Amendment was clearly established law as of January 2010, direct liability for excessive force was also clearly established. Therefore, within the Fifth Circuit, there was clearly established law at the time the event at issue occurred that detention facility employees could be held liable under the Fourth Amendment for using excessive force against pretrial detainees.")

Rodriguez v. Bexar County Hospital District, No. SA-14-CA-861-OG, 2015 WL 7760209, at *36 (W.D. Tex. Nov. 30, 2015) ("Recently, the Supreme Court has declared that claims of excessive force brought under Section 1983 by pretrial detainees must be reviewed under an objective standard. . . As explained above, however, defendant Garcia is entitled to the protection afforded by the doctrine of qualified immunity, which protects public officers and employees from liability for conduct which was objectively reasonable under then-clearly established federal law. At the time of the altercation between plaintiff and defendant Garcia, the officer's conduct must have demonstrated a subjective awareness of a substantial risk of serious harm and a failure to take reasonable measures to abate this risk. . . The Court agrees with defendant Garcia's expert witness that the conduct of defendant Garcia, which is substantiated by the video recording, appears in all respects to have been objectively reasonable in view of the legitimate governmental interest in maintaining order and decorum inside the University Hospital's controlled access unit and in preventing plaintiff, an actively psychotic patient, from obtaining control over defendant Garcia's weapon (something plaintiff candidly admits he attempted to accomplish during his fight with defendant Garcia). Plaintiff's uncorroborated self-serving assertions are not enough to raise a genuine issue of material fact when the remainder of the record fully supports defendant Garcia's assertions and refutes plaintiff's version of the events. . . Given plaintiff's psychotic condition, suicidal ideation, and clearly demonstrated propensity for violent conduct, this Court concludes the conduct of defendant Garcia did not violate the standard of subjective unreasonableness required under clearly established federal law in this Circuit for an excessive force claim at the time of the altercation between the two men on September 25, 2012. Defendant Garcia correctly argues plaintiff was experiencing a psychotic episode, actively hallucinating, and intent upon committing suicide by officer at the time of the incident on September 25, 2012. . . The undisputed video evidence shows: (1) plaintiff clearly instigated the incident by hopping around his bed and closing his hospital room door, something he acknowledges he was not authorized to do and (2) defendant Garcia's actions in attempting to gain control of plaintiff and keep plaintiff from gaining control over defendant Garcia's firearm were all eminently reasonable under the circumstances. Plaintiff had no right to close his hospital room door or to seek to gain control of defendant Garcia's weapon. Nothing in the video recording properly before the Court shows defendant Garcia employing anything other than reasonable force to subdue plaintiff, who not only actively resisted defendant Garcia throughout their altercation but attempted to gain control of defendant Garcia's weapon. Confronted with a psychotic, suicidal patient, defendant Garcia's conduct did not exceed the level of subjective reasonableness applicable at the time of the incident in question. Defendant Garcia is entitled to the protection afforded by the doctrine of qualified immunity and to a summary judgment on plaintiffs excessive force claim.")

Brown v. Gusman, No. CIV.A. 15-1491-DEK, 2015 WL 6827260, at *4-5, *7 (E.D. La. Nov. 6, 2015) ("[W]hatever the ultimate impact of Kingsley may be on this Circuit's traditional analysis, one thing is clear: the foregoing Hudson factors still play a role in a court's analysis of a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim. This is apparent from the fact that the Kingsley court referenced similar factors to be considered in resolving the objective reasonableness of an action on which a Fourteenth Amendment claim is based[.] . . . Finding Judge Brown's reasoning [in Thompson v. Beasley] persuasive, the undersigned will proceed by analyzing plaintiff's excessive force by considering the Hudson factors. . . . [T]he Court finds that all of the Hudson factors weigh in the defendants' favor and, as a result, plaintiff cannot show that Adams' use of Mace was 'objectively unreasonable.'")

Cauley v. Walker, No. CV 1:10CV326, 2015 WL 5521972, at *6 & n.4 (E.D. Tex. Sept. 16, 2015) ("Plaintiff has presented competent summary judgment showing that the amount of force used against him was objectively unreasonable and that he suffered more than a de minimis injury. Moreover, plaintiff's right to be free from having excessive force used against him was clearly established at the time of the incident in question. . . .The right of a pretrial detainee to be free from the use of excessive force was clearly established at the time of the incident in question. However, as indicated above, at that time courts considering an excessive use of force claim against a pretrial detainee asked whether force was used maliciously and sadistically, for the very purpose of causing harm, or in a good faith effort to maintain and restore discipline, rather than whether the force used was objectively unreasonable. As stated above, plaintiff's testimony at his deposition indicates that he was not presenting any threat while in the defendant's office and, accordingly, there was no need for any force to be used to maintain or restore discipline. Plaintiff has therefore demonstrated excessive force was used against him even under the test previously applied.")

Callaway v. City of Austin, No. A-15-CV-00103-SS, 2015 WL 4323174, at *3 n.1 (W.D. Tex. July 14, 2015) ("Some courts have interpreted Graham to hold that, where the Fourth Amendment applies to a plaintiff's Section 1983 claims, the plaintiff may not also state a claim under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . In this case, however, Callaway has alleged excessive force claims incident to her arrest, but which took place after she had been 'processed' at the Travis County Jail. . . 'Whether a particular standard applies turns on the plaintiff's status during the relevant time period.'. . The Fourteenth Amendment applies to claims of excessive force by pretrial detainees. . . Therefore, the Court will not dismiss Callaway's Section 1983 claims based on the Fourteenth Amendment. To the extent Callaway characterizes her Section 1983 claim as one for excessive force against a pretrial detainee under the Fourteenth Amendment, however, the Supreme Court has recently clarified that the same 'objective reasonableness' standard used in analyzing Fourth Amendment claims applies. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, No. 14–6368, 2015 U.S. LEXIS 4073, *12–13 (U.S. June 22, 2015) (citing Graham, 490 U.S. at 396). Given this clarification, id., along with the Supreme Court's repeated pronouncements that the Fourth Amendment applies to excessive force claims relating to involuntary blood draws from arrestees, see Missouri v. McNeely, 133 S.Ct. 1552, 1559–60 (2013), and Schmerber, 384 U.S. at 767, this Court will analyze all of Callaway's excessive force claims under the objectively reasonable standard articulated in Graham, 490 U.S. at 394–95.")

Thompson v. Beasley, 309 F.R.D. 236, 247 (N.D. Miss. 2015) ("In the approximately three weeks since Kingsley was decided, only one court in this circuit has addressed the Supreme Court's Kingsley opinion's impact on a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim in the Fifth Circuit. In Clark v. Anderson, a Texas District Court followed the Fifth Circuit rule that Fourteenth and Eighth Amendment claims are analyzed under the same framework, although it allowed that 'this holding is called into question by the Supreme Court's recent decision in Kingsley ....' No. 4:15–cv–360, 2015 WL 3960886, at *3, 3 n. 3 (N.D. Tex. June 29, 2015). While Clark stopped short of recognizing that Kingsley overruled the Kitchen and Valencia line of cases, a reading of Kingsley compels such a conclusion. Kingsley held that Fourteenth Amendment claims, unlike Eighth Amendment claims, must be decided under an objective standard. . . Kitchen and Valencia held that Fourteenth Amendment claims, like Eighth Amendment claims, must be decided under a subjective standard. . . These holdings cannot be squared. Accordingly, this Court follows the Supreme Court's direction and holds that Plaintiff's Fourteenth Amendment claim must be evaluated under an objective standard—that is, the Court must ask whether, from an objective point of view, Beasley's actions were rationally related to a legitimate, nonpunitive governmental purpose and whether his actions were excessive in relation to that purpose. . .There can be no serious dispute that Beasley's use of force during the incident was rationally related to the legitimate, non-punitive governmental purpose of moving to lockdown an inmate involved in a physical altercation, pending the completion of an investigation. Accordingly, the question becomes whether Beasley's use of force was excessive in relation to that purpose. In answering this question, the Court turns to the Hudson inquiry, which has been used for nearly twenty-five years to determine whether a corrections officer's use of force was 'wanton and unnecessary,' that is, whether force was excessive. . . However, in a departure from the pre-Kingsley jurisprudence, the Court need only ask whether the force was unnecessary—not whether the use of force was so unnecessary as to show the requisite state of mind to support an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim.")

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Hulon v. City of Lansing, Michigan, No. 23-1937, 2025 WL 554201, at *3–4 (6th Cir. Feb. 19, 2025) (not reported) ("Lawler. . . appears to conflict with Helphenstine, which applied the new reckless disregard standard to a pre-Brawner deliberate indifference claim. . . In other words, Helphenstine used the new standard to deny qualified immunity after it framed the clearly established right as the 'right to be free from deliberate indifference,'. . . while Lawler—much like Trozzi before it—used the old standard to grant qualified immunity after it focused on whether the contours of the right to be free from deliberate indifference had been clearly established. . . . We need not reconcile these decisions in this interlocutory appeal because the practical result is the same either way: qualified immunity must be denied in this case because a genuine dispute of material fact remains.")

Hulon v. City of Lansing, Michigan, No. 23-1937, 2025 WL 554201, at *4-5 (6th Cir. Feb. 19, 2025) (not reported) (Readler, J., concurring) ('I share the majority opinion's puzzlement over the state of our circuit's deliberate indifference law. And I join its thoughtful criticisms of the inconsistencies in that case law, which begin with the altered deliberate indifference standard announced in Brawner v. Scott County, 14 F.4th 585 (6th Cir. 2021). . . Brawner was misguided as an original matter. . . But even setting that objection aside, all should agree that the standard articulated there was 'anything but clear.'. . So the ensuing decision in Trozzi v. Lake County, 29 F.4th 745 (6th Cir. 2022), 'tried to clarify' it. . . In the end, Trozzi was consistent with Brawner. And so it remains the law of the circuit, subsequent inconsistent panel opinions notwithstanding. . . As others have observed, Brawner's wake left unanswered questions over the contours of our deliberate indifference standard for pretrial detainees. . . When that happens, future panels are left to provide answers. Trozzi honored that task, articulating Brawner's holding in a judicially administrable three-part test. . . And it did so after engaging in a detailed exploration of Brawner, the opinion that inspired Brawner, see Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015), our Court's subsequent precedents, and other background principles. In the end, Trozzi's analysis of the issue spanned eight double-columned pages of the Federal Reporter. . . There, the unanimous Trozzi panel faithfully advanced Brawner's holding, while adhering to the understanding that a substantive due process claim cannot be grounded in a standard of culpability lower than a conscious disregard to the plaintiff's safety. . . Trozzi's 'interpretation of Brawner was not only possible but indeed necessary.'. . Our en banc court, it bears noting, was content to leave Trozzi's holding in place, implicitly rejecting any notion that it created an intra-circuit conflict with Brawner. . . Yet a subsequent panel decision seemingly sought to achieve what the en banc court could not. Our decision in Helphenstine v. Lewis County purported to invalidate Trozzi. . . To Helphenstine's mind, Brawner itself spawned no questions, but only answers. At the outset, it bears asking how Helphenstine had the power to purport to nullify Trozzi. Traditionally, our Court applies the prior panel rule when '[b]oth rulings cannot be right,'. . . because the second case reaches a holding that is '[o]pposite to,' 'contrary to, or 'in conflict with' the first. . . Most often, this occurs when two lines of precedent arise oblivious of each other and eventually butt heads. . . In such cases, the rule from the first-decided case stands. . . This command sensibly 'promotes consistency and reliability' in our law. . . by establishing a default rule when two lines of precedent cannot both be right—the eldest controls. But this practice does not limit a panel's constitutional and statutory authority to interpret prior case law in deciding a future case. . . After all, we interpret our precedents in every case we decide. If a panel could invoke the prior panel rule to avoid an earlier holding any time it believed a prior decision incorrectly interpreted a prior case, nothing would remain of horizontal stare decisis. That is likely why Congress implemented a mechanism for our Court to revisit purportedly incorrect panel interpretations of precedent in the form of en banc review. . . What is more, our case law on the prior panel rule explicitly accounts for a subsequent panel's ability to interpret precedent. . . Judged by these benchmarks, Trozzi's interpretation and clarification of Brawner presented no occasion for Helphenstine to deploy the prior panel rule.")

Hulon v. City of Lansing, Michigan, No. 23-1937, 2025 WL 554201, at *7-10 (6th Cir. Feb. 19, 2025) (not reported) (Stranch, J., dissenting) ("This is a straightforward interlocutory appeal that turns entirely on disputed facts. Our precedent provides a straightforward resolution—dismissal for lack of jurisdiction. But the majority, in a confusing deviation, resolves to hear the case while readily acknowledging that the appeal boils down to disputes of fact. Equally troubling is the majority's use of this case to cast doubt on our governing and settled caselaw by offering unwarranted commentary on an issue that neither party raised. The concurrence goes even further and explicitly seeks to relitigate that governing caselaw. I therefore respectfully dissent. . . .I also cannot sign on to the majority's (and concurrence's) commentary regarding our recent caselaw on deliberate indifference. . . Both proffer a discussion of our precedent that is, by their own admission, unnecessary to resolve this appeal. . . The graver concern, however, is that their commentary effectively invites the district court to adopt a legal test that our circuit has repeatedly rejected. All our writings in this case agree that this appeal turns on disputes of material fact, which is all that is needed to dispose of it. But the majority and concurrence go further, using this case as an opportunity to air grievances with Brawner v. Scott County, 14 F.4th 585 (6th Cir. 2021), and Helphenstine v. Lewis County, 60 F.4th 305 (6th Cir. 2023). . . The majority suggests, and the concurrence explicitly asserts, that Trozzi v. Lake County, 29 F.4th 745 (6th Cir. 2022), provides the correct test for evaluating a pretrial detainee's deliberate indifference claim pursuant to Brawner. . . This commentary is unsolicited—neither party argued on appeal that Trozzi, and not Helphenstine, should apply in assessing whether the defendants were deliberately indifferent. And even if they had, that issue would have been immaterial to the resolution of this appeal. The majority and concurrence essentially urge district courts to embrace a legal test that is not good law in this circuit. There is no dispute that, prior to Brawner, we required pretrial detainees to prove not only that the detainee had a sufficiently serious medical need, but also that the official subjectively 'kn[ew] of and disregard[ed] an excessive risk to [the detainee's] health or safety.'. . In 2021, Brawner 'modifi[ed] ... the subjective prong of the deliberate-indifference test for pretrial detainees' from actual knowledge to 'reckless disregard.'. . One year later, despite Brawner's modification of the subjective prong, the Trozzi panel held that courts were still required to consider 'an official's actual knowledge of the relevant circumstances.'. . Helphenstine subsequently rejected the deliberate indifference test articulated in Trozzi as 'irreconcilable with Brawner.'. . As Helphenstine recognized, Trozzi's attempt to reimpose an actual-knowledge requirement directly contradicted Brawner, which had framed the subjective inquiry as follows: What then is required to establish deliberate indifference in [the pretrial detainee] context? Mere negligence is insufficient. A defendant must have not only acted deliberately (not accidentally), but also recklessly 'in the face of an unjustifiably high risk of harm that is either known or so obvious that it should be known.'. . Instead of applying Brawner, Trozzi sought to substantively alter the controlling legal standard that Brawner set forth. Faced with a clear conflict between Brawner and Trozzi, the Helphenstine court hewed to the well-established principle that when two cases 'look in opposite directions,' we must 'look to the oldest decision on point.'. . Finding the matter settled, Helphenstine applied Brawner and assessed whether the defendants acted recklessly, without requiring a showing of actual knowledge. . .Since Helphenstine, our circuit's view of the matter has remained unchanged. We have repeatedly and consistently adhered to Helphenstine's rejection of Trozzi. Most recently, in Lawler v. Hardeman County, we reaffirmed that Helphenstine—not Trozzi—provides the correct legal framework for analyzing a pretrial detainee's deliberate indifference claim under Brawner. . . Lawler adhered to an ever-growing list of published cases in which our court agreed with Helphenstine and expressly rejected Trozzi's attempt to alter Brawner. . . Indeed, since Helphenstine, every published case to address the issue has followed Helphenstine's rejection of Trozzi. . . Given this overwhelming authority, I agree with Lawler that our law on this matter is 'settled.'. . Because I believe the proper disposition of this appeal was dismissal for lack of jurisdiction—without relitigating our now-settled caselaw—I respectfully dissent.")

Whyde v. Sigsworth, No. 22-3581, 2024 WL 4719649 (6th Cir. Nov. 8, 2024) (not reported) ("Whyde tries to overcome qualified immunity by relying on Brawner v. Scott County, which lowered the standard for deliberate-indifference claims by pretrial detainees like Whyde. . . Before Brawner, a detainee had to show that an official 'kn[ew] of and disregard[ed] an excessive risk to inmate health or safety.'. . But after Brawner, a detainee need only show that an official acted with 'something akin to reckless disregard'—a lower standard that doesn't require actual knowledge of a serious risk of harm. . . Whyde can't benefit from Brawner. Our court decided that case in September 2021—more than four years after Whyde's stay in the Erie County Jail. And to overcome qualified immunity, Whyde must show that officials violated law that was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct. Lawler, 93 F.4th at 926. Brawner didn't control in 2017; the Supreme Court's decision in Farmer did. . . And under the Farmer standard, the officials here aren't liable unless Whyde can show they 'kn[ew] of and disregard[ed]' an 'excessive risk' to his health. . . The officials (a) must have known facts from which they could infer that Whyde was at a substantial risk of serious harm, and (b) must have actually drawn that inference for themselves. . .The dissent suggests that we should conduct the qualified immunity analysis under the Brawner standard because that's how the parties briefed the case. . . But regardless of what the parties think the law is, 'courts have an independent obligation to get the law right.'. . That means we must apply the correct governing law, even if the parties urge otherwise. And the correct law is clear: the qualified immunity analysis turns on precedent that applied at the time of the alleged misconduct. . . Here, Whyde can't overcome the defendants' assertion of qualified immunity.")

Campbell v. Riahi, 109 F.4th 854, 860-62 (6th Cir. 2024) ("We skip to the question whether Riahi's action violated any clearly established right. . . The Fourteenth Amendment requires (among other things) that jail officials take reasonable measures 'to protect pretrial detainees from harm.'. . At the time of the alleged constitutional violation here, a plaintiff alleging a Fourteenth Amendment deliberate-indifference claim needed to prove two elements: first, that the detainee faced a 'substantial risk of serious of harm'; and second, that the defendant understood yet 'consciously disregarded' that risk—meaning the defendant knew of the risk and responded unreasonably to it. . . . Here, regardless of whether Riahi subjectively perceived the potential risk that Baker would commit suicide, Baker's mother has not cited—nor have we found—any case that would have put Riahi on notice that her decision to close Baker's cell door was 'so unreasonable as to violate the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . At that time, Riahi was responding to an ongoing altercation between two cellmates, which had escalated over the course of nearly thirty minutes. Twice Riahi tried to defuse the altercation; but when Baker and Herbert started 'going in and out' of their cells attempting 'to get' each other, Riahi closed each of their cell doors 'to avoid a physical altercation.' At that moment—as the sole corrections officer on duty—Riahi was forced to balance competing exigencies: the potential risk that Baker might harm herself, on the one hand, and the risk that Baker and Herbert might harm each other (or another inmate), on the other. No 'clearly established law' from our court or the Supreme Court 'prohibited' Riahi from balancing those considerations by closing Baker's cell door for ten minutes while seeking assistance from her supervising officer. . . .At the time of Baker's suicide, no case from the Supreme Court or this court established that Riahi's actions were unconstitutional at the time she took them. Riahi is therefore entitled to qualified immunity as to the federal claim against her.")

Heeter v. Bowers, 99 F.4th 900, 916-19 (6th Cir. 2024) ("We previously applied the same standard to medical-care claims by pretrial detainees alleging due process violations under the Fourteenth Amendment and to claims by inmates alleging unconstitutional punishment under the Eighth Amendment. . . That 'deliberate indifference' standard required the officer not only to know the facts giving rise to the medical risk, but also to subjectively know the risk of harm, and then respond unreasonably. . . Following Supreme Court precedent, we changed the mental state for the due process claims. For a Fourteenth Amendment claim, as the Heeters assert, we no longer require that the officer knew the risk of harm from failure to provide medical care; an officer is still liable for recklessly disregarding the risk. . . We clarified this new standard in Helphenstine v. Lewis

County just a month before the district court issued its decision. . . As neither party raised the case, the district court applied the prior standard. . . The change makes no difference in this case, however, because the Heeters meet the stricter, older standard. . . There is no dispute that Officer Bowers subjectively knew the risk of harm—death—to Mr. Heeter from shooting him five times in the center of his body. Neither is there a dispute that Officer Bowers knew Mr. Heeter was bleeding profusely and that without immediate medical attention he had a high risk of dying. The question we face, then, turns not on whether Officer Bowers knew or should have known the risk to Mr. Heeter, but instead on whether he 'responded reasonably' to the risk. . . He didn't. As Mr. Heeter lay face down, bleeding from multiple gunshot wounds, it was unreasonable for Officer Bowers to stand idle—even for a few minutes and even while paramedics were on their way—rather than administer the first aid he was trained to provide. Our court has repeatedly held that officers violate a pretrial detainee's right to adequate medical care when, despite knowing of an emergent risk of harm, they stand idle and fail to provide immediately necessary medical care that they have been trained to administer. . . . Despite his training and police department policy, Officer Bowers did not even try to provide Mr. Heeter first aid as he lay moaning and bleeding and as his breathing became increasingly labored. The district court was therefore correct in finding Officer Bowers violated the Constitution when he 'knowingly left a mortally wounded suspect lying face down on the ground while handcuffed without administering aid during the critical moments following injury.'. .In response, the defendants tell us there is a bright-line rule that after summoning the paramedics, officers have no further duty to provide medical care to pretrial detainees. Citing Stevens-Rucker v. City of Columbus, they contend that Officer Bowers responded reasonably because he knew the paramedics had been called, and the Constitution 'does not require [an] officer to intervene personally' or 'exhaust[ ] every medical option' so long as they call for care and do not delay it from reaching the suspect. . . To the extent we suggested in Stevens-Rucker and other cases that officers do not have to 'intervene personally' when they believe medical aid is en route, it was because there we accepted or presumed that the officers reasonably believed 'their individual intervention would not have helped.'. . That is not the case here. Given Mr. Heeter's moans and labored breathing, it was clear he was still alive, and a jury could conclude that a reasonable officer trained in basic first aid would have tried to use that training to help Mr. Heeter. Officer Bowers overreads our fact-bound cases. As a matter of common sense and precedent, there is no bright-line rule that officers never have to provide care after calling for help. We have never held that calling for a paramedic always terminates a police officer's constitutional obligations to a pretrial detainee—irrespective of the time it will take for help to arrive, how urgently help is needed, how the officer has been trained, or even how easy it would be for the officer to help. Under the defendants' view, a trained correctional officer has no obligation to administer the Heimlich maneuver to help a choking inmate, and a prison guard has no obligation to cut down a detainee who has attempted suicide by hanging. That's not just contrary to Heflin, but to myriad other precedents where we've held that calling the paramedics does not guarantee an officer qualified immunity from like Fourteenth Amendment claims. . . .To summarize, it is undisputed that Officer Bowers focused on ordering an officer to handcuff Mr. Heeter, then stood idle as Mr. Heeter bled out, moaned, and struggled to breathe. A reasonable jury could find that Mr. Heeter's critical injury called for immediate first aid before professional paramedics arrived, and that Officer Bowers—trained in first aid and unoccupied by police duties—could and should have rendered that care. Therefore, a reasonable jury could find Officer Bowers violated Mr. Heeter's Fourteenth Amendment right to adequate medical care.")

Little v. City of Morristown, Tennessee, No. 23-5302, 2024 WL 1530468, at *2–3 (6th Cir. Apr. 9, 2024) (not reported) ("[O]ur 2021 decision in Brawner v. Scott County, 14 F.4th 585, 596 (6th Cir. 2021), altered our approach for pretrial detainees. Brawner reduced the level of mental culpability with which a defendant must act from 'knowing' to 'reckless disregard.'. .When it comes to qualified immunity, the timing of this change matters. That is because the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified-immunity inquiry focuses on 'whether the officer had fair notice that her conduct was unlawful' based on 'the law at the time of the conduct.'. .In several qualified-immunity appeals following Brawner, we apparently assumed that the new standard applied, even when the conduct at issue pre-dated Brawner's publication. See, e.g., Greene v. Crawford Cnty., 22 F.4th 593, 603–04, 606–07, 614–15 (6th Cir. 2022) (applying Brawner standard in qualified-immunity context for conduct that occurred in 2017); Helphenstine v. Lewis Cnty., 60 F.4th 305, 311, 316–17, 326–27 (6th Cir. 2023) (same); Howell v. NaphCare, Inc., 67 F.4th 302, 308, 311–12, 317–18 (6th Cir. 2023) (applying Brawner in qualified-immunity context for conduct that occurred in 2018); Mercer v. Athens Cnty., 72 F.4th 152, 156–57, 160–61, 164 (6th Cir. 2023) (same). These opinions do not reflect consideration of—let alone a conscious conclusion about. . . one of the legal issues defendants raise here: whether a pretrial detainee's right to be free from reckless, rather than knowing, disregard of a risk to serious harm was clearly established before Brawner's publication. While this appeal was pending, another panel of this court resolved that question. In Lawler, we held that pretrial detainees' right to be free from reckless, rather than knowing, disregard to a serious risk of harm was not clearly established until, at the earliest, Brawner's publication in 2021. . . When the date of the conduct at issue predates Brawner, 'our older decisions applying Farmer to the claims of pretrial detainees provide the only clearly established law' as of that time. . .Without the benefit of Lawler's clarification, the district court applied Brawner's standard—not Farmer's—when analyzing whether defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. Because we are 'a court of review, not of first view,' we vacate the district court's denials of qualified immunity to Officers Gillett, McFarland, and Smith for the failure-to-provide-medical-care claim and remand for its consideration under Farmer in the first instance. . . In addition, the district court analyzed the clearly established prong of the defendants' immunity claims collectively. On remand, it should instead analyze that prong defendant by defendant.")

Batton, for the Estate of Witbeck v. Sandusky County, Ohio, No. 23-3168, 2024 WL 1480522, at *____ (6th Cir. Apr. 5, 2024) (not reported) ("In response to recent Supreme Court precedent, . . . this circuit has modified the subjective component of the deliberate indifference inquiry for pretrial detainees. See Helphenstine v. Lewis Cnty., 60 F.4th 305, 316–17 (6th Cir. 2023) (explaining the divergence in the Fourteenth and Eighth Amendment analysis articulated in Brawner v. Scott Cnty., 14 F.4th 585 (6th Cir. 2021) in response to Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015)). After Brawner, the subjective element has been modified to 'lower the subjective component from actual knowledge to recklessness.'. . So, a plaintiff making out a deliberate indifference claim under the Fourteenth Amendment must now show: (1) that the detainee possessed a sufficiently serious medical need; and (2) that the officer 'acted deliberately (not accidentally), [and] also recklessly "in the face of an unjustifiably high risk of harm that is either known or so obvious that it should be known."'. . . Here, the district court noted that neither party attempted to apply the new standard at the district court level. On appeal, the parties likewise cite to pre-Brawner cases assessing the obviousness of Witbeck's suicidal tendencies. Indeed, it does not appear that this circuit has addressed the risk of suicide necessary for a plaintiff to make out a deliberate indifference claim under the Fourteenth Amendment post-Brawner. Because the obviousness of a risk of suicide remains central to a finding of an officer's reckless disregard of that risk, these cases seem to remain relevant under the new standard. . . But the shift in analysis post-Brawner appears to make it easier for a plaintiff to make out this claim, as '[r]eckless inaction in the face of [an] obvious need is enough to proceed to a jury under Brawner.'. . Accordingly, we cite to pre-Brawner case law assessing whether a detainee's actions made obvious a strong likelihood that the detainee would attempt suicide but note that the shift to recklessness indicates a lessened showing that a detainee plaintiff must make in this context. But, while we note this change in legal landscape concerning the constitutional violation, we continue to apply the law as it existed in 2019—when the conduct occurred—to determine whether any constitutional violation was clearly established at the time. See Lawler ex rel. Lawler v. Hardeman Cnty., 93 F.4th 919, 927–28 (6th Cir. 2024).")

Lawler ex rel Lawler v. Hardeman County, Tennessee, 93 F.4th 919, 921-22, 925-28, 936 (6th Cir. 2024) ("In July 2018, Brian Lawler tragically committed suicide at a county jail. To hold officers liable for failing to prevent a pretrial detainee's death at that time, our caselaw required proof that the officers subjectively believed that there was a strong likelihood the inmate would commit suicide. . . Today, however, our court would hold officers liable if they recklessly overlooked a pretrial detainee's strong likelihood of suicide—even if they did not subjectively recognize it. See Helphenstine v. Lewis County, 60 F.4th 305, 316–17 (6th Cir. 2023). When denying qualified immunity to the officers sued in this case, the district court held that a reasonable jury could find that they 'recklessly disregarded' the strong risk that Lawler would commit suicide. But that standard governs today; it did not govern when Lawler committed suicide in 2018. And when we apply the correct test, the evidence shows that the officers did not subjectively believe that Lawler was likely to take his life. We thus reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the officers. . . . Here, given that the controlling legal rules have recently changed, we find it easiest to resolve the Officers' appeal by jumping immediately to the 'clearly established' requirement. We need not (and do not) decide whether the Officers violated today's legal rules because Lawler's father has not shown that they violated the rules in place when Lawler committed suicide. Qualified immunity thus insulates the Officers from this damages suit. . . Because the district court invoked the wrong set of legal rules (understandably so, given our evolving caselaw), we begin by clarifying the law that applies here. . . . [C]ourts evaluating a qualified-immunity defense may consider only the legal rules existing when 'the challenged conduct' occurred, not legal rules adopted by later caselaw. . . Under this framework, we must identify the rules that governed in July 2018 when Lawler took his life. This inquiry starts by identifying the constitutional right at issue. Lawler was a pretrial detainee at the time of his death, meaning that a court had yet to try or punish him. Lawler's father thus cannot invoke the Eighth Amendment right against 'cruel and unusual punishments' because that right kicks in only after a conviction. . . Still, pretrial detainees like Lawler do have a Fourteenth Amendment right not to be 'deprive[d]' of their 'life' 'without due process of law.'. . And the Supreme Court has long held that the Due Process Clause offers protections to pretrial detainees that at least match those afforded convicted prisoners under the Eighth Amendment. . . Having identified the right, we next must identify the claim at issue. This case implicates the legal rules that apply to claims that jail staff violated the Due Process Clause by failing to protect pretrial detainees from harm. These types of claims can arise in a variety of circumstances. Sometimes, a correctional officer might fail to protect the detainee from violence by other inmates. . . Other times, a prison doctor might fail to treat the detainee for a harmful medical condition. . . At still other times, jail staff might fail to thwart a detainee's suicide. . . In the Eighth Amendment context, the Supreme Court has held that the failure to protect prisoners from harm violates the ban on cruel and unusual punishment only if the prisoners prove both objective and subjective elements. . . Objectively, prisoners must have faced a 'substantial risk of serious harm.'. . Subjectively, officers must have acted with 'deliberate indifference' to this risk. . . Under this test, an inmate must prove both that an officer subjectively knew of facts that created a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate and that the officer subjectively concluded that this risk existed. . . Because officers must consciously know of the risk, then, they do not violate the Eighth Amendment merely by negligently or recklessly overlooking it. . . Should these Eighth Amendment rules for failure-to-protect claims by prisoners extend to similar claims by pretrial detainees under the Due Process Clause? For years, we answered "yes" to this question. . . But the ground underlying our traditional approach began to shift in 2015 when the Supreme Court decided Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015). That case concerned an excessive-force claim (not a failure-to-protect claim). . . . In the ensuing years, circuit courts disagreed over whether Kingsley's decision to jettison the Eighth Amendment's subjective element for a pretrial detainee's excessive-force claim also modified the subjective element for a pretrial detainee's failure-to-protect claim. . . In 2021, we sided with the courts that extended Kingsley to this failure-to-protect context. . . After initial disagreement over what Brawner required, we settled on a test that reduced Farmer's subjective element from 'actual knowledge to recklessness.'. . Today, officers can face liability even if they did not actually know of a risk of harm to a pretrial detainee. Pretrial detainees need only prove that the officers recklessly disregarded a risk so obvious that they either knew or should have known of it. . . What do these recent legal changes mean for the claims here? The changes do not affect our resolution because Lawler's father must overcome qualified immunity's 'clearly established' prong. Our recent cases that depart from Farmer in this pretrial-detainee context came out between 2021 and 2023. Because they postdate Lawler's suicide, they do not clearly establish anything 'at the time' the Officers acted. . . Admittedly, the Supreme Court decided Kingsley before Lawler took his life. But Kingsley, a decision about excessive force, did not clearly apply to this failure-to-protect context. The circuit split about Kingsley's scope confirms this point. . . In short, our older decisions applying Farmer to the claims of pretrial detainees provide the only clearly established law in 2018. This difference matters. To be sure, the district court suggested that it need not decide whether Brawner modified Farmer because Lawler's father had created a genuine dispute of fact even under Farmer's more demanding test. . . But the court actually invoked Brawner's more lenient test in all but name when applying the law to the facts. It reasoned that a jury could find that the Officers had 'recklessly disregarded' a significant risk that Lawler would take his life. . . Farmer, however, requires the Officers to have 'consciously' (not recklessly) disregarded that risk. . . That is, they must have 'draw[n] the inference' that the risk existed. . . The district court thus applied the wrong law to deny the Officers qualified immunity. . . Given the date of the conduct at issue, we instead must apply Farmer's standards. . . . Our conclusion that Lawler's father cannot hold the Officers liable under § 1983's qualified-immunity test says nothing about whether he could have held them liable under today's standards. It also 'says nothing about whether [the Officers'] conduct was proper as a matter of good policy.'. . And nothing we say here bars Tennessee or its jail administrators from holding correctional officers to more demanding standards of conduct as a matter of state law. . . But Lawler's father lacks the type of evidence that we have traditionally required to meet the stringent constitutional test that applied when Lawler tragically committed suicide. We thus reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the Officers and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Grote v. Kenton County, Kentucky, 85 F.4th 397, 405-06 (6th Cir. 2023) ("The standard in this circuit to prove a deliberate-indifference claim brought under the Fourteenth Amendment by a pretrial detainee is clear. To make out such a claim, a plaintiff must demonstrate (1) an objectively serious medical need; and (2) that the defendants, analyzed individually, acted (or failed to act) intentionally and either ignored the serious medical need or 'recklessly failed to act reasonably to mitigate the risk the serious medical need posed.'. . Stated differently, a pretrial detainee must have a serious medical need, and the defendant must act, whether through intentional action or omission, recklessly in response to the need and the risk it presented to the detainee. . .This has been the law of the circuit since at least 2021, when we explained that the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson . . . necessarily alters our approach to deliberate-indifference claims for pretrial detainees. See Brawner, 14 F.4th at 596. Specifically and in line with Kingsley, we held in Brawner that the level of culpability with which a defendant must act to establish deliberate indifference to pretrial detainees is lower than that necessary for convicted incarcerated individuals. . .This is so because a pretrial detainee's claims derive not from the Eighth Amendment, with its focus on punishment, but instead from the Fourteenth Amendment, which can be violated without respect to an official's state of mind. . . Contrary to deliberate-indifference claims brought under the Eighth Amendment, which requires both an official's awareness of facts suggesting a likelihood of substantial harm to an incarcerated person and an official actually connecting such facts to an inference of harm, . . . a pretrial detainee need only prove 'something akin to reckless disregard' to satisfy the second element of a deliberate-indifference claim[.] . .Through no fault of its own, the district court applied the discussion from Trozzi v. Lake County, 29 F.4th 745 (6th Cir. 2022), in analyzing Grote's deliberate-indifference claims. . . . But Trozzi is at odds with the precedent that precedes it, and thus does not control. . . Contrary to Brawner, Trozzi, with its focus on what an official actually knew and whether the official ignored known risks, attempted to resurrect the pre-Brawner (and pre-Kingsley) treatment of pretrial detainees' deliberate-indifference claims. . .

Trozzi stands alone in this regard, and we have rightfully rejected it. . . In line with Brawner, Helphenstine, and Howell, we analyze the claims on appeal under the proper Fourteenth Amendment test.")

Mercer v. Athens County, Ohio, 72 F.4th 152, 160-61 (6th Cir. 2023) ("'After Brawner, to survive summary judgment on a deliberate indifference claim, a pretrial detainee must 'present evidence from which a reasonable jury could find (1) that she had an objectively serious medical need; and (2) that [the defendant's] action (or lack of action) was intentional (not accidental) and [the defendant] either (a) acted intentionally to ignore [the detainee's] serious medical need, or (b) recklessly failed to act reasonably to mitigate the risk the serious medical need posed to [the detainee.]'. .Months later, a panel of this court purported to modify the second element of the Brawner test and added a third element: that 'the prison official knew that his failure to respond would pose a serious risk to the pretrial detainee and ignored that risk.' Trozzi v. Lake Cnty., 29 F.4th 745, 757–58 (6th Cir. 2022). A subsequent panel held that '[Trozzi's] framing of the elements is irreconcilable with Brawner.' Helphenstine v. Lewis Cnty., 60 F.4th 305, 316 (6th Cir. 2023). The Howell court agreed with Helphenstine. 67 F.4th at 311 n.3 ('[Trozzi's] language is nearly identical in substance to Farmer's subjective requirement ... [and] Brawner expressly departed from that standard.'). And now, so do we. The district court relied on Trozzi to analyze Mercer's deliberate indifference claim. So we repeat: '[b]ecause Brawner was decided before Trozzi, Brawner controls.' Helphenstine, 60 F.4th at 317. And we apply Brawner in analyzing Mercer's deliberate indifference claim.")

Howell v. NaphCare, Inc., 67 F.4th 302, 310 & n.3, 313-14 (6th Cir. 2023) ("Applying Kingsley's reasoning, Brawner held that a pretrial detainee must make a showing (1) that he had an objectively serious medical need and (2) that each defendant 'acted deliberately [and] also recklessly "in the face of an unjustifiably high risk of harm that is either known or so obvious that it should be known."'[3] [fn. 3: After Brawner, a panel of this court held that a pretrial detainee must satisfy a third element: that 'the prison official knew that his failure to respond [to an excessive risk of harm] would pose a serious risk to the pretrial detainee and ignored that risk.' Trozzi v. Lake County, 29 F.4th 745, 757-58 (6th Cir. 2022). But that language is nearly identical in substance to Farmer's subjective requirement for convicted prisoners: that an 'official kn[ew] of and disregard[ed] an excessive risk to inmate health or safety; the official must both [have been] aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of harm exist[ed], and he must also [have] draw[n] the inference.' 511 U.S. at 837, 114 S.Ct. 1970. Brawner expressly departed from that standard. We agree with the panel in Helphenstine v. Lewis County that Trozzi's 'framing of the elements is irreconcilable with Brawner,' and '[b]ecause Brawner was decided before Trozzi, Brawner controls.'"] . . . .There is no dispute that Jordan subjectively believed Howell was experiencing a psychiatric episode. But after Brawner, subjective belief is not the end of the analysis. Brawner is satisfied if a jury could find that Jordan acted recklessly by failing to treat Howell's sickle cell disease when it was obvious that he faced an unjustifiably high risk of harm. A jury could make that finding here based on the following facts: (1) Jordan knew Howell had sickle cell; (2) she knew he had previously been transported to a local hospital for sickle cell complications while incarcerated; (3) she observed his inability to stand and saw him fall out of a wheelchair; (4) she heard his complaints about pain in his legs and back and numbness in his legs—common sickle-cell symptoms; (5) she read Howell's irregular vitals; and (6) as expert testimony established, a sickle cell patient complaining of severe pain represents a medical emergency that would have made it apparent to a layperson that Howell needed to go to the emergency department. Yet Jordan never took further action to rule out a sickle cell crisis. Accordingly, the district court erred in granting summary judgment to Nurse Jordan. . . . In the light most favorable to the Estate, a jury could find that Jordan was reckless by failing to act in the face of an obvious, unjustifiably high risk of harm, amounting to deliberate indifference to Howell's serious medical need.")

Helphenstine v. Lewis Count., Kentucky, 66 F.4th 794, 795-802 (6th Cir. 2023) (Readler, J., statement respecting denial of rehearing en banc) ("As an inferior court, see U.S. Const. art. III, § 1, we must be attentive to the pronouncements of the Supreme Court. Sometimes, a fresh decision requires us to grapple with how broadly the opinion sweeps. But that was not the case for Kingsley v. Hendrickson[.]. . In Kingsley, the Supreme Court told us it was deciding a narrow issue: whether federal courts should consider a defendant's subjective intent in 'the context of excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees.'. .Yet rather than ending the legal debate, Kingsley marked just the beginning. In a classic example of mission creep, at least four circuit courts (arguably five, depending on who you ask) read Kingsley as requiring a change to the circuit's law for Fourteenth Amendment pre-trial conditions of confinement claims, otherwise known as deliberate indifference claims. Compare Kemp v. Fulton County, 27 F.4th 491, 495 (7th Cir. 2022) (counting five), with Helphenstine v. Lewis County, 60 F.4th 305, 316 (6th Cir. 2023) (counting four). An odd conclusion, one has to say, when excessive force by definition involves active misconduct while deliberate indifference concerns inaction. . . That is likely why the Supreme Court tailored Kingsley as it did. . . This frolic led to even other detours. In the circuits that upended the law for deliberate indifference post-Kingsley, those courts have split internally across the board over how to apply these new standards. [collecting cases] Still other circuits have rejected the idea that Kingsley's resolution of excessive force claims has anything to say about deliberate indifference claims, given the obvious difference between the conduct underlying the two. [collecting cases] Our Court was one that took Kingsley as a veiled call to action to rewrite our deliberate indifference standard. . . How to do so, however, has divided us once again. All agree that a deliberate indifference plaintiff must prove an objectively serious harm. But what about the claim's state of mind component? The Brawner majority opinion concluded that Kingsley 'modifi[ed]' our former subjective standard so that the defendant's inaction had to be 'deliberate[ ] (not accidental[ ])' and 'reckless[ ] in the face of an unjustifiably high risk of harm that is either known or so obvious that it should be known.' . . At least three of us understood that standard to require a plaintiff to prove an objectively serious harm and two states of mind—one with respect to the harm suffered by the plaintiff and one with respect to the defendant's response to that harm. Trozzi v. Lake County, 29 F.4th 745, 757–58 (6th Cir. 2022). Now, a separate panel of our Court reads Trozzi as in tension with Brawner, meaning Brawner controls. . . And still other members of our Court have confessed understandable confusion over the issue. . . Simply put, that so many have said so much in so little time is both an acknowledgement that Brawner has left ample room for debate over its holding as well as a recognition of the frequency with which these cases appear on our docket. . . In an area of law that deserves precision, our approach reflects more of a shotgun blast. The original sin in this legal drama, it bears noting, was not ours. It was the Supreme Court's decision to divine constitutional rights for inmates who have been harmed in prison. [citing Estelle v. Gamble] . . . . No one condones mistreating prisoners, no matter their underlying offense. But state law can easily account for that mistreatment, with both causes of action and remedies. . . Yet for many years now, these garden variety tort claims have also been deemed matters of constitutional significance. The Supreme Court could return all of these actions to state court. . . And there are grounds to do so. . . . With precedents pointing in all directions, the disharmony in the case law in this setting is as extreme as any. Especially when the standard is more or less reduced to 'reasonableness,' this legal regime lacks any manner of predictability for officers and detainees alike. Given this state of affairs, and with state law as an adequate backdrop against which to litigate deliberate indifference claims, reliance interests are minimal at best. . . . Following a thorough discussion, Trozzi adopted a confined understanding of Brawner. And for good reason. Reading Brawner as eliminating any state-of-mind inquiry would ignore language in Brawner itself requiring that the actor's 'lack of action' be 'intentional (not accidental).'. . A nebulous 'reasonableness' approach would likewise turn a blind eye to Brawner's repeated assertions that it was not imposing a negligence standard, but merely 'modif[ying]' Farmer's subjective prong. . . Above all, Brawner's raison d'être, Kingsley, itself maintained the foundational rule that a constitutional tort must take into consideration the subjective state of mind at play. . . Accepting Brawner's conclusion that Kingsley governs, Trozzi attempted to translate the 'two separate state-of-mind questions' in the excessive force context to this new frontier. . . It did so by explaining that civil recklessness governs the external question of the degree of harm facing the detainee, while criminal recklessness, at the very least, governs the behavior of the government official. . .Any other understanding of Brawner would simply adopt the plaintiff-friendly part of Kingsley and omit the rest, contrary to longstanding precedent restraining our substantive due process jurisprudence. . . That takes us to today's case. The panel opinion read the three-part test from Trozzi as 'irreconcilable with Brawner.'. . I, of course, disagree. Either way, Helphenstine's main point of emphasis was to recite the various disagreements among the circuits on the Kingsley question. . . After having done so, the panel concluded that Brawner settled all of these disagreements by 'requir[ing] us to lower the subjective component from actual knowledge to recklessness.'. . In many respects, this feels like two ships passing in the night. Trozzi did not hold that Brawner refrained from lowering the subjective component. Instead, Trozzi's second prong expressly incorporated the civil recklessness standard from Brawner's modified subjective approach with a caveat about its appropriate focus. . . What Brawner (and, more to the point, Kingsley) did not do was say that the only state of mind at issue was with respect to the risks to the detainee. There still needed to be an examination of whether the defendant's inaction was accidental, . . . which Trozzi held cannot be supported tautologically by simply pointing to the inaction itself[.] . . That approach also bears out in the analogous failure-to-protect claim, where we require an intentional state of mind concerning the officer's 'decision,' separate and apart from the Brawner inquiry. . . . Three judges in Trozzi thought a narrow interpretation of Brawner was not only possible but indeed necessary. Prior opinions had largely said the same. . . Then, in response to an en banc petition asserting that Trozzi was irreconcilable with Brawner, '[l]ess than a majority of the judges' ultimately voted in favor of rehearing. . . And now a different panel reads Trozzi as irreconcilable with Brawner, yet laments the deep confusion these issues have caused 'all over the map.'. . Meanwhile, all sides to the en banc briefing in this case—including the detainee's estate—agree that Brawner was wrongly decided and confusing. . . With signs pointing in all directions, even the most careful reader would likely find herself at a crossroads. For judges and academics, these are theoretical concepts to debate. But for prison officials, these decisions—as incongruent as they are—govern their everyday conduct. . . And as we continue to lower the bar for liability, we increasingly put these officials in impossible situations, ones the Constitution surely was never contemplated to resolve. . . For all involved, we must do better. . . A year and a half into the experience, Brawner's promise that '[m]ere negligence is insufficient' appears to be an empty one. . . I can understand our en banc court's reluctance to take up the issue here, given the many competing views on the underlying legal standard in our circuit and others along with the high bar for convening en banc proceedings. But at some point, intervention is needed. With confusion rampant coast-to-coast, the Supreme Court would appear to be the proper forum. For the sake of litigants and courts alike, the Supreme Court should soon grant certiorari in a case involving allegedly unconstitutional deliberate indifference toward a pretrial detainee. It may be too much to ask for the Supreme Court to revisit the application of substantive due process principles in this context, but reconsidering Estelle would not be a bad place to start. At the very least, the Supreme Court can resolve whether Kingsley's excessive force analysis should be grafted on to deliberate indifference claims. And, if Kingsley sweeps so broadly, what test are the inferior courts to use in resolving those cases? As both Trozzi and this panel decision recognize, the Kingsley circuit split is more than mature—it is having offspring. . . Disagreements abound, from whether to apply Kingsley to deliberate indifference claims, to the test to apply if so, to whether the same test applies in various settings for conditions of confinement claims. This is no small matter. As court records reflect, these cases populate every docket across the federal courts. See IDB Appeals 2008–Present, Fed. Jud. Ctr., https://www.fjc.gov/research/idb/interactive/21/IDB-appeals-since-2008 (last visited Apr. 18, 2023) (listing more than 76,000 "prisoner civil rights" and "prison condition" claims in the federal appellate courts since 2008, approximately 16.8% of all civil appeals); see also Zhen Zeng, Bureau of Justice Statistics, NCJ 251774, Jail Inmates in 2017, at 1 (2019) (reporting that almost two-thirds of jail inmates were "unconvicted"). But until Supreme Court intervention comes to pass, we are left to muddle on, following paths leading in any and all directions.")

Helphenstine v. Lewis County, Kentucky, 60 F.4th 305, 315-17 (6th Cir. 2023), reh'g en banc denied, 65 F.4th 794 (6th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 692 (2024) ("Brawner answered the question left open by Kingsley, holding that Kingsley required modification of the subjective component of a pretrial detainee's deliberate indifference claim: 'Given Kingsley's clear delineation between claims brought by convicted prisoners under the Eighth Amendment and claims brought by pretrial detainees under the Fourteenth Amendment, applying the same analysis to these constitutionally distinct groups is no longer tenable.'. . We modified the subjective prong

as follows: 'A pretrial detainee must prove more than negligence but less than subjective intent—something akin to reckless disregard.'. . In other words, a plaintiff must prove that a defendant 'acted deliberately (not accidentally), [and] also recklessly "in the face of an unjustifiably high risk of harm that is either known or so obvious that it should be known."'. . Recently, however, a panel of this court called this reading of Brawner into question. See Trozzi v. Lake Cnty., 29 F.4th 745 (6th Cir. 2022). In Trozzi, the panel agreed that Brawner modified the subjective element. . . But based on the Brawner opinion itself, 'post-Brawner decisions, and background principles,'. . . it concluded that the subjective inquiry 'still requires consideration of an official's actual knowledge of the relevant circumstances.'. . It then framed the test this way: 'Reading Farmer, Kingsley, Brawner, and Greene [v. Crawford Cnty., 22 F.4th 593 (6th Cir. 2022)] together, a plaintiff must satisfy three elements for an inadequate-medical-care claim under the Fourteenth Amendment: (1) the plaintiff had an objectively serious medical need; (2) a reasonable officer at the scene (knowing what the particular jail official knew at the time of the incident) would have understood that the detainee's medical needs subjected the detainee to an excessive risk of harm; and (3) the prison official knew that his failure to respond would pose a serious risk to the pretrial detainee and ignored that risk.'. . We hold that this framing of the elements is irreconcilable with Brawner. We appreciate that our sister circuits are all over the map on this issue. As an initial matter, four circuits have rejected the extension of Kingsley to deliberate indifference claims. See Cope v. Cogdill, 3 F.4th 198, 207 n.7 (5th Cir. 2021); Whitney v. City of St. Louis, 887 F.3d 857, 860 n.4 (8th Cir. 2018); Strain v. Regalado, 977 F.3d 984, 989–93 (10th Cir. 2020); Dang by & through Dang v. Sheriff, Seminole Cnty., 871 F.3d 1272, 1279 n.2 (11th Cir. 2017). Three more circuits continue applying the pre-Kingsley framework, though without ruling out a future switch. See Miranda-Rivera v. Toledo-Davila, 813 F.3d 64, 74 (1st Cir. 2016); Moore v. Luffey, 767 F. App'x 335, 340 n.2 (3d Cir. 2019); Mays v. Sprinkle, 992 F.3d 295, 300–01 (4th Cir. 2021). As to the circuits that extend Kingsley's objective inquiry to deliberate indifference, they disagree on the question to ask. One circuit asks what 'a reasonable official in the [defendant's] circumstances would have appreciated' about the risks facing a detainee. Gordon v. Cnty. of Orange, 888 F.3d 1118, 1125 (9th Cir. 2018). One circuit asks what the defendant himself knew or should have known about the risks. Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 34–35 (2d Cir. 2017). And a third circuit asks if the defendant displayed 'purposeful, knowing, or reckless disregard of the consequences.' Miranda v. Cnty. of Lake, 900 F.3d 335, 354 (7th Cir. 2018); Pittman by & through Hamilton v. Cnty. of Madison, 970 F.3d 823, 827 (7th Cir. 2020) (same). Whatever the merits of these approaches to Kingsley, we do not think that Brawner leaves the question open. Simply put, Brawner held that Kingsley required us to lower the subjective component from actual knowledge to recklessness. Indeed, several panels of our court have interpreted Brawner in this way. [citing cases] Because Brawner was decided before Trozzi, Brawner controls. . . Accordingly, plaintiff must show (1) that Helphenstine had a sufficiently serious medical need and (2) that each defendant 'acted deliberately (not accidentally), [and] also recklessly "in the face of an unjustifiably high risk of harm that is either known or so obvious that it should be known."'")

Schoonover v. Rogers, No. 21-3970, 2022 WL 12258998, at *___ n.1 (6th Cir. Oct. 21, 2022) (not reported) ("The Fourteenth Amendment protects pretrial detainees under a framework that is similar to that of the Eighth Amendment. . . After the Supreme Court held in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015), that an officer violates a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment rights if the officer uses force in an objectively unreasonable manner, some panels of this court have modified the subjective component of the standard for deliberate-indifference claims. Compare Brawner v. Scott County, 14 F.4th 585, 596–97 (6th Cir. 2021), with Trozzi v. Lake County, 29 F.4th 745, 753 (6th Cir. 2022). We need not wade into this issue, however, because Schoonover was not a pretrial detainee, and his claims fall squarely within the ambit of the Eighth Amendment.")

Stein v. Gunkel, 43 F.4th 633, 638 -41 (6th Cir. 2022) ("The district court analyzed the failure-to-protect claim under Brawner and concluded that Stein had failed to establish a violation. . . It also determined that the law was not clearly established, as Brawner constituted a sufficient change in the law such that pre-Brawner caselaw could not clearly establish a deliberate indifference claim analyzed under the new test. . . Thus, summary judgment was also supported on the alternate ground that Sterling and Gunkel were owed qualified immunity. . . This timely appeal followed. . . . During the pendency of this litigation, the standard that this circuit applies to a pretrial detainee's claim of deliberate indifference changed. We previously analyzed pretrial detainees' deliberate indifference claims under the standard applied in Farmer v. Brennan . . . to Eighth Amendment claims brought by convicted prisoners. Farmer requires that a prisoner prove both that there was an objective risk of serious harm and that a defendant official subjectively knew of and disregarded that risk. . . . After Kingsley, this court altered the test for a pretrial detainee alleging that jail officials were deliberately indifferent to medical needs. . . Recognizing that Brawner changed the applicable test for a deliberate-indifference claim brought by a pretrial detainee, the district court analyzed Stein's failure-to-protect claim under the Brawner test . . . Since the district court's decision, we have applied Brawner to a deliberate-indifference claim for failure to protect. . . Under Westmoreland, to establish deliberate indifference for failure to protect, 'a defendant officer must [1] act intentionally in a manner that [2] puts the plaintiff at a substantial risk of harm, [3] without taking reasonable steps to abate that risk, [4] and by failing to do so actually cause the plaintiff's injuries.'. .Even assuming Stein can satisfy the first two elements, his case falters at the third Westmoreland element. The third element requires more than negligence because 'liability for negligently inflicted harm is categorically beneath the threshold of constitutional due process.'. . Thus, to establish the third element, Stein must prove that each officer 'was more than merely negligent; the officer must have acted with "reckless disregard" in the face of "an unjustifiably high risk of harm."'. . Stein fails to do so. . . .Because Stein does not establish that either Sterling or Gunkel violated his constitutional rights, we AFFIRM.")

Westmoreland v. Butler County, Kentucky, 35 F.4th 1051, 1051-53 (6th Cir. 2022) (Bush, J., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) ("For many years, our circuit has applied the deliberate-indifference standard as set forth in Farmer v. Brennan . . . to evaluate pretrial detainees' claims under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Last year, however, a split panel in Brawner v. Scott County, 14 F.4th 585 (6th Cir. 2021), determined that the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson . . . permitted deviation from our circuit precedent and thus an abandonment of the Farmer deliberate-indifference standard in the medical-needs context. . . Since then, our circuit has struggled with how to apply the Brawner test in medical-needs cases. See, e.g., Hyman v. Lewis, 27 F.4th 1233, 1237 (6th Cir. 2022); Smith v. Boyd Cnty. Fiscal Ct., No. CV 20-14-HRW, 2022 WL 992768, at *7 (E.D. Ky. Mar. 31, 2022). Did Brawner obviate an inquiry into defendants' mental states? See Britt v. Hamilton County, No. 21-3424, 2022 WL 405847, at *6–7 (6th Cir. Feb. 10, 2022) (Clay, J., dissenting). Did it merely modify that inquiry? See Greene v. Crawford County, 22 F.4th 593, 606 (6th Cir. 2022). And in so doing, did Brawner leave a subjective inquiry in place? See Trozzi v. Lake County, 29 F.4th 745, 754–55 (6th Cir. 2022). The panel majority's decision in this case represents only the latest example of the post-Brawner confusion. See generally Westmoreland v. Butler County, 29 F.4th 721 (6th Cir. 2022). Much as Brawner itself abrogated circuit precedent to reject the deliberate-indifference standard in the medical-needs context, so too the panel majority here abrogated circuit precedent to reject the standard in the failure-to-protect context. . . And it did so with a novel and ambiguous test that may substantially expand officials' liability and render the law more difficult for them to discern. The jail administration problem is exacerbated because many pretrial detainees and post-conviction prisoners are housed in the same facilities. . . I query the workability of a standard that changes an official's liability for the same action for two individuals with differing trial statuses housed in the same facility. And I fear that our current trajectory will soon undermine the Eighth Amendment. Moreover, the panel majority never defined its vague requirement of an 'intentional' (but not deliberately indifferent) decision by the defendant regarding the 'conditions' under which a plaintiff was confined, . . . whether liability may flow from merely but-for causation or, if proximate causation is required, whether the liability extends to multiple officials, . . . or how this new test differs from a de facto (and impermissible) negligence standard under the color of 'civil recklessness[.]' . . . The panel majority compounded this confusion by 'holding' that a plaintiff must show that 'a defendant officer [ ] act[ed] intentionally in a manner that puts the plaintiff at substantial risk of harm, without taking reasonable steps to abate that risk, and by failing to do so actually cause[d] the plaintiff's injuries.'. . Because the panel majority declined to clarify these ambiguous elements and statements, I fear that the Westmoreland test will add to the muddle that is our current Fourteenth Amendment deliberate-indifference jurisprudence. The Supreme Court has not addressed the deliberate-indifference issue since its 2015 Kingsley decision, and it has declined petitions to do so. See, e.g., Strain v. Regalado, 977 F.3d 984 (10th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 142 S. Ct. 312, 211 L.Ed.2d 147 (2021); Castro v. County of L.A., 833 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 137 S. Ct. 831, 197 L.Ed.2d 69 (2017). This appears to be despite the development of a sizable circuit split on the question whether Kingsley abrogated the deliberate-indifference standard for pretrial detainees' claims. [collecting cases] I thus share the hope of Judge Readler, see Brawner v. Scott County, 18 F.4th at 557 (Readler, J., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc), that the Court will soon step in to clarify the proper standard under the Fourteenth Amendment. And it indeed may be soon, as there are currently petitions for writs of certiorari pending before the Court in Brawner and Cope. Brawner v. Scott County, petition for cert. pending, No. 21-1210 (filed Mar.

4, 2022); Cope v. Cogdill, petition for cert. pending, No. 21-783 (filed Nov. 24, 2021). [My note: cert. was denied in Cope] Our circuit's decision to deny rehearing en banc in this case, like the similar decision made in Brawner, highlights the need for the Supreme Court to provide guidance. I respectfully dissent.")

Morgan by next friend Morgan v. Wayne County, Michigan, 33 F.4th 320, 326-28 (6th Cir. 2022) ("An inmate's right to be free from prison violence under the Eighth Amendment was clearly established at the time of defendants' alleged misconduct. . . To show that Clark and Davis violated this constitutional right, Morgan must show that '(1) the alleged mistreatment was objectively serious; and (2) [one or both] defendant[s] subjectively ignored the risk to [her] safety.'. . In this regard, we recently held that a pretrial detainee's right to be free from deliberate indifference arises from the Fourteenth Amendment, rather than the Eighth Amendment, which modifies or eliminates the showing a plaintiff must make on the subjective component. Brawner v. Scott Cnty., 14 F.4th 585, 596 (6th Cir. 2021); see Trozzi v. Lake Cnty., 29 F.4th 745, 753 (6th Cir. 2022) (discussing Brawner's "modified subjective standard"). But see Westmoreland v. Butler Cnty., 29 F.4th 721, 728 (6th Cir. 2022) (noting that after Brawner, "our Circuit has explicitly taken the position that a failure-to-protect claim by a pretrial detainee requires only an objective showing that an individual defendant acted (or failed to act) deliberately or recklessly" (emphasis added)). At the time of the alleged assault, Morgan was both a pretrial detainee (on the assault of a prison officer charge) and a convicted prisoner (on the unrelated charge). However, she has pleaded and argued this case solely under the Eighth Amendment standard. We agree with Morgan that under these circumstances, the more demanding Eighth Amendment standard is applicable. . . The district court concluded that even if Morgan had met her burden on the objective component, she had not met it on the subjective component, so she had not demonstrated that her constitutional rights were violated. We agree. Like the district court, we assume for the purpose of this analysis that Morgan has met her burden on the objective component and begin with the subjective component. To establish a constitutional violation based on failure to protect, Morgan must show that defendants acted with 'deliberate indifference' to her safety. . . An official is deliberately indifferent if he 'knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate health or safety; the official must both be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and he must also draw the inference.'. . . We must evaluate the liability of each deputy individually. Id. And it is Morgan's burden to demonstrate that defendants possessed a sufficiently culpable state of mind. . . .Because Morgan has not met her burden on the subjective component of her claim, we need not evaluate the objective component. The district court properly granted summary judgment in favor of Deputies Clark and Davis.")

Trozzi v. Lake County, Ohio, 29 F.4th 745, 752-58 (6th Cir. 2022) ("For many years, Farmer's two-prong test governed claims of inadequate medical care brought by pretrial detainees as well as convicted prisoners in this Circuit. . . But we recently shifted course in Brawner v. Scott County, 14 F.4th 585 (6th Cir. 2021). . . . On page 597, Brawner addresses the plaintiff's specific claims. And in so doing, the opinion articulates the modified subjective standard in a sentence only a lawyer could love: the jail official must either act intentionally or 'recklessly fail[ ] to act reasonably to mitigate the risk the serious medical need posed ... even though a reasonable official ... would have known that the serious medical need posed an excessive risk ....'. . . In the absence of any further explanation on how Brawner modified the Farmer test, our focus, it seems, should be on this sentence. At the risk of 'treat[ing] a judicial opinion as if it were a statute,'. . . we start with what is obvious about the sentence at hand: the legally requisite state of mind is recklessness. There is no instruction as to whether civil or criminal recklessness is at play, but the opinion does state that the recklessness must concern a failure to act with respect to mitigating certain medical risks. The standard also introduces an objective inquiry through the rubric of a 'reasonable official.'. . The 'reasonable official' standard, however, does not directly modify the conduct of failing to act; instead, it is separately introduced as a measure of the nature of the underlying medical need. . . All said, Brawner's modification could fairly be read to suggest one of two things: either (1) subjective considerations should be entirely ignored; or (2) the jail official's actual knowledge remains relevant, both as to his mindset with respect to his decision making and as to whether a reasonable official, armed with that knowledge, would have known of a risk to the detainee. Which is it? In this setting, we ordinarily might turn to sister circuits whom we joined in holding that Kingsley altered the Farmer test for pretrial detainees. But they are all over the map on this front. Some are even split within their own circuits on the relevance of the jail official's subjective mindset post-Kingsley. [collecting and comparing cases] That leaves us to rely on any hints we can gather from Brawner, our post-Brawner decisions, and background principles. Doing so leads to an approach that takes account of a jail official's actual knowledge. Ignoring as much cannot be reconciled with Brawner's assertion that it was merely modifying Farmer's subjective prong for pretrial detainee claims. 14 F.4th at 593, 596. After all, if Brawner had adopted an unvarnished, objective-only inquiry, it would not have listed a two-part test, where part one is whether the detainee had an 'objectively serious medical need' requiring medical attention. . . Understandably then, our post-Brawner precedent continues to consider the jail official's personal knowledge when applying the deliberate indifference prong. . . . Perhaps most importantly, a stand-alone reasonable-prison-official standard that wholly ignored the defendant's specific knowledge would be 'tantamount to determining whether that official was negligent.' . . Yet both Brawner and Kingsley squarely rejected such a standard. . . In fact, Kingsley recognized that the defendant's state of mind remains relevant with regard to the defendant's conduct, in contrast to the results of his conduct, which are judged under an objective-reasonableness test. . . . For these reasons, the post-Brawner deliberate indifference inquiry still requires consideration of an official's actual knowledge of the relevant circumstances. . . . Closing one door, however, opens another: when evaluating deliberate indifference, when and how should we consider what the jail official knew? Brawner partially answers that question; it disavowed our prior focus on whether the jail official actually knew that the pretrial detainee faced a risk of harm from a serious medical need. . . Modifying the standard, Brawner added an objective consideration. Borrowing from Kingsley, Brawner explained that a detainee raising a Fourteenth Amendment medical deprivation claim must show that a reasonable officer at the scene—not one 'with the 20/20 vision of hindsight'—would have known the detainee's medical needs posed an excessive risk. . . But otherwise, Brawner stopped short of fully articulating the deliberate-indifference inquiry. . . In fact, Brawner acknowledged as much. Rather than purporting to flesh out the revised deliberate indifference prong, the opinion instead merely provided its thoughts on what might be 'relevant on remand' for the district court. . . Greene v. Crawford County, the decision that formally adopted Brawner's standard as the law of the circuit, starts where Brawner stops. . . Greene considered inadequate-medical-care claims brought by a pretrial detainee who, while in custody, had exhibited obvious symptoms of delirium tremens before ultimately dying of respiratory failure. . . In assessing whether a reasonable officer at the scene would have known the detainee's medical needs posed an excessive risk, we repeatedly considered, among other things, what the jail official knew about the detainee's condition. . . Greene's approach is consistent with Brawner. Recall that Brawner's standard for deliberate indifference contemplates separate inquiries into whether the jail official (1) 'recklessly failed to act' (2) 'even though' a 'reasonable official' 'would have known' there was a serious medical need. . . And this view—bifurcating knowledge of the underlying conduct from knowledge about the detainee's medical needs—has its genesis in Kingsley, which recognized that constitutional due process claims include 'two separate state-of-mind questions.'. . One inquiry entails an objective inquiry into a 'series of events in the world,' while the other considers the defendant's actual intentions as to his own conduct. . . Applying Kingsley in the context of an inadequate medical care claim, the latter state-of-mind question includes an inquiry into whether the defendant actually understood the consequences of failing to act. In other words, just as a use of force in and of itself is insufficient to demonstrate a constitutional tort, so too is simple inaction in the face of an objectively serious medical need insufficient to demonstrate deliberate indifference in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. (And we recently imposed an even higher standard than criminal recklessness for failure-to-protect claims, requiring that a defendant officer "act intentionally." (See Westmoreland) Reading Farmer, Kingsley, Brawner, and Greene together, a plaintiff must satisfy three elements for an inadequate-medical-care claim under the Fourteenth Amendment: (1) the plaintiff had an objectively serious medical need; (2) a reasonable officer at the scene (knowing what the particular jail official knew at the time of the incident) would have understood that the detainee's medical needs subjected the detainee to an excessive risk of harm; and (3) the prison official knew that his failure to respond would pose a serious risk to the pretrial detainee and ignored that risk. This third inquiry faithfully applies Kingsley, . . . ensuring that there is a sufficiently culpable mental state to satisfy the 'high bar' for constitutional torts grounded in a substantive due process violation. . . In practice, that may mean that a prison official who lacks an awareness of the risks of her inaction (because, for example, another official takes responsibility for medical care, a medical professional reasonably advised the official to not act, the official lacked authority to act, etc.) cannot have violated the detainee's constitutional rights.")

Trozzi v. Lake County, Ohio, 29 F.4th 745, 760-61 (6th Cir. 2022) ([W]e need not decide whether Snow's decision not to seek immediate emergency help for Trozzi amounted to a constitutional violation. For when that same conduct 'does not violate clearly established ... [federal] rights of which a reasonable person would have known,' it is not necessary to decide whether a constitutional violation occurred. . . In other words, finding that Snow did not violate a clearly established right is a separate ground by which we may affirm the district court. . . Turning, then, to the clearly established inquiry, qualified immunity is appropriate unless the officer in question had 'fair notice' that her conduct was unlawful. . . To provide such notice, the scope of the constitutional right must be 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what [she] is doing violates that right.'. . Whether the official had such notice is 'judged against the backdrop of the law at the time of the conduct.'. . Critically, we do not define clearly established law at a 'high ... level of generality.'. . While a case need not be 'directly on point for a right to be clearly established,' the burden is on the plaintiff to show that closely analogous precedent has placed the 'constitutional question beyond debate.'. . As an initial observation, we agree with Trozzi that pre-Brawner case law—that is, cases that consider whether the government official was subjectively aware of the detainee's serious medical issues—is the appropriate focus for determining what constitutional rights are clearly established. After all, a change in the law (such as Brawner) that occurs after the official's conduct is 'of no use in the clearly established inquiry.'. . This view joins that of the majority of our sister circuits who have held that Kingsley modifies the Farmer test. See Balsewicz v. Pawlyk, 963 F.3d 650, 657 & n.5 (7th Cir. 2020); Ross v. Corr. Officers John & Jane Does 1-5, 610 F. App'x 75, 77 n.1 (2d Cir. 2015). But see Sandoval v. County of San Diego, 985 F.3d 657, 672 (9th Cir. 2021).")

Westmoreland v. Butler County, Kentucky, 29 F.4th 721, 728-30 (6th Cir. 2022), reh'g en banc denied, 35 F.4th 1051 (6th Cir. 2022) ("Here, the district court analyzed Westmoreland's claims against Tyree and BCJ under the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference standard with both an objective and a subjective prong. The district court rejected Westmoreland's argument that Kingsley changed the standard from deliberate indifference to 'objective unreasonableness,' noting the Sixth Circuit had not yet adopted either view in the existing circuit split on the issue. But our Circuit has now explicitly taken the position that a failure-to-protect claim by a pretrial detainee requires only an objective showing that an individual defendant acted (or failed to act) deliberately and recklessly. . . Brawner did not address the application of this standard to individual officers, however, as the county was the only remaining party in that case. Our court has not yet applied the objective standard to a failure-to-protect claim against an individual officer, but it has done so for claims against individual officers for deliberate indifference to an inmate's serious medical needs. See Greene, 22 F.4th at 609–14; Britt v. Hamilton Cnty., et al., 2022 WL 405847, at *3 (6th Cir. Feb. 10, 2022); Hyman v. Lewis, —— F.4th ——, ——, 2022 WL 682543, at *2 (6th Cir. Mar. 8, 2022). . . . Like the Ninth and Seventh Circuits, and following our own circuit's post-Kingsley line of cases, we hold that a defendant officer must act intentionally in a manner that puts the plaintiff at substantial risk of harm, without taking reasonable steps to abate that risk, and by failing to do so actually cause the plaintiff's injuries. . . . A pretrial detainee need not prove subjective elements about an officer's actual awareness of the level of risk, but he must prove the officer was more than merely negligent; the officer must have acted with 'reckless disregard' in the face of 'an unjustifiably high risk of harm.'. . . We vacate the district court's grant of summary judgment because the analysis of whether Tyree was deliberately indifferent should be solely an objective consideration. . . The outcome of this analysis is necessary to determine whether Tyree violated a clearly established constitutional right, or whether he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Westmoreland v. Butler County, Kentucky, 29 F.4th 721, 734-44 (6th Cir. 2022) (Bush, J., dissenting), reh'g en banc denied, 35 F.4th 1051 (6th Cir. 2022) ("The standard for evaluating medical-needs claims as announced in Brawner should now be considered binding precedent. However, I fear that Brawner, as applied by the majority opinion, will compound the conflict in our Fourteenth Amendment jurisprudence. The majority opinion apparently views Brawner, using a civil-law recklessness standard, as permitting a path to recovery that is wholly objective, i.e., not contingent on a finding that an official was subjectively aware of some asserted risk. . . But this interpretation is inconsistent with Farmer and our longstanding adoption of the Farmer test for pretrial detainees' failure-to-protect claims. . . . True, the Brawner test may not facially look like a mere negligence standard because it requires an 'excessive risk.' But this hedging makes little difference in practice. Jails are inherently risky places to be. . . . Pretrial detainees in every case will now argue that jailers 'should have known' some harm would materialize. Setting aside those concerns for now, though, this case does not present immediately analogous circumstances to those in Brawner, which involved a medical-needs claim. Here, a failure-to-protect claim is at issue. There is no compelling reason why the former must govern the latter. As Westmoreland's counsel conceded at oral argument, a medical-needs claim 'differs from [ ] an excessive-force and failure-to-protect claim.' . . No Supreme Court precedent—certainly not Kingsley itself—authorizes reimagination of our failure-to-protect analysis. And we have never applied Kingsley outside of the medical-needs context. So, Brawner does not govern here. . . .Brawner does not compel us to ignore binding precedents for a type of claim—failure-to-protect—that was not at issue in Brawner. The discussion below first explains why the majority's new test is not mandated by Supreme Court precedent. The discussion then describes why the new test is unworkable and logically inconsistent. . . . .The Supreme Court also was clear that liability of an official under Kingsley is limited to only those situations involving 'an intentional and knowing act.'. . So, as a purely common-sense matter, it is not clear how Kingsley—a case involving an action—necessarily applies to cases involving inaction. . . It is true that the Brawner majority did apply Kingsley in the medical-needs context, which could involve alleged governmental inaction. But I would not extend Kingsley further to apply to a failure-to-protect claim in the absence of a clear Supreme Court directive that we do so. . . . [T]he majority's new test is not workable as applied to failure-to-protect claims. . . It purports to implement Kingsley, but that case involved alleged action—that is, excessive force—not alleged inaction, which underlies a failure-to-protect claim. . . When the affirmative act of excessive force is alleged, as the Supreme Court explained, it does not matter if the official intended to punish a detainee by his actions. The question is if 'the force purposefully or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.'. . In other words, we can infer punitive intent based on an affirmative act's relationship to a legitimate government objective. . . But inaction—when an official fails to act—does not raise such an inference. If an official unknowingly fails to act, even if the failure is objectively unreasonable, the official does not violate the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . Under the majority's new test, Westmoreland would need to prove each of the four elements of that test in order to show that Tyree violated his 'clearly established' constitutional right. . . Yet his claim fails to satisfy at least elements 1, 3, and 4. [discussion follows on each element] Even assuming Westmoreland could meet each of the majority's four elements to show that Tyree violated his constitutional right, he would still need to show that such a right was 'clearly established at the time' of the alleged violation. . . . As my colleagues concede, the standard under which we analyze pretrial detainees' failure-to-protect claims under the Fourteenth Amendment is anything but clear. . . The federal appellate circuits are split on the applicability of Kingsley. Our own circuit has never 'applied the objective standard to a failure-to-protect claim against an individual officer[.]'. . And, as the district court accurately explained, we had 'yet to alter the standard for failure to protect claims and [ ] continued to apply the deliberate indifference standard.'. . Westmoreland cannot show that his right was clearly established at the time of Tyree's alleged inactions. 'So long as the alleged violation has not been clearly established, the officers receive qualified immunity and the suit can be dismissed.'. . Indeed, it is definitionally impossible to deny qualified immunity to Tyree when adopting a new test on appeal. . . . The Supreme Court has reminded us time-and-time again that we ignore this requirement at our own peril. . . It is time we heed its warning.")

Hyman v. Lewis, 27 F.4th 1233, 1237-39 (6th Cir. 2022) ("Following our recent decision in Brawner v. Scott County, a plaintiff must show '(1) that [the detainee] had an objectively serious medical need; and (2) that [the defendant's] action (or lack of action) was intentional (not accidental) and [that] she ... recklessly failed to act reasonably to mitigate the risk the serious medical need posed to [the detainee], even though a reasonable official in [the defendant's] position would have known' of that risk. . . While Brawner is far from clear, we can distill a couple of principles from it. First, Brawner left the 'objectively serious medical need' prong untouched. . . Second, under the modified second prong, we know that Hyman must prove 'more than negligence but less than subjective intent—something akin to reckless disregard.'. . And third, we know that the modified second prong asks whether the defendant acted ' "recklessly in the face of an unjustifiably high risk" that is either "known or so obvious that it should be known"' to a reasonable official in the defendant's position. . . . Lewis's admitted intentional violation of jail operating procedures does not mean he intentionally ignored Lipford's needs. Hyman also argues that 'Recklessnes [sic] equals gross negligence' under Michigan law. . . . On the facts before us, Lewis was at most negligent, not grossly negligent or reckless. His failure to open the doors to the video-arraignment room to check on detainees individually violated operating procedures. When asked why he did not physically enter the arraignment room, Lewis provided several reasons, chief among them that officers did not want to irritate inmates by repeatedly waking them up while they were sleeping. While Lewis's actions might have been imprudent, they do not show that Lewis was acting "in the face of an unjustifiably high risk" that any reasonable officer would have known. Lewis made his rounds, looking into the video-arraignment room and monitoring the inmates inside. He had no reason to know that Lipford had concealed narcotics in his body. Lewis no doubt violated the jail's operating procedures. But 'failure to follow internal policies, without more,' does not equal deliberate indifference. . . And even in a post-Brawner world, Lewis's violation of the operating procedures does not rise above negligence to become a constitutional violation under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . Hyman has not shown that any reasonable officer in Lewis's position would have known that Lipford's undisclosed, concealed drugs created an 'obvious' and unjustifiably high risk of harm.")

Britt v. Hamilton County, No. 21-3424, 2022 WL 405847, at *2–3, *6 (6th Cir. Feb. 10, 2022) (not reported) (" The Fourteenth Amendment requires corrections officials to provide adequate medical care to pretrial detainees. . . Officers violate that right when they display 'deliberate indifference to serious medical needs.'. . The key question in this case goes to deliberate indifference: Did the officers act 'recklessly in the face of an unjustifiably high risk' that is either 'known or so obvious that it should be known'? [citing Brawner and Greene] This is an objective inquiry, as Brawner and Greene note, one that asks whether the defendants acted recklessly in response to a danger, 'even though a reasonable official' in their position would have known about an 'excessive risk.'. . In answering this question, all agree that 'negligence is insufficient.'. . Instead, the standard requires objectively established 'recklessness.' . . . A few words are in order in response to the dissent. It claims that we have 'misapplie[d] the applicable law' by failing to apply the Brawner recklessness standard and by citing pre-Brawner cases in our decision. . . But from beginning to end, we have applied the recklessness test for determining the existence of deliberate indifference. That we have relied on pre-Brawner cases for other aspects of the deliberate-indifference inquiry is hardly unusual. What would be unusual would be to assume that Brawner overruled all of these cases, even those that dealt with other issues and even those that relied on alternative grounds when they addressed the state-of-mind inquiry. . . The dissent also claims that we should rely on the district court's one-sentence statement that it would have handled the claims against the nurses differently if recklessness were the test. . . But we look at a district court's summary judgment decisions with fresh eyes. That indeed is just what the dissent has done. It would reverse not just the district court's resolution of the claims against the nurses but also its resolution of the claims against Sergeant Kilday, even though the district court never said a recklessness test would affect its decision as to *that defendant.*For these reasons, we affirm the grant of summary judgment.")

Britt v. Hamilton County, No. 21-3424, 2022 WL 405847, at *6-7 (6th Cir. Feb. 10, 2022) (not reported) (Clay, J., dissenting) ("In granting Defendants' motions for summary judgment, the district court concluded as follows: '[I]f analyzed under Kingsley's solely objective test, Plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence to raise at least one genuine dispute of material fact that would allow her to escape summary judgment: a juror could find that a reasonable nurse in [Defendants'] position should have concluded that Britt was suffering from an infection or endocarditis.'. . . [T]he majority analyzes Plaintiff's claims in light of prior, now obsolete, cases that relied on a subjective test analysis. . . In predicating its analysis on the subjective test, while denying that it is doing so, the majority effectively ignores the district court's assertion that it never would have granted summary judgment in the first place based upon the majority's approach. The majority also minimizes the extent of material disputed facts between the parties and, contrary to the standards governing summary judgment motions, repeatedly draws favorable inferences regarding disputed facts in favor of Defendants instead of Plaintiff. . . Because the record raises genuine and material factual disputes as to Defendants' alleged deliberate indifference to the deceased's medical needs in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, I would reverse the district court's order granting Defendants' motions for summary judgment and remand Plaintiff's claims so they can be heard by a jury. . . . In this case, the district court explicitly concluded that if we eliminated the subjective prong of the now-obsolete deliberate indifference test, 'Plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence to raise at least one genuine dispute of material fact that would allow her to escape summary judgment....'. . . Consequently, the majority upholds entry of summary judgment by a district court which itself stated that, under the applicable current legal authority, it would have been inappropriate to enter summary judgment in the first place.")

Greene v. Crawford County, Michigan, 22 F.4th 593, 606-07 (6th Cir. 2022) ("Brawner answered the question that Kingsley left open. The majority opinion concluded that Kingsley's reasoning required 'modification of the subjective prong of the deliberate-indifference test for pretrial detainees.'. . Brawner modified the second prong of the deliberate indifference test applied to pretrial detainees to require only recklessness. . . .Judge Readler dissented in part from the Brawner majority. He wrote that, 'because resolving the Kingsley question [was] not essential to support [the] judgment, the majority opinion's conclusion on the issue is not [a] holding.'. . Whether Brawner's extension of Kingsley to deliberate indifference claims was a holding—and not mere dictum—is important for today's case because, '[l]ike most circuits, this circuit follows the rule that the holding of a published panel opinion binds all later panels unless overruled or abrogated en banc or by the Supreme Court.' Wright v. Spaulding, 939 F.3d 695, 700 (6th Cir. 2019). A 'conclusion that does nothing to determine the outcome is dictum and has no binding force' on a future panel. . .Counsel for County Defendants urged us at oral argument to interpret Brawner's extension of Kingsley as non-binding dictum and to apply the traditional subjective standard. . . We decline to take that interpretation of Brawner. The Brawner majority expressly considered and rejected the suggestion that its extension of Kingsley was dictum. . . Although it concluded that the facts 'support[ed] a finding of deliberate indifference under either' the Eighth-Amendment subjective standard or Kingsley's modified objective standard, it reasoned that 'deciding the issue [was] necessary so the jury can be properly instructed on remand' and that there were 'no statutory or alternative grounds on which to decide this case.'. . We are bound by that decision.")

Hale v. Boyle County, 18 F.4th 845, 852-53 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Kingsley's objective test applies to Hale's claims against Pennington. Both parties have framed Hale's claim as an excessive-force claim. . . That framing comports with how other courts have treated similar claims. . . And that framing is also consistent with the facts of this case. The Tenth Circuit appears to be the only federal appellate court that has encountered a detained person's allegation that they were sexually abused by a prison guard post-Kingsley. In Brown, the court applied Kingsley to a detained woman's lawsuit against a guard who allegedly abused her, reasoning that an analysis of Fourteenth Amendment claims cannot track the Eighth Amendment after Kingsley. . . Consistent with the Tenth Circuit, we conclude that Hale's assertions against Pennington are properly viewed as an excessive-force claim that should be evaluated under Kingsley's objective test.")

Brawner v. Scott County, Tennessee, 18 F.4th 551, 551-52, 555-56 (6th Cir. 2021) (Readler, J., joined by Thapar, Bush, Nalbandian, and Murphy, JJ., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) ("We should not be enlisting a case about excessive force to disturb our deliberate indifference to medical needs jurisprudence. Brawner v. Scott County, 14 F.4th 585, 605 (6th Cir. 2021) (Readler, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Kingsley [v. Hendrickson] would be the quintessential stalking horse if invoked as grounds to overrule our current deliberate indifference precedent."). For that and other reasons, I continue to see Brawner as a flawed decision. . . . The majority opinion is yet another example of our Circuit transforming constitutional prohibitions against punishment into a 'freestanding right to be free from jailhouse medical malpractice.'. . The Brawner majority opinion did so by forgoing any examination of the Fourteenth Amendment's text or original public meaning. Instead, it turned to Kingsley v. Hendrickson, . . . an excessive force decision that, all agree, did not address 'other Fourteenth Amendment pretrial-detainment contexts.'. . Despite Kingsley's express limits, Brawner used Kingsley to jettison our traditional inquiry in the deliberate indifference setting. Rather than asking whether the defendant was subjectively aware of the serious medical risks facing the detainee, Brawner adopted a reckless disregard standard, a benchmark we are told should be viewed through the eyes of a 'reasonable official in the defendant's position.'. . In that world, if a plaintiff can muster more than a scintilla of evidence to suggest that an official acted with objectively unreasonable reckless indifference to a detainee's medical condition, it is left to the jury—effectively acting as both doctor and warden—to decide whether the official's actions were reasonable. . . . [E]ven before Brawner, we had already diluted the traditional deliberate indifference inquiry merely to ask whether an official should have known of and inferred (rather than actually knew and actually inferred) that the detainee faced a substantial risk of harm. This objective-only inquiry for constitutional deliberate indifference claims pays no heed to the subjective inquiry we traditionally required. . . . And query how our decaying standard is any different from a state law negligence claim. On that front, it bears reminding that a detainee, just like an individual not in official custody, may bring a state tort claim should she be the victim of negligent medical care. But why has our Court allowed the detainee to also pursue a constitutional claim to seek compensation for negligent care (unencumbered by the liability-reducing damages caps and limits on attorneys' fees that often accompany a state law claim)? And why are medical providers who work in detention facilities subject to the risk of both state and constitutional theories of liability for providing negligent care? . . . Our precedent answers those questions only with silence. All of this is to say that, over time, we have seized on Farmer's aside functionally to rid any serious inquiry into the subjective intentions of the sued government official. Yet what took decades to achieve, Brawner aims to accomplish more rapidly. What began as a requirement that the government official 'both be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and ... draw the inference,' Farmer, 511 U.S. at 837, 114 S.Ct. 1970, has devolved into a nebulous consideration of whether 'a reasonable official in [the official's] position would have known that the serious medical need posed an excessive risk to [the detainee's] health or safety,' Brawner, 14 F.4th at 597. As we long ago abandoned the text and history of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments in favor of a 'tender-hearted desire to tortify' the Constitution, such a departure is perhaps unsurprising. . . But it is no less regrettable. . . So far, we have been unwilling to reconsider these developments. In fact, more than two decades have passed since the en banc Court last considered a detainee's deliberate indifference claim. . . Given the ensuing dilution of the governing standard, it is exceptionally important that we reconsider our precedent in this area. . . Otherwise, the lesson for future panels is obvious: fortune favors the bold.")

Brawner v. Scott County, Tennessee, 14 F.4th 585, 591-96 (6th Cir. 2021), rehearing en banc denied, 18 F.4th 551| (6th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 84 (2022) ("We have 'historically analyzed Fourteenth Amendment pretrial detainee claims and Eighth Amendment prisoner claims "under the same rubric."'. . Brawner argues, however, that the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley . . . eliminates the subjective element of a pretrial detainee's deliberate-indifference claim. . . . However, Kingsley did not address whether an objective standard applies in other [than excessive force] Fourteenth Amendment pretrial-detainment contexts. Although the facts here, viewed in the light most favorable to Brawner, support a finding of deliberate indifference under either Farmer's subjective . . . or Kingsley's objective standard, we must address the issue because the standard will be relevant on remand. . . The Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits have held that Kingsley requires modification of the subjective component for pretrial detainees bringing Fourteenth Amendment deliberate-indifference claims. [collecting cases] On the other hand, the Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits have retained, with minimal analysis, the subjective component for deliberate-indifference Fourteenth Amendment claims despite Kingsley. [collecting cases] More recently, the Tenth Circuit joined the Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits. Strain v. Regalado, 977 F.3d 984, 991 (10th Cir. 2020). . . . Our circuit has not yet decided this issue, but some members of this court have expressed 'serious doubt' whether a deliberate-indifference claim under the Fourteenth Amendment retains a subjective component in light of Kingsley, . . . or have expressly found that the subjective component no longer applies to these claims in light of Kingsley[.] . . . Because the question is whether Kingsley renders Farmer's subjective prong of the deliberate indifference test inapplicable to claims brought by pretrial detainees under the Fourteenth Amendment, it is useful to examine the Court's decision in Farmer. . . . It is clear. . . that the Farmer Court adopted the subjective component of the test for deliberate indifference under the Eighth Amendment based on the language and purposes of that amendment, focusing particularly on 'punishments,' and not on any intrinsic meaning of the term. We thus reject the Tenth Circuit's argument that the term 'deliberate indifference' itself demands a subjective standard. . . We also reject any argument that Farmer controls here until the Supreme Court tells us otherwise, because Farmer cannot fairly be read to require subjective knowledge where the Eighth Amendment does not apply, and the Supreme Court has not held that Farmer's subjective standard applies to Fourteenth Amendment pretrial-detainee medical-care claims. Scott County additionally argues that we are bound by our own precedent applying a subjective standard to deliberate-indifference claims by pretrial detainees both before and after Kingsley. We disagree. As other circuits have recognized, Kingsley is an inconsistent Supreme Court decision that requires modification of our caselaw . . . and therefore we may amend our standard to be consistent with Kingsley[.] Further, the post-Kingsley decisions the County cites expressly reserved the question whether Kingsley requires modification of the deliberate-indifference standard. . . And other panels of this court that have recognized the issue have declined to resolve it without suggesting that they could not do so absent rehearing en banc. . . Given Kingsley's clear delineation between claims brought by convicted prisoners under the Eighth Amendment and claims brought by pretrial detainees under the Fourteenth Amendment, applying the same analysis to these constitutionally distinct groups is no longer tenable. . . Accordingly, we agree with the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits that Kingsley requires modification of the subjective prong of the deliberate-indifference test for pretrial detainees. What then is required to establish deliberate indifference in this context? Mere negligence is insufficient. A defendant must have not only acted deliberately (not accidentally), but also recklessly 'in the face of an unjustifiably high risk of harm that is either known or so obvious that it should be known.'. . A pretrial detainee must prove 'more than negligence but less than subjective intent—something akin to reckless disregard.'")

Brawner v. Scott County, Tennessee, 14 F.4th 585, 603-11 (6th Cir. 2021) (Readler, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part), rehearing en banc denied, 18 F.4th 551| (6th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 84 (2022) ("Every other time a party has asked us to apply the Kingsley framework to deliberate indifference claims, we have rightly acknowledged there was no need to do so when the case could be decided on alternative grounds. [collecting cases] Exercising judicial modesty, judges across our Court have 'reserve[d] the [Kingsley] question for another day' when the outcome on appeal would be the same 'under either test'—the traditional subjective deliberate indifference standard or Kingsley's objective reasonableness standard. . . We have faithfully done so out of respect for the federal constitution, for which we prize restraint by deferring contentious constitutional questions unless 'unavoidable' or 'absolutely necessary' to the appeal's disposition. . . That is wise counsel again today, where resolving the Kingsley issue is neither 'absolutely necessary' to the appeal's outcome nor 'unavoidable' in ways not previously faced by many past panels. We have likewise refrained from addressing Kingsley's purported applicability to deliberate indifference claims in recognition of our established rules governing a decision's holding, as contrasted with dicta that might accompany a holding. A case's holding is binding on future panels of our Court. . . But dicta—that is, anything 'not necessary to the determination of the issue on appeal'—is not. . . That latter principle is central to today's case. When, as here, a party can prevail under both a higher standard and a lower standard, 'selecting one standard or the other would "not [be] necessary to the determination of the issue on appeal."'. . For purposes of this appeal, where the question is whether Brawner alleged sufficient evidence to make out a violation of her Fourteenth Amendment rights, '[t]he preference of a particular standard would ... be dicta.'. . Demonstrating the point, remove mention of Kingsley from the majority opinion and its judgment stands unaffected. . . . Today, the majority opinion, noting the district court's comments about instructions the jury never received, suggests that it might be appropriate to resolve the Kingsley question because our answer to that question theoretically will be 'relevant on remand' and at trial. . . The same could be said, of course, about a great many other issues as well, given the inherent unpredictability a trial brings. But because resolving the Kingsley question is not essential to support today's judgment, the majority opinion's conclusion on the issue is not today's holding. As all of this abundantly demonstrates, constitutional avoidance, judicial modesty, past practice, binding precedent, and respect for the role of the district court all confirm why any discussion of Kingsley here is unnecessary. That last point bears particular emphasis. The district court, as is the customary practice, can resolve on remand any outstanding issues as needed. That includes the Kingsley issue, for which the proper solution is to wait for the issue to be teed up during trial. Using a special verdict form with tailored interrogatories, the trial court can easily deduce whether the prison officials' actions met the objective and/or subjective standards. . . In fact, Brawner has already indicated that she will propose such a verdict form to allow the jury to determine whether she satisfied the objective-only component. . . The district court seemingly can add a second question, one that asks whether the County also acted with conventional subjective indifference. If both answers come back in the affirmative, not even the district court will need to resolve the Kingsley issue, let alone this Court. . . Nor do I believe that the majority opinion, even in the capacity of an advisory opinion, articulates the proper reading of Kingsley. For when properly presented with the opportunity to extend Kingsley in a future case, we should decline that invitation. At best, Kingsley's relinquishment of the subjective inquiry applies only to a pretrial detainee's excessive force claims. It does not extend to claims premised on a failure to act, the essence of a deliberate indifference claim. . . .[I]t is difficult to see how Kingsley's holding as to excessive force abrogates the subjective component of our Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference standard. For starters, nothing in Kingsley purports to address, let alone modify, deliberate indifference standards. . . . [I]t would be peculiar to seize on Kingsley's general pronouncements as to excessive force claims as a basis for rewriting our deliberate indifference jurisprudence. . . Neither the language nor logic of Kingsley suggests a broader application beyond the excessive force setting, a fact recognized by other circuits that wisely have refused to chart the majority opinion's proposed course. [collecting cases] . . . . All this to say that Kingsley's 'delineation' between prisoners and pretrial detainees, which is not a new concept, surely does not compel a sea change in our Farmer-inspired deliberate indifference jurisprudence. . . . As explained in Bell, in analyzing a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment claim, the key question is whether the situation at issue amounts to a punishment of the detainee. While punitive intent may be inferred from affirmative acts that are excessive in relationship to a legitimate government objective, the mere failure to act does not raise the same inference. Rather, a person who unknowingly fails to act—even when such a failure is objectively unreasonable—is negligent at most. And the Supreme Court has made clear that liability for negligently inflicted harm is categorically beneath the threshold of constitutional due process. . . . Without any manner of inquiry into a party's intent, courts cannot fairly distinguish negligent deprivation of care—which does not give rise to a constitutional claim—from an intentional deprivation of care that amounts to punishment—which violates the Fourteenth Amendment. . . How does the majority opinion purport to grapple with this distinction? It would erect a novel third standard—'something akin to reckless disregard.'. . That standard, according to the majority opinion, purportedly is lower than our subjective Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference standard, yet higher than the negligence standard that Kingsley reaffirmed is out of bounds for any Fourteenth Amendment claim. . . . At bottom, Kingsley's test (which applies to affirmative acts) is irreconcilable with the majority opinion's test (which applies to failures to act), a tension other courts have acknowledged in criticizing this 'entirely new standard of constitutional liability: reckless indifference.'. . When the Kingsley issue is properly presented in a future case, our Court should forgo following this unmerited and unwise path. . . . . Curiously, the majority opinion may be fonder of the standard it purports to reject than meets the eye. . . . Rightly or wrongly, we seemingly already allow jurors to conclude that an officer satisfies the subjective component whenever a plaintiff pleads facts sufficient to suggest a 'conscious disregard' for a pretrial detainee's substantial health risk. . . And 'a factfinder may conclude that a prison official knew of a substantial risk from the very fact that the risk was obvious.'. . In failing to articulate a true point of departure from our conventional Farmer test, the majority opinion arguably 'has simply dressed up the Farmer test in Kingsley language for no apparent reason[,] ... conflat[ing] the two standards only to end up where we started.' That test, if adopted, may well yield results largely the same as the conventional subjective test it purports to overrule. So, to recap, the majority opinion reads Kingsley's excessive force holding as a basis for rewriting our traditional standard for a different claim—deliberate indifference. Yet it then crafts a legal standard for objective indifference that fails to track the test articulated in Kingsley (and, in so doing, prefers a novel and seemingly unusual 'reckless indifference' standard). And it does all of this only to foster a standard that, in practice, looks more and more like the standard the majority opinion is so eager to abandon. If this winding jurisprudential path has left you feeling a bit lost, you are not alone. There is a better way. I remain unconvinced that the Fourteenth Amendment confers any freestanding right to be free from jailhouse medical malpractice. . . But that does not mean that detainees who suffer harm at the hands of incompetent officers have no means for legal redress. . . Rather than taking further steps to 'tortify the Fourteenth Amendment,'. . . contorted in this case even more than usual, pretrial detainees like Brawner can draw on a rich body of state negligence law for recompense. . . That field of law, after all, is a traditional area of focus for state legislatures and state courts. I would not further expand the Fourteenth Amendment to swallow up matters better left to those able bodies.")

Burwell v. City of Lansing, Michigan, 7 F.4th 456, 465-66 (6th Cir. 2021) ("According to Burwell, Kingsley's reasoning is not confined to excessive force cases and should apply with equal measure to deliberate indifference claims brought by pretrial detainees. Our sister circuits are divided on whether Kingsley abrogates the subjective intent requirement of a Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim. . . This court has not resolved that question, although we have said in dicta 'that this shift in Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference jurisprudence calls into serious doubt whether [pretrial detainees] need even show that the individual defendant-officials were subjectively aware of [their] serious medical conditions and nonetheless wantonly disregarded them.'. .However, we need not take a position here on whether Kingsley extends to deliberate indifference claims. We have historically declined to resolve this issue when, as here, the plaintiff failed to argue it before the district court. . . Our usual rule is 'that an issue not raised before the district court is not properly before us.'. . .We see no reason to deviate from that path here, particularly when Burwell failed to respond to the defendants' argument that she waived the issue. Thus, for now, we stick with the conventional test. 'To satisfy the subjective component, the plaintiff must allege facts which, if true, would show that the official being sued subjectively perceived facts from which to infer substantial risk to the prisoner, that he did in fact draw the inference, and that he then disregarded that risk.'")

Bowles v. Bourbon County, Kentucky, No. 21-5012, 2021 WL 3028128, at *5, *7-8 (6th Cir. July 19, 2021) (not reported) ("Plaintiffs admit that they cannot satisfy the deliberate-indifference test under the Eighth Amendment and do not press this argument on appeal. . . Instead, Plaintiffs contend that Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389, 397 (2015), requires that the district court apply an objective-unreasonableness test to Plaintiffs' claim of constitutionally inadequate medical care. Defendants counter that the objective-unreasonableness test articulated in Kingsley is limited to claims of excessive force and should not extend to claims of constitutionally inadequate medical care. Moreover, Defendants contend that Plaintiffs' claims do not satisfy even the objective-unreasonableness standard. We need not resolve the proper standard after Kingsley to evaluate claims of constitutionally inadequate medical care made by pretrial detainees, for the record shows that Plaintiffs cannot satisfy their preferred objective-unreasonableness standard. . . . Kingsley . . . did not explicitly decide whether the objective-unreasonableness standard applied to all § 1983 claims made by pretrial detainees. As a circuit, we have not squarely resolved whether the objective-unreasonableness test of Kingsley extends to claims by pretrial detainees of constitutionally inadequate medical care. In Richmond, we 'recognize[d] that this shift in Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference jurisprudence' as a result of Kingsley 'calls into serious doubt whether [the pretrial detainee] need even show that the individual defendant-officials were subjectively aware of her serious medical conditions and nonetheless wantonly disregarded them.'. . Nonetheless, we did not decide whether Kingsley altered the standard for claims of constitutionally inadequate medical care because 'neither party cite[d] Kingsley or addresse[d] its potential effect in their briefing.'. . In subsequent cases, we have 'stayed out of the fray,' and 'found it unnecessary to answer the question each time we have confronted the issue' because the 'same result would obtain under either the subjective test dictated by Farmer or by a purely objective test derived from Kingsley.'. . In a handful of cases, plaintiffs have neglected to mention that Kingsley might warrant an objective analysis only, and we have applied the subjective deliberate-indifference standard without reflection. . . Although we have not had occasion to resolve the proper standard for claims of constitutionally inadequate medical care brought by pretrial detainees after Kingsley, other circuits have considered the question and have come to different conclusions. On one side, a slim majority of circuits have limited Kingsley to excessive-force claims. In most cases where a circuit has declined to extend Kingsley to claims of constitutionally inadequate medical care, the court's analysis is sparse and confined to a footnote. [collecting cases from First, Fifth, Eighth, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits] The Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits, by contrast, have extended Kingsley to claims by pretrial detainees of constitutionally inadequate medical care. [citing cases] Regardless of whether we analyze Plaintiffs' claims under the objective-unreasonableness standard, as Plaintiffs here request, or under the more stringent subjective deliberate-indifference standard, Plaintiffs' claims fail because they cannot establish more than negligence by Defendants. Accordingly, we do not contribute to the circuit split on the relevant test.") Moderwell v. Cuyahoga County, Ohio, 997 F.3d 653, 662 (6th Cir. 2021) ("[T]his Court has held that '"claims of excessive force do not necessarily require allegations of assault," but rather can consist of the physical structure and conditions of the place of detention.'. . . Therefore, Plaintiff's claims of excessive force based on the Corrections Defendants subjecting Johnson to the horrible conditions of CCCC's Red Zone, despite his suicidal condition and in response to a non-violent minor infraction, are not categorically barred by the Amended Complaint's failure to allege that the Corrections Defendants assaulted Johnson. Because it was unnecessary for Plaintiff to allege an assault in conjunction with her excessive force claim, there is no reason to depart from 'our general preference' not to grant qualified immunity based only on the pleadings. . . To understand 'the "facts and circumstances of [this] particular case,"' and to decide whether, faced with those facts and circumstances, a reasonable official would have understood that placing Johnson in CCCC's Red Zone constituted objectively unreasonable force, Plaintiff must be provided the opportunity to develop the factual record. Kingsley, 576 U.S. at 397, 135 S.Ct. 2466 (quoting Graham, 490 U.S. at 396, 109 S.Ct. 1865). Although there is limited precedent addressing claims of excessive force without an assault, at this stage, we cannot determine whether discovery will nonetheless establish that the Corrections Defendants' actions were so 'egregious' that 'any reasonable officer should have realized that' the force used against Johnson 'offended the Constitution.' Taylor, 141 S. Ct. at 54.")

Moderwell v. Cuyahoga County, Ohio, 997 F.3d 653, 663 n.6 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Because none of the Executive Defendants' arguments implicate the deliberate indifference standard, we need not decide whether, pursuant to Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 192 L.Ed.2d 416 (2015), the test for deliberate indifference claims brought under the Fourteenth Amendment retains a subjective component. See Griffith v. Franklin County, 975 F.3d 554, 570 (6th Cir. 2020) (declining to address this issue because the claim failed whether or not there was a subjective component); see also id. at 588–89 (Clay, J., concurring in part and dissenting part) (concluding "that Kingsley is applicable to the deliberate indifference context" and, accordingly, "that a pretrial detainee must only prove that a defendant-official acted intentionally to ignore their serious medical need or recklessly failed to act with reasonable care to mitigate the risk that the serious medical need posed to the pretrial detainee, even though a reasonable official in the defendant's position would have known, or should have known, that the serious medical need posed an excessive risk to the pretrial detainee's health or safety.").")

Roberts v. Coffee County, No. 20-5194, 2020 WL 6156707, at *3 n.2 (6th Cir. Oct. 21, 2020) (not reported) ("Although we recently noted that the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015), 'calls into serious doubt' whether a subjective-intent requirement applies to a deliberate-indifference claim by a pretrial detainee under the Fourteenth Amendment, because neither party discusses Kingsley's potential effect on Roberts's deliberate-indifference claim, we do not address that issue here.")

Troutman v. Louisville Metro Dep't of Corr., 979 F.3d 472, 482 n.8 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Plaintiffs and their amici assert that we should adopt the standard used by the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits which applies Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 192 L.Ed.2d 416 (2015) to claims of inadequate medical treatment claims raised by pretrial detainees. This case does not present the opportunity to do so, though the question remains open whether Kingsley applies beyond excessive-force claims.")

Griffith v. Franklin County, Kentucky, 975 F.3d 554, 556-71 (6th Cir. 2020) ("'The Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment generally provides the basis to assert a § 1983 claim of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, but where that claim is asserted on behalf of a pre-trial detainee, the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment is the proper starting point.'. . . This court has consistently applied the same 'deliberate indifference' framework to Eighth-Amendment claims brought by prisoners as Fourteenth-Amendment claims brought by pretrial detainees. . . This two-part framework contains both an objective component—a ' "sufficiently serious' medical need'—and a subjective component—a 'sufficiently culpable state of mind.'. . . The text of the Eighth Amendment mandates this showing of subjective knowledge for claims brought by prisoners: '[t]he Eighth Amendment does not outlaw cruel and unusual "conditions"; it outlaws cruel and unusual "punishments."'. . . The Fourteenth Amendment, of course, does not contain the word 'punishment.'. . . Indeed, pretrial detainees cannot be punished at all, and there is accordingly 'no need, as there might be in an Eighth Amendment case, to determine when punishment is unconstitutional.'. . Accordingly, the 'proper inquiry' to evaluate the conditions of confinement for a pretrial detainee is 'whether those conditions amount to punishment.'. . . Despite these differences, we have nevertheless explained that it is appropriate to apply the Eighth Amendment standard to pretrial detainees because applying the Wolfish test would yield the same deliberate-indifference standard. See Roberts v. City of Troy, 773 F.2d 720, 724–25 (6th Cir. 1985). In Roberts, we explained that the appropriate test under Wolfish is whether the challenged condition is reasonably related to a legitimate government objective. . .We reasoned that this test is applied to determine whether prison officials are acting with improper punitive intent or pursuant to proper regulatory goals; thus, we concluded that 'Bell v. Wolfish requires an intent to punish.'. . Based on that straightforward logic—that the punitive intent required under Wolfish is the same 'punishment' governed by the Eighth Amendment—we adopted the deliberate-indifference test wholesale for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Griffith argues, and the district court held, that this approach is no longer appropriate in light of Kingsley. . . . Following Kingsley, the circuits have divided on whether an objective test similarly governs conditions-of-confinement claims brought under the Fourteenth Amendment. [collecting cases] Our court has generally stayed out of the fray. We have found it unnecessary to answer the question each time we have confronted the issue, instead holding that the same result would obtain under either the subjective test dictated by Farmer or by a purely objective test derived from Kingsley. . . The district court adopted the test from the Second Circuit and held that Griffith could prevail simply by showing that the defendants 'recklessly failed to act with reasonable care to mitigate the risk that the [medical] condition posed to the pretrial detainee even though the defendant-official knew, or should have known, that the condition posed an excessive risk to health or safety.'. . It nevertheless held that Griffith failed to satisfy this lower requirement. . .We agree that Griffith cannot prevail under either test, and therefore reserve the question for another day. . . As we explain below, Griffith's proof establishes, at most, a negligence claim sounding in state tort law.")

Griffith v. Franklin County, Kentucky, 975 F.3d 554, 585-90 (6th Cir. 2020) (Clay, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I write separately to explain how I would decide the Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim presented by this appeal and why I would hold that Nurses Sherrow, Trivette, and Mundine were not entitled to summary judgment. . . . Under the standard for deliberate indifference claims brought by pretrial detainees which, in light of recent Supreme Court precedent, only requires an objective showing of deliberate indifference, a reasonable jury could find that the nurses were deliberately indifferent to Griffith's serious medical needs. Because the majority reaches the opposite conclusion, and declines to adopt the correct standard, I respectfully dissent. Our current test for deliberate indifference under the Fourteenth Amendment mirrors similar claims brought under the Eighth Amendment and contains an objective and subjective component. . . .Recent Supreme Court precedent, however, demands that our standard governing Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claims must be altered. . . . I would hold that Kingsley is applicable to the deliberate indifference context. Subjectivity has no place in a Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim because pretrial detainees are in a categorically different situation than convicted prisoners. Deliberate indifference claims brought under the Eighth Amendment require an inquiry into the official's state-of-mind because 'an official's failure to alleviate a significant risk that he should have perceived but did not, while no cause for commendation, cannot under our cases be condemned as the infliction of punishment.'. . However, Kingsley affirmed that 'pretrial detainees (unlike convicted prisoners) cannot be punished at all.'. .Moreover, the Supreme Court in Kingsley largely relied on its earlier decision in Bell v. Wolfish, which held that pretrial detainees may prevail in Fourteenth Amendment challenges to conditions of their confinement even in the absence of an intent to punish, 'by showing that the actions are not "rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose" or that the actions "appear excessive in relation to that purpose."'. . The Court held that this is an objective standard and proceeded to adapt it to the context of excessive force. . . This indicates that Kingsley simply acknowledged the breadth of a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment rights and affirmed that an objective inquiry into a defendant's state of mind is the appropriate standard by which to judge a defendant's intentional conduct. . . The majority acknowledges much of this but declines to give effect to this recent Supreme Court precedent because it would not change the outcome in the present case. Whether or not this is correct, we may not simply ignore Supreme Court precedent. . . . Kingsley is an inconsistent decision issued by the Supreme Court, and it requires modification of our Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference standard. Therefore, I would hold that a pretrial detainee must only prove that a defendant-official acted intentionally to ignore their serious medical need or recklessly failed to act with reasonable care to mitigate the risk that the serious medical need posed to the pretrial detainee, even though a reasonable official in the defendant's position would have known, or should have known, that the serious medical need posed an excessive risk to the pretrial detainee's health or safety. This change in our law necessitates a slight adjustment to the nomenclature we use in deliberate indifference cases. Kingsley had no impact on the 'objective' component of a deliberate indifference claim—a pretrial detainee must still prove that their medical need was sufficiently serious. However, the 'subjective' component is no longer subjective. I will instead refer to this component as the "mens rea" component because it still requires a court to determine whether the defendant acted with a sufficiently culpable state of mind to establish deliberate indifference. To do so, we must examine the recklessness of a defendant from the perspective of a reasonable official. . . . Griffith has satisfied the objective component of a deliberate indifference claim because he plainly suffered from a sufficiently serious medical condition in FCRJ. . . . However, the majority mistakenly concludes that Griffith has not met the mens rea prong with respect to Nurses Trivette, Sherrow, and Mundine. It holds that regardless of which standard we apply—either our obsolete subjective standard or the objective test in light of Kingsley—Griffith cannot prevail because his proof only demonstrates that the nurses were negligent in their care of him. But under the correct, objective standard for deliberate indifference, Griffith has demonstrated several genuine issues of material fact which preclude judgment as a matter of law for the nurses. A reasonable jury could find that each nurse recklessly failed to act with reasonable care to mitigate the risk that Griffith's serious medical need posed to him, even though a reasonable nurse in Defendants' positions would have known, or should have known, that Griffith's serious medical need posed an excessive risk to his health and safety.")

Cameron v. Bouchard, 815 F. App'x 978, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("Plaintiffs and their amici argue that we should adopt a new standard for pretrial detainees in light of Kingsley v. Hendrickson. . . . Since Kingsley, the circuits have split on whether deliberate indifference claims arising under the Fourteenth Amendment are still governed by Farmer (requiring a subjective inquiry for an officer's state of mind), or instead are governed by Kingsley (requiring an objective inquiry for an officer's state of mind). Compare Castro v. Cty. of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1070 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) (adopting a new objective standard for deliberate indifference claims brought by pretrial detainees); Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 35 (2d Cir. 2017) (same); Miranda v. Cty. of Lake, 900 F.3d 335, 351–52 (7th Cir. 2018) (same) with Alderson v. Concordia Parish Corr. Facility, 848 F.3d 415, 419 n. 4 (5th Cir. 2017) (declining to reconsider its earlier precedent treating Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment claims alike); Whitney v. City of St. Louis, 887 F.3d 857, 860 n.4 (8th Cir. 2018) (same); Nam Dang by and through Vina Dang v. Sheriff, Seminole Cty. Florida, 871 F.3d 1272, 1279 n.2 (11th Cir. 2017) (same). We have not ruled on the issue. See Richardson v. Huq, 885 F.3d 928, 938 n.3 (6th Cir. 2018) (declining to address the issue because it was not raised by either party). We need not resolve the issue today, because no matter the approach we adopt, the outcome is the same. Even if the pretrial detainees do not need to introduce evidence of subjective recklessness in light of Kingsley, they acknowledge that they still must prove something more than that the Defendants acted unreasonably. A 'claim for a violation of due process requires proof of a mens rea greater than mere negligence.'. . The test they propose would still require either 'something akin to reckless disregard,'. . . or that they 'knew or should have known' of the risk and nonetheless 'recklessly failed to act'[.] . . . The evidence Plaintiffs presented is insufficient to demonstrate that the jail officials acted with reckless disregard to the serious risk COVID-19 poses. Indeed, the steps that jail officials took to prevent the spread of COVID-19 were reasonable. Given the similarity of the BOP's response in Wilson and Defendants' response here, Wilson controls the outcome of this case, even if Farmer's subjective component does not apply to Plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment claims.")

Cameron v. Bouchard, 815 F. App'x 978, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) (Cole, C.J., dissenting) ("To me, the district court's findings, which we adopt absent clear error, show serious deficiencies on the part of the defendants in responding to the COVD-19 pandemic. I therefore depart from the majority and would find that the plaintiffs have demonstrated a likelihood of success on the merits of their claims. As such, I respectfully dissent. . . . As the majority acknowledges, the question of how to analyze the pretrial detainees' Fourteenth Amendment claims—specifically whether they include a deliberate indifference element—is an open one after the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, where the Supreme Court held that it was inappropriate to apply the same mental culpability requirement to excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees as the one applied in those brought by convicted inmates. . . The majority assumes, for purposes of this case, that pretrial detainees do not need to prove a subjective component and says that it is proceeding under the Ninth Circuit's approach of requiring such plaintiffs to prove only 'objective recklessness' on the part of jail officials. . . The Ninth Circuit explained that the 'objective recklessness' standard requires plaintiffs to prove that '[t]he defendant did not take reasonable available measures to abate [a substantial risk of harm facing the plaintiff], even though a reasonable officer in the circumstances would have appreciated the high degree of risk involved—making the consequences of the defendant's conduct obvious.'. . By contrast, plaintiffs seeking vindication of their Eighth Amendment right against cruel and unusual punishment face a steeper climb and must prove that a defendant 'knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate health or safety.'. . Despite the majority's representation that it is applying the Castro Fourteenth Amendment standard for purposes of this case, however, it in effect still holds all plaintiffs to the Eighth Amendment's deliberate indifference standard. We know this to be true because the majority cites a single case to support its analysis of the plaintiffs' constitutional claims: our recent decision in Wilson v. Williams, 961 F.3d 829 (6th Cir. 2020). That case was brought by prisoners at a federal prison, none of whom were pretrial detainees. . . As their claims all arose under the Eighth Amendment, we applied the Eighth Amendment test, and, indeed, our decision turned on the prisoners' ability to prove deliberate indifference under the subjective prong. . . Our consideration of this Fourteenth Amendment claim should not be bound by a case where we used an Eighth Amendment analysis. For today's purposes, though, I will not further explore the issue of the proper standard for reviewing Fourteenth Amendment claims of pretrial detainees, as I conclude that the plaintiffs are likely to succeed on the merits even under the more-stringent Eighth Amendment review that all parties agree applies to the claims of the convicted inmates at the jail. . . . The majority finds that the plaintiffs cannot demonstrate a likelihood of success on the merits largely based on our decision in Wilson. I remain unconvinced that Wilson properly adjudicated the claims before it. See Wilson, 961 F.3d at 845–50 (Cole, C.J., dissenting in part). But I do not dissent from today's decision because I think Wilson was wrongly decided; I recognize that it carries the same precedential value of any published decision of our court. Rather, I conclude that the decision does not stretch so far as to foreclose a constitutional claim based on the record before us today, both because the record contains evidence adverse to the defendants that was not present in Wilson and because the evidence in favor of the defendants that appears at first glance to be similar to that which we credited in Wilson suffers from serious reliability issues. . . . In sum, the record reveals differences in degree and in kind between this case and Wilson. I find that by demonstrating that the defendants deployed transfers to COVID-infected areas punitively, temporarily adopted better practices only for purposes of passing inspection, repeatedly provided inadequate medical care, failed to consistently quarantine symptomatic inmates, and did not take advantage of opportunities for increased social distancing, the plaintiffs have shown that they are likely to succeed on the merits of their claims.")

Cameron v. Bouchard, 815 F. App'x 978, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("Given our intervening decision in Wilson, a case that is binding on us, we now agree with Defendants that Plaintiffs are unlikely to succeed on the merits of their Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment claims. '[W]hile the harm imposed by COVID-19 on inmates at [the Jail] "ultimately [is] not averted," [Defendants have] "responded reasonably to the risk" and therefore ha[ve] [likely] not been deliberately indifferent to the inmates" Eighth Amendment rights.'. . Our conclusion that Plaintiffs are unlikely to succeed on the merits challenge is dispositive, because '[o]ur cases warn that a court must not issue a preliminary injunction where the movant presents no likelihood of merits success.'. .We GRANT Defendants' renewed emergency motion to stay the preliminary injunction pending resolution of Defendants' appeal.")

Cameron v. Bouchard, 815 F. App'x 978, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) (Cole, C.J., dissenting) ("Largely for the reasons stated in the May 26, 2020, order in this case, I would deny the defendants' renewed emergency motion for a stay. See Cameron, et al. v. Bouchard, et al., No. 20-1469 (6th Cir. May 26, 2020) (order denying motion to stay) ("May 26 Order"). The preliminary injunction is a modest order entered to maintain the health and safety of the inmates incarcerated at the Jail while this litigation proceeds. It does not order the release of a single inmate and only requires the defendants to take measures such as providing soap and disinfectant to inmates, performing regular cleaning of the facility, and establishing detailed protocols to address the spread of COVID-19 within the Jail. I do not believe that Wilson v. Williams, No. 20-3447, 2020 WL 3056217 (6th Cir. June 9, 2020), changes the analysis that led us to deny the defendants' request for a stay last month. In particular, I would note that the district court, following submissions by the parties and a multi-day hearing, made several findings of fact regarding deficits in the defendants' response to the COVID-19 pandemic at the Jail, findings that were not part of the record in Wilson. The record contains, for example, evidence that officials altered their practices for the sole purpose of an inspection of the Jail only to return to unsafe practices when the inspection concluded. It also reveals that inmates are unable to use disinfectant in their bunks and common areas, and that those common areas are rarely—if ever—cleaned. It shows that use of personal protective equipment by Jail officials has been, at best, sporadic, that officials move inmates between cells without regard for whether an inmate is symptomatic, and that there have been completely inadequate medical responses to inmates who do experience symptoms. Most concerningly, the record shows that officials threatened to punish complaining inmates by transferring them to areas of the Jail that are infested with COVID-19. Wilson, like all Eighth Amendment cases, required a detailed examination of a distinct factual record. I do not view the result of that examination as dispositive of our inquiry here. Moreover, the pretrial detainees at the Jail bring their claims under the Fourteenth Amendment, and, as such, I am not convinced that they must satisfy the deliberate indifference standard that doomed the petitioners' Eighth Amendment claims in Wilson. See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015); see also J.H. v. Williamson Cty., 591 F.3d 709, 717 (6th Cir. 2020) (citing Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 535, 538–39 (1979)).")

J.H. v. Williamson County, Tennessee, 951 F.3d 709, 716-20 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Because we can answer the qualified immunity questions in any order, . . . we begin with the question of whether McMahan violated a constitutional right and then turn to whether that right was clearly established. . . . Under Bell, a pretrial detainee can demonstrate that he was subjected to unconstitutional punishment in either of two ways: (1) by showing 'an expressed intent to punish on the part of the detention facility officials,' or (2) by showing that a restriction or condition is not rationally related to a legitimate government objective or is excessive in relation to that purpose. Id. at 538–39, 99 S.Ct. 1861; see also Kingsley v. Hendrickson, —— U.S. ——, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2473, 192 L.Ed.2d 416 (2015). . . .The 'expressed intent to punish' prong proscribes an intent to punish for the alleged crime causing incarceration prior to an adjudication of guilt. . . It also prohibits officials from subjectively seeking to punish detainees simply because they are detainees, . . or on the basis of vengeful or other illegitimate interests[.]. . This prong does not, however, categorically prohibit discipline imposed by jail officials for infractions committed while in pretrial detention. . . Here, J.H. alleges that he was placed in solitary confinement in direct response to the November 17 disciplinary incident. This alleged action, without more, does not run afoul of the first prong of Bell. The relevant question is thus under Bell's second prong: whether J.H.'s placement in segregation was 'rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose and whether [it] appear[s] excessive in relation to that purpose.'. . In answering the first part of this question, we agree that McMahan has put forth a legitimate governmental purpose: 'maintain[ing] safety and security in the facility.' . . As the Supreme Court explained in Bell, 'maintaining institutional security and preserving internal order and discipline are essential goals' of a detention facility. . .Temporary placement of J.H. in solitary confinement, given his accused disciplinary infraction, appears rationally related to this purpose. Yet where McMahan's argument falters is on the question of whether the discipline here was excessive. . . . In considering whether the discipline imposed on J.H. was excessive, we are mindful of J.H.'s age; his known mental health issues; and the duration and nature of his confinement. We weigh these factors against the disciplinary infraction of which J.H. was accused and the governmental purpose for which the discipline was imposed. When considering 'the totality of [these] circumstances,' we conclude that the discipline imposed was excessive relative to its purpose and thus violated J.H.'s Fourteenth Amendment rights as described in Bell. . . . As a 14-year-old, J.H. was uniquely vulnerable to the harmful effects of solitary confinement, and thus his placement in segregation was a particularly harsh form of discipline. Second, it was well-known to McMahan before placing J.H. in solitary confinement that J.H. had been diagnosed with and required treatment for PANDAS, which is associated with several psychiatric symptoms. . . . In sum, considering J.H.'s age, mental health, and the duration and nature of his confinement, we conclude that the punishment imposed on J.H. was excessive. When weighing the penalty imposed against his disciplinary infraction—in which he made verbal threats but did not physically injure another detainee—it is apparent that his punishment was disproportionate in light of the stated purpose of maintaining institutional security. . . Any momentary need to separate J.H. from the specific detainees whom he had threatened on November 17 does not justify the extended duration in which McMahan subjected J.H. to solitary confinement and completely isolated him from all contact with other juveniles. This discipline was excessive given the infraction that J.H. was accused of and the unique vulnerabilities he possessed—namely his age and mental health status. . . We therefore hold that, assuming J.H.'s allegations to be true, his Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights were violated when he was held in solitary confinement from November 17 to December 8, 2013. . . . The second question is whether the constitutional right in question was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . .We cannot say that the right at issue was established with sufficient specificity as to hold it clearly established as of 2013, the time of these incidents. Many of the cases recognizing what a punishing experience placement in solitary confinement can be—especially for juveniles and those with mental health issues—have been issued after 2013. Thus, McMahan is entitled to qualified immunity, and we are obliged to affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment on this claim.")

