Author's Note

This outline is arranged under various topic headings that indicate problem areas likely to be encountered in the litigation of section 1983 cases. The outline is not a substitute for the excellent treatises that exist on section 1983, but is intended as a useful research tool to keep informed of very recent case law and trends in this rapidly developing area.

Please be advised that I do not use research assistants to prepare these outlines, so that any errors are my own. Each updated outline attempts to remove cases that may no longer be good law or to indicate any negative history of a case where important. I would advise that you check the current status of any case you intend to rely on, especially a district court opinion.

OVERVIEW OF SECTION 1983 LITIGATION

OVERVIEW OF SECTION 1983 LITIGATION

I. PRELIMINARY PRINCIPLES

A. Deprivation of a Federal Right

Title 42 U.S.C. § 1983 provides in relevant part:

> Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress, except that in any action brought against a judicial officer for an act or omission taken in such officer's judicial capacity, injunctive relief shall not be granted unless a declaratory decree was violated or declaratory relief was unavailable.

Note that a plaintiff must assert the violation or deprivation of a right secured by federal law. The Court has recently held that a violation of Miranda does not in itself violate the Constitution and does not provide the basis for a claim under section 1983. Compare Vega v. Tekoh, 142 S. Ct. 2095, 2101, 2105-06, 2108 (2022) ("The question we must decide is whether a violation of the Miranda rules provides a basis for a claim under § 1983. We hold that it does not. . . . In this case, the Ninth Circuit held—and Tekoh now argues. . . that a violation of Miranda constitutes a violation of the Fifth Amendment right against compelled self-incrimination, but that is wrong. Miranda itself and our subsequent cases make clear that Miranda imposed a set of prophylactic rules. Those rules, to be sure, are 'constitutionally based,'. . . but they are prophylactic rules nonetheless. . . . Contrary to the decision below and Tekoh's argument here, . . . our decision in Dickerson, 530 U. S. 428, did not upset the firmly established prior understanding of Miranda as a prophylactic decision. Dickerson involved a federal statute, 18 U. S. C. § 3501, that effectively overruled Miranda by making the admissibility of a statement given during custodial interrogation turn solely on whether it was made voluntarily. . . . The Court held that Congress could not abrogate Miranda by statute because Miranda was a 'constitutional decision' that adopted a 'constitutional rule,'. . . and the Court noted that these rules could not have been made applicable to the States if it did not have that status[.] . . . At the same time, however, the Court made it clear that it was not equating a violation of the Miranda rules with an outright Fifth Amendment violation. For one thing, it reiterated Miranda's observation that 'the Constitution would not preclude legislative solutions that differed from the prescribed Miranda warnings but which were "at least as effective in apprising accused persons"' of their rights. . . Even more to the point, the Court rejected the dissent's argument that § 3501 could not be held unconstitutional unless 'Miranda warnings are required by the Constitution, in the sense that nothing else will suffice to satisfy constitutional requirements.'. . The Court's answer, in substance, was that the Miranda rules, though not an explication of the meaning of the Fifth Amendment right, are rules that are necessary to protect that right (at least until a better alternative is found and adopted). . . Thus, in the words of the Dickerson Court, the Miranda rules are 'constitutionally based' and have 'constitutional underpinnings.'. . But the obvious point of these formulations was to avoid saying that a Miranda violation is the same as a violation of the Fifth Amendment right. What all this boils down to is basically as follows. The Miranda rules are prophylactic rules that the Court found to be necessary to protect the Fifth Amendment right against compelled self-incrimination. In that sense, Miranda was a 'constitutional decision' and it adopted a 'constitutional rule' because the decision was based on the Court's judgment about what is required to safeguard that constitutional right. And when the Court adopts a constitutional prophylactic rule of this nature, Dickerson concluded, the rule has the status of a 'La[w] of the United States' that is binding on the States under the Supremacy Clause . . . and the rule cannot be altered by ordinary legislation. This was a bold and controversial claim of authority. . . but we do not think that Dickerson can be understood any other way without (1) taking the insupportable position that a Miranda violation is tantamount to a violation of the Fifth Amendment, (2) calling into question the prior decisions that were predicated on the proposition that a Miranda violation is not the same as a constitutional violation, and (3) excising from the United States Reports a mountain of statements describing the Miranda rules as prophylactic. . . . Because a violation of Miranda is not itself a violation of the Fifth Amendment, and because we see no justification for expanding Miranda to confer a right to sue under § 1983, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.") with Vega v. Tekoh, 142 S. Ct. 2095, 2108-11 (2022) (Kagan, J., joined by Breyer and Sotomayor, JJ., dissenting) ("The Court's decision in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U. S. 436 (1966), affords well-known protections to suspects who are interrogated by police while in custody. Those protections derive from the Constitution: Dickerson v. United States tells us in no uncertain terms that Miranda is a 'constitutional rule.'. . And that rule grants a corresponding right: If police fail to provide the Miranda warnings to a suspect before interrogating him, then he is generally entitled to have any resulting confession excluded from his trial. . .From those facts, only one conclusion can follow—that Miranda's protections are a 'right[ ]' 'secured by the Constitution' under the federal civil rights statute. . . Yet the Court today says otherwise. It holds that Miranda is not a constitutional right enforceable through a § 1983 suit. And so it prevents individuals from obtaining any redress when police violate their rights under Miranda. I respectfully dissent. . . . Over and over, Dickerson labels Miranda a rule stemming from the Constitution. . . . In Dickerson, the Court considered a federal statute whose obvious purpose was to override Miranda. Dickerson held that Miranda is a 'constitutional decision' that cannot be 'overruled by' any 'Act of Congress.'. . To be sure, Congress may devise 'legislative solutions that differ[ ] from the prescribed Miranda warnings,' but only if those solutions are '"at least as effective."'. . Dickerson therefore instructs (as noted above) that Miranda sets a 'constitutional minimum.'. . No statute may provide lesser protection than that baseline. . . . So Dickerson is unequivocal: Miranda is set in constitutional stone. . . . Today, the Court strips individuals of the ability to seek a remedy for violations of the right recognized in Miranda. The majority observes that defendants may still seek 'the suppression at trial of statements obtained' in violation of Miranda's procedures. . . But sometimes, such a statement will not be suppressed. And sometimes, as a result, a defendant will be wrongly convicted and spend years in prison. He may succeed, on appeal or in habeas, in getting the conviction reversed. But then, what remedy does he have for all the harm he has suffered? The point of § 1983 is to provide such redress—because a remedy 'is a vital component of any scheme for vindicating cherished constitutional guarantees.'. . The majority here, as elsewhere, injures the right by denying the remedy. See, e.g., Egbert v. Boule, 596 U. S. ___ (2022). I respectfully dissent.")

See also Blackmon v. Jones, No. 23-3288, 2025 WL 869045, at *3 (7th Cir. Mar. 20, 2025) ("The officers have not asked for qualified immunity with respect to the counts of Blackmon's complaint that charge them with manufacturing evidence or coercing testimony. Their appeal is limited to Blackmon's contention that an unduly suggestive photo array or lineup by itself entitles an accused to damages. And our answer—that it does not—is limited to that issue. Blackmon's appropriate remedy on that subject would have been exclusion of evidence at trial, not damages. We have so far looked at this suit using the framework established by Vega in 2022. A different perspective would ask whether, in 2002, when the police obtained these identifications, it was clearly established that investigating officers could be personally liable under § 1983 for conducting a suggestive lineup. The answer is no. Before 2002 neither this circuit, nor any other, had held that an officer could be liable for employing suggestive identification procedures. . . And it did not become clearly established in the years between 2002 and 2022 that officers could be personally liable for suggestive identification procedures. Even as late as 2022, this circuit expressed uncertainty about how the law treats these situations, Holloway v. Milwaukee, 43 F.4th 760, 766 (7th Cir. 2022). At least one other circuit held that damages for suggestive identification procedures would be 'unprecedented and unwarranted' unless the officer misled the prosecutor or lied to the judge. Wray v. New York, 490 F.3d 189, 193 (2d Cir. 2007). We agree with Wray that any 'violation [of the right to a fair trial] was caused by the ill-considered acts and decisions of the prosecutor and trial judge' (and, here, defense counsel too). . . Blackmon has not cited, and we have not found, any appellate decision holding police officers liable in damages when judges allowed prosecutors to introduce suggestive identifications into evidence at trial. The absence of a clearly established right entitles the defendants in this case to qualified immunity."); Holloway v. City of Milwaukee, 43 F.4th 760, 766 (7th Cir. 2022) ("This case is not about Miranda. But at oral argument, while the Court's decision in Tekoh was pending, we asked the parties whether the protection against unduly suggestive identification procedures is, like Miranda, only a trial right, or whether it is more broadly enforceable, through either a suit under section 1983 or otherwise. This is an important question, but we conclude that it need not be resolved in this opinion. The parties paid no heed to it until we raised the issue at oral argument. And there are at least two plausible answers: perhaps the right to be free from suggestive identification procedures is a substantive right that flows from the Due Process Clauses; or perhaps, even though a constitutional right, it is just a trial right that is not violated unless there is a tainted identification at trial. As we explain below, the outcome of Holloway's case does not turn on these distinctions. We thus flag the issue and save it for another day.")

The Court has also reaffirmed that the language "and laws" means what it says. See Health & Hospital Corporation of Marion County v. Talevski, No. 21-806, 2023 WL 3872515, at *3 (U.S. June 8, 2023) ("'Laws' means 'laws,' no less today than in the 1870s, and nothing in petitioners' appeal to Reconstruction-era contract law shows otherwise. Consequently, as we have previously held, § 1983 can presumptively be used to enforce unambiguously conferred federal individual rights, unless a private right of action under § 1983 would thwart any enforcement mechanism that the rights-creating statute contains for protection of the rights it has created. . . We hold that the two FNHRA provisions at issue here do unambiguously create § 1983-enforceable rights. And we discern no incompatibility between private enforcement under § 1983 and the statutory scheme that Congress has devised for the protection of those rights. Accordingly, we affirm the lower court's judgment that respondent's § 1983 action can proceed in court. . . . We have been asked before to narrow the scope of this express authorization, i.e., to read 'laws' to mean only 'civil rights or equal protection laws.'. . We declined to do so, reasoning that a straightforward reading of the 'plain language' of § 1983 is required. . .That should have been no surprise; 'Congress attached no modifiers to the phrase ["and laws"].' Since Thiboutot, we have crafted a test for determining whether a particular federal law actually secures rights for § 1983 purposes. . . But we have not previously doubted that any federal law can do so. . . . We have no doubt that HHC wishes § 1983 said something else. But that is 'an appeal better directed to Congress.'. . Hewing to § 1983's text and history (not to mention our precedent and constitutional role), we reject HHC's request, and reaffirm that 'laws' in § 1983 means what it says. . . .The FNHRA can create § 1983-enforceable rights. But do the two FNHRA provisions at issue in this case actually do so? In that respect, our precedent sets a demanding bar: Statutory provisions must unambiguously confer individual federal rights. . . For the reasons explained below, we conclude that the bar has been cleared with respect to the presently contested provisions [unnecessary-restraint and predischarge-notice provisions]. And while the FNHRA itself might nevertheless evince Congress's intent to preclude the use of § 1983 to enforce these particular rights, . . . we hold further that it does not.")

The Supreme Court has made clear that an officer's violation of state law in making an arrest does not make a warrantless arrest unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment where the arrest was for a crime committed in the presence of the arresting officer. Virginia v. Moore, 128 S. Ct. 1598, 1607 (2008). See also Myrick v. Fulton County, Georgia, 69 F.4th 1277, 1303 n.28 (11th Cir. 2023) ("It is true that Officers Delacruz, Cook, Whitaker, Roache, and Jackson were disciplined for violating Fulton County Jail policy with respect to the additional restraints. But violation of a local policy or procedure does not automatically mean that May's constitutional rights were violated. . . Simply because something is in violation of a policy, or even illegal, does not make it unconstitutional."); Flynn v. Donnelly, No. 18-2590, 2019 WL 6522890, at *3 (7th Cir. Dec. 4, 2019) (not reported) ("In their brief, Pirro and Flynn stated without elaboration that they allege violations of 'Constitutionally protected rights to be free from illegal stops, questioning, interrogation, detention, charging, and incarceration.' But, even when repeatedly pressed at oral argument, they pointed only to state law for the proposition that their seizures violated the Fourth Amendment. A violation of state law, however, 'is completely immaterial as to the question of whether a violation of the federal constitution has been established.'. . The appellants could not articulate what, apart from the illegitimate nature of the SAFE unit, purportedly violated their Fourth Amendment rights. Perhaps there was an argument to be made that deputizing civilians to make traffic stops violates the Fourth Amendment's standards apart from any violations of state law, but these plaintiffs did not make it. The judgment of the district court is AFFIRMED."); Oglesby v. Lesan, 929 F.3d 526, 534 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Officer Hein and Deputy Lesan did not violate the Fourth Amendment solely by arresting Oglesby outside of the Lincoln city limits."); Cummings v. Dean, 913 F.3d 1227, 1243 (10th Cir. 2019) ("[T]the district court's reasoning is flawed because it equates a violation of a clear obligation under state law . . . with a violation of clearly-established federal law. Whether Director Dean violated clearly-established state law in failing to set CBA-based rates, however, is an entirely separate question from whether that failure violated clearly-established federal law. And even if Director Dean had notice that his reading of the Act was incorrect as a matter of state law, this would not necessarily deprive him of qualified immunity from liability under federal law."); Hoffman v. Knoebel, 894 F.3d 836, 845 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Everyone agrees that Knoebel and Snelling lacked any semblance of state-law authority to arrest DTC [Drug Treatment Court] participants. But, as Virginia v. Moore, 553 U.S. 164 (2008), makes clear, that flaw does not show that there was a federal constitutional violation. As the Court held in Moore, an arrest based on probable cause, even if prohibited by state law, does not violate the Fourth Amendment. . . Knoebel and Snelling acted pursuant to facially valid state warrants, and so probable cause to support the arrests either existed, or they reasonably believed that it did. . . That is not to say that all was well from a broader point of view. The extent to which Knoebel and Snelling exceeded their jurisdiction is quite troubling. Snelling was a bailiff whose arrest powers did not extend past the courthouse doors, and Judge Jacobi testified that he told Snelling not to arrest people. Knoebel had no conceivable basis for arrest authority, though in fairness she did not personally handcuff any participants. Both defendants misleadingly brought with them indicia of authority—badges, guns, and in one case a call of 'police'—when they had no actual authority. But these are all matters of state law: no one argues that any other aspects of the arrest would offend the Fourth Amendment. The warrants were valid, no excessive force was used, and each plaintiff was promptly taken to the DTC. This does not add up to a Fourth Amendment violation."); Hurem v. Tavares, 793 F.3d 742, 746-47 (7th Cir. 2015) ("We begin with a point that could, on its own, dispose of this argument: 'state restrictions do not alter the Fourth Amendment's protections.' [citing Virginia v. Moore] . . . A state may 'choose[ ] to protect privacy beyond the level that the Fourth Amendment requires,' but the Fourth Amendment requires only that an arrest be based upon probable cause, which 'serves interests that have long been seen as sufficient to justify the seizure.'. .The remedy for a violation of such a state law is in state court. We recognized in Gordon v. Degelmann, 29 F.3d 295, 301 (7th Cir .1994), that Illinois's forcible entry statute imposes a prior procedural requirement before a person can be removed from a particular property: there must be a judicial hearing to determine a person's entitlement to remain. We observed that this procedure went beyond what the Fourth Amendment requires and concluded that a police officer's failure to afford the plaintiff the hearing mandated by state law 'does not matter—not, at least, to a claim under the fourth amendment and § 1983,' given the plaintiff's violation of Illinois's criminal trespass law. . . So it is in Hurem's case, and we decline his invitation to overrule Gordon."); Bruce v. Guernsey, 777 F.3d 872, 876 (7th Cir. 2015) ("[T]he constitutionality of a mental-health seizure does not depend on whether the officer met each requirement spelled out by Illinois state law. Whether or not an officer complied with these state law conditions may have some evidentiary value when determining whether that officer's conduct was reasonable, but a violation of the Illinois Mental Health and Developmental Disabilities Code does not constitute a per se violation of the Fourth Amendment. Our task instead is to see whether Harris and Guernsey had probable cause to believe that Bruce needed immediate hospitalization because she was a danger to herself or others."); Snider Intern. Corp. v. Town of Forest Heights, Md., 739 F.3d 140, 145 (4th Cir. 2014) ("A basic requirement of a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 violation is 'the depriv[ation] of a right secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States.'. . Conduct violating state law without violating federal law will not give rise to a § 1983 claim. . .We find Appellants' third challenge, which concerns whether the citations comply with the Maryland statute, misplaced in a § 1983 claim. Even if the citations violated Maryland law, the noncompliance would not violate federal law and thus cannot give rise to § 1983 relief. . . . The district court properly found that Appellants cannot pursue § 1983 relief for acts that allegedly violate only Maryland law."); Tebbens v. Mushol, 692 F.3d 807, 818 (7th Cir. 2012) ("[I]t is firmly established that the Fourth Amendment permits an officer to make an arrest when he or she has probable cause to believe that an individual has committed or is committing an act which constitutes an offense under state law, regardless of whether state law authorizes an arrest for that particular offense."); Luckert v. Dodge County, 684 F.3d 808, 819 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Failure to follow written procedures does not constitute per se deliberate indifference. If this were so, such a rule would create an incentive for jails to keep their policies vague, or not formalize policies at all. And the record in this case does not show any evidence, nor are we aware of any precedent, from which jail officials would know a thirty-minute suicide watch—as opposed to a twenty-minute watch—is constitutionally impermissible, or that keeping a suicide notebook is constitutionally required."); Johnson v. Phillips, 664 F.3d 232, 238 (8th Cir. 2011) ("That Phillips lacked authority under state law to make an arrest does not establish that his conduct violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . The outstanding warrant gave Phillips probable cause to arrest Johnson, and that probable cause satisfied the Fourth Amendment."); Rieck v. Jensen, 651 F.3d 1188, 1191, 1194 (10th Cir. 2011) ("[T]he Supreme Court has made it clear that the Fourth Amendment does not track property law. Twice the Supreme Court has held that a trespass by law-enforcement officers did not violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . [T]he end of the driveway near the gate did not fall within the curtilage of Rieck's home, and Jensen's entry into this area did not violate the Fourth Amendment."); Ault v. Speicher, 634 F.3d 942, 947 (7th Cir. 2011) ("[E]ven if Plaintiff could show that Defendant violated Illinois law, failure to comply with state procedures does not demonstrate the violation of Plaintiff's clearly established constitutional due process rights."); Porro v. Barnes, 624 F.3d 1322, 1329, 1330 (10th Cir. 2010) ("Policies are often prophylactic, setting standards of care higher than what the Constitution requires. And that's surely the case here. While the putative federal policy may totally forbid the use of tasers on immigration detainees, the Constitution doesn't go so far. The use of tasers in at least some circumstances − such as in a good faith effort to stop a detainee who is attempting to inflict harm on others – can comport with due process. . . . Simply put, the failure to enforce a prophylactic policy imposing a standard of care well in excess of what due process requires cannot be – and we hold is not – enough by itself to create a triable question over whether county officials were deliberately indifferent to the Constitution. This isn't to say, of course, a county's failure to train its employees in a prophylactic policy is always or categorically irrelevant to the question of deliberate indifference. We need and do reject only Mr. Porro's claim that such a failure alone suffices to make out a claim of deliberate indifference."); Marksmeier v. Davie, 622 F.3d 896, 901 (8th Cir. 2010) ("Despite Marksmeier's contention, it is unnecessary to decide whether Officer Davie was acting within his primary jurisdiction at the time he arrested Marksmeier because even if the arrest violated Nebraska law, it did not violate the Fourth Amendment. . . .Even assuming Nebraska law limited Officer Davie's geographic jurisdiction, Officer Davie had probable cause to believe Marksmeier committed a sexual assault on JP and a physical assault on SP, thus no Fourth Amendment violation occurred."); Edgerly v. City and County of San Francisco, 599 F.3d 946, 956 n.14, 957 (9th Cir. 2010) ("In our previous opinion, we held that Edgerly's arrest was unconstitutional and that the Officers were not entitled to qualified immunity in light of the state law restriction on arrests for first-time offenses of this kind. . . We withdrew our opinion after the Supreme Court decided Virginia v. Moore, in which it held that such state arrest restrictions are irrelevant to our Fourth Amendment inquiry. . . We are now bound by Moore, and to the extent that Bingham and Reed are inconsistent with Moore, they are effectively overruled. . . . Bull, however, left undisturbed our line of precedent requiring reasonable suspicion to strip search arrestees charged with minor offenses who are not classified for housing in the general jail population. . . This precedent controls here because Edgerly was never placed in the general jail population, but was merely cited and released at the station."); Francis v. Giacomelli, 588 F.3d 186, 195 (4th Cir. 2009) ("Commissioner Clark maintains that the Mayor did not have authority to terminate the Police Commissioner's employment, an allegation with which the Maryland Court of Appeals agreed in part. . . but that fact does not change the Fourth Amendment analysis. The fact that the Court of Appeals determined that Clark's firing was inconsistent with the Public Local Law of Baltimore City does not alone support the claim that the searches and seizures conducted in connection with the Mayor's effort to terminate Clark's employment violated the Fourth Amendment."); Holder v. Town Of Sandown, 585 F.3d 500, 507, 508 (1st Cir. 2009) ("We have relied on Moore to hold that when a prisoner's conversation with his attorney was recorded in violation of a state regulation, that violation of state law did not operate to nullify, for purposes of Fourth Amendment analysis, the client's consent to the recording. United States v. Novak, 531 F.3d 99, 102 (1st Cir.2008). Our colleagues in other circuits have reached similar conclusions. In Walker v. Prince George's County, Maryland, 575 F.3d 426, 430 (4th Cir.2009), the Fourth Circuit, relying on Moore, held that, even if a county ordinance required a police officer to verify that the owner of a wolf lacked a license before seizing the wolf, breach of that requirement would not establish a violation of the Fourth Amendment. In United States v. Brobst, 558 F.3d 982, 989-90 (9th Cir.2009), the Ninth Circuit relied on Moore to reject an argument that a seizure and arrest was constitutional only if it complied with the protections from search and seizure afforded by Montana law. These cases demonstrate that Moore applies not only to cases where certain crimes are explicitly made unarrestable offenses, but also to cases where state procedural requirements are not followed. . . We therefore conclude that the New Hampshire statute is irrelevant to the Fourth Amendment analysis that we must undertake to resolve the present claim. . . . From the foregoing analysis, we must conclude that, at the time he arrested Mr. Holder, the officer had sufficient information to conclude that the state offense of simple assault had taken place."); Bowling v. Rector, 584 F.3d 956, 970 (10th Cir. 2009) ("We conclude that the warrant was valid under the Fourth Amendment. Whether or not Rector's alleged conduct in seeking the warrant violated Oklahoma law, it did not violate Bowling's constitutional rights."); Swanson v. Town of Mountain View, Colo., 577 F.3d 1196, 1201 (10th Cir. 2009) ("We agree with the plaintiffs that Colorado law does not permit officers to enforce traffic infractions outside their home jurisdiction. As we held in United States v. Gonzales, 535 F.3d 1174, 1182 (10th Cir.2008), when officers stop a suspect for a 'traffic violation outside their jurisdiction, they violate[ ] Colorado law.' But this violation of Colorado law does not necessarily mean the defendants violated the plaintiffs' federal constitutional rights."); Pasco ex rel. Pasco v. Knoblauch, 566 F.3d 572, 579 (5th Cir. 2009) ("The district court concluded that Knoblauch's conduct violated clear Fourth Amendment law because Knoblauch 'was acting contrary to police department protocol' when he bumped Pasco off the road. However, the fact that Knoblauch acted contrary to his supervisor's order is constitutionally irrelevant. Violations of non-federal laws cannot form a basis for liability under § 1983, and qualified immunity is not lost because an officer violates department protocol."); Creusere v. Weaver, 2009 WL 170667, at *7 (6th Cir. Jan. 26, 2009) ("Creusere alleges that KEPSB [Kentucky Education Professional Standards Board] failed to follow its own procedures because it did not give him a copy of a report in 1995 and did not hold a hearing in a timely fashion after charges were brought against Creusere. Even taking these allegations as true, it is not a constitutional violation for a state agency not to follow its own procedures. . . Therefore, KEPSB's alleged failure to give a copy of the report to Creusere is not a constitutional violation, nor is its delay in holding a hearing. . . Since no constitutional violation occurred, the KEPSB members are entitled to rely upon qualified immunity for their actions."); Taake v. County of Monroe, 530 F.3d 538, 542 (7th Cir. 2008) ("Our caselaw already explains that mere breaches of contract by the government do not support substantive due process claims under the Constitution, . . . but we will explain it again, for the sake of future litigants who may think it a good idea to bring regular state-law contract claims to federal court via § 1983. When a state actor breaches a contract it has with a private citizen, and the subject matter of that contract does not implicate fundamental liberty or property interests, the state acts just like any other contracting private citizen . . . . [T]he proper tribunal to adjudicate issues arising from the contract (or alleged contract) is a state court . . . ."); Wilder v. Turner, 490 F.3d 810, 814(10th Cir.2007) ("Of course a 'violation of state law cannot give rise to a claim under Section 1983.' Marshall v. Columbia Lea Regional Hosp., 345 F.3d 1157, 1164 (10th Cir.2003). 'Section 1983 does not ... provide a basis for redressing violations of state law, but only for those violations of federal law done under color of state law.' Jones v. City and County of Denver, 854 F.2d 1206, 1209 (10th Cir.1988). 'While it is true that state law with respect to arrest is looked to for guidance as to the validity of the arrest since the officers are subject to those local standards, it does not follow that state law governs.' Wells v. Ward, 470 F.2d 1185, 1187 (10th Cir.1972). Nor, perhaps more importantly, are we bound by a state court's interpretation of federal law-in this case the Fourth Amendment."); Steen v. It may be that Officer Hespe's possible violation of the CPD's General Orders is of interest to his superiors when they are making discipline, promotion or salary decisions, but that information was immaterial in the proceedings before the district court and was properly excluded. Thus, he argues, 'Shawano County's policy was deliberately indifferent to a known risk to foster children.' Waubanascum seems to propose that state laws and regulations assume that failure to perform background checks necessarily will expose foster children to risk, thus constituting deliberate indifference. This argument misstates the legal standard, because it sidesteps the requirement that there be knowledge or suspicion of actual risk and substitutes the possibility of risk arising from the county's custom. Undoubtedly, foster children would be exposed to a heightened degree of risk if foster license applicants were subjected to no background checks at all. We may assume that it is this very concern that underlies Wisconsin's laws and regulations requiring such background checks before a foster license may be granted. But a failure to abide by a general statutory requirement for background checks cannot substitute for the requirement of actual knowledge or suspicion in the foster home context. . . . As noted, it is unclear that Shawano County actually did violate Wisconsin law in effect at the time that the county granted Fry the courtesy foster license. But in any event, state law does not create a duty under the federal constitution, so even if Shawano County failed to abide by Wisconsin law, this would not by itself amount to a violation of Waubanascum's due process rights."); Tanberg v. Sholtis, 401 F.3d 1151, 1164, 1165 (10th Cir. 2005) ("Although plaintiffs frequently wish to use administrative standards, like the Albuquerque SOPs, to support constitutional damages claims, this could disserve the objective of protecting civil liberties. Modern police departments are able – and often willing – to use administrative measures such as reprimands, salary adjustments, and promotions to encourage a high standard of public service, in excess of the federal constitutional minima. If courts treated these administrative standards as evidence of constitutional violations in damages actions under § 1983, this would create a disincentive to adopt progressive standards. Thus, we decline Plaintiffs' invitation here to use the Albuquerque Police Department's operating procedures as evidence of the constitutional standard. The trial court's exclusion of the SOPs was particularly appropriate because Plaintiffs wished to admit not only evidence of the SOPs themselves, but also evidence demonstrating that the APD found that Officer Sholtis violated the SOPs and attempted to discipline him for it. Explaining the import of these convoluted proceedings to the jury would have been a confusing, and ultimately needless, task. The Albuquerque Chief of Police followed the recommendation of an internal affairs investigator to discipline Officer Sholtis both for making an impermissible off-duty arrest and for use of excessive force. An ad hoc committee subsequently reversed this decision. Additional testimony would have been necessary to help the jury understand the significance of these determinations and the procedures used to arrive at these contradictory results. This additional testimony explaining the procedures used at each step in the APD's investigation and decision-making would have led the jury ever further from the questions they were required to answer, and embroiled them in the dispute over whether Officer Sholtis's actions did or did not violate the SOPs. At the end of this time-consuming detour through a tangential and tendentious issue, the jury would have arrived at the conclusion that the APD itself seems to have been unable to resolve satisfactorily the question whether Plaintiffs' arrest violated the APD SOPs. . . . The similarity of the SOP addressing excessive force to the objective standard employed by state and federal law would render jury confusion even more likely, tempting the jury to conclude that if experienced police officers interpreted Officer Sholtis's actions as a violation of SOPs employing the same standards as the law, then Officer Sholtis must also have violated legal requirements. When, as here, the proffered evidence adds nothing but the substantial likelihood of jury confusion, the trial judge's exclusion of it cannot be an abuse of discretion."). See also Coleman v. Baker, No. 3:19-CV-129 JD, 2023 WL 22126, at *4 n.3 (N.D. Ind. Jan. 3, 2023) ("Mr. Coleman also presents as evidence that Officer Baker violated the Michigan City Police use of force policy. This is not relevant to the Fourth Amendment inquiry. Thompson v. City of Chicago, 472 F.3d 444, 454 (7th Cir. 2006) ("[T]he violation of police regulations or even a state law is completely immaterial as to the question of whether a violation of the federal constitution has been established."). The parties did not submit a finding by the panel explaining how the policy was violated, but the Court notes a significant difference between the Michigan City Police Department policy and the constitutional standard. Policy Number 32, section V(B)(2) reads: 'Firearms shall not be discharged at a moving vehicle unless a person in the vehicle is immediate threatening the officer or another person with deadly force by means other than the vehicle. The moving vehicle itself shall not presumptively constitute a threat that justifies an officer's use of deadly force.'. . This differs from the constitutional standard, where 'a car can be a deadly weapon.' Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U.S. 194, 200 (2004).")

But see United States v. Proano, 912 F.3d 431, 439-40 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Proano . . . argues that the government's evidence of his training was inadmissible, relying mostly on Thompson v. City of Chicago, 472 F.3d 444 (7th Cir. 2006). Thompson concerned 42 U.S.C. § 1983, and it held that the CPD's General Orders (essentially, formal policy statements) were not relevant to proving whether force was constitutional. . . This is because the Fourth Amendment, not departmental policy, sets the constitutional floor. . . Since Thompson, however, we have clarified that there is no per se rule against the admission of police policies or training. . . We explained in Aldo Brown that such a rule would be especially excessive in the § 242 context, where an officer's intent is at issue and the defendant has a constitutional right to present a defense. . . Thompson did not address whether evidence of police policy or training can be relevant to intent; § 1983, unlike § 242, is a civil statute that lacks a specific-intent requirement. . . Thompson therefore offers no guide here. Still, Proano presses, even if some evidence of training may be relevant, the government's evidence in this case was not because it concerned CPD-specific training. Proano seizes on language from Aldo Brown, which said that evidence of 'widely used standardized training or practice[s]' could be relevant to show an officer's intent in § 242 cases. . . Proano characterizes the CPD's training as 'localized' and not 'widely used,' and therefore not relevant. That characterization is suspect; the CPD is the second-largest police force in the country. . . Regardless, neither Aldo Brown nor common sense limits the pool of admissible training-related evidence of intent to national, model, or interdepartmental standards. Assuming those standards exist, . . . only evidence of training that the officer actually received can be relevant to his state of mind. . . Proano's remaining arguments go to the weight of the evidence, not its relevance. He asserts that the prohibition on shooting into windows and crowds was not relevant because that training did not concern cars. But as the district court reasonably concluded, four or five people in the back of a car could constitute a crowd. Proano also asserts that his firearms training was not relevant because that training occurred in a controlled environment. Yet Jamison testified that the firearms training was not training for training's sake, but rather it was intended to have real-word application. Proano's arguments were ones for the jury, not us. . . The probative value of an officer's training, like most any evidence, depends on case-specific factors. Those factors are too many to list, but no doubt included are the training's recency and nature, representativeness of reasonable practices, standardization, and applicability to the circumstances the officer faced. Whatever its ultimate strength, evidence of an officer's training can be relevant in assessing his state of mind. The district court carefully assessed the evidence and the state-of-mind inquiry in this case, and it did not abuse its discretion in admitting the evidence of Proano's training.").

She argues that under 'evolving standards of decency' even consensual intercourse with a prisoner is cruel and unusual punishment. . . We decline to go so far. . . . [I]t is a matter of first impression in this circuit whether consent can be a defense to an Eighth Amendment claim based on sexual acts. Other courts are divided in their approach to consensual sexual intercourse between guards and inmates. The Sixth and Eighth Circuits have ruled that consensual sexual intercourse does not rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. [citing cases] Some district courts have taken the opposite approach, holding that a prison guard has no consent defense in an Eighth Amendment civil-rights case alleging sexual relations. [collecting cases] More recently, the Ninth Circuit adopted a middle ground in Wood v. Beauclair, 692 F.3d 1041 (9th Cir.2012). . . . The court elected to create a rebuttable presumption of nonconsent. . . The state official can rebut the presumption by showing that the sexual interaction 'involved no coercive factors.'. . The court declined to provide an extensive list of factors but remarked that in addition to words or behavior showing opposition, coercive factors could include 'favors, privileges, or any type of exchange for sex.'. .In short, there is no consensus in the federal courts on whether, or to what extent, consent is a defense to an Eighth Amendment claim based on sexual contact with a prisoner. As a matter of public policy, Ms. Graham's position has force. We cannot imagine a situation in which sexual activity between a prison official and a prisoner would be anything other than highly inappropriate. But not all misbehavior by public officials, even egregious misbehavior, violates the Constitution. The Supreme Court has warned against constitutionalizing (or unconstitutionalizing, if that can be a word) tortious conduct by government agents. . . . Absent contrary guidance from the Supreme Court, we think it proper to treat sexual abuse of prisoners as a species of excessive-force claim, requiring at least some form of coercion (not necessarily physical) by the prisoner's custodians. We agree with the Ninth Circuit that '[t]he power dynamics between prisoners and guards make it difficult to discern consent from coercion.'. . But there is no difficulty presented by the facts relied on by Ms. Graham in this case. B. Under Color of State Law

In order to establish liability under § 1983, the plaintiff must prove that she has been deprived of a federal statutory or constitutional right by someone acting "under color of" state law. Parratt v. In Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167, 180 (1961), the Court held that acts performed by a police officer in his capacity as a police officer, even if illegal or not authorized by state law, are acts taken 'under color of' law. As the Supreme Court stated in United States v. Classic, 313 U.S. 299, 326 (1941), "[m]isuse of power, possessed by virtue of state law and made possible only because the wrongdoer is clothed with the authority of state law, is action taken `under color of' state law."

Note that generally, a public defender does not act "under color of state law" when providing counsel to a defendant in a criminal proceeding. Polk County v. Dodson, 454 U.S. 312, 325 (1981). But see Carter v. City of Montgomery, 473 F.Supp.3d 1273, ____ (M.D. Ala. 2020), infra.

SUPREME COURT

Lindke v. Freed, 144 S. Ct. 756, 762, 765-70 (2024) ("When a government official posts about job-related topics on social media, it can be difficult to tell whether the speech is official or private. We hold that such speech is attributable to the State only if the official (1) possessed actual authority to speak on the State's behalf, and (2) purported to exercise that authority when he spoke on social media. . . .By and large, our state-action precedents have grappled with variations of the question posed in Griffin: whether a nominally private person has engaged in state action for purposes of § 1983. . . Today's case, by contrast, requires us to analyze whether a state official engaged in state action or functioned as a private citizen. This Court has had little occasion to consider how the state-action requirement applies in this circumstance. . . . The distinction between private conduct and state action turns on substance, not labels: Private parties can act with the authority of the State, and state officials have private lives and their own constitutional rights. Categorizing conduct, therefore, can require a close look. . . .[O]ur precedent articulates principles that govern cases analogous to this one. For the reasons we explain below, a public official's socialmedia activity constitutes state action under § 1983 only if the official (1) possessed actual authority to speak on the State's behalf, and (2) purported to exercise that authority when he spoke on social media. The appearance and function of the social-media activity are relevant at the second step, but they cannot make up for a lack of state authority at the first. . . The first prong of this test is grounded in the bedrock requirement that 'the conduct allegedly causing the deprivation of a federal right be fairly attributable to the State.'. . An act is not attributable to a State unless it is traceable to the State's power or authority. Private action—no matter how 'official' it looks—lacks the necessary lineage. . . . Lindke must show more than that Freed had some authority to communicate with residents on behalf of Port Huron. The alleged censorship must be connected to speech on a matter within Freed's bailiwick. For example, imagine that Freed posted a list of local restaurants with health-code violations and deleted snarky comments made by other users. If public health is not within the portfolio of the city manager, then neither the post nor the deletions would be traceable to Freed's state authority—because he had none. For state action to exist, the State must be 'responsible for the specific conduct of which the plaintiff complains.'. . There must be a tie between the official's authority and 'the gravamen of the plaintiff's complaint.'. . To be clear, the '[m]isuse of power, possessed by virtue of state law,' constitutes state action. . .While the state-action doctrine requires that the State have granted an official the type of authority that he used to violate rights—e.g., the power to arrest—it encompasses cases where his 'particular action'—e.g., an arrest made with excessive force—violated state or federal law. . . Every § 1983 suit alleges a misuse of power, because no state actor has the authority to deprive someone of a federal right. To misuse power, however, one must possess it in the first place. . . .In sum, a defendant like Freed must have actual authority rooted in written law or longstanding custom to speak for the State. That authority must extend to speech of the sort that caused the alleged rights deprivation. If the plaintiff cannot make this threshold showing of authority, he cannot establish state action. . . . Freed's page. . . was not designated either 'personal' or 'official,' raising the prospect that it was 'mixed use'—a place where he made some posts in his personal capacity and others in his capacity as city manager. Categorizing posts that appear on an ambiguous page like Freed's is a fact-specific undertaking in which the post's content and function are the most important considerations. . . . [I]t is crucial for the plaintiff to show that the official is purporting to exercise state authority in specific posts. And when there is doubt, additional factors might cast light—for example, an official who uses government staff to make a post will be hard pressed to deny that he was conducting government business. One last point: The nature of the technology matters to the state-action analysis. Freed performed two actions to which Lindke objected: He deleted Lindke's comments and blocked him from commenting again. So far as deletion goes, the only relevant posts are those from which Lindke's comments were removed. Blocking, however, is a different story. Because blocking operated on a page-wide basis, a court would have to consider whether Freed had engaged in state action with respect to any post on which Lindke wished to comment. The bluntness of Facebook's blocking tool highlights the cost of a 'mixed use' social-media account: If page-wide blocking is the only option, a public official might be unable to prevent someone from commenting on his personal posts without risking liability for also preventing comments on his official posts. . . A public official who fails to keep personal posts in a clearly designated personal account therefore exposes himself to greater potential liability. . .The state-action doctrine requires Lindke to show that Freed (1) had actual authority to speak on behalf of the State on a particular matter, and (2) purported to exercise that authority in the relevant posts. To the extent that this test differs from the one applied by the Sixth Circuit, we vacate its judgment and remand the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

D.C. CIRCUIT

McGovern v. Brown, 891 F.3d 402 (D.C. Cir. 2018) (special police officers who were commissioned by the District of Columbia and employed by private university were acting under color of state law, for § 1983 purposes, when they arrested attendee who engaged in standing protest during university-sponsored event on campus).

Johnson v. Government of Dist. of Columbia, 734 F.3d 1194, 1201 (D.C. Cir. 2013) ("We agree with the district court that even assuming that the District had notice of the strip search practices and that those practices were unconstitutional, the District lacked the discretion necessary for class members to prevail. Given that Dillard was at all times acting under color of federal law, . . .the District had no authority to prevent him from conducting strip searches of arrestees upon their arrival at the Superior Court. Relying on two circuit court decisions, one by this Court and one by the Sixth Circuit, see Warren, 353 F.3d 36; Deaton v. Montgomery County, 989 F.2d 885 (6th Cir.1993), for the proposition that '[i]t does not matter if the transferor has no control over the facility in which it places its prisoners,'. . . class members believe they can prevail even if Dillard was at all times a federal official acting under color of federal law. In each of the cited cases, however, the municipality had contracted to send its prisoners to a penal facility; even though the municipality exercised no direct control over policies and practices at the facility, it retained power to cancel the contract in the event of constitutional violations. See Warren, 353 F.3d at 37; Deaton, 989 F.2d at 885. Here, by contrast, nothing in the record suggests that the District could have held presentment hearings somewhere other than the Superior Court. And although class members insist that the District had statutory authority to bypass the Superior Court Marshal and deliver pre-presentment arrestees directly to Superior Court judges, the statutory provisions class members rely on are ambiguous at best. Thus, the District's failure to embrace class members' statutory interpretation hardly demonstrates 'deliberate indifference to the rights' of arrestees.")

Williams v. United States, 396 F.3d 412, 414 (D.C. Cir. 2005) (federal police officer who arrested plaintiff for violation of D.C. law did not act under color of state law).

Fischer v. District of Columbia, No. 24-CV-00044 (CRC), 2025 WL 894445, at *12 (D.D.C. Mar. 24, 2025) ("Fischer next tries his luck with § 1983 and Bivens claims alleging the same constitutional violations against USCP and the USCP Board, as well as Deputy Chief Waldow, Deputy Chief Loyd, Chief Steven Sund, Assistant Chief Yogananda Pittman, and Speaker Emerita Nancy P. Pelosi in their official and individual capacities. . . . As noted, 1983 applies to conduct done under color of state law. Therefore, a defendant sued under § 1983 must have been exercising the authority of the state. 'Courts generally treat under color of law ... as the same thing as the state action required under the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . Because federal officials act under federal law, they generally fall outside § 1983's reach. . . Individuals suing federal officers for constitutional violations usually must instead proceed through a Bivens action. However, as Fischer contends, when federal officers act together or conspire with state officials to deprive an individual of his constitutional rights, they may be considered to have acted under color of state law for § 1983 purposes. . . This principle derives from a series of Supreme Court cases recognizing that state action may be found where 'there is such a "close nexus between the State and the challenged action" that seemingly private behavior "may be fairly treated as that of the State itself."'. . '[A] challenged activity may be state action when it results from the State's exercise of "coercive power," when the State provides "significant encouragement, either overt or covert," or when a private actor operates as a "willful participant in joint activity with the State or its agents."'. . The exact standard for determining when a federal official, as opposed to a private party, acts under color of state law is somewhat unclear. Courts have recognized '[a] plaintiff may well need to allege a higher level of coordination to show federal officers, rather than private parties, acted under color of state law.' [collecting cases] In Big Cats, the Tenth Circuit explained that a higher burden may be warranted because a plaintiff attempting to assert such a theory 'must overcome the presumption[s] that [1] Congress did not intend for federal officers to be subject to § 1983 litigation' and 'that [2] where federal and state actors come together, they are acting pursuant to supreme law.'. .Without articulating an exact standard for determining whether the federal actor's conduct can 'be fairly treated as that of' the state, the D.C. Circuit has considered whether the state 'gave him the power' to act, 'exercised ... coercive power' through him, or otherwise 'provid[ed] significant encouragement.'. . Fischer's allegations do not meet these requirements. He asserts only that "the two police departments worked together, collaborated and conspired in the use of force and the indiscriminate launching of munitions into the crowd of protesters," including by "shar[ing] munitions and g[iving] each other directions on where to point their weapons for launching the munitions.". . He has not claimed that the District gave the USCP officers the power to act or exercised coercive power over them. And while he references a 'conspiracy,'. . . he has not specifically pled that the Federal and District Defendants had the requisite 'meeting of the minds' to violate his rights. . . Moreover, as noted, Fischer's complaint describes a reactive response to a chaotic situation as opposed to a coordinated 'meeting of the minds.' Accordingly, because Fischer had not pled that the USCP officers at the scene conspired with the MPD officers so that the USCP officers were acting under color of District law, he cannot assert a § 1983 claim against them.")

Brown v. Short, No. 08-1509 (RMC), 2010 WL 2989837, at *4 (D.D.C. July 30, 2010) ("The Court finds that at the time DSO Short searched Ms. Brown, she was not acting at the behest of a Superior Court judge or carrying out her courtroom duties. Therefore, to the extent that the Superior Court can be described as a 'state' court, DSO Short was not exercising power derived from state law and she was not clothed with that authority. DSO Short was following U.S. Marshal policy without regard to the order of a judicial officer. In this position, she was a federal actor analogous to the U.S. Marshall for the Superior Court, to whom Section 1983 does not apply.")

Maniaci v. Georgetown University, 510 F.Supp.2d 50, 62, 70 (D.D.C.,2007) ("[T]he Court notes that various circuits have applied Section 1983 and its limitations as set forth in Monell to private institutions such as Georgetown University where such private institutions employ quasi-state actors. [collecting cases] . . . . Plaintiff's Amended Complaint contains facts that, if taken as true, sufficiently raise a colorable claim that the Georgetown Public Safety Officers were acting under the color of law by exercising their state-granted authority to arrest or actions related thereto. The Public Safety Officers in this case were not merely verbally conveying a store policy (and thus functioning in a private capacity) . . . . On several occasions, Plaintiff sets forth facts that indicate that his physical liberty was restrained and that he was aware of the power asserted over him by the Public Safety Officers. . . Allegedly, he was physically grabbed and 'violently jerked ... from his seat.'. . He was 'surrounded by six campus police offers and was pushed against a glass window.'. . His exit was blocked, and he was 'told not to go anywhere.'. . . Accordingly, at this time, the Court shall not dismiss Plaintiff's Section 1983 claim on the grounds that the Public Safety Officers were not acting under color of state law, as Plaintiff has alleged facts sufficient to suggest that an arrest or actions related thereto occurred.").

FIRST CIRCUIT

Pike v. Budd, No. 23-1593, 2025 WL 942827, at *5–6 (1st Cir. Mar. 28, 2025) ("Pike has alleged that members of the treatment court team 'were expected -- and effectively required –' to attend the Nashville conference. Pike has also alleged that Budd made comments related to their work as they sat in the hotel bar after he attempted to invite himself into her room. And, again as noted, Budd allegedly told Pike that he was often sexually propositioned by women due to his role as a judge and that he hoped the TRC team did not think that he gave favorable treatment towards two of their female clients that he found particularly attractive. But we needn't go so far as to conclude that, in isolation, the complaint adequately alleges state action at the conference. That is so, because just as it was Pike's and Budd's work for the TRC that brought them to the conference in Nashville, it was their work for the TRC that brought them to the courthouse back in Maine. Critically, Pike has additionally alleged that Budd invoked his authority over her to continue his harassment when they got back to Maine. Specifically, she reasonably alleges that he summoned her individually to his chambers and made comments there that she understood to mean that he planned on leaving his wife and intended to continue pursuing Pike. Taken as a whole, these allegations are sufficient to plausibly establish that Budd was acting under color of state law to create a hostile environment for Pike.")

Jakuttis v. Town of Dracut, 95 F.4th 22, 29-30 (1st Cir. 2024) ("The determination of whether Poirier was clothed with state authority rather than federal authority at the relevant times depends on the level of government to which Poirier's allegedly unlawful conduct is 'fairly attributable. . .That determination, in turn, depends on the 'nature and circumstances' of Poirier's allegedly unconstitutional retaliatory conduct 'and the relationship of that conduct to the performance of ... official duties.'. . As we will explain, we conclude on de novo review and reading the complaint in the light most favorable to Jakuttis. . . that the complaint fails to plausibly allege that Poirier was acting under color of state rather than federal law at the relevant times. . . .[T]he complaint alleges that Poirier learned of the police-corruption allegations while on the job as a federal TFO, investigated those allegations as a federal TFO, and allegedly retaliated against Jakuttis while working as a federal TFO and in the CBI offices. True, the complaint alleges that Poirier was a state trooper at all relevant times. But, from the face of the complaint, the 'nature and circumstances' of Poirier's alleged retaliatory conduct were related to 'the performance of his official duties' to the CBI rather than to the Massachusetts state police, . . . as the mere fact that Poirier was also employed with the Massachusetts state police when these events occurred does not in and of itself suffice on this record to provide a plausible basis for attributing his conduct to anything other than his federal role[.]")

United States v. Martinez-Mercado, 919 F.3d 91, 99-100 (1st Cir. 2019) ("Although courts have had frequent occasion to interpret section 1983's 'color of law' requirement, 'there is no bright line test for distinguishing "personal pursuits" from activities taken under color of law.'. . We have previously instructed that a state actor does not act under color of law unless his 'conduct occurs in the course of performing an actual or apparent duty of his office, or unless the conduct is such that the actor could not have behaved in that way but for the authority of his office.'. . More specifically, this court trains its attention 'on the nature and circumstances of the officer's conduct and the relationship of that conduct to the performance of his official duties.'. . 'The key determinant is whether the actor ... purposes to act in an official capacity or to exercise official responsibilities pursuant to state law.'. . Martínez-Mercado argues, therefore, that the conspiracy at issue here did not involve conduct committed in the performance of any actual or pretended official duty. The facts show otherwise. The conspirators literally employed the colors of the law in the form of a marked on-duty police vehicle to do what no private individual could do -- divert private and police interlopers by creating the appearance of legitimate police involvement. The plan also addressed the risk of a citizen call to the police by exploiting López-Torres's official capacity to forestall any investigation at the scene. López-Torres and Ramos-Figueroa were part of the conspiracy and present at the scene of the heist precisely because they possessed the official authority to ensure that it would proceed uninterrupted. This was surely enough to support a jury finding that the conspirators acted under color of law.")

Jarvis v. Vill. Gun Shop, Inc., 805 F.3d 1, 13 (1st Cir. 2015) ("We summarize succinctly. In their action against the Gun Shop, the plaintiffs do not challenge either the confiscation of their firearms or the police's authority to transfer those firearms to a bonded warehouse for storage. Rather, they challenge the imposition of storage charges and the subsequent auctioning of their firearms after they failed to pay those storage charges. But the facts evidenced in the summary judgment record, even when viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, do not show that state action, as opposed to private action, produced these asserted harms. Although the activities undertaken by the Gun Shop were authorized by state law, mere compliance with the strictures of state law cannot transmogrify private action into state action. Nor is it enough that the state set in motion the subsequent actions taken by the Gun Shop: but-for causation is simply insufficient to conjure a finding of state action. Whatever rights (if any) the plaintiffs may have against the Gun Shop, they have made out none under section 1983.")

Klunder v. Brown Univ., 778 F.3d 24, 34 (1st Cir. 2015) ("Seeing no meaningful distinction between Brown in the present case and Harvard in Krohn, we agree with the district court that Brown University is not a state actor subject to federal jurisdiction under § 1983. Brown's motion for partial summary judgment was properly granted.")

Santiago v. Puerto Rico, 655 F.3d 61, 70 (1st Cir. 2011) ("We are not the first court to reach the conclusion that transportation to and from school is not an exclusive state function. Considering strikingly similar facts, the Third Circuit found that a private bus company and its employees were not subject to liability under section 1983 even though, by transporting pupils to and from public schools, they 'were carrying out a state program at state expense.'. . Just as education is not exclusively a state function because it is regularly performed by private entities, . . . so too student transportation falls outside the exclusive purview of the state . . . . [F]reedom to choose alternatives removes school busing from the realm of services that are traditionally exclusively reserved to the state.")

Burke v. Town of Walpole, 405 F.3d 66, 88 (1st Cir. 2005) (private forensic odontologist who rendered bite mark opinon at request of District Attorney's Office was acting under color of law and eligible for qualified immunity).

Martinez v. Colon, 54 F.3d 980, 987 (1st Cir. 1995) (an unintended shooting of a police officer at the police station, during the course of harassment and taunting by a fellow officer who was on duty and in uniform, did not constitute conduct under color of law where the court concluded that the behavior of the harassing officer represented a "singularly personal frolic[,]" and in no way was or purported to be in furtherance of the exercise of any police power).

Vincent v. Dolan, No. 1:24-CV-155-JJM-LDA, 2024 WL 4635204, at *3 (D.R.I. Oct. 31, 2024) ("Taking Plaintiff's allegations as true, it is plausible that Mr. Dolan was acting under color of law when he followed Plaintiff's vehicle to the pizza restaurant, approached the Plaintiff's vehicle, and fired his service revolver at Mr. Vincent. Mr. Dolan purported to act in his official capacity as a police officer, despite being off-duty and on his way home because but for being a police officer, he would not have engaged in pursuing a potential 'fleeing suspect.' Therefore, it is plausible that Mr. Dolan was acting under color of law.")

Arias v. Bernard, No. 17-CV-516-SM, 2021 WL 185031, at *1 n.1 (D.N.H. Jan. 19, 2021) ("Although several of the named defendants are police officers employed by the cities of Nashua and Manchester, New Hampshire, they appear to have been 'detailed' to work on a federal drug interdiction task force. Accordingly, the parties have assumed that, for purposes of this suit, all defendants are properly treated as federal agents.")

Carr v. Metro. Law Enforcement Council, Inc., CIV.A. 13-13273-JGD, 2014 WL 4185482, *8 (D. Mass. Aug. 20, 2014) ("MetroLEC contends that since it 'consists of local police and sheriff departments, it is a municipal organization or entity.'. . Ms. Carr argues that 'MetroLEC is a private corporation performing delegated police functions normally reserved to the State[,]' and is therefore covered by § 1983. . . As detailed herein, the record is not sufficiently developed to determine the status of MetroLEC vis-à-vis the various statutes at issue in this litigation. For purposes of § 1983, however, this court concludes that MetroLEC is subject to liability, at a minimum as a private entity assuming powers traditionally exclusively reserved to the State. Moreover, as the parties seemingly agree, its liability will be assumed to be coterminous with those of a municipality under § 1983. MetroLEC is authorized by Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 40, § 4J, which provides for public safety mutual aid agreements. . . . [I]n light of the fact that MetroLEC is an entity separate from its components, it may, in fact, be considered a 'person' under § 1983. . . Moreover, since MetroLEC is a private actor which has 'assumed a traditional public function,' it qualifies as a 'state actor' which may be subject to liability under § 1983. . . Thus, MetroLEC is subject to liability under § 1983.")

Chandler v. Greater Boston Legal Services, No. 13–12979–GAO, 2013 WL 6571938, *5 n.10 (D. Mass. Dec. 10, 2013) ("Notwithstanding any dispute Chandler may have with the quality of legal services performed on his behalf by a GBLS lawyer, acts or omissions by counsel do not give rise to a cause of action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 because counsel does not act under the color of state law in performing a lawyer's traditional function as counsel and therefore cannot be sued under § 1983 as an agent of the state. See Polk County v. Dodson, 454 U.S. 313, 471 (1981); Malachowski v. City of Keene, 787 F.2d 704, 710 (1st Cir. 1986). See also Dunker v. Bissonnette, 154 F.Supp.2d 95, 105 (D. Mass. 2001) (Stearns, J.).")

Sonia v. Town of Brookline, 914 F.Supp.2d 36, 42, 43 (D. Mass. 2012) ("A procedural irregularity is worth noting at the outset. Most challenges to the color-of-law element in § 1983 cases are raised jointly by the defendant officers and municipalities and opposed by the plaintiffs. Here, the Officers join the plaintiff in opposing the Town of Brookline's contention that they did not act under color of law. In effect, the officers 'admit' that they were acting under color of law. Whether or not the Officers are overcome by honesty or, more likely, are seeking to buttress their cross-claims against the Town of Brookline for contribution and indemnification, their admission does not control the analysis. An officer cannot consent to have acted 'under color of law.' See Barreto–Rivera, 168 F.3d at 46 (explaining color of law analysis depends upon totality of circumstances but particularly upon officer's purpose at time of the act). It also warrants mention at the outset that this case is in a different procedural posture than those described above. The district courts in those cases were called upon to examine the factual record to decide whether there were sufficient indicia of public action to support a jury finding in favor of the plaintiff on the color-of-law issue. This Court's task is simpler. It need not weigh the evidence or take a position on which party's version of the events is more credible. In considering a motion to dismiss, this Court must simply decide whether the facts alleged in the complaint, if proven, are sufficient to support a finding that the officers acted under color of state law. The color-of-law issue is a close one. On the one hand, a number of factors support a finding that the Officers were not acting under color of law. The dispute was at a private residence. The Officers were off duty and out of uniform. They were highly intoxicated. They were not responding to an unruly bachelor party; they were the unruly bachelor party. . . Neighbors who witnessed the brawl called the police, apparently unaware that the police were the ones allegedly doing the beating. On the other hand, there are multiple indicia of state action that support a finding in favor of the plaintiff. The Officers identified themselves as police. They photographed the plaintiff's license plate, handcuffed the plaintiff during the altercation and informed him that he was under arrest, all forms of police techniques and functions. Finally, the plaintiff reasonably perceived that the Officers were acting as police officers. It is the combination of these factors that persuades the Court that it is premature to rule that none of the Officers was acting under color of law at any point during the incident. While the Officers allegedly precipitated the dispute, as did the police in Barreto–Rivera and Zambrana–Marrero, they employed a 'symbol of police authority' when they placed plaintiff under arrest. In constrast to the officer's actions in Parilla–Burgos, shooting someone does not project police authority as uniquely as does the act of detaining someone in the name of the sovereign. Accordingly, the Court finds that plaintiff has pled sufficient facts to claim that the Officers acted under color of law.")

Miller v. City of Boston, 586 F.Supp.2d 5, 7 (D. Mass. 2008) ("The City first argues that it is never liable for the misconduct of special officers. The only authority the City offers for this assertion is the text of the 1898 statute giving the City authority to license these special officers and virtually identical language in a corresponding police department rule.. . . The statute gives licensed special officers 'the power of police officers to preserve order and to enforce the laws and ordinances of the city.'. . The statute goes on to state that 'the corporation or person applying for an appointment under this section shall be liable for the official misconduct of the officer.' . . BPD argues that because the statute makes the special officers' employer liable for their misconduct, the City cannot be liable. . . The mere fact that the statute holds the employer of special officers liable, however, does not necessarily mean that the City may not also be held liable for the misconduct of special officers. Under the terms of the statute, special officers are granted the 'power of police officers.' Inasmuch as the statute grants special officers the authority of police officers, it seems logical to treat them as such for purposes of the City's liability. Because Plaintiff's complaint is deficient in other respects, however, this court assumes without deciding that the City may be held liable for special officer misconduct to the same extent as it may be liable for the misdeeds of other city employees.").

Shah v. Holloway, No. 07-10352-DPW, 2009 WL 2754406, at *7 (D. Mass. Aug. 20, 2009) ("After reviewing the record at the motion to dismiss stage, I found the need for further discovery to determine whether facts justified treating this case as one in which federal agents acted in concert with state agents under circumstances justifying recognition of a Section 1983 claim against them for depriving Shah of Fourth Amendment rights. Shah and the defendants agree that SA Holloway and a Boston Police officer did act in concert during the time they observed, stopped, and detained Shah. However, Shah has not offered any evidence that suggests that SA Holloway's – or any other Federal Agent's – actions were derived from state, rather than federal, authority. SA Czellecz does state that after consulting with his Boston Police counterpart, he selected the nearby local police station as the location to which he would transport Shah. But SA Czellecz received instructions from the Secret Service supervisors at the IDCC, not from the Boston Police, to move Shah. Even viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Shah, I find that no reasonable inference can be made that the Federal Agents conspired with or acted in concert with state officials under color of state law to deprive Shah of his civil rights. Rather, the evidence indicates that the Federal Agents acted under authority of their Secret Service chain of command and pursuant to their own judgment, albeit seeking and obtaining assistance from state actors.").

Carmack v. MBTA, 465 F.Supp.2d 18, 27 (D. Mass. 2006) ("In evaluating whether the conduct of an otherwise private actor constitutes indirect state action, courts conventionally have traveled a trio of analytic avenues, deeming a private entity to have become a state actor if (1) it assumes a traditional public function when it undertakes to perform the challenged conduct, or (2) an elaborate financial or regulatory nexus ties the challenged conduct to the State, or (3) a symbiotic relationship exists between the private entity and the State. . . The satisfaction of any one of these tests requires a finding of indirect state action. . . In addition, where '[t]he nominally private character of [an organization] is overborne by the pervasive entwinement of public institutions and public officials in its composition and workings, and there is no substantial reason to claim unfairness in applying constitutional standards to it,' the conclusion is that there is state action. . . The inquiry, under any of these theories, is necessarily fact-intensive, and the ultimate conclusion regarding state action must be based on the particular facts and circumstances of the case. . . This court finds that Mr. Carmack has alleged enough facts to support a claim that MBCR [Massachusetts Bay Commuter Railroad Company] was a state actor based on the traditional public function and symbiotic relationship theories.")

SECOND CIRCUIT

Cancel v. Amakwe, 551 F. App'x 4, *6, *7 (2d Cir. 2013) ("While we have recognized that a police officer's self-identification and use of a service pistol can constitute acting under color of state law, see Jocks v. Tavernier, 316 F.3d 128, 134 (2d Cir.2003), the action at issue must be 'made possible only because the wrongdoer is clothed with the authority of state law,' West v. Atkins, 487 U.S. 42, 49, 108 S. Ct. 2250, 101 L.Ed.2d 40 (1988). Here, even crediting Cancel's allegation that Gibson identified himself as a police officer, Cancel's theory of the City's delegation of police powers to private businesses is insufficient by itself plausibly to allege that Gibson was acting under color of state law. Gibson was employed by a private business at the time of the alleged assault, and any authority he had over Cancel and other citizens derived solely from that role and was not made possible only because he was 'clothed with the authority of state law.' Accordingly, Cancel's claims against Gibson were properly dismissed.")

Fabrikant v. French, 691 F.3d 193, 211 (2d Cir. 2012) ("We therefore conclude that animal rescue organizations such as the SPCA—independent contractors to which, under New York law, municipalities can delegate authority to perform animal control—are state actors for purposes of § 1983 when they perform surgery on animals in their care while those animals are being kept from their owners by the authority of the state, following searches and seizures carried out by the agencies pursuant to warrants.")

Jocks v. Tavernier, 316 F.3d 128, 134 (2d Cir. 2003) ("[W]hen an officer identifies himself as a police officer and uses his service pistol, he acts under color of law.").

Bull for the Estate of Ingalsbe v. Howard, No. 22-CV-00766-JLS-LGF, 2024 WL 1939480, at *10 (W.D.N.Y. Apr. 11, 2024) ("In the instant case, SHC, by providing medical care to detainees at ECHC, 'performs a role traditionally within the exclusive prerogative of the state and could, in this context, be found to be 'the functional equivalent of the municipality.'. . A thorough reading of the Complaint, however, establishes the only factual allegation suggesting SHC is a state actor for purposes of § 1983 liability is found in ¶ 25 alleging '[u]pon information and belief' that SHC contracted to provide services within New York State including medical care to Decedent at ECHC. Further, Plaintiff does not allege with whom SHC contracted to provide medical services to detainees housed at ECHC. See Smith v. Benson, 2016 WL 11817187, at * 2 (W.D.N.Y. Mar. 21, 2016) (concluding, in considering a motion to amend, that the plaintiff detainee plausibly alleged the jail's medical provider was a state actor "by virtue of its contract with the [jail]," a copy of which was attached to the proposed amended complaint) (citing Sykes v. McPhillips, 412 F.Supp.2d 197, 204 n.1 (N.D.N.Y. 2006) ("If there was an express contract to provide medical care to prisoners, state actor status would be conferred."); and Sepolveda v. Armor Corr'l Health, 2015 WL 6550623, at * 3 n.2 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 28, 2015) ("As the entity with which the Jail contracted to provide medical services to its prisoners, [defendant] was acting under color or state law for purposes of Section 1983 with respect to its duties in rendering such medical services to plaintiff."). Accordingly, Plaintiff has failed to sufficiently allege SHC, when providing medical care to detainees at ECHC, acted pursuant to a contract with ECHC so as to be considered a state actor for purposes of § 1983 liability and Defendant's motion should be GRANTED with regard to Plaintiff's § 1983 claims as asserted against SHC, i.e., the First, Fourth, and Fifth Claims.") Pagan v. Westchester County, No. 12 Civ. 7669(PAE)(JCF), 2014 WL 982876, *24, *25 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 12, 2014) (adopting R & R) ("Aramark contends that all of the claims against it should be dismissed because it is an 'independent contractor' and not a state actor liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. The role of providing food to inmates is the responsibility of the state. . . Here, Westchester County has a duty to provide nutritionally adequate food to those incarcerated within its facility. The County has contracted with Aramark to perform this governmental function. Thus, Aramark is serving a public function in providing daily meals to inmates. . . .Here, Aramark provides food for the inmates at the Jail pursuant to a contract with the County. The Jail provides oversight for Aramark's services. Aramark's 'seemingly private behavior' can be treated as that of the state given that the challenged action, proper food service, flows directly from the obligations of the government entity and is performed under its supervision. . . .The role of Aramark as food provider is similar to that of private physicians paid to care for inmates at state and local facilities. In these cases, courts have consistently held that the physician is acting under color of state law when providing treatment to inmates. . .Furthermore, other courts have held that Aramark is acting under color of state law for § 1983 liability when it provides food to state inmates. [collecting cases] Aramark argues repeatedly that as an independent contractor it is not acting under color of state law. While state employment, as a general rule, is sufficient to render the defendant a state actor, an employer-employee relationship is not necessary to a determination of state action or action taken under color of state law. . . It is the function of the private actor within the state system, not 'the precise terms of his employment, that determines whether his actions can fairly be attributed to the State ....'. . . As such, the Court concludes that Aramark is acting under color of state law for purposes of § 1983 liability by providing daily meals to the inmates at the Jail, a duty Westchester County ordinarily owes to the inmates.")

Rodriguez v. Winski, No. 12 Civ. 3389(NRB), 2013 WL 5379880, *9, *10 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 26, 2013) ("[S]ummoning police or requesting that police take action to disperse OWS protestors simply does not suffice to constitute joint action or to convert the private party into a state actor. . . . [T]hese allegations demonstrate that police responding to protest sites reached independent decisions as to what action, if any, to take and how. Plaintiffs simply cannot show the substitution of private judgment for police judgment necessary to constitute joint action. Instead, plaintiffs explicitly plead the very opposite as to defendant Brookfield, which allegedly 'actually transferr[ed] discretion and authority to [the] NYPD to order OWS participants off of publicly accessible open areas.'. . In sum, plaintiffs' allegations cannot support an inference of joint action with the City or the police against Mitsui or the Brookfield defendants.")

THIRD CIRCUIT

Henry v. Essex County, 113 F.4th 355, 360 (3d Cir. 2024) ("Persons with arguably mixed federal and state authority act under color of federal law when they perform their federal duties.")

Borrell v. Bloomsburg Univ., 870 F.3d 154, 161-62 (3d Cir. 2017) ("Richer's decision was to enforce the hospital's preexisting policy requiring employees to participate in drug tests when asked, and GMC had already fired four other nurses for violating the same policy. Neither Bloomsburg nor its agreement with Geisinger played any part in creating the policy enforced in this case; the agreement merely made clear that Geisinger's employee policies would govern the behavior of clinical students while they were working at the hospital. In light of the controlling legal principles we have articulated, the question boils down to which entity—the hospital or the university—exercised the authority to terminate Borrell for a violation of Geisinger policies. . . .Notwithstanding his consultation with others, Richer made the decision to fire someone working at GMC due to her violation of a preexisting policy of the hospital, and he had the authority to do so based on his position there. '[T]he authority of state officials ... was wholly unnecessary to effectuate Borrell's dismissal from the NAP.'. . Accordingly, we must reverse the District Court's holding that GMC and Richer were state actors.")

Kach v. Hose, 589 F.3d 626, 649 & n.22 (3d Cir. 2009) ("On this particular record, no reasonable finder of fact could conclude that Pennsylvania authorities exercised control over any element of the particular conduct Kach describes. Hose was charged with supervising and maintaining a secure environment for schoolchildren. In clear violation of his mandate, Hose engaged in an impermissible relationship with one of the very schoolchildren whose safety he was supposed to ensure. Kach has not presented evidence to suggest that Hose's actions were committed on anyone's initiative but his own or with anything other than his own interests in mind. Instead, the record leaves no room for doubt that Hose 'was bent on a singularly personal frolic[,]' Martinez v. Colon, 54 F.3d 980, 987 (1st Cir.1995) (footnote omitted), and thus his conduct is not cognizable as state action for § 1983 purposes. . . Because Hose was not acting under color of state law when he committed the acts that form the basis of Kach's § 1983 claim against him, we need not decide if Kach's constitutional rights were violated. Accordingly, Kach's § 1983 claim against Hose fails as a matter of law. . . . We do not foreclose the possibility that, under other circumstances, a private security guard employed in a public school could qualify as a state actor.").

Marcus v. McCollum, 394 F.3d 813, 818 (3d Cir. 2004) (noting Circuit agreement that officers are not state actors during private repossession if they act only to keep the peace).

Foster v. City of Philadelphia, CIV.A. 12-5851, 2014 WL 5027067, *22 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 8, 2014) ("Even towing companies, which have less responsibility than salvors under Pennsylvania law, have been held to be state actors, albeit in other jurisdictions. . . . Since salvors engage in more conduct than towing companies under the Abandoned Vehicle Code, it follows inexorably that a salvor like Century Motors is a state actor.")

Adams v. Springmeyer, 17 F.Supp.3d 478, 506 (W.D. Pa. 2014) ("In 2008, Sciulli was assigned to work for the ATF as a federally deputized Task Force Officer. . . Local law enforcement officials working in such a capacity are generally regarded as federal agents. . . Since it is undisputed that Sciulli was attempting to execute federal arrest warrants in his capacity as a federal Task Force Officer, the Defendants' motion for summary judgment will be granted with respect to the § 1983 claims brought against him.")

Fleck v. Trustees of University of Pennsylvania, 995 F.Supp.2d 390, 401-03 (E.D. Pa. 2014) ("The Supreme Court has left open the circumstances under which private security officers may be deemed to perform public functions for purposes of § 1983 suits. While our Court of Appeals has not refined its Henderson holding, other federal courts have found state action where a security guard is employed by a police department, Travers v. Meshriy, 627 F.2d 934 (9th Cir.1980), or works jointly with a township police officer, Padover v. Gimbel Bros., Inc., 412 F.Supp. 920 (E.D.Pa.1976) (Ditter, J.). On the other hand, a security guard was held not to be a state actor where no state or municipal police power was involved, see Wade v. Byles, 83 F.3d 902 (7th Cir.1996), or when a college security guard, despite also being a local police officer, acts solely in his college-guard capacity, see Robinson v. Davis, 447 F.2d 753 (4th Cir.1971). To be sure, '[w]here private security guards are endowed by law with plenary police powers such that they are de facto police officers, they may qualify as state actors under the public function test,' Romanski v. Detroit Entertainment, L.L.C., 428 F.3d 629, 637 (6th Cir.2005) (citing Henderson). . . . The Penn Police Department's so-called patrol zone extends well beyond the borders of the University campus to encompass a large slice of West Philadelphia—roughly between Market Street and Baltimore Avenue, from 43rd Street to the Schuylkill River—an area that includes the Masjid Al Jamia Mosque at 4228 Walnut Street. . . Penn police officers are 'highly-trained in a number of specialized areas including: emergency response, crisis and hostage negotiation, dignitary protection, traffic safety, motorcycle and bicycle patrol.'. . The Department maintains a fifteen-person Detective Unit that conducts criminal investigations and crime scene analysis. Id. The Penn Police Department has been accredited through the Commission on the Accreditation of Law Enforcement Agencies—a standard-setting body, since March of 2001. Its officers have worked with a Drug Enforcement Administration task force, United States v. Ford, 618 F.Supp.2d 368 (E.D.Pa.2009) (Pollak, J.), and with FBI investigators on credit-card identity theft, United States v. Barr, 454 F.Supp.2d 229 (E.D.Pa.2006) (Rufe, J.). Here, Officers Cooper, Michel and Thammavong were on patrol on a street within the Penn Police Department's patrol zone, and when their efforts to maintain public order failed, they arrested two instigators of the disturbance. Accordingly, we find that Pennsylvania law endows the Penn Police Department with the plenary authority of a municipal police department in the patrol-zone territory, once the 'exclusive prerogative' of the City of Philadelphia. But the Penn Police Department is not an entity capable of being sued. Rather, the University itself, i.e., the Trustees of the University of Pennsylvania, is the proper defendant for purposes of a § 1983 suit (along with the named individual officers). . . Penn's police officers therefore are state actors for Section 1983 purposes.")

Kelly v. N.J. Dept. of Corrections, No. 11–7256 (PGS), 2012 WL 6203691, *6, *7 (D.N.J. Dec. 11, 2012) ("Federal courts are split on the question whether organizations that operate halfway houses, and their employees, are state actors for purposes of § 1983. [collecting cases] In this action, in any event, Plaintiff has failed to allege any facts that would suggest that Community Education Centers functioned as a state actor. For example, Plaintiff does not describe the nature of the contractual relationship, if any, with the New Jersey Department of Corrections. He does not describe the nature of the services provided, or the nature of the population to whom those services are provided. . .Moreover, Plaintiff has failed to allege any facts that would suggest that Community Education Centers promulgated any policy or practice that encouraged the conduct he challenges here. Accordingly, Plaintiff has failed to state a claim against Community Education Centers. As the allegations made by Plaintiff are insufficient to establish that Community Education Center functioned as a 'state actor,' they similarly are insufficient to establish that counselors employed by Community Education Centers or its facilities functioned as state actors.")

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Peltier v. Charter Day Sch., Inc., 37 F.4th 104, 118-21, 123 (4th Cir. 2022) (en banc) ("The statutory framework of the North Carolina charter school system compels the conclusion that the state has delegated to charter school operators like CDS part of the state's constitutional duty to provide free, universal elementary and secondary education. . . . Thus, charter schools in North Carolina 'exercise[ ] power possessed by virtue of state law and made possible only because the [school] is clothed with the authority of state law.'. . The Supreme Court has held that such a delegation of a state's responsibility renders a private entity a state actor. . . . We are not aware of any case in which the Supreme Court has rejected a state's designation of an entity as a 'public' school under the unambiguous language of state law and held that the operator of such a public school was not a state actor. . . We are not prepared to do so here. . . . We reach a different conclusion with respect to RBA, the for-profit management contractor of CDS. The plaintiffs assert that RBA's 'intertwinement with CDS,' its role in daily school operations, and its responsibility for enforcing the skirts requirement renders RBA a state actor. According to the plaintiffs, RBA and CDS are essentially indistinguishable entities and, thus, both qualify as state actors. Despite the close relationship between CDS and RBA, we disagree with the plaintiffs' argument. There are several key differences between RBA, a for-profit management company, and CDS, the non-profit charter school operator authorized by the state to run a charter school. North Carolina has not chosen to delegate its constitutional duty to provide free, universal elementary and secondary education to for-profit management companies like RBA. To the contrary, RBA has no direct relationship with the state and is not a party to the charter agreement between CDS and North Carolina. Instead, RBA manages the daily functioning of the school under its management agreement with CDS. In working for CDS, rather than for the state of North Carolina, RBA's actions are more attenuated from the state than those of CDS, the entity authorized by the state to operate one of its public schools. We therefore conclude that RBA's actions implementing the skirts requirement are not 'fairly attributable' to the state.")

White Coat Waste Project v. Greater Richmond Transit Co., 35 F.th 179, ___ (4th Cir. 2022) ("While the constitutional state-action and statutory color-of-law requirements are technically distinct, courts treat them 'as the same thing.'. . 'The ultimate issue in determining whether a person is subject to suit under § 1983 is the same question' as the state-action inquiry: 'is the alleged infringement of federal rights "fairly attributable to the State?"'. . . Often, that means asking whether there is a 'close nexus' between the government and the conduct being challenged. . . But this appeal presents a more basic question: What is the government? Often, the answer is clear. The army is the government. . . So is a municipal zoning board. . . And usually, private corporations are not the government. . . Usually, but not always. In Lebron, the Supreme Court noted a special class of corporate entities, 'Government-created and -controlled corporations,' that are part of the government despite their ostensibly private character. . . The Court there confronted a similar case to our own: The National Railroad Passenger Corporation, commonly known as Amtrak, refused to display a political advertisement, which prompted a First Amendment challenge. . . Amtrak argued that it was a corporation, not a government entity, so it was not bound by the First Amendment. . .The Supreme Court disagreed, holding Amtrak was a government entity. . . The government is afforded administrative flexibility to achieve its ends, but organizational creativity cannot release it from its constitutional mandates: It surely cannot be that government, state or federal, is able to evade the most solemn obligations imposed in the Constitution by simply resorting to the corporate form. On that thesis, Plessy v. Ferguson can be resurrected by the simple device of having the State of Louisiana operate segregated trains through a state-owned Amtrak.'. . Instead, the Court held that where 'the Government creates a corporation by special law, for the furtherance of governmental objectives, and retains for itself permanent authority to appoint a majority of the directors of that corporation, the corporation is part of the Government for purposes of the First Amendment.'. . So Lebron establishes that a corporation is 'Government-created and –controlled' and part of the government for purposes of the First Amendment where: (1) creation of the corporation occurred by 'special law'; (2) creation was 'for the furtherance of governmental objectives'; and (3) retention by the government of 'permanent authority to appoint a majority of the directors of that corporation.'. . Richmond Transit satisfies all three elements.")

Davison v. Randall, 912 F.3d 666, 681 (4th Cir. 2019) ("Put simply, Randall clothed the Chair's Facebook Page in 'the power and prestige of h[er] state office,'. . . and created and administered the page to 'perform[ ] actual or apparent dut[ies] of h[er] office[.]'. . Additionally, the specific actions giving rise to Davison's claim—Randall's banning of Davison's Virginia SGP Page—'are linked to events which arose out of h[er] official status.'. . Randall's post to the Chair's Facebook Page that prompted Davison's comment informed the public about what happened at the Loudoun Board and Loudoun County School Board's joint meeting. And Davison's comment also dealt with an issue related to that meeting and of significant public interest—School Board members' alleged conflicts of interest in approving financial transactions. That Randall's ban of Davison amounted to an effort 'to suppress speech critical of [such members'] conduct of [their] official duties or fitness for public office' further reinforces that the ban was taken under color of state law. . . Considering the totality of these circumstances, the district court correctly held that Randall acted under color of state law in banning Davison from the Chair's Facebook Page.")

U.S. v. Day, 591 F.3d 679, 687-89 (4th Cir. 2010) (Virginia's conferral of authority on armed security officers to effect an arrest for an offense occurring in their presence did not render them de facto police officers, as would justify a finding that officers acted as government agents when they arrested and interrogated defendant, for purposes of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments, where not only was arrest power of armed security officers more circumscribed than that of police officers, who could arrest on basis of reasonable grounds or probable cause to suspect a person of having committed a felony not in their presence, but it was also essentially the same as that of any private citizen).

Philips v. Pitt County Memorial Hosp., 572 F.3d 176 (4th Cir. 2009) (discussing various tests for state action and concluding that hospital's Board of Trustees did not act under color of state law in temporarily suspending physician's practice privileges).

Rossignol v. Voorhaar, 316 F.3d 516, 523, 524, 527 (4th Cir. 2003) ("Defendants executed a systematic, carefully-organized plan to suppress the distribution of St. Mary's Today. And they did so to retaliate against those who questioned their fitness for public office and who challenged many of them in the conduct of their official duties. The defendants' scheme was thus a classic example of the kind of suppression of political criticism which the First Amendment was intended to prohibit. The fact that these law enforcement officers acted after hours and after they had taken off their badges cannot immunize their efforts to shield themselves from adverse comment and to stifle public scrutiny of their performance. . . .We would thus lose sight of the entire purpose of § 1983 if we held that defendants were not acting under color of state law. Here, a local sheriff, joined by a candidate for State's Attorney, actively encouraged and sanctioned the organized censorship of his political opponents by his subordinates, contributed money to support that censorship, and placed the blanket of his protection over the perpetrators. Sheriffs who removed their uniforms and acted as members of the Klan were not immune from § 1983; the conduct here, while different, also cannot be absolved by the simple expedient of removing the badge.").

Durham v. Rapp, 64 F. Supp. 3d 740, 746-47 (D. Md. 2014) ("The Court concludes that Durham is not barred from suing Vogt under § 1983 simply because Vogt is an FBI agent. The only question is whether Vogt was acting under color of state law when he was serving as a commissioner of the MPTC [Maryland Police Training Commission]. Since it was Maryland state law that created the MPTC and bestowed upon it its powers and duties including those exercised by Vogt, it can be fairly said that Vogt must be regarded as a state actor as to the circumstances presented in this lawsuit. He has cited no federal law that required him to serve as an MPTC commissioner. Thus, he was acting under color of state law. For that reason, he is not subject to suit under Bivens because he was not acting under color of federal law.")

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Kallinen v. Newman, No. 22-20383, 2023 WL 2645555, at *2–3 (5th Cir. Mar. 27, 2023) ("[I]n Campbell v. Reisch, the Eighth Circuit concluded that a 'Missouri state senator did not act under color of state law when blocking a constituent from a Twitter page that she created to announce her candidacy for office.'. . That court determined that the senator, acting as a private individual, created the account before her election and then 'used [the account] overwhelmingly for campaign purposes.'. . Though the Eighth Circuit did not outright define 'overwhelming' in this context, we agree with its conclusion and reach a similar one here after examining Judge Newman's Facebook page. While the alleged facts here suggest that Judge Newman often used his page as a campaign tool, they do not support a claim that Judge Newman used his official position to silence Kallinen's speech, or that Judge Newman's Facebook page was a function of his official duties. At best, Kallinen has alleged enough facts to conclude that Judge Newman used his Facebook page strategically to create a favorable impression in the minds of voters. . . Further, Kallinen does not allege facts demonstrating that Judge Newman used his power as a judge to delete Kallinen's comments. . . . Because Judge Newman was not acting under the color of state law when he blocked Kallinen and deleted his comments, we hold that Kallinen has not met his burden under § 1983.")

Tyson v. Sabine, 42 F.4th 508, 522-23 (5th Cir. 2022) ("Deputy Boyd argues that he did not act under color of law because he 'was not on duty' and only Tyson's 'subjective belief' supports otherwise. But '[w]hether an officer is acting under color of state law does not depend on his on- or off-duty status at the time of the alleged violation.'. . Critically, Tyson's 'subjective belief' that Deputy Boyd was acting under color of law was born directly from his conduct leading her to think as much. . . . Deputy Boyd argues that he did not act under color of law because 'the "real reason" for [his] visit to her house was not related to law enforcement, but rather to engage in sexual activity.' But officials who act for purely personal reasons do not 'necessarily fail to act "under color of law."'. . It is only '[i]f an officer pursues personal objectives without using his official power as a means to achieve his private aim[ ] [that] he has not acted under color of state law.'. .Deputy Boyd acted under color of law during the alleged sexual abuse.")

Watts v. Northside Independent School District, 37 F.4th 1094, 1097-98 (5th Cir. 2022) ("Breed's ordering players to assault the referee . . . does not fit in the state-created-danger box. Instead, it is an example of a public official's ordering private actors to engage in conduct. The law has long recognized that state action exists when a state actor commands others to commit acts as much as when the state actor commits those acts. . . Under this view of the case, which Watts also argues, it is clearly established that Breed engaged in state action when he ordered his players to assault Watts. The challenged action is Breed's order to hurt Watts. It is hard to see how that is anything other than state action. Breed was on the sidelines acting in his role as an assistant football coach at a public school. Just as a police officer cannot avoid the Fourth Amendment by ordering a private citizen to conduct an illegal search, . . . Breed cannot escape liability by ordering students to conduct the attack. . . . Because the law has long recognized that a public official remains a state actor when he orders others to carry out his objectives, any reasonable football coach would have known that he was engaged in state action when instructing his players that Friday night. Consequently, the state action in this case was clearly established and it was error to dismiss the section 1983 claim against Breed on that ground. Although we hold that Breed was engaged in state action that subjected him to the Due Process Clause, we do not opine on whether the complaint has alleged a violation of clearly established due process law.")

Gomez v. Galman, 18 F.4th 769, 776 (5th Cir. 2021) ("Viewing his complaint in the light most favorable to Gomez—as we must—we determine that he has adequately pleaded facts which establish that Galman and Sutton acted under the color of law. First, Gomez alleges that when he exited the bar, Sutton 'acting as a police officer, gave Mr. Gomez a direct order to stop and not leave the patio area of the bar.' Gomez obeyed this order. Then, when he attempted to drive away after getting violently beaten, Sutton and Galman 'ordered him to stop' and 'ordered [him] to step out of his vehicle.' Gomez claims that '[b]ecause they acted like police officers, [he] believed he was not free to leave, and did as he was ordered.' These allegations are key. A victim usually does not follow orders from someone who just attacked him without good reason to do so. He is even less likely do so when—as alleged here—the victim was in the process of escaping his attackers. The fact that Gomez stopped and exited his vehicle at his attackers' commands lends significant credence to his allegation that he believed them to be police officers, because the complaint offers no reason for Gomez to obey Galman and Sutton unless they were 'acting by virtue of state authority.'. .Gomez alleges other facts indicating that Galman and Sutton 'misused or abused their official power.'. . For example, Gomez asserts that the officers 'forced him onto his stomach, and placed his hands behind his back in a police hold as they were trained to do during an arrest, and effected an arrest of Mr. Gomez.' This caused Gomez to 'believe[ ] he was being arrested.' The use of the police hold further indicates that Galman and Sutton were abusing their official power and exercising their authority as officers in their efforts to harm Gomez. Further, Sutton 'called for backup in continuing to make an arrest' and Defendants 'identified themselves to NOPD dispatch as NOPD officers.' Gomez concedes that by the time the officers called for backup he was unconscious. Nevertheless, Defendants' call for backup—and especially their identification of themselves as officers of the law—adds to the 'air of official authority' that pervaded the assault. . . Taken together, these allegations are sufficient to plead that the officers misused their official power. Accordingly, the district court erred in finding that Galman and Sutton did not act under color of law.")

Gomez v. Galman, 18 F.4th 769, 782-83 (5th Cir. 2021) (Ho, J., concurring) ("As a strictly doctrinal matter, this is a close case. Gomez alleges that he believed his assailants were police officers, and that for that reason, he complied with their orders, rather than flee to avoid further injury. But he never explains why he believed the defendants were police officers. He does not allege that they wore uniforms, displayed their badges, or otherwise presented themselves to him as police officers. And it is not Gomez's subjective beliefs, but the officers' conduct, that determines whether the defendants acted 'under color of [state law]' as required under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . So I can see how the district court might have concluded that this case cannot proceed under § 1983. That said, I am not prepared to dismiss all of Gomez's claims at this time. Some circuits have recognized that a plaintiff's subjective beliefs may bear 'some relevance' to the color of law determination. . . In addition, there is at least some support in our circuit precedent for the proposition that the officers here acted under color of state law because they later called for police backup. . . In light of these authorities, I am happy to reverse in part and remand for further proceedings, and therefore concur. Moreover, although reasonable minds can debate whether the misconduct alleged here is actionable under § 1983, it is unquestionably contemptible. Accepting the allegations in the complaint as true, as we must at this stage, Jorge Gomez is a U.S. citizen and decorated military veteran of Honduran descent. On the night in question, he visited a local bar, proudly wearing his military regalia. Officers Galman and Sutton ordered Gomez to approach. They called him a 'fake American' and a 'liar' and told him to 'go back' to wherever he came from. They attempted to strip off his military clothing. And then they brutally beat him until two bystanders intervened to stop the attack. They left Gomez sprawled across a patio table, bruised and bloodied. After he managed to get up, Gomez entered his car and began driving away. But the officers ordered him to stop and exit his vehicle. Believing he had no choice, Gomez complied. The officers then knocked Gomez to the ground, forced him onto his stomach, held his arms behind his back, and beat him unconscious. 'Nothing is more corrosive to public confidence in our criminal justice system than the perception that there are two different legal standards.'. . If the allegations in this case are true, the officers have not merely brutalized one man—they have badly undermined public trust in law enforcement. And unfortunately, the misconduct alleged here is not unique. . . I agree that the district court should not have dismissed Gomez's claims against the officers at this early stage in the proceedings. Accordingly, I concur.")

Pikaluk v. Horseshoe Entertainment, LLP, 810 F. App'x 243, ___ (5th Cir. 2020) ("The district court granted summary judgment based on its conclusion that the Officers conducted an 'independent investigation' after receiving the call from Horseshoe. We disagree. As we will explain, the lack of independent investigation is a significant factor in Pikaluk's malicious prosecution claim. But even without evidence of an independent investigation, summary judgment on Pikaluk's § 1983 claim was still proper because of the lack of evidence of any 'interdependence' or 'meeting of the minds' between the state officials and the Horseshoe Defendants. We thus affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment on Pikaluk's § 1983 claim.")

Ayala-Gutierrez v. Doe, No. 16-20164, 2017 WL 3722804, at *1 (5th Cir. Aug. 28, 2017) (not reported) ("Ayala-Gutierrez argues that he has stated a claim under § 1983 because GEO is a state actor that derives its authority to operate Joe Corley Detention Facility from the state of Texas. He additionally argues that he has stated a claim under Bivens because GEO is a federal employee insofar as it acts under the color of federal law in operating Joe Corley Detention Facility. This court has rejected these arguments in Eltayib v. Cornell Companies, Inc., 533 Fed.Appx. 414, 414-15 (5th Cir. 2013). Eltayib held that GEO and their employees are not subject to suit as state actors under § 1983 because they manage a federal prison, and § 1983 applies to constitutional violations by state—not federal—officials. . . It additionally held that GEO and its employees cannot be liable as private actors under Bivens. Id. (citing Minneci v. Pollard, 565 U.S. 118, 131, 132 S.Ct. 617, 181 L.Ed.2d 606 (2012), and Correctional Services Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61, 63-64, 122 S.Ct. 515, 151 L.Ed.2d 456 (2001)). Ayala-Gutierrez therefore has shown no error on the part of the district court in dismissing his complaint for failure to state a claim.")

Moody v. Farrell, No. 16-60684, 2017 WL 3530156, at *4 (5th Cir. Aug. 17, 2017) ("[E]vidence that a private citizen reported criminal activity or signed a criminal complaint does not suffice to show state action on the part of the complainant in a false arrest case. . .The plaintiff must further 'show that the police in effecting the arrest acted in accordance with a "preconceived plan" to arrest a person merely because he was designated for arrest by the private party, without independent investigation.'. . .As Farrell argues, the record indisputably shows that the Lowndes County Sheriff's Department conducted an investigation and independently determined that probable cause existed to arrest Moody. . . .In light of the undisputed facts that Officer Cooper investigated Farrell's allegations for almost a year and that two state officials found probable cause, it is reasonable to infer, at most, that Farrell pressured Officer Cooper to pursue arrest. In this way, Farrell, like the defendant in Bartholomew, influenced the actions of the police but did not determine them. A jury could not reasonably infer that Farrell's pressure destroyed the independence of Officer Cooper's investigation.")

Doe v. United States, 831 F.3d 309, 314-17 (5th Cir. 2016) ("The plaintiffs rely on the 'nexus' test, under which the state's involvement is such that the private actor's conduct can fairly be treated as that of the state itself. . . In essence, the plaintiffs assert that CCA derived its authority to run the detention center from the subcontract with Williamson County, meaning the CCA defendants were acting under color of state law. . . .[T]he plaintiffs argue here, the fact that the plaintiffs are federal detainees is irrelevant. Whether state action exists depends 'on the nature of the defendant' and not the nature of the plaintiff. . . .As an initial matter, resolving whether an action is 'fairly attributable to the State' "begins by identifying the specific conduct of which the plaintiff complains[.]"'. . In Cornish, a guard at a private corrections facility that housed juveniles sued under Section 1983 after he was fired. . . Affirming dismissal, we said that the facility's 'role as an employer' did not constitute state action. . . This is true even if the facility's role in 'providing juvenile correctional services was state action.'. . We said that it was immaterial that the facility's guards were subject to state regulations, or that a state contract authorized the facility's operations. . . Here, the specific conduct complained of is the CCA defendants' failure to follow ICE's transport policy, which the plaintiffs allege facilitated Dunn's crimes. Thus, following Cornish's reasoning, the CCA defendants' relevant role on which we must focus is in detaining aliens pending a determination of their immigration status pursuant to ICE specifications. This is fundamentally a federal function. Relatedly, we once held that a CCA guard at a detention center housing federal detainees was the equivalent of a federal corrections officer. United States v. Thomas, 240 F.3d 445, 448 (5th Cir. 2001). Furthermore, even if we focus on the subcontract. . . . its terms support a finding that Williamson County's involvement in running the detention center was minimal. The subcontract delegated all responsibility for housing detainees pursuant to ICE standards to CCA. Williamson County is permitted to employ a representative to serve as a 'liaison,' but it has no involvement in the day-to-day operations of the detention center regardless of whether it pressured CCA to remove Hernandez. Other provisions of the subcontract merely facilitate an administrative payment between Williamson County and CCA, provide indemnification to Williamson County, and require CCA to notify county officials if there is an emergency at the detention center. This leaves the fact of the subcontract's existence as the sole connection to the state. We have said that the '[a]cts of ... private contractors do not become acts of the government by reason of their significant or even total engagement in performing in public contracts.' See Cornish, 402 F.3d at 550. Henderson and Alvarez, moreover, are distinguishable on their facts. The state in both cases exhibited more control over the relevant correctional facilities than Williamson County had over the detention center here. In Henderson, the jail was county owned and operated; it unequivocally derived its existence from the state. . . No private contractor was involved. . . Alvarez involved a county-owned jail, which was operated by a private contractor and housed state and federal prisoners. . . The district court said the contract with the Marshals Service to house some federal prisoners did not change the character of the private contractor's relevant function as the operator of the county jail. . . Here, again, the detention center — which houses only federal aliens detained by ICE — is owned and operated by CCA alone, not Williamson County or the state of Texas. ICE promulgates all policies and procedures by which the detention center must operate through the service agreement and subcontract. The plaintiffs' case centers on the CCA defendants' violation of one of those policies. Henderson and Alvarez are not on point.")

Rundus v. City of Dallas, Tex., 634 F.3d 309, 315 (5th Cir. 2011) ("We hold that the facts here clearly indicate SFOT is not a state actor; it runs a private event on public property. The pervasive entwinement present in Brentwood is not presented in the facts before us. The City has no say in SFOT's internal decision making, and had no role in enacting or enforcing the restriction on distribution of literature. Nor are we convinced by Rundus's argument that Appellees' mutual commitment to improve Fair Park demonstrates state action, because SFOT improves only the portions of Fair Park that will attract more fairgoers. In short, the facts presented are not sufficiently analogous to Brentwood to conclude that SFOT is a state actor.")

Bustos v. Martini Club Inc., 599 F.3d 458, 464, 465 (5th Cir. 2010) ("Whether an officer is acting under color of state law does not depend on his on- or off-duty status at the time of the alleged violation.. . . If an officer pursues personal objectives without using his official power as a means to achieve his private aim, he has not acted under color of state law. . . . [H]ere, Bustos does not allege facts to suggest that the officers who assaulted him misused or abused their official power. His allegations suggest that, at the time of the incident, the officers were off-duty and enjoying drinks at the bar with female companions. . . . .[B]ecause he asserts no facts that would suggest that the use of force by Officers Goodwin and Cantu was a misuse of their power as state officers, he has not sufficiently alleged that their actions were under color of state law.").

Barkley v. Dillard Dept. Stores, Inc., No. 07-20482, 2008 WL 1924178, at *3 (5th Cir. May 2, 2008) (not published) ("Although Dillard's notified Wilkinson of the shoplifter, Wilkinson made an independent decision to chase after and attempt to apprehend the suspect. These facts are in contrast with those in Smith v. Brookshire Brothers, Inc., 519 F.2d 93 (5th Cir.1975) (per curiam), in which we found that Brookshire was a state actor because 'the police and [Brookshire] maintained a pre-conceived policy by which shoplifters would be arrested based solely on the complaint of the merchant.'. . There is no evidence of a pre-conceived policy in this case. Therefore, based on the facts described above, we conclude that the district court did not err in deciding that Dillard's was not a state actor. Consequently, we affirm summary judgment for Dillard's.").

Cornish v. Correctional Services Corp., 402 F.3d 545, 550, 551 (5th Cir. 2005) (CSC's decision to terminate plaintiff's employment was made in its role as private prison management employer and could not be attributed to Dallas County or State of Texas).

Rosborough v. Management & Training Corporation, 350 F.3d 459, 461 (5th Cir. 2003) (agreeing with Sixth Circuit and with district courts 'that have found that private prison-management corporations and their employees may be sued under § 1983 by a prisoner who has suffered a constitutional injury.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Lawson v. Creely, No. 24-5649, 2025 WL 916815, at *5–6 (6th Cir. Mar. 26, 2025) (not reported) ("In this situation, the fact that Creely's and Franke's conduct 'exceed[ed] the scope' of the school policy does not preclude that conduct from being state action if 'the State has delegated the general "type of authority" that [Creely and Franke] exercised.'. . But nothing in the policy suggests that the state had delegated to Creely and Franke the general authority to conduct investigations or seek out potential dangers beyond what was immediately ascertainable to them. Instead, a holistic review of the school's policies suggests that employees should report concerns and suspicions to supervisors or law enforcement, who are better equipped to develop a plan of action. Further, the fact that these policies contemplate the reporting of beliefs and suspicions suggests that employees need not conclusively verify their suspicions (such as by searching through a coworker's bag) before reporting them. . . In fact, when the school's weapons policy discusses potential searches, it expressly limits that authority to the school's principal: 'In the enforcement of this policy, principals may authorize, if they have reasonable suspicion, searches in compliance with applicable Board policies.'. . Considering these policies as a whole, the state had not delegated even the general type of authority at issue here to employees like Creely and Franke. . . For the foregoing reasons, Creely and Franke did not search Lawson's bag pursuant to any state authority, and consequently, Lawson cannot satisfy the acting-under-color-of-state-law element for her § 1983 claim.")

Ermold v. Davis, 130 F.4th 553, 561-63 (6th Cir. 2025) ("This appears to be an issue of first impression. The parties have provided no case in which a government official raised a First Amendment affirmative defense to a § 1983 claim. The district court likewise noted that it found 'no example' of such a case. . . Although Davis's assertions are novel, they fail under basic constitutional principles. Under § 1983, Davis is being held liable for state action, which the First Amendment does not protect—so the Free Exercise Clause cannot shield her from liability. The First Amendment protects 'private conduct,' not 'state action.'. . To be sure, not every act taken by a public official constitutes state action unprotected by the First Amendment. . . Government officials 'have private lives and their own constitutional rights.'. . But when a public official wields the 'authority of the state,' she 'engage[s] in state action,' which, by definition, cannot be protected by the First Amendment. . . A recent Supreme Court case illustrates these principles. [discussing Lindke v. Freed] The First Amendment shields Davis where she 'functioned as a private citizen,' but not where she 'engaged in state action.'. . That binary is outcome-determinative here because the act for which Davis is being held liable—denying Plaintiffs a marriage license—is quintessential state action. A state official engages in state action when she 'possesse[s] state authority' and 'purport[s] to act under that authority.'. . So too where she exercises power that is 'possible only because' she is 'clothed with the authority of state law.'. . In Kentucky, marriage licenses are issued by the government; a private party has no authority to grant or deny a marriage license to anyone. And Kentucky delegated that licensing authority to county clerks, who are charged with 'issuing marriage licenses, recording marriage certificates, and reporting marriages.'. . So, when Davis denied Plaintiffs a marriage license, she was wielding the 'authority of the State'—not 'function[ing] as a private citizen.'. . That means the license denials were 'state action,'. . . which cannot receive First Amendment protection, and Davis cannot raise a First Amendment defense to liability.")

Lindke v. Freed, 114 F.4th 812, 816-21 (6th Cir. 2024) (on remand from S. Ct.) ("Under the Supreme Court's new test, an official's social-media activity counts as state action only if the plaintiff can show that the official (1) 'possessed actual authority to speak on the State's behalf' and (2) 'purported to exercise that authority when he spoke on social media.'. . This new test differs from the one we previously applied in two ways: it's narrower in one respect and broader in another. At prong one, we previously held that actual or apparent authority could support a finding of state action. . . But the Supreme Court made clear that only actual authority could suffice. . . And on prong two, we focused on the appearance and administration of Freed's page as a whole. . . But the Supreme Court explained that this prong requires a post-by-post inquiry. . . For the reasons we discuss below, a limited remand is necessary to apply this revised test. . . .If Freed lacked actual authority to speak on the state's behalf, that's the end of the inquiry—there's no state action. But if Freed did have such authority, then we move to the second prong: whether Freed purported to exercise that authority when he spoke on social media. This is an objective test, although the 'appearance and function' of the social-media activity are relevant. . . For example, if a government website links to an official's social-media posts, it's likely that such posts exercised state authority. . . . Resolving this second prong requires a post-by-post analysis. . . Accounts like Freed's, which aren't clearly labeled as either personal or official, may contain some posts made in a personal capacity and others in an official capacity. . . Consequently, Lindke must identify 'specific posts' in which Freed purported to exercise authority to speak on the state's behalf. . . Moreover, it's 'crucial' that Lindke show that Freed was purporting to exercise state authority in the specific posts that Lindke identifies. . . It's not the district court's job to comb through the offending account. Of course, the posts Lindke identifies must be ones that were the subject of alleged censorship. Otherwise, Lindke wouldn't be able to allege a rights violation. Here, Lindke alleges two categories of posts that were the subject of censorship: (1) posts from which Lindke's comments were deleted, and (2) posts that Lindke couldn't access because he was 'blocked' from Freed's page. When it comes to the deletion of comments, the court's task is straightforward: look at the allegedly offending posts that Lindke identifies and determine whether any of those posts represented state action. . . For deletion, 'the only relevant posts are those from which Lindke's comments were removed.' . .But when it comes to Freed's wholesale 'blocking' of Lindke from accessing his page, Lindke need only identify one single post on Freed's account that represented state action. . . Indeed, '[b]locking' someone on Facebook is a 'blunt[ ] ... tool.'. . This means that when an official blocks someone from accessing a page on which both personal and official business is conducted, the official risks liability if the blocked user is prevented from commenting on even a single state-action post—even if the majority of the account's content is personal. . . Context is everything in analyzing this second prong. Whether each post's 'content and function' invoke personal or official authority is a 'fact-specific undertaking.'. . . Discerning whether a post exercises state authority will be a context-specific, totality-of-the-circumstances inquiry. But a few factors can guide courts undertaking this task. For instance, posts that expressly invoke an official's legal authority will likely be exercises of that authority. As will posts that have some legal consequence in the real world, like a 'burn ban' issued on social media by our hypothetical fire marshal. Likewise, if a government official uses their staff or office funding to make a post, it's more likely the post is made pursuant to state authority. On the flip side, the mere subject matter of a post isn't enough to show that a post is state action—especially when the information contained in the post is available in other places (whether online or in-person). After all, any citizen can post about a school policy, road closure, or press conference. None of that requires authorization by state law. Indeed, when a state official posts about government happenings in a way that any other citizen could, plaintiffs will need to show that those posts were made pursuant to the official's job duties. . . Because the Supreme Court's test changes the relevant inquiries, Lindke argues that he needs to further develop the record before a court can resolve his claims. We agree. The discovery he conducted couldn't have been tailored toward satisfying a legal standard that had eluded all the parties as well as this court. Thus, we remand this case to the district court for further proceedings. We now turn to consider what the remand might look like. . . . If the district court ultimately tackles the state-action question, it must give Lindke an opportunity to establish facts that became legally relevant only after the Supreme Court articulated its test. But the district court doesn't need to re-open discovery for issues on which Lindke already had a chance to develop the record the first time around. Start with the first prong of the state-action test, which asks whether Freed had authority to speak for the state on the matters in question. . . Our prior test asked a different question: whether Freed had authority to run a Facebook page. . . So, the relevant object of authority has changed from authority to run a Facebook page to authority to speak for the state. As explained above, this authority can come from written law, custom, or usage. And permissible sources of custom could range from use of social media by Freed's predecessors to any other patterns established by Port Huron. If the district court determines that Lindke hasn't had an opportunity to show that these sources granted Freed authority to speak on the state's behalf, then discovery on this issue would be warranted. If Freed lacked actual authority to speak for the state, then there's no state action, and Freed is entitled to summary judgment. The district court would proceed to prong two only if Freed had actual authority. This prong asks whether Freed purported to exercise that authority in specific posts. . . To be sure, Lindke has already discovered a trove of Freed's Facebook posts. But on this prong, context is everything, so a fact-intensive analysis of individual posts might be necessary. . . Lindke might need additional discovery to develop facts that could be important to understanding the context of Freed's posts. Lastly, even if discovery uncovers that some of Freed's posts were state action, a host of other First Amendment issues remain: what kind of forum Freed's social-media accounts are, what level of scrutiny his deletion or block decisions receive, and whether he's entitled to qualified immunity. We leave these interesting questions for another day.")

Mackey v. Rising, 106 F.4th 552, 555, 558-64 (6th Cir. 2024) ("Rising served as a legislator, not a police officer. The City of Adrian thus did not grant him any 'authority' to use (or threaten) physical force on its behalf. . . And because the City 'did not entrust' Rising with this power, his alleged 'misuse' of the power cannot qualify as state action. . . Next, Rising accepted the City's insurance for his defense because he maintained that the insurer's duty to defend turned on

Mackey's allegations alone (which claimed that Rising had acted for the City). Because his state-action defense on the merits did not conflict with his view of the insurer's duty to defend, neither waiver nor judicial estoppel apply. We thus affirm the grant of summary judgment to Rising. . . . The Supreme Court has long interpreted these constitutional and statutory state-action requirements in an 'identical' way. . . Because States today often hire full-time public staff to carry out their functions, 'state action is easy to spot' most of the time. . . That said, courts often confront two different (yet equally 'difficult') state-action problems. . . The first arises from the States' traditional practice of hiring ostensibly private parties (such as doctors) to perform public services (such as the provision of medical care to prisoners). . . When do these private parties qualify as state actors under the Constitution and § 1983? The Supreme Court has adopted various tests (a public-function test, a state-compulsion test, and a nexus text) to answer this question. . . We need not consider any of these tests here. This case instead concerns the second state-action problem. . . . All agree that Adrian City Commissioners like Rising qualify as 'state actors.'. . But state officials have private lives. So how should we distinguish their official conduct (which falls within the Fourteenth Amendment and § 1983) from their 'personal' conduct (which falls outside those provisions)?. .The Supreme Court in Lindke recently addressed this question in the social-media context. . . . Ultimately, it adopted a two-part test to determine whether the manager had spoken for the city in his social-media posts. . . First, the manager must have 'possessed actual authority to speak on the State's behalf' in the social-media posts. . . Second, the manager must have 'purported to exercise that authority when he spoke on social media.'. . Outside the social-media context, our court—and the Supreme Court—have long followed a similar two-part test. When asking whether a challenged action qualified as state action, we described the 'the controlling issue' as whether an official 'possessed state authority' to take the action 'and whether [the official] purported to act under that authority' on the specific occasion. . . The Supreme Court in Lindke seemingly tailored this general test to the specific social-media context. . . It also cautioned that courts should apply a 'fact-intensive inquiry' when answering state-action questions and recognized the 'rapidly changing' nature of social media. . . Given this caution, we need not decide on the precise formulation that governs here. Under either formulation, Rising did not possess state authority to threaten violence against Mackey or his mother. We reach that conclusion without proceeding past the first element: Did a state statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage give the defendant the 'actual' or 'state' 'authority' to engage in the relevant conduct? . . . This element requires courts to identify the 'nature of the act' that the plaintiff challenges . . . and to compare that act with the state-assigned 'responsibilities' of the official who committed it[.] . . The state official possesses the authority to take a challenged action only if the action meaningfully relates to the official's 'governmental status' or the 'performance of his duties.'. . This test produces some easy answers. Most obviously, a state employee's conduct will meet the test if a state regulation tasked the employee with engaging in the specific conduct at issue. Consider our oft-cited decision in Stengel. There, a police officer shot three bar patrons while attempting to end a middle-of-the-night bar fight. . . Although the officer was off-duty and out of uniform, 'police department regulations' vested him with the authority—indeed, the duty—to stop crime '24 hours a day.'. . And state officials later approved the officer's force as consistent with these regulations. . .But things are not always so simple. In some situations, an official might possess the required state authority even if the State did not permit the conduct. In other situations, an official might not possess this state authority even if the State did permit it. Begin with the first set of situations: A state official's conduct can qualify as state action even if the 'particular action which he took' (say, a police officer's use of excessive force) 'was not authorized by state law' (say, because it violated a State's use-of-force regulations). . . . [A]s Lindke put it, state officials can satisfy the Court's 'actual authority test even if they go beyond (or '[m]isuse') the power that the State has entrusted them. . . Even before Lindke, our cases made the same point when they noted that officers can engage in state action if their conduct arose from an 'apparent duty' of their office or 'ostensible state authority[.]'. . We interpret these statements—consistent with Lindke—to cover fact patterns when an official exercises state authority but exceeds the scope of the delegation. . . So what distinguishes the misuse of authority from the absence of authority? The Supreme Court has offered little guidance on this subject. But it has clarified that we must look beyond whether the State has permitted the 'particular action' that a plaintiff challenges. . . We must instead ask whether the State has delegated the general 'type of authority' that an official exercised. . . Our cases about police officers prove this point. We often hold that the police engaged in state action when they purported to exercise law-enforcement powers—without stopping to ask whether their actions violated state regulations on, say, using force. . . Turn to the second set of situations: A state official's conduct might qualify as private action even if the State gave the official the authority to engage in the conduct in an abstract sense. States authorize (that is, permit) public and private parties alike to do many things. They, for example, permit their residents to file defamation suits against those that make false statements about them. Yet this state 'authorization' does not transform all private citizens into state actors whenever they pursue defamation claims. . . And that rule applies even if the plaintiffs are state officials who threaten private defamation suits 'to safeguard their personal reputations.'. . To create state action, then, a State must do more than permit all parties (public and private alike) to engage in the conduct at issue. The State must instead entrust a party with 'state authority.'. . This distinction matters. Even if a State permits a state official (like a 'private citizen') to engage in certain conduct, the conduct will not qualify as state action if it falls outside the duties that the State has tasked the official to perform and if instead the State has permitted anyone to engage in the activity. . . .That said, we must not take any analogy to private conduct too far. If the State does assign an official a duty to engage in an action as part of the official's state job responsibilities, '[i]t is irrelevant that he might have taken the same action had he acted in a purely private capacity[.]'. . The conduct will still qualify as state action even though the official could have performed the same task as a private party. . . For example, although any private person can complain to a state bar about an attorney, a bar official engages in state action if he makes a complaint while undertaking his official bar-related duties. . . .These principles foreclose Mackey's claim. The City of Adrian did not give Rising the authority to engage in the conduct that Mackey challenges in this suit. . . .Nor can Mackey fall back on the claim that Rising's threat of violence qualifies as a 'misuse' of the power that the City allowed him to exercise on its behalf. . . Even if the divide between the misuse of power and the absence of power can be difficult to draw, we see no difficulty here. Mackey identifies no legislative power that Rising's alleged threat could conceivably fall under. Critically, Mackey agrees that Rising threatened only physical harm—not the types of harm that legislators might inflict. For example, Mackey does not claim that Rising threatened to enact a harmful ordinance (or initiate a costly legislative investigation) as payback for the criticism. . . .Even if Rising lacked the power to use force for the City, Mackey responds, Rising had the power to speak to residents on the City's behalf outside official meetings. To support this claim, Mackey notes that Rising testified that he used his personal cellphone interchangeably to make both government and private calls. Rising distinguished between the two types of calls based on 'the topic of the conversation[.]'. . .Mackey's 'topic of conversation' approach to state action commits an error that the Supreme Court highlighted in Lindke. Mackey puts the 'focus on appearance' by asking whether Rising purported to talk about something government related. . . Yet, as Lindke explained in the social-media context, '[t]he appearance and function of the social-media activity are relevant at the second step, but they cannot make up for a lack of state authority at the first.'. . Here, too, Rising skips over the first crucial question: Was Rising 'possessed of state authority'? . . . Mackey does not even attempt to identify some 'statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage' that gave Rising the authority to be the official voice of Adrian during phone calls with residents. . . He merely assumes that Adrian gave Rising the power to speak to residents on the City's behalf based on Rising's testimony that he spoke about government topics over the phone. Yet Rising cannot 'conjure the power of the State through his own efforts'; Mackey must point to a source delegating this power to him. . . .We need not consider the second element of the state-action test to reject Mackey's claim because he cannot get past its first element. Whether or not Rising purported to act in his official capacity, Adrian did not give him any authority to use (or threaten) physical force on its behalf. . . So the City 'cannot "fairly be blamed"' for Rising's alleged threat to harm Mackey.")

Nugent v. Spectrum Juvenile Justice Services, 72 F.4th 135, 140-43 & n.3 (6th Cir. 2023) ("There are three tests for determining whether a private actor may be treated as a state actor: 'the public-function test, the state-compulsion test, and the nexus test.'. . On appeal, plaintiffs argue that they pleaded sufficient facts to establish Spectrum as a state actor based on all three tests. Because we find that plaintiffs adequately allege state action under the public-function test, we address that test alone. . . . Under our precedent, detention centers are generally considered 'a public function traditionally reserved to the state.' . . . Other circuits have generally held that correctional facilities perform a traditionally exclusive public function. . . . [fn.3: The Fourth Circuit, however, has concluded that incarceration cannot satisfy the public function test because it was never traditionally an exclusive state function. See Holly v. Scott, 434 F.3d 287, 293 (4th Cir. 2006). The Holly court relied on dicta in Richardson v. McKnight, in which Justice Breyer stated, 'correctional functions have never been exclusively public.'. . But we interpret Justice Breyer's analysis to apply only to 'questions of § 1983 immunity,' not 'whether [prison officials] are liable under § 1983 even though they are employed by a private firm.']. . .The mere fact that a facility has a remedial component, however, is not enough to demonstrate it exercises a traditionally exclusive public function—after all, some purely private entities may exercise that power. . . . [P]rivate actors may execute functions that are similar to—but not quite—a traditionally exclusive public function. But the key for distinguishing state action is, in part, to determine whether a private actor is '"endowed with [state] powers beyond those enjoyed" by everyone else.' In the case of incarceration, when the state grants a private actor legal authority to exercise control over inmates, there is state action.

. . . We hold that the complaint contains adequate facts to establish that Spectrum is a state actor. Plaintiffs allege Spectrum carries out the 'public function of caring for youths at the direction of the State of Michigan.'. . If the complaint's description had stopped there, then Spectrum's facility would be deemed closely analogous to the facility found to be a non-state actor in Howell. But here the allegations go further. Plaintiffs allege that the facility does not just care for children; the facility is 'similar to a prison setting.' They state that the 'Defendants had influence and control over how long a child was detained at the facilities.'. . According to the complaint, the children 'are under 24 hours/7 days supervision, and their movements are restricted as though they were prisoners.'. . What's more, the children 'are not free to leave the Defendant's facilities on their own volition, and their liberties are entirely restricted.'. . Plaintiffs allege that the state requires Spectrum to prevent the children from escaping and to contact local law enforcement if escape should occur. Finally, plaintiffs allege that Spectrum fulfilled 'the public function of juvenile incarceration, detainment, commitment, [and] rehabilitation.'. . These facts, taken as true and viewed in a light most favorable to the plaintiffs, suggest that the State of Michigan has endowed Spectrum with legal authority to exercise control over juveniles under court-ordered confinement. Plaintiffs allege that Quintana was court-ordered to the Spectrum facility. The facility was run like a prison, as detailed above. Quintana could obtain his release only through court order. Such a set of facts starkly contrasts with Howell, where the youth were not incarcerated, and the private entity served not to incarcerate but rather to facilitate youths' involvement in the community. . . . Given that our precedent has consistently held that the operation of correctional facilities is a traditionally exclusive state function, we hold that plaintiffs pleaded sufficient facts 'giving rise [to] a reasonable inference that [the function] is traditionally exclusively in the province of the State.'. . The complaint therefore plausibly alleges state action.")

Nugent v. Spectrum Juvenile Justice Services, 72 F.4th 135, 144-47 (6th Cir. 2023) (Griffin, J., dissenting) ("The sole issue in this appeal is whether plaintiffs' complaint sufficiently alleged that defendants Spectrum Juvenile Justice Services and Spectrum Human Services, Inc. (Spectrum) are state actors for purposes of liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Without engaging in the requisite historical analysis of Michigan's approach to caring for juveniles, the majority opinion finds defendants, who privately own and operate a juvenile detention center, to be state actors solely because of the correctional nature of their facility. I respectfully disagree and would affirm the district court. . . . Precedent dictates our focus must not be on blanket claims of state action, but rather on the 'state specific' historical nature of the function at issue. . . Both Street and Skelton involved private prisons in Tennessee, not Michigan. . . Without an established, similar state history in Michigan, Street and Skelton cannot control. Second, the state-actor analysis in Street and Skelton is fundamentally deficient. Both cases relied on just one of the test's two components—that the adult prisons at issue there were 'performing a public function traditionally reserved to the state.'. . Like the majority today, the cursory analysis in both opinions conducted no kind of historical examination as to whether Tennessee also 'exclusively performed the function' of operating a prison. . . Third, the Supreme Court has cast significant doubt on the holdings of Skelton and Street. In Richardson v. McKnight, the Court signaled history is not on their side—in a dispute involving a private adult prison in Tennessee, nonetheless. . . The question

there was whether employees of a private prison were entitled to qualified immunity from § 1983 claims. . . History informed the Court's conclusion that immunity was unavailable due in part to the lack of a 'firmly rooted tradition of immunity applicable to privately employed prison guards.'. . To arrive at that conclusion, the Supreme Court chronicled the history of private prison systems generally, beginning in the Middle Ages in England and through the Nineteenth Century here in the United States. . . '[C]orrectional functions' in the United States, Richardson proclaimed, 'have never been exclusively public. Private individuals operated local jails in the 18th century, and private contractors were heavily involved in prison management during the 19th century.'. . Importantly, the Court highlighted that '[d]uring that time, some States, including southern States like Tennessee, leased their entire prison systems to private individuals or companies which frequently took complete control over prison management, including inmate labor and discipline.'. . This description contradicts Street's and Skelton's perfunctory assertions that running prisons is a 'function traditionally reserved to the state.'. . Fourth, Skelton and Street are distinguishable because they addressed the incarceration of adults. Inmates at adult facilities are institutionalized based on criminal convictions and resulting sentences. . . In equating adult incarceration with juvenile care, the majority expands the reaches of our caselaw.")

Phillips v. Tangilag, 14 F.4th 524, 532-34 (6th Cir. 2021) ("[A]n individual need not be a formal 'public employee' to qualify as a state actor because governments have long carried out their duties using private agents. . . To decide whether a seemingly private party is a 'state' actor, the Supreme Court has applied different tests in different settings. . . In this prison setting, the Court has opted for a 'public-function' test. . . It has recognized that the states can privatize most functions (like the provision of electricity or education) without turning the parties who take on these tasks into 'government' agents. . . Yet a few public functions—those the government has 'traditionally and exclusively' performed—cannot be delegated to private parties in this way without the Constitution's limits accompanying the delegation. . . The Court has extended this public-function logic to some doctors who care for prisoners. The Constitution does not generally impose a positive duty on states to offer medical care to those within their jurisdictions. . . When, however, a state imprisons individuals and deprives them of the liberty to care for themselves, it takes on a 'duty' through the Eighth Amendment to ensure their wellbeing. . . And states may not entirely outsource this constitutional duty to a private entity. . . The Supreme Court thus held that an orthopedic specialist became a state actor when he operated a clinic providing twice-a-week care to inmates at a prison hospital. . . Although this doctor saw many other patients, he had 'voluntarily assumed' the state's 'obligation to provide adequate medical care to' inmates by entering into a contract for that care. . . Our court likewise held that a psychiatrist who saw a pretrial detainee was a state actor because she offered her services under a formal agreement with the county. . . At the same time, private parties do not automatically become 'state' actors simply by caring for prisoners. Consider a hospital with an emergency room that generally must treat all patients who seek care for life-threatening conditions. . . Does this hospital become a state actor whenever a prisoner gets rushed there for a medical emergency? The Seventh Circuit has held to the contrary, reasoning that the hospital had not voluntarily agreed to accept the state's special responsibility' to its prisoners. . .We have likewise emphasized the lack of a contract between a state and a doctor when finding that the doctor was not a state actor. See Scott v. Ambani, 577 F.3d 642, 649 (6th Cir. 2009). In Scott, a prison doctor referred an inmate with cancer to an outside hospital for radiation treatment. . . We found that the hospital oncologist who treated the prisoner was not a state actor because there was 'no contractual relationship' between the oncologist and the state. . . The prison doctor had referred the patient to the hospital generally, so the prisoner could have been treated by any of the staff oncologists. . . The state also had no influence over the oncologist's care of the prisoner; she decided on the proper treatment based solely on 'her own training, experience, and independent medical judgment.'. .This case falls somewhere between these decisions. On the one hand, Dr. Jefferson is a private orthopedic surgeon who saw Phillips at his private office and who spoke with Dr. Tangilag about Phillips's MRI. That was the extent of his participation in Phillips's care. Unlike the doctors in West and Carl, Jefferson had no written contract with Kentucky to provide care to its prisoners. Instead, Phillips was referred to Jefferson in the same way that any ordinary patient might be referred to him. In West, moreover, the Supreme Court emphasized that the doctor had performed his duties 'at the state prison,' which the Court thought would inevitably affect the doctor's care. . . Here, by contrast, no evidence suggests that Phillips's status as a prisoner affected Dr. Jefferson's care. . . . On the other hand, Dr. Tangilag referred Phillips specifically to Dr. Jefferson. This fact distinguishes Jefferson from the oncologist in Scott, who cared for the prisoner by happenstance because the referral had been to the hospital. . . This fact also makes this case resemble Conner v. Donnelly, 42 F.3d 220 (4th Cir. 1994). There, the Fourth Circuit held that an orthopedic physician was a state actor when he treated a prisoner at his private office pursuant to a prison doctor's referral. . . The court reached this result even though the state and physician had no written contract. . . Here, moreover, Jefferson knew that Phillips was a prisoner when he accepted the referral and so could be said to have in some respects assumed the state's duty to provide medical care. . .At day's end, we opt not to decide whether Dr. Jefferson qualified as a state actor. Even if he did, Phillips has not shown that he was deliberately indifferent to Phillips's serious medical needs. We thus can resolve this appeal solely on the deliberate-indifference element.")

United States v. Miller, 982 F.3d 412, 422-23 (6th Cir. 2020) ("When should a private party's actions be 'fairly attributable' to the government and trigger the Constitution's protections? . . . One approach to this constitutional 'agency' question would be to review our legal traditions and consider situations in which our laws have historically imputed one person's conduct to another. After all, 'traditional agency principles were reasonably well ensconced in the law at the time of the founding[.]'. . Yet the Supreme Court has stated that '[w]hat is fairly attributable is a matter of normative judgment, and the criteria lack rigid simplicity.'. . It has adopted a fact-bound approach to this attribution question, one that uses 'different factors or tests in different contexts.'. . Sometimes, the Court uses a 'function' test that asks whether a private party performs a public function. . . Other times, the Court uses a 'compulsion' test that asks whether the government compelled a private party's action. . . Still other times, the Court uses a 'nexus' test that asks whether a private party cooperated with the government. . . As the party seeking to suppress evidence, Miller must prove that Google's actions were government actions under one of these tests. . . He has fallen short.")

Howell v. Father Maloney's Boys' Haven, Inc., 976 F.3d 750, 753-54 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Across the country, there's near uniformity that foster homes do not count as state actors. [collecting cases] Like most foster homes, the Haven houses, educates, and provides day-to-day care to the children under its roof. And like most foster homes, the Haven has no power to remove children and place them under appropriate care or in juvenile correctional facilities—the kinds of things state actors traditionally may do. All in all, Kentucky has not 'traditionally and exclusively' performed these functions, . . . and the Haven is not standing in its shoes when offering these eleemosynary services. . . .Howell claims that West v. Atkins. . . advances her cause. That's not the case. West held that a physician under contract to provide medical services to state inmates in a state prison qualified as a state actor under § 1983. . . In West, the 'state itself was directly responsible for managing' the facility in which the alleged constitutional violation occurred. . . The Haven in contrast is 'privately run.'. . West also involved a 'correctional setting,' a prototypical state function 'designed to remove individuals 'from the community.'. . Far from incarcerating children placed under its care, the Haven facilitates their continuing engagement and presence in the community. This is not a remotely comparable exertion of state power.")

Siefert v. Hamilton County, 951 F.3d 753, 761 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. ___ (2020) ("[T]he Sieferts present specific factual allegations, detailing a deep and symbiotic relationship between Children's [Hospital] and the county. From the Sieferts' perspective, it would have been hard to know who could discharge Minor Siefert—Hamilton County or Children's. And when the distinction between the state and private party breaks down to that degree, a private party becomes a state actor in § 1983 cases. . . All this means today is that the Sieferts have alleged enough facts to keep Children's in this lawsuit. . . But a 'plaintiff['s] ability to survive a motion to dismiss with respect to the state-actor question does not necessarily mean that they could survive summary judgment.'. . The Sieferts have unlocked the door to discovery, not to liability. And in the end, Children's may show that it was not a state actor. But at this point, it is too soon to know.")

Morris v. City of Detroit, 789 F. App'x 516, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("Taking the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, we assume that Adams was on duty, even though she had clocked out at 4:00 pm before going to plaintiffs' home. She was scheduled to work until 6:00 pm that day, and the police investigation report found that she was on duty. Adams was not in uniform when she went to plaintiffs' house, but she had her badge, handcuffs and service revolver with her. The only item she used during the incident was her service revolver. Although Adams used her gun, which was state-issued equipment, she did not manifest the requisite showing of state-granted authority to act under color of law. The sole purpose for Adams being at Morris' house was to collect a personal debt of $300. Adams did not purport to be conducting police-related business, nor did she attempt to use her status as a police officer advantageously during the altercation. The fact that Adams used her department-issued weapon during a private dispute is not enough to establish she was acting under color of law.")

Winkler v. Madison County, 893 F.3d 877, 904 (6th Cir. 2018) ("A private entity, such as Healthcare, that contracts to provide medical services at a jail can be held liable under § 1983 because it is carrying out a traditional state function.")

Middaugh v. City of Three Rivers, No. 15-1140, 2017 WL 1179375, at *4-5 (6th Cir. Mar. 29, 2017) (not reported), on remand from Piper v. Middaugh, 136 S. Ct. 2408 (2016) (per curiam) ("To determine whether an officer's conduct transforms a private repossession into state action, our cases have looked for decades to the purpose and effect of the conduct, 'distinguish[ing] between conduct designed to keep the peace and activity fashioned to assist in the repossession.'. . . .Officers 'cross the line' into state action when they 'take an active role in a seizure or eviction,' Cochran, 656 F.3d at 310, and 'affirmatively intervene to aid the repossessor,'id. (quoting Marcus v. McCollum, 394 F.3d 813, 818 (10th Cir. 2004)). . . .We find that the Officers' conduct crossed the line, rendering the repossession state action. By driving Chrystal onto the Middaughs' property and enabling her to seize the car without objection, the Officers 'affirmatively intervene[d] to aid the repossessor.'. . Thus, the Officers' conduct was sufficient for state action.")

Partin v. Davis, 675 F. App'x 575, 587 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Although Franklin County and the Ikard Defendants shared a contractual relationship, no facts in the record suggest that the parties were 'pervasive [ly] entwin[ed.]'. . . During the process of executing the Writ, Deputy Tyler phoned Jason Ikard to perform a towing service. The deputy chose Jason Ikard because his company had towed seized cars for the county before, and it was the only one capable of moving tractor-trailers. Ikard then drove the Partins' trucks to a holding facility. Other than asking Ikard to drive the seized trucks, Deputy Tyler shared no information about the legal basis for the execution. As the deputy explained, the Ikard Defendants played 'no role in the seizure of the property identified in the Writ of Execution other than handling the logistics of transporting the tractor-trailers.' Accordingly, their involvement in the Writ-enforcement process falls short of demonstrating the close nexus with Franklin County necessary to expose them to § 1983 liability. We thus find the Ikard Defendants' role in the seizure insufficient to make them state actors under § 1983.")

Meadows v. Enyeart, 627 F. App'x 496, 501 (6th Cir. 2015) ("The Defendants in this case are public officials who hired a private attorney to send a cease-and-desist letter. Enyeart and Migliozzi did not act out of a state-imposed duty. Rather, they were motivated to safeguard their personal reputations. Nor did the Defendants threaten to initiate anything other than private legal action against the Meadowses. Because any person may hire a private attorney to threaten private legal action, it cannot be said that the letter was 'possible only because [the Defendants were] clothed with the authority of state law.'. . Rather, the 'nature of the act performed' was 'functionally equivalent to that of any private citizen.'. . Therefore, the Defendants did not act under color of state law in sending the cease-and-desist letter, and the Meadowses cannot recover in a § 1983 action on the basis of that letter.")

be considered state actors if they exercise power 'possessed by virtue of state law' and if they are 'clothed with the authority of state law.'. . The question turns on whether the private individual's actions can be fairly attributed to the state. . . Our court has identified three tests to resolve the state-actor inquiry: the public-function test, the state-compulsion test, and the nexus test. . . The parties agree that this case implicates the public-function test, which 'requires that the private [individual] exercise powers which are traditionally exclusively reserved to the state.'. . . The Sixth Circuit has interpreted this test narrowly; rarely have we attributed private conduct to the state. . . Nevertheless, Carl argues that Dr. Jawor is a state actor under the public-function test and that West v. Atkins, 487 U.S. 42, 108 S.Ct. 2250, 101 L.Ed.2d 40 (1988), supports his position. We agree. We start from the basic premise that states must provide medical care to those in custody. . . .A state may not escape § 1983 liability by contracting out or delegating its obligation to provide medical care to inmates. . . .Dr. Jawor engaged in a public function by evaluating Carl, an individual involuntarily in custody. Attributing Dr. Jawor's conduct to the state is appropriate because Dr. Jawor performed a function that the state would typically carry out. . . It makes no difference that Carl was assessed for psychiatric treatment as opposed to medical care more generally. . . The right to both kinds of care is protected under the Eighth Amendment. True enough, Dr. Jawor did not have a direct employment relationship with Muskegon County Jail to provide psychiatric services to detainees. She was, however, under contract with the county, through its agency CMH, to administer services to pretrial detainees held at the Jail. . . Whether Dr. Jawor was employed directly by the state does not control whether she was a state actor. . . .As it stands, the district court's holding—finding no state action—would incentivize the state to contract out, piece by piece, features of its prison healthcare system. In turn, each private actor providing medical care could disclaim liability under § 1983, downplaying their role in the prison system as so nominal that they should not be considered state actors. Sanctioning a state's delegation of duties in this manner is incompatible with West, which admonishes that '[c]ontracting out prison medical care does not relieve the State of its constitutional duty to provide adequate medical treatment to those in its custody.' West, 487 U.S. at 56, 108 S.Ct. 2250. In the face of today's expansion of healthcare outsourcing and prison privatization, these activities, many of which are necessary and well-intentioned, do not absolve a state from adhering to constitutional precepts.") Bishawi v. Ne. Ohio Corr. Ctr., 628 F. App'x 329, 342 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Bishawi argues that CCA, NEOCC, and its employees should be considered state actors because the prison was under contract with the City of Youngstown, Ohio, for conveyance of the land on which the prison was built and because NEOCC was subject to State of Ohio inspections. To state a claim under § 1983, a plaintiff must allege the violation of a right secured by the Federal Constitution or laws and that the violation was committed by a person acting under color of state law. . .When a defendant is a private entity, the entity can be held liable under § 1983 only if its conduct may be 'fairly attributable to the state.'. . At the time of the events complained of, Bishawi was incarcerated at NEOCC, a private prison owned and operated by CCA, a private corporation, to provide services for the federal government. Because NEOCC does not provide services on behalf of the state, neither NEOCC nor CCA were acting under the color of state law for the purposes of § 1983.

Further, NEOCC's employees cannot be considered state actors because they are employees of a privately operated prison, operated for the federal government. Thus, the district court correctly found that § 1983 is not applicable to this case.")

Barkovic v. Hogan, No. 11–2335, 2012 WL 5862468, *3, *4 (6th Cir. Nov. 19, 2012) (not reported) ('This case, like Chapman, presents a situation where there are 'unanswered questions of fact regarding the proper characterization of the actions.'. . Hogan was on duty that morning at the courthouse for official business. In fact, the business involved one of Barkovic's cases. Barkovic argues that Hogan was in the jury room, an area of the courthouse where he could only have been pursuant to his official duties. The record is unclear, however, as to the exact nature of the 'jury room' and whether this was a restricted area. Additionally, the two men had previous encounters, all involving official duties rather than personal pursuits. Hogan's anger toward Barkovic stemmed from his role as a police officer. There is evidence that the verbal dispute resulted from Barkovic's insulting comments to other police officers that morning and that the fight escalated when Hogan felt he needed to 'defend the dignity of his department.' Barkovic also claims that Hogan's status as a police officer emboldened him to assault Barkovic. On the other hand, Hogan argues that he did not assault Barkovic pursuant to a duty given to him by the state. He claims that he did not assert his authority as a police officer, and it is undisputed that Hogan was not in uniform or displaying a badge or a weapon. Hogan, however, also contends in his state immunity defense that he was acting during the course of his employment and within the scope of his authority in accordance with his department's guidelines and procedures. Thus, as in the Chapman case, there is a dispute of fact to be presented to the jury, and summary judgment is inappropriate.")

Barkovic v. Hogan, No. 11–2335, 2012 WL 5862468, *4, *5 (6th Cir. Nov. 19, 2012) (not reported) (McKeague, J., dissenting) ("Summary judgment is proper here because even if Barkovic's version of events be accepted as true, there is insufficient support for the conclusion that Hogan acted under color of state law. The majority pays lip service to the correct standard-a public employee acts under color of state law when he 'exercise[s] power possessed by virtue of state law and made possible only because [he or she] is clothed with the authority of state law.'. . However, the majority neglects to apply this standard. The majority opinion nowhere explains how Hogan could have been exercising state-given authority when he pushed Barkovic into the doorframe. In Chapman, the factfinder could reasonably have concluded that the security officer was exercising state-given power because he was dressed in uniform and engaging in activities bearing a relationship to law enforcement. Hogan, on the other hand, although present in the courthouse pursuant to a subpoena and therefore on official business, was not in uniform and was clearly not acting in a law enforcement capacity or exercising any power possessed by virtue of state law when he shoved Barkovic. The majority notes that it is unclear whether the jury room was a restricted area. So what? The altercation did not occur there; it took place in a public hallway. The majority also notes that Hogan's status as a police officer was relevant to the background relationship between the two men, but this fact is irrelevant to deciding whether Hogan was exercising state-given power when he shoved Barkovic in response to verbal insults. Finally, although Barkovic alleges that Hogan's status as a police officer 'embolden[ed]' him to attack Barkovic, Barkovic cites no record support for this allegation nor any authority for the notion that it is relevant. In the end, the factual disputes in this case are immaterial. Even under Barkovic's version of events, Hogan's actions were not made possible only because of his state-given powers. But for his official status, Hogan could still have pushed Barkovic. In my opinion, the district court properly granted summary judgment on Barkovic's § 1983 claim for excessive force in violation of his Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights, and Barkovic was properly left to pursue his state law remedies for assault and battery in state court. I respectfully dissent.")

Hensley v. Gassman, 693 F.3d 681, 691, 692 (6th Cir. 2012) ("In the instant case, the Deputies' actions between the time of their arrival and the time Sheila got into the Buick were more than mere police presence and reflect circumstances other courts have found indicative of state action: (1) the Deputies arrived at the Hensley residence with, and at the request of, Gassman; (2) Deputy Scott ordered Hensley Jr., at least once, to move from between the Buick and the tow truck, as Hensley Jr. was attempting to thwart the repossession; (3) the Deputies ignored Hensley Jr.'s demands to leave the property; (4) Deputy Gilbert told Hensley Jr. that Gassman was taking the Buick; and (5) Deputy Scott ignored both Sheila's protest and her explanation and told Sheila that Gassman was still going to take the Buick. . . The circumstances of this case are somewhat unique because, rather than dissuading Sheila from objecting, the Deputies' conduct prompted her to do so. We need not dwell on these facts, however, because the Deputies concede that Deputy Scott's act of ordering Gassman to tow the Buick to the road, which the Deputies claim was necessary to resolve the situation, was state action. . . More importantly, although the Deputies do not expressly concede the point, it cannot be reasonably disputed that their conduct of breaking the car window, removing Sheila, and ordering her to remove her belongings from the car was state action. Equally clear is that this conduct was not only active participation, but was instrumental to Gassman's success in completing the repossession. Sheila asserted her right to object not only through words, but by physically taking control of the Buick. At that point, Gassman's right to pursue his self-help remedy terminated, and he was required to cease the repossession. . . Regardless, the Deputies' subsequent actions, which enabled Gassman to seize the Buick sans Sheila, resolved the stalemate in favor of Gassman—the party neither factually nor legally entitled to the Buick.")

Cochran v. Gilliam, 656 F.3d 300, 307, 308 (6th Cir. 2011) ("[I]n cases where police officers take an active role in a seizure or eviction, they are no longer mere passive observers and courts have held that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . This is particularly true when there is neither a specific court order permitting the officers' conduct nor any exigent circumstance in which the government's interest would outweigh the individual's interest in his property. . . Here, the record contains photos showing at least one of the two Gilliam brothers carrying items out of the house and helping the Landlords load Cochran's property into a pickup truck. These affirmative acts take the Gilliams beyond the acts of the deputies in Soldal who never entered the house or physically moved any of the property. The Gilliams' actions place them squarely within the Supreme Court's reaffirmation that a physical seizure of the property constitutes a Fourth Amendment violation. Further, the Gilliams interposed themselves between Cochran and the Landlords to allow the Landlords to take Cochran's property. The Gilliams allegedly threatened to arrest Cochran if he interfered with the Landlords' actions, and sent away the state police officer that Cochran had called for assistance. Then, in a scenario similar to that in Soldal, Don Gilliam, aware of the possible questionable nature of the removal of Cochran's belongings, attempted to clarify the situation by calling the county attorney. The Gilliams then even went so far as to buy Cochran's TV from the Landlords. These acts, taken together, indicate the Gilliams' presence that day went beyond the constitutionally permissible detached keeping of the peace function and crossed over into a 'meaningful interference' with Cochran's property.")

Norris v. Premier Integrity Solutions, Inc., 641 F.3d 695, 698 (6th Cir. 2011) (private drug testing corporation acted under color of state law in using "direct observation" method of taking urine samples for analysis where company conducted the tests for the government after the Administrative Office of the Courts had approved company's policies and methods and "where judges in Kentucky viewed the direct observation testing method as 'essential.'").

Paige v. Coyner, 614 F.3d 273, 280 (6th Cir. 2010) ("The district court thus erred in applying Blum to the instant case and by framing the issue as whether Bunnell Hill's actions in firing Paige could be fairly attributed to the state. Blum's tests are limited to suits where the private party is the one allegedly responsible for taking the constitutionally impermissible action. Here, Coyner is clearly a state actor because she works on behalf of local government entities, and Paige contends that Coyner violated § 1983 when Coyner called Bunnell Hill and made false statements in retaliation for Paige's criticism of the proposed interstate project. Paige has therefore properly alleged state action.")

Powers v. Hamilton County Public Defender Com'n, 501 F.3d 592, 613, 614 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Powers alleges that the Public Defender engages in an across-the-board policy or custom of doing nothing to protect its indigent clients' constitutional rights not to be jailed as a result of their inability to pay court-ordered fines. Unlike the plaintiff in Polk County, Powers does not seek to recover on the basis of the failures of his individual counsel, but on the basis of an alleged agency-wide policy or custom of routinely ignoring the issue of indigency in the context of non-payment of fines. Although we acknowledge that requesting indigency hearings is within a lawyer's 'traditional functions,' the conduct complained of is nonetheless 'administrative' in character for the reasons already described: Powers maintains that the Public Defender's inaction is systemic and therefore carries the imprimatur of administrative approval. . . .He argues that the Public Defender systematically violates class members' constitutional rights by failing to represent them on the question of indigency. Given the reasoning of Polk County, it makes sense to treat this alleged policy or custom as state action for purposes of § 1983. The existence of such a policy, if proven, will show that the adversarial relationship between the State and the Public Defender – upon which the Polk County Court relied heavily in determining that the individual public defender there was not a state actor – has broken down such that the Public Defender is serving the State's interest in exacting punishment, rather than the interests of its clients, or society's interest in fair judicial proceedings.").

Lindsey v. Detroit Entertainment, L.L.C., 484 F.3d 824, 830, 831 (6th Cir. 2007) (where security personnel were not licensed by state, detention of plaintiffs could not be attributed to state action)

Swiecicki v. Delgado, 463 F.3d 489, 496, 497 (6th Cir. 2006) ("Here, we believe the record establishes that Delgado was a state actor from the beginning of the incident in question because he 'presented himself as a police officer.'. . Our conclusion is based not only on Delgado's attire, badge, and weapons, but also on the fact that Delgado told Swiecicki that '[w]e can either do this the easy way or the hard way.'. . .Rather than calmly asking Swiecicki to leave the stadium, Delgado, while wearing his uniform and carrying his official weapons, threatened Swiecicki and forcibly removed him from the bleachers. This evidence, combined with the fact that Delgado was hired by Jacobs Field to intervene 'in cases requiring police action' suggests that his warning to Swiecicki amounted to a threat of arrest. Delgado apparently believed, moreover, that the incident was one requiring 'police action' because he approached Swiecicki before Labrie had a chance to further investigate. In sum, this was more than a case in which a civilian employed by the Indians peaceably ejected an unruly fan from a baseball game – a procedure clearly contemplated by the rules and regulations of Jacobs Field. Delgado, in full police uniform, forcibly removed Swiecicki in the escort position. All of this evidence, when considered together, indicates that Delgado was acting under color of state law at the time he removed Swiecicki from the bleachers.")

Durante v. Fairlane Town Center, 201 F. App'x 338, 2006 WL 2986452, at *2, *3 (6th Cir. Oct. 18, 2006) ("The term 'public function' is a bit of a misnomer, at least in the context of private actors. As explained by the First Circuit, '[i]n order for a private actor to be deemed to have acted under color of state law, it is not enough to show that the private actor performed a public function.' Rockwell v. Cape Cod Hosp., 26 F.3d 254, 258 (1st Cir.1994). Rather, the private actor must perform a public function which has traditionally and exclusively been reserved to the State. Jackson v. Metro. Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345, 352 (1974). This test is difficult to satisfy. 'While many functions have been traditionally performed by governments, very few have been exclusively reserved to the State.' . . . There are instances, however, when the performance of certain functions by a private security officer crosses the line from private action to state action. For example, the Seventh Circuit has held that private police officers licensed to make arrests could be state actors under the public function test. Payton v. Rush-Presbyterian-St. Luke's Med. Ctr., 184 F.3d 623, 627-30 (7th Cir.1999). The key distinction lies in whether the private defendant's police powers delegated by the State are plenary, or merely police-like. In the latter instance, the private action is not one considered exclusively reserved to the State, and is thus not undertaken under color of law. There is no evidence before us that the FTC security guards were licensed under M.C.L. § 338.1079. The fact that the they were security guards does not, in itself, imply that they were licensed – M.C.L. § 338.1079(2) expressly provides that private security guards are not required to be licensed. Durante did not allege that they were so licensed, nor did he take any depositions or seek discovery on this issue. Accordingly, Romanski lends Durante no support. Nor does Durante find support elsewhere under federal or state law. First, a plaintiff who argues that a private actor acted under color of state law must offer some historical analysis on whether the power exercised is one that is traditionally the exclusive prerogative of the state. . . Durante has offered no historical analysis of a merchant's arrest and transport powers (if any) for criminal trespass under Michigan law. . . . Moreover, even if Durante had offered some historical analysis, he has not shown that the FTC defendants exercised a power exclusively left to the State of Michigan, and delegated to them by the State. Numerous cases decline to find that a private security guard acted under color of state law based on the authority of the common law shopkeeper's privilege.").

Chapman v. Higbee Company, 319 F.3d 825, 834, 835 (6th Cir. 2003) (en banc) ("Here, the Dillard's security officer who stopped and searched Chapman was an off-duty sheriff's deputy, wearing his official sheriff's department uniform, badge, and sidearm. . . Moreover, the Dillard's security officer was obligated to obey Dillard's policies and regulations while on-duty at the store. Although the state played no part in the promulgation of these policies, their strip searching provision directly implicates the state: 'Strip searches are prohibited. If you suspect that stolen objects are hidden on [the shopper's] person, call the police.' During the incident at issue, the Dillard's security officer did not represent himself as a police officer, threaten to arrest Chapman, wave his badge or weapon, or establish any contact with the sheriff's department. He did however initiate a strip search by requiring Chapman to enter a fitting room with the sales manager to inspect her clothing. Because Dillard's policy mandates police intervention in strip search situations, a reasonable jury could very well find that the initiation of a strip search by an armed, uniformed sheriff's deputy constituted an act that may fairly be attributed to the state. Additionally, if Chapman did not feel free to leave, as a result of the security officer's sheriff's uniform, his badge, or his sidearm, a reasonable jury could find the detention was a tacit arrest and fairly attributable to the state.").

Neuens v. City of Columbus, 303 F.3d 667, 670, 671 (6th Cir. 2003) ("[T]he district court erred when it accepted Bridges' stipulation that he was acting under color of law and considered only the second prong of § 1983 analysis. Because there is no indication in the record that Defendant-Appellant was acting under color of law at the time of the incident, we also conclude that the district court erred in denying Officer Bridges' summary judgment motion. . . . The record clearly demonstrates that Bridges was acting in his private capacity on the morning of December 26, 1998. Bridges was not in uniform, he was not driving in a police car, and he did not display a badge to Neuens or anyone else at the Waffle House restaurant. Bridges was not at the Waffle House pursuant to official duties; rather, he was out with his personal friends for social reasons. Neither Bridges nor his friends made any suggestions that Bridges was a police officer. . . . If after its independent review the district court concludes that Bridges did not act under color of state law, we instruct the district court to dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief may granted.")

Blair v. Harris, No. 08-CV-15090, 2010 WL 3805588, at *6 (E.D. Mich. Sept. 23, 2010) ("Guided by the principles extracted from the foregoing cases, the Court concludes in this case that Plaintiff has failed to establish that Gregory Harris was acting under color of law when he shot Marquise

Blair. The only evidence Plaintiff relies upon is that when Harris observed Blair trying to steal his personal vehicle, he yelled, 'Halt. Stop. Police. It's a police officer's van.' It is undisputed that Harris was off-duty at the time. He was not in his uniform and he did not flash his badge. While it is true that Harris had his gun drawn and pursued Blair as he tried to escape apprehension, the uncontroverted evidence shows that the gun was Harris's personal handgun, not his service revolver. .. While the shooting of Plaintiff's decedent is tragic, focusing, as the Court must, on the nature of the defendant officer's actions and the factual context out of which those actions arose, the Court finds that Harris's actions do not rise to the level of a constitutional deprivation as they were not taken 'under color of law.'")

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Hernandez v. Causey, 124 F.4th 325, 335-38 (5th Cir. 2024) ("Section 1983 applies 'only when "the claimed deprivation has resulted from the exercise of a right or privilege having its source in state authority."'. .This case law aligns with Lindke's emphasis that 'state action exists only when' the constitutional deprivation 'ha[s] its source in state authority.'. . As cases cited by Hernandez confirm, a federal officer acting under his agency's authority but assisting a state officer generally acts under color of federal law. . . . Even if we were to apply Hernandez's proposed 'joint action test,' which is applicable to private actors not federal actors, to determine ICE Agent Causey's liability, willful participation alone is insufficient. Hernandez would still be required to allege some agreement, whether explicit or implicit, between Causey and state officers to deprive Hernandez of his rights in order to claim liability under § 1983. We have held that, to satisfy the joint action test for a private actor, a plaintiff must plead 'facts showing an agreement or meeting of the minds between the state actor and the private actor to engage in a conspiracy to deprive the plaintiff of a constitutional right, and that the private actor was a willing participant in joint activity with the state or its agents.'. . . Our decision in Cherry Knoll reflects the requirement that a plaintiff must plead some type of agreement to pursue a § 1983 claim against a private actor. Applying § 1983 liability to a federal actor requires further allegations that place the constitutional deprivation under state rather than federal law. Where the federal actor could have derived their authority to act under federal law, the consensus of circuit courts is that § 1983 necessitates evidence of a conspiracy between the federal actor and a state actor to deprive the plaintiff of his rights under color of state law. . . .Federal officers who are called in to assist a state officer can be liable under § 1983 when there is evidence of a conspiracy to deprive and the constitutional deprivation 'ha[s] its source in state authority.'. . But because Causey did not act under color of state law, and because Hernandez has alleged neither details of a conspiracy between Causey and the state officials nor any agreement with them to use excessive force, much less any state authority directive to do so, the district court properly dismissed Hernandez's § 1983 claims.")

Hernandez v. Causey, 124 F.4th 325, 339-41 (5th Cir. 2024) (Dennis, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I agree with the majority that Hernandez's Bivens claim is foreclosed by the Supreme Court's decision in Egbert v. Boule[.] . . However, and with great respect for my esteemed colleagues, I would find that Hernandez has pleaded a § 1983 claim upon which relief can be granted. To plausibly plead that Causey acted under color of state law, rather than federal law, our cases do not require Hernandez to have alleged a conspiracy between the Laurel Police and ICE officers to seize Hernandez. . . Instead, when federal officials either conspire or act jointly with state officials to deny constitutional rights, the state officials provide the requisite state action to support § 1983 claims against the federal officials. . . . Contrary to the majority's view, I read Knights of Ku Klux Klan, Realm of Louisiana v. East Baton Rouge Parish School Board, 735 F.2d 895 (5th Cir. 1984), to apply the so-called joint action test to federal officers. . . There, we held 'when federal officials conspire or act jointly with state officials to deny constitutional rights, "the state officials provide the requisite state action"' for purposes of § 1983. . . Despite the use of the word 'or,' the majority reads Knights to require a conspiracy and rejects Hernandez's argument that the joint action test applies to federal officers. . . In my view, Knights explicitly dictates that we find federal officials act under color of state law when the federal government 'act[s] jointly with state officials to deny constitutional rights.'. . Our cases following Knights confirm as much. . . Given its significant reliance on out-of-circuit authority, it is apparent that the majority wants our circuit's precedents to conform with some other circuits' precedents, which admittedly do impose a strict conspiracy requirement. See, e.g., Ante, at —— (relying on caselaw from the Seventh, Ninth, and Tenth Circuits that do not align with Knights). . . While the pursuit of conformity is an important one, under our rule of orderliness, we are duty bound to apply Knights' explication of the law at this stage. . . I therefore cannot join the part of the majority's opinion that sub silentio overturns a prior published panel opinion. . . .Applying the joint action test derived from binding precedents to the facts of this case, I would find that Hernandez plausibly alleged that translator Causey acted under color of state law when he seized Hernandez with a gunshot/excessive force. Neither the majority, the district court, nor the Government point to any federal law or regulation that Causey acted pursuant to when he came to the scene as Officer Driskell's translator, when he began to chase after Hernandez who was leaving a state law traffic investigation, or when he eventually shot Hernandez to seize him. To the contrary, the Government disavows that the ICE Agents were on the scene to perform immigration operations—they were only there as the Laurel Police Department's translators to accomplish the state's purpose of enforcing its traffic laws. . . Further still, according to Officer Driskell, the ICE translators were an 'additional tool in his toolbox' and he had relied on them in the past for translation assistance when stopping Hispanic people. The level of interdependence manifested in this case by Laurel Police Department Officer Driskell, acting pursuant to state law, instructing ICE Agents to partake in a local police matter as translators and then to pursue and seize Hernandez. Causey followed that instruction and seized Hernandez by shooting him in the arm, in contravention of the Fourth Amendment's guarantee that individuals be free from an unreasonable government seizure by the use of excessive force. . . Viewing the alleged facts in the light most favorable to Hernandez leads me to conclude that Causey was a 'willful participant in joint action with the State or its agents.'. . I would reverse the district court's dismissal of Hernandez's § 1983 excessive force claim against Causey. Still, for the reasons assigned by the majority, I agree that we must affirm the district court's dismissal of Hernandez's Bivens claim. I respectfully concur in part and dissent in part.")

Cielak v. Nicolet Union High School District, 112 F.4th 472, 480-81 (7th Cir. 2024) ("Cielak's claims fail at this first step: he has not plausibly pleaded a violation of his substantive due process or equal protection rights because Johnson's post-allegation abuse—after Cielak graduated from NHS—was not done under color of state law. Cielak cannot merely assert that Johnson was a state employee; instead, he must allege that Johnson's 'invocation of state authority in one way or another facilitated or enabled the alleged misconduct.'. . In other words, in committing the abuse, Johnson must have been 'exercising power "possessed by virtue of state law and made possible only because [he] is clothed with the authority of state law."'. . But once Cielak graduated from NHS, Johnson's abuse was unrelated to his duties as a teacher and was not done pursuant to or facilitated by any authority he had as a teacher. Simply, after 1983, Johnson and Cielak 'did not encounter each other as [student and teacher], but as private persons,' so Johnson's actions 'were those of a private citizen in the course of a purely private [ ] interaction.'. .Cielak makes much of the fact that Johnson continued to invoke the sham physiological study during the post-allegation abuse, but his allegations do not show that Johnson 'was anything other than a private citizen or that his [teaching] duties related to [Cielak's] claims.'. . Cielak does not allege that the study was part of Johnson's duties or related to Johnson's employment at NHS. . . And the fact that Johnson, using his authority as a teacher, initiated the abuse when Cielak was a student does not mean the abuse after 1983 was enabled by an invocation of state authority. . . Cielak also argues that Johnson was only able to abuse him after the 1983 allegation because of Johnson's prominence in the community. But influential status is not itself a 'sign[ ] of state authority.'. . In abusing Cielak after his graduation, Johnson was 'functionally equivalent to ... any private citizen' who happens to have influence in a community. . . In sum, as Cielak can show no violation of his rights after Hodges's allegation, the district court properly dismissed his § 1983 claims.")

Scott v. Univerisity of Chicago Medical Center, 107 F.4th 752, 761 & n.9 (7th Cir. 2024) ("We assume—but do not decide—that taking temporary protective custody of a child is an exclusive and traditional function of the state. But, here, the University of Chicago Medical Center did not 'exercise' that function, . . . given that Dr. Liou never took the Scotts' newborn away from them. The Scotts have pointed to no case in which the mere threat of performing a traditional state function transforms a private actor into one acting 'under color of state law.' Given that the Scotts have failed to show Dr. Liou and the University of Chicago Medical Center performed a public function, this theory fails.[9] [fn. 9: The parents argue that our decision in Rodriguez v. Plymouth Ambulance Service, 577 F.3d 816, outlined a fourth set of state action factors that likewise supports their theory that the hospitals and their employees were acting under color of state law. That decision, however, simply considered the 'public function' question as it applies to medical providers in state prisons. . . The case focused primarily on 'the relationship among the state, the health care provider and the prisoner,' recognizing that, in a prisoner context, the state is 'the ultimate responsible party for the prisoner's health care.'. . Here, the state had no control or coercion over the newborns' medical care, nor was there a contract between the state and the defendant providers to care for the newborns (an 'important factor' in Rodriguez). . . .We have never applied the factors from Rodriguez outside of the prison context and will not do so here.]")

DiDonato v. Panatera, 24 F.4th 1156, 1161-62 (7th Cir. 2022)("To plead that a defendant acted under color of state law, a § 1983 plaintiff must allege that a defendant's invocation of state authority in one way or another facilitated or enabled the alleged misconduct. That the defendant is a state employee is not enough. '[S]tate officials or employees who act without the cloth of state authority do not subject themselves to § 1983 suits.'. . . The district court applied these exact principles and determined that DiDonato failed to allege that Panatera acted under color of state law. We reach the same conclusion after taking our own independent look at the allegations in DiDonato's second amended complaint. . . . DiDonato's complaint describes behavior that, while abhorrent, was 'wholly unconnected' to Panatera's employment. . . DiDonato and Panatera did not encounter each other as paramedic and patient, but as private persons together in Panatera's home. Panatera's 'actions were those of a private citizen in the course of a purely private social interaction.'. . Any action or inaction was not under color of state law. Because we agree with the district court that DiDonato failed to allege that Panatera acted under color of state law, we need not immerse ourselves in any aspect of the court's reasoning under DeShaney. We instead stop on the state action point and AFFIRM the dismissal of DiDonato's § 1983 claim.")

First Midwest Bank Guardian of Estate of LaPorta v. City of Chicago, 988 F.3d 978, 987 (7th Cir. 2021) ("A Monell plaintiff must establish that he suffered a deprivation of a federal right before municipal fault, deliberate indifference, and causation come into play. LaPorta's claim fails at this first step. He did not suffer a deprivation of a right secured by the federal Constitution or laws. It's undisputed that Kelly was not acting under color of state law when he shot LaPorta. His actions were wholly unconnected to his duties as a Chicago police officer. He was off duty. He shot LaPorta after they spent a night out drinking together and had returned to his home to continue socializing at the end of the evening. Kelly's actions were those of a private citizen in the course of a purely private social interaction. This was, in short, an act of private violence.")

Ferguson v. Cook County Correctional Facility/Cermak, 836 F. App'x 438, ___ (7th Cir. 2020) (not reported) ([W]e do not agree with the district court that Ferguson's claims fail because, having posted his individual bond and having left Cermak (i.e., jail), he was not in custody at the time. Though someone on bail subject to electronic monitoring arguably is not in custody, . . . the events at Mt. Sinai happened before Ferguson was taken home. A deputy sheriff brought a handcuffed Ferguson to and from Mt. Sinai in his cruiser, so Ferguson was in the custody of the Cook County Sheriff's Department until he was released at his apartment. See DeShaney v. Winnebago Cty. Dep't of Soc. Servs., 489 U.S. 189, 200, 109 S.Ct. 998, 103 L.Ed.2d 249 (1989). . . Of course, the mere fact that Ferguson was in custody at the time is not sufficient to expose the Mt. Sinai defendants to § 1983 liability. . . Dismissal was still proper because they did not act under the color of state law. . . Private actors do not expose themselves to suit under § 1983 simply by being involved in the involuntary commitment process, although a private actor may function as a state actor if compelled by the state to commit a mentally ill patient or if contracted by the state to provide detainees with medical care. . . Here, the allegations do not support an inference that Mt. Sinai had to admit Ferguson. Illinois law does not force a receiving institution to commit a patient; instead, medical professionals must conduct an independent examination and release a patient who, in their judgment, does not require commitment. . . Additionally, Ferguson's complaint makes clear that Balawender had Ferguson sent to Mt. Sinai under the civil-commitment laws because he was not a detainee anymore, so Mt. Sinai was not acting as a contractor for detainee healthcare.")

Harnishfeger v. United States, 943 F.3d 1105, 1120 (7th Cir. 2019) ("The defendants argue that Knutson does not control here, not because the Indiana Army National Guard is materially different from the Wisconsin Air National Guard, but because Harnishfeger was a member of a federal program when Kopczynski demanded her removal. The proper focus, however, is not on the target of the action but on the actor. . . The defense argument implies that any public or private VISTA sponsor (the Indianapolis Public Schools or a local Boys and Girls Club, for example) becomes a federal agent whenever it hosts a VISTA volunteer, a view we find untenable. The defense points out that Harnishfeger's VISTA position was federally funded and subject in part to federal guidelines. But both factors were present in Knutson as well, see id. at 767 ("the federal government provides salaries, benefits, and supplies to full-time Guard officers and technicians"), 768 ("Wisconsin adopts and [defendant] opts to utilize federal substantive and procedural rules"), and that did not 'alter the state-law character' of the Wisconsin Air National Guard's actions. . . In demanding Harnishfeger's removal from her VISTA placement, Lieutenant Colonel Kopczynski was a Guard officer exercising her supervisory authority over the Guard's Family Program Office for the Guard's benefit and in furtherance of the Guard's mission. That was action under color of state law, so § 1983 offers a remedy.")

Martin v. Milwaukee County, 904 F.3d 544, 554-57 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Generally, scope of employment is a fact issue. . . But, as the district court here correctly noted, when the facts are undisputed, and all reasonable inferences therefrom lead to but one conclusion, judgment as a matter of law is appropriate and required. 'Wisconsin courts have stated that it is proper to decide the scope of employment issue on a motion for summary judgment as long as the underlying facts are not in dispute and reasonable inferences leading to conflicting results cannot be drawn from the undisputed facts.'. . .Courts have phrased the scope test for § 895.46 in slightly different but compatible ways. We distill the test to its essence. An act is not in the scope unless it is a natural, not disconnected and not extraordinary, part or incident of the services contemplated. An act is not in the scope if it is different in kind from that authorized, far beyond the authorized time or space, or too little actuated by a purpose to serve the employer. But an act is in the scope if it is so closely connected with the employment objectives, and so fairly and reasonably incidental to them, that it may be regarded as a method, even if improper, of carrying out the employment objectives. We must consider the employee's intent and purpose, in light of subjective and objective circumstances. Here, we may take it as granted that the sexual assaults occurred during the authorized time and space limits of Thicklen's employment (although there may be some question about whether Thicklen was actually authorized to be in the particular locations of the sexual assaults at the times he perpetrated them). But even when viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Martin and the verdict, we hold no reasonable jury could find the sexual assaults were in the scope of his employment. No reasonable jury could conclude the sexual assaults were natural, connected, ordinary parts or incidents of contemplated services; were of the same or similar kind of conduct as that Thicklen was employed to perform; or were actuated even to a slight degree by a purpose to serve County. No reasonable jury could conclude the sexual assaults were connected with the employment objectives (much less closely connected) or incidental to them in any way. No reasonable jury could regard the sexual assaults as improper methods of carrying out employment objectives. The evidence negates the verdict. Uncontested evidence at trial demonstrated County thoroughly trained Thicklen not to have sexual contact with inmates. County expressly forbade him from having sexual contact with an inmate under any circumstances, regardless of apparent consent. County's training warned him that such sexual contact violates state law and the Sheriff's Office's mission. County not only instructed him not to rape inmates; it also trained him how to avoid or reject any opportunity or invitation to engage in any sort of sexual encounter with inmates. . . .Martin failed to offer any evidence the sexual assaults were natural, connected, ordinary parts or incidents of the services contemplated. She presented no evidence from which a reasonable jury could conclude these sexual assaults were similar to guarding inmates. And she presented no evidence from which a reasonable jury could conclude the sexual assaults were actuated in any way by a purpose to serve County. . . .This case is distinguishable from cases involving excessive force by police officers. Some force, even deadly force, is sometimes permissible for police officers. But the rapes in this case were not part of a spectrum of conduct that shades into permissible zones. Inmate rape by a guard usually involves no gray areas. . . . We do not hold sexual assault could never be within the scope. We simply conclude that on these facts, even when viewed most favorably to Martin and the verdict, no reasonable jury could find these sexual assaults were within the scope.")

Robinett v. City of Indianapolis, 894 F.3d 876, 881-82 (7th Cir. 2018) ("An employee acts within the scope of his employment when his conduct is 'of the same general nature as that authorized by the public employer' or 'incidental to the conduct authorized by the employer.'. . An employee can act under color of state law, meanwhile, even when he 'misuse[s]' state power. . . That is to say, he can be held liable for conduct beyond what 'the State in fact authorized.'. . Our cases underscore the difference between 'scope of employment' and 'under color of state law.' . . . No doubt there are some cases in which the two standards will align, but for issue-preclusion purposes, it is enough to note that one does not inexorably lead to the other. In short, the statute protects public employees who act within the scope of their employment from having to foot the bill for defense costs in a civil-rights action regardless of the outcome. Win or lose, however, the employee must have been acting within the scope of his employment; a mere allegation to that effect is not enough to put the public employer on the hook for the cost of the defense. Both the statutory text and precedent make this clear. The judge found that Robinett acted as a private person, not a police officer, when he failed to come to Carmack's aid. Robinett doesn't contest that determination. Because he was not acting within the scope of his public employment, the City need not shoulder the financial burden of his defense.")

Robinett v. City of Indianapolis, 894 F.3d 876, 884-85 (7th Cir. 2018) (Rovner, J., dissenting)

("That the employee here successfully defended on the ground that he was not acting under color of state law or within the scope of his public employment is irrelevant. What matters is that he was sued as a public employee who 'could be' subject to liability under a statute that applies only to public employees. His defense, by the way, also benefitted his public employer, who would have been on the hook at least for any compensatory damages and possibly for punitive damages had the plaintiff been successful. Nothing in the statute ranks defenses. Robinett was found not liable because he successfully convinced a court that he was not acting under color of state law, but he well could have been liable. The color-of-law analysis in this case is a closer call than it appears at first glance. Anders went to Robinett not only as a friend but as a person who could identify a police-placed tracking device for what it was. And Robinett responded using knowledge that he likely gained as a police officer, confirming that the device was what Anders suspected it to be. Robinett even directed Anders to place the device back on his car and to leave his former wife (who had a protective order) alone, acts a police officer might well take in the scope of his employment and under color of state law. Granted, a competent police officer who was fully aware of the situation would also have alerted the department that Anders knew he was being tracked and had the ability to remove the device or otherwise evade detection. In any case, the questions of scope of employment and color of state law required litigation through discovery and all the way to summary judgment in this case, subjecting Robinett to extensive attorney's fees solely because he was a public employee. This is just the type of case the legislature likely meant to cover with its promise of indemnification for fees for its public employees. . . . Robinett's successful defense of this claim benefitted the City of Indianapolis to Robinett's detriment. The record reveals that Robinett held a second job at the local Olive Garden restaurant. Whatever this suggests about the pay scale for Indianapolis police officers, it tells us that Robinett is probably ill-equipped to pay more than $20,000 in attorney's fees and costs that he incurred defending himself against the civil rights charges leveled against him as a police officer. The plain language of the statute directs the City of Indianapolis to indemnify Robinett for the fees he incurred here. I respectfully dissent.")

Miller v. Vohne Liche Kennels, Inc., 600 F. App'x 475, 477 (7th Cir. 2015) ("It is true that delegating an exclusive public function to a private entity does not absolve a state of its constitutional obligations. See West v. Atkins, 487 U.S. 42, 54–55 (1988), Rodriguez v. Plymouth Ambulance Serv., 577 F.3d 816, 824–26 (7th Cir.2009). Yet the activities that have been held to fall within a state's exclusive function are few. See Terry v. Adams, 345 U.S. 461 (1953) (administration of elections); Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501 (1946) (operation of a company town); Jackson v. Metro. Edison Co., 419 U.S. 345 (1974) (eminent domain); Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., 500 U.S. 614 (1991) (preemptory challenges in jury selection); Evans v. Newton, 382 U.S. 296 (1966) (operation of a municipal park). The fact that a 'private entity performs a function that serves the public does not transform its conduct into state action.' Wade v. Byles, 83 F.3d 902, 905 (7th Cir.1996). And while delegation of a state's entire police power to a private entity may turn that entity into a state actor, that is not what happened here. . . Police protection in Plymouth is provided by the Plymouth Police Department. VLK is not authorized by the City or the State of Indiana to engage in police powers akin to those of a Plymouth police officer. True, the Training Board has approved the use of VLK-trained dogs by police officers in Indiana. Training drug-sniffing dogs and their handlers, however, is not an exercise exclusively reserved to the state. . . Thus, because VLK could not have engaged in state action by training the dog, Miller does not have a plausible claim against the companies under § 1983.")

Listecki v. Official Comm. of Unsecured Creditors, 780 F.3d 731, 740-41 (7th Cir. 2015) ("[T]he Archdiocese argues—and the district court found—that the Committee performs a 'public function' making it a governmental actor. Under this test, a private entity is a governmental actor when it is performing an action that is 'traditionally the exclusive prerogative of the State.'. . This test is rarely met. . . The Archdiocese argues that the Committee is basically stepping into the shoes of the Trustee. First, that theory is belied by the fact that the Committee can, and does, conflict with the Trustee. Were they performing the same function, they would presumably be on the same page. Second, the goal and purpose of the committee is to act on behalf of and for the creditors. Conversely, the goal of the Trustee is to 'promote the integrity and efficiency of the bankruptcy system for the benefit of all stakeholders—debtors, creditors, and the public.'. There is some overlap between their functions—e.g., both engage in restructuring discussions and converse with the court regarding the status of the case and the debtor's estate—but the traditional function of the governmental entity is to act as an impartial supervisor of the bankruptcy process for the benefit of all. The Committee, however, is far from impartial. The Archdiocese also argues, and the district court found, that a debtor-in-possession performs a public function, and when the Committee obtained derivative standing to pursue avoidance claims, it stepped into the shoes of the debtor-in-possession, thereby becoming a governmental actor. . . The problem for the Archdiocese is that the debtor-in-possession does not perform an action that is 'traditionally the exclusive prerogative of the State.'. . As the Code makes clear, the 'trustee' avoids transfers-not the United States Trustee or any other governmental entity. . . It is not the government or even a governmental actor that traditionally avoids transfers, but rather individual trustees and debtor-in-possessions. This is not the exclusive prerogative of the government. . . Although each determination of an entity's governmental actor status is fact- and case-specific, our conclusion that the Committee is not a governmental actor is supported by the Supreme Court's precedent. . . . There might be a 'nexus,' between the Committee and the government, but it is not a close one. . . For all these reasons, we find the Committee is not acting under the color of law and so RFRA does not apply. Therefore we need not address the Committee's argument that RFRA's application here would create federalism issues.").

Belbachir v. County of McHenry, 726 F.3d 975, 978, 979 (7th Cir. 2013) ("Had the contract between the federal government and McHenry County to house aliens suspected of being forbidden to enter or remain in the United States made the county jail a federal instrumentality and its personnel (maybe including Centegra's employees, though they were not employees of the jail) federal officers, the jail staff would be suable for federal constitutional violations under the doctrine of Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388, 91 S.Ct. 1999, 29 L.Ed.2d 619 (1971), rather than under section 1983. But the contract did not federalize McHenry County Jail, which continued to house nonfederal as well as federal prisoners.

Cases similar to this, allowing section 1983 claims by federal prisoners against county or city employees, are legion. [collecting cases] Although Centegra's employees are not public employees, they rightly do not deny that in performing functions that would otherwise be performed by public employees, they were acting under color of state law and therefore could be sued under section 1983. . . Otherwise state and local government could immunize itself from liability under section 1983 by replacing its employees with independent contractors.")

Rice ex rel. Rice v. Correctional Medical Services, 675 F.3d 650, 671-73 (7th Cir. 2012) ("We have our doubts as to whether the district court was correct in categorizing Ceniceros as a private rather than a state actor. Rice was treated by Ceniceros in fulfillment of the jail's obligation to provide medical care, including necessary psychiatric care, to Rice as an inmate of the jail. The orders committing Rice to a private facility simply reflect a judicial determination, solicited by Rohrer as the jail's mental health care provider, that Rice required more intensive psychiatric treatment than could be provided to him at the jail, and treatment that had to be provided without his consent. And the record suggests that it was not happenstance or judicial fiat that resulted in Oaklawn's selection as the facility to which Rice would be committed on the first two occasions in October 2003 and May 2004 (and as one of the four facilities to which he could have been committed in October 2004). Rather, the facts support the inference that Rice was committed to Oaklawn because of Oaklawn's voluntary, contractual undertaking to provide psychiatric services to the jail's inmates. . .The commitment orders did not alter Rice's status as a pretrial detainee. Because he was incarcerated, the jail had an obligation to address Rice's serious medical needs. . .That obligation included a duty to provide psychiatric care to Rice as needed. . . If Rice had been committed to the state's own facility for treatment by state-employed physicians, there would be no question that those physicians would qualify as state actors who could be liable for any deliberate indifference to his psychiatric needs . . . This would be true whether Rice were committed to a psychiatric unit within the jail . . . or instead transferred to a state-owned facility outside of the jail . . . . That Rice was instead committed to the care of a private psychiatrist—or, in the third instance, was refused care by that psychiatrist—whose employer had contracted to provide psychiatric care to the jail's inmates, arguably does not alter the analysis materially. The Supreme Court has not yet addressed whether medical care provided to a prisoner in a private facility outside of the prison walls constitutes state action. However, in West, the Court held that medical care provided on the grounds of the prison by a private physician under contract with the state does constitute state action. . . . Although the court cited the location of the treatment as one factor supporting its conclusion, . . . nothing in its analysis suggests that the result necessarily would have been different had the care been provided at a private facility. . . . Instead, central to the court's analysis was that the care was provided under contract with the prison in fulfillment of the prison's obligation to provide for the inmate's medical needs. That is arguably just as true here as it was in West. One might infer that on each of the three occasions when the court ordered Rice's involuntary commitment, Ceniceros and Oaklawn became involved not because the court chose Oaklawn for its own reasons, or because Oaklawn was otherwise obliged to provide psychiatric care to all who sought it, as an emergency room might be, . . .but rather because Oaklawn had voluntarily agreed to provide inpatient psychiatric care to the jail's inmates when needed. . . . .Had it been possible for Rice to receive inpatient care from Ceniceros on the premises of the jail, there would be no question that Ceniceros would qualify as a state actor under both West and Rodriguez. And the district court's focus on the court-ordered nature of Rice's commitments implicitly presumes that had Rice been accepted for admission at Oaklawn in the absence of such an order, the same might be true. . . The court viewed the judicial commitment orders as superseding Oaklawn's voluntary assumption of the jail's duty to provide psychiatric care to its inmates. But the record suggests that the orders had much more to do with overruling Rice's will than with Oaklawn's willingness to treat Rice on its premises. . . . On these facts, a factfinder might conclude that Oaklawn and Ceniceros were not dragooned into treating Rice as a result of the court's commitment orders, but rather had voluntarily assumed that role by virtue of Oaklawn's contract with the jail. . . We need not ultimately resolve Ceniceros' status, however, because as we discuss later in this opinion, we conclude that the facts do not support a finding of deliberate indifference on Ceniceros' part. We have voiced our doubts about the district court's conclusion that Ceniceros was not a state actor because that is the sole basis on which the district court resolved the Estate's claim against Ceniceros and because, given the widespread practice of outsourcing jail and prison medical services to private contractors, it is certain that this issue will recur. We do not consider what we have said here to be binding, but we do wish any future court's exploration of this issue to take into consideration the circumstances we have highlighted as relevant to the state-actor determination.")

Javier v. City of Milwaukee, 670 F.3d 823, 831, 832 (7th Cir. 2012) ("[T]he key question in the Javiers' statutory claim against the City was whether Glover was acting as a vigilante for his own purposes or as a police officer when he shot Prado. . . Glover's inquest testimony suggested that he pursued and shot Prado pursuant to his off-duty responsibilities under the 'always on duty' rule because Prado had tried to run him over and appeared to point a gun at him. The City challenged Glover's version of events, noting its inconsistency with other evidence and arguing that the shooting was part and parcel of a purely personal dispute. But because the jury had to decide whether Glover used excessive force under color of law and whether his actions were within the scope of his employment, there was a great risk that jurors would conflate the two. . . . The City conveyed the incorrect impression that because Glover had been criminally charged, he could not have been acting within the scope of his employment. The two are not mutually exclusive. Without an instruction telling the jury that the law is precisely the opposite—that Glover's conduct could be criminal, excessive, and outside his authority and still be within the scope of his employment—the jury was missing a critical 'relevant legal principle[ ]' and was likely 'confuse[d] or mis[led].' . . The jury needed to hear from the court that the scope-of-employment concept recognizes that an officer can exceed or abuse his authority—even intentionally or criminally—and still be acting within the scope of his employment. The judge should not have refused the Javiers' proposed limiting instruction or their modified scope-of-employment instruction.")

Wilson v. Price, 624 F.3d 389, 392-95 (7th Cir. 2010) (City alderman's actions in savagely beating employee of automobile repair shop until he was unconscious and suffered broken jaw, after employee refused to move illegally parked cars for which alderman had received complaints from his constituents and refused to find owner of shop upon alderman's request, were not made "under color of state law," within meaning of § 1983 , providing civil action against state official or employee for deprivation of federally guaranteed right, even assuming that alderman was at shop conducting legislative investigation in accordance with Illinois law, since alderman crossed line from legislative role that was within scope of his aldermanic duties and entered realm of law enforcement that was wholly unrelated to his legislative duties upon demanding that employee move cars.)

Lewis v. Downey, 581 F.3d 467, 471 n.3 (7th Cir. 2009) ("An interesting question not presented by either party is the applicability of § 1983 to employees of a local correctional facility that is housing federal inmates under contract between the federal and local governments. See 18 U.S.C. § 4002. A county employee caring for federal prisoners arguably becomes a federal actor, rather than the requisite state actor, rendering § 1983 inapplicable. . .Because it is not currently before us, we reserve our answer to the question for another day. We doubt, however, that the contractual relationship does anything to change the status of county jail employees as state actors. Cf. Logue v. United States, 412 U.S. 521, 528-32 (1973) (declining, for purposes of federal government liability under the Federal Tort Claims Act, to characterize as federal employees county jailers who were caring for federal prisoners).").

Rodriguez v. Plymouth Ambulance Service, 577 F.3d 816, 826, 827, 830 (7th Cir. 2009) ("The situation before us today is not identical to the one before the Court in West. However, in applying West, our focus must be on the particular function of the medical care provider in the fulfillment of the state's obligation to provide health care to incarcerated persons. . . .When a party enters into a contractual relationship with the state penal institution to provide specific medical services to inmates, it is undertaking freely, and for consideration, responsibility for a specific portion of the state's overall obligation to provide medical care for incarcerated persons. In such a circumstance, the provider has assumed freely the same liability as the state. Similarly, when a person accepts employment with a private entity that contracts with the state, he understands that he is accepting the responsibility to perform his duties in conformity with the Constitution. . . . We cannot tell, on the face of the complaint alone, the relationship of Plymouth, and through it, the EMTs, to the prison system or to Mr. Rodriguez. West requires that this trilateral relationship be analyzed in order to determine whether their actions fairly can be attributed to the state.").

Johnson v. LaRabida Children's Hospital, 372 F.3d 894, 897 (7th Cir. 2004) (privately employed special police officer not entrusted with full powers possessed by the police does not act under color of state law).

Hampton v. Cagle, No. 4:20-CV-04210-SLD-JEH, 2024 WL 3967265, at *4 (C.D. Ill. Aug. 28, 2024) ("Municipalities may delegate policymaking authority for traditional public functions to a private entity, which may make the actions that entity takes fall within the scope of state action. . . For example, a court found that ISC [Inmate Services Corporation] acted under color of state law when it transported a prisoner because 'custody of the state prisoners is traditionally an exclusive state function' and 'ISC had authority to transport [the prisoner] only because the state delegated that function to ISC.'. . Here, Hampton established that ISC was performing a traditionally exclusive state function because it was in the business of transporting detainees across state lines and did so in Hampton's case via a delegation of state authority from Pulaski County. . . Therefore, ISC was acting under color of state law when it entrusted Hampton's transport to Nesby.")

Byrne v. City of Chicago, No. 19 C 1383, 2019 WL 6609297, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 5, 2019) ("As noted, the complaint alleges in the alternative that Schuler, while in his apartment, either encouraged his girlfriend Byrne to shoot herself with his gun or himself shot her. Because neither action related in any way to the performance of a police duty, Schuler is not alleged to have acted under color of state law. . . .Even if Schuler was technically on duty that evening, even if Byrne was shot with Schuler's CPD-issued service weapon, and even if Byrne knew that Schuler was a CPD officer, governing precedent holds that the dispositive question is whether Schuler's conduct 'related in some way to the performance of the duties of [his] office.'. . Neither of Schuler's alleged actions—encouraging Byrne after a night of drinking to shoot herself in the face, or shooting Byrne himself—bore any relationship to the performance of his police duties. Schuler accordingly was not acting under color of state law.")

Pindak v. Dart, 125 F.Supp.3d 720, (N.D. Ill. 2015) ("In sum, despite the various factual disputes–regarding the meaning of the Post Orders, the appearance of the guards' uniforms, and the relationship between the guards and the deputies–the fact that the Plaza is a public forum by itself requires the conclusion that the guards act under color of state law when deciding whether or not to remove panhandlers from the Plaza.")

Pindak v. Cook County, No. 10 C 6237, 2013 WL 1222038, *5 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 25, 2013) ("The court agrees with Plaintiff that the alleged regulation of his speech in a public forum is a public function. Plaintiff has adequately asserted that Securitas officers were regulating his speech when they interfered with his peaceful panhandling because there was no apparent security threat from his conduct. Nothing in the record suggests that Plaintiff's presence or actions posed a threat to other citizens on Daley Plaza. When Securitas personnel allegedly banned Plaintiff while he was making only non-threatening overtures, they took on the mantle of state actors regulating speech in a public forum. Plaintiff has adequately alleged to survive a motion to dismiss that Securitas is liable pursuant to § 1983 because its officers were performing a public function.")

Green v. Wexford Health Sources, No. 12 C 50130, 2013 WL 139883, *5, *6 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 10, 2013) ("The Supreme Court has long recognized that private physicians and nurses who contract with the State to provide medical care to prisoners act 'under color of law' for purposes of § 1983. See, e.g., West v. Atkins, 487 U.S. 42 (1988); Rice ex rel. Rice v. Correctional Medical Services, 675 F.3d 650, 671 (7th Cir.2012). The defendants' attempt to distinguish this case from West based on different contractual terms regarding liability and indemnification is unavailing: '[i]t is the physician's function within the state system, not the precise terms of his employment, that determines whether his actions can fairly be attributed to the State.' West, at 55–56. The Supreme Court did not, in Minneci, explicitly overturn a long line of established law on who may be a § 1983 defendant. See Winchester v. Marketti, No. 11 C 9224, 2012 WL 2076375, *2–3 (N.D.Ill. Jul. 8, 2012) (Zagel, J.). Minneci does not bar the plaintiff's civil rights claims.")

Boyle v. Torres, 756 F.Supp.2d 983, 994, 995 (N.D. Ill. 2010) ("The UCPD Officers' argument is bottomed on the assumption that private police or security forces do not exercise full police powers, and thus are not state actors, if they do not perform every function performed by municipal police officers. It is difficult to see how this assumption can be correct. . . . In any event, there can be no question that the UCPD's role is one that has traditionally been the exclusive prerogative of the state: they carry guns, they wear police uniforms, and they patrol their territory in squad cars; they have the ongoing authority to detain citizens and place them in handcuffs; they have the authority to demand that individuals furnish them with ID. When the ensemble of the officers' powers and functions is kept in view, there can be no doubt that they are state actors.")

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Brown v. Linder, 56 F.4th 1140, 1145 (8th Cir. 2023) ("[A]ccepting as true all of Brown's well-pleaded factual allegations and drawing all reasonable inferences in his favor, we conclude that his complaint does not adequately allege that Linder acted under color of state law when he rebuked Brown's expert testimony. The bare assertion that Linder identified himself as a UI law professor and acted within the scope of that employment when he criticized Brown is not enough to allege plausibly that Linder's conduct was state action. . . Nothing in Brown's complaint indicates that Linder's criticisms involved an exercise of 'power possessed by virtue of state law' or were 'made possible only because [Linder] [wa]s clothed with the authority of state law.'. . And absent from the complaint is any detail about what Linder's official duties as a state employee include or how his conduct was facilitated by state resources. . . Without facts like these, Brown fails to allege that Linder's condemnation was anything other than 'purely private.'. . Brown's allegations are therefore exactly the sort of 'labels and conclusions' that cannot survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. . . At the end of the day, we do not doubt that the public might regard a law professor's views on expert testimony as particularly authoritative. Indeed, it is certainly possible that Linder's occupation brought attention to, or elevated the credibility of, his criticism of Brown. Nonetheless, that Linder happens to work for a public university rather than a private one does not, by itself, mean that his conduct was under color of state law.")

