for two reasons. First, focusing on the logic underlying Florence, the court asserted that '[t]here is no easy way to distinguish between juvenile and adult detainees in terms of the security risks cited by the Supreme Court in Florence.'. . And, the court explained, because juveniles and adults pose the same security risks, it follows that the same constitutional test for reasonableness should apply in assessing searches meant to mitigate those risks. . .Second, the court in J.B. homed in on certain language in the Florence opinion that seems to indicate a broad scope of the holding, including Florence's expansive definition of jail to include 'other detention facilities.'. . The court noted that this 'sweeping language ... comports with the federal definition of prison: "[A]ny Federal, State, or local facility that incarcerates or detains juveniles or adults."' . . Thus, relying on its reading of Florence's substantive logic and certain passages in the opinion's language, the Third Circuit concluded that Florence controls in cases involving strip and cavity searches of minors. The County urges us to follow the Third Circuit in holding that Florence controls in cases involving juveniles. Mabry and her amici argue that Florence does not control when minors are involved, and that we should instead apply Safford's reasonable-suspicion test or some other alternative. . . . [W]e read Florence to mean that, in the correctional context—whether juvenile or adult—courts, which are not experts, should still defer to officials who are. The logic underlying Florence's deferential test thus compels the conclusion that the deference given to correctional officials in the adult context applies to correctional officials in the juvenile context as well. . . .Mabry acknowledges that, under Florence, it is her burden to prove the policy's unreasonableness with substantial evidence. Yet, in her brief, Mabry focuses her argument exclusively on the threshold question of whether Florence should apply to T.M.'s case. She makes no real effort to present evidence that the Center's search policy is exaggerated, unnecessary, or irrational in any way. . . Accordingly, she effectively concedes that she cannot prevail under Florence's test. Mabry's effective concession on this point is fatal to her claim, even though we note that, at oral argument, counsel for the County could not point to even one instance in which contraband was found via the strip and cavity search that could not have been found through use of the metal detecting wand and pat-down. Furthermore, the County has given no explanation for the Center's blanket policy of placing all incoming juvenile pretrial detainees into its general population as a default matter, absent some special indication from the Youth Court to the contrary. Indeed, at no point in its brief does the County point to any evidence whatsoever legitimating any components of the Center's intake procedures, including the search policy. Despite the paucity of the County's defense of the Center's policies and procedures, Mabry failed to enter evidence into the record below making a substantial showing that the Center's search policy is an exaggerated or otherwise irrational response to the problem of Center security. Mabry's argument must therefore be rejected.")

Jones v. Lowndes County, Miss., 678 F.3d 344, 350 (5th Cir. 2012) ("Jones and Nance identify only one policy they claim caused the deprivation of their Fourth Amendment rights. Sheriff Howard explained in an interrogatory response that 'the general policy is a target to take the detainee to a Judge within 48 hours but no later than 72 hours and as soon as reasonably possible and without any unnecessary delay.'. . . That the policy recognizes that determinations of probable cause may sometimes occur after the 48–hour benchmark does not, in of itself, violate McLaughlin, and has not been shown in this case to have been a moving force behind the delay. It therefore cannot serve as the basis for plaintiffs' Section 1983 claim.")

Jimenez v. Wood County*, *Tex, 660 F.3d 841, 849, 859 (5th Cir. 2011) (Jerry E. Smith, J., joined by Jones, C.J., and Clement, J., dissenting) (en banc) ("A majority of this court chooses to ignore the Supreme Court and, in the process, nimbly avoids an issue that needs deciding. I respectfully dissent. First, the majority incorrectly concludes that Wood County did not preserve its error. The county raised, in the district court, the argument that our precedent is at odds with Supreme Court caselaw, only to have the argument properly rejected. Given that a district court does not have the authority to overrule our precedents, any further objections would have been futile. More egregious, however, is the majority's failure to address an important constitutional issue: whether the precedent of this circuit, requiring individualized reasonable suspicion before conducting a strip-search of individuals arrested for minor offenses, is incorrect in light of governing Supreme Court caselaw. Even if the county did not properly preserve its argument − and our review is thus for plain error − the first step of the plain-error analysis requires us to decide whether there was error at all. The majority, however, declares that the error was not plain before it decides whether error itself was present. By failing to follow the plain-error analysis properly, the majority chooses to avoid the issue of whether our precedent is at odds with Supreme Court caselaw. And because our precedent is, in fact, directly contrary to a Supreme Court decision, that failure − and the corresponding failure to correct the law of this circuit − is inexcusable. . . .In sum, the majority incorrectly concludes that the county did not preserve error. But, more importantly, the majority wrongly declares that the error was not plain before deciding whether there even was error. If a majority of this en banc court (incorrectly) believes that our precedent is not at odds with Supreme Court jurisprudence, let those judges say so. If, on the other hand, a majority of our judges realize that we have misapplied a Supreme Court decision, we should use the opportunity of en banc rehearing to correct the error. In either circumstance, there is no need to hide behind waiver or assuming-without-deciding. I can think of no reason − and the majority surely has not provided one − for electing not to address whether our precedent is at odds with Wolfish, beyond a desire to avoid deciding difficult questions. But resolving hard issues is what the en banc process is usually all about. I respectfully dissent.")

Jimenez v. Wood County*, *Tex, 660 F.3d 841, 849, 859, 860 (5th Cir. 2011) (Emilio M. Garza, J., joined by Jones, C.J., Jerry E. Smith, J., Edith Brown Clement, J., and Priscilla R. Owen, J., dissenting) (en banc) ("The majority refuses to acknowledge the most salient issue raised by the County before the panel and this en banc court: whether this court's precedent in Stewart v. Lubbock County, 767 F.2d 153 (5th Cir.1985), and its progeny, requiring reasonable suspicion before individuals arrested for minor offenses can be subjected to visual strip searches, conflicts with the Supreme Court's holding in Bell v. Wolfish. . . . That is, the County contends not that the district court failed to follow Fifth Circuit precedent but that the Fifth Circuit failed to follow Supreme Court precedent. The County raises this issue separately from the objection to the jury charge under current caselaw. The majority holds, nonetheless, that Wood County failed to preserve this separate issue by not objecting to the district court's jury instructions on this distinct ground as required by Rule 51 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. But the majority conflates the issues: the County has not argued that the Bell v. Wolfish error is confined to the jury instructions. That is, the County's challenge to the minor offense rule before this court is not wed to its alternative claim of jury charge error regarding the application of the 'minor offense' rule under current caselaw. . . The Wolfish error permeates the entire case. While the County certainly needed to satisfy the requirements in Rule 51 in order to preserve its alternative argument under current caselaw, its general challenge to the minor offense rule presents us with a broader question: whether the County's failure to challenge the 'minor offense' rule at the trial level prevents this en banc court from considering the obvious tension between our caselaw and Supreme Court precedent. I believe it does not and respectfully dissent.") Jimenez v. Wood County, Tex, 660 F.3d 841, 849, 861, 862 (5th Cir. 2011) (Edith Brown Clement, J., joined by Jones, C.J., and Garza, J., dissenting) (en banc) ("I join Judge Garza's dissent and parts II and III of Judge Smith's dissent. I write separately to express a narrow disagreement with Judge Smith's application of Bell v. Wolfish to Jimenez's claim. As Judge Smith correctly observes, in upholding a blanket strip-search policy applicable to all inmates housed at the MCC, including pretrial detainees and witnesses held in protective custody, Wolfish necessarily rejected the need for reasonable suspicion before a person entering the general population of a detention facility may constitutionally be strip searched. . . I therefore agree with Judge Smith's conclusion that our precedents holding that reasonable suspicion is always required to strip search those arrested for minor offenses are inconsistent with Wolfish. I do not, however, agree with Judge Smith's further conclusion that Wolfish necessarily sanctions the strip search of every person even temporarily held at a detention facility. Wolfish 'requires a balancing of the need for the particular search against the invasion of personal rights that the search entails. Courts must consider the scope of the particular intrusion, the manner in which it is conducted, the justification for initiating it, and the place in which it is conducted.'. . In Wolfish, the justification advanced for the challenged searches was 'to discover [and] deter the smuggling of weapons, drugs, and other contraband into the institution.'. . But the threat of this type of contraband smuggling is likely to be significantly lessened when an arrestee is temporarily detained in a holding cell rather than being admitted into the general population of a jail or prison. Indeed, the recent Third, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuit opinions on which Judge Smith relies were all careful to clarify that the strip search policies they respectively upheld were applicable only to arrestees entering the general jail populations. . . The record before us indicates that after her arrest, Jimenez was transported to the Wood County jail, strip searched, then placed in a holding cell with three other detainees until she was released the following morning. These facts differ markedly from those considered in Wolfish, Florence, Bull, and Powell, all of which dealt with strip searches performed prior to entry (or re-entry) into the general population of a detention facility. . . Although Wolfish should certainly guide review of Jimenez's claim, I do not agree with Judge Smith that it straightforwardly necessitates a judgment against her. In my view, the balancing test set forth in Wolfish . . . requires an evaluation of the 'need for the particular search' in light of the specific facts surrounding Jimenez's detention in the Wood County jail − facts which are underdeveloped on this record because they were essentially irrelevant under this court's erroneous minor-offense rule. Because I would overrule our precedents establishing the minor-offense rule applied by the district court, I would remand for further development of the record and with instructions to decide Jimenez's claim according to the principles articulated in Wolfish, particularly that corrections officials 'should be accorded wide-ranging deference in the adoption and execution of policies and practices that in their judgment are needed to preserve internal order and discipline and to maintain institutional security.'")