J.H. v. Williamson County, Tennessee, 951 F.3d 709, 722-23 (6th Cir. 2020) ("To prove deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, J.H. must 'demonstrate both: (1) the existence of a "sufficiently serious' medical need; and (2) that defendants 'perceived facts from which to infer substantial risk to the prisoner, that [they] did in fact draw the inference, and that [they] then disregarded that risk."' [citing Hopper v. Plummer, 887 F.3d 744, 756 (6th Cir. 2018)]")

Martin v. Warren County, Kentucky, 799 F. App'x 329, ___ & n.4 (6th Cir. 2020) ("An amicus brief was filed by the Roderick and Solange MacArthur Justice Center, addressing the proper standard for deliberate-indifference claims brought by pretrial detainees in the wake of Kingsley. . . .As our precedent stands, we analyze pretrial detainees' Fourteenth Amendment claims of deliberate indifference under the same framework for deliberate-indifference claims brought by prisoners pursuant to the Eighth Amendment, including claims of inadequate medical care. . . .On appeal, Martin argues that the district court applied the wrong standard to her deliberate-indifference claims in light of Kingsley, but she does not meet her burden at summary judgment for reasons that do not depend on the standard for evaluating pretrial detainees' deliberate-indifference claims. . . . Martin argues that Kingsley requires an objective reasonableness standard. . . In Kingsley, the Court held that a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claim was governed by an objective standard, specifically objective reasonableness. . . Whether an objective standard applies to pretrial detainee claims of deliberate indifference and what the standard entails are open questions, though we have noted that Kingsley 'calls into serious doubt' the application of the subjective component of the deliberate-indifference test usually applied to pretrial detainees' claims. Richmond v. Huq, 885 F.3d 928, 938 n.3 (6th Cir. 2018). But see Winkler, 893 F.3d at 890 (failing to address Kingsley). Whatever Kingsley requires, it is more than negligence. . . Because Martin at best shows negligent conduct when she does not otherwise fail to make a showing of causation, we leave the Kingsley question for another day.")

Baker-Schneider v. Napoleon, 769 F. App'x 189, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("The Supreme Court has held that a prison official violates the Eighth Amendment when he acts with 'deliberate indifference' to an inmate's 'serious medical needs.'. . Of course, Schneider was a pretrial detainee, not a prisoner, but that distinction is immaterial here because the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause extends the same protections to pretrial detainees as the Eighth Amendment does to prisoners. . . . Because the record contains no evidence that Schneider showed before Huq a strong likelihood that he would commit suicide, nor evidence that Huq disregarded that risk, we conclude as a matter of law that Huq is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Winkler v. Madison County, 893 F.3d 877, 890-91 (6th Cir. 2018) ("'The Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment generally provides the basis to assert a § 1983 claim of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, but where that claim is asserted on behalf of a pre-trial detainee, the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment is the proper starting point.'. . 'There are two parts to the claim, one objective, one subjective. For the objective component, the detainee must demonstrate the existence of a sufficiently serious medical need.'. . There is no question that Hacker's perforated duodenal ulcer, which ultimately caused his death, met this objective component. . . 'For the subjective component, the detainee must demonstrate that the defendant possessed a sufficiently culpable state of mind in denying medical care.'. . A defendant has a sufficiently culpable state of mind if he 'knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate health or safety.'. . This means that 'the official must both be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and he must also draw the inference.'. . A plaintiff need not show that the defendant acted with the very purpose of causing harm, but must show something greater than negligence or malpractice.")

Hanson v. Madison County Det. Ctr., No. 17-5209, 2018 WL 2324252, at *5 n. 4 (6th Cir. May 22, 2018) (unreported) ("In Kingsley, Justice Alito noted in dissent that 'whether a pretrial detainee can bring a Fourth Amendment claim based on the use of excessive force by a detention facility employee' remains an open question. Kingsley, 135 S. Ct. at 2472 (Alito, J., dissenting) (citing Graham, 490 U.S. at 395 n.10). But it is not an open question in the Sixth Circuit. See Aldini v. Johnson, 609 F.3d 858, 865 (6th Cir. 2010).")

Hopper v. Plummer, 887 F.3d 744, 756 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Defendants argue they are also entitled to qualified immunity on plaintiff's deliberate-indifference claim. We analyze a Fourteenth Amendment claim for deliberate indifference to a serious medical need 'under the same rubric as Eighth Amendment claims brought by prisoners.' Villegas v. Metro. Gov't of Nashville, 709 F.3d 563, 568 (6th Cir. 2013). Proving deliberate indifference requires that plaintiff demonstrate both: (1) the existence of a "sufficiently serious" medical need; and (2) that defendants 'perceived facts from which to infer substantial risk to the prisoner, that he did in fact draw the inference, and that he then disregarded that risk.'")

Richmond v. Huq, 885 F.3d 928, 937-38 & n.3 (6th Cir. 2018) ("This Court has historically analyzed Fourteenth Amendment pretrial detainee claims and Eighth Amendment prisoner claims 'under the same rubric.' Villegas v. Metro. Gov't of Nashville, 709 F.3d 563, 568 (6th Cir. 2013). '[A] prisoner's Eighth Amendment right is violated when prison doctors or officials are deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's serious medical needs.'. . .The Supreme Court in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, __ U.S. __, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), held that a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim need only meet the objective component by showing that 'the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.'. . This Court has not yet considered whether Kingsley similarly abrogates the subjective intent requirement of a Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim. Several of our sister courts have and are split. Compare Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 34-35 (2d Cir. 2017) (holding that the "subjective prong" of a claim of deliberate indifference to conditions of confinement under the Fourteenth Amendment must be "defined objectively" in light of Kingsley) and Castro v. Cty. of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1070 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc), cert. denied sub nom. Los Angeles Cty. v. Castro, 137 S. Ct. 831 (2017) (interpreting Kingsley to mean that a failure-to-protect claim brought by a pretrial detainee under the Fourteenth Amendment does not include a subjective intent element), with Alderson v. Concordia Par. Corr. Facility, 848 F.3d 415, 419 n.4 (5th Cir. 2017) (finding that because the Fifth Circuit continued "to apply a subjective standard [in failure-to-protect claims] post-Kingsley, this panel is bound by our rule of orderliness"). We find no circuit applying Kingsley specifically to a deliberate indifference to a detainee's serious medical needs claim. But see Alderson, 848 F.3d at 424-45 (Graves, J., specially concurring in part) (calling into question whether that court should have reconsidered the deliberate indifference standard in light of Kingsley). Yet, neither party cites Kingsley or addresses its potential effect in their briefing. Nonetheless, we recognize that this shift in Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference jurisprudence calls into serious doubt whether Richmond need even show that the individual defendant-officials were subjectively aware of her serious medical conditions and nonetheless wantonly disregarded them.")

Bays v. Montmorency Cty., 874 F.3d 264, 268-70 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment when they act with 'deliberate indifference' to the 'serious medical needs' of inmates committed to their charge. . . The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment provides the same guarantee to pretrial detainees. . . Two inquiries loom over every deliberate indifference case: Was the ailment a serious one? And was the official 'subjective[ly] reckless[ ],' such that she was actually 'aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exist[ed], and ... also [drew] the inference'? . . . . Sigler adds that nothing in the record shows that she subjectively knew, then disregarded, that Shane was at risk of suicide. But the relevant question is not whether Sigler recognized that Shane might kill himself. It is whether Sigler recognized that Shane was suffering from a serious mental illness creating a host of risks and requiring immediate treatment during the fourteen days that Sigler treated him. . . Sigler argues that while she may have committed malpractice, her conduct was not deliberately indifferent to Shane's plight. If a prison medical official provides treatment, it is true, constitutional liability attaches only if the treatment is 'so cursory as to amount to a conscious disregard for [the inmate's] needs.'. . Taking the Bays' allegations as true, Sigler's care fell below this admittedly low bar. She scheduled an appointment weeks in the future despite symptoms that she, Nurse Pilarski, and the Bays' expert now all agree required immediate or near-immediate care. Yes, she eventually did try to schedule an earlier appointment. But the sum total of her efforts were two phone calls and a message, all while she had the option of getting immediate emergency room treatment or at least putting him on a watch list, and yet she chose to do neither. Sigler looks to Taylor v. Burkes, which held that inmates have no clearly established right to the proper implementation of suicide prevention procedures. . . But the Bays do not argue that Sigler violated Shane's right to procedures that might have prevented his suicide. They argue that Sigler violated Shane's right to have a serious psychological illness treated seriously. And that right is clearly established.")

Kulpa for Kulpa v. Cantea, 708 F. App'x 846, ___ (6th Cir. 2017) ("Cantea argues that even if his conduct was objectively unreasonable, the law's contours were not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation with respect to the restraint of pretrial detainees. The gist of his argument is that because the events in this case took place before the Supreme Court adopted the objective reasonableness standard in Kingsley, no clearly established law barred unreasonable force against pretrial detainees. At the time of Kulpa's death in October 2011, we evaluated a pretrial detainee's excessive-force claim by asking 'whether the force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'. . . Our pre-Kingsley caselaw put Cantea on notice 'that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Champion, decided seven years before Kulpa's death, clearly articulated that driving heavy pressure into a prone, handcuffed, incapacitated detainee's back was constitutionally impermissible because it posed a serious risk of asphyxiation to the arrestee and was unnecessary to protect the officers. . . . Although Champion arose in the context of an arrest, the conduct at issue, the risk of death to the detainee, and the minimal threat posed by a bound and incapacitated detainee to officer safety is the same in a pretrial detention center. Furthermore, it was clearly established in 2011 that 'pretrial detainees had a clearly established right not to be gratuitously assaulted while fully restrained and subdued.'. . Cantea argues that—notwithstanding Champion's clear admonition about this precise conduct—the law permitted him to plant significant weight into a prone, handcuffed detainee's back so long as he lacked malicious intent. For the reasons explained above, however, sufficient evidence exists that Cantea acted with malicious intent, given the extent of Kulpa's injury, the minimal threat Kulpa posed to officer safety, and Cantea's application of unnecessary force. In addition, as the Seventh Circuit recently explained, to buy Cantea's argument 'we would have to accept the dubious proposition that, at the time the officers acted, they were on notice only that they could not have a reckless or malicious intent and that, as long as they acted without such an intent, they could apply any degree of force they chose.' Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 833 (7th Cir. 2015). As we have noted, however, the law clearly established that the 'amount of force that was used' must be roughly proportionate to the 'need for the application of force.'").

Evans v. Plummer, No. 16-3826, 2017 WL 1400495, at *4 (6th Cir. Apr. 19, 2017) (not reported) ("We apply the Fourth Amendment's 'objective reasonableness' test to allegations that government officials used excessive force during the booking process, not the Fourteenth Amendment's 'shocks the conscience' test or the Eighth Amendment's 'cruel and unusual punishment' test. Burgess v. Fischer, 735 F.3d 462, 472–73 (6th Cir. 2013). The Supreme Court recently approved of this approach by 'adopt[ing] a bright line rule that "a pretrial detainee must show only that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable."' Morabito v. Holmes, 628 F. App'x 353, 357 (6th Cir. 2015) (quoting Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015)). In assessing objective reasonableness, we look 'to the reasonableness of the force in light of the totality of the circumstances confronting the defendants, and not to the underlying intent or motivation of the defendants.' Burgess, 735 F.3d at 472; see Kingsley, 135 S. Ct. at 2475–76 (rejecting a subjective standard).")

Guy v. Nashville, No. 16-6100, 2017 WL 1476896, at *3–4 (6th Cir. Apr. 25, 2017) (not reported) ("Taking a different tack on appeal, Romines argues that this right was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. Although this argument was not made in the district court, we exercise our discretion to consider the issue because it is a legal question within our jurisdiction and resolution of the defendant's asserted qualified-immunity defense would further the progress of the litigation. . . The essence of this argument is that the use of force in this case occurred prior to the Supreme Court's adoption of the objective reasonableness standard in Kingsley. It is true that there was disagreement among the circuits prior to Kingsley about whether a claim of excessive force 'brought by a pretrial detainee must satisfy the subjective standard or only the objective standard.'. . But, a defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity 'simply because the courts have not 'agreed upon the precise formulation of the [applicable] standard.' Harris v. City of Circleville, 583 F.3d 356, 367 (6th Cir. 2009) (alteration in original) (quoting Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 202-03 (2001)). Rather, the question under the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis 'is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Although there need not be a case directly on point, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . The right must not be defined at a 'high level of generality,' and the 'dispositive question is "whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established."'. . . At the time of the use-of-force incident in September 2013, this court applied analogous standards to excessive-force claims brought under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . That is, under either amendment the question was whether the use of force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing harm. . . The force need not have been absolutely necessary, but we asked in Griffin 'whether the use of force could plausibly have been thought necessary.'. . In Griffin, this court held that the prison officials' use of a leg-sweep maneuver to gain control over a pretrial detainee who created a disturbance, resisted being moved, and struggled as two officers tried to guide her away from a nurse's station did not violate this standard. . . In Williams, prison officials used a chemical agent and assault team on an inmate who was ordered to 'pack up' his cell and responded by asking, 'What for, sir?' Williams v. Curtin, 631 F.3d 380, 384 (6th Cir. 2011). We concluded in Williams that the facts, if true, could permit a finding that the use of force was unnecessary, was not applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, and was possibly motivated by malicious purpose. . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, we conclude that a reasonable officer would have been on notice in September 2013 that use of a chemical agent on a non-threatening pretrial detainee who did not comply with the officer's verbal orders and then passively resisted an open-handed escort by hesitating and stopping to turn to ask again about seeing a nurse would amount to constitutionally excessive force. The denial of qualified immunity with respect to this claim was not error.")

Nallani v. Wayne County, 665 F. App'x 498, 506 (6th Cir. 2016) (In medical needs case, Court notes that "[W]e have held consistently that pretrial detainees 'are ... entitled to the same Eighth Amendment rights as other inmates.' Thompson v. Cty. of Medina, 29 F.3d 238, 242 (6th Cir. 1994). 'The analysis set forth in Farmer, although rooted in the Eighth Amendment, therefore applies with equal force to a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment claims.'")

Morabito v. Holmes, 628 F. App'x 353, 356-58 (6th Cir. 2015) (applying the objective reasonableness standard to pretrial detainee's excessive force claims and deliberate indifference standard to medical needs claim)

Richko v. Wayne Cty., Mich., 819 F.3d 907, 915-16, 919-20 (6th Cir. 2016) ("We begin by clarifying the specific source of the constitutional right to be free from inmate-on-inmate violence. In denying the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the district court appears to have based its holding solely on the Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. . . . But the Eighth Amendment applies only to those individuals who have been tried, convicted, and sentenced. . . Pretrial detainees like Horvath, on the other hand, are protected by the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . .But such a misstatement by the district court is inconsequential because this court has made clear that, under the Fourteenth Amendment, pretrial detainees are 'entitled to the same Eighth Amendment rights as other inmates.' . . . . . Applying the above analysis to the present case, Richko had the burden of presenting evidence from which a reasonable juror could conclude that the individual defendants were deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of serious harm to Horvath and that they disregarded that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to protect him. . . . Viewing the present case in the abstract, the risk to Horvath of being housed with and attacked by an inmate who had recently been arrested for violent assault and had a history of serious mental illness was sufficient to fulfill the objective component of this analysis. Because the analysis of the facts below establishes, for the purpose of overcoming the defendants' motion for summary judgment, that Richko has satisfied the subjective component of Farmer's test, the objective component is likewise satisfied based on the same factual analysis. . . . Construing the facts in the light most favorable to Richko, a reasonable juror could infer that Stinson heard the banging, yelling, and pounding from the duty station, that he simply chose not to respond, and that he further delayed responding for 10 minutes even after being notified by Nurse Williams that Horvath was missing. All of Stinson's arguments are thus best left to a jury, which will be tasked with weighing the evidence presented by Stinson against that proffered by Richko. We therefore conclude that the district court properly denied Stinson's motion for summary judgment that was based on his claim of qualified immunity.")

Coley v. Lucas Cnty., Ohio, 799 F.3d 530, 537-38 (6th Cir. 2015) ("When a free citizen claims that a government actor used excessive force during the process of an arrest, seizure, or investigatory stop, we perform a Fourth Amendment inquiry into what was objectively 'reasonable' under the circumstances. . . These Fourth Amendment protections extend through police booking until the completion of a probable cause hearing. Aldini v. Johnson, 609 F.3d 858, 866–67 (6th Cir.2010). When convicted prisoners bring claims of excessive force, we turn to the Eighth Amendment, which forbids the 'unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain' that constitutes 'cruel and unusual punishment,' and specifically conduct that is malicious and sadistic. . . .Until very recently, it was unclear which standard applied to excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees. The Supreme Court has recently clarified, however, that when assessing pretrial detainees' excessive force claims we must inquire into whether the plaintiff shows 'that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.' [citing Kingsley] The inquiry is highly fact-dependent, and must take into account the 'perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, including what the officer knew at the time, not with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . It should also account for 'the "legitimate interests that stem from [the government's] need to manage the facility in which the individual is detained,"'. . . and defer when appropriate to '"policies and practices that in th[e] judgment" of jail officials "are needed to preserve internal order and discipline and to maintain institutional security."'. . .In light of this Fourteenth Amendment standard and the facts alleged in the complaint, Plaintiffs' excessive force claims should proceed. The alleged conduct of Schmeltz and Gray was knowing or purposeful and 'objectively unreasonable,' and each used force that 'amount[ed] to punishment' of Benton. . . Taking into account all of the circumstances of that day, including the legitimate interests of law enforcement in preserving order and discipline, the allegations that Schmeltz and Gray inflicted gratuitous pain on Benton while he was handcuffed, culminating in his death, establish valid claims that both officers violated Benton's Fourteenth Amendment rights.")

Clay v. Emmi, 797 F.3d 364, 369-70 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Officer Emmi argues that the district court mistakenly applied the Fourth Amendment's objective use of force standard to this case rather than the Fourteenth Amendment's subjective use of force standard. Following the parties' briefing on appeal, the Supreme Court rendered this issue purely academic in Kingsley v. Hendrickson by holding that a pretrial detainee's excessive force claim brought under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause is subject to the same objective standard as an excessive force claim brought under the Fourth Amendment. 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015). In light of Kingsley, under either amendment, the court would employ the same objective test for excessive force. . . The district court's application of the Fourth Amendment rather than the Fourteenth Amendment, moreover, is warranted based on the facts in this record. The Fourth Amendment applies to the seizure of individuals due to mental health concerns, Ziegler v. Aukerman, 512 F.3d 777, 783–84 (6th Cir.2008), and to excessive force claims alleged within the context of that seizure, Monday v. Oullette, 118 F.3d 1099, 1104 (6th Cir.1997). As with pretrial detainees, once a plaintiff finds himself in ongoing state custody after an initial mental health seizure, his excessive force claims generally. . . fall under the Fourteenth Amendment rather than the Fourth Amendment. Lanman v. Hinson, 529 F.3d 673, 683 (6th Cir.2008). Here, there is no indication that Clay was seized before he refused to put on the dressing gown because he voluntarily rode to the hospital to 'talk to somebody' and was not restrained. . . . Under the Fourth Amendment—and since Kingsley, also the Fourteenth Amendment—the test for whether officers' use of force violated the Constitution is 'whether the officers' actions are "objectively reasonable" in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them, without regard to their underlying intent or motivation.'. . Among the factors to be considered are whether the person being seized 'poses an immediate threat to the safety of officers or others' and 'whether he is actively resisting.'")

Berrier for Estate of Trowbridge . Lake County, Ohio, No. 1:22 CV 813, 2024 WL 4591816, at *8 (N.D. Ohio Oct. 28, 2024) ("When determining whether an defendant had fair notice that their conduct was unlawful, the court must consider 'the law at the time of the conduct.'. . The conduct that gave rise to this action occurred in June of 2020, which was before the 2021 Brawner decision changed the test for deliberate indifference to the medical needs of a pretrial detainee. . . The only clearly established law at the time of the conduct was established by Farmer, which held that a defendant could only be liable for deliberate indifference to the medical needs of a detainee if they were subjectively aware of facts that established a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate and the defendant actually concluded that the risk existed. . . It would not have been enough, under the standard in existence at the time of the conduct, that the defendants acted recklessly. . . . Plaintiff has failed to meet their burden of establishing that withholding Ms. Trowbridge's Suboxone prescription violated a sufficiently particularized constitutional right that was clearly established in June of 2020. They point to no cases prior to June of 2020 that have found officials could be held to be deliberately indifferent to medical needs when the inmate had neither complained of nor outwardly exhibited any associated symptoms or signs of serious risk. Further, Plaintiff has not pointed to any case law that would have clearly informed a reasonable official that allowing an inmate to go through withdrawal, without Suboxone, but with the support of comfort medications when necessary, constitutes deliberate indifference, absent manifestation of some specific symptom or serious condition that arises during that process.")

Smallwood v. Highland County Sheriff, No. 1:24-CV-76, 2024 WL 4302354, at *2–3 (S.D. Ohio Sept. 26, 2024) ("The undersigned finds it necessary to write further to clarify the constitutional underpinnings of Claim 3 - the denial or delay of medical care claim. . . Plaintiff originally articulated Claim 3 as the '[d]enial or delay of medical treatment' by two jail employees for 'a serious medical need for a life threatening injury' that he experienced shortly after his arrest and detention at the Highland County Jail. . . The complaint relates that Plaintiff was arrested for a probation violation on February 8, 2022. . . Previously, the undersigned assumed without discussion that, as a convicted individual accused of a probation violation, Plaintiff's claims of 'cruel and unusual punishment,' (Claim 2) and of deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs, (Claim 3), arose under the Eighth Amendment. Consistent with that analysis, Plaintiff's most recent 'Addendum' repeatedly refers to the standards of the Eighth Amendment. . . But in considering Plaintiff's construed motion to supplement his complaint, the undersigned reconsiders a threshold question of whether Plaintiff was a pretrial detainee or a convicted prisoner at the time his claims arose. The answer to that determination impacts the constitutional analysis. The Eighth Amendment applies only to convicted prisoners, not to pretrial detainees. The claims of a pretrial detainee are reviewed under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Sixth Circuit has never explicitly decided whether someone detained for a probation violation is a pretrial detainee or convicted prisoner, and courts across the country have grappled with the difficulty of this question. [collecting cases] Until recently, the referenced threshold question was of little import. That is because for many years, the Sixth Circuit analyzed both Eighth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment 'deliberate indifference' claims under the same two-part test, requiring a plaintiff to show both an objective component (a medical need that was 'sufficiently serious') and a subjective component (that the official knew of and disregarded an excessive risk to inmate health or safety). But in Brawner v. Scott Cnty., Tennessee, 14 F.4th 585, 596 (6th Cir. 2021), the Sixth Circuit joined the Second, Seventh and Ninth Circuits in holding that Kingsley . . . requires modification of the 'subjective' standard for a deliberate indifference claim brought by a pretrial detainee. Brawner reasoned that instead of the higher standard akin to 'criminal recklessness' adopted in Farmer for Eighth Amendment claims, a lower 'civil recklessness' standard should apply for Fourteenth Amendment claims. . . Thus, whether Plaintiff was a convicted prisoner or merely a pretrial detainee at the time of the events in question significantly impacts the constitutional analysis. . . Considering this issue, the undersigned finds the reasoning of Bond v. Moore to be highly persuasive. In short, absent controlling authority, Plaintiff will be considered to be a pretrial detainee at the time of the events in question. See Bond v. Moore, 672 F. Supp.3d at 369 (concluding that an arrestee on a probation violation is a pretrial detainee, discussing unpublished Sixth Circuit cases and similarly persuasive authority); Jones v. Kenton Cnty., Kentucky, No.2:23-cv-164-DCR, 2024 WL 1705210 at *3-4 (E.D .Ky. Apr. 19, 2024) (same); but contrast Peterson v. Heinen, 89 F.4th 628, 635 (8th Cir. 2023). The references in Plaintiff's Addendum to the Eighth Amendment do not alter the undersigned's conclusion on this issue, because those references merely parrot the Court's prior assumption that the Eighth Amendment applied. Accordingly, Defendants should formulate any response to Plaintiff's construed motion to supplement Claim 3 as if pleaded as a violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.")

Thomas v. S. Health Partners, Inc., No. 221CV012WOBCJS, 2023 WL 3935047, at *6 (E.D. Ky. June 9, 2023) ("Thomas was incarcerated for a probation violation subsequent to previous convictions and for new charges of possessing methamphetamine and drug paraphernalia. . . Although it is clear that Thomas was a pretrial detainee with respect to her new charges, courts have struggled to decide whether a plaintiff's suspected probation violation makes them a pretrial detainee or a convicted prisoner. See, e.g., Green v. Taylor, No. 1:22-CV-1007, 2023 WL 415502, at *4 n.2 (W.D. Mich. Jan. 26, 2023) (collecting cases); Johnson v. NaphCare, Inc., No. 3:19-CV-054, 2022 WL 306981, at *13 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 2, 2022) (collecting cases); Walker v. S. Health Partners, 576 F. Supp. 3d 516, 538–39 (E.D. Ky. 2021) (applying the Fourteenth Amendment because the defendants had not argued that the more stringent Eighth Amendment approach should apply). It does not appear that the Sixth Circuit has directly addressed the issue. . . and the parties have applied both tests in their analyses. . .Thomas's classification is further complicated by the fact that she stipulated to violating the terms of her probation at a hearing on February 18, 2020. . . Accordingly, to the extent Thomas was a 'pretrial detainee' during the pendency of her probation violation proceedings, she likely lost that status upon admitting that violation to the court. . . Other courts in this Circuit have applied both the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment standards where it was unclear whether the plaintiff was a pretrial detainee or a convicted prisoner. . .Accordingly, this Court will also apply both standards. As discussed below, the outcome for each Defendant is the same regardless of which standard is used.")

Bond v. Moore, No. 7:20-CV-20-REW-MAS, 2023 WL 3451208, at *6–7 (E.D. Ky. May 9, 2023) ("The Sixth Circuit has never explicitly decided whether someone detained for a probation violation is a pretrial detainee or convicted prisoner, and courts across the country have grappled with the difficulty of this question. [collecting cases] The Court concludes that Kinney was a pretrial detainee during his stay at PCDC. Though Kinney was previously convicted of robbery charges (hence the existence of a probation period), the alleged offense for which he was jailed was the unresolved probation violation. . . At no point between arriving at PCDC and his death was Kinney's violation adjudicated. In Bell v. Wolfish, the Supreme Court held that 'under the Due Process Clause, a detainee may not be punished prior to an adjudication of guilt in accordance with due process of law.'. . It follows that Kinney should not be treated as a convicted prisoner for an alleged probation violation prior to a guilt determination on that status. . . Relevant case law reinforces this logic and determination. Multiple circuits have applied 'pretrial detainee' status to prisoners arrested for probation violations. [citing cases from 8th, 9th, and 10th Circuits] Sixth Circuit precedent also supports the Court's conclusion. . . These cases, while they do not directly address the question, present examples of the Sixth Circuit classifying persons detained for unadjudicated conduct as pretrial detainees and, therefore, bolster the conclusion that Kinney should be analyzed as such. Further, the Sixth Circuit routinely treats jailed arrestees as pretrial detainees protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. . . While individuals jailed for unadjudicated probation violations have been 'tried, convicted, and sentenced' of the underlying offense giving rise to a probation period, they have not been tried, convicted, or sentenced, that is, not adjudicated, for the conduct giving rise to the violation of the probation period. Therefore, Kinney is properly categorized as a pretrial detainee.")

Little v. City of Morristown, Tennessee, No. 221CV00047DCLCCRW, 2023 WL 2769633, at *6 & n.7 (E.D. Tenn. Mar. 31, 2023) ("Ultimately, rather than eliminate the subjective prong, the Sixth Circuit 'lower[ed] the subjective component from actual knowledge to recklessness.' Helphenstine v. Lewis Cnty., 60 F.4th 305, 316 (6th Cir. 2023). . . . Although the County Defendants maintain that the Court should employ pre-Brawner law in analyzing Plaintiffs' claims because 'this incident occurred more than a year before Brawner was decided'. . . , Brawner is controlling precedent. . . Pre-Brawner case law, however, is properly examined in conducting the clearly established inquiry for incidents that occurred prior to the Brawner decision. . . Thus, the Court applies the modified subjective standard in analyzing the existence of a constitutional violation but will look to case law in existence prior to the incident at issue to determine if such constitutional right was clearly established.")

Chapple v. Granklin County Sheriff's Officers FCCC 1 & 2, No. 2:21-CV-05086, 2022 WL 16734656, at *4–7 (S.D. Ohio Nov. 7, 2022) ("Conditions of confinement claims are typically scrutinized under the Eighth Amendment, which 'imposes duties on [prison] officials, who must provide humane conditions of confinement[,]...must ensure that inmates receive adequate food, clothing, shelter, and medical care, and must "take reasonable measures to guarantee the safety of the inmates."'. . Of course, Chapple is a pretrial detainee, not a prisoner whose guilt has already been adjudicated, and so he is protected from cruel and unusual punishments by the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, rather than by the Eighth Amendment. . . Although the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause provides protections 'at least as great as' the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause, . . . courts have typically applied the same Eighth Amendment conditions of confinement analysis to claims by pretrial detainees. . . Traditionally, such claims have had an objective and a subjective component, wherein the prisoner or pretrial detainee must show both that 'he is incarcerated under conditions posing a substantial risk of serious harm,'. . . and that the defendants '(1) were "aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists"; (2) actually drew the inference; and (3) consciously disregarded the risk.'. . But, in the aftermath of the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015), the Sixth Circuit held that the traditional subjective prong was no longer appropriate in analyzing claims by pretrial detainees. [citing Brawner v. Scott County] Instead, a pretrial detainee seeking to establish deliberate indifference need not show that 'the officers were subjectively aware their use of force was unreasonable,' but must only prove that 'a defendant...acted deliberately (not accidentally), but also recklessly "in the face of an unjustifiably high risk of harm that is either known or so obvious that it should be known."'. . A pretrial detainee, in other words, must demonstrate 'something akin to reckless disregard,' which is 'more than negligence but less than subjective intent.'. .Of course, a pretrial detainee who seeks to allege a conditions of confinement claim must still demonstrate a sufficiently serious deprivation: that he was denied 'the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities.'. . That prong of the Farmer test has not changed. Whether a deprivation meets the sufficiently serious standard depends on both the severity of the deprivation. . . and the duration. . . . Whether Kingsley requires the modification of the traditional subjective prong of deliberate indifference claims with respect to environmental hazards is unknown, see supra Part III.C, but Chapple's water issue claim falls short under either the subjective or modified standards. There is no doubt that exposure to lead in drinking water would pose a 'substantial risk of serious harm.'. . Chapple has not, however, provided factual allegations, in the Complaint or in his Objections, that any of the defendants either had knowledge about the presence of lead in the FCCC water or should have known about the lead.") Montgomery v. Wellpath Medical, No. 3:19-CV-00675, 2022 WL 3589571, at *5 n.4 (M.D. Tenn. Aug. 22, 2022) ("One Sixth Circuit judge recently noted ongoing intra-circuit confusion in employing Brawner's modification of the deliberate indifference standard under the Fourteenth Amendment: [referencing language from Westmoreland v. Butler Cnty., 35 F.4th 1051, 1052 (6th Cir. 2022) (Bush, J., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc).] While questions may remain as to how Brawner applies in particular factual contexts, there is no question that Brawner is binding precedent and must be applied to deliberate indifference claims brought under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . The Court will therefore apply the Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference standard as articulated in Brawner and adopted in Greene to Montgomery's claims.")

Brown v. Clark, No. 3:22-CV-21-BJB, 2022 WL 3355805, at *2–3 (W.D. Ky. Aug. 12, 2022) ("In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, . . . the Supreme Court held that a Fourteenth (rather than Eighth) Amendment excessive-force claim by a pretrial detainee needn't establish that the officer was subjectively aware that the use of force was unreasonable. Did that decision also jettison the subjective-intent element for all Fourteenth Amendment deliberate-indifference claims brought by pretrial detainees in other contexts? The courts are deeply split on this question. See Westmoreland v. Butler County, 29 F.4th 721, 727 (6th Cir. 2022) (gathering cases). The Sixth Circuit recently decided that the Supreme Court indeed replaced the former test with an objective inquiry that asks whether an official 'acted deliberately (not accidentally) and "recklessly in the face of an unjustifiably high risk of harm that is either known or so obvious that it should be known."'. . This reckless-disregard standard is still higher than negligence, but lower than criminal recklessness; like civil recklessness, the official doesn't have to actually be aware of the harm. . . This difference, however, should rarely matter in the Covid context: what prison official has been hiding under a rock since March 2020 and remains unaware of the risks Covid poses to prisoners? . . . Instead, the analysis turns on whether the officials responded to that risk in an objectively reasonable manner. . . Officials may have acted reasonably even if the harm later materializes and more effective approaches were available. . . . Under pandemic circumstances, however, does denying a vaccine amount to 'deliberate indifference'? That is a difficult standard to meet in the prison context, even under Kingsley's modified standard. . . Courts of appeals have repeatedly declined to conclude that prison officials' responses to the risks of Covid were deliberately indifferent—even if the case numbers are high and the officials could have done more. . . This is partially because courts shouldn't make a habit of second-guessing prison administrators, especially in their handling of an evolving public health crisis.")

Prince v. Scioto County Common Pleas Court, No. 1:20-CV-652, 2022 WL 1569868, at *5 (S.D. Ohio May 18, 2022) ("Each Defendant's 'liability must be assessed individually based on his own actions.'. . To prove his claim, Plaintiff must present evidence from which a reasonable jury could find that each Defendant had notice of his medical need and took some action that 'was intentional (not accidental)' and 'either (a) acted intentionally to ignore [the] serious medical need, or (b) recklessly failed to act reasonably to mitigate the risk the serious medical need posed to [Plaintiff], even though a reasonable official… would have known that the serious medical need posed an excessive risk to [Plaintiff's] health or safety.' Brawner, 14 F.4th at 597. On the record presented, the evidence unequivocally demonstrates that the individuals' actions were reasonable, while Plaintiff has utterly failed to present evidence that could overcome their assertions of qualified immunity. Even if a reviewing court were to decide that issue differently, any such right was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. This is true even if this Court considers the new deliberate indifference standard applicable in the Sixth Circuit under the Due Process Clause. In short, no genuine issues of material fact remain and Defendants are entitled to judgment as a matter of law even if the lower standard applies.")

Walker v. Southern Health Parners, No. CV 5:20-397-DCR, 2021 WL 5988359, at *13–14 (E.D. Ky. Dec. 17, 2021) ("In Brawner v. Scott Cnty., Tenn., the Sixth Circuit extended Kingsley to deliberate-indifference claims, concluding that it is inappropriate to apply the same test to cases involving pretrial detainees and convicted prisoners. . . In clarifying what is required to establish deliberate indifference to a serious medical need in light of Kingsley, the court stated that '[m]ere negligence is insufficient.' Further, the court determined, '[a] defendant must have not only acted deliberately (not accidentally), but also recklessly 'in the face of an unjustifiably high risk of harm that is either known or so obvious that it should be known.'". . The Brawner court set out the following elements: (1) an objectively serious medical need; and (2) that the defendant's action (or lack of action) was intentional (not accidental) and the defendant either (a) acted intentionally to ignore the plaintiff's serious medical need, or (b) recklessly failed to act reasonably to mitigate the risk the serious medical need posed to the plaintiff, even though a reasonable official in the defendant's position would have known that the serious medical need posed an excessive risk to the plaintiff's health or safety. . . Of course Brawner only applies if Walker is considered a pretrial detainee. Courts have struggled with the question of whether a prisoner detained for a suspected probation violation is a pretrial detainee. . . And it does not appear that the Sixth Circuit has directly addressed the issue. But see Ford v. Grand Traverse Cnty., 2005 WL 2572025, at *1 n.1 (W.D. Mich. Oct. 12, 2005) (concluding that defendant being held for suspected parole violation was imprisoned in connection with a convicted offense and, therefore, was not a pretrial detainee). Because the defendants have not made any effort to argue that the more stringent approach under the Eighth Amendment should apply, the Court will apply the test announced in Brawner.")

Huntley v. Fuller, No. 1:21-CV-350, 2021 WL 4621777, at *5–6 (W.D. Mich. Oct. 7, 2021) ("[I]n Brawner v. Scott Cnty., ___ F.4th ___, 2021 WL 4304754 (6th Cir. Sept. 22, 2021), in a published decision, the Sixth Circuit considered if and how Kingsley applied in a case involving allegations of inadequate medical care for a pretrial detainee. The court held that Kingsley required a modification of the deliberate-indifference standard for pretrial detainees, because the deliberate-indifference standard flowed from the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishments. . . In applying Kingsley, however, the Sixth Circuit did not impose a strictly objective test for conditions-of-confinement claims; it modified the subjective component of the test. The court held that, as with Eighth Amendment claims, negligence is not enough. . . Instead, a recklessness standard applies. . . Nevertheless, that recklessness standard is different than the recklessness standard observed in Eighth Amendment cases, which is taken from the criminal law and applies '"only when a person disregards a risk of harm of which he is aware."'. . In contrast, in Fourteenth Amendment claims by pretrial detainees, the court adopted the civil recklessness standard observed by the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits. . . . In other words, recklessness under the Fourteenth Amendment's substantive due process standard exists where a defendant disregards a risk of which he is aware or should have been aware—a 'knew or should have known' standard of disregard. . . . In the instant case, Plaintiff utterly fails to allege that he faced a serious risk to his health or safety. He merely had to remain in segregation for a few extra days. Plaintiff makes no allegations that the conditions of segregation placed him at any risk, much less a serious risk, to his health or safety; indeed, he makes no factual allegations about the conditions in the segregation unit. He therefore fails to meet the objective component of the Fourteenth Amendment standard. Moreover, given that failure, Plaintiff cannot demonstrate that any reasonable prison official knew or should have known that Plaintiff faced an excessive risk to his health or safety, yet failed to act. Plaintiff's claim therefore fails on the subjective prong as well. Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment claim, properly construed as a substantive due process claim, therefore will be dismissed for failure to state a claim.")

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Pittman by and through Hamilton v. Madison County, Illinois (Pittman IV), 108 F.4th 561, 566, 569-74 (7th Cir. 2024), pet. for cert. filed, No. 24-572 (U.S. Nov. 19, 2024) ("Over Pittman's objection, the district court instructed the jury in line with our ruling in Pittman III, using materially identical language to that which we approved in Pittman III. The jury returned a verdict for defendants, and this appeal followed. . . . We have canvassed these post-Kingsley decisions in order to reveal the tension, if not inconsistency, in our case law. Miranda and Pittman III can be read as requiring pretrial detainees alleging inadequate medical care claims to prove defendants' subjective awareness of the risk of harm. . . Yet in Kemp and Thomas we retreated from any such requirement in evaluating the requirements for failure-to-protect claims. . . The confusion and discrepancy arise from our interpretation of Kingsley's first state-of-mind inquiry: 'the defendant's state of mind with respect to his physical acts.'. . Pittman III, and to a lesser extent Miranda, conceptualize this inquiry as requiring proof of both intentional physical action and awareness of the consequences of that action. . . Under this interpretation, a defendant must subjectively know the consequences of their action or inaction to act purposefully, knowingly, or recklessly. On the other hand, our failure-to-protect cases perceive the first inquiry as a lower bar, requiring proof only that a defendant 'intended to carry out a certain course of actions.'. . In these cases, once a defendant deliberately acts, their awareness of the risk of harm, or lack thereof, goes only to objective reasonableness. . . We owe it to our case law and litigants alike to resolve this confusion. Given the volume and importance of § 1983 pretrial detainee litigation, now is the time to resolve any inconsistency within our case law. The circumstance before us is one of our own making, as we (like many other courts) have struggled to implement Kingsley's standards outside the context of a pretrial detainee's claim of excessive force. In light of today's clarification of our case law, we circulated this opinion to the full court under Circuit Rule 40(e). No judge in active service requested to hear this case en banc. . . As difficult as it is to acknowledge, we have a hard time squaring Pittman III with our post-Pittman III precedent interpreting and applying Kingsley. With the benefit of multiple cases in multiple contexts requiring application of this Circuit's and our sister circuits' analyses of Kingsley, we are left with the firm conviction that a pretrial detainee in a medical care case need not prove a defendant's subjective awareness of the risk of harm to prevail on a Fourteenth Amendment Due Process claim. To the extent Pittman III concluded otherwise, it is overruled on this particular point. . . . While recognizing our error, we acknowledge the difficulty we faced in Pittman III. This is a very complicated area of law, and in no way are we alone in struggling to discern the appropriate mental state standard for judging pretrial detainees' claims. . . .At the time of Pittman III, few courts had weighed in on these issues. But that has changed.

Several of our fellow circuits now agree that a pretrial detainee does not have to prove a defendant's subjective awareness of a serious risk of harm. [collecting cases] We know of no circuit court that has reached a contrary conclusion. And our post-Pittman III failure-to-protect cases have explained the Kingsley standard in cases of inaction. Leaning on Kingsley, we have concluded that Kingsley's first inquiry requires proof only that a defendant made an intentional decision about the plaintiff's conditions. . . . With the benefit of these developments, we recognize our error in Pittman III. By requiring proof that 'the defendants were aware of ... or strongly suspected facts showing' a strong likelihood of harm, . . . we introduced a subjective component into Kingsley's otherwise objective inquiry. The district court, following our guidance in Pittman III, thus erred (through no fault of its own) by instructing the jury in this most recent trial that Pittman must prove that the defendants 'were aware ... or strongly suspected facts showing a strong likelihood that [Pittman] would be seriously harmed.' Instead, on the mental-state element in question, the district court should have instructed the jury that, to prevail, Pittman must prove that the defendants did not take reasonable available measures to abate the risk of serious harm to Pittman, even though reasonable officers under the circumstances would have understood the high degree of risk involved, making the consequences of the defendants' conduct obvious. That is the essential objective inquiry. . . . Because we conclude Pittman III would be decided differently given our current understanding of Kingsley, adherence to that decision risks a manifest injustice and the law of the case doctrine does not apply. . . . Pittman's task on appeal is not yet over. We must still assess whether the jury instruction error prejudiced him. . . . On this trial record—and especially mindful of the evidence and arguments by both parties—we conclude that the erroneous instruction did not impact the jury's verdict. . . .Because of the way the parties presented this case, we conclude that the erroneous jury instruction did not steer the jury toward a verdict that turned on defendants' subjective awareness of the risk of harm to Pittman. . . .While we hold that the district court erred when instructing the jury that a pretrial detainee must show a defendant was subjectively aware of the risk of harm, we do not fault the district court or parties for this error. As the record reveals, the district court and parties handled this case and the jury instructions with care. The district court faithfully applied our guidance in Pittman III and ultimately, the legal mistake we recognize today did not prejudice Pittman. In the final analysis, then, we AFFIRM.")

Davis v. Rook, 107 F.4th 777, 780-82 (7th Cir. 2024) ("The Fourteenth Amendment standard does not require a pretrial detainee to prove the defendant's subjective awareness of the risk of harm to establish liability. See Kemp, 27 F.4th at 497 (explaining that such a requirement 'cannot be reconciled' with the Supreme Court's instruction in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015) to 'pay careful attention to the different status of pretrial detainees' (internal quotations omitted)). The detainee must prove only that a reasonable officer under the circumstances would have appreciated the risk of harm to the detainee, and, from there, that the defendant acted in an objectively unreasonable way in addressing that risk. See Echols v. Johnson, --- F.4th ----, 2024 WL 3197540 at 1 (7th Cir. June 27, 2024); Kemp*, 27 F.4th at 497*; Thomas v. Dart*, 39 F.4th 835, 841 (7th Cir. 2022). Do not read us to be saying that the defendant's personal knowledge plays no role in the objective reasonableness analysis. Far from it: the defendant's knowledge of the factual circumstances informs whether a reasonable officer under the same circumstances would have developed subjective or personal awareness of the risk of harm to the plaintiff. Or, as the Supreme Court put the point in Kingsley, the district court must assess the objective reasonableness of the defendant's action or inaction 'from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, including what the officer knew at the time, not with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . To demonstrate that a reasonable officer in the defendant's shoes would have 'put the puzzle pieces together' about the risk of harm, the detainee must show that the defendant actually received 'all the information about a potential health or safety risk.' . . . In short, we do not assume that a reasonable officer is omniscient. Instead, the first step in evaluating whether the defendant should have appreciated the risk of harm is to take inventory of the factual information that he received. . . . Davis insists that the district court's reliance on Officer Gibson's many years of experience and other bits of his personal knowledge shows that the district court rejected his failure-to-protect claim under an improper subjective standard. We disagree. The objective analysis mandated by Kingsley and our related precedent begins with the defendant's knowledge of the factual context and then asks whether a reasonable officer with that knowledge would appreciate the risk of harm and still engage in the same conduct. The district court charted that precise course of reasoning here by ascertaining 'what [Officer Gibson] knew at the time' before concluding that a reasonable officer in his shoes would not have perceived the risk of assault to Davis. . . A reasonable officer who had never seen cleaning supplies used as weapons in 26 years of correctional experience would have had no reason to suspect that Davis, of all inmates, would suddenly be attacked during the cleaning period on April 12 with a broomstick and mop.")

Echols v. Johnson, 105 F.4th 973, 977-78 (7th Cir. 2024) ("Echols is right that the district court's instruction misstated the law. The beginning point is recognizing that the Constitution confers a right on anyone incarcerated to be free from physical harm inflicted by others in the institution. For persons convicted of a crime and serving a sentence, the right comes from the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. . . But for persons not convicted of a crime, including pretrial detainees and those like Echols who are in the civil custody of a state, the right to protection comes from the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . The source of the right matters. '[D]ifferent constitutional provisions, and thus different standards, govern depending on the relationship between the state and the person in the state's custody.'. . Federal courts disagreed for years as to the standard for judging pretrial detainees' claims under the Fourteenth Amendment. The Supreme Court granted review in Kingsley v. Hendrickson to resolve the issue in the excessive-force context, clarifying that a pretrial detainee need show only that the force used was objectively unreasonable. . . In so holding, the Court found legal error with a jury instruction that required proof of 'reckless disregard of [the plaintiff's] rights' and a showing that the defendants 'reasonably believed there was a threat to the safety of staff or prisoners.'. . Put another way, the Court disapproved of a jury instruction that required the jury to 'weigh [a correctional officer's] subjective reasons for using force and subjective views about the excessiveness of the force.'. . In Kingsley's wake, we decided two cases in 2022 that provide substantial direction for resolving this appeal. First came Kemp v. Fulton County, where we expressly extended the objective reasonableness inquiry for pretrial detainees to the failure-to-protect context. . . Relying at every turn on Kingsley, we explained that a defendant officer need not have subjectively perceived the risk of harm particular actions or conditions of confinement presented to a plaintiff detainee. . . A subjective risk of harm requirement, we underscored, 'cannot be reconciled with Kingsley's language, reasoning, and reminder to pay careful attention to the different status of pretrial detainees.'. . Next came Thomas v. Dart, where we expanded on our reasoning in Kemp by articulating in these terms the elements of a due process-based failure-to-protect claim:

(1) the defendant made an intentional decision regarding the conditions of the plaintiff's confinement; (2) those conditions put the plaintiff at substantial risk of suffering serious harm; (3) the defendant did not take reasonable available measures to abate the risk, even though a reasonable officer in the circumstances would have appreciated the high degree of risk involved, making the consequences of the defendant's inaction obvious; and (4) the defendant, by not taking such measures, caused the plaintiff's injuries.

39 F.4th at 841.

As Thomas makes clear, a pretrial or civil detainee pressing a failure-to-protect claim must have been placed at or exposed to a substantial risk of suffering serious harm with the defendant then acting in an objectively unreasonable way in response to that risk of harm. . . That brings us to the instruction the district court provided to the jury on the elements of Echols's failure-to-protect claim. The legal error in the jury instruction came with the second element, which required Echols to prove that '[t]he defendant under consideration was aware of th[e] strong likelihood that Plaintiff would be seriously harmed as the result of an assault.' By its terms—and as both parties agree—this instruction required Echols to prove that the defendant in question was aware of the strong likelihood that Rexroat would assault Echols in the dayroom. That requirement conflicts with the direction from Kingsley, Kemp, and Thomas because it impermissibly introduced a subjective state-of-mind component into what should have been an objective reasonableness inquiry. The jury instead should have been instructed to assess whether a reasonable officer, situated within the dayroom as the defendant at issue was situated before the attack, acted in an objectively reasonable way in taking or failing to take action to mitigate the risk of harm that Paul Rexroat presented to Minosa Echols.")

Chilcutt v. Santiago, No. 22-2916, 2023 WL 4678583 (7th Cir. July 21, 2023) (not reported) ("The estate contends Tabisz and Santiago violated Chilcutt's rights under the Fourteenth Amendment when they failed to provide the booking officer with information about the October 7 incident and took no steps to prevent him from harming himself. Santiago even gave Chilcutt the blanket with which he hanged himself. To prevail on the merits, the estate must show that the officers acted in an objectively unreasonable manner. See Miranda v. County of Lake, 900 F.3d 335, 352 (7th Cir. 2018) (denial of medical care); Kemp v. Fulton County, 27 F.4th 491, 497 (7th Cir. 2022) (failure to protect). A wrinkle here is that, in 2017, objective unreasonableness was not the standard applicable to pretrial detainees' claims about their conditions of confinement; they were still treated as deliberate indifference claims, which come with a higher burden of proof. . . We have not explicitly addressed how the change in the standard affects the qualified-immunity analysis. In prior cases, we have applied current law (objective unreasonableness) to determine on the merits whether there was a violation of a constitutional right, and, for purposes of qualified immunity, looked to our deliberate indifference cases to determine if the right was clearly established at the time. See, e.g., Hardeman v. Curran, 933 F.3d 816, 820–22 (7th Cir. 2019). We need not decide the issue here, though, because either way, the estate must show that the officers knew or had notice that Chilcutt was at risk of suicide.")

Stockton v. Milwaukee County, 44 F.4th 605, 614 n.3 (7th Cir. 2022) ("Until oral argument, both parties apparently presumed the Eighth Amendment provided the proper standard for evaluating Stockton's deliberate indifference claim. We are not so certain. In Miranda v. County of Lake, we held the standard for pretrial detainees challenging their medical care under the Fourteenth Amendment is lower than that for post-conviction prisoners proceeding under the Eighth Amendment. . . It is not entirely clear whether Madden-incarcerated at the MCJ on an unadjudicated probation violation-fits within the Eighth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment framework. We need not resolve this issue, however, as Stockton failed to advocate for Fourteenth Amendment treatment, thereby waiving the question. . . For purposes of this appeal, we assume without concluding the Eighth Amendment applies.")

Thomas v. Dart, 39 F.4th 835, 842-43 (7th Cir. 2022) ("Without more, . . . simply being housed in the Jail's general population, even while suffering from PTSD, is not a particular enough risk in the failure-to-protect context. The unfortunate reality is that jails and prisons are dangerous places inhabited by violent people. . . The constitutional expectation 'is that guards act responsibly under the circumstances that confront them,' not that they anticipate every potential danger facing a detainee. . . As the Supreme Court cautioned in Kingsley, an assessment of objective reasonableness must be made 'on the facts and circumstances of each particular case' and 'from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, including what the officer knew at the time.'. .To be sure, the specific risk a reasonable officer would appreciate need not be uniquely associated with the plaintiff or his attacker. The risk can be based on 'a victim's particular vulnerability' (even though the identity of the assailant is not known before the attack), or it can be based on 'an assailant's predatory nature' (even though the identity of the victim is not known before the attack). . . But either way, the risk must be somehow 'specific to a detainee, and not a mere general risk of violence.'. . Thomas cannot assert an appreciable risk of harm based solely on his placement in the Jail's general population because the 'general risks of violence in prison' confront virtually every detainee. . . Nor has Thomas offered a plausible reason why the intake clerks should have been on notice that placing him in the Jail's general population with PTSD created a substantial risk. He does not suggest that his having PTSD provoked, encouraged, or made more likely his assault by another Jail inmate. And he does not suggest that the inmate who assaulted him had a known propensity for violence against detainees like Thomas. This case, then, resembles In re Estate of Rice, 675 F.3d 650 (7th Cir. 2012). There we held that a valid failure-to-protect claim was not alleged when a mentally ill detainee was assaulted by another inmate over the detainee's hygiene problem because jail personnel—though aware of the hygiene problem—had no notice that he was at risk of assault because of that problem.'")

Kemp v. Fulton County, 27 F.4th 491, 495-97 (7th Cir. 2022) ("While Kingsley was specifically about excessive-force claims, we have recognized that '[n]either the Supreme Court's logic nor its language' is limited to that context. . . Recognizing the Supreme Court's 'signal[ ] that courts must pay careful attention to the different status of pretrial detainees' as compared with convicted offenders, we have applied Kingsley's objective unreasonableness test to other Fourteenth Amendment claims, including challenges to inadequate medical care and other conditions of pretrial confinement. . . Other circuits, including the Second, Sixth, Ninth, and Tenth, have similarly concluded that Kingsley's objective standard applies to some or all conditions-of-confinement cases brought by pretrial detainees. See Brawner v. Scott Cnty., 14 F.4th 585, 596 (6th Cir. 2021) (medical need); Colbruno v. Kessler, 928 F.3d 1155, 1161–63 (10th Cir. 2019) (general conditions of confinement); Gordon v. Cnty. of Orange, 888 F.3d 1118, 1120, 1122–25 (9th Cir. 2018) (medical need); Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 14, 34–35 (2d Cir. 2017) (general conditions of confinement). But see Strain v. Regalado, 977 F.3d 894 (10th Cir. 2020) (holding that Kingsley is limited to excessive-force cases and applying both a subjective and objective standard to medical-care cases). Following Kingsley, Miranda, and Hardeman, a plaintiff such as Kemp challenging the conditions of his pretrial detention need show only that a defendant's conduct was 'objectively unreasonable.'. . Burget thus would be liable if he 'acted purposefully, knowingly, or perhaps even recklessly' in coming to work without his hearing aid, but not if he were no more than negligent. . . .We have not yet had the occasion to consider how Kingsley, Miranda, and Hardeman apply to a failure-to-protect claim. Our pre-Kingsley cases follow the Eighth Amendment's approach (i.e., objective harm plus subjective intent) to pretrial settings. . . But, just as we have done with medical-care and excessive-force cases, we must now take Kingsley into account. We begin by recalling that in Kingsley, the Supreme Court explained that an excessive-force claim raises two distinct state-of-mind issues:

The first concerns the defendant's state of mind with respect to his physical acts—i.e., his state of mind with respect to the bringing about of certain physical consequences in the world. The second question concerns the defendant's state of mind with respect to whether his use of force was 'excessive.' ... We conclude with respect to that question that the relevant standard is objective not subjective.

Kingsley, 576 U.S. at 395. . . . The Ninth Circuit, sitting en banc, applied these principles to failure-to-protect claims in Castro v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060 (7th Cir. 2016) (en banc). It held there that a pretrial detainee does not need to show that an officer with all the information about a potential health or safety risk actually did put the puzzle pieces together. In doing so, it contrasted the test in Fourteenth Amendment cases with the Eighth Amendment's requirement to show subjective deliberate indifference. . . At the same time, as we have done, it acknowledged that 'negligent conduct does not offend the Due Process Clause.'. . . Like the Ninth Circuit, and following our own post-Kingsley line of cases, we now hold that Kingsley abrogates Guzman, Butera, and their kin to the extent that they require pretrial detainees to show, in a failure-to-protect case, that a defendant was subjectively 'aware of a substantial risk of serious injury.'. . This requirement cannot be reconciled with Kingsley's language, reasoning, and reminder to 'pay careful attention to the different status of pretrial detainees.'. . We hold, as the Ninth Circuit did in Castro, that the defendant officer must intend to carry out a certain course of actions; negligence is not enough. At that point, the remaining question is whether that course is objectively reasonable. If not, there is a Fourteenth Amendment violation.")

Redman v. Downs, No. 20-1655, 2021 WL 1889749, at *2 (7th Cir. May 11, 2021) (not reported) ("We agree that the district court erred by dismissing [the claims] at screening under a deliberate-indifference standard. To state a claim under the Fourteenth Amendment, a pretrial detainee must allege only that the defendants purposefully, knowingly, or recklessly created conditions that were objectively unreasonable. . . Redman did so. Jails must provide detainees with 'basic human needs,' including clothing and hygiene products. . . Here, Redman alleged that he was not provided with soap, a toothbrush, and toothpaste for at least 51 days. Further, he allegedly lacked something to cover himself (even a suicide smock) for at least 10 days after his suicide attempt and had to walk the halls naked, past jail staff, to get his meals. Although Officers Finley and Harper taunted him as he did so, they never gave him another smock and neither did any other officer. Finally, Redman alleged that the deprivations of clothing and hygiene products were demeaning and humiliating. . . We note that 'officials must be free to take appropriate action to ensure the safety of inmates.'. . But that potential explanation for the deprivation did not provide a basis to dismiss Redman's claim at the pleadings stage. Further, it does not follow from the need to keep hygiene items out of the cell to prevent self-harm—if that is why Redman did not have soap or dental hygiene products—that a detainee may be altogether deprived of opportunities to wash himself or brush his teeth.")

Mays v. Dart, 974 F.3d 810, 819 n.1, 819-21, 824 (7th Cir. 2020) ("Both the Sixth Circuit and the Eleventh Circuit have recently addressed conditions of confinement claims involving the coronavirus in prison settings. See Wilson v. Williams, 961 F.3d 829 (6th Cir. 2020), in Swain v. Junior, 961 F.3d 1276 (11th Cir. 2020). These Circuits, however, apply an Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference standard to pretrial detainee conditions of confinement claims rather than the objectively unreasonable claim that we apply, and thus focus on a subjective element that is not at issue here. . . . The district court erred by narrowly focusing its objective reasonableness analysis almost exclusively on social distancing instead of considering the totality of facts and circumstances, including all of the Sheriff's conduct in responding to and managing COVID-19. Citing McCann, the district court wrote, 'To succeed on their claim, the plaintiffs must show that the Sheriff's conduct in addressing the risks posed by exposure to coronavirus is objectively unreasonable in one or more respects.'. . The district court then went on to emphasize social distancing and the Sheriff's efforts to implement social distancing to the exclusion of the Sheriff's other actions. This analysis incorrectly ignored the totality of the circumstances. It may very well be the case that a particular aspect of an action is so lacking that the failing on this one factor will lead a court to correctly conclude the entire course of challenged conduct was objectively unreasonable. It may also be that some actions or inactions are more consequential than others. But that does not mean that the court should evaluate each aspect of the disputed actions in a vacuum, especially in a case involving a systemic claim like here. Rather, the court must consider the total of the circumstances surrounding the challenged action. In addition, the district court hinged its decision to impose a social distancing directive on the basis of one, and only one, key factual finding: 'At the current stage of the pandemic, group housing and double celling subject detainees to a heightened ... risk of contracting and transmitting the coronavirus.' We do not suggest that this finding was erroneous: the district court had before it a voluminous evidentiary record about the importance of social distancing to reducing transmission of COVID-19. Instead, we take issue with what was missing: absent from the district court's reasoning was any mention of the totality of the measures the Sheriff already had taken to combat the spread of COVID-19, including those regarding social distancing. By the time the district court issued the preliminary injunction, the Sheriff had already implemented several such measures. Notably, and as the district court initially acknowledged in its temporary restraining order, these included substantial efforts to increase social distancing, such as opening shuttered divisions of the Jail, creating new single-cell housing, and decreasing the capacity of dormitories. The Sheriff had also undertaken extensive other measures to prevent and manage the spread of COVID-19 at the Jail. By failing to evaluate the request for a policy precluding double celling and group housing in light of the other aspects of the Sheriff's COVID response, the district court did not properly consider the totality of the facts and circumstances when evaluating the objective unreasonableness of the Sheriff's actions. . . .When evaluating Plaintiffs' request for a policy precluding group housing and double celling, the district court made a passing reference to its obligation to 'account for and give deference to the Sheriff's interest in managing the Jail facilities and to practices that are needed to preserve order and discipline and maintain security.' The district court, however, did not discuss in a meaningful way how, if at all, the considerable deference it owed to the judgment of prison administrators impacted its analysis. Undoubtedly, safety and security concerns play a significant role in a correctional administrator's housing decisions: jails and prisons require some degree of flexibility in choosing cell assignments, as they need to ensure, for example, that detainees are assigned to the living quarters corresponding with their security classifications and factoring in particular vulnerabilities that increase security risks. This is especially true at the Jail where the population fluctuates daily given the number of bookings and releases that take place. Correctional officers similarly must have the freedom to quickly reassign inmates when fights or other emergency situations occur that threaten the safety of staff and inmates. This is perhaps no more important than at a facility like the Cook County Jail, which houses a wide range of detainees accused of committing up to the most serious of violent offenses. Given the deference courts owe to correctional administrators on matters implicating safety concerns and the substantial role that security interests play in housing assignments, the failure to consider these interests was a legal error. . . .We commend Judge Kennelly for his handling of the motion, particularly in light of the many novel issues posed by the onset of COVID-19 and the case's emergent nature. We nevertheless REVERSE in part and VACATE the portion of the preliminary injunction precluding double celling and group housing because of the legal errors that arose as the district court applied the objective reasonableness standard recently announced in Kingsley.")

Pittman by and through Hamilton v. County of Madison, Illinois (Pittman III), 970 F.3d 823, 827-28 (7th Cir. 2020) ("The challenged jury instruction required the jury to make four findings: (1) '[t]here was a strong likelihood that [Pittman] would seriously harm himself,' (2) the defendants 'were aware of ... or strongly suspected facts showing [this] strong likelihood,' (3) they

'consciously failed to take reasonable measures to prevent [Pittman] from harming himself,' and (4) Pittman 'would have suffered less harm if [the defendants] had not disregarded the risk.' Pittman argues that the instruction is inconsistent with the objectively reasonable standard that we recently articulated in Miranda v. County of Lake, 900 F.3d 335 (7th Cir. 2018). Before Miranda, this circuit evaluated a Fourteenth Amendment due process claim brought by a pretrial detainee under the deliberate indifference standard, which 'requires a showing that the defendant had a "sufficiently culpable state of mind" and asks whether the official actually believed there was a significant risk of harm.'. . This standard tracked the subjective inquiry employed for Eighth Amendment claims—and that made it a misfit. 'Pretrial detainees stand in a different position' than convicted prisoners, so 'the punishment model is inappropriate for them.'. . Moreover, our approach was undercut by the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, which held that an excessive-force claim brought by a pretrial detainee under the Fourteenth Amendment must be evaluated under an objective test rather than the subjective deliberate indifference standard. . . So in Miranda, we changed course. Taking our cue from Kingsley, we held that an objective standard applies to medical-needs claims brought by pretrial detainees such as the one brought by Pittman. . . Under this standard, the jury must answer two questions. First, it must decide whether the 'defendants acted purposefully, knowingly, or perhaps even recklessly.'. . Second, it must determine whether the defendants' actions were 'objectively reasonable.'. . Pittman argues that the jury instruction conflicts with this test because the jury was told to consider whether the defendants 'were aware of ... or strongly suspected' facts showing a likelihood that Pittman would harm himself and whether the defendants 'consciously failed to take reasonable measures' to avert that harm. . . According to Pittman, this language directed the jury to apply the now defunct subjective test rather than the objective test that governs under Miranda. Pittman's argument fails as to the instruction that the jury decide whether the defendants 'were aware of ... or strongly suspected facts showing' a strong likelihood that Pittman would harm himself. This language goes to Miranda's first inquiry: whether the defendants acted 'purposefully, knowingly, or perhaps even recklessly.' At bottom, Miranda's first inquiry encompasses all states of mind except for negligence and gross negligence. . . The challenged language accurately conveyed this standard to the jury: if the defendants 'were aware' that their actions would be harmful, then they acted 'purposefully' or 'knowingly'; if they were not necessarily 'aware' but nevertheless 'strongly suspected' that their actions would lead to harmful results, then they acted 'recklessly.' This much is consistent with Miranda. But the district court erred by telling the jury to determine whether the defendants 'consciously failed to take reasonable measures to prevent [Pittman] from harming himself.' . . This language conflicts with Miranda's second inquiry: whether the defendants acted in an 'objectively reasonable' manner. By using the word 'consciously,' the instruction erroneously introduced a subjective element into the inquiry. Under Miranda's standard, whether the defendants' failure to take reasonable measures was the result of a conscious decision is irrelevant; they are liable if their actions (or lack thereof) were objectively unreasonable. . . Because the word 'consciously' rendered the jury instruction impermissibly subjective, the jury instruction misstated the law. This error likely 'confused or misled' the jury. . . Although the word 'consciously' is the only aspect of the instruction that conflicts with Miranda, we consider 'the instructions as a whole, along with all of the evidence and arguments.'. . Here, the evidence and arguments presented at trial by both Pittman and the defendants reveal that the word 'consciously' was likely prejudicial. . . . In light of the evidence presented at trial and the arguments made by the defendants, the use of the word 'consciously' likely steered the jury toward the subjective deliberate indifference standard. And that error 'likely made [a] difference in the outcome,'. . . because a reasonable jury could conclude that the defendants' failure to provide medical care for Pittman was objectively unreasonable, but not a conscious failure. In sum, because the jury instruction misstated Miranda's objective standard and the error was likely prejudicial, we reverse the judgment and remand the case for a new trial.")

Pulera v. Sarzant, 966 F.3d 540, 550 (7th Cir. 2020) ("Pulera maintains that he was an arrestee subject to the Fourth Amendment. In the non-medical defendants' contrary view, Pulera was properly classified as a pretrial detainee. Although a judge conducted a Gerstein hearing for Pulera's bail jumping charge the day after his suicide attempt, they argue that another judge found probable cause to arrest him for battery in 2011 and that this qualifies him as a pretrial detainee. At oral argument, though, the parties all agreed that the standards are now effectively the same for judging the adequacy of custodial medical care under either Amendment. Under the Fourth Amendment, an arrestee must demonstrate that an official's actions were 'objectively unreasonable under the circumstances.'. . This objective rule is easier for a plaintiff to meet than the subjective deliberate-indifference standard used under the Eighth Amendment. . . For years, we also used the more onerous subjective approach for Fourteenth Amendment claims relating to conditions of pretrial detention. . . In 2018, however, we clarified that pretrial detainees' medical-care claims are now governed by an 'objective unreasonableness inquiry.' Miranda v. Cty. of Lake, 900 F.3d 335, 352 (7th Cir. 2018). Both standards, then, are objective, and the non-medical defendants identify no practical difference between them.")

Hardeman v. Curran, 933 F.3d 816, 822-23 (7th Cir. 2019) ("It is true that Kingsley directly addressed only claims of excessive force, and so some circuits have understood its holding to be confined to those facts. See Miranda v. Cnty. of Lake, 900 F.3d 335, 352 (7th Cir. 2018) (collecting cases). We, however, have not taken that approach. Recognizing 'that the Supreme Court has been signaling that courts must pay careful attention to the different status of pretrial detainees,' we have held that a pretrial detainee's claims of inadequate medical care 'are subject only to the objective unreasonableness inquiry identified in Kingsley.'. . The plaintiffs in this case suggest that we should extend Kingsley further from the medical context to the general conditions-of-confinement problem we have here. We see no principled reason not to do so. To the contrary, as we recognized in Miranda, there is 'nothing in the logic the Supreme Court used in Kingsley that would support this kind of dissection of the different types of claims that arise under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause.'. . The Supreme Court has also said that medical care is simply one of the many conditions of confinement to which an imprisoned person is subjected. . . As we recognized in Miranda, several of our sister circuits have viewed Kingsley's holding as establishing that an objective inquiry applies to a variety of conditions-of-confinement claims, not just those involving excessive force. Miranda, 900 F.3d at 351–52; see also Gordon v. Cnty. of Orange, 888 F.3d 1118, 1120, 1122–25 (9th Cir. 2018) (medical-need claim); Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 34–35 (2d Cir. 2017) (conditions of confinement generally); Castro v. Cnty. of L.A., 833 F.3d 1060, 1070–71 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 137 S. Ct. 831, 197 L.Ed.2d 69 (2017) (failure-to-protect claim). Since Miranda was decided, the Tenth Circuit has joined those that apply Kingsley's objective inquiry to a claim other than excessive use of force. See Colbruno v. Kessler, 928 F.3d 1155, 1161–63 (10th Cir. 2019). . . . Like the Second and Tenth Circuits, we see no doctrinal reason to distinguish among different types of conditions-of-confinement claims for purposes of applying Kingsley's objective standard. Neither the Supreme Court's logic nor its language suggests that such a distinction is proper. . .We therefore hold that Kingsley's objective inquiry applies to all Fourteenth Amendment conditions-of-confinement claims brought by pretrial detainees.")

Hardeman v. Curran, 933 F.3d 816, 823-24 (7th Cir. 2019) ("A single clogged toilet does not violate the Constitution, and prisoners are not entitled to Fiji Water on demand. But on the other end of the spectrum, a defendant cannot purposefully deny water until a prisoner is on the brink of death or force a prisoner permanently to live surrounded by her own excrement and that of others. The latter actions would be so obviously unconstitutional that qualified immunity could not protect the perpetrators.")

Hardeman v. Curran, 933 F.2d 816, 825-27 (7th Cir. 2019) (Sykes, J., concurring in the judgment) ("After Miranda v. County of Lake, 900 F.3d 335 (7th Cir. 2018), it makes sense as a doctrinal matter to extend Kingsley's objective standard to all conditions-of-confinement claims by pretrial detainees. . . . In Miranda we extended Kingsley's 'objective unreasonableness' standard to a claim that a pretrial detainee received constitutionally inadequate medical care. . . We emphasized, however, that Kingsley retained the rule that mere negligence is not a constitutional violation. . . . Like my colleagues, I see no principled reason to treat general conditions-of-confinement claims differently than medical conditions-of-confinement claims. I therefore agree that this case is governed by Kingsley's objective standard—but importantly, only at the step in the liability framework that requires an interpretation of the conditions to which the plaintiffs were subjected during the three-day water shutoff. As I've just explained, under Kingsley the constitutional claim still carries a subjective component. To prevail, the plaintiffs must prove that the defendants acted purposefully, knowingly, or recklessly; negligence is not enough. In addition, nothing in Kingsley removed the threshold requirement in every conditions-of-confinement claim: 'the inmate must show that he is incarcerated under conditions posing a substantial risk of serious harm.'. . .So to prevail on a claim alleging unconstitutional conditions of pretrial confinement, the plaintiff must prove three elements: (1) the conditions in question are or were objectively serious (or if the claim is for inadequate medical care, his medical condition is or was objectively serious); (2) the defendant acted purposefully, knowingly, or recklessly with respect to the consequences of his actions; and (3) the defendant's actions were objectively unreasonable—that is, 'not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective or ... excessive in relation to that purpose.'")

McCann v. Ogle County, Illinois, 909 F.3d 881, 886-87 (7th Cir. 2018) ("After the district court ruled on the defendants' motions for summary judgment, we decided Miranda v. County of Lake, 900 F.3d 335 (7th Cir. 2018), holding that a standard of objective reasonableness, and not deliberate indifference, governs claims under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause for inadequate medical care provided to pretrial detainees. Our decision in Miranda hewed closely to Kingsley v. Hendrickson, where the Supreme Court held that the due process standard for assessing a pretrial detainee's claim of excessive force should be 'objective not subjective.'. . A pretrial detainee 'needed only to show that the defendant's conduct was objectively unreasonable,' without any accompanying requirement to demonstrate, as would be the case in a claim brought under the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause by an inmate serving a sentence, 'that the defendant was subjectively aware that the amount of force being used was unreasonable.'. . After Miranda, then, the controlling inquiry for assessing a due process challenge to a pretrial detainee's medical care proceeds in two steps. The first step, which focuses on the intentionality of the individual defendant's conduct, remains unchanged and 'asks whether the medical defendants acted purposefully, knowingly, or perhaps even recklessly when they considered the consequences of their handling of [plaintiff's] case.'. . A showing of negligence or even gross negligence will not suffice. . . At the second step, and now aligned with Kingsley, we ask whether the challenged conduct was objectively reasonable. . .This standard requires courts to focus on the totality of facts and circumstances faced by the individual alleged to have provided inadequate medical care and to gauge objectively—without regard to any subjective belief held by the individual—whether the response was reasonable. . . . Like the district court, we cannot say on the record before us that Nurse Mongan's administration of the methadone dosages prescribed by Dr. Cullinan was objectively unreasonable.")

Miranda v. County of Lake, 900 F.3d 335, 350-54 (7th Cir. 2018) ("[W]e have typically assessed pretrial detainees' medical care (and other) claims under the Eighth Amendment's standards, reasoning that pretrial detainees are entitled to at least that much protection. . . In conducting this borrowing exercise, we have grafted the Eighth Amendment's deliberate indifference requirement onto the pretrial detainee situation. . . Missing from this picture has been any attention to the difference that exists between the Eighth and the Fourteenth Amendment standards. The Supreme Court recently disapproved the uncritical extension of Eighth Amendment jurisprudence to the pretrial setting in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015). . . .Though Kingsley's direct holding spoke only of excessive-force claims, two of our sister circuits have held that its logic is not so constrained. The Ninth Circuit first extended Kingsley's objective inquiry to detainees' Fourteenth-Amendment failure-to-protect claims. [citing Castro v. Cnty. of L.A.] Since then, that court has applied the Kingsley holding more broadly to a medical-need claim brought by a pretrial detainee. [citing Gordon v. Cnty. of Orange] The Second Circuit followed suit, applying the objective standard to detainees' Fourteenth-Amendment complaints about their conditions of confinement; in the process it overruled a decision applying a subjective test to a medical-care claim. [citing Darnell v. Pineiro] Later, the Second Circuit expressly applied an objective standard to a claim of deliberate indifference to a serious medical condition. [citing Bruno v. City of Schenectady] Other courts of appeals have contemplated the same reading of Kingsley. [citing Richmond v. Huq, 885 F.3d 928, 938 n.3 (6th Cir. 2018)] The Eighth, Eleventh, and Fifth Circuits have chosen to confine Kingsley to its facts—that is, to Fourteenth-Amendment claims based on excessive-force allegations in a pretrial setting. [citing cases] Some circuits have continued to analyze inadequate medical treatment claims under the deliberate indifference standard without grappling with the potential implications of Kingsley. . . We have not yet expressly weighed in on the debate. Since Kingsley, we have continued to duplicate the Eighth Amendment inquiry for claims of deficient medical treatment. E.g., Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cnty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n.31 (7th Cir. 2016). But we have acknowledged that Kingsley has 'called into question' our case law treating the 'protections afforded by' the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments as ' "functionally indistinguishable" in the context of a claim about inadequate medical care.' Smego v. Jumper, 707 F. App'x 411, 412 (7th Cir. 2017). . . Because the answer may make a difference in the retrial of Gomes's claims, we think it appropriate to address the proper standard at this time. We begin with the fact that the Supreme Court has been signaling that courts must pay careful attention to the different status of pretrial detainees. In this respect, Kingsley does not stand alone. . . The Court has cautioned that the Eighth Amendment and Due Process analyses are not coextensive. . . We see nothing in the logic the Supreme Court used in Kingsley that would support this kind of dissection of the different types of claims that arise under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. To the contrary, the Court said that '[t]he language of the [Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments] differs, and the nature of the claims often differs. And, most importantly, pretrial detainees (unlike convicted prisoners) cannot be punished at all, much less "maliciously and sadistically."'. . We thus conclude, along with the Ninth and Second Circuits, that medical-care claims brought by pretrial detainees under the Fourteenth Amendment are subject only to the objective unreasonableness inquiry identified in Kingsley. . . . The defendants here worry that an objective-reasonableness standard will impermissibly constitutionalize medical malpractice claims, because it would allow mere negligence to suffice for liability. A careful look at Kingsley, however, shows that this is not the case; the state-of-mind requirement for constitutional cases remains higher. . . . The allegations here easily fit the mold of Gordon, Darnell, and Castro. A properly instructed jury could find that Drs. Elazegui and Singh made the decision to continue observing Gomes in the jail, rather than transporting her to the hospital, with purposeful, knowing, or reckless disregard of the consequences. (The jury could also reject such a conclusion.) It would be a different matter if, for example, the medical defendants had forgotten that Gomes was in the jail, or mixed up her chart with that of another detainee, or if Dr. Elazegui forgot to take over coverage for Dr. Kim when he went on vacation. Such negligence would be insufficient to support liability under the Fourteenth Amendment, even though it might support state-law liability. Here, there is evidence that Drs. Elazegui and Singh deliberately chose a 'wait and see' monitoring plan, knowing that Gomes was neither eating nor drinking nor competent to care for herself. . . Because the Estate does not claim merely negligent conduct, a jury must decide whether the doctors' deliberate failure to act was objectively reasonable. . . . Any death is a great loss, but one as preventable as Gomes's is especially disturbing. On this record, a jury could have found that the intentional and knowing inaction of Drs. Elazegui and Singh caused Gomes's death. We therefore Reverse and Remand for new trial of the Estate's claim against them, as it relates to Gomes's death. We Affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to the County defendants.")

Smego v. Jumper, 707 F. App'x 411, 412 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Because Smego is a civil detainee—not a prisoner—his claims derive from the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of due process, not the Eighth Amendment's right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. . . In prior cases we have said that the protections afforded by these constitutional amendments are 'functionally indistinguishable' in the context of a claim about inadequate medical care. . . But these cases have been called into question by Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), which applied a purely objective standard to a detainee's excessive-force claim without regard to any subjective component. See Collins v. Al-Shami, 851 F.3d 727, 731 (7th Cir. 2017). We have not decided whether the reasoning in Kinglsey extends beyond claims of excessive force. See Collins, 851 F.3d at 731; but see Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 36 (2d Cir. 2017) (applying objective-reasonableness standard to detainee's conditions-of-confinement claim); Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1071 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) (same with failure-to-protect claim). But we need not resolve this issue now, because even under the less demanding objective-reasonableness standard, Smego would not prevail.")

Collins v. Al-Shami, 851 F.3d 727, 731 (7th Cir. 2017) ("The Fourth Amendment applies to the period of confinement between a warrantless arrest and the probable-cause determination . . . the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment governs after the probable-cause determination has been made. . . and the Eighth Amendment applies after a conviction[.] . . The parties in this case agree that Collins's federal claims are subject to the Due Process Clause, but disagree on what that Clause entails. In the past, we have applied to due-process claims of inadequate medical care the deliberate-indifference standard derived from the Eighth Amendment. . . That standard includes both an objective and subjective component . . . and thus is more difficult to satisfy than its Fourth Amendment counterpart, which requires only that the defendant have been objectively unreasonable under the circumstances[.] . . . Collins argues that under Kingsley v. Hendrickson, — U.S. —, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), it is the objective-unreasonableness standard that governs here . . . but Kingsley was an excessive-force case, and we have not yet addressed whether its reasoning extends to claims of allegedly inadequate medical care, cf. Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n.31 (7th Cir. 2016). We need not (and do not) resolve that issue here, however, as even under the less-demanding standard, Collins's federal claims still cannot succeed.")

Mulvania v. Sheriff of Rock Island County, 850 F.3d 849, 856-58 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Because plaintiffs were pretrial detainees, not convicted prisoners, we assess their claim under the Fourteenth Amendment instead of the Eighth Amendment. In Bell v. Wolfish, the Supreme Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause prohibits holding pretrial detainees in conditions that 'amount to punishment.'. . A pretrial condition can amount to punishment in two ways: first, if it is 'imposed for the purpose of punishment,' or second, if the condition 'is not reasonably related to a legitimate goal—if it is arbitrary or purposeless—a court permissibly may infer that the purpose of the government action is punishment.'. . The Supreme Court recently explained that 'a pretrial detainee can prevail by providing only objective evidence that the challenged governmental action is not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective or that it is excessive in relation to that purpose.'. . .Giving plaintiffs the benefit of favorable inferences from this record, a reasonable trier of fact could find that the white underwear policy is not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective, or is at least excessive in relation to such a purpose. This conclusion, without more, supports an inference that the policy punishes pretrial detainees in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . We therefore reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment against the plaintiffs on their challenge to the white underwear policy. . . .Even if the jail's policy might ultimately be found to be rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective, the deprivation it imposes must not be excessive in relation to that purpose. . . .Dignity serves an important balancing function alongside the legitimate safety and management concerns of jails and prisons. . . .Without the counterweight of dignity, a jail could presumably set forth security reasons to require detainees to remain naked throughout their detention or other such unseemly measures. The Constitution forbids such tactics. It requires consideration of individual dignity interests when assessing the permissibility of restrictive custodial policies. . . . Here, the plaintiff–detainees allege a credible dignitary harm. They describe their experiences being deprived of their underwear as 'very uncomfortable,' 'embarrassing,' 'humiliating,' and 'upsetting.' In addition, the policy resulted in detainees attending their own court hearings without underwear. At least one plaintiff was deprived of her underwear during her menstrual cycle. This indignity lasted for indeterminate periods of time. The district court found that detainees would be deprived of underwear for at most one day, but we have not found support for that finding. Defendants appear to concede this point in their brief. Thus, even if the white underwear policy turns out to be rationally related to a legitimate interest, the dignitary harm imposed by the policy might still be excessive in relation to that interest.")

Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n.31 (7th Cir. 2016) ("'The Eighth Amendment's ban on 'cruel and unusual punishments' requires prison officials to take reasonable measures to guarantee the safety of inmates, including the provision of adequate medical care.' Minix v. Canarecci, 597 F.3d 824, 830 (7th Cir. 2010). We note that some members of the class are pretrial detainees and that 'the Eighth Amendment applies only to convicted persons.'. . However, in this context, the present case law holds that 'pretrial detainees ... are entitled to the same basic protections under the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. Accordingly, we apply the same legal standards to deliberate indifference claims brought under either the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment.'. . But see Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2475 (2015) (holding that there are different standards for sentenced prisoners and pretrial detainees in the case of excessive force claims).")

Smith v. Dart, 803 F.3d 304, 309-10 & n.2 (7th Cir. 2015) ("At the outset, we note that Smith's constitutional rights as a pretrial detainee are derived from the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, rather than the Eighth Amendment, which is applicable to convicted prisoners. See, e.g., Kingsley v. Hendrickson, —— U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 2475, 192 L.Ed.2d 416 (2015); Budd v. Motley, 711 F.3d 840, 842 (7th Cir.2013). In the context of a conditions of confinement claim, a pretrial detainee is entitled to be free from conditions that amount to 'punishment,'. . . while a convicted prisoner is entitled to be free from conditions that constitute 'cruel and unusual punishment.'. . In both cases, however, the alleged conditions must be objectively serious enough to amount to a constitutional deprivation, and the defendant prison official must possess a sufficiently culpable state of mind. . . .With respect to this second, subjective element, an inmate must 'prove that the defendant "possess[ed] a purposeful, a knowing, or possibly a reckless state of mind" with respect to the defendant's actions (or inaction) toward the plaintiff.' Davis v. Wessel, 782 F.3d 793, 801 (7th Cir.2015) (quoting Kingsley, 135 S.Ct. at 2472). Although the parties argue this element in their briefs, it is not at issue in this appeal. As the district court correctly noted, the personal involvement of senior jail officials, such as Dart, can be inferred at the motion to dismiss stage, where, as here, the plaintiff alleges 'potentially systemic,' as opposed to 'clearly localized,' constitutional violations. See Antonelli v. Sheahan, 81 F.3d 1422, 1428–29 (7th Cir.1996). . . .Smith first contends that, in dismissing his conditions of confinement claims, the district court conflated the Fourteenth Amendment with the Eighth Amendment, and thus failed to consider whether his claims fell somewhere within the 'gray area' that exists between them. First, the district court acknowledged Smith's status as a pretrial detainee and that his rights are derived from the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court also recognized the Supreme Court's holding in Bell v. Wolfish that due process protects pretrial detainees from being subjected to conditions of confinement that amount to punishment. The court determined, however, that Smith failed to allege facts indicating that he was subjected to such grave conditions. Second, the district court did not err by relying on Eighth Amendment cases or by failing to consider whether Smith's conditions of confinement claims fell within some 'gray area' that exists between the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. We have held that there is little practical difference, if any, between the standards applicable to pretrial detainees and convicted inmates when it comes to conditions of confinement claims, and that such claims brought under the Fourteenth Amendment are appropriately analyzed under the Eighth Amendment test.")

Smith v. Dart, 803 F.3d 304, 316-17 (7th Cir. 2015) (Posner, J., concurring and dissenting) ("The majority opinion upholds some of his claims, rejects others, and for the most part I agree with its rulings. But not with respect to the alleged infestation of his cell by mice and cockroaches, and the inadequate heating of his cell (although footnote 4 of the majority opinion leaves some room for him to renew the heating complaint on remand). The district judge directed this pro se plaintiff to file an amended complaint specifying whether the infestation of his cell by mice and cockroaches was 'so profound as to rise to the level of a constitutional violation.' How could a pro se jail detainee be expected to answer such a question? He had alleged that the mice and cockroaches were in his food and that he developed scabies—a highly contagious skin infestation, productive of severe itching, and sometimes referred to as 'the seven-year itch'—from the unsanitary conditions. What more should be required to state a claim of punishment? That he keep a record of the number of his meals that he shared with the vermin? He alleged that his cell was inadequately heated during the winter; again, what more should he have been required to allege—does the jail give him a thermometer and a calendar, so that he can keep a written record of the temperature in his cell day by day to submit to a judge? Smith responded to the defendants' request for more information about the pest and heating allegations. That should have been enough to convince the district court to deny the motion to dismiss. The jail's counsel would then have deposed the plaintiff and maybe other inmates and also jail employees and on the basis of the testimony elicited in those depositions might have moved successfully for summary judgment. Because the district judge terminated the case prematurely, no one will ever know whether the plaintiff's rejected claims concerning pest infestation and (subject to the qualification in footnote 4) inadequate heating are indeed meritless.")

Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 831 (7th Cir. 2015) (on remand) ("We have undertaken the required scrutiny of the record and are convinced that the error in this case cannot be characterized as harmless. True, many of the factors to which the district court invited the jury's attention were the same factors that a jury would assess under the objective standard now mandated by the Supreme Court. Nevertheless, those factors were suggested to the jury not in the context of applying them to an objective test but as circumstantial evidence from which an inference of reckless or malicious intent might be drawn. Moreover, given the evidence of record, the jurors might well have decided that, although the officers had acted in an objectively unreasonable manner, they did not have the subjective intent required by the erroneous instruction. That is, the jurors might well have concluded that the officers acted in an objectively unreasonable manner in their effort to handle a manacled prisoner, a conclusion supported by the testimony of Mr. Kingsley's expert. Nevertheless, the jury also might have concluded that the officers, while unreasonable in their approach, did not have a reckless or malicious intent. Under the Supreme Court's holding, Mr. Kingsley should prevail if he is able to establish that the officers acted in an unreasonable manner—without regard to their subjective intent. The evidence of record would have supported a finding for him under that theory, but the jury was told that it also had to find the officers had a proscribed intent. This last requirement increased, significantly, his burden of proof. The error was not harmless.").

Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 831-33 (7th Cir. 2015) (on remand) ("The defendants next suggest that they should be able to avoid retrial because they are entitled to qualified immunity. Their argument is a nuanced one. In their view, the decision of the Supreme Court, resolving a circuit split in its decision in this case, altered the substantive law of liability. Because there was a division among the circuits on the state of the law at the time that they acted, they contend that they cannot be held liable for their actions. Although the matter of qualified immunity was brought to the attention of the Court, its instructions to us make no mention of our returning to this issue. In any event, we do not believe that this defense is a viable one here. . . .[I]n this case, the scope of the right in issue must be drawn more narrowly than the right of a pretrial detainee to be free from excessive force during his detention; instead, we must examine whether the law clearly established that the use of a Taser on a non-resisting detainee, lying prone and handcuffed behind his back, was constitutionally excessive. Here, the facts surrounding the underlying incident are in sharp dispute. When those facts are construed in the light most favorable to Mr. Kingsley, see Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 201 (2001), a reasonable officer was certainly on notice at the time of the occurrence that Mr. Kingsley's conduct did not justify the sort of force described in his account. According to Mr. Kingsley, he was not resisting the officers in a manner that justified slamming his head into the wall, using a Taser while he was manacled, and leaving him alone after use of that instrument. Our precedent makes clear that when the officers applied the Taser to Mr. Kingsley in May 2010, use of the Taser violated Mr. Kingsley's right to be free from excessive force if he was not resisting. . . If we were to accept the defendants' argument here, we would untether the qualified immunity defense from its moorings of protecting those acting in reliance on a standard that is later determined to be infirm. Here, before and after the Supreme Court's decision in this case, the standards for the amount of force that can be permissibly employed remain the same. To accept the defense of qualified immunity here, we would have to accept the dubious proposition that, at the time the officers acted, they were on notice only that they could not have a reckless or malicious intent and that, as long as they acted without such an intent, they could apply any degree of force they chose. As we have noted, however, the law clearly established that the amount of force had to be reasonable in light of the legitimate objectives of the institution. Accordingly, the judgment of the district court is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.")

Price on behalf of J.K. v. Mueller-Owens, No. 19-CV-854-BBC, 2021 WL 354190, at *8–9 (W.D. Wis. Feb. 2, 2021) ("The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit has not yet considered how the Kingsley standard would apply in school cases, but even before Kingsley, the court criticized the 'shocks the conscience' phraseology and did not require a showing of malice, brutality or sadism in all substantive due process cases. . . And at least one circuit court has held that the Kinglsey standard applies to all excessive force claims brought under the Fourteenth Amendment, not just those brought by pretrial detainees. Edrei v. Maguire, 892 F.3d 525, 537 (2d Cir. 2018). . . For these reasons, I will apply the Fourth Amendment objective reasonableness standard set forth in Wallace to plaintiff's unlawful seizure and excessive force claims.")

Galan-Reyes v. Acoff, No. 20-CV-345-SMY, 2020 WL 2497133, at *4 (S.D. Ill. May 14, 2020) ("[D]espite the best efforts of Respondent Acuff and Pulaski staff, COVID-19 infections persist at the facility. . . According to Acuff's Supplemental Declaration, as of May 9, 2020, 15 Pulaski staff members have tested positive for COVID-19 (14 of whom have been cleared by the Illinois Department of Public Health (IDPH) to return to work) and 17 detainees have tested positive (10 of those have recovered per IDPH and have been returned to general population). . . Under the circumstances, Galan-Reyes' detention at Pulaski – where he shares dormitory-style living quarters with up to 50 other detainees – which obviously places him at risk for contracting this serious and potentially deadly illness, is tantamount to punishment. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015) (a detainee who has not been convicted of a crime may not be held under conditions that amount to punishment); Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 535 (1979). For the foregoing reasons, in the absence of clear and convincing evidence that his release would endanger the public or that he is a flight risk, coupled with the known risks associated with the presence of COVID-19 at Pulaski, this Court concludes that Galan-Reyes' continued indefinite detention violates his Fifth Amendment right to due process. The government's interests in continuing his detention must therefore yield to his liberty and safety interests.")

Lentz v. Marion County Sheriff's Office, No. 118CV03938TABTWP, 2020 WL 2097801, at *6–8 (S.D. Ind. May 1, 2020) ("Although Kingsley dealt with a pretrial detainee's claim for excessive force, the Seventh Circuit recently held that this objective inquiry also applies to pretrial detainees' medical claims. Miranda v. County of Lake, 900 F.3d 335, 352 (7th Cir. 2018). Following Miranda, the Seventh Circuit held that 'Kingsley's objective inquiry applies to all Fourteenth Amendment conditions-of-confinement claims brought by pretrial detainees.' Hardeman, 933 F.3d at 823. The parties analyze Lentz's claim under the Eighth Amendment's two-prong deliberate indifference standard. . . . Given the holdings in Kingsley, Miranda, and Hardeman, Lentz's failure to protect claim must be analyzed under Kingsley's objective standard. Viewed in the light most favorable to Lentz, the evidence shows that MCSO has a policy, practice, or custom of holding newly arrested detainees charged with non-violent misdemeanors in the same large holding cells as newly arrested detainees charged with serious violent felonies (with the exception of murder); holding newly arrested detainees charged with non-violent misdemeanors in the same large cells as newly arrested detainees with prior violent felony convictions; and only segregating for infirmity those detainees who require a wheelchair, a walker, crutches, or other mobility device. These polices, practices, or customs, however, are largely irrelevant to Lentz's claim. There is no evidence that Maclean or Galarza were being held on violent felony charges on November 15, 2017. To the contrary, Maclean was being held on four misdemeanor charges, and Galarza was held on three non-violent felony charges. Although Maclean has prior convictions for low-level, violent felonies, Galarza does not appear to have any prior convictions for crimes of violence. The evidence does not support a reasonable inference that Lentz was 'frail' at the time of his arrest, and Lentz concedes that he concealed potentially relevant information about his health from the nursing staff during his medical evaluation. Given this evidence, Lentz's due process claim against MCSO may only survive summary judgment if the evidence creates a reasonable inference that MCSO's policy of temporarily holding newly arrested detainees charged with non-violent misdemeanors in the same cells as other detainees with prior violent felony convictions is unconstitutional. To meet this burden, the evidence must show that the policy is not rationally related to a legitimate, non-punitive purpose or that the policy is excessive in relation to that purpose. . . . MCSO has the difficult task of processing and securing a high volume of newly arrested detainees in a safe and efficient manner. It prioritizes its limited resources to providing segregated holding cells to detainees charged with murder, detainees confined to wheelchairs and other mobility devices, and detainees at risk of suicide. Deputies frequently perform in-person clock rounds of detainees who are held together, and a security camera records video footage that can be reviewed during subsequent investigations and prosecutions. Under these circumstances, MCSO's policies were not objectively unreasonable. Lentz was the victim of a random and brutal act of violence by two fellow detainees. However, there is no material evidence that this attack was caused by an unconstitutional policy, practice, or custom of MCSO. Accordingly, the defendants' motion for summary judgment on Lentz's Fourteenth Amendment due process claim is granted.")

Johnson v. Schuyler County, No. 16-4204, 2019 WL 2778084, at *2–3 (C.D. Ill. July 2, 2019) ("In Miranda v. Cty. of Lake, 900 F.3d 335 (7th Cir. 2018), the Seventh Circuit extended the Supreme Court's reasoning in Kingsley to hold that courts must analyze a detainee's medical-care claims under an objective reasonableness standard, rather than the Eighth Amendment's deliberate indifference standard. . . Miranda appears to limit its holding to 'medical-care claims,' while suggesting that courts should apply the objective reasonableness standard to all conditions-of-confinement claims brought by a detainee. Id. at 352 ("We see nothing in the logic the Supreme Court used in Kingsley that would support ... dissection of the different types of claims that arise under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . Regardless of the standard the Court applies to Plaintiff's claim arising from the car ride from the TDF to the Schuyler County Jail, Plaintiff's claims cannot survive. Under the objective reasonableness standard, a plaintiff must show that: (1) the official 'acted purposefully, knowingly, or perhaps even recklessly' when taking the actions at issue—negligence, or even gross negligence, will not suffice; and (2) that those actions were objectively unreasonable. . . The deliberate indifference standard focuses on whether an official acted with deliberate indifference towards an objectively serious risk of harm. . . The outside temperatures at the time of Plaintiff's transport were not extreme, and nothing suggests that Plaintiff was forced to remain outside for a duration longer than it would have taken him to walk from a building to the vehicle and visa-versa. Plaintiff does not allege that Defendants Rose and Wear attempted to increase his discomfort (e.g. by opening a window during the ride, taking an unnecessarily long detour for no legitimate reason) or otherwise subjected Plaintiff to an excessive risk to his health or safety. At worst, Plaintiff had to endure a three-to-four (3-4) minute drive in temperatures he did not find comfortable. A reasonable officer in Defendants' positions could not have appreciated that a short vehicle ride under those circumstances would have presented an excessive risk to Plaintiff's health or safety, and Plaintiff has not presented evidence to show that limiting his clothing to a jumpsuit under those circumstances was objectively unreasonable. Accordingly, the Court finds that no reasonable juror could find that Defendants subjected Plaintiff to inhumane conditions of confinement.")

Hyche v. Wisconsin, No. 17-482-WMC, 2019 WL 1866315, at *1 (W.D. Wis. Apr. 25, 2019) ("Historically, the Seventh Circuit has applied the Eighth Amendment standard to detainee's constitutional claims related to conditions of confinement, but it recently changed course based on the Supreme Court's reasoning in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), that excessive force claims by pretrial detainees are governed by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Specifically, in Miranda v. Cty. of Lake, 900 F.3d 335 (7th Cir. 2018), the Seventh Circuit extended the holding in Kingsley to medical care claims. . . Given that a prisoner's medical care is just one subset of a conditions of confinement claim, it is reasonable to infer that Kingsley applies with equal force to the type of conditions of confinement claims plaintiff outlines here. Indeed, other courts in this circuit have assumed the same. [collecting cases]")

Romero-Arrizabal v. Ramos, No. 16-CV-5967, 2019 WL 1281968, at *4–5 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 20, 2019) ("On its face, the holding in Miranda was limited to 'medical-care claims.'. . Since medical claims are a subset of conditions-of-confinement claims, this Court concludes, as other judges in this circuit have, that the objective reasonableness standard announced in Miranda applies generally to conditions-of-confinement claims brought by detainees. . . The Court also finds the analysis in these cases, and particularly in Sibley, regarding how Miranda should be understood to affect the inquiry into conditions of confinement for detainees to be persuasive. When a prisoner challenges his conditions of confinement, two elements are required to establish that the Eighth Amendment has been violated. First, there must be 'an objective showing that the conditions are sufficiently serious—i.e., that they deny the inmate "the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities."'. . Second, there must be 'a subjective showing of a defendant's culpable state of mind.'. . For suits by prisoners under the Eighth Amendment, 'the mental state of the prison official must have been one of deliberate indifference to inmate health or safety.'. . For detainees, however, the analysis is now different. After Miranda, a detainee bringing a conditions-of-confinement claim under the Due Process Clause 'need only allege that "defendant's conduct was objectively unreasonable"—in addition to alleging that the conditions of confinement were sufficiently serious.'. . In other words, for detainees, the conditions-of-confinement inquiry remains a two-part test, and Miranda altered only one of the two prongs. Miranda modified the requirement for what the defendant's mental state must be with respect to the detainee's conditions of confinement, replacing the deliberate-indifference standard with one of objective unreasonableness. But it did not change the governing standards regarding the severity of the conditions that would qualify as a constitutional violation under the Due Process Clause. A detainee must still demonstrate that the conditions of confinement are 'sufficiently serious,' which is to say that they must deny the detainee 'the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities.'")

Corbier v. Watson, No. 16-CV-257-SMY-MAB, 2019 WL 351498, at *5 (S.D. Ill. Jan. 29, 2019) ("Under Kingsley and Miranda, in order to prove a failure to protect claim, a plaintiff need only establish that the defendant's conduct was objectively unreasonable – not that the defendant was subjectively aware that it was unreasonable. Miranda, 900 F.3d at 352-53. In other words, a plaintiff must show that a defendant 'knew, or should have known, that [a] condition posed an excessive risk to health or safety' of the detainee and 'failed to act with reasonable care to mitigate the risk.'. . This is a more exacting standard than that required to prove negligence, or even gross negligence and is 'akin to reckless disregard.'")

Terry v. County of Milwaukee, No. 17-CV-1112-JPS, 2019 WL 181329, at *6-9 (E.D. Wis. Jan. 11, 2019) ("In extending Kingsley to a pretrial detainee's claim of medical mistreatment, the Court of Appeals balanced two competing considerations. First, consistent with Kingsley, pretrial detainees should be afforded the benefit of objectively reasonable conduct by their custodians. . . Second, consistent with longstanding precedent concerning constitutional claims of medical misconduct, the jail officials' failure to properly recognize or treat the plaintiff's illness must have been the result of something more than negligence, or even gross negligence. . . In fashioning a legal standard that accommodates these competing concerns, the Seventh Circuit created a doctrine that is difficult to apply. The Court of Appeals held that the standard for medical care under the Fourteenth Amendment consists of two questions. First, did the medical defendants act 'purposefully, knowingly, or perhaps even recklessly when they considered the consequences' of their actions? . . . Second, if so, was their conduct objectively reasonable, without consideration for their subjective intent? . . . These elements are not clearly aligned with Kingsley. In Kingsley, the Supreme Court stated that the intent element is intended to foreclose accidents. . . Miranda's intent element initially appears to correlate with this threshold question in Kingsley as to whether the defendant's conduct was volitional. But asking whether the defendant acted purposefully, knowingly, or recklessly with respect to 'the consequences of [his actions]' goes well beyond asking whether he performed volitional acts. . . For instance, it is indisputable that a doctor who performs a surgical removal of a limb engaged in volitional acts to bring about that removal—he did not cut off the patient's leg by accident. It is a far different question to ask whether he performed those acts with purposeful, knowing, or reckless indifference to the consequences of the removal—i.e., future infection, removing the wrong leg, permanent handicap or disfigurement, or other medical problems. When read this way, Kingsley's first element, which is intended to exclude those claims where the harm caused was a complete accident, . . . does not align with the first element set forth in Miranda. This is to say, Miranda's volitional element probes the defendant's appreciation of the consequences of his actions, while Kingsley's does not. On the other hand, the examples in Kingsley that illustrate intentional conduct consist entirely of the defendant acting in ways that result in harm. One does not purposefully, knowingly, or recklessly punch/push/tase someone without knowing, on some level, that there is a high risk that the subject is going to get hit/pushed/stunned. Thus, despite the Supreme Court's assertion to the contrary, perhaps the first element in Kingsley is intended to probe the defendant's appreciation of the consequences of his action. If that is the case, then the subjective element in Kingsley is less at odds with Miranda, but no easier to apply in the medical context, for the reasons discussed below. . . In essence, Miranda's attempt to harmonize Kingsley with the negligence-is-not-enough principle has created an entirely new standard of constitutional liability: reckless indifference. Doctrinal concerns with Miranda aside, the Court is left to apply the law to the case before it. Thus, a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment right to medical care is violated if: (1) there was an objectively serious medical need; (2) the defendant made a volitional act with regard to the plaintiff's medical need; (3) that act was objectively unreasonable under the circumstances in terms of treating or assessing the patient's serious medical need; and (4) the defendant 'acted purposefully, knowingly, or perhaps even recklessly' with respect to the risk of harm. . . Even with the rule articulated above, is difficult to envision a world in which a defendant acted reasonably under the circumstances, but also acted purposefully, knowingly, or recklessly with regard to a high risk of harm. In any application, the Court will be ultimately applying a recklessness test. The 'objective' prong functions primarily as a gatekeeper for the intent prong. . . . As explained above, there is evidence to support a reasonable jury's conclusion that Wenzel and Bevenue violated Terry's Fourteenth Amendment right because they acted unreasonably under the circumstances and purposefully, knowingly, or recklessly ignored that Terry was in labor, causing her to give birth alone in a filthy cell. The cases against them will move forward unless qualified immunity applies.")

Terry v. County of Milwaukee, No. 17-CV-1112-JPS, 2019 WL 181329, at *9-10 (E.D. Wis. Jan. 11, 2019) ([T]he 'objectively unreasonable' standard for pretrial detainees that was announced in Miranda is not entirely new. It is well-established in this circuit that arrestees awaiting their probable cause hearings have a right to medical care that is protected under the Fourth Amendment's 'objectively unreasonable' standard. Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626, 629–30 (7th Cir. 2013); Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523 (7th Cir. 2011). In Ortiz, the Seventh Circuit denied qualified immunity despite uncertainty over whether the 'deliberately indifferent' or objectively unreasonable' standard governed medical care claims for arrestees because it was clear that the Fourth Amendment protected arrestees at the time of the plaintiff's death. Id. at 538. The Court of Appeals further held that qualified immunity was inappropriate because defendants' conduct would not have been entitled to qualified immunity under the deliberate indifference standard anyway. . . Thus, Miranda does not change the qualified immunity standard. The defendants may argue that they believed they were held to the deliberate indifference standard and did not realize that they would be subject to the objectively unreasonable standard of care. This is, in effect, an argument that defendants were unaware that they had to act a modicum more humanely towards Terry. Such a miserable contention is not persuasive. . . Although mistakes of fact may sometimes give rise to qualified immunity, . . it was well established at the time that the Fourteenth Amendment protected pretrial detainees. [citing Wolfish] Moreover, Terry's arguments, 'if credited by a jury, satisf[y] the deliberate indifference standard because she argues that the defendants were subjectively aware that she had a serious medical condition...and failed to respond.'. . Therefore, even if the Court applied the old standard, qualified immunity would not be appropriate. As discussed below, Wenzel and Bevenue knew, without a doubt, that detainees had a constitutional right to medical care, and they also knew that they were not allowed to ignore serious medical risks. That was true under the deliberate indifference standard, and it remains true under the new standard.")

Scott Peters, Plaintiff, v. Dr. Young Sun Kim, Defendants., No. 15 CV 7236, 2018 WL 6398915, at *5-6 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 6, 2018) ("In the light most favorable to plaintiff, the court will analyze his claims under the Fourteenth Amendment standard and under the guidance of Miranda regarding all of his contacts with defendant. Miranda teaches the proper inquiry is two-step. 'The first step, which focuses on the intentionality of the individual defendant's conduct, remains unchanged.'. . The question is 'whether the medical defendant[ ] acted purposefully, knowingly, or perhaps even recklessly when [he] considered the consequences of [his] handling of [plaintiff's]' medical care. . . A showing of negligence or gross negligence will not be enough - plaintiff must prove 'something akin to reckless disregard.'. . In the second step, aligned with Kingsley, plaintiff must demonstrate defendant's conduct was objectively unreasonable - not that defendant was subjectively aware that it was unreasonable. . . In other words, plaintiff must show that defendant acted intentionally or recklessly - a more 'exacting standard' than that required to prove negligence. . . Defendant argues he is entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law because, regardless of which standard (objective or subjective) is applied, plaintiff's claims fail because defendant, in his care and treatment of plaintiff, did not violate plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . . The court's review of the record, including the videotaped evidence of defendant's and plaintiff's interactions in the medical unit, show that defendant's care and conduct was proper and objectively reasonable.")

Stidimire v. Watson, No. 17-CV-1183-SMY-SCW, 2018 WL 4680666, at *4 (S.D. Ill. Sept. 28, 2018) ("Under Kingsley and Miranda then, a pretrial detainee need only establish that the defendant's conduct was objectively unreasonable – not that the defendant was subjectively aware that it was unreasonable. . . In other words, a plaintiff must show that a defendant acted intentionally or recklessly as he 'knew, or should have known, that the condition posed an excessive risk to health or safety' and 'failed to act with reasonable care to mitigate the risk.'. . This is a more exacting standard than that required to prove negligence, or even gross negligence and is 'akin to reckless disregard.'. .Applying the Miranda standard, the Court finds that Plaintiff's allegations plausibly suggest that Defendants Walter, Knyff, and Ripperda acted purposefully, knowingly or recklessly regarding Stidimire's risk of suicide, and that their conduct was objectively unreasonable. During booking, 19-year old Stidimire was visibly disturbed, scared, and concerned that something improper was occurring. Despite Stidimire's obvious fear and signs of distress, Walter did not ask him any questions regarding his current mental state, his mental health history, nor did he refer him to mental health for further evaluation. On the day he committed suicide, Stidimire appeared seriously and visibly distraught throughout the day. Thus, it is plausible that Knyff and Ripperada, who were responsible for conducting cell checks in Stidimire's block that day, were aware that Stidimire was exhibiting signs of distress, was at a high risk for suicide, and did nothing. Accordingly, Defendants' Motion is denied as to the claims asserted in Count I against Defendants Walter, Knyff, and Ripperda.")

Moore v. Germaine, No. 18-CV-01378-JPG, 2018 WL 4027575, at *2 (S.D. Ill. Aug. 23, 2018) ("In Kingsley, the United States Supreme Court held that the due process standard for excessive force claims of pretrial detainees is less demanding than the Eighth Amendment standard for claims brought by convicted persons. . . The Seventh Circuit recently extended the same logic to a medical claim brought by a pretrial detainee in Miranda and analyzed the defendants' conduct under an objective reasonableness standard, instead of a deliberate indifference standard. [citing Miranda] Given that medical claims are a subset of conditions-of-confinement claims, it stands to reason that the same objective reasonableness standard would apply to Plaintiff's claim if he was a pretrial detainee during the relevant time period. . . Count 3 survives screening against all four defendants under this less demanding standing.")

McWilliams v. Cook County, No. 15 C 53, 2018 WL 3970145, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 20, 2018) ("The Seventh Circuit recently held in Miranda that Kingsley's logic applies as well to medical treatment claims. . . In turn, Miranda's logic reaches the broader genus of conditions of confinement claims, of which medical treatment claims are merely a species. . . . Under Kingsley and Miranda, then, a plaintiff states a Fourteenth Amendment conditions of confinement claim by alleging that (1) the defendant 'acted purposefully, knowingly, or perhaps even recklessly' and (2) the defendant's conduct was objectively unreasonable. . . Unlike in the Eighth Amendment context, deliberate indifference—the defendant's subjective awareness that her conduct was unreasonable—is not required.")

Phillips v. People of Illinois, No. 18-CV-01058-JPG, 2018 WL 2412400, at *3 (S.D. Ill. May 29, 2018) ("It is still unclear whether the reasoning of Kingsley extends beyond claims of excessive force to claims based on unconstitutional conditions of confinement. . . The Court nevertheless finds that the conditions described in the Complaint are sufficiently serious under both the Fourteenth and Eighth Amendments to warrant further review of this matter. These conditions include, but are not limited to, a lack of adequate bedding, exercise, and sanitary living conditions. . . The Complaint describes conditions that may 'violate the Constitution in combination when they have a "mutually enforcing effect that produces the deprivation of a single, identifiable human need."'. . For screening purposes, the Court finds that the conditions at issue are sufficiently 'serious' to trigger constitutional concerns under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments.")

Murphy v. Allen, No. 18-CV-00957-JPG, 2018 WL 2329743, at *3 (S.D. Ill. May 23, 2018) ("The Seventh Circuit has not decided whether the reasoning in Kingsley extends beyond claims of excessive force to claims for unconstitutional conditions of confinement, including medical care. See Smego v. Jumper, 707 F. App'x 411, 412 (7th Cir. Dec. 29, 2017) (citing Collins, 851 F.3d at 731; but see Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 36 (2d Cir. 2017) (applying objective-reasonableness standard to detainee's conditions-of-confinement claim); Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1071 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) (same with failure-to-protect claim)). However, this question is not one that must be resolved for purposes of this screening order. Plaintiff's inadequate medical care claim survives review under both standards, including the more demanding Eighth Amendment standard.")

Benson v. Geiger, No. 3:17-CV-865-JD-MGG, 2018 WL 2299245, at *1 n.1 (N.D. Ind. May 21, 2018) ("This is an Eighth Amendment test. 'Although the Eighth Amendment applies only to convicted persons, pretrial detainees...are entitled to the same basic protections under the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. Accordingly, [courts] apply the same legal standards to deliberate indifference claims brought under either the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment.' Minix v. Canarecci, 597 F.3d 824, 831 (7th Cir. 2010). See also Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n. 31 (7th Cir. 2016) (clarifying that Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. __, __; 135 S.Ct. 2466 (2015) did not change the applicability of the Eighth Amendment standard to pre-trial detainee deliberate indifference claims).")

Teen v. Germaine, No. 18-CV-996-JPG, 2018 WL 2299231, at *2–3 (S.D. Ill. May 21, 2018) ("The propriety of applying the more stringent standard to pretrial detainees' conditions of confinement claims was recently called into question by Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015). . . However, Kingsley was an excessive force case, and it is not yet clear that the objective standard applies in other types of pretrial detention conditions cases. In 2016, the Seventh Circuit suggested that the deliberate indifference standard still applies to other types of claims by pretrial detainees. See Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cnty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n.31 (7th Cir. 2016) (acknowledging Kingsley but applying deliberate indifference standard to medical claim brought by pretrial detainee). In a subsequent decision, however, the Court of Appeals applied the objective unreasonableness standard to a conditions of confinement claim raised by several pretrial detainees. Mulvania v. Sheriff of Rock Island Cty., 850 F.3d 849, 856-58 (7th Cir. 2017). After Mulvania, the Seventh Circuit has acknowledged, but declined to decide the issue on two occasions. In Collins v. Al-Shami, 851 F.3d 727, (7th Cir. 2017), a conditions case involving medical care, the Seventh Circuit expressly declined to address whether Kingsley applied to the plaintiff's claims because resolution of the issue was unnecessary to the case before it. Collins, 851 F.3d at 731. The Appellate Court took the same route in Smego v. Jumper, 707 F. App'x 411 (7th Cir. 2017) (unpublished) . . . . Most recently, however, the Seventh Circuit stated as follows, with regard to a pretrial detainee's claim involving deficient medical care:

As a pretrial detainee, [plaintiff's] constitutional rights are derived from the Fourteenth Amendment's due-process clause rather than the Eighth Amendment, which applies to convicted inmates. Smith v. Dart, 803 F.3d 304, 309 (7th Cir. 2015). But the standards are virtually indistinguishable. A detainee must have a medical condition 'objectively serious enough to amount to a constitutional deprivation,' and 'the defendant prison official must possess a sufficiently culpable state of mind.'. .

Ayoubi v. Dart, 2018 WL 1445986, *3 (7th Cir. March 23, 2018) (unpublished).

In the instant case, the Court need not resolve any uncertainty pertaining to Kingsley. As is set forth more fully below, the Court finds that Count 9 survives even under the more stringent deliberate indifference standard.") Newsome v. Madison County, Illinois, No. 316CV01103JPGDGW, 2018 WL 2064989, at *2–3 (S.D. Ill. May 3, 2018) ("Mr. Newsome died at the jail shortly after he was arrested and before his probable cause hearing. Accordingly, Mr. Newsome is what is known as a pre-Gerstein arrestee. When a pre-Gerstein arrestee brings a constitutional claim arising from his conditions of confinement, it is typically covered by the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness test—a more stringent standard than Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference. . . And that makes perfect sense: if the police arrest a man and toss him in jail, and that man has not yet appeared before a judge to determine whether there was probable cause for the arrest in the first place, surely the jail should exercise even more caution than usual to ensure that they are not violating that man's rights. . . While the Seventh Circuit has not yet had the opportunity to apply this rationale to failure to protect claims, they have already done so with Eighth Amendment inadequate medical care cases. See, e.g., Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523, 530 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Because Molina had not yet benefitted from a judicial determination of probable cause, otherwise known as a Gerstein hearing, we agree that the Fourth Amendment applies."); King v. Kramer, 763 F.3d 635, 641–48 (7th Cir. 2014) (reversing and remanding when the district court incorrectly applied the Eighth Amendment standard instead of the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness test). And considering the Supreme Court has recently extended the doctrine to excessive force claims by pre-trial detainees, it is logical to also apply the doctrine to failure to protect claims in the same manner. . . Both parties recognized this distinction in their briefs. Newsome claims that she pled her Fourteenth and Fourth Amendment claims in the alternative so that she may proceed on whichever the Court deems correct. The defendants, however, assert that the Fourteenth/Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference standard should apply here—but they are incorrect in light of Kingsley, Lopez, Williams, Ortiz, and King. The defendants also argue that 'the Fourth Amendment does not provide remedies for failure to protect claims' at all, but that is wrong. Failure to protect claims arising under the Fourth Amendment focus on an individual's right to be free from an unreasonable seizure, and the Seventh Circuit has long recognized that theory as valid. Yang v. Hardin, 37 F.3d 282, 284–86 (7th Cir. 1994). Accordingly, the Court will dismiss the 14th Amendment claims—Counts II, IV, and VI—for failure to state a claim for relief, and proceed on the Fourth Amendment claims.")

White on behalf of Scarpi v. Watson, No. 16-CV-560-JPG-DGW, 2018 WL 2047934, at *6 n.2 (S.D. Ill. May 2, 2018) ("There is some uncertainty about whether Kingsley changed the standard applicable to suits by pretrial detainees. In Kingsley, a pretrial detainee sued for excessive force, and the Supreme Court held that the appropriate standard was whether the officers' purposeful or knowing use of force was objectively unreasonable, not whether the officers were subjectively aware that their use of force was unreasonable. . . Kingsley calls into question whether deliberate indifference is the correct standard for a pretrial detainee's conditions of confinement claim, but the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals has suggested the Eighth Amendment standard still applies. See Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n. 31 (7th Cir. 2016). But see Mulvania v. Sheriff of Rock Island Cty., 850 F.3d 849, 856-58 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 361 (2017) (applying objective unreasonableness standard to conditions of confinement claim). However, it has declined to decide definitively whether Kingsley changed the applicable standard in claims other than excessive force claims. See Collins v. Al-Shami, 851 F.3d 727, 731 (7th Cir. 2017); Smego v. Jumper, 707 F. App'x 411, 412 (7th Cir. 2017).")

Garrett v. McLauren, No. 17-CV-871-JPG, 2018 WL 1706380, at *4–5 (S.D. Ill. Apr. 9, 2018) ("Kingsley was an excessive force case, and it is not yet clear the objective standard applies in other types of pretrial detention conditions cases. In 2016, the Seventh Circuit suggested that the deliberate indifference standard still applies to other types of claims by pretrial detainees. See Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cnty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n.31 (7th Cir. 2016) (acknowledging Kingsley but applying deliberate indifference standard to medical claim brought by pretrial detainee). In a subsequent decision, however, the Seventh Circuit applied the objective unreasonableness standard to a claim raised by several pretrial detainees based on a jail's policy that deprived inmates of their underwear if it was not white. Mulvania v. Sheriff of Rock Island Cty., 850 F.3d 849, 856-58 (7th Cir. 2017). After Mulvania, the Seventh Circuit has acknowledged, but declined to decide the issue on two occasions. See Collins v. Al-Shami, 851 F.3d 727, (7th Cir. 2017) (conditions of confinement case where Seventh Circuit expressly declined to address whether Kingsley applied to plaintiff's claims); Smego v. Jumper, 707 F. App'x 411 (7th Cir. 2017) ("We have not decided whether the reasoning in Kingsley extends beyond claims of excessive force. See Collins, 851 F.3d at 731; but see Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17, 36 (2d Cir. 2017) (applying objective-reasonableness standard to detainee's conditions-of-confinement claim); Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1071 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) (same with failure-to-protect claim)."). In the instant case, the Court need not resolve any uncertainty pertaining to Kingsley and Plaintiff's conditions of confinement claim. Plaintiff's allegations regarding mold in the showers are incredibly general and do not address how Plaintiff, personally, has been affected by the mold.")

Nichols v. St. Clair County Jail, No. 18-CV-572-JPG, 2018 WL 1617820, at *3 (S.D. Ill. Apr. 4, 2018) ("The propriety of applying this more stringent standard to Fourteenth Amendment claims was recently called into question by Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), 'which applied a purely objective standard to a detainee's excessive- force claim without regard to any subjective component.'. . However, Kingsley was an excessive force case, and the Seventh Circuit has not decided whether the objective reasonableness standard applies to cases involving inadequate medical care. . . In the instant case, at screening, the Court need not resolve which standard is applicable to Plaintiff's medical claims. This is because, as is set forth more fully below, the Court finds that Count 1 survives under the more-demanding deliberate indifference standard, and the Court finds that Count 2 fails to state a claim regardless of which standard applies.")

Teen v. Smith, No. 17-CV-916-JPG, 2018 WL 1407201, at *3–4 (S.D. Ill. Mar. 21, 2018) ("The propriety of applying the more stringent standard to pretrial detainees' conditions of confinement claims was recently called into question by Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015). . . . However, Kingsley was an excessive force case, and it is not yet clear that the objective standard applies in other types of pretrial detention conditions cases. In 2016, the Seventh Circuit suggested that the deliberate indifference standard still applies to other types of claims by pretrial detainees. See Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cnty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n.31 (7th Cir. 2016) (acknowledging Kingsley but applying deliberate indifference standard to medical claim brought by pretrial detainee). In a subsequent decision, however, the Court of Appeals applied the objective unreasonableness standard to a conditions of confinement claim raised by several pretrial detainees. Mulvania v. Sheriff of Rock Island Cty., 850 F.3d 849, 856-58 (7th Cir. 2017). . . After Mulvania, the Seventh Circuit has acknowledged, but declined to decide the issue on two occasions. In Collins v. Al-Shami, 851 F.3d 727, (7th Cir. 2017), a conditions case involving medical care, the Seventh Circuit expressly declined to address whether Kingsley applied to the plaintiff's claims because resolution of the issue was unnecessary to the case before it. Collins, 851 F.3d at 731. The Appellate Court took the same route in Smego v. Jumper, 707 F. App'x 411 (7th Cir. 2017)[.] . . . In the instant case, the Court need not resolve any uncertainty pertaining to Kingsley and Plaintiff's conditions of confinement claims (Counts 1 through 5). As is set forth more fully below, the Court finds that Count 4 survives even under the more stringent deliberate indifference standard.")

Sill v. Moore, No. 18-CV-405-JPG, 2018 WL 1407188, at *2 (S.D. Ill. Mar. 21, 2018) ("In the past, the Seventh Circuit applied the deliberate-indifference standard derived from the Eighth Amendment to Fourteenth Amendment inadequate medical care claims. Collins v. Al-Shami, 851 F.3d 727, 731 (7th Cir. 2017). The deliberate indifference standard 'includes both an objective and subjective component and thus is more difficult to satisfy than its Fourth Amendment counterpart, which requires only that the defendant have been objectively unreasonable under the circumstances.'. . The propriety of applying this more stringent standard to Fourteenth Amendment claims was recently called into question by Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), 'which applied a purely objective standard to a detainee's excessive-force claim without regard to any subjective component.' Smego v. Jumper, 707 F. App'x 411, 412 (7th Cir. 2017)

(citing Collins, 851 F.3d at 731). However, Kingsley was an excessive force case, and the Seventh Circuit has not decided whether the objective reasonableness standard applies to cases involving inadequate medical care. See Collins, 851 F.3d at 731 (expressly declining to resolve the issue); Smego, 707 F. App'x at 412 (same). In the instant case, at screening, the Court need not resolve (1) whether Plaintiff was an arrestee or pretrial detainee at the time of the alleged constitutional violations or (2) whether, if Plaintiff was a detainee, the standard applicable to Plaintiff's medical claim. This is because, as is set forth more fully below, the Court finds that Count 1 fails to state a claim regardless of which standard applies.")