Roberson v. Dakota Boys & Girls Ranch, 42 F.4th 924, 932-35 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Where North Dakota 'outsourced one of its constitutional obligations'—the duty to provide adequate medical care—to the Ranch, that 'private entity may ... be deemed a state actor.'. . North Dakota had a constitutional obligation under the Due Process Clause, which the Ranch assumed. Thus, this Court need not assess whether the State had a similar obligation under the Eighth Amendment. However, the parties focused much of their analysis on West and subsequent Eighth Amendment cases. That precedent reinforces that the Ranch was a state actor here. The Fourteenth Amendment precedent for a state's duty to provide medical care to persons in state custody draws upon, and is intertwined with, the Eighth Amendment precedent for a state's duty to provide medical care to prisoners. . . Given the similarities between states' obligations to people in their custody under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, Eighth Amendment state-action precedent is persuasive here. . . Providing medical care to a state detainee is a performance of a traditional, exclusive public function. . . Under West, a private medical facility conducts this public function even if it also treats non-state detainees or lacks a financial contract with the state. 'It is the physician's function within the state system, not the precise terms of his employment, that determines whether his actions can fairly be attributed to the State.'. . . The critical facts are that the Ranch cooperated with North Dakota, that A.A.R. could receive treatment only from it, and that it functioned as A.A.R.'s medical provider 'within the state system[.]' These facts make it a state actor. . . By assuming North Dakota's constitutional obligation to provide A.A.R.'s medical treatment, the Ranch became a state actor. The Robersons state a plausible claim against it under § 1983.") Yassin v. Weyker, 39 F.4th 1086, 1089-91 (8th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 779 (2023) ("Mixing the color-of-law inquiry with the summary-judgment standard introduces a complication. Genuine issues of material fact are for juries to resolve. . . The answer is different for legal questions, which are typically decided by courts, even at summary judgment. . . So which one is the under-color-of-law determination? It turns out that the Supreme Court has already answered this question. In Cuyler v. Sullivan, for example, it made clear that the under-color-of-law determination is a 'question of law.'. . To the extent there is any room left for debate, the predominant view is that it is legal. . . We recognize, of course, that the under-color-of-law determination can turn out to be quite 'fact[ ]bound.'. . But as long as the underlying material facts are undisputed, courts can decide the question, even when those undisputed facts point in different directions. . .To be sure, juries still have a role to play when material facts are in dispute. Suppose in this case, for example, that the parties disputed whether Weyker had been cross-deputized as a federal agent. . . In those circumstances, a jury may well need to resolve the factual dispute first, before the district court can decide the color-of-law question. . . Color of law is rooted in authority. . . . The question is whether the conduct is 'fairly attributable to the State.'. . To determine if it is, the focus is on the 'nature and circumstances of the officer's conduct and the relationship of that conduct to the performance of ... official duties.'. . State law had nothing to do with 'the nature and circumstances' of Weyker's conduct. . . At the time, she was in Nashville working on a federal task force as a Special Deputy United States Marshal. She introduced the other task-force members in the room during the call, including the lead federal prosecutor and a federal agent. And the witness she was trying to protect, Muna Abdulkadir, was only on her radar because she was assigned to a federal investigation. Weyker also did not stray from the 'performance of [her] official duties' when she spoke to Officer Beeks and his supervising officer. . . As someone who was tasked with 'investigative work on the [sex-trafficking] task force,' she acted within the scope of those duties by trying to keep a federal witness out of trouble. . . The same goes for her statements in the affidavit she prepared the next day. . . .Weyker's work on the federal sex-trafficking investigation led to Yassin's arrest, she acted within the scope of her federal duties while dealing with the situation, and she referenced her federal-task-force role during her conversations with Officer Beeks and his supervisor. . . What matters, in other words, is that she

'act[ed] or purport[ed] to act in the performance of [her federal] duties, even if [s]he overstep[ped] [her] authority and misuse[d] power.'. .Our rule today is straightforward. Without any 'actual or purported relationship between [Weyker's] conduct and [her] duties as a [St. Paul] police officer,' no section 1983 action is available.")

Doe v. North Homes, Inc., 11 F.4th 633, 637-39 (8th Cir. 2021) ("The power to decide to incarcerate a person rests with the state. . . And so, only the state can decide to delegate that power. . . Even so, we can see how that conclusion may seem at odds with Richardson v. McKnight's statement: 'correctional functions have never been exclusively public.' . . But Richardson expressly limited its scope to § 1983 immunity, not § 1983 liability. . . . And, in upholding a qualified-immunity denial, Richardson expressly left the state-actor question for the district court to decide. . . While one circuit saw Richardson as dispositive on the public-function question, others did not. [citing cases] Against that legal landscape and through the Iqbal standard, we sift the facts alleged here. Doe alleged that North Homes cared for juveniles whose liberties the state (counties) decided to restrict. She also alleged that the state (agencies) agreed to empower North Homes to run two units, through which North Homes could deprive residents of their liberties. And she alleged that the state (legislature, agencies, and courts) gave North Homes the power to detain residents in a correctional facility whenever it wanted and for whatever reason it saw fit. While conceding Doe's inability to leave the DOC unit, North Homes could not tell us why she could not leave (i.e., whose authority kept her there). True, involuntary commitment may not amount to a public function . . . but Doe's complaint did not rest on the involuntary character of her commitment. . . Instead, she alleged that North Homes moved her to, and detained her in, a corrections unit, where the alleged abuse occurred. . . She also alleged that North Homes later detained her in the corrections unit to punish and silence her efforts to report abuse. Construing the complaint in her favor, we conclude that Doe plausibly alleged that North Homes's exercise of a public function (the state's authority to detain her) caused her involuntary detainment in a corrections unit. As a result, we disagree with the decision to dismiss Doe's § 1983 claims at the pleading stage.")

Doe v. North Homes, Inc., 11 F.4th 633, 639-41 (8th Cir. 2021) (Gruender, J., dissenting) ("To state a claim under § 1983, a plaintiff must allege facts sufficient to show that the defendant acted under color of state law and that the defendant's conduct violated a federally protected right. . . Only the first element is at issue here. Although '§ 1983 excludes from its reach merely private conduct,'. . . 'a private entity can qualify as a state actor,' triggering § 1983 liability, 'in a few limited circumstances[.] . . One such circumstance is 'when the private entity performs a traditional, exclusive public function.'. . The private party must be performing a function that was 'traditionally the exclusive prerogative of the State.'. . The court concludes that Doe alleged facts sufficient to show that North Homes qualifies as a state actor under the public-function test. I disagree. Although the court alludes to several functions, it never identifies one that is both 'the exclusive prerogative of the State,'. . . and a function that Doe alleged North Homes was performing when she suffered the abuse. . . . [I]nvoluntary detention is not a function that Doe alleged North Homes was performing when she suffered the abuse. On the contrary, the complaint indicated that Doe's foster mother and Kanabec County enrolled Doe in North Homes. . . And in any event, involuntary detention is not an exclusive public function. . . . So, what does the court think transformed North Homes into a stator actor for § 1983 purposes? The court stresses Doe's allegation that the abuse occurred after she was transferred to a unit in the corrections facility due to behavioral issues. . . But the location where North Homes housed Doe does not change the fact that North Homes was neither incarcerating her as punishment for a crime nor detaining her 'involuntarily' in the relevant sense. . . If involuntary criminal confinement is likely not an exclusive public function . . . and involuntary civil confinement is definitely not an exclusive public function, . . . then it is difficult to see why voluntary civil confinement should nonetheless qualify as an exclusive public function simply because it occurs in a unit licensed by the state department of corrections. Thus, I agree with the district court that Doe did not allege facts sufficient to show that North Homes qualified as a state actor under the public-function test. I also agree with the district court that Doe did not allege facts sufficient to show that North Homes qualified as a state actor under the joint-action test. . . . To survive a motion to dismiss, a plaintiff 'must allege, at the very least, that there was a mutual understanding, or a meeting of the minds, between the private party and the state actor.'. . Further, the plaintiff must allege a 'close nexus not merely between the state and the private party, but between the state and the alleged deprivation itself.'. . After carefully reviewing Doe's complaint, the district court concluded that it fell short of this demanding standard. After doing the same, I agree. For the foregoing reasons, I would affirm the district court's dismissal of Doe's complaint. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.")

Campbell v. Reisch, 986 F.3d 822, 827-28 (8th Cir. 2021) ("In short, we think Reisch's Twitter account is more akin to a campaign newsletter than to anything else, and so it's Reisch's prerogative to select her audience and present her page as she sees fit. She did not intend her Twitter page 'to be like a public park, where anyone is welcome to enter and say whatever they want.'. . Reisch's own First Amendment right to craft her campaign materials necessarily trumps Campbell's desire to convey a message on her Twitter page that she does not wish to convey. . . even if that message does not compete for room as it would, say, in a campaign newsletter. While Reisch's posts open up an interactive space where Twitter users may speak, that doesn't mean that Reisch cannot control who gets to speak or what gets posted. It's her page to manage as she likes. Though Campbell and others may not like how Reisch runs her page, 'the place to register that disagreement is at the polls,'. . . or, at least, on Campbell's own page. We therefore reverse and remand for the district court to enter judgment in Reisch's favor.")

Campbell v. Reisch, 986 F.3d 822, 828-31 (8th Cir. 2021) (Kelly, J., dissenting) ("Missouri State Representative Cheri Toalson Reisch appeals the district court's adverse judgment that she violated Mike Campbell's First Amendment rights by blocking him from her Twitter account. Because I believe Reisch was acting under color of state law when she blocked Campbell, I respectfully dissent. . . Under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, 'a public employee acts under color of state law while acting in [her] official capacity or while exercising [her] responsibilities pursuant to state law.'. . Here, the court's determination that Reisch was not acting under color of state law rests on its finding that Reisch used her Twitter account mainly to 'position herself for more electoral success down the road.' In my view, this finding is neither supported by the record nor dispositive of the state-action inquiry. . . .On this record, and given the focus of the 'under color of state law' inquiry on the 'actual or purport[ed]' relationship between Reisch's conduct and her official duties, . . . I cannot conclude that Reisch used her Twitter account primarily for campaign purposes, let alone that she made such a showing by a preponderance of the evidence. Instead, evidence that Reisch blocked Campbell 'to suppress speech critical of [her] conduct of official duties or fitness for public office,'. . . strengthens the inference that her conduct was attributable to the state. . . . Just as public officials 'may not preclude persons from participating' in the public-comment portion of a town hall meeting 'based on their viewpoints,'. . . Reisch cannot block users from her Twitter account because she dislikes their opinions. But this is precisely what Reisch did. The weight of the evidence, including Reisch's own testimony at trial and during her deposition, shows that Reisch blocked Campbell (and others) because she thought he shared the view of Missouri State Representatives Bruce Franks and Kip Kendrick that she engaged in 'unacceptable' behavior as a public official. Because Reisch, acting under color of state law, was 'impermissibly motivated by a desire to suppress a particular point of view' when she blocked Campbell, . . . I believe she discriminated against Campbell based on his viewpoint, thereby violating the First Amendment. For these reasons, I would affirm the district court's judgment.")

Johnson v. Phillips, 664 F.3d 232, 239, 240 (8th Cir. 2011) ("Phillips contends that he did not commit a constitutional violation because he was not acting under color of law at the time of the alleged sexual assault. In his view, once he removed Johnson's handcuffs, everything that followed–the conversation about homeless shelters, the drive to a second location, and the assault itself–occurred while he was acting in his capacity as a civilian, not as a city official. . . . Here, Phillips first effected a traffic stop, arrested Johnson on an outstanding warrant, and searched her car. Then, while wearing a police uniform and operating a police car, he released Johnson from the patrol car and directed her to follow him in her car. A reasonable factfinder believing these facts could conclude that Phillips was purporting to act as a police officer performing official duties when he led Johnson to the empty parking lot and committed the sexual assault. The district court thus properly rejected Phillips's motion to dismiss this claim.")

Americans United for Separation of Church and State v. Prison Fellowship Ministries, Inc., 509 F.3d 406, 423 (8th Cir. 2007) (In this case, the state effectively gave InnerChange its 24- hour power to incarcerate, treat, and discipline inmates. InnerChange teachers and counselors are authorized to issue inmate disciplinary reports, and progressive discipline is effectuated in concert with the DOC. Prison Fellowship and InnerChange acted jointly with the DOC and can be classified as state actors under § 1983 .").

Wickersham v. City of Columbia, 481 F.3d 591, 598, 599 (8th Cir. 2007) (To be sure, the mere invocation of state legal procedures, including police assistance, does not convert a private party into a state actor. . . . The contributions of the Columbia police go beyond the kind of neutral assistance that would normally be offered to private citizens in enforcing the law of trespass. . . .

When a private entity has acted jointly and intentionally with the police pursuant to a 'customary plan,' it is proper to hold that entity accountable for the actions which it helped bring about. . . . Since Salute and the city were knowingly and pervasively entangled in the enforcement of the challenged speech restrictions, we conclude that Salute was a state actor when it interfered with appellees' expressive activities. The district court did therefore not err in holding that Salute's curtailment of appellees' freedom of expression constituted state action and was actionable under § 1983.").

Moore v. Carpenter, 404 F.3d 1043, 1046 (8th Cir. 2005) (When a police officer is involved in a private party's repossession of property, there is no state action if the officer merely keeps the peace, but there is state action if the officer affirmatively intervenes to aid the repossessor enough that the repossession would not have occurred without the officer's help. . . .").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Thai v. County of Los Angeles, 127 F.4th 1254, 1256, 1259-60, 1262 (9th Cir. 2025) ("We consider whether two law enforcement officers from the Los Angeles District Attorney's Office, who were assigned full time to a joint federal-state task force investigating allegations of fraud in Social Security disability benefits applications, were acting under color of state law for purposes of 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Because the federal government was the source of authority under which the task force was implemented and because the officers' day-to-day work was supervised by a federal officer, we conclude the officers were acting under color of federal, rather than state, law. . . .In sum, the CDI [Cooperative Disability Investigation] Unit in Los Angeles was created by the OIG, the SSA Regional Office, and the California DDS and led by a federal special agent. In addition to federal personnel, it included state personnel from the DDS and state or local law enforcement officers, including Sanchez and Villasenor. . . .We agree with our sister circuits. To determine whether state officials assigned to a joint federal-state program operate under color of state law, we consider the totality of the circumstances. In general, where the source of authority for the program is federal in nature and the state officials' participation in the challenged conduct is subject to the immediate control of a federal supervisor, those officials act under color of federal law, not under color of state law. . . .Plaintiffs provide no evidence that 'the authority of the state was exerted in enforcing the law' such that the officers' conduct is fairly attributable to the state. . . Rather, Sanchez and Villasenor engaged in the conduct that allegedly deprived Thai and Doan of their rights while operating within a federal program, under the daily supervision and immediate control of a federal officer, and therefore acted under color of federal law. Roberts' federal supervising authority distinguishes Sanchez and Villasenor from officers of other joint federal-state agencies supervised by state employees and ultimately held to act under color of state law.")

O'Handley v. Weber, 62 F.4th 1145, 1160 (9th Cir. 2023) ("In sum, we conclude that Twitter's content-moderation decisions did not constitute state action because (1) Twitter did not exercise a state-conferred right or enforce a state-imposed rule under the first step of the Lugar framework, and (2) the interactions between Twitter and the OEC do not satisfy either the nexus or the joint action tests under the second step. Our resolution of this issue is determinative with respect to O'Handley's claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 because each of those claims requires proof of state action.")

Pasadena Republican Club v. Western Justice Center, 985 F.3d 1161, 1171-72 (9th Cir. 2021) ("In all, WJC and its agents were not state actors for purposes of the Club's § 1983 claims. The Club fails to allege that the City has 'undertaken a complex and deeply intertwined process' with WJC to discriminate against the Club by canceling its speaking event. . . The Club also fails to allege that the City 'has so deeply insinuated itself into this process that [WJC's] conduct constituted state action.'. . . When the City executed the Lease, it was not delegating final policy-making authority on political speaking events in the City; it was simply conveying a property interest—the right of occupancy—in the premises. WJC maintained the authority to decide who, when, for what reason, and for how long a visitor could occupy the premises during nonbusiness hours. Therefore, when WJC executed—and rescinded—the rental agreement with the Club, WJC was exercising its discretionary authority on its own behalf as the holder of a possessory interest in the Property. WJC was not exercising any 'policymaking authority for a particular city function' on behalf of the City. . . And, of course, there is no claim that renting out event space during nonbusiness hours is a 'traditional, exclusive public function.' The government does not, without more, become vicariously liable for the discretionary decisions of its lessee. Accordingly, the undisputed facts show that the City did not delegate any final policy-making authority that caused the Club's alleged constitutional injury.")

Rawson v. Recovery Innovations, Inc., 975 F.3d 742, 747, 752-54, 757 (9th Cir. 2020) ("The specific alleged conduct Rawson challenges includes involuntarily committing him without legal justification, knowingly providing false information to the court, and forcibly injecting him with antipsychotic medications without his consent. . . The relevant inquiry is therefore whether Defendants' role as custodians, as litigants, or as medical professionals constituted state action. . . . As in West, any deprivation effected by Defendants here was in some sense caused by the State's exercise of its right, pursuant to both its police powers and parens patriae powers, to deprive Rawson of his liberty for an extended period of involuntary civil commitment. . . . In that sense, Defendants were 'clothed with the authority of state law' when they detained and forcibly treated Rawson beyond the initial 72-hour emergency evaluation period. . . Thus, under West, if Defendants 'misused [their] power by demonstrating deliberate indifference to' Rawson's rights to liberty, refusal of treatment, and/or due process, 'the resultant deprivation was caused, in the sense relevant for state-action inquiry, by the State's exercise of its right to' civilly commit Rawson for purposes of protecting both the public and Rawson himself. . . These facts, in light of West, weigh in favor of finding that Defendants acted under color of state law. . . . The Court reasoned in West that the State has an Eighth Amendment obligation 'to provide adequate medical care to those whom it has incarcerated,' and that the State employs private contract physicians, and relies on their professional judgment, to fulfill this obligation. . . Similarly here, the State has a Fourteenth Amendment obligation toward those whom it has ordered involuntarily committed. . . In the now-vacated Pollard opinion, where we held that employees of a privately-operated prison acted under color of state law, we rejected the notion that 'by adding an additional layer, the government can contract away its constitutional duties' by having private actors rather than state actors perform some of the work. . . Accordingly, the State's particular Fourteenth Amendment duties toward persons involuntarily committed weighs toward a finding of state action in this case. . . . Defendants also argue that the prosecutor's role here is analogous to the public defender in Polk County v. Dodson, . . . and therefore that the prosecutor is not a state actor when prosecuting commitment petitions. We disagree. The prosecutor here is not advocating for the private interests of the hospital or mental health professionals. Neither the prosecutor's nor Defendants' 'professional and ethical obligation[s] ... set [them] in conflict with the State.'. . Instead, Defendants cooperate with the executive arm of the State to further the State's interest in protecting both the public and the patient. . . Accordingly, the role played by the county prosecutor here, in practice and by statute, supports a finding of state action by the Defendants. . . .Although Defendants were nominally private actors, exercised professional medical judgment, and were not statutorily required to petition for additional commitment, . . .on balance, the facts weigh toward a conclusion that they were nevertheless state actors. As in Jensen, the State here has 'undertaken a complex and deeply intertwined process [with private actors] of evaluating and detaining individuals' for long-term commitments, and therefore, 'the state has so deeply insinuated itself into this process' that '[the private actors'] conduct constituted state action.'. . Just as West found state action with private contract physicians rendering treatment services for prisoners at a state prison, we hold the same under the arrangement the State has devised for involving private actors in long-term involuntary commitments. Defendants were not merely subject to extensive regulation or subsidized by state funds. . . Given the necessity of state imprimatur to continue detention, the affirmative statutory command to render involuntary treatment, the reliance on the State's police and parens patriae powers, the applicable constitutional duties, the extensive involvement of the county prosecutor, and the leasing of their premises from the state hospital, we conclude that 'a sufficiently close nexus between the state and the private actor' existed here 'so that the action of the latter may be fairly treated as that of the State itself.'. . We therefore conclude that Defendants were acting under color of state law with respect to the actions for which Rawson attempts to hold them liable. We reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to the contrary and remand for further proceedings.")

Hyun Ju Park v. City and County of Honolulu, 952 F.3d 1136, 1140 (9th Cir. 2020) ("Our circuit has developed a three-part test for determining when a police officer, although not on duty, has acted under color of state law. The officer must have: (1) acted or pretended to act in the performance of his official duties; (2) invoked his status as a law enforcement officer with the purpose and effect of influencing the behavior of others; and (3) engaged in conduct that 'related in some meaningful way either to the officer's governmental status or to the performance of his duties.'. . . Park's claims against Naki and Omoso fail at the first step. The complaint does not plausibly allege that either officer was exercising, or purporting to exercise, his official responsibilities during the events that led to her injuries. Both officers were off-duty and dressed in plain clothes, drinking and socializing at the bar in their capacity as private citizens. They never identified themselves as officers, displayed their badges, or 'specifically associated' their actions with their law enforcement duties. . . Thus, even accepting Park's allegations as true, there is no sense in which Naki and Omoso performed or purported to perform their official duties on the night in question.")

Pistor v. Garcia, 791 F.3d 1104, 1114-15 (9th Cir. 2015) ("[W]hether the defendants were acting under color of state or tribal law when they seized the gamblers is a necessary inquiry for the purposes of establishing the essential elements of the gamblers' § 1983 claim . . . . As we have long recognized, 'actions under section 1983 cannot be maintained in federal court for persons alleging a deprivation of constitutional rights under color of tribal law.'. . The tribal defendants can thus be held liable under § 1983 only if they were acting under color of state, not tribal, law at the time they seized the gamblers.")

Naffe v. Frey, 789 F.3d 1030, 1036-39 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Although we have never decided if and when a state employee who moonlights as a blogger acts under color of state law, we have considered more generally when the actions of off-duty state employees give rise to § 1983 liability. . . .Stanewich, McDade, and Anderson establish our framework for determining whether Naffe pleaded facts sufficient to support her allegation that Frey acted under color of state law. Under those cases, a state employee who is on duty, or otherwise exercises his official responsibilities in an off-duty encounter, typically acts under color of state law. . . That is true even if the employee's offensive actions were illegal or unauthorized. . . A state employee who is off duty nevertheless acts under color of state law when (1) the employee 'purport[s] to or pretend[s] to act under color of law,' Stanewich, 92 F.3d at 838; McDade, 223 F.3d at 1141, (2) his 'pretense of acting in the performance of his duties ... had the purpose and effect of influencing the behavior of others,' Anderson, 451 F.3d at 1069, and (3) the harm inflicted on plaintiff ' "related in some meaningful way either to the officer's governmental status or to the performance of his duties[]"'. . . . On the other hand, a government employee does not act under color of state law when he pursues private goals via private actions. . .Naffe's § 1983 claim fails under this framework for several reasons. First, Naffe's factual allegations do not give rise to the reasonable inference that Frey harmed Naffe while on duty or when 'exercising his responsibilities pursuant to state law.'. . Frey is a county prosecutor whose official responsibilities do not include publicly commenting about conservative politics and current events. . .Second, Frey's comments about Naffe are not sufficiently related to his work as a county prosecutor to constitute state action. . . .Third, the facts Naffe pleads do not support her claim that Frey 'purported or pretended to act under color of [state] law' when he blogged about her. . . To the contrary, Frey frequently reminded his readers and followers that, although he worked for Los Angeles County, he blogged and Tweeted only in his personal capacity. . . . And although Frey drew on his experiences as a Deputy District Attorney to inform his blog posts and Tweets, that alone does not transform his private speech into public action. . . . In sum, Naffe seeks to support her allegation of state action by claiming repeatedly that Frey acted '[i]n his capacity as a Deputy District Attorney' when he criticized her online. But she does not allege facts that support this claim. And, as the district court correctly held, a bare claim of state action does not withstand a Rule 12(b)(6) motion.")

George v. Edholm, 752 F.3d 1206, 1216 (9th Cir. 2014) ("To hold Dr. Edholm personally liable as a state actor, George must establish not only that Edholm was induced to act as he did, but also that Edholm intended to assist Freeman and Johnson in obtaining evidence for their investigation. . . We hold only that Edholm's actions could be attributed to the state, based on our holding that a reasonable jury could conclude that Freeman and Johnson provided false information, encouragement, and active physical assistance to Edholm. We do not reach the different question whether a jury could conclude that Edholm is himself liable under § 1983.")

Tsao v. Desert Palace, Inc., 698 F.3d 1128, 1140 (9th Cir. 2012) ("Desert Palace's behavior qualifies as state action under the joint action test thanks to its system of cooperation and interdependence with the LVMPD. First, under the SILA program, some Desert Palace security personnel have the authority, normally reserved to the state, to issue a citation to appear in court for the crime of misdemeanor trespassing. To gain this authority, security guards must take a training course given by the LVMPD. This delegation of authority by the police department, Crumrine explained, helps 'alleviate some of the manpower concerns of the police' by relieving them from responding to every claim of trespassing that arises at a casino. Security guards with SILA authority may not arrest a suspect who has an outstanding arrest warrant, so they routinely call the LVMPD's records department to get information concerning warrants. The citations that security guards issue are no different from those issued by police officers, and failure to respond to them by appearing in court constitutes a separate offense. . . Desert Palace and the state are therefore joint participants in the SILA program, which produces benefits that accrue to both Desert Palace and the LVMPD.")

Florer v. Congregation Pidyon Shevuyim, 639 F.3d 916, 926 (9th Cir. 2011) ("While CPSNA had entered into a contract with DOC to provide religious instruction and guidance to inmates, the contract cannot reasonably be read to require Defendants to provide Florer with a Torah, calendar, or rabbi visit. Defendants are not state actors under the public-function analysis.")

Ibrahim v. Department of Homeland Sec., 538 F.3d 1250, 1257 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Ibrahim reads our decision in Cabrera as making an exception to this rule where, as here, federal officials recruit local police to help enforce federal law. But we created no such exception in Cabrera; instead, we reaffirmed the long-standing principle that federal officials can only be liable under section 1983 where there is a 'sufficiently close nexus between the State and the challenged action of the[federal actors] so that the action of the latter may be fairly treated as that of the State itself.' . . . California had nothing to do with the federal government's decision to put Ibrahim on the No-Fly List, nothing to do with the Transportation Security Administration's Security Directives that told United Air Lines what to do when confronted with a passenger on the No-Fly List, and nothing to do with Bondanella's decision to order the San Francisco police to detain Ibrahim.").

Maggio v. Shelton, No. 2:14-CV-01682-SI, 2015 WL 5126567, at *8 (D. Or. Sept. 1, 2015) ("Dr. Anderson. . . is not an emergency room doctor. Based on the facts alleged by Plaintiff, Dr. Anderson had more than an 'incidental and transitory relationship' with Plaintiff. Indeed, Dr.

Anderson agreed to provide medical care to Plaintiff, a state prisoner. As alleged by Plaintiff, Dr. Anderson treats many prisoners who are referred to him by ODOC. Plaintiff saw Dr. Anderson on four separate occasions: once for the initial referral, again for the surgery, again for the pin removal, and once again after Plaintiff complained about pain lasting for months after the procedure. The fact that Plaintiff was sent back to Dr. Anderson by TRCI staff on multiple occasions, even after Plaintiff complained about the medical treatment he received from Dr. Anderson, suggests that Dr. Anderson 'voluntarily'. . . accepted TRCI's delegation of its duty to provide Plaintiff's medical care. Considering the relationship between TRCI, ODOC, Plaintiff, and Dr. Anderson, the Court concludes that Plaintiff sufficiently alleges that Dr. Anderson effectively engaged in a public function by providing medical care to Plaintiff, a person involuntarily in the custody of the state.")

Guzman-Martinez v. Corrections Corp. of America, No. CV–11–02390–PHX–NVW, 2012 WL 5907081, at *10-*12 (D. Ariz. Nov. 26, 2012) ("It is undisputed that CCA operates the Center under a contract with the City, which transfers to CCA the City's obligations and benefits obtained through a contract with ICE. It also is undisputed that operating a prison traditionally is a governmental function and private operators of a state prison generally are considered as acting under color of state law. [collecting cases] However, it is disputed whether CCA and its employees 'exercised power possessed by virtue of state law and made possible only because the wrongdoer is clothed with the authority of state law.'. . Whether the CCA operates the immigration detention center under color of state law or under color of federal law is determinative because, 'by its very terms, § 1983 precludes liability in federal government actors.'. . The CCA Defendants contend they were not state actors because Plaintiff was in ICE custody at the time of the alleged incidents, detention of aliens is exclusively within federal authority, and CCA's authority derived from the federal government. Plaintiff contends that 'CCA Defendants are state actors by virtue of CCA's contractual relationship with [the City of] Eloy.' The specific conduct complained of is: (1) CCA's and DeRosa's failure to implement policies and practices to prevent assault, sexual assault, and abuse of transgender immigrant detainees by detainees and guards and failure to appropriately monitor and supervise detention conditions of transgender immigrant detainees and (2) Mohn's and Adams' failure to adequately evaluate the risk to Plaintiff as a transgender woman detainee and failure to properly classify and place Plaintiff in safe housing with adequate supervision. Even if the specific conduct complained of deprived Plaintiff of a constitutional right, Plaintiff was detained at the Center by ICE under federal law, not by the City under state law. Adopting policies and practices regarding ICE detention of immigrants is 'both traditionally and exclusively governmental,'. . . but it is traditionally the 'exclusive prerogative' of federal government, not state government. . . CCA's authority and obligation to adopt policies and practices regarding the classification, housing, monitoring, and supervision of transgender immigrant detainees, if any, is delegated by ICE through contracts with the City. Thus, the public function test is not met under the circumstances alleged here. . . . Under the joint action test, courts consider whether the state has knowingly accepted benefits derived from unconstitutional conduct, thereby becoming interdependent with the private entity and a joint participant in the challenged activity. . . Without more, governmental funding and extensive regulation do not establish governmental involvement in the actions of a private entity. . . To be liable under the joint action test, not only must the private party be a willful participant with the State or its agents in an activity that deprives a plaintiff of her constitutional rights, but also the private party's actions must be 'inextricably intertwined' with those of government. . . Here, the Amended Complaint does not allege that the state or the City have knowingly accepted benefits derived from unconstitutional conduct or that the City and CCA or its employees acted jointly in the challenged activity. Even if the contract between the City and CCA imposed extensive regulation and provided governmental funding, it would be insufficient to establish joint action. The contract merely acted as a conduit for transferring regulation and funding from ICE to CCA. . . . Under the compulsion test, courts consider whether the coercive influence of the state effectively converts a private action into a state action. . . The Amended Complaint does not allege that the state or the City coerced CCA or its employees to take any action. . . .Under the nexus test, courts consider whether there is such a close nexus between the state and the challenged action that the action may be fairly treated as that of the state itself. . . The Amended Complaint does not allege that the challenged action may be fairly treated as that of the state or the City itself. . . . The Amended Complaint does not allege facts sufficient to demonstrate that CCA, DeRosa, Mohn, or Adams deprived Plaintiff of a constitutional right while acting under color of state law. Therefore, Count I fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted against CCA, DeRosa, Mohn, or Adams.")

Beck v. City of Portland, Or., No. CV-10-434-HU, 2010 WL 4638892, at *6, *7 (D. Or. Nov. 5, 2010) ("These cases, Huffman, Van Ort, and Traver, collectively point to several types of factors relevant to the query of when an off-duty police officer purports or pretends to act pursuant to official authority. First are the indicia of authority such as wearing a uniform, displaying badge, brandishing a weapon, identifying oneself as an officer, issuing commands, or intervening in a dispute. Other considerations may include the officer's role at the time, such as the fact that Gibson was actually hired to perform security under a formal arrangement with the police department. Finally, as explained in Van Ort, while mere recognition as a police officer does not turn private acts into acts under color of state law, there are situations where an officer may exert such 'meaningful, physical control' over another 'on the basis of his status as a law enforcement officer' that the officer's actions may amount to official conduct under color of state law. Sheffer argues that walking down the sidewalk in her neighborhood, outside the jurisdiction where she is employed, off-duty, and out-of-uniform, and stepping into the street in front of a neighbor's car with no allegation that she flashed a badge or identified herself as a police officer in any way, and then motioning for her neighbor to stop, are not actions taken under color of state law. Furthermore, Sheffer argues that, under Van Ort, simply because plaintiff knew Sheffer to be a Portland police officer does not transform her actions into actions taken under color of state law. Plaintiff argues that Sheffer acted under pretense of state employment by asserting her state-authorized ability to stop moving vehicles as well as to run license plate searches. . . Plaintiff argues that it was precisely because Sheffer was 'cloaked' in the authority of the state that she had the audacity to walk into a public street and stand in front of a moving vehicle and direct plaintiff to pull over. Although the issue is close, I agree with defendant. As defendant notes, she was off-duty, out of uniform, and not in her jurisdiction. She did not flash a badge. She did not have a weapon. She did not issue an oral command to stop. She did not identify herself in any way as a police officer. Additionally, her actions were made in the context of what appears to have been a personal dispute between plaintiff and Sheffer. And while plaintiff may have known that Sheffer was a police officer, that alone does not cloak Sheffer's actions with official authority. If that were the test, a police officer's every action would be subject to a federal constitutional claim by any family member, neighbor, friend, etc. based only on the status of being in law enforcement. The caselaw does not support such a standard.")

Committee for Immigrant Rights of Sonoma County v. County of Sonoma, No. C 08-4220 RS, 2010 WL 2465030, at *4 (N.D. Cal. June 11, 2010) ("When a Santa Rosa sheriff's deputy stops, detains, arrests, or jails an individual he or she is cloaked with the authority of state law, regardless of whether an ICE agent requested the action. The officer's uniform, badge, gun, vehicle, are all provided by the state or county, not federal authorities. The power to engage in law enforcement activities comes from the state. Although the Santa Rosa sheriffs may have been working with ICE agents to enforce federal law, they necessarily acted under color of state law.")

Joseph v. Dillard's, Inc., No. CV-08-1478-PHX-NVW, 2009 WL 5185393, at *13 (D. Ariz. Dec. 24, 2009) ("While the Ninth Circuit appears not to have addressed this specific context, the Fifth Circuit has decided that a private employer of an off-duty police officer does not act under color of law unless the officer 'failed to perform an independent investigation, and that evidence of a proper investigation may include such indicators as an officer's interview of an employee, independent observation of a suspect, and the officer writing his own report.'. . Plaintiff utterly failed to address this argument in her response. However, the issue may be resolved on the facts and evidence already presented. Plaintiff's section 1983 claim is predicated on Villarreal's actions in taking her to the floor and arresting her for alleged assault. . . Therefore, the question is whether Villarreal, an undisputed state actor, performed an independent investigation before arresting Plaintiff for assault. The undisputed facts indicate that he did. No Dillard's employees directed or requested Villarreal to arrest Plaintiff for assault. In fact, at no point did any Dillard's employees direct or request Villarreal to investigate or arrest Plaintiff for any crime. The extent of Dillard's involvement in the incident was to inform Villarreal that it wanted Plaintiff to leave the store. Only when Plaintiff was moving toward the exit did Villarreal lunge at and arrest her for alleged assault. Villarreal independently observed Plaintiff's actions and the Phoenix Police Department prepared its own police report after the incident. Because the state conducted its own investigation, Dillard's was not acting under color of law during the incident.").

See also Pollard v. Geo Group, Inc., 629 F.3d 843, 854-58 (9th Cir. 2010), rev'd on other grounds sub nom, Minneci v. Pollard, 132 S. Ct. 617 (2012) ("[T]he threshold question presented here is whether the GEO employees can be considered federal agents acting under color of federal law in their professional capacities. We conclude that they can. . . . We note at the outset that the one federal court of appeal to have directly addressed the question – the Fourth Circuit – has held that employees of private corporations operating federal prisons are not federal actors for purposes of Bivens. Neither the Supreme Court nor our court has squarely addressed whether employees of a private corporation operating a prison under contract with the federal government act under color of federal law. That said, we have held that private defendants can be sued under Bivens if they engage in federal action. . . . In our view, there is no principled basis to distinguish the activities of the GEO employees in this case from the governmental action identified in West. Pollard could seek medical care only from the GEO employees and any other private physicians GEO employed. If those employees demonstrated deliberate indifference to Pollard's serious medical needs, the resulting deprivation was caused, in the sense relevant for the federal-action inquiry, by the federal government's exercise of its power to punish Pollard by incarceration and to deny him a venue independent of the federal government to obtain needed medical care. On this point, West is clear. . . . The relevant function here is not prison management, but rather incarceration of prisoners, which of course has traditionally been the State's 'exclusive prerogative.'. . .Likewise, in the § 1983 context, our sister circuits have routinely recognized that imprisonment is a fundamentally public function, regardless of the entity managing the prison. . . . In accord with West and other federal courts of appeal, we hold that there is but one function at issue here: the government's power to incarcerate those who have been convicted of criminal offenses. We decline to artificially parse that power into its constituent parts – confinement, provision of food and medical care, protection of inmate safety, etc. − as that would ignore that those functions all derive from a single public function that is the sole province of the government: 'enforcement of state-imposed deprivation of liberty.'. . Because that function is 'traditionally the exclusive prerogative of the [government],' it satisfies the 'public function' test under Rendell-Baker.")

TENTH CIRCUIT

VDARE Foundation v. City of Colorado Springs, 11 F.4th 1151, 1168 (10th Cir. 2021) ("In sum, the allegations don't show that the City ever threatened or ordered the Resort to take any action akin to what the Commission did to distributors in Bantam Books. Nor does it allege that the City sent police officers to intimidate anyone as in Bantam Books. . . Likewise, VDARE hasn't pleaded that the Resort and the City were intertwined through regulatory, administrative, financial, or contractual regimes, such as those discussed in Blum and its progeny or in Gallagher, which could have given the City direct influence over the Resort. As well, VDARE's allegations don't compare to the facts in R.C. Maxwell, Hammerhead, X-Men, or Penthouse, cases in which a government official directly communicated with a private third party in an effort to pressure that party to take a specific action. In sum, we agree with the district court that 'for unconstitutional state action to exist, state law must direct and/or state agencies and officials must commit conduct that directly violates a party's [F]irst [A]mendment rights.'. . The City didn't engage in such conduct here. Thus, we conclude that VDARE hasn't plausibly alleged that the Resort's cancellation of the Conference was state action.")

Big Cats of Serenity Springs, Inc., v. Rhodes, 843 F.3d 853, 870-71 (10th Cir. 2016) ("The district court nonetheless concluded the 'enlistment of state law enforcement' was sufficient to hold federal officers liable under § 1983. The court and the government rely on an unpublished district court case from California for support, Reynoso v. City & County. of San Francisco, No. C 10-00984 SI, 2012 WL 646232 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 28, 2012). In that case, San Francisco police officers entered the plaintiff's residence to search for drugs. But the court found substantial concerted action by the state and federal officials. 'After the premises was secured, the ATF agents "merely substituted themselves for the agents of the City and County of San Francisco in the break-in of plaintiffs' home and took up the search and seizure initiated by the City and County of San Francisco authorities."'. . Because the federal defendants were significant participants in the state scheme, those federal defendants' actions could ' "fairly be attributed to the state."'. .The circumstances here are quite different. The deputies were not actively engaged in pursuing a common law enforcement objective. Nor were they attempting to vindicate any state or county interest. They were only operating under the false assumption that the entry was authorized under federal law and pursuant to court order. In sum, the complaint does not allege the federal and state actors shared an unconstitutional goal. Nor do we find sufficient state cooperation, considering the local deputies' entire involvement consisted of complying with the requests of the APHIS inspectors. More accurately, the federal officials are better seen as acting under color of federal law—the AWA—when they instructed the state officials to cut the locks. Because the federal officials did not act under color of state law, the district court erred in denying the government's motion to dismiss the § 1983 claim.")

Wittner v. Banner Health, 720 F.3d 770, 774-77, 780 (10th Cir. 2013) ("Plaintiffs' state action theory, as set out in the complaint, hinges entirely on the state statutory scheme allowing seventy-two-hour involuntary mental health holds and NCMC's role thereunder as a 'designated facility.' Plaintiffs contend the state of Colorado transformed the medical facility and its health care employees into state actors by assuming the power to authorize the involuntary commitment of mentally ill persons and delegating that power to designated facilities which the state regulates. In so doing, plaintiffs argue, the state assumed the duty to provide constitutionally adequate medical care for the involuntarily committed patient, and NCMC and its employees acted under color of state law when it contracted to perform the state's obligation of care. . . .Without more, . . .a statutory grant of authority for a short-term involuntary hold in a private hospital does not pass the nexus/compulsion test for turning private action of the hospital or the certifying doctor into state action. . . . Plaintiffs cite to some out-of-circuit district court decisions finding involuntary commitment of the mentally ill to be a public function and thus state action. But this view has been rejected in our circuit. . . .Using public function reasoning, some courts have applied West to private prisons. See Rosborough v. Mgmt. & Training Corp., 350 F.3d 459, 461 (5th Cir.2003) (quoting Skelton v. Pri–Cor, Inc., 963 F.2d 100, 102 (6th Cir.1991)). But we and other circuits following Spencer, 864 F.2d 1376, have declined to import this 'public function' label onto short-term involuntary mental health holds in private hospitals. See Harvey, 949 F.2d at 1131; Rockwell v. Cape Cod Hosp., 26 F.3d 254 (1st Cir.1994). West anticipated Brentwood's focus on all relevant quantitative and qualitative facts by supplementing its public function reasoning with joint action and symbiotic relationship analyses, finding it relevant that contracted doctors were not given unfettered discretion but were required to cooperate with state prison personnel. . . But that does not help plaintiffs because the facts alleged here do not create a close question under any of the four tests.")

Phillips v. Tiona, No. 12–1055, 2013 WL 239891, *12-*15 (10th Cir. Jan. 23, 2013) (not reported) ("Structurally, CCA is in no way a public entity. It is a private, for-profit, business corporation, listed on the New York Stock Exchange, in the business of, among other things, the private management of prisons and other correctional facilities under contract with all three federal corrections agencies, sixteen states, and local municipalities. It is the fifth-largest corrections system in the nation behind only the federal government and three states. It houses more than 80,000 inmates in more than 60 facilities, 44 of which are company-owned, and it employs nearly 17,000 people. CCA operates three correctional facilities in the State of Colorado, under contract with the State: Bent County Correctional Facility, Crowley County Correctional Facility, and, as relevant here, Kit Carson Correctional Center. The State of Colorado contracts with CCA pursuant to state statute authorizing the CDOC 'to permanently place state inmates classified as medium custody and below in private prisons,' Colo.Rev.Stat. § 17–1–104.9, subject to legislation comprehensively regulating such prisons. . . Functionally, private prisons like KCCC only partly mirror prisons operated by the state. . . As indicated above, the State of Colorado remains intimately involved. Private prisons in Colorado must, among other things, 'abide by operations standards for correctional facilities adopted by the executive director of the department of corrections.'. . Notably, inmates assigned to private prisons remain officially in the custody of the CDOC, and the CDOC retains sole authority to assign and transfer inmates, make final determinations on disciplinary matters affecting liberty interests, make decisions that affect sentences or time served, including earned time credits, make recommendations to the state board of parole, develop work requirements, and determine eligibility for any form of release from a correctional facility. . . By outsourcing the incarceration of its prisoners, the State relieves itself of significant expenses, from those related to housing prisoners and providing food, medical, dental and other care, plus a full range of programs, to security, and the burden of payroll and state benefits to staff and administrators. In addition the State avoids exposure to the risks and expense of litigation and judgments. CCA personnel have no claim on benefits from the State, and CCA, by statute, indemnifies the State and its employees from all liabilities, including those stemming from civil rights claims; and it must carry insurance to back up that indemnification. . . .The line separating a State-operated prison from one operated by a private corporation is not just cosmetic. There are important differences, creating a material and significant asymmetry. Thus, for instance, whereas the State and its CDOC employees enjoy Eleventh Amendment immunity from damages suits under § 1983 for their official actions, . . . and CDOC employees in their individual capacities enjoy qualified immunity in § 1983 damages actions, CCA and its private prison employees enjoy neither. They are fully exposed to the numerous civil rights suits brought by inmates. . . .On the other hand, unlike federal prisoner suits against government employees, federal prisoners at a privately run federal prison cannot bring a Bivens . . . action against the private corporation that manages the prison, or its privately employed personnel working there, when there is a remedy under state tort law. See Malesko, 534 U.S. at 72–73; Minneci, 132 S.Ct. at 620. But that prohibition is more than offset by the ability to bring actions for simple negligence—a ground not available, for instance, in an Eighth Amendment claim under § 1983. . . And, with respect to the application of Title II of the ADA, states may, for certain conduct, enjoy sovereign immunity from

ADA suits for money damages where that conduct does not actually violate the Fourteenth Amendment. . . If it is determined that Title II of the ADA applies to them, private prison management corporations will have no such opportunity for protection. Finally, Title II of the ADA does not apply to federal prisoners in federal prisons, including those privately managed by corporations such as CCA. That is so because Title II covers only states and defined appendages thereof. . . Importantly, regulations issued by the Attorney General implementing Title II suggest that states may not avoid the responsibility to provide services to disabled prisoners by contracting away those obligations. Thus, prison assignments should not make a material difference. . . . The remedy for violations of the regulation, and such conditions, is not to sue the jails for breach of contract under a third-party beneficiary theory, or for violations of the ADA, but to sue the state for failing to meet its own obligations under the ADA. . . .Mr. Phillips has not joined the State as a party, so we do not pursue the matter here. The point is, however, that it would be a mistake to assume some stark difference in disability accommodations between Colorado inmates in State-run prisons and those in private facilities operated under contract. . . In any event, while all these considerations bear somewhat on the problem, in the end we are still faced directly with a question of statutory interpretation: Is CCA a public entity? Is it an instrumentality of government in the same sense as a 'department, agency, or special purpose district'? We think not. In the absence of clarification on the point in the 2008 Amendments to the ADA or any of the regulations issued before or since, we agree with the reasoning of the Second Circuit in Green that the proper canon of construction to apply is noscitur a sociis (a word is known by the company it keeps), and that 'instrumentality' refers to a traditional government unit or one created by a government unit. Accordingly, we join the Eleventh Circuit and the overwhelming majority of other courts that have spoken directly on the issue, and hold that Title II of the ADA does not generally apply to private corporations that operate prisons. In particular, it does not apply to CCA with respect to the management of KCCC. And the complaint fails to state a claim against CCA upon which relief could be granted for an alleged violation of the ADA.")

M.S. v. Belen Consol. Sch. Dist., No. 15-CV-912-MCA-SCY, 2017 WL 3057662, at *6 (D.N.M. July 18, 2017) ("Viewing the undisputed facts of this case in the light most favorable to M.S., a jury could reasonably find that Esquibel was acting under color of state law when he sexually abused M.S. Like the teacher in Doe who took advantage of his position as a teacher and coach to seduce and sexually abuse a student, Esquibel took advantage of his position as SRO and his affiliation with the Belen Police Department softball team to sexually abuse M.S. . . . .In sum, viewing the actions taken by Esquibel that lay the groundwork for the acts of sexual abuse, and the actions taken by Esquibel to hide the abuse, as a continuing course of conduct as did the Courts in Griffin, Doe, and Giordano, a jury could reasonably conclude that Esquibel used his position as the SRO to befriend M.S., to sexually abuse her, and to prevent her from disclosing the abuse. For all of the foregoing reasons, a jury could reasonably conclude that Esquibel's actions were taken under color of state law.")

Baumann v. Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City, No. 12–cv–01310–CMA–MEH, 2013 WL 4757264, 1 n.1 (D. Colo. Sept. 3, 2013) ("The parties cite no Tenth Circuit authority, nor is the Court aware of any, commenting on whether FRLEOs [Federal Reserve Law Enforcement Officers] are governmental actors for purposes of § 1983. In certain contexts, courts have found Federal Reserve Banks and/or their employees to be federal actors or instrumentalities. [collecting cases] However, other courts, particularly in the tort context, have held that Federal Reserve Banks and/or their employees are not governmental actors. [collecting cases] In light of the latter opinions which, as opposed to the former ones, address causes of action reasonably analogous to Plaintiff's § 1983 claim, and given the lack of authority on point in the Tenth Circuit, the Court will refrain from disrupting the parties' agreement that FRLEOs 'are not government employees.'")

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Charles v. Johnson, 18 F.4th 686, 697 (11th Cir. 2021) ("When a private citizen steps in to render brief, ad hoc assistance to a police officer, Jackson and Lugar are immediately distinguishable. The citizen clearly does not make use of state processes against his personal enemy, and the state is clearly not reaching out to the citizen to form a partnership. Because no other form of citizen-state collaboration applies, the only thread of precedent that could cover the private citizen's actions is the conspiracy thread. We need not determine what the specifics of the conspiracy must be, because it is clear in this case that there is no evidence of a conspiracy whatsoever. The communication between Leckie and Deputy Thacker consisted only of Leckie asking: 'Sir, can you get a cuff on him?' This is not an agreement between the two, and it is certainly distinguishable from the conspiracies examined by the Supreme Court in Price and Adickes. The Seventh Circuit reached the same conclusion under similar facts in Proffitt v. Ridgway. In Proffitt, a police officer accepted a bystander's offer to help restrain an arrestee. . . Our sister circuit held that 'the rendering of brief, ad hoc assistance' did not transform a bystander into a state actor. . .We hold that a civilian's rendering of brief, ad hoc assistance to a law enforcement officer is not state action, absent proof of a conspiracy to violate the constitutional rights of another. Summary judgment in favor of Leckie was therefore proper.")

Harper v. Professional Probation Servs. Inc, 976 F.3d 1236, 1240 n.5 (11th Cir. 2020) ("As already noted, in the district court PPS didn't contest that it was a state actor for either purpose. To the extent PPS now disputes (however obliquely) that it was a state actor, we hold that it was. Where 'deprivations of rights under the Fourteenth Amendment are alleged,' the under-color-of-law and state-action requirements 'converge.'. . State action includes 'the exercise by a private entity of powers traditionally exclusively reserved to the [s]tate.'. . More specifically, when the government 'delegates adjudicative functions to a private party,' the latter qualifies as a state actor. . . Because as we explain below, PPS was performing delegated judicial functions, it was a state actor for both § 1983 and Fourteenth Amendment purposes.")

Myers v. Bowman, 713 F.3d 1319, 1329-31 (11th Cir. 2013) ("A person acts under color of state law when he acts with authority possessed by virtue of his employment with the state . . . or when the manner of his conduct ... makes clear that he was asserting the authority granted him and not acting in the role of a private person. . . . The dispositive issue is whether the official was acting pursuant to the power he/she possessed by state authority or acting only as a private individual. . .Our precedents in Almand and Butler illustrate that an officer cannot be held liable for a constitutional tort when he acts in a private capacity. . . .Murry did not act under color of law when he reported to police that someone had stolen his dog because, in reporting the crime, he act[ed] only as a private individual. . . and not in his official capacity or while exercising his responsibilities pursuant to state law. . . . The theft occurred in connection with a private dispute and not a matter that was before Murry in his official capacity as a magistrate judge, and Murry alleged a theft of private property, not any property that belonged to the government. . . The Myers argue that Murry acted under color of law because he reported the theft using his government-issued SouthernLINC communications system, but we disagree. In Butler, we held that the corrections official did not act under color of law even though she used the gun and handcuffs she carried while on duty. . . Likewise, Murry did not act under color of law because he used the SouthernLINC communications device. And the SouthernLINC system was not a proprietary technology of the government. Any citizen could have purchased the technology, and Evans testified that ordinary citizens sometimes reported crimes directly to police officers using a SouthernLINC device or cellular phone instead of by calling a police dispatcher. And if Murry did not have a SouthernLINC device, he could have reported the crime using a cellular phone or other device. Thus there is no reason to believe that [Murry] would not have done, or been able to do, what [he] did to [the Myers] without the use of his SouthernLINC radio, and we must conclude that Murry did not act under color of law. . .The Myers also argue that Murry acted under color of law because Miller would not have pursued the Myers outside of his jurisdiction unless he received the instruction from a government official, but this argument fails too. [T]he primary focus of the color of law analysis must be on the conduct of the [defendant], not the victim or a third-party. . . and the record does not support the conclusion that Murry act[ed] pursuant to the power [he] possessed by state authority. . . . Nor was the arrest made possible only because [Murry] [wa]s clothed with the authority of state law. . . Although Murry's position as a magistrate judge affected Miller's decision to pursue the Myers, Evans acted at all times within his jurisdiction, and it was Evans who caused the Myers to stop their vehicle. Evans would have arrested the Myers even if Miller had stopped his vehicle at the city limits. Although Murry instructed Evans to remove Dustin from the vehicle, the record establishes that Evans would have made the arrest even if Murry had not been present at the scene or directed Evans to remove Dustin from the vehicle. Evans had probable cause to arrest the Myers for a felony theft, and Evans approached the truck with his gun drawn and directed Dustin to place his hands outside the vehicle before Murry gave any direction to Evans. By the time Murry instructed Evans to remove Dustin from the vehicle, Evans was already in the process of arresting Dustin. Murry therefore did not invoke his authority as a magistrate judge to cause the arrest of Dustin. Although Murry invoked his authority as a magistrate judge when he threatened Dustin at the scene of the arrest, that threat occurred after police arrested the Myers and fails to create a reasonable inference that Murry acted under color of law when he reported the theft of the dog. . . Murry is entitled to a summary judgment against the claim for false arrest because he did not act under color of law.")

Butler v. Sheriff of Palm Beach County, 685 F.3d 1261, 1267, 1268 (11th Cir. 2012) ("As in Almand, Collier's conduct, or misconduct, was not accomplished because of her status as a corrections officer. Just as 'any thug or burglar could have committed the same violent acts' as the officer in Almand, 103 F.3d at 1515, any irate mother with an anger management problem could have done what Collier did. . . . This case actually presents a weaker basis for a finding of action under color of state law than the Almand case did. Unlike the defendant in that case, Collier did not use her law enforcement position to strike up a relationship with the victim or to initially gain access to the house where the assault took place. It was Collier's house and she walked in just like any private individual returning home from work. Collier's discovery of a naked man in her daughter's closet was not the result of an official search by a law enforcement officer. When Collier punched Butler, she was acting as an enraged parent; she was not purporting to exercise her official authority to subdue a criminal for purposes of an arrest. When she handcuffed and detained Butler, Collier did not purport to be exercising her authority to arrest a criminal. When she called her husband, she was acting as a wife and parent, not as an officer. And when Collier called her place of work, a boot camp facility for minors, for advice about whether Butler could be charged with a crime, she did no more than an ordinary citizen could do by simply requesting information from law enforcement authorities about whether Butler's conduct was criminal. Although Collier did use the pistol that she wore as an officer, any adult without a felony record can lawfully possess a firearm (and tens of millions do). A law enforcement officer who gets into an after-hours dispute with her domestic partner that tragically escalates into a shooting does not act under color of law merely because the weapon used is the firearm the officer carries on duty. As for the handcuffs, the law does not restrict possession of them to law enforcement officers. In any event, there is no reason to believe that Collier would not have done, or been able to do, what she did to Butler without her handcuffs. They were incidental, not essential, to his detention. . . . If the allegations are true, Collier's treatment of Butler was badder than old King Kong and meaner than a junkyard dog. She might even have acted like the meanest hunk of woman anybody had ever seen. Still, the fact that the mistreatment was mean does not mean that the mistreatment was under color of law. Because the alleged mistreatment of Butler was not inflicted under color of law, the district court correctly dismissed his § 1983 claims. Butler will have to seek his remedies under state law and in state court.").

Carter v. City of Montgomery, 473 F.Supp.3d 1273, ____ (M.D. Ala. 2020) ("Mr. Kloess . . . contends that he cannot be held liable under § 1983 because public defenders are not state actors. Generally, that argument holds true: 'a public defender does not act under color of state law when performing a lawyer's traditional functions as counsel to a defendant in a criminal proceeding.' Polk Cty. v. Dodson, 454 U.S. 312, 325 (1981). But a public defender may be a public actor when performing some administrative functions. . . And legal activities cross the line into administrative functions when they become systemic. A public defender's systemic inaction 'carries the imprimatur of administrative approval.'. . Ordinary policies may not subject a public defender to liability under § 1983. When, however, a public defender engages across the board in a practice that systemically deprives defendants of their constitutional rights, 'the adversarial relationship between the State and the Public Defender—upon which the Polk County Court relied heavily in determining that the individual public defender there was not a state actor—has broken down such that the Public Defender is serving the State's interest in exacting punishment, rather than the interests of its clients, or society's interest in fair judicial proceedings.'. . Mr. Carter alleges that kind of breakdown: that Mr. Kloess served the City's interest rather than his own as part of an unconstitutional a 'pay-or-stay' scheme. Mr. Kloess testified that he has requested indigency determinations in the past, but he also testified that he could not name a single defendant for whom he requested such a hearing. . . Whether Mr. Kloess actually sought such hearings is a question of credibility that must go to a jury. . . If a jury chooses not to credit Mr. Kloess's assertion that he has requested indigency determinations, it could conclude that Mr. Kloess systemically deprived defendants of indigency hearings. Therefore, Mr. Kloess is not entitled to summary judgment on the grounds that he is not a state actor.")

C. Statute of Limitations

Wallace v. Kato, 127 S. Ct. 1091, 1094, 1095 (2007) ("Section 1983 provides a federal cause of action, but in several respects relevant here federal law looks to the law of the State in which the cause of action arose. This is so for the length of the statute of limitations: It is that which the State provides for personal-injury torts. Owens v. Okure, 488 U.S. 235, 249-250, 109 S.Ct. 573, 102 L.Ed.2d 594 (1989); Wilson v. Garcia, 471 U.S. 261, 279-280, 105 S.Ct. 1938, 85 L.Ed.2d 254 (1985) . . . . While we have never stated so expressly, the accrual date of a § 1983 cause of action is a question of federal law that is not resolved by reference to state law.").

See also Brown v. Pouncy, 93 F.4th 331, 334-38 (5th Cir. 2024) ("Brown maintains that we ask whether Section 1983 police brutality claims—and not Section 1983 claims generally, as Pouncy contends—are discriminated against or practically frustrated by Louisiana's prescriptive period. Tellingly, Section 1983 police brutality claims were at issue in both Wilson and Owens, yet neither analyzed the statute of limitations question based on the nature of police brutality claims specifically and instead considered Section 1983 claims generally. . . That approach makes sense: The doctrinal developments outlined above reflect an 'interest in having firmly defined, easily applied rules.'. . That interest was stymied when courts had to parse which limitations period applied based on the particular facts of a Section 1983 action, . . . and so Wilson, then Owens, announced a straightforward rule that obviated the need to do so. The claim-specific approach assumed by Brown in his opening brief—and then urged by him in reply—would upend this. Though our court has not addressed this issue before, we embraced Wilson's 'broad and inclusive language' to reject the argument that Section 1983 suits seeking equitable relief are not bound by statutes of limitations. . . . We concluded that 'Wilson's strongly expressed interests in judicial economy suggest' no exception for equitable relief exists. . . [O]ur case law reflects the bargain that courts have struck in the gap that Congress left: Accept that some plaintiffs may miss out on longer limitations periods afforded to analogous state law claims but give all plaintiffs the baseline protection of the limitations period used for '[g]eneral personal injury actions ... [that] constitute a major part of the total volume of civil litigation in the state courts,' so that it is 'most unlikely that the period of limitations applicable to such claims ever was, or ever would be, fixed in a way that would discriminate against federal claims.'. . . Our court has repeatedly applied Louisiana's one-year prescriptive period, . . . but we agree with Brown that it has not been challenged on these grounds. Puerto Rico, Kentucky, and Tennessee are tied with Louisiana as having the shortest limitations periods applicable to Section 1983 actions, . . . and it does not appear that either the First Circuit or Sixth Circuit has addressed these arguments. But the Ninth Circuit and Eleventh Circuit each addressed challenges to one-year limitations periods after Owens. As out-of-circuit cases, they are merely persuasive. . . and offer limited analysis. In McDougal v. County of Imperial, the Ninth Circuit rejected the argument that 'a one-year period of limitations is too restrictive to accommodate the important federal interests at stake in a civil rights action.'. . . In Jones & Preuit v. Mauldin, the Eleventh Circuit rejected, on remand from the Supreme Court after Owens, the argument that a one-year period contravenes federal interests because '[n]o case ... has held that a one-year limitations period conflicts with the policies behind section 1983 by providing an insufficient period in which to file suit.'. . . We read Supreme Court precedent, and our cases applying that precedent, to foreclose Brown's position. Only the Supreme Court, having already solved the problem of uncertainty in the absence of a federal limitations period for Section 1983 claims, can clarify how lower courts should evaluate practical frustration without undermining that solution. And states, like Louisiana, are free to act so that they are no longer outliers.")

Reed v. Goertz, 143 S. Ct. 955, 961-62 (2023) ("This Court's case law 'severely limits the federal action a state prisoner may bring for DNA testing.' Skinner v. Switzer, 562 U. S. 521, 525 (2011). The Court has 'rejected the extension of substantive due process to this area, and left slim room for the prisoner to show that the governing state law denies him procedural due process.'. . Seeking to fit his § 1983 suit within the 'slim room' left by this Court's precedent, Reed raised a procedural due process challenge to Texas's post-conviction DNA testing law. The sole question now before this Court is whether Reed's § 1983 suit was timely. The parties agree that the statute of limitations for Reed's claim is two years. But the parties disagree about when that 2-year limitations period began to run. That question is one of federal law. . . As a general matter, the statute of limitations begins to run when the plaintiff has a 'complete and present cause of action.'. . To determine when a plaintiff has a complete and present cause of action, the Court focuses first on the specific constitutional right alleged to have been infringed. . . Here, the specific constitutional right allegedly infringed is procedural due process. A procedural due process claim consists of two elements: (i) deprivation by state action of a protected interest in life, liberty, or property, and (ii) inadequate state process. . . Importantly, the Court has stated that a procedural due process claim 'is not complete when the deprivation occurs.'. . Rather, the claim is 'complete' only when 'the State fails to provide due process.'. . Reed contends that the State's process for considering his DNA testing request was fundamentally unfair in violation of the Due Process Clause. Texas's process for considering a request for DNA testing in capital cases includes not only trial court proceedings, but also appellate review by the Court of Criminal Appeals. . . And under longstanding Texas rules of appellate procedure, the Court of Criminal Appeals's appellate review process encompasses a motion for rehearing. . . In Reed's case, the State's alleged failure to provide Reed with a fundamentally fair process was complete when the state litigation ended and deprived Reed of his asserted liberty interest in DNA testing. Therefore, Reed's § 1983 claim was complete and the statute of limitations began to run when the state litigation ended—when the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals denied Reed's motion for rehearing. The soundness of that straightforward conclusion is 'reinforced by the consequences that would follow' from a contrary approach. . . If the statute of limitations for a § 1983 suit like Reed's began to run after a state trial court's denial of a plaintiff 's motion for DNA testing (or even after the appeal before the plaintiff 's rehearing proceedings), the plaintiff would likely continue to pursue relief in the state system and simultaneously file a protective federal § 1983 suit challenging that ongoing state process. That parallel litigation would 'run counter to core principles of federalism, comity, consistency, and judicial economy.'. . We see no good reason for such senseless duplication. Moreover, significant systemic benefits ensue from starting the statute of limitations clock when the state litigation in DNA testing cases like Reed's has concluded. If any due process flaws lurk in the DNA testing law, the state appellate process may cure those flaws, thereby rendering a federal § 1983 suit unnecessary. And if the state appellate court construes the DNA testing statute, that construction will streamline and focus subsequent § 1983 proceedings. In sum, when a prisoner pursues state post-conviction DNA testing through the state-provided litigation process, the statute of limitations for a § 1983 procedural due process claim begins to run when the state litigation ends. In Reed's case, the statute of limitations began to run when the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals denied Reed's motion for rehearing. Reed's § 1983 claim was timely.")

But see Reed v. Goertz, 143 S. Ct. 955, 970-71 (2023) (Thomas, J., dissenting) ("In sum, there is no getting around the essential problem with Reed's due process claim: To the extent he is not merely seeking an advisory opinion, he is complaining about a court-inflicted injury, and redressing that injury would require an exercise of appellate jurisdiction that the District Court does not possess. In substance, his complaint in this action is a mere reprise of his prior certiorari petition, camouflaged as an original action against the district attorney. Thus, I would vacate the Fifth Circuit's judgment and remand this case to the District Court with instructions to dismiss the complaint for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction. . . . [W]hen a State allegedly violates due process through its judicial actions—be it through the denial of a fundamentally fair judicial procedure or through the application of a rule of decision that itself violates due process—the remedy that Congress has provided is appellate 'review of the [challenged] judgmen[t] in this Court.'. . But, if that remedy proves unsuccessful—as it did for Reed—the aggrieved party cannot simply substitute an executive officer as a defendant, charge the state court's errors to that officer, and seek redress for a court-inflicted injury in a purported original action. Properly understood, therefore, Article III, the Rooker-Feldman doctrine, and procedural due process principles work in harmony. The majority's piecemeal analysis replaces this natural coherence with chaos. . . . It allows Reed to convert his failed certiorari petition into a § 1983 complaint. And, in doing so, it authorizes a proceeding in which the District Court can do nothing except opine on the constitutional merits of a state-court adjudication. . . . [B]ecause the majority undermines vital principles of federal jurisdiction and destabilizes the orderly working of our judicial system, I respectfully dissent.")

testing claim accrued, but in my view, the notion that this did not take place until rehearing was denied is clearly wrong. . . . We need only decide whether accrual was put off until the CCA denied rehearing, and it is clear to me that this delayed accrual date is wrong. . . As noted, the claim that Reed asserts is not based on the bare text of Article 64, but on what he claims is an erroneous interpretation of that provision by the Texas courts. He thus submits that his claim accrued when the 'authoritative construction of Article 64' that he challenges was pronounced by the CCA. I will assume for the sake of argument that Reed's claim accrued when the CCA issued its 'authoritative construction of Article 64,' but I cannot agree with Reed's argument—which the Court conspicuously declines to defend—that the CCA's interpretation did not become 'authoritative' until rehearing was denied. Reed cites no authority for the proposition that the filing of a petition for rehearing typically suspends the authoritative force of an appellate court's decision, and in fact, it appears that the opposite is true—as this Court's 'GVR' practice illustrates. On or shortly after the day when we hand down a decision, we often 'GVR' cases in which petitions raising similar issues are pending before us. . . .We do not wait to see if a petition for rehearing will be filed; nor do we hold off until a mandate is issued or a certified copy of the judgment is prepared. . . If our decisions did not become authoritative and binding as soon as they are issued, this practice would be impermissible. There is no reason why decisions of the CCA should be viewed any differently. On the contrary, it appears that the CCA has followed a practice similar to our GVR practice. . . And neither Reed nor the Court has cited any contrary Texas authority. Accordingly, Reed's 'authoritative construction' argument became complete, at the latest, when the CCA adopted that construction on April 12, 2017, two years and 11 months before Reed filed his § 1983 complaint. . . .Unlike Reed, the Court does not contend that the CCA's interpretation lacked 'authoritative' status until rehearing was denied. Instead, the Court merely proclaims that the State, acting through Goertz, did not deny Reed due process of law until 'the state litigation ended.'. . I certainly see the logic in this view: until the process afforded by a State has been exhausted, it may be said that the State has not definitively denied the process that the Constitution is alleged to demand. This logic leads to the conclusion that a prisoner like Reed should exhaust state remedies—something that would generally be required if the proper vehicle for contesting the denial of a DNA testing claim were a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. . . But the Court rejected that proposition in District Attorney's Office for Third Judicial Dist. v. Osborne, 557 U. S. 52 (2009), and it is well-established that a § 1983 plaintiff need not exhaust state remedies. . . Not only is this the general rule, but the Osborne Court found that the rule applies in cases involving constitutional challenges to the denial of requested DNA testing. . . Thus, the Court's reasoning collides with precedent. On top of this, the Court's reasoning, if taken to its logical conclusion, points to a result that neither Reed nor the Court is willing to embrace: namely, that a due process challenge to the denial of a request for DNA testing is not ripe until state remedies have been exhausted. . . But that is where the Court's reasoning is likely to lead. . . . In light of these problems, it is not surprising that the Court declines to say anything about whether prisoners who wish to challenge a state DNA testing law may sue as soon as their testing requests are denied. The Court says only that it 'need not address th[e] hypothetical scenario' of a plaintiff who declines 'full appellate review,'. . . but what does that mean? Does it mean that such a plaintiff must exhaust state remedies at the trial level but need not appeal? Does it mean that such a plaintiff must pursue some (but not "full") appellate review?

Litigants and the lower courts are left to guess. Instead of clarifying the law, the Court's decision may sow confusion. . . Much of Reed's argumentation is not aimed at the argument that his claim accrued when the CCA issued its contested interpretation of Article 64. Instead, Reed directs his attack on the earlier possible accrual dates discussed in Part I of this opinion and in particular the Fifth Circuit's holding that a claim like Reed's accrues when testing is denied at the trial level. . . . Whatever merit these arguments might have in relation to the accrual date adopted by the Fifth Circuit, they ring hollow as applied to the choice between the date when a state high court issues a decision interpreting the state testing statute and the date when that court refuses to rehear and overturn that interpretation. . . And it is hard to see how requiring a § 1983 plaintiff to sue within two years after a state high court decision is issued is unfair or does any damage to federalism, comity, or judicial economy. Reed has provided no explanation why he could not have filed his § 1983 action within two years after the CCA's decision. Instead, he waited until an execution date was set. While that event may have 'concentrate[d] his mind wonderfully,' that is not an excuse for the basic mistake of missing a statute of limitations. . . For these reasons, I would affirm the judgment below, and I therefore respectfully dissent.")

Compare Reguli v. Russ, 109 F.4th 874, 879-83 (6th Cir. 2024) ("At the outset, state law determines the length of § 1983's statute of limitations. The Supreme Court has held that the statute incorporates the limitations period for personal-injury torts from the State where the events occurred. . . Conversely, federal law determines when a § 1983 claim accrues to trigger the running of this state statute of limitations. . . The Supreme Court has explained that the 'standard' accrual 'rule' starts a limitations period when 'the plaintiff has "a complete and present cause of action."'. . Put differently, this 'injury-occurrence' or 'occurrence' rule triggers the limitations period on the first day that every element of a claim has occurred such that the plaintiff may sue in court over the claim. . . The Supreme Court has recited this rule in three § 1983 cases. [citing Reed v. Goertz, McDonough v. Smith, and Wallace v. Kato] But our § 1983 cases have taken a different approach. We have suggested that the statute adopts a 'discovery rule,' not an 'occurrence rule.'. . This rule postpones the limitations period to the date that the plaintiff discovered, or reasonably should have discovered, basic facts about the claim. . . . Whether she needed to know about only her injury or about both her injury and its cause, she did not file her claim within the one-year statute of limitations. Her complaint alleged that she discovered her injury—the invasion of privacy from the Facebook search—'in about January 2020.'. . And her complaint alleged that she learned of this injury's cause—'Detective Lori Russ'—at the same time. . . This knowledge started the limitations period in January 2020, whether or not Reguli knew of the 'other elements of' her claim.") with Reguli v. Russ, 109 F.4th 874, 884-85 (6th Cir. 2024) (White, J., concurring) ("I agree that Reguli's claim accrued under federal law when she had 'a complete and present cause of action,'. . . when Russ obtained her Facebook records. Under the discovery rule, which the parties agree applies here, Russ must also 'show that Reguli knew of this cause of action (or at least reasonably should have known of it).'. . Whether this is so is generally a fact-intensive inquiry. Here, Reguli's complaint establishes that she should have pursued a First Amendment retaliation claim when she received the discovery packet in January 2020 and perceived that the entire prosecution was unfounded and irregular. Because straightforward application of the discovery rule makes this clear, I find much of the majority's discussion unnecessary."). See also Reguli v. Russ, 109 F.4th 874, 885-88 (6th Cir. 2024) (Murphy, J., concurring) ("We decide this case in the way that the parties have presented it to us. . . So we assume that the 'discovery rule'—which delays the usual start date of a statute of limitations—applies to Connie Reguli's First Amendment claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. But this assumption may well prove misplaced. As in another statute-of-limitations case that the Supreme Court recently decided, the parties debate the mechanics of the discovery rule without addressing 'the logically antecedent question': Should this rule apply at all? . . . Although our court has recited the discovery rule in many § 1983 cases, I have my doubts about our approach. Frankly, the Supreme Court's caselaw on this question and our caselaw on it seem to be speaking different languages. . . . In recent cases, the Court has repeatedly considered when different types of constitutional claims accrue to trigger § 1983's statute of limitations. . . Each time, the Court has followed the same general framework. It has first pinpointed the 'specific constitutional right' on which the § 1983 plaintiff relied—whether the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause or the Fourth Amendment's ban on unreasonable searches and seizures. . . The Court has next turned to the 'common law of torts' to determine the 'accrual' rules for the identified constitutional claim. . . It has explained that the common law 'presumptively' adopted what the majority opinion calls the 'occurrence' rule—not any type of discovery rule. . . That is, the common law typically started the limitations period on the first day that plaintiffs had 'a complete and present cause of action[.]'. . Plaintiffs have such a cause of action when they can seek relief in court because a claim's legal elements have all arisen (whether or not they know of this fact). . . .To be clear, the Court has recognized only a presumption in favor of this occurrence rule. It has applied the rule when nothing supported a departure from it. . . But sometimes a constitutional claim (such as an unreasonable-seizure claim) might resemble a tort (such as a false-imprisonment claim) that followed a 'distinctive' accrual test at common law . . . In that scenario, the Court might extend this distinctive test (not the occurrence rule) to the analogous constitutional claim. . . . We first adopted a 'discovery' rule for § 1983's statute of limitations in a 1984 case about the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. . . Bereft of any reasoning that would justify our choice of a discovery rule over an occurrence rule, Sevier devoted all of one sentence to this topic: 'The statute of limitations commences to run when the plaintiff knows or has reason to know of the injury which is the basis of his action.'. . Its support? Four out-of-circuit decisions. . . Since then, we have cited Sevier's lone sentence as our source to expand the discovery rule—in seemingly automatic fashion—to many other constitutional claims that plaintiffs have pursued under § 1983. . . Consider a few ways that our current approach to this accrual question differs from the Supreme Court's. To begin with, the Supreme Court has told us to start with the 'specific constitutional right' at issue when determining the proper accrual test. . . But most of our cases start—and end—by adopting a discovery rule without considering the relevant constitutional right. Indeed, many opinions do not even identify the right that the § 1983 plaintiff sought to vindicate in the suit. . . Next, the Supreme Court 'presumptively' follows the occurrence rule in § 1983 cases both because the Court looks to 'common-law tort principles' to interpret § 1983 and because States generally followed this rule to decide when the statute of limitations began for their torts. . . We, by contrast, have automatically (not presumptively) adhered to a discovery rule in our § 1983 cases. And none of our cases has even examined

'common-law tort principles,' let alone attempted to ground our broad-brush discovery rule in those principles. . . . As far as I can tell, a broad discovery rule conflicts with these traditional principles. . . .At the same time, the Supreme Court's instructions that we should follow 'distinctive' accrual rules when the common law would adopt them likely leaves some room for a discovery rule. . . Most notably, the common law at the time of § 1983's enactment adopted a discovery rule that delayed the running of the statute of limitations when the plaintiff asserted a fraud claim. . . If a constitutional claim under § 1983 resembles such a fraud claim, this 'distinctive' discovery rule might apply. . . Other unique rules might also exist. Even for non-fraud torts, for example, some common-law sources suggested that a defendant's fraudulent effort to hide the tort could delay the start of the statute of limitations. . . .I will not belabor the point further. I hope that what I have said suffices to show the tension between our precedent and the Supreme Court's. Eventually, the distinction between our automatic use of the discovery rule and the Supreme Court's presumptive use of the occurrence rule will matter to the outcome of a § 1983 case. When it does, a panel must address whether our prior decisions bind us to the discovery rule as a precedential matter despite the Supreme Court's caselaw. If a panel finds itself bound, perhaps the en banc court should take a fresh look at our discovery rule. After all, that rule arose long ago in a conclusory fashion well before the Supreme Court's more recent (and reasoned) guidance on this issue.")

Oct. 18, 2024) (not reported) ("Turning first to the time-barred claims, DeLarosa maintains that his Fourth Amendment claims (counts I, II, III, IV, V and VI) were timely because he was barred under Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477, 486–87 (1994), from bringing these claims until his criminal case was dismissed. DeLarosa is correct that Heck applies to his malicious prosecution claims (counts I, IV, and VI), McDonough v. Smith, 588 U.S. 109, 116–117 (2019), and that those claims are therefore timely. But Heck does not apply to an action that would impugn an anticipated future conviction. See Wallace v. Kato, 549 U.S. 384, 393 (2007). DeLarosa's claims for unreasonable search and seizure (counts II, III, and V) accrued when the search and seizure were conducted, . . . and the subsequent prosecution did not delay accrual[.] . . In Illinois, Fourth Amendment claims for unreasonable search and seizure are governed by the two-year statute of limitations for personal injury claims. . . As the district court rightly concluded, DeLarosa's Fourth Amendment claims were untimely because he did not file his complaint until June 2023—almost six and a half years after his January 2017 search and arrest."); Bannister v. Knox County Bd. of Education, 49 F.4th 1000, 1008-11 (6th Cir. 2022) ("While Tennessee law determines the length of the limitations period, federal law determines the event that causes the one-year clock to begin to tick (that is, the 'accrual date'). . . The Supreme Court has twice suggested in this § 1983 context that the presumptive accrual rule starts the running of a limitations period on the first day that a plaintiff may sue on a claim, which occurs once the plaintiff has 'a complete and present cause of action[.]'. . We have, by contrast, applied a 'discovery rule' to § 1983 claims. . . This rule delays the start of the limitations period until a plaintiff learns of (or should have learned of) the injury and the party who caused it—even if all of the claim's required legal elements had come into existence before that point. . . We recently attempted to reconcile these cases on the ground that Wallace and McDonough did not discuss the discovery rule and so should not be read to have rejected it for § 1983 claims. See Snyder-Hill, —— F.4th at ——, 2022 WL 4233750, at *10. But that case involved Title IX and so could not have authoritatively resolved the tension in this distinct § 1983 context. We need not resolve this tension either because the difference between these two accrual rules makes no difference to our outcome. . . Before deciding on the specific requirements for a § 1983 claim, we must 'identify the specific constitutional right' that the plaintiff has invoked. . . This 'threshold inquiry' has importance in this statute-of-limitations context too. . . We may choose the statute-of-limitations rules for a specific § 1983 claim only after looking to the common-law principles governing the tort that is 'most analogous' to the alleged constitutional violation. . .Two cases from the Supreme Court demonstrate this approach. In the first case, a plaintiff alleged that officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they arrested him without legal process (a warrant). Wallace, 549 U.S. at 387 & n.1, 389, 127 S.Ct. 1091. The Court identified false imprisonment as the tort most analogous to this unreasonable-seizure claim. . . It then explained that a 'distinctive' accrual rule applied to false-imprisonment claims at common law. . . Even though the plaintiff had a complete cause of action (and could have sued) on the first day of an unlawful detention, the limitations period did not begin to run until this unlawful detention came to an end—either through the plaintiff's release or through the initiation of legal process. . . Wallace applied this false-imprisonment rule to the unreasonable-seizure claim. . . It thus holds that a special accrual rule can apply to a § 1983 claim if the rule applies to the most analogous tort. In the second case, a plaintiff alleged that an officer violated due process by introducing false evidence in the plaintiff's criminal case. McDonough, 139 S. Ct. at 2155. The Court identified malicious prosecution as the tort most analogous to this fabricated-evidence claim. . . At common law, malicious prosecution required a plaintiff to prove that the underlying criminal case had terminated in the plaintiff's favor. . . The limitations period for this due-process claim thus began to run only on this date (when the case ended in the plaintiff's favor), not the earlier date when the officer used the false evidence. . . McDonough thus holds that, when a § 1983 claim adopts an analogous tort's legal elements, those elements can control whether a plaintiff has a 'complete' cause of action. . . This approach creates a problem for this case. The parties' briefing in the district court ignored the 'threshold inquiry' for choosing the accrual rules that govern the Bannisters' § 1983 claims. . . Neither side identified the specific constitutional right at issue. When the School District moved to dismiss the § 1983 claims as time-barred, it did not characterize the complaint as invoking a particular constitutional theory. . . Rather, it argued that the Bannisters did not timely file their claims on April 16, 2018, because the School District's challenged acts all occurred before April 16, 2017. . . The School District thus assumed that its acts triggered the limitations period for every § 1983 claim. In response, the Bannisters also failed to identify the constitutional rights on which they relied. . . They instead argued that their (unidentified) claims accrued either upon Will's suicide (on April 17, 2017) or later when they learned of his concerning journal entry (on April 30). . . The parties' oversight could affect the proper resolution of this statute-of-limitations issue. The Bannisters' complaint vaguely indicated that the School Districts' 'acts and omissions' violated Will's 'federal constitutional rights' without identifying any specific right. . . While this type of complaint might not represent the best of legal strategies, . . . it does not conflict with modern pleading rules. Those rules required the Bannisters to plead only factual allegations plausibly setting forth a claim. . . They did not need to identify the 'precise legal theor[ies]' on which they relied. . . And their factual allegations about the events in question could be read to raise different constitutional theories implicating different dates for when the claim came into existence. On the one hand, the complaint's factual allegations could be read (as the district court read them) to assert a procedural-due-process claim tied to Will's suspension. . . The complaint repeatedly attacked Will's suspension proceedings as violating 'administrative due process.'. . What is the proper accrual date for this claim? [court discusses possibilities] Under any of these dates, though, the district court held that the Bannisters' claim would be untimely. . .On the other hand, the complaint's factual allegations could be read to raise a substantive-due-process claim tied to Will's suicide. The complaint alleged that Will expressed suicidal thoughts in his journal entry and that the School District failed to inform the Bannisters. On appeal, the Bannisters argue that this failure 'shocks the conscience' and violates substantive due process. . . .This substantive-due-process theory might give rise to different accrual rules, depending on the proper common-law analogy. [court discusses possibilities] Ultimately, though, we need not decide the specific accrual rules that apply to any of these due-process theories. Through their conduct (or, more accurately, their attorneys' conduct), the Bannisters have waived their procedural-due-process theory and forfeited their substantive-due-process theory.")

See also Dibrell v. City of Knoxville, Tennessee, 984 F.3d 1156, 1161-63 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Dibrell's false-arrest-and-imprisonment claim and his malicious-prosecution claim are thus specific versions of a general unreasonable-seizure claim alleging the same constitutional theory: that the officers seized (and continued to seize) Dibrell without probable cause (or even reasonable suspicion for the initial temporary stop). Manuel, 137 S. Ct. at 918; compare Tlapanco v. Elges, 969 F.3d 638, 654 n.3 (6th Cir. 2020), with id. at 658–60 (Thapar, J., concurring). Yet § 1983 sometimes adopts different statutory rules to govern the portion of a detention that preceded legal process (for which the torts of false arrest and false imprisonment might offer the best analogy) as compared to the portion that succeeded it (for which the tort of malicious prosecution might offer the best analogy). Wallace, 549 U.S. at 389–90. Here, for example, the officers raised a statute-of-limitations defense to Dibrell's false-arrest-and-imprisonment claim but only a merits defense to his malicious-prosecution claim. We address each defense in turn. . . . In this § 1983 context, the Court has started its accrual analysis with the standard rule: that a claim accrues when the plaintiff has a complete cause of action. . . Our § 1983 caselaw, by contrast, has started the accrual analysis with the competing discovery rule: that the claim accrues when the plaintiff knows of, or should have known of, that cause of action. See King v. Harwood, 852 F.3d 568, 578 (6th Cir. 2017); Johnson, 777 F.3d at 843. Do our cases imbibing this 'bad wine' warrant reconsideration in light of the Supreme Court's recent teachings? We need not resolve this tension now because Dibrell's claims would be untimely either way. If the standard rule were to apply here, the limitations period for a claim involving a false arrest and imprisonment would 'commence to run' from the date of the wrongful arrest because the plaintiff has a complete cause of action at that point. . . And if the discovery rule were to apply, Dibrell's knowledge that he had been arrested (allegedly wrongfully) would start the clock on the same date. Either approach thus would have triggered the statute of limitations on February 17, 2014. But the Court has not ended with the standard rule in this § 1983 context. Rather, it has proceeded to look to the accrual rules for the tort most like the constitutional claim at issue. [citing McDonough] In Wallace, moreover, the Court made clear that the torts of false arrest and false imprisonment have special accrual rules. . . . These torts, which again challenge a detention without legal process, accrue at the earlier of two dates. . . They accrue when the false imprisonment ends with the plaintiff's release. . . Or, if the plaintiff remains detained, they alternatively accrue when the false imprisonment ends with the issuance of legal process—when, for example, the plaintiff is brought before a magistrate. . . 'From that point on,' a plaintiff relying on the law of torts to challenge any continuing detention must assert a malicious-prosecution claim. . . Dibrell's claim is untimely under these rules. His detention ended on February 18, 2014, when he was released on bond, so the limitations period likely started then. . . Dibrell makes no claim that the bond requirements imposed as a condition of his release qualified as a continuing 'detention' for statute-of-limitations purposes, so we need not consider that theory. . . And regardless, his bond hearing likely triggered Wallace's alternative accrual rule tied to the issuance of legal process. . . At the latest, this 'legal process' issued when he was indicted in April 2015. . . Whether measured from the date of his bond hearing or the date of his indictment, the one-year statute of limitations had long run when Dibrell sued in September 2018."); Lockett v. County of Los Angeles, 977 F.3d 737, 740-42 (9th Cir. 2020) ("Federal courts borrow from state law to determine any applicable statute of limitations for § 1983 claims, including tolling provisions. . . . In this case, while Lockett filed his Monell claim against the County two years and five months after his arrest by the deputies—outside of the two-year statute of limitations—his attempted murder charge was pending for eight months. Consequently, his claim against the County may proceed if § 945.3 tolled his civil action while he was in custody. To answer whether § 945.3 governs, we look to whether Lockett's Monell claim is 'based upon conduct of the peace officer relating to the offense for which the accused is charged.' Cal Gov't Code § 945.3. . . . While the County correctly argues that Monell liability is limited to the 'acts of the municipality,'. . . the peace officer's conduct still constitutes an element of a Monell claim. Under this understanding of the law, it is clear that the officers' conduct is the 'but for' cause of Lockett's Monell claim. Here, Lockett alleges that two deputies severely kicked, punched, and beat him with a baton during his arrest in violation of his right to be free from excessive force—a constitutional violation. In turn, Lockett's Monell claim alleges that the County of Los Angeles allowed the proliferation of racially motivated gangs or cliques among Sheriff's deputies, including the two deputies involved in his case, which resulted in the constitutional violation he suffered. To succeed on the latter, Lockett must prove the former. Accordingly, the deputies' conduct necessarily lies at the heart of Lockett's Monell claim, Heller, 475 U.S. at 799, and his Monell claim is 'based upon conduct of the peace officer[s]' within the meaning of § 945.3. His claim was, thus, tolled while his attempted murder charge was pending."); Randall v. City of Philadelphia Law Dep't, 919 F.3d 196, 199 (3d Cir. 2019) ("Here, even after Pennsylvania dropped the charges against Randall, he remained detained. He argues that this detention was part of a continuing practice by the defendants. So, he says, his limitations period did not begin to run until his release on December 24, 2015. If that is right, then his suit was timely. . . . But the continuing-violation doctrine focuses on continuing acts, not effects. . . In other words, the doctrine relies on a defendant's continuing acts, not a plaintiff's continuing injury. Here, New Jersey and

Delaware County detained Randall past August 2015. But New Jersey and Delaware County are not defendants. No defendant detained Randall beyond August 2015. Nor does it matter that Randall's arrest and prosecution were but-for causes of his continued detention in New Jersey and Delaware County. Continued detention was an effect of his Philadelphia arrest and prosecution, not an act (or omission in the face of a duty to act) by any defendant. And he has not alleged that the defendants somehow enrolled New Jersey or Delaware County as their agents in detaining him. So that detention did not trigger the continuing-violation doctrine. To be clear, our holding is about the timeliness of Randall's case, not its merits. For the continuing-violation doctrine is a timeliness rule, not a merits rule. His continued detention could be relevant to liability or damages; we need not decide that. But it has no bearing on his suit's timeliness."); Battle v. Ledford, 912 F.3d 708, 715-20 (4th Cir. 2019) ("Virginia law provides an elaborate administrative grievance process for prisoner complaints. Exhaustion of this remedy involves at least three levels of review. . . A prisoner has 30 days to submit a formal grievance, and corrections administrators are then given another 180 days to resolve the grievance. . . Given this structure, Virginia's no-tolling rule, as applied to prisoners seeking to bring § 1983 claims, frustrates the goals of § 1983 and is thus clearly 'inconsistent' with settled federal policy. . . First, application of the no-tolling rule would frustrate the purpose of compensating prisoners who have sustained constitutional injuries. Under Virginia regulations — as implemented by state officials — as much as seven months could be subtracted from the period in which a prisoner can file a federal claim. This inevitable and indeterminate reduction in limitations would be wholly contingent on the efficiency of administrators and the complexity of the case. And as other circuits have noted and common sense suggests, a state's grievance process may extend beyond the state's regulatory deadlines. . . . Application of a no-tolling rule here would also fail to serve § 1983's second primary goal — deterrence. Instead, this rule would enable state officials to shrink a prisoner's filing window and so limit his opportunity to bring a claim. In this way, a no-tolling rule would even create perverse incentives for prison commissioners to extend regulatory deadlines and for wardens and investigators to stall in their review of individual grievances, for doing so might limit government officials' legal exposure. . . . In sum, because Virginia's no-tolling rule is inconsistent with federal law and policy, we cannot apply it here. . .Notwithstanding this analysis, the officers contend that Virginia's no-tolling rule necessarily comports with federal policies because a separate federal law — the PLRA — imposes the relevant exhaustion requirement. But by enacting the PLRA, Congress did not endorse such a no-tolling rule or diminish the interests underlying § 1983. To so conclude would be to overread the PLRA's silence on tolling, misread the PLRA's purpose, and ignore the text of § 1983 and § 1988. . . . Because we hold that Virginia's no-tolling rule is inconsistent with § 1983, we must determine a proper remedy. Battle asks that we apply federal equitable tolling principles to account for the time lost during his 83-day mandatory exhaustion period. We agree with Battle (and our sister circuits) that those principles apply during this period. . . . [E]very circuit that has confronted a state no-tolling rule and reached this question has applied federal law to equitably toll § 1983 limitations during the PLRA exhaustion period. [citing cases from seven other circuits] . . . . [T]he inquiry here is objective. All a court must do is determine the point of exhaustion and run the limitations period from that date. We therefore reject the officers' invitation to deviate from the path followed by seven other circuits. Battle's limitations period must be tolled for the 83 days in which he exhausted his administrative remedies, as he was required to do before bringing suit. This satisfies the goals of § 1983 and the PLRA while also comporting with principles of equity: it gives Battle the benefit of the full limitations period applicable to other litigants, no more and no less. In sum, Battle's § 1983 complaint is timely; it was filed within two years of the date he exhausted administrative remedies required by the PLRA."); Spak v. Phillips, 857 F.3d 458, 462-66 (2d Cir. 2017) ("The fact that the accrual of Section 1983 claims is analyzed under federal common law, while the merits of those claims are analyzed under the law of the state where the tort occurred, has led to some confusion concerning the standards used to define a 'favorable termination' in the malicious prosecution context. This is because a malicious prosecution claim accrues when the underlying prosecution terminates in favor of the accused, id., but 'favorable termination' is also a substantive element of a state law tort claim, see, e.g., Singleton v. City of New York, 632 F.2d 185, 193 (2d Cir. 1980). While the same phrase—'favorable termination'—is used in both the accrual analysis and the merits analysis of a Section 1983 suit, it is analyzed under a different legal standard in each context. When the question before a federal court is at what point a malicious prosecution claim accrued, 'favorable termination' is analyzed under federal common law, because the timing of accrual is a question of federal law. See, e.g., Wallace, 549 U.S. at 388. When, by contrast, a federal court is analyzing the substantive merits of a plaintiff's claim, the definition of 'favorable termination' is analyzed under state law. . . What constitutes a 'favorable termination' may turn out to be the same in each context, but not necessarily so. However, even if 'favorable termination' in a particular case is unclear as a matter of state law, it can still be conclusively resolved as a matter of claim accrual under federal law. Thus, the fact that a nolle prosequi constitutes a favorable termination under Connecticut state law may be relevant to our accrual inquiry, but it is not dispositive. Unless a nolle also constitutes a 'favorable termination' under federal common law, then Spak's claim did not accrue for Section 1983 purposes upon entry of the nolle. . . . Under Connecticut law, a prosecutor may decline to prosecute a case by entering a nolle prosequi. . . The effect of a nolle is to terminate a particular prosecution against the defendant. However, a nolle prosequi is not the equivalent of a dismissal of a criminal prosecution with prejudice, because jeopardy does not attach. . . The statute of limitations on the nolled charge continues to run, and the prosecutor may choose to initiate a second prosecution at any time before the limitations period expires. . . A prosecution can only be reinstituted following a nolle, however, by the filing of a new charging document and a new arrest. . . If a new prosecution is not commenced, Connecticut law requires that within thirteen months of the nolle 'all police and court records and records of the state's or prosecuting attorney' related to the prosecution be erased. . . .We agree with the district court that as a general matter a nolle prosequi constitutes a 'favorable termination' for the purpose of determining when a Section 1983 claim accrues. . .The weight of authority on the common law of malicious prosecution supports this conclusion. . . . We agree with the district court that as a general matter a nolle prosequi constitutes a 'favorable termination' for the purpose of determining when a Section 1983 claim accrues. . . The weight of authority on the common law of malicious prosecution supports this conclusion. . . .To be sure, courts and common law authorities state that a nolle does not constitute a favorable termination when it is entered for reasons that are 'not indicative of the defendant's innocence.'. . However, this qualifier is defined narrowly. It generally only includes nolles that are caused by the defendant—either by his fleeing the jurisdiction to make himself unavailable for trial or delaying a trial by means of fraud. It also includes any nolle entered in exchange for consideration offered by the defendant (e.g., cooperation). . . Spak disputes this conclusion, and cites our decision in Murphy v. Lynn which states that the termination of a prosecution must be 'conclusive[ ]' in order to satisfy the favorable termination requirement of a Section 1983 claim. . . Murphy involved a malicious prosecution claim originating in New York, while Spak's claim accrued in Connecticut, but it is nonetheless relevant because favorable termination for accrual purposes is a matter of federal law which does not vary from state to state. Spak contends that a nolle prosequi is not a 'conclusive' termination of a prosecution because jeopardy does not attach when a nolle is entered and the prosecuting attorney may file new charges against the same defendant for the same criminal act at any time before the statute of limitations on the underlying crime has run. This argument misreads our holding in Murphy. It is true that, strictly speaking, a nolle prosequi only terminates a specific prosecution by vacating a charging instrument; it does not prevent a prosecutor from re-charging the same defendant for the same criminal conduct at some point in the future. . . Under the common law, however, a termination of the existing prosecution is sufficient for a malicious prosecution claim to accrue. . . So long as a particular prosecution has been 'conclusively' terminated in favor of the accused, such that the underlying indictment or criminal information has been vacated and cannot be revived, then the plaintiff has a justiciable claim for malicious prosecution. At that point, all of the issues relevant to the claim—such as malice and lack of probable cause . . . are ripe for adjudication. Nothing in our opinion in Murphy can be read to contravene this longstanding common law rule. We are mindful that both our court, see DiBlasio v. City of New York, 102 F.3d 654, 658 (2d Cir. 1996), and the Supreme Court have warned against the possibility of parallel civil and criminal litigation arising from the state's prosecution of the same defendant for the same criminal offense[.] [citing Heck] However, we read our precedent and the Supreme Court's dicta in Heck v. Humphrey to counsel only against duplicative litigation on issues of guilt and probable cause arising out of the same accusatory instrument. . . Heck and its progeny generally deal with Section 1983 suits that are filed by plaintiffs asserting that a prior criminal conviction is invalid, and seeking to recover damages for the state's abuse of legal process. Those decisions thus require that the plaintiff demonstrate that the outstanding conviction has been conclusively invalidated in a manner that demonstrates his innocence before he can pursue his civil claim. . . They do not address the type of termination at issue here, in which a plaintiff was never convicted of a criminal offense, but the charges against him were dismissed in a manner that did not preclude future prosecution under a different charging instrument. We do not read those opinions to prevent such a plaintiff from bringing suit on the basis of vacated charges simply because he might be prosecuted again in the future, even successfully. . . Indeed, while it is theoretically possible that a prosecutor could revive a nolled case, and obtain a criminal conviction against a defendant who has already received a favorable civil judgment in a malicious prosecution suit, we think that this is highly unlikely to occur in practice. . .Moreover, preventing plaintiffs from bringing suit for malicious prosecution once a nolle is entered would be inconsistent with the purpose of Section 1983. . . When the state institutes criminal charges maliciously and without probable cause and requires a defendant to appear before a court and answer those charges, it violates the Fourth Amendment's guarantee against unlawful seizure. . .The accused is entitled to seek recovery for such a wrongful seizure as soon as the charges are vacated. His day in court should not be delayed merely because the state remains free to bring a similar prosecution in the future. Lastly, Spak's contention that his claim accrued not upon entry of the nolle, but thirteen months later when records of the charges against him were automatically erased pursuant to Connecticut state law, see Conn. Gen. Stat. § 54-142a(c)(1), is meritless. Connecticut courts have made clear that the erasure provision Spak cites is a purely administrative measure. . . . Moreover, the erasure of records pertaining to a prosecution does not preclude the prosecuting attorney from filing new charges against the same defendant at some point in the future. . . This statute therefore provides no more 'conclusive' bar to future criminal proceedings than the nolle itself."); Rapp v. Putman, 644 F. App'x 621, 626 (6th Cir. 2016) ("The district court erred in identifying the applicable statute of limitations for plaintiff's Fourth Amendment malicious-prosecution claim. The district court relied on the two-year statute of limitations for state-law malicious prosecution claims, M.C.L. § 600 .5805(5). But plaintiff's malicious-prosecution claim is based on the Fourth Amendment and § 1983, not state law. Ever since Wilson v. Garcia, 471 U.S. 261 (1985), courts apply a single statute of limitations for all § 1983 claims arising in a particular state. In Michigan, it is the three-year statute of limitations for personal-injury claims. Carroll, 782 F.2d at 44; M.C.L. § 600.5805(10). Thus, the district court should have applied a three-year statute of limitations, not a two-year one. Even under defendants' preferred accrual date—July 27, 2012, when plaintiff's conviction was reversed—plaintiff's November 11, 2014, complaint was filed within three years of that date. Thus, the district court erred in holding that plaintiff's Fourth Amendment malicious-prosecution claim is time-barred."); Bradford v. Scherschligt, 803 F.3d 382, 387-89 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Here, Bradford alleges a violation of his due process rights based on the initiation of criminal charges that were based on allegedly fabricated evidence. The constitutional violation and resultant injury thus began on the date that the State brought charges against Bradford. Yet, unlike Jackson, in which the date of vacatur was the date on which the government could no longer use the unlawful evidence against the plaintiff, or Rosales–Martinez, in which the date of vacatur was also the date on which all charges were conclusively resolved, Bradford's conviction was vacated in a manner that specifically permitted the pursuit of the same charges against him based on the same evidence. . . The inquiry here is therefore not as simple as merely identifying the onset date of injury. Indeed, the limitations period 'on common-law torts do[es] not always begin on the date that a plaintiff knows or has reason to know of his injury.'. . To determine the proper date of accrual, we look to the common law tort most analogous to Bradford's claim. . . As we have explained, the right at issue in a Devereaux claim is the right to 'be free from [criminal] charges' based on a claim of deliberately fabricated evidence. . . In this regard, it is similar to the tort of malicious prosecution, which involves the right to be free from the use of legal process that is motivated by malice and unsupported by probable cause. . .In a recent case, the Fourth Circuit provided a helpful analysis of the accrual rules for malicious prosecution claims. . . There, the Fourth Circuit was tasked with determining when a certain Brady-based § 1983 claim had accrued. . . The court first recognized that under Wallace, a court evaluates the proper accrual date for a claim by identifying the common law analogue for the § 1983 claim and applying any 'distinctive' accrual rules associated with that common law analogue. . . Likening it to a malicious prosecution claim, the court held that the § views expressed by our sister circuits, we conclude that a prisoner may allege a continuing violation under Section 1983 by identifying a series of acts or omissions that demonstrate deliberate indifference to a serious, ongoing medical need. The statute of limitations does not begin to run on such a claim for a continuing violation of a prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights until the date, if any, on which adequate treatment was provided. . . A plaintiff's claim of a continuing violation may extend back to the time at which the prison officials first learned of the serious medical need and unreasonably failed to act. . . Accordingly, to assert a Section 1983 claim for deliberate indifference under the 'continuing violation' doctrine, a plaintiff must (1) identify a series of acts or omissions that demonstrate deliberate indifference to his serious medical need(s); and (2) place one or more of these acts or omissions within the applicable statute of limitations for personal injury. . . Thus, this principle does not apply to claims that are based on 'discrete acts of unconstitutional conduct,' or those that fail to identify acts or omissions within the statutory limitation period that are a component of the deliberate indifference claim. . .In the present case, DePaola has alleged a continuing violation of deliberate indifference to his serious mental illnesses. He alleges that he notified VDOC of his mental illnesses during the prison intake process and 'repeatedly' sought 'help' from officials and medical staff at Red Onion. He asserts that despite this notice to the defendants, and given the ongoing nature of his mental illnesses, the defendants have violated and 'continue to' violate his rights by failing to provide any treatment or access to a psychiatrist or a psychologist.")

1983 claim had accrued when prosecutors entered a nolle prosequi rather than the date on which the court had originally granted the plaintiff a new trial. . . The court noted that a malicious prosecution claim does not accrue until the proceedings against the plaintiff have 'terminated "in such manner that [they] cannot be revived."'. . We find this reasoning persuasive. Setting the accrual date for Bradford's Devereaux claim as the date of acquittal is logical. If Bradford's original 1996 trial had resulted in an acquittal, his Devereaux claim would have accrued on the date the charges against him were dismissed. . . The analysis is the same in the retrial setting where, as here, the government pursues the same charges based on the same evidence after the vacatur of the original conviction. In this instance, setting the triggering date for the onset of the limitations period as the date of acquittal also makes practical sense. Had Bradford brought his claims immediately after his conviction was vacated, Detective Scherschligt would almost certainly have moved to stay proceedings on the grounds that a retrial was imminent and that a conviction would produce a Heck bar against Bradford's claims. . . Thus, Detective Scherschligt would not only not be prejudiced by a delay in reaching the merits, he might well have benefitted from it. We recognize, however, that the result may be different under other factual circumstances. For example, a similar claim could accrue upon vacatur of a conviction if the conviction was set aside in a manner precluding the government from maintaining charges on evidence presented at the initial trial. . . But in this case, Bradford remained subject to the very same charges based on the same evidence, which forms the basis of his claim, until his February 10, 2010, acquittal. His claim seeking to vindicate his right to be free from those criminal charges based on the allegedly fabricated evidence did not accrue until the charges were fully and finally resolved and could no longer be brought against him. . . We therefore conclude that Bradford filed the underlying action within the three-year statute of limitations period, and it was error to dismiss his deliberate fabrication of evidence claim as time-barred."); Woods v. Illinois Dept. of Children and Family Services, 710 F.3d 762, 768, 769 (7th Cir. 2013) ("To sum up, we reiterate our holding that the limitations period applicable to all § 1983 claims brought in Illinois is two years, as provided in 735 ILCS 5/13–202, and this includes § 1983 claims involving allegations of failure to protect from childhood sexual abuse . . . . Woods filed his complaint long after the limitations period had expired, and so it was properly dismissed. His arguments for applying a different limitations period are foreclosed by Supreme Court and circuit precedent, and there is nothing that can be achieved from an evidentiary hearing."); Mata v. Anderson, 635 F.3d 1250, 1252, 1253 (10th Cir. 2011) ("We reject Mr. Mata's argument that his First Amendment retaliatory-prosecution claim did not accrue until the charges against him were dismissed. We note that a § 1983 malicious prosecution claim, which requires favorable termination as an element, does not accrue until the alleged malicious prosecution terminates in favor of the plaintiff. Wilkins v. DeReyes, 528 F .3d 790, 801 n. 6 (10th Cir.2008) (citing Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477, 484-86 (1994)). Unlike a malicious prosecution claim, however, a First Amendment retaliatory-prosecution claim does not require a favorable termination of the underlying action. . . . Mr. Mata's First Amendment retaliatory-prosecution claims accrued when he knew or had reason to know of the alleged retaliatory prosecution[.]").

D. No Respondeat Superior Liability

In Monell v. Dept. of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658, 690-91 (1978), the Supreme Court overruled Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167 (1961), to the extent that Monroe had held that local governments could not be sued as "persons" under § 1983. Monell holds that local governments may be sued for damages, as well as declaratory and injunctive relief, whenever > the action that is alleged to be unconstitutional implements or executes a policy statement, ordinance, regulation, or decision officially adopted and promulgated by that body's officers. Moreover. . . local governments . . . may be sued for constitutional deprivations visited pursuant to governmental 'custom' even though such a custom has not received formal approval through the body's decisionmaking channels.

Monell rejects government liability based on the doctrine of respondeat superior. Thus, a government body cannot be held liable under § 1983 merely because it employs a tortfeasor. 436 U.S. at 691-92. But see United States v. Town of Colorado City, 935 F.3d 804, 808-11 (9th Cir. 2019) ("Colorado City argues that the district court erred by construing the statute as imposing liability on governments for patterns of constitutional violations committed by their officers and agents. It asserts that § 12601 requires the United States to demonstrate that the Towns 'instituted an official municipal policy' of violating residents' constitutional rights. The United States, on the other hand, contends that the statute 'imposes liability on municipalities for patterns of constitutional violations [that] their law enforcement officers commit, without requiring an additional showing that the municipality's policy or custom caused those violations.' This issue—whether § 12601 imposes respondeat superior liability[3]—is one of first impression in our circuit. . . Colorado City relies on the premise that, by including 'pattern or practice' in § 12601, Congress used 'language with a well-defined meaning [ ] developed under [Monell v. Department of Social Services. . . for municipal liability.' That contention, however, confuses the relationship between general liability rules in civil rights statutes and the Supreme Court's decision in Monell. '[T]he general rule regarding actions under civil rights statutes is that respondeat superior applies.'. . In Monell, the Court carved out an exception to this general rule by holding that a municipality may not be held liable pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for the actions of its subordinates. Instead, to establish municipal liability, a plaintiff must show that a local government's 'policy or custom' led to the plaintiff's injury. . . In reaching its holding, the Court relied on 'the language of § 1983, read against the background of the [statute's] legislative history.'. . Because § 1983 imposes liability only where a state actor, 'under color of some official policy, "causes" an employee to violate another's constitutional rights,' the Court reasoned that Congress did not intend to impose vicarious liability on municipalities 'solely on the basis of the existence of an employer-employee relationship with a tortfeasor.'. . Moreover, in the Civil Rights Act of 1871—the predecessor statute to § 1983—Congress did not intend municipalities to be held liable unless action pursuant to official municipal policy of some nature caused a constitutional tort.'. .Monell's holding remains the exception to the general rule. . . We have declined to bar respondeat superior liability in other contexts. In Bonner, for example, we held that respondeat superior liability applies to claims pursuant to § 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 because '[t]he application of respondeat superior ... [is] entirely consistent with the policy of that statute, which is to eliminate discrimination against the handicapped.'. . And, in Duvall v. County of Kitsap, we held that respondeat superior liability applies to claims brought pursuant to Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12132. . . We likewise decline to extend Monell's holding to claims pursuant to § 12601. . . . First, § 12601, unlike § 1983, does not include the words 'under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom or usage.' That difference is important because, by including 'custom' in § 1983, Congress expressly contemplated imposing liability on actors who violated constitutional rights under an official policy. The absence of that language from § 12601, therefore, suggests that Congress did not intend to limit liability to those acting under an official law or policy. Instead, the plain text of § 12601 shows that any government agent who engages in a pattern or practice of conduct that deprives persons of their constitutional rights violates § 12601. Second, § 12601 does not limit liability to those who 'cause [citizens or persons] to be subjected' to a deprivation of their constitutional rights. The Monell Court interpreted that language, which appears in § 1983, as imposing liability 'on a government that, under color of some official policy, "causes" an employee to violate another's constitutional rights.'. . The lack of that causal phrase in § 12601 suggests that Congress did not intend to limit local governments' liability to situations when 'the action that is alleged to be unconstitutional implements or executes a policy statement, ordinance, regulation, or decision officially adopted and promulgated by that body's officers.'. . Taken together, these statutory clues persuade us that Congress intended to allow for respondeat superior liability against local governments pursuant to § 12601. In arguing that the statutory text supports its position, Colorado City relies on the fact that the phrase 'pattern or practice' appears in both § 1983 and § 12601. That phrase, it claims, 'refers to the same language necessary to show a "custom" under Monell.' We acknowledge that Congress used 'pattern or practice in both statutes, and are mindful that '[a] basic principle of interpretation is that courts ought to interpret similar language in the same way, unless context indicates that they should do otherwise.'. . That principle, however, does not necessarily support Colorado City's argument, for Congress has also used pattern or practice' literally, rather than as a term of art, in several statutes. . . Under those statutes, the United States must demonstrate only that the conduct alleged 'was not an isolated or accidental or peculiar event.'. . It need not show the existence of an official policy or custom. For this reason, Congress's use of 'pattern or practice' in § 12601 does not support the weight that Colorado City wishes to place upon it. Congress could have used the phrase to refer to an official policy or custom, as in § 1983, but it also could have used the phrase to refer to a regular event, as in the statutes cited above. Our interpretation of the statute aligns with our recognition that although '[§] 12601 shares important similarities with § 1983[,] .... the language of § 12601 goes even further than § 1983.'. . Had Congress wished to eliminate respondeat superior liability under § 12601, it could have easily done so with explicit statutory language. . . Its decision not to do so suggests that it intended for § 12601, like most civil rights statutes, to allow for respondeat superior liability. . . . Section 12601 provides a civil cause of action to the United States Attorney General when a local government's agents 'engage in a pattern or practice of conduct ... that deprives persons of rights, privileges, or immunities secured or protected by the Constitution or laws of the United States.'. . Because the statutory language does not demonstrate that Congress intended to exclude local governments from respondeat superior liability, we hold that § 12601 imposes liability based on general agency principles. Accordingly, the district court did not err in its construction of § 12601.")

The rationale of Monell has been mechanically applied to private corporations sued under section 1983. See, e.g., Coleman v. Hamilton County Board of County Commissioners, No. 24-3453, 2025 WL 732840, at *7 (6th Cir. Mar. 7, 2025) ("§ 1983 plaintiffs cannot hold private companies like NaphCare vicariously liable for the acts of their employees. See Savoie v. Martin, 673 F.3d 488, 494 (6th Cir. 2012). Instead, plaintiffs must show that their injuries arose out of a private company's policy or custom (such as its failure to train its employees)."); Martinez v. Nueces County, Texas, 71 F.4th 385, 391-92 (5th Cir. 2023) ("We read Martinez's proposed amended complaint as alleging that Wellpath, as a state actor, had a pattern or policy of deliberate indifference as to adequate medical care, and that policy was the moving force behind a deprivation of Martinez's constitutional rights that led to his injury. Assuming, without deciding, that a nationwide corporation such as Wellpath can be sued as a municipality, . . .we proceed to the merits. As with his claim against Nueces County, Martinez must show the existence of a policy or custom that was the moving force behind the violation of his constitutional rights. . . Martinez has alleged a custom or policy of deliberate indifference. Again, he can show this via a pattern that has 'occurred for so long or so frequently that the course of conduct warrants the attribution to the governing body of knowledge that the objectionable conduct is the expected, accepted practice of [Wellpath's] employees.'. . And again, there is not enough detail in Martinez's complaint to clear this bar. . . .Wellpath is a nationwide company that operates in jails and other institutions across the country. Plaintiff's own exhibits state that the company operates in more than 500 facilities in 34 states and is responsible for around 300,000 people in custody every day. . . The complaint does not allege a single instance of medical negligence (aside from his own) that occurred in Nueces County and that was caused by Wellpath. . . In fact, it is unclear from the face of the complaint what exact role Wellpath even played at Nueces County. True, a plaintiff is not required to identify the precise policymaker to make out a Monell claim. . . But he is required to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face,'. . . and from the face of Martinez's pleadings, there is no reason to conclude that Wellpath, at an organization-wide level, had a policy of deliberate indifference that was the moving force of Martinez's alleged constitutional violation at the Nueces County Jail."); Roy v. For a thoughtful and refreshing opinion questioning the application of Monell to private corporations, see Shields v. Illinois Dept. of Corrections, 746 F.3d 782, 785, 786, 789-92, 795-96 (7th Cir. 2014), cert. denied, 135 S. Ct. 1024 (2015) (Hamilton, J., joined by Posner, J., with Tinder, J., concurring) ("This case illustrates the often arbitrary gaps in the legal remedies under § 1983 for violations of federal constitutional rights. Viewing the evidence through the lens of summary judgment, we can and must assume that Shields is the victim of serious institutional neglect of, and perhaps deliberate indifference to, his serious medical needs. The problem he faces is that the remedial system that has been built upon § 1983 by case law focuses primarily on individual responsibility. Under controlling law, as a practical matter, Shields must come forward with evidence that one or more specific human beings acted with deliberate indifference toward his medical needs. Shields has not been able to do so. The Illinois Department of Corrections and its medical services contractor, Wexford, diffused responsibility for Shields' medical care so widely that Shields has been unable to identify a particular person who was responsible for seeing that he was treated in a timely and appropriate way. Several of the individual defendants employed by Wexford were aware of portions of Shields' course of treatment, but no one person was responsible for ensuring that Shields received the medical attention he needed. No one doctor knew enough that a jury could find that he both appreciated and consciously disregarded Shields' need for prompt surgery. The problem Shields faces also raises a serious question about how we should evaluate the responsibility of a private corporation like Wexford for violations of constitutional rights. The question is whether a private corporation should be able to take advantage of the holding of Monell v. Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658 (1978), which requires a plaintiff suing a local government under § 1983 to show that the violation of his constitutional rights was caused by a government policy, practice, or custom. Our prior cases hold, but without persuasive explanations, that the Monell standard extends from local governments to private corporations. As we explain below, however, that conclusion is not self-evident. We may need to reconsider it if and when we are asked to do so. As state and local governments expand the privatization of government functions, the importance of the question is growing. Given the state of the controlling law, though, we must ultimately affirm the summary judgment for all defendants on the constitutional claims. . . . We consider first the claim against the Wexford corporation itself. The question posed here is how § 1983 should be applied to a private corporation that has contracted to provide essential government services—in this case, health care for prisoners. The answer under controlling precedents of this court is clear. Such a private corporation cannot be held liable under § 1983 unless the constitutional violation was caused by an unconstitutional policy or custom of the corporation itself. Respondeat superior liability does not apply to private corporations under § 1983. E.g., Iskander v. Village of Forest Park, 690 F.2d 126, 128 (7th Cir.1982). Because Shields has no evidence of an unconstitutional policy or custom of Wexford itself, these precedents doom his claim against the corporation. For reasons we explain below, however, Iskander and our cases following it on this point deserve fresh consideration, though it would take a decision by this court sitting en banc or pursuant to Circuit Rule 40(e), or a decision by the Supreme Court to overrule those decisions. We start with the background of § 1983 and the Supreme Court cases relevant to the issue, then turn to circuit court decisions, and finally discuss reasons to question those circuit decisions and adopt a different approach for private corporations. . . . A close look at the reasoning of Monell provides no persuasive reason to extend its holding to private corporations. Monell gave two reasons for barring respondeat superior liability for municipalities under § 1983. First, the Court focused on the language of § 1983, which imposes liability on a person who 'shall subject, or cause to be subjected,' any person to a deprivation of Constitutional rights . . . .Second, the Court concluded that the legislative history of the Civil Rights Act of 1871 showed that Congress did not intend to impose respondeat superior liability on municipalities. . . . The rejection of respondeat superior liability for municipalities in Monell has been the subject of extensive analysis and criticism. . . . Perhaps the most important criticism to emerge from this literature is that Monell failed to grapple with the fact that respondeat superior liability for employers was a settled feature of American law that was familiar to Congress in 1871, when § 1983 was enacted. Congress therefore enacted § 1983 against the backdrop of respondeat superior liability, and presumably assumed that courts would apply it in claims against corporations under § 1983. . . .The Court's reliance on the Sherman Amendment is also problematic. The rejection of the proposal to hold municipalities liable for actions of private citizens it could not control says little about whether a municipality should be held liable for constitutional torts committed by its own employees acting within the scope of their employment. . . . Given these flaws on the surface of its reasoning, Monell is probably best understood as simply having crafted a compromise rule that protected the budgets of local governments from automatic liability for their employees' wrongs, driven by a concern about public budgets and the potential extent of taxpayer liability. Of course, the critiques of Monell's rejection of respondeat superior liability for municipalities have not yet persuaded the Supreme Court to reconsider that rule. Given our position in the judicial hierarchy, then, we are bound to follow Monell as far as municipal liability is concerned. We need not extend that holding, however, to the quite different context of private corporate defendants. [court proceeds to critically examine history, precedent, policy surrounding application of Monell to private corporations] For all of these reasons, a new approach may be needed for whether corporations should be insulated from respondeat superior liability under § 1983. Since prisons and prison medical services are increasingly being contracted out to private parties, reducing private employers' incentives to prevent their employees from violating inmates' constitutional rights raises serious concerns. Nothing in the Supreme Court's jurisprudence or the relevant circuit court decisions provides a sufficiently compelling reason to disregard the important policy considerations underpinning the doctrine of respondeat superior. And in a world of increasingly privatized state services, the doctrine could help to protect people from tortious deprivations of their constitutional rights. . . . The facts in this case are . . . an excellent example of the problems generated by barring respondeat superior liability for corporations under § 1983. On the facts before us, it appears that Wexford structured its affairs so that no one person was responsible for Shields' care, making it impossible for him to pin responsibility on an individual. If respondeat superior liability were available, Wexford could not escape liability by diffusing responsibility across its employees, and prisoners would be better protected from violations of their constitutional rights. In view of these considerations, we have considered the possibility of circulating an opinion overruling Iskander and its progeny on this point for consideration by the entire court under Circuit Rule 40(e). Since Shields has not asked us to overrule those cases and Wexford has not had occasion to brief the issue, we have decided not to take that approach. A petition for rehearing en banc would provide an opportunity for both sides to be heard on this issue, and our decision is of course subject to review on certiorari. For now, this circuit's case law still extends Monell from municipalities to private corporations."). See also Moore v. Putnal* . . . prevents Plaintiffs from holding them vicariously liable under § 1983. Plaintiffs chose not to respond to this argument in their opposition. . . Rather, they argued only that they could hold the Corporate Defendants vicariously liable for their state-law claims for excessive force and failure to provide medical care. We do not consider arguments 'raised for the first time on appeal.'. . Therefore, we leave for another day whether plaintiffs can hold private defendants vicariously liable under § 1983.")

The court is sympathetic to Plaintiffs' request. In addition to the problems that the Seventh Circuit aptly identified in Shields, this case illustrates another kind of problem that arises from Iskander's holding. Often, as may ultimately be the case here, there will be no individual 'final policymaker' or 'final policy decision' by the private corporation. Rather, the authority to determine the private entity's policies and procedures will be divided among the private corporation and the relevant government agency or agencies. This case for example, presents much more complicated relationships between governmental and private entities than the Seventh Circuit considered in Shields. Here, the Public Building Commission (a municipal entity), hired MBRE (a private company) to manage the public building. MBRE in turn contracted with SMI, which was purchased by Securitas, and which itself employs subcontractors (for example, Waters is an employee of Star Detective Agency, a Securitas subcontractor. . . In addition to the diffuse responsibilities within an organization–as the Court of Appeals noted in Shields – these complex relationships spread responsibility across public and private entities. In this case, for example, Coleman explained that several people were involved in updating the Post Orders. . .. This divided and overlapping authority presents difficult questions regarding causation and complicates the task of identifying who, if anyone, has final 'policymaking' authority within the meaning of Monell. As the Appellate Court recognized in Shields, these legal standards simultaneously encourage government agencies to delegate responsibility to private corporations and encourage those private corporations to structure their operations to evade liability. . . . While the court is sympathetic to Plaintiffs' request, it remains bound by the holding in Iskander. After Shields, the Seventh Circuit revisited the question of permitting respondeat superior liability for private entities in § 1983 actions, but once again demurred because the plaintiffs had not preserved the question at the district court. . . Stated differently, Plaintiff claims that Primecare is responsible, on the basis of respondeat superior liability, for the deliberate indifference of its employees towards Plaintiff's serious medical needs. Primecare has argued that it cannot be held liable under a theory of respondeat superior liability because it is an independent contractor for a municipality and, as such, should enjoy protection from vicarious liability similar to that granted to municipalities in Monell . . . . Primecare cites to Natale v. Camden County Correctional Facility, 318 F.3d 575 (3d Cir.2003) and a variety of decisions from other Circuit Courts and District Courts, for the proposition that private corporations such as Primecare cannot be held liable under Section 1983 on the basis of respondeat superior. . . . The Court has analyzed this issue and reaches the following conclusions. First, the issue of whether immunity from respondeat superior liability under Section 1983 extends to private contractors was not one of the two issues presented to the Natale Court. . . . The language relied on by Primecare is therefore merely dicta. As such, there is currently no Third Circuit authority requiring a decision in favor of Primecare. Second, the Court finds that there is clear disagreement among the federal courts concerning this issue. Both parties have cited persuasive authority for different conclusions. . . . Third, even if Primecare is correct and a Monell-type immunity applies to it, an entity entitled to such immunity can still potentially be held liable under Section 1983 based on a theory of failure to train its employees, which Plaintiff alleges. . . At this stage, therefore, the Court is not prepared to conclude that Primecare is entitled to summary judgment on this claim."); Hutchison v. Brookshire Brothers, Ltd., 284 F.Supp.2d 459,472, 473 (E.D.Tex. 2003) ("The court now turns to the question of Brookshire Brothers' liability. Defendants' argue that, even if Plaintiff succeeds in proving concert of action between McCown and Shelton, Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim against Brookshire Brothers ought to be dismissed because '[o]bviously there is no respondeat superior for § 1983 purposes.'. . Where Defendants brush aside Plaintiff's claim in a single sentence, the court finds a more complicated issue. What is clear is that Defendants have cited the wrong precedent to support their statement of law. Collins v. City of Harker Heights stands for the proposition that a municipality (and not a private employer) generally 'is not vicariously liable under § 1983 for the constitutional torts of its agents.'. . .It is not so clear, however, that a private employer cannot be held vicariously liable under § 1983 when its employees act under color of law to deprive customers of constitutional rights. The court can find no case that supports this proposition, and the language of § 1983 does not lend itself to Defendants' reading. . . . Though the Supreme Court has stated that § 1983 'cannot be easily read to impose liability vicariously on governing bodies solely on the basis of the existence of an employer-employee relationship with a tortfeasor,' . . . the Court has made no similar statement regarding private employers. Indeed, there would be no textual basis for such a statement. Additionally, the court finds no persuasive policy justification for shielding private employers from vicarious liability. While the Supreme Court has found that Congress did not want to create a 'federal law of respondeat superior ' imposing liability in municipalities in the § 1983 context because of 'all the constitutional problems associated with the obligation to keep the peace,'. . . this court cannot find any similar concerns implicated in the private context. Imposing liability on private corporations affects neither the state's police power nor its ability to regulate its municipalities. Instead, allowing the imposition of vicarious liability would seem to keep Congress within its broad power to regulate interstate commerce. Thus, no significant federalism issues are raised when private employers are held liable for the constitutional torts of their employees. For these reasons, the court holds that neither Monell nor its progeny can be read to shield private corporations from vicarious liability when their employees have committed a § 1983 violation while acting within the scope of their employment. If Plaintiff can demonstrate that Shelton committed a Fourth Amendment violation in the course of his employment, Brookshire Brothers may be held liable. Such a violation would be 'within the scope of employment' if it were ' 'actuated, at least in part, by a purpose to serve the [employer],' even if it is forbidden by the employer.' . . The court infers that the scope of Shelton's responsibilities to Brookshire Brothers includes handling customer disputes and ensuring that customers pay for their gas; this may be reasonably inferred from Plaintiffs deposition testimony and Hill's statement that Plaintiff had to talk to her manager. . . Shelton's actions, as alleged by Plaintiff, allow the further inference that he was motivated at least in part by a desire to serve Brookshire Brothers. Though Shelton allegedly placed the siphoned gasoline into his own gas tank and collected no money for Brookshire Brothers, there is some evidence that Shelton first tried to collect on the alleged debt and resolve the dispute in favor of his employer. . .Thus Plaintiff has succeeded in demonstrating a genuine issue of material fact with regard to whether Shelton was acting within the scope of his employment. Defendants' motion for summary judgment is DENIED with respect to Brookshire Brothers on this claim."); Taylor v. Plousis, 101 F. Supp.2d 255, 263 & n.4 (D.N.J. 2000) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor the Third Circuit has yet determined whether a private corporation performing a municipal function is subject to the holding in Monell. However, the majority of courts to have considered the issue have determined that such a corporation may not be held vicariously liable under § 1983. [citing cases] . . . . Although the majority of courts to have reached this conclusion have done so with relatively little analysis, treating the proposition as if it were self-evident, the Court accepts the holdings of these cases as the established view of the law. However, there remains a lingering doubt whether the public policy considerations underlying the Supreme Court's decision in Monell should apply when a governmental entity chooses to discharge a public obligation by contract with a private corporation. . . . An argument can be made that voluntarily contracting to perform a government service should not free a corporation from the ordinary respondeat superior liability. A parallel argument involves claims of qualified immunity which often protect government officials charged with a constitutional violation. If a private corporation undertakes a public function, there is still state action, but individual employees of that corporation do not get qualified immunity. . . . The policy considerations which prompted the Supreme Court to reject qualified immunity for private prison guards are the same considerations which suggest that private corporations providing public services, such as prison medical care, should not be immune from respondeat superior liability under § 1983. In the context of a claim that the deprivation of medical care amounted to a constitutional violation, proof of such claim would almost certainly prove a case of ordinary state law malpractice where respondeat superior would apply. It seems odd that the more serious conduct necessary to prove a constitutional

To prevail on her claim, Miller must allege that the constitutional violation resulted from an 'unconstitutional policy or custom of the corporation itself.'. . Miller has not adequately alleged that her injuries were the result of Rodeway's 'official policy or custom.'. . Miller argues that Rodeway did not train its employees to refuse access to police officers requesting access to guests' rooms absent a search warrant, exigency, or consent. She labels this failure to train a policy. But liability attaches only where the corporation's policymakers make 'a deliberate choice to follow a course of action' from 'among various alternatives.'. . But courts in this district have allowed a private corporation to be liable for failing to train correctional officers on matters relating to the private corporation's responsibilities. . . Correctional officers would provide ACH employees with information about inmates' health, so ACH had a contractual interest in the officers' practice for obtaining and communicating that information. Indeed, there is evidence that correctional officers did give ACH employees information about inmates' medical conditions. . .There is enough evidence to create a dispute about whether correctional officers knew Piercy was vomiting blood, but failed to tell medical staff. Had they been adequately trained on how to use the protocols, Plaintiff contends, they would have known what to do about Piercy's bloody vomit—specifically, they would have known to contact the ACH medical providers. Assuming that ACH required jail officials to use these protocols (which the court must do on Defendants' summary judgment motion), Plaintiff claims that ACH did not train the officers on (1) when to consult the protocols that were intended to govern how the officers treated inmates when medical personnel were not present, and (2) how to reconcile allegedly conflicting protocols. Defendants claim that Plaintiff's argument that officers were not adequately trained about whether to consult the protocols at all is a 'red herring because the officers never consulted the protocols regarding Piercy.'. . ACH seems to argue that if the officers had consulted the protocols, then they would have called the provider . . . implying the fault lies, at most, with the officers, not ACH. But that is beside the point—when faced with an inmate who was vomiting blood, which the protocols clearly treat as a dire situation requiring immediate medical attention, officers did not consult them. The evidence of how much training officers received, moreover, is sufficiently vague that a reasonable jury could conclude that it was inadequate. Defendants also argue that more training on when to consult the protocols would not have 'affected the outcome' for Piercy. . . Defendants again try to distinguish Awalt, where the court concluded that there was sufficient evidence for a jury to find that the failure to give the officers general training about when to consult medical professionals caused an inmate's death, after officers did not alert medical staff that he was having a seizure. . . Here, contrary to Defendants' argument, the evidence of causation is even clearer: Defendants themselves acknowledge that if the officers had consulted the protocols, they probably would have alerted medical staff to Piercy's condition.")

The Supreme Court has resolved the question of whether Monell applies to claims for only declaratory or prospective relief. See Los Angeles County, Cal. v. Humphries, 131 S.Ct. 447, 451, 452 (2010) ("We conclude that Monell's holding applies to § 1983 claims against municipalities for prospective relief as well as to claims for damages. . . . The language of § 1983 read in light of Monell's understanding of the legislative history explains why claims for prospective relief, like claims for money damages, fall within the scope of the 'policy or custom' requirement. Nothing in the text of § 1983 suggests that the causation requirement contained in the statute should change with the form of relief sought. . . . Respondents further claim that, where prospective relief is at issue, Monell is redundant. They say that a court cannot grant prospective relief against a municipality unless the municipality's own conduct has caused the violation. Hence, where such relief is otherwise proper, the Monell requirement 'shouldn't screen out any case.'. . To argue that a requirement is necessarily satisfied, however, is not to argue that its satisfaction is unnecessary. If respondents are right, our holding may have limited practical significance. But that possibility does not provide us with a convincing reason to sow confusion by adopting a bifurcated relief-based approach to municipal liability that the Court has previously rejected. . . . For these reasons, we hold that Monell's 'policy or custom' requirement applies in § 1983 cases irrespective of whether the relief sought is monetary or prospective."). See also Snyder v. King, 745 F.3d 242, 250 (7th Cir. 2014) ("Both the parties and the district court spoke about the possibility of injunctive and declaratory relief against the County Defendants as though it were an issue totally distinct from whether Snyder adequately stated a Monell claim against those defendants. That was incorrect. The Supreme Court has squarely held that Monell's 'policy or custom' requirement applies in Section 1983 cases irrespective of whether the relief sought is monetary or prospective. Los Angeles Cnty., Cal. v. Humphries, 131 S.Ct. 447, 453–54 (2010). Snyder cannot obtain injunctive or declaratory relief against the County Defendants for the same reason he cannot obtain nominal damages: he has not adequately pleaded a suit against them. It is therefore unnecessary to consider whether any claim for injunctive relief is moot.").

Each of our sister circuits with jurisdiction over this question has disagreed. A majority of the active judges in our court voted to rehear this case en banc to reconsider our ruling that § 1981 provides an implied cause of action. Today, we join our sister circuits in holing that it does not. We vacate and remand this case to the district court with instructions to allow Hitoshi Yoshikawa to replead his § 1981 claim as a § 1983 claim, the proper vehicle for his claim of discriminatory enforcement of the City of Honolulu's building codes. . . . That Congress created an express cause of action against state actors in § 1983, but declined to do so in § 1981, bolsters our view. Accordingly, we overrule Federation. And to the extent that our precedents rely on Federation's reasoning or are otherwise inconsistent with our holding today, we overrule those decisions as well. Section 1981 establishes substantive rights that a state actor may violate. It does not itself contain a remedy against a state actor for such violations. A plaintiff seeking to enforce rights secured by § 1981 against a state actor must bring a cause of action under § 1983."); ; Felton v. This Court concludes that [42 U.S.C.] § 14141 is properly construed to similar effect. Its language does not unambiguously contemplate the possibility of vicarious liability and such legislative history as exists manifests a congressional intent to conform its substantive provisions to the standards of § 1983. . . . The Court therefore construes § 14141 to require the same level of proof as is required against municipalities and local governments in actions under § 1983.").

City of Fort Lauderdale, 11 F.4th 1266, 1276-83 (11th Cir. 2021) ("[T]he City argues that FLFNB, as an unincorporated association, is not a 'person' that may bring suit under § 1983. . . . There is some historical support for the City's reading, but this view stands in tension with the text's ordinary meaning, Supreme Court precedent, successive amendments to § 1983, and longstanding, settled practice. Absent clear direction from the Supreme Court, we decline the City's invitation to bar all unincorporated associations (other than unions) from being able to sue under § 1983. . . . Monell, Ngiraingas, and Will each interpreted the first use of the word 'person' in § 1983, which relates to which entities may be proper § 1983 defendants – '[e]very person' who under color of law causes a deprivation of federal rights shall be liable to the party injured. By contrast, today we interpret § 1983's second use of the word 'person' – 'any citizen or other person' -- a phrase that delineates which entities may be proper § 1983 plaintiffs. . . . In order to decide whether FLFNB has a cause of action in this case, we must determine whether 'other persons,' in addition to including non-citizen individuals and corporate entities, extends to unincorporated associations. . . . All told, historical context suggests that the word "person" as used in Section 1 of the 1871 Civil Rights Act did not extend to unincorporated associations. But this does not end the analysis, because we are not interpreting Section 1 of the 1871 Civil Rights Act. Instead, we must apply § 1983 of Title 42 of the United States Code as it exists today, that is, as thrice amended since its initial enactment in 1871. We must therefore account for any changes in the legal meaning of 'person' that may have informed Congress's decision to perpetuate that term across amended versions of § 1983. . . . [B]y the time of the 1979 and 1996 amendments to § 1983, federal law made it quite clear that unincorporated associations were 'persons' that could sue to enforce constitutional rights under § 1983. It is telling that against this backdrop, Congress did not choose to restrict the scope of the term 'person' when it re-enacted amended versions of § 1983. . . Whatever 'person' meant in 1871, its meaning included unincorporated associations by the time Congress 'perpetuated' the word 'person' in new versions of § 1983 in 1979 and 1996. . . Even setting these textual and historical considerations aside, Allee suggests that an unincorporated entity like FLFNB, just like the unincorporated union in that case, is a 'person' for § 1983 purposes. . . .[T]he Court concluded, without limiting its reasoning, that unincorporated unions were § 1983 'persons.'. . . In keeping with a broad reading of Allee, most federal courts to have confronted the question of whether a non-union unincorporated association is a 'person' under § 1983 have answered in the affirmative. [collecting cases] Moreover, there is a longstanding and robust practice of treating unincorporated associations as proper § 1983 plaintiffs as a matter of course. The Eleventh Circuit and an array of other courts have evaluated § 1983 claims brought by all manner of unincorporated associations seeking to vindicate a diverse array of constitutional interests -- including the Orlando and Santa Monica local Food Not Bombs chapters -- without even hinting that they lacked a § 1983 cause of action. [collecting cases] . . . . The Tenth Circuit, which holds that unincorporated associations cannot sue under § 1983, stands alone against the trend of treating unincorporated associations as 'persons.'. . . At bottom, in enacting § 1983, Congress 'intended to give a broad remedy for violations of federally protected civil rights.'. . . Absent some indication from the Supreme Court that unincorporated associations are not 'persons,' we decline the City's invitation to upset longstanding practice recognizing that unincorporated associations are 'persons' that may sue under § 1983. . . We hold that FLFNB is a person that may bring suit under § 1983."); Rural Water District No. 1 v. City of Wilson, 243 F.3d 1263, 1274 (10th Cir. 2001) (agreeing with Sixth Circuit in South Macomb and holding that water district, a quasi-municipality, could sue under § 1983 to enforce federal statutory rights).

E. Individual Capacity v. Official Capacity Suits

When a plaintiff names an official in his individual capacity, the plaintiff is seeking "to impose personal liability upon a government official for actions he takes under color of state law." Kentucky v. Graham, 473 U.S. 159, 165 (1985). See also Community House, Inc. v. City of Boise, Idaho, 623 F.3d 945, 966 (9th Cir. 2010) ("We simply cannot find anything in the record that suggests that either the parties or the district court appreciate the difference between personal and official capacity § 1983 lawsuits. When asked during oral argument about the capacities of the defendants, CHI's counsel could not recall what was in the complaint. Thus, it is an appropriate time to republish the Supreme Court's explanation of this important distinction.") [The court goes on to reference language from Kentucky v. Graham].

See also Rossy v. City of Buffalo, No. 23-7296-CV (L);, 2025 WL 816301, at *5 (2d Cir. Mar. 14, 2025)(not reported) ("A key distinction between official capacity and individual capacity Section 1983 claims is the availability of qualified immunity. '[B]ecause a claim asserted against a government official in his official capacity is essentially a claim against the governmental entity itself, the defense of qualified immunity, which may be available to individual defendants as they are sued in their individual capacities, is not applicable to claims against them in their official capacities.'. . . [I]f the district court correctly determined that no individual capacity claims under Section 1983 had been asserted in the complaint, then its qualified immunity analysis could not apply to the official capacity Section 1983 claims and that analysis would have been completely unnecessary. In other words, the district court's denial of summary judgment on the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment claims against Tedesco and Acquino on qualified immunity grounds is inconsistent with its later determination that the complaint did not contain any individual capacity claims. In light of this discrepancy, and because we would not need to reach the appeal of the denial of qualified immunity in the absence of an individual capacity Section 1983 claim, we exercise pendent jurisdiction in order to first determine whether the district court properly concluded that Plaintiff did not assert individual capacity claims against Tedesco and Acquino. . . .The district court concluded that 'Plaintiff sued the officers in only their official capacities as acting under the color of law, despite captioning the suit as against the officers "Individually and in their representative capacities."'. . In reaching that conclusion, the district court erroneously suggested that the allegation that the officers acted 'under the color of law' means that they could not have acted in their individual capacities. To the contrary, '[p]ersonal-capacity suits ... seek to impose individual liability upon a government officer for actions taken under color of state law,' Hafer v. Melo, 502 U.S. 21, 25 (1991) (emphasis added), precisely because the 'acts of officers in the ambit of their personal pursuits are plainly excluded' from Section 1983, Screws v. United States, 325 U.S. 91, 111 (1945). Here, the complaint clearly 'provided [Tedesco and Acquino] with sufficient notice of potential exposure to personal liability.'. . Not only did the complaint explicitly state that Plaintiff 'sues all defendants in both their individual and official capacities,'. . . it also sought punitive damages, 'which are only available in individual capacity suits,'. . . and it alleged facts sufficient to demonstrate that Tedesco and Acquino, 'acting under color of state law, caused the deprivation of a federal right[.]'. . Indeed, the district court determined that the 'color of state law' requirement had been 'met without dispute.'. . Moreover, Tedesco and Acquino never argued in the district court that they had not been sued in their individual capacity, and the fact that they moved for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds, which only applies to individual capacity claims, confirmed that they were on notice of the individual capacity claims in the complaint. In sum, the district court erred in concluding that Plaintiff failed to sue Tedesco and Acquino in their individual capacities."); Rashada v. Flegel, No. 23-1674, 2024 WL 1367436, at *3, *5 (6th Cir. Apr. 1, 2024) (not published) ("Rashada's complaint explicitly states that he is suing Flegel and Morgan in their official capacities. The form complaint contained a prompt asking '[o]fficial and/or personal capacity?', and Rashada responded 'suing official.'. . To be sure, as a pro se litigant, Rashada may not have known the import of the prompt on the form. Moreover, his response indicates that he may have meant to merely express that he was suing two individuals who are also officials in the correctional facility. Nevertheless, the ultimate inquiry we make when conducting the course of proceedings test is whether the defendants have sufficiently been put on notice that they will need to defend themselves in their individual capacity. . . . When a complaint specifically identifies that the plaintiff brings official capacity claims, defendants will not be on notice of an individual capacity claim against them. . . And, although this Court has stated in an unpublished opinion that '[t]o the extent doubt persists' in evaluating the factors for the course of proceedings test, 'this doubt should be resolved in' the pro se plaintiff's favor, Rashada's clear statement of capacity in his complaint does not leave room for doubt. . . Thus, the district court did not err in construing his complaint as asserted against Defendants in their official capacities. . . .In this case, the district court acknowledged that '[i]f Plaintiff had named Defendants in their personal capacities, [it] would not dismiss this matter on screening, as Plaintiff has stated a plausible Eighth Amendment excessive force claim.'. . That is, but for a procedural pleading deficiency in Rashada's pro se complaint, the district court would have found that he stated a claim for relief as to at least one of his claims. Ordinarily, a plaintiff would have the opportunity to cure such a procedural deficiency without court involvement. Indeed, had the deficiency been raised by Defendants in response to Rashada's complaint after having been served—or even if Rashada later discovered it on his own—he would have been entitled to amend his complaint 'once as a matter of course' within 21 days of serving it or 21 days after being served with a responsive pleading or motion to dismiss. . . We are aware of no authority suggesting that PLRA screening is meant to foreclose this normal operation of Rule 15. Given Rashada's pro se status in the district court and the highly technical nature of pleading official and personal capacity claims, in the 'interest of justice,' Rashada should be permitted to amend his complaint and pursue his claims against Defendants in their proper capacities."); Does v. The Hazens allege that they are suing the unnamed city and state officials in their 'official or individual capacity.' . . . That is a failing, the argument goes, because it affects how those officials must defend against the Hazens' claims: in an individual-capacity claim a defendant may assert the defense of qualified immunity, . . . while in an official-capacity claim the plaintiff must establish that a governmental 'policy or custom' was behind the alleged violation of federal law, see Hafer v. Melo, 502 U.S. 21, 25 (1991). That may (or may not) be a reason to dismiss a complaint as a shotgun pleading. A number of district courts in this Circuit have ruled that it is. Just as the City of Chattanooga cannot assert qualified immunity as a defense against an official-capacity suit, neither can Walsh, Nicholson, Hurn, or McKamey. . . . We note that in Bartell we permitted a non-profit entity to assert qualified immunity in a case where it was not specified whether the defendants were sued in their official or individual capacity. . . Because we previously permitted a corporate defendant to assert qualified immunity as a defense to an individual-capacity suit, . . . and because permitting an assertion of qualified immunity as a defense to an official-capacity suit would conflict with clear Supreme Court precedent, we presume that Bartell involved an assertion of qualified immunity only in the defendants' individual capacity. had a legally enforceable contract right. Thus, CMU as an entity filed the lawsuit against Kathleen in state court. Moreover, there is no evidence that any of the individual defendants participated in the decision to place a hold on Christopher's transcript. As with the filing of the lawsuit, it was CMU as an entity that held Christopher's transcript because of his outstanding tuition balance. Accordingly, President Ross, in his official capacity as a representative of CMU, is the only defendant against which the Benisons may proceed. Because public officials may not assert qualified immunity as a shield in their official capacities, no defendant has the capacity to claim qualified immunity as a defense. The former claim may attach personal liability to the government official, whereas the latter may attach liability only to the governmental entity. . . In other words, an official-capacity claim is merely another name for a claim against the municipality. . . Claims asserted against the municipality are not entitled to the qualified-immunity defense and, thus, such claims cannot be resolved on interlocutory appeal unless they are necessarily resolved by our qualified-immunity determination on the individual-capacity claims. . .In a case such as this, where the supervisor is also the policymaker, an individual-capacity claim may appear indistinguishable from an official-capacity or municipal claim, but these failure-to-train claims turn on two different legal principles.") The Eighth Circuit, sitting en banc, has jettisoned its "clear statement" test and joined the other circuits in adopting the "course of proceedings" test to determine the capacity in which an official is being sued when it is unclear from the language of the complaint. See S.A.A. v. Geisler, 127 F.4th 1133, 1136, 1138-39 (8th Cir. 2025) (en banc) ("S.A.A. petitioned for rehearing en banc so that we may reconsider our approach to determining the capacity in which a § 1983 defendant is sued when the complaint does not specify. Specifically, S.A.A. urges us to reject the clear statement rule in favor of the course of proceedings test used in all the other circuits. S.A.A. contends that, under the course of proceedings test, her claims should be construed as against Geisler in her individual capacity, so the grant of summary judgment should be reversed. . . . The clear statement rule conflicts with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, is in tension with Supreme Court decisions, and unwarrantedly sets us alone among the courts of appeals. For each of these reasons, we now reject the clear statement rule. . . . Faithfully applying Supreme Court precedent and the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, we join our sister circuits in rejecting the clear statement rule in favor of the course of proceedings test for determining the capacity in which a § 1983 defendant is sued. . . . Accordingly, the district court on remand should determine whether the course of proceedings indicates S.A.A.'s intent to sue Geisler in her individual capacity. . . Our sister circuits can offer helpful guidance. The fundamental question is whether the course of proceedings has put the defendant 'on notice that she was being sued in her individual capacity' and that 'her personal liability was at stake.'. . 'Throughout, the underlying inquiry remains whether the plaintiff's intention to hold a defendant personally liable can be ascertained fairly.'. . Relevant factors include, but are not limited to, how early in the litigation the plaintiff first specified individual capacity claims, whether the plaintiff's complaint included a prayer for punitive damages, and whether the defendant declined to raise a qualified immunity defense. . . The earlier that a plaintiff indicates that she intends to pursue individual capacity claims, the more compelling.")

Nonetheless, she maintains that she brought 'claims ... against Defendant Newton in his individual capacity and against the members of the Kansas City Board of Police Commissioners as a Monell style claim.'. . More specifically, she notes that she 'explicitly ma[de] a municipal liability claim' against the Board and 'ma[de] a claim against [Officer] Newton specifically for his actions alleged to have resulted in a Fourth Amendment violation.'. . She asks this court to liberally construe her amended complaint so that the counts against Officer Newton and the Board are not duplicative. She further points out that she 'explicitly ... requested leave to Amend in her Response [in Opposition to Officer Newton's Motion for Summary Judgment] to explicitly state it was an individual capacity claim.'. . . We agree with Nunley that Murphy resolves the Eleventh Amendment issue in this case. In his answer to Nunley's first amended complaint, Officer Newton asserted that the § 1983 'claim against [him] in his individual capacity [is] barred by qualified immunity.'. . He separately argued that the § 1983 claim 'against [him] in his official capacity is barred by 11th Amendment immunity.'. . Thus, Officer Newton had 'sufficient notice [he was] being sued in [his] personal capacit[y].'. . And, like the defendants in Murphy, it was not until Officer Newton filed his motion for summary judgment that he first argued that Nunley brought only official-capacity claims against him. . . In her response in opposition to the motion for summary judgment, Nunley requested leave to amend the complaint, stating: To the extent the [c]ourt requires, [Nunley] seeks leave to amend the [c]omplaint to specifically assert an individual capacity claim [against Officer Newton]. Such an amendment is in the interest of justice and does not prejudice [Officer Newton] in any way as all of the relevant issues have been addressed in discovery and are discussed in the instant motion. . . . As in Murphy, the district court did not rule on Nunley's request. . . Nunley's request to seek leave to amend her complaint is comparable to the plaintiff in Murphy who filed a separate motion for leave to amend his complaint. . . As in Murphy, 'we are confident that the district court would grant [Nunley] leave to amend the complaint to state personal-capacity equal protection claims if we remanded for consideration of that issue,' given that the district court has already analyzed Officer Newton's request for qualified immunity. . . Further, 'given the liberality of Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a) regarding amendments, granting such leave to amend would not abuse the court's discretion.'. . We deem Nunley's complaint amended."); Young Apartments, Inc. v. Town of Jupiter, Fla., 529 F.3d 1027, 1047 (11th Cir. 2008) ("The main concern of a court in determining whether a plaintiff is suing defendants in their official or individual capacity is to ensure the defendants in question receive sufficient notice with respect to the capacity in which they are being sued. . . . [W]hile it is 'clearly preferable' that a plaintiff state explicitly in what capacity defendants are being sued, 'failure to do so is not fatal if the course of proceedings otherwise indicates that the defendant received sufficient notice.' Moore v. City of Harriman, 272 F.3d 769, 772 (6th Cir.2001). In looking at the course of proceedings, courts consider such factors as the nature of plaintiff's claims, requests for compensatory or punitive damages, and the nature of any defenses raised in response to the complaint, particularly claims of qualified immunity which serve as an indicator that the defendant had actual knowledge of the potential for individual liability. . . In examining the course of proceedings in this case, we are persuaded that Young Apartments raised claims against the individual defendants in their personal capacities, and that the individual defendants were aware of their potential individual liability."); Powell v. Alexander, 391 F.3d 1, 22 (1st Cir. 2004) ("We now join the multitude of circuits employing the 'course of proceedings' test, which appropriately balances a defendant's need for fair notice of potential personal liability against a plaintiff's need for the flexibility to develop his or her case as the unfolding events of litigation warrant. In doing so, we decline to adopt a formalistic 'bright-line' test requiring a plaintiff to use specific words in his or her complaint in order to pursue a particular defendant in a particular capacity. However, we do not encourage the filing of complaints which do not clearly specify that a defendant is sued in an individual capacity. To the contrary, it is a far better practice for the allegations in the complaint to be specific. A plaintiff who leaves the issue murky in the complaint runs considerable risks under the doctrine we adopt today. Under the 'course of proceedings' test, courts are not limited by the presence or absence of language identifying capacity to suit on the face of the complaint alone. Rather, courts may examine 'the substance of the pleadings and the course of proceedings in order to determine whether the suit is for individual or official liability.'"); Moore v. They argue that to withstand a motion to dismiss, Wells requires complaints seeking damages for alleged violations of § 1983 to contain the words 'individual capacity,' regardless of whether the defendants actually receive notice that they are being sued individually. Although we acknowledge that Wells contains language supporting this reading, we find the more reasonable interpretation to be that § 1983 plaintiffs must clearly notify defendants of the potential for individual liability and must clearly notify the court of its basis for jurisdiction. When a § 1983 plaintiff fails to affirmatively plead capacity in the complaint, we then look to the course of proceedings to determine whether *Wells'*s first concern about notice has been satisfied. . . . In conclusion, we reaffirm *Wells'*s requirement that § 1983 plaintiffs must clearly notify any defendants of their intent to seek individual liability, and we clarify that reviewing the course of proceedings is the most appropriate way to determine whether such notice has been given and received . . . . This is not an insignificant distinction.' Hill v. Shelander, 924 F.2d 1370, 1372 (7th Cir. 1991). Weaver specified in the caption of his complaint, in the preamble, and in the prayer for relief that he was suing the IDOC defendants in their official capacities. . . When there is uncertainty about whether a plaintiff sued a government defendant in their official or personal capacity, a court looks at the language of the complaint, the conduct alleged, and how the parties treated the suit, including the type of damages, to determine the nature of liability. . . Weaver argues that his complaint's allegations against three of the IDOC defendants were enough to put those defendants on notice that he intended to sue them in their individual capacity. Weaver alleges that those three were'"responsible for calculating Weaver's outdate, communicating the outdate to Will County [jail], and facilitating the transfer, processing, and release of Weaver individually, jointly, and in conjunction with [the other two IDOC defendants].'. . These allegations are about the roles those defendants played in IDOC's process, they do not alert the three defendants that Weaver is suing them in their individual capacity. . . Weaver's complaint states that the IDOC defendants were responsible for creating the policies and customs for calculating sentence term, . . . he alleges that the defendants were acting within the scope of their employment, . . . and does not describe any individual tortious behavior, all of which indicate the suit was brought against the IDOC defendants in their official capacities. . . Furthermore, the parties have thus far treated the suit as a suit against the IDOC defendants in their official capacity—plaintiff did not ask for punitive damages, nor did any of the defendants raise a qualified immunity defense as one might expect if the complaint was alleging personal liability on the part of the IDOC defendants. . . Weaver seeks compensatory damages, and while that could point to a personal capacity suit, the conduct at issue and the fact that Weaver listed the defendants as being sued in their official capacities override that inference. . . Given the language of the complaint, the conduct alleged, how the parties have treated the suit, and the nature of the damages sought, this suit is against the IDOC defendants in their official capacities. As such, there is no possibility of § 1983 liability against the IDOC defendants and summary judgment is appropriate. . . .Because § 1983 liability does not lie against a state or a state official sued in their official capacity and Weaver sued the IDOC defendants in their official capacity, judgment in favor of the IDOC is appropriate

Nonetheless, Officer Smith filed a summary judgment motion asserting qualified immunity as a defense. The issue was briefed by both parties and this Court issued an Order finding that at that stage of the proceedings, he was not entitled to qualified immunity. Clearly, Officer Smith was operating under the assumption that he was being sued individually. He prepared for and proceeded to trial without suggesting otherwise. Factors relevant to the inquiry include the substance of the complaint, the nature of relief sought, and statements in dispositive motions and responses. . . Here, the course of proceedings demonstrates that claims alleged against Brown are official capacity claims. The claims against Brown are significantly different than those alleged against the other defendants: while Jimenez alleges conduct-based claims against the other defendants, he alleges policy-based claims against Brown. . . In their Motion for Summary Judgment, Defendants address their liability in both their individual and official capacities. In addressing the individual capacity claims, Defendants limit their discussion to conduct-based claims, rather than the policy-based claims. . . Defendants address the policy claims only to the extent that they impact municipal liability. . . We hold that it does. . . . After examining the cases decided by the Sixth, Seventh, Eleventh, and D.C. First, the answer to the complaint filed by the Defendants asserts the affirmative defense of qualified immunity – a defense against an individual capacity lawsuit. The inclusion of the affirmative defense of qualified immunity is important because it suggests that the attorney representing Plano and Cabezuela, in his official capacity, is likely to have communicated to Cabezuela that he may have been sued in his individual capacity. . . . After conducting a side-by-side comparison of the original and amended complaints, we note that the only modification between the original and amended complaint is the substitution of the word 'individual' for 'official.' The amended complaint is otherwise silent as to whether Defendant is being sued in her official or individual capacity. Moreover, Defendant has not moved for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity, yet another indication that Defendant was not adequately notified that she was being sued in her individual capacity. . . Under this test, we consider the nature of the plaintiff's claims, requests for compensatory or punitive damages, and the nature of any defenses raised in response to the complaint, particularly claims for qualified immunity, to determine whether the defendant had actual knowledge of the potential for individual liability. . .We also consider whether subsequent pleadings put the defendant on notice of the capacity in which he or she is being sued. . . . In the instant matter, the plaintiffs failed to specify in their complaint that they were suing Wellman as an individual, rather than in his official capacity. The plaintiffs later amended their complaint, but the amended complaint also failed to specify the capacity in which the plaintiffs were suing Wellman. The plaintiffs filed a second motion to amend, in which they specified that they were suing Wellman as an individual. The magistrate judge denied the motion to amend, and the district court affirmed. . . .We think the magistrate judge had good reason to deny leave to file a second amended complaint, and that the denial was not an abuse of discretion. . . . [T]he plaintiffs' request for monetary damages is the only indication that they might be suing Wellman in his individual capacity. Although Moore recognizes that the request for monetary damages is one factor that might place an individual on notice that he is being sued in his individual capacity, we do not read that case as holding that a request for money damages is alone sufficient to place a state official on notice that he is being sued in his individual capacity. To so hold would be inappropriate, because the rest of the complaint so strongly suggests an official capacity suit. [T]he fact that Mayor Berger acted in his official capacity as mayor does not immunize him from being sued as an individual under § 1983. The district court's second reason for rejecting the individual capacity suit – that the Fourteenth Amendment protects only against actions of the state – also conflicts with Hafer. The state action requirement of the Fourteenth Amendment is satisfied by showing that a state official acted 'under color of' state law, as when the official exercises authority conferred by a state office. . . In Jones and Snow, plaintiffs sought both money damages and injunctions. Neither case dealt with jury instructions; the question in both was whether the case could proceed at all. Lack of resources is not a defense to a claim for prospective relief because prison officials may be compelled to expand the pool of existing resources in order to remedy continuing Eighth Amendment violations. . . A case seeking prospective relief thus can't be dismissed simply because there is a shortage of resources. Damages are, by contrast, entirely retrospective. They provide redress for something officials could have done but did not. What resources were available is highly relevant because they define the spectrum of choices that officials had at their disposal. To the extent Jones and Snow can be read to apply to monetary damages against an official who lacks authority over budgeting decisions, they are overruled. . . .Peralta seeks only damages. Allowing the jury to consider the constraints under which an individual doctor operates in determining whether he is liable for money damages because he was deliberately indifferent doesn't mean that prisoners have no remedy for violations of their Eighth Amendment rights. For example, although prisoners can't sue states for monetary relief, they can sue for injunctions to correct unconstitutional prison conditions. . . Section 1983 also authorizes prisoners to sue municipal entities for damages if the enforcement of a municipal policy or practice, or the decision of a final municipal policymaker, caused the Eighth Amendment violation. . . A chronic shortage of resources may well amount to a policy or practice for which monetary relief may be available under Monell, but Monell claims can't be brought against states, which are protected by the Eleventh Amendment. See, e.g., Quern v. Jordan, 440 U.S. 332, 345 (1979). The prison where Peralta was held was, of course, run by the state. Our dissenting colleagues would have the jury hold Brooks liable for delay in treatment caused by shortages beyond his control, on the theory that the state will wind up paying any damages award. According to the dissenters, this will give the state an incentive to improve prison conditions. . . But the state is protected from monetary damages by the Eleventh Amendment. We may not circumvent this protection by imputing the state's wrongdoing to an employee who himself has committed no wrong. The dissenters attempt an end run around the Eleventh Amendment by subjecting the state to precisely the kind of economic pressure against which the amendment protects it. We have no quarrel with the dissenters' view that Peralta may have suffered an Eighth Amendment violation. If the state provided insufficient resources to accord inmates adequate medical care, it could be compelled to correct those conditions. . . But such a lawsuit could provide no redress for past constitutional violations because the state is protected by sovereign immunity, 'a fundamental aspect of the sovereignty which the States enjoyed before the ratification of the Constitution, and which they retain today.'. . Congress could abrogate this immunity, but it has not done so for cases brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. See Quern, 440 U.S. at 345. We decline to bring about by indirection what Congress has chosen not to do expressly.")

Groblewski , 907 F.3d 630, 638 (1st Cir. 2018) ("We are not aware of any authority. . .to support the proposition that there is a per se Eighth Amendment prohibition against corrections officials considering cost, even when considered only in the course of selecting treatment that is aimed at attending to an incarcerated person's serious medical needs. . . Thus, even if there were sufficient evidence in the record to show that Groblewski took cost into account in making his July 15 denial of Humira in favor of Dovonex, that evidence would not in and of itself provide a supportable basis for a finding of deliberate indifference, given what the record shows regarding what Groblewski knew about Zingg's condition, MPCH's treatment protocol for psoriasis, and the potential risks posed by Humira that topical medications do not pose.")

But see Peralta v. Dillard, 744 F.3d 1076, 1089, 1092, 1093 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc), cert. denied, 135 S. Ct. 946 (2015) (Christen, J., with whom Rawlinson, M. Smith, and Hurwitz, JJ., join, and with whom Bybee, J, joins as to Parts I, II, and III, dissenting in part and concurring in part) (en banc) ("The decision announced today overturns more than thirty years of circuit precedent by holding that lack of resources is a defense to providing constitutionally inadequate care for prisoners. Because it will deny any remedy for prisoners who have suffered injuries due to prison officials' deliberate indifference and eliminates an important incentive for improving prison conditions, I respectfully dissent. . . . The majority assures us that prisoners will still be able to bring § 1983 claims if they seek injunctive relief and attempts to distinguish Jones and Snow on the basis that Peralta sought only money damages. But the principle in Jones and Snow was first articulated in Spain, which drew no distinction between the type of relief sought by the plaintiff. . . .[U]ntil today, we have never suggested that cost may be a defense to Eighth Amendment claims for damages. . . . .The rule articulated in Spain, Jones, and Snow recognizes that the constitutionally-required threshold for the humane treatment of prisoners is impossible to safeguard if prison officials are permitted to claim lack of resources as a defense. In the case of California prisons, there can be no doubt that chronic underfunding and overcrowding have plagued prison administrators and the prison population for decades. . . The majority's decision will effectively prevent prisoners from bringing suits for damages against prison officials who have violated their Eighth Amendment rights by demonstrating deliberate indifference to serious medical needs: those who actually control prison budgets are immune from damage suits, Tenney v. Brandhove, 341 U.S. 367, 376–79 (1951) (providing absolute immunity for state legislators); and prison officials responsible for substandard care or conditions will be shielded by the newly-announced 'lack of resources' defense.")

Smith, and Christen, JJ., join, and with whom Bybee, J., joins as to Parts I and II, dissenting in part and concurring in part) ("Today's opinion therefore renders damages suits by inmates who suffer grievous injuries as a result of constitutionally forbidden indifference all but impossible in practice. In every case in which state actors are sued for failing to provide minimal medical care—even those cases involving loss of life or serious permanent injury—the defense will be lack of resources, and that defense will almost surely succeed. This will encourage further constitutional violations: If states do not have to pay damages for depriving inmates of the level of care required to avoid violating the Eighth Amendment, there will be little reason to increase appropriations for prisoner care. . . .In the end, the only rational justification for today's decision is concern for the prison medical provider. That solicitude is valid: With shoestring budgets, prison doctors must triage medical care. . . .[T]his case does not deal with the imposition of liability on a doctor who was unable to see a patient. Peralta managed to become Dr. Brooks' patient, and the suit attacks decisions made by Dr. Brooks from that point forward. . . More importantly, the majority's focus on the personal liability of prison physicians ignores an important reality—the state is in every respect the real party in interest in a damages suit. California indemnifies employees for torts committed in the scope of their employment. . . .When a state funds its employee's defense and indemnifies him against any judgment, it ought not then assert that he is faultless because the state is really to blame. The policy concern that no doctor will work for a prison if he faces the possibility of personal liability has already been addressed (and apparently effectively so) by California's promise to hold the physician harmless. Having made the policy decision to incarcerate a large number of wrongdoers, California should not be allowed to avoid the Eighth Amendment consequences of that decision by systematically underfunding medical care. At a minimum, when a state attempts to do so, we should create an exception to the judge-made collateral source rule and allow the plaintiff to inform jurors that the state, not the individual defendants, will pay any compensatory damages awarded. . . .Such an approach would not, as the majority suggests, Maj. Op. at 11, violate state sovereign immunity. States have no obligation to indemnify their employees for damages imposed because of constitutional violations. But, when a state chooses to do so, the state agent should not be heard to argue that the imposition of liability on him individually is unfair. Section 1983 and the Constitution do not codify a collateral source rule. . . .Today's decision, as Judge Christen's dissent convincingly demonstrates, is wrong on the record of this case. But even if that were not so, the decision sweeps far too broadly, effectively foreclosing any liability for permanent injuries and deaths caused by the deliberate indifference of state funding authorities. I therefore dissent from the affirmance of the judgment in favor of Dr. Brooks.")

Baca, 895 F.3d 1176, 1191 (9th Cir. 2018) ("If plaintiffs in § 1983 actions demonstrate that their conditions of confinement have been restricted solely because of overcrowding or understaffing at the facility, a deference instruction ordinarily should not be given. Similarly, if plaintiffs in § 1983 actions demonstrate that they have been subjected to search procedures that are an unnecessary, unjustified, or exaggerated response to concerns about jail safety, we do not defer to jail officials. Otherwise, 'careless invocations of "deference" run the risk of returning us to the passivity of several decades ago, when the then-prevailing barbarism and squalor of many prisons were met with a judicial blind eye and a "hands off" approach.'").

F. Supervisory Liability v. Municipal Liability

Supervisory liability can be imposed without a determination of municipal liability. Supervisory liability runs against the individual, is based on his or her personal responsibility for the constitutional violation and does not require any proof of official policy or custom as the "moving force," City of Oklahoma City v. Tuttle, 471 U.S. 808 (1985) (quoting Polk County v. Dodson, 454 U.S. 312, 326 (1981)), behind the conduct.

See also Hunt v. Davis, 749 F. App'x 522, ___ (9th Cir. 2018) ("Cases addressing municipal liability are also inapplicable to Hunt's claim against Sheriff Clark individually. Municipal liability requires an allegation of a constitutional injury flowing from a governmental policy or custom. . . This can be established by a showing 'that an official with final policymaking authority ratified a subordinate's unconstitutional decision or action and the basis for it.'. . Such a ratification is 'chargeable to the municipality' as a policy or custom. City of St. Louis v. Praprotnik, 485 U.S. 112, 127 (1988). But whether there is a municipal policy or custom that caused constitutional injury is a distinct inquiry from whether a particular official, 'through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. . As neither the Supreme Court nor our circuit has established that an official's post-incident ratification of or acquiescence to a claimed constitutional violation is alone sufficient for individual liability under § 1983, . . the district court erred when it held that Hunt stated a claim against Sheriff Clark on this basis."); McGrath v. Scott, 250 F. Supp. 2d 1218, 1222-23 (D. Ariz. 2003) ("In their pleadings, both parties rely on cases involving questions of municipal liability under § 1983 to establish the legal standard for supervisory liability under § 1983. . .However, municipal and supervisory liability present distinct and separate questions that are treated and analyzed as such. . . Supervisory liability represents a form of personal liability against an individual, while municipal liability is entity liability. Supervisory liability concerns whether supervisory officials' own action or inaction subjected the Plaintiff to the deprivation of her federally protected rights. Generally, liability exists for supervisory officials if they personally participated in the wrongful conduct or breached a duty imposed by law. . .In contrast, municipal liability depends upon enforcement by individuals of a municipal policy, practice, or decision of a policymaker that causes the violation of the Plaintiffs federally protected rights. . . Typically, claims asserted against supervisory officials in both their individual and official capacities provide bases for imposing both supervisory liability (the individual claim) and municipality liability (the official capacity claim) if the supervisor constitutes a policymaker.")

1. Pre-Iqbal Cases

"[W]hen supervisory liability is imposed, it is imposed against the supervisory official in his individual capacity for his own culpable action or inaction in the training, supervision, or control of his subordinates." Clay v. Conlee, 815 F.2d 1164, 1170 (8th Cir. 1987). See also Lloyd v. Van Tassell, 2009 WL 179622, at *5, *6 (11th Cir. Jan. 27, 2009) (not published) ("A supervisor may be individually liable under § 1983 only when: (1) 'the supervisor personally participates in the alleged unconstitutional conduct'; or (2) 'there is a causal connection between the actions of a supervising official and the alleged constitutional deprivation.'. . A causal connection is established when: (1) the supervisor was on notice, by a history of widespread abuse, of the need to correct a practice that led to the alleged deprivation, and he failed to do so; (2) the supervisor's policy or custom resulted in deliberate indifference; (3) the supervisor directed the subordinate to act unlawfully; or (4) the supervisor knew the subordinate would act unlawfully and failed to stop the unlawful action. . . 'The deprivations that constitute widespread abuse sufficient to notify the supervising official must be obvious, flagrant, rampant and of continued duration, rather than isolated occurrences.'. . In order to be held liable under § 1983 in an official capacity, the plaintiff must show that the deprivation of a constitutional right resulted from: '(1) an action taken or policy made by an official responsible for making final policy in that area of the [County's] business; or (2) a practice or custom that is so pervasive, as to be the functional equivalent of a policy adopted by the final policymaker.'. . Only a final policymaker may be held liable in an official capacity. . . This is similar to the standard used for imposing supervisor liability, although the plaintiff must also prove that the defendant was a policymaker. Also, the qualified immunity defense does not apply to an official sued in his official capacity."); McGratposth v. Scott, 250 F. Supp.2d 1218, 1222, 1223 (D.Ariz. 2003) ("[M]unicipal and supervisory liability present distinct and separate questions that are treated and analyzed as such. . . . Supervisory liability concerns whether supervisory officials' own action or inaction subjected the Plaintiff to the deprivation of her federally protected rights. Generally, liability exists for supervisory officials if they personally participated in the wrongful conduct or breached a duty imposed by law. . .In contrast, municipal liability depends upon enforcement by individuals of a municipal policy, practice, or decision of a policymaker that causes the violation of the Plaintiffs federally protected rights. . . Typically, claims asserted against supervisory officials in both their individual and official capacities provide bases for imposing both supervisory liability (the individual claim) and municipality liability (the official capacity claim) if the supervisor constitutes a policymaker.").

As with a local government defendant, a supervisor cannot be held liable under § 1983 on a respondeat superior basis, Monell v. Dept. of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658, 694 n.58 (1978), although a supervisory official may be liable even where not directly involved in the constitutional violation. The misconduct of the subordinate must be "affirmatively link[ed]" to the action or inaction of the supervisor. Rizzo v. Goode, 423 U.S. 362, 371 (1976).

Since supervisory liability based on inaction is separate and distinct from the liability imposed on the subordinate employees for the underlying constitutional violation, the level of culpability that must be alleged to make out the supervisor's liability may not be the same as the level of culpability mandated by the particular constitutional right involved.

While § 1983 itself contains no independent state of mind requirement, Parratt v. Taylor, 451 U.S. 527, 535 (1981), overruled in part on other grounds, Daniels v. Williams, 474 U.S. 327 (1986), lower federal courts consistently require plaintiffs to show something more than mere negligence yet less than actual intent in order to establish supervisory liability. See e.g., Blankenhorn v. City of Orange, 485 F.3d 463, 486 (9th Cir. 2007) ("While Chief Romero did not personally dismiss complaints against Nguyen, as was the case in Larez and Watkins, he did approve Nguyen's personnel evaluations despite repeated and serious complaints against him for use of excessive force. That approval, together with the expert testimony regarding the ineffectiveness of Nguyen's discipline for those complaints, could lead a rational factfinder to conclude that Romero knowingly condoned and ratified actions by Nguyen that he reasonably should have known would cause constitutional injuries like the ones Blankenhorn may have suffered."); Whitfield v. Melendez-Rivera, 431 F.3d 1, 14 (1st Cir. 2005) ("Supervisors may only be held liable under § 1983 on the basis of their own acts or omissions. . . Supervisory liability can be grounded on either the supervisor's direct participation in the unconstitutional conduct, or through conduct that amounts to condonation or tacit authorization. . . Absent direct participation, a supervisor may only be held liable where '(1) the behavior of [his] subordinates results in a constitutional violation and (2) the [supervisor's] action or inaction was Aaffirmatively link [ed]' to the behavior in the sense that it could be characterized as Asupervisory encouragement, condonation or acquiescence' or Agross negligence ... amounting to deliberate indifference.''. .Our holding with respect to Fajardo's municipal liability informs our analysis of the mayor's and the police commissioner's supervisory liability. Because the plaintiffs failed to provide sufficient evidence establishing that Fajardo's police officers were inadequately trained, it follows that the plaintiffs failed to prove that the mayor and the police commissioner were deliberately, recklessly or callously indifferent to the constitutional rights of the citizens of Fajardo. The plaintiffs failed to show that there were any training deficiencies, much less that the mayor or the police commissioner'should have known that there were ... training problems.' . . Moreover, as discussed above, the evidence was insufficient to support the theory that the mayor or the police commissioner had condoned an unconstitutional custom."); Atteberry v. Nocona General Hospital, 430 F.3d 245, 254, 256 (5th Cir. 2005) ("Ordinarily, supervisors may not be held vicariously liable for constitutional violations committed by subordinate employees. . . . In sum, the Plaintiffs alleged that Norris and Perry knew both that a dangerous drug was missing and that patients were dying at an unusually high rate. They also alleged that although Norris and Perry should and could have investigated the deaths and missing drugs or changed hospital policy, they did nothing for a considerable period of time. Negligence is not enough to impose section 1983 liability on a supervisor."); Carter v. Morris, 164 F.3d 215, 221 (4th Cir. 1999)("A plaintiff must show actual or constructive knowledge of a risk of constitutional injury, deliberate indifference to that risk, and 'an Aaffirmative causal link' between the supervisor's inaction and the particular constitutional injury suffered by the plaintiff.' Plaintiff has not alleged that Defendants Brown or MacFarland had any direct participation in the alleged retaliation by corrections officers. It appears that Plaintiff bases Commissioner Brown and Administrator MacFarland's alleged liability solely on their respective job titles, rather than any specific action alleged to have been taken by them adverse to Plaintiff.").

But see Brandon v. Kinter, 938 F.3d 21, 38-39 (2d Cir. 2019) ("The cases on which defendants rely do not hold that all claims under § 1983 require a mental state greater than negligence. . . To the contrary, the § 1983 statute 'contains no state-of-mind requirement independent of that necessary to state a violation of the underlying constitutional right.' Daniels v. Williams, 474 U.S. 327, 330 (1986). Daniels does not foreclose all § 1983 claims based on negligence. The Supreme Court simply stated that, 'depending on the right, merely negligent conduct may not be enough to state a claim' and expressly declined to 'rule out the possibility that there are other constitutional provisions that would be violated by mere lack of care.'. . Our Circuit has not stated whether a First Amendment free exercise claim requires more than negligence, and we need not do so here. Even assuming arguendo that it does, in the instant case, as we will outline shortly, Brandon has introduced sufficient evidence to create a genuine dispute as to whether the defendants acted with deliberate indifference in serving him pork. Under our holding in Greenwich Citizens Committee, Inc. v. Counties of Warren and Washington Indus. Development Agency, 77 F.3d 26 (2d Cir. 1996), deliberate indifference clearly suffices. We, therefore, decline to reach the question of whether something less than deliberate indifference—like negligence—would also be sufficient to establish an affirmative First Amendment claim. . . .We conclude that a reasonable jury could find that the defendants acted with deliberate indifference to Brandon's free exercise rights. Accordingly, and for those reasons, we need not decide at this time whether negligence would also be sufficient to state a claim under the Free Exercise Clause.")

In Greason v. Kemp, 891 F.2d 829 (11th Cir. 1990), the court found the Supreme Court's analysis in City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989), provided a helpful analogy in determining whether a supervisory official was deliberately indifferent to an inmate's psychiatric needs. The court held that a three-prong test must be applied in determining a supervisor's liability: "(1) whether, in failing adequately to train and supervise subordinates, he was deliberately indifferent to an inmate's mental health care needs; (2) whether a reasonable person in the supervisor's position would know that his failure to train and supervise reflected deliberate indifference; and (3) whether his conduct was causally related to the constitutional infringement by his subordinate." 891 F.2d at 836-37.

Plaintiffs posit that this lack of training served as implicit authorization of or knowing acquiescence in Deputy Emslie's allegedly inappropriate use of his patrol car to chase and strike Tommy Ontha as he attempted to flee. Yet, to establish supervisory liability, it is not enough to point after the fact to a particular sort of training which, if provided, might have prevented the harm suffered in a given case. Rather, such liability attaches only if a constitutional violation is 'part of a pattern' of misconduct, or 'where there is essentially a complete failure to train the police force, or training that is so reckless or grossly negligent that future police misconduct is almost inevitable or would properly be characterized as substantially certain to occur.' . . . In this case, Plaintiffs do not contend that Deputy Emslie's purported misuse of his patrol car was part of a pattern of comparable violations, as opposed to an isolated occurrence. Neither have Plaintiffs suggested any basis for us to conclude that the tragic events of this case were an 'almost inevitable' or 'substantially certain' byproduct of a lack of training as to the proper operation of a patrol car when pursuing an individual traveling on foot. . . . Under this record, we find as a matter of law that Plaintiffs cannot sustain their § 1983 claims against Sheriff Jones in his individual capacity."); Vaughn v. Under this theory of liability, Vaughn must demonstrate Sheriff Langston 'was deliberately indifferent to or tacitly authorized the offending acts.'. . Vaughn fails to do so. We cannot say Sheriff Langston's practice of delegating to others such duties as reading mail and responding to communications regarding Jail inmates amounts to deliberate indifference. Certainly, supervisory officers who order a subordinate officer to violate a person's constitutional rights and non-supervisory officers present during a violation of person's civil rights who fail to stop the violation can be liable under § 1983. . . Additionally, the supervising officer can neither encourage the specific act of misconduct nor otherwise directly participate in it. . . Whether Whatmore committed a Fourth Amendment violation when he entered Sargent's home, Taylor is not vicariously liable for any alleged violation because there is no indication either that Taylor ordered Whatmore to enter the house illegally or that Taylor knew that Whatmore entered the home without consent. City of Orlando, 407 F.3d 1152, 1157, 1158 (11th Cir. 2005) ("All of the factors articulated in Graham weigh in favor of Mercado. Because he was not committing a crime, resisting arrest, or posing an immediate threat to the officers at the time he was shot in the head, if Padilla aimed for Mercado's head, he used excessive force when apprehending Mercado. At this point, we must assume that Padilla was aiming for Mercado's head based on the evidence that Padilla was trained to use the Sage Launcher, that the weapon accurately hit targets from distances up to five yards, and that Mercado suffered injuries to his head. Padilla was aware that the Sage Launcher was a lethal force if he shot at a subject from close range. The officers were also aware that alternative actions, such as utilizing a crisis negotiation team, were available means of resolving the situation. This is especially true in light of the fact that Mercado had not made any threatening moves toward himself or the officers. Thus, in the light most favorable to Mercado, Padilla violated his Fourth Amendment rights when he intentionally aimed at and shot Mercado in the head with the Sage Launcher. . .We further conclude, however, that Officer Rouse did not violate Mercado's Fourth Amendment rights. Although Officer Rouse did not fire the Sage Launcher, Mercado contends that she should be held responsible under a theory of supervisory liability. . . Officer Rouse was in another room during the incident, and did not see Padilla aim or fire the gun. She did not tell Padilla to fire the Sage Launcher at Mercado's head. Given that Padilla was trained in the proper use of the launcher, that the Department's guidelines prohibited firing the launcher at a suspect's head or neck except in deadly force situations, and that . . . there is no evidence that Padilla has used similarly excessive force in the past-all of which are undisputed facts in the record-Rouse could not reasonably have anticipated that Padilla was likely to shoot Mercado in the head either intentionally or unintentionally. Even under the 'failure to stop' standard for supervisory liability, Rouse cannot be held liable."); Randall v. Toledo-Davila's first review of Officer Medina-Vargas's file came in 1992, when an investigating officer recommended his dismissal because he had an extensive record of physical assaults and there had been no apparent change in his behavior despite sanctions. Ignoring the recommendation, Toledo-Davila imposed a fifteen day suspension. Two weeks later, Toledo-Davila reviewed another disciplinary action taken against Officer Medina-Vargas for the improper use of his firearm three years earlier. Following this review, Toledo-Davila reduced Officer Medina-Vargas's sanction from a thirty day suspension imposed by the former superintendent to a two day suspension. they knew about Schlegel's prior misconduct but nonetheless promoted him to Captain of Field Services. They also knew of Remaley's violent episodes but permitted him to be a member of the K-9 Unit. These acts are, as a matter of law, insufficient to constitute the requisite direct involvement in appellees' injuries. . . . Importantly, neither Palmer nor Goldsmith were aware of the attacks in question until after they occurred. At that time, they ordered an investigation but ultimately chose not to discipline the officers involved, even though it appears that Zukasky had recommended that at least certain of the officers be disciplined. This decision not to discipline the officers does not amount to active involvement in appellees' injuries given that all of the injuries occurred before the decision. Supervisors are expected to keep their eyes open for 'anything amiss,' but they focus on ensuring that reports are complete and accurate and that officers' time has been spent efficiently and productively. Discovery of criminal activity by subordinate officers is ordinarily made through the receipt of complaints from citizens. A supervisor's responsibility upon receiving a complaint is to report it to the Internal Affairs Division; Internal Affairs then handles the investigation. Investigation by Internal Affairs – not by supervisors – is the tool by which the Department attempts to uncover criminality on the part of its officers. Given these facts, we do not think the defendants' failure to investigate the corrupt officers amounts to acquiescence in the officers' misconduct or reflects indifference to violations of the plaintiffs' rights. The defendants were entitled to rely on Internal Affairs to perform its assigned function. The defendants' responsibility was to report specific complaints of criminality or misconduct that they themselves observed. None of the defendants personally observed any misconduct. Ferency and Tate received specific complaints and duly reported them. Ferency also reported generalized rumors of criminal activity. It was the reports to Internal Affairs that led, in time, to the officers' prosecution.") with Lynn v. City of Detroit, 98 F. What is not disputed is that Defendants, who directly supervised the rogue officers responsible for violations of Plaintiffs' constitutional rights, acted with deliberate indifference when confronted with daily rumors and discussion of their subordinates' criminal behavior. By looking the other way, or by failing to act when faced with apparently reliable reports of police corruption, Defendants actually contributed to the lawlessness of the third platoon by permitting its officers to continue to violate citizens' rights with impunity.").

plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . Liability can result from Sheriff Davey's acquiescence to Knox County Jail's ongoing practice of strip searching all detainees charged with misdemeanors. . . Some evidence in the record points to Sheriff Davey's actual knowledge of this ongoing practice. . . . However, Sheriff Davey disputes that he had actual knowledge of the unlawful custom and practice of strip searching detainees charged with misdemeanors without reasonable suspicion of concealing contraband or weapons. . . Regardless of his actual knowledge, the Court concludes that based on the undisputed evidence in the record he should have known that the practice was ongoing, and that, despite the change to the written policy in 1994 and the institution of new procedures in 2001, the practice had not been eliminated. The issue then becomes whether Plaintiffs have established that Sheriff Davey's conduct amounts to deliberate indifference or willful blindness to an unconstitutional practice of his subordinates. . . Finally, Plaintiffs must establish a causal connection between Sheriff Davey's conduct and the corrections officers' unconstitutional actions. . . . The widespread practice was sufficient to alert Sheriff Davey that the unlawful strip search practice persisted. On the evidence presented in the summary judgment record, the Court concludes that Sheriff Davey's failure to take any corrective action directed at eradicating this pervasive practice – even in the face of official Department of Corrections' reports and the incontrovertible record evidence that the practice persisted – amounts to a reckless indifference of the constitutional rights of class members arrested on misdemeanor charges. Sheriff Davey's reckless indifference allowed the practice to persist for years and caused the violation of the constitutional rights of Plaintiffs arrested on misdemeanor charges. For the foregoing reasons, the Court will grant Plaintiffs' Motion for Partial Summary Judgment with respect to that part of Count II alleging that Sheriff Davey is responsible, in his personal capacity, for the Knox County Jail's unconstitutional custom and practice of strip searching detainees charged with misdemeanors."); McAllister v. City of Memphis, No. 01-2925 DV, 2005 WL 948762, at *4, *5 (W.D. Tenn. Feb. 22, 2005) (not reported) ("Young conducted the hearing. However, Young did not consider the statements of the witnesses. He did not interview the three police officers who were present at the time the incident occurred. This is true despite the fact that Charnes had determined that Polk's statement deserved considerable weight because it is unusual for an officer to admit that he believes that another officer struck a citizen. Although the IAB is not permitted to consider previous complaints against the officer being investigated, a hearing officer is allowed to consider them. Thus, Young knew that Hunt had six prior complaints against him. Moreover, although Young was permitted to subpoena anyone he believed would be helpful, the only person he subpoenaed was Hunt. Young never spoke with Plaintiff, and Plaintiff was not allowed to attend the hearing. Additionally, the MPD's policy states that a presumption of guilt is established when the IAB sustains a charge against an officer. In spite of this seemingly overwhelming evidence against Hunt, Young dismissed the complaint. Following the hearing, the City sent Plaintiff a letter informing him that there was sufficient evidence to sustain Plaintiff's allegations and that the appropriate action had been taken. Deputy Chief Pilot admitted in her deposition that the tone of the letter was misleading. . . This could be evidence that Defendant's actions may have been a result of deliberate indifference to the Plaintiff's rights. Furthermore, as it is IAB's policy to send a letter to every complainant stating that appropriate action was taken, even when no action at all was taken, . . . such a practice may indicate Defendant's ratification of its officers' misconduct. . .