Victoria W. v. Larpenter, 369 F.3d 475, 477-79, 489 (5th Cir. 2004) ("prison's policy of requiring an inmate to obtain a court order to receive an elective medical procedure' not unconstitutional)

Winzer v. Kaufman County, No. 3:15-CV-01284-N, 2023 WL 2530861, at *3–5 (N.D. Tex. Mar. 14, 2023) ("The Fifth Circuit 'has been wary of" finding municipal liability for a failure to train claim based on single incidents. . . Single violations create liability in only the most egregious cases, . . . such as where the dangerous 'proclivities' of an officer impute knowledge to the government that existing training is insufficient, . . . or where an 'obvious need' for training exists, but the officer 'was provided no training whatsoever.'. . The single-incident exception also applies when the policy at issue is facially unconstitutional. . . In such cases, plaintiffs need not prove deliberate indifference because '[w]here an official policy or practice is unconstitutional on its face, it necessarily follows that a policymaker was not only aware of the specific policy, but was also aware that a constitutional violation [would] most likely occur.'. . Put differently, training on an unconstitutional policy is inherently inadequate. However, plaintiffs still 'must cite evidence which could prove that the policy was the moving force behind the violation.'. . . Plaintiffs contend that Kaufman County may be held liable on a single-incident theory because its official use-of-force policies are inconsistent with Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989). . . . While section 9-4 of the Manual does not reference the objective reasonableness standard, the Use of Force Policy embraces the Graham approach. Though the Policy centers on officers' 'reasonable belief' that the use of force is justified, it ties the definition of reasonable belief to objective reasonableness by instructing officers to assess their real-time perceptions against whether 'an ordinary and prudent person' would think similarly. It is an inescapable fact that officers in potential use-of-force situations must exercise their best judgment, and the Policy advises officers how to do so in a way that comports with Graham. Accordingly, the County's use-of-force policies are not facially unconstitutional. Further, even in the single-incident context, 'it is the Plaintiff's burden to create a fact issue on the inadequacy of the training on the use of deadly force.'. . Plaintiffs have not demonstrated how excessive force incidents were a 'highly probable' consequence of the County's policy. Indeed, courts consider it 'highly predictable that a County's deputies will follow standards of behavior adopted and authorized by the County,' meaning that constitutional violations will not normally be an obvious result of a policy that passes constitutional muster. . . Nor have Plaintiffs pointed to evidence calling into question whether any of the involved officers had 'dangerous proclivities' toward excessive force violations, such as a history of similar misconduct showing their propensities for violence, recklessness, or questionable judgment. . . There is also no evidence that Kaufman County failed to provide any training whatsoever on the use of force. . . .Plaintiffs have not created a fact issue as to any of the exceptions, and thus they cannot invoke single-incident liability.")

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Hall v. Navarre, 118 F.4th 749, 758 (6th Cir. 2024) ("Craig's command to engage the protesters was neither facially infirm nor taken with deliberate indifference to its known or obvious consequences. . . Absent such evidence, Hall cannot demonstrate that the City's nebulous policy of engaging the protesters was the 'moving force' behind his alleged injuries. . . Hall takes issue with this framework. To his mind, it is enough for him to show that Navarre's specific use of force was unconstitutional, and that Craig's order, even if lawful on its face, nonetheless was carried out in an improper manner. Put differently, Hall believes that a mere but-for causal connection between a city policy and his injury is enough to establish municipal liability. Not so. When a facially legal municipal policy is at issue, more than but-for causation is required. . . Otherwise, Monell would 'become a dead letter.'. . At the extreme, any municipal policy, however benign, from a police department's decision to hire an individual to a municipality's choice to enforce the laws at all, could be a but-for cause of one constitutional violation or another. . . Hall likewise seeks to hold the City liable for the ticket he received from Barr. Hall argues that the citation was issued in retaliation for Hall's attendance at the protest, thereby amounting to a First Amendment violation. Hall attempts to tie the citation to city policy by pointing to Cole's instruction that Barr issue mass citations, a directive Hall says came from the police department's 'highest ranking officials.' He labels this instruction the 'moving force' behind his constitutional injury. But Hall nowhere argues that Cole was an 'official[ ] with final decision-making authority.'. . Equally absent is evidence that Barr was ordered to issue the citation in retaliation for Hall's First Amendment activity, let alone evidence that the City was deliberately indifferent to the possible constitutional consequences of the ticketing. . . Here too, then, he fails to show that the alleged city policy caused his specific injury. Accordingly, we affirm the award of summary judgment to the City on Hall's Monell claims.")

Morgan by next friend Morgan v. Wayne County, Michigan, 33 F.4th 320, 328-29 (6th Cir. 2022) ("To sustain an illegal policy or practice Monell claim, Morgan must show the existence of a policy, connect that policy to the municipality, and demonstrate that her injury was caused by the execution of that policy. . . Because Morgan has not demonstrated that any individual employee violated her Eighth Amendment rights, she must show that the municipality itself, through its policy or practice, violated her Eighth Amendment rights by manifesting deliberate indifference to her vulnerabilities. . . Standing alone, an allegation that a policy was violated cannot sustain a constitutional deliberate indifference claim. . . Instead, Morgan must show that the policy itself was facially deficient. 'An unconstitutional policy can include both implicit policies as well as a gap in expressed policies.'. . Morgan argues that Wayne County's policy had an unconstitutional gap because the lack of a policy separating male and female inmates created a security risk, which shows that Wayne County was deliberately indifferent to her vulnerabilities. But Wayne County has presented a comprehensive security protocol that addresses minimum staffing, rounds, reporting requirements, head counts, inspections, shower security, and other duties. This policy was a clear attempt to protect inmates. Indeed, there had been no reported instances of sexual relations or assaults between inmates at UCH before November 2005. And there exists no evidence that prior to this incident, Wayne County knew its policy was ineffective. Morgan cites no authority for the proposition that the Eighth Amendment requires men and women to be housed separately, which, at bottom, is her argument. Accordingly, in this case, she cannot sustain a Monell claim against Wayne County.")