Swisher v. Porter County Sheriff's Dep't., No. 3:10-CV-337-MGG, 2018 WL 1400889, at *8 n. 15 (N.D. Ind. Mar. 20, 2018) ("Swisher was a pre-trial detainee when these events occurred. 'Although the Eighth Amendment applies only to convicted persons, pretrial detainees...are entitled to the same basic protections under the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. Accordingly, [courts] apply the same legal standards to deliberate indifference claims brought under either the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment.' Minix v. Canarecci, 597 F.3d 824, 831 (7th Cir. 2010). See also Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n. 31 (7th Cir. 2016) (clarifying that Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. __, __; 135 S.Ct. 2466 (2015) did not change the applicability of the Eighth Amendment standard to pre-trial detainee deliberate indifference claims).")

Stewart v. Lakin, No. 15-CV-974-JPG-DGW, 2018 WL 1181312, at *2 (S.D. Ill. Mar. 7, 2018) ("Kingsley calls into question whether deliberate indifference is the correct standard for a pretrial detainee's conditions of confinement claim, but the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals has left open the question of whether the Eighth Amendment standard still applies. Smego v. Jumper, 707 F. App'x 411, 412 (7th Cir. 2017); see Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n. 31 (7th Cir. 2016) (applying Eighth Amendment standard to inadequate medical treatment claim). But see Mulvania v. Sheriff of Rock Island Cty., 850 F.3d 849, 856-58 (7th Cir. 2017) (applying objective unreasonableness standard to conditions of confinement claim). However, whether the objective reasonableness or deliberate indifference standard applies, the result is the same: Lakin and Bost are entitled to summary judgment on Count 2. The Court has reviewed the matter de novo and has determined that there is no evidence from which a reasonable jury could find that they enacted or implemented the policy of requiring observation rounds at least every thirty minutes unreasonably or with deliberate indifference to the risk it posed to Stewart between the observation times.")

Fennell v. Dickson, No. 17-CV-00961-JPG, 2018 WL 1124506, at *3 (S.D. Ill. Mar. 1, 2018) ("If Plaintiff was a detainee, his claims derive from the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of due process. . . In the past, the Seventh Circuit applied the deliberate-indifference standard derived from the Eighth Amendment to Fourteenth Amendment inadequate medical care claims. . . . The propriety of applying this more stringent standard to Fourteenth Amendment claims was recently called into question by Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), 'which applied a purely objective standard to a detainee's excessive-force claim without regard to any subjective component.'. . . However, Kingsley was an excessive force case, and the Seventh Circuit has not decided whether the objective reasonableness standard applies to cases involving inadequate medical care. . . In the instant case, at screening, the Court need not resolve (1) whether Plaintiff was an arrestee or pretrial detainee at the time of the alleged constitutional violations or (2) whether, if Plaintiff was a detainee, the standard applicable to Plaintiff's medical claims. This is because, as is set forth more fully below, the Court finds that Count 1 (as to Dickson and John Doe 2) and Count 2 (as to Blankenship) survive under the more-demanding deliberate indifference standard, and the Court finds that Count 1 (as to John Doe 1) fails to state a claim under the less-demanding objective reasonableness standard.")

Rees v. Corizon Medical Services, No. 3:17-CV-588-JD-MGG, 2018 WL 1014232, at *2 & n.3 (N.D. Ind. Feb. 22, 2018) ("In medical cases, the Constitution is violated only when a defendant was deliberately indifferent to an inmate's serious medical needs. . . .Although Rees claims that the defendants have violated his Eighth Amendment rights, he was a pre-trial detainee when these events occurred. 'Although the Eighth Amendment applies only to convicted persons, pretrial detainees...are entitled to the same basic protections under the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. Accordingly, [courts] apply the same legal standards to deliberate indifference claims brought under either the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment.' Minix v. Canarecci, 597 F.3d 824, 831 (7th Cir. 2010). See also Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n. 31 (7th Cir. 2016) (clarifying that Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. __, __; 135 S.Ct. 2466 (2015) did not change the applicability of the Eighth Amendment standard to pre-trial detainee deliberate indifference claims).")

Medford v. Smith, No. 17-CV-243-JPG, 2018 WL 889042, at *3 (S.D. Ill. Feb. 14, 2018) ("There is little practical difference between the standards that are applicable to pretrial detainees and convicted prisoners for claims involving the conditions of confinement. Claims brought under the Fourteenth Amendment are 'appropriately analyzed under the Eighth Amendment.' Dart, 803 F.3d at 310 (citing Smego v. Mitchell, 723 F.3d 752, 756 (7th Cir. 2013) ("[T]he protection afforded under [the Due Process Clause] is functionally indistinguishable from the Eighth Amendment's protection for convicted prisoners.")).")

Bartlett v. Winans, No. 16-CV-1185, 2018 WL 297566, at *3 n.3 (C.D. Ill. Jan. 4, 2018) ("The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals has not addressed whether the Supreme Court case of Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466 (2015), which applied an objective standard to a detainee's excessive force claim, applies to a detainee's medical claim. Collins v. Al-Shami, 851 F.3d 727, 731 (7th Cir. 2017). As of this writing, the deliberate indifference standard appears to still apply. See Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook County, 828 F.3d 541 n. 31 (7th Cir. 2016)")

Pratt v. Lawson, No. 3:17-CV-436 RLM, 2017 WL 6446662, at *1 n.1 (N.D. Ind. Dec. 18, 2017) ("Mr. Pratt was a pre-trial detainee when these events occurred. 'Although the Eighth Amendment applies only to convicted persons, pretrial detainees...are entitled to the same basic protections under the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. Accordingly, [courts] apply the same legal standards to deliberate indifference claims brought under either the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment.' Minix v. Canarecci, 597 F.3d 824, 831 (7th Cir. 2010). See also Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n. 31 (7th Cir. 2016) (clarifying that Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. __, __; 135 S.Ct. 2466 (2015) didn't change the applicability of the Eighth Amendment standard to pre-trial detainee deliberate indifference claims).")

Turner v. Waldera, No. 16-CV-384-WMC, 2017 WL 5991840, at *4 (W.D. Wis. Dec. 1, 2017) ("Claims by pretrial detainees regarding deliberate indifference and conditions of confinement are governed by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2475 (2015); Rice ex rel. Rice v. Correctional Medical Services, 675 F.3d 650, 664 (7th Cir. 2012). However, the Seventh Circuit has applied the same standard to conditions of confinement claims under both the Eighth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment. See Smith v. Dart, 803 F.3d 304, 310 (7th Cir. 2015).")

Baker v. Hertz, No. 15-CV-600-JPG-DGW, 2017 WL 5591485, at *2 n.1 (S.D. Ill. Nov. 21, 2017) ("Magistrate Judge Wilkerson applied the Eighth Amendment standard for inadequate medical care to this case. However, there has been some uncertainty about whether Kingsley v. Hendrickson . . . changed this standard for pretrial detainees. In Kingsley, a pretrial detainee sued for excessive force, and the Supreme Court held that the appropriate standard was whether the officers' purposeful or knowing use of force was objectively unreasonable, not whether the officers were subjectively aware that their use of force was unreasonable. . . . Kingsley calls into question whether deliberate indifference is the correct standard for a pretrial detainee's conditions of confinement claim, but the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals has suggested the Eighth Amendment standard still applies. See Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n. 31 (7th Cir. 2016). But see Mulvania v. Sheriff of Rock Island Cty., 850 F.3d 849, 856-58 (7th Cir. 2017) (applying objective unreasonableness standard to conditions of confinement claim).")

Mann v. Burns, No. 14-CV-1358-JPG-SCW, 2017 WL 5573958, at *1 (S.D. Ill. Nov. 20, 2017) ("In the Report, Magistrate Judge Williams set forth the Eighth Amendment standard for cruel and unusual conditions of confinement for convicted prisoners, which has historically been applied to pretrial detainees' conditions of confinement claims under the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause. . . However, as noted in Chief Judge Michael J. Reagan's August 5, 2015, order reviewing this case under 28 U.S.C. § 1915A (Doc. 24), the Supreme Court's ruling in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), has created some uncertainty. . . . Kingsley calls into question whether deliberate indifference is the correct standard for a pretrial detainee's conditions of confinement claim, but the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals has suggested the Eighth Amendment standard still applies. See Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n. 31 (7th Cir. 2016). But see Mulvania v. Sheriff of Rock Island Cty., 850 F.3d 849, 856-58 (7th Cir. 2017) (applying objective unreasonableness standard to conditions of confinement claim). However, even if the correct standard is objective reasonableness, the Court finds that no reasonable jury hearing the facts of this case could conclude that any defendant's conduct was objectively unreasonable in light of the legitimate interest in managing the jail. Their treatment of Mann did not amount to punishment, so they did not violate the Due Process Clause.")

Cozart v. Aramark Correctional Services, LLC, No. 12-CV-3150, 2017 WL 5585714, at *2 (C.D. Ill. Nov. 20, 2017) ("After Kingsley, . . . the Seventh Circuit has continued to rely on the deliberate indifference standard to pretrial detainees' claims for lack of medical care. See, e.g., Daniel v. Cook County, 833 F.3d 728, 732-33 (2016). At this point, the Court can avoid trying to define what greater protection is afforded civil detainees as compared to prisoners. Plaintiff's claim survives summary judgment even under the Eighth Amendment standard. Avoidance may no longer be possible when faced with how the jury should be instructed, but that is a discussion for another day.")

More v. Michek, No. 17-CV-401-JDP, 2017 WL 3995641, at *2 (W.D. Wis. Sept. 8, 2017) ("The Supreme Court in Kingsley v. Hendrickson explained that the applicable standard is objective reasonableness for a pretrial detainee asserting a Fourteenth Amendment claim. . . Kingsley was an excessive force case, and the Seventh Circuit has not decided whether the objective unreasonableness standard applies to cases involving inadequate medical care, but it has not foreclosed that possibility either. . . So for the time being, I would allow More to proceed on a Fourteenth Amendment claim if her medical care was objectively unreasonable. The objective unreasonableness standard does not require a plaintiff to show 'expressed intent to punish.'. . . Although the label 'objective reasonableness' brings tort concepts to mind, a garden-variety negligence claim does not make out a Fourteenth Amendment claim. . . So to establish the objective unreasonableness of the challenged medical care, the plaintiff must show some error beyond ordinary malpractice but not necessarily an error that 'departs radically from "accepted professional practice,"' which would be a way to show deliberate indifference. . . This is a fine line for which courts have not articulated a precise standard, and I need not do so here because More states, at most, a negligence claim.")

Bartlett v. Inoue, No. 15-CV-1466, 2017 WL 2872366, at *4 (C.D. Ill. July 5, 2017) ("Plaintiff was a detainee during the relevant time, so his claim is governed by the Fourteenth Amendment, not the Eighth Amendment. As of this writing, though, the Eighth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment standard for medical claims is indistinguishable. . . .The Seventh Circuit has indicated that the standard on detainee medical claims may need to be revisited in light of a relatively recent Supreme Court case, but as of now the subjective requirement remains deliberate indifference. Collins v. Al-Shami, 851 F.3d 727, 731 (7th Cir. 2017) (declining to decide whether Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466 (2105) requires, for detainee's medical claims, an objective reasonableness standard versus a deliberate indifference standard); Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook County, 828 F.3d 541, 544 (7th Cir. 2016) (applying deliberate indifference standard to detainees' claims of lack of medical care, but acknowledging Kingsley).")

Rogers v. Crow, No. 16-CV-01353-JPG, 2017 WL 2418726, at *2 (S.D. Ill. June 5, 2017) ("The legal standard that governs this claim depends on Plaintiff's status as a pretrial detainee or a convicted prisoner during the relevant time period. The Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause applies to claims of pretrial detainees, and the Eighth Amendment governs claims brought by prisoners. See Smith v. Dart, 803 F.3d 304, 312 (7th Cir. 2015) (citing Kingsley v. Hendrickson, ––– U.S. ––––, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2475 (2015); Budd v. Motley, 711 F.3d 840, 842 (7th Cir. 2013)). A pretrial detainee is entitled to freedom from conditions that constitute 'punishment' under the Fourteenth Amendment, while a convicted prisoner is entitled to freedom from 'cruel and unusual punishment' under the Eighth Amendment. . . With that said, there is little practical difference between the two standards in the context of medical claims.")

Lancour v. Parshall, No. 15-CV-105-WMC, 2017 WL 2198195, at *3 (W.D. Wis. May 18, 2017) ("While there is a point at which, after a person is arrested, claims relating to the constitutionality of confinement and treatment pass from the Fourth to the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, and even later after a conviction to the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause, the Seventh Circuit has explained that in cases in which the arrest was warrantless, the Fourth Amendment generally governs the period of confinement between the arrest and the preliminary hearing at which a determination of probable cause is made, while due process regulates the period of confinement after the initial determination of probable cause. . . Here, defendant has submitted no evidence that plaintiff was arrested pursuant to a warrant or that there was ever any judicial determination of probable cause to arrest. Indeed, the only support defendant offers for his argument that plaintiff's claim is governed by the Fourteenth Amendment is a citation to Wilkins v. May, 872 F.2d 190, 193–95 (7th Cir. 1989), but here, too, defendant is in error. Although Wilkins held that the period between an arrest and a formal charge falls under the rubric of due process rather than the Fourth Amendment, the Seventh Circuit limited this holding in subsequent cases. See Lopez, 464 F.3d at 719 (discussing how Wilkins has been limited by later Seventh Circuit case law). All that being said, it does not really matter to the outcome of defendant's pending summary judgment motion whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment applies. As the Supreme Court explained in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, ––U.S. ––––, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), an objective reasonableness standard applies to excessive force claims brought under both the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . Under the objective reasonableness standard, force is excessive if it is unreasonable in light of the 'facts and circumstances of the particular case.'. . Factors that may be relevant to this determination include: the relationship between the need for the use of force and the amount of force used; the extent of the plaintiff's injury; any effort made by the officer to temper or to limit the amount of force; the severity of the security problem at issue; the threat reasonably perceived by the officer; and whether the plaintiff was actively resisting. . . When this standard is applied to the present case, it is clear that summary judgment is not appropriate.")

Silliman v. Davis, No. 17-CV-00301-JPG, 2017 WL 1908521, at *3 (S.D. Ill. May 10, 2017) ("In the context of medical claims, there is little practical difference between the standards that apply to convicted prisoners and pretrial detainees. Minix v. Canarecci, 597 F.3d 824, 831 (7th Cir. 2010); Smentek v. Dart, 683 F.3d 373, 374 (7th Cir. 2012). In this context, Fourteenth Amendment claims are 'appropriately analyzed under the Eighth Amendment.' Smith v. Dart, 803 F.3d at 310

(citing Smego v. Mitchell, 723 F.3d 752, 756 (7th Cir. 2013)) ("[T]he protection afforded under [the Due Process Clause] is functionally indistinguishable from the Eighth Amendment's protection for convicted prisoners.").")

Harden v. Aramark Food Services Corp., No. 11-CV-3238, 2017 WL 1658812, at *2 (C.D. Ill. May 1, 2017)("After Kingsley, though, the Seventh Circuit has continued to rely on the deliberate indifference standard to pretrial detainees' claims for lack of medical care. See, e.g., Daniel v. Cook County, 833 F.3d 728, 732-33 (2016). At this point, the Court can avoid trying to define what greater protection is afforded civil detainees as compared to prisoners. Plaintiff's claims survive summary judgment even under the Eighth Amendment standard. Avoidance may no longer be possible when faced with how the jury should be instructed, but that is a discussion for another day.")

Outlaw v. City of Cahokia, No. 16-CV-456-JPG-SCW, 2017 WL 1491836, at *3 & n.2 (S.D. Ill. Apr. 26, 2017) ("Because Outlaw was a pretrial detainee, his claim falls under the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause rather than the Eighth Amendment Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause. However, the legal standards are essentially the same. . . The test for an Eighth Amendment violation has two components, an objective and a subjective one. . . First, the condition of confinement about which the inmate complains must be objectively serious; it must result in the denial of '"the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities."'. . Second, the official must have a sufficiently culpable state of mind, that is, he must at a minimum be deliberately indifferent. . .An official is deliberately indifferent if he 'knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate health or safety.'. . . There has been some uncertainty about whether Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), changed this standard for pretrial detainees. In Kingsley, a pretrial detainee sued for excessive force, and the Supreme Court held that the appropriate standard was whether the officers' use of force was objectively unreasonable, not whether the officers were subjectively aware that their use of force was unreasonable. . . Kingsley calls into question whether deliberate indifference is the correct standard for a pretrial detainee's conditions of confinement claim, but the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals has suggested the Eighth Amendment standard still applies. See Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n. 31 (7th Cir. 2016).")

T.S. v. Twentieth Century Fox Television, No. 16 C 8303, 2017 WL 1425596, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 20, 2017) In the alternative to their Fourteenth Amendment due process claim, in Count II, Plaintiffs bring a Fourth Amendment claim against all of the Defendants arguing that the Supreme Court has not definitely determined whether the Fourth Amendment continues to provide protection against the use of excessive force beyond arrest. See Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 395 n.10, 109 S. Ct. 1865, 104 L.Ed.2d 443 (1989); see also Kingsley, 135 S.Ct. at 2479 (Alito, J., dissenting) ("we should decide whether a pretrial detainee can bring a Fourth Amendment claim based on the use of excessive force by a detention facility employee," because "[w]e have not yet decided that question."). Plaintiffs' argument is misplaced because the Supreme Court has repeatedly recognized that 'the Due Process Clause protects a pretrial detainee from the use of excessive force that amounts to punishment.'. . . The Court grants, with prejudice, Defendants' motions to dismiss Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim as alleged in Count II.")

Cruz v. Dart, No. 12-CV-6665, 2017 WL 1021992, at *6 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 16, 2017) (" 'The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits 'deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of pretrial detainees.'". . . To show deliberate indifference, the plaintiff 'must show that his medical condition was objectively serious.'. . The plaintiff must also make a subjective showing. . . The 'official must be "aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists" and the official "must also draw the inference."'")

Estate of Adams v. Christian Cty., No. 13-3300, 2017 WL 937146, at *6 (C.D. Ill. Mar. 9, 2017) ("The Defendants contend the rule in Kingsley should be held to apply only to excessive force claims and not deliberate indifference claims, as alleged here. Under a subjective standard, 'a plaintiff must put forth evidence to establish that the defendant knew of a serious risk to the prisoner's health and consciously disregarded that risk.' Holloway v. Delaware County Sheriff, 700 F.3d 1063, 1073 (7th Cir. 2012). This requires 'more than negligence and it approaches intentional wrongdoing.'. . The subjective deliberate indifference standard is analogous to criminal recklessness. . .The Court believes that, because the same language of the Fourteenth Amendment would apply to either claim, it is likely that the rule in Kingsley will be held to apply to medical care or conditions of confinement cases such as this one. Even though Defendant Nelson does not allege that qualified immunity applies, however, the Court does not believe it would be appropriate to hold a Defendant sued in his individual capacity to a standard that did not apply when he committed acts which are alleged to violate one's constitutional rights. Accordingly, the Court believes that the subjective standard is most appropriate in this case.")

Akindele v. Arce, No. 15 C 3081, 2017 WL 698679, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 22, 2017) ("Akindele claims that Reyes and Arce failed to protect him from an attack by his fellow detainees. 'Because [Akindele] was a pretrial detainee, his deliberate-indifference claim arises under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause but is governed by the same standards as a claim for violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.' Smith v. Sangamon Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 715 F.3d 188, 191 (7th Cir. 2013); see also Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cnty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n.31 (7th Cir. 2016) (reaffirming this due process standard for deliberate indifference claims by pretrial detainees notwithstanding Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2475 (2015), which holds that the due process standard for excessive force claims by pretrial detainees is less demanding than the Eighth Amendment standard for excessive force claims by convicted inmates).")

Hughes v. Dredge, No. 11-CV-3320, 2017 WL 637677, at *2 (C.D. Ill. Feb. 16, 2017) ("After Kingsley, . . .the Seventh Circuit has continued to rely on the deliberate indifference standard to pretrial detainees' claims for lack of medical care. See, e.g., Daniel v. Cook County, 833 F.3d 728, 732–33 (2016).")

Godfrey v. Shrestha, No. 15 C 11284, 2017 WL 635149, at *2 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 16, 2017) ("A section

1983 claim by a pretrial detainee alleging that jail officials failed to protect her from harm is analyzed under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . A jail official (such as a correctional officer) is liable under section 1983 for failing to protect a detainee 'only when [she] is deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of serious harm' to the detainee. . . 'A finding of deliberate indifference requires a showing that the [correctional officer] was aware of a substantial risk of serious injury to [the detainee] but nevertheless failed to take appropriate steps to protect [the detainee] from a known danger.'. .Thus, to show that a jail official acted with deliberate indifference, an injured party must show that 1) she was exposed to a substantial risk of serious harm, 2) the jail official had actual knowledge of the threat, and 3) the jail official acted unreasonably in light of the known risk.")

Satterly v. Land, No. 3:14-CV-1588, 2017 WL 633852, at *1 (N.D. Ind. Feb. 15, 2017) ("After this motion was fully briefed, the Seventh Circuit clarified that Kingsley only applies to excessive force claims and did not change the test for denial of medical treatment claims such as this one. . . Therefore the court will apply the same Eighth Amendment standards to this Fourteenth Amendment claim that were cited in the screening order.")

Akindele v. Arce, No. 15 C 5952, 2017 WL 467683, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 3, 2017) ("The Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause governs a pretrial detainee's claim based on unconstitutional conditions of confinement. See Smith v. Dart, 803 F.3d 304, 309 (7th Cir. 2015). That said, 'there is little practical difference, if any, between the standards applicable to pretrial detainees and convicted inmates when it comes to conditions-of-confinement claims, and ... such claims brought under the Fourteenth Amendment are appropriately analyzed under the Eighth Amendment test.'. . To prevail on his conditions of confinement claim, Akindele must establish that: (1) he was housed under conditions that were 'sufficiently serious so that a prison official's act or omission results in the denial of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities'; and (2) Defendants were deliberately indifferent to that deprivation.")

Kozar v. Munoz, No. 14 C 2634, 2017 WL 413605, at *2 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 31, 2017) (" 'Because [Kozar] was a pretrial detainee, his deliberate-indifference claim arises under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause but is governed by the same standards as a claim for violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment.'" Smith v. Sangamon Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 715 F.3d 188, 191 (7th Cir. 2013); see also Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook Cnty., 828 F.3d 541, 554 n.31 (7th Cir. 2016) (reaffirming this due process standard for deliberate indifference claims by pretrial detainees notwithstanding Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), which holds that the due process standard for excessive force claims by pretrial detainees is less demanding than the Eighth Amendment standard for excessive force claims by convicted inmates).") Miller v. Ninkovic, No. 14-CV-1603, 2017 WL 244846, at *1 (E.D. Wis. Jan. 20, 2017) ("After reviewing the clarified chronology of the revocation of Miller's extended supervision, there is no doubt that Miller was a convicted prisoner as of December 5, 2013. Miller concedes as much. And the law is clear that the Eighth Amendment applies to claims of excessive force made by convicted prisoners. See Kinney v. Indiana Youth Center, 950 F.2d 462, 465 (7th Cir. 1991). The question is thus whether the fact that Miller was at Milwaukee County Jail for a case he had not been convicted of change this. While Miller's argument that a uniform pretrial detainee standard should apply at the jail has its appeal, it would in essence create a dual status for Miller and similarly situated persons. Miller has cited to no cases and I have found none supporting such a position. As defendants point out, Miller did not lose his status as a convicted prisoner merely because he was transferred to a different location, nor does he get enhanced constitutional rights simply because he is alleged to have committed additional crimes for which he had not yet been tried. . . Accordingly, I will grant defendants' motion in limine requesting that I instruct the jury to apply the Eight Amendment standard to Miller's excessive force claim.")

Becerra v. Kramer, No. 16 C 1408, 2017 WL 85447, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 10, 2017) ("Although the Fourteenth Amendment provides pretrial detainees with greater protection than convicted prisoners at least with respect to excessive force claims, see Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466 (2015), the Seventh Circuit has continued to apply the same standard to deliberate indifference claims brought by pretrial detainees as to those brought by convicted prisoners protected by the Eighth Amendment. See Phillips v. Sheriff of Cook County, 828 F.3d 541, 554 n.31 (7th Cir. 2016).")

White v. Watson, No. 16-CV-560-JPG-DGW, 2016 WL 6277601, at *3 (S.D. Ill. Oct. 27, 2016) ("The plaintiff claims the individual defendants were deliberately indifferent to the serious risk that Scarpi would commit suicide when they failed to place him in a suicide-proof cell, obtain mental health services for him, and regularly check on him in his cell. Because Scarpi was a pretrial detainee, these claims fall under the Fourteenth Amendment due process clause rather than the Eighth Amendment cruel and unusual punishment clause, which applies only to convicted prisoners. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2475 (2015); Burton v. Downey, 805 F.3d 776, 784 (7th Cir. 2015). Nevertheless, the standard under the Fourteenth Amendment is essentially the same as the Eighth Amendment standard for cruel and unusual punishment.")

Mulder v. Clayton, No. 14-CV-3274, 2016 WL 5929217, at *4 n.5 (C.D. Ill. Oct. 11, 2016) (a failure to protect case) ("Reasonable minds might debate whether the subjective element is or is becoming something less than deliberate indifference, but at this point the difference is immaterial because Plaintiff's claims survive even under the deliberate indifference standard. In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015), the Supreme Court held that a defendant's subjective state of mind in a pretrial detainee's excessive force claim was relevant only to the extent that the defendant's actions were 'purposeful or knowing.'. . In Smith v. Dart, 803 F.3d 304, n. 2 (7th Cir. 2015), a pretrial detainee conditions of confinement claim, the Seventh Circuit cited Kingsley for the proposition that the subjective element required 'a purposeful, a knowing, or possibly a reckless state of mind.' The Seventh Circuit has recently remarked on the "shifting sands of present-day case authority' for the constitutional claims of detainees. Werner v. Wall, —— F.3d—— –, 2016 WL 4555610 (7th Cir. 2016).")

Shultz v. Dart, No. 13 C 3641, 2016 WL 212930, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 19, 2016) ("The parties treat Shultz as a pretrial detainee and thus analyze his deliberate indifference claim under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause rather than the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause, which applies only to convicted prisoners. As a practical matter, that distinction is of little consequence, as the Seventh Circuit has consistently held in the context of deliberate indifference claims that the two standards are 'essentially the same.'. . True, the Supreme Court held last year that a pretrial detainee bringing a § 1983 excessive force claim under the Due Process Clause need show only that the amount of force used against him was objectively unreasonable, by contrast to an inmate bringing an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim, who must show that a prison official subjectively applied the force to maliciously and sadistically cause harm. See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2473-75 (2015). But Burton, which the Seventh Circuit decided after Kingsley, holds that the Due Process Clause and Eighth Amendment standards remain 'essentially the same' in the context of deliberate indifference claims. Accordingly, this court will rely on deliberate indifference cases decided under both provisions; even if the Seventh Circuit ultimately decides that the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference standard is more difficult to meet, the difference does not matter because Shultz's claim survives summary judgment even under the Eighth Amendment standard.").

Karkoszka v. Dart, No. 13 C 1635, 2016 WL 164331, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 14, 2016) ("After the Supreme Court's remand in Kingsley, the Seventh Circuit rejected the defendant jail officials' qualified immunity argument in the context of the jail guards using Tasers on a non-resisting detainee, who was handcuffed and lying prone. See Kingsley, 801 F.3d at 832-33. In this context, the Seventh Circuit concluded that before and after the Supreme Court's Kingsley decision, it was clearly established that 'the amount of force had to be reasonable in light of the legitimate objectives of the institution.'. . Here, viewing the facts and reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor, although Plaintiff initially resisted being handcuffed, evidence in the record reveals that Officer Navarro took him to the ground after which Officers Webb, Malloy, and Leinweber successfully handcuffed him. It is reasonable to infer based on the extent and severity of Plaintiff's injuries and the fact that Officer Navarro got Plaintiff to the ground at the beginning of the altercation that certain Defendant Officers continued to hit, beat, or kick Plaintiff when he was on the ground of the bullpen and after he was handcuffed and subdued. There is also evidence in the record creating a triable issue that Officer Young used pepper spray after Plaintiff had already been handcuffed. Moreover, it was clearly established at the time of the incident on October 12, 2012 that a reasonable officer would be on notice that this use of force was unnecessary and excessive due to the lack of a legitimate security interest once Plaintiff was handcuffed and on the ground. . . In addition, a reasonable officer observing this excessive and unreasonable force would know that the other officers were violating Plaintiff's rights so that intervention was warranted. . . Accordingly, Defendant Officers' qualified immunity argument fails.")

Coleman v. City of Chicago, No. 12 C 10061, 2015 WL 8601702, at *2-3 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 14, 2015) ("The propriety of an officer's use of force against an arrestee or pretrial detainee is governed by an objective reasonableness standard. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015). The objective reasonableness of an officer's use of force turns on the facts and circumstances of the particular case. . . It is determined from the perspective of a reasonable police officer on the scene, including what the officer knew at the time. . . Considerations that may bear on the reasonableness or unreasonableness of force used include, among other factors, the relationship between the need for the use of force and the amount of force used; the extent of the plaintiff's injury; any effort made by the officer to temper or limit the amount of force; the severity of the security problem at issue; the threat reasonably perceived by the officer; and whether the plaintiff was actively resisting. . . There is no question that Officer Kirkland's dragging of Mr. Coleman along the floor by his handcuffs constituted intentional use of force; defendants do not argue otherwise. It is also plainly apparent from the video that before Officer Kirkland dragged Mr. Coleman by his handcuffs out of his cell and down the hallway, Mr. Coleman was no longer offering resistance. He had been subdued by the use of a taser and other officers' application of force, and he had been restrained by the application of handcuffs and shackles. It is well established that a police officer may not use significant force on a non-resisting or passively resisting subject. . . .Once the officers had subdued and restrained Mr. Coleman, they, and in particular Officer Kirkland, had a choice about how to get him out of the cell. Because Mr. Coleman was subdued and restrained, this was, most emphatically, not a situation where things were still evolving or Officer Kirkland had to make a decision on the fly. . . . Whatever the propriety of the use of a taser and the ensuing efforts to subdue Mr. Coleman, once the officers had his hands cuffed and his legs shackled, he was under control and on the floor. Given those circumstances, there is no viable claim, and no reasonable jury could find, that Officer Kirkland had to make a split-second decision on what to do next. There is no basis for a contention that the officers had no time to 'recalibrate' how much force was needed to get Mr. Coleman out of his cell and wherever he had to go next. No effort was made in this case to temper the use of force in removing Mr. Coleman from the cell. Rather, Officer Kirkland chose to use brute force when it was no longer necessary. Sergeant Walker conceded during his deposition that the officers could have stood Mr. Coleman up and told him to walk. If such an instruction had been given and refused, that might have justified some alternative means of removal from the cell—such as carrying him—but it is undisputed that no attempt was made to remove Mr. Coleman from the cell in a way that did not require additional force. Defendants contend in their brief that 'Coleman could have walked if he wanted to walk but he chose not to walk, . . . but that is a misstatement of the record— defendants have offered no evidence that Mr. Coleman was given the opportunity to leave the cell under his own power after he was tasered, handcuffed, and shackled.") Swisher v. Porter Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, No. 3:10-CV-337, 2015 WL 6738601, at *2 (N.D. Ind. Nov. 4, 2015) ("Swisher is suing Dr. Nadir H. Al–Shami, Sheriff David Lain, and Warden John Widup for denying him medical treatment. Here, Swisher's allegations plausibly allege that the denial of medical treatment was excessive or not rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose. Therefore Swisher will be granted leave to proceed against Dr. Nadir H. Al–Shami, Sheriff David Lain, and Warden John Widup for denying him medical treatment for his hernia, back pain, sinus headaches, foot pain, and post-traumatic stress disorder caused by his reaction to skin cancer and surgeries.")

Gilbert v. Rohana, No. 1:14-CV-00630-RLY, 2015 WL 6442289, at *4 (S.D. Ind. Oct. 23, 2015) ("The court finds Kinglsey did not alter the legal standard for denial of medical treatment claims brought by pretrial detainees like Plaintiff. Kingsley was limited to excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees; the Court did not comment on the appropriate standard for denial of medical treatment claims brought by such detainees. Further, since Kingsley, district courts have continued to use the deliberate indifference standard in denial of medical treatment claims. [collecting cases] Accordingly, the court will follow well-settled Seventh Circuit precedent, which requires the court to analyze Plaintiff's claim under the deliberate indifference standard.")

Harper v. Dart, No. 14 C 01237, 2015 WL 6407577, at *3 & n.2 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 21, 2015) ("To state a claim for unlawful restraint (again, under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment), Harper must allege that the use of bodily restraints is not rationally related to a legitimate non-punitive government purpose or that their use appears excessive and objectively unreasonable in relation to the purpose they serve. . . .Restraint claims by pretrial detainees, like Harper's, have traditionally been evaluated under this standard, which originated in Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 561 (1979), and Youngberg v. Romero, 457 U.S. 307, 324 (1982). But there is an argument that Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466 (2015), which adopted an objective standard for excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees, . . . may be a better fit. . . The parties here have not raised that possibility but should consider whether to do so at the summary judgment stage.")

Carter v. Huntington Cnty. Sheriff*,* No. 1:15-CV-246 TLS, 2015 WL 5252211, at *2 (N.D. Ind. Sept. 9, 2015) ("It appears that Carter is a pretrial detainee and that his claims arise under the Fourteenth Amendment. 'In evaluating the constitutionality of conditions or restrictions of pretrial detention ... the proper inquiry is whether those conditions amount to punishment of the detainee.' Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 535, 99 S.Ct. 1861, 60 L.Ed.2d 447 (1979). '[I]n the absence of an expressed intent to punish, a pretrial detainee can nevertheless prevail by showing that the actions are not "rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose" or that the actions "appear excessive in relation to that purpose."' Kingsley v. Hendrickson, —— U.S. ——, ——, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 2473, 192 L.Ed.2d 416 (2015) (quoting Bell, 441 U.S. at 561). However, when judging what is rationally related or what is excessive, 'prison administrators [are] accorded wide-ranging deference in the adoption and execution of policies and practices that in their judgment are needed to preserve internal order and discipline and to maintain institutional security.' Bell, 441 U.S. at 547. Here, Carter's allegation that he has been denied any medical treatment for serious medical needs plausibly alleges that the denial of medical treatment is excessive and not rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose.")

Collins v. Al-Shami*,* No. 1:13-CV-01838-TWP, 2015 WL 5098533, at *8 (S.D. Ind. Aug. 31, 2015) ("Based on [Kingsley], Mr. Collins argues that Fourteenth Amendment claims of inadequate medical care are now analyzed using the objectively unreasonable standard, not the heightened deliberately indifferent standard. Mr. Collins position is well taken, however, the Court need not address whether Kingsley requires that the objectively unreasonable standard be used in this case because under either standard—deliberate indifference or objective unreasonableness—Mr. Collins's claims cannot survive summary judgment.")

Green v. Watson, No. 3:15-CV-00621-MJR, 2015 WL 4609977, at *1 n.2 (S.D. Ill. July 31, 2015) ("The Supreme Court's recent decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson does not change this analysis. Kingsley held that, in an excessive force case, a plaintiff need only prove that the force 'knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable'—he did not need to prove a separate subjective element that the force was applied 'maliciously and sadistically.'. . However, Kingsley reaffirmed that a defendant 'must possess a purposeful, a knowing, or possibly a reckless state of mind,' as the Fourteenth Amendment does not 'impose liability for negligently inflicted harm.'. . After Kingsley, the Seventh Circuit has held fast to this state of mind requirement, noting that officials do not violate the due process clause when they act 'negligent[ly]' or make 'an accidental mistake.' Davis v. Wessel, —— F.3d ——, 2015 WL 4095358, at *5–7 (7th Cir. July 7, 2015).")

Hoffman v. Lakin, No. 15-CV-00648-NJR, 2015 WL 4090451, at *2 n.1 (S.D. Ill. July 6, 2015) ("Following the United States Supreme Court's Kingsley decision, it is unclear whether a detainee challenging the conditions of his confinement must also allege that the defendant acted with a certain state of mind, namely maliciously and sadistically with the intent to cause harm, or whether an allegation that defendant's actions were objectively unreasonable will suffice. In Kingsley, the Court adopted an objective standard for pretrial detainees' excessive force claims, but did not explicitly state that this is the standard for conditions claims under the Fourteenth Amendment. Until this Court receives further guidance on the appropriate standard to be applied in these cases, the Court will allow claims that otherwise state a conditions of confinement claim under the Fourteenth Amendment to pass its threshold screening under 28 U.S.C. § 1915A(a).")

Baker v. Hertz, No. 15-CV-600-JPG, 2015 WL 4052366, at *8 n.3 (S.D. Ill. July 2, 2015) ("In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, . . . the Supreme Court ruled just days ago that a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment due process claim regarding the use of excessive force turned on the objective reasonableness of the use of force, and proof as to the defendants' mental state was not required. . . However, the high court specifically declined to decide whether such an objective standard might suffice in a case involving mistreatment of a detainee, as the defendants in that case did not dispute that they had acted purposefully or knowingly. Nevertheless, the Kingsley Court noted that an objective standard had been applied in Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 541–43 (1979), relative to a variety of prison conditions, including double-bunking. . . Bell did not specifically state that an objective standard applied; rather, the Kingsley Court characterized the 'rationally related' and 'appears excessive in relation to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose' standards as being objective. Plaintiff's complaint herein has alleged both the objective and subjective factors with respect to the claims that survive threshold review.")

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Jones v. Faulkner County, Arkansas, No. 23-1367, 2025 WL 866053, at *3 (8th Cir. Mar. 20, 2025) ("We analyze Jones's deliberate indifference claims against Grant and Dixon under the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause, . . . relying on Fourteenth and Eighth Amendment cases alike[.] . . 'A plaintiff claiming deliberate indifference must establish objective and subjective components.'. . 'The objective component requires a plaintiff to demonstrate an objectively serious medical need,' while '[t]he subjective component requires a plaintiff to show that the defendant actually knew of, but deliberately disregarded, such need.'. . This latter component requires the official to 'be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and ... draw the inference.'. . However, 'the district court can infer knowledge if the risk was obvious.'")

Peterson v. Heinen, 89 F.4th 628, 634-35 (8th Cir. 2023) ("The parties spar over whether the Eighth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment applies to Peterson's excessive force claims. And understandably so: if the Fourteenth Amendment applies, Peterson has 'a lighter burden to show a constitutional violation.'. .The issue boils down to whether someone detained awaiting adjudication of a probation violation is more like a pretrial detainee or a convicted prisoner. Pretrial detainees seeking to vindicate their rights to be free from excessive force find shelter in the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . Convicted prisoners seeking the same must turn to the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause. . . When Peterson first arrived at WCJ, he was being held on unadjudicated probation violation charges tied to a state conviction for disorderly conduct. He received 90 days in prison, with 60 days suspended, for that conviction, as well as one year of probation, revocable if Peterson 'fail[ed] to abide by the rules.'. . If Peterson violated any conditions of his probation, the sentencing order states that the court could order him to serve 'the balance of the [original] sentence.' So while on probation and before being held at WCJ, Peterson was unlike 'pretrial detainees or persons enjoying unrestricted liberty.'. . Nevertheless, Peterson latches onto how, like criminal charges against pretrial detainees, his probation violation charge was 'unadjudicated,' so he says the Fourteenth Amendment applies. . . We are unconvinced. While alleged probation violators are afforded certain protections under the Due Process Clause, . . . neither we nor the Supreme Court have afforded alleged probation violators 'a substantive "liberty" interest' to be free from excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment while detained[.] . . We decline 'to expand the concept of substantive due process' unnecessarily, . . . as the Eighth Amendment provides the 'explicit textual source of constitutional protection' against excessive force applied to an individual incarcerated on an unadjudicated probation violation[.] Unlike a pretrial detainee, Peterson finds himself outside any 'stage of a criminal prosecution.'. . In other words, Peterson is 'in wholly different circumstances' than those of a pretrial detainee, 'separated by the harsh facts of criminal conviction,' and held instead incident to the state's ongoing punishment following adjudication of his criminal culpability. . . His detention is part and parcel of the state's successful criminal conviction and ensuing punishment, . . . where any alleged excessive force claim incurred during consequent incarceration is analyzed under the Eighth Amendment[.]")

Reece v. Hale, 58 F.4th 1027, 1033-34 (8th Cir. 2023) ("We last consider McCain's entitlement to qualified immunity, which probably presents the closest question given that she was present throughout Amos's [pre-trial detainee] detention in BCDC and therefore witnessed his medical condition deteriorate. But for the same reasons that Hobelmann and Smith were entitled to rely on the medical team's assessment and supervision of Amos, it was reasonable for McCain to rely on the medical team as well once they arrived on scene. There is some question, though, whether she should have contacted medical staff earlier in the morning (assuming that would've helped Amos anyway), but we don't think the record shows that she was deliberately indifferent to a serious medical need. This isn't a situation where officers essentially ignored an injured inmate for hours as he lay motionless and unresponsive, see Letterman v. Does, 789 F.3d 856, 864 (8th Cir. 2015), or failed to seek medical attention even though an inmate had 'screamed, howled, and banged his head against the door of his cell for some eight hours.' See Ryan v. Armstrong, 850 F.3d 419, 425–26 (8th Cir. 2017). The incident report reflects that members of the jail staff, including McCain, checked on Amos at least eleven times in the two-and-a-half hours between booking and McCain's decision to place him in a restraint chair. . . Even though Amos's behavior during that time may have been odd, none of the other five nonparty officers who checked on him requested a medical evaluation either. And even though Amos was making absurd, random comments and was 'obnoxious' and sweating profusely at this time, that doesn't serve to distinguish him from many others who enter the jail under the influence of alcohol or drugs. . . He also had no external injuries, nor was he struggling to breathe, bleeding, vomiting, or choking. . . Up to the point a medical evaluation was requested, moreover, Amos complied with instructions. Perhaps McCain could have done more. But we cannot consider Donna's claim through the lens of 'hindsight's perfect vision,' as she must demonstrate more than mere negligence or 'ordinary lack of due care for the prisoner's safety' to succeed on her claim. . . The record would not support a finding that McCain's failure to act differently was a product of deliberate indifference. She is therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

Buckley v. Hennepin County, 9 F.4th 757, 763-64 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Buckley alleges the paramedics were deliberately indifferent to the substantial risk of serious medical complications they knew ketamine sedation posed when they injected her with that sedative. Though Buckley was not imprisoned at the time, and therefore the Fourteenth Amendment rather than the Eighth Amendment governs her claim, we agree with the parties that the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference standard applies. '[W]hen the State by the affirmative exercise of its power so restrains an individual's liberty that it renders [her] unable to care for [herself], and at the same time fails to provide for [her] basic human needs [such as medical care,] it transgresses the substantive limits on state action set by the Eighth Amendment and the Due Process Clause.'. . To state a claim, Buckley must plausibly allege that the paramedics' conduct, viewed objectively, deprived her of a 'minimal civilized measure of life's necessities' when they injected her with the ketamine sedative knowing of but disregarding an excessive risk to her health or safety. . . Placing a person in need of emergency medical care on a medical transportation hold and transporting her to a hospital 'demonstrates a deliberate concern for [her] well-being, and not an indifference.'. . Likewise, sedating an agitated patient during the trip to the hospital to protect the patient and her emergency medical providers is not deliberate indifference. Quite the contrary. Buckley's Complaint alleged simply that the paramedics knew, 'when they administered the ketamine, that there was a substantial risk that [she] would develop respiratory difficulties and require intubation.' There were no allegations of what the paramedics subjectively knew about the County's 'ketamine trials,' or why administering a commonly used sedative evidenced deliberate indifference. The district court properly dismissed these implausible substantive due process claims.")

Karsjens v. Lourey, 988 F.3d 1047, 1051-53 (8th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 232 (2021) ("In Karsjens I, the claims and allegations in Counts 1 and 2—and subsequent bench trial and findings—focused on the statutory scheme itself and the officials' implementation thereof, specifically the indefinite nature of Appellants' confinement; the lack of automatic periodic review; and the administration of the treatment program. By contrast, the present claims and allegations focus squarely on the conditions of confinement, including the inadequacy of meals, double-bunking, overly harsh punishment for rules violations, property being taken and destroyed before any hearing, the lack of less restrictive alternatives, and the inadequacy of medical care. . . In other words, in Counts 5, 6, and 7, Appellants do not challenge their inability to be released from the facility but rather the conditions within the facility. They contend that, considered as a whole, their conditions of confinement amount to punishment in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . We previously found that the 'deliberate indifference' standard applied to a civilly committed individual's claim of inadequate medical care. . . To prevail under that standard, a plaintiff must show that 'officials knew about excessive risks to his health but disregarded them, and that their unconstitutional actions in fact caused his injuries.'. . We conclude that the district court should have applied the deliberate indifference standard, rather than the 'shocks the conscience' standard, to Appellants' inadequate medical care claim. . . .We now turn to the remaining claims in Counts 5, 6, and 7, in which Appellants allege that they were subjected to punitive conditions of confinement. Neither pretrial detainees nor civilly committed individuals may be punished without running afoul of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Unless the detainee can show 'an expressed intent to punish ..., that determination generally will turn on "whether an alternative purpose to which [the restriction] may rationally be connected is assignable for it, and whether it appears excessive in relation"' to such alternative purpose. . . Although the Supreme Court has not established a constitutional standard for evaluating the conditions of a civilly committed individual's confinement, it has stated that '[a]t the least, due process requires that the nature and duration of commitment bear some reasonable relation to the purpose for which the individual is committed.'. . In Beaulieu v. Ludeman, we applied the Bell standard to a claim brought by an individual who alleged that the MSOP's practice of double-bunking was punitive. . .Although we have not yet considered other allegedly punitive conditions in the context of civil commitment, we find our decisions regarding pretrial detainees to be instructive. . . 'Since Bell became law, we have applied its standard to conditions-of-confinement claims brought by pretrial detainees.'. . Indeed, we have applied Bell to a variety of conditions of confinement claims[.] [collecting cases] Based on the Supreme Court's pronouncements in Bell and Youngberg, we conclude that the Bell standard applies equally to conditions of confinement claims brought by pretrial detainees and civilly committed individuals, as neither group may be punished. This conclusion is further supported by our consistent application of the Bell standard to such claims brought by pretrial detainees. Moreover, several circuits have applied Bell to conditions of confinement claims brought by individuals in civil commitment. See Matherly v. Andrews, 859 F.3d 264, 274-76 (4th Cir. 2017); Healey v. Spencer, 765 F.3d 65, 78-79 (1st Cir. 2014); Allison v. Snyder, 332 F.3d 1076, 1079 (7th Cir. 2003). In light of Supreme Court precedent, our own precedent governing pretrial detainees, and persuasive authority from our sister circuits, we hold that the Bell standard governs the claims in Counts 5, 6, and 7 (except the claim of inadequate medical care) that allege punitive conditions of confinement.")

Briesemeister v. Johnston, No. 20-1607, 2020 WL 6266453, at *1 n.2 (8th Cir. Oct. 26, 2020) (not reported) ("Briesemeister relies on Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015), for the proposition that the standard for deliberate indifference claims under the Due Process Clause has been altered, and thus he had to prove only that the defendants' actions were not objectively reasonable. However, this court has continued to apply the deliberate indifference standard to claims for denial of medical care for pretrial detainees and thus for civilly committed patients.")

Stearns v. Inmate Services Corp., 957 F.3d 902, 906-08 & n.6 (8th Cir. 2020) ("The parties argue as to what Stearns must prove under Bell. They point out possible inconsistencies within our precedent and ask for clarification as to the appropriate standards. ISC argues that Stearns must show deliberate indifference. Stearns argues that Bell requires an objective showing. In Bell v. Wolfish, the Supreme Court articulated the standard governing pretrial detainees' claims related to conditions of confinement. . . . The Court articulated two ways to determine whether conditions rise to the level of punishment. A plaintiff could show that the conditions were intentionally punitive. . . Alternatively, if there is no expressly demonstrated intent to punish, the plaintiff could also show that the conditions were not reasonably related to a legitimate governmental purpose or were excessive in relation to that purpose. . . Stearns does not allege ISC's policies or customs were intentionally punitive. Therefore, to succeed on his conditions-of-confinement claim, he must show that ISC's policies or customs caused conditions that were not reasonably related to a legitimate governmental purpose or were excessive in relation to that purpose. . . .ISC argues that instead of applying Bell to Stearns's claim, we should apply a subjective deliberate indifference standard. ISC relies on isolated dicta to argue that we should effectively ignore the clear command of Bell. Specifically, in Morris, we stated that '[a]lthough this court has yet to establish a clear standard for pretrial detainees, we repeatedly have applied the same "deliberate indifference" standard as is applied to Eighth Amendment claims made by convicted inmates.'. . Despite this dicta, we applied Bell in Morris because the case involved a conditions-of-confinement claim. . . There is simply no need to rely upon dicta to determine the standard applicable to Stearns's claim. Since Bell became law, we have applied its standard to conditions-of-confinement claims brought by pretrial detainees. . . . Stearns's claim is based on his allegations that he was affirmatively subjected to conditions—by way of ISC's policies or customs—that were punitive. In particular, he alleges he was shackled and transported for eight days in foul conditions resulting in sores, infections, and loss of liberty, when all that was necessary was a 17 hour drive. Therefore, the objective[5] standard of Bell controls.[6] [fn.6: The parties cite Kingsley_v. Hendrickson, . . . which clarified that the standard for a pretrial detainee's excessive force claim is objective reasonableness. The parties argue over Kingsley's impact on all pretrial-detainee claims. Without deciding the impact of Kingsley, we decline to address it here.]")

Whitney v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 887 F.3d 857, 860 & n.4 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Our precedent establishes that '[w]hether an official was deliberately indifferent requires both an objective and a subjective analysis.'. . .Whitney Sr. asserts that the Supreme Court's conclusion in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, . . . that 'the relevant standard is objective not subjective' should apply here. Kingsley does not control because it was an excessive force case, not a deliberate indifference case.")

Ryan v. Armstrong, 850 F.3d 419, 424-25 & nn. 2 & 3 (8th Cir. 2017) ("The trustee first claims that the district court erred by granting summary judgment to defendants Armstrong and Culloton. . . on the claim that they were deliberately indifferent to Harrell's serious medical need by failing to seek treatment for him during their shift. The parties agree that Harrell was a pretrial detainee during his time at the jail and that his deliberate indifference claim is based on the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[2] [fn.2 We have previously noted that in this circuit it is an open question whether the standard of the Fourth or the Fourteenth Amendment applies to medical care claims of arrestees. See Bailey v. Feltmann, 810 F.3d 589, 593 (8th Cir. 2016). Since the trustee asserts here that Harrell was a pretrial detainee and 'cites authorities applying due process analysis,' we address his arguments accordingly. Carpenter v. Gage, 686 F.3d 644, 650 (8th Cir. 2012).] The standard we apply in this context 'borrow[s] from the Eighth Amendment deliberate-indifference standard applicable to claims of prison inmates.' Bailey v. Feltmann, 810 F.3d 589, 593 (8th Cir. 2016).[3] [fn.3 In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), the Supreme Court rejected analysis of a defendant's subjective state of mind in excessive force cases and concluded 'the appropriate standard for a pretrial detainee's excessive force claim is solely an objective one.'. . see also Castro v. Cty. of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1069–71 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) (applying Kingsley to deliberate indifference claims). We need not decide the applicability of Kingsley to deliberate indifference claims here; even if subjective analysis of these claims is still warranted we conclude the district court erred in granting summary judgment to the defendants.])

Barton v. Taber, 820 F.3d 958, 964 & n.3 (8th Cir. 2016) ("To determine whether Owens's failure to seek medical care for Barton [a pre-trial detainee] violated Barton's constitutional rights, we apply the Eighth Amendment 'deliberate indifference' standard. . . . We note that in our recent decision, Bailey v. Feltmann, No. 14–3859, 2016 WL 191929 (8th Cir. Jan.15, 2016), we acknowledged disagreement regarding the proper standard to apply in denial-of-medical-care claims brought by arrestees. See Bailey, 810 F.3d 589, 2016 WL 191929, at *2; see also Kingsley v. Hendrickson, —— U.S. ——, ——, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 2473, 192 L.Ed.2d 416 (2015) (holding that the Fourteenth Amendment's objective reasonableness standard governs excessive-force claims brought by pretrial detainees).")

Bailey v. Feltmann, 810 F.3d 589, 593 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Bailey first argues that we should analyze his § 1983 claim against Feltmann for denial of medical care under the objective reasonableness standard of the Fourth Amendment. The Fourth Amendment governs an arrestee's claim alleging excessive use of force, Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 395 (1989), but this court has not resolved whether an arrestee's claim alleging denial of medical care is analyzed under the Due Process Clause or the Fourth Amendment. One recent decision, Carpenter v. Gage, 686 F .3d 644, 650 (8th Cir.2012), applied due process analysis to the claim of an arrestee, but the plaintiff there did not invoke the Fourth Amendment, and the issue was not joined. Earlier cases seem to imply—also without discussion of the Fourth Amendment—that the Due Process Clause may govern, e.g., Spencer v. Knapheide Truck Equip. Co., 183 F.3d 902, 905 & n. 3 (8th Cir.1999), and there is a conflict in authority elsewhere about how to evaluate this type of claim. Compare Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523, 530 (7th Cir.2011) (applying Fourth Amendment), with Barrie v. Grand Cty., 119 F.3d 862, 865–69 (10th Cir.1997) (applying Due Process Clause). For present purposes, it is enough to acknowledge that a right under the Fourth Amendment against unreasonable delay in medical care for an arrestee was not clearly established in March 2012. Neither the Supreme Court nor this circuit had announced such a right, and there is no uniform body of authority that might allow us to conclude that the right was clearly established. Nor was it clearly established that a standard of objective reasonableness applies under the Due Process Clause. Cf. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015). Feltmann is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Bailey's claim that Feltmann acted unreasonably, and the district court properly dismissed that portion of the complaint. We think it prudent to avoid addressing the proper constitutional standard unnecessarily. See Camreta v. Greene, 131 S.Ct. 2020, 2031 (2011). Bailey argues in the alternative that Feltmann's decision to proceed to the jail rather than to a hospital exhibited deliberate indifference to his need for medical attention in violation of his clearly established constitutional rights under the Due Process Clause. Regardless of whether an 'unreasonable' decision to forego treatment would violate the Constitution, this court deemed it clearly established by 2008 that a pretrial detainee (or an arrestee, see Spencer, 183 F.3d at 905 n. 3) has a right to be free from deliberately indifferent denials of emergency medical care. See Thompson v. King, 730 F.3d 742, 750 (8th Cir.2013). Bailey's claim fails, however, because he has not produced sufficient evidence to support a finding that Feltmann violated that right.")

Hall v. Ramsey County, 801 F.3d 912, 917 n.3, 918-20 (8th Cir. 2015) ("The Supreme Court recently published its decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), holding a pretrial detainee need only show a government official's use of force was objectively unreasonable in a section 1983 case premised upon excessive force. Prior to the publication of Kingsley, the parties did not dispute the requisite state of mind required for Hall's excessive force claim. . . Further, any constitutional rights afforded to Hall under Kingsley were not 'clearly established' at the time of Hall's detention. . . Therefore, Kingsley does not effect [sic] the standard against which we evaluate the Aides[']conduct in the qualified immunity analysis. . . . The conduct of the Aides and Leifeld shows an error in judgment and carelessness because Hall was likely injured by the Aides' actions. But this is a plain case of 'unwise excess of zeal' that, while disturbing, does not literally shock the conscience such that the behavior meets the heavy burden of violating substantive due process. See Moran, 296 F.3d at 647 (citation omitted) (internal quotation marks omitted). Thus, Hall failed to show a constitutional violation as required to recover for the use of excessive force. We would be remiss, however, if we failed to acknowledge that government officials have "an unquestioned duty to provide reasonable safety for all residents and personnel within [an] institution" where people are involuntarily committed. Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307, 324, 102 S.Ct. 2452, 2462, 73 L.Ed.2d 28 (1982). Here, government officials failed to provide reasonable safety to Hall. Instead, Hall's elbow and wrist were likely injured during the escort to seclusion. The behavior on the part of the Aides, and Leifeld's supervision of such conduct, is unacceptable. Yet, this is not the egregious case that rises to the level of violating substantive due process under the Fourteenth Amendment. Instead, state-law claims still exist that may be a more appropriate remedy for the harm caused to Hall. . . . Sworn statements by Leifeld state Hall was placed in seclusion 'because he was uncooperative and unable to follow directions.' Further, Hall's seclusion lasted for less than two hours. Based upon the record, the Detox Center had a legitimate governmental interest in maintaining order and efficiently managing the facility. Placement of Hall in seclusion for a short period of time was a reasonable means of meeting the objective. Therefore, Hall failed to show his seclusion was a form of 'punishment' violating his constitutional rights under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Hall finally argues the Appellees unconstitutionally denied Hall medical care when Leifeld failed to immediately send Hall to the hospital for his injured leg. Again, we disagree. Hall's right to medical care arises under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . To analyze denial of medical care claims, however, 'we apply the deliberate-indifference standard that governs claims brought ... under the Eighth Amendment.'. . . According to the video footage and other evidence, Hall did not appear to need medical attention. Throughout the video footage, Hall walks without a noticeable limp and does not appear to favor either leg. There is also no evidence in the record showing harm to Hall by the delay. Thus, Hall failed to establish a due process violation. . . . Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, we affirm the district court's determination that Appellees were entitled to qualified immunity. . . Hall failed to show a violation of his procedural or substantive due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment.")

Hollingsworth v. City of St. Ann, 800 F.3d 985, 989 (8th Cir. 2015) ("The parties agree that the conduct of the officers at issue here was governed by the Fourth Amendment. Their submission is consistent with our precedents, which have applied the Fourth Amendment when resolving excessive force claims arising during transportation, booking, and initial detention of recently arrested persons. See Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898, 905 (8th Cir.2011) (citing cases); cf. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, No. 14–6368, 2015 WL 2473447, at *13 (U.S. June 22, 2015) (Alito, J., dissenting).")

Davis v. White, 794 F.3d 1008, 1011-12 & n.1 (8th Cir. 2015) ("Davis was a post-arrest detainee at the time of the incident. He alleged that White, Beaird, and Tihen used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment, consistent with our cases holding that the Fourth Amendment's 'objective reasonableness' standard applies to excessive-force claims that arise before the end of a detainee's booking process. See, e.g., Hicks v. Norwood, 640 F.3d 839, 842

(8th Cir.2011). In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, the Supreme Court recently held that the objective reasonableness standard applies to excessive force due process claims by pretrial detainees. . .The Court has not decided whether the Fourth Amendment applies to claims by detainees in custody. . . But Kingsley confirms that we have properly applied the objective reasonableness standard to these claims. . . .In applying the objective reasonableness standard to detainees in jail, the Court 'explained that a court must take account of the legitimate interests in managing a jail, acknowledging as part of the objective reasonableness analysis that deference to policies and practices needed to maintain order and institutional security is appropriate.'. . Kingsley did not overrule cases applying a different, subjective standard to Eighth Amendment excessive force claims by convicted prisoners. . . .There is one further aspect of this problem that warrants consideration at this time. The decision in Kingsley turned on the Supreme Court's conclusion that the district court erred in defining 'excessive force' in its jury instructions. . . But the Court did not overrule its prior decision that, '[i]n determining whether a Fourth Amendment violation occurred we draw all reasonable factual inferences in favor of the jury verdict, but ... we do not defer to the jury's legal conclusion that those facts violate the Constitution.' Muehler v. Mena, 544 U.S. 93, 98 n. 1 (2005). None of the four separate opinions in Kingsley mentioned this issue. Both Muehler and Kingsley were 5–4 decisions. Justice Kennedy was the only Justice in both majorities. We see nothing in the Kingsley opinion suggesting that Justice Kennedy has departed from his concurring opinion in Muehler, which we read as treating the question of whether force was constitutionally excessive as an issue of law. . . Obviously, this is a question of great significance in deciding issues of qualified immunity and in conducting trials of Fourth Amendment excessive force claims.")

Smith on behalf of Estate of Hill v. Lisenbe, No. 4:20 CV 804 JMB, 2022 WL 407142, at *7 n.20 (E.D. Mo. Feb. 10, 2022) ("In the context of an excessive force claim filed pursuant to § 1983, the Supreme Court has held that 'a pretrial detainee can prevail [on a due process claim] by providing only objective evidence that the challenged governmental action is not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective or that it is excessive in relation to that purpose.'. . This ruling has been extended to pretrial detainee's medical needs claims in the Second, Sixth, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits. . . The Eighth Circuit, however, has explicitly confined Kingsley to excessive force claims. [collecting cases] The Third and Fourth Circuits have declined to address the issue and there is no First Circuit case on point.")

Ivey v. Williams, No. CV 12-30 (DWF/TNL), 2019 WL 669805, at *4 (D. Minn. Feb. 19, 2019) ("Defendants argue further that the Kingsley analysis is not appropriate in the context of qualified immunity because the decision was released in 2015, while Defendants' alleged actions took place in 2011. . . They cite Hall v. Ramsey County to contend that the relevant question for excessive force in the context of qualified immunity is whether the plaintiff can demonstrate 'both that the official's conduct was conscience shocking, and that the official violated one or more fundamental rights that are deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition, and implicit in the concept of ordered liberty.'. . . The Court is unpersuaded. The Eighth Circuit applied the objective reasonableness standard to both qualified immunity and excessive force claims long before the Kingsley decision was released. See e.g., Wilson v. Spain, 20 F.3d 713, 716 (8th Cir. 2000)

(asserting that "[t]he linchpin of qualified immunity is the objective reasonableness of the officer's actions; objective reasonableness is also applied in analyzing the merits of Fourth Amendment excessive-force claims); Nelson v. County of Wright, 162 F.3d 986, 989-990, 990 n.5 (8th Cir. 1998) (observing that the standard for determining qualified immunity is identical to the standard for deciding if the use of force was excessive and that both involve considerations of objective reasonableness). . . The Court finds that whether or not the Magistrate Judge relied on Kingsley, the objective reasonableness standard applies; because reasonable officers in Defendants' position would have likely understood that their conduct was violating Plaintiff's clearly established right to be free from excessive force, the Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Even if the 'shocks the conscience' standard applied, the result is the same. The Supreme Court has observed, the measure of what is conscience shocking is no calibrated yard stick,' but it does 'point the way.' . . Kingsley held that excessiveness is measured objectively and then identified various considerations to inform whether the governmental action was rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective. . . Therefore, 'Kingsley teaches that purposeful, knowing or (perhaps) reckless action that uses an objectively unreasonable degree of force is conscience shocking.'. . Here, a reasonable factfinder could conclude under both an objective reasonableness' or 'shocks the conscience' standard that Defendants' alleged actions were unnecessary and excessive, considering Plaintiff was already subdued and restrained when Defendants entered his room.")

Jones v. Briggs, No. 4: 16CV00593 BSM/JTR, 2018 WL 662362, at *4 n.5 (E.D. Ark. Feb. 1, 2018) ("Currently, the Eighth Circuit applies the same deliberate indifference standard to inhumane conditions of confinement claims brought by pretrial detainees, under the Fourteenth Amendment, and convicted prisoners, under the Eighth Amendment. Butler, 465 F.3d at 345. In Ingram v. Cole Cnty, 846 F.3d 282 (8th Cir. 2017), the Eighth Circuit heard arguments, en banc, on whether the deliberate indifference standard still applies to conditions of confinement claims asserted by pretrial detainees, based on the Court's holding in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015). As of the date of this Recommended Disposition, no opinion has been entered in the Ingram case. However, even if the Eighth Circuit decides to extend Kingsley to conditions of confinement claims asserted by pretrial detainees, Defendants in this case would be entitled to qualified immunity from a retroactive application of that new legal standard.")

Muckenfuss v. Arrington, No. 5:16-CV-00023-JTR, 2017 WL 6542753, at *1 n.3 (E.D. Ark. Dec. 21, 2017) ("It appears Muckenfuss was a pre-trial detainee at the time his inadequate medical care claim arose. Currently, the Eighth Circuit applies the same deliberate indifference standard to an inadequate medical care brought by a pretrial detainee, under the Fourteenth Amendment, or a convicted prisoner, under the Eighth Amendment. See Vaughn v. Greene County, Ark., 438 F.3d 845, 850 (8th Cir. 2006). In Ingram v. Cole Cnty, 846 F.3d 282 (8th Cir. 2017), the Eighth Circuit recently heard arguments, en banc, as to whether the deliberate indifference standard still applies to pretrial detainees in the light of the Supreme Court's holding in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466 (2015). However, as of the date of this Recommendation, no opinion has been entered in the Ingram case.")

Beck v. Richards, No. 4:16-CV-00495 KGB, 2017 WL 3326969, at *3 (E.D. Ark. Aug. 3, 2017) ("In their motions for summary judgment, defendants argue that this Court must analyze Mr. Beck's claim under the Fourteenth Amendment's deliberate indifference standard . . . . The Court rejects this argument, as the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals 'has not resolved whether an arrestee's claim alleging denial of medical care is analyzed under the Due Process Clause or the Fourth Amendment.'. .Despite this, the Court concludes that defendants are entitled to summary judgment on Mr. Beck's Fourth Amendment claims. Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on these claims, as 'a right under the Fourth Amendment against unreasonable delay in medical care for an arrestee was not clearly established' when the underlying events occurred in early 2014. . . It also was not 'clearly established that a standard of objective reasonableness applies under the Due Process Clause.'")

McAdoo v. Martin, No. 6:13-CV-06088, 2017 WL 1091348, at *6 (W.D. Ark. Mar. 21, 2017) (applying Kingsley to excessive force claim but deliberate indifference to medical needs claim)

Swington v. City of Waterloo, Iowa, No. C15-0125-LRR, 2017 WL 427495, at *15 (N.D. Iowa Jan. 31, 2017) ("The plaintiff's right to medical care arises under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . .To analyze denial of medical care claims, however, 'the deliberate-indifference standard that governs claims brought ... under the Eighth Amendment' is applied.")

Ellingson v. Piercy, No. 2:14-CV-04316-NKL, 2016 WL 2745868, at *7 n.3 (W.D. Mo. May 11, 2016) ("In Kingsley, the United States Supreme Court held that Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claims are properly analyzed under the 'objective reasonableness' standard. . . However, it remains an open question whether Kingsley's standard also applies to conditions of confinement claims under the Fourteenth Amendment. The question is not one the Court must presently decide. Even if the Brandon's Fourteenth Amendment claim is analyzed under the deliberate indifference standard, . . . Plaintiffs have offered sufficient allegations to survive a motion for judgment on the pleadings. Plaintiffs allege that Piercy knew Brandon was handcuffed when he placed Brandon against a flipped-up seat and then operated the patrol boat at high speeds across crowded, choppy water. Plaintiffs further allege that after Brandon fell into the lake, Piercy did not seek assistance or attempt a water rescue until nearby witnesses urged him to do so, despite knowing that Brandon was handcuffed and knowing he could not grab the dock hook Piercy initially fished into the water. These allegations are sufficient at this stage to establish that Piercy knew of an excessive risk—that a handcuffed, potentially inebriated person in his custody may drown if ejected into the water—and then proceeded to disregard this risk by leaning Brandon against a flipped-up seat, driving at high speeds across the lake, and delaying a water rescue after Brandon was ejected from the patrol boat. As in the case of a medical emergency, these risks are obvious even to a layperson such that a jury could find deliberate indifference.")

Oliver v. County of Gregory, No. 3:14-CV-03013-RAL, 2016 WL 70824, at *6 n.12 (D.S.D. Jan. 6, 2016) ("In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, the Supreme Court of the United States held that a pretrial detainee need only show that the defendant-official's use of force was objectively unreasonable in a § 1983 case alleging excessive force. . . That holding, however, was limited to excessive force cases under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Thus, the Eighth Circuit still utilizes the subjective measure of deliberate indifference as set forth in Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825 (1994), for pretrial detainees in Fourteenth Amendment cases involving an allegation of deprivation of medical care. [citing Hall]")

Townsend v. Summerville, No. 4:12-CV-04072, 2015 WL 5163052, at *9 (W.D. Ark. Sept. 3, 2015) ("The United States Supreme Court recently confirmed the Eighth Circuit's application of the objectively reasonable standard to excessive force claims by pretrial detainees in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, __ US __, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015). See Davis v. White, __ F.3d __, 2015 WL 4528367 at *2 (July 28, 2015).")

Nattress v. Lancaster Cnty., Neb., No. 4:14-CV-3161, 2015 WL 4249493, at *5-7 (D. Neb. July 13, 2015) ("[A]s a preliminary matter, it is necessary to consider what constitutional standard is applicable to the unique circumstance of a plaintiff who alleges that excessive force was applied after his acquittal, but before he was released from custody or charged with another offense. . . . The plaintiff, as in Andrews, might fairly be characterized as a 'post-trial detainee.' And as in Andrews, the same governmental concerns are implicated. Guided by the Eighth Circuit's reasoning in Andrews, the Court will apply a Fourteenth Amendment standard to the plaintiff's excessive force claim. Under that standard, the plaintiff must show that force was purposely or knowingly used against him. . . and that the force used was objectively unreasonable. [citing Kingsley] Objective reasonableness turns on the facts and circumstances of each particular case. . . A court must make this determination from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, including what the officer knew at the time, not with the 20/20 vision of hindsight. . . A court must also account for the legitimate interests that stem from the government's need to manage the facility in which the individual is detained, appropriately deferring to policies and practices that in the judgment of jail officials are needed to preserve internal order and discipline and to maintain institutional security. . .Considerations that bear on the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the force used may include the relationship between the need for the use of force and the amount of force used, the extent of the plaintiff's injury; any effort made by the officer to temper or to limit the amount of force, the severity of the security problem at issue, the threat reasonably perceived by the officer, and whether the plaintiff was actively resisting. . . . A plaintiff can prevail by providing objective evidence that the challenged government action was not rationally related to a legitimate government purpose or that it was excessive in relation to that purpose.")

NINTH CIRCUIT

Alexander v. Nguyen, 78 F.4th 1140, 1144 (9th Cir. 2023) ("This court tends 'to address both prongs of qualified immunity where the two-step procedure promotes the development of constitutional precedent in an area where this court's guidance is ... needed.'. . Because the law governing pretrial detainees' claims of inadequate medical care and other dangerous conditions of confinement is still developing in the wake of the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v.

Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389 (2015), we address the first prong, which is decisive here. We need not discuss qualified immunity separately. Alexander argues that he can prove that Dr. Nguyen denied him appropriate medical care in violation of his Fourteenth Amendment rights under the test set forth in Gordon v. County of Orange, 888 F.3d 1118 (9th Cir. 2018). Dr. Nguyen argues that the proper inquiry is whether Alexander was deprived of safe conditions under the test in Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307 (1982). These tests differ only slightly. Both ask whether Dr. Nguyen's conduct was reasonable, and both require Alexander to show that Dr. Nguyen's conduct was worse than negligent. The undisputed facts show that Alexander cannot meet this burden under either phrasing.")

Polanco v. Diaz, 76 F.4th 918, 928 n.7 (9th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 2520 (2024) ("In a different context, we held that the requisite mental state for a Fourteenth Amendment due process claim is an objective form of deliberate indifference. See Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1069–70 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc). But we have continued to apply a purely subjective test to state-created-danger claims. See Herrera, 18 F.4th at 1160–61 (recognizing a tension between the requisite mental states in Castro and post-Castro state-created-danger cases but holding that it was bound by the latter cases).")

Russell v. Lumitap, 31 F.4th 729, 738-45 (9th Cir. 2022) ("[T]he standard governing claims for inadequate medical care has changed since Russell's death. After our decision in Clouthier, the Supreme Court cautioned in Kingsley v. Hendrickson. . . that claims brought by pretrial detainees under the Fourteenth Amendment should not necessarily be evaluated under the same standard as claims brought by convicted prisoners under the Eighth Amendment. . . Kingsley addressed a claim brought by a pretrial detainee that jail officers had used excessive force against him. . .The Court held that a defendant bringing such a claim need not show subjective deliberate indifference; he need only demonstrate 'that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.'. . In Gordon v. County of Orange, we extended the Supreme Court's reasoning in Kingsley to claims for inadequate medical care brought by pretrial detainees. . . . Thus the subjective second prong of Clouthier has been replaced by an objective standard: A defendant can be liable even if he did not actually draw the inference that the plaintiff was at a substantial risk of suffering serious harm, so long as a reasonable official in his circumstances would have drawn that inference. Under this objective reasonableness standard, a plaintiff must 'prove more than negligence but less than subjective intent—something akin to reckless disregard.'. . . The primary issue in this case is the third prong of the Gordon test. As we explained, the subjective deliberate indifference prong of the Clouthier test that governed inadequate medical care claims at the time of Russell's death has since been replaced by Gordon's objective prong. An officer is entitled to qualified immunity unless the unlawfulness of his conduct was clearly established at the time that he acted . . . and the law at the time that the defendants acted was different than it is now. However, we held in Sandoval v. County of San Diego that 'when we assess qualified immunity for a claim of inadequate medical care of a pre-trial detainee arising out of an incident that took place prior to Gordon, we ... "concentrate on the objective aspects of the [pre-Gordon] constitutional standard" to evaluate whether the law was clearly established.'. . Thus, to determine whether the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, we do not consider whether they subjectively understood that Russell faced a substantial risk of serious harm. . . Rather, we conduct 'an objective examination of whether established case law would make clear to every reasonable official that the defendant's conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . Applying Sandoval's approach here, to defeat qualified immunity the plaintiffs must show that, given the available case law at the time, a reasonable official, knowing what Dr. Le, Nurse Teofilo, Nurse Trout, and Nurse Lumitap knew, would have understood that their actions 'presented such a substantial risk of harm to [Russell] that the failure to act was unconstitutional.'. . Their 'actual subjective appreciation of the risk is not an element of the established-law inquiry.'. . . Like the plaintiffs in Plemmons, Tlamka, and Estate of Carter, Russell was displaying 'classic' and 'obviously severe'. . . symptoms of a heart attack. And like the officials in Tlamka, Dr. Le and the nurses halted treatment 'with no good or apparent explanation for the delay ....'. . . Dr. Le knew that the intervention plan under the Standardized Procedures for angina pectoris had been initiated when Russell was given a first dose of nitroglycerin, yet he did not recommend continuing this line of treatment—which called for the administration of up to two more doses of nitroglycerin within as little as five minutes after the first dose, and hospitalization. As in Clouthier, it should have been clear to Dr. Le that Russell was at severe risk based on Nurse Trout's call relaying his symptoms and the recommendation of the Standardized Procedures to hospitalize Russell under these circumstances. . . Unlike Simmons, it is reasonable to infer—and so, again, at this stage we must . . . that a reasonable person in Dr. Le's position would have been aware that the risk to Russell was 'imminent'. . . due to the severity and nature of the symptoms and the 'obvious'. . . nature of the risk, as demonstrated in part by the fact that the Standardized Procedures called for an immediate call to paramedics under these circumstances. Nevertheless, without explanation or examination, Dr. Le did not recommend that Nurse Trout conform her treatment to the Standardized Procedures. As in Ortiz, Dr. Le made his recommendation without examining his patient despite his knowledge of Russell's ominous symptoms, and disregarded a clear signal—the ineffectiveness of the dose of nitroglycerin—that Russell's condition was potentially fatal. . . While Dr. Le recommended Motrin and a mental-health screening, clearly established law at the time provided that Russell need not 'prove complete failure to treat' because 'access to medical staff is meaningless unless that staff is competent and can render competent care.'. . A reasonable jury could conclude that Dr. Le had been deliberately indifferent. Under these circumstances, taking the facts most favorably to the plaintiffs, Dr. Le could not have reasonably believed based on the clearly established law as it stood then that he could provide constitutionally adequate care without even examining a patient with Russell's symptoms who had not responded to a dose of nitroglycerin. Therefore, the district court was correct in denying summary judgment on qualified immunity to Dr. Le. . . . However, when Nurse Trout called Dr. Le and told him all of the symptoms that Russell had been experiencing, Dr. Le did not recommend hospitalizing him. Even though Russell was experiencing classic symptoms of a heart attack, Dr. Le recommended Motrin and a mental-health screening. No clearly established law would have put a reasonable nurse in Nurse Trout's position on notice that she could violate Russell's constitutional rights even while relying on Dr. Le's evaluation and recommendation. Therefore, Nurse Trout is entitled to summary judgment on qualified immunity. A jury could not, on the facts pleaded, reasonably conclude that Nurse Trout was deliberately indifferent. Though perhaps she should have called paramedics, her having promptly called the physician on call and followed his instructions cannot be categorized as deliberate indifference. . . . Drawing all inferences in plaintiff's favor, a reasonable person in Nurse Lumitap's position would have inferred that Russell was at serious risk if not hospitalized. By the time she came on duty at 7:00 am, Dr. Le's advice was 5½ hours old and Russell's symptoms were much worse than when Dr. Le had been called. The record shows that, like Nurses Teofilo and Trout, Nurse Lumitap knew that Dr. Le had evaluated Russell over the phone and had not recommended hospitalization. However, Nurse Lumitap was responsible for Russell's care from around 7:00 am until 12:20 pm, between 5½ to 11 hours after Dr. Le had made his recommendation to administer Motrin. A reasonable factfinder could conclude that, after so much time had elapsed, and in the face of Russell's rapidly deteriorating condition, Nurse Lumitap was no longer in a position to reasonably rely on Dr. Le's recommendation from the night before without calling him again. She did not call for paramedics until Russell was unresponsive, and at no point did she call Dr. Le or any other physician for an updated recommendation in light of Russell's worsening symptoms. Her decision not to call Dr. Le (or whichever physician was then on call) at any point during that period suffices to raise a genuine dispute over whether it was clearly established that the care she provided was constitutionally adequate. Therefore, the district court was correct in denying qualified immunity to Nurse Lumitap. . . Although Nurse Trout is shielded by qualified immunity because her actions did not violate then-existing clearly established law, there is at least a genuine dispute of material fact over whether Dr. Le's and Nurses Teofilo's and Lumitap's conduct violated clearly established law as it then stood. Therefore, we reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity to Nurse Trout, and we affirm its denial of qualified immunity to Dr. Le and Nurses Teofilo and Lumitap.") Fraihat v. United States Immigration & Customs Enforcement, 16 F.4th 613, 659-60 & n.7 (9th Cir. 2021) (Berzon, J., dissenting) ("Even though the proper standard 'is one of objective indifference, not subjective indifference,'. . . the majority substantiates its analysis with cases that additionally require subjective indifference. It does so primarily by relying on cases that predate Kingsley v. Hendrickson[.] . . Kingsley held the proper standard for evaluating a detainee's excessive force claim is purely objective. . . Applying Kingsley, Gordon 'conclude[d] that the proper standard of review' for 'right to adequate medical care' claims 'is one of objective indifference, not subjective indifference.'. . . [T]he Kingsley/Gordon reckless disregard standard is not satisfied by simply recognizing a risk to health and safety, expressing concern, and taking some measures to decrease the risk. Instead, the officials responsible for the conditions must take 'reasonable available measures to abate that risk'; the degree of risk presented necessarily informs which 'reasonable available measures' are needed 'to abate' them. . . Plaintiffs have presented evidence which, viewed through an objective standard, strongly suggesting the government did not prescribe such measures, whether it meant to do so or not. Distracted, I submit, by its evaluation of whether ICE was acting in good faith, the majority holds that ICE's policy about detention conditions is not 'objectively unreasonable[.]' . . I disagree. Given the degree of irreparable harm to which the Plaintiff subclasses of medically vulnerable detainees were exposed, Roman makes clear that the district court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the Plaintiffs at least demonstrated a serious legal question on the merits of their claim, sufficient to support the grant of a preliminary injunction. The majority holds, for example, that '[P]laintiffs did not demonstrate that the mere fact of their detention amounted to deliberate indifference[.]'. . . The post-Kingsley case law continues to use the term 'deliberate indifference,'. . . despite its origination in the Eighth Amendment subjective standard cases, . . . and even though the term seems to incorporate the subjective component (that the 'indifference' was 'deliberate'). I use 'reckless disregard' here and suggest that we stop using the misleading 'deliberate indifference' rubric in cases involving pretrial or civil detention Fifth or Fourteenth Amendment challenges.")

Sandoval v. County of San Diego, 985 F.3d 657, 671-78 (9th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 711 (2021) ("We begin with whether the shift in the legal framework governing Plaintiff's claims—from subjective deliberate indifference to objective unreasonableness—has any bearing on the qualified immunity analysis. The nurses argue, and the dissent agrees, that in determining whether the nurses are entitled to qualified immunity, we must apply all elements of an inadequate medical care claim exactly as they stood at the time of the incident at issue here, including the subjective deliberate indifference requirement. But we have already rejected this approach in Horton by Horton v. City of Santa Maria. 915 F.3d at 599–603. Under Horton, when we assess qualified immunity for a claim of inadequate medical care of a pre-trial detainee arising out of an incident that took place prior to Gordon, we apply the current objective deliberate indifference standard to analyze whether there was a constitutional violation. . . and 'concentrate on the objective aspects of the [pre-Gordon] constitutional standard' to evaluate whether the law was clearly established[.] . . .To fully understand Horton, we must first address Estate of Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043 (9th Cir. 2002). [court discusses Estate of Ford and Horton] The rule of Horton, aside from the fact that it is controlling precedent, makes sense. The purpose of determining whether there has been a constitutional violation has always been to 'further the development of constitutional precedent.'. . It would run counter to that goal to apply the pre-Gordon standard now, because 'no purpose would be served for future cases from delineating the application of that standard to the constitutional merits of this case.'. .Horton's recognition that the objective deliberate indifference standard applies even when the incident occurred pre-Gordon comports with the purpose underlying the clearly established law requirement. As the Supreme Court has explained, this requirement is designed to 'give[ ] government officials breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments about open legal questions.'. .Because the premise of qualified immunity is that state officials should not be held liable for money damages absent fair warning that their actions were unconstitutional, the clearly established law standard 'requires that the legal principle clearly prohibit the [defendant's] conduct in the particular circumstances before him.'. . This inquiry is an objective one that compares the factual circumstances faced by the defendant to the factual circumstances of prior cases to determine whether the decisions in the earlier cases would have made clear to the defendant that his conduct violated the law. . . The focus is on the standards governing the defendant's conduct, not legal arcana. . . Consistent with this purpose, the qualified immunity analysis remains objective even when the constitutional claim at issue involves subjective elements. . . Thus, in the Eighth

Amendment deliberate indifference context, we have recognized that 'a reasonable prison official understanding that he cannot recklessly disregard a substantial risk of serious harm, could know all of the facts yet mistakenly, but reasonably, perceive that the exposure in any given situation was not that high. In these circumstances, he would be entitled to qualified immunity.'. . We are not aware of a single case in which we have examined the defendant's mental state in assessing the clearly established law prong of qualified immunity. Several other circuits have concluded, as we did in Horton, that because the clearly established law prong focuses objectively on whether it would be clear that the defendant's conduct violated the Constitution, lack of notice regarding the mental state required to establish liability has no bearing on the analysis. Take, for example, the Seventh Circuit's decision on remand from the Supreme Court in Kingsley itself. See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828 (7th Cir. 2015) (per curiam) ("Kingsley II"). . . On remand, the Kingsley defendants advanced a view of qualified immunity similar to the one the nurses offer here. They argued that because the Supreme Court's decision had 'altered the substantive law of liability,' their liability should not be assessed under the new objective unreasonableness standard, which had not been clearly established at the time of the incident in the case. . .In addressing this argument, the Seventh Circuit first concluded that prior cases had clearly established that the force used by the officers was excessive—i.e., that their conduct was unlawful. . It then turned to the defendants' argument that they were nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity because the standard had changed from subjective awareness to objective unreasonableness during the course of the litigation. . . Rejecting this position, the Seventh Circuit explained that it 'would untether the qualified immunity defense from its moorings of protecting those acting in reliance on a standard that is later determined to be infirm.'. . Reliance interests were not implicated there, it said, because before and after the Supreme Court's decision, 'the standards for the amount of force that c[ould] be permissibly employed remain[ed] the same.'. . The Seventh Circuit concluded that to decide otherwise would require it 'to accept the dubious proposition that, at the time the officers acted, they were on notice only that they could not have a reckless or malicious intent and that, as long as they acted without such an intent, they could apply any degree of force they chose.'. . It declined to do so. . .Like the Seventh Circuit, the Sixth Circuit has rejected the argument that defendants facing claims of excessive force based on pre-Kingsley conduct are entitled to qualified immunity simply because it would not have been clear at the time of their unconstitutional conduct that any claims against them would be governed by an objective standard. Hopper v. Plummer, 887 F.3d 744, 755–56 (6th Cir. 2018). . . The First and Fifth Circuits have reached similar conclusions. [citing cases] Rather than sticking to our settled approach, the dissent would, for the first time, drag a subjective element into the question of whether a defendant violated clearly established law. For example, the dissent concludes Nurse de Guzman is entitled to qualified immunity—regardless of whether it would have been clear to every reasonable nurse that his conduct was unlawful—because there is, supposedly, insufficient evidence that de Guzman subjectively understood that Sandoval faced a serious medical need. . . This radical reimagination of qualified immunity would produce results directly contrary to the purposes served by the doctrine—giving 'government officials breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments about open legal questions,'. . . while at the same time ensuring that a plaintiff can recover damages from a defendant who acts so unreasonably in light of established case law that he is appropriately described as 'plainly incompetent[.]'. . Consider how the dissent's approach would play out in practice. Here, there is no dispute that the objective unreasonableness standard from Gordon governs the merits of Plaintiff's claims. Thus, had the nurses not raised a qualified immunity defense, presumably even the dissent would agree that objective unreasonableness alone would be sufficient to establish their liability. . . Yet the dissent would use qualified immunity, a defense designed 'to shield officials ... when they perform their duties reasonably,'. . . to require Plaintiff to satisfy a standard under which the nurses would be protected from liability—no matter how *un*reasonable their conduct—as long as they did not subjectively appreciate that their actions put Sandoval at a substantial risk of suffering serious harm. We cannot accept this extraordinary proposition, which would transform a defense that protects 'all but the plainly incompetent,' into one that provides immunity to defendants precisely because they were so incompetent that they did not understand the patent unreasonableness of their conduct as already established by law. . . The dissent's position might be justified if we could somehow conclude that the nurses relied on the subjective deliberate indifference standard in determining how to treat Sandoval. But to speak the thought is to recognize that it makes little sense. As the clearly established law prong of qualified immunity is typically applied, we impute to the defendant knowledge of the relevant case law governing his conduct. Thus, if there is binding precedent holding that a police officer may not use deadly force against an unarmed fleeing suspect, . . . future officers are expected to tailor their conduct accordingly. Those who fail to do so are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . They have received their 'fair notice' and squandered it. . . But how would an official who believes any claims against him would be tried under a subjective deliberate indifference standard act any differently than one who knows that an objective unreasonableness standard applies? It is not as if an individual can consciously control the extent to which he is subjectively aware of the wrongfulness of his conduct. It therefore seems likely that officials responsible for providing medical care to inmates will act in exactly the same manner after Gordon as they did before. They will provide the treatment they think necessary under the circumstances, mindful of what our cases dictate is appropriate conduct in different factual scenarios, and, in the event they subjectively believe the treatment they are providing is inadequate, they will, we would hope, adjust their conduct accordingly. It is true that after Gordon, state officials may now be held liable for providing inadequate medical care even when they were not subjectively aware of the unreasonableness of their conduct. But as the Seventh Circuit has explained, this change could affect an official's on-the-ground actions only if we were to assume that before Gordon, officials acted in reliance on the belief that as long as they were not subjectively aware that their conduct created a substantial risk of serious harm to an inmate, they could provide any level of medical care they so chose, no matter how obviously deficient. . . Like the Sixth and Seventh Circuits, we refuse to accept this 'dubious proposition.'. . In sum, as we previously concluded in Horton, when the governing law has changed since the time of the incident, we apply the current law to determine if a constitutional violation took place under the first prong of qualified immunity analysis, and the second prong remains what it has always been: an objective examination of whether established case law would make clear to every reasonable official that the defendant's conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted. . . We will approach our analysis accordingly. We have already determined that there is a triable issue of fact whether the nurses committed constitutional violations under the Gordon standard, which governs the violation prong of our qualified immunity analysis. . . We turn now to whether the right was clearly established at the time. . . Applying Horton's approach here, to defeat qualified immunity for the Officers, Plaintiff must show that, given the available case law at the time, a reasonable nurse, knowing what Llamado, Harris, and de Guzman knew, would have understood that failing to call paramedics (Llamdo and Harris), or failing to check on Sandoval for hours and failing to pass on information about his condition (de Guzman), 'presented such a substantial risk of harm to [Sandoval] that the failure to act was unconstitutional.'. . The nurses' actual subjective appreciation of the risk is not an element of the established-law inquiry. We conclude that Sandoval has demonstrated that the available law was clearly established as to the unreasonableness of the nurses' conduct.")

Sandoval v. County of San Diego, 985 F.3d 657, 685-91 (9th Cir. 2021) (Collins, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 711 (2021) ("In reversing the judgment as to the Nurses, the majority applies the wrong legal standards to the qualified immunity inquiry and, as to Nurse de Guzman, reaches the wrong result. . . In opposing the Nurses' claim of qualified immunity, Plaintiff had to show that the Nurses violated clearly established law as it stood in 2014, when they acted. Because the then-controlling deliberate-indifference liability standards included a subjective element, Plaintiff therefore had to make a showing of subjective deliberate indifference to defeat qualified immunity, and she had to do so even though that subjective element of the test for liability has since been overruled. The majority errs—and expressly creates a circuit split—in reaching the oxymoronic conclusion that a county employee who did not even violate the law at the time he or she acted can nonetheless be said to have violated clearly established law at that time. . . . Because the qualified immunity issue turns on whether '"any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he [or she] was violating"' then-existing law, . . . and because then-existing law required subjective awareness of a serious medical need, . . . it follows that a nurse who, at the time, did not subjectively apprehend Sandoval's serious medical needs is entitled to qualified immunity. Put simply, a nurse who did not violate then-existing law cannot possibly be said to have violated clearly established law, and such a nurse is therefore entitled to qualified immunity. Consequently, unless Plaintiff presented sufficient evidence to raise a triable issue with respect to (inter alia) a given nurse's subjective awareness of Sandoval's serious medical needs, that nurse would be entitled to qualified immunity. . . The majority nonetheless contends that the qualified immunity inquiry in this case is governed by a purely objective standard, viz., whether 'a reasonable nurse, knowing what Llamado, Harris, and de Guzman knew, would have understood that [his or her actions] "presented such a substantial risk of harm to [Sandoval] that the failure to act was unconstitutional."'. . According to the majority, the qualified immunity inquiry requires an exclusively objective focus that effectively shears off any subjective element of the previously existing liability standard. As explained above, this position cannot be correct, because it rests on the self-contradictory premise that one can violate the clearly established law at the time without even violating the law at the time. . . Although the majority argues that its position is required by Ninth Circuit precedent, its ruling here is both contrary to our caselaw and creates a split with at least three other circuits. . . . In addition to being inconsistent with our precedent, the majority's ruling creates a clear split with the decisions of at least three other circuits. Indeed, the majority opinion candidly acknowledges that the Third, Eighth, and Tenth Circuits have held that courts addressing comparable claims must 'apply a subjective framework for purposes of qualified immunity, even though it ha[s] since been replaced by an objective standard.'. . . Although the majority's position is directly contrary to that of the Third, Eighth, and Tenth Circuits, the majority claims that its approach is supported by the decisions of several other circuits. . . That is doubtful. Only two of these cases involved a claim of deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of a pretrial detainee, and the court in both cases applied the subjective test in addressing qualified immunity. Dyer v. Houston, 964 F.3d 374, 383–84 (5th Cir. 2020) (holding that confusion over the exact nature of the subjective element did not absolve the district court of having to decide whether the defendants were liable under the then-clearly established standards); Hopper v. Plummer, 887 F.3d 744, 756–57 (6th Cir. 2018) (declining to disturb district court's denial of qualified immunity in light of its "finding of a genuine issue of material fact as to defendants' 'knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm'"). The majority instead cites the portion of Hopper that involved an excessive force claim, as well as two other decisions involving such claims. Hopper, 887 F.3d at 755–56; Miranda-Rivera v. Toledo-Davila, 813 F.3d 64 (1st Cir. 2016); Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828 (7th Cir. 2015) (decision on remand from the Supreme Court's Kingsley decision). The courts in all three of these cases dismissed the notion that any previously applicable subjective element of the excessive force test provided any basis for granting qualified immunity, and to that extent those cases bear some arguable similarity to the majority's conclusion here. . . But there is a critical difference between the role of the subjective element in an excessive force claim (in which the officer affirmatively applies force, . . . and a claim of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs (in which the official fails to act). In excessive force cases in which the objective component of the qualified immunity inquiry is met—meaning that the officer has applied an objective level of force that any reasonable officer would know is excessive—there are likely to be few, if any, cases in which the officer who is knowingly and affirmatively applying that force could plausibly assert that he did not simultaneously act with the requisite subjective intent of 'at least recklessness.'. . In other words, satisfying the objective standard for qualified immunity in such excessive force cases almost certainly means that the subjective element is met as well. By contrast, where the gravamen of the violation is a failure to act (as in the context of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs), the objective unreasonableness of a nurse's failure to detect a serious medical risk does not similarly lead to an inescapable conclusion that the nurse must have actually subjectively appreciated that risk. People can, and do, sometimes subjectively overlook what they should obviously detect. These three cases thus supply little support for the majority's sweeping rule that the qualified immunity inquiry is exclusively objective and requires courts to affirmatively and always disregard any subjective elements of the previously clearly established law. In all events, to the extent that these cases could be read to endorse the majority's flawed analysis, then they are wrong as well. . . Accordingly, each of the Nurses here is entitled to qualified immunity unless Plaintiff presented sufficient evidence to show (inter alia) that that Nurse was subjectively '"aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm [to Sandoval] exists,"' and that he or she actually '"dr[e]w the inference."'")

Smith v. Washington, No. 18-35263, 2019 WL 3099387, at *2 (9th Cir. July 15, 2019) (not reported) ("[T]he district court improperly imported Eighth Amendment jurisprudence into the Fourteenth Amendment context. Although a plaintiff must establish under the Eighth Amendment that the defendant official demonstrated 'a subjective awareness of the risk of harm,'. . . under the Fourteenth Amendment a pre-trial detainee need only prove that the official's conduct was 'objectively unreasonable.'. . . We do not address here whether the current Fourteenth Amendment standard should apply during the qualified immunity analysis.")

Hoard v. Hartman, 904 F.3d 780, 788-90 (9th Cir. 2018) ("In the decades since Whitley was decided, the Supreme Court has consistently emphasized that the 'core judicial inquiry' in excessive force cases is 'whether force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'. . The contrast is clear: an officer who harms an inmate as part of a good-faith effort to maintain security has acted constitutionally, but an officer who harms an inmate 'for the very purpose of causing harm,'. . has engaged in excessive force, provided that the other elements of excessive force have been met. . . Put simply, officer intent—not officer enjoyment—serves as the core dividing factor between constitutional and unconstitutional applications of force. . . . Defendants nonetheless urge us to conclude that the district court did not err in instructing the jury on the meaning of 'sadistically' because Whitley established that only force applied 'maliciously and sadistically to cause harm' constitutes excessive force. In support of their argument, Defendants point to a string of Eighth Circuit decisions explaining that '[t]he word "sadistically" is not surplusage[.]' . . . . We decline to follow our sister circuit's interpretation of Whitley. . . . Sometimes, a word is just a word. And there is ample evidence here that the Supreme Court did not intend its use of 'maliciously and sadistically' in Whitley to work a substantive change in the law on excessive force beyond requiring intent to cause harm. Chief among this evidence is the fact that the Supreme Court has never addressed 'maliciously and sadistically separately from the specific intent to cause harm. It has even, on one occasion, omitted any mention of 'maliciously and sadistically' altogether and simply explained that 'a purpose to cause harm is needed for Eighth Amendment liability in a [prison] riot case.'. . Indeed, as recently as Kingsley v. Hendrickson, —— U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 192 L.Ed.2d 416 (2015), the Supreme Court referred to this factor of the excessive force test as the 'malicious and sadistic purpose to cause harm.'. . The Court's characterization of this standard in Kingsley comports with our understanding that the phrase 'maliciously and sadistically' serves a predominantly rhetorical function. Rather than create additional elements for plaintiffs to satisfy, the use of these two terms emphasizes the cruelty inherent in harming an inmate for no other reason than to cause harm. . . .Consistent with Whitley and its progeny, an officer's subjective enjoyment is not a necessary element of an Eighth Amendment excessive force claim. Of course, an officer who harms an inmate for his or her personal enjoyment has engaged in excessive force, but that is not the question before us: the question is whether proof of sadism is required for excessive force claims. We hold that it is not. . . .By instructing the jury that 'maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm' required 'having or deriving pleasure from extreme cruelty,' the district court required Hoard to prove that Officer Hartman acted with a subjective state of mind far more demanding than that of intent to harm. This was error.")

Shorter v. Baca, 895 F.3d 1176, 1190-91 (9th Cir. 2018) ("In Gordon, we concluded that 'claims for violations of the right to adequate medical care "brought by pretrial detainees against individuals under the Fourteenth Amendment" must be evaluated under an objective deliberate indifference standard,' and we set forth the elements of a medical care claim under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Not having the benefit of Gordon, the district court evaluated Shorter's inadequate medical care claim under the Eighth Amendment's subjective deliberate indifference standard. Because the pretrial grant of summary judgment was based on an erroneous legal standard, we vacate and remand the judgment in favor of County Defendants on Shorter's § 1983 inadequate medical care claim for further proceedings consistent with Gordon.")

Gordon v. County of Orange, 888 F.3d 1118, 1120-25 (9th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 794 (2019) ("Given developments in Section 1983 jurisprudence, including the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson . . . and our en banc decision in Castro v. County of Los Angeles, . . . we conclude that the proper standard of review for such claims is one of objective indifference, not subjective indifference. Accordingly, summary judgment is vacated and the case is remanded to the district court for further proceedings consistent with this decision. . . . With this Court's en banc decision in Castro, we rejected the notion that a subjective deliberate indifference standard applied globally to all section 1983 claims, whether brought by pretrial detainees or by convicted prisoners. . . This decision addresses the standard for claims brought by pretrial detainees for inadequate medical care. . . . While Kingsley did 'not necessarily answer the broader question of whether the objective standard applies to all Section § 1983 claims brought under the Fourteenth Amendment against individual defendants[,]'. . . logic dictates extending the objective deliberative indifference standard articulated in Castro to medical care claims. . . First, the landscape remains the same. As noted, we remain in a realm where 'Section 1983 itself 'contains no state-of-mind requirement independent of that necessary to state a violation' of the underlying federal right" (id.) and here, the medical care claims brought by pretrial detainees also 'arise under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, rather than under the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause'. . . . Notably, the 'broad wording of Kingsley.... did not limit its holding to "force" but spoke to "the challenged governmental action" generally.'. . . Second, the Supreme Court has treated medical care claims substantially the same as other conditions of confinement violations including failure-to-protect claims. For instance in 1991, in Wilson v. Seiter, the Supreme Court saw 'no significant distinction between claims alleging inadequate medical care and those alleging inadequate "conditions of confinement." Indeed, the medical care a prisoner receives is just as much a "condition" of his confinement as ... the protection he is afforded against other inmates.'. . . Third, we have long analyzed claims that government officials failed to address pretrial detainees' medical needs using the same standard as cases alleging that officials failed to protect pretrial detainees in some other way. . . Accordingly, we hold that claims for violations of the right to adequate medical care 'brought by pretrial detainees against individual defendants under the Fourteenth Amendment' must be evaluated under an objective deliberate indifference standard. . . Based thereon, the elements of a pretrial detainee's medical care claim against an individual defendant under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment are: (i) the defendant made an intentional decision with respect to the conditions under which the plaintiff was confined; (ii) those conditions put the plaintiff at substantial risk of suffering serious harm; (iii) the defendant did not take reasonable available measures to abate that risk, even though a reasonable official in the circumstances would have appreciated the high degree of risk involved—making the consequences of the defendant's conduct obvious; and (iv) by not taking such measures, the defendant caused the plaintiff's injuries. 'With respect to the third element, the defendant's conduct must be objectively unreasonable, a test that will necessarily "turn[ ] on the facts and circumstances of each particular case."'. . The ' "mere lack of due care by a state official" does not deprive an individual of life, liberty, or property under the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . Thus, the plaintiff must 'prove more than negligence but less than subjective intent—something akin to reckless disregard.'. .Because the district court applied a subjective standard to the plaintiff's claim of inadequate medical care, the grant of summary judgment was in error.")

White v. Baca, 676 F. App'x 724, 725 (9th Cir. 2017) ("We review a claim that a jury instruction is an incorrect statement of the law de novo, reversing only where there was a prejudicial error. . . The jury instructions erroneously stated that the jury needed to find the defendants acted maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing harm. See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2472-73 (2015) (holding that the factfinder need only decide whether the force the officer used against the pretrial detainee was objectively unreasonable). Because the jury instructions included a particular state of mind requirement, they failed to properly state the law. . . The failure to properly instruct the jury was not harmless. . . White is entitled to a new trial because the defendants have failed to identify any evidence to support a harmless error finding, and it is unlikely that adding an extra element to White's burden of proof would be harmless. . . Moreover, given the evidence in the record, it cannot be said that it is more likely than not that the jury would have reached the same verdict had it been properly instructed. . . Although it is plausible that the jury determined the defendants acted in a reasonable manner, it is also plausible that the jury concluded the defendants acted in an unreasonable manner, but they did not act maliciously and sadistically for the purpose of causing harm. . . Lastly, the jury verdict form is of no moment because it does not separate the elements that the jury had to find in order to establish liability; the first question, which is the only question the jury answered, subsumes all of the excessive force elements, including the erroneous requirement that White establish the subjective intent of the defendants.")

Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1069-72 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) ("In sum, Kingsley rejected the notion that there exists a single 'deliberate indifference' standard applicable to all § 1983 claims, whether brought by pretrial detainees or by convicted prisoners. Kingsley did not squarely address whether the objective standard applies to all kinds of claims by pretrial detainees, including both excessive force claims and failure-to-protect claims. An excessive force claim, like the one at issue in Kingsley, differs in some ways from a failure-to-protect claim, like the one at issue here. An excessive force claim requires an affirmative act; a failure-to-protect claim does not require an affirmative act. And Kingsley's holding concerned whether the 'force deliberately used is, constitutionally speaking, "excessive,"'. . . which does not necessarily answer the broader question whether the objective standard applies to all § 1983 claims brought under the Fourteenth Amendment against individual defendants. On the other hand, there are significant reasons to hold that the objective standard applies to failure-to-protect claims as well. 'Section 1983 itself "contains no state-of-mind requirement independent of that necessary to state a violation" of the underlying federal right.' . . The underlying federal right, as well as the nature of the harm suffered, is the same for pretrial detainees' excessive force and failure-to-protect claims. Both categories of claims arise under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, rather than under the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause. . . . We note, too, the broad wording of Kingsley. In rejecting the interpretation of Bell on which we relied in Clouthier, the Court wrote that 'a pretrial detainee can prevail by providing only objective evidence that the challenged governmental action is not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective or that it is excessive in relation to that purpose.' Kingsley, 135 S. Ct. at 2473–74 (emphasis added). The Court did not limit its holding to 'force' but spoke to 'the challenged governmental action' generally. We therefore overrule Clouthier to the extent that it identified a single deliberate indifference standard for all § 1983 claims and to the extent that it required a plaintiff to prove an individual defendant's subjective intent to punish in the context of a pretrial detainee's failure-to-protect claim. On balance, we are persuaded that Kingsley applies, as well, to failure-to-protect claims brought by pretrial detainees against individual defendants under the Fourteenth Amendment. Excessive force applied directly by an individual jailer and force applied by a fellow inmate can cause the same injuries, both physical and constitutional. Jailers have a duty to protect pretrial detainees from violence at the hands of other inmates, just as they have a duty to use only appropriate force themselves. Because of the differences between failure-to-protect claims and claims of excessive force, though, applying Kingsley's holding to failure-to-protect claims requires further analysis. As explained above, Kingsley recognized that there are two state-of-mind issues at play in an excessive force claim. The first—the officer's state of mind with respect to his physical acts—was undisputedly an intentional one there, because the officer had taken the affirmative act of using force knowingly and purposefully. In the failure-to-protect context, in which the issue is usually inaction rather than action, the equivalent is that the officer's conduct with respect to the plaintiff was intentional. For example, if the claim relates to housing two individuals together, the inquiry at this step would be whether the placement decision was intentional. Or, if the claim relates to inadequate monitoring of the cell, the inquiry would be whether the officer chose the monitoring practices rather than, for example, having just suffered an accident or sudden illness that rendered him unconscious and thus unable to monitor the cell. . . . Under Kingsley, the second question in the failure-to-protect context would then be purely objective: Was there a substantial risk of serious harm to the plaintiff that could have been eliminated through reasonable and available measures that the officer did not take, thus causing the injury that the plaintiff suffered? That inquiry differs from the inquiry with respect to an Eighth Amendment failure-to-protect claim: There, 'the deprivation alleged must objectively be sufficiently serious; and the prison official must subjectively have a sufficiently culpable state of mind.'. . . [T]he test to be applied under Kingsley must require a pretrial detainee who asserts a due process claim for failure to protect to prove more than negligence but less than subjective intent—something akin to reckless disregard. Putting these principles together, the elements of a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment failure-to-protect claim against an individual officer are:

(1) The defendant made an intentional decision with respect to the conditions under which the plaintiff was confined;
(2) Those conditions put the plaintiff at substantial risk of suffering serious harm;
(3) The defendant did not take reasonable available measures to abate that risk, even though a reasonable officer in the circumstances would have appreciated the high degree of risk involved—making the consequences of the defendant's conduct obvious; and
(4) By not taking such measures, the defendant caused the plaintiff's injuries. . .

With respect to the third element, the defendant's conduct must be objectively unreasonable, a test that will necessarily 'turn[ ] on the "facts and circumstances of each particular case."'. . . Here, the individual defendants do not claim that there was any miscommunication about the placement of Gonzalez in Castro's cell or that some other unintentional act created the jail conditions at issue. Nor do the individual defendants dispute that Castro faced a substantial risk of serious harm at the hands of Gonzalez or that they failed to take reasonable measures to mitigate that risk. Rather, the individual defendants argue that there was insufficient evidence to establish their subjective awareness of the danger that Castro faced and their knowing disregard of it, or to establish that their conduct caused Castro's injuries. In light of the analysis above, to affirm the jury's verdict we need only determine that there was substantial evidence that a reasonable officer in the circumstances would have appreciated the high degree of risk involved and that the officers' failure to take reasonable measures to protect Castro caused his injuries. The jury here found that the officers knew of the substantial risk of serious harm to Castro, which necessarily implies that the jury found that a reasonable officer would have appreciated the risk.")

Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1084-87 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) (Ikuta, J., with whom Callahan and Bea, JJ., join dissenting) ("I join Judge Callahan's dissent in full, but I write separately to express my dismay that the majority has misinterpreted Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), and made a mess of the Supreme Court's framework for determining when pretrial detainees have suffered punishment in violation of their Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. . . A pretrial detainee has a constitutional right under the Fourteenth Amendment to be free from punishment without due process of law. . . According to Bell, when a pretrial detainee alleges a violation of a constitutional right (and does not point to a violation of any 'express guarantee of the Constitution'), the only question is whether the situation at issue amounts to punishment of the detainee. . . This right to be free from punishment under the Due Process Clause is the only constitutional right at issue in this case; neither Castro nor the majority claims that any other constitutional right is at issue. Under Supreme Court precedent, there are four ways for pretrial detainees to establish that they were unconstitutionally punished. First, and most obviously, a pretrial detainee can show that a government official's action was taken with an 'expressed intent to punish.'. .Second, a pretrial detainee can show that a government official's deliberate action was objectively unreasonable. . . An objectively unreasonable action is one that is not reasonably related to the government's legitimate interests, like interests in managing the detention facility and maintaining order. . . Because an objectively unreasonable action has no 'legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose,' it indicates an intent to punish. . . A claim that an official used excessive force, rather than reasonable force necessary to maintain order, falls into this category. . . Third, a pretrial detainee can establish that a restriction or condition of confinement, such as a strip search requirement, is not reasonably related to a legitimate government purpose, which indicates that the purpose behind the condition is punishment. . . . Finally, a pretrial detainee can show that a governmental official's failure to act constituted punishment if the detainee can establish that the official was deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of harm. The Supreme Court has made clear that a failure to act is not punishment at all unless the government official actually knew of a substantial risk and consciously disregarded it. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 837–38 (1994). This standard follows from the 'intent requirement' implicit in the word 'punishment,' Wilson v. Seiter, 501 U.S. 294, 298–300 (1991); the unintentional or accidental infliction of harm amounts at most to negligence, which is not a due process violation, Kingsley, 135 S. Ct. at 2472. We have long applied this deliberate indifference standard to claims that a government official failed to address medical needs or otherwise protect pretrial detainees. [citing cases] Castro's claim falls into this last category. He alleges that a government official actually knew of a substantial risk of serious harm by putting Gonzalez in his cell and failed to protect him from that risk. As stated in Judge Callahan's dissent, we can affirm the judgment against the individual defendants on this ground. . . Rather than apply this well-established framework, the majority inexplicably holds that we must analyze a claim that a government official's failure to act constituted punishment under the standard applicable to excessive force claims, relying on the Supreme Court's recent decision in Kingsley. A description of Kingsley shows it is entirely inapposite. In that case, when a detainee refused to remove a piece of paper covering his light fixture, four officers handcuffed him, forcibly removed him from the cell, and applied a Taser to his back for about five seconds. . . The detainee brought an action under § 1983 claiming that the officers used excessive force against him in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . The Court held that where officers deliberately use force against a pretrial detainee, the standard to determine whether the force is excessive is an objective one. . . . Kingsley is consistent with the Supreme Court cases establishing that where the government official's affirmative acts are shown to be 'excessive in relation' to any 'legitimate governmental objective,' a court 'permissibly may infer' that they are punitive in nature. . . But the Kingsley standard is not applicable to cases where a government official fails to act. As explained in Bell, in analyzing a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment claim, the key question is whether the situation at issue amounts to a punishment of the detainee. . . While punitive intent may be inferred from affirmative acts that are excessive in relationship to a legitimate government objective, the mere failure to act does not raise the same inference. . . Rather, a person who unknowingly fails to act—even when such a failure is objectively unreasonable—is negligent at most. . . And the Supreme Court has made clear that 'liability for negligently inflicted harm is categorically beneath the threshold of constitutional due process.'. .Realizing this difficulty, the majority fiddles with the standard applicable to failure-to-act claims to create a new test: It holds that a pretrial detainee can state a due process violation for an official's failure to act by showing that (i) the official made an intentional decision with respect to the plaintiff's conditions of confinement; (ii) the decision put the detainee at substantial risk of suffering serious harm; (iii) the official was objectively unreasonable in not fixing the risk; and (iv) the failure to undertake a fix caused the detainee's injuries. . . This test simply doesn't fit a failure-to-act claim. . . .[T]he majority has simply dressed up the Farmer test in Kingsley language for no apparent reason; it conflates the two standards only to end up where we started. In sum, the majority unnecessarily muddles our longstanding test for claims alleging that an officer's failure to act amounted to punishment based on its mistaken assumption that it must achieve consistency with the test enunciated in Kingsley. But Kingsley applies to a different category of claims: those involving intentional, objectively unreasonable actions. Because the majority's reasoning is both mistaken and unnecessary, I dissent.")

Rettew v. Cassia County, No. 1:20-CV-00386-BLW, 2022 WL 623206, at *5–6 (D. Idaho Mar. 3, 2022) ("A determination of 'deliberate indifference' involves an examination of two elements: the seriousness of the pre-trial detainee's medical need and the nature of the defendant's response to that need. . . The plaintiff 'must first show a serious medical need by demonstrating that failure to treat [the plaintiff's] condition could result in further significant injury or the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain.'. . Upon demonstration of a serious medical need, the plaintiff must then show that the defendant's response was objectively deliberately indifferent. . . The Ninth Circuit recently enumerated the objective deliberate indifference components as:
(1) the defendant made an intentional decision regarding the denial of medical care; (2) those conditions put the detainee at substantial risk of suffering serious harm; (3) the defendant did not take reasonable available measures to abate that risk, even though a reasonable official in the circumstances would have appreciated the high degree of risk involved—making the consequences of the defendant's conduct obvious; and (4) by not taking such measures, the defendant caused the detainee's injuries.
Sandoval, 985 F.3d at 669. To satisfy the third element, Plaintiffs must show that the defendant's actions were 'objectively unreasonable' – a test that necessarily turns on the facts and circumstances of each case. Castro v. Cty. of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1067-68 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc). The objective unreasonableness standard requires a showing of 'more than negligence but less than subjective intent—something akin to reckless disregard.'. . 'The mere lack of due care by a state official does not deprive an individual of life, liberty, or property under the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . 'A court must make this determination from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, including what the officer knew at the time, not with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.' [citing Kingsley v. Hendrickson]")

Gutierrez-Lopez v. Figueroa, No. CV2000732PHXSPLJFM, 2020 WL 2781722 (D. Ariz. May 27, 2020) (applying Kingsley to conditions of confinement) ("Despite knowledge of the serious risks posed to vulnerable detainees by COVID-19, and knowledge of Petitioner's high-risk medical condition, Respondents have not implemented recommended or required measures through which Petitioner could maintain a safe distance from other detainees who may or may not be contagious; measures that would provide Petitioner with the ability to adequately clean and disinfect herself and her immediate surroundings if exposed; measures that would provide Petitioner with the means to protect herself from exposure during her interactions with staff; or measures that would allow Petitioner to seek medical care without risking exposure. Respondents do not claim that measures facilitating social distancing, hygiene, self-protection, and medical care are unreasonable or unnecessary for preventing and managing transmission of COVID-19. Nor do Respondents claim that such measures are not feasible or that they are incompatible with EDC operations. By failing to take these recommended, reasonable, and available measures, Respondents have fostered conditions that pose an objectively unreasonable risk of transmission of COVID-19 and a resulting substantial risk of serious harm to Petitioner's health and ultimate safety. While Respondents may have legitimate objectives for detaining Petitioner, they have identified no single legitimate purpose served by detaining Petitioner under conditions that pose an objectively unreasonable risk of harm to her. That is because these conditions serve no legitimate government objective. The conditions under which Petitioner is detained therefore amount to punishment and violate the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment.")

Ahlman v. Barnes, No. SACV20835JGBSHKX, 2020 WL 2754938, at *13 (C.D. Cal. May 26, 2020) ("Plaintiffs. . . have not met their burden to prove that the balance of equities tilts in favor of releasing all medically vulnerable and disabled inmates. There are myriad risks of releasing incarcerated individuals without any consideration of crime committed, propensity to violence, or flight risk. Concerns that released inmates would commit crimes is far from 'speculative'—many of the individuals in the proposed class have committed or are charged with violent crimes. Moreover, some pre-trail inmates may pose a flight risk. Such a haphazard release of inmates could present a threat to public safety. Because it is plausible that the Jail could mitigate many of the risks presented by COVID-19 with better compliance with the CDC Guidelines, Plaintiffs have not met their burden to demonstrate that the need for release outweighs the risks of releasing of 488 inmates without individualized assessments.")

Pimentel-Estrada v. Barr, No. C20-495 RSM-BAT, 2020 WL 2092430, at *14-17 (W.D. Wash. Apr. 28, 2020) ("As summarized above, Respondents have taken numerous actions in response to the COVID-19 outbreak. . . There are, however, several glaring deficiencies. First, ICE has not reduced or rearranged the population at the NWIPC such that appropriate and meaningful social distancing is possible. As of April 18, 2020, 13,287 of the 30,737 individuals held in ICE custody nation-wide had no criminal convictions and no criminal charges pending against them. ICE, Detention Management, available at https://www.ice.gov/detention-management (last visited on Apr. 22, 2020). Given the risks posed by the COVID-19 pandemic, it would be reasonable for ICE to exercise its discretion to release a significant number of these noncitizens to create safer conditions for those who remain in detention. ICE has failed to do so. Second, Respondents have not established social distancing protocols outside of the medical clinic. . . .Third, Respondents have not taken any steps to protect Petitioner, who they know is a high-risk individual. . . . Given these deficiencies, the Court concludes Petitioner has established a likelihood that Respondents have acted with reckless disregard to the significant risk of serious harm to Petitioner. . . . Conditions of confinement violate a civil detainee's Fifth Amendment due process rights when the conditions 'amount to punishment of the detainee.' Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 535 (1979); see also Kingsley, 135 S. Ct. at 2473–74. A petitioner can demonstrate punitive conditions by showing that the challenged condition is: (1) expressly intended to punish or (2) not rationally related to a legitimate government objective or is excessive to that purpose. . . Petitioner raises only the second test, arguing that the risk he faces of serious illness or death from COVID-19 is not reasonably related to or is excessive in relation to a legitimate governmental interest. . . The Supreme Court has recognized that detention pending removal proceedings is rationally related to the legitimate governmental interest of ensuring noncitizens appear for their removal proceedings and preventing danger to the community. . . Petitioner does not dispute that these are legitimate governmental interests; however, he argues that continued detention ceases to be reasonably related to these objectives when it threatens imminent illness and death. . . Respondents counter that the COVID-19 outbreak does not alter the conclusion that Petitioner's detention is rationally related to the government's non-punitive responsibilities and administrative purposes. . .Petitioner has been a lawful permanent resident of the United States for over 20 years. He was convicted in 2013 of a serious, nonviolent drug-related crime. He served his criminal sentence and in fact was released early because of his behavior. Petitioner is being held only to face a civil violation, placing him in a materially different position than those who are being held to answer criminal charges. Although Petitioner's initial detention could not be described as punitive, the situation has drastically changed given the unique and unprecedented threat posed by COVID-19. As discussed above, Petitioner has established a likelihood that he is being held in conditions that create a substantial risk of serious and potentially permanent, irreparable harm due to his age and underlying health conditions. These conditions create far more serious consequences for Petitioner than are justified by Respondent's need to ensure his presence at removal, should that be the ultimate outcome of his proceedings. . .Likewise, the risk to Petitioner of continued detention is excessive in relation to Respondent's need to protect the community. Petitioner has been convicted of only one crime in the last 66 years, and although it was serious, he successfully completed his prison sentence, was released early to a halfway house, and then began home confinement—all without incident. Under these circumstances, the Court concludes that Petitioner has established a likelihood that the conditions of his detention are not reasonably related to the legitimate governmental interests such that his continued detention is punitive in violation of his due process rights.")

Robinson v. County of Shasta, No. 214CV02910KJMKJN, 2019 WL 1931879, at *7–8 (E.D. Cal. May 1, 2019) ("With Matthew's status as a mental health patient involuntarily committed under § 5150 and in transit to a mental health facility, and with police called upon for assistance in providing Matthew with access to mental health care and not in apprehending him as a suspect, none of the case law appears to have contemplated the precise circumstances presented here. Matthew was not a free citizen subjected to excessive force in an 'arrest, investigatory stop, or other "seizure" of his person,'. . . nor was he a pretrial detainee in pre-arraignment custody[.] . .

The Fourth Amendment rights that apply in those circumstances therefore do not control here. Further, because Matthew was already committed under § 5150, the Fourth Amendment's 'distinct right to be free from an unreasonable governmental seizure of the person for whatever purpose' seems inapplicable, unless the events at issue here somehow constituted a second and distinct seizure. . . There is also a line of authority holding that involuntarily civilly committed individuals retain the right to safe conditions and the right to freedom from bodily restraint, both of which are liberty interests protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Here, too, the fit is imperfect, as Matthew was committed under § 5150 but was not in a facility and the alleged use of force was not committed by facility employees, but by law enforcement officers. . . Nonetheless, and ultimately, the Fourteenth Amendment appears to be the proper vehicle for plaintiffs' excessive force claim in the absence of clear authority to the contrary. Notably, following the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley, the court will apply the same objective reasonableness standard here regardless of whether plaintiffs' claim arises under the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment, as 'a pretrial detainee [pursuing an excessive force claim under the Fourteenth Amendment] must show only that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.'. . Evaluating an excessive force claim brought by an involuntarily committed mental health patient, the Sixth Circuit explained, Kingsley rendered any distinction between the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments' excessive force standards 'purely academic' because, [i]n light of Kingsley, under either amendment, the court would employ the same objective test for excessive force.'. . Expressing these reservations and finding the substantive outcome will be the same regardless, the court proceeds under a Fourteenth Amendment analysis. Claims of excessive force brought by involuntarily detained individuals are analyzed under the 'objective reasonableness' standard, which considers whether the officers' actions were objectively reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting them, regardless of the officer's underlying intent or motive.") Gohranson v. Snohomish County, NO. C16-1124RSL, 2018 WL 5921012, at *1-2 & n.2 (W.D. Wash. Nov. 13, 2018) ("Until 2015, a detainee alleging that the government had been deliberately indifferent to her medical needs had to show that defendants were subjectively aware of a substantial risk of serious harm when they failed to provide medical care. The Court previously found that plaintiffs' medical care claim would fail under that standard 'because they have not produced evidence that any of the corrections officers or nurses who interacted with Ms. Kronberger in the week before her death recognized that her medical condition had transitioned from the horror that is opiate withdrawal to a life-threatening electrolyte imbalance.'. . The contours of a pretrial detainee's medical care claims under the Due Process Clause have changed since 2015, however, such that custodians can now be liable in the absence of subjective knowledge if a 'reasonable official in the circumstances would have appreciated the high degree of risk involved.'. . That fact is dispositive of the claims against the individual defendants. . . . As discussed above, defendants' conduct was not unconstitutional in 2014 because they were not subjectively aware that Ms. Kronberger was suffering from life-threatening dehydration and electrolyte imbalance. The announcement of an objective standard for judging defendants' conduct post-dated the events that gave rise to this litigation and imposed additional requirements on defendants. Previously, custodial and medical staff were required to respond to the facts of which they were aware: now they must consider the possibility that additional inquiry, evaluation, or testing is necessary to ensure that they are correctly apprehending the risks involved and are being reasonably responsive to those risks. Because there was no clearly established right to medical attention from jail staff who did not actually perceive the need for such attention in 2014, qualified immunity bars plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment claim for lack of adequate medical care. . . . The Court declines to decide the first part of the qualified immunity analysis, namely whether the individual defendants' conduct violated Ms. Kronberger's constitutional rights under Kingsley and Gordon. Individual defendants made efforts to monitor Ms. Kronberger's situation and responded to her needs with differing degrees of care. Taken together, those efforts were insufficient to avert the detainee's death, but determining whether a particular defendant was simply negligent or was objectively and deliberately indifferent in the context of a not-enough-medical-care claim is extremely challenging on both the facts and the law. The Court therefore exercises its discretion to address the 'clearly established' prongs of the qualified immunity analysis first.")