. Therefore, the Court finds that a genuine issue of material fact exists as to whether a meaningful investigation was conducted. Additionally, based on the IAB investigation a genuine issue of material fact exists as to whether Defendant's decision not to discipline Officer Hunt indicates deliberate indifference on the part of the City, as envisioned by the Supreme Court in City of Canton....").

None of these Defendants was a remote, desk-bound supervisor; rather, all three were direct participants in the firing of the knee knockers on April 29, 2001. Similarly, taking all of Plaintiff's factual allegations as true, there is a direct causal connection between the supervision provided by Zoretic, Wood, and Curmode and the failure of any officers to provide medical assistance to Plaintiff. We can make it more precise by noting that supervisors who are merely negligent in failing to detect and prevent subordinates' misconduct are not liable, because negligence is no longer culpable under section 1983. Gross negligence is not enough either. The supervisors must know about the conduct and facilitate it, approve it, condone it, or turn a blind eye for fear of what they might see. Although the courts do not differ significantly as to the level of culpability required for supervisory liability, there is some split on the question of whether the requisite culpability for supervisory inaction can be established on the basis of a single incident of subordinates' misconduct or whether a pattern or practice of constitutional violations must be shown.

See International Action Center v. United States, 365 F.3d 20, 26-28 (D.C. Cir. 2004) ("The MPD supervisors do not seek a ruling on whether they enjoy qualified immunity from a supervisory inaction claim based on past transgressions under Haynesworth. . . . . What was being appealed, counsel explained, was any effort to base liability on a duty to actively supervise and to train without regard to anything, any other aspect, or any prior history. That merely because these four individuals are supervisors, they had an obligation to anticipate that constitutional torts were highly likely and to take steps to prevent them regardless of any other facts in the case. . . . Plaintiffs do wish to pursue such a theory of liability. At oral argument, they argued that the duty to supervise arose generally from the potential for constitutional violations, even absent proof that the MPD supervisors had knowledge of a pre-existing pattern of violations by either Cumba or Worrell. Plaintiffs contend that the general duty to supervise 'arises in the ordinary course of taking responsibility where the police intervene in the context of mass demonstration activity,'. . .because of the 'substantial risk' of constitutional violations. . . . Plaintiffs also contend that '[t]he duty to supervise does not require proof of a pre-existing pattern of violations.'. . Such a theory represents a significant expansion of Haynesworth – one we are unwilling to adopt. The broad wording of the district court opinion, and its failure to focus on what 'circumstances' gave rise to a duty on the part of the supervisors to act, pose the prospect that a claim of the sort described by plaintiffs' counsel could proceed. The district court, in denying qualified immunity on the inaction claim, simply noted that 'it is undisputed that the MPD Supervisors were overseeing the activities of many uniformed and plain-clothes MPD officers present at the Navy Memorial for crowd control purposes during the Inaugural Parade and that those officers included ... Cumba and Worrell,' and that plaintiffs 'allege that in this context, there could be a substantial risk of violating protestors' free speech or Fourth Amendment rights.'. . Without focusing on which allegations sufficed to give rise to a claim for supervisory inaction, the court concluded that immunity was not available because plaintiffs 'have sufficiently alleged a set of circumstances at the Navy Memorial on January 20, 2001, which did indeed make it 'highly likely' that MPD officers would violate citizens' constitutional rights.'. . The district court's analysis failed to link the likelihood of particular constitutional violations to any past transgressions, and failed to link these particular supervisors to those past practices or any familiarity with them. In the absence of any such 'affirmative links,' the supervisors cannot be shown to have the requisite 'direct responsibility' or to have given 'their authorization or approval of such misconduct,'. . . and the effort to hold them personally liable fades into respondeat superior or vicarious liability, clearly barred under Section 1983. . . . The question thus reduces to the personal liability of these four individuals for alleged inadequate training and supervision of Cumba and Worrell – in the absence of any claim that these supervisors were responsible for the training received by Cumba and Worrell, or were aware of any demonstrated deficiencies in that training. That leaves inaction liability for supervision, apart from 'active participation' (defined to include failure to intervene upon allegedly becoming aware of the tortious conduct) and apart from any duty to act arising from past transgressions highly likely to continue in the absence of supervisory action. Keeping in mind that there can be no respondeat superior liability under Section 1983, what is left is plaintiffs' theory that the supervisors' duty to act here arose simply because of 'the context of mass demonstration activity.' . . . We accordingly reject plaintiffs' theory of liability for general inaction, mindful not only of the hazards of reducing the standard for pleading the deprivation of a constitutional right in the qualified immunity context, but also of the degree of fault necessary to implicate supervisory liability under Section 1983.").

The Supreme Court's recent decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. 1937 (2009), clearly changes the law of many circuits with respect to the standard of supervisory liability in both section 1983 and Bivens actions.

Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1948, 1949 (2009) ("Because vicarious liability is inapplicable to Bivens and § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution. . . . [T]o state a claim based on a violation of a clearly established right, respondent must plead sufficient factual matter to show that petitioners adopted and implemented the detention policies at issue not for a neutral, investigative reason but for the purpose of discriminating on account of race, religion, or national origin. Respondent disagrees. He argues that, under a theory of 'supervisory liability,' petitioners can be liable for 'knowledge and acquiescence in their subordinates' use of discriminatory criteria to make classification decisions among detainees.'. . That is to say, respondent believes a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution. We reject this argument. Respondent's conception of 'supervisory liability' is inconsistent with his accurate stipulation that petitioners may not be held accountable for the misdeeds of their agents. In a § 1983 suit or a Bivens action-where masters do not answer for the torts of their servants-the term 'supervisory liability' is a misnomer. Absent vicarious liability, each Government official, his or her title notwithstanding, is only liable for his or her own misconduct. In the context of determining whether there is a violation of clearly established right to overcome qualified immunity, purpose rather than knowledge is required to impose Bivens liability on the subordinate for unconstitutional discrimination; the same holds true for an official charged with violations arising from his or her superintendent responsibilities.").

Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S. 1937, 1956, 1957 (2009) (Souter, J., joined by Stevens, J., Ginsburg, J., Breyer, J., dissenting) ("Without acknowledging the parties' agreement as to the standard of supervisory liability, the Court asserts that it must sua sponte decide the scope of supervisory liability here. . . I agree that, absent Ashcroft and Mueller's concession, that determination would have to be made; without knowing the elements of a supervisory liability claim, there would be no way to determine whether a plaintiff had made factual allegations amounting to grounds for relief on that claim. . . But deciding the scope of supervisory Bivens liability in this case is uncalled for. There are several reasons, starting with the position Ashcroft and Mueller have taken and following from it. First, Ashcroft and Mueller have, as noted, made the critical concession that a supervisor's knowledge of a subordinate's unconstitutional conduct and deliberate indifference to that conduct are grounds for Bivens liability. Iqbal seeks to recover on a theory that Ashcroft and Mueller at least knowingly acquiesced (and maybe more than acquiesced) in the discriminatory acts of their subordinates; if he can show this, he will satisfy Ashcroft and Mueller's own test for supervisory liability. . . . I would therefore accept Ashcroft and Mueller's concession for purposes of this case and proceed to consider whether the complaint alleges at least knowledge and deliberate indifference. Second, because of the concession, we have received no briefing or argument on the proper scope of supervisory liability, much less the full-dress argument we normally require. . . We consequently are in no position to decide the precise contours of supervisory liability here, this issue being a complicated one that has divided the Courts of Appeals. . . . The majority says that in a Bivens action, 'where masters do not answer for the torts of their servants,' 'the term Asupervisory liability' is a misnomer,' and that '[a]bsent vicarious liability, each Government official, his or her title notwithstanding, is only liable for his or her own misconduct.'. . Lest there be any mistake, in these words the majority is not narrowing the scope of supervisory liability; it is eliminating Bivens supervisory liability entirely. The nature of a supervisory liability theory is that the supervisor may be liable, under certain conditions, for the wrongdoing of his subordinates, and it is this very principle that the majority rejects. . . . The dangers of the majority's readiness to proceed without briefing and argument are apparent in its cursory analysis, which rests on the assumption that only two outcomes are possible here: respondeat superior liability, in which 'an employer is subject to liability for torts committed by employees while acting within the scope of their employment,'. . or no supervisory liability at all. The dichotomy is false. Even if an employer is not liable for the actions of his employee solely because the employee was acting within the scope of employment, there still might be conditions to render a supervisor liable for the conduct of his subordinate. . . In fact, there is quite a spectrum of possible tests for supervisory liability: it could be imposed where a supervisor has actual knowledge of a subordinate's constitutional violation and acquiesces, see, e.g., Baker v. Monroe Twp., 50 F. 3d 1186, 1994 (CA3 1995); Woodward v. Worland, 977 F. 2d 1392, 1400 (CA10 1992); or where supervisors A 'know about the conduct and facilitate it, approve it, condone it, or turn a blind eye for fear of what they might see,' ' International Action Center v. United States, 365 F. 3d 20, 28 (CADC 2004) (Roberts, J.) (quoting Jones v. Chicago, 856 F. 2d 985, 992 (CA7 1988) (Posner, J.)); or where the supervisor has no actual knowledge of the violation but was reckless in his supervision of the subordinate, see, e.g., Hall, supra, at 961; or where the supervisor was grossly negligent, see, e.g., Lipsett v. University of Puerto Rico, 864 F. 2d 881, 902 (CA1 1988). I am unsure what the general test for supervisory liability should be, and in the absence of briefing and argument I am in no position to choose or devise one.").

3. Post-Iqbal Liability-of-Supervisors Cases

U.S. SUPREME COURT

Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1863-65 (2017) ("Applying its precedents, the Court of Appeals held that the substantive standard for the sufficiency of the claim is whether the warden showed 'deliberate indifference' to prisoner abuse. . . The parties appear to agree on this standard, and, for purposes of this case, the Court assumes it to be correct. The complaint alleges that guards routinely abused respondents; that the warden encouraged the abuse by referring to respondents as 'terrorists'; that he prevented respondents from using normal grievance procedures; that he stayed away from the Unit to avoid seeing the abuse; that he was made aware of the abuse via 'inmate complaints, staff complaints, hunger strikes, and suicide attempts'; that he ignored other 'direct evidence of [the] abuse, including logs and other official [records]'; that he took no action 'to rectify or address the situation'; and that the abuse resulted in the injuries described above[.]. . . These allegations—assumed here to be true, subject to proof at a later stage—plausibly show the warden's deliberate indifference to the abuse. Consistent with the opinion of every judge in this case to have considered the question, including the dissenters in the Court of Appeals, the Court concludes that the prisoner abuse allegations against Warden Hasty state a plausible ground to find a constitutional violation if a Bivens remedy is to be implied. . . .[A] case can present a new context for Bivens purposes if it implicates a different constitutional right; if judicial precedents provide a less meaningful guide for official conduct; or if there are potential special factors that were not considered in previous Bivens cases. . . The constitutional right is different here, since Carlson was predicated on the Eighth Amendment and this claim is predicated on the Fifth. . . And the judicial guidance available to this warden, with respect to his supervisory duties, was less developed. The Court has long made clear the standard for claims alleging failure to provide medical treatment to a prisoner—'deliberate indifference to serious medical needs.'. . . The standard for a claim alleging that a warden allowed guards to abuse pre-trial detainees is less clear under the Court's precedents. This case also has certain features that were not considered in the Court's previous Bivens cases and that might discourage a court from authorizing a Bivens remedy. As noted above, the existence of alternative remedies usually precludes a court from authorizing a Bivens action. . . And there might have been alternative remedies available here, for example, a writ of habeas corpus . . . ; an injunction requiring the warden to bring his prison into compliance with the regulations discussed above; or some other form of equitable relief. Furthermore, legislative action suggesting that Congress does not want a damages remedy is itself a factor counseling hesitation. . . Some 15 years after Carlson was decided, Congress passed the Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995, which made comprehensive changes to the way prisoner abuse claims must be brought in federal court. See 42 U.S.C. § 1997e. So it seems clear that Congress had specific occasion to consider the matter of prisoner abuse and to consider the proper way to remedy those wrongs. This Court has said in dicta that the Act's exhaustion provisions would apply to Bivens suits. See Porter v. Nussle, 534 U.S. 516, 524, 122 S.Ct. 983, 152 L.Ed.2d 12 (2002). But the Act itself does not provide for a standalone damages remedy against federal jailers. It could be argued that this suggests Congress chose not to extend the Carlson damages remedy to cases involving other types of prisoner mistreatment.

The differences between this claim and the one in Carlson are perhaps small, at least in practical terms. Given this Court's expressed caution about extending the Bivens remedy, however, the new-context inquiry is easily satisfied. Some differences, of course, will be so trivial that they will not suffice to create a new Bivens context. But here the differences identified above are at the very least meaningful ones. Thus, before allowing this claim to proceed under Bivens, the Court of Appeals should have performed a special factors analysis. It should have analyzed whether there were alternative remedies available or other 'sound reasons to think Congress might doubt the efficacy or necessity of a damages remedy' in a suit like this one. . . Although the Court could perform that analysis in the first instance, the briefs have concentrated almost all of their efforts elsewhere. Given the absence of a comprehensive presentation by the parties, and the fact that the Court of Appeals did not conduct the analysis, the Court declines to perform the special factors analysis itself. The better course is to vacate the judgment below, allowing the Court of Appeals or the District Court to do so on remand.")

D.C. CIRCUIT

Johnson v. Government of Dist. of Columbia, 734 F.3d 1194, 1204, 1205 (D.C. Cir. 2013) ("Fifth Amendment Class members maintain that the strip search gender disparity violated the Fifth Amendment's equal protection guarantee. We resolve these claims, unlike the claims of the Fourth Amendment class, at the first stage of the qualified immunity analysis by examining whether Dillard violated class members' Fifth Amendment rights. The parties agree that Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), controls this issue. . . .Acknowledging that they 'must prove Dillard intended to discriminate against women arrestees,' Fifth Amendment Class members argue that Dillard 'intended a policy, formal or informal, of women-only strip searches.'. . For his part, Dillard insists that his policy throughout the class period required 'every prisoner'—both male and female—to go through the strip search process upon arrival at the Superior Court cellblock. . . Although class members point to some evidence from which we might infer that Dillard knew deputies were implementing his gender neutral policy in a gender imbalanced manner, plenty of other evidence suggests that Dillard was largely missing in action throughout the class period. But even assuming class members could show that Dillard knew what was going on at the cellblock, they have pointed to no evidence from which we could infer that Dillard himself intended to treat women differently from men. . . . [C]lass members cite no testimony by any subordinate indicating that the gender disparity resulted from Dillard's instruction or intention.")

Johnson v. Government of Dist. of Columbia, 734 F.3d 1194, 1208 (D.C. Cir. 2013) (Rogers, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("A reasonable jury could find that knowing acquiescence to continuing violations of a plaintiff's Equal Protection rights by one's deputies amounts to purposeful conduct and infer, in the absence of a legitimate non-invidious reason for treating women differently than men, a defendant's discriminatory purpose. . . Dillard repeatedly swore, however, that he believed men and women were being strip searched in the same manner, see Dillard Dep. 96:10–97:8, 99:8–101:12, and the Fifth Amendment class fails to proffer evidence from which a reasonable jury could find that he had a women-only strip search policy or knew of the disparate treatment by his deputies. . . Absent evidence that Dillard either had a blanket policy for strip searching only female arrestees, or knew that his deputies were doing so indiscriminately and did nothing to stop them, a discriminatory purpose by Dillard cannot reasonably be inferred.")

Elkins v. District of Columbia, 690 F.3d 554, 555, 556 (D.C. Cir. 2012) ("Even if Maloney did have a responsibility to train and supervise Williams–Cherry, which he disputes, summary judgment in his favor was still appropriate because the record shows, at best, 'mere negligence,' not an 'affirmative link' between Maloney's conduct and the constitutional injury. . . This link must be strong enough that, from Maloney's perspective, the possibility of a constitutional violation occurring due to poor training or supervision would have been highly likely, not simply foreseeable. . . Supervisory liability under § 1983 is triggered only when a supervisor fails to provide more stringent training in the wake of a history of past transgressions by the agency or provides training 'so clearly deficient that some deprivation of rights will inevitably result absent additional instruction.'. . There was no pattern of constitutional violations to put Maloney on notice that training was required; indeed, this was the first search warrant DCRA had ever sought. And even if it was foreseeable that an untrained official might take a false step in these new and unfamiliar circumstances, such a result was by no means inevitable, especially as the search was led by officers from the MPD, who are trained in the proper execution of a warrant.")

Shaw v. District of Columbia, 944 F.Supp.2d 43, 63, 64 (D.D.C. 2013) ("Kates is alleged to have failed to train, supervise or discipline subordinate USMS employees in the appropriate treatment of female transgender detainees. . . His motion to dismiss contends that the allegations of the complaint are insufficient to state a claim because neither his 'ultimate authority' nor the allegations that 'focus on his training and supervision' are sufficient to 'render [him] personally liable for the alleged wrongful acts of individual USMS employees.'. . There is no question that Kates cannot be held liable for the actions of subordinates based solely on his position as the Superior Court Marshal (his 'ultimate authority'), but that is not what plaintiff alleges. . . As for his alleged failure to train, supervise or discipline, he argues that the allegations are insufficient to establish that he had an obligation to train or supervise in the manner plaintiff alleges—on not treating female transgender detainees as if they are male. . . Relying on Elkins, Kates asserts that the complaint (1) fails to allege 'any history of constitutional transgressions by USMS' and thus '"no pattern of constitutional violations to put [the official] on notice that training was required"'. . . and (2) fails to allege 'training that is so clearly deficient ... that some deprivation of constitutional rights will inevitably result.'. . . Plaintiff appears to concede the first point, but not the second. As she points out, the complaint alleges that Kates engaged in no training or supervision as to the treatment of female transgender detainees despite knowing the harm that was 'likely to occur' if plaintiff were treated as if she were male. . . The question is not whether plaintiff's claim against Kates will ultimately succeed, but only whether these allegations are sufficient to adequately allege an obligation to train or supervise as to the appropriate treatment of female transgender detainees.")

Justiniano v. Walker, 986 F.3d 11, 19-24 (1st Cir. 2021) ("At the heart of the Alben motion-to-dismiss issue . . . is whether the complaint's Count 3 plausibly alleged not only that Alben's failure to implement training to teach troopers how to deal with mentally ill individuals caused a violation of Justiniano's constitutional rights, but also that Alben was deliberately indifferent to the risk that not providing that training would result in a trooper committing that kind of constitutional violation. Justiniano, of course, says the complaint accomplished all of this, while Alben takes the opposite stance. Before we get into those arguments, let's first canvass these legal principles (deliberate indifference, causation in failure-to-train cases) -- they're the backdrop against which we'll assess the complaint's sufficiency, after all. Alben was not on the scene, of course, so Justiniano relies on supervisory liability and a failure-to-train theory to put him on the hook. We've cautioned that '[t]he liability criteria for "failure to train" claims are exceptionally stringent.'. . Generally, a supervisor cannot be held liable under § 1983 on a respondeat superior theory -- a 'supervisor's liability must be premised on his [or her] own acts or omissions' and does not attach automatically even if a subordinate is found liable. . . To connect the liability dots successfully between supervisor and subordinate in this context, a plaintiff must show 'that one of the supervisor's subordinates abridged the plaintiff's constitutional rights' and that the supervisor's (in)action 'was affirmative[ly] link[ed] to that behavior in the sense that it could be characterized as ... gross negligence amounting to deliberate indifference.'. . And that's a critical issue here -- deliberate indifference. Deliberate indifference requires a plaintiff to demonstrate or allege '(1) a grave risk of harm, (2) the defendant's actual or constructive knowledge of that risk, and (3) his failure to take easily available measures to address the risk.'. . Indeed, '[m]ere negligence will not suffice: the supervisor's conduct must evince "reckless or callous indifference to the constitutional rights of others." . . And there's more. '[D]eliberate indifference alone does not equate with supervisory liability,'. . . but rather '[c]ausation [is also] an essential element, and the causal link between a supervisor's conduct and the constitutional violation must be solid[.]'. . For causation in a failure-to-train claim, a plaintiff must allege that the 'lack of training caused [the officer] to take actions that were objectively unreasonable and constituted excessive force.'. . And the causation requirement 'contemplates proof that the supervisor's conduct led inexorably to the constitutional violation.'. . We've observed this 'is a difficult standard to meet,' though not impossible -- for instance, a plaintiff could 'prove causation by showing inaction in the face of a "known history of widespread abuse sufficient to alert a supervisor to ongoing violations."'. . Alternatively, liability might be appropriate '"in a narrow range of circumstances" where "a violation ..." is "a highly predictable consequence of a failure to equip law enforcement officers with specific tools to handle recurring situations.''. .So that's what needed to be alleged here -- deliberate indifference and causation that fit these black-letter-law bills. True, '[c]ausation and deliberate indifference are separate requirements ... [, but] they are often intertwined in these cases.'. . So it is here -- both determinations turn on whether Alben was aware of a risk that his subordinates (Walker, in particular) might violate mentally ill individuals' constitutional rights. Justiniano says the complaint does plenty to state this claim plausibly, and thus it should have survived the Rule 12(b)(6) motion. Count 3 alleges that Alben, as Walker's supervisor and a policymaker, failed to provide Walker with the proper training and resources that would have helped to prevent a violation of Justiniano's constitutional rights (again, the complaint leans on the lethal force as the violation). Justiniano argues that the complaint adequately alleges that Alben was aware of and ignored national trends indicating a problematic rise in bad-outcome encounters between police and mentally ill individuals but provided no specialized training, and that failure to train constituted deliberate indifference to an obvious risk. And, according to Justiniano, the complaint plausibly lays out the requisite causal nexus by alleging that the sought-after deescalation training would have prevented this tragedy, meaning Walker's lack of training by Alben was the cause of the violation of Justiniano's rights. Alben disagrees, asserting that the complaint falls short of alleging facts sufficient to establish that he acted with deliberate indifference to Justiniano's constitutional rights (or, put differently, that Alben had notice of conduct violating constitutional rights but failed to take steps to address it), and, on top of that, the complaint does not adequately allege that proper training would have prevented that violation (i.e., no causation). With the benefit of every possible doubt -- accepting all of the complaint's factual allegations as true, . . . assuming that a constitutional violation occurred, drawing all reasonable inferences in Justiniano's favor, and 'isolat[ing] and ignor[ing]' mere legal conclusions -- this claim's 'non-conclusory, non-speculative' factual allegations do not 'plausibly narrate a claim for relief,'. . . so Justiniano's Count 3 as pled does not pass muster. In broad strokes, as to the alleged facts that arguably could support the supervisory liability theory, this is what the complaint does accomplish: that Alben, as supervisor, did not have specific policies in place 'for dealing with mental health crises without using lethal force' or 'for troopers dealing with mental health crises on techniques to de-escalate'; that Alben was aware of national trends showing an increase in the number of mental health crises and a corresponding increase in the number of death-resulting encounters with police which have prompted some law enforcement entities to institute training regarding these issues, but Alben took no 'affirmative action,' which may have contributed to Justiniano's death. It then asserts that Alben's failure to act in the face of these national trends 'demonstrates a deliberate indifference' to Justiniano's civil rights, and, '[a]s a direct result of' Alben's conduct, Justiniano died. It is not difficult to see what Justiniano was trying to do here. But these alleged facts don't support the essential legal elements of 'reckless or callous indifference to the constitutional rights of others,'. . . and the 'solid' 'causal link between [Alben]'s conduct and the constitutional violation,'. . . that Justiniano needed to state in order to be entitled to relief as a matter of law. Starting with deliberate indifference, it's clear Justiniano's aim was to highlight the absence of training when it comes to police encounters with the mentally ill -- Alben himself acknowledged that shortcoming in the system, as the complaint alleges -- and to try to link that to wrongdoing by Alben. But there are too many pieces missing, even with the benefit of some inferential leaps, for us to conclude deliberate indifference has been plausibly pled. For instance, there are no non-speculative facts in the complaint that allege a specific 'grave risk of harm' in failing to train or that there were 'easily available measures to address the risk' that Alben could have taken but didn't. . . There is no allegation that the referenced mental health training adopted by some other jurisdictions would have been easy to implement in Massachusetts, nor that the trainings actually have been effective in reducing the frequency of constitutional violations of the mentally ill. . . And even if there were such allegations, it still would not be enough to suggest plausibly that Alben knew or should have known his troopers might violate the rights of a mentally ill individual, particularly when there is no known history of such constitutional trampling by Massachusetts troopers alleged. The complaint does not plead that Walker or the Massachusetts State Police more generally had a history of using excessive and constitutionally violative force against individuals who were mentally ill such that Alben should have been on notice of that conduct, nor is there any suggestion that the Massachusetts State Police are otherwise specifically at risk of violating a mentally ill individual's constitutional rights. . . Clearly, then, he could not have ignored -- with deliberate indifference or otherwise -- a non-existent history of these issues. . . Another angle would be to consider whether the complaint plausibly alleged a national trend of constitutional violations so prominent that Alben should have been (or was) on notice of a high risk that, without this training, there was a grave risk that his troopers would violate a mentally ill person's constitutional rights, and he nonetheless ignored it. . . But the complaint does not allege such a widespread, prominent trend of constitutional violations: in fact, the complaint does not actually allege that the 'trend' involves constitutional violations at all, but instead states that there are more and more 'tragic encounters with police where unarmed mentally ill citizens end up dead.' While we do not purport to foreclose the possibility that such a national trend might be enough to provide this notice, the trend as alleged here simply does not rise to that level. And the requisite causal link has not been plausibly alleged either, i.e., that Alben's failure to train his troopers 'caused [Walker] to take actions that were objectively unreasonable and constituted excessive force.'. . Justiniano pleads that '[a]s a direct result of the conduct of Defendant Alben, Wilfredo Justiniano lost his life,' but none of the pled conduct supports that legal conclusion. And while the complaint alleges that Walker acted improperly in light of Justiniano's mental condition, there is no allegation that Walker's decision to shoot Justiniano was related to any mental illness that Justiniano suffered. Yes, the complaint alleges that Walker confronted, fired his gun at, and ultimately killed Justiniano, who was unarmed and experiencing a mental health crisis, but, even if all of that was proven, there still could be no non-speculative inference from those facts that, had Alben provided the training, the shooting would not have happened. Recall, too, that we've said a plaintiff could 'prove causation [in this context] by showing inaction in the face of a "known history of widespread abuse sufficient to alert a supervisor to ongoing violations,"'. . . and it could be alleged by pleading that certain conduct 'is "a highly predictable consequence of a failure to equip law enforcement officers with specific tools to handle recurring situations[.]"'. . This is a non-exhaustive set of examples, certainly, but nothing even approaching these scenarios happened here (as we touched on in part in our deliberate indifference discussion). Instead, the complaint conclusorily alleges that Alben's refusal to change the relevant policies led to the 'inevitable outcome' of Justiniano's death, but does nothing to allege non-speculative facts that would allow an inference that training actually would have altered that outcome. All told, we needed 'more than a sheer possibility that [Alben] ... acted unlawfully[,]' but we didn't get it. . . There's not enough factually alleged here to support a conclusion that Alben acted with deliberate indifference when he neglected to train Walker (and other troopers) on how to interact with the mentally ill; and, regardless of that shortcoming, there's still a dearth of factual allegations to bolster the conclusion that his failure to do so caused Walker to violate Justiniano's rights. Therefore, we affirm the district court's dismissal of the claim against Alben.")

Parker v. Landry, 935 F.3d 9, 14-17, 19 (1st Cir. 2019) ("A supervisory liability claim under section 1983 has two elements: the plaintiff must plausibly allege that 'one of the supervisor's subordinates abridged the plaintiff's constitutional rights' and then forge an affirmative link between the abridgement and some action or inaction on the supervisor's part. . . Such culpable action or inaction may comprise, say, a showing of behavior that constitutes 'supervisory encouragement, condonation or acquiescence[,] or gross negligence ... amounting to deliberate indifference.'. .The concept of supervisory liability is separate and distinct from concepts such as vicarious liability and respondeat superior. . . Although a supervisor need not personally engage in the subordinate's misconduct in order to be held liable, his own acts or omissions must work a constitutional violation. . . Facts showing no more than a supervisor's mere negligence vis-á-vis his subordinate's misconduct are not enough to make out a claim of supervisory liability. . . At a minimum, the plaintiff must allege facts showing that the supervisor's conduct sank to the level of deliberate indifference. . . We train the lens of our inquiry there. . . . Here, the proposed amended complaint does not identify any affirmative acts by any of the defendants that might arguably constitute deliberate indifference. Even in the absence of such facts, though, a plaintiff sometimes can identify a causal nexus by juxtaposing the supervisor's omissions alongside a 'known history of widespread abuse sufficient to alert a supervisor to ongoing violations.'. . But such omissions, if paired only with 'isolated instances' of a subordinate's constitutional violations, will not clear the causation bar. . .In addition to deliberate indifference and causation, the plaintiff must allege facts showing that the supervisor was on notice of the subordinate's misconduct. . . Such notice may be either actual or constructive. . . .The bottom line is that the scanty factual allegations limned in the proposed amended complaint do not make out a plausible showing of deliberate indifference and, thus, do not carry the plaintiff's supervisory liability claims over the plausibility threshold. In the last analysis, the complaint contains no facts sufficient to support a plausible inference that any of the defendants had reason to believe that Dall-Leighton presented a substantial risk of serious harm to female inmates. . . Where, as here, a complaint reveals random puffs of smoke but nothing resembling real signs of fire, the plausibility standard is not satisfied. We iron out one wrinkle. Even in the absence of a showing that officials knew of a substantial risk of serious harm at the hands of a particular subordinate, a plaintiff still may, in rare circumstances, make a plausible showing of deliberate indifference by alleging facts that indicate 'a known history of widespread abuse sufficient to alert a supervisor to ongoing violations,' from which officials could infer a substantial risk of serious harm. . . .We caution, though, that no one should read our opinion as insulating from liability correctional officials who fail to maintain a meaningful and clearly communicated process for detecting sexual abuse of inmates, as that would be inconsistent with our view of the deliberate indifference standard. . . .We need go no further. Moral indignation alone is not enough to permit a court either to hold prison officials liable for every abuse that occurs within a correctional facility or to authorize a plaintiff to embark on a fishing expedition. . . The facts alleged in the plaintiff's proposed amended complaint are simply too exiguous to make out plausible claims of either supervisory liability or civil rights conspiracy against the defendants. . . Accordingly, we hold that the district court acted well within the encincture of its discretion in rejecting as futile the plaintiff's motion for leave to file her amended complaint.")

Guadalupe-Baez v. Pesquera, 819 F.3d 509, 514-17 (1st Cir. 2016) ("Guadalupe's most loudly bruited claims sound in supervisory liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Such a claim has two elements: first, the plaintiff must show that one of the supervisor's subordinates abridged the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . Second, the plaintiff must show that 'the [supervisor]'s action or inaction was affirmative[ly] link[ed] to that behavior in the sense that it could be characterized as supervisory encouragement, condonation, or acquiescence or gross negligence amounting to deliberate indifference.'. . Supervisory liability is sui generis. Thus, a supervisor may not be held liable under section 1983 on the tort theory of respondeat superior, nor can a supervisor's section 1983 liability rest solely on his position of authority. . . This does not mean, however, that for section 1983 liability to attach, a supervisor must directly engage in a subordinate's unconstitutional behavior. . . Even so, the supervisor's liability must be premised on his own acts or omissions. . . Mere negligence will not suffice: the supervisor's conduct must evince 'reckless or callous indifference to the constitutional rights of others.'. . If a plaintiff relies on a theory of deliberate indifference, a three-part inquiry must be undertaken. . . In the course of that inquiry, the plaintiff must show '(1) "that the officials had knowledge of facts," from which (2) "the official[s] can draw the inference" (3) "that a substantial risk of serious harm exists."'. . '[D]eliberate indifference alone does not equate with supervisory liability.'. . Causation remains an essential element, and the causal link between a supervisor's conduct and the constitutional violation must be solid. . . This causation requirement 'contemplates proof that the supervisor's conduct led inexorably to the constitutional violation.'. . That is a difficult standard to meet but far from an impossible one: a plaintiff may, for example, prove causation by showing inaction in the face of a 'known history of widespread abuse sufficient to alert a supervisor to ongoing violations.'. . '[I]solated instances of unconstitutional activity' will not suffice. . .In addition, a supervisor must be on notice of the violation. . . Such notice may be either actual or constructive. . . Before us, Guadalupe argues that the district court erred in dismissing his supervisory liability claims both because it failed to give proper evidentiary weight to the Report and because it imposed too demanding a pleading standard. We agree in part. The amended complaint alleges that each of the supervisory defendants 'negligently confided and entrusted' the unnamed police officers 'with the authority to discharge their apparent duties.' And as to each, the amended complaint also alleges that:

[He] is responsible to [Guadalupe] for his own actions and omissions, negligent entrustment and negligent supervision ... a behavior ... that ... could be characterized as supervisory encouragement, condonation or acquiescence or gross negligence, amounting to deliberate indifference and reckless disregard of [Guadalupe's] rights and guarantees under the law, and improperly training/supervising his subordinates.

The complaint then alleges that every one of the supervisory defendants failed to take necessary investigatory or remedial action after the shooting.

Certain other allegations, relevant only to Pesquera, Somoza, and Sánchez, likewise bear on these supervisory liability claims. As to this group of defendants, the amended complaint further alleges that each member of the group adopted policies that preserved 'the pattern and practice of use of excessive force.' Given this series of averments, Guadalupe's best case is against Pesquera (who became Superintendent of the PRPD after the Report became public and held that office at the time of the shooting). The district court nonetheless dismissed the supervisory liability claim against Pesquera, concluding that Guadalupe's allegations were insufficient to 'connect the dots' and demonstrate that Pesquera's conduct was affirmatively linked to the harm that eventuated. . . We think that the court set the bar too high: viewed as part of the tableau constructed by the Report, Guadalupe has stated a supervisory liability claim against Pesquera that is plausible on its face. As Superintendent, Pesquera bore the ultimate responsibility for overseeing and directing all administrative, operational, training, and disciplinary aspects of the PRPD. An appreciable amount of time elapsed between the issuance of the Report and the shooting. Guadalupe alleges, though, that Pesquera continued—or at least failed to ameliorate—'policies which cause the pattern and practice of use of excessive force.' When this allegation is evaluated in conjunction with the rampant constitutional violations limned in the Report and the parade of horribles allegedly visited upon Guadalupe, a plausible inference exists that Pesquera either condoned or at least acquiesced in the offending conduct—conduct that is affirmatively linked to the harm Guadalupe suffered. Thus, Pesquera may be subject to section 1983 liability as a supervisor for that harm. Any claim by Pesquera that he was unaware of the substantial risk of the serious harm that befell Guadalupe would constitute deliberate indifference to the reality of the dysfunction that Pesquera inherited when he took over as Superintendent of the PRPD. . . The short of it is that Guadalupe's supervisory liability claim against Pesquera crosses the plausibility threshold because the DOJ has given him a leg up. Indeed, it is through such reasoning that district courts in Puerto Rico have consistently given weight to the Report and declined to dismiss analogous claims during the pleading phase. . .We add that plausibility determinations cannot be made in the abstract. Here, all that Guadalupe could reasonably know (or be expected to ascertain) at the time he filed suit was that an unidentified police officer had shot him for no apparent reason. But when combined with the Report, that is enough to get Guadalupe across the plausibility threshold: such random and anonymous violence appears to be a predictable culmination of the systemic problems documented in the Report. In this instance, then, the Report plays a critical role in bridging the plausibility gap. Nor is there anything unfair about this result. The existence of the Report put Pesquera on luminously clear notice that he might become liable, in his supervisory capacity, should his acts and omissions contribute to the continuation of the pathologies described in the Report. . . To be sure, Guadalupe's claim against Pesquera, as pleaded, is not a textbook model. He could have included more particulars about Pesquera's role and responsibilities as Superintendent of the PRPD and tied such details to the known circumstances of his shooting. But we have said before, and today reaffirm, that '[a] high degree of factual specificity is not required at the pleading stage.'. . In our view, there is enough here—though not by much—to permit Guadalupe to proceed to discovery.") Saldivar v. Racine, 818 F.3d 14, 18-20 (1st Cir. 2016) ("The District Court dismissed Saldivar's claim against Racine on the ground that Saldivar had failed to plausibly allege that Racine was deliberately indifferent. The District Court explained that it reached that conclusion because the complaint failed to allege facts that would plausibly show that Racine had the requisite notice of the risk that Pridgen would assault Saldivar. . . Our precedent requires that same conclusion. In order for a police supervisor to be deemed 'deliberately indifferent,' the supervisor must have 'actual or constructive knowledge' of a 'grave risk of harm' posed by the subordinate and fail to take 'easily available measures to address the risk.'. . The complaint does allege that Pridgen had a number of disciplinary violations prior to the alleged assault and rape. Those violations do not, however, include any that would indicate that Pridgen had any propensity for violence or for any other sufficiently related conduct. This absence renders speculative any inference that one might otherwise arguably draw that any officer who would commit such an offense likely had a record that would suffice to give such an indication. . . . We recognize that we are reviewing a dismissal of a complaint and thus that the plaintiff need not prove her allegations. At this early stage in the litigation, she need only make the kind of allegations that would suffice under the standard set forth in Iqbal . . . . Indeed, as we have noted, seemingly all of our analogous § 1983 supervisory liability cases have been resolved at summary judgment, or at other later stages of the litigation. Nonetheless, under the Iqbal standard, the complaint must set forth facts that make the § 1983 claim plausible. . . And, here, we do not believe the facts that have been set forth suffice to make it plausible that the supervisor—Racine—is liable under § 1983 for the horrific conduct by Officer Pridgen that is alleged.") Morales v. Chadbourne, 793 F.3d 208, 220-22 & n.5 (1st Cir. 2015) ("Morales alleges that ICE supervisors Chadbourne and Riccio violated her Fourth Amendment rights because they knew or were deliberately indifferent to the fact that their subordinates routinely issued immigration detainers against naturalized U.S. citizens without probable cause, and formulated or condoned policies permitting the issuance of detainers without probable cause. Defendants argue that Morales has failed to allege sufficient facts to plausibly state a supervisory liability claim. . . .Morales alleges that ICE agents in Rhode Island maintained a practice of 'routinely collaborat[ing]' with state law enforcement authorities 'to issue and enforce detainers against U.S. citizens, particularly naturalized U.S. citizens, ... without sufficient investigation into their citizenship or immigration status and without probable cause to believe that they are non-citizens subject to removal and detention.'. . The complaint further alleges that when an individual is arrested at the ACI and 'provide[s] a foreign country of birth, has a foreign-sounding last name, speaks English with an accent, and/or appears to be Hispanic,' ICE agents 'often fail sufficiently to investigate the arrestee's citizenship or immigration background before issuing an immigration detainer ... without probable cause to believe that the individual is a noncitizen subject to detention and removal by ICE.'. . The complaint further alleges that Chadbourne and Riccio, as the heads of the ICE Boston Field Office and Rhode Island sub-office, 'knew or should have known that their subordinates, including Defendant Donaghy, regularly ... issued immigration detainers against individuals such as Ms. Morales, without conducting sufficient investigation and without probable cause to believe that the subject of the immigration detainer was a non-citizen subject to removal and detention.'. . The complaint adds that Chadbourne and Riccio 'formulated, implemented, encouraged, or willfully ignored [ICE's] policies and customs [in Rhode Island] with deliberate indifference to the high risk of violating Ms. Morales's constitutional rights' and failed to 'change[ ] these harmful policies and customs' although they 'had the power and the authority to change [them] by, for instance, training officers such as Defendant Donaghy to perform an adequate investigation into individuals' citizenship and immigration status before issuing detainers.'. . Relying on the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009), Chadbourne and Riccio contend that Morales's allegations are conclusory and fail to establish an affirmative link between Donaghy's behavior and their action or inaction. . . .We reject Chadbourne and Riccio's argument because, unlike the conclusory allegations in Iqbal, the allegations in Morales's complaint are based on factual assertions that establish the affirmative link necessary to sufficiently plead a supervisory liability claim. [Court details allegations] Based on these detailed allegations—combined with the previously highlighted allegations discussing Chadbourne and Riccio's specific roles—and drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Morales (which we must do at the motion to dismiss stage), it is plausible that Chadbourne and Riccio either formulated and implemented a policy of issuing detainers against naturalized U.S. citizens without probable cause or were deliberately indifferent to the fact that their subordinates were issuing detainers against naturalized U .S. citizens without probable cause. Thus, Morales has sufficiently alleged that Chadbourne and Riccio, through their action or inaction, permitted their subordinates, including Donaghy, to issue detainers without probable cause in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Although there were no specific cases in 2009 directly addressing a supervisor's liability with regard to the issuance of immigration detainers, it is beyond debate that a supervisor who either authorized or was deliberately indifferent to his subordinate's issuance of a detainer without probable cause could be held liable for violating the Fourth Amendment.")

[See also Morales v. Chadbourne, 235 F. Supp. 3d 388, 402–03 (D.R.I. 2017) ("Ms. Morales moves for summary judgment, arguing that Director Chadbourne violated her Fourth Amendment right by failing to supervise and train his agents to issue detainers properly and failing to implement more effective immigration detainer policies. Director Chadbourne also moves for summary judgment, arguing that he was not responsible for training agents—that was done at the ICE training academy—or establishing policies for issuing detainers—that happens at ICE Headquarters in Washington, D.C. . . . .Because Director Chadbourne did not physically issue the detainer or have a hands-on role in holding Ms. Morales, the Court reviews his conduct under the premise of supervisory liability. . . . The Court begins its analysis, looking for an affirmative link between Agent Donaghy's conduct and Director Chadbourne's actions and inactions. The undisputed evidence establishes that Director Chadbourne failed to properly train and supervise his subordinates, including Agent Donaghy, concerning the issuance of detainers. Despite acknowledging his responsibility for communicating ICE policy to agents, Director Chadbourne could not recall discussing the detainer form with his agents or providing any training, guidance, or supervision to them. . . He could not recall reviewing the Hayes Memo with the agents. . . Director Chadbourne did not appear to know that probable cause was required to issue a detainer, testifying that 'an agent does not have to make a determination that a person is in the country illegally before issuing a detainer.'. . The result of this failure to supervise is that Agent Donaghy issued the detainer against Ms. Morales without probable cause based on incomplete information without asking a single question before doing so or conducting a further investigation. Furthermore, Director Chadbourne did not supervise how his employees were issuing detainers through statistical analysis either. He failed to collect statistics about agent-issued detainers and did not report those statistics to ICE headquarters as was required by a 2007 national ICE policy. . . . The bottom line is that Director Chadbourne was not aware that there were any problems with the way his Rhode Island Field Office agents issued detainers because he did not pay attention to the process and explicitly failed to supervise agents. Whether Agent Donaghy's unconstitutional actions were based on Director Chadbourne's inaction in failing to communicate ICE policy, or his failure to review the field offices' detainer statistics for issues, or his failure to ensure through supervision that his agents were not issuing detainers against those asserting citizenship, the Court finds that there was an affirmative link between Agent Donaghy's conduct in issuing an illegal detainer and Director Chadbourne's actions in failing to train and supervise. . . Therefore, Director Chadbourne is liable for the unconstitutional detainer because his supervision and training of his agents, or the lack thereof, was deliberately indifferent to the possibility that their performance, ignorant of the legal standard for issuing a detainer, could cause a deprivation of civil rights.")]

Ramirez-Lluveras v. Rivera-Merced, 759 F.3d 10, 19-21 (1st Cir. 2014) ("The defendants strongly urge that this case be used as a vehicle to recast the contours of supervisory liability in the aftermath of Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). We see no reason to do so or to address what is a hypothetical argument. The plaintiffs' case against the supervisors simply is insufficient to meet this circuit's standards as articulated before and reinforced after Iqbal. There are a number of clear rules governing supervisory liability under § 1983. First, the subordinate's behavior must have caused a constitutional violation, although that alone is not sufficient. . . Here, there is a jury verdict establishing Pagán's and the other two officers' violation of constitutional rights. Additionally, the tort theory of respondeat superior does not allow imposition of supervisory liability under § 1983. . . After Iqbal, as before, we have stressed the importance of showing a strong causal connection between the supervisor's conduct and the constitutional violation. . . .In addition, the supervisor must have notice of the unconstitutional condition said to lead to the claim. . . .Pagán's disciplinary record evidenced seven instances of alleged misconduct over a nearly fourteen-year period. That record was not sufficient to put supervisors on notice that he presented a 'substantial,' 'unusually serious,' or 'grave risk' of shooting an arrestee. . . Nor did it give notice he required discipline beyond that already given to him. We do not discount the seriousness of the domestic violence allegations. We think the commission of these acts by Pagán against his girlfriend is indeed relevant to whether Pagán could be thought to pose a threat of violence to others when he was on official duty. We disagree with the proposition that private domestic abuse is not relevant to the risk of an officer abusing his public position with violence. Nonetheless, in light of all of the facts here, the causal connection the plaintiffs attempt to draw is insufficient as a matter of law to impose supervisory liability even on those supervisors who knew of the content of Pagán's disciplinary record, much less on those who did not know. The domestic abuse events took place in 1998, nearly nine years before the shooting. The complaint about them was handled seriously by the PRPD. The PRPD investigation found that Pagán had made verbal threats and made threats using his weapon, but did not find he had acted on those threats or inflicted physical harm on others, much less used his weapon to shoot anyone. Further, Pagán was promptly sent for evaluation by the Domestic Violence unit, his firearm was taken away, and he was suspended. Once Pagán and the complainant's relationship ended, there were no other domestic abuse complaints filed against Pagán. Importantly, while Toledo–Dávila had recommended termination based only on the pre-hearing allegations, that recommendation was not deemed suitable after Pagán was given a hearing. Indeed, Toledo–Dávila said the evidence at the hearing compelled that reduction of the discipline to a suspension for a period of time. Pagán did receive significant discipline after the hearing: a sixty-day suspension without pay. A reasonable official would think that suspension would have a deterrent effect. Indeed, the handling of the charges in a serious manner seemed to have that effect, for there were no other domestic abuse claims made against Pagán after the charges were brought. This evidence is simply insufficient to show the needed causal relationship between the 1998 domestic abuse complaint and the August 11, 2007 shooting. Even after thoroughly investigating the complaint, the PRPD Superintendent did not conclude that the events showed that Pagán was too dangerous to be in a position in which he would encounter civilians. The record does not evidence any causal link between the two events.")

Ramirez-Lluveras v. Rivera-Merced, 759 F.3d 10, 23, 24, 28-30 (1st Cir. 2014) (Torruella, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part) ("Considering the evidence on record, and drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of the non-moving plaintiffs, I believe the majority judges are incorrect in affirming the grant of summary judgment as to all supervisory defendants. Though a close call, I find there are questions of material fact regarding the supervisory liability of Cruz–Sánchez and Colón–Báez that have improperly been kept from a jury. . . .I am concerned by the majority's view that Pagán's disciplinary history was not enough to put the supervisory officials on notice that he presented a substantial risk of shooting an arrestee or civilian. Underlying this finding is the notion that, in order for liability to attach on a deliberate indifference theory, our case law requires that supervisory officials be on notice, not merely of the potential for violence on the part of the subordinate, but of the potential of a specific act of violence, in this case, shooting a civilian. To be sure, the Supreme Court has provided guidance to the effect that there must be warning of a specific kind of injury. [citing Bryan County] However, if a subordinate's threats of death by gunfire against another person are not enough to put a supervisor on notice that the subordinate is a prime prospect for engaging in such conduct in the future, is it required that his supervisors wait until the subordinate actually commits such a crime before corrective or preventive measures are taken? Such a strenuous standard cannot possibly be the law. In the case of Pagán, after one episode of executing a civilian, it seems obvious now that he is an ideal candidate for supervisory action based on his proven record. For Cáceres, it was one shot too many. . . .I concede that whether the causal connection here is sufficient, is a close question, particularly as to Cruz–Sánchez. I understand it may seem a stretch to some, at first glance, that a few violent episodes in 1998 would somehow be linked to another violent episode in 2007. However, it is in part because this is a difficult question that I believe the majority errs in not allowing the jury to fulfill its traditional function. . . Though Pagán's most egregious acts of violence happened years before the murder of Cáceres, the disciplinary proceedings related to those acts did not conclude until eight years later, in October 2006, when Pagán served his suspension only months before the execution. . . . A jury should have the opportunity to determine whether Cruz–Sánchez and Colón–Báez were on notice of the risk of harm Pagán posed to civilians. It should also have the occasion to determine whether either defendant should have seized any of the opportunities they had to keep Pagán from acting out and repeating his violent tendencies. I believe a reasonable jury could answer both inquiries in the affirmative. A claim of ignorance cannot shield them from liability. In fact, such a claim might be probative of deliberate indifference. Accordingly, for these reasons, I dissent.")

Marrero-Rodriguez v. Municipality of San Juan, 677 F.3d 497, 501-03 (1st Cir. 2012) ("The individual defendants who held the positions of Lieutenant of the Municipal Police, Commissioner of the Municipal Police, Operational Field Chief, Operation Field Sub–Director, Commanding Officer of Specialized Units, Administrative Director of Police Training, Captain of the Municipal Police, and/or Instructors are all, on the pleadings, charged with responsibility for police training and the training that day. By contrast, the Municipality is pled to be liable merely because it employs the individual defendants and because it did not have sufficient training regulations in place, and the Mayor is said to be liable because he is Mayor. . . . From these facts a number of inferences may be drawn in favor of plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment claim. The conduct of shooting in the back a participant in a training exercise was certainly likely to injure. It is plausible that no reasonable government interest in this training exercise justified a police officer taking out a firearm and placing it to the unprotected back of a prone officer, who was face down, motionless, under control, and unarmed. Further, it is plausibly shocking that Santiago, the co-supervisor of the training, did nothing to intervene when Lt. Pacheco placed the gun to Lozada's back. Moreover, this was done by the highest-ranking supervisor present, as part of a training program. Lt. Pacheco, that supervisor, did not discharge his weapon before entering the facility and did not go through the required checkpoint, in violation of several training protocols. Moreover, Lt. Pacheco said that it was not proper training to merely subdue and control a suspect. Rather, he illustrated 'proper' training by using what was obviously lethal force, entirely disproportionate to any reasonable need, in conducting the lesson. The inference can be drawn that the instruction given by Lt. Pacheco as 'proper' in this type of situation was shockingly indifferent to the rights of the subdued 'suspects.' These factual allegations may not prove to be true; but at this stage, all inferences are drawn in the plaintiffs' favor. In short, as to the defendant officers directly involved, Lt. Pacheco and Santiago, the facts are sufficiently pled. As to the police defendants not present that day, but with direct responsibility for training, the question is closer. The complaint can, if read generously, be read to say they are not being sued merely because they are supervisors who engaged in no misconduct themselves, but because they each had direct responsibility for the conduct of training exercises and had some active involvement in the structuring of the lethal training exercise that day, and that at least some should have been there that day. Other inferences may also be drawn-their failure to implement policies, protocols, or correct training about use of live firearms and preventing deaths in such exercises from the police defendants was itself so lacking in justification as to be shocking to the conscience. This is slightly more than was pled in Soto–Torres v. Fraticelli, 654 F.3d 153 (1st Cir.2011), and Peñalbert–Rosa v.. Fortuño–Burset, 631 F.3d 592 (1st Cir.2011), where we found the pleadings insufficient. At this early stage we are reluctant to dismiss. The role of these defendants can be made clearer in discovery and nothing precludes later efforts to end the case against them should discovery not substantiate these inferences. It takes more than this, though, to assert a § 1983 claim against those who have no personal involvement of any sort in the events, such as the Mayor, and more to assert a claim against the Municipality. The Mayor is not amenable to suit, as pled in the complaint, merely because he is Mayor. Nor may the Municipality be sued under § 1983, as pled, on a respondeat superior theory that it is liable because it employs the individual defendants. . . . In this case, although the complaint alleges that there were insufficient regulations in place to govern the training exercise, it also describes several safety procedures that were intended to prevent exactly this type of accident. In particular, it states that: (1) before entering the training area, officers were to discharge their weapons in a sandbox; (2) in the training facility, officers were only to use only 'dummy guns'; and (3) at this particular training, no firearms were to be used. As a result, no plausible claim of municipal liability based on lack of any safety procedures is stated. The facts as alleged may turn out not to be so. It may be that this shooting was a horrid accident brought about by the inexplicable actions of one man, Lt. Pacheco. But we think the Fourteenth Amendment pleadings, as inartful as they are, point to sufficiently plausible theories of violation to survive dismissal at this stage, save as to the Mayor and the Municipality.")

Feliciano-Hernandez v. Pereira-Castillo, 663 F.3d 527, 533-36 (1st Cir. 2011) ("Feliciano-Hernández's complaint fails under Iqbal to plead adequately that the individual defendants violated his constitutional rights and so fails the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. As such, he necessarily fails the second prong as well: an objectively reasonable public official situated as defendants would not be on notice of violations of any constitutional rights. The named defendants are very high-level officials, each of whom, as Secretary of the Department of Corrections, had vast responsibilities. . . . The complaint sets forth a series of conclusions. It alleges that '[i]n keeping the plaintiff confined beyond the term of his sentence, each defendant acted with deliberate indifference and/or reckless disregard of the plaintiff's Eighth Amendment rights and due process of law' and that '[e]ach defendant [ ] unjustifiabl[y] deprived plaintiff of liberty in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights and due process of law.'. The complaint states as to each of the former-Secretary defendants that he or she 'is being sued on the basis of his [or her] deliberate indifference and/or reckless disregard' of the plaintiff's rights. It alleges among other conclusions that the defendants 'failed in their duty to assure adequate monitoring, disciplining, evaluating, training and supervising any and all personnel under their charge, to assure that all inmates were properly classified and released upon completion of their sentence.' It relatedly alleges that '[h]ad the defendants complied with their supervisory duties, they would have identified those employees that did not properly register the plaintiff's classification and inaccurately categorized the crimes for which he had been sentenced.' None of these conclusory allegations suffice to establish a claim. These are exactly the sort of 'unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation[s]' that both we and the Supreme Court have found insufficient. . . . There are a number of other specific deficiencies in the complaint. We start (and end) with the failure to plead that any of the named defendants, each a former Secretary of the Department of Corrections, had any individual notice that plaintiff's incarceration beyond 1993 was a violation of his constitutional rights, much less that there was an affirmative link to them or that they were deliberately indifferent to those notices of alleged violations of his rights. Actual or constructive knowledge of a rights violation is a prerequisite for stating any claim. . . .Even beyond failing to show notice to the individual defendants, the complaint fails on other grounds. Feliciano-Hernández 'would still have to go further, for "not every official who is aware of a problem exhibits deliberate indifference by failing to resolve it."'. . . The complaint contains no factual allegations to support even a minimal showing of deliberate indifference.")

Soto-Torres v. Fraticelli, 654 F.3d 153, 157-60 & nn.7 & 8 (1st Cir. 2011) ("Soto-Torres does not allege that SAC [Special Agent in Charge] Fraticelli was present when these events occurred or that Fraticelli witnessed their occurrence. Rather, he makes only two relevant allegations. He alleges that Fraticelli 'was the officer in charge during the incident' and that he 'participated in or directed the constitutional violations alleged ... or knew of the violation[s] and failed to act to prevent them.' These are the only allegations that address Fraticelli's involvement in Soto-Torres's detention. . . . . In Maldonado we observed that 'recent language from the Supreme Court may call into question our prior circuit law on the standard for holding a public official liable under § 1983 [and Bivens] on a theory of supervisory liability.'. . However, as in Maldonado, '[w]e need not resolve this issue ... because we find that [Soto-Torres has] not pled facts sufficient to make out a plausible entitlement to relief under our previous formulation of the standards for supervisory liability.'. . . Soto-Torres essentially brings this suit on a theory of supervisory liability. The only allegations in the complaint linking Fraticelli with the detention of Soto-Torres are that Fraticelli 'was the officer in charge during the incident' and that he 'participated in or directed the constitutional violations alleged herein, or knew of the violation[s] and failed to act to prevent them.' Iqbal and our precedents applying it make clear that these claims necessarily fail. As our discussion of the law of supervisory liability makes clear, the allegation that Fraticelli was 'the officer in charge' does not come close to meeting the required standard. While the complaint states that Fraticelli 'participated in or directed the constitutional violations alleged herein,' it provided no facts to support either that he 'participated in' or 'directed' the plaintiff's detention. In some sense, all high officials in charge of a government operation 'participate in' or 'direct' the operation. Iqbal makes clear that this is plainly insufficient to support a theory of supervisory liability and fails as a matter of law.For the complaint to have asserted a cognizable claim, it was required to allege additional facts sufficient to make out a violation of a constitutional right. Those additional facts would then be measured against the standards for individual liability. The complaint would have had to plead facts supporting a plausible inference that Fraticelli personally directed the officers to take those steps against plaintiff which themselves violated the Constitution in some way. Such a pleading would then have been tested to see whether the standards for immunity had been met. But in this case, the complaint does not even meet the first prong of our two-part Iqbal inquiry. Our precedents make clear that it is not enough to state that a defendant 'was the officer in charge during the incident' and that he 'participated in or directed the constitutional violations' alleged. . . . The district court treated the reasoning of Maldonado as inapplicable to this case because the portions of Maldonado that laid out the requirements for supervisory liability concerned a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim, whereas here, Soto-Torres attempts to state a supervisory liability theory for violation of his Fourth Amendment rights. However, the constitutional source of a plaintiff's claims are [sic] irrelevant to this court's analysis of whether a plaintiff has satisfactorily articulated a supervisory liability theory. Neither Maldonado nor Iqbal suggest [sic] that supervisory liability theories should be treated differently based on whether they are made to support a claim under the Fourth Amendment or the Fourteenth Amendment.")

Leavitt v. Correctional Medical Services, Inc., 645 F.3d 484, 502 (1st Cir. 2011) ("Nor can supervisory officials, like Tritch, be held liable for the conduct of their subordinates solely under a theory of respondeat superior. . . It may be true that the care Leavitt received at MSP was generally inadequate. However, to make out a cognizable Eighth Amendment claim against healthcare providers in their individual capacity, he must demonstrate that there is sufficient evidence for a reasonable factfinder to conclude that each CMS defendant was 'aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists,' and that each defendant did, in fact, 'draw the inference.'. . We cannot conclude that Leavitt has satisfied his burden.")

Sanchez v. Pereira-Castillo, 590 F.3d 31, 48, 49 (1st Cir. 2009) ("We read plaintiff's complaint to assert a claim of supervisory liability under Section 1983 against the administrative correctional defendants, namely Pereira, Fontanez, Díaz, Negrón, and Soto, premised on the theory that those defendants failed adequately to train the correctional defendants who were implicated in the surgery itself. Although 'Government officials may not be held liable for the unconstitutional conduct of their subordinates under a theory of respondeat superior,' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948, supervisory officials may be liable on the basis of their own acts or omissions. Aponte-Matos v. Toledo-Dávila, 135 F.3d 182, 192 (1st Cir.1998). In the context of Section 1983 actions, supervisory liability typically arises in one of two ways: either the supervisor may be a 'primary violator or direct participant in the rights-violating incident,' or liability may attach 'if a responsible official supervises, trains, or hires a subordinate with deliberate indifference toward the possibility that deficient performance of the task eventually may contribute to a civil rights deprivation.' Camilo-Robles v. Zapata, 175 F.3d 41, 44 (1st Cir.1999). In the latter scenario, relevant here, the analysis focuses on 'whether the supervisor's actions displayed deliberate indifference toward the rights of third parties and had some causal connection to the subsequent tort.' Id. In either case, the plaintiff in a Section 1983 action must show 'an affirmative link, whether through direct participation or through conduct that amounts to condonation or tacit authorization,' id., between the actor and the underlying violation. In determining whether allegations state a plausible claim for relief, the Supreme Court has suggested that we 'begin by identifying pleadings that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1950. Turning to plaintiff's complaint, we find that it does little more than assert a legal conclusion about the involvement of the administrative correctional defendants in the underlying constitutional violation. Parroting our standard for supervisory liability in the context of Section 1983, the complaint alleges that the administrative defendants were 'responsible for ensuring that the correctional officers under their command followed practices and procedures [that] would respect the rights and ensure the bodily integrity of Plaintiff' and that 'they failed to do [so] with deliberate indifference and/or reckless disregard of Plaintiff's federally protected rights.' This is precisely the type of 'the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me' allegation that the Supreme Court has determined should not be given credence when standing alone. Id. at 1949. The sole additional reference to the administrative correctional defendants' role in the surgery is the complaint's statement that '[t]he pushiness exerted by John Doe [upon the doctors] followed ... the regulations and directives designed by Pereira and construed and implemented by all of the other Supervisory Defendants .'. . However, the only regulations described in the complaint are the strip search and x-ray regulations promulgated by Pereira. The deliberate indifference required to establish a supervisory liability/failure to train claim cannot plausibly be inferred from the mere existence of a poorly-implemented strip search or x-ray policy and a bald assertion that the surgery somehow resulted from those policies. We conclude, therefore, that the 'complaint has alleged-but it has not Ashow[n]'-Athat the pleader is entitled to relief''from the administrative correctional defendants. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1950 (quoting Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 8(a)(2)). Although it did so on different grounds, the district court was correct to dismiss the claims against those defendants. . . .We conclude that plaintiff's allegations against Cabán and John Doe are sufficient to allow us 'to draw the reasonable inference that [each] defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged .' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949. Although the claims against John Doe and Cabán also rest on a form of supervisory liability in the sense that neither one actually performed the surgery on plaintiff, those claims do not depend on a showing by plaintiff of a failure to train amounting to deliberate indifference to his constitutional rights. Instead, plaintiff succeeds in pleading that the defendants were liable as 'primary violator[s] ... in the rights-violating incident,' thereby stating a sufficient claim for relief. . . . We begin with the claims against Sergeant Cabán. . . Plaintiff's complaint specifically alleges that Cabán was directly involved in all phases of the search for contraband. . . and in the ultimate decision to transport plaintiff to the hospital 'for a rectal examination and/or a medical procedure to remove the foreign object purportedly lodged in Plaintiff's rectum.' The complaint goes on to allege that John Doe, acting pursuant to 'orders imparted by Cabán,' pressured the doctors to conduct a medical procedure to remove the illusory cell phone from plaintiff's bowels. Given these allegations, it is a plausible inference that Cabán caused plaintiff to be subjected to the deprivation of his Fourth Amendment rights. See 42 U.S.C. § 1983.").

Maldonado v. Fontanes, 568 F.3d 263, 273-75 & n.7(1st Cir. 2009) ("[A]nalyzing the pleadings under Iqbal, we hold that the allegations of the complaint do not allege a sufficient connection between the Mayor and the alleged conscience-shocking behavior – the killing of the seized pets – to state the elements of a substantive due process violation.. . . The purported liability of the Mayor for damages for substantive due process violations does not involve a policy of the Municipality for which he is responsible, nor does it rest on his personal conduct. Instead, the allegations against the Mayor are that he promulgated a pet policy for the public housing complexes and was present at and participated in one of the raids. This level of involvement is insufficient to support a finding of liability. . . . Plaintiffs complaint identifies no policy which authorized the killing of the pets, much less one which the Mayor authorized. Second, the complaint does not allege that the Mayor was personally involved in any conscience-shocking conduct during the raids. . . .A government official who himself inflicts truly outrageous, uncivilized, and intolerable harm on a person or his property may be liable; but there is no claim in this complaint the Mayor himself inflicted such harm. . . The allegations against the Mayor thus do not establish that his involvement was sufficiently direct to hold him liable for violations of the plaintiffs' substantive due process rights. Nor do the allegations make out a viable case for supervisory liability, such that the Mayor could, on these pleadings, be held responsible for violations of the plaintiffs' substantive due process rights committed by subordinate municipal employees or workers from ACS. . . . Some recent language from the Supreme Court may call into question our prior circuit law on the standard for holding a public official liable for damages under § 1983 on a theory of supervisory liability. . . We need not resolve this issue, however, because we find that the plaintiffs have not pled facts sufficient to make out a plausible entitlement to relief under our previous formulation of the standards for supervisory liability. . . . Here, the Mayor's promulgation of a pet policy that was silent as to the manner in which the pets were to be collected and disposed of, coupled with his mere presence at one of the raids, is insufficient to create the affirmative link necessary for a finding of supervisory liability, even under a theory of deliberate indifference. The Mayor is entitled to qualified immunity on the pleadings on the Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claims.").

Horan v. Cabral, No. CV 16-10359-GAO, 2017 WL 4364174, at *3 (D. Mass. Sept. 29, 2017) ("Discovery on Monell liability has been stayed, and there has been no discovery on the question of the existence of a policy or practice that caused the plaintiff to be deprived of a constitutional right. Thus, the defendant cannot move for summary judgment on this issue. See Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(d). Even assuming an underlying constitutional violation by medical personnel in the respect alleged, the complaint fails to support a plausible inference that Cabral had personally been involved with the subordinate personnel who provided the care such that she could be liable as a supervisor. Drawing a reasonable inference in the plaintiff's favor, that the January 22 letter from the plaintiff's counsel was received and read by Cabral, the letter neither establishes an 'affirmative link' nor plausibly supports the inference that Cabral's conduct 'led inexorably' to the purported constitutional violation. . . Cabral's inaction after receiving a letter that notified her of a disagreement regarding the plaintiff's medical treatment plan is, without more, not enough to establish deliberate indifference on her part. Additionally, an isolated incident of constitutionally deficient medical care does not plausibly allege a policy or practice of deliberate indifference to constitutional violations on the part of Cabral. . . Because the complaint does not state a plausible basis for relief, the § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim against defendant Cabral is dismissed.")

McLaren, as Administratrix of the Estate of Leyland v. Salisbury, No. CV 24-263-JJM-LDA, 2025 WL 846490, at *2–3 (D.R.I. Mar. 18, 2025) ("It has been clearly established since at least 1986, 'that police officers violate the Fourteenth Amendment due process rights of a detainee if they display a "deliberate indifference" to the unusually strong risk that a detainee will commit suicide.'. . . And supervisory liability may attach under § 1983 for failure to train police or correctional officers on the prevention of detainee suicides. . . Taking the allegations in the First Amended Complaint as true, the RIDOC and its agents knew that Mr. Leyland was suicidal. It claims that Defendants failed to act in the face of this knowledge. They placed him on a suicide watch, but then failed to watch. They did not constantly observe him in violation of their own procedure. This evidence of actual knowledge and lack of required action and inaction is sufficient to show deliberate indifference. As to the Supervisory Defendants did not train the John Does on RIDOC's suicide prevention policy, did not implement the policy, and did not hold the John Does responsible or accountable for violating the policy. On this limited factual record, qualified immunity does not apply. . . .A review of the facts alleged in the Amended Complaint shows that the Estate has plausibly alleged sufficient facts to establish each of their causes of action, including objective and subjective deliberate indifference under the Eighth Amendment. Under the Eighth Amendment, prisoners cannot be treated with 'deliberate indifference' toward 'a substantial risk of serious harm to health' or 'serious medical needs.' . . . The Estate has alleged that the RIDOC and its agents knew that Mr. Leyland was suicidal. They placed him on a suicide watch, but then failed to watch. They did not constantly observe him in violation of their own procedure. This evidence of actual knowledge and lack of required action and inaction is sufficient to show deliberate indifference. As to the Supervising Defendants specifically, the Estate plausibly claims that the Supervisory Defendants failed to properly train the John Doe correctional officers ("COs") Defendants on the RIDOC's suicide-prevention policy, failed to implement the policy, and failed to hold COs responsible or accountable for violating the policy. The First Circuit has long recognized that supervisory liability may attach under § 1983 for failure to train police or correctional officers on the prevention of detainee suicides. . . The Estate has plausibly alleged that a 'seriously elevated risk of suicide, [the supervisors'] knowledge of that risk, and [the supervisors'] failure to take obvious remedial steps, to the point where [their] culpability considerably exceeds negligence and, because it is "reckless" or "callous" or wanton.'")

De Los Santos, as Administratrix of the Estate of De Los Santos v. Salisbury, No. CV 24-266-JJM-LDA, 2025 WL 846411, at *1–3 (D.R.I. Mar. 18, 2025) ("While suffering withdrawal symptoms from substance use disorder, Mr. De Los Santos made known to Defendants that he intended to commit suicide. Despite this information, RIDOC staff provided Mr. De Los Santos with underwear, socks, and two T-shirts, and staff either provided Mr. De Los Santos with shoelaces or did not remove his shoelaces. RIDOC staff also did not keep constant visual supervision of him in violation of standard operating policy and took no action to abate the known risk that Mr. De Los Santos would commit suicide. Two days after arriving in RIDOC care, while alone and unwatched in his cell, Mr. De Los Santos wrapped his shoelaces around his neck, affixed the laces to something in his cell, and hung himself. RIDOC staff called rescue who found Mr. De Los Santos pulseless, and found his body cool to the touch. RIDOC staff reported to Emergency Medical Services ("EMS") that Mr. De Los Santos was last seen alive about an hour earlier. Despite cardio-pulmonary resuscitation, the EMS found no signs of life throughout treatment and transported Mr. De Los Santos's body to Rhode Island Hospital where he was pronounced dead. . . . Taking the allegations in the First Amended Complaint as true, Defendants failed to act in the face of Mr. De Los Santos's known risk of imminent suicide. He presented to RIDOC as an unusually strong suicide risk; he was wearing a suicide prevention Tyvek suit, Pawtucket Police told RIDOC that he threatened suicide, and Mr. De Los Santos himself told Defendants that he was contemplating suicide. Defendants did not follow their own protocol and instead ignored these signs, putting Mr. De Los Santos at risk. The Supervisory Defendants did not train the COs on RIDOC's suicide prevention policy, did not implement the policy, and did not hold COs responsible or accountable for violating the policy. On this record, qualified immunity does not apply. . . . A review of the facts alleged in the Amended Complaint shows that the Estate has plausibly alleged sufficient facts to establish each of their causes of action, including objective and subjective deliberate indifference under the Eighth Amendment. . . . The Estate has alleged that the RIDOC and its agents knew that Mr. De Los Santos had a history of substance abuse, he swallowed a bag of fentanyl, was wearing a suicide-prevention jumper when he arrived at the ACI, he had attempted suicide while in the custody of Pawtucket Police, and he told RIDOC agents that he had suicidal ideations. The Estate has alleged that, despite the Defendants' actual notice that Mr. de Los Santos was suicidal and likely to harm himself, they did not take necessary precautions to keep him safe and RIDOC agents had not checked on him for over an hour. These allegations of actual knowledge and lack of action are sufficient to plead deliberate indifference. As to the Supervising Defendants specifically, the Estate plausibly claims that the Supervisory Defendants failed to train the John Doe correctional officers ("COs") Defendants on the RIDOC's suicide-prevention policy, failed to implement the policy, and failed to hold COs responsible or accountable for violating the policy. . . The Estate has plausibly alleged that a 'seriously elevated risk of suicide, [the supervisor's] knowledge of that risk, and [the supervisor's] failure to take obvious remedial steps, to the point where [their] culpability considerably exceeds negligence and, because it is "reckless" or "callous" or wanton.'")

Thomas v. Town of Chelmsford, 267 F.Supp.3d 279, ___ (D. Mass. 2017) ("The Court concludes that a school's failure to take action to stop bullying and sexual harassment in response to a student's complaints of rape is sufficiently adverse to state a retaliation claim. . . .The parties spar over whether the individual defendants were deliberately indifferent to students' behavior toward Matthew. Both parties miss the antecedent issue, which is that supervisory liability cannot be predicated on actions by students. First, it is plain that a student does not have a supervisor-subordinate relationship with a teacher or school administrator. Second, a student's actions cannot create the underlying constitutional infringement to support supervisory liability because of the lack of state action. Supervisory liability may nonetheless exist as to individual defendants who encouraged or were deliberately indifferent to the actions of school district employees who infringed the plaintiffs' constitutional rights. The complaint alleges that Superintendent Tiano supervised A.D. Moreau and Principal Caliri. . . The complaint also alleges that Principal Caliri directly supervised Dean Doherty and all teachers at CHS. . . Superintendent Tiano and Principal Caliri are the only two individual defendants alleged to have had supervisory roles. . . But for any supervisory liability to attach to either defendant, the complaint must allege acts or omissions by that supervisor rather than relying on a general theory of vicarious liability. Plaintiffs have already adequately pleaded primary liability for First Amendment retaliation against Superintendent Tiano and Principal Caliri with respect to deliberate indifference to the sexual harassment of Matthew by fellow students. The question is whether the complaint also adequately alleges that Superintendent Tiano and Principal Caliri have supervisory liability for First Amendment retaliation. The plaintiffs argue that Superintendent Tiano and Principal Caliri knew that multiple teachers were making retaliatory comments about Matthew, but that Superintendent Tiano and Principal Caliri themselves retaliated against Matthew by being deliberately indifferent to the constitutional violations in a way that could be considered supervisory encouragement or condonation. But the complaint suggests that the administration did respond to reports of teachers' retaliatory comments. . . While the plaintiffs argue that the administrators' response was inadequate, the Court's role is not to second-guess supervisory approaches. Rather, the question is whether the plaintiffs plead such deliberate indifference on the part of the supervisors that the supervisors themselves could be said to have engaged in constitutional misconduct. The plaintiffs fail to state a supervisory liability claim against Superintendent Tiano and Principal Caliri.")

Langlois v. Pacheco, No. CV 16-12109-FDS, 2017 WL 2636043, at *7 (D. Mass. June 19, 2017) ("Failure-to-train claims are typically brought against municipal defendants or other entities, not individuals. Nonetheless, 'a supervisor may be held individually liable under § 1983 if ... [a failure to] train the offending employee caused a deprivation of constitutional rights.' Andrews v. Fowler, 98 F.3d 1069, 1078 (8th Cir. 1996); see also Shirback v. Lantz, 2008 WL 878939, at *4 n.5 (D. Conn. March 28, 2008) ("It appears to the court that the standard for 'deliberate indifference' as an element of a claim for municipal liability [for failure to train or supervise] is the same as the standard for 'deliberate indifference or gross negligence' as an element of a claim of personal liability.").")

Morales v. Chadbourne, 235 F. Supp. 3d 388, 403 (D.R.I. 2017) ("Director Chadbourne also asserts a defense of qualified immunity. The Court has previously outlined the law, see supra Section III.A.2, so will turn directly to Director Chadbourne's factual assertions in support of this defense. In order to qualify for immunity, Mr. Chadbourne would have to prove that the constitutional right was not clearly established and that, as a reasonable officer, he did not understand that his conduct violated that right. Where Director Chadbourne's qualified immunity defense fails is in proving the 'clearly established' prong. The evidence shows that it was clearly established in 2009 that Ms. Morales had a constitutional right as a United States citizen not to have her liberty infringed based on a detainer that lacked probable cause, . . . and Director Chadbourne should have understood that his actions violated the Fourth Amendment. He should have known that agents needed probable cause to issue the detainer, but was deliberately indifferent to the standard under which ICE should issue detainers. The mandatory directives from the Hayes Memo, which he was responsible for knowing, understanding, and communicating to his agents, said as much. Moreover, he had the power and authority to supervise these individuals. ICE policy required him to keep statistics on enforcement of immigration detainers, presumably so that any aberration of policy could be detected, but he failed to do so, permitting violations of the constitutional rights of United States citizens like Ms. Morales. Director Chadbourne's conduct was not objectively reasonable in 2009 and the Court finds that qualified immunity does not shield his deficiencies.")

Diaz v. Devlin, 229 F.Supp.3d 101, 109-10 (D. Mass. 2017) ("For purposes of this motion, Det. Carlson does not argue that the Plaintiffs' constitutional rights were not violated, rather he argues that Plaintiffs have not alleged any facts which establish that any action or inaction on his part caused any such violations, either by him directly, or in his supervisory capacity. Plaintiffs have made general allegations that Det. Carlson was a member of the WPD vice squad involved in the Jackson investigation, had Jackson under surveillance at another address, helped plan the raid, and 'assisted' in carrying out the raid. Plaintiffs have not pled any specific facts which link Det. Carlson, directly or indirectly, to any [of] the alleged unlawful conduct. Such bare-bones allegations are insufficient to establish a plausible Section 1983 claim against Det. Carlson for illegal search and/or use of excessive force. Plaintiffs suggest that Det. Carlson may be liable for the violations of their rights as a supervisor of those officers who were involved in the raid. However, even assuming that Det. Carlson was the supervisor of the officers who executed the raid, as to the excessive force claim, courts have extended section 1983 liability only to those police supervisors who were physically present and either directed their subordinates to violate others' rights or failed to intervene to prevent their subordinates from violating others' rights. As discussed above, Plaintiffs have not pled any facts which establish that Det. Carlson was present at the Apartment, and, even if they had, they have not alleged that he directed his subordinates to use force against them, or that he was in a position to intervene. Det. Carlson's mere presence, his planning and/or execution of the raid is insufficient 'to create the affirmative link necessary for a finding of supervisory liability.' Maldonado v. Fontanes, 568 F.3d 263, 275 (1st Cir. 2009). As to Plaintiffs' Section 1983 supervisory claim against Det. Carlson for illegal search and seizure, as stated above, Plaintiffs' barebones allegations fail to state a plausible claim against Det. Carlson for a direct violation. As to the claim asserted against him in his supervisory capacity, Plaintiffs have failed to link any action or inaction of Det. Carlson the behavior of a subordinate which led to a constitutional deprivation. Instead, Plaintiffs rely on conclusory allegations and unsupported speculation, which is insufficient to establish the affirmative link necessary to establish the deliberate indifference on the part of Det. Carlson in his supervisory capacity. For the reasons set forth above, I find that Plaintiffs have not alleged plausible Section 1983 claims against Det. Carlson for excessive force or illegal search and seizure. Therefore, those claims are dismissed.")

Doan v. Bergeron, No. 15-CV-11725-IT, 2016 WL 5346935, at *5 (D. Mass. Sept. 23, 2016) ("Hodgson's reliance on Sanchez v. Pereira-Castillo, 590 F.3d 31, 49-50 (1st Cir. 2009), is misplaced. In that case, the First Circuit affirmed the dismissal of a deliberate indifference claim against a prison superintendent and other high-level prison officials because the plaintiff brought forth only bald legal conclusions against those defendants. There, the plaintiff alleged only that those defendants were deliberately indifferent just because they had responsibility 'for ensuring that the correctional officers under their command followed practices and procedures [that] would respect the rights and ensure the bodily integrity of Plaintiff' and failed to do so. . . Here, however, Doan alleges not just Hodgson's responsibility for assuring Doan's adequate medical care, but also that he knew about Doan's condition and the absence of adequate care and did nothing to remedy that.")

Doan v. Bergeron, No. 15-CV-11725-IT, 2016 WL 5346935, at *8-9 (D. Mass. Sept. 23, 2016) ("When a plaintiff seeks to hold liable a defendant based on his supervisory role over others who allegedly violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights, the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is satisfied when (1) the subordinate's actions violated a clearly established constitutional right, and (2) it was clearly established that a supervisor would be liable for constitutional violations perpetrated by his subordinates in that context. In other words, for a supervisor to be liable there must be a bifurcated 'clearly established' inquiry—one branch probing the underlying violation, and the other probing the supervisor's potential liability. . . As to the first step of the 'clearly established' inquiry, the violations of Gallagher's subordinates—CPS and the Bristol County Sheriff's Office defendants—were violations of clearly established constitutional rights. Doan's right to be free from involuntary medication—implicated by the allegations that CPS defendants gave Doan Haldol even though she was incapable of giving informed consent and they did not have a court order to do so, . . . was clearly established, as the Supreme Court has stated that prisoners 'possess[ ] a significant liberty interest in avoiding the unwanted administration of antipsychotic drugs.'. . Doan's right to be free from harm—implicated by Gallagher's failure to protect Doan from the involuntary medication of Haldol—was also clearly established in Supreme Court case law. . . .As to the second step of the analysis, it was clearly established that a supervisor would be liable for the violations of his subordinates in this context, where Gallagher was alleged to have known about the constitutional violations. A supervisor can be liable for the actions of his subordinates if he or she 'is on notice' to 'ongoing violations' and 'fails to take corrective action.'. . Here, Doan has alleged that Gallagher was aware of the ongoing constitutional violations that she was suffering, had the power to alleviate those violations by relocating Doan, but failed to take corrective action. Gallagher relies on cases from other circuits holding that non-medical jail or prison officials such as Gallagher are entitled to rely on the expertise of medical personnel. See Arnett v. Webster, 658 F.3d 742, 755 (7th Cir. 2011) (stating that "if a prisoner is under the care of medical experts, a non-medical prison official will generally be justified in believing that the prisoner is in capable hands"); Spruill v. Gillis, 372 F.3d 218, 236 (3d Cir. 2004) (same). However, 'non-medical officials can be chargeable with ... deliberate indifference where they have a reason to believe (or actual knowledge) that prison doctors or their assistants are mistreating (or not treating) a prisoner.' Arnett, 658 F.3d at 755. This is what Doan alleges; that Gallagher knew that CPS was involuntarily medicating Doan and failed to take any corrective action. Accordingly, Gallagher is not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation.")

Doan v. Bergeron, No. 15-CV-11725-IT, 2016 WL 5346935, at *9 (D. Mass. Sept. 23, 2016) ("Gallagher also argues that Doan has failed to make a cognizable claim against him under Bivens. Specifically, he states that Doan is making out a vicarious liability argument, which is not permissible under Bivens. . .Doan, however, is not making such a claim. Instead, her claim is one of supervisory liability. A supervisory claim is viable as a Bivens claim, but only if liability is premised on the supervisor's 'own acts or omissions.' . . With such a claim, a plaintiff must show that the supervisor's 'action or inaction was "affirmatively linked" to the constitutional violation caused by the subordinate.'. . In other words, the supervisor's behavior must be able to be characterized as 'supervisory encouragement, condonation, or acquiescence or gross negligence ... amounting to deliberate indifference.'. . Here, as Doan alleges, Gallagher knew of the unconstitutional conditions to which Doan was subjected, and though he had power to relocate Doan from the institution that was responsible for these conditions, he failed to do so, allowing the unconstitutional conditions to continue. Such facts as stated plausibly make out claim that Gallagher was deliberately indifferent to the constitutional violations against Doan by CPS. Accordingly, at this stage, Doan has pled enough so as to survive a motion to dismiss Count V against Gallagher in his individual capacity.")

Rodriguez v. Sancha, No. CV 12-1243(PAD), 2016 WL 1247208, at *8-10 (D.P.R. Feb. 24, 2016) ("Regarding co-Defendants Figueroa–Sancha and Vázquez, Plaintiffs have presented evidence that points to the existence of an atmosphere of possible supervisory encouragement, condonation or acquiescence amounting to deliberate indifference and lack of supervision at the PRPD. It is uncontested that there was no hands-on training in the use (or prevention) of excessive force and of civil rights by the PRPD. All the officers had was the 'local Academy' which consisted of an informal meeting roughly every month where communications from Police Headquarters were discussed and discussions about the use of force and civil rights were held with the participants. This was not hands-on training. Furthermore, at the time the events that gave rise to this complaint took place in 2010, the PRPD was not required to provide regular training on use of force and civil rights to its officers. That is directly in contrast to today, where the PRPD is under an obligation to provide better training and disciplinary process to officers as a result of a stipulation between the local Department of Justice, the United States Department of Justice and the PPRD. The findings by the USDOJ further undermines Defendants' defense. The USDOJ found, among others, that the 'PRPD appears to lack basic contemporary practices that have been adopted by many law enforcement agencies to safeguard the fundamental constitutional rights of the citizens they serve', as well as insufficient guidelines on the application of force, lack of formal requirements for reporting and reviewing use of force, an ineffective disciplinary system, lack of basis processes and resources for internal investigations, inadequate guidance on conducting searches and seizures, inadequate supervision and fragmented community engagement. . . These findings were all bolstered by the formal report issued by the USDOJ in September, 2011 and by the report of Police Department Monitor Efraín Rivera Pérez. . . Co–Defendant Vázquez, in charge of ensuring that the officers of the force were duly trained in civil rights and use of force, further admitted under oath that: training is of the utmost importance in order to prevent police officers from abusing civil rights and using excessive use of force; that an officer not trained in use of force and civil rights is more likely to engage in civil rights violations because of that lack of training; that a duly, regularly trained officer is less likely to use excessive force; that one of the ways of preventing violations of civil rights and use of force is assuring that the police officers have regular training and correct supervision, among others. It is evident that the above elements did not exist in the PRPD while both Figueroa–Sancha and Vázquez were at the agency's helm, and they were both well aware of this situation. The letters from the USDOJ directed to Figueroa–Sancha dated March and April, 2009 clearly spell this out. Thus, the fact that co-defendants Vázquez and Figueroa–Sancha were not at the scene of the incident in question is of little use to them if Plaintiffs can establish that they, as high ranking officers of the PRPD, had knowledge about the constitutional violation atmosphere that permeated the PRPD and did nothing about it. . . .As the supervisor responsible for a mobilization of some fifteen officers which included an arrest, the impounding of a vehicle and a massive home search, in certainly gives the Court pause that such a vast operation did not render any accusations and instead only produced the arrest of a man for alleged drunk driving who was in fact, completely sober. Furthermore, the fact that no search or arrest warrants were issued on the night in question, when they are the norm and not the exception, casts doubt on Defendants' actions and on whatever instructions were given by Colón, the supervisor of the police operation. It is also telling that Colón was also unaware of the many shortcomings of the officers he commanded, as he was also unaware of the multiplicity of administrative complaints against Fernández and Morales. As the Humacao Regional Director, Colón had a duty to ensure that officers under his command were adequately trained and that their actions comported with police standards. As Plaintiffs correctly point out, when a supervisor fails to monitor the actions of the officers under his charge, an inference can be made that he is acquiescing to their unconstitutional behavior, particularly under the specific facts of this case and given the multiplicity of prior administrative violations by the officers involved. At this Plaintiff-friendly stage, such an inference can be drawn on the facts presented before the Court.")

Johnson v. Han, No. CV 14-CV-13274-IT, 2015 WL 4397360, at *3-6 (D. Mass. July 17, 2015) ("Johnson brings Counts I through IV of his complaint against O'Brien. . . Each count is predicated on a theory of supervisory liability. Johnson claims that O'Brien condoned the withholding of Brady material (Count I), the withholding of negative test results (Count II), and the knowing presentation of falsified inculpatory evidence (Count III). Johnson further alleges that O'Brien failed to train, supervise, or discipline Dookhan and Renczkowski (Count IV). O'Brien brings four arguments in support of her motion to dismiss: (1) the obligation to disclose exculpatory and impeachment evidence under Brady does not apply to state-employed chemists, (2) the complaint fails to plausibly allege that O'Brien was a supervisor at the time Dookhan and Renczkowski tested the substance, (3) the complaint fails to plausibly plead the requisite elements of supervisory liability, and (4) qualified immunity bars liability. . . . Under Brady, it is '[t]he prosecution's affirmative duty to disclose evidence favorable to defendant.' However, the suppression of evidence unknown to a prosecutor and held only by members of the investigative team is still a Brady violation. . . In the context of § 1983 liability, the First Circuit has held that investigatory officials such as police officers may be liable for their failure to disclose Brady materials. . . . Although the First Circuit has not expressly held that Brady obligations similarly extend to state-employed lab chemists, O'Brien provides no persuasive reason to distinguish between different members of the state investigatory team in this regard. . . .O'Brien argues that the complaint does not include facts plausibly suggesting that O'Brien: (1) had actual or constructive knowledge of the direct constitutional violations alleged, amounting to deliberate indifference; or (2) undertook acts or omissions causally related to those violations. O'Brien emphasizes that the complaint concedes that in 2010 she raised concerns regarding Dookhan's work with her supervisors. Accordingly, O'Brien argues she could not have been deliberately indifferent to the alleged violations of Johnson's constitutional rights. . . . Here, the complaint alleges that, during or before 2009, O'Brien: (1) knew Dookhan's resume lied about her educational credentials, (2) saw Dookhan's testing rate and understood this rate to be implausibly high if proper testing procedures were used, (3) observed Dookhan's lab protocols, and (4) had received and dismissed a report of concerns about Dookhan's high testing rate. The complaint also alleges that, after her promotion to 'Laboratory Supervisory I,' O'Brien became aware that Dookhan removed samples from the evidence room without proper chain-of-custody procedures. Counts I through IV allege claims of supervisory liability based on O'Brien's alleged role in allowing her subordinates to withhold exculpatory evidence and falsify evidence of guilt and in failing to train, supervise, or discipline these subordinates for their actions. As alleged in the complaint, the substance was tested in February 2009, Dookhan prepared and turned over the discovery packet in April 2009, and Dookhan and Renczkowski testified in November 2009. Based on O'Brien's own claim of a promotion date of March 8, 2009, the preparation of the discovery packet and the trial testimony occurred while O'Brien was Dookhan and Renczkowski's supervisor. At least by April 2009, O'Brien knew that Dookhan had lied about her educational credentials, knew that Dookhan claimed to test a high rate of samples and understood these claims to be implausible, observed Dookhan fail to follow lab protocols, and had received prior complaints about Dookhan's testing rates. At the motion-to-dismiss stage, these factual allegations suffice to state a claim that O'Brien was aware, or should have been aware, of a pattern of behavior by her subordinates that was highly likely to lead to the violation of constitutional rights (either through withholding negative test results or falsifying positive test results). The complaint further plausibly pleads that O'Brien acted with deliberate indifference towards that behavior, effectively condoning its continuation throughout 2009 despite her supervisory role. Accordingly, the court will not dismiss Counts I through IV on this ground.")

Williams v. Bisceglia, 115 F.Supp.3d 184, 189 (D. Mass. 2015) ("The First Circuit has upheld conclusory language similar to that alleged by the Plaintiff where the supporting facts asserted elsewhere in the complaint establish 'the affirmative link necessary to sufficiently plead a supervisory liability claim,' and/or a policy or custom of the City which led to the alleged constitutional violation. See Morales v. Chadbourne, ––– F.3d ––––, No. 14–1425, 2015 WL 4385945, *11 (Jul. 17, 2015). In this case, Plaintiff has not pled any supporting facts which would support his bare, conclusory allegations against the City and Chief Gemme. On the contrary, these are the same type of conclusory allegations that the Supreme Court found deficient in Iqbal. Therefore, these Defendants motion to dismiss the Section 1983 claims against them is allowed.") Henriquez v. City of Lawrence, No. 14-CV-14710-IT, 2015 WL 3913449, at *4 (D. Mass. June 25, 2015) ("For reasons similar to those stated above in relation to municipal liability, the court finds that Henriquez states a plausible claim for supervisory liability. Henriquez pleads more than conclusory allegations of deliberate indifference. . . Rather, Henriquez alleges that officers in the Department engaged in prior instances of excessive force and denial of medical care constituting a 'history or pattern' of such conduct; Police Chief Romero was aware of prior complaints against officers in the Department for such conduct; and despite this awareness, Police Chief Romero failed to take any steps to supervise, investigate, train, or discipline the officers. Because Henriquez's factual allegations state a plausible claim, Police Chief Romero's motion to dismiss Count II is denied.")

Nascarella v. Cousins, No. 13-CV-10878-IT, 2015 WL 1431054, at *11-13 (D. Mass. Mar. 27, 2015) ("Nascarella has failed to identify evidence giving rise to a reasonable inference that the substance of the training provided to correctional officers was constitutionally deficient. Neither Superintendent Marks' failure to review the Advisory Training Council reports or the difficulty correctional officers exhibited in describing use-of-force techniques appears 'so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights' as to show that supervisors were deliberately indifferent. . . Accordingly, Nascarella's failure-to-train claim fails as a matter of law. . . .According to Nascarella, Officer Mustone and Officer Marks' combined uses of force on forty-seven occasions in the two years preceding the incident would have put any attentive supervisor on notice that they were likely to use unecessary force against a prisoner in the future. . . Moreover, Nascarella claims that the Facility was put on notice of Officer Mustone and Officer Marks' tendency to use excessive force by way of Morris' complaint, but failed to adequately investigate this allegation or take corrective action, instead summarily dismissing the complaint after a review of Morris' disciplinary record. . . A single incident of misconduct, even if egregious, is generally insufficient to find supervisors liable for their failure to supervise or discipline subordinates. . . This would admittedly be a simpler case if the evidence showed forty-seven complaints of excessive force, rather than forty-seven use-of-force reports. However, the court must view the evidence in context. In cases involving claims of excessive force against police officers by civilians, the court would expect a greater rate of complaints-civilians may have better access to complaint procedures and may, in filing their complaints, operate beyond the control and oversight of the officers they allege used excessive force against them. That is not always the case within a correctional facility, where prisoners may be dissuaded from reporting such events by the knowledge that they remain under the care of the correctional officers about whom they would seek to complain. . . In this context, and in the face of the use-of-force reports, the court cannot find that the absence of a pattern of excessive-force complaints is dispositive. In addition to evidence that forty-seven combined uses of force over two years would cause 'great alarm' on the part of an attentive supervisor, . . Nascarella offers evidence that Superintendent Marks was cited for non-compliance by Department of Correction auditors for failing to ensure the completeness and accuracy of use-of-force packages. . . Finally, Nascarella has offered evidence that, despite being cited for non-compliance, and despite the high number of combined uses of force by Officer Marks and Officer Mustone, Superintendent Marks did not investigate the discrepancies in reporting by these officers when another prisoner alleged that they had kicked and punched him in the face. . . The strength of this evidence may appropriately be weighed by a jury. The evidence suffices, however, to place in dispute the material fact of whether Superintendent Marks exhibited deliberate indifference to a recognizable pattern of the inappropriate uses of force that required investigation and correction through his failure to properly review use-of-force packages. The First Circuit has previously found that the inference that a failure to discipline officers in the past would lead to the belief that they could escape discipline for future acts 'simply too tenuous' to form the basis of a supervisory liability claim. . . In both Febus–Rodriguez and Ramírez–Lluveras, however, the past, undisciplined acts were unrelated to the type of conduct at issue in those cases. . . In contrast, a jury could reasonably infer that Superintendent Marks' failure to ensure the accuracy of past use-of-force packages, and failure to identify the allegedly alarming rate of force used by Officer Mustone and Officer Marks, gave rise to a belief in Officer Mustone and Officer Marks that they could continue to use, and under-report, force against prisoners with impunity. The court finds that this conclusion requires less of an inferential leap than in Febus–Rodriguez and Ramírez–Lluveras. . . . Accordingly, the court finds sufficient record evidence to create a triable issue as to whether Superintendent Marks was deliberately indifferent in his failure to supervise or discipline correctional officers, predictably leading to Officer Mustone and Officer Marks' use of force. . . . As to Sheriff Cousins, however, Nascarella has failed to present evidence that he 'would have known[,] ... but for his deliberate indifference or willful blindness,' that Officer Mustone and Officer Marks posed a significant risk of harm and required supervision or discipline. . . . The record does not establish that Sheriff Cousins has responsibility for reviewing use-of-force reports at the Facility. Accordingly, in the absence of a pattern of excessive-force complaints or other evidence reasonably available to Sheriff Cousins that could have shown a pattern of abuse or tendency towards unconstitutional behavior, no affirmative link can be drawn between his actions and Officer Mustone and Officer Marks' use of force.") Saldivar v. Pridgen, 91 F.Supp.3d 134, 137-38 (D. Mass. 2015) ("Pridgen's disciplinary record in the Fall River Police Department consists of 11 violations between September, 2003 and June, 2011 that are entirely unrelated to any form of sexual misconduct. The suspensions that Pridgen received were due to 1) failure to abide by departmental policy in handling a domestic violence call, such as improperly informing the victim of her rights and inadequately conducting a search for weapons, 2) abuse of sick leave policy, 3) failure to appear for roll call and 4) failing to maintain a valid license to carry a firearm. Pridgen also received seven reprimands for violations such as failing to abide by proper procedure for the submission of reports, arriving late to work and causing a cruiser accident. Plaintiff has failed to demonstrate that Racine had actual or constructive knowledge of the likelihood or even the possibility that Pridgen would sexually assault a woman while on duty. In other words, Racine lacked the prerequisite notice.")

Stile v. Somerset Cnty., No. 1:13-CV-00248-JAW, 2015 WL 667814, at *5-6 (D. Me. Feb. 17, 2015) (J. Woodcock's opinion adopting R & R) ("A review of the recommended decision and Mr. Allen's objection reveals essential congruity on the legal standard for supervisory liability. The Magistrate Judge observed that under Iqbal, courts must often turn to 'judicial experience and common sense'. . . and must often make 'a contextual judgment about the sufficiency of the pleadings.'. . Selecting a different case, Mr. Allen quoted similar language from the First Circuit for the imposition of supervisory liability as appears in the recommended decision: that a plaintiff must demonstrate that his constitutional injury 'resulted from direct acts or omissions of the official, or from indirect conduct that amounts to condonation or tacit authorization.'. . Mr. Stile alleges in his Amended Complaint Final that he got in an altercation with one of the correction officer's relatives, a fellow inmate, and that from then on, the correction officers at the Somerset County Jail waged an ongoing, long and deliberate campaign to physically and mentally abuse him, to unnecessarily and repeatedly strip search him and subject him to visual body cavity searches, to leave him naked for extended periods in his cell, to turn off the hot water when he showered and to refuse to give him a towel, to improperly assign him to administrative segregation, to refuse to properly process his grievances, to assault him, leaving him black and blue, to deny him clergy, counsel, proper hydration, and visitors, to remove his legal papers, to deprive him of his eyeglasses, and to subject him to daily taunts and abuses. Contrary to Mr. Allen's position, it is a common sense and logical contextual inference that if a Jail Administrator were doing his job, he would have some knowledge of an inmate being treated in this fashion over the course of many months. Under this rubric, it is proper for purposes of a motion to dismiss, to infer that Mr. Allen either condoned or tacitly authorized what occurred. This conclusion obtains regardless of the size of the jail and even assuming that the Magistrate Judge had no right to observe that the Somerset County Jail is not a major metropolitan prison, a proposition that seems dubious, the First Amended Complaint still survives dismissal.")

Stile v. Somerset Cnty., No. 1:13-CV-00248-JAW, 2015 WL 667814, at *9 n.4 (D. Me. Feb. 17, 2015) (Magistrate Judge Nivison's opinion) ("In Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), the Supreme Court considered whether a Pakistani prisoner stated a claim of intentional discrimination, based on race, religion or national origin, against the Secretary of Defense and the Director of the FBI. The Court rejected a conclusory allegation of a purpose to discriminate where implementation of the policy in question served a neutral investigative purpose, id. at 680–81, i.e., a 'nondiscriminatory intent to detain aliens who were illegally present in the United States and who had potential connections to those who committed terrorist acts,' id. at 682. The Court noted that intent in the context of an equal protection claim required more than a showing of volition or awareness of a disparate impact. . . Here, in comparison, the Court must evaluate the plausibility of an inference that the administrator of a relatively small county jail in central Maine was consulted or was aware of the treatment of a pretrial detainee who, allegedly, engaged in a hunger strike and who also either could not or would not walk during daily transports to medical over the course of a 39–day period and, as an alleged result, was subjected to a daily regimen of forced extractions involving electric prods and other force. The supervisory connection for which Plaintiff argues is much more intuitive than the one argued in Soto–Torres. Additionally, the condonation or tacit authorization needed to support the connection between Defendant Allen and his subordinates is different from the purposeful discrimination inference required to support the constitutional theory presented in Iqbal.") Facey v. Dickhaut, No. CA 11-10680-MLW, 2014 WL 8105164, at *19 (D. Mass. Sept. 30, 2014) ("Neither defendant is entitled to summary judgment. Mendonsa had a largely supervisory role and respondeat superior does not apply to constitutional violations. See Sanchez, 590 F.3d at 49. However, the record includes sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to find that Mendonsa is liable based on his own conduct. As described earlier, Mendonsa 'more than likely' participated in the decision to place Facey in H–1. . . Moreover, as part of the team that decided whether to release inmates from SMU, Mendonsa spoke with SMU inmates three times a week and had access to inmate conflict sheets. . . Finally, in his deposition, Mendonsa admitted that he had heard about Facey's August 2009 attack on Inmate L. . . A reasonable jury could infer from this evidence that Mendonsa was aware of Facey's status as a Blood and his particular conflict with a Gangster Disciple leader. Therefore, a reasonable jury could find that Mendonsa was aware that Facey faced a significant risk of reprisal from the Gangster Disciples and nevertheless approved his placement H–1, rather than in a safer unit.")

Diaz-Morales v. Rubio-Paredes, 50 F.Supp.3d 98, 114 (D.P.R. 2014) ("In his second cause of action, the Plaintiff holds liable all identified and unidentified defendants who were supervisors during the course of his investigation and prosecution for their deliberate indifference towards their subordinates' violations of his constitutional rights and for failing to monitor, supervise, train and discipline their subordinates. . . The only named defendant in the Plaintiff's complaint who is held liable for his actions in the exercise of his supervisory duties is co-defendant Arill–Garcia as 'the highest and immediate supervising prosecutor of RUBIO PAREDES in the Humacao District Attorney's Office....'. . . The allegations against Arill–Garcia specify that he was present during some of the interviews that both Cruz–Velez and Rubio–Paredes took, and was thus aware of the malicious prosecution against Plaintiff. . . In light of these allegations, the court finds that Diaz–Morales has pleaded a plausible claim of deliberate indifference on the part of Arill–Garcia as supervisor of Rubio–Paredes. Taking the facts alleged as true, the court can reasonably infer that by failing to take any measures to rectify Rubio–Paredes' conduct, Arill–Garcia knowingly allowed the latter to wrongly prosecute the Plaintiff by suborning false testimony. Thus, at this stage of the proceedings, the court DENIES WITHOUT PREJUDICE co-defendant Arill–Garcia's motion to dismiss on grounds of lack of supervisory liability.")

Podgurski v. Dep't of Correction, CIV.A. 13-11751-DJC, 2014 WL 4772218, *5, *6 (D. Mass. Sept. 23, 2014) ("Here, taking the complaint as a whole and looking at the facts in the light most favorable to Podgurski, one could reasonably infer that Saba was deliberately indifferent to Podgurski's serious medical needs under either a primary or supervisory liability theory. As to primary violator liability, Podgurski pleaded that his daughter informed Saba, with a letter from Podgurski's podiatrist, that Podgurski required regular podiatric treatment, which Saba 'rebuffed.'. . This allegation, considered together with the allegations that Podgurski showed signs of deterioration that could be apparent to a lay person, including visible infection, walking with a cane, crutch or walker and constant complaints of pain to the Defendants and to nurses, . . . support the plausible inference that Saba knew of the 'facts from which the inference could be drawn' that Podgurski had a serious medical need and then disregarded it. . . Since Podgurski's counsel indicated at the hearing that he contends that Saba was a primary violator and the Court concludes that the pleaded facts are sufficient as to this theory of liability, the Court need not address whether there are sufficient allegations of supervisory liability.")

Guadalupe-Baez v. Police Officers A-Z, CIV. 13-1529 GAG, 2014 WL 4656663, *5-*7 (D.P.R. Sept. 17, 2014) ("In most cases, like the one we review today, the 'causation' element constitutes the biggest challenge for plaintiff. Often, plaintiffs fail to show a plausible connection between the supervisor and plaintiff's constitutional violation, properly supported by facts. The First Circuit recently embarked on this issue and stated: 'After Iqbal, as before, we have stressed the importance of showing a strong causal connection between the supervisor's conduct and the constitutional violation.' See Ramírez–Lluveras v. Rivera Merced, Nos. 11–2339 & 13–1169, 2014 WL 3398427 at * 8 (1st Cir.2014) . . . This affirmative link, i.e., the causation, must be strong enough to show that it 'contemplates proof that the supervisor's conduct led inexorably to the constitutional violation.' Ramírez–Lluveras, 2014 WL 3398427 at *8. In other words, to meet this burden, a plaintiff must plead sufficient facts that, if taken as true, connect the dots between the supervisor's conduct and plaintiff's constitutional violation. . . . Here, Plaintiffs' allegations are insufficient to 'connect the dots,' i.e., show causation, because their allegations are nothing more than legal conclusions, completely devoid of supporting facts. . . . Plaintiffs attempt to hold the Supervisor Defendants liable for their own actions, insofar that by their negligent behavior while supervising Police Officers A–Z, they encouraged, condoned or acquiesced the violation of Guadalupe's rights. However, Plaintiffs do not identify the actual underpinnings of the Supervisor Defendants' alleged failure to train. . . .Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint is a repetition of legal jargon ad nauseam, that merely lists the elements of a Section 1983 cause of action without any supporting factual allegations. It is evident that these allegations do not suffice. The court previously had warned Plaintiffs that 'mere labels do not reach the plausibility standard.'. . Today, it is clear that Plaintiffs ignored the court's warning. Plaintiffs justify their deficient pleading arguing that due to Defendants' failure to disclose information about the investigation, they are precluded from pleading factual allegations sufficient to meet the Iqbal/Twombly standard. . . For that reason, in support of their 'pattern and practice' allegations, Plaintiffs rely on the Investigation Report of the Investigation of the Puerto Rico Police Department by the Civil Rights Division of the United States Department Justice of September 5, 2011 ("U.S. DOJ Report") . . . Nevertheless, as this court previously warned Plaintiffs, 'simply citing the agreement between the government of the United States and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico for the Reform of the Puerto Rico Police Department does not per se generate any plausibility.'. . Under the Iqbal/Twombly standard, the U.S. DOJ Report, by itself, is not enough to establish plausible causation. Moreover, the US. DOJ Report may be used as a stepping stone to pave the way to plausibility, however, it must be supplemented with factual allegations relating to the specific facts of the case, tracing the story between the supervisor's conduct and plaintiff's alleged constitutional violation, in accordance with the supervisory liability standard. Thus, Plaintiffs' supervisor liability claims are DISMISSED.")

Carr v. Metro. Law Enforcement Council, Inc., CIV.A. 13-13273-JGD, 2014 WL 4185482, *14 (D. Mass. Aug. 20, 2014) ("Similarly, the claim against the unnamed MetroLEC supervisor who allegedly failed to supervise those who engaged in the destructive search should be allowed to proceed. 'Although a superior officer cannot be held vicariously liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 on a respondeat superior theory ..., he may be found liable under section 1983 on the basis of his own acts or omissions[.]'. . In the instant case, the allegations of the complaint can be fairly read as asserting a claim against the MetroLEC supervisor who was on site during the search, and therefore is seeking to hold him liable for his own conduct. . . Again, this claim requires further development of the record. Carr is basing her claim against Police Chief Cunningham 'for his own acts or omissions in permitting a culture that condoned the unrestrained use of excessive force by MetroLEC officers' and for his actions in hiring, training and/or supervising officers 'with a deliberate indifference toward the possibility that deficient performance of a task may contribute to a civil rights [deprivation].'. . It is well established that a supervisor may be liable under § 1983 for 'formulating a policy, or engaging in a custom, that leads to the challenged occurrence.'. . Moreover, in a § 1983 action against a supervisor who was not a direct participant in the incident at issue, 'liability attaches if a responsible official supervises, trains, or hires a subordinate with deliberate indifference toward the possibility that deficient performance of the task eventually may contribute to a civil rights deprivation.... Under such a theory, a supervisor may be brought to book even though his actions have not directly abridged someone's rights; it is enough that he has created or overlooked a clear risk of future unlawful action by a lower-echelon actor over whom he had some degree of control.' Camilo–Robles v. Zapata, 175 F.3d 41, 44 (1st Cir.1999) (internal citations omitted). '[T]he extent of a superior's knowledge of his subordinate's proclivities is a central datum in determining whether the former ought to be liable (or immune from suit) for the latter's unconstitutional acts.' Id. at 46. This is a factdependent inquiry and the issue should be addressed again after further development of the record. For these reasons, the motion to dismiss Counts IV, V and VIII is denied.")

Cabrera-Berrios v. Pedrogo, 21 F.Supp.3d 147, 153 (D.P.R. 2014) ("The Court recognizes that, at this stage of litigation, the plaintiffs do not possess exact knowledge of either Pesquera's or Diaz–Colon's activities, and, therefore, are unable to substantiate their claim of supervisory liability with more specific and detailed facts. Accordingly, the Court exercises its common sense and judicial experience to deny defendants Pesquera's and Diaz–Colon's motion to dismiss in order to permit plaintiffs the opportunity to gather more information concerning those two defendants' possible acts or omissions leading to the constitutional violations. Granted, plaintiffs have 'a long way to go' in order to substantiate their supervisory liability claims against Pesquera and Diaz–Colon. . . Nevertheless, the Court abstains from estimating the probability that plaintiffs will prevail on those claims. . . In essence, '[t]he role of these defendants can be made clearer in discovery and nothing precludes later efforts to end the case against them should discovery not substantiate these inferences.' . . Accordingly, defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiffs' section 1983 claims is DENIED.")

Gary v. McDonald, No. 13–12847–JLT, 2014 WL 1933084, *2, *3 (D. Mass. May 13, 2014) ("Gary sets forth sufficient factual allegations to state a plausible claim for relief. He has alleged that Moniz was responsible for training and supervising subordinates in a way that ensured prisoner safety, as well as being responsible for implementing prison policies to protect inmates from suffering violence at the hands of other inmates. . . These responsibilities include the implementation of an inmate classification plan. . . Gary has also alleged that, despite Moniz having those responsibilities, he was placed into a cell with an inmate who had a history of assaulting other inmates to receive preferable cell assignments. . . Construing the facts in the light most favorable to Gary, it is reasonable to infer that Moniz failed properly to train or supervise PCCF employees on the appropriate screening and placement of violent inmates or failed to implement an adequate placement procedure. . . .With respect to the second step of the qualified-immunity analysis, the issue is whether a reasonable person in Moniz's position would have understood that his conduct violated Gary's constitutional rights. . . As explained, Gary does not argue that Moniz had personal knowledge that Gary had been placed in the same cell as a violent inmate. . . He does allege, however, that Moniz was responsible for implementing appropriate policies and training measures to ensure prisoner safety. . .Nonetheless, Gary was placed in the same cell as a violent inmate who had a history of assaulting other inmates in order to be placed in a private cell. On the basis of these facts, this Court concludes that a reasonable person in Moniz's position reasonably would have understood that his failure properly to train his subordinates violated Gary's constitutional rights. At the time of the alleged violations, prison officials had a clearly established duty to protect inmates from violence at the hands of other inmates. . .This duty includes the duty to use of some form of classification system to ensure that inmates with a propensity for violence do not pose a danger to others. . . Here, it is reasonable to infer that Moniz did not establish an adequate classification system or failed properly to train his subordinates on the placement of violent and non-violent inmates. Because Gary has adequately claimed that his clearly established constitutional rights were violated, qualified immunity does not bar his claim.")

Jones v. Han, 993 F.Supp.2d 57, *68, *69 (D. Mass. 2014) ("Defendant Han. . . contends that plaintiff must prove she had a 'subjective belief' that there was a risk [of] unconstitutional harm to have been deliberately indifferent, citing Snell v. Demello, 44 F.Supp.2d 386 (D.Mass.1999). Snell is easily distinguishable. In Snell, the plaintiff sued prison officials for violations of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . The 'subjective belief' standard from Snell originated in the Supreme Court's Eighth Amendment analysis in Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 114 S.Ct. 1970, 128 L.Ed.2d 811 (1994). . . . Outside the Eighth Amendment context, however, an official can be deliberately indifferent to constitutional violations by her subordinates without holding a subjective belief that their actions would result in constitutional harms. . . Here, the allegations of the complaint are sufficient to state a claim for acquiescence or 'gross negligence amounting to deliberate indifference' to those violations by defendant. . . It therefore properly states a supervisor liability claim under § 1983.")

Solomon v. Dookhan, No. 13–10208–GAO, 2014 WL 317202, *14-*18 (D. Mass. Jan. 27, 2014) (O'Toole, J. (adopting Magistrate Judge Sorokin's R & R) ("There is no dispute as to the governing law with respect to Nassif's motion (law which also largely governs the motions of Han, Auerbach and Bigby, infra). Pursuant to § 1983, a supervisor can only be liable for a subordinate's behavior if '(1) the behavior of [his] subordinates results in a constitutional violation, and (2) the [supervisor's] action or inaction was affirmative[ly] link[ed] to the behavior in the sense that it could be characterized as supervisory encouragement, condonation or acquiescence or gross negligence amounting to deliberate indifference.' Pineda v. Toomey, 533 F.3d 50, 54 (1st Cir.2008) (citations omitted). In addition, to establish supervisory liability, Solomon must allege facts sufficient to support a finding that Nassif either had actual notice of the offending conduct of Dookhan, or that she would have known of Dookhan's conduct 'but for [her] deliberate indifference.'. .A number of factual allegations (many allegedly drawn from the state police investigation) bear mention: (1) Dookhan tested drugs at a rate at least fifty percent higher than other lab technicians (Docket # 14 at ¶ 40); (2) Dookhan's level of production of test results concerned supervisors; (id. at ¶ 48C); (3) Dookhan left many samples out on her benchtop and maintained a work space 'filled with numerous vials open to cross contamination,' (id. at ¶ 48C, 48D); (4) Dookhan 'ignored lab procedures' (id. at ¶ 48A); (5) the 'Laboratory had a culture of lax oversight' (id. at ¶ 48J); (6) Dookhan bore 'responsibil[ity] for training and for some QA/QC procedures' (id.); (7) 'Numerous lab personnel expressed concerns with Dookhan's workload, documentation errors, blatant forgeries, and questionable test results' (id. at ¶ 48K); (8) the procedures 'to restrict access to the evidence room were ignored and circumvented' (id. at ¶ 480); and (9) the 'safe was found open and unattended, was left propped open when [the Lab] was "busy," and was accessible by codes and keys that had not been changed in over a decade' (id. at ¶ 48R). The foregoing allegations, combined with the reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom (and particularly when viewed in light of Nassif's role at the lab both as Director of Analytic Chemistry and within Dookhan's direct chain of supervision), suffice to state a claim of Nassif's supervisory encouragement of, condonation of, or acquiescence in Dookhan's misconduct, or of gross negligence amounting to deliberate indifference toward Solomon's constitutional rights. . . Particularly salient is Dookhan's disturbingly high rate of production, coupled with the other warning signs both specific to Dookhan and visible to those running the lab. Although a fully-developed factual record indeed may not ultimately support the claim, the Court is obliged at this stage to accept all well-pleaded facts alleged in the Amended Complaint as true and to draw all reasonable inferences in Solomon's favor. . . Accordingly, I RECOMMEND that the Court DENY Nassifs motion. . . .Although Han held a higher position within the lab's hierarchy and thus was arguably more removed from events than was Nassif, she nevertheless was the Director of the Hinton Lab. The allegations noted above, combined with the supplemental allegation which supported the claim against Nassif, support the reasonable inference that Han—like Nassif—was aware of the problems with Dookhan as well the problems at the lab noted, supra. Accordingly, I RECOMMEND that the Court DENY Han's motion for the same reasons for which I have previously recommended that the Court deny Nassif's Motion (and repeating the same caveat that a fuller factual record may produce a different result at a later stage of the case). . . .Auerbach stands in a materially different position from Han and Nassif. Auerbach had substantially larger responsibilities and did not personally work at or directly supervise the lab itself. Accordingly, absent specific factual allegations, it is not a reasonable inference that Auerbach would have known of Dookhan's misconduct or of the problems at the lab absent his deliberate indifference to Dookhan's violation of Solomon's constitutional rights. Solomon does advance a few allegations specific to Auerbach, noted above. These allegations, and the reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom, fail to plausibly state a claim that Auerbach knew of, or condoned, Dookhan's violation of Solomon's constitutional rights, or, that he would have known of it but for his deliberate indifference. Simply put, even taking Solomon's allegations as true, Auerbach is too far removed and lacking in knowledge of, or participation in, Dookhan's misconduct to state a claim of supervisory liability under the governing Section 1983 caselaw discussed supra. Moreover, the allegations of a 'cover-up' regarding his instructions to Han and Nassif are too generalized and vague to plausibly state a claim of violation of Solomon's constitutional rights. . . .Defendant Bigby moves to dismiss the Amended Complaint as directed against her, as failing to state a claim for supervisory liability. Docket # 96. Solomon alleges in the Amended Complaint that Bigby was at all relevant times the duly appointed Secretary of the Executive Office of Health and Human Services of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, responsible for oversight of the Department of Public Health. . . He alleges that Bigby was aware in June 2011, that Dookhan was testing and certifying substances at a rate that was fifty percent higher than any other chemist, and that Bigby described Dookhan's productivity as, 'a red flag that wasn't appropriately investigated.'. . The remainder of the factual allegations concerning Bigby assert generally that she 'failed to properly supervise, train, investigate, and monitor the Department of Public Health and the Hinton Laboratory which employed Dookhan' and that she (along with other lab supervisors) maintained outdated operating procedures for the Hinton lab, failed to seek accreditation, and failed to train lab employees concerning Brady obligations and contact with prosecutors. . . .The claim against Bigby fails for two reasons. First, even taking the factual allegations as true, Bigby is even more removed and uninvolved than Auerbach, and thus the allegations regarding Dookhan's misconduct and the operation of the lab do not state a deliberate indifference claim as to Bigby. Second, the only specific factual allegation regarding Bigby is that Bigby was aware in June 2011 that Dookhan was testing and certifying substances at a rate that was fifty percent higher than any other chemist. Much later, Bigby described Dookhan's productivity as, 'a red flag that wasn't appropriately investigated.'. . The fifty percent number is, in and of itself, insufficient to plausibly allege that a person in Bigby's remote position would be on notice of its significance, amounting to deliberate indifference to Dookhan's violation of Solomon's constitutional rights. The remainder of the factual allegations concerning Bigby assert generally that she 'failed to properly supervise, train, investigate, and monitor the Department of Public Health and the Hinton Laboratory which employed Dookhan' and that she (along with other lab supervisors) maintained outdated operating procedures for the Hinton lab, failed to seek accreditation, and failed to train lab employees concerning Brady obligations and contact with prosecutors. . . These allegations all sound in negligence only. Accordingly, I RECOMMEND that the Court ALLOW Bigby's motion to dismiss.") Canales v. Gatnuzis, 979 F.Supp.2d 164, 172 (D. Mass. 2013) ("Deliberate indifference is akin to willful blindness. . . Even where a supervisor does not know of the specific actions of a subordinate that violate a person's constitutional rights, a supervisor may be held liable if he is aware of a general 'pattern or practice' that threatens persons' constitutional rights and is deliberately indifferent to the danger. . . '[I]solated instances of unconstitutional activity ordinarily are insufficient to establish a supervisor's policy or custom, or otherwise to show deliberate indifference.'. . . Plaintiff has failed to plead sufficient facts to make out a plausible claim for supervisory liability against Defendant Horgan. First, the Complaint is devoid of any suggestion that Horgan personally knew Plaintiff was being administered HIV medications or was aware of Plaintiff's protests. Second, Plaintiff fails to plead any facts to suggest that Horgan was aware of similar medication errors or other practices by the medical staff that posed a risk to inmates' constitutional rights. Plaintiff merely states that 'Defendants have a disorganized medical program and failed to maintain a quality assurance program.'. .Plaintiff also states that SCHOC failed 'to maintain adequate and accurate medical records.'. .Even taking these allegations as true, Plaintiff does not allege that Horgan himself was aware of a threat to inmates' constitutional rights. This is due in part to Plaintiff's failure to allege anything more specific than general factual allegations purportedly applicable to all Defendants. Such pleading fails to inform Horgan or this court of the factual basis for Plaintiff's supervisory liability claim. Nonetheless, as discussed below, Plaintiff has requested that this court allow him to file an amended complaint to give him an opportunity to add sufficient factual allegations, should this court find them lacking. Because this court will allow Plaintiff to file an amended complaint in this matter, Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Count V as to Horgan in his individual capacity is denied without prejudice to Defendants renewing the motion once Plaintiff has filed his amended complaint.")

Bridges v. Ouellette, No. 2:13–cv–00082–NT, 2013 WL 5755588, *6-*8 (D. Me. Oct. 23, 2013) (order affirming R&R) ("Lancaster's summary judgment motion is based on the idea that the mere review and denial of a grievance will not support an action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . This is true. An after-the-fact assessment of a bygone deprivation, made in the context of reviewing an administrative grievance, does not rise to the level of a constitutional deprivation, because the grievance process is not, in itself, constitutionally mandated, . . . and because the grievance process ordinarily concerns completed acts of alleged misconduct rather than ongoing acts. . . .What Bridges says in response is that he would like the opportunity to discover whether Lancaster had the authority and opportunity to do something to assist him. . . He would like to serve interrogatories, requests for admission, and requests for production of documents . . . to better understand, among other things, 'whether or not defendant Lancaster could have ordered that I be allowed to be treated by a psychiatrist, and could have ordered that I be released from restraints'. . . . Based on my review, I conclude that Lancaster's summary judgment motion actually fails to demonstrate that there is no genuine dispute as to any material fact. State officials with supervisory oversight can be liable on constitutional claims based on tacit acquiescence and their own deliberate indifference. . . Lancaster's affidavit suggests that he had supervisory authority to countermand a prison order involving restraint of Bridges. Bridges, meanwhile, is asserting that Lancaster's review may have taken place while Bridges was still being restrained around the clock rather than medicated. Bridges believes that Lancaster may have had the opportunity to aid him and elected not to do anything. That is one plausible inference that could be drawn and it is an inference that is not dispelled by Lancaster's summary judgment showing. . . Lancaster's affidavit does not establish that Bridges was removed from full restraints prior to or simultaneous with Lancaster's investigation. Because it is unclear when Lancaster became aware of Bridges's situation, what exactly that situation was at the time, how long that situation persisted during and following Lancaster's investigation, and what authority or opportunity Lancaster had to intervene, it cannot fairly be said that Lancaster's summary judgment motion shows that there is no genuine issue of material fact. Lancaster's motion for summary judgment needs additional factual development and legal analysis and is insufficient in its present form.")

Llanos-Morales v. Municipality of Carolina, No. 12–1847(ADC), 967 F.Supp.2d 507, 515, 516 (D.P.R. 2013) ("Unlike the complaint in Soto–Torres, which merely stated that supervisory police officers were 'in charge' during the constitutional violations and participated in them, the complaint here alleges that the supervisory defendants were responsible for implementing training programs to curb constitutional abuses and the use of excessive force. . . More than merely alleging that the supervisory defendants failed to prevent constitutional violations generally, which was a threadbare conclusion in Soto–Torres, the complaint here goes further by alleging that the supervisory defendants were put on notice of Agosto's potential for civil rights violations because they knew of the complaints lodged against him for excessive use of force and knew of his mental or emotion condition. . . Although the supervisory defendants reassigned Agosto to a desk job, they did not disarm him or take any remedial measures that would help prevent him from violating constitutional rights in the future. . . These specific facts alleging knowledge of Agosto's medical and disciplinary problems, coupled with allegations as to the supervisory defendants' oversight of training and discipline, together are sufficient to plausibly aver supervisory liability for Agosto's violation of the plaintiffs' constitutional rights.")

Molina v. Vidal-Olivo, 961 F.Supp.2d 382, 383-86 (D.P.R. 2013) ("Supervisory liability doctrine, particularly when coupled with the affirmative defense of qualified immunity, imposes a strenuous burden on those harmed by top government agents. . . For good cause. The high standard is necessary; no government could function if its leaders operated under a Damoclean threat of being hailed into court. However, an equally meritorious argument favors individual plaintiffs who lack the necessary resources, knowledge, and time to engage in Freedom of Information Act requests or their own independent research to augment factual allegations against top supervisors. . . .But that is not so in the complaint we consider today—one alleging instances of both malem prohibitum and malem in se. Plaintiffs' complaint surpasses Rule 8's requirements because the United States has done the legwork. The Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice compiled a study of the Puerto Rico Police Department ('PRPD') in a 42 U.S.C. § 14141 action brought by the Attorney General of the United States. . . The study, amassed over several years, alleges the PRPD's extraordinary and deliberate indifference to use-of-force policies, deliberate misrepresentations contrary to PRPD statistics, and deliberate indifference to safety. These allegations generally reference the PRPD's leadership, and specifically reference Defendant Figueroa–Sancha. The court has reviewed the Department of Justice's findings on myriad occasions. Years of investigations and questions yielded the following: [detailing findings] . . . . These findings allege gross insufficiency, deliberate indifference, and blatant disregard for safety, which plausibly entitle Plaintiffs to relief against Defendant Figueroa–Sancha. Furthermore, the Defendant–Officers in this case could plausibly fall under the umbrella of officers who received allegedly defective training under Defendant Figueroa–Sancha's ostensibly wanton leadership. . . . .Not withstanding the preceding, the court emphasizes that this ruling is not a ruling on the merits. This opinion reflects only the plausibility of Plaintiffs' claims. The court understands that this ruling opens the door to a plethora of similar lawsuits against the PRPD's top officials, including those serving before and after Defendant Figueroa–Sancha's tenure. It is paramount to reiterate that, at this stage, the court makes no credibility determinations or findings of fact. The allegations against Defendant Figueroa–Sancha may be entirely unwarranted, entirely meritorious, or somewhere in between. The standard to overcome a motion to dismiss is simply pleading facts that could plausibly entitle Plaintiffs to relief. Furthermore, the court stresses that it is hereby not recognizing any distinct rights pursuant to the recently approved agreement between the United States and the PRPD. . . Plaintiffs' action herein is rooted in 42 U.S.C. § 1983, not 42 U.S.C. § 14141. The court considers the report only to determine the plausibility of Plaintiffs' allegations, not to create any enforceable rights between the parties. Notwithstanding, this opinion does not prospectively provide plaintiffs' attorneys carte blanche to file unfounded claims against top supervisors without due diligence and proper investigation. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 11 and the Model Rules of Professional Conduct adopted by this court impose the highest standards of professional conduct on all attorneys.")

Facey v. Dickhaut, 892 F.Supp. 347, 357 (D. Mass. 2012) ("The complaint here identifies Dickhaut as the Superintendent of SBCC and states that Dickhaut and Mendonsa instituted a policy requiring the separation of known enemies. It contains some general allegations, described earlier, that '[t]he Defendants' were aware of the feud between the Bloods and the Gangster Disciples and placed the plaintiff on the South Side of the facility, where he was attacked. However, to the extent that these general statements are intended as allegations of knowledge and direct participation on the part of Dickhaut, they are too 'threadbare' and 'speculative' to be accorded the presumption of truth, particularly given the absence of any other allegation specifically linking Dickhaut to the events of the case. . .These allegations are insufficient to state a claim that Dickhaut was directly involved in the incident in which the plaintiff's rights were allegedly violated. . . The complaint is also insufficient to state a claim of supervisory liability because it does not contain any allegations showing that Dickhaut was deliberately indifferent in supervising or training the officials who are directly alleged to have placed the plaintiff in danger. . . Accordingly, the complaint is being dismissed in its entirety as to Dickhaut.")

Pena-Pena v. Figueroa-Sancha, 866 F.Supp.2d 81, 91, 92 & n.8 (D.P.R. 2012) ("[T]he Supervisors insist that Plaintiffs allegations point to omissions rather than actions as allegedly required under the applicable standard. . . As recent as a month ago, however, the First Circuit Court of Appeals ruled out such contentions in Marrero–Rodriguez v. Municipality of San Juan . . . . [T]he Court . . . stated that omissions such as 'failure to implement policies, protocols, or correct training about use of live firearms' were also bases for the imposition of supervisory liability under § 1983. . . A similar conclusion is warranted in this case, where the complaint plausibly alleges that Plaintiffs' injuries were caused in part by the Supervisors' failure 'to train, supervise and control police officers, procedures and operations'. . . as well as their failure to establish protocols on the use of force, on the use of chemical agents, and on riot police and crowd control policies . . . The Supervisors spend a significant portion of their submissions arguing that Iqbal ruled out § 1983 supervisory liability based on inaction or omission. . . As just stated, Plaintiffs' claims against the Supervisors are premised on both actions (the authorization to use force against Plaintiffs and other demonstrators) as well as on omissions (the failure to control the attacking officers and to institute proper policies and procedures). Accordingly, the Court need not address the Supervisors' argument on this issue. Nevertheless, upon a cursory analysis of the applicable case law, the Court is unpersuaded by the Supervisors' exposition.")

Inman v. Siciliano, No. 10–10202–FDS, 2012 WL 1980408, at *13 & n.14 (D. Mass. May 31, 2012) ("Insofar as Ciccolini was responsible for employee training, the analysis is very similar to that which is required in the municipal liability context. . . . . See, e.g., Jones v. Wellham, 104 F.3d 620, 628 (4th Cir.1997) ("While a municipal liability claim based upon a particular official's attributed conduct and a supervisory liability claim against that official based upon the same conduct are not perfectly congruent, each requires proof both of the official's deliberate indifference and of a close affirmative link between his conduct and a resulting constitutional violation by a subordinate.") (citation omitted); Haynesworth v. Miller, 820 F.2d 1245, 1262 n. 133 (6th Cir.1987) ("[S]ome courts have equated municipal and supervisory liability."). Indeed, the First Circuit has sometimes bundled the analyses together. See, e.g., Bordanaro v. McLeod, 871 F.2d 1151, 1154–55 (1st Cir.1989).")

Thath Sin v. Massachusetts Dept. of Correction, No. 10–40226–FDS, 2012 WL 1570810, at *4, *5 (D. Mass. May 2, 2012) ("[B]ecause plaintiff has alleged actual involvement by defendant Saba (through the grievance appeal process), he has stated a claim for supervisory liability. . . At this stage, because the Court cannot say that 'it is clear that no relief could be granted under any set of facts that could be proved consistent with the allegations,'. . . plaintiff may assert his claims against defendants Saba. Defendants also contend that the equal protection claim must be dismissed as against defendants Saba and Richard because the complaint does not allege sufficient involvement by them in the discriminatory conduct. However, as noted with respect to Saba, plaintiff does allege involvement through the prisoner grievance process. . . That is sufficient at this stage of the litigation.")

Stewart v. Fleming, 838 F.Supp.2d 1, 3, 4 (D. Me. 2012) ("Here, Stewart makes no allegations that Chief Fleming was a direct participant in the conduct that she alleges violated her constitutional rights. Instead, her allegations against the Chief are simply that, as a supervisor, he 'had knowledge or, ..., should have had knowledge' of the wrongful conduct of Bureau and Mills and 'approved or ratified the conduct of Bureau and Mills.'. . Although that assertion constitutes a factual claim about the Chief's state of mind, the Supreme Court has concluded that a bare allegation of intent is inadequate to state a claim without more specific factual assertions. . . Thus, because Stewart offers no factual allegations to show that Chief Fleming's action or inaction was affirmatively linked to the allegedly constitutionally improper behavior of those he supervised, I will dismiss all the federal claims.")

Moulton v. Carroll County Dept. of Corrections, No. 11–cv–391–PB, 2011 WL 7080656, at *14 (D. N.H. Dec. 14, 2011) ("The County Commissioners in this case were unaware of any problem concerning Moulton's dental care until June 2011, when Moulton alleges he filed a grievance with the Commissioners. Moulton does not allege that the Commissioners had a direct hand in denying him dental care. The Commissioners cannot be held liable, under a supervisory liability theory, therefore, for acts of which they were unaware and were not otherwise alleged to have caused. Accordingly, no supervisory liability lies against the Commissioners for any actions taken by Fowler and Johnson prior to Moulton's June 2011 grievance to the Commissioners. Moulton received no response to his June 2011 grievance to the Commissioners. Moulton did not provide a copy of the grievance he filed with the Commissioners but alleges in his complaint that his grievance to the Commissioners concerned the 'extraction-only' policy and stated that he 'wanted [his] teeth repaired.' The record is not sufficient to draw a reasonable inference that the Commissioners had subjective knowledge of the CCDC's refusal to provide fillings, as opposed to root canals and crowns, or that the individual Commissioners were deliberately indifferent to his need for fillings. In this Circuit, 'supervisory liability under a theory of deliberate indifference will be found only if it would be manifest to any reasonable official that his conduct was very likely to violate an individual's constitutional rights.'. . Thus, to the extent Moulton intends to state claims against the County Commissioners in their individual supervisory capacities for the CCDC's failure to provide his fillings, those claims should be dismissed.") Pacheco-Pacheco v. Toledo, Civil No. 09-2121 (JAG), 2011 WL 5977337, at *2, *3 (D.P.R. Nov. 29, 2011) ("[S]upervisory liability is not circumscribed to situations in which the supervisor is a primary, or direct, participant in the illegal incident. A plaintiff may also rest his claim on the fact that a state official '[supervised, trained, or hired] a subordinate with deliberate indifference toward the possibility that deficient performance of the task' could result in a civil rights violation. . . A supervisory official acts with deliberate indifference when 1) there exists a grave risk of harm; 2) the official has actual or constructive knowledge of that risk; and 3) the official fails to take easily available measures to address that risk. Camilo-Robles v. Hoyos, 151 F.3d 1, 7 (1st Cir.1998). Put differently, it is sufficient that the supervisor 'has created or overlooked a clear risk of future unlawful action by a lower-echelon actor over whom he had some degree of control.' Camilo-Robles v. Zapata, 175 F.3d at 44. Finally, the claimant must also 'affirmatively link' the supervisor's conduct to the subordinate's illegal act or omission. . . This causality requirement 'need not take the form of knowing sanction, but may include tacit approval of, acquiescence in, or purposeful disregard of, rights-violating conduct.'. . After pruning the complaint at hand of boilerplate language and legal conclusions, a plausible claim of supervisory liability emerges. In general terms, it is alleged that Defendant Toledo failed to properly train and discipline the police officers under his command. This, according to Plaintiffs, made possible the situation that led to Mr. Irizarry's death. To start with, the complaint establishes that Toledo and other supervisors are 'vested with the authority to train, supervise, discipline and otherwise control' their subordinates. . . Additionally, the complaint states that they were 'were the policymakers for their respective police corps.'. . Certainly, it is reasonable to infer that Toledo and the other supervisors were in a position to address and correct behavioral issues with their subordinates. The complaint contains several allegations that, when taken as true and together, allow for an inference that Toledo 'created or overlooked a clear risk of future unlawful action' by his subordinates. . . First, that the supervisors were aware of the persistent and widespread use of excessive force by officers under their command. . . The supervisors also knew that police officers hid behind a 'code of silence'. . . when questioned about any of these incidents. . . The Internal Affairs Division, upon a policy set by the supervisors, continually failed to investigate and act upon complaints made by citizens in a suitable manner. . . Finally, the complaint contends that nothing was done by the supervisors to correct these problems. . . These failures 'are and have been ratified by the police department, and the supervisors.'. .It is unclear whether any of the officers involved in the homicide of Mr. Irizarry-Perez actually had a history of misconduct. . . However, this Court is mindful that '[s]pecific facts are not necessary; the statements need only "give the defendants fair notice of what the claim ... is and the grounds upon which it rests."'. . The complaint does set forth that the supervisors failed to act 'in the face of numerous transgressions of which they knew or should have known.'. . A reasonable inference from the facts alleged in the complaint is that Defendant simply ignored prior incidents of misbehavior by his subordinates. In sum, the dire picture painted by the complaint–that of rampant misconduct by police officers, and of a systemic failure by Defendant and the police corps to address the use of excessive force–provides enough foothold for the Court to deny Defendant's motion. . . . The Court finds, however, that Plaintiffs' complaint goes beyond merely 'parroting' the standard of supervisory liability under § 1983. Sanchez v. Pereira-Castillo, 590 F.3d 31, 49 (1st Cir.2009). As such, Defendant's motion must be denied.") Irving v. Town of Camden, No. 2:10-cv-000367-MJK, 2011 WL 2133836, at *16 (D. Me. May 27, 2011) ("Assuming supervisory liability still is a tenable liability standard in the wake of *Iqbal, see Santana-Castro v. June 24, 2009), clearly mere knowledge, after the fact, of a subordinate's supposed wrongful conduct does not establish 42 U.S.C. § 1983 liability for a supervisor . Rather, there must be an affirmative link between the conduct of the supervisor and the supposed constitutional deprivation experienced by Irving.")

Alicea v. Wilcox, No. 09-CV-12231-RGS, 2011 WL 1625032, 2 (D. Mass. Apr. 28, 2011) ("A perusal of the Complaint with respect to Chief Romero discloses factual allegations sufficient to survive the motion to dismiss. According to the Complaint: (1) Officer Wilcox had been convicted of the criminal assault and battery of two other detainees three weeks prior to the alleged assault on plaintiff Alicea; (2) Chief Romero was aware of the fact that Wilcox was the subject of numerous civilian complaints and lawsuits alleging the excessive use of force, including four of recent vintage filed in the United States District Court; (3) the Department's Use of Force Policy vested responsibility in Chief Romero to oversee its implementation and enforcement; and (4) despite that responsibility Chief Romero neither enforced the Policy nor investigated allegations of violations by the officers under his command, including Wilcox. This is enough for pleading purposes to satisfy Fed.R.Civ.P. 8. With respect to former Mayor Sullivan, however, the only substantive allegation is that as chief executive officer under the City Charter, Mayor Sullivan was 'responsible for the general supervision and control of [the City's] various agencies and departments' and therefore should have known of and corrected abuses of civilians by City police officers. . . This is an allegation of vicarious liability and nothing more. It is plainly insufficient to survive scrutiny under the Twombly-Iqbal standard.")

Valle Colon v. Municipality of Maricao, Civ. No. 09-02217(PG), 2011 WL 1238437, at *10 & n.2 (D. P.R. Mar. 23, 2011) ("The First Circuit, in an opinion penned by Chief Judge Lynch, noted that the Supreme Court's language in Iqbal 'may call into question our prior circuit law on the standard for holding a public official liable for damages under § 1983 on a theory of supervisory liability.'. . However, the First Circuit did not render a final verdict or furnish any guidance to the district courts on this question because the appellate court found that the plaintiffs had not pled facts sufficient to make out a plausible entitlement to relief under the First Circuit's previous formulation of supervisory liability. Notwithstanding the Chief Judge's foreboding, the First Circuit has continued to employ and develop its previously articulated standard of supervisory liability under Section 1983. . . . The First Circuit has sided with those circuit courts' supervisory liability standards that, as one noted commentator observed, 'only survive Iqbal to the extent they authorize § 1983 liability against a supervisory official on the basis of the supervisor's own unconstitutional conduct or, at least, conduct that sets the unconstitutional wheels in motion.' Martin A. Schwartz, Section 1983 Litigation: Claims and Defenses, § 7.19[D] (4th ed.2010). Rather, there must be an affirmative link between the conduct of the supervisor and the constitutional deprivation experienced by Thayer.")

Brown v. Englander, No. 10-cv-257-SM, 2010 WL 4968174, at *9 (D.N.H. Nov. 24, 2010) ("Here, plaintiff alleges that each named defendant participated in the unconstitutional deprivations alleged, by condoning their subordinates' failure to insure that Brown received the surgery he needed and attempting to lessen his pain while denying or delaying the treatment of his physical back problems. Defendants refused to remedy, and to have continued to support, the practices brought to their attention through the inmate request and grievance processes. Accordingly, these defendants can be sued in their supervisory capacities under section 1983.")

Hernandez v. Castillo, Civ. No. 09-1569(PG), 2010 WL 3372527, at *6, *9, *10, *12 (D.P.R. Aug. 24, 2010) ("Notwithstanding the Chief Judge's foreboding [in Maldonado], the First Circuit has continued to employ and develop its previously articulated standard of supervisory liability under Section 1983. . . In this case, much like in Pereira-Castillo, Plaintiff parroted the circuit's supervisory liability standard without much if any factual enhancement tying defendant Laboy, or any of the other named defendants, to his constitutional injury. Plaintiff lumps together all five of the DOC Secretaries who were at the helm of the Department during Plaintiff's fifteen or more years of allegedly excessive incarceration as defendants sharing equal responsibility for broadly-worded and generalized conduct that fails to rise above legal conclusion or, as the Supreme Court has articulated, the 'sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully.'. . . Plaintiff does not allege that Defendant promulgated any policy that led to the bungling of his sentence, nor does he specify which practices and procedures Defendant failed to implement to protect Plaintiff's constitutional rights. Plaintiff fails to allege any facts specifically linking Defendant's training or supervision of subordinate personnel to the erroneous classification of his sentence, which the Court surmises is normally the responsibility of DOC record-keepers. Indeed, Plaintiff would have fared better in lodging a complaint against those lower-echelon DOC employees directly handling his case, such as the prison's record-keepers or the Parole Board members who repeatedly denied his requests for release. Plaintiff shoots himself in the foot when he states that the Parole Board knew but never gave notice to the DOC Secretaries of the nature of Plaintiff's sentence or of his right to be released upon rehabilitation. This statement undermines any role that the defendants may have played in acting deliberately indifferent toward Plaintiff's plight. As previously explained, notice is an important factor in making a determination of liability because one cannot act with deliberate indifference toward a person's constitutional rights if one does not know that his rights are being violated in the first place. . . . Assuming the complaint's facts are true, the Court laments the sad saga that Plaintiff was forced to endure as a prisoner whose Kafkaesque plight appeared to be repeatedly ignored by the DOC. However, the Court cannot replace its constitutional directive to judge facts indifferently through the eyes of the law with its sympathy for Plaintiff having suffered a terrible injustice. Plaintiff simply failed to state a plausible claim for relief by painting too broad a brush and not digging deeper beyond the surface of a generalized grievance against the heads of a department. By not doing the extra legal work required to make those specific causal connections between his alleged harm and those responsible for it, he missed his opportunity to obtain any relief.")

Lopez-Jimenez v. Pereira, No. 09-1156CCC, 2010 WL 500407, at *4, *5 (D. P.R. Feb. 3, 2010) ("[P]laintiffs have also included allegations in which they aver that defendants were 'aware of serious lapses in security and of the unreasonable risk of death existing at Bayamón 292 Institution through information available to them through regular channels of communication at the Administration of Correction ... [but] failed to enforce acceptable correctional practices at that institution or otherwise provide adequate security to Gilberto J. López-Jiménez...'. . . This, however, is akin to the 'knowledge and acquiescence' supervisory theory of liability rejected in Iqbal, where the Court held that it is not enough to just allege that a supervisor at least had knowledge of and was deliberately indifferent to the constitutional violation. Iqbal, at 1949. See also Maldonado v. Fontanés, 568 F.3d at 274, n. 7 (recognizing that " "[s]ome recent language from the Supreme Court may call into question our prior circuit law on the standard for holding a public official liable for damages under § 1983 on a theory of supervisory liability" and quoting Iqbal.) While we cannot say that plaintiffs' complaint does not show 'a possibility that someone acted unlawfully,' this is not enough under the revised pleading standards. Id. Instead, there must be factual allegations sufficient to rise above the 'speculative level' or the 'merely possible or conceivable.'. . . As plaintiffs' complaint does not plead enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face, it must be dismissed.").

Brenes-Laroche v. Toledo Davila, 682 F.Supp.2d 179, 186, 187 & n.3 (D.P.R. 2010) ("We . . . find that Plaintiff pleads sufficient facts to pin section 1983 liability upon all of the supervisory officers. As the Complaint's description of the parties and factual allegations show, the supervisory officers acts and omissions were affirmatively linked to their subordinates' unconstitutional behavior such that they could be characterized as either encouragement, condonation, acquiescence, or gross negligence amounting to deliberate indifference. We do not yet know which of these categories of misconduct would most appropriately describe Defendants' acts or omissions given our undeveloped factual record. However, we must credit Plaintiff for setting forth a factual scenario in which each individual defendant personally participated in the deprivation of rights, or at the very least, formulated a policy or engaged in a custom that led to a deprivation that was foreseeable and that each had power and authority to alleviate. . . . This is a case of a purported policy of the SJTOU's using excessive force, authorized by the unit's supervisors all the way up the chain of command, and directly ordered or permitted by them on the day of the alleged beatings. As stated in the factual background of this opinion and as reiterated in Plaintiff's Opposition to the Motion to Dismiss, each Defendant is implicated with having participated in the SJTOU's constitutional violations, either by consulting, ordering, or deliberately neglecting the unit's foreseeable use of excessive force. . . . Thus, here we are not presented with a case of wholly conjectural or hypothetical factual allegations that merely repeat the formulaic or conclusory language of supervisory liability, requiring dismissal under the standards set forth by the Supreme Court in Iqbal. We find that Plaintiff has pled sufficient facts to make out a plausible entitlement to relief under the First Circuit's formulation of supervisory liability, even if such has been called into question by the Supreme Court's new pleading standards. [noting that Maldonado casts doubt on the standard for holding a public official liable for damages under section 1983 on a theory of supervisory liability] We are cognizant of the difficulty described by Plaintiff in identifying who is responsible for what, especially when the SJTOU allegedly removed their badges and attacked Plaintiff in a coordinated group effort. We understand the difficulty faced by many civil rights litigants in Plaintiff's position who are not armed with sufficient facts, more likely to be found in Defendants' possession, to survive Iqbal's pleading standard at this pre-discovery stage of litigation. We hope the Circuit will clarify the supervisory liability standard to guide us in this task. For now, we heed the Supreme Court's suggestion to 'draw on [our] judicial experience and common sense.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1950. We deny Defendants request to dismiss the claims against the supervisory officers to allow discovery on these important factual issues that need to be resolved in order to determine more precisely each individual defendant's role, and thus liability, in violating Plaintiff's constitutional rights.") .

Whitten v. Blaisdell, No. 09-cv-450-SM, 2010 WL 376903, at *4, *5 (D.N.H. Jan. 22, 2010) ("Mere knowledge of the constitutional misdeeds of a subordinate does not, without more, give rise to a supervisor's liability for that conduct in a § 1983 action, where the underlying constitutional violation requires proof of the subordinate's purposeful action. See Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949 (discussing contours of liability for officials charged with Equal Protection violations arising from superintendent responsibilities). . . . Whitten alleges that, by utilizing the DOC grievance process, he alerted defendants MacLeod, Blaisdell, and Wrenn to the inadequacies in his medical care. Whitten alleges that these defendants, as supervisors for the medical staff directly responsible for providing his inadequate medical care, were more than merely aware of the inadequacies in his medical treatment. These supervisors, by virtue of being the decision makers in the grievance process, are charged with the obligation, and given the concomitant opportunity, to remedy the medical staff's failure to provide adequate medical care. This is particular true where, as here, the supervisors' failure to remedy or correct the denial of adequate medical care could be reasonably understood by the medical providers to amount to condonation of their failure to provide treatment. Where, as here, the issue is denial of medical care for a medical condition, and pain and other serious problems that are ongoing, supervisory approval of the medical staff's actions can be understood to lead inexorably to a continuing or future violation of an inmate's right to adequate medical care. . .Whitten states that he grieved the inadequacy of his medical treatment to MacLeod, to Blaisdell, and then on to Wrenn. These supervisory officials, by doing nothing, led Whitten to continue to receive inadequate medical care. Accordingly I find that, for purposes of preliminary review, Whitten has stated claims against the supervisory defendants for their deliberate indifference to, and denial of adequate medical care for, his serious medical needs.").

Kilroy v. Maine, Civil No. 9-324-B-W, 2010 WL 145294, at *4 (D. Me. Jan. 8, 2010) ("The Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal seems to have constricted the airways of supervisory liability law making it much harder for a plaintiff with such a claim to survive a motion to dismiss. See Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948. In the First Circuit before and after Iqbal, the plaintiff must plead facts sufficient to suggest that there was an affirmative link between the supervisor's conduct and the alleged constitutional violation. See Sanchez v. Pereira-Castillo, __ F.3d. __, __, __, 2009 WL 4936397, 12-13 (1st Cir. Dec. 23, 2009; Maldonado v. Fontanes, 568 F.3d 263, 274-75 & n. 7 (1st Cir.2009); Whitfield v. Melendez-Rivera, 431 F.3d 1, 14 (1st Cir.2005); Choate v. Merrill, 08-49-B-W, 2009 WL 3487768, 2-4 (D.Me. Oct. 20, 2009) (pending recommended decision). Kilroy's individual capacity claims against Mills and Harvey are based on a quintessentially respondeat superior theory of liability and the Iqbal majority insisted: 'Government officials may not be held liable for the unconstitutional conduct of their subordinates under a theory of respondeat superior. ... Because vicarious liability is inapplicable to ... § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.' 129 S.Ct. at 1948.")

Mulero Abreu v. Ocquendo-Rivera 729 F.Supp.2d 498, 514, 515 (D.P.R. 2010) ("In this case, the plaintiffs reference the sexual harassment claim policy that the supervisory defendants allegedly ignored that would have prevented constitutional violations, and also offer details regarding how and why Mulero's supervisors should have or did know about the alleged violations. Supervisory liability, however, 'lies only where an affirmative link between the behavior of a subordinate and the action or inaction of his supervisor exists such that the supervisor's conduct led inexorably to the constitutional violation.' Maldonado, 568 F.3d at 275 (quotations and citations omitted). Given the strict standard set by Maldonado, the Court finds that plaintiffs' allegations are similarly deficient to establish an 'affirmative link' between Orquendo's alleged behavior and the inaction of PRPD supervisors 'such that the supervisor's conduct led inexorably to the constitutional violation.'. . Accordingly, all claims for supervisory liability are hereby DISMISSED.")

Picard v. Hillsborough County Dept. of Corrections Medical Dept., No. 09-cv-271-SM, 2009 WL 4063191, at *4 (D.N.H. Nov. 20, 2009) ("Defendant O'Mara is alleged to have been made aware of Picard's need for medical attention for his weight loss by virtue of the HCDOC grievance system and failed to take action to insure the adequacy of the medical care provided to Picard. I find that a reasonable official receiving a grievance from Picard complaining of his significant weight loss and the failure of the HCDOC Medical Department to address the problem, would know that the failure to address those issues and to provide Picard with adequate medical care at the HCDOC, would likely violate Picard's constitutional rights. See Maldonado, 568 F.3d at 275. Picard has alleged sufficient facts to assert a claim that O'Mara was aware of and failed to remedy a deprivation of adequate medical care for Picard's weight loss, and that O'Mara is liable for the violation of Picard's Eighth Amendment right to adequate medical care.").

Torres-Santiago v. Diaz-Casiano, No. 08-1650 (GAG/BJM), 2009 WL 4015648, at *8, *9 (D.P.R. Nov. 16, 2009) ("Defendant Toledo, in his personal capacity, contends that the evidence in the record fails to make out a claim against him based on supervisory liability under Section 1983. Toledo argues that the plaintiffs have shown no facts which establish Toledo's personal involvement and have failed to otherwise show supervisory liability. . . The plaintiffs do not contend that Toledo was personally involved with the events of September 27-28, 2006; rather, they argue that Toledo is liable under Section 1983 for the violation of plaintiffs' Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights on the theory of supervisory liability for his failure to adequately supervise, train, and discipline the officers under his command. . . Under Section 1983, supervisory liability cannot be predicated on the theory of respondeat superior, and supervisors may only be held liable on the basis of their own acts or omissions. . . Nevertheless, a supervisor may be liable under Section 1983 if he formulates a policy or engages in a practice that leads to a civil rights violation committed by another. . . Absent direct participation, a supervisor may be held liable where (1) the behavior of his subordinates results in a constitutional violation, and (2) the supervisor's action or inaction was affirmatively linked to the behavior in the sense that it could be characterized as supervisory encouragement, condonation or acquiescence, or gross negligence amounting to deliberate indifference. . . . On a motion to dismiss, and by extension on a motion for judgment on the pleadings, the court must not credit 'bald assertions, unsupportable conclusions, periphrastic circumlocutions, and the like.'. . Merely alleging that a supervisor failed to train his subordinates is patently insufficient to establish a Section 1983 claim against the supervisor. . . Here, the plaintiffs' amended complaint makes only conclusory allegations that Toledo knew or should have known of the defendant officers' violent propensities; knowingly failed to properly train, supervise, or discipline the defendant officers; knowingly failed to implement reasonable or adequate policies and procedures to avoid abuse of plaintiffs' civil rights; and personally reviewed and/or adjudicated plaintiffs' administrated complaint and failed to act on it – all of which, the complaint alleges, constituted gross negligence amounting to deliberate or reckless indifference to the plaintiffs' constitutional rights. . . These 'bald assertions' and 'unsupportable conclusions' are plainly deficient to survive a motion for judgment on the pleadings. The fact that their administrative complaint (whether or not personally reviewed by Toledo, as conclusorily alleged) did not result in disciplinary action against the defendant officers does not reflect Toledo's knowing failure to adequately train, supervise, and discipline them, amounting to callous or reckless indifference. . . Aside from the absence of disciplinary action on the administrative complaint, the plaintiffs have not offered any other evidence in support of their assertions against Toledo, and further, they have established no affirmative link between Toledo's acts or omissions and his subordinates' alleged violation of the plaintiffs' constitutional rights. Rather, the plaintiffs only set forth generally that Toledo failed to train, supervise, and discipline officers under his control. Therefore, the plaintiffs have failed to allege a plausible entitlement to relief under Section 1983. Accordingly, the court DISMISSES with prejudice plaintiffs' Section 1983 claim against defendant Toledo in his personal capacity for violation of the plaintiffs' Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights.").

Merchant v. Blaisdell , No. 09-cv-231-PB, 2009 WL 3447245, at *4 (D.N.H. Oct. 16, 2009) ("Mere knowledge of the constitutional misdeeds of a subordinate does not, without more, give rise to a supervisor's liability for that conduct in a § 1983 action, where the underlying constitutional violation requires proof of the subordinate's purposeful action. . . .Merchant states that he grieved the inadequacy of his medical treatment to MacLeod, to Blaisdell, and then on to Wrenn. These supervisory officials, by doing nothing, led Merchant to continue to receive inadequate medical care. Accordingly I find that, for purposes of preliminary review, Merchant has stated sufficient facts to state claims against the supervisory defendants for their deliberate indifference to, and denial of adequate medical care for, his serious medical needs.").

Stanley v. Landers, No. 09-cv-52-PB, 2009 WL 2242676, at *8 (D.N.H July 23, 2009) ("There is no supervisory liability in § 1983 actions based on a respondeat superior theory of liability. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, __ U.S. __, __, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949 (2009). The standard set forth in the First Circuit for supervisory liability under section 1983 is that a supervisor may be held personally liable 'for the behavior of his subordinates only if "(1) the behavior of his subordinates results in a constitutional violation, and (2) the supervisor's action or inaction was affirmatively linked to that behavior in the sense that it could be characterized as supervisory encouragement, condonation or acquiescence or gross negligence amounting to deliberate indifference,'' leading inexorably to the constitutional violation. Pineda v. Toomey, 533 F.3d 50, 54 (1st Cir.2008) (citation and internal brackets omitted). The First Circuit's precedent, to be consistent with Ashcroft, 129 S.Ct. at 1949, must be interpreted to make officials liable only for their own actions or omissions. . . . Stanley asserts that he has made 'repeated multiple written and verbal complaints' regarding Landers' abusive conduct and false arrests to Landers' supervisors, Goodnow and Jordanhasi, which they ignored. . . . The allegations in the complaint are sufficient to state a claim for supervisory liability as to Goodnow and Jordanhasi for failing to investigate Stanley's complaints and supervise Landers.")

Chao v. Ballista, 630 F.Supp.2d 170, 177-79 & n.2 (D. Mass. 2009) ("Plausibility, as the Supreme Court's recent elaboration in Ashcroft v. Iqbal makes clear, is a highly contextual enterprise – dependent on the particular claims asserted, their elements, and the overall factual picture alleged in the complaint. . . .Allegations become 'conclusory' where they recite only the elements of the claim and, at the same time, the court's commonsense credits a far more likely inference from the available facts. . .This analysis depends on the full factual picture, the particular cause of action, and the available alternative explanations. Yet in keeping with Rule 8(a), a complaint should only be dismissed at the pleading stage where the allegations are so broad, and the alternative explanations so overwhelming, that the claims no longer appear plausible. . . .Together, [the] factual allegations [of the complaint] raise the plausible inference that, given their supervisory duties and security responsibilities, the Defendants failed to adequately train, supervise, or investigate Ballista's year-long sexual encounters with Chao. They encompass also a failure to adopt policies and procedures within the DOC that would have prevented the sexual abuse alleged in the complaint. . . . Given the public attention devoted to sexual abuse in prisons writ large, and the repetitive, long-lasting abuse alleged in this case, it is a fair inference from the pleadings that prison officials – including Commissioner Dennehey – were deliberately indifferent to the risks and reality of this abuse. . . . Notably, the state of mind required to make out a supervisory claim under the Eighth Amendment – i.e., deliberate indifference – requires less than the discriminatory purpose or intent that Iqbal was required to allege in his suit against Ashcroft and Mueller. . . Together with the other contextual factors discussed above, what qualifies as a fair or credible inference from the facts alleged in the pleadings must be calibrated accordingly.. . . While the Defendants' personal involvement will be further tested at the summary judgment stage, Chao's claims have met the crucial threshold of plausibility and survive the Defendants' Motion to Dismiss.")

Tangreti v. Bachmann, 983 F.3d 609, 612-20 (2d Cir. 2020) ("Following Ashcroft v. Iqbal, . . . courts may not apply a special rule for supervisory liability. Rather, the plaintiff must directly plead and prove that 'each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. . Applying the proper standard, we conclude that there is insufficient evidence in the pretrial record for the inference that Bachmann, through her own actions, displayed deliberate indifference to the substantial risk of sexual abuse. Even considering only Tangreti's version of the facts, the pretrial record does not support the inference that Bachmann had subjective knowledge that Tangreti was at a substantial risk of sexual abuse. . . It is not sufficient, as the district court maintained, that Bachmann should have known of the substantial risk of sexual abuse. . . . This court articulated standards for supervisory liability in Colon v. Coughlin, 58 F.3d 865 (2d Cir. 1995), but the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal called those standards into question and this court has not clarified whether or to what extent the Colon standards continue to apply. . . The district court relied on Colon to conclude that Bachmann was 'conceivably personally involved' in violating Tangreti's rights under the Eighth Amendment either because Bachmann was grossly negligent in supervising the officers or because she failed to act on information indicating that Tangreti was at substantial risk of sexual abuse. . .We disagree with that conclusion. Iqbal holds that a plaintiff may not rely on a special test for supervisory liability. Rather, 'a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.' . . Accordingly, for deliberate-indifference claims under the Eighth Amendment against a prison supervisor, the plaintiff must plead and prove that the supervisor had subjective knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm to an inmate and disregarded it. . . The pretrial record in this case does not support the inference that Bachmann had the required subjective knowledge that Tangreti was at a substantial risk of being sexually abused. . . .Iqbal cast doubt on the continued viability of the special standards for supervisory liability set forth in Colon. . . Without clear direction from this court, . . . district courts in the circuit have sought, with inconsistent results, to determine the effect of Iqbal on supervisory liability. . . . Circuit courts have considered the impact of Iqbal as well. The Tenth Circuit has concluded that, 'after Iqbal, [a p]laintiff can no longer succeed on a § 1983 claim against [a d]efendant by showing that as a supervisor he behaved knowingly or with deliberate indifference that a constitutional violation would occur at the hands of his subordinates, unless that is the same state of mind required for the constitutional deprivation he alleges.' [citing Dodds v. Richardson]. . . The focus is on what the supervisor did or caused to be done, 'the resulting injury attributable to his conduct, and the mens rea required of him to be held liable, which can be no less than the mens rea required of anyone else. Simply put, there's no special rule of liability for supervisors. The test for them is the same as the test for everyone else.'. . Other circuits have endorsed this view. . . We join these circuits in holding that after Iqbal, there is no special rule for supervisory liability. Instead, a plaintiff must plead and prove 'that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. . 'The factors necessary to establish a [§ 1983] violation will vary with the constitutional provision at issue' because the elements of different constitutional violations vary. . . The violation must be established against the supervisory official directly. In this case, '[t]o state a claim under the Eighth Amendment on the basis that a defendant has failed to prevent harm, a plaintiff must plead both (a) conditions of confinement that objectively pose an unreasonable risk of serious harm to their current or future health, and (b) that the defendant acted with "deliberate indifference[.]"'. . . Deliberate indifference in this context 'means the official must "know[ ] of and disregard[ ] an excessive risk to inmate health or safety; the official must both be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and he must also draw the inference."'. .Tangreti must therefore establish that Bachmann violated the Eighth Amendment by Bachmann's own conduct, not by reason of Bachmann's supervision of others who committed the violation. She must show that Bachmann herself 'acted with "deliberate indifference"'—meaning that Bachmann personally knew of and disregarded an excessive risk to Tangreti's health or safety. . . Tangreti cannot rely on a separate test of liability specific to supervisors. . . . Given this record, at most it may be said that Bachmann could have or should have made an inference of the risk of sexual abuse. . . But there is no evidence that she made that inference until October 31, 2014, when she discovered, and questioned Tangreti about, the ongoing sexual abuse. There is therefore insufficient evidence in the pretrial record that Bachmann acted with deliberate indifference to support Tangreti's § 1983 claim. Contrary to the district court's conclusion, it is not enough for Tangreti to show that Bachmann was negligent, or even grossly negligent, in her supervision of the correctional officers or in failing to act on the information she had. The deliberate-indifference standard 'require[es] a showing that the official was subjectively aware of the risk,'. . . and that showing has not been made. . .In sum, we agree with Bachmann that the scope of supervisory liability under § 1983 for violations of the Eighth Amendment was not clearly established at the time of the relevant conduct. To hold a state official liable under § 1983, a plaintiff must plead and prove the elements of the underlying constitutional violation directly against the official without relying on a special test for supervisory liability. In the context of the Eighth Amendment, that requires a showing of deliberate indifference on the part of the state-official, and the pretrial record in this case cannot meet that standard. Accordingly, we REVERSE the judgment of the district court and remand with instructions to enter summary judgment for the defendant.")

Morgan v. Dzurenda, 956 F.3d 84, 89-90 (2d Cir. 2020) ("Here, while Chapdelaine and Godding both held supervisory roles at Osborn, Morgan seeks to hold them liable only for acts that they themselves committee. . . The crux of Morgan's allegations against Chapdelaine and Godding is that they violated the Eighth Amendment by ignoring his pleas for help. Morgan nowhere suggests that Chapdelaine, Godding, or any other defendant improperly allowed a subordinate prison official to commit a constitutional violation. The doctrine of supervisory liability is therefore not implicated.")

Ganek v. Leibowitz, 874 F.3d 73, 93 (2d Cir. 2017) ("[T]he fact that the decision to search LG's offices was 'carefully considered at the highest levels' of the U.S. Attorney's office is not enough to admit an inference that supervisors knew or should have known that a statement in the warrant affidavit, attributed to Adondakis, was false. . . Certainly Ganek does not plead, either generally or with specific reference to this case, that FBI and U.S. Attorney supervisors, when reviewing search warrant applications, do not routinely rely on their subordinates to report accurately the statements made to them by cooperating witnesses. Nor do they—or could they—suggest that doing so is reckless. . . In sum, because Ganek has failed to state cognizable Fourth Amendment, procedural due process, and failure-to-intercede claims, and, in any event, because Ganek has failed to plead sufficient facts as to each supervisor defendant's personal involvement in the submission of the alleged misstatement to the magistrate judge, the supervisor defendants are entitled to dismissal of these claims.")

Raspardo v. Carlone, 770 F.3d 97, 116-17 (2d Cir. 2014) ("Individual liability under § 1983 in hostile work environment claims may also involve supervisory liability. In addressing the 'federal analog' of § 1983 Bivens actions, the United States Supreme Court in Ashcroft v. Iqbal confirmed that liability for supervisory government officials cannot be premised on a theory of respondeat superior because § 1983 requires individual, personalized liability on the part of each government defendant. . . . A supervisor is protected by qualified immunity so long as reasonable officials could disagree about whether the supervisor's action was grossly negligent in light of clearly established law. . . The standard of gross negligence is satisfied where the plaintiff establishes that the defendant-supervisor was aware of a subordinate's prior substantial misconduct but failed to take appropriate action to prevent future similar misconduct before the plaintiff was eventually injured. . . . A supervisor is not grossly negligent, however, where the plaintiff fails to demonstrate that the supervisor knew or should have known of a problematic pattern of employee actions or where the supervisor took adequate remedial steps immediately upon learning of the challenged conduct. . . A plaintiff pursuing a theory of gross negligence must prove that a supervisor's neglect caused his subordinate to violate the plaintiff's rights in order to succeed on her claim. . .We have not yet determined the contours of the supervisory liability test, including the gross negligence prong, after Iqbal. . . We need not decide this question here because, as explained below, Gagliardi did not act with gross negligence in his supervision of Carlone, and the other tests for supervisory liability are not satisfied.")

Terebesi v. Torreso, 764 F.3d 217, 234, 235 (2d Cir. 2014) ("[A] supervisor may be held liable if he or she was personally a 'direct participant' in the constitutional violation. . . . In this Circuit, a 'direct participant' includes a person who authorizes, orders, or helps others to do the unlawful acts, even if he or she does not commit the acts personally. . . .Our case law thus clearly establishes that planners may be liable under section 1983 to the extent that a plan for a search or seizure, as formulated and approved by those defendants, provides for and results in an unconstitutionally excessive use of force. . . We therefore reject the defendants' assertions that the law in this respect is not clearly established. . . A defendant who plans or directs an unreasonable use of force is liable for the resulting constitutional violation as a 'direct participa[nt].'")

Doe v. Whidden, 557 F. App'x 71, 2014 642671, *1, *2 n.1 (2d Cir. Feb. 20, 2014) ("We need not decide how the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), affected the standards for establishing supervisory liability as articulated in Colon v. Coughlin, 58 F.3d 865, 874 (2d Cir.1995), as Doe has not adduced sufficient evidence to show personal involvement under either standard. See Grullon v. City of New Haven, 720 F.3d 133, 139 (2d Cir.2013) (noting possibility that Ashcroft v. Iqbal "heightened the requirements for showing a supervisor's personal involvement with respect to certain constitutional violations" but concluding that complaint failed adequately to plead supervisor's personal involvement even under Colon v. Coughlin standards).")

Hogan v. Fischer, 738 F.3d 509, 519 n.3 (2d Cir. 2013) ("The Attorney General also argues that the claims against CO Erhardt, the one named defendant allegedly involved in the spraying incident, should be dismissed because Hogan has inadequately alleged his personal involvement. The district court did not address Erhardt's personal involvement in the spraying incident. We decline to address it in the first instance, but note that the complaint could be liberally construed to allege that Erhardt controlled access to the cell block, allowed the John Doe guards access to Hogan's cell, and then failed to intervene when it became apparent that the guards were violating Hogan's rights. . .We express no view on the extent to which the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009), 'may have heightened the requirements for showing a supervisor's personal involvement with respect to certain constitutional violations,'. . . or whether Hogan's current complaint plausibly alleges personal involvement.")

Grullon v. City of New Haven, 720 F.3d 133, 139-41 (2d Cir. 2013) ("Although the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), may have heightened the requirements for showing a supervisor's personal involvement with respect to certain constitutional violations, we need not reach Iqbal's impact on Colon in this case, for Grullon's initial complaint did not adequately plead the Warden's personal involvement even under Colon.. . .Grullon's complaint, as filed, did not sufficiently allege the Warden's personal involvement in or awareness of the health, safety, and communications issues raised by Grullon. There were no such direct allegations; there were no indirect allegations sufficient to permit an inference the Warden had acted or failed to act in any of the ways that would subject him to personal liability for the deprivations alleged by Grullon. We conclude that the district court did not err in dismissing Grullon's claims against the Warden in his individual capacity for lack of sufficient allegations of the Warden's personal involvement. We reach a different conclusion with respect to the denial of Grullon's request to amend. . . .Here, the district court dismissed Grullon's action with prejudice on the basis of his initial pleading, denying him leave to file an amended complaint alleging that he in fact sent his Letter to the Warden complaining of prison conditions. At the pleading stage, even if Grullon had no knowledge or information as to what became of his Letter after he sent it, he would be entitled to have the court draw the reasonable inference—if his amended complaint contained factual allegations indicating that the Letter was sent to the Warden at an appropriate address and by appropriate means—that the Warden in fact received the Letter, read it, and thereby became aware of the alleged conditions of which Grullon complained. It is of course possible that the Warden read the Letter and took appropriate action or that an administrative procedure was in place by which the Warden himself would not have received the Letter addressed to him; but those are potential factual issues as to personal involvement that likely cannot be resolved without development of a factual record. As we have previously held, 'when a pro se plaintiff brings a colorable claim against supervisory personnel, and those supervisory personnel respond with a dispositive motion grounded in the plaintiff's failure to identify the individuals who were personally involved, under circumstances in which the plaintiff would not be expected to have that knowledge, dismissal should not occur without an opportunity for additional discovery.'")

Vincent v. Yelich, 718 F.3d 157, 173 (2d Cir. 2013) ("A supervisory official may be liable in an action brought under § 1983 if he 'exhibited deliberate indifference to the rights of inmates by failing to act on information indicating that unconstitutional acts were occurring.' [citing Colon] As set out in Part II.A.2. above, Annucci testified in State v. Myers that he was 'aware of the Second Circuit's decision in Earley v. Murray at the time it came out in 2006,' that he was aware that Earley I ruled 'that DOCS did not have the authority to add a period of post-release supervision, if it was not included by the sentencing judge,' and that he 'did not agree with that decision'. . . Annucci testified that, 'at that time in 2006' he 'did not begin a resentencing initiative.'")

Reynolds v. Barrett, 685 F.3d 193, 206 n.14 (2d Cir. 2012) ("We need not here determine if the pattern-or-practice framework can ever be used in a § 1983 suit against a policy-making supervisory defendant, although we note our considerable skepticism on that question in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 676 (2009). In Iqbal, the Supreme Court held that 'b]ecause vicarious liability is inapplicable to ... § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. . In so holding, the Court explicitly rejected the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.'. . Thus, 'each Government official, his or her title notwithstanding, is only liable for his or her own misconduct.'. . Iqbal has, of course, engendered conflict within our Circuit about the continuing vitality of the supervisory liability test set forth in Colon v. Coughlin, 58 F.3d 865, 873 (2d Cir.1995). . . But the fate of Colon is not properly before us, and plaintiffs have not articulated any reason in their briefs to treat individual print shop supervisors and their policy-making superiors differently in the context of this suit. . . . Because plaintiffs have failed to develop any argument as to why the pattern-or-practice framework is suitable to establish the liability of individual supervisory defendants in § 1983 suits, we deem that argument waived.")

Shomo v. City of New York, 579 F.3d 176, 184 (2d Cir. 2009) ("Given Shomo's failure to allege the supervisors' personal involvement in the alleged Eighth Amendment violations, the district court properly ruled that Shomo failed to state valid claims against the supervisors. Even so, we conclude that Shomo should be granted leave to replead against these defendants. The district court determined that Shomo's complaint was inadequate because there were no allegations 'that Fraser and Perry were aware of the violations,' that grievances sent to the supervisors notified them of constitutional violations, or that the supervisors acted or failed to act in a way that caused any constitutional violations. It is possible that Shomo could remedy the inadequacies identified by the district court.").

James v. City of Rochester, No. 23-CV-6057DGL, 2023 WL 4413972, at *2-3 & n. (W.D.N.Y. July 10, 2023) ("Under the standards set forth in Iqbal and Tangreti, I conclude that plaintiff's allegations concerning [Monroe County Sheriff] Baxter are insufficient to make out a claim against him under § 1983. Plaintiff has simply alleged in conclusory fashion that Baxter provided training to MCSO deputies and that the training was inadequate. . . . In short, plaintiff's allegations fail to show Baxter's personal involvement in the alleged constitutional violation. Plaintiff's claim against Baxter rests essentially on a theory of supervisory liability, which is foreclosed by Tangreti. . . . The case relied on by plaintiff, Stone #1 v. Annucci, No. 20-CV-1326, 2021 WL 4463033 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 28, 2021), is inapposite. The court in that case held that a senior prison official can be held liable for his role in creating a policy by which violations of the Eighth Amendment occurred, if he can be shown to have acted with the necessary mens rea of deliberate indifference to the consequence of that policy. . . Plaintiff in the case at bar has not alleged that Baxter created a policy that led to a constitutional violation, much less that he did so with a culpable state of mind. This case has nothing to do with MCSO policies, but with the manner in which one particular warrant was executed.")

Stone #1 v. Annucci, No. 20-CV-1326 (RA), 2021 WL 4463033, at *7–10 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 28, 2021) ("The parties here dispute the state of the law in the wake of Tangreti. In particular, they disagree about whether the creation of policies by a supervisory defendant can constitute personal involvement in an underlying constitutional violation sufficient to establish Section 1983 liability. As noted above, whereas Defendants argue that the third Colon factor is no longer good law, . . . Plaintiffs argue that Tangreti 'does not change the fundamental framework' governing their claims[.] . . .At the outset, Plaintiffs' maximalist position—that 'personal involvement of supervisors can still be established by the five factors articulated in Colon,'. . . is clearly not correct. Although it is true that Tangreti did not expressly state, 'We are overruling Colon,' it made clear that plaintiffs seeking to hold supervisors liable 'cannot rely on a separate test of liability specific to supervisors'—i.e., exactly what the five-factor Colon test was. . . Going forward, a plaintiff must establish that each defendant's own conduct violated the constitution, and such liability can no longer be solely premised on a defendant's ''supervision of others who committed the violation.'. . This clear direction from Tangreti plainly abrogates the fourth Colon factor, which allowed liability for a defendant who was 'grossly negligent in supervising subordinates who committed the wrongful acts.'. . The Tangreti decision also makes clear that a plaintiff must show that each supervisor himself or herself possessed the requisite mens rea to be held liable for the constitutional violation, e.g., in a case like this, that he or she 'acted with "deliberate indifference"—meaning that [the defendant] personally knew of and disregarded an excessive risk to [plaintiff's] health or safety.'. . District courts applying Tangreti in the months since it was decided have generally stated that the five-factor Colon test is no longer good law. [collecting cases] It is simply not plausible, then, for Plaintiffs to argue that the old Colon test survived Tangreti in its entirety. At the same time, however, the Court disagrees with Defendants about the fate of policymaker liability under Section 1983 after Tangreti. Although the Second Circuit generally rejected Colon, Tangreti does not suggest that Colon's third factor—whereby a defendant can be said to be personally involved in a constitutional violation if he 'created a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred, or allowed the continuance of such a policy or custom,'. . . could never form the basis of an official's liability. . . . To be clear, Tangreti made clear that the requisite mens rea for a supervisor under Section 1983 'can be no less than the mens rea required of anyone else.'. . But where a plaintiff can establish that a senior official promulgated an unconstitutional policy with a culpable mental state—in this case, deliberate indifference—the Court is of the view that such official could be deemed to be personally involved in a constitutional violation. . . . Reading Tangreti and these other decisions together, the Court concludes that a senior prison official can still be held liable for his role in creating a policy by which violations of the Eighth Amendment occurred, but only if he can be shown to have acted with the necessary mens rea of deliberate indifference—that is, only if the pleadings or record evidence 'permit the inference that [he] had subjective knowledge of the risk of the sexual abuse inflicted on [plaintiffs] and that [he] decided to disregard that risk.'. . In this sense, although Plaintiffs' contention that Colon in its entirety survives Tangreti is certainly wrong, the framework applied by this Court in Pusepa is still largely applicable. There, this Court noted that a plaintiff adequately pleads a defendant's involvement in an unconstitutional policy by alleging facts showing 'that the defendant had policymaking responsibility and that, after notice of an unconstitutional practice, the defendant created the improper policy or allowed it to continue, causing the harm.'. . To the extent Tangreti bears on this framework, it is by making clear that mere 'notice' of an unconstitutional practice may be inadequate. After all, 'the mens rea required of [a supervisor] to be held liable ... can be no less than the mens rea required of anyone else.'. . The requisite inference of mens rea cannot be established merely by showing that a supervisory defendant 'should have known of the substantial risk of sexual abuse.'. . This language from Tangreti suggests that merely being on notice of sexual abuse in prison, or having constructive knowledge thereof, is not necessarily enough—rather, the defendant-official must subjectively know of the risk of sexual abuse and consciously disregard that risk. . . . One caveat is worth emphasizing: going forward past the pleadings stage, merely showing that defendants were on notice of previous instances of sexual abuse will not necessarily be enough to establish their liability. . . As Tangreti makes clear, a prison official charged with deliberate indifference must both (1) be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that there was a substantial risk of serious harm to inmates; and (2) actually draw that inference. . . At summary judgment, Plaintiffs will no longer benefit from Rule 9(b)'s recognition that knowledge and intent can be alleged generally. But for now, the allegations, viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, give rise to a reasonable inference that Annucci and Effman subjectively knew of a serious risk of sexual abuse of female inmates by staff in DOCCS facilities that was not being adequately addressed by the existing policies or the way they were being enforced.")

Cordero v. City of New York, No. 15-CV-3436, 2017 WL 4685544, at *11 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 17, 2017) ("Viewed in a light most favorable to the plaintiff the claims of supervisory liability against Lieutenant Moran for false arrest may proceed to trial. Lieutenant Moran supervised the investigation and arrest, and approved the overtime claims. He also received overtime himself, arguably as a result of the arrest. . . The jury may find Lieutenant Moran complicit with abuse of the city's overtime policy.")

Matteo v. Perez, No. 16-CV-1837 (NSR), 2017 WL 4217142, at *4–5 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 19, 2017) ("The Second Circuit has not squarely addressed how Iqbal affects the standards in Colon for establishing supervisory liability. . . Whether the claim should proceed against Defendant here is a close question. The Complaint alleges only that Defendant received two letters from Plaintiff and failed to respond. Some courts have held that 'mere receipt of a letter from an inmate, without more, does not constitute personal involvement for the purposes of section 1983 liability.'. . To the extent Plaintiff is arguing that Defendant failed to properly supervise subordinates who were violating his rights, 'the mere fact that a defendant possesses supervisory authority is insufficient to demonstrate liability for failure to supervise under § 1983.'. . But courts in this circuit have also held that 'these decisions may overstate Iqbal's impact on supervisory liability'. . . given that Iqbal involved alleged intentional discrimination. Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 676 (2009). The Supreme Court specifically held that '[t]he factors necessary to establish a Bivens violation will vary with the constitutional provision at issue.'. . 'Where the constitutional claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent, but instead relies on the unreasonable conduct of deliberate indifference standards of the Fourth and Eighth Amendments, the personal involvement analysis set forth in Colon v. Coughlin may still apply.'. . Ultimately, Plaintiff has demonstrated 'a tangible connection between the acts of the defendant and the injuries suffered.'. . The Court, in ruling on a motion to dismiss, must "take all facts and draw all inferences in the light most favorable" to the plaintiff, . . and, as noted, must apply the alleged general failure to remedy the inadequate heating to Defendant, the facility's immediate supervisor. Assuming that all five Colon avenues to liability remain open to Plaintiff, . . . a reasonable jury could find that the inmate was subjected for a prolonged period to bitter cold through the cumulative effects of Defendant's acts and omissions; if true, that could indeed constitute a constitutional violation[.] . . . Thus, The Court denies Defendant's motion to dismiss on these grounds.")

Case v. City of New York, 233 F.Supp.3d 372, 396 n.16 (S.D.N.Y. 2017) ("The Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, which imposed a limitation on supervisory liability, has 'engendered conflict within [the] Circuit about the continuing vitality of the supervisory liability test set forth in Colon.' Reynolds v. Barrett, 685 F.3d 193, 205 n.14 (2d Cir. 2012). In the wake of Iqbal, district courts in the Second Circuit have disagreed on the continuing vitality of the second, fourth, and fifth Colon factors, with some suggesting that the viability of those factors 'depends on the underlying constitutional claim.'. . Courts appear to agree, however, that the third factor remains viable regardless of the underlying claim. . .Because the relevant allegations with regard to the supervisory Defendants here sound only in the first and third factors, the Court need not concern itself with Iqbal's ramifications on this analysis.")

Johnson v. McKay, No. 9:14-CV-0803 BKS/TWD, 2015 WL 1735102, at *9-10 (N.D.N.Y. Apr. 16, 2015) ("District courts in this circuit have routinely held that a prisoner's allegation that a supervisory official failed to respond to a grievance is insufficient to establish that the official 'failed to remedy that violation after learning of it through a report or appeal' or 'exhibited deliberate indifference ... by failing to act on information indicating that the violation was occurring' within the meaning of Colon. . . Similarly, district courts have held that 'an allegation that an official ignored a prisoner's letter of protest and request for investigation of allegations made therein is insufficient to hold that official liable for the alleged violations.'. . However, the Second Circuit has recently cautioned courts against dismissing claims at the 12(b)(6) stage for failure to allege personal involvement where the Plaintiff alleges that an official failed to respond to a letter of complaint. [citing Grullon v. City of New Haven] Here, under Grullon, Plaintiff is entitled to the inference that Defendant Fischer received his notifications, read them, and became aware of the alleged conditions of which Plaintiff complained. Therefore, the complaint plausibly suggests Defendant Fischer's personal involvement.")

Riddick v. Semple, No. 3:15-CV-322 SRU, 2015 WL 1530808, at *2 (D. Conn. Apr. 6, 2015) ("Riddick has named as defendants Commissioner Semple, Warden Falcone, and Deputy Wardens Hein and Dilworth. He describes these defendants as being responsible for creating and enforcing policies, training and supervising employees and the general custody and care of inmates. Riddick alleges that defendants Falcone, Hein and Dilworth were 'aware' that he had completed the Administrative Segregation Program and refused to remove him from Administrative Segregation status. He alleges that he repeatedly informed the defendants of his conditions of confinement in segregation. Although these allegations might be insufficient at trial or on summary judgment, the Second Circuit has held that allegations that a prisoner informed supervisory officials of his claims can be sufficient to state a claim for supervisory liability. See Grullon v. City of New Haven, 720 F.3d 133, 141 (2d Cir.2013). The claims against the supervisory defendants will proceed at this time.")

Golodner v. City of New London, Conn., No. 314-CV-00173-VLB, 2015 WL 1471770, at *7 (D. Conn. Mar. 31, 2015) ("The Second Circuit has raised the possibility that the Colon test was overruled in part by the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal, and that the requirement for making out a claim of supervisory liability is now more demanding. See, e.g., Grullon, 720 F.3d at 139. However, the Second Circuit has thus far declined to resolve the question, as many other courts in this district have noted. . . This court does not need to consider the question of whether to apply the stricter standard because plaintiff has not satisfied the less exacting Colon standard. Further, even if plaintiff had met the Colon test, other courts in this district have found that where the 'constitutional claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent, but instead relies on the unreasonable conduct or deliberate indifference standards of the Fourth, Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments, the personal involvement analysis set forth in Colon v. Coughlin may still apply.'")

Argro v. Osborne, No. 3:12-CV-910 NAM/DEP, 2015 WL 1446427, at *15 (N.D.N.Y. Mar. 30, 2015) ("Under Iqbal, the allegation in the second amended complaint that Bette Osborne 'knew that [DSS] employees are routinely entering people's homes and conducting searches' does not, without more, support a claim for supervisory liability. Iqbal expressly rejected as a basis for liability government officials' 'knowledge and acquiescence in' their subordinates' unconstitutional conduct, because such liability would amount to holding the officials 'accountable for the misdeeds of their agents.'. . Plaintiffs allege more than knowledge and acquiescence, however. They allege that, while knowing of the unconstitutional conduct of her subordinates, Bette Osborne failed to establish proper training policies concerning constitutional rights and established a policy or 'protocol' pursuant to which DSS employees 'were allowed to enter anybody's home without a search warrant or court order and without care for protestations of privacy and objections to searches, and do whatever they like.' If proven, such allegations would amount to a showing that, through her own individual actions in carrying out her responsibilities as DSS Commissioner, Bette Osborne caused the constitutional violations of which plaintiffs complain. Imposing liability based on such a showing would be consistent with Iqbal,. . . and would satisfy Colon's third category, i.e., that Bette Osborne 'created a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred, or allowed the continuance of such policy or custom.'")