Young v. Campbell County, Kentucky, 846 F. App'x314, ___ (6th Cir. 2021) ("Young has not presented any facts from which a jury could reasonably find that Campbell County had a policy or custom that caused a violation of Young's constitutional right to protection from inmate violence. An express policy can be unconstitutional in two ways: '(1) facially unconstitutional as written or articulated, or (2) facially constitutional but consistently implemented to result in constitutional violations with explicit or implicit ratification by city policymakers.' Gregory v. City of Louisville, 444 F.3d 725, 752 (6th Cir. 2006). 'Where the identified policy is itself facially lawful, the plaintiff "must demonstrate that the municipal action was taken with 'deliberate indifference' as to its known or obvious consequences. A showing of simple or even heightened negligence will not suffice."'" Id. (quoting Brown, 520 U.S. at 407, 117 S.Ct. 1382). To the extent that Young is arguing that Campbell County's classification policies are facially unconstitutional, he provides no authority to substantiate this contention. Young also has not pointed to any evidence showing that the classification policies have been 'consistently implemented to result in constitutional violations with explicit or implicit ratification by city policymakers,' except for Young's alleged assault. . . As the district court found, though Young's expert testified to several inadequacies in the classification policies and how they posed a risk to inmates' safety, . . . such testimony does not show that Campbell County acted with deliberate indifference to the known or obvious consequences of its policies. There is no evidence in the record of the expert even finding that similar deficiencies at other jails or prisons have caused constitutional violations. At most, this supports a conclusion that Campbell County acted negligently by adopting or permitting a policy that proved inadequate in this case. . . But negligence cannot satisfy the deliberate-indifference standard. . . .In some cases, a single act by a policymaker with final policymaking authority may sustain a municipal-liability claim. . . . However, to prove municipal liability under a single-act theory, Young must demonstrate that Jailer Daley made 'a deliberate choice to follow a course of action ... from among various alternatives.'. . As discussed earlier, Young has presented no evidence that Jailer Daley deliberately chose not to reclassify Ka. Consequently, Young has failed to set forth sufficient facts to establish an unconstitutional policy. Young also has not shown that Jailer Daley and Campbell County had a custom of tolerating unconstitutional acts due to Jailer Daley's failure to investigate or discipline the classification officers or the officers who supervised BP2 from June 15 through 18. In order to establish deliberate indifference due to a final decisionmaker's failure to investigate or discipline, Young must show that 'the flaws in this particular investigation were representative of (1) a clear and persistent pattern of illegal activity, (2) which [Jailer Daley] knew or should have known about, (3) yet remained deliberately indifferent about, and (4) that the [CCDC]'s custom was the cause of the [violation].'. . Young has not met this burden as he has not presented evidence of a pattern of constitutional violations or incidents where inmates were harmed due to failures in the classification system or by CCDC officials failing to follow supervision policies. Absent these showings, 'mere acquiescence in a single discretionary decision by a subordinate is not sufficient to show ratification.' Feliciano v. City of Cleveland, 988 F.2d 649, 656 (6th Cir. 1993). Consequently, the facts fall short of showing deliberate indifference by the municipality. Finally, to the extent that Young argues that CCDC classification officers had an unwritten policy or practice of failing to reclassify violent inmates that was condoned by Jailer Daley, . . . such argument is also unavailing. To survive summary judgment under this theory, Young must show, among other requirements, 'the existence of a clear and persistent pattern of [illegal activity].'. . As discussed earlier, Young has failed to make such a showing. In sum, the district court properly found that Campbell County and Jailer Daley, in his official capacity, could not be held liable with respect to Young's deliberate-indifference claims.") Troutman v. Louisville Metro Dep't of Corr., 979 F.3d 472, 489-91 (6th Cir. 2020) ("If the plaintiff fails to establish a constitutional violation by any individual officer, the municipality itself cannot be held liable under § 1983. . . That is to say, 'where there exists no constitutional violation for failure to take special precautions to prevent suicide, then there can be no constitutional violation on the part of a local government unit based on its failure to promulgate policies and to better train personnel to detect and deter jail suicides.'. . Therefore, liability must rest, if at all, on the actions of Cox in the context of the municipality's policy, since we find that only Cox disputably violated Charles' constitutional rights. . . We agree with the district court in granting summary judgment in favor of the Louisville Metro Government. Stephanie's allegations against the municipality may support the conclusion that it was negligent, but a 'finding of negligence does not satisfy the deliberate indifference standard.'. . Our holding that Cox was arguably deliberately indifferent rests in large part on his failure to follow the prison's policy regarding obtaining clearance from medical staff before placing an inmate in solitary confinement. That is to say, underlying our finding of potential liability on Cox is a finding that Cox deliberately ignored jail policy; Stephanie's arguments suggest that if another employee had properly followed the jail's policy, then Charles' suicide could have been prevented. In Perez, we found a similar tension between the arguments against an individual officer and against the municipality. . . There, the plaintiff argued that placing the decedent in a single cell before his suicide 'wholly disregarded jail policy' which requires such inmates indicating potentially suicidal behavior be placed in a 'multiple cell with appropriate supervision.'. . Though we found that the individual officer was arguably deliberately indifferent in his disregard of the risk of moving the decedent into solitary, . . . we found that those same arguments counseled against finding the municipality liable. . . In other words, the arguments against the individual officer—that he failed to follow jail policy—itself implies the existence of a policy which, if followed adequately, would have prevented the suicide. . . Here, the municipality did have policies in place. It is plausible that the municipality was negligent in enacting and enforcing those policies, but '[d]eliberate indifference remains distinct from mere negligence. Where a city does create reasonable policies, but negligently administers them, there is no deliberate indifference and therefore no § 1983 liability.'. . Stephanie has not shown that 'through its deliberate conduct, the municipality was the "moving force" behind the injury alleged.'. . She has not shown 'that the municipal action was taken with the requisite degree of culpability' nor has she demonstrated 'a direct causal link between the municipal action and the deprivation of federal rights.'. . . Moreover, '[p]retrial detainees do not have a constitutional right for cities to ensure, through supervision and discipline, that every possible measure be taken to prevent their suicidal efforts.'. . Though we find that Cox was arguably deliberately indifferent in executing jail policies, such a finding of individual liability cannot—without more—support a finding of municipal liability because a municipality 'cannot be held liable under § 1983 for an injury inflicted solely by its employees or agents.'. . The facts here are tragic, and we have written before to note the troubling statistics regarding suicides in jail, . . . but deliberate indifference is a 'stringent standard of fault,'. . . and under that stringent standard, '[v]ery few cases have upheld municipal liability for the suicide of a pre-trial detainee.'. . So too here, where the evidence shows that one of the municipality's officers was at least arguably deliberately indifferent but does not show that the 'deliberate conduct' of the municipality was itself a 'moving force' behind the violation of Charles' constitutional rights, nor that there is a 'direct causal connection' between the municipality's policies or customs and Charles' constitutional injury. . .Accordingly, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the Louisville Metro Government.")

Crabbs v. Scott (Crabbs II), 800 F. App'x 332, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("The issue now is whether Scott can be liable for the swab of Crabbs' DNA under a municipal policy. On a motion for summary judgment, the district court said no. The court determined that even if Sheriff Scott's office had an 'official policy authorizing the post-acquittal collection of DNA from felony arrestees who were on an ID hold,' and even if that alleged policy were unconstitutional, it still could not give rise to liability. The alleged policy, like the Ohio statute, would apply only to felony arrestees, which Crabbs was not. Moreover, the district court held that even if the Sheriff's Office employees thought they were implementing the policy when they swabbed Crabbs, that mistake was not reasonably foreseeable, so the policy was not the proximate cause of the swab. Accordingly, the district court granted summary judgment in favor of Scott. . . . There are essentially two ways in which Sheriff Scott could be liable. First, he could be liable if his office's policy authorized the collection of Crabbs' DNA. Second, he could be liable if it was reasonably foreseeable that the policy would cause the collection of Crabbs' DNA, even if technically the policy did not allow the swab. Before moving on, it's worth mentioning that the district court did not conclusively find that the Franklin County Sheriff's Office had any official policy regarding post-acquittal DNA collection. In the same way, we do not purport to hold that such a policy exists; we merely assess whether any alleged policy could create liability for Scott. With that said, we proceed to analyze the two theories of Scott's potential liability in turn. . . . Here, Scott has no formal policy permitting the taking of Crabbs' DNA, because Crabbs was not a felony arrestee at the time the swab was taken. According to the 2011 Memo from Chief Deputy Barrett, Sheriff's Office employees could 'only collect DNA specimens from persons ... arrested on a felony charge.' And a bond-violation arrest is not the same thing as a felony arrest in the statutory context, as we noted in Crabbs I, 786 F.3d at 430. Crabbs' 'felony voluntary-manslaughter charge was irrelevant to his second arrest.'. . .Therefore, the alleged policy did not give Sheriff's Office employees any authority to swab Crabbs' DNA. Going beyond the written documents, Crabbs points to Sheriff Scott's earlier position in this litigation and his deposition testimony. Both reveal, according to Crabbs, that Scott thought swabbing Crabbs' DNA was required under the policy. According to this argument, we should interpret the policy to mean what the Sheriff, who made the policy, said it means. Now, Monell does contemplate municipal liability for the actions of officials 'whose edicts or acts may fairly be said to represent official policy.'. . So it's at least possible that, if Scott understood the policy to cover Crabbs and then applied it to him, then that application could amount to office policy. . . . Scott did not take the swab, nor did he direct anyone to do so. So his involvement was limited to the policy. Neither Scott's deposition testimony nor his litigation position as to the meaning of the policy is what 'directly caused' the swab of Crabbs' DNA. By the time Scott took a litigation position and was deposed, the deed had already been done—Crabbs' DNA had already been taken. Even assuming Scott had the type of final policymaking authority contemplated by Pembaur, there's no way his after-the-fact interpretation of the policy, correct or incorrect, could have 'directly caused' something that had already happened. . . So really, Crabbs is saying that, when it comes to interpreting the policy, and thus why the swab was taken, we should trust Scott's reading. But we are not bound by Scott's after-the-fact interpretation of how the alleged policy should or should not have applied to Crabbs. Because we find that Crabbs was not a felony arrestee, the alleged policy simply did not apply to him, and what Scott says after the DNA swab doesn't change that conclusion. . . . The cornerstone of the proximate-cause analysis is foreseeability; we ask 'whether it was reasonably foreseeable that the complained of harm would befall the § 1983 plaintiff as a result of the defendant's conduct.'. . .So here, the proximate-cause issue is whether, when Sheriff Scott's office passed the alleged policy, it was reasonably foreseeable that the policy could be mistakenly applied to someone like Keith Crabbs—that is, someone who was arrested for a felony, then released on bond, then rearrested for violating that bond, then placed on an ID hold, then tried for and acquitted of the underlying felony, then swabbed for a DNA sample upon release. . . .[T]he issue is no longer whether Scott's employees thought they were applying the policy; that was the question under factual causation. The issue now is whether their doing so was reasonably foreseeable. And on that issue, Crabbs does not point us to any additional evidence. Without more, a reasonable juror could not conclude that the policy was the proximate cause of Crabb's injury. Therefore, summary judgment in favor of Scott was proper. Our assumption that the underlying policy was unconstitutional does not change this outcome, because even an unconstitutional policy must proximately cause the plaintiff's injury. To be sure, in cases involving a municipal actor departing from a municipal policy, the underlying policy is usually constitutional on its face. . . . Crabbs has not pointed us to any cases where the policy being incorrectly applied was facially unconstitutional. But we do not go so far as to say that a municipality is always liable if its unconstitutional policy leads to a deprivation of rights, regardless of how unreasonably the policy is applied. . . .[M]unicipalities should not have to anticipate and preemptively account for every possible incorrect reading of their policies in order to avoid Monell liability. Otherwise we would be drifting too close to respondeat superior liability for § 1983 claims against municipalities, an idea that has been repeatedly and resoundingly rejected. . . Accordingly, we would hold Scott liable for Crabbs' injury only if Scott's alleged policy was both the factual and proximate cause of the injury—even though we are assuming that the underlying policy was unconstitutional. “)