Turano v. County of Alameda, No. 17-CV-06953-KAW, 2018 WL 3054853, at *6 (N.D. Cal. June 20, 2018) ("At the hearing, Plaintiff clarified that she is bringing a conditions of confinement claim. The Ninth Circuit has held that a pretrial detainee's medical care claim and a failure to protect claim are evaluated under an objective deliberative indifference standard. Gordan, 888 F.3d at 1124-25; Castro, 833 F.3d at 1069-70. Medical care and failure to protect claims, in turn, fall under the ambit of conditions of confinement claims generally, which would support applying the objective deliberative indifference standard to conditions of confinement claims. . . The Ninth Circuit's reasoning in Gordan also applies to conditions of confinement claims; § 1983 does not include a state-of-mind requirement, the claim arises under the Fourteenth Amendment rather than the Eighth Amendment, and Kingsley was not limited to force claims. . . The Court, therefore, concludes that Plaintiff is not required to plead facts demonstrating subjective intent to punish.")

Jacobsen v. Curran, No. 116CV01050LJOMJSPC, 2018 WL 1693382, at *9 (E.D. Cal. Apr. 6, 2018) ("Plaintiff's complaint contains sufficient allegations that, if taken as true, would entitle Plaintiff to a legal remedy. As a pretrial detainee in order to state a legal claim, Plaintiff must allege that: '(1) The defendant made an intentional decision with respect to the conditions under which the plaintiff was confined; (2) Those conditions put the plaintiff at substantial risk of suffering serious harm; (3) The defendant did not take reasonable available measures to abate that risk, even though a reasonable officer in the circumstances would have appreciated the high degree of risk involved—making the consequences of the defendant's conduct obvious; and (4) By not taking such measures, the defendant caused the plaintiff's injuries.'. . With respect to the third element, the defendant's conduct must be 'objectively unreasonable.'. . . Here, Plaintiff alleges that Defendant Gonzalez removed his PIC line and discontinued Plaintiff's antibiotics against the orders of Plaintiff's doctor. This is sufficient to find that Plaintiff was at risk of serious harm, Defendant Gonzalez did not take reasonable measures to abate that risk, and that this caused Plaintiff injuries.")

TENTH CIRCUIT

Wise v. Caffey, 72 F.4th 1199, 1209-10 (10th Cir. 2023) ("Officer Caffey argues that the law within this circuit, as it relates to a resisting detainee under the Fourteenth Amendment, was not clearly established on the date of the incident (October 14, 2018) as opposed to the Fourth Amendment context. Officer Caffey frames the evaluation regarding whether a right is clearly established far more literally than we require. According to Officer Caffey, the only cases that could have provided him notice that kneeing a subdued inmate in the face was a violation of the inmate's constitutional rights would have to come after the Supreme Court's holding in Kingsley (2015) and before the subject incident (2018). . . But as we explained above, the notice requirement can be discerned from a range of excessive-force cases that 'illustrate the types of objective circumstances potentially relevant to a determination of excessive force.'. . Our precedent clearly establishes that in this circuit 'officers may not continue to use force against a suspect who is effectively subdued.'. . This clearly-established principle is confirmed by a number of our cases. . . . Because the law was clearly established when Officer Caffey used objectively unreasonable force in striking Mr. Wise—a subdued pretrial detainee who posed no immediate security threat—Officer Caffey is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Geddes v. Weber County, No. 20-4083, 2022 WL 3371010, at *1, *5-*9 & n.4 (10th Cir. Aug. 16, 2022) (not reported), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 778 (2023) ("Mr. Geddes brought his claim pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and alleged the officers had violated his Fourteenth Amendment rights. The question before us is not whether the officers' actions indeed constituted excessive force. It is instead whether Mr. Geddes can bring an excessive-force claim—as an arrestee—under the Fourteenth Amendment. We conclude that he cannot. And we, therefore, agree with the district court's grant of summary judgment and conclusion that Mr. Geddes did not have 'a cognizable claim under the Fourteenth Amendment' because the alleged excessive force did not occur 'after a determination of probable cause and before conviction.'. . Only the Fourth Amendment supplied a valid legal basis for Mr. Geddes's § 1983 claim[.] . . . [N]ot only do the different amendments provide protection at different parts of the criminal justice process, but more importantly for present purposes, the different amendments protect against unique forms of potential governmental intrusion on the protected right. This underscores the need for litigants to identify the correct amendment under which they seek relief. . . . [B]ecause Mr. Geddes was an arrestee, only the Fourth Amendment can supply the basis for his § 1983 excessive-force claim. . . . Mr. Geddes continues to cling to a constitutional amendment that provides him—as an arrestee—with no cognizable basis for a § 1983 excessive-force claim. 'The choice of amendment matters,'. . . and the amendment Mr. Geddes has chosen and has persisted in choosing dooms his § 1983 action. . . . Mr. Geddes says it does not matter whether he pleaded his excessive-force claim as a Fourth Amendment or Fourteenth Amendment violation. Either way, he insists, the outcome of his suit would be the same because the applicable standard would be the same.[4] [fn.4: Although Mr. Geddes suggests that we should not 'reach the issue of where a precise dividing line lies' between the amendments and notes the Supreme Court has not actually resolved this question, . . . he does not acknowledge that we have already drawn this line. We have explained that 'the Fourth Amendment not only bars the use of excessive force during the making of an arrest, but such also bars the use of excessive force during a period of detention immediately following arrest and before the person is taken before a magistrate judge, or other judicial official, to determine whether the arrest and continued detention were based on probable cause.'. . The Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley did not alter or disturb our precedent on this point. The Court in Kingsley spoke to the standard under which excessive-force claims should be analyzed—it did not consider where the Fourth Amendment begins and ends. Although Mr. Geddes is correct that the Supreme Court has not directly opined on 'whether the Fourth Amendment continues to provide individuals with protection against the deliberate use of excessive physical force beyond the point at which arrest ends and pretrial detention begins,'. . . most circuits have joined us in answering in the affirmative that Fourth Amendment protections continue up until a probable cause determination[.] [collecting cases] Therefore, Mr. Geddes's argument that he could seek the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment before a probable cause hearing is also meritless.] Not so. The Fourth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force standards are not identical. As Mr. Geddes rightly notes, both standards assess the objective reasonableness of the use of force. . . But beyond that, the two standards differ. . . . Consistent with our previous discussion of the stages of the criminal justice system and the corresponding constitutional rights that attach at each stage, the considerations identified in the Fourth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment contexts, although similar, differ in important ways. Namely, they protect against different types of infringements upon constitutional rights. And although both are now evaluated under an objective standard, the Fourth Amendment inquiry is arguably more favorable to a plaintiff because it protects from unreasonable seizures of free citizens. . . On the other hand, the balance is recalibrated in the pre-trial detainee context in a manner arguably less favorable to the plaintiff; there, the inquiry is whether the conduct was related to 'legitimate interests that stem from [the government's] need to manage the facility in which the individual is detained,' so long as that conduct is not punitive in character. . . This distinction is made more apparent when comparing the factors themselves. Most notably, under the Kingsley test, courts are to consider '[1] the relationship between the need for the use of force and the amount of force used; [2] the extent of the plaintiff's injury; [and] [3] any effort made by the officer to temper or to limit the amount of force.'. . These additional factors supplement the Graham analysis with an additional deference 'to "policies and practices that in th[e] judgment" of jail officials "are needed to preserve internal order and discipline and to maintain institutional security."'. . In sum, then, we and the Supreme Court have never suggested that precisely the same standard applies when assessing the objective reasonableness of the use of force under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . . Mr. Geddes's complaint only provided fair notice that the basis for his § 1983 action was a purported Fourteenth Amendment violation. The complaint nowhere indicated that the basis of his claim instead might be the Fourth Amendment. Yet, as we have now explained, different legal frameworks govern our analysis of Fourth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims. Pleading one type of excessive-force claim cannot put defendants on notice of the other type of claim.") Geddes v. Weber County, No. 20-4083, 2022 WL 3371010, at *13-14 (10th Cir. Aug. 16, 2022) (not reported) (Bacharach, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 778 (2023) ("In this appeal, the main issue is whether two jailers should obtain summary judgment based on the plaintiff's omission of the applicable constitutional amendment in his complaint. The majority answers yes, and I would answer no. So I respectfully dissent as to the jailers' liability. . . . The jailers used force before a finding of probable cause. So the Fourth Amendment (not the Fourteenth) provided the applicable test for Mr. Geddes's claim. . . Though the applicable test came from the Fourth Amendment, the claim itself arose under the Fourteenth Amendment. 'In a technical sense, a Fourth Amendment claim against [state] officers is also a Fourteenth Amendment claim, because that is the amendment that incorporates the Fourth Amendment's protections against the states.' . . Though we commonly refer to claims against state officers as Fourth Amendment claims, these claims are 'strictly speaking ... claim[s] under the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . So in the complaint, Mr. Geddes correctly invoked the Fourteenth Amendment as the constitutional source for his protection against excessive force. The district court and the majority point out that the test for the claim comes from the Fourth Amendment. But 'the Fourteenth Amendment standard is ... almost identical to the Fourth Amendment standard.'. . The standard under the Fourteenth Amendment is whether 'the force purposely or knowingly used against [the claimant] was objectively unreasonable ... from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene.' Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389, 397 (2015) (emphasis added). The standard under the Fourth Amendment is whether the force was objectively unreasonable 'in light of the facts and circumstances confronting [the officers], without regard to their underlying intent or motivation.' Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 397 (1989). We've thus concluded that the 'same objective standard ... applies to excessive-force claims brought under either the Fourth or the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . Given the similarity between the tests under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments, the complaint supplied all of the notice that the jailers needed.")

Hooks v. Atoki, 983 F.3d 1193, 1203 (10th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2764 (2021) ("Although our opinion in Strain addressed a claim of medical indifference, every aspect of its reasoning applies more broadly, to Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claims, including those based on a failure to prevent jailhouse violence.")

Strain v. Regaldo, 977 F.3d 974, 990-93 & n.6 (10th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 312 (2021) ("Plaintiff argues that the Supreme Court's Kingsley decision alters the standard for pretrial detainees' Fourteenth Amendment claims. In Kingsley, the Court held that a plaintiff may establish an excessive force claim under the Fourteenth Amendment based exclusively on objective evidence. . . But Kingsley did not address the standard for deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. And the circuits are split on whether Kingsley eliminated the subjective component of the deliberate indifference standard by extending to Fourteenth Amendment claims outside the excessive force context. [collecting cases in footnote] Although we have continued to apply a two-prong test, we have not yet addressed Kingsley head-on. . . We do so today. We decline to extend Kingsley to Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claims for several reasons. First, Kingsley turned on considerations unique to excessive force claims: whether the use of force amounted to punishment, not on the status of the detainee. Next, the nature of a deliberate indifference claim infers a subjective component. Finally, principles of stare decisis weigh against overruling precedent to extend a Supreme Court holding to a new context or new category of claims. . . . Even though both causes of action arise under the Fourteenth Amendment, a pretrial detainee's cause of action for excessive force serves a different purpose than that for deliberate indifference. . . . Excessive force requires an affirmative act, while deliberate indifference often stems from inaction. . . . Because the two categories of claims protect different rights for different purposes, the claims require different state-of-mind inquiries. . . .[T]he force of Kingsley does not apply to the deliberate indifference context, where the claim generally involves inaction divorced from punishment. Next, we observe that a deliberate indifference claim presupposes a subjective component. . . . Removing the subjective component from deliberate indifference claims would thus erode the intent requirement inherent in the claim. . . . Finally, the Supreme Court has cautioned against reaching the resolution that Plaintiff seeks. Extending Kingsley to eliminate the subjective component of the deliberate indifference standard in the Tenth Circuit would contradict the Supreme Court's rejection of a purely objective test in Farmer and our longstanding precedent. . . . Although other circuits have relied on the 'broad language' of Kingsley to apply a purely objective standard to Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claims, . . . we choose forbearance. . .At no point did Kingsley pronounce its application to Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claims or otherwise state that we should adopt a purely objective standard for such claims, so we cannot overrule our precedent on this issue. [fn.6: Plaintiff also contends that we recently applied a purely objective test for the mistreatment of a pretrial detainee outside the excessive force context. Colbruno v. Kessler, 928 F.3d 1155, 1163 (10th Cir. 2019) (applying the Kingsley standard to claims against law enforcement officers who punished a pretrial detainee by publicly displaying his nude body through the public areas of a hospital). Even if not a classic excessive force case, Colbruno may otherwise be categorized as a conditions of confinement case. . . And because that case dealt with the appropriateness of punishment, we saw fit to apply the Kingsley standard to the plaintiff's claims. . . In any event, Colbruno did not address deliberate indifference, so it does not influence our analysis in this case.] We therefore join our sister circuits that have declined to extend Kingsley to deliberate indifference claims and will apply our two-prong test to Plaintiff's claims.")

Brown v. Flowers, 974 F.3d 1178, 1182-83 (10th Cir. 2020) ("As a preliminary matter, we note that because Brown was a pretrial detainee, she was protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. See Colbruno v. Kessler, 928 F.3d 1155, 1162 (10th Cir. 2019). And although the district court stated as much, it analyzed her claim as an Eighth Amendment violation. As such, it considered both prongs of the Eighth Amendment test: the objective component, or whether 'the alleged wrongdoing was objectively harmful enough,' and the subjective component, or whether 'the officials act[ed] with a sufficiently culpable state of mind.'. . And on appeal, the parties likewise consider both prongs. Such an analysis is in line with our previous statement that the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment analyses are 'identical.'. . But this statement is no longer good law after the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 192 L.Ed.2d 416 (2015). There, the Court held that 'the appropriate standard for a pretrial detainee's excessive[-]force claim is solely an objective one' and that therefore 'a pretrial detainee can prevail by providing only objective evidence that the challenged governmental action is not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective or that it is excessive in relation to that purpose.'. . And because we 'treat sexual abuse of prisoners as a species of excessive-force claim,'. . . after Kingsley, a pretrial detainee bringing such claim is not required to meet the 'subjective element' required of Eighth Amendment excessive-force claims[.] Thus, to make out a constitutional violation, Brown must only demonstrate that Flowers's conduct 'was objectively harmful enough to establish a constitutional violation.'")

Quintana v. Santa Fe County Board of Commissioners, 973 F.3d 1022, 1028-29 & n.1 (10th Cir. 2020) ("In assessing the plaintiff's contention that the individual defendants violated Ortiz's Fourteenth Amendment rights, we apply the two-part Eighth Amendment inquiry when a pretrial detainee alleges deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. . . .We also endorse Judge Bacharach's rejection of the argument that Kingsley v. Hendrickson. . . requires us to conduct only an objective inquiry. . . . In our view, frequent vomiting alone does not present an obvious risk of severe and dangerous withdrawal. . . For clarity, as further explained below, we agree that the bloody vomiting Officer Chavez allegedly knew of does present an obvious risk. After all, blood would imply to a reasonable detention official that there is an actual internal injury. But since the complaint limits this allegation to Officer Chavez, we see no reason to export allegations of this knowledge onto the other individual defendants.")

Quintana v. Santa Fe County Board of Commissioners, 973 F.3d 1022, 1035, 1049-57 (10th Cir. 2020) (Bacharach, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Mr. Ricardo Ortiz was arrested for stealing a handbag and booked into Santa Fe County's detention facility. When he was booked, Mr. Ortiz had a heroin addiction and expected to experience severe withdrawal. And he did. As Mr. Ortiz's withdrawal spiraled, officials allegedly failed to provide treatment. He died three days later. . . . I would conclude that the second amended complaint adequately alleges a constitutional violation by each of the six employees. So even if the first amended complaint had been deficient, these deficiencies would have been cured in the second amended complaint. The resulting issue is whether that constitutional right was clearly established at the time of Mr. Ortiz's detention. I would answer 'yes.'. . . We must determine the contours of the constitutional right that was clearly established during Mr. Ortiz's detention. The plaintiffs argue that the district court misapplied the subjective prong in light of the Supreme Court's opinion in Kingsley v. Hendrickson[.] . . There the Supreme Court held that for excessive-force claims by pretrial detainees, the test for deliberate indifference was objective rather than subjective. . . But Kingsley did not clearly apply to pretrial detainees' claims of inadequate medical care, so the district court did not err in applying the subjective prong for purposes of qualified immunity. Though Kingsley modified the test for deliberate indifference for pretrial detainees' claims of excessive force, the scope of this modification did not become clear until after Mr. Ortiz had died. At the time of his detention, no circuit court had applied Kingsley outside of the excessive-force context. Absent such case law, the objective test of deliberate indifference could have been clearly established only if Kingsley itself had spelled out its applicability outside of the excessive-force context. Kingsley, however, had not spoken to this question. Circuit courts have thus disagreed over its reach. For example, after Mr. Ortiz's detention, some circuits have concluded that Kingsley extends beyond excessive-force claims, effectively abrogating the subjective prong of deliberate indifference whenever pretrial detainees claim a denial of due process.[7] But other circuits have limited Kingsley to excessive-force claims. . . This circuit split suggests that Kingsley did not definitively settle the issue. After Mr. Ortiz's death, we applied Kingsley outside of the excessive-force context in Colbruno v. Kessler, 928 F.3d 1155 (10th Cir. 2019). Colbruno involved a conditions-of-confinement claim, and we held that Kingsley had eliminated the need for a pretrial detainee to show an intent to punish. . . According to the plaintiffs, Colbruno shows that Kingsley abrogated the need for pretrial detainees to satisfy a subjective test for deliberate indifference. But Colbruno did not address Kingsley in the discussion of a clearly established right. . . And even after Mr. Ortiz's detention, many Tenth Circuit opinions before Colbruno had expressly declined to address Kingsley's applicability to pretrial detainees outside of excessive-force cases. . . Given the existence of a circuit split and our circuit's frequent avoidance of the issue even after Mr. Ortiz's detention, we conclude that Kingsley itself did not clearly establish a purely objective test for all pretrial detainees' claims of deliberate indifference. So even if Kingsley applies to medical-care claims, the six employees would have lacked notice of a purely objective test for deliberate indifference. . . Given the lack of notice, the clearly established right in January 2016 included a subjective test for deliberate indifference. . . . Because a fact finder could reasonably infer that Mr. Ortiz had obviously needed medical attention, nurses couldn't reasonably think that the Constitution would permit them to do nothing. So if a nurse chose not to respond to an obvious medical need, the nurse would have violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . . The majority argues that only a few circuit cases have recognized a constitutional violation in similar circumstances. But the majority concedes that a fact finder could reasonably infer an obvious medical need. . . Given this concession, what more did the plaintiffs need to allege to defeat qualified immunity? Surely employees in a detention unit didn't need a precedent to tell them that the Constitution prohibited them from ignoring an inmate's frequent and bloody vomiting over a three-day period? . . . .In sum, the plaintiffs adequately allege in the second amended complaint that

• Mr. Ortiz suffered an objectively serious medical need consisting of frequent vomiting (sometimes with blood) and

• Nurse Robinson, Officer Chavez, Officer Valdo, Officer Lopez, Officer Garcia, and Corporal Gallegos knowingly disregarded a risk of serious harm to Mr. Ortiz.

These employees' alleged disregard of Mr. Ortiz's medical need would have violated a clearly established constitutional right. I would thus reverse the district court's dismissal and the denial of leave to file the second amended complaint to supplement the allegations against the six employees.")

Contreras on behalf of A.L. v. Doña Ana County Bd. of County Commissioners, 965 F.3d 1114, 1129-30 & n.3 (10th Cir. 2020) (Baldock, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1382 (2021) ("[A]bsent a formal adjudication of guilt against A.L., the Eighth Amendment has no application. . . Nevertheless, '[i]n evaluating the constitutionality of conditions ... of pretrial detention that implicate only the protection against deprivation of liberty without due process of law, ... the proper inquiry is whether those conditions amount to punishment of the detainee.'. . To determine whether the evidence is sufficient for a jury to find any or all of the individual Defendants 'punished' A.L. and deprived him of liberty without due process of law in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, Tenth Circuit precedent requires us to employ an analysis identical to the analysis we employ in Eighth Amendment cases challenging a prisoner's conditions of confinement under a failure-to-protect theory. . . Before a jury may find an individual Defendant violated A.L.'s right to due process, Plaintiff must satisfy two elements: one objective and one subjective. . . To satisfy the objective component, Plaintiff must show A.L. was detained 'under conditions posing a substantial risk of serious harm.'. . If Plaintiff satisfies this objective prong, she must then establish that at least one of the individual Defendants was deliberately indifferent to the substantial risk A.L. faced. . . This is a subjective inquiry. . . . In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, . . . the Supreme Court held an objective reasonableness standard governs excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees under the Fourteenth Amendment. In Castro v. Cty. of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc), the Ninth Circuit imaginatively interpreted Kingsley and held an objective standard also governs failure-to-protect claims of pretrial detainees raised under the Fourteenth Amendment. And In Darnell v. Pineiro, 849 F.3d 17 (2d Cir. 2017), the Second Circuit followed suit. For years, however, federal courts across the land, including the Tenth Circuit, have relied on Wolfish to apply Farmer's subjective deliberate-indifference standard to claims that state actors failed to protect pretrial detainees in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . To suggest Kingsley overturned such long-standing precedent, uninvited and sub silentio, simply proves too much. Absent the Supreme Court overturning its own precedent or our own, we are bound by it. And I suspect the Court may never do so because, as Judge Ikuta ably points out in her dissent to Castro, a fundamental difference exists between the action underlying an excessive force claim and the inaction underlying a deliberate-indifference claim[.]")

Sawyers v. Norton, 962 F.3d 1270, 1282 n.11 (10th Cir. 2020) ("As recognized in Burke, 'the Supreme Court said the Eighth Amendment standard for excessive force claims brought by prisoners, which requires that defendants act "maliciously and sadistically to cause harm," does not apply to Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees, which require showing only that the defendants' use of force was "objectively unreasonable."'. . We noted 'the circuits are split on whether Kingsley alters the standard for conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care claims brought by pretrial detainees.'. . Neither party here argues that Kingsley alters the deliberate indifference standard for pretrial detainees. As in Burke, we need not resolve this question for our circuit because we can affirm under the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference standard, which is more favorable to the three officers.")

Khan v. Barela, 808 F. App'x 602, ___ n.8 (10th Cir. 2020) ("As noted above, '[p]retrial detainees are protected [against punishment] under the Due Process Clause rather than the Eighth Amendment,' but 'in determining whether [a detainee's] rights were violated, ... we apply an analysis identical to that applied in Eighth Amendment cases.'. . In Kingsley, 135 S. Ct. at 2473, the Supreme Court ruled that for a claim of excessive force, 'a pretrial detainee must show only that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.' In this circuit, there is an open question whether, in light of Kingsley's pronouncement regarding excessive-force claims, the subjective component of the Farmer test applies to a pretrial detainee's claims regarding conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care. See, e.g., Burke v. Regalado, 935 F.3d 960, 991 n.9 (10th Cir. 2019) (recognizing issue but declining to resolve it). We need not answer that question today because all of Khan's preserved Eighth Amendment claims stand or fall under either standard.")

Turner v. Oklahoma County Bd. of Cty. Commissioners, 804 F. App'x 921, ___(10th Cir. 2020) ("Because Mr. Turner's claims arose when he was a pretrial detainee, the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment governs. See Burke v. Regalado, 935 F.3d 960, 991 (10th Cir. 2019). 'In evaluating such Fourteenth Amendment claims, we apply an analysis identical to that applied in Eighth Amendment cases.'")

McCowan v. Morales, 945 F.3d 1276, 1283 n.6 (10th Cir. 2019) ("The Fourteenth, instead of the Fourth, Amendment, applies to an excessive-force claim brought by a pretrial detainee—'one who has had a "judicial determination of probable cause as a prerequisite to [the] extended restraint of [his]liberty following arrest."'. . Applying that definition of pretrial detainee, this court, in Estate of Booker, explained that the Fourth Amendment applied to an excessive-force claim brought by an individual like McCowan, who complained of force used after his warrantless arrest but before any probable-cause determination has been made because that person was still an arrestee and not yet a pretrial detainee. . . The distinction we drew in Estate of Booker between an arrestee and a pretrial detainee was critical in that case because, while we apply only an objective standard to an arrestee's Fourth Amendment excessive-force claim, at the time we decided Estate of Booker, we applied both an objective and subjective test to a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claim. . . The distinction between arrestee and pretrial detainee is less important in this case because the Supreme Court has now clarified that only the objective (and not a subjective) standard applies to a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claim. . . Thus, the same objective standard now applies to excessive-force claims brought under either the Fourth or the Fourteenth Amendment. In the case before us, the district court, declining to decide which amendment governed McCowan's excessive-force claim, considered Officer Moralez's subjective intent by noting that, as alleged, the officer's conduct in laughing at McCowan as he was flung about the back seat was 'malicious and sadistic' . . That was error under a purely objective analysis. In conducting our de novo review, therefore, we do not consider Officer Moralez's subjective intent here.")

McCowan v. Morales, , 945 F.3d 1276, 1290-91 & n.12 (10th Cir. 2019) ("[T]he claim we address here is that Officer Moralez was deliberately indifferent to McCowan's serious medical needs—his injured shoulders—while the officer held McCowan at the police station and before the officer delivered McCowan to the detention center. But because medical care was available to McCowan at the detention center, even though he chose not to avail himself of it, and because McCowan asserts no deliberate-indifference claims against the detention center or any of its employees, his claim at issue here is that Officer Moralez was deliberately indifferent when he delayed McCowan's access to medical care during the time Moralez held McCowan at the police station (up to 150 minutes, according to McCowan), before transporting him to the detention center (which took between six and fifteen minutes). As our starting point for considering this deliberate-indifference claim, it is the Fourteenth Amendment that applies to McCowan's claim alleging the denial of medical care after his warrantless arrest and before he was taken to be booked into the county detention center. . . The Fourteenth Amendment 'entitles pretrial detainees to the same standard of medical care owed to convicted inmates under the Eighth Amendment.'. . To succeed on his Fourteenth Amendment claim, then, McCowan 'must show "deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs."'. . 'The Supreme Court has established a two-pronged test for deliberate indifference claims. Under this test, a plaintiff must satisfy an objective prong and a subjective prong.' Rife, 854 F.3d at 647 (citing Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834, 837-40 (1994)). . . . Recently this court noted that, after the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley, . . . holding a Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claim brought by a pretrial detainee is governed only by an objective reasonableness standard, . . . a split among circuits developed 'on whether Kingsley [also] alters the standard for conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care claims brought by pretrial detainees.' Burke, 935 F.3d 960, 991 n.9 (10th Cir. 2019). We have no occasion here to address that question, however, because no one makes such an argument. . . Instead, even after Kingsley, both parties here applied the two-pronged objective/subjective test to McCowan's claim alleging that Officer Moralez was deliberately indifferent to McCowan's serious medical needs. In light of that, we follow suit. See Burke, 935 F.3d at 991 n.9 (declining, 'in the absence of briefing from either party,' to decide whether Kingsley has eliminated the subjective inquiry previously applicable to deliberate indifference claims brought by pretrial detainees). We do note, however, that a claim of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs by its very terminology seems to require both a subjective and an objective test. 'Deliberate' certainly invokes a subjective analysis and 'serious medical needs' invokes an objective analysis. In any event, the objective/subjective standard that we apply 'is more favorable' to Officer Moralez. . . Even so, we conclude, under that objective/subjective standard, that McCowan has sufficiently supported a claim alleging that Officer Moralez was deliberately indifferent to McCowan's serious medical needs.") [no mention of Colbruno]

Burke v. Regalado, 935 F.3d 960, 991 n.9 (10th Cir. 2019) ("Six years after Lopez, the Supreme Court said the Eighth Amendment standard for excessive force claims brought by prisoners, which requires that defendants act 'maliciously and sadistically to cause harm,' does not apply to Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees, which require showing only that the defendants' use of force was 'objectively unreasonable.' [citing Kingsley v. Hendrickson] As this court recently noted, the '[c]ircuits are split on whether Kingsley alters the standard for conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care claims brought by pretrial detainees.' Estate of Vallina v. County of Teller Sheriff's Office, 757 F. App'x 643, 646 (10th Cir. 2018) (unpublished). The Sheriffs argue that Kingsley does not apply to this case. . . But we need not resolve this question for our circuit here because we can affirm under the Eighth Amendment standard, which is more favorable to the Sheriffs. . . And in the absence of briefing from either party, we decline to do so here, where resolution of the issue would have no impact on the result of this appeal."). [no mention of Colbruno]

Colbruno v. Kessler, 928 F.3d 1155, 1161-66 & n.3 (10th Cir. 2019) ("Even one who has been properly searched or seized by police authorities (say, arrested on probable cause), can claim that the search or seizure was unreasonable because of unreasonable treatment by officers in effecting the search or seizure. Typically, the mistreatment has been the use of excessive force; but 'the interests protected by the Fourth Amendment are not confined to the right to be secure against physical harm; they include liberty, property and privacy interests—a person's sense of security and individual dignity.' Holland ex rel. Overdorff v. Harrington, 268 F.3d 1179, 1195 (10th Cir. 2001) . . . . Bell and Blackmon are not entirely clear about whether a pretrial detainee could sustain a due-process claim for mistreatment without showing that the custodians intended their actions as punishment. Both opinions could be read as requiring an intent to punish the pretrial detainee although allowing such intent to be inferred from the absence of a legitimate purpose behind the offensive conduct. . . But the Supreme Court in Kingsley eliminated any ambiguity. Reviewing a claim of excessive force brought by a pretrial detainee, the Court declined to read Bell as meaning 'that proof of intent (or motive) to punish is required for a pretrial detainee to prevail on a claim that his due process rights were violated.'. . Rather, a pretrial detainee can establish a due-process violation by 'providing only objective evidence that the challenged governmental action is not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective or that it is excessive in relation to that purpose.'[3] [fn3: The dissent argues that the proper approach to Fourteenth Amendment claims against executive action would be to determine whether the action shocks the conscience. Kingsley, however, is to the contrary for claims relating to the treatment of pretrial detainees.] In particular, there is no subjective element of an excessive-force claim brought by a pretrial detainee. . . . In our view, any reasonable adult in our society would understand that the involuntary exposure of an adult's nude body is a significant imposition on the victim. And law-enforcement officers in this circuit have been taught this lesson repeatedly. . . . All we need to take from these cases is a conclusion that was obvious without them: exposing a person's naked body involuntarily is a severe invasion of personal privacy. The conclusion that Defendants' alleged conduct constituted a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment readily follows. The only issue is whether the exposure of Plaintiff's body was 'not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective or [was] excessive in relation to that purpose.'. . In our view, the facts alleged in the Complaint satisfy this condition. . . . We agree with the district court. It is common sense that acquiring some replacement clothing at a hospital would be at most a matter of minutes, and we can reasonably infer from the long delay in transporting Plaintiff that Defendants' actions were not based on a medical need so pressing that they could not spare a little time to obtain a dignified covering. . . . There remains the question whether Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. Was the law clearly established that their conduct (as alleged by Plaintiff) violated the Fourteenth Amendment? Ordinarily the answer is no unless there is precedent of the Supreme Court or of this court declaring that there would be a violation under closely similar facts. Fortunately, however, not every constitutional violation has factual antecedents. We can occasionally rely on the general proposition that it would be 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted ... even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . We must be careful not to do so when there are any relevant ambiguities, such as whether physical force is justified for a particular purpose or in a particular context, see Aldaba v. Pickens, 844 F.3d 870, 879 (10th Cir. 2016) (use of taser to subdue person needing medical care), or whether force used constituted deadly force, see Thomson v. Salt Lake County, 584 F.3d 1304, 1315–17 (10th Cir. 2009) (whether use of police dog constituted deadly force); Wilson v. City of Lafayette, 510 F. App'x 775, 778 (10th Cir. 2013) (Gorsuch, J.) (whether tasing amounted to use of deadly force). Here, however, there are no relevant ambiguities regarding the manner in which Defendants allegedly took Plaintiff from the police vehicle to his hospital room. The Fourteenth Amendment is violated if a pretrial detainee is subjected to 'a restriction or condition ... not reasonably related to a legitimate goal.' Bell, 441 U.S. at 539, 99 S.Ct. 1861; see Kingsley, 135 S. Ct. at 2473–74. To be sure, some restrictions or conditions may be too insignificant to be the predicate for a Fourteenth Amendment violation. But common sense tells us that parading someone nude in public is not so insignificant, and the above-referenced Fourth Amendment jurisprudence makes the point crystal clear. . . . Bell in itself sufficed as clearly established law in that context. There is little subtlety in a standard requiring merely a rational relationship to a legitimate objective. In our view, Bell suffices here as well, particularly given the additional precedential authority of Blackmon. On one possible aspect of Plaintiff's claim, however, we do not think Defendants' actions were governed by clearly established law. To the extent that Plaintiff claims that his constitutional rights were violated by being chained in the hospital bed to which he was taken, we dismiss the claim as barred by qualified immunity. Given Plaintiff's status as one facing criminal charges, and the apparent risk he posed to himself, there was certainly a legitimate purpose for the constraints. Also, his nude body was presumably then exposed only to his hospital caregivers, who could best determine what, if any, garb or covering was appropriate for his treatment and care. Given the much more limited nature of Plaintiff's exposure, the legitimate reasons for the restraint, and the change in caretaker upon Plaintiff's delivery to the room, it is not obvious that Defendants denied him due process in the manner that they left him in the hospital bed.")

Colbruno v. Kessler, 928 F.3d 1155, 1166-71 & n.3 (10th Cir. 2019) (Tymkovich, C.J., dissenting) ("This case presents a classic variation on the theme that 'bad facts make bad law.' The experiences alleged by Mr. Colbruno, if inflicted with malice, would trouble anyone. If, on the other hand, deputies sought only to make the best of a bad situation in obtaining emergency medical care for him, few would be alarmed. In my view, Mr. Colbruno has not adequately alleged malicious conduct. Applying the appropriate legal framework under the Fourteenth Amendment, the deputies should therefore be entitled to qualified immunity. As the majority explains, Mr. Colbruno must allege some violation of a clearly established constitutional right. But the complaint fails to allege facts sufficient to state a claim for substantive due process under the Fourteenth Amendment, let alone one that was clearly established at the time of the events in question. . . . Mr. Colbruno alleges the deputies moved him from the ambulance bay to his hospital room without clothing or otherwise covering his body. This contention supports an inference of indifference or callousness, but no more. Mr. Colbruno does not allege any intent to humiliate or punish lay behind this decision. Nor does he contend the deputies prolonged his exposure to potential onlookers, either through needless delay or circuitous travel through the hospital. Nor, lastly, does he allege that anyone beyond hospital personnel witnessed any of these events. All of which presumably transpired within seconds. In short, as the complaint now stands, we know the deputies were responding to a medical emergency; we know Mr. Colbruno—after ingesting metal objects in the midst of a pyschotic episode—had soiled himself while in transit from pretrial detention to the hospital; and we know the deputies decided to rush him into the emergency room, unclothed. We do not know why they made the decisions they did; we do not know whether a suitable gown was readily available; and we do not know whether time was really of the essence. Perhaps further investigation prior to filing this lawsuit would have shed light upon some of these missing facts. Taken together, the answers to the questions could very well allow for a permissible inference of conscience-shocking conduct. . . But in the absence of such additional factual context, I would conclude the complaint fails to allege the requisite inference of malice that is necessary to conclude the deputies might have engaged in conduct that shocks the conscience. In sum, Mr. Colbruno has not adequately alleged a violation of his constitutional rights to substantive due process under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . .Given the limitations of the complaint, the majority acknowledges difficulty in identifying which constitutional provision should entitle Mr. Colbruno to relief. He alleged violations of both his Fourth Amendment right to be free of unreasonable searches and his Fourteenth Amendment right to bodily integrity. The district court, in turn, accepted the Fourth Amendment rationale and did not conduct an independent analysis of the Fourteenth Amendment claim. But because Mr. Colbruno was neither searched nor seized in any conventional sense, it is obvious—as explained above—that any relief must stem from the Fourteenth Amendment's protections against official misconduct; and not the Fourth Amendment's familiar assurances against unreasonable search or seizure. The majority understandably turns to a line of cases involving the rights of pre-trial detainees. Relying upon Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 535, 99 S.Ct. 1861, 60 L.Ed.2d 447 (1979), and Kingsley v. Hendrickson, —— U.S. ——, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 192 L.Ed.2d 416 (2015),[3] [fn.3: Because Kingsley was decided after the events alleged in the complaint, Bell remains the applicable Supreme Court precedent. Kingsley likewise addressed the state-of-mind requirement for an excessive-force claim brought under the Fourteenth Amendment. Because the complaint does not allege excessive force, the relevance of Kingsley—beyond its restatement of the general principles articulated in Bell—is not obvious.] . . . [T]he majority concludes '[a] detainee may not be punished prior to an adjudication of guilt in accordance with due process of law.'. . In Bell, the Supreme Court explained that—when a person is confined while awaiting trial—the government must respect the presumption of his innocence. Accordingly, only those restraints against liberty that advance legitimate institutional interests will be constitutionally permissible. But 'if a restriction or condition is not reasonably related to a legitimate goal—if it is arbitrary or purposeless—a court permissibly may infer that the purpose of the governmental action is punishment that may not constitutionally be inflicted upon detainees qua detainees.'. .The majority also points to a case not briefed by either party to apply the principles outlined in Bell. Relying on Blackmon v. Sutton, 734 F.3d 1237 (10th Cir. 2013), the majority concludes Mr. Colbruno's treatment as detailed in his complaint was tantamount to punishment. . . .No matter how we analyze his claims, Mr. Colbruno has failed to allege the violation of a clearly established constitutional right. The Supreme Court has explained that '[a] clearly established right is one that is sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Although we need not 'require a case directly on point,' it is nonetheless the case that 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . . The violation proposed by the majority—of a right to be free from 'a restriction or condition ... not reasonably related to a legitimate goal'. . . is far too broad. While I am certainly sympathetic to the privacy interests asserted by Mr. Colbruno, no precedential case has clearly established a constitutional violation at the appropriate level of specificity under the facts alleged here. To avoid this conclusion, the majority asserts the deputies' violation of Mr. Colbruno's rights was so obvious that we need not point to a closely aligned case. It is, of course, correct that some 'constitutional violation[s] may be so obvious that similar conduct seldom arises in our cases,' such that 'it would be remarkable if the most obviously unconstitutional conduct should be the most immune from liability only because it is so flagrantly unlawful that few dare attempt.'. . But this exception is exceedingly narrow, as we must effectively conclude 'our precedents render the legality of the conduct undebatable.'. . In its effort to clear this hurdle, the majority again looks to Blackmon. But the circumstances depicted there could not credibly alert the deputies of misconduct, absent some punitive intent. Whereas punishment sat at the center of the dispute in Blackmon, Mr. Colbruno has not alleged facts that would suggest the deputies intended to punish him; or, for that matter, any other state of mind that would meet the constitutional standard for egregiousness. And whereas at least one official in Blackmon engaged in repeated, systematic, and gratuitous misconduct, Mr. Colbruno details what would be—at most—a single discrete incident that lasted only for a matter of moments. In sum, absent plausible allegations of intentional and abusive misconduct, clearly-established law could not have alerted the deputies they were violating Mr. Colbruno's right to substantive due process. As troubling as these allegations—if true—would be, the complaint fails to tie the invasion of Mr. Colbruno's privacy to the constitutional requirement for intent.")

Estate of Vallina v. County of Teller Sheriff's Office, 757 F. App'x 643, ___ (10th Cir. 2018) ("Circuits are split on whether Kingsley alters the standard for conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care claims brought by pretrial detainees. The Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits have interpreted Kingsley as displacing prior subjective requirements. [collecting cases] These courts have adopted an objective test requiring reckless disregard. . . In contrast, the Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits have held that Kingsley applies only to excessive force claims and does not extend to claims related to conditions of confinement or inadequate medical care. [collecting cases] As noted supra, however, plaintiffs did not raise the Kingsley issue below. We generally do not review issues advanced for the first time on appeal. . . Further, plaintiffs affirmatively argued the subjective prong of the deliberate indifference test before the district court. Accordingly, plaintiffs may not have merely forfeited the issue, but invited error. . . And in any event, we conclude that plaintiffs' claim would fail under either standard. That is, they have shown neither subjective disregard of a known risk, . . . nor objectively reckless disregard of a serious medical concern[.] . . A prison official does not act recklessly or with deliberate indifference by failing to act to avert the suicide of a detainee who displays no outward indicators of suicidal ideation, . . . actively denies suicidal ideation, and has been cleared by a psychologist, a psychiatrist, and other medical professionals to be detained in general population.")

Crocker v. Glanz, 752 F. App'x 564, ___ (10th Cir. 2018) ("The analysis in Kingsley may not apply to a failure to provide adequate medical care or screening, where there is no such intentional action. Indeed, the Court reiterated the proposition that 'liability for negligently inflicted harm is categorically beneath the threshold of constitutional due process.' . . Second, even if we ultimately decided that Kingsley changed the law in the way proposed by Grant, his theory (which is, at the least, an expansion of Kingsley) would not afford him relief because it was not clearly established law at the time of the events in question. Although it may be that Glanz did not adequately preserve the clearly-established argument in district court, Grant undeniably did not preserve the Kingsley argument. We would be loath to excuse Grant's forfeiture but not Glanz's. Therefore, we will not address the Kingsley issue.")

Crocker v. Glanz, 752 F. App'x 564, ___ (10th Cir. 2018) (Holmes, J., concurring) ("I concur in the judgment and join in the lion's share of the analysis of the majority's well-written and thoughtful order and judgment. I decline, however, to join the majority's recitation of two ostensible reasons 'for uncertainty' about whether Mr. Grant may secure relief under the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, --- U.S. ----, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015). As the majority correctly observes, Mr. Grant presents his Kingsley-based argument for the first time on appeal and that argument is therefore forfeited. At least under the unremarkable circumstances here, the appropriate course is for us to decline to consider that argument on the merits and go no further. . . Instead, the majority offers observations regarding the reasons 'for uncertainty' concerning whether Mr. Grant could prevail on his Kingsley-based argument. Such observations are purely dicta. I respectfully decline to join my esteemed colleagues in this unnecessary analysis. For these reasons, I write separately.")

Clark v. Colbert, 895 F.3d 1258, 1269 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Clark contends the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson. . . 'held open the possibility that an objective-only standard should apply to' his medical needs claim. . .Yet he does not argue that Kingsley actually displaced any precedent regarding medical care during pretrial detention. We thus have no occasion to revisit the applicable law.")

Perry v. Durborow, 892 F.3d 1116, 1122 n.1 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Because Perry was a pretrial detainee at the time of the alleged rape, we question whether, in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, —— U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 192 L.Ed.2d 416 (2015), she had to demonstrate that Durborow 'acted with subjective deliberate indifference, as opposed to objective deliberate indifference,' to establish that he violated her constitutional rights. . . . We haven't yet addressed Kingsley's impact on Fourteenth Amendment claims like this one. And in the absence of briefing from either party, we decline to do so here, where resolution of the issue would have no impact on the result of this appeal. Even assuming Perry had to demonstrate that Durborow acted with subjective deliberate indifference, we must accept as true the district court's finding that he did so. . . Conversely, even assuming Perry only had to demonstrate that Durborow acted with objective deliberate indifference, this lower standard wasn't clearly established as of February 25, 2013.")

Rife v. Oklahoma Dep't of Public Safety, 854 F.3d 637, 647 (10th Cir. 2017) (amended opinion) ("The Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause entitles pretrial detainees to the same standard of medical care owed to convicted inmates under the Eighth Amendment. See Olsen v. Layton Hills Mall, 312 F.3d 1304, 1315 (10th Cir. 2002). Thus, the Fourteenth Amendment is violated if state officials are deliberately indifferent to a pretrial detainee's serious medical needs.")

Wright v. Collison, 651 F. App'x 745, 748 (10th Cir. 2016) ("Mr. Wright's claims are governed by the Due Process Clause rather than the Eighth Amendment because Mr. Wright was a pretrial detainee. . . Even so, to determine whether Mr. Wright's constitutional rights were violated, 'we apply an analysis identical to that applied in Eighth Amendment cases brought pursuant to § 1983.'. . 'To establish a cognizable Eighth Amendment claim for failure to protect an inmate from harm by other inmates, the plaintiff must show that he [was] incarcerated under conditions posing a substantial risk of serious harm, the objective component, and that the prison official was deliberately indifferent to his safety, the subjective component.'. . Regarding the subjective component, the plaintiff bears the burden to show that the defendants responded in an 'objectively unreasonable manner'—that is, they 'knew of ways to reduce the harm but knowingly or recklessly declined to act.'")

United States v. Brown, 654 F. App'x 896, 906 n.6 (10th Cir. 2016) ("Barnes is correct in noting that because pretrial detainees have not yet been convicted, they 'cannot be punished at all,' let alone in a cruel and unusual manner. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2475 (2015). Accordingly, their Eighth Amendment rights are not implicated. . . That does not, however, mean that the conditions of a pretrial detainee's confinement are not constitutionally protected; that protection derives instead from the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth (or Fifth) Amendment. . . Although the constitutional sources of these protections are different, the legal standards are similar. See Craig v. Eberly, 164 F.3d 490, 495 (10th Cir. 1998) ("Although the Due Process Clause governs a pretrial detainee's claim of unconstitutional conditions of confinement, the Eighth Amendment standard provides the benchmark for such claims." (citation omitted)). For our purposes here, we need not flesh out the extent to which the two standards differ.")

Sexton v. Faris, No. 22-CV-1927-WJM-MEH, 2023 WL 5671492, at *5-6 (D. Colo. Sept. 1, 2023) ("Despite the Tenth Circuit's clarifying language concerning what Kingsley did and did not hold, Plaintiff now argues that in Kingsley, 'the Supreme Court extended the objective reasonable standard generally applied to Fourth Amendment seizures to a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim.'. . He cites no other cases whatsoever on this point, much less any cases extending Kingsley beyond pretrial detainees in the manner he suggests. . . Defendants argue that Plaintiff's interpretation 'stretches the reasoning in Kingsley beyond the Court's intention,' observing that the Supreme Court did not address whether the 'shock[s] the conscience' standard or the 'objective reasonableness' standard applied to Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claims. . . The Court agrees. Plaintiff cites no case law extending Kingsley in the manner he suggests (to plaintiffs who are not pretrial detainees), and the Court is unaware of any such ruling in the Tenth Circuit. Application of Kingsley by the Tenth Circuit appears limited to cases involving pretrial detainees. . . Rather, in cases like this one where the Fourth or Eighth Amendments do not apply, District of Colorado judges routinely apply the shocks the conscience standard. . . Therefore, the Court rejects Plaintiff's suggestion that the objective reasonableness standard applies. Instead, the Court will apply the substantive due process analytical framework.")

Antonio for the Estate of Toledo v. Board of County Commissioners for the County of Cibola, No. CV 19-572 KG/JFR, 2020 WL 5232392, at *5 (D.N.M. Sept. 2, 2020) ("Plaintiff observes that 'various circuits have interpreted Kingsley to apply to conditions of confinement and/or inadequate medical care claims under the Fourteenth Amendment rather than just excessive force claims.'. . Plaintiff relies on Colbruno v. Kessler to project that the Tenth Circuit will join those circuits in applying Kingsley to conditions of confinement claims, including inadequate medical care claims. 928 F.3d 1155 (10th Cir. 2019) (applying Kingsley to case involving pretrial detainee taken to hospital without clothing). After Colbruno was decided, the Tenth Circuit 'noted "the circuits are split on whether Kingsley alters the standard for conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care claims brought by pretrial detainees."'. . Even so, and given existing Tenth Circuit precedent, this Court will apply the subjective standard to conditions of confinement claims, including inadequate medical care claims. . . . Plaintiff acknowledges that the Fifth and Eighth Circuits confine the holding in Kingsley to excessive force cases.")

Ortega v. ICE, No. 220CV00522KWRKBM, 2020 WL 4816373, at *5–6 (D.N.M. Aug. 19, 2020) ("The parties appear to agree that Fifth Amendment Due Process law applies to this condition of confinement claim brought by a civil detainee. . . The Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment forbids the government from depriving a person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. . . Civil detainees such as Petitioner are protected by the Fifth Amendment Due Process clause. . . To evaluate the constitutionality of pretrial detention under the Fifth Amendment, the Court must determine whether the conditions 'amount to punishment of the detainee.'. . In the absence of an expressed intent to punish, Petitioner can prevail by showing that the conditions are not 'rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose or that the conditions 'appear excessive in relation to that purpose.' Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2473, 192 L.Ed.2d 416 (2015) (quoting Bell, 441 U.S. at 561, 99 S.Ct. 1861); See also Colbruno v. Kessler, 928 F.3d 1155, 1163 (10th Cir. 2019) ("Persons who are civilly detained "can establish a due-process violation by providing only objective evidence that the challenged governmental action is not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective or that it is excessive in relation to that purpose."). '[I]f a restriction or condition is not reasonably related to a legitimate goal—if it is arbitrary or purposeless—a court permissibly may infer that the purpose of the governmental action is punishment that may not constitutionally be inflicted upon detainees qua detainees.' Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 539, 99 S.Ct. 1861, 60 L.Ed.2d 447 (1979).

The Government has a legitimate interest in enforcing immigration laws and detaining persons pending removal. . . Here, the Government has a legitimate interest in detaining Petitioner pending his fourth removal and the reinstatement of his standing removal order. If the Government could not detain persons pending removal, its ability to enforce immigration laws and remove persons would be thwarted by individuals such as Petitioner, who repeatedly ignores immigration and criminal laws. Moreover, the government has a legitimate interest in managing detention facilities, . . . and allocating scarce resources. . . However, the Government has no legitimate interest in punishing civil detainees or denying necessary medical care. . . The Government must also provide for the basic needs of civil detainees. . . 'Therefore, conditions which pose an objectively unreasonable and substantial risk of serious harm to detainee health or safety are not rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive government purpose.'. . However, Respondents are not obligated to provide perfect conditions. Rather, to constitute a constitutional violation conditions must be 'objectively unreasonable.'. . The Fifth Amendment does not require detention facilities to reduce the risk of harm to zero. . . . Even if Petitioner's conditions of confinement claim could properly be considered in a habeas petition, Petitioner has not shown that Otero failed to take adequate steps to ensure Petitioner's health and safety in light of the COVID-19 pandemic. Considering the law above in Section II(B), the Court concludes that the COVID-19 measures and conditions at Otero are objectively reasonable and rationally related to legitimate government interests.")

Barco v. Price, No. 2:20-CV-350-WJ-CG, 2020 WL 2099890, at *1, *6-10 & n.2 (D.N.M. May 1, 2020) ("Plaintiffs are noncitizen detainees who are in the process of being removed from the United States. They are detained at the Otero County Processing Center ("Otero"). Plaintiffs request that the Court issue a temporary restraining order releasing them from Otero because they have medical conditions that make them vulnerable to serious illness or death should they contract Coronavirus Disease 2019 (COVID-19) and that there are no adequate measures that can ensure they avoid exposure to COVID-19 at Otero. Plaintiffs are seeking relief under 28 U.S.C. § 2241 as a habeas corpus petition and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 as an independent cause of action for injunctive relief under the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause. The Court has reviewed the briefing, exhibits, and applicable law and finds that Plaintiffs have not met their heightened burden to demonstrate that the extraordinary remedy of a temporary restraining order is warranted. For the reasons explained in this Memorandum Opinion and Order, the Court denies Plaintiffs' motion. . . . Although Plaintiffs are requesting immediate release, they are not challenging the legality or duration of their detention. At the core of their argument, they contend that the conditions of their detention at Otero are inadequate to protect them from exposure to COVID-19. For example, Plaintiffs allege that they 'are in close quarters on a near constant basis, making it virtually impossible to adhere to social distancing guidelines,' 'inadequate hygienic and sanitation practices have continued amidst the COVID-19 pandemic,' 'they are not provided with sufficient cleaning supplies or hand soap,' and that the 'guards do not wear masks or gloves.'. . Plaintiffs do not allege that the fact that they are detained for removal proceedings or that the length of their detention is illegal. Accordingly, the Court finds that Plaintiffs are challenging the conditions of their detention, as opposed to its fact or duration, which is not appropriate under 28 U.S.C. § 2241. . .

. Federal immigration detention is a form of civil detention that must comply with the Fifth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . To evaluate the constitutionality of pretrial detention under the Fifth Amendment, the Court must determine whether the conditions 'amount to punishment of the detainee.' Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 535 (1979). In the absence of an expressed intent to punish, Plaintiffs can prevail by showing that the conditions are not 'rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose' or that the conditions 'appear excessive in relation to that purpose.' Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015) (quoting Bell, 441 U.S. at 561).[2] [fn. 2: The parties seem to treat Plaintiffs' claims, in part, as a denial of medical care. Even if Plaintiffs' claims were treated as a denial of medical care, the analysis and result would be the same. In Colbruno v. Kessler, a case Plaintiffs cited, the Tenth Circuit explained that 'when a "plaintiff finds himself in the criminal justice system somewhere between the two stools of an initial seizure and post-conviction punishment[,] we turn to the due process clauses of the Fifth or Fourteenth Amendment and their protection against arbitrary governmental action by federal or state authorities' to evaluate claims of mistreatment.' 928 F.3d 1155, 1162 (10th Cir. 2019) (quoting Porro v. Barnes, 624 F.3d 1322, 1326 (10th Cir. 2010)).] Plaintiffs do not allege that Defendants have an expressed intent to punish. Plaintiffs argue that '[k]eeping medically-vulnerable people detained in such close proximity to one another and without testing or screening or the sanitation or protective equipment necessary to combat the spread of [COVID-19] is "not rationally related to a legitimate governmental objective" and thus constitutes illegitimate punishment in violation of Plaintiffs' due process rights.'. . Plaintiffs' argument relies on two unproven factual premises: that they have medical conditions that put them at a higher risk of serious illness or death should they contract COVID-19 and that there are no adequate measures that can ensure they avoid exposure to COVID-19 while detained at Otero. . . . The Supreme Court has consistently held that detaining aliens to prevent them from absconding and ensuring that they appear for removal proceedings is a legitimate governmental purpose. . . Plaintiffs have not shown that their detention at Otero is not rationally related to that legitimate governmental purpose or is excessive in relation to that purpose because they have failed to demonstrate that they have medical conditions that put them at a higher risk of serious illness or death should they contract COVID-19 and that there are no adequate measures that can ensure they avoid exposure to COVID-19 while detained at Otero. See Kingsley, 135 S. Ct. at 2473 (2015) (quoting Bell, 441 U.S. at 561). Accordingly, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have not shown a substantial likelihood of prevailing on the merits. . . .A preliminary injunction of the type requested by Plaintiffs is an extraordinary remedy, and to obtain one Plaintiffs must show a substantial likelihood of prevailing on the merits; irreparable harm unless the injunction is issued; that the threatened injury outweighs the harm that the preliminary injunction may cause the opposing party; and that the injunction, if issued, will not adversely affect the public interest. Plaintiffs have not met their burden in establishing any of these factors. For the reasons explained in this Memorandum Opinion and Order, Plaintiffs' Motion for a Temporary Restraining Order . . . is DENIED.") Essien v. Barr, No. 20-CV-1034-WJM, 2020 WL 1974761, at *4 & n.5 (D. Colo. Apr. 24, 2020) ("The reasoning in Kingsley holds even more true in the civil detention context, such as immigration detention. Moreover, in this respect, the Court sees no distinction between an excessive force claim and a conditions-of-confinement claim. There is no justification for an inquiry into a subjective state of mind. Accordingly, the only elements the Court must consider are whether there was an expressed intent to punish, whether the restriction in question bears no reasonable relationship to any legitimate governmental objective, or whether the restriction is excessive as compared to a legitimate government objective. . . .The Court's holding is limited only to dangerous conditions of confinement in civil detention. The Court recognizes that a denial-of-medical-care claim (sometimes categorized as a conditions-of-confinement claim) raises special concerns because eliminating the subjective component might make the government liable for mere medical negligence, yet 'liability for negligently inflicted harm is categorically beneath the threshold of constitutional due process.'. . The Court therefore expresses no opinion about denial-of-medical-care claims.")

Wright on behalf of Salgado v. Glanz, No. 13-CV-315-JED-JFJ, 2020 WL 1663356, at *6 (N.D. Okla. Apr. 3, 2020) ("Without guidance from the Tenth Circuit, the undersigned declines to extend Kingsley's excessive force, objective-only standard to pretrial detainee claims of inadequate medical care.")

Parks v. Taylor, No. CIV-18-968-D, 2020 WL 1271587, at *3-4 & n.8 (W.D. Okla. Mar. 17, 2020) ("Lt. Carter first objects to Judge Erwin's finding regarding the standard of liability applicable to Count I. Based on recent legal developments regarding the constitutional rights of pretrial detainees under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, Judge Erwin concludes that an objective standard recognized by the Supreme Court for excessive force claims in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), should govern liability under Count I. Judge Erwin reaches this conclusion based on Colbruno v. Kessler, 928 F.3d 1155 (10th Cir. 2019), which he views as signaling that the Tenth Circuit has 'join[ed] the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits in determining that the Kingsley standard should apply to due process claims brought by pretrial detainees.'. . Lt. Carter contends this conclusion is simply wrong, citing recent cases in which the Tenth Circuit has acknowledged a circuit split 'on whether Kingsley alters the standard for conditions of confinement ... claims brought by pretrial detainees' and has declined to 'resolve this question for our circuit.'. . . The Court finds persuasive Lt. Carter's argument that the Tenth Circuit has not decided whether Kingsley's objective reasonableness standard should apply to a pretrial detainee's conditions-of-confinement claim and that, absent a Tenth Circuit decision, this Court should continue to apply existing precedent. This approach has been adopted by other district courts in this circuit. . . In numerous unpublished opinions issued after Kingsley and Colbruno, the Tenth Circuit has continued to apply the Eighth Amendment standard to pretrial detainees' claims regarding their conditions of confinement. . . . In short, Plaintiff has not pleaded sufficient facts to show that Lt. Carter was deliberately indifferent to an unsanitary condition in Plaintiff's cell, and therefore, has failed to state a plausible § 1983 claim against Lt. Carter in Count I. . . .
One could reasonably question whether, even utilizing a lesser standard required by Kingsley, Plaintiff's factual allegations are sufficient to state a plausible claim against Lt. Carter. Circuits that interpret Kingsley as requiring an objective standard for a pretrial detainee's claim have adopted an 'objectively reckless disregard' standard. See Estate of Vallina v. Cty. of Teller Sheriff's Office, 757 F. App'x 643, 647 (10th Cir. 2018) (discussing Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuit cases). To show that Lt. Carter acted with reckless disregard of a risk to Plaintiff's health by failing to provide cleaning supplies, Plaintiff would still need to allege some facts regarding Lt. Carter's knowledge of and responsibility for the problem.")

Bowlds v. Turn Key Health, No. CIV-19-726-SLP, 2020 WL 730876, at *2 & n.1 (W.D. Okla. Feb. 13, 2020) ("As a pretrial detainee, Plaintiff's claims are governed by the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . The Tenth Circuit continues to evaluate such claims applying 'an analysis identical to that applied in Eighth Amendment cases.'. . . The Tenth Circuit has yet to decide whether Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015) alters this analysis. See Burke,935 F.3d at 991, n. 9; see also McCowan v. Morales, 945 F.3d 1276, 1291 n. 12 (10th Cir. 2019) (declining to decide issue but noting that "a claim of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs by its very terminology seems to require both a subjective and objective test" and applying the two-prong test where the parties did not address the impact of Kingsley). Because here, as in McCowan, the parties do not address Kingsley the Court applies the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference standard.")

Bush for the Estate of Garland v. Bowling, No. 19-CV-00098-GKF-FHM, 2020 WL 265201, at *3 (N.D. Okla. Jan. 17, 2020) ("The Tenth Circuit has noted that other '[c]ircuits are split on whether Kingsley alters the standard for conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care claims brought by pretrial detainees.' Burke v. Regalado, 935 F.3d 960, 991-92 n.9 (10th Cir. 2019) (quoting Estate of Vallina v. Cty. of Teller Sheriff's Office, No. 17-1361, 2018 WL 6331595, at *2 (10th Cir. Dec. 4, 2018)). In an unpublished decision, the Tenth Circuit observed that the claim in Kingsley was 'an excessive-force claim where there was no question about the intentional use of force against the prisoner.' Crocker v. Glanz, 752 F. App'x 564, 569 (10th Cir. 2018). The panel majority in Crocker suggested that the analysis in Kingsley may not apply to a failure to provide adequate medical care or screening, where there is no such intentional action.'. . But the Tenth Circuit has not yet ruled directly on this issue. See McCowan v. Morales, — F.3d —, 2019 WL 7206045, at *11 n.12 (10th Cir. Dec. 27, 2019) (declining to address the question as the argument was not raised by the parties); Clark, 895 F.3d at 1269 (expressly declining to revisit the law applicable to medical care during pretrial detention in light of Kingsley); Perry v. Durborow, 892 F.3d 1116, 1122 n.1 (10th Cir. 2018) (expressly declining to address Kingley's impact on a pretrial detainee's claim of supervisory liability premised on deliberate indifference). Because Kingsley did not address the standard applicable to a pretrial detainee's denial of medical care claim, this court follows existing Tenth Circuit precedent as to the appropriate standard.")

Kerns v. Southwest Colorado Mental Health Center, Inc., No. 18-CV-2962-WJM-SKC, 2019 WL 6893022, at *10 (D. Colo. Dec. 18, 2019) ("In the absence of clear guidance from the Tenth Circuit that Kingsley should be extended to apply also to deliberate indifference claims, the Court will follow existing precedent from that court on the elements of a deliberate indifference claim brought by a pretrial detainee.")

Holland v. Glanz, No. 16-CV-349-JED-JFJ, 2019 WL 4781869, at *5 n.1 (N.D. Okla. Sept. 30, 2019) ("In 2015, in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, the Supreme Court 'held that the Eighth Amendment standard for excessive force claims brought by prisoners, which requires that defendants act "maliciously and sadistically to cause harm," does not apply to Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees.' Estate of Vallina v. Cty. of Teller Sherriff's Office & Its Det. Facility, 757 Fed. App'x. 643, 646 (10th Cir. 2018); see Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015). Since then, the 'Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits have interpreted Kingsley as displacing prior subjective requirements' for 'inadequate medical care claims brought by pretrial detainees.' Estate of Vallina, 757 Fed. App'x. at 646. 'Those courts have adopted [a purely] objective test requiring reckless disregard.'. . The Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits have declined to extend Kingsley. . .The Tenth Circuit has thus far declined to address the application of Kingsley. E.g., Crocker v. Glanz, 752 Fed. App'x. 564, 569 (10th Cir. 2018).")

Pendleton v. Board of County Commissioners for Oklahoma County, No. CIV-18-707-G, 2019 WL 4752269, at *5 & n.4 (W.D. Okla. Sept. 30, 2019) ("Although Mr. Pendleton was a pretrial detainee and therefore subject to protection under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, the Court applies an analysis identical to that applied to the Eighth Amendment claims brought by convicted prisoners. . . . Plaintiff argues that for pretrial detainees the traditional deliberate-indifference standard should be abandoned in favor of an objective-only standard. . . Kingsley, an excessive-force case, did not directly address the standard applicable to a pretrial detainee's conditions-of-confinement claim, and the Tenth Circuit has noted that circuits 'are split on whether Kingsley alters the standard for conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care claims brought by pretrial detainees.' Estate of Vallina v. Cty. of Teller Sheriff's Office, 757 F. App'x 643, 646 (10th Cir. 2018). Further, the Tenth Circuit 'has not yet ruled directly on this issue.' Burke v. Regalado, No. 18-CV-231-GKF-FHM, 2019 WL 1371144, at *4 (N.D. Okla. Mar. 26, 2019). The Court therefore follows established Tenth Circuit precedent in evaluating this claim (which survives even under the dual-prong standard, as discussed below).

Lance v. Board of County Commissioners of Pittsburg County, Okla., No. CIV-17-378-RAW, 2019 WL 4581351, at *13 & n. 22 (E.D. Okla. Sept. 20, 2019) ("While the Tenth Circuit has not yet definitively ruled on the issue,[22] [fn.22: The Tenth Circuit has since noted the split amongst the Circuits on this issue, but has not yet definitively ruled on it. Burke v. Regalado, --- F.3d ---, No. 18-5042 and 18-5043, 2019 WL 3938633 at * 14, n. 9 (10th Cir. Aug. 20, 2019); Estate of Vallina v. County of Teller Sheriff's Office, 757 Fed.Appx. 643, 646-47 (10th Cir. 2018) (unpublished).] the court believes that the subjective element – the defendant's state of mind, that he acted deliberately – is necessary to prove a claim of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs under either a Fourteenth Amendment or an Eighth Amendment analysis. Like the Northern District of Oklahoma, this court will follow existing Tenth Circuit precedent. See Burke v. Regalado, No. 18-CV-231-GKF-FHM, 2019 WL 1371144, *4 (N.D. Okla. Mar. 26, 2019) ("Because Kingsley did not address the standard applicable to a pretrial detainee's denial of medical care claim, this court follows existing Tenth Circuit precedent as to the appropriate standard.").")

Thurman v. County Commissioners of Oklahoma County, No. CIV-17-950-G, 2019 WL 3318120, at *2 (W.D. Okla. July 24, 2019) ("[A]s Judge Erwin thoroughly explained in his Report, Kingsley—an excessive-force case—did not directly address the standard applicable to a pretrial detainee's inadequate medical care claim, and while the Tenth Circuit has noted that circuits 'are split on whether Kingsley alters the standard for conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care claims brought by pretrial detainees,' the Tenth Circuit 'has not yet ruled directly on this issue.' Estate of Vallina v. Cty. of Teller Sheriff's Office, 757 F. App'x 643, 646 (10th Cir. 2018); Burke v. Regalado, No. 18-CV-231-GKF-FHM, 2019 WL 1371144, at *4 (N.D. Okla. Mar. 26, 2019); see also Rife v. Okla. Dep't of Pub. Safety, 854 F.3d 637, 647 (10th Cir. 2017) (discussing the traditional two-prong standard for a pretrial detainee's inadequate medical care claim post-Kingsley). The Court fully concurs with Judge Erwin's determination that, in the absence of a clear directive on the issue from the Tenth Circuit, this Court should follow established Tenth Circuit precedent in evaluating Plaintiff's claim.") [My note: But see Colbruno v. Kessler, 928 F.3d 1155 (10th Cir. 2019), supra]

Ramsey v. Southwest Correctional Medical Group, Inc., No. 18-CV-1845-WJM-KLM, 2019 WL 3252181, at *8 n.13 (D. Colo. July 19, 2019) ("The Tenth Circuit applies the same test for deliberate indifference to serious medical needs to both Eighth Amendment claims brought by prisoners and Fourteenth Amendment claims brought by pretrial detainees. See, e.g., Martinez v. Beggs, 563 F.3d 1082, 1088 (10th Cir. 2009); Olsen v. Layton Hills Mall, 312 F.3d 1304, 1315 (10th Cir. 2002). In Estate of Vallina v. County of Teller Sheriff's Office, 757 F. App'x 643, 646–47 (10th Cir. 2018), the Tenth Circuit noted a developing circuit split regarding whether a recent Supreme Court decision abrogating the subjective component in a pretrial detention use-of-force claim also calls for abrogating the subjective component in a pretrial detention denial-of-medical-care claim. See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015). But the plaintiff in Estate of Vallina did not argue for such abrogation, so the Tenth Circuit continued to follow its prior precedent. See 757 F. App'x at 647. Likewise, Ramsey does not argue for such abrogation, so the Court will continue to apply the Eighth Amendment standard.") .") [My note: But see Colbruno v. Kessler, 928 F.3d 1155 (10th Cir. 2019), supra]

Hernandez v. Board of County Commissioners of Oklahoma County, No. CIV-18-606-R, 2019 WL 3069430, at *3 (W.D. Okla. July 12, 2019) ("There is the potential for debate over what standard applies to a pretrial detainee following the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2470 (2015), holding that the Eighth Amendment standard for excessive force claims brought by prisoners, requiring proof that a defendant acted with a culpable state of mind, does not apply to Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claims brought by pretrial detainees. . . Rather, a pretrial detainee is only required to show that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was 'objectively unreasonable.'. . The parties have not addressed the issue, and in an unpublished decision, the Tenth Circuit noted that other circuits 'are split on whether Kingsley alters the standard for conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care claims brought by pretrial detainees.' Estate of Vallina v. Cty. of Teller Sheriff's Office, 757 F. App'x 643, 646 (10th Cir. 2018); see also Crocker v. Glanz, 752 F. App'x at 569 (noting Kingsley was an excessive-force claim where there was no question about the intentional use of force against the prisoner and suggesting that its analysis may not apply to a failure to provide adequate medical care or screening). However, given that the parties have not raised this issue, and the Tenth Circuit's last published statement on the appropriate test indicates that the standard has not changed at this time (see Perry v. Durborow, 892 F.3d 1116, 1121 (10th Cir. 2018)), the Court proceeds on the basis that the Fourteenth and Eighth Amendment standards are identical for purposes of Plaintiff's claims.") .") [My note: But see Colbruno v. Kessler, 928 F.3d 1155 (10th Cir. 2019), supra]

Turner v. Bd. of County Commissioners of County of Oklahoma, No. CIV-18-36-SLP, 2019 WL 1997474, at *3 n.3 (W.D. Okla. May 6, 2019) ("As a pretrial detainee, Plaintiff's claims are governed by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. However, under Tenth Circuit precedent, the same Eighth Amendment standard governs this claim. . . In a recent unpublished opinion, the Tenth Circuit noted that circuit courts are split as to whether the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, —— U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 2466 (2015), alters this standard or whether the holding in Kingsley is limited to claims of excessive force brought by pretrial detainees. See Estate of Vallina v. Cty. of Teller Sheriff's Office, 757 F. App'x 643, 646-47 (10th Cir. 2018). But the Tenth Circuit declined to decide the issue. The parties do not argue for application of a different standard and based on existing Tenth Circuit precedent, the Court deems the appropriate standard governing Plaintiff's claims remains unchanged by Kingsley.")

Estate of Bradshaw v. Armor Correctional Health Services, Inc., No. 17-CV-615-TCK-FHM, 2019 WL 1675148, at *6 n.3 (N.D. Okla. Apr. 17, 2019) ("Citing Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015) and Castro v. Los Angeles Cty., 833 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 2016) Plaintiff argues that the appropriate standard for evaluating her claims is one of 'objective reasonableness.' In Kingsley, the Supreme Court ruled that the proper standard for evaluating excessive force claims by pretrial detainees is an objective reasonableness test similar to the standard used to evaluate on-the-street claims of excessive force by arrestees. . . Subsequently, the Ninth Circuit—citing Kingsley—followed the Kingsley rationale and applied the objective reasonableness standard to a failure-to-protect claim brought by a pretrial detainee. Castro v. Los Angeles Cty., 833 F.3d 1060, 1069 (9th Cir. 2016). Plaintiff has cited no authority for her argument that the objective reasonableness standard applies in the context of claim arising from alleged failure to provide adequate medical care to a pretrial detainee, and as noted above the appropriate standard in this circuit is 'deliberate indifference.'")

Weitzman v. City and County of Denver, No. 17-CV-02703-KLM, 2019 WL 1438072, at *6 n.8 (D. Colo. Mar. 31, 2019) ("The Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals, in a recent, unpublished opinion, has noted that circuit courts 'are split on whether [Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015),] alters the standard for conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care claims brought by pretrial detainees,' with the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits saying it has done so and with the Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits saying it has not done so and that Kingsley applies only to excessive force claims. Estate of Vallina v. Cty. of Teller Sheriff's Office, __ F. App'x __, __, No. 17-1361, 2018 WL 6331595, at *2 (10th Cir. Dec. 4, 2018). The Tenth Circuit has not yet directly determined this issue. . .However, given that the parties have not raised this issue, and the Tenth Circuit's last published statement on the appropriate test indicates that the standard has not changed at this time, see Perry, 892 F.3d at 1121, the Court proceeds on the basis that the Fourteenth and Eighth Amendment standards are identical for purposes of Plaintiff's claims.")

Burke for the Estate of Godsey v. Regalado, No. 18-CV-231-GKF-FHM, 2019 WL 1371144, at *4 (N.D. Okla. Mar. 26, 2019) ("In an unpublished decision, the Tenth Circuit noted that other circuits 'are split on whether Kingsley alters the standard for conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care claims brought by pretrial detainees. Estate of Vallina v. Cty. of Teller Sheriff's Office, No. 17-1361, 2018 WL 6331595, at *2 (10th Cir. Dec. 4, 2018). In another unpublished decision, the Tenth Circuit observed that the claim in Kingsley was 'an excessive-force claim where there was no question about the intentional use of force against the prisoner.' Crocker v. Glanz, 752 F. App'x 564, 569 (10th Cir. 2018). The panel majority in Crocker suggested that the 'analysis in Kingsley may not apply to a failure to provide adequate medical care or screening, where there is no such intentional action.'. . But the Tenth Circuit has not yet ruled directly on this issue. See Clark, 895 F.3d at 1269 (expressly declining to revisit the law applicable to medical care during pretrial detention in light of Kingsley); Perry v. Durborow, 892 F.3d 1116, 1122 n.1 (10th Cir. 2018) (expressly declining to address Kingley's impact on a pretrial detainee's claim of supervisory liability premised on deliberate indifference). Because Kingsley did not address the standard applicable to a pretrial detainee's denial of medical care claim, this court follows existing Tenth Circuit precedent as to the appropriate standard.")

Ueding v. Border, No. 18-CV-00778-KLM, 2019 WL 1077367, at *7 (D. Colo. Mar. 7, 2019) ("The Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals, in a recent, unpublished opinion, has noted that circuit courts 'are split on whether [Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015),] alters the standard for conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care claims brought by pretrial detainees,' with the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits saying it has and with the Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits saying it has not and that Kingsley applies only to excessive force claims. Estate of Vallina v. Cty. of Teller Sheriff's Office, __ F. App'x __, __, No. 17-1361, 2018 WL 6331595, at *2 (10th Cir. Dec. 4, 2018). The Tenth Circuit has not yet directly determined this issue. . . However, given that (1) the parties have not raised this issue, (2) the Tenth Circuit's last published statement on the appropriate test indicates that the standard has not changed at this time, see Perry v. Durborow, 892 F.3d 1116, 1121 (10th Cir. 2018), and (3) Plaintiff's claims would fail under either standard, the Court proceeds on the basis that the Fourteenth and Eighth Amendment standards are identical for purposes of Plaintiff's claim.")

Partridge v. Pell, No. 17-CV-02941-CMA-STV, 2019 WL 1045840, at *6 (D. Colo. Mar. 5, 2019) ("After Kinglsey, the Courts of Appeal for the Second Circuit and the Ninth Circuit have held that '[t]he same objective analysis' the Supreme Court sanctioned in Kingsley 'should apply to an officer's appreciation of the risks associated with an unlawful condition of confinement in a claim for deliberate indifference under the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . The Tenth Circuit discussed these cases in Perry[.] . . .The case presently before this Court may be an opportunity to analyze Kingsley's impact on a Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim. However, just as the Tenth Circuit did in Perry, . . . and Magistrate Judge Varholak did in the Recommendation, . . . the Court declines to conduct that analysis here. Both parties have made their arguments in the context of the subjective standard. The Court will therefore use the subjective deliberate indifference standard that arises under the Eighth Amendment.")

Scott v. Montoya, No. 17-CV-01364-KLM, 2019 WL 688053, at *3 n.10 (D. Colo. Feb. 15, 2019) ("The Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals, in a recent, unpublished opinion, has noted that circuit courts 'are split on whether [Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015),] alters the standard for conditions of confinement and inadequate medical care claims brought by pretrial detainees,' with the Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits saying it has and with the Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits saying it has not and that Kingsley applies only to excessive force claims. Estate of Vallina v. Cty. of Teller Sheriff's Office, __ F. App'x __, __, No. 17-1361, 2018 WL 6331595, at *2 (10th Cir. Dec. 4, 2018). The Tenth Circuit has not yet directly determined this issue. . . However, given that (1) the parties have not raised this issue, (2) the Tenth Circuit's last published statement on the appropriate test indicates that the standard has not changed at this time, see Perry v. Durborow, 892 F.3d 1116, 1121 (10th Cir. 2018), and (3) Plaintiff's claims would fail under either standard, the Court proceeds on the basis that the Fourteenth and Eighth Amendment standards are identical for purposes of Plaintiff's claims.")

Thomas v. Lester, No. CIV-17-90-D, 2018 WL 3954851, at *3-4 (W.D. Okla. Aug. 17, 2018) ("Recently, in adopting an objective standard to govern a pretrial detainee's excessive force claim in Kingsley, the Supreme Court found support in precedents like Bell. The Court reaffirmed that even 'in the absence of an expressed intent to punish, a pretrial detainee can nevertheless prevail by showing that the actions are not "rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose" or that the actions "appear excessive in relation to that purpose."'. . The Court observed that the objective standard endorsed in Bell can be used to evaluate a variety of prison conditions or practices, and need 'not consider the prison officials' subjective beliefs about the policy.'. . Here, Plaintiff alleges no facts to suggest that Defendants' decision to prohibit juvenile visitation in the Cleveland County jail was intended as punishment, but this lack of subjective evidence is not dispositive. . . The question becomes whether Plaintiff has alleged facts that would show, objectively, the juvenile visitation ban lacked a rational relationship to a legitimate governmental objective or purpose. . . . In short, Plaintiff provides sufficient factual allegations from which to conclude that Defendants' juvenile visitation ban for pretrial detainees was not reasonably tailored to its purpose. For these reasons, the Court finds that Plaintiff has stated a plausible § 1983 claim that Defendants' ban on juvenile visitation in the Cleveland County jail constituted punishment of a pretrial detainee in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Thus, the Court finds that Defendants are not entitled to dismissal of the Amended Complaint with respect to this claim.")

Estate of Walter v. Correctional Healthcare Companies, Inc., No. 16-CV-0629-WJM-MEH, 2018 WL 2414865, at *8 (D. Colo. May 29, 2018) ("Although the Estate no longer pursues an excessive force claim, it highlights Kingsley as something 'the Court should keep in mind, because it has prompted other courts to question whether any Fourteenth Amendment cause of action arising from alleged mistreatment in pretrial detention contains a subjective component. . . In the present context, this argument could have interesting consequences. Under the Eighth Amendment test for delay or denial of medical care, a prisoner must prove that (1) objectively, he or she had a serious illness or injury, (2) the defendant was aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that the prisoner faced a substantial risk of serious harm, (3) the defendant subjectively drew the inference, but (4) the defendant did not act, and (5) the failure to act caused harm to the prisoner. . . The second, third, and fourth elements comprise 'deliberate indifference' to an inmate's medical needs. . . If Kingsley applies in the present circumstance, then a plaintiff would no longer need to prove deliberate indifference, but only knowledge of the relevant facts and an objectively unreasonable failure to act. . . The Estate, however, takes the position that 'the Court need not address this issue because [the Estate] has ample evidence to satisfy the subjective deliberate indifference standard under the pre-Kingsley state of the law.'. . The Court takes the Estate at its word and therefore does not explore the effect of Kingsley, particularly because removing the subjective component from deliberate indifference in the medical context comes very close to creating a federal constitutional cause of action simply for medical negligence—something against which the Supreme Court has counseled. . . Thus, to restate the standard of liability, the Estate must prove: (1) objectively, Walter had a serious illness or injury, (2) the defendant in question was aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that Walter faced a substantial risk of serious harm, (3) the defendant subjectively drew the inference, but (4) the defendant did not act, and (5) the failure to act caused harm to Walter.")

Schabow v. Steggs, No. 16-CV-02232-RBJ-KLM, 2018 WL 1014140, at *3-5 (D. Colo. Feb. 21, 2018) ("Plaintiff was a pretrial detainee at the time of the events underlying this lawsuit, and pretrial detainees are protected under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause rather than the Eighth Amendment's proscription against cruel and unusual punishment. . . However, the Eighth Amendment still provides the benchmark for claims of excessive force and cruel and unusual punishment. . .Therefore, the Court analyzes Plaintiff's claims under the Fourteenth Amendment, which incorporates the Eighth Amendment framework, and the Kingsley 'objectively reasonable' test for excessive force against pretrial detainees. . . .Defendants argue that Plaintiff fails to adequately assert a constitutional violation because his allegations do not satisfy both the objective and subjective prongs of the excessive force test under the Eighth Amendment. . . However, Defendants are applying an outdated standard. . . According to Kingsley, to successfully allege a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 claim of excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment, a pretrial detainee plaintiff must allege two elements: (1) that the defendant possessed a 'purposeful, a knowing, or possibly a reckless state of mind,'. . . and (2) that the defendant's actions were objectively unreasonable in light of facts and circumstances of that particular case.")

Schabow v. Steggs, No. 16-CV-02232-RBJ-KLM, 2018 WL 1014140, at *9 &n.7 (D. Colo. Feb. 21, 2018) ("Plaintiff alleges that Defendants Stob, Rogers, and Eugene violated his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights through their deliberate indifference to his medical needs. . . . Pretrial detainees are protected by the Fourteenth Amendment rather than the Eighth Amendment, however, the degree of protection and the analysis is the same under both Amendments.")

Moore v. Goodman, No. 17-CV-196-CVE-JFJ, 2017 WL 4079401, at *3 n.1 (N.D. Okla. Sept. 14, 2017) ("The Court notes that the Supreme Court has ruled that a pretrial detainee's excessive force claim brought pursuant to the Due Process Clause is governed by an objective standard and differentiated review of that claim from one brought by a convicted prisoner. . . But the Kingsley decision did not address the standard applicable to a pretrial detainee's denial of medical care claim and, therefore, the Court follows existing Tenth Circuit precedent as to the appropriate standard governing an inadequate medical care claim.")

Abila v. Funk, 220 F.Supp.3d 1121, 1180-81 (D.N.M. 2016) ("In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. at 2473, the Supreme Court ruled that a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment due-process claim regarding the use of excessive force turns on the objective reasonableness of the use of force, and proof as to the defendants' mental state is not required. . . The Supreme Court did not specifically decide whether that objective standard might suffice in cases involving mistreatment of detainees, as the defendants in that case had not disputed that they acted purposefully and knowingly. . . Nevertheless, the Supreme Court in Kingsley v. Hendrickson noted that an objective standard had been applied in Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. at 541-43, relative to a variety of prison conditions, including double bunking. . . Bell v. Wolfish did not specifically state that an objective standard applied; rather, the Supreme Court in Kingsley v. Hendrickson characterized Bell v. Wolfish's 'rationally related' and 'appears excessive in relation to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose' standard as being objective. . . . No Court yet, in the wake of Kingsley v. Hendrickson, has explicitly applied this standard to a claim, such as Abila's, alleging inhumane conditions of confinement. But see Castro v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1070 (9th Cir. 2016)(applying the 'broad' wording of the Kingsley v. Hendrickson standard, which the Supreme Court was applying in the context of an excessive-force claim, to a failure-to-protect claim, because '[t]he Court did not limit its holding to "force" but spoke to "the challenged governmental action" generally'). The Supreme Court premised its holding in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, however, with respect to pretrial detainees, on the longstanding Supreme Court precedent of Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. at 541-43. In sum, the Court concludes that Kingsley v. Hendrickson held that there does not exist a single 'deliberate indifference' standard applicable to all § 1983 claims, whether pretrial detainees or convicted prisoners bring the claim. . . The parties to this case confirm the Court's conclusion. . . Accordingly, 'the Due Process Clause protects a pretrial detainee from ... punishment.'. . '[S]uch "punishment" can consist of actions taken with an "expressed intent to punish."'". . In the absence of an expressed intent to punish, however, 'a pretrial detainee can nevertheless prevail by showing that the actions are not "rationally related to a legitimate nonpunitive governmental purpose" or that the actions "appear excessive in relation to that purpose."'. . The Supreme Court, in Bell v. Wolfish, applied this latter objective standard to evaluate a variety of prison conditions, including a prison's practice of double bunking.")

Smith v. DuBoise, No. 14-CV-511-GKF-PJC, 2015 WL 9275005, at *7 (N.D. Okla. Dec. 18, 2015) ("To the extent Plaintiff raises a separate claim challenging the conditions of the holding cell, the claim fails. Although the Fourteenth Amendment governs this claim due to Plaintiff's status as a pretrial detainee, the standards are the same as those under the Eighth Amendment.")

Salazar v. White, No. 14-CV-02081-RM-CBS, 2015 WL 5781650, at *4-5 & n.3 (D. Colo. Oct. 5, 2015) ("[A]s to the sufficiency of Plaintiff's allegations, Defendant argues that the 'new "objective reasonableness"' standard under Kingsley, supra, announced in 2015 was not clearly established at the time of the alleged incident in 2014. Instead, Defendant contends the subjective reasonable standard applies and Plaintiff has failed to sufficiently allege facts to meet this standard. The Court agrees that the 'motives of the state actor' (what Defendant refers to as 'subjective reasonableness component') requirement set forth in Estate of Booker, 745 F.3d at 426, should be considered to evaluate Defendant's conduct which allegedly occurred in 2014. . . The Court finds, however, that Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged facts to meet this requirement. . . . In light of the Court's determination, it need not address the possible implications of Kingsley. . . .The subjective intent standard for an excessive force due process violation has been described as ' "force inspired by unwise, excessive zeal amounting to an abuse of official power that shocks the conscience, or by malice rather than mere carelessness."'. . . In this case, Plaintiff's allegations that Defendant attacked Plaintiff, threw him on the ground, 'savagely and maliciously beat and kicked' him, while he was in handcuffs and not resisting are sufficient to support that the force was inspired by malice or excessive zeal that shocks the conscience.")

Kennedy v. Bd. of Cnty. Commissioners For Oklahoma Cnty., No. CIV-15-398-D, 2015 WL 4078177, at *1 n.6 (W.D. Okla. July 6, 2015) ("The Supreme Court recently decided the appropriate Due Process Clause standard for a pretrial detainee's excessive force claim. See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. ——, 2015 WL 2473447, (June 22, 2015). This decision does not alter the standard applicable to medical care claims.")

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Myrick v. Fulton County, Georgia, 69 F.4th 1277, 1302-05 (11th Cir. 2023) ("There may be a question as to whether May stepped toward Officer Cook. Appellants are correct that none of the officers mentioned the alleged step in their incident reports. But we need not address whether May stepped toward Officer Cook. Even assuming that he didn't, it was reasonable under the circumstances for Officer Cook to tase May. The undisputed record, when viewed in the light most favorable to Appellants, shows that (1) May was naked in his cell in violation of jail policy and state law; (2) Officer Cook repeatedly instructed May to put his clothes on; (3) May refused to comply; (4) May was defiant and took an aggressive stance; (5) Officer Cook tased May; (6) the taser was only partially effective; and (7) May jumped back up almost immediately and continued to resist. These facts, when viewed through the lens of the Kingsley factors, do not suggest that Officer Cook's initial use of his taser on May was objectively unreasonable, so we cannot say that Officer Cook violated May's Fourteenth Amendment rights. . . .Under our precedent, and given the situation that he confronted, Officer Cook was within his rights to tase May. We have declined to find a Fourth Amendment violation in similar circumstances. In Draper v. Reynolds, we held that it was reasonable to tase a suspect who defied lawful orders, 'used profanity, moved around and paced in agitation, and repeatedly yelled' at law enforcement. . . All that was also true here. If anything, May's aggressive stance made the situation here more volatile, in that it gave the officers reason to believe that a brawl might ensue. So if it was reasonable to tase the suspect in Draper, it was reasonable to tase May here. . . As such, the District Court properly granted Officer Cook summary judgment based on qualified immunity. . . . Even under the most favorable version of events, there is simply no dispute that an active struggle was ensuing in the holding cell. Under the Kingsley factors, Officer Strowder's punches were not objectively unreasonable given the struggle between May and the Officers—regardless of whether he grabbed her handcuffs. May actively resisted. Officer Strowder gave May verbal warnings. Her closed-fist strikes were in response to that resistance and the safety and security risks May posed. The injury resulting from the punches was relatively minimal. Because Officer Strowder's use of force was not clearly unreasonable, she did not violate May's Fourteenth Amendment rights. The District Court properly granted her summary judgment as well. . . . Even if we assume that the Officers had subjective knowledge of the serious risk of medical harm, we cannot say that they disregarded that risk or that they acted with more than gross negligence. . . . Because Appellants cannot show that the Officers were deliberately indifferent to May's serious medical need, they cannot show his Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated. As such, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity and the District Court did not err in granting them summary judgment.")

Pullen v. Osceola County, 861 F. App'x 284, ___ n.7 (11th Cir. 2021) ("Although Skrtich involved a convicted prisoner and the Eighth Amendment standard for excessive force, we have repeatedly held that the use of force 'maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm' violates clearly established law '[i]n both the Fourteenth and the Eighth Amendment [contexts].' Cockrell v. Sparks, 510 F.3d 1307, 1311 (11th Cir. 2007). We do not believe that the Supreme Court's subsequent decision in Kingsley, which lowered the requirements for an excessive force claim under the Fourteenth Amendment, disturbs this precedent.")

Crocker v. Beatty, 995 F.3d 1232, 1246-50 (11th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 845 (2022) ("[U]nder the Supreme Court's current framework, the Fourth Amendment covers arrestees, the Eighth Amendment covers prisoners, and the Fourteenth Amendment covers 'those who exist in the in-between—pretrial detainees.'. . . The Supreme Court has long taught that '[i]n addressing an excessive force claim brought under § 1983, analysis begins by identifying the specific constitutional right allegedly infringed by the challenged application of force.'. . So, exactly what kind of excessive-force claim has Crocker alleged? Not entirely clear. Crocker's filings before the district court could be read as raising either a Fourth Amendment claim, a Fourteenth Amendment claim, or perhaps both. . . But Crocker's counsel later clarified that his hot-car excessive-force claim relied solely on the Fourteenth Amendment. And in his opening brief to this Court, Crocker expressly cast his claim in Fourteenth Amendment terms. But as you might suspect from Crocker's shape-shifting arguments, the Fourteenth Amendment doesn't offer a perfect fit for the facts here. As we said in Piazza, the Fourteenth Amendment has been interpreted to protect 'pretrial detainees' from excessive force. . . And it's not obvious that Crocker was a pretrial detainee. The Supreme Court long ago described a pretrial detainee as a person who had received 'a "judicial determination of probable cause as a prerequisite to [the] extended restraint of [his] liberty following arrest."'. . Because Crocker never made it to the probable-cause-determination stage, calling him a 'pretrial detainee' is hard to square with Bell. Accordingly, it's not clear that the Fourteenth Amendment provides the appropriate framework for Crocker's excessive-force claim. Bell's suggestion notwithstanding, we've acknowledged that 'the line is not always clear as to when an arrest ends and pretrial detainment begins.'. . As a result, the line—for excessive-force purposes—between an arrestee and a pretrial detainee isn't always clear, either. . . And the definitional problem creates a follow-on analytical issue: For someone who could plausibly be characterized as either an arrestee or a pretrial detainee, it's hard to say whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment should govern the analysis. . . The day may well come when we need to clarify the distinction. Today, though, isn't that day. Whether framed in terms of the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment, Crocker's claim fails. . . . We will start with the Fourteenth Amendment analysis since that's the framework that Crocker has invoked before us. First, we'll articulate the governing standard—which the district court misapprehended and our dissenting colleague disputes—and then, having done so, we'll apply that standard to Crocker's case. . .We recently laid out the proper Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force framework and applied it in a 'hot car' case in Patel. There, we began by explaining that claims of excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment used to be analyzed like excessive-force claims under the Eighth Amendment, such that we had to undertake a subjective inquiry into whether an officer applied force 'maliciously and sadistically.'. . If so, then there was excessive force. If not, then there wasn't. Not anymore. In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, the Supreme Court held that for Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims 'the relevant standard is objective not subjective.'. . . Here, the district court erroneously applied the old malicious-and-sadistic standard and, on that basis, granted summary judgment on Crocker's excessive-force claim. Before applying Kingsley's 'objective not subjective' standard to the facts of Crocker's case, we must say a few words in response to our dissenting colleague's reading of that decision. On the dissent's view, both before and after Kingsley, a viable excessive-force claim can be based even on 'objectively reasonable force' provided that the officer-defendant acted with a sufficiently sinister state of mind—what the dissent calls 'an express intent to punish.'. . That, the dissent says, is because under Bell v. Wolfish, . . . 'pretrial detainees can establish a violation of their Fourteenth Amendment rights by showing that an official inflicted force with an express intent to punish.'. . And, the dissent maintains, Kingsley shouldn't be read to have done 'away with this method of proving Fourteenth Amendment violations for excessive force claims when it said nothing about having done so.'. . On that theory, both before and after Kingsley, 'proof of express intent to punish is alone sufficient' to support an excessive-force claim. . . Several responses. First, while Kingsley certainly discusses Bell's subjective standard for punishment, we don't draw from that discussion the dissent's two-track treatment of excessive-force claims. Consider, for instance, how the Kingsley Court framed the case: 'The question before us is whether, to prove an excessive force claim, a pretrial detainee must show that the officers were subjectively aware that their use of force was unreasonable, or only that the officers' use of that force was objectively unreasonable.'. . As the Court's phrasing indicates, proof of objectively unreasonable force has always been necessary to a pretrial detainee's excessive-force claim. . . Post-Kingsley, such proof is sufficient. . . But in becoming sufficient, it didn't cease to be necessary. Second, we don't think that the dissent's assertion that, as a general matter, unconstitutional 'punishment' can be proven based on 'an express intent to punish,'. . . demonstrates, more particularly, that proof of objectively unreasonable force is unnecessary to an excessive-force claim. Here, we think it important to distinguish between and among punishment and its specific instantiations. We agree, of course, that the Constitution prohibits any 'punishment' of pretrial detainees, . . . including the 'use of excessive force that amounts to punishment[.]'. . But not all punishment involves excessive force. Indeed, neither Bell nor McMillian v. Johnson, 88 F.3d 1554 (11th Cir. 1996)—the two cases on which the dissent principally relies—mention 'excessive force' at all. Rather, both involved what we've called 'conditions-of-confinement' claims. . . And although the genus 'punishment' contains several species, including both excessive-force and conditions-of-confinement claims, the standard by which one might discern the one won't necessarily reveal the other. We don't think, then, that an express intent to punish alone, coupled with an objectively reasonable use of force, can sustain an excessive-force claim. . . .Although the district court erroneously invoked the malicious-and-sadistic standard, rather than Kingsley's 'objective not subjective' standard, it landed on the right answer. As an initial matter, there was (under the proper framework) no constitutional violation. Moreover, and in any event, even if there had been, the law wasn't so clearly established that Beatty should have known better.")

Crocker v. Beatty, 995 F.3d 1232, 1250-52 & n.16 (11th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 845 (2022) ("We begin with the constitutional question.[16] [fn 16: The Supreme Court has said that 'courts should think hard, and then think hard again' before addressing the merits of an underlying constitutional claim as well as whether the law is clearly established. . . Having done our due diligence, we conclude that addressing the constitutional claim here will 'clarify the legal standards governing public officials.'. . Paired with Patel, this case helps illustrate what kind of conduct does and doesn't cross a constitutional line in the context of hot-car cases.] Officer Beatty's alleged conduct wasn't objectively unreasonable. The Supreme Court has given us six factors to consider in making a Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force determination, and although the Court cautioned that these factors aren't exhaustive or exclusive, they're sufficient here. . . . Considering all the Kingsley factors, it seems most important there was very little 'force' used and essentially no harm done. . . . [I]t's hard to imagine how we could find a constitutional violation here without making a federal case of just about every 'hot car' incident in Alabama, Florida, and Georgia, which we (once again) decline to do.")

Crocker v. Beatty, 995 F.3d 1232, 1261-64 (11th Cir. 2021) (Martin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 845 (2022) ("Despite the majority's discussion to the contrary, Mr. Crocker made clear, both before the District Court and now on appeal, that he is bringing his excessive force claim solely under the Fourteenth Amendment. And while Deputy Beatty notes that the line between arrest and pretrial detention is not clear, he makes no argument that the Fourth Amendment, rather than the Fourteenth, should govern. Despite acknowledging that application of one amendment over the other does not change the outcome of Mr. Crocker's excessive force claim under its interpretation, the majority opinion analyzes Crocker's claim under both the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . In addition to authoring the majority opinion, Judge Newsom also writes a separate concurrence to say that, in his view, it is the Fourth Amendment that should apply in these post-arrest, pre-custody situations. . . .Here, however, we have no briefing on the question and both parties have understood Mr. Crocker's excessive force claim to travel under the Fourteenth Amendment. I would therefore analyze whether Deputy Beatty used excessive force against Mr. Crocker when he locked him in a hot patrol car and left him there, as the parties did, under the Fourteenth Amendment alone. . . . I agree with the majority that the District Court's analysis of this claim was wrong because the court failed to apply the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson[.]. . I also agree that the force used here was not objectively unreasonable. . . But again, I part ways with the majority insofar as I do not read Kingsley to do away with Fourteenth Amendment liability where an officer applies objectively reasonable force with an express intent to punish. I say Mr. Crocker presented sufficient evidence to create a dispute of fact about whether Deputy Beatty acted with express intent to punish him. . . And since it was clearly established at the time of Mr. Crocker's arrest that applying force with the express intent to punish a pretrial detainee violated the Fourteenth Amendment, Deputy Beatty is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . . According to the majority opinion, Kinglsey's holding that pretrial detainees can prove excessive force simply by establishing that an official used objectively unreasonable force means that proof of objectively unreasonable force is the only way pretrial detainees can prove excessive force in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . In the majority's view, Kingsley forecloses 'the possibility of an excessive-force violation, even in circumstances where the use of force is objectively reasonable, on the ground that some sinister purpose is allegedly afoot.'. . But the majority misreads Kingsley. Kingsley did nothing to disallow Fourteenth Amendment claims based on express intent to punish, and those claims remain viable today. . . .The Court never said it was doing away with Bell's subjective standard, under which pretrial detainees can establish a violation of their Fourteenth Amendment rights by showing that an official inflicted force with an express intent to punish. . . Much less did the Court say it was doing away with Bell's subjective standard solely for excessive force claims while leaving it in place for other claims of punishment, as the majority opinion suggests. . . . It has thus long been understood, prior to Kingsley, that proof of express intent to punish is alone sufficient to establish a Fourteenth Amendment violation. . . Kingsley—a decision that sought to make it easier for pretrial detainees to vindicate their rights—cannot properly be read to do away with this method of proving Fourteenth Amendment violations for excessive force claims when it said nothing about having done so. Based on my reading of Kingsley, I would ask whether the evidence in this case demonstrates that Deputy Beatty locked

Mr. Crocker in the back of a hot car for nearly half an hour with the goal of punishing him. . . And I see sufficient evidence here to create a dispute of fact about whether Deputy Beatty locked Mr. Crocker in the hot car with an express intent to punish him.")

Patel v. Lanier County, Georgia, 969 F.3d 1173, 1181-91 (11th Cir. 2020) ("By adopting an objective-reasonableness criterion, the Kingsley Court indicated a connection between the Fourteenth Amendment's excessive-force standard and the Fourth Amendment's standard, rather than the Eighth Amendment's. . . . Notwithstanding Kingsley, the district court here pointedly distinguished Fourth Amendment precedent, citing our pre-Kingsley cases for the proposition that '[t]he standard for showing excessive force in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment ... is higher than that required to show excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment.'. . But as we clarified in Piazza—which came down after the district court here issued its decision—that's no longer true. After Kingsley, the Fourteenth Amendment's standard is analogous to the Fourth Amendment's. Had the district court applied the correct standard—Kingsley's Fourth-Amendment-like objective-reasonableness test, informed by several contextual considerations—we think it would have concluded, as we do, that Deputy Smith violated Patel's Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . .We haven't directly confronted a 'hot car' case before now, but variations of this fact pattern are understandably common. To try to bring clarity to the law governing such circumstances, we'll identify the considerations that inform our decision, but we can't hope to lay down a neat rule; as the Supreme Court has explained—for better or worse—'objective reasonableness turns on the "facts and circumstances of each particular case."'. . . Whenever the force used against a pretrial detainee consists in his subjection to hazardous conditions, the 'amount of force used' is a function of two component factors—(1) the severity of those conditions and (2) the duration of his subjection to them. These two considerations combine to create a sliding scale: The more severe the conditions, the shorter the detention need be before it amounts to excessive force—and vice versa. Now, how about 'need'? In cases involving pretrial detainees, there is always (by definition) some need to detain, at least until a judge authorizes a release. But, it seems to us, the need for detention in relatively harsh conditions depends both on the threat that the detainee poses and on the feasibility of alternative means of holding him. Again, a sliding scale: Detention in harsher conditions may be justified where alternative modes of detention are not readily available, especially if the detainee poses a heightened risk of danger to police or the public; by contrast, where the detainee poses no particular risk or where an alternative is at hand, the 'need' for harsher modes of detention dissipates. Here, Patel was kept in a hot transport van—without any ventilation or air conditioning—for a period of approximately two hours. While those facts alone don't entitle Patel to a trial on his excessive-force claim, we note that detentions of comparable duration and severity have been held to create jury questions. . . Moreover, for nearly half of Patel's detention—the 55 minutes during which he was left unattended in the sally port—Deputy Smith presumably could have moved him inside the Lowndes County jail while he made arrangements to transport Grant. Hence, it seems to us that a significant fraction of the force applied to Patel was not just harsh but also unnecessary. . . . Although Kingsley's list isn't 'exclusive,' its factors suffice to resolve the constitutional question here. Construing the facts and accompanying inferences in his favor, the Kingsley factors tilt decisively toward Patel. Accordingly, we conclude that in the particular circumstances of this case, Patel's detention and transport were 'more severe than [was] necessary to ... achieve a permissible governmental objective.'. . Because the force Deputy Smith applied was not 'objectively reasonable,' it violated Patel's Fourteenth Amendment rights. . . .That's the good news for Patel on excessive force. Now the bad: Although we conclude that Deputy Smith violated Patel's constitutional rights, we cannot say that the underlying law applicable to Patel's excessive-force claim was sufficiently 'clearly established' to defeat qualified immunity. Before explaining why, we must first address Patel's threshold contention that, in the context of a Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claim, he doesn't have to show a clearly established right. . . . The usual rule in a qualified-immunity case is that, in addition to proving a constitutional violation, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the law underlying his claim was 'clearly established' at the time of the incident in question. . . It is true, as Patel says, that in Johnson v. Breeden, 280 F.3d 1308, 1321–22 (11th Cir. 2002), and Fennell, 559 F.3d at 1216–17, we articulated a sui generis exception to that general rule for Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims. But that exception was justified only by an idiosyncrasy of those claims—an idiosyncrasy that, with respect to those arising under the Fourteenth Amendment, Kingsley eliminated. As a result, Patel can no longer rely on our previous holdings but, rather, must prove that his right not to be subjected to prolonged detention in the hot transport van was clearly established. . . . The Johnson/Fennel exception rested entirely on the 'extreme' subjective-intent element of Eighth and (then) Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims. Kingsley, though, expressly eliminated any subjective element for such claims arising under the Fourteenth Amendment—at least as to the excessiveness of the force. . . . In so doing, the Supreme Court likewise eliminated the justification for the Johnson/Fennel exception itself—effectively undermining that special rule 'to the point of abrogation,' at least as to Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims. . . And if that weren't enough, the Kingsley Court expressly acknowledged that the clearly-established prong of the qualified-immunity inquiry would govern such claims. . . As a result, although the Johnson/Fennel exception continues to apply to Eighth Amendment claims, we must abandon it as applied in the Fourteenth Amendment context. . . . Applying the ordinary qualified-immunity framework, we conclude that Patel's constitutional rights here were not clearly established at the time of his transport between Cook, Lowndes, and Lanier Counties. . . . At the time of the constitutional violation here, there existed no clearly established law that could have given Deputy Smith fair notice that confining Patel as he did amounted to excessive force. For starters, Patel can point to no 'materially similar case.'. . .[O]ur holding that the pepper-spray incident in Danley was unconstitutional didn't give Deputy Smith fair notice that his treatment of Patel was excessive. Although our precedent clearly establishes that environmental conditions can amount to excessive force in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, our previous cases would not have put Deputy Smith on notice that the particular conditions he caused were sufficiently harsh. We note that Danley cites Burchett—a Sixth Circuit case with facts quite similar to this one—for the proposition 'that confining ... an arrestee, in a "police car with the windows rolled up in ninety degree heat for three hours constituted excessive force" in violation of the Fourth Amendment.'. . But a mere citation to an out-of-circuit decision—even with approval, and even with an accompanying factual précis—cannot clearly establish the law for qualified-immunity purposes. . . . Moreover, and in any event, even if Burchett—or Danley's citation of it—could clearly establish the law in general, it wouldn't clearly establish that Deputy Smith's particular conduct violated Patel's constitutional rights. The detention in Burchett was both (1) somewhat longer—three hours with no ventilation, as compared to two hours here, less than half of which was wholly unventilated—and (2) somewhat more severe—a 90 degree ambient temperature, as compared to 85 degrees. . . Close, but not close enough—because all agree that confining a pretrial detainee in a hot vehicle for just a short time wouldn't be unreasonable, law-enforcement officials need some leeway in this area. Accordingly, we will not impute notice in a hot-car case unless the analogy to preexisting case law is clear. . . . Although Kingsley established that all objectively unreasonable applications of force against pretrial detainees violate the Fourteenth Amendment, . . . confining a prisoner in a hot transport van, even for a couple of hours, is not so obviously unreasonable that Deputy Smith should have known better in the absence of case law more closely on point. Patel doesn't point to any other case that established 'a broad[ ], clearly established principle that should govern the novel facts of the situation,'. . . and we aren't aware of any. Nor, finally, was Deputy Smith's conduct so egregious 'that prior case law is unnecessary' to establish a clear violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Although Patel's detention and transport were no doubt exceedingly uncomfortable—and as it turns out, dangerous—Deputy Smith's conduct was not akin to those instances 'so far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force that [the officer] had to know he was violating the Constitution even without caselaw on point.'. . . The basic standards governing Patel's Fourteenth Amendment deliberate-indifference claim are uncontested and, here, are 'identical to those under the Eighth.'. . . Here, the circumstantial evidence would allow a jury to infer 'subjective knowledge of a risk of serious harm' because (1) Deputy Smith witnessed symptoms that even a layperson could recognize as indicating that risk and (2) Smith wasn't any ordinary layperson—he was trained as a medical first responder. . . A jury could also find 'disregard' of the risk based on the fact that Deputy Smith provided no intervention until after he delivered Patel to the Lanier County Sheriff's Office, and then only reluctantly. . . Finally, the conduct here was worse 'than gross negligence' because Deputy Smith utterly refused to respond to the severe symptoms that he saw. . . Deputy Smith's total inaction is telling; he not only failed to enlist the help of a medical professional in the face of a serious medical need, but he failed even to provide water on request and made no attempt to treat Patel himself despite having first-responder training. And of course it was Deputy Smith's neglect—leaving Patel in a hot, unventilated, un-air-conditioned transport van—that created the danger in the first place. Finally, the evidence amply supports the conclusion that Deputy Smith's deliberate indifference caused Patel harm. Patel's hospitalization and diagnoses alone suffice to establish a jury question as to injury. And the very identity of his diagnosed conditions—heat exhaustion and heat syncope—indicate heat exposure as their most likely cause. . . . For all these reasons, we conclude that Patel has presented sufficient evidence to prove every element of a Fourteenth Amendment deliberate-indifference claim. . . .We turn once more, then, to the second step of qualified immunity—that is, whether the right that Patel alleges was clearly established. Although we haven't identified any controlling case with closely analogous facts, we think 'the novel facts of the situation' are obviously governed by a 'broader, clearly established principle.'. . 'The knowledge of the need for medical care and intentional refusal to provide that care has consistently been held to surpass negligence and constitute deliberate indifference.'. . Both aspects of this articulation—knowledge and intentional refusal—are on full display here. This broad principle has put all law-enforcement officials on notice that if they actually know about a condition that poses a substantial risk of serious harm and yet do nothing to address it, they violate the Constitution. No more notice was necessary because 'the assumed circumstances here are stark and simple, and the [preexisting] decisional language ... obviously and clearly applies.'. . This is not a case in which a law-enforcement officer provided inadequate aid, the reasonableness of which can be fairly disputed. Here, at least on the facts as we must take them, Deputy Smith provided no timely aid—he was confronted with a serious medical need and did nothing. Because we have made clear that such complete abdication in the face of a known serious need is unconstitutional, Deputy Smith is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

> See also Rodriguez-Bonilla v. Ivey, No. 6:21-CV-428-JA-DAB, 2023 WL 2375217, at *12 (M.D. Fla. Mar. 6, 2023) ("'The usual rule in a qualified-immunity case is that, in addition to proving a constitutional violation, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the law underlying [her] claim was "clearly established" at the time of the incident in question.'. . The purpose of this rule is to 'ensure that before they are subjected to suit, officers are on notice that their conduct is unlawful.'. . Before Kingsley, there was an exception to this requirement for excessive-force claims brought under the Fourteenth Amendment based on the simple fact that the old malicious-and-sadistic standard was 'so extreme that every conceivable set of circumstances in which this constitutional violation occurs is clearly established to be a violation of the Constitution.'. . After Kingsley, however, this exception no longer applies. Patel, 969 F.3d at 1183 ("[A]lthough the Johnson/Fennel exception continues to apply to Eighth Amendment claims, we must abandon it as applied in the Fourteenth Amendment context.").")

Grochowski v. Clayton County, Georgia, 961 F.3d 1311, 318 & n.4 (11th Cir. 2020) ("When analyzing claims under the Due Process Clause, the Eleventh Circuit often refers to precedent under the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause. . . The Eleventh Circuit has thus recognized that '[a] prison official's deliberate indifference to a known, substantial risk of serious harm to an inmate violates the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . 'Whether a risk of harm is substantial is an objective inquiry.'. . The 'deliberate indifference' component is a subjective inquiry that requires a plaintiff to show that the defendants 'acted with a sufficiently culpable state of mind.'. . .Plaintiffs urge us to dispense with the subjective component, as the Supreme Court did in Kingsley. . . for excessive force claims arising under the Fourteenth Amendment. We decline to apply Kingsley because Grochowski's death occurred in 2012 and Kingsley was decided in 2015. We are not aware of any court that has ruled that Kingsley has retroactive effect. We therefore do not consider whether Kingsley would otherwise be applicable.")

Swain v. Junior, 961 F.3d 1276, 1285 & n.4, 1294 (11th Cir. 2020) ("The plaintiffs contend that the defendants have been 'deliberately indifferent' to the serious risk that COVID-19 poses to them, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Although the plaintiffs' claim technically arises under the Fourteenth Amendment because they are pretrial detainees rather than convicted prisoners, it is 'evaluated under the same standard as a prisoner's claim of inadequate care under the Eighth Amendment.' Dang ex rel. Dang v. Sheriff, Seminole Cty. Fla., 871 F.3d 1272, 1279 (11th Cir. 2017). The Eighth Amendment—and therefore the Fourteenth also—is violated when a jailer 'is deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of serious harm to an inmate who suffers injury.'. .To establish a deliberate-indifference claim, a plaintiff must make both an objective and a subjective showing. . . . The Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, which held that pretrial detainees alleging excessive force need only show objective unreasonableness, doesn't change our analysis here. . . This case doesn't arise in the excessive-force context, and we have otherwise continued to require detainees to prove subjective deliberate indifference. [citing cases] . . . .While COVID-19 poses novel health risks to incarcerated inmates—and novel administrative challenges for jail and prison administrators—the law that the district court was bound to apply is well established. In order to obtain a preliminary injunction, the plaintiffs had to show a substantial likelihood of success on the merits of their constitutional claim, which means that they had to demonstrate the defendants' deliberate indifference—which is to say their utter recklessness. Because the district court erred, among other ways, in erroneously concluding that the plaintiffs had met that requirement, we conclude that it abused its discretion in granting the preliminary injunction.") Swain v. Junior, 961 F.3d 1276, 1294-96, 1303 (11th Cir. 2020) (Martin, J., dissenting) ("The COVID-19 pandemic is a health crisis without precedent in living memory. At the time we heard oral argument in this case, the virus had already claimed the lives of over 100,000 Americans. . . COVID-19 is highly infectious and easily communicable. Of those infected, approximately 20% will become seriously ill and 1 to 3% will die. People with common health conditions including lung or heart disease, diabetes, and chronic liver or kidney conditions are at much greater risk of death. About 15% of them will die if they contract COVID-19. Those who survive may nonetheless experience permanent organ and neurological damage. There is no known vaccine or effective antiviral medication to prevent or treat infection from COVID-19. The only effective way to protect people is to take precautionary measures to avoid infection. Against this background, seven pretrial detainees held at the Miami-Dade Metro West Detention Center ("Metro West") brought suit against Daniel Junior, the director of the Miami-Dade Corrections and Rehabilitation Department ("MDCR"), and Miami-Dade County. They sued on behalf of a putative class of people detained at Metro West during the COVID-19 pandemic, as well as a subset of people in pretrial custody at Metro West who are particularly vulnerable to injury or death if they contract the virus. The named plaintiffs all have preexisting medical conditions that place them among those at highest risk of death or serious illness if they are infected. They sought emergency declaratory and injunctive relief that would compel Metro West to take steps to reduce the risk of transmission of COVID-19 at the facility. . . . My review of this record amply supports the District Court's holding that Plaintiffs are likely to show their treatment amounted to deliberate indifference. Defendants acknowledge their subjective awareness of the objectively grave risk the COVID-19 pandemic poses to the safety of those detained at Metro West. But Defendants say they took reasonable steps, within the limits of their legal authority, to ensure detainee safety in the face of the COVID-19 threat. Unlike the majority, I see no abuse of discretion in the District Court's finding to the contrary. This record shows that Defendants knowingly maintained conditions that placed detainees at an impermissibly high risk of illness and death in two ways: first, by maintaining a dangerously high jail population; and second, by failing to implement needed safety measures that would reduce the risk of infection in that already unsafe population level. . . .The COVID-19 pandemic is a global health crisis that has taken the lives of thousands and strained every level of our society and government. But crises do not lower the constitutional limits on the conditions in which people may be confined against their will. People held in prisons and detention centers are among the most vulnerable to the ravages of this devastating illness. I do not understand the Fourteenth Amendment to permit the knowing and willful detention of human beings in circumstances that place them at great risk of death or grave illness. I would affirm the District Court Order granting Plaintiffs' motion for a preliminary injunction. I respectfully dissent.")

Piazza v. Jefferson County, Alabama, 923 F.3d 947, 952-55 (11th Cir. 2019) ("While the Fourth Amendment prevents the use of excessive force during arrests, . . . and the Eighth Amendment serves as the primary source of protection against excessive force after conviction, . . . it is the Fourteenth Amendment that protects those who exist in the in-between—pretrial detainees. . . That pretrial detainees fall within the Fourteenth Amendment's ambit dates to the Supreme Court's decision in Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 99 S.Ct. 1861, 60 L.Ed.2d 447 (1979). The Court explained there that the 'proper inquiry' when 'evaluating the constitutionality of conditions or restrictions of pretrial detention' is 'whether those conditions amount to punishment of the detainee.'. . . Although pretrial detainees' excessive-force claims have been analyzed under the Fourteenth Amendment since Bell, the constitutional inquiry—at least in this Circuit—has long resembled the one that governs prisoners' excessive-force claims under the Eighth Amendment. Historically, both prisoners and pretrial detainees needed to show not only that a jail official deliberately used excessive force, but also that the official did so 'maliciously or sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm.'. . All that changed a few years back, though, when the Supreme Court clarified that, unlike a prisoner bringing an Eighth Amendment excessive-force claim, a pretrial detainee raising a Fourteenth Amendment claim needn't prove an officer's subjective intent to harm but instead need show only that 'the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.'. . Harking back to Bell, the Kingsley Court explained that, unlike in Eighth Amendment cases, there is no need in the pretrial-detainee context to determine 'when punishment is unconstitutional' because a pretrial detainee has not yet been adjudicated guilty and thus may not be punished at all. . . Although, under Bell, impermissible 'punishment' could mean force deployed with a subjective, 'expressed intent to punish,' it also could mean force that, as an objective matter, is 'not rationally related to a legitimate governmental' purpose or is 'excessive in relation to that purpose.'. . After Kingsley, then, if force used against a pretrial detainee is more severe than is necessary to subdue him or otherwise achieve a permissible governmental objective, it constitutes 'punishment' and is therefore unconstitutional. Notably, inasmuch as it entails an inquiry into the objective reasonableness of the officers' actions, the Fourteenth Amendment standard has come to resemble the test that governs excessive-force claims brought by arrestees under the Fourth Amendment. . . Obviously, 'legitimate interests'—including the need to 'preserve internal order and discipline' and 'maintain institutional security'—may at times require jail officers to use force. . . And of course, officers facing disturbances are often forced to make 'split-second judgments' about the need for such force 'in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.'. . Because of this, we can't (and won't) evaluate a pretrial detainee's excessive-force challenge in a glib, post-hoc fashion or 'with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . Instead, we must do our best to consider the situation through the lens of 'a reasonable officer on the scene.'. .How do we know, then, when force is reasonable and when it is 'excessive in relation to its purpose'? Well, as relevant to this case, our decisions make one thing clear: 'Once a prisoner has stopped resisting there is no longer a need for force, so the use of force thereafter is disproportionate to the need.'. . . In other words, because force in the pretrial detainee context may be defensive or preventative—but never punitive—the continuing use of force is impermissible when a detainee is complying, has been forced to comply, or is clearly unable to comply. . . . Although we don't for a minute discount the difficult decisions that jail officers must make in the heat of a tussle, simply counting to eight aloud reveals the problem with Dukuzumuremyi's argument. In eight seconds, you can tie a shoe, sing the chorus of "Row, Row, Row Your Boat," or complete a qualified rodeo bull ride. And in eight seconds, we believe, any reasonable officer would have concluded that a detainee who lay inert on the floor, having soiled himself, was no longer putting up a fight. . . . At the end of the day the question before us is this: Is it excessive to tase for a second time a man who, as a result of an initial shock, is lying motionless on the floor and has wet himself, and who presented only a minimal threat to begin with? Undoubtedly, yes. We hold that, based on the allegations in Hunter's complaint, the force used against Hinkle was excessive, and thus unconstitutional.")

Jacoby v. Mack, 755 F. App'x 888, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("Because Kingsley was issued after the events underlying this litigation took place, it will not be considered in determining whether the conduct violated clearly established law at the time it occurred. . . . Danley makes clear that jailers cannot use force in the form of continued confinement that causes a compliant detainee to suffer continued effects of pepper spray. This preexisting precedent clearly established the unlawfulness of Appellees' conduct at the time it occurred. . . Because we conclude that McCants and Winky violated Mr. Jacoby's clearly established constitutional right, the district court erred in concluding that they were entitled to qualified immunity.")

Robinson v. Lambert, 753 F. App'x 777, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("At the time of the alleged conduct, the standard for excessive force was 'whether that force was applied in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline or maliciously or sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm.'. . But the factors used to assess whether force was excessive were the same. . . It is well established in our case law that an officer cannot continue to use force after there is no longer a need for it. . . .And we have made clear that if a detainee stops resisting, the use of force is no longer justified. . . . We find that this well-established principle applies to this case with obvious clarity. Based on Robinson's version of the facts, he was pinned against the wall with his arms behind his back while Officers Lambert and Peterkin pushed him back and forth for approximately 30 to 45 seconds. At no point during this interaction did he resist. After Robinson had been pinned against the wall for at least 30 seconds without resisting, any objectively reasonable officer would know that Robinson had been subdued. The continued use of force became unnecessary and unjustified. But Lambert proceeded to push Robinson face-down on the desk, and then shove him with enough force to break his arm. Based on then current law, this gratuitous display of force allows us to 'draw a reasonable inference' that Lambert acted with 'the very purpose of causing harm' and was consequently excessive. . . . We conclude that Lambert's use of force was a clearly established violation of Robinson's constitutional right. The law provided that the continued use of force after there is no longer a need for it is excessive. And the law provided that threatening to cause further injury indicates sadistic intent. Coupling Lambert's continued use of force after Robinson was subdued with his threat to inflict further injury, it is plain as a matter of obvious clarity that Lambert used force 'maliciously and sadistically with the very purpose of causing harm.'. .Thus, he is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Kraus v. Martin County Sheriff's Office, 753 F. App'x 668, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("Kraus misreads the district court's order. Although it is true that the court cited Shuford, it did so merely to state that '[i]n looking at what is clearly established, the Court is bound by the law at the time of the incident,' Shuford, 666 F. App'x at 817, which is clearly correct. . . The district court went on to state that, because the incident giving rise to this suit occurred before the Supreme Court's ruling in Kingsley, Kraus would have to show that it was clearly established that the officers' actions were unlawful under the pre-Kingsley 'sadistic and malicious' standard. That is a correct statement of the then-prevailing law, and we will not disturb the court's ruling on this ground.")

Johnson v. City of Bessemer, Alabama, No. 17-13122, 2018 WL 3359672, at *3 n.5 (11th Cir. July 10, 2018) (not reported) ("Johnson argues that she need only satisfy the objective component because of the Supreme Court's holding in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. ——, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015), 'that the appropriate standard for a pretrial detainee's excessive force claim is solely an objective one.' But Kingsley involved an excessive force claim, not a deliberate indifference to serious medical need claim. Id.; see also Nam Dang by & through Vina Dang v. Sheriff, Seminole Cty. Fla., 871 F.3d 1272, 1279 n.2 (11th Cir. 2017) (refusing to reach the issue of whether Kingsley requires a pretrial detainee to satisfy only the objective component in a deliberate indifference claim, but stating that because 'Kingsley involved an excessive-force claim, not a claim of inadequate medical treatment due to deliberate indifference,' it is not 'squarely on point with and does not actually abrogate or directly conflict with' our prior panel precedent on deliberate indifference claims) (quotation marks omitted). Kingsley does not undermine our earlier Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference precedents.")