Guillory v. Weber, No. 9:12-CV-280 LEK/RFT, 2015 WL 1419088, at *11 (N.D.N.Y. Mar. 27, 2015) (R&R) ("Whether a supervisory official can be liable under the second Colon factor—failing to remedy a wrong after learning of the violation—appears to turn on whether the complaint alleges an 'ongoing' constitutional violation. . . A supervisor will be 'personally involved' if the complaint alleges an 'ongoing' constitutional violation, the supervisor reviews the complaint, and it is a situation that he can remedy directly. . . On the other hand, if the violation has already occurred and is not ongoing, then 'the official will not be found personally responsible for failing to remedy a violation.'. .Here, Superintendent Doldo was unaware of an ongoing constitutional violation. Instead, it is uncontested that on October 14, 2011, Superintendent Doldo learned about the October 12th microwave incident and Plaintiff's inability to enter the Activities Building the previous day. There are no other facts suggesting that Doldo was aware of an ongoing issue with access to the Activities Building during mealtimes. And in fact, Plaintiff was able to enter the Activities Building on October 12th. Therefore, his failure to respond to or act on Plaintiff's letter of complaint, which, at the time, appeared to refer to a previous and isolated error, is insufficient to find him personally involved in the mishaps that took place during the Festival of Sukkot. For this reason, the Court recommends dismissing Superintendent Doldo from Plaintiff's free exercise and RLUIPA claims.") (footnotes omitted)

Rothenberg v. Daus, No. 08-CV-567 SHS, 2015 WL 1408655, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 27, 2015) ("The Second Circuit 'ha[s] not yet determined the contours of the supervisory liability test ... after Iqbal.'. . Although this Court has already expressed its position that 'the five Colon categories supporting personal liability of supervisors still apply as long as they are consistent with the requirements applicable to the particular constitutional provision alleged to have been violated,' see Qasem v. Toro, 737 F.Supp.2d 147, 151–52 (S.D.N.Y.2010) (Stein, J.), other district courts have disagreed as to which Colon categories survive Iqbal. [collecting cases]")

Peguero v. City of New York, No. 12-CV-5184 JPO, 2015 WL 1208353, at *5 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 17, 2015) ("In opposing summary judgment on the Monell claims, Plaintiffs rely exclusively on the argument that the City may be held liable by virtue of Schwarz's conduct. . . . Plaintiffs reason that because Schwarz had 'supervisory authority' over Labate . . . and personally participated in the violation of Peguero's constitutional rights, his conduct may form the basis of a Monell claim. . . This argument confuses municipal and supervisory liability. A supervisor's 'direct participation' in a constitutional violation—even if that participation takes the form of 'ordering or helping others to do the unlawful acts'—is a means to establish that the supervisor had 'personal involvement' in the violation and is therefore liable for damages under Section 1983. . . But it is not sufficient to hold a municipality liable. To subject the City of New York to liability under Section 1983, Schwarz would have to be an official with 'final policymaking authority.'. . It is clear, as a matter of law, that Schwarz—who held the position of sergeant—was not.")

Doe v. New York, No. 10 CV 1792 RJD VVP, 2015 WL 1221495, at *9-11 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 16, 2015) ("[E]ven if Governor Pataki was not involved in the creation of the Hepatitis policy, plaintiff has alleged that the Defendant Policy Makers held meetings to discuss 'methods to keep prison HCV rates under control,'. . . and 'discussed the price of mass treatment and preventative measures in the prison system' in 'various meetings and memoranda between 1993 and 1995[.]'. . . Accepting these allegations as true, it is certainly plausible that Governor Pataki was advised of the Hepatitis policy in one of these meetings and, agreeing with its cost benefit analysis, decided to allow the continuance of the policy. . . Therefore, plaintiff's claims against Governor Pataki in his individual capacity may proceed, for the moment at least, based on his alleged role in creating (or allowing the continuance of) the Hepatitis policy. . . . The allegations in the Third Amended Complaint that Dr. Curtin and Dr. O'Connell, in their role as medical supervisors, indifferently or intentionally enforced the Hepatitis policy at their facilities, is conclusory. . . Plaintiff K. Doe does not identify with any particularity that Dr. Curtin and Dr. O'Connell personally knew about the Hepatitis policy, or encouraged its implementation at their correctional facilities, much less that they were aware of K. Doe's symptoms and were deliberately indifferent to his medical needs. . . . If these allegations were sufficient, it could create the possibility of Section 1983 liability for prison medical supervisors any time there was a failure to diagnose an inmate. 'That result would defeat the Second Circuit's strict requirement of personal involvement as a prerequisite for [Section] 1983 liability.'. . Therefore, plaintiff's claims against Dr. Curtin and Dr. O'Connell are dismissed for failure to adequately allege personal involvement under Section 1983.")

Ellerbe v. Jasion, No. 3:12-CV-00580 MPS, 2015 WL 1064739, at *6-8 (D. Conn. Mar. 11, 2015) ("At issue here is the scope of the second Colon category ('[T]he defendant, after being informed of the violation through a report or appeal, failed to remedy the wrong ....'), which is in tension with Iqbal. . . In cases decided before Iqbal, the Second Circuit held that a supervisor could be shown to be personally involved in a disciplinary hearing where the supervisor reviewed and affirmed the decision of the hearing officer. [citing cases] The Second Circuit has also noted in dicta that 'it is questionable whether an adjudicator's rejection of an administrative grievance would make him liable for the conduct complained of.' McKenna v. Wright, 386 F.3d 432, 437 (2d Cir.2004) (emphasis added). It is unclear whether this comment in McKenna—a case about an inmate's grievance to prison administrators concerning the prison's failure to provide medical treatment—is applicable to an appeal of a decision to impose segregated confinement. At least in Connecticut's prisons, appealing a placement in Punitive Segregation or Administrative Segregation is governed by different rules than an 'Inmate Grievance,' which is a catch-all term for all inmate complaints other than appeals of specific listed decisions (a list that includes decisions to place an inmate in Punitive Segregation or Administrative Segregation). Conn. Dep't Corr. Admin. Dir. 9.6 § 4. As a result of the tensions within Second Circuit case law and the uncertainty raised by Iqbal, recent decisions by the district courts in this circuit are split over whether and to what extent a supervisor's denial of an administrative appeal constitutes personal involvement. Many decisions rely on a case-by-case approach, finding personal involvement only where a supervisor's role is more active than a 'rubber stamping' of the hearing officer's decision, and/or only where the supervisor's review occurs while the consequences of the hearing (segregated confinement) are still ongoing and can be remedied. [collecting cases] A decision in this district found personal involvement where both factors were shown-that is, the supervisor decided the appeal after an 'extensive review' and was aware of the alleged due process violation 'before the sanctions imposed by [the hearing officer] had expired.' Friedland v. Otero, No. 3:11–CV–606 JBA, 2014 WL 1247992, at *10–11 (D.Conn. Mar. 25, 2014); see also Baldwin v. Arnone, No. 3:12–CV–243 JCH, 2012 WL 3730010, at *4 (D. Conn. June 20, 2012) (granting plaintiff leave to amend "to include specific allegations" with regard to the supervisor who affirmed the result of the hearing). This Court adopts such an approach. Ellerbe's allegations against Milling are limited to a conclusory accusation that she 'acquiesced to application of said malfeasance when she signed off and placed the plaintiff on A/S.'. . Under Administrative Directive 9.4, Milling's role as Director of Offender Classification and Population Management is to review a written report and recommendation provided by the hearing officer (in this case, Griggs) and issue a final decision. . . As to timing, the complaint is silent as to exactly when Milling became involved. But a reasonable inference drawn in Ellerbe's favor is that Milling's review occurred before or during Ellerbe's time in Administrative Segregation. Milling's actions were necessary to authorize Ellerbe's placement in Administrative Segregation. . . .Ellerbe fails to allege that Milling's decision was anything more than a 'rubber stamp,' or that she even was on notice that Ellerbe believed that his due process rights had been violated. Although Milling's role—reviewing the hearing officer's recommendation and issuing the final decision—is slightly different from that of an official reviewing an administrative appeal, it shares the qualities that make review of an administrative appeal a questionable basis for personal involvement. The Directive does not require Milling to be present at the hearing or otherwise on notice of what occurred—much less actively involved in the process—and Ellerbe does not allege that she was. While it is conceivable that Griggs's report put Milling on notice that Ellerbe's due process rights were violated during the hearing, Ellerbe has made no such allegation. The fact that Milling approved the placement, in the absence of further allegations, does not amount to personal involvement in the alleged due process violations. As to the timing of Dzurenda's consideration of Ellerbe's appeal, a reasonable inference from Ellerbe's allegations is that Dzurenda's review occurred while Ellerbe was still in Administrative Segregation. Ellerbe alleges that the appeal was decided by October 15, 2010, and that he was in Administrative Segregation for 243 days. Ellerbe's allegations about Dzurenda's involvement are more extensive than those against Milling. Ellerbe alleges that he filed an appeal notifying Dzurenda that evidence was ignored and his due process rights were violated. . . He also alleges that Dzurenda's denial of the appeal specifically referenced and rejected the allegation that a piece of evidence, the videotape, was ignored, . . . and that Dzuranda 'intentionally fabricated information as his basis for denying the appeal,'. . . . These allegations are enough to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of Dzurenda's personal involvement. Whether Ellerbe can flesh out his allegations and support them with evidence is a matter to be determined at the summary judgment phase or at trial. The motion to dismiss the due process claim against Milling due to her lack of personal involved is granted, and the claim is dismissed without prejudice. Ellerbe may, within twenty-one days of this ruling, file an amended complaint with additional allegations only as to the manner in which Milling was actively involved in violating his due process rights. The motion to dismiss the due process claim against Dzurenda due to his lack of personal involvement is denied.") Rossi v. Fishcer, No. 13-CV-3167 PKC DF, 2015 WL 769551, at *16-17 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 24, 2015) ("Plaintiff alleges that Brian Fischer, as the Commissioner of DOCCS, 'has the statutory authority to promulgate rules, regulations, and policies governing the religious rights of prisoners within the department.'. . Similarly he alleges that Catherine Jacobsen as Acting Deputy Commissioner for Program Services 'had the authority to approve policies governing the religious programs in [DOCCS],'. . . and that Mark Leonard, as the Director of Ministerial, Family, and Volunteer Services 'was responsible for the promulgation of policies affecting the religious rights of all Rastafarian prisoners within [DOCCS].'. . Plaintiff attributes DOCCS's policies on holy days and headgear to Fischer, Jacobsen, and Leonard, along with other defendants. . . A defendant that creates a policy is considered personally involved in any unconstitutional practices that occur under the policy. . . .[P]laintiff has plausibly alleged that defendants Fischer, Jacobson, and Leonard were involved in creating policies under which his right to free exercise was substantially burdened. Thus, these defendants are not properly dismissed from this suit at this juncture. Plaintiff also alleges that defendant Fischer is personally involved in the alleged constitutional violations because he has written letters to defendant Fischer 'complaining about the unconstitutional impediments to plaintiff's ability to practice his faith,' but Fischer has always referred plaintiff's complaints to subordinates. . . Defendants are correct in stating that this allegation cannot demonstrate the requisite personal involvement of Fischer. . . 'If the supervisor fails to respond to [a prisoner's] letter or passes the letter on to a subordinate to handle, the general rule is that the supervisor is not personally involved.'. . Nevertheless, because plaintiff has plausibly alleged Fischer's personal involvement in creating policies under which unconstitutional practices have occurred, Fischer is not dismissed from this suit.")

Smith v. Wildermuth, No. 9:11-CV-0241 TJM/TWD, 2015 WL 403108, at *9-10 (N.D.N.Y. Jan. 29, 2015) (R & R) ("District courts in this circuit have routinely held that a prisoner's allegation that a supervisory official failed to respond to a grievance is insufficient to establish that the official 'failed to remedy the violation after learning of it through a report or appeal.'. . Similarly, district courts have held that 'an allegation that an official ignored a prisoner's letter of protest and request for investigation of allegations made therein is insufficient to hold that official liable for the alleged violations .'. . However, the Second Circuit has recently cautioned courts against dismissing claims at the 12(b)(6) stage for failure to allege personal involvement where the plaintiff alleges that an official failed to respond to a letter of complaint. Grullon v. City of New Haven, 720 F.3d 133, 141 (2d Cir.2013) . . . Here, the second amended complaint includes ten pages of ways in which Plaintiff alleges that Defendant Martuscello became aware of an environment existing at Coxsackie in which correction officers had free rein to abuse prisoners. Expressing no opinion as to whether such allegations are sufficient to withstand a dispositive motion, I find that they are sufficient for the purposes of initial review and recommend that the Court direct Defendants to respond to this claim. . . . As noted above, the Second Circuit has recently cautioned courts against dismissing claims at the 12(b)(6) stage for failure to allege personal involvement where the plaintiff alleges that an official failed to respond to a letter of complaint. . . In light of Grullon, the second amended complaint sufficiently alleges deliberate indifference to survive initial review. Plaintiff alleges that he repeatedly wrote letters and grievances to Defendants Rock and Evans regarding Inmate Scarbrough's erratic behavior and Plaintiff's fears for his own safety. . . Plaintiff further alleges, and the Court has confirmed, that Defendant Evans was named as a defendant in a lawsuit by Inmate Scarbrough preceding his attack on Plaintiff. . . In that lawsuit, Scarbrough alleged that he was mentally unstable and was not being protected from himself and others. . . Assuming, as the Second Circuit has directed that the Court must, that Defendants Rock and Evans in fact received those letters and read them, Plaintiff has alleged facts sufficient to survive initial review. . . Therefore, I recommend that the Court direct Defendants to respond to this claim.")

Ocampo v. Fischer, No. 11-CV-4583 CBA MDG, 2014 WL 7422763, at *7-8 (E.D.N.Y. Dec. 31, 2014) ("At the outset, the Court acknowledges that affirming the denial of a grievance is insufficient to establish the personal involvement of a prison superintendent, . . . and that the 'mere receipt of a letter from an inmate, without more, does not constitute personal involvement for the purposes of section 1983 liability[.]'. . . However, '[w]here a supervisory official reviews and responds to a prisoner's [letter of] complaint, [he] is personally involved.'. . . The Court agrees with the R & R that, at this stage of the proceedings, Ocampo has sufficiently alleged Superintendent Breslin's personal involvement in the failure to provide him with adequate medical treatment. Superintendent Breslin's personal involvement in the instant action is not premised solely on his August 8, 2011 determination regarding Ocampo's Hepatitis C related grievance, or the mere receipt of letters regarding Ocampo's medical treatment. Rather, the supplemental materials submitted by Ocampo suggest that Breslin not only received letters regarding Ocampo's medical treatment, but also responded to them. . .To the extent Superintendent Breslin argues in his objections that Ocampo has failed to provide Superintendent Breslin's responses that corroborate these statements, . . . the Court notes that in deciding a motion to dismiss, the Court accepts as true Ocampo's factual allegations and views them in the light most favorable to him. . . Accordingly, on the basis of factual allegations demonstrating that Superintendent Breslin personally responded to issues regarding Ocampo's medical care beyond reviewing the grievance Ocampo filed, at this stage of the proceedings Ocampo has sufficiently alleged Superintendent Breslin's personal involvement in the failure to provide Ocampo with adequate medical care.")

Balkum v. Leonard, 65 F.Supp.3d 367, 371 (W.D.N.Y. 2014) ("Here, Plaintiff alleges in his first claim that he was physically attacked 'while imprisoned in a DOCCS transportation bus ... parked within Lakeview Shock Incarceration Facility,' . . . and alleges in his second claim that 'while within the Lakeview Shock Incarceration Facility' he advised Defendant Richir of the attack committed by his corrections officers . . . . Both claims are listed as occurring on June 17, 2011 at 6:00 p.m. 'within Lakeview Shock Incarceration Facility.'. . As a result, Plaintiff's complaint may liberally be construed to allege that Defendant Richir was present and informed of the alleged attack, or that Defendant Richir was informed of the alleged attack shortly after it occurred but failed to remedy the wrong. Either way, Plaintiff sufficiently alleges Defendant Richir's personal involvement to survive a motion to dismiss by claiming that Defendant Richir learned of the alleged attack but 'failed to correct the wrong acts.'")

Houston v. Schriro, No. 11 CIV. 7374 LAP, 2014 WL 6694468, at *14-15 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 26, 2014) ("Whatever the status of Colon, '[t]he law is clear ... that a prison official's mere response to a grievance, by itself, is not sufficient to establish personal involvement for purposes of § 1983 ...,' although a detailed response may be sufficient. . . Similarly, ignoring a prisoner's letter or complaint is insufficient to render an official personally liable. . . Even assuming Houston's account of the grievances that he filed to be accurate, there is insufficient evidence to establish the personal involvement of the supervisory-defendants. Houston initially filed a grievance with Brown, IGRAC Supervisor for MDC, who responded that the issue was non-grievable. . . This response was a form letter in which Brown had placed an 'X' to indicate that the complaint '[did] not fall under the purview of the IGRP,'. . . and is far from the substantive response required to establish personal involvement. . . Houston then claims to have filed an IGRC hearing request with Harris, Director for IGRC Hearings Program for NYC DOC, and appeal requests with Agro, the Warden for MDC, Halyard–Saunders, Assistant Commissioner for Programs Administration and Discharge Planning for NYC DOC, and Wolf, Director of the Board of Corrections for NYC DOC. . . All claim that they never received any such grievance, and none responded. . . Even resolving this factual dispute in favor of Houston, receipt of a grievance does not constitute personal involvement. . . Otherwise, the exhaustion requirement would lead to supervisory liability becoming nearly automatic. . . Finally, Houston wrote to Commissioner Schriro. Schriro's office has a record of the letter indicating that she reviewed it and forwarded it to a subordinate to investigate. . . Such delegation is ordinary and appropriate, and is insufficient to constitute personal involvement. . . Accordingly, Defendants' motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff's claims of supervisory liability is granted.")

Guillory v. Ellis, 9:11-CV-600 MAD/ATB, 2014 WL 4365274, *21 (N.D.N.Y. Aug. 29, 2014) ("A supervisory official is personally involved if that official directly participated in the infraction. . . The defendant may have been personally involved if, after learning of a violation through a report or appeal, he or she failed to remedy the wrong. . . Personal involvement may also exist if the official created a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred or allowed such a policy or custom to continue. . . Finally, a supervisory official may be personally involved if he or she were grossly negligent in managing subordinates who caused the unlawful condition or event. . . The mere receipt of a letter or similar complaint is insufficient to constitute personal involvement; otherwise, a plaintiff could create personal involvement by any supervisor simply by writing a letter. . . In order for a letter to suffice to establish personal involvement, plaintiff would have to show that the supervisor conducted a personal investigation or personally took action on the letter or grievance. . .However, personal action does not include referring the letter to a subordinate for investigation.")

Phillip v. Schriro, 12-CV-8349-RA, 2014 WL 4184816, *4-*6 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 22, 2014) ("Defendants assert that Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), invalidated the Colon factors regarding supervisory liability and that 'to adequately allege personal involvement, a plaintiff must demonstrate that the defendant, through his or her own conduct, violated the Constitution.'. . Although the Second Circuit has explicitly declined to resolve this issue, see Hogan, 738 F.3d at 519 n. 3; Grullon v. City of New Haven, 720 F.3d 133, 139 (2d Cir.2013), numerous district courts have confronted the question, and the Court is persuaded by the majority view that Colon remains good law. . . While it is true that Iqbal reinforces the well-established rule in this Circuit that respondeat superior does not apply to § 1983 claims, . . 'Colon' s bases for liability are not founded on a theory of respondeat superior, but rather on a recognition that personal involvement of defendants in alleged constitutional deprivation can be shown by nonfeasance as well as misfeasance.'. . Therefore, unless or until the Second Circuit or Supreme Court rule otherwise, this Court agrees with the courts that have held that the Colon factors 'still apply as long as they are consistent with the requirements applicable to the particular constitutional provision alleged to have been violated.'. . . Plaintiff has pled sufficient facts to plausibly allege the personal involvement of the Wardens. He alleges that he was denied his constitutional right to attend religious services on ten different occasions and that the Wardens were contacted by a grievance representative concerning these violations. . . Plaintiff also claims that the Wardens were informed of the violations by the Commissioner. . .These 'allegations fall squarely within the second Colon category.'. . Under the second Colon factor, 'if a plaintiff alleges that a constitutional violation is ongoing, and that a defendant, after being informed of a violation through a report or appeal, failed to remedy the wrong, the plaintiff's claim against the defendant should not [be] dismissed under Rule 12(b)(6).'. . This is not a case where it is clear that the Wardens had no 'genuine' or 'realistic' opportunity to intervene in the alleged violations of Plaintiff's rights. . .Accordingly, because there has been no 'discovery in this case, this Court will not dismiss Plaintiff's claims ... at this time. Discovery ... will reveal whether the [Wardens] were in a position to remedy the alleged ongoing constitutional violation Plaintiff complains of.'. . .Plaintiff's allegations against Commissioner Schriro, by contrast, must be dismissed for lack of personal involvement. A supervisory official is not deemed to have been personally involved solely by virtue of having received a letter or complaint from a prisoner and having referred it to the appropriate department for investigation, which is what Plaintiff alleges here. . . Courts have so held, because 'commissioners and prison superintendents receive large numbers of letters from inmates, and they delegate subordinates to handle them. If courts found personal involvement every time a supervisor forwarded a complaint to a subordinate, the requirement would lose all meaning.'. . For the same reason, Plaintiff's contention that the Wardens were informed of the alleged violation by Commissioner Schriro does not establish her personal involvement. . . Indeed, the letter attached to the Amended Complaint is signed by someone other than Commissioner Schriro, presumably someone working in the Office of the Commissioner. . . This makes the connection between the alleged constitutional violation and Commissioner Schriro even more attenuated. . . Plaintiff's claim against Commissioner Schriro in her individual capacity is therefore dismissed.")

Reid v. Nassau Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 13-CV-1192 SJF SIL, 2014 WL 4185195, *12 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 20, 2014) ("The allegations in the complaints, and particularly the amended complaint, at issue on this motion, are sufficient to state a plausible claim of supervisory liability on the part of Sheriff Sposato in his individual capacity. Specifically, the consolidated plaintiffs' allegations, inter alia, that Sheriff Sposato knew about the challenged conditions at the NCCC that violated their constitutional rights, but failed to act to remedy or correct those conditions, are sufficient at the pleadings stage to state a plausible Section 1983 claim against Sheriff Sposato in his individual capacity. Accordingly, the branches of the County defendants' motions seeking dismissal of the consolidated plaintiffs' Section 1983 claims against Sheriff Sposato in his individual capacity are denied. However, Reid has not alleged the direct participation of the Superintendent in any of the wrongdoing alleged in his complaint, nor any basis upon which to find the Superintendent liable in a supervisory capacity. Accordingly, the branch of the County defendants' motion seeking dismissal of Reid's Section 1983 claims against the Superintendent in his individual capacity is granted and Reid's Section 1983 claims against the Superintendent in his individual capacity are dismissed pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for failure to state a claim for relief.")

Lloyd v. City of New York, 43 F.Supp.3d 254, 266-68 (S.D.N.Y. 2014) ("Defendants contend that the categories in Colon are no longer viable after Iqbal. . . However, the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), did not completely eliminate the Colon rule. The claims in Iqbal involved, inter alia, denial of equal protection and discrimination—legal theories that require proof of discriminatory intent. In that context, the Supreme Court held that a supervisor's 'mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose' does not render the supervisor personally involved in violating the constitution. . . Rather, 'a plaintiff must [prove] that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. . As the Supreme Court explained, however, 'the factors necessary to establish a [constitutional] violation will vary with the constitutional provision at issue.'. . In this circuit, where discriminatory intent is not an element of a constitutional claim, Colon remains the standard for establishing personal involvement by supervisory officials under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . Here, Plaintiffs' free exercise claims do not require a showing of discriminatory intent, so personal involvement with respect to those claims is governed by Colon. However, because Plaintiffs' equal protection claims require a showing of discriminatory intent, Plaintiffs must allege that each supervisory defendant actively participated in the alleged constitutional violations, and a defendant's failure to act will not result in liability under Section 1983. Thus, the personal involvement analysis varies by claim. . . . The fact that Defendant Schriro forwarded Plaintiff Lloyd's letter of complaint to another official for handling means she cannot be held liable under § 1983. Courts have consistently held that, 'if an official receives a letter from an inmate and passes it on to a subordinate for response or investigation, the official will not be deemed personally involved with respect to the subject matter of the letter.'")

Archie v. Fischer, 9:12-CV-1050, 2014 WL 3670676, *9 (N.D.N.Y. July 23, 2014) ("The fact that Plaintiff may have written a letter does not automatically render the supervisory official responsible for any constitutional violation. . . Prison supervisors cannot be deemed personally involved based simply on a response to a complaint.")

Tretola v. D'Amico, 13-CV-5705 JS AKT, 2014 WL 2957523, *8 (E.D.N.Y. July 1, 2014) ("[T]he Second Circuit in Colon listed five ways that a plaintiff can establish liability—not just the two listed—including failure to remedy a wrong after being informed of the violation, grossly negligent supervision of subordinates who committed the wrongful acts, and deliberate indifference to the rights of inmates. . . However, the 'continuing vitality' of these additional methods has 'engendered conflict within our Circuit' due to the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal. Reynolds v. Barrett, 685 F.3d 193, 205 n. 14 (2d Cir.2012). This Court has concluded that only personal involvement and a custom or practice survive as viable bases for supervisory liability. See Butler v. Suffolk Cnty., 289 F.R.D. 80, 95 n. 8 (E.D.N.Y.2013). As to D'Amico and Dewar, the Complaint appears to allege two bases for supervisory liability: (1) that D'Amico and Dewar were aware of the constitutional violations but failed to take action, and (2) it was the policy, custom, and practice of D'Amico and Dewar to allow or ignore violations of the Second, Fourth, Fifth, and Fourteenth Amendments. . . Neither theory saves them from the State Defendants' motion to dismiss. First, as previously stated, failure to remedy a wrong after being informed of the violation has been rejected by this Court as a viable theory after Iqbal. . . Second, Plaintiffs' allegations of a policy or custom on the part of D'Amico and Dewar are conclusory at best. The Complaint recites boilerplate language regarding a policy or custom, but provides no factual allegations in support.")

Griffin v. Doyle, 12-CV-4359 JS GRB, 2014 WL 2945676, *6 n.5 (E.D.N.Y. June 30, 2014) ("A supervisory official can nonetheless be held liable if he 'participated directly in the alleged constitutional violation [or] ... created a policy or custom under which [the] unconstitutional practices occurred, or allowed the continuance of such a policy or custom.'. . This Court has concluded that only personal involvement and a custom or practice survive as viable bases for supervisory liability. See Butler v. Suffolk Cnty., 289 F.R.D. 80, 95 n. 8 (E.D.N.Y.2013). Accordingly, awareness and/or negligence are not enough.")

Ciaprazi v. Jacobson, No. 13 Civ. 4813(PAC)(KNF), 2014 WL 2751023, *12, *13 (S.D.N.Y. June 17, 2014) (R & R) ("The Second Circuit has not yet addressed what, if anything, remains of the five ways of showing personal involvement of supervisory defendants after Iqbal . . . . However, absent Second Circuit authority to the contrary, the Court finds that Iqbal did not abrogate the five forms of evidence showing personal involvement, as articulated in Colon. . . .Ciaprazi alleges that Fischer and Dr. D'Silva 'maintain and enforce a policy or custom of denying root canal or any other restorative treatment to all posterior teeth, and of providing instead as "treatment" only extraction for all posterior teeth that may otherwise be restored and saved through root canal.' He was advised by more than one dentist that 'the DOCCS Central Office generated this policy or custom in order to save time, effort and money because root canal and other similar restorative procedures are more time-consuming, labor-intensive and expensive than extractions,' and '[t]he prison dentists are also apparently not compensated by the DOCCS for root canal or other restorative treatment performed on "posterior" teeth.' Ciaprazi's plausible allegations of the deliberate indifference to his dental needs, specifically his posterior teeth, illustrate and support his allegations that the defendants maintain and enforce the policy or custom of 'refusing to provide readily available treatment to save' posterior teeth. Moreover, Fischer and Dr. D'Silva are aware of the policy because Ciaprazi complained about it in his letters to them. However, Fischer and Dr. D'Silva failed to act and continued to maintain and enforce the policy, notwithstanding that DOCCS regulations do not prohibit restorative treatment of posterior teeth. Accordingly, Ciaprazi's allegations, that Fischer and Dr. D'Silva maintain and enforce the policy of refusing to provide restorative treatment to posterior teeth and that by doing so they deliberately disregard his constitutional rights, are sufficiently plausible at this stage of the litigation to indicate the personal involvement of Fischer and Dr. D'Silva.")

Yearney v. Sidorowicz, No. 13 Civ. 3604(CM, 2014 WL 2616801, *8, *9 (S.D.N.Y. June 10, 2014) ("The general rule is that 'an allegation that an official ignored a prisoner's letter of protest and request for an investigation of allegations made therein is insufficient to hold that official liable for the alleged violations.'. .Even if there had been a constitutional violation here, the mere receipt of letters from an inmate is insufficient to show the requisite personal involvement for a § 1983 claim. . . The fact that Dr. Koenigsmann asked a subordinate to respond to Plaintiffs letters does not constitute personal involvement for purposes of § 1983 liability. . .Moreover, the fact that Dr. Koenigsmann's subordinate, writing on his behalf, affirmed the course of treatment offered by the doctors at Sullivan rather than intervening and appeasing Plaintiff's demand for an MRI, is also insufficient to establish Dr. Koenigmsann's personal involvement or 'to shed any light on the critical issue of supervisory liability, and more particularly, knowledge on the part of the defendant.'")

Cruz v. New York, 24 F.Supp.3d 299, 308-09 (W.D.N.Y. 2014) ("Plaintiff alleges that Defendant Fischer 'was provided on a daily basis with reports of applications of force, allegations of excessive use of force and other breaches of security in the Department facilities.'. . He also alleges that Defendants Fischer, Griffin, and Sheahan 'knew and/or should have known that the pattern of physical abuse described above existed in the State prisons prior to and including the time of the assault of plaintiff.'. . Specifically, he alleges these Defendants' awareness through 'DOC's elaborate reporting system,' as well as through '[c]omplaints to the Commissioner, [g]rievances and the Inspector General, and [d]epartment reports.'. . Plaintiff alleges that the Supervisory Defendants had knowledge of 'the failure of the Department to place surveillance cameras on [g]alleries that house the Special Housing Unit,'. . . and that the Special Housing Unit's lack of cameras for security reasons resulted in serious injuries to inmates housed there. . . . Plaintiff also alleges that Defendants' tolerance of abuse by correction officers 'constituted a municipal policy, practice or custom;' that Defendants' conduct was a 'substantial factor' in the continuation of violence by correction officers; and that the Supervisory Defendants permitted, tolerated, and sanctioned the 'persistent and widespread policy' of abuse. . .Plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to support deliberate indifference on the part of the Supervisory Defendants. As explained above, the Supervisory Defendants 'are alleged to have received extensive information concerning the ... pattern of incidents involving ... violence and the failure of DOC to prohibit staff from continuing such conduct, and have failed to take any steps to curb those unconstitutional abuses.'. . Additionally, Plaintiff has alleged a particular policy as having caused the alleged assault; specifically, the failure of the Supervisory Defendants to place security cameras in the Special Housing Unit in order to deter correction officers from inflicting abuse on inmates. . .With regard to the Supervisory Defendants' knowledge of the alleged abuse by correction officers, Plaintiff's complaint contains an entire section ("New York State Prisons: A History of Abuse"), in which he details how the Supervisory Defendants have knowledge of specific abuses occurring within the Special Housing Unit. . . Accordingly, Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's second cause of action for failure to allege deliberate indifference against Defendants Fischer, Griffin, and Sheahan, is denied. . . . Defendants further argue that Plaintiff has failed to allege the personal involvement necessary to state an Eighth Amendment violation by prison officials. . . Specifically, Defendants argue that the Supervisory Defendants were not personally involved in the events that occurred on September 17, 2011. . . As explained in Section IV(A) of this Decision and Order, supra, Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged facts demonstrating personal involvement by the supervisory Defendants under category (5) of the Colon categories. To the extent that Defendants argue that Ashcroft v. Iqbal limits the application of the Colon categories so that only the first and third categories under Colon apply, as explained in Section IV(A), supra, Plaintiff also has alleged sufficient facts that the Supervisory Defendants created a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred, or allowed the continuance of such a policy or custom. Accordingly, Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment claims against the Supervisory Defendants for failure to allege facts supporting personal involvement is denied.")

Ferrer v. Fischer, No. 9:13–CV–0031 (NAM/ATB), 2014 WL 1763383, *2, *3 (N.D.N.Y. May 1, 2014) ("Courts in this circuit have frequently held that the mere receipt of letters from an inmate is insufficient to constitute personal involvement. . . However, the Second Circuit has recently cautioned courts against dismissing claims at the 12(b)(6) stage where the complaint contains allegations that an official failed to respond to a letter of complaint. See Grullon v. City of New Haven, 720 F.3d 133, 141 (2d Cir.2013) ("At the pleading state, even if [plaintiff] had no knowledge or information as to what became of his Letter after he sent it, he would be entitled to have the court draw the reasonable inference-if his amended complaint contained factual allegations indicating that the Letter was sent to the Warden at an appropriate address and by appropriate means-that the [defendant] in fact received the Letter, read it, and thereby became aware of the alleged conditions of which [plaintiff] complained."); see also Toliver v. City of New York, 530 F. App'x 90, 93 (2d Cir.2013) (describing Grullon by stating that 'pro se allegations that a prisoner sent a letter to a warden complaining of unconstitutional conditions that were not remedied are sufficient to state a claim for deliberate indifference against the warden'). . .Plaintiff's allegations regarding Commissioner Fischer are limited, but he does allege that he sent multiple letters to defendant Fischer, that defendant Fischer was fully aware of his situation, and that defendant Fischer failed to respond to the letters or otherwise take appropriate action. Defendant Fischer may be able to adduce sufficient evidence through discovery to demonstrate that he was not personally involved in the violations at issue. . . However, in light of the Second Circuit's recent decision in Grullon, I find that at this stage, plaintiff's allegations are sufficient to support defendant Fischer's personal involvement.")

Bessette v. Pallito, No. 1:13–cv–252–jgm–jmc, 2014 WL 1744265, *8 (D. Vt. Apr. 30, 2014) (adopting R&R) ("As to Commissioner Pallito, the only potentially applicable Colon categories are the second and fifth. However, Commissioner Pallito's failure to act on the July 26, 2013 appeal or to 'remedy the wrong' alleged in that appeal is insufficient.'"[A] supervisory official having received (and ignored) a letter from an inmate alleging unconstitutional conduct does not, without more, give rise to personal involvement on the part of that official.' Thompson, 949 F.Supp.2d at 575. 'The reason for this rule appears to be the fact that high-level DOCS officials delegate the task of reading and responding to inmate mail to subordinates, and, thus, a letter sent to such an official often does not constitute actual notice.' Id. (quoting Voorhees v. Goord, No. 05 Civ. 1407(KMW)(HBP), 2006 WL 1888638, at *5 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 24, 2006)).")

Rucano v. Koenigsmann, No. 9:12–cv–00035 (MAD/RFT), 2014 WL 1292281, *11, *12 (N.D.N.Y. Mar. 31, 2014) (adopting R & R) ("Plaintiff alleges that he wrote Defendant Koenigsmann three letters describing the inadequacies of his dental care. Defendant Koenigsmann referred two of those letters to Defendant Grinbergs, who replied to Plaintiff on behalf of Defendant Koenigsmann on May 17 and June 27, 2011. . . Defendant Koenigsmann did not respond to Plaintiff's third letter, dated September 9, 2011, in which Plaintiff alleged that Defendant Kullman and Oliveira refused to provide him with crowns pursuant to an unconstitutional DOCCS' Policy. . . It was once well accepted that neither ignoring an inmate's letter nor referring his letters to a subordinate constituted personal involvement on behalf of a supervisory official. [collecting cases] However, in light of the Second Circuit's recent decision in Grullon v. City of New Haven, it would appear that plaintiffs within the Second Circuit are 'entitled to have the court draw the reasonable inference ... that the [official] in fact received the Letter, read it, and became aware of the alleged conditions of which [the inmate] complained.'. .As to the first two letters, it is clear that Defendant Koenigsmann acted upon those letters by referring them to his subordinate. . . However, affording Plaintiff the benefit of this inference, it is possible that Plaintiff's third letter to Defendant Koenigsmann put him on notice of a continuing violation of Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment rights, and he failed to take any action to remedy the wrong. . . Therefore, we recommend that Defendants' Motion be DENIED as to Defendant Koenigsmann.")

Young v. Choinski, 15 F.Supp.3d 172, 188-89, 191-93 (D. Conn. 2014) ("Cases in this District have repeatedly acknowledged this split over Iqbal in addressing the Colon factors, but have abstained from determining 'whether Iqbal applies in all cases or just those involving discriminatory intent.'[collecting cases] Although the Second Circuit has not addressed the issue directly, it has suggested that at least some of the Colon factors remain viable. . . . Although Iqbal does arguably cast doubt on the viability of certain categories of supervisory liability, where the Second Circuit has not revisited the criteria for supervisory liability, this Court will continue to recognize and apply the Colon factors. . . .The fact that a prisoner sent a letter or written request to a supervisory official does not establish the requisite personal involvement of the supervisory official. . . . The district courts within this Circuit 'are divided regarding whether review and denial of a grievance constitutes personal involvement in the underlying alleged unconstitutional act.'. . For example, with respect to 'personal involvement,' a number of courts have drawn a distinction between 'a pro forma denial of a grievance and a "detailed and specific" response to a grievance's allegations.'. . Put simply, denial of a grievance alone may be insufficient to establish the 'personal involvement' of a supervisory official. . . Similarly, courts have held that a supervisory official's act of affirming the denial of a grievance on appeal does not constitute personal involvement. . .On the other hand, when a supervisory prison official receives a particular grievance, personally reviews it, and responds and/or takes action in response, such conduct may constitute sufficient 'personal involvement' to establish individual liability for the alleged constitutional violation. [collecting cases] Another factor district courts in this Circuit have examined is the nature of the alleged constitutional violation to determine whether it was 'ongoing' or discrete in nature, and thus whether it could be remedied by the supervisor. . . Following such reasoning, if the supervisory official is confronted with an 'ongoing' constitutional violation and reviews a grievance or appeal regarding that violation, that official is 'personally involved' if he or she can remedy the violation directly. In contrast, '[i]f the official is confronted with a violation that has already occurred and is not ongoing, then the official will not be found personally responsible for failing to remedy a violation.'. . In the case at bar, Warden McGill directly reviewed two grievances from Young, asserting complaints about the failure of Officers Hartley and Williams to respond to and arrange for treatment of Young's mental health needs on September 3, 2008. McGill denied those grievances after reviewing the incident and concluding that 'all staff involved [had] handled [the incident] in an appropriate manner in accordance with [DOC] directive.'. . Pursuant to the common law of this Circuit, mere denial of a grievance may be insufficient to establish the 'personal involvement' of a supervisory official. . . Nonetheless, if McGill failed to respond adequately upon receiving notice of a violation that could be remedied, . . . such as an 'ongoing' violation, . . . he may be held liable. In the absence of an ongoing violation—one that is capable of mitigation—McGill cannot be held personally liable. . . .In the case in suit, the grievances Young submitted to McGill solely included complaints about misconduct that had already occurred and concluded, as opposed to 'ongoing' violations. Therefore, with respect to plaintiff's allegations regarding his treatment by Williams and Hartley, that conduct could no longer be effectively remedied. Accordingly, Young has failed to allege McGill's 'personal involvement' in the alleged deliberate indifference to Young's serious mental health needs on September 3, 2008. The motion for summary judgment will be granted as to claims of deliberate indifference to mental health needs against defendant McGill in his individual capacity.")

Hollins v. City of New York, No. 10 Civ. 1650(LGS), 2014 WL 836950, *13, *14 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 3, 2014) ("In 2009, the Supreme Court in Ashcroft v. Iqbal squarely addressed supervisory liability claims, and held that "Government officials may not be held liable for the unconstitutional conduct of their subordinates under a theory of respondeat superior." . . It is unclear—and the Second Circuit has not explicitly ruled on—what remains of Colon in the wake of Iqbal. . . The district courts of the Second Circuit disagree about what remains of Colon after Iqbal.[collecting cases] This Court agrees with Bellamy v. Mount Vernon Hosp., which held that 'Only the first and part of the third Colon categories pass Iqbal's muster.'. . After Iqbal, a supervisor can be liable only 'if that supervisor participates directly in the alleged constitutional violation or if that supervisor creates a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred.'. . Only the first and third prongs of Colon require active involvement of a supervisor.")

King v. McIntyer, No. 9:11–CV–1457, 2014 WL 689028, *8-*10 (N.D.N.Y. Feb. 20, 2014) (adopting R&R) ("Defendants assert that Defendant Fischer lacked personal involvement in the alleged constitutional deprivations. In support of this assertion, Defendants rely on two arguments. First, Defendants submit that liability against a supervisory official for an alleged constitutional violation cannot be based on the doctrine of respondeat superior, citing Blyden v. Mancusi, 186 F.3d 252, 264 (2d Cir.1999). . . Second, Defendants argue, 'just because a prisoner writes to supervisory officials about instances of alleged mistreatment does not, alone, justify holding those supervisory officials liable under Section 1983,' citing Liner v. Goord, 310 F.Supp.2d. 550, 555

(W.D.N.Y.2004). Id. Defendants are correct as to their first argument concerning respondeat superior. However, Defendants' argument concerning the effect that a prisoner writing to a supervisor has on that supervisor's personal involvement is abrogated by Grullon v. City of New Haven, 720 F.3d 133 (2d Cir.2013). District courts in this circuit have routinely held that a prisoner's allegation that a supervisory official failed to respond to a grievance is insufficient to establish that the official 'failed to remedy that violation after learning of it through a report or appeal' or 'exhibited deliberate indifference ... by failing to act on information indicating that the violation was occurring.'. . Similarly, district courts have held that 'an allegation that an official ignored a prisoner's letter of protest and request for investigation of allegations made therein is insufficient to hold that official liable for the alleged violations.'. . However, the Second Circuit has recently cautioned courts against dismissing claims at the 12(b)(6) stage for failure to allege personal involvement where the plaintiff alleges that an official failed to respond to a letter of complaint. . .Here, like the procedural posture in Grullon, Defendants challenge, inter alia, Plaintiff's claim of personal involvement as to Defendant Fischer in a motion to dismiss. . . Thus, based on the holding in Grullon, Plaintiff is entitled to have the Court draw the reasonable inference from Plainitiff's pleadings that Defendant Fischer in fact received the three letters of complaint that Plaintiff described in his operative complaint. Based on this inference, Plaintiff has alleged facts sufficient to support a finding of Defendant Fischer's personal involvement. Therefore, I recommend that the Court deny Defendants' motion to dismiss with respect to Plaintiff's individual capacity claim against Defendant Fischer. . . .Defendants assert that Defendant Miller lacked personal involvement in the alleged constitutional deprivations. In support of this assertion, Defendants point out that Plaintiff's allegations against Defendant Miller are that Defendant Miller affirmed two disciplinary hearing findings of guilt. . .District courts in the Second Circuit disagree about whether simply affirming an allegedly unconstitutional disciplinary decision constitutes personal involvement. Courts declining to find personal involvement conclude that there is no 'ongoing' violation for the supervisory official to 'remedy' in such a situation. . . Other district courts in this circuit have found personal involvement where a supervisory official affirms an allegedly constitutionally infirm hearing decision. . . . I agree with Magistrate Judge David E. Peebles that the cases finding personal involvement in such situations 'appear to be both better reasoned and more consistent with the Second Circuit's position regarding personal involvement.'. . Here, Plaintiff alleges that Defendant Miller affirmed two disciplinary findings of Plainitiff's guilt. . . Accordingly, under the reasoning articulated in Bennett, supra, Plaintiff's allegations that Defendant Miller affirmed two disciplinary findings are sufficient to support the finding that Defendant Miller was personally involved in the alleged constitutional deprivations. Therefore, I recommend that the Court deny Defendants' motion to dismiss with respect to Plaintiff's individual capacity claim against Defendant Miller.")

Carpenter v. City of New York, 984 F.Supp.2d 255, 269 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) ("The analysis of the supervisory liability claims in this case turns on the underlying constitutional claims against the individual officer defendants. Because summary judgment is granted to the individual officer defendants on the false arrest claims, it is also granted to the supervisor defendants on these claims. As to the excessive force claims, however, plaintiffs have raised a genuine question of material fact as to the existence of a constitutional violation. The question then is whether plaintiffs have raised a genuine question of material fact as to the existence of supervisory liability. They have done so here, because the plaintiffs have submitted sufficient evidence to show that both Chief Esposito and Chief Hall either were present for or partook in the alleged constitutional violations. If the plaintiffs prevail in demonstrating that the arresting officers used excessive force, a jury could also conclude that Chief Esposito and Chief Hall are responsible for these constitutional violations in their supervisory capacity. Accordingly, the excessive force claims against the supervisor defendants survive summary judgment.")

Buffaloe v. Fein, No. 12 Civ. 9469(GBD)(AJP), 2013 WL 5815371, *7-*10 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 24, 2013) (R&R) ("Although the Second Circuit has not weighed in on what remains of Colon after Iqbal,. . . several decisions in this district have concluded that by specifically rejecting the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution,'. . . Iqbal effectively nullified several of the classifications of supervisory liability enunciated by the Second Circuit in Colon. . . While Colon permitted supervisory liability in situations where the supervisor knew of and acquiesced in a constitutional violation committed by a subordinate, these post- Iqbal district court decisions reason that *Iqbal'*s 'active conduct' standard imposes liability only where that supervisor directly participated in the alleged violation or had a hand in creating a policy or custom under which the unconstitutional practices occurred. These decisions may overstate *Iqbal'*s impact on supervisory liability. Iqbal involved allegations of intentional discrimination. . . Where the alleged constitutional violation involved 'invidious discrimination in contravention of the First and Fifth Amendments,' Iqbal held that 'plaintiff must plead and prove that the defendant acted with discriminatory purpose,' whether the defendant is a subordinate or a supervisor. . . It was with intent-based constitutional claims in mind, specifically racial discrimination, that the Supreme Court rejected the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.'. . Where the constitutional claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent, but instead relies on the unreasonable conduct or deliberate indifference standards of the Fourth, Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments, the personal involvement analysis set forth in Colon may still apply." [collecting cases in footnote])

Pinter v. City of New York, 976 F.Supp.2d 539, 571, 572 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) ("Pinter's opposition to summary judgment offers a conclusory paragraph stating that named defendants Sergeant Michael Madison, Deputy Chief Brian Conroy, Chief Anthony Izzo, Chief Joseph Esposito, and Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly bear supervisory liability-*without explaining how any of these individuals violated Pinter's rights through their own actions. . .As defendants accurately note in their reply brief, Pinter's conclusory paragraph does not show 'any constitutional violation on the part of the [individual supervisory] Defendants,' including Mayor Bloomberg. . .Nor does Pinter's Rule 56.1 Counter–Statement contain evidence that could support the liability of any of the supervisory defendants.")

De Ratafia v. County of Columbia, No. 1:13–CV–174 (NAM/RFT), 2013 WL 5423871, *8, *9 (N.D.N.Y. Sept. 26, 2013) ("This Court agrees with the analysis in Sash,. . . that '[i]t was with intent-based constitutional claims in mind, specifically racial discrimination, that the Supreme Court rejected the argument that a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.'. . Thus, as in the present case, where the claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent, the personal-involvement analysis set forth in Colon should still apply. . . Hence, the court refers to earlier Second Circuit precedent that applies the tests of deliberate indifference or gross negligence to assess supervisory liability. That analysis demands a showing of actual or constructive notice to the supervisory defendant of constitutional torts committed by their subordinates. . . . Nowhere in the nearly three hundred paragraphs of the complaint, do plaintiffs flush out the direct manner in which defendant Harrison allegedly violated their rights. Instead, plaintiffs assert that defendant Harrison 'failed to properly train and supervise' the officers involved in the incident at plaintiffs' home. However, 'the existence of a municipal policy or practice, such as a failure to train or supervise, cannot be grounded solely on the conclusory assertions of the plaintiff.'. . . Nowhere do plaintiffs provide any factual allegations to support their assertions that the Deputy Sheriffs' actions in this case were due to a failure by defendant Harrison to train properly his officers. Nor does the complaint identify in what way the Sheriff's Department training was insufficient, nor the manner in which there was a failure to train. Plaintiffs also assert that defendant Harrison 'knew or should have known that the Deputy Sheriffs eventually would be faced with the type of vague, indefinite report from an inebriate that Meleck gave' on October 16, 2011, and 'promulgated no standards for evaluation or supervisory review of the Deputy Sheriffs' response to such unreliable reports.' However, absent from the complaint are any facts establishing or suggesting the alleged basis for defendant Harrison's knowledge or awareness of the likelihood that his Deputies would respond in the manner they did herein to the complaint of a drunkard. It is apparent from review of the complaint that the claims as presently stated against defendant Harrison could only be supported pursuant to respondeat superior or vicarious liability doctrines, which do not support liability under § 1983.")

Malik v. Skelly, No. 09–CV–6283–FPG, 2013 WL 5372850, *2, *3 (W.D.N.Y. Sept. 24, 2013) ("In this case, Defendant argues that the second Colon factor namely that a supervisor, after being informed of the violation through a report or appeal, failed to remedy the wrong—was abrogated by Iqbal. Again, I disagree. In LaMagna v. Brown, 474 F. App'x 788, 790 (2d Cir.2012) (unpublished) the Second Circuit favorably cited Colon in determining that the dismissal of an amended complaint was warranted where, inter alia, there was 'no allegation that [defendant] "failed to remedy the wrong" once being informed of [plaintiff's] assault.' The Second Circuit has yet to overrule Colon, and unless and until that happens, Colon remains good law. The Complaint in this case sufficiently alleges facts that, if proven, could subject Napoli to potential liability under Colon. Amongst other things, the Complaint alleges that Napoli was aware that prison officials had assaulted Plaintiff, that Napoli 'reviewed video tapes depicting the abuses against plaintiff' (Complaint at ¶ 48), and then failed to intervene or otherwise prevent further abuses against Plaintiff. At the pleading stage, where the Court 'must accept as true all of the factual allegations contained in the complaint,' Twombly, 550 U.S. at 572, these allegations suffice to 'raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence' of the charged conduct, Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556, especially in light of the Supreme Court's admonition that 'a well-pleaded complaint may proceed even if it strikes a savvy judge that actual proof of those facts is improbable, and that a recovery is very remote and unlikely.'. . What discovery will or will not reveal, and what those revelations could equate to at the summary judgment stage is simply a different question for a different day.")

Barnes v. Ross, 926 F.Supp.2d 499, 509 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) ("Applying these principles here, Barnes' allegations are insufficient to state an equal protection claim against Fischer. Barnes alleges that Fischer was aware that inmates at Sullivan were not receiving adequate mental-health treatment. But Barnes does not plead any facts suggesting that Fischer was aware that minority inmates were treated differently than white inmates. And even if Fischer did have knowledge of invidious discrimination by his subordinates, 'purpose rather than knowledge is required' for Barnes' equal protection claim. . . There is no allegation in the complaint that Fischer participated directly in any discriminatory conduct, nor that he purposefully created or encouraged a discriminatory policy. The only other factual allegation concerning Fischer is that he responded to letters written on Barnes' behalf—a fact that, even if true, would not demonstrate his personal involvement. . . Indeed, the Second Circuit held in Sealey v. Giltner, 116 F.3d 47, 51 (2d Cir.1997), that a prisoner failed to establish the requisite personal involvement of the Commissioner at that time by writing him letters, even though the Commissioner referred the first letter to a subordinate for investigation and responded directly to the second letter. . .The Court concludes that Barnes' allegations that Fischer was aware of Barnes' treatment and that Fischer received and responded in some manner to letters written on Barnes' behalf are insufficient to plausibly allege that Fischer, Commissioner of DOCCS, had any personal involvement in Barnes' medical treatment at Sullivan that would be sufficient to state an equal protection claim.")

Houston v. Schriro, No. 11 Civ. 7374(HB), 2013 WL 4457375, *11, *12 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 20, 2013) ("Here, Plaintiff alleges that Brown, Harris, Agro, Halyard–Saunders, and Wolf all received grievances, requests for hearings, or appeals regarding his constitutional claims for deprivation of adequate dental and foot care as well as his deprivation of low-sodium meals in violation of the First Amendment and RLUIPA. . . Regarding the destruction of his medication, Plaintiff claims that Padmore, Harris, Johnson, Schriro, Halyard–Saunders, and Wolf received his complaints. . . Plaintiff also claims that Hall received his complaints about inadequate foot care. . . And Plaintiff claims that Schriro received his complaints about his meals. . . Thus, all of these defendants had notice of these claims, yet according to Plaintiff failed to act. And none of these claims require a showing of retaliatory or discriminatory intent. Accordingly, even in light of Iqbal, it is inappropriate to dismiss Plaintiff's claims against these defendants at this stage for lack of personal involvement. See Grullon, 2013 WL 3023464, at *5–*7 ("At the pleading stage, even if [Plaintiff] had no knowledge or information as to what became of his [grievance] after he sent it, he would be entitled to have the court draw the reasonable inference ... that the [supervisor] in fact received the [grievance], read it, and thereby became aware of the alleged conditions of which [Plaintiff] complained."). But the defendants to whom Plaintiff complained are not liable on claims requiring discriminatory or retaliatory intent where Plaintiff's sole allegation against them is that they failed to respond to his grievances. Thus, Plaintiff's surviving First Amendment retaliation claim as to the flooding of his cell is dismissed as to the above defendants. . . Similarly, Plaintiff fails to allege that any defendants, outside of Webb, Hall, Colon, and Agro, caused his strip searches in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Because his claims against the remaining defendants here also involve only their purported failure to respond to his grievances, I dismiss the strip search claims against the remaining defendants on this ground.")

Lee v. Graziano, No. 9:12–CV–1018 (FJS/CFH), 2013 WL 4426447, *6, *7 (N.D.N.Y. Aug. 15, 2013) ("In this case, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, Lee has alleged a plausible claim that Graziano was responsible for creating a blanket policy that precluded inmates with disabilities from receiving shower chairs or railings. As a superintendent, it was within Graziano's purview to direct staff, formulate policies for the effective operation of Greene Correctional, and ensure that corrections staff comply with such policies. . . .Further, liberally construing Lee's complaint, Correctional Officer John Doe # 1's alleged statement of, 'you don't get any special treatment here at Greene Correctional Facility,' creates a question of fact with respect to Greene Correctional's policy for providing shower accommodations to inmates with disabilities and how that policy was articulated to employees and enforced. This, along with the lack of evidence at this time showing any shower accommodations for inmates with disabilities, which bolsters Lee's liberally construed claims of an unconstitutional policy, leads to a recommendation denying Graziano's motion without prejudice, allowing Graziano an opportunity to raise these arguments at a point when it can be analyzed based upon a more fully developed record.")

Liner v. Fischer, No. 11 Civ. 6711(PAC)(JLC), 2013 WL 4405539, *16 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 7, 2013) ("This Court agrees with the majority view that 'even after the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal, these categories supporting personal liability of supervisors still apply as long as they are consistent with the requirements applicable to the particular constitutional provision alleged to have been violated.'[collecting cases]")

Smith v. Conway, No. 10–CV–00824A(F), 2013 WL 4046290, *10 (W.D.N.Y. Aug. 7, 2013) ("Although mere receipt of a letter is insufficient to establish the requisite personal involvement for § 1983 liability, personal involvement may be found where a supervisory official receives and acts on or undertakes an investigation of the inmate's complaint or grievance.")

Liner v. Fischer, No. 11 Civ. 6711(PAC)(JLC), 2013 WL 3168660, *7, *8 (S.D.N.Y. June 24, 2013) ("The law in this Circuit before Iqbal was that a plaintiff could state a claim against a supervisory defendant in a § 1983 case where the plaintiff alleged that the defendant: (1) participated directly in the alleged constitutional violation; (2) failed to remedy a wrong after learning of it; (3) created a policy or custom under which the violation occurred, or allowed such a policy or custom to continue; (4) was grossly negligent in supervising subordinates who committed the alleged violation; or (5) was deliberately indifferent to ongoing unconstitutional acts. Colon v. Coughlin, 58 F.3d 865, 873 (2d Cir.1995). The Second Circuit has not ruled as to Iqbal's impact on the factors set forth in Colon. . . Moreover, courts in this Circuit are divided as to how many of the Colon factors survive in the wake of Iqbal. [comparing cases] This Court agrees with the majority view that 'even after the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal, these categories supporting personal liability of supervisors still apply as long as they are consistent with the requirements applicable to the particular constitutional provision alleged to have been violated.'")

Paul v. Bailey, No. 09 Civ. 5784(RO), 2013 WL 2896990, *4, *5 (S.D.N.Y. June 13, 2013) ("Defendant is correct that supervisory officials cannot be held liable simply by virtue of their position of authority, but Plaintiff has alleged facts showing that Defendants had firsthand knowledge of Plaintiff's medical condition and need for alternative footwear, but ignored it. Simply because they are not physicians does not mean that Defendants are not responsible for ensuring that prisoners receive proper footwear or may ignore a doctor's orders. Accordingly, holding the pro se Plaintiff to a lower pleading standard, Plaintiff has alleged facts that create a plausible inference that Defendants Bailey and Batson demonstrated deliberate indifference to Plaintiff's medical condition. At a later stage in this litigation, it may become clear that Plaintiff cannot adequately support his claims. But at this stage, under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6), Plaintiff's factual allegations must be accepted as true unless it is clear that it would be impossible for Plaintiff to establish a legally cognizable claim.")

Randle v. Alexander, 960 F.Supp.2d 457, 466, 478, 479 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) ("Defendants Tracy Alexander and Robert Ercole were, respectively, a sergeant at and the Superintendent of Green Haven while Randle was incarcerated there. . . . Randle has alleged sufficient facts to give rise to a plausible inference that Alexander, but not Ercole, was personally involved in the purported constitutional violations. With respect to Alexander, the Complaint alleges that he participated directly in the conduct by filing a false report to his supervisors in order to 'cover up the [Guard Defendants'] actions.'. . Defendants assert in their Reply that a false report does not rise to the level of a constitutional violation . . . but the case they cite is inapposite. In Boddie v. Schnieder, 105 F.3d 857 (2d Cir.1997), the Second Circuit held that 'a prison inmate has no general constitutional right to be free from being falsely accused in a misbehavior report.'. . Here, however, Randle does not allege simply that Alexander stated he misbehaved when he had not, or even that Alexander retaliated against him by filing a false report, . . . but rather, that Alexander played a direct role in covering up an illegal forced fight within the prison. With respect to Ercole, Randle makes a number of allegations suggesting that the Guard Defendants' behavior was a direct result of supervisory gross negligence that harbored an environment in which this type of forced fight was condoned. . . However, these allegations constitute nothing more than recitations of the applicable standard without supporting factual context. For example, Randle alleges that Ercole, in his role as superintendent, 'failed to train and/or supervise Sergeant Alexander and [the Guard Defendants] in how to properly transport inmates throughout the facility, how to deal with inmate altercations within the facility, the appropriate level of interaction the officers should have with the inmate population, and failed to supervise the officer's interactions with the Green Haven population.'. . And while the characteristics of the alleged forced fights—namely that many guards participated, they took place in an organized manner, and occurred in a particular area of the Green Haven facility—suggest that the Guard Defendants' alleged antics may have been well known among certain subsets of guards at Green Haven, given the alleged cover-up of the incident between Johnson and Randle, it seems implausible that someone in Superintendant Ercole's position would have been aware of the forced-fight practice. Accordingly, on both a failure to train theory, and the theory that Ercole was grossly negligent in permitting the purported practice to continue on his watch, Randle's claims against Ercole fail to survive Defendants' motion to dismiss. And while it is true that Randle does allege that Ercole ignored inmate grievances and complaints—as discussed, such behavior is non-actionable in this context.")

Thompson v. Pallito, 949 F.Supp.2d 558, 574, 575 (D. Vt. May 29, 2013) ("There has been considerable debate and disagreement within this circuit as to how much of the Colon test remains viable after Iqbal. The Second Circuit has not yet definitively stepped into the breach. . . Some district courts within the Second Circuit have disallowed any § 1983 supervisory liability after Iqbal, effectively abrogating Colon. [collecting cases] Others have reaffirmed the continued vitality of all five Colon categories. [collecting cases] This latter approach seems to reflect the majority position. Here, because Thompson has not asserted intent-based claims—instead relying upon the 'deliberate indifference' standard of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments—and because no decision from the Second Circuit has explicitly overruled Colon, I follow the majority position within the district courts of this circuit and decline the DOC Defendants' invitation to eliminate all forms of supervisory liability under § 1983. Accordingly, I apply the categories of personal involvement as established by the Second Circuit in Colon.")

Byrne v. Trudell, No. 1:12–cv–245–jgm–jmc, 2013 WL 2237820, *7, *8 (D. Vt. May 21, 2013) ("Byrne also alleges that he sent Pallito a 'detailed letter seeking relief from the abuse' alleged in his case, and 'the response was that he upheld their ruling.'. . 'Numerous courts have held that merely writing a letter of complaint does not provide personal involvement necessary to maintain a § 1983 claim.'. . . Further, if a defendant refers or forwards such a letter to another staff member, personal involvement still cannot be shown. . . . 'If, however, the official does personally look into the matters raised in the letter, or otherwise acts on the prisoner's complaint or request, the official may be found to be personally involved.'. . .The precise contents of the alleged letter are unspecified, and it is unclear whether Pallito responded directly to it, referred the matter down the chain of command to a subordinate, or ignored it entirely. Byrne expressly claimed in his Complaint that 'he' affirmatively upheld the decision of those involved, perhaps a cryptic reference to Pallito's personal, direct response to the letter. In any event, giving Byrne the benefit of the doubt as to this ambiguity, I conclude that Byrne has sufficiently alleged Pallito's personal involvement in the claimed constitutional violations. . . In the language of Colon, Pallito was a supervisory official who, 'after being informed of the violation through a report or appeal, failed to remedy the wrong.'")

Powell v. Johnson, No. 3:11–CV–1304 (MAD/DEP, 2013 WL 2181268, *5 n.3 (N.D.N.Y. May 20, 2013) ("The issue of supervisory liability for a civil rights violation was addressed by the Supreme Court in Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662. The Second Circuit has yet to address the impact of Iqbal upon the categories of supervisory liability under Colon. Lower courts have struggled with this issue, and specifically whether Iqbal effectively calls into question certain prongs of the Colon five-part test for supervisory liability. . . While some courts have taken the position that only the first and third of the five Colon categories remain viable and can support a finding of supervisory liability [collecting cases], others disagree and conclude that whether any of the five categories apply in any particular case depends upon the particular violations alleged and the supervisor's participatory role [collecting cases].")

Wynder v. McMahon, No. 99 Civ. 772(ILG)(CLP), 2013 WL 1759968, *10 n.16 (E.D.N.Y. Apr. 24, 2013) ("In its prior Order, the Court cited the then-accepted standard for supervisory liability in a § 1983 action, where a plaintiff could establish liability through one of five ways under Colon v. Coughlin, 58 F.3d 865, 873 (2d Cir.1995). . . It then determined that the Complaint sufficiently alleged two of those five ways, direct participation in the violation and creating a policy under which the violation occurred. .. Since that Order was issued in 2008, the Supreme Court changed the standard for supervisory liability in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009). After Iqbal, courts in this circuit have not reached a consensus on the extent to which Iqbal altered the five Colon factors and the Second Circuit has not yet addressed the issue. See Reynolds v. Barrett, 685 F.3d 193, 205 n. 14 (2d Cir.2012). However, courts in this circuit have generally agreed that in § 1983 intentional discrimination cases, such as Mr. Wynder's race-based discrimination action, supervisory liability still may be established through those two ways."), aff'd, 565 F. App'x 11 (2d Cir. 2014).

Kucera v. Tkac, No. 5:12–cv–264, 2013 WL 1414441, *5 (D.Vt. Apr. 8, 2013) ("[B]ecause Plaintiff has not asserted intent-based discrimination claims, but instead relies on claims under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment, the court examines the Amended Complaint to determine whether Plaintiff has adequately pled supervisory liability against Officers Cutting and Roberts under any of the five Colon factors.")

Zappulla v. Fischer, No. 11 Civ. 6733(JMF), 2013 WL 1387033, *9, *10 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 5, 2013) ("Unless and until the Supreme Court or Second Circuit rule otherwise, this Court agrees with those courts that have held that Iqbal should not be read to invalidate the Colon categories altogether. The Iqbal Court specifically noted that '[t]he factors necessary to establish a [constitutional] violation will vary with the constitutional provision at issue.' . . 'It was with intent-based constitutional claims in mind, specifically racial discrimination, that the Supreme Court rejected [in Iqbal] the argument that "a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution."'. . Thus, where a plaintiff has alleged a claim that does not include a discriminatory intent element, such as a claim under the Eighth Amendment for denial of medical treatment, the Colon test should still apply to the extent that it is 'consistent with the particular constitutional provision alleged to have been violated.'. . More specifically, if a plaintiff alleges that a constitutional violation is ongoing, and that a defendant, after being informed of a violation through a report or appeal, failed to remedy the wrong, the plaintiff's claim against that defendant should not dismissed under Rule 12(b)(6). . . . That is the case here. The gravamen of Plaintiff's remaining claim is that Defendants violated his constitutional rights by depriving him of adequate medical care following surgery on his right elbow. Liberally construed, the Complaint further alleges that Defendant Lee, after being informed of that ongoing violation through the grievance process, failed to remedy that wrong. Those allegations fall squarely within the second Colon category and, in the circumstances of this case, are adequate to state a claim against Lee.")

Watson v. Wright, No. 08–CV–00960(A)(M), 2013 WL 1791079, *7 (W.D.N.Y. Mar. 26, 2013) (I agree 'with the apparent majority view that where, as here, the constitutional claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent, but instead relies on the unreasonable conduct or deliberate indifference standards of the Fourth, Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments, the personal involvement analysis set forth in Colon v. Coughlin may still apply.' Shepherd v. Powers, 2012 WL 4477241, *10 (S.D.N.Y.2012).")

Butler v. Suffolk County, No. 11–CV–2602(JS)(GRB), 2013 WL 1136547, *10 n.8 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 19, 2013) ("The Second Circuit in Colon actually listed five ways that a plaintiff can establish supervisory liability—not just the two described above—including failure to remedy a wrong after being informed of the violation, grossly negligent supervision of subordinates who committed the wrongful acts, and deliberate indifference to the rights of inmates. . . However, the 'continuing vitality' of these additional methods has 'engendered conflict within our Circuit' due to the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal. Reynolds v. Barrett, 685 F.3d 193, 206 (2d Cir.2012). In Iqbal, the Supreme Court rejected the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.'. . Although the Second Circuit has yet to determine the effects of Iqbal on the Colon-factors, the weight of authority among the district courts in the Eastern District of New York suggests that only two of the Colon-factors—direct participation and the creation of a policy or custom—survive Iqbal. [collecting cases] This Court agrees and, thus, will limit its discussion to only those two factors.")

Loccenitt v. City of New York, No. 12 Civ. 948(LTS)(MHD), 2013 WL 1091313, *5 & n.8 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 15, 2013) ("While the Supreme Court in Iqbal may have narrowed the viability of some of the Colon predicates for supervisory liability, the two predicates that are relevant here have been held by courts in this district to have survived Iqbal. . . Plaintiff states that Defendant Hilda J. Simmons 'is the highest ranking member of the D.O.C. [and] was informed of the religious violations and failed to remedy the issue' and that she 'is also responsible of [sic] the supervision, oversight and religious service management.'. . Plaintiff states that Commissioner Dora Schriro is liable because she is 'responsible for the policy, practice, supervision, implementation, and conduct' of all D.O.C. personnel and their compliance with the civil rights laws and 'is also responsible for supervisor liability for failure to remedy the situation after being informed of the [ ] complaint.'. . These two allegations satisfy the requirement for pleading supervisory liability since they support the inference that, as supervisors, these two Defendants created or permitted the continuance of the policy or custom under which the wrongs occurred and, after being informed of Plaintiff's alleged civil rights violations, failed to remedy ongoing wrongs. As for Defendants Kathleen Mulvey, Rose Argo, Deputy Warden A. Baily, Deputy Warden K. Williams, Captain L. Smith and Captain H. Medina, Plaintiff merely lists these Defendants as individuals who were 'made aware of the violations,' and 'failed ... to remedy the situation.'. . Plaintiff does not suggest that they were directly involved in the alleged violations, or in the creation of a policy or custom that permitted such alleged violations, or had any authority or ability to prevent the violations from occurring. Plaintiff's general allegations against these lower-level individual Defendants are not sufficient to demonstrate a basis for subjecting them to personal liability under Section 1983.")

Inesti v. Hogan, No. 11 Civ. 2596(PAC)(AJP)., 2013 WL 791540, *12 & n.23 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 5, 2013) (R & R) ("Although the Second Circuit has not weighed in on what remains of Colon after Iqbal, several decisions in this district have concluded that by specifically rejecting the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution,'. . . Iqbal effectively nullified several of the classifications of supervisory liability enunciated by the Second Circuit in Colon. . . While Colon permitted supervisory liability in situations where the supervisor knew of and acquiesced in a constitutional violation committed by a subordinate, these post-Iqbal district court decisions reason that Iqbal's 'active conduct' standard imposes liability only where that supervisor directly participated in the alleged violation or had a hand in creating a policy or custom under which the unconstitutional practices occurred. These decisions may overstate Iqbal's impact on supervisory liability. Iqbal involved allegations of intentional discrimination. . . Where the alleged constitutional violation involved 'invidious discrimination in contravention of the First and Fifth Amendments,' Iqbal held that 'plaintiff must plead and prove that the defendant acted with discriminatory purpose,' whether the defendant is a subordinate or a supervisor. . . It was with intent-based constitutional claims in mind, specifically racial discrimination, that the Supreme Court rejected the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.'. . Where the constitutional claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent, but instead relies on the unreasonable conduct or deliberate indifference standards of the Fourth, Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments, the personal involvement analysis set forth in Colon may still apply. [citing cases & Michael Avery et al., Police Misconduct: Law & Litigation § 4:5 (2009) (discussing the impact of Iqbal on supervisor liability in § 1983 and Bivens actions)]")

Aguilar v. Connecticut, No. 3:10–cv–1981 (VLB), 2013 WL 657648, *5, *6 (D. Conn. Feb. 22, 2013) ("In the present case, the Plaintiff essentially asks the Court to ignore the fact that the Plaintiff has not asserted, much less offered facts, of an underlying constitutional deprivation, He asks the court to focus on whether the Warden's conduct satisfies any of the five Colon factors; however, a supervisor can only be liable where his or her subordinate engaged in unconstitutional conduct. The Plaintiff has failed to identify Whidden's subordinate and has failed to offer facts as to the purported unconstitutional conduct in which that person engaged which resulted in the Plaintiff and his assailant being placed in the same cell. He has submitted no evidence of the identity or the conduct of the subordinate. Consequently, the Plaintiff has failed to establish that there was an underlying constitutional deprivation. This is particularly true in the context of a failure to protect claim under the Eighth Amendment, which the Supreme Court has made clear involves a subjective inquiry and analysis. . . . In order to find an underlying violation of the Eighth Amendment in the present case, the Plaintiff would have had to identify the subordinate official who made the cell placement and further provide evidence as to the actual knowledge of risk by that subordinate official. Because the Plaintiff has failed to identify the subordinate official nevertheless demonstrate that this official was both aware of facts from which an inference of an excessive risk to inmate health or safety could be drawn and did draw that inference, the Court cannot determine whether the Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment rights were violated. As discussed above in the absence of a finding that there is an underlying constitutional violation, a supervisory official cannot be liable under § 1983. Therefore where there is no underlying constitutional deprivation by a subordinate, the claim against the supervisor should be dismissed. . . The Court then need not address whether Whidden's conduct satisfied any of the Colon factors as the Plaintiff has failed to demonstrate an underlying constitutional deprivation in the first instance.")

A'Gard v. Perez, 919 F.Supp.2d 394, 407 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) ("The Second Circuit Court of Appeals has not addressed the question directly, but it has indicated that at least some of the Colon factors other than direct participation remain viable. See Rolon v. Ward, 345 F. Appx 608, 611 (2d Cir.2009) ("A supervisory official personally participates in challenged conduct not only by direct participation, but by (1) failing to take corrective action; (2) creation of a policy or custom fostering the conduct; (3) grossly negligent supervision, or deliberate indifference to the rights of others."); see also Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 10809 (2d Cir.2010).")

Jean-Laurent v. Lane, No. 9:11–CV–186 (NAM/TWD), 2013 WL 600213, *15, *16 (N.D.N.Y. Jan. 24, 2013) ("Supervisory personnel may be held liable under § 1983 for 'fail[ure] to remedy a violation after learning of it through a report or appeal.' Colon, 58 F.3d at 873. However, mere receipt of a report or complaint or request for an investigation by a prison official is insufficient to hold the official liable for the alleged constitutional violations. . . . 'On the other hand, where a supervisory official receives and acts on a prisoner's grievance (or substantively reviews and responds to some other form of inmate complaint), personal involvement will be found under the second Colon prong: the defendant, after being informed of the violation through a report or appeal, failed to remedy the wrong.'. . . Allegations of awareness on the part of a correctional facility superintendent of an ongoing failure by prison officials to provide a plaintiff with medical treatment for injuries, coupled with failure to remedy the wrong after learning of it through a grievance procedure have been found to be sufficient to survive a Rule 12(b) (6) motion. . . However, the naked assertion in Plaintiff's Complaint that he complained to Defendants Barkley, Hulihan, and Lindquist that he was being deprived of reasonable and adequate dental care, and that his complaints were found unsubstantiated is simply too lacking in factual detail to show that Plaintiff is entitled to relief. . . Plaintiff's Complaint contains absolutely no factual enhancement regarding the manner in which complaints were conveyed to each of the defendants, the content of the complaints, the timing of the complaints, or the responses of each of those Defendants to those complaints. Therefore, I recommend that Defendants Barkley, Hulihan, and Lindquist's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment medical indifference claim against them be granted and that Plaintiff be granted leave to amend.")

Firestone v. Berrios, 42 F.Supp.3d 403, 416-18 (E.D.N.Y. 2013) ("[T]he Plaintiff contends that the Amended Complaint plainly alleges that Dr. Kendall's decisions and actions (or lack thereof) caused the violation of Firestone's constitutional rights. . . She asserts that under the Colon prongs, unfortunately embracing this now abrogated standard, her allegations against Dr. Kendall easily satisfy prongs (2), (4) and (5). However, as set forth above, only the first and part of third Colon categories appears to pass Iqbal's muster, especially in the case of intent-based constitutional claims, which is what the Court faces here. Indeed, the cases that the Plaintiff cites in support of her arguments as to Dr. Kendall's personal involvement all pre-date Iqbal. Therefore, the Court looks to the factual allegations contained in the Amended Complaint to ascertain whether the Plaintiff has stated a claim for supervisory liability under Section 1983 post-Iqbal. The baseline inquiry is what precisely the constitutional violation is that the Plaintiff is alleging. Certainly, the sexual harassment by Berrios is alleged to constitute disparate treatment based on gender in violation of the Equal Protection Clause. . . With regard to Dr. Kendall, the Plaintiff alleges that she had actual knowledge or should have known of the repeated sexual harassment of the Plaintiff by Berrios; that she failed to take timely corrective or remedial action, thereby acquiescing in the severe and pervasive sexual harassment; and that because Dr. Kendall knew of the harassment that the Plaintiff was subjected to and knew of prior improper sexual conduct by Berrios to other female staff members, this constitutes deliberate indifference to the Plaintiff's constitutional rights. The Plaintiff references the sexual harassment policy that her supervisor, Dr. Kendall, allegedly ignored and maintains that this would have prevented constitutional violations. In addition, she offers details regarding how and why Dr. Kendall should have or did know about the alleged violations. However, despite the Plaintiff's attempts to tie Dr. Kendall's actions or inactions into the sexual harassment, at its core the Plaintiff's claim for supervisory liability is one for failure to remedy a wrong after it has been reported. This is undoubtedly insufficient in the aftermath of Iqbal. . . . Thus, the Plaintiff has not sufficiently alleged direct personal involvement. The Supreme Court has plainly rejected the essence of the Plaintiff's allegations against this particular defendant, which is that a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution. If the Plaintiff can allege that Dr. Kendall was directly involved in the constitutional violation or was responsible for the policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occur, then a claim for damages under Section 1983 may lie. . . However, even when viewing the Amended Complaint in the best light for the Plaintiff, the Court cannot discern these contentions from the relevant pleading. Therefore, the Section 1983 claim against the Defendant Dr. Kendall is dismissed without prejudice.")

Smolen v. Fischer, No. 12 Civ. 1856(PAC)(AJP), 2012 WL 5928282, *5, *6 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 27, 2012) ("Although the Second Circuit has not weighed in on what remains of Colon after Iqbal, several decisions in this district have concluded that by specifically rejecting the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution,'. . . Iqbal effectively nullified several of the classifications of supervisory liability enunciated by the Second Circuit in Colon. . . While Colon permitted supervisory liability in situations where the supervisor knew of and acquiesced in a constitutional violation committed by a subordinate, these post-Iqbal district court decisions reason that Iqbal's 'active conduct' standard imposes liability only where that supervisor directly participated in the alleged violation or had a hand in creating a policy or custom under which the unconstitutional practices occurred. These decisions may overstate Iqbal's impact on supervisory liability. Iqbal involved allegations of intentional discrimination. . . Where the alleged constitutional violation involved 'invidious discrimination in contravention of the First and Fifth Amendments,' Iqbal held that 'plaintiff must plead and prove that the defendant acted with discriminatory purpose,' whether the defendant is a subordinate or a supervisor. . . It was with intent-based constitutional claims in mind, specifically racial discrimination, that the Supreme Court rejected the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.'. . Where the constitutional claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent, but instead relies on the unreasonable conduct or deliberate indifference standards of the Fourth, Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments, the personal involvement analysis set forth in Colon may still apply.[citing cases and Michael Avery et al., Police Misconduct: Law & Litigation § 4:5 (2009)]")

Johnson v. Pallito, No. 2:12–CV–138, 2012 WL 6093804, *5-*7 (D. Vt. Nov. 26, 2012) (R & R adopted by 2012 WL 6093801 (D. Vt. Dec 7, 2012) ("As noted earlier, this circuit's standard for supervisory liability in a § 1983 action is governed by the principles set forth in Colon. . . The Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal v. Ashcroft potentially altered this standard when the majority rejected the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.'. . Many courts in this circuit post-Iqbal have struggled to determine how much of the Colon standard remains intact. . . Some courts interpret the decision in Iqbal to considerably limit the Colon standard [citing cases], while others caution against such an interpretation [citing cases]. The latter cases focus on Iqbal's reliance upon the 'constitutional provision at issue' because '[i]t was with intent-based constitutional claims in mind, specifically racial discrimination, that the Supreme Court rejected the argument that a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.'. . Put differently, Iqbal instructs the court to (1) look at the elements of the claim at issue and (2) determine whether the claim requires a showing of discriminatory intent. If the claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent then the Colon analysis may still apply. Conversely, if the claim does require discriminatory intent as an element then an Iqbal-limited standard may apply. . . The Court should reach an analogous conclusion here. Construing the allegations most favorably to Plaintiff, I conclude that he has failed to allege sufficient personal involvement with respect to his equal protection and due process claims. Both these claims—similar to those brought in Iqbal—require discriminatory intent as an essential element. See Giano v. Senkowksi, 54 F.3d 1050, 1057 (2d Cir.1995) (holding that an equal protection claim requires 'purposeful discrimination'); see also Jabbar v. Fischer, 683 F.3d 54, 57 (2d Cir.2012) (explaining a due process claim requires 'a deliberate decision to deprive [an inmate] of his life, liberty, or property'). Consequently, Defendant, as Commissioner of the Department of Corrections, cannot be held liable for failing to remedy a wrong on the basis that he was potentially informed of the violation through Plaintiff's grievance appeals. On the other hand, Eighth Amendment violations do not require discriminatory intent as an element, . . . and, therefore, supervisors may still be found liable for failure to act after notification of wrongdoing through a grievance appeal, see Colon, 58 F.3d at 87.")

Barksdale v. Frenya, No. 9:10–CV–00831 (MAD/DEP), 2012 WL 4107805, *5, *6 (N.D.N.Y. Sept. 19, 2012) ("Within this circuit there is a severe division among the district courts as to whether mere review by a DOCCS official of an appeal from a disciplinary hearing, which an inmate claims to have been infected by due process violations, can lead to personal liability on the part of that individual. . . However, 'the Second Circuit has, on at least one occasion, allowed a due-process claim to proceed against an upper-level prison official based on the allegation that the official "affirmed [plaintiff's disciplinary] conviction on administrative appeal."'. . In Rodriguez v. Selsky, I followed those cases holding that a supervisory official's affirmance 'of a constitutionally defective disciplinary determination at a time when the inmate is still serving his or her disciplinary sentence, and the violation can therefore be abated, falls within the Colon factors articulated in the Second Circuit for informing the supervisory liability analysis.'. . In my view, those cases concluding that a plaintiff's allegations that a supervisory defendant reviewed and upheld an alleged constitutionally suspect disciplinary determination are enough to show his or her personal involvement in the alleged violation appear to be both better reasoned and more consonant with the Second Circuit's position regarding personal involvement. . .In this case the question of which line of supervisory personal liability cases should be followed is not outcome-determinative. The record reflects that plaintiff's appeal of his disciplinary sentence to the Commissioner's office was reviewed by Norman Bezio. There is no evidence of defendant Fischer's involvement in the review of that disciplinary determination. In the absence of such evidence, defendant Fischer is entitled to dismissal of plaintiff's claims against him.")

Ramos v. Lajoie, No. 3:11cv679(DJS), 2012 WL 4056727, *1-*3 (D. Conn. Sept. 13, 2012) ("For many years it was well settled in this circuit that there were five ways to demonstrate the personal involvement of a supervisory defendant: (1) the defendant directly participated in the alleged constitutional violation, (2) after he was informed of the violation through a report or appeal, the supervisory defendant failed to remedy the wrong, (3) the supervisory defendant created a policy or custom pursuant to which the constitutional violation occurred or permitted such a policy or custom to continue, (4) the defendant was grossly negligent in supervising the subordinates who committed the wrongful acts, or (5) the defendant was deliberately indifferent to the plaintiff's rights by failing to act on information that unconstitutional acts were occurring. Colon v. Coughlin, 58 F.3d 865, 873 (2d Cir.1995). In addition, the plaintiff must demonstrate an affirmative causal link between the supervisory official's failure to act and his injury. . .The decision in Iqbal caused many courts to question this issue. . . .Since Iqbal, some districts courts within this circuit have determined that not all five of Colon's categories of conduct that may give rise to supervisory liability remain viable. [citing cases] Other district courts restrict application of Iqbal to cases involving discriminatory intent. . . . . The Second Circuit has not yet addressed this issue. This Court need not determine whether Iqbal applies in all cases or just those involving discriminatory intent, because the allegations against the defendants Lajoie, Quiros and Butkiewicus are insufficient to survive dismissal even under the Colon standard. The plaintiff alleges that he did not tell defendants Lajoie, Quiros or Butkiewicus about the incident until after it was over. Thus, they were not personally involved in and were not aware of any facts that would have enabled them to prevent the incident. . . Defendants Lajoie, Quiros and Butkiewicus were notified of the incident through the institutional administrative remedy process. The receipt of a letter of complaint or an inmate grievance is insufficient to establish personal involvement of supervisory officials. . . In addition, the plaintiff has alleged no facts suggesting that the incident was other than an unauthorized act by defendant Trifone. Thus, none of the other Colon categories apply.")

Gabriel v. County of Herkimer, 889 F.Supp.2d 374, 402, 403 (N.D.N.Y. 2012) ("There is some debate as to whether all five Colon categories of supervisor liability remain available after the United States Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal. . . . Plaintiff's allegations against these policymaker defendants fit squarely within the third Colon category permitting liability based on a supervisor's creation of 'a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred, or allowed the continuance of such a policy or custom.' Colon, 58 F.3d at 873. Plaintiff claims that Sheriff Farber, Cpt. McGrail, and Lt. Coddington promulgated and allowed unconstitutional policies and customs to occur and continue, such as the medical officer policy and the under staffing of nurses at the jail. Sheriff Farber testified that he does not supervise the jail, and his day-to-day duties as County Sheriff do not involve the policies and procedures of the jail. According to him, Cpt. McGrail develops policies and procedures for the jail. Cpt. McGrail testified that he is responsible for the policies and procedures of the jail, and that Sheriff Farber reviews and signs off on those policies. He also testified that Sheriff Farber is responsible for the contract between the County and Little Falls Hospital. Further, as part of their role through that contract, N.P. Macri and Dr. Handy advise the County regarding jail medical policies and procedures. Then, after those policies are signed off on by Dr. Handy and Sheriff Farber, Cpt. McGrail and his staff implement them at the jail. Because there is testimony regarding both Sheriff Farber and Cpt. McGrail's involvement in promulgating and implementing the allegedly unconstitutional policies and practices at the jail, summary judgment is inappropriate and defendants' motion to dismiss Sheriff Farber and Cpt. McGrail will be denied.")

Solar v. Lennox, 2012 WL 3929936, *13 (N.D.N.Y. July 16, 2012) ("In Solar's deposition testimony, he contends that he personally told Rowe about various medical accommodation issues on at least six occasions, three of which related to missed meals that were not provided to Solar while he was medically restricted to eating in his cell. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Solar, such repeated, direct conversations regarding an alleged, repeating constitutional violation is sufficient to establish personal involvement. See Harnett v. Barr, 538 F.Supp.2d 511, 524 (N.D.N.Y.2008) (concluding that a distinction lies between a supervisory official that is 'confronted with an alleged violation that has ended or ... is ... a continuing violation,' as with the latter the supervisory officially is deemed 'personally involved if he is confronted with a situation that he can remedy directly.') (internal quotation marks and citations omitted).")

Smolen v. Fischer, No. 12 Civ. 1856(PAC)(AJP), 2012 WL 3609089, *7-*9 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 23, 2012) ("Although the Second Circuit has not weighed in on what remains of Colon after Iqbal, several decisions in this district have concluded that by specifically rejecting the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution,'. . . Iqbal effectively nullified several of the classifications of supervisory liability enunciated by the Second Circuit in Colon. . . . These decisions may overstate Iqbal's impact on supervisory liability. Iqbal involved allegations of intentional discrimination. . . Where the alleged constitutional violation involved 'invidious discrimination in contravention of the First and Fifth Amendments,' Iqbal held that 'plaintiff must plead and prove that the defendant acted with discriminatory purpose,' whether the defendant is a subordinate or a supervisor. . . It was with intent-based constitutional claims in mind, specifically racial discrimination, that the Supreme Court rejected the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.'. . Where the constitutional claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent, but instead relies on the unreasonable conduct or deliberate indifference standards of the Fourth, Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments, the personal involvement analysis set forth in Colon may still apply. [collecting cases and citing to Michael Avery et al., Police Misconduct: Law & Litigation § 4:5 (2009) (discussing the impact of Iqbal on supervisor liability in § 1983 and Bivens actions) in footnote] . . . . Since Smolen's claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent, but instead relies on the deliberate indifference standards of the Eighth Amendment, the Colon factors apply in determining defendants' personal involvement. . . Based on Smolen's allegations that Fischer and Perez had knowledge of 'the hazard of [the storm] windows' and lack of 'cell window knobs' from previous fires . . . , they could be found to be personally involved in the alleged violations under Colon's second factor (failure to remedy the wrong after being informed of the violation through a report or appeal) and fifth factor (exhibition of deliberate indifference to the rights of inmates by failing to act on information indicating that unconstitutional acts were occurring). . . Accordingly, assuming the truth of Smolen's factual allegations of personal involvement of Fischer and Perez, as the Court must in considering a motion to dismiss, Fischer and Perez's motion to dismiss Smolen's claims for lack of personal involvement should be DENIED.")

Malik v. City of New York, No. 11 Civ. 6062(PAC)(FM), 2012 WL 3345317, *15, *16 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 15, 2012) ("Malik alleges in conclusory terms that Superintendent Agro knew that he was provided with insufficient footwear. . . The only factual basis for this allegation, however, is that Malik wrote Superintendent Agro a letter regarding his grievances. . . Malik also has failed to allege that Superintendent Agro created or allowed the continuance of an unconstitutional policy or custom, or that she was grossly negligent in supervising subordinates who committed the allegedly wrongful acts. . . For these reasons, Malik's claims against Superintendant Agro must be dismissed.")

Beck v. Coats, No. 5:11–CV–420, 2012 WL 2990017, *4 (N.D.N.Y. July 19, 2012) ("Whether all five Colon bases for supervisor liability remain available in light of the United States Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 676–77, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1948–49 (2009), is subject to debate in this circuit. [collecting cases] Even if all five bases of supervisory liability survived Iqbal, plaintiff has failed to allege sufficient personal involvement on the part of defendant Morey. There is nothing in the complaint to suggest Morey was directly involved in the conduct that allegedly violated Beck's constitutional rights, knew that Beck's rights were being violated, created the ordinance at issue, or was grossly negligent in his supervision. Plaintiff alleges that it was Coats who asked him to remove his displays, sent him letters and notices, and signed the summons accusing him of violating section 316.7. There are no allegations implicating Morey in any of this conduct. In fact, plaintiff specifically notes: "I am charging Glenn Morey for he is Gary L. Coats [sic] supervisor." Compl. at 5. This is insufficient to hold Morey liable under § 1983, and he will therefore be dismissed from this action.")

Stresing v. Agostinoni, No. 11–CV–967S, 2012 WL 2405240, at *4, *5 (W.D.N.Y. June 25, 2012) ("Following Iqbal, there has been some division in the district courts of this Circuit over whether all five of the Colon factors are still applicable. . . Some courts have interpreted the Supreme Court's directive as imposing individual liability under § 1983 on a supervisor for only his or her affirmative actions, and precluding liability based on the failure to act. . . Other courts have determined that Iqbal allows for flexibility, in that 'the degree of personal involvement varies depending on the constitutional provision at issue,' and therefore 'the five Colon categories for personal liability of supervisors may still apply as long as they are consistent with the requirements applicable to the particular constitutional provision alleged to have been violated.'. . The Second Circuit has not yet explicitly recognized this split among the district courts. In a recent unpublished decision, however, the Court quoted *Iqbal'*s pleading requirement with respect to government officials, but nonetheless favorably cited Colon in determining that dismissal of the amended complaint was warranted where, inter alia, there was 'no allegation that the [defendant] "failed to remedy the wrong" once being informed of [the plaintiff's] assault.' LaMagna v. Brown, No. 11–488–pr, 2012 WL 1109696, *1–2 (2d Cir. Apr.4, 2012), quoting Colon, 58 F.3d at 873. .. Fountain v. City of New York, No. 10 Civ. 7538(BSJ)(KNF), 2012 WL 1372148, at *3, *4 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 18, 2012) ("The Second Circuit has yet to rule on the question of whether any or all of the Colon criteria survive the Supreme Court's ruling on Iqbal, and in the interim, courts in this district have been divided as to what forms of supervisory conduct can give rise to § 1983 liability. [citing cases] The Court finds that, with respect to Bailey, it need not reach the question of whether the five factors elucidated in Colon survive Iqbal as the Amended Complaint fails to allege any involvement whatsoever by this Defendant. The Amended Complaint's only reference to Bailey's involvement is to state that Bailey, amongst others, failed 'to take disciplinary or other action to curb the known pattern of physical abuse of inmates by defendants Dipierr, Coverington and other rogue correction officers ...' The Amended Complaint does not provide any further facts, however, to support its claim that Bailey knew about a 'pattern of physical abuse.' Nor does the Amended Complaint make any allegation that Bailey was aware of the alleged incident, or that he supervised any of the defendants who were personally involved. In light of these pleading deficiencies, the Court finds that the Amended Complaint fails to sufficiently state a claim under § 1983 against Bailey for the purposes of surviving a motion to dismiss. Turning next to Schriro, the Court finds that the Amended Complaint has sufficiently plead a cause of action pursuant to § 1983 against this defendant in order to survive a motion to dismiss. The Amended Complaint contains the allegation that: 'Plaintiff wrote a complaint to Dora Shiro (sic); Comm of Corr, explaining his version of the assault, requesting an investigation be done and disciplinary action be taken against the rogue correction employees, and I never received a response.'. . The Court finds that this allegation sufficiently pleads supervisory involvement on the part of Schriro under either the second or fifth factors of the Colon analysis, factors which this Court regards as relevant in its consideration of the allegations in the instant action. In reaching this determination, this Court joins courts in this district which have held that 'the five Colon categories for personal liability of supervisors may still apply as long as they are consistent with the requirements applicable to the particular constitutional provision alleged to have been violated.'")

Bouche v. City of Mount Vernon, No. 11 Civ. 5246(SAS), 2012 WL 987592, at *8 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 23, 2012) (" 'Accordingly only the first and third Colon factors have survived the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal.'" citing Bellamy)

Bertuglia v. City of New York, 839 F.Supp.2d 703, 720-23 (S.D.N.Y. 2012) ("[C]ourts in this Circuit are divided over the question of how many of the so-called Colon factors survive in the wake of Iqbal. [citing cases] Our Court of Appeals has not addressed the question directly yet, but it has indicated that at least some of the Colon factors other than direct participation remain viable. See Rolon v. Ward, 345 F. App'x 608, 611 (2d Cir.2009) ("A supervisory official personally participates in challenged conduct not only by direct participation, but by (1) failing to take corrective action; (2) creation of a policy or custom fostering the conduct; (3) grossly negligent supervision, or deliberate indifference to the rights of others."); see also Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 10809 (2d Cir.2010). . . The plaintiffs allege, with regard to the PA supervisory defendants, that PA defendants Schaffler, Ferrone, and D'Aleo at all times acted 'at their direction' 'and/or with their express approval.'. . This conclusory, formulaic language, standing alone, is not entitled to the assumption of truth. . . The only other allegations against the supervisory defendants are that, after Van Etten, in his capacity as Inspector General, received a complaint by Bertuglia against the Port Authority relating to the Port Authority's bidding process, and in retaliation for that complaint, 'Van Etten, along with ... Nestor and ... Kennedy, as well as defendants [Shaffler] and Ferrone, decided to selectively investigate and prosecute [the plaintiffs], leading to this matter being referred to the New York County District Attorney's Office and ADA Ruzow.'. . Neither the Amended Complaint, nor any other documents relied on by it, contain further facts regarding the specifics of this decision or the manner in which the PA supervisory defendants acted to execute it, or the nature of the supervisory defendants supervision or knowledge of the primary PA defendants. The issue is whether those allegations can support the remaining § 1983 claims against the supervisory defendants under any theory of supervisory liability. The Court will address in turn the remaining § 1983 claims with reference to both the supervisory and primary PA defendants. . . .There are no specific allegations that the supervisory defendants themselves provided false information to the ADA defendants, or indeed that they knew that information provided by subordinates was false; that they created a policy or practice of providing such false information; that they were grossly negligent in supervising the primary PA defendants with regard to their providing the false information; or that they had the opportunity to stop what they knew was a false arrest and did not do so. . . Accordingly, the motion to dismiss the false arrest claim as against the supervisory PA defendants is granted.")

Hodge v. Sidorowicz, No. 10 Civ. 428(PAC)(MHD), 2012 WL 6778524, at *15, *16 & n. 15 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 20, 2011) ("Recently. . . the scope of what qualifies as 'personal involvement' by a supervisor has come into question by virtue of a 2009 decision in which the Supreme Court held, in a pleading context, that '[b]ecause vicarious liability is inapplicable to ... § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. . The Second Circuit has not yet addressed how Iqbal affects the five categories of conduct that give rise to supervisory liability under Colon. However, because Iqbal specifically rejected the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution,'. . .several decisions in this district have held that Iqbal has nullified most of the longstanding Colon factors. [citing Bellamy and Newton] These courts have concluded that '[o]nly the first and part of the third Colon categories pass Iqbal's muster,' and that '[t]he other Colon categories impose the exact types of supervisory liability that Iqbal eliminated,' because only the first and third categories sufficiently allege personal involvement to permit supervisory liability to be imposed after Iqbal. . . We disagree with this narrow interpretation of Iqbal, as have a number of other courts.[citing cases] We believe, as observed in Sash v. United States, 674 F.Supp.2d 531 (S.D.N.Y.2009), that '[i]t was with intent-based constitutional claims in mind, specifically racial discrimination, that the Supreme Court rejected the argument that a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.' . . Thus, as in the present case, where the claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent, the personal-involvement analysis set forth in Colon should still apply. . . Hence we look to earlier Second Circuit precedent that applies the tests of deliberate indifference or gross negligence to assess supervisory liability, a standard that demands a showing of actual or constructive notice by the supervisory defendant of constitutional torts committed by their subordinates. [citing Sash and Connick v. Thompson] . . . . Although Connick dealt solely with municipal liability under section 1983, we believe that its analysis is informative as to the scope of personal liability for supervisors and supports our conclusion that Colon remains viable. In the context of either municipal liability or supervisory liability, the Supreme Court has clearly stated that a defendant is only responsible for his own actions. . . Hence, if failure-to-train claims or the 'deliberate indifference' test for a supervisor's personal involvement in constitutional violations under § 1983 were no longer viable after Iqbal, we would expect that the same type of § 1983 claims would fail if asserted against a municipality. Yet in Connick, the Supreme Court applied the 'deliberate indifference' test to a failure-to-train claim. . . Connick ultimately rejected municipal liability on the grounds that the plaintiff had not proven the 'pattern of similar violations' establishing that the supervisory defendant had received adequate notice of the specific constitutional violation allegedly resulting from his failure to adequately train his subordinates, and thus failed to show a ' "policy of inaction" [that] [was] the functional equivalent of a decision by the city itself to violate the Constitution.'. . The Court did not, however, suggest that municipal liability was unavailable because it was premised on a failure-to-train claim, compare Newton, 640 F.Supp.2d at 448, or allegations of deliberate indifference, which would seem to fall within Colon's fifth category of personal involvement. Compare Bellamy, 2009 WL 1835939 at *6.")

For example, a claim of invidious discrimination, such as the racial discrimination claim present in Iqbal, requires a showing of discriminatory purpose. If, however, the claim relies on unreasonable conduct or the deliberate indifference standard, the factors set forth above may still apply. The Second Circuit has not yet addressed this issue. Until it does, this Court assumes that Iqbal's stricter standard applies only to intent-based constitutional claims.")

Rivera v. Lempke, 810 F.Supp.2d 572, 576 (W.D.N.Y. 2011) ("The Supreme Court has also made clear that, at least as to claims involving discriminatory or retaliatory intent, a claim premised on a supervisor's 'knowledge and acquiescence' in subordinates' wrongdoing is insufficiently stated. . . Thus, following Iqbal, courts in this circuit 'have held that a defendant cannot be held liable under section 1983 unless that defendant took an action that deprived the plaintiff of his or her constitutional rights.' Plair v. City of New York, __ F.Supp.2d __, 2011 WL 2150658, at *4 (S.D.N.Y.2011). Mere failure to correct, or acquiescence in, a lower-level employee's violation is not enough. . . . Applying these standards here, I conclude that the claims must be dismissed. As to Lempke and Guiney, who were at all relevant times the superintendent and deputy superintendent of Five Points, the complaint simply alleges, with no supporting factual allegations, that they directed Abate to write a false, retaliatory misbehavior report against plaintiff. Plaintiff also alleges that he wrote to Lempke about these matters and that Lempke failed to remedy the constitutional violation. As explained above, such allegations are insufficient to state a § 1983 claim.")

Plunkett v. City of New York, No. 10–CV–6778 (CM), 2011 WL 4000985, at *8, *9 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 2, 2011) ("The Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal,. . . did not completely eliminate the Colon rule, as the City contends. The claims in Iqbal involved, inter alia, denial of equal protection and discrimination– legal theories that require proof of discriminatory intent. In that context, the Supreme Court held that a supervisor's 'mere knowledge of his subordinates discriminatory purpose' does not amount to the supervisor's violating the constitution. . . . That holding does not change the law on supervisory liability, particularly where, as here, the underlying constitutional right of the inmate is to be free from the use of cruel and unusual punishment or excessive force. In such cases, the traditional Colon categories of supervisory liability still apply. . . Indeed, following Iqbal, numerous Second Circuit courts have routinely continued to cite all five of the Colon categories as the bases for establishing supervisory liability in cases alleging violations of a plaintiff's Fourth and Eighth Amendment rights. [collecting cases] The cases of [Bellamy and Newton] which Defendants cite, are not binding on this Court and overlook the specific role that discriminatory intent played in Iqbal. In fact, subsequent decisions have explicitly called Bellamy and Newton into doubt, noting that those rulings 'may overstate Iqbal's impact on supervisory liability' and holding that '[w]here the constitutional claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent, but instead relies on the unreasonable conduct or deliberate indifference standards of the Fourth and Eighth Amendments, the personal involvement analysis set forth in Colon v. Coughlin may still apply.'. . It is the opinion of this court that Colon remains the standard for establishing personal involvement by supervisory officials under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.") [collecting cases] Others have continued to apply the five Colon categories without limitation [collecting cases]. . . . This Court agrees with those courts that have concluded that Iqbal must be viewed in light of the fact that it was dealing with an intentional race discrimination claim, and that Iqbal was rejecting an argument that the supervisor's mere knowledge of the subordinate's intent is tantamount to proof that the supervisor himself committed a discriminatory act.") Aguilar v. Immigration and Customs Enforcement Div. of the U.S. Department of Homeland Sec., 811 F.Supp. 803, 806, 814-16, 817 n.5, 820 (S.D.N.Y. 2011) ("The plaintiffs, twenty-five individuals whose homes were searched by agents of the Immigration and Customs Enforcement Division of the Department of Homeland Security ('ICE') during eight operations between February and September of 2007, bring this putative class action against ICE; Michael Chertoff, the former Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security ('DHS'); Julie Myers, the former Assistant Secretary of ICE; John Torres, the former Director of ICE's Office of Detention and Removal Operations (the 'DRO'); and Marcy Forman, the former Director of ICE's Office of Investigations (the 'OI') (Chertoff, Myers, Torres, and Forman, together, the 'Supervisory Defendants'). . . .[I]in order to assert a claim under the equal protection component of the Fifth Amendment, a plaintiff must assert that the defendant intended to discriminate against the plaintiff because of a prohibited classification. What is less clear is what a plaintiff must assert in order to plead a claim against a supervisory defendant for the violation of a different constitutional provision. . . . The Court of Appeals has not yet definitively decided which of the Colon factors remains a basis for establishing supervisory liability in the wake of Iqbal, and no clear consensus has emerged among the district courts within the circuit. . . .This uncertainty is echoed in the decisions of the courts of appeals for other circuits. See, e.g., Argueta v. U .S. Immigration & Customs Enforcement, 643 F.3d 60, 70 (3d Cir.2011); Dodds v. Richardson, 614 F.3d 1185, 1194 (10th Cir.2010); Parrish v. Ball, 594 F.3d 993, 1001 (8th Cir.2010). For the purpose of deciding this motion, however, it is not necessary for the Court to determine the standard for supervisory liability for violations of the Fourth Amendment after Iqbal. That is because there is no controversy that allegations that do not satisfy any of the Colon prongs are insufficient to state a claim against a defendant-supervisor. That is the case with respect to defendants Chertoff and Myers. . . . At best, [plaintiffs' allegations] suggest that the defendants, officials at the highest level of government in charge of overseeing a bureaucracy of tens of thousands of people, had access to information indicating that a handful of field agents in disparate locations around the country had engaged in constitutionally infirm practices. Accepted as true, this allegation is insufficient to establish that defendants Chertoff and Myers knew of and failed to intervene to prevent a widespread pattern of constitutional violations. . . . This conclusion with respect to defendants Chertoff and Myers is in accordance with the recent decision of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals in Argueta v. U.S. Immigration & Customs Enforcement, 643 F.3d 60 (3d Cir.2011). . . . Argueta reached a different conclusion as to the potential liability of defendant Torres than does this Court . . . . The facts alleged in that case, however, differ in critical respects from the facts alleged in this one. Most notably, the complaint in Argueta did not allege that defendant Torres was directly involved in the alleged Fourth Amendment violations by virtue of having authored detailed operational plans. Rather, the plaintiffs in Argueta alleged principally that defendant Torres knew of and acquiesced in constitutional violations, because he was on notice that they were occurring, and that he had 'direct responsibility for the execution of fugitive operations.'. . The allegations against defendant Torres that the Argueta court considered were thus similar in kind to those alleged against defendants Chertoff and Myers, and dissimilar from those alleged against defendant Torres, in this case. . . . [As to the Fifth Amendment equal protection claims,] the plaintiffs are required to plead that an individual defendant against whom relief is sought 'acted with discriminatory purpose.'. . . The plaintiffs have wholly failed to do so with respect to any of the four Supervisory Defendants.") Rheaume v. Hofmann, No. 1:10–CV–318, 2011 WL 2947040, at *3 n.1 (D. Vt. June 6, 2011) ("In Iqbal, the Supreme Court ruled that '[b]ecause vicarious liability is inapplicable to ... § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.' 129 S.Ct. at 1948. This ruling has led several courts to conclude that only some of the Colon factors remain viable. See, e.g., Bellamy v. Mt. Vernon Hosp, 2009 WL 1835939, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. June 26, 2009). Other courts have held that the personal involvement requirements for supervisors, post- Iqbal, depend 'on the constitutional provision alleged to have been violated,' and that Iqbal most directly applies to intent-based constitutional claims (e.g. racial discrimination). See Qasem v. Toro, 737 F.Supp.2d 147, 151 (S.D.N.Y.2010); Sash v. United States, 674 F.Supp.2d 531, 544 (S.D.N.Y.2009). For purposes of this case, particularly because it does not allege the sort of intentional discrimination addressed in Iqbal, I will assume that all of the Colon factors still apply.")

D'Attore v. New York City, No. 10 Civ. 3102(JSR)(MHD), 2011 WL 3629166, at *9, *10 (S.D.N.Y. June 2, 2011) ("[T]he scope of what qualifies as 'personal involvement' by a supervisor has recently come into question by virtue of the Iqbal decision, in which the Supreme Court held that '[b]ecause vicarious liability is inapplicable to ... § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. . . The Second Circuit has not yet addressed how Iqbal affects the five categories of conduct that give rise to supervisory liability under Colon. . . . We believe, as observed in Sash v. United States, 674 F.Supp.2d 531 (S.D.N.Y.2009), that '[i]t was with intent-based constitutional claims in mind, specifically racial discrimination, that the Supreme Court rejected the argument that "a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution."'. . . Thus, as in the present case, where the claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent, the personal-involvement analysis set forth in Colon should still apply. . . . Plaintiff's allegations that he wrote letters to defendants Quinones, Mirabel and Schirro evidence a possible failure by them 'to remedy a wrong after being informed through a report or appeal,' Hernandez v. Keane, 341 F.3d 137, 145 (2d Cir.2003), and thus plaintiff sufficiently pleads that defendants disregarded a risk of excessive harm of which they were aware . . . .In light of plaintiff's allegations of his communication of the issues with these supervisory defendants, he sufficiently pleads that they were involved in the alleged violations of his rights and that they acted with a sufficiently culpable state of mind.")

Plair v. City of New York, No. 10 Civ. 8177, 2011 WL 2150658, at 4-6 (S.D.N.Y. May 31, 2011) ("Prior to Iqbal, the controlling authority on supervisory liability was Colon v. Coughlin, 58 F.3d 865, 873 (2d Cir.1995), which held that liability 'may be shown by evidence that: (1) the defendant participated directly in the alleged constitutional violation, (2) the defendant, after being informed of the violation through a report or appeal, failed to remedy the wrong, (3) the defendant created a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred or allowed the continuance of such a policy or custom, (4) the defendant was grossly negligent in supervising subordinates who committed the wrongful acts, or (5) the defendant exhibited deliberate indifference to the rights of inmates by failing to act on information indicating that unconstitutional acts were occurring.'. . Following Iqbal, courts in this district have held that a defendant cannot be held liable under section 1983 unless that defendant took an action that deprived the plaintiff of his or her constitutional rights. [citing cases] In that context, with intention-based constitutional claims in mind, the Supreme Court held that a supervisor's 'mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose' does not amount to the supervisor's violating the constitution. . . However, 'the factors necessary to establish a Bivens violation will vary with the constitutional provision at issue.'. . Here, the underlying constitutional right of the inmate is to be free from the use of excessive force by his jailers. In such a case, I conclude that the traditional Colon categories of supervisory liability still apply. . . Following Iqbal, other judges in the Second Circuit have continued to cite all five of the Colon categories as the bases for establishing supervisory liability in cases alleging violations of a plaintiff's Fourth and Eighth Amendment rights. [citing cases] . . . . In this action Colon remains the standard for establishing personal involvement by supervisory officials under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Here, the Complaint attempts to state a claim under the third Colon category; each of the supervisors is alleged to have received extensive information concerning the City's pattern of incidents involving unnecessary and excessive force to inmates and the failure of the DOC to prohibit its staff from using such force, and the Supervisory Defendants are alleged to have failed to take any steps to curb those unconstitutional abuses. . . They are alleged to have allowed the continuation of a policy or custom under which the unconstitutional practice of using excessive force against inmates incarcerated in the City's jails has occurred. . . However, Plaintiff's allegations of the existence of a policy or custom are conclusory and do not reach the requisite level of plausibility to survive under Twombly and Iqbal. . . In the Complaint, Plaintiff points to two cases of violence that occurred several years prior to the alleged violence against him and the existence of reports from unspecified time periods which would have reported violence at New York City detention facilities. . . He conclusorily alleges that these prior incidents established a policy or custom of violence against prisoners, and that the Supervisory Defendants were aware of and allowed this policy to continue. . . Given the passage of time and the installation of a new DOC Commissioner and other supervisory staff between the prior violent incidents and the alleged abuse of Plaintiff, as well as the general failure of Plaintiff to plausibly allege that a policy or custom underlay these acts of violence, Plaintiff has not sufficiently alleged that the violence which harmed him was part of a larger policy or custom at the DOC. . . Plaintiff has therefore failed to state a claim under Colon against the Supervisory Defendants.")

Delgado v. Bezio, No. 09 Civ. 6899(LTS), 2011 WL 1842294, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. May 9, 2011) ("The Second Circuit has not yet addressed the impact, if any, of Iqbal on the Colon standard. Courts in this district have reached contrary conclusions, holding in some cases that only the first and third Colon categories remain viable bases for liability, see, e.g., Bellamy v. Mt. Vernon Hosp., 07 civ 1801, 2009 WL 1835939, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. June 26, 2009) and, in other cases, that 'the personal involvement required to overcome a 12(b)(6) motion varies depending on the constitutional provision alleged to have been violated' such that the applicability of each Colon category will depend on the nature of the violation alleged, see Qasem, 737 F.Supp.2d at 151-52; see also D'Olimpio v. Crisafi, 718 F.Supp.2d 340, 346-47 (S.D.N.Y.2010). This Court agrees with the latter line of reasoning. . . . Here, Plaintiff does not assert an intentional discrimination claim of the sort that was at issue in Iqbal, and intent is not an element of his due process claims. Plaintiff's due process claims against Prack, Bezio and Cook fall into the second Colon category of personal involvement–namely, that 'the defendant, after being informed of the violation through a report or appeal, failed to remedy the wrong.'. . The Iqbal decision would clearly preclude liability of a supervisor on the basis of mere knowledge that a subordinate had rendered a decision that was intentionally discriminatory, and would likely preclude as well a claim based on affirmance of such a decision (at least absent a proffer that the affirmance was intentionally discriminatory). However, it cannot be said that the Iqbal holding precludes liability where, as is alleged here, supervisory personnel affirmed a decision that they knew to have been imposed in violation of Plaintiff's due process rights, thus continuing a deprivation of liberty without due process of law. Plaintiff claims that he was denied due process by reason of the withholding of information on confidentiality grounds at his disciplinary hearing. He also alleges that he appealed to, or sought reconsideration from, Defendants Prack, Bezio and Cook. In his appeal and reconsideration-request papers, his attorney identified the withholding of information as grounds for the infirmity of the decision and argued that the reliance on confidential information denied Plaintiff the ability to defend himself at the hearing. . . Defendants Prack, Bezio and Cook each denied an appeal or request for reconsideration. Read in the light most favorable to Plaintiff his Complaint and supporting documents allege sufficiently the personal involvement of Prack, Bezio and Cook, as they are alleged to have had the power, and to have refused, to vacate a penalty they knew had been imposed in violation of Plaintiff's due process rights, thus violating Plaintiff's constitutional rights by knowingly continuing a deprivation of liberty without due process of law. Accordingly, the motion will be denied to the extent it seeks dismissal of Plaintiff's due process claims against Prack, Bezio and Cook.")

Thomas v. Calero, 824 F.Supp.2d 488, 505-11 (S.D.N.Y. 2011) ("The Second Circuit has not yet addressed how Iqbal affects the five categories of conduct that give rise to supervisory liability under Colon. However, because Iqbal specifically rejected the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution,' 129 S.Ct. at 1949, several decisions in this district have held that Iqbal has nullified most of the longstanding Colon factors. [collecting cases] We disagree with these narrow interpretations of Iqbal, as have a number of other courts. [collecting cases] Thus, as in the present case, where the claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent, the personal-involvement analysis set forth in Colon should still apply 'as long as [it is] consistent with the requirements applicable to the particular constitutional provision alleged to have been violated.'. . Here, plaintiff alleges violations of his right to procedural due process within the context of a prison disciplinary hearing. As stated above, this does not require the plaintiff to show that the defendants intended to deprive him of his procedural rights, but only that defendants deprived him of a liberty interest as a result of insufficient process. . . This standard contains no reference to intent, or, indeed, even to the lesser 'deliberate indifference' standard applied to Eighth Amendment claims for denial of medical care, under which a plaintiff must show that the defendant 'knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate health or safety; the official must both be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and he must also draw the inference.'. . Looking, therefore, to Colon, we view the second category–that '(2) the defendant, after being informed of the violation through a report or appeal, failed to remedy the wrong,' Colon, 58 F.3d at 873 – as the most applicable for evaluating plaintiff's claim. . . . [A] number of courts in this Circuit have concluded that merely affirming the hearing officer's determination is not a sufficient basis to impose liability under the second Colon factor. [noting cases] On the other hand, other courts have found that affirming a hearing officer's determination on appeal is sufficient to establish personal involvement under the second Colon factor. [noting cases] We believe that, as a matter of pleading, Director Bezio's actions, by affirming CHO Calero's determination with only a modification of the penalty, . . .are sufficient to demonstrate personal involvement and could lead a trier of fact to impose liability under the second Colon factor. . . . Director Bezio's actions fall squarely within the second Colon factor– after he learned, via an appeal, of an alleged violation of plaintiff's rights, he not only failed to remedy the wrong, but allowed it to continue. . . . We therefore hold that the facts alleged in plaintiff's complaint against Director Bezio's may be sufficient to prove personal involvement under the second Colon factor. In applying Colon in this manner, there is one final issue that we must address. Some courts have held that, in applying the second Colon category, the plaintiff must plead that there was an 'ongoing' violation, which the defendant had the opportunity to 'remedy.'. . . At the time of plaintiff's appeal to Director Bezio, he was confined in SHU and, following his appeal, his confinement in SHU continued, resulting in a total of 291 days of confinement. . . . Thus, under the second Colon factor, we conclude that, when viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the facts pled are sufficient to withstand defendants' 12(b)(6) motion. Finally, our initial determination was that, despite Iqbal, all five Colon factors still apply to this case. However, should the Second Circuit adopt a more stringent interpretation and limit the Colon categories to include only the first and part of the third categories, we still believe plaintiff's claim survives. Plaintiff claims that by affirming CHO Calero's determination, with only a modification of the sentence, Director Bezio is responsible for the CHO's alleged constitutional violation. Looking to the first Colon category, 'that the defendant participated directly in the alleged constitutional violation', we believe plaintiff has pled sufficient facts to overcome defendants' 12(b)(6) motion.")

Mar. 28, 2011) ("The defendants argue that the Second Circuit's traditional factors governing supervisory liability are no longer valid in the wake of Iqbal. It is not clear that the Second Circuit's personal involvement theory was limited by Iqbal. . . Even if Iqbal has limited the personal liability theory, however, 'the Second Circuit has emphasized the importance in providing pro se incarcerated plaintiffs with an opportunity to conduct discovery to identify the officials "who have personal liability."' Sosa v. Lantz, 3:09cv869, 2010 WL 3925268, at *5 (D.Conn. Sept. 30, 2010) (quoting Davis v. Kelly, 160 F.3d 917, 921 (2d Cir.1998)).")

Warrender v. U.S., No. 09-CV-2697 (KAM)(LB), 2011 WL 703927, at *5 n.1 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 17, 2011) ("Although the Second Circuit has not ruled on the precise issue of whether any of the Colon categories remain viable after Iqbal, see Sash v. United States, 674 F.Supp.2d 531, 543 (S.D.N.Y.2009), the court agrees with other courts in this district which have found that most of the Colon categories have been superseded by Iqbal. . . Accordingly, the proper standard under which to view plaintiff's allegations is prescribed by the Supreme Court in Iqbal rather than the Second Circuit's earlier decision in Colon.")

Livermore v. City of New York, No. 08 CV 4442(NRB), 2011 WL 182052, at *8 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 13, 2011) ("Although the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal eliminated certain categories of supervisory liability that were recognized in Colon, a plaintiff may still state a claim based on a supervisor creating or condoning a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occur. [citing Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 108-09 (2d Cir.2010)] We agree with defendants that, as an intellectual matter, it is unlikely that plaintiff will prevail against the Supervisor Defendants on the basis of an unconstitutional policy or custom for two related reasons. First, plaintiff has already concluded that she cannot successfully pursue an analogous Monell claim against the City. Second, plaintiff's argument against the Medical Defendants turns on the existence of the DOHMH alcohol withdrawal policy. Thus, arguing that there was an unconstitutional policy or custom appears to be inconsistent with plaintiff's theory that there was a proper policy that the Medical Defendants failed to observe. . . However, the motion to dismiss turns on the sufficiency of the allegations alone. And here, the allegations that relate to policies and customs are sufficiently plausible and provide fair notice to the Supervisor Defendants. Thus, this claim against the Supervisor Defendants survives a motion to dismiss.")

Diaz-Bernal v. Myers, No. 3:09cv1734 (SRU), 2010 WL 5211494, at *18, *20, *21 (D. Conn. Dec. 16, 2010) ("The individual defendants argue that the Colon factors were diminished by Iqbal. . . In Iqbal, the Supreme Court rejected the idea that a supervisor could be liable for an employee's equal protection violations based on their 'knowledge and acquiescence in their subordinates' use of discriminatory criteria to make classification decisions among detainees.'. . In rejecting the supervisors' liability, the Supreme Court insisted that supervisors 'may not be held accountable for the misdeeds of their agents.... [E]ach government official ... is only liable for his or her own misconduct.... [P]urpose rather than knowledge is required to impose Bivens liability ... for unconstitutional discrimination.'. . The Second Circuit has recently suggested that at least some of the Colon factors survive Iqbal. Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 110 (2d Cir.2010) ("To be sure, [t]he personal involvement of a supervisory defendant may be shown by evidence that: ... the defendant created a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred, or allowed the continuance of such a policy or custom.' ") (citing Colon, 58 F.3d at 837). . . . Here, the plaintiffs have put forth a plausible claim that Myers and Torres are subject to supervisory liability because their actions imposing intense pressure to make arrests, allowing bystander arrests, and providing inadequate training created a policy under which constitutional violations occurred. . . . Chadbourne and Martin are not liable under the same theory as Myers and Torres, because they did not create the FOTS [Fugitive Operative Teams] arrest quota, and the litigation plaintiffs point to as providing notice to the defendants did not allege unconstitutional conduct in Connecticut or Massachusetts, where Chadbourne and Martin were supervisors. Instead, Chadbourne and Martin are potentially liable for creating a policy of conducting large-scale raids without adequately training raid officers. Courts split over whether a failure to train claim can be the basis for supervisory liability post-Iqbal. Compare Newton v. City of New York, 640 F.Supp.2d 426, 448 (S.D.N.Y.2009) ("[P]assive failure to train claims pursuant to section 1983 have not survived the Supreme Court's recent decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal. "), with D'Olimpio v. Crisafi, 718 F.Supp.2d 340, 347 (S.D.N.Y.2010) (Colon's bases for liability survive because they 'are not founded on a theory of respondeat superior, but rather on a recognition that personal involvement of defendants in alleged constitutional deprivations' can be shown by nonfeasance as well as misfeasance.") (quoting Colon, 58 F.3d at 873). I agree with the latter line of cases. A supervisor who has been deliberately indifferent in failing to train is not liable for a passive constitutional violation based on the theory of respondeat superior. Instead, a failure to train can be an active violation on the part of a supervisor who has willfully chosen to allow the harm resulting from a lack of training. In these cases, a failure to train is more akin to those situations in which a defendant 'create [s] a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred, or allow[s] the continuance of such a policy or custom," which the Second Circuit post-Iqbal has recognized as a basis for liability. Scott, 616 F.3d at 110 (quoting Colon, 58 F.3d at 873). There is some evidence here that Chadbourne and Martin should have been on notice about unconstitutional conduct on the part of raid officers, so that their failure to train might be found to constitute deliberate indifference.")

Rivera v. Metropolitan Transit Authority, 750 F.Supp.2d 456, 462, 463 (S.D.N.Y. 2010) ("Precisely what remains of the Second Circuit's personal involvement rule in light of Iqbal is not entirely clear. While the Circuit has not yet addressed the question, one of my colleagues has concluded that: '[o]nly the first and part of the third Colon categories pass Iqbal's muster – a supervisor is only held liable if that supervisor participates directly in the alleged constitutional violation or if that supervisor creates a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred. The other Colon categories impose the exact types of supervisory liability that Iqbal eliminated–situations where the supervisor knew of and acquiesced to a constitutional violation committed by a subordinate.'. . .That view is persuasive. There is no suggestion that any of these defendants directly participated in any of the alleged constitutional violations–false arrest, malicious prosecution, excessive use of force or anything else. Nor is there any admissible evidence that any of them 'create[d] or allow[ed] the continuation of a policy or custom under which [the alleged] unconstitutional practices occurred.'. . It is doubtful that the evidence would permit a finding that any of them thought that violations occurred but looked the other way, and even that would not be sufficient. Accordingly, they are entitled to dismissal.")

McNair v. Kirby Forensic Psychiatric Center, No. 09 Civ. 6660(SAS), 2010 WL 4446772, at *6 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 5, 2010) ("The Iqbal decision abrogates several of the categories of supervisory liability enumerated in Colon v. Coughlin. . . Iqbal's 'active conduct' standard only imposes liability on a supervisor through section 1983 if that supervisor had an active hand in the alleged constitutional violation. Only two Colon categories survive after Iqbal - (1) a supervisor is only held liable if that supervisor participates directly in the alleged constitutional violation, and part of (3) if that supervisor creates a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred. The other Colon categories impose the exact types of supervisory liability that Iqbal eliminated – situations where the supervisor knew of and acquiesced to a constitutional violation committed by a subordinate.").

Edwards v. City of Kingston, No. 1:08-CV-803 (LEK/RFT), 2010 WL 3761892, at *10 (N.D.N.Y. Sept. 20, 2010) ("The personal involvement of a supervisory defendant may be shown by evidence of, inter alia: participation directly in the alleged constitutional violation; failure to remedy the violation after being informed through a report or appeal; creation or allowance of the continuation of a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occur; or gross negligence in supervising subordinates who commit the wrongful acts. Colon v. Coughlin, 58 F.3d 865, 873 (2d Cir.1995). The Supreme Court ruling in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009), cast doubt on the viability of some of these factors in discrimination suits. The Court ruled that mere knowledge and acquiescense does not suffice to create liability under that type of claim. . . However, the Court's ruling certainly does not prevent finding supervisors liable when their direct participation is alleged or where they have purposefully violated their 'superintendent responsibilities.' As such, Defendants' argument that Gorsline did not directly participate in inappropriate or wrongful sexual conduct against Plaintiffs in unavailing. . . While Plaintiffs directly implicate Gorsline in some measure, particularly in terms of gender discrimination, their claims against him rest on his supervisory role and his full knowledge, at least passive acceptance, and failure to act an ongoing hostile work environment, despite directly witnessing multiple incidents and becoming aware of Plaintiffs' distress. Accordingly, as Gorsline exhibits a sufficient level of personal involvement to be held liable, summary judgment as to the § 1983 claims against him is denied.")

Qasem v. Toro, No. 09 Civ. 8361(SHS), 2010 WL 3156031, at 3-5 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 10, 2010) ("The Second Circuit has not yet addressed how Iqbal affects the five categories of conduct that give rise to supervisory liability under Colon. As explained in detail in D'Olimpio v. Crisafi, No. 09 Civ. 7283, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 59563, at *14-18 (S.D.N.Y. June 15, 2010), in the wake of Iqbal, certain courts in this district have found that '[o]nly the first and part of the third Colon categories pass Iqbal's muster,' and that '[t]he other Colon categories impose the exact types of supervisory liability that Iqbal eliminated,' because only the first and third categories allege personal involvement sufficiently to permit supervisory liability to be imposed after Iqbal. Bellamy v. Mount Vernon Hosp., No. 07 Civ. 1801, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 54141, at *6 (S.D.N.Y. June 26, 2009); see also Newton v. City of N.Y., 640 F.Supp.2d 426, 448 (S.D.N.Y.2009) ("[P]assive failure to train claims pursuant to section 1983 have not survived the Supreme Court's recent decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal."); Joseph v. Fischer, No. 08 Civ. 2824, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96952, at *42-43 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 8, 2009) ("Plaintiff's claim, based on [defendant's] "failure to take corrective measures," is precisely the type of claim Iqbal eliminated."). This Court, as did the Court in D'Olimpio, disagrees with this narrow interpretation of Iqbal. As Iqbal noted, the degree of personal involvement required to overcome a Rule 12(b)(6) motion varies depending on the constitutional provision alleged to have been violated. Invidious discrimination claims require a showing of discriminatory purpose, but there is no analogous requirement applicable to Qasem's allegations of repeated sexual assaults. See Sash v. United States, 674 F.Supp.2d 531, 544 (S.D.N.Y.2009) (citing Chao v. Ballista, 630 F.Supp.2d 170, 178 n. 2 (D.Mass. July 1, 2009)); see also D'Olimpio, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 59563, at *16. Colon's bases for liability are not founded on a theory of respondeat superior, but rather on a recognition that 'personal involvement of defendants in alleged constitutional deprivations' can be shown by nonfeasance as well as misfeasance. Id. at * 17 (quoting Colon, 58 F.3d at 873). Thus, the five Colon categories supporting personal liability of supervisors still apply as long as they are consistent with the requirements applicable to the particular constitutional provision alleged to have been violated. . . . Plaintiff's allegations and inferences, if proven, would entitle her to relief under the Fourteenth Amendment and Eighth Amendments. . . . The Court finds that plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts that Thornton – the Superintendent of the DOCS facility where plaintiff resided–and Rogers–the Deputy Superintendent for Security at that same facility – were deliberately indifferent to her health and safety and that they were responsible for creating or maintaining policies and practices that failed to prevent plaintiff from being raped and assaulted. The Eighth Amendment requires prison officials to take reasonable measures to guarantee the safety of inmates in their custody. . . . Although discovery may ultimately reveal that defendants Thornton and Rogers made every reasonable effort to prevent the alleged sexual abuse, Qasem has alleged sufficient facts to allow the Court 'to draw the reasonable inference' that the defendants 'are liable for the misconduct alleged.'")

D'Olimpio v. Crisafi, 718 F.Supp.2d 340, 347 (S.D.N.Y. 2010) ("The defendants here note that certain courts in this District have read these passages of Iqbal to mean that '[o]nly the first and part of the third Colon categories pass Iqbal's muster ... [t]he other Colon categories impose the exact types of supervisory liability that Iqbal eliminated.' [collecting decisions] This Court respectfully disagrees. As Iqbal noted, the degree of personal involvement varies depending on the constitutional provision at issue; whereas invidious discrimination claims require a showing of discriminatory purpose, there is no analogous requirement applicable to D'Olimpio's allegations regarding his search, arrest, and prosecution. . . Colon's bases for liability are not founded on a theory of respondeat superior, but rather on a recognition that 'personal involvement of defendants in alleged constitutional deprivations' can be shown by nonfeasance as well as misfeasance. . . Thus, the five Colon categories for personal liability of supervisors may still apply as long as they are consistent with the requirements applicable to the particular constitutional provision alleged to have been violated.")

However, Plaintiff has not stated that any of these Defendants participated directly in the alleged illegal conduct (i.e., the inspections of the Property and the posting of the sign indicating Plaintiff's home was unfit for human occupancy). Based upon the lack of particularized allegations against these four individuals, and in light of the Supreme Court's holding in Iqbal eliminating supervisory liability in situations where supervisors knew of and acquiesced in a constitutional violation committed by a subordinate, Plaintiff's 1983 claims against [supervisory Defendants] cannot survive the motion to dismiss.").

Dec. 15, 2009) (discussing and disagreeing with several district court decisions concluding that Iqbal has nullified several criteria for imposing supervisory liability because it established an 'active conduct' standard). The Second Circuit has not yet addressed the effect of Iqbal on the standard for supervisory liability. This Court, however, need not resolve the issue. The plaintiff has not alleged any facts in his complaint relating to defendants Murphy and Lantz. He merely identifies them as defendants. Thus, the plaintiff has not satisfied any criteria for imposing supervisory liability and appears to assert only a claim of respondeat superior.").

Mateo v. Fischer, 682 F.Supp.2d 423, 430, 431 (S.D.N.Y. 2010) ("Courts in the Second Circuit are divided on whether a supervisor's'review and denial of a grievance constitutes personal involvement in the underlying alleged unconstitutional act.' Burton v. Lynch, No. 08-8791, 2009 WL 3286020, at *6 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 13, 2009). As Judge Sand noted in Burton, some courts distinguish between the degree of response to an inmate's grievance – for example, between summarily denying a grievance and denying it in a detailed response that specifically addresses the plaintiff's allegations. . . The Court finds that distinction persuasive. A supervisor's detailed, specific response to a plaintiff's complaint suggests that the supervisor has considered the plaintiff's allegations and evaluated possible responses. . . A pro forma response suggests nothing like that. Here, Mateo's complaint claims only that Fischer received his letters, forwarded at least two of them to subordinates for investigation, and sent Mateo a response to the effect that Mateo had provided insufficient information to support his allegations. Without more, these allegations prove only the scantest awareness of Mateo's claims. Indeed, Mateo's complaint openly admits that Fischer lacked full knowledge of his claims: it suggests that 'facility officials' never reported his allegations in full to Fischer. On these pleadings, the Court must conclude that Fischer lacked personal involvement; all claims against him are dismissed.).

Sash v. U.S., 674 F.Supp.2d 531, 543-45 & n.16 (S.D.N.Y. 2009) ("Although the Second Circuit has not weighed in on what remains of Colon after Iqbal, several decisions in this district have concluded that by specifically rejecting the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution,' Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949, Iqbal effectively nullified several of the classifications of supervisory liability enunciated by the Second Circuit in Colon v. Coughlin. [citing Bellamy, Fischer, and] Newton v. City of N.Y., 640 F.Supp.2d 426, 448 (S.D.N.Y.2009) ("[P]assive failure to train claims pursuant to section 1983 have not survived the Supreme Court's recent decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal."). While Colon permitted supervisory liability in situations where the supervisor knew of and acquiesced in a constitutional violation committed by a subordinate, these post-Iqbal district court decisions reason that Iqbal's 'active conduct' standard imposes liability only where that supervisor directly participated in the alleged violation or had a hand in creating a policy or custom under which the unconstitutional practices occurred. These decisions may overstate Iqbal's impact on supervisory liability. Iqbal involved alleged intentional discrimination. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1942. The Supreme Court specifically held that '[t]he factors necessary to establish a Bivens violation will vary with the constitutional provision at issue.' Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948. Where the alleged constitutional violation involved 'invidious discrimination in contravention of the First and Fifth Amendments,' Iqbal held that 'plaintiff must plead and prove that the defendant acted with discriminatory purpose,' whether the defendant is a subordinate or a supervisor. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948-49. It was with intent-based constitutional claims in mind, specifically racial discrimination, that the Supreme Court rejected the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.' Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949. Where the constitutional claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent, but instead relies on the unreasonable conduct or deliberate indifference standards of the Fourth and Eighth Amendments, the personal involvement analysis set forth in Colon v. Coughlin may still apply. . . See, e.g., Chao v. Ballista, 630 F.Supp.2d 170, 178 n.2 (D.Mass. July 1, 2009) (noting that the 'state of mind required to make out a supervisory claim under the Eighth Amendment – i.e., deliberate indifference – requires less than the discriminatory purpose or intent that Iqbal was required to allege in his suit....); Michael Avery et al., Police Misconduct: Law & Litigation ' 4:5 (2009) (discussing the impact of Ashcroft v. Iqbal on issue of supervisor liability in section 1983 and Bivens actions). . . .Regardless of whether Colon or an Iqbal-limited standard applies, supervisory defendants Blackford and Merrigan are entitled to summary judgment. It is undisputed that defendant Blackford was not present at Sash's arrest, nor is there any evidence that he directed the use of excessive physical force against Sash. . . Similarly, although defendant Merrigan was present at the scene of the arrest, Sash does not contend that Merrigan ever laid a hand on him, nor does he contend that Merrigan ordered the Mulcahys to use excessive physical force. . . To the extent Sash argues that Blackford and Merrigan are liable on a theory of bystander liability, . . . he offers no supporting evidence. . . . Although Sash contends that Blackford and Merrigan should be liable based on their failure to provide necessary and proper training to the Mulcahys, or alternatively, on their failure to implement a policy that would have prevented the use of excessive force, there is no evidence to support these claims.").

[collecting cases] However, other courts have concluded that merely affirming the hearing determination is not a sufficient basis to impose liability. [collecting cases] The distinction between these cases appears to be that 'while personal involvement cannot be founded solely on supervision, liability can be found if the official proactively participated in reviewing the administrative appeals as opposed merely to rubber-stamping the results.' *Hamilton v. Stevens has alleged that he contacted King via certified mail, that he spoke with King on the telephone, and that he complied with King's request for supporting documentation and contact information for Stevens' counsel, and that nonetheless, King did nothing. Assuming that all allegations in the Complaint are true, this is sufficient to state a cause of action. Therefore, Stevens' § 1981 and § 1983, NYSHR, and NYCHR claims against defendant King are not dismissed at this time.")

Alli v. City of New York, No. 11 Civ. 7665(BSJ)(MHD), 2012 WL 4887745, *5, *6 & n.1 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 12, 2012) ("Recently, . . . the scope of what qualifies as 'personal involvement' by a supervisor has come into question by virtue of a 2009 decision in which the Supreme Court held, in a pleading context, that '[b]ecause vicarious liability is inapplicable to ... § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948. The Second Circuit has not yet addressed how Iqbal affects the five categories of conduct that give rise to supervisory liability under Colon. However, because Iqbal specifically rejected the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution,' several decisions in this district have held that Iqbal has nullified most of the longstanding Colon factors. . . These courts have concluded that '[o]nly the first and part of the third Colon categories pass *Iqbal'*s muster,' and that '[t]he other Colon categories impose the exact types of supervisory liability that Iqbal eliminated,' because only the first and third categories sufficiently allege personal involvement to permit supervisory liability to be imposed after Iqbal. . . We disagree with this narrow interpretation of Iqbal, as have a number of other courts. . .We believe, as observed in Sash v. United States, 674 F.Supp.2d 531 (S.D.N.Y.2009), that '[i]t was with intent-based constitutional claims in mind, specifically racial discrimination, that the Supreme Court rejected the argument that a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.'. . Thus, as in the present case, where the claim does not require a showing of discriminatory intent, the personal-involvement analysis set forth in Colon should still apply. . . Hence we look to earlier Second Circuit precedent that applies the tests of deliberate indifference or gross negligence to assess supervisory liability. That analysis demands a showing of actual or constructive notice to the supervisory defendant of constitutional torts committed by their subordinates. . . . Although Connick dealt solely with municipal liability under section 1983, we believe that its analysis is informative as to the scope of personal liability for supervisors, and supports our conclusion that Colon remains largely intact. In the context of either municipal liability or supervisory liability, the Supreme Court has clearly stated that a defendant is only responsible for his own actions. . . Hence, if failure-to-train claims or the 'deliberate indifference' test for a supervisor's personal involvement in constitutional violations under § 1983 were both no longer viable after Iqbal, we would expect that the same type of section 1983 claims would fail if asserted against a municipality. Yet in Connick, which post-dates Iqbal, the Supreme Court applied the 'deliberate indifference' test to a failure-to-train claim. . . In addressing Connick's failure-to-train claim against the supervisory defendant, the Supreme Court ultimately rejected municipal liability on the grounds that the plaintiff had not satisfied the substantive requirements of the legal standard. The Court thus found that Connick failed to show a ' "policy of inaction" that [was] the functional equivalent of a decision by the city itself to violate the Constitution.'. . Notably, however, the Court did not suggest that municipal liability was completely unavailable in the context of a failure-to-train claim. . . Nor did the Court suggest that municipal liability was unavailable with respect to a claim of deliberate indifference. . . We therefore infer that the Court preserved *Colon'*s fifth factor of analysis-concerning deliberate indifference-for claims of personal involvement in section 1983 cases. . . .That said, the complaint is devoid of any specified factual basis for inferring that the Warden or the John Doe Deputy Warden were aware of, or promoted, due-process violations by prison hearing officers, or that they had somehow acquiesced to such conduct by Capt. Caputo or others. Indeed, the proposed complaint offers only a conclusory allegation that Warden Agro was somehow responsible for such a policy or practice. . . Absent any allegation of a factual basis to conclude that this was the case, the proposed claims against Warden Agro and the Deputy Warden are not plausible in light of Iqbal and therefore would have to be dismissed.")

Although Iqbal addressed Bivens claims (and, by analogy, section 1983 claims as well), there is no reason why its reasoning should not apply with equal force to RLUIPA claims. Based on the foregoing, I conclude that personal involvement of a defendant in the alleged substantial burden of plaintiff's exercise of religion is a prerequisite to stating a claim under RLUIPA. I also conclude that an official's denial of a grievance alleging a constitutional deprivation, without more, does not amount to personal involvement in the deprivation of that right.").

The 'continuing vitality' of Colon, however, has 'engendered conflict within [the Second] Circuit,' Reynolds v. Barrett, 685 F.3d 193, 205 n. 14 (2d Cir.2012), after the Supreme Court in Iqbal rejected the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.'. . Dorlette v. Quiros, No. 3:10cv615 (AWT), 2012 WL 4481455, *3-*5 (D. Conn. Sept. 26, 2012) ("In Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), the Supreme Court rejected the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution,' concluding that 'each Government official, his or her title notwithstanding, is only liable for his or her own misconduct.'. . Since Iqbal, some district courts in this circuit have concluded that not all five of Colon's categories of conduct that may give rise to supervisory liability remain viable. . . Other district courts restrict application of Iqbal to cases involving discriminatory intent. . . The Second Circuit has not yet addressed this issue. This court need not determine whether Iqbal applies in all cases or just those involving discriminatory intent because the allegations against defendants Lajoie and Quiros are insufficient to survive summary judgment even under the Colon standard. The defendants argue that the plaintiff has not alleged that either defendant personally engaged in wrongful conduct, and merely alleges formulaic statements of the elements of a claim for supervisory liability. Thus, they contend that the plaintiff has not presented any facts to support a plausible claim of supervisory liability. The plaintiff states that defendants Lajoie and Quiros were on notice of the violent tendencies of certain staff members through requests and grievances submitted by other inmates prior to October 23, 2009. The plaintiff also specifically reported the October 23, 2009 incident. Rather than take action, defendants Lajoie and Quiros denied the plaintiff's grievances. The plaintiff alleges no facts and presents no evidence suggesting that defendants Lajoie and Quiros were notified prior to October 23, 2009, that any correctional officers had violent tendencies. Although the plaintiff notified them about the incident after it occurred, this is insufficient to establish their personal involvement. The plaintiff has not presented evidence that either defendant had sufficient knowledge to have prevented the incident. . . Further, the fact that defendants Quiros and Lajoie denied his grievance appeal does not state a cognizable claim. . . The defendants' motion for summary judgment is granted as to the claims against defendants Quiros and Lajoie.")

The Court notes that the recent Supreme Court decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009) has called into question whether all of the Colon factors remain a basis for establishing supervisory liability and that 'no clear consensus has emerged among the district courts within this circuit.'. . . Here, the Defendants have only moved to dismiss the claims against Karajanis on the basis that Lewis has failed to state a claim for municipal liability and therefore they appear to be seeking only dismissal of the official capacity claims against Karajanis. As noted above, Lewis does not specify whether the claims asserted against Karajanis in Count VIII are official or individual capacity claims or both. Construing the claims in Count VIII, it appears they allege both official and individual capacity claims. Accordingly, since the Defendants have not moved to dismiss the claims on the basis that Lewis has failed to state a claim for supervisory liability under the Colon factors, these claims remain extant for summary judgment and trial.")

Jones v. Superintendent of Attica Correctional Facility, No. 10–CV–0823(Sr), 2012 WL 4464685, *3 (W.D.N.Y. Feb. 3, 2012) ("With respect to Superintendent Conway, however, plaintiff's allegations do not suggest that Superintendent Conway was personally involved in the decision to move plaintiff to the housing unit or aware that plaintiff had problems with other inmates on that housing unit prior to the assault. Even interpreting plaintiff's allegations to suggest that he wrote Superintendent Conway about his safety concerns upon his transfer, given plaintiff's allegation that the assault occurred on the same day as his move into the housing block, it is not plausible that Superintendent Conway would have received plaintiff's letter prior to the assault. In any event, such a letter is insufficient to demonstrate personal involvement by a supervisory official.")

Young v. State of New York Office of Mental Retardation and Developmental Disabilities, 649 F.Supp.2d 282, 293, 294 (S.D.N.Y. 2009) ("Until recently, the Second Circuit rule was that a supervisory official was 'personally involved' only when that official: '(1) participate[d] directly in the alleged constitutional violation; (2) fail[ed] to remedy the violation after being informed of the violation through a report or appeal; (3) create[d] or allow[ed] the continuation of a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred; (4) act[ed] with gross negligence in supervising subordinates who commit the wrongful acts; or (5) exhibit[ed] deliberate indifference to the rights of inmates by failing to act on information indicating that unconstitutional acts were occurring.'[citing Colon] This Term, however, the Supreme Court in Ashcroft v. Iqbal held that '[b]ecause vicarious liability is inapplicable to ... [section] 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution,'. . and it explicitly rejected the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.''. . Accordingly, '[a]bsent vicarious liability, each Government official, his or her title notwithstanding, is only liable for his or her own misconduct.'. . . Precisely what remains of the Second Circuit rule in light of Iqbal is not entirely clear. While the Circuit has not yet addressed the question, one of my colleagues has concluded that: '[o]nly the first and part of the third Colon categories pass Iqbal's muster – a supervisor is only held liable if that supervisor participates directly in the alleged constitutional violation or if that supervisor creates a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred. The other Colon categories impose the exact types of supervisory liability that Iqbal eliminated – situations where the supervisor knew of and acquiesced to a constitutional violation committed by a subordinate.'[citing Bellamy] Plaintiffs do not contend that Uschakow and Williamson were directly involved in any of the treatment or care at issue. Rather, they assert that they are liable because they failed to failed, either before or after Ms. Young's death, to adopt a policy to prevent DVT [deep vein thrombosis]. . . . As an initial matter, it is difficult to see how either Uschakow or Williamson could be held liable on the theory that he failed, after Ms. Young's demise, to adopt a policy to prevent DVT. Any such failure would bear no causal connection to the harm allegedly caused by their alleged constitutional violation. Plaintiffs' allegations with respect to the inaction of Messrs. Uschakow and Williamson during the period before Ms. Young's death are exceptionally vague, amounting essentially to a claim that they ultimately were responsible for the proper running of the facility and, in consequence, for any failure to adopt a policy to prevent DVT therefore would suffice to establish supervisory liability even after Iqbal. The Court has considerable doubt that supervisory liability properly could be imposed on such a basis, as it appears that the duty would be far too general. But it would be inappropriate to resolve that issue until the facts concerning the actual responsibilities of Messrs. Uschakow and Williamson, what they did and did not do, and the relationship, if any, of their actions and omissions to Ms. Young's situation are clear. As these defendants have failed to demonstrate the absence of a genuine issue of material fact on an issue as to which they would have the burden of proof at trial, summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds would be inappropriate at this juncture.").

Jackson v. Goord, 664 F.Supp.2d 307, 324 n.7 (S.D.N.Y. 2009) ("A question has arisen as to whether the traditional supervisory-liability test has been eviscerated by the recent Supreme Court decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, __ U.S. __, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). See, e.g., Martin A. Schwartz, Supreme Court Sets Standards For Civil Rights Complaints, N.Y.L.J., Aug. 3, 2009, at 3, 7 (stating that the Court 'jettisoned the very concept of supervisory liability "). We do not believe that it has done so in the circumstance of this case. The claims by Iqbal involved, inter alia, denial of equal protection or discrimination – legal theories that require proof of discriminatory intent. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948 (citing Church of Lukumi Babalu Ave, Inc. v. Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520, 540-541 (1993) and Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 240 (1976)). The Supreme Court held in Iqbal that even supervisors must be alleged and proven to have violated the plaintiff's underlying constitutional right to be held liable. See id. at 1949, 1952. Since the claims at issue in Iqbal involved discriminatory intent, the Court held that the plaintiff could not prevail by way of the traditional supervisory-liability test of deliberate indifference. Id. at 1949. In contrast, in this and many other prison-condition cases, the underlying constitutional right of the inmate is to be free of injurious deliberate indifference by their jailers. See, e.g., Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 89 (2007); Sledge

v. Kooi, 564 F.3d 105, 106 (2d Cir.2009). In these cases, then, deliberate indifference by supervisors to known injury-causing conditions should still trigger liability.")

Bellamy v. Mount Vernon Hosp., No. 07 Civ. 1801(SAS), 2009 WL 1835939, at *4, *6 (S.D.N.Y. June 26, 2009), aff'd by Bellamy v. Mount Vernon Hosp., No. 09–3312–pr, 387 F. App'x 55, 2010 WL 2838534 (2d Cir. Jul.21, 2010) ("In 1995, the Second Circuit held that a supervisory official is personally involved only when that official: (1) participates directly in the alleged constitutional violation; (2) fails to remedy the violation after being informed of the violation through a report or appeal; (3) creates or allows the continuation of a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred; (4) acts with gross negligence in supervising subordinates who commit the wrongful acts; or (5) exhibits deliberate indifference to the rights of inmates by failing to act on information indicating that unconstitutional acts were occurring. [citing Colon v. Coughlin, 58 F.3d 865, 873 (2d Cir. 1995)] The Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal v. Ashcroft abrogates several of the categories of supervisory liability enumerated in *Colon v. Coughlin. Iqbal'*s 'active conduct' standard only imposes liability on a supervisor through section 1983 if that supervisor actively had a hand in the alleged constitutional violation. Only the first and part of the third Colon categories pass *Iqbal'*s muster - a supervisor is only held liable if that supervisor participates directly in the alleged constitutional violation or if that supervisor creates a policy or custom under which unconstitutional practices occurred. The other Colon categories impose the exact types of supervisory liability that Iqbal eliminated - situations where the supervisor knew of and acquiesced to a constitutional violation committed by a subordinate. Bellamy's remaining claim alleges that Wright, in his individual capacity, was deliberately indifferent to Bellamy's medical needs. However, Bellamy offers no evidence that any of Wright's actions fall into any of the remaining exceptions that would permit supervisory liability. First, Bellamy admits that Wright was not personally involved in the letter responses. Both parties agree that they have never had any form of contact. Second, Bellamy offers no evidence that Wright created or contributed to a policy or custom of unconstitutional practices. Bellamy also admitted that he can provide no evidence that Wright was responsible for making any decisions regarding his testosterone medications. . . Bellamy's conclusory allegations that Wright must have known about Bellamy's plight is not enough to impute section 1983 liability.")

THIRD CIRCUIT

Williams v. Papi, 714 F. App'x 128, 133-34 (3d Cir. 2017) ("This Court has noted that there exists 'uncertainty as to the viability and scope of supervisory liability' after the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal . . . arguably narrowed or abrogated the ability to find a supervisor liable for conduct of which he was merely aware but did not direct. . . Although we have not yet squarely addressed the extent of *Iqbal'*s impact on the theory of supervisory liability, we have repeatedly held that '[i]t is uncontested that a government official is liable only for his or her own conduct and accordingly must have had some sort of personal involvement in the alleged unconstitutional conduct.'. . Such personal involvement may be established by alleging that the supervisor 'participated in violating the plaintiff's rights, directed others to violate them, or, as the person in charge, had knowledge of and acquiesced in his subordinates' violations.'. .The District Court concluded that Chiefs Fisher, Ely, Kreig, and Olszewski, and Corporal Miller (as the ranking officer on site) could be held liable as supervisors 'who were either present at the scene of the incident or directly participated in the events,' and that disputes of fact precluded granting them qualified immunity. . . In reaching this determination, the District Court did not separately consider each supervisor's circumstances or the extent of each's personal involvement in the alleged conduct. This lapse is particularly notable concerning Chiefs Kreig and Fisher. Although Krieg was personally involved in various alleged violations, he was the only Meshoppen Borough officer on the scene, meaning he had no subordinates for whose conduct he could be held liable. Thus, to the extent that he was found liable as a supervisor for his own participation in the alleged violations, that is redundant of his individual liability, and he is entitled to summary judgment on this claim. Regarding Fisher, it is undisputed that he was off duty, did not come to scene, and did not direct, condone, or have awareness of the conduct that occurred. Fisher's generalized knowledge that the situation was unfolding is too slender a reed upon which to hold him liable for the conduct of his on-site subordinates. . . We reject Mrs. Williams' theory that Fisher can be held liable based solely on his failure to come to the scene, thereby leaving Miller in charge even though he was allegedly unprepared to handle the situation. To the extent that such a basis for liability exists and survived Iqbal, it is certainly not clearly established that the mere failure to show up at a scene when off duty could render a supervisor liable for his subordinates' unconstitutional conduct, and Mrs. Williams has failed to cite any case law in support of the proposition. Fisher is thus entitled to qualified immunity.")

Wharton v. Danberg, 854 F.3d 234, 243, 247 (3d Cir. 2017) ("Suits against high-level government officials must satisfy the general requirements for supervisory liability. In particular, supervisors are liable only for their own acts; in this case, they are liable only if they, 'with deliberate indifference to the consequences, established and maintained a policy, practice or custom which directly caused [the] constitutional harm.' A.M. ex rel. J.M.K. v. Luzerne Cty. Juvenile Det. Ctr., 372 F.3d 572, 586 (3d Cir. 2004) (quoting Stoneking v. Bradford Area Sch. Dist., 882 F.2d 720, 725 (3d Cir. 1989)) (alteration in original). This standard for supervisory liability largely overlaps with the over-detention standard—both require a showing of deliberate indifference and causation—but centers the inquiry around a policy or practice. . . . Our precedent is clear that while the detention of sentenced inmates is governed by the Eighth Amendment, the treatment of pretrial detainees is governed by the Due Process Clause. . . For pretrial detainees, therefore, there is no applicable provision more specific than the Due Process Clause and the more-specific-provision rule does not apply. A separate due process analysis is required. The protections of the Eighth Amendment and Due Process Clauses are sometimes, but not always, the same. . . We need not delve into the differences between those two analyses in this context, however. This is a suit against supervisory officials, for the creation of policies and practices. Supervisory policy-and-practice liability requires deliberate indifference. A.M. ex rel. J.M.K., 372 F.3d at 586. Thus, for the same reasons as in our Eighth Amendment analysis, we conclude that there is no genuine dispute of material fact as to deliberate indifference under the Fourteenth Amendment.")

Palakovic v. Wetzel, 854 F.3d 209, 225 n.17, 233 (3d Cir. 2017) ("A supervisor may be directly liable under the deliberate indifference test set forth in Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825 (1994), if the supervisor 'knew or w[as] aware of and disregarded an excessive risk to the plaintiff['s] health or safety[.]'. . . A plaintiff 'can show this by establishing that the risk was obvious.'. . There is some question as to whether a supervisor may be held indirectly liable for deficient policies under Sample v. Diecks, 885 F.2d 1099, 1118 (3d Cir. 1989)), as the Supreme Court may have called the so-called Sample test into question in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). Because the Palakovics have plausibly alleged a claim based on direct supervisory liability, we need not consider the unresolved nature of the Sample test today. . . . The Palakovics claimed that the supervisory defendants established a policy whereby mentally ill and suicidal prisoners like Brandon were repeatedly placed in solitary confinement rather than provided with adequate mental health treatment. . . . According to the Palakovics, despite the risk and the obviousness of the need to correct it, the supervisors failed to train officials on how to recognize and properly manage seriously mentally ill and suicidal prisoners, failed to provide suicide prevention training, failed to provide training on the adverse impact of solitary confinement on those with mental illness, and failed to train non-medical staff on the importance of consulting with mental health care providers concerning discipline and management of mentally ill prisoners. The supervisors were alleged to have provided essentially no training on suicide, mental health, or the impact of solitary confinement, and simply acquiesced in the repeated placement of mentally ill prisoners like Brandon in solitary confinement. According to the Palakovics, the supervisors were responsible for the policies concerning the treatment of mentally ill prisoners that gave rise to an unreasonable risk of Brandon's suicide, as well as the failure to provide specific types of training that could reasonably have prevented it. We must take the factual allegations of the amended complaint as true, and those facts are sufficient to support claims against the supervisory defendants.") Jankowski v. Lellock, 649 F. App'x 184, 187-88 (3d Cir. 2016) ("Once this supervisory relationship is established, we have articulated two ways in which a supervisor may be liable for unconstitutional actions undertaken by a subordinate. First, liability may attach if the supervisor, '"with deliberate indifference to the consequences, established and maintained a policy, practice or custom which directly caused [the] constitutional harm."'. . This standard encompasses Jankowski's failure to train claim, and specifically requires (1) deliberate indifference and (2) direct causation. . . Second, at least prior to Iqbal, 'a supervisor may be personally liable under § 1983 if he or she participated in violating the plaintiff's rights, directed others to violate them, or, as the person in charge, had knowledge of and acquiesced' in the subordinate's unconstitutional conduct. . . . '[W]e have refrained from answering the question of whether Iqbal eliminated—or at least narrowed the scope of—supervisory liability because it was ultimately unnecessary to do so in order to dispose of the appeal then before us.'. . As in Argueta, we 'make the same choice here because we determine that [Jankowski] failed to allege a plausible claim to relief on the basis of the supervisors' "knowledge and acquiescence" or any other similar theory of liability.'. . Applying this legal framework to the facts in Jankowski's second amended complaint convinces us that the District Court correctly dismissed the claims against both Meyers–Jeffrey and Zangaro. First, Jankowski never alleges that either Meyers–Jeffrey, who was merely an aide in the detention classroom, or Zangaro had any supervisory or actual authority. . . over Lellock, thus immediately casting serious doubt on both claims. Second, Jankowski's second amended complaint, stripped of its conclusory allegations, pleads very few facts, none of which transform his claims into anything more than pure speculation. This is so because Jankowski relies primarily on the strength of an inference that we believe is unreasonable. He argues that because Lellock (1) pulled approximately twenty-two male students out of detention over the course of the school year to talk to them individually and (2) did so in apparent violation of a district policy forbidding the removal of students from a classroom, it was 'obvious' that Lellock was intending to have 'private one-on-one encounters with those male students.' Thus, he concludes that Meyers–Jeffrey and Zangaro knew or should have known that Lellock was sexually abusing these students. We cannot agree with Jankowski that this final inference is reasonable in light of the facts alleged. Assuming that either or both individuals did have actual authority over Lellock, supervisory liability still requires a plaintiff to show that the supervisor knew about and acquiesced in the subordinate's unconstitutional conduct. . . Jankowski has not met this standard for either Meyers–Jeffrey or Zangaro. Mere knowledge that students are being pulled from class to speak with a school police officer in violation of a district policy does not lead one to reasonably conclude that those students are then being sexually assaulted by that officer. The facts alleged, therefore, do not support the claim that either Meyers–Jeffrey or Zangaro actually knew about Lellock's conduct during the 1998–1999 school year. . . Thus, we hold that both claims of supervisory liability were properly dismissed by the District Court.")

Chavarriaga v. New Jersey Dep't of Corr., 806 F.3d 210, 227, 229-30, 232-33 (3d Cir. 2015) ("[T]he inmate must identify the supervisor's specific acts or omissions demonstrating the supervisor's deliberate indifference to the inmate's risk of injury and must establish a link between the supervisor, the act, and the injury. . . .We are satisfied that appellant's allegations that Brown intentionally denied her potable water for three days or was deliberately indifferent to the denial were insufficient to impose liability on Brown because appellant did not adequately allege facts attributing the denial to Brown. Although the complaint pleaded that Brown was one of an unspecified number of supervisors of the correctional officers who interacted with appellant, appellant did not make specific allegations concerning Brown's duties as a supervisor, or her interactions or communications with correctional officers in general, let alone with the officers directly involved with appellant's custody. The complaint did allege that Brown forced appellant to drink water 'from a dirty toilet bowl,' but this allegation was conclusory because appellant did not plead that Brown gave a direction for appellant to drink in this way. It is clear that appellant based her complaint against Brown for the denial of water on the actions of subordinate personnel, and thus appellant was seeking to place liability on Brown on a respondeat superior theory or was alleging that Brown was liable on some other theory merely because of her position as a supervisor. But Brown's position as a supervisor without more did not make her responsible for her subordinates' conduct. Accordingly, we cannot infer from the factual allegations in the complaint that Brown should have been alerted to a history of mistreatment of inmates in general or of appellant in particular. . . . We also are satisfied that appellant did not adequately plead that Brown was instrumental in requiring her to go to the shower or otherwise be naked while in the presence of male prison personnel and inmates and in not supplying her with sanitary napkins and medications. Rather, though she did plead that Brown directed that her clothing be taken from her, her allegations with respect to the walk to the shower or otherwise be naked in the presence of male prison personnel and inmates and the denial of sanitary napkins and medications are generalized with respect to the individuals responsible for these actions. Although appellant did not adequately plead that Brown should have known that she was deprived of water for three days, we reiterate our rejection of the District Court's conclusion that the deprivations of potable water in this case could not be cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. . . Thus, while we uphold the grant of summary judgment on the denial of potable water as well as on the naked shower walk and other naked exposures and the denial of sanitary napkin and medications claims in Brown's favor, we will reverse the District Court's dismissal of the Eighth Amendment claims against the unknown defendants that appellant alleged were responsible for these deprivations and will remand the case for further proceedings on these claims. . . . Notwithstanding our foregoing discussion, we hold that the District Court correctly granted Brown summary judgment on appellant's Eighth Amendment body cavity search claim. In her brief, appellant attempts to implicate Brown in her manual body cavity search by claiming that 'Jane Doe's simultaneous digital penetration of plaintiff's vagina and rectum was committed in the presence of her direct supervisor, Sgt. Brown.'. . Yet this statement, though quite specific, was in appellant's brief and not her complaint, and is of questionable significance as she goes on in her brief to indicate that Brown 'evidently authorized and supervised' the search, a comment that suggests that she only is surmising that Brown was involved in the search. . . In any event, appellant by making these allegations in her brief cannot overcome the lack of an adequate pleading in her complaint alleging with specificity that Brown was involved in the search. In fact, although appellant did allege in her complaint that Brown 'supervised various DOC personnel,' she did not allege that Brown supervised Jane Doe. . . Although a court on a motion to dismiss ordinarily 'must accept the allegations in the complaint as true,' it is not compelled to accept assertions in a brief without support in the pleadings. . . After all, a brief is not a pleading. We therefore will affirm the District Court's grant of summary judgment on the body cavity claim in favor of Brown.") Parkell v. Markell, 622 F. App'x 136, 140 (3d Cir. 2015) ("To establish that a supervisor was deliberately indifferent, Parkell must identify a specific policy or practice that the supervising official failed to employ and show that the existing policy or procedure created an unreasonable risk of a constitutional violation, that the official was aware of but indifferent to the risk, and that the policy or procedure caused constitutional injury. . . We have held that these elements are met where the supervisor 'failed to respond appropriately in the face of an awareness of a pattern of such injuries' or where 'the risk of constitutionally cognizable harm is so great and so obvious that the risk and the failure of supervisory officials to respond will alone support' a finding of deliberate indifference. . .We cannot infer from Parkell's allegations, even construed liberally, that Markell or Biden—even if they allegedly failed to build more prison space or pursue institutional reform—either played a role in determining the prison conditions creating the risk of his injury, or were aware of that risk. . . While the case against Morgan and Coupe is closer, Parkell's allegations are too conclusory to support an inference of deliberate indifference. . . Parkell does not indicate, for example, how frequently fights over provisions occurred prior to his, how many had resulted in serious injury, and what prison guards' actual response—outside of sounding an emergency alert—to such fighting consisted of. His complaint therefore does not plausibly suggest that the type of violent dispute causing his injury was so pervasive, injurious, and predictable, and guards' typical responses so ineffectual, that Morgan and Coupe must have been aware of a problem merely by virtue of their institutional roles. . . However, Parkell's allegations as to Morgan and Coupe are not so implausible as to be factually or legally frivolous. . . He conceivably could address their deficiencies so as to nudge his failure-to-protect claim over the line into plausibility. . . The District Court erred in denying Parkell an opportunity to amend his complaint and flesh out his claim against Morgan and Coupe.")

Hammond v. City of Wilkes-Barre, 600 F. App'x 833, 838 n.8 (3d Cir. 2015) ("As we noted in Santiago, courts 'have expressed uncertainty as to the viability and scope of supervisory liability after [Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009)].'. . We need not address whether the scope of supervisory liability has narrowed, as Defendants are entitled to summary judgment 'even under our existing supervisory liability test.'")

Barkes v. First Corr. Med., Inc., 766 F.3d 307, 316-25 (3d Cir. 2014), rev'd on other grounds sub nom. Taylor v. Barkes, 135 S. Ct. 2042 (2015) ("Before discussing the District Court's qualified immunity analysis, it is necessary first to consider whether and to what extent our precedent on supervisory liability in the Eighth Amendment context was altered by the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). Though we have in the past declined 'to wade into the muddied waters of post-Iqbal "supervisory liability,"' Bistrian v. Levi, 696 F.3d 352, 366 n. 5 (3d Cir.2012); see also Argueta v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 643 F.3d 60, 69–70 (3d Cir.2011), we find it appropriate to do so now. . . . 'Failure to' claims—failure to train, failure to discipline, or, as is the case here, failure to supervise—are generally considered a subcategory of policy or practice liability. . . . We developed a four-part test for determining whether an official may be held liable on a claim for a failure to supervise. The plaintiff must identify a supervisory policy or practice that the supervisor failed to employ, and then prove that: (1) the policy or procedures in effect at the time of the alleged injury created an unreasonable risk of a constitutional violation; (2) the defendant-official was aware that the policy created an unreasonable risk; (3) the defendant was indifferent to that risk; and (4) the constitutional injury was caused by the failure to implement the supervisory practice or procedure. . . In this Circuit, when a plaintiff seeks to hold a defendant liable under the Eighth Amendment in his or her role as a supervisor, 'Sample's four-part test provides the analytical structure ..., it being simply the deliberate indifference test applied to the specific situation of a policymaker.'. .Which brings us to Iqbal. . . . [T]he Court expressly tied the level of intent necessary for superintendent liability to the underlying constitutional tort. . . .This aspect of Iqbal has bedeviled the Courts of Appeals to have considered it, producing varied interpretations of its effect on supervisory liability. . . . Most courts have gravitated to the center, recognizing that because the state of mind necessary to establish a § 1983 or Bivens claim varies with the constitutional provision at issue, so too does the state of mind necessary to trigger liability in a supervisory capacity. The Tenth Circuit, for example, held that, after Iqbal, § 1983 liability may attach to 'a defendant-supervisor who creates, promulgates, implements, or in some other way possesses responsibility for the continued operation of a policy the enforcement (by the defendant-supervisor or her subordinates) of which "subjects, or causes to be subjected,"' the plaintiff to a constitutional deprivation, if the supervisor 'acted with the state of mind required to establish the alleged constitutional deprivation.' Dodds v. Richardson, 614 F.3d 1185, 1199 (10th Cir.2010) (emphasis added). . . .The Ninth Circuit agreed with this view in Starr v. Baca, seeing 'nothing in Iqbal indicating that the Supreme Court intended to overturn longstanding case law on deliberate indifference claims against supervisors in conditions of confinement cases.'. . .We do not read Iqbal to have abolished supervisory liability in its entirety. Rather, we agree with those courts that have held that, under Iqbal, the level of intent necessary to establish supervisory liability will vary with the underlying constitutional tort alleged. In this case, the underlying tort is the denial of adequate medical care in violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment, and the accompanying mental state is subjective deliberate indifference. . . . Accordingly, we hold that the standard we announced in Sample for imposing supervisory liability based on an Eighth Amendment violation is consistent with Iqbal. We leave for another day the question whether and under what circumstances a claim for supervisory liability derived from a violation of a different constitutional provision remains valid. . . . Our dissenting colleague disagrees with our conclusion that Sample has survived Iqbal. In his view, a supervisor can be held liable under the Eighth Amendment only if he committed an affirmative 'action[ ],' was 'personal [ly] involve[d] in his subordinates' misfeasance,' and acted with 'intentional ... deliberate indifference.'. . Our colleague claims that his position recognizes that 'there's no special rule of liability for supervisors' and that 'the test for them is the same as the test for everyone else.'. . But in fact the opposite is true: his test would immunize from liability prison officials who were deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk that inmates' serious medical conditions were being mistreated or not treated at all. . . Simply because an official may have a senior position in the DOC does not make him free to ignore substantial dangers to inmate health and safety. . . .Treating supervisors and subordinates equally under the Eighth Amendment does not mean ignoring the different ways in which each type of officer can, with deliberate indifference, expose inmates to constitutional injury. We think our dissenting colleague fails to recognize this fact, and in doing so makes three significant analytical errors. We address each below. . . . [E]xcessive force claims are different than conditions of confinement claims: instead of deliberate indifference, they require a plaintiff to show that 'officials applied force "maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm," or ... with "a knowing willingness that [harm] occur."'. . .The Dissent's position neglects the black-letter principle that the type of Eighth Amendment claim alleged here can be shown by an act or an omission. . . . Under the Eighth Amendment, prison officials, from the bottom up, may be liable if by act or omission they display a deliberate indifference to a known risk of substantial harm to an inmate's health or safety. . . The omission alleged here is the deliberately indifferent failure to enforce FCM's compliance with proper suicide-prevention protocols, as required under FCM's contract with the DOC. As we will discuss, there is a material factual dispute on this point. . . . The Dissent would require both that the supervisor 'personally display [ed] deliberate indifference,'. . . and that the supervisor was 'personal[ly] involve[d] in his subordinates' misfeasance[.]'. . . With respect to the former observation, we agree, which is why our decision requires subjective deliberate indifference on the part of the offending officer. . . With respect to the latter, the Dissent misinterprets the rules for Eighth Amendment liability under *Farmer.*The Dissent asserts that, by affirming Sample's vitality post-Iqbal, our decision wrongly applies an objective, rather than a subjective, test for evaluating deliberate indifference, in contravention of Farmer. This criticism is unpersuasive for two reasons. . . . Far from being patently objective, Sample's test is explicitly concerned with the officer's subjective knowledge. . . .To be sure, Sample stated that it derived its test '[b]ased on City of Canton,'. . . but the actual test that it articulated clearly sounds in subjectivity. . . . [T]his brings us to the second reason that the Dissent's objection fails: the test that we derive from Sample and apply in this case cannot be described as anything but subjective, and is thus entirely consistent with Farmer. . . . To the extent that Sample approved, in some circumstances, an objective test for determining a prison official's Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference, that portion of Sample has been abrogated by Farmer and it is not the test we apply today. Recognizing that our test does, in fact, require an official's subjective deliberate indifference, the Dissent pivots and claims that the plaintiff must nonetheless plead that the supervisor was 'personal[ly] involve[d] in his subordinates' misfeasance.'. . The Dissent's rule would have the practical effect of requiring that a supervisor have personal knowledge of an individual inmate, that inmate's particular serious medical need, and of the prison staff's failure to treat that need, before the supervisor could ever be held liable for deliberate indifference. But Farmer itself recognized that a prison official cannot avoid liability under the Eighth Amendment simply 'by showing that, while he was aware of an obvious, substantial risk to inmate safety, he did not know that the complainant was especially likely to' suffer a constitutional injury. . . What the Dissent fundamentally fails to recognize is that there are different ways that prison officials can be responsible for causing an inmate harm. . . . [W]here there is evidence of serious inadequacies in the provision of adequate medical care for inmates, and there is evidence that prison officials were aware of the problem and yet indifferent to the risk that an inmate would suffer a constitutional injury, they can be held liable under § 1983 for violating the Eighth Amendment.") Barkes v. First Corr. Med., Inc., 766 F.3d 307, 332, 336-44 (3d Cir. 2014) (Hardiman, J., dissenting), rev'd on other grounds sub nom. Taylor v. Barkes, 135 S. Ct. 2042 (2015) ("Today the Court holds that two of the most senior executives in the Delaware prison system must stand trial for the suicide of Christopher Barkes. In my view, this decision is a classic case of holding supervisors vicariously liable, a practice the Supreme Court proscribed in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). The majority accomplishes this feat by attempting to salvage the supervisory liability doctrine we created twenty years before Iqbal in Sample v. Diecks, 885 F.2d 1099 (3d Cir.1989). As I shall explain, Sample has been abrogated by Iqbal. And even assuming I am wrong about Sample's abrogation, Defendants Taylor and Williams are still entitled to summary judgment because Barkes has not complied with Sample's requirement that she identify a specific supervisory practice or procedure that they failed to employ. I respectfully dissent. . . . Since Iqbal, supervisory liability claims must spring from 'actions' or 'misconduct,'. . . . [T]he mere fact that the supervisor occupied a position of authority is insufficient. Accordingly, the overwhelming weight of authority requires plaintiffs to establish the supervisor's personal involvement in his subordinates' misfeasance. . . The courts of appeals requiring the supervisor's personal involvement—i.e., the Fifth, Seventh, Eighth, and Tenth Circuits—have upheld supervisory liability claims when the challenged policy originates with the supervisor or he contributes to its unlawfulness. . . None of those courts of appeals has upheld a so-called 'failure-to' claim, in which subordinates violate the law while the supervisor fails to take remedial action. Decisions of both the Seventh and Tenth Circuits illustrate the fundamental dichotomy between cases involving the supervisors' personal involvement on the one hand and those relying on the supervisor's position of authority. [Discussing cases] Like the Seventh and Tenth Circuits, the Fifth and Eighth Circuits have rejected similar 'failure-to' claims after Iqbal. [Discussing cases] When the Ninth Circuit faced a 'failure-to' claim in Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202 (9th Cir.2011), it departed from the approaches taken by the Fifth, Seventh, Eighth, and Tenth Circuits. Contrary to the other four courts of appeals, the Ninth Circuit upheld an Eighth Amendment supervisory liability claim against a sheriff 'because he knew or should have known about the dangers in the [jail], and ... was deliberately indifferent to those dangers.'. . The plaintiff's complaint contained detailed allegations concerning the sheriff's knowledge of his subordinates' unlawfulness. . . In determining the sheriff's culpability for his inaction, however, the Court permitted the claim to go forward because a state statute held the sheriff 'answerable for the prisoner's safekeeping.'. . In a vigorous dissent, Judge Trott claimed that the 'complaint has all the hallmarks of an attempted end run around the prohibition against using the vicarious liability doctrine of respondeat superior to get at the boss.'. . .In light of Iqbal, we must also overrule the framework we adopted for supervisory liability claims in Sample v. Diecks, 885 F.2d 1099 (3d Cir.1989). . . . [A]fter denuding Sample of its objective quality, the majority upholds a test that does not require the plaintiff to plead personal involvement by the supervisor. Under Sample, the plaintiff need only establish a 'supervisory practice or procedure that [the supervisor] failed to employ.' Sample, 885 F.2d at 1118. That is a far cry from the 'personally displayed deliberate indifference,' Nelson, 585 F.3d at 535, or 'deliberate, intentional act,' Porro, 624 F.3d at 1327–28; Dodds, 614 F.3d at 1195, that our sister circuits have required after Iqbal. 'Simply put, there's no special rule of liability for supervisors. The test for them is the same as the test for everyone else.'. . None of the cases discussed—not even the Ninth Circuit's decision in Starr—has upheld a special test that applies only to supervisors. The majority disagrees, saying Sample's 'essence' is deliberate indifference, . . . so we should continue to treat supervisors differently. Only by doing so, can the majority circumvent the District Court's prior holdings that the record does not show deliberate indifference. . . Sample's unique combination of elements applies only to the supervisory form of deliberate indifference and permits Barkes to take her claim to trial without alleging Taylor and Williams's personal involvement. With due respect to my colleagues' concern that Iqbal has 'bedeviled' the courts of appeals, . . .I perceive near unanimous agreement among our sister circuits. Barkes's claim plainly seeks to hold Taylor and Williams vicariously liable for, in Barkes's words, 'presid[ing] over a system,'. . . that she deems unlawful. Today's decision invites plaintiffs to sue senior government officials whenever prison guards use force against an inmate or police officers mistreat a suspect. Regrettably, it exposes Commissioner Taylor and Delaware's prison wardens to lawsuits from any Delaware inmate with a complaint about FCM's services. . . . None of the courts that have considered Iqbal have applied a standard like Sample's, as the majority does today. The District Court's prior decision that Barkes cannot prove Taylor and Williams's deliberate indifference combined with the absence of any allegation of personal involvement on their part, entitles them to qualified immunity. . . .Even had Iqbal not substantially changed the law of supervisory liability and had Sample remained good law, I would still hold that Taylor and Williams are entitled to summary judgment. . . . . Judge Farnan granted them summary judgment on the first supervisory liability claim because Barkes failed to meet Sample's threshold requirement. Barkes did not allege in her third amended complaint a specific supervisory practice that Taylor and Williams should have performed, and any allegations that Taylor and Williams should have 'enforced' the contract would do nothing to cure that omission. The District Court should have granted Taylor's and Williams's motion for summary judgment on the supervisory liability claim for the same reasons Judge Farnan did on the earlier supervisory liability claim.")

Valdez v. Danberg, 576 F. App'x 97, 100 (3d Cir. 2014) ("We have recognized two theories of supervisory responsibility: (1) where a supervisor establishes and maintains a policy, practice or custom which directly causes a constitutional harm; and (2) where the supervisor participates in violating a plaintiff's rights, directs others to violate them, or has knowledge of and acquiesces in the violations. Santiago, 629 F.3d at 129 n. 5. See also Sample, 885 F.2d at 1116–17 (supervisory liability may be imposed only where the supervisor was the 'moving force' behind the constitutional tort).")

Lawal v. McDonald, 546 F. App'x 107, 113, 114 (3d Cir. 2014) ("As the District Court observed, the repeated and collective use of the word 'Defendants' 'fail[ed] to name which specific Defendant engaged in the specific conduct alleged.'. . As a result, the Amended Complaint is ambiguous about each Defendant's role in the operation and whether he committed the act himself or supervised other agents in doing so. In using the collective 'Defendants,' Plaintiffs alleged that each of the Defendants: (a) directed the PPA to send the letters to Plaintiffs advising them that they were entitled to a refund, to be picked up at the PPA facility; (b) attacked each driver, throwing him against a wall and handcuffing him; (c) was told by Plaintiffs that Plaintiffs were citizens; (d) interrogated each Plaintiff for more than one hour; (e) acknowledged to each Plaintiff that he 'had been mistakenly detained,' but (f) told them they were not permitted to leave; (g) held the Plaintiffs for several additional hours; and (h) prohibited them from speaking or standing. There is a serious question as to whether it is plausible that each of the three defendants committed all of the acts ascribed to them, particularly given the number of other individuals brought to the facility during the operation and the affidavits submitted with Defendants' motion to dismiss. . . In light of these ambiguities, the Amended Complaint may fail to meet Iqbal's directive that 'a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. .Moreover, given the very narrow potential claim upon which relief may be granted, it is difficult for Defendants to determine which of them are alleged to have held or directed others to hold Plaintiffs after their U.S. citizenship was verified and they were no longer suspected of violating the immigration laws. To the extent Plaintiffs seek to proceed on a theory of supervisory liability, the pleading likely requires further factual assertions linking the direction or act of an individual defendant to the alleged unconstitutional conduct. . .Thus, to resolve the ambiguity regarding the precise actions each individual Defendant allegedly took, we will provide Plaintiffs a final opportunity to file a pleading that provides the factual enhancements that specify the acts each individual Defendant . . . allegedly took, explains whether each Defendant personally engaged in the acts or if the actions were taken at the specific Defendant's direction, and includes facts concerning the reasonableness of Plaintiffs' detention. Of course, such a pleading must comply with Fed.R.Civ.P. 11. If Plaintiffs choose to file a Second Amended Complaint, the District Court will be free to entertain another motion to dismiss before permitting any discovery and determine whether Plaintiffs have alleged facts that demonstrate a specific Defendant plausibly engaged in an unreasonable seizure after they verified Plaintiffs' citizenship status, and, even if sufficiently alleged, whether the specific Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Zion v. Nassan, 556 F. App'x 103, 2014 WL 323373, *5 (3d Cir. Jan. 30, 2014) ("The amended complaint includes numerous allegations of Nassan's violent propensities before and during his employment as a Pennsylvania state trooper. The amended complaint specifically alleges that the supervisory defendants were aware of a 2008 jury finding that Nassan was liable for the shooting death of a twelve-year-old boy. . . The supervisors allegedly did not order additional training for Nassan, and one of them allegedly ordered a subordinate to alter Nassan's employment records. . . These allegations establish that the supervisory defendants were aware of a pattern of violent behavior by Nassan and did nothing to remedy the situation. At the time of the shooting, binding precedent held that a supervisor may be liable for his subordinate's constitutional violations if the supervisor 'had knowledge of and acquiesced in' the violations. A.M. ex rel. J.M.K. v. Luzerne Cnty. Juvenile Detention Ctr., 372 F.3d 572, 586 (3d Cir.2004). Because the legal norms allegedly violated by the supervisory defendants were clearly established at the time of the challenged actions, we will affirm the District Court's judgment as to the supervisory defendants as well.")

Bistrian v. Levi , 696 F.3d 352, 366 n.5 (3d Cir. 2012) ("This case gives us no occasion to wade into the muddied waters of post-Iqbal 'supervisory liability.' 'Numerous courts, including this one, have expressed uncertainty as to the viability and scope of supervisory liability after Iqbal.' Santiago, 629 F.3d at 130 n. 8 (collecting cases); see also Argueta, 643 F.3d at 70. Neither the parties nor the District Court mention 'supervisory liability' as a possible basis for recovery here. As we understand his claims, Bistrian alleges that the named defendants directly and personally participated in the alleged unconstitutional conduct. That is the only theory of recovery we consider.")