Crabbs v. Scott (Crabbs II), 800 F. App’x 332, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) (Nalbandian, J., dissenting) (“The majority looks at this case the wrong way. The question is not whether, when the Sheriff’s office passed the policy, ‘it was reasonably foreseeable that the policy could be mistakenly applied to someone like Keith Crabbs.’. . Rather, the correct question is simply whether the policy applied to someone like Crabbs. It did. Sheriff Scott admitted that the policy applied to Crabbs. And he never claimed that his employees made a mistake under the policy. So the majority bases its question on a false premise—that Sherriff Scott’s employees in fact made a mistake. But when we frame the question correctly, focusing on the district court’s assumptions and Sheriff Scott’s admissions, we should conclude that Sheriff Scott’s DNA collection policy caused the collection of Crabbs’s DNA. . . . The only question before us is whether Sheriff Scott’s policy of collecting DNA proximately caused the collection of Crabbs’s DNA. . . Sheriff Scott asks us to adopt the district court’s reasoning, arguing that his staff misapplied his policy, so we cannot hold him responsible under Monell for his staff’s mistake. If we did, Sheriff Scott argues that we would create respondeat superior liability, which the Supreme Court has forbidden under Monell. Sheriff Scott is both right and wrong. He is correct that, under Monell, an employee’s mistake cannot transform an employer’s good policy into a bad one. But Sheriff Scott is wrong on that rule’s application here for two reasons. First, Sheriff Scott’s policy is not ‘otherwise sound.’ The opposite is true: the district court assumed that Sheriff Scott’s DNA collection policy is unconstitutional. And second, there was no mistake. Sheriff Scott admitted that his policy of collecting DNA caused the collection of Crabbs’s DNA. . . .[A] municipality’s liability depends on the existence of a good policy versus a troublesome policy. And our ‘mistake’ cases protect a municipality only when it has an otherwise sound policy.’ It is this existence of a constitutional policy (or, at least, the lack of an unconstitutional policy), that saves a municipality from liability when its employee makes a mistake. But on the other hand, if a municipality has an unconstitutional policy on its face, such as encouraging excessive force, sexual abuse, beating prisoners, or providing substandard care, there is no problem holding the municipality liable under Monell. . . .Here, Crabbs’s appeal falls under the latter scenario: the district court assumed Sheriff Scott implemented an unconstitutional policy of collecting DNA—i.e., it was a bad policy on its face. Indeed, throughout this litigation, the district court has maintained this assumption to avoid ‘a thorny constitutional question of first impression[.]’. . So at this stage of the litigation, the district court’s assumption means that Sheriff Scott had a written policy telling his staff to engage in constitutional violations. This point alone distinguishes this appeal from our ‘mistake’ cases under Monell. Now, of course, this does not mean that Crabbs would have ultimately won his case if we did reverse. As I explained, this is a unique case with a strange record. The district court’s assumptions might have ultimately been wrong: a jury could have decided that no official policy existed, or the district court could have determined that the policy was perfectly constitutional. But based on the record in this appeal, Crabbs’s Monell claim should continue. . . .Sheriff Scott’s argument should have failed for another reason: there was no mistake when the Sheriff’s employees implemented the policy, contrary to the majority’s interpretation. Sheriff Scott testified that his policy of collecting DNA caused the collection of Crabbs's DNA. His staff confirmed this. And his office paperwork shows that his staff followed policy. . . . Sheriff Scott does not cite (nor could I find) any authority when a court dismissed a Monell claim for lack of causation when the policymaker admitted it had an official policy—and conceded that the policy caused the alleged constitutional injury. This makes sense, too. So it is unsurprising that the DNA collection policy caused the collection of Crabbs's DNA. . . .In sum, I find it foreseeable that Crabbs would be arrested, released on bond, re-arrested for violating his bond, and placed on an ID hold. It was foreseeable that when officers re-arrested Crabbs, Sheriff Scott's employees would label Crabbs under the same case number as his felony arrest, because he violated the bond in place from his felony arrest. Sheriff Scott admitted that Crabbs fell under the policy and that the policy classified him as a felony arrestee. And there is no evidence that the officers made any factual mistake under the policy. We should read the policy and interpret it as the employees foreseeably would on the day they processed Crabbs back to jail. And when I do, I see that a jury could find it reasonably foreseeable that employees would label Crabbs as a felony arrestee and take his DNA. Indeed, the policy required classifying Crabbs as a felony arrestee, given the options. So while it may ultimately be true that Sheriff Scott did nothing wrong—and his policy was constitutionally sound—at a minimum, there remains a disputed issue of fact on causation. And a reasonable jury could find that Sheriff Scott's policy on DNA collection caused his staff to collect Crabbs's DNA. As a result, summary judgment was inappropriate. I respectfully dissent.")

Roell v. Hamilton Cty., Ohio, 870 F.3d 471, 487-88 (6th Cir. 2017) ("We . . . have utilized the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis to conclude that the deputies are entitled to summary judgment because no caselaw clearly established that the degree of force used by the deputies violated Roell's Fourth Amendment rights. In doing so, we have reached no conclusion with respect to whether Roell's rights were actually violated. We must therefore address Nancy Roell's three theories for Hamilton County's liability by assuming, without deciding, that Roell's Fourth Amendment rights were violated by the deputies' excessive use of force. Hamilton County is subject to liability under § 1983 for its policy on handling mentally ill individuals only if Nancy Roell can 'demonstrate "a direct causal link between the policy and the alleged constitutional violation."'. . But Nancy Roell does not point to any policy that is the 'moving force' behind the deputies' actions. . . She instead argues that Hamilton County's lack of adequate policies and training caused the deputies' use of excessive force. . . .The record shows that the deputies received training on topics that included the use of force and tasers, crisis intervention techniques, interacting with the special-needs population and mentally ill suspects, and recognizing the symptoms of excited delirium. Finally, we note that Nancy Roell's argument that Hamilton County failed to train its deputies is completely inconsistent with her § 1983 claim that the deputies' use of excessive force was evidenced by the fact that they failed to follow Hamilton County's procedures regarding officer interactions with individuals suffering from excited delirium. This leaves Nancy Roell with her argument that Hamilton County ratified the use of excessive force by Deputies Alexander, Dalid, and Huddleston when it conducted an inadequate investigation of the events. Specifically, she asserts that the investigation merely rubber-stamped the deputies' unconstitutional conduct, neglected to discover what actually took place, and failed to review whether the deputies' actions violated Hamilton County's policies and procedures. . . . Because Hamilton County is not subject to municipal liability under any of her theories, the district court did not err in granting summary judgment to the county on her § 1983 claim.")

Fields v. Henry County, Tenn., 701 F.3d 180, 183-85 (6th Cir. 2012) ("Henry County does not dispute that Fields's detention resulted from a policy of automatically detaining domestic-assault defendants for a 12–hour period. Nor does it dispute that its policy was to set bail using a bond schedule. . . Thus, the only issue before us is whether those policies violated the plaintiff's Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. . . .Fields argues that Henry County's use of a bond schedule violates his Eighth Amendment right to be free from excessive bail. But there is nothing inherently wrong with bond schedules. . . .Fields also claims that the 12–hour holding period was a 'denial of bail.'. . Not so. The Eighth Amendment's protections address the amount of bail, not the timing. There is no constitutional right to speedy bail.")

Mitchell v. McNeil, 487 F.3d 374, 378 (6th Cir. 2007) (policy of allowing informants to drive an officer's private vehicle is not unconstitutional)

Balbridge v. Jeffreys, 2009 WL 275669, at *7, *8 (E.D. Mich. Feb. 5, 2009) ("The Court finds a policy or custom of transporting female inmates alone with male guards is not unconstitutional, because the majority of men, and the majority of prison guards, are not rapists merely waiting for an opportunity to assault a woman. This is not to say that this policy is wise, or that a different policy would not have protected the Plaintiff's undeniable right to bodily integrity more effectively. But absent a showing that transportation by a male guard alone is tantamount to a sentence of rape for any women unfortunate enough to suffer it, the policy cannot be said to have caused the rape. Rather, the policy failed to prevent the rape, which is inadequate as a matter of law to support liability. . . . The court finds as a matter of law that the Jackson County's policies, or failure to promulgate a specific policy governing the off-site, cross-gender supervision does not constitute deliberate indifference.")