Thomas v. City of Jacksonville, 731 F. App'x 877, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("Plaintiffs allege under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 that Defendants were deliberately indifferent to Thomas' medical needs, thus violating his constitutional rights. A pretrial detainee's deliberate-indifference claims '[arise] under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment rather than the Eighth Amendment,' but are nevertheless 'subject to the same scrutiny as if they had been brought as deliberate indifference claims under the Eighth Amendment.'")

McCroden v. County of Volusia, No. 17-12331, 2018 WL 817869, at *1 & n.1 (11th Cir. Feb. 12, 2018) (not reported) ("McCroden alleges that the Officers used excessive force against him in violation of his Fourteenth Amendment rights. In deciding whether force deliberately used against a pretrial detainee is constitutionally excessive, 'a pretrial detainee must show only that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.'. . Kingsley abrogated the standard we previously used, which required the plaintiff to show that the defendant applied the force 'maliciously or sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm,' see Bozeman v. Orum, 422 F.3d 1265, 1271 (11th Cir. 2005). . . .On remand in Kingsley, the Seventh Circuit correctly noted that 'before and after the Supreme Court's decision in [Kingsley], the standards for the amount of force that can be permissibly employed remain the same.' Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 832 (7th Cir. 2015) (per curiam). '[T]he law clearly established that the amount of force had to be reasonable ....' Id. at 833.")

Nam Dang, by and through Vina Dang v. Sheriff, Seminole Cty. Florida, 871 F.3d 1272, 1279 & n.2 (11th Cir. 2017) ("As a pretrial detainee, Dang alleges inadequate medical care under the Fourteenth Amendment rather than the Eighth Amendment. . . Nevertheless, Dang's claims are evaluated under the same standard as a prisoner's claim of inadequate care under the Eighth Amendment. . . . Dang argues that following Kingsley v. Hendrickson, . . . a pretrial detainee alleging constitutionally deficient medical care need not show deliberate indifference. We cannot and need not reach this question. First, Kingsley involved an excessive-force claim, not a claim of inadequate medical treatment due to deliberate indifference. Therefore, it is not 'squarely on point' with and does not 'actually abrogate or directly conflict with,' United States v. Kaley, . . . our prior precedent identifying the standard we apply in this opinion to Dang's claim. Second, even if we were free to consider what, if any, implications Kingsley might have for the claims of pretrial detainees involving inadequate medical treatment due to deliberate indifference, Kingsley could not help Dang. Kingsley itself notes that even when it comes to pretrial detainees, 'liability for negligently inflicted harm is categorically beneath the threshold of constitutional due process.'. . In Dang's case, as tragic as the facts are, all we have is, at most, negligence. So regardless of whether Kingsley could be construed to have affected the standard for pretrial detainees' claims involving inadequate medical treatment due to deliberate indifference, whatever any resulting standard might be, it could not affect Dang's case.")

Johnson v. Conway, 688 F. App'x 700, 706, 709, 707 n.2 (11th Cir. 2017) ("Here, like the district court, albeit for different reasons, we do not reach the question of whether Johnson's constitutional rights were violated because he has not shown that the detention officers violated a clearly established right. . . . It bears repeating that 'generally no bright line exists for identifying when force is excessive; we have therefore concluded that unless a controlling and materially similar case declares the official's conduct unconstitutional, a defendant is usually entitled to qualified immunity.'. . No 'materially similar case' declares the detention officers' conduct unconstitutional, and the broad principles of law on which Johnson relies do not apply with 'obvious clarity' to the specific situation facing the detention officers. . . Because Johnson has not shown that the detention officers violated a clearly established right in the specific context of this case, we affirm the grant of qualified immunity to Revels, Bailey, and Davis. . . .Kingsley was decided after the incident giving rise to this case and so is not directly relevant to the inquiry of whether the law was 'clearly established at the time of the misconduct.'. . For this inquiry we look to our pre-existing law, which applied the subjective-malice standard abrogated by Kingsley. . . The district court concluded that, because the evidence was insufficient to meet the subjective standard (and therefore to prove a constitutional violation under the prior precedent), the officers could not have been on notice that their conduct was unlawful. Appearing to concede that he cannot meet the subjective-malice standard, Johnson contends that Kingsley 'did nothing to change the standard of conduct for detention officers' and that pre-existing law in this Circuit clearly established an objective standard of conduct that applies with obvious clarity in this case. See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 832–33 (7th Cir. 2015) (holding that "before and after the Supreme Court's decision in [Kingsley], the standards for the amount of force that can be permissibly employed remain the same"). For instance, since before the time of this incident, as both parties appear to agree, this Circuit applied the same objective factors to Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims as the Supreme Court articulated in Kingsley. See Cockrell v. Sparks, 510 F.3d 1307, 1311 (11th Cir. 2007). Likewise, the broad principles of law articulated in Ort, Danley, and Williams, are largely the same as those articulated in Kingsley. Accordingly, we assume without deciding that Johnson is correct that an objective standard of conduct was clearly established by pre-existing case law. Cf. Kingsley, 135 S. Ct. at 2474–75 (explaining that "the use of an objective standard adequately protects an officer who acts in good faith"). It makes no difference to the ultimate outcome, however, because Johnson has not shown that the broad principles of law on which he relies clearly established the objective unreasonableness of the detention officers' conduct, nor has he shown that the evidence is sufficient to meet the subjective 'malicious or sadistic' standard.")

Shuford v. Conway, 666 F. App'x 811, 817 & n.1 (11th Cir. 2016) (per curiam) ("Kingsley's 2015 ruling requiring a pretrial detainee to show that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable, came after the incidents that are the subject of this suit, so it does not govern our 'clearly-established' analysis here. However, since before the time of these incidents, this Circuit applied the same objective factors to Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claims as the Supreme Court articulated in Kingsley. . . See Cockrell v. Sparks, 510 F.3d 1307, 1311 (11th Cir. 2007) (per curiam). . . . We agree with what the Seventh Circuit noted on remand in Kingsley—that the Supreme Court's holding only eliminated the requirement that a plaintiff show the official acted with subjective malice, not 'the standard[ ] for the amount of force that can be permissibly employed.' Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 801 F.3d 828, 832–33 (7th Cir. 2015). '[B]efore and after the Supreme Court's decision in this case, the standards for the amount of force that can be permissibly employed remain the same .... the law clearly established that the amount of force had to be reasonable ....'(emphasis in orginal). . . . And in any event, the Supreme Court reminded us that the central holding of Kingsley— that 'a pretrial detainee can prevail by providing only objective evidence'— had been the law since Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 99 S. Ct. 1861 (1979).")

Jacoby v. Baldwin County, 666 F. App'x 759, 764-66 (11th Cir. 2016) ("The standard we previously used to determine whether a defendant used excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment — which required the plaintiff to show that the defendant applied the force 'maliciously or sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm,' see Bozeman v. Orum, 422 F.3d 1265, 1271 (11th Cir. 2005) — has been abrogated by Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. —, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015). In that opinion, the Supreme Court held that 'a pretrial detainee must show only that the force ... used against him was objectively unreasonable.'. . As a result, we proceed with the Fourteenth Amendment violation inquiry of the qualified immunity analysis under Kingsley's objective unreasonableness standard. The evidence construed in Jacoby's favor shows that after he was pepper sprayed, his face was rubbed in pepper spray on the floor, washed with water for two to three seconds and then he was left alone in the restraint chair for more than eight hours while still in his pepper-sprayed clothes. During that time he urinated on himself and cried for help because he burned from his pepper-sprayed and urine-soaked clothing. . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Jacoby, as we must at this stage, there is a genuine issue of material fact about whether Rowell and Keers' actions were objectively unreasonable and in violation of Jacoby's Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . Rowell and Keers contend that even if there is a question of fact about whether they violated Jacoby's constitutional rights, they are still entitled to qualified immunity because the alleged unlawfulness of their conduct was not clearly established at the time it occurred. While Kingsley's objective unreasonableness standard governs the existence of a constitutional violation, that decision was issued after the restraint chair incident took place, so it plays no part in our determining whether the unlawfulness of Rowell and Keers' conduct was clearly established at the time it occurred. . . Instead, in order to determine whether the clearly established requirement is met in this case, we look to pre-Kingsley case law, which applied the old 'sadistic or malicious' standard for excessive force. Our analysis here is governed by our decision in Danley v. Allen, 540 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2008), overruled on other grounds as recognized in Randall v. Scott, 610 F.3d 701, 709–10 (11th Cir. 2010). In the Danley case, the defendant-officers sprayed the plaintiff with pepper spray for three to five seconds, pushed him into a small, poorly ventilated cell, and closed the door. . . After twenty minutes (ten of which the plaintiff spent begging to be let out), the jailers removed him from the cell, allowed him to take a two minute shower, and then placed him in a larger, but still poorly ventilated, group cell. . . The plaintiff continued to suffer from the pepper spray's effects and eventually 'almost blacked out' from breathing difficulties. . . After at least twelve hours of suffering, the plaintiff was released from the jail. . . This Court held that the officers' use of force against the Danley plaintiff was excessive and in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, noting that '[w]hen jailers continue to use substantial force against a prisoner who has clearly stopped resisting — whether because he has decided to become compliant, he has been subdued, or he is otherwise incapacitated — that use of force is excessive.'. . And when an inmate has stopped resisting 'there is no longer a need for force, so the use of force thereafter is disproportionate to the need.'. . The Danley decision's legal principle that jailers cannot continue to use force against a compliant inmate clearly established the unlawfulness of Rowell and Keers' alleged conduct. . . The facts as they stand at this point in the proceedings are that Rowell and Keers left Jacoby unattended in the restraint chair after pepper-spraying him, rubbing his face in pepper spray on the floor, and providing clearly inadequate decontamination. They left him there for more than eight hours in his pepper-sprayed and urine-soaked clothes with no opportunity for relief. . . Those circumstances create a fact question about whether there was an excessive continuation of the use of force after Jacoby was already subdued or restrained, and our decision in Danley clearly establishes the right to be free from that kind of excessive force. The district court erred in granting summary judgment to Rowell and Keers on Jacoby's excessive force claims against Rowell and Keers.")

Melton v. Abston, 841 F.3d 1207, 1220, 1223 & n.2 (11th Cir. 2016) ("As a pretrial detainee at Pickens County Jail, Melton's rights arose under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment rather than the Eighth Amendment. . . Nonetheless, Melton's claims are 'subject to the same scrutiny as if they had been brought as deliberate indifference claims under the Eighth Amendment.'. . . A plaintiff claiming deliberate indifference to a serious medical need must prove: (1) subjective knowledge of a risk of serious harm; (2) disregard of that risk; (3) by conduct that is more than mere negligence. . . . In Townsend v. Jefferson Cty., 601 F.3d 1152, 1158 (11th Cir. 2010), a panel of this Court stated that under Cottrell v. Caldwell, 85 F.3d 1480, 1490 (11th Cir. 1996) and Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 847 (1994), 'a claim of deliberate indifference requires proof of more than gross negligence.' We disagree with that conclusion for three main reasons. First, the 'more than mere negligence' standard in McElligott is more consistent with Farmer than the 'more than gross negligence' standard in Townsend. Farmer, 511 U.S. at 847 (holding that deliberate indifference requires subjective risk of serious harm and disregard of that risk by 'failing to take reasonable measures to abate it'). Second, the phrase 'more than gross negligence' is not found in either Cottrell or Farmer. Third, the panel in Cottrell found no deliberate indifference where the plaintiff failed to prove the 'subjective intent element prescribed in Farmer' and, therefore, did not reach whether Farmer requires 'more than mere negligence' or 'more than gross negligence.'. . Because McElligott is the earliest Eleventh Circuit case after Farmer to directly address the degree of culpability required under Farmer, we must follow it.")

Jacoby v. Baldwin County, 666 F. App'x 759, 764-66 (11th Cir. 2016) ("The standard we previously used to determine whether a defendant used excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment — which required the plaintiff to show that the defendant applied the force 'maliciously or sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm,' see Bozeman v. Orum, 422 F.3d 1265, 1271 (11th Cir. 2005) — has been abrogated by Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. —, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015). In that opinion, the Supreme Court held that 'a pretrial detainee must show only that the force ... used against him was objectively unreasonable.'. . As a result, we proceed with the Fourteenth Amendment violation inquiry of the qualified immunity analysis under Kingsley's objective unreasonableness standard. The evidence construed in Jacoby's favor shows that after he was pepper sprayed, his face was rubbed in pepper spray on the floor, washed with water for two to three seconds and then he was left alone in the restraint chair for more than eight hours while still in his pepper-sprayed clothes. During that time he urinated on himself and cried for help because he burned from his pepper-sprayed and urine-soaked clothing. . . . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Jacoby, as we must at this stage, there is a genuine issue of material fact about whether Rowell and Keers' actions were objectively unreasonable and in violation of Jacoby's Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. . . Rowell and Keers contend that even if there is a question of fact about whether they violated Jacoby's constitutional rights, they are still entitled to qualified immunity because the alleged unlawfulness of their conduct was not clearly established at the time it occurred. While Kingsley's objective unreasonableness standard governs the existence of a constitutional violation, that decision was issued after the restraint chair incident took place, so it plays no part in our determining whether the unlawfulness of Rowell and Keers' conduct was clearly established at the time it occurred. . . Instead, in order to determine whether the clearly established requirement is met in this case, we look to pre-Kingsley case law, which applied the old 'sadistic or malicious' standard for excessive force. Our analysis here is governed by our decision in Danley v. Allen, 540 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir. 2008), overruled on other grounds as recognized in Randall v. Scott, 610 F.3d 701, 709–10 (11th Cir. 2010). In the Danley case, the defendant-officers sprayed the plaintiff with pepper spray for three to five seconds, pushed him into a small, poorly ventilated cell, and closed the door. . . After twenty minutes (ten of which the plaintiff spent begging to be let out), the jailers removed him from the cell, allowed him to take a two minute shower, and then placed him in a larger, but still poorly ventilated, group cell. . . The plaintiff continued to suffer from the pepper spray's effects and eventually 'almost blacked out' from breathing difficulties. . . After at least twelve hours of suffering, the plaintiff was released from the jail. . . This Court held that the officers' use of force against the Danley plaintiff was excessive and in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, noting that '[w]hen jailers continue to use substantial force against a prisoner who has clearly stopped resisting — whether because he has decided to become compliant, he has been subdued, or he is otherwise incapacitated — that use of force is excessive.'. . And when an inmate has stopped resisting 'there is no longer a need for force, so the use of force thereafter is disproportionate to the need.'. . The Danley decision's legal principle that jailers cannot continue to use force against a compliant inmate clearly established the unlawfulness of Rowell and Keers' alleged conduct. . . The facts as they stand at this point in the proceedings are that Rowell and Keers left Jacoby unattended in the restraint chair after pepper-spraying him, rubbing his face in pepper spray on the floor, and providing clearly inadequate decontamination. They left him there for more than eight hours in his pepper-sprayed and urine-soaked clothes with no opportunity for relief. . . Those circumstances create a fact question about whether there was an excessive continuation of the use of force after Jacoby was already subdued or restrained, and our decision in Danley clearly establishes the right to be free from that kind of excessive force. The district court erred in granting summary judgment to Rowell and Keers on Jacoby's excessive force claims against Rowell and Keers.")

McBride v. Houston County Health Care Authority, 658 F. App'x 991, 996 n.5 (11th Cir. 2016) ("The standard for deliberate indifference claims under the Fourteenth Amendment is the same as the standard applicable for prison inmates under the Eighth Amendment. Cottrell v. Caldwell, 85 F.3d 1480, 1490 (11th Cir. 1996). Thus, "decisional law involving prison inmates applies equally to cases involving arrestees or pretrial detainees.")

Jacoby v. Baldwin County, 835 F.3d 1338, 1345-46 & n.3 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Bell effectively creates a two-part test. First, a court must ask whether any 'legitimate goal' was served by the prison conditions. Second, it must ask whether the conditions are 'reasonably related' to that goal. And, to defeat Sheriff Mack's claim of qualified immunity, Mr. Jacoby must point to precedent that would give Sheriff Mack 'fair warning' that these requirements would not be met under the conditions of confinement Mr. Jacoby says he experienced. . . .[fn.3 In Hamm v. DeKalb County, 774 F.2d 1567 (11th Cir. 1985), this Court held that 'in regard to providing pretrial detainees with such basic necessities as food, living space, and medical care the minimum standard allowed by the due process clause is the same as that allowed by the eighth amendment for convicted persons.'. . Relying on Hamm, the Magistrate Judge's Report and Recommendation (which the District Court adopted) applied the Eighth Amendment's subjective deliberate indifference standard to Mr. Jacoby's due process claim. That is, the District Court found that Mr. Jacoby had not established: (1) an 'objective[ ], sufficiently serious' risk of harm, and (2) 'deliberate indifference' to that risk by prison officials. Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 834, 114 S. Ct. 1970, 1977 (1994) (quotations omitted). We conclude that the outcome in this case is the same under either Hamm or Bell, and so apply the Supreme Court's articulation of the standard for pretrial detainees from Bell on appeal. However, we need not decide Mr. Jacoby's claim that the Eighth Amendment's subjective deliberate indifference standard conflicts with Bell's objective 'punishment' standard]. . . . We hold that Mr. Jacoby has failed to make this showing. He has pointed to no caselaw clearly establishing that putting him in a cell with two other inmates was unconstitutional punishment in violation of Bell. To the contrary, in Bell itself the Supreme Court held that 'double-bunking' (placing two inmates in a cell intended for one) does not constitute punishment. . . Neither has Mr. Jacoby pointed to any caselaw clearly establishing that having to sleep on a mattress on the floor violated his constitutional rights. In fact, in Hamm, this Court held that '[t]he fact that [a pretrial detainee] temporarily had to sleep upon a mattress on the floor or on a table is not necessarily a constitutional violation.'. . .Taken in the light most favorable to him, Mr. Jacoby's allegations establish that he was temporarily forced to sleep on a mattress on the floor near the toilet. . . His circumstances are not enough like those described in Chandler, Brooks, and Jordan for those cases to clearly establish that his conditions of confinement were unconstitutional. We therefore affirm the District Court's ruling on Mr. Jacoby's substantive due process claim.")

Cole v. Esely, No. 3:20-CV-935-MMH-PDB, 2022 WL 218483, at *4 n.7 (M.D. Fla. Jan. 25, 2022) ("In Johnson v. Breeden and Fennell v. Gilstrap, . . . the Eleventh Circuit concluded that qualified immunity is not available for excessive force claims arising under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, reasoning that '"the subjective element required to establish it is so extreme that every conceivable set of circumstances in which this constitutional violation occurs is clearly established to be a violation of the Constitution…."'. . . Recently, in light of Kingsley v. Hendrickson, . . . the Eleventh Circuit abrogated this exception for excessive force claims under the Fourteenth Amendment, but said that 'the Johnson/Fennel exception continues to apply to Eighth Amendment claims' such as the one here. Patel v. Lanier Cnty., Ga., 969 F.3d 1173, 1185–86 (11th Cir. 2020).")

Howard v. Wilkinson, No. 617CV1473ORL40GJK, 2018 WL 1583638, at *7-8 & n.6 (M.D. Fla. Apr. 2, 2018) ("The Officer Defendants next argue that there 'was no clearly established law proscribing a takedown of a resisting detainee.'. . They insist that, in the aftermath of the Kingsley decision clarifying the elements of a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim, there was 'a dearth of on-point factual law in the pretrial detainee context' informing officers of what they can and cannot do. . .That is, in the absence of opinions applying Kingsley in factually similar cases, there was no 'clearly established' use of force law the Officer Defendants could have violated. This argument is, of course, absurd. 'For a constitutional right to be clearly established, its contours "must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right."'. . Even in novel factual circumstances, 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law....' . . . So a right can be clearly established before a Court speaks directly to the precise factual circumstances. At the time of the incident, the Eleventh Circuit had firmly established the right of a non-resisting individual to (i) be free from being pepper sprayed gratuitously, and (ii) not be slammed head first into a hard floor. . . Furthermore, the Officer Defendants overstate the 'upheaval' in use of force caselaw occasioned by the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley. . . That case merely eliminated the requirement imposed by several Circuit Courts—including the Eleventh—that plaintiffs prove an officer's subjective awareness that their use of force was unreasonable to make out an excessive force claim. . . It did not otherwise abrogate the decisional excessive force law in this Circuit. In light of the continued viability of excessive force cases pre-dating Kingsley, a reasonable official occupying the Officer Defendants' position would understand that their actions violated Mr. Howard's Fourteenth Amendment rights. . . This conclusion is fortified by the extreme force alleged in the Complaint and lack of a compelling justification to use such force. . . .It is worth noting that the allegations of the Complaint might plausibly state a claim for excessive use of force under the pre-Kingsley Eleventh Circuit law, which required that officials act 'maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'. . In such an inquiry, Fennell instructed courts to consider factors similar to the Kingsley factors. . . ("[1] the need for the application of force; [2] the relationship between the need and the amount of force that was used; [3] the extent of the injury inflicted upon the prisoner; [4] the extent of the threat to the safety of staff and inmates; and [5] any efforts made to temper the severity of a forceful response."). That is to say, even under pre-Kingsley law (which was more favorable to officer-defendants), reasonable officials in the Officer Defendants' shoes would have been on notice that their conduct violated Mr. Howard's Fourteenth Amendment rights. The Court therefore has no difficulty finding that they would have been on notice post-Kingsley.")

Hutchinson v. Cunningham, No. 2:17-CV-185-WKW, 2018 WL 1474532, at *4 n.5 (M.D. Ala. Mar. 26, 2018) ("Mr. Hutchinson asserts that the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2446 (2015), abrogates this line of case law and contends that an objective standard should apply to his Fourteenth Amendment claims. . . But he also correctly notes that the Eleventh Circuit has stated, albeit in dictum, that Kingsley does not affect medical care cases. See Dang v. Sheriff, Seminole Cnty. Fla., 871 F.3d 1272, 1279 n.2 (11th Cir. 2017).")

Grawbadger v. Geo Care, LLC, No. 214CV432FTM29MRM, 2017 WL 2600718, at *3 (M.D. Fla. June 15, 2017) ("The Court recognizes that the FCCC is not a prison and Plaintiff is not a prisoner. . . Instead, an individual who has been involuntarily civilly committed has 'liberty interests under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to safety, freedom from bodily restraint, and minimally adequate or reasonable training' as required to ensure safety and freedom from restraint. . . Indeed, the Court recognizes that residents at the FCCC are afforded a higher standard of care than those who are criminally committed. . .Nonetheless, 'the Eighth Amendment's deliberate indifference jurisprudence is applicable to the Fourteenth Amendment due process rights of pre-trial detainees.'. . Consequently, the Court examines cases addressing medical deliberate indifference claims under the Eighth Amendment for guidance in evaluating Plaintiff's claims.")

Bell v. Advanced Corr. Healthcare, Inc., No. 2:16-CV-278-TMP, 2016 WL 7242170, at *3 n.6 (N.D. Ala. Dec. 15, 2016) ("Because the plaintiff was a pretrial detainee at the time in question, her claims are analyzed under the Fourteenth Amendment. See, e.g., Cottrell v. Caldwell, 85 F.3d 1480, 1490 (11th Cir. 1996) ("Claims involving the mistreatment of arrestees or pretrial detainees in custody are governed by the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause"). Nevertheless, in regard to providing pretrial detainees with such basic necessities as food, living space, and medical care, the minimum standard allowed by the due process clause is the same as that allowed by the Eighth Amendment for convicted persons, which is 'deliberate indifference' to the need for medical care. Hamm v. DeKalb County, 774 F.2d 1567, 1574 (11th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 475 U.S. 1096 (1986); Melton v. Abston, ––F.3d ––, 2016 WL 6819670, at *6 (11th Cir. Nov. 18, 2016). Her claims related to the use of excessive force, however, are analyzed under an 'objective reasonableness' standard. *Kingsley v. Hendrick*son, ––U.S. ––, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2473, 192 L.Ed. 2d 416 (2015).")

Rojo v. Holderbaum, No. 8:15-CV-1982-T-33JSS, 2016 WL 7116207, at *8 (M.D. Fla. Dec. 7, 2016) ("[T]he Court notes that, '[w]hile Kingsley's objective unreasonableness standard governs the existence of a constitutional violation, that decision was issued after the [alleged violation] took place, so it plays no part in [the Court's] determin[ation of] whether the unlawfulness of [Holderbaum's] conduct was clearly established at the time it occurred.' Jacoby v. Baldwin Cty., No. 14-12773, 2016 WL 6575054, at *5 (11th Cir. Nov. 7, 2016) (citing Belcher v. City of Foley, 30 F.3d 1390, 1400 n.9 (11th Cir. 1994)). 'Instead, in order to determine whether the clearly established requirement is met in this case, [the Court] look[s] to pre-Kingsley case law, which applied the old 'sadistic or malicious' standard for excessive force.'")

Baker v. Jump, No. 2:16-CV-37, 2016 WL 4468559, at *4–5 (S.D. Ga. Aug. 23, 2016) ("Prior to the United States Supreme Court's recent decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, ___ U.S. ____, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (Aug. 11, 2015), it was well-settled in the Eleventh Circuit that the same standards applied to a denial of adequate medical care claim brought by a pretrial detainee under the Due Process Clause as a claim brought by a convicted prisoner under the Eighth Amendment. . .

However, in Kingsley, an excessive force case, the Supreme Court rejected the defendant officers' application of a subjective standard and reliance upon a pair of Eighth Amendment decisions. ___ U.S. at ___, 135 S. Ct. at 2475. The Court noted that the language of the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause 'differs' from the Due Process Clause and that 'pretrial detainees (unlike convicted prisoners) cannot be punished at all[.]'. . Since the Supreme Court decided Kingsley, lower courts have struggled with the question of whether Eighth Amendment standards apply to a pretrial detainee's claim of inadequate medical care. . .The Court need not resolve these questions in this case. Regardless of the application of a subjective or objective standard, Plaintiff has plausibly stated that Defendants Gunderson, Brooks, Hall, and Juran failed to provide Plaintiff medical care and were deliberately indifferent to his health and safety. Plaintiff contends that, on February 11, 2016, all of these Defendants allowed Plaintiff to lie on the floor in his own urine while Plaintiff was in intense pain for over an hour. It appears that Plaintiff suffered from a serious medical need during this time, as he states he had a broken hip and fractured elbow. . . Further, his injuries required treatment at two hospitals and surgery. Additionally, as to Defendant Hall, Plaintiff claims that she was deliberately indifferent to Plaintiff's serious medical conditions on March 4, 2016, by forcibly removing his sling from his shoulder causing Plaintiff increased pain and injury. Thus, accepting Plaintiff's allegations as true, as it must at this stage, the Court finds that Plaintiff has stated plausible claims against Defendants Gunderson, Brooks, Hall, and Juran.")

Queen v. Collier, No. 5:15-CV-01109-MHH, 2016 WL 4073946, at *3-4 (N.D. Ala. Aug. 1, 2016) ("Relying on the Supreme Court's recent decision, Kingsley v. Hendrickson, --- U.S. ---, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), Mr. Queen argues that the Court need not decide which constitutional amendment applies to his excessive force claim because a claim under either amendment is measured against an objective reasonableness standard. The Court disagrees. In Kingsley, the Supreme Court stated that for a pretrial detainee to prove an excessive force claim, he must show that the officer's use of force was objectively unreasonable. Although Kingsley provided that excessive force claims under the Fourteenth Amendment are governed by an objective reasonableness standard, the Court did not collapse the standard for arrestee and pretrial detainee excessive force cases into a single standard. Instead, the Kingsley Court stated that in applying the 'objectively unreasonable' aspect of the pretrial detainee standard, courts must not only look to Graham's 'facts and circumstances' inquiry, but also account for the 'legitimate interests that stem from [the government's] need to manage the facility in which the individual is detained,' appropriately deferring to 'policies and practices that in th[e] judgment' of jail officials 'are needed to preserve internal order and discipline and to maintain institutional security.'. . Therefore, the Court must identify which constitutional standard applies to Mr. Queen's excessive force claim. . . In the Eleventh Circuit, '[t]he precise point at which a seizure ends (for purposes of Fourth Amendment coverage) and at which pretrial detention begins [for purposes of Fourteenth Amendment coverage] is not settled....' Hicks v. Moore, 422 F.3d 1246, 1254 (11th Cir. 2005). The period of time between an arrest and the beginning of pretrial detention is known as the 'twilight zone.' . . Because Officer Collier's use of force occurred after the arresting officers surrendered Mr. Queen to jail personnel but before detention officers finished the booking process, this case falls squarely in the twilight zone. In twilight zone cases, to identify the applicable constitutional standard, a court must decide whether the force occurred closer to the arrest or the detention end of the spectrum. . . . The Garrett and Fennell opinions demonstrate that the role of the arresting officer weighs heavily in the constitutional analysis of an arrestee's claim. In this case, the officers who arrested Mr. Queen had surrendered Mr. Queen to the custody of Officer Collier at the Morgan County Jail before the confrontation at issue occurred. Although Mr. Queen had not been fully processed at the jail when Officer Collier restrained him and took him to the ground, Mr. Queen had been in detention for a significant period of time. The force in the instant case occurred almost two hours after Mr. Queen arrived at the jail. (In contrast, the force at issue in Fennell occurred just moments after the plaintiff arrived at the jail.) The arrest was over; detention had begun. Considering the foregoing, the Court finds that Mr. Queen was a pretrial detainee at the time of the confrontation with Officer Collier and that the Fourteenth Amendment governs Mr. Queen's excessive force claim.")

Perez v. Wicker, No. 2:14-CV-558-FTM-29CM, 2016 WL 3543502, at *3 (M.D. Fla. June 29, 2016) ("The analysis under the Fourteenth Amendment is the same for both pretrial detainees and those civilly committed. . . Accordingly, the Supreme Court's recent decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), provides the applicable standard for claims of excessive force against a civilly committed detainee.")

Crowley v. Scott, No. 5:14-CV-326 (MTT), 2016 WL 2993174, at *7 (M.D. Ga. May 23, 2016) ("It is undisputed that Scott was acting within his discretionary authority, and the Court has concluded that a reasonable jury could find that Scott violated Crowley's constitutional rights by using excessive force. Thus, Scott is entitled to qualified immunity only if the law was not clearly established that his conduct was unlawful. To overcome Scott's qualified immunity defense, Crowley cites the former rule for Fourteenth Amendment excessive force cases: a plaintiff can overcome the defense of qualified immunity simply by establishing the violation of his constitutional rights. . . This was the rule because 'the subjective element required to establish [a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim was] so extreme that every conceivable set of circumstances in which this constitutional violations occurs is clearly established to be a violation of the Constitution.'. . However, because the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley eliminated the subjective element in Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claims, a plaintiff asserting the claim must establish a constitutional violation and that the defendant violated clearly established law. . . Scott argues 'the law was not clearly established that the amount of force used was excessive in response to the resistance [Crowley] offered in response to the directions Scott had given him.'. . At the time of the events in this case, the law was clearly established that a handcuffed, non-resisting, and otherwise compliant person has a 'right to be free from excessive force.'. . Therefore, if a jury credits Crowley's version that Scott used a leg sweep while Crowley was handcuffed, non-resistant, and otherwise not creating the disturbance that Scott described, then no reasonable officer in Scott's position could have believed that Scott's use of force was lawful. . . . Accordingly, Scott is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Tims v. Golden, No. CV 15-0516-WS-B, 2016 WL 1312585, at *8 (S.D. Ala. Apr. 4, 2016) ("The Court concludes that Kingsley applies retroactively. The Acoff Court stressed that Garner overruled none of the Supreme Court's prior precedents and that it did not contradict near-unanimous lower court authority. . . So here, Kingsley did not overrule any Supreme Court precedent; on the contrary, the Court emphasized that its ruling 'is consistent with our precedent.' . . Moreover, far from upsetting nearly unanimous appellate rulings, the Kingsley Court noted the split of appellate authority as to the proper standard. . . It is thus the objective Kingsley standard that must be applied to the plaintiff's claim of excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment. And because that standard applies, the burden on the plaintiff is to show that it was clearly established, in October 2013, that Officer Golden's tasing of the plaintiff was objectively unreasonable under the circumstances then presented. As with her privacy claim, this is a most formidable hurdle, given the circumstances she alleges in her complaint, . . . and it is made even more so by the absence of Eleventh Circuit authority employing the objective standard before Kingsley introduced that standard in 2015. At any rate, the plaintiff's complete failure to address her burden is fatal to her claim.") Thomley, II v. Bennett, No. 5:14-CV-73, 2016 WL 498436, at *7-8 (S.D. Ga. Feb. 8, 2016) ("In light of the Kingsley decision, several courts have discussed its application to claims made by pretrial detainees involving deliberate indifference allegations. . . However, it does not appear that Kingsley provides the standard which is to be applied in this case. . . . The Eleventh Circuit has yet to issue a ruling on the proper standard to employ in analyzing a pretrial detainee's deliberate indifference claim in light of the Kingsley decision. Because of this, the Court applies the standards in place at the time giving rise to the events set forth in Plaintiff's Complaint. First, the parties have not been put on notice the Court would apply a different standard to Plaintiff's deliberate indifference claims and thus, have not briefed the issue on the basis of an objective reasonableness test. See Hentschel v. Rockingham Cty. Dep't of Corr., Case No. 15-cv-215-SM, 2015 WL 8489610, at *1 n.1 (D.N.H. Nov. 20, 2015) (noting it is unclear what standard to use for a pretrial detainee's deliberate indifference claim in Kingsley's wake but declining to apply Kingsley because the parties had not briefed that issue). In addition, even if a pretrial detainee's deliberate indifference claims are to be analyzed using the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause rather than the Eighth Amendment's deliberate indifference standard, the facts of this case lead to the conclusion Defendants nevertheless would be entitled to summary judgment. As discussed in this Report, infra., Plaintiff fails to establish genuine disputes as to any fact material to his deliberate indifference claims under an objectively reasonable standard. Further, because the standard applicable at the time giving rise to Plaintiff's Complaint was the Eighth Amendment's deliberate indifference standard, Defendants would likely be entitled to qualified immunity, as Kingsley was not the clearly established law at that time. Ross v. Corr. Officers John &Jane Does 1–5, 610 F. App'x 75, 77 n.1 (2d Cir. 2015) ("Because our focus, in analyzing whether qualified immunity applies, is on whether the right asserted by Ross was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, we need not address Kingsley's possible implications for deliberate indifference claims brought by pre-trial detainees."); see also Bilal v. Geo Care, LLC, Case No. 2:14-cv-422-FtM-38MRM, 2016 WL 345514, at *6 (M.D. Fla. Jan. 28, 2016) (recognizing the Kingsley decision and stating, "[i]n the context of conditions of confinement cases, the Eighth Amendment is concerned with deprivations of essentials, food, medical care, or sanitation or other conditions intolerable for prison confinement. ... The relevant state of mind for a condition claim is deliberate indifference.") (citations omitted).")

Rojo v. Holderbaum, No. 8:15-CV-1982-T-33JSS, 2015 WL 9302844, at *3-5 (M.D. Fla. Dec. 22, 2015) ("A brief discussion of the impact of the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 2472-73 (2015), abrogating Bozeman v. Orum, 422 F.3d 1265 (11th Cir. 2005), is required. Eleventh Circuit precedent allowed a plaintiff alleging excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment to overcome qualified immunity by only satisfying the first prong, i.e., that a constitutional violation occurred. Fennell v. Gilstrap, 559 F.3d 1212, 1216-17 (11th Cir. 2009) (citing Johnson v. Breeden, 280 F.3d 1308, 1321-22 (11th Cir. 2002)). This rule was created 'because, for an excessive-force violation of the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments, "the subjective element required to establish it is so extreme that every conceivable set of circumstances in which this constitutional violation occurs is clearly established to be a violation of the Constitution."'. . However, the Supreme Court in Kingsley held 'that a pretrial detainee must show only that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively reasonable.'. . Thus, now that the subjective inquiry is no longer a part of an excessive-force claim under the Fourteenth Amendment, a plaintiff alleging such a claim must satisfy both prongs. . . . Upon review of the Amended Complaint, the Court determines Rojo has sufficiently alleged facts demonstrating that the right was clearly established. The Amended Complaint alleges, and again this Court must accept the allegations as true at this stage, that Rojo was not actively resisting . . . Eleventh Circuit case law holds that using force on a non-resisting person is excessive. . . Therefore, for purposes of the pending Motion to Dismiss, the Court determines Rojo has sufficiently alleged facts to carry his burden.")

Esposito v. Stone, No. 8:14-CV-2414-T-33EAJ, 2015 WL 5440599, at *8-9 (M.D. Fla. Sept. 15, 2015) (Applying the Kingsley factors, "[t]he Court has determined that a reasonable jury could find that a constitutional violation occurred. The next inquiry is whether the constitutional violation was clearly established. In determining whether a right is clearly established, '[t]he relevant, dispositive inquiry ... is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . .The Eleventh Circuit has explained, 'Claims involving the mistreatment of arrestees or pretrial detainees in custody are governed by the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause instead of the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause, which applies to such claims by convicted prisoners.'. . 'However, the applicable standard is the same, so decision law involving prison inmates applies equally to cases involving arrestees or pretrial detainees.'. .These cases uniformly hold that gratuitous use of force against an individual who is not resisting is excessive. [collecting cases] After considering the numerous authorities explaining that police officers may not punch non-resisting arrestees and that unnecessary and gratuitous use of force is unconstitutional, and considering the evidence in the light most favorable to Esposito, the Court must conclude that the constitutional violation alleged was clearly established. Defendants' motion for summary judgment, including Defendants' request for qualified immunity, is accordingly denied. In denying summary judgment, the Court underscores that its analysis is based on the version of the facts set forth by Esposito, which drastically and irreconcilably clashes with the version of the facts described by the Defendant Officers.")

10. Note on Fourth vs. Fourteenth Amendment

It is clear that the Eighth Amendment applies to claims of excessive force by convicted prisoners. See Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312 (1986). See also Simpson v. Cisneros, 129 F.4th 901, 904-06 (5th Cir. 2025) ("The Magistrate Judge recommended the grant of summary judgment to the Defendant under the Eighth Amendment—but not under the Fourteenth Amendment—with the assumed facts. A failed summary judgment motion denying qualified immunity is appealable under the collateral-order doctrine. . . We turn to whether the Fourteenth Amendment's substantive due process doctrine protects inmates. It does not. Cisneros argues that the district court erred in determining that the plaintiffs pled a substantive due process claim under the Fourteenth Amendment, as it is the Eighth Amendment—not the Fourteenth Amendment—that protects incarcerated individuals. We construe the facts in favor of the Plaintiffs and conclude that the Plaintiffs did assert a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim in their initial complaint. . . We now turn to whether the Plaintiffs—as inmates—could proceed under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . In general, the 'substantive component of the Due Process Clause under the Fourteenth Amendment secures the right to be free of state-occasioned damage to a person's bodily integrity.'. . But when a particular constitutional amendment 'provides an explicit textual source of constitutional protection against a particular sort of government behavior, that Amendment, not the more generalized notion of substantive due process, must be the guide for analyzing these claims.'. . And, the Prison Rape Elimination Act of 2003 ("PREA") notes that sexual assault in prison implicates the Eighth Amendment. . . Here, 'the Eighth Amendment, which is specifically concerned with the unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain in penal institutions, serves as the primary source of substantive due process under the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . As the Eighth Amendment gives 'an explicit textual source of protection,'. . . the Plaintiffs here have no claim under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . The district court erred in applying a Fourteenth Amendment framework. . .The Eighth Amendment, not the Fourteenth Amendment, protects prisoners from mistreatment and malfeasance. The district court in its rulings held back final judgment against the Warden and the Assistant Warden. . . It is now in its hands to deal with what remains in this case. As the Fourteenth Amendment claim is the only live issue on appeal here, we REVERSE that ruling, GRANT summary judgment on the Fourteenth Amendment, and REMAND the case for further proceedings."); Hughes v. Rodriguez, 31 F.4th 1211, 1220-21 (9th Cir. 2022) ("To determine the applicable constitutional right in this case requires us to place escaped prisoners, like Hughes, on the custodial continuum, with free citizens on one end and convicted prisoners on the other. We conclude that the Eighth Amendment applies equally to convicted prisoners inside or outside the walls of the penal institution. The logic of Whitley applies with equal force even in the case of an escaped convict, as 'the State has complied with the constitutional guarantees traditionally associated with criminal prosecutions.'. . And although claims of excessive force brought by escaped prisoners are rare, our conclusion conforms to the law of our sister circuits. See Gravely v. Madden, 142 F.3d 345, 346–48 (6th Cir. 1998) (holding that the Eighth Amendment applied to an excessive force claim brought by an escaped convict because '[t]he Fourth Amendment is not triggered anew by attempts at recapture because the convict has already been "seized," tried, convicted, and incarcerated.').

As noted, supra, in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2479 (2015) (Alito, J., dissenting), Justice Alito pointed out that the Supreme Court has not decided whether the Fourth Amendment applies in the context of a pretrial detainee's excessive force claim.

Compare Geddes v. Weber County, No. 20-4083, 2022 WL 3371010, at *1, *5-*9 & n.4(10th Cir. Aug. 16, 2022) (not reported), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 778 (2023) ("Mr. Geddes brought his claim pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and alleged the officers had violated his Fourteenth Amendment rights. The question before us is not whether the officers' actions indeed constituted excessive force. It is instead whether Mr. Geddes can bring an excessive-force claim—as an arrestee—under the Fourteenth Amendment. We conclude that he cannot. And we, therefore, agree with the district court's grant of summary judgment and conclusion that Mr. Geddes did not have 'a cognizable claim under the Fourteenth Amendment' because the alleged excessive force did not occur 'after a determination of probable cause and before conviction.'. . Only the Fourth Amendment supplied a valid legal basis for Mr. Geddes's § 1983 claim[.] . . . [N]ot only do the different amendments provide protection at different parts of the criminal justice process, but more importantly for present purposes, the different amendments protect against unique forms of potential governmental intrusion on the protected right. This underscores the need for litigants to identify the correct amendment under which they seek relief. . . . [B]ecause Mr. Geddes was an arrestee, only the Fourth Amendment can supply the basis for his § 1983 excessive-force claim. . . . Mr. Geddes continues to cling to a constitutional amendment that provides him—as an arrestee—with no cognizable basis for a § 1983 excessive-force claim. 'The choice of amendment matters,'. . . and the amendment Mr. Geddes has chosen and has persisted in choosing dooms his § 1983 action. . . . Mr. Geddes says it does not matter whether he pleaded his excessive-force claim as a Fourth Amendment or Fourteenth Amendment violation. Either way, he insists, the outcome of his suit would be the same because the applicable standard would be the same.[4] [fn.4: Although Mr. Geddes suggests that we should not 'reach the issue of where a precise dividing line lies' between the amendments and notes the Supreme Court has not actually resolved this question, . . . he does not acknowledge that we have already drawn this line. We have explained that 'the Fourth Amendment not only bars the use of excessive force during the making of an arrest, but such also bars the use of excessive force during a period of detention immediately following arrest and before the person is taken before a magistrate judge, or other judicial official, to determine whether the arrest and continued detention were based on probable cause.'. . The Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley did not alter or disturb our precedent on this point. The Court in Kingsley spoke to the standard under which excessive-force claims should be analyzed—it did not consider where the Fourth Amendment begins and ends. Although Mr. Geddes is correct that the Supreme Court has not directly opined on 'whether the Fourth Amendment continues to provide individuals with protection against the deliberate use of excessive physical force beyond the point at which arrest ends and pretrial detention begins,'. . . most circuits have joined us in answering in the affirmative that Fourth Amendment protections continue up until a probable cause determination[.] [collecting cases] Therefore, Mr. Geddes's argument that he could seek the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment before a probable cause hearing is also meritless.] Not so. The Fourth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force standards are not identical. As Mr. Geddes rightly notes, both standards assess the objective reasonableness of the use of force. . . But beyond that, the two standards differ. . . . Consistent with our previous discussion of the stages of the criminal justice system and the corresponding constitutional rights that attach at each stage, the considerations identified in the Fourth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment contexts, although similar, differ in important ways. Namely, they protect against different types of infringements upon constitutional rights. And although both are now evaluated under an objective standard, the Fourth Amendment inquiry is arguably more favorable to a plaintiff because it protects from unreasonable seizures of free citizens. . . On the other hand, the balance is recalibrated in the pre-trial detainee context in a manner arguably less favorable to the plaintiff; there, the inquiry is whether the conduct was related to 'legitimate interests that stem from [the government's] need to manage the facility in which the individual is detained,' so long as that conduct is not punitive in character. . . This distinction is made more apparent when comparing the factors themselves. Most notably, under the Kingsley test, courts are to consider '[1] the relationship between the need for the use of force and the amount of force used; [2] the extent of the plaintiff's injury; [and] [3] any effort made by the officer to temper or to limit the amount of force.'. . These additional factors supplement the Graham analysis with an additional deference 'to "policies and practices that in th[e] judgment" of jail officials "are needed to preserve internal order and discipline and to maintain institutional security."'. . In sum, then, we and the Supreme Court have never suggested that precisely the same standard applies when assessing the objective reasonableness of the use of force under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . . Mr. Geddes's complaint only provided fair notice that the basis for his § 1983 action was a purported Fourteenth Amendment violation. The complaint nowhere indicated that the basis of his claim instead might be the Fourth Amendment. Yet, as we have now explained, different legal frameworks govern our analysis of Fourth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claims. Pleading one type of excessive-force claim cannot put defendants on notice of the other type of claim.") with Geddes v. Weber County, No. 20-4083, 2022 WL 3371010, at *13-14 (10th Cir. Aug. 16, 2022) (not reported) (Bacharach, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 778 (2023) ("In this appeal, the main issue is whether two jailers should obtain summary judgment based on the plaintiff's omission of the applicable constitutional amendment in his complaint. The majority answers yes, and I would answer no. So I respectfully dissent as to the jailers' liability. . . . The jailers used force before a finding of probable cause. So the Fourth Amendment (not the Fourteenth) provided the applicable test for Mr. Geddes's claim. . . Though the applicable test came from the Fourth Amendment, the claim itself arose under the Fourteenth Amendment. 'In a technical sense, a Fourth Amendment claim against [state] officers is also a Fourteenth Amendment claim, because that is the amendment that incorporates the Fourth Amendment's protections against the states.' . . Though we commonly refer to claims against state officers as Fourth Amendment claims, these claims are 'strictly speaking ... claim[s] under the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . So in the complaint, Mr. Geddes correctly invoked the Fourteenth Amendment as the constitutional source for his protection against excessive force. The district court and the majority point out that the test for the claim comes from the Fourth Amendment. But 'the Fourteenth Amendment standard is ... almost identical to the Fourth Amendment standard.'. . The standard under the Fourteenth Amendment is whether 'the force purposely or knowingly used against [the claimant] was objectively unreasonable ... from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene.' Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 576 U.S. 389, 397 (2015) (emphasis added). The standard under the Fourth Amendment is whether the force was objectively unreasonable 'in light of the facts and circumstances confronting [the officers], without regard to their underlying intent or motivation.' Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 397 (1989). We've thus concluded that the 'same objective standard ... applies to excessive-force claims brought under either the Fourth or the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . Given the similarity between the tests under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments, the complaint supplied all of the notice that the jailers needed.").

There is some disagreement among the Circuits as to when the Fourth Amendment or arrest context ends and the Fourteenth Amendment pre-trial detainee context begins. A majority of Circuits apply, regardless of one's status as an "arrestee" or "pre-trial detainee," the Fourteenth Amendment to medical care claims.

Compare Awnings v. Fullerton, 912 F.3d 1089, 1094-1102 (8th Cir. 2019) ("The parties do not dispute that Officer Banks neglected to inform jail personnel of Awnings's need for a follow-up medical appointment. Awnings argues that his transport from the Hospital to the jail was part of his arrest; therefore his claim against Officer Banks necessarily implicates the Fourth Amendment. But, historically, in this circuit, claims of deliberate indifference to an arrestee's medical needs are 'properly analyzed under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . Unresolved is 'the question whether the Fourth Amendment continues to provide individuals with protection against the deliberate use of excessive physical force beyond the point at which arrest ends and pretrial detention begins.'. . Awnings's claim against Officer Banks is a failure to provide adequate medical services—not an excessive force claim related to his arrest. Instead, Awnings claim against Officer Banks relates to the sufficiency of his post-arrest, post-medical examination, medical care. It is true that we have not as yet 'resolved whether an arrestee's claim alleging denial of medical care is analyzed under the Due Process Clause or the Fourth Amendment. . . We need not do so here. The facts distinguish this case from those arising from an allegation of excessive force. Factually, any alleged denial of medical care incident to Awnings's arrest ended when he actually received medical attention at the hospital. Awnings's claim against Officer Banks relates to Officer Banks's omission to convey the follow-up medical appointment ordered by the doctor—not from his participation in Awnings's arrest. In fact, Officer Banks did not participate in the arrest of Awnings. Unlike the plaintiff in Carpenter, Awnings was first transported for medical treatment before being taken to jail. On this record, our precedents favor analyzing Awnings's medical needs claim under Fourteenth Amendment standards. . . . Here, Awnings sustained a small laceration, and his examining physician post-arrest declared Awnings fit for incarceration. Further, a chest X-ray showed no fractured ribs or lung damages. Under these circumstances, it cannot be said that Officer Banks's failure to inform the jail staff of Awnings's follow-up medical visit rises to the level of conduct that 'shocks the contemporary conscience.'. . The district court correctly dismissed Awnings's claim against Officer Banks under Rule 12(b)(6).") with Awnings v. Fullerton, 912 F.3d 1089, 1103-04 (8th Cir. 2019) (Colloton, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("As to Awnings's claim against Officer Banks, I disagree with the court's decision to declare that the claim is governed by the Due Process Clause. Whether the Fourth Amendment or the Due Process Clause governs the actions of Officer Banks during the period after Awnings was arrested but before a judicial officer determined probable cause to detain him is important doctrinally. The issue was not thoroughly briefed in this case. The answer is unnecessary to resolving this appeal. I would therefore refrain from deciding the point. We said in Bailey v. Feltmann, 810 F.3d 589 (8th Cir. 2016), that 'this court has not resolved whether an arrestee's claim alleging denial of medical care is analyzed under the Due Process Clause or the Fourth Amendment and noted 'a conflict in authority' on the question. . . . In this case, Awnings loses under either approach. An arrestee's asserted Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable neglect in communicating a need for medical care was not clearly established in July 2013 when Awnings was seized, so Banks is entitled to qualified immunity on that claim. . . If the more demanding deliberate indifference standard of the Due Process Clause applies, then Awnings's claim fails for lack of alleged conscience-shocking conduct. . . We need not say more to resolve the appeal. The court goes further, however, and says that 'our precedents favor analyzing Awnings's medical needs claim under Fourteenth Amendment standards.'. . But our decisions do not resolve which constitutional provision applies. . . . The court disclaims any decision about whether 'an arrestee's claim alleging denial of medical care is analyzed under the Due Process Clause or the Fourth Amendment,'. . . but then decides the issue anyway as to an arrestee like Awnings. The doctrinal debate cited in Bailey concerns whether claims arising after arrest but before a judicial determination of probable cause are governed by the Fourth Amendment. Awnings's claim against Banks arose before a probable-cause determination, so the court necessarily rejects one of the two conflicting lines of authority cited in Bailey by declaring that the Due Process Clause governs Awnings's claim. I would reserve judgment on that significant question where it was not thoroughly briefed and is unnecessary to a decision.").

See Colson v. City of Alcoa, Tennessee, 37 F.4th 1182, 1187 (6th Cir. 2022) ("For claims concerning injuries sustained while in police custody, there is sometimes a dispute over whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment governs the constitutionality of the officer's conduct. After all, the point at which the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable seizures ends and the Fourteenth Amendment's substantive due process right begins is not always obvious. . . For instance, in Aldini, we held that when a person in custody asserts an excessive force claim against an officer, a judicial determination of probable cause is the 'dividing line' between application of the two amendments. . . Under the Aldini paradigm, the Fourth Amendment governs an excessive force claim brought by an 'arrestee'—one who has been arrested but has not yet received a judicial determination of probable cause, either through an arrest warrant or a post-arrest probable cause hearing. . . The Fourteenth Amendment, on the other hand, provides the same protection for a 'pretrial detainee'—a person who has received a judicial determination of probable cause but has not yet been adjudicated guilty of a crime. . .We hold that Colson's medical care right is governed by the Fourteenth Amendment. That is the straightforward conclusion from a series of decisions in which the Supreme Court applied the Fourteenth Amendment to analyze medical care claims arising out of events as early as the time of apprehension by police, see City of Revere v. Mass. Gen. Hosp., 463 U.S. 239, 244, 103 S.Ct. 2979, 77 L.Ed.2d 605 (1983), and as late as the period of pretrial detention, see Bell, 441 U.S. at 523, 545, 99 S.Ct. 1861. Additionally, in DeShaney, the Supreme Court explained that the Fourteenth Amendment imposes on the government an affirmative duty to provide medical care to all those it takes into its custody, regardless of the person's precise legal status. . .That includes, as the facts of this case present, the period after arrest but before a judicial finding of probable cause. . . . More broadly, eight other courts of appeals also apply the Fourteenth Amendment to arrestees' claims for failure to provide medical care. See, e.g., Tardif v. City of New York, 991 F.3d 394, 398–99, 405 n.9 (2d Cir. 2021); Mays v. Sprinkle, 992 F.3d 295, 298–300 (4th Cir. 2021); Batyukova v. Doege, 994 F.3d 717, 722–24, 732–33 (5th Cir. 2021); Smith v. Kilgore, 926 F.3d 479, 486 (8th Cir. 2019); Miranda-Rivera v. Toledo-Davila, 813 F.3d 64, 74 (1st Cir. 2016); Valderrama v. Rousseau, 780 F.3d 1108, 1116 (11th Cir. 2015); Barrie v. Grand County, 119 F.3d 862, 863–64, 867–69 (10th Cir. 1997); Groman v. Township of Manalapan, 47 F.3d 628, 632–33, 636–37 (3d Cir. 1995). And the Supreme Court has cited with approval two decisions of this ilk. See County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 850, 118 S.Ct. 1708, 140 L.Ed.2d 1043 (1998) (first citing Barrie, 119 F.3d at 867–69; and then citing Weyant v. Okst, 101 F.3d 845, 856 (2d Cir. 1996)). Precedent to the contrary is scant. The Ninth Circuit has flagged the issue but has yet to decide which right applied to an arrestee's failure to provide medical care claim. J. K. J. v. City of San Diego, 17 F.4th 1247, 1257 (9th Cir. 2021). Only the Seventh Circuit, it appears, has concluded that the Fourth Amendment governs a failure to provide medical care to an arrestee. See, e.g., Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626, 630–31 (7th Cir. 2013). . . . A failure to provide medical care is not a seizure, as it is not an affirmative act to restrain another. Rather, it is inaction in the face of a duty to provide adequate care. . . And, by definition, the right to medical care is triggered only once a person is in the government's custody, which follows a seizure. . . So the right to medical care and the Fourth Amendment's right to be free from unreasonable seizures are distinct, both conceptually and temporally. . . . True, as Colson emphasizes, Aldini held that the Fourth Amendment applies to excessive force claims for incidents arising before a probable cause determination. . . But we have never extended Aldini to hold that the Fourth Amendment governs an arrestee's claim of inadequate medical care. At times, we have suggested in dicta that there is 'an open question' on the matter. E.g., Esch v. County of Kent, 699 F. App'x 509, 514–15 (6th Cir. 2017); Smith, 603 F. App'x at 418–22; Shaver v. Brimfield Township, 628 F. App'x 378, 381 n.3 (6th Cir. 2015); Bonner-Turner v. City of Ecorse, 627 F. App'x 400, 406 n.2 (6th Cir. 2015); Estate of Carter v. City of Detroit, 408 F.3d 305, 311 n.3 (6th Cir. 2005); Boone v. Spurgess, 385 F.3d 923, 934 (6th Cir. 2004). But at other times, members of our circuit have said the question has been answered, in light of both Supreme Court precedent as well as our own. [collecting cases] To clear up any lingering uncertainty, we hold that there is no Fourth Amendment right to medical care.")

See also Mosier v. Evans, 90 F.4th 541, 546 (6th Cir. 2024) ("At the time of the events in question, Evans had 'been arrested but ha[d] not yet received a judicial determination of probable cause, either through an arrest warrant or a post-arrest probable cause hearing.'. . So the Fourth Amendment governs his claims. . .The operative question is whether the force used was '"objectively reasonable" in light of the facts and circumstances confronting' the officer."); Kelson v. Clark, 1 F.4th 411, 417-18, 421 (5th Cir. 2021) ("As a threshold matter, the parties dispute whether plaintiffs adequately allege that Fletcher was in police custody as an arrestee or pretrial detainee. The parties agree that the paramedics' obligations under the Fourteenth Amendment began only once Fletcher was detained by the police. However, Clark and Cox assert that the 'pleadings fail to establish that Fletcher was in custody at the time that Clark and Cox allegedly failed to treat him.' 'After the initial incidents of a seizure have concluded and an individual is being detained by police officials but has yet to be booked, an arrestee's right to medical attention, like that of a pretrial detainee, derives from the Fourteenth Amendment.' Nerren v. Livingston Police Dep't, 86 F.3d 469, 473 (5th Cir. 1996). In the Fourth Amendment context, 'a seizure occurs when, under the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable person would have thought he was not free to leave.'. . 'Physical force is not required to effect a seizure; however, absent physical force, "submission to the assertion of authority" is necessary.'. . Clark and Cox principally argue that the complaint does not allege that Fletcher was physically restrained at the time they arrived on the scene, and that after their alleged failure to treat Fletcher, he was 'thereafter' arrested and taken to the detention facility. Clark and Cox concede, as they must, that 'a reasonable person would not have thought that Fletcher was free to leave once Fletcher was being transported to the City's detention facility in Officer Morales' patrol car,' but that 'prior to that point, Fletcher was neither an arrestee nor pretrial detainee ... [while] just sitting on the sidewalk talking with the officers and paramedics.' By contrast, the plaintiffs argue that Fletcher was detained earlier: he 'submitted to police authority and reasonably believed [he] was not free to leave [ ] while on the street before being transported to the Detention Center.'. .While we agree with Clark and Cox that the precise timeline of events is underdeveloped, 'detailed factual allegations' are not required at the pleadings stage. . . Mindful of the standards governing Clark and Cox's motion to dismiss, and drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of the nonmoving party, the plaintiffs have pleaded sufficient factual material to allege that Fletcher was detained. . . . It is undisputed that, at the time Clark and Cox allegedly failed to treat Fletcher, the law was clearly established that pretrial detainees have a Fourteenth Amendment right to medical care. . . . Clark and Cox argue that clearly established law does not require them to provide medical care to an individual who is 'not a pretrial detainee.' This is irrelevant; for the reasons previously stated, Fletcher was allegedly detained at the relevant time."); Crocker v. Beatty, 995 F.3d 1232, 1253-58 & n.3 (11th Cir. 2021) (Newsom, J., concurring) ("The main opinion finds it unnecessary to decide whether someone in Crocker's position—i.e., one who has been arrested but has not yet been taken before a magistrate for a probable-cause determination—is (1) an arrestee whose excessive-force claim should be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment or instead (2) a pretrial detainee whose excessive-force claim should be analyzed under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . I write separately to suggest two things: first, that this Court hasn't (to my mind) committed itself to any particular position on that issue, which has generated a circuit split; and second, that if another panel confronts this question, it should draw the line between arrestees and pretrial detainees in accordance with Bell v. Wolfish, . . .such that the probable-cause determination is the divider. . . . [W]hat about individuals—like

Crocker here—who bring excessive-force claims based on events that occur after the initial act of arrest but before they've received a judicial determination of probable cause? . . . Courts have disagreed about whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment governs in this legal limbo. See, e.g., Miranda-Rivera v. Toledo-Davila, 813 F.3d 64, 70 (1st Cir. 2016) (collecting cases). . . . If we're counting noses, it seems fair to say that most circuits to have answered this question have lined up behind the Fourth Amendment. See Miranda-Rivera, 813 F.3d at 70 (collecting cases). So what about us—where are we? On the basis of our decision in Cottrell v. Caldwell, 85 F.3d 1480 (11th Cir. 1996), some have placed us in the minority camp, lumping us in with those courts that rely on the Fourteenth Amendment to analyze excessive-force claims brought by those whose arrest is complete but who haven't yet been had a probable-cause hearing. See, e.g., Wilson v. Spain, 209 F.3d 713, 716 n.2 (8th Cir. 2000). Respectfully, I don't think that either Cottrell or our subsequent interpretations of it compel that reading. . . .To sum up: Other circuits disagree about whether claims like Crocker's—brought by an individual who has been arrested but hasn't yet received a judicial determination of probable cause—arise under the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment.[3] [fn 3: Note that because the practical consequences of the split aren't what they used to be pre-Kingsley, the Supreme Court may have less reason to step in and resolve any conflict between the circuits. . . For that matter, I suppose that insofar as the so-what factor isn't what it used to be, our en banc court may have less incentive to untangle any knots in our precedent in this area.] Our own precedent hasn't settled the issue, either. If I'm right about that, then a future panel might have to answer the questions this case only caused us to ask. . .If and when that happens, I'd recommend that we (1) draw the line between arrestees and pretrial detainees in accord with Bell v. Wolfish, . . . and thus (2) analyze the excessive-force claims of all pre-probable-cause-determination arrestees under the Fourth Amendment. . . .Taken together, I understand Bell and Gerstein to mean that until a judge has weighed in on whether probable cause exists to detain someone, he remains an arrestee and is thus entitled to (but only to) Fourth-Amendment protection from excessive force. . . . One might object to this general approach on the ground that it necessarily embodies a 'continuing seizure' theory, about which we (and others) have expressed 'doubts[.]' . . Our reticence is well-founded; the Supreme Court has said, after all, that '[a] seizure is a single act, and not a continuous fact.'. . And that view finds support in the original public meaning of the Fourth Amendment. . . There's good reason, then, to be suspicious of a flabby conception of 'seizure.' Even so, it seems to me that what transpires between the initial act of a warrantless arrest and the subsequent probable-cause determination may be considered a 'seizure' without doing violence to the Fourth Amendment—or, for that matter, even requiring the 'continuing' modifier. . . .And happily, that understanding of 'seizure' supports drawing a nice, bright line between the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments at the probable-cause hearing. . . .Our duty to follow the Constitution and the Supreme Court's decisions requires us to reject an in-there-somewhere approach to excessive-force claims brought under § 1983. We didn't have to go to the roots of Crocker's claim to know that it could bear no fruit, but in another case, our court may need to dig deeper. If so, I hope that panel will distinguish between arrestees and pretrial detainees and clarify the analytical framework that applies to the excessive-force claims of both."); Quinette v. Reed, 805 F. App'x 696, ___ (11th Cir. 2020) ("In this Circuit, '[t]he precise point at which a seizure ends (for purposes of the Fourth Amendment coverage) and at which pretrial detention begins (governed until conviction by the Fourteenth Amendment) is not settled.' Hicks v. Moore, 422 F.3d 1246, 1253 n.7 (11th Cir. 2005). We need not delineate that point now, because even though the district court concluded that the Fourteenth Amendment applied, Quinette has pled facts that support a violation of either the Fourth or the Fourteenth Amendment. In Kingsley v. Hendrickson, the Supreme Court clarified that to prove an excessive force claim in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, a 'pretrial detainee must show only that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.'. . This objective reasonableness standard mirrors the standard an arrestee must meet to plead a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . So we turn to the question of whether Reed's force was objectively reasonable. . . .Reed's application of a two-handed shove to a non-resistant detainee, with sufficient force to knock that detainee to the ground and to break his hip, constituted unreasonable force in violation of Quinette's constitutional right under the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment."); McCowan v. Morales, 945 F.3d 1276, 1290 n.11 (10th Cir. 2019) ("We. . . reject Officer Moralez's assertion that it is. . . the Fourth Amendment that should govern here. In making that assertion, Officer Moralez relies on several district court decisions from the Ninth Circuit. But those cases address situations where officers injured or killed a suspect while seizing him and the suspect, or his survivors, then sued officers alleging they failed either to summon medical care promptly or to perform first aid. . . Here, instead, McCowan claimed that Officer Moralez deprived him of needed medical attention while at the police station for injuries McCowan allegedly suffered after his arrest and before the officer delivered McCowan to the detention center. This situation is more analogous to Rife, where the Tenth Circuit applied the Fourteenth Amendment to a claim alleging an officer deprived an arrestee of necessary medical care after his warrantless arrest and while the officer transported the arrestee to the jail."); Piazza v. Jefferson County, Alabama, 923 F.3d 947, 952 n.6 (11th Cir. 2019) ("Although some courts have extended Fourth Amendment protections into the pretrial detention phase, see, e.g., Aldini v. Johnson, 609 F.3d 858, 866 (6th Cir. 2010), '[n]either [this Court] nor the Supreme Court has decided whether the Fourth Amendment continues to provide individuals with protection from excessive force beyond the point at which an arrest ends and pretrial detention begins,' J W by & through Tammy Williams v. Birmingham Board of Education, 904 F.3d 1248, 1259 (11th Cir. 2018)."); Parrish v. Dingman, 912 F.3d 464, 467 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Parrish's excessive-force claim is governed by the Fourth Amendment's objective reasonableness standard. Hicks v. Norwood, 640 F.3d 839, 842 (8th Cir. 2011) ("It is settled in this circuit that the Fourth Amendment's 'objective reasonableness' standard for arrestees governs excessive-force claims arising during the booking process.")."); Alcocer v. Mills, 906 F.3d 944, 952-55 (11th Cir. 2018) ("[W]e agree with the district court's determination that the right at issue here arises under the Fourth Amendment, not the Fourteenth Amendment, as Defendants assert. In any § 1983 case, we must begin our analysis by identifying 'the precise constitutional violation' the defendant has allegedly committed. . . This step requires us, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Alcocer, to establish the cause of her continued detention after posting bond. Here, the district court noted that Alcocer obtained a bond for her misdemeanor suspended-license offense and would have been released on January 30, immediately upon securing her bond, had it not been for the alleged ICE detainer. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Alcocer, the district court concluded that Alcocer remained incarcerated because Defendants engaged in a second detention of her for being an illegally present alien. This fact pattern potentially presents two possible rights as candidates for driving our analysis: (1) the Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizures, Case v. Eslinger, 555 F.3d 1317, 1326 (11th Cir. 2009), and (2) the Fourteenth Amendment due-process right to be free from continued detention after law enforcement should have known that the detained person was entitled to release, West v. Tillman, 496 F.3d 1321, 1327 (11th Cir. 2007) (per curiam). . . .Here, viewed in the light most favorable to Alcocer, the facts reflect that she continued to be detained after satisfying the bond requirements, solely because of suspicion that she might be illegally present in the United States. This overnight detention plainly was not 'brief,' so it could not have been a Terry stop. Nor did Alcocer consent to her overnight detention. Indeed, she protested it. So if the Fourth Amendment governs the analysis here, to the extent that Defendants were causally involved in Alcocer's overnight detention, they must show they had probable cause (or in the qualified-immunity analysis, arguable probable cause) to believe that Alcocer was illegally present in the United States. We turn now to the Fourteenth Amendment. That amendment applies when an individual alleges an 'over-detention,' or a continued detention after a right to release, where probable cause supported the charge for which the person was detained. . . When an over-detention occurs and the Fourteenth Amendment governs the analysis, a plaintiff must demonstrate that the defendant acted with deliberate indifference to her due-process rights. . . That requires her to show three things: (1) the defendant had subjective knowledge of a risk of serious harm, consisting of continued detention when the plaintiff was entitled to be released; (2) he disregarded that risk; and (3) he did so by conduct that is more than mere negligence. . .As we have noted, we have applied the Fourteenth Amendment analysis in cases involving over-detentions. . . .In all of these cases, we held that the right at issue was the Fourteenth Amendment due-process right to be free from continued detention after law enforcement should have known that the detained person was entitled to release. . . That right, we said, is protected by the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of substantive due process. . . After careful consideration of these cases, we conclude that the precise right implicated by the facts Alcocer alleges is the Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizures. That is so for two reasons. First, the facts here require this conclusion. In explaining why, we look at the reason for Alcocer's continued detention after she satisfied her bond requirements. Viewing facts in the light most favorable to Alcocer, she remained in jail solely because of suspicion that she was in the United States illegally. The Sheriff's Office staff told Alcocer's sister that she was not being released due to an ICE hold; statements in Alcocer's file, mentioning Defendant Staten, show that her continued detainment was related to an ICE hold; and Alcocer was released almost immediately after an ICE agent notified the Sheriff's Office that Alcocer was in fact a citizen. Any facts that might have underpinned the conclusion that Alcocer was in the United States illegally were not a part of the probable cause that supported Alcocer's original detention, which was for the misdemeanor of driving with a suspended license. For this reason, independent probable cause was required to warrant Alcocer's continued detention after she had satisfied all conditions of her bond on her original detention. . . Second, the law similarly demands this result. The Fourth Amendment provides an explicit source of protection for the right that Defendants allegedly violated. The Fourteenth Amendment does not. Rather, as we have noted, the Fourteenth Amendment right to be free from continued detention after law enforcement should have known that the person was entitled to release is a substantive-due-process right. . . Where the Constitution 'provides an explicit textual source of constitutional protection' for the violation alleged, we apply the analysis that constitutional provision requires, rather than the analysis dictated by 'the more generalized notion of "substantive due process."'. . Because the Fourth Amendment provides 'an explicit textual source for constitutional protection' under the factual scenario here, it governs. For these reasons, we hold that the district court correctly determined that this case involves the Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizures."); J W by & through Tammy Williams v. Birmingham Bd. of Educ., 904 F.3d 1248, 1259 (11th Cir. 2018) ("The SROs argue that the students improperly asserted their decontamination claims under the Fourth Amendment. As the SROs see it, the students should have proceeded under the Fourteenth Amendment because they were arrestees and/or pre-trial detainees after they were sprayed. . . The students respond that the Fourth Amendment provides the correct framework to analyze their excessive force claims because the inadequate decontamination occurred during the process of arrest, 'moments after the seizure began[,] ... prior to any formal booking, and before pretrial detention began.' . .Generally, the Fourth Amendment protects against the use of excessive force during investigatory stops and arrests, while the Fourteenth Amendment guards against the use of excessive force against arrestees and pretrial detainees. . . Although the Supreme Court has held that 'all claims that law enforcement officers have used excessive force ... in the course of an arrest, investigatory stop, or other "seizure" of a free citizen should be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment,'. . . neither we nor the Supreme Court has decided whether the Fourth Amendment continues to provide individuals with protection from excessive force beyond the point at which an arrest ends and pretrial detention begins, let alone in the school context[.] We need not decide whether the Fourth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment governs the students' decontamination claims to resolve the SROs' qualified immunity arguments. Assuming that those claims are properly brought under the Fourth Amendment, and that the SROs violated the Fourth Amendment by not adequately decontaminating the students, the relevant law was not clearly established at the time of the SROs' conduct."); Hopper v. Plummer, 887 F.3d 744, 751-53 (6th Cir. 2018) ("First, we must decide which constitutional guarantee plaintiff's excessive-force claim implicates. An excessive-force claim may arise under the Fourth, Eighth, or Fourteenth Amendments. While the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable seizures bars excessive force against free citizens, see Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 388, 109 S. Ct. 1865, 104 L.Ed.2d 443 (1989), the Eighth Amendment's ban on cruel and unusual punishment bars excessive force against convicted persons. See Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312, 318–19, 106 S. Ct. 1078, 89 L.Ed.2d 251 (1986). When an individual does not clearly fall within either category, the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause prohibits a governmental official's excessive use of force. See Phelps v. Coy, 286 F.3d 295, 299–300 (6th Cir. 2002). The question is not merely academic because the standards of liability differ depending upon which amendment applies. . . . Richardson was . . . the classic civil contemnor detainee in that he 'carrie[d] the keys of his prison in his own pocket' and could 'end the sentence and discharge himself at any moment by doing what he had previously refused to do' for the benefit of the complainant. . . The Fourteenth Amendment therefore governs plaintiff's excessive-force claim."); Otis v. Demarasse, 886 F.3d 639, 645 (7th Cir. 2018) ("The parties and the district court assumed that Ms. Otis's claim is governed by the Fourteenth Amendment. The district court viewed Ms. Otis's claim through the lens of Chapman v. Keltner, 241 F.3d 842 (7th Cir. 2001). In that decision, we relied on the right to due process and its 'deliberate indifference' standard in analyzing the claims of a plaintiff who was arrested on a warrant. . . We have said, however, that the deliberate indifference standard applies only to persons who have received a judicial determination of probable cause, not to persons arrested without a warrant and waiting to be taken to a judge. See Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523, 530 (7th Cir. 2011); Williams v. Rodriguez, 509 F.3d 392, 403 (7th Cir. 2007); Lopez v. City of Chicago, 464 F.3d 711, 718–19 (7th Cir. 2006). . . Ms. Otis was arrested without a warrant, and she had not appeared before a judicial officer for a determination of probable cause for that arrest. Under our cases, therefore, her claim is controlled not by the Fourteenth Amendment but the Fourth. . . . Under the Fourth Amendment, Ms. Otis must show only that Officer Demarasse's conduct was 'objectively unreasonable under the circumstances.'"); Estate of Perry v. Wenzel, 872 F.3d 439, 452-53 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Perry's Amended Complaint contends that he is entitled to relief because the defendants violated his Eighth Amendment rights when they acted with deliberate indifference to his medical needs. But, Perry, who had been in custody for less than 24 hours when he died, never received a probable cause hearing. Therefore, the district court properly concluded that it is the Fourth Amendment, and not the Eighth, that governs Perry's claims. . . So, to succeed on his claim, Perry must demonstrate that the officers' actions were 'objectively unreasonable under the circumstances,' a less demanding standard than the Eighth Amendment's deliberate indifference standard."); Bailey v. Feltmann, 810 F.3d 589, 593 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Bailey first argues that we should analyze his § 1983 claim against Feltmann for denial of medical care under the objective reasonableness standard of the Fourth Amendment. The Fourth Amendment governs an arrestee's claim alleging excessive use of force, Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 395 (1989), but this court has not resolved whether an arrestee's claim alleging denial of medical care is analyzed under the Due Process Clause or the Fourth Amendment. One recent decision, Carpenter v. Gage, 686 F .3d 644, 650 (8th Cir.2012), applied due process analysis to the claim of an arrestee, but the plaintiff there did not invoke the Fourth Amendment, and the issue was not joined. Earlier cases seem to imply—also without discussion of the Fourth Amendment—that the Due Process Clause may govern, e.g., Spencer v. Knapheide Truck Equip. Co., 183 F.3d 902, 905 & n. 3 (8th Cir.1999), and there is a conflict in authority elsewhere about how to evaluate this type of claim. Compare Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523, 530 (7th Cir.2011) (applying Fourth Amendment), with Barrie v. Grand Cty., 119 F.3d 862, 865–69 (10th Cir.1997) (applying Due Process Clause). For present purposes, it is enough to acknowledge that a right under the Fourth Amendment against unreasonable delay in medical care for an arrestee was not clearly established in March 2012. Neither the Supreme Court nor this circuit had announced such a right, and there is no uniform body of authority that might allow us to conclude that the right was clearly established. Nor was it clearly established that a standard of objective reasonableness applies under the Due Process Clause. Cf. Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S.Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015). Feltmann is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Bailey's claim that Feltmann acted unreasonably, and the district court properly dismissed that portion of the complaint. We think it prudent to avoid addressing the proper constitutional standard unnecessarily. See Camreta v. Greene, 131 S.Ct. 2020, 2031 (2011). Bailey argues in the alternative that Feltmann's decision to proceed to the jail rather than to a hospital exhibited deliberate indifference to his need for medical attention in violation of his clearly established constitutional rights under the Due Process Clause. Regardless of whether an 'unreasonable' decision to forego treatment would violate the Constitution, this court deemed it clearly established by 2008 that a pretrial detainee (or an arrestee, see Spencer, 183 F.3d at 905 n. 3) has a right to be free from deliberately indifferent denials of emergency medical care. See Thompson v. King, 730 F.3d 742, 750 (8th Cir.2013). Bailey's claim fails, however, because he has not produced sufficient evidence to support a finding that Feltmann violated that right."); J.H. ex rel. J.P. v. Bernalillo Cty., 806 F.3d 1255, 1259-60 (10th Cir. 2015) ("J.H.'s Fourteenth Amendment claims are identical to her two Fourth Amendment claims: excessive force and unlawful arrest without probable cause. But the Fourteenth Amendment does not support these claims. We addressed the effect of the Fourteenth Amendment in Estate of Booker v. Gomez, 745 F.3d 405 (10th Cir.2014), holding that excessive force claims are governed by the Fourth Amendment, rather than the Fourteenth Amendment, when force is used between a warrantless arrest and a probable cause hearing. . . This holding governs here, for J.H. alleges that Deputy Sharkey arrested J.P. without a warrant and the state courts never provided a hearing on probable cause. Therefore, Estate of Booker prevents J.H. from relying on the Fourteenth Amendment for her claim of excessive force."); Morabito v. Holmes, 628 F. App'x 353, 357-58 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Circuits have been divided as to what standard applies, and when, for cases in the 'gray area.' The Sixth Circuit previously set 'the dividing line between the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment zones of protection at the probable-cause hearing.' Aldini v. Johnson, 609 F.3d 858, 867 (6th Cir.2010) (footnote omitted). However, the Supreme Court has recently clarified that no dividing line is necessary. Instead, the Court adopted a bright line rule that 'a pretrial detainee must show only that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.'. . . Accepting Plaintiff's version of the facts, as we are required to at this stage, provoking an altercation with Morabito out of frustration with his repeated verbal outbursts and demands for medical treatment, ultimately slapping, tasing, and punching Morabito while he was pinned under two officers, does not constitute an objectively reasonable use of force. Further, the constitutional right to be free from such treatment was clearly established long ago."); Bonner-Turner v. City of Ecorse, No. 14-2337, 2015 WL 5332465, at 5 n.2, *10 (6th Cir. Sept. 14, 2015) (not reported) ("Plaintiff asks this court to analyze the medical care claims under the Fourth Amendment's objective reasonableness standard because Turner was a warrantless arrestee who had yet to have a probable cause hearing. Our court has not resolved whether the Fourth Amendment's objective reasonableness standard or the more onerous Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference standard governs claims for failure to provide medical care prior to a probable cause determination. See Boone v. Spurgess, 385 F.3d 923, 933–34 (6th Cir.2004); Estate of Carter v. City of Detroit, 408 F.3d 305, 311 n.3 (6th Cir.2005); Smith v. Erie Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 603 F. App'x 414, 418–19 (6th Cir.2015); see also Aldini v. Johnson, 609 F.3d 858, 864 (6th Cir.2010) (holding that the Fourth Amendment governs excessive force claims arising beyond the time of arrest until a probable cause hearing). In this case, because plaintiff survives summary judgment under the more demanding deliberate indifference standard, we do not resolve which standard governs. . . . The Fourth Amendment's objective reasonableness standard governs claims for excessive physical force during the course of an arrest, booking, and until a probable cause determination."); Schoettle

v. Jefferson Cnty., 788 F.3d 855, 861 n.4 (8th Cir. 2015) ("We analyzed Carpenter's deliberate indifference claim under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and under the Eighth Amendment, because the deliberate indifference was alleged to have occurred after Carpenter's arrest. . . Schoettle's excessive force claim is properly brought under the Fourth Amendment as it concerns pre-arrest conduct, and is therefore governed by the Graham standard enunciated supra."); Valderrama v. Rousseau, 780 F.3d 1108, 1121 n.16 (11th Cir. 2015) ("Although Lancaster involved an inmate, not an arrestee, 'decisional law involving prison inmates applies equally to cases involving arrestees or pretrial detainees.' Cottrell v. Caldwell, 85 F.3d 1480, 1490 (11th Cir.1996)."); Smith v. Erie Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 603 F. App'x 414, 425 (6th Cir. 2015) (Batchelder, J., concurring in part and concurring in the result) ("The Fourteenth Amendment controls here. Stallard had not received a probable cause hearing, and the district court erred by applying a formalistic chronological approach to hold that the Fourth Amendment applied. The Fourth Amendment provides in part that '[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated.' U.S. Const. amend. IV. However, the interaction here between state agents and the decedent had nothing to do with either a 'search' or a 'seizure.' So the officers' conduct pertaining to any medical matters is examined under the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause, which provides, that '[n]o State shall ... deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.'. . The Due Process Clause requires police officers to provide adequate medical care to individuals in police custody prior to a criminal conviction. See Revere v. Mass. Gen. Hosp., 463 U.S. 239, 244 (1983); Phillips v. Roane Cnty., 534 F.3d 531, 539 (6th Cir.2008). A person's right to adequate medical care is violated if the police acted with 'deliberate indifference to serious medical needs.'"); Tatum v. Moody, 768 F.3d 806, 814-21 (9th Cir. 2014) ("We hold that the Constitution does protect Walker from prolonged detention when the police, with deliberate indifference to, or in the face of a perceived risk that, their actions will violate the plaintiff's right to be free of unjustified pretrial detention, withhold from the prosecutors information strongly indicative of his innocence, and so affirm. . . Moody and Pulido first assert that 'the Fourth Amendment, not the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment[,] governs a pretrial loss of liberty.' Not so. Rivera v. County of Los Angeles squarely rejected that proposition earlier this year. 745 F.3d 384 (9th Cir.2014). As Rivera explained, '[p]recedent demonstrates ... that postarrest incarceration is analyzed under the Fourteenth Amendment alone.' Id. 389–90 (citing Baker v. McCollan, 443 U.S. 137, 145 (1979); Lee v. City of L.A., 250 F.3d 668, 683–85 (9th Cir.2001)). . . On that ground, Rivera rejected a claim, brought under § 1983, that the plaintiff's post-arrest incarceration on the basis of a warrant naming another man, after jailors should have known of the error, violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Rivera forecloses Moody and Pulido's Fourth Amendment-based argument here. . . . To resolve this appeal, we need not decide the scope of the protections established by Brady and its progeny, because Walker's claim sounds in the right first alluded to in Baker, 443 U.S. 137, not Brady. Where, as here, investigating officers, acting with deliberate indifference or reckless disregard for a suspect's right to freedom from unjustified loss of liberty, fail to disclose potentially dispositive exculpatory evidence to the prosecutors, leading to the lengthy detention of an innocent man, they violate the due process guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . We emphasize the narrowness of the constitutional rule we enforce today, which is restricted to detentions of (1) unusual length, (2) caused by the investigating officers' failure to disclose highly significant exculpatory evidence to prosecutors, and (3) due to conduct that is culpable in that the officers understood the risks to the plaintiff's rights from withholding the information or were completely indifferent to those risks. . . . Here, Walker was detained for 27 months after preliminary hearings that, as noted, offered him no protection from Moody and Pulido's misconduct, because the exculpatory information was withheld both before and after the hearings. That period of time, under any measure, is sufficiently lengthy to trigger the narrow due process right at issue here. . . . We can assume here that this sort of due process claim is actually triggered by the failure to disclose evidence that is not merely material but strongly indicative of the plaintiff's innocence. . . . In the context of a § 1983 suit against police officers for a due process violation, official conduct violates due process 'only when [it] "shocks the conscience,"' a standard satisfied in circumstances such as these by conduct that either consciously or through complete indifference disregards the risk of an unjustified deprivation of liberty.); King v. Kramer, 763 F.3d 635, 648 (7th Cir. 2014) (In case regarding medical care provided to a pretrial detainee awaiting a probable cause determination, court finds "that the district court abused its discretion in ordering that the case be tried under the incorrect Eighth Amendment [deliberate indifference] standard." Court reversed, and directed that the motion for a new trial be granted and jury be instructed under standard of objective reasonableness.); Estate of Booker v. Gomez, 745 F.3d 405, 419-21 (10th Cir. 2014) ("Determining which amendment applies to an allegation of excessive force requires consideration of 'where the [plaintiff] finds himself in the criminal justice system.'. . Any force used 'leading up to and including an arrest' may be actionable under the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable seizures. . . By contrast, claims of excessive force involving convicted prisoners arise under the Eighth Amendment. . . 'And when neither the Fourth nor Eighth Amendment applies—when the plaintiff finds himself in the criminal justice system somewhere between the two stools of an initial seizure and post-conviction punishment—we turn to the due process clauses of the Fifth or Fourteenth Amendment and their protection against arbitrary governmental action by federal or state authorities.'. .It is therefore well-established that the Fourteenth Amendment governs any claim of excessive force brought by a 'pretrial detainee'—one who has had a 'judicial determination of probable cause as a prerequisite to [the] extended restraint of [his] liberty following arrest.'. . For similar reasons, we have also concluded that the Fourteenth Amendment standard 'controls excessive force claims brought by federal immigration detainees.'. .On the other hand, we have held that the Fourth Amendment, not the Fourteenth, governs excessive force claims arising from 'treatment of [an] arrestee detained without a warrant ' and 'prior to any probable cause hearing.'. . .In this case, unlike the plaintiff in Austin—where the excessive force occurred before a probable cause determination and thus constituted a continuing seizure under the Fourth Amendment, . . . Mr. Booker was arrested pursuant to a warrant based on probable cause for failing to appear at a court proceeding in conjunction with drug charges. Although there was no probable cause determination on the drug charges, there was a probable cause determination for Mr. Booker's failure to appear. In this important respect, our holding in Austin does not control this case. After the officers arrested Mr. Booker and brought him into the 'cooperative seating area' for booking, he was a 'pretrial detainee.' Like the immigration detainee in Porro whose excessive force claim arose under the Fourteenth Amendment because he did not 'dispute that he had been lawfully seized and detained,'. . . Mr. Booker's claim is governed by the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. Accordingly, we hold the Fourteenth Amendment standard governs excessive force claims arising from post-arrest and pre-conviction treatment if the arrestee has been taken into custody pursuant to a warrant supported by probable cause."); Blackmon v. Sutton, 734 F.3d 1237, 1239-43 (10th Cir. 2013) ("The jurisprudential terrain between arrest and conviction remains today only partially charted. Over the last several decades, the Supreme Court has elaborated in considerable detail the standards of care prison administrators must satisfy to avoid inflicting 'cruel and unusual' punishment on convicted prisoners in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . The Court has, as well, expounded on what force officers may and may not use to effect an arrest consistent with the Fourth Amendment and its prohibition of 'unreasonable searches and seizures.'. . But at least so far the Court has done comparatively little to clarify the standards of care due to those who find themselves between these stools—held by the government after arrest but before conviction at trial. . .We know that after the Fourth Amendment leaves off and before the Eighth Amendment picks up, the Fourteenth Amendment's due process guarantee offers detainees some protection while they remain in the government's custody awaiting trial. . . But we do not know where exactly the Fourth Amendment's protections against unreasonable searches and seizures end and the Fourteenth Amendment's due process detainee protections begin. Is it immediately after arrest? Or does the Fourth Amendment continue to apply, say, until arraignment? Neither do we know with certainty whether a single standard of care applies to all pretrial detainees—or whether different standards apply depending where the detainee stands in his progress through the criminal justice system. Might, for example, the accused enjoy more due process protection before a probable cause hearing than after? All these questions remain very much in play. . .The defendants make much of these lingering questions, going so far as to suggest they preclude the possibility they could have violated the clearly established legal right of any pretrial detainee in 1997, the time of the events in question in this lawsuit. But that argument proves a good deal too much. In the defendants' world, officials who engaged in sadistic and malicious conduct in 1997 would have violated the defined rights of convicted inmates, but the same conduct would not have violated the rights of pretrial detainees because of the comparative ambiguity surrounding their rights. Though the law of pretrial detention may not have been precise in all its particulars in 1997, though it may remain comparatively ambiguous today, things have never been quite as topsy turvy as that. Pretrial detainees are not men without countries, persons without any clearly defined legal rights. By 1997, it was beyond debate that a pretrial detainee enjoys at least the same constitutional protections as a convicted criminal. . . Conduct that violates the clearly established rights of convicts necessarily violates the clearly established rights of pretrial detainees. By 1997, it was clearly established as well that prison officials run afoul of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishments when they exhibit 'deliberate indifference' to a convicted inmate's 'serious medical needs.'. . It was clearly established, too, that Estelle's standard gives way to a more onerous test when 'guards use force to keep order.'. . In deference to the need to maintain order in a prison environment, liability will not attach in these particular circumstances unless the challenged force is 'applied ... maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm.'. .Neither is this the end to what we know with certainty about the state of the law in 1997 regarding pretrial detainees. By then the Supreme Court had held that the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of due process prohibits any punishment of those awaiting trial. Punishment may be constitutionally acceptable for persons convicted of crimes—at least so long as it doesn't amount to 'cruel and unusual' punishment as defined by Estelle and Hudson. But punishment is never constitutionally permissible for presumptively innocent individuals awaiting trial. . . Where exactly do we draw the line between what does and doesn't constitute 'punishment'? Historically, the government has enjoyed the authority to detain until trial those defendants who pose a flight risk. And no doubt those who find themselves detained in this manner experience a great many restrictions on their liberty—restrictions many of us would regard as punishment in themselves. But when do these restrictions pass, as a matter of law, from constitutionally acceptable to constitutionally impermissible? Bell tells us the answer turns on the answers to two questions. First, we must ask whether an 'expressed intent to punish on the part of detention facility officials' exists. . . If so, liability may attach. If not, a plaintiff may still prove unconstitutional punishment by showing that the restriction in question bears no reasonable relationship to any legitimate governmental objective. . . .With these (clearly established) legal principles in hand, we can now turn to Mr. Blackmon's primary complaint: the many hours he spent shackled to the Pro–Straint chair. The district court analyzed his claim under Hudson's demanding Eighth Amendment 'malicious and sadistic' test for cruel and unusual punishments—and, even then, it found that Mr. Blackmon succeeded in stating a triable claim. We don't need to travel so far, however, to reach the same destination. While Hudson forbids a certain class of punishments for convicted prisoners (cruel and unusual ones), Bell forbids punishment altogether for pretrial detainees like Mr. Blackmon. And there is ample evidence in this case that the defendants at least sometimes used the Pro–Straint chair to punish their young charge. To be very clear, we do not doubt that the defendants often had a legitimate (nonpunitive) purpose for using the chair, or that its use was often reasonably related to that purpose. While awaiting trial—on charges of rape that were eventually thrown out—Mr. Blackmon was deeply distraught. The eleven-year-old attempted suicide and repeatedly banged his head dangerously against walls. No one disputes that the defendants had a legitimate interest in restraining him from these attempts at self-harm. Neither do we understand Mr. Blackmon to suggest that the use of restraints like the Pro–Straint chair is never a reasonable way to achieve this legitimate purpose. Indeed, we are confident Mr. Blackmon remains alive today thanks to the intervention of facility staff and they are due no small measure of credit for that. The problem is that the factual record in this case points in more than one direction. Much of it suggests that the defendants usually used the restraint chair in a reasonable effort to prevent Mr. Blackmon from killing or seriously injuring himself. But viewing the record in the light most favorable to Mr. Blackmon as we must, it also suggests the defendants sometimes shackled him with the express purpose of punishing him, in clear violation of Bell's first test. At least one defendant allegedly instructed others—openly—to use the chair as 'punishment.' The record evidence suggests the possibility, too, that on other occasions officials shackled Mr. Blackmon without any legitimate penological purpose, in clear violation of Bell's second test. Sometimes, Mr. Blackmon alleges, he was shackled to the chair for long stretches when there was no hint he posed a threat of harming himself or anyone else. Other times, Mr. Blackmon was placed in the chair because of a legitimate threat of self-harm but then arguably kept there for extensive periods after any threat of self-harm had dissipated. On one occasion, too, the boy was stripped out of his clothes and forced to wear a paper gown while restrained in the chair. All of this, says Mr. Blackmon's expert, left him with severe mental health problems. And in none of these instances does the record appear to reveal a legitimate penological reason for the defendants' actions. The district court held that facts like these preclude the entry of qualified immunity at summary judgment and we cannot disagree. By 1997, the defendants were on notice that they could not use restraints with the express purpose of punishing or without some legitimate penological purpose in mind. Yet the record here suggests they may have used restraints in both forbidden ways at least some of the time. In fact, as the district court observed, by 1997 this court had already held that the use of force without any 'disciplinary rationale' runs afoul even of the Eighth Amendment's protections for convicted prisoners. . . Under Bell and the Fourteenth Amendment, surely no less could have been said by then for pretrial detainees."); Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626, 628-32 (7th Cir. 2013) ("Currie filed her initial complaint on October 14, 2009, naming as defendants various jail officials, Williamson County, Chhabra and Reynolds, and Health Professionals, Ltd. The initial iterations of her complaint alleged that the defendants acted with 'deliberate indifference' to Okoro's medical needs, suggesting a claim that the defendants violated Okoro's due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . At the close of discovery, however, in response to the defendants' motion for summary judgment, Currie argued for the first time that the Fourth Amendment's 'objectively unreasonable' standard should govern. . . . Upon receipt of Currie's revised complaint alleging 'objectively unreasonable' conduct, Chhabra, Reynolds, and Health Professionals filed a motion to dismiss, asserting qualified immunity 'because the Fourth Amendment has not been applied to licensed medical professional[s] subcontracted to care for state detainees.' The court denied this motion. Only Chhabra and Reynolds are before us on appeal. . . . The defendants' real argument is that the Fourth Amendment never governs constitutional claims alleging inadequate provision of medical care to an arrestee by a nurse or doctor, regardless of the defendant's employment arrangement. Although the Supreme Court has provided relatively little guidance regarding the constitutional rights of arrestees and pretrial detainees, . . . this court's cases foreclose the defendants' argument. [discussing cases] The defendants attempt to distinguish Ortiz, Williams, and Sides as cases involving the objectively unreasonable denial of medical care by jailers, not the objectively unreasonable provision of medical care by doctors and nurses. A jailer might violate an arrestee's Fourth Amendment rights by unreasonably denying the arrestee access to insulin, the defendants urge, but a health care professional who unreasonably withholds insulin does not. This argument lacks support in law or logic. . . . True, the named defendants in our earlier Fourth Amendment medical-care cases were 'lockup keepers' (Ortiz and William) and police detectives (Lopez), but from the perspective of the arrestee, it matters not a whit whether it is the jailer or the doctor whose conduct deprives him of life-saving medical care. This is why our Fourth Amendment cases speak broadly of claims involving the 'provision of medical care,'. . . not simply the 'denial of medical care by a jailer' (as the defendants would have it). . . . The defendants next argue that even if their conduct violated Okoro's Fourth Amendment rights, qualified immunity is proper because no previous decision 'applied the Fourth Amendment to analyze the reasonableness of health care provided by contracted medical professionals to arrestees being held by the police in jail.' If there is any lack of clarity in our previous cases, however, it is only with respect to the threshold issue whether the defense of qualified immunity is ever available to private medical care providers like the defendants. . . .The Supreme Court recently considered the question whether 'an individual hired by the government to do its work is prohibited from seeking [absolute or qualified] immunity, solely because he works for the government on something other than a permanent or full-time basis.'. . It held that 'immunity under § 1983 should not vary depending on whether an individual working for the government does so as a full-time employee, or on some other basis.'. . On the other hand, the Filarsky Court reaffirmed the holding of Richardson categorically rejecting immunity for the private prison employees there; in so doing, the Court emphasized that the incentives of the private market suffice to protect employees when 'a private firm, systematically organized to assume a major lengthy administrative task ... for profit and potentially in competition with other firms,' assumes responsibility for managing an institution. . . In a detailed opinion tracking the Court's analysis in Filarsky, the Sixth Circuit recently held that a doctor providing psychiatric services to inmates at a state prison is not entitled to assert qualified immunity. McCullum v. Tepe, 693 F.3d 696 (6th Cir. 2012) (discussing the historical roots of immunity for similarly situated parties and the history and purpose of § 1983); see also Hasher v. Hayman, 2013 WL 1288205 (D.N.J. Mar. 27, 2013) (private medical employees failed to establish that they are entitled to assert a qualified immunity defense, 'even after Filarsky'). We find the Sixth Circuit's reasoning persuasive, though we need not definitively decide the issue today; even if our defendants were entitled to seek qualified immunity as a general matter, we would conclude that the defense is not applicable here. The contours of Okoro's Fourth Amendment rights were 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right' throughout the period of Okoro's detention. . . . As we already have explained, nothing in our opinions hints at some special Fourth Amendment exemption for health care professionals . . . . It was 'quite clear' in 2004, we said, 'that the Fourth Amendment protects a person's rights until she has had a probable cause hearing.'. . It was no less clear in December 2008, when Okoro collapsed in his cell, that the same Fourth Amendment standard applies to the wrongdoing alleged here."); Carpenter v. Gage, 686 F.3d 644, 650 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Carpenter also argues that the deputies exhibited deliberate indifference to his medical needs in violation of his constitutional rights. Because the alleged violation occurred after Carpenter was arrested, our cases suggest that it is properly analyzed under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. McRaven v. Sanders, 577 F.3d 974, 979 (8th Cir.2009); Spencer v. Knapheide Truck Equipment Co., 183 F.3d 902, 905 & n. 3 (8th Cir.1999); cf. Graham, 490 U.S. at 395 n. 10 (noting an unresolved question whether the Fourth Amendment applies to an excessive force claim after an arrest ends and pretrial detention begins). Carpenter cites authorities applying due process analysis, and he does not invoke the Fourth Amendment, so we consider his argument on that basis. But cf. Ortiz v. City of Chi., 656 F.3d 523, 530 (7th Cir.2011); Barrie v. Grand County, Utah, 119 F.3d 862, 870–71 (10th Cir.1997) (Briscoe, J., dissenting)."); Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523, 530, 531 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Before delving into the facts, the court determined that the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard governs this inquiry, rather than the deliberate indifference standard derived from the Eighth Amendment and applied to claims from detainees awaiting a trial by virtue of the Due Process Clause. Because Molina had not yet benefitted from a judicial determination of probable cause, otherwise known as a Gerstein hearing, we agree that the Fourth Amendment applies. . . . Each state actor who encounters a detainee must reasonably respond to medical complaints; a detainee cannot be treated like a hot potato, to be passed along as quickly as possible to the next holder. The duty to respond reasonably to an arrestee's medical needs is affected by any police policies that may endanger the well-being of those in custody. Here, the CPD's policy of prohibiting detainees from taking medication in lockup unless the individual is transported to Cermak Hospital is central to our inquiry. We have no occasion to comment on whether that policy is wise as a general matter, but its existence cannot be ignored. When a state actor detains a known diabetic in a facility that separates her from the drugs that keep her alive, it must take her medical needs into account in deciding what justifies a trip to the hospital. Presumably, at least part of the function served by creating a screening record for each detainee upon arrival is to gain the information about her health status that is needed to ensure that she remains safe while in custody. In short, in cases like this we must consider everything that each officer knew about Molina's deteriorating health in light of the amount of time she was in custody and the CPD's policy that detainees could not obtain any medication unless they were sent to the hospital."); Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898, 905 (8th Cir. 2011) ("At oral argument, counsel for two of the officers asserted that Chambers's claim against them does not arise under the Fourth Amendment, because the Fourth Amendment applies only up to the point of arrest. We have noted the existence of a 'legal twilight zone' between arrest and sentencing, where it is unclear whether excessive force claims are governed by the Fourth Amendment or cases decided based on the Fourteenth Amendment and substantive due process. [citing Wilson v. Spain] This court has ruled, however, that it is appropriate to use a Fourth Amendment framework to analyze excessive force claims arising out of incidents occurring shortly after arrest, apparently because those incidents still occur 'in [the] course of' a seizure of a free citizen. . . In particular, we have applied Fourth Amendment excessive force standards to incidents occurring during the transportation, booking, and initial detention of recently arrested persons. . . The alleged excessive force here occurred during and shortly after Chambers's arrest, while he was on the floor of the apartment where police encountered him and while he was transported to the hospital for a medical evaluation as part of the detainee intake process. Our cases therefore dictate that the claims against the officers are governed by the Fourth Amendment."); Sallenger v. City of Springfield, Ill., 630 F.3d 499, 503 (7th Cir. 2010) ("The Estate claimed that Officers Zimmerman, Oakes, and Oliver failed to adequately respond when Sallenger stopped breathing after being hobbled. The Fourth Amendment's objective reasonableness standard applies; the Estate's claim pertains to the medical needs of a person under arrest who has not yet had a judicial determination of probable cause."); Aldini v. Johnson, 609 F.3d 858, 860, 865 n.6, 867 (6th Cir. 2010) ("The most important question before us is whether the Fourth or the Fourteenth Amendment applies to pre-trial detainees in the process of booking but after they are no longer in the custody of the arresting officer. The Supreme Court has deliberately left the question of what law protects these post-arrest, pre-conviction detainees vague, and we have never addressed this precise question. We find that the Fourth Amendment protects pre-trial detainees arrested without a warrant through the completion of their probable-cause hearings and thus find that the district court erred in applying the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . . The majority of circuits hold that the Fourth Amendment applies until an individual arrested without a warrant appears before a neutral magistrate for arraignment or for a probable cause hearing or until the arrestee leaves the joint or sole custody of the arresting officer or officers. [collecting cases] . . . . Placing the dividing line at the probable-cause hearing for those arrested without a warrant does. . . have a basis in Supreme Court precedent. The Court noted in dicta in Wolfish that individuals who have not had a probable-cause hearing are not yet pretrial detainees for constitutional purposes. . .Thus, unlike the arrestee's transfer out of the arresting officer's custody or the completion of booking procedures, the probable-cause hearing is a judicial proceeding that affects the 'legal status' of the arrestee, constitutionally authorizing his detention throughout the proceedings against him, just as a guilty verdict affects his 'legal status' by authorizing his detention for the duration of his sentence. . . . We therefore join the Ninth and Tenth Circuits in setting the dividing line between the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment zones of protection at the probable-cause hearing. . . .In this case, it is undisputed that the beating and tasing took place in the middle of the booking procedure, because Aldini's photograph had not yet been taken, and prior to a probable-cause hearing. Thus, the district court erred in applying the Fourteenth Amendment standard to an arrestee detained following a warrantless arrest prior to a probable-cause hearing."); Hill v. Carroll County, Miss., 587 F.3d 230, 237, 238 (5th Cir. 2009) ("Hill includes failing to monitor Loggins within her Fourth Amendment unreasonable seizure claim. . . .This claim sounds not in the Fourth Amendment but in the Fourteenth. See Nerren v. Livingston Police Department, 86 F.3d 469, 473 (5th Cir.1996) ("[a]fter the initial incidents of a seizure have concluded and an individual is being detained by police officials but has yet to be booked, an arrestee's right to medical attention, like that of a pre-trial detainee, derives from the Fourteenth Amendment"). Although the panel in Gutierrez suggests otherwise, 139 F.3d at 452, a later panel of this court cannot overrule an earlier panel decision. Harvey v. Blake, 913 F.2d 226, 228 n. 2 (5th Cir.1990); see also Wagner, 227 F.3d at 324-25 (applying Fourteenth Amendment). Nerren, as the earlier decision, therefore controls. The claim for failure to monitor is, at its heart, the failure to provide medical attention due to insufficient monitoring."); Drogosch v. Metcalf, 557 F.3d 372, 378 (6th Cir. 2009) ("But it is the Fourth, rather than the Fourteenth, Amendment that applies to this case because 'the Fourth Amendment governs the period of confinement between arrest without a warrant and the preliminary hearing at which a determination of probable cause is made, while due process regulates the period of confinement after the initial determination of probable cause.' Villanova v. Abrams, 972 F.2d 792, 797 (7th Cir.1992). Because Drogosch was never provided with an initial determination of probable cause, we conclude that the Fourth Amendment governs the rights at stake in the present case."); Orem v. Rephann, 523 F.3d 442, 445, 446 (4th Cir. 2008) ("Here, the district court analyzed Orem's claim that Deputy Rephann used excessive force under the Fourth Amendment's 'objective reasonableness standard.' However, we have made clear that Fourth Amendment protections do not extend to arrestees or pretrial detainees. Riley v. Dorton, 115 F.3d 1159 (4th Cir.1997) (en banc). Indeed, in Riley, we held that '[t]he Fourth Amendment [only] governs claims of excessive force during the course of an arrest, investigatory stop, or other'seizure' of a person.'. . Whereas, 'excessive force claims of a pretrial detainee [or arrestee] are governed by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . The point at which Fourth Amendment protections end and Fourteenth Amendment protections begin is often murky. But here, Orem's excessive force claim arises

during her transport to EJR, after she was arrested. While she had not been formally charged, her status as an arrestee requires application of the Fourteenth Amendment to her claim. The district court erred in applying the Fourth Amendment."); Williams v. Rodriguez, 509 F.3d 392, 402, 403 (7th Cir. 2007) ("Although Williams's deliberate indifference claim fails under the Fourteenth Amendment analysis, it is worth noting that while this suit was before the district court, this court recognized in Lopez v. City of Chicago that the Fourteenth Amendment's due process protections only apply to a pretrial detainee's confinement conditions after he has received a judicial determination of probable cause. Lopez v. City of Chicago, 464 F.3d 711, 719 (7th Cir.2006). Claims regarding conditions of confinement for pretrial detainees such as Williams, who have not yet had a judicial determination of probable cause (a Gerstein hearing), are instead governed by the Fourth Amendment and its objectively unreasonable standard. . . . The Lopez decision came out nearly two months before the district court granted defendants' summary judgment motion in this case, and Williams has waived any Fourth Amendment claim by failing to amend or supplement his motion for summary judgment or raise the issue on appeal Without offering any opinion as to whether Williams's deliberate indifference claim would have been successful under a Fourth Amendment analysis, we do note that the deliberate indifference standard under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments requires a higher showing on a plaintiff's part than is necessary to prove an officer's conduct was 'objectively unreasonable under the circumstances.' . . . What is 'objectively unreasonable' in the context of a medical needs case has been further clarified by this court in Sides v. City of Champaign, 496 F.3d 820 (7th Cir.2007). In that case, the plaintiff was ordered out of his vehicle by police and made to stand against the fender of his car, which was hot, on a ninety degree day for approximately one hour. . . This led the plaintiff to complain to the officers of dizziness, dehydration, and soreness, but the officers did not permit the plaintiff to move. . . The reasoning underlying this court's determination that the officers did not violate the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights implicitly identified four factors that are relevant for ascertaining whether a defendant's conduct was objectively unreasonable. . . The first is that the officer be given notice of the arrestee's medical need, whether by word as occurred in Sides, or through observation of the arrestee's physical symptoms. . . Second, the court in Sides considered the seriousness of the medical need, in that case noting that the plaintiff's complaints were not accompanied by any physical symptoms. . . The severity of the medical condition under this standard need not, on its own, rise to the level of objective seriousness required under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment. Instead, the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness analysis operates on a sliding scale, balancing the seriousness of the medical need with the third factor − the scope of the requested treatment. In Sides for example, the court noted that the plaintiff was partially responsible for his lengthy detention outdoors, since he insisted that the officers not charge him at all, rather than requesting that the officers take him to the station house or write him a citation immediately. . . Finally, police interests also factor into the reasonableness determination. This factor is wide-ranging in scope and can include administrative, penological, or investigatory concerns. Sides reflected the latter of these interests, with the court emphasizing the importance of an on-site investigation and noting that the officers did not prolong the plaintiff's detention once this investigation was completed. . . Again, we offer no opinion as to whether defendants' conduct violated Williams's Fourth Amendment rights under this multi-factor analysis, but for the reasons discussed above, Williams has failed to meet the higher burden of showing that Officer Rodriguez was deliberately indifferent to an objectively serious medical condition."); Sides v. City of Champaign, 496 F.3d 820, 827, 828 (7th Cir. 2007) ("Sides claims that the officers were deliberately indifferent to his serious medical needs during his detention in the parking lot. All of the briefs use the 'deliberate indifference' approach from jurisprudence under the Eighth Amendment, . . . but that provision does not apply until a suspect has been convicted. The governing standard at the time of arrest is the Fourth Amendment's ban on unreasonable seizures. . . . . Although Chapman v. Keltner, 241 F.3d 842, 845 (7th Cir.2001), asks whether the officers' conduct at the time of arrest evinced 'deliberate indifference to a serious injury or medical need,' the parties to Chapman did not join issue on the proper standard or discuss the bearing of Graham and Bell on contentions of this kind. A decision that employs a mutual (and mutually mistaken) assumption of the parties without subjecting it to independent analysis does not constitute a holding on the subject. Chapman should not be understood as extending the domain of Eighth Amendment analysis beyond the bounds set by Graham and Bell."); Tatum v. City & Cty. of San Francisco, 441 F.3d 1090, 1098-99 (9th Cir. 2006) ("Just as the Fourth Amendment does not require a police officer to use the least intrusive method of arrest, . . . neither does it require an officer to provide what hindsight reveals to be the most effective medical care for an arrested suspect. Prior to its holding in Graham, that 'all claims that law enforcement officers have used excessive force ... should be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment,'. . . the Supreme Court said that the Due Process Clause requires the provision of medical care to 'persons ... who have been injured while being apprehended by the police.' City of Revere v. Mass. Gen. Hosp., 463 U.S. 239, 244, 103 S.Ct. 2979, 77 L.Ed.2d 605 (1983) (holding that city had a constitutional obligation to provide medical care to a person injured during an arrest, and that the city satisfied its duty to provide medical care by taking an injured suspect to a hospital). Likewise, before Graham, we said that '[d]ue process requires that police officers seek the necessary medical attention for a detainee when he or she has been injured while being apprehended by either promptly summoning the necessary medical help or by taking the injured detainee to a hospital.' Maddox v. City of Los Angeles, 792 F.2d 1408, 1415 (9th Cir.1986). Although it was decided before Graham, we think that Maddox sets the standard for objectively reasonable post-arrest care. Accordingly, we hold that a police officer who promptly summons the necessary medical assistance has acted reasonably for purposes of the Fourth Amendment, even if the officer did not administer CPR. See Maddox, 792 F.2d at 1415 ('We have found no authority suggesting that the due process clause establishes an affirmative duty on the part of police officers to render CPR in any and all circumstances.')."); Hicks v. Moore, 422 F.3d 1246, 1254 n.7 (11th Cir. 2005)("'Claims involving the mistreatment of arrestees or pretrial detainees in custody are governed by the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause,' and require a showing of deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm. . .Plaintiff asserts protection under the Fourth Amendment standard, which is commonly an easier standard for a plaintiff to meet. At the time of the fingerprinting, Plaintiff had already been arrested, delivered to the Jail, and had begun − but not completed − the booking process. The original arresting officer had turned Plaintiff over to jailers, and he was not present during and did not participate in the events underlying the complaint. The precise point at which a seizure ends (for purposes of Fourth Amendment coverage) and at which pretrial detention begins (governed until a conviction by the Fourteenth Amendment) is not settled in this Circuit. We underline that Defendants never argue that the strip search or fingerprinting was separate from Plaintiff's seizure; so we − will assume (for this case) Plaintiff was still being seized and − analyze the claim under the Fourth Amendment."); Bryant v. City of New York, 404 F.3d 128, 136 (2d Cir. 2005) ("The Fourth Amendment, which applies to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. . . prohibits 'unreasonable ... seizures,' U.S. Const. amend IV. Indisputably, an arrest is a seizure. Further, although plaintiffs would have us rule that a 'seizure' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment consists only of the initial act of physical restraint, and nothing thereafter . . . , it is well established that the Fourth Amendment governs the procedures applied during some period following an arrest. . . . . Accordingly, given that plaintiffs complain that defendants' failure to issue them desk appearance tickets unconstitutionally prolonged their respective periods of postarrest detention, we turn to Fourth Amendment principles."); Boone v. Spurgess, 385 F.3d 923, 933, 934 (6th Cir. 2004) ("An allegation by Boone that Moyer had used excessive force against him after his arrest would therefore be a Fourth Amendment question: was the continuing seizure of Boone reasonable? A seizure can be 'unreasonable' for any number of reasons, and the guarantee of reasonableness in the manner of a seizure does not seem to allow for a distinction between a claim that an officer used excessive force and a claim that the same officer denied medical care to a detainee. In Graham itself, the excessive force claim was partially based on the officers' refusal to provide medical care to a handcuffed suspect suffering from a diabetic attack. . . At least one circuit has therefore applied the Fourth Amendment's guarantee of 'reasonable' seizures to a claim that police failed to provide adequate medical care to a suspect in their custody. See Estate of Phillips v. City of Milwaukee, 123 F.3d 586, 595-96 (7th Cir.1997). But see Barrie v. Grand County, 119 F.3d 862, 865-69 (10th Cir.1997). None of our prior cases speak directly to this issue, although we have in the past used the Fourteenth Amendment even where the suspect was still technically 'seized' under the continuing seizure doctrine, without noting the conflict. See, e.g., Weaver, 340 F.3d at 410; Lily v. Watkins, 273 F.3d 682, 685-86 (6th Cir.2001). District courts in the circuit have split on the issue. Compare Estate of Owensby v. City of Cincinnati, No. 1:01-CV-00769, 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9444, *42-*60 (S.D.Ohio May 19, 2004) (using substantive due process) with Alexander v. Beale St. Blues Co., 108 F.Supp.2d 934, 940-41 (W.D.Tenn.1999) (using reasonableness standard and relying on Estate of Phillips, 123 F.3d at 595-96). Ultimately, there seems to be no logical distinction between excessive force claims and denial of medical care claims when determining the applicability of the Fourth Amendment. Because we conclude that under either standard, Boone has not made out a claim, we do not decide this issue, but instead reserve it for a more appropriate case."); Garrett v. Athens-Clarke County, 378 F.3d 1274, 1279 n.11 (11th Cir. 2004) ("Defendants argue we should analyze the excessive force claims under the rubric of the Fourteenth Amendment, not the Fourth Amendment. We disagree. The excessive force claims arise from events happening in the course of the arrest. . . . Although the line is not always clear as to when an arrest ends and pretrial detainment begins, the facts here fall on the arrest end. See Gutierrez v. City of San Antonio, 139 F.3d 441, 452 (5th Cir.1998) (stating Fourteenth Amendment analysis does not begin until "after the incidents of arrest are completed, after the plaintiff has been released from the arresting officer's custody, and after the plaintiff has been in detention awaiting trial for a significant period of time") (quotation and citation omitted)."); Gibson v. County of Washoe, 290 F.3d 1175, 1197 (9th Cir. 2002) ("Although the Supreme Court has not expressly decided whether the Fourth Amendment's prohibition on unreasonable searches and seizures continues to protect individuals during pretrial detention, . . we have determined that the Fourth Amendment sets the 'applicable constitutional limitations' for considering claims of excessive force during pretrial detention. . . Graham therefore explicates the standards applicable to a pretrial detention excessive force claim in this circuit."); Phelps v. Coy, 286 F.3d 295, 299, 300 (6th Cir. 2002) ("The question of which amendment supplies Phelps's rights is not merely academic, for the standards of liability vary significantly according to which amendment applies. . . . Which amendment applies depends on the status of the plaintiff at the time of the incident, whether free citizen, convicted prisoner, or something in between. . . . If the plaintiff was a free person at the time of the incident and the use of force occurred in the course of an arrest or other seizure of the plaintiff, the plaintiff's claim arises under the Fourth Amendment and its reasonableness standard . . . . For a plaintiff who was a convicted prisoner at the time of the incident, the Eighth Amendment sets the standard for an excessive force claim. . . . Finally, if a plaintiff is not in a situation where his rights are governed by the particular provisions of the Fourth or Eighth Amendments, the more generally applicable due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment still provides the individual some protection against physical abuse by officials . . . . Coy contends that the Fourth Amendment does not apply to Phelps's case because Phelps had already been arrested when the incident took place. Our cases refute the idea that the protection of the Fourth Amendment disappears so suddenly. At the time of the incident, Phelps was still in the custody of Coy and Stutes, the arresting officers. Stutes was booking Phelps when he asked Phelps to raise his foot, and this was the gesture which Coy mistook for aggression. After the incident, Phelps was booked and released, rather than being incarcerated as a pretrial detainee. We have explicitly held that the Fourth Amendment reasonableness standard governs throughout the seizure of a person. . . . Whatever arguments can be made about pretrial detainees' rights are beside the point in this case, in which the plaintiff was still in the custody of the arresting officers and was never incarcerated. The 'murky area' does not begin until the protection of the Fourth Amendment ends, and our precedent establishes that an arrestee in the custody of the arresting officers is still sheltered by the Fourth Amendment."); Fontana v. Haskin, 262 F.3d 871, 878, 879 & n.5 (9th Cir. 2001) ("At the outset, we make two related points about the scope of the Fourth Amendment. (1) Fontana's claim is a Fourth Amendment claim for unreasonable seizure and intrusion on one's bodily integrity, and (2) the Fourth Amendment protects a criminal defendant after arrest on the trip to the police station. First, even though this case does not involve excessive force in the traditional sense, it still falls within the Fourth Amendment. The Fourth Amendment's requirement that a seizure be reasonable prohibits more than the unnecessary strike of a nightstick, sting of a bullet, and thud of a boot. . . . Second, we have held that 'once a seizure has occurred, it continues throughout the time the arrestee is in the custody of the arresting officers.... Therefore, excessive use of force by a law enforcement officer in the course of transporting an arrestee gives rise to a section 1983 claim based upon a violation of the Fourth Amendment.' Robins v. Harum, 773 F.2d 1004, 1010 (9th Cir.1985). . . . . We note that the circuits are split on this issue. Compare Wilson v. Spain, 209 F.3d 713, 715-16 (8th Cir.2000) (adopting continuing seizure approach); United States v.

Johnstone, 107 F.3d 200, 206-07 (3d Cir.1997) (same), and Frohmader v. Wayne, 958 F.2d 1024, 1026 (10th Cir.1992) (same), and Powell v. Gardner, 891 F.2d 1039, 1044 (2d Cir.1989) (same), and McDowell v. Rogers, 863 F.2d 1302, 1306 (6th Cir.1988), with Riley v. Dorton, 115 F.3d 1159, 1164 (4th Cir.1997) (declining to adopt a 'continuing seizure' conception of the Fourth Amendment, and listing cases from circuits rejecting and adopting the rule), and Cottrell v. Caldwell, 85 F.3d 1480, 1490 (11th Cir.1996) (analyzing claims of pretrial detainees under Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause), and Brothers v. Klevenhagen, 28 F.3d 452, 456 (5th Cir.1994) (same), and Wilkins v. May, 872 F.2d 190 (7th Cir.1989) (same)."); Wilson v. Spain, 209 F.3d 713, 715 & n.2 (8th Cir. 2000) ("Between arrest and sentencing lies something of a legal twilight zone. The Supreme Court has left open the question of how to analyze a claim concerning the use of excessive force by law enforcement 'beyond the point at which arrest ends and pretrial detention begins,' Graham, 490 U.S. at 395 n. 10, and the circuits are split. . . . Some circuits hold that after the act of arrest, substantive due process is the proper constitutional provision because the Fourth Amendment is no longer relevant. See Riley v. Dorton, 115 F.3d 1159, 1161-64 (4th Cir.) (en banc), cert. denied, 522 U.S. 1030 (1997); Cottrel v. Caldwell, 85 F.3d 1480, 1490 (11th Cir.1996); Wilkins v. May, 872 F.2d 190, 192-95 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 1026 (1989). Other circuits hold that the Fourth Amendment applies until an individual arrested without a warrant appears before a neutral magistrate for arraignment or for a probable cause hearing, or until the arrestee leaves the joint or sole custody of the arresting officer or officers. See Barrie v. Grand County, 119 F.3d 862, 866 (10th Cir.1997); Pierce v. Multnomah County, 76 F.3d 1032, 1042-43 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 519 U.S. 1006 (1996); Powell v. Gardner, 891 F.2d 1039, 1044 (2d Cir.1989); McDowell v. Rogers, 863 F.2d 1302, 1306-07 (6th Cir.1988). The Fifth Circuit, while generally taking the position that substantive due process applies after the act of arrest, see Valencia v. Wiggins, 981 F.2d 1440, 1443-45 (5th Cir .), cert. denied, 509 U.S. 905 (1993), has concluded that the relevant constitutional provisions overlap and blur in certain factual contexts. See Petta v. Rivera, 143 F.3d 895, 910-914 (5th Cir.1998) (noting that Fourth Amendment standards are sometimes used in analyzing claims technically governed by substantive due process). . . . This Court previously has applied the Fourth Amendment to situations very similar to this case. In Moore v. Novak, 146 F.3d 531 (8th Cir.1998), law enforcement officers at a jail used force against an arrestee who was being violent and disruptive during the booking process. See id. at 532-33. We held that the district court appropriately applied Fourth Amendment standards to Moore's excessive-force claims. See id. at 535. Similarly, in Mayard v. Hopwood, 105 F.3d 1226 (8th Cir.1997), we applied Fourth Amendment standards not only to the act of arrest, but also to use of force against an arrestee who was restrained in the back of a police car. See id. at 1228. We therefore shall use the Fourth Amendment to analyze Wilson's federal claims. In doing so, we observe that if Wilson cannot win his case under Fourth Amendment standards, it is a certainty he cannot win it under the seemingly more burdensome, and clearly no less burdensome, standards that must be met to establish a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim.").