Argueta v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 643 F.3d 60, 70 (3d Cir. 2011) ("In this case, Plaintiffs never alleged in their Second Amended Complaint that Appellants actually adopted a facially unconstitutional policy. For instance, they did not claim that Appellants, as part of Operation Return to Sender, ever ordered ICE agents to storm into homes without obtaining the requisite consent. Plaintiffs instead claimed that these four individuals should be held accountable because, among other things, they knew of – and nevertheless acquiesced in - the unconstitutional conduct of their subordinates. The District Court determined that Plaintiffs could pursue a claim under the Fourth Amendment based on a 'knowledge and acquiescence' theory because the Fourth Amendment does not require proof of a discriminatory or unlawful purpose (and it further concluded that Appellants adequately alleged such a claim in their pleading). In response, Appellants have argued that: (1) at least after Iqbal, 'knowledge and acquiescence,' 'failure to train,' and similar theories of supervisory liability are not viable in the Bivens context and, on the contrary, a supervisor may be held liable only for his or her direct participation in the unconstitutional conduct; and (2) even under such now defunct theories of liability, Plaintiffs failed to allege a facially plausible Bivens claim against Appellants. We recently observed that '[n]umerous courts, including this one, have expressed uncertainty as to the viability and scope of supervisory liability after Iqbal.'. . To date, we have refrained from answering the question of whether Iqbal eliminated – or at least narrowed the scope of – supervisory liability because it was ultimately unnecessary to do so in order to dispose of the appeal then before us. . . We likewise make the same choice here because we determine that Plaintiffs failed to allege a plausible claim to relief on the basis of the supervisors' 'knowledge and acquiescence' or any other similar theory of liability. Accordingly, we need not (and do not) decide whether Appellants are correct that a supervisor may be held liable in the Bivens context only if he or she directly participates in unconstitutional conduct.") Argueta v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 643 F.3d 60, 72, 74-77 (3d Cir. 2011) ("[W]e assume for purposes of this appeal that a federal supervisory official may be liable in certain circumstances even though he or she did not directly participate in the underlying unconstitutional conduct. The District Court specifically concluded that a Fourth Amendment claim does not require a showing of a discriminatory purpose and that Plaintiffs could therefore proceed under a 'knowledge and acquiescence' theory. Plaintiffs acknowledge that the 'terminology' used to describe 'supervisory liability' is 'often mixed.'. . They contend that a supervisor may be held liable in certain circumstances for a failure to train, supervise, and discipline subordinates. . . . We accordingly stated in a § 1983 action that '[p]ersonal involvement can be shown through allegations of personal direction or of actual knowledge and acquiescence.' Rode v. Dellarciprete, 845 F.2d 1195, 1207 (3d Cir.1988). . . We further indicated that a supervisor may be liable under § 1983 if he or she implements a policy or practice that creates an unreasonable risk of a constitutional violation on the part of the subordinate and the supervisor's failure to change the policy or employ corrective practices is a cause of this unconstitutional conduct. . . . Having addressed the legal elements that a plaintiff must plead to state a legally cognizable claim, we turn to the remaining steps identified by Iqbal: (1) identifying those allegations that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to any assumption of truth; and (2) then determining whether the well-pleaded factual allegations plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief. . . We acknowledge that Plaintiffs filed an extensive and carefully drafted pleading, which certainly contained a number of troubling allegations especially with respect to alleged unconstitutional behavior on the part of lower-ranking ICE agents. Plaintiffs are also correct that, even after Iqbal, we must continue to accept all factual allegations as true, construe the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, and then determine whether a reasonable inference may be drawn that the defendant is liable for the alleged misconduct. . . .[W]e ultimately conclude that, like Iqbal, Plaintiffs failed to allege a plausible Bivens claim against the four Appellants. Initially, certain allegations in the Second Amended Complaint were conclusory in nature and merely provided, at best, a 'framework' for the otherwise appropriate factual allegations. . . For instance, the broad allegations regarding the existence of a 'culture of lawlessness' are accorded little if any weight in our analysis. . . We further note that the relevant counts in the pleading contained boilerplate allegations mimicking the purported legal standards for liability, which we do not assume to be true. We also must reject certain broad characterizations made by the District Court, which were not supported by either the actual factual allegations in the Second Amended Complaint or reasonable inferences from such allegations. Most significantly, the District Court went too far by stating that Myers and Torres 'worked on these issues everyday.'. . Turning to the non-conclusory factual allegations in the Second Amended Complaint, we begin with the critical issue of notice. Plaintiffs did reference an impressive amount of documentation that allegedly provided notice to Appellants of their subordinates' unconstitutional conduct. However, these alleged sources of notice were fatally flawed in one way or another. Broadly speaking, we must point out the typical 'notice' case seems to involve a prior incident or incidents of misconduct by a specific employee or group of employees, specific notice of such misconduct to their superiors, and then continued instances of misconduct by the same employee or employees. The typical case accordingly does not involve a 'knowledge and acquiescence' claim premised, for instance, on reports of subordinate misconduct in one state followed by misconduct by totally different subordinates in a completely different state. . . . Second, we observe that allegations specifically directed against Appellants themselves (unlike the allegations directed at the agents who actually carried out the raids) described conduct consistent with otherwise lawful behavior. . . In other words, a federal official specifically charged with enforcing federal immigration law appears to be acting lawfully when he or she increases arrest goals, praises a particular enforcement operation as a success, or characterizes a home entry and search as an attempt to locate someone (i.e., a fugitive alien). In fact, the qualified immunity doctrine exists to encourage vigorous and unflinching enforcement of the law. . . .We also agree with Appellants' assertion that Plaintiffs themselves did not really identify in their pleading what exactly Appellants should have done differently, whether with respect to specific training programs or other matters, that would have prevented the unconstitutional conduct. . . . We also cannot overlook the fact that Appellants themselves occupied relatively high-ranking positions in the federal hierarchy. . . .[T]he context here involved, at the very least, two very high-ranking federal officials based in Washington D.C. who were charged with supervising the enforcement of federal immigration law throughout the country (as well as two other officials responsible for supervising such enforcement throughout an entire state). . . . [W]e wish to emphasize that our ruling here does not leave Plaintiffs without any legal remedy for the alleged violation of the United States Constitution. Chavez, Galindo, and W.C. are still free to pursue their official capacity claims for injunctive relief against any further intimidation or unlawful entry into their home. Also, we do not address Plaintiffs' individual capacity claims for damages against the lower-ranking ICE agents named in the Second Amended Complaint.") Santiago v. Warminster Tp., 629 F.3d 121, 128-34 & n.8, n.10 (3d Cir. 2010) ("While we conclude that the Third Amended Complaint can be read as alleging liability based on the

Supervising Officers' own acts, we will nevertheless affirm the District Court's ruling because those allegations fail to meet the pleading requirements set forth by the Supreme Court in Twombly and Iqbal. . . . [A]ny claim that supervisors directed others to violate constitutional rights necessarily includes as an element an actual violation at the hands of subordinates. In addition, a plaintiff must allege a causal connection between the supervisor's direction and that violation, or, in other words, proximate causation. . . . Therefore, to state her claim against Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly, Santiago needs to have pled facts plausibly demonstrating that they directed Alpha Team to conduct the operation in a manner that they 'knew or should reasonably have known would cause [Alpha Team] to deprive [Santiago] of her constitutional rights.'. . .As to her claim against Lt. Springfield, Santiago must allege facts making it plausible that 'he had knowledge of [Alpha Team's use of excessive force during the raid]' and 'acquiesced in [Alpha Team's] violations.'. . . Numerous courts, including this one, have expressed uncertainty as to the viability and scope of supervisory liability after Iqbal. . . . Because we hold that Santiago's pleadings fail even under our existing supervisory liability test, we need not decide whether Iqbal requires us to narrow the scope of that test. . . . Santiago alleges that the plan developed and authorized by Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly 'specifically sought to have all occupants exit the Plaintiff's home, one at a time, with hands raised under threat of fire, patted down for weapons, and then handcuffed until the home had been cleared and searched.' Because this is nothing more than a recitation of what Santiago says the Alpha Team members did to her, it amounts to a conclusory assertion that what happened at the scene was ordered by the supervisors. While the allegations regarding Alpha Team's conduct are factual and more than merely the recitation of the elements of a cause of action, the allegation of supervisory liability is, in essence, that 'Murphy and Donnelly told Alpha team to do what they did' and is thus a 'formulaic recitation of the elements of a [supervisory liability] claim,' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct.. at 1951 (internal quotation marks omitted) – namely that Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly directed others in the violation of Santiago's rights. Saying that Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly 'specifically sought' to have happen what allegedly happened does not alter the fundamentally conclusory character of the allegation. . . Our conclusion in this regard is dictated by the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal. . . . In short, Santiago's allegations are 'naked assertion[s]' that Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly directed Alpha Team to conduct the operation in the allegedly excessive manner that they did and that Lt. Springfield acquiesced in Alpha Team's acts. As mere restatements of the elements of her supervisory liability claims, they are not entitled to the assumption of truth. However, it is crucial to recognize that our determination that these particular allegations do not deserve an assumption of truth does not end the analysis. It may still be that Santiago's supervisory liability claims are plausible in light of the non-conclusory factual allegations in the complaint. We therefore turn to those allegations to determine whether the claims are plausible. . . . In summary, the allegations against Alpha Team are that the officers ordered everyone to exit the house one at a time; that Santiago exited first under threat of fire; that Santiago was patted down in a demeaning fashion, found to be unarmed, and subsequently handcuffed; that the remaining occupants of the home then exited, some of whom were handcuffed while others were not; that Santiago's daughter was coerced into consenting to a search of the home; and that Santiago was left restrained for thirty minutes while her home was searched, during which time she had a heart attack. The question then becomes whether those allegations make it plausible that

Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly directed Alpha Team to conduct the operation in a manner that they 'knew or should reasonably have known would cause [Alpha Team] to deprive [Santiago] of her constitutional rights,'. . . or that Lt. Springfield 'had knowledge [that Alpha Team was using excessive force during the raid]' and 'acquiesced in [Alpha Team's] violations.'. . . [T]here is no basis in the complaint to conclude that excessive force was used on anyone except Santiago. Even if someone else had been subjected to excessive force, it is clear that the occupants were not being treated uniformly. Thus, Santiago's allegations undercut the notion of a plan for all occupants to be threatened with fire and handcuffed. While it is possible that there was such a plan, and that Alpha Team simply chose not to follow it, 'possibility' is no longer the touchstone for pleading sufficiency after Twombly and *Iqbal. Plausibility is what matters. Allegations that are 'merely consistent with a defendant's liability' or show the 'mere possibility of misconduct' are not enough. . . Here, given the disparate treatment of the occupants of the home, one plausible explanation is that the officers simply used their own discretion in determining how to treat each occupant. In contrast with that 'obvious alternative explanation' for the allegedly excessive use of force, the inference that the force was planned is not plausible. Where, as here, an operation results in the use of allegedly excessive force against only one of several people, that use of force does not, by itself, give rise to a plausible claim for supervisory liability against those who planned the operation. To hold otherwise would allow a plaintiff to pursue a supervisory liability claim anytime a planned operation resulted in excessive force, merely by describing the force used and appending the phrase 'and the Chief told them to do it.' Iqbal requires more. . . . We next ask whether the allegation that Lt. Springfield was placed in charge of the operation, coupled with what happened during the operation, makes it plausible that Lt. Springfield knew of and acquiesced in the use of excessive force against Santiago. Again, we conclude that it does not. The complaint implies but does not allege that Lt. Springfield was present during the operation. Assuming he was present, however, the complaint still does not aver that he knew of the allegedly excessive force, nor does it give rise to the reasonable inference that he was aware of the level of force used against one individual. . . . In sum, while Santiago's complaint contains sufficient allegations to show that the Supervising Officers planned and supervised the operation and that, during the operation, Alpha Team used arguably excessive force, her allegations do nothing more than assert the element of liability that the Supervising Officers specifically called for or acquiesced in that use of force. . . . The Third Amended Complaint was filed after the close of discovery. Consequently, there is no reason to believe that Santiago's conclusory allegations were simply the result of the relevant evidence being in the hands of the defendants. Under *Iqbal, however, the result would be the same even had no discovery been completed. We recognize that plaintiffs may face challenges in drafting claims despite an information asymmetry between plaintiffs and defendants. Given that reality, reasonable minds may take issue with Iqbal and urge a different balance between ensuring, on the one hand, access to the courts so that victims are able to obtain recompense and, on the other, ensuring that municipalities and police officers are not unnecessarily subjected to the burdens of litigation. . . The Supreme Court has struck the balance, however, and we abide by it.") constitutional violation by 'setting in motion' certain events which he knows or should know will result in a constitutional violation. . . Laffey asks us to adopt and apply a similar standard in this Bivens action and to find that Rackley, Plousis, and Elcik are liable because 'they pressured MVM into disciplining Laffey....' We have yet to apply such a standard in cases arising under § 1983, much less in the context of a Bivens action. Furthermore, we are hesitant to adopt this standard following Iqbal, a Bivens action in which the Supreme Court emphasized 'a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948 (emphasis added). And finally, although Laffey argues that Plousis, Rackley, and Elcik 'pressured' MVM into disciplining him, his complaint alleges insufficient facts to support such an inference. In sum, the District Court did not err because Laffey failed to allege facts sufficient to demonstrate that any individual Marshals Service defendant was responsible for his demotion or suspension.").

Bayer v. Monroe County Children and Youth Services, 577 F.3d 186, 191 n.5 (3d Cir. 2009) ("With respect to Bahl, the District Court recognized that he cannot be liable for this violation under § 1983 on a respondeat superior theory, and that plaintiffs 'instead must show that [he] played a personal role in violating their rights.'. . The court concluded that plaintiffs had created a triable issue 'as to whether Defendant Bahl had personal knowledge regarding the Fourteenth Amendment procedural due process violation.' In light of the Supreme Court's recent decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, No. 07-1015 (May 18, 2009), it is uncertain whether proof of such personal knowledge, with nothing more, would provide a sufficient basis for holding Bahl liable with respect to plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment claims under § 1983. . . . We need not resolve this matter here, however. As discussed infra, we believe qualified immunity shields both Dry and Bahl from liability for their conduct in this case; thus, Bahl would be entitled to such immunity whether his alleged liability under § 1983 were to derive from his own conduct or from his knowledge of Dry's conduct.").

Hall v. Phelps, No. 22-CV-480, 2024 WL 1052894, at *4-5 (M.D. Pa. Mar. 11, 2024) ("To establish knowledge and acquiescence of a subordinate's misconduct, a plaintiff must allege the defendant's (1) contemporaneous knowledge of the offending incident or knowledge of similar incidents in the past, and (2) actions or inactions which communicated approval of the subordinate's behavior. . . A plaintiff may not allege that a supervisory defendant had constructive knowledge of a subordinate's unconstitutional conduct simply because of his role as a supervisor. . . Furthermore, failure to train only amounts to deliberate indifference 'where the need for more or different training is obvious' and the lack of training can be expected to result in constitutional violations. . . Evanchick argues that Plaintiffs do not plead his personal involvement in the alleged violation of Christian's constitutional rights i.e., be free from excessive and deadly force. . .Whereas Plaintiffs argue that the facts in their complaint show Evanchick tolerated and actively encouraged the use of excessive force by subordinates by intentional[ly] using his authority as a supervisor to cover up and excuse wrongdoing. In support of this argument Plaintiff's point to Evanchick's pled conduct after Christian died, namely his personal involvement in publishing a since contradicted official statement about Christian's death, failing to comply with Plaintiff's subpoena, and refusing to identify the trooper that fired the fatal shots. However, none of these subsequent actions or inactions are relevant to the court's analysis which turns on what Evanchick did or failed to do before Christian was shot and killed. . . . Unlike in Zion, Plaintiffs here do not allege that either of the troopers who shot Christian have violent histories including past civil verdicts against them, nor do they allege that Evanchick had any knowledge of such history. However, like in Barber they do allege that Evanchick occupied a position of responsibility, in which he should have known other PSP troopers, as noted above, had used excessive deadly force on individuals experiencing mental health emergencies like Christian did on December 30, 2020. While unlike in Barber Plaintiffs do not specifically allege legal claims were filed against that trooper or other PSP employees for similar conduct, they do allege that the PSP itself investigated the deadly force incidents involving them. Such investigations should have put Evanchick on notice of PSP troopers potentially unconstitutional use of excessive and deadly force against suicidal persons and alerted him to the need for further training and supervision. As pled Evanchick had knowledge or was at least deliberately indifferent to ongoing constitutional issues or problems within the PSP, and authority or means to address the matters, but, ultimately, failed to take appropriate action. Accordingly, Plaintiffs at this stage of the litigation plausibly plead a supervisory liability claim against Evanchick based on excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment.")

Castellani v. City of Atl. City, No. CV 13-5848 (JBS/AMD), 2017 WL 3112820, at *16-17 (D.N.J. July 21, 2017) ("The availability of a supervisory liability theory for excessive force claims is unclear since the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). See Argueta v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 643 F.3d 60, 70 (3d Cir. 2011)("To date, we have refrained from the answering the question of whether Iqbal eliminated—or at least narrowed the scope of—supervisory liability ... [w]e likewise make the same choice here...."). Plaintiff argues that the Court should employ the Eighth Amendment supervisory liability analysis from Barkes v. First Correctional Medical, Inv., 766 F.3d 307, 316 (3d Cir. 2014), rev'd on other grounds sub nom, Taylor v. Barkes, 124 S. Ct. 2042 (2015), which permits supervisory liability where the supervisor acted with deliberate indifference in maintaining a custom or policy that directly caused the violation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . .Defendant Hall, on the other hand, relies on Ricker v. Weston, 27 Fed.Appx. 113 (3d Cir. 2002), which, while concededly an unpublished decision, addresses supervisor liability in the context of an allegation of excessive force. The Ricker court held that a supervisor may be liable under § 1983 for his subordinate's lawful conduct 'if he or she directed, encouraged, tolerated, or acquiesced in that conduct,' but for liability to attach, 'there must exist a causal link between the supervisor's action or inaction and the plaintiff's injury.'. . In other words, the supervisor 'must be directly and actively involved in the subordinate's unconstitutional conduct.'. . In Ricker, the court granted the supervisors' motion for summary judgment because there was 'simply no causal link' between Plaintiff's injuries and what the supervisors did or did not do. . . .Defendant Hall further argues that even if some form of supervisor liability in the context of an excessive force claim still exists post Iqbal, Plaintiff's claim still fails because for liability to be established under a deliberate indifference standard, the plaintiff must preliminarily establish that the supervisor is a policymaker. A.M. ex rel. J.M.K. v.

Luzerne Cnty. Juvenile Det. Ctr., 372 F.3d 572, 586 (3d Cir. 2004). Defendant argues that Plaintiff has presented no evidence that Hall was a policymaker, as he was a working police sergeant in a large police department, whose only role was to gather information on K-9 handler candidates and produce it to the hiring committee. . . . The Court finds that Plaintiff has failed to raise any genuine dispute of material fact as to Defendant Hall's supervisory liability. Defendant Hall was not the policymaker in this situation, and there is no indication that Hall actually selected Wheaten for the position of K9 Handler, nor that he directed the officers to attack. In the alternative, Defendant Hall asserts qualified immunity, and Plaintiff does not oppose. Plaintiff has not established that Defendant Hall violated a clearly established constitutional right, as he has not identified a case where a supervisor acting under similar circumstances as Hall was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment. See White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 552 (2017)(reiterating that the clearly established law must be "particularized" to the facts of the case, and should not be defined "at a high level of generality").")

Wilson v. Gilmore, No. 14CV1654, 2015 WL 3866531, at *6 (W.D. Pa. June 22, 2015) ("Taking as true Plaintiff's allegations concerning Superintendent Gilmore's failure to train and supervise, Plaintiff has stated a plausible claim for relief that Superintendent Gilmore's practice of failing to train and supervise his employees on the DOC's policies regarding use of force, use of restraints, and access to medical care created an unreasonable risk that a constitutional injury would occur, of which he was aware and indifferent to, and which resulted in an injury to Plaintiff. Specifically, Plaintiff has alleged that Superintendent Gilmore was responsible in his position of authority to ensure his correctional officers were trained on use of force, use of restraints, and access to medical care policies and the failure to perform this function created an unreasonable risk of injury. Whether the facts at issue here constitute a constitutional violation is inappropriate for the Court to determine at this juncture. Plaintiff also alleges that Superintendent Gilmore 'tolerated, encouraged, and acquiesced in a practice of excessive use of force by correctional officers at Greene through his failure to appropriately discipline those he knew had violated DOC policy on use of force, application of restraints, and access to medical care.'. . . He further alleges that Superintendent Gilmore acquiesced in the security office's practice of ignoring prisoner complaints of abuse. . . Taking these allegations as true, Plaintiff has stated a plausible claim that Superintendent Gilmore's actions of ignoring inmate abuse complaints and failing to discipline correctional officers for violating the aforementioned DOC policies created an unreasonable risk that the officers, including the other defendants, would violate these policies knowing that they would not be disciplined for such conduct and that these actions indirectly caused his injuries. Accordingly, Plaintiff has sufficiently pled the requisite level of personal involvement as to Superintendent Gilmore and the Defendant's motion should therefore be denied.")

Moore v. Mann, No. 3:CV-13-2771, 2015 WL 3755045, at *4 (M.D. Pa. June 16, 2015) ("Courts have found that an allegation that an official ignored correspondence from an inmate, and that the requesting of an investigation of his allegations, is insufficient to impose liability on the supervisory official. . . While under some circumstances a letter alerting local prison officials, who are in a position to take steps to protect an inmate, may impose such duties to take reasonable measures to guarantee the safety of the inmate, such is not the case here. Wetzel was not employed at SCI–Coal Township. Further, as Plaintiff admits, by the time he became aware of the allegations via the letter Plaintiff wrote to the Office of Professional Responsibility, the matter was under investigation. . . For these reasons, the claims set forth against Defendant Wetzel will be dismissed from the complaint.")

Doe v. New Jersey Dep't of Corr., No. CIV.A. 14-5284 FLW, 2015 WL 3448233, at *10 (D.N.J. May 29, 2015) ("Pursuant to Barkes, the Court analyzes whether Plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to show that (1) a policy or procedure in effect at the time of the alleged injury created an unreasonable risk of a constitutional violation; (2) that Defendant Lanigan was aware that the policy or procedure created an unreasonable risk; (3) that Defendant Lanigan was indifferent to that risk; and (4) that the constitutional injury was caused by the failure to implement the supervisory procedure. Plaintiff's Complaint identifies Defendant Lanigan as a policymaker who is responsible for 'the implementation and enforcement of policies and procedures ... to ensure the physical and emotional safety and well-being of an inmate such as the Plaintiff.'. . Plaintiff's Complaint details a pattern of violent assaults against him by correctional officers and inmates, which were purportedly precipitated by his status as a cooperating witness in the prosecutions of high profile gang members and the mistaken belief among correctional officers that he had also cooperated in the prosecution of a former NJSP correctional officer. In count six, captioned 'Policymaker and/or Supervisory Liability,' Plaintiff alleges, among other allegedly deficient policies, that the NJSP policies regarding protection of cooperating witness were deficient because those policies failed to 'protect, secure, and segregate inmates who have cooperated with law enforcement-especially in a criminal case that involves employees of the NJDOC itself and/or involves violent inmate gang members.'. . Plaintiff further contends that '[i]nmates who have cooperated in cases involving NJDOC employees, particularly Correction Officers, should be transferred out of State and their safety should be ensured[.]'. . The Court also finds that Plaintiff has adequately pleaded the knowledge requirement with respect to Defendant Lanigan. Notably, after the first three assaults by correctional officers, but months before the assault by Defendant McNair on July 24, 2014, Plaintiff's mother allegedly sent letters to upper management and policy makers in the NJDOC in an effort to notify high ranking prison officials about her son's plight. The July 25, 2014 letter from Plaintiff's attorney to Defendant Lanigan, attached as an exhibit to the Complaint and sent after the last violent attack, also references correspondence sent to the Office of the Attorney General during 2013–2014, allegedly to notify state officials about the assaults on and threats against Plaintiff. Plaintiff alleges that the earlier attacks by Defendants Avino and Ortiz resulted in the termination of Defendant Avino and prompted an internal investigation within NJSP. Assuming the truth of these allegations for purposes of the motion to dismiss and giving all favorable inferences to Plaintiff, it is hardly implausible to draw the inference that Defendant Lanigan was aware of Plaintiff's particular plight prior to the attack on July 24, 2014. As explained in Barkes, to meet the knowledge requirement for supervisory liability, a supervisor need not have specific or knowledge of a particular inmate's situation in order to hold the supervisor liable for deliberate indifference. . . Here, however, it is plausible under the facts pleaded in Plaintiff's Complaint that Defendant Lanigan was aware that Plaintiff was a repeated target of assault by correctional officers prior to the July 24, 2014 attack but did not institute any corrective policies, measures, training, or supervision to prevent further injury to Plaintiff. As such, because Plaintiff adequately states a claim for relief against Defendant Lanigan in his supervisory capacity and the State fails to offer additional arguments for dismissal, the State's motion to dismiss the Complaint as to Defendant Lanigan is denied without prejudice.")

Beenick v. LeFebvre, No. 4:14-CV-01562, 2015 WL 2344966, at *4-7 (M.D. Pa. May 14, 2015) ("As Plaintiff points out, Magistrate Judge Blewitt's report and recommendation failed to address the ways in which Barkes clarified Third Circuit law in the aftermath of the United States Supreme Court decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). It is true, as Magistrate Judge Blewitt acknowledged and Defendants argue, that government officials may not be held liable for the unconstitutional actions of their subordinates on a theory of respondeat superior. . . It was on this principle that Magistrate Judge Blewitt founded his analysis. In doing so, Magistrate Judge Blewitt unfortunately failed to recognize the myriad of ways in which Plaintiff had alleged that Dittsworth, Weavering, and Fagan, through their own individual actions, had violated his constitutional rights. To that end, Barkes reiterated that there are two general ways in which a supervisor-defendant can be held liable for the unconstitutional actions and conduct of their subordinates. . . The first is a direct liability theory, including a theory of knowledge and acquiescence, and the second is policy or practice liability, including a theory based on failure to supervise. In his complaint, Plaintiff specified only a failure to supervise claim in Count IV. However, throughout the complaint he utilizes language of knowledge and acquiescence. Consequently, the Court will address both theories as they apply to Plaintiff's allegations. . . . Although Iqbal arguably rejected supervisory liability predicated on a theory of knowledge and acquiescence, the Third Circuit has clarified through Barkes that the holding in Iqbal was dependent on the constitutional violation at issue. . . Because the claim presented in Iqbal—First and Fifth Amendment violations—required that the plaintiff prove that the perpetrator acted with a discriminatory purpose, it necessarily followed that the defendant supervisors need have possessed the same mental state. . . Therefore, the Barkes court concluded, 'the level of intent necessary to establish supervisory liability will vary with the underlying constitutional tort alleged. In this case, the underlying tort is ... [a] violation of the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment, and the accompanying mental state is subjective deliberate indifference.'. . However, following Iqbal, the Third Circuit has heightened its pleading bar for supervisory liability claims predicated on a theory of knowledge and acquiescence. . . [Discussing Santiago and Argueta] In the case at bar, Plaintiff alleges only that Defendants Dittsworth and Weavering knew that LeFebvre and Mandichak–McConnell routinely ordered prisoners to operate the meat slicer to slice food it was not intended to slice, without any safety precautions and without any training. He alleges more specifically that Defendant Fagan knew of this practice through her periodic inspections, observation, and through verbal and written communications from staff and prisoners. He further alleges that all of the supervisory defendants 'tolerated, condoned, acquiesced in, and encouraged the practice.' These allegations are insufficient to state a claim for supervisory liability under the Third Circuit's heightened pleading standards. As relates to Defendants Dittsworth and Weavering, the open-ended statement that they had knowledge of their subordinates' conduct is purely conclusory without any facts to support that statement. As for Defendant Fagan, the allegations against her are very similar to those articulated in Argueta in terms of specificity and abundance. As those allegations in Argueta were found to be insufficient, so too do we find them here. Consequently, to the extent Plaintiff's claim in count IV is predicated on a theory of knowledge and acquiescence, it is dismissed without prejudice, with leave to amend in accordance with this Court's decision to more explicitly state the circumstances and specifics of the Defendants' knowledge. . . .The second way in which a supervisor-defendant may be liable for the acts of its subordinates is if, 'with deliberate indifference to the consequences, [he or she] established and maintained a policy, practice or custom which directly caused [the] constitutional harm.'. . A subcategory of this type of policy or practice liability includes 'failure to' claims, including failure to train, failure to discipline, and most importantly for the matter before this Court, failure to supervise. . . The Barkes court went on to reaffirm the continued viability of its test for supervisory liability in the context of a failure to supervise claim under the Eighth Amendment, as originally articulated in Sample v. Diecks, 885 F.2d 1099 (3d Cir.1989). . . In that case, the Third Circuit developed a four-part test for establishing a claim based on the failure of a government official to supervise his or her subordinates. Specifically, '[t]he plaintiff must identify a supervisory policy or practice that the supervisor failed to employ, and then prove that: (1) the policy or procedures in effect at the time of the alleged injury created an unreasonable risk of a constitutional violation; (2) the defendant-official was aware that the policy created an unreasonable risk; (3) the defendant was indifferent to that risk; and (4) the constitutional injury was caused by the failure to implement the supervisory practice or procedure.'. . Moreover, the Barkes court explicitly rejected the notion that the defendant must have committed an affirmative act in order to be held liable under the Eighth Amendment. . . At this point in the litigation the Court need only consider whether Plaintiff has plead a cause of action for failure to supervise, not whether he has proven his claim. I find that he has done so. Specifically, Plaintiff has alleged that all three of the supervisory Defendants were responsible in their positions of authority to make protective gear available and to ensure that the meat-slicer would not be used without its blade guard. The failure to make available protective gear with a dangerous cutting instrument and the failure to train prisoners in the use of that instrument necessarily creates an unreasonable risk of injury, especially in the context of a prison environment where prisoners have less liberty to refuse to follow the order of a superior. Whether the facts at issue here constitute a constitutional violation is inappropriate for the Court to determine at this juncture. I find only that Plaintiff has alleged enough information in his complaint to plausibly state that a constitutional violation has occurred because of Defendants' inactions. . . Moreover, Plaintiff does aver that Defendants knew that Defendants LeFebvre and Mandichak–McConnell routinely ordered prisoners to operate the meat slicer to slice food it was not intended to slice, without any safety precautions and without any training. In the absence of a more developed factual record, the Court is unaware of the exact contours of the Defendants knowledge of their subordinates' conduct. Furthermore, Plaintiff alleges that Defendants did nothing to prevent this practice, instead tolerating, condoning, and encouraging it. . . Finally, Plaintiff alleges that his injury, including the loss of his fingers, was directly caused by the failure of the Defendants to take the actions they were required to and their inaction in preventing Defendants LeFebvre and Mandichak–McConnell from allowing this unsafe practice to persist. These are more than 'naked assertions' that formulaically recite the elements of the cause of action. Consequently, Defendants' motion to dismiss count IV will be denied to the extent Plaintiff's complaint relies upon a theory of failure to supervise.")

Peet v. Beard, No. 3:10-CV-482, 2015 WL 2250233, at *15-17 (M.D. Pa. May 12, 2015) ("T]he defendants' exclusive focus on Palakovich's asserted inability to make medical decisions and his lack of direct interaction with Peet misses the salient focus that the Third Circuit highlighted in Barkes, which is on whether Palakovich's own conduct in his role as a supervisor was itself deliberately indifferent with respect to policies and procedures within the prison. . . . In particular, Peet notes that official policy dictated that emergency response times were to be within four minutes, something that Palakovich himself acknowledged was expected of staff. Nevertheless, there is evidence in the record to show that SCI–Camp Hill officers on duty on the day of the alleged incident had never been trained in effective response times, and indeed were entirely unaware of the 4–minute maximum response time expected until they learned of it during discovery in this case. . . Likewise, DOC nurses who were also under Palakovich's supervision and ultimate authority were also never trained regarding expected response times. . . . T]he evidence reveals a potentially stark contrast between what defendant Palakovich describes as his understanding of the medical emergency response policy, a policy he was charged with implementing, and the general lack of awareness of that policy among those who were charged with Peet's safety during the critical moments when he lay disabled with his face wedged against a scalding radiator. This gulf could have been bridged by essential training, understanding, awareness and communication, but the factual record is largely silent on this score, leaving the gulf between the superintendent's expectations, and staff awareness of those expectations unbridged. Given these unresolved factual questions, we believe that summary judgment would not be appropriate on a supervisory failure-to-train claim. . . .T]he evidence, albeit disputed, when viewed in a light most favorable to the plaintiff would permit a finding of supervisory failure-to-train liability. The nature of this policy, which deals with emergency medical responses, underscores the gravity of adequate staff knowledge and training. . . . Yet, the evidence, and particularly the staff assertions that they were totally unaware of a policy that called for a four minute response to a medical emergency in which it is alleged that an inmate was being blinded, scarred and burned by a radiator for an extended period of time, permits an inference that there was a failure-to-train in this case that rose to a matter of potentially constitutional dimensions. . . . The defendants' suggestion that medical staff are entirely independent of Palakovich, or somehow that they and their decisions fell outside the ambit of his authority, is not legally tenable, and does not provide a basis for summary judgment in light of Barkes. . . . T]he plaintiff has done an adequate job of identifying facts that could show that SCI–Camp Hill administrators, including Superintendent Palakovich, were indifferent to their role as supervisors overseeing both corrections staff and medical staff at the prison, and that this indifference—in the face of Peet's serious and documented medical needs—arose to the level of constitutional misconduct.")

Harris v. Hudson Cnty. Jail, No. CIV.A. 14-6284 JLL, 2015 WL 1607703, at *5 (D.N.J. Apr. 8, 2015) ("To make out a supervisor liability claim based on acquiescence, Plaintiff must show that the supervisor had authority over a subordinated, had actual knowledge of a violation of a plaintiff's rights, and then acquiesced to that violation. . . To recover on such a claim, a plaintiff must also show that the supervisor acted with the requisite mental state, which varies based on the tort alleged. Barkes, 766 F.3d at 319–20. In a conditions of confinement claim, the requisite mental state is deliberate indifference.")

Jamison v. Wetzel, No. 1:13-CV-2129, 2015 WL 791444, at *7 (M.D. Pa. Feb. 25, 2015) ("[T]o the extent that these supervisory liability claims rest on the premise that officials did not after-the-fact act favorably upon his past grievances, this claim also fails. An inmate cannot sustain a constitutional tort claim against prison supervisors based solely upon assertions that officials failed to adequately investigate or respond to his past grievances. Inmates do not have a constitutional right to a prison grievance system. Speight v. Sims, 283 F. App'x 880 (3d Cir.2008) . . . Consequently, dissatisfaction with a response to an inmate's grievances does not support a constitutional claim. . . . In sum, a number of the plaintiff's claims against these supervisory defendants appear to consist of little more than assertions of respondeat superior liability, coupled with dissatisfaction with the processing of this inmate's past grievances, assertions which as a matter of law do not suffice to state a constitutional tort claim. Therefore, these defendants are entitled to be dismissed from this case.")

Womack v. Moleins, No. CIV. 10-2932, 2015 WL 420161, at *2-3 (D.N.J. Jan. 30, 2015) ("There are two ways to establish a supervisory defendant's personal involvement in a subordinate's unconstitutional conduct. First, the supervisor may be liable if he 'participated in violating the plaintiff's rights, directed others to violate them, or, as the person in charge, had knowledge of and acquiesced in the subordinate's unconstitutional conduct.' Barkes v. First Corr. Med., Inc., 766 F.3d 307, 316 (3d Cir.2014). To establish knowledge and acquiescence, a plaintiff must allege the defendant's '(1) contemporaneous knowledge of the offending incident or knowledge of similar incidents in the past, and (2) actions or inactions which communicated approval of the subordinate's behavior.'. . '[C]onstructive knowledge of a subordinate's unconstitutional conduct simply because of [the defendant's] role as a supervisor' is insufficient. Instead, the supervisory defendant must have actual knowledge of the misconduct, but knowledge may be inferred from the circumstances. . . Allegations of participation or actual knowledge and acquiescence must be made with particularity. . . Second, the supervisory defendant may be liable if he, 'with deliberate indifference to the consequences, established and maintained a policy, practice or custom which directly caused the constitutional harm.'. . Claims alleging a failure to train, failure to discipline, or failure to supervise are a subset of such policy or practice liability. . . Generally, failure to adequately train or supervise can only constitute deliberate indifference if the failure has caused a pattern of violations. . . To hold an official liable on a claim for failure to supervise based on a policy or practice, a plaintiff 'must identify a supervisory policy or practice that the supervisor failed to employ, and then prove that: (1) the policy or procedures in effect at the time of the alleged injury created an unreasonable risk of a constitutional violation; (2) the defendant-official was aware that the policy created an unreasonable risk; (3) the defendant was indifferent to that risk; and (4) the constitutional injury was caused by the failure to implement the supervisory practice or procedure.' Barkes, 766 F.3d at 317. Similarly, to bring a claim of failure to train under § 1983, 'a Plaintiff must (1) identify the deficiency in training; (2) prove that the deficiency caused the alleged constitutional violation; and (3) prove that the failure to remedy the deficiency constituted deliberate indifference....' Lapella v. City of Atlantic City, No. 10–2454 JBS/JS, 2012 WL 2952411, at *6 (D.N.J. July 18, 2012).")

Collinson v. City of Philadelphia, No. CIV.A. 12-6114, 2015 WL 221070, at *4 n.1 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 14, 2015) ("The Third Circuit has expressed uncertainty as to the viability and scope of supervisory liability after the Supreme Court's holding in Ashcroft v. Iqbal . . . The Third Circuit recently addressed the concept of supervisory liability after Iqbal as it pertained specifically to Eighth Amendment claims. The Circuit held that 'under Iqbal, the level of intent necessary to establish supervisory liability will vary with the underlying constitutional tort alleged.' Barkes v. First Correctional Medical, Inc., 766 F.3d 307, 319 (3d Cir.2014). The Third Circuit specifically 'left for another day' whether supervisory liability will continue to exist for other constitutional violations. . .With this 'uncertainty,' district courts in this Circuit have continued to apply pre-Iqbal standards with caution. See, e.g ., Pratt v. City of Philadelphia, 2012 WL 592247, at *3 (E.D.Pa.2012).")

Bornstein v. Cnty. of Monmouth, No. CIV. 11-5336, 2014 WL 6908925, at *3-5 (D.N.J. Dec. 9, 2014) ("Recently, the Third Circuit in Barkes v. First Correctional Medical, Inc. ruled that supervisory liability under § 1983 in the Eighth Amendment context survived the Supreme Court's ruling in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). . . Specifically, the Court reaffirmed its four-part standard, established in Sample v. Diecks, for determining whether an official may be held liable on a § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim for failure to supervise. . . In reaching its conclusion, the Court stated that 'under Iqbal, the level of intent necessary to establish supervisory liability will vary with the underlying constitutional tort alleged.'. . Since the parties in the present case did not have the benefit of the Barkes opinion when briefing Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment, the Court directed the parties to provide supplemental briefing on the impact, if any, of Barkes. After reviewing the parties' submissions, the Court does not find that Barkes altered the personal involvement standard for supervisory liability applicable to this case. The Barkes court identified 'two general ways in which a supervisor-defendant may be liable for unconstitutional acts undertaken by subordinates[:]' (1) liability based on an establishment of policies, practices or customs that directly caused the constitutional violation and (2) personal liability based on the supervisor participating in the violation of Plaintiff's rights, directing others to violate Plaintiff's rights, or having knowledge of and acquiescing to a subordinate's conduct. . . The violation alleged in Barkes fell into the first category, as it was based on a supervisory officer's failure to supervise with respect to a deficient prison mental health screening policy, while the case at hand presents a claim within the second category, which, beyond mere identification, is not addressed further in Barkes. Thus, the Barkes ruling is not directly applicable here. Although the Third Circuit's reasoning in Barkes relies on the broader notion that the standard for supervisory liability varies with the underlying constitutional tort alleged, ultimately, the Barkes ruling is limited to affirming its previously established Sample standard and does not indicate an intent to change existing standards on supervisory liability. Indeed, Barkes expressly states that it would 'leave for another day the question of whether and under what circumstances a claim for supervisory liability derived from a violation of a different constitutional provision remains valid.'. . Had the Third Circuit intended to overrule existing standards for supervisory liability, it would have spoken more clearly. Therefore, the Court does not find that Barkes alters the well-established personal involvement standard for supervisory liability. . . . In Barkes, the Third Circuit reasoned that since the underlying tort was the denial of adequate medical care in violation of the Eighth Amendment, which has an accompanying mental state of subjective deliberate indifference, in order to hold a supervisor liable for failure to supervise in the context of a deficient mental health screening policy, there must also be deliberate indifference on the part of the supervisor, as assessed under the four part Sample test. . . Here, the underlying tort is excessive force against a pretrial detainee, which is assessed under the due process 'shocks the conscience' standard. . . . Just as a reasonable jury could find, based on the video evidence and statements of the officers, that the force used by the subordinate officers shocked the conscience, drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Plaintiff as the non-moving party, a reasonable jury could also find that Sgt. Noland's conduct in permitting Bornstein's treatment by other officers shocked the conscience, especially considering the cumulative amount of force used against him by multiple officers in multiple instances. There remains a genuine dispute of material fact whether Sgt. Noland was personally involved in the alleged constitutional violations and whether his conduct shocks the conscience. Therefore, Sgt. Noland's Motion for Summary Judgment will be denied.")

Rankin v. Majikes, No. 3:CV-14-699, 2014 WL 6893693, at *9 (M.D. Pa. Dec. 5, 2014) ("Rankin will be permitted to proceed with his Fourth Amendment claim against Dessoye and Crane because the Amended Complaint contains sufficient factual allegations to support a supervisory liability theory. Here, Dessoye and Crane are alleged to have had responsibility over the training and supervision of the City Officers and Sergeants. . . Rankin also avers that they failed to train in methods for avoiding the use of excessive or deadly force, including the use of live action simulations and other generally accepted police training methods regarding the avoidance of the use of such force. . . Rankin further asserts that they were deliberately indifferent to that risk, which resulted in the deprivation of his Fourth Amendment rights. . . Dessoye and Crane's motion to dismiss the excessive force claim will be denied.")

Thomas v. Adams, 55 F.Supp.3d 552, 554, 567-68, 578-80, 586-88 (D.N.J. 2014) ("Moving to dismiss Plaintiffs claims, pursuant to Rule 12(b) of the Federal Rule of Civil Procedure, Defendants essentially maintain that Plaintiffs failed to state a plausible claim against them simply because Defendants are high-ranking supervising officials, and Plaintiffs' facts lack the particularities of Defendants' decision-making process and actions. This Court disagrees and will deny Defendants' motions, in part, and grant them in part. . . . Nowhere has the Iqbal misreading been more evident and distortive of the letter and spirit of Rule 8 than in the matters containing claims against defendants holding supervisory positions. While, half a century ago, the Conley passage came to be construed as allowing a pleader to avoid asserting any facts, the Iqbal misreading came to be used as a shield that allowed virtually every wrongdoer holding a supervisory position to escape litigation upon claiming 'insufficiency of pleading,' i.e., upon uttering the hollow phrase which came to mean that a plaintiff, separated from the supervisor-wrongdoer by a few ranks of subordinates, simply had no meaningful way to learn about and plead, without discovery, the particularities of the wrongdoer's exact conduct. Such Iqbal misreading is troubling. The contraction of the Conley holding into the Conley passage might or might not have done a long term damage. However, the transformation of the careful, thoughtful and well-grounded holding of Iqbal into the Iqbal misreading threatens such damage. . .Iqbal did not change any aspect of substantive law. Nor did Iqbal create a liability exception for the defendants fortunate to hold supervisory positions. And, a fortiori, Iqbal did not change a single word of Rule 8(a) (or Rule 12(b)), or the meanings of these Rules: the actual holding of Iqbal merely elaborated on the Supreme Court's original passim observation in Dura that 'it should not prove burdensome [for a plaintiff] to provide [his defendants with] some indication of the [facts] that the plaintiff has in mind,' 544 U.S. at 347 (emphasis supplied), since the Federal Rules have always been asking a pleader for a 'short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.'. . Thirty six years ago, in Monell [v. Dep't of Soc. Servs., 436 U.S. 658 (1978)], the [Supreme] Court ... concluded that Congress had rejected [the concept of] impos[ing] liability upon [supervisory entities] based purely upon the acts of others .... Section 1983's causation language imposes liability on a 'person who ... shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any person' to a deprivation of federal rights. . . .Thirty six years after Monell, the pleading standard as to supervising officials remains the same. It is with that standard in mind, the Supreme Court addressed those Iqbal claims that were merely disguised respondeat superior challenges. . . .Reading Leamer, Napoleon and Durmer jointly with the rationale of Plata, this Court concludes that, if: (a) supervising officials make systemwide determinations; (b) these determinations become the moving force behind the circumstances under which the subordinate officers effectively have no choice but to deny/reduce/change an inmate's prescribed medical/ mental treatment for non-medical reasons; and (c) such denial/reduction/change in prescribed treatment was foreseeable under the systemwide determinations the supervisors made, then the supervisors are liable to the inmate for his injuries caused by such denial/reduction/change in prescribed treatment, provided that the inmate draws the requisite 'causal link' between the supervisors' decisions and his injury-by stating facts plausibly establishing the supervisors' deliberate indifference to the risk of the inmate's injury. . . .A recent decision by the Court of Appeals details the precise causal link the inmate must draw to plausibly plead such a claim. See Barkes, —— F.3d ——, 2014 U.S.App. LEXIS 17261. . . .Read against the holdings of Barkes and Sample, the guidance in Plata, Iqbal, Barkes, Argueta, Leamer, Napoleon and Durmer indicates that a plaintiff states a plausible circumstantial-evidence medical care claim against defendants-supervisors if:

(a) there are facts (either pled or amenable to judicial notice) showing that the supervisors' decisions created an operational regime laden with an unreasonable risk of denial of (or reduction/change in) the plaintiffs' mental care for non-medical reasons, and defendants-supervisors, being aware that their systemwide decisions entailed such risk elected to proceed with an implementation of their decisions (regardless of whether the defendants-supervisors were acting maliciously or were prompted to act by unfortunate slew of external economic/socio-political/logistical circumstances); and (b) the causal link between these systemwide decisions and denial of (or reduction/change in) the plaintiffs' mental care can reasonably be inferred from the lack of facts indicating that subordinate officers had a meaningful discretion to properly perform their duties under the circumstances ensuing from the operational regime triggered by the defendants-supervisors' systemwide decisions. . . . [S]tripped of all niceties, the DOC Defendants' qualified immunity argument turns on their self-serving misreading of Iqbal, i.e., on their claim that supervisory officials are necessarily shielded from suit by a plaintiff separated from those supervisors by a few ranks of subordinates, since that the plaintiff cannot be in privy with the particularities of the supervisors' operations and decision-making processes and, hence, cannot plead those particularities. Although, as detailed supra, such self-serving misreading of Iqbal has become common among defendants holding supervisory positions and even persuaded a few jurists, see Barkes, —— F.3rd ——, 2014 U.S.App. LEXIS 17261, at 24 ("Iqbal* has ... [led some jurists to] believe [that it] abolish [ed] supervisory liability in its entirety"), that misreading is not the law and never was the law. Thus, this misreading cannot entitle Defendants to qualified immunity. Iqbal did not involve a change in the Fourteenth or Eighth Amendment regime, nor did Iqbal eliminate the 'practical guidance' these bodies of law provided to the DOC Defendants, 'fairly warning' them that they could be liable for their decisions and acts evincing deliberate indifference to the risk of harm resulting from denial/reduction/change in Plaintiffs' prescribed mental treatment for non-medical reasons. Not a single statement in Iqbal could have led the DOC Defendants to believe that they would be entitled to violate clearly established due process law because the Supreme Court offered a clarification as to the pleading requirement of Rule 8(a), or because the DOC Defendants held supervisory positions, or because Plaintiffs—not being in privy with the DOC Defendants' exact operations—could not plead the particularities of the DOC Defendants' decision-making processes or acts. . . . [T]he DOC Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Shawn H. v. Wienk, 2:12-CV-1783, 2014 WL 4792247, *8 (W.D. Pa. Sept. 23, 2014) ("When viewed in connection with the above standards, it is clear that Plaintiffs have failed to sufficiently allege a supervisory liability claim. There are no facts pled in the Complaint that would indicate Berdar or Savini had any personal involvement in the incident or that they directed, or actually knew of and acquiesced in, the alleged violations of S.H.'s constitutional rights. Moreover, for the reasons previously discussed in connection with Plaintiffs' Monell claim, Plaintiffs have failed to allege sufficient facts that Berdar and Savini had notice of a prior practice of unconstitutional behavior of a similar conscience-shocking nature on the part of Wienk. Finally, to the extent Plaintiffs are relying on a failure to supervise/train theory of liability, the Complaint is devoid of any factual allegations with respect to a pattern of similar constitutional violations. Accordingly, dismissal of this claim is appropriate as well, and Defendants' Motions will therefore be granted as to Counts II and III.")

Marks v. Corizon Health Care Inc., 4:13-CV-0726, 2014 WL 4252430, *6, *7 (M.D. Pa. Aug. 26, 2014) ("In this case, Marks alleges that he wrote to defendants Leggore, Harris, Davis, and Law asking for help and explaining that he has epilepsy, that he has seizures, that he was placed on a top tier, that he told Hunsberger about his situation, that Hunsberger did not care, and that it is hazardous for him to be on the top tier. He alleges that he wrote to these defendants after he was assigned to an upper tier but before he fell. At this stage of the proceedings, Marks has sufficiently alleged that he put defendants Leggore, Harris, Davis, and Law on notice of an ongoing dangerous situation and that by failing to take action to correct the situation they acquiesced in the situation. Thus, at this early stage of the proceedings, Leggore, Harris, Davis, and Law are not entitled to dismissal on the basis of lack of personal involvement. Marks has failed, however, to sufficiently allege personal involvement on the part of defendant Shoop. Marks alleges that Shoop is a health care administrator, who, according to Marks, should have made sure that his staff put his medical condition in his file and on the computer. Marks further alleges that he wrote to Shoop's staff, but Shoop neglected to properly oversee his staff. Shoop, however, cannot be liable on the basis of respondeat superior. And Marks has not alleged that any facts from which it can reasonably be inferred that Shoop was aware of his situation before his fall. While he attached to his amended complaint a response to a grievance, which response appears to be signed by defendant Shoop, that response indicates that Marks's grievance was dated November 27, 2012, three weeks after his fall. Mark's after-the-fact grievance is not sufficient to show personal involvement on the part of defendant Shoop. Accordingly, we will recommend that the Eighth Amendment claim against Shoop be dismissed.")

Powell v. Wetzel, No. 1:12–cv–01684, 2014 WL 2864686, *2, *3 (M.D. Pa. June 24, 2014) ("The Court will decline to adopt the Report and Recommendation, and deny Defendant Fisher's motion to dismiss Count One. In his amended complaint, Plaintiff alleges that Defendant Fisher was 'personally aware of the irregular confiscation of [his] legal materials by Sgt. Workinger, because Mr. Powell repeatedly informed Superintendent Fisher both verbally and in writing and also pleaded for the return of the legal files,'. . . and that 'Superintendent Fisher tolerated and acquiesced in the disregard of DOC policies by Sgt. Workinger with regard to the confiscation of Mr. Powell's legal files'. . . . Although Magistrate Judge Schwab concluded that Defendant Fisher's 'after-the-fact knowledge of such alleged wrongdoing, through oral communication or written letters or grievances, is not enough to establish the requisite personal involvement,' this legal conclusion runs counter to the principle that a supervisor may be held liable for 'having knowledge of and acquiescing in their subordinates' violations.'. . Plaintiff alleges that he contacted Defendant Fisher several times and requested that he return his legal papers, and Defendant Fisher refused. . . Accordingly, at the pleadings stage, the Court finds that Plaintiff has stated an access to courts claim against Defendant Fisher, and will deny his motion to dismiss Count One.")

Holbrook v. Jellen, No. 3:14–CV–28, 2014 WL 1944644, *10, *11 (M.D. Pa. May 14, 2014) ("We find that Defendants' argument for dismissal of the supervisory Defendants (including Woodside) as well as the application of the four Turner factors to Plaintiffs' First Amendment claims to be premature and to be more appropriate at the summary judgment stage of this case after sufficient time for discovery has been afforded. . . . Despite the fact that Defendants have submitted as an Exhibit with their Motion to Dismiss a copy of DC–ADM 803, it does not appear that discovery has commenced in this case. In light of Thompson v. Smeal, as well as Scott v.

Erdogan, we find that a proper analysis of the Turner factors to Plaintiffs' First Amendment claims requires complete and thorough discovery, such as specific evidence as to how the mailings which were sent to inmate Holbrook would cause security risks in the prison. Also, we agree with Plaintiffs that discovery is required as to the specific roles of the supervisory Defendants each time Holbrook's mail was censored to see if these Defendants only engaged in perfunctory reviews of Jellen's decisions or if they conducted their own analysis of the contents of the censored mail. Thus, we concur with Plaintiffs that they are entitled 'to develop evidence to aid the "fact-intensive" and "contextual, record-sensitive analysis" required by Turner.'")

Rosembert v. Borough of East Lansdowne, 14 F.Supp.3d 631, 643 (E.D. Pa. 2014) ("In light of the facts asserted in the amended complaint, that supervisory officers were present during the alleged beating of Plaintiff and that previous African–Americans have been targeted in a similar manner by police officers from these Boroughs, Plaintiff has sufficiently stated a claim for failure to train, discipline or control. These facts demonstrate that supervisors were present and aware of the excessive force used in Plaintiff's arrest, and by either engaging in the behavior or silently acquiescing to the conduct, they communicated a message of approval.")

McCargo v. Camden County Jail, No. 13–0868 (RBK)(KMW), 2014 WL 116329, *3 n.2 (D.N.J. Jan. 9, 2014) ("It is worth noting that numerous courts have explained that a plaintiff states a claim by alleging that a supervisory defendant reviewed a grievance where the plaintiff alleges an ongoing violation as she " 'is personally involved in that violation because [s]he is confronted with a situation [s]he can remedy directly.'" [collecting cases] In this case, however, while plaintiff may have alleged an ongoing condition of confinement violation, the complaint does not allege that defendants Taylor or Pizario were involved in reviewing plaintiff's grievances to impute the required knowledge to sustain the claim.")

Cardona v. Warden - MDC Facility, No. 12–7161 (RBK)(AMD), 2013 WL 6446999, *5 (D.N.J. Dec. 6, 2013) ("Numerous courts have explained that a plaintiff states a claim by alleging that a supervisory defendant reviewed a grievance where the plaintiff alleges an ongoing violation as she ' "is personally involved in that violation because [s]he is confronted with a situation [s]he can remedy directly."' [collecting cases] In this case, as plaintiff alleged an ongoing violation that defendant Zickefoose was made aware of through his written requests per facility procedure, he has stated a deliberate indifference claim against her. The claim against Zickefoose will be permitted to proceed.")

Dare v. Township of Hamilton, No. 13–1636 (JBS/JS), 2013 WL 6080440, *7, *8 (D.N.J. Nov. 18, 2013) ("Under pre-Iqbal Third Circuit precedent, '[t]here are two theories of supervisory liability,' one under which supervisors can be liable if they 'established and maintained a policy, practice or custom which directly caused [the] constitutional harm,' and another under which they can be liable if they 'participated in violating plaintiff's rights, directed others to violate them, or, as the person[s] in charge, had knowledge of and acquiesced in [their] subordinates' violations.'. . . The Third Circuit has recognized the potential effect Iqbal might have in altering the standard for supervisory liability in a section 1983 suit but, to date, has declined to decide whether Iqbal requires narrowing the scope of the test. . . Therefore, it appears that, under a supervisory theory of liability, personal involvement by a defendant remains the touchstone for establishing liability for the violation of a plaintiff's constitutional right. . . Facts showing personal involvement of the defendant must be asserted; such assertions may be made through allegations of specific facts showing that a defendant expressly directed the deprivation of a plaintiff's constitutional rights or created such policies where the subordinates had no discretion in applying the policies in a fashion other than the one which actually produced the alleged deprivation; e.g., supervisory liability may attach if the plaintiff asserts facts showing that the supervisor's actions were 'the moving force' behind the harm suffered by the plaintiff. . . Here, Plaintiff alleges no facts regarding Chief Tappeiner's personal involvement in the deprivation of Plaintiff's constitutional rights. Plaintiff's Complaint contains only one paragraph that may implicate Police Chief Tappeiner at all. This paragraph consists of the bare allegation that '[t]here was participation by upper management of the Township of Hamilton Police Department, under color of State law, in connection with the deprivation of the rights of Plaintiff, that evidences the customs, patterns, practices, and procedures of Defendants to retaliate and violate the civil rights of Plaintiff.'. . Plaintiff has alleged no facts indicating that Chief Tappeiner directed the deprivation of a plaintiff's constitutional rights or created policies to that effect. Instead, Plaintiff relies on a single paragraph of legal conclusions that only obliquely alludes to 'upper management' without even mentioning Chief Tappeiner. Accordingly, this Court will dismiss the claims against Chief Tappeiner under section 1983.")

McCray v. Holmes, No. 12–2356 (RBK)(JS), 2013 WL 6073852, *4 (D.N.J. Nov. 15, 2013) ("Plaintiff alleges that he appealed his grievances complaining about the lack of his kosher meals to defendant Holmes, but that defendant Holmes failed to restore his kosher meals. Typically, a plaintiff appealing his grievances to the prison administrator is not enough to impose knowledge against the prison administrator of the wrongdoing. [collecting cases] However, in this case, plaintiff alleges an ongoing constitutional violation. Indeed, he alleges that he has not received kosher meals since February, 2012. Furthermore, he alleges that defendant Holmes was made aware of this ongoing violation through plaintiff's prison grievances and appeals. Numerous courts have stated that a plaintiff states a claim by alleging that a supervisory defendant reviewed a grievance where the plaintiff alleges an ongoing violation as he ' "is personally involved in that violation because he is confronted with a situation he can remedy directly."' [collecting cases] In this case, as plaintiff has alleged an ongoing violation that defendant Holmes was made aware of through his grievance appeals, he has stated a free exercise claim against Holmes.")

Jerri v. Harran, No. 13–1328, 2013 WL 4401435, *1, *3 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 16, 2013) ("Although the Third Circuit has, in dictum in several cases, recognized that a theory of knowledge and acquiescence may serve as the basis of a § 1983 claim against a person in a supervisory role in relation to the alleged unconstitutional wrongdoing, the Court has never upheld such a judgment in a precedential decision. Argueta v. United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 643 F.3d 60, 71, (3d Cir.2011); Santiago v. Warminster Twp., 629 F.3d 121, 129 (3d Cir.2010); Rode v. Dellarciprete, 845 F.2d 1195, 1207 (3d Cir.1988). The court has refrained from defining the precise contours of what is required in order to plead or prove such a claim sufficiently. These decisions impose a high standard, and all but one of the Third Circuit's decisions have not proceeded beyond the motion to dismiss or summary judgment stage. . . . In this case, plaintiffs' allegations of 'knowledge and acquiescence,' are very general and fail to show any specific knowledge or conduct. The Court rejects plaintiffs' argument that their allegations are sufficient to establish supervisory liability.")

Newsome v. Catone, No. 3:12–CV–2475, 2013 WL 2897796, *7-*9 (M.D. Pa. June 11, 2013) ("To the extent that supervisory liability survives after Iqbal, the scope of that liability is clearly and narrowly defined. . . . Newsome has not alleged well-pleaded facts showing that 'the person[s] in charge, had knowledge of and acquiesced in [their] subordinates' violations.'. . Moreover, Newsome has not alleged well-pleaded facts which would establish a claim of supervisory liability grounded upon an assertion that the defendants 'established and maintained a policy, practice or custom which directly caused [a] constitutional harm[.]'. . .Furthermore, to the extent that Newsome's supervisory laibility claims rest on the premise that officials did not after-the-fact act favorably upon his past grievances, this claim also fails. An inmate cannot sustain a constitutional tort claim against prison supervisors based solely upon assertions that officials failed to adequately investigate or respond to his past grievances. Inmates do not have a constitutional right to a prison grievance system. . . Consequently, dissatisfaction with a response to an inmate's grievances does not support a constitutional claim. . . . Indeed, in a case such as this, it is also well-established that non-medical correctional supervisors may not be 'considered deliberately indifferent simply because they failed to respond directly to the medical complaints of a prisoner who was already being treated by the prison doctor.'. . . [C]ourts have repeatedly held that, absent some reason to believe that prison medical staff are mistreating prisoners, non-medical corrections staff who refer inmate medical complaints to physicians may not be held personally liable for medically-based Eighth Amendment claims. . . . In sum, as presently drafted, the plaintiff's amended complaint's claims against these supervisory defendants consist of little more than assertions of respondeat superior liability, coupled with dissatisfaction with the processing of this inmate's past grievances, assertions which as a matter of law do not suffice to state a constitutional tort claim. Therefore, these defendants are entitled to be dismissed from this case.")

Dinote v. Danberg, No. 12–cv–377 (GMS), 2013 WL 2297039, *5, *6 (D. Del. May 23, 2013) ("Here, there is no evidence that defendants Danberg, McBridge, or Johnson, in their roles as Commissioner of the Delaware Department of Corrections, Director of Central Offender Records, and Warden of SCI, respectively, had any contact or interaction with Dinote during the time in question or that they made the decision that she be strip searched. Dinote also does not allege that the strip search policy at BWCI was established and/or approved by any of the individual defendants. Specifically, Dinote's brief contains a citation to Danberg's testimony that it is the warden who would establish the strip search policy for that institution. Thus, while Dinote's account of her prison experience may, if proved, demonstrate a constitutional violation, . . . her allegations and pleadings, as well as the evidence she presents, is insufficient to legally implicate the individual defendants presently before the court as the warden of BWCI is not a party to this action. Instead, Dinote attempts to make out a claim against these defendants by associating institutional policies, such as the requirement that all incoming inmates at BWCI go through the 'standard booking procedure' including a strip search and a shower, with constitutional violations. . . These claims are based solely on defendants' various positions within the Delaware Department of Correction, rather than any alleged individual involvement in the alleged events. . . Thus, defendants are entitled to summary judgment on Dinote's Fourth Amendment claims.")

Broadwater v. Fow, 945 F.Supp. 574, 587, 588 (M.D. Pa. 2013) ("A supervisory defendant in a § 1983 action may not be liable based merely on the theory of respondeat superior. Rode v. Dellarciprete, 845 F.2d 1195, 1207 (3d Cir.1988). Instead, the plaintiff must allege that the supervisory defendant was personally involved in the incident at hand. . . Unfortunately, the term 'personal involvement' is not universally defined in applicable case law. . . Overall, the supervisor must somehow exhibit a 'deliberate indifference' to the deprivation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . Policy-making supervisors may be liable if they 'established and maintained a policy, practice or custom which directly caused [the] constitutional harm.'. . A supervisor's failure to employ a specific supervisory practice or procedure to correct a known unreasonable risk of constitutional harm also satisfies the personal involvement requirement. . .Mere knowledge and acquiescence in a subordinate's constitutional violations may also qualify as personal involvement. .. Allegations that a supervisor 'tolerated past or ongoing misbehavior' may suffice. . . To establish knowledge and acquiescence of a subordinate's misconduct, a plaintiff must allege the defendant's (1) contemporaneous knowledge of the offending incident or knowledge of similar incidents in the past, and (2) actions or inactions which communicated approval of the subordinate's behavior. . . A plaintiff may not allege that a supervisory defendant had constructive knowledge of a subordinate's unconstitutional conduct simply because of his role as a supervisor. . . A failure to train only amounts to deliberate indifference 'where the need for more or different training is obvious' and the lack of training can be expected to result in constitutional violations.")

Hartmann v. Carroll, 929 F.Supp.2d 321, 326, 327 (D. Del. 2013) ("It is well established that supervisory liability cannot be imposed under § 1983 on a respondeat superior theory. . . Purpose rather than knowledge is required to impose liability on an official charged with violations arising from his or her superintendent responsibilities. . . 'Absent vicarious liability, each Government official, his or her title notwithstanding, is only liable for his or her own misconduct.'. . A plaintiff must show that an official's conduct caused the deprivation of a federally protected right. . . Additionally, the filing of a grievance is not sufficient to show the actual knowledge necessary for personal involvement . . . and participation in the after-the-fact review of a grievance is not enough to establish personal involvement . . . .")

Smith v. Indiana County Jail, No. 12–728, 2013 WL 425144, *3, *4 (W.D. Pa. Feb. 4, 2013) ("To state a claim for supervisory liability, a complaint must allege the defendant's actual knowledge to support a claim of deliberate indifference. This distinction in pleading requirements resulted in the dismissal of a complaint in Santiago v. Warminster Tp., 629 F.3d at 134, where the plaintiff implied but did not allege facts establishing actual knowledge. Instead, the complaint implied the presence of the supervisory defendants in the vicinity of alleged unconstitutional conduct, and therefore alleged broadly that they knew of and acquiesced in the use of excessive force. The United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit concluded that these allegations did not support an inference of awareness of subordinates' allegedly unconstitutional activity so as to support a claim predicated upon personal involvement. The Court of Appeals affirmed the dismissal of the claims against the supervising officers, holding that the plaintiff's allegations were insufficient to establish the degree of knowledge sufficient to 'nudge [[his]] claims across the line from conceivable to plausible' so as to satisfy Twombly. . . Similarly, in Arguenta v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 643 F.3d 60, 74 (3d Cir.2011), the Court of Appeals affirmed the dismissal of an action against supervising defendants where the complaint did not plausibly allege legally sufficient notice of the underlying unconstitutional conduct of their subordinates . . . .In the case at issue, Plaintiffs' claims, which are based upon allegations of imputed and assumed knowledge, or speculative tolerance of past behavior, are insufficient. There are no allegations that Warden Hummel participated in or directed the sexual misconduct at issue. Instead, Plaintiffs rely upon allegations that the sexual activity of Defendant Gross and Dailey were 'common knowledge of the inmate population.' Plaintiffs impute this purported general knowledge within the inmate population to Warden Hummel, so as to create an inference of notice and deliberate indifference, highlighted by her failure to act to prevent additional occurrences. . . However, the Complaint does not allege that the sexual misconduct was ever reported to Warden Hummel so as to infer a plausible claim of notice or 'actual knowledge.' In the absence of some actual knowledge or notice of Gross and Dailey's misconduct, Plaintiffs' allegations do not support a plausible claim of Warden Hummel's personal involvement in the violation of Plaintiffs' constitutional rights.")

Cress v. Ventnor City, No. 08–1873(NLH)(AMD), 2012 WL 6652804, *3 (D.N.J. Dec. 20, 2012) ("Egg Harbor defendant, John Woods, did not participate in the actual execution of the search warrant and he did not enter plaintiffs' home until after the completion of the operation. Instead, Woods was the team commander who devised the operation plan, assigned the ACERT members' duties, and directed practice runs. Plaintiffs claim that the operation plan was excessive from its inception based on the minor nature of the offense allegedly committed by Lombardi and because there was no real or perceived risk that Lombardi was dangerous. In order to hold Woods personally liable under § 1983, plaintiffs 'must show that he participated in violating their rights, or that he directed others to violate them, or that he, as the person in charge of the raid, had knowledge of and acquiesced in his subordinates' violations.' Baker v. Monroe Twp., 50 F.3d 1186, 1190–91 (3d Cir.1995). The Court finds that even though Woods did not personally use excessive force, there are sufficient disputes of material fact concerning what was known and relied upon in developing the plan so as to preclude summary judgment as to Woods at this time. However, it is likely that a separate special interrogatory question or questions regarding the planning of the operation may be necessary to insure that Woods's claim of qualified immunity is viewed through the lens of facts applicable to his conduct and not others. For example, a jury might conclude that the warrant was obtained without probable cause, that the officers did not have reason to fear Lombardi, and the use of force was unreasonable. On the other hand, they could reach the opposite conclusion on any, or all, of those factual disputes. A proper set of interrogatories in this case should assess each stage of the operation and the relative role of each defendant to insure the proper application of the qualified immunity doctrine. See id. at 1193; cf. Santiago v. Warminster Twp., 629 F.3d 121, 133 (3d Cir.2010) ("Where, as here, an operation results in the use of allegedly excessive force against only one of several people, that use of force does not, by itself, give rise to a plausible claim for supervisory liability against those who planned the operation. To hold otherwise would allow a plaintiff to pursue a supervisory liability claim anytime a planned operation resulted in excessive force, merely by describing the force used and appending the phrase 'and the Chief told them to do it.' ").")

Moriarty v. de LaSalle, No. 12–3013 (RMB), 2012 WL 5199211, *5, *6 (D.N.J. Oct. 19, 2012) ("The Third Circuit permits § 1983 claims to proceed based on a theory of supervisory liability where a plaintiff can show defendants had knowledge of their subordinates' violations and acquiesced in the same. See Baker v. Monroe Twp., 50 F.3d 1186, 1190–91 (3d Cir.1995) (permitting plaintiff to hold a supervisor liable for a subordinate's § 1983 violation provided plaintiff is able to show 'the person in charge ... had knowledge of and acquiesced in his subordinates' violations'). To impose liability on a supervisory official there must be 'both (1) contemporaneous knowledge of the offending incident or knowledge of a prior pattern of similar incidents, and (2) circumstances under which the supervisor's assertion could be found to have communicated a message of approval to the offending subordinate.' Colburn v. Upper Darby Twp., 838 F.2d 663, 673 (3d Cir.1988). Allegations of actual knowledge and acquiescence must be made with particularity. Rode v. Dellarciprete, 845 F.2d 1195, 1207 (3d Cir.1988). In this case, the Complaint does not allege or suggest that any of the supervisory defendants had contemporaneous knowledge of the incident. Plaintiff is not entitled to relief as against the supervisory defendants here; Plaintiff alleges that they became aware of the claims via his grievance filings. Participation in the after-the-fact review of a grievance or appeal is insufficient to establish personal involvement on the part of those individuals reviewing grievances. See Rode, 845 F.2d at 1208 (finding the filing of a grievance insufficient to show the actual knowledge necessary for personal involvement); Brooks v. Beard, 167 F. App'x 923, 925 (3d Cir.2006) (per curiam) (allegations of inappropriate response to grievances does not establish personal involvement required to establish supervisory liability). Accordingly, the supervisory defendants cannot be held liable for Plaintiff's medical claims here and claims against these defendants will be dismissed with prejudice.")

Pfeiffer v. Hutler, No. 12–1335 (AET), 2012 WL 4889242, *4-*6 (D.N.J. Oct. 12, 2012) ("Under pre-Iqbal Third Circuit precedent, '[t]here are two theories of supervisory liability,' one under which supervisors can be liable if they 'established and maintained a policy, practice or custom which directly caused [the] constitutional harm,' and another under which they can be liable if they 'participated in violating plaintiff's rights, directed others to violate them, or, as the person[s] in charge, had knowledge of and acquiesced in [their] subordinates' violations.'. . The Third Circuit has recognized the potential effect that Iqbal might have in altering the standard for supervisory liability in a § 1983 suit but, to date, has declined to decide whether Iqbal requires narrowing of the scope of the test. . . Hence, it appears that, under a supervisory theory of liability, and even in light of Iqbal, personal involvement by a defendant remains the touchstone for establishing liability for the violation of a plaintiff's constitutional right. . . Facts showing personal involvement of the defendant must be asserted; such assertions may be made through allegations of specific facts showing that a defendant expressly directed the deprivation of a plaintiff's constitutional rights or created such policies where the subordinates had no discretion in applying the policies in a fashion other than the one which actually produced the alleged deprivation; e.g., supervisory liability may attach if the plaintiff asserts facts showing that the supervisor's actions were 'the moving force' behind the harm suffered by the plaintiff. . .Here, Plaintiff provides no facts describing how the supervisory defendants, Warden Hutler and Chief Mueller, actively or affirmatively violated his constitutional rights, i.e., he fails to allege facts to show that these defendants expressly directed the deprivation of his constitutional rights, or that they created policies which left subordinates with no discretion other than to apply them in a fashion which actually produced the alleged deprivation. In short, Plaintiff has alleged no facts to support personal involvement by the supervisory defendants, and simply relies on recitations of legal conclusions such that they failed to supervise, oversee or correct the alleged custom by some correction officers at OCJ to verbally abuse and disclose gay inmates or inmates confined on sex crime charges in violation of Plaintiff's constitutional rights. These bare allegations, 'because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1950. Accordingly, this Court will dismiss without prejudice the Complaint, in its entirety, as against the defendants, Warden Hutler and Chief Mueller, because it is based on a claim of supervisor liability, which is not cognizable in this § 1983 action, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii) and 1915A(b)(1). Nevertheless, if Plaintiff believes that he can assert facts to show more than supervisor liability, or if he can assert facts to cure the deficiencies of his claims against the other unnamed correction officers, Officer DeMarco and Lt. Martin, then he may move to file an amended complaint accordingly.")

Smart v. Borough of Bellmawr, No. 11–0996 (RBK/JS), 2012 WL 4464561, *8 (D.N.J. Sept. 24, 2012) ("Plaintiff asserts a failure-to-train claim against Defendant Walsh, alleging that Walsh knew of and acquiesced in his subordinates' violations. . . The Third Circuit has previously held that a supervisory official may face § 1983 liability under a knowledge-and-acquiescence theory. See Baker v. Monroe Twp., 50 F.3d 1186, 1190–91 (3d Cir.1995). But the Supreme Court rejected the argument that officials who know of and acquiesce in the misdeeds of their subordinates can be liable for them. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 677 (2009). The Third Circuit has not yet decided whether a supervisor may only be held liable if he directly participates in unconstitutional conduct. See Argueta v. U.S. Immigration & Customs Enforcement, 643 F.3d 60, 70 (3d Cir.2011). Regardless, Plaintiff has failed to produce evidence that Walsh knew of any violations of his subordinates. Plaintiff argues that none of the Bellmawr law enforcement training materials specifically reference certain state and federal cases involving warrantless entry. But this assertion is not a basis for liability, and Plaintiff has failed to connect Defendant Walsh with any potential constitutional violation committed by Defendant Draham.")

Love v. South River Police Dept., Civ. No. 11–3765, 2012 WL 3950358, *2, *3 (D.N.J. Sept. 10, 2012) ("It is well established that government officials cannot 'be held liable for the unconstitutional conduct of their subordinates under a theory of respondeat superior,' rather a Plaintiff must show that each government official has violated the constitution through their own individual actions. . . Consequently, to survive a motion to dismiss, a plaintiff bringing a section 1983 claim against named defendants in their individual capacities must allege sufficient factual matter to support a claim for one of the two forms of supervisory liability. The first form of supervisory liability requires the plaintiff to allege that the supervisor 'established and maintained a policy, practice, or custom which directly caused [the] constitutional harm.'. . This form of supervisory liability does not require the plaintiff to allege a direct act by the defendant that caused the constitutional violation. Rather, a plaintiff may establish liability under this first form by alleging that the defendant's policy, practice, or custom, when enforced by subordinates or third parties, caused the plaintiff harm under § 1983. . . .The second form of supervisory liability under § 1983 requires a plaintiff to allege that the supervisor 'participated in violating plaintiff's rights, directed others to violate them, or, as a person in charge, had knowledge of and acquiesced in his subordinates' violations.'. . To establish a claim under the second form of supervisory liability, Plaintiff would have to allege a direct and affirmative act by the Defendant, whether in the form of acquiescence or direct participation, that resulted in an infringement of his constitutional rights. Additionally, supervisory liability requires the plaintiff to show 'a causal connection between the supervisor's actions and the violation of plaintiff's rights.'. . Liberally construing the Amended Complaint and subsequent submissions, it appears that Plaintiff is alleging this second form of supervisory liability. Because the Complaint must be 'held to less stringent standards than formal pleadings drafted by lawyers,' Erickson, 551 U.S. at 94, and because many of the allegations in the Amended Complaint require a context specific inquiry and necessitate the development of the factual record before the Court can decided whether, as a matter of law, Chief Bouthillette could be liable, the Court declines to dismiss the Amended Complaint as to Chief Bouthillette at this time. Original Defendants' arguments, which are certainly colorable, are best addressed by way of a motion for summary judgment after discovery has concluded.")

Neil v. Allegheny County, No. 12–03482012, 2012 WL 3779182, *5 n.3 (W.D. Pa. Aug. 31, 2012) ("The Iqbal case stated that because 'vicarious liability is inapplicable to § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. . Thus, the Supreme Court noted that in section 1983 actions, where master-servant liability is extinct, 'the term "supervisory liability" is a misnomer. Absent vicarious liability, each Government official, his or her title notwithstanding, is only liable for his or her own misconduct.'. . Our Court of Appeals has recognized the potential effect that Iqbal might have in altering the standard for supervisory liability in a section 1983 suit, but, to date, has declined to decide whether Iqbal requires narrowing of the scope of the supervisory liability test. [citing Santiago and Argueta]")

Figueroa v. City of Camden, No. 09–4343 (JBS/AMD), 2012 WL 3756974, *9, *11 (D.N.J. Aug. 28, 2012) ("Here, while Defendant City of Camden points to evidence in the record of the training program that all Camden Police Officers are required to undergo, and evidence that both Defendants Gransden and Roberts did, in fact, complete the required training, see Jay Cert. Exs. M–R, there is also evidence in the record that the City's policymakers were on notice that its training program and its internal discipline program were insufficient to prevent a repeated and uncorrected pattern of constitutional rights violations as of 2007 when these incidents occurred. The Court finds that, on a record such as this, Plaintiffs must survive Defendant City of Camden's motion for summary judgment. . . . Alternatively, Defendant Venegas argues that he is entitled to supervisory qualified immunity for his actions overseeing the Camden Police Department because a reasonable supervisor in Defendant's position would not have believed that he was being deliberately indifferent to the risk of the Defendant Officers' use of excessive force. See Rosenberg v. Vangelo, 93 F. App'x 373, 378 n. 2 (3d Cir.2004). The Court disagrees. Given the scope of Venegas's responsibilities under his supercession executive agreement with the County, and the context in which he was brought to oversee the Camden Police Department, including the Attorney General's letter, the Court concludes that a reasonable supervisor would have known that disclaiming all responsibility for duties such as discipline and training of police officers would be deliberately indifferent to the possibility of undisciplined officers effecting arrests with excessive force. Whether Defendant Venegas took meaningful steps to improve officer training regarding reasonable force in arrests and to improve internal disciplinary investigations and measures during the year leading up to the incidents complained of herein is not in the present record. Accordingly, the Court will deny Defendant Venegas's motion for summary judgment.")

Lapella v. City of Atlantic City, No. 10–2454 (JBS/JS), 2012 WL 2952411, *10 (D.N.J. July 18, 2012) (" 'A supervisor may be personally liable ... if he or she participated in violating the plaintiff's rights, directed others to violate them, or, as the person in charge, had knowledge of and acquiesced in his subordinates' violations.' A.M. ex rel J.M.K. v. Luzerne Cnty. Juvenile Det. Ctr., 372 F.3d 572, 586 (3d Cir.2004). The elements of the cause of action alleged are two-fold, that the supervisor have knowledge of the subordinates' violations and that the supervisor acquiesce in the subordinates' violations. Plaintiff alleges just that, that Police Chief Mooney had knowledge of and acquiesced in Officer Moynihan's conduct. However, while Plaintiff alleges the elements of the cause of action, she provides no factual allegations to support a plausible basis for relief. Rather, Plaintiff recites the elements of the cause of action in legal boilerplate. This is insufficient under Rule 8 and this Count must be dismissed.")

Plouffe v. Cevallos, No. 10–1502, 2012 WL 1994785, at *4 -*6 & n.4 (E.D. Pa. June 1, 2012) ("Plouffe asserts incorrectly that Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly has eliminated the requirement that he plead actual knowledge and acquiescence. Twombly held that factual allegations must be sufficient to raise a right to relief above a speculative level. . . It did not purport to relax the substantive requirements of supervisory liability under § 1983. If anything, the Supreme Court's later decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009), may bring into question the ongoing viability of knowledge and acquiescence as a basis for supervisory liability at all. In Iqbal, the Supreme Court held that a plaintiff must plead that each government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution. . . Iqbal's implications for supervisory liability are not yet clear. In a few post- Iqbal cases, the Third Circuit has questioned but not answered whether Iqbal narrowed the scope of supervisory liability. See, e.g., Argueta v. U.S. Immigration & Customs Enforcement, 643 F.3d 60, 70 (3d Cir.2011); Santiago v. Warminster Twp., 629 F.3d 121, 130 n. 8 (3d Cir.2010). Indeed, in one case, the Third Circuit commented that '[i]n light of ... [Iqbal], it is uncertain whether proof of [personal knowledge regarding a constitutional violation], with nothing more, would provide a sufficient basis for holding [defendant] liable ... under § 1983....' Bayer v. Monroe Cty. Children & Youth Servs., 577 F.3d 186, 190 n. 5 (3d Cir.2009). However, the Third Circuit has not resolved the questions of Iqbal's impact on all of the pre- Iqbal theories of supervisory liability. . . Because the Third Circuit has not held that a plaintiff may no longer establish § 1983 liability based on a supervisor's knowledge of and acquiescence in a subordinate's constitutional violation, this Court will continue to apply the pre- Iqbal supervisory liability analysis. . . . The defendants argue that the only allegations regarding Cavanaugh and Mottola's knowledge come after the fact, when Plouffe filed a post-termination grievance. Citing Rode v. Dellarciprete, the defendants argue that this is insufficient to establish personal involvement on the part of the supervisory officials. In Rode, the plaintiff alleged that the Governor had personal knowledge of the unconstitutional conduct against her because the plaintiff had filed grievances with the Governor's administrative office. The Third Circuit held that such allegations were insufficient to show actual knowledge and, hence, personal involvement. . . However, Rode is distinguishable from the case at bar. In Rode, the grievances filed with the governor's administrative office were the only evidence of actual knowledge on the part of the supervisory official; there was no allegation that the governor had personally reviewed the grievance or otherwise had knowledge of the alleged violation. By contrast, here, Plouffe alleges that defendant Mottola handled Plouffe's particular grievance. . . Furthermore, Plouffe claims that a representative from the Chancellor's Office was present at Plouffe's pre-termination final hearing, and that this representative responded to Plouffe's legal arguments. . . Regarding defendant Cavanaugh, Plouffe also alleged that the president of the local faculty union 'personally brought the matter to the attention of the Chancellor, who said he would look into it when the grievance reached his level.'. . These allegations, which the Court must accept as true, reasonably support a theory of contemporaneous knowledge and acquiescence by defendants Cavanaugh and Mottola.") Zeigler v. PHS Correctional Health Care, Inc., No. 11–203Erie, 2012 WL 1971149, at *4-*7 (W.D. Pa. June 1, 2012) ("If a prisoner is under the care of medical experts, a nonmedical prison official will generally be justified in believing that the prisoner is in capable hands. . . . [A] non-medical supervisory official may be held liable if there was 'knowledge of "malicious" and "sadistic" medical mistreatment.'. . .In her capacity as the Health Services Administrator, Defendant Overton is not deliberately indifferent if she failed to respond to Plaintiff's medical complaints while he was under the care of medical professionals. . . Defendant Overton's reliance on the opinion of medical professionals even as Plaintiff grieved his complaints about the alleged inadequacies in his medical treatment through the administrative remedy process. . . do not indicate that Overton possessed 'knowledge of malicious or sadistic medical mistreatment' so as to impose liability upon her. . . . The failure to train claim must be dismissed against Defendants Overton and Baker as such a claim is only available against entity-type defendants and not individuals. . . . Defendants Overton and Baker cannot be held liable for the failure to train their subordinates as they have no constitutional duty to do so.")

Peppers v. Booker, No. 11–3207 (CCC), 2012 WL 1806170, at 6, 7 (D.N.J. May 17, 2012) ("To survive a motion to dismiss, a section 1983 claim against named defendants in their individual capacities, a plaintiff must allege sufficient factual matter to support a claim for one of the two forms of supervisory liability. The first form of supervisory liability requires the plaintiff to allege that the supervisor 'established and maintained a policy, practice, or custom which directly caused [the] constitutional harm.'. . This form of supervisory liability does not require the plaintiff to allege a direct act by the defendant that caused the constitutional rights violation. Rather, a plaintiff may establish liability under this first form by alleging that the defendant's policy, practice, or custom, when enforced by subordinates or third parties, caused the plaintiffs harm under section 1983. . . The second form of supervisory liability under section 1983 requires a plaintiff to allege that the supervisor 'participated in violating plaintiff's rights, directed others to violate them, or, as a person in charge, had knowledge of and acquiesced in his subordinates' violations.'. . To establish a claim under the second form of supervisory liability, Plaintiffs would have to allege a direct and affirmative act by the Defendants that resulted in an infringement of Plaintiffs' constitutional rights. Under this form of supervisory liability, a defendant is held liable for their direct acts whether in the form of acquiescence or direct participation. Additionally, supervisory liability requires the plaintiff to show 'a causal connection between the supervisor's actions and the violation of plaintiff's rights.'. . .Plaintiff's factual assertions, taken as true, are not sufficient to sustain claims against Booker on the basis of knowledge and acquiescence. Plaintiffs assert that the Mayor insisted on or approved of their transfers and demotions. These factual assertions, without more, are not sufficient to establish a plausible claim against Mayor Booker.")

R.M. v. Sainato, Civ. No. 2:11–cv–01676 (WJM), 2012 WL 1623860, at *5-*8 (D.N.J. May 9, 2012) ("In this case, Plaintiff adequately pled that Sheriff Rochford had actual knowledge of an excessive risk to inmate safety. The Complaint alleges that Sheriff Rochford had 'actual ... knowledge' of the fact that Sainato was the subject of a criminal investigation involving allegations of sexual misconduct. . . The Complaint also alleges that Sheriff Rochford had 'actual ... knowledge' that Sainato 'was engaged in a series of sexual encounters with inmates' participating in the SLAP program. . .The Complaint therefore adequately alleges facts supporting Plaintiff's claim that Sheriff Rochford knew of a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmates. Plaintiff also adequately pled that Sheriff Rochford disregarded the risk. . . . Plaintiff adequately pled facts and allegations supporting a theory of fault in hiring. . . .In this case, Plaintiff alleged that Sheriff Rochford was responsible for hiring decisions and failed to adequately screen Defendant Sainato before hiring him. . . . Specifically, Plaintiff alleges that Sheriff Rochford hired Sainato 'despite actual and/or constructive knowledge [that Sainato] was the subject of a criminal investigation and charge(s) involving allegations of inappropriate sexual conduct.'. . Plaintiff's allegations clearly establish a direct causal link between Sainato's background, which includes criminal charges for sexual misconduct, and the particular constitutional violation Plaintiff suffered, i.e., sexual assault.

Thus, Plaintiff sufficiently alleged facts to support that Sainato 'was highly likely to inflict the particular injury suffered by the plaintiff.'. . Plaintiff failed to plead sufficient facts and allegations to support a theory of supervisory/training liability. Based on the Supreme Court's reasoning in City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989), the Third Circuit developed a four-part test for liability under the Eighth Amendment for failure to properly supervise and train. . . . It is not clear whether this theory of supervisory liability is still available in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal. . . . Like the Third Circuit in Argueta, this Court need not reach the question of the scope of supervising liability post- Iqbal, because the allegations in the Complaint are insufficient to make out a claim for supervisory liability. Consistent with Judge Sheridan's findings in the First Action, this Court finds that Plaintiff failed to identify a policy or practice that Sheriff Rochford failed to employ. Specifically, Plaintiff failed to 'identify in [his] pleading what exactly [the Defendant] should have done differently, whether with respect to specific training programs or other matters, that would have prevented the unconstitutional conduct.'. . Accordingly, this claim is dismissed without prejudice.")

Szemple v. UMDNJ, No. 10–5445 (PGS), 2012 WL 1600360, at *3 (D.N.J. May 7, 2012) ("In Iqbal, the Supreme Court held that '[b]ecause vicarious or supervisor liability is inapplicable to Bivens and § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. . Thus, each government official is liable only for his or her own conduct. The Court rejected the contention that supervisor liability can be imposed where the official had only 'knowledge' or 'acquiesced' in their subordinates conduct." footnote omitted)

Walker v. Walsh, No. 3:11–CV–1750, 2012 WL 1569629, at *3 (M.D. Pa. May 3, 2012) ("After de novo review, this Court will adopt the legal standards set forth in the R & R, which recognize that a supervisor may be held liable for the acts of his subordinates if he directed or actually knew of and acquiesced in the misconduct.")

Jackson v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, No. 11–6278 (JBS), 2012 WL 1435632, at *7 & n. 3 (D.N.J. Apr. 25, 2012) ("In light of the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal, supra, the Court questions the continuing validity of the Third Circuit's supervisory liability jurisprudence. As stated by the Supreme Court . . . . However, although the Third Circuit has acknowledged Iqbal's potential impact on § 1983 supervisory liability claims, it has declined to hold that a plaintiff may no longer establish liability under § 1983 based on a supervisor's knowledge of and acquiescence in a violation. . . Accordingly, this Court will continue to apply the Third Circuit's traditional supervisory liability analysis as set forth above. . . . Thus, Jackson appears to allege only that Zickefoose failed to take action once notified of the occurrences, even though he also alleges that he did not file any grievances at FCI Fort Dix. Participation in the after-the-fact review of a grievance or appeal is insufficient to establish personal involvement on the part of those individuals reviewing grievances. . . Therefore, Warden Zickefoose cannot be held liable in this instance, and the Complaint will be dismissed with prejudice for failure to state a claim, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 1915(e)(2) (B)(ii) and 1915A(b)(1).")

Baklayan v. Ortiz, No. 11–03943 (CCC), 2012 WL 1150842, at *5, *6 (D.N.J. Apr. 5, 2012) ("A liberal reading of the Complaint could find that Plaintiffs are asserting a theory of supervisory liability. . . .The only facts offered anywhere in the Complaint in support of a supervisory theory of liability are the descriptions of Defendants' jobs: Plaintiffs state that Defendant Ortiz was 'charged with ultimate responsibility for the training and supervision of Essex County correctional officers, and for the administration and implementation of the Essex County Department of Corrections policies, practices, and/or customs,' and that Defendant Pringle was 'charged with overseeing all programs and operations applicable to custody, inmate management and release from Essex County Correctional Facility.'. . It would be too great a leap for the Court to infer from these cursory job descriptions that Defendants were somehow aware of and acquiescent to the alleged misconduct, or that they were responsible for the policy or procedure which resulted in the alleged misconduct and deliberately indifferent to its result, and that they are therefore liable under § 1983. . . . Count Five alleges that Defendants failed to prevent the alleged unconstitutional conduct by 'knowingly, recklessly, or with gross negligence' failing to 'instruct, supervise, control, and discipline' their subordinates from: (1) unlawfully harassing Baklayan; (2) unlawfully implementing an immigration hold on a U.S. citizen; (3) conspiring to violate Baklayan's rights; and (4) otherwise depriving Baklayan of his rights. . . As with Count Four, Plaintiffs fail to allege any personal involvement in the alleged wrongdoing. . .As mentioned previously, a supervisor may be held liable under § 1983 when he or she 'with deliberate indifference to the consequences, established and maintained a policy, practice, or custom which directly caused [the] constitutional harm,'. . . or where the supervisor has knowledge of the incident and acquiesces to it. . . Plaintiffs have yet to allege any facts suggesting that Defendants knew about Baklayan's predicament or that they established a policy or custom that resulted in constitutional harms to Baklayan. Accordingly, Count Five is dismissed for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.")

Bondurant v. Christie, No. 10–3005 (FSH), 2012 WL 1108523, at *7, *8 (D.N.J. Apr. 2, 2012) ("The Third Circuit has recognized the potential effect that Iqbal might have in altering the standard for supervisory liability in a § 1983 suit but, to date, has declined to decide whether Iqbal requires narrowing of the scope of the test. . . Hence, it appears that, under a supervisory theory of liability, and even in light of Iqbal, personal involvement by a defendant remains the touchstone for establishing liability for the violation of a plaintiff's constitutional right. . . Facts showing personal involvement of the defendant must be asserted; such assertions may be made through allegations of specific facts showing that a defendant expressly directed the deprivation of a plaintiff's constitutional rights or created such policies where the subordinates had no discretion in applying the policies in a fashion other than the one which actually produced the alleged deprivation; e.g., supervisory liability may attach if the plaintiff asserts facts showing that the supervisor's actions were 'the moving force' behind the harm suffered by the plaintiff. . . Here, plaintiff provides no facts describing how these supervisory defendants allegedly violated his constitutional rights, i.e., he fails to allege facts to show that these defendants expressly directed the deprivation of his constitutional rights, or that they created policies which left subordinates with no discretion other than to apply them in a fashion which actually produced the alleged deprivation. In short, Bondurant has alleged no facts to support personal involvement by the supervisory defendants, and simply relies on recitations of legal conclusions such that they were responsible for its agencies and employees and for developing and applying policies, practices and procedures at their respective agencies. These bare allegations, 'because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth.'. . Accordingly, this Court will dismiss with prejudice the Amended Complaint (Docket entry no. 6), in its entirety, as against the defendants, Chris Christie, Governor of New Jersey; Gary Lanigan, Commissioner of NJDOC; and Jennifer Velez, Commissioner of NJDHS, because it is based on a claim of supervisor liability, which is not cognizable in this § 1983 action, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2)(B).")

Johnson v. Morgan, No. 09–007–LPS, 2012 WL 1427774, at *4, *5 (D. Del. Mar. 30, 2012) ("Under pre-Iqbal Third Circuit precedent, '[t]here are two theories of supervisory liability,' one under which supervisors can be liable if they 'established and maintained a policy, practice or custom which directly caused [the] constitutional harm,' and another under which supervisors can be liable if they 'participated in violating plaintiff's rights, directed others to violate them, or, as the person[s] in charge, had knowledge of and acquiesced in [their] subordinates' violations.'. . Supervisory liability may attach if the plaintiff shows that the supervisor's actions were 'the moving force' behind the harm suffered by the plaintiff. . . . The Third Circuit has recognized the potential effect that Iqbal might have in altering the standard for supervisory liability in a § 1983 suit but, to date, has declined to decide whether Iqbal requires narrowing the scope of the test. . . Hence, it appears that, under a supervisory theory of liability, and even in light of Iqbal, personal involvement by a defendant remains the touchstone for establishing liability for the violation of a plaintiff's constitutional right.")

Gaymon v. Esposito, No. 11–4170 (JLL), 2012 WL 1068750, at *10 (D.N.J. Mar. 29, 2012) ("To the extent that Plaintiffs allege that the Supervisory Defendants are liable in their individual capacities for failing to supervise and/or control Defendant Esposito, the Court finds the factual allegations insufficient to support such a claim. As stated infra, the Complaint fails to allege any facts relaying any information about Defendants Fontoura and Ryan's whereabouts and awareness when the alleged injury occurred, namely the fatal shooting of the Decedent by Officer Esposito. The Complaint thus does not state any facts which support their personal involvement in the alleged injury, nor are there any facts alleged supporting their actual knowledge and acquiescence in Defendant Esposito's use of deadly force. The Court thus dismisses Plaintiffs' § 1983 claims for failure to train, supervise and/or control as to the Supervisory Defendants")

Mayo v. County of York, No. 1:10–CV–01869, 2012 WL 871198, at *10, *11 (M.D. Pa. Feb. 16, 2012) (R & R) (" 'It is well-established that inmates do not have a constitutionally protected right to a prison grievance system.'. . Thus, a denial of a grievance or grievance appeal does not amount to a violation of a prisoner's constitutional rights. . . Although the amended complaint fails to state an independent claim upon which relief can be granted based on the processing of his grievances, the fact that the plaintiff filed grievances is relevant to the plaintiff's other claims. In some circumstances a grievance may be sufficient to put a prison official on notice of alleged continuing abuse by other prison staff and therefore may show actual knowledge of an alleged constitutional violation and acquiescence in the events forming the basis of a prisoner's claims. . . .The plaintiff alleges that he filed grievance informing the defendants of the ongoing denial of prescribed medical care but that the defendants failed to take corrective action. We conclude that the amended complaint sufficiently alleges personal involvement on the part of the defendants involved in the grievance process.")

Festa v. Jordan, 803 F.Supp.2d 319, 325 (M.D. Pa. 2011) ("There is no respondeat superior liability in the § 1983 context; a defendant must have personal involvement in the alleged wrongs for liability to attach. . . This personal involvement can be shown where a defendant personally directs the wrongs, or has actual knowledge of the wrongs and acquiesces in them. . . Actual knowledge 'can be inferred from circumstances other than actual sight.'. . Acquiescence is found '[w]here a supervisor with authority over a subordinate knows that the subordinate is violating someone's rights but fails to act to stop the subordinate from doing so, the factfinder may usually infer that the supervisor "acquiesced" in (i.e., tacitly assented to or accepted) the subordinate's conduct.' . . The defendant claims that there is 'a complete lack of evidence' that Ware directed, supervised, or approved of the police searches and seizures. The Court disagrees. The plaintiff has introduced circumstantial evidence from which a rational juror could draw the conclusion that Ware either directed, or knew and acquiesced in, the searches and seizures. First, Ware notified the police that Coss might be with Festa. Second, he expressed a desire that Festa's children not be present at the house. Third, he was actually present at the scene of the completed car search after receiving a phone call from an officer. Fourth, he was present at the search of Festa's home, even though how close he was is in dispute. This is more than a scintilla of evidence from which a juror could disbelieve Ware's claims that he did not direct the officers. After all, Ware admitted that he frequently advises police, at least two phone calls between him and Dunmore officers were made, he acted to ensure that no children were in the house, and he was present at the scene. His mere presence at the scenes of the searches, moreover, plausibly suggests actual knowledge and acquiescence in the events that occurred. For this reason, summary judgment on the grounds that supervisory liability cannot be imposed on Ware will be denied." footnote omitted)

Campbell v. Gibb, No. 10–6584 (JBS), 2012 WL 603204, at *10 & n.6 (D.N.J. Feb. 21, 2012) ("In light of the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal,. . . the Court questions the continuing validity of the Third Circuit's supervisory liability jurisprudence. . . . However, although the Third Circuit has acknowledged Iqbal's potential impact on § 1983 supervisory liability claims, it has declined to hold that a plaintiff may no longer establish liability under § 1983 based on a supervisor's knowledge of and acquiescence in a violation. Santiago v. Warminster Twp., 629 F.3d 121, 130 n. 8 (3d Cir.2010); Bayer v. Monroe, 577 F.3d 186, 190 n. 5 (3d Cir.2009). Accordingly, this Court will continue to apply the Third Circuit's traditional supervisory liability analysis as set forth above.")

Cooper v. Sharp, No. 10–5245 (FSH), 2012 WL 274800, at *14 (D.N.J. Jan. 31, 2012) ("Here, plaintiff provides no facts describing how the supervisory defendants, Singer and Dacosta, allegedly violated his constitutional rights, i.e., he fails to allege facts to show that these defendants expressly directed the deprivation of his constitutional rights, or that they created policies which left subordinates with no discretion other than to apply them in a fashion which actually produced the alleged deprivation. In short, Cooper has alleged no facts to support personal involvement by the supervisory defendants, and simply relies on recitations of legal conclusions such that they failed to supervise, oversee or correct the treatment of civilly committed residents at EJSP–STU as prisoners in violation of plaintiff's constitutional rights.")

Richardson v. Crawford County Correctional Facility, NO. CIV.A. 10-275 ERIE, 2011 WL 7102576, at *9 (W.D. Pa. Nov 21, 2011), Report and Recommendation Adopted as Modified byRichardson v. Crawford County Correctional Facility, 2012 WL 253195 (W.D. Pa. Jan 26, 2012) ("Plaintiff alleges that sometime after his return from Meadville Medical Center and while his arm was still in a sling, Defendant Schrekengost slammed a steel door on Plaintiff's injured arm 'with maliciousness and purpose.'. . Further, Plaintiff alleges that Wardens Lewis and Saulsbery 'have been made aware and have had actual knowledge of such physically vindictive conduct of ... Schrekengost in the past pervious to the complained events (and since), of its substantial and dangerous propensities to the safety and health of the inmates and yet have acquiesced in same, doing nothing to correct her said contacts.'. . Defendant Wardens move to dismiss this claim against them because it is grounded in supervisory liability which cannot support a § 1983 action. Defendants are wrong in this regard. Plaintiff has specifically alleged that the Wardens were personally involved in that they knew of Schrekengost's past vindictive conduct and acquiesced in it. This allegation is sufficient to support a claim against Defendants Wardens at this motion to dismiss stage.")

Ballard v. Williams, No. 3:10-CV-1456, 2011 WL 5089726, at *4 (M.D. Pa. Oct. 25, 2011) ("[T]he Magistrate Judge failed to consider that '[i]t is also possible to establish section 1983 supervisory liability by showing a supervisor tolerated past or ongoing misbehavior.' Argueta v. United States Immigration & Customs Enforcement, 643 F.3d 60, 72 (3d Cir.2011) (citing Baker v. Monroe Township, 50 F.3d 1186, 1191 n. 3 (3d Cir.1995). While merely mishandling a grievance may not be a constitutional violation, 'a supervisor may be personally liable under § 1983 if he or she participated in violating the plaintiff's rights, directed others to violate them, or, as the person in charge, had knowledge of and acquiesced in his subordinates' violations.' A.M. v. Luzerne County Juvenile Det. Ctr., 372 F.3d 572, 586 (3d Cir.2004). In his response brief, Plaintiff suggests that this may well be the sort of liability he is seeking against Palakovich and Zobitne, averring that their actions were 'tantamount to supervisory liability.'. . Admittedly, this claim is difficult to glean from Plaintiff's Amended Complaint. He merely states that Defendant Zobitne, as Unit Manager, had disregarded the Plaintiff's request and never responded back. . . And, although the exact hierarchy at the prison is not explained, this claim could serve as the foundation for supervisor liability. As for Defendant Palakovich, the allegations are even more barren, though it is clear that Ballard is claiming that Defendant Palakovich acted intentionally in depriving Plaintiff of his property. . . As such, both of these potential claims are insufficient to survive the Motion to Dismiss, even under the liberal pro se pleading standard, . . . as additional factual recitations are required. However, as explained below, Plaintiff will be given leave to amend.")

Abraham v. Danberg, 832 F.Supp.2d 368, 378 (D. Del. 2011) ("Facts showing personal involvement of the defendant must be asserted; such assertions may be made through allegations of specific facts showing that a defendant expressly directed the deprivation of a plaintiff's constitutional rights or created such policies where the subordinates had no discretion in applying the policies in a fashion other than the one which actually produced the alleged deprivation; e.g., supervisory liability may attach if the plaintiff asserts facts showing that the supervisor's actions were 'the moving force' behind the harm suffered by the plaintiff.")

Mohney v. Pennsylvania, 809 F.Supp.2d 384, 391, 392 (W.D. Pa. 2011) ("Generally, in order to establish supervisory liability against government officials in their individual capacities under § 1983, a plaintiff must demonstrate that the officials were personally involved in the commission of the conduct alleged. . . However, the United States Supreme Court has recognized a second theory of supervisory liability in that 'there are limited circumstances in which an allegation of "failure to train" can be the basis for liability under § 1983.' City of Canton, Ohio v. Harris , 489 U .S. 378, 387 (1989). In such case, a plaintiff must establish that the alleged 'failure to train amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the [untrained persons] come into contact.'. . . Accordingly, Defendants are not correct in asserting that personal involvement is a necessary element of a viable § 1983 claim. Nonetheless, even taken in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the facts pleaded in the Amended Complaint are not sufficient to constitute deliberate indifference. . . . In his Amended Complaint, Plaintiff states that the Supervisory Defendants 'have encouraged, tolerated, ratified, and had been deliberately indifferent to' a pattern of misconduct involving, among other things, the use of excessive force, the failure to establish proper procedures with respect to encounters with mentally disabled persons, the improper use of taser weapons, and the failure to discipline officers who were the subject of prior complaints. . . . However, there are no facts offered in support of those conclusory statements. The Amended Complaint does not establish the requisite pattern of constitutional violations necessary to make Plaintiff's supervisory liability claim plausible on its face. Nor has Plaintiff provided any facts related to prior encounters between mentally disabled individuals who have doused themselves with gasoline and PSP officers, which would demonstrate the need for the sort of specialized training that Plaintiff alleges was lacking in this case. . . Therefore, the § 1983 claims against Supervisory Defendants Neal, Wilson, and Pawlowski in their individual capacities will be DISMISSED.")

Lane v. Phelps, 800 F.Supp.2d 646, 650 (D. Del. 2011) ("The Third Circuit has recognized the potential effect that Iqbal might have in altering the standard for supervisory liability in a § 1983 suit but, to date, has declined to decide whether Iqbal requires narrowing of the scope of the test. . . Hence, it appears that, under a supervisory theory of liability, and even in light of Iqbal, personal involvement by a defendant remains the touchstone for establishing liability for the violation of a plaintiff's constitutional right. . . . Facts showing personal involvement of the defendant must be asserted; such assertions may be made through allegations of specific facts showing that a defendant expressly directed the deprivation of a plaintiff's constitutional rights or created such policies where the subordinates had no discretion in applying the policies in a fashion other than the one which actually produced the alleged deprivation[.]")

Major Tours, Inc. v. Colorel, 799 F.Supp.2d 396, 398, 399 (D.N.J. 2011) ("As this Court explained in Liberty and Prosperity 1776, Inc. v. Corzine, 720 F.Supp.2d 622, 628-29 (D.N .J.2010), claims based on a showing that a supervisor knew of and acquiesced to the discriminatory conduct of a subordinate are not foreclosed by Iqbal. Iqbal rejected supervisory liability in that case because the Supreme Court found that a nondiscriminatory intention, and not discriminatory animus, was the more likely inference to be drawn from the allegations made in that case regarding the supervisor's conduct. . . Consequently, merely permitting the operation of the discriminatory policy did not state a claim against the policymaker because there was no factual allegation or reasonable inference regarding discriminatory purpose behind that decision. . . Conversely, if a plaintiff shows that the supervisory decisions that resulted in the discriminatory effects were taken for a discriminatory reason, then the plaintiff need not show that the supervisor himself directly executed the harmful action. . . .[A] reasonable jury could find that Schulze and Calorel's own actions caused Plaintiffs' buses to be stopped on the basis of the race of the owners.")

Johnson v. Bradford, No. 10-5039 (RBK), 2011 WL 1748433, at *7, *8 (D.N.J. May 6, 2011) ("Under pre-Iqbal Third Circuit precedent, '[t]here are two theories of supervisory liability,' one under which supervisors can be liable if they 'established and maintained a policy, practice or custom which directly caused [the] constitutional harm,' and another under which they can be liable if they 'participated in violating plaintiff's rights, directed others to violate them, or, as the person[s] in charge, had knowledge of and acquiesced in [their] subordinates' violations.' Santiago v. Warminster Twp., 629 F.3d 121, 127 n. 5 (3d Cir.2010) (internal quotation marks omitted). . . .The Third Circuit has recognized the potential effect that Iqbal might have in altering the standard for supervisory liability in a § 1983 suit but, to date, has declined to decide whether Iqbal requires narrowing of the scope of the test. . . Hence, it appears that, under a supervisory theory of liability, and even in light of Iqbal, personal involvement by a defendant remains the touchstone for establishing liability for the violation of a plaintiff's constitutional right. . . . Here, plaintiff provides no facts describing how the supervisory defendants allegedly violated his constitutional rights, i.e., he fails to allege facts to show that these defendants expressly directed the deprivation of his constitutional rights, or that they created policies which left subordinates with no discretion other than to apply them in a fashion which actually produced the alleged deprivation. In short, Johnson has alleged no facts to support personal involvement by the supervisory defendants, and simply relies on recitations of legal conclusions such that they failed to supervise or failed to protect plaintiff in violation of his First, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights.")

Nykiel v. Borough of Sharpsburg, No. 08-0813, 2011 WL 869141, at *12, *13 (W.D. Pa. Mar. 9, 2011) ("In Iqbal, the United States Supreme Court upheld the decision in Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388, 91 S.Ct. 1999, 29 L.Ed.2d 619 (1971), that absent respondeat superior, each federal government official is liable for his or her own misconduct. . . However, purpose rather than knowledge is required to impose Bivens liability on the official charged with violations arising from his or her superintendent responsibilities. However, contrary to defendant's position, these cases apply to federal employees and not section 1983 supervisory liability claims. . . .The present case differs from Iqbal and Bivens. First, the officials in Iqbal and Bivens were federal officials and not state officials, like Chief Rudzki, to which the standards of section 1983 apply. Likewise, in Iqbal, the plaintiff was seeking supervisor liability based solely upon the officer's role and not his actions. . . Here, there is a dispute of material facts regarding Chief Rudzki's actions and how they reflect a knowledge of and acquiescence to the detention and subsequent restraining of Nykiel by Officer Duffy and Officer Mitchell for the following reasons. First, prior to arriving to the Sharpsburg police station that day, he spoke with Officer Duffy on several occasions over the telephone and was aware of the surrounding circumstances of Nykiel's arrest. Second, upon Chief Rudzki arriving at the station, the record indicates that Nykiel was exhibiting combative behavior, the officers were restraining him, and the medics were treating him. Chief Rudzki observed the events from the hallway when he arrived at the station for approximately three to five minutes and then went back to his office. Prior to returning to his office, Officer Fusco informed him that he strongly believed Nykiel was overdosing on crack cocaine. The record does not reveal that he adequately inquired as to what was going on or the type of medical treatment or physical treatment being administered to Nykiel. This contemporaneous knowledge of possible offending acts as well as inaction on Chief Rudzki's part could be interpreted by a reasonable juror as circumstances under which Chief Rudzki was aware of and acquiesced to Officer Duffy and Officer Mitchell's actions and communicated a message of approval to the allegedly offending officers. For the foregoing reasons, summary judgment on supervisor liability will be denied.")

Fennell v. Rodgers, 762 F.Supp.2d 727, 732, 733 (D. Del. 2011) ("The Third Circuit has recognized the potential effect that Iqbal might have in altering the standard for supervisory liability in a § 1983 suit but, to date, has declined to decide whether Iqbal requires narrowing of the scope of the test. . . Hence, it appears that, under a supervisory theory of liability, and even in light of Iqbal, personal involvement by a defendant remains the touchstone for establishing liability for the violation of a plaintiff's constitutional right. . . Facts showing personal involvement of the defendant must be asserted; such assertions may be made through allegations of specific facts showing that a defendant expressly directed the deprivation of a plaintiff's constitutional rights or created such policies where the subordinates had no discretion in applying the policies in a fashion other than the one which actually produced the alleged deprivation; e.g., supervisory liability may attach if the plaintiff asserts facts showing that the supervisor's actions were 'the moving force' behind the harm suffered by the plaintiff. . . Plaintiff has not refuted Scarborough's sworn statement that Scarborough does not know plaintiff, that his duties did not include implementing procedures for requesting medical treatment, and that he was not involved in grievances submitted by plaintiff. While plaintiff argues that Scarborough 'lied,' he provides no evidence to support his argument. . . . A reasonable jury could not find that Scarborough was personally involved in plaintiff[']s claims. Therefore, the court will grant Scarborough's motion for summary judgment.").

Thomas v. Board of Educ. of Brandywine School School Dist., 759 F.Supp.2d 477, 495-97 & n.19 (D. Del. 2010) ("The Court acknowledges some lack of clarity in the case law – and in the parties' briefing − as to the interaction between supervisory liability and the doctrine of qualified immunity. For example, the parties identify Plaintiff's constitutional right as the 'right to be free from sexual abuse.'. . While, of course, Plaintiff has such a right, . . . there is no allegation here that Harter, a supervisor, directly violated that right. Instead, the issue here could be stated as whether Plaintiff had a clearly established constitutional right to be free of a public school superintendent's deliberate indifference to sexual abuse being committed against the student by a teacher. Alternatively, the issue might be stated as whether Plaintiff can demonstrate supervisory liability against Harter; if Plaintiff cannot, then undertaking further qualified immunity analysis becomes unnecessary. . . . Where, as here, individual liability is predicated on a defendant's supervisory role, the supervisor -defendant 'must have personal involvement in the alleged wrongs; liability cannot be predicated solely on the operation of respondeat superior.... Personal involvement can be shown through allegations of personal direction or of actual knowledge and acquiescence ...'. In other words, a supervisor may only be held liable for a constitutional violation in which the supervisor can fairly be said to have had a personal involvement. There are two ways of demonstrating the personal involvement of supervisors sufficient to justify imposing Section 1983 liability on a supervisor in his individual capacity. First, supervisors can be liable 'if they established and maintained a policy, practice or custom which directly caused [the] constitutional harm.'. . . Alternatively, supervisors can be 'liable if they participated in violating plaintiff's rights, directed others to violate them, or, as the person[s] in charge, had knowledge of and acquiesced in [their] subordinates' violations.'. . . While the Third Circuit has not adopted a test for determining when supervisory liability exists based on sexual harassment in the public school context, several other courts of appeals have done so, and the Court considers those tests to be highly instructive. Thus, in order to hold Barter liable in his individual capacity, Plaintiff must show; (1) the defendant learned of facts or a pattern of inappropriate sexual behavior by a subordinate pointing plainly toward the conclusion that the subordinate was sexually abusing the student, and (2) the defendant demonstrated deliberate indifference toward the constitutional rights of the student by failing to take action that was obviously necessary to prevent or stop the abuse, and (3) such failure caused a constitutional injury to the student. . . . Here, there is insufficient record evidence to permit a reasonable juror to find that Harter had actual knowledge of sexual abuse by Holt.")

Mincy v. McConnell, C.A. No. 09-236 Erie, 2010 WL 3092681, at *5 (W.D. Pa. July 15, 2010) ("If a grievance official's only involvement is investigating and/or ruling on an inmate's grievance after the incident giving rise to the grievance has already occurred, there is no personal involvement on the part of that official. . . However, a supervisory official can be found liable under §1983 if it is shown that he had knowledge of and acquiesced in his subordinates' violations. . . . Plaintiff has not alleged that Defendants Harlow, Giroux, or Brooks were, in any way, personally involved in the harassment or retaliation of which he complains. However, Plaintiff does allege that these Defendants were aware of Defendant McConnell's 'retaliatory tendencies' and 'racially motivated abusive behavior,' yet failed to take any corrective action. This awareness is alleged to have come from numerous 'grievances, civil actions, and complaints' that were allegedly filed against Defendant McConnell, presumably by Plaintiff and other inmates. Construed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, these allegations are sufficient to show that these Defendants had knowledge of and essentially acquiesced in their subordinates' complained-of misconduct.")

Liberty And Prosperity 1776, Inc. v. Corzine, 720 F.Supp.2d 622, 628, 629 (D. N.J. 2010) ("After the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal, there is some uncertainty over the continued existence of liability for a supervisor who knows about the unconstitutional conduct of subordinates and does nothing to stop it. . . Longstanding Third Circuit Court of Appeals precedent holds that supervisory personnel can be held liable under § 1983 if they had knowledge of and acquiesced in subordinates' constitutional violations. . . But Iqbal makes it clear that there is no separate test for liability under § 1983 for supervisors; rather, each claim must satisfy the requirements of individual liability for each defendant regardless of supervisory position . . . A careful reading of Iqbal reveals that it does not foreclose Plaintiffs' claim based on knowledge and acquiescence, and therefore the alternative allegations in the Complaint are sufficient. While Iqbal did hold that elements of a § 1983 claim cannot be imputed to a supervisor by way of respondeat superior, it did not hold that acts or omissions regarding superintendent duties can never state a claim. This distinction is crucial. . . . The allegations in Iqbal were insufficient to state a claim under the Equal Protection clause, not because decisions made by a supervisor with respect to whether certain policies will be carried out cannot state a claim, but because that particular claim requires not just acts or omissions that have discriminatory effects, but also that the decisions be the consequence of purposeful discrimination. The requirement of purpose in Iqbal flows from the nature of an Equal Protection claim, rather than some general requirement of supervisory liability. . . Some free speech claims made against supervisors may similarly require factual allegations regarding the supervisor's discriminatory purpose, if the restriction is facially content-neutral but the plaintiff claims that it has a viewpoint-discriminatory purpose, for example. . . . Other free speech claims do not require this kind of finding of discriminatory purpose, such as those based on policies that facially discriminate based on content, . . . but may require allegations regarding knowledge and intent when qualified immunity is raised. Even for claims that require a finding of purpose, sometimes this finding is the only reasonable inference from the nature of the restriction, meaning that no separate factual allegation to support a finding of purpose is required. Such is the case here. Even if purpose is a necessary element of Plaintiffs' claims, the Governor's decision to permit the speech limitations reasonably raises the inference that the decision was taken with a discriminatory purpose because a very likely motivation for the policy was to prevent the speech of people who opposed the plan since the policy permitted the speech of Save Our State. It would be as if, in Iqbal, the plaintiffs had alleged that Ashcroft had implemented a policy of arresting only Arab Muslims who voted for Ralph Nader. In such a case, if not the only reasonable inference, certainly an extremely strong inference sufficient to state a plausible claim would be that this decision was taken because of, and not in spite of the protected political expression of the targets. In summary, Iqbal does not abandon constitutional liability for supervisors' decisions regarding policies implemented by subordinates. The Supreme Court would not have made such a sweeping change to the law by implication. The case simply reiterates the longstanding distinction between supervisory liability based on the discrete conduct of the supervisor that meets the requirements for the claim, and liability that is imputed to the supervisor solely by virtue of the supervisory position. If a claim requires discriminatory purpose as well as discriminatory effect, then the plaintiff must allege facts sufficient to show that the supervisory decisions that resulted in the discriminatory effects were taken for a discriminatory reason. And, in such cases, where a discriminatory purpose is a plausible inference from the facts, and in the absence of a 'more likely' motivation to be inferred, then this obligation has been met. Thus, the question with respect to the sufficiency of the allegations against Governor Corzine is not about his personal participation, since the allegation of knowledge and acquiescence is sufficient. The question is whether the facts alleged raise a plausible claim that viewpoint discrimination motivated the restrictions, rather than some content-neutral motivation . . . .")

Park v. Veasie, No. 3:CV-09-2177, 2010 WL 2367666, at *7, *8 (M.D. Pa. June 9, 2010) ("Various courts of appeals, including the Third Circuit, have recognized the potential effect that Iqbal might have in altering the standard for supervisory liability in a Bivens or a § 1983 suit. . . However, it appears that, under a supervisory theory of liability, and even in light of *Iqbal, personal involvement by a defendant remains the touchstone for establishing liability for the violation of a plaintiff's constitutional right. Here, Plaintiffs have alleged sufficient facts suggesting that Veasie was both personally involved in the improper search and seizure. . . and that he directed Defendants Bogart and Markochik to violate Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights. For instance, Plaintiffs allege that Veasie intentionally chose officers with little training and experience in conducting a drug raid and that he was responsible for conducting the raid. . . Combined with the more specific allegations that Plaintiffs make concerning Veasie's direct involvement, these allegations are sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss.")

Whitaker v. Springettsbury Tp., Civil No. 1:08-CV-627, 2010 WL 1565453, at *14 (M.D. Pa. Apr. 19, 2010) ("Supervisory liability under § 1983 utilizes the same standard as claims for municipal liability. Iqbal, __ U.S. __, 129 S.Ct. at 1948; Carter, 181 F.3d at 356. A supervisor will only be liable for the acts of a subordinate if he fosters a policy or custom that amounts to deliberate indifference towards an individual's constitutional rights. . .To establish supervisory liability , a plaintiff 'must (1) identify the specific supervisory practice or procedure that the supervisor failed to employ, and show that (2) the existing custom and practice without the identified, absent custom or procedure created an unreasonable risk of the ultimate injury, (3) the supervisor was aware that the unreasonable risk existed, (4) the supervisor was indifferent to the risk; and (5) the underling's violation resulted from the supervisory practice or procedure.' Brown v. Muhlenberg Twp., 269 F.3d 205, 216 (3d Cir.2001) (citing Sample v. Diecks, 885 F.2d 1099, 1118 (3d Cir.1989). As we found above, Plaintiffs have pointed to no evidence in this case to show that a relevant policy or custom proximately caused the alleged use of unconstitutionally excessive force that resulted in Whitaker's death, and Plaintiffs have not identified evidence to support any other factor that must be shown to establish a failure to supervise on the part of Chief Eshbach. Given the absence of evidence in support of this claim, and because we can perceive no basis for permitting a claim for supervisory liability to go forward on the record developed, we will recommend that the Court enter summary judgment in Chief Eshbach's favor with respect to all claims.").

Bullock v. Beard, No. 3:10-CV-401, 2010 WL 1507228, at *4 (M.D. Pa. Apr. 14, 2010) ("In Count 2, Plaintiffs bring a § 1983 claim against Defendants Beard, Klopotosky, Walsh and Mooney. Most of the language in this claim seems to be couched in the rhetoric of municipal liability claims for failure to train employees. . . However, Plaintiffs have not named any municipal defendants, so this cannot be the appropriate standard for this claim. The only other type of claim that would have been covered under Count 1 is a claim for supervisory liability. The Plaintiffs' Complaint makes out a claim under supervisory liability by alleging that these Defendants had actual knowledge of the Eighth Amendment violations occurring in SCID and acquiescing to these violations. For example, the Plaintiffs alleged that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the safety of prisoners and thereby condoned the disregard for psychiatric needs of inmates, such that Decedent's death was likely to occur. . . This claim, therefore, alleges the type of knowledge and acquiescence sufficient to make out a claim for supervisory liability pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983.").

Williams v. Lackawanna County Prison, No. 4:CV-07-1137, 2010 WL 1491132, at *4, *5 (M.D. Pa. Apr. 13, 2010) ("Accepting Williams' allegations as true, Williams has pled facts sufficient to state a plausible claim to relief [malicious and sadistic use of force] as to defendants Blume, Craven, and Masci; therefore, we will refrain from dismissing this claim as to these defendants. See Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1960. However, in his complaints, Williams also indicates that he wishes to sue Warden Donate. Williams claims the following: I have sent numerous grievances to the Warden and nothing has been done. She knows of the violation of my rights and failed to do anything to fix the situation. She also created these policies and customs allowing and encouraging these illegal acts, and she is grossly negligent in managing the people she is suppose [sic] to supervise. . . In his first amendment to his original complaint, Williams asserts, 'Warden Janine Donate refuses to investigate any of my complaints/grievances. I have been grieving my issues to her for 8 months now and she hasn't responded to any of them. She approves and encourages this type of behavior of her prison and staff members.' . . With this claim, Williams appears to be alleging a supervisory liability claim against Warden Donate under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. According to traditional Third Circuit precedent, supervisory personnel are only liable under § 1983 if they participated in or had knowledge of violations, if they directed others to commit violations, or if they had knowledge of and acquiesced in subordinates' violations. Baker v. Monroe Twp., 50 F.3d 1186, 1191 (3d Cir.1995). However, with its decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, the Supreme Court may have cast doubt on the viability of this standard for holding government officials liable based on a theory of supervisory liability under § 1983. . . . Various courts of appeals, including the Third Circuit, have recognized the potential effect that Iqbal might have in altering the standard for supervisory liability in a Bivens or a § 1983 suit. [citing Bayer and Maldonado] However, it appears that, under a supervisory theory of liability, and even in light of Iqbal, personal involvement by a defendant remains the touchstone for establishing liability for the violation of a plaintiff's constitutional right. Additionally, in the context of the Eighth Amendment claim of cruel and unusual punishment, this involvement may be demonstrated 'through allegations of personal direction or of actual knowledge and acquiescence.' Rode v. Dellarciprete, 845 F.2d 1195, 1207 (3d Cir.1988); see also Womack v. Smith, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 120728, at *15-17 (M.D.Pa. Dec. 29, 2009) (Conner, J.) (noting that, in applying the Rode standard of personal involvement in a case in which the plaintiff alleged cruel and unusual punishment, the Supreme Court's holding in Iqbal "is expressly limited to situations involving discrimination" and that the Court in that case made clear that "the factors necessary to establish a Bivens violation will vary with the constitutional provisions at issue"). Here, Williams has not alleged any facts that would support the personal involvement of Warden Donate in either the denial of the grievance process or the alleged assault. . . Instead, Williams merely claims that the warden 'refuses to investigate' his complaints and grievances and has failed to respond 'to any of them.' . .In addition, he claims that '[s]he approves and encourages this type of behavior' within the prison, . . .that she 'created these policies and customs allowing and encouraging these illegal acts,' and that 'she is grossly negligent in managing the people she is suppose [sic] to supervise.'. .These allegations simply amount to a recitation of the legal elements of a constitutional claim that are insufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss. . . Accordingly, we will dismiss, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii), the above-referenced claims against Warden Donate premised upon supervisory liability.").

Womack v. Smith, No. 1:06-CV-2348, 2009 WL 5214966, at *5, *6 (M.D. Pa. Dec. 29, 2009) ("We do not subscribe to the defendants reading of Iqbal. The defendants insist that this recent Supreme Court decision overturns longstanding Third Circuit precedent which permits a finding of personal involvement through either allegations of 'personal direction or actual knowledge and acquiescence." Rode v. Dellarciprete, 845 F.2d 1195, 1207 (3d Cir.1988) (emphasis added). The court believes Iqbal is distinguishable from the instant case. First, as the Supreme Court makes clear in Iqbal, the factors necessary to establish a Bivens violation will vary with the constitutional provisions at issue. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948. The claims at issue in Iqbal involved discrimination in contravention of the First and Fifth Amendments to the Constitution. Id. at 1944. Supreme Court decisions are clear that in order to make out a claim of discrimination under the First and Fifth Amendments a plaintiff must plead and prove that the defendants acted with 'discriminatory purpose.' Id. In the case sub judice, the plaintiff alleges cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment, not discrimination. The court's concern here is strictly limited to whether prison officials acted with 'deliberate indifference' towards a 'substantial risk of serious harm to an inmate.' Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 828, 832-37, 114 S.Ct. 1970 (1994). Second, the Supreme Court's own holding is expressly limited to situations involving discrimination. The Court specifically stated that '[i]n the context of determining whether there is a violation of clearly established right to overcome qualified immunity, purpose rather than knowledge is required to impose Bivens liability ... for unconstitutional discrimination...." Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949 (emphasis added). Therefore, the court will apply the knowledge and acquiescence standard in determining whether the plaintiff has sufficiently pleaded personal involvement. . . . The allegations state that on multiple occasions between December 9, 2004 and January 4, 2005 defendant Smith informed Lappin, Dodrill, Vanyur, Thomas, Kendig and Marioana, in writing, that the plaintiff was placed in restraints while he was housed in a secure cell and that the plaintiff was compliant when placed in restraints. . . In particular, defendant Dodrill was informed at least once every eight hours, a total of 75 separate notifications, that the plaintiff was being restrained. . . None of the defendants ostensibly took action to alleviate the plaintiff's conditions or reprimanded any of the corrections officers involved. . .We conclude that the allegations are sufficient to subject Defendant Dodrill to potential liability, but are insufficient as to the other defendants. Here, the averments against Dodrill demonstrate that he was notified no less than 75 times of the prolonged restraint of Womack. Such continuous and systematic notification indicate[s] that Dodrill knew of the plaintiff's condition. Additionally, his alleged non-intervention after being notified of the plaintiff's condition indicate[s] that Dodrill acquiesced in the restraining of Womack. In sharp contrast, Womack's claims against Lappin, Vanyur, Thomas, Kendig and Marioana involve only three notices and the court concludes that the allegations against them are insufficient to show knowledge and acquiescence. Specific and detailed allegations are needed to show that these defendants had personal knowledge in order to sustain . . .civil rights claims against them. . . Womack's theory is that the defendants had personal knowledge based solely on defendant Smith's three communications indicating the plaintiff was restrained. . . The Bureau of Prisons employs thousands of employees and oversees thousands of prisoners. The smaller regional offices also are responsible for thousands of employees and prisoners. These allegations are simply insufficient to show that Lappin, Vanyur, Thomas, Kendig and Marioana had actual knowledge. A holding to the contrary would subject the Director of the Bureau of Prisons and regional administrators to potential liability merely because an inmate or a corrections officer transmits a small number of status updates to regional and national authorities. . . Without detailed and specific allegations, the plaintiff's claims against these defendants are insufficient to show they had knowledge of and acquiesced in his treatment. Nevertheless, the court will dismiss the claims against Lappin, Vanyur, Thomas, Kendig and Marioana without prejudice and grant leave to file an amended pleading if discovery reveals additional evidence of actual knowledge.").

Young v. Speziale, No. 07-03129 (SDW-MCA), 2009 WL 3806296, at *7, *9 (D.N.J. Nov. 10, 2009) ("In Iqbal, the Supreme Court held that a plaintiff seeking to impose supervisory liability on a § 1983 defendant must allege more than that the particular defendant 'knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to' violate a plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . Although such allegations were held to be insufficient in Iqbal, the plaintiff's claims there are distinguishable from those of Young. Specifically, the plaintiff in Iqbal brought a Bivens action for discrimination in violation of the First and Fifteenth Amendments. Such claims require a plaintiff to plead and prove that the defendant acted with discriminatory purpose . . . As a result of this particular requirement, the Supreme Court concluded that mere knowledge on the part of the supervisor was an insufficient basis for Bivens liability, which it treated as equivalent to § 1983 liability. . . There is no such requirement for a § 1983 claim for inadequate medical care arising under either the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments. . . The Supreme Court, in Iqbal, even prefaced its analysis of this issue by recognizing that '[t]he factors necessary to establish a Bivens [or § 1983] violation will vary with the constitutional provision at issue.'. . Iqbal thus does not support the proposition that general allegations are never sufficient to support a § 1983 claim. . . .The Court is aware of the qualified immunity doctrine and the underlying policy, espoused therein, against discovery; however, at this juncture, discovery is needed to, at a minimum, determine the players involved in the denial of Plaintiff's request for surgery. Although it 'exacts heavy costs in terms of efficiency and expenditure of valuable time and resources that might otherwise be directed to the proper execution of the work of the Government, ... [l]itigation [may be] be necessary to ensure that officials comply with the law.'").

Gioffre v. County Of Bucks, No. 08-4232, 2009 WL 3617742, at *5 (E.D. Pa. Nov. 2, 2009) ("These supervisory officials here argue that the allegations against them amount to nothing more than formulaic recitations of the elements of supervisory liability and must, therefore, be disregarded. . . Further, they argue that even if the allegations were deemed factual, these facts fail to establish that they were personally involved in Mr. Gioffre's alleged constitutional injuries. . . Specifically, Defendants maintain that Plaintiff has alleged only that they established or implemented policies denying inmates adequate medical care and failed to properly train, supervise, monitor or discipline the medical staff. They argue that such allegations are insufficient to establish the supervisory liability of non-medical prison officials because Plaintiff fails to allege that Defendants had any actual knowledge of Mr. Gioffre's alleged constitutional injuries. . . With respect to Defendants, the Complaint alleges (1) that upon admission, Mr. Gioffre needed a medical examination, which he was not provided because of prison customs and policies, Compl. at & 17; (2) that as of the date of Mr. Gioffre's admission, Defendants had established, tolerated or ratified a practice, custom or policy of failing to provide necessary medical care to inmates to 'avoid the costs of necessary medication, treatment and hospitalization,' id. at & 29 (emphasis added); and (3) that Defendants were on notice of the constitutionally insufficient practices at BCCF because of 'inmate complaints, court rulings, reports, and other information,' id. at & 30. To be sure, this version of the Complaint lacks much detail. Plaintiff does not identify the precise practice or policy instituted by Defendants that created a substantial risk to inmates such as Mr. Gioffre. Nor does Plaintiff provide details about the substance of the complaints, court rulings, and reports received by Defendants regarding the constitutionally insufficient practices at BCCF. Nevertheless, the Complaint alleges a problematic practice or policy, known to and ratified by Defendants, of denying medical care for cost-saving reasons. The Complaint also alleges that Defendants learned of these alleged unconstitutional conditions, but that with deliberate indifference, they failed to remedy the situation. . . These details regarding the motive for the practice or policy of denying inmates medical treatment and the means through which the Defendants learned of the unconstitutional conditions elevate the Complaint, perhaps only barely, from being merely a blanket, general assertion of entitlement to relief. . . . Thus, the Court concludes that while the allegations as to Defendants are minimal and discovery eventually may establish that no such constitutionally impermissible practices or policies existed, the allegations are sufficient at this stage to put Defendants fairly on notice of the claims against them.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Johnson v. Robinette, 105 F.4th 99, 124 (4th Cir. 2024) ("Johnson's evidence falls far short of that necessary to establish supervisory or bystander liability against Lt. Robinette. As the district court observed, Johnson failed to forecast evidence sufficient to prove Lt. Robinette knew or should have known that Officer Zimmerman was engaged in unconstitutional acts of sexual abuse or that he had a propensity for engaging in such unlawful action. At most, Johnson testified that Lt. Robinette was in the vicinity of Johnson's cell during some of Officer Zimmerman's strip searches for contraband and, therefore, should have known that Officer Zimmerman was strip searching him. But, at no point was Lt. Robinette present in the cell during any strip search. Even if Johnson's testimony is sufficient to establish that Lt. Robinette was or should have been aware that Officer Zimmerman was conducting some of the strip searches for contraband, the evidence wholly fails to support a finding that Lt. Robinette was aware of a pervasive and unreasonable risk of constitutional injury to Johnson, that he knew or should have known that Officer Zimmerman's contact with Johnson at any point exceeded the proper performance of his official duties, or that he had a reasonable opportunity to prevent Officer Zimmerman from touching Johnson during the searches. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to Lt. Robinette on this basis.")

Kartman v. Markle, 582 F. App'x 151, 154-55 (4th Cir. 2014) ("Kartman testified in his deposition that he repeatedly informed Markle, the Administrator of the Central Regional Jail, in grievances and letters delivered by varying methods, that he faced a substantial risk of harm from other inmates. Markle testified that he never received any of these grievances and, therefore, had no knowledge of Kartman's situation. The district court assumed that Kartman filed the grievances and letters as he claimed. However, the court concluded that there was no evidence that Markle actually received them or had any knowledge of Kartman's issues, based on Markle's testimony and the fact that Markle was not responsible for making prisoner's housing decisions and would not have been the person to respond to these grievances. We conclude that material issues of fact exist preventing summary judgment on this claim. Markle testified that requests to be moved would be placed in his mailbox so long as they were addressed to him and would not be diverted to a supervisor or guard. While Markle stated that he would likely refer the request to a supervisor or the booking department, such a referral would require Markle to initially read and screen the request or grievance. Moreover, the record showed that grievances must be filed with the Administrator of the Jail; filing grievances with officers or supervisors would be insufficient to exhaust. Finally, Kartman submitted a grievance response from the Director of Inmate Services, which could be interpreted as stating that Markle had received Kartman's grievances filed following the October assault. Based on the foregoing, and contrary to the district court's ruling, we find that Kartman provided sufficient evidence to raise a material issue of fact as to whether he filed the disputed grievances and letters and, if so, whether Markle either received them or was willfully blind to their existence. . . The district court ruled that a reasonable person in Markle's position in possession of the incident reports of the October fight, Kartman's November grievances, and Kartman's letter would have known of an excessive risk of harm to Kartman and would have taken action. Because it is unclear whether Markle was in possession of or was aware

Danser v. Stansberry, 772 F.3d 340, 349-50 (4th Cir. 2014) ("The court's observation that Stansberry and Roy were 'directly responsible' cannot be reconciled with the court's failure to identify any conduct of Stansberry and Roy supporting this conclusion. Moreover, the record fails to reveal any such evidence, or other evidence that FCI–Butner or the SHU 'had a policy or practice of ignoring or failing to update the BOP classifications in Sentry and the CIM system.' Thus, all that is present in the record before us is the mere fact that Stansberry and Roy were Boyd's supervisors, and under Iqbal that is insufficient as a matter of law to conclude that Stansberry and Roy violated Danser's Eighth Amendment rights. . . Our conclusion is not altered by Danser's argument that Stansberry and Roy are not entitled to qualified immunity because they 'tacitly authorized' Boyd's actions by failing to discipline him after the incident. At its core, Danser's argument reflects a misperception of the 'tacit authorization' theory, which focuses on information known to a supervisor before an incident occurs. See Shaw v. Stroud, 13 F.3d 791, 798–800 (4th Cir.1994). A supervisor may be held liable under a tacit authorization theory if that supervisor fails to take action in response to a known pattern of comparable conduct occurring before the incident at issue took place. . . Here, there is no evidence in the record that either Stansberry or Roy was aware before the date of Danser's attack of any alleged defects in the assignment process for the recreation cages or of a pattern of officers leaving the recreation area unattended. Therefore, neither Stansberry nor Roy may be held liable under a tacit authorization theory. . . Accordingly, based on the record before us, we conclude as a matter of law that the district court erred in denying the summary judgment motion of Stansberry and Roy.")

Evans v. Chalmers, 703 F.3d 636, 660, 661 (4th Cir. 2012) (Wilkinson, J., concurring) ("A second example of the complaints' overreach lies not so much in the nature of the claims as in the identity of the defendants. The plaintiffs have sued not just the police investigators, but also a number of Durham city officials such as the City Manager, Chief of Police, and various members of the police chain of command. Plaintiffs seek monetary damages from these so-called 'supervisory defendants' under a theory of supervisory liability. In Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), however, the Supreme Court issued several cautionary holdings with respect to such liability—lessons that plaintiffs have utterly failed to heed. To begin with, the Supreme Court explained in Iqbal that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge' that his subordinates are engaged in unconstitutional conduct is insufficient to give rise to liability; instead, a supervisor can be held liable only for 'his or her own misconduct.' Id. at 677. Yet the complaints in this case repeatedly allege that the so-called supervisory defendants violated plaintiffs' constitutional rights on the theory that they 'knew or should have known' about their subordinates' conduct. This directly contradicts Iqbal's holding that such allegations, standing alone, cannot give rise to supervisory liability. Moreover, the Iqbal Court explained that in order to state a claim for supervisory liability, 'a plaintiff must plead that each [supervisory] defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. . The plaintiffs here, however, have roped in a number of Durham city officials without pleading any allegedly improper individual actions. . . . The absence of individualized allegations is all the more remarkable in light of the otherwise exhaustive nature of the complaints: combined, the three complaints weigh in at a staggering eight hundred-plus pages. The plaintiffs argue that the absence of specific allegations with respect to each individual supervisor is of no consequence given that they have used the term 'supervisory defendants' as shorthand to allege the collective actions and state of mind for all of the named supervisors. Requiring repetition of the names of specific defendants within the context of each factual allegation, we are told, would be 'pointless and inefficient.' This contention sorely misses the mark. The purpose of requiring a plaintiff to identify how 'each [supervisory] defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution,'. . . is not to erect some formalistic rule that a complaint must mention each defendant by name some particular number of times. The requirement is instead designed to ensure that the serious burdens of defending against this sort of lawsuit are visited upon a departmental supervisor only when the complaint 'plausibly suggest[s]' that the supervisor engaged in 'his or her own misconduct.'. . .At bottom, then, the problem with the supervisory liability claims here is that, like those at issue in Iqbal, they fail to cross 'the line from conceivable to plausible.'. . As in Iqbal, the plaintiffs' allegations here could be 'consistent with' a scenario in which the supervisory officials somehow participated in their subordinates' allegedly unconstitutional conduct. . . But the 'obvious alternative explanation[]'. . . for the supervisors' conduct in assigning the case to certain investigators and attending meetings where the case was discussed is that they wanted to facilitate the investigation, stay abreast of recent developments, and bring the case to closure on a reasonable timeline. That, after all, is their job. In short, the complaints here are wholly indiscriminate. They seek to sweep in everyone and everything, heedless of any actual indications of individual malfeasance that would justify the personal burdens that litigation can impose. What Iqbal condemned, the complaints assay. What is more, the complaints' sweeping allegations mirror the sweeping nature of the wrongs of which plaintiffs complain. It is, of course, the purpose of civil litigation to rectify, but not in a manner that duplicates the very evils that prompted plaintiffs to file suit.").

Al-Haqq v. Stirling, No. CA 2:14-098-TMC, 2014 WL 6749096, at *9 (D.S.C. Dec. 1, 2014) ("Even if prior Fourth Circuit case law on supervisory liability is still good law after Iqbal,. . . the Plaintiff has not satisfied the requirements for imposing supervisory liability enunciated in cases such as Carter v. Morris, 164 F.3d 215, 221 (4th Cir.1999) (a Plaintiff must show actual or constructive knowledge of a risk of constitutional injury, deliberate indifference to that risk, and an 'affirmative causal link' between the supervisor's inaction and the particular constitutional injury suffered by the Plaintiff); Shaw v. Stroud, 13 F.3d 791, 798 (4th Cir.1994); and Slakan v. Porter, 737 F.2d 368, 370–75 (4th Cir.1984). As a result, a Defendant in a supervisory position over others who has mere knowledge of a constitutional violation is subject to dismissal-the supervisor himself must purposefully violate a prisoner's constitutionally protected rights to be subject to liability. Therefore, to the extent Plaintiff alleges claims premised upon supervisory liability, those claims likewise fail.")

Cook v. Howard, No. 11–1601, 2012 WL 3634451, *4, *5 (4th Cir. Aug. 24, 2012) (not reported) ("Curiously, the Appellants make no attempt to demonstrate that it satisfied the Supreme Court's explanations of Rule 8(a)(2)'s requirements as set forth in Twombly and Iqbal, and which were the primary grounds upon which the district court relied. Instead, they rely on pre-Twombly and Iqbal cases such as Leatherman and Jordan. While Leatherman held that § 1983 claims are not subject to a heightened pleading standard and Jordan applied that holding in this Circuit, claims brought in federal court are also subject to the generally applicable standards set forth in the Supreme Court's entire Rule 8(a) jurisprudence, including Twombly and Iqbal. As we have previously recognized, these later 'decisions require more specificity from complaints in federal civil cases than was heretofore the case.' Robertson v. Sea Pines Real Estate Cos., 679 F.3d 278, 288 (4th Cir.2012). . . . We agree with the district court that the amended complaint does not satisfy these requirements. The amended complaint suffers from a number of infirmities with respect to the claims against the BCPD. Most strikingly, it repeatedly sets forth legal conclusions masquerading as factual allegations. . . .With respect to Commissioner Bealefeld and Colonel Bevilaqua's liability as supervisory officers, the amended complaint's assertions boil down to contending that because Cook's death occurred at a time when they were supervisors of BCPD officers, they have imputed knowledge of their subordinates' conduct and should be held liable for it. Simply put, the amended complaint does not set forth facts that raise beyond the level of speculation any claim of entitlement to relief under § 1983 or 1985 founded on a theory of supervisory liability.")

O'Connell v. City of Greenville, 4:14-CV-64-BO, 2014 WL 4537182, *2 (E.D.N.C. Sept. 11, 2014) ("Defendant Aden argues that plaintiff's supervisory liability claim fails because the complaint does not allege any facts regarding Aden's individual actions or omissions. The complaint, however, asserts that Aden, the police chief, failed to adequately supervise Does One through Five. Specifically, plaintiff alleges that Aden failed to implement and enforce policies to adequately supervise and train his officials to prevent constitutional violations. These allegations are sufficient to nudge plaintiff's supervisory liability claim across the line from conceivable to plausible. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 70. Thus, defendant Aden's motion to dismiss the individual capacity claim on this ground is denied.")

Alexander v. Kenworthy No. 5:11–CT–3142–FL, 2013 WL 461338, *3 (E.D.N.C. Feb. 6, 2013) ("Defendants each assert that plaintiff failed to allege that they had any personal involvement in the alleged failure to clean and maintain the cell containing the staph infection. Plaintiff, however, alleges that each of the defendants was aware of the situation and refused to direct that the cell be cleaned/disinfected. The court finds that these allegations are sufficient to state a supervisor liability claim.")

Panowicz v. Hancock, No. DKC 11–2417, 2012 WL 4049358, *11, *12 (D. Md. Sept. 12, 2012) ("Where a complaint recites only a single instance of harm, courts have generally found a failure to state a claim for supervisory liability. . . . While it may be true that Plaintiff will ultimately be required to show prior instances of misconduct to prevail on his supervisory liability claim, the focus at the dismissal stage is on plausibility. Considering the well-pleaded allegations of the complaint in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, as the court must on a motion to dismiss, Plaintiff has set forth a plausible claim that he suffered a cognizable injury as a result of Defendant's failure to implement formal safeguards against the erroneous publication of judgments of conviction on a judicial website. The question is a close one, and Plaintiff's ultimate burden in proving deliberate indifference is heavy, but the audit report 'nudge[s][his] claim[ ] across the line from conceivable to plausible[.]'. . The appendix to the audit report indicates that Defendant implemented informal procedures to ensure that judgments were accurately recorded, but the State's recommendation that formal policies be adopted at least suggests that these informal procedures were in some respect insufficient. To the extent that Defendant may have known of a propensity for such errors and failed to respond, whether by implementing a formal policy or providing training to her subordinates, Plaintiff has set forth a sufficient § 1983 claim against Defendant in her individual capacity, albeit by a very thin margin. Ultimately, the 'determining issue on supervisory liability is whether defendant proximately caused a violation of the plaintiff's rights by doing something or failing to do something he should have done,' and 'this issue is ordinarily one of fact, not law.'. . Plaintiff is entitled to discovery to attempt to make the requisite showing. Accordingly, Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's individual capacity claim under § 1983 will be denied.") Denney v. Berkeley County, No. 3:10–1383–RMG–JRM, 2012 WL 3877732, *6, *7 (D.S.C. Sept. 5, 2012) ("[S]upervisors may still be held liable under § 1983. See, e.g., Taylor v. Lang, No. 12–6069, 2012 WL 2354460, at *2 (D.S.C. June 21, 2012) (conducting supervisory liability analysis under § 1983 post- Iqbal); Smith v. Ray, 409 F. App'x 641, 650 (4th Cir.2011) (same); see also Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1205–07 (9th Cir.2011) (explaining why Iqbal did not affect the existence of supervisory liability under § 1983). That is because the liability of a supervisor is not based on ordinary principles of vicarious liability, but instead on '"a recognition that supervisory indifference or tacit authorization of subordinates' misconduct may [itself] be a causative factor in the constitutional injuries [the subordinates] inflict on those committed to their care."'. . 'Thus, when a supervisor is found liable based on deliberate indifference, the supervisor is being held liable for his or her own culpable action, not held vicariously liable for the culpable action or inaction of his or her subordinates.' Starr, 652 F.3d at 1207. Given that background, it makes sense that the state of mind requirement for a deliberate indifference claim is modified somewhat in the supervisory context, requiring a plaintiff to demonstrate: (1) that the supervisor had actual or constructive knowledge that his subordinate was engaged in conduct that posed a pervasive and unreasonable risk of constitutional injury to citizens like the plaintiff; (2) that the supervisor's response to that knowledge was so inadequate as to show deliberate indifference to or tacit authorization of the alleged offensive practices; and (3) that there was an affirmative causal link between the supervisor's inaction and the particular constitutional injury suffered by the plaintiff. Randall v. Prince George's Cnty., Md., 302 F.3d 188, 206 (4th Cir.2002) (quotation marks and citation omitted). Plaintiff Denney's claim against Dewitt fails because he has not shown that Dewitt 'had actual or constructive knowledge that his [subordinates were] engaged in conduct that posed a pervasive and unreasonable risk of constitutional injury to citizens like the plaintiff.'. . Denney essentially argues that Dewitt must have known of the risk, given the many alleged lapses in protocol by prison officials. But a deliberate indifference claim requires more than that. In order for the fact-finder to infer that an official knew of the risk, the plaintiff must have shown that the risk 'was longstanding, pervasive, well-documented, or expressly noted by prison officials in the past, and the circumstances suggest that the defendant-official being sued had been exposed to information concerning the risk and thus must have known about it.'. . Denney has offered no evidence that Dewitt was aware that his subordinates were placing individuals charged with crimes against minors into cells where they might be the targets of violence, or of any other violations of policy. Nor has Denney shown that Dewitt knew of the two beatings that occurred at the detention center in the weeks leading up to this incident. Thus, Denney has not raised beyond the level of mere speculation his claim that Dewitt knew his subordinates were engaged in conduct that posed a risk to the safety of individuals in Denney's position.")

Knowles v. Lewis, No. 5:11–CT–3113–FL, 2012 WL 3637241, *5, *6 (E.D.N.C. Aug. 22, 2012) ("The court next turns to plaintiff's claim against Lewis and Smith arising out of their alleged deliberate indifference to his medical care. This supervisor liability claim is based solely upon the fact that plaintiff wrote letters to Lewis and Smith complaining about his medical care. However, this alone, is insufficient to meet the heavy burden in supervisor liability cases. . . Moreover, even if supervisor liability could stem from the letters alone, plaintiff's claims still fails because as DAC supervisory officials, Lewis and Smith are entitled to rely upon the judgment of medical staff at Johnston for the provision of medical care. . . Based upon the foregoing, plaintiff has failed to state a supervisor liability claim based upon alleged deliberate indifference to plaintiff's medical care against Lewis and Smith. Finally, plaintiff alleged a supervisor liability claim against Lewis and Smith based upon the alleged deliberate indifference to the design of the Johnston facility and prison policies resulting in his sun exposure. Lewis and Smith have not proven that plaintiff failed to state a claim upon which relief may be granted for this claim. Thus, to the extent Lewis and Smith seek dismissal of these claims, their motion is DENIED.")

Moore v. Davis, No. 8:11–cv–01173–DCN–JDA, 2012 WL 2890893, *4 n.4 (D.S.C. May 22, 2012) ("[T]he Supreme Court in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009), may have entirely abrogated supervisory liability in Bivens actions. . . A Bivens action 'is the "federal analog to suits brought against state officials under ... § 1983."'. . Therefore, the Supreme Court's reasoning may extend to abrogate supervisory liability in § 1983 actions as well as Bivens actions.")

Shannon v. Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services, No. ELH–11–1830, 2012 WL 1150802, at *7 (D. Md. Apr. 5, 2012) ("To the extent that Shannon seeks to hold Warden Wolfe culpable under a theory of supervisory liability, his claims are unavailing. Supervisory liability under § 1983 must be supported with evidence that: 1) the supervisor had actual or constructive knowledge that his subordinate was engaged in conduct that posed a pervasive and unreasonable risk of constitutional injury to citizens like the plaintiff; 2) the supervisor's response to the knowledge was so inadequate as to show deliberate indifference to or tacit authorization of the alleged offensive practices; and 3) there was an affirmative causal link between the supervisor's inaction and the particular constitutional injury suffered by the plaintiff. . . Shannon does not claim Warden Wolfe had actual or constructive knowledge of the incidents in question, nor are there any grounds alleged for assigning supervisory liability. Shannon does not allege that Warden Wolfe was aware of and disregarded an excessive risk to Shannon's health. . . Further, Warden Wolfe was entitled to rely on the opinions of medical professionals concerning Shannon's treatment. For these reasons, Warden Wolfe is entitled to summary judgment in his favor.")

Pelzer v. McCall, No. 8:10–cv–1265–MBS–JDA, 2012 WL 761935, at *5 (D.S.C. Feb. 16, 2012) ("[T]he Supreme Court in Ashcroft v. Iqbal. . . may have entirely abrogated supervisory liability in Bivens actions. . . . A Bivens action 'is the "federal analog to suits brought against state officials under ... § 1983."'. . Therefore, the Supreme Court's reasoning may extend to abrogate supervisory liability in § 1983 actions as well as Bivens actions.")

Lavender v. City of Roanoke Sheriff's Office, 826 F.Supp.2d 928, 935, 936 (W.D. Va. 2011) ("To plead claims for relief under § 1983 against Johnson in her individual capacity, once again, Lavender must plead facts that show a more than a respondeat superior relationship. 'While a municipal liability claim based upon a particular official's attributed conduct and a supervisory liability claim against that official based upon the same conduct are not perfectly congruent, each requires proof both of the official's deliberate indifference and of a close affirmative link between his conduct and the resulting constitutional violation by a subordinate.' Jones v. Wellham, 104 F.3d 620, 628 (4th Cir.1997) (citation omitted). To establish supervisory liability , a plaintiff must show: (1) that the supervisor had actual or constructive knowledge that his subordinate was engaged in conduct that posed 'a pervasive and unreasonable risk' of constitutional injury to citizens like the plaintiff; (2) that the supervisor's response to that knowledge was so inadequate as to show 'deliberate indifference to or tacit authorization of the alleged offensive practices;' and (3) that there was an 'affirmative causal link' between the supervisor's inaction and the particular constitutional injury suffered. . . Here, Lavender's pleadings are essentially boilerplate, devoid of specific facts showing that Johnson either in her official or individual capacity was deliberately indifferent to or tacitly authorized a particular practice that led to the single alleged use of excessive force against Lavender on March 21, 2009 by an unidentified deputy. At the hearing on the motion to dismiss, Lavender's counsel explained that Lavender was attempting to hold Johnson liable under § 1983 because after Johnson became aware of the March 21, 2009 incident, she allegedly failed to 'follow through,' that is, 'properly investigate' the incident and that Lavender also was seeking to hold Johnson liable based on her 'pattern of conduct,' though he did not have 'specific facts.' Counsel's explanation underscores at least two fundamental deficiencies in Lavender's complaint. First, though Johnson's alleged failure to investigate the alleged excessive use of force against Lavender possibly might serve as grist should another excessive force claim arise in the future, it could not have resulted in the constitutional deprivation Lavender alleges–the antecedent excessive use of force–and consequently is not actionable under § 1983. . . Second, the acknowledgment that Lavender does not yet have 'specific facts' to establish a pattern of conduct and is seeking to engage in discovery to support his allegations ignores Iqbal's admonition that Rule 8 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 'does not unlock the doors and discovery for a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions.'. . In short, Lavender's complaint falls far short of showing that Lavender is entitled to relief under § 1983 against Johnson in her individual or official capacity, and the court will dismiss those claims against her.")

Harbeck v. Smith, 814 F.Supp.2d 608, 627 (E.D. Va. 2011) ("Although Plaintiff has not conclusively shown that Smith had knowledge of Plaintiff's continued unlawful incarceration, she need not meet that burden at this point. Plaintiff has plausibly alleged that Smith personally received notice of the unlawful incarceration on several occasions and failed to act. Such a showing of personal knowledge is sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss. . . .Therefore, despite the fact that liability for Smith cannot rest on a theory of respondeat superior, Plaintiff has alleged sufficient personal involvement on the part of Smith to survive a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6).")

Humbert v. O'Malley, Civil No. WDQ-11-0440, 2011 WL 6019689, at *7 (D. Md. Nov. 29, 2011) ("The Court will deny Bealefeld and Dixon's motions to dismiss the § 1983 claims. Humbert has properly alleged that Bealefeld had actual or constructive knowledge of officers' misconduct, such as ordering crime lab technicians not to follow up on DNA found at crime scenes. That the police allegedly did so in at least nine cases makes it plausible that Bealefeld had a 'policy of inaction' with respect to his subordinates' DNA collection and processing. . . Because Humbert's constitutional harm involved continued detention despite exculpatory DNA evidence, he has sufficiently pled an affirmative causal link between Bealefeld's inaction and his injury. . . The allegations of police misconduct are so significant that even the mayor should have known about it. . . Accordingly, the Court will deny the motions to dismiss the § 1983 claims against Bealefeld and Dixon.")

Newbrough v. Piedmont Regional Jail Authority, 822 F.Supp.2d 558, 586 & n.14 (E.D. Va. 2011) ("In the Fourth Circuit, a plaintiff seeking to establish supervisory liability under § 1983 must show: (1) that 'the supervisor had actual or constructive knowledge that his subordinate was engaged in conduct that posed "a pervasive and unreasonable risk" of constitutional injury to citizens like the plaintiff'; (2) that the supervisor's response was so inadequate as to show 'deliberate indifference to or tacit authorization of the alleged offensive practices'; and (3) that there existed 'an "affirmative causal link" between the supervisor's inaction and the particular constitutional injury suffered by the plaintiff.' Shaw, 13 F.3d at 799 (internal citations omitted). In short, a plaintiff must demonstrate that the supervisor's constitutionally offensive inaction was itself a 'direct cause' of the injury alleged, Miltier, 896 F.2d at 854 − a heavy burden. . . . Arguably, Iqbal may have abrogated supervisory liability altogether. . . . Because a Bivens action 'is the federal analog to suits brought against state officials under ... § 1983,' id at 1948, the Court's reasoning may effectively nullify supervisory liability in both § 1983 actions and Bivens actions.")

McFadyen v. Duke University, No. 1:07CV9532011, 2011 WL 1260207, at *57 (M.D.N.C. Mar. 31, 2011) ("[I]n applying [the Iqbal] standard, circuit courts have concluded that supervisory liability may still be imposed based on 'deliberate indifference' where the underlying constitutional violation itself may be established based on deliberate indifference. See Starr v. Baca, No. 09-55233, 2011 WL 477094, at *4 (9th Cir.2011); see also, e.g., Smith v. Ray, No. 09-1518, 2011 WL 317166, at *8 (4th Cir. Feb. 2, 2011) (continuing to apply the Shaw v. Stroud "deliberate indifference" standard).").

Hunt v. Robeson County, No. 5:10-CT-3112-FL, 2011 WL 761483, at *6 (E.D.N.C. Feb. 24, 2011) ("Plaintiff alleges that the named supervisors created an official policy and/or an environment that implicitly authorized detention officers and the medical staff to systemically deny inmates proper and adequate medical services. In particular, plaintiff alleges that the supervisory defendants created an environment in which inmates' medical complaints were treated as frivolous or untruthful and that denied inmates' medical services in a timely manner. This is sufficient to state a constitutional claim against the supervisory defendants. See Monell v. Department of Social Services of City of New York, 436 U.S. 658, 694-95 (1978). Thus, the motion to dismiss Begay and Harris is DENIED.")

Miller v. Hamm, Civil No. CCB-10-243, 2011 WL 9185, at *12 (D. Md. Jan. 3, 2011) ("Miller claims Stakem-Hornig and City Solicitor Nilson are liable for his constitutional injuries in their capacities as supervisors. In Shaw v. Stroud, 13 F.3d 791 (4th Cir.1994), the Fourth Circuit set forth three elements required to establish supervisory liability under 42 U.S.C § 1983: (1) that the supervisor had actual or constructive knowledge that his subordinate was engaged in conduct that posed 'a pervasive and unreasonable risk' of constitutional injury to citizens like the plaintiff; (2) that the supervisor's response to that knowledge was so inadequate as to show 'deliberate indifference to or tacit authorization of the alleged offensive practices,'; and (3) that there was an 'affirmative causal link' between the supervisor's inaction and the particular constitutional injury suffered by the plaintiff. . . To satisfy the first element, a plaintiff must show the supervisor had knowledge of a subordinate's conduct that 'pose[d] a pervasive and unreasonable risk of constitutional injury to the plaintiff.'. . This requires that the plaintiff allege conduct that 'is widespread, or at least has been used on several different occasions,' and 'poses an unreasonable risk of harm of constitutional injury.'. . Although Miller brings this claim against both Stakem-Hornig and City Solicitor Nilson, the relevant pleadings focus only on Nilson's knowledge of his subordinate's conduct. . . To the extent that the pleadings support Stakem-Hornig's liability, it is not as a supervisor, but as an active participant in the decision to deny Miller a name-clearing hearing. As a result, the motion to dismiss the claim of supervisory liability will be granted as to Stakem-Hornig. With respect to Nilson, the pleadings do not give rise to a plausible inference that he had actual or constructive knowledge that his subordinate, Stakem-Hornig, was engaging in conduct that posed a pervasive and unreasonable risk of constitutional injury to the plaintiff. The complaint alleges only that Nilson had reason to believe Stakem-Hornig was violating the constitutional rights of BPD officers and that he had knowledge she was acting as a final decisionmaker rather than referring decisions to the BPD. . . The former allegation is too broad and vague to give rise to supervisory liability. The latter allegation, while suggesting potentially improper conduct, does not make it plausible that Nilson was aware Stakem-Hornig was engaging in conduct posing an unreasonable risk to Miller's rights. Miller does not specify the types of decisions Stakem-Hornig was failing to refer to BPD, and he does not assert these decisions repeatedly implicated officers' constitutional rights. Miller has not established the first element of supervisory liability as to either Stakem-Hornig or City Solicitor Nilson. Accordingly, this claim will be dismissed.")

Massenburg v. Adams, No. 3:08CV106, 2010 WL 1279087, at *3 (E.D. Va. Mar. 31, 2010) ("Defendants Adams and Sharpe argue that the complaint does not adequately allege that they were personally involved in any deprivation of Plaintiff's rights. Read in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, both Adams and Sharpe knew Plaintiff's religion prohibited him from working on the Sabbath. Both Sharpe and Adams also knew that the Plaintiff's work assignment required that he work on the Sabbath or face punishment. [FN6. Sharpe knew the foregoing facts because Plaintiff raised the complaint in her presence. Adams knew these facts because Plaintiff wrote a grievance in which he requested that she intervene.] The complaint further suggests that in their respective positions as Camp Administrator and Warden, Sharpe and Adams had the authority and responsibility to intervene and remedy the alleged violation of Plaintiff's free exercise rights, yet they stood indifferent. Such allegations are sufficient, at this juncture, to establish a personal involvement by Adams and Sharpe.").

Doe v. Ferguson, 128 F.4th 727, 733 (5th Cir. 2025) ("Defendants contend Ashcroft v. Iqbal . . . extinguished supervisory-liability claims under § 1983, including the test for school supervisory liability outlined in Doe v. Taylor Indep. Sch. Dist., 15 F.3d 443 (5th Cir. 1994) (en banc). We hold that Iqbal did not foreclose such claims; Taylor remains good law in our circuit. For starters, our court has continued to allow supervisory-liability claims under § 1983 in the 15 years since Iqbal was decided. [citing cases] In any event, Iqbal concerned Bivens claims for invidious discrimination rooted in the First and Fifth Amendments, requiring showing purposeful discrimination. . . Defendants point to language in Iqbal referring to the term 'supervisory liability' as a 'misnomer' in actions brought under Bivens or § 1983. . .. But the Iqbal majority took issue with the term 'supervisory liability' only to the extent it invoked respondeat superior liability based on a subordinate's conduct. . . The Court rejected the contention that a supervisor's 'mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution' and concluded that 'purpose rather than knowledge is required to impose Bivens liability' on a supervisor. . . Pursuant to Taylor, and as discussed infra, supervisors are not liable for mere knowledge, but for 'demonstrat[ing] deliberate indifference toward the constitutional rights of the student by failing to take action' that itself 'cause[s]' the constitutional injury. . . Because this standard focuses on the independent misconduct of the supervisor, Taylor falls within Iqbal's recognition that 'each Government official ... is only liable for his or her own misconduct'.")

Ford v. Anderson County, Texas, 102 F.4th 292, 321 (5th Cir. 2024) ("Liability under the doctrine of respondeat superior is not cognizable in actions brought pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . 'Rather, a plaintiff must show either [that] the supervisor personally was involved in the constitutional violation or that there is a "sufficient causal connection" between the supervisor's conduct and the constitutional violation.'. . Liability may be found where 'supervisory officials implement a policy so deficient that the policy "itself is a repudiation of constitutional rights" and is 'the moving force of the constitutional violation.' " Thompkins v. Belt, 828 F.2d 298, 304 (5th Cir. 1987) (quoting Grandstaff v. City of Borger, 767 F.2d 161, 169, 170 (5th Cir. 1985)). Furthermore, '[i]n order to establish supervisor liability for constitutional violations committed by subordinate employees, plaintiffs must show that the supervisor act[ed], or fail[ed] to act, with deliberate indifference to violations of others' constitutional rights committed by their subordinates.'. .Based on the evidence of the alleged PR bond policy outlined above, Plaintiffs can plead a colorable supervisory liability claim against Sheriff Taylor, who is the undisputed policymaker in this case. Plaintiffs' proposed third amended complaint contains allegations that Sheriff Taylor implemented the policy of delaying care for detainees with serious medical needs, and that he was personally involved in Newsome's delay of care on the date of her death. While we decline at this stage to address whether Plaintiffs have presented sufficient evidence for their supervisory liability claim to survive a summary judgment challenge, we find that Plaintiffs, at the very least, have shown that amending their pleadings would not be futile.")

Tuttle v. Sepolio, 68 F.4th 969, 975-76 (5th Cir. 2023) ("The district court denied Gonzales's motion to dismiss the excessive force and search-and-seizure claims based on a failure-to-supervise theory. A 'supervisory official may be held liable under section 1983 for the wrongful acts of a subordinate "when [the supervisory official] breaches a duty imposed by state or local law, and this breach causes plaintiff's constitutional injury."'. . We have understood this inquiry to contain three elements: (1) that the supervisor failed to train or supervise the subordinate; (2) a causal link between the failure to train or supervise and the constitutional violation; and (3) that the failure to train or supervise amounts to deliberate indifference. . . The threshold for pleading a failure-to-supervise claim is high, but we conclude that it is satisfied here. Plaintiffs allege multiple specific instances in which Goines fraudulently obtained a search warrant and in which violence occurred. They further allege that Gonzales—in his capacity as Goines's supervisor—knew about these infractions, but did nothing to correct them. As such, these allegations present the uncommon case where deliberate indifference may be attributed to an officer's supervisor. The facts alleged also support the inference that Gonzales failed to supervise Goines, and that a causal link exists between his failure to supervise and the actions that ultimately occurred. The district court did not err in allowing this claim to proceed.")

Hicks v. LeBlanc, 832 F. App'x 836, ___ (5th Cir. 2020) ("A supervisory official may be held liable only if (1) he affirmatively participates in the acts that cause the constitutional deprivation, or (2) he implements unconstitutional policies that causally result in the constitutional injury. . . 'In order to establish supervisor liability for constitutional violations committed by subordinate employees, plaintiffs must show that the supervisor act[ed], or fail[ed] to act, with deliberate indifference to violations of others' constitutional rights committed by their subordinates.'. . 'A failure to adopt a policy can be deliberately indifferent when it is obvious that the likely consequences of not adopting a policy will be a deprivation of constitutional rights.'. . 'A supervisor may also be liable for failure to supervise or train if: "(1) the supervisor either failed to supervise or train the subordinate official; (2) a causal link exists between the failure to train or supervise and the violation of the plaintiff's rights; and (3) the failure to train or supervise amounts to deliberate indifference."'. . Deliberate indifference requires 'proof that a municipal actor disregarded a known or obvious consequence of his action.'. . To establish a state actor's disregard, there must be 'actual or constructive notice' 'that a particular omission in their training program causes ... employees to violate citizens' constitutional rights' and the actor nevertheless 'choose[s] to retain that program.'. . 'A pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees is ordinarily necessary to demonstrate deliberate indifference.'. .The complaint contained no allegations that LeBlanc affirmatively participated in the acts that caused Hicks' constitutional deprivation. Instead, Hicks' claim against LeBlanc was predicated on his conduct in (1) failing to promulgate adequate policies, and (2) failing to train and supervise DPSC employees. We must therefore consider whether LeBlanc's alleged actions, or inaction, were objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established law that a prison official must ensure an inmate's timely release and that such an official may be liable for failure to promulgate policy or failure to train and supervise if he acted with deliberate indifference to constitutional rights. . . Whether LeBlanc acted with deliberate indifference is a close call. Hicks alleged that LeBlanc knew of the DPSC's long history of overdetaining inmates; that DPSC employees used different methods to calculate release dates; and that the DPSC had not disciplined employees who miscalculated sentences. However, the alleged facts—which included processing delays, data errors, inconsistent calculation methodologies, and unspecified deficiencies—speak to the incompetence of DPSC employees and the lack of adequate training and supervision. Based on these allegations, LeBlanc could be held liable for incompetent over-detention, such as the failure to process a prisoner's release or immediately compute an inmate's sentence after being sentenced to time served. . . But it cannot be said that LeBlanc had notice that his employees were purposely disregarding sentencing orders out of retaliatory intent. The complaint was devoid of allegations supporting the reasonable inference that a pattern of intentional over-detention existed in the DPSC; that is, the alleged facts suggest a pattern of over-detention caused by quality control deficiencies and the lack of training and supervision, not a pattern of over-detention stemming from the blatant refusal to credit offenders with time served contrary to sentencing orders. In the absence of such a pattern, LeBlanc could not have acted with deliberate indifference to Lawson's intentional sentencing miscalculation and over-detention of Hicks. Accordingly, the district court erred in denying LeBlanc's defense of qualified immunity.") Johnson v. Halstead, 916 F.3d 410, 416-19 (5th Cir. 2019) (denying reh'g and reh'g en banc) ("The district court denied Halstead qualified immunity on Johnson's hostile work environment claim but limited the claim to a theory of supervisory liability. A supervisor can be liable for the hostile work environment created by his subordinates 'if that official, by action or inaction, demonstrates a deliberate indifference to a plaintiff's constitutional rights.'. . We first address Halstead's contention that there is a clear legal obstacle to this section 1983 claim. He argues that although a hostile work environment based on sex violates the Equal Protection Clause, it is not clearly established that one based on race does. This ignores multiple cases in which we have considered race-based hostile work environment claims asserted under section 1983. . . .But for Halstead to be liable, it is not enough that Johnson was subject to a hostile work environment. Halstead must have been deliberately indifferent to this racially hostile work environment. . . This is a 'stringent standard of fault, requiring proof that a municipal actor disregarded a known or obvious consequence of his action.'. . Johnson thus must allege that 'repeated complaints of civil rights violations' were followed by 'no meaningful attempt on the part of the municipality to investigate or to forestall further incidents.'. . He has done so. There is no dispute that Halstead knew about the alleged harassment. Johnson says he met with Halstead soon after he filed the complaint with HR. The subsequent transfer of Johnson and Halstead's later apology corroborate this. So does the Coleman Report, as it found that a 'high ranking officer' confirmed Johnson's account of his interactions with the Police Chief. The investigators also concluded that there was 'widespread knowledge' of Johnson's situation, and that the 'Chain of Command' knew about the 'hostile, intimidating, and bullying' behavior. Johnson's allegations that Halstead did nothing to try and stop the harassment even though he knew about it—again corroborated by the outside investigation—also satisfy the second requirement for deliberate indifference.")

Perniciaro v. Lea, 901 F.3d 241, 259-60 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Perniciaro contends that Dr. Thompson—the chief of staff at ELMHS responsible for overseeing the provision of care—was deliberately indifferent by failing to adequately supervise Dr. Nicholl in light of Perniciaro's myriad injuries and Dr. Nicholl's failure to create a holistic treatment plan. But without an underlying constitutional violation—of which we have found none—there can be no supervisory liability. . . Perniciaro has failed to establish that Dr. Thompson violated his clearly established rights, and Dr. Thompson is therefore entitled to qualified immunity. As to Lea, the CEO of ELMHS, Perniciaro contends that he was deliberately indifferent by failing to adequately supervise Dr. Nicholl, failing to adequately supervise and train the guards on the proper implementation of ALO, and failing to ensure that all incidences of injuries or violence were reported. Regarding Lea's supervision of Dr. Nicholl, once again the absence of an underlying constitutional violation precludes supervisory liability. Regarding the supervision and training of guards and reporting of injuries, Perniciaro's claims fare no better. Perniciaro has failed to identify any deficiency in the guards' training . . . and there is neither evidence that Lea knew that guards were not properly implementing ALO nor evidence that the need for additional supervision or training should have been obvious. In an environment like ELMHS, where guards are tasked with the difficult job of keeping mentally ill and potentially violent individuals safe from themselves and from one another, the fact that Perniciaro was injured while on ALO is not itself sufficient to make the need for further supervision or training obvious. . . Finally, although Perniciaro points to evidence that he twice sustained injuries that were either unreported or untimely reported, he presented no evidence, nor even argument, that those failures were causally connected to any constitutional violation. Nor is there evidence that those two failures made the inadequacy of existing training and supervision 'obvious and obviously likely to result in a constitutional violation.' Accordingly, Lea, too, is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Pena v. City of Rio Grande City, 879 F.3d 613, 621 (5th Cir. 2018) ("A superior officer issuing a direct order to a subordinate to use excessive force demonstrates both the necessary action and causality for a supervisor-liability claim. Peña's proposed amended complaint thus stated a claim against Solis under this theory. . . . A superior officer issuing a direct order to a subordinate to use excessive force demonstrates both the necessary action and causality for a supervisor-liability claim. Peña's proposed amended complaint thus stated a claim against Solis under this theory.")

Davidson v. City of Stafford, Texas, 848 F.3d 384, 397-98 (5th Cir. 2017) ("As a threshold matter, the proper inquiry for supervisory liability here would be Chief Krahn's alleged failure to train or supervise, not his interpretation of § 38.02. But even if Chief Krahn's interpretation of § 38.02 was the equivalent of a failure to train or supervise, Davidson has failed to demonstrate a material dispute of fact concerning the deliberate indifference of Chief Krahn. Davidson's evidence is insufficient to demonstrate either a pattern, as discussed in section III.A.2, supra, or that his injury was a highly predictable consequence of Chief Krahn's understanding of § 38.02. That is, Chief Krahn's understanding of § 38.02 does not lead to the highly predictable consequence of officers arresting individuals (including Davidson) without probable cause. On this point, our prior decision in Brown v. Bryan County, 219 F.3d 450 (5th Cir. 2000) is instructive. There, we found deliberate indifference where the municipality in question had not trained or supervised the officer who committed the allegedly unconstitutional conduct. . . We further emphasized the fact that the policymaker, a sheriff, had recently investigated the officer and was aware of the officer's 'youth, inexperience, personal background, and ongoing [improper] arrest activities.'. . None of the facts in Davidson's case provide the same cause for concern we recognized in Bryan County. Defendants provided evidence demonstrating the extensive training completed by Officers Flagg and Jones, and Davidson points to no evidence concerning the officers' backgrounds or activities with the Stafford PD that demonstrate the high probability of Davidson's arrest. Davidson's evidence therefore fails to create a material dispute of fact as to deliberate indifference, and the district court correctly granted summary judgment on his claim for the liability of Chief Krahn in his individual capacity.")

Terry v. Kinney, No. 15-20548, 2016 WL 5335030 (5th Cir. Sept. 22, 2016) (not reported) ("As the parties recognize, Terry had a clearly established liberty interest in her bodily integrity guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment that was violated by McCutchen's misconduct . . . The defendants, as McCutchen's supervisors during the relevant period, may be held liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 if they 'learned of facts or a pattern of inappropriate sexual behavior by [McCutchen] pointing plainly toward the conclusion that the subordinate was sexually abusing [Terry]' and 'demonstrated deliberate indifference toward the constitutional rights' of Terry, if that failure to take action caused Terry a constitutional injury.")

Hinojosa v. Livingston, 807 F.3d 657, 668-69 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Defendants contend that the complaint does not properly allege their responsibility for the asserted constitutional violation because § 1983 does not contemplate supervisory liability. They argue that they cannot be held liable for the alleged failures of medical personnel and subordinate corrections officers because they did not personally participate in those failures. . . . But Defendants misread the complaint. The complaint does not seek to hold Defendants vicariously liable for the actions of their subordinates. Rather, it seeks to hold them liable for their own actions in promulgating—and failing to correct—intake and housing policies that exposed Hinojosa and other inmates like him to extreme temperatures without adequate remedial measures. 'A supervisory official may be held liable ... if ... he implements unconstitutional policies that causally result in the constitutional injury.'. . To the extent that Defendants appear to argue they had no hand in the formation of the intake and housing policies described in the complaint, they raise a factual dispute inappropriate for resolution on a motion to dismiss. The complaint specifically alleges that Defendants promulgated and had the power to change the policies that allegedly caused Hinojosa's death. Moreover, while it is true that the complaint contains allegations regarding the conduct of Defendants' subordinates, these allegations seek only to establish direct liability against those subordinates who were also named as defendants in the complaint, not vicarious liability against Livingston, Thaler, and Stephens.")

Hinojosa v. Livingston, 807 F.3d 657, 689 (5th Cir. 2015) (Jones, J., dissenting) ("Especially after Iqbal, the plaintiff has not provided the careful factual allegations to meet the burden of pleading, with plausibility, that three of the highest-ranking officials in the Texas prison system were deliberately indifferent to Hinojosa's vulnerability to heat in the conditions he faced at Garza West")

Brauner v. Coody, 793 F.3d 493, 500-01 (5th Cir. 2015) ("A supervisor can . . . be held liable when he was himself deliberately indifferent. In order to hold a defendant supervisor liable on such a theory, 'the plaintiff must show that: (1) the supervisor either failed to supervise or train the subordinate official; (2) a causal link exists between the failure to train or supervise and the violation of the plaintiff's rights; and (3) the failure to train or supervise amounts to deliberate indifference.'. . Thus, Brauner would have to create a genuine issue of material fact that the doctors and wardens failed to supervise or train the subordinate officials. He would then have to create a genuine fact issue that the doctors knew the nurses were disregarding their orders, and the doctors neglected to correct this behavior knowing it posed an actual serious risk to Brauner's health. His evidence is lacking on these points.")

Pena v. Givens, 637 F. App'x 775, 785 n.6, 786 (5th Cir. 2015) ("Although the particular facts of this case do not require us to address the Supervisory Appellants' Iqbal argument, we note the many cases in the years since Iqbal in which we have continued to apply our rigorous pre-Iqbal standards for supervisory liability. See, e.g., Brauner v. Coody, 793 F.3d 493, 500–01 (5th Cir.2015); Pierce v. Hearne Indep. Sch. Dist., 600 Fed. App'x 194, 199 (5th Cir.2015); Whitley v. Hanna, 726 F.3d 631, 639–41 (5th Cir.2014); Walker v. Upshaw, 515 F. App'x 334, 339 (5th Cir.2013). . . . We resolved the psych techs' qualified immunity challenge based on a different part of the qualified immunity standard: the lack of clarity on whether physical restraint in the context of mental-health treatment is a seizure. Of course, this does not answer whether a constitutional violation did or did not occur. It simply answers whether the psych techs can be made to account for it. But the unsettled nature of the law in this area likewise entitles the Supervisory Appellants to qualified immunity. . . . Put simply, if the law did not put the psych techs on notice that their actions would be judged under the Fourth Amendment, then it cannot have put the Supervisory Appellants on notice that they had a duty to ensure their subordinates were respecting patients' Fourth Amendment rights.")

Lott v. Edenfield, 542 F. App'x 311, 315, 316 (5th Cir. 2013) (not published) ("The complaint fails to adequately allege that either Lappin or Holder had knowledge of the alleged unconstitutional conditions at FCI Big Spring. The complaint does not recite a single fact that would establish that either Lappin or Holder actually received notice of the conditions. Instead, the complaint suggests that Lappin and Holder were aware of the conditions because they are 'the governmental authorities charged with oversight of the United States Bureau of Prisons and FCI Big Spring.' This is essentially a theory of respondeat superior, which is not applicable in Bivens suits. . . In the absence of any facts showing that Lappin and Holder received notice, knowledge may not be imputed to them based on their supervisory positions. Although it is a close question, we conclude that the complaint adequately alleges knowledge on the part of Edenfield. The complaint states that many of the plaintiffs filed administrative grievances concerning the alleged unconstitutional conditions. These grievances, along with Edenfield's presence at the prison and immediate responsibility for the prison, support a plausible inference that Edenfield actually received notice of the conditions. However, even if Edenfield was aware of the conditions, the complaint does not include sufficient facts to allow this court to draw the inference that she was deliberately indifferent to the plaintiffs' clearly established rights. The plaintiffs do not suggest that Edenfield personally caused the overcrowding at FCI Big Spring or the alleged conditions related to it. Rather, they argue that she is liable because she was aware of the conditions but failed to address them. Relying on Farmer v.. Brennan, 511 U.S. at 832, the plaintiffs argue that the Eighth Amendment imposes a duty on prison officials to provide humane conditions of confinement. Although this is true, Farmer requires only that prison officials act reasonably in dealing with prison conditions that they know to be dangerous or inhumane. Applying the doctrine of qualified immunity in the context of deliberate indifference, we conclude that the plaintiffs must plead facts from which we can infer that Edenfield responded to the conditions in a way that any reasonable official in her position would understand to be unacceptable. There are numerous allegations in the complaint regarding the conditions at the prison. The plaintiffs connect every alleged inhumane condition to the broader condition of overcrowding. At no point have the plaintiffs explained what Edenfield could have done to correct the overcrowding at FCI Big Spring, either in the complaint, in subsequent briefing, or at oral argument. The complaint alleges only that Edenfield 'has taken no steps to remediate' the conditions. Without additional facts, we are unable to draw a reasonable inference that Edenfield is liable for the alleged harm to the plaintiffs. . . .Because the complaint does not include facts establishing that Lappin and Holder were aware of the alleged unconstitutional conditions at FCI Big Spring, or that Edenfield responded unreasonably to the conditions, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Walker v. Upshaw, No. 11–20628, 2013 WL 829057, *4-*6 & n.19 (5th Cir. Mar. 4, 2013) (not published) ("Supervisory officials may not be held liable under § 1983 for the actions of their subordinates under any theory of vicarious liability. . .When, as here, plaintiffs allege that a supervisory official failed to train or supervise, they must prove that (1) the official failed to train or supervise the correctional officers, (2) a causal link exists between the failure to train or supervise and the alleged violation of the inmate's rights, and (3) the failure to train or supervise amounted to deliberate indifference. . To hold Upshaw liable on account of inadequate policy, Plaintiffs must show '(1) that the policy itself violated federal law or authorized or directed the deprivation of federal rights or (2) that the policy was adopted or maintained by the municipality's policymakers with deliberate indifference as to its known or obvious consequences.'. . Whether the evidence sufficiently 'demonstrate[s] deliberate indifference for supervisory liability is a legal issue that this court may review on interlocutory appeal.'. . . The parties agree that Upshaw had no actual knowledge of Hamilton's prior attack of an inmate with his boots in a different unit years prior to Walker's death and that Upshaw was not at the prison the night Walker died. Because Upshaw had no actual knowledge of the danger posed to Walker, any attempt to hold Upshaw liable for a personal failure to protect Walker would fail. . . Instead, plaintiffs claim that Upshaw is liable for his failure to train and supervise subordinates and his failure to implement adequate policies. . . .Although supervisor liability stems from a supervisor's deliberate indifference to the violations his training causes, . . . Plaintiffs do not seem to base their claim against Upshaw on the actions or inactions of Upshaw's employees due to his training. Plaintiffs make no attempt to show a pattern of Upshaw's employees failing to protect inmates. In fact, they acknowledge that 'normally, the rover on night patrol would come by every 15 to 20 minutes.' This suggests that Upshaw's training was usually effective but that his subordinates' failure to make timely rounds the night Walker died played a significant role in Walker's death. Plaintiffs instead focus on Hamilton's violence and the fact that Upshaw, through his training and supervision of his employees, failed to prevent it. However, 'mere proof that the injury could have been prevented if the officer had received better or additional training cannot, without more, support liability.'. .The Supreme Court has acknowledged that 'in a narrow range of circumstances, a pattern of similar violations might not be necessary to show deliberate indifference.'. . . However, the Court stressed that the possibility of 'single-incident liability' based on a failure to train is 'rare,'. . . and this circuit has similarly 'stressed that a single incident is usually insufficient to demonstrate deliberate indifference.'. . Plaintiffs' claims fall far short of the hypothetical offered in Canton in which the officers were offered no training in a highly dangerous situation. The evidence does not meet the requirements for single-incident liability. . .Similarly, demonstrating that a policy reflects deliberate indifference 'generally requires that a plaintiff demonstrate at least a pattern of similar violations.'. . Plaintiffs do not identify policies that Upshaw created or failed to enforce. Instead, they rely on Upshaw's statement that he oversaw the Ferguson Unit to assert that Upshaw was deliberately indifferent in failing to enforce or create an adequate policy that would have prevented Hamilton from having work boots, a cellmate, and being in a hot, uncomfortable cell that would promote violence given his mental history. Upshaw admitted to knowing that inmates have used their shoes to hurt other inmates, but he had no actual knowledge of Hamilton's prior transgressions. This, however, focuses on actions of inmates and fails to identify any prior constitutional violations resulting from Upshaw's policies. Again, this falls short of the standard required to show that Upshaw maintained a policy with deliberate indifference to its known or obvious consequences. . . . Although Johnson speaks to municipal liability, this court has noted

'the close relationship between the elements of municipal liability and an individual supervisor's liability' and held that 'the same standards of fault and causation should govern.'")

Carnaby v. City of Houston, 636 F.3d 183, 189 (5th Cir. 2011)("Mrs. Carnaby maintains that Washington is liable for failure to supervise the other officers on the scene. Under § 1983, however, a government official can be held liable only for his own misconduct. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, ––– U.S. ––––, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009). Beyond his own conduct, the extent of his liability as a supervisor is similar to that of a municipality that implements an unconstitutional policy. There is no evidence that Washington established any sort of policy during this one incident, so summary judgment on this claim was proper.")

Hernandez v. Horn, No. 10-40384, 2011 WL 462159, at *1 (5th Cir. Feb. 9, 2011) ("The State Defendants have waived the only issue they raise on appeal, viz., the unavailability of supervisory liability. . . . For the first time on appeal, State Defendants assert that '[t]he Supreme Court has eliminated the doctrine of supervisory liability.... Although this Circuit has not had an opportunity to confirm its case law accordingly, other federal courts have recognized that claims for failure to supervise and failure to train − the substance of plaintiffs' complaint in this case − are exactly the types of claims that Iqbal forecloses.' We can find no argument by the State Defendants in the district court concerning the invalidity of supervisory liability post-Iqbal. . . The State Defendants assert that they have not waived this issue on appeal because they discussed Iqbal at length in their district court motion. There, however, the State Defendants addressed only the holding of Iqbal regarding pleading standards, never arguing the substantive holding of Iqbal concerning supervisory liability. Indeed, the State Defendants appear to have conceded in that motion that they could be liable under the standard set forth in Youngberg v. Romeo. . .They never contended in the district court that Iqbal had foreclosed claims grounded in failure to supervise or failure to train. . . As the only issue that the State Defendants advanced on appeal is waived, we must dismiss their interlocutory appeal and remand for further proceedings in the district court. We express no view on what matters may be properly raised there on remand.")