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Kelley-Lomax v. City of Chicago, Illinois, 49 F.4th 1124, 1125–26 (7th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 785 (2023) ("Conyers held, among other things, that the Fourth Amendment (applied to state actors by the Fourteenth) does not regulate disposition of the seized property. . . Disposition, we concluded, is governed by the Due Process Clause. The Fourth Amendment is satisfied if the seizure is reasonable when it occurs—as seizure of an arrestee's property is[.] . . Kelley-Lomax wants us to overrule this portion of Conyers, but we do not see any deficiency in that opinion's reasoning. Conyers rejected a due process challenge to the City's policy, holding that the City provides detainees with notice and an opportunity to reclaim their property. Kelley-Lomax tries a different tack: substantive due process. He maintains that the City must serve as unpaid custodian of his goods for as long as it takes for him (or his designee) to retrieve the items. Put in that way, the argument lacks any prospect of success. Substantive due process depends on the existence of a fundamental right, which means a right with deep roots in our history and traditions. . . Kelley-Lomax does not contend that our historical tradition recognizes a right to have the government serve as unpaid custodian of property for extended periods. Instead he characterizes the fundamental right as property itself. We do not doubt that property is a fundamental right; the Takings Clause shows as much. But, as we explained in Conyers, property can be abandoned. After that occurs the former owner lacks rights. . . Chicago draws the abandonment line at 30 days. That choice cannot be attacked by pointing to the fundamental status of 'property' in the abstract. Instead the plaintiff must address the actual policy at stake: the government's unwillingness to serve as unpaid bailee for indefinite periods. And on that score Kelley-Lomax does not even try to show that such a role for government has historical provenance. Conyers remarked that 30 days is a short time for a detainee to take the steps necessary to retrieve property. . . Perhaps it is too short. The Due Process Clause requires notice and an adequate opportunity to protect one's interests. But in this case, just as in Conyers, the plaintiff has made an all-or-none argument. Instead of contending that the Constitution requires 60 or 90 days, Kelley-Lomax contends that a detainee is entitled to wait a lifetime before claiming the property. Perhaps that strategy is driven by the fact that during the whole six months he remained in custody, Kelley-Lomax did not try to retrieve the phone or wallet. The choice between 30 days and a longer time did not matter to Kelley-Lomax. But it may matter to other detainees, and Conyers leaves timing open. Conyers also does not tackle the question whether Chicago must sell the seized items for the detainees' accounts rather than throwing them in the trash. Units of government often take custody of unclaimed property, returning it once the owner has been identified (provided that the time for escheat has not arrived). . . .That approach works well with monetary instruments. Physical items seized from arrested persons make claims on limited space, and for many detainees the costs of arranging a sale in order to free up space would exceed the value of the items in inventory. But cell phones and jewelry often have substantial market value. When the governmental interest is limited to rationing available storage, perhaps the option of sale for detainees' accounts must be considered. . . Conyers did not make an argument along these lines, and neither did Kelley-Lomax. We mention the possibility not to resolve it, but to show that neither Conyers nor this decision has resolved it implicitly.") Gonzalez v. McHenry County, Illinois, 40 F.4th 824, 829-30 (7th Cir. 2022) ("Gonzalez targets what he calls the sheriffs' 'policy' of accepting any pretrial detainee into the jail without regard to the jail's ability to accommodate his serious medical conditions. He argues that, in accepting the decedent into the jail despite his serious medical needs, the sheriffs deprived him of a constitutional right. Gonzalez contends that this purported policy caused the decedent's pain and ultimate death. He suggests that the sheriffs should have 'persuade[d] the prosecutor to seek release on personal recognizance or arrange for release on home confinement' or come up with some other 'creative' solution. Gonzalez does not allege a policy at all. For section 1983 purposes, an official can be said to set a 'policy' only when he possesses the authority to adopt a rule prescribing government conduct on a matter. . . But 'courts, not sheriffs, make pretrial detention decisions.'. . Gonzalez's theory that Monell liability can be imposed when jail officials simply comply with a court's confinement orders fails because jailors cannot release pretrial detainees remanded to their custody. . . State or local law determines whether someone is a policymaker under section 1983. . . . Keeping in custody a detainee remanded to detention by a court is not a 'policy' that can be adopted or discarded; it's an obligation that jailors cannot evade. Illinois law clearly compels a sheriff, in his capacity as a warden of a county jail, to 'receive and confine in such jail, until discharged by due course of law, all persons committed to such jail by any competent authority.'. . . Here, jail personnel did what they could do for the decedent consistent with the U.S. Constitution and the laws of Illinois, and that was to take him to the hospital for treatment when necessary. Gonzalez does not identify, nor could we find, authority for the proposition that the Constitution empowers, much less requires, a sheriff to release a detainee committed to his charge. In essence, Gonzalez asks us to impose Monell liability on jail officials who had no policymaking authority over the 'policy' he alleges. But the sheriffs 'cannot be liable under Monell when there is no underlying constitutional violation.' Sallenger v. City of Springfield, 630 F.3d 499, 504 (7th Cir. 2010). Without a valid allegation of a policy, Gonzalez's claims cannot be sustained.")

Stewart v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., 14 F.4th 757, 765-68 (7th Cir. 2021) ("As for the defendant Wexford Health Services, private entities acting to fulfill government duties are not vicariously liable for the conduct of their employees. . . Instead, a plaintiff must demonstrate direct liability by showing that the constitutional violation was 'caused by (1) an express municipal policy; (2) a widespread, though unwritten, custom or practice; or (3) a decision by a municipal agent with final policymaking authority.'. . In this case, Stewart claims that Wexford had a widespread custom or practice of not granting black box exemptions to inmates with conditions similar to that of Stewart. In order to succeed on this claim, Stewart must present evidence of an 'unconstitutional practice by the [prison's] staff that is so well settled that it constitutes a custom or usage with the force of law.'. .As part of its contract with IDOC, Wexford must follow IDOC's administrative and institutional directives, including the requirement that all inmates wear black box restraints when they leave prison. The directive allows a medical doctor to issue an exemption when a medical condition so warrants. Therefore, it is IDOC policy that creates the presumption that an inmate will wear a black box outside of the prison unless medically contraindicated. Some Wexford physicians found that Stewart qualified for the exemption at some times, and others did not. Stewart has not provided any evidence that Wexford had a widespread custom or practice of disallowing all exemptions for his condition. In fact, the evidence of Stewart's own experience indicates that the medical providers do as instructed and issue black box exemptions on a case-by-case basis based on the clinical facts before them, as Stewart himself sometimes received the exemption and sometimes did not. Stewart argues that the evidence that he was denied a medical exemption on multiple occasions and by multiple providers is a sufficient pattern of repeated behavior to create a factual question regarding a widespread pattern or practice. Although he was denied an exemption and forced to wear a black box on many occasions (twenty-three, by his count, . . . by his own admission he also received medical exemptions from wearing the black box, sometimes for years at a time. . . He does not enumerate the times he received medical treatment but was not forced to wear a black box, but based on his many medical appointments and the years in which he was exempt, we can assume these were many, too. . . . Stewart's own experience indicates the lack of a per se policy against black box exemptions. Stewart also claims that Wexford had a policy of inaction, and that a lack of policy or obvious gaps in policy created the constitutional violation. It is true that 'the absence of a policy might reflect a decision to act unconstitutionally, but the Supreme Court has repeatedly told us to be cautious about drawing that inference.'. . In this case, Wexford did have a policy that required medical providers to evaluate each prisoner on a case-by-case basis to assess the medical risks in light of the security concerns and according to medical standards. Wexford medical providers followed this policy, and at times granted Stewart an exemption even if, more often, they did not grant an exemption. This is not a case in which a prison allowed individual guards to make decisions as to whether a prisoner would wear a black box or not, without any guiding principles. In this case, the prison asked medical professionals to rely on their extensive medical training and judgment to evaluate complex and individualized medical conditions in light of prevailing security concerns. Even assuming the truth of all of Stewart's facts, Wexford did not have a policy or practice of per se denials of black box exemptions or of failing to perform assessments to determine whether an exemption was warranted. . . . Stewart also claims that IDOC (through Steele in his official capacity) should have had more specific and directive policies regarding who should receive black box exemptions and that failure to create and implement such policies violate prisoners' constitutional rights. We cannot say that IDOC violated the Constitution by allowing medical providers to evaluate each requestor individually. Each prisoner presents a unique set of medical conditions and individualized experiences with pain. Allowing for an individual medical assessment is not evidence that IDOC failed to implement policies in a way that added up to deliberate indifference. Finally, we do not find sufficient evidence to allow a reasonable jury to conclude that IDOC had an unconstitutional custom or practice of not giving black box exemptions to inmates with conditions like that of Stewart. As we noted above, Stewart himself sometimes received an exemption and sometimes did not. This is evidence that the IDOC did not have an unconstitutional custom or practice of not giving black box exemptions to inmates with conditions like Stewart's.") Calderone v. City of Chicago, 979 F.3d 1156, 1163-65 (7th Cir. 2020) ("To ultimately prove a Monell claim, a plaintiff must have evidence of: '(1) an action pursuant to a municipal policy, (2) culpability, meaning that policymakers were deliberately indifferent to a known risk that the policy would lead to constitutional violations, and (3) causation, meaning the municipal action was the "moving force" behind the constitutional injury.'. . We assume, without deciding, an underlying constitutional violation. . . The City does not contest that it acted under its policy, that is, its personnel rules. Accordingly, the parties debate the second and third elements of the Monell claim: culpability and causation. The pivotal question is 'always whether an official policy, however expressed ..., caused the constitutional deprivation.'. . Calderone does not appear to argue that the relevant personnel rules facially violate the Second Amendment rights of City employees; rather, Calderone contends that, as applied to her, the rules violate her Second Amendment rights. Calderone also appears to accept that the text of the personnel rules she relies on does not explicitly forbid an employee from discharging a firearm in self-defense. Rightly so, because all these rules do is generally prohibit unlawful conduct, discourteous treatment of members of the public, and conduct unbecoming of a public employee. But if, as Calderone argues, 'it is the application of such policy that results in a constitutional violation,' she has not carried her burden to demonstrate causation and culpability. A plaintiff may directly show these elements by 'demonstrating that the policy is itself unconstitutional.'. . Because Calderone cannot do so, she must indirectly show a 'series of bad acts[,] creating an inference that municipal officials were aware of and condoned the misconduct of their employees.'. . Calderone misreads Calhoun v. Ramsey, 408 F.3d 375, 379–80 (7th Cir. 2005), to suggest that she need only 'one application of the offensive policy resulting in a constitutional violation ... to establish municipal liability.' As the City points out, in Calhoun we acknowledged in the sentence preceding the one Calderone quotes that a municipality is only liable in such circumstances assuming that one of its express policies facially violates the Constitution. . . 'But where the policy relied upon is not itself unconstitutional, considerably more proof than the single incident will be necessary in every case to establish both the requisite fault on the part of the municipality, and the causal connection between the policy and the constitutional deprivation.'. One single incident cannot suffice; rather, Calderone must show 'a series of constitutional violations.'. .Here, Calderone identifies no other employee who suffered the Second Amendment injuries she purportedly has by enforcement of the City's personnel rules. . . Without that evidence, she claims only that the application of the City's personnel rules resulted in her termination from municipal employment in violation of the Second Amendment. The single constitutional violation Calderone allegedly experienced cannot establish Monell liability in view of the City's facially constitutional personnel rules. The district court was right to dismiss this claim.")