See also Wilbourn v. Sheriff of Cook County, No. 23 CV 1782, 2024 WL 897463, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 1, 2024) ("Wilbourn alleges that the Sheriff's policy to arrest pre-trial detainees for violations of electronic monitoring without first obtaining an order from a court violates the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . He argues that a hearing was required before the Sheriff effectively revoked his release on electronic monitoring by arresting him and holding him at the Cook County jail. . . But pre-trial detention, including the detention of an individual granted bail, is governed by the Fourth Amendment. . .Wilbourn brings two Fourth Amendment claims and those are the appropriate vehicles for his complaint about his arrest and detention. [citing Manuel] Wilbourn doesn't explain why the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause grants him different or additional protection than the Fourth Amendment's requirement of a 'neutral decision-maker between unchecked official discretion and invasions of private liberty by search or seizure.'. . When the Fourth Amendment provides constitutional protection against intrusive state action, it provides the guide for analyzing the plaintiff's claims instead of 'the more generalized notion of substantive due process.'. . The cases Wilbourn cites to support his invocation of the Fourteenth Amendment involve people who were on parole after serving a custodial sentence. . . or serving probation as their criminal sentence. . . [T]heir guilt had been adjudicated and different constitutional rights were at stake than for a pre-trial detainee. Wilbourn's Fourteenth Amendment claim does not advance a different set of rights than those contained in his Fourth Amendment claim—his right to remain free from seizure absent a judicial finding that he violated the terms of electronic monitoring or probable cause that he committed another crime; his Fourteenth Amendment claim is dismissed."); Jalloh v. Underwood, No. 16-1613 (TJK), 2020 WL 2615522, at *3 & n.3 (D.D.C. May 22, 2020) ("[W]hether Count II may be brought under the Fourth Amendment against either the Maryland Defendants or the District Defendants is an unsettled question that the parties have not briefed. After Revere, which said nothing about the Fourth Amendment, the Supreme Court clarified that the Fourth Amendment, not the Fourteenth Amendment, governs an arrestee's excessive force claims. . . Since then, the D.C. Circuit has not addressed whether an arrestee's claim that authorities failed to provide him medical assistance may be grounded in the Fourth Amendment. Several courts in this District have analyzed such claims (against police officers employed by the District of Columbia, to whom the Fourteenth Amendment does not apply) under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment, without addressing whether the Fourth Amendment may apply. . . And courts of appeals outside this jurisdiction appear to have split on whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment governs an arrestee's claim that a police officer employed by a state failed to provide medical assistance. . . Notably, this 'is not a purely academic question' because 'the standards of liability vary significantly according to which amendment applies,' which the Court need not recount here. . . . [S]ome courts have also applied Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2470 (2015)—which removed the subjective component of the standard used to evaluate claims of excessive force by pretrial detainees under the Fourteenth Amendment—to claims of failure to provide medical assistance as well. See Miranda v. County of Lake, 900 F.3d 335, 352 (7th Cir. 2018) (canvassing circuit split and joining the Second and Ninth Circuits in applying Kingsley to medical assistance claims while acknowledging that the Fifth, Eighth, and Eleventh Circuits have not); Banks v. Booth, No. 20-cv-849 (CKK), 2020 WL 1914896, at *5–6 (D.D.C. Apr. 19, 2020) (applying Kingsley to medical assistance claims). If Kingsley applies to medical assistance claims, then the liability standards under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments would be the same, mooting the question of which amendment governs. . . . For these reasons, the Court will deny the motion for summary judgment without prejudice as to Count II. The Court will grant Jalloh leave to amend Count II, if he wishes, either to clarify the legal basis for his claim or the Defendants against whom he asserts it. Then Defendants may, if they wish, move again for summary judgment on Count II."); Bishop v. White, No. 16 C 6040, 2019 WL 5550576, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 28, 2019) ("'Deliberate indifference' is the standard for claims of denial of medical care brought under the Fourteenth and Eighth Amendment, but '[t]he relevant legal standard for arrestees who have been seized but who have not yet had their probable cause hearing...comes from the Fourth Amendment, not the Fourteenth.' Currie v. Chhabra, 728 F.3d 626, 631 (7th Cir. 2013). Under the Fourth Amendment, in such circumstances, '[t]he issue is whether the state actor's "response to [the arrestee]'s medical needs was objectively unreasonable" and "caused the harm of which [the arrestee] complains."'"); Shoffler v. City of Wildwood, No. CV 17-4859 (NLH)(JS), 2019 WL 4165305, at *9–10 (D.N.J. Sept. 3, 2019) ("The Third Circuit has noted that the exact point at which an individual transitions from arrestee to pretrial detainee has not been expressly ruled upon by the Circuit. . . Under Third Circuit law, force used by a police officer 'in the police station garage, after [the arrestee] had been transported from the scene of the initial beating' although, 'the closest – both temporally and spatially – to pre-trial detention at the station house ... [was found to have] occurred during the course of [a] defendant's arrest.' United States v. Johnstone, 107 F.3d 200 (3d Cir. 1997). Recently, this district, relying on Johnstone, found that alleged excessive force against an individual 'during his transport to the police station must be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment.' Panarello v. City of Vineland, 160 F. Supp. 3d 734, 756 (D.N.J. Feb. 8, 2016). Because the claims relating to the Wildwood Defendants occurred either during the arrest, during transport after the arrest, or while the Plaintiff was being processed at the police station, the Court will analyze these claims under the Fourth Amendment. No party has argued that the Fourteenth Amendment's analysis should apply given the circumstances surrounding Plaintiff's claims or that the analysis would materially differ from the analysis under the Fourth Amendment."); Collett v. Hamilton County, Ohio, No. 1:17-CV-295, 2019 WL 121360, at *4-5 (S.D. Ohio Jan. 7, 2019) ("Plaintiff argues that because he was an 'arrestee' rather than a prisoner or pretrial detainee at the time he was injured, his excessive force claims are properly analyzed under the Fourth Amendment's 'objective reasonableness' standard, so that the standards for claims brought under the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments do not apply here. . . In support of his argument, plaintiff relies on a 2003 case from the Third Circuit, Hughes v. Shestakov, 76 F. App'x 450 (3d Cir. 2003), which held that the proper test in analyzing an excessive force claim is 'objective reasonableness.'. . . In their reply, defendants again cite Hopper . . . for the proposition that the Fourteenth Amendment applies here but they no longer advocate for application of the 'objective reasonableness' standard that has long been applied in excessive force cases involving a search or seizure. . . Defendants adopt the position that at the time of plaintiff's injuries, he had already been seized (arrested), and his truck had already been searched, so his claims do not arise in the context of a search of seizure. However, they acknowledge that plaintiff was not yet a convicted prisoner protected by the Eighth Amendment. Defendants contend that plaintiff therefore fell into a 'gray area' between free citizen and convicted criminal that is not governed by the 'objective reasonableness' standard of the Fourth Amendment. . . Defendants instead argue that plaintiff's claims are appropriately analyzed under the Fourteenth Amendment 'shocks the conscience' standard. . . . It is clear that the Fourth Amendment applies to plaintiff's excessive force claims. The Sixth Circuit follows a 'continuing seizure rule' under which 'the seizure that occurs when a person is arrested continues throughout the time the person remains in the custody of the arresting officers,' and the Fourth Amendment 'objective reasonableness' standard controls. . . The Sixth Circuit has 'acknowledged that Fourth Amendment protections do not vanish at the moment of arrest' and that its prior cases 'refute the idea that the protection of the Fourth Amendment disappears so suddenly.'. . The Sixth Circuit found that such protections apply at least through the completion of the booking procedure, which is typically handled by jailers. . . The Court in Aldini confirmed the applicability of the Fourth Amendment from the time of arrest through at least the booking process and answered the question of how far the protection extends. . . The Sixth Circuit held that the dividing line was the probable cause hearing, so that the protections of the Fourth Amendment apply to a detainee arrested without a warrant between the time of the arrest and the probable-cause hearing. . . The alleged excessive force in this case occurred after plaintiff's warrantless arrest and before he was booked on the charges against him. Thus, the Fourth Amendment governs plaintiff's excessive force claims."); Newsome v. Madison County, Illinois, No. 316CV01103JPGDGW, 2018 WL 2064989, at *2–3 (S.D. Ill. May 3, 2018) ("Mr. Newsome died at the jail shortly after he was arrested and before his probable cause hearing. Accordingly, Mr. Newsome is what is known as a pre-Gerstein arrestee. When a pre-Gerstein arrestee brings a constitutional claim arising from his conditions of confinement, it is typically covered by the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness test—a more stringent standard than Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference. . . And that makes perfect sense: if the police arrest a man and toss him in jail, and that man has not yet appeared before a judge to determine whether there was probable cause for the arrest in the first place, surely the jail should exercise even more caution than usual to ensure that they are not violating that man's rights. . . While the Seventh Circuit has not yet had the opportunity to apply this rationale to failure to protect claims, they have already done so with Eighth Amendment inadequate medical care cases. See, e.g., Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523, 530 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Because Molina had not yet benefitted from a judicial determination of probable cause, otherwise known as a Gerstein hearing, we agree that the Fourth Amendment applies."); King v. Kramer, 763 F.3d 635, 641–48 (7th Cir. 2014) (reversing and remanding when the district court incorrectly applied the Eighth Amendment standard instead of the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness test). And considering the Supreme Court has recently extended the doctrine to excessive force claims by pre-trial detainees, it is logical to also apply the doctrine to failure to protect claims in the same manner. . . Both parties recognized this distinction in their briefs. Newsome claims that she pled her Fourteenth and Fourth Amendment claims in the alternative so that she may proceed on whichever the Court deems correct. The defendants, however, assert that the Fourteenth/Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference standard should apply here—but they are incorrect in light of Kingsley, Lopez, Williams, Ortiz, and King. The defendants also argue that 'the Fourth Amendment does not provide remedies for failure to protect claims' at all, but that is wrong. Failure to protect claims arising under the Fourth Amendment focus on an individual's right to be free from an unreasonable seizure, and the Seventh Circuit has long recognized that theory as valid. Yang v. Hardin, 37 F.3d 282, 284–86 (7th Cir. 1994).

Accordingly, the Court will dismiss the 14th Amendment claims—Counts II, IV, and VI—for failure to state a claim for relief, and proceed on the Fourth Amendment claims."); Saintcome v. Tully, No. CV 16-12490-NMG, 2017 WL 5178033, at *2–3 (D. Mass. Nov. 8, 2017) ("When a pretrial detainee makes an allegation of excessive force, there is an open question concerning the specific civil right which has been infringed. . . The Court in Graham reserved the question of whether the Fourth Amendment's protection of arrestees against excessive force extends to pretrial detainees, or whether such claims should be analyzed under Fourteenth Amendment due process. . . The 1st Circuit has yet to resolve the question but some district courts within the Circuit have analyzed the issue under the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable seizures. . . For the purpose of this motion, we accept as pled the plaintiff's uncontested claim that the civil right implicated in this instance of purported excessive force was his right to be free of unreasonable seizure. Defendants maintain that the use of force described in the complaint cannot rise to the level of a constitutional violation because the quantum of force used was de minimis. To support that contention, they cite the Supreme Court's holding in Hudson v. McMillian, 503 U.S. 1, 9–10, 112 S.Ct. 995, 117 L.Ed.2d 156 (1992) and a string of subsequent cases. Those cases are inapposite, however, because they deal with the Eighth Amendment's bar on corrective punishment of convicts. Because, at the time of the incident, plaintiff was not convicted of a crime but rather was a pre-trial detainee, it is the Fourth, not the Eighth, Amendment that is implicated. The proper standard in this case is to examine whether, in the context of the incident, the level of force used against Saintcome was objectively reasonable. See Kingsley, 135 S.Ct. at 2473. An attempt to quantify the harm suffered by plaintiff has little bearing on whether the force was necessary or reasonable. Taking these facts as true, plaintiff has pled facts that plausibly constitute a claim of excessive force. Accordingly, plaintiff's cause of action will not be dismissed on these grounds."); Bryant v. Meriden Police Dep't, No. 3:13-CV-449 (SRU), 2017 WL 1217090, at *6 (D. Conn. Mar. 31, 2017) ("Though circuits remain split on the issue, the Second Circuit has held that 'the Fourth Amendment standard probably should be applied at least to the period prior to the time when the person arrested is arraigned or formally charged, and remains in the custody (sole or joint) of the arresting officer.'. . . Courts within the circuit generally apply the Fourth Amendment to all claims of excessive force prior to the individual being arraigned or formally charged. . . In the instant case, the alleged use of excessive force in the Meriden Police Department holding cell occurred following Bryant's arrest and before he was arraigned or formally charged. Accordingly, Bryant's excessive force claim is appropriately analyzed under the Fourth Amendment."); Queen v. Collier, No. 5:15-CV-01109-MHH, 2016 WL 4073946, at *3-4 (N.D. Ala. Aug. 1, 2016) ("Relying on the Supreme Court's recent decision, Kingsley v. Hendrickson, ---- U.S. ---, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), Mr. Queen argues that the Court need not decide which constitutional amendment applies to his excessive force claim because a claim under either amendment is measured against an objective reasonableness standard. The Court disagrees. In Kingsley, the Supreme Court stated that for a pretrial detainee to prove an excessive force claim, he must show that the officer's use of force was objectively unreasonable. Although Kingsley provided that excessive force claims under the Fourteenth Amendment are governed by an objective reasonableness standard, the Court did not collapse the standard for arrestee and pretrial detainee excessive force cases into a single standard. Instead, the Kingsley Court stated that in applying the 'objectively unreasonable' aspect of the pretrial detainee standard, courts must not only look to Graham's 'facts and circumstances' inquiry, but also account for the 'legitimate interests that stem from [the government's] need to manage the facility in which the individual is detained,' appropriately deferring to 'policies and practices that in th[e] judgment' of jail officials 'are needed to preserve internal order and discipline and to maintain institutional security.'. . Therefore, the Court must identify which constitutional standard applies to Mr. Queen's excessive force claim. . . In the Eleventh Circuit, '[t]he precise point at which a seizure ends (for purposes of Fourth Amendment coverage) and at which pretrial detention begins [for purposes of Fourteenth Amendment coverage] is not settled....' Hicks v. Moore, 422 F.3d 1246, 1254 (11th Cir. 2005). The period of time between an arrest and the beginning of pretrial detention is known as the 'twilight zone.' . . Because Officer Collier's use of force occurred after the arresting officers surrendered Mr. Queen to jail personnel but before detention officers finished the booking process, this case falls squarely in the twilight zone. In twilight zone cases, to identify the applicable constitutional standard, a court must decide whether the force occurred closer to the arrest or the detention end of the spectrum. . . . The Garrett and Fennell opinions demonstrate that the role of the arresting officer weighs heavily in the constitutional analysis of an arrestee's claim. In this case, the officers who arrested Mr. Queen had surrendered Mr. Queen to the custody of Officer Collier at the Morgan County Jail before the confrontation at issue occurred. Although Mr. Queen had not been fully processed at the jail when Officer Collier restrained him and took him to the ground, Mr. Queen had been in detention for a significant period of time. The force in the instant case occurred almost two hours after Mr. Queen arrived at the jail. (In contrast, the force at issue in Fennell occurred just moments after the plaintiff arrived at the jail.) The arrest was over; detention had begun. Considering the foregoing, the Court finds that Mr. Queen was a pretrial detainee at the time of the confrontation with Officer Collier and that the Fourteenth Amendment governs Mr. Queen's excessive force claim."); Foy ex rel Haynie, Jr., No. 15 C 3720, 2016 WL 2770880, at *4 n.3 (N.D. Ill. May 12, 2016) ("The sixth amended complaint does not indicate whether the defendant officers' conduct at the Harrison Police Station occurred before Haynie was given a probable cause hearing pursuant to Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975). If Haynie's arrest was warrantless and the alleged events took place before Haynie was given a probable cause hearing, then Plaintiff's allegations of failure to provide medical care must be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment. . . A claim for failure to provide medical care to an arrestee that is brought under the Fourth Amendment is governed by an 'objectively unreasonable standard.'. . The standard for establishing a Fourth Amendment medical-care claim is lower than that needed to establish deliberate indifference under either the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments. . . Because the sixth amended complaint gives no indication as to whether Haynie was arrested pursuant to a warrant or had received a Gerstein hearing, it is unclear whether the Fourth Amendment or Fourteenth Amendment governs count seven. However, because Plaintiff's claim against Officers Johnson, Philbin, and Banks is sufficient under the Fourteenth Amendment's more stringent deliberate indifference standard, Plaintiff's claim also passes muster under the Fourth Amendment's objectively unreasonable standard."); Panarello v. Cit of Vineland, 160 F.Supp.3d 734, 755-56 (D.N.J. 2016) ("The force used by the Officer Defendants at the time of arrest must be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment. . . However, it is not clear what standard applies to the use of force during Panarello's transportation to the police station and the use of force at the police station. . . The Supreme Court, first in Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989) and most recently in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466 (2015), made clear that excessive force claims made by pretrial detainees in state facilities are to be evaluated under the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause. . . Those cases have specifically left open the issue of when the subject of a criminal case transitions from the status of an arrestee—whose claims are evaluated under the Fourth Amendment—to a pretrial detainee—whose claims are evaluated under the Fifth or Fourteenth Amendment, as appropriate. . . The Third Circuit has also not clarified the issue, but has found that the use of force by a police officer in the station house garage occurred during an arrest, and so would be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment, '[w]ithout deciding where an arrest ends and pretrial detention begins.'. . Other regional circuit courts have determined that the Fourth Amendment continues to apply beyond even this point. See, e.g., Estate of Booker v. Gomez, 745 F.3d 405, 419 (10th Cir. 2014) (applying the Fourth Amendment to a plaintiff arrested without a warrant prior to any probable cause hearing); Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898, 905 (8th Cir. 2011) (applying the Fourth Amendment "to incidents occurring during the transportation, booking, and initial detention of a recently arrested person"); Aldini v. Johnson, 609 F.3d 858, 865–67 (6th Cir. 2010) (applying the Fourth Amendment for warrantless arrestees prior to a probable-cause hearing, relying on dicta in Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520, 536 (1979)). . . Based on the Third Circuit's holding in Johnstone, this Court finds that any alleged use of force against Panarello during his transport to the police station must be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment. This Court also finds that because Panarello was arrested without a warrant, relying on the weight of authority from the other regional circuits, the Fourth Amendment applies to the alleged use of force while in the police station booking room."); Otero v. Dart, No. 12 C 3148, 2016 WL 74667, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 7, 2016) ("The Court first examines Defendant's argument that the Fourteenth Amendment applies under the circumstances and not the Fourth Amendment's protections against unreasonable searches and seizure. Defendant specifically argues that Fourth Amendment protections only apply to detainees during the period of confinement between their arrest and the judicial determination of probable cause. See Ortiz v. City of Chicago, 656 F.3d 523, 530 (7th Cir. 2011); Lopez v. City of Chicago, 464 F.3d 711, 719 (7th Cir. 2006). Plaintiff's claim, however, is based on his post-acquittal confinement, and thus he was 'a free citizen protected by the Fourth Amendment.'. . . The Court therefore turns to Plaintiff's argument that he has presented sufficient evidence creating an issue of material fact for trial that Defendant's policy is unreasonable in violation of the Fourth Amendment."); Acevedo v. City of Anaheim, No. 8:14-CV-01147-ODW(E), 2016 WL 79786, at *5 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 6, 2016) ("'The Ninth Circuit analyzes claims regarding deficient medical care during and immediately following an arrest under the Fourth Amendment.' Mejia v. City of San Bernardino, No. EDCV 11-00452 VAP, 2012 WL 1079341, at *5 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 30, 2012) (citing Tatum v. City and Cnty. of S.F., 441 F.3d 1090, 1098–99 (9th Cir. 2006) (explaining that while the Supreme Court has analyzed such claims under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment in the past, it appears that the Fourth Amendment is the proper authority following the decision in Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989))). The Fourth Amendment requires law enforcement officers to provide objectively reasonable post-arrest care to an apprehended suspect. Tatum, 441 F.3d 1099. Though the precise contours of this objectivity test are unclear, it is clear that 'a police officer who promptly summons ... necessary medical assistance has acted reasonably for purposes of the Fourth Amendment[.]'"); Estate of Redd v. Love, No. 2:11-CV-00478-RJS, 2015 WL 8665348, at *9 (D. Utah Dec. 11, 2015) ("The Estate's articulated Fourth Amendment excessive force claim against Agent Love purports to be based on events that occurred at the Redd home throughout the day. But Dr. Redd was an arrestee from only 6:55 a.m. until he arrived at the BLM office in Monticello for booking. Upon his arrival at the BLM office, Dr. Redd became a pretrial detainee. And when Dr. Redd returned home later that evening, he was no longer 'seized' under the Fourth Amendment—he was free to come and go as he pleased. . . The potential reach of the Estate's Fourth Amendment claim legally concluded upon Dr. Redd's arrival at the BLM office, meaning the Estate's claim is necessarily confined to events that occurred before Dr. Redd arrived at the BLM office. Further, because the Estate's claim focuses only on events that occurred at Dr. Redd's home, the Estate's claim can relate only to events that occurred before Dr. Redd was removed at 10:34 a.m."); Hammond v. Lapeer Cnty., 133 F.Supp.3d 899, (E.D. Mich. 2015) ("The legal status of a victim of excessive force is, of course, significant because the conduct of the offending officer must be analyzed under the standard appropriate to the applicable constitutional provision. 'Under the Fourth Amendment, we apply an objective reasonableness test, looking to the reasonableness of the force in light of the totality of the circumstances confronting the defendants, and not to the underlying intent or motivation of the defendants.'. . As the Supreme Court has recently confirmed, a claim of excessive force under the Fourteenth Amendment is also analyzed under an 'objective reasonableness' standard. [citing Kingsley] See also Coley v. Lucas County, Ohio, __F.3d__, 2015 WL 4978463, at *4 (6th Cir. 2015) ("The Supreme Court has recently clarified...that when assessing pretrial detainees excessive force claims we must inquire into whether the plaintiff shows 'that the force purposely or knowingly used against him was objectively unreasonable.' ") . . . . Under the Eighth Amendment, which applies to a convicted prisoner, an official's conduct will be found to amount to cruel and unusual punishment 'when their "offending conduct reflects an unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain."'. . In examining an excessive force claim under the Eighth Amendment, the constitutional analysis has both a subjective and an objective component, requiring the court to determine 'whether the force was applied in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline, or maliciously and sadistically to cause harm,' and whether 'the pain inflicted [is] sufficiently serious.'. . . Notwithstanding the parties' apparent agreement as to Plaintiff's legal status as a convicted individual who had been sentenced to jail and remanded to the custody of the sheriff for transport to jail, neither party addressed the issue of which constitutional amendment governed the Plaintiff's claims of excessive force. This Court questioned the parties' mutual assumption that the Fourth Amendment applied and therefore required supplemental briefing on the issue of which constitutional right was implicated by the alleged acts of excessive force in this case. In his supplemental brief, Plaintiff argued for application of the Fourth Amendment to his claims because Plaintiff had not been 'booked' when the alleged acts of excessive force occurred and, according to Plaintiff, the Fourth Amendment applies 'through the booking process.'. . .The critical dividing line, however, discussed in Burgess and established in Aldini, is not the 'booking process' but the probable cause hearing. 'We find that the Fourth Amendment protects pre-trial detainees arrested without a warrant through the completion of their probable-cause hearings and thus find that the district court erred in applying the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . Until the probable cause hearing occurs, Plaintiff remains a free citizen entitled to the broad constitutional protections of the Fourth Amendment. In this case, Plaintiff was not awaiting a probable cause determination – he was arrested on a warrant issued on a finding of probable cause, arraigned and sentenced before the alleged acts of excessive force occurred. Plaintiff's supplemental brief improperly focused on the 'booking process,' which of course can occur either before or after a determination of probable cause, rather than the Plaintiff's legal status as a post-probable cause, convicted and sentenced individual. Defendants argue in their supplemental brief for application of the Fourteenth Amendment, noting that unlike the plaintiff in Burgess, Plaintiff in this case was arrested on a warrant, appeared before Judge Scott and was found in contempt of court and immediately remanded to the custody of the jailers. . . Defendants conclude that because Judge Scott 'had already issued his sentence, the appropriate legal standard is the 14th Amendment.'. . The Fourteenth Amendment applies to pretrial detainees including, as Aldini suggests, individuals arrested on a warrant issued on probable cause. See also Booker v. Gomez, 745 F.3d 405, 420-21 (10th Cir. 2014) ("[W]e hold the Fourteenth Amendment standard governs excessive force claims arising from post-arrest and pre-conviction treatment if the arrestee has been taken into custody pursuant to a warrant supported by probable cause."). As the Tenth Circuit noted in Gomez, when an individual is arrested pursuant to a warrant issued on probable cause, that individual is a pre-trial detainee at the time he is presented for booking. . . In this case, following his arrest on a bench warrant and at the arraignment on that warrant, Judge Scott found Plaintiff in contempt of court, ordered him immediately detained and sentenced him to a term of 30 days in jail or a fine of $866 . . . .Following the imposition of this sentence, while being escorted to the basement of the courthouse and while awaiting transportation to the jail, Plaintiff claims he was subject to excessive force. A threshold question the Court must address is what was Plaintiff's legal status at that time? . . ..While neither party in this case advocated in their supplemental brief for the Eighth Amendment, the Court finds the argument for application of the Eighth Amendment here compelling. As in Lewis, Plaintiff was not a free citizen, nor was he a pretrial detainee 'awaiting an adjudication of charge[]'. . . after Judge Scott found Plaintiff in contempt of court and ordered him immediately held in custody. He was a convicted prisoner in the custody of the sheriff awaiting transport to jail and, as Judge Steeh concluded in Lewis, his excessive force claim therefore should be analyzed under the Eighth Amendment. . . .In this case, there is no evidence that Plaintiff had escaped the custody of the officers who were escorting him following Judge Scott's finding of contempt and imposition of sentence. Like the plaintiffs in Lewis and Sharp, Plaintiff here was 'was not a suspect, detainee or fugitive; [he] was a convicted person in the custody of [officers]. Because [he] was a prisoner in the custody of [officers], any treatment [he] received on the way to a jail cell is governed by the Eighth Amendment.'. . . . Plaintiff's claims that he was (1) forcefully driven head first into the wall of the elevator, forced to the floor and threatened with a taser, all while handcuffed behind his back and (2) ignored by officers when he persistently complained of excessively tight handcuffs. All of these events, which occurred after Judge Scott had imposed a contempt sentence, are appropriately analyzed under the Eighth Amendment."); Laury v. Rodriguez, No. 13-15059, 2015 WL 2405648, at *6 (E.D. Mich. May 20, 2015) ("The parties appear to agree that Plaintiff Laury's claims regarding Defendants' use of excessive force during his booking procedure are governed by the Fourth Amendment. However, despite only setting forth a claim pursuant to the Fourth Amendment in his Complaint, Plaintiff Laury makes references to the Fourteenth Amendment in his Response brief. . . To the extent that Plaintiff Laury could be attempting to assert a Fourteenth Amendment claim for excessive force, such a claim fails. It is well settled that the Fourth Amendment's protections extend through the booking process. [citing Aldini]. Indeed, the Sixth Circuit has explained that '[t]he Fourth Amendment of the United States Constitution protects a person from being subjected to excessive physical force during the course of an arrest, a booking, or other police seizure.' Malory v. Whiting, 489 F. App'x. 78, 81 (6th Cir.2012) (citing Drogosch v. Metcalf, 557 F.3d 372, 378 (6th Cir.2009); Lamb v. Telle, No. 5:12–CV–00070–TBR, 2013 WL 5970422, *2-*5 (W.D. Ky. Nov. 8, 2013) ("Section 1983 does not confer substantive rights but merely provides a means to vindicate rights conferred by the Constitution or laws of the United States. . . 'In addressing an excessive force claim brought under § 1983, analysis begins by identifying the specific constitutional right allegedly infringed by the challenged application of force.'. . The three constitutional provisions for analyzing an excessive force claim brought under § 1983 are the Fourth, Eighth, and Fourteenth Amendments. As will become apparent, the Fourteenth Amendment is the appropriate constitutional provision for analyzing Plaintiff's claims. . . . Plaintiff was arrested pursuant to a warrant. The Fourth Amendment protects detainees arrested without a warrant through completion of their probable cause hearing. Since Plaintiff was arrested pursuant to a warrant, the Fourth Amendment does not apply to his claims. . . . At the time of the January 17, 2012 incident, Plaintiff had not been convicted of any crime and was merely a pretrial detainee arrested pursuant to a warrant. Therefore, the Eighth Amendment does not apply to his claims. . . . Plaintiff was a pre-trial detainee arrested pursuant to a warrant. Accordingly, the Fourteenth Amendment applies to Plaintiff's claims, not the Fourth or Eighth Amendment. . . .Since Plaintiff was arrested pursuant to a warrant and therefore was a pretrial detainee rather than an arrestee or convicted prisoner, his excessive force claim will be analyzed under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . In the Sixth Circuit 'the law is unsettled. . . as to whether the analysis for a Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claim and an Eighth Amendment excessive-force claim is the same.'. . At the least, pretrial detainees are guaranteed the same level of protection guaranteed by the Eighth Amendment."); Briggs v. Edwards, Nos. 12–2145, 13–5335, 13–5342, 2013 WL 5960676, *6 & n.10 (E.D. La. Nov. 6, 2013) ("In his Complaint, Mr. Galmon asserts a claim under section § 1983 based on a denial of medical treatment. . . 'After the initial incidents of a seizure have concluded and an individual is being detained by police officials but has yet to be booked, an arrestee's right to medical attention, like that of a pretrial detainee, derives from the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . .Though some Circuits recognize a Fourth Amendment right to medical treatment, the Court will construe the claim contained in Paragraph 47 of Mr. Galmon's Complaint as a Fourteenth, and not a Fourth, Amendment claim, as it appears that the Fifth Circuit analyzes an arrestee's right to medical care under the Substantive Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Nerren, 86 F.3d at 473; compare to Legg v. Pappas, 383 F. App'x 547 (7th Cir.2010) (recognizing Fourth Amendment right to medical care)."); Peters v. Woodbury County, Iowa, 979 F.Supp.2d 901, 930, 931, 949 (N.D. Iowa 2013) ("[T]he defendants assert that, after an individual becomes a pretrial detainee, the 'due process' standard of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments applies, citing Johnson–El v.

Schoemehl, 878 F.2d 1043, 1048–49 (9th Cir.1989), but Johnson–El is a 'conditions of confinement' case, not a case involving allegations of improper searches or other violation of privacy rights. . . . Neither Johnson–El nor Morris can be read for the blanket proposition that all claims by a pretrial detainee are governed by a Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment 'due process' standard that considers whether the officers' conduct amounted to 'punishment,' but only that conditions of confinement claims by pretrial detainees are governed by such a standard, rather than the Eighth Amendment 'cruel and unusual punishment' standard. Although the defendants acknowledge that, in Moore v. Novak, 146 F.3d 531 (8th Cir.1998), the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals has applied a Fourth Amendment 'objective reasonableness' test to the claim of an arrestee who became disruptive during the booking process, that case is also inapposite, because the claim at issue concerned use of 'excessive force,' not a search or other violation of privacy rights. . . More apposite are decisions of the Supreme Court and the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals concluding that claims arising from intrusions on the privacy rights of an arrestee or a pretrial detainee during booking or detention are governed by a Fourth Amendment 'reasonableness' standard. . . . Thus, Fourth Amendment 'reasonableness" standards are applicable to Peters's claim in Count I, rather than other 'due process' or 'punishment' standards, even if the applicability of a Fourth Amendment 'reasonableness' standard is via the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . [W]hile the constitutional source of the right at issue on an 'excessive force' claim arising during booking or initial detention is not altogether clear, the standard for such a claim under Eighth Circuit precedent is clearly one of 'objective reasonableness' analogous to a Fourth Amendment standard."); Smith v. County of Isabella, No. 2:12–cv–11333, 2013 WL 4550163, *5 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 28, 2013) ("As a preliminary matter, the Court must determine whether Plaintiff's excessive force claim falls under the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment. . .While excessive force claims are often brought under the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches and seizures, when no search or seizure is involved in a given case, the Supreme Court has indicated 'that the substantive component of the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause is the most appropriate lens with which to view an excessive force claim.'. .In the Sixth Circuit, the applicable amendment 'depends on the status of the plaintiff at the time of the incident, whether free citizen, convicted prisoner, or something in between.'. . 'Because the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable seizures seems primarily directed to the initial act of restraining an individual's liberty,' the Sixth Circuit holds that a pretrial detainee's excessive force claim is governed by the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. . . In this case then, Plaintiff, who was detained at the Isabella County Jail following her arrest for simple assault and disorderly conduct, was a pretrial detainee and the Fourteenth Amendment, not the Fourth, supplies the appropriate analytical framework for her excessive force claim against the Deputy Defendants. As such, Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment excessive force claim fails as a matter of law and is accordingly dismissed with prejudice."); Rivera-Garcia v. Roman-Carrero, 938 F.Supp.2d 189, 198, 199 (D.P.R. 2013) ("Since Rivera–García purportedly claims post-arrest, pre-arraignment mistreatment, Sosa–Vega concludes that only the Fourteenth Amendment right to due process applies, and that his Fourth Amendment claims fail. . .Both parts of this argument are too clever by half. First, notwithstanding Rivera–García's off-the-cuff testimony about what 'excessive force' subjectively means to him, neither the complaint nor the summary judgment papers draw any distinction between claims for use of force before versus after the instant in time Rivera–García considered himself 'neutralized.' He complains that he was thrown to the ground, then kicked, then cuffed, and then kicked again. . . On this nonmovant-friendly view of the facts, giving SosaVega's legal analysis its full weight would only cut off Fourth Amendment liability at the conceptual moment his seizure was complete, leaving other claims for trial. Yet even that rule would not dispose of the balance of Rivera–García's excessive force case. True, the Supreme Court pronounced in Graham that it had 'not resolved the question [of] whether the Fourth Amendment continues to provide individuals with protection against the deliberate use of excessive physical force beyond the point at which arrest ends and pretrial detention begins....' 490 U.S. at 395 n. 10. And Sosa–Vega correctly notes at least three circuits holding that only a Fourteenth Amendment due process right prohibits excessive force after the time of arrest. . . But prior to that 'point at which arrest ends and pretrial detention begins,' the Supreme Court's holding is clear: the Fourth Amendment protects 'free citizen[s]' from excessive force 'in the course of an arrest, investigatory stop, or other 'seizure.'. . Sosa–Vega's argument therefore must turn on the proposition that Rivera–García became a 'pretrial detainee' before his claims arose. . . That would be a colorable legal conclusion if Rivera–García were complaining of his treatment at the stationhouse as in Wilkins and Brothers, or perhaps even in the police cruiser as in Cottrell. But here, he complains of abuse before he was even moved from the spot he was handcuffed. . . Whatever hairs might be split over doctrinal labels, it is hard to conceive of a justification for why the mere attachment of handcuffs at the scene alters the standard measuring an officer's use of force, particularly when the arrestee has not been significantly moved and essentially no time has passed. Indeed, Graham's language itself reflects a common-sense understanding that the Fourth Amendment applies 'in the course of an arrest,' not some more technical span of time such as 'preceding the neutralization of an arrestee.' . . There is undoubtedly a point where the 'free citizen' becomes a 'pretrial detainee' and Graham ceases to control, and the Court expressly decided not to decide what constitutional guarantees apply at that time. But Sosa–Vega never shows why the point converting Rivera–García into a 'pretrial detainee' occurred when he says it did, and his assumption is not rooted in any doctrinal grounds."); Ramirez v. County of Los Angeles, No. CV 11–5370 AHM (MANx), 2012 WL 2574826, at *3 n.3 (C.D. Cal. July 3, 2012) ("Although neither party raises this issue, it is likely that where the alleged excessive force occurred post-arraignment but prior to trial, as was the case here, the applicable constitutional provision is the Fourteenth Amendment, not the Fourth."); Ostling v. City of Bainbridge Island, 872 F.Supp.2d 1117, 1129 (W.D. Wash. 2012) ("Claims that officers have failed to provide medical care were previously analyzed under the due-process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. [citing City of Revere v. Mass. Gen. Hosp.]. In Graham v. Connor, . . . however, the court held that 'all claims that law enforcement officers have used excessive force—deadly or not—in the course of an arrest, investigatory stop, or other "seizure" of a free citizen should be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment and its "reasonableness" standard, rather than under a "substantive due process" approach.'. . Thus, courts now sensibly analyze both claims of excessive force and failure to render post-arrest medical aid under the same reasonableness standard of the Fourth Amendment."); Polanco v. City of Marco Island, No. 2:10-cv-605-FtM-29DNF, 2011 WL 2911002, at *3 (M.D. Fla. July 19, 2011) ("The Eleventh Circuit . . . has analyzed situations similar to the present case [use of pepper spray on arrested suspects while in police vehicle on way to booking] under both the Fourth Amendment's objective reasonableness standard and, occasionally, under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. [discussing Vinyard, Mercado, Cottrell, and Hicks] The Eleventh Circuit has twice cited Gutierrez v. City of San Antonio, 139 F.3d 441, 452 (5th Cir.1998) for the correct standard to determine the line between when an arrest ends and pretrial detention begins. Reese v. Herbert, 527 F.3d 1253, 1262 n. 11 (11th Cir.2008); Garrett v. Athens-Clarke County, Ga., 378 F.3d 1274, 1279 n. 11 (11th Cir.2004). Gutierrez found that the Fourteenth Amendment analysis does not begin until 'after the incidents of arrest are completed, after the plaintiff has been released from the arresting officer's custody, and after the plaintiff has been in detention awaiting trial for a significant period of time'. . . . Under this standard, the facts alleged in the Amended Complaint establish that only a Fourth Amendment claim is cognizable in this case."); LaJocies v. City of North Las Vegas, No. 2:08-cv-00606-GMN-GWF, 2011 WL 2036972, at *4 (D. Nev. May 24, 2011) ("Plaintiff was being held as a pre-trial detainee at the North Las Vegas Detention Center at the time of the incident. However he was also serving time as a convicted prisoner on a federal weapons charge. . . The Fourth Amendment's protection of unreasonable searches and seizures applies to situations where excessive force used during the arrest of a person and when an arrestee is kept at a facility for booking procedures without a probable cause of arraignment hearing. . . This protection is not implicated in this case, because Plaintiff was already serving time as a convicted prisoner. Likewise, the Fourteenth Amendment's due process protection that a person suspected of a crime should not be subject to punishment does not apply. Plaintiff may be correct in arguing that while he was under a sentence of imprisonment for his federal conviction, he was likely only being held in the jail and not a federal prison due to his pretrial detainee status. However, regardless of why he was located at the North Las Vegas Detention Center, it is uncontested that Plaintiff was also already serving time for the federal weapons charge and was thus subject to the Federal Government's power of punishment. . . Thus the Court finds that the Eighth Amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment sets the applicable constitutional limitations to be applied to Plaintiff in this case."); Kalinkin v. Robinson, No. 09-CV-1058-BR, 2010 WL 5158386, at *6, *7 (D. Or. Dec. 14, 2010) ("[W]hether claims of excessive force by individuals in post-arraignment, pretrial custody should be analyzed under the Fourth, Eighth, or Fourteenth Amendments remains an open question in the Ninth Circuit. The Court notes, however, that a number of district courts within the Ninth Circuit have held the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment protects post-arraignment, pretrial detainees from the use of excessive force. [collecting cases] Even though Plaintiff was a pretrial, postarraignment detainee and, therefore, the question whether the Court should analyze his claim under the Fourth, Eighth, or Fourteenth Amendments is unresolved in the Ninth Circuit, it is unnecessary for this Court to choose which of these standards ultimately applies to Plaintiff's claim. As explained below, Plaintiff's proposed claim against Sergeant Scott fails even under the Fourth Amendment's least-burdensome standard that courts have applied to pretrial detainees' excessive-force claims."); Moreau v. Gerardi, No. 08-40117-FDS, 2010 WL 4961676, at *6-*11 (D. Mass. Nov. 24, 2010) ("Although it is beyond dispute that custodial detainees have a constitutional right not to be subjected to excessive force, the source of that right is surprisingly unclear. Both the Fourth and the Eighth Amendments provide protection against excessive force in certain contexts. . .

Excessive force claims arising in the context of an arrest are governed by the Fourth Amendment, and are evaluated under an 'objective reasonableness' standard. . . Excessive force claims brought by convicted and sentenced inmates are governed by the Eighth Amendment, and are evaluated under a 'malicious or sadistic use of force' standard. . . The incident in this case arose after arrest but before sentencing, during a time in which Moreau was a custodial detainee. This time period has been termed a 'legal twilight zone,' as the Constitution does not clearly indicate the source of protection against the use of excessive force against such persons. . . Although it is clear that the Eighth Amendment does not apply, whether the Fourth Amendment should apply, or whether the issue should be analyzed under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, is a matter of some dispute. . . . This lack of constitutional clarity has led to a circuit split. Four circuits have held that the Fourth Amendment provides the constitutional standard of review for claims of intentional excessive force that arise after a warrantless arrest but before a probable cause hearing or arraignment. [citing cases from 6th, 9th, 10th, and 2d Circuits] Four other circuits have held that the Fourth Amendment becomes inapplicable after the act of arrest, and instead analyze post-arrest claims of excessive force as substantive due process claims under the Fourteenth Amendment. [citing cases from 4th, 11th, 5th, and 7th Circuits] The First Circuit has not yet determined what constitutional provision provides the source of protection and the applicable standard of review in this context. . . .Determining the applicable constitutional provision is not a merely technical exercise, as the burden that the plaintiff must meet is substantially different under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . . An excessive force analysis under the Fourth Amendment looks to the objective reasonableness of the officer's actions, without inquiring into the subjective motivations of the officer. . . By contrast, when conducting a substantive due process analysis, courts ask whether an officer's conduct 'is so beyond the norm of proper police procedure as to shock the conscience.'. . Several courts have noted that the Fourteenth Amendment analyses are more burdensome to plaintiffs than the Fourth Amendment analysis. . . . From a practical standpoint, however, it is not clear why a plaintiff should be held to a higher standard of proof depending on his claim arises at the moment of arrest, as he is an arrestee in police custody, or as he is a pretrial detainee after a probable cause hearing. Indeed, it makes little sense to do so. Consider three different scenarios of police brutality: Person A is beaten excessively by the police on a sidewalk in the course of an otherwise-lawful arrest; Person B is beaten excessively in the police station lockup, after arrest but before any appearance before a judicial officer; and Person C is beaten excessively in the police station lockup after a judicial officer has made a probable cause determination. Why should A have an easier standard of proof than C? And why should B and C have different standards of proof, simply because the detention has been found to be lawful? Either the use of force under the circumstances is justifiable, or it is not. The factual circumstances might change from scenario to scenario, but the ultimate question ought to remain the same: was the use of force, viewed objectively, excessive under the circumstances? Requiring one plaintiff to meet a higher standard of proof than another elevates doctrine over fairness and common sense. . . .Taking all these considerations into account, the Court concludes that Moreau's § 1983 claim is most appropriately analyzed under the Fourth Amendment. From a practical standpoint, employing the Fourth Amendment has the virtue of the 'objective reasonableness' standard and provides of consistency and fairness among similarly-situated individuals. And as a matter of doctrine, this approach is more consistent with the relevant Supreme Court cases. . . . An arrestee is still effectively 'seized' by police when he is brought to the police station, booked, and detained before a probable cause hearing or before arraignment. . . Within the comparatively safer conditions of a police station as opposed to the conditions surrounding the moment of arrest, it is more constitutionally incumbent on officers restraining individuals' liberty to be reasonable in their use of force. For the purposes of this case, the Court need not explore the outer bounds of where Fourth Amendment protection ends and Fourteenth Amendment protection begins. It is enough to conclude that the Fourth Amendment governs Gerardi's treatment of Moreau, who had only been in custody for a few hours after his arrest, had just completed the booking process, and had not been arraigned or received a probable-cause determination. The question on summary judgment, then, is whether the facts, viewed in the light most favorable to Moreau, could lead a reasonable jury to conclude that Gerardi's treatment of Moreau was objectively unreasonable."); Cobige v. City of Chicago, No. 06 C 3807, 2010 WL 4340653, at *4 n.2, *14 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 25, 2010) ("Although the facts underlying Plaintiff's conditions of confinement claim occurred while Cobige was a pretrial detainee, there had been no judicial determination of probable cause before her death. Accordingly, the applicable standard for Plaintiff's Failure to Provide Medical Care claim is pursuant to the Fourth Amendment. See Williams v. Rodriguez, 509 F.3d 392, 403 (7th Cir.2007); Lopez v. City of Chicago, 464 F.3d 711, 718-19 (7th Cir.2006). . . . In their motion, Defendants argue that because the Seventh Circuit had not decided Lopez until September 2006 and the conduct surrounding Cobige's death occurred in June 2006, Lopez does not apply because it was not the clearly established standard during the relevant time period. . . Instead, Defendants argue that the deliberate indifference standard pursuant to the Fourteenth Amendment applies. . . Defendants' argument is without merit. In holding that the Fourth Amendment standard applied to pretrial detainees who have not had a probable cause determination, the Lopez court relied on case law from as early as 1992. . . . Because the Fourth Amendment standard was the controlling standard at the time of Defendants' conduct in June 2006, Defendants' argument fails."); Castellar v. Caporale, No. CV-04-3402 (DGT), 2010 WL 3522814, at *6 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 2, 2010) ("Accordingly, given that plaintiff had not yet been arraigned or formally charged during Svinos' alleged conduct at 500 Pearl, plaintiff's excessive force claim should be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment."); Walters v. Prince George's County, No. AW-08-711, 2010 WL 2858442, at *6 (D. Md. July 19, 2010) ("At the outset, the Court finds that Plaintiff is a pretrial detainee, whose claims of excessive force are properly governed by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Pretrial detainees are persons who have been 'lawfully arrested and [are] being held prior to a formal adjudication of guilt.'. . People who are involuntarily taken into police custody are pretrial detainees. . . Here, Plaintiff is properly classified as a pretrial detainee because she was handcuffed and involuntarily taken into police custody by Officers Swonger and Matthews. Since Plaintiff does not allege that Officers Swonger and Matthews used excessive force in handcuffing her, her Fourth Amendment rights were not violated. Plaintiff complains of events that occurred after Defendants Davis and Kelly took custody of her, when the Fourth Amendment had ceased to apply because the single act of detaining Plaintiff had already been completed and she was already in police custody. As the Fourth Circuit does not recognize continuing seizure, Plaintiff's argument to this effect is unavailing. Since Plaintiff was not an arrestee subject to Fourth Amendment protections, the Court will accordingly grant Defendant's Motion for Summary Judgment on the Fourth Amendment violation of the § 1983 claim."); Aponte v. City of Chicago, No. 08 C 6893, 2010 WL 2774095, at *9 (N.D. Ill. July 14, 2010) ("[P]retrial detainees who have not received probable cause determinations may bring claims regarding the conditions of their confinement under the Fourth Amendment, which protects against unreasonable seizures."); Valind v. Retzer, No. 05-C-0702, 2009 WL 3805518, at *6, *7 (E.D. Wis. Mar. 10, 2009) ("The parties briefed Valind's medical care claim based on the Due Process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, which is the same standard used to evaluate Eighth Amendment claims. In the court's screening order dated November 4, 2005, the court also considered the plaintiff's medical care claim under the Due Process Clause. However, after the screening order in this case, the Seventh Circuit 'recognized in Lopez v. City of Chicago that the Fourteenth Amendment's due process protections only apply to a pretrial detainee's confinement conditions after he has received a judicial determination of probable cause.' Williams v. Rodriguez, 509 F.3d 392, 403 (7th Cir.2007) (citing Lopez v. City of Chicago, 464 F.3d 711, 719 (7th Cir.2006)). Claims regarding conditions of confinement by pretrial detainees such as Valind, who have not yet had a judicial determination of probable cause, are instead governed by the Fourth Amendment and its objectively unreasonable standard. . . In Sides v. City of Champaign, 496 F.3d 820 (7th Cir.2007), the Seventh Circuit clarified what is 'objectively unreasonable' in the context of a medical needs case. There are four factors that influence the analysis of a plaintiff's claims of inadequate medical care under the Fourth Amendment: (1) whether the officer had notice of the arrestee's medical need, either through words or observation; (2) the seriousness of the medical need, including whether complaints are accompanied by any physical symptoms; (3) the scope of the requested treatment, which is to be balanced against the second factor; and (4) police interests. . . Moreover, 'the deliberate indifference standard under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments requires a higher showing on a plaintiff's part than is necessary to prove an officer's conduct was Aobjectively unreasonable under the circumstances'' under the Fourth Amendment."); Davis v. Peoria County, No. 08-cv-1118, 2009 WL 3258318, at *4 n.4, *5 (C.D.Ill. Oct. 8, 2009) ("Here, at the time of the alleged abuse, Plaintiff was being held in a cell, but had been arrested without a warrant, had not been booked, and had not been subject to a judicial determination of probable cause. . . . The Court need not decide at this point whether Plaintiff was an arrestee or a pretrial detainee. Whether she had crossed this line or not, '[i]t does not follow that the officers acquired greater ability to assault and batter' her even if she was a pretrial detainee rather than an arrestee. Titran, 893 F.2d at 147. Indeed, the Seventh Circuit Jury Instructions concerning excessive force do not distinguish between the Fourth and the Fourteenth Amendment analyses: the same instructions are applied to both categories of persons, and the Instructions are titled 'Fourth/Fourteenth Amendment − Excessive Force Against Arrestee or Pretrial Detainee' FED. CIV. JURY INSTR. 7th Cir. 7.08 (2005). As discussed above, reasonableness in the circumstances is the key analysis for both stages."); Adams v. City Of Orlando, No. 6:08-cv-30-Orl-28GJK, 2009 WL 2634339, at *7, *8 (M.D. Fla. Aug. 24, 2009) ("The matter of whether the officers used excessive force in their treatment of Plaintiff in handcuffing him and placing him in the squad car is properly analyzed under the Fourth Amendment because during that time he was being seized and placed under arrest. Thus, the officer's actions are analyzed under an 'objective reasonableness' standard. . . . While the Fourth Amendment plainly governs the handcuffing and placing into the police car, the issue of whether the Fourth Amendment of the Fourteenth applies to Plaintiff's assertions regarding use of the Ripp-Hobble restraint while he was in the holding cell at the substation requires brief discussion. As noted earlier, the Fourth Amendment governs seizures, including arrests, but the Fourteenth Amendment governs claims of mistreatment of arrestees and pretrial detainees in custody. . . . Although in their motion papers the parties discuss the Fourth Amendment with regard to all aspects of Plaintiff's excessive force claim, this Court is compelled to find that the Fourteenth Amendment, not the Fourth, applies to the Ripp-Hobble portion of the case. The Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals has acknowledged that the precise line between excessive force claims governed by the Fourth Amendment and excessive force claims governed by the Fourteenth Amendment is not well-defined, but in a recent case that court analyzed an excessive force claim under the Fourteenth Amendment rather than the Fourth where the force occurred in a context similar to that involved in the instant case. In Fennell v. Gilstrap, 559 F.3d 1212 (11th Cir.2009), the plaintiff had been arrested and transported in a police car to the jail; the allegedly excessive force occurred in the 'pat-down room' shortly after his arrival there. . . This Court finds that if the chain of events in Fennell is sufficient to transfer the source of the right at issue from the Fourth Amendment to the Fourteenth Amendment in this circuit, then the circumstances of the instant case certainly are-here, there was a lapse of time from Plaintiff being placed in the holding cell until the Ripp-Hobble was applied, whereas in Fennell the events from the outset of the arrest to the application of the force are described as essentially a continuous sequence. Thus, this portion of Plaintiff's excessive force claim is analyzed under the Fourteenth Amendment rather than the Fourth."); Perez v. City of New York, No. 07 Civ. 10319(RJS)(KNF), 2009 WL 1616374, at *7 (S.D.N.Y. June 8, 2009) ("The Second Circuit, post-Graham, has opined that 'the Fourth Amendment standard probably should be applied at least to the period prior to the time when the person arrested is arraigned or formally charged, and remains in the custody (sole or joint) of the arresting officer.' Powell v. Gardner, 891 F.2d 1039, 1044 (2d Cir.1989). . . . Accordingly, the Court finds that the plaintiff's excessive force claim should be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment."); Ramos v. Lucio, No. B-08-122, 2009 WL 700635, at *8 (S.D. Tex. Mar. 17, 2009) ("The failure to monitor claim arises from the course of the arrest. Plaintiffs allege the failure to monitor occurred before Ramos was released from the arresting officer's custody. Therefore, it is analyzed using the Fourth Amendment standard. Gutierrez, 139 F.3d at 452 (quoting Valencia v. Wiggins, 981 F.2d 1440, 1445 (5th Cir.1993)). Therefore, under the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard, this court will apply an excessive force analysis. . . . Again, this Court analyzes the Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim to proper and timely medical care to determine whether the individual officers actions were objectively unreasonable and amount to excessive force."); Holmberg v. Tieber, No. 1:07 CV 1849, 2008 WL 1930089, at * 6 (N.D. Ohio Apr. 29, 2008) ("The Sixth Circuit has recently recognized that under the Fourth Amendment, 'a governmental seizure of an individual must be reasonable, a rule that applies to an officer's use of force during a booking procedure. Force in this setting becomes constitutionally excessive if it is objectively unreasonable in light of the facts and circumstances confronting the officer.' Lawler v. City of Taylor, 2008 WL 624770 (6th Cir. March 5, 2008) (citing Phelps v.. Coy, 286 F.3d 295 (6th Cir.2002) and Graham, 490 U.S. at 397)."); Evans v. Multnomah County, No. 07-CV-1532-

BR, 2009 WL 1011580, at *5 (D. Or. Apr. 15, 2009) ("Here Plaintiff's excessive-force claim arises from actions occurring after his warrantless arrest, during the booking process, and before a Magistrate determined there was probable cause for the initial arrest. Consistent with the Ninth Circuit's decisions in Pierce and Gibson, the Court applies the Fourth Amendment standard to Plaintiff's § 1983 claims for excessive force."); Ratliff v. City of Houston 2008 WL 910205, at *1, *2 (S.D. Tex. Apr. 3, 2008) ("[C]ourts in this Circuit have indicated that the point at which Constitutional protections for detainees shift from the Fourth Amendment to the Due Process Clause of the Fifth or Fourteenth Amendment is the point at which an individual is placed into secure custody in a jail cell. . . Indeed, to hold otherwise would create an unnecessarily complicated inquiry, especially in the context of this case, where there are well over one hundred plaintiffs, each complaining of similar, yet factually distinct conduct by police. More importantly, the protections of the Fourth Amendment necessarily cede to the protections afforded under Due Process once a seizure − whether lawful or not − has been completed. . . Due Process tests contemplate the needs of law enforcement and jail personnel to protect the safety and security of police, correctional officers, and detainees. . . These needs exist regardless whether a detainee is in a cell for one hour, or for weeks."); Rosa v. City of Fort Myers, 2007 WL 3012650, at *12, *14 (M.D. Fla. Oct. 12, 2007) ("In this case, plaintiff had been arrested and brought to the police station where she was detained as the booking process took place. Plaintiff had clearly been seized within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment by virtue of her arrest, but her status had evolved into that of an arrestee in custody. The Eleventh Circuit has analyzed such 'custody' situations under different constitutional amendments. In Vinyard v. Wilson, 311 F.3d 1340 (11th Cir.2002), the Court analyzed an excessive force claim during arrestee's ride to the jail under the Fourth Amendment. In Mercado v. City of Orlando, 407 F.3d 1152, 1154 n. 1 (11th Cir.2005), the Court rejected a Fourteenth Amendment analysis in favor of a Fourth Amendment analysis where a suspect was 'in custody' by virtue of being surrounded by officers. On the other hand, in Cottrell v. Caldwell, 85 F.3d 1480, 1490 (11th Cir.1996), a suspect was arrested and transported in the back of a police car in a position which led to his asphyxiation. The Eleventh Circuit stated that excessive force claims 'involving the mistreatment of arrestees or pretrial detainees in custody are governed by the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause ...' See also Redd v. R.L. Conway, 160 F. App'x 858, 860 (11th Cir.2005) (applying Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process analysis to claims of excessive force during arrest and booking process).' Analyzing claim under both Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment standards, court concluded "plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence to show either a Fourth Amendment or a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim."); Stephens v. City of Butler, Ala, 509 F.Supp.2d 1098, 1108, 1109 (S.D.Ala.,2007) ("[T]his case presents an additional issue which also has not been settled in this Circuit. '[T]he line is not always clear as to when an arrest ends and pretrial detainment begins.' Garrett v. Athens-Clarke County, Georgia, 378 F.3d 1274, 1279 n. 11 (11th Cir.2004). Even under standardized police procedures, there is a practical gap, a 'legal twilight zone,' between the completion of the arrest as that term is commonly used and the beginning of pretrial detainment. . . The procedures utilized in this case-in which the seizure began at the apartment complex but the arrest did not occur until after plaintiff had already been booked . . . are far from standardized. Other Circuits have taken divergent approaches to the issue. [collecting cases] The authority in this Circuit establishes no clear cut-off point beyond which the Fourth Amendment ceases to apply. . . .At the hearing, the court noted the evidence − principally in the form of deposition testimony from the arresting officer, defendant Lovette − that plaintiff was not arrested until he was already in the jail and the booking process was underway. . . . As set forth above, plaintiff has offered sufficient evidence that a reasonable jury could find that Lovette first arrested plaintiff immediately prior to the tasing. Moreover, at the time of the tasing the plaintiff had not been searched or fingerprinted and the arresting officer continued to command plaintiff.Based on these facts, the court finds that the tasing occurred incident to the arrest and thus the Fourth Amendment is applicable."); Miller v. City of Columbus, No. 2:05-CV-425, 2007 WL 915180, at *10 (S.D. Ohio Mar. 26, 2007) ("Miller was convicted of a Fifth Degree Felony and sentenced to two years of community control. Defendants allege that Miller fled before completing his sentence, and was not a free citizen; therefore, the Fourth Amendment's objective reasonableness standard is not applicable to Defendants' encounter with Miller. Defendants are correct that the Fourth Amendment does not apply post-conviction, Johnson v. City of Cincinnati, 310 F.3d 484, 491 (6th Cir. 2002), however, at the time of this encounter, Miller had not yet been convicted of violating his supervised release.Neither party has provided any Sixth Circuit law on point on this issue, . . . however the Court notes that other federal appellate and district courts have not applied the Eighth Amendment to persons who are not incarcerated or imprisoned at the time of the encounter despite the plaintiff's status as a parolee. . . The Ninth and Tenth Circuits have applied the Fourth Amendment's objective reasonableness standard to excessive force claims by individuals on parol or on supervised release. [citing cases] Accordingly, this Court will apply the Fourth Amendment's objective reasonableness standard to Plaintiff's excessive force claims."); Rose v. City of Lafayette, No. 05-cv-00311-WDM-MJW, 2007 WL 485228, at *4 (D. Colo. Feb. 12, 2007) ("Plaintiff is correct that 'following arrest the due process protections of the Fourteenth Amendment are triggered to protect a pretrial detainee from excessive force approaching punishment.' . . However, the Tenth Circuit has ruled that claims based on physical assaults by police on a person arrested but not yet presented to a judicial officer are subject to the Fourth Amendment objectively reasonable framework, not substantive due process. . . Other types of claims of mistreatment in the post-arrest context may fall under due process considerations . . . but Plaintiff's do not."); Stewart v. Beaufort County, 481 F.Supp.2d 483, 490 (D.S.C. 2007) ("The court notes that it is often not clear when an arrestee becomes a pretrial detainee for purposes of determining the applicable constitutional protection. . . . For purposes of determining constitutional protections, the holding in Riley [v. Dorton, 115 F.3d 1159 (4th Cir.1997)] instructs the court that a person is an 'arrestee' when an officer decides to detain, and that the Fourth Amendment applies only to the single act of the arrest. Applying this rule to the case at hand, it follows that Stewart was an arrestee during his arrest in the parking lot of Smoker's Express. By the time he arrived in the sally port of the Beaufort County Detention Center, however, he was lawfully arrested and being held prior to a formal adjudication of guilt, and was therefore a pretrial detainee."); St. Amant v. Taylor Police Department, No. 05-CV-72900, 2006 WL 2365007, at *4 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 14, 2006) ("However, Plaintiff does not claim that he was still in the custody of the arresting officers at the time of the incident, nor has he named either of the arresting officers as defendants. Yet it is also unclear whether Plaintiff would fall under the definition of a 'pretrial detainee' for purposes of substantive due process analysis, since he was only being held at the police station for the night and was released the next morning. On the other hand, Plaintiff was under arrest for his third drunk driving violation and was not necessarily entitled to nominal bond inasmuch as he was chargeable with a felony offense. In short, neither the facts nor the case law are developed enough to conclude whether Plaintiff's exact status at the time of this incident was that of a 'pretrial detainee' or simply 'in custody.' Nevertheless, for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim advanced by the Plaintiff, the Defendants' actions clearly do not 'shock the conscience,' as set forth in the analysis below. Moreover, even under the less forgiving standard applied under Fourth Amendment analysis, the actions of the Defendants were not unreasonable. Plaintiff's claim would therefore fail under either standard."); McBride v. Clark, No. 04-03307-CV-S-REL, 2006 WL 581139, at *22, *23 (W.D. Mo. Mar. 8, 2006) (not reported) ("In this case, the parties disagree on the appropriate governing standard. That is, Plaintiff argues that the Fourth Amendment's objective reasonableness standard applies; Defendant contends that the Eighth Amendment governs Plaintiff's excessive force claim. It is clear that the Eighth Amendment does not apply, as Plaintiff had not yet been convicted of a crime and was not serving a sentence at the time of the alleged violation. . . It is less clear, however, whether Plaintiff's claim is governed by the Fourth Amendment standard for arrestees or the Fourteenth Amendment standard for pretrial detainees. Here, Plaintiff was being held on a warrant for suspicion of a drug-related offense. Although both parties categorize Plaintiff as a 'pretrial detainee,' merely labeling him as such does not make it so. Under factually analogous circumstances, courts of this circuit have applied − and the Eighth Circuit has upheld − the Fourth Amendment standard rather than the Fourteenth Amendment standard. . . As a result, I find that the Fourth Amendment governs Plaintiff's excessive force claim."); Turner v. White, 443 F.Supp.2d 288, 294 (E.D.N.Y. 2006) (" The status of a parolee who seeks to bring claims of excessive force against his parole officer is unsettled in this Circuit. . . Courts in the Fifth Circuit have held that constitutional claims by parolees are governed by an Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment analysis. [citing cases]These cases, however, are not binding on this Court . . . and appear to be contrary to the approach followed by district courts in this Circuit. . . . In Blake v. Base, the district court, after distinguishing the cases that applied an Eighth Amendment analysis to claims brought by parolees, concluded that a parolee's claim that he was subjected to excessive force while in detention at a time prior to the time he had been arraigned on the new charges for which he was being detained is more properly analyzed under the Fourth Amendment. 1998 WL 642621, at *10 n. 21. This Court finds this analysis to be persuasive. Just because an individual has been convicted of a crime in the past and is on parole does not deprive him of his Fourth Amendment constitutional right to be free from excessive force if arrested on another crime."); Bornstad v. Honey Brook Township, No. C.A.03-CV-3822, 2005 WL 2212359, at *19 n.47 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 9, 2005) ("Some courts have evaluated a claim for failure to render medical assistance during the course of an arrest using a Fourth Amendment excessive force analysis. Price, 990 F.Supp. at 1241 n. 22. Here, Plaintiff does not argue that the Defendants' failure to offer medical assistance constituted excessive force. Rather, he relies solely on the protections afforded by the Fourteenth Amendment."); Calhoun v. Thomas, 360 F.Supp.2d 1264, 1271-74 (M.D. Ala. 2005) ("[W]hile it is clear that Calhoun had already been 'seized' and, for all intents and purposes, arrested at the time of the alleged abuses, it is equally plain that he had not yet acquired the status of a pretrial detainee. As a formal matter, Calhoun had not yet been officially arrested at the time the alleged abuses occurred. In addition, he was in the custody of the officers who eventually arrested him at all times during the interrogation process. He had not been booked into the Pike County Jail, and had not yet made an initial appearance before a judge. . . Furthermore, at that point in time, Calhoun had not been charged with any crime. Thus, the alleged application of excessive force in this case occurred while Calhoun was in a 'legal twilight zone,' the legal implications of which were left unclear by Graham. . . Since Graham was decided, lower courts have grappled with the issue of which constitutional provision provides protection from excessive force during this period of detention following an arrest or seizure, but prior to a judicial determination of probable cause. . . While some federal appellate courts have continued to apply the Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause to excessive force claims occurring during this post-arrest, pre-custody time period, a number of appellate courts have applied the Fourth Amendment to incidents of excessive force occurring after the moment of arrest by adopting the 'continuing seizure' approach to defining when seizure ends and pretrial detention begins. Under this analysis, a Fourth Amendment seizure is treated as extending beyond the actual moment of arrest to the ensuing period of intermittent custody in the hands of the arresting officers. [citing cases] The Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals has not explicitly adopted this 'continuing seizure' test. However, it has indirectly countenanced the application of the Fourth Amendment to post-arrest, pre-detention excessive-force claims in several cases. [discussing cases] . . . . Most recently, the Eleventh Circuit touched upon the issue in Garrett v. Athens-Clarke County, 378 F.3d 1274 (11th Cir.2004), another §1983 excessive-force case alleging a Fourth Amendment violation of an arrestee's rights. As in Cottrell, the arrestee in Garrett died from positional asphyxia. In this case, arresting officers had pepper-sprayed him and bound his feet and ankles together during the course of arresting him. He died while lying in the road behind the squad car, moments after he had been physically subdued. In noting that Garrett's claim was properly analyzed under the rubric of the Fourth Amendment, the court stated in a footnote, 'Although the line is not always clear as to when an arrest ends and pretrial detention begins, the facts here fall on the arrest end. See Gutierrez v. City of San Antonio, 139 F.3d 441, 452 (5th Cir.1998) (stating Fourteeenth Amendment analysis does not begin until 'after the incidents of arrest are completed, after the plaintiff has been released from the arresting officer's custody, and after the plaintiff has been in detention awaiting trial for a significant period of time") (quotation and citation ommitted).' . . . By citing to a Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals case that emphasized the specific limits of the Fourteenth Amendment in excessive-force cases, the court again implied that the Fourth Amendment provides a more appropriate framework of analysis for post-arrest, pre-detention cases. . . . Thus, the Eleventh Circuit's own case law, in addition to the case law of a number of other circuits and the Supreme Court, suggests that an analysis under the Fourth Amendment is appropriate, if not required, in post-seizure, pre-detention allegations of excessive force such as Calhoun's. Accordingly, this court finds that the Fourth Amendment is the specific constitutional right allegedly infringed by the challenged application of force in this case."); Whiting v. Tunica County, 222 F. Supp.2d 809, 822, 823 (N.D. Miss. 2002) ("Some Circuits, for example, apply the Fourth Amendment reasonableness standard to excessive force claims arising post-arrest, setting arraignment as the line of demarcation between the Fourth and

Fourteenth Amendments. In these circuits, the Fourth Amendment reasonableness standard applies until the arrestee appears before a neutral magistrate for arraignment or probable cause hearing, or until the individual leaves the joint custody of the arresting officers. [citing cases] Other Circuits focus on the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and apply a substantive due process standard at the moment the incidents of arrest are complete. [citing cases] On facts similar to the instant case, the Eighth Circuit has applied Fourth Amendment standards to a claim of excessive force allegedly suffered by an individual in being restrained in the back of a police car post-arrest. . . The Fifth Circuit has taken a somewhat hybrid approach. As a general rule, substantive due process applies in the Fifth Circuit after the fact of arrest. [citing cases] On these facts, the Court concludes that the Fourth Amendment applies to Whiting's claim arising out of the post-arrest events in the police car. . . . The proximity to the arrest in this case, unlike in Valencia, transpired so closely to the actual arrest, that, under Graham, the most reasoned approach is to apply the Fourth Amendment. This is especially so since Whiting was still in the custody of the arresting officer, having never left that custody."); Carlson v. Mordt, No. 00 C 50252, 2002 WL 1160115, at *4, *5 (N.D.Ill. May 29, 2002) (not reported) ("The Seventh Circuit has not made clear at precisely what point an arrest ends, and pretrial detention begins. See, e.g., Proffitt v. Ridgway, 279 F.3d 503, 506 (7th Cir.2002) (analyzing excessive force claim under due process standard where action occurred en route to jail following arrest); Estate of Phillips v. City of Milwaukee, 123 F.3d 586, 596 (7th Cir.1997) (acknowledging struggle with the issue, and analyzing excessive force claim under Fourth Amendment where conduct in question occurred shortly after arrestee was handcuffed) . . . The court concludes that in this case, when the police dog was dropped from the attic, Carlson's arrest was still ongoing. At that time, Carlson had not been removed from his house, where he had been apprehended. The attack occurred immediately after Carlson was handcuffed, while he was still on the floor. . . . [C]onsequently the court must analyze Carlson's excessive force claim as to that incident under the Fourth Amendment."); Bartram v. Wolfe, 152 F. Supp.2d 898, 910 & n.8 (S.D.W.Va. 2001) (noting that the Fourth Circuit in Riley v. Dorton, 115 F.3d 1159, 1161 (4th Cir.1997), rejected concept of a 'continuing seizure' but provided no simple rule for determining when Fourth Amendment protection ends; suggesting "[a] simple rule would be that a person is an arrestee until the person has made an initial appearance before a judicial officer, and then the person becomes a pretrial detainee. Such a rule would have the added benefit of discouraging the use of force and intimidation by police officers in the obtaining of a statement from an accused who has not appeared in court and has not obtained counsel."); Hill v. Algor, 85 F. Supp.2d 391, 402, 403 (D.N.J. 2000) ("[T]he Supreme Court [in Graham] left unanswered (1) the particular moment in time at which arrest or seizure ends and pretrial detention begins; and (2) whether the Fourth Amendment applies beyond arrest into the period of pretrial detention. . . . [I]t is clear from Bell that one who remains in detention after formal charge and while awaiting trial is a pretrial detainee subject to Due Process protection. The question now plaguing the courts of appeals, however, concerns whether the starting point of pretrial detention, as determined by the termination of a Fourth Amendment 'seizure', precedes post-charge detention as acknowledged in Bell. . . .At least three circuits have declined to extend the Fourth Amendment beyond the initial arrest or seizure. [citing cases from Fourth, Fifth and Seventh Circuits] Disagreeing with these courts, the Ninth and Tenth Circuits have applied the Fourth Amendment to post-arrest, pre-arraignment custody obtained without a warrant. [citing cases] In line with the Ninth and Tenth Circuits, the Second Circuit has concluded, 'the Fourth Amendment standard probably should be applied at least to the period prior to the time when the person arrested is arraigned, or formally charged, and remains in the custody ... of the arresting officer.' Powell v. Gardner, 891 F.2d 1039, 1043 (2nd Cir.1989). . . . This Court agrees with the Ninth and Tenth Circuits that a person continues to be an arrestee subject to Fourth Amendment protection through the period of post-arrest but prearraignment detention. Stated differently, this Court declines to extend pretrial detention beyond the circumstances in Bell, concluding that such detention does not begin until an arrestee is at least formally charged and his release or continued detainment is determined.").

See also Johnson v. City of Cincinnati, 310 F.3d 484, 492, 493 (6th Cir. 2002) ("To be sure, application of the Ordinance's post-arrest provision resembles a seizure in that it is a show of government authority and a restraint on a freedom of movement. . . But in each of the cases addressed by our sister circuits, the government not only curtailed the suspect's right to interstate travel, it also imposed additional restrictions designed to compel an ultimate court appearance, such as obligations to post bond, attend court hearings, and contact pretrial services. [citing cases] In contrast, (1) the Ordinance imposes solely travel restrictions; (2) the ninety day exclusion is not bounded by an eventual court appearance; and, (3) the stated purpose of these restrictions is to combat drug crime in Over the Rhine. Thus, we conclude that the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable seizures does not provide the appropriate analytical framework for evaluating the constitutionality of such restrictions.").

In Brown v. Phelan, No. 93 C 4636, 1993 WL 364842, *3 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 14, 1993) (not reported), the court found no basis for ascribing deliberate indifference to the conduct of a Sheriff who was "responsible by statute for operation of the County Jail, [where he] was inherently limited by the funds and facilities that had been made available to him...." See also Watson v. Sheahan, No. 93 C 6671, 1994 WL 130759, *3 (N.D. Ill. April 14, 1994) (not reported) ("[I]n all the respects about which [plaintiff] complains both [defendants] are simply limited to doing the best that they can with what they are given to work with. That being the case, both [defendants] are unquestionably chargeable with knowledge of the adverse conditions, but they cannot be said − given the limitations on their power − to have 'acquiesced' in them. In sum, it is not possible to characterize either of the named defendants with 'deliberate indifference' so as to subject them to ['] 1983 liability.").

But see Brown v. Mitchell, 308 F.Supp.2d 682, 700, 701 (E.D.Va. 2004) ("Considering the . . . fact that a Virginia sheriff has no authority to construct or modify local jail facilities, Mitchell argues that, because she is required to accept 'all persons' committed to the Jail, she cannot have been deliberately indifferent or grossly negligent as to the alleged overcrowding conditions at the Jail. It is true that, by statute, the locality, not the sheriff, is required to build and maintain a jail of a reasonable size to house the inmate population. . . . A Virginia sheriff, by contrast, has no duty or ability to build, expand, or otherwise improve the structural facilities of a jail. As discussed above, as a constitutional officer, Mitchell's duties and responsibilities are created solely by statute.. . Her statutory duties include maintaining records on all prisoners, formulating and enforcing jail rules, providing security in the jail, and keeping inmates clothed and fed. . . There is no statute, however, requiring or allowing a sheriff to build, add to, or otherwise improve the physical structure of a jail. Thus, Mitchell is correct respecting her inability to remedy the problem of overcrowding by building a new jail or modifying the existing one. Her failure, therefore, to build a new jail or remedy the existing one cannot be considered gross negligence or deliberate indifference. However, Mitchell's argument that, as a matter of law, she is exonerated from either a state-law wrongful death action or an action under Section 1983 by virtue of Va.Code Ann. § 53.1-119 et seq. is misplaced because the argument simply ignores the remainder of the statutory scheme of which Va.Code Ann. § 53.1-119 et seq. is a part. . . . Under § 53.1-74, which also is a part of Chapter 3 of Title 53: 'When a ... city is without an adequate jail ... the circuit court thereof shall adopt as its jail, the jail of another county or city until it can obtain an adequate jail.' The ensuing sections of Chapter 3 provide for the procedures that are to be followed after such an adoption and set forth mechanisms for providing payment to the adopted jurisdiction. Thus, the General Assembly has provided a means for eliminating overcrowding when overcrowding would render a jail inadequate other than the structural remedies of constructing a new jail facility or expanding an existing one. And, although the authority for arranging for the use of other facilities lies in the local circuit courts, . . . Chapter 3 requires the sheriff to know, and keep records reflecting, the population of the local jail. . . Indeed, the sheriff must report thereon to the Compensation Board and, if asked, to the local circuit court. . . Thus, when a Virginia sheriff knows that a local jail is so overcrowded as to render it inadequate, that sheriff is not, contrary to Mitchell's arguments, without recourse or ability to remedy the overcrowding because, under Virginia's statutory scheme, alternate arrangements can be made by informing the local circuit court of the fact of overcrowding. Indeed, the Virginia legislature provides, quite clearly, that when so informed, the circuit court 'shall adopt as its jail, the jail of another county or city until it can obtain an adequate jail.' . . . Additionally, under another section of the statute, the circuit court can, upon Petition for Writ of Mandamus, command a governing body to put its own jail in good repair and be made otherwise adequate. . . Mitchell, whose job includes the operation of the Jail in accord with the dictates of Title 53, is charged with knowledge of these statutes. And, she is charged with knowledge of conditions in the Jail over which she has charge. Her failure to use these statutory mechanisms in the face of known overcrowding to the extent of the inadequacy as alleged in the Complaint certainly can be considered 'deliberate indifference' within the meaning of Eighth Amendment jurisprudence or gross negligence under Virginia's wrongful death jurisprudence."); Laube v. Haley, 234 F.Supp.2d 1227, 1249, 1250 (M.D. Ala. 2002) ("Here, the defendants urge the court to consider the reasonableness of each official's response with respect to his or her ability to act within budgetary constraints. In other words, the defendants ask the court to consider whether each official's response was reasonable given the lack of funds available to him or her. The lack-of-funds defense is common in prison suits, and precedent clearly establishes that this defense is available to officials only when they are sued in their individual capacities.").

See also Henry v. Hulett, 969 F.3d 769, 777-84 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc) ("We do not think it naturally follows that, because the Court created a categorical exception to a prisoner's Fourth Amendment rights in her cell, the Court intended to expand that rule to also deprive a prisoner of all Fourth Amendment protections in her body. Indeed, the Supreme Court has indicated several times that the privacy interest in one's body is more acute than the interest in one's property. . . .[W]hile prison security requires officials to constantly monitor prisoners' cells, the same is not true of their unclothed persons. We conclude that a diminished right to privacy in one's body, unlike a right to privacy in one's property and surroundings, is not fundamentally incompatible with imprisonment and is an expectation of privacy that society would recognize as reasonable. We therefore join every other circuit to have addressed the question and hold that the Fourth Amendment protects (in a severely limited way) an inmate's right to bodily privacy during visual inspections, subject to reasonable intrusions that the realities of incarceration often demand. . . . Thus, when evaluating a prisoner's Fourth Amendment claim regarding a strip or body cavity search, courts must assess that search for its reasonableness, considering 'the scope of the particular intrusion, the manner in which it is conducted, the justification for initiating it, and the place in which it is conducted.'. . We highlight that our holding today—that inmates maintain a privacy interest, although diminished, in their bodies—pertains to pretrial detainees and convicted prisoners alike. Importantly, Hudson drew no distinction between these two categories in its analysis; rather, the Court focused on the heightened concerns over safety and security emblematic of any detention facility. . . . Contrary to the assertion of our dissenting colleague, neither Bell nor Florence limited its holding solely to pretrial detainees. As stated above, Bell expressly assumed that convicted prisoners retain Fourth Amendment rights. . . .We conclude that the applicability of the Fourth Amendment does not compromise the heightened standard of the Eighth. . . . True, the Supreme Court has held unenumerated rights—such as those arising from the due process clause—do not afford a prisoner greater protection than the Eighth Amendment. . . But this conclusion is specific to the Court's substantive due process jurisprudence—claims 'covered by a specific constitutional provision, such as the Fourth or Eighth Amendment ... must be analyzed under the standard appropriate to that specific provision, not under the rubric of substantive due process.'. . . Importantly, the Fourth and Eighth Amendments have different roles to play with respect to bodily searches and protect different categories of constitutional rights. The Eighth Amendment safeguards prisoners against the use of searches that correctional officers subjectively intend as a form of punishment. . . . Because reasonableness is an objective test, a defendant's subjective state of mind is irrelevant to a court's Fourth Amendment analysis. . . The Fourth Amendment thus protects prisoners from searches that may be related to or serve some institutional objective, but where guards nevertheless perform the searches in an unreasonable manner, in an unreasonable place, or for an unreasonable purpose. . . This last consideration is particularly salient in the case before us: certainly, a court need not give as much deference to a prison administrator's assessment of the necessity of a training exercise as it does to measures taken in response to the actual presence of weapons, contraband, or other immediate security concerns. . . . In Johnson, we broadly announced that Hudson held that any Fourth Amendment right to privacy extinguished upon conviction, and we affirmed the dismissal of an inmate's Fourth Amendment claim regarding observation of his naked body on that basis. .

. Thus, in King, we attempted to reconcile this inconsistency in our case law with a bright-line rule: that prisoners retain an expectation of privacy regarding physical intrusions into their bodies—such as during digital rectal probes and forced catheterizations—but not visual inspections of them. . . As our colleague initially explained in his concurrence in King, this rule is untenable. . . To begin, it draws no support from Supreme Court precedent. Indeed, the strip searches the Court evaluated using a reasonableness analysis in Bell and Florence were visual. . . No other circuit has announced (nor ever entertained the notion) that the Fourth Amendment reaches only searches that involve a physical intrusion by a searching official. This is for good reason, as searches may be attributed to law enforcement when they do not physically do the searching, but it occurs at their command. . . This is consistent with the overarching focus of the Fourth Amendment reasonableness analysis, which evaluates an individual's expectation of privacy 'in what was searched,' not who did the searching. . . To conclude otherwise promotes a distinction without a difference: whereas a manual body cavity search conducted by a prison official would fall within the domain of the Fourth Amendment, a search in which an officer orders a prisoner to manipulate her own body and merely looks on would avoid review. In light of these considerations, we thus overrule the section of King addressing the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim and the bright-line rule it announced. Likewise, we overrule our decision in Johnson to the extent it deems the Fourth Amendment inapplicable to visual inspections during bodily searches. . . . Consistent with the principle of deference to the judgment of prison administrators, several of our sister circuits, after undertaking a reasonableness analysis of prison strip searches, have concluded that these searches do not violate the Fourth Amendment where the level of intrusion does not outweigh the purported justification for the search. . . . Finally, although we have concluded that the Fourth Amendment applies to the strip and body cavity searches at issue, this does not mean that Plaintiffs are necessarily entitled to a trial on their Fourth Amendment claim. They still must provide sufficient evidence that the searches were unreasonable, considering 'the scope of the particular intrusion[s], the manner in which [they were] conducted, the justification for initiating [them], and the place in which [they were] conducted.'. .Citing security concerns and the need for cadet training, Defendants argue that the searches at issue were reasonable. We do not resolve today, however, whether Plaintiffs have demonstrated a genuine dispute regarding the reasonableness of the searches. Because the district court concluded the Fourth Amendment did not cover the searches at issue here, it did not perform a reasonableness analysis. Indeed, Defendants, in their motion to strike Plaintiffs' response to their motion for summary judgment, conceded that '[t]he nature of the searches and whether they were conducted in the manner claimed by Plaintiffs are clearly in dispute.' On this record, we cannot determine whether the searches were, in fact, reasonable. We thus leave that analysis to the district court to perform in the first instance on remand.")

But see Henry v. Hulett, 969 F.3d 769, 788-91 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc) (Easterbrook, Circuit Judge, dissenting) ("My colleagues are right to say that prisoners are entitled to protection from abusive guards. Misbehaving guards can be and are criminally prosecuted, as the guard was in J.K.J. v. Polk County, 960 F.3d 367 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc), and many prisoners have tort claims. But our plaintiffs invoke the Constitution rather than other sources of law. Constitutional protection for persons serving sentences following convictions comes from the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause of the Eighth Amendment, not the Fourth Amendment. The difference between the two is that liability under the Eighth Amendment depends on showing an intent to punish improperly, not simply on taking an action that a court deems unreasonable. . . . In recent years the Court has repeatedly addressed the question: How long after arrest does the Fourth Amendment remain applicable? Although some decisions suggested that the Fourth Amendment's protections lapse when an arrested person is presented to a judge, see, e.g., Wallace v. Kato, 549 U.S. 384, 389–92, 127 S.Ct. 1091, 166 L.Ed.2d 973 (2007), more recent decisions have drawn the line at conviction. A detainee retains rights under the Fourth Amendment until conviction. See Manuel v. Joliet, —— U.S. ——, 137 S. Ct. 911, 197 L.Ed.2d 312 (2017); McDonough v. Smith, —— U.S. ——, 139 S. Ct. 2149, 204 L.Ed.2d 506 (2019). After that, the Eighth Amendment sets the limits on institutional management. . . . If prisons are to enjoy the scope of discretion that is essential to sound administration, while protecting prisoners from sadistic conduct, the Eighth Amendment is the right tool for the job.")

See also Fugate v. Erdos, No. 21-4025, 2022 WL 3536295, at *13-14 (6th Cir. Aug. 18, 2022) (not reported) ("While we did not parse the distinction in Cornwell, the en banc Seventh Circuit recently articulated the distinction between the Eighth Amendment and the Fourth Amendment as they relate to prison strip searches: The Fourth Amendment, as discussed earlier, 'protects prisoners from searches that may be related to or serve some institutional objective, but where guards nevertheless perform the searches in an unreasonable manner, in an unreasonable place, or for an unreasonable purpose.' Henry v. Hulett, 969 F.3d 769, 781 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc). The Eighth Amendment, on the other hand, 'safeguards prisoners against the use of searches that correctional officers subjectively intend as a form of punishment.'. . With these standards in mind, Fugate has come forward with evidence that the warden maliciously ordered the third daily strip search as punishment.")

11. Note on "Shocks the Conscience"

In County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833 (1998), the Court granted certiorari "to resolve a conflict among the Circuits over the standard of culpability on the part of a law enforcement officer for violating substantive due process in a pursuit case." Id. at 839. The decedent in Lewis was a sixteen-year-old passenger on a motorcycle driven by a friend. A pursuit took place when the driver of the motorcycle ignored an officer's attempt to stop him for speeding. The chase reached speeds of up to 100 miles per hour and ended when the motorcycle failed to maneuver a turn, resulting in both the driver and passenger falling off the cycle. The police officer in pursuit skidded into Lewis, propelling him 70 feet down the road. Lewis died as a result of his injuries.

Because Supreme Court precedent precluded application of the Fourth Amendment to the facts of the case, see California v. Hodari, 499 U. S. 621, 626 (1991) (police pursuit does not amount to "seizure" within meaning of Fourth Amendment) and Brower v. County of Inyo, 489

U. S. 593, 596-597 (1989) (Fourth Amendment seizure occurs only when there is a governmental termination of freedom of movement through means intentionally applied), the Court first had to resolve whether the plaintiff could state a claim under the substantive due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment in the pursuit context, and, if so, whether the allegations set out by the plaintiff were sufficient to establish such a claim.

Justice Souter, writing the majority opinion, noted that the Court had recently expressed its view on the first question and pointed to the following language in United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 272 n.7 (1997):

Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 394,109 S.Ct. 1865, 1870-1871, 104 L.Ed.2d 443 (1989), does not hold that all constitutional claims relating to physically abusive government conduct must arise under either the Fourth or Eighth Amendments; rather, Graham simply requires that if a constitutional claim is covered by a specific constitutional provision, such as the Fourth or Eighth Amendment, the claim must be analyzed under the standard appropriate to that specific provision, not under the rubric of substantive due process.

Thus, given the facts of Lewis and the inapplicability of a more specific constitutional provision, the plaintiff could assert a claim under the substantive due process clause. See also Moran v. Clarke (Moran I), 296 F.3d 638, 646 (8th Cir. 2002) (en banc) ("[W]hen a person is damaged by outrageous police misconduct but the resulting injury does not neatly fit within a specific constitutional remedy, the injured party may, depending upon the circumstances, pursue a substantive due process claim under section 1983."); Petta v. Rivera, 143 F.3d 895, 901 (5th Cir. 1998) ("[W]e conclude, as have all of the courts of appeals that have addressed the issue, that a plaintiff whose claim is not susceptible to proper analysis with reference to a specific constitutional right may still state a claim under § 1983 for a violation of his or her Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process right, and have the claim judged by the constitutional standard which governs that right."); Hemphill v. Schott, 141 F.3d 412, 418-19 (2d Cir. 1998) ("This court has held that outside the context of an arrest, a plaintiff may make claims of excessive force under § 1983 under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . One embodiment of this still extant claim for relief from excessive force based in Due Process is the situation in which a state actor aids and abets a private party in subjecting a citizen to unwarranted physical harm. . . . Graham's holding that excessive force claims in the context of an arrest are to be analyzed under the Fourth Amendment's objective standards does not extend to this unusual situation in which the police officers allegedly engaged in a deprivation of rights coincident with, but distinct from, their arrest of the suspect. Not only did the alleged aid necessarily begin before the Officers and Torrado reached the scene of the arrest, but Torrado, as a civilian, was not himself arresting Hemphill."); Sanchez v. Figueroa, 996 F. Supp. 143, 147 (D.P.R. 1998) ("While substantive due process analysis has been rendered inapposite to situations to which specific constitutional amendments apply, . . . the factors set forth by Judge Friendly in Glick remain useful in analyzing claims of excessive force by innocent bystanders who have no Fourth or Eighth Amendment claims.").

See also Betts v. New Castle Youth Development Center, 621 F.3d 249, 260, 261 (3d Cir. 2010) ("Although we have not previously applied the more-specific-provision rule in a precedential opinion, at least four of our sister circuit courts of appeals have done so. [collecting cases] Betts does not cite any case law for the proposition that he may bring both substantive due process and Eighth Amendment claims challenging the same conduct. Moreover, Betts's claims concern his conditions of confinement and an alleged failure by Defendants to ensure his safety. Because these allegations fit squarely within the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment, we hold that the more-specific-provision rule forecloses Betts's substantive due process claims."); Cain v. Rock, 67 F. Supp.2d 544, 552-53 (D. Md. 1999) ("Whether a random act of violence by a prison guard constitutes 'cruel and unusual punishment' for Eighth Amendment purposes is a question of first impression in the Fourth Circuit. . . . This Court agrees with the reasoning of the Second and Fifth Circuits. The assault at issue in the present case plainly falls outside of 'cruel and unusual punishment' jurisprudence. Rock's alleged sexual acts were in direct violation of prison regulations, neither authorized nor condoned by prison officials, and completely removed from the purposes of the correctional facility. These acts, though regrettable, were random, and the Court holds that a random sexual assault by a prison guard − while cruel and not ordinary − does not qualify as 'punishment' for Eighth Amendment purposes. Accordingly, the Court rejects Cain's Eighth Amendment claim. Prisoners who are the subject of unauthorized assaults, however, may still have a claim under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . . In the present case, the Court finds that Cain's allegations and evidence, if true, set forth a scenario that could shock the judicial conscience. Given the 'power arrangements' in the prison environment, . . . and the custodial role of correctional officers, a sexual assault by a guard is a shocking abuse of power, particularly where the inmate is mentally or physically incapacitated.").

See also Simi Investment Company, Inc. v. Harris County, 236 F.3d 240, 248, 249 (5th Cir. 2000) ("John Corp. found that under Albright /Graham, a more explicit provision does not necessarily preempt due process protections, and that substantive due process claims can survive a related takings argument . . . . Our limited holding in John Corp. is similarly limited here; we find only that when a state interferes with property interests, a substantive due process claim may survive a takings analysis and, therefore, provide jurisdiction for a federal court.").

The Court expressly rejected as "unsound," 523 U.S. at 843, the contrary position taken by the Seventh Circuit in Mays v. City of East St. Louis, 123 F.3d 999, 1002 (7th Cir. 1997) (where passengers in suspect's car sued for injuries sustained in context of high-speed pursuit, court held that "[c]aution in the creation of new rights leads us to conclude that the sort of claim plaintiffs make is not a proper invocation of substantive due process. . . .[O]nce the substantive criteria of the fourth amendment have been applied, there is neither need nor justification for another substantive inquiry − one based not on constitutional text but on an inference from structure.").

The more difficult question was the standard of culpability plaintiff would have to demonstrate to make out a substantive due process claim in the pursuit context. In Lewis, the Ninth Circuit had held that "deliberate indifference or reckless disregard" was the appropriate standard for a substantive due process claim arising from a high-speed pursuit. Lewis v. Sacramento County, 98 F.3d 434, 441 (9th Cir.1996). The Ninth Circuit's holding was in direct conflict with decisions of other Circuits requiring conduct that "shocks the conscience" in high-speed pursuit cases. See, e.g., Evans v. Avery, 100 F.3d 1033, 1038 (1st Cir. 1996) (holding that "police officers' deliberate indifference to a victim's rights, standing alone, is not a sufficient predicate for a substantive due process claim in a police pursuit case. Rather, in such a case, the plaintiff must also show that the officers' conduct shocks the conscience."); Williams v. City and County of Denver, 99 F.3d 1009, 1017 (10th Cir. 1996) (concluding that officer's "decision to speed against a red light through an intersection on a major boulevard in Denver without slowing down or activating his siren in non-emergency circumstances . . . could be viewed as reckless and conscience-shocking."), vacated and remanded for further proceedings in light of County of Sacramento v. Lewis and Bd. of County Comm'rs of Bryan County v. Brown, Williams v. City and County of Denver, 153 F.3d 730 (10th Cir. 1998) (per curiam) (en banc); Fagan v. City of Vineland, 22 F.3d 1296, 1303 (3d Cir. 1994) (en banc) (holding that "the appropriate standard by which to judge the police conduct [in a high speed pursuit case] is the 'shocks the conscience' standard.").

The Court first observed that "the core of the concept" of due process has always been the notion of "protection against arbitrary action." 523 U.S. at 845. What will be considered "fatally arbitrary," however, will "differ depending on whether it is legislation or a specific act of a governmental officer that is at issue." Id. To establish an executive abuse of power that is "fatally arbitrary," the plaintiff will have to demonstrate conduct that "shocks the conscience." The Court acknowledged that "the measure of what is conscience-shocking is no calibrated yard stick," and "that the constitutional concept of conscience-shocking duplicates no traditional category of common-law fault." Id. at 848. Most likely to reach the conscience-shocking level would be "conduct intended to injure in some way unjustifiable by any government interest." Id. at 849.

Approving of the deliberate indifference standard applied to substantive due process claims of pretrial detainees complaining of inadequate attention to health and safety needs, the Court distinguished high-speed pursuits by law enforcement officers as presenting "markedly different circumstances." Id. at 851. The Court noted substantial authority for different standards of culpability being applied to the same constitutional provision. Thus, in the Eighth Amendment prison context, while deliberate indifference to medical needs may establish constitutional liability, the Court has required prisoners asserting excessive force claims in the context of a prison riot to show that the force was used "maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm." Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312, 320-21 (1986). The Court analogized police officers engaged in sudden police chases to prison officials facing a riot and concluded:

Just as a purpose to cause harm is needed for Eighth Amendment liability in a riot case, so it ought to be needed for Due Process liability in a pursuit case. Accordingly, we hold that high-speed chases with no intent to harm suspects physically or to worsen their legal plight do not give rise to liability under the Fourteenth Amendment, redressible by an action under § 1983.

523 U.S. at 854. With no suggestion of improper or malicious motive on the part of the officer in Lewis, the alleged conduct could not be found "conscience-shocking." Thus, the Court reversed the judgment of the Court of Appeals.

While six of the Justices concurred in the judgment and opinion of the Court, Justices Stevens, Scalia and Thomas concurred only in the judgment. Justice Stevens would have reinstated the judgment of district court which had disposed of the case on qualified immunity grounds on the basis that the law was not clearly established at the time. He would have left resolution of the difficult constitutional question for a case against a municipality. 523 U.S. at 859 (Stevens, J., concurring in the judgment).

Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, suggested that the appropriate test for a substantive due process claim was "whether our Nation has traditionally protected the right respondents assert" rather than "whether the police conduct here at issue shocks my unelected conscience." Id. at 862 (Scalia, J., joined by Thomas, J., concurring in the judgment). Justice Scalia "would reverse the judgment of the Ninth Circuit, not on the ground that petitioners have failed to shock my still, soft voice within, but on the ground that respondents offer no textual or historical support for their alleged due process right." Id. at 865.

See Washington v. Housing Authority of the City of Columbia, 58 F.4th 170, 178-82 (4th Cir. 2023) ("Here, deliberate indifference is the correct standard to measure the Housing Authority's conduct. Unlike cases involving emergency, split-second decisions, Plaintiff alleges years of choices by the Housing Authority that led to the tragic circumstances of this case. . . . Additionally, the Housing Authority adopted a specific policy in 2017 to ensure that missing carbon monoxide detectors, which it considered to be 'life-threatening conditions,' were installed in some (privately owned) properties. . . But two years later—and with time to reflect that such 'life-threatening conditions' from carbon monoxide threatened all of its properties—the Housing Authority had chosen not to apply the same policy to its own housing. Thus, the facts alleged show there was ample time to deliberate and reflect on those choices. Accordingly, deliberate indifference is the correct standard to apply here. Next, we consider whether the Housing Authority's alleged conduct constitutes deliberate indifference to Witherspoon's life and safety. . . .The Housing Authority argues that Plaintiff failed to allege that the Housing Authority recognized the risk of carbon monoxide poisoning. Specifically, the Housing Authority posits that without prior knowledge of past complaints relating to carbon monoxide leaks or other similar dangerous conditions, it could not have known the danger here. . . . Plaintiff has alleged enough facts at this early stage to establish that the Housing Authority recognized the risk of carbon monoxide poisoning and acted inappropriately in light of that risk. . . .Taken to its logical conclusion, the Housing Authority's argument would amount to a 'one free death' card. . . That's because, where a landlord fails to install carbon monoxide detectors or inspect a furnace, the most likely way they will discover any dangerous emissions will be a person's very serious illness or death. . . . Critically, too, Plaintiff alleged this policy of willful neglect in the apartment's maintenance was a conscious choice by the Housing Authority. By engaging in a pattern of mismanagement and poor maintenance, the Housing Authority allegedly hoped to allow its properties to become 'so dangerously unsafe and uninhabitable that they became eligible for federal grants,' such as the HOPE VI grant. . . . Such blatant disregard for tenant safety in order to obtain federal funding, if proven to be true, would be conscience shocking, as it lacks any 'reasonable justification in the service of a legitimate governmental objective.'. . .At bottom, the facts alleged in this case shock the conscience: a public housing authority's deliberate indifference to a risk of harm that threatened numerous families living in low-income housing. What is more, two men died because of that indifference, several more were hospitalized, and an entire community was evacuated. Substantive due process exists as the 'last line of defense' against such official abuses of power that are so arbitrary as to shock the conscience of the court. . . These grave facts are surely even more egregious than those in Dean—accordingly, we find that Plaintiff's complaint sufficiently alleges that the Housing Authority acted with deliberate indifference to Witherspoon's bodily integrity, thereby violating his substantive-due-process rights."); Braun v. Burke, 983 F.3d 999, 1003 (8th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 215 (2021) ("[O]ur decision in Sitzes is generally instructive. There, an officer learned from a police dispatcher that someone had been assaulted and robbed of $55 in a Wal-Mart parking lot. . . The officer responded (even though another officer was already en route), driving at speeds of at least eighty miles per hour in a thirty mile-per-hour zone on the wrong side of the road. . . We seriously doubted the parking lot heist constituted an actual emergency. . . Still, we held that the officer's affidavit stating he believed he was responding to an emergency was not so preposterous as to reflect bad faith. . . Even more so here, where the officer was facing an active threat to public safety, we are unwilling to find Trooper Burke's belief preposterous. Finally, Braun insists that speeding does not constitute an actual emergency. This argument goes nowhere. Again, the emergency inquiry is a subjective, not objective, one. In sum, Trooper Burke believed he was responding to an emergency, and thus we apply the intent-to-harm standard. This resolves Braun's claim against him, as she does not even argue, much less present any evidence, that he intended to harm anyone. Therefore, the district court correctly granted summary judgment for Trooper Burke on Braun's substantive due process claim because she failed to establish a constitutional violation."); Braun v. Burke, 983 F.3d 999, 1004 (8th Cir. 2020) ("Colloton, J., concurring), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 215 (2021) ("I join the opinion of the court and submit these observations regarding the separate concurring opinion that follows. In Terrell v. Larson, 396 F.3d 975 (8th Cir. 2005) (en banc), this court held that in determining the requisite level of culpability to prove a substantive due process claim against a law enforcement officer, there is no legally significant distinction between high-speed driving in pursuit of a suspect and high-speed driving in response to other types of emergencies. . . The court rejected the use of an objective standard to determine whether a particular situation constitutes an emergency that triggers the 'intent-to-harm' standard of fault that applies to high-speed pursuits under County of Sacramento v. Lewis[.] . .Because 'substantive due process liability is grounded on a government official's subjective intent, and because the intent-to-harm standard applies "when unforeseen circumstances demand an officer's instant judgment" and "decisions have to be made in haste, under pressure, and frequently without the luxury of a second chance,"' the court ruled that 'this issue turns on whether the deputies subjectively believed that they were responding to an emergency.'. . The 'intent-to-harm' standard thus applies to a substantive due process claim both when an officer believes that he is pursuing a suspect and when an officer believes that he is responding to another type of emergency. The suggestion of the concurrence. . . that there is a 'legally significant' distinction between the two types of cases runs counter to Terrell. More significantly, the concurrence asserts that our decision in this case 'helps illustrate a growing circuit split' on the level of culpability required to establish a substantive due process claim. . . The suggested conflict in authority, however, is illusory. In Dean v. McKinney, 976 F.3d 407 (4th Cir. 2020), the defendant officer acknowledged that an 'emergency' call had been cancelled, and stated affirmatively that he was 'backing down' to a non-emergency response. . . At a minimum, there was a factual dispute about whether the officer believed in good faith that he was responding to an emergency. In Sauers v. Borough of Nesquehoning, 905 F.3d 711 (3d Cir. 2018), which involved a motion to dismiss a complaint, the officer allegedly observed only a 'summary' or 'minor' traffic offense, and then pursued the violator at over 100 miles per hour. . . The complaint alleged that there was no emergency, and there was no allegation that the officer believed he was responding to an emergency. . . Neither of the cited cases, therefore, applied a 'deliberate indifference' standard of fault in a case where it was undisputed that the officer believed he was responding to an emergency."); Braun v. Burke, 983 F.3d 999, 1005-06 (8th Cir. 2020) (Grasz, J., concurring), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 215 (2021) ("I concur with the court's opinion. Precedent requires it. But if the outcome also seems unjust, I can understand why. Two people tragically died after a state trooper sped and endangered the public in order to try to locate a car previously seen speeding. I write separately to address two points. One is a point of factual emphasis and the other is simply an observation related to the need for clarity in the interest of public understanding as well as the preservation of respect for the rule of law. First the point of factual emphasis. This is not a case involving a high-speed pursuit of a fleeing suspect. . . The facts, when viewed in the light most favorable to Braun, show that this was instead a hunt for a suspect whose whereabouts were unclear. That distinction is legally significant. It matters because when an officer is not in pursuit of a fleeing suspect, our precedent requires the district court to engage in an additional step: determining whether the officer subjectively believed he was responding to an 'emergency.'. . While that difference is important for future cases, the result here is the same. That is because no facts were presented to create a triable fact on the trooper's subjective belief under Sitzes v. City of West Memphis. . . As a consequence, in this case we must accept the trooper's affidavit stating he believed there was an emergency that required him, after concluding his work at the scene of a hit and run accident, to drive ninety-eight miles per hour on a public highway without emergency lights or sirens to try to locate a car he had earlier seen ... speeding. Now to the observation. This case helps illustrate a growing circuit split on when and how to apply the requisite level of culpability under County of Sacramento v. Lewis[.]. . Compare Dean v. McKinney, 976 F.3d 407, 414–16 (4th Cir. 2020) (en banc) (looking at objective facts beyond the officer's subjective arguments to decide that deliberate indifference applied), and Sauers v. Borough of Nesquehoning, 905 F.3d 711, 715, 717–18 (3d Cir. 2018) (deciding that deliberate indifference applied after using objective factors to determine that no emergency existed), with Bingue v. Prunchak, 512 F.3d 1169 1176–78 (9th Cir. 2008) (applying an intent-to-harm standard), and Terrell, 396 F.3d at 980 ("[T]his issue turns on whether the deputies subjectively believed that they were responding to an emergency."). A uniform standard, or at least more clarity on when each standard applies, would advance respect for the rule of law in this area. This is especially true when, as here, there was time to deliberate before engaging in the high-speed driving that caused the accident and it was not a situation where the circumstances demanded an officer's instant judgment or a decision under pressure.").

See also Ellis ex rel. Estate of Ellis v. Ogden City, 589 F.3d 1099, 1103 n.3 (10th Cir. 2009) ("The fact that Mr. Ellis was a bystander and not the suspect being pursued does not change our view of the controlling effect of Lewis here. Arguably an innocent bystander presents a stronger case for liability against the pursuing officers than does a fleeing suspect. But we perceive no difference in the strength of Lewis as a defense against a bystander's claim or other persons pursued. See Bingue v. Prunchak, 512 F.3d 1169, 1175 (9th Cir.2008) ("Lewis applies to injuries resulting from a high-speed police chase regardless of whether the injured victim was a fleeing suspect or an innocent bystander."); See also Helseth v. Burch, 258 F.3d 867, 872 (8th Cir.2001); Davis v. Township of Hillside, 190 F.3d 167, 170 n.2 (3rd Cir.1999). The Court in Lewis, grouped together 'suspects, their passengers, other drivers, or bystanders.' 523 U.S. at 853 (emphasis added)."); Daniels v. City of Dallas, 272 F. App'x 321, 323 (5th Cir. 2008) ("It matters not here whether we apply an intent-to-harm standard for chases or a lower standard of deliberate indifference; Wolverton's actions do not fall within the ambit of either. This is a case that, although tragic, involves negligence or even gross negligence but not deliberate indifference . . . The fact that a public official committed a common law tort with tragic results fails to rise to the level of a violation of substantive due process . . . . [M]otor vehicle accidents caused by public officials or employees do not rise to the threshold of a constitutional violation actionable under § 1983, absent a showing that the official knew an accident was imminent but consciously and culpably refused to prevent it. It is insufficient to show that a public official acted in the face of a recognizable but generic risk to the public at large. . . . In an unpublished opinion in Smith v. Walden, we similarly affirmed a deliberate indifference holding in the police context. The district court held that a police officer who was speeding without lights or a siren in response to a non-emergency call and killed an innocent passenger did not act with 'the level of arbitrary or intentional conduct that shocks the conscience in the constitutional sense.'. . We find no facts in the pleadings or the record, viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, showing that Wolverton acted with the recklessness required for deliberate indifference. . . Nor do we find error in the district court's treatment of Plaintiffs' facts and pleadings. No matter how favorably a court treats the Plaintiffs' facts and pleadings, they do not demonstrate the requisite factors for deliberate indifference."); Bingue v. Prunchak, 512 F.3d 1169, 1177 (9th Cir. 2008) ("We agree with the Eighth Circuit and decline to try to draw a distinction between 'emergency' and 'non-emergency' situations involving high-speed chases aimed at apprehending a fleeing suspect. . . We, therefore, hold that the Lewis standard of 'intent to harm' applies to all high-speed police chases. . . . We conclude that high-speed police chases, by their very nature, do not give the officers involved adequate time to deliberate in either deciding to join the chase or how to drive while in pursuit of the fleeing suspect. We hold, therefore, that Lewis requires us to apply the 'intent to harm' standard to all high-speed chases."); Meals v. City of Memphis, Tenn., 493 F.3d 720, 730 (6th Cir. 2007) ("It is clear from the record that Officer King did not intentionally cause Mr. Harris's vehicle to crash. Moreover,

Officer King argues persuasively that even when the facts are viewed in the light most favorable to the appellee, they do not meet the shocks-the-conscience test. Although the police expert, Mr. Waller, opined that the pursuit reached an unacceptable level when Mr. Harris crossed into oncoming traffic when he first turned onto Covington Pike, and despite the fact that Officer King violated the police pursuit policy, the record does not establish that Officer King intended to harm the occupant of the vehicle being pursued − or the victims of her actions. . . . We are therefore compelled to conclude, despite the tragic results stemming from Officer King's violation of the City's policy, that the facts in the present case do not make out a substantive due process violation under Lewis, supra."); Terrell v. Larson, 396 F.3d 975, 978-81 & n.2 (8th Cir. 2005) (en banc) ("In determining the requisite level of culpability in this case, we reject the panel majority's conclusion that the controlling force of Lewis is limited to high-speed police driving aimed at apprehending a suspected offender. The Supreme Court's analysis of the culpability issue in Lewis was framed in far broader terms. . . [W]e hold that the intent-to-harm standard of Lewis applies to an officer's decision to engage in high-speed driving in response to other types of emergencies, and to the manner in which the police car is then driven in proceeding to the scene of the emergency. . . . Because substantive due process liability is grounded on a government official's subjective intent, and because the intent-to-harm standard applies 'when unforeseen circumstances demand an officer's instant judgment' and 'decisions have to be made in haste, under pressure, and frequently without the luxury of a second chance,' Lewis, 523 U.S. at 853, we conclude that this issue turns on whether the deputies subjectively believed that they were responding to an emergency. . . .We need not consider whether a different rule should apply if an official's claim of perceived emergency is so preposterous as to reflect bad faith. Here, it is undisputed that, prior to the accident, Larson and Longen only heard the initial dispatch that a young mother had locked herself in a bedroom and was threatening to harm her three-year-old child. From the perspective of a police officer deciding whether to respond, the dispatch without question described an emergency, that is, a situation needing the presence of law enforcement officers as rapidly as they could arrive, even if that entailed the risks inherent in high-speed driving. . . . On appeal, plaintiffs argue, as they did in the district court, that a jury could find that the situation was not reasonably regarded as an emergency by Larson and Longen because they 'volunteered' to provide back-up and then persisted in responding after being advised they were 'covered' and could 'cancel.' But whether Larson and Longen could reasonably have decided that they were not needed as additional back-up is irrelevant. Under Lewis, the intent-to-harm culpability standard applies if they believed they were responding to an emergency call. . . . Alternatively, we conclude that Deputies Larson and Longen are entitled to summary judgment even under the deliberate indifference standard of fault adopted by the panel majority and the district court. To prevail on their substantive due process claim, plaintiffs must prove, not only that the deputies' behavior reflected deliberate indifference, but also that it was 'so egregious, so outrageous, that it may fairly be said to shock the contemporary conscience.' . . Not all deliberately indifferent conduct is conscience shocking in the constitutional sense of the term."); Slusarchuk v. Hoff, 346 F.3d 1178, 1183 (8th Cir. 2003) ("Appellees argue that officers Hoff and Faust evidenced the requisite intent to harm in pursuing Howard because they did not have probable cause to stop him and therefore the pursuit was unrelated to a legitimate object of arrest. This contention is without merit. When Howard refused to stop after the officers activated their emergency lights, they had probable cause to arrest him for committing a felony in their presence, regardless of their initial reasons for the attempted stop. . . . Alternatively, appellees argue that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity because they intended 'to worsen [Howard's] legal plight.' . . . We decline to read the term expansively, as appellees urge, because every police pursuit is intended to 'worsen [the] legal plight' of the suspect by arresting him. Thus, a broad reading would eviscerate the intent-to-harm standard that the Court adopted, at least in part, to sharply limit substantive due process liability. Rather, we construe the term as applying only to a narrow category of pursuits that reflect a conscience-shocking motive beyond the realm of legitimate government action but do not involve an intent to inflict physical harm. The pursuit in this case reflects no such motive."); Helseth v. Burch, 258 F.3d 867, 871 (8th Cir. 2001) (en banc) ("Since Lewis, all other circuits that have examined the issue have applied the intent-to-harm standard in high-speed police pursuits cases, without regard to . . .the length of the pursuit, the officer's training and experience, the severity of the suspect's misconduct, or the perceived danger to the public in continuing the pursuit.[citing cases] We now join those circuits and. . .hold that the intent-to-harm standard of Lewis applies to all § 1983 substantive due process claims based upon the conduct of public officials engaged in a high-speed automobile chase aimed at apprehending a suspected offender.").

Compare Browder v. City of Albuquerque (Browder I), 787 F.3d 1076, 1080-81 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Attempting to follow as best we can what guidance we've received in this murky area, we believe we can say this much about the case at hand. No one before us disputes that Ashley's death and the damage done to Lindsay's person count as direct and substantial impairments of their fundamental right to life, so we can and do take that much as given. And while the line that separates executive actions that are 'reasonably justified' in the service of a 'legitimate governmental objective' and those that are 'arbitrary or conscience shocking' appears anything but clearly defined, this case does not seem to us to implicate any serious borderline disputes. 'Arbitrary' actions are those performed capriciously or at one's pleasure and without good reason. . . And on the complaint's telling at least, Sergeant Casaus's actions appear the very model of that. He used his official squad car and activated its emergency lights and proceeded to speed through surface city streets at more than 60 miles per hour over 8.8 miles through eleven city intersections and at least one red light—all for his personal pleasure, on no governmental business of any kind. . . .Speeding and jumping red lights often may signify no more than negligence—the failure to do what a reasonably prudent person would do. Even in this case we acknowledge a jury might find Sergeant Casaus guilty of no more than that. But on the facts pleaded a reasonable jury could infer something more, a conscious contempt of the lives of others and thus a form of reckless indifference to a fundamental right—precisely the sort of mens rea Lewis says will normally suffice to establish liability.") and Sitzes v. City of West Memphis Ark., 606 F.3d 461, 480 (8th Cir. 2010) (Lange, J., dissenting) ("Without question, law enforcement officers deserve protection from Section 1983 suits for conduct that is taken without an opportunity to deliberate under situations that are actual emergencies. However, the situation in this case was not an emergency. Officer Wright's affidavit alone does not transform the situation into an emergency. This is not to imply that an objective standard should govern whether an emergency exists. Rather, when there is substantial evidence to create a question of fact as to whether the officer legitimately believed there to be an emergency such that the officer's credibility is in doubt, then summary judgment is inappropriate. Because issues of fact inappropriate for summary judgment exist here, I dissent with respect to summary judgment on the Section 1983 claim.") with Sitzes v. City of West Memphis Ark., 606 F.3d 461, 469, 470 (8th Cir. 2010) ("Although Officer Wright's failure to engage his emergency lights and siren is arguably incompatible with a belief that he was responding to an emergency, we conclude that an inquiry into the objective reasonableness of Officer Wright's belief is contrary to the intent of Terrell, which is to insulate police officers from liability when they believe they are responding to an emergency call. Terrell implied, but did not explicitly hold, that a different rule might apply 'if an official's claim of perceived emergency is so preposterous as to reflect bad faith.' 396 F.3d at 980 n. 2. In essence, this requires us to take at face value an officer's characterization of a situation as an emergency in all but the most egregious cases. Although this case approaches that bad faith line, it does not cross it. Viewing the record in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, Officer Wright's belief that the theft of property and assault that occurred in the Wal-Mart parking lot constituted an emergency was likely mistaken and perhaps even unreasonable. Were it not for the language in Terrell, this unreasonableness might be enough to remove this case from the intent-to-harm realm of cases. However, we are bound by Terrell, and we find that Officer Wright's belief is not so preposterous as to reflect bad faith. . . . As such, the unreasonableness of Officer Wright's belief is not enough to render the intent-to-harm standard inapplicable here. We agree with the dissent that our opinion should not be read to establish a rule that an officer can insulate himself from substantive due process liability, no matter the circumstances, by simply averring that he subjectively believed the situation to which he was responding was an emergency. . . . In sum, we do not understand this case to establish a per se rule that an officer's self-serving affidavit will always insulate that officer from substantive due process liability. Instead, we simply hold that the plaintiffs have failed to create a genuine issue of fact as to Officer Wright's subjective belief and that this belief is not so preposterous as to reflect bad faith on the part of Officer Wright."). Lewis has been applied in other Fourteenth Amendment contexts where officers are confronted with sudden, tense, rapidly developing or emergency-type situations.

Compare Chambers v. Sanders, 63 F.4th 1092, 1097-1101 (6th Cir. 2023) ("This circuit has not previously decided whether the right to family integrity is implicated whenever the state deprives a child of routine interaction with a parent through wrongful incarceration. . . We address the issue now and hold that it is not. . .We may assume for purposes of this case that plaintiffs have identified a liberty interest protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. Even so, it would not be violated here because plaintiffs have not alleged that any state actor intruded on that right with the culpability required to state a due process violation. . . This conclusion is supported by the majority of our sibling circuits and our own precedent. . . . The only circuit to agree with the plaintiffs' approach is the Ninth Circuit, which allows children to claim violation of their right to family integrity against state actions which incidentally impact their relationship with their parents. . . The Ninth Circuit's view is based primarily on a broad reading of the substantive due process right to family association and the legislative history of the Ku Klux Klan Act of 1871, the precursor to 42

U.S.C. § 1983. . . The Ninth Circuit's analysis is flawed in both respects. First, as already discussed, the Supreme Court has cautioned against such broad interpretations of rights under the due process clause. . . Second, the Ninth Circuit mischaracterizes the legislative history on which it relies. . . . Analogous cases from this circuit confirm that no constitutional violation of the right to family association exists without a state action directed at the family relationship. In § 1983 cases where family members of those wrongfully killed by police claim infringement of the right to familial association, we have rejected such claims as collateral. . . . Even more recently in LeFever, we again rejected a family-integrity claim by children whose parents were killed by state police officers. . . In that opinion, the panel majority—like that in Foos—expressly declined to follow the Ninth Circuit's approach of allowing claims by children who are deprived of their familial relationships because their parent is wrongfully killed by a state actor. . . LeFever stands alongside Foos and Claybrook in rejecting similar claims to those brought by Chambers and Smith. Our precedent and that of most other circuits lead us to conclude that substantive due process claims based on the right to family integrity require that the state official act with a culpable state of mind directed at the family relationship. The due process right of familial association does not protect against all forms of state action that impact parent-child relationships. . . . To clarify this rule, two points must be made. First, the standard we adopt today will not be met simply because a government official acted intentionally. A government official can make a wrongful, intentional decision, as the alleged facts here demonstrate, without that intent or the decision itself being aimed at the family relationship. Instead, as with any due process violation, stating a claim in this context requires that the state actor act with a culpable state of mind with respect to the plaintiffs themselves and their own alleged constitutional rights. . . . Second, it will admittedly be a rare case in the wrongful incarceration context that meets this standard. That rarity is appropriate in light of both the narrow scope of substantive due process generally and our case law and that of other circuits consistently rejecting such claims in the Fourteenth Amendment context. On the other hand, were we to dispense with the requirement that the government action at issue target the family relationship, then every close family member of a wrongfully incarcerated individual would have a constitutional claim based on the incidental, even unknowing, impact of that individual's incarceration on the family relationship. As discussed above, that conclusion cannot be squared with the Supreme Court's case law, or that of this circuit and nearly all of our sister circuits. . . . Applying this framework to the instant case, Chambers and Smith have not pled facts to state a claim that Sanders's conduct was directed at interfering with their parent-child relationship. We cannot conclude that Sanders's investigative misconduct and deliberate indifference toward Burton's federally protected rights also amounts to 'conscience shocking' treatment of his children's federally protected rights.") with Chambers v. Sanders, 63 F.4th 1092, 1102, 1106-07, 1112 (6th Cir. 2023) (Moore, J., dissenting) ("I disagree with the majority that a state official deprives a person of their due-process right to family association and integrity only when the state official 'acted with a culpable state of mind directed at the plaintiff's family relationship or a decision traditionally within the ambit of the family.'. . I believe that this new requirement lacks support in our controlling precedent. Instead, I believe that we should apply the shocks-the-conscience standard to the official's conduct. Therefore, I would measure whether Appellees' conduct towards the Appellants—intentionally and deliberately procuring a wrongful conviction against their father and depriving them of their father—shocks the conscience. I would hold that when the child loses this relationship to the perpetual absence of their parent because a state official deliberately and intentionally procured a wrongful conviction, the official deprives the child of their due-process right to family association and integrity. But even under the majority's test, I nonetheless believe that Appellants' allegations and the reasonable inferences drawn from those allegations are sufficient at the pleading stage to demonstrate that Sanders's decision was aimed at the family relationship. . . .The majority's introduction of a 'state of mind' requirement lacks a basis in our precedent and conflates the required degree of culpability of an official's actions with a state-of-mind requirement. First, § 1983 itself 'contains no independent state-of-mind requirement.'. . Second, the Supreme Court's precedent instructs that we ask whether the official's conduct shocks the conscience to determine whether an executive official violated a person's substantive-due-process rights. But the majority looks outside this framework and instead turns to other sibling circuits to impose a state-of-mind requirement—a requirement with an outdated and mooted rationale. . . .Like City of Fontana, I agree that a pre-Daniels and pre-Lewis justification for such an intent requirement no longer remains applicable. Contrary to the majority's assertion, nothing about applying the shocks-the-conscience standard would 'impose[ ] strict liability' and hold[ ] a government actor automatically responsible for incidental harms flowing from his actions.' . . They would face liability only when their conduct shocks the conscience—'a tough test' '[t]o say the least,'. . . and when they caused the plaintiff's injury[.] . . Further, that other circuit courts followed Trujillo is not a reason to adopt an outdated and moot requirement. . . .Sanders engaged in conscience-shocking conduct when he intentionally and deliberately procured a wrongful conviction that incarcerated Appellants' father for thirty-two years, directly depriving Appellants of their family association. It does not matter that Sanders's primary motivation may not have been to harm the relationship. Thus, I would hold that Sanders violated Appellants' rights to family association and integrity because his conduct shocks the conscience.")

Compare Napouk v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Department, 123 F.4th 906, 923 (9th Cir. 2024) ("Plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment deprivation of a familial relationship claim also fails. In the Ninth Circuit, an adult decedent's parents have the right to assert a substantive due process claim for the deprivation of the companionship of their child. Sinclair v. City of Seattle, 61 F.4th 674, 678–79 (9th Cir. 2023). Even assuming arguendo that such a claim exists based on these facts, where Napouk was an adult in his forties, . . . only '[o]fficial conduct that "shocks the conscience" in depriving parents of that interest is cognizable as a violation of due process.' Jones v. Las Vegas Metro. Police Dep't, 873 F.3d 1123, 1132–33 (9th Cir. 2017) (alterations in original) (quoting Wilkinson v. Torres, 610 F.3d 546, 554 (9th Cir. 2010)). 'Where actual deliberation [by the officers] is practical, then an officer's "deliberate indifference" may suffice to shock the conscience.'. . But where, as here, 'a law enforcement officer makes a snap judgment because of an escalating situation, his conduct may only be found to shock the conscience if he acts with a purpose to harm unrelated to legitimate law enforcement objectives.'. . Here, assuming Plaintiffs could assert a substantive due process claim based on the death of their forty-four-year-old son, and that they could succeed in making out an excessive force claim, there is no evidence that the officers acted with anything other than the legitimate law enforcement objectives of self-defense and defense of each other. . . Thus, the Fourteenth Amendment claim fails.") with Napouk v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Department, 123 F.4th 906, 924-27 (9th Cir. 2024) (Nelson, J., concurring) ("I concur in the majority opinion and the conclusion to affirm the district court's dismissal of Plaintiffs' substantive due process claim. In my view, however, substantive due process does not extend to the Napouks' relationship with their forty-four-year-old son. Our circuit has recognized a substantive due process right to the companionship of one's adult children in limited circumstances. See, e.g., Sinclair v. City of Seattle, 61 F.4th 674, 679 (9th Cir. 2023). In doing so, we have created a split with other circuits. . . And our holding that plaintiffs have such a right finds no basis in the text, history, or tradition of the Fourteenth Amendment. Our ahistorical precedent should not be extended beyond the narrow circumstances in those prior cases. . . .George Lloyd Napouk was forty-four years old when he died. His parents live thousands of miles from where Napouk resided. Thus, while their grief is justifiably still great, they lack the custodial parent-child relationship that we held in Sinclair was constitutionally protected. I would not extend Sinclair to these circumstances.")

See also Peck v. Montoya, 51 F.4th 877, 893-94 (9th Cir. 2022) ("This case involves a familial-association claim asserted by a spouse, rather than a parent or child. We have not previously held whether a substantive due process right exists in that context, and other courts of appeals have reached conflicting conclusions. [citing cases] Were we to confront the question, we would have to consider not only the language from Graham quoted above but also the standards of Glucksberg, which counsel caution in the extension of substantive due process rights. . . We need not consider those issues, however, because even under our case law relating to familial-association claims asserted by parents and children, the claim here fails. . . . Peck argues that the deputies made flawed tactical choices early in the encounter, thereby creating a more lethal environment. But the purpose-to-harm standard can apply even where 'the officer may have helped to create an emergency situation by his own excessive actions.'. . Under the purpose-to-harm standard, Peck's claim fails because no showing of such a purpose has been made or even attempted. No evidence suggests that the deputies shot Mono for any other purpose than their (possibly mistaken) perception of the need for self-defense. Consequently, there was no Fourteenth Amendment violation, and the deputies are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim."); Ochoa v. City of Mesa, 26 F.4th 1050, 1056-59 (9th Cir. 2022) ("Whether evaluated under the deliberate-indifference test or the purpose-to-harm test, the Fourteenth Amendment 'shocks the conscience' standard is not the standard that typically comes to mind in police shooting cases. Another standard—the standard applicable to Fourth Amendment excessive-force claims—is more familiar in this context. That standard asks whether the officers' conduct was 'objectively unreasonable.'. . We have previously recognized that applying the Fourth Amendment excessive-force standard to a Fourteenth Amendment claim for loss of companionship and familial association following a fatal police shooting might have 'surface appeal.'. . The gist of the two claims is the same: an officer is accused of improperly using police power to kill someone. But the Fourteenth Amendment standard applicable to a claim by a relative demands more of such a plaintiff than a Fourth Amendment claim by the victim of an officer's actions. Moreland v. Las Vegas Metro.