Brown v. Callahan, 623 F.3d 249, 253-57 (5th Cir. 2010) ("Whether Dr. Bolin, jail nurses, or other staff violated Brown's rights is not before us; the Browns' case against Dr. Bolin and Nurse Kracja, awaits trial pending the outcome of this appeal, and we express no opinion on its merits. Sheriff Callahan had no knowledge of and did not participate in the events surrounding Brown's fatal period of detention. Thus, the Sheriff can only be held liable in his capacity as a supervisor of the jail for his own unconstitutional conduct. . . . The Browns have alleged two theories of supervisory liability, which, being founded on the same facts, may be discussed together. Mirroring the requirements in this circuit, they contend first that Callahan failed to train or supervise Dr. Bolin and the jail staff; that a causal link exists between the failure to train or supervise and the unconstitutional denial of medical care to Jason; and his failure to train or supervise amounts to deliberate indifference. . . Their second theory of liability is that the Sheriff ratified or condoned Dr. Bolin's custom or policy of intimidating nurses from providing needed medical care, and the custom or policy was 'so deficient that the policy itself is a repudiation of constitutional rights and is the moving force of the constitutional violation.'. . .Even if we assume arguendo that the sheriff's supervision of Dr. Bolin or the nursing staff was inadequate and that there was a causal link between his failure and Brown's death, we cannot conclude that there is a genuine material fact issue as to Callahan's deliberate indifference to constitutional rights. Evidence is also lacking to prove the objective unreasonableness, for immunity purposes, of Sheriff Callahan's management of the jail's medical care. . . .Deliberate indifference implies an official's actual knowledge of facts showing that a risk of serious harm exists as well as the official's having actually drawn that inference. . .Deliberate indifference is more than mere negligence or even gross negligence. . . Proof of deliberate indifference normally requires a plaintiff to show a pattern of violations and that the inadequate training or supervision is 'obvious and obviously likely to result in a constitutional violation.'. . Here, evidence of Sheriff Callahan's failure to supervise Dr. Bolin and the nursing staff is simply too attenuated to permit the inference that the Sheriff was deliberately indifferent, i.e., that he ignored a known or obvious risk of unconstitutionally deficient medical care. . . . [T]he Sheriff's potential liability for an unconstitutional policy runs afoul of the second prong of qualified immunity analysis, where the dispositive inquiry is 'whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . This court has interpreted 'clearly established law' on the subject of policy promulgation to require 'an intentional choice' and amount to subjective deliberate indifference. . . It must be 'obvious that the likely consequences of not adopting a policy will be a deprivation of civil rights.'. . Applied to this case, it would have had to be clear to the Sheriff that condoning or ratifying Dr. Bolin's practice of nurse intimidation would in fact discourage nurses from seeking constitutionally adequate medical care for the detainees. That he did not have the subjective knowledge required for deliberate indifference and imputation of liability has been explained above. There is also insufficient evidence from which a reasonable jury could infer that Callahan's conduct did not deserve qualified immunity. The district court relied on the same evidence related above that shows, at worst, the Sheriff's negligent supervision of Dr. Bolin and the doctor's relationship with the nursing staff. In the absence of any prior incidents that connoted inadequate medical care at the jail, it is impossible to infer that the Sheriff was essentially callous about inmate medical care or had any reason to suspect the level of care had become or could become constitutionally inadequate. The Sheriff was neither plainly incompetent nor knowingly violating the law, nor were his actions, in the circumstances he faced, objectively unreasonable.")

Floyd v. City of Kenner, La., No. 08-30637, 2009 WL 3490278, at *6 (5th Cir. Oct. 29, 2009) (unpublished) ("Floyd does not complain that Caraway himself filed the alleged unlawful affidavit in support of the warrants. Instead, he claims that Caraway, in his capacity as chief investigator, directed and approved the applications filed by Cunningham. This is an alleged Fourth Amendment violation under Franks, as we stated in addressing the claim against Cunningham. 'Because vicarious liability is inapplicable to ... § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948. Liability under Section 1983 for a supervisor may exist based either on personal involvement in the constitutional deprivation or 'a sufficient causal connection between the supervisor's wrongful conduct and the constitutional violation.' Thompkins v. Belt, 828 F.2d 298, 304 (5th Cir.1987). We must determine whether Floyd alleged the 'factual particulars' necessary to state a valid Fourth Amendment claim against Caraway. . .The relevant allegation is that Caraway 'participated in, approved and directed' the filing of false and misleading affidavits. In analyzing the issue, we turn to the Supreme Court's recent decision in Iqbal. . . . Certainly our precedents have acknowledged that some limited discovery may at times be needed before a ruling on immunity is proper. As an example, we referred to 'search cases, [because] probable cause and exigent circumstances will often turn on facts peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants.'. . In such a case, 'if there are conflicts in the allegations regarding the actions taken by the police officers, discovery may be necessary.'. . The importance of discovery in such a situation is not to allow the plaintiff to discover if his or her pure speculations were true, for pure speculation is not a basis on which pleadings may be filed. Rule 11 requires that any factual statements be supported by evidence known to the pleader, or, when specifically so identified, 'will likely have evidentiary support' after discovery. Fed.R.Civ.P. 11(b)(3) (emphasis added). There has to be more underlying a complaint than a hope that events happened in a certain way. Instead, in the 'short and plain' claim against a public official, 'a plaintiff must at least chart a factual path to the defeat of the defendant's immunity, free of conclusion.' Schultea, 47 F.3d at 1430. Once that path has been charted with something more than conclusory statements, limited discovery might be allowed to fill in the remaining detail necessary to comply with Schultea. . . Under these standards, Floyd's allegations against Caraway amount to nothing more than speculation. The conclusory assertion that Caraway 'participated in, approved and directed' the filing of false and misleading affidavits is consistent with finding a constitutional violation, but it needed further factual amplification. See Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949. Floyd might not know everything about what occurred, but the bare allegation does not make it plausible that he knows anything. Unlike his allegations against Cunningham, this bare assertion does not provide any detail about what Caraway, as chief of investigations, did to seek to control Cunningham's filing of an affidavit. Put differently, the conclusion presents nothing more than hope and a prayer for relief. An example of a situation that falls squarely within the kind of case justifying limited discovery is discussed in a recently released but non- precedential opinion by a panel of this court. Morgan v. Hubert, No. 08- 30388, 2009 WL 1884605 (5th Cir. July 1, 2009). In Morgan, a plaintiff who was in protective custody before Hurricane Katrina was transferred to a general prison population following the storm. . . After being beaten and stabbed, the plaintiff filed a Section 1983 suit against the prison warden. . . The complaint presented sufficient detail to demonstrate a highly plausible allegation of an Eighth Amendment violation. . . The events cited were so clear, the practical effects of such conduct so obvious, that the defendants' responsibility under Section 1983 for the plaintiff's harm simply needed the detail that limited discovery would either provide or deny. . . Unlike in Morgan, Floyd has shown nothing in his complaint to indicate a basic plausibility to the allegation. His Section 1983 claim premised on a Fourth Amendment violation therefore fails.").

Barnes v. City of El Paso, No. EP-22-CV-161-KC, 2023 WL 4097075, at *16 (W.D. Tex. June 12, 2023) ("[I]ndividual-capacity supervisory liability claims differ from Monell claims in certain key respects. For example, punitive damages are available from individuals (including supervisors) but not municipalities. . . And individuals can assert qualified immunity, while municipalities cannot. . . Most critically, to succeed on a supervisory liability claim, 'a plaintiff must allege that the defendant was personally ... responsible for the policy or custom giving rise to the alleged constitutional deprivation.'. . . A plaintiff must also show that the supervisor acted with deliberate indifference in enacting such policies or customs. . . The Fifth Circuit has recognized that a plaintiff can simultaneously bring municipal and supervisory liability claims based on the same alleged policy or custom. In Calhoun, for instance, the plaintiff brought Monell claims against the City of Houston, alleging that it 'had a policy of "failing" to "properly discipline," "restrict," and "control" its employees.'. . The plaintiff brought similar supervisory liability claims against the chief of the Houston Police Department, alleging that he 'took no actions to discourage [his officer's] unlawful abuse of authority.'. . The Fifth Circuit upheld dismissal of both sets of claims. . . But it discussed the municipal and supervisory liability claims separately, providing a distinct analysis for each set of claims. . . Calhoun thus cautions that supervisory liability claims should be considered separately from Monell claims, even when both sets of claims deal with the same factual allegations. In summary, Barnes' supervisory liability claims do not simply duplicate her Monell claims. Though the two sets of claims involve similar facts and similar legal standards, Barnes' supervisory liability claims turn on Allen's personal actions, while her Monell claims turn on the City's policies and customs, and the actions of its policymakers. . . While these considerations often overlap, they remain distinct. . . Thus, Barnes' supervisory liability claims may proceed.")

Gonzalez v. Gordy, No. 2:18-CV-220, 2020 WL 882049, at *2 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 24, 2020) ("Gonzalez has identified a specific 'quarantine' policy which he states he was subject to and which he claims led to a near-death medical emergency because it denied him medical attention when he was ill. . . The Court concludes such an alleged policy and harm state a claim upon which relief can be granted against a supervisory official.")

Carr v. Montgomery Cnty., Tex., 59 F.Supp.3d 787, 808 (S.D. Tex. 2014) ("In the alternative to Hayden being individually liable for bringing third parties to plaintiff's home for a private purposes during a search, she has claimed that he can be held liable for his failure to supervise his officers violated plaintiff's rights. The court concluded in Section V.B that plaintiff pled sufficient facts to state a claim upon which relief could be granted as to Hayden's supervisory liability for violating the constitutional right not to have officers bring third parties into a home for private a claim sufficient to defeat defendants' motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds. Defendants' purposes. Because the claim of supervisory liability is premised on Hayden's deliberate indifference to plaintiff's constitutional rights, which are well-settled rights, plaintiff has also stated motion to dismiss this specific supervisory liability claim against Hayden on the basis of qualified immunity is denied.")

Hawn v. Hughes, 1:13-CV-00036-GHD, 2014 WL 4418050, *5, *7, *9 (N.D. Miss. Sept. 8, 2014) ("Although a plaintiff who seeks to mount a case for supervisory liability against an individual under § 1983 is in for an uphill battle, the battle is not insurmountable; if it were, no individual could ever be brought into court on a § 1983 supervisory-liability claim, thus rendering the cause of action a nullity. For the reasons stated below, the Court finds that Plaintiffs' § 1983 supervisory-liability claim survives summary judgment. . . .The Court is of the opinion that Plaintiffs have demonstrated for purposes of summary judgment that Director Berthay was aware of alleged acts of excessive force by Officer Hughes in 2007 involving Wampler–George and Brann and acted with deliberate indifference to the same, and that this alleged deliberate indifference proximately caused Officer Hughes' pattern of excessive force to continue with Plaintiffs. Accordingly, Plaintiffs' supervisory-liability claim against Director Berthay survives summary judgment on its merits. The Court now turns to whether Director Berthay is nonetheless qualifiedly immune from suit on the claim. . . . In the opinion of this Court, Plaintiffs have met their burden in showing that a reasonable official in Director Berthay's shoes would have understood that his failure to train or supervise Officer Hughes, despite knowledge of the 2007 Lee County Jail incident involving Wampler–George and likely knowing of the subsequent incident involving Brann, would constitute deliberate indifference. For all of the foregoing reasons, Plaintiffs have overcome Director Berthay's qualified-immunity defense at the summary-judgment stage.")

Martone v. Livingston, 4:13-CV-3369, 2014 WL 3534696, *7, *12 (S.D. Tex. July 16, 2014) ("The TDCJ [Texas Dep't of Criminal Justice] Defendants object that they cannot be held liable under § 1983 for the alleged violation of the Eighth Amendment since there is no allegation of their personal involvement in the conditions of Mr. Martone's confinement. . . To the contrary, Plaintiff seeks to hold the TDCJ Defendants liable under a theory of supervisory liability for 'creating and approving the dangerous conditions that caused [Mr. Martone's] heat stroke, and failing to remedy them.'. . Plaintiff has adequately alleged that the TDCJ Defendants acted, or failed to act, with deliberate indifference to constitutional violations as necessary for supervisory liability to attach under § 1983. . . . For the same reasons described above, the Court finds that Plaintiff has adequately stated violations of the Eighth Amendment based on Dr. Murray's alleged failure to implement policies to protect inmates from the extreme heat, alleged policy of leaving the inmates without adequate medical care each night, and alleged failure to adequately train the staff about the risk of heat stroke.")

Khansari v. City of Houston, 14 F.Supp.3d 842, 866-67 (S.D. Tex. 2014) ("Plaintiffs fail to allege any foundational facts capable of showing that Chief McClelland was directly involved in the training or supervising of the officers involved in the incident at the Khansari's home on November 25, 2011; that the training or supervision that Chief McClelland provided to those officers was inadequate; or that Chief McClelland was aware of a pattern of prior violations by any of those officers that put him on notice that additional training or supervision was needed to prevent a violation of Corey's constitutional rights. Plaintiffs' argument that this case fits within the narrow scope of the single incident exception has no merit because a 'lone incident is insufficient to pierce the qualified immunity enjoyed by Chief [McClelland] .'. . Plaintiffs have neither cited a case that has relied on the single incident exception as a means of holding an individual supervisor liable in his personal capacity, nor alleged facts capable of establishing that this exception should be applied to Chief McClelland in this case. To rely on this exception plaintiffs must allege facts capable of establishing that the 'highly predictable' consequence of Chief McClelland's failure to train or supervise would result in the specific constitutional injury at issue, and that the failure to train or supervise represented the 'moving force' behind that injury. . . There are no allegations here that the officers at issue had not received any training or supervision, or that they had been involved in any cases involving the improper use of excessive force or tasers while responding to calls involving mental health patients. Instead, plaintiffs merely allege that the training all Houston police officers received as a result of Chief McClelland's policies was not enough and that more or different training or supervision would have prevented the plaintiffs' injuries. Such allegations are not sufficient to state a claim for failure to train or supervise against Chief McClelland in his personal capacity. . . Accordingly, defendants' motion to dismiss the § 1983 claims asserted against Chief McClelland for failure to train or supervise will be granted.")

Khansari v. City of Houston, 14 F.Supp.3d 842, 867, 871 (S.D. Tex. 2014) ("This court is not aware of and plaintiffs have not cited any cases imposing personal liability on a supervisor based on ratification. To the extent that ratification might, in some instances, be characterized as the implementation of an unconstitutional policy that causally results in the constitutional injury, subsequent ratification of a subordinate's excessive use of force does not state a claim for which relief may be granted in this case because such ratification could not have caused the constitutional injury about which the plaintiffs complain. Any § 1983 claim plaintiffs have attempted to state against Chief McClelland for ratification of a subordinate's allegedly excessive use of force is therefore subject to dismissal because, as a matter of law, no such claim may be stated against Chief McClelland. See Hobart v. City of Stafford, 916 F.Supp.2d 783, 799 (S.D.Tex.2013) (post-incident ratification cannot impart liability on a supervisor). . . . The mere failure to investigate a subordinate's decision does not amount to ratification. . . And policymakers who simply go along with a subordinate's decision do not thereby vest final policymaking authority in the subordinate. . . . Applying the ratification theory as plaintiffs propose in this case would turn it into de facto respondeat superior. While the mere failure to investigate a police officer's conduct that allegedly violated a person's Fourth Amendment rights cannot amount to ratification, the converse must also be true: The mere decision to investigate and exonerate also cannot amount to ratification. . . .[E]ven assuming that the policymaker, Chief McClelland, reviewed the conduct of the officers who responded to the call for service at the Khansari's home, he reviewed that conduct after the fact, i.e., after the conduct had been committed without his approval. To hold the City liable because Chief McClelland concluded that the officers acted appropriately would convert liability through ratification into respondeat-superior liability.")

Briggs v. Edwards, Nos. 12–2145, 13–5335, 13–5342, 2013 WL 5960676, *4, *5 (E.D. La. Nov. 6, 2013) ("Supervisory liability in § 1983 cases is a murky area of the law. . . Not only are there Circuit splits on this issue, there are conflicting standards that arise from the same Circuit, and even the same courts, and the Supreme Court has said little on the subject. . . . [T]he Fifth Circuit has repeatedly applied a 'deliberate indifference' standard to supervisory liability claims where the supervisor is not directly involved. [collecting cases] Accepting the fact that 'deliberate indifference to the known or obvious fact that such constitutional violations would result,' is the standard for supervisory liability cases, the Court must then determine how to apply the standard. . . .Applying the deliberate indifference standard to the instant case, the Court finds that, though Plaintiffs' allegations sufficiently allege that Lt. Redmond was deliberately indifferent to the dangers or installing an after market trigger, Plaintiffs do not sufficiently allege that Lt. Redmond was deliberately indifferent to Dee Jay's constitutional rights. . . Plaintiffs' allegations, even taken as true, cannot show that Lt. Redmond's actions were the cause of or affirmatively linked to the constitutional violation. Lt. Redmond's actions may have been the cause of Dee Jay's death . . . because the gun would not have gone off were it not for the aftermarket trigger, that is not the same as saying that his actions caused the constitutional violations of excessive force and/or denial of medical care. . . Regarding the excessive force claim, Plaintiffs argue that Deputy Phebus either intentionally shot Dee Jay or accidentally shot him because of the aftermarket trigger. Under the former theory, there is no way to conclude that the installation of an aftermarket trigger caused Deputy Phebus to intentionally shoot Dee Jay. If the latter theory is true, the excessive force would be Deputy Phebus' decision to point the weapon at Dee Jay, not the actual shooting. . . Again, there is simply no logical way to conclude that the installation of an aftermarket trigger on Deputy Phebus' weapon caused Deputy Phebus to draw a weapon on a teenager who was allegedly unarmed and had his hands in the air. As to the denial of medical treatment claims, there is, again, no way to determine that installation of an aftermarket trigger would cause Lt. Redmond to deny treatment to Dee Jay. Therefore, Defendants' motion to dismiss must be granted on this issue.")

Jackson v. Chavez, No. A–11–CA–417–LY, 2013 WL 3328683, *10, *11 (W.D. Tex. June 26, 2013) ("The State Defendants argue the previously recognized standards for supervisory liability are no longer applicable in the wake of Iqbal. Their argument is based on statements in Iqbal making clear 'each Government official, his or her title notwithstanding, is only liable for his or her own misconduct' and holding Iqbal's claim of 'knowledge and acquiescence' by a supervisor was insufficient to impose liability. . . The State Defendants note a number of appellate court decisions suggest Iqbal 'call[s] into question our prior circuit law ... on supervisory liability.'[collecting cases] However, as the State Defendants admit, the Fifth Circuit has not yet addressed this issue. See Hernandez v. Hom, 410 F. App'x 819, 820 (5th Cir.2011) (stating 'this Circuit has not had an opportunity to confirm its case law' on issue post- Iqbal, but declining to consider issue on appeal as not properly raised in district court). They also admit other federal circuits have raised the issue, but have not yet ruled Iqbal has radically altered the civil rights landscape in the manner they suggest. [collecting cases] Accordingly, the undersigned declines to dismiss the claims against Steen, Cuevas, Weinberg and Fredricks based on this expansive reading of Iqbal.")

Jolley v. Geo Group, No. 3:11CV481–LRA, 2013 WL 1364080, *2 (S.D. Miss. Apr. 3, 2013) ("Plaintiff does not suggest that Epps was personally aware that he was not being provided with enough food, or that he was not taken to a specialist or given the medical care he requested or needed, or that he was not provided with toiletries. He simply charges that Epps should have known—had he been appropriately monitoring EMCF. Without more, Plaintiff's allegations failed to establish that Epps was personally involved in any constitutional violation against him.

Supervisory liability under § 1983 cannot attach where the allegation of liability is based upon a mere failure to act; instead, any liability must be based upon active unconstitutional behavior. Leach v. Shelby County Sheriff, 891 F.2d 1241, 1246 (6th Cir.1989). The Court finds that although Commissioner Epps would be immune from suit under these circumstances, Plaintiff has also failed to state a constitutional claim against Epps.")

Hobart v. City of Stafford, 916 F.Supp.2d 783, 799 (S.D. Tex. 2013) ("This Court is aware of, and Plaintiffs have cited, no cases that impose liability on a supervisor based on ratification. . . To the extent that ratification might, in some instances, be characterized as the implementation of an unconstitutional policy that 'causally result[s] in the constitutional injury,' . . . subsequent ratification of a subordinate's excessive use of force does not cause the constitutional injury. Accordingly, this Court finds that, as a matter of law, no claim may be stated against Chief Krahn based on ratification of a subordinate's allegedly excessive use of force.")

Ard v. Rushing, 911 F.Supp.2d 425, 432 (S.D. Miss. 2012) ("Even assuming the continued viability of supervisory liability following Iqbal, as Rushing points out, Miller admittedly had notice of Rushing's policies and procedures regarding the male jailers' interactions with female inmates and plaintiff has failed to come forward with proof which would create a fact issue as to Rushing's knowledge of Miller's disregard of the policy. Moreover, Ard has not established an issue of fact as to whether Rushing was deliberately indifferent. . . She has thus failed to establish the elements of her failure to train/supervise claim, and it is clear that Rushing is entitled to immunity as to this claim as well.")

Turner v. Caskey, No. 4:09–CV–102–LRA, 2012 WL 2921797, *3, *4 (S.D. Miss. July 17, 2012)("Fifth Circuit precedent requires either personal involvement by an individual Defendant in the alleged violation, or the enforcement of some policy or practice resulting in the constitutional deprivation. Champagne v. Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office, 188 F.3d 312, 314 (5th Cir.1999) (emphasis added). If no personal involvement exists, then a causal link between their actions and the alleged constitutional deprivation must be shown. . .Turner's claim against Caskey is not based on his personal involvement in the incident; Turner did not notify Caskey personally that he feared for his safety. Caskey was not responsible for a "policy" or "custom" which caused Turner's injury. Turner's allegations are insufficient to establish supervisory liability against Caskey based on a failure to train or a failure to supervise theory of liability.")

Amerson v. Pike County, Miss., No. 3:09CV53–DPJ–FKB, 2012 WL 968058, at *5 n.7 (S.D. Miss. Mar. 21, 2012) ("To the extent Whirl and Barksdale remained valid, the Supreme Court's opinion in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, calls them into further doubt. There, the Court appeared to reject 'supervisory liability' and limit an official's liability to his own misconduct. . . In Carnaby v. City of Houston, the Fifth Circuit apparently followed Iqbal's rejection of supervisory liability, stating: Under § 1983, however, a government official can be held liable only for his own misconduct. . . . Beyond his own conduct, the extent of his liability as a supervisor is similar to that of a municipality that implements an unconstitutional policy.")

Milazzo v. Young, No. 6:11CV350, 2011 WL 6955710, at *4 (E.D. Tex. Dec. 11, 2011) ("The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has not yet interpreted this holding of Iqbal. Nonetheless, under existing Fifth Circuit jurisprudence, a supervisor may only be held liable if one of the following exists: (1) his personal involvement in the constitutional deprivation, or (2) sufficient causal connection between the supervisor's wrongful conduct and the constitutional violations. . . Neither of these two conditions contradict Iqbal but are consistent with the Supreme Court's holding that mere knowledge or acquiescence is insufficient to create supervisory liability in the § 1983 setting. Here, Plaintiff's allegations do not satisfy either condition. Warden Wheat can be held liable only to the extent that he personally engaged in misconduct. . . Plaintiff's allegations do not even come close to making such a showing.")

Carter v. St. John Baptist Parish Sheriff's Office, No. 11–1401, 2011 WL 6140861, at *7, *8 (E.D. La. Dec. 9, 2011) ("To state a claim against LeBlanc for failure to train or failure to supervise, plaintiffs must allege that LeBlanc had subjective knowledge of a serious risk of harm. . . Plaintiffs fail to do so. Accordingly, they have not shown that LeBlanc acted with deliberate indifference. . . . Plaintiffs' also seek to hold LeBlanc liable as a supervisor on the grounds that he formulates the policies of the LDPSC and those policies directly caused the violations of plaintiffs' rights. An official may be liable when enforcement of a policy or practice results in a deprivation of federally protected rights. . . In their complaint, plaintiffs allege that the following policies of the LDPSC caused their deprivation of rights: (1) failing to ensure adherence to citizens' constitutional rights; (2) failing to properly screen their officers before hiring; (3) approving a culture in which the personnel have an expectation that their actions will not be monitored and that their misconduct would not be investigated; and (4) failing to hold supervisory officers responsible for misconduct. None of the policies plaintiffs cites in their complaint states a claim against LeBlanc. First, the Fifth Circuit has explicitly held that the failure to establish policies ensuring the protection of constitutional rights is not an adequate basis for supervisor liability under Section 1983. . . Second, plaintiffs assertions that the LDPSC fails to properly screen its officers before hiring, approves a culture in which the officers expect that their actions will not be monitored, and fails to hold supervisory officers responsible for misconduct are wholly conclusory and devoid of factual support. The Court acknowledges that at the motion to dismiss stage, it is difficult for a plaintiff to provide proof of an unconstitutional policy. But, plaintiffs must at least set forth sufficient facts to raise their right to relief above a speculative level. Plaintiffs do not provide any factual allegations beyond a bare assertion of the existence of a policy at a high level of generality. Further, plaintiffs fail to allege a causal connection between these policies and the asserted deprivations of their constitutional rights. Because the Court finds that plaintiffs fail to state a claim against LeBlanc in his individual capacity, an analysis of his defense of qualified immunity is unnecessary.")

Colgrove v. Gibson, No. 9:11cv100, 2011 WL 6715821, at *7 (E.D. Tex. Nov. 10, 2011) ("The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has not yet interpreted this holding of Iqbal. Nonetheless, under existing Fifth Circuit jurisprudence, a supervisor may only be held liable if one of the following exists: (1) his personal involvement in the constitutional deprivation, or (2) sufficient causal connection between the supervisor's wrongful conduct and the constitutional violations. . . Neither of these two conditions contradict Iqbal but are consistent with the Supreme Court's holding that mere knowledge or acquiescence is insufficient to create supervisory liability in the § 1983 setting.")

Enriquez v. Nolen, No. 6:11CV320, 2011 WL 4716223, at *5 (E.D. Tex. Oct. 2, 2011) ("The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has not yet interpreted this holding of Iqbal. Nonetheless, under existing Fifth Circuit jurisprudence, a supervisor may only be held liable if one of the following exists: (1) his personal involvement in the constitutional deprivation, or (2) sufficient causal connection between the supervisor's wrongful conduct and the constitutional violations. Mesa v. Prejean, 543 F.3d 264, 274 (5th Cir.2008); Thompkins v. Belt, 828 F.2d 298, 303-304 (5th Cir.1987). Neither of these two conditions contradict Iqbal but are consistent with the Supreme Court's holding that mere knowledge or acquiescence is insufficient to create supervisory liability in the § 1983 setting.")

Olvera v. Alderete, No. 4:10-cv-2127, 2010 WL 4962964, at *12 (S.D. Tex. Dec. 1, 2010) ("In this case, Olvera does not allege that Defendant Tollett was personally involved in his arrest. Instead, he states in his Response to Defendants' Motion to Dismiss, that he has sued Defendant Tollett under the theory that Tollett oversaw a policy that allowed police officers in the City of Sealy to arrest individuals for taking photographs of police officers, and that such a policy, based on an erroneous understanding of the law, is unconstitutional. However, Olvera's complaint does not contain any mention of this theory, nor any facts that would support a claim against Defendant Tollett based upon this theory. Because this case is now at the motion to dismiss phase, the Court acknowledges that providing proof of an unconstitutional policy or Defendant Tollett's actions that led to the violation of Olvera's constitutional rights is exceedingly difficult for a plaintiff, who has no source of pre-discovery evidence that he may produce to support such a claim. However, Olvera must set forth at least some facts that allege the existence of policy, how such a policy is unconstitutional, and how Defendant Tollett implemented such a policy. This Olvera has not done. The Court allows Olvera leave to amend his complaint to address this deficiency.")

Ramirez v. Jim Wells County, Tex., No. CC-09-209, 2010 WL 2598304, at *1, *2 (S.D. Tex. June 25, 2010) ("Citing to Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly. . . and Ashcroft v. Iqbal. . . , Defendants first object that the facts pled by Plaintiff are insufficient to state a failure to train or supervise claim against Sheriff Lopez and Deputy Valadez. The Court disagrees. . . .Plaintiff specifically pleads that Sheriff Lopez and Deputy Valadez referred to Deputy Martinez as 'Taser Joe' and were responsible for training and/or supervising him on the use of his taser gun. Plaintiff also alleges the following: Defendants Valadez and Lopez have never required Defendant Martinez to be held accountable for taser cartridges, including but not limited to, failing to require him to sign-out taser cartridges, failing to require him to document the extensive use of his taser, and failing to properly train and inform him that the taser gun is an intermediate weapon to be used to gain compliance and not to be used as a replacement for verbal commands and/or as punishment. Assuming these factual allegations are true, the Court finds Plaintiff has pled sufficient facts from which this Court may draw the reasonable inference that Sheriff Lopez and Deputy Valadez failed to train and/or supervise Deputy Martinez.")

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Does v. Whitmer, 69 F.4th 300, 307-09 (6th Cir. 2023) ("We require 'more than an attenuated connection' between the injury and the supervisor's wrongful conduct. . . Sloppiness, recklessness, or negligence is insufficient to establish liability. . . But deliberate indifference, knowing acquiescence, tacit or implicit authorization, or failure to take precautions against likely violations may suffice. . . .The allegations here are a far cry from those in Peatross and Garza. The plaintiffs here do not allege that they told Etue and Gaspar that the MSP was violating their rights, that the directors acknowledged problems, or that they attempted to cover up constitutional violations. . . Nor do they claim that the directors received reports that the plaintiffs' rights—as opposed to the rights of the four individual plaintiffs who prevailed in Does I and Does I on appeal—had been or were being violated and failed to take precautions against likely future violations. Instead, the plaintiffs complain only that Etue and Gaspar failed to act and that the directors' failure encouraged MSP officers to continue violating the plaintiffs' rights. Even drawing all reasonable inferences in the plaintiffs' favor, the complaint's allegations against the MSP directors fail to state a claim of supervisory liability. The district court's ruling on this point was erroneous. However, the district court correctly dismissed the plaintiffs' supervisory-liability claims against Whitmer and Snyder. The two governors are even further removed from the alleged injuries than the MSP directors. The only connection between the governors and the alleged injuries is the governors' generalized responsibility to enforce the law and their supervisory authority over the MSP. That connection is too 'attenuated.'. . Governors may not be held liable for the unconstitutional conduct of their subordinates on a theory of respondeat superior. . . The plaintiffs argue that Whitmer and Snyder should have issued an 'executive order, policy directive, or other communication' instructing the MSP not to enforce SORA, but those allegations, like those against the MSP directors, merely charge the governors with a failure to act, which is not enough. . . Therefore, the plaintiffs also fail to state a claim of supervisory liability against the governors.")

Miller v. Gettel, No. 22-1034/1046, 2023 WL 2945340 (6th Cir. Apr. 14, 2023) (not reported) ("'[A] supervisor cannot be held liable simply because he or she was charged with overseeing a subordinate who violated the constitutional rights of another.' Peatross v. City of Memphis, 818 F.3d 233, 241 (6th Cir. 2016) (citing Gregory v. City of Louisville, 444 F.3d 725, 751 (6th Cir. 2006)). '[A] mere failure to act will not suffice[.]'. . Rather, the 'failure to supervise, control or train the offending individual is not actionable unless the supervisor either encouraged the specific incident of misconduct or in some other way directly participated in it.'. . This means, '[a]t a minimum,' Miller must plausibly allege that 'the official at least implicitly authorized, approved, or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending officers.'. . Miller continues to rely on Taylor v. Michigan Dep't of Corr., 69 F.3d 76, 81 (6th Cir. 1995), and Hill v. Marshall, 962 F.2d 1209 (6th Cir. 1992). But, as this court subsequently explained, neither decision holds that a knowing abdication of supervisory responsibilities is enough to establish liability for a subordinate's unconstitutional acts. . . The district court observed as much, and concluded that Miller's claims against Gettel and Fondren for failure to train and supervise were based on an alleged failure to act. Miller does not plausibly allege that Gettel or Fondren implicitly authorized, approved, or knowingly acquiesced in the allegedly unconstitutional conduct by the Intoximeters' technician who left the subject device in use after it failed to pass inspection on February 15, 2019.")

Zakora v. Chrisman, 44 F.4th 452, 476-77 (6th Cir. 2022) ("The complaint alleges that Warden Hoffner and MDOC Assistant Deputy Director Rivard were told by Inspectors Chrisman and Huntley about the drug-smuggling problem at Lakeland, but Hoffner and Rivard allegedly either ignored the information or instructed Chrisman and Huntley not to investigate the accusations. In either scenario, a plausible claim is stated for failure to train or supervise their subordinates. Hoffner and Rivard, as supervisors of the inspectors at MDOC, are directly responsible for giving orders to the inspectors. Failing to order an investigation into the drug smuggling, particularly after the two overdoses inside the C-Unit on consecutive days, could be found to constitute 'knowing acquiescence' to the constitutional violation of exposing the inmates in the C-Unit to a substantial risk of serious harm. . . When supervisors responsible for inmate health and safety ignore known threats to those inmates, they are more than simply failing to act. . . . The complaint adequately alleged that Hoffner and Rivard, in the face of a known threat to inmate safety 'personally had a job to do' in ordering an investigation into the known presence of drugs at Lakeland (and inside the C-Unit specifically), 'and [they] did not do it.'. . This alleged failure could be found to have directly resulted in a violation of Zakora's Eighth Amendment right to be free from the substantial risk of harm. The Estate has therefore stated a claim for failure to supervise against defendants Hoffner and Rivard.")

Crawford v. Tilley, 15 F.4th 752, 761, 766 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Dawn's Eighth Amendment claim against Erwin depends on Erwin's supervisory liability. So, on top of the deliberate indifference standard, Dawn's complaint must also meet the requirements of supervisory liability in § 1983 cases. Supervisory liability comprises two concepts important here: active involvement by the supervisor and causation. . . . At most, Dawn's complaint alleges the following: Erwin accepted Marc's transfer to KSR. Through that process, Erwin was 'made aware' of Marc's medical conditions. . . Erwin knew that Correct Care's deficient policies and customs posed risks to Marc. Erwin never tried to alleviate these risks. And the combination of these actions and inactions proximately caused Marc's injuries. That's it. Even charitably construed, this is all the activity that Dawn's amended complaint attributes to Erwin, and it is not enough to survive Iqbal. . . . Dawn's other claim that the problems at KSR were obvious to Erwin is also insufficient. In appropriate circumstances, we have attributed knowledge of obvious risks to prison officials. . . But those defendants, both wardens, had day-to-day obligations at their institutions. . . By contrast, Erwin is responsible for twenty-seven subdivisions within the Department of Corrections. . . At least twelve of these are penal institutions, each of which a warden directly manages. . . There is no allegation that Erwin regularly visited or received briefing on even some subset of them. We've never attributed knowledge of prison conditions so high up the chain of command with so little in the way of alleged exposure to those same conditions. So there are not enough well-pleaded factual allegations to establish that Erwin knew of particular issues related to Correct Care's practices at KSR. . . That leaves the ongoing lawsuits against Correct Care. The amended complaint provides no detail on where the alleged lawsuits came from. Rather, it observes that Correct Care was operating in more than five hundred institutions spread across thirty-four states. Erwin is never alleged to have read or had reason to know about any of the litigation; Dawn does not allege that any came from Kentucky generally or KSR specifically. So it is not plausible that Erwin knew about particular failures to provide adequate healthcare at KSR. . . . This is not enough to survive 12(b)(6) on an allegation of supervisory liability. Supervisory liability requires 'active unconstitutional conduct' by Erwin. . . But, as explained above, there are no well-pleaded factual allegations that Erwin knew anything besides that he was approving the transfer of a patient with lung cancer and blood clots to KSR to facilitate better medical treatment. . . Without more, Dawn has not pleaded that Erwin's acceptance of Marc's transfer implicitly authorized, approved, encouraged, or knowingly acquiesced in the alleged violation of Marc's constitutional rights. . . Dawn also has not pleaded that Erwin's acceptance of Marc's transfer was a proximate cause of his injuries. Supervisory liability is generally limited to times when the supervisor had existing knowledge of the specific type of conduct that led to a plaintiff's injuries. . . But the amended complaint does not describe the experience of any past inmates at KSR. And as explained above, the allegations about Erwin's knowledge of an existing problem are conclusory and not entitled to a presumption of truth. . . Without more, Dawn has not pleaded that Erwin's acceptance of Marc's transfer proximately caused the alleged violation of Marc's constitutional rights.")

Troutman v. Louisville Metro Dep't of Corr., 979 F.3d 472, 488 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Stephanie does not claim that Bolton encouraged a specific incident of misconduct, directly participated in that misconduct, or abandoned the specific positions of his duty in the fact of actual knowledge of a breakdown in the proper workings of the jail. . . Rather, Stephanie claims that Bolton inadequately performed his responsibilities—for instance, by failing to put in writing the policy of requiring medical clearance before transfer to solitary—but such allegations of inadequate performance fall short of the requirements to impose supervisory liability. . . Indeed, there was a standing 'no bars' policy in place that medical would place on an inmate's XJail if medical determined the inmate was a suicide risk. Even if we are to assume a 'breakdown in the proper workings' of this policy—which is plausible, considering the suicide at issue here—Stephanie does not allege that Bolton knew the policy was not working and nonetheless completely abdicated his responsibilities. She has not shown that Bolton 'either encouraged the specific incident of misconduct or in some other way directly participated in it' nor has she shown that Bolton 'at least implicitly authorized, approved, or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending officers.'. . Rather, Stephanie claims that Bolton inadequately performed his duties, but such claims are insufficient for § 1983 supervisory liability.")

Garza v. Lansing School District, 972 F.3d 853, 866-68, 874-75 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Plaintiff alleges in her complaint that Bacon and Robinson are liable for Duvall's violation of C.G.'s rights because,

as principals of the Beekman Center while Duvall taught there, they received and inadequately responded to multiple complaints that Duvall was physically abusing students. The district court dismissed Plaintiff's claims, finding that '[a]ny action or inaction by Bacon and Robinson occurred years before the events at issue in this case, and neither of those defendants had any supervisory authority over Duvall at the time that he allegedly abused C.G.'. . On appeal, Plaintiff argues that these are not valid bases for dismissal. Taking into account the circumstances involved in this case, we conclude that a lapse of time between a defendant's deliberately indifferent conduct and a plaintiff's injury does not necessarily preclude that defendant's supervisory liability—at least where the defendant had ample notice of the supervisee's likelihood of continuing violations, and the passage of time was not so great as to erase the connection between the supervisor's conduct and the student's subsequent abuse. We note that Plaintiff's claims do not present a statute of limitations issue, as she pursued them promptly after C.G.'s injury. In the instant case, the success of these claims instead turns on whether Plaintiff can show that Defendants actually and proximately caused C.G.'s injury, despite the time lapse between their alleged misconduct and Duvall's abuse of C.G. For the reasons that follow, given the specific facts of this case and for the purposes of a motion to dismiss, Plaintiff has sufficiently shown that Defendants' alleged failure to carry out their duties to report and investigate student abuse caused C.G.'s subsequent abuse. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's dismissal of Plaintiff's claims against Bacon and Robinson. . . . Just as a party need not have 'been present at the time of the constitutional violation' in order to be found supervisorily liable, Peatross, 818 F.3d at 242, they need not have current supervisory authority over the alleged violator. If this were not the case, parties would become effectively immune from supervisory liability immediately upon leaving the relevant position of authority, even if a violation occurs just days later. This is not a logical result—if a supervisor has encouraged a violator's misconduct, the effects of that encouragement do not cease at the moment of the supervisor's departure. Moreover, this would encourage individuals to avoid liability for their supervisee's constitutional violations not by responding to them adequately, but by passing the supervisee down the line to a different supervisor—or, more relevantly, by simply transferring the supervisee to another school. Instead, we ask whether Bacon and Robinson acted in a manner demonstrating deliberate indifference to the likelihood of Duvall's future abuse and, if so, whether their deliberately indifferent conduct caused his violation of C.G.'s rights. . . .[V]iewing the evidence in Plaintiff's favor, Alwardt's decision to place Duvall in a new school, where his colleagues had less notice of his history, raises a genuine issue as to whether Alwardt was deliberately indifferent to the possibility of future abuse. Moreover, the record suggests that upon transferring Duvall to Gardner, despite having received multiple reports against Duvall and knowing that he had been suspended based on one, Alwardt assured Gardner's principal, Defendant Nickson, that Duvall was known to be a good teacher and that none of the allegations against him had been substantiated. This, too, arguably further increased Duvall's risk of additional abuse. Defendants again contend that Roseville and Claiborne County require this Court to affirm the district court's judgment as to Alwardt. We disagree. The record suggests that Alwardt was presented with many more specific reports of abuse than were any of the administrators in Roseville or Claiborne County. . . . Altogether, we are faced with evidence that raises questions as to whether Alwardt failed to fulfill his obligation to review investigatory reports, failed to investigate other allegations, exposed students to additional risk by transferring Duvall to a new school, and actually verbally encouraged the use of force. This evidence demonstrates a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Alwardt knowingly acquiesced in or was deliberately indifferent to the possibility that Duvall would continue his abuse. Plaintiff's claim against Alwardt thus withstands summary judgment, and the district court erred in concluding otherwise.")

Graves v. Malone, No. 18-2296, 2020 WL 1900458 (6th Cir. Apr. 17, 2020) (not reported) ("In cases where we have found supervisory liability for excessive force, it has been where the government official ordered, or at least implicitly authorized, the use of force. See, e.g., Jones v. Sandusky Cty., 541 F. App'x 653, 667 (6th Cir. 2013)). Here, the record shows that Hedger ordered or authorized only the circumstances that, perhaps, ultimately led to the use of force; indeed, Myers and Potratz both testified that the decision to shoot was their own. Mere creation of the circumstances in which force is ultimately deployed does not give rise to a constitutional violation.")

Howard v. Knox County, Tenn., 695 F. App'x 107, 113-16 & n.2 (6th Cir. 2017)) ("Plaintiffs argue that although Wiegenstein did not himself physically abuse the minor children, he is nonetheless liable as a supervisor for causing minor Plaintiffs W.H. and L.R. to be deprived of a federal right. . . It is well-established that 'a mere failure to act will not suffice to establish supervisory liability,' and that a showing of 'active unconstitutional behavior' is required. Peatross, 818 F.3d at 241 (citation omitted). 'However, "active" behavior does not mean "active" in the sense that the supervisor must have physically put his hands on the injured party or even physically been present at the time of the constitutional violation.'. . . In order to bring a claim of supervisory liability against a school official, a plaintiff must show that the defendant's 'failure to take adequate precautions amounted to deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of students.'. . This requires, at a minimum, a showing 'that a supervisory official at least implicitly authorized, approved or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending subordinate.'. . The issue of deliberate indifference in this context is a question of proportionality. . .The court should first take into consideration the information available to the supervisor at the time, and whether the information available to the supervisor 'showed a strong likelihood' that the defendant would engage in similar behavior in the future. . . The likelihood of future harm may depend upon a showing that the supervisor 'was confronted with a widespread pattern of constitutional violations,' not merely isolated or 'sporadic' incidents. . . Next, the court must consider whether, in light of that information, the school official's response rises to the level of deliberate indifference. . . Taking as true the allegations contained in the amended complaint, we conclude that Plaintiffs have alleged sufficient facts to demonstrate that Wiegenstein had actual knowledge of Shoemaker's abuse. Plaintiffs point to numerous examples where parents and students complained to Wiegenstein about specific incidents of abuse witnessed or otherwise discovered, not just a general fear of potential abuse. . . .We must next consider whether, given Wiegenstein's actual knowledge of Shoemaker's abuse, his response rises to the level of deliberate indifference. On the basis of the complaint, it is clear that his actions, and more often, inaction, constituted deliberate indifference. Although knowing acquiescence implies more than 'sloppy, reckless, or neglectful' execution of duties, . . . 'failure to take any disciplinary action despite reports of repeated [abuse] rises to the level of deliberate indifference[.]' . . Moreover, a defendant may be more likely to be considered deliberately indifferent if he took affirmative action that heightened the risk of harm to the plaintiff. . . The complaint alleges that Wiegenstein made no efforts to investigate, report, train, or terminate Shoemaker upon receipt of numerous complaints from students, parents, and teachers. . . This alone is sufficient to establish a claim for deliberate indifference. The complaint also alleges that Wiegenstein, despite knowledge of Shoemaker's abuse, took affirmative actions to heighten the risk of future harm to children. . . . Wiegenstein has failed to identify a single case where we held that a school supervisor who took no action in response to complaints of a constitutional violation was entitled to qualified immunity. . . .We have not yet determined whether a causal connection must be shown where the plaintiff can establish active participation. . . The language of § 1983 itself holds liable any person acting under color of law who 'subjects, or causes [a person] to be subjected' to a constitutional violation. 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (emphasis added).")

Peatross v. City of Memphis, 818 F.3d 233, 240-46 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Although Officers Dunaway and McMillen shot Vanterpool, the Estate seeks to hold Armstrong liable in his individual capacity under a claim of supervisory liability. It is important to note at the outset that a § 1983 individual-capacity claim differs from a § 1983 official-capacity claim. . . . [fn. 3 Since Iqbal, the circuits have grappled with the precise contours of § 1983 supervisory liability, and while the claim of supervisory liability has not been altogether eliminated, the requirements for sustaining such a claim vary by circuit]. . . . We have long held that supervisory liability requires some 'active unconstitutional behavior' on the part of the supervisor. . . However, 'active' behavior does not mean 'active' in the sense that the supervisor must have physically put his hands on the injured party or even physically been present at the time of the constitutional violation. . . . '[A] supervisory official's failure to supervise, control or train the offending individual is not actionable unless the supervisor either encouraged the specific incident of misconduct or in some other way directly participated in it.'. . We have interpreted this standard to mean that 'at a minimum,' the plaintiff must show that the defendant 'at least implicitly authorized, approved, or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending officers.'. . As part of this inquiry, this court also considers whether there is a causal connection between the defendant's wrongful conduct and the violation alleged. . . A close reading of § 1983 affirms this point. The statute states that every person acting under color of law who 'subjects, or causes [a person] to be subjected' to deprivation of constitutional rights 'shall be liable to the party injured[.]' 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (emphasis added). Accordingly, where an official's execution of his or her job function causes injury to the plaintiff, the official may be liable under the supervisory-liability theory. . . In the instant case, the Complaint sufficiently alleges that Armstrong violated Vanterpool's constitutional rights because: (1) the facts plausibly allege that Armstrong knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates through the execution of his job function; . . . and (2) the facts plausibly allege that there is a causal connection between Armstrong's 'acts and omissions' and Vanterpool's death[.] . . . Taken as true, these facts and the inferences drawn therefrom . . . support the plausible inference that in the execution of his job functions, Armstrong at least knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of Officers Dunaway and McMillen. . . .For the foregoing reasons, the Complaint sufficiently alleges that Armstrong 'at a minimum, knowingly acquiesced' in the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates through the execution of his job functions. . . . [fn. 6 To be clear, we do not suggest that every time an MPD officer violates the constitutional rights of a citizen, Armstrong can be held liable for the conduct in his individual capacity. Qualified immunity is a fact-intensive analysis and will, therefore, turn on the particular circumstances of each case. Here, the Complaint sufficiently pleads that Armstrong knowingly acquiesced to the conduct that proximately caused the injury alleged, and we have long held that this behavior is enough.]. . . . [T]he Complaint here alleges that Armstrong essentially allowed the officers to 'do whatever they want, whenever they want, to whomever they want, irrespective of the United States Constitution.' It alleges that Armstrong was involved at least in part in creating and enforcing all department policies; that he did not punish officer misconduct, including the use of excessive force; that he failed to take action in the face of the growing use of excessive force by officers and admonishment from the Mayor on the issue; and that he 'rubber stamped' officer misconduct. . . .Armstrong's alleged conduct of 'rubber stamping' the behavior of officers who shot and killed individuals with increasing frequency 'could be reasonably expected to give rise to just the sort of injuries that occurred'—Vanterpool's unfortunate death. . . Accordingly, the Complaint sufficiently pled a causal connection between Armstrong's acts and omissions and Vanterpool's death. . . . We next examine whether the right alleged to have been violated was clearly established at the time of the violation. As an initial matter, Armstrong argues that the Estate failed to allege a clearly established right because the Estate seeks to hold Armstrong liable under a theory of supervisory liability, and Vanterpool did not have a constitutional right to additional police training. Armstrong's argument evinces a misunderstanding of this prong of the qualified immunity analysis. The Estate need not show that Vanterpool had a constitutional right to additional training or adequate supervision from Armstrong; it need only show that the right that Officers McMillen and Dunaway violated was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . Armstrong admits that Vanterpool's 'Fourth Amendment rights are clearly established insofar as the alleged misconduct of Officer's Dunaway and McMillen are concerned.'. . Based on Armstrong's concession, which is consistent with this court's precedent, see Smith v. Cupp, 430 F.3d 766, 774 (6th Cir.2005), the right is clearly established. Viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to the Estate and accepting the facts and drawing all reasonable inferences from those facts in favor of the Estate, the Complaint 'adequately alleges the commission of acts that violated clearly established law.'. . .In discussing what is now known as § 1983 in the late 1800s, Congressman Hoar of Massachusetts summed up the need for a 'duty of protection':

[For example,] [i]f every sheriff in South Carolina refuses to [hold persons accountable for wrongs allegedly committed against] a colored man and those sheriffs are kept in office year after year by the people of South Carolina, and no verdict against them for their failure of duty can be obtained before a South Carolina jury, the State of South Carolina, through the class of officers who are [tasked with affording] the equal protection of the laws ... has denied that protection.

Carter, 409 U.S. at 427 (emphasis added).

The words of Congressman Hoar capture the essence of the issue before the Court today, well over a century later. This fact is both ironic and disappointing. There is no doubt that several cities in this nation today are in a state of crisis regarding civilian and police relations. Here, we have allegations that a government official with supervisory responsibility ratified the conduct of officers who shoot first and make judgments later, evincing a brazen disregard for human life. Ratification of such conduct is abhorrent. It not only flouts accountability, but it undermines the integrity of our justice system. Where internal investigations repeatedly yield only 'rubber stamps' of approval for unconstitutional conduct, it sends the message that human beings are not being killed by accident—they are being killed by design. The law simply does not allow government officials to use qualified immunity to escape liability for such wrongs. At this stage of the proceedings, it is not known whether the Estate will be able to sustain these allegations, but it is clear that the facts alleged in the Complaint set forth a plausible claim of supervisory liability.")

Coley v. Lucas Cnty., Ohio, 799 F.3d 530, 541-42 (6th Cir. 2015) ("A § 1983 claim of personal liability for a failure to train and supervise differs from a § 1983 claim against a municipality for a failure to train and supervise. In order to establish personal liability for a failure to train and supervise

> [t]here must be a showing that the supervisor encouraged the specific incident of misconduct or in some other way directly participated in it. At a minimum, a § 1983 plaintiff must show that a supervisory official at least implicitly authorized, approved or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending subordinate.

Taylor v. Michigan Dep't of Corr., 69 F.3d 76, 81 (6th Cir.1995) (emphasis in original) (quoting Bradley v. Bellamy, 729 F.2d 416, 421 (6th Cir.1984)). Plaintiffs allege that Telb had a duty to train and supervise employees of the Sheriff's Department to avoid the use of excessive force and to ensure that the medical needs of persons in the Sheriff's custody were met. They then allege that Telb failed to train and supervise staff regarding the proper use of force and failed to investigate properly allegations of excessive force. This failure to train and supervise specifically included a failure to train on 'the use of a chokehold and the injuries derived therefrom' which action resulted in Benton's 'injuries and death.' Plaintiffs also allege that Telb had 'full knowledge of the assault on Carlton Benton ... but nonetheless intentionally and deliberately made false statements to federal officials about [his] knowledge of Defendant Schmeltz's assault and Defendant Gray's chokehold and the deliberate failure to provide medical attention to Benton.' These allegations are sufficient to show that Plaintiffs have established a valid claim under § 1983, insofar as they have shown that Telb 'at least implicitly authorized, approved or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending subordinate' when he helped Schmeltz and Gray to cover up their unconstitutional actions. . . Given Schemltz and Gray's constitutional violations as well as the sufficiency of Plaintiffs' allegations in establishing Telb's potential personal liability for his failure to train and supervise under § 1983, Telb has not shown entitlement to qualified immunity on this claim.") Essex v. County of Livingston, No. 11–2246, 2013 WL 1196894, *4-*6 (6th Cir. Mar. 25, 2013) (unpublished) ("For individual liability on a failure-to-train or supervise theory, the defendant supervisor must be found to have '"encouraged the specific incident of misconduct or in some other way directly participated in it.'". . A plaintiff must demonstrate that the defendant supervisor '"at least implicitly authorized, approved, or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending officers."'. . A mere failure to act will not suffice to establish supervisory liability. . . In both Taylor and Hill, it was the defendant supervisors' active engagement in a function of their position that directly resulted in injury to the plaintiffs. . . . This sort of 'direct participation' or, at the very least, active acquiescence in the known misconduct are likely examples of the outer bounds of the 'active performance' necessary for a supervisory liability claim. . . There must be some conduct on the supervisor's part to which a plaintiff can point that is directly correlated with the plaintiff's injury. . .Contrast a failure-to-train or supervise claim against a municipality; this is a broader claim concerning the custom or policy of a municipality, . . . and thus would implicate the conduct of a defendant supervisor insofar as he acted with deliberate indifference in his official capacity as a policymaker. . . Such claims do not require direct participation in or encouragement of the specific acts; rather, these claims may be premised on a failure to act. . . A plaintiff must establish that the municipality, through its policymakers, failed to train or supervise employees despite: 1) having actual or constructive knowledge of a pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees. . . or 2) the fact that the constitutional violation alleged was a patently obvious and 'highly predictable consequence' of inadequate training. . . . We highlight this crucial distinction between individual-capacity and official-capacity failure-to-train-or-supervise claims because, in the instant case, whether sexual assault was an obvious consequence of inadequate training or whether a pattern of sexual misconduct in other counties sufficed for proving actual or constructive knowledge speaks to the County's liability for Bezotte's conduct in his official capacity. These questions do not bear on the qualified-immunity inquiry of whether Bezotte exhibited the much higher culpability standard of personal involvement. Having discussed the two types of failure-to-train-or-supervise claims before us, we now turn to the issues of qualified immunity and pendent appellate jurisdiction. . . . In the instant case, the genuine issues of material facts found by the district court—whether sexual assault was an obvious consequence of inadequate training and/or supervision and whether a pattern of behavior in other jurisdictions constitutes knowledge of a risk—have no bearing on whether Bezotte was entitled to qualified immunity. As discussed above, such facts concern a deliberate-indifference inquiry in analyzing the claim against the County. Because the facts as alleged by Plaintiffs do not establish a constitutional violation by Bezotte in his individual capacity, we find that he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Although the sexual assaults on Plaintiffs are clearly established violations of their constitutional rights, Plaintiffs fail to assert any facts that Bezotte's personal actions violated those rights. For Bezotte to be individually liable for failing to train or supervise, Plaintiffs needed to demonstrate that he took deliberate action or was otherwise involved in Boos' illegal acts. . . . Plaintiffs allege only that Bezotte inadequately trained road patrol deputies and failed to supervise Boos despite knowing that sexual assaults on inmates were occurring in other jurisdictions. This hardly counts as encouragement of the specific incident or knowing acquiescence in Boos' conduct. Indeed, it is an allegation of only a failure to act, which alone is insufficient to support a supervisory-liability claim. . . Plaintiffs were required to point to some actual conduct by Bezotte that directly contributed to their injury; we have no such showing here. We therefore find that the district court erred in denying Bezotte's motion for summary judgment. '[W]hereas the County's liability may be premised on its policymaker's deliberate indifference,' the individual defendant may be liable only upon a showing of personal involvement. Harvey v. Campbell, Cnty., 453 F. App'x 557, 563 (6th Cir.2011). The question of deliberate indifference for establishing liability against the County for Bezotte's actions in his official capacity as policymaker is a separate inquiry. . .There are simply no facts in the record to support a finding of supervisory liability with respect to Bezotte.")

Campbell v. City of Springboro, Ohio, 700 F.3d 779, 790 (6th Cir. 2012) ("Although Kruithoff was not actively involved in the incidents involving Spike, a causal connection between his acts and omissions and the alleged constitutional injuries is suggested by the record. Chief Kruithoff allowed Spike in the field even after his training had lapsed. He never required appropriate supervision of the canine unit and essentially allowed it to run itself. He failed to establish and publish an official K–9 unit policy, and he was seemingly oblivious to the increasing frequency of dog-bite incidents involving Spike. Furthermore, Chief Kruithoff ignored Clark's many complaints regarding his need to keep Spike up to date on his training. Thus, Chief Kruithoff's apparent indifference to maintaining a properly functioning K–9 unit could be reasonably expected to give rise to just the sort of injuries that occurred. The district court correctly determined that the disputed facts preclude granting summary judgment.")

Campbell v. City of Springboro, Ohio, 700 F.3d 779, 791, 793-95 (6th Cir. 2012) (McKeague, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur in the holding that defendant Officer Nick Clark is not entitled to qualified immunity in relation to plaintiffs' § 1983 excessive force claims. . . . I disagree with the conclusion that Police Chief Jeffrey Kruithoff is not entitled to qualified immunity in relation to plaintiffs' claim that he is individually liable for Clark's use of excessive force on a theory of supervisory failure-to-train liability. . . I also disagree with the dismissal of the City of Springboro's appeal. . . . Neither the City nor Chief Kruithoff can be held liable for Clark's conduct on a theory of respondeat superior. . . The City may be held liable under § 1983 if it maintained a policy or custom that caused the violation of plaintiffs' rights. . . . The City can be held liable under plaintiffs' failure-to-train theory if plaintiffs' injuries can be attributed to the City's failure to adequately train Spike and this failure amounted to 'deliberate indifference' to the rights of members of the public. . . Specifically, plaintiffs must show three elements: (1) that Spike's training was inadequate to prepare him for the tasks he was expected to perform; (2) that the inadequacy persisted due to the City's deliberate indifference; and (3) that the inadequacy is closely related to or actually caused plaintiffs' injuries. . . .[W]hereas the City's liability may be premised on its policymaker's deliberate indifference, Kruithoff cannot be held liable in his individual capacity for failing to supervise unless he 'either encouraged the specific incident of misconduct or in some other way directly participated in it.'. . To hold Kruithoff liable in his individual capacity for injuries shown to be caused by deficiencies in Spike's training or officers' training, plaintiffs must show that Kruithoff 'at least implicitly authorized, approved, or knowingly acquiesced' in the violations and injuries sustained by plaintiffs Campbell and Gemperline. . . Plaintiffs have neither alleged nor presented any evidence to support a finding of Kruithoff's personal involvement in these incidents. The majority purports to apply the correct legal standard to plaintiff's failure-to-train claim against Kruithoff. Further, the majority acknowledges that 'Kruithoff was not actively involved in the incidents involving Spike.' It follows that Kruithoff is entitled to qualified immunity. Yet, the majority affirms the denial of qualified immunity based on evidence of Kruithoff's indifference to the need for better training of the canine unit. This determination that Kruithoff is exposed to liability in his individual capacity for his alleged failure to adequately train or supervise the canine unit 'improperly conflates a § 1983 claim of individual supervisory liability with one of municipal liability.'. . To the extent plaintiffs have adduced evidence supporting findings that Kruithoff was a City policymaker on matters of training and was so deliberately indifferent to the need for more comprehensive training as to render the training deficiency a matter of de facto City policy, he would be liable, if at all, in his official capacity, i.e., rendering the City liable. . . Thus, for lack of evidence of Kruithoff's personal involvement in either of these particular incidents, it is clear that he should have been granted summary judgment based on qualified immunity—notwithstanding his responsibility, as Chief and City policymaker, for deficiencies in Spike's and/or officers' training.")

Heyerman v. County of Calhoun, 680 F.3d 642, 647-49 (6th Cir. 2012) ("Section 1983 liability. . .cannot be premised solely on a theory of respondeat superior, or the right to control employees. . . Supervisory officials are not liable in their individual capacities unless they 'either encouraged the specific incident of misconduct or in some other way directly participated in it. At a minimum, a plaintiff must show that the official at least implicitly authorized, approved, or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending officers.'. . Heyerman's attempt to hold Mladenoff liable in her individual capacity for her alleged failure to adequately supervise assistant county prosecutors or for her adherence to or continuation of a policy that, in Heyerman's words, 'abdicated' her responsibility 'to act on remand orders', 'improperly conflates a § 1983 claim of individual supervisory liability with one of municipal liability.'. . Municipal liability, however, also is not established in this case. . . .The record contains no evidence of any case in Calhoun County, other than Heyerman's, where a defendant was not timely presented to the trial court after his or her case was remanded by the court of appeals. Thus this is not a circumstance where the need for action was 'plainly obvious' to the municipality's policymakers or where what happened was a 'highly predictable consequence'of the County's existing policy or the failure to train assistant prosecuting attorneys on the handling of remand orders. . . .Undoubtedly, the judicial system—to say nothing of the criminal defense system—has not functioned as it should when a criminal defendant remains imprisoned for seventeen years after his or her conviction has been reversed and no further action has been taken. Section 1983 liability, however, does not necessarily attach to any entity and/or individual as a result of this breakdown. It does not here. In short, Mladenoff was not personally involved in any conduct that led to any violation of Heyerman's speedy-trial rights to establish her individual liability. Heyerman fails to demonstrate a defective policy or practice to hold Calhoun County or Mladenoff in her official capacity liable.")

King v. Zamiara, 680 F.3d 686, at 696, 697, 706, 707 (6th Cir. 2012) ("Superiors and supervisors . . . are generally not liable for the acts of those whom they oversee. . . . Having the right to control the offending employee is not enough, simply being aware of the misconduct is not enough, and even administrative approval of an action later found to be retaliatory, without more, is not enough. . . The supervisor must be said to have 'directly participated, encouraged, authorized or acquiesced in the claimed retaliatory acts' to be liable under § 1983. . . As an initial matter, we must evaluate Warden Berghuis under the theory of supervisory liability under § 1983. Liability will not lie absent active unconstitutional behavior; failure to act or passive behavior is insufficient. . . Warden Berghuis will be liable for the unconstitutional acts of her subordinates only if she actively participated in the unlawful conduct, such as if she '"implicitly authorized, approved or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending subordinate."'. . The evidence presented a trial demonstrated that Berghuis at a minimum had knowledge of King's protected conduct. . . . Despite Berghuis's knowledge of King's protected conduct, nothing about the transfer order she signed suggested any potential constitutional violation or retaliation was afoot. . . . Without some level of knowledge of the underlying constitutional violation. . . Berghuis cannot be liable for the acts of her subordinates.")

Broyles v. Correctional Medical Services, Inc., No. 10–1447, 2012 WL 1503760, at *5 (6th Cir. Apr. 30, 3012) (not reported) ("In the amended complaint, Broyles sues an unknown medical services supervisor, John Doe, in both his individual and official capacities; however, Broyles makes allegations only on an individual-capacity basis in his amended complaint . . . Broyles alleges that an unknown medical services supervisor 'failed to properly supervise, develop, and provide an adequate medical system and staff to respond to medical emergencies.' Broyles asserts this failure to supervise and train allowed nurses and staff to make inadequate and incompetent medical determinations. These general allegations are insufficient to establish liability under § 1983 for failure to supervise. Section 1983 liability 'must be based on more than respondeat superior, or the right to control employees.'. . Thus, in such claims, the plaintiff must allege facts showing the defendant 'either encouraged the specific incident of misconduct or in some other way directly participated in it. At a minimum a plaintiff must show that the official at least implicitly authorized, approved, or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending officers.'. . To attempt to hold John Doe liable in his individual capacity simply for his alleged failure to adequately train employees 'improperly conflates a § 1983 claim of individual supervisor liability with one of municipal liability.'. . Because Broyles does not allege that Doe took any deliberate action or otherwise involved himself personally in allegedly unconstitutional acts of others, Broyles's failure-to-supervise claim fails.")

Hall v. Warren, No. 09-2400, 2011 WL 4916703, at *10 & n.4 (6th Cir. Oct. 18, 2011) (not published) ("Warren, who is the warden at TCF, argues that the district court's summary judgment as to her was appropriate because Section 1983 liability may not be based on a respondeat superior basis. Although we agree that liability may not be imputed to a supervisor based entirely upon the actions of a subordinate, . . . 'this does not automatically mean that a supervisor can never incur liability under § 1983,' Taylor v. Mich. Dep't of Corr., 69 F.3d 76, 81 (6th Cir.1995). Supervisors can be held liable for their own 'active unconstitutional conduct ... rather than on their supervision of others engaging in unconstitutional conduct.' Spencer v. Bouchard, 449 F.3d 721, 730 (6th Cir.2006). Hall claims that Warren personally failed to transfer him to tobacco-free housing despite receiving a written KITE alerting her to Hall's serious medical condition and the need for a transfer. This was not a 'vague and generalized' notice insufficient to notify a warden 'of the specific concerns about [a prisoner's medical] needs and alleged deprivation.'. . Rather, it clearly documented his medically prescribed need for tobacco-free housing and requested Warren to effectuate a transfer to the Burns Unit because he was getting very ill. Warren has failed to introduce any evidence establishing her lack of involvement in making or overseeing transfer decisions at TCF. Taken in the light most favorable to Hall, this record is sufficient to create a genuine issue of fact as to whether Warren was subjectively aware of the risk of harm to Hall. . . . Even if Hall's claim against Warren were based on her supervisory role, Warren could still be held liable if she 'implicitly authorized, approved or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of [an] offending subordinate.' Bellamy v. Bradley, 729 F.2d 416, 421 (6th Cir.1984). The unanswered KITES could lead a reasonable juror to conclude that Warren knowingly acquiesced in her subordinates' refusal to transfer Hall to a tobacco-free unit. For this additional reason, Warren is not entitled to summary judgment based on her supervisory position.")

Wright v. Leis, No. 08-3037, 2009 WL 1853752, at *3 (6th Cir. June 30, 2009) (not published) ("As for whether Wright sufficiently pleaded a violation by Sheriff Leis, the defendants offer a two sentence argument, essentially claiming that the amended complaint does not allege that 'Leis had any personal contact with Wright....' That, however, misses the point. Wright asserts that Sheriff Leis failed to train his subordinates, making it irrelevant whether Leis had physical contact with Wright. The defendants, by failing to adequately address the issue, waive any objection to the sufficiency of Wright's failure-to-train claim.").

Rossell v. Armstrong, No. 14-2737-JDT-DKV, 2015 WL 8773504, at *4 (W.D. Tenn. Dec. 14, 2015) ("A supervisory official, who is aware of the unconstitutional conduct of his or her subordinates, but fails to act, generally cannot be held liable in his or her individual capacity. . . A failure to take corrective action in response to an inmate grievance or complaint does not supply the necessary personal involvement for § 1983 liability. See George v. Smith, 507 F.3d 605, 609-10 (7th Cir. 2007) ("Ruling against a prisoner on an administrative complaint does not cause or contribute to the [constitutional] violation. A guard who stands and watches while another guard beats a prisoner violates the Constitution; a guard who rejects an administrative complaint about a completed act of misconduct does not."). The complaint does not allege that Defendant Armstrong, through his own actions, violated Rossell's rights.")

Laning v. Doyle, No. 3:14-CV-24, 2015 WL 710427, at *12-13 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 18, 2015) ("Plaintiffs seek to hold Chief Schommer and Sergeant John Doe personally liable under § 1983 for their alleged roles in failing to adequately train, supervise, and discipline Officer Doyle. Plaintiffs allege that Schommer and Doe knew of Doyle's history of violating the constitutional rights of citizens within his jurisdiction, and failed to take any remedial action. They further allege that Schommer and Doe failed to adequately investigate Laning's complaint of Doyle's misconduct. Defendants argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity on these claims, because a supervisor cannot be held liable unless he was actively and personally involved in the alleged constitutional violation. 'Supervisory liability under § 1983 cannot attach where the allegation of liability is based upon a mere failure to act ... and cannot be based upon simple negligence.' Bass v. Robinson, 167 F.3d 1041, 1048 (6th Cir.1999). . . . In this case, Plaintiffs' Amended Complaint is devoid of any allegations that Chief Schommer or Sergeant John Doe directly participated in Laning's arrest, or in any way encouraged Doyle to engage in the alleged unconstitutional conduct. Although Plaintiffs allege that Sergeant Doe appeared at the scene following the arrest, they do not allege that he played an active part in it. Rather, they allege only that he 'failed to investigate the circumstances of the stop.'. . Likewise, Plaintiffs allege that, although Schommer and Doe knew of Officer Doyle's propensity to engage in misconduct, they failed to take appropriate measures to avoid 'foreseeable and highly predictable consequences.'. . These allegations are insufficient as a matter of law to state a viable claim against them. So are the allegations that Schommer and Doe failed to adequately investigate Laning's complaint about Doyle. . . Accordingly, the Court dismisses all claims asserted against Chief Schommer and Sergeant John Doe in their individual capacities.")

Lacy v. Duell, 1:14-CV-537, 2014 WL 3752919, *6 (W.D. Mich. July 30, 2014) ("The acts of one's subordinates are not enough, nor can supervisory liability be based upon the mere failure to act. . . Moreover, § 1983 liability may not be imposed simply because a supervisor denied an administrative grievance or failed to act based upon information contained in a grievance. . . '[A] plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. . Plaintiff has failed to allege that Defendants Goodsen, Prelesnik, Stoddard or Huss engaged in any active unconstitutional behavior. Accordingly, he fails to state a claim against them.")

A.M.S. v. Steele, No. 1:11–cv–298, 2012 WL 2130971, at *6, *7 (S.D. Ohio June 8, 2012) (R&R) ("It is apparent that plaintiffs have erroneously conflated 'supervisory liability' with official capacity liability. Individual capacity claims seek to hold a defendant personally liable for actions taken under color of state law. . . Official capacity claims, in contrast, are the equivalent of claims brought against the governmental entity itself. . . Establishing 'supervisory liability' against defendant Bailey is a way of holding defendant Bailey personally liable in his individual capacity. As it is apparent to the Court that this is in fact plaintiffs' intent in this matter, the Court shall address whether plaintiffs' complaint contains sufficient allegations to state a § 1983 claim against Bailey in his individual capacity as a supervisor of defendants Steele and Mathis. A supervisor cannot be held liable under § 1983 simply by virtue of his position as supervisor over an offending individual. . .Further, '[s]upervisory liability under § 1983 cannot attach where the allegation of liability is based upon a mere failure to act.'. . Rather, to state a claim for supervisory liability sufficient to withstand a Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) challenge, a complaint must allege specific facts demonstrating that the defendant 'either encouraged the specific incident of misconduct or in some other way directly participated in it. At a minimum a plaintiff must show that the official at least implicitly authorized, approved, or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending officers.'. .Defendants argue that plaintiffs' complaint fails to satisfy this standard as it contains no factual allegations that Bailey was directly involved with, or even knew about, Steele's and/or Mathis' alleged unlawful conduct. . . .The factual allegations pertaining to Bailey in plaintiff's complaint are sparse: Bailey was a Captain in the Cincinnati Police Department with direct supervisory authority over Steele and Mathis on the date R.M. was being held at the police station and 'Steele told Bailey that [Steele] didn't want to speak to [A.M.S.] and that he was going to "let her stew" a bit overnight.'. . Viewing these limited allegations in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, the Court cannot draw a reasonable inference that Bailey encouraged, directly participated in, or even had knowledge of the unconstitutional conduct allegedly committed by Steele and/or Mathis. At most, plaintiffs have alleged that Bailey knew Steele did not want to speak to the mother of a juvenile in police custody. Regardless of Steele's motives for avoiding the conversation, this conduct, in and of itself, is not unconstitutional. Accordingly, Bailey's alleged knowledge that Steele did not want to talk to A.M.S. is insufficient to state a claim against Bailey for supervisory liability")

Sandoval v. Corrections Corp. of America, No. 4:12CV0093, 2012 WL 1552265, at *3, *4 (N.D. Ohio Apr. 30, 2012) ("Supervisory liability cannot be based upon the failure to act, or simply because a supervisor denied a grievance or failed to act based upon information contained in a grievance. . . In the instant case, Plaintiff alleges generally that Defendants Pugh, Johnson, and Hivner should be held liable for the conduct of their subordinates because they 'knew[ ] about the conduct and facilitate[d] it, approve[d] it, condone[d] it, and turn[ed] a blind eye for fear of what they might see.'. . Plaintiff fails, however, to allege any specific instances of 'active unconstitutional behavior' on the part of these Defendants relating to his alleged denial of medical care. In the absence of any such allegations, the Court finds Plaintiff has failed to establish any grounds to impose supervisory liability upon these Defendants.")

Mitchell v. City of Hamilton, No. 1:11–cv–764, 2012 WL 701173, at *3, *4 (S.D. Ohio Mar. 1, 2012) ("Supervisory liability under § 1983 must be premised upon active behavior, not a failure to act. . . . Mitchell does not allege that Chief Ferdelman or Sheriff Jones participated in, authorized, or condoned his arrest on October 29, 2009. At most, Mitchell seeks to hold Chief Ferdelman and Sheriff Jones liable for establishing a policy and custom of training and supervision that was so inadequate as to inevitably result in the violation of his rights. . . As recognized by the Sixth Circuit, general allegations that officers were not properly trained 'are more appropriately submitted as evidence to support a failure-to-train theory against the [government entity] itself, and not the supervisors in their individual capacities.' Phillips v. Roane Cty., Tenn., 534 F.3d 531, 543–44 (6th Cir.2008). Mitchell's sparse allegations against Chief Ferdelman and Sheriff Jones here, similar to those in Phillips, 'improperly conflate[ ] a § 1983 claim of individual supervisory liability with one of municipal [or county] liability.'. . Additionally, even if failure-to-train allegations could be sufficient to establish supervisory liability, the allegations fail to meet the Rule 12(b)(6) pleading threshold. The allegations that Officer Britt and Sheriff Deputy Mohr were inadequately trained and supervised are conclusory, as explained in greater detail in the following section. Accordingly, the allegations fail 'to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.'. . The Court will dismiss the claims against Chief Ferdelman and Sheriff Jones pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6).")

Thome v. Lake Erie Correctional Medical Management & Training Corp., No. 1:11 CV 2581, 2012 WL 273612, at *3 (N.D. Ohio Jan. 27, 2012) ("It appears plaintiff may have named Warden Gansheimer as a defendant because, as the Warden, he is the supervisor of all personnel at the prison. . . . In order for liability to attach to Warden Gansheimer, plaintiff must prove that he did more than play a passive role in the alleged violations or show mere tacit approval of the goings on. . . He must show the Warden somehow encouraged or condoned the actions of his subordinates. . . There are no allegations in the Complaint reasonably suggesting that Warden Gansheimer actively engaged in unconstitutional behavior relating to the alleged denial of medical care to plaintiff. Accordingly, the claims against him under § 1983 must be dismissed.")

Debardelaben v. McKeon, No. 2:11–cv–439, 2012 WL 234146, at *2 (W.D. Mich. Jan. 24, 2012) ("Plaintiff alleges that Defendants Bauman and McKeon denied his Step II and III grievance appeals and failed to protect him from the unconstitutional conduct of their subordinates. Government officials may not be held liable for the unconstitutional conduct of their subordinates under a theory of respondeat superior or vicarious liability. . . A claimed constitutional violation must be based upon active unconstitutional behavior. . . The acts of one's subordinates are not enough, nor can supervisory liability be based upon the mere failure to act. . . . Plaintiff has failed to allege that Defendants Bauman and McKeon engaged in any active unconstitutional behavior. Accordingly, he fails to state a claim against them.")

Trethewey v. Pekrul, No. 2:10-CV-12335, 2011 WL 4945814, at *6 & n.2 (E.D. Mich. Sept. 8, 2011) ("[E]ven if Pekrul could be considered a supervisory official, his failure to investigate the incident is insufficient to establish that he ratified, and thus was personally involved in, the alleged deprivation of plaintiff's rights. As the Sixth Circuit has repeatedly explained, an allegation that a supervisor was aware of an actionable wrong committed by a subordinate and failed to take corrective action 'is insufficient to impose liability on supervisory personnel under § 1983.'. . . Here, there is no evidence that defendant Pekrul encouraged the arresting officer's alleged use of excessive force or directly participated in it. Thus, he may not be found liable simply for his failure to investigate the incident. . . . In Marchese v. Lucas, 758 F.2d 181 (6th Cir.1985), the Court imposed supervisory liability on a Sheriff in part based on his failure to investigate. This case, however, is distinguishable. In Marchese, the Sheriff was sued in his official capacity, and was deemed by the court to be a policy maker for the county, rendering his failure to investigate an official policy or custom of the county for purposes of imposing liability. . . Marchese is inapplicable to a suit brought against a non-policy making official in his individual capacity.")

Dillingham v. Millsaps, 809 F.Supp.2d 820, 846, 847 (E.D. Tenn. 2011) ("Plaintiffs have incorrectly conflated the constitutional standards for individual supervisory liability and municipal liability. . . . Absent personal involvement in the underlying unconstitutional act, the attempt to hold '[municipal supervisors] liable in their individual capacities for their alleged failure to adequately train employees ... "improperly conflates a § 1983 claim of individual supervisory liability with one of municipal liability."'. . In this case, there is no evidence that Sheriff Bivens was personally involved or authorized the alleged incident. Consequently, Plaintiffs have improperly brought suit against Sheriff Bivens in his individual capacity. Generally, there are two ways of imposing supervisory liability: (1) a pattern of conduct; or (2) a truly egregious single incident. . . Because Plaintiffs have failed to establish a pattern of similar incidents, Sheriff Bivens will only be liable if there was 'essentially a complete failure to train the police force, or training that is so reckless or grossly negligent that future police misconduct is almost inevitable or would properly be characterized as substantially certain to occur.'. . Even assuming that Deputy Millsaps never received a copy of the Policy Manual, he still received training on the appropriate use of force. . . Deputy Millsaps graduated from the Tennessee Law Enforcement Training Academy in 1996 where he received training on the use of force. . . At the time of the alleged incident, Deputy Millsaps was in good standing with the Sheriff's Department and had not received any complaints. . . Additionally, Deputy Millsaps received training at the Academy on how to deal with belligerent individuals, and this training was refreshed every couple of years. . . In addition to the more general training, Deputy Millsaps also attended a taser training class in the fall of 2006 that lasted four to eight hours. . . During this class, he was instructed on the appropriate use of force, both generally and specifically with regard to using tasers. . . For example, Deputy Millsaps was taught that using a taser is appropriate when a person does not respond to verbal commands and is being combative. . . The fact that Dillingham completed this training is significant. Plaintiffs are trying to equate 'failure to give a policy manual' with 'failure to train,' and completely ignoring the fact that Deputy Millsaps received training on the precise weapon at issue in this case. This training-which was tailored to the appropriate use of taser guns-is a lot more specific than the Policy Manual's general statement that officers should use 'reasonable force.' . . . This general 'failure to train' claim should have been directed against Monroe County, not Sheriff Bivens in his individual capacity. . . . Moreover, even when considering this claim, Plaintiffs have failed to cite any specific, affirmative act by Sheriff Bivens that would subject him to liability. Accordingly, Dillingham's Fourth Amendment 'excessive force' against Sheriff Bivens in his individual capacity is DISMISSED WITH PREJUDICE. Furthermore, because Sheriff Bivens cannot be held supervisorily liable, there is no need to determine whether Sheriff Bivens is entitled to qualified immunity.") Campbell v. City of Springboro, Ohio, 788 F.Supp.2d 637, 680, 681 (S.D. Ohio 2011) ("There is no allegation in this case that Chief Kruithoff either encouraged the specific incidents of misconduct or in some other way directly participated in them. Instead Plaintiffs seek to hold Chief Kruithoff liable for establishing a policy and custom of training and supervision that was so inadequate as to inevitably result in the violation of Plaintiffs' rights. One way of showing knowing acquiescence is to show that a supervisor knew of a pattern of constitutional violations and failed to address the problem. In the absence of evidence of a pattern of past misconduct that would suggest knowing acquiescence on the part of a supervisor, . . . the Sixth Circuit has held that 'a supervisory official ... may be held liable only where there is essentially a complete failure to train the police force, or training that is so reckless or grossly negligent that future police misconduct is almost inevitable.'. . . [T]here is evidence in this case that in establishing the SPD's canine unit, Chief Kruithoff took few if any steps to ensure that the unit functioned in accordance with the law.

He chose to essentially abdicate any duty he may have had to set policies governing the operation of the unit and to provide training for the officers who were supposedly charged with supervising the unit. Plaintiffs set forth sufficient evidence from which a jury could conclude that the supervision and training in this case were so lacking that the resultant violations of Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights was almost a foregone conclusion.")

Clellan v. Karnes, No. 2:10-CV-170, 2011 WL 249493, at *2, *3 (S.D. Ohio Jan. 25, 2011) ("Even though Twombly does not require detailed allegations at the pleadings stage, legal conclusions without any factual support do not meet the standard necessary to overcome a 12(b)(6) motion, which is the applicable standard for this 12(c) motion. Thus, the Plaintiffs in this case fail to make a showing that any of the three Defendants, all of whom are agents of Franklin County, was acting pursuant to a County policy, custom, procedure when the alleged constitutional violations occurred; therefore, their suit against all three Defendants in their official capacities fails. The Plaintiffs also bring suit against each of the three Defendants in their personal capacities. To establish personal liability in a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 action, the plaintiff must demonstrate that an official, acting under the color of state law, caused the deprivation of a federal right, which is a lower standard than must be met to find someone has committed a constitutional violation in an official capacity. . . The Plaintiffs allege that they suffered assault and battery, an intentional infliction of emotional distress, and were falsely arrested. For none of these claims, however, do the Plaintiffs suggest Karnes played a direct role in committing the offense. The Plaintiffs also do not mention that Karnes directed or encouraged the incidents of misconduct they allege Felkner and Montgomery committed. The Sixth Circuit has found that without such a showing, a supervisor cannot be held personally liable for a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 violation subordinates commit. . .Though the Plaintiffs claim the other two Defendants were 'under the direct supervision of their superiors, including Defendant Sheriff Jim Karnes,' they plead no facts which demonstrate that this was in fact the case and that such supervision involved encouraging the deputies to commit constitutional violations. Thus, because the Plaintiffs have not pled facts that indicate Karnes either encouraged the deputies to commit the alleged unconstitutional action or was directly involved in committing such action himself, their claim against him in his personal capacity fails.")

Peterson v. Cooper, No. 1:09-cv-224, 2009 WL 2448141, at *3 (W.D. Mich. Aug. 10, 2009) ("Plaintiff argues that Defendants Embry, Huss and Klinesmith failed to investigate Plaintiff's claims regarding the August 22, 2006 incident after viewing the surveillance video and implicitly authorized, approved and acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of Defendants Cooper and Patterson and the two John Doe Defendants. Plaintiff also asserts that Defendants Smith and Caruso are liable for their policies of inaction when they should have known of the widespread pattern of assaults by staff on prisoners. Government officials may not be held liable for the unconstitutional conduct of their subordinates under a theory of respondeat superior or vicarious liability. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1948 (2009) . . . The acts of one's subordinates are not enough, nor can supervisory liability be based upon the mere failure to act. . . Moreover, § 1983 liability may not be imposed simply because a supervisor denied an administrative grievance or failed to act based upon information contained in a grievance. . . Plaintiff has failed to allege that Defendants . . . engaged in any active unconstitutional behavior. Therefore, Plaintiff fails to state a claim.").

Davis v. Strickland, 2009 WL 2047891 (S.D. Ohio July 7, 2009) (prisoners' claims against Governor in his individual capacity dismissed where no allegations that Governor was personally involved or encouraged alleged wrongs).

Jacobs v. Strickland, No. 2:08-cv-680, 2009 WL 1911781, at *3 (S.D. Ohio June 30, 2009) ("Although there are other legal claims that can properly be asserted against a supervisor simply because someone under his or her supervision may have committed a legal wrong, liability for constitutional deprivations under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 cannot rest on such a claim. Consequently, unless the plaintiff's complaint affirmatively pleads the personal involvement of a defendant in the allegedly unconstitutional action about which the plaintiff is complaining, the complaint fails to state a claim against that defendant and dismissal is warranted. . . This rule holds true even if the supervisor has actual knowledge of the constitutional violation as long as the supervisor did not actually participate in or encourage the wrongful behavior.").

Stockton v. Milwaukee County, 44 F.4th 605, 619 (7th Cir. 2022) ("[S]upervisory liability cannot attach under § 1983 absent a showing the officer is personally responsible for a deprivation of a constitutional right. . . To maintain an action for supervisory liability against Clarke, Schmidt, or Evans, Stockton cannot rely on a theory of respondeat superior but, instead, must present evidence that the defendants violated the Constitution through their own conduct. . . Stockton must demonstrate Madden's injury occurred at Clarke, Schmidt, and Evans's direction or with their knowledge and consent and that the defendants acted 'either knowingly or with deliberate, reckless indifference.'. . On this record, no reasonable jury could conclude Clarke, Schmidt, or Evans were personally involved either in Madden's care or facilitated, approved, or turned a blind eye to medical staffing levels or sick call slip processing at the MCJ.")

Kemp v. Fulton County, 27 F.4th 491, 498-99 (7th Cir. 2022) ("Kemp argues that Standard and Ford knowingly hired and retained a hearing-impaired correctional officer. Although Standard and Ford deny knowing about Burget's hearing loss, we assume, favorably to Kemp, that they knew about it. Kingsley's objective-unreasonableness test applies equally to supervisory-liability claims. That is because the state of mind necessary to trigger a supervisor's liability varies with the constitutional provision at the heart of the claim, in much the same way that the state of mind needed to establish a section 1983 violation does. . . Thus, applying Kingsley's objective-unreasonableness test, Kemp can defeat summary judgment only if the facts viewed in the light most favorable to him show that Standard and Ford acted purposefully, knowingly, or with reckless disregard for the consequences of hiring and retaining Burget despite his hearing disability. . . Once again, he must show more than negligence. . . . [T]here is no evidence in the record that would allow a reasonable jury to conclude that another officer with no hearing impairment would have heard the fight and intervened earlier. Second, Kemp has presented no evidence that Standard and Ford knew that Burget was not wearing his hearing aid or that they had any reason to believe that he was unable to perform his job duties without the device. Without notice that Burget was posing a danger to the people detailed in the Fulton County Jail, his supervisors' decision to retain him may have been negligent, but there is no evidence that it was purposeful, knowing, or reckless. . . On this record, Kemp has not presented sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to conclude that defendants Burget, Standard, or Ford took objectively unreasonable actions that caused his injuries.")

Horshaw v. Casper, 910 F.3d 1027, 1029-30 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Liability under § 1983 is direct rather than vicarious; supervisors are responsible for their own acts but not for those of subordinates, or for failing to ensure that subordinates carry out their tasks correctly. . . We held in Vance that a soldier cannot alter this rule by sending a letter of complaint directly to the Secretary of Defense. . .But whether a given supervisor retained some operational responsibilities is a question of fact. Atchison's testimony that he would have transferred Horshaw to protective custody had he received the note implies that he made important operational decisions personally rather than referring complaints to the staff. If so, he could be directly liable under Farmer.")

Hoffman v. Knoebel, 894 F.3d 836, 841-43 (7th Cir. 2018) ("As we said at the outset, [there] is enough to show that the plaintiffs were deprived of a liberty interest without due process of law. But who is responsible? In particular, were either the individual defendants (Knoebel and Seybold) or the Clark County Sheriff's Office subject to liability for a constitutional tort? For both sets of defendants, the crucial issue is personal (or departmental) responsibility. . . . We begin with the individual defendants. The plaintiffs do not argue that Knoebel and Seybold are responsible for the failure to provide due process protections in the first instance. Rather, they argue that both defendants were deliberately indifferent for failing to intervene while the plaintiffs were in jail. . . .The plaintiffs also argue that Seybold and Knoebel were deliberately indifferent for failing to bring an end to the DTC's unlawful incarcerations earlier. But it is clear from the record that Knoebel and Seybold themselves lacked authority to change the DTC's sanctioning practices. While Knoebel had some authority over the administrative policies of the Clark County DTC, neither she nor Seybold had the power to over-ride Judge Jacobi's orders. When the staff and outside lawyers did bring due process concerns to Judge Jacobi's attention, he dismissed them. Knoebel and Seybold had no ability to compel the judge to do otherwise. Recognizing this, the plaintiffs contend that Knoebel and Seybold should at least have 'investigated and made a report of the obvious constitutional violations that were running rampant in 2012 and pre-November 2013.' Seybold eventually did make such a report when he expressed his concerns to Clark County Chief Judge Vicki Carmichael in November 2013, and his report contributed to the eventual revelation of the DTC's abuses. But the plaintiffs say more was required. To be sure, the Constitution imposes an affirmative duty to protect the well-being of those in custody. . . And supervisors are liable for constitutional violations if they turn a blind eye or acquiesce to abuses of their subordinates. . . The problem is that Knoebel and Seybold were not supervisors of the DTC, and they certainly had no supervisory authority over the judge. They supervised no one but the participants of the program, and no one argues that the plaintiffs were violating their own rights. . . With supervisory liability out of the way, this theory lacks a legal basis. . . The Constitution does not impose a general duty to expose wrongdoing anywhere within a government employee's organization. State law might impose expanded reporting duties on employees such as the defendants, but that would not help the plaintiffs. . . . Knoebel and Seybold were not deliberately indifferent for failing to take extra steps once internal efforts were rebuffed.")

Rasho v. Elyea, 856 F.3d 469, 478-79 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Prison officials generally are entitled to rely on the judgment of medical professionals treating an inmate. . . While Dr. Elyea and Dr. Blank were themselves medical professionals who might ordinarily be held to a different standard than a non-medical prison official, in this case Rasho seeks to hold Dr. Elyea and Dr. Blank accountable as prison administrators and policymakers, not treaters. Rasho has not presented evidence that either of them should have realized that something was amiss with Dr. Massa's and Dr. Garlick's transfer recommendation. Accordingly, the grant of summary judgment in their favor was appropriate as well.")

Gill v. City of Milwaukee, 850 F.3d 335, 344 (7th Cir. 2017) ("To succeed on a claim for supervisory liability, a plaintiff must show that the supervisor was personally involved in the constitutional violation. . . That means the supervisor 'must know about the conduct and facilitate it, approve it, condone it, or turn a blind eye for fear of what [he] might see.'. . Gill's complaint fails to plausibly allege that Chief Flynn had such personal involvement in the detectives' conduct. It states only that Chief Flynn failed to train the detectives adequately and that he was 'deliberately and recklessly indifferent' to the detectives' actions. There is, however, no allegation or plausible inference that Chief Flynn knew about or was personally involved in the specific conduct. Therefore, we agree with the district court that Gill cannot maintain a claim for supervisory liability.")

Estate of Miller by Chassie v. Marberry, 847 F.3d 425, 428-29 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Although Iqbal, Vance, and Burks all hold that inaction following receipt of a complaint about someone else's conduct is not a source of liability, Miller seeks support from Haywood v. Hathaway, 842 F.3d 1026 (7th Cir. 2016), in which the majority of a divided panel thought that allegations against a state prison's warden created a triable Eighth Amendment issue. Haywood contended that he had been held for 60 days in freezing conditions. The panel's majority stressed that the warden had given instructions to the prison's engineering staff, received a report, visited the scene, and declared that all was well. That personal involvement permitted an inference that the warden's own conduct was unconstitutional. Miller's allegation, by contrast, is that Rogers and Marberry brushed off his complaints, leaving them to be handled through the chain of command. That brings Miller's claim within the scope of Iqbal, Vance, and Burks rather than Haywood.")

Estate of Miller by Chassie v. Marberry, 847 F.3d 425, 429-33 (7th Cir. 2017) (Posner, J., dissenting) ("Judge Easterbrook's majority opinion speculates that medical personnel might issue lower-bunk restrictions for reasons that don't imply the existence of a serious medical need; points out that not all brain tumors are serious; and reminds the reader that guards are not obliged to believe whatever a prisoner tells them. All true—but whether Rogers or Marberry was aware of the serious health risk to Miller from being assigned to an upper bunk is an open question that needs to be addressed at a trial. The record contains facts that support Miller's claim that he had a serious medical need and that the defendants knew it and did nothing despite their responsibilities. . . .The defendants knew after Miller's first fall from an upper bunk, and from his complaints to both of them, that he was in danger of a serious injury if he remained in an upper bunk, and it would been the simplest thing in the world for either or both of them to have conveyed his complaints to the prison's medical staff for confirmation of whether he already had, and if not should be given, a lower-bunk restriction. Warden Marberry's reactions to Miller's complaints made to her repeatedly in person as she made her rounds through the Special Housing Unit were grossly insensitive—so callous that they could have been expected to cost her her job. All she would have had to do in response to Miller's complaints was alert the prison's medical staff to them; the staff would have responded with alacrity to a directive by the warden to determine whether Miller should be given (or indeed already had, as indeed he did have after January 2008) a lower-bunk restriction. It would have taken her no time, no effort, and no detailed knowledge of Miller's condition to respond intelligently to his repeated and plausible complaints (plausible given his brain tumor and his falls from the upper bunk). After his first fall, and certainly after his second, it must have been obvious to Marberry and Rogers and any other prison personnel who knew of Miller's condition that he should not be consigned to an upper bunk. . . . Judge Easterbrook's opinion cites Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 677, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009), for its rejection of a theory of 'supervisory liability' that would make supervisors liable for 'knowledge and acquiescence in their subordinates' use of discriminatory criteria to make classification decisions among detainees.' The Court in Iqbal thus rejected the proposition that a supervisor's mere knowledge of a subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution. '[P]etitioners may not be held accountable for the misdeeds of their agents.... Absent vicarious liability, each Government official, his or her title notwithstanding, is only liable for his or her own misconduct. In the context of determining whether there is a violation of a clearly established right to overcome qualified immunity, purpose rather than knowledge is required to impose ... liability on the subordinate for unconstitutional discrimination; the same holds true for an official charged with violations arising from his or her superintendent responsibilities.'. . I have no quarrel with that. But knowledge and duty can be entwined. 'A prison official's knowledge of prison conditions learned from an inmate's communications can, under some circumstances, constitute sufficient knowledge of the conditions to require the officer to exercise his or her authority and to take the needed action to investigate and, if necessary, to rectify the offending condition.' Vance v. Peters, 97 F.3d 987, 993 (7th Cir. 1996). Both Rogers and Marberry were responsible for the safety of prison inmates and were on notice that Miller's safety was jeopardized as a consequence of confining him to an upper bunk. They were complicit in his suffering and may have hastened his death. A dog would have deserved better treatment. We should reverse.")

Haywood v. Hathaway, 842 F.3d 1026, 1031-33 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Haywood brought forth evidence in opposition to Warden Hathaway's motion for summary judgment that Warden

Hathaway knew both of the extreme cold in the segregation unit and the causes of that cold. . . .The warden's 'plainly inappropriate' responses to Hathaway's grievance, to the extreme weather, and to the situation in the segregation unit allow the inference that he was deliberately indifferent to the extreme cold suffered by Haywood and the other prisoners. . . Our dissenting colleague reads Iqbal and Vance v. Rumsfeld, 701 F.3d 193 (7th Cir. 2012) (en banc), to support a contrary result. We do not believe, however, that Iqbal or Vance alters the standards set forth in Farmer v. Brennan. Indeed, Iqbal recognizes that '[t]he factors necessary to establish a Bivens violation will vary with the constitutional provision at issue.'. . In Iqbal, the Bivens claim alleged was 'invidious discrimination' on the basis of race, religion, and national origin 'in contravention of the First and Fifth Amendments.'. . In such situations, the Court explained, 'our decisions make clear that the plaintiff must plead and prove that the defendant acted with discriminatory purpose,'. . . and 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose' is not sufficient[.] . . . Iqbal simply did not speak to standards of liability for Eighth Amendment violations, for Iqbal had not made a claim under that provision, and the Court certainly gave no indication of discontent with the settled law set forth in Farmer. Moreover, even if it had signaled an intent to depart from Farmer, the Supreme Court has admonished us not to anticipate its future steps. . . . [T]he standard articulated in Vance is satisfied here. The evidence showed that Warden Hathaway had actual knowledge of the unusually harsh weather conditions, that he had been apprised of the specific problem with the physical condition of Haywood's cell (i.e., the windows would not shut), and that, during the time period of Haywood's complaint, the warden toured the segregation unit himself. These facts establish that Warden Hathaway's response was not simply 'plainly inappropriate,' but that Haywood's complaints 'literally [were] ignored' by the individual in the position to remedy them. . . In short, there simply is no evidence that, in Iqbal, the Supreme Court overruled or limited Farmer. . . Vance, as well, has no direct application to this case. Vance concerned the possibility of holding the cabinet secretary of a federal department responsible for the implementation of policy at the individual level—a far cry from holding the administrator of a single facility liable for known deficiencies that directly threatened the welfare of prisoners for whom he was responsible. . . Vance did not alter—nor could it alter—the standards set forth in the Court's Eighth Amendment caselaw. Indeed, since Vance, we have continued to apply Farmer to allegations of unconstitutional conditions of confinement. . . Consistent with our approach in Townsend, other courts of appeals have determined that, post-Iqbal, Farmer's deliberate indifference standard continues to govern claims of unconstitutional conditions of confinement brought against supervisory prison officials. [collecting cases]").

Haywood v. Hathaway, 842 F.3d 1026, 1033-35 (7th Cir. 2016) (Easterbrook, J., dissenting in part) ("I agree with the court's disposition of Haywood's First Amendment claim but not with its conclusion that Warden Hathaway can be personally liable for cold temperatures in his cell. Haywood seeks to hold the warden directly (rather than derivatively) liable on the theory that he filed two grievances alerting the warden to the cold. But Iqbal concludes that knowledge is not enough. . . .Prisoners need to sue the persons responsible for the conditions of which they complain. A warden is an easy target—his name is known, and it is easy to achieve service of process. But decisions such as Iqbal and Vance mean that liability rests with the people who injure prisoners; the top of a bureaucratic hierarchy is the wrong person to sue, unless the claim concerns the prison's formal policies or other decisions that the warden took personally. I do not read Iqbal or Vance as incompatible with Farmer, which did not address the question whether supervisors can be liable for failing to cure problems created or ignored by their subordinates. By contrast, Iqbal and Vance do address that situation. . . .My colleagues are among many federal judges who prefer an approach under which notice to a supervisor is enough to create personal liability. The Supreme Court encountered such an approach in Iqbal and disapproved it. When a panel of this court adopted that approach in Vance, the court took the case en banc and disapproved it. As my colleagues observe, decisions in other circuits have continued to impose supervisory liability when notice does not lead to a remedy. They cite Barkes v. First Correctional Medical, Inc., 766 F.3d 307, 320 (3d Cir. 2014), and Colwell v. Bannister, 763 F.3d 1060 (9th Cir. 2014), and might have added a citation to Turkmen v. Hasty, 789 F.3d 218, rehearing en banc denied, 808 F.3d 197 (2d Cir. 2015). Barkes has been reversed on immunity grounds, —— U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 2042, 192 L.Ed.2d 78 (2015), and the Justices did not tell us their view of the merits; Colwell concerned supervisors' policies and not just failure to control subordinates, so its bearing on our dispute is doubtful; but Turkmen deals with both policy-creation and subordinate-control in one package. The grants of certiorari in Turkmen set the stage for a new look at the question whether and when supervisors (including Hasty, a prison's warden) can be liable for failing to prevent or rectify misconduct by guards and other subordinates. See Ziglar v. Turkmen, —— U.S. ——, 137 S.Ct. 292, ——L.Ed.2d —— (2016) (consolidated with Ashcroft v. Turkmen, —— U.S. ——, 137 S.Ct. 293, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2016), and Hasty v. Turkmen, —— U.S. ——, 137 S.Ct. 293, —— L.Ed.2d —— (2016)). The sort of dispute represented by Haywood's Eighth Amendment claim is now in the hands of the Supreme Court. Turkmen may be decided on other grounds (the lead argument is that the Second Circuit erred in implying a Bivens remedy against supervisors, while § 1983 supplies an express remedy in our case), but even so Turkmen may reflect on the circumstances under which heads of organizations who are alerted to problems but don't fix them can be liable for that failure. They ducked in Barkes, a summary reversal, but may conclude that resolution is due in Turkmen, which will be briefed and argued.")

Daniel v. Cook County, 833 F.3d 728, 737-38 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Sheriff Dart also argues that he cannot be liable in his personal capacity. He points out that there is no vicarious liability for supervisory officials under § 1983. This is correct but incomplete. The sheriff can be directly liable for Daniel's injury. If a senior jail or prison official, including a person with final policymaking power, is 'aware of a systemic lapse in enforcement of a policy critical to ensuring inmate safety, his failure to enforce the policy could violate the Eighth Amendment.'. . Similarly, if a supervisor designed or is aware of the institution's 'deliberately indifferent policy that caused a constitutional injury, then individual liability might flow from that act.' Armstrong v. Squadrito, 152 F.3d 564, 581 (7th Cir. 1998). The Department of Justice Report, along with the later Agreed Order incorporating the investigation's findings and the 2010 Monitor Report detailing the Jail's progress, provides substantial evidence that Sheriff Dart had notice of the systemic deficiencies in the Jail's health care. The totality of Daniel's evidence would allow a jury to find that these problems persisted when Daniel received inadequate care and that the sheriff did not respond reasonably to them. Daniel may proceed with his claim against Sheriff Dart in his personal capacity.")

Perez v. Fenoglio, 792 F.3d 768, 781-82 (7th Cir. 2015) ("As pertains to this case, in order to establish a constitutional violation based upon conditions of confinement, a plaintiff must allege that each prison official named as a defendant has been deliberately indifferent to that plaintiff's objectively serious medical condition, . . . with deliberate indifference occurring where an official realizes that a substantial risk of serious harm to a prisoner exists, but disregards it . . . . Applying Farmer, we have stated that deliberate indifference may be found where an official knows about unconstitutional conduct and facilitates, approves, condones, or 'turn[s] a blind eye' to it. . . An inmate's correspondence to a prison administrator may thus establish a basis for personal liability under § 1983 where that correspondence provides sufficient knowledge of a constitutional deprivation. . . Indeed, once an official is alerted to an excessive risk to inmate safety or health through a prisoner's correspondence, 'refusal or declination to exercise the authority of his or her office may reflect deliberate disregard.'. . In other words, prisoner requests for relief that fall on 'deaf ears' may evidence deliberate indifference. . . In this regard, Gentry v. Duckworth is instructive. There, an inmate claimed that his right of access to the courts was violated because he was denied scribe materials (e.g., paper, some means of writing, and access to notary services) by prison guards. . . He sent many letters to the superintendent concerning his claims, which went unanswered. . . Although the superintendent may not have been directly responsible for the constitutional deprivation, we concluded that the superintendent knew of the denial of scribe materials because of the prisoner's 'many letters' to him, and that the superintendent had systematically ignored these requests for redress. We thus allowed the inmate's § 1983 action to survive summary judgment. . . We find that Perez's complaint alleges facts sufficient to form a basis for personal liability against the grievance officials for violations of the Eighth Amendment. The complaint alleges that the named defendants each obtained actual knowledge of Perez's objectively serious medical condition and inadequate medical care through Perez's coherent and highly detailed grievances and other correspondences. It also alleges that each of these officials failed to exercise his or her authority to intervene on Perez's behalf to rectify the situation, suggesting they either approved of or turned a blind eye to his allegedly unconstitutional treatment. . . Perez's claims against the grievance officials thus should have been allowed to proceed. Again, we emphasize that the district court screened Perez's complaint before discovery, before submission of any evidence, and before the defendants were even served process. At this early stage of the litigation, we ask only whether Perez's complaint, liberally construed . . . and drawing all reasonable inferences in his favor . . . contains facts sufficient to state a plausible Eighth Amendment claim against the grievance defendants. We believe that it has. Of course, discovery will shed light on whether, as the State contends, the grievance defendants took 'the needed action to investigate' Perez's grievances . . . and 'reasonably rel[ied] on the judgment of medical professionals.'. . However, these are questions of fact that simply cannot be resolved in the absence of a record. Therefore, we reverse the dismissal of Perez's complaint with respect to all of the defendants.")

Locke v. Haessig, 788 F.3d 662, 669-73 (7th Cir. 2015) ("For discrimination claims like those at issue in Iqbal and here, where the state of mind of purposeful discrimination is an element of the violation, a supervisor is liable only if she had the specific intent to discriminate. . . For these claims, the plaintiff must show 'more than "intent as volition or intent as awareness of consequences."'. . . The supervisor is liable for undertaking a course of action only because of, not merely in spite of, the action's adverse effects upon an identifiable group. . . Although Iqbal involved a claim of invidious discrimination, the Court's discussion shaped the law of supervisory liability for constitutional violations more generally. Before Iqbal, most circuits required that a supervisor act (or fail to act) with the state of mind of deliberate indifference to be liable, no matter the underlying constitutional violation. . . .After Iqbal, we re-examined the state of mind required for supervisory liability for sexual harassment in T.E. v. Grindle, 599 F.3d 583 (7th Cir.2010). . . . Haessig argues that Iqbal and Grindle together mean that there is a constitutional difference between action and inaction—that purposeful discrimination may be inferred from the former but not the latter. She contends the district court erred as a matter of law in holding that a jury could find Haessig liable for an equal protection violation for purposefully ignoring Locke's complaint of harassment. . .We have doubts about this argument. For one, there is little support in these cases for a distinction between action and inaction. Haessig points us to the Supreme Court's statement that purposeful discrimination 'involves a decisionmaker's undertaking a course of action because of ... the action's adverse effects upon an identifiable group.'. . Haessig seizes on one phrase, 'course of action,' as implying that a supervisor who takes no action cannot, as a matter of law, intend discrimination. We reject such an expansive reading of Iqbal. Haessig's argument conflicts with the principle that a supervisor could be liable for ignoring complaints from one identifiable group while acting on similar complaints from those of another group. . . . Short perhaps only of a confession of intentional discrimination, selective inaction can be strong evidence of discriminatory intent. In any event, Locke has provided evidence that tends to show that Haessig's response was more than mere inaction. A reasonable jury could infer that Haessig had the requisite intent to discriminate because she threatened to retaliate against Locke after he complained of sexual harassment. . . . Locke may submit his evidence to a jury and can prevail if he can convince the jury that Haessig treated Locke's complaint differently because he was a man complaining of sexual harassment. Locke does not need to prove that Haessig was motivated solely by his sex in the way that she responded to his complaint, but he must show that she chose her course of action at least in part because of his sex.")

Courtney v. Devore, 595 F. App'x 618, 620 (7th Cir. 2014) ("Here Courtney has alleged that jail officials assigned female guards to monitor his bathroom activity in order to humiliate him. First, he contends that jail administrators granted the transfer requests of other detainees, but kept him assigned to a unit with cross-sex monitoring, despite his transfer requests, to shame him because he was a sex offender. Second, he adds that, when administrators later transferred him to another unit that also used cross-sex bathroom monitors, they did so to retaliate against him for complaining about the humiliation. The facts may later refute these allegations or show that the jail officials acted for institutionally legitimate reasons, but at this stage Courtney's allegations suffice to state an Eighth Amendment claim. We pause to comment on the proper defendants.

Courtney's claim is valid only against the administrators who personally assigned him to these units. . . Courtney has sued the 'Marion County Jail,' which we take to be an inartful attempt to name pseudonymously these administrators. Because Courtney is pro se, on remand the district court may and should assist him in identifying and naming the administrators who assigned him to his jail units. . . Courtney has also named the sheriff, but he has not alleged that the sheriff had any personal role in the assignment. Instead he has alleged only that, after he wrote to the sheriff to complain, the sheriff did not rectify the problem. But chief administrators are ordinarily not personally liable for decisions made by subordinates, even if they receive a letter complaining about those decisions and do not intervene. . . There can be an exception if the superior, by not acting, creates or increases some peril, . . . but Courtney alleges the opposite: the cross-sex monitoring never changed. So the sheriff is personally dismissed.")

Keller v. Elyea, 496 F. App'x 665, 2012 WL 5869308, *1, *2 (7th Cir. Nov. 19, 2012) ("The district court indeed viewed this issue through too narrow a lens: there need not be a case 'on all fours,' with identical facts, in order for a constitutional right to be clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity. . . Federal courts have long held that deliberate indifference to prisoners' serious medical conditions violates their Eighth Amendment right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. . . Of particular relevance here, we have ruled that a supervisor may be liable when he turns a blind eye to an inmate's letters requesting medical treatment. . . Thus we cannot agree with the district court's conclusion that there was no clearly established law that would have put Dr. Elyea on notice that his alleged conduct violated Keller's constitutional rights. But we need not reach the question of qualified immunity because there is a more direct basis for affirmance—Keller has not shown that Dr. Elyea caused or participated in any constitutional violation. . . As the district court recognized, Dr. Elyea, the head of the prison system's medical hierarchy, cannot be vicariously liable for the acts of his staff. . . But the principal case relied upon by the court to deny summary judgment on this issue, Reed v. McBride, differs from this case in an important way. In Reed, we found disputed issues of supervisory liability when supervisors acknowledged receiving the plaintiff's complaint letters and were therefore aware of the continuing harm he was suffering. . . Here, by contrast, Keller has not produced evidence that Dr. Elyea was aware of Keller's conditions or that the alleged violations by the treating medical staff were caused by any policy Dr. Elyea put in place.")

Vance v. Rumsfeld, 701 F.3d 193, 198, 199, 203-05 (7th Cir. 2012) (en banc) ("Whatever presumption in favor of a Bivens-like remedy may once have existed has long since been abrogated. The Supreme Court has never created or even favorably mentioned the possibility of a non-statutory right of action for damages against military personnel, and it has twice held that it would be inappropriate to create such a claim for damages. See Chappell v. Wallace, 462 U.S. 296 (1983); United States v. Stanley, 483 U.S. 669 (1987). The Court has never created or even favorably mentioned a nonstatutory right of action for damages on account of conduct that occurred outside the borders of the United States. Yet plaintiffs propose a novel damages remedy against military personnel who acted in a foreign nation—and in a combat zone, no less. . . Even if we were to create a common-law damages remedy against military personnel and their civilian superiors, former Secretary Rumsfeld could not be held liable. He did not arrest plaintiffs, hold them incommunicado, refuse to speak with the FBI, subject them to loud noises, threaten them while they wore hoods, and so on. The most one could say about him—the most plaintiffs do say about him—is that (a) in 2002 and 2003 he authorized the use of harsh interrogation techniques when dealing with enemy combatants, (b) he received reports that his subordinates sometimes used these techniques, without authorization, on persons such as plaintiffs despite the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, and (c) he did not do enough to bring interrogators under control. The Supreme Court held in Iqbal that liability under a Bivens-like remedy is personal. . . Cabinet secretaries (in Iqbal the Attorney General) and other supervisory personnel are accountable for what they do, but they are not vicariously liable for what their subordinates do. The Court added that knowledge of a subordinate's misconduct is not enough for liability. The supervisor can be liable only if he wants the unconstitutional or illegal conduct to occur. . . Yet plaintiffs do not allege that Secretary Rumsfeld wanted them to be mistreated in Iraq. His orders concerning interrogation techniques concerned combatants and terrorists, not civilian contractors. What happened to plaintiffs violated both Rumsfeld's directives of 2002 and 2003, and the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005. In an ideal world, the Secretary of Defense and the Army's Chief of Staff would have achieved full compliance with the Detainee Treatment Act, but a public official's inability to ensure that all subordinate federal employees follow the law has never justified personal liability. . . .Both Iqbal and al-Kidd say that supervisors are not vicariously liable for their subordinates' transgressions. . . .Plaintiffs' theme is that Secretary Rumsfeld, having authorized harsh interrogation tactics for enemy combatants in 2002 and 2003, should have intervened after receiving reports that non-combatants were being subjected to these tactics and that interrogators had not properly implemented the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005. Yet the standard form of intervention would have been criminal prosecution (in the civilian courts or by court-martial). The Department of Defense did prosecute some soldiers through courts-martial, and the Department of Justice filed some criminal prosecutions. Plaintiffs think that they should have done more, but no one can demand that someone else be prosecuted. . . A court cannot say that, if there are too few prosecutions (or other enforcement), and thus too much crime, then the Attorney General or the Secretary of Defense is personally liable to victims of (preventable) crime. Yet that's what plaintiffs' approach entails. Iqbal held that knowledge of subordinates' misconduct is not enough for liability. The supervisor must want the forbidden outcome to occur. Deliberate indifference to a known risk is a form of intent. But Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825 (1994), holds that, to show scienter by the deliberate-indifference route, a plaintiff must demonstrate that the public official knew of risks with sufficient specificity to allow an inference that inaction is designed to produce or allow harm. A warden's knowledge that violence occurs frequently in prison does not make the warden personally liable for all injuries. See McGill v. Duckworth, 944 F.2d 344 (7th Cir.1991). Prisons are dangerous places, and misconduct by both prisoners and guards is common. Liability for wardens would be purely vicarious. Farmer rejected a contention that wardens (or guards) can be liable just because they know that violence occurs in prisons and don't do more to prevent it on an institution-wide basis. To get anywhere, Vance and Ertel would need to allege that Rumsfeld knew of a substantial risk to security contractors' employees, and ignored that risk because he wanted plaintiffs (or similarly situated persons) to be harmed. The complaint does not contain such an allegation and could not plausibly do so. . . .Although Vance and Ertel contend that their injuries can be traced (remotely) to Secretary Rumsfeld's policies of 2002 and 2003, as well as to the misconduct of personnel in Iraq, they do not contend that the policies authorized harsh interrogation of security detainees, as opposed to enemy combatants. It is therefore unnecessary to decide when, if ever, a Cabinet officer could be personally liable for damages caused by the proper application of an unlawful policy or regulation. As we observed in Hammer v. Ashcroft, 570 F.3d 798, 800 (7th Cir.2009) (en banc), the normal means to handle defective policies and regulations is a suit under the Administrative Procedure Act or an equivalent statute, not an award of damages against the policy's author. Accord, Arar, 585 F.3d at 572–73. No court has ever held the Administrator of the EPA personally liable for promulgating an invalid regulation, even if that regulation imposes billions of dollars in unjustified costs before being set aside. Cf. Padilla v. Yoo, 678 F.3d 748 (9th Cir.2012) (Deputy Assistant Attorney General not personally liable for preparing an opinion concluding that Secretary Rumsfeld's policies were valid). The extent to which untenable directives, policies, and regulations may support awards of damages can safely be postponed to another day. Because we have held that a common-law right of action for damages should not be created—and that plaintiffs' complaint would fail to state a claim against former Secretary Rumsfeld even if such a right of action were to be created—it is unnecessary to decide whether Rumsfeld violated plaintiffs' clearly established rights. The decisions of the district court are reversed.")

Vance v. Rumsfeld, 701 F.3d 193, 210 (7th Cir. 2012) (en banc) (Wood, J., concurring in the judgment) ("I conclude, along with the majority, that the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), governs our decision here. In Iqbal, the Court concluded that the Attorney General's knowledge of and participation in the mistreatment of the plaintiff was remote enough that he could not be held vicariously liable for the actions of his subordinates. The same must be said of Secretary Rumsfeld. This is not because his leadership of the Department of Defense had nothing to do with the plaintiffs' injuries. His approval of the so-called harsh techniques may have egged subordinates on to more extreme measures—measures that surely violated the standards of the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, as well as broader norms such as those in the CAT. But the link between their mistreatment and the Secretary's policies authorizing extreme tactics for enemy combatants is too attenuated to support this case.")

Vance v. Rumsfeld, 701 F.3d 193, 223-25 (7th Cir. 2012) (en banc) (Hamilton, J., joined by Rovner, J. and Williams, J., dissenting) ("I agree with the majority's general statements of the law of personal responsibility under Bivens and 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Responsibility is personal, not vicarious. Where we differ is in the application of those general principles to plaintiffs' second amended complaint. . . .The plaintiffs may or may not be able to prove their allegations—it now is unlikely they will ever have the chance to try—but they allege that the use of harsh interrogation techniques amounting to torture was the subject of Mr. Rumsfeld's personal attention. . . They allege that he issued policies or orders contrary to governing U.S. law but authorizing the torture they suffered. . . That should be enough to withstand a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). In Ashcroft v. Iqbal itself, the Attorney General and the Director of the FBI conceded that they would have been subject to personal liability for actions of their subordinates if they 'had actual knowledge of the assertedly discriminatory nature of the classification of suspects being of "high interest" and that they were deliberately indifferent to that discrimination.'. .We and other circuits have taken that approach as well. [collecting cases] Iqbal's different approach to pleading an individual's discriminatory intent does not address the issue of personal responsibility for an unconstitutional practice or policy asserted here. . . The case is before us on an interlocutory appeal from the denial of a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). The allegations against Mr. Rumsfeld satisfy the plausibility standard of Iqbal, Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), and Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89 (2007). And even if they did not, the plaintiffs should be allowed to amend their pleadings, especially in view of the uncertainty of federal pleading standards after Iqbal and the fact that the district court and panel found their present pleadings sufficient to state plausible claims. . . . The majority's grant of absolute civil immunity to the U.S. military for violations of civilian citizens' constitutional rights departs from that long heritage. We leave citizens legally defenseless to serious abuse or worse by their own government. I recognize that wrongdoers in the military are still subject to criminal prosecution within the military itself. Relying solely on the military to police its own treatment of civilians fails to use the government's checks and balances that preserve Americans' liberty. The legal foundations for the claims before us are strong and in keeping with the Supreme Court's decisions and the best traditions of American liberty and governance. We should affirm the district court's decision to allow plaintiffs to try to prove their claims for torture.")

Vance v. Rumsfeld, 701 F.3d 193, 226 (7th Cir. 2012) (en banc) (Rovner, J., with Hamilton, J., and Williams, J., dissenting) ("Vance and Ertel have alleged Secretary Rumsfeld's direct participation in their torture. Vance contends, for example, that Secretary Rumsfeld authorized the interrogation tactics utilized on the plaintiffs and that some of these techniques required Secretary Rumsfeld's personal approval on a case-by-case basis thus inferring that Secretary Rumsfeld must have authorized the torturous interrogation himself. . . These claims may not be true, and if they are, the plaintiffs may have little chance of providing sufficient evidence to convince a trier-of-fact, but they are nevertheless plausible and contain more than bare legal conclusions. Twombly and Iqbal require no more. I fear future appeals of dismissals will be muddied by the court's attempt to refract the Rule 12(b)(6) standard to protect a high level governmental official engaged in a war to protect the citizens and ideals of this country. But even in the most difficult of cases, we must adhere to the federal pleading requirements dictated by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) and the precedent of the United States Supreme Court.")

Vance v. Rumsfeld, 701 F.3d 193, 231 (7th Cir. 2012) (en banc) (Williams, J., joined by Hamilton, J., and Rovner, J., dissenting) ("Whether the plaintiffs have adequately pled Rumsfeld's personal liability for violations of clearly established law is also a delicate question. Arguably qualified immunity should shoulder more of the burden of the majority's demonstrable hesitation to hold high government officials accountable for constitutional violations. Cf. Padilla v. Yoo, 678 F.3d 748, 768 (9th Cir.2012) (disposing of suit on qualified immunity grounds rather than affording total immunity to Bivens). Nevertheless, I agree with my dissenting colleagues that the plaintiffs' complaint should survive. This complaint is unusually detailed and alleges Rumsfeld's personal participation in interrogation determinations, something the majority ignores. It is plausible (if not necessarily probable) to infer from Rumsfeld's direct involvement in developing interrogation practices at Camp Cropper and his case-specific approval of techniques used on detainees that he personally authorized the plaintiffs' abuse or remained intentionally indifferent to it. These allegations go well beyond those deemed insufficient in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), and present more than a mere possibility of liability. Therefore, I would permit the suit to continue to at least limited discovery.")

Paine v. Cason, 678 F.3d 500, 512 (7th Cir. 2012) as amended on denial of rehearing and rehearing en banc (May 17, 2012) ("Earnest can be liable only for what he did; there is no doctrine of supervisory liability for the errors of subordinates such as Berglind. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 676–77 (2009).")

Vinning-El v. Evans, 657 F.3d 591, 592 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Warden Evans is entitled to prevail on the § 1983 claim without any need to consider immunity. Section 1983 does not authorize 'supervisory liability.' See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1947-49 (2009). Section 1983 creates liability only for a defendant's personal acts or decisions. Vinning-El does not contend that Evans made or ratified the decision about his diet. The district court therefore should have granted Evans's motion for summary judgment.")

Arnett v. Webster, 658 F.3d 742, 757 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Although Iqbal was a discrimination case involving discriminatory purpose, the Court's reasoning in that case has raised questions about whether a stricter standard of personal liability for supervisors applies in deliberate indifference suits. We recently indicated that 'mere "knowledge and acquiescence" is not sufficient to impose' such liability, but that 'Iqbal did not disturb the ... principles holding that a supervisor may be liable as an individual for wrongs he personally directed or authorized his subordinates to inflict,' Vance, 2011 WL 3437511, at *6 & n.5; see also Starr v. Baca, No. 09-55233, 2011 WL 2988827, at *4 (9th Cir. July 25, 2011) ("We see nothing in Iqbal indicating that the Supreme Court intended to overturn longstanding case law on deliberate indifference claims against supervisors in conditions of confinement cases."). The landscape of such claims after Iqbal remains murky, but we need not clear the waters here because the record doesn't show that Dr. Webster was personally involved in the alleged constitutional violations under the standard set forth in Gentry.")

T.E. v. Grindle, 599 F.3d 583, 588-91 (7th Cir. 2010) ("The parties focused their briefing on whether a theory of supervisory liability for equal protection claims was clearly established at the time of Grindle's conduct. However, as the Supreme Court has made clear in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009), an equal protection claim against a supervisor requires a showing of intentional discrimination. Because there is no theory of respondeat superior for constitutional torts, a plaintiff 'must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.' Id. at 1948. In the equal protection context, this means showing that the supervisor, like the subordinate, intended to discriminate on the basis of a protected class. . . While it appears that our precedent would have previously allowed a plaintiff to recover from a supervisor based on that supervisor's 'deliberate indifference' toward a subordinate's purposeful discrimination, see Nanda, 412 F.3d at 842, after Iqbal a plaintiff must also show that the supervisor possessed the requisite discriminatory intent. Nonetheless, even in light of Iqbal, plaintiffs have offered evidence sufficient to defeat summary judgment on Grindle's qualified immunity defense. Plaintiffs need not prove discriminatory intent in the same manner it was established in Nabozny, where male and female victims were treated differently. Plaintiffs have offered evidence that would let a jury easily conclude that Sperlik, acting under color of state law, denied the girls equal protection by molesting and abusing them. Plaintiffs have also offered evidence that would allow a jury to conclude that Grindle knew about Sperlik's abuse of the girls and deliberately helped cover it up by misleading the girls' parents, the superintendent, and other administrators. From this evidence, a jury could reasonably infer − though it would not be required to infer-that Grindle also had a purpose of discriminating against the girls based on their gender. Cf. Bohen v. City of East Chicago, Ind., 799 F.2d 1180, 1190-91 (7th Cir.1986) (Posner, J., concurring) (suggesting that policy of deliberately refusing to respond to complaints of sexual harassment would support an inference of intentional discrimination). If Grindle wishes to argue that she merely wanted to avoid a scandal or that she would have taken similar steps to conceal abuse if boys had been the victims, she can present those arguments to the jury, but such suggestions do not mean that she is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. . . .[W]e must address the impact of Iqbal on plaintiffs' due process claim. It is important to note that, as in Stoneking, plaintiffs are not relying on a theory that 'mere failure of supervisory officials to act' violates the Due Process Clause. . . Rather, plaintiffs allege that Grindle is liable for actively concealing reports of abuse and creating an atmosphere that allowed abuse to flourish. In other words, they argue that Grindle's own actions deprived them of their constitutional right to bodily integrity. Because plaintiffs seek to do no more than hold Grindle liable 'for ... her own misconduct,' their substantive due process theory is not foreclosed by Iqbal. . . When a state actor's deliberate indifference deprives someone of his or her protected liberty interest in bodily integrity, that actor violates the Constitution, regardless of whether the actor is a supervisor or subordinate, and the actor may be held liable for the resulting harm.").

Turner v. Cook County Sheriff's Office, No. 19 CV 5441, 2020 WL 1166186, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 11, 2020) ("Plaintiff's individual claim against Sheriff Dart is not based on any direct involvement in Ms. Scott's overdose, but rather on Sheriff Dart's ineffective—or nonexistent—drug detection and treatment policies that allow inmates easy access to drugs and increase the risk/frequency of drug overdoses. . . Plaintiff's individual capacity claim against Sheriff Dart is rooted in his alleged failure to implement policies that provide constitutionally adequate healthcare to detainees suffering from drug addiction and overdose. . . Because of his position, Sheriff Dart had final authority over Jail policies. . . Therefore, Plaintiff's allegations, if true, sufficiently allege that Sheriff Dart was personally involved in the decision-making that amounted to a violation of Ms. Scott's constitutional right to be free from deliberate indifference to her serious medical needs. The Amended Complaint, read in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff, alleges systemic constitutional violations by way of Sheriff Dart's Jail policies and practices. Therefore, the Court denies Sheriff Dart's Motion to Dismiss the individual capacity claim.")

Powell v. City of Chicago, No. 17-CV-5156, 2018 WL 1211576, at *9 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 8, 2018) ("Plaintiff alleges that Cline and Kirby knew of the Officer Defendants' grave misconduct and knew that the misconduct would likely continue, yet deliberately did nothing (in their capacity as supervisors) to correct the problem. . . Plaintiff neither claims a 'constitutional right to an internal investigation,'. . . nor states a theory of vicarious liability. Rather, Plaintiff says that Cline and Kirby deliberately disregarded his constitutional rights by failing to stop the Officer Defendants from continuing their illegal scheme of, among other things, fabricating evidence against residents of the Ida B. Wells Homes. . . At this early stage, those allegations suffice to state a claim against Cline and Kirby. . . While such claims may or may not survive summary judgment, this Court denies Defendants' motion to dismiss claims against Cline and Kirby.")

Karim v. Obaisi, No. 14 C 1318, 2017 WL 4074017, at *7 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 14, 2017) ("Warden Lemke argues that he cannot be liable for deliberate indifference because he was not personally involved in any decision that led to a deprivation of Karim's constitutional rights. Although it is true that 'the Warden of each prison...is entitled to relegate to the prison's medical staff the provision of good medical care,' Burks v. Raemisch, 555 F.3d 592, 595 (7th Cir. 2009), if a prison official, like Lemke, has a reason to believe, or actual knowledge that the prison's medical staff are mistreating or failing to treat a prisoner, the prison official may be liable for deliberate indifference. . . When viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Karim, . . . even when putting aside Karim's grievances and communications, Lemke had actual knowledge of Karim's abscess and appointment on August 8 and refused to allow Karim to attend his appointment. Thus, he was personally involved in deciding that Karim would not get the treatment that medical professionals determined he needed on that day. Lemke argues that because of the lockdown he could not get Karim the needed treatment, yet his own testimony makes clear that prisoners with serious medical issues could be seen by doctors and dentists during a lockdown. . . . Thus, Lemke's decision to not grant Karim leave to get treatment during a lockdown may constitute deliberate indifference because according to Karim, Lemke saw the abscess on August 8th, understood it to be a serious condition, yet refused to allow Karim to attend the appointment to receive treatment. This is especially so because according to Karim, at the time he saw Lemke on August 8, the abscess was so grotesque that even a layperson like Lemke would have understood that Karim required urgent dental care.")

Miller v. Kienlen, No. 14-CV-00031, 2017 WL 951342, at *10 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 10, 2017) ("The complaint . . . states a plausible claim of deliberate indifference against Kienlen. To be liable under § 1983 in her individual capacity, 'the supervisor must "know about the conduct and facilitate it, approve it, condone it, or turn a blind eye for fear of what they might see."'. . Miller alleges that he reported to Kienlen that Jefferson was not changing his wound dressings daily, irrigating his wound, and dispensing prescribed medication as his doctor recommended and that Kienlen knew about the risks Jefferson's conduct posed. . . The complaint does not spell out how Kienlen knew of the risks, but it does not have to; that is what discovery is for. . . In the face of Miller's reports, Kienlen did nothing according to the complaint. . . Viewed in the light most favorable to Miller, these allegations state a plausible claim that Kienlen condoned, approved, or turned a blind eye to Jefferson's alleged conduct.")

Smith v. Burge, 222 F.Supp.3d 669, 687 (N.D. Ill. 2016) ("In essence, Plaintiff asserts that Defendants Martin, Daley, and Hillard as supervisors had knowledge of the systemic torture leading to coerced confessions of innocent individuals, but nevertheless condoned it or turned a blind eye to it. . . The fact that Defendants Daley, Martin, and Hillard were not at Area 2 at the time of Plaintiff's torture and coerced confession does not absolve these Defendants under Plaintiff's theory of liability. See Sanville v. McCaughtry, 266 F.3d 724, 740 (7th Cir. 2001) (supervisor "does not have to have participated directly in the deprivation" to be personally involved).")

Smith v. Burge, 222 F.Supp.3d 669, 697 (N.D. Ill. 2016) ("Plaintiff specifically alleges that while Defendant Daley was Mayor: (1) he did not disclose exculpatory information in his possession from the date he resigned as State's Attorney of Cook County in 1989 until he left the Mayor's office in 2011; (2) he did not intervene at any time to direct the CPD to disclose exculpatory information in its possession regarding Defendant Burge and detectives under his command; and (3) he did not direct the CPD to conduct a thorough and aggressive investigation of Defendants Burge, Byrne, Dignan, and the other detectives who tortured and abused African-American men while working under Defendant Burge's command. . . Plaintiff also alleges that in furtherance of this conspiracy, Defendant Daley: (1) repeatedly discredited OPS findings of the systemic torture under Defendant Burge at Area 2; (2) refused to direct Defendant Martin (as CPD Superintendent) to initiate criminal investigations or disciplinary proceedings against Defendant Burge and CPD Detectives under his command; (3) rejected advise from senior staff that the City should sue Defendant Burge rather than continue to defend him in civil proceedings despite Defendant Daley's knowledge of Defendant Burge's wrongdoing; and (4) made false public statements in July 2006 in response to a Special Prosecutor's Report. . . . These allegations sufficiently allege that Defendant Daley, as Chicago's Mayor, participated in a conspiracy to conceal evidence of police torture. . . . The Court therefore denies this aspect of Defendant Daley's motion to dismiss.") Lemons v. City of Milwaukee, No. 13-C-0331, 2016 WL 3746571, at *20-21 (E.D. Wis. July 8, 2016) ("There is no principle of automatic supervisor liability for constitutional torts. Instead, to be held liable for conduct of a subordinate, a supervisor must have been personally involved in that conduct, meaning that he or she knew about the conduct and 'facilitate[d] it, approve[d] it, condone [d] it, or turn[ed] a blind eye for fear of what [he or she] might see.'. . The supervisors must have acted either knowingly or with deliberate, reckless indifference. . . A supervisor who was merely negligent or grossly negligent in failing to detect and prevent a subordinate's misconduct is not liable, because negligence is not actionable under § 1983. . . Instead, the supervisor must be criminally reckless or at the least in conscious disregard of known or obvious dangers. . . . The City defendants contend that the Supreme Court in Iqbal v. Ashcroft, 556 U.S.

662 (2009), altered the above-described concept of a supervisor's liability to require actual participation in the subordinate's malfeasance. The City defendants argue that all individual-capacity claims against Flynn and Hegerty must be dismissed because neither chief was personally involved with anything that happened in Lemons's home while Lemons was alone with Cates. But the City defendants are wrong. . . .Here, Lemons contends that Hegerty and Flynn are liable for their own actions (or inactions) in creating or maintaining insufficient IAD investigatory procedures and their own failures in supervising or disciplining Cates's conduct, enabling Cates to sexually prey upon women he encountered on the job. No evidence suggests that Hegerty or Flynn was present at Lemons's house during the rape, intended for Cates to rape Lemons, or actually knew Cates would do so, but that is beside the point. As to IAD procedures and officer supervision and discipline, Hegerty and Flynn were personally involved. There is no dispute that the chiefs were responsible for IAD investigating procedures, received reports regarding pending investigations, and were the ultimate decisionmakers regarding officer discipline. And there is no dispute that Hegerty and Flynn exercised decisionmaking authority regarding Cates individually. Taking the facts in Lemons's favor, Hegerty was apprised of the SW and TC matters, yet gave Cates only a six-day suspension as discipline for the former and nothing for the latter, even in light of information in Cates's file regarding his prior violence toward Officer C. Similarly, Flynn was apprised of the TC and TG matters, yet failed to discipline Cates, even in light of information in Cates's file regarding the Officer C, SW, TC, and TG matters. Taking the facts in Lemons's favor, both chiefs allowed IAD internal investigations to end upon a DA's decision not to charge a crime, failed to consider prior unsustained conduct, failed to implement any system to monitor for patterns of illegal conduct, and caused an attitude in the MPD that sexual misconduct was not going to be treated seriously. . . .A reasonable jury could find that Hegerty and Flynn turned a blind eye to any pattern, exhibiting deliberate indifference to the well-being of future females with whom Cates came into contact in his job and that sexual assault was a foreseeable next offense. . . .In sum, taking the facts in Lemons's favor, Hegerty and Flynn facilitated Cates's conduct and turned a blind eye to it by not disciplining him more severely (or at all) for prior rule infractions, abdicating responsibility for discipline to the DA's office, not providing a means for recognition of patterns of prior conduct even if unsustained, and responding to complaints of sexual misconduct by Cates so inadequately that Cates felt confident that he could rape Lemons with little to no consequence. A reasonable jury could find that Hegerty's and Flynn's personal choices in IAD oversight and in previously not disciplining Cates created the circumstances in which Cates believed that his word would outweigh Lemons's and that the most discipline he would receive was a short suspension—that he would be back on the force with little trouble. Thus, summary judgment will be denied as to this theory of liability.")

Smith v. City of Chicago, 143 F.Supp.3d 741, ___ (N.D. Ill. 2015) ("Defendant McCarthy additionally argues that the Court must dismiss Plaintiffs' constitutional claims brought against him in his individual capacity because Plaintiffs fail to allege that he was personally involved in the alleged constitutional deprivations. To clarify, because the doctrine of respondeat superior (blanket supervisory liability) does not apply to actions filed under § 1983, a plaintiff must allege that an individual defendant, through his own conduct, violated the Constitution. See Perez v.

Fenoglio, 792 F.3d 768, 781 (7th Cir. 2015). A supervisor, such as Defendant McCarthy, can be liable under § 1983 if he knows about the misconduct and either facilitates it, approves it, condones it, or turn a blind eye. . .Although Defendant McCarthy denies personal involvement in the approximately 50 individual incidents alleged in the Amended Complaint, Plaintiffs have presented sufficient factual allegations stating a claim for supervisory liability that is legally sound and plausible on its face, namely, that Superintendent McCarthy was aware of the police officers' unconstitutional stops and facilitated this conduct. Construing the facts and all reasonable inferences in Plaintiffs' favor – as the Court must do at this procedural posture – they allege that Defendant McCarthy had knowledge of the unlawful stops and frisks based on the CPD's history of conducting suspicionless stops and frisks, the 2003 Shani Davis lawsuit and the data collected therein, and other actions taken by the ACLU. . . Plus, Plaintiffs assert that Superintendent McCarthy put pressure on Chicago police officers to increase the number of stops and frisks giving the officers a strong incentive to make such stops because the officers' increased numbers would suggest productivity. . . Similarly, Plaintiffs contend that Superintendent McCarthy facilitated the alleged misconduct because he failed to set forth procedures to properly train police officers as to the legal and factual bases for conducting stops and frisks. . . Under the circumstances, Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged a plausible claim for supervisory liability pursuant to the federal pleading standards. . . The Court thus denies Defendant McCarthy's motion to dismiss the constitutional claims brought against him in his individual capacity.")

Medrano v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., No. 13 C 84, 2015 WL 4475018, at *6 (N.D. Ill. July 21, 2015) ("For written notice to prison administrators to form the basis of a deliberate indifference claim, the plaintiff 'must demonstrate that the communication, in its content and manner of transmission, gave the prison official sufficient notice to alert him or her to an excessive risk to inmate health or safety.' Arnett, 658 F.3d at 755. Medrano cannot make such an allegation here. Rather, Medrano alleges he received regular appointments with doctors, a number of medical tests, and medication prescriptions in an attempt to address his medical conditions. It may be that Medrano has sufficiently alleged that some of this treatment fell below a constitutionally adequate level. That question is not at issue on this motion. But in the absence of allegations that Medrano was 'completely ignored by medical staff,' Arnett, 658 F.3d at 756, Director Godinez and Chairperson Miller were entitled to rely on the medical judgments supporting the treatments Medrano alleges he received. . . . Accordingly, Medrano's claims against Director Godinez and Chairperson Miller are dismissed. . . . It is true that respondeat superior liability is not available for a claim under § 1983. Medrano, however, does not use the mere fact of Dr. Tilden's title to establish his liability. Rather, Medrano alleges that he received inadequate care at Pontiac when he failed to receive the treatment prescribed by the UIC doctors. Medrano argues that Dr. Tilden had knowledge of this inadequate treatment due to his supervisory positions as Medical Director. In this way, Medrano's allegation is quite different from the allegations against Director Godinez and Chairperson Miller, which the Court has already dismissed. Dr. Tilden is not merely responsible for prison administration generally, but is responsible for medical care in particular. This allegation is enough for the Court to infer that Dr. Tilden knew about any inadequate care Medrano received and did nothing to remedy the situation. This is sufficient to state a claim against him based on Medrano's accompanying allegation that he has not received the treatment prescribed by the UIC doctors.")

Laba v. Chicago Transit Auth., No. 14 C 4091, 2015 WL 3511483, at *4 (N.D. Ill. June 2, 2015) ("In Count III, Plaintiffs allege that Bhayani, Loughnane and Claypool enjoyed a supervisory capacity at the CTA and approved, facilitated, condoned and ordered the actions of Guidone and Woods in installing the hidden cameras for the alleged purpose of secretly filming Plaintiffs. The conclusory allegations in Plaintiffs' Complaint, by themselves, would not be sufficient to raise Plaintiffs' supervisory liability claim above the speculative level. However, in conjunction with the well-pleaded allegations, this claim survives. Plaintiffs specify each Defendant's supervisory role and claim that these supervisors allegedly communicated together in person and knew that the installation was a violation of Plaintiffs' rights to privacy, but still decided to allow the filming to occur. We may draw the reasonable inference that, by virtue of their positions as supervisors, they knew about the installation of the cameras and subsequently may have known that it was a violation of Plaintiffs' rights to privacy. This is enough to plead knowledge, or at the very least, establish that it is plausible that these Defendants conducted, facilitated or condoned the conduct at issue. Thus, the Court denies Defendants' motion to dismiss Count III.")

Elsayed v. Vill. of Schaumburg, No. 14 C 8387, 2015 WL 1433071, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 26, 2015) ("Although Elsayed states many of the elements that might give rise to supervisory liability, her allegations are mere legal conclusions, not facts. . . Elsayed's proposed amendments to her complaint do not fix this problem. The added allegations that 'Hudak and O'Brien's superior officers ... were aware of Hudak and O'Brien's regular practice of arresting individuals without probable cause' do not add any factual matter to Elsayed's complaint; they merely reiterate the legal conclusions. . . Stripped of the legal conclusions, there is essentially no factual matter—which would be taken as true in this stage of the litigation—to support a § 1983 claim against Hudak and O'Brien's supervisors. The claim for 'supervisory liability' is dismissed.")

Chatman v. City of Chicago, No. 14 C 2945, 2015 WL 1090965, at *8-9 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 10, 2015) ("[T]he City argues that Plaintiff's claim is deficient because '[s]upervisory officials who are simply negligent in failing to detect and prevent a subordinate's misconduct are not culpable under § 1983 because they are not personally involved.'. . The City's recitation of the law is correct. For supervisors to be personally liable under § 1983, the supervisor must 'know about the conduct and facilitate it, approve it, condone it, or turn a blind eye for fear of what they might see.'. . That is, a supervisor must be personally responsible for the deprivation of a constitutional right. . . But nothing prohibits Plaintiff from bringing a claim against Defendants Walsh, Holy, and Joria for direct liability and, in the alternative, for supervisory liability. . . Here, Plaintiff has alleged that these supervising Defendants were aware of, facilitated, condoned, and oversaw specific unconstitutional activities by their subordinates, including the coercing of a false confession and the withholding of exculpatory evidence. . . Accepting the well-pleaded facts as true and drawing all reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor, the motion to dismiss Count VII is denied as against Defendants Walsh, Holy, and Joria.")

Bentz v. Lindenberg, No. 15-CV-00121-NJR, 2015 WL 1064525, at *5 (S.D. Ill. Mar. 9, 2015) ("[I]t appears that Plaintiff's claim against these supervisory defendants stems from their involvement in the grievance process. According to the exhibits, these defendants signed off on grievance denials and appeals. This type of claim arises under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause, not the Eighth Amendment. It is equally doomed. Prison grievance procedures are not constitutionally mandated and thus do not implicate the Due Process Clause per se. As such, the alleged mishandling of grievances 'by persons who otherwise did not cause or participate in the underlying conduct states no claim.'. . In other words, the fact that a counselor, grievance officer, or even a supervisor received a complaint about the actions of another individual does not create liability. Therefore, Plaintiff's claim against these individual defendants fails under a theory of supervisory liability rooted in the Eighth Amendment or due process violation arising from the Fourteenth Amendment.")

Hughes v. Moore, No. 14-CV-1410-MJR, 2015 WL 800172, at *4 (S.D. Ill. Feb. 25, 2015) ("[I]f a supervisory official is alleged to have directed the conduct or to have given knowing consent to the conduct which caused the constitutional violation, that defendant has sufficient personal involvement to be responsible for the violation, even though that defendant has not participated directly in the violation. . . A defendant in a supervisory capacity may then be liable for "deliberate, reckless indifference" where he or she has purposefully ignored the misconduct of his/her subordinates. . . Plaintiffs allegations fall squarely within this realm – he claims that Defendants Moore, Jennings, Dallas, and/or Freeman, as supervisors, knew about a pattern of assaults such as Plaintiff experienced, yet 'turned a blind eye' or condoned this pattern by their inaction. At the pleading stage, Plaintiff states a claim that survives review under 1915A, and he may proceed with Count 4 against Defendants Moore, Jennings, Dallas, and Freeman.")

Demouchette v. Dart, No. 09 C 6016, 2015 WL 684805, at *6-7 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 17, 2015) ("To prevail against a supervisor for deliberate indifference, an inmate still must establish personal participation. The inmate must show that the supervisor was personally involved in the deprivation of a constitutional right, and directed the conduct causing it or turned a blind eye to it. Chavez v. Illinois State Police, 251 F.3d 612, 651 (7th Cir. 2001); Thomas, 499 F.Supp.2d at 1093. To begin with and as discussed in the background, it is not clear what role, if any, Lieutenant Hernandez had in creating or implementing the CPR policy. Lieutenant Hernandez further was not the one who signed Officer Mason's September 28, 2008 logbooks, so the record cannot show how Lieutenant Hernandez's alleged practice of ratifying inadequate cell checks contributed specifically to Demouchette's death. Even drawing all inferences in favor of Plaintiffs though, summary judgment is nonetheless warranted. The very arguments Plaintiffs raise here were rejected in Thomas, and this Court finds no basis to depart from the Court's analysis there. In Thomas, the Court granted summary judgment to supervisors who lacked knowledge of the inmate's medical condition. . . Instructive for the present case, the fact that the supervisors failed to take steps to remedy 'serious health and security risks' that contributed to the inmate's death, including cross-watching and broken monitors, was insufficient for the inmate to maintain a claim against the supervisors where they lacked awareness of the inmate's medical condition. . . . [T]he record shows that, far from ratifying misconduct, Lieutenant Hernandez met with his staff the day following Demouchette's suicide and instructed them to be more observant and to better watch the detainees. . .The part of Abdollahi that Plaintiffs quote—about encouraging inadequate cell checks by failing to discipline the subordinate officers at fault, 405 F.Supp.2d at 1212—involves official capacity claims against the supervisors and thus is inapplicable here. . . Official capacity claims represent another way of pleading a Monell claim against an entity. Estate of Abdollahi, 405 F.Supp.2d at 1212. The Monell claims here, however, have been bifurcated . . . and the relevant claim against Lieutenant Hernandez is in his individual capacity . . . .Because Lieutenant Hernandez did not violate any constitutional right, this Court does not need to consider whether he is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Fisher v. McCallistor, No. 15-CV-00007-JPG, 2015 WL 574542, at *3 (S.D. Ill. Feb. 9, 2015) ("The complaint states an Eighth Amendment claim against Defendant McCallistor. This defendant supervised the strip search of Plaintiff in the presence of female guards on May 13, 2014 . . . . The allegations against Defendant McCallistor suggest that he not only approved of the conduct, but directed it and that the search may have been performed in a manner that was intended to harass or humiliate the inmates involved. Accordingly, Plaintiff shall be allowed to proceed with Count 1 against this defendant.")

Hilliard v. Illinois Dep't of Corr., No. 15-CV-004-MJR, 2015 WL 468691, at *2-3 (S.D. Ill. Feb. 3, 2015) ("Although the S.O.R.T. Team Commander and the Warden may have held supervisory authority over the two John Doe S.O.R.T. Team Officers, this is not enough to hold them liable for the unconstitutional actions of their subordinates. The doctrine of respondeat superior (supervisory liability) is not applicable to § 1983 actions. . . The facts do not suggest that either the Defendant S.O.R.T. Team Commander or Defendant Luth was 'personally responsible for the deprivation of a constitutional right.'. . Accordingly, the Defendant S.O.R.T. Team Commander shall be dismissed from Count 1 with prejudice. As noted, Defendant Luth had no personal involvement in the excessive force incidents. Further, if he indeed received Plaintiff's letter or grievance over the incident, his role in reviewing such a complaint does not impose liability on him. . . However, Defendant Luth shall remain in the action for two reasons. First, Defendant Luth is an appropriate party to respond to Plaintiff's discovery requests regarding the identities of the two John Doe S.O.R.T. Team Officer Defendants who assaulted him on August 23, 2014. . . Secondly, because Plaintiff is seeking injunctive relief, Defendant Luth shall remain in the action for the purpose of implementing any injunctive relief to which Plaintiff may ultimately be entitled if he should prevail.")

Sanders v. City of Chicago Heights, No. 13 C 0221, 2014 WL 5801181, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 7, 2014) ("In Count VII of the First Amended Complaint, Plaintiff brings a separate supervisory liability claim. Although § 1983 does not authorize a separate, cognizable claim for supervisory liability, § 1983 does create liability for a defendant's personal acts, conduct, or decisions. . . Put differently, for supervisors to be personally liable, the supervisor must 'know about the conduct and facilitate it, approve it, condone it, or turn a blind eye for fear of what they might see.'. . In short, a supervisor must be personally responsible for the deprivation of a constitutional right. . . Here, Plaintiff alleges that federal prosecutors prosecuted Defendant Mangialardi and a number of other Chicago Heights Police Officers for racketeering and witness tampering just prior to the incident underlying this lawsuit. . . Similarly, Plaintiff maintains that the Chicago Heights Police Department's misconduct was so widespread that the Mayor enlisted a retired Supreme Court of Illinois Justice to investigate the department. . . Plaintiff further explains that due to the systemic corruption in Chicago Heights, six police officers and fifteen public officials were convicted and sentenced. . . Accepting the well-pleaded facts as true and drawing all reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor, he has sufficiently alleged that after the Chicago Heights police officers were indicted and convicted– thereby putting supervisors on notice of the misconduct at issue–the misconduct in the Chicago Heights Police Department nevertheless continued. Moreover, the corruption charges for which Defendant Mangliardi and a number of other Chicago Heights Police Officers were prosecuted, including witness tampering, are similar, in part, to the allegations in Plaintiff's First Amended Complaint. Under the circumstances, Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged supervisor liability. The Court therefore grants Defendant Officers' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's supervisory liability claim in Count VII as a stand alone claim with the caveat that Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged supervisory liability as to his constitutional claims.") Shesler v. Sanders, No. 13-CV-394-JDP, 2014 WL 5795486, at *10-11 (W.D. Wis. Nov. 6, 2014) ("I am reluctant to extend Estate of Phillips to a claim against an individual defendant because it stands to reason that a supervisor who intentionally allows her staff to act with gross negligence could in fact be acting with deliberate indifference herself. But that would be a very difficult claim to prove, and the undisputed facts do not support it here. In a recent decision, the Supreme Court rejected the plaintiff's argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.'. . .

In the present case, plaintiff presents evidence showing that, at most, defendant Sanders was not actively involved in ascertaining whether DOC staff were properly reviewing prisoners' sentences. Plaintiff comes nowhere close to showing that Sanders wanted her staff to negligently review sentences. As with the other defendants, Sanders was at most negligent in her oversight of the sentence review process, but this is not sufficient to sustain an Eighth Amendment claim. Therefore I will grant defendants' motion for summary judgment on the supervisory claim against Sanders.")

Smith v. Hartmann, 12-CV-09915, 2014 WL 4912010, *3, *4 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 30, 2014) ("Plaintiff's SAC offers several theories of Mayor Rockingham's liability in his individual capacity . . . At a minimum, the theory relating to his supervision of Officer Bogdala states a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). The allegations are as follows. Prior to Plaintiff's arrest, Mayor Rockingham learned of two or more incidents when Officer Bogdala used excessive force. He learned of Sharon Jackson's complaint accusing Officer Bogdala of punching her in the face and breaking her eye socket. . . He also learned from Assistant Chief of Operations Crystal Phillips that Officer Bogdala had previously used excessive force. . .Because of this record of misconduct, the Chief of Police recommended firing him. When Mayor Rockingham learned of this recommendation, he intervened, 'recommend[ing] and inform[ing] Chief of Police Newsome not to fire' him. . . The Chief of Police refrained from firing Officer Bogdala '[a]s a result of Mayor Rockingham's recommendation.'. . Instead, he gave Officer Bogdala a 'last chance' three-year employment agreement. During the course of this continued employment, Officer Bogdala allegedly violated Plaintiff's constitutional rights. The SAC paints a picture that the FAC does not–one that is sufficient to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). According to the FAC, Mayor Rockingham facilitated a policy of police brutality; then two officers in the police force happened to use excessive force against Plaintiff. As the Court's prior opinion explained, this theory lacked personal involvement and a causal connection. According to the SAC, however, Rockingham knew of the particular officer who injured Plaintiff–Officer Bogdala. He knew that this officer had a record of excessive force, he knew that the Chief of Police recommended firing him because of this record, and he put a stop to the firing process. As a result of the mayor's intervention, Officer Bogdala participated in an arrest allegedly involving a constitutional injury to Plaintiff. This new theory of supervisory liability in the SAC sufficiently alleges that Mayor Rockingham was 'personally responsible for the deprivation of the constitutional right.' . . It alleges that Mayor Rockingham knew about Officer Bogdala's prior misconduct and that he facilitated it, approved it and condoned it by preventing him from being fired. . . Defendants argue that the SAC fails to 'substantiate that Mayor Rockingham condoned similar conduct to that which is alleged in the SAC.'. . The SAC alleges that Officer Bogdala caused Plaintiff a constitutional injury by failing to intervene, not by using excessive force himself. Yet, according to Defendants, the SAC does not provide that Mayor Rockingham had previous knowledge of Officer Bogdala failing to intervene in other incidents. 'Therefore, the Mayor's actions could not have conveyed to Officer Bogdala "that similar actions would be of no consequence in the future."'. .First, drawing all reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor, the Court infers that, as a practical reality, if Mayor Rockingham approved of Officer Bogdala's prior face-smashing incident with Sharon Jackson, his approval would apply equally (if not more so) to a failure to intervene–an omission being arguably less offensive than an overt act. Second, Defendant's argument, which cites no supporting case law, misses a point made clear in Seventh Circuit precedent–that an affirmative act of excessive force and a failure to intervene in another officer's use of excessive force both violate § 1983. . . To hold otherwise would insulate non-intervening officers from liability for 'reasonably foreseeable consequences of the neglect of their duty to enforce the laws and preserve the peace.'. . Defendant's attempt to formalistically limit the scope of Mayor Rockingham's approval to Officer Bogdala's misfeasance, as opposed to nonfeasance, contradicts the thrust of the case law under § 1983. At the pleading stage, Plaintiff has alleged enough factual details to support an inference that, as mayor, Rockingham knew that the law does not distinguish between misfeasance and nonfeasance and that, when he allegedly approved of Officer Bogdala's past § 1983 violations, he effectively condoned future § 1983 violations, regardless of whether those involved misfeasance or nonfeasance.") claim for supervisory liability. . . . To the extent that Defendants are arguing that Plaintiffs may not sue both McDermott and also the City of Chicago under a theory of supervisory liability, that argument is also misplaced. The focus of the supervisory liability is McDermott's own personal knowledge of the events that affected Plaintiffs and whether she was personally responsible for those events. The City's liability, however, is not limited to McDermott's personal knowledge and participation, but rather whether Plaintiffs' deprivation is caused by an express policy, a widespread practice or custom, or the deliberate act of a policymaking official. . . McDermott is not the policymaking official of the City 'so any liability of the City based on the act of a policymaking official would be distinct from [McDermott's] liability.'. . . Having said that, summary judgment as to McDermott's supervisory liability is improper because Plaintiffs have not established whether there was probable cause to arrest Plaintiffs and thus whether there was any constitutional violation for McDermott to facilitate, approve, or condone. . . The conflicting evidence creates a jury question with respect to whether McDermott is liable under a theory of supervisory liability.")

Estate of Heenan v. City of Madison, 13-CV-606-WMC, 2014 WL 3778574, *3-*5 (W.D. Wis. July 30, 2014) ("[P]laintiff argues that defendants mistakenly rely on Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference cases, requiring a subjective notice standard, whereas plaintiff here asserts a Fourth Amendment failure to train or supervise claim where the 'deliberate indifference standard is objective,' requiring only 'obvious or constructive notice.'. . In support of its view of the law, plaintiff cites Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 841, 114 S.Ct. 1970, 128 L.Ed.2d 811 (1994), but misreads that case. In Farmer, the Supreme Court described the test for municipal liability for deliberate indifference as described in Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378, 109 S.Ct. 1197, 103 L.Ed.2d 412 (1989), but rejected applying an 'obviousness' test with respect to the individual liability of prison officials. . . . The distinction being drawn in Farmer is not between a failure to train claim under the Fourth Amendment as compared to the Eighth Amendment—as plaintiff argues—but rather between a claim against a municipality and a claim against an official of the municipality in his or her individual capacity. Plaintiff's failure to recognize this distinction is troubling given that all of the other cases cited in support of applying an 'obviousness' or 'constructive knowledge' test involve claims against a municipality or a government official in his official capacity. . . While the court understands a different standard applies in a Fourth Amendment claim (objective reasonableness) as compared to an Eighth Amendment claim (deliberate indifference), both apply a subjective standard, at least requiring knowledge for a supervisory official to be liable. . . See, e.g., Backes v. Vill. of Peoria Heights, Ill., 662 F.3d 866, 870 (7th Cir.2011) (describing supervisory liability test as requiring knowledge or reckless indifference in case involving an underlying Fourth Amendment excessive force claim). Recently, in a less discussed portion of Ashcroft v. Iqbal . . . the Supreme Court considered a supervisory liability claim premised on intentional discrimination under the First and Fifth Amendments. . . After reiterating the Court's long-standing rejection of supervisory liability premised on a theory of respondeat superior, the Court held that the plaintiff in that case failed to state a claim against government officials, rejecting the plaintiff's argument for 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.'. .

Instead, the Court held that 'each Government official, his or her title notwithstanding, is only liable for his or her own misconduct.'. . As such, 'purpose rather than knowledge' is required to impose so-called 'supervisory liability.'. .Courts initially grappled with the import of the Supreme Court's holding in Iqbal with respect to supervisory liability claims, including the Seventh Circuit. . . . In an en banc opinion, however, the Seventh Circuit went to great lengths to clarify any uncertainty: 'Iqbal held that knowledge of a subordinates' misconduct is not enough for liability. The supervisor must want the forbidden outcome to occur.' Vance v. Rumsfeld, 701 F.3d 193, 204 (7th Cir.2011) (en banc). . . Judge Easterbrook, writing for the majority, went on to explain that '[d]eliberate indifference to a known risk is a form of intent,' but 'to show scienter by the deliberate-indifference route, a plaintiff must demonstrate that the public official knew of risks with sufficient specificity to allow an inference that inaction is designed to produce or allow harm.'. . As a result, the majority held that for the substantive due process claim at stake in Vance to proceed, the plaintiffs 'would need to allege that Rumsfeld knew of a substantial risk to security contractors' employees, and ignored that risk because he wanted plaintiffs (or similarly situated persons) to be harmed.'. . The court, therefore, reversed the district court's denial of defendant's motion to dismiss because the complaint did not allege that Rumsfeld wanted plaintiffs to be harmed 'and could not plausibly do so.'. . Here, plaintiff only alleges that Chief Nobel Wray had knowledge of Heimsness's prior violent acts in 2001 and 2006, but the complaint understandably stops short of alleging that Wray had actual knowledge of the risk Heimsness would shoot and kill an innocent citizen necessary for finding Wray wanted Heenan or someone similarly situated to be harmed. . . While Heimsness allegedly sent disturbing communications in the months preceding Heenan's shooting via the mobile command center that threatened—or at least expressed a desire—to shoot people or be otherwise violent, plaintiff does not allege that these messages reached Wray, nor is it reasonable to infer from the complaint that they did. At most, the complaint alleges that Wray was generally aware of Heimsness's violent tendencies, and that is not enough to maintain a claim against him in his individual capacity. Rather, the proper outlet for such a claim is the one already directed against the City. See Sanville v. McCaughtry, 266 F.3d 724, 739 (7th Cir.2011) ("Failure to train claims are usually maintained against municipalities, not against individuals."). Accordingly, the court will grant defendants' motion and will dismiss Noble Wray as a defendant in this action.")

Boyce v. Johnson, 13 C 6832, 2014 WL 3558762, *5 (N.D. Ill. July 17, 2014) ("Boyce wrote letters to Godinez [Director of Illinois Dep't of Corrections] complaining about the socket, the window, and the mattress. . . A supervisory prison official may not turn a blind eye to alleged constitutional violations. . . Thus, an allegation that a supervisory official knew about an alleged constitutional violation and failed to act is sufficient to state a claim for deliberate indifference. . . Boyce's letters to Godinez placed Godinez on notice regarding the conditions in Boyce's cell, and Godinez did not take action based on those letters. Accordingly, Godinez's request to dismiss the Eighth Amendment claim against him is denied.")

Smith v. Hartmann, No. 12–cv–09915, 2014 WL 2134574, *4-*6 (N.D. Ill. May 22, 2014) ("Although Stoneking (or at least Grindle's articulation of it) is viable law in the Seventh Circuit, the Court agrees with Defendants that our court of appeals has not had occasion to consider whether the theory of liability recognized in Stoneking is cognizable in a case of police brutality. Therefore, Plaintiff is attempting to assert a new theory of excessive force liability here. The Seventh Circuit acknowledged the applicability of Stoneking in cases premised on due process violations stemming from invasions of one's personal security through sexual abuse. By contrast, Plaintiff's claim against Defendants here is premised on a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights stemming from allegations of excessive force during an arrest, and Plaintiff is seeking to hold supervisors liable on what is essentially a Monell-type theory of liability. So the allegations are different in kind—premised on a different constitutional violation, in an entirely different context, and where a plaintiff can already hold the city responsible for unconstitutional policies/practices/customs that caused him harm. For that reason, the Court is reticent to break ground and proclaim, as Plaintiff urges, that supervisors in a police department, all the way up through a city's mayor, can be held liable for creating a 'climate' that enabled an officer to inflict harm on an arrestee, particularly when our court of appeals has not done so. However, the Court need not determine whether Stoneking has relevance in the police brutality context (or whether qualified immunity would shield either or both Defendants from liability if it did), because that answer would not affect the Court's ultimate determination on this motion. As mentioned, Stoneking does not disturb the well-settled principle in the Seventh Circuit that a supervisor cannot be held liable for a subordinate's unconstitutional conduct unless a plaintiff demonstrates that the supervisor 'kn[e]w about the conduct it, facilitate[d] it, approve[d] it, condone[d] it, or turn[ed] a blind eye for fear of what they might see.'. . Here, for the purpose of surviving a motion to dismiss, Plaintiff has done that with respect to Police Chief Newsome. Plaintiff alleges that on September 4, 2011—just three months prior to the incident about which Plaintiff complains—Officer Hartmann 'viciously slammed' a suspect's face into the ground and into the side of his squad car. . . The victim filed a citizen's complaint the following week, but Police Chief Newsome ensured that the complaint bypassed the internal affairs protocol, and came straight to his desk. . . Because it did, Newsome was able to ignore the complaint and allow Officer Hartmann to go undisciplined. . . Drawing all reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor, the FAC suggests that Newsome did this to ensure that Hartmann would not retaliate and expose Newsome's embezzlement. . . Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Newsome condoned Hartmann's practice of abusive treatment (i.e., viciously slamming the faces of arrestees) and, by covering up the citizen's complaint, signaled to Hartmann that similar actions would be of no consequence in the future. In that sense, it reasonably can be said that Newsome was 'personally responsible for the deprivation of the constitutional right' of which Plaintiff complains—Hartmann's smashing of Plaintiff's face just a few months later. . . Irrespective of some amorphous custom, practice, or policy that Plaintiff alleges that Newsome instituted (and which, Plaintiff argues, supports the application of Stoneking here), Newsome, at the very least, turned a blind eye to the precise act complained of by Plaintiff, thereby conveying to Hartmann that he could perform this act with impunity. Newsome therefore facilitated the alleged excessive force inflicted on Plaintiff by Hartmann, and, as such, Plaintiff has stated a Section 1983 claim against Newsome. . . .Plaintiff, however, has not alleged personal involvement with respect to Mayor Rockingham. Plaintiff contends that Rockingham failed to implement the recommendations commissioned by the NAACP and memorialized in the

'Memorandum of Understanding Between the City of North Chicago and Minority Coalition,' despite his knowledge of a 'practice and pattern among the City of North Chicago's police officers ... of using excessive force.'. . Plaintiff also alleges that Rockingham, along with Newsome, 'prevented officers from reporting misconduct by violating the officers' confidences when they reported this sensitive information.'. . According to Plaintiff, these acts demonstrate that Rockingham 'established and maintained [a] policy of allowing the use of excessive force during the arrest and/or detention of accused individuals with deliberate and reckless indifference to the consequences.'. . This merely is a Monell claim dressed up in Stoneking language. . .In Grindle, the Seventh Circuit concluded that the Court's prior references to Stoneking precluded the defendants from availing themselves of the protections of qualified immunity. . . But Grindle did not dispense with the requirement that, for supervisory liability to attach, a defendant supervisor must have been personally involved in the constitutional violation. Mayor Rockingham's alleged failure to institute sweeping corrective measures in the department, such as those promulgated at the behest of the NAACP, amounts to mere inaction, not personal involvement. And the causal connection between Mayor Rockingham's alleged effort to discourage officers from reporting their colleagues by breaching confidences and Hartmann's alleged abuse of Plaintiff is too attenuated for the Court to conclude that Rockingham was 'personally involved' in the shattering of Plaintiff's orbital. Plaintiff's argument would have to be that Hartmann abused Plaintiff during his arrest, because he believed that Bogdala (his fellow arresting officer on the scene) would not report his misconduct thanks to Mayor Rockingham's general discouragement of such a practice. Whereas Plaintiff alleges that Police Chief Newsome knew of, condoned, and facilitated Hartmann's abuse of Plaintiff by keeping secret a recent, nearly-identical allegation, Plaintiff's complaint does not even state that Mayor Rockingham was aware of Hartmann's prior face-smashing incident (or that he even knew that Hartmann was a member of the city's police force, for that matter). Accordingly, the Court concludes that Rockingham's actions were too far removed from Plaintiff's incident to say that he was personally involved, and Plaintiff's allegations concerning unconstitutional policies or customs instituted by the Mayor of North Chicago must be brought as Monell claims against the city itself (which, the Court notes, Plaintiff has appropriately done in Count VI of his FAC). Stoneking, even if it did apply in the excessive force context, would not change this result. As mentioned above, the Third Circuit concluded that qualified immunity did not shield from liability the defendant principal—who personally received multiple complaints of sexual misconduct from female students, kept them hidden in secret files, and announced a corrective 'policy' to the band director whereby he forbade him from having one-on-one contact with female students. . . . However, the Court determined that the superintendent—who was told of some of the complaints, but took no part in the cover up—could not be held liable, because his behavior did not amount to an affirmative act that resulted in the plaintiff's abuse. . . Here, Mayor Rockingham is more like the superintendent, who at most was aware of complaints of police abuse (by way of lawsuits against the city, if nothing else), than the principal, who actively attempted to hide complaints in a secret file. Although Plaintiff's FAC makes the conclusory allegation that Rockingham and Newsome 'approved and condoned the City of North Chicago's police officers using excessive force' by 'actively concealing police misconduct,' the actual facts that Plaintiff alleges do not support this conclusion with respect to Mayor Rockingham. Again, the FAC is devoid of allegations that Mayor Rockingham covered up (or even knew) of Officer Hartmann's previous face-smashing incident. Therefore, the allegation that Rockingham covered up incidents of police misconduct strikes the Court as a 'formulaic recitation' of the language from the case law, and one that does not give Defendant 'fair notice of what the * * * claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.'. . In short, even under a Stoneking theory of liability, Plaintiff would fail to state a claim that Rockingham caused his injuries. That said, if Plaintiff is in possession of additional factual allegations with respect to Mayor Rockingham that he believes may overcome the deficiencies identified by the Court, he may amend his first amended complaint within 28 days.")

Payne v. City of Chicago, No. 13 C 8643, 2014 WL 585310, *1, *2 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 14, 2014) ("[S]ome lawyers appear to believe that because the filing fee for a federal action is a flat $400 irrespective of the number of defendants sought to be placed in its crosshairs, that provides a license to name anyone on that side of the 'v.' sign even though such inclusion may be clearly wrong. And here, targeting Superintendent McCarthy is clearly wrong. For one thing, naming him in his official capacity is at odds with established Supreme Court authority (Kentucky v. Graham, 473 U.S. 159, 165 (1985)), which really treats such a claim as one brought against the City of Chicago—which is already named as a defendant itself. Accordingly that 'official capacity' allegation cannot stand. Even more fundamentally, nothing in the Complaint asserts personal involvement on Superintendent McCarthy's part. Complaint ¶ 7 alleges his 'asserted responsibility for training, supervision, and conduct' of the Officer defendants, but the nature of the conduct with which those Officers are charged is not such as to create a causal link between any such responsibility and their actions.There is really no need to elaborate—or, indeed, to call for a response by Payne's counsel. Superintendent McCarthy's motion for his dismissal as a defendant is granted.")

Bohannon v. City of Milwaukee, 998 F.Supp.2d 736, 748 (E.D. Wis. 2014) ("[T]he plaintiff alleges only the conclusory statements that Flynn and Mucha knew or should have known about the officers' pattern of engaging in improper searches (Compl.¶ 64) and 'facilitated, approved, condoned, turned a blind eye to, and/or purposefully ignored' that misconduct (Compl.¶ 65). Those limited and conclusory allegations, by themselves, would not be sufficient to raise the plaintiff's supervisory liability claim above the speculative level; however, in conjunction with the other facts alleged in the complaint, the plaintiff clears that bar. As discussed more fully above, the plaintiff claims that the City and MPD received many complaints relating to improper searches prior to the incident in question. . . The plaintiff also asserts that the City and MPD failed to take any action to address those complaints. . . The defendants point out that, otherwise, 'there are no allegations that support plaintiff's assertion that Chief Flynn or Sergeant Mucha was aware of a pattern of unlawful searches being committed by [defendant officers] or other Fifth District officers.'. . Be that as it may, the Court may draw the reasonable inference that, by virtue of their positions as supervisors, Flynn and Mucha both received reports of the many illegal-search complaints being lodged with the City and MPD. . .Thus, the Court finds that the plaintiff has alleged sufficient factual material to have plausibly pled Flynn's and Mucha's knowledge; he has also adequately pled that, at the very least, those individuals turned a blind eye to the complaints they were receiving. . . Accordingly, the plaintiff's supervisory liability claim against Flynn and Mucha is sufficiently pled under Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678. The Court is, therefore, obliged to deny the defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings in this regard.") Hoskin v. City of Milwaukee, 994 F.Supp.2d 972, 983 & n.4, 984 (E.D. Wis. 2014) ("Supervisors 'need not participate directly in the deprivation [of civil rights] for liability to follow under § 1983.'. . Indeed, so long as the supervisors 'know about the conduct and facilitate it, condone it, or turn a blind eye for fear of what they might see,' they may be held liable. . . In other words, supervisors may be held liable under § 1983 for the actions of their subordinates if they acted 'either knowingly or with deliberate indifference.'. . The Backes court reached this conclusion in relation to several police supervisors who had been sued in their individual capacity. . . Meanwhile, the plaintiff sued Flynn in both his individual and official capacities. . . The defendants argue that there is some difference in the standard applied to individual-and official-capacity claims, but does not cite to any case law to support that contention. . . The Seventh Circuit applied the standard described in Backes to defendants sued in their official capacity in the case of Mathews v. City of East St. Louis, without noting any distinction between the two. . . The Court will take the same path and will treat both the individual-and official-capacity claims against Flynn as one and the same. The Court will also ignore the defendants' argument that Hudson and Mucha cannot be held liable under a Monell theory because they are not official policymakers (Br. in Supp. at 16–18); the plaintiffs acknowledge that they do not raise Monell claims against those defendants (Pl.'s Resp. at 12 n. 1), so this argument is irrelevant. The plaintiff's allegations on the supervisory liability issue do not go very far beyond those discussed above with relation to his Monell claim. . . In fact, aside from his incorporation of facts (Compl.¶ 62) and statement that he suffered damages (Compl.¶ 65), the plaintiff alleges only the conclusory statements that Flynn, Hudson, and Mucha knew or should have known about the officers' pattern of engaging in improper searches (Compl.¶ 63) and 'facilitated, approved, condoned, turned a blind eye to, and/or purposefully ignored' that misconduct (Compl.¶ 64). Those limited and conclusory allegations, by themselves, would not be sufficient to raise the plaintiff's supervisory liability claim above the speculative level; however, in conjunction with the other facts alleged in the complaint, the plaintiff clears that bar. As discussed more fully above, the plaintiff claims that the City and MPD received many complaints relating to improper searches prior to the incident in question. . . The plaintiff also asserts that the City and MPD failed to take any action to address those complaints. . . The defendants point out that, otherwise, 'there are no allegations that support plaintiff's assertion that Chief Flynn, Captain Hudson, or Sergeant Mucha were aware of a pattern of unlawful searches being committed by Vagnini and other Fifth District officers.'. . Be that as it may, the Court may draw the reasonable inference that, by virtue of their positions as supervisors, Flynn, Hudson, and Mucha, all received reports of the many illegal-search complaints being lodged with the City and MPD. . . Thus, the Court finds that the plaintiff has alleged sufficient factual material to have plausibly pled Flynn's, Hudson's, and Mucha's knowledge; he has also adequately pled that, at the very least, those individuals turned a blind eye to the complaints they were receiving. . . Accordingly, the plaintiff's supervisory liability claim against Flynn, Hudson, and Mucha, is sufficiently pled under Iqbal, 556

U.S. at 678. The Court is, therefore, obliged to deny the defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings in this regard.")

Potts v. Moreci, 12 F.Supp.3d 1065, (N.D. Ill. Nov. 7, 2013) ("In Antonelli, the Seventh Circuit explained that the Sheriff of Cook County should not be held liable in his individual capacity for 'clearly localized' claims brought by inmates where he had no knowledge of the facts underlying claims. . . It explained that the Sheriff and others in high-level positions are 'far from most of the day-to-day decisions that may have affected inmates.' . . Under the Seventh Circuit's distinction between 'clearly localized, non-systemic violations' and 'potentially systemic' violations, allegations of the former should be dismissed as to the Sheriff. . . The court held that the Sheriff could be held liable in his individual capacity for those potentially systemic claims that did not solely involve the plaintiff. . . Thus, while high level officials normally cannot be held liable for localized violations, they 'are expected to have personal responsibility for systemic conditions.'. . For example, in Byron v. Dart, 825 F.Supp.2d 958, 963–64 (N.D.Ill.2011), the court held that the plaintiff had adequately alleged that jail officials were liable under a failure to protect claim after the plaintiff had been attacked in his jail cell because the plaintiff alleged the defendants 'knew there was a widespread problem of faulty cell doors.' Id. at 964.")

Robinson v. Leonard-Dent, No. 3:12CV417–PPS, 2013 WL 5701067, *3 (N.D. Ind. Oct. 18, 2013) ("[E]ven in the postIqbal case that defendants suggest has tightened the rules on supervisory liability, the Seventh Circuit held that 'turning a blind eye to and affirmatively covering up' sexual abuse by a subordinate can support personal capacity liability because such conduct may be found to demonstrate the requisite discriminatory intent. T.E. v. Grindle, 599 F.3d 583, 588, 590 (7th Cir.2010). Robinson's report to Morton, Morton's then contacting Dent, and the allegation that HASB began a retaliatory investigation rather than address Dent's harassment of Robinson, are sufficient at the pleading stage to support the possibility that the factfinder may ultimately be persuaded that Morton personally had the requisite retaliatory (and therefore discriminatory) intent and participated in the retaliation. . . .The Seventh Circuit continues to acknowledge that one with authority to take action who stands 'idly by' in response to complaints of discrimination may be found to have discriminatory animus. . . The requisite personal responsibility for the constitutional deprivation can take several forms: the supervisor may ' "know about the conduct and facilitate it, approve it, condone it, or turn a blind eye for fear of what they might see."'. . Dent's successor as Executive Director, George Byers, was on the scene in time to have played a role in (or turned a blind eye to) the retaliatory investigation of AMAAB that deprived Robinson of further business opportunities with the HASB. Morton's fellow Board members may be shown to have had knowledge of Dent's harassing behavior and/or the complaints of Robinson or others and stood idly by, failing to intervene to halt the harassment and facilitating or condoning the allegedly retaliatory investigation afterward. Robinson alleges that Human Resources Director McDonald 'knew of and witnessed' Dent's harassment of Robinson 'but did nothing to stop it.'. . Maintenance Manager Fleckner allegedly also 'knew of the harassment and did nothing to prevent it.'. . Further challenges to the viability of Count I against each of these individual defendants must await summary judgment.")

Rose v. Justus, No. 13–cv–00810–MJR, 2013 WL 5488451, *2 (S.D. Ill. Oct. 1, 2013) ("The complaint sufficiently alleges personal involvement by Defendants Officer Mike, Levy Bridges, Sgt. Nickol and Sgt. Blackburn, in that each is personally tied to an alleged constitutional violation. There is no such personal involvement alleged on the part of Sheriff Justus. However, there are allegations that it was Justus's policy for grievances and complaints about the conditions of confinement to be ignored–the 'ostrich' approach. At this juncture that is sufficient to state a claim of individual liability as to Justus.")

Miller v. Ryker, No. 11–cv–436–MJR, 2012 WL 3705174, *7 (S.D. Ill. Aug. 27, 2012) ("As to Warden Hodges, Plaintiff's complaint only alleges in one paragraph that he asked to speak with Hodges 'about his serious medical condition' as he passed Hodges on his way to a class. The Court does not find that this allegation is sufficient to have given Hodges actual knowledge of a substantial risk of harm, and supervisory liability does not apply to § 1983 actions, Burks v. Raemisch, 555 F.3d 592, 596 (7th Cir.2009); Sanville v. McCaughtry, 266 F.3d 724, 740 (7th Cir.2001). Plaintiff's claim against Hodges is dismissed without prejudice.")

Thomas v. Illinois, No. 11–cv–571–MJR, 2012 WL 3263587, *11, *12 (S.D. Ill. Aug. 9, 2012) ("Plaintiff names Defendants Michael Puisis (Medical Director of the Illinois Department of Corrections—"IDOC"), Michael Randle (IDOC Director), Derwin Ryker (Lawrence Warden), and Phillip Martin (Lawrence Medical Administrator) in the complaint. However, he does not identify any actions taken by any of these individuals that caused the constitutional deprivations giving rise to this lawsuit. Instead, he appears to assert claims against them based on their role as administrators with supervisory authority over the Defendants who caused the alleged deprivations. For example, in the case of Defendant Martin, Plaintiff claims he 'gave nursing staff [Defendants Brooks and Morris] the assumed authority to circumvent ... rules, policies, training' in order to retaliate and harass Plaintiff (Doc. 1, p. 24). In essence, Plaintiff seeks to impose supervisory liability. Contrary to the belief of many prisoner civil rights litigants, there is no supervisory liability in this type of lawsuit.")

Young v. Wexford Health Sources, No. 10 C 8220, 2012 WL 621358, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 14, 2012) ("Plaintiff contends that he is not being seen by health care providers with any regularity and that, at least at the time he filed suit, his medical condition—as well as the bleeding and severe chronic pain associated with that ailment—went largely undiagnosed and 'virtually untreated.' Plaintiff alleges that because Warden Hardy denied his emergency medical grievances, as well as appointment cancellations due to lockdowns and missing paperwork, Plaintiff went unseen by medical staff for six months. Where, as here, Plaintiff informed correctional officials that he was being denied access to the health care unit, those officials may be liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for their purported inaction. . . Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment claims against Defendants Hardy and Harris will proceed.")

Jones v. Feinerman, No. 09 C 03916, 2011 WL 4501405, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 28, 2011) ("It is not clear what impact, if any, Iqbal has on the line of cases that hold supervisors may be held liable if they 'facilitated, approved, condoned, or turned a blind eye' to constitutional violations. E .g., Trentadue v. Redmon, 619 F.3d 648, 652 (7th Cir.2010). Perhaps this is all just a way of saying what the Seventh Circuit has previously held, that 'a supervising prison official cannot incur § 1983 liability unless that officer is shown to be personally responsible for a deprivation of a constitutional right.' Vance v. Peters, 97 F.3d 987, 992 (7th Cir.1996); see also Vinning-El v. Evans, __ F.3d __, 2011 WL 4336661, at *1 (7th Cir., Sep.16, 2011) ("Section 1983 does not authorize 'supervisory liability.'") (citation omitted). Or perhaps Iqbal has set a more demanding standard than previously set for supervisors to be held responsible for conduct in which they did not personally engage. In this case, however, there is no need to reconcile the standards: here, Jones has not alleged any personal conduct or responsibility of Osafo at all, other than the conclusory allegations that address 'Defendants' as a group. . . For Osafo to be personally liable, the complaint must allege some causal connection between Osafo personally and the violation of Jones's constitutional rights.")

Tillman v. Burge, 813 F.Supp.2d 946, 972-75 & n.14 (N.D. Ill. 2011) ("Plaintiff has alleged that Burge was present at Area 2 during his interrogation, that the physical evidence of his torture was apparent to those at Area 2, and that Burge 'encourag[ed], condon[ed] and permitt[ed]' his torture. . . Though more details concerning Burge's involvement would be useful, the court concludes these allegations are sufficient to support the inference that Burge was indeed personally involved in the deprivation of Plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . . In *Ashcroft v. Iqbal, . . .*the Supreme Court made clear that the bar on respondeat superior liability applies in the Bivens context just as it does in the § 1983 context. In this court's view, that case plows no new ground as to the allegations alleged here-it merely confirms what the existing § 1983 case law, including Steidl, has long held-'a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. . Plaintiff does also allege that Burge 'supervised, encouraged, sanctioned, condoned and ratified brutality and torture by other detectives and supervisors'. . . , but those allegations are in addition to allegations that Burge was personally involved in the conduct underlying Plaintiff's claims. . . . Finally, Plaintiff makes claims against Daley and Martin for their alleged involvement in his coercive interrogation. Plaintiff alleges that the repeated failures of Martin and Daley to intervene and prevent torture at Area 2, despite their knowledge that it was occurring, proximately caused Plaintiff's torture. . . . With respect to his due process claims, Plaintiff has not alleged that Daley or Martin were personally involved in his torture, an allegation necessary to establish their liability under § 1983. . . .As explained earlier, for a supervisor to be liable for a constitutional deprivation, he 'must know about the conduct and facilitate it, approve it, condone it, or turn a blind eye for fear of what [he] might see.'. . . Plaintiff asserts that the Tenth Circuit has held that § 1983 liability can attach where '[a] defendant supervisor's promulgation, creation, implementation, or utilization of a policy ... caused a deprivation of plaintiff's rights.' Notably, the case he cites, Dodds v. Richardson, 614 F.3d 1185, 1195 (10th Cir.2010) itself recognizes that Iqbal has called this holding into question, and that only 'defendants whose own individual actions cause a constitutional deprivation' face § 1983 liability. In any event, authority in this Circuit requires a showing that a supervisor's actions be tied to the specific constitutional violation at issue in order for the supervisor to be liable. . . . [T]oo many variables stand in the way of a determination that there is a causal connection between Daley and Martin's failure to investigate and the deprivation of Plaintiff's rights. The many years it has taken for the allegations of torture at Area 2 to come to light bear this out-the notion that the wrongdoing would have stopped once an inquiry was launched is simply too tenuous. Iqbal has reaffirmed the Supreme Court's unwillingness to extend supervisory liability for constitutional violations in the civil context. Absent any controlling authority for a finding of liability under a 'failure to investigate' theory, the court sustains these Defendants' objections, and grants Daley and Martin's motions to dismiss Count IV.")

Kitchen v. Burge, 781 F.Supp.2d 721, 736 (N.D. Ill. 2011) ("The parties dispute at length whether 'supervisory liability' is allowed under § 1983. On inspection, however, the dispute is merely verbal. The Seventh Circuit has recognized liability for faulty supervision. [citing cases] Here, Kitchen is not seeking to hold Martin vicariously liable for others' actions; he claims that Martin is primarily liable for failing to stop others from violating his constitutional rights. . . His liability, if any, is not for the officers' actions but for his own action in failing to stop them. Accordingly, the municipal defendants' motion to dismiss Count IV is denied.")

Rojas v. Town of Cicero, No. 08 C 5913, 2010 WL 4065483, at *10, *11 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 14, 2010) ("As the Seventh Circuit explained in T.E. v. Grindle, 599 F.3d 583 (7th Cir.2010), . . . after the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, . . . 'an equal protection claim against a supervisor requires a showing of intentional discrimination.'. .Thus, although prior Seventh Circuit precedent 'would have previously allowed a plaintiff to recover from a supervisor based on that supervisor's "deliberate indifference" toward a subordinate's purposeful discrimination,' after Iqbal a plaintiff must also show that the supervisor possessed the requisite discriminatory intent.'. . This same standard applies to claims under the First Amendment. . . In this case, Rojas relies on the pre- Iqbal standard, arguing that Dominick is liable for his 'deliberate indifference.' Specifically Rojas contends that Dominick had a 'head-deep-in-the-sand approach' and was 'unwilling to take a stand against retaliatory actions and threats made by Larry Dominick' and instead 'condoned' those actions. . . As explained in Grindle, however, the relevant consideration is not whether Dominick condoned discriminatory actions but rather whether Derek Dominick possessed the requisite discriminatory intent.").

Vetter v. Dozier, No. 06-cv-3528, 2010 WL 1333315, at *26 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 31, 2010) ("Recent Seventh Circuit case law indicates that the standards for supervisory liability in this circuit have been established for more than twenty years, and the case law suggests that qualified immunity is less likely when a defendant helps to cover up misconduct. T.E. v. Grindle, __ F.3d __, 2010 WL 938047, at *3, *4 (7th Cir. Mar.17, 2010) (citing Jones, 856 F.2d 985). In sum, if supervisors were deliberately indifferent and caused their subordinate's misconduct, then they can be held liable under well delineated case law.").