Levy v. Marion County Sheriff, 940 F.3d 1002, 1010-13 (7th Cir. 2019) ("The Sheriff's Office does not dispute that it created a system with the Marion County Superior Courts to process inmates for release utilizing Odyssey, OMS, and the release workflow, which included an agreement that if a court modified a release order, court staff would contact the Sheriff's inmate records staff to notify them of the change. Likewise, the Sheriff does not challenge the district court's decision to analyze this system as a policy or practice under Monell. That said, it is critical to specify the exact policy or practice at issue here to properly conduct our analysis. As noted above, the district court discussed Monell as if there were two polices in this case—the 'Transmittal Policy' and the 'Change Notification Policy'—when determining whether the Sheriff's Office had acted with deliberate indifference. Levy argues that the two must be treated as one policy for the purposes of this appeal, and defendants appear to concede the same. A review of the record supports this conclusion. The evidence suggests that the Sheriff's Office adopted the Change Notification Policy to ensure that it received notice of subsequent orders that may have been otherwise overlooked by the existing Transmittal Policy. Thus, the issue on appeal is whether Levy can establish that the Sheriff's adoption and use of this modified Transmittal Policy constituted deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of detainees' over-detention and whether that policy's adoption caused his own over-detention. For the reasons explained below, we conclude that absent evidence that the Sheriff's Office knew or should have known that the modified Transmittal Policy would fail, or failed so often that it would obviously result in detainees' over-detention, Levy cannot to show that defendants acted with deliberate indifference. Contrary to the district court's reasoning, Levy posits that to establish deliberate indifference, he is not required to show 'other instances' where the failure to follow the Change Notification Policy caused prolonged detentions. This is so, he explains, because he challenges a 'decision to adopt [a] particular course of action [ ] properly made by that government's authorized decisionmakers,' and that is a sufficient basis to find municipal liability under § 1983. Pembaur v. City of Cincinnati, 475 U.S. 469, 481 (1986). . . . In this case, however, there is no concern that a policy is not at play. In fact, the Sheriff's Office acknowledged in its appellate brief that it 'does not challenge the district court's decision to analyze this release process as a policy or practice under Monell.' Moreover, the record supports Levy's narrative that by continuing to use the Transmittal Policy without any modification, defendants persistently pursued a course of action of selecting and continuing to use a case management system despite many concerns from stakeholders, numerous integration issues, and an inability to process updated release orders from the courts. Thus, if Levy's detention had occurred prior to the Sheriff's adoption of the Change Notification Policy, and he therefore challenged the use of the Transmittal Policy prior to the Change Notification Policy, then there may have been a question for the jury as to deliberate indifference. But Levy's detention occurred after the Sheriff's Office took steps to address the purported problems with the Transmittal Policy. Thus, as in Armstrong v. Squadrito, . . . we are faced with the question of whether a prison's use of a system with significant weaknesses can be considered deliberately indifferent, even after the prison has taken affirmative steps to address those weaknesses. . . . The logic of Armstrong applies with equal force here. Given the concerns regarding the Sheriff's ability to receive and act upon court orders processed through OMS, the Sheriff's Office created backup plans to address the limitations of its systems. First, it developed the release workflow process as part of the Transmittal Policy to ensure that the courts' orders were properly handled and effected. Second, and most importantly, the Sheriff's Office developed the Change Notification Policy, a modification of the release workflow process that required court officials to call or email the Sheriff with any modifications to prior court orders. As in Armstrong, these actions 'show[ed] an awareness on the part of jail officials that a danger exist[ed] and an attempt to avert an injury from that danger.' Consequently, without evidence that the Sheriff's Office knew or should have known that these safeguards would fail, or failed so often that they would obviously result in over-detentions, we cannot conclude that defendants acted with deliberate indifference to the risk of detainees' over-detention. Levy's singular experience does not support a finding to the contrary.") Spiegel v. McClintic, 916 F.3d 611, 617-18 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Spiegel argues that Wilmette's disorderly conduct ordinance constitutes the express policy of the City. The ordinance does not expressly criminalize public videography or photography. . . And, given the requirement that the person act in an 'unreasonable manner,' the ordinance does not raise facial constitutional concerns. . . Certainly, a person can photograph and videotape in a sufficiently disruptive way that it would be not unconstitutional to arrest the individual for disorderly conduct. Spiegel's claim is thus about the enforcement of the statute, not its facial constitutionality. . . Spiegel does not allege that Wilmette anticipated or intended that the ordinance would be enforced to chill lawful, expressive conduct like photography. . .We do not think Spiegel has plausibly alleged an express policy by Wilmette to enforce the disorderly conduct ordinance unconstitutionally. He merely alleges that officers received reports of a disturbance, responded to the reports, and advised an apparent provocateur to stop his surveillance. That's not enough. . . . As for the other bases for Monell liability, Spiegel wisely declines to argue that they exist. Two visits by officers do not constitute a widespread policy or practice. And the complaint makes no mention of any Wilmette officials who might have policymaking authority.")

Hoffman v. Knoebel, 894 F.3d 836, 843-44 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Trying another tack, the plaintiffs argue that under Monell v. Department of Social Services of the City of New York, 436 U.S. 658 (1978), Sheriff Rodden can be held accountable for the deprivation of their due process rights. To establish liability under Monell, the plaintiffs must show that an official government policy or custom 'is responsible for the deprivation of rights.'. . The Sheriff's Department had no involvement with the DTC's [Drug Treatment Court's] deficient hearings. But once they were detained, plaintiffs assert, the sheriff violated their due process rights by failing to adopt policies to bring their unlawful detentions to an end. The Clark County Jail, however, had several policies in place at the time that conceivably could have safeguarded detainees from wrongful detention. The jail sent a 'Weekly Inmate Roster' to the county court listing all the detainees at the jail who had come from the court. Those being wrongfully detained could have complained by using the jail's informal in-house mail system, through which the guards would walk unstamped mail over to court employees. (The jail and courthouse were housed in the same building.) This system was ad hoc and imperfect, but there is evidence in the record of several letters that made it to the appropriate court officials. Failing that, detainees could try the U.S. mail or file a grievance through the jail's internal grievance system, although there is scant evidence that these fallback policies were actually used. Relying primarily on Armstrong v. Squadrito, 152 F.3d 564 (7th Cir. 1998), the plaintiffs argue that these policies were constitutionally insufficient to protect against due process violations. In Armstrong, the plaintiff turned himself in on a warrant for what he thought would be a same-day bail hearing, but 'the sheriff's office misfiled [the plaintiff's] records and held him for 57 days despite his repeated inquiries.'. . We found that the sheriff was deliberately indifferent for relying solely on a 'will call' list of detainees set to go before a judge to prevent unlawful pre-trial detentions, and by refusing to accept grievances. . . The plaintiffs analogize Clark County's Weekly Inmate Roster to the Armstrong sheriff's 'will call' list, and argue that Clark County 'abdicated responsibility' by impermissibly shifting the burden to detainees to end their unlawful detentions. . .There are two problems with this theory. First, the plaintiffs in our case were held pursuant to a facially valid court order, whereas Armstrong was held on a warrant. 'In Indiana, the sheriff's department (which administers the jail) is ... the entity charged with taking those arrested on both civil warrants and criminal warrants to court.'. . The sheriff has no analogous duty when a detainee is held pursuant to a court order. In those cases, the statute requires only that the order be enforced. . . We have held that it is an 'entirely lawful policy' for a sheriff to hold detainees pursuant to a court order, 'unless the custodian knows that the judge refuses to make an independent decision or there is doubt about which person the judge ordered held.'. . Here, Judge Jacobi's orders came after a hearing, and nothing on the face of the orders indicated that those hearings were deficient. . . . Second, there is considerable evidence that, whatever the defects of the sheriff's policies, they were successful in getting some complaints to the DTC staff. In making their case against Knoebel and Seybold, the plaintiffs point to many letters that made it into DTC case files from the in-house mail system. This suggests that the sheriff's deputies were transmitting some letters from those in custody to the court. Even if the sheriff's informal policies were flawed, those inefficiencies did not cause the plaintiffs' extended incarcerations and fall short of the 'policy or custom of refusing to accept complaint forms' at issue in Armstrong. . . The Sheriff's Department followed court orders, as it was required to do, and directed detainees' complaints about those orders to the issuing court. These policies do not support a Monell claim. We can assume that the Clark County DTC's imposition of extended jail "sanctions" without proper hearings ran afoul of both state and federal law. None of the defendants before us, however, violated federal due process norms.")