Police Dep't, 159 F.3d 365, 371 n.4 (9th Cir. 1998), as amended (Nov. 24, 1998). The Supreme Court has held that 'Fourth Amendment rights are personal rights which ... may not be vicariously asserted.'. . The plaintiffs here cannot sidestep this prohibition and assert Ochoa's Fourth Amendment rights through a Fourteenth Amendment claim. . . Instead, they must show more: not just that the officers' actions were objectively unreasonable and thus violated Ochoa's Fourth Amendment rights, but that the officers' actions 'shock[ed] the conscience' and thus violated the plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment rights. . . This difference in standards can be dispositive where relatives assert Fourteenth Amendment claims but there is no Fourth Amendment claim. Indeed, 'it may be possible for an officer's conduct to be objectively unreasonable [under the Fourth Amendment] yet still not infringe the more demanding standard that governs substantive due process claims [under the Fourteenth Amendment].'. . . In sum, the record does not show that the officers acted with a purpose to harm unrelated to a legitimate law enforcement objective. Rather, it reflects that the officers took steps to ensure that a fleeing, armed, and noncompliant suspect would not further endanger the officers, the home's inhabitants, and the public. On this record, the officers' conduct does not shock the conscience and the officers did not violate the plaintiffs' rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . .The plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment claim requires that the officers' conduct 'shocks the conscience'—a standard that is more demanding of the plaintiffs than the Fourth Amendment standard typically applicable in police shooting cases. Because the officers here did not have time to deliberate before firing, the district court correctly applied the purpose-to-harm test to determine if the officers' conduct shocks the conscience. The court correctly concluded that under that test, the conduct did not violate the plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment rights. The officers' actions instead reflect their attempts to satisfy legitimate law enforcement objectives: apprehension of an armed, dangerous suspect and protection of the safety of the officers, the home's inhabitants, and the public."); Van Orden v. Stringer, 937 F.3d 1162, 1169-70 (8th Cir. 2019) ("[W]e agree with the district court that the rationale of our decision in Karsjens that Minnesota's commitment scheme did not shock the conscience dictates the same outcome here. . . .To avoid this conclusion, the residents argue that the court in Karsjens incorrectly applied an intent-to-harm standard for conscience-shocking conduct, and that 'deliberate indifference' to liberty is the proper standard. Karsjens is not entirely clear on this point. The issue was not raised in briefs before the Karsjens panel because the plaintiffs disputed that the conscience-shocking standard applied at all. The Karsjens opinion. . . did refer to conduct inspired by 'malice or sadism' (language associated with intent to harm), but it also framed the issue as whether the defendants' actions were 'egregious or outrageous,' a phrase that aligns with the understanding that deliberate indifference involves 'patently egregious' conduct. . . The residents submit that a deliberate indifference standard must apply here, because the defendant officials had sufficient time to reflect and deliberate about their actions. They point to the statement in Lewis that the deliberate indifference standard 'is sensibly employed only when actual deliberation is practical.'. . The State responds that decisions from other circuits have suggested that something more akin to an intent-to-harm standard may apply when officials, after deliberating, are forced to choose among competing, legitimate interests. . . The State suggests that the need for officials to balance the competing obligations of community safety and proper treatment makes the intent-to-harm standard appropriate here. We need not resolve the dispute over the applicable standard. We reject the residents' argument because the alleged actions of the defendant officials do not shock the conscience under either standard. There is no showing of malicious or sadistic intent to harm, and what was not 'egregious' conduct in Karsjens. . . is not 'patently egregious' deliberate indifference here. The director's alleged failure to authorize petitions for release does not amount to conscience-shocking deliberate indifference to liberty when a resident may petition a court directly for release and trigger the same type of proceeding on whether commitment is still justified. . . The nonexistence of less restrictive housing options, the district court explained, stems largely from inadequate funding. Since at least 2010, state officials have 'requested money to be placed in the state's budget for establishing cottages in the community, in order to implement the community reintegration phase,' but the governor has not proposed that funding to the state legislature. Those efforts by state officials to secure funding run counter to a conclusion of deliberate indifference by the defendants. . . The district court traced the problem of annual reviewers applying incorrect standards to a lack of legal training. This fault is hardly commendable, but it is insufficient to prove conscience-shocking deliberate indifference to a resident's liberty when the annual review is presented to a state court that is charged with reviewing the matter independently under correct legal standards. As in Karsjens, we conclude that the alleged shortcomings in the State's sexually violent offender program do not shock the conscience."); Porter v. Osborn, 546 F.3d 1131, 1133, 1137-40 (9th Cir. 2008) ("[I]n an urgent situation of the kind involved here, the established standard is whether Osborn acted with a purpose to harm Casey without regard to legitimate law enforcement objectives. Whether a jury could find Osborn violated that standard is not clear on the record before us. Although Osborn appears to have helped create and even exacerbate the confrontation he then ended by deadly force, the parties and the district court will need to readdress Osborn's summary judgment motion under the more stringent purpose to harm standard.. . . . We begin by clarifying the standard of culpability for a due process right to familial association claim. The parties mistakenly suggest that the choice is between 'shocks the conscience' and 'deliberate indifference' as the governing standard, when in fact the latter is one subset of the former. The Supreme Court has made it clear, as the district court correctly recognized, that only official conduct that 'shocks the conscience' is cognizable as a due process violation. . . The relevant question on the facts here is whether the shocks the conscience standard is met by showing that Trooper Osborn acted with deliberate indifference or requires a more demanding showing that he acted with a purpose to harm Casey for reasons unrelated to legitimate law enforcement objectives. . . . We hold, following Supreme Court precedent and our cases, that the purpose to harm standard must govern Osborn's conduct. . . . We recognize that the district court drew a principled distinction between police chase cases and the much less obvious public safety threat Casey posed during Osborn's roadside investigation, but our precedent entitles Osborn to the purpose to harm standard of culpability because the 'critical consideration [is] whether the circumstances are such that "actual deliberation is practical.''. . Due to the rapidly escalating nature of the confrontation between Osborn and Casey, we respectfully disagree with the district court that Osborn had an opportunity for the kind of deliberation that has been articulated by Lewis and its progeny. . . . We agree with Judge McKee's concurring opinion in Davis, a Third Circuit police chase case, which reasons that where force against a suspect is meant only to 'teach him a lesson' or to 'get even' then 'Lewis would not shield the officers from liability even though they were ultimately effectuating an arrest.'"); Perez v. Unified Government of Wyandotte County/Kansas City, Kansas, 432 F.3d 1163, 1167, 1168 (10th Cir. 2005) ("We have not had occasion to apply Lewis to a situation where a firefighter or police officer is involved in an automobile accident while responding to an emergency call. . . However, it is clear from Lewis that the intent to harm standard applies in this case. A firefighter responding to a house fire has no time to pause. He has no time to engage in calm, reflective deliberation in deciding how to respond to an emergency call. Doing so would risk lives. This case presents a paradigmatic example of a decision that must be made in haste and under pressure. Two other circuits and one state supreme court have addressed cases nearly identical to this one and have applied *Lewis'*s intent to harm standard as well. [citing Carter v. Simpson, 328 F.3d 948, 949 (7th Cir.2003) ; Terrell v. Larson, 396 F.3d 975, 978 (8th Cir.2005) (en banc); Norton v. Hall, 834 A.3d 928 (Me.2003)]. . . . In holding that there was a question of material fact as to whether the deliberate indifference standard should apply the district court committed a mistake of law. . . Under Lewis, the court should have applied the intent to harm standard. We may have remanded the case to the district court for application of the proper standard, but Becerra conceded at oral argument that there were no allegations and no facts in this case that supported a claim that Mots had an intent to harm. Because there is no such allegation in the complaint, we need not reach the question of what showing is necessary to evince an intent to harm. We simply hold that a bystander hit by an emergency response vehicle in the process of responding to an emergency call cannot sustain a claim under the substantive due process clause without alleging an intent to harm. As such, Mots should be granted qualified immunity."); Dillon v. Brown County, 380 F.3d 360, 364, 365 (8th Cir. 2004) ("In practice, therefore, the 'intent to harm' standard has not been confined to high-speed police chases aimed at apprehending a suspect. . . .It is undisputed that the officers in this case were confronted with a rapidly developing situation that arose quickly after their arrival on the property of the manufacturing plant. Whether or not they technically were in 'pursuit' of Dillon for purposes of Nebraska law, or whether they intended to make a formal arrest, there is no doubt that the officers were seeking to make investigative contact with Dillon concerning the alleged shoplifting and stolen license plates, and in response to the complaints from Dillon's mother. All agree that when Dillon appeared on the ATV from behind a building, the officers were afforded no more than ten seconds to react to the approaching vehicle. That the officers may have been driving at 'medium-speed' rather than 'high-speed' is not a constitutionally significant distinction. We believe the scenario plainly qualifies as a 'rapidly evolving, fluid, and dangerous situation[ ],' rather than one which allows for 'calm and reflective deliberation,' . . . and that the plaintiff must show an intent to harm in order to establish a violation of substantive due process."); Rivas v. City of Passaic, 365 F.3d 181, 195, 196 (3d Cir. 2004) ("Because conduct that 'shocks the conscience' under one set of circumstances may not have the same effect under a different set of circumstances, the standard of culpability for a substantive due process violation can vary depending on the situation. . . . We [have] held that the 'shock-the-conscience' standard 'applied to the actions of emergency medical personnel-who likewise have little time for reflection, typically making decisions in haste and under pressure.'. . Thus, the Rivas family can only meet the second element of the Kneipp test by presenting evidence that Garcia's and Rodriguez's conduct shocks the conscience by consciously disregarding a substantial risk that Mr. Rivas would be seriously harmed by their actions."); Bublitz v. Cottey, 327 F.3d 485, 490, 491 (7th Cir. 2003) (In this case, much of the argument goes to whether the shocks-the-conscience or the deliberate-indifference standard is the appropriate benchmark by which to determine if the defendant officers' conduct violates the Fourteenth Amendment. Mr. Bublitz attempts to distinguish Lewis by noting that Officer Durant had at least three to five minutes in which he had to decide whether to deploy the spikes, giving him adequate time to deliberate. The officers counter that the circumstances of a high-speed police pursuit − which entail constantly changing conditions − do not lend themselves to careful and considered deliberation. But we need not choose between the two formulations of the constitutional standard (even assuming they present different inquiries), as we believe that Mr. Bublitz has not presented facts which rise to either level. At most, Mr. Bublitz has described a scenario in which Durant may have been negligent in deciding to deploy his Stinger Spike System, but mere negligence is insufficient to give rise to a constitutional violation under the Fourteenth Amendment."); Brown v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania Dept. of Health Emergency Medical Services Training Institute, 318 F.3d 473, 480, 481(3d Cir. 2003) ("We derive from these cases the principle that the 'shocks the conscience' standard should apply in all substantive due process cases if the state actor had to act with urgency. This has been the law for police pursuit cases, see, e.g., Fagan II, and, social workers when they are acting with urgency to protect a child, see, e.g., Miller; Croft v. Westmoreland County Children & Youth Services, 103 F.3d 1123 (3d Cir.1997). We now hold that the same 'conscience shocking' standard applies to the actions of emergency medical personnel-who likewise have little time for reflection, typically making decisions in haste and under pressure. . . . Although Stewart and Caffey may have ultimately failed to rescue Shacquiel successfully from a pre-existing danger, we have already said that they had no constitutional obligation to do so. We cannot say that their actions in attempting a failed rescue shocks the conscience. Thus, Appellants have not demonstrated a viable state-created danger claim."); Darrah v. City of Oak Park, 255 F.3d 301, 306, 307 (6th Cir. 2001) ("[T]he Supreme Court has held that different conscience-shocking standards should be applied depending on the circumstances in which the governmental action occurred. . . . Officer Bragg, when grabbed from behind in a loud and unruly crowd of people, did not have time to deliberate the best possible course of action. Just the opposite is the case. . . . Given the facts of this case, the plaintiff simply cannot show that any reasonable jury could find that Officer Bragg's conduct was malicious, sadistic, and imposed not to restore order, but only to cause harm."); Neal v. St. Louis County Board of Police Commissioners, 217 F.3d 955, 958, 959 (8th Cir. 2000) ("[I]n rapidly evolving, fluid, and dangerous situations which preclude the luxury of calm and reflective deliberation, a state actor's action will shock the conscience only if the actor intended to cause harm. . . . Plaintiffs attempt to redirect this Court's focus to the hour and a half before the shootout to show that Officer Peterson had time to deliberate departmental policies and practices designed to protect officers involved in undercover operations. . . . Given the facts of this case, we believe that it is inappropriate to look outside the time period immediately preceding Peterson's decision to fire his gun to determine whether Peterson's conduct was truly conscience shocking."); Claybrook v. Birchwell, 199 F.3d 350, 360 (6th Cir. 2000) ("[E]ven if, as the plaintiffs have argued, the actions of the three defendant patrolmen violated departmental policy or were otherwise negligent, no rational fact finder could conclude, even after considering the evidence in the light most favorable to Quintana, that those peace enforcement operatives acted with conscience-shocking malice or sadism towards the unintended shooting victim."); Moreland v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Department, 159 F.3d 365, 372-73 (9th Cir. 1998) ("The question we face today is whether [the Lewis] newly minted explanation of the 'shocks the conscience' standard also controls in cases where it is alleged that an officer inadvertently harmed a bystander while responding to a situation in which the officer was required to act quickly to prevent an individual from threatening the lives of others. We conclude that it does. While the Supreme Court limited its holding in Lewis to the facts of that case (i.e., to high-speed police chases), there is no principled way to distinguish such circumstances from this case. Reasoning by analogy from its previous recognition that different types of conduct implicate different culpability standards under the Eighth Amendment, the Court extensively discussed the question of what states of mind trigger the 'shocks the conscience' standard that governs substantive due process claims arising from executive action. . . . Expressly declining to draw a bright line rule, the Court described the critical consideration as whether the circumstances are such that 'actual deliberation is practical.'. . . [E]ach of the circuits that has interpreted and applied this aspect of the Lewis decision has recognized that the critical question in determining the appropriate standard of culpability is whether the circumstances allowed the state actors time to fully consider the potential consequences of their conduct. . . . Appellants do not contend Burns intended to harm Douglas, physically or otherwise. Nor do Appellants dispute that Burns was entitled to use deadly force to halt the gunfight occurring in the Chances Arr parking lot. Instead, Appellants simply contend that the officers shot a bystander, and that this creates a triable issue as to whether the officers acted recklessly or with gross negligence. Even if all this is true, Appellants have failed to state a viable substantive due process claim because these matters are not material to the controlling question of whether Burns acted with a purpose to harm Douglas that was unrelated to his attempt to stop the male in the parking lot from endangering others."); Schaefer v. Goch, 153 F.3d 793, 798 (7th Cir. 1998) ("In our case . . . the officers who fired their weapons did intend to harm the suspect, John Nieslowski, but it is not John on whose behalf this suit was brought. . . . Nobody has suggested that the officers intended to harm Kathy Nieslowski, and so the straightforward application of the Lewis analysis yields a verdict in favor of defendants. On the other hand, firing a gun when an innocent party who has just attempted to surrender is standing, by most accounts, only inches from the intended target seems even more dangerous a course than pursuing a suspect at high speeds through city or suburban streets. Under the analysis employed in Lewis, however, the officers' decision to fire does not 'inch close enough to harmful purpose' to shock the conscience, even assuming that John never swung his weapon in the direction of the officers. . . . The situation was fluid, uncertain, and above all dangerous, and the officers' decision to shoot, regrettable though its results turned out to be, does not shock the conscience."); Medeiros v. O'Connell, 150 F.3d 164, 170 (2d Cir. 1998) (Lewis "shocks the conscience" standard not satisfied where bullet intended for suspect deflected and hit hostage); Radecki v. Barela, 146 F.3d 1227, 1231-32 (10th Cir. 1998) ("[I]n assessing the constitutionality of law enforcement actions, we now distinguish between emergency action and actions taken after opportunity for reflection. Appropriately, we are required to give great deference to the decisions that necessarily occur in emergency situations. . . . Henceforth, we look to the nature of the official conduct on the spectrum of culpability that has tort liability at one end. On the opposite, far side of that spectrum is conduct in which the government official intended to cause harm and in which the state lacks any justifiable interest. In emergency situations, only conduct that reaches that far point will shock the conscience and result in constitutional liability. Where the state actor has the luxury to truly deliberate about the decisions he or she is making, something less than unjustifiable intent to harm, such as calculated indifference, may suffice to shock the conscience.").

See also Donahue for Estate of McIntyre v. Borough of Collingdale, No. CV 22-1695, 2024 WL 387455, at *3, *6-7 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 1, 2024) ("The Third Circuit is no stranger to this variety of claim. Both the appellate court and many in-circuit district courts have addressed officer and government liability to bystanders during vehicle pursuits. . . In short, this Court writes upon well-trod principles. The analysis centers on the second prong: when does a police chase 'shock the conscience?'. . . The critical question is when an officer runs afoul of the Constitution while attempting to capture a fleeing suspect. That 'level of culpability required to shock the contemporary conscience falls along a spectrum,' depending on the facts of each case. . . There are three potential standards, varying based on 'how much time a police officer has to make a decision.'. . First, in a 'hyperpressurized environment,' an action cannot shock the conscience unless the officer harbored 'an intent to harm.'. . Second, when the scenario allows an officer 'a matter of hours or minutes before taking action,' he is liable when he 'disregard[s] a great risk of serious harm.'. . Finally, when the officer has time to make 'an unhurried judgment,' the plaintiff need only show the officer acted with 'deliberate indifference' to a plaintiff's rights. . . Under binding precedent, high-speed police chases are 'hyperpressurized environments requiring a snap judgment.'. . This is so because weighing 'the need to stop a suspect's flight from the law against the threat a high-speed chase poses to others demand[s] an officer's instant judgment,' lest the wrongdoer escape. . . Thus, '[i]n the circumstances of a high-speed chase aimed at apprehending a suspected offender ... only a purpose to cause harm unrelated to the legitimate object of arrest will' shock the conscience. . . . The rule is clear—an 'intent to harm', not 'disregard of great risk' mens rea applies to high-speed chases. . . . There is no genuine issue of fact to show that Lyons, Lynch, or Richers intended any harm distinct from apprehending Jones. . . .Therefore, this Court will grant summary judgment for the officers on the § 1983 claims."); Estate of Brower by O'Brien v. Charleston County, No. 2:23-CV-0216, 2023 WL 5960098, at *4 (D.S.C. Sept. 13, 2023) ("The Court . . . finds that, at this stage, the deliberate indifference standard applies because Plaintiff has alleged facts tending to show that Taylor was facing a non-emergency situation in which he had time to deliberate on his actions. . . .The Court turns next to consider whether Defendant Kendall's conduct, based on the facts viewed in the most favorable light to Plaintiff, could reflect deliberate indifference to a 'great risk of serious injury to someone in Plaintiff's position.'. .The 'deliberate indifference' standard imposes liability where the evidence shows (1) the officer subjectively recognized a substantial risk of harm, and (2) the officer subjectively recognized that his actions were inappropriate in light of that risk. . . .The complaint alleges that Defendant Kendall began driving at 85 mph through a Mt. Pleasant neighborhood. . . The complaint further alleges that Defendant Kendall turned right onto US Highway 17 North and drove at speeds exceeding 100 mph as he weaved around heavy traffic and between lanes. . . In addition to attempting dangerous maneuvers between lanes, the complaint further alleges that Defendant Kendall eventually reached speeds of over 130 mph while traveling down Highway 17. . . The Complaint alleges that Defendant Kendall drove in this behavior after dispatch told him the call involved no danger. . .The Court finds that Plaintiff has plausibly alleged that Defendant Kendall recognized the substantial risk to bystanders and other drivers around him and recognized that his actions were inappropriate in light of that risk. Accordingly, the Court concludes that Plaintiff has properly pled its § 1983 claim against Defendant Kendall.") and Eisner on behalf of Estate of Eisner v. Charleston County, No. 2:23-CV-0217, 2023 WL 5960353, at *4 (D.S.C. Sept. 13, 2023) (same); Aracena v. Gruler, 347 F.Supp.3d 1107, 1117 (M.D. Fla. 2018) ("Like the officers in Lewis, Officer Gruler was faced with a sudden emergency and had no time to deliberate. He could have gone in immediately to face an uncertain threat, potentially harming those inside in an attempt to neutralize the suspect, or alternatively stayed outside Pulse, called for backup, or set up a perimeter to secure the structure. He chose to momentarily leave his post and stayed outside when the gunshots began. In these circumstances, Officer Gruler's conduct does not 'shock the conscience.' Assuming the truth of the SAC's allegations and viewing the SAC in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Officer Gruler's conduct can conceivably be characterized as negligent—perhaps even reckless. But as noted above, even 'precipitate recklessness' is insufficient to support a substantive due process claim.");White v. Polk County, No. 8:04-cv-1227-T-26EAJ, 2006 WL 1063336, at *7 (M.D. Fla. Apr. 21, 2006) ("At some point, there comes a time, even in a high-speed chase, at which the abuse of the law enforcement officer is so clear that the judicial conscience is shocked. This Court will leave that determination for another day and another case with more egregious facts than this one. Here, there is no indication in the record that Jacoby or White had any idea Lawson intended to commit a crime on them, nor did Lawson admit that he intended to commit any crime upon them. Plaintiffs contend that the accident could have been avoided had Deputy Lawson simply turned on his lights and siren and pulled Jacoby over. Such is noted by a captain of the sheriff's office in his report. Whether the accident could have been avoided, however, is not part of the analysis with respect to shocking the conscience."); Logan v. City of Pullman, 392 F.Supp.2d 1246, 1264, 1265 (E.D. Wash. 2005) ("Here, the Defendant Officers certainly weren't facing the 'extreme emergency of public gunfire' like the officers faced in Moreland. Therefore, arguably, the Defendant Officers had time to deliberate about how they were going to break up the fight before opening the door and spraying O.C. However, in Lewis, the Supreme Court held that actual deliberation was not practical where the defendant officer, driving a patrol car, was simply pursuing a motorcyclist in a high-speed chase whose only offense was speeding. Further, the concerns of the Defendant Officers at the time of the incident were similar to those concerns of officers involved in dispersing a prison riot. Therefore, since 'deliberate indifference' was insufficient to show officer liability in both a prison riot and a high-speed chase of a motorcyclist who was speeding, the Court concludes that it is also insufficient to show officer liability in a situation such as that confronted by the Defendant Officers in this case. Consequently, the Court concludes that actual 'purpose to cause harm' unrelated to any legitimate use of O.C. must be shown to satisfy the 'shocks the conscience' standard necessary for a due process violation in this case. The Defendant Officers' use of O.C. inside the Top of China Restaurant and the fact that it dispersed throughout the building and affected the individuals inside does not meet the

'purpose to cause harm' standard. . . However, Plaintiffs have produced evidence that if proven, is adequate to meet this standard. Specifically, Plaintiffs allege the Defendant Officers refused to provide assistance to the injured Plaintiffs, refused to allow the Plaintiffs to assist one another, and tried to keep the Plaintiffs from exiting the building after O.C. was sprayed. . . If proven, these facts evidence a purpose to cause harm against all of the Plaintiffs unrelated to any legitimate use of force by the Defendant Officers, thereby satisfying the 'shocks the conscience' standard necessary for a substantive due process violation in this case."); White v. City of Philadelphia, 118 F. Supp.2d 564, 570, 572 (E.D. Pa. 2000) ("The Officers in this case were . . . facing conflicting responsibilities: on the one hand, according to the complaint, the Officers were being pressured by neighbors to break the door down; on the other hand, the Officers' reluctance to invade a seemingly peaceful residence pulled in the other direction. Under these circumstances, the Court concludes as a matter of law that the Officers' behavior was not conscience-shocking. . . . In response to the 911 call placed by Nadine White's neighbors, the Officers knocked on Nadine White's door several times. . .Upon hearing no response, the Officers refused the neighbors' request to break down the door and left the scene. . . .The Officers did nothing to place Nadine White in jeopardy − they only failed to protect Nadine White from private violence. Such inaction does not create liability."); Lizardo v. Denny's Inc., No. 97-CV-1234 FJS GKD, 2000 WL 976808, at *12 (N.D.N.Y. July 13, 2000) (not reported)("At the time of the brawl, the parking lot was a volatile, violent environment. In that environment, Adams and Paninski were forced to decide whether it was best to call 911 and wait for back-up, and therefore expose the combatants to harm at the hands of other combatants, or to intervene in the numerous altercations, and therefore risk harm to themselves and others should they lose possession of their firearms. In making that decision, Adams and Paninski were not afforded an opportunity to deliberate; rather, they were required to make a split-second decision under high pressure. In light of those circumstances, the Asian-American Plaintiffs must demonstrate that Adams' and Paninski's actions were motivated by an intent to harm."); Gillyard v. Stylios, No. Civ.A. 97-6555, 1998 WL 966010, at *4, *5 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 23, 1998)(not reported)("Every court addressing police conduct since Lewis has found its reasoning extends beyond high-speed pursuit of suspected criminals. [citing cases]. . . . Plaintiff claims that the conduct of police officers responding to a fellow officer's radio call and killing two innocent bystanders differs from officers killing a suspect in a high-speed pursuit as in Lewis. Officers Stylios and Fussell were assisting a fellow officer they erroneously believed to be in peril; the officers were on-duty and responding to a police radio request. The fact that they were not pursuing a suspect does not foreclose the application of Lewis."); White v. Williams, No. 94 C 3836, 1998 WL 729643, *5 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 16, 1998) (not reported) ("There are two substantive due process standards that have been applied to the conduct of law enforcement officers. The first is the deliberate indifference standard, which is generally applied to prison officials who 'subject an inmate under their authority to dangers that [the officials] might have prevented.'. . . The second is the 'shocks the conscience' standard, which is applied to situations like high-speed car chases in which actual deliberation is impractical. . . Though the situation in this case does not fall neatly into either category, it seems closer to the high-speed chase setting than to the prison setting. It is undisputed that Williams believed it was appropriate to arrest White, that Williams was attempting to do so when he leaned into White's car with his gun drawn, that White attempted to get away from Williams, rather than surrendering to him, and that Williams' gun accidentally fired in the process. . . It is also undisputed that all of these events 'happened really quickly.'. . Given the pace of these events and the unpredictability of White's reaction, Williams had little opportunity for deliberation before he leaned into White's car. As a result, we hold that the 'shocks the conscience' standard is more appropriate for this case than the deliberate indifference standard. . . . Because Williams did not intend to harm White, Williams' behavior does not shock the conscience."); Smith v. City of Plantation, 19 F. Supp.2d 1323, 1330 (S.D. Fla. 1998) (Applying Lewis to find no substantive due process violation arising from hostage situation, where officer "was confronted by an emergency situation that he did not precipitate."), aff'd, 198 F.3d 262 (11th Cir. 1999); Jarrett v. Schubert, No. 97-2628-GTV, 1998 WL 471992, *5 (D. Kan. July 31, 1998) (not reported) ("To help sort through the quagmire, the Supreme Court has adopted a fluctuating standard of review. In emergency situations, a government official will be liable only if he intended to inflict harm on the plaintiff and the government has no justifiable interest in his particular conduct. . . If, on the other hand, the government official has the luxury of deliberating about the decision he is making, 'something less than unjustifiable intent to harm, such as calculated indifference, may suffice to shock the conscience.'").

See also Range v. Douglas, 763 F.3d 573, 591, 592 (6th Cir. 2014) ("[T]he type of harm, the level of risk of the harm occurring, and the time available to consider the risk of harm are all necessary factors in determining whether an official was deliberately indifferent. We are not convinced by Plaintiffs' argument that 'any touching' of the bodies without a forensic purpose amounts to a 'serious harm' in the constitutional sense. If a drunk person moves a dead body's arm, it may amount to inappropriate behavior or even a tort violation. If done intentionally by a government actor, it's even arguable that it's a constitutional violation. . . But we cannot say that protection against the possible risk of such an occurrence is 'so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental.'. . Nor can we agree that a jury could find that Kersker and Dr. Cleveland were aware of a 'substantial risk' of what might be a more serious constitutional harm such as desecrating a body. While we agree that lapses in judgment by people under the influence are generally recognized, Plaintiffs have pointed to no cases, scientific or sociological knowledge, or literature suggesting that there is a substantial risk that an inebriated person will desecrate a body. Nor is there evidence that these Defendants knew of such a risk. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, a jury could find much to condemn in the conduct of Kersker and Dr. Cleveland, perhaps even recklessness. But a jury could not conclude that these Defendants were aware of facts from which they could infer a substantial risk of the kind of serious harm that occurred here, that they did infer it, and that they acted with indifference toward the rights of the families involved. We simply cannot say that the behavior of these Defendants could show deliberate indifference to Plaintiffs' constitutionally protected rights such that their actions 'shock the conscience.' The district court did not err in concluding that there was no violation of Plaintiffs' clearly established rights by Kersker or Dr. Cleveland."); Davis v. Carter, 555 F.3d 979, 984 (11th Cir. 2009) ("In this case, Tyler Davis voluntarily participated in an extracurricular after-school activity, so no custodial relationship existed between himself and the school. Plaintiffs did not allege the coaches engaged in corporal punishment or physically contacted Davis. The allegations in the complaint do not support a finding that the coaches acted willfully or maliciously with an intent to injure Davis. Rather, the facts allege that the coaches were deliberately indifferent to the safety risks posed by their conduct to Davis. In this school setting case, the complaint's allegations of deliberate indifference, without more, do not rise to the conscience-shocking level required for a constitutional violation. While the circumstances of this case are truly unfortunate, Plaintiffs' claims are properly confined to the realm of torts. We need not reach the second part of the qualified immunity analysis."); Hunt v. Sycamore Community School Dist. Bd. of Educ., 542 F.3d 529, 536, 541 (6th Cir. 2008) ("[W]hen executive action is worse than negligent but was not done for the purpose of injuring someone or in furtherance of invidious discrimination, . . . Lewis and later cases interpreting it have identified several considerations that bear on whether the action will be considered arbitrary, including: (1) the voluntariness of the relationship between the government and the plaintiff, especially whether the plaintiff was involuntarily in government custody or was voluntarily a government employee; (2) whether the executive actor was required to act in haste or had time for deliberation; and (3) whether the government actor was pursuing a legitimate governmental purpose. . . . Some authority from this Circuit indicates that whether the required culpability level is 'intent to harm' or subjective deliberate indifference depends entirely on whether the situation is an emergency or allows time to deliberate. . . . As the rule is articulated in these cases, if the situation is an emergency, the heightened intent standard would apply, and if there is time to deliberate, the lower deliberate indifference standard would apply. . . Superficially, this haste/leisure dichotomy might seem to preclude taking account of whether or not the government actor is or is not motivated by a countervailing legitimate purpose. If countervailing purposes could not be taken into account, in non-custodial, non-crisis situations, a government actor's choice could shock the conscience because he knowingly risked a person's life, even where he picked the lesser of two evils. By this reasoning, a policeman could not risk one person's life to save ten others. . . . The outcomes in our cases do not support such an interpretation. . . . Thus, even where the governmental actor is subjectively aware of a substantial risk of serious harm, we will be unlikely to find deliberate indifference if his action was motivated by a countervailing, legitimate governmental purpose."); Marino v. Mayger, 118 F. App'x 393, 402, 403, 2004 WL 2801795, at *8 (10th Cir. Dec. 7, 2004) ("[E]ven if sufficient affirmative conduct had been alleged, the ultimate measure of whether conduct by state actors violates due process is whether 'the challenged government action Ashocks the conscience' of federal judges.' . . We consider the following three factors in making such a determination: '(1) the need for restraint in defining the scope of substantive due process claims; (2) the concern that § 1983 not replace state tort law; and (3) the need for deference to local policymaking bodies in making decisions impacting public safety.'. . 'These factors counsel that application of danger creation as a basis for § 1983 claims is reserved for exceptional circumstances.'. . Lastly, '[w]e have noted that ordinary negligence does not shock the conscience, and that even permitting unreasonable risks to continue is not necessarily conscience shocking[.] Rather, a plaintiff must demonstrate a degree of outrageousness and a magnitude of potential or actual harm that is truly conscience shocking.'. . While we agree that the sheriff defendants' alleged conduct in this case, if accurately portrayed, was inconsistent with what we expect from public officials, we cannot conclude that their actions were so egregious or fraught with unreasonable risk as to 'shock the conscience.' To the extent that Hill, Waterman, and Hiler permitted a potentially volatile situation to persist, we do not believe their cumulative inaction rises above the level of negligence. Nor do we believe that the sheriff defendants created the danger that Michael Marino would be assaulted by Francis Hiemer with a shovel on that particular day. Therefore, because the Marinos have failed to allege affirmative conduct that shocks the conscience, we conclude that the district court properly dismissed the Marinos' substantive due process claim."); Coyne v. Cronin, 386 F.3d 280, 288, 289 (1st Cir. 2004) ("The conscience-shocking standard is not a monolith; its rigorousness varies from context to context. . . . In situations where a substantive due process claim might lie but where government officials must act in haste, under pressure, and without an opportunity for reflection, even applications of deadly force by those officials cannot be conscience-shocking unless undertaken maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm. . .By contrast, in situations where a substantive due process claim might lie and where actual deliberation on the part of a governmental defendant is practical, the defendant may be held to have engaged in conscience-shocking activity even without actual malice (to take one familiar example, if a government official assumes custody of a person and then displays deliberate indifference to his ward's basic human needs). . . The spectrum is wide because substantive due process violations tend to come in various shapes and sizes and in a multitude of configurations. We need not probe too deeply where along this spectrum of levels of fault Coyne's claim against Cronin may lie because the complaint does not fairly allege deliberate indifference, let alone any more serious level of scienter. . . . If matters were at all different or there were any concrete suggestion as to what might plausibly be developed against Cronin that would suggest conscience-shocking behavior, we would be sympathetic to discovery. But everything we know from the complaint and Coyne's own allegations show that this is basically a negligence case to which the government must respond but for which Cronin may not be sued under the Due Process Clause."); Upsher v. Grosse Pointe Public School Systerm, 285 F.3d 448, 453, 454 (6th Cir. 2002) ("This court made clear in Lewellen . . .that in a non-custodial setting, in order to establish liability for violations of substantive due process under § 1983, a plaintiff must prove that the governmental actor either intentionally injured the plaintiff or acted arbitrarily in the constitutional sense. . . The Lewellen court expressed doubt as to whether, in a non-custodial case, 'deliberate indifference' could give rise to a violation of substantive due process. . . . Similarly, here, we cannot find, nor was our attention invited to, any evidence in the record which suggests that any of the defendants made a deliberate decision to inflict pain or bodily injury on any of the plaintiffs. Neither is there proof that the defendants engaged in arbitrary conduct intentionally designed to punish the plaintiffs − conduct which we have recognized may result in the deprivation of a constitutionally protected interest. . .. Without more, we conclude that the plaintiffs' evidence establishes, at best, a case sounding in negligence and not a constitutional tort under § 1983."); Cummings v. McIntire, 271 F.3d 341, 345, 346 (1st Cir. 2001) (" This is a case whose factual context falls within the middle ground, neither so tense and rapidly evolving as a high-speed police pursuit nor so unhurried and predictable as the ordinary custodial situation. Some courts approach such cases by assessing the facts pursuant to a test formulated by Judge Friendly in Johnson, 481 F.2d at 1033, with which we substantially agree: In determining whether the constitutional line has been crossed, a court must look to such factors as the need for the application of force, the relationship between the need and the amount of force that was used, the extent of injury inflicted, and whether force was applied in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline or maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm. . . . While there is no doubt that McIntire unnecessarily utilized physical force, we agree with the district court that the record does not permit a finding that he did so 'maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm,' . . . At the time he acted, McIntire was juggling drivers and runners in a busy location, swiveling his head to be sure no problems arose. . . In such circumstances, a hard shove accompanied by abusive language, whose evident purpose − as even appellant acknowledges − was to get Cummings out of the way, . . . does not in our view constitute the 'brutal' and 'inhumane' conduct necessary to establish a due process violation. The Due Process Clause is intended to prevent government officials 'from abusing [their] power, or employing it as an instrument of oppression,' . . . here, the officer's action was reactive rather than reflective, seemingly inspired by a 'careless or unwise excess of zeal' in communicating his displeasure with Cummings' interruption, rather than by a purpose to harm."); Burga v. City of Plainfield, No. CV171655KMJBC, 2020 WL 2316583, at *9-11 (D.N.J. May 11, 2020) ("I find. . . that the deliberate intent standard, not the conscious disregard standard, applies here. The court may even assume for purposes of argument that these officers conducted the pursuit in a negligent or reckless manner, or that they violated the AG's guidelines by exceeding the permitted number of vehicles and failing to use their sirens and lights. Even so, this conduct would fail to rise to the required level of intent for a constitutional violation. . . .The record establishes beyond doubt that this was a high-speed chase of a dangerous fleeing suspect. The Supreme Court held in Lewis that in such a case, an intent-to-harm standard applies. . . . The record is clear that the pursuit took place at high speed, developed rapidly, and lasted at most 5 minutes. The circumstances here are thus akin to those in Lewis. As Lewis and Sauers establish, an officer can only be liable for a substantive due process violation resulting from a high-speed pursuit of a dangerously fleeing suspect if the officer intended to cause harm. . . As to defendants Black, McCall, and Kennovin, there is no evidence of intent to cause harm to plaintiffs. Failure to use lights or comply with AG guidelines, if it occurred, was perhaps negligent. But not even plaintiffs contend that this evidence amounts to an 'intent to harm'; rather, plaintiffs assert that this behavior, if proven, amounts to 'a conscious disregard of a great risk of serious harm.'. . That, as I have held, is not the standard; intent is required. This was an accident, created by Mr. Ward's reckless and criminal behavior; the plaintiffs, innocent bystanders, were unfortunately victims of it. The evidence is insufficient to establish that it was any officer's intent to harm plaintiffs. Therefore, I find that plaintiffs have not established that defendants violated their constitutional rights under Section 1983. . . . As stated above, no private constitutional right has been violated. Thus plaintiffs cannot overcome the first prong required to pierce qualified immunity. Nevertheless, I will, as required, consider the second prong, i.e., whether the right allegedly violated was clearly established. . . . [E]ven assuming there was an error in judgment, it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer in this high-pressure situation that he should not chase this fleeing gunman. Nor would knowledge of potential liability for negligence or violations of the AG guidelines have put the officers on notice that their conduct violated the Constitution. The Supreme Court had already held long ago in Lewis that '[r]egardless of whether [the officer's] behavior offended the reasonableness held up by tort law or the balance struck in law enforcement's own codes of sound practice,' it does not shock the conscience for purposes of a § 1983 claim."); Aracena v. Gruler, 347 F.Supp.3d 1107, 1117-18 (M.D. Fla. 2018) ("[T]he 'deliberate indifference' standard for substantive due process claims is inapplicable to this case of unforeseen circumstances where actual deliberation was impractical. . . But even if the deliberate indifference standard were applicable to this case, the Amended Complaint is bereft of factual allegations showing that Officer Gruler was aware of a risk that was 'extremely great.'. . It does not allege any foreknowledge of the Pulse attack by any Defendants and offers no factual allegations establishing that nightclubs lacking visible security are under an 'extremely great risk' of attack. . . Thus, Officer Gruler's conduct was not deliberately indifferent to Plaintiff's constitutional rights."); Winter v. City of Westlake, Ohio, No. 1:16CV1753, 2018 WL 838283, at *4–6 (N.D. Ohio Feb. 13, 2018) ("The Sixth Circuit has . . . applied this intent-to-harm framework to high-speed chases, ruling rather conclusively that absent intent to harm, pursuing officers in a high-speed chase do not violate the Fourteenth Amendment rights of a fleeing suspect. . . However, the instant case presents the distinct question of whether the same Fourteenth Amendment analysis should apply to officers responding to, but not directly involved in police chases. More specifically, it poses a question of whether police road blocks or stop sticks deployment may violate the Fourteenth Amendment rights of innocent third parties. While the Sixth Circuit applies an intent to harm standard to high speed chases, it takes a different stance for circumstances where state actors have time for deliberation. . . .Although Arcuri had previous experience using stop sticks, where the fleeing vehicle lost control into a ravine, this prior conduct is not enough by itself to show deliberate indifference. While Arcuri's action here did involve some risk, he was not deliberately indifferent to the risk. Defendant officers deployed the tire deflation device with the hope that Pawlak's truck would be stopped. Though neither Arcuri nor Fox personally witnessed Pawlak's erratic operation of the truck, with the information they were given they could reasonably infer that Pawlak presented a danger to the public as long as he was permitted to continue on his perilous path. Neither officer had the luxury of 'reflection' or 'unhurried judgment.'. . .Upon review of Sixth Circuit case law following Nishiyama and Reed, the Court finds that the Nishiyama standard of culpability is no longer correct. In Lewellen v. Metropolitan Gov't of Nashville & Davidson County, 34 F.3d 345 (1994), the Sixth Circuit held that '[g]ross negligence is not actionable under § 1983, because it is not "arbitrary in the constitutional sense."'. . .Plaintiffs have not met their burden of demonstrating that the Westlake Defendants are not entitled to the qualified immunity defense. Plaintiffs have failed to show that Arcuri and Fox acted with an intent to harm or with deliberate indifference. Even if Plaintiffs could demonstrate that Defendants' actions were grossly negligent or reckless, their claims still would not be actionable under § 1983. Viewed in a light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the facts do not show that these Defendants violated Plaintiffs' constitutional rights. Thus, the Court echoes the sentiments of the Sixth Circuit in Lewellen: 'When all is said and done, this case,..., amounts to nothing more than a non-intentional tort case the facts of which give the plaintiff a strong claim on our sympathies.'"); Cutter v. Metro Fugitive Squad, No. CIV-06-1158-GKF, 2008 WL 4068188, at 18-20 (W.D. Okla. Aug. 29, 2008) ("Here, the defendants' conduct must be analyzed with respect to the particular circumstances the officers faced at the time. Based on the authorities discussed above, it is inappropriate for the court to apply a blanket 'shock the conscience' standard to all of the defendants' conduct because some of the circumstances allowed for actual deliberation or reflection, while other circumstances required instant reactions. The conduct of the defendants, which allegedly placed Harris in danger, can be broken down into three general categories: (1) the defendants' decision to engage Harris as a civilian operative and the actual planning of the operation itself; (2) the defendants' decision to converge on Harris's vehicle 'swat-team' style soon after Barnett got inside and Harris drove away; and (3) the defendants' decision to engage in gunfire with Barnett in Harris's presence. The court concludes that the first category of conduct − i.e., the defendants' decision to engage Harris, a civilian, in an operation to apprehend Barnett and the plans underlying the operation − involved actual deliberation. . . . Where the defendants had the opportunity to truly deliberate, as they did here, deliberate indifference may suffice to shock the conscience. . ..With respect to the second category of conduct − i.e., converging on Harris's vehicle 'swat-team' style with guns drawn after the vehicle had traveled a short distance − the court concludes that this conduct also involved time for actual deliberation and should be analyzed under the deliberate indifference standard. . . . .Finally, the deliberative judgments in planning the operation and surrounding Harris's vehicle are distinguishable from the decisions the defendants had to make at the time they were faced with emergency circumstances. In considering the actions of the Sheriff Defendants after they converged on the vehicle, the court must apply the 'intent to harm' standard. . . .To the extent the plaintiffs' state-created danger claim is based on the defendants' decision to engage in gunfire with Barnett, such claims must be dismissed as to the Sheriff Defendants."); Purvis v. City of Orlando, 273 F.Supp.2d 1321, 1327, 1328 (M.D. Fla. 2003) ("Even though Reeve reacted to a situation that he allegedly caused, the Court cannot properly analogize Reeve to a prison official enjoying the luxuries of unhurried judgments. Logan was not detained in a jail cell. Similarly, given Reeve's knowledge of Logan's suicidal state, the flight risk he posed, and his alleged willingness to let him flee, the Court cannot properly analogize Reeve to an officer in the midst of a completely unexpected high-speed car chase. The Court, unable to find a situation in existing case law analogous to the instant case, finds that Logan's situation falls somewhere between these situations. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Reeve allowed Logan to escape. This implies some degree of forethought by Reeve. Nevertheless, Reeve cannot be held accountable for Logan's actions subsequent to his escape. Reeve had no way of knowing Logan would jump the fences he jumped, or enter the retention pond where he drowned. There are no allegations that Reeve herded Logan over the fences and into the pond, or that he released Logan with the specific intention of causing Logan's death. The allegations are simply that Reeve pursued Logan to the retention pond and failed to aid him. The question before the Court is one of Reeve's intent. . . . Plaintiff makes no specific factual allegations concerning Reeve's actions or intent in allowing Logan to escape. In the absence of such allegations, the Court cannot assume that Plaintiff can prove facts that she has not alleged. . . . Consequently, the Court finds that Plaintiff has not stated a Fourteenth Amendment violation. . . . If Reeve indeed herded or forced Logan into the pond, it could constitute conscience-shocking behavior. In the absence of such allegations, however, the Court will not hold that Reeve's failure to wade into a pond to apprehend a 'struggling' escaped prisoner violates the Constitution.").

Compare T.W. ex rel. Wilson v. School Bd. of Seminole County,Fla., 610 F.3d 588, 602 (11th Cir. 2010) ("We need not decide whether corporal punishment that causes only psychological harm is categorically below the constitutional threshold. After considering the totality of the circumstances, including T.W.'s psychological injuries, we conclude that Garrett's conduct was not so arbitrary and egregious as to support a complaint of a violation of substantive due process. We do not condone the use of force against a vulnerable student on several occasions over a period of months, but no reasonable jury could conclude that Garrett's use of force was obviously excessive in the constitutional sense. . . Because Garrett's use of force was not obviously excessive, we need not consider whether the force Garrett used presented a reasonably foreseeable risk of serious bodily injury.") with T.W. ex rel. Wilson v. School Bd. of Seminole County,Fla., 610 F.3d 588, 605, 613 n.14 (11th Cir. 2010) (Barkett, J., dissenting) ("There is no dispute that a student's right to be free from gratuitous violence or from excessive corporal punishment inflicted by teachers at public schools is protected by substantive due process under the Fourteenth Amendment. A claim alleging an infringement of this right requires a showing that the state conduct 'can properly be characterized as arbitrary, or conscience shocking in a constitutional sense.'. . I believe that this record, when considered in its totality and viewed in the light most favorable to T.W., more than adequately supports a conclusion that Garrett's repeated physical restraints and excessive force against T.W. 'shocks the conscience' and thus violated his constitutional rights. . . . The only amendment other than the Fourteenth that arguably applies to the use of excessive force against a student is the Fourth. At least two circuits have applied the Fourth Amendment to a teacher's use of excessive corporal punishment against a student. See Doe ex rel. Doe v. Hawaii Dep't of Educ., 334 F.3d 906, 909 (9th Cir.2003); Wallace ex rel. Wallace v. Batavia Sch. Dist., 68 F.3d 1010, 1016 (7th Cir.1995). The Fourth Amendment standard is one of 'objective reasonableness' under the circumstances, without regard to the official's underlying intent or motivation. . . Garrett's alleged actions easily satisfy this standard because there was no need for force and as such, her use of force was objectively unreasonable. In any event, under either a Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment analysis, Garrett's alleged conduct was clearly unlawful.") Compare Siefert v. Hamilton County, 951 F.3d 753, 767 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 896 (2020) ("Based on the facts as alleged in the complaint, these Defendants were between a rock and a hard place: they could either ensure that the parents were not deprived of their fundamental liberty interest and risk failing to protect the child if the allegations of abuse were legitimate, or they could ensure that the minor child was protected from alleged abuse and risk depriving the parents of their liberty interest. Even if we disagree with the choice the Defendants made, we cannot say that when faced with that choice, the Defendants' opting to err on the side of protecting the child at the expense of depriving the parents of their parental rights for a period of a month is conduct that shocks the conscience. Thus, the complaint fails to establish behavior that shocks the conscience, so we AFFIRM the district court's holding that the Sieferts failed to state a claim under substantive due process.") with Siefert v. Hamilton County, 951 F.3d 753, 768-69 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 896 (2020) (Donald, J., dissenting) ("While I agree with most of the majority's analysis, I would reverse the district court's holding that the Sieferts failed to state a claim under substantive due process. As the majority points out, there are two categories of substantive due process claims: those alleging a 'deprivation of a particular constitutional guarantee' and those alleging actions that 'shock the conscience.' Op. at —— (citing Pittman v. Cuyahoga Cty. Dep't of Children & Family Servs., 640 F.3d 716, 728 (6th Cir. 2011)). In Pittman, however, we clarified that we apply different standards to those two types of claims. . . Where the plaintiff does not assert the deprivation of a particular constitutional guarantee, we review the claim under the shock the conscience standard. . . In contrast, where a plaintiff does assert a deprivation of a particular constitutional guarantee—such as that alleged here, deprivation of familial association—we analyze whether 'the [challenged] action [was] necessary and animated by a compelling purpose.'. . I believe the district court correctly determined that the Sieferts premise their substantive due process claim on the deprivation of their right to familial association. . . . The Sieferts allege that the defendants interfered with their right to associate with their child for over four weeks. Under the particular-constitutional-guarantee standard, we have suggested that similar conduct could constitute a substantive due process violation. . . Therefore, contrary to the majority, I would reverse the district court with respect to this claim as well.").

See also Adams v. Demopolis City School, 80 F.4th 1259, 1274 (11th Cir. 2023) ("In non-custodial settings, such as in public schools, conduct by a government actor will rise to the level of a substantive due process violation only if the act can be characterized as arbitrary or conscience-shocking in a constitutional sense. . . To rise to the 'conscience-shocking level, conduct most likely must be intended to injure in some way unjustifiable by any government interest.'. . . In considering whether conduct raises to the level of arbitrary or conscience-shocking, deliberate indifference, without more, is rarely a basis for substantive due process liability in cases arising in the school context. . . . Even if we assume that deliberate indifference can rise to the level of arbitrary or conscience-shocking conduct—an issue we do not decide today—the evidence simply does not support a finding that the defendants were deliberately indifferent."); Domingo v. Kowalski, 810 F.3d 403, 416 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Kowalski's educational and disciplinary methods, as reported by Brant, may have been inappropriate, insensitive, and even tortious. This does not, however, render them unconstitutional. . . . The evidence establishes that Kowalski attempted to toilet-train and control her special-education students in furtherance of valid pedagogical goals. The methods she employed to accomplish these goals do not shock the conscience. Moreover, Appellants produced no evidence that Kowalski acted out of malice, callousness, or deliberate indifference. Appellants also produced no evidence that any student suffered a serious physical or psychological injury. Therefore, the district court did not err in granting summary judgment to Kowalski on Appellants' substantive due process claims.")

But see Flores v. City of South Bend, 997 F.3d 725, 729-30 (7th Cir. 2021) ("The deliberate-indifference standard demands close attention to the particulars of the case. Identical behavior considered reasonable in an emergency situation might be criminally reckless when state actors have time to appreciate the effects of their actions. . . This is why officers giving chase, who 'are supposed to act decisively and to show restraint at the same moment,' have more latitude to balance these competing directives. . . Officers responding to a nonemergency situation or inserting themselves into a situation that is already under control face a different set of constraints. They cannot reasonably expect to engage in the same conduct considered acceptable in the heat of an emergency. The key question is whether the officer 'ha[d] sufficient knowledge of the danger such that 'one can infer he intended to inflict the resultant injury.'. . In Hill, we confronted a case superficially similar to the one now before us. There, a police officer who was not responding to an emergency situation sped 'well over the speed limit' through a red light and crashed into the decedent's car, killing him. . . We concluded that this bare factual allegation allowed at most the inference that the officer created a 'generic risk to the public at large' that 'd[id] not rise to the threshold of a constitutional violation actionable under § 1983.'. .The district court found Hill dispositive and concluded that Flores's complaint similarly failed to allege sufficient facts to permit the inference that Gorny subjectively knew of the danger he created and consciously disregarded it. Gorny's actions, the court thought, supported at most a reasonable inference that he created a generic risk to the general public through his reckless speeding and disregard of traffic signals. In our view, however, the facts alleged here go well beyond those in Hill, and the difference matters. An officer who is not responding to an emergency can act so recklessly that a trier of fact would be entitled to find subjective knowledge of an unjustifiable risk to human life and conscious disregard of that risk. Our sister circuits have encountered similar factual allegations, and we find their opinions to be instructive. [discussing Sauers and Browder] . . .Here, Gorny's reckless conduct, unjustified by any emergency or even an order to assist in a routine traffic stop that five officers had under control, allows the inference that he subjectively knew about the risk he created and consciously disregarded it. Unlike the minimally detailed complaint in Hill, which again was limited to an accusation of speeding, the complaint here paints a far more troubling picture. Gorny, who was not assigned to the hot-spot area, overheard Hipakka, Howard, and O'Blenis communicate their assent to Alfrey and Wagner's request for assistance specifically from the other members of their team. At no point did Gorny hear any officer indicate that he or she needed external back-up or that the traffic stop presented an emergency. With no justification, Gorny chose to race through a residential area with a posted speed limit of 30 miles per hour at rates of speed between 78 and 98 miles per hour, two-to-three times the limit. It was too late to control the car when he reached the intersection of Kaley Avenue and charged through, despite the obstructed view. The result, as we have said, was that Flores, innocently driving in accordance with the traffic signals, was hit and killed. A jury could find, based on these allegations, that he displayed criminal recklessness (or deliberate indifference) to the known risk."); Dean for and on behalf of Harkness v. McKinney, 976 F.3d 407, 414-20 (4th Cir. 2020) ("The parties disagree as to what standard of culpability should apply in this case. McKinney argues that the district court should have applied the higher standard of 'intent to harm' to his actions because he was responding to what he believed to be an emergency, and the plaintiff presented no evidence that he intended to harm Harkness. But even if the lesser 'deliberate indifference' standard applies, he contends his actions did not demonstrate deliberate indifference and were not conscience-shocking. The plaintiff asserts that there was no emergency, and that McKinney's conduct was so egregious that it undoubtedly establishes that he acted with deliberate indifference to Harkness's life and safety. We have examined each standard in light of the facts and circumstances in this case and conclude that for purposes of summary judgment, deliberate indifference is the standard by which McKinney's conduct should be measured. . . . [U]nder Lewis, the intent-to-harm culpability standard applies to officers responding to an emergency call. . . . [W]hen an officer is able to make unhurried judgments with time to deliberate, such as in the case of a non-emergency, deliberate indifference is the applicable culpability standard for substantive due process claims involving driving decisions. . . Under this legal framework and viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, . . . we find that a jury could conclude that McKinney was not responding to an emergency and had time to deliberate his actions. . . .An officer's actions demonstrate deliberate indifference where the evidence shows that the officer subjectively recognized a substantial risk of harm and that his actions were inappropriate in light of the risk. . . A defendant's subjective knowledge of the risk may be inferred from circumstantial evidence. . . . [A] reasonable jury could conclude that McKinney knowingly disregarded a substantial risk of serious harm, and that his deliberate indifference to life and safety was conscience-shocking, in violation of Harkness's Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights. See Sauers v. Borough of Nesquehoning, 905 F.3d 711, 718 (3d Cir. 2018) (responding to non-emergency call at over 100 mph demonstrates conscious disregard for a great risk of serious harm); Browder, 787 F.3d at 1081 (where off-duty officer was not chasing suspect or responding to an emergency, "a reasonable jury could infer ... a conscious contempt of the lives of others and thus a form of reckless indifference to a fundamental right"). . . . That there is little precedent imposing liability under these specific circumstances does not necessarily mean that an officer lacks notice that his conduct is unlawful. As then-Judge Gorsuch wrote for the panel in Browder:

> [S]ome things are so obviously unlawful that they don't require detailed explanation and sometimes the most obviously unlawful things happen so rarely that a case on point is itself an unusual thing. Indeed, it would be remarkable if the most obviously unconstitutional conduct should be the most immune from liability only because it is so flagrantly unlawful that few dare its attempt.

Browder, 787 F.3d at 1082–83 (citations omitted). . . Further, this Court has found that 'we need not—and should not—assume that government officials are incapable of drawing logical inferences, reasoning by analogy, or exercising common sense. In some cases, government officials can be expected to know that if X is illegal, then Y is also illegal, despite factual differences between the two.'. . With this legal framework in mind, the question to be resolved is whether a reasonable officer in McKinney's position would have known that his conduct—driving a police vehicle without activating his emergency lights and siren at over 80 miles per hour on a curved, unlit road at night while not responding to an emergency or pursuing a suspect—could give rise to a claim for a Fourteenth Amendment violation. As the district court noted, 'there is relatively scant caselaw imposing liability in these specific circumstances.'. . Neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has considered the exact conduct presented here. McKinney urges that the facts of this case are most similar to the circumstances presented in Lewis, where the Court declined to find a constitutional violation. But Lewis, . . . as well as this Circuit's opinion in Temkin, . . . involved officers who caused injuries while actively pursuing a fleeing suspect. We have already established here that the facts, viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, do not support a conclusion that these circumstances are akin to a high-speed chase or that McKinney was responding to an emergency. Beyond this, the parties concede that no other court decisions have addressed the factual circumstances upon which we must make a determination. But while there is no case directly on point factually to inform our analysis, core constitutional principles set forth in numerous cases lead us to the conclusion that Harkness's substantive due process right was clearly established. . . Lewis is not factually analogous to our case, but the Supreme Court did find that an officer not actively pursuing a suspect or responding to an emergency requiring quick decision-making, i.e., where 'deliberation is practical,' may be liable based on a deliberate indifference standard for unintentional conduct. . . . After Lewis, two Tenth Circuit cases adopted the view that an officer can be liable for a substantive due process violation under a deliberate indifference standard when not responding to an emergency or chasing a suspect. . . .Thus, while the courts have yet to consider a case where an officer engaged in the same conduct as McKinney, he is not absolved of liability solely because the court has not adjudicated the exact circumstances of his case. We find that a reasonable officer in McKinney's position would have known, based on rights 'manifestly included within more general applications of the core constitutional principles invoked,'. . . that an officer may be subject to a claim under the Fourteenth Amendment under a deliberate indifference standard for unintentional injuries caused when not responding to an emergency or chasing a suspect. This substantive due process right was clearly established at the time McKinney engaged in the conduct that caused Harkness's injuries. A reasonable officer in McKinney's position would have known his conduct was not only unlawful, but that it created a substantial risk of serious harm to those around him. As the court stated in Browder, some conduct is so obviously unlawful that an officer does not need a detailed explanation. . . Thus, we affirm the district court's finding that 'in October 2016, it was clearly established that an officer driving more than 80 mph at night, on a curved section of an unlit road, in a non-emergency, non-pursuit situation could be subject to liability under the Fourteenth Amendment for deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm to those around him' and that '[a] reasonable officer in McKinney's position would have realized such conduct was unlawful.'. . Accordingly, taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, we find that McKinney's actions were deliberately indifferent to Harkness's life and safety such that it shocks the conscience and rises to the level of a violation of a constitutional right that was clearly established at the time of the collision. We acknowledge that in the context of qualified immunity, officials are not liable for 'bad guesses in gray areas.'. . But McKinney's actions, construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, do not constitute a 'bad guess in a gray area' that qualified immunity protects. . . Thus, McKinney is not entitled to qualified immunity and his motion for summary judgment on that basis must be denied."); Sauers v. Borough of Nesquehoning, 905 F.3d 711, 715-19 (3d Cir. 2018) ("Because we conclude that it was not clearly established at the time of the crash that Homanko's conduct, as alleged in the complaint, could give rise to constitutional liability under the Fourteenth Amendment, we will vacate the District Court's denial of qualified immunity. We hope, however, to establish the law clearly now. . . .We accordingly define the right at issue here as one not to be injured or killed as a result of a police officer's reckless pursuit of an individual suspected of a summary traffic offense when there is no pending emergency and when the suspect is not actively fleeing the police. . . . The level of culpability required 'to shock the contemporary conscience' falls along a spectrum dictated by the circumstances of each case. . . Our case law establishes three distinct categories of culpability depending on how much time a police officer has to make a decision. . . In one category are actions taken in a 'hyperpressurized environment[.]'. . They will not be held to shock the conscience unless the officer has 'an intent to cause harm.'. . Next are actions taken within a time frame that allows an officer to engage in 'hurried deliberation.'. . When those actions reveal a conscious disregard of a great risk of serious harm' they will be sufficient to shock the conscience. . . Finally, actions undertaken with 'unhurried judgments,' with time for 'careful deliberation,' will be held to shock the conscience if they are 'done with deliberate indifference.'. . Our case law is clear that this 'shocks the conscience' framework for analysis applies to police-pursuit cases. . . The District Court rightly interpreted the complaint to allege that Homanko 'had at least some time to deliberate' before deciding whether and how to pursue the traffic offender. . . That places the fact-pattern in the second category of culpability, requiring inferences or allegations of a conscious disregard of a great risk of serious harm. . . . The liability question thus becomes whether deciding to pursue a potential summary traffic offender at speeds of over 100 miles-per-hour, after radioing for assistance from the neighboring jurisdiction where the potential offender was headed, demonstrates a conscious disregard of a great risk of serious harm. We have no difficulty in concluding that it does. . . . In sum, Sauers adequately pled that Homanko's conduct was conscience-shocking under our state-created danger framework. The complaint therefore contains a plausible claim that Homanko violated Sauers's and his wife's Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights. . . .At the time of the crash in May 2014, the state of the law was such that police officers may have understood they could be exposed to constitutional liability for actions taken during a police pursuit only when they had an intent to harm. Thus, it was not at that time clearly established that Homanko's actions could violate the substantive due process rights of Sauers and his wife."); Bolmer v. Oliveira, 594 F.3d 134, 143-45 (2d Cir. 2010) ("In this case, Oliveira contends that the district court erred by applying Rodriguez's medical-standards test instead of determining whether Oliveira's conduct shocked the conscience under Lewis. We conclude that the district court did not err by applying Rodriguez, as that case imposed a rule for determining when an involuntary commitment violates substantive due process that is consistent with Lewis's shocks-the-conscience framework. In other words, a physician's decision to involuntarily commit a mentally ill person because he poses a danger to himself or others shocks the conscience, thereby violating substantive due process, when the decision is based on 'substantive and procedural criteria that are ... substantially below the standards generally accepted in the medical community.' Rodriguez, 72 F.3d at 1063. The principles enunciated in Lewis support our conclusion. First, Rodriguez's medical-standards test does not impose constitutional liability for conduct that is merely negligent. In requiring that the commitment decision be the product of criteria substantially below those generally accepted in the medical community, Rodriguez imposes liability for conduct that is at least grossly negligent. Lewis does not preclude liability for such middle-range culpability. . . . .Second, the circumstances of an involuntary commitment support the application of Rodriguez's medical-standards test. . . . Finally, the post-Lewis case law does not convince us that Rodriguez should be overruled. . . We are aware that other circuits have employed different analyses. See Benn v. Univ. Health Sys., Inc., 371 F.3d 165, 174-75 (3d Cir.2004) (explaining that, "in view of the events that led to [the plaintiff's] commitment and the steps taken after his arrival at [the psychiatric hospital, the doctors'] conduct was not conscience-shocking"); James v. Grand Lake Mental Health Ctr., Inc.,

No. 97-5157, 1998 WL 664315, at *7, *10 (10th Cir. Sept. 24, 1998) (order and judgment). However, the reasoning of those cases does not persuade us that Rodriguez is no longer good law. . . . We do not read Lewis to require a subjective analysis of the physician's state of mind."); McQueen v. Beecher Community Schools, 433 F.3d 460,469 (6th Cir. 2006)("Here, deliberate indifference is the appropriate standard because Judd had the opportunity to reflect and to deliberate before deciding to leave Smith and several children unsupervised in the classroom. Although public schools are busy places, Judd did not need to make a split-second decision that merits applying a higher standard."); Pena v. DePrisco, 432 F.3d 98, 113, 114 (2d Cir. 2005) ("The case before us does not involve a chase of a suspect or a prison riot where we need to 'capture the importance of [state officials'] competing obligations, or convey the appropriate hesitancy to critique in hindsight decisions necessarily made in haste, under pressure, and frequently without the luxury of a second chance.' . . Not condoning egregious drunk driving 'does not ordinarily clash with other equally important governmental responsibilities.'. . The defendants here, on the facts as alleged, had ample opportunity, not only during the day in question, but also during the days, weeks and months that preceded it, in which to decide what to do and say in response to the alleged practice of drinking and driving by off-duty officers. Nor does it require a sophisticated exercise in judicial notice for us to acknowledge that the extreme danger of drinking and driving is widely known. We conclude that the alleged behavior of the pre-accident individual defendants here, over an extended period of time and in the face of action that presented obvious risk of severe consequences and extreme danger, falls within the realm of behavior that 'can properly be characterized as ... conscience shocking, in a constitutional sense.' . . . Accordingly, we think that the allegations in the complaints before us, even if they do not accuse the defendants of acting with specific intent or desire to cause physical injury, are sufficient to assert that the defendants created a serious danger by acting with deliberate indifference to it. Whether termed 'deliberate indifference' or 'recklessness,' this mental state is sufficient to establish liability in such cases 'because it requires proof that the defendant focused upon the risk of unconstitutional conduct and deliberately assumed or acquiesced in such risk.'"); Estate of Owensby v. City of Cincinnati, 414 F.3d 596, 603 (6th Cir. 2005) ("The Cincinnati police officers argue that this case is more analogous to vehicular chase cases than traditional prisoner or pretrial detainee cases, essentially because only about six minutes passed between the time Owensby was taken into custody and the time medical care was provided. This argument assumes, however, that actual deliberation was not possible within those six minutes. That assumption is erroneous. During the six minutes that Owensby was denied medical care after being taken into custody, the officers had time to do such things as greet each other, prepare for the arrival of their superiors, pick up dropped items and straighten their uniforms; some officers even had time to observe and discuss the apparent severity of Owensby's injuries. Under these circumstances, there is no question that the officers had 'time to fully consider the potential consequences of their conduct.'. . Accordingly, the district court properly applied the traditional deliberate indifference standard."); Terrell v. Larson, 396 F.3d 975, 981, 984 (8th Cir. 2005) (en banc) (Lay, J., joined by Heaney, J., and Bye, J., dissenting) ("Today's decision has the effect of giving police officers un qualified immunity when they demonstrate deliberate indifference to the safety of the general public. A police officer may now kill innocent bystanders through criminally reckless driving that blatantly violates state law, police department regulations, accepted professional standards of police conduct, and the community's traditional ideas of fair play and decency so long as the officer subjectively, though unreasonably, believed an emergency existed. The majority's holding extends Lewis's high-speed pursuit rule from its intended purpose of protecting officers forced to make split-second decisions in the field to a per se rule that now shields officers even after they have had an actual opportunity to deliberate at the police station. Believing that 28 U.S.C. § 1983 gives citizens a remedy for egregious abuses of executive power that deprive citizens of their constitutional right to life, we dissent. . . . We submit there are significant distinctions between this high-speed response case and suspect pursuit cases such as Lewis and Helseth. First, while officers pursuing suspected offenders generally find themselves, when acting in their official duties, in situations which are thrust upon them, see Lewis, 523 U.S. at 853, here Larson made a conscious, voluntary decision to respond to the domestic disturbance call even after he was informed that other deputies were responding and he could cancel. Second, while suspect pursuits require instantaneous decisions and on-the-spot reactions, see id., Larson and Longen were eating dinner and doing paperwork when they received the call and were afforded the opportunity to deliberate their response before leaving the police station. Finally, officers involved in suspect pursuits may be required to violate traffic laws or risk losing the suspect. In contrast, Larson and Longen were not in danger of losing a suspect or of leaving the primary officers in this case without adequate backup, as they were aware other deputies were on their way to the scene. In view of these distinctions, we conclude the obvious lack of exigent circumstances convince us that the intent-to-harm standard is inappropriate in non-emergency response situations."); A.M. v. Luzerne County Juvenile Detention Center, 372 F.3d 572, 579 (3d Cir. 2004) ("As in a prison setting, we believe the custodial setting of a juvenile detention center presents a situation where 'forethought about [a resident's] welfare is not only feasible but obligatory.'. . We therefore conclude that this case is properly analyzed using the deliberate indifference standard. The circumstances of this case present a situation where the persons responsible for A.M. during his detention at the Center had time to deliberate concerning his welfare."); Bukowski v. City of Akron, 326 F.3d 702, 710(6th Cir. 2003) ("After reviewing the Supreme Court's decision in City of Sacramento v. Lewis,. . .we have come to view the justification for a heightened standard in noncustodial cases as coming from the fact that the reasoning in noncustodial situations is often, by necessity, rushed. . . The guiding principle seems to be that a deliberate-indifference standard is appropriate in 'settings [that] provide the opportunity for reflection and unhurried judgments,' but that a higher bar may be necessary when opportunities for reasoned deliberation are not present. . . For the case at bar, a deliberate-indifference standard is clearly the appropriate one, given the fact that the defendants not only had time to deliberate on what to do with Bukowski but actually did deliberate on this point. The plaintiffs here, however, cannot meet that standard."); Estate of Smith v. Marasco, 318 F.3d 497, 508, 509 (3d Cir. 2003) (Smith I) ("In this case, the officers were confronted with what Fetterolf described as a 'barricaded gunman'situation. This case, however, did not involve the 'hyperpressurized environment' of an in-progress prison riot or a high-speed chase. . . Indeed, the official incident report shows that at least one hour passed between the time Marasco and Scianna approached Smith's residence and the time Fetterolf authorized a request to activate SERT. During that time no shots were fired and the officers did not see a firearm brandished. Moreover, at least after the police arrived at the Smith residence, the police had no reason to be concerned about the safety of third parties. Thus, this case does not involve a 'hyperpressurized environment'such that the Smiths to recover would have to demonstrate that the defendants had an actual purpose to cause harm. At the same time, however, this case is not one in which the police had 'the luxury of proceeding in a deliberate fashion, as prison medical officials can.' . . Because the urgency and timing involved in this case is more like the situation in Miller, the Smiths here must demonstrate 'a level of gross negligence or arbitrariness that indeed Ashocks the conscience .''. . . We think based on our reading of the precedents in this elusive area of the law that, except in those cases involving either true split-second decisions or, on the other end of the spectrum, those in which officials have the luxury of relaxed deliberation, an official's conduct may create state-created danger liability if it exhibits a level of gross negligence or arbitrariness that shocks the conscience."); Ewolski v. City of Brunswick, 287 F.3d 492, 511 & n.5, 513 (6th Cir. 2002) ("Applying this framework, we agree with the district court that this case 'falls within the Amiddle-range' between custodial settings and high-speed chases,' and likewise conclude that, on balance, 'the more appropriate standard of review is Adeliberate indifference.'' . . . Although the Brunswick police officers conducting the standoff undoubtedly faced competing obligations and intense pressures in making their decisions, the facts viewed most favorably to the plaintiffs reveal that this was a situation where actual deliberation was practical. The police waited five hours to initiate the first 'tactical solution,' which strongly suggests that split-second decision making was not required. Many more hours passed before the decision was made to deploy the armored vehicle. Indeed, in his deposition, Chief Beyer indicated that the decision to initiate a tactical assault was made after consulting two mental health professionals and requesting input from the officers on the scene. Beyer also indicated that he discussed the pros and cons of using tear gas. Clearly, this testimony demonstrates not only that deliberation was practical, but that some effort at deliberation was in fact made. . . . . Nevertheless, even under the more exacting deliberate indifference standard, we conclude that the Appellant has not shown a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the conduct of the police rose to the level of the conscience shocking under the particular circumstances presented. . . . We note that although the issue has never been decided, cases from this circuit decided before Lewis have 'expressed doubt' as to whether the deliberate indifference standard should apply in noncustodial settings. . . Such doubt, we believe, has been resolved by the Court's opinion in Lewis, which made clear that the key variable is whether actual deliberation is practical, not whether the claimant was in state custody. As the Court explained, deliberate indifference applies in custodial settings because these settings provide the opportunity for reflection and unhurried judgments. . . Custodial settings, however, are not the only situations in which officials may have a reasonable opportunity to deliberate."); Wilson v. Lawrence County, 260 F.3d 946, 956 & n.9 (8th Cir. 2001) ("The general test of whether executive action denying a liberty interest [footnote omitted] is egregious enough to violate due process is whether it shocks the conscience. . . The Supreme Court has taken a context specific approach to determining whether intermediate culpable states of mind, such as recklessness, support a section 1983 claim by shocking the conscience and, thus, violating due process. . . . In Neal . . . , we stated, based on Lewis, that in situations where state actors have the opportunity to deliberate various alternatives prior to selecting a course of conduct, such action violates due process if it is done recklessly. . . This statement from Neal certainly applies to the present claim. . . . In the present situation, officers conducting the post-arrest investigation certainly had the luxury of unhurried judgments and repeated reflections, which make a reckless standard appropriate. . . . It is important to recall that this reckless standard normally contains a subjective component similar to criminal recklessness."); Young v. City of Mount Ranier, 238 F.3d 567, 574-77 (4th Cir. 2001) ("Although the original complaint refers to 'malicious abuse' by the law enforcement officers, the Parents' claims are not grounded in the Fourth Amendment − in their brief and during oral argument they specifically disavowed any contention that the law enforcement officers improperly took Young into custody or that they used excessive force when taking him into custody. Instead, the Parents proceed solely under the Fourteenth Amendment, contending that the defendants violated Young's constitutional rights by failing to protect him from a known risk of harm (the risk of asphyxiation when restrained in a prone position, particularly after being sprayed with pepper spray), or, stated somewhat differently, that the defendants violated Young's constitutional rights by their indifference to his serious medical needs brought about by the pepper spray, restraints, and face-down positioning. . . . These claims fall within the limited circumstances where conduct in the 'middle range' of culpability − specifically, conduct that amounts to 'deliberate indifference' − is viewed as sufficiently shocking to the conscience that it can support a Fourteenth Amendment claim. . . . Reading the original complaint in the light most favorable to the Parents and giving the Parents the benefit of all reasonable inferences, . . . the complaint simply establishes that Young struggled with law enforcement officers, was sprayed with pepper spray, restrained, transported to a hospital in a prone position, and died sometime thereafter. While the complaint alleges that the officers knew or should have known about the potential problems with the use of pepper spray and restraints on PCP users, these allegations, particularly absent any suggestion that Young exhibited any distress during the time he was in the custody of the officers, at most support an inference that the defendants were negligent in some unidentified way. Negligence, however, is insufficient to support a claim of a Fourteenth Amendment violation."); Butera v. District of Columbia, 235 F.3d 637, 652 (D.C. Cir. 2001) ("As in the context of State custody, the State also owes a duty of protection when its agents create or increase the danger to an individual. Like prison officials who are charged with overseeing an inmate's welfare, State officials who create or enhance danger to citizens may also be in a position where 'actual deliberation is practical.'. . . In the instant case, the officers had the opportunity to plan the undercover operation with care. In view of the officers' duty to protect Eric Butera, he may prove that the officers' treatment of him in connection with the attempted undercover drug buy 'shocked the conscience' by meeting the lower threshold of 'deliberate indifference.'"); Claybrook v. Birchwell, 199 F.3d 350, 362, 363 (6th Cir. 2000) (Clay, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("When conducting an 'exact analysis' of the facts of this case in the light most favorable to Ms. Claybrook, it is clear that the officers had sufficient time to make an unhurried judgment about their conduct upon seeing Mr. Claybrook with his weapon such that a lower level of fault should be applied. As the officers testified, they were aware of department rules requiring them to radio for a marked car and uniformed officers, and they made a conscious decision to request such support. The officers were also aware that the department rules mandated that they refrain from investigating the situation unless emergency circumstances arose. Significantly, at the point when they discovered Mr. Claybrook standing outside with this gun, Officer Birchwell testified that he did not believe that the officers were in imminent danger or that exigent circumstances requiring the use of force existed. However, after having made a decision to request backup, the officers inexplicably proceeded to engage Mr. Claybrook in a violent confrontation without awaiting the arrival of the uniformed officers. Contrary to the majority's assertion, the officers here were hardly involved in a high-speed pursuit or any high-pressure confrontation at the time that they decided to act, as were the officers in Lewis. . . As such, Ms. Claybook's claims should be analyzed using the 'deliberate indifference' standard; which is to say, her claim should be viewed in the context of whether the officers had time to make a reasoned judgment about their conduct. . . . Notably, there were no emergency circumstances present so as to require the officers to begin shooting without following protocol and without making a reasoned decision as to whether the vehicle was occupied. Accordingly, under these circumstances, a jury should decide whether the officers acted with deliberate indifference to Ms. Claybrook's rights."); Brown v. Nationsbank Corp., 188 F.3d 579, 592 (5th Cir. 1999) ("Applying the Lewis analysis to the FBI's alleged activity in this case, we conclude that the FBI made decisions which harmed the Plaintiffs after ample opportunity for cool reflection. In fact, they invested almost two years and thousands of man hours in developing the sting operation. Thus, the due process clause protects the Plaintiffs from any harm that arose from the officers' deliberate indifference. The facts, as pleaded, establish at least that level of federal agent culpability as Operation Lightning Strike evolved into a disastrous boondoggle. We therefore hold that Hodgson's allegations that federal agents inflicted damages on him, an innocent non-target, during this particular undercover operation and refused him compensation states a claim under Bivens."); Armstrong v. Squadrito, 152 F.3d 564, 576 (7th Cir. 1998) ("[T]he Court [in Lewis] endorsed the use of the deliberately indifferent standard for cases in which the defendants have the luxury of forethought . . . . The Court explained that prison is the quintessential setting for the deliberately indifferent standard.").

See also Napper v. Hankison, No. 3:20-CV-764-BJB, 2022 WL 3008809 (W.D. Ky. July 28, 2022) ("After a state-court grand jury indicted Hankison for his role in these events, the Court stayed the civil claims against him. . . Since then, the Commonwealth tried Hankison for wanton endangerment and a jury acquitted him. . . So at this juncture the Court does not face the question whether the Plaintiffs stated a plausible claim against Hankison—the only Defendant whose bullets allegedly entered the Plaintiffs' apartment. Instead, this Order addresses the motions to dismiss filed by Louisville Metro Government and the individual defendants aside from Hankison. . . . The Supreme Court and the Sixth Circuit have long distinguished between force directed at a particular person and force that incidentally restricts a third-party's movement. . . .The Plaintiffs describe themselves as 'innocent bystanders,'. . . and expressly acknowledge that their 'Unit 3 ... was not the target of the Search Warrant[.]' . . Nor do they say Hankison intended to fire at them or their apartment. . . Rather, the 'Defendants were executing ... search warrants that night at ... 3003 Springfield Drive Unit 4' which was 'occup[ied]' by 'Breonna Taylor and Kenneth Walker.'. . As explained by Plaintiffs' own pleadings, the decision to knock and search Unit 4 was intentional; the shots that entered Unit 3 were not. . . . The Plaintiffs ask the Court to ignore Claybrook as inconsistent with Brower, or at least read Claybrook narrowly to apply only to purely inadvertent uses of force, like a slipped parking brake, as opposed to intentional uses of force that inadvertently injure a third party. . . But Claybrook is binding, published precedent that discussed and followed Brower, not earlier precedent that a subsequent Supreme Court decision might theoretically have abrogated. So a district court has no basis to ignore it. And the reasoning of the many precedents cited above reject Plaintiffs' reading of 'seizures' to include any volitional force, as opposed to force specific to the plaintiff. Plaintiffs are simply wrong that '[i]t doesn't matter who you seize.'. . The Fourth Amendment does not provide a claim to any aggrieved person (target and bystander alike) harmed when an officer uses objectively unreasonable force in an attempt to seize someone. . . Instead the Fourth Amendment protects someone intentionally seized by government officials. . . Contrary arguments are best addressed to the Sixth Circuit sitting en banc or to the Supreme Court, not to a single district judge. . . .The upshot of Claybrook is that courts examine use-of-force claims brought by bystanders under the Fourteenth Amendment instead of the Fourth. . . .Even if 'the actions of the [officers] violated departmental policy or were otherwise negligent,' that could not establish 'conscience-shocking malice or sadism toward the unintended shooting victim.'. . Both the Sixth Circuit and the Supreme Court have dismissed claims that rest solely on violations of local regulations. . . To be sure, the LMPD regulations expressly call for "reasonableness" in the use of force in the execution of a search warrant, considered in light of the individual circumstances known before and during the execution. . . But while standard operating procedures may of course call for a higher or different standard of care than does the Constitution, that does not supplant the Constitution as the source of legal liability under § 1983. Congress made states and localities liable for constitutional violations, not violations of state and local policies. A plaintiff asserting a Lewis claim must allege the violation of 'the plaintiff's federally protected rights.'. .These Plaintiffs haven't. They ignore the law's clear teaching on when to assess liability for the use of force: when the officer 'react[ed] to the dangerous actions of [an] armed man.'. . The use of force Plaintiffs complain about—the bullets that flew into their apartment—occurred in the context of a fast-evolving firefight following Walker's shooting at police officers. . . . A '[w]ild gunfight' not planned or intended by law enforcement is the sort of prototypical 'dangerous action[ ]' for which the heightened malicious-or-sadistic standard applies."); Clark v. Merrell, No. CV 19-1579, 2021 WL 288791, at *5 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 28, 2021) ("Officer Merrell's dangerous pursuit of Douglass in defiance of a direct order from his supervisors earlier that day to not pursue any dirt bikes could support an inference that Officer Merrell acted with intent to harm. Undeterred by his supervisors' direct order, Officer Merrell pursued Douglass for eight to ten minutes, at 60 miles per hour, in the middle of the afternoon, near a major transportation center, and through densely populated areas with clearly marked pedestrian crosswalks. There was no urgency to pursue Douglass. In fact, Officer Merrell was specifically ordered not to pursue him. Officer Merrell's dangerous and unauthorized pursuit of Douglass could support an inference that Officer Merrell acted with the requisite intent to harm. . . . Officer Merrell's repeated attempts to conceal, coverup or simply lie about the circumstances of his unauthorized pursuit of Douglass also support an inference that he acted with a purpose to cause harm.") [See also Clark v. Merrell, No. CV 19-1579, 2025 WL 565822, at *7 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 19, 2025) (denying summary judgment for defendant)]; Thomas v. Town of Chelmsford, 267 F.Supp.3d 279, ___ (D. Mass. 2017) ("While the students' Lord-of-the-Flies behavior shocks the conscience, that is not the issue; the relevant inquiry is whether there was any conscience-shocking behavior by the state defendants that led to the bodily injury. The Court finds that the answer is no. Although there is a plausible argument that the defendants' failure to supervise the bunkhouse was negligent, the defendants' conduct does not rise to the level of deliberate indifference. The defendants knew that bullying took place at previous football camps at Camp Robindel, but none of the previous incidents of bullying were anywhere near as serious as the broomstick rape. Similarly, while the defendants knew of one previous occasion in which Matthew was bullied in football practice—urination in his cleats—that incident was much less serious. There was no reason for any of the defendants to have believed that the students, if left unsupervised, would have inflicted violence of this magnitude on Matthew."); Wells v. Bisard, No. 1:11-cv-1049-WTL-DML, 2011 WL 5827213, at *2, *3 (S.D. Ind. Nov. 18, 2011) ("Where, as here, a police motor vehicle accident occurs in a non-emergency setting, such an accident offends the Constitution if the defendant was criminally reckless. Hill v. Shobe, 93 F.3d 418, 421 (7th Cir.1996). 'Criminal recklessness-which is the same as deliberate indifference-is a proxy for intent' and the test for criminal recklessness is a subjective standard. Id. Under the subjective standard, the plaintiff is required to 'demonstrate that [the defendant] was willing to let a fatal collision occur.' Id. Thus, in order to withstand a motion to dismiss, the plaintiff 'must demonstrate that the defendant had actual knowledge of impending harm which he consciously refused to prevent. In other words, the state actor must have sufficient knowledge of the danger that one can infer he intended to inflict the resultant injury.' Id. However, '[i]t is insufficient to show that a public official acted in the face of a recognizable but generic risk to the public at large.' Id. Rather, the reckless conduct must be directed toward the plaintiff. . . .Conduct can be directed toward the plaintiff even if the defendant does not know the specific identity of each person within the group. . . . Wells has pled sufficient facts that, if proved, would support a finding that Bisard had sufficient knowledge of danger to a specific group of persons caused by his actions. From this, a jury could reasonably find that Bisard acted recklessly in conscious disregard of that risk. Specifically, Wells has alleged that Bisard put pedestrians and motorists in his path in danger when he reported to work intoxicated and/or drank while on duty such that he drove under the influence of alcohol and had a blood alcohol level of .19 two hours after the collision, drove 73 miles per hour in a 40 mile-per-hour zone during lunch time on a work day where there was significant traffic on the roadway, and used the police car's laptop computer to instant message another officer about non-police matters while driving, in violation of IMPD General Orders. For this reason, the Defendant's motion to dismiss Wells' claim for failure to state a constitutional violation under § 1983 is DENIED. . . . The right at issue in this case is clearly established. Hill established that, in the context of non-emergency police motor vehicle accidents, a criminal recklessness-deliberate indifference standard would apply. While articulating a higher standard for police motor vehicle accidents in which a police officer must make the split-second decision whether to give chase, Lewis bolstered the holding in Hill by specifically contemplating that situations not marked by such urgency be measured by the lesser, deliberate indifference standard. Based on Hill and bolstered by Lewis , the Court finds that a reasonable official, acting as Bisard is alleged to have acted, would have understood that what he was doing violated Wells' substantive due process rights. The Defendants' motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity is therefore DENIED.");

Leisure v. City of Cincinnati, 267 F. Supp.2d 848, 853, 854 (S.D. Ohio 2003) ("The Court . . . finds that Plaintiffs have also sufficiently alleged a violation of Thomas' due process rights. Such allegation can also serve as the basis for the case to proceed on an alternatively pleaded constitutional violation. The Supreme Court, in County of Sacramento v. Lewis, established that although substantive due process claims based upon clearly deliberate decisions intended to harm or injure are 'most likely to rise to the conscience-shocking level,' those claims are not exclusive. . . . Claims based upon 'something more than negligence but less than intentional conduct, such as recklessness or gross negligence' or 'mid-level fault' could also be actionable in some circumstances. . . . Plaintiffs allege that Defendant Roach pursued Thomas with 'his gun out and his hand on the trigger'. . ., contrary to the policy of the Cincinnati Police Department . . . Such conduct, even if only the result of 'mid-level fault,' inches close enough to harmful purpose to spark shock under County of Sacramento. Though Defendants read County of Sacramento to foreclose due process liability in a pursuit case absent purpose to cause harm . . . , the Court finds that the specific holding of the case pertains to high-speed chases. . . Defendants further try to frame a pursuit on foot as high-speed, but the Court does not find this proposition convincing, as a person on foot cannot travel as fast as a person on a motorcycle. The urgency and the obvious danger to the public is not the same. For these reasons, the Court finds that consonant with County of Sacramento, Plaintiffs' allegations of violation of due process can serve as an alternative basis for a constitutional violation."); Sanders v. Bd. Of County Commissioners of Jefferson County, 192 F. Supp.2d 1094, 1114, 1115 (D. Colo. 2001) ("[I]n assessing the constitutionality of law enforcement actions, I must distinguish between emergency action and actions taken after opportunity for reflection. Appropriately, I must give great deference to the decisions that necessarily occur in emergency situations. With that caveat in mind, I look to the nature of the official conduct on the spectrum of culpability that has tort liability at one end; conduct in which the state actor intended to cause harm and in which the state lacks any justifiable interest on the other. In emergency situations, only conduct that reaches that far point will shock the conscience and result in constitutional liability. Where the state actor has the luxury to truly deliberate about the decisions he or she is making, something less than unjustifiable intent to harm, such as calculated indifference, may suffice to shock the conscience. . . . The result here comes clear when focused through the lens of the Lewis standard. From the time when the attack on Columbine High School began on April 20, 1999 at approximately 11:15 a.m. until approximately 12:30 p.m. when the hostile gunfire ceased and the Command Defendants knew that Harris and Klebold were dead, the competing interests of public and officer safety outweighed the rescue needs of the students and staff inside Columbine High School, including Dave Sanders. This first hour and fifteen minutes of the attack is closely analogous to the prison riot discussed in Lewis during which state officials were forced to make 'split-second judgments-in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.' . . . Under such circumstances, unless an intent to harm a victim is alleged, there is no liability under the Fourteenth Amendment redressible by an action under § 1983. . . . In this case, the pertinent time frame falls between approximately 12:30 p.m. when the Command Defendants learned that Harris and Klebold were dead and 4:00 p.m. when a SWAT team finally reached Dave Sanders in Science Room 3. Pursuant to Plaintiff's allegations, during that time, the Command Defendants knew Dave Sanders' exact location and the nature of his wounds. Yet they took repeated affirmative actions to block access to or rescue of Dave Sanders by private citizens or other state actors not withstanding his readily-accessible location. Under the factual allegations of Plaintiff's complaint I cannot say precisely at what moment between 12:30 p.m. and 4:00 p.m., the circumstances facing the Command Defendants changed. I do conclude that at some point during the afternoon, the Command Defendants gained the time to reflect and deliberate on their decisions. At that point, the Command Defendants demonstrated a deliberate indifference towards Dave Sanders' plight shocking to the conscience of this federal court."); Glaspy v. Malicoat, 134 F. Supp.2d 890, 896 (W.D. Mich. 2001) ("The Court concludes that the deliberate indifference test rather than the higher 'malicious or sadistic' test is appropriate in this case because Glaspy's request to Malicoat to use the restroom did not involve a 'rapidly evolving, fluid, and dangerous predicament which preclude[d] the luxury of calm and reflective pre-response deliberation.' [citing Claybrook] Rather, Malicoat had sufficient time to consider different alternatives and act on them. While it is true that prisoner count, an important prison function, was being conducted at the time, unlike a prison riot, prisoner count is a routine procedure that does not require snap judgments requiring balancing of competing interests. Furthermore, although no more than 22-24 minutes elapsed between William's first request that Glaspy be permitted to use the restroom and the end of count, Malicoat had sufficient time to determine how to accommodate Glaspy's need. Applying the deliberate indifference standard to the facts of this case, the Court concludes that Malicoat's conduct shocks the conscience because Malicoat was deliberately indifferent to Glaspy's federally protected rights."); Williams v. City and County of Denver, No. 90 N 1176, slip op. at *17 (D. Colo. Sept. 27, 1999) (on remand) ("I find that a reasonable juror could conclude that Murawski's back-up call did not require an emergency response and, thus, Williams need not satisfy the intent to harm culpability requirement. Further, I find that a reasonable juror could conclude that, under the totality of the circumstances, Farr's conduct was sufficiently reckless to shock the conscience.").

See also Childress v. City of Arapaho, 210 F.3d 1154, 1157, 1158 (10th Cir. 2000) ("The Lewis principles therefore apply whether the claimant is a police suspect or an innocent victim."); Onossian v. Block, 175 F.3d 1169, 1171 (9th Cir. 1999) ("As we read the Court's opinion [in Lewis], if a police officer is justified in giving chase, that justification insulates the officer from constitutional attack, irrespective of who might be harmed or killed as a consequence of the chase."). See also L.S., ex rel. Hernandez v. Peterson, 982 F.3d 1323, 1330-31 (11th Cir. 2020) ("To succeed on their theory of deliberate indifference, the students must allege both that the officials acted with deliberate indifference and that their indifference was 'arbitrary' or 'conscience shocking.'. . . We doubt that deliberate indifference can ever be 'arbitrary' or 'conscience shocking' in a non-custodial setting. We stated in dicta in Nix that we 'ha[ve] been explicit' that it cannot. . . Yet, we later suggested that deliberate indifference might be sufficient in a non-custodial setting if, 'at the very least,' it involved 'deliberate indifference to an extremely great risk of serious injury.'. . But Waddell then suggested that 'the correct legal threshold for substantive due process liability' might be much higher than deliberate indifference. . . Although neither Nix nor Waddell created a binding rule, . . . the weight of authority lies with Nix. 'No case in the Supreme Court, or in this Circuit, ... has held that ... deliberate indifference is a sufficient level of culpability to state a claim of violation of substantive due process rights in a non-custodial context.' Waldron v. Spicher, 954 F.3d 1297, 1310 (11th Cir. 2020). Indeed, in the public-school setting, we have allowed substantive-due-process claims to proceed only when they involved intentional, obviously excessive corporal punishment. . . Even if we assume that a non-custodial claim of deliberate indifference may be cognizable as a matter of substantive due process, the students' claim is not. The students allege that the officials' actions were 'arbitrary' or 'conscience shocking' in two ways. First, Israel, Runcie, Medina, Peterson, and Broward County knew that Cruz was a danger but failed to intervene during the shooting. Second, Jordan prevented lifesaving care by blocking medics from entering the school during the shooting. The students argue that these choices, in the totality of the circumstances, were 'arbitrary' or 'conscience shocking.' The students are right that we must evaluate the totality of the circumstances, . . .but they ignore the key circumstance. A shooting is 'an occasion calling for fast action,' where officials must 'make split-second judgments—in circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving.'. . When split-second judgments are required, an official's conduct will shock the conscience only when it stems from a 'purpose to cause harm.'. . Outside of their since-abandoned and conclusory claim of retaliation against Medina, the students fail to allege that any official acted with the purpose of causing harm. . . The students have not alleged 'arbitrary' or 'conscience shocking' conduct by any official. The 'purpose to cause harm' requirement applies even if the officials or Broward County had notice of the danger that Cruz posed. This requirement controls whenever rapid judgments are necessary. . . Conduct that is not intentionally harmful can violate substantive due process only in contexts 'when actual deliberation is practical.'. .Lewis makes clear that this appeal involves rapid judgments in a dangerous and unpredictable circumstance. In Lewis, the Supreme Court distinguished, for example, between the day-to-day operations of a prison, where actual deliberation is practical, and a prison riot, where it is not. . . In a school shooting, as with a prison riot, officials might be able to prepare in the abstract. But when a violent and chaotic circumstance comes to pass, officials must make decisions 'in haste, under pressure, and frequently without the luxury of a second chance.'. . Absent intentional wrongdoing, we cannot review those split-second decisions under the Due Process Clause."); J.R. v. Gloria, 593 F.3d 73, 79, 80 (1st Cir. 2010) ("The mere creation of a special relationship, even if placing young children into foster care created such a relationship, is not enough to make out a due process claim for any harm that may follow. Even then, the claim against the defendants must also involve 'conscience-shocking' conduct by state officials. . . and 'the official conduct "most likely to rise to the conscience-shocking level" is the "conduct intended to injure in some way unjustifiable by any government interest."'. . .The Supreme Court has also repeatedly 'expressed [its] reluctance to expand the doctrine of substantive due process.'. . In particular, the Court has made it clear that state officials' negligence, without more, is simply insufficient to meet the conscience-shocking standard. . . We assume arguendo that DCYF created a 'special relationship' because it affirmatively took responsibility for protecting the twins from harm while they remained in foster care. Even so, plaintiffs, on all of their evidence, did not make out a substantive due process claim. The evidence they put forward alleges troubling lapses in DCYF's supervision of the twins' foster care environment. But it does not allege any behavior by defendants that would meet the legal definition of conscience-shocking conduct. Plaintiffs argue that the legal standard for defining conduct that

'shocks the conscience' is whether the state has acted with 'deliberate indifference.' That is not entirely correct. As we stated in Rivera, deliberately indifferent behavior does not per se shock the conscience. Indeed, we suggested that it is only '[i]n situations where actors have an opportunity to reflect and make reasoned and rational decisions' that 'deliberately indifferent behavior may suffice to shock the conscience.'. . The burden to show state conduct that 'shocks the conscience' is extremely high, requiring 'stunning' evidence of 'arbitrariness and caprice' that extends beyond '[m]ere violations of state law, even violations resulting from bad faith' to 'something more egregious and more extreme.' DePoutot v. Raffaelly, 424 F.3d 112, 119 (1st Cir.2005). Gloria and Terry do not defend their actions on the basis that they were responding to an emergency, with no time to reflect, but on the basis that even if their conduct fell short of regulatory requirements, it did not come close to shocking the conscience. Plaintiffs' evidence did not show the defendants acted even with deliberate indifference. Though other circuits have varied in their formulations of when 'deliberate indifference' rises to conscience-shocking conduct in the foster care context, state officials must have been at least aware of known or likely injuries or abuse and have chosen to ignore the danger to the child. . . Even when the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, no rational trier of fact could conclude that the defendants were aware that the twins were in danger of being abused or otherwise harmed by Stevens."); Phillips v. County of Allegheny, 515 F.3d 224, 241 (3rd Cir. 2008) ("[U]nder Sanford, three possible standards can be used to determine whether state action shocked the conscience: (1) deliberate indifference; (2) gross negligence or arbitrariness that indeed shocks the conscience; or (3) intent to cause harm. . . . Taking the allegations as true, the complaint leads us to conclude that defendants Tush and Craig were not acting in a 'hyperpressurized environment.' Instead, they had sufficient time to proceed deliberately. . . . Hence, to 'shock the conscience,' they have to have behaved with deliberate indifference to the results of their actions."); Sanford v. Stiles, 456 F.3d 298, 310 & n.15 (3d Cir. 2006) ("[I]n a state-created danger case, when a state actor is not confronted with a 'hyperpressurized environment' but nonetheless does not have the luxury of proceeding in a deliberate fashion, the relevant question is whether the officer consciously disregarded a great risk of harm. Again, it is possible that actual knowledge of the risk may not be necessary where the risk is 'obvious.' . . . We recognize that in some instances these standards may become arduous to apply. Other circuits have taken a more straightforward approach to the fault requirement. For example, the Ninth Circuit has held that 'deliberate indifference to [a] known or obvious danger' is the uniform standard in all state-created danger cases. . . The Sixth and Eighth Circuits have suggested a two-tiered standard under which deliberate indifference will apply if an opportunity for reflection exists while intent to harm will apply to 'split-second decision[s] .' . . However, unlike these courts, we are constrained by Miller and subsequent cases to recognize our three existing tests to identify conscience-shocking behavior."); Fraternal Order of Police Department of Corrections Labor Committee v. Williams, 375 F.3d 1141, 1145, 1146 (D.C. Cir. 2004) ("As we explained in Butera, . . . the 'lower threshold' for meeting the shock the conscience test by showing deliberately indifferent as opposed to intentional conduct applies only in 'circumstances where the State has a heightened obligation toward the individual.' . . . . The opportunity for deliberation alone is not sufficient to apply the lower threshold to substantive due process claims. Instead, it is '[b]ecause of ... special circumstances' like custody that 'a State official's deliberate indifference ... can be Atruly shocking.'"); Waddell v. Hendry County Sheriff's Office, 329 F.3d 1300, 1306 & n.5, 1309 (11th Cir. 2003) ("In this non-custodial setting, a substantive due process violation would, at the very least, require a showing of deliberate indifference to an extremely great risk of serious injury to someone in Plaintiffs' position. . . . We stress the phrase 'at the very least.' We do not rule out today that the correct legal threshold for substantive due process liability in a case like this one is actually far higher. For example, the standard could be that the government official acted with 'deliberate indifference to a substantial certainty of serious injury' or maybe that the government official acted 'maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of creating a serious injury' or perhaps some different standard. We feel comfortable today that the standard we use today is the low point − may well be too low a point − for a possible standard in a case like this one and that we can decide this case without being more definite about the law as an academic matter. . . . To act with deliberate indifference, a state actor must know of and disregard an excessive − that is, an extremely great − risk to the victim's health or safety. . . . In summary, we, in circumstances such as these, are unwilling to expand constitutional law to hold police departments responsible for the tortious acts of their confidential informants. No decision by Defendants in this case involved such an obviously extremely great risk that Garnto would become intoxicated and then drive an automobile and then crash into another automobile causing serious injury as to shock the conscience. We conclude that the district court properly determined that Plaintiffs failed to establish a substantive due process violation."); Schieber v. City of Philadelphia, 320 F.3d 409, 417, 420, 423 (3d Cir. 2003) ("Whether executive action is conscience shocking and thus 'arbitrary in the constitutional sense' depends on the context in which the action takes place. In particular, the degree of culpability required to meet the 'shock the conscience' standard depends upon the particular circumstances that confront those acting on the state's behalf. . . . While it is true that Woods and Scherff were not required to exercise an instantaneous judgment, like an officer in a chase situation, this was nevertheless far from the situation of prison doctors where 'extended opportunities to do better [may be] teamed with protracted failure even to care.' . . Woods and Scherff were required to make a decision without delay and under the pressure that comes from knowing that the decision must be made on necessarily limited information. . . . I believe that a comparison of the situation confronting Officers Woods and Scherff with those confronting the social worker in Miller and the paramedics in Ziccardi suggests that liability could exist here only if Woods and Scherff subjectively appreciated and consciously ignored a great, i.e., more than substantial, risk that the failure to break down Schieber's door would result in significant harm to her. Clearly, the record would not support such a finding. Nevertheless, just as I have found it unnecessary to determine whether the Lewis 'intent to harm' standard is applicable, I also find it unnecessary to adopt the Miller/Ziccardi standard. Because the record would not support a finding of more than negligence on the part of Woods and Scherff, the result we reach follows a fortiori from that reached in Miller and Ziccardi."); Ziccardi v. City of Philadelphia, 288 F.3d 57, 66, 67 (3d Cir. 2002) ("In summary, then, we understand Miller to require in a case such as the one before us, proof that the defendants consciously disregarded, not just a substantial risk, but a great risk that serious harm would result if, knowing Smith was seriously injured, they moved Smith without support for his back and neck. On remand in the present case, we believe that the district court should apply this standard and instruct the jury accordingly if one is empaneled."); Gottlieb v. Laurel Highlands School District, 272 F.3d 168, 173 (3d Cir. 2001) (applying Ashocks the conscience' standard to claim of excessive force in school context and analyzing claim in terms of following four elements: Aa) Was there a pedagogical justification for the use of force?; b) Was the force utilized excessive to meet the legitimate objective in this situation?; c) Was the force applied in a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline or maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm?; and d) Was there a serious injury?"); Shrum v. Kluck, 249 F.3d 773, 778, 779 (8th Cir. 2001) ("Shrum accuses Elwood of maintaining a policy or custom which deprived her son of his constitutional right to bodily integrity. She defines that infringing policy or custom as Elwood's official decision to terminate Kluck and enter into a confidential settlement agreement with him, even though Kluck should have been terminated for his sexually inappropriate behavior with students. Because Shrum's claim against Elwood depends upon her son's constitutionally-protected liberty interest in his bodily integrity − a substantive due process theory − the district court correctly applied the culpability standard for a § 1983 substantive due process claim as mandated by Lewis. . . . [I]n some circumstances, official policy that is deliberately indifferent to unconstitutional conduct may satisfy the 'shocks the conscience' standard required by Lewis. . . . We therefore must consider whether Elwood's official decision to enter into the confidential settlement agreement with Kluck is a policy that is so deliberately indifferent to a predictable constitutional violation that it shocks the conscience. . . . In the present case, Elwood's actions − entering into a confidential settlement agreement with Kluck rather than terminating him outright, and providing him with a neutral letter of recommendation − do not rise to the level of deliberate indifference. . . . We agree with the district court that Kluck's subsequent sexual misconduct was not so obvious a consequence as to impute § 1983 liability to Elwood for its deliberate indifference to that consequence."); Neal v. Fulton County Bd. of Educ., 229 F.3d 1069, 1074-76 (11th Cir. 2000) ("[W]e think for a number of reasons that a student-plaintiff alleging excessive corporal punishment can in certain circumstances assert a cause of action for a violation of his rights under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . .[A]lmost all of the Courts of Appeals to address the issue squarely have said that a plaintiff alleging excessive corporal punishment may in certain circumstances state a claim under the substantive Due Process Clause. [citing cases] We agree, and join the vast majority of Circuits in confirming that excessive corporal punishment, at least where not administered in conformity with a valid school policy authorizing corporal punishment as in Ingraham, may be actionable under the Due Process Clause when it is tantamount to arbitrary, egregious, and conscience-shocking behavior. . . . Consistent with the cases, we hold that, at a minimum, the plaintiff must allege facts demonstrating that (1) a school official intentionally used an amount of force that was obviously excessive under the circumstances, and (2) the force used presented a reasonably foreseeable risk of serious bodily injury. . . In determining whether the amount of force used is obviously excessive, we consider the totality of the circumstances. In particular, we examine: (1) the need for the application of corporal punishment, (2) the relationship between the need and amount of punishment administered, and (3) the extent of the injury inflicted. . . We need not decide today how 'serious' an injury must be to support a claim. The injury alleged by Plaintiff here − the utter destruction of an eye − clearly was serious. Moreover, courts elsewhere treat the extent and nature of the injury as simply one factor (although an important one) to be considered in the totality of the circumstances. . . . The test we adopt today will, we think, properly ensure that students will be able to state a claim only where the alleged corporal punishment truly reflects the kind of egregious official abuse of force that would violate substantive due process protections in other, non-school contexts. We do not open the door to a flood of complaints by students objecting to traditional and reasonable corporal punishment."); Nicini v. Morra, 212 F.3d 798, 810-12 (3d Cir. 2000) ("Lewis therefore makes clear that a plaintiff seeking to establish a constitutional violation must demonstrate that the official's conduct 'shocks the conscience' in the particular setting in which that conduct occurred. In some circumstances, conduct that is deliberately indifferent will shock the conscience. Indeed, in the foster care context, most of the courts of appeals have applied the deliberate indifference standard, although they have defined that standard in slightly different ways. . . . Cyrus, unlike the social worker in Miller, had time 'to make unhurried judgments' in investigating whether to permit Nicini to remain with the Morras. . . In the context of this case, we agree that Cyrus's actions in investigating the Morra home should be judged under the deliberate indifference standard. . . . This case does not require us to determine whether an official's failure to act in light of a risk of which the official should have known, as opposed to failure to act in light of an actually known risk, constitutes deliberately indifferent conduct in this setting. We will assume arguendo that Nicini's proposed standard of 'should have known' is applicable. Nevertheless, as Lewis makes clear, the relevant inquiry is whether the defendant's conduct 'shocks the conscience.' Under the circumstances of this case, we cannot agree that Cyrus's conduct meets that standard. To the contrary, we conclude that Cyrus's conduct in investigating the Morras amounted, at most, to negligence. For the same reason, we need not consider whether failure to perform a specific duty can ever amount to deliberate indifference, . . . as there is no evidence that Cyrus failed to perform any required duty."); Davis v. Township of Hillside, 190 F.3d 167, 171 (3d Cir. 1999) ("Here, the chase ended when the pursuing police car bumped into the rear of Cook's car, causing him to lose control of the car, which led to the collision in which plaintiff was injured. Plaintiff argues that the deliberate ramming of Cook's car by the police vehicle amounted to use of a deadly weapon, which permits the drawing of an inference that the police acted with the intent to cause physical injury. We disagree. Lewis does not permit an inference of intent to harm simply because a chase eventuates in deliberate physical contact causing injury. Rather, it is 'conduct intended to injure in some way unjustifiable by any government interest [that] is the sort of official action most likely to rise to the conscienceshocking level.'"); White v. Lemacks, 183 F.3d 1253, 1258 (11th Cir. 1999) ("Although Lewis leaves open the possibility that deliberate indifference on the part of the state will 'shock the conscience' in some circumstances, . . . it is clear after Collins that such indifference in the context of routine decisions about employee or workplace safety cannot carry a plaintiff's case across that high threshold."); Miller v. City of Philadelphia, 174 F.3d 368, 375 (3d Cir. 1999) ("We recognize that a social worker acting to separate parent and child does not usually act in the hyperpressurized environment of a prison riot or a high- speed chase. However, he or she rarely will have the luxury of proceeding in a deliberate fashion, as prison medical officials can. As a result, in order for liability to attach, a social worker need not have acted with the 'purpose to cause harm,' but the standard of culpability for substantive due process purposes must exceed both negligence and deliberate indifference, and reach a level of gross negligence or arbitrariness that indeed 'shocks

the conscience.'"); Culberson v. Doan, 125 F. Supp.2d 252, 272 (S.D. Ohio 2000) ("Having reviewed this matter, the Court finds that the 'shocks the conscience' test is applicable to Chief Payton's alleged conduct, and that Chief Payton's alleged intentional or reckless actions in allowing the pond in question to be unguarded for 24 hours, in order to allow the Baker Family or Doan enough time to permanently remove and secrete Carrie's body, are sufficiently brutal, demeaning, and harmful as to 'shock the conscience' of this Court."); Leddy v. Township of Lower Merion, 114 F. Supp.2d 372, 376 (E.D. Pa. 2000) ("The circumstances of the present case lie between the parameters of deliberate and spontaneous. Unlike the police officer in Lewis who was engaged in a pursuit, Officer Bedzela was on a non-emergency call, albeit one that required immediate attention. Also unlike the Nicini caseworker, he did not have time to make unhurried judgments. More akin to Miller and Cannon, while full deliberation may not have been practicable, the needs of the situation were not so exigent that only a purpose to cause harm would shock the conscience. As articulated in Miller, culpability in an intermediate setting requires at least 'gross negligence or arbitrariness.' . . . Under this criterion, if Officer Bedzela was driving between 57 and 61 miles per hour without lights and sirens, his conduct, while not condonable, cannot be said to have shocked the conscience."); Cannon v. City of Philadelphia, 86 F. Supp. 2d 460, 469-71 (E.D. Pa. 2000) ("Lewis and Miller require that the actions of the state actor must shock the conscience to trigger § 1983 liability. Therefore, under Lewis and Miller, in order for the plaintiff to prevail on the second Kneipp prong, a plaintiff must prove that the state actor's behavior shocks the conscience. A determination of whether the actions of the state actor shock the conscience requires an evaluation of the context in which they acted. In other words, because Lewis and Miller hold that a determination of what shocks the conscience depends on the circumstances in which the incident occurred, identical actions of a state actor may be sufficient to set forth a state-created danger claim in one context, while it will not suffice in another context. . . . As in Lewis and Miller, the officers in this case did not have the luxury of proceeding in a deliberate fashion. Although the police activity in this case may not rise to the level of the 'hyperpressurized' environment of a police chase, the situation did not unfold in a vacuum. The police radio transmissions during the relevant time reveal that the events took place while officers were searching for alleged suspects and while officers were attempting to secure a crime scene. The officers' actions must be considered within the context of this surrounding police activity. As Lewis indicates, police officers frequently have obligations that tug in different directions. . . Here, the officers were attempting to apprehend a suspect and secure a crime scene and at the same time address the plaintiff's request for transportation to the hospital."), aff'd by Cannon v. Beal, 261 F.3d 490 (3d Cir. 2001); Pickard v. City of Girard, 70 F. Supp.2d 802, 808 (N.D. Ohio 1999) ("[T]he Sixth Circuit has cautioned against applying the 'shocks the conscience' standard for cases not involving physical abuse or excessive force. Cassady v. Tackett, 938 F.2d 693, 698 (6th Cir.1991) . . . Consequently, Plaintiffs' remaining claims that the Girard Defendants did not subject Estes to a field sobriety test, or arrest Estes for assault, simply do not rise to the level of 'physical abuse' and, thus, do not state a substantive due process claim.").

See also City of Cuyahoga Falls v. Buckeye Community Hope Foundation, 123 S.Ct. 1389, 1396 (2003) ("The subjection of the site-plan ordinance to the City's referendum process, regardless of whether that ordinance reflected an administrative or legislative decision, did not constitute per se arbitrary government conduct in violation of [substantive] due process."); Pittman v. Cuyahoga County Dept. of Children and Family Services, 640 F.3d 716, 729 n.6 (6th Cir. 2011) ("The district court improperly analyzed Pittman's substantive due process claim under the 'shock the conscience' standard. . . In the past, this Court has used both the 'shock the conscience' rubric and the deprivation of fundamental rights theory to assess substantive due process claims against social workers. . . Nonetheless, Pittman clearly claims a substantive due process violation based on the alleged deprivation of his fundamental liberty interest in family integrity, not on allegedly conscience-shocking conduct."); Chambers ex rel. Chambers v. School Dist. of Philadelphia Bd of Educ., 587 F.3d 176, 192 (3rd Cir. 2009) ("In light of the Supreme Court's clear statements that only deliberate conduct implicates due process, we now extend our holding in McCurdy to situations involving minor and unemancipated children. In doing so, we reiterate that only deliberate executive conduct in such instances may give rise to a substantive due process violation. The Chambers have failed to allege, much less adduce competent evidence, that the School District deliberately sought to harm their relationship with Ferren, and thus their substantive due process claim fails as a matter of law."); Clark v. Boscher, 514 F.3d 107, 112 , 113 (1st Cir. 2008) ("In order to assert a valid substantive due process claim, Appellants have to prove that they suffered the deprivation of an established life, liberty, or property interest, and that such deprivation occurred through governmental action that shocks the conscience. . . In the instant case, whether Appellants have a recognized property interest in developing their land is ultimately immaterial because they have failed to prove that Westfield engaged in behavior that shocks the conscience. . . . [A] run-of-the-mill land-use case such as this one does not rise to the level of behavior that shocks the conscience. Here, Appellants do not allege any 'fundamental procedural irregularity, racial animus, or the like.'. . Nor do they contend that a fundamental principle has been violated. . . Appellants merely complain that they were denied the necessary permits to develop residential subdivisions on the Clark and Pérez land, and that the City of Westfield denied such permits in furtherance of its own interests.Indeed, the regulatory actions Appellants complain of are virtually indistinguishable from others we have declined to find actionable in the past."); Aguilar v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement Div. of Dept. of Homeland Sec., 510 F.3d 1, 23, 24 (1st Cir. 2007) ("While the 'shock the conscience' test comprises the threshold inquiry with respect to substantive due process violations, the petitioners also must show that the government deprived them of a protected interest in life, liberty, or property. . . Here, the nature of the underlying right asserted by the petitioners reinforces our conclusion that they have not stated a viable substantive due process claim. We see the matter this way. Although the interest of parents in the care, custody, and control of their offspring is among the most venerable of the liberty interests protected by the Fifth Amendment, . . . the petitioners have not demonstrated that this guarantee of substantive due process encompasses their assertions. After all, the right to family integrity has been recognized in only a narrow subset of circumstances. To be sure, the petitioners cite cursorily to cases that deal with this right but they conspicuously fail to build any bridge between these cases and the facts that they allege. We do not think that this is an accident. The petitioners' claims seem markedly different from those scenarios that courts heretofore have recognized under the rubric of family integrity. They have not alleged that the government has interfered permanently with their custodial rights. . . Nor have they alleged that the government has meddled with their right to make fundamental decisions regarding their children's education, . . . or religious affiliation . . . .Taken most favorably to the petitioners, the interference alleged here is transitory in nature and in no way impinges on parental prerogatives to direct the upbringing of their children. We have scoured the case law for any authority suggesting that claims similar to those asserted here are actionable under the substantive component of the Due Process Clause, and we have found none. . . That chasm is important because, given the scarcity of 'guideposts for responsible decisionmaking in this unchartered area,' courts must be 'reluctant to expand the concept of substantive due process.' . . This unfortunate case is a paradigmatic example of an instance in which the prudential principle announced by the Collins Court should be heeded. Accordingly, we dismiss the petitioners' substantive due process claims for failure to satisfy the prerequisites of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6)."); Mongeau v. City of Marlborough,492 F.3d 14, 18, 19 (1st Cir. 2007) ("We have never precluded a plaintiff from arguing that conduct that is the product of a deliberate and premeditated decision might be conscience-shocking whereas the same conduct might not be if it was undertaken in the heat of the moment. Ultimately such an argument would not affect our conclusion that only conscience-shocking behavior will constitute a substantive due process violation. . . . [O]ur precedent on this issue is both clear and binding on this case: in order to state a substantive due process claim of any ilk, a plaintiff must allege behavior on the part of the defendant that is so outrageous that it shocks the conscience. . . . Taking all of Mongeau's allegations as true, we do not see such a conscience-shocking situation; we can discern nothing more than a run-of-the-mill dispute between a developer and a town official."); Marco Outdoor Advertising, Inc. v. Regional Transit Authority, 2007 WL 1723107, at * (5th Cir. 2007) (Wiener J., dissenting) ("It smacks of Lewis Carroll to say that the RTA did not act arbitrarily and capriciously despite (1) self-servingly declaring itself free of the restrictions of the bid laws, (2) conducting its bid process in knowing disregard of its own announced procedures, (3) colluding with the third best of six bidders to enhance that bidder's proposal post-submission, i.e., after 'going to school' on Marco's bid, and (4) ultimately awarding the contract to its favored bidder, regardless of its own pre-award guidelines. I cannot see how this willful − and thus arbitrary and capricious – behavior does not shock the majority's conscience: Even as jaded as I have become from living in New Orleans and seeing almost daily media reports of this kind of behavior by local agencies, the RTA has managed to shock my conscience in this instance."); Pagan v. Calderon, 448 F.3d 16, 32 (1st Cir. 2006) ("ARCAM is in error when it posits that it can prevail on its substantive due process claim either by showing that Calderon's conduct was conscience-shocking or by showing that her conduct deprived it of a protected liberty or property interest. This disjunctive proposition is incorrect. Where, as here, a plaintiff's substantive due process claim challenges the specific acts of a state officer, the plaintiff must show both that the acts were so egregious as to shock the conscience and that they deprived him of a protected interest in life, liberty, or property."); O'Connor v. Pierson, 426 F.3d 187, 204 (2d Cir. 2005) ("County of Sacramento did not distinguish between different types of substantive due process claims, so 'constitutionally arbitrary' action for purposes of a property-based substantive due process claim is action that shocks the conscience."); DePoutot v. Raffaelly, 424 F.3d 112, 118 & n.4 (1st Cir.2005) ("This case involves executive branch action.

Thus, we must proceed incrementally. First, we must determine whether the official's conduct shocks the conscience. . . Only if we answer that question affirmatively can we examine what, if any, constitutional right may have been violated by the conscience-shocking conduct and identify the level of protection afforded to that right by the Due Process Clause. . . . The parties correctly note that our pre-Lewis jurisprudence paved two avenues that a plaintiff might travel in pursuing a substantive due process claim. See, e.g., Brown v. Hot, Sexy & Safer Prods., Inc., 68 F.3d 525, 531 (1st Cir.1995) (indicating that a plaintiff may establish a violation of substantive due process by showing either the deprivation of a fundamental right or conduct that shocks the conscience). Lewis, however, clarified the law of substantive due process and made pellucid that conscience-shocking conduct is an indispensable element of a substantive due process challenge to executive action."); Eichenlaub v. Township of Indiana, 385 F.3d 274, 286 (3d Cir. 2004) ("[T]he misconduct alleged here does not rise sufficiently above that at issue in a normal zoning dispute to pass the 'shocks the conscience test.'"); Levin v. Upper Makefield Township, No. 03-1860, 90 F. App'x 653, 2004 WL 449189, at *7 n.2 (3d Cir. Mar. 8, 2004) ("Levin argues that the 'shocks the conscience' test only applies where the state executive actor had to act with urgency. . .But, says Levin, because the Township did not have to act, and did not in fact act, with any urgency, the 'shocks the conscience' test does not apply to his substantive due process claim. Consequently, the less-stringent Bello 'improper motive' test applies. However, there's nothing in United Artist that supports the distinction Levin urges upon us. In fact, United Artist makes it clear that the 'shocks the conscience' test applies to all substantive due process claims. Levin also 'takes issue' with the United Artist decision, claiming that it does not afford an individual any 'protection from the irrational and arbitrary actions of the government and its officials.'. . However, United Artist is the law of this circuit and, therefore, his distaste for it is irrelevant. Moreover, the United Artist 'shocks the conscience standard' is precisely designed to protect an individual from arbitrary and irrational executive action."); Galdikas v. Fagan, 342 F.3d 684, 690 n.3 (7th Cir. 2003) ("As noted by many courts and commentators, the majority opinion in Lewis leaves a number of questions unresolved. The principal ambiguity is whether the 'shocks the conscience' standard replaces the fundamental rights analysis set forth in Glucksberg whenever executive conduct is challenged or whether the 'shocks the conscience' standard supplements or informs the Glucksberg paradigm in such situations. Certain language in the majority opinion in Lewis suggests that the 'shocks theconscience' standard should be applied as an antecedent or threshold inquiry in all cases of executive conduct. . . Other passages suggest that the 'shocks the conscience' inquiry may be employed to inform the historical inquiry into the nature of the asserted liberty interest. . . .This ambiguity has been noted as well in our own earlier cases. [discussing cases]Our case law on this point seems to reflect a more generally perceived confusion as to the interrelationship of Lewis and Glucksberg. . . Resolution of this ambiguity is not necessary to our decision today. For the reasons set forth in the text, the plaintiffs' substantive due process claim fails under any reading of Lewis. The Supreme Court has not recognized a fundamental right to education. It certainly has not recognized a fundamental right to a post-secondary accredited degree program. Taking the plaintiffs' allegations that the defendants acted improperly by misleading them about the accreditation status of the MSW program as true, such conduct is not sufficiently egregious to shock the conscience."); Bowers v. City of Flint, 325 F.3d 758, 764 (6th

Cir. 2003) (Moore, J., concurring) ("[T]his court should undertake a three-step analysis of the residents' substantive due process claim. First, we should consider whether the asserted interest constitutes a fundamental constitutional right. [footnote omitted] If the asserted interest is not a fundamental right, we then must evaluate whether Flint's conduct depriving the residents of that interest shocks the conscience. Finally, if Flint's conduct does not shock the conscience, then this court must consider whether that conduct is rationally related to a legitimate state interest."); United Artists Theatre Circuit, Inc. v. Township of Warrington, 316 F.3d 392, 400, 401 (3d Cir. 2003) ("Despite Lewis and the post-Lewis Third Circuit cases cited above, United Artists maintains that this case is not governed by the 'shocks the conscience' standard, but by the less demanding 'improper motive' test that originated with Bello v. Walker, 840 F.2d 1124 (3d Cir.1988), and was subsequently applied by our court in a line of land-use cases. In these cases, we held that a municipal land use decision violates substantive due process if it was made for any reason 'unrelated to the merits,' Herr v. Pequea Township, 274 F.3d 109, 111 (3d Cir.2001) (citing cases), or with any 'improper motive.'[citing cases] These cases, however, cannot be reconciled with Lewis's explanation of substantive due process analysis. Instead of demanding conscience-shocking conduct, the Bello line of cases endorses a much less demanding 'improper motive' test for governmental behavior. Although the District Court opined that there are 'few differences between the [shocks the conscience] standard and improper motive standard,' we must respectfully disagree. . . The 'shocks the conscience' standard encompasses 'only the most egregious official conduct.' . . In ordinary parlance, the term 'improper' sweeps much more broadly, and neither Bello nor the cases that it spawned ever suggested that conduct could be 'improper' only if it shocked the conscience. We thus agree with the Supervisors that the Bello line of cases is in direct conflict with Lewis. . . . [W]e see no reason why the present case should be exempted from the Lewis shocks-the-conscience test simply because the case concerns a land use dispute. . . . . We thus hold that, in light of Lewis, Bello and its progeny are no longer good law."), reh'g en banc denied, 324 F.3d 133 (3d Cir. 2003); Moran v. Clarke (Moran I), 296 F.3d 638, 651 (8th Cir. 2002) (en banc) (Bye, J., concurring) ("In County of Sacramento v. Lewis, the Court held that all substantive due process claims against executive officials proceed under one theory, not two separate theories. . . In every case in which a plaintiff challenges the actions of an executive official under the substantive component of the Due Process Clause, he must demonstrate both that the official's conduct was conscience-shocking, . . . and that the official violated one or more fundamental rights that are 'deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition, and implicit in the concept of ordered liberty, such that neither liberty nor justice would exist if they were sacrificed.'"); Gurik v. Mitchell, No. 00-4068, 2002 WL 59641, at *4 (6th Cir. Jan. 15, 2002) (not published) ("Our requirement that terminated public employees allege violations of fundamental rights in order to allege violation of a substantive due process property interest in their employment simply standardizes the 'shocks the conscience' test for purposes of termination from public employment. In other words, a public employee's termination does not 'shock the conscience' in this court if it was not based on the violation of some fundamental right. Thus, Gurik's criticism of this court's precedent based on Lewis is inappropriate, and Gurik must allege violation of a fundamental right in order to allege violation of his substantive due process interest in public employment."); Hawkins v. Freeman, 195 F.3d 732, 738, 739, 741, 750 (4th Cir.