Petrovic v. City of Chicago, No. 06 C 6111, 2010 WL 1325709, at *4, *5 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 30, 2010) ("[I]n the instant case, because the following conclusory allegations merely parrot the elements of a supervisor liability claim, the Court holds that they are not entitled to the presumption of truth:
(1) 'The Supervisory Defendants knew that the City maintained the widespread and settled policy and practice of failing to adequately train, supervise, discipline, and otherwise control its officers.' ("m.Compl. & 41(a).)
(2) 'They also knew that the maintenance of these practices would result in preventable police abuse, including the type of constitutional harm inflicted on Plaintiff.'(Id.)
(3) 'The Supervisory Defendants oversaw, acquiesced in, and even condoned the above-described policies and practices and refused to take steps to correct them.' (Id. & 41(b).)
(4) '[T]he Supervisory Defendants caused and participated in the denial of Plaintiff's constitutional rights' by failing to: (a) 'monitor police officers and groups of officers who violate civilians' constitutional rights;' (b) 'discipline police officers who violate civilians' constitutional rights;' and (c) 'implement an effective early warning system to identify police officers and groups of officers who systematically violate civilians' constitutional rights.' (Id.)
(5) 'With respect to the Defendant Officers in this case, the Supervisory Defendants knew that the Defendant Officers had a practice of committing misconduct similar to that alleged by Plaintiff. Yet, the Supervisory Defendants approved, assisted, condoned and/or purposely ignored the Defendant Officers' prior misconduct.' (Id. & 41(d).)
(6) 'As such, the Supervisory Defendants were, at all times material to this Complaint, deliberately indifferent to the rights and safety of Plaintiff.' (Id. & 41(e).)
(7) 'As a result of the unjustified and excessive use of force by Defendant Officers, the actions and inactions of the Supervisory Defendants and the City's policy and practice, Plaintiff has suffered pain and injury, as well as emotional distress." (Id. & 42.)
Plaintiff argues that the Iqbal Court recognized that allegations that supervisors condoned discrete wrongs, i.e., the beatings by lower-level governmental actors, could be grounds for inferring that the supervisors acted with wrongful intent. See 129 S.Ct. at 1952. Although the Iqbal Court stated that under some circumstances that could be true, it also stated that it would not be an appropriate inference in a section 1983 case against supervisors because respondeat superior liability is inapplicable. Id. The Iqbal Court explained that because the doctrine was inapplicable to Ashcroft and Mueller, plaintiff failed to state a claim in that he provided conclusory, formulaic allegations that supervisors 'knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed' to subject plaintiff to such beatings without any factual allegation to suggest that they themselves intended to discriminate against him. Id. at 1951-52. So it is in this case. Petrovic has included formulaic recitations of the elements of a supervisor liability claim without any factual allegations to create a plausible suggestion that Cline and Morris, not merely indirectly approved, but encouraged the specific incident of misconduct involving Petrovic and Chevas or in some way directly participated in the incident. Thus, the Court grants Cline and Morris' motion to dismiss and dismisses all claims against them without prejudice.").

Fox v. Ghosh, No. 09 C 5453, 2010 WL 345899, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 26, 2010) ("In this case, Fox has not sufficiently alleged that McCann is personally liable for his purported injuries. Fox's Complaint merely avers that McCann 'knew about [the other defendants'] conduct and facilitated, approved, condoned, or turned a blind eye to it' (1st Am.Compl.&& 19, 26), and 'promulgated rules, regulations, policies, or procedures as Warden of Stateville Correctional Center that directly resulted in [the other defendants'] conduct.' (Id.) The court finds that these allegations are precisely the type of '[t]hreadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements' which the Supreme Court found insufficient to state a claim against a government official in Iqbal. . . . Fox's section 1983 claims against McCann, therefore, are dismissed without prejudice.")

Terry v. Cook County Dept. of Corrections, No. 09-cv-3093, 2010 WL 331720, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 22, 2010) ("Thus, the gravamen of Plaintiff's individual capacity claim against Dart is his alleged failure to train and to implement policies designed to provide constitutionally adequate healthcare to pretrial detainees in the Cook County Jail. At first blush, Plaintiff's claim against Dart appears to be more akin to an official capacity claim. . . . However, the Seventh Circuit has stated that 'if [a] supervisor personally devised a deliberately indifferent policy that caused a constitutional injury, then individual liability might flow from that act.' Armstrong v. Squadrito, 152 F.3d 564, 581 (7th Cir.1998) . . . . Read in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the amended complaint alleges that Dart failed to correct a deliberately indifferent policy that caused a constitutional injury. The Court does not see a material difference between a policymaker's failure to correct an unconstitutional policy and a policymaker's establishment of such a policy in the first place. Therefore, Defendants' motion to dismiss the individual capacity claim against Dart is denied.").

Estate of Allen ex rel. Wrightsman v. CCA of Tennessee, LLC, No. 1:08-cv-0774-SEB-TAB, 2009 WL 2091002, at *3 (S.D. Ind. July 14, 2009) ("Plaintiffs do not rely solely on a theory of supervisory liability. Plaintiffs allege that Sheriff Anderson had 'knowledge of the substandard medical care provided to inmates at Jail # 2 by CCA, yet he remained indifferent to the medical needs of inmates at the facility, including the needs of Brian Keith Allen resulting in his death.'. . With this allegation Plaintiffs do not rely on a theory of supervisory liability. Instead, by alleging that Sheriff Anderson did nothing despite knowing that Allen and others were not receiving necessary medical attention, Plaintiffs attempt to hold Sheriff Anderson liable for his own conduct, not the misconduct of his subordinates.")

Levy v. Holinka, 2009 WL 1649660, at *3 (W.D. Wis. June 11, 2009) ("[Plaintiff] alleges that defendants Holinka and Feathers are responsible for the policies that prevent the recognition of Hebrew Israeilites and prohibit the wearing of turbans. He alleges that defendant Jones enforced these policies when he confiscated his kufi and that defendants Holinka and Feathers approved this decision. However, plaintiff should be aware that supervisors cannot be held liable for mere 'knowledge and acquiescence' of their subordinates' unconstitutional acts. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948. If as this case progresses, it becomes apparent that defendants Holinka and Feathers merely knew of and consented to defendant Jones's alleged wrongdoing, he will not be able to establish their liability for any constitutional violation.' [RFRA claim]).

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Street v. Leyshock, 41 F.4th 987, 989-90 (8th Cir. 2022) ("In an action under § 1983, a supervisor may be liable only for his own misconduct. . . We conclude that the allegations in this case are insufficient to establish a plausible claim that the defendant officers violated any plaintiff's clearly established right against the use of excessive force. The complaint does not adequately allege that any defendant officer is responsible for the use of excessive force against a plaintiff. Plaintiff Street alleges that an officer 'standing behind Defendant Jemerson' jabbed her with a baton and knocked off her glasses, but she does not allege that Jemerson caused that one-time use of force. The other plaintiffs make no allegation that any defendant used force against them or even was present when the plaintiffs were subjected to force. The complaint alleges that defendant Karnowski used force against an unidentified citizen, and that he and defendant Boyher (on one occasion) and defendant Rossomanno (on another occasion) directed the use of force against other non-parties, but there is no allegation that these defendants used force or directed the use of force against any of the plaintiffs. In Baude, this court rejected a claim of qualified immunity on the ground that the plaintiff alleged that 'supervisory officers observed or intended the use of excessive force,' and that 'the supervisors issued orders allowing their subordinates to use excessive force against an allegedly peaceful crowd.'. . The complaint in this case, however, does not allege that the defendants issued orders to use excessive force against the crowd as a whole or against the plaintiffs in particular. Nor does it allege that the supervisory officers observed or intended the use of excessive force as to the crowd as a whole or the plaintiffs in particular. Allegations that three supervisory officers used or directed the use of force in three discrete instances are insufficient to support a reasonable inference that the six supervisory officers were deliberately indifferent to the use of excessive force against anyone in the crowd at any time, including against the plaintiffs here. The supervisory officers cannot be held liable for the alleged misdeeds of other police officers on a theory of respondeat superior. We therefore conclude that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the claims alleging use of excessive force. The partial dissent invites a comparison of the complaint in Baude with the complaint in this case. In determining the scope of circuit precedent, however, we are guided by the previous opinion of the court itself. As noted, the Baude opinion said that the key allegations of that complaint were that 'supervisory officers observed or intended the use of excessive force' and that 'supervisors issued orders allowing their subordinates to use excessive force against an allegedly peaceful crowd.'. . The complaint in this case does not plausibly allege that the defendants took the actions described in Baude regarding the use of excessive force.")

Street v. Leyshock, 41 F.4th 987, 990-92 (8th Cir. 2022) (Kelly, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The court acknowledges that in Baude, a case arising from the same incident and brought against the same defendant officers, we rejected a claim of qualified immunity on the plaintiff's excessive force claims because the complaint there alleged that 'supervisory officers observed or intended the use of excessive force,' and that 'the supervisors issued orders allowing their subordinates to use excessive force against an allegedly peaceful crowd.'. . The court attempts to distinguish the excessive force allegations here from those in Baude by asserting that, unlike in Baude, the complaint 'does not allege that the defendants issued orders to use excessive force against the crowd as a whole or against plaintiffs in particular.' But a review of the complaints from both cases reveals that the factual allegations pertaining to excessive force are almost identical. Using nearly the exact same words as in Baude, the complaint here likewise alleges facts supporting the conclusion that the supervisory officers observed or intended the use of excessive force. . . and issued orders allowing their subordinates to use excessive force. . . The court dismisses the similarities between the factual allegations in the two complaints by asserting that '[i]n determining the scope of circuit precedent ... we are guided by the previous opinion of the court itself.' It then points to the Baude court's summary of the excessive force allegations in that case—i.e., that the complaint there alleged that 'supervisory officers observed or intended the use of excessive force' and that 'the supervisors issued orders allowing their subordinates to use excessive force against an allegedly peaceful crowd'—and asserts that the complaint in this case did not make such allegations. But as noted above, the specific allegations underlying the Baude court's description are also in the complaint here. The court does not identify any factual allegations related to excessive force that were raised in Baude but not in the instant case. It may be true that we typically look only to the previous opinion of the court and not the underlying record when assessing whether precedent controls a new case with a different set of facts. But here, the two cases—Baude and this one—concern the same underlying events and the same defendants. To refuse to review the relevant records under such circumstances risks creating the undesirable result seen here: that two sets of plaintiffs receive disparate treatment despite raising the same claims arising from the same events supported by the same factual allegations against the same defendants. Because the excessive force allegations in Baude are indistinguishable from those here, I would affirm the district court's order denying the officers' motion to dismiss with respect to the excessive force claims.")

McGuire v. Cooper, 952 F.3d 918, 922-23 (8th Cir. 2020) ("Sheriff Dunning contends that, even taking in a light most favorable to McGuire all of the reported incidents of prior sexual misconduct by deputies employed by the Sheriff's Office, he is entitled to qualified immunity because these incidents are insufficient to provide notice that an on-duty deputy might sexually assault a member of the public like Cooper did. The circumstances of the prior incidents are contained in the record at paragraph 86 of Sheriff Dunning's declaration dated March 28, 2018. The district court listed in a footnote fifteen prior incidents of sexual misconduct that Sheriff Dunning knew about, but neither made detailed findings regarding them nor reasoned how they were similar to the sexual misconduct at issue in this case. Constraining ourselves to the version of facts in the record that the district court assumed or likely assumed in favor of McGuire, we conclude that the prior instances of sexual misconduct are not similar in kind or sufficiently egregious in nature to demonstrate a pattern of sexual assault against members of the public by deputies. In order to establish a pattern, our case law requires a showing of more than general allegations of a wide variety of sexual misconduct. It requires the other misconduct to 'be very similar to the conduct giving rise to liability. . . Put another way, the conduct must be 'sufficiently egregious in nature.'. . . In this case, the other misconduct included trading cigarettes for a detainee's display of her breasts; licking a minor stepdaughter's nipples during horseplay; asking 'deeply personal and inappropriate questions' to members of the public; engaging in verbal sexual harassment; having consensual sexual contact at the office; and abusing work hours to conduct personal business or ask women out on a date. While this behavior is troubling, it is not enough to put a supervising official on notice that a deputy might use his position and authority to separate a woman from her boyfriend at the park and coerce her to engage in sexual contact with him. The summary judgment record, even when viewed in a light most favorable to McGuire, fails to establish that Sheriff Dunning received notice of a pattern of similar unconstitutional acts being committed by his subordinates. A reasonable officer in Sheriff Dunning's position would not have known that he needed to more closely supervise his deputies, including Cooper, or they might sexually assault a member of the public.")

Barton v. Taber, 908 F.3d 1119, 1125-26 (8th Cir. 2018) ("The record is devoid of any evidence establishing that Wright knew that Martin was inadequately trained or supervised. Regina Barton's brief asserts that 'Martin has been involved in several lawsuits, the majority of which involve allegations of denial of medical care,' but she cited no evidence to support that assertion. . . While Martin testified that she had been sued by four plaintiffs, there is no indication that the claims against her involved the denial of medical care. Moreover, there is no evidence regarding the nature of Martin's alleged acts or omissions, when those acts or omissions occurred, or when the plaintiffs filed suit. In the absence of such evidence, the mere assertion of prior suits does not support an inference that Wright had notice on September 12, 2011, that the County's training procedures and supervision were inadequate and likely to result in constitutional violations.")

Marsh v. Phelps County, 902 F.3d 745, 754-56 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Marsh's claim that Samuelson and Gregg 'knew or should have known' their actions or omissions created a substantial risk of injury to Marsh evinces a negligence standard not contemplated under § 1983. . . 'To establish personal liability of the supervisory defendants, [Marsh] must allege specific facts of personal involvement in, or direct responsibility for, a deprivation of [her] constitutional rights.'. . As to Marsh's failure-to-train claim, '[a] supervisor's failure to train an inferior officer may subject the supervisor to liability in his individual capacity only "where the failure to train amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the [officers] come into contact."'. . Overarching these claims is qualified immunity. A supervising officer will not be individually liable for an otherwise unlawful act if he is entitled to qualified immunity. Qualified immunity protects government officials from liability for civil damages in their individual capacities if their conduct did not violate 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . . Marsh does not allege that Samuelson or Gregg ordered or directed Campana to sexually assault female inmates, or Marsh particularly. Thus, their alleged liability cannot be based on direct participation in this constitutional violation. In this action, Marsh alleges that Samuelson and Gregg failed to protect her from the substantial risk of harm that Campana presented to herself and other inmates. She argues the evidence that Campana might possibly have problems working around females, that he was counseled to be careful with his interactions lest he open himself up to a law suit, the verbal complaints of Johnson not wanting to work alongside Campana, and the evidence of Campana's character while performing his job duties, all support an inference that Samuelson and Gregg were aware of the risk Campana posed to female inmates. Marsh claims as to Samuelson that it was his inaction against the 'known' danger Campana posed that establishes his liability. Sheriff Samuelson is entitled to qualified immunity unless he had notice of a pattern of conduct that was sufficiently egregious in nature. Qualified immunity from supervisory liability turns on what Samuelson knew of Campana's actions. . . Here, there is insufficient evidence to infer that Samuelson knew of any danger posed by Campana, and most certainly he did not receive notice of a pattern of unconstitutional acts. Much of the problem in this matter is that the evidence Marsh points to as creating material fact issues, is largely information garnered after Campana's suspension. That it became known later, when Campana no longer had a presence at the jail, there were red flags lurking but unknown at the time of his hiring does not create liability for Samuelson, nor does it create a fact issue on appeal when these facts were not known by Samuelson prior to Campana's suspension. . . .On these facts, a reasonable officer in Sheriff Samuelson's shoes would not have known that he needed to more closely supervise Campana. . The district court correctly granted Samuelson qualified immunity. . . . Marsh claims that there were written policies that prohibited male officers from being in the female cells and claims without record citation that Samuelson and Gregg were aware Campana 'openly defied' those policies. 'Assuming without deciding that "turning a blind eye" could ever constitute actual notice' of wrongdoing sufficient to support a constitutional claim, being aware that Campana violated jail policy, without more, by accompanying female inmates in their cells 'falls far short of notice of a pattern of conduct that violated' Marsh's constitutional rights. . . .On the facts before us, neither Gregg (nor Samuelson) had information that would have raised an inference that Campana was violating his duties as an officer by sexually assaulting female inmates. It is not a reasonable inference on these facts, for example, to assume that a general claim that someone might possibly have a problem working with women indicates that individual poses a threat of sexually assaulting women.") Saylor v. Nebraska, 812 F.3d 637, 644-45 (8th Cir. 2016) ("As for the named medical defendants, Dr. Kohl, Dr. White, Dr. Weilage, and Dr. Perez, none were treating physicians. Thus, these defendants also acted in a supervisory capacity. 'To impose supervisory liability, other misconduct [by the medical defendants] must be very similar to the conduct giving rise to liability.' Livers v. Schenck, 700 F.3d 340, 356 (8th Cir.2012). This means that there is no real vicarious liability. . . Rather, to be liable under § 1983 the medical defendants had to personally violate Saylor's rights or be responsible for a systematic condition that violates the Constitution. . . Saylor's main argument is that the treatment that occurred after Dr. Christensen left NSP rises to the level of cruel and unusual punishment. Dr. Christensen's treatment plan was three-part: regular psychotherapy treatment, medication, and a safe environment. The medical defendants attempted to provide Saylor with another psychiatrist at NSP, ultimately found him another psychiatrist at TSCI, continued medication as they saw fit within their independent medical judgment, and gave him his requested private cell. To the extent there was any change in Dr. Christensen's treatment plan, Saylor requested some and agreed to other deviations. Specifically, Saylor stated he was willing to forgo seeing a doctor so long as he could continue taking his medications. After the meeting with Dr. Baker wherein she suggested easing him off Seroquel because it did not seem to be helping and was causing low blood pressure, Saylor agreed to continue taking Xanax. Throughout his time of incarceration, the record shows that Defendants met Saylor's medical needs beyond the minimum standard required. Defendants were aware of his medical needs and took steps to meet those needs. Because Saylor cannot show that Defendants acted with deliberate indifference, there was no deprivation of his Eighth Amendment rights, and thus, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

S.M. v. Krigbaum, 808 F.3d 335, 340-42 (8th Cir. 2015) ("When a supervising official who had no direct participation in an alleged constitutional violation is sued for failure to train or supervise the offending actor, the supervisor is entitled to qualified immunity unless plaintiff proves that the supervisor (1) received notice of a pattern of unconstitutional acts committed by a subordinate, and (2) was deliberately indifferent to or authorized those acts. . . This rigorous standard requires proof that the supervisor had notice of a pattern of conduct by the subordinate that violated a clearly established constitutional right. Allegations of generalized notice are insufficient. . . . For purposes of this appeal, Krigbaum concedes that Edwards's sexual assaults deprived plaintiffs of a clearly established constitutional right to substantive due process when he committed 'an egregious, nonconsensual entry into the body which was an exercise of power without any legitimate governmental objective.'. . Sheriff Krigbaum is entitled to qualified immunity unless he had notice of a pattern of conduct that was sufficiently egregious in nature. Qualified immunity from supervisory liability turns on what Sheriff Krigbaum knew of Edwards's actions as tracker, not what Drug Court Administrator Graham–Thompson or Commissioner Sullivan knew. . . . Assuming without deciding that 'turning a blind eye' could ever constitute actual notice, and that Krigbaum knew of this conduct, being aware that Edwards violated jail policy by taking Drug Court participants out for a cigarette break falls far short of notice of a pattern of conduct that violated plaintiffs' rights to substantive due process. . . Like the defendant sheriff in Walton, Krigbaum acted to fire Edwards as soon as Krigbaum learned of Edwards's egregious misconduct. . . . In addition to notice of a pattern of unconstitutional conduct, plaintiffs must present sufficient evidence that Krigbaum acted with deliberate indifference to their rights. When the issue is qualified immunity from individual liability for failure to train or supervise, deliberate indifference is a subjective standard that 'entails a level of culpability equal to the criminal law definition of recklessness.'. . '[Plaintiffs] must prove [Krigbaum] personally knew of the constitutional risk posed by [his] inadequate training or supervision' of Edwards. . . .Plaintiffs also rely on our statement that to be liable '[t]he supervisor must know about the conduct and facilitate it, approve it, condone it, or turn a blind eye for fear of what [he] might see.'. . The statement preceded the Supreme Court's decision in Farmer and therefore must be ignored to the extent it is inconsistent with the subjective test for deliberate indifference. Here, plaintiffs presented no evidence that Krigbaum had knowledge of sexual misconduct by Edwards that would create an inference Krigbaum turned a blind eye to or consciously disregarded a substantial risk of the constitutional harm Edwards was causing—conscience-shocking violations of plaintiffs' substantive due process rights by a member of the Sheriff's Department performing duties for the Drug Court.")

Jackson v. Nixon, 747 F.3d 537, 545 (8th Cir. 2014) ("To state a claim against Warden Burgess, Jackson must plead facts to show that Burgess was directly involved in making, implementing or enforcing a policy decision that 'create[d] unconstitutional conditions.'. . Our case law is clear that the warden's general supervisory authority over prison operations does not make him liable under § 1983. . . We note that personal involvement may be assessed differently depending on the alleged constitutional violation at issue. In cases regarding prison violence, for instance, it can be difficult to demonstrate the warden's 'knowledge of, or connection with' individual incidents between guards and prisoners or among prisoners. . . Here, although Jackson challenges the curriculum of a treatment program—the choice of which was inherently a policy decision—and its effect on him, his conclusory statement that Warden Burgess 'knew or should have known' of the alleged First Amendment violation is insufficient. Instead, Jackson must plead facts that plausibly show direct involvement by the warden in the formation, implementation, or enforcement of that policy, which at this stage of the litigation he has failed to do. Jackson's claims regarding Salsbury's involvement are more specific than his statements regarding the other defendants. In particular, he alleged that as director of the treatment program, she could have allowed him to avoid the religious portions of the program but still remain enrolled in order to comply with his parole stipulation. . . The scope of her authority as to the OUTP curriculum and inmates' participation in it is unclear. Even if she did not determine the OUTP curriculum, however, the claim concerns her ability to help ameliorate the constitutional violation alleged. . . Affording Jackson reasonable inferences from the facts in his complaint, we find that he has plausibly alleged Salsbury's personal involvement.")

Ellis v. Houston, 742 F.3d 307, 325, 326 (8th Cir. 2014) ("Long before the actions of supervisors in this case, the Supreme Court had recognized employee rights to be free from racial harassment and retaliation in Jones, 541 U.S. at 383, and CBOCS, 553 U.S. at 451. In light of this preexisting law it was readily apparent that a 'continuous racially invidious climate' in a penitentiary, Snell, 782 F.2d at 1099, and undertaking 'systematic[ ]' retaliation following complaints, Kim, 123 F.3d at 1052, would violate clearly established rights. . . .The black officers presented evidence here that the Nebraska penitentiary's own administrative regulation 112.07 recognized that inflammatory racial comments and jokes violate employee rights. Any reasonable supervisor would have recognized that racial slurs and remarks like those used here would illegally affect the working environment. . . As in the prison in Snell, there is also evidence that conduct by the supervisors at the Nebraska penitentiary caused black guards to question whether white officers would come to their aid if they were in danger. . . The evidence in this case is nearly identical to that shown to violate the law in Allen, including black officers being monitored more closely than white employees and told not to congregate in the yard, receiving baseless citations, and being denied career advancement opportunities. . . .We conclude that existing precedent put the supervisors on notice that such actions would violate constitutional rights. A reasonable prison supervisor would have understood that permitting and participating in racially derisive remarks and assigning inferior work assignments would violate the black officers' rights under §§ 1981 and 1983. Based on the record evidence, Sergeant Miles has not shown that he is entitled to qualified immunity on the black officers' harassment claims, nor have Lieutenants Stoner and Haney shown they are entitled to qualified immunity on the retaliation claims of Officer Ellis.")

Ellis v. Houston, 742 F.3d 307, 327, 328 (8th Cir. 2014) (Loken, J., concurring in the judgment, joined by Colloton, J.) ("Even if the individual defendant exercised at least some supervisory authority over the plaintiff, as in this case, liability under §§ 1981 and 1983 is not established merely by proof that the defendant was deliberately indifferent to racial harassment by his subordinates, as we suggested in Ottman, 341 F.3d at 761, or by proof of a 'general racial animus in the prison' and 'lack of response by the supervisors,' as the courts ruled in Snell v. Suffolk County, 782 F.2d 1094, 1097 (2d Cir.1986), and Allen v. Michigan Department of Corrections, 165 F.3d 405, 410–11 (6th Cir.1999). In my view, those rulings were overruled by Ashcroft v. Iqbal. . . .Thus, 'where the intent to discriminate is an element of the constitutional violation .... the plaintiffs must show that the supervisory officials themselves acted with an impermissible motive, not merely that they knew of their subordinates' impermissible motives and did not put a stop to their actions.' Dodds v. Richardson, 614 F.3d 1185, 1210 (10th Cir.2010) (Tymkovich, J., concurring), cert. denied, 131 S.Ct. 2150 (2011). Applying this standard to a case where multiple co-workers are accused of engaging in racial jokes, taunts, and insults that, over an undefined period of time, created a hostile work environment for five minority plaintiffs, is a complex task. It is not enough that a defendant 'participated' in the racial taunts and insults and turned a blind eye to harassing conduct by his subordinates. Plaintiffs must prove he acted (and failed to act) for the purpose of creating a hostile work environment for the plaintiffs, that is, that he intended to alter the terms and conditions of their employment through severe and pervasive racial harassment. Determining the liability of an individual supervisor or co-worker in this type of case is very different than determining when the public employer is liable for the existence of such a hostile work environment in its workplace. See Vance v. Ball State Univ., 133 S.Ct. 2434, 2441–42 (2013). Viewing the current record in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, I agree there is sufficient evidence of Sgt. Miles's sustained participation in racial harassment to preclude summary judgment dismissing the hostile work environment claims against him. Plaintiffs allege that Miles made offensive 'jokes' regularly over the course of a few months in front of the entire first shift, with one witness describing it as 'almost like a daily occurrence.' Miles made the majority of the alleged derogatory comments at roll call, and plaintiffs testified that the harassment was worse when he was there. Though the record suggests that Sgt. Miles was not in charge at roll call, he was an employee of superior rank. . Even if the insensitive comments were initially thought to be mere teasing or joking, a jury could reasonably infer that a supervisor who continued to participate in the hazing after Ellis, one of the targets, exclaimed, 'damn the jokes' and 'enough is enough,' was intentionally creating a hostile work environment. Taking all of these circumstances into account, I agree there is enough evidence in this record to submit to a jury whether Sgt. Miles participated in sufficiently severe or pervasive racial harassment with the purpose of creating a hostile work environment for one or more of these plaintiffs.")

Livers v. Schenck, 700 F.3d 340, 356, 357 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Notice of allegations Commander Kofoed committed dishonest acts unrelated to handling evidence is not sufficient to support Sheriff Dunning's liability for a failure to supervise. . . The district court's finding that some DCSO employees knew of Commander Kofoed's 'administrative lapses' is legally insufficient to impose supervisory liability. . . Nor does our own review of the record reveal notice to Sheriff Dunning. . . . Our cumbersome review of more than 65 bound volumes and 40 video DVDs drew a blank. There is no evidence, or reasonable inference from any evidence, indicating Sheriff Dunning had notice Commander Kofoed may have mishandled evidence in this or any other investigation until after the Stock investigation ended, too late to prevent injury to Livers. Livers also alleges Sheriff Dunning's supervision was inadequate because he did not properly investigate and discipline DCCSI employees for misconduct. Livers contends Sheriff Dunning never disciplined DCCSI employees for possible mishandling of evidence, which made Commander Kofoed think he would not be punished for planting evidence. This assertion is mere speculation and argument, and is not a basis for denying qualified immunity. . . .Livers' final contention—that Sheriff Dunning knew Captain Olson instructed Commander Kofoed not to correct Commander Kofoed's report about the date he 'discovered' the blood evidence in Will's car—is similarly unavailing. Captain Olson did not share this information with Sheriff Dunning until March 2008, long after Sheriff Dunning could have prevented injury to Livers. Again, the record does not support any finding that Sheriff Dunning received notice of the alleged misconduct in time for any failure to act by Sheriff Dunning to have injured Livers. Sheriff Dunning is entitled to qualified immunity both on Livers' failure-to-train claim and his failure-to-supervise claim. . . .Livers also cites City of St. Louis v. Praprotnik, 485 U.S. 112, 127 (1988), and Speer v. City of Wynne, Ark., 276 F.3d 980, 987 (8th Cir.2002), for his claim Sheriff Dunning should be liable because he ratified Commander Kofoed's fabrication of evidence after it occurred. Praprotnik and Speer are inapposite because they involve municipal—not individual—liability. . .Applying those cases would violate the principle that a supervisor who does not directly participate in an employee's constitutional violation can only be liable for the violation when it was caused by the supervisor's failure to train or supervise his or her employees properly.")

L.L. Nelson Enterprises, Inc. v. County of St. Louis, Mo., 673 F.3d 799, 810 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Supervisors like Overall, Buckles, and Fox cannot be held vicariously liable under § 1983 for the actions of a subordinate. . . To state a claim, the plaintiff must plead that the supervising official, through his own individual actions, has violated the Constitution. . . Where, as here, the alleged constitutional violation requires proof of an impermissible motive, the amended complaint must allege adequately that the defendant acted with such impermissible purpose, not merely that he knew of a subordinate's motive. . . The amended complaint in this case does not adequately allege that Overall, Buckles, or Fox took adverse action against Landlords Moving with retaliatory motive. Landlords Moving alleges that each of the three supervisors 'either participated himself in the conspiracy and retaliation against [Landlords Moving], knew of the conspiracy and retaliation but failed to take action to halt it, or should have known of the conspiracy and retaliation but deliberately or willfully failed to discover it and halt it.'. . Like the complaint in Iqbal, which alleged that supervisory officials 'knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to' subject the plaintiff to harsh conditions for an illegitimate reason, these asseverations against Overall, Buckles, and Fox are conclusory, and they are not entitled to a presumption of truth. . . The amended complaint asserts that Main took her actions 'openly,' and that they were 'obviously designed to disadvantage Landlords Moving,' but this probably does not suffice to allege even that the actions were known to the particular supervisory officials named as defendants . . . and it assuredly does not plead adequately that the supervisors acted with impermissible purpose as required by Iqbal. The amended complaint does allege that Fox 'was informed on many occasions throughout 2004' about 'the irregularities within the Sheriff's office,' and then deliberately failed to take corrective action. . . But even assuming the alleged retaliation is among the 'irregularities' this assertion is insufficient to allege that Fox acted with a retaliatory motive. We therefore conclude that the district court properly dismissed the claims against Overall, Buckles, and Fox.")

Wagner v. Jones, 664 F.3d 259, 275 (8th Cir. 2011) ("Wagner's claim against Dean Jones is based on Dean Jones's own actions and omissions during the hiring process. Wagner has alleged facts establishing that even though Dean Jones was on notice that Wagner's political beliefs and associations may have impermissibly affected the faculty's hiring recommendation, she still refused to hire Wagner for any position. Accordingly, Dean Jones's position as a supervisor does not shield her from § 1983 liability. The district court erred in finding that qualified immunity protects Dean Jones from liability in her individual capacity. We reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment as to Carolyn Jones in her personal capacity, and we remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Schaub v. VonWald, 638 F.3d 905, 920 (8th Cir. 2011) ("The dissenting opinion is correct that VonWald had no personal interaction with Schaub. However, VonWald was aware of his serious medical needs and deliberately disregarded them by falsely assuring a judge the ADC could handle his needs and then failing to take the proper steps to insure that the ADC could provide adequate care. A prison official may be liable if the official has actual knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm. . . When VonWald saw Schaub return to the special management unit, it was incumbent upon him to take the necessary steps to provide Schaub adequate medical care, or inform Judge Williamson that the ADC could not accommodate his full-time care; VonWald's inaction constituted deliberate indifference.")

Doe v. Flaherty, 623 F.3d 577, 584 (8th Cir. 2010) ("There is no question, under our precedent, that Doe's substantive due process rights were indeed violated when Coach Smith sexually abused her. . .Whether Wilcher is liable under § 1983 for Smith's abusive conduct, however, is another matter. Supervisory school officials, like Wilcher, can be liable under § 1983 only if they are 'deliberately indifferent to acts committed by a teacher that violate a student's constitutional rights.'. . Therefore, the plaintiffs must prove that Wilcher had [actual] notice of a pattern of unconstitutional acts by Smith, that she showed deliberate indifference to those acts, that she failed to take sufficient remedial action, and that such failure proximately caused injury to Jane Doe.")

Langford v. Norris, 614 F.3d 445, 461, 462 (8th Cir. 2010) ("In this case, it is plain that if Byus knew all the relevant facts about Langford's and Hardin's medical needs, the unlawfulness of failing to ensure that they received adequate treatment would have been apparent. The more difficult question centers on how much Byus actually knew about Langford's and Hardin's medical needs and the allegedly inadequate treatment they received. As we have said, we may take as given the facts that the district court assumed. . . But the only relevant fact identified in the magistrate judge's proposed findings and recommendations is that Byus sent letters to Langford and Hardin in which he acknowledged receiving letters from them. . . .The district court likely inferred that the letters from Langford and Hardin contained at least some description of their medical needs − Langford's stomach and back pain and Hardin's Charcot foot − and the perceived inadequacy of the treatment they had received to that point. . . . Considering these facts together, and drawing all reasonable inferences from them in favor of the plaintiffs, we are convinced that the constitutional right at issue was clearly established as of the time of the relevant conduct, such that a reasonable supervisory official would have known that his actions were unlawful. That is to say, a reasonable official standing in Byus's shoes would have understood that ignoring Langford's and Hardin's complaints about receiving deficient medical care contravened clearly established principles of Eighth Amendment jurisprudence.").

Parrish v. Ball, 594 F.3d 993, 1001 & n.1, 1002 (8th Cir. 2010) ("As we have held, a supervising officer can be liable for an inferior officer's constitutional violation only ' Aif he directly participated in the constitutional violation, or if his failure to train or supervise the offending actor caused the deprivation.''. . The Supreme Court's recent pronouncement in Iqbal may further restrict the incidents in which the 'failure to supervise' will result in liability. . . However, we do not address the extent to which Iqbal so limits our supervisory liability precedent because, even under our prior precedent, Sheriff Ball is entitled to qualified immunity. . . The summary judgment record, even when viewed in a light most favorable to Parrish, reveals nothing that suggests that Sheriff Ball received any notice of a pattern of unconstitutional acts committed by any of Sheriff Ball's subordinates. Moreover, pursuant to the parties' stipulation of facts at summary judgment, the parties agreed that Sheriff Ball had no occasion to know that Fite was about to engage in a sexual assault. Thus, a reasonable officer in Sheriff Ball's shoes would not have known that he needed to more closely supervise Fite. Therefore, to the extent that such a failure to supervise may survive Iqbal, Sheriff Ball was, nevertheless, entitled to qualified immunity on such a claim.").

Nelson v. Correctional Medical Services, 583 F.3d 522, 534, 535 (8th Cir. 2009) (en banc) ("Nelson claims that Director Norris violated her Eighth Amendment rights by failing to ensure that proper policies and customs were implemented with respect to the restraint of female inmates in labor . . . In a § 1983 case an official 'is only liable for his ... own misconduct' and is not 'accountable for the misdeeds of [his] agents' under a theory such as respondeat superior or supervisor liability. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1948-49 (2009). Norris is thus liable only if he personally displayed deliberate indifference to the hazards and pain resulting from shackling an inmate such as Nelson during the final stages of labor. Farmer, 511 U.S. at 842. Nelson does not contend, nor does the record reflect, that Norris had any personal involvement in Turensky's decision to keep Nelson restrained while she was in labor. Indeed, there is no evidence that Norris, who was responsible for managing a large state wide prison system, had any personal knowledge of Nelson or the medical care she was receiving. . . . The regulations, directives, and orders in the record suggest administrative concern for the health and safety of pregnant inmates. Without further allegation or evidence of deliberate indifference, Nelson's Eighth Amendment claim against Norris must fail. We conclude therefore that the district court erred in denying summary judgment to Director Norris based upon qualified immunity.")

Cole v. Does, No. 21-CV-1282 (PJS/JFD), 2021 WL 5645511, at *8-9 (D. Minn. Dec. 1, 2021) ("Even when a supervising official did not directly participate in a constitutional violation committed by his inferior officers, he may still be held liable under § 1983 when his 'failure to properly supervise and train the offending employee[s] caused a deprivation of constitutional rights.'. . In order to recover for a failure to train or supervise, however, a plaintiff must establish four elements: (1) the supervisor was on 'notice of a pattern of unconstitutional acts committed by subordinates;' (2) the supervisor 'was deliberately indifferent to or tacitly authorized' the pattern of unconstitutional acts; (3) the supervisor failed to take 'sufficient remedial action' to address the pattern of unconstitutional acts; and (4) the supervisor's failure to remedy the pattern of unconstitutional acts proximately caused the plaintiff's injury. . . Cole and Hennessy-Fiske have not adequately pleaded even the first of these four elements. During the hearing, the Court questioned the parties about what, exactly, Dwyer and Salto would have to know in order to be on 'notice of a pattern of unconstitutional acts committed by subordinates.'. . For example, is it sufficient if they knew that any state trooper had engaged in a pattern of unconstitutional acts? Or must they have known that a trooper under their command had engaged in such a pattern? Or must they have known that John Does 1, 2, and 3 had engaged in such a pattern? And what type of conduct must have come to their attention? Is it sufficient if they were aware of any type of unconstitutional conduct? Or must they have been aware of instances of excessive force? Or must they have been aware of instances of excessive force against journalists? With respect to the 'who' question, both sides agreed that it is not sufficient that Dwyer or Salto knew of unconstitutional acts by just any state trooper; Dwyer and Salto argued that they had to know of unconstitutional acts committed by John Does 1, 2, and 3, while Cole and Hennessy-Fiske argued that they had to know of unconstitutional acts committed by troopers under their command (even if those troopers were not John Does 1, 2, or 3). With respect to the 'what' question, Dwyer and Salto argued that they had to know of the prior use of excessive force against members of the press, while Cole and Hennessy-Fiske argued that knowledge of any use of excessive force—including, say, excessive force against a suspect or detainee—could suffice. Neither side, however, was able to cite case law that directly supported their positions. For purposes of this motion, the Court will assume, without deciding, that plaintiffs are correct as to both questions. In other words, the Court will assume that Cole and Hennessy-Fiske must plausibly allege that Dwyer and Salto knew that one or more troopers under their command had engaged in a pattern of excessive force (against anyone). Even if this is a correct application of the law—and the Court has its doubts . . . [,] Cole and Hennessy-Fiske have not pleaded a plausible failure-to-train or failure-to-supervise claim, because their complaint does not identify a single instance of excessive force committed by a state trooper under the command of Dwyer and Salto, much less a pattern of excessive force, much less a pattern of excessive force of which Dwyer or Salto was aware.")

NINTH CIRCUIT

Richards v. Cox, 842 F. App'x 49, ___ (9th Cir. 2021) ("Here, the parties agree that the requisite state of mind for the Supervisor Defendants—when enacting the birdshot policy in combination with get-down orders—is 'deliberate indifference' to inmate safety. . . The 'deliberate indifference' standard requires a prison official to subjectively know of and consciously disregard an excessive risk to inmate safety. . . The district court here properly determined that, viewing the material facts in a light most favorable to Richards, a reasonable jury could find that the Supervisor Defendants were deliberately indifferent to inmate safety in implementing the birdshot policy in combination with get-down orders. The district court also determined that the Supervisor Defendants' policy was 'so deficient' that it constituted the moving force behind Richards's constitutional violation. . .The Supervisor Defendants admitted that Richards was shot in the face by a correctional officer attempting to follow their birdshot policy.We agree with the district court that the Supervisor Defendants' policy was 'so deficient' that it constituted the moving force behind a constitutional violation. That is because the Supervisor Defendants' policy required bystander inmates to lie on the ground while correctional officers fired 12-gauge shotguns—loaded with birdshot cartridges containing hundreds of metal pellets—directly at the ground during non-deadly prison disturbances. To make matters worse, the Supervisor Defendants admitted that their policy did not require correctional officers to consider the safety of any bystander inmate lying on the ground before firing a 12-gauge shotgun directly at the ground.")

Addison v. City of Baker City, 758 F. App'x 582, ___ (9th Cir. 2018) ("To prove supervisory liability under § 1983, courts must look at the requisite mental state for the specific constitutional violation alleged. See OSU Student All. v. Ray, 699 F.3d 1053, 1071–72 (9th Cir. 2012). For claims of free speech violations under the First Amendment, knowledge and acquiescence suffice for supervisor liability. Id. at 1075. The district court concluded that Addison presented sufficient evidence to raise a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether Chief Lohner knew about the alleged retaliation and acquiesced to it, and as to whether Chief Lohner directed the actions of his subordinates. Chief Lohner's claim that he cannot be held liable under a supervisory liability theory is therefore unavailing.")

Felarca v. Birgeneau, 891 F.3d 809, 820-21 (9th Cir. 2018) ("We first consider Vice Chancellor Le Grande, Associate Chancellor Williams, and Associate Vice Chancellor Holmes, none of whom was in the police chain of command. Because these administrators had no supervisory authority over the police who allegedly committed the violations, they did not participate in or cause such violations. . . They cannot be supervisors of persons beyond their control. . . Therefore, the district court erred in denying summary judgment to these three administrators. . . We next consider the other UC administrators, Chancellor Birgeneau, Executive Vice Chancellor Breslauer, and Police Chief Celaya, each of whom was in the police chain of command. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, as we must, we assume these officials ordered police to remove the tents, acquiesced in the use of batons to effectuate removal of the tents, and learned that batons had been used during the afternoon protest and injuries had occurred. The question, then, is whether these facts show the degree of personal involvement or causal connection required by our precedents. . . We hold that they do not. Plaintiffs' brief does not describe any specific instance of force against those plaintiffs alleging only supervisory claims. Although some submitted affidavits claiming that police officers used force against them, they have not connected the force applied by each officer to the actions of these administrators. Accordingly, they have failed to establish that the three UC administrators in the police chain of command 'set[ ] in motion a series of acts' that they 'knew or reasonably should have known' would cause the officers 'to inflict a constitutional injury.'. . Without that crucial connection, plaintiffs' argument is nothing more than an attempt to hold the UC administrators liable solely by virtue of their office. That argument fails because 'there is no respondeat superior liability under section 1983.'. .We conclude that Chancellor Birgeneau, Executive Vice Chancellor Breslauer, and Police Chief Celaya did not have sufficient personal involvement in the alleged acts of force. Summary judgment should have been granted by the district court on these claims, and we reverse and remand for the district court to do so.")

Rodriguez v. County of Los Angeles, 891 F.3d 776, 798-99 (9th Cir. 2018) ("As explained above, the deputies' actions violated clearly established law. The question specific to the supervisors is whether they are individually liable for those constitutional violations under principles of supervisory liability. We conclude that they are. A supervisory official is liable under § 1983 so long as 'there exists either (1) his or her personal involvement in the constitutional deprivation, or (2) a sufficient causal connection between the supervisor's wrongful conduct and the constitutional violation.'. . . Thus, a supervisor may 'be liable in his individual capacity for his own culpable action or inaction in the training, supervision, or control of his subordinates; for his acquiescence in the constitutional deprivation; or for conduct that showed a reckless or callous indifference to the rights of others.'. . Sergeants McGrattan, Ohnemus, and Washington concede that they were personally present and directed the deputies' use of force against appellees. Even assuming that their presence and direction of the extraction teams does not constitute 'personal involvement,' there is a 'sufficient causal connection' to establish the sergeants' supervisory liability for their 'own culpable action or inaction in the ... supervision [and] control of' the deputies. . .We do not accept appellants' argument that the nature of the pre-extraction disturbance, standing alone, justified the supervisors' inaction. Long before the incident in question, the Supreme Court established that government officials violate the Eighth Amendment when they use malicious and sadistic force in the course of quelling a prison disturbance, even one that 'indisputably poses significant risks to the safety of inmates and prison staff.'. .To the extent that appellants Cruz and Blasnek stood by and observed the extractions but 'knowingly refus[ed] to terminate' the deputies' unconstitutional acts, . . . they are individually liable for the same reasons as Sergeants McGrattan, Ohnemus, and Washington. Ample evidence—including appellants' own testimony—supports the conclusion that appellants Cruz and Blasnek directed and observed most of the extraction teams. For example, there was evidence that appellant Blasnek 'observe[d] each extraction.'. . .It is not clear from the record before us that appellant Cruz directly observed Nunez's and Rodriguez's extractions. Assuming without deciding that Cruz did not observe these extractions, the jury could still have reasonably found the 'requisite causal connection' to hold Cruz liable for his 'own culpable action or inaction in the training, supervision, or control of his subordinates.'. . The jury could have concluded from evidence in the record, including Olmstead's testimony, that Cruz knowingly participated in creating and maintaining a culture of impunity for officers' use of unconstitutionally excessive force, thereby 'setting in motion a series of acts by' his subordinates that Cruz 'knew or reasonably should have known would cause' the violations of appellees' Eighth Amendment rights. . . The jury could also reasonably have concluded that in disabling or failing to follow procedures used to identify uses of excessive force, and in ensuring that violators escaped punishment, Cruz created an environment where the mechanisms for supervision and control over the use of force operated ineffectively and sometimes not at all. Thus, the jury could also reasonably conclude that Cruz's 'inaction in the training, supervision, or control of his subordinates' provided a basis for supervisory liability.")

Peralta v. Dillard, 744 F.3d 1076, 1095, 1096 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc), cert. denied, 135 S. Ct. 946 (2015) (Christen, J., with whom Rawlinson, M. Smith, and Hurwitz, JJ., join, and with whom Bybee, J, joins as to Parts I, II, and III, dissenting in part and concurring in part) ("The majority holds that Dr. Dillard's failure to review Peralta's appeal—an obligation conferred upon him by California law—shields him from liability. Unchecked, this rule will allow care providers to defeat claims of deliberate indifference by arguing that they had no actual knowledge of the prisoner's condition, even if that lack of knowledge is the result of failing to perform duties expressly assigned to them. The majority not only charts a path that permits prison officials to escape liability by arguing that they have inadequate funds to provide emergency care to inmates, it condones an escape hatch from liability available to officials willing to look the other way or who fail to perform assigned duties that might cause them to gain actual knowledge of an inmate's condition. Neither circuit nor Supreme Court authority permits such a result. . . . Here, a reasonable jury could conclude that some Lancaster prisoners' emergency dental problems would go unaddressed if the only staff dentist qualified to review first level appeals did not actually review them. Dr. Dillard knew he was obligated to review the first level appeals, and he knew he was the only staff dentist qualified to do so. On this record, a jury could conclude that Dr. Dillard did not fulfill his obligations and consciously disregarded a substantial risk of serious harm to the dental needs of prisoners at Lancaster. The law does not require that Dr. Dillard intended harm to result. Judgment as a matter of law was inappropriate.")

Lemire v. California Dept. of Corrections and Rehabilitation, 726 F.3d 1062, 1085 (9th Cir. 2013) ("Here, the evidence is undisputed that Carey and Tranquina complied with the order in Coleman and implemented a CPR policy at CSP–Solano. Plaintiffs have presented no evidence that either Carey or Tranquina were on notice that staff at CSP–Solano were not complying with the CPR policy, or that some staff were unaware of the policy. While at least two staff members, MTA Hak and RN Hill, were not trained on the policy until a day after St. Jovite died, there is no evidence that Carey or Tranquina knew or had reason to know of this lapse. . . Plaintiffs also argue that the training provided was deficient because it allowed custody staff to acquiesce to medical staff once on the scene. Plaintiffs have offered no evidence, however, that this interpretation of the Dovey Memo is impermissible. Nor do they show that Carey was deliberately indifferent in interpreting the policy in that way, requiring custodial staff to provide CPR to inmates but to allow medical staff to take primary responsibility once on the scene. We affirm the grant of summary judgment as to Carey and Tranquina on the failure to train claims.")

Maxwell v. County of San Diego, 708 F.3d 1075, 1086 (9th Cir. 2013) ("We must decide whether to grant summary judgment to Captain Reynolds and Lieutenant Salazar alone. Reynolds and Salazar did not directly participate in any of the allegedly unlawful acts. The Maxwells contend that summary judgment is nonetheless inappropriate because a jury could reasonably find Reynolds and Salazar liable as the ranking officers present. We agree. A supervisor is liable under § 1983 for a subordinate's constitutional violations 'if the supervisor participated in or directed the violations, or knew of the violations and failed to act to prevent them.' Taylor v. List, 880 F.2d 1040, 1045 (9th Cir.1989). Reynolds and Salazar testified that they were mere observers who stayed at the end of the Maxwells' driveway. But based on the Maxwells' version of the facts, which we must accept as true in this appeal, we draw the inference that Reynolds and Salazar tacitly endorsed the other Sheriff's officers' actions by failing to intervene. It is undisputed that Reynolds and Salazar were aware of the Maxwells' detention and witnessed at least part of Jim's arrest and beating. Reynolds testified that he heard Kneeshaw yelling 'stop, stop, stop' right before the latter pepper-sprayed and struck Jim. Salazar testified that he heard a 'commotion' at that time. On this appeal we do not weigh the evidence to determine whether Reynolds and Salazar's stated reasons for not intervening are plausible.")

Maxwell v. County of San Diego, 708 F.3d 1075, 1097, 1098 (9th Cir. 2013) (Ikuta, J., dissenting) ("[E]ven if the majority were correct that the deputies violated clearly established law, it is impossible to conclude that Captain Gregory Reynolds and Lieutenant Anthony Salazar could be held liable merely because they were standing behind yellow crime tape at the scene. We have long held that officers may not be held liable 'merely for being present at the scene of an alleged unlawful act' or for being a member of the same team as the wrongdoers. . . More recently, Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), clarified that there is no respondeat superior liability under § 1983. Rather, a government official may be held liable only for the official's own conduct. . . To bring a § 1983 action against a supervisor, the plaintiff must show: (1) the supervisor breached a legal duty to the plaintiff, see Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1207–08(9th Cir.2011); (2) the breach of duty was 'the proximate cause' of the plaintiff's constitutional injury, . . . and (3) the supervisor had at least the same level of mens rea in carrying out his superintendent responsibilities as would be required for a direct violation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights . . . . Here the Maxwells do not allege that Reynolds and Salazar took any affirmative acts to set in motion the allegedly unconstitutional acts of their subordinates, nor do they present any evidence that Reynolds and Salazar knew about their subordinates' conduct in delaying the ambulance or detaining and separating the Maxwells. Moreover, they do not dispute that neither Reynolds nor Salazar crossed the yellow tape across the Maxwells' driveway that restricted entry to the crime scene. The Maxwells allege merely that Reynolds and Salazar (1) were the highest ranking officials at the scene, (2) could observe the crime scene from the driveway, and (3) heard Kneeshaw yelling at Jim Maxwell to 'stop, stop' just before using pepper spray and striking Jim with his baton. These facts are insufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact that Reynolds and Salazar breached a legal duty to the Maxwells, that they were the proximate cause of the Maxwells' constitutional injuries, or that they acted with the requisite state of mind. First, the Maxwells do not allege that the supervisors were even aware that the deputies delayed Kristin's departure, let alone that the supervisors acted with deliberate indifference. Nor can we infer, solely based on geographic proximity, that Reynolds and Salazar knew or reasonably should have known that the other Sheriff's deputies had forcibly detained the Maxwells and prevented them from seeing their daughter and each other, and that there were no exigent circumstances to justify the detention. This is especially true given that Reynolds and Salazar never entered the crime scene. Nor is there any evidence 'of a specific policy implemented by the Defendants or a specific event or events instigated by the Defendants that led to these purportedly unconstitutional' seizures. . . . As in Hydrick, 'the factual allegations in Plaintiffs' complaint resemble the "bald" and "conclusory" allegations in Iqbal, instead of the detailed factual allegations in Starr.'. . It is therefore clear that Reynolds and Salazar cannot be held liable for the alleged constitutional violations of other deputies on the scene. . . .It is a truism that 'tragic facts make bad law.'. . Nevertheless, we may not furnish a cause of action where the law does not supply one. . . The deputies arriving at the Maxwells' residence faced a chaotic scene: a woman had been shot in the jaw; the perpetrator was still in the house; multiple ambulances and paramedics were responding to the scene; and frantic relatives were milling about. From the perspective of the deputies, it was more than merely reasonable to take steps to secure the crime scene and separate the witnesses—it was their duty. The majority has not pointed to a single case that clearly establishes that the deputies' actions here violated the Maxwells' constitutional rights. Under existing case law, the deputies are entitled to qualified immunity for their actions. I therefore respectfully dissent.")

OSU Student Alliance v. Ray, 699 F.3d 1053, 1058, 1070, 1071-78 & nn. 15, 18 (9th Cir. 2012) ("Plaintiffs, the Liberty's student editors and student publishers, sue under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. We have little trouble finding constitutional violations. The real issue is whether the complaint properly ties the violations to the four individual defendants, who are senior University officials. Plaintiffs confront a familiar problem: they do not know the identities of the employees who threw the newsbins into the trash heap, and they do not know which University official devised the unwritten policy or which official gave the order to confiscate the bins. Plaintiffs do know, however, that three of the four defendants participated in the decision to deny them permission to place bins outside of the designated areas after the confiscation. We conclude that the complaint states claims against those three defendants based on this post-confiscation decision. We also hold that the complaint states a claim against one defendant—the Director of Facilities Services—based on the confiscation itself. . . . Iqbal emphasizes that a constitutional tort plaintiff must allege that every government defendant—supervisor or subordinate—acted with the state of mind required by the underlying constitutional provision. . . . The claims against President Ray and Vice President McCambridge require closer examination. According to the complaint, neither defendant actually made the decision to deny plaintiffs permission to place their newsbins throughout campus;

Martorello did that. Both Ray and McCambridge, however, oversaw Martorello's decision-making process and knowingly acquiesced in his ultimate decision. . . . According to the complaint, then, Ray and McCambridge knew that their subordinate, Martorello, was applying the previously unannounced and unenforced policy against the Liberty, but not against any of the other off-campus newspaper, and they did nothing to stop him. The question is whether allegations of supervisory knowledge and acquiescence suffice to state claims for speech-based First Amendment and equal protection violations. . . . Iqbal does not answer this question. That case holds that a plaintiff does not state invidious racial discrimination claims against supervisory defendants by pleading that the supervisors knowingly acquiesced in discrimination perpetrated by subordinates, but this holding was based on the elements of invidious discrimination in particular, not on some blanket requirement that applies equally to all constitutional tort claims. Iqbal makes crystal clear that constitutional tort claims against supervisory defendants turn on the requirements of the particular claim—and, more specifically, on the state of mind required by the particular claim—not on a generally applicable concept of supervisory liability. . . . Put simply, constitutional tort liability after Iqbal depends primarily on the requisite mental state for the violation alleged. . . . Here, where President Ray and Vice President McCambridge are alleged to have knowingly acquiesced in their subordinate Martorello's violation of plaintiffs' free speech rights under the First and Fourteenth Amendments, we must decide whether knowledge (as opposed to purpose) satisfies the mental state requirement for free speech violations. With some notable exceptions, courts before Iqbal generally did not have to determine the required mental state for constitutional violations, particularly not free speech violations. A uniform mental state requirement applied to supervisors: so long as they acted with deliberate indifference, they were liable, regardless of the specific constitutional right at issue. . . . As for the subordinate officials who violate constitutional rights directly—the officer who shoots the suspect, the Facilities Department employee who junks the newsbins—they act intentionally in most cases. Perhaps they do not always know that their actions are unconstitutional (hence, the qualified immunity defense), but they do intend to take the violative action. Thus, before Iqbal, fixing the mental state requirement for a particular constitutional provision was most often unnecessary. The line officers generally satisfied every mental state because they acted intentionally, and supervisors were subject to a uniform mental state requirement divorced from the underlying claim. . . By abrogating the second half of this framework, however, Iqbal places new weight on the state of mind requirement for constitutional torts. Now claims against supervisors present problems that claims against subordinates typically do not: must the supervisor have harbored the specific intent to subject the plaintiff to the injury-causing act, or does knowledge or some lesser mental state suffice? . . . . We understand Iqbal's language eliminating the doctrine of "supervisory liability" to overrule circuit case law that, following City of Canton v. Harris, had applied a uniform test for supervisory liability across the spectrum of constitutional claims. . . . Iqbal means that constitutional claims against supervisors must satisfy the elements of the underlying claim, including the mental state element, and not merely a threshold supervisory test that is divorced from the underlying claim. Iqbal does not stand for the absurd proposition that government officials are never liable under § 1983 and Bivens for actions that they take as supervisors. . . . Iqbal holds simply that a supervisor's liability, like any government official's liability, depends first on whether he or she breached the duty imposed by the relevant constitutional provision. . . .For two reasons, we conclude that knowledge suffices for free speech violations under the First and Fourteenth Amendments. . . First, it is black-letter law that government need not target speech in order to violate the Free Speech Clause. . . . In other words, the government may violate the speech clause even if it acts without the purpose of curtailing speech. Free speech claims do not require specific intent. Second, only in limited situations has the Supreme Court found constitutional torts to require specific intent. We know of three examples: (1) due process claims for injuries caused by a high-speed chase, Cnty. of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833, 836, 118 S.Ct. 1708, 140 L.Ed.2d 1043 (1998); (2) Eighth Amendment claims for injuries suffered during the response to a prison disturbance, Whitley v. Albers, 475 U.S. 312, 320–21, 106 S.Ct. 1078, 89 L.Ed.2d 251 (1986); and (3) invidious discrimination under the Equal Protection Clause and the First Amendment Free Exercise Clause. . . . For these two reasons—because Supreme Court case law indicates that free speech violations do not require specific intent, and because the rationales that have led the Court to read specific intent requirements into certain other constitutional tort claims do not apply in the free speech context—we conclude that allegations of facts that demonstrate an immediate supervisor knew about the subordinate violating another's federal constitutional right to free speech, and acquiescence in that violation, suffice to state free speech violations under the First and Fourteenth Amendments. The complaint alleges that Ray and McCambridge knowingly acquiesced in Martorello's decision to continue restricting the Liberty's circulation under the standardless, unwritten newsbin policy. They stood superior to Martorello; they knew that Martorello denied plaintiffs' publication the same access to the campus that the Barometer received; and they did nothing. The complaint therefore states First Amendment and Equal Protection claims against Ray and McCambridge. [footnote observing that "same analysis controls the First Amendment and speech-based equal protection claims. Unlike equal protection claims for racial or religious discrimination, speech-based equal protection claims do not require a showing that the plaintiff was singled out because of a particular characteristic. Rather, speech-based equal protection claims require only a showing that the plaintiff was subjected to differential treatment that trenched upon a fundamental right."] . . . . The allegations portray Martorello as the University official responsible for enforcing the unwritten newsbin policy. Thus, the question on which plaintiffs' due process claim against Martorello turns is not whether knowledge and acquiescence, deliberate indifference, or some lesser mental state meets the state of mind requirement for the claim, but rather whether an official's administration and oversight of an unconstitutional policy meets the required threshold. The Tenth Circuit confronted this question in Dodds, where the issue was whether the complaint stated a § 1983 claim against a Sheriff for a due process violation that occurred when jail officials denied the plaintiff the opportunity to post bail for several days after his arrest. . . .We agree with Dodds. When a supervisory official advances or manages a policy that instructs its adherents to violate constitutional rights, then the official specifically intends for such violations to occur. Claims against such supervisory officials, therefore, do not fail on the state of mind requirement, be it intent, knowledge, or deliberate indifference. . . . Advancing a policy that requires subordinates to commit constitutional violations is always enough for § 1983 liability, no matter what the required mental state, so long as the policy proximately causes the harm—that is, so long as the plaintiff's constitutional injury in fact occurs pursuant to the policy. . . .Thus, because it alleges that Martorello was in charge of the newsbin policy and that the confiscation without notice was conducted pursuant to that policy, the complaint pleads a due process claim against Martorello. We note two distinctions from the invidious discrimination claims that Iqbal rejected. First, Javaid Iqbal's complaint did not 'contain facts plausibly showing that [Ashcroft and Mueller] purposefully adopted a policy of classifying post–September–11 detainees as "of high interest" because of their race, religion, or national origin.'. . Simply put, the complaint did not tie the alleged unconstitutional conduct—purposeful discrimination by race or religion—to any policy that the supervisory defendants advanced. This case is different. Through concrete allegations, the complaint ties the unconstitutional confiscation of the newsbins to the policy that Martorello administered. Second, the small scope of Martorello's operation matters. It is one thing to allege that, because some low-level government officers engaged in purposeful discrimination, a cabinet-level official must also have engaged in purposeful discrimination. But it is another thing to say that the director of a university facilities department had a hand in the unconstitutional manner in which his employees enforced a department-wide policy. The second claim is plausible. Like all claims at the pleading stage, of course, it requires development. . . .The complaint does not tie President Ray and Vice President McCambridge to the confiscation, through the policy or any other means. Unlike Martorello, these officials are not alleged to have run the department that enforced the policy or to have had any familiarity with the policy's requirements before the confiscation. . . . Therefore, the complaint does not state due process claims against these defendants.")

OSU Student Alliance v. Ray, 699 F.3d 1053, 1079-81 (9th Cir. 2012) (Ikuta, J., dissenting in part) ("Simply put, to state a claim under § 1983 against a government official, a plaintiff must allege that the official's 'own misconduct' violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . What the plaintiff must plead and prove 'will vary with the constitutional provision at issue,' based on the Supreme Court's decisions regarding what conduct violates that particular provision. . . But the Supreme Court is quite clear that 'supervisory liability' is a 'misnomer' in § 1983 cases, and that officials 'may not be held accountable for the misdeeds of their agents.'. . The majority muddles and obscures this simple principle. Plaintiffs' complaint adequately alleges that Vincent Martorello, OSU's facilities services director, violated their First Amendment rights under § 1983 by personally and arbitrarily limiting The Liberty's distribution on campus. But their complaint nowhere indicates how OSU's president, Ed Ray, and the vice president of finance and administration, Mark McCambridge, also violated those rights through their 'own individual actions.'. . The majority considers it sufficient that Ray and McCambridge 'knowingly acquiesced' in Martorello's actions. . . Under Iqbal, however, an official is not liable under § 1983 for simply knowing about a lower ranking employee's misconduct and failing to act. In holding otherwise, the majority resurrects the very kind of supervisory liability that Iqbal interred. I disagree with this departure from Iqbal.. . . In sum, for an official's inaction to deprive plaintiff of constitutional rights under color of law, the official must fail to act when the law requires action. . . .Neither exception applies here. Plaintiffs do not allege that Ray or McCambridge had a legal duty to stop Martorello from continued enforcement of his newsbin policy, that they exerted any control over the decisions of the facilities department, or that their failure to intervene in the dispute between Plaintiffs and Martorello violated any law, statute, or even university requirement. . . . Nor do plaintiffs allege that either Ray and McCambridge personally took an action that deprived plaintiffs of their constitutional rights. . . . In sum, the complaint merely recites 'the organizational role of the[ ] supervisors,' and makes 'no allegation that the supervisors took any specific action resulting in' the constitutional violation. Moss v. U.S. Secret Serv. (Moss II), 675 F.3d 1213, 1231 (9th Cir.2012) (emphasis in original). This is not sufficient to state a claim under § 1983. The majority misses this central point because it focuses solely on one component of a § 1983 claim: the proper mental state for First Amendment claims. The majority's detailed and elaborate discussion of this issue. . . boils down to the simple, though erroneous, proposition that a plaintiff can adequately allege a § 1983 claim for violation of that plaintiff's First Amendment rights merely by alleging that the official had knowledge of such violation. The majority brushes aside § 1983's requirement that a defendant engage in conduct that 'subjects, or causes to be subjected' a plaintiff to a deprivation of constitutional rights, and instead holds it suffices if a supervisory official 'knowingly acquiesces' in the misconduct of a lower ranking employee. . . But of course, 'acquiescence' is merely a way to describe knowledge and inaction. . . Further, the majority erroneously implies that an allegation of 'knowledge' suffices to establish the causation element of a § 1983 claim, namely, that the official caused the plaintiff's injury. The majority relies on a novel and somewhat impenetrable formulation that 'duty' is generally equivalent to acting with a specified state of mind, and this duty 'eclipses' proximate cause where the plaintiff acts with knowledge that a violation may occur. . . Because (in the majority's view) the mental state of knowledge stands in for both misconduct and causation, the plaintiffs can state a § 1983 claim by alleging only that a supervisor had knowledge of a subordinate's misconduct and took no action.This is not enough. While plaintiffs here must plead the elements of a First Amendment violation, including mental state, they must also plead that each official acted in a way that 'subject[ed], or cause[d] to be subjected,' a citizen to the deprivation of First Amendment rights. . . Plaintiffs here did not allege that Ray or McCambridge engaged in any misconduct or that these officials caused their injury. Therefore, the complaint in its current form does not meet the bare minimum for stating a First Amendment claim under § 1983 against Ray or McCambridge, and this claim must be dismissed.")

Lacey v. Maricopa County, 693 F.3d 896, 916 (9th Cir. 2012) (en banc) ("For an official to be liable for another actor's depriving a third party of his constitutional rights, that official must have at least the same level of intent as would be required if the official were directly to deprive the third party of his constitutional rights. . . With this proviso, a supervisor can be held liable for the constitutional torts of his subordinates if 'a sufficient causal connection between the supervisor's wrongful conduct and the constitutional violation' exists, Starr, 652 F.3d at 1207(quoting Hansen v. Black, 885 F.2d 642, 646 (9th Cir.1989)); see Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 677. But an official with no official authority over another actor can also be liable for that actor's conduct if he induces that actor to violate a third party's constitutional rights, provided that the official possesses the requisite intent, such as retaliatory animus. See Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 262 (2006); see also Harris v. Roderick, 126 F.3d 1189, 1196–97, 1204 (9th Cir.1997) (finding liability for both supervisory and nonsupervisory officials). . . . In claims under the Eighth Amendment, we have recognized that a supervisor also may be accountable under § 1983 if he was deliberately indifferent to unconstitutional conditions in the prison. See Starr, 652 F.3d at 1205.")

Williams v. County of San Mateo, No. 08–17747, 2012 WL 2513962, at *1 (9th Cir. July 2, 2012) (not published) ("Williams has also raised a genuine issue of material fact as to Sheriff Horsley's supervisory liability, because a jury could reasonably find that the Sheriff was aware of the policies and practices concerning the detention of civil detainees. . . As we have previously stated, '"acquiescence or culpable indifference" may suffice to show that a supervisor "personally played a role in the alleged constitutional violations."'. . The Trindle affidavit presents evidence that civil detainees were subjected to the same conditions as criminal detainees. This evidence plausibly suggests that Sheriff Horsley, as the person 'required by statute to take charge of and keep the county jail and the prisoners in it,' . . . acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates.")

Williams v. County of San Mateo, No. 08–17747, 2012 WL 2513962, at *2 (9th Cir. July 2, 2012) (Ikuta, J., dissenting in part) (not published) ("Because a supervisor who lacks knowledge of any risk to inmate health or safety cannot be deliberately indifferent to such risk, the majority errs in concluding that Williams raised a genuine issue of material fact as to Sheriff Horsley's liability. We use a 'deliberate indifference' standard to analyze claims that a prison official violated pretrial detainees' constitutional rights by subjecting them to punitive treatment. . . Under this standard, a pretrial detainee must show that the prison official both was '"aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists,"' and also actually drew that inference. . . The Supreme Court has made it clear that government officials are not liable for the misdeeds of their subordinates; rather, officials can be held liable under § 1983 only for their 'own individual actions' that violate the Constitution. . . Here, Williams has not raised a genuine issue of material fact that Sheriff Horsley evinced 'deliberate indifference.' There is no evidence that Sheriff Horsley personally reviewed Williams's grievances or received any notice that civil detainees were being treated the same as or less considerately than criminal detainees. . . Although the majority relies on the Trindle affidavit, . . .this offers no assistance, because the affidavit is entirely silent regarding the state of Sheriff Horsley's knowledge. In fact, Williams fails to cite any evidence that Sheriff Horsley was actually 'aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn' that pretrial detainees were receiving inappropriate treatment, let alone that he actually drew that inference. . . In short, Williams's claims against Sheriff Horsley are based solely on a theory of respondeat superior: because Sheriff Horsley was the ultimate supervisor of the prison system, he can be held liable. Because the Supreme Court has made clear that a supervisor cannot be held vicariously liable in this manner, Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 676, I respectfully dissent.").

Chavez v. U.S., 683 F.3d 1102, 1107-12 (9th Cir. 2012) ("After the Ninth Circuit reinstated plaintiffs' Bivens claims against the supervisory defendants, the Supreme Court decided Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). In light of Iqbal, the supervisory defendants filed a motion for judgment on the pleadings under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(c). The district court denied the motion, finding that the supervisory defendants failed to provide a plausible nondiscriminatory explanation for the alleged stops. Moreover, the district court held that plaintiffs did not need to allege that the supervisory defendants directly participated in constitutional violations. Instead, citing Larez v. City of Los Angeles, 946 F.2d 630, 646 (9th Cir.1991), the district court held that the plaintiffs had plausibly alleged that the supervisory defendants had either knowingly refused to terminate a series of acts they reasonably should have known would cause constitutional violations, acquiesced in constitutional deprivations by subordinates, or displayed reckless or callous indifference to others' rights. The supervisory defendants now appeal from that decision. . . . Relying on Iqbal, the supervisory defendants invite the Court to hold that the Fourth Amendment, like the Fifth Amendment, requires plaintiffs to allege that supervisors acted with a 'discriminatory purpose.' This argument, however, misreads Iqbal. In Iqbal, the Supreme Court did not require allegations of 'discriminatory purpose' in order to render supervisors liable for any constitutional violation by their subordinates. Rather, the Supreme Court noted that plaintiffs cannot base a claim against supervisors on a theory of respondeat superior, and must instead show that the supervisors, 'through [their] own individual actions, ha[ve] violated the Constitution.'. . Because a plaintiff claiming invidious discrimination under the Fifth Amendment must allege facts showing that officers acted with a 'discriminatory purpose,' allowing that Fifth Amendment claim to proceed against a supervisor in the absence of a particularized showing of such a purpose would, in effect, render the supervisor vicariously liable for her subordinates' intent. . .The requirement that a plaintiff allege a 'discriminatory purpose,' then, derived from the Fifth Amendment rather than from the fact that the plaintiff pled claims against supervisors. We see nothing in Iqbal indicating that the Supreme Court intended to overturn longstanding case law by adding a 'discriminatory purpose' requirement to a Fourth Amendment claim against supervisors. See Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1207 (9th Cir.2011) (reaching same conclusion for an Eighth Amendment claim). . . .Because Iqbal requires courts to apply an equivalent standard to supervisors and subordinates, we hold that, taking qualified immunity into account, a supervisor faces liability under the Fourth Amendment only where 'it would be clear to a reasonable [supervisor] that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' A lower standard would impose vicarious liability on supervisors based on their subordinates' clearly unlawful conduct. Because the plaintiffs' complaint, as described below, does not come close to meeting this standard except with respect to defendant Hunt, who faces liability for his direct participation in the stops, we leave to future cases the determination of what conduct by supervisors may qualify as clearly unlawful. Judged under the standard described above, plaintiffs' complaint fails to state a Fourth Amendment claim against any supervisory defendant except Hunt. Turning first to the supervisory defendants other than Hunt, even assuming arguendo that the plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged that Border Patrol agents conducted stops without reasonable suspicion, plaintiffs have not alleged facts that would allow a court to draw a reasonable inference that a reasonable supervisor in these defendants' situations would have found their conduct to be clearly unlawful. The Court discounts, as it must, the plaintiffs' wholly conclusory allegation that the supervisory defendants 'personally reviewed and, thus, knowingly ordered, directed, sanctioned or permitted' the allegedly unconstitutional stops. Having done so, the remaining allegations do not plausibly suggest that these supervisors clearly should have regarded their conduct as unlawful. . . . In contrast to the other supervisory defendants, Hunt faces liability not only as a supervisor, but also for his direct participation in the stops. As noted above, the Fourth Amendment prohibits an officer on roving patrol near the border from stopping a vehicle in the absence of an objectively 'reasonable suspicion' that the 'particular vehicle may contain aliens who are illegally in the country' or is involved in some other criminal conduct. . . . Here, plaintiffs plausibly allege conduct by Hunt that would be a clear Fourth Amendment violation to a reasonable officer. Plaintiffs allege that, because they traveled at highway speeds, Border Patrol agents could not make the particularized observations necessary to form a reasonable suspicion that plaintiffs' shuttle contained aliens. They further allege that Border Patrol agents instead focused principally on 'the Latin, Hispanic or Mexican appearance of drivers and/or other occupants of vehicles,' a characteristic that, under Brignoni–Ponce, clearly does not give rise to reasonable suspicion. . . . Based on the facts set forth in the complaint, we hold that plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that Hunt stopped them based solely on their and their passengers' 'apparent Mexican ancestry,' a characteristic that a reasonable officer clearly would have known did not create reasonable suspicion. Accordingly, the complaint adequately states a claim against Hunt for Fourth Amendment violations, and, at least on the facts alleged, qualified immunity does not shield Hunt from liability. . . .In sum, we hold that, to state a claim against supervising officers for causing their subordinates' purported violations of the Fourth Amendment, a complaint must allege facts that plausibly suggest that a reasonable supervisor would find it 'clear' that the defendant's conduct was 'unlawful in the situation he confronted.' Applying that standard to this case, we hold that plaintiffs' complaint fails to state a claim against any supervisory defendant other than Hunt, who directly participated in the alleged underlying violations. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's ruling with respect to Hunt, but reverse it and direct the entry of final judgment with respect to Ziglar, Aguilar, Obregon, Felix Chavez, and Campbell.")

Chavez v. U.S., 683 F.3d 1102, 1113 (9th Cir. 2012) (Wallace, J., concurring) ("I fully concur in the opinion and judgment, but I would have preferred to resolve this appeal without addressing the effect of Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), on supervisory liability in the Fourth Amendment context. This is because even under the pre-Iqbal standard described in Larez v. City of Los Angeles, 946 F.2d 630, 646 (9th Cir.1991), plaintiffs' claims meet the same fate described in the panel's opinion for substantially the same reasons. Once we strip away plaintiffs' conclusory allegations as mandated by the section of Iqbal addressing general pleading standards, . . . there are no factual allegations alleging that any of the supervisory defendants except Hunt knew or reasonably should have known that their conduct would cause others to inflict a constitutional injury. . . Our court recently reasoned that it did not need to consider the debate regarding the extent to which the Ninth Circuit's pre-Iqbal supervisory liability standard remains good law because the complaint's allegations fell even under the old standard. Moss v. United States Secret Serv., 675 F.3d 1213, 1231 n.6 (9th Cir.2012). Similarly, at least eight opinions from other circuit courts have explicitly recognized that Iqbal might restrict supervisory liability, but have refused to rule on the extent of the restriction when the question could be avoided. [collecting cases] I would choose to follow an approach signaled by a prior Ninth Circuit opinion whenever we can because it makes good sense and assists us to keep our law intact. That so many other circuit opinions have also taken the same course strongly suggests that it would be a better practice to do so here. Although I do not disagree with the standard we adopt in our opinion, I would have preferred to follow the wisdom of prior circuit opinions (including our own) and resolve this case without adopting any new standard at all.")

Henry A. v. Willden, 678 F.3d 991, 1003-05 (9th Cir. 2012) ("[T]he State defendants argue that plaintiffs have failed to state a claim against them for supervisory liability. We recently reaffirmed that a plaintiff may state a claim under § 1983 against a supervisor for deliberate indifference. Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202 (9th Cir.2011). . . . After thoroughly examining the plaintiffs' complaint, we agree that there are few specific allegations against the State defendants. Most of the allegations in the complaint simply reference 'Defendants,' without specifying whether the conduct at issue was committed by the named State officials, County officials, or the 'John Doe' supervisors or caseworkers. . . .The allegations that do expressly reference the State defendants are too general to state a claim for supervisory liability. In Starr v. Baca, the plaintiff alleged that Sheriff Baca himself had been given clear notice by the Department of Justice of the specific unconstitutional conditions in the jails; that the Sheriff received numerous reports documenting inmate violence caused by the unconstitutional conduct of his deputies; and that the Sheriff ultimately acquiesced in these constitutional violations. . . In contrast, the allegations here claim that the agencies directed by Willden and Comeaux have oversight responsibility for Clark County's foster care system and are required to ensure that Clark County is complying with state and federal law. The complaint also alleges that all of the defendants had knowledge of independent reports documenting the systemic failures of foster care in Nevada. But it does not allege that Willden or Comeaux had any personal knowledge of the specific constitutional violations that led to Plaintiffs' injuries, or that they had any direct responsibility to train or supervise the caseworkers employed by Clark County. The allegations that come closest to pleading personal involvement by Willden and Comeaux concern the failure to provide medical records to the children and their foster parents in order to facilitate their medical care. . . .When read together, these allegations suggest that there may be a causal connection between the State defendants' failure to share these medical records and the injuries suffered by plaintiffs such as Henry, who received a dangerous combination of prescription drugs because his medical records were not given to his treatment providers. But even if the complaint in its current form fails to state a claim against the State officials for substantive due process violations, the district court abused its discretion by failing to give the plaintiffs an opportunity to amend their complaint. . . . Here, Plaintiffs offered to amend their complaint if necessary in their response to the motion to dismiss, but the district court did not grant leave to amend and did not provide any reasons for its decision. As we have already concluded, the complaint adequately pleads violations of Plaintiffs' clearly established substantive due process rights, and it plausibly suggests an entitlement to relief from at least some of the defendants. Where the complaint falls short in some places is tying its factual allegations to particular defendants. But this type of deficiency can likely be cured by amending the complaint, and there is certainly no evidence to suggest that allowing amendment would be futile. Therefore, on remand, Plaintiffs should be given an opportunity to amend their substantive due process claims. We note that in any future proceedings in the district court, each defendant's liability must be analyzed individually using the proper standard, whether that individual is a line-level caseworker, a supervisory official, or a municipality.")

Hydrick v. Hunter, 669 F.3d 937, 939-42 (9th Cir. 2012) (on remand from the Supreme Court for reconsideration in light of Ashcroft v. Iqbal) ("As discussed in more detail below, after reviewing the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal, the parties' supplemental briefs, and our court's recent decision in Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202 (9th Cir.2011), we now hold that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' claims for money damages. The conclusory allegations in Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint are insufficient to establish Defendants' individual liability for money damages. Our holding, however, is limited. Qualified immunity is only an immunity from a suit for money damages, and does not provide immunity from a suit seeking declaratory or injunctive relief. . . Accordingly, on remand, the Plaintiffs may proceed with their claims for declaratory and injunctive relief. . . .As discussed in greater detail below, in the case before us, the factual allegations in Plaintiffs' complaint resemble the 'bald' and 'conclusory' allegations in Iqbal, instead of the detailed factual allegations in Starr. . . Accordingly, Plaintiffs pleaded insufficient facts to establish 'plausible' claims against the Defendants in their individual capacities and the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .The Plaintiffs' complaint proceeds under two theories of liability against the Defendants in their individual capacities. Plaintiffs allege that the Defendants are: (a) liable for their own conduct because they created policies and procedures that violated the Plaintiffs' constitutional rights; and, (b) liable because they were deliberately indifferent to their subordinates' constitutional violations. . . Plaintiffs' allegations fail to state claims against Defendants in their individual capacities under either theory of liability. Plaintiffs' complaint is based on conclusory allegations and generalities, without any allegation of the specific wrong-doing by each Defendant. For example, Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim alleges that Defendants' 'policies, practices and customs subject [Plaintiffs] to unreasonable searches; searches as a form of punishment; degrading public strip searches; improper seizures of personal belongings; and the use of unreasonable force and physical restraints.' But there is no allegation of a specific policy implemented by the Defendants or a specific event or events instigated by the Defendants that led to these purportedly unconstitutional searches. Plaintiffs' remaining claims suffer from the same infirmities. Plaintiffs' First Amendment retaliation claim alleges that 'Defendants have personal knowledge of retaliation against [the Plaintiffs] for participation in lawsuits, but Defendants' policies, practices and customs permit and encourage retaliation.' But there is no allegation of a specific policy or custom, nor are there specific allegations regarding each Defendant's purported knowledge of the retaliation. The remainder of Plaintiffs' claims are likewise devoid of specifics. The absence of specifics is significant because, to establish individual liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, 'a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948. Even under a 'deliberate indifference' theory of individual liability, the Plaintiffs must still allege sufficient facts to plausibly establish the defendant's 'knowledge of' and 'acquiescence in' the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates. Starr, 652 F.3d at 1206–07. In short, Plaintiffs' 'bald' and 'conclusory' allegations are insufficient to establish individual liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.")

Starr v. County of Los Angeles, 659 F.3d 850, 851-55 (9th Cir. 2011) (O'Scannlain, Circuit Judge, joined by Gould, Tallman, Bybee, Callahan, Bea, M. Smith, and Ikuta, JJ., dissenting from the order denying rehearing en banc), cert. denied, 132 S. Ct. 2101 (2012) ("A mere two years ago, the Supreme Court rejected the argument that Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), applied only to antitrust and similarly complex commercial cases, stating that its 'decision in Twombly expounded the pleading standard for "all civil actions."' Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1953 (2009) (quoting Fed.R.Civ.P. 1). The panel majority in this case disregards that holding, suggesting instead that the Twombly/ Iqbal standard does not apply to all civil actions. In reaching this erroneous result, the panel also resurrects a theory of supervisory liability for constitutional torts that the Supreme Court has foreclosed. I therefore must dissent from the regrettable failure of our court to rehear this case en banc. . . . Though the majority ultimately professes to apply something like the Iqbal plausibility standard, in the end, it applies what might be deemed 'Iqbal Lite' ("Same insufficient complaints, fewer dismissals!"). The majority states that a complaint's factual allegations must 'plausibly suggest an entitlement to relief,'. . . but it wrongly requires that the determination of whether this standard is met be made in light of whether it would be 'unfair to require the opposing party to be subjected to the expense of discovery and continued litigation.'. . The majority thus creates a sliding scale in which the greater the anticipated discovery expense, the greater the showing of plausibility that is required. The Supreme Court has rejected such an approach. . . Such a reading is nothing more than a thinly veiled artifice to confine Twombly to cases in which discovery is especially costly. In doing so, the majority inexplicably muddies the waters made crystal clear by the Supreme Court's pronouncement in Iqbal. Today's unfortunate decision yet again places the Ninth Circuit on the wrong side of a circuit split. Although courts have struggled to determine precisely what Iqbal requires, see, e.g ., Swanson v. Citibank, N.A., 614 F.3d 400, 403 (7th Cir.2010), there was-until now-no dispute that Twombly/ Iqbal is the standard that applies. . . The panel majority's decision leaves our district court judges in the unenviable position of reconciling the instructions of the Supreme Court with those we announce today. The panel majority's analysis of the facts demonstrates what little resemblance its standard bears to the rule articulated in Twombly and Iqbal. Starr alleges an Eighth Amendment claim based on the conditions of his confinement. He therefore must plead 'factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference,' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949, that he was injured as a result of 'an excessive risk to inmate health or safety' that Sheriff Baca 'kn[ew] of and disregard[ed],' Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 837 (1994). Sheriff Baca must have been both 'aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and he must also [have] draw[n] the inference.' Id. (emphasis added). The majority contends that 'the factual allegations in Starr's complaint plausibly suggest that Sheriff Baca acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates, and was thereby deliberately indifferent to the danger posed to Starr.'. . But the majority never explains − indeed, cannot explain-how it is able to draw this inference. The facts pleaded by Starr do not plausibly suggest that Baca 'kn[ew] of and disregard[ed] an excessive risk to inmate health or safety.' Brennan, 511 U.S. at 837. To be sure, a possible explanation for ten varied and discrete incidents of inmate-on-inmate violence amongst a prison population of 20,000 might be that the leader of the prison bureaucracy is callously indifferent to such violence. But possible is not sufficient. Twombly and Iqbal require a plausible explanation and held that an explanation is not plausible when an '"obvious alternative explanation"' exists. . . Here, 'the obvious alternative explanation' for the inmate-on-inmate assaults is that it is virtually impossible for an administrator in charge of 20,000 inmates − many of whom are violent − to ensure that they never assault each other. Starr's complaint amounts to nothing more than a general indictment of the LASD. The LASD is the largest sheriff's department in the nation. With a budget of $2.4 billion and a staff of 18,000, it is charged with directly protecting over 4 million people in the 9.8 million person county. It also provides critical support to city police departments by housing all of Los Angeles County's nearly 20,000 locally jailed inmates. See Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department, http://lasheriff.org/aboutlasd/execs.html. While size alone does not absolve its leadership of responsibility for its shortcomings, it does underscore the difficulty of attributing any specific incident to the deliberate indifference of the official at the top of this large bureaucracy. . . These ten incidents suggest-at most-that Sheriff Baca is an ineffective leader. They do not plausibly suggest that he is deliberately indifferent to inmate violence. . . . The majority's conclusion has the effect of inserting respondeat superior liability into section 1983 despite the Supreme Court's admonition that 'a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. . . As a result, even assuming that Sheriff Baca was deliberately indifferent to an excessive risk of inmate violence, Starr still cannot recover unless Baca's indifference caused the assault on Starr. . . Thus, to state a cause of action, a plaintiff must 'allege facts sufficient to show that the defendants had actual knowledge of an impending harm easily preventable, so that a conscious, culpable refusal to prevent the harm can be inferred from the defendant's failure to prevent it.; Santiago v. Walls, 599 F.3d 749, 756 (7th Cir.2010) . . . Starr's allegations get nowhere close to this standard. As noted above, Starr alleges that the prior incidents of inmate-on-inmate violence were caused by correctional officer negligence − e.g., poor supervision and misclassification of prisoners. But according to Starr's own account, his assault was caused by a group of sadistic correctional officers who intentionally helped several inmates stab Starr twenty-three times and then, unsatisfied, joined in the assault themselves. Thus, even if Sheriff Baca had solved the alleged problems of lax supervision and inmate misclassification, it is difficult to see how that would have stopped this assault. Yet the panel resists the notion that Starr must adequately plead a nexus between Baca's alleged deliberate indifference and Starr's injury. Instead, it infers deliberate indifference from violent episodes that do not have a common, concrete cause that a high-level administrator could readily remedy. In resisting any attempt to require Starr to tie the prior incidents to his injury, the majority reveals its true purpose: to impose respondeat superior in any jurisdiction which has a history of prior prison problems, no matter how unrelated those problems are to the plaintiff's injuries. In allowing Starr's claim to proceed, this court creates a road map for circumventing the rule against vicarious liability in constitutional litigation. First, allege a constitutional violation committed by a low-level employee of a large administrative agency. Next, list a number of tangential bad acts committed by other members of that agency. And, finally, fault the head of that agency for not sufficiently addressing the general problem of his subordinates' poor behavior. Indeed, it is hard to see why every L.A. County prisoner who is assaulted by another prisoner does not now have a viable claim against Sheriff Baca. . . The court's ruling today conflicts with Iqbal in its statement of the pleading standard, in its application of the pleading standard, and in its far-reaching conclusions regarding supervisory liability. By failing to rehear this case en banc, we fail to correct these errors and once again must wait for the Supreme Court to do so for us.")

Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1207 (9th Cir. 2011), reh'g en banc denied by Starr v. County of Los Angeles, 659 F.3d 850 (9th Cir. 2011) and cert. denied, 132 S. Ct. 2101 (2012) ("We see nothing in Iqbal that indicates that the Supreme Court intended to overturn longstanding case law on deliberate indifference claims against supervisors in conditions of confinement cases. We also note that, to the extent that our sister circuits have confronted this question, they have agreed with our interpretation of Iqbal. [citing Dodds v. Richardson, 614 F.3d 1185, 1204 (10th Cir.2010), Sandra T .E. v. Grindle, 599 F.3d 583, 591 (7th Cir.2010), and Sanchez v.. Pereira-Castillo, 590 F.3d 31, 49 (1st Cir.2009)] We therefore conclude that a plaintiff may state a claim against a supervisor for deliberate indifference based upon the supervisor's knowledge of and acquiescence in unconstitutional conduct by his or her subordinates.").

Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1218, 1219, 1221 (9th Cir. 2011) (Trott, J., dissenting), reh'g en banc denied by Starr v. County of Los Angeles, 659 F.3d 850 (9th Cir. 2011) and cert. denied, 132 S. Ct. 2101 (2012) ("Alleging that the Sheriff 'could' have known, 'should' have known, and 'should' have become aware is tantamount to admitting that Starr had no facts to support his allegations. The test that governs this case consists of two words, not one. Indifference is not enough. For indifference to be actionable, it must be deliberate. Starr's conclusory allegations amount to no more than formulaic flak fired into the sky in an attempt to bring down the squadron leader. When we cease to look at the Los Angeles Sheriff's Department (LASD) as an abstraction and look at the reality, we see good reasons for requiring facts before permitting lawsuits against the Sheriff himself: the agency is gigantic. The LASD is the largest Sheriff's Department in the world. It covers 3,171 square miles, 2,557,754 residents, and by contract 42 of the 88 incorporated cities in Los Angeles County. The Department employs 8,400 law enforcement officers and 7,600 civilians and is responsible for 48 courthouses and 23 substations. The Men's Central Jail alone houses a revolving population of 5,000 inmates. In addition, the Department operates the Twin Towers Correctional Facility, the Mira Loma Detention Facility, the Pitchess Detention Center, and the North County Correctional Center. Persons charged with or convicted of crimes are in over one hundred different locations. The layers of administration and management between what happens in a jail are many and they are complex. To infer that specific incidents which occur in a jail are necessarily known by the Sheriff is to engage in fallacious logic. This complexity does not absolve the Department of responsibility for respecting the constitutional rights and general well-being of its charges, but it does show how inappropriate it is to sue the Sheriff individually unless in terms of causation the Sheriff can be personally tied to the actionable behavior at issue. Just being a disappointing or even an insufficiently engaged public servant is not enough. Those issues are for the ballot box and the County Board of Supervisors, not the courts. . . . The days of pleading conclusions without factual support accompanied by the wishful hope of finding something juicy during discovery are over. Wisely, we have moved up judgment day to the complaint stage rather than bog down the courts and parties with pre-summary judgment combat. This conclusion, of course, does not leave Starr without redress. He may sue the Sheriff in his official capacity, which is the same as suing the County of Los Angeles and the Sheriff's Department, and he may pursue his lawsuit on the ground of official policy or longstanding custom and practice − but he may not sue the Sheriff individually just because he is the Sheriff.")

Cross v. City and County of San Francisco, No. 18-CV-06097-EMC, 2019 WL 1960353, at *14-15 (N.D. Cal. May 2, 2019) ("[S]upervisory liability turns on the substantive scienter requirements of the constitutional claim at issue. As the Ninth Circuit explained in OSU Student Alliance: 'Iqbal makes crystal clear that constitutional tort claims against supervisory defendants turn on the requirements of the particular claim – and, more specifically, on the state of mind required by the particular claim – not on a generally applicable concept of supervisory liability.'. . The Ninth Circuit continued: 'courts before Iqbal generally did not have to determine the required mental state for constitutional violations, particularly not free speech violations' and, instead, '[a] uniform mental state requirement applied to supervisors: so long as they acted with deliberate indifference, they were liable, regardless of the specific constitutional right at issue.'. . In other words, 't]he line officers generally satisfied every mental state because they acted intentionally, and supervisors were subject to a uniform mental state requirement divorced from the underlying claim.'. . But Iqbal abrogat[ed] the second half of this framework' and 'place[d] new weight on the state of mind requirement for constitutional torts. Now claims against supervisors present problems that claims against subordinates typically do not: must the supervisor have harbored the specific intent to subject the plaintiff to the injury-causing act, or does knowledge or some lesser mental state suffice?'. . Given the above legal framework for supervisory claims, the first question in the instant case is what kind of claim has been brought by Plaintiffs. Based on the allegations in the FAC, Plaintiffs seem to be asserting both a claim for invidious discrimination (as in Iqbal) and a claim for failure to train. For the invidious discrimination claim, Plaintiffs must allege purposeful discrimination by the supervisory defendants, and not just knowing acquiescence or deliberate indifference. . . . For a failure-to-train claim, the intent requirement is not as high as it is for an invidious discrimination claim. For a failure to train, deliberate indifference is the requisite intent. . . Deliberate indifference may be shown by knowledge and acquiescence on the part of the supervisor. . . In the instant case, Plaintiffs claim invidious discrimination because Deputy Chief Redmond and Captain Cherniss knew about the racial targeting in OSS but failed to intervene. For failure to train, Plaintiffs assert that, at the very least, Deputy Chief Redmond and Capt. Cherniss should have known about the racial targeting in OSS but failed to act. If these allegations are credited, then both causes of action would survive the motion to dismiss. The problem for Plaintiffs is that, as the FAC is currently pled, there is an insufficient factual basis for the allegations that the supervisors had the requisite intent under either theory. If the two supervisors were actually involved in some concrete way with OSS, that would be a basis for knowledge; however, at the hearing, Plaintiffs essentially conceded that they did not know if either supervisor did have a role in OSS and that they were simply presuming such because Deputy Chief Redmond and Captain Cherniss are, as a general matter, supervisors over police officers who were actually involved in OSS. The Court therefore grants the motion to dismiss the claims against Deputy Chief Redmond and Captain Cherniss. The dismiss, however, is without prejudice. If, during discovery, Plaintiffs uncover evidence indicating that one or both did have a role in OSS, then they may move for leave to amend to add the supervisor(s) back to the case.")

Estate of Lopez v. Torres, No. 15-CV-0111-GPC-MDD, 2016 WL 429910, at *6-8 (S.D. Cal. Feb. 4, 2016) ("The law recognizes that personal participation in a constitutional deprivation is not the only predicate for section 1983 liability. . . Anyone who 'causes' any citizen to be subjected to a constitutional deprivation is also liable. . . In the years post-Iqbal, lower courts have interpreted Iqbal's supervisory liability holding in different ways, with some circuits treating Iqbal as a pleading decision, others limiting Iqbal to its facts, and others reading Iqbal as annihilating supervisory liability to various degrees. . . The Ninth Circuit has generally interpreted Iqbal in a more limited way. . . However, under Iqbal and under the Ninth Circuit's more expansive interpretation of supervisory liability in the § 1983 context, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have failed to state a claim predicated on supervisory liability. In the Ninth Circuit, a defendant may be held liable as a supervisor under § 1983 'if there exists either (1) his or her personal involvement in the constitutional deprivation, or (2) a sufficient causal connection between the supervisor's wrongful conduct and the constitutional violation.'. . The requisite causal connection can be established not only by some kind of direct personal participation in the deprivation but also by 'set[ting] in motion a series of acts by others [ ] or knowingly refus[ing] to terminate a series of acts by others, which [a supervisor] knew or reasonably should have known, would cause others to inflict the constitutional injury.'. . The critical question is whether it was reasonably foreseeable to a supervisor that the actions of particular subordinates would lead to the rights violations alleged to have occurred. . . . Plaintiffs allege that Defendants failed to analyze and investigate the reliability of the information provided by an anonymous informant, which they knew or should have known to be false, before conveying this information with reckless or deliberate indifference to its truth or falsity in a 'misleading and inaccurate fashion' to SWAT, which resulted in Lopez' death. . . The Court finds that Plaintiffs allegations are again insufficient to state a claim for excessive force premised on supervisory liability. First, There is no dispute that the anonymous informant provided truthful information regarding Lopez' status as a parolee at large and his address. In addition, this information was corroborated before the SWAT team was deployed. These corroborated facts unquestionably supported the actions to arrest Lopez. While a 20-20 hindsight review of the incident reveals that Lopez was not armed and there was no AK-47 in the Apartment 58, short of making contact with Lopez and searching his apartment, these allegations could not have been investigated prior to the attempted arrest. Second, although Plaintiffs' FAC provides additional facts regarding the role Defendants allegedly played in conveying unverified information to SWAT, they are insufficiently vague. . . . The FAC nowhere identifies the mission parameters, goals, or commands that the 'mission leaders' allegedly issued, or otherwise allege facts suggesting that Lt. Leos and/or Sgt. Holslag instructed or encouraged SWAT officers to use more force than necessary under the circumstances. . . . Plaintiffs do not allege sufficient facts to find that Defendants 'set in motion a series of acts by others...which [they] knew or reasonably should have known, would cause others to inflict the constitutional injury.'. . . Plaintiffs contend that Defendants knew providing the information they did to SWAT 'would cause heightened tension, awareness, and fear, and would give rise to a likelihood of the immediate use of deadly force if Walb or other agents perceived a threat.'. . Even assuming the truth of Plaintiffs' allegations, it is not reasonable to infer that Defendants knew or should have known that conveying that information to SWAT and requesting SWAT's engagement would result in a SWAT officer using excessive force. . . . [E]ven assuming Defendants were supervisors and set in motion the series of acts that ultimately resulted in Lopez's shooting, Defendants did not proximately cause Lopez's death because the actions of the SWAT unit were an intervening event. . . It was the SWAT team's decision to use submachine guns, to pursue Lopez when he fled into the apartment building, and to shoot him when he allegedly was kneeling in compliance with the Officer Walb's order that led to the deprivation of constitutional rights. Although Plaintiffs allege that Lt. Leos and Sgt. Holslag served as mission leaders of the operation, Plaintiffs do not allege any facts suggesting that they instructed or encouraged SWAT officers to employ more force than necessary under the circumstances. Defendants could not have foreseen that highly trained SWAT officers allegedly would use excessive force in attempting to apprehend Lopez, even SWAT officers armed with the very information Defendants provided them with. Thus, the Court finds that Plaintiffs do not allege sufficient facts to find that Defendants 'set in motion a series of acts by others...which [they] knew or reasonably should have known, would cause others to inflict the constitutional injury' (Larez, 946 F.2d at 646), demonstrating 'a reckless or callous indifference to the rights of others.' Starr, 652 F.3d at 1208. Officer Walb's use of lethal force was unforeseeable in light of the information Defendants conveyed to SWAT when requesting SWAT's engagement.")

Murillo v. Parkinson, No. CV 11-10131-JGB VBK, 2015 WL 3791450, at *11 (C.D. Cal. June 17, 2015) ("[T]he allegations of the First Amended Complaint are wholly bald and conclusory and assert merely that Defendant Sheriff Parkinson knew or should have known that Plaintiff's rights would be violated by the conditions of her confinement at the jail. Plaintiff does not allege any facts that plausibly suggest Defendant Sheriff Parkinson knew of any constitutional deprivations occurring at the San Luis Obispo County Jail. The mere fact that Defendant Sheriff Parkinson is the Sheriff of San Luis Obispo, and thus is the top official with respect to the administration of the Jail, is not an adequate factual predicate for stating a § 1983 claim against him based on the subject matter of the First Amended Complaint. As in Hydrick, '[T]he absence of specifics is significant,' because Iqbal has made clear that a complaint against a government official must show that the official's own individual actions violated the Constitution. . . Plaintiff's First Amended Complaint does not provide allegations describing why and how Defendant Sheriff Parkinson 'reasonably should have known' that his rank and file employees were engaged in some 'series of acts' (which he did not initiate, command or encourage) which would cause constitutional injury to Plaintiff if Defendant Sheriff Parkinson did not terminate that 'series of acts[.]'. . . Nor does the First Amended Complaint supply specific allegations describing, in more than conclusory fashion, how Defendant Sheriff Parkinson might have 'set [ ] in motion a series of acts by others'. . . that he knew or reasonably should have known would cause his subordinates to inflict constitutional injury on Plaintiff. Without a factually based, non-conclusory allegation that Defendant Sheriff Parkinson actually knew of the conditions to which Plaintiff refers, as a matter of law it cannot be said that Defendant Sheriff Parkinson 'acquiesced' in those conditions or that his conduct exhibited

'reckless or callous indifference to the rights of' Plaintiff. Accordingly, Defendants Sheriff Parkinson and the County of San Luis Obispo are entitled to summary judgment.")

Perez v. United States, 103 F. Supp. 3d 1180, 1199-1206 (S.D. Cal. 2015) ("Defendant Napolitano is sued in her individual capacity for her allegedly unlawful acts and omissions as Secretary of DHS. Defendant Bersin is sued in his individual capacity for his allegedly unlawful acts and omissions as Commissioner of CBP. Defendant Fisher is sued in his individual capacity for his allegedly unlawful acts and omissions as Chief of Border Patrol. Defendants Napolitano, Bersin, and Fisher contend that at the time of the alleged constitutional violation, the 'knowledge and acquiescence' standard was not clearly established in the Fourth Amendment context. Defendants contend that, even if it was clearly established, the SAC fails to allege sufficient facts demonstrating Defendants Napolitano and Bersin's knowledge and acquiescence of the Rocking Policy. . . Plaintiffs contend that the knowledge and acquiescence standard applied to supervisors for excessive force claims long before Yañez was killed. . . . Chavez demonstrates that supervisory liability in the Fourth Amendment context requires, at a minimum, knowledge of a pattern or practice of unconstitutional actions taken by subordinates, coupled with culpable action or inaction. . . . Although Connick analyzed a claim against a governmental official in his official capacity, Connick is equally applicable to claims against government supervisors in their individual capacity. . . .The SAC alleges no facts to support the inference that either Defendant Janet Napolitano, as Secretary of DHS, or Defendant Bersin, as Commissioner of CBP, were directly responsible for the training of Border Patrol agents in their use of force. Instead, the facts alleged in the SAC suggest that the Chief of Border Patrol, not the Secretary of DHS or Commissioner of CBP, is directly responsible for implementing Border Patrol training programs. . . .In addition, the SAC fails to allege sufficient facts to permit the 'reasonable inference' that Defendants Napolitano and Bersin 'disregarded a known or obvious consequence' of their failure to properly train Border Patrol agents on use of force in response to rock-throwing. . . The fact that there were ten rock-throwing deaths along the United States–Mexico Border over an eight year period does not plausibly demonstrate an 'obvious' need for rock-throwing-specific use of force training, such that the failure to provide that training amounts to 'deliberate indifference.'. . The Associated Press article incorporated by reference in the SAC reveals that Border Patrol Agents were attacked with rocks 339 times in 2011 and 185 times in 2012. . . .The SAC alleges that Defendant Napolitano was Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security for the relevant period and that Defendant Bersin was the Commissioner for Customs and Border Protection for the relevant period. At this level of the supervisory chain of command, the Court cannot draw the 'reasonable inference' that Defendants Napolitano and Bersin were aware of a pattern or practice of excessive force in response to rock throwing, absent factual allegations demonstrating specific notice of a such a pattern or practice. . . . The allegation that Defendants Napolitano and Bersin received a mass email each time a Border Patrol agent used force does not permit the 'reasonable inference' that these Defendants were able to appreciate a pattern of excessive force specific to alleged rock-throwing incidents that would require them to take corrective action. . . . The SAC again alleges facts demonstrating that Defendants Napolitano and Bersin were specifically put on notice of the death of Sergio Hernandez, but fails to allege facts that they were given similar notice of other rock-throwing deaths, let alone a pattern or practice of excessive force used in response to rock-throwing, prior to Yañez's death. The Court concludes that the SAC 'fail[s] to nudge the possible to the plausible' in demonstrating Defendant Napolitano and Bersin's knowledge of a pattern or practice of excessive force in response to rock throwing, and are therefore liable for culpable action or inaction that caused Yañez's death. . . The Court concludes that Defendants Napolitano and Bersin are entitled to qualified immunity on the ground that the allegations of the SAC fail to make out a constitutional violation. . . Because the Court finds that further amendment would be futile, Plaintiffs' fourth claim is dismissed with prejudice as to Defendants Napolitano and Bersin.")

Perez v. United States, 103 F. Supp. 3d 1180, 1206-12 (S.D. Cal. 2015) ("In the Court's September 3, 2014 Order, the Court concluded that the FAC stated a plausible Fourth Amendment supervisory liability claim against Defendant Fisher. Defendant Fisher now contends that he is entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that the Fourth Amendment supervisory liability standard was not clearly established at the time of Yañez's death. Defendant Fisher contends that, at the time of the alleged shooting—June 21, 2011—it was not clearly established that 'knowledge and acquiescence' governed supervisory liability for Fourth Amendment excessive force claims. . . Defendant Fisher contends that at this time, the governing standard was Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009), which held that 'knowledge and acquiescence' is 'insufficient to satisfy' the standard for supervisory liability in the Bivens context. . . Defendant Fisher contends that months later, in al-Kidd, . . . the dissent questioned whether the 'knowing failure to act' standard survived Iqbal. . . Defendant Fisher contends that the Court relied on Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202 (9th Cir.2011) in its September 3, 2014 Order, even though that case was decided four weeks after the alleged shooting incident. Defendant Fisher contend[s] that Starr v. Baca's holding is limited to Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claims. Defendants contend that as late as 2013 it has been debated whether the 'knowledge and acquiescence' standard survived Iqbal. Plaintiffs contend that, as early as 1991, 'it was clearly established in this Circuit that supervisors are liable when they know of and acquiesce in their subordinates' use of excessive force.'. . Plaintiffs contend that Iqbal did not '"unsettle" the knowledge and acquiescence standard governing excessive use of force claims' because Iqbal 'held only that knowledge and acquiescence was insufficient to establish a claim of purposeful discrimination, and the Court expressly tied the level of intent necessary for supervisor liability to the underlying constitutional tort.'. . Plaintiffs contend that Starr v. Baca was decided before the alleged shooting, and clarified that 'Iqbal does not affect the standard governing supervisor liability claims when, as is the case here, the level of intent necessary for supervisor liability is greater than needed for the underlying constitutional tort....'. . . Chavez is the current standard for supervisory liability in the Fourth Amendment context. 'Because Iqbal requires courts to apply an equivalent standard to supervisors and subordinates ... a supervisor faces liability under the Fourth Amendment only where "it would be clear to a reasonable [supervisor] that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted."'. . To meet this standard, a plaintiff must allege, at a minimum, a 'factual basis for imputing ... knowledge' of an unconstitutional practice undertaken by subordinates, coupled with culpable action or inaction. . .Prior to May, 18, 2009, the date Ashcroft v. Iqbal was decided. . . .

[s]upervisors could be liable for their subordinates use of excessive force if they were on notice of a pattern or practice of excessive force, failed to take corrective action, and that failure foreseeably caused the plaintiff's injury. . . . The Court finds that the pre-May 18, 2009 and current standards for supervisory liability in the Fourth Amendment context both require knowledge of an unconstitutional pattern or practice of excessive force used by subordinates, coupled with culpable action or inaction. However, Defendant Fisher contends that, at the time of the alleged shooting, June 21, 2011, the governing standard was Ashcroft v. Iqbal, . . . which held that 'knowledge and acquiescence' is 'insufficient to satisfy' the standard for supervisory liability in the Bivens context. . . Alternatively, Defendant Fisher contends that, on June 21, 2011, there was enough disagreement in the Courts following Iqbal such that any Fourth Amendment supervisory liability standard established prior to Iqbal was no longer clearly established law. . . .Starr demonstrates that Iqbal does not necessarily impose a 'purpose' requirement in all constitutional contexts, but instead required that the same requirements for holding a subordinate liable for a Bivens violation are equally applicable to 'an official charged with violations arising from his or her superintendent responsibilities.'. . At the time of Yañez's death, there were no Supreme Court on Ninth Circuit cases available that applied Iqbal to a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim asserted against supervisors. However, Fourth Amendment excessive force law was clearly established, and Iqbal requires that the Fourth Amendment's mental state requirements be applied equally to supervisors. '[S]pecific intent [is not] required in order to establish a violation of the Fourth Amendment.'. . The facts known to the governmental actor are relevant in determining the objective reasonableness of the actor's actions. . . Following Iqbal, the pre-May 11, 2009 standard remained good law in the Fourth Amendment excessive force context because it was consistent with the Fourth Amendment's mental state requirements: a supervisor's knowledge of a pattern or practice of excessive force by subordinates and failure to take corrective action is not '"objectively reasonable" in light of the facts and circumstances confronting [the supervisor].'. . As stated previously, the pre-May 11, 2009 standard and Chavez both require knowledge of a pattern or practice of excessive force committed by subordinates, coupled with culpable action or inaction. The Court concludes that the standard remained substantially unchanged both before and after Iqbal and before and after Chavez. The Court further concludes that nothing in Iqbal raises the standard for supervisory liability for Fourth Amendment excessive force from knowledge of an unconstitutional pattern or practice, coupled with culpable action or inaction, to a standard requiring a higher mental state. The Court concludes that Defendant Fisher is not entitled to qualified immunity on the ground that the applicable mental state for supervisory liability in the Fourth Amendment context was not clearly established at the time of Yañez's death.")

Jones v. Cate, No. 2:12-CV-2181 TLN CKD, 2015 WL 1440168, at *10-11 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 27, 2015) ("In OSU, the Ninth Circuit held that a supervisor's knowledge of and acquiescence in a First Amendment free speech violation was sufficient to impose liability on the supervisor for the constitutional tort. The court gave two reasons for the holding: first, that First Amendment free speech claims do not require specific intention; and second, that United States Supreme Court has 'only in limited situations ... found constitutional torts to require specific intent.'. . The three situations cited by the OSU court are '(1) due process claims for injuries caused by a high-speed chase ... (2) Eighth Amendment claims for injuries suffered during the response to a prison disturbance ... (3) and invidious discrimination under the Equal Protection Clause and the First Amendment Free Exercise Clause.'. . The case at bar presents a fourth constitutional tort that includes a specific intent requirement. Success on a retaliation claim requires proof that retaliation for the exercise of protected conduct 'was a "substantial" or "motivating" factor' in imposing adverse employment consequences. . . Under Iqbal and its Ninth Circuit progeny, Plaintiffs must allege facts which suggest that Defendants Cate and McDonald had the intent necessary to support a retaliation claim when they allegedly failed to train correctional officers and acquiesced in retaliatory events of which they had knowledge. There are no allegations in the FAC which suggest that either Defendant Cate or Defendant McDonald had the requisite animus in allegedly failing to train, investigate, or discipline officers. For this reason, the third claim for relief must be dismissed. It is not clear to the Court whether the deficiencies in this claim could be cured by amendment. Accordingly, the Court will grant Plaintiffs leave to file a second amended complaint.")

Roberts v. Blades, No. 1:13-CV-00312-BLW, 2014 WL 7149576, at *4-5 (D. Idaho Dec. 15, 2014) ("Plaintiff alleges that Warden Blades had notice of Plaintiff's ongoing problem and did not do anything further to solve his problem. This is enough to infer deliberate indifference—knowledge, plus a conscious disregard of an allegedly serious health need. Non-medical prison personnel are generally entitled to rely on the opinions of medical professionals with respect to appropriate medical treatment of an inmate. However, if 'a reasonable person would likely determine [the medical treatment] to be inferior,' the fact that an official is not medically trained will not shield that official from liability for deliberate indifference. . . .Other courts are in agreement. If an alleged constitutional violation is ongoing, and a supervisory official reviewing the inmate's report of a problem has the duty and authority to review the propriety of the medical treatment and take action to remedy the alleged deficiencies (not necessarily by providing medical care himself, but by obtaining the answer to whether the medical care was proper from a person with medical training and directing a remedy to be implemented), then a cause of action lies, because the defendant 'knew of an ongoing constitutional violation and ... had the authority and opportunity to prevent the ongoing violation,' under supervisory liability principles applicable to § 1983 actions. . . Stated differently, where claims are asserted against persons who supervise the provision of prison medical care, the question is not whether the supervisor was 'directly involved' in the plaintiff's diagnosis, but whether the plaintiff has sufficiently alleged or provided evidence from which a jury could find that the supervisor's knowing failure to address the treating provider's deficient care rendered Plaintiff's medical treatment constitutionally inadequate. . . .Based on all of the foregoing, Plaintiff will be permitted to proceed to the discovery and summary judgment stages on his claims against Warden Blades in his personal or individual capacity for damages purposes.")

Hagen v. Williams, No. 6:14-CV-00165-MC, 2014 WL 6893708, at *3 (D. Or. Dec. 4, 2014) ("It is clear that there is a high bar for what is considered a sufficient claim for supervisory liability under section l983. Turning to the allegations in this case, Plaintiff has not met that bar. She has not alleged a sufficient causal connection between Defendants Williams, Morrow, Nooth, and Gilmore's acts or failures to act and Hagen's death. Here, Plaintiff fails to allege facts with sufficient detail to infer that Williams and Morrow plausibly were aware of the unconstitutional conduct of DOC personnel and were deliberately indifferent to the safety of Hagen. Plaintiff instead relies on the bare assertion that Williams and Morrow would have been aware of 'an ongoing problem of inmate violence throughout the DOC and, specifically ... the murder of an inmate at SRCI by an inmate with whom he had a known conflict.'. . The fact that an inmate was killed in a prison setting prior to Hagen's murder, without more, does not provide the type of notice outlined in Starr. And while a homicide in a prison can never be tolerated by prison officials, there is nothing in this record to indicate any similarity or pattern between the prior homicide and Hagen's death that would give rise to deliberate indifference. The claims against Williams and Morrow are dismissed, without prejudice.")

Estate of Shafer ex rel. Shafer v. City of Elgin, Or., No. 2:12-CV-00407-SU, 2014 WL 6633106, at *16 (D. Or. Nov. 21, 2014) ("Defendants argue in order to hold a supervisor liable in an excessive force case, there must be evidence the officer previously used the same type of force that was used against the complaining plaintiff. . . Specifically, defendants argue that to hold Chief Lynch liable in this case, there must be evidence of a prior shooting by Officer Kilpatrick. . . The court disagrees. In a case alleging excessive force by a police officer, liability of the police chief depends on whether he 'set in motion a series of acts by others, or knowingly refused to terminate a series of acts by others, which he knew or reasonably should have known, would cause others to inflict the constitutional injury.'. . Although there is no evidence of a shooting by Officer Kilpatrick prior to the shooting of Richard Shafer, a jury could find a causal link in this case from evidence that Chief Lynch knew Officer Kilpatrick repeatedly pointed his gun at unarmed Elgin residents. Summary judgment is improper in a § 1983 claim alleging Fourth Amendment violations against a police chief for supervisor liability when there is evidence of prior citizen complaints made against an officer for use of force, and the opinion of a qualified expert witness demonstrates the police chief failed to take remedial action in response to those complaints. . . This case presents precisely that. The court finds there are issues of fact surrounding whether Chief Lynch took proper remedial action against Officer Kilpatrick after complaints were made to him that Officer Kilpatrick had pointed his gun at other Elgin residents. As such, defendants' motion for summary judgment on the § 1983 claim against Chief Lynch is denied.")

Palmer v. Wexford Med., No. CV 12-08214-PCT-SPL, 2014 WL 5781305, at *9 (D. Ariz. Nov. 6, 2014) ("To the extent Ryan argues that he is not liable because his only involvement was in the grievance process, he overstates the holding of Shehee, a Sixth Circuit opinion. Whether involvement in the grievance process is sufficient personal involvement to state a claim of a constitutional deprivation would depend on several factors, such as whether, at the time of the grievance response, the violation is ongoing, see e.g., Flanory v. Bonn, 604 F.3d 249, 256 (6th Cir.2010), or the unconstitutional conduct is completed, see Shehee, 199 F.3d at 300, and whether the defendant responding to the grievance has authority to take action to remedy the alleged violation, see Bonner v. Outlaw, 552 F.3d 673, 679 (8th Cir.2009). Further, under Sixth Circuit law, liability under § 1983 requires 'active unconstitutional behavior; failure to act or passive behavior is insufficient.' King v. Zamiara, 680 F.3d 686, 706 (6th Cir.2012). But under Ninth Circuit law, a defendant can be liable for the failure to act. See Taylor, 880 F.2d at 1045.")

Dasovich v. Contra Costa Cnty. Sheriff Dep't, 14-CV-00258-MEJ, 2014 WL 4652118, *7, *8 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 17, 2014) ("The Ninth Circuit has explained various ways in which a supervisory figure can be individually liable in a § 1983 case. A supervisor can be liable if he or she directed his or her subordinates to commit the offensive act. . . Liability also can attach when the supervisor 'set[s] in motion a series of acts by others ..., which he knew or reasonably should have known, would cause others to inflict the constitutional injury.'. . Even when the supervisor does not direct his or her subordinates to commit the offensive act, or set in motion a series of acts by others which caused others to inflict the constitutional injury, the supervisor can still be liable if he or she 'knew of the violations' being committed by subordinates yet 'failed to act to prevent them.'. . The Ninth Circuit also recognizes that '[s]upervisory liability [can be] imposed against a supervisory official in his individual capacity for his own culpable action or inaction in the training, supervision, or control of his subordinates, for his acquiescence in the constitutional deprivations of which the complaint is made, or for conduct that showed a reckless or callous indifference to the rights of others.'. . Finally, a supervisory official can be liable if he or she 'implement[s] a policy so deficient that the policy itself is a repudiation of constitutional rights and is the moving force of the constitutional violation.'. . . Here, as discussed above, Plaintiff alleges that Defendants, including Sheriff Livingston, developed and maintained training policies that 'led to the improper use of canines by individual officers, including the release of canines to bite on individuals when it is not objectively reasonable to do so.'. . If Plaintiff is able to establish that Sheriff Livingston failed to train, supervise, or control his subordinates in the deployment of canines, he can be held liable under § 1983. . . He can also be held liable if this policy is 'so deficient that the policy itself is a repudiation of constitutional rights and is the moving force of the constitutional violation.'. .Accordingly, under the liberal pleading standard of Rule 8(a)(2) and drawing all reasonable inferences that Sheriff Livingston is liable for the misconduct alleged, the Court finds that the FAC contains sufficient allegations of underlying facts to give fair notice to Sheriff Livingston and to enable him to defend against the allegations effectively. Accordingly, the Court DENIES Defendants' Motion on this ground.")

Perez v. United States, 13CV1417-WQH-BGS, 2014 WL 4385473, *10-*12 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 3, 2014) ("Plaintiffs allege that each and every Supervisor Defendant violated Yañez's Fourth Amendment rights by 'personally developing, authorizing, and conspiring to effect, and permitting and directing their subordinates to implement, the Rocking Policy' and by 'failing to establish adequate procedures to train the Border patrol agents, failing to establish adequate disciplinary procedures and adequate procedures to investigate agents' misconduct, and acting and failing to act in disregard of previous allegations of Border Patrol agents' use of excessive, lethal force.'. .Defendants contend that Plaintiffs cannot maintain suit against the Supervisor Defendants by alleging their knowledge and acquiescence to the alleged unconstitutional conduct. Defendants assert that Plaintiffs have failed to allege the specific roles of each Defendant beyond their general responsibilities within DHS, such as how each became aware of the Rocking Policy. Plaintiffs contend that allegations of 'deliberate indifference' or 'knowledge and acquiescence' are sufficient to state Bivens violations. . . Plaintiffs assert that all of the public information alleged in the FAC reasonably gives rise to the inference that each Supervisor Defendant was aware of the Rocking Policy, and that they have alleged the specific knowledge of Defendants Napolitano and Fisher. . . . Plaintiffs have alleged in detail several instances of border shootings related to alleged rock throwing and detailed public debate on the Border Patrol's use of lethal force in response to rock throwing, including statements by the NBPC. These allegations make it possible that some or all of the Supervisor Defendants were aware of the alleged Rocking Policy, but 'the non-specific allegations in the complaint regarding [each Supervisor Defendant's individual involvement] fail to nudge the possible to the plausible, as required by Twombly.' al-Kidd v. Ashcroft, 580 F.3d 949, 979 (2009), rev'd on other grounds, —— U.S. ——, 131 S.Ct. 2074, 179 L.Ed.2d 1149 (2011); see also Hydrick v. Hunter, 669 F.3d 937, 942 (2012) (complaint must allege facts demonstrating that each supervisor was personally responsible for the alleged constitutional violation). Plaintiffs only make specific factual allegations as to Defendants Napolitano and Fisher. As to Defendant Napolitano, the report that the Mexican Attorney General complained to her of excessive force used in one instance is not sufficient to plausibly put her on notice of the alleged Rocking Policy. . . This allegation alone is insufficient to state a claim against Defendant Napolitano on a supervisory liability theory. . .As to Defendant Fisher, the article incorporated by reference in the FAC begins by reporting that 'Border Patrol agents will be allowed to continue using deadly force against rock-throwers, [Defendant Fisher] said, despite the recommendation of a government-commissioned review to end the practice.'. . The incorporated article permits the inference that Defendant Fisher knew of and was responsible for the alleged Rocking Policy. Although the article post-dates Yañez's death, Plaintiffs have alleged that Defendant Fisher has served as the Chief of the Border Patrol since May 2010, and have set forth facts to permit the inference that the alleged Rocking Policy existed for the entirety of Defendant Fisher's tenure. This individualized factual allegation is sufficient to state a claim against Defendant Fisher. The Court concludes that Plaintiffs have failed to allege sufficient facts to state a Fourth Amendment claim against all Defendants except Fisher. The Motion to Dismiss the Fourth Claim as to Defendant Fisher is denied. The Motion to Dismiss the Fourth Claim as to all other Supervisor Defendants is granted.")

Estate of Peterson v. City of Missoula, CV 12-123-M-DLC, 2014 WL 3868217, *18-*21 (D. Mont. Aug. 6, 2014) ("Here, Plaintiffs do not allege or provide evidence that either supervisor was ever present at any point during the investigation related to Colton. Nor do Plaintiffs point to any other instances where other members of the Drug Task Force violated the constitutional rights of other confidential informants or drug suspects. Plaintiffs thus do not forward a valid acquiescence or ratification theory on which to impose supervisory liability. . . Instead, Plaintiffs focus exclusively on deficiencies in Detective Krueger's training as it relates to the use of confidential informants and the handling of potentially suicidal suspects or individuals. . . . Though Chief Muir was responsible for Detective Krueger's training and supervision, Plaintiffs fail to present sufficient evidence to create a genuine dispute that the need for more training in the handling of confidential informants or suicidal drug suspects was obvious. Though a Plaintiff need not always point to evidence of other constitutional violations in order to demonstrate a need for more training, the need for more training in such cases must be 'patently obvious.'. . Here, Defendants present evidence that Detective Krueger received a great deal of training, though perhaps only limited training in the specific areas of evaluating individuals for suicide risk and the use of confidential informants. Detective Krueger attended a DEA basic drug investigator training course. The Missoula Police Department also had established a process for how to sign up confidential informants. In addition, all City of Missoula police officers receive brief ongoing training daily, must meet or exceed minimum standards for hiring, must meet the employment education and certification standards, and are required to complete the basic academy at the Montana Law Enforcement Academy or that of another state. Also, Missoula City Police Officers must complete a variety of other training courses before they can work on their own. The Missoula Police Department has received national recognition for its training program for new officers. Plaintiffs point to deficiencies related to specific HIDTA training, . . . but do not dispute that Detective Krueger received all of the training required by the Missoula Police Department and the DEA course for drug investigators. . . . Under these circumstances, the Court does not regard the need for additional, specific training regarding the use of confidential informants and suicidal suspects to fall in the 'narrow range of circumstances' where the need for more training is 'so patently obvious' that a claim can be maintained without demonstrating a pattern of or any other similar violations. . . In addition, Plaintiffs fail to address Chief Muir's claim for qualified immunity. Notably, Plaintiffs do not cite any case where a failure to train claim against a supervisor has succeeded despite a plaintiff's failure to demonstrate another instance or pattern of similar violations. The Court thus concludes that Plaintiffs fail to create any genuine dispute of fact that Chief Muir was deliberately indifferent to an obvious need for more or better training. Accordingly, Chief Muir is entitled to summary judgment. . . . For many of the same reasons that Plaintiffs' claims against the individual supervisory officials fail, Plaintiffs' Monell claims also fail. Plaintiffs' fail to create any genuine issue of fact that the need for more training or supervision in the area of confidential informant handling and suicidal suspects was obvious. Plaintiffs present no evidence of similar violations or a pattern of unconstitutional conduct on the part of either the Sheriff's Department or the Missoula Police Department. Accordingly, Missoula County and the City of Missoula are entitled to summary judgment on Plaintiffs' § 1983 claims.") Hernandez v. City of Beaumont, No. EDCV 13–00967 DDP (DTBx), 2014 WL 1669990, *4, *5 (C.D. Cal. Apr. 28, 2014) ("To impose supervisory liability for failure to train, the supervisor must have been 'deliberately indifferent' to the need for 'more or different training.'. .As the chief of the BPD, Plaintiffs allege that Coe 'possessed the power and the authority and [was] charged by law with the responsibility to enact policies and to prescribe rules and practices concerning the operation of the BPD.'. . The Court finds that Plaintiffs have pled sufficient facts to state plausible claims for supervisory liability and for negligent training against Coe for the same reasons their Monell claim is sufficient. . . .Here, in determining whether Plaintiffs have stated a claim for municipal and supervisory liability, the Court has already determined that Plaintiffs have pled facts demonstrating that Coe's conduct in failing to adequately train BPD officers in the constitutional implications of using the JPX amounted to a constitutional violation, satisfying the first prong of the Saucier test. The Court also determined that Coe and the City could be liable for the failure to train because the need for such training was 'so obvious' that it amounted to deliberate indifference. This amounts to essentially the same thing as finding that it should have been 'readily apparent' that the failure to train would amount to a violation of constitutional rights. Therefore, the Court finds that Coe is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Nicholson v. Finander, No. CV 12–9993–FMO (JEM), 2014 WL 1407828, *7, *8 (C.D. Cal. Apr. 11, 2014) ("The Ninth Circuit has not ruled on whether a supervisor who learns about unconstitutional behavior from a prisoner's grievance and fails to intervene is personally involved in the constitutional violation, and the district courts are divided on the issue. . . Some district courts have reasoned that no constitutional claim of any sort may be based upon the administrative appeals process, [collecting cases] while others have held that a grievance appeal reviewer who fails to remedy a denial of adequate medical care personally participates in an Eighth Amendment violation. [collecting cases] In Michaud v. Bannister, for example, the District Court for Nevada held that 'an Eighth Amendment violation can attach to any official who denies an inmate constitutionally adequate medical care,' and, therefore, 'a supervisor who denies medical care via grievance is equally liable as a physicians' panel determining the medical necessity of a particular treatment.'. . .Here, Plaintiff's only claims against Dr. Finander involve her denial of Plaintiff's administrative grievances. Although Plaintiff states that 'from day one, Dr. Finander denied my pain medication and my chrono,'. . . he does not assert that Dr. Finander was ever involved in a decision to deny him Methadone or a lower bunk chrono except through the grievance procedure. . . . The Court cannot infer from Dr. Finander's supervisory position alone that she directed the other Defendants to ignore Plaintiff's serious medical needs. Nevertheless, a supervisor who learns about an unconstitutional denial of adequate medical care from a prisoner's grievance and fails to intervene may be found to have personally participated in the Eighth Amendment violation. . . Accordingly, the Court recommends denying the Motion to Dismiss the claim against Dr. Finander on the grounds that her role in the alleged Eighth Amendment violation was limited to reviewing Plaintiff's grievances.")

Doe v. City of San Diego, 35 F.Supp.3d 1214, 1226-29 (S.D. Cal. 2014) ("The pivotal question. . .is not whether Plaintiff was constitutionally harmed, but whether the Supervisor Defendants are personally liable for the harming. The answer resides within the confines of Section 1983's supervisory liability jurisprudence. As the Court previously noted, supervisory liability can be imposed only if (1) the supervisor was personally involved in the constitutional deprivation, or (2) there is a sufficient causal connection between the supervisor's wrongful conduct and the constitutional violation. . . It is undisputed that the Supervisor Defendants did not personally participate in the sexual assault and battery of Jane Doe. Accordingly, to prevent summary judgment, Doe must produce evidence demonstrating a causal connection between the Supervisor Defendants' conduct and Doe's injury. The Supervisor Defendants contend that this burden is insurmountable because the requisite causal connection can only be forged by demonstrating repeated failure to act to abate repeated constitutional violations, and it is undisputed that at the time of Doe's injuries each Supervisor Defendant knew of only one prior allegation of sexual misconduct against Officer Arevalos. . .Plaintiff disagrees with the Supervisor Defendants' interpretation of supervisory liability requirements. She contends that the requisite culpability for supervisory inaction can be established on the basis of a single incident of subordinate misconduct. . . Upon review of Gutierrez–Rodriguez and the other cases relied on by Plaintiff, however, the Court finds that the limits of supervisory liability are not so unrestrained. . . . Importantly, supervisory liability in Gutierrez–Rodriguez was not premised on knowledge of one past incident of misconduct, but, rather, a long history of past complaints and violence. . . .Upon review of the case law—cited by Plaintiff or otherwise—the Court cannot find any case which imposes personal liability on a supervisor for having knowledge of a single prior act of misconduct on the part of a subordinate. . . . Upon review of the case law, the Court concludes that, for cases involving supervisory inaction following subordinate misconduct, a supervisor must have knowledge of pervasive and widespread conduct posing an unreasonable risk of constitutional injury before supervisory liability can attach.")

Jones v. Skolnik, No. 3:10–cv–00162–LRH–VPC, 2013 WL 6498955, *3 (D. Nev. Dec. 10, 2013) ("Thus, although in Ashcroft v. Iqbal the United States Supreme Court rejected the idea that 'knowledge and acquiescence' of subordinates' conduct is enough to hold supervisory officials liable under § 1983 where the a claim is one of purposeful and unlawful discrimination, . . . the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals concluded that where the applicable constitutional standard is deliberate indifference, 'a plaintiff may state a claim against a supervisor for deliberate indifference based upon the supervisor's knowledge of and acquiescence in unconstitutional conduct by his or her subordinates.'. . Neither the Ninth Circuit nor the United States Supreme Court has squarely addressed whether knowledge of and acquiescence in a subordinates' conduct is sufficient to impose supervisory liability where the underlying constitutional violation does not involve either purposeful discrimination or deliberate indifference. However, other courts have concluded that such a theory may remain viable. [collecting cases]")

Mackenzie v. Hutchens, No. LA CV 12–00584–VBF–JC, 2014 WL 8291423, *6 n.9, *12, *13 (C.D. Cal. Sept. 9, 2013), aff'd 623 F. App'x 483 (9th Cir. 2015) ("The Court will use the phrase 'hold a supervisor liable' or 'hold the sheriff liable', not the term 'supervisory liability.' The Tenth Circuit cogently observed that while that court 'ha[s] referred [in past cases] to claims against supervisors as based on "supervisory liability" ... this label can be misunderstood as implying vicarious liability.'. . . [W]e are left with nothing in the complaint alleging that the sheriff ever directed or encouraged her subordinates to subject plaintiff to any particular condition of confinement, nor that any of the allegedly unconstitutional conditions of confinement were taken pursuant to the jail's policies rather than contrary to them, nor that she actually knew of any condition of confinement and acquiesced in it, nor that she otherwise exhibited callous indifference for the rights of others. Rather, as quoted above, the complaint does not even allege that the sheriff knew of any of the conditions of his confinement, saying only that the sheriff knew 'or reasonably should have known' that the OC Jail's conditions, in general terms, were unconstitutional for civil detainees. . . .[T]he mere fact that an official has ultimate authority over the policies and activities of his office, in this case a county jail, is not by itself sufficient to state a claim for relief against that official without some factual basis to connect the specific policy—or the specific application or interpretation of a policy—to the sheriff.")

Orr v. County of Sacramento, No. CIV. S–13–0839 LKK/AC, 2013 WL 4519637, *8, *9 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 26, 2013) ("Defendants assert that the allegations against the individual defendants are not specific enough under Iqbal, to find supervisory liability. The court finds that plaintiffs have alleged sufficient facts. The Complaint alleges that the named supervisory defendants knew that plaintiff had a medical need to be assigned to a lower tier (and a lower bunk) in order to avoid serious injury. It alleges how they knew this—from a prior incident, and from his medical file. The Complaint alleges that because of their failure to train and control their subordinates, plaintiff was nevertheless placed into an upper tier cell. It alleges that plaintiff fell on the stairs, trying to reach his upper-tier cell. The Complaint alleges that the fall on the stairs could not have occurred if plaintiff had been placed in a lower tier cell. Defendants assert that these allegations are conclusory, but they are in fact very specific factual allegations, sufficient to meet the pleading standard of Fed.R.Civ.P. 8, as interpreted by Twombly and Iqbal. Defendants complain that plaintiff has lumped all the individual defendants together. That is true, but it is not enough to dismiss the claims against them. Plaintiff has named the four senior officials who, collectively, are responsible for creating and implementing policies to ensure that his medical needs are seen to, and who, collectively, are alleged to be responsible for ensuring that those policies are carried out. Plaintiff presumably does not currently know exactly which official was responsible for which aspect of the policies. That would appear to be a matter for plaintiff to learn in discovery, it is not a basis for dismissal.")

Collins v. Lopez, No. 1:11–cv–01534–LJO–SKO PC, 2013 4041828, *4, *5 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 7, 2013) ("Deliberate indifference is shown where a prison official 'knows that inmates face a substantial risk of serious harm and disregards that risk by failing to take reasonable measures to abate it,' Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 847, 114 S.Ct. 1970 (1994), and in this Circuit, a sworn allegation that a supervisor or an administrator was placed on notice of a medical problem by letter but failed to take action is sufficient to defeat summary judgment, Jett v. Penner, 439 F.3d 1091, 1098 (9th Cir.2006) (citing Moore v. Jackson, 123 F.3d 1082, 1087 (8th Cir.1997)) (triable issue of fact in medical care case where inmate alleged he sent letters and administrators denied receiving them). It is therefore sufficient to support a claim at the pleading stage. Indeed, this basis for liability falls within one of the viable and longstanding supervisory liability theories identified by Defendants: alleged knowledge of a violation and the failure to take action to prevent it. Snow v. McDaniel, 681 F.3d 978, 989 (9th Cir.2012) (citing Taylor v. List, 880 F.2d 1040, 1045 (9th Cir.1989)); Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1205–08 (9th Cir.2011), cert. denied, 132 S.Ct. 2101 (2012). To the extent Defendants wish to persuade the Court that the act of sending a letter does not, for purposes of supporting a claim, equate to knowledge, the law does not support this interpretation. Jett, 439 F.3d at 1098. An allegation of notice given supports an inference of knowledge, and it is immaterial whether the notice was provided through a chance meeting on the yard, a medical examination in the clinic, an inmate appeal, a letter, or some other avenue.")

Love v. Salinas, No. 2:11–cv–00361–MCE–CKD, 2013 WL 4012748, *8-*10 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 6, 2013) ("[T]he Court finds that the evidence presented by Plaintiff with respect to the lack of any meaningful training in cell door operations at DVI is sufficient to create a factual dispute as to whether supervisory Defendants Salinas and Rackley were deliberately indifferent to inmates' safety. From this evidence, the jury also could reasonably conclude that the lack of training caused Defendants Montgomery and Berghorst to engage in the inherently dangerous practice of 'blind' door closing which led to Plaintiff's serious injury on February 12, 2010. The fact that Plaintiff became the first casualty of the inadequate training does not necessarily absolve Defendants Rackley and Salinas of liability. Since a jury could reasonably conclude that Plaintiff's injury was a 'highly predictable consequence' of supervisory Defendants' failure to implement any meaningful training on cell door operations at DVI, see Connick, 131 S.Ct. at 1360, Defendants' motion for summary judgment with respect to Plaintiff's 'failure to protect' claim against Rackley and Salinas should be denied. . . . The state of the law in 2010, when the alleged constitutional violation took place, would have given Defendants a fair warning that their failure to protect Plaintiff from a substantial risk of harm from a known dangerous condition was unconstitutional. . . Since Plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence to allow a reasonable jury to conclude that the manner of cell door operations at DVI created significant risk to his safety and that Defendants knew of the risk but chose to disregard it, Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity with respect to Plaintiff's 'failure to protect' claim at this stage in the proceedings.")

Alvarez-Orellana v. City of Antioch, No. C–12–4693 EMC, 2013 WL 3989300, *6 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 2, 2013) ("Plaintiff makes only conclusory allegations that Livingston knew or should have known that his subordinates were engaging in a pattern or practice of not complying with Penal Code sections 821, 822, and 1269b. . . Plaintiff has not pled facts indicating that Livingston was notified of his subordinates' allegedly unconstitutional conduct. Unlike in Starr, where the plaintiff pled that the sheriff was notified of constitutional deficiencies through the reports, Plaintiff fails to allege any specific facts indicating that Livingston was given any notice that a pattern or practice existed amongst his subordinates. . . As in Moss, Plaintiff's allegations that Livingston's actions and failure to train his subordinates amount to deliberate indifference are similarly conclusory.")

Estate of Prasad ex rel. Prasad v. County of Sutter, 958 F.Supp.2d 1101, 1113, 1114 (E.D. Cal. 2013) ("Where a complaint 'specifically alleges ... that [a supervisory defendant] was given notice, in several reports, of systematic problems,' and he 'did not take action to protect inmates under his care despite the dangers ... of which he had been made aware,' such allegations 'plausibly suggest that [he] acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates, and was thereby deliberately indifferent to the danger posed to [plaintiff].'. . Here, the complaint pleads just that. Plaintiffs allege that Cummings, Bhattal, and Garbett authorized and implemented a policy whereby Jail medical staff were available only from 4:00 a.m. to midnight . . . and despite the lack of 24–hour medical staff and the consequent danger to inmates with emergency medical needs, Parker, Samson, and Bidwell created and enforced a policy whereby only medical staff obtained medical care for inmates. . . . Plaintiffs further allege that the Supervisory Defendants were on notice from earlier documented reports that medical staff should be at the Jail seven days a week,

Dukes v. Harrington, No. 1:12cv00941 DLB PC, 2013 WL 1003672, *3 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 13, 2013) ("Here, Plaintiff attempts to allege liability against Defendant Harrington based on a letter he wrote to Defendant Harrington. However, simply sending a letter does not support a presumption of knowledge. Pursuant to Iqbal, Plaintiff must affirmatively allege that Defendant Harrington received the letter and knew of its contents. He therefore fails to state any claims against Defendant Harrington.")

Downing v. Graves, No. 2:12–cv–00332–JCM–CWH, 2013 WL 420424, *15 (D. Nev. Jan. 31, 2013) ("Although the United States Supreme Court has rejected the idea that 'knowledge and acquiescence' of subordinates' conduct is enough to hold supervisory officials liable under section 1983 where the a claim is one of purposeful and unlawful discrimination, Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 677–684, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009), the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals has held that where the applicable constitutional standard is deliberate indifference, 'a plaintiff may state a claim against a supervisory for deliberate indifference based upon the supervisor's knowledge of and acquiescence in unconstitutional conduct by his or her subordinates.' Starr, 652 F.3d at 1205. 'Even under a deliberate indifference theory of individual liability, the [p]laintiffs must still allege sufficient facts to plausibly establish the defendant's 'knowledge of' and 'acquiescence in' the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates.' Hydrick v. Hunter, 669 F.3d 937, 942 (9th Cir.2012) (citing Star v. Baca, 652 F.3d at 1206–07). In the instant case, plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to plausibly establish that defendants Skolnik and Cox had knowledge of the improper use of the NDOC disciplinary and grievance procedures and purposes, and failed to train defendants Graves, Griggs, Williams, Wilson, Burson, Howell, Dreesen, Connett, Smith, Foster, Romero, and Woodbury. However, plaintiff has failed to allege facts to state a colorable claim against defendants Skolnik and Cox for failure to train their subordinates in 'the effective operation of the SDCC law library' and 'the constitutional rights of plaintiff and NDOC prisoners in general with respect to prison conditions.' The claim against defendants Skolnik and Cox for failure to train their subordinates in the use of the NDOC disciplinary and grievance procedures may proceed.")

Cornelio v. Hirano, Civ. No. 12–00072 LEK/RLP, 2012 WL 5414836, *5 (D. Hawai'i Nov. 6, 2012) ("'Iqbal emphasizes that a constitutional tort plaintiff must allege that every government defendant-supervisor or subordinate-acted with the state of mind required by the underlying constitutional provision.' [citing OSU Student Alliance] Vague and conclusory allegations concerning the involvement of official personnel in civil rights violations are not sufficient. . . Despite four attempts to do so, Plaintiff fails to provide any details showing that Hirano knew of a specific danger to Plaintiff and failed to act to prevent the alleged assault. That is, Plaintiff alleges nothing showing that Hirano acted with the state of mind required for an Eighth Amendment violation: deliberate indifference. Plaintiff again simply alleges that Hirano is 'in charge of [MCCC's] overall operation.'. . An individual's 'general responsibility for supervising the operations of a prison is insufficient to establish personal involvement.'. . Plaintiff fails to state a claim against Hirano and claims against him are DISMISSED with prejudice.")

Hoslett v. Dhaliwal, No. 3:11–CV–00674–KI, 2012 WL 3878415, *3 (D. Or. Sept. 6, 2012) ("As is clear from the allegations, Hoslett brings claims against De Las Heras, Jacquez and Thomas even though none of them are medical providers. Hoslett's allegations dwell on these defendants' supervisory roles at FCI Sheridan. The allegations are conclusory and do not allege sufficient facts for the court to draw a reasonable inference that these defendants are liable under a theory of supervisory liability based on the supervisor knowing of the constitutional violations and failing to prevent them. Claims under Section 1983 cannot rest on respondeat superior liability. Moreover, negligence and medical malpractice do not constitute deliberate indifference. . . The allegations refer to medical malpractice several times. Thus, Hoslett fails to state a claim against De Las Heras, Jacquez, and Thomas that is plausible on its face. Hoslett alleges Dr. Davis constantly denied his need for pain medication. As a doctor, he might be making decisions about Hoslett's treatment. The allegations, though, are more indicative of supervisory liability. Dr. Davis supervises Dr. Dhaliwal, Hoslett's primary caregiver. Hoslett alleges Dr. Davis knew about his pain but does not allege how Dr. Davis gained that knowledge, other than through his supervision of Dr. Dhaliwal. There are no specific allegations Dr. Davis ever treated Hoslett. Accordingly, Hoslett also fails to state a claim against Dr. Davis.")

Martinez v. Delio, No. 1:11–cv–01088–LJO–MJS (PC), 2012 WL 3778842, *2, *3 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 30, 2012) ("Under § 1983, Plaintiff must demonstrate that each defendant personally participated in the deprivation of his rights. . . This requires the presentation of factual allegations sufficient to state a plausible claim for relief. . . . The statute requires that there be an actual connection or link between the actions of the defendants and the deprivation alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff. . . Government officials may not be held liable for the actions of their subordinates under a theory of respondeat superior. . . Since a government official cannot be held liable under a theory of vicarious liability in § 1983 actions, Plaintiff must plead sufficient facts showing that the official has violated the Constitution through his own individual actions. . . In other words, to state a claim for relief under § 1983, Plaintiff must link each named defendant with some affirmative act or omission that demonstrates a violation of Plaintiff's federal rights. . . .Plaintiff alleges that Defendant Hedgpeth was the Warden at KVSP and thus responsible for supervising and monitoring the facility. The mere fact that Hedgpeth may have supervised the individuals responsible for a violation is not enough. Defendants may only be held liable in a supervisory capacity if they 'participated in or directed the violations, or knew of the violations and failed to act to prevent them.' Taylor v. List, 880 F.2d 1040, 1045 (9th Cir.1989). The Court's previous screening order instructed Plaintiff on the applicable law and gave him an opportunity to amend. Plaintiff has again failed to allege facts connecting Defendants Zamora and Hedgpeth to the violations alleged. No useful purpose would be served by granting additional leave to amend. The Court recommends Plaintiff's claims against Defendants Zamora and Hedgpeth be dismissed with prejudice.")

Parrish v. Solis, No. C 11–1438 LHK (PR), 2012 WL 3902689, *4, *5 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 28, 2012) ("Here, as in Hydrick, Plaintiff does not allege any specific past incidents of the use of excessive force by subordinates of Defendants Solis, Muniz, and Hedrick. Neither does Plaintiff allege any specific incident during which Defendant Solis, Muniz, or Hedrick was given notice of a subordinate's unconstitutional conduct. Plaintiff's allegations are generally conclusory recitals. Hydrick makes clear that general allegations failing to describe specific incidents or policies are not enough to survive the Iqbal standard of pleading for a supervisory liability. Thus, Defendants Solis, Muniz, and Hedrick are entitled to summary judgment, and are DISMISSED from this action.")

Bock v. County of Sutter, No. 2:11–cv–00536–MCE–GGH, 2012 WL 3778953, *11 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 31, 2012) ("The requisite causal connection between a supervisor's wrongful conduct and the violation of the prisoner's constitutional rights can be established in a number of ways. Plaintiffs may show that a supervisor set in motion a series of acts by others, or knowingly refused to terminate a series of acts by others, which the supervisor knew or reasonably should have known would cause others to inflict a Constitutional injury. . . Similarly, a supervisor's own culpable action or inaction in the training, supervision, or control of his subordinates may establish supervisory liability. . . Finally, a supervisor's acquiescence in the alleged constitutional deprivation, or conduct showing deliberate indifference toward the possibility that deficient performance of the task may violate the rights of others, may establish the requisite causal connection. . .The Court dismissed Plaintiffs' supervisory liability claim in their First Amended Complaint on the basis that it did not sufficiently plead facts demonstrating each supervisory Defendant's role in any alleged deprivation. However, the additional facts pled in Plaintiffs' TAC allow the Court to infer that a reasonable trier of fact, after discovery, could reasonably find that the supervisory Defendants were aware of and failed to act on constitutional violations regularly practiced by the Sutter County Jail. The very fact that, as alleged, Decedent's court-ordered transfer, which could have saved his life, was purportedly disregarded implicates the supervisors because the type of error alleged suggests that the mistake was a result of flawed measures which were likely implemented by employees in managerial roles. Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Plaintiffs' Supervisory Liability claim against Defendants Parker, Samson and Bidwell is therefore DENIED.")

Campos v. County of Los Angles, No. CV 11–09613 DDP (PJWx), 2012 WL 3656518, *3, *4 (C.D. Cal. Aug. 23, 2012) ("Defendants also argue that all claims against Sheriff Baca should be dismissed because the SAC does not allege that he personally participated in Decedent's confinement or treatment. . . A supervisor may be individually liable if he is personally involved in a constitutional injury or where there is a 'sufficient causal connection between the supervisor's wrongful conduct and the constitutional violation.'. . Knowing refusal to terminate the acts of subordinates, inaction in training or control of subordinates, acquiescence in constitutional violations, or reckless or callous indifference to constitutional rights may constitute sufficient causal connection to a violation to confer individual liability upon a supervisor. . . In Starr, the Ninth Circuit found supervisory liability allegations against Sheriff Baca sufficient where the plaintiff's complaint alleged several incidents of deputy-on-inmate violence and inmate-on-inmate violence in Los Angeles County jails, that Sheriff Baca received notice of the incidents, and that Sheriff Baca acquiesced in the unconstitutional actions of his subordinates. . . Here, Defendants argue that Starr does not apply because this case about suicide, not the deputy-on-inmate violence and inmate-on-inmate violence alleged in Starr. The court is not persuaded. First, the SAC here does allege inmate-on-inmate violence. The SAC alleges that Decedent feared he would be killed by fellow inmates and requested a transfer to protective housing. . . The SAC further alleges that Decedent reported at least one, and possibly two, violent assaults against him by other inmates. . . Second, and more importantly, even putting aside inmate violence issues, the SAC makes numerous allegations regarding instances of inadequate mental health treatment within the jails (e.g.¶¶ 26, 30, 39), as well as allegations regarding Sheriff Baca's knowledge of mental health-related incidents and issues (e.g.¶¶ 15–17, 19–20, 28–29). Contrary to Defendants' argument, the question is not whether the allegations here are identical to those in Starr, but rather whether the SAC sufficiently alleges a causal connection between Sheriff Baca's conduct and Decedent's constitutional injuries.[footnote omitted] The court is satisfied that it does, and that the individual claims against Sheriff Baca are adequately pled.")

Tandel v. County of Sacramento , Nos. 2:11–cv–00353–MCE–GGH, 2:09–cv–00842–MCE–GGH, 2012 WL 3638449, at *8, *10, *11 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 22, 2012) ("A supervisor's physical presence is not required for supervisory liability. . . Rather, the requisite causal connection between a supervisor's wrongful conduct and the violation of the prisoner's Constitutional rights can be established in a number of ways. The plaintiff may show that the supervisor set in motion a series of acts by others, or knowingly refused to terminate a series of acts by others, which the supervisor knew or reasonably should have known would cause others to inflict a constitutional injury. . . Similarly, a supervisor's own culpable action or inaction in the training, supervision, or control of his subordinates may establish supervisory liability. . . Finally, a supervisor's acquiescence in the alleged constitutional deprivation, or conduct showing deliberate indifference toward the possibility that deficient performance of the task may violate the rights of others, may establish the requisite causal connection. . . .Plaintiff relies on Starr and Redman to sustain his claim that Dr. Hambly should be found deliberately indifferent as a supervisor. (Pl.'s Opp. at 12:8–22.) In Redman, a plaintiff specifically alleged that the Sheriff was ultimately in charge of the facility's operations, that the Sheriff knew that the facility was not a proper place to detain the plaintiff and posed a risk of harm to the plaintiff, but placed the plaintiff there anyway. . . In Starr, the plaintiff similarly alleged that the Sheriff knew of the unconstitutional activities in the jail, including that his subordinates were engaging in some culpable actions. . . In fact, the plaintiff's complaint in Starr contained numerous specific factual allegations demonstrating the Sheriff's knowledge of unconstitutional acts at the jail and the Sheriff's failure to terminate those acts, including that the U.S. Department of Justice gave the Sheriff clear written notice of a pattern of constitutional violations at the jail, that the Sheriff received 'weekly reports from his subordinates responsible for reporting deaths and injuries in the jails,' that the Sheriff personally signed a Memorandum of Understanding that required him to address and correct the violations at the Jail, and that the Sheriff was personally made aware of numerous concrete instances of constitutional deprivations at the jail. . . Here, on the other hand, Plaintiff's CSAC does not contain sufficient factual allegations demonstrating that Hambly was aware of Plaintiff's constitutional deprivations or of any other wrongful acts by Jail personnel. Dr. Hambly was not the interim medical director until the beginning of 2007, and yet most of Plaintiff's allegations that Dr. Hambly was on notice rely on reports made before he assumed this post. Accordingly, Plaintiff has not pleaded sufficient facts to support the inference that Hambly was deliberately indifferent to Plaintiff's medical needs. Inasmuch as leave to amend has already been accorded, the Court now dismisses Defendant Hambly from Plaintiff's first claim for relief.")

Ornelas v. Dickinson, No. 1:12–cv–0499–MJS (PC), 2012 WL 3638502, *3, *4 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 21, 2012) ("Plaintiff has not alleged facts demonstrating that Defendants Dickinson, Kramer, Riddle, Robles, Hein, and the Warden's Advisory Group personally acted to violate Plaintiff's personal rights. Plaintiff's allegations against these Defendants only relate to general actions taken against Southern Hispanic inmates generally. Plaintiff does not allege these individuals took any specific actions directed against him. Plaintiff's claims against Defendants Dickinson and the Warden's Advisory Group all relate to their policy-making activities or lack of supervision of policy making. Plaintiff's claims against Defendants Riddle, Robles, and Hein describe only orders they gave to other individuals. Plaintiff has not alleged that any of these Defendants, through their individual actions, violated his rights. Plaintiff shall be given the opportunity to file an amended complaint curing these deficiencies and undertaking specifically to link these Defendants to a violation of his rights.")

Tucker v. City of Santa Monica, No. CV 12–5367–SVW (MAN), 2012 WL 2970587, *6 (C.D. Cal. July 20, 2012) ("[A]lthough plaintiff alleges that Jackman 'turned a blind eye' to proof of the officers' wrongdoing in connection with the investigation of plaintiff's citizen's complaint (Complaint ¶ 10), allegations that a supervisor ratified an officer's conduct through the handling of a subsequent investigation cannot show that the supervisor caused the officer's conduct. See Jones v. County of Sacramento, 2010 WL 2843409, *6–7 (E.D.Cal., July 20, 2010) (discussing applicable case law and concluding that a supervisor's "isolated and subsequent ratification" of an officer's conduct by failing to sustain a citizen's complaint "can never be sufficient to show that the supervisor caused the officer's conduct," especially after Iqbal).")

Brown v. Hoops, No. CV 11–5415–CAS (DTB), 2012 WL 3582003, *13 (C.D. Cal. July 13, 2012) (R & R) ("Sheriff Hoops's liability is not so clear. In a post- Iqbal decision, the Ninth Circuit reiterated in Starr v. Baca, that, '[a] supervisor can be liable in his individual capacity for his own culpable action or inaction in the training, supervision, or control of his subordinates; for his acquiescence in the constitutional deprivation; or for conduct that showed a reckless or callous indifference to the rights of others.' 652 F.3d 1202, 1208 (9th Cir.2012) (citing Watkins v. City of Oakland, 145 F.3d 1087, 1093 (9th Cir.1998)). Under Starr, the Court finds that were plaintiff able to cite to an official policy of the Sheriff regarding the use of force that was unconstitutional on its face, liability could be imposed on Hoops when his subordinates acted pursuant to that policy. While plaintiff alleges that Hoops enacted the policy that lead to the use of force, no such official policy has been provided to the Court and no detail of the contents of any such policy has been set forth. Nor has plaintiff alleged that Hoops was present at the arrest or in any way involved in the arrest, or that he, for example, failed to intervene with the deputies['] unconstitutional use of force. As such, the Court finds that to the extent plaintiff is attempting to allege an excessive force claim against Sheriff Hoops, the allegations of the FAC are insufficient to do so.") Ramirez v. County of Los Angeles, No. CV 11–5370 AHM (MANx), 2012 WL 2574826, at *4, *5 (C.D. Cal. July 3, 2012) ("The Ninth Circuit's decision in Starr dealt with allegations similar to those at issue here. In that case, the plaintiff sued Baca in his individual capacity under a supervisory liability theory for injuries he suffered in a Los Angeles County Jail. The plaintiff specifically mentioned in the operative complaint 'numerous incidents in which inmates in Los Angeles County jails have been killed or injured because of the culpable actions of the subordinates of Sheriff Baca.'. . The plaintiff also alleged that Baca was given notice of these incidents and failed to take action to protect inmates in his care. . . The Ninth Circuit held that even under the Twombly/Iqbal standard, the allegations against Baca were sufficient. . . The court stated two reasons for its holding: (1) the detailed factual allegations in Starr's complaint went 'well beyond reciting the elements of a claim of deliberate indifference,' and (2) the allegations were 'plausible' because, unlike in Iqbal, there was no 'obvious alternative explanation' for why Baca took no action despite his knowledge of the constitutional violations occurring in his jails. . .Recently, in Hydrick v. Hunter, 669 F.3d 937, 2012 WL 89157, 4 (9th Cir.2012), the Ninth Circuit reaffirmed its holding Starr. The court made clear, however, that the decision in Starr was dependent on the numerous allegations describing specific incidents 'where Sheriff Baca was on notice of inmate deaths and injuries....'. . . In contrast, the defendants in Hydrick had made 'no allegation of a specific policy implemented by the Defendants or a specific event or events instigated by the Defendants that led to these purportedly unconstitutional searches.'. . As a result, the Ninth Circuit held that the plaintiff had failed to allege supervisory liability claims. . .In this case, Plaintiffs make the following allegations in the FAC:

• Hernandez died of a severe head injury he received during the time he was detained in the Twin Towers. (FAC ¶¶ 22–24.)
• Agents of the LASD either severely beat Hernandez or caused him to fall, causing injuries that resulted in his death. (FAC ¶ 28).
• Agents of the LASD 'routinely use excessive force on inmates.' (FAC ¶ 13.)
• Baca knew or reasonably should have known of the routine use of excessive force and that these acts would be 'likely to, and regularly did, result in severe injuries, including death, inflicting extreme anguish on the family members of the victims.' (FAC ¶¶ 12, 17.)
• '[I]n spite of his awareness,' Baca has refused to implement policy changes to prevent the use of excessive force and has enacted policies that prevent investigation of the allegations of abuse. (FAC ¶ 14–15.)
• Baca placed Hernandez under the custody and care of deputies who had documented propensities for unwarranted violence. (FAC ¶ 16.)

Like the defendants in Hydrick, Plaintiffs do not allege any specific past incidents of the use of excessive force by Baca's subordinates. Neither does Plaintiff allege any specific incident during which Baca was given notice of his subordinates' unconstitutional conduct. Plaintiffs' other allegations are generally conclusory recitals of the elements of a supervisory liability claim. Hydrick makes clear that without allegations describing specific incidents or policies, these allegations are not enough to survive the Iqbal standard of pleading for a supervisory liability. Thus, Plaintiff's § 1983 claim against Baca is dismissed with leave to amend.")

Fellows v. Baca, No. CV 10–0698–RSWL (JEM), 2012 WL 3150346, *12 (C.D. Cal. June 8, 2012) (R & R) ("Plaintiff alleges that Sheriff Baca was responsible for operation of the Jail and protecting the civil rights of inmates, including providing adequate medical care and treatment for civil detainees. . . Plaintiff further alleges that Sheriff Baca is responsible for administration of the Jail, particularly staff training regarding proper medical care, but that Baca failed to train, supervise and control his subordinates, which resulted in the deprivation of adequate medical care to Plaintiff. . . Specifically, Plaintiff has alleged facts demonstrating that a 'no room for civil detainees' policy was implemented at the Jail, which resulted in the regular denial and delay of medical treatment to civil detainees generally, and Plaintiff specifically. It is a reasonable inference that Sheriff Baca, as the Jail administrator, was aware of this policy and at least allowed it to continue. There is also evidence of a policy against providing expensive medical care for temporary civil detainees at the Jail, such as treatment to remove a kidney stone. The facts alleged demonstrate a lengthy history of Plaintiff complaining about severe abdominal pain, delay in providing medical appointments to diagnose the condition, and refusal to provide adequate care even after the condition was diagnosed. The facts alleged also evidence a long and widespread pattern of denying or delaying treatment of Plaintiff's other serious medical conditions, which could support a finding of culpable inaction directly attributable to Sheriff Baca in the supervision or control of his subordinates, or acquiescence in the constitutional deprivations at issue. Construing Plaintiff's pro se pleadings liberally, Plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts at this stage of the litigation to state a claim for deliberate indifference and failure to train and/or supervise against Sheriff Baca in his individual capacity.")

Alexander v. Nevada, No. 3:10–cv–00429–RCJ (WGC), 2012 WL 2190837, at *6, *7 (D. Nev. Mar. 12, 2012) (R & R), aff'd, 617 F. App'x 718 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Iqbal did not involve a claim of deliberate indifference under § 1983. In Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202 (9th Cir.2011), the Ninth Circuit stated, '[w]e see nothing in Iqbal indicating that the Supreme Court intended to overturn longstanding case law on deliberate indifference claims against supervisors in conditions of confinement cases.'. . . The Ninth Circuit found that the plaintiff in Starr included 'many allegations' 'detailing what Sheriff Baca knew or should have known, and what Sheriff Baca did or failed to do.'. . In the recent case of Hydrick v. Hunter, 2012 WL 89157 (9th Cir. Jan. 12, 2012), the Ninth Circuit determined that the factual allegations before the court more closely 'resemble[d] the "bald" and "conclusory" allegations in Iqbal, instead of the detailed factual allegations in Starr.'. . .In Hydrick, like the case currently before the court, the plaintiff's predicated, at least in part, on the theory that the defendants were liable because they created policies that violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . The Ninth Circuit concluded that instead of including specific allegations of wrongdoing, the plaintiff fell short by including only 'conclusory allegations and generalities.'. . . Here, the only allegations Plaintiff includes with respect to Defendants Bannister, Hartman, Morrow, Baca, Neven, Cox, and Skonik are that they are indirectly liable because they: (1) created policies which prohibit constitutional medical care; (2) failed to provide adequate staff or space to provide constitutional medical care; and (3) failed to resolve the issue after being informed there was a problem. . . . The allegations of the Amended Complaint are more akin to the conclusory allegations contained in Iqbal and Hydrick, than to the specific allegations in Starr. Accordingly, Defendants' motion to dismiss Defendants Bannister, Hartman, Morrow, Baca, Neven, Cox, and Skolnik should be granted with leave to amend.") Hamad v. Gate, No. C10–591 MJP, 2012 WL 1253167, at *4-*7 (W.D. Wash. Apr. 13, 2012) ("Gates argues Plaintiff's Second Amended Complaint still fails to allege Gates was personally involved in violating Hamad's constitutional rights. In this limited respect, the Court agrees. To proceed with his Bivens claim, Hamad must allege facts indicating that Secretary Gates was personally involved in and responsible for the alleged constitutional violations. . . . Hamad's allegation that Gates 'knew' that there were innocent men being held at Guantanamo Bay yet continued the policies of his predecessor is not a fact-based allegation; rather, it is still a bald legal conclusion. While 'legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint,' to survive a motion to dismiss 'they must be supported by factual allegations.'. . The Court finds Hamad's four added factual allegations are not enough to meet Iqbal's plausibility standard. First, Hamad's reliance on a statute setting forth the Secretary of Defense's responsibilities is weak. . . . Hamad fails to allege any policy guidance that Gates himself set regarding Guantanamo Bay let alone policy guidance that Gates set related to Hamad's unlawful detention. Second, Hamad's allegation that various officials evaluated and identified problems with Guantanamo Bay's military commissions is inapposite. . . . There is no factual allegation that Gates knew military officials were holding detainees whom the military itself determined should be freed. Third, a letter from 145 Congressmen to then-President Bush does not plausibly suggest Gates was personally involved in Hamad's unlawful detention. . . . While it is certainly possible that the letter put Gates on notice of constitutional violations in Guantanamo Bay, the Court does not find the letter suggests it was plausible. . . . Fourth, Hamad's pending habeas petition does not create a reasonable expectation that Gates was aware of Hamad's unlawful detention and/or Gates personally violated Hamad's constitutional rights. . . . At most, Hamad's factual allegations suggest Gates was aware Guantanamo Bay was under scrutiny when he took office in September 2006. However, Hamad's allegations do not nudge his claim that Gates personally participated in his unlawful detention 'across the line from conceivable to plausible.'. . . To the extent Hamad argues Gates is subject to supervisory liability, the Court finds Hamad's argument is weak. In the Ninth Circuit, a supervisor may be liable for the actions of subordinates only if the supervisor is personally involved in the constitutional deprivation, or if there is a sufficient causal connection between the supervisor's wrongful conduct and the constitutional deprivation. . . While 'wrongful conduct' may include a supervisor's inaction or acquiescence in the constitutional deprivation, the supervisor must still be aware of the unconstitutional conduct; otherwise, supervisory liability would melt into vicarious liability-which is not recognized in Bivens actions. . . As discussed, there is minimal factual allegation that Gates knew detainees were being unconstitutionally held in Guantanamo Bay let alone Gates implemented policies resulting in Hamad's constitutional deprivation. While Gates may have known he inherited a flawed detention system, Hamad has not alleged enough facts to suggest Gates knew detainees were being held in violation of the Fifth Amendment and therefore is not liable under supervisory liability. In sum, it is possible Gates knew Hamad was unlawfully detained, but it is not plausible based on the facts alleged. Unfortunately, this is not enough to survive dismissal under Iqbal.")

Hightower v. Tilton, No. C08–1129–MJP, 2012 WL 1194720, at *3, *4 (E.D. Cal. Apr. 10, 2012) ("Defendants argue that the 'supervisory Defendants'. . .'cannot be held liable based on knowledge and acquiescence in a subordinate's unconstitutional conduct because government officials, regardless of their title, can only be held liable under Section 1983 for his or her own conduct and not the conduct of others.'. . This is a partial and inaccurate statement of the law. A supervisor is only liable for constitutional violations of his subordinates if the supervisor participated in or directed the violations, or knew of the violations and failed to act to prevent them. There is no respondeat superior liability under section 1983. . . The supervisory Defendants may be held liable for the unconstitutional conduct of their subordinates which they were aware of and failed to prevent. Defendants are correct, however, that a causal link between the supervisors and the unconstitutional actions or policies must be specifically alleged. . . .In arguing that Plaintiff has not specifically alleged actions by these Defendants with a causal link to the constitutional/statutory violations, Defendants treat all of his allegations 'on information and belief' as conclusory and/or speculative. In fact, the rule in the Ninth Circuit is that pleading 'on information and belief' is sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss as long as the other Iqbal–Twombly factors are satisfied. . . . The Court holds that allegations pled on 'information and belief' should be reviewed in the same way as all factual allegations in a Complaint. That is, the Court will review them under Twombly's 12(b)(6) formulation requiring sufficient facts pleading to make a claim plausible. The mere fact that allegations begin with the statement 'on information and belief' will not automatically render them insufficient.")

Chacoan v. Rohrer, No. 2:05–cv–02276–MCE–KJN, 2012 WL 1021067, at *3 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 27, 2012) ("[C]ontrary to Plaintiff's contention, Starr did not create a new legal standard regarding supervisory liability under § 1983; it merely held that the United States Supreme Court's ruling in Ashcroft v. Iqbal . . . did not eliminate supervisory liability from the scope of Section 1983. . . After concluding that it did not, the court reaffirmed the long-standing 9th Circuit standards governing supervisory liability under Section 1983. . . To this end, the court did not err in utilizing Ninth Circuit Model Jury Instruction 9.3.") and 'copies nearly word for word' portions of the order dismissing plaintiff's complaint, in particular portions of footnote 3 of that order referring to allegations in the Starr complaint 'indicating that Baca received several reports of recurring serious problems in the jail and failed to correct them.'. . Defendant contends that plaintiff's 'plagiarized' allegations fail to show 'a history of similar occurrences' or Baca's personal participation in the alleged constitutional violations. . . . The mere fact that plaintiff's allegations charging Baca with knowledge of his subordinates' unconstitutional conduct are derived from Starr does not make those allegations conclusory or irrelevant in this action. The facts relevant to the question whether Baca knew or should have known that inmates faced a substantial risk of serious harm from particular conditions of confinement in the county jail will not be unique in every case, nor are they dependent on the identity of the inmate filing suit. At issue in Starr was whether the plaintiff adequately alleged that Baca was deliberately indifferent to the substantial risk to inmates of death and injuries posed by inmate-on-inmate violence and deputy-on-inmate violence. Like the plaintiff in Starr, plaintiff alleges that he was the victim of an unwarranted physical attack by a deputy that resulted in a serious physical injury. In Starr, the alleged incident of deputy-on-inmate violence occurred in January 2006. In this case, the alleged incident occurred in October 2007, approximately twenty months later. Like the plaintiff in Starr, plaintiff alleges that Baca received reports from the DOJ and the Special Counsel of 'a continuing and serious pattern and practice of constitutional violations, including abuse of inmates by deputies,' as well as 'notice of increasing levels of inmate violence, lax security and discipline, and other serious defects in Sheriff's Department practices and procedures....'. . . For purposes of a motion to dismiss, the elapsed time between the attack on the plaintiff in Starr and the deputy's alleged attack on plaintiff in this case and is not long enough to negate the inference that Baca knew or should have known that county inmates such as plaintiff faced a serious risk of injury of substantial harm from deputy-instigated violence and failed to take adequate steps to protect those inmates. Plaintiff's first amended complaint contains facts plausibly suggesting that Baca is 'liable in his individual capacity for his own culpable action or inaction in the training, supervision, or control of his subordinates.'. .Therefore, Baca's motion to dismiss the first amended complaint should be denied.")

Coley v. Baca, No. CV09–08595 CAS (AJW), 2012 WL 1340373, at *4-*6 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 8, 2012) ("Defendant contends that '[r]ather than alleging specific nonconclusory facts' sufficient to state a claim for supervisory liability against Baca, the amended complaint 'merely regurgitates'

Dubrin v. Bonilla, No. 1:11–cv–01484 AWI JLT (PC), 2012 WL 761714, at *3,*4 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 6, 2012) ("A defendant may be held liable as a supervisor under § 1983 if there exists 'either (1) his or her personal involvement in the constitutional deprivation; or (2) a sufficient causal connection between the supervisor's wrongful conduct and the constitutional violation.'. . In order to establish a causal connection, a plaintiff may show that the supervisor set in motion a series of acts by others, or knowingly refused to terminate a series of acts by others, which the supervisor knew or reasonably should have known would cause others to inflict a constitutional injury. . . However, a sufficient causal connection may be shown 'by evidence that the supervisor implemented a policy so deficient that the policy itself is a repudiation of constitutional rights.'. . Given Plaintiffs' allegations that Stainer approved of a policy to deprive the SHU inmates of exercise, Plaintiffs have alleged sufficient facts to state a claim against Defendant Stainer.")

Vaught v. Clark, No. CIV S–09–3422 MCE CKD P, 2012 WL 530198, at *5-*7 (E.D. Cal. Feb.

17, 2012) ("The central, offending act alleged in this case was the maintenance of lockdowns over periods of several weeks without provision for outdoor exercise. Although plaintiff is not specific exactly which defendant had direct control or involvement in the lockdowns, the defendants bear the initial burden of showing that as a matter of law it could not have been McDonald, Gower or Wright. It is reasonable to conclude, indeed, that by virtue of their supervisory positions in the prison, one or all of them were directly involved in the decision to enact the lockdowns and one or all of them were involved in the decision(s) to maintain the lockdowns over a long period of time. . . .The defendants cannot simply assert their supervisory positions as prima facie evidence that they had no connection to the alleged deprivation of exercise when plaintiff's core allegation is that the lockdowns were managed in such a way as to deprive him of the ability to exercise for weeks on end. Indeed, it is disingenuous to so argue in the face of plaintiff's clearly written claims: as to defendant Gower, he alleges that Gower 'is in [cahoots] with others to deprive Plaintiff of exercise for much longer than 10 days at a time'; as to defendant Wright, he alleges that Wright has violated his rights under the Eighth Amendment by not providing plaintiff the ability to exercise; and as to defendant McDonald, he alleges that McDonald used his 'controlling authority' in 'not affording Plaintiff his exercise every 10 days ... in violation of the Constitution[.]'. . These are clear allegations of direct involvement in a constitutional violation. Defendants' argument that the complaint asserts liability against them only under a theory of vicarious liability is contradicted by these plain words and is without merit. . . . As for the subjective prong of his claims, plaintiff does not explicitly aver 'deliberate indifference' by defendants. However, he does color the long-term prohibition on outdoor exercise as 'similar to keeping two pit bulls in a cell for months at a time," "treating human beings like trash," and indicative of a practice in which a 'human [is] less than an animal.'. . For purposes of this motion, these allegations, while unorthodox as assertions of deliberate indifference, satisfy the subjective prong of plaintiff's Eighth Amendment claim.")

Ofeldt v. McDaniel, No. 3:10–cv–00494–RCJ–WGC, 2012 WL 506010, at *1, *2 (D. Nev. Feb. 15, 2012) ("[T]he Court disagrees that McDaniel can be personally liable under § 1983 as the First Amended Complaint is pled. There is no respondeat superior liability under § 1983. . . A supervisor can be held liable under § 1983 without committing the act himself or even being present when another commits it, but only if he directly sets into motion the particular violation at issue via his supervisory authority or refuses to stop actions of which he is or should be aware. See Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1205–07 (9th Cir.2011). Under this standard, the magistrate judge reasonably opined that McDaniel as warden could potentially be held personally liable for deliberate indifference to the allegedly unconstitutional conditions complained of in disciplinary segregation at ESP, because McDaniel is alleged to have put in place the policies that led to those conditions and was aware of those conditions but did not remedy them. But the magistrate judge did not have the benefit of Hydrick v. Hunter, No. 03–56712, 2012 WL 89157 (9th Cir. Jan. 12, 2012), which case distinguished Starr. In Hydrick, the plaintiff complained of unconstitutional conditions of confinement, as Plaintiff does here, and the Court of Appeals ruled that the complaint did not satisfy Iqbal with respect to supervisory liability under § 1983, because 'there is no allegation of a specific policy implemented by the Defendants or a specific event or events instigated by the Defendants that led to these purportedly unconstitutional searches.'. . The same is true here. Plaintiff complains of the conditions in disciplinary segregation at ESP but does not identify any specific policies implemented by McDaniel leading to the alleged harms or any specific events instigated by McDaniel himself.")

Hardesty v. Barcus, No. CV 11–103–M–DWM–JCL, 2012 WL 705862, at *9 (D. Mont. Jan. 20, 2012) ("While the factual allegations in support of Hardesty's Section 1983 supervisory liability claim are relatively sparse, they are adequate to satisfy Twombly and Iqbal. Hardesty alleges, for example, that Barcus violated MHP policies on the use of force by hitting him with the Maglite flashlight, and that Tooley set those events in motion by failing to properly train, supervise, or control Barcus 'such that the laws, rules and regulations regarding the use of force and deadly force were violated by Trooper Barcus.'. . Hardesty also alleges that Tooley 'failed to properly investigate and punish prior constitutional deprivations, which encouraged a culture in the[ ] department[ ] of excessive use of force.'. . These allegations are sufficient to state a claim that is 'plausible on its face,' and to 'raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of' a basis for Tooley's liability. . . Hardesty's supervisory liability claim is thus sufficient to withstand Tooley's Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss.")

Schwartz v. Lassen County ex rel. Lassen County Jail, 838 F.Supp.2d 1045, 1056 (E.D. Cal. 2012) ("In this case, based on two of the aforementioned theories, Plaintiff's complaint contains sufficient factual allegations to establish a causal connection between Mineau's allegedly wrongful conduct and the constitutional violation such that it survives Defendants' motion to dismiss. First, the complaint contains sufficient factual allegations to permit the court to reasonably infer that Mineau plausibly refused to terminate a series of acts by his subordinates, which the supervisor knew or reasonably should have known would cause others to inflict a Constitutional injury. Specifically, Plaintiff alleges that Decedent's physical health was visibly deteriorating, that he had requested medical care on numerous occasions, that Mineau knew of his deteriorating health but, as undersheriff of Lassen County, failed to ensure that the Facility provided him sufficient medical care. Moreover, based on these same facts, the court can reasonably infer that Mineau plausibly acquiesced in the alleged constitutional deprivation and was deliberately indifferent to the possibility that his subordinates deficiently performed in providing Decedent necessary medical care. In sum, at this stage of the litigation, in which little to no discovery [footnote omitted] has been conducted, and where all reasonable inferences must be drawn in favor of Plaintiff, the Court cannot conclude that, based on the facts as alleged, Plaintiff has no plausible claim that Mineau is liable under Section 1983 for Plaintiff's constitutional deprivation in either his individual or supervisory capacity.")

Lovejoy v. Arpaio, No. CV09–1912–PHX–NVW, 2011 WL 6759552, at *19, *23, *24 (D. Ariz. Dec. 23, 2011) ("On this record, it was unconstitutional to arrest Lovejoy for animal cruelty. But as noted previously, Lovejoy has not sued the officers who actually performed the arrest (Simonson and Summers). Lovejoy hangs his entire case on proving that Arpaio was responsible. A supervisor may be liable for subordinates' unconstitutional acts if the supervisor engaged in 'culpable action or inaction in the training, supervision, or control of his subordinates.' Larez v.

City of Los Angeles, 946 F.2d 630, 646 (9th Cir.1991). Thus, a supervisor may be liable if he or she:
• sets in motion a series of acts by others, or knowingly refuses to terminate a series of acts by others, which he knows or reasonably should know, would cause others to inflict the constitutional injury;
• acquiesces in the constitutional deprivations of which the complaint is made; or • otherwise engages in conduct that shows a reckless or callous indifference to the rights of others.
. . Summary judgment in favor of Arpaio is appropriate unless Lovejoy has sufficient evidence from which a jury could conclude that one of these supervisory liability standards i[s] met. Sufficient evidence exists from which a reasonable jury could conclude that Arpaio, in his supervisory role, acted to ensure that Lovejoy would be charged, or culpably failed to act to prevent others from bringing such charges. . . . As the Court concluded in a prior order, Arpaio is a final policymaker for Maricopa County in the context of criminal law enforcement. . . His acts therefore represent official Maricopa County 'policy.' Lovejoy has raised a triable issue of fact here. Indeed, Lovejoy's Monell case is substantially the same as his case against Arpaio personally. Both depend on proving that Arpaio caused or acquiesced in Lovejoy's arrest, and that Arpaio ensured Lovejoy would be prosecuted or otherwise remains responsible for the prosecution as the continuing injury caused by the arrest. As discussed above, Lovejoy has sufficient evidence to put those accusations before a jury. The only difference between Lovejoy's claim against Arpaio personally and Lovejoy's claim against the County is that the County has no qualified immunity defense. . . Thus, even if Arpaio was entitled to qualified immunity in his individual capacity (which he is not, see Part V.D, above), trial would still be necessary on Lovejoy's claim of County liability. Summary judgment on County liability will therefore be denied.")

Anderson v. Hartley, No. 1:09-cv-1924-LJO-MJS (PC), 2011 WL 5876913, at *3 (E.D. Cal. Nov. 22, 2011) ("Plaintiff alleged that Defendant Hartley had or should have had knowledge of the risk created by Defendant Hansen and was deliberately indifferent to that risk. Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that multiple incidents of excessive force by Defendant Hansen were brought to the attention of Defendant Hartley. Despite having knowledge of several such incidents, Defendant Hartley took no action to prevent further harm to prisoners. Instead he left Defendant Hansen in a position where he could, and did, continue using excessive force on prisoners and did use such force against Plaintiff. . . . Plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to state a claim against Defendant Hartley for failure to protect in violation of the Eighth Amendment.")

McCabe v. Gibbons, No. 3:09-cv-00244-LRH-RAM, 2011 WL 2608603, at *3 (D. Nev. June 30, 2011) ("Here, plaintiff alleges that all of the supervisory defendants became 'aware of the grossly inadequate and dangerously negligent medical care ... at Ely State Prison as early as May 2007' when they learned of the investigation being conducted by the American Civil Liberties Union ("ACLU") . . . Plaintiff alleges that his medical treatment was specifically investigated by the ACLU and included in a report sent to the supervisory defendants in 2008. . . Plaintiff also alleges that the supervisory defendants became aware of the inadequate medical treatment he was being provided because of the media and medical releases he signed in conjunction with the ACLU investigation. . . Plaintiff claims that despite the supervisory defendants' knowledge of his medical situation, they failed to take any action in response to his serious medical needs. . . These allegations are sufficiently detailed to put the supervisory defendants on notice of plaintiff's claims that they had knowledge of unconstitutional conduct by others and acquiesced in that conduct. Additionally, plaintiff's allegations contain enough facts to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence to support those allegations. Although the court recognizes that the supervisory defendants who are members of the Board of Prison Commissioners are policymakers who may not be present for the day-to-day activities at the prisons, even policymakers may be held liable when, with a sufficient level of personal participation, they condone or ratify the unconstitutional conduct of subordinates.")

Cruz v. County of San Bernardino, No. CV 11-1821 CAS (DTBx), 2011 WL 1790717, at *6 (C.D. Cal. May 9, 2011) ("Defendants argue that the Court should dismiss plaintiff's supervisory liability claim because the allegations are conclusory and fail to set forth sufficient facts showing a causal connection between Sheriff Hoops's conduct and plaintiff's injury. . . The Court disagrees. Plaintiff alleges that Sheriff Hoops has taken no measures to implement any form of independent review of deputies' statements or investigation of citizen complaints. . . According to plaintiff, this practice of 'rubber stampin'" deputies' statements and reports, has resulted in a system whereby deputies' false statements are never investigated. . . Plaintiff further alleges that Sheriff Hoops is aware of numerous citizen complaints and lawsuits alleging excessive force by sheriff's deputies, but that he has taken no measures to independently investigate them. . . The Court concludes that these allegations relating to Sheriff Hoops's inaction in the training, supervision, and control of his deputies are sufficient to state a claim.").

Taylor v. Clark, No. 1:07-cv-00032-AWI-SMS PC, 2011 WL 917382, at *6, *7, *9 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 16, 2011) ("It is true that the Supreme Court has rejected liability on the part of supervisors for 'knowledge and acquiescence' in subordinates' wrongful discriminatory acts. . . However, Defendants argument that Iqbal effectively eviscerated supervisory liability is without merit as in the very same decision, the Supreme Court held that 'discrete wrongs − for instance, beatings − by lower level Government actors ... if true and if condoned by [supervisors] could be the basis for some inference of wrongful intent on [the supervisors'] part.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1952 (emphasis added). Further, the Ninth Circuit very recently held that '... where the applicable constitutional standard is deliberate indifference, a plaintiff may state a claim for supervisory liability based upon the supervisor's knowledge of and acquiescence in unconstitutional conduct by others.' Starr v. Baca, __ F.3d __, 2011 WL 477094, *4 (9th Cir. Feb. 11, 2011). It is under this rubric that the traditional and still valid elements of supervisor liability within the Ninth Circuit are properly analyzed. . . . Accordingly, the crux of issues in this case for purposes of this motion is whether Defendants Clark and Adams knew, or reasonably should have known, of Defendant McKesson's propensity for violence (via the various investigations into accusations against him) and whether they could have taken supervisory and/or disciplinary actions towards Defendant McKesson, other than as actually occurred to equate to a failure to act, that they knew or reasonably should have known would cause instances of Defendant McKesson using excessive force such as the type Plaintiff claims caused him injury in this case. . . . Defendants further suggest that supervisor liability has been 'entirely eliminated,' or has at least been severely narrowed such that 'liability may no longer be based on inaction, such as knowledge and acquiescence and a failure to act or deliberate indifference regarding a subordinate's alleged unconstitutional conduct,' but rather that 'liability may only be found where the supervisor commits a purposeful act that leads to the deprivation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights.'. . While Defendants' arguments along this vein would be true if this case dealt with a discrimination action under the First or Fifth Amendments, as discussed above, this argument does not extend and should not be applied to claims of deliberate indifference under the Eighth Amendment.")

Gonzales v. Cate, No. 1:09-cv-02149 LJO GSA PC, 2011 WL 23068, at *2 (E.D. Cal. Jan. 4, 2011) ("[I]n order to hold Warden Hartley liable, Plaintiff must allege facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and facts indicating that Wardeny Hartley drew the inference. . . Here, Plaintiff alleges that he was assaulted, and that Hartley and the other defendants should have known of the risk. Plaintiff has not alleged any facts indicating how Defendant Hartley knew of the risk. He should therefore be dismissed.")

Kennedy v. Hayes, No. 1:09-cv-01946 JLT (PC), 2010 WL 5440805, at *8 (E.D. Cal. Dec. 28, 2010) (Here, Plaintiff seeks to impose liability on the A-Yard medical supervisor ("Doe 1") and the direct supervisor of defendant Hayes ("Doe 2"). . . However, Plaintiff has failed to allege these defendants knew of any alleged unlawful action. Furthermore, the deliberate indifference standard is met only when prison officials have actual knowledge; it is not sufficient to allege the defendants should have been aware of Plaintiff's medical needs. Finally, though Plaintiff states the supervisors acted with deliberate indifference, this conclusory statement, unsupported by any facts, is insufficient to state a claim.")

Fields v. Adam, No. 1:09-cv-1770-MJS (PC), 2010 WL 5113071, at *4 (E.D. Cal. Dec. 8, 2010) ("In this case, Plaintiff alleges only that the Supervisory Defendants knew of the unlawful search and failed to prevent it. There is no allegation that any of them actually participated in the search, that they ordered the search, or that the search was conducted pursuit to a policy that they implemented. Accordingly, Plaintiff has failed to state a claim against any of the Supervisory Defendants. He shall be given leave to amend these claims to attempt to address the deficiencies noted herein.")

Pruitt v. Clark, No. 1:07-cv-01709-AWI-SMS, 2010 WL 3063254, at *5 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 3, 2010) ("The Court finds that Plaintiff's allegations state a claim against Defendants Curtiss and Wan but not Defendant Watking. Defendant Watking conducted an administrative review of Plaintiff's appeal and did not have authority over the work change area or its employees, policies, and practices. There simply is not sufficient factual support for a facially plausible claim that Defendant Watking violated Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights. . . Defendants Curtiss and Wan, by contrast, had authority over work change and its policies and practices, and were aware that routine cross-gender strip searches were taking place. This is sufficient to state a claim under section 1983. . . Turning last to Defendants Clark and Fisher, Plaintiff alleges only that he sent Warden Clark a letter and Fisher responded on Clark's behalf, telling Plaintiff to file an inmate appeal. Defendants Clark and Fisher are only liable for their own misconduct, and the allegations that a letter was sent and responded to with the direction to file an inmate appeal fall short of stating a facially plausible Fourth Amendment claim against them.").