Brown v. Chicago Bd. of Educ., 824 F.3d 713, 714-16 (7th Cir. 2016) ("The Chicago Board of Education has a written policy that forbids teachers from using racial epithets in front of students, no matter what the purpose. Lincoln Brown, a sixth grade teacher at Murray Language Academy, a Chicago Public School, caught his students passing a note in class. The note contained, among other things, music lyrics with the offensive word 'nigger.' Brown used this episode as an opportunity to conduct what appears to have been a well–intentioned but poorly executed discussion of why such words are hurtful and must not be used. The school principal, Gregory Mason, happened to observe the lesson. Brown was soon suspended and brought this suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against the Board and various school personnel. . . . In the case before us, Brown himself has emphasized that he was speaking as a teacher—that is to say, as an employee—not as a citizen. . . . The question remains whether the Garcetti rule applies in the same way to 'a case involving speech related to scholarship or teaching.'. . The Supreme Court had no need to address that issue, and so left it for another day. This is not our first opportunity, however, in which to confront that question. See Mayer v. Monroe Cnty. Cmty. Sch. Corp., 474 F.3d 477 (7th Cir. 2007). In Mayer, we concluded that a teacher's in–classroom speech is not the speech of a 'citizen' for First Amendment purposes. . . The core of the teacher's job is to speak in the classroom on the subjects she is expected to teach. This meant, we thought, that in–classroom instruction necessarily constitutes 'statements pursuant to [the teacher's] official duties.'. . Here, Brown gave his impromptu lesson on racial epithets in the course of his regular grammar lesson to a sixth grade class. His speech was therefore pursuant to his official duties. That he deviated from the official curriculum does not change this fact. . . .Brown argues that we should ignore Mayer and instead follow the Ninth Circuit by understanding the Supreme Court's reservation as a hint that Garcetti should not apply 'in the same manner to a case involving speech related to scholarship or teaching.' Garcetti, 547 U.S. at 425; see Demers v. Austin, 746 F.3d 402, 411 (9th Cir. 2014). But Demers addressed speech in a university setting, not a primary or secondary school. It relied on the long–standing recognition that academic freedom in a university is 'a special concern of the First Amendment' because of the university's unique role in participating in and fostering a marketplace of ideas. . . In fact, in the primary and secondary school context, the Ninth Circuit follows Mayer's approach. See Johnson v. Poway Unified Sch. Dist., 658 F.3d 954, 962–63 (9th Cir. 2011) (holding in–classroom instruction is pursuant to teacher's official duties and unprotected employee speech). So do the Third and Sixth Circuits. Evans–Marshall v. Bd. of Educ. of Tipp City Exempted Vill. Sch. Dist., 624 F.3d 332 (6th Cir. 2010); Edwards v. Cal. Univ. of Pa., 156 F.3d 488, 491 (3d Cir. 1998) (Alito, J.) (pre–Garcetti). Only the Fourth Circuit has adopted the position that Brown advocates, and it did so without analysis. Lee v. York Cnty. Sch. Div., 484 F.3d 687, 694 n.11 (4th Cir. 2007). We see no reason to depart here from our decision in Mayer. Brown made his comments as a teacher, not a citizen, and so his suspension does not implicate his First Amendment rights.")

King v. McCarty, 781 F.3d 889, 898, 900-01 (7th Cir. 2015) ("King has stated a viable claim that he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. He complains that he was degraded and humiliated by being transported in a see-through jumpsuit that left him exposed in front of other inmates as well as guards of both sexes. Such compelled and prolonged nudity seems to be, for present purposes, analogous to a lengthy strip-search. King asserts that there was no legitimate reason for this policy, a point he supports with specific factual allegations. Detainees arriving at the intake facility from other jails were not wearing similar garments, which at least tends to suggest that such clothing is not necessary for safe and secure penal transfers. Moreover, King was strip-searched before and after his transfer, and he remained shackled and under surveillance throughout. These facts tend to suggest there was no security reason for keeping transferees in a state of semi-nudity. Moreover, King's allegation that he was mocked when he objected to the jumpsuit is enough at this stage to raise at least the possibility that the policy was driven by a desire to humiliate or harass. . . Our decision in Johnson v. Phelan is not to the contrary. That case involved female guards monitoring male prisoners in their bathrooms, showers, and cells, where the inmates were sometimes by necessity in varying states of undress. The plaintiff objected to being exposed in front of guards of the opposite sex. We affirmed dismissal of the complaint, holding that the policy of cross-sex monitoring was not meant to cause pain or humiliation but instead served several valid institutional goals. One was to avoid Title VII or equal protection problems by removing a basis on which the jail would have to distinguish between its male and female employees. The plaintiff in Johnson did not claim he was forced to disrobe for no reason, only that he and other prisoners were monitored by female guards in the shower or toilet, when they would already be naked. King challenges a much different policy of compelled, continuing, and public undress without any obvious justification for the treatment. Like the plaintiff in Johnson, King objects to the presence of female guards, but that is not the basis of his complaint. He has described instead a broader constitutional problem, one that does not depend solely on the sex of the guards. (For this reason, the Title VII and equal protection concerns in Johnson for women employed as guards do not seem relevant to King's claims.) The unusual practice alleged here, if supported by the facts, looks more like an unjustified effort to humiliate prisoners than did the routine supervision of prisoners in Johnson. . . .We said broadly in Johnson v. Phelan that Hudson held that prisoners retain no right of privacy under the Fourth Amendment. . . We have also said in other cases, however, that the Fourth Amendment continues to protect some degree of privacy for convicted prisoners, at least when it comes to bodily searches, even if that protection is significantly lessened by punitive purposes of prison and the very real threats to safety and security of prisoners, correctional staff, and visitors. . . . We draw support for the line we draw from the Supreme Court's decision in Florence, where the issue was whether routine visual strip-searches of pretrial detainees, without individualized suspicion that a detainee was concealing contraband, were reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. The Court allowed such searches but made clear that its opinion did not address searches in which detainees would be touched as part of the searches. . . King, who was at the time of his transfer no longer a pretrial detainee but a convicted prisoner, alleges only a form of prolonged visual search in which he was not touched. The Supreme Court has adhered to the importance of the subjective element of Eighth Amendment claims by convicted prisoners like King, and the Court has never extended Fourth Amendment protection to a prisoner's claim like King's. In light of those facts, we do not believe we should expand the scope of Fourth Amendment protection to strip-searches of convicted prisoners to create an Eighth–Amendment–light standard in which the subjective purposes of prison officials would not be relevant. We conclude that King has failed to state a claim upon which relief may be granted under the Fourth Amendment.")

Compare King v. McCarty, 781 F.3d 889, 901-04 (7th Cir. 2015) (Hamilton, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("I respectfully disagree . . . with Part IV, which rejects King's Fourth Amendment claim on the pleadings and instructs the district court not to consider it on remand. I do not believe the boundary for the protections provided by the Fourth Amendment to a convicted prisoner is the surface of the prisoner's skin, as my colleagues suggest (though they leave open the possibility that no Fourth Amendment protection at all is available to a convicted prisoner). In fact the majority's Fourth Amendment reasoning goes further than the Supreme Court itself and other circuits have gone. The Fourth Amendment requires law enforcement officials to act in a reasonable manner when they subject people to searches of their person or property. It is well established that observation of a nude detainee is a search for purposes of the Fourth Amendment. . . To be sure, those who are detained in connection with proven or suspected criminal activity have sharply diminished expectations of privacy—none when it comes to their property and only very limited rights when it comes to their bodies. Moreover, courts give deference to the judgment of jail or prison staff in determining what searches are reasonable. . . But I do not believe that convicted prisoners have utterly no Fourth Amendment rights, at least when it comes to rights of bodily integrity. . . King's allegations describe an unusual form of prolonged search that he alleges was unreasonable. The Supreme Court has not held that prisoners have no Fourth Amendment right to bodily privacy. . . .Our court has on occasion used broad language that denies prisoners essentially any legitimate expectation of privacy, even with respect to their own bodies. See Johnson, 69 F.3d at 146 (reading Hudson v. Palmer as holding that prisoners do not retain any right of privacy under the Fourth Amendment); Green v. Berge, 354 F.3d 675, 679 (7th Cir.2004) (Easterbrook, J., concurring) (prisoners' privacy interests 'are extinguished by judgments placing them in custody'). But Johnson is the outlier on this issue. In other cases, both before and after Johnson, we have recognized that the Fourth Amendment continues to protect some very limited degree of privacy in prisons, at least when it comes to strip-searches, even if that protection is significantly lessened by the very real dangers of incarceration. [collecting cases] . . . . All of the other courts of appeals except the Federal Circuit (which would rarely if ever have occasion to consider the question) have said that prisoners retain some diminished degree of protection against unreasonable bodily searches and/or have allowed such challenges to go forward. As best I can tell, no other circuit applies the categorical rule that my colleagues apply, finding no Fourth Amendment protection against strip-searches or nudity. [collecting cases] With only the pleadings before us on this claim, I believe it is a mistake to attempt now to draw precise boundaries under the Fourth Amendment. In Florence the Supreme Court took care to limit its decision and to leave room for future modification and exceptions. . . We should exercise similar caution here. At this preliminary stage of this case, we should recognize that the Fourth Amendment's focus on objective reasonableness may preserve some outer limit on the actions of even well-meaning prison administrators where such bodily searches are involved, while it also requires courts to give substantial—but not complete—deference to the warden's judgment. The uncertain scope of the law might well allow individual defendants to rely on qualified immunity to avoid damages liability, of course, but Armstrong has also asserted a practice or policy claim against the sheriff in his official capacity under Monell v. Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658, 98 S.Ct. 2018, 56 L.Ed.2d 611 (1978). We should allow further factual development on this claim in the district court on remand.")

Campbell v. Miller, 499 F.3d 711, 720 (7th Cir. 2007) ("There is nothing in this record indicating that the decision to strip-search Campbell in public was influenced in any way by the City's policy or practice. That decision appears to have been made by Officers Miller and Lamle alone, which precludes finding the City liable under § 1983.")