1999) (en banc) ("Depending upon whether the claimed violation is by executive act or legislative enactment, different methods of judicial analysis are appropriate. . . This is so because there are different 'criteria' for determining whether executive acts and legislative enactments are 'fatally arbitrary,' an essential element of any substantive due process claim. . . In executive act cases, the issue of fatal arbitrariness should be addressed as a 'threshold question,' asking whether the challenged conduct was 'so egregious, so outrageous, that it may fairly be said to shock the contemporary conscience.' . . If it does not meet that test, the claim fails on that account, with no need to inquire into the nature of the asserted liberty interest. If it does meet the threshold test of culpability, inquiry must turn to the nature of the asserted interest, hence to the level of protection to which it is entitled. . . If the claimed violation is by legislative enactment (either facially or as applied), analysis proceeds by a different two-step process that does not involve any threshold 'conscience-shocking' inquiry. The first step in this process is to determine whether the claimed violation involves one of 'those fundamental rights and liberties which are, objectively, Adeeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition,'' [citing Glucksberg], and ' Aimplicit in the concept of ordered liberty,' such that Aneither liberty nor justice would exist if they were sacrificed.'' . . The next step depends for its nature upon the result of the first. If the asserted interest has been determined to be 'fundamental,' it is entitled in the second step to the protection of strict scrutiny judicial review of the challenged legislation. . . . If the interest is determined not to be 'fundamental,' it is entitled only to the protection of rational-basis judicial review. . . . [W]e are satisfied that whether the claim is analyzed under the Lewis or Glucksberg methodologies, it fails as a matter of law. . . . Specifically, we hold that the precise liberty interest asserted here − that of continuing in a state of freedom erroneously granted by government and enjoyed for a significant time by a convict who yet remains under an unexpired lawful sentence − cannot be found one of 'those fundamental rights and liberties which are objectively "deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition.'' . . . Nor, unless possibly when solely animated by a vindictive or oppressive purpose that is not suggested here, could the executive act of re-imprisoning under such circumstances be declared 'shock[ing to] the contemporary conscience.'").

See also Cherry Hill Towers, LLC v. Township of Cherry Hill, 407 F.Supp.2d 648, 655, 656 (D.N.J. 2006) ("Even if the Court accepts Plaintiff's statement of the facts as true, what happened here does not rise to the level of 'the kinds of gross misconduct that have shocked the judicial conscience.'. . Whether union officials unconnected to the Township attempted to persuade, or even threaten, the parties involved in the Cherry Hill Towers project to use union labor is not relevant to the question of whether these Defendants deprived Plaintiff of a property right in a manner that shocks the conscience. Nor is it surprising that a high-profile project such as this would attract the attention of the unions, or that Township officials would recognize this and point it out to Plaintiff. Defendants' actions do not reflect the egregious abuse of power that substantive due process was intended to correct."); Robinson v. Limerick Township, No. 04-3758, 005 WL 15469, at * (E.D. Pa. Jan. 4, 2005) (not reported) ("The Robinsons allege the Township has taken action motivated by bias, bad faith, and improper motives and intended to threaten, intimidate, and harass them. There are no allegations of self dealing, or unjust enrichment of the Township Supervisors or anyone related to them. . . Instead, the Robinsons argue that the Township's conduct is automatically conscience shocking due to its improper motive. I am unable to agree. . . . [T]he Robinsons must go considerably further than mere allegations that the Township's conduct was taken with an improper motive. . . . The latest jurisprudence of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals evinces a preference for evidence of self dealing or other unjust enrichment of the municipal decision makers as a way to meet the shocks the conscience standard."); Nicolette v. Caruso, Civil Action 02-1368, 2003 WL 23475027, at *9 (W.D. Pa. Nov. 4, 2003) ("The United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit specifically extended the Lewis 'shocks the conscience' test to cases alleging that a municipal land-use decision violated substantive due process. . . United Artists was decided in January, 2003 and there have not been many subsequent municipal land-use decisions applying the new 'shocks the conscience' standard. There, however, is at least one court which dealt with that standard. In Associates in Obstetrics & Gynecology v. Upper Merion Township, 270 F.Supp.2d 633, 656 (E.D .Pa.2003), the court held that the plaintiff stated a claim under section 1983 that met the 'shocks the conscience' standard by alleging that zoning regulations were enforced with the intent to harm and/or restrict the business interests of the plaintiff who was a lessee. . . . [T]he court finds that, albeit this is a close question, plaintiff's complaint implicated the 'shocks the conscience' test sufficiently to survive the motion to dismiss."). But see Kamaole Pointe Development LP v. Hokama, 2008 WL 2622819, at *21 (D. Hawai'i July 3, 2008) ("Plaintiffs are correct that County Defendants misapprehend the relevant standard for a due process challenge to legislation. This standard is not, as County Defendants urge, whether the legislation 'shocks the conscience.' As mentioned above, this standard applies in situations of allegedly abusive executive actions, such as police abuse cases. . . Rather, a substantive due process challenge to legislation that neither utilizes a suspect classification nor draws distinctions implicating fundamental rights is reviewed pursuant to the 'arbitrary and irrational' standard. Richardson v. City and County of Honolulu, 124 F.3d 1150, 1162 (9th Cir.1997). County Defendants' reliance on the incorrect standard as a basis for the Motion on Plaintiffs' substantive due process claim renders their argument legally unsound. As such, County Defendants' Motion is DENIED as to Plaintiffs' substantive due process claim.").

See also Williams v. Berney, 519 F.3d 1216, 1221, 1223-25 (10th Cir. 2008) ("Plaintiffs' case presents a narrow issue that has generated a surprising dearth of reported authority: whether a § 1983 plaintiff can successfully assert a substantive due process right to be free from intentional use of force by a state actor not authorized to use force. . . .The inquiry is thus in what circumstances will a physical assault transcend ordinary state tort law and rise to the level of a constitutional tort. . . . An assault − standing alone − does not suffice to make out a constitutional substantive due process claim. But an assault under a stated threat, a threat the victim knows an assaulting government official has the authority to carry out, can separate the ordinary common law tort from the substantive due process claim. The combination of serious physical abuse and the assaulting official's use of official authority to force the victim to submit can shock the conscience. . . . Combining these principles, the following legal framework emerges: to state a substantive due process claim against government officials not authorized to use force, litigants must show an abuse of governmental authority as an integral element of the attack.. . . .Berney was not authorized to use force, whether reasonably or not. Denver does not represent to licensees that its inspectors can lawfully use force against non-compliant business owners. . . . Berney, in other words, did not have discretion to use force. . . . His only responsibilities were to inspect and enforce dog kennel regulations. Based on the undisputed facts in this record, Berney's assault appeared to be an emotional overreaction made in anger. But nothing about Berney's position with the City or his duties as an inspector authorized him to use force − rather, he lost it on the job. While deplorable, this assault is not obviously distinguishable from an ordinary tort in myriad situations. It was not a situation where Plaintiffs' injuries were caused by an abuse of Berney's authority as a license inspector. And, as we have said, Berney's official position alone is not enough to create a substantive due process claim. As a result, we cannot conclude Berney's conduct violated Plaintiffs' constitutional rights.").

Lewis did not settle the question of who makes the determination of "conscience-shocking." See, e.g., Galaviz v. Reyes, 95 F.4th 246, 253 (5th Cir. 2024) ("The Supreme Court has applied a 'shock the conscience' standard to determine—as a question of law not fact—whether, for example, the Due Process Clause was violated in questioning a witness. . . and whether an officer's conduct during a high-speed chase violated the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of substantive due process and would therefore be actionable under § 1983. . . In those cases and other cases cited in those opinions, it appears that whether particular conduct occurred was a question of fact, but whether that conduct shocked the conscience was a question of law."); Terrell v. Larson, 396 F.3d 975, 981 (8th Cir. 2005) (en banc) ("Because the conscience-shocking standard is intended to limit substantive due process liability, it is an issue of law for the judge, not a question of fact for the jury."); Moran v. Clarke (Moran I), 296 F.3d 638, 643 (8th Cir. 2002) (en banc) ("[W]hether the plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence to support a claimed violation of a substantive due process right is a question for the fact-finder, here the jury."); Armstrong v. Squadrito, 152 F.3d 564, 577 (7th Cir. 1998) ("[T]he question of whether the defendants' conduct constituted deliberate indifference is a classic issue for the fact finder. We know that the submission of the issue to the fact finder may create some confusion because, technically, the question is the second consideration in our inquiry into the existence of a violation of substantive due process. Nevertheless, because this question is a factual mainstay of actions under § 1983, we do not believe it should receive consideration as a question of law. Any concern about allowing the fact finder to determine a constitutional question is ameliorated by the overlap between this inquiry and the third step in our analysis − an examination of the totality of the circumstances − which is a question of law."); Bovari v. Town of Saugus, 113 F.3d 4, 6 (1st Cir. 1997) ("Under Evans [v. Avery], the question is not whether the officers' decision to dog the Honda was sound − decisions of this sort always involve matters of degree − but, rather, whether a rational jury could say it was conscience-shocking."); CBS Outdoor Inc. v. New Jersey Transit Corp., 2007 WL 2509633, at *19 (D.N.J. 2007) ("At the outset, CBS Outdoor argues that whether the alleged conduct shocks the conscience should at least be a factual issue for a jury and therefore is inappropriate to resolve on a motion to dismiss. However, '[b]ecause the conscience-shocking standard is intended to limit substantive due process liability, it is an issue of law for the judge, not a question of fact for the jury.' Terrell v. Larson, 396 F.3d 975, 981 (8th Cir.2005); see also United States v. Engler, 806 F.2d 425, 430 (3d Cir.1986) ("The question whether government conduct was so outrageous as to constitute a violation of due process is a question of law to be determined by the court, not the jury.")"); Busch v. City of New York, No. 00 CV 5211(SJ), 2003 WL 22171896, at *6 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 11, 2003) (not reported) (whether conduct shocks the conscience is a question for jury); Johnson v. Freeburn, No. 96-74996, 2002 WL 1009572, at *4, *5 (E.D. Mich. April 24, 2002) (not reported) ("The concerns of Justices O'Connor, Scalia, and Thomas, suggest that the risks of unrestrained and unelected subjectivity − the antithesis of a rule of law − would be far greater if the nearly unreviewable personal sentiments of jurors are added to the mix in the application of this substantive due process standard. While courts have routinely submitted this standard to juries, see, e.g., Walker v. Bain, 257 F.3d 660, 671-73 (6th Cir.2001); United States v. Walsh, 194 F.3d 37 (2d Cir.1999); Boveri v. Town of Saugus, 113 F.3d 4, 6-7 (1st Cir.1997), much can be said that this should be accompanied by judicial guidance, if not preempted totally by judges once a jury has resolved all the material disputed issues of fact, as is often done in the qualified immunity area under [Harlow]. . . . It may be that the tradition of generally giving 'shocks the conscience' issues to the jury will continue notwithstanding many arguments against it. Nonetheless, on facts such as those in this case, a judge would have been warranted in directing the jury that after ruling for Plaintiff on the disputed factual questions (answered in jury question 1), the gratuitous threat or instruction to armed guards to have an inmate shot if he moves − given by a corrections officer who earlier that day threatened to have the inmate killed, and given for no legitimate penological purpose, but to retaliate against the inmate for reporting to authorities the correction officer's earlier threat on the inmate's life − does 'shock the conscience' as a matter of law."); Escatel v. Atherton, No. 96 C 8589, 2001 WL 755280, at *6 n. 14 (N.D. Ill. July 2, 2001) (not reported) ("The Supreme Court has not made clear whether the 'shocks the conscience' analysis is normally a question for the jury or whether it is a question of law for the court. . . The Seventh Circuit has said that it is a question of law. . . Other courts have indicated it is a decision for the court, not the jury, to decide."); Mason v. Stock, 955 F. Supp. 1293, 1308-09 (D. Kan. 1997) ("[T]he "shock the conscience" determination is not a jury question. . . . Under the rules pertaining to summary judgment, a plaintiff who wishes to assert a Collins' claim must, at minimum, point to conduct or policies which would require the court to make a 'conscience shocking' determination."); Mellott v. Heemer, 1997 WL 447844, *15 (M.D. Pa. July 23, 1997) (not reported) ("The question of whether conduct is 'truly conscience shocking' is one for the jury."), rev'd on other grounds, 161 F.3d 117 (3d Cir. 1998).

NOTE: See Thaddeus-X v. Blatter, 175 F.3d 378, 387, 388 (6th Cir. 1999) (en banc) ("In various instances since Graham, this circuit (mainly in unpublished opinions) has subjected prisoners claiming retaliation in violation of an enumerated constitutional right to a heightened requirement that the retaliatory act 'shock the conscience.' See McLaurin v. Cole, 115 F.3d 408, 411 (6th Cir.1997). . . . To the extent that our prior decisions have imposed the 'shocks the conscience' test when prisoners claim retaliation in violation of an enumerated constitutional right, they are in conflict with the Supreme Court's decisions in Graham and its progeny and are no longer the law of this Circuit.").

12. Note on Torres v. Madrid and What Constitutes a Seizure

The Court recently addressed the question of "whether a seizure occurs when an officer shoots someone who temporarily eludes capture after the shooting."

Torres v. Madrid, 141 S. Ct. 989, 993-1003 (2021) ("The question in this case is whether a seizure occurs when an officer shoots someone who temporarily eludes capture after the shooting. The answer is yes: The application of physical force to the body of a person with intent to restrain is a seizure, even if the force does not succeed in subduing the person. . . . We stress, however, that the application of the common law rule does not transform every physical contact between a government employee and a member of the public into a Fourth Amendment seizure. A seizure requires the use of force with intent to restrain. Accidental force will not qualify. See County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U. S. 833, 844 (1998). Nor will force intentionally applied for some other purpose satisfy this rule. In this opinion, we consider only force used to apprehend. We do not accept the dissent's invitation to opine on matters not presented here—pepper spray, flash-bang grenades, lasers, and more. . . Moreover, the appropriate inquiry is whether the challenged conduct objectively manifests an intent to restrain, for we rarely probe the subjective motivations of police officers in the Fourth Amendment context. [citing Nieves v. Bartlett] . . . While a mere touch can be enough for a seizure, the amount of force remains pertinent in assessing the objective intent to restrain. A tap on the shoulder to get one's attention will rarely exhibit such an intent. Nor does the seizure depend on the subjective perceptions of the seized person. Here, for example, Torres claims to have perceived the officers' actions as an attempted carjacking. But the conduct of the officers—ordering Torres to stop and then shooting to restrain her movement—satisfies the objective test for a seizure, regardless whether Torres comprehended the governmental character of their actions. The rule we announce today is narrow. In addition to the requirement of intent to restrain, a seizure by force—absent submission—lasts only as long as the application of force. That is to say that the Fourth Amendment does not recognize any 'continuing arrest during the period of fugitivity.'. . The fleeting nature of some seizures by force undoubtedly may inform what damages a civil plaintiff may recover, and what evidence a criminal defendant may exclude from trial. . . But brief seizures are seizures all the same. Applying these principles to the facts viewed in the light most favorable to Torres, the officers' shooting applied physical force to her body and objectively manifested an intent to restrain her from driving away. We therefore conclude that the officers seized Torres for the instant that the bullets struck her. . . .The officers and the dissent derive from our cases a different touchstone for the seizure of a person: 'an intentional acquisition of physical control.' Brower v. County of Inyo, 489 U. S. 593, 596 (1989). Under their alternative rule, the use of force becomes a seizure 'only when there is a governmental termination of freedom of movement through means intentionally applied.'. .This approach improperly erases the distinction between seizures by control and seizures by force. In all fairness, we too have not always been attentive to this distinction when a case did not implicate the issue. . . But each type of seizure enjoys a separate common law pedigree that gives rise to a separate rule. . . Unlike a seizure by force, a seizure by acquisition of control involves either voluntary submission to a show of authority or the termination of freedom of movement. A prime example of the latter comes from Brower, where the police seized a driver when he crashed into their roadblock. . . Under the common law rules of arrest, actual control is a necessary element for this type of seizure. . . Such a seizure requires that 'a person be stopped by the very instrumentality set in motion or put in place in order to achieve that result.'. . But that requirement of control or submission never extended to seizures by force. . . As common law courts recognized, any such requirement of control would be difficult to apply in cases involving the application of force. . . At the most basic level, it will often be unclear when an officer succeeds in gaining control over a struggling suspect. Courts will puzzle over whether an officer exercises control when he grabs a suspect, when he tackles him, or only when he slaps on the cuffs. Neither the officers nor the dissent explains how long the control must be maintained—only for a moment, into the squad car, or all the way to the station house. To cite another example, counsel for the officers speculated that the shooting would have been a seizure if Torres stopped 'maybe 50 feet' or 'half a block' from the scene of the shooting to allow the officers to promptly acquire control. . . None of this squares with our recognition that ' "[a] seizure is a single act, and not a continuous fact."'. . For centuries, the common law rule has avoided such line-drawing problems by clearly fixing the moment of the seizure. . . . We hold that the application of physical force to the body of a person with intent to restrain is a seizure even if the person does not submit and is not subdued. Of course, a seizure is just the first step in the analysis. The Fourth Amendment does not forbid all or even most seizures—only unreasonable ones. All we decide today is that the officers seized Torres by shooting her with intent to restrain her movement. We leave open on remand any questions regarding the reasonableness of the seizure, the damages caused by the seizure, and the officers' entitlement to qualified immunity. The judgment of the Court of Appeals is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.").

Torres v. Madrid, 141 S. Ct. 989, 1003-17 (2021) (Gorsuch, J., with whom Thomas, J. and Alito, J., join, dissenting) ("The majority holds that a criminal suspect can be simultaneously seized and roaming at large. On the majority's account, a Fourth Amendment 'seizure' takes place whenever an officer 'merely touches' a suspect. It's a seizure even if the suspect refuses to stop, evades capture, and rides off into the sunset never to be seen again. That view is as mistaken as it is novel. . . . Imagine that, with an objective intent to detain a suspect, officers deploy pepper spray that enters a suspect's lungs as he sprints away. Does the application of the pepper spray count? Suppose that, intending to capture a fleeing suspect, officers detonate flash-bang grenades that are so loud they damage the suspect's eardrum, even though he manages to run off. Or imagine an officer shines a laser into a suspect's eyes to get him to stop, but the suspect is able to drive away with now-damaged retinas. Are these 'touchings'? What about an officer's bullet that shatters the driver's windshield, a piece of which cuts her as she speeds away? Maybe the officer didn't touch the suspect, but he set in motion a series of events that yielded a touching. Does that count? While assuring us that its new rule will prove easy to administer, the majority refuses to confront its certain complications. Lower courts and law enforcement won't have that luxury. If efficiency cannot explain today's decision, what's left? Maybe it is an impulse that individuals like Ms. Torres should be able to sue for damages. Sometimes police shootings are justified, but other times they cry out for a remedy. The majority seems to give voice to this sentiment when it disparages the traditional possession rule as 'artificial' and promotes its alternative as more sensitive to 'personal security' and 'new' policing realities. . . It takes pains to explain, too, that its new rule will provide greater protection for personal 'privacy' interests, which we're told make up the 'essence' of the Fourth Amendment. . . But tasked only with applying the Constitution's terms, we have no authority to posit penumbras of 'privacy' and 'personal security' and devise whatever rules we think might best serve the Amendment's 'essence.' The Fourth Amendment allows this Court to protect against specific governmental actions—unreasonable searches and seizures of persons, houses, papers, and effects—and that is the limit of our license. Besides, it's hard to see why we should stretch to invent a new remedy here. Ms. Torres had ready-made claims for assault and battery under New Mexico law to test the officers' actions. . . The only reason this case comes before us under § 1983 and the Fourth Amendment rather than before a New Mexico court under state tort law seems to be that Ms. Torres (or her lawyers) missed the State's two-year statutory filing deadline. . . That may be a misfortune for her, but it is hardly a reason to upend a 230 year-old understanding of our Constitution. Nor, if we are honest, does today's decision promise much help to anyone else. Like Ms. Torres, many seeking to sue officers will be able to bring state tort claims. Even for those whose only recourse is a federal lawsuit, the majority's new rule seems likely to accomplish little. This Court has already said that a remedy lies under § 1983 and the Fourteenth Amendment for police conduct that 'shocks the conscience.'. . At the same time, qualified immunity poses a daunting hurdle for those seeking to recover for less egregious police behavior. In our own case, Ms. Torres has yet to clear that bar and still faces it on remand. So, at the end of it all, the majority's new rule will help only those who (1) lack a state-law remedy, (2) evade custody, (3) after some physical contact by the police, (4) where the contact was sufficient to show an objective intent to restrain, (5) and where the police acted 'unreasonably' in light of clearly established law, (6) but the police conduct was not 'conscience shocking.' With qualification heaped on qualification, that can describe only a vanishingly small number of cases. Even if its holding offers little practical assistance to anyone, perhaps the majority at least hopes to be seen as trying to vindicate 'personal security' and the 'essence' of 'privacy' when it derides the traditional possession rule as 'artificial.' But an attractive narrative cannot obscure the hard truth. Not only does the majority's 'mere touch' rule allow a new cause of action in exceedingly few cases (non-conscience-shocking-but-still-unreasonable batteries intended to result in possession that don't achieve it). It supplies no path to relief for otherwise identical near-misses (assaults). A fleeing suspect briefly touched by pursuing officers may have a claim. But a suspect who evades a hail of bullets unscathed, or one who endures a series of flash-bang grenades untouched, is out of luck. That distinction is no less 'artificial' than the one the law has recognized for centuries. And the majority's new rule promises such scarce relief that it can hardly claim more sensitivity to 'personal security' than the rule the Constitution has long enshrined. In the face of these concerns, the majority replies by denying their relevance. It says there is 'no call' to 'surmise' that its decision rests on anything beyond an 'analysis of the common law of arrest.'. . But there is no surmise about it. The majority itself tells us that its decision is also justified by the need to 'avoi[d] ... line-drawing problems,' protect 'personal security,' and advance the 'privacy' interests that form the 'essence' of the Fourth Amendment. Having invoked these sundry considerations, it's hard to see how the majority might disown them.").

Post-Torres Cases

D.C. CIRCUIT

Asinor v. District of Columbia, 111 F.4th 1249, 1252, 1254-59 (D.C. Cir. 2024) ("All agree that the MPD's arrest of the plaintiffs was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. And it is blackletter law that, during an arrest, police may seize personal property held by the arrestee without a warrant. . . So the District's initial seizure of the plaintiffs' effects did not violate the Fourth Amendment. The question before us is whether the Fourth Amendment has anything to say about the many months in which the MPD allegedly continued to hold the plaintiffs' effects with no legitimate investigatory or protective purpose. The District answers no. It contends that the Fourth Amendment governs the government's taking of possession of an individual's personal property, but not the government's continued possession of the property. We disagree. When the government seizes property incident to a lawful arrest, the Fourth Amendment requires that any continued possession of the property must be reasonable. We reach this conclusion based on the Fourth Amendment's text and history, as well as modern Supreme Court precedents regarding the constitutionally permissible duration of seizures, whether of property or persons. . . . [T]he common law recognized that property interests are impaired not only at the instant when an owner loses possession, but also for as long as the owner cannot get the property back. And it provided remedies for wrongful interference with possessory rights regardless of whether the interference became wrongful at the moment of the initial seizure or only later. This history indicates that the Fourth Amendment governs the MPD's continued retention, as well as its taking possession, of the plaintiffs' property. . . . The MPD's initial seizure of the plaintiffs' effects was lawful because it was incident to their arrests. Such seizures are reasonable to protect the safety of arresting officers and to prevent any destruction of evidence. . . But here, the plaintiffs allege that the government continued to possess their property for many months after it lacked any legitimate interest in protecting officers or investigating possible criminal behavior. And after the government's legitimate interests dissipated, harm to the plaintiffs continued to accrue: It is one thing not to have access to a cell phone while spending a night in jail. It is quite another not to have access to it for the following year. Some plaintiffs allege that they had to replace their phones, a significant financial harm. And some allege that they lost access to important information like passwords, photographs, and contact information for friends and family. So the plaintiffs have alleged that the seizures at issue, though lawful at their inception, later came to unreasonably interfere with their protected possessory interests in their own property. . . . In Manuel v. City of Joliet, . . . the Supreme Court held that after a person is arrested, the Fourth Amendment requires any pretrial detention to remain reasonable even after the commencement of formal legal process. . . The Court explained that the continued detention of an individual is an ongoing 'seizure'. . . . The same logic applies here. The plaintiffs allege that MPD retained—which is to say, 'seized'—their property for over eight months after their arrests. And they allege that this continued seizure was unreasonable because it served no legitimate investigatory or protective purpose. By its terms, the Fourth Amendment prohibits unreasonable seizures of 'persons, houses, papers, and effects,' which suggests that the four listed terms receive analogous protection. Neither text, grammar, nor history suggest that seizures are ongoing events when directed at 'persons' but mere snapshots when directed at 'houses, papers, and effects.' Likewise, this Court has held that the Fourth Amendment requires officers to release an arrestee from custody—that is, to end their seizure of a person—if new facts dissipate the probable cause that justified a warrantless arrest. . . This principle also covers the claims here. If the rationales that justified the initial retention of the plaintiffs' effects dissipated, and if no new justification for retaining the effects arose, then the Fourth Amendment obliged the MPD to return the plaintiffs' effects. The District counters that Torres v. Madrid. . . distinguishes seizures of persons and effects. True enough, Torres did hold that a person, but not an effect, is 'seized' if shot by a government official. . . This distinction was based on the 'unremarkable proposition that the nature of a seizure can depend on the nature of the object being seized.'. . The proposition mattered because the seizure of a person implicates the common law of arrest, while the seizure of an effect does not. . . But while Torres thus explained why people and effects are different in the specific context of a shooting, the District offers no good reason why people and effects are different with respect to ongoing seizures in general. . . . More narrowly, the District argues that governments must apply continuing force to seized persons, who would often wish to flee, which is why Manuel recognized the need for ongoing reasonableness of the detention. In contrast, the District argues, there is no continuing application of force against an inanimate object, and thus no need for its prolonged retention to be reasonable. This argument misses the point. Of course, the government does not use force against a cell phone, just as it does not infringe upon the property interests of a cell phone. But it infringes upon a person's possessory property interests in a cell phone. And whether the government infringes upon a liberty or property interest, it hopes to avoid using force, but will do so if necessary. An arrested individual will be subjected to force if he tries to walk out of his jail cell. But so too will a cell phone owner who tries to walk into police headquarters to remove the phone from an evidence locker. In both instances, the government is prepared to use force to prolong an ongoing deprivation of liberty or property. If the Fourth Amendment addresses the former, we see no reason why it does not also address the latter. . . . Hodari D. and Torres show that the government 'takes possession' of a person or object at a single moment in time. The other cases show that, once the government has taken possession of a person or object, its conduct must remain reasonable over time. At both the moment of seizure and throughout its duration, the government's conduct must be reasonable—consistent with both founding-era meanings of the word 'seizure.'. . . The District acknowledges a constitutional obligation to return the plaintiffs' property, but it locates the duty in the Fifth Amendment's guarantee that no person shall be 'deprived of ... property, without due process of law.'. . In other words, because the Fifth Amendment protects the plaintiffs' ongoing possessory interests, the Fourth Amendment does not. But constitutional provisions do not preempt one another like that. Indeed, the Supreme Court has already rejected the argument that the Fourth Amendment does not apply to interferences with property rights just because the Fifth Amendment does. Soldal v. Cook County, 506 U.S. 56, 70–71, 113 S.Ct. 538, 121 L.Ed.2d 450 (1992). . . So, the question whether this case implicates procedural due process, substantive due process, or the Takings Clause is irrelevant to the question whether it also implicates the Fourth Amendment. Even if we had to pick between constitutional provisions, we do not share the District's confidence that the Fifth Amendment fits the plaintiffs' claims better than the Fourth. The District argues that a hearing under D.C. Criminal Rule 41(g)—which allows a 'person aggrieved' by a property deprivation to 'move for the property's return'—affords constitutionally sufficient process for the adjudication of the plaintiffs' claims. But even if a hearing under Rule 41(g) provides adequate process, the question remains what substantive law would require the District to return property held without justification. We are reluctant to reduce this entirely to a question of D.C. law, which would eliminate substantive constitutional protection for the property rights at issue. As for other portions of the Fifth Amendment, it is unclear whether the government's continued retention of lawfully seized property would constitute an unconstitutional taking. . . . An argument that we need not consider the Fourth Amendment because of substantive due process thus gets things backward; instead, we need not consider substantive due process because of the Fourth Amendment.")

Asinor v. District of Columbia, 111 F.4th 1249, 1261, 1264 n.4 (D.C. Cir. 2024) (Henderson, J., concurring) ("I join the majority opinion in full. The Fourth Amendment's protections do not cease once the government takes possession of an individual's property. I write separately to explain why I believe we correctly part ways with many of our sister circuits. Five circuits — the First, Second, Sixth, Seventh and Eleventh — have held in precedential opinions that the Fourth Amendment does not support a claim for the government's retention of legally seized property. [collecting cases] Granted, we should hesitate before rejecting a robust consensus from our sister circuits but here, I believe, their reasoning lacks the power to persuade because they fail to discuss the key Supreme Court precedent, United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109, 104 S.Ct. 1652, 80 L.Ed.2d 85 (1984). . . . As my colleagues note, . . . the Supreme Court's more recent decision in Manuel v. City of Joliet. . . lends further support to our conclusion. There, the Court held that the Fourth Amendment applies throughout the duration of a person's pretrial detention. . . Under the most natural reading of the Fourth Amendment, we should give analogous protection against the seizure of 'persons' and 'effects,' at least absent a well-defined historical tradition to the contrary. See Torres v. Madrid, 592 U.S. 306, 324, 141 S.Ct. 989, 209 L.Ed.2d 190 (2021). To me, Manuel suggests as a corollary that Fourth Amendment protections for property endure over time, too.")

Fischer v. District of Columbia, No. 24-CV-00044 (CRC), 2025 WL 894445, at *11 (D.D.C. Mar. 24, 2025) ("Fischer alleges a Fourth Amendment violation because the officers' '[i]ndiscriminate[ ] shooting' of 'munitions into a crowd' was an unreasonable use of force. . . A Fourth Amendment seizure 'requires the use of force with intent to restrain.'. . . Here, however, Fischer is explicit that the MPD officers deployed force 'with no intent to arrest.'. . Instead, he contends, 'the intent of the police was certainly to disburse [sic] the crowd.' This concession is fatal to Fischer's Fourth Amendment claim: The MPD officers' use of force for this 'other purpose' of dispersing the crowd does not qualify as a seizure. Because Fischer has not alleged a Fourth Amendment seizure, his claim cannot proceed. Again, however, even if the complaint could be construed to state such a claim, given the 'unprecedented' circumstances surrounding the violent encroachment of the U.S. Capitol, Fischer has not demonstrated that 'every "reasonable official"' would have understood the MPD officers' conduct to violate the Fourth Amendment. . . Accordingly, they are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Goodwin v. District of Columbia, No. CV 21-806 (BAH), 2025 WL 637467, at *10 (D.D.C. Feb. 27, 2025) ("This use of pepper spray against these plaintiffs, who each testified about feeling the ill effects of the spray, was a direct 'application of physical force to the body' of the individuals directly sprayed 'with intent to restrain' their movements and therefore constitutes a seizure. . . The circumstances further demonstrate an objective intent to restrain these individuals, since the decision to close the kettle on Swann Street was made to effectuate arrests, rather than disperse the group, . . . and Commander Glover had already stated that members of the encircled group were not free to leave, because they were "under arrest[.]". . Indeed, defendant Crisman testified about his personal intent to restrain the protesters by using pepper spray, though he stated that he was trying to 'stop two individuals from going up the stairs' into Mr. Dubey's home and deployed the pepper spray because he felt he 'had to stop them somehow.'. . Whatever the specific focus for defendant Crisman's use of the pepper spray, in examining whether an officer had an intent to restrain for the purposes of determining whether a Fourth Amendment seizure occurred, 'the appropriate inquiry is whether the challenged conduct objectively manifests an intent to restrain,' and courts 'rarely probe the subjective motivations of police officers in the Fourth Amendment context.'")

Ferris v. District of Columbia, No. 1:23-CV-481-RCL, 2023 WL 8697854, at *8–11 (D.D.C. Dec. 15, 2023) ("The Plaintiffs have failed to allege that the Individual Defendants possessed a prerequisite for a seizure, and thus excessive force: the intent to restrain. For that reason, they have not alleged a violation of the Fourth Amendment. And even if Plaintiffs have alleged a violation, they have failed to allege a violation of a clearly established right, meaning the Individual Defendants would be entitled to qualified immunity. . . Plaintiffs argue that the Individual Defendants violated their Fourth Amendment rights because their use of less lethal munitions constituted an unreasonable seizure and excessive force. . . Defendants contend that the Plaintiffs have failed to plausibly allege a seizure or unreasonable force. . . Defendants also argue Plaintiffs cannot overcome qualified immunity because there was no violation of the Plaintiffs' clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. . . Defendants have the better argument. . . . Plaintiffs allege a seizure by physical force, not show of authority. . . This sort of seizure 'requires the use of force with intent to restrain.' Torres v. Madrid, 141 S. Ct. 989, 998 (2021). The intent to restrain is indispensable: 'force intentionally applied for some other purpose' is no seizure. . . In considering whether an officer had an intent to restrain, a court does not examine 'the subjective motivations of police officers' or the 'subjective perceptions of the seized person.'. . '[T]he appropriate inquiry is' instead 'whether the challenged conduct objectively manifests an intent to restrain.'. . The fatal flaw in the Amended Complaint is its failure to allege that the Individual Defendants acted with the 'intent to restrain' required by Torres. On the facts alleged by Plaintiff, the conduct of the MPD officers does not 'objectively manifest[ ] an intent to restrain.'. . Plaintiffs state that one purpose for the officers' deployment of less lethal munitions 'was to incapacitate those struck to facilitate custodial false arrest.'. . But Plaintiffs have failed to plausibly establish this purpose for two reasons. First, the assertion that the officers sought to incapacitate protestors is simply not supported by the facts alleged, and 'the Court need not accept inferences or conclusory allegations that are unsupported by the facts set forth in the complaint.'. . Actually, Plaintiffs' facts suggest the opposite: if the officers really had this purpose, surely the use of less lethal munitions would have been followed by large-scale arrests of protestors. But Plaintiffs allege only two actual or attempted arrests after only one of the four incidents. . . Second, there is an 'obvious alternative explanation,'. . . for the Defendants' conduct: that because of their animus toward the protestors, the officers sought to disperse, rather than restrain, the protestors. Indeed, Plaintiffs describe MPD as forcing protestors to leave particular areas, not remain there. . . Another obvious alternative explanation in the Amended Complaint is that '[a] purpose' of the officers' use of force was to 'retaliate, chill the message, and deter further protests through infliction of pain.'. . In light of these alternative explanations, Plaintiffs' factually unadorned assertion about the officer's purpose of restraining protestors does not establish a claim for unreasonable seizure. Looking past Plaintiffs' conclusory allegation of an intent to restrain, neither of the two factually grounded purposes attributed to the police evidences an intent to restrain. Intent to retaliate is obviously different. The harder question is whether intent to disperse counts as intent to restrain. Torres considered 'only force used to apprehend' and declined 'to opine on matters not presented here—pepper spray, flash-bang grenades, lasers, and more.'. . That decision therefore 'did not address whether force used only to compel departure from an area constitutes a seizure.' Dundon v. Kirchmeier, 85 F.4th 1250, 1256 (8th Cir. 2023). Before Torres, several circuits indicated that the Fourth Amendment does reach forceful dispersal. See Bennett v. City of Eastpointe, 410 F.3d 810, 834 (6th Cir. 2005) ("Fourth Amendment jurisprudence suggests a person is seized ... when a reasonable person would not feel free to remain somewhere, by virtue of some official action."); Nelson v. City of Davis, 685 F.3d 867, 873, 877–78 (9th Cir. 2012) (finding a seizure when police officer shot plaintiff in the eye with a pepperball projectile as part of an effort to disperse a crowd). Since Torres's gloss that seizure requires intent to restrain, several courts have considered whether police have an intent to restrain when they use force to block or disperse but not apprehend an individual. The only courts in this district to have considered the question have concluded that force used to block or redirect a person does not constitute a seizure under Torres. . . .This Court agrees with the other courts in this district that an intent to 'keep out or to redirect,'. .is different from an intent to restrain. One might argue that the police 'restrain' people when they use force to limit their freedom of movement. But distinguishing an intent to disperse from an intent to restrain gives effect to the Torres Court's understanding of the Fourth Amendment as historically focusing on arrests. The Supreme Court explained that '[t]he "seizure" of a "person" plainly refers to an arrest' and this 'linkage existed at the founding.'. . .To be sure, a seizure can occur without an arrest. But keeping a person in place remains essential. . . . Taking Plaintiffs' facts as true, the circumstances objectively demonstrate officers intended to expel protestors from particular areas, not restrain them. Since Plaintiffs have failed to adequately allege that the Individual Defendants possessed an intent to restrain, they have failed to allege a Fourth Amendment seizure.")

Black Lives Matter D.C. v. Trump, 544 F.Supp.3d 15, 48-49 (D.D.C. 2021) ("The plaintiffs also bring Fourth Amendment claims against the D.C. and Arlington defendants for unreasonable seizures conducted with excessive force. The plaintiffs have not, however, pointed to a violation of any clearly established Fourth Amendment right that can overcome the defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity. Taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the officers attacked and improperly dispersed the protesters—they did not restrain them or attempt to seize them in place. . . Indeed, quite the opposite was true—the officers attempted to cause the protestors and fleeing crowd to leave their location, rather than cause them to remain there. . . And the plaintiffs allege that they all did in fact leave Lafayette Square. . . These alleged facts lie in stark contrast to the Supreme Court's recent holding that 'the application of physical force to the body of a person with intent to restrain is a seizure even if the person does not submit and is not subdued.' Torres v. Madrid, 141 S. Ct. 989, 1003 (2021) (emphasis added). One could make the argument that, although the plaintiffs were not physically restrained, their freedom of movement was restrained because the defendants sought to route them in certain directions. But even assuming that the plaintiffs were seized by being forced to leave Lafayette Square, the plaintiffs have not pointed to a case clearly establishing that attempting to move members of a crowd (rather than keep them in a location) can constitute a seizure. And where assessing qualified immunity in the context of the Fourth Amendment, the Supreme Court has repeatedly 'stressed the need to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances ... was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.'. .In an effort to ground their claim in relevant precedent, the plaintiffs point out that 'Supreme Court and Circuit precedent hold[s] that even a momentary limitation of a person's freedom of movement is a seizure if it results from means intentionally applied.'. . But this frames the issue at far too high a level of generality, which the Supreme Court has repeatedly instructed against. . . The relevant question is not whether a momentary use of force can constitute a seizure—of course, it can—but whether the use of tear gas to move members of a crowd can constitute a seizure. Because the plaintiffs have pointed to no case clearly establishing an answer to that question, the defendant officials are entitled to qualified immunity.")

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Thompson on behalf of the Estate of White v. Badgujar, No. 20-CV-1272-PWG, 2021 WL 3472130, at *5 (D. Md. Aug. 6, 2021) ("A review of Fourth Amendment precedent. . . makes clear that Mr. White was not seized for purposes of a Fourth Amendment violation until Officer Badgujar shot Mr. White. That Officer Badgujar employed a show of authority does not alone give rise to Fourth Amendment protections. . . . Seizure requires submission 'to that show of authority.'. . And, critically, 'without actual submission to the police, there is at most an attempted seizure, which is not subject to Fourth Amendment protection.'. . Under this framework, the complaint fails to allege a critical component of its Fourth Amendment causes of action prior to the shooting—that Mr. White submitted to Officer Badgujar. The complaint and video show just the opposite. . . .Therefore, under the binding precedents cited above, I must find that the Fourth Amendment is not implicated at the time Plaintiffs allege the violation started, and that the Plaintiffs have failed to state a cause of action in Count 1 for an illegal Fourth Amendment seizure prior to the time of the shooting.");

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Vardeman v. City of Houston, 55 F.4th1045, 1052 (5th Cir. 2022) ("The allegations that Simpson punched Vardeman in the face so hard that he fell to the ground, and then Simpson hovered over him for a time in a menacing manner, would, if supported by evidence, allow jurors to find that for some period of time at least, a reasonable person would not believe he was free to leave. The Supreme Court has not required a finding that the officer intended to arrest the person, only that an objective person would perceive that at least briefly, there was no freedom to go. Torres, 141 S. Ct. at 998–99. Though the earlier alleged profane insistence by the officer was for Vardeman to move his vehicle, we see a fact dispute as to whether the encounter had become something of longer duration and for a different purpose, such as at least for being issued a ticket. Respectfully, we conclude the district court erred in holding the complaint did not set out sufficient facts for a claim of excessive force in making a seizure.")

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Kilnapp v. City of Cleveland, Ohio, No. 22-4059, 2023 WL 4678994 (6th Cir. July 21, 2023) (not reported) ("In this case, there is no doubt that the law is clearly established. '[D]eadly force is a seizure subject to the reasonableness requirement of the Fourth Amendment,'. . . and the individual injured need not be the intended target of the force to be seized[.] . . Gannon applied deadly force with the intent to seize Borden. Kilnapp was shot instead. Although Kilnapp was not the intended target, she was still seized under the Fourth Amendment. Further, viewed in that light most favorable to Kilnapp, Gannon acted unreasonably by blindly deploying a firearm over his head when no suspect posed a threat to him. The law is sufficiently clear, that in this case, based on the facts alleged in the complaint, 'every reasonable official would have understood' that Gannon's actions violated Kilnapp's Fourth Amendment rights. . . Therefore, Gannon is not entitled to a judgment as a matter of law. Accordingly, this Court affirms the district court's decision to allow Kilnapp's excessive force claims against Gannon to proceed to discovery.")

Campbell v. Cheatham County Sheriff's Dep't, 47 F.4th 468, 476-79 (6th Cir. 2022), cert. denied sub nom Fox v. Campbell, 144 S. Ct. 70 (2023) ("The parties do not dispute that Fox showed authority by firing eight shots into the Campbells' home, but Fox contends that the Campbells did not submit to this show of authority, and thus were not seized. What constitutes a submission to a show of authority or a termination of freedom of movement? If an officer rams a suspect's car off the road or locks a suspect in a room, the officer has terminated the suspect's freedom of movement and seized the suspect under the Fourth Amendment. . . Alternatively, if an officer orders an individual to stop but the individual continues running away, then there has been no seizure, because there has been no submission to authority or termination of movement. . . As the Supreme Court has recognized, 'when an individual's submission to a show of governmental authority takes the form of passive acquiescence, there needs to be some test for telling when a seizure occurs in response to authority, and when it does not.'. . The Court explained that 'a seizure occurs if "in view of all of the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave."'. . . In view of all the circumstances here, a reasonable person would not believe that he or she was free to leave a house while an officer repeatedly fired at the front door. . . . In this case, when Fox fired immediately and repeatedly upon Mark opening the door, Fox terminated the Campbells' movement and 'a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave.'. . Therefore, the Campbells were seized within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. . . . It also makes no difference whether Fox knew Sherrie was also inside the home. We have explained that when an officer seizes one person by shooting at a car, for example, the officer seizes everyone in the car, even if the officer is unaware of the presence of passengers. . . The same logic extends to the home: just as shooting at a car and causing it to stop terminates the freedom of movement of everyone in the car, so does shooting into a house in a manner that prevents occupants from leaving constitutes a seizure of the occupants. By shooting at the house, Fox seized everyone inside, including Sherrie. . . .By firing at the Campbells' home, Fox made a show of authority. This show of authority restricted the Campbells' movement such that a reasonable person, under these circumstances, would not feel free to leave. . . Therefore, Fox seized the Campbells under the Fourth Amendment.")

Hopkins v. Nichols, 37 F.4th 1110, 1117 (6th Cir. 2022) ("Mendenhall and Saari establish that words that compel compliance with the officer's orders to exit a house constitute a seizure. Thus, when taking the facts in the light most favorable to the Hopkinses, Nichols's commands to Mrs. Hopkins may have amounted to a clearly established constitutional violation. For those reasons, we conclude that the district court properly denied qualified immunity to defendants for the alleged seizure of Mrs. Hopkins.")

Treadway v. City of Columbus., No. 2:22-CV-2287, 2025 WL 689317, at *8 n.2 , *9-11 (S.D. Ohio Mar. 4, 2025) ("This Court previously examined whether officers seized protestors under the Fourth Amendment when officers used chemical agents, less-lethal projectiles such as wooden knockers, and physical force. Alsaada v. City of Columbus, 536 F. Supp. 3d 216, 263 (S.D. Ohio 2021). This Court noted that the dispositive question is one of control: Did the police control Plaintiffs' and protestors' movement through the use of force intentionally applied? . . The case sub judice involves the use of chemical agents during one of the protests reviewed in Alsada. Treadway does not argue that the use of the chemical agents was excessive, nor does he argue that he was seized based on the use of the chemical agents. As such, this Court will address the removal of the gas mask and the arrest as the alleged seizures. . . . The facts and inferences here indicate that officers sprayed chemical agents towards Plaintiff during the protest. . . Plaintiff raised his middle finger at the officers, and Ramsey subsequently approached Plaintiff from behind, grabbed Plaintiff by the shoulder, and removed Plaintiff's mask strapped to Plaintiff's head. . . Plaintiff alleges these events occurred as he was attempting to comply with officer orders to leave the area where officers were spraying chemical agents. . . That Plaintiff had a 'violent reaction to Ramsey' has no bearing on whether Ramsey objectively manifests an intent to restrain. . . Force 'with intent to restrain is a seizure, even if the force does not succeed in subduing the person.'. .Further, Ramsey's conduct of removing the gas mask is not as simple as lifting up Plaintiff's gas mask but includes grabbing Plaintiff's shoulder from behind as Ramsey removed the gas mask strapped to Plaintiff's head. . . Defendant's argument regarding Plaintiff's freedom of movement seems to be limited to before and after Ramsey lifted the gas mask. . . What about while the gas mask was being lifted? This Court finds there is sufficient evidence favoring Plaintiff's assertion that the removal of the gas mask was a seizure. Ramsey's conduct of grabbing Plaintiff's shoulder and removing the gas mask viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, manifests an intent to restrain Plaintiff. . . . Ramsey intentionally grabbed Plaintiff by the shoulder as Ramsey removed the mask strapped to Plaintiff's head. . . This grab is more than the 'tap on the shoulder to get one's attention' which would 'rarely exhibit' an intent to restrain. . . Ramsey grabbed Plaintiff's shoulder while pulling up the mask with an intent at least to restrain Plaintiff long enough to remove the mask strapped to Plaintiff's head. . . . There is sufficient evidence favoring Plaintiff's assertion that the removal of the gas mask was a seizure. Even so, this is just the first step of this Court's Fourth Amendment claim analysis. The seizure must be unreasonable to violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . Because of the sufficient evidence to support that Plaintiff was complying with orders to disperse, this Court finds Ramsey's conduct of removing the mask was not objectively reasonable when viewing evidence in light favorable to Plaintiff.") Alsaada v. City of Columbus, 536 F.Supp.3d 216, ___ (S.D. Ohio 2021) ("Whether a constitutionally cognizable seizure by control can occur in protest scenarios is a murkier landscape. The question before this Court is: Was there a seizure by control when the police used less-lethal force, including pepper spray, tear gas, and physical force, to disperse— rather than detain— activists, protestors, and congregants? Some courts answer this question in the affirmative and others in the negative. Others do not answer it at all and instead assume the Fourth Amendment applies. But there is a body of authority suggesting that the use of a chemical agent or other less-lethal crowd control tactics over a demonstrating crowd constitutes a seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. This Court finds three cases persuasive. [Court discusses Marbet v. City of Portland, No. CV 02-1448-HA, 2003 WL 23540258, at *10 (D. Or. Sept. 8, 2003), Jennings v. City of Miami, No. 07-23008-CIV, 2009 WL 413110, at *8 (S.D. Fla. Jan. 27, 2009) and Downes-Covington v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Department, No. 220CV01790, 2020 WL 7408725, at *10 (D. Nev., Dec. 17, 2020)] As analyzed below, in the cases, the courts considered similar facts and reasoned that officers' use of chemical irritants and physical force could amount to a constitutionally redressable seizure. . . .Thus, a constitutionally redressable seizure can occur where officers use physical force to prevent protestors from coming any closer, such as by herding protestors, forming a skirmish line, or failing to provide a means of egress— where such governmental action is intentional and results in the termination of freedom of movement. . . This Court now asks whether the type of force used—chemical agents, less-lethal projectiles such as wooden knockers, and physical force—militates in favor of finding that a seizure occurred. The dispositive question is one of control: Did the police control Plaintiffs' and protestors' movement through the use of force intentionally applied? . . . Relevant factors that weigh in favor of a finding of a seizure of a person include the officer's tone of voice, whether the officer displayed a weapon or handcuffs, wore a uniform, touched the individual without permission, or threatened or physically intimidated him. . . Plaintiffs allege that throughout last summer's protests, they were peacefully observing, providing medical aid, or protesting when Defendants, often clad in riot gear, exercised an indiscriminate use of chemical irritants, physical force, and other weapons. Given that the standard for injunctive relief is a likelihood of success, the Court finds that the evidence and testimony from last year's protests—explored summarily—suggest that Plaintiffs have met their burden as to the elements of a Fourth Amendment claim. . . . Accordingly, even absent an arrest, the use of chemical spray and less-lethal projectiles can amount to . . .a cognizable restraint under the Fourth Amendment where the 'clear[ ]' effect of officers' use of pepper spray 'was to control plaintiffs' movement.' . . . This Court finds that Plaintiffs' allegations are sufficient to set forth a likelihood of success on the merits that the deployment of less-lethal munitions constituted physical force that temporarily restrained the protestors. . . The intentionality requirement of the Fourth Amendment seizure analysis is fulfilled since there is no dispute that the protestors were the target of police conduct when the officers held out their hands and sprayed the protestors indiscriminately. . . Regardless of officers' motives, their application of force terminated the protestors' freedom of movement and constituted a seizure under the Fourth Amendment." [footnotes omitted])

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Stearns v. Wagner, 122 F.4th 699, 703-04 (8th Cir. 2024) ("Here, Stearns's First Amendment retaliation claim fails because, viewing the record in the light most favorable to him, he fails to demonstrate a causal connection between his injury and a retaliatory animus. Unlike the police in Quraishi, Sergeant Spire did not single out a particular group of people. And unlike the relatively small group in Green who were attempting to peacefully depart the scene an hour after a protest had ended, Stearns was in the midst of a crowd where—he admits—only minutes before officers were required to deploy 'handheld munitions' to 'effectively and safely start[ ] to control the protestors.' This case is closer to Molina, where officers 'were dodging rocks and bottles just a few minutes earlier' than to Green, where the protest had dispersed an hour earlier. . . And, like the officers in Aldridge and De Mian, Stearns concedes that Sergeant Spire 'did not fire at a specific person, but indiscriminately fired into a group of people.' 'One cannot simultaneously single out the appellants and "indiscriminately" spray the crowd.'. . Thus, Stearns has failed to allege that Seargent Spire violated a constitutional right. Sergeant Spire is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Stearns's First Amendment retaliation claim. Stearns also appeals the dismissal of his excessive force claim under the Fourth Amendment and the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. With respect to his Fourth Amendment claim, Stearns fails to'"provide a meaningful explanation of the argument' and neglects any 'citation to relevant authority.'. . Therefore, his Fourth Amendment claim is waived. As to his Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim, to prove a violation of substantive due process, Stearns 'must show (1) that [Sergeant Spire] violated one or more fundamental constitutional rights, and (2) that the conduct of [Sergeant Spire] was shocking to the contemporary conscience.'. . 'Proof of intent to harm is usually required,' though, 'in some cases, proof of deliberate indifference' may satisfy the standard. . . 'The lower deliberate indifference standard is sensibly employed only when actual deliberation is practical.'. . . Here, Stearns argues that Sergeant Spire's deployment of projectile shells after the crowd was beyond throwing distance was 'a brutal and inhumane abuse of official power.' But—even assuming that Sergeant Spire used crowd control measures longer and more aggressively than was required. . .there is no evidence that Sergeant Spire intended harm. And the lower 'deliberate indifference' standard does not apply because Sergeant Spire lacked 'the benefit of time to make [an] unhurried judgment[ ].'. . Altogether, Sergeant Spire's actions fall far short of shocking the conscience. Therefore, Stearns has not shown a substantive due process violation and Sergeant Spire is entitled to qualified immunity on Stearns's Fourteenth Amendment claim.")

Irish v. McNamara, 108 F.4th 715, 719-20 (8th Cir. 2024) ("We have already recognized that even after Brower and Brendlin, the law is not clearly established in this area. As of 2007, it was not clearly established that an officer "could effect a seizure under the Fourth Amendment without subjectively intending to do so." . . . Officer Irish says things have changed since Gardner, pointing to Torres v. Madrid, which held that police seized a suspect 'for the instant th[eir] bullets struck her,' even though she temporarily eluded arrest afterward. . . Torres observed that 'the appropriate inquiry is whether the challenged conduct objectively manifests an intent to restrain,'. . . a snippet of the opinion that Officer Irish says leaves 'no confusion' that an officer's subjective intent is irrelevant to whether a seizure occurred. Setting aside the myriad ways Torres is factually distinguishable, we cannot ignore that in the very same sentence Officer Irish quotes, the Court said that it 'rarely probe[s] the subjective motivations of police officers in the Fourth Amendment context.'. . Rarely, not never. This qualified language is consistent with the Court's repeated observation that officers' subjective intent 'is relevant to an assessment of the Fourth Amendment implications of police conduct' insofar as 'that intent has been conveyed to the person confronted.'. . Like Brendlin, Torres focused on 'objective intent,' but it didn't disavow the Court's prior statements or end any 'debate' on subjective intent's role in whether a seizure occurred. . . . In the end, this is a 'narrow and specialized Fourth Amendment problem,'. . . where we must ask 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established[.]'. . We are not dealing with the use of a K9 against either a suspect or even a traditional bystander, but rather against a fellow officer who was also involved in the chase. . . . All told, we cannot say that it was 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official [in Deputy McNamara's shoes] would understand' that he acted unlawfully—or even within the scope of the Fourth Amendment. . . Contrary to Officer Irish's warning, our decision today does not mean that one police officer could never seize another. . . We hold only that it was not clearly established as of March 2022 that an officer in Minnesota could seize a fellow officer with a K9 without subjectively intending to do so. . . Because Officer Irish has not plausibly pleaded any facts suggesting that Deputy McNamara subjectively intended to seize him, Deputy McNamara is 'entitled to qualified immunity on the face of the complaint.'")

Wolk v. City of Brooklyn Center, 107 F.4th 854, 859 (8th Cir. 2024) ("Wolk alleged that the Supervisory Defendants directed law enforcement's response to the protests and authorized the indiscriminate use of tear gas, flashbang grenades, pepper spray, and rubber bullets to disperse the crowds, which ultimately resulted in Wolk's injuries. However, this Court concluded last year—more than two years after the incident giving rise to the claims in this case—that it was not clearly established that the use of force with the intent to disperse or repel a crowd constituted a seizure under the Fourth Amendment. See Dundon v. Kirchmeier, 85 F.4th 1250, 1256-57 (8th Cir. 2023) (distinguishing force used by officers with intent to apprehend with force used by officers with intent to disperse or repel). Wolk has not shown it was clearly established as of April 2021 that officers effect a seizure when they use force to disperse protestors. And while Wolk's complaint generally alleges that some protesters were thrown to the ground for arrest, which tends to show an intent to apprehend rather than disperse, Wolk does not allege that these actions caused Wolk's injuries. The Supervisory Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Wolk's Fourth Amendment excessive force and failure to intervene claims, and we reverse the district court's denial of their motion to dismiss on this basis.")

Marks v. Bauer, 107 F.4th 840, 842, 845-46 (8th Cir. 2024) ("Ethan Marks, who was 19 years old at the time, sustained a ruptured eyeball, a fractured eye socket, and a traumatic brain injury when Minneapolis Police Officer Benjamin Bauer shot him with a chemical-filled projectile from approximately five to ten feet away. Marks sued Officer Bauer under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging violations of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. The district court . . . denied Officer Bauer's motion for summary judgment on Marks' excessive force claim, finding that genuine issues of material fact precluded a grant of qualified immunity. This interlocutory appeal followed. We affirm. . . . Officer Bauer contends deploying a projectile against an 'assaultive protestor' is insufficient force to constitute a seizure under the Fourth Amendment. To establish a Fourth Amendment violation, Marks must show both that a seizure occurred and the seizure was unreasonable. . . While we have noted that '[prior] decisions did not place officers on notice that the existence of a seizure depends on the type of force applied for the purpose of dispersing a crowd,' . . . Officer Bauer was not dispersing a crowd the moment he aimed and shot Marks. The video footage shows that, before Marks was shot, Officer Bauer's general deployment of projectiles allowed officers to form a perimeter and evacuate the stabbing victim. It also shows the officers were able to form a second perimeter around another injured individual. By this time, most of the crowd had retreated and only a couple dozen individuals remained around the second individual who needed medical attention. . . .The projectile aimed and purposefully deployed at Marks by Officer Bauer stopped Marks and achieved the result Officer Bauer intended. The record demonstrates that Officer Bauer applied force to restrain and stop Marks. That Marks was not arrested does not change the analysis. . . . Under the facts and circumstances of this case, Marks was seized when Officer Bauer shot him with a projectile.")

Dundon v. Kirchmeier, 85 F.4th 1250, 1255-57 (8th Cir. 2023) ("To establish a Fourth Amendment violation, the claimant must demonstrate that a seizure occurred and that the seizure was unreasonable. . . The threshold question here is whether the protestors were seized within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. The protestors maintain that the officers effected a seizure when they used force against them with an intent to disperse the crowd. The municipalities argue, however, that when an officer's use of force is designed to disperse a crowd, there is no seizure. Even assuming that the plaintiffs could proceed against unnamed police officers, . . . the protestors have not shown that it was clearly established as of November 2016 that a use of force designed to disperse a crowd constituted a seizure. The protestors maintain that the officers used force to restrain their 'freedom of movement' because the force 'knocked most of the Appellants and many of the other assembled persons off their feet or otherwise restricted their freedom of movement by stopping them in their tracks.' They rely primarily on Torres v. Madrid, 141 S. Ct. 989 (2021), which held that police seized a suspect for the instant that police bullets struck her, even though the suspect temporarily eluded arrest thereafter. . . Torres was decided after the encounter at issue here, so it does not constitute clearly established law for purposes of this case. In any event, Torres involved force used to apprehend a suspect . . . and did not address whether force used only to compel departure from an area constitutes a seizure. This court has recognized that the law is not clearly established in this area. As of 2014, it was not clearly established that the use of tear gas by police to disperse news reporters from the site of public unrest and protests was a seizure. Quraishi v. St. Charles County, 986 F.3d 831, 839-40 (8th Cir. 2021). As of 2018, it was not clearly established that a push used to repel a subject seeking to enter a government facility was a seizure. Martinez v. Sasse, 37 F.4th 506, 510 (8th Cir. 2022). The protestors here suggest a legally significant difference between the use of tear gas or pepper spray, which disperses through the air, and the deployment of munitions such as rubber bullets or bean bags. Our decisions, however, have recognized a potential distinction between force used with intent to apprehend and force used with intent to disperse or repel. Those decisions did not place officers on notice that the existence of a seizure depends on the type of force applied for the purpose of dispersing a crowd. The protestors invoke Mitchell v. Kirchmeier, 28 F.4th 888 (8th Cir. 2022), where a protestor alleged that he was injured by lead-filled bean bags during another protest at the Backwater Bridge. This court concluded that the protestor's claim alleging excessive force survived a motion to dismiss. But the protestor in that case 'was arrested,' so the court had no occasion to consider whether a use of force to disperse rather than to apprehend constituted a seizure. . . Other cited authorities are similarly inapposite because the officer used force to apprehend a suspect. . .The protestors rely on a decision from the Ninth Circuit about the use of 'pepperballs' to disperse students from an unruly party. Nelson v. City of Davis, 685 F.3d 867, 877 (9th Cir. 2012). Although the use of force was designed to disperse the students, the court concluded that the student was seized because the 'application of force was a knowing and wilful act that terminated Nelson's freedom of movement.'. . While Nelson may lend support to the protestors' theory, it does not demonstrate clearly established law as of November 2016 that the officers' use of force to disperse the protestors was a seizure. One decision from another court of appeals falls short of a 'robust consensus of authority' clearly establishing that the use of force to disperse is a seizure under the Fourth Amendment. Indeed, after Nelson was decided, this court in Quraishi and Martinez concluded that the law was not clearly established on the relevant point. . . . We conclude that the protestors have not established that the individual officers violated a clearly established right under the Fourth Amendment, because it was not clearly established as of November 2016 that use of force to disperse the crowd was a seizure. The protestors do not develop an argument that the actions of the officers clearly 'shocked the conscience,' see County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 846-47 (1998), or otherwise violated a clearly established right of the protestors under the Due Process Clause. The district court properly dismissed the claims against the officers under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments.")

Pollreis v. Marzolf, 66 F.4th 726, 731 (8th Cir. 2023) ("The seizure of a person often occurs in the context of an arrest or detainment. Here, Pollreis was neither arrested nor detained. Neither was she told she was 'not free to leave[.]'. . Nonetheless, we conclude Pollreis was seized, even if for only a moment. For a brief time, Pollreis stood, with a taser pointed at her. She then asked, 'Where do you want me to go?' and was told, after more back and forth, to 'go back to your house.' Viewed in the light most favorable to Pollreis, when Officer Marzolf aimed his taser at her, he restricted her freedom of movement while displaying a weapon. . . Officer Marzolf reiterated his command to 'get back in a 'tone of voice indicating that compliance ... might be compelled,'. . . while also aiming a taser. A reasonable person in Pollreis's shoes would not believe she was free to ignore Officer Marzolf's commands. This is further evidenced through the fact that Pollreis submitted to Officer Marzolf's show of authority by leaving the scene even though her children were being detained at gunpoint. Considering the circumstances, we hold Officer Marzolf briefly seized Pollreis through a show of his authority.")

Martinez v. Sasse, 37 F.4th 506, 509-10 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Although the claim here alleges use of excessive force, the parties dispute the threshold question whether Sasse seized Martinez at all within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. Martinez argues that Sasse effected a seizure when she pushed Martinez to the ground before locking the doors to the ICE facility. Sasse maintains, however, that when an officer's use of force is designed only to repel a person from entering a facility, there is no seizure. On that view, Martinez may have a tort claim against Sasse for assault or battery if the officer used unjustified force, but Sasse did not violate the Fourth Amendment. As of June 2018, the Supreme Court had explained that a seizure occurs 'when the officer, by means of physical force or show of authority, has in some way restrained the liberty of a citizen.'. . Sasse maintains that her alleged push of Martinez did not 'restrain' the lawyer, but served instead to 'repel' her from entering the federal facility. . . . Martinez responds that a seizure occurs where an officer restrains a person even briefly. She relies on Torres v. Madrid, —— U.S. ——, 141 S. Ct. 989, 209 L.Ed.2d 190 (2021), which held that police seized a suspect for the instant that police bullets struck her, even though the suspect temporarily eluded capture thereafter. . . Torres, however, was decided after the encounter at issue here, so cannot be clearly established law for purposes of this case. In any event, Torres involved force used to apprehend a suspect, and did not address whether force used only to repel constitutes a seizure. . . . As with the force used to repel Martinez in this case, the force in Quraishi was not employed to apprehend a subject. If there is a constitutional distinction between force used for repulsion that momentarily restricts forward movement and force used for dispersion that impels retreat, the distinction is not so readily apparent that every reasonable officer would have understood it. For these reasons, we conclude that Martinez has not adequately pleaded that Sasse violated a clearly established right, because it was not clearly established as of June 2018 that Sasse's alleged push was a seizure under the Fourth Amendment.")

Steed, by and through Steed v. Missouri State Highway Patrol, 2 F.4th 767, 770 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Steed next argues that Lavoy's Fourth Amendment rights were violated when Trooper Ashby deployed the spike strips. A failed attempt to restrain a suspect is not a 'seizure' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment unless there is some application of physical force. See Torres v. Madrid, ––– U.S. ––––, 141 S. Ct. 989, 995, 209 L.Ed.2d 190 (2021) (seizure only for the moment that the officer's bullet struck the plaintiff). Here, the officers tried to stop the Explorer with the spike strips—physical force—but were unsuccessful. Steed says that a reasonable jury could find that the Explorer drove over the spike strips. But again, that argument is 'blatantly contradicted by the record.'. . The dashcam footage shows the strips on the two left lanes, and the Explorer drove in the far-right lane. Plus, the Explorer continued the chase afterwards—likely impossible to do with punctured tires. We conclude that the record clearly establishes that the troopers did not apply physical force by trying to use the spike strips, so there was no seizure.")

Quraishi v. St. Charles County, Missouri, 986 F.3d 831, 840 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Neither the district court nor the reporters cite authority that gave 'fair warning' to Anderson that deploying one canister of tear-gas was a seizure. . . The district court relied on inapposite law. True, use of pepper spray to arrest an unarmed, compliant suspect can be excessive force. . . Peterson is distinguishable, because it focused on the officer's behavior after the individual was already seized. This court did not consider whether the use of chemical agents alone is a seizure. . . Here, the issue is whether deploying tear gas is a seizure.The reporters cite Supreme Court cases to argue they were restrained because they could not stay in their chosen location. . . But these cases did not give fair warning. Brendlin held that, during traffic stops, passengers are seized. . . Brower held that setting up a roadblock that stops a fleeing suspect is a seizure. . . Brendlin and Brower are inapposite because both involve police action that terminated or restricted freedom of movement. . . Here, the reporters' freedom to move was not terminated or restricted. See Johnson, 926 F.3d at 506 (no seizure where plaintiff was not "ordered to stop and remain in place" and "was able to leave the scene"). They were dispersed. The reporters cite no 'precedent,' 'controlling authority' or 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' to show it was clearly established that tear-gassing was a seizure. . . When Anderson deployed the tear-gas, it was not clearly established that his acts were a seizure. The district court should have granted qualified immunity to Anderson on the Fourth Amendment claim.").

Hollamon v. County of Wright, No. 22-CV-2246 (KMM/LIB), 2024 WL 3653092, at *9, *12 & n.16, (D. Minn. Aug. 5, 2024) ("The threshold question here is whether Sergeant Miller's use of force constituted a seizure. As discussed, for a seizure to occur within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment as a result of an officer's application of physical force, there must be a '"use of force with intent to restrain."'. . This issue is determined by '"whether the challenged conduct objectively manifests an intent to restrain."'. . 'Accidental force will not qualify. Nor will force intentionally applied for some other purpose.'. . Based on the summary judgment record, a reasonable jury could not conclude that Sergeant Miller's use of the pepperball launcher objectively manifested an intent to restrain. Start with the undisputed material facts. There is no dispute that the fenced area contained no trespassing signage. The evidence shows that officers shouted warnings at the protestors not to cross into the fenced area and that doing so would constitute trespassing. The video evidence, specifically Officer Berg's bodycam footage, confirms that as protestors approached the fenced area, they were told to stop and not to cross the outer fence. After several protestors began coming over the outer fence and entering the No Man's Land, Hollamon points to no evidence indicating that he was told to remain in place, nor that officers physically prohibited the protesters from leaving through use of pepperball rounds or otherwise. And during the entire period in which Sergeant Miller fired pepperball rounds in Mr. Hollamon's direction, no officer entered the No Man's Land between the fences to apprehend any of the trespassing protestors. . . . Deterred from trying to enter the construction site by this stand-off with the officers, Mr. Hollamon and other protestors retreated away from the inner fence. Some, like Mr. Hollamon, took cover behind the berm, but many of the protestors went back over the outer fence and left the construction site. The officers did not prevent any of those protestors from leaving and made no effort to arrest any of them. Nor did the officers enter the No Man's Land to arrest those, like Hollamon, who had remained at the construction site. . . . Given these circumstances, Sergeant Miller did not seize Mr. Hollamon by firing pepperballs at him. . . . During this period of the encounter, no action of the officers, including the firing of pepperballs, prevented Mr. Hollamon or anyone else, from turning around, going back to the outer fence, or leaving the area entirely. Indeed, the only reasonable inference is that the use of these munitions was to deter the protestors from breaching the inner fence and get them to turn around and leave the no-trespassing area. . . .In sum, the Court concludes that a reasonable jury could not find that Hollamon was seized, so he cannot demonstrate that there was a constitutional violation.[16] [fn. 16: This Court shares Chief Judge Patrick Schiltz's 'reservations about the "legal black hole" created by distinguishing protestors being "free to leave" and being "free to stay,"' including the implication that if force is used to disperse, there would be no Fourth Amendment seizure regardless of the level of force used 'to disperse or repel a crowd—including fire hoses, police dogs, live ammunition, and even flame throwers.'. . In Cole, Judge Schiltz avoided the need to resolve this tension because the plaintiffs 'submitted evidence to allow a reasonable jury to find that [the defendants'] use of pepper spray did, in fact, objectively manifest an intent to restrain the plaintiffs.'. . Mr. Hollamon did not present such evidence, so the question is closer to the surface here. Of course, this case does not involve the use of force akin to the examples identified in Cole. But it is difficult to imagine the situation in which the use of live ammunition or a flame thrower would not implicate the Fourth Amendment even if a government official were brazen enough to suggest that such methods were legitimate crowd dispersal techniques.] In addition, the Court finds that Sergeant Miller is entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established, as of July 29, 2021, that firing pepperball rounds to disperse a group of protestors engaged in a trespass constituted a seizure, even if an argument can now be made that it did. Mr. Hollamon does not point to any controlling authority, nor a robust consensus of persuasive authority, that would have given fair warning to Sergeant Miller that his conduct violated the constitution.")

Cole v. Lockman, No. 21-CV-1282 (PJS/DLM), 2024 WL 328976, at *5–6, *8, (D. Minn. Jan. 29, 2024) ("Defendants argue that Eck and Lockman did not seize Cole, Hennessy-Fiske, or the other occupants of the alcove because the officers deployed pepper spray for the purpose of dispersing the occupants, not restraining them. In support of their argument, defendants cite a number of excessive-force cases that have distinguished between force used to disperse (not a seizure) and force used to restrain (a seizure). [collecting cases] The Court has reservations about the 'legal black hole' created by distinguishing between protestors being 'free to leave' and being 'free to stay.' Shawn E. Fields, Protest Policing and the Fourth Amendment, 55 U.C. Davis L. Rev. 347, 361, 364 (2021). For example, defendants' theory would seem to empower police officers to use any level of force to disperse or repel a crowd—including fire hoses, police dogs, live ammunition, and even flame throwers. Because no 'seizure' would occur, it would not matter for purposes of the Fourth Amendment whether the force applied was reasonable. In any event, the Court need not grapple with the implications of defendants' theory, because Cole and Hennessy-Fiske have submitted sufficient evidence to allow a reasonable jury to find that Eck's and Lockman's use of pepper spray did, in fact, objectively manifest an intent to restrain the plaintiffs. . . Defendants claim that it is undisputed that Eck and Lockman used their pepper spray to disperse Cole, Hennessy-Fiske, and the others gathered in the alcove, but video of the incident suggests otherwise (or at least would allow a reasonable jury to conclude otherwise). For one thing, at the moment when Eck and Lockman deployed their pepper spray, plaintiffs were surrounded in the alcove by riot police, . . . in other words, plaintiffs had nowhere to go, or to be dispersed to. In this respect, this case resembles Ludwig v. Anderson, in which the Eighth Circuit found that police had seized the decedent when several officers 'formed a semicircle' around him and maced . . . him in the face. . . Moreover, the video shows Eck deploying his pepper spray at the same time that other officers were pointing to the ground and yelling 'get down.'. . A reasonable jury could conclude that the objective intent behind Eck's use of pepper spray under those circumstances was to force those in the alcove to get to the ground—i.e., to stay, not to go. . . . Particularly given the testimony in the record that the MSP's plan was for a team of officers to follow behind the skirmish line, a reasonable jury could conclude that Eck's and Lockman's use of pepper spray was an act of restraint rather than dispersal and thus that Cole and Hennessy-Fiske were seized for purposes of the Fourth Amendment. . . Eck and Lockman have countered with declarations stating that they deployed pepper spray to get the group in the alcove to disperse. . . That may be true, but it is also irrelevant, as courts 'rarely probe the subjective motivations of police officers in the Fourth Amendment context.'. . The only objective evidence to which defendants point is that Eck and possibly other riot police were yelling 'move' while using their pepper spray. The problem for defendants, though, is that the command to 'move' cannot be heard on the video of the incident until two seconds after Eck initially deployed his pepper spray. At the moment that Eck started deploying pepper spray, the only thing his targets had been told was to get down on the ground. Finally, the fact that plaintiffs were not actually arrested and were allowed to move north after being pepper sprayed is not determinative. The seizure may have been brief, but 'brief seizures are seizures all the same.'. . .Altogether, a jury could readily find that a reasonable officer in the position of Eck and Lockman would have known (1) that Cole, Hennessy-Fiske, and the rest of the group in the alcove were journalists, (2) that those journalists were not subject to the curfew or the curfew-based dispersal order (i.e., were not breaking any law), and (3) that those journalists posed no threat to the officers or anyone else. And based on these findings, a reasonable jury could hold Eck and Lockman liable for pepper spraying Cole and Hennessy-Fiske just a couple of seconds after they had been commanded to get on the ground. . . That is particularly true given that Eck and Lockman were surrounded by other officers and had lesser means of force at their disposal. . . And that is also true given that the amount of force used against Cole was severe enough to cause chemical burns to her eye, which required continuing medical supervision. . . Put differently, if a reasonable jury resolved the disputes of fact in plaintiffs' favor, that jury could conclude that not a single one of the Graham factors weighs in favor of defendants—i.e., that plaintiffs were not violating any law, posed no immediate threat to officer safety, and were not resisting or fleeing. . . The Court therefore declines to hold that Eck's and Lockman's use of force was reasonable as a matter of law.")

Perkins v. City of Des Moines, Iowa, 712 F. Supp. 3d 1159, 1172-75 (S.D. Iowa 2024) ("Under Torres and Quraishi, an individual is not seized under the Fourth Amendment when an officer objectively manifests an intent to disperse rather than restrain. . . Here, the record contains no evidence from which a reasonable jury could conclude an objective intent to restrain rather than disperse Perkins. . . Upon arriving in the Merle Hay Mall area, Perkins was aware of the large crowds and looting going on in the area. . . She was also aware law enforcement officers and a SWAT team were present in the area and that tear gas was being deployed. . . When Perkins attempted to speak with one of the officers whose car was blocking an entrance to the mall parking lot, she was instructed to '[m]ove along.'. . Thus, Perkins was aware of the volatile situation going on around her and had been instructed by an officer to leave the area. Nevertheless, Perkins exited her daughter's car shortly after interacting with the officer and began walking back and forth in the street amid traffic in the lane adjacent to the mall parking lot. . . It was at this point—with Perkins walking back and forth through the street amid traffic—that the Bearcat drove by Perkins's location and Detective Tart deployed the impact round that struck Perkins. . . Perkins argues the fact she was struck 'while moving away from [Detective] Tart and the parking lot' demonstrates Detective Tart intended to restrain her. . . Seconds before being struck by the impact round, however, Perkins was walking towards the Bearcat and mall parking lot. . . And unlike the cases Perkins cites for support, there is no evidence Perkins was moving away from the mall parking lot in an attempt to flee or run away from Detective Tart or another officer. . . Perkins also argues the fact Detective Tart did not order her to disperse prior to deploying the impact round demonstrates he intended to restrain her. . . Even assuming for purposes of summary judgment that Detective Tart did not order Perkins to disperse prior to deploying the impact round or that Perkins did not hear Detective Tart issue such an order, Perkins had already been instructed by another officer to 'm]ove along' from the area. . . Finally, Perkins asserts that other than the fact she was walking away from Detective Tart and that he did not order her to disperse, 'the only objectively manifested conveyance of [Detective] Tart's intent' was the fact he struck her with the impact round. . . That Perkins was struck by the impact round fails to indicate, however, why Detective Tart deployed the impact round, including whether he intended to restrain or disperse her or whether he intended to strike her with the impact round at all. . . Furthermore, none of the events after Perkins was struck by the impact round objectively manifest an intent to restrain. Perkins was not arrested after being struck. Instead, she drove away in her daughter's car unimpeded by law enforcement. . . Based upon such evidence, no reasonable jury could conclude Detective Tart objectively manifested an intent to restrain Perkins at the time she was struck by the impact round such that she was seized for purposes of the Fourth Amendment. . . Because the Fourth Amendment is implicated only when a seizure has occurred, Perkins's Fourth Amendment excessive force claim fails as a matter of law. . . . Absent 'precedent, controlling authority, or a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' showing it was clearly established as of May 2020 that striking an individual who was walking back and forth in a street during a protest with a single, less-lethal impact round constituted a seizure, the Court finds Detective Tart is entitled to qualified immunity on Perkins's Fourth Amendment claim. . . On this alternative ground, the Court grants Detective Tart's motion for summary judgment as to Perkins's Fourth Amendment excessive force claim.")

Keup v. Sarpy County, No. 8:21-CV-312, 2023 WL 8829298, at *16-19 (D. Neb. Dec. 21, 2023) ("Because the Court holds that neither of Deputy Palmer's actions—firing a pepper ball at Keup and using force when transporting him to get medical attention—constitute 'seizures' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, there is no need to consider the 'reasonableness' of those actions. . . . Regarding Keup's first Fourth Amendment theory—that use of the pepper ball constituted a seizure—the Court holds that Palmer is entitled to qualified immunity because it was not 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged misconduct that 'a use of force to disperse rather than to apprehend constituted a seizure.' . . The reasoning in Dundon applies equally to this case because there is no genuine dispute that Deputy Palmer was trying to disperse rather than arrest Keup. . . . All of this undisputed evidence indicates that the Sarpy County SWAT Team in general and Deputy Palmer in particular were trying to clear an area in Omaha by dispersing (not arresting) individuals within the area. This belies Keup's contention that '[w]hen Palmer shot Keup at least twice with PepperBalls, he seized Keup' within the clearly established definition of 'seizure' at the time, which as discussed above included use of force to arrest but not to disperse. Deputy Palmer clearly intended to disperse Keup when he fired pepper balls at him. The notion that Deputy Palmer was trying to arrest rather than disperse Keup, who all parties agree 'did not commit a crime,'. . . is farfetched: right before encountering Keup, Deputy Palmer had been actively engaged in the dispersal of several crowds which undisputedly included 'violent protestors,'. . . without attempting to arrest any of them. Deputy Palmer also had no cause to arrest Keup, given that all parties agree that 'Keup did not commit a crime.' Indeed, Keup was never placed under arrest. . . However, Deputy Palmer did have cause to disperse Keup, who was present near the protest at the 'intersection of 72nd and Dodge,' which undisputedly 'was closed to the public by law enforcement,'. . . and 'had been declared an unlawful assembly by law enforcement.'. . Thus, the evidence forecloses the possibility that Deputy Palmer deployed pepper balls at Keup in order to apprehend him. Therefore, Keup has failed to adduce sufficient evidence to 'persuade a jury[]'. . . that Deputy Palmer used force to apprehend rather than disperse Keup. Accordingly, the Fourth Amendment rights claimed by Keup as they pertain to Deputy Palmer's use of pepper balls were not 'clearly established at the time of the defendant's alleged misconduct.'")

Franks v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, No. 4:19 CV 2663 RWS, 2022 WL 1062035, at *8 (E.D. Mo. Apr. 8, 2022) ("To establish a Fourth Amendment violation, a plaintiff must demonstrate that 'a seizure occurred and the seizure was unreasonable.' [citing Quraishi] A seizure occurs when an officer 'restrains the liberty of an individual through physical force or show of authority.'. . An officer's use of force or show of authority must have been such that '"a reasonable person would have believed that [she] was not free to leave."'. . In determining whether a seizure occurred through a use of force, 'the appropriate inquiry is whether the challenged conduct objectively manifests an intent to restrain.' Torres v. Madrid, 141 S.Ct. 989, 998 (2021). Here, the record does not support a finding that Franks was seized. There is no evidence that Officer Olsten ordered Franks to remain in place or that Franks was unable to leave the scene at any point. See Johnson v. City of Ferguson, 926 F.3d 504, 506 (8th Cir. 2019) (finding no seizure where plaintiff was not 'ordered to stop and to remain in place' and was 'able to leave the scene'). To the contrary, the evidence shows that Officer Olsten and the other officers did not attempt to make any arrests after Officer Olsten deployed pepper spray. . . There is also no evidence indicating that Officer Olsten deployed pepper spray with an intent to restrain Franks. According to Franks, Officer Olsten deployed pepper spray in retaliation against her for exercising her First Amendment rights. According to Officer Olsten, he deployed pepper spray to stop Brandy and to disperse the protestors. . . In either case, such a use of force is not a seizure. . . Because Franks must show that she was seized in order to establish a claim for excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment, and the record does not support a finding that Franks was seized, Officer Olsten is entitled to qualified immunity on Franks' excessive force claim. Furthermore, even if the record did contain evidence of a seizure under Torres, Officer Olsten would still be entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established in 2017 that use of pepper spray alone was a seizure. Cf. Quraishi, 986 F.3d at 840 (concluding it was not clearly established in 2014 that deploying tear-gas alone was a seizure). Accordingly, summary judgment will be granted to Officer Olsten on Count IV.");

NINTH CIRCUIT

Puente v. City of Phoenix, 123 F.4th 1035, 1050-56 (9th Cir. 2024) ("[W]e agree with the district court that the PPD's dispersal of class members by the airborne transmission of chemical irritants (such as tear gas and pepper spray) and auditory or visual irritants (such as the sound and flash produced by flash-bang grenades) does not constitute a seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. . . . The Court in Torres underscored the importance of the common law's intent-to-restrain requirement to any finding of a 'seizure' based on the 'application of physical force to the body of a person.'. . . The Court further explained that, with respect to this element, 'the appropriate inquiry is whether the challenged conduct objectively manifests an intent to restrain, for [the courts] rarely probe the subjective motivations of police officers in the Fourth Amendment context.'. . And just as an officer's purely subjective intent is not relevant, so too the inquiry does not 'depend on the subjective perceptions of the seized person.'. .Plaintiffs do not contend that they were seized by a 'show of authority' to which they submitted, but only that they were seized by an application of physical force with an objective intent to restrain. We will assume, without deciding, that the diffuse airborne transmission of chemical irritants or intense flashes or sounds at a group of persons may constitute an 'application of physical force to the body of [those] person[s].'. . But even on that assumption, Defendants' use of such irritants to disperse the crowd from the Free Speech Zone does not constitute a seizure because there is no basis in the record for concluding that it was undertaken with the necessary objective intent to restrain. . .Torres makes clear that an objective intent to 'restrain,' for Fourth Amendment purposes, refers to measures that objectively aim to detain or confine the person, even if only temporarily or even if only through a 'mere touch.'. . . Because an objective intent to assert custody over a person, or to confine the person, was required for any form of 'arrest,' the requisite intent to restrain is present only when the force applied objectively aims at detaining or confining the person. It follows that an application of force with an objective intent merely to disperse or exclude persons from an area—and without any measures objectively aimed at detaining or confining them in the process—does not involve the necessary 'intent to restrain' that might give rise to a 'seizure.'. . . With these principles in mind, we conclude that Plaintiffs failed to produce sufficient evidence to establish that, in the course of attempting to disperse and exclude class members from the Free Speech Zone, the Defendant officers' application of force through the use of various diffusely-applied airborne irritants involved measures that objectively aimed at detaining or confining them, even temporarily. . . . In nonetheless arguing that the Defendant officers here effectuated a seizure, Plaintiffs rely on a variety of clearly distinguishable cases, all of which involved scenarios where the defendant officers did detain or confine persons, even if only briefly, or applied force objectively aimed at restraint or confinement in the course of attempting to disperse them. . . . Because the record shows that the Defendant officers' use of airborne irritants here was not objectively aimed at restraining the class members, even temporarily, there was no 'seizure' of the class members within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. . .Having found that the class's excessive-force claims arose 'outside the context of a seizure,' we evaluate those claims under the Fourteenth Amendment 'shocks-the-conscience test.'. . .We conclude that the situation in this case is one that escalated quickly, requiring officers to respond promptly without 'the luxury ... of having time to make unhurried judgments.'. . It is therefore governed by the 'purpose to harm' standard. . . . Because the Fourteenth Amendment's 'purpose to harm' standard (rather than the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness standard) governs the Defendant officers' use of chemical irritants and flash-bangs against the class members, and because there is no triable issue of such a purpose to harm, the district court correctly granted summary judgment against the class on its claims of excessive force in violation of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments.") Puente v. City of Phoenix, 123 F.4th 1035, 1057-62 (9th Cir. 2024) ("To the extent that these Plaintiffs' individual excessive-force claims overlap with the class's claims, our earlier analysis governs as well, and those claims fail at the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. However, each of these three Plaintiffs' situations differs from the class claims in that each of them individually experienced a direct physical impact from a munition fired by a PPD officer. Our earlier analysis finding no 'seizure' with respect to the class claims therefore does not carry over to these Plaintiffs' individual claims based on such physical impacts. However, we need not resolve whether these individual Plaintiffs experienced a temporary 'seizure' when they were directly impacted by physical objects that were potentially momentarily disabling. . . Even assuming that they were, we conclude that, based on the undisputed facts, the Defendant officers were entitled to qualified immunity because they acted reasonably under the circumstances or violated no clearly established law. . . .Examining the totality of the circumstances, we conclude that, as a matter of law, Defendants' use of intermediate force against Yedlin was a reasonable response that was 'commensurate[ ]' to the PPD's strong interest in avoiding any breach of the fence. . . Consequently, Yedlin's Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights were not violated. We therefore conclude that the relevant individual Defendants were entitled to qualified immunity on Yedlin's claim and that the district court erred in concluding otherwise. . . .We conclude that Defendants' use of force against Travis was objectively reasonable. As with Yedlin, Travis's actual injuries were nowhere near as serious as those in Nelson, and we view the force deployed against her as intermediate. . . Like Yedlin, Travis was not being arrested and was not resisting arrest. However, unlike Yedlin's situation, Travis was struck after she remained in the area in clear disregard of the repeated announcement that an unlawful assembly had been declared and after multiple orders to disperse had been issued. . . . Viewing all of the circumstances in context, the repeated applications of force made by the advancing officers, including the particular blast that impacted Travis, were reasonable measures to accomplish the PPD's substantial interests in public safety. . . But even if we were to assume that the Defendant officers violated Travis's Fourth Amendment rights, they are nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity because the relevant right asserted by Travis was not clearly established. . . . Here, Plaintiffs do not cite any case that could have 'clearly establish[ed]' that Defendants' use of force against Travis was objectively unreasonable. . . . And this is plainly not an 'obvious' case in which every reasonable officer would have recognized that the Defendant officers' conduct was unlawful. For these reasons, we conclude that the district court erred in failing to grant summary judgment, on qualified immunity grounds, to the relevant individual Defendants with respect to Travis's excessive-force claims. . . . Viewing the record in the light most favorable to Guillen, the PPD's use of force against her constituted a seizure, and we conclude that there is a triable issue as to whether that use of force was objectively unreasonable. There are a number of features surrounding the particular use of force that struck Guillen that distinguish it from the uses of force against Yedlin and Travis. In particular, in contrast to Travis's situation, the video evidence does not show any obviously unlawful or threatening conduct occurring in Guillen's immediate vicinity prior to the relevant Defendants' use of force. Nor did Guillen engage in any personal conduct, as Yedlin had done, that itself presented a risk to public safety. Guillen was also not disobeying any orders—at the time, no announcement of an unlawful assembly had been made, and the video evidence indicates that she was confused as to what she was supposed to do. But in the absence of the sort of factors we noted with respect to Yedlin and Travis, we conclude that, even if Guillen had 'heard and was in non-compliance with the officers' orders to disperse, this single act of non-compliance, without any attempt to threaten the officers or place them at risk,' would not make reasonable the particular use of chemical projectiles against her, causing the moderately serious injuries she experienced. . . Nonetheless, we conclude that Nelson is 'materially distinguishable' in several respects and that it therefore did not 'clearly establish' that the relevant Defendants' actions violated Guillen's rights. . . . Because no precedent '"squarely governs"' the specific facts at issue' and because this is not an 'obvious case,'. . . we conclude that the relevant Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the force used against Guillen. Accordingly, on that basis, we reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment to the relevant individual Defendants.") Sanderlin v. Dwyer, 116 F.4th 905, 912-13 (9th Cir. 2024) ("Here, Panighetti intentionally used physical force by directly firing a foam baton round at Sanderlin. According to Sanderlin's declaration, after he was struck with the foam baton, he fell to the ground unable to move. The video footage from Panighetti's body camera provides some corroboration for this claim, as Sanderlin can be seen staggering from the impact, unable to stand or walk properly. In other words, Panighetti intentionally applied physical force, and as a result, Sanderlin's 'freedom of movement [was] restrained.'. . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Sanderlin, we conclude that a reasonable factfinder could determine that he was seized within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. . . The fact that Panighetti's incapacitation of Sanderlin may have been limited in duration does not alter this conclusion, because a 'meaningful interference' with an individual's freedom of movement, even if brief, constitutes a seizure. . . Nor is it relevant that Sanderlin was ultimately able to walk away, because 'the application of physical force to the body of a person with intent to restrain is a seizure even if the person does not submit and is not subdued.'. . Panighetti argues that he could not have seized Sanderlin because his actual intent in firing the foam baton was to force him to leave the area, not to restrain Sanderlin or apprehend him. Panighetti is correct that under the Supreme Court's recent decision in Torres, '[a] seizure requires the use of force with intent to restrain.'. . But Torres is equally clear that our inquiry centers on 'whether the challenged conduct objectively manifests an intent to restrain.'. . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Sanderlin, we conclude that a reasonable factfinder could find that Panighetti objectively manifested an intent to restrain Sanderlin and prevent Sanderlin from freely walking away. Record evidence suggests that the 40mm launcher that Panighetti used is chiefly designed, intended, and used for the purpose of incapacitating its target—and there can be no reasonable dispute that 'incapacitating' an individual by firing a projectile at them is an act that 'meaningful[ly] interfere[es]' with their freedom of movement. . . .A reasonable trier of fact viewing this evidence could conclude that by firing a 40mm projectile at Sanderlin's groin, Panighetti objectively manifested an intent to restrain Sanderlin. Whether Panighetti may have subjectively intended to repel Sanderlin rather than restrain him is irrelevant to the analysis. We therefore conclude that Panighetti's act of firing a projectile at Sanderlin constituted a seizure under the Fourth Amendment.")

Cuevas v. City of Tulare, 107 F.4th 894, 899 (9th Cir. 2024) ("[W]hen a person is pulled over by the police, that person is seized because she complied with a show of authority. Passengers in the car are seized together with the driver. . . In 2021, we held that, as of 2016, it was established 'that a passenger struck by a bullet intended to stop the driver of a vehicle' has been seized. Villanueva v. California, 986 F.3d 1158, 1165 (9th Cir. 2021). Under these clearly established principles, the officers seized Castro. True, Castro was not seized when he first got stuck in the mud. His repeated attempts to flee suggest that he did not consider himself restrained and belie that he submitted to the officers. But there are multiple points at which Castro—and therefore Cuevas—was seized after he became stuck in the mud. The exact point at which the seizure occurred is less important. Castro was seized, at the very least, when K-9 Officer Garcia put Bane through the broken window instructing him to bite Castro. This was a use of force. So too were the shots that the officers fired at Castro after he shot Bane and his handler. . . Since Cuevas was Castro's passenger, she too was seized. The district court's contrary conclusion was incorrect.")

Cullinan v. City of Los Angeles, 752 F. Supp. 3d 1180, 1184 (C.D. Cal. 2024) ("Here, Defendants concede that Officer Hunter's use of the 40 mm launcher was 'intended to prevent [another individual] from harming the officers and other protestors.' Defendants do not argue that Officer Hunter did not intend to seize someone—only that he did not intend to seize Plaintiff. But case law is clear that so long as Officer Hunter intentionally deployed the 40 mm launcher and the 'intent conveyed' was to restrain a person's movement (see Villanueva, 986 F.3d at 1166), his actions constitute a seizure. ")

Baca v. Anderson, No. 22-CV-02461-WHO, 2024 WL 2868145, at *8 (N.D. Cal. June 6, 2024) ("Defendants argue that no seizure occurred because Anderson's baton strike was a mere attempt to repel and push Baca back from the police line. They point to Anderson's deposition testimony that at the time he used his baton, he did not intend to seize or arrest Baca but was acting to protect Simonini. . . Anderson's subjective intent is irrelevant, however. The question is whether Anderson's conduct 'objectively manifests and intent to restrain.'. .Baca argues that the slightest use of force can constitute a seizure. . . He contends that in addition to the baton strike, additional objective evidence of an intent to seize is that Anderson did not object to and simply watched the other officers drag Baca behind the line and then attempt to subdue and bring him down to the ground after the baton hit. Baca also argues that he was not free to leave or given the opportunity to move back from the police line after the baton strike. Once the baton strike occurred, however, it is undisputed that Baca grabbed the baton and made a fist. Seeing that conduct (which we assume was involuntary, construing the evidence in the light most favorable to Baca), Simonini was objectively justified in moving to seize Baca. That Anderson, at that point, did not attempt to disrupt the seizure is irrelevant. The only point of possibly unreasonable seizure then is the initial baton strike. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Baca, and considering that the 'back up' warning given by an officer (perhaps Anderson) occurred at essentially the same time as the baton strike, the question remains whether the baton strike was aimed at and hit Baca on his head or neck, as Baca contends. For the same reasons that summary judgment cannot be granted to Anderson on the excessive force claim, it cannot be granted based on the unlawful seizure claim.")

Cheairs v. City of Seattle, No. 2:21-CV-01343-LK, 2024 WL 1765663, at *12 (W.D. Wash. Apr. 24, 2024) ("The undisputed facts are as follows. As violence directed at the police from protestors escalated, . . . the SPD 'broadcast messages to try and move the crow[d]s' away from the area. . . Although Cheairs heard an order to disperse and had ample time to comply, he chose not to do so. . . After Captain Brooks issued an order to deploy OC blast balls, Officer Anderson threw four blast balls from behind a line of other officers without any concomitant effort to apprehend or otherwise restrain any member of the crowd, including Cheairs. . . In his use of force report, Officer Anderson stated that he deployed the blast balls to create space between the police line and protestors and cause people to leave the area in accordance with the dispersal orders. . . Unlike the plaintiff in Nelson v. City of Davis, . . . Cheairs was not immobilized after one of these blast balls ricocheted and hit him[.] . . Indeed, he does not dispute the City's contention that his freedom of movement was not restricted by Officer Anderson's use of force. . . Furthermore, Cheairs was not stopped or arrested by any officer. . . These undisputed facts do not objectively manifest an intent to restrain. Rather, they are entirely consistent with an intent to prompt the crowd to leave without attempting to apprehend or otherwise restrain anyone. Therefore, Cheairs has failed to rebut the City's showing that no seizure occurred.")

Johnson v. City of San Jose, No. 21-CV-01849-BLF, 2023 WL 7513670, at *8–10 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 13, 2023) ("First, Defendants argue that the undisputed evidence shows that even if Officer Adgar fired a projectile that struck Mr. Johnson, such conduct 'was plainly an accident,' so that Mr. Johnson was not seized within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. . . That is, Defendants contend that each PIW fired by Officer Adgar on May 30, 2020 was intended to restrain one of three specific individuals who had thrown a glass bottle at police officers—thereby excluding Mr. Johnson, who did not throw any object at the officers—so that Mr. Johnson was in effect a bystander inadvertently harmed during the attempted seizure of a third party. . . Mr. Johnson counters that Officer Adgar seized him within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment, regardless of whether he was the deliberate object of Officer Adgar's force, because Officer Adgar volitionally fired 40mm PIWs at undifferentiated individuals in the crowd and struck Mr. Johnson. . . Defendants respond that Nelson is inapposite because the court there held that the plaintiff was intentionally seized under the Fourth Amendment where officers intentionally fired at the plaintiff as one member of the group against which they intended to use undifferentiated force, which is a separate issue from the question of 'whether the accidental striking of a person while targeting a different suspect can constitute a seizure.'. . .Defendants argued at the hearing on this Motion that the only—and therefore undisputed—evidence of Officer Adgar's intent is Officer Adgar's police report, which indicates that Officer Adgar fired each of his 40mm PIWs at one of three specific individuals he believed had thrown glass bottles at police officers. . . However, as noted in the Opposition, 'the appropriate inquiry is whether the challenged conduct objectively manifests an intent to restrain, for we rarely probe the subjective motivations of police officers in the Fourth Amendment context.'. . Accordingly, the evidence of Officer Adgar's intent therefore also includes the video evidence on record, as well as expert analyses of that video evidence. The evidence before the Court on the question of whether Mr. Johnson was intentionally seized under the Nelson framework—i.e., as a member of a crowd at which Officer Adgar fired without aiming at a specific target other than Mr. Johnson—is as follows. [court reviews evidence] Viewing this evidence in the light most favorable to Mr. Johnson, as the nonmoving party, the Court finds that a rational jury could conclude that Officer Adgar struck Mr. Johnson with a 40mm PIW after firing into the crowd without a specific target, and thereby seized Mr. Johnson within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. The Court will therefore deny Defendants' Motion on this ground. . . . Defendants next argue that Mr. Johnson's own allegations and theory establish that Officer Adgar did not display the requisite objective intent to restrain because Officer Adgar's actions 'objectively evinced the opposite: an intent to repel assaultive suspects and deter them from remaining in the area.'. . . The Court . . . finds that Mr. Johnson's allegations are sufficient to support a theory of seizure under Nelson. . . Under Nelson, to establish a seizure, Mr. Johnson must prove that he was subject to an intentional application of force evincing an objective intent to restrain, regardless of whether Officer Adgar subjectively intended to repel him and whether he was in fact subdued or restrained. . . . Drawing all inferences in favor of Mr. Johnson on this motion for summary judgment, the Court finds that this evidence is sufficient to create a disputed issue of fact as to whether a reasonable person would find that Officer Adgar objectively intended to restrain Mr. Johnson by firing at him.")

Hawatmeh v. City of Henderson, No. 222CV01786APGDJA, 2023 WL 5796641, at *4–5 (D. Nev. Sept. 6, 2023) ("The Hawatmehs first argue that Joseph was seized when HPD officers surrounded the Escalade, citing the many officers in the area and the mention of stop sticks to immobilize the vehicle. But that argument is predicated on the idea that officers seized the Escalade's occupants by acquisition of control, and 'actual control is a necessary element for this type of seizure.'. . Bourne, not the officers, had actual control of Joseph in the Escalade. The 911 call transcript reflects Bourne telling Joseph what to say and do, pointing a gun at him, and threatening to shoot him in the head. . . A seizure by control requires 'that a person be stopped by the very instrumentality set in motion ... to achieve that result.'. . The complaint does not allege that the stop sticks or any other mechanism stopped the vehicle, nor is it clear how 'surrounded' the Escalade was. . . And for seizures by control, a 'show of authority' without a corresponding termination of freedom of movement is not a seizure. . . Nor could Joseph have been seized through voluntary submission to a show of authority. A person is seized after an intentional show of authority when 'in view of all of the circumstances surrounding the incident, a reasonable person would have believed that he was not free to leave.'. . Joseph would have believed he was not free to leave because of Bourne, not because of the officers there to rescue him. Joseph was not seized when officers surrounded the vehicle. The Hawatmehs next argue Joseph was seized when officers shot him. They argue a 'seizure occurs even when an unintended person or thing is the object of the detention or taking,' so long as the taking is 'willful.'. . Because officers willfully fired on the Escalade, the Hawatmehs argue, officers seized Joseph when they shot him even if they did not mean to shoot him specifically. But because officers intended to seize Bourne, not Joseph or the vehicle, Joseph was not seized under the Fourth Amendment. A seizure by force requires 'the use of force with intent to restrain. Accidental force will not qualify.' [citing Torres] 'Nor will force intentionally applied for some other purpose satisfy this rule.'. . The question is therefore not whether officers used intentional force, but rather whether they used force 'with intent to restrain.'. . An officer who intentionally fires at a suspect but hits an innocent bystander does not seize the bystander, because the bystander was not the intended object of the force. . . By contrast, an officer who intentionally fires at a victim they mistook for a suspect has seized the victim, because the victim was the intended object of the officer's force. . . And an officer who intentionally shoots at a group of students and hits one has seized the student, even if the officer did not intend to seize that specific student, because the officer intended to apply force to the group. Nelson v. City of Davis, 685 F.3d 867, 877 (9th Cir. 2012). Finally, officers who intentionally shoot at a truck slowly moving towards them seize the truck's passenger, even if they are unaware of the passenger's presence, because they intentionally fired at the truck to stop its movement. Villanueva, 986 F.3d at 1167-69. These cases make clear that the force required for a Fourth Amendment seizure is not just force intentionally applied, but rather force intentionally applied to the target that officers sought to restrain. Joseph was not seized when he was shot because unlike in Villanueva, where officers intended to restrain the truck (and incidentally anyone in it), or Nelson, where officers intended to restrain the group (and incidentally anyone in it), officers shot at the Escalade exclusively to restrain Bourne. The complaint indicates Bourne put a gun to Joseph's head and then officers fired. While it states that officers on scene failed to deescalate the situation or communicate with other officers to prevent contagious gunfire, it does not allege facts indicating an intent to restrain anyone or anything other than Bourne. . . The Hawatmehs also argue that after Bourne was initially shot, Joseph became a passenger, not a hostage, and per Villanueva, a passenger shot when officers attempt to stop a vehicle is seized. . . But as discussed, officers were trying to stop Bourne, not the vehicle, and Villanueva itself distinguishes 'the very different situation where the passenger was also a hostage and the officers were trying to rescue the passenger, not arrest him.'. . The great weight of authority indicates a hostage accidentally injured by police force aimed at their captor is not seized within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. See, e.g., Landol-Rivera v. Cruz Cosme, 906 F.2d 791, 795 (1st Cir. 1990); Medeiros v. O'Connell, 150 F.3d 164, 168 (2d Cir. 1998); Childress v. City of Arapaho, 210 F.3d 1154, 1156-57 (10th Cir. 2000). Even viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, Joseph was neither seized when officers surrounded the Escalade nor when he was shot. But even if he was seized, the officers would be entitled to qualified immunity. The Hawatmehs do not identify, nor can I find, clearly established law that a hostage in either circumstance is seized under the Fourth Amendment. To the extent the Hawatmehs contend that Villanueva clearly establishes that a hostage-passenger is seized when officers intentionally shoot at a vehicle such that every reasonable official would know their conduct was a Fourth Amendment seizure (a proposition with which I disagree), that proposition was not clearly established in November 2020. I therefore dismiss the excessive force claim asserted by Iehab as the appointed administrator of Joseph's estate with leave to amend. It does not appear there are facts under these circumstances that would plausibly allege a Fourth Amendment violation. Nevertheless, out of an abundance of caution, if Iehab as the appointed administrator of Joseph's estate can allege sufficient facts to state a claim, then I give him the opportunity to do so.") Tuggle v. City of Tulare, No. 119CV01525JLTSAB, 2023 WL 4273900, at *15–16 (E.D. Cal. June 29, 2023) ("Cuevas argues that she was seized by the officers' 'intentional gunshots into the car.'. . She relies on, Villanueva v. California, 986 F.3d 1158 (9th Cir. 2021), to argue that when 'officers fired shots at the driver of a vehicle following a pursuit, killing the driver and injuring the passenger,' the passenger is also seized by those gunshots. . . In Villanueva, the Ninth Circuit held that a passenger injured by officers who shot at a vehicle while attempting to stop the vehicle from escaping have a cognizable Fourth Amendment claim. . . The Ninth Circuit explained that whether officers knew passengers were in the vehicle was irrelevant because the injured passenger was the 'subject to the Officers' "intentional action to stop the car"—and with it the "objectively manifested' restraint on his movement—whether the Officers knew he was a passenger when they fired or not.'. . Critically, however, the officers in Villanueva shot at the vehicle 'with the intent of stopping the Silverado from moving, effecting a traffic stop by force' and seizing all occupants of the car in the process. . . In this case, the officers shot at the vehicle not to stop it—it had already stopped when it skidded into the mud embankment—and after Castro had stopped his attempts to escape the police. . . Then, Officer Bradley, Sgt. Garcia, and Officer Puente discharged their weapons in response to Castro shooting Officer Garcia and the K9. . . Even assuming the officers did not know precisely who was firing, the evidence shows they directed their shots at the shooter, whom they believed to be the driver, and not at the car in general. . . In contrast to Villanueva, instances where the police shoot at a vehicle to neutralize a safety threat posed by the driver, the officers do not intentionally seize the accidently injured passengers.");

TENTH CIRCUIT

Packard v. Budaj, 86 F.4th 859, 867, 869-70 (10th Cir. 2023) ("[Defendants] contend there is no evidence Plaintiffs were intentionally targeted. They explain less-lethal munitions are not implements of 'seizure,' but 'tool[s] to disperse crowds.'. . And they argue Graham is a framework ill-suited for protest cases like this, where 'it was a practical impossibility for the Aurora Officers here to assess an individualized threat in the circumstances presented to them.'. . But construing the evidence in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, the district court rejected these contentions. 'A reasonable juror,' the district court explained, 'could ... infer ... that Officer McNamee shot Mr. Packard intentionally, and Officer Budaj shot Mr. Duran intentionally.'. . We are bound by this inference and the facts supporting it. And based on this finding, we reject Defendants' suggestion that Messrs. Packard and Duran were simply unintended victims of an effort to disperse protesters. . . . Defendants resist the import of Fogarty and Buck by contending neither case involved plaintiffs shot while 'in the vicinity of other individuals against whom officers were justifiably using force.'. . Defendants suggest, then, that Messrs. Duran and Packard were accidentally shot based on their proximity to others. . . But as we have explained, the district court affirmatively found, based on the evidence properly construed in favor of the non-movant, that a reasonable jury could find the shootings here were intentional. Again, that view of the facts is not blatantly contradicted by the record, and we will not displace it. . . . By May of 2020, when the incidents here occurred, it had been clearly established for (at least) twelve years that the deployment of less-lethal munitions on an unthreatening protester who is neither committing a serious offense nor seeking to flee is unconstitutionally excessive force.")

Bjelland v. City and County of Denver, No. 1:22-CV-01338-SKC-SBP, 2024 WL 4165428, at *4-6 (D. Colo. Sept. 12, 2024) ("Defendants' primary argument with respect to Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claims is that Plaintiffs were not seized because the 'chemical agents or exploded pepper balls [ ] did not physically touch [them] and did not cause them to submit to any officer's authority.'. . Defendants also contend they are entitled to summary judgment because Plaintiffs cannot show any officer intentionally applied force to seize them. These arguments are not persuasive. . . . The Court can discern no logical reason why the use of chemical agents might constitute a use of physical force under the law when used on incarcerated persons, but not when used on peaceful protestors in the context alleged here. . . Thus, whether any 'physical' force was deployed in this case is at best a disputed issue of material fact. . . .A seizure by force. . . does not require control. Instead, it 'requires the use of force with intent to restrain,' as opposed to force applied by accident or for some other purpose. . . .The Court is persuaded that 'even absent an arrest, the use of chemical spray and less-lethal projectiles can [ ] amount to a cognizable restraint under the Fourth Amendment where the clear effect of officers' use of pepper spray was to control plaintiffs' movement.'. . Here, there is evidence that nearly all the Plaintiffs came into physical contact with chemical agents that effectively restrained their freedom of movement and constituted more than a minimal intrusion on their bodily integrity. To be sure, many of the Plaintiffs were disoriented, momentarily blinded, and unable to breathe, while at least one was incapacitated completely. . . Thus, the Court is satisfied there is sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to conclude Plaintiffs were seized within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. Defendants also contend Plaintiffs cannot show any officer intentionally applied force to seize them. But this imposes a subjective standard on an otherwise objective inquiry. Courts 'rarely probe the subjective motivations of police officers in the Fourth Amendment context,'. . . and therefore, the question is whether 'the challenged conduct objectively manifests an intent to restrain.'. . But Defendants do not argue this legal standard. They instead argue an incorrect subjective standard on this claim. And because Defendants have not addressed the appropriate legal standard, the Court concludes they have failed to meet their burden. Consequently, their request for summary judgment on this basis is denied.")

Dayton v. City & County of Denver, Colorado, 649 F. Supp. 3d 1124, 1137 (D. Colo. 2023) ("Guided by Torres, this Court finds that the Complaint plausibly alleges a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim. The allegations show that Defendants John Does 1-4 'began advancing on the crowd' and one of them 'threw a flash-bang grenade directly at Mr. Dayton, who was still sitting in the middle of the crowd.'. . The flash-bang grenade 'struck Mr. Dayton directly in his left elbow' and exploded, searing Mr. Dayton's eyes.'. . The Complaint further alleges that flash-bang grenades 'are hand-thrown explosive devices that emit a bright flash and a loud noise' and which 'are designed to disorient' and 'can cause temporary blindness and deafness.'. . Applying the Graham factors, the Court finds that these allegations are sufficient to show that Defendants unreasonably seized Mr. Dayton by advancing on him and throwing a flash-bang grenade at him while he was peacefully sitting on the ground. . . Stated differently, Defendants' conduct 'objectively manifested an intent' to restrain and incapacitate Mr. Dayton while he was peacefully protesting. Torres, 141 S. Ct. at 999. As such, the Complaint plausibly states a Fourth Amendment claim.")

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Ratlieff v. City of Fort Lauderdale, 748 F.Supp.3d 1202, ____ (S.D. Fla. 2024) ("In opposition to summary judgment, Ratlieff dedicates little more than a page to defending her claim that there remains a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether she was unreasonably seized. . . In doing so, she largely rehashes the same argument this Court already rejected at the dismissal stage. . . Essentially, Ratlieff claims that, because the undisputed facts confirm she was tear gassed repeatedly and ultimately struck with an FLPD-deployed KIP that incapacitated her, her freedom of movement was therefore restricted by means intentionally applied and she was thus unreasonably seized within the ambit of the Fourth Amendment. . . Ratlieff's reprised argument is equally unavailing. At the outset, the Court notes that Ratlieff has identified no new evidence during discovery that otherwise alters her original Fourth Amendment seizure theory, which the Court has already rejected. Order at 15–17. She has once again failed to demonstrate how FLPD's deployment of tear gas and KIPs 'objectively manifest[ed]' an intent to restrain her—as opposed to being accidental or intentional force applied for some other purpose. . . Ratlieff's § 1983 theory maintains that FLPD officers deployed tear gas and KIPs against peaceful demonstrators without a dispersal order and with the specific intention to unlawfully disperse them for voicing anti-police-brutality views. . . But under Ratlieff's unlawful-dispersal theory, FLPD's deployment of tear gas and KIPs amount to intentional force applied for some other purpose. . . Ratlieff's Fourth Amendment claims thus fail the objective-intent-to-restrain test under Torres—a conclusion similarly reached by other courts. [collecting cases] . . . .Thus, after considering the parties' arguments and the undisputed facts, including the parties' video evidence, the Court concludes that Ratlieff has failed to create a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether she was unreasonably seized. . . Accordingly, Ratlieff's Fourth Amendment claims fail as a matter of law. Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on Count VIII. . . . In Counts V and VI, Ratlieff advances a § 1983 claim against all individual Defendants and the City, respectively, for violations of her substantive due process rights under a non-custodial excessive force theory. . . . [T]he Eleventh Circuit has recognized 'that under some circumstances, an individual not actually seized by an officer may have a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process right to be free from excessive force used on them by the officer.'. . To establish a substantive due process violation based on excessive force in a non-custodial setting such as this, the standard is the same: '[a] [p]laintiff must allege facts showing the [defendant's] conduct was "arbitrary or conscience-shocking."'. . . As noted above, there is no genuine dispute of material fact that Ratlieff was not subjected to a seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment on May 31, 2020. Accordingly, in order for her substantive due process claims based upon excessive force to survive summary judgment, Ratlieff must identify a genuine dispute of material fact that Defendants' conduct was 'arbitrary or conscience-shocking, in a constitutional sense.'. . She has not done so.")

See also Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S. Ct. 2012, 2022 n.4 (2014) ("There seems to be some disagreement among lower courts as to whether a passenger in Allen's situation can recover under a Fourth Amendment theory. Compare Vaughan v. Cox, 343 F.3d 1323 (C.A.11 2003) (suggesting yes), and Fisher v. Memphis, 234 F.3d 312 (C.A.6 2000) (same), with Milstead v. Kibler, 243 F.3d 157 (C.A.4 2001) (suggesting no), and Landol–Rivera v. Cruz Cosme, 906 F.2d 791 (C.A.1 1990) (same). We express no view on this question. We also note that in County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 836, 118 S.Ct. 1708, 140 L.Ed.2d 1043 (1998), the Court held that a passenger killed as a result of a police chase could recover under a substantive due process theory only if the officer had 'a purpose to cause harm unrelated to the legitimate object of arrest.'"); Mahdi v. Salt Lake Police Dep't, 54 F.4th 1232, 1236-39 (10th Cir. 2022) ("In cases of alleged excessive force by a state actor, we use two different standards to apply the shocks-the-conscience test. Selection of the appropriate standard turns on whether the state actor had time to deliberate before engaging in the complained-of conduct. When the state actor has the opportunity 'to engage in actual deliberation, conduct that shows deliberate indifference to a person's life or security will shock the conscience[.]'. . But if there is no such opportunity, conduct will shock the conscience only if it is done with the intent to harm the injured party. . . Mr. Mahdi proposes that we apply the deliberate-indifference standard in his case. We disagree. Time to engage in actual deliberation means time to really deliberate. Actual deliberation means 'more than having a few seconds to think.'. . It 'do[es] not mean "deliberation" in the narrow, technical sense in which it has sometimes been used in traditional homicide law.'. . Rather, it implies 'the luxury ... of having time to make unhurried judgments, upon the chance for repeated reflection, largely uncomplicated by the pulls of competing obligations.'. . Thus, there are two elements to the requisite deliberation. The first is time—time for 'unhurried judgments' and 'repeated reflection.' The other is the opportunity for attention—with no substantial 'pulls of competing obligations.' In other words, the intent-to-harm standard 'is not limited to situations calling for split-second reactions'; instead, it applies more broadly to scenarios where state actors make decisions 'in rapidly evolving, fluid, and dangerous situations which preclude the luxury of calm and reflective deliberation.'. . . [W]e apply the intent-to-harm standard to resolve substantive-due-process issues arising from police motor-vehicle pursuits. . . There may be police-chase cases in which the deliberate-indifference standard applies—and we do not rule out the possibility—but we are aware of none. . . . The officers' decision to open fire following the crash was a direct response to the circumstances they faced at that particular moment. They had only one or two seconds after arriving on scene to act and, as a matter of law, two seconds is inadequate for 'unhurried judgments [and] repeated reflection.'. . As for supervisors at headquarters, they may not be burdened by the moment-to-moment decisionmaking necessary while engaged in the pursuit; but they would be burdened by the lack of reliable information concerning ongoing events and the locations of the officers under their command. They, too, could not anticipate how the chase would end or create a decision tree addressing all reasonably possible scenarios, much less communicate it to over 15 officers engaged in the pursuit. . . . We do not foreclose the possibility that in some exceptional circumstances (shooting at someone in a parade?) an innocent bystander inadvertently harmed by force directed at a suspect could have a cause of action under § 1983. But this is certainly not one of them. . . . We conclude that Mr. Mahdi was required to, but did not, allege that the officers intended to harm him. Therefore, neither his first nor his second amended complaint states a claim of a violation of his substantive-due-process rights."); Pearce v. Doe, 849 F. App'x 472, ___ (5th Cir. 2021) ("Here, the only plausible reading of the allegations is that Doe accidentally shot Ulises while trying to help him by ending the hostage situation. Such accidental conduct does not result in a Fourth Amendment seizure. . . As a result, Plaintiffs have not alleged a violation of the Fourth Amendment. And even if arguendo Plaintiffs could allege a violation of the Fourth Amendment, . . . they have not come close to doing so in a way that overcomes Agent Doe's qualified immunity."); Villanueva v. California, 986 F.3d 1158, 1167-69 (9th Cir. 2021) ("Here, the Officers shot at Villanueva and the Silverado with the intent of stopping the Silverado from moving, effecting a traffic stop by force and seizing Orozco in the process, just as the Brower roadblock would have constituted a seizure of the driver, as well as of any passengers in the car. . . Thus, Orozco was seized under clearly established law as soon as the Officers intentionally fired at the Silverado to effect the stop. The Officers also dispute that they knew Orozco was in the Silverado. But under Brendlin's logic, it is irrelevant whether they knew any passengers were in the car, because they stopped the car and all its possible occupants when they shot at it. Here, Orozco was subject to the Officers' 'intentional action to stop the car'—and with it the 'objectively manifested' restraint on his movement—whether the Officers knew he was a passenger when they fired or not. . . The Third Circuit agrees that Brendlin 'ma[kes] clear that an officer's knowledge of a passenger's presence in the vehicle is not dispositive' to the question of seizure 'so long as the detention is willful and not merely the consequence of an unknowing act.' Davenport v. Borough of Homestead, 870 F.3d 273, 279 (3d Cir. 2017) (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). Indeed, all of the other circuits that have addressed whether a passenger struck by a stray bullet aimed at the vehicle or driver has a cognizable Fourth Amendment claim agree with our conclusion that such a passenger does have a Fourth Amendment claim in these circumstances. The Third, Sixth, and Eleventh Circuits have all concluded that by intentionally stopping a vehicle, an officer subjects the vehicle's passenger to a Fourth Amendment seizure. See Davenport, 870 F.3d at 279 ("[A] passenger shot by an officer during the course of a vehicular pursuit may seek relief under the Fourth Amendment."); Vaughan v. Cox, 343 F.3d 1323, 1328 (11th Cir. 2003) ("[B]ecause he did not intend to shoot [the passenger], [the officer] contends that [the passenger] did not suffer a Fourth Amendment seizure. We disagree."); Fisher v. City of Memphis, 234 F.3d 312, 318–19 (6th Cir. 2000) ("By shooting at the driver of the moving car, [the officer] intended to stop the car, effectively seizing everyone inside, including the Plaintiff."); see also Lytle v. Bexar Ctny., Tex., 560 F.3d 404, 410 (5th Cir. 2009) (no dispute that the passenger was " 'seized' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment"). No other Circuit has addressed the question. The Officers cite cases from the First, Second, and Tenth Circuits, arguing for a contrary result, but those cases were all pre-Brendlin, and address the very different situation where the passenger was also a hostage and the officers were trying to rescue the passenger, not arrest him. See Childress v. City of Arapaho, 210 F.3d 1154, 1157 (10th Cir. 2000) ("The police officers in the instant case did not 'seize' plaintiffs within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment but rather made every effort to deliver them from unlawful abduction."); Medeiros v. O'Connell, 150 F.3d 164, 168 (2d Cir. 1998) ("[F]ar from seeking to restrain [the injured hostage's] freedom, the troopers' every effort was bent on delivering all the hostages from deadly peril."); Landol-Rivera v. Cruz Cosme, 906 F.2d 791, 795 (1st Cir. 1990) ("A police officer's deliberate decision to shoot at a car containing a robber and a hostage for the purpose of stopping the robber's flight does not result in the sort of willful detention of the hostage that the Fourth Amendment was designed to govern."). . . Moreover, as of the time of the events here, we had already applied Brendlin and Brower to hold that a Fourth Amendment seizure occurred where the officers intentionally used force that injured an individual in a crowd. Nelson v. City of Davis, 685 F.3d 867, 876 (9th Cir. 2012). There, we concluded that Nelson was 'unquestionably seized under the Fourth Amendment,'. . . by officers who intentionally shot pepperballs into a large college party they wished to disperse, even though the officers did not specifically intend to target Nelson, who was hit in the eye with one of the projectiles[.] . .As here, we rejected the officers' argument that because Nelson was not individually the target of their use of force, his injury was unintentional and thus not in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . We therefore conclude that under Brower, Brendlin, and Nelson, because Orozco's freedom of movement was terminated when the Officers intentionally shot at the Silverado in which he was a passenger to stop its