Herrera v. Hall, No. 1:08-cv-01882-LJO-SKO PC, 2010 WL 2791586, at *4, *5 (E.D. Cal. July 14, 2010) ("[I]t was unclear whether the plaintiff's administrative appeal was a request for medical treatment or whether the plaintiff was merely complaining about another prison official's failure to provide him with treatment. The distinction is important because an appeals coordinator does not cause or contribute to a completed constitutional violation that occurs in the past. See George v. Smith, 507 F.3d 605, 609-610 (7th Cir.2007) ("[a] guard who stands and watches while another guard beats a prisoner violates the Constitution; a guard who rejects an administrative complaint about a completed act of misconduct does not"). However, if there is an ongoing constitutional violation and the appeals coordinator had the authority and opportunity to prevent the ongoing violation, a plaintiff may be able to establish liability by alleging that the appeals coordinator knew about an impending violation and failed to prevent it. . . . Iqbal does not support Defendants' proposition that 'a defendant who is involved only to the extent that he or she considered a plaintiff's inmate appeal may not be held liable.' Iqbal does not even discuss the processing of inmate appeals. Further, even if Defendants could be considered supervisors, Plaintiff is not attempting to hold them liable for the unconstitutional conduct of their subordinates. Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged that Defendants' own individual actions in denying Plaintiff's requests for medical treatment violated the Constitution. Plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to state a claim against [Defendant supervisors].")

Lee v. Alameida, No. 1:02-cv-05037-LJO-GSA-PC, 2010 WL 2629800, at *4 (E.D. Cal. June 29, 2010) ("In the order granting Plaintiff leave to file a first amended complaint, he was advised that in City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989), the Supreme Court held that, under certain circumstances, a municipality may be held liable based on the failure to train its employees. This Court finds no authority for the extension of City of Canton and its progeny to state prison officials being sued in their personal capacity. It appears to this Court, following a review of relevant case law, that the cases involving failure to train are limited to suits against city and county entities. This claim should therefore be dismissed.").

Jones v. Stieferman, No. CIV S-06-2732-FCD-CMK-P, 2010 WL 2546061, at *2 (E.D. Cal. June 23, 2010) ("Plaintiff names Warden Pliler as a defendant in this action based solely on the allegation that she refused to intervene in his mistreatment. As stated above, a supervisory defendant can only be liable for his or her own conduct, not that of others. Except for his allegation that he attempted to communicate with Warden Pliler about his mistreatment, and therefore she was presumably aware of it and failed to intervene, there are no allegations of any affirmative conduct by Warden Pliler. Plaintiff makes no allegation that Warden Pliler actively participated in his alleged mistreatment. Knowledge and acquiescence of mistreatment is insufficient to impose liability on a supervisory defendant. As discussed above, Plaintiff has been provided sufficient opportunity to cure defects in his complaints, and therefore the undersigned recommends that defendant Pliler be dismissed from this action, without leave to amend, for failure to state a claim.")

Coleman v. Adams, No. 1:06-cv-00836-AWI-SKO PC, 2010 WL 2572534, at *6, *7 (E.D. Cal. June 22, 2010) ("Defendants contend that mere 'awareness' of the negligent acts of their subordinates is not sufficient to hold them liable under Section 1983. However, Plaintiff has alleged more tha[n] mere negligence. . . Defendants' awareness of the fact that Plaintiff was not receiving treatment for his vision problem and did not receive a lower bunk assignment is sufficient to hold them liable for their failure to act. Plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to hold [Defendants] liable for their participation in the alleged deprivation of Plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . .Taken together, Mann, Ramirez, and Buckley cannot be read broadly enough to support the proposition that the processing of an administrative appeal cannot, in any circumstances, form the basis of a claim to relief under Section 1983. Mann, Ramirez, and Buckley are limited to holding that a Plaintiff has no substantive right to a prison grievance system and that due process claims based on the denial of or interference with a prisoner's access to a prison grievance system are not cognizable. Thus, if a prisoner were to raise a claim premised on an asserted denial of due process caused by denied or obstructed access to a prison's administrative grievance system, the claim would not be cognizable under Mann, Ramirez, and Buckley. Here, Plaintiff is not claiming a loss of a substantive right in the processing of his appeals caused by denied or obstructed access to a prison grievance system. Plaintiff's Section 1983 claim is not premised on Defendants' failure to process his grievances, consider evidence, hear witnesses, provide written findings or otherwise deny Plaintiff's administrative complaints without adequate process. Plaintiff is raising an Eighth Amendment claim, not a Fourteenth Amendment claim. Plaintiff's reference to the administrative complaint system merely bolsters his allegation that supervisory personnel had actual awareness of the risk to Plaintiff's safety. Nothing in the cases cited by Defendants bars Plaintiff from proceeding on that theory. The decisions in Mann and Ramirez do not touch upon whether an appeal reviewer's actions can be considered 'cruel and unusual' within the meaning of the Eighth Amendment.")

Bovarie v. Tilton, No. 06CV687 JLS (NLS), 2010 WL 743741, at *3, *4 (S.D. Cal. Mar. 1, 2010) ("This Court has previously found that the Plaintiff has sufficiently pled causation on behalf of Defendants, which included directors, wardens, lieutenants, captains and library staff in his Third Amended Complaint. . . The Court found that 'plaintiff alleged the implementations and enforcement of law library policies that effectively denied plaintiff access to the court.'. . . Magistrate Judge Stormes went on to reject defendants' argument that Plaintiff merely alleged the conclusory statement that Defendant [sic] were 'grossly negligent in the supervision and duty' and found that Plaintiff adequately pled that Defendants adopted and enforced policies which led to a deprivation of Plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . Despite this earlier Order, Defendants ask the court to re-evaluate the 4AC in light of Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. __, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1943 (2009), where the United States Supreme Court clarified the pleading standard under Rule 8. In Defendants

R & R currently at issue, Magistrate Judge Stormes recommends that this Court reverse its earlier finding and grant the Defendant Directors' . . . motion to dismiss with prejudice. . . The Court disagrees. . . . In light of the Court's holding in Iqbal, Magistrate Judge Stormes found that Plaintiff's allegation that the Directors interfered with his access to the courts by 'promulgating, enforcing and allowing policies, procedures and operations that deny access to legal resources' was no more than a 'formulaic recitation of the elements of a constitutional ... claim.'. . Then, the magistrate judge found that the allegations that Defendant were grossly negligent in their supervision and failed to provide adequate training, funding, and policy for the law libraries was 'insufficient to state a claim against the Directors because even if true, they fail to allege the necessary knowledge and state of mind to established that the Director Defendants caused a violation of Plaintiff's right to access the courts.'. . Plaintiff objects to this recommendation, arguing that Iqbal involved a different constitutional violation than in the present case and that the magistrate judgment mis-characterized and mis-summarized his allegations as they pertain to the Director Defendants. . . The Court sustains Plaintiff's objections and rejects Magistrate Judge Stormes' recommendation as it pertains to the Director Defendants. First, it is unclear what standard regarding state of mind and knowledge Magistrate Judge Stormes found was insufficiently pled. The standard applied in Iqbal was purposeful discrimination; here, it is deliberate indifference. Moreover, Magistrate Judge Stormes does not explain why Iqbal would change the Court's earlier finding that Plaintiff sufficiently pled deliberate indifference on behalf of the Director Defendants. Iqbal did not change this standard, nor what must be pled under this standard. . . . The fact that both the Director Defendants and the respondents in Iqbal were high-ranking government officials is not sufficient to overturn this Court's previous findings. Accordingly, the Court, having reviewed the 4AC and the decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, adheres to its original determination that Plaintiff has sufficiently pled a violation of his constitutional right of access to courts on behalf of the Director Defendants.").

Feb. 1, 2010) ("In his deposition, Chief of Police Mark Paresi testified that under his leadership the North Las Vegas Police Department decided to allow their officers to carry and use tasers and implemented a set of policies and procedures regulating their use. . . Paresi further testified that after reviewing the police report in this case, he concluded that Officer Miller appropriately followed police department procedure when he chose to tase Eastman. As noted above, a genuine factual dispute exists regarding whether Officer Miller violated the Eastman's Fourth Amendment rights when he used his taser on him. Consequently, if the finder of fact concludes that Miller is liable under § 1983, the Supervising Officers can also be held liable because they approved and implemented the policies governing the use of tasers that led to this incident.”).

Avila v. Cate, No. 1:09-cv-00918-SMS PC, 2009 WL 5029827, at *3 (E.D. Cal. Dec. 15, 2009) (“[W]hile a supervisor may be held liable for the constitutional violations of his or her subordinates under section 1983 if he or she ‘participated in or directed the violations, or knew of the violations and failed to act to prevent them,’ *Taylor v. Therefore, Plaintiff’s attempt to hold Defendants liable for racial discrimination because they were placed on notice of it via his inmate appeals fails as a matter of law. Id. These Defendants were not personally involved in intentionally discriminating against Plaintiff and the claim against them is subject to dismissal.”).

Castillo v. Skwarski, No. C08-5683BHS, 2009 WL 4844801, at *7, *8 (W.D. Wash. Dec. 10, 2009) (“Defendants argue that in Ashcroft v. Iqbal . . . ‘the Supreme Court eliminated the theory of supervisory liability from Bivens suits.’. . In Iqbal, the Court stated that because ‘vicarious liability is inapplicable to Bivens ... suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official’s own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.’. . Although this holding seems to have limited the liability of supervisors, the Court disagrees with Defendants’ proposition that supervisor liability has been ‘eliminated.’In an opinion issued post-Iqbal, the Ninth Circuit identified four general situations in which supervisory liability may be imposed: (1) for setting in motion a series of acts by others, or knowingly refusing to terminate a series of acts by others, which they knew or reasonably should have known would cause others to inflict constitutional injury; (2) for culpable action or inaction in training, supervision, or control of subordinates; (3) for acquiescence in the constitutional deprivation by subordinates; or (4) for conduct that shows a reckless or callous indifference to the rights of others. Al-Kidd v. Ashcroft, 580 F.3d 949, 965 (9th Cir.2009) . . . In this case, Defendant Melendez argues that the Court should dismiss Plaintiff’s claims against him because the complaint lacks an allegation of his personal participation. . .The Court agrees. Plaintiff’s complaint alleges as follows: 1.2.5. At all times relevant, Michael Melendez was the Immigration and Customs Enforcement Supervising Deportation and Removal Officer for the Northwest Detention Center. On information and belief, at all times relevant, Michael Melendez was responsible for training and supervision of the ICE agents and officers whose conduct caused the injuries alleged herein. As part of his job responsibilities, Officer Melendez had a duty to ensure that no U.S. citizens were detained by ICE. At all relevant times Officer Melendez was acting under color of federal law and is sued in his individual capacity. * * * 3.33. On information and belief, with deliberate indifference, intent, or reckless disregard, Defendants failed to adequately and properly train and supervise Agents Carl Stephens and Julie Stephens and other officers and agents involved in the arrest, detention, questioning, and removal proceedings to which Mr. Castillo was subjected. On information and belief, Defendants' failure to provide proper and adequate training and supervision was a proximate cause of the injuries that Mr. Castillo suffered. . .The pleaded facts against Defendant Melendez are no more than labels and conclusions because Plaintiff alleges only that Defendant Melendez 'was responsible for training and supervision' and that he failed to provide 'proper and adequate training.' Moreover, based on these assertions, the Court is left to simply infer the mere possibility of culpable conduct by Defendant Melendez. Therefore, the Court grants Defendants' motion on this issue and Plaintiff's claims against Defendant Melendez are dismissed without prejudice. With respect to Defendant Potter, he argues that Plaintiff's complaint against him is 'similarly flawed.'. . The Court disagrees because Plaintiff has alleged more than mere labels and conclusions. For example, Plaintiff has alleged that (1) Defendant Potter unlawfully approved the Form I-213 and issued an invalid Notice to Appear when he knew, or recklessly or callously disregarded evidence that Plaintiff was a United States citizen, Complaint, & 3.11-3.13, and (2) Defendant Potter's failure to conduct any investigation into the I-213, despite inconsistencies, demonstrates deliberate indifference to [Plaintiff's] constitutional rights, Id. & 3.33, 5.3, 5.7. The Court finds that Plaintiff has pled sufficient facts to state a claim that is plausible on its face. Therefore, the Court denies Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's claim against Defendant Potter.").

Booth v. Carvell, No. CV-F-08-1912 LJO GSA, 2009 WL 4730910, at * 8 (E.D. Cal. Dec. 7, 2009) ("The fourth cause of action for failure to instruct, supervise, control and discipline is . . . insufficient under Iqbal. The claim incorporates all preceding allegations and states in a conclusory fashion: 23. At all relevant times, the defendants executing the warrants were acting under the direction and control of the unknown DOE superiors and supervisors. 24. Acting under color of state law, the unknown DOE superiors and supervisors intentionally, knowing, recklessly and with deliberate indifference to the rights of the inhabitants of the area failed to instruct, supervise, control and/or discipline the defendants who executed the warrants to refrain from conducting unlawful searches and seizures, and otherwise depriving citizens of their constitutional and statutory rights, privileges and immunities. 25. Defendant unknown DOE superior and supervisors had knowledge or should have had knowledge that the wrongs alleged herein were going to be committed and had the power to prevent, or aid in preventing, the commission of said wrongs, could have done so, and intentionally, knowingly, or with deliberate indifference to the rights of inhabitants of the area, failed or refused to do so. . . Plaintiff has failed to allege any factual support for his claims of supervisor liability under section 1983. . . . Plaintiff has alleged no facts indicating any personal involvement by defendants. The fact that each of the DOE defendants holds a supervisory position alone, does not render them liable for conduct of their staff. The fourth cause of action alleges no more than what the Supreme Court explicitly warned against, 'a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949. Nov. 23, 2009) ("Although not specified in Iqbal, it seems logical that the more removed a defendant is from a plaintiff, the more factual specificity would be necessary to entitle an allegation to the presumption of truth and to plausibly suggest an entitlement to relief. In other words, where defendants are closely connected to the plaintiff's day to day activities, it would take less factual specificity to survive a motion to dismiss than where the defendants are as far removed as the Attorney General and the FBI Director. . . . The Iqbql Court rejected the plaintiff's argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.' Id. at 1949. This rejection, however, was based upon the requirement of pleading a discriminatory purpose in order to state a claim for discrimination. Thus, the allegation of knowledge of a subordinate's discriminatory purpose was insufficient to state a claim against the supervisor because there was no allegation that the supervisory individually had a discriminatory purpose. Accordingly, Iqbal does not invalidate prior case law stating that supervisory knowledge and failure to stop a constitutional violation is sufficient to state a claim for supervisory liability.").

Kelly v. State of Arizona, acting ex rel. the Arizona Dept. of Corrections, No. CV-09-824-PHX-DGC, 2009 WL 3756699, at *4, *5 & n.3 (D. Ariz. Nov. 6, 2009) ("Plaintiffs do not allege that Defendants Schriro or Larson were present on the yard when Sean Kelly was murdered. They do not allege that Defendants Schriro and Larson had any direct involvement in the unfortunate events of that day. Given Defendant Schriro's role as director of the Arizona Department of Corrections and Defendant Larson's role as warden of the entire Arizona State Prison Complex–Lewis, it is not plausible to believe that either of them knew specifically what was occurring on the yard on the day Sean Kelly was murdered, knew the location or movements of specific inmates that day, knew that the inmates were somehow gaining access to the housing unit in which Sean Kelly was located, or knew that prisoners were allowed to pass through a metal detector without monitoring. The greater factual detail contained in these paragraphs almost certainly applies to the guards who were on the ground − the John Doe defendants named in the case. The paragraphs cannot reasonably be read as applying to Defendants Schriro and Larson. The Court presumes that this is why Plaintiffs assert the allegations only against 'Defendants' generically. Because the more factually specific paragraphs cannot be read as applying to Defendants Schriro and Larson, and the paragraphs that do name Defendants Schriro and Larson are entirely conclusory, the count one claims against Schriro and Larson must be dismissed. . . . Plaintiffs have pleaded no factual material which plausibly suggests that Defendants Schriro and Larson acted with deliberate indifference toward Sean Kelly − that they were aware of the risk of harm to Sean Kelly and deliberately chose to disregard that risk. As noted above, the requirement is one of actual, subjective intentC'the official must both be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and he must also draw the inference.' Farmer, 511 U.S. at 837. Because Plaintiffs have failed to plead facts that satisfy this standard, count one will be dismissed as to Defendants Schriro and Larson. . . . Iqbal also appears to have scaled back supervisory liability under § 1983 and Bivens claims. Iqbal rejected the argument that 'a supervisor's mere knowledge of his subordinate's discriminatory purpose amounts to the supervisor's violating the Constitution.' 129 S.Ct. at 1949. The Supreme Court explained: 'In a § 1983 suit or a Bivens action − where masters do not answer for the torts of their servants − the term Asupervisory liability' is a misnomer. Absent vicarious liability, each Government official, his or her title notwithstanding, is only liable for his or her own misconduct.' Id. The Supreme Court concluded that 'purpose rather than knowledge is required.' Id. The Court need not decide whether this language would eliminate the liability of Defendants Schriro and Larson based solely on their knowledge that others within the Department of Corrections were violating Sean Kelly's constitutional rights. Even if such knowledge remains sufficient for a § 1983 claim, Plaintiffs have not alleged facts sufficient to show such knowledge.").

Shehee v. Baca, No. CV 08-2277-FMC (E), 2009 WL 3462174, at *6 n.6 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 23, 2009) ("After Iqbal, the issue of whether an individual's knowing failure to act, alone, can justify section 1983 liability is unclear. Iqbal noted that 'purpose rather than knowledge' is required to impose liability on defendants for discharging their responsibilities in a way that may have resulted in constitutional deprivations. See Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949 (discussing same); see also al-Kidd v. Ashcroft, 580 F.3d at 976 & n. 25 (acknowledging dissent's contention that the 'knowing failure to act' standard did not survive Iqbal, but refusing to reach the issue).

TENTH CIRCUIT

Burke v. Regalado, 935 F.3d 960, 1001 (10th Cir. 2019) ("It was reasonable for the jury to find (1) Sheriff Glanz was responsible for 'an unconstitutional policy or custom,' Dodds, 614 F.3d at 1199, of poor training, inadequate staffing, and lack of urgency surrounding jail medical care; (2) that this policy or conduct resulted in a violation of Mr. Williams's right to adequate medical care under the Fourteenth Amendment; and (3) Sheriff Glanz acted with deliberate indifference toward the risk that the policy or conduct of providing inadequate medical care would result in an injury like Mr. Williams's. Accordingly, the evidence was sufficient to support the jury's verdict against Sheriff Glanz holding him liable for supervisory liability.")

Stevenson v. Cordova, No. 17-1053, 2018 WL 2171179, at *8 (10th Cir. May 11, 2018) (not reported) ("Finally, Stevenson also fails to show plain error in the district court's instruction on the state of mind necessary to find that Cordova and Holloway used excessive force. . . He argues the standard should have been deliberate indifference. We have applied that standard to a supervisor's liability for a subordinate's use of excessive force against a prisoner. See Serna v. Colo. Dep't of Corr., 455 F.3d 1146, 1151-52 (10th Cir. 2006). But it remains an open question whether that standard still applies in the wake of the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). See Dodds, 614 F.3d at 1197-99 (discussing Iqbal and concluding that a claim against a supervisory defendant must allege that he acted with the state of mind necessary to establish the alleged constitutional violation). To the extent that Stevenson is challenging the district court's decision not to give an instruction on supervisory liability based upon the defendants' deliberate indifference, the lack of evidence of any constitutional violation by a subordinate precluded that theory of liability. And he otherwise fails to demonstrate that Instruction Nos. 10 and 11 erroneously required the jury to find that Cordova and Holloway acted maliciously and sadistically in refusing to loosen the handcuffs, as is required for liability on an Eighth Amendment claim of excessive use of force.")

Moya v. Garcia, 895 F.3d 1229, 1232-34, 1237-39 (10th Cir. 2018) (amended opinion on denial of rehearing en banc), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 1323 (2019) ("The first question is whether Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry have adequately alleged a deprivation of due process. We need not decide this question because of our answer to the second question: in our view, the complaint does not plausibly allege facts attributing the potential constitutional violation to the sheriff or wardens. . . To prevail, Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry must have alleged facts showing that the sheriff and wardens had been personally involved in the underlying violations through their own participation or supervisory control. . .The district court rejected both theories of liability. Here, though, Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry rely only on their theory of supervisory liability. For this theory, Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry blame the sheriff and wardens for the delays in the arraignments. In our view, however, the sheriff and wardens did not cause the arraignment delays. . . . [T]he arraignments could not be scheduled by anyone working for the sheriff or wardens; scheduling of the arraignments lay solely with the state trial court. . . . [T]he court was firmly in control here. Grand juries indicted Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry, and both individuals were arrested based on outstanding warrants issued by the court. And after these arrests, jail officials notified the court that Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry were in custody. The arrests triggered New Mexico's Rules of Criminal Procedure, which entitled Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry to arraignments within fifteen days. Rule 5-303(A) NMRA. Compliance with this requirement lay solely with the court, for an arraignment is a court proceeding that takes place only when scheduled by the court. . . The court failed to comply with this requirement, resulting in overdetention of Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry. These overdetentions were caused by the court's failure to schedule and conduct timely arraignments rather than a lapse by the sheriff or wardens. See Webb v. Thompson, 643 Fed.Appx. 718, 726 (10th Cir. 2016) (unpublished) (Gorsuch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("[T]he only relevant law anyone has cited to us comes from state law, and it indicates that the duty to ensure a constitutionally timely arraignment in Utah falls on the arresting officer—not on correctional officers."). Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry argue that the sheriff and wardens could have mitigated the risk of overdetention by keeping track of whether detainees had been timely arraigned, requesting arraignments for those who had been overdetained, or bringing detainees to court prior to a scheduled arraignment. But the sheriff and wardens did not cause the overdetention. At most, the sheriff and wardens failed to remind the court that it was taking too long to arraign Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry. But even with such a reminder, the arraignments could only be scheduled by the court itself. . . . [T]he dissent reasons that the right at issue must be the right to freedom from pretrial detention rather than the right to a timely arraignment. Based on this reasoning, the dissent concludes that our misplaced focus on arraignment has caused us to improperly focus on the state district court's role and overlook actions that the defendants could have taken, such as releasing Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry. We have focused on the plaintiffs' right to timely arraignment because that's what the plaintiffs have alleged. As the dissent admits, Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry are imprecise about their asserted right, conflating the right to an arraignment within fifteen days of arrest and the right to pretrial release (or bail). This conflation is understandable because the rights are coextensive under their theory of the case. . . .Under the theory articulated by Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry, the defendants violated the right to freedom from detention by failing to ensure timely arraignments. . . . As discussed above, the defendants were powerless to cause timely arraignments because arraignments are scheduled by the court rather than jail officials. The dissent agrees. But the dissent theorizes that jail officials could have simply released Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry. This theory is not only new but also contrary to what Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry have told us, for they expressly disavowed this theory. . . .The state trial court's alleged failure to schedule timely arraignments cannot be attributed to the sheriff or wardens. Thus, the complaint does not plausibly allege a basis for supervisory liability of the sheriff or wardens. . . . Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry also assert § 1983 claims against the county, alleging that it failed to adopt a policy to ensure arraignments within fifteen days. These claims are based on the alleged inaction by the sheriff and wardens. But, as discussed above, the sheriff and wardens did not cause the arraignment delays. Thus, the county could not incur liability under § 1983 on the basis of the alleged inaction. . . . Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry allege a deprivation of due process when they were detained for more than fifteen days without arraignments. We can assume, without deciding, that this allegation involved a constitutional violation. But Mr. Moya and Mr. Petry sued the sheriff, wardens, and county, and these parties did not cause the arraignment delays. Thus, the district court did not err in dismissing the complaint or in denying leave to amend.") Marin v. King, No. 16-2225, 2018 WL 272008, at *14–15 (10th Cir. Jan. 3, 2018) (not reported) ("When a § 1983 plaintiff pursues a claim of supervisory liability, he must show the subordinate violated his constitutional rights—a supervisor cannot be liable if the subordinate did not commit a violation. . . Having concluded that Plaintiffs have not successfully advanced their Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment claim against Ms. Ferguson or Dr. Norris, Plaintiffs' attempt to hold Mr. King and Mr. Suttle liable for any purported violation must fail. Moreover, when a supervisor seeks qualified immunity in a § 1983 action, the clearly established prong is met only when the supervisor's and the subordinate's actions violate clearly established law. . . As stated, Plaintiffs fail to show Ms. Ferguson or Dr. Norris violated clearly established law for their Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment claim. Thus, we conclude that Mr. King and Mr. Suttle are entitled

Ellis v. Oliver, No. 16-1387, 2017 WL 4857427 (10th Cir. Oct. 26, 2017) (not reported) ("Ultimately, Mr. Ellis has failed to identify any 'specific actions taken by [the warden], or specific policies over which [the warden] possessed supervisory responsibility, that violated [his] clearly established constitutional rights.'. . While this court is sympathetic to the informational disparity. . . between a prisoner and prison officials, especially in the pre-discovery context, something more is required to establish a constitutional violation and overcome the presumption of qualified immunity. . . Since Mr. Ellis has failed to allege facts plausibly showing that the warden's individual actions violated his constitutional rights, he has also failed to show that Warden Oliver caused the constitutional harm and did so with the requisite state of mind.")

Vega v. Davis, No. 16-1028, 2016 WL 7448067, at *4-5 (10th Cir. Dec. 28, 2016) (unpublished) ("Although Plaintiff's Second Amended Complaint does 'nudge' his deliberate indifference claim more toward the line of plausibility than his initial complaint, . . . it still fails the facial plausibility standard. . . . Plaintiff was required to demonstrate that the Warden was aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that Vega was at a substantial risk of harm or suicide, and the Warden 'must also draw the inference.'. . The Second Amended Complaint fails in both respects. . . . Plaintiff fails to demonstrate how one can infer the Warden was aware of any of the facts that pre-dated his tenure. As this court admonished during the prior appeal, '[t]he mere presence of records, by themselves, does not create the reasonable inference that Davis read them. The plaintiff fails to explain why it is reasonable to infer that a warden would review all of the records of each inmate, or each inmate in the Control Unit, or [Vega's] records in particular.'. . In the current appeal, Plaintiff suggests it is reasonable to conclude that the Warden was aware of Vega's earlier mental health history because he 'reviewed documents related to [Vega] that outlined his disciplinary history dating back to 2003.' We are not persuaded. Although the Warden did review documents that discussed Vega's behavior in 2003—specifically, the assaultive behavior that landed Vega in the Control Unit—those documents say nothing about mental illness. Though the Warden, by reviewing these documents, clearly became aware of Vega's conduct, there is nothing to suggest he was aware of or knowingly disregarded Vega's mental health, particularly where the facility's own psychologist opined that Vega 'ha [d] no current mental health issues.'")

Keith v. Koerner, 843 F.3d 833, 838-40, 846-47, 849 (10th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e need not define the standard for personal involvement in all instances because Ms. Keith's theories of liability either fail on their merits or fall within the basis of liability we recognized in Dodds as surviving Iqbal. To establish personal involvement, Ms. Keith first alleges a failure to train by Warden Koerner. Although we have not determined whether a failure to train satisfies the post-Iqbal personal-involvement requirement, the evidence in this case does not support Ms. Keith's theory even under our pre-Iqbal precedent. Accordingly, we need not determine whether the failure-to-train theory would be legally sufficient under a heightened standard. Second, Ms. Keith argues Warden Koerner failed to implement and enforce policies that would have prevented the sexual assault by

Mr. Gallardo. Because we concluded in Dodds that personal involvement may be established by a supervisor's responsibility for policies, Ms. Keith may rely on the same theory here. We discuss each of these personal liability theories below. . . . Because Warden Koerner provided multiple, explicit prohibitions against sexual interaction with inmates, we cannot conclude he failed to train his employees in a way that would establish his personal involvement in Ms. Keith's injury. Indeed, we have held that allegations of failure to train were inadequate to support a § 1983 claim where the officer completed a state training program and we found no evidence of a deficiency in the training. Barney v. Pulsipher, 143 F.3d 1299, 1308 (10th Cir. 1998). In Barney, we further explained that, even if the training was 'less than adequate, we [were] not persuaded that a plainly obvious consequence of a deficient training program would be the sexual assault of inmates. Specific or extensive training hardly seems necessary for a jailer to know that sexually assaulting inmates is inappropriate behavior.'. . Similarly here, there is no evidence that additional training would have prevented Mr. Gallardo's misconduct. Indeed, Mr. Gallardo raped Ms. Keith after acknowledging that engaging in sex with or sexually assaulting an inmate was grounds for termination and criminal prosecution. . . . Ms. Keith has not identified case law clearly establishing a warden's personal liability based solely on instances of inappropriate conduct that may be considered undue familiarity but that do not rise to the level of sexual misconduct. Consequently, we distinguish between these forms of misconduct in analyzing Warden Koerner's personal involvement, relying on the evidence relating to undue familiarity to the extent it provides context for the conditions at TCF. . . . Although TCF had formal policies prohibiting sexual misconduct, the evidence raises questions about whether those policies were being followed or enforced. Despite facing a higher number of allegations of sexual misconduct and undue familiarity than similar facilities, Warden Koerner's most common response was to deem the allegations unsubstantiated whenever the employee denied them. In turn, even when breach of polices designed to protect inmates from undue familiarity and sexual misconduct was independently corroborated, discipline was lax. Considering the evidence as a whole, a jury could reasonably infer that Warden Koerner was personally involved in failing to enforce policies in a way that allowed sexual misconduct to occur at TCF. . . . Viewing this evidence together with the high volume of complaints at TCF, the multiple complaints against individual employees, and the lackluster response to such complaints, we conclude Ms. Keith has demonstrated a genuine issue of material fact about whether Warden Koerner acted with deliberate indifference to the risk of sexual misconduct by his employees. . . At trial, Warden Koerner may introduce evidence to rebut any inference of knowledge or to show his actions were reasonable under the circumstances, Farmer, 511 U.S. at 844, but the weighing of such evidence is the jury's role, not ours, Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 255 (1986). In summary, Ms. Keith has presented sufficient evidence to establish Warden Koerner's personal involvement, causation, and state of mind, as necessary to present her constitutional violation to a jury. Viewing the circumstances at TCF as a whole, there is sufficient evidence from which a reasonable jury could infer that Warden Koerner was aware of but failed to address a substantial risk that his employees would engage in sexual misconduct and thereby harm TCF inmates, including Ms. Keith.")

Durkee v. Minor, 841 F.3d 872, 876-78 (10th Cir. 2016) ("Plaintiff's claim against Defendant Minor in his individual capacity amounts to a claim of direct supervisory liability. . . To establish such liability, Plaintiff must show Defendant Minor's 'direct personal responsibility' for the claimed deprivation of his Eighth Amendment right. . . . Accordingly, Plaintiff must prove Defendant Minor caused his injury with a state of mind amounting to deliberate indifference for Plaintiff's safety. See Dodds v. Richardson, 614 F.3d 1185, 1195 (10th Cir. 2010) (recognizing the elements of individual supervisory liability as (1) personal involvement, (2) causation, and (3) a culpable state of mind equal to that required to establish the underlying constitutional violation). In Dodds, we decided a sheriff could be held individually liable for his deliberately indifferent maintenance of a policy that prevented arrestees from posting preset bail for no legitimate reason, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment's liberty guarantee. . . Plaintiff tells us the parallels of his case to Dodds are clear. To us those parallels are clear as mud. Dodds involved a policy or procedure that was constitutionally infirm in the overwhelming majority of its applications, if not on its face. . . The policy Plaintiff challenges here presents us with no such dilemma. The detention center's policy of unshackling inmates in the booking area next to the visitation room does not appear problematic on its face; nor has it proven problematic in its application—at least on the record before us—save the present isolated incident. . . Apart from a supervisor's promulgation of the sort of policy at issue in Dodds, some of our sister circuits have held a supervisor may cause a constitutional violation when he has actual knowledge of subordinates' past constitutional violations but does nothing to stop future occurrences. . . Nothing in the present record suggests, however, that the policy in question here led to any constitutional violations prior to Ramos's assault on Plaintiff. . . .We suppose cases of supervisory liability under § 1983 are not necessarily limited to those two factual scenarios we have just outlined. But whether Plaintiff's theory of causation is based on an improper or inadequate policy or something else such as failure to train or supervise, the fact remains that he must still present record evidence sufficient to permit a jury to find that Defendant Minor caused his injury while deliberately indifferent to his safety. This Plaintiff has not done, which perhaps accounts for the district court's inadequate findings. That Plaintiff misunderstands his burden is well illustrated by his argument to both the district court and us that Defendant Minor's 'inadequate training and supervision of Hochmuth and others at the jail led to Hochmuth's deliberate indifference to [Plaintiff's] safety.'. . Plaintiff's argument in support of his individual liability claim against Defendant Minor amounts to little more than Minor should be held liable because he was in charge of the detention center. This simply is not enough to hold Defendant Minor liable in his individual capacity.")

Castillo v. Jones-Cooper, 660 F. App'x 614, 617 (10th Cir. 2016) ("The deliberate-indifference standard is not a negligence standard—Dolan had to actually know of the risk. We agree with the district court that Appellants fail to show that Dolan knew of such a risk. Once he knew of the risk—when Gaytan told him why she did not want to see Bobelu on May 29, 2009—Dolan quickly removed Bobelu from his position. Apart from what Dolan learned from Gaytan, Appellants rely only on their own beliefs that Dolan should have inferred that Bobelu might sexually assault a worker based on unrelated disciplinary incidents. Nothing in the record presents a genuine dispute of material fact that Dolan knew of the risk of sexual assault before meeting with Gaytan. Thus,

Wright v. Collison, 651 F. App'x 745, 747-49 (10th Cir. 2016) ("Mr. Wright alleges that Officers Collison and Cannon violated his constitutional rights by acting with deliberate indifference in failing to protect him from other inmates despite their threats to harm him. And he claims that Sheriff Stanley's supervisory policy and practice of housing inmates in overcrowded cells, with actual knowledge that those conditions posed a substantial risk of serious harm to inmates, caused his constitutional rights to be violated. . . . [The district court] concluded that Sheriff Stanley's supervisory conduct could be considered unconstitutional because it was clearly established that 'prison officials have a duty to protect prisoners from violence at the hands of other prisoners.'. . But the law governing a sheriff's obligations in these circumstances was not clearly established. The issue is whether case law existing as of August 2011 would alert any reasonable sheriff that he had a constitutional duty to reduce overcrowding by any of the measures suggested by Mr. Wright. But neither Mr. Wright nor the district court has cited such case law. Sheriff Stanley is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Webb v. Thompson, 643 F. App'x 718, 724-25 (10th Cir. 2016) ("Thompson's final argument is that the district court applied the wrong mens rea standard for supervisor liability. We addressed supervisor liability under § 1983 in Dodds v. Richardson, 614 F.3d 1185 (10th Cir.2010), noting that 'the factors necessary to establish a [supervisor's] § 1983 violation depend upon the constitutional provision at issue, including the state of mind required to establish a violation of that provision.'. . In other words, 'there's no special rule of liability for supervisors. The test for them is the same as the test for everyone else.'. . In Dodds, the constitutional right at issue was substantive due process, which we assumed requires a showing of deliberate indifference. . . In contrast, Webb's right to a prompt judicial determination of probable cause is protected by the Fourth Amendment. . .Fourth Amendment claims are subject to an objective reasonableness standard, and we do not consider an actor's state of mind. . .Thompson nevertheless argues that the applicable mens rea standard is intent. He contends that supervisor liability under § 1983 requires 'a deliberate and intentional act on the part of the supervisor to violate the plaintiff's legal rights.'. . However, this language in Wilson merely reinforces that § 1983 does not authorize respondeat superior liability, and therefore to be liable 'a supervisor, as with everyone else' must have 'subjected, or caused to be subjected a plaintiff to a deprivation of his legal rights.'. . . After observing that the plaintiff in Wilson alleged that the defendant's act caused constitutional violations, we noted appellants did not challenge the district court's conclusion that deliberate indifference was 'a sufficiently culpable mental state to impose supervisory liability [for prolonged detention claims] under § 1983.'. . We did not engage the question of which mens rea standard applies in Wilson, and thus did not contradict the conclusions that we apply an objective reasonableness test to Fourth Amendment claims under § 1983, . . and that the same standard applies to § 1983 claims against supervisors . . . .Nevertheless, the district court did apply the wrong standard. Rather than asking whether Thompson's actions were objectively reasonable, the court asked whether Thompson acted 'knowingly or with deliberate indifference that a constitutional violation would occur.' Despite this error, because the court found that there was a genuine issue of material fact whether he acted with deliberate indifference, there is also a genuine issue of material fact whether he acted with objective reasonableness. Thus, Thompson is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Cox v. Glanz, 800 F.3d 1231, 1248-54 (10th Cir. 2015) ("The requisite showing of an 'affirmative link' between a supervisor and the alleged constitutional injury has '[come] to have three related prongs: (1) personal involvement, (2) sufficient causal connection, and (3) culpable state of mind.'. .Admittedly, '[t]he contours of ... supervisory liability are still somewhat unclear after [the Supreme Court decided] Iqbal, which "articulated a stricter liability standard for ... personal involvement."'. . . Our clearly-established-law analysis centers on whether the controlling cases 'show that [Sheriff Glanz] took the alleged actions with the requisite state of mind.' . . This state of mind '"can be no less than the mens rea required" of [any of his] subordinates [i.e., Jail employees] to commit the underlying constitutional violation.'. . Importantly, as our discussion of the pertinent governing caselaw . . . demonstrates, this is a particularized state of mind: actual knowledge by a prison official of an individual inmate's substantial risk of suicide. . . .Our review of relevant caselaw postdating Hocker and Barrie indicates that the foregoing state of the law in our circuit—which required prison officials to possess knowledge that a specific inmate presents a substantial risk of suicide—had not changed in material respects by July 2009. We are not aware of any controlling Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decisions that directly answer this clearly-established-law inquiry. However, our view of the requirements of the clearly established law extant when Mr. Jernegan committed suicide (July 2009) does find some support in the Supreme Court's recent decision in Taylor v. Barkes, —— U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 2042 (2015) (per curiam), where the Court resolved a deliberate-indifference dispute on the clearly-established-law prong of the qualified-immunity standard. There, the Court held that, as of November 2004, there was no clearly established 'right' of an inmate to be adequately screened for suicide. . . The Taylor Court emphatically stated that '[n]o decision of this Court even discusses suicide screening or prevention protocols.'. . Taylor teaches us that, as of November 2004, there was no constitutional right to such screening or protocols. . .Consequently, in November 2004, a jail's nonexistent or deficient suicide-screening measures would not have necessarily indicated that an individual prisoner's suicide was the product of deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth Amendment. In light of Taylor, our reading of the contours of the law a short five years later should not be surprising. That is, irrespective of the alleged deficiencies in the Jail's suicide-screening protocols, in order for any defendant, including Sheriff Glanz, to be found to have acted with deliberate indifference, he needed to first have knowledge that the specific inmate at issue presented a substantial risk of suicide. Moreover, though not dispositive, our limited corpus of nonprecedential jail-suicide decisions supports our reading of the state of the law when Mr. Jernegan committed suicide. . . .At bottom, when confronting individual-capacity § 1983 claims, our 'focus must always be on the defendant—on the ... injury he inflicted or caused to be inflicted, and on his motives. This is because § 1983 isn't a strict liability offense.'. . As noted, Sheriff Glanz had no personal interaction with Mr. Jernegan or direct and contemporaneous knowledge of his treatment in July 2009. Therefore, insofar as he had knowledge sufficient to form the requisite mental state, it would have had to necessarily come from his subordinates, notably Ms. Taylor or Ms. Sampson. Because they did not possess such knowledge, the conclusion inexorably follows that Sheriff Glanz could not have possessed such knowledge. Accordingly, though we have not ignored Ms. Cox's strong assertions regarding the systemic failings of the Jail's mental-health screening and treatment protocols, which quite understandably troubled the district court, we conclude that Ms. Cox has nevertheless failed to establish that Sheriff Glanz acted as to Mr. Jernegan with the requisite mental state to constitute deliberate indifference. In other words, she has not carried her burden regarding the essential subjective component of the deliberate-indifference standard. In sum, for the reasons stated, we cannot conclude that Sheriff Glanz's conduct constituted an Eighth Amendment violation under the law that was clearly established at the time of Mr. Jernegan's death. Therefore, Ms. Cox cannot satisfy the clearly-established-law component of the qualified-immunity standard. We must accordingly reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the Sheriff on Ms. Cox's individual-capacity claim under § 1983.")

Attocknie v. Smith, 798 F.3d 1252, 1258, 1259-60 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Cherry's entry of Aaron's home was clearly contrary to well-established law. He is not entitled to qualified immunity on the claim of unlawful entry. And because a reasonable jury could determine that the unlawful entry was the proximate cause of the fatal shooting of Aaron, . . . [W]e need not decide whether Cherry used excessive force when he confronted Aaron. . . .The important procedural failure in this case is not Plaintiff's or the district court's but Smith's. His motion for summary judgment did not raise any ground on which we can reverse. The argument section of the motion devotes four pages to Plaintiff's § 1983 claim against him in his individual capacity. It notes, correctly, that because he was not personally involved in the August 25, 2012 incident until after the shooting, his liability could only be as a supervisor. Next it summarizes his view of the law of supervisory liability and argues that he is not liable under that law because (1) Cherry did not violate the Constitution and (2) even if he did, 'Cherry was not an employee or officer of Sheriff Smith.'. . It then summarizes his view of the law of qualified immunity but concludes that '[t]he second stage of qualified immunity analysis, whether a right was "clearly established" need not even be performed, as Defendant Smith did not personally violate Plaintiff's constitutional rights in any way whatsoever.'. . Smith raised no argument below that he would be entitled to qualified immunity even if Cherry was his employee. Yet given his concession that he cannot challenge on appeal the district court's determination that Cherry was his employee, this foregone argument would be his only path to reversal. Because he does not argue on appeal that the district court committed plain error, we do not address that possibility. . . We affirm the denial of qualified immunity.")

Castillo v. Day, 790 F.3d 1013, 1020 (10th Cir. 2015) ("This court's precedent confirms Plaintiffs' position that a prison guard's failure to take reasonable steps to protect an inmate from a known risk of sexual abuse by another prison guard. . . can be a violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . Accordingly, we reject Pavliska's argument that a prison guard who knows of, yet fails to reasonably respond to, a risk of harm created by another guard can only be liable if the perpetrator is a subordinate.")

Estate of Booker v. Gomez, 745 F.3d 405, 435, 436 (10th Cir. 2014) ("To establish supervisory liability, the Plaintiffs must show Sergeant Rodriguez's (1) personal involvement, (2) causation, and (3) the requisite state of mind with respect to either the excessive force or failure to provide medical care claims. . .Our earlier conclusions that a reasonable jury could find Sergeant Rodriguez actively participated in—and failed to intervene and prevent—the use of excessive force . . . satisfies the first and second elements. Similarly, our earlier conclusion that a reasonable jury could find Sergeant Rodriguez exhibited excessive zeal—by using the taser on Mr. Booker for 60 percent longer than the recommended time period when he was no longer resisting and fully subdued by handcuffs, Deputy Robinette's weight, and Deputy Grimes's carotid neck hold. . . satisfies the third element. Finally, our conclusion regarding clearly established law . . . also precludes summary judgment on this claim. See Schwartz, § 7.19[E] ("Under the holding in Iqbal that a supervisory official may be held liable under § 1983 only for his or her unconstitutional conduct, there is no longer any need to contemplate whether qualified immunity as applied to supervisory officials requires special or separate consideration.").")

Pahls v. Thomas, 718 F.3d 1210, 1225, 1226 & n.6, 1230, 1231 (10th Cir. 2013) ("[P]ersonal-involvement requirement does not mean. . .that direct participation is necessary. As we recently recognized in Dodds, government officials may be held responsible for constitutional violations under a theory of supervisory liability. 'A plaintiff may therefore succeed in a § 1983 suit'—and, we may add, a Bivens action—'against a defendant-supervisor by demonstrating: (1) the defendant promulgated, created, implemented or possessed responsibility for the continued operation of a policy that (2) caused the complained of constitutional harm, and (3) acted with the state of mind required to establish the alleged constitutional deprivation.'. . Because § 1983 and Bivens are vehicles for imposing personal liability on government officials, we have stressed the need for careful attention to particulars, especially in lawsuits involving multiple defendants. '[I]t is particularly important' that plaintiffs 'make clear exactly who is alleged to have done what to whom, ... as distinguished from collective allegations.'. . When various officials have taken different actions with respect to a plaintiff, the plaintiff's facile, passive-voice showing that his rights 'were violated' will not suffice. Likewise insufficient is a plaintiff's more active-voice yet undifferentiated contention that 'defendants' infringed his rights. . . Rather, it is incumbent upon a plaintiff to 'identify specific actions taken by particular defendants' in order to make out a viable § 1983 or Bivens claim. . .The same particularized approach applies with full force when a plaintiff proceeds under a theory of supervisory liability. Various officials often have 'different powers and duties.'. . A plaintiff must therefore identify the specific policies over which particular defendants possessed responsibility and that led to the alleged constitutional violation. . .Of course, in all cases, a plaintiff must show that each defendant acted with the requisite state of mind. . . . We pause here to note a critical distinction between Bivens and § 1983. The latter is a statutorily conferred cause of action. The former is a cause of action implied directly under the Constitution. The Supreme Court 'has been reluctant to extend Bivens liability to any new context or new category of defendants.'. . . And the Court has never held that a Bivens action is available against federal officials for a claim based upon the First Amendment. . .No argument was presented to us on the availability of a Bivens action for a First Amendment viewpoint-discrimination claim against a Secret Service officer actively engaged in protecting the President. We therefore need not and do not decide whether Bivens is available in these circumstances. We assume, for purposes of this case only, that it is. . . . [A]lthough the requirement of personal participation, including the question of supervisory liability, is a component of liability under § 1983 and Bivens, we also incorporate it into our qualified-immunity analysis, where we ask whether a clearly established constitutional right has been violated. . . . To make out viable § 1983 and Bivens claims and to overcome defendants' assertions of qualified immunity, plaintiffs here must establish that each defendant—whether by direct participation or by virtue of a policy over which he possessed supervisory responsibility—caused a violation of plaintiffs' clearly established constitutional rights, and that each defendant acted with the constitutionally requisite state of mind. . . . [Plaintiffs] must identify specific actions taken by particular defendants, or specific policies over which particular defendants possessed supervisory responsibility, that violated their clearly established constitutional rights. . . Failure to make this showing both dooms plaintiffs' § 1983 and Bivens claims and entitles defendants to qualified immunity. . . . In § 1983 and Bivens actions, a claim of viewpoint discrimination in contravention of the First Amendment requires a plaintiff to show that the defendant acted with a viewpoint-discriminatory purpose. . . .In this case, for plaintiffs to prevail as to each defendant, they must show that the defendant's individual actions caused viewpoint discrimination to occur, and that those actions were taken 'because of[,] not merely in spite of, [plaintiffs'] anti-Bush message.'. . Under plaintiffs' supervisory-liability theory, they must show that each defendant adopted and implemented the security policies at issue, not for viewpoint-neutral reasons, 'but for the purpose of discriminating on account of' the particular message plaintiffs wished to convey. . . . We determine that the evidence, at most, shows that each defendant was aware of the disparate treatment to which plaintiffs were subjected. This evidence is insufficient as a matter of law to show that any defendant promulgated the policies at issue or acted for a discriminatory purpose. Each defendant is therefore entitled to qualified immunity.") Schneider v. City of Grand Junction Police Dept., 717 F.3d 760, 768-71 & n.5 (10th Cir. 2013) ("'[W]e have not yet had occasion to determine what allegations of personal involvement ... meet Iqbal's stricter liability standard.'. . [citing cases] None of those cases, however, presented us with the occasion to address the precise contours of this standard. And neither does this case. None of the claims against the individual defendants turns on the question of personal involvement. The district court's summary judgment conclusions were based on the second and third elements, causation and state of mind, and the parties' arguments also are focused on these latter elements. We therefore assume without deciding that Ms. Schneider has presented sufficient evidence of the individual defendants' personal involvement under Iqbal's stricter liability standard. . . .On appeal, no one challenges the use of the deliberate-indifference standard. We therefore assume without deciding that deliberate indifference is the applicable state of mind. This is consistent with our approach in Dodds, which also concerned a substantive due process § 1983 claim, where we declined to consider whether deliberate indifference was the correct standard because neither party challenged the district court's use of that standard. . . We assumed without deciding, as we do here, that deliberate indifference is the standard for a claim of violation of substantive due process. . . As with the personal involvement element of the claims against the individual defendants, we do not rely on the element of a municipal policy or custom to resolve Ms. Schneider's claims against the City. The district court assumed without deciding that this element was met, and based its summary judgment decisions in favor of the City on the second and/or third elements—causation and state of mind. We similarly assume without deciding that Ms. Schneider has presented sufficient evidence of a municipal policy or custom for her claims against the City. . . . In the present case, the state-of-mind element is deliberate indifference for both the individual defendants and the City. This may not always be the case. For individual defendants, the applicable state of mind will depend on the type of constitutional violation at issue. . . In contrast, the prevailing state-of-mind standard for a municipality is deliberate indifference regardless of the nature of the underlying constitutional violation.")

Wilson v. Montano, 715 F.3d 847, 857, 858 (10th Cir. 2013) ("[U]nder New Mexico law both Warden Chavez and Sheriff Rivera were responsible for the policies or customs that operated and were enforced by their subordinates at the VCDC and VCSO and for any failure to adequately train their subordinates. We therefore consider the allegations against each supervisory defendant to determine whether they meet the Dodds requirements for imposing individual liability under § 1983. . . .The complaint alleges Warden Chavez 'established a policy or custom of holding citizens without pending criminal charges until the court filed orders of release sua sponte.' Allegedly, these policies or customs were 'a significant moving force behind Plaintiff's illegal detention.' The complaint further alleges Warden Chavez's policy of holding citizens without court orders caused the violation of Wilson's Fourth Amendment right to a prompt probable cause determination. That is, because Warden Chavez failed to require the filing of written complaints, detainees, including Wilson, were held at the VCDC without receiving prompt probable cause determinations. The complaint also alleges Warden Chavez inappropriately trained his employees, which led to the violation of Wilson's right to a prompt probable cause determination. Indeed, the complaint alleges there were numerous occasions where the VCDC and the VCSO held individuals for days and, on some occasions, weeks, without law enforcement taking those individuals before a magistrate judge. These allegations, taken as true, sufficiently establish Warden Chavez promulgated policies which caused the constitutional harm of which Wilson complains, i.e., his prolonged detention without a probable cause hearing. . . That Wilson has not alleged he had any direct contact with Warden Chavez or that Warden Chavez actually knew of Wilson's specific circumstances is of no consequence. . . Finally, the complaint alleges sufficient facts to establish Warden Chavez acted with the requisite mental state. To establish a violation of § 1983 by a defendant-supervisor, the plaintiff must establish, at minimum, a deliberate and intentional act on the part of the supervisor to violate the plaintiff's legal rights. Porro v. Barnes, 624 F.3d 1322, 1327–28 (10th Cir.2010). The complaint alleges Warden Chavez acted with deliberate indifference to routine constitutional violations occurring at the VCDC. This allegation is supported by Wilson's assertions that there were numerous prior occasions in which individuals at the VCDC and VCSO were subject to prolonged warrantless detention. . . Appellants do not challenge the district court's conclusion that deliberate indifference is a sufficiently culpable mental state to impose supervisory liability under § 1983. The complaint's allegations against Warden Chavez therefore state a plausible claim for relief under Dodds, and the district court did not err in denying the motion to dismiss as to Warden Chavez.")

Keith v. Koerner, 707 F.3d 1185, 1188, 1189 (10th Cir. 2013) ("As an initial matter, it is clearly established that a prison official's deliberate indifference to sexual abuse by prison employees violates the Eighth Amendment. . . Such a violation occurs where 'the official knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate health or safety,' and there is an affirmative link between the constitutional deprivation and the supervisor's actions. . . This 'affirmative link' has had three related, indistinct prongs in our case law: '(1) personal involvement, (2) sufficient causal connection, and (3) culpable state of mind.' Dodds, 614 F.3d at 1195, 1199. We have held that a plaintiff may establish the first prong with evidence that 'the defendant promulgated, created, implemented or possessed responsibility for the continued operation of a policy' that caused the constitutional harm. Id. at 1199. The question here, then, is whether Ms. Keith has alleged facts sufficient to support such a deliberate indifference violation by Mr. Koerner. To state a claim, a plaintiff must only allege enough factual matter in her complaint to make her 'claim to relief ... plausible on its face' and provide fair notice to a defendant. . . The district court found that Ms. Keith did so. . . In particular, it noted that she alleged facts that could tend to establish that Mr. Koerner 'was responsible for managing TCF and knew about multiple instances of sexual misconduct at TCF over a period of years, inconsistently disciplined corrections officers who engaged in prohibited sexual conduct with inmates and thus purportedly tolerated at least an informal policy which permitted sexual contact between prison staff and inmates.'. . . We have reviewed the complaint and conclude that on a motion to dismiss, Ms. Keith has provided notice and nudged her claims beyond the conceivable to the plausible given that we must accept well-pleaded allegations as true. First, Ms. Keith's complaint refers to facts, primarily from the Audit Report, that could support a conclusion that Mr. Koerner was aware of multiple incidents of unlawful sexual conduct at TCF. . . . Second, Ms. Keith alleges facts indicating that discipline in response to complaints of sexual misconduct and undue familiarity at TCF was inconsistent. . . .Third, Ms. Keith alleges facts that tend to show the existence of structural policy problems that contributed to the unlawful sexual conduct here. . . . Fourth, Ms. Keith alleges that the lack of training programs tailored to the all-female population of TCF contributed to the misconduct here. . .These allegations go beyond formulaic labels and conclusions and meet our intermediate pleading standard. . . .Mr. Koerner's arguments to the contrary do not carry the day. He argues that although he may have had knowledge of other incidents of sexual misconduct, he had no indication of potential harm to Ms. Keith specifically. . . But an 'official's knowledge of the risk need not be knowledge of a substantial risk to a particular inmate, or knowledge of the particular manner in which injury might occur.'")

Stewart v. Beach, 701 F.3d 1322, 1328 (10th Cir. 2012) ("A § 1983 claim requires 'personal involvement in the alleged constitutional violation.' Gallagher v. Shelton, 587 F.3d 1063, 1069 (10th Cir. 2009). The 'denial of a grievance, by itself without any connection to the violation of constitutional rights alleged by plaintiff, does not establish personal participation under § 1983.'.

. Whatever knowledge Roberts may have had when he denied the appeal, his only involvement was to deny the grievance appeal, which is insufficient for § 1983 liability.")

Brown v. Montoya, 662 F.3d 1152, 1163-66 (10th Cir. 2011) ("A § 1983 defendant sued in an individual capacity may be subject to personal liability and/or supervisory liability. . . Personal liability 'under § 1983 must be based on personal involvement in the alleged constitutional violation.'. . Supervisory liability 'allows a plaintiff to impose liability upon a defendant-supervisor who creates, promulgates, [or] implements ... a policy ... which subjects, or causes to be subjected that plaintiff to the deprivation of any rights ... secured by the Constitution.' [citing Dodds v. Richardson] Section 1983 does not authorize liability under a theory of respondeat superior. . . Instead, to establish supervisory liability, a plaintiff must show that '(1) the defendant promulgated, created, implemented or possessed responsibility for the continued operation of a policy that (2) caused the complained of constitutional harm, and (3) acted with the state of mind required to establish the alleged constitutional deprivation.' Dodds, 614 F.3d at 1199. . . . To overcome Secretary Williams's defense of qualified immunity, Mr. Brown must allege facts showing that Secretary Williams, either through his personal participation in Mr. Brown's treatment or the promulgation of a policy, violated a clearly established constitutional right. He has not done so in his Complaint. Personal liability under § 1983 must be based on Secretary Williams's personal involvement, and supervisory liability must be based on his Policy. The Complaint alleges neither. . . .Mr. Brown's Complaint cannot be the basis for personal liability because it does not specifically allege how Secretary Williams acted in Mr. Brown's case or even that he knew about it. Although the Complaint alleges that Secretary Williams was 'charged with notifying sex offenders of their duty to register,' it does not specifically allege that Secretary Williams told Mr. Brown to register or directed anyone else to make Mr. Brown register. Instead, it alleges that Officer Montoya and Deputy Sherriff Aguilar directed Mr. Brown to register. . . Mr. Brown argues in his brief that Secretary Williams is liable as a supervisor because he signed the Policy on which Officer Montoya allegedly relied to classify Mr. Brown as a sex offender. . . But the allegations in Mr. Brown's Complaint do not meet the standard for supervisory liability. To establish supervisory liability, Mr. Brown would have to show that (1) Secretary Williams promulgated or was responsible for a policy that (2) caused the constitutional harm and (3) acted with the state of mind required to establish the alleged constitutional deprivation. . .The Complaint fails on the first step because it does not even mention the Policy. Mr. Brown only attached the Policy to his memorandum in response to Secretary Williams's motion to dismiss and asked the district court to take judicial notice of the Policy. . . . Without specifically alleging Secretary Williams's personal involvement or anything about the Policy, Mr. Brown has alleged no connection between Secretary Williams and any constitutional violation.")

Martinez v. Milyard, 440 F. App'x 637, 2011 WL 4537786, at *1 n.1 (10th Cir. Oct. 3, 2011) ("In Ashcroft v. Iqbal, the Supreme Court reiterated that '[g]overnment officials may not be held liable for the unconstitutional conduct of their subordinates under a theory of respondeat superior,' 129 S.Ct. at 1948, and explained that a government official 'is only liable for his or her own misconduct.' Id. at 1949. While Iqbal has 'generated significant debate about the continuing vitality and scope of supervisory liability' in § 1983 cases, Lewis v. Tripp, 604 F.3d 1221, 1227 n. 3 (10th Cir.2010), this circuit has not yet determined the full extent of Iqbal's impact on our case law. We need not resolve this debate here, however, because Martinez's claims fail even under our preexisting standard.")

J.W. v. Utah, 647 F.3d 1006, 1012 (10th Cir. 2011) ("As for the caseworker's supervisor, the district court correctly concluded that Plaintiffs' claim was essentially one of negligent supervision, which is insufficient to support a § 1983 claim. See Woodward v. City of Worland, 977 F.2d 1392, 1400 (10th Cir.1992). The undisputed evidence in the summary judgment record reflects that the supervisor was not responsible for the placement decision on which Plaintiffs' claim is premised. Plaintiffs have cited to no evidence that the supervisor personally participated or knowingly acquiesced in the alleged deprivations of Plaintiffs' constitutional rights, and thus the district court correctly held that Plaintiffs have not set forth a valid basis for finding the supervisor liable under § 1983.")

Lobozzo v. Colorado Dept. of Corrections, No. 10-1396, 2011 WL 2663548, at *5 (10th Cir. July 8, 2011) ("Prisoners are sometimes victims of sexual abuse at the hands of staff and other inmates alike − a tragic fact demanding the attention of prison administrators. But despite Lobozzo's characterization of the record, there is no evidence any of the CDOC Defendants failed to take seriously their responsibility for the safety of inmates. She failed to make a record equal to her rhetoric. The record simply does not support her allegations that the CDOC Defendants knew of and disregarded an excessive risk that she would be sexually victimized by Martinez.")

Porro v. Barnes, 624 F.3d 1322, 1327, 1328 (10th Cir. 2010) ("Just as § 1983's plain language doesn't authorize strict liability, it doesn't authorize respondeat superior liability. The plain language of the statute, again, asks simply whether the defendant at issue 'subject[ed], or cause[d] to be subjected 'a plaintiff to a deprivation of his legal rights. . .To establish a violation of § 1983 by a supervisor, as with everyone else, then, 'the plaintiff must establish a deliberate, intentional act' on the part of the defendant 'to violate [the plaintiff's legal] rights.'. . . In the due process context, this means the focus is on the force the supervisor used or caused to be used, the resulting injury attributable to his conduct, and the mens rea required of him to be held liable, which can be no less than the mens rea required of anyone else. [citing Iqbal and Dodds]Simply put, there's no special rule of liability for supervisors. The test for them is the same as the test for everyone else. And as we've already explained, Mr. Porro's claim against Mr. Barnes fails that test.")

Dodds v. Richardson, 614 F.3d 1185, 1194-1206 (10th Cir. 2010) ("[D]etermining whether a plaintiff has demonstrated a defendant-supervisor violated his constitutional rights and whether § 1983 allows a plaintiff to hold a defendant-supervisor liable for that violation may depend on whether that defendant-supervisor, rather than only his subordinates, violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. For this reason, we properly address this question of supervisory liability now as part of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . Defendant maintains that in order to show he violated Plaintiff's clearly established constitutional rights, and therefore overcome his assertion of qualified immunity as well as hold him liable under § 1983, Plaintiff must demonstrate that he personally participated in such a violation with a sufficiently culpable state of mind. Defendant points out that Plaintiff does not allege Defendant was one of the jail employees who told him and the individuals who inquired about posting bail on his behalf that he could not post the bail set in his arrest warrant until he had been arraigned by a judge. Nor does Plaintiff contend Defendant personally instructed those employees to refuse to accept bail from Plaintiff the weekend of Friday, April 6, 2007. According to Defendant in his opening brief, the 'policy of the court clerk's office, and no action' by him deprived Plaintiff of his federally protected rights. Defendant argues, as a result, Plaintiff has not shown he committed any act which violated Plaintiff's rights or that he acted with deliberate indifference to Plaintiff's rights. Defendant's argument implicates important questions about the continuing vitality of supervisory liability under § 1983 after the Supreme Court's recent decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). . . .Personal involvement does not require direct participation because § 1983 states "'[a]ny official who "causes" a citizen to be deprived of her constitutional rights can also be held liable.' " Buck v. City of Albuquerque, 549 F.3d 1269, 1279 (10th Cir.2008) (quoting Snell v. Tunnell, 920 F.2d 673, 700 (10th Cir.1990)). Even before Iqbal, it was not enough in our circuit 'for a plaintiff merely to show defendant was in charge of other state actors who actually committed the violation. Instead, ... the plaintiff must establish a deliberate, intentional act by the supervisor to violate constitutional rights.'. . In sum, to impose § 1983 liability the plaintiff first had to establish 'the supervisor's subordinates violated the [C]onstitution.'. . Then, the plaintiff must demonstrate 'an "affirmative link" between the supervisor and the violation....'. . . Over time, this 'affirmative link' requirement came to have three related prongs: (1) personal involvement, (2) sufficient causal connection, and (3) culpable state of mind. A plaintiff could establish the defendant-supervisor's personal involvement by demonstrating his ' "personal participation, his exercise of control or direction, or his failure to supervise,"'. . . or his 'knowledge of the violation and acquiesce[nce] in its continuance.'. . A defendant supervisor's promulgation, creation, implementation, or utilization of a policy that caused a deprivation of plaintiff's rights also could have constituted sufficient personal involvement. . . A plaintiff then had to establish the ' "requisite causal connection"' 'by showing' ' "the defendant set in motion a series of events that the defendant knew or reasonably should have known would cause others to deprive the plaintiff of her constitutional rights."'. . . And, finally, the plaintiff also had to show the supervisor had a culpable state of mind, meaning 'the supervisor acted knowingly or with "deliberate indifference" that a constitutional violation would occur.'. . We did not view these requirements as necessarily distinct. Proof of a supervisor's personal direction or knowledge of and acquiescence in a constitutional violation often sufficed to meet the personal involvement, causal connection, and deliberate indifference prongs of the affirmative link requirement for § 1983 supervisory liability. . . . But then, as the saying will surely go, came Iqbal. . . . We have already acknowledged that Iqbal may have changed the § 1983 supervisory liability landscape. [citing Lewis] But because our cases since Iqbal have thus far only presented allegations that do not satisfy our pre-Iqbal liability standard, we have not yet had occasion to determine what allegations of personal involvement and mental state do meet Iqbal's stricter liability standard. . . . . Whatever else can be said about Iqbal, and certainly much can be said, we conclude the following basis of § 1983 liability survived it and ultimately resolves this case: § 1983 allows a plaintiff to impose liability upon a defendant-supervisor who creates, promulgates, implements, or in some other way possesses responsibility for the continued operation of a policy the enforcement (by the defendant-supervisor or her subordinates) of which 'subjects, or causes to be subjected' that plaintiff 'to the deprivation of any rights ... secured by the Constitution ....' . . . . A plaintiff may therefore succeed in a § 1983 suit against a defendant-supervisor by demonstrating: (1) the defendant promulgated, created, implemented or possessed responsibility for the continued operation of a policy that (2) caused the complained of constitutional harm, and (3) acted with the state of mind required to establish the alleged constitutional deprivation. . . . Monell and its progeny clearly stand for the proposition that the very language of § 1983 provides for the imposition of liability where there exists an 'affirmative' or 'direct causal' link between a municipal person's adoption or implementation of a policy and a deprivation of federally protected rights, and that imposing liability upon such a basis does not implicate respondeat superior . Nothing in Iqbal contradicts this longstanding interpretation of § 1983's language. . . . [T]he facts, taken in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, show Defendant may have played more than a passive role in the alleged constitutional violation − he may have deliberately enforced or actively maintained the policies in question at the jail. Plaintiff has thereby presented facts that establish personal involvement by Defendant in the alleged constitutional violation sufficient to satisfy § 1983. By Defendant's own admission, the policies' enforcement caused the constitutional violation before us. As a result, the facts show Defendant's maintaining these policies at the jail caused Plaintiff to be deprived of his due process rights. . . . Now that we have concluded Plaintiff has shown facts that, if proven at trial, suffice to establish Defendant's personal involvement caused the misconduct complained of, we address whether the facts show Defendant acted with the state of mind required to establish Defendant committed a constitutional violation. The Court in Iqbal explained that the factors necessary to establish a § 1983 violation depend upon the constitutional provision at issue, including the state of mind required to establish a violation of that provision. . . . We therefore conclude that after Iqbal, Plaintiff can no longer succeed on a § 1983 claim against Defendant by showing that as a supervisor he behaved 'knowingly or with "deliberate indifference" that a constitutional violation would occur' at the hands of his subordinates, unless that is the same state of mind required for the constitutional deprivation he alleges. . . . But given Plaintiff alleges a substantive due process violation, it appears Plaintiff must establish that Defendant acted with deliberate indifference to Plaintiff's due process right to post preset bail. . . . So, let us be clear: We do not pass judgment at this time on the state of mind required to establish a substantive due process violation based upon preventing an arrestee from posting preset bail. We assume, without deciding, deliberate indifference constitutes the required state of mind. Plaintiff has shown facts from which a reasonable jury could infer Defendant knowingly created a substantial risk of constitutional injury to people like Plaintiff. Oklahoma law made Defendant, rather than the clerk or district judges, responsible for controlling the jail and accepting bail from arrestees like Plaintiff. Defendant admits that while he served as the sheriff he maintained policies that prevented felony arrestees whose bail had been set from posting bail after hours and before arraignment. Plaintiff had a liberty interest in being released once his bail had been set. Defendant does not suggest any 'legitimate goal' behind preventing felony arrestees whose bail had been set from posting bail. We therefore agree with the district court that Plaintiff has shown facts that taken in the light most favorable to him establish that Defendant acted with deliberate indifference and thereby violated his Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. . . . Plaintiff's right to be free from unjustified detention after his bail was set was clearly established such that a reasonable official in Defendant's position in April 2007 would have understood that his deliberately indifferent maintenance of the policies that prevented arrestees from posting preset bail for no legitimate reason violated the Constitution.")

Dodds v. Richardson, 614 F.3d 1185, 1208-13 (10th Cir. 2010) (Tymkovich, J., concurring) ("I fully agree with the majority that the complaint sufficiently alleges former Sheriff Richardson violated clearly established law when he implemented the county court's unconstitutional bail policy. . . I write separately to further note the lack of clarity in the law of supervisory liability, and my view of how this may have been affected by the Supreme Court's recent decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). Federal law provides that '[e]very person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured.' 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (emphasis added). The phrase 'causes to be subjected' suggests that liability exists for officials who did not directly violate constitutional rights, but, as the majority illustrates, the standard for demonstrating that a supervisory official has caused a violation is far from clear. [discussing Pembaur, City of Canton] These examples − official policy, decisions of high-ranking officials, and failure to adequately train employees − are not rightfully regarded as theories of liability but should instead be viewed as theories of causation. As to supervisory liability, the added level of removal between the violation and the supervisor makes questions of causation even more difficult. The Supreme Court has yet to speak with much clarity on the theories of causation that could demonstrate a supervisory official's liability for the constitutional violations carried out by a subordinate. Whether a supervisor has violated the plaintiff's rights is dependent on whether the subordinate violated the Constitution − the supervisor cannot be liable if there was no violation. . . And in some cases, the determination of whether a violation occurred turns on the subordinate's state of mind. . . What remains unclear is the state of mind that the supervisor must possess to be liable for causing such a violation. As the majority points out, the Supreme Court recently muddied further these already cloudy waters. . . . Iqbal unfortunately did not provide a unified theory for the variety of supervisory liability cases we face. We do know supervisory liability under § 1983 is still only appropriate where the plaintiff can prove that the supervisor caused the violation. And in a case like Iqbal, where the constitutional violation requires discriminatory intent, a supervisor does not cause a violation unless he or she actually intended for his or her subordinates to invidiously discriminate. Mere knowledge and acquiescence of, or even 'deliberate indifference' towards, the discriminatory actions of employees now appears insufficient to prove causation, and thereby prove liability. . . . But Iqbal does not address constitutional violations that are based on a state of mind other than specific intent − for instance, a procedural due process violation, or an Eighth Amendment violation based on an official's deliberate indifference. A supervisor is liable for these actions only when the supervisor can be fairly said to have caused the violation, but determining when this is the case can be tricky, to say the least. . . . The exact method of demonstrating a causal link depends on the actions of the supervisor in relation to the subordinate that led to the violation. Supervisors sometimes directly order their subordinates to take an action, either in a specific case, or by establishing some sort of policy. They may also learn of conduct taken by their subordinates and acquiesce in it after the fact or simply ignore it. Some supervisors may never learn of the unconstitutional actions of their subordinates, not because their subordinates were successful in hiding their behavior, but because the supervisor was 'willfully blind' or deliberately indifferent. And supervisors may have a responsibility, as do municipalities, to ensure that their subordinates are properly trained − failure to carry out this duty may in some cases result in a violation. Just as there are various ways in which a supervisor can be said to have caused a violation, as outlined above, there are different levels of fault associated with these actions. We consider some of these actions to be blame-worthy enough that the supervisor should be liable. . . . In sum, our precedent has established, with varying levels of clarity, that a supervisor is only liable for violations that he caused, and that causation requires at least some degree of fault on the supervisor's part. Exactly how this causation can be shown varies depending on the type of violation and the facts of the case. . . . [S]everal theories of liability are possible. First, a supervisor may directly order a subordinate to violate the plaintiff's rights. . . . Next, some cases say a supervisor may cause violations when he or she has actual knowledge of past constitutional violations being carried out by a subordinate, and does nothing to stop future occurrences. . . . Finally, a series of cases requires a standard of deliberate indifference. Those types of cases include the failure to train, the failure to supervise, and potentially other supervisory shortcomings. . . In those cases, we may find that a supervisor has somehow caused the violation to occur by an egregious failure to act. . . . In sum, our decisions hold that supervisors are liable for constitutional violations they cause. The exact contours of causation − especially regarding an official's state of mind sufficient for liability − are uncertain in light of Iqbal. But for purposes of this case, Dodds alleges the sheriff deliberately implemented an unconstitutional bail policy that violated his clearly established rights as a pretrial detainee and thereby caused him injury. As the majority ably demonstrates, his allegations are enough to survive summary judgment.").

Nelson v. Skehan, 386 F. App'x 783, 2010 WL 2748808, at *2 n.2 (10th Cir. July 13, 2010) ("Whether the "acquiescence" component of supervisory liability has survived *Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949 (2009), is an open question in this Circuit.").

Lewis v. Tripp, 604 F.3d 1221, 1226, 1227 & n.3 (10th Cir. 2010) ("In this case, the district court failed to set forth the facts it believed a reasonable jury could find with respect to the critical question before us − the nature of Dr. Tripp's involvement, if any, in an unlawful search and seizure. Instead, the court merely stated that Dr. Tripp phoned the Board's office on May 16 and sent two emails to the Board's legal counsel. The court then immediately and summarily concluded that

> and acquiesced in, the asserted [but unspecified] constitutional violation. See Poolaw v. Marcantel, 565 F.3d. 721, __, 2009 WL 1176466, at *7 (10th Cir.2009) ("For liability under section 1983, direct participation is not necessary. Any official who 'causes' a citizen to be deprived of her constitutional rights can also be held liable. The requisite causal connection is satisfied if the defendant set in motion a series of events that the defendant knew or reasonably should have known would cause others to deprive the plaintiff of her constitutional rights.") (internal quotation omitted).

D. Ct. Op. at 7-8. The problem with this discussion is that it doesn't tell us what Dr. Tripp did or where, when, or why he took any action that might have violated Dr. Lewis's Fourth Amendment rights. In other words, it does not 'set forth with specificity the facts ... that support a finding that the defendant violated a clearly established right.' Armijo, 159 F.3d at 1259. Instead, the opinion merely advances the legal conclusion that Dr. Tripp did so, paraphrasing the legal standard for 'supervisory liability' under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 we set forth in Poolaw and then holding the standard satisfied. Such a 'conclusory legal ruling' does not constitute findings of fact to which we can defer. . . . In Ashcroft v. Iqbal, the Supreme Court recently held that 'purpose rather than knowledge is required to impose Bivens liability on ... an official charged with violations arising from his or her superintendent responsibilities.' . .This announcement has generated significant debate about the continuing vitality and scope of supervisory liability not only in Bivens actions, but also in § 1983 suits like the one before us. At one end of the spectrum, the Iqbal dissenters seemed to believe that the majority opinion 'eliminates ... supervisory liability entirely,' overruling cases like Poolaw. Id. at 1957 (Souter, J., dissenting). At the other end of the spectrum, the Ninth Circuit has read Iqbal as possibly holding that 'purpose ... is required' merely in cases of alleged racial discrimination by governmental officials, given that Iqbal itself involved allegations of racial discrimination and such discrimination only violates the Constitution when it is intentional. See al-Kidd v. Ashcroft, 580 F.3d 949, 976 n. 25 (9th Cir.2009). Many intermediate positions are also surely plausible. See, e.g., Sheldon Nahmod, Constitutional Torts, Over-Deterrence and Supervisory Liability after Iqbal, 14 Lewis & Clark L.Rev. 279, 294-98 (2010) (discussing some alternatives). We need not stake out a position in this debate today because, as will become clear, Dr. Lewis's claims fail even under our preexisting Poolaw standard.")

Christensen v. Big Horn County Bd. of County Com'rs, 374 F. App'x 821, 2010 WL 1627833, at *4 (10th Cir. Apr. 15, 2010) ("The primary thrust of Mr. Christensen's claims against these parties, who did not directly participate in the operative events recounted in the complaint, is that they are formally responsible for operations, conditions, and the conduct of staff at the Big Horn County Jail. He also refers in conclusory terms to their culpability for inadequate supervision and training of jail staff. The short answer to these claims is that, in light of the inadequacy of the underlying constitutional allegations against the actual participants − which we confirm on this appeal − there is nothing for which these defendants may be held derivatively accountable. . . .The slightly longer answer, explained by the district court, is that the allegations for the derivative liability of these defendants are themselves facially deficient. Repeating that analysis here is unnecessary. Suffice it to say that Mr. Christensen's pleadings in this respect reflect the 'formulaic recitation' of 'bare assertions' deemed categorically deficient by the Supreme Court in Iqbal.").

Arocho v. Nafziger, 367 F. App'x 942, 2010 WL 681679, at *3 n.4, *11 (10th Cir. Mar. 1, 2010) ("[G]iven a recent Supreme Court pronouncement, the basic concept of § 1983 or Bivens supervisory liability itself may no longer be tenable. . . After Iqbal, circuits that had held supervisors liable when they knew of and acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of subordinates have expressed some doubt over the continuing validity of even that limited form of liability. See Bayer v. Monroe County Children & Youth Servs., 577 F.3d 186, 190 n. 5 (3d Cir.2009); Maldonado v. Fontanes, 568 F.3d 263, 274 n. 7 (1st Cir.2009). . . . The traditional standard for supervisory liability in this circuit 'requires allegations of personal direction or of actual knowledge and acquiescence' in a subordinate's unconstitutional conduct. . . As alluded to earlier, the Supreme Court's recent discussion of supervisory liability casts doubt on the continuing vitality of even this limited formulation of such liability. . . . In any event, Mr. Arocho's allegations do not satisfy our extant standard. His claim here is that 'warden [Wiley] was in the position to correct plaintiff['s] rights violation and fail[ed] to do so.'. . To the extent the rights violation was a function of BOP Director Lappin's decision, Lappin is obviously not Wiley's subordinate and any allegation that Wiley was in a position to 'correct' Lappin's decision would be facially implausible.").

Gallagher v. Shelton, 587 F.3d 1063, 1069 (10th Cir. 2009) ("Gallagher's only allegation involving these defendants relates to their denials of his grievances, namely that they 'rubber-stamped' his various grievances. . . We agree with the reasoning in our previous unpublished decisions that a denial of a grievance, by itself without any connection to the violation of constitutional rights alleged by plaintiff, does not establish personal participation under § 1983. . . Because Gallagher's only allegations involving these defendants relate to the denial of his grievances, he has not adequately alleged any factual basis to support an 'affirmative link' between these defendants and any alleged constitutional violation. Accordingly, the claims against Werholtz, Shelton, and Purdue were properly dismissed.").

Green v. Padilla, No. CIV 19-0751 JB\JFR, 2020 WL 5350175, at *35–36 (D.N.M. Sept. 4, 2020) ("As a preliminary matter, the Court notes that there are significant differences between Ashcroft v. Iqbal and cases like this one. First, unlike the common law Bivens actions that were at issue in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, § 1983's language -- imposing liability on 'every person who ... subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States ... to the deprivation of any rights ...,' 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (emphasis added), provides for supervisory liability. Second, unlike the Equal Protection claim at issue in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, the Female Inmates need not allege discriminatory purpose to state an Eighth Amendment claim. . . Last, the plaintiff in Ashcroft v. Iqbal asserted common-law discrimination claims against the two of the highest ranking officials in the United States government -- the Attorney General and the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, officials 'whom the [Supreme] Court has historically afforded the highest level of protection from suit.' Karen M. Blum, Supervisory Liability after Iqbal*: Misunderstood but Not Misnamed*, 43

Urb. Law. 541, 543 (2011). The defendants in Ashcroft v. Iqbal thus were many more levels removed from the constitutional violations at issue in that case than are the Supervisory Defendants here, who are mid- and upper-level administrators at a state correctional facility. Nonetheless, confusion exists regarding the extent to which Farmer v. Brennan supplies the operative standard for a prison supervisor's mental state. In that case, the Supreme Court, acknowledging that 'considerable conceptual difficulty would attend any search for the subjective state of mind of a governmental entity, as distinct from that of a government official,' distinguished the objective deliberate indifference standard that it used in City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989). . . The Supreme Court then further clarified that an official's deliberate indifference entails subjective awareness of a risk of constitutional harm. . . The Supreme Court acknowledged, however, that a plaintiff can prove actual knowledge through circumstantial evidence. . . Tenth Circuit caselaw since Ashcroft v. Iqbal suggests that this standard is still operative in supervisory liability cases under the Eighth Amendment. In Dodds v. Richardson, the Tenth Circuit confirmed that plaintiffs state a claim for supervisory liability where the defendant possesses the constitutionally required state of mind, which varies with the constitutional violation's nature. . . Accordingly, the Tenth Circuit's pre-Ashcroft v. Iqbal test for Eighth Amendment supervisory liability remains operative. . . The Supervisory Defendants nonetheless contend that the Court may discount the Female Inmates' allegations regarding the Supervisory Defendants' state of mind. The Court subjects the Female Inmates' claims to Ashcroft v. Iqbal's procedural prescriptions -- it separates the Female Inmates' legal conclusions and screened the remaining factual contentions for plausibility. . . . The Supreme Court in Ashcroft v. Iqbal construed as a legal conclusion the plaintiff's allegations that Ashcroft and Mueller 'each knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject [the plaintiff]' to unconstitutional confinement conditions 'as a matter of policy, solely on account of [his] religion, race, and/or national origin for no legitimate penological interest,' and that Ashcroft was this policy's 'principal architect' while Mueller was 'instrumental' in implementing the policy. . . The Supreme Court characterized these allegations as 'bare assertions,' that 'amount to nothing more than a "formulaic recitation of the elements" of a constitutional discrimination claim,' and so were legal conclusions couched as factual allegations. . . The Tenth Circuit has since made clear, however, that not all allegations which include legal characterizations are conclusory, and that Ashcroft v. Iqbal does not abolish the basic principles of notice pleading. . . . Green's allegations regarding Sanchez' role in Padilla's abuse are more than formulaic legal conclusions couched as factual allegations, and so are entitled to a presumption of truth under rule 12(b)(6). As the Court discusses below, Green alleges sufficient factual allegations regarding her and other inmates' reporting about Padilla's abusive behavior to support that Sanchez knew about the risk. She alleges that she and other inmates reported Padilla's abuse to prison administrators, NM State Police, and PREA auditors, and that Sanchez was aware of this reporting. She details interacting with Springer Correctional administrators regarding her grievance and alleges that Padilla's abuse continued after this reporting. Sanchez' awareness here is not implausible. Unlike in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, where the plaintiff alleged that the highest-ranking officials in the United States knew about unconstitutional practices and so designed or implemented those practices, Sanchez is not far removed from the alleged constitutional violations -- he runs a mid-sized state prison facility. As the Tenth Circuit has made clear since Ashcroft v. Iqbal, a plaintiff's factual allegations are still entitled to reasonable inferences for the legal conclusions that they support. . . . Ashcroft v. Iqbal's procedural holding[s] thus do not compel the Court to construe as implausible Green's factual allegations about Sanchez' state of mind.") Derosier v. Balltrip, 149 F. Supp. 3d 1286, 1297 (D. Colo. 2016) ("Plaintiff's allegations concerning Commander Sanchez are that he and Officer Balltrip discussed Plaintiff's phone call to the Greeley Tribune and 'agreed between themselves that there was probable cause' for Plaintiff's arrest and that Commander Sanchez 'authorized Officer Balltrip to act on his desire to effect a warrantless arrest of [Plaintiff] at his home.'. . Because Plaintiff has alleged that Commander Sanchez participated directly in the probable cause determination and directly authorized the warrantless arrest of Plaintiff inside his home, I find that the first two elements of supervisory liability are satisfied. . . Given my conclusion that the law regarding the alleged constitutional violations was clearly established, and Plaintiff's allegations that Commander Sanchez directly participated in the probable cause determination and authorized the warrantless arrest, I conclude that Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged the state of mind element. See Schneider, 717 F.3d at 769 (deliberate indifference state of mind demonstrated where defendant 'knowingly created a substantial risk of constitutional injury').

Mahaffey v. City of Vernal, No. 2:13-CV-4 DN, 2014 WL 7369837, at *10 (D. Utah Dec. 29, 2014) ("Defendants assert that a court must find personal participation in the constitutional violation before supervisory liability can be found. They argue that, because Defendants Bassett and Campbell were not physically present during the alleged constitutional violations, they did not participate personally and are entitled to summary judgment. . . However, personal participation does not require 'the sort of on-the-ground, moment-to-moment control that defendants appear to suggest.'. . As discussed, if a defendant 'promulgated, created, implemented or possessed responsibility for the continued operation of a policy'. . . through which a constitutional violation occurred, the first prong of the test is satisfied.")

Shapiro v. Falk, No. 13-CV-3086-WJM-KMT, 2014 WL 4651952, *7, *8 (D. Colo. Sept. 18, 2014) ("Notwithstanding the lack of clarity with respect to supervisory liability after Iqbal, the court finds that Plaintiff's allegations fails to establish that Defendant Bilderaya and Falk were personally involved in the alleged violation of his constitutional rights. First, Plaintiff alleges that both Defendant Bilderaya and Defendant Falk 'consented to' and were 'aware' that mass strip searches–in general, not in this particular instance–were being conducted at SCF. . . The court need not accept Plaintiff's label that Defendants Bilderaya and Falk 'consented to' strip searches at SCF in general–particularly where Plaintiff does not allege any facts to support this conclusion. Further, Iqbal clearly forecloses liability based on the fact that Defendants Bilderaya and Falk were 'aware' that mass strip searches were being conducted, even assuming that allegation is true. . . Second, Plaintiff appears to allege that Defendant Bilderaya failed to properly train his subordinates in the SCF Receiving Unit regarding the proper methods for conducting strip searches. . . However, even prior to Iqbal, § 1983 liability for a failure to train arises only 'where there is essentially a complete failure to train, or training is so reckless or grossly negligent that future misconduct is almost inevitable.'. . Here, Plaintiff's Amended Complaint does not outline any specific deficiencies in the training provided to the SCF Receiving Unit, much less how those deficiencies rendered the alleged violation of his Fourth Amendment rights inevitable. . . Accordingly, the court finds that Plaintiff has failed to demonstrate that Defendants Bilderaya and Falk were personally involved in the alleged violation of his constitutional rights. As such, Defendants Bilderaya and Falk are properly dismissed as Defendants.")

Poore v. Glanz, 46 F.Supp.3d 1191, 1203 (N.D. Okla. 2014) ("From all of the evidence, a jury could infer that (1) the manner in which the juvenile female inmates were housed in the north wing of the medical unit was such that they were at risk of sexual abuse by a staff member, (2) as a result of inadequate staffing, supervision, monitoring, and detention of juvenile females, a detention officer could (and did) enter Poore's cell and do as he pleased with her, uninhibited and undetected by any other officer or staff, (3) the risk of harm was so obvious to the female inmates housed in that manner that Glanz realized it, and (4) Glanz failed to take reasonable steps to alleviate that obvious risk. Thus, 'a jury might reasonably infer that [Glanz] was actually aware of a constitutionally infirm condition,' which is all that is required to establish deliberate indifference at the summary judgment stage. See Tafoya, 516 F.3d at 922. Hence, Glanz's motion for summary judgment on the § 1983 claim against him in his individual capacity is denied.")

Castillo v. Bobelu, 1 F.Supp.3d 1190, 1203, 1204 (W.D. Okla. 2014) ("Defendants essentially argue that they can be held liable as supervisors only if they ' "purposefully" or "intentionally" (Iqbal) under[took] a course of conduct to sexually harass, sexually assault, or rape the Plaintiffs or possess[ed] the same "state of mind" (Serna/Dodds) to intentionally sexually harass, sexually assault, or rape the Plaintiffs.'. . While the court disagrees with defendants' stated standards of supervisory liability, it concludes plaintiffs have not offered evidence from which a reasonable jury could find that Jones–Cooper or Bud Dolan or Larsen acted with the required intent. The test for a 'deliberate indifference' claim under the Eighth Amendment has both an objective and a subjective component. The objective component of the test is met if the harm suffered is sufficiently serious to implicate the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause. The subjective component is met if a prison official knows of and disregards an excessive risk to inmate health or safety. . . It is clear enough that Bobelu and Humphries' alleged conduct satisfies the objective component of an Eighth Amendment claim. The stumbling block for plaintiffs is the subjective component, which requires 'that the official actually be "aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and he must also draw the inference."'. . . The court must therefore evaluate plaintiffs' evidence pertinent to their assertion that each defendant acted with a 'culpable state of mind.'. . .The court agrees with plaintiffs that if a supervisor knows about misconduct and fails to act or is aware of a significant risk and does not alleviate it, she can be held liable under § 1983. The court does not, though, agree that Smith alerted Jones–Cooper to a substantial risk of harm to the Hillside inmates. A case involving one incident of sexual assault more than ten years earlier at a different work site in a different city under different circumstances was not enough to alert Jones–Cooper to risks faced by female inmates participating in the prisoner works program at the Governor's Mansion. . .While prior sexual assaults at the same site have been found sufficient to put a supervisor 'on notice of the dangerous conditions,'. . . plaintiffs have offered no evidence that there had been earlier incidents involving sexual misconduct at the Governor's Mansion or, with one exception (the Smith case), with female inmates working elsewhere in Oklahoma pursuant to a prisoner public works project contract. They also did not substantiate their assertion that Jones–Cooper was aware of Bobelu or Humphries' behavior before May 29, 2009 with any evidence.")

Pena v. Greffet, 922 F.Supp.2d 1187, 1244, 1245 (D.N.M. 2013) ("Peña's allegations, taken as true and reasonably construed in a light most favorable to her, plead sufficient facts from which the Court can plausibly infer that both CCA and Hickson deliberately 'engaged' in a custom of suppressing reporting of and disregarding incidents of prison rape that caused the constitutional violations of which she complains. Peña alleges that CCA and Hickson engaged in the practices of placing inmates who reported sexual abuse in segregation or otherwise retaliating against them, violating its own and NMCD's written policies by failing to report allegations of prison rape to outside law enforcement, failing to conduct adequate internal investigations regarding rape allegations, and offering financial incentives to CCA employees for non-reporting of rape allegations. . . Judge Kern in Henderson v. Glanz noted that the plaintiff alleged that the defendant was aware of past sexual assaults and continued to understaff the alleged spots where they took place, and Judge Fitzpatrick reasoned in Brown v. Smith that allegations of the defendant's failure to train employees and to adequately investigate allegations of past sexual assaults was sufficient to make plausible the defendant's liability; both cases exhibit the defendants' failure to use past incidences of sexual assault to implement policies or to train their staff to prevent the same instances from occurring in the future. Here, although Peña does not specifically allege that there were past instances of sexual assaults at the NMCWF, her allegations imply the existence of past instances of sexual assault by alleging the defendants' response to past reports of such conduct. Whereas the defendants' failures to address such situations in Henderson v. Glanz and Brown v. Smith were sufficient to make a claim for supervisory liability for the plaintiffs' sexual assaults, Peña goes beyond alleging that CCA and Hickson merely failed to train the staff to prevent further sexual assault or implement policies for the same; Peña's allegations contend that CCA and Hickson affirmatively did the opposite. Her allegations of retaliation against the inmates for sexual assault reports, and that it is a practice or custom not to report such alleged instances to outside law enforcement, in violation of CCA's and NMCD policies, make plausible that CCA's and Hickson's policies and customs not only failed to address the prevention of further sexual assaults, but created an environment that likely led to an environment in which sexual assaults of inmates increased. Whereas Judge Kern concluded that the defendant's failure to affirmatively place more staff on duty 'despite his awareness of frequent sexual assaults ... occurring in [known] spots,' Henderson v. Glanz, 2012 WL 5931546, at *4, was sufficient to make a plausible claim for § 1983 liability for the plaintiff's alleged sexual assault, Peña's allegations make plausible that CCA and Hickson not only failed to take action to prevent further sexual assaults despite alleged awareness of past instances, but that they 'engaged in' policies suppressing reporting of the instances by inmates and staff alike. . . While Peña probably should have pled some specific facts about particular past instances, the Court concludes that these allegations nudge her claim across the line to plausible. Although Peña's Complaint may be criticized as lacking in specific factual allegations connecting CCA's or Hickson's personal involvement to these practices or policies, Peña's allegation that a practice was to place inmates in segregation for reporting sexual assault, combined with her allegation that she was placed in segregation 'following her reporting of Defendant Greffet's rapes,'. . . gives sufficient specific factual background to nudge such a claim against Hickson from speculative to plausible. Moreover, the allegation that there was in place a policy or custom of providing incentives for non-reporting of sexual assaults is troubling for CCA particularly. That there was a policy in place in which CCA employees were given bonuses or other financial incentives for their attempt to suppress the amount of sexual assault reports leads to the inference that both the CCA, as the employer, and Hickson, as the Warden in charge of the NMWCF, engaged in the provision of such bonuses. While Peña fails to differentiate and refer specifically in her allegations to CCA's conduct versus Hickson's conduct, the allegation that incentives were provided for non-reporting supports the conclusion that CCA not only knew about the practice and custom of suppressing reports of sexual assaults at NMWCF, but affirmatively encouraged and engaged in the custom. CCA's and Hickson's custom and practice of suppressing inmates' and staff members' reporting of sexual assaults leads to the conclusion that sexual assaults at NMCWF, such as Greffet's sexual assault of Peña in July/August, 2009, were more prevalent and occurred more frequently than they would have without CCA's and Hickson's engaging in these practices. Peña's allegations are thus sufficient to make plausible that CCA and Hickson engaging in the alleged practices and thereby suppressing sexual assault reports created an environment, without which, Peña's alleged sexual assault by Greffet at NMWCF would not have occurred. Because Peña alleges sufficient factual allegations to state a plausible claim for CCA's and Hickson's liability for violation of her constitutional rights in violation of § 1983, the Court will deny CCA's and Hickson's request to dismiss Count III.")

Shaver v. Glanz, No. 12–CV–0234–CVE–PJC, 2012 WL 3061498, *4 (N.D. Okla. July 26, 2012) ("The Court finds that plaintiff has stated a claim against Glanz in his individual capacity. Plaintiff alleges that she was repeatedly assaulted by Bowers while she was detained in the medical unit of the Tulsa County Jail, and this is a sufficiently serious injury to satisfy the objective component of a deliberate indifference claim. Plaintiff also claims that Glanz was aware of blind spots in the Tulsa County Jail, and that he knew that jail personnel and inmates were engaging in illegal conduct in these blind spots. In particular, she claims that Glanz knew that jail personnel were engaging in sexual acts with inmates and used the blind spots to avoid detection. . . When Glanz learned of Bowers' conduct, plaintiff alleges that Glanz failed to take any disciplinary action against Bowers or refer Bowers to the Tulsa County District Attorney for possible criminal charges. . . She claims that Glanz showed deliberate indifference to the needs of female inmates by failing to take steps to monitor the blind spots and properly staff the north wing of the medical unit with at least one female detention officer. These allegations are sufficient to support an inference that Glanz was aware of a substantial risk of harm to female inmates and that he acted with deliberate indifference by failing to abate the risk. Glanz argues that plaintiff's factual allegations do not specifically and conclusively show that he acted with deliberate indifference, but he disregards the well-pleaded allegations of the complaint and his arguments are more appropriate for consideration on a motion for summary judgment.")

Kirtman v. U.S., No. CIV–12–504–HE, 2012 WL 2258339, at *3, *4 (W.D. Okla. May 8, 2012) ("Plaintiff's allegations concerning Defendant Ledezma are that he 'allowed medical staff and officers to knowingly cuff Plaintiff behind his back against standing medical orders' and that Plaintiff 'did not make any movements or actions to justify the use of force.'. . Plaintiff has alleged only that Defendant Ledezma had knowledge that other prison officials or medical staff handcuffed Plaintiff behind his back. Plaintiff's allegation that Defendant Ledezma is liable to him solely because of his supervisory position at FCI El Reno or solely because he had knowledge of the actions of other medical staff or prison officials does not state a plausible claim for relief under Bivens. Plaintiff has not alleged that Defendant Ledezma personally participated in placing handcuffs on Plaintiff behind his back, personally participated in the medical treatment provided or not provided to Plaintiff, or that Defendant Ledezma implemented a policy showing his authorization or approval of this action. . . Thus, Plaintiff has failed to state a plausible claim upon which relief may be granted, and this claim should be dismissed pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1915A(b).")

Busby v. City of Tulsa, No. 11–cv–447–GKF–PJC, 2012 WL 1867167, at *4, *5 (N.D. Okla. May 22, 2012) ("Busby alleges in Paragraph 11 of the First Amended Complaint that Larsen was 'responsible for creating, adopting, approving, ratifying, and enforcing the rules, regulations, policies, practices, procedures, and/or customs of the TPD, including the policies, practices, procedures, and/or customs that violated Plaintiff's constitutional rights as set forth in this Complaint.' However, Busby fails to identify any particular policy that (1) Larsen promulgated, created or implemented, or possessed responsibility for continued operation; that (2) caused the complained of constitutional harm. . . Rather, as more specifically set forth below, Busby's claims against Larsen are that Larsen 'ratified' certain unconstitutional acts taken by Larsen's subordinate, Major Evans. . . . Busby alleges that '[b]y denying Captain Busby's appeal, the City, Chief Jordan and Deputy Chief Larsen approved of and ratified the retaliatory performance evaluation.' Here, as was the case with Busby's previous allegations, Busby alleges Larsen had knowledge of Major Evans' allegedly discriminatory purpose. Knowledge, however, is not a sufficient basis upon which to state a claim of individual liability against a government official for the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinate. . . Moreover, Busby's allegation that Larsen denied Busby's appeal of Major Evans' allegedly retaliatory performance evaluation does not sufficiently allege purposeful misconduct on the part of Deputy Chief Larson. The alleged misconduct was the retaliatory performance evaluation rendered by Larsen's subordinate. Upon review of the allegations contained in Paragraph 31 of the First Amended Complaint, the Court concludes that Busby has failed to plausibly plead that Larsen, by virtue of his own conduct and state of mind, violated the Constitution.")

Harris v. Denver Health Medical Center, No. 11–cv–01868–REB–MEH, 2012 WL 1676590, at *5, *6 (D. Colo. May 10, 2012) ("Supervisory status alone does not create § 1983 liability. . .

Rather, liability of a supervisor under § 1983 requires 'allegations of personal direction or of actual knowledge and acquiescence.'. .For Claim One, Plaintiff alleges that Defendant Stob, representative for Denver Health, 'is the individual who is responsible, through actual or constructive knowledge, for enforcing a policy and custom, (pull teeth only), that caused plaintiff's injuries.'. . For Claim Two, Plaintiff alleges the same against Defendant Wilson, D.D.C. Administrator. . . .Construing the Amended Complaint liberally and taking Plaintiff's allegations as true, the Plaintiff alleges that he suffers ongoing physical ailments resulting from a lack of dental care and treatment, the lack of which stems from medical staff refusing to provide such care and treatment pursuant to a policy allowing only tooth extractions, which Defendant Stob has knowingly enforced at the medical center and which Defendant Wilson has knowingly enforced at the detention center. The Plaintiff need not allege that the Defendants 'personally played any part in his treatment' . . . nor that they 'participat[ed] ... in Plaintiff's ongoing dental care.'. . Whether a policy of "tooth extractions only" exists or whether these Defendants actually implemented, promulgated or enforced such policy are not proper considerations in a Rule 12(b)(6) analysis. Rather, the Plaintiff may overcome a Rule 12(b)(6) challenge to his Amended Complaint by alleging: '(1) the [Defendants] promulgated, created, implemented or possessed responsibility for the continued operation of a policy that (2) caused the complained of constitutional harm, and (3) acted with the state of mind required to establish the alleged constitutional deprivation.'. . Plaintiff's allegations concerning both Defendant Stob and Defendant Wilson meet Dodds' requirements.")

Keith v. Werholtz, No. 11–2281–KHV, 2012 WL 1059858, at *7 (D. Kan. March 28, 2012) ("Here, the Court finds that plaintiff has alleged facts sufficient to state a plausible claim against defendant Koerner, who was responsible for managing TCF and knew about multiple instances of sexual misconduct at TCF over a period of years, inconsistently disciplined corrections officers who engaged in prohibited sexual conduct with inmates and thus purportedly tolerated at least an informal policy which permitted sexual contact between prison staff and inmates.")

Poore v. Glanz, No. 11–CV–0797–CVE–TLW, 2012 WL 728199, at *4 (N.D. Okla. Mar. 6, 2012) ("The Court finds that plaintiff has stated a claim against Glanz in his individual capacity. Shaw v. Glanz, No. 11–CV–518–GKF–FHM, 2012 WL 405151, at *6, *7 (N.D. Okla. Feb. 8, 2012) ("Accepting as true plaintiff's allegations that Glanz was aware of discriminatory practices by his subordinates, plaintiff has arguably met the first requirement for pleading a cognizable § 1983 claim against Glanz for supervisory liability, i.e., that Glanz promulgated, created, or implemented or possessed responsibility for the continued operation of a policy. Further, by alleging she has been treated differently than her Caucasian coworkers with regard to promotions, raises and discipline, and recounting specific instances of such treatment, plaintiff has asserted facts which, if proven, would establish the second element of a § 1983 claim, i.e., that she has suffered constitutional harm. With respect to the third element—the defendant's state of mind—Iqbal instructs that discriminatory intent is required to establish a claim for supervisory liability for racial discrimination. . . Plaintiff has alleged Glanz acted 'intentionally or with reckless indifference.' 'Reckless indifference' clearly does not suffice to establish the required mens rea under Iqbal. Further, while the complaint makes the conclusory allegation that Glanz acted 'intentionally,' plaintiff has failed to allege any facts supporting the allegation. The only allegation of any personal involvement by Glanz is that she complained to Glanz and Undersheriff Edwards about the defendant's policies and their negative effect upon her as an African American, and she received a letter in response from Edwards finding the claim of discrimination was not corroborated. . . This allegation, taken as true, might establish 'knowledge and acquiescence' on the part of Glanz, but does not suffice to establish the 'discriminatory intent' state of mind required by Iqbal. . . Thus, plaintiff has failed to meet the pleading requirements set out in Dodds.")

Kemp v. Lawyer, 846 F.Supp.2d 1170, ___ (D. Colo. 2012) ("A defendant sued in his individual capacity under § 1983, may be subject to personal liability and/or supervisory liability. . . While personal liability under § 1983 must be based on personal involvement in the alleged constitutional violation, . . . supervisory liability under § 1983 'allows a plaintiff to impose liability upon a defendant-supervisor who creates, promulgates, implements, or in some other way possesses responsibility for the continued operation of a policy the enforcement (by the defendant supervisor or [his] subordinates) of which subjects, or causes to be subjected that plaintiff to the deprivation of any rights secured by the Constitution.'. . .Plaintiffs contend that Defendant Dunlap personally directed, had actual knowledge of, and acquiesced in both the forced entry and the use of excessive force. Specifically, they assert in their complaint that Dunlap 'failed to intervene or remedy the violation of Plaintiff's constitutional rights, and instead chose to supervise, directly participate in, and/or acquiesce in the constitutional violations ... with the same purpose and state of mind as Defendant Lawyer—to gain entry into the apartment regardless of the risk to the safety of those inside in order to gather chemical evidence, even though a reasonable officer in [his] position would have known that Jason would not have voluntarily submitted to a chemical test and that they had no right to forcibly require Jason to submit to such a test under the circumstances.'. .In support of these claims, Plaintiffs allege that: Defendant Dunlap actively participated in escalating the tension and level of force used at the scene, laying the groundwork for Jason's death. As the supervising sergeant on the scene, it was Defendant Dunlap's duty to supervise Lawyer and Firko and to take all reasonable actions to prevent violations of constitutional rights. Yet, rather than directing Lawyer and Firko to cease trying to violently force their way into the home without a warrant, Dunlap condoned, ratified and approved of Lawyer and Firko's actions, and then provided support for their attempts at entry by guarding the back exit from the house. Defendant Dunlap provided support as Defendants Lawyer and Firko escalated the tension and level of force used on the scene, laying the groundwork for Jason's death. Dunlap watched as Firko and Lawyer attempted to kick down the door with their guns drawn, knowing they were seeking entry without a warrant solely to further a fruitless quest for chemical evidence. Dunlap knew that even if Firko and Lawyer gained entry into the residence, Jason would not have voluntarily submitted to a chemical test and that Firko and Lawyer had no right to forcibly require Jason to submit to such a test under the circumstances. Thus, Dunlap knew that the quest for chemical evidence by forcibly entering the residence was likely to be fruitless as well as illegal. Dunlap was present on the scene and, as the supervising officer, was likely informed that Lawyer and/or Firko had ripped a part of the door frame off and shoved it into the open door to prop it open [and ...] that Lawyer and/or Firko had pepper sprayed Jason. . . . When these allegations are taken as true, I conclude that Plaintiffs have alleged facts to support a claim of individual supervisory liability against Dunlap related to the warrantless search based on his failure to stop the entry—which he is alleged to have witnessed and presumptively knew to involve only a minimal traffic accident and/or possible DUI—and where there was no indication that Jason was armed or a flight risk. Failing to stop Defendant Lawyer and Firko's attempt, with guns drawn, to kick their way into the residence without a warrant, and then supporting their ultimate entry by guarding the back exit, constituted implicit approval sufficient to state a plausible § 1983 claim of supervisor liability for a constitutional violation based on the warrantless search. A defendant in a supervisory position can be personally involved in an alleged constitutional violation by his subordinates when he 'personally directed his subordinates to take the action resulting in the alleged constitutional violation' or 'when he had actual knowledge that his subordinates were committing the alleged constitutional violation and he acquiesced in its commission.'. . Plaintiffs also allege sufficient facts of supervisory liability related to the use of excessive force because they have alleged that Defendant Dunlap, as the supervising officer on the scene, had the ability, opportunity and, indeed, the duty to prevent the deadly shooting from occurring. . . Plaintiffs allege that Dunlap was aware that Defendants Lawyer and Firko were attempting armed, forced entry into Jason's residence without permission. Plaintiffs argue that his failure to stop the entry, coupled with his assisting at the rear of the residence, are facts that make out a plausible claim for supervisory liability in the ultimate use of excessive force by Defendant Lawyer. I agree. While Defendant Dunlap was not present at the front of the house, his acts and failures to act as alleged, are not too attenuated to support a plausible claim that he caused the constitutional deprivation of deadly force. As such, I conclude that Plaintiffs have alleged facts that, if proven at trial, suffice to establish a plausible claim that Defendant Dunlap's personal involvement caused the excessive force violation. . . .Finally, I address whether the facts alleged show Defendant Dunlap acted with the state of mind required to establish he committed the constitutional violations. . . .Under the Fourth Amendment, an action is 'reasonable,' regardless of the individual officer's state of mind, 'as long as the circumstances, viewed objectively, justify [the] action.'. . In addition, to establish a violation of § 1983 by a supervisor, the plaintiff must, at minimum, demonstrate a deliberate, intentional act on the part of the defendant to violate the plaintiff's legal rights. . . .Plaintiffs have alleged that Defendant Dunlap acted with 'deliberate indifference' to Jason's constitutional rights when he failed to act to stop, control and diffuse the situation and instead assisted by guarding the rear. They have alleged that Defendant Dunlap witnessed the armed attempts to enter without a warrant, chose not to intervene to stop, control or diffuse the encounter while knowing the underlying circumstances, and then provided support for the continued escalation of the events. These facts and the inferences therefrom, when take as true, are sufficient to support a plausible claim that his actions and failures to act constituted deliberate indifference, and such conduct was objectively unreasonable under the totality of the circumstances alleged.") Kemp v. Lawyer, 846 F.Supp.2d 1170, 1175-77 (D. Colo. 2012) ("[T]o demonstrate that a supervisor-defendant has violated the plaintiff's constitutional right in failing to train—in order to establish individual liability under § 1983—a plaintiff must show: 1) an underlying violation of his constitution rights; 2) that the supervisor-defendant's personal involvement caused the misconduct complained of; and 3) that the supervisor-defendant acted with the state of mind or intent required to establish he committed a constitutional violation; specifically, at minimum, establish a deliberate and intentional act on the part of the defendant to violate the plaintiff's legal rights. . . . I conclude that Plaintiffs' complaint alleges insufficient factual matter to support that Defendant Turano's acts in failing to create policies for CPS officers and/or either failing or inadequately training the CPS officers related to the legalities of search and seizures under the circumstances presented here, demonstrate that his personal involvement ultimately caused the misconduct complained of, and that his intent was to deliberately and intentionally fail to act (in implementing adequate policies and training) in order to violate Jason's legal rights. . . . I conclude that the factual allegations in Plaintiffs' complaint, even when viewed as true, are insufficient to establish that Defendant Turano's personal involvement caused the underlying constitutional violations and that his intent, in so doing, was to deliberately and intentionally fail to implement policies and train CSP officers in order to violate Jason's legal rights. As such, Plaintiffs' complaint does not establish a plausible claim for individual supervisory liability under § 1983 against Defendant Turano for failure to train.")

Coffey v. U.S., Nos. CIV 08-0588 JB/LFG, CIV 09-0028 JB/LFG, 2011 WL 6013611, at *37-*40 (D.N.M. Nov. 28, 2011) ("McKinley County argues that Coffey has not responded to its argument that Ashcroft v. Iqbal has changed or abolished the standard for supervisory liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . The Tenth Circuit has recognized that Ashcroft v. Iqbal limited, and may have even eliminated, supervisory liability for government officials based on an employee's or subordinate's constitutional violations. See Dodds v. Richardson, 614 F.3d 1185 (10th Cir.2010). The language that may have altered the landscape for supervisory liability in Ashcroft v. Iqbal is as follows: 'Because vicarious liability is inapplicable to Bivens and § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. . The Tenth Circuit in Dodds v. Richardson did not resolve completely how Ashcroft v. Iqbal affected supervisory liability. . . The Supreme Court's and the Tenth Circuit's decisions bind the Court. . . The Tenth Circuit has recognized that Ashcroft v. Iqbal may create a conflict with its prior precedent on supervisory liability and has not yet decided to resolve that Supreme Court decision with its prior precedent. See Dodds v. Richardson, 614 F.3d at 1199. . . . The Tenth Circuit recognized before Ashcroft v. Iqbal that supervisory liability was a valid theory on which a plaintiff could hold a government official liable, at least under some circumstances, for conduct in which his or her subordinates engaged. . . District courts within the Tenth Circuit are bound to follow the Tenth Circuit's decisions. . . There is some confusion among courts as to the effect Ashcroft v. Iqbal had on supervisory liability. The dissent in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, written by Justice Souter and joined by three other Justices, concluded that the majority had eliminated supervisory liability in its entirety. . . The United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit has, on the other hand, opined that the decision may have only required purposeful conduct by supervisors in racial discrimination cases, as those were the facts in Ashcroft v. Iqbal. . . The Tenth Circuit has recognized, besides these two positions, '[m]any intermediate positions are also surely plausible.' Lewis v. Tripp, 604 F.3d 1221, 1227 n. 3 (10th Cir.2010). Given that the Tenth Circuit has not yet determine whether Ashcroft v. Iqbal has overruled its prior opinions on supervisory liability, including Serna v. Colorado Department of Corrections and Jenkins v. Wood, given that a district court is bound by Tenth Circuit law until the Tenth Circuit overrules a prior panel's decision, given that the Tenth Circuit has recognized this conflict that Ashcroft v. Iqbal has created with supervisory liability but has not yet decided the scope of the conflict, given that the parties have not briefed this issue in detail, given that Coffey may not even be asserting a supervisory liability claim, and given that anything the Court would say would be dicta, the Court declines to address the effect Ashcroft v. Iqbal had on supervisory liability. As the Court previously concluded, no McKinley County policy was the moving force behind any violation that may have occurred, and there is no affirmative link between McKinley County's conduct and any of its employees' constitutional violations. Thus, as those grounds resolve Coffey's claims, it is not necessary to address Ashcroft v. Iqbal's effect on supervisory liability." [footnotes omitted])

Carbajal v. Seventh Judicial Dist., No. 10-cv-02862-REB-KLM, 2011 WL 3471237, at *19, *20 & n.8 (D. Colo. Aug. 8, 2011) ("The Supreme Court has recently called into question the notion of personal involvement by knowing acquiescence. In Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949, the Court suggested that the simple fact that a supervisor knew of and acquiesced in a constitutional violation committed by his subordinates does not establish that he was personally involved in the violation. . . . Iqbal has been interpreted by at least two Courts of Appeals as narrowing the scope of what constitutes 'personal involvement' by a supervisor in an alleged constitutional violation committed by his subordinates [citing Bayer and Maldonado] Accordingly, to establish that a defendant in a supervisory position was personally involved in an alleged constitutional violation committed by his subordinates, a plaintiff must show that the defendant did more than simply acquiesce in the violation. . . . The Courts of Appeals have not provided clear guidance regarding precisely what a plaintiff must show to demonstrate more than mere acquiescence by the defendant. But Iqbal and Serna indicate that the defendant's state of mind is the linchpin of the analysis. In Iqbal, the Supreme Court suggested that a defendant who acquiesced in a constitutional violation committed by his subordinates was personally involved in the violation only if his acquiescence was motivated by a 'purpose' to allow or further the violation. . . In Serna, the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit suggested that a defendant supervisor who acquiesced in a constitutional violation was personally involved in that violation only if he shared the same 'state of mind' with his subordinates who actually committed the violation.") Fleetwood v. Werholtz, No. 10-2480-RDR, 2011 WL 2938106, at *5, *6 (D. Kan. July 19, 2011) ("Defendants argue that there is no allegation in the second amended complaint concerning what the supervisor defendants actually did, only conclusory allegations, such as allowing a culture of sexual misconduct. . . The supervisor defendants contend that there is no allegation that the supervisor defendants ignored an officer's known history of sexual contact with prisoners. . . The supervisor defendants further argue that the second amended complaint lacks a plausible allegation that the supervisor defendants knew of any risk of harm to plaintiff which they then ignored. . . Finally, the supervisor defendants contend that plaintiff's claims that defendants failed to properly discipline staff for undue familiarity or for failing to monitor the movement of staff and inmates, are not specific to any defendant and are not specific to the alleged incident between plaintiff and defendant VanDyke. Therefore, they argue that there is no sufficient affirmative link alleged between that incident and the supervisor defendants. . . As previously stated, the court's role is to examine the factual allegations in the complaint (as opposed to the legal conclusions) and determine whether they plausibly could lead to an entitlement to relief. It is undisputed that plaintiff has alleged a constitutional violation committed by defendant VanDyke who was a subordinate to the supervisor defendants. The question is whether plaintiff has plausibly alleged an affirmative link between the alleged actions or omissions of the supervisor defendants and the alleged constitutional violation.

As the court has stated, an affirmative link has three elements: personal involvement; a causal connection; and a culpable state of mind. Personal involvement can be alleged by claiming that a supervisor's failure to exercise control or direction caused the alleged illegal acts or that the supervisor promulgated, created, implemented or utilized a policy that caused the alleged deprivation of constitutional rights. There are allegations in the second amended complaint that defendant VanDyke boasted to others about his sexual contacts with inmates and others at TCF. There is also an allegation of one inmate complaint and an affidavit alleging improper sexual contact by defendant VanDyke. It is plausible that plaintiff could prove that these boasts and the written complaints and affidavits were known to the supervisor defendants. There are allegations in the second amended complaint that defendant VanDyke and other TCF officers engaged in a seemingly large amount of improper sexual activity of various kinds, from 'undue familiarity' to sexual intercourse. The second amended complaint alleges that the supervisor defendants reacted mildly and inconsistently to reports of such activity and thus fostered a culture of sexual misconduct. While a claim that defendants 'personally participated in the allowance of a culture of sexual misconduct' is a broad allegation, it is a broad factual allegation, not a legal conclusion. Thus, the court is obliged to consider whether it is a plausible allegation which may demonstrate the supervisor defendants' personal involvement (via a failure to supervise) in the alleged deprivation of constitutional rights. After considering the mass of factual allegations contained in the lengthy second amended complaint, the court does not believe that this claim is implausible. It is plausible to think plaintiff may be able to establish that the alleged failure to supervise defendant VanDyke and others set into motion a series of events which a reasonable supervisor should have known would lead to the alleged constitutional violation. It is also plausible to think that the failure to react to the alleged incidents of sexual misconduct by officers at TCF is evidence that the supervisor defendants were aware of and failed to take reasonable steps to alleviate a substantial risk of harm to female inmates who might come into contact with defendant VanDyke or other officers at TCF. The court rejects the argument that plaintiff does not allege how any of the supervisor defendants knew of the risk of harm to her. The second amended complaint contains numerous allegations of: 1) supervisory authority over defendant VanDyke and TCF; 2) widespread problems of sexual misconduct by defendant VanDyke and other officers at TCF; and 3) other complaints and claims regarding VanDyke and TCF. This is sufficient to make a plausible claim that each of the supervisor defendants was aware of a substantial risk of harm. Finally, the court also rejects the argument that plaintiff's allegations are too general to properly allege an affirmative link between a specific supervisor defendant to the sexual contact between plaintiff and defendant VanDyke. As the court has already noted, in Tafoya the Tenth Circuit stated that an official's knowledge of the risk need not be knowledge of a substantial risk to a particular inmate, or knowledge of the particular manner in which the injury might occur. Furthermore, there are specific allegations regarding defendant VanDyke which plaintiff may prove were known to the supervisor defendants.") Mason v. Hartley, 2011 WL 7429431, at *4, *5 & n.2 (D. Colo. July 14, 2011) ("Iqbal has been interpreted by at least two Courts of Appeals as narrowing the scope of what constitutes 'personal involvement' by a supervisor in an alleged constitutional violation committed by his subordinates [citing Bayer (3d Cir. 2009) and Maldonado (1st Cir. 2009)] Accordingly, to establish that a defendant in a supervisory position was personally involved in an alleged constitutional violation committed by his subordinates, a plaintiff must show that the defendant did more than simply acquiesce in the violation. . . . Nelson v. Glanz, No. 11-CV-189-CVE-PJC, 2011 WL 2144660, at *4, *5 (N.D. Okla. May 31, 2011) ("Although the Tenth Circuit did not expressly abrogate any of its precedent on supervisory liability, it recognized that Iqbal 'may very well have abrogated § 1983 supervisory liability as we previously understood it in this circuit....'. . . Considering all of the allegations of plaintiff's petition, the Court finds that plaintiff has not stated a § 1983 claim against Glanz in his official or individual capacities. The petition alleges that plaintiff's immediate supervisors, not Glanz, discriminated against plaintiff in terms of promotion, pay increases, and discipline, and she claims that Glanz was ultimately responsible for these actions. Taking plaintiff's factual allegations as true, they are insufficient to establish an 'affirmative link' between the adoption of an unconstitutional policy by Glanz and the conduct of his subordinates. . . The allegations of the petition would be sufficient to show that plaintiff's immediate supervisors may have engaged in racial discrimination, but plaintiff does not allege that the Sheriff's Office actually adopted a policy or custom authorizing or encouraging racial discrimination. Plaintiff alleges that the Sheriff's Office adopted employment practices with a disparate impact on African Americans. . . However, § 1983 requires that a plaintiff prove an intentional deprivation of constitutional rights and '[d]isparate impact claims that do not "raise a presumption of discriminatory purpose" are "insufficient to sustain a cause of action under ... [§ 1983]."'. . Plaintiff's allegations that the Sheriff's Office adopted policies that had a disparate impact on minorities do not raise a presumption of discriminatory purpose. Plaintiff will be granted leave to file an amended complaint if she can allege sufficient facts to state a § 1983 claim against Glanz. Specifically, plaintiff must be able to identify a specific policy adopted or promulgated by Glanz or the Sheriff's Office that deprived her of a constitutional right, and she must also have a sufficient basis to allege that Glanz acted to deliberately and intentionally violate plaintiff's constitutional rights.")

Gatrell v. City and County of Denver, No. 10-cv-02311-REB-KLM, 2011 WL 2185793, at *4 (D. Colo. May 26, 2011) ("Iqbal has been interpreted by at least two Courts of Appeals as narrowing the scope of what constitutes 'personal involvement' by a supervisor in an alleged constitutional violation committed by his subordinates[.] [citing Bayer and Maldonado] Accordingly, to establish that a defendant in a supervisory position was personally involved in an alleged constitutional violation committed by his subordinates, a plaintiff must show that the defendant did more than simply acquiesce in the violation. . . . Mallory v. Jones, No. 10-cv-02564-CMA-KMT, 2011 WL 1750234, at *11 (D. Colo. May 3, 2011) ("In the instant case, the Court finds that Plaintiff has alleged facts that set forth an affirmative link between the Supervisory Defendants and the alleged Eighth Amendment violation. Plaintiff has alleged that each of the Supervisory Defendants were notified of CDOC's excessive use of NSAIDs and failure to ensure the adequate monitoring of prisoners for NSAID-induced side effects such as ulcers and gastrointestinal bleeding, from which Plaintiff suffered. Plaintiff further alleges that, despite knowledge of these problems, the Supervisory Defendants did not take adequate remedial action within the CCF and, as a result, Defendants disregarded Plaintiff's serious medical condition and medical needs. Accordingly, the Court finds that denial of Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Plaintiff's claim against the Supervisory Defendants is warranted.")

Handy v. Diggins, No. 10-cv-02022-WYD-KMT, 2011 WL 1743394, at *1, *6, *7 (D. Colo. Mar. 23, 2011) ("In this prisoner civil rights suit, Plaintiff alleges that Defendants, Chief Diggins, Major Connors and Chaplain Scott, violated the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) and the First and Fourteenth Amendments by refusing to provide him with a kosher diet in accordance with his religious beliefs. . . . Defendants contend that Plaintiff's complaint contains no allegations that Chief Diggins was personally involved in the alleged violations. In response, Plaintiff argues that he submitted numerous kites and grievances to Chief Diggins complaining that his subordinates where subjecting Plaintiff to constitutional violations. Plaintiff contends that Chief Diggins is not being sued for his supervisory powers at the DCJ, 'but for his involvement, knowledge, and his failure to stop a subordinate's constitutional violation of which he was aware.'. . In his Complaint, Plaintiff alleges that he submitted a kite to Chief Diggins on April 10, 2010, explaining that he had been requesting a kosher meal since February 2010 and had submitted a grievance on March 19, 2010 to which he had not yet received a response. He further stated that he believed that Chaplain Scott was depriving him of his right to practice his religion and asked Chief Diggins to resolve the issue. . . Plaintiff further alleges that on May 7, 2010, he submitted a grievance to Chief Diggins chronicling his efforts to obtain a kosher meal and noting that he had been denied a kosher meal for nearly ninety days, effectively depriving him of his right to practice his religion and asking Chief Diggins to intervene. . . Plaintiff also contends that, according to DCJ grievance procedures, the grievance he submitted to Major Connors on April 27, 2010 would have been forwarded to Chief Diggins because it was the second grievance. . . Plaintiff argues that these allegations show that Chief Diggins 'had actual knowledge of the misconduct, approved of it, acquiesced in it or failed to stop it.'. . In this case, whether Plaintiff has alleged personal participation sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss is a close question. Plaintiff has alleged facts to suggest that Chief Diggins was aware of a potential constitutional violation, and that he failed to respond to Plaintiff's grievances or intervene on Plaintiff's behalf. The question is whether knowledge of alleged misconduct, approval of it, acquiescence in it, or failure to stop it, amounts to the personal participation necessary to state a claim against a supervisor since the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal. . . . In Iqbal, the Supreme Court held that the alleged deliberate indifference to or knowledge and acquiescence of Defendants Ashcroft and Mueller in their subordinates' unconstitutional conduct or discriminatory animus, alone, did not amount to the state of mind required to establish purposeful discrimination. . . . In Dodds, the Tenth Circuit held that '§ 1983 allows a plaintiff to impose liability upon a defendant- supervisor who creates, promulgates, implements, or in some other way possesses responsibility for the continued operation of a policy the enforcement of which subjects, or causes to be subjected that plaintiff to the deprivation of any rights secured by the constitution.'. . However, the court still has not determined whether allegations of a supervisor's knowledge of and acquiescence in a constitutional violation, such as those made by Plaintiff in this case, are sufficient to state a claim, post-Iqbal. Given the lack of clarity in the law, the court finds that Plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to suggest personal participation on the part of Chief Diggins and therefore recommends that Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's claims against Chief Diggins be denied.")

Twitchell v. Hutton, No. 10-cv-01939-WYD-KMT, 2011 WL 318827, at *6, *7 (D. Colo. Jan. 28, 2011) ("[I]n a recent decision interpreting Iqbal, the Tenth Circuit noted that the Supreme Court narrowed the scope of supervisory liability under § 1983. Dodds v. Richardson, 614 F.3d 1185, 1195 (10th Cir.2010). Thus, after Iqbal, the Dodds Court instructed that a supervisor can be held liable under § 1983 only if '(1) [he] promulgated, created, implemented or possessed responsibility for the continued operation of a policy that (2) caused the complained of constitutional harm, and (3) acted with the state of mind required to establish the alleged constitutional deprivation.'. . Turning to Plaintiff's Complaint, I find that it fails to plausibly plead that Chief Hays − while possessing the required state of mind − acted in such a way that caused Plaintiff's alleged constitutional harm. I agree with Defendants that Plaintiff's allegations focus on Chief Hays' supervisory status in alleging his liability. For example, Plaintiff alleges that Chief Hays, as the commanding officer for the Defendants, was responsible for the Defendants' training, supervision, conduct and for enforcing the regulations of the Steamboat Police Department. . . Plaintiff also makes a conclusory allegation that Chief Hays 'adopted, authorized, and ratified and/or condoned policies and/or customs of the use of excessive force and deliberate indifference ...' that deprived the Plaintiff of her constitutional rights. . . However, Plaintiff offers no supporting facts in connection with her conclusory allegations. Accordingly, I find that Plaintiff's allegations fail to contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a plausible claim.")

Garcia v. Webster, No. 09-cv-03024-CMA-KLM, 2010 WL 5572503, at *10 & n.3, *11 (D. Colo. Dec. 20, 2010) ("Iqbal has been interpreted by at least two Courts of Appeals as narrowing the scope of what constitutes 'personal involvement' by a supervisor in an alleged constitutional violation committed by his subordinates . . . . In Iqbal, the Supreme Court suggested that a defendant who acquiesces in a constitutional violation committed by his subordinates is personally involved in the violation only if his acquiescence was motivated by a 'purpose' to allow or further the violation. See 129 S.Ct. at 1949. In Serna, the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit suggested that a defendant supervisor who acquiesces in a constitutional violation is personally involved in that violation only if he shares the same 'state of mind' with his subordinates who actually commit the violation.] In this case, Plaintiff has failed to allege any personal involvement by Defendant Milyard in denying him medical care beyond simple acquiescence to the actions of medical staff at Sterling. Plaintiff's Complaint does not contain factual allegations sufficient to plausibly suggest that Defendant Milyard had either a 'purpose' to deny Plaintiff proper medical care, see Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949, or a 'state of mind' similar to that of his subordinates who allegedly were deliberately indifferent to Plaintiff's medical needs . . . . Plaintiff has merely alleged that (1) Defendant Milyard knew that he was complaining about the quality of his medical treatment, and (2) Defendant Milyard did not do 'anything to help.'. . These allegations are insufficient to state a claim against Defendant Milyard.")

A.W. by & Through J.W. v. Coweta County School District., 110 F.4th 1309, 1316-17 (11th Cir. 2024) ("A supervisor is liable for a subordinate's constitutional violation only if she 'personally participates in the alleged unconstitutional conduct' or causes the constitutional violation. . . That is, Hildebrand is liable as Sprague's supervisor only if she participated in violating the students' rights or caused them to suffer a violation at the hands of Sprague. Students are in a noncustodial relationship with the state. . . In that setting, 'conduct by a government actor' violates substantive due process 'only if the act can be characterized as arbitrary or conscience shocking in a constitutional sense.'. . So Hildebrand's liability as a supervisor turns on whether she participated in or caused conscience-shocking conduct, and her independent liability turns on whether her alleged deliberate indifference to the alleged abuse shocks the conscience. We have never held that an official's deliberate indifference in a noncustodial setting can shock the conscience. . . Indeed, even allegations of intentional misconduct seldom shock the conscience. . . Our precedent makes clear that Sprague's alleged abuse did not violate the students' right to substantive due process. We have held that a similar complaint that a teacher abused a disabled student did not shock the conscience. . . .In the light of T.W., Sprague's alleged abuse does not satisfy the shock-the-conscience standard. . . .The Supreme Court has cautioned against judicial expansion of rights to substantive due process 'because guideposts for responsible decisionmaking in this unchartered area are scarce and open-ended.' . . . Allegations of a teacher's intentional abuse are ordinarily the province of state tort law. . . Sprague's alleged abuse does not warrant supplanting state tort law and exceeding the limited contours of the shock-the-conscience standard.")

Myrick v. Fulton County, Georgia, 69 F.4th 1277, 1298-99 (11th Cir. 2023) ("The complaint does not allege that Sheriff Jackson personally directed the Officers to act unlawfully or that he knew they would do so and failed to stop them. That leaves options one and two. With respect to the first, '[t]he deprivations that constitute widespread abuse sufficient to notify the supervising official must be obvious, flagrant, rampant and of continued duration, rather than isolated occurrences.'. . Any attempt by Appellants to demonstrate a causal connection between Sheriff Jackson and the alleged constitutional deprivation based on such a history of widespread abuse must fail. There is simply nothing alleged in the complaint demonstrating that Sheriff Jackson would have had notice of the alleged widespread abuse. . . . The complaint focuses only on May's experience at the Fulton County Jail—it does not point to other instances of excessive force or deliberate indifference aside from noting that Fulton County has paid judgments and settlements for unknown claims in the past. Because Appellants' complaint focuses solely on May's experience—a single incident of allegedly unconstitutional activity—and because none of the policies or customs it alleges are unconstitutional on their own, the complaint does not, as a matter of law, state a claim against Sheriff Jackson for supervisory liability.")

Christmas v. Harris County, Georgia, 51 F.4th 1348, 1355-58 (11th Cir. 2022) ("[B]efore Christmas's assault, Sheriff Jolley was aware of two—and only two—instances of potential concern involving Pierson. In one, Pierson was sued for using excessive force against a young man who later died in police custody. In the other, Pierson's ex-wife alleged that Pierson was following her in his police cruiser. These incidents may well have rendered Pierson unfit to serve as a police officer (and they may have warranted other action too). But, without for a moment condoning Pierson's conduct (there or here), . . . we can't help but observe that neither incident involved a sexual assault, and that (as a result) neither would have put Sheriff Jolley on notice of Pierson's proclivity for sexually assaulting people in his custody. . . . Because these two incidents are of such a different character from the constitutional violation at hand, we simply cannot (consistent with our precedents) say that, based on them, Sheriff Jolley should (or could) have predicted Christmas's assault. And so, we cannot conclude that Sheriff Jolley 'failed to stop' Pierson from sexually assaulting Christmas. . . There's also no indication in the record that Sheriff Jolley 'directed [Pierson] to act unlawfully.'. . On the contrary, Sheriff Jolley—it's uncontested—didn't hear about Pierson's sexual misconduct until after Christmas was assaulted. Nor has Christmas pointed to any 'custom or policy [that] resulted in deliberate indifference to constitutional rights[.]'. . 'A policy is a decision that is officially adopted by the municipality, or created by an official of such rank that he or she could be said to be acting on behalf of the municipality.'. . 'A custom is an unwritten practice that is applied consistently enough to have the same effect as a policy with the force of law.'. . 'Demonstrating a policy or custom requires showing a persistent and wide-spread practice.'. . The unconstitutional act, moreover, must have been carried out 'pursuant to' the alleged policy or custom. . . . Christmas cannot show that Sheriff Jolley failed to train Pierson. 'Where the proper response ... is obvious to all without training or supervision, then the failure to train or supervise is generally not so likely to produce a wrong decision as to support an inference of deliberate indifference by city policymakers to the need to train or supervise.'. . That's just the situation we have here: That a police officer should not (and may not) sexually assault citizens in his custody is 'obvious to all without training or supervision.'. . . For all these reasons, then, Christmas doesn't meet the 'extremely rigorous' standard 'by which a supervisor is held liable in his individual capacity for the actions of a subordinate[.]'. . As a result, she's failed to show 'that [Sheriff Jolley] violated a constitutional right.'")

Ingram v. Kubik, 30 F.4th 1241, 1256 (11th Cir. 2022) ("Because Ingram does not dispute that Dorning was acting within the scope of his discretionary authority, 'the burden shifts to [Ingram] to show that (1) [Dorning] violated a constitutional right and (2) the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.'. . Ingram has satisfied his burden. A supervisor can be held liable for implementing or failing to implement a policy that causes his subordinates to believe that they can permissibly violate another's constitutional rights if the subordinates then do so based on that belief. . . As we have explained, the complaint adequately alleges that one of Dorning's subordinates used excessive force and that there is a causal connection between that excessive force and Dorning's policy of allowing such force. And this Court has clearly established that 'a custom of allowing the use of excessive force ... provides the requisite fault[,] ... as a persistent failure to take disciplinary action against officers can give rise to the inference that a [supervisor] has ratified conduct.'. . That 'allegation would [also] provide the causal link between the challenged conduct and the ... policy, because [the officer] would have been acting in accordance with the policy of allowing or encouraging excessive force.'. . This principle applies both to municipalities and supervisors 'responsible for disciplining police officers and setting police department policy.'. . It follows that Ingram's complaint states a claim that Dorning violated his clearly established constitutional rights.")

Quinette v. Reed, 805 F. App'x 696, ___ (11th Cir. 2020) ("Here, to deny the Supervisor Defendants qualified immunity, we must conclude that they were on notice that a failure to punish a subordinate's misconduct with sufficient severity (or anything besides termination)—as opposed to a failure to investigate or provide discipline at all—was a violation of clearly established law that could expose them to personal liability. We cannot reach this conclusion. In this Circuit, the published excessive-force cases imposing supervisory liability appear to all involve supervisors who took no action when aware of their subordinate's unlawful conduct. . . Here though, the supervisors did investigate and act when they became aware of Reed's misconduct. While reasonable minds may disagree about the level of discipline necessary to prevent further misconduct, the sanctions imposed here were real—up to and including suspension. Thus, even in the light most favorable to Quinette, his claim bears distinct differences from the circumstances present in Danley, Valdes, and Fundiller.")

Quinette v. Reed, 805 F. App'x 696, ___ (11th Cir. 2020) (Wilson, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur in the affirmance of the district court's denial of qualified and official immunity to Reed. However, I would affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity based on supervisory liability. Accepting Quinette's allegations as true, Reed's extensive history of using excessive force toward inmates was sufficient to put the supervisors on notice of his misconduct, and was sufficiently blatant to require them to act. . . .Reed's history of 'obvious, flagrant, [and] rampant' use of excessive force and related conduct, such as using racial epithets, profanity, and threats, and losing his temper with inmates provided meaningful notice to the supervisors that they needed to correct a constitutional violation. . . Indeed, of the three prior, separate investigations into Reed's excessive use of force, two involved pushing an inmate to the floor. Three of those internal affairs investigations were for using excessive force against restrained inmates. Quinette has sufficiently alleged that each of the supervisors was aware of Reed's history of using excessive force, yet they failed to do anything to 'remedy the situation.'. .Accepting the complaint's well-pleaded allegations as true and construing them in the light most favorable to Quinette, the supervisors knew of the danger that Reed presented and took no action to appropriately supervise or discipline him. The district court correctly determined that they were involved in internal affairs investigations involving Reed in varying capacities, and each of them failed to adequately discipline, supervise, or train Reed. Since Quinette has sufficiently alleged that the supervisors violated his clearly established constitutional rights, I would conclude that they are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Bryant v. Buck, No. 19-11913, 2019 WL 6609698, at *4 (11th Cir. Dec. 5, 2019) (not reported) ("The district court also denied Dr. Buck qualified immunity because there 'remain[ed] material questions of fact as to whether, as a supervisor, [Dr.] Buck's policies and customs resulted in deliberate indifference.'. . Specifically, the district court concluded that Dr. Buck could be liable based on two of the infirmary's policies or customs: (a) the treatment policy made little distinction between nurses and doctors; and (b) the infirmary was severely understaffed. . . The district court's analysis seems to conflate the municipal liability claim that was initially pled against Orange County with the supervisory liability claim pled against Dr. Buck. The plaintiffs initially alleged that Orange County's policies and practices—including its failure to properly fund, train, and staff the Orange County Corrections infirmary—resulted in deliberate indifference. That claim was dismissed because the plaintiffs did not plausibly allege that such policies or customs existed. The supervisory liability claim against Dr. Buck, in contrast, asserted that he failed to properly supervise Mr. Gracia's treatment and care. . .A supervisor cannot be liable under § 1983 based on vicarious liability or respondeat superior. . . But a supervisor may be liable if he 'personally participates in the alleged unconstitutional conduct or when there is a causal connection between the actions of a supervising official and the alleged constitutional deprivation.'. . Dr. Buck did not personally participate in the unconstitutional conduct, as discussed above. The plaintiffs assert, however, that Dr. Buck caused the constitutional violation by failing to adequately train his nursing staff in recognizing the onset of sepsis. He may be liable for failure to train if he had 'actual or constructive notice that a particular omission in the[ ] training program cause[d] [his] employees to violate citizens' constitutional rights, and 'armed with that knowledge,' chose to retain the training program. . . Actual or constructive notice may be established by showing a pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees. . . There is no evidence that, prior to this incident, Dr. Buck had reason to believe the nurses on his staff lacked adequate training to recognize sepsis. Although the plaintiffs alleged that there had been other incidents of deliberate indifference by medical staff at Orange County Corrections, none of them involved sepsis. Accordingly, Dr. Buck cannot be liable for failure to train.")

Piazza v. Jefferson County, Alabama, 923 F.3d 947, 957-58 (11th Cir. 2019) ("The standard by which a supervisor can be held liable for the actions of a subordinate is 'extremely rigorous.'. . Supervisory officials cannot be held liable under § 1983 for unconstitutional acts by their subordinates based on respondeat-superior or vicarious-liability principles. . . Instead, absent allegations of personal participation—of which there are none here concerning Hale or Eddings—supervisory liability is permissible only if there is a 'causal connection' between a supervisor's actions and the alleged constitutional violation. . . One way that a plaintiff can show the requisite causal connection is by demonstrating that a supervisor's policy or custom resulted in 'deliberate indifference to constitutional rights.'. . A plaintiff can also show that the absence of a policy led to a violation of constitutional rights. . . Either way, though, to prove that a policy or its absence caused a constitutional harm, a plaintiff must point to multiple incidents, . . or multiple reports of prior misconduct by a particular employee[.] . . . Hunter has not made the requisite showing with respect to either of the two theories that underlie his supervisory-liability claims against Hale and Eddings. . . . Because Hunter's excessive-force claim focuses solely on Hinkle's episode—'a single incident of unconstitutional activity'—it does not, as a matter of law, state a claim against Hale and Eddings for supervisory liability. . . . The same goes for the supervisory-liability claims predicated on an alleged deliberate indifference to Hinkle's serious medical needs. Hunter asserts that Hinkle was an alcoholic who was neither treated for his alcoholism nor provided his prescription medication upon admission to the jail. Hunter does not, though, point to other instances of inadequate medical screening or delayed medical care at the Birmingham City Jail, nor does he allege any facts indicating that Hale or Eddings were on notice of the officers' alleged deliberate indifference. . . Because Hunter's complaint contains only conclusory assertions that jail officers were indifferent to Hinkle's needs pursuant to certain policies or customs—without alleging any facts concerning those policies or customs—he has not stated a claim for supervisory liability for deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. . . Accordingly, we hold that Hunter has failed to plead facts sufficient to sustain supervisory-liability claims against Sheriff Hale or Captain Eddings and that the district court therefore erred in rejecting the officers' qualified-immunity defenses to those claims.")

Johnson v. Conway, No. 16-12129, 2017 WL 2080251, at *9 (11th Cir. May 15, 2017) (not reported) ("Because Johnson has not shown that the Sheriff was subjectively aware of a substantial risk that excessive force would be used against inmates simply for exercising their right to refuse medical treatment, he has not established that the Sheriff was deliberately indifferent to his constitutional rights. . . Accordingly, Sheriff Conway is not liable as a supervisor under § 1983, and we affirm the grant of summary judgment in his favor.")

Shuford v. Conway, 666 F. App'x 811, 818-19 (11th Cir. 2016) (per curiam) ("The plaintiffs have established a material question of fact as to whether Sheriff Conway and Lt. Col. Sims were on notice of a history of widespread abuse, and also whether Sheriff Conway's custom or policy resulted in deliberate indifference to their constitutional rights. However, neither method of proving the necessary causal connection for supervisory liability can be established for Col. Pinkard in this case. First, deprivations constituting 'widespread abuse sufficient to notify the supervising official must be obvious, flagrant, rampant and of continued duration, rather than isolated occurrences.'. . Plaintiffs provided eight video discs full of RRT [Rapid Response Team] incidents over the years. They submitted affidavits from seven other pretrial detainees who say they were subjected to excessive force by the RRT. Sheriff Conway testified in his deposition that he viewed many RRT videos, including at least fifty that involved the use of a restraint chair. Sheriff Conway also acknowledged he received 'very vocal ... criticism' from Lt. Cofer about the RRT's actions before Lt. Cofer took charge of the RRT. With regard to Lt. Col. Sims, he reviewed and signed off on every single written report of an RRT entry and use of force. He reviewed hundreds of RRT videos over the last five years, referring some for further investigation. He was also a direct overseer of the RRT, selected the RRT staff, and trained them. This raises a material issue of fact whether Lt. Col. Sims was on notice of continued occurrences that violated detainees' constitutional rights. The district court ruling that there is 'no evidence in the record' putting Sheriff Conway or Lt. Col. Sims on notice is simply not borne out by our examination of the record. There is also an issue of material fact about whether Sheriff Conway's policies resulted in deliberate indifference to plaintiffs' constitutional rights. 'Deliberate indifference requires the following: (1) subjective knowledge of a risk of serious harm; (2) disregard of that risk; (3) by conduct that is more than gross negligence.'. . Again, there is evidence that Sheriff Conway received criticisms of the RRT and watched many videos of RRT incidents. Lt. Cofer, the former head of the RRT, warned Sheriff Conway that he believed unnecessary force was being used. And Sheriff Conway said that at least some others in the Sheriff's office had raised these concerns as well. There is therefore a material question of fact about whether Sheriff Conway was on notice of a risk of serious harm, disregarded it, and did so by conduct that is more than gross negligence. On the other hand, the record establishes that Lt. Col. Sims referred many incidents of RRT force for further investigation by the Professional Standards Unit of the Sheriff's Department. Therefore, plaintiffs have failed to make a sufficient showing of grossly negligent conduct as to Lt. Col. Sims. We affirm the district court in its finding that Lt. Col. Sims did not have supervisory liability under this method of proving a causal connection. There are material questions of fact about whether Sheriff Conway or Lt. Col. Sims were on notice about a history of widespread abuse and whether Sheriff Conway had subjective knowledge of a risk of serious harm, disregarded that risk, and did so by conduct constituting more than gross negligence. As a result, we reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment on these issues. For Col. Pinkard, we affirm the district court finding that he has no supervisory liability under either method of proof. Col. Pinkard did have command and oversight responsibilities for the RRT, but there is no evidence he took any role in overseeing the RRT's use of force, had any notice of the alleged widespread abuse, or was grossly negligent in ignoring a risk of serious harm. Instead, he largely delegated these duties to the RRT Commander. We also affirm the district court finding that Lt. Col. Sims has no supervisory liability under the deliberate indifference standard, because there is no evidence that he had subjective knowledge of any serious risk that he disregarded by conduct that was more than grossly negligent.")

Smith v. LePage, 834 F.3d 1285, 1298-99 (11th Cir. 2016) ("First, no supervisory liability can arise from the second tasing of Mr. Smith because we have concluded it was not a constitutional violation. . . Second, the plaintiffs' § 1983 supervisory liability claim related to the shooting fails because Sgt. Gamble neither participated in the shooting nor had a legally sufficient causal connection to it. The District Court properly rejected the plaintiffs' argument, based on the out-of-circuit case of Billington v. Smith, 292 F.3d 1177 (9th Cir. 2002), that Sgt. Gamble personally participated by escalating the situation. Under this Circuit's law, Sgt. Gamble did not personally participate because he did not shoot at Mr. Smith or order any of the officers to do so, and his mere presence at the scene was not enough. . . Whether Sgt. Gamble's actions were causally connected to the shooting, however, is a closer call. As the District Court noted, Sgt. Gamble may have made 'a tragic mistake of judgment' by not calling in the Special Weapons and Tactics ("SWAT") team. The DeKalb County Police Department Manual states that the SWAT team handles 'barricaded suspects,' in order to 'contain the situation and attempt to negotiate a peaceful end to the situation.' Once Mr. Smith closed himself in his bathroom and refused to come out, there may have been a so-called barricade situation. . . . Nevertheless, Sgt. Gamble's possible mistake of judgment does not rise to the level of creating a causal connection between his acts and the shooting, because there are no facts suggesting that he either directed the officers to act unlawfully or knew they would.")

Estate of Owens v. GEO Group, Inc., 660 F. App'x 763, 773-74 (11th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e cannot find any support in the record for Leeper's claim that uninterrupted supervision was required on the basis that the facility had mixed medium-security and close-custody inmates in the same classroom. First, Graceville was designed to house close-custody inmates; close-custody inmates were not interspersed in a medium-security facility. Second, courts have generally declined to impose liability where the complained-of danger resulted from mixing inmate custody classifications. . . And in any event, Leeper has not shown that GEO's practice of allowing mixed-custody classes in this penal institution resulted in wide-spread abuses such that prison officials must have known about the palpable danger of serious injury. Finally, Leeper raises still other claims against Warden Henry and Assistant Warden Stewart. The law by now is clear that a supervisor may be held liable for the actions of his subordinates under § 1983 if he personally participates in the act that causes the constitutional violation or where there is a causal connection between his actions and the constitutional violation that his subordinates commit. . . . On this largely barren record, however, Leeper's supervisory liability claims against Warden Henry and Assistant Warden Stewart fail. First, as we've already observed, there was no Eighth Amendment constitutional violation on the part of their subordinates. Second, Leeper has offered no record evidence that Henry or Stewart had personally participated in any way in the events surrounding the attack, or that they had any knowledge of prior attacks under remotely similar circumstances, or had any specific knowledge about the events involved in Owens's attack.Nor does her claim that Stewart was negligent in his training of security staff fare any better. Notably, a supervisory official is not liable under § 1983 for failure to train unless: (1) his failure to train amounts to deliberate indifference of the rights of persons his subordinates come into contact with; and (2) the failure has actually caused the injury of which the plaintiff complains. . . Thus, Leeper must demonstrate that Stewart had 'actual or constructive notice that a particular omission in [GEO's] training program cause[d] [GEO] employees to violate citizens' constitutional rights' and, despite that notice, Stewart chose to retain the deficient training program. . . To establish that a supervisor had actual or constructive notice of the deficiency of training, '[a] pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees is ordinarily necessary.'. . Leeper has not made this showing. Even assuming Stewart's training program was deficient and even if that failure to adequately train or supervise did cause Owens' death, the record forecloses the conclusion that Stewart had actual or constructive notice of the deficiency of the training. There is no evidence that any inmate at Graceville had suffered any harm as a result of an instructor leaving a classroom; therefore, the single incident involving Owens can hardly be termed the result of 'a pattern of similar constitutional violations.'. . Absent any evidence that his subordinates were engaged in behavior that violated the inmates' Eighth Amendment right to be protected from violence at the hands of other inmates, Stewart had no constitutional obligation to train security guard Strickland or anyone else in some discernibly-different way. Thus, on this record, Leeper cannot establish a constitutional violation grounded in the failure to train or supervise personnel to adequately handle the situation in which an instructor needed to leave the classroom.")

Magwood v. Sec'y, Florida Dep't of Corr., 652 F. App'x 841, 844-45 (11th Cir. June 15, 2016) ("Supervisors are only liable if there is a causal connection between their actions and the injury, and nothing in Magwood's complaint alleges that they personally participated in his medical care. . . Additionally, although Magwood's complaint links several of these defendants to the grievances he submitted, his complaint does not explain how many grievances were sent, what the grievances stated, or why attending the jail's sick-call was an inadequate remedy. Therefore, because Magwood did not show, beyond a speculative level, a causal connection between these defendants and his allegedly inadequate medical care, the district court did not err in granting a motion to dismiss regarding them.")

Bowen v. Warden Baldwin State Prison, 826 F.3d 1312, 1324-25 (11th Cir. 2016) ("[T]he administrator alleges that Deputy Warden Underwood and Officer Davis were actually aware of a substantial and seemingly conspicuous risk posed to Mr. Bowen by allowing him to remain in the small cell with Merkerson. . . Even assuming that these defendant officials were unaware of Mr. Bowen's removal request or Merkerson's mother's warning, this lack of awareness does not serve to negate or even to discount the facts they allegedly did know. We conclude, therefore, that the administrator has set forth in his second amended complaint sufficient facts showing that Deputy Warden Underwood and Officer Davis were both 'aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exist[ed], and ... also dr[e]w the inference.'. . . Because this was the sole disputed element of his claims against these defendants, dismissal was inappropriate. . . .Deputy Warden Underwood and Officer Davis were therefore on notice in March 2010 that 'the law of this Circuit, as expressed in Cottone, clearly established that the defendants' total failure to investigate—or take any other action to mitigate—the substantial risk of serious harm that [Merkerson] posed to [Mr. Bowen] constituted unconstitutional deliberate indifference to [Mr. Bowen's] Eighth Amendment rights.'. . . These defendants therefore are not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings.")

McNeeley v. Wilson, No. 15-14023, 2016 WL 1730651, at *6 (11th Cir. May 2, 2016) (not published) ("Here, there is evidence in the record that both Bertuzzi and Wilson knew McNeeley had been sprayed with pepper spray; both were present an hour later when he was put in the four-point restraints chair, and complaining about the effects of pepper spray; and neither did anything to allow him proper decontamination. The Defendants also admit in the reply brief that Lieutenant Wilson knew McNeeley was being held in the chair without a decontamination shower for several hours after being sprayed with chemical agents. Danley clearly established that these allegations articulate an Eighth Amendment violation, and thus Lieutenant Wilson and Corporal Bertuzzi were not entitled to summary judgment on the supervisory liability claim.")

Smith v. Owens, 625 F.3d 924, 928 (11th Cir. 2015) ("As to Supervisory Defendant Bruton, Plaintiff alleged in his complaint that Bruton acted with deliberate indifference to his safety by failing to protect him from the violent cellmate who stabbed him. By asserting that Bruton had sole authority to determine cell assignments and that he used this authority to personally ensure that all of Plaintiff's cellmates were gang members, Plaintiff sufficiently alleged a causal connection for § 1983 purposes. . . Moreover, Plaintiff adequately alleged that Bruton knew of the danger and had the means to cure it. . . Specifically, Plaintiff alleged that his cellmate was 'known for stabbing incidents,' and that Bruton knew or should have known of this fact. Accordingly, when viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, he alleged that there was a substantial risk of serious harm to him from attack by this cellmate. . . Moreover, by asserting that Bruton controlled cell assignment, Plaintiff sufficiently alleged that Bruton had the means of preventing the danger. Accordingly, the district court erred by dismissing Plaintiff's § 1983 deliberate indifference claim against Bruton, and we vacate and remand for further proceedings as to this claim.")

Smith v. City of Sumiton, 13-13416, 2014 WL 4211070, *2-*4 (11th Cir. Aug. 27, 2014) (unpublished) ("Our Franklin decision is binding precedent that Smith's 'knew or should have known' allegation 'falls short of [the] standard' for deliberate indifference. . . To state a claim for deliberate indifference, a plaintiff must show: '(1) subjective knowledge of a risk of serious harm; (2) disregard of that risk; (3) by conduct that is more than gross negligence.'. . Absent an allegation that the supervisor or city 'actually knew of the serious risk [the offending corrections officer] posed,'. . . there is no claim. We note that a paragraph of Smith's second amended complaint does allege that: 'Defendants and its officials knew, should have known, or participated in acts of sexual harassment and abuse inside the City of Sumiton Jail or by Sumiton Police Officers or employees in the past and were aware of previous misconduct of [Daughtery], but failed to correct those actions.'. . Another paragraph alleges that 'Defendants had knowledge of these acts and the potential for this kind of action taken by ... Daughtery based on previous similar acts he had committed.'. . Smith seems to have abandoned those allegations in her brief, which argues that 'knew or should have known' is enough. . . Even if she has not abandoned any argument based on those allegations, her second amended complaint is still due to be dismissed because those allegations are too conclusory to state a claim. . . . There is no allegation that connects Daughtery's alleged earlier misconduct with the defendants' alleged knowledge of it. . . . Disregarding, as our two-prong approach requires us to do, Smith's conclusory allegations about the City and Chief Burnett's awareness or knowledge of Daughtery's past misconduct, paragraph nos. 12–15 give us the following properly pleaded facts: (1) in mid-October 2010, Smith was arrested by the City's police department for unpaid traffic tickets and taken to the City's jail; (2) on her first night in jail, Daughtery, a City police officer, threatened and sexually assaulted her; (3) some unspecified time before assaulting Smith, Daughtery had 'committed sexual harassment and/or sexual assault against individuals arrested or incarcerated by the City.' While those allegations are enough to plead that Smith was assaulted, they do not support a plausible claim that the City or Chief Burnett was aware of or knew about Daughtery's alleged prior sexual harassment or assaults. . . Nor has Smith provided factual matter that would support a plausible claim for supervisory or municipal liability on a ground other than the City's or Chief Burnett's alleged knowledge of Daughtery's prior misconduct. For these reasons, the district court's judgment dismissing Smith's second amended complaint is AFFIRMED.")

Hatcher ex rel. Hatcher v. Fusco, 570 F. App'x 874, 877-78 (11th Cir. 2014) ("In this case, the well-pled factual allegations support a reasonable inference that Fusco personally attempted to dissuade Hatcher from participating in 'Day of Silence.' According to the complaint, Fusco repeatedly threatened Hatcher and her parents with 'consequences' for Hatcher's participation. We reject Fusco's argument that the only reasonable inference is that she was following the superintendent's orders. . . The allegations also support a reasonable inference that Fusco either directed that Hatcher be disciplined or actually knew that she would be and failed to intervene. The complaint indicates that Fusco directed teachers to report on students who were participating in 'Day of Silence.' Hatcher was one such student. Hatcher was summoned to the dean''s office and informed that she was being punished because Fusco had 'told [her] not to do this.' The next business day, Fusco reported on Hatcher's discipline to the superintendent. It is reasonable to infer that Fusco may have caused or knowingly failed to prevent Hatcher's in-school suspension.")

Key v. Lundy, 563 F. App'x 758, 760 (11th Cir. 2014) ("As in our recent decision in Franklin, the Defendants here argue that a claim of deliberate indifference is no longer sufficient after Ashcroft v. Iqbal . . . . Instead they argue that Key must allege a purposeful and intentional violation of her constitutional rights. However, we rejected that argument in Franklin, another Eighth Amendment case. . . As we noted in Franklin, the factors necessary to establish a § 1983 claim will vary with the constitutional provision at issue. . . We also distinguished Iqbal—which involved claims of invidious discrimination—from the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference claim at issue in Franklin. . . Similarly, Key's § 1983 claims against the Defendants for violations of the Eighth Amendment can survive without allegations of purposeful and intentional conduct as long as she meets this Circuit's standard for deliberate indifference. Franklin also addressed the sufficiency of allegations of supervisory liability under the deliberate indifference standard in a factual scenario strikingly similar to that alleged by Key. . . Because the parties and the district court did not have the benefit of our decision in Franklin, we remand with instructions that the district court give Key an opportunity to amend her complaint in accordance with that decision. . . The Defendants may then renew their motion to dismiss if warranted.")

Keith v. DeKalb County, Ga., 749 F.3d 1034, 1048 & n.46, 1050, 1053 & n.56 (11th Cir. 2014) ("[I]n order to prove that Sheriff Brown violated Cook's constitutional rights, Keith must show that the Sheriff Brown had subjective knowledge of a risk of serious harm to Cook and that he recklessly disregarded that risk. . . Keith does not allege that Sheriff Brown personally participated in the alleged constitutional violations. Therefore, if Sheriff Brown is to be held liable, he must have failed to correct a widespread pattern of constitutional violations or he must [have] adopted a custom or policy that deprived Cook of his constitutional rights. . . Keith does not allege that Sheriff Brown directed his subordinates to act unlawfully or that he knew that his subordinates would act unlawfully and that he failed to stop them from doing so. . . .Distilled to its essence, Keith's main allegation is that Sheriff Brown created a substantial risk of harm by relying on MHM staff's determination—that an inmate did not pose a substantial risk of harm to other inmates—in housing the inmate. Of course, Keith does not overtly make this claim; to do so would reveal that Keith's actual complaint is with MHM staff's independent (and, in retrospect, possibly mistaken) determination that Adan did not pose a risk of harm to other inmates. Instead, Keith argues that Sheriff Brown created a substantial risk of serious harm by 'failing' to segregate mental health inmates with violent histories from those with nonviolent histories and by 'failing' to separate mental health inmates charged with a violent crime from those charged with a nonviolent crime. . . In effect, Keith aims to hold Sheriff Brown liable for not disregarding the expert medical opinions of MHM staff. That is, because MHM staff could mistakenly determine that a mental health inmate does not pose a risk of harm to other inmates when in fact he does, Sheriff Brown must take affirmative steps to avoid the mistake. . . .Keith's theory of liability does not square with the law. Simply put, the law does not require that Sheriff Brown ignore the determination and recommendation of MHM staff. A sheriff cannot be held liable for failing to segregate mental health inmates whom trained medical personnel have concluded do not present a risk of harm to themselves or others. . . Moreover, even if we assume that Sheriff Brown violated Cook's constitutional rights, Keith has not demonstrated that it is 'clearly established' that a sheriff has a constitutional obligation to disregard the medical expertise of the very contractors he has hired to ensure that the inmates' mental health is tended to. . . . Although the Supreme Court has left open the possibility that a single incident may prove sufficient to hold a supervisor liable for a failure to train, [citing City of Canton] we decline to use this case as the vehicle for flushing out the Supreme Court's hypothetical basis for § 1983 relief. In Canton, the Supreme Court hypothesized a police force that gives officers firearms but fails to provide any training regarding the constitutional limitations on the use of deadly force, concluding that the need to provide such training would be 'so obvious' that the failure to do so could amount to deliberate indifference. . . It is not similarly obvious that the 'failure to train' at issue in this case amounts to deliberate indifference. . . .As the Supreme Court has indicated, '[a] [supervisor's] culpability for a deprivation of rights is at its most tenuous where a claim turns on a failure to train.' Connick, —— U.S at ——, 131 S.Ct. at 1359. Keith's claim that Sheriff Brown violated Cook's constitutional rights by failing to adequately train detention officers is especially tenuous because not only does she fail to demonstrate that Sheriff Brown was on notice, she also fails to demonstrate how 'better training' would have prevented the incident leading to Cook's death. Therefore, like her claims discussed in subpart A, her failure to train claim must also fail.")

Harrison v. Culliver, 746 F.3d 1288, 1299, 1300 (11th Cir. 2014) ("The evidence demonstrates that Warden Culliver was on notice that inmate-on-inmate assaults occurred on the back hallway; his signature is on each of the incident reports detailing assaults that occurred on the back hallway from 2005 until August 6, 2008. However, the incident reports indicate that only four assaults occurred on the back hallway from 2005 until the day Harrison was assaulted. . . Although assaults did occur throughout Holman, and some did involve weapons fashioned out of a utility knife, box cutter, or razor, . . .the evidence of inmate-on-inmate assault involving weapons does not indicate that inmates were 'exposed to something even approaching the constant threat of violence.'. . Holman is a large institution—according to the District Court's undisputed finding, Holman housed between 830 and 990 inmates during the relevant time period—and the thirty-three incidents involving weapons, only four of which occurred on the back hallway, are hardly sufficient to demonstrate that Holman was a prison 'where violence and terror reign.'. . Similarly, Holman's policies for monitoring the back hallway did not create a substantial risk of serious harm. The evidence shows that, although a detention officer was not permanently stationed on the back hallway, at least one was assigned as a rover with responsibility for monitoring the back hallway. In addition, a camera monitored the back hallway, and although it did not record, it provided a live stream that a detention officer monitored twenty-four hours a day. . .Additionally, Warden Culliver took reasonable steps to reduce the inmate traffic on the back hallway, relocating the Masjid . . .and library to other areas of Holman. The limited number of inmate-on-inmate assaults on the back hallway from 2005 until August 2008 indicates that the area was fairly secure already. Although placing a detention officer on the back hallway to monitor inmates may have improved the security at Holman, Warden Culliver's decision not to do so did not create a substantial risk of harm. . . The limited number of assaults involving weapons fashioned from box cutters or razor blades—around eleven of a total thirty-three assaults involving weapons over a three year period—is insufficient to establish that Warden Culliver was constructively aware of a pattern of detention officers failing to follow the Standard Operating Procedures. Although we are unable to pin down precisely how many assaults involved box cutters procured through the hobby shop—five incident reports indicate that a box cutter was used, but they do not indicate from where the inmate obtained the box cutter. . .the record fails to demonstrate that any lapses in oversight of cutting instruments created a substantial risk of excessive inmate-on-inmate violence.")

Franklin v. Curry, 738 F.3d 1246, 1250, 1251, 1252 n.7 (11th Cir. 2013) (per curiam) [Note Judge Ripple from 7th Cir. sitting by designation] ("In analyzing Franklin's claims against the Supervisory Defendants, the district court erred by finding allegations that they 'knew or should have known' of a substantial risk of serious harm sufficient to state a deliberate indifference claim. Deliberate indifference requires more than constructive knowledge. The district court began its analysis correctly, stating that, 'to establish supervisory liability under § 1983, a plaintiff must allege that the supervisor personally participated in the alleged unconstitutional conduct or that there is a causal connection between the actions of a supervising official and the alleged constitutional deprivation.'. . The district court then explained that a plaintiff can show a causal connection, inter alia, when 'the supervisor's policy or custom resulted in deliberate indifference.'. . To this point, the district court's analysis was sound. However, the court then went astray when it concluded that Franklin had alleged a causal connection, stating: Franklin alleges that a causal connection exists because Sheriff Curry was on notice of Officer Gay's alleged conduct and the need to correct this practice, but failed to do so, and because Sheriff Curry's policy or custom resulted in deliberate indifference, and [w]ith respect to Officers Samaniego, Burchfield, Fondren, Corbell and George, Franklin alleges that they too knew or should have known of Officer Gay's pattern of inappropriate conduct with female detainees and inmates but 'were deliberately indifferent....' . . . In reaching these conclusions, the district court neglected to analyze whether Franklin had properly alleged deliberate indifference. In fact, the elements of deliberate indifference do not appear anywhere in the district court's order. . .Its first step should have been to identify the precise constitutional violation charged—in this case, deliberate indifference—and to explain what the violation requires. . .Had the district court done so, Franklin's failure to allege the required elements would have been apparent. Deliberate indifference requires the following: '(1) subjective knowledge of a risk of serious harm; (2) disregard of that risk; (3) by conduct that is more than gross negligence.'. . Franklin's allegations that the Supervisory Defendants 'knew or should have known' of a substantial risk clearly fall short of this standard. . . . Franklin failed to allege the Supervisory Defendants actually knew of the serious risk Gay posed even in the most conclusory fashion. . . . As part of their appeal, Appellants argue that under Iqbal supervisors can only be liable for constitutional violations if a plaintiff alleges purposeful and intentional conduct. We reject this argument. Appellants ignore the Iqbal Court's caution that '[t]he factors necessary to establish a [claim] will vary with the constitutional provision at issue.'. . The discussion of purposeful intent in Iqbal pertained to claims of invidious discrimination, not deliberate indifference. . . Nothing in Iqbal suggests that supervisors cannot be held liable for deliberate indifference toward risks posed by their subordinates or that such liability requires a higher mens rea than any other deliberate indifference claim. So long as a supervisor's own conduct-and not that of his subordinate-constitutes deliberate indifference, his status as a supervisor changes nothing.") Estate of Bearden ex rel. Bearden v. Anglin, No. 12–15572, 2013 WL 5788569, *2-*4 (11th Cir. Oct. 29, 2013) (not published) ("As a supervisor, Anglin can be liable for either his personal participation in the alleged constitutional violation or his actions as a supervisor in creating a custom or policy that caused his subordinates to commit the constitutional violation. . . 'The causal connection can be established when a history of widespread abuse puts the responsible supervisor on notice of the need to correct the alleged deprivation, and he fails to do so.'. . 'The deprivations that constitute widespread abuse sufficient to notify the supervising official must be obvious, flagrant, rampant and of continued duration, rather than isolated occurrences.'. .Under this standard, perfect efforts are not required of jailers, and where the jail has standard operating procedures to protect at-risk detainees, these usually will be sufficient to confer qualified immunity, even when aspects of the system are imperfect. . . Additionally, the lack of a written suicide policy, in and of itself, does not impose liability automatically. . . In this case, there are no substantiated allegations that Anglin was present at the time that Bearden committed suicide or that he was involved personally in her care at the jail. . . As a result, the only possible basis for liability as to Anglin is in his role as a supervisor and jail administrator, establishing the anti-suicide procedures at the jail and overseeing their implementation. The Estate faults Anglin for failing to create a suicide policy, changing the medical staffing plan to eliminate some off-site treatment, and maintaining cells with anchor points. To establish knowledge of serious risk, the Estate points to Anglin's knowledge of the previous suicides at the Bay County Jail, all of which were prior to Anglin's assumption of control of the jail. This was the key fact relied upon by the district court in altering its judgment. There is no evidence on the record, however, as to whether the suicide rate was unusually high or whether the suicides were the result of the failure of a common aspect of the jail's anti-suicide program. Without this type of information, Anglin could not have possessed personal knowledge of a serious risk to suicidal prisoners that was created by the jail's medical program so that he could be held to have purposefully or recklessly disregarded such risk. Additionally, these prior suicides occurred under the private administrator's system, portions of which had been adjusted. Under the new policies, no suicides occurred that could have put Anglin on notice of serious risks. Although it appears that Anglin was familiar with these incidents, at least somewhat, based on his role in overseeing the county's contract and planning the jail's transition, no evidence suggests that he had particular knowledge about how those inmates committed suicide so as to alert him of serious problems with the cells. In fact, out of the three cases of suicides executed by a ligature device, at least one of them occurred in a manner substantially different from Bearden's suicide, namely in a bathroom rather than in a cell. As a result, the district court and the Estate both misjudged the value of this knowledge in bolstering the Estate's claim. These facts do not suggest that Anglin was aware of the potential suicide risk associated with the mesh door being used as an anchor point. The Estate's position would impose a duty to suicide-proof virtually all cells, a duty not required by the Constitution. Without knowledge of the particular serious risk at issue, Anglin could not have been deliberately indifferent, and therefore no § 1983 action can be maintained.")

Hendrix v. Tucker, No. 13–10050, 2013 WL 4504595, *1, *2 (11th Cir. Aug. 26, 2013) (not published) ("After careful consideration, we conclude that the district court did not err in dismissing Hendrix's claim under § 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii) because the complaint did not 'contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim to relief' against the defendants, based on a theory of supervisory liability. Supervisors can be held 'liable under ... § 1983, for the unconstitutional acts of [their] subordinates if [they] personally participated in the allegedly unconstitutional conduct or if there is a causal connection between [their] actions ... and the alleged constitutional deprivation.'. . A plaintiff may establish a causal connection by showing that: (1) 'a history of widespread abuse puts the responsible supervisor on notice of the need to correct the alleged deprivation and he fail[ed] to do so'; (2) 'the supervisor's improper custom or policy le[d] to deliberate indifference to constitutional rights'; or (3) 'facts support an inference that the supervisor directed the subordinates to act unlawfully or knew that the subordinates would act unlawfully and failed to stop them from doing so.'. . Even if Hendrix's complaint is construed liberally, . . it was insufficient to support supervisory liability. . . . Hendrix's amended complaint alleges two potential grounds for supervisory liability. First, Hendrix attempts to establish a causal connection by arguing that the defendants were 'on notice of the need to correct the alleged deprivation and [they] fail[ed] to do so.'. . Hendrix asserts that the defendants were on notice because they were aware of his administrative grievances and state court litigation. However, '[t]he deprivations that constitute widespread abuse sufficient to notify the supervising official must be obvious, flagrant, rampant and of continued duration, rather than isolated occurrences.'. . And, as demonstrated by, for example, the outcome of the state court litigation, which determined that Hendrix's claims had no merit, there was not 'obvious, flagrant, [and] rampant' abuse here, sufficient to support supervisory liability. Second, Hendrix's complaint states there is 'a long standing policy, practice, and custom of treating similarly situated prisoners differently in this application of gain time.'. . However, Hendrix does not plead any specific facts to support this

Goodman v. Kimbrough, 718 F.3d 1325, 1334 (11th Cir. 2013) ("Goodman has adduced no evidence that either Boland or Feemster was subjectively aware of the peril to which Goodman was exposed on the night in question, and that failure is fatal to his claim. And though Goodman points to the officers' failure to conduct head counts and cell checks and their disengagement of the emergency call buttons in support of his assertions, the fact that the officers deviated from policy or were unreasonable in their actions—even grossly so—does not relieve Goodman of the burden of showing that the officers were subjectively aware of the risk; in other words, he cannot say, 'Well, they should have known.' Were we to accept that theory of liability, the deliberate indifference standard would be silently metamorphosed into a font of tort law—a brand of negligence redux—which the Supreme Court has made abundantly clear it is not. . . . Our decision in this case should not be taken to condone Boland and Feemster's actions. To the contrary, we are disturbed by the dereliction of duty that facilitated the violence visited upon Goodman while he was under the officers' charge. But we are federal judges, not prison administrators, and the standards for coloring a constitutional claim in this area of the law are exacting for the very purpose of preventing federal judges like us from meddling, even by our best lights, in the administration of our nation's prisons. . . . As we see it, the fact that jailers in Clayton County did not enter every cell in accordance with policy and commonly deactivated emergency call buttons is simply insufficient to meet the 'extremely rigorous standard for supervisory liability' that our cases demand in cases such as these. . . We are unable to conclude that these policy violations are sufficient to create a genuine issue of fact as to the existence of a custom, so settled and permanent as to have the force of law, that ultimately resulted in deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm to Goodman. . . That is especially so in light of the undisputed evidence that Officers Boland and Feemster were disciplined—and in fact recommended for termination—following their violations of Sheriff's Department policy on the night Goodman was injured. . . And all of that says nothing about the remarkable fact that Goodman's complaint is bereft of any allegation that Sheriff's Department policy or custom actually caused Goodman's injuries. The district court did not err in granting summary judgment for Sheriff Kimbrough.")

McCreary v. Parker, 456 F. App'x 790, ___ (11th Cir. 2012) ("'[S]upervisors can be held liable for subordinates' use of excessive force against inmates in violation of the Eighth Amendment on the basis of supervisory liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Supervisory liability under § 1983 occurs when the supervisor personally participates in the alleged constitutional violation or when there is a causal connection between the actions of the supervising official and the alleged constitutional deprivation.' Valdes v. Crosby, 450 F.3d 1231, 1236 (11th Cir.2006) (quotations and citations omitted). There is no allegation that Parker himself directly took part in the decision to place McCreary in Evans's cell. As for the other method by which Parker could be responsible for his subordinates' actions, a 'causal connection may be established when: 1) a history of widespread abuse puts the responsible supervisor on notice of the need to correct the alleged deprivation, and he or she fails to do so; 2) a supervisor's custom or policy results in deliberate indifference to constitutional rights; or 3) facts support an inference that the supervisor directed subordinates to act unlawfully or knew that subordinates would act unlawfully and failed to stop them from doing so.'. . Parker argues that he is being denied immunity simply because a death occurred in an overcrowded jail. However, Plaintiff has alleged plausible facts indicating that Parker met two of the Valdes factors. . . .Plaintiff alleged that Parker instituted a policy of double-celling inmates who were in disciplinary or administrative holding. Here, due to Parker's double-celling policy, Evans was not allowed to be quartered by himself, and this ultimately resulted in McCreary—who had not yet been convicted of any crime—being celled with an inmate who had threatened to cause serious injury to any young black men who were quartered with him. Plaintiff also alleges that Parker had publically admitted that the jail was dangerous due to the overcrowding. Parker had received an inmate Self Report Survey that indicated dangerous conditions, but Plaintiff alleges that Parker's response was merely to complain about inmates being allowed to participate in a survey. Plaintiff also alleged that Parker himself had been informed by inmates that staff members were placing certain inmates together in order to increase the likelihood of violence—the same thing that Plaintiff alleges happened to McCreary. Given Parker's alleged knowledge of the increasing frequency of inmate-on-inmate violence, Judge Edelstein's report, and allegations that inmates had repeatedly complained to Parker about being quartered with dangerous inmates and Parker's failure to correct same notwithstanding his ability to do so, as well as the operation of Parker's own policy of double-celling in the face of these circumstances, Plaintiff has pleaded sufficient facts to state a claim against Parker that is plausible on its face.")

AFL-CIO v. City of Miami, 637 F.3d 1178, 1190 (11th Cir. 2011) ("A supervisor can be held liable for the actions of his subordinates under § 1983 if he personally participates in the act that causes the constitutional violation or where there is a causal connection between his actions and the constitutional violation that his subordinates commit. . . A causal connection can be established if a supervisor has the ability to prevent or stop a known constitutional violation by exercising his supervisory authority and he fails to do so. . . The district court concluded that the plaintiffs failed to bring forward any evidence that the defendants directly violated the plaintiffs' constitutional rights or that they directed that the plaintiffs' constitutional rights be violated. The district court also concluded that the plaintiffs failed to adduce any evidence that the defendants knew that the plaintiffs' constitutional rights were being violated and failed to intervene. We agree.")

Doe v. School Bd. of Broward County, Fla., 604 F.3d 1248, 1266, 1267 (11th Cir. 2010) ("Scavella did not personally participate in Hoever's sexual assault of Doe. Therefore to impose liability on Scavella for Hoever's constitutional violation, Doe must establish Scavella's liability in a supervisory capacity. . . . She cannot do so. 'It is well established in this circuit that supervisory officials are not liable under § 1983 for the unconstitutional acts of their subordinates' unless the 'supervisor personally participates in the alleged constitutional violation' or 'there is a causal connection between actions of the supervising official and the alleged constitutional deprivation.'. .This requisite causal connection can be established in the following circumstances: (1) when a 'history of widespread abuse puts the responsible supervisor on notice of the need to correct the alleged deprivation, and he fails to do so' or (2) when a supervisor's 'improper custom or policy results in deliberate indifference to constitutional rights.'. . For a history of abuse to be sufficiently widespread to put a supervisor on notice, the abuse must be 'obvious, flagrant, rampant and of continued duration, rather than isolated occurrences.'. . We agree with the district court that Doe cannot show the requisite causal connection between Scavella's actions and Hoever's sexual assault of Doe based on his notice of Hoever's 'history of widespread abuse' or his 'custom or policy' of deliberate indifference. 'The standard by which a supervisor is held liable in her individual capacity for the actions of a subordinate is extremely rigorous.' . . Here, there is no basis for claiming that the two complaints against Hoever prior to Doe's sexual assault rose to the level of sexual harassment similarly 'obvious, flagrant, rampant and of continued duration.'. . Also insufficient is Doe's conclusory assertion of a custom or policy resulting in deliberate indifference to Doe's constitutional right to be free from sexual assault. . . . Accordingly, in the absence of evidence that Scavella personally participated in Doe's sexual assault, was on notice of a history of Hoever's widespread abuse of female students, or had a policy in place permitting such assaults, Doe cannot show that Scavella has supervisory liability for Hoever's deprivation of her constitutional right to be free from sexual abuse.").

Keating v. City of Miami, 598 F.3d 753, 763-65 (11th Cir. 2010) ("Timoney, Fernandez, Cannon, and Burden argue that the Protesters failed to allege sufficient facts to establish a causal connection between their supervisory actions and the alleged constitutional violations by the subordinate officers. Therefore, we first review whether the Protesters' complaint sufficiently alleges violations of the First Amendment under a theory of supervisory liability. . . . Specifically, the Protesters allege that Timoney, who is the Chief of the Miami Police Department, approved orders permitting the police line to advance while beating unarmed demonstrators and discharging projectiles and tear gas. . . The Protesters allege that Fernandez, Deputy Chief of the Miami Police Department and second in command to Timoney, made the decision to utilize 'herding techniques' to corral the demonstrators by personally directing the police lines to march northward. . . The Protesters allege that Cannon, a Captain in the Miami Police Department, directed the police lines to begin discharging weapons at the unarmed demonstrators. . . . In light of the Protesters' allegations, we find that they satisfied the heightened pleading requirement for a § 1983 claim under a supervisory liability theory by alleging a causal connection established by facts that support an inference that Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon directed the subordinate officers to act unlawfully. . . The Protesters allege that Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon committed a violation of the Protesters' First Amendment rights because their commands caused the subordinate police officers to disperse a crowd of peaceful demonstrators, including the Protesters, who were exercising their freedom of expression. . . . Because Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon had the authority, and exercised that authority, to direct the subordinate officers to engage in unlawful acts to violate the Protesters' First Amendment rights, they likewise had the authority to stop the subordinate officers from exercising such unlawful acts. Therefore, because Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon knew that the subordinate officers would engage in unlawful conduct in violation of the Protesters' First Amendment rights by directing such unlawful acts, they also violated the Protesters' First Amendment rights by failing to stop such action in their supervisory capacity. . . . However, Burden's alleged failure to stop the subordinate officers' unlawful activity did not cause the violations of the First Amendment because Burden did not have the authority to stop the subordinate officers from violating the Protesters' First Amendment rights, even though he was an authorized decisionmaker. Burden did not direct the subordinate officers to engage in unlawful conduct that violated the Protesters' First Amendment rights. Burden's ranking as a Major in the Miami Police Department is subordinate to that of Chief Timoney, and Chief Timoney directed the subordinate officers to engage in unlawful conduct. Burden and Timoney stood next to each other during the demonstration. It would be unreasonable to have expected Burden to stop the subordinate officers' conduct after Timoney directed the subordinate officers to engage in unlawful acts because Burden did not have any authority to contravene Timoney's orders. Additionally, the Protesters only allege that Burden was present when the subordinate officers engaged in the unlawful activity. Therefore, Burden did not violate the Protesters' First Amendment rights by failing to stop the subordinate officers from conducting such unlawful activity because his inaction did not cause the constitutional violations. The Protesters failed to allege a constitutional violation against Burden, and thus, Burden is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Edwards v. Fulton County, No. 09-13591, 2010 WL 346383, at *1 (11th Cir. Jan. 29, 2010) (not published) ("Ronald Edwards, an African-American male employed as a Community Development Specialist in Fulton County's Department of Housing and Community Development, filed a § 1983 complaint against Fulton County and defendant-appellant Thomas Andrews, individually, alleging pay discrepancies. In the complaint, Edwards specifically alleged that he was paid less than women and white employees who performed the same duties, and that Andrews, as the County Manager, ignored memoranda notifying him of the discrepancies and continued the discriminatory practice. According to the complaint, Andrews's actions constituted violations of the Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses.. . . Here, Edwards alleged that Andrews personally made the decision to continue discriminatory pay practices after these practices were repeatedly brought to his attention. Taking this allegation as true, which we must at this stage of the proceedings, the complaint sufficiently alleges that Andrews's actions violated Edwards's clearly established constitutional right to equal protection and equal pay. Moreover, we disagree with Andrews's argument that the complaint failed to meet the heightened pleading requirement. The complaint contains 'a claim for relief that is plausible on its face,' and not merely 'an unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation.' [citing Twombly and Iqbal]").

Harper v. Lawrence County, Ala., 592 F.3d 1227, 1236, 1237 (11th Cir. 2010) ("Supervisory liability lies where the defendant personally participates in the unconstitutional conduct or there is a causal connection between such conduct and the defendant's actions. There are three ways to establish such a causal connection:

> when a history of widespread abuse puts the responsible supervisor on notice of the need to correct the alleged deprivation, and he fails to do so. Alternatively, the causal connection may be established when a supervisor's custom or policy ... result[s] in deliberate indifference to constitutional rights or when facts support an > inference that the supervisor directed the subordinates to act unlawfully or knew that the subordinates would act unlawfully and failed to stop them from doing so.

Cottone, 326 F.3d at 1360-61 (internal quotations omitted) Here, because there are no allegations in the Complaint regarding the supervisors' personal participation in the denial of Harper's Fourteenth Amendment rights, we look to whether Plaintiff has alleged a 'causal connection.' Although Plaintiff does mention 'widespread' constitutional rights deprivations (see Compl. at 16), it seems that the bulk of her facts against Gene Mitchell, Kenneth Mitchell, and Brown allege 'causal connection' based on their customs or policies that resulted in harm to Harper. Specifically, Plaintiff alleges that those Defendants, who were responsible for the management and administration or oversight of the jail, had customs or policies of improperly screening inmates for alcohol withdrawal, improperly handling inmates addicted to alcohol or drugs, delaying medical treatment and restricting access to outside medical providers in order to save money, primarily using emergency medical treatment for physical injuries only, and also failing to train jailers in identifying inmates with alcohol dependency. . . . In sum, given the Complaint's factual detail about Harper's incident and the similar incident involving Parker just one month before, as well as the specific allegations regarding the customs or policies put in place by the supervisors, Plaintiff met both the Rule 8 and heightened pleading standards. . . Accordingly, we hold that Plaintiff sufficiently alleged that the supervisory Defendants violated Harper's Fourteenth Amendment rights based on their customs or policies.").

Bryant v. Jones, 575 F.3d 1281, 1299, 1300 (11th Cir. 2009) ("It is well established that liability in § 1983 cases cannot be premised solely upon a theory of respondeat superior. . . In Brown v. Crawford, 906 F.2d 667 (11th Cir.1990), we observed that supervisory liability occurs either when the supervisor personally participates in the alleged constitutional violation or when there is a causal connection between actions of the supervising official and the alleged constitutional deprivation. The causal connection can be established when a history of widespread abuse puts the responsible supervisor on notice of the need to correct the alleged deprivation, and he fails to do so. The deprivations that constitute widespread abuse sufficient to notify the supervising official must be obvious, flagrant, rampant, and of continued duration, rather than isolated occurrences. . . The evidence before the district court established that Jones contrived a broad plan to eliminate white managers and replace them with black managers so as to create a 'darker administration.' As a means of implementing this scheme, Jones and his administration would 'eliminate' the white managers' positions rather than simply firing the white managers. His discriminatory intent was further made plain by his open expressions of racial animus, calling Bryant a 'white bastard' and declaring that he wanted to terminate Kelley because he felt she let 'whites' control the parks. . . . In sum, this evidence showed compellingly that Jones, as the CEO, was the architect of a racially discriminatory scheme, a scheme that was designed to produce the overt discrimination the plaintiffs suffered. Unquestionably, he spawned the claims the plaintiffs have brought against him.").

Gross v. White, 340 F. App'x 527, 2009 WL 2074234, at *2 (11th Cir. July 17, 2009) ("'The standard by which a supervisor is held liable in his individual capacity for the actions of a subordinate is extremely rigorous.' Cottone v. Jenne, 326 F.3d 1352, 1360 (11th Cir.2003) (quotation marks and alteration omitted). A claim based on supervisory liability must allege that the supervisor: (1) instituted a custom or policy which resulted in a violation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights; (2) directed his subordinates to act unlawfully; or (3) failed to stop his subordinates from acting unlawfully when he knew they would. See Goebert v. Lee County, 510 F.3d 1312, 1331 (11th Cir.2007). Gross alleged just the opposite. He stated that the jail's rules and regulations required 'Red Dot,' violence-prone inmates to be separated from the general inmate population. He asserted that unnamed deputies broke those rules by placing him in a cell with a Red Dot inmate who was known to escape from his restraints and to be violent. Gross did not allege that White directed anyone to break the rules or that White knew anyone would do so. Gross' allegations fail to meet the 'extremely rigorous standard' for supervisory liability under § 1983. Cottone, 326 F.3d at 1360. . . . '[S]upervisors can be held personally liable when either (1) the supervisor personally participates in the alleged constitutional violation, or (2) there is a causal connection between the actions of the supervisor and the alleged constitutional violation.' Id. Gross did not assert that White personally violated his constitutional rights or caused the alleged violation to occur. He did not allege that there was any custom or policy of holding violence-prone, Red Dot inmates in jail cells with other inmates. He merely alleges that the deputies 'knew about' rules and regulations requiring these inmates to be kept separate from the general population and that they 'ignored them' by placing him in a cell with a Red Dot inmate who later attacked him. An allegation about an isolated occurrence is not enough to state a claim for deliberate indifference against White.").