Nicodemus v. City of South Bend, No. 3:23CV744 DRL, 2024 WL 139248, at *8 (N.D. Ind. Jan. 12, 2024) ("The public has a First Amendment right to record police activity—a critically important right. Law enforcement officers have a right to perform their lawful duties unimpeded. Indiana's buffer law has many constitutional applications within its plainly legitimate sweep. It never once permits an officer to tell a reporter or citizen-journalist to leave altogether or to cease recording police activity. The law is directed toward encroachment on an officer's lawful duties within 25 feet. It doesn't target speech. It penalizes approaching a lawfully-engaged officer (after an order), not recording one. And at 25 feet, in measure small steps from an officer's work, this law has only an incidental effect on the public's First Amendment right to capture audio and video and otherwise to scrutinize police conduct. The court denies a permanent injunction because Indiana's buffer law is not unconstitutional by virtue of being facially overbroad. A case might be different if an officer enforces this law unconstitutionally in a particular scenario, but the court is not deciding such a case today.")

Lopez v. Vidljinovic, No. 1:12-CV-5751, 2016 WL 4429637, at *2-3 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 22, 2016) ("Here, Lopez does not assert that a person with final policymaking authority caused his alleged constitutional injury. The Court therefore must determine whether Lopez's injuries can be reasonably ascribed to either an explicit policy or an established custom or practice. . . There are actually two varieties of 'express policy' claims under Monell. The first variation applies 'where a policy explicitly violates a constitutional right when enforced.'. . Under this type of claim, one application of the offensive policy resulting in a constitutional violation is sufficient to establish municipal liability. . . A second way of attacking an 'express policy' is to object to 'omissions in the policy.'. . To prevail under this variation of the express policy theory, a plaintiff must adduce 'more evidence than a single incident' of unconstitutional behavior. . .In his response to the City's motion for summary judgment, Lopez claims four explicit policies were the cause of his alleged constitutional injury: (1) Municipal Code Sec. 4-68-110; (2) Chicago EMS Policies and Procedures; (3) CPD Special Order S03-08; and (4) CPD Special Order S02-01-04. . . However, Lopez never identifies specific language in any of these polices which is 'explicitly' violative of a person's constitutional rights when applied. Accordingly, the Court analyzes his claims under the 'second' variation of the 'express policy' test. . .Given the lack of facially suspect language in this case, Lopez was obligated to present evidence suggesting that the regulations at issue gave rise to a substantial number of impermissible applications. . . Lopez has failed to meet his burden on this score. He has not provided any evidence of similar incidents of forced medical care resulting from the use of a taser; in fact, he has not adduced any evidence of similar incidents resulting from compliance with these policies at all. Accordingly, Lopez may not pursue a Monell claim against the City on an 'express policy' theory.")

Hall v. City of Chicago, No. 12 C 6834, 2012 WL 6727511, *3, *4 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 28, 2012) ("S04–13–09 provides two distinct categories in which law enforcement officers are permitted or required to complete Contact Information Cards. The first circumstance is a 'citizen encounter.'. . S04–13–09 defines a citizen encounter as a 'voluntary interaction between a sworn member and a citizen that does not involve any suspicion of criminal activity.'. . S04–13–09 instructs that a citizen encounter does not require officers to complete a Contact Information Card, but if the officer determines that the completion of a card will serve 'a useful police purpose,' then the officer has the discretion to do so. . . The second circumstance that S04–13–09 pertains to is an investigatory street stop. S04–13–09 defines an investigatory street stop as '[a] contact in which the sworn member has articulable reasonable suspicion that the person is committing, is about to commit, or has committed a crime; consequently, the sworn member has momentarily restricted the person's freedom of movement. The contact should last only as long as necessary to determine if probable cause to arrest exists.'. . If an investigatory street stop does not result in an arrest, an officer is required to complete a Contact Information Card to record the encounter. . . If an investigatory street stop does result in an arrest, an officer is not required to complete a Contact Information Card, as the circumstances of the stop and the arrest will be documented in the officer's arrest report. (In response to the City's Motion to Dismiss, Plaintiffs state that they are only challenging the 'citizen encounters' in S04–13–09, not investigatory street stops.) . . . . The City points out that as an express policy, S04–13–09 cannot cause Plaintiffs' alleged Fourth Amendment violations because S04–13–09 does not authorize nor direct officers to detain an individual without reasonable suspicion. The Court agrees and as such, finds that Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment Monell claim grounded in an express policy theory fails.")

Bladdick v. Pour, No. 09-cv-330-WDS, 2010 WL 5088815, at *6-*8 (S.D. Ill. Dec. 8, 2010) ("At the outset, the Court notes that a determination that Pour was not acting under the color of state law is not dispositive of the municipal liability claim against the Board. . . The Board itself is the state actor 'and its action in maintaining the alleged policy at issue supplies the "color of law" requirement under § 1983.' Gibson, 910 F.2d at 1519. . . . Plaintiff contends that the Board's policy of allowing officers, whether on or off duty, to use their own discretion as to whether or not to carry their service weapons without any further guidance is the state action that deprived him of his constitutional right to be free from unreasonable seizure. The plaintiff has completely failed to put forth any evidence that the Board's policies have caused a constitutional deprivation. A policy which leaves to the discretion of the individual officer whether or not to carry his firearm while off-duty, or while crossing state lines does not, on its face, cause unreasonable seizures of persons in violation of their constitutional rights. Plaintiff wrongly alleges that the carrying of firearms is completely in the officer's discretion, even in situations which present a risk of intoxication or other situations where an officer's judgment may be impaired, creating the impression with officers that acts, such as Pour's in shooting plaintiff, would be tolerated. The exact opposite has been shown by the Board. The Board has set forth the policies and procedures of the police department, which establish guidelines concerning the carrying and use of firearms, including procedures for complying with LEOSA which does not authorize the carrying of a concealed firearm across state lines, or while under the influence of alcohol or any other intoxicating or hallucinating substance. . . . The policies specifically prohibit the use of a firearm while intoxicated, and provide for sanctions and other discipline should the policies not be followed. To the extent that the plaintiff's allegations can be construed to include an allegation of failure to train, or deliberate indifference on the part of the Board, plaintiff's allegations completely fail to meet the standard. Plaintiff's entire claim rests on this one incident in which he was shot by an off-duty officer. Plaintiff has not set forth any facts that show that a need for more training was obvious and likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, nor did he show a repeated pattern of constitutional violations that would make the need for more training obvious to the Board.")

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Williams v. City of Sherwood, 947 F.3d 1107, 1110 (8th Cir. 2020) ("Another difficulty with Williams's claims is that she merely speculates vaguely and conclusorily that the city council and mayor had developed unconstitutional policies. The only possible marker of a municipal policy that Williams identifies in her complaint is a city ordinance that created a position at the judge's request to help with serving the warrants associated with the hot-check court and thereby help bring in revenue. But such an ordinance demonstrates merely that events occurring in the court 'parallel[ed] or appears entangled with the desires of the municipality,'. . or that the city knew of and approved of the judge's conduct. . . Critically, at no point does Williams identify an ordinance or other municipal action whereby the city directs someone to commit an act that is a constitutional violation or, with deliberate indifference to known or obvious consequences, directs someone to take an action that leads to a violation of constitutional rights. . . Williams has not alleged that city policymakers deliberately set itself on a course that would lead to her constitutional rights being violated. . . Instead, Williams relies on conclusory assertions that the city council and mayor somehow created some unspoken policy and tasked the judge with carrying it out. But as another circuit recently explained in a case containing similar conclusory allegations, 'any connection between the judicial acts and the [city officials] is too chimerical to be maintained.' McCullough v. Finley, 907 F.3d 1324, 1335 (11th Cir. 2018).")

Moyle v. Anderson, 571 F.3d 814, 818 (8th Cir. 2009) ("The undisputed facts in this case do not resemble those confronted by the Fifth Circuit in Janes. The county's booking policy did not sanction the placement of violent inmates with nonviolent inmates in the AIU: its policy was that an incoming inmate should be classified as high or low risk after completion of an intake interview. Those designated as high risk were then housed in a separate area of the jail. The county thus intended to segregate violent inmates from nonviolent inmates, and its policy did not prohibit the booking officer from seeking additional information about an inmate beyond that provided by the transferring institution. A policy which does not 'affirmatively sanction' unconstitutional action, and which instead relies on the discretion of the municipality's employees, is not an unconstitutional policy.")

Szabla v. City of Brooklyn Park, 486 F.3d 385, 395, 396 (8th Cir. 2007) (en banc)("[A] claim for municipal liability premised on actions taken pursuant to an official municipal policy must demonstrate that the policy itself is unconstitutional")

Ward v. Olson, 939 F.Supp.2d 956, 963, 964 (D. Minn. 2013) ("Ward claims that the City of Bloomington is liable under Monell because its use-of-force policy permits officers to discharge tasers in drive-stun mode against passively-resisting subjects. . . In Schumacher v. Halverson, 467 F.Supp.2d 939 (D.Minn.2006), however, the court explained that the use of a taser in drive-stun mode against a passively resisting subject was 'reasonable and in accord with established constitutional principles.'. . In an attempt to distinguish Schumacher, Ward argues that the case is inapposite because the municipality in question had an unwritten custom regarding taser use, not a formal policy. . . Such an argument is unavailing, however, as this fact was not relevant to the determination in Schumacher that the officer did not use excessive force. . . Therefore, the court determines that the use of a taser in drive-stun mode against a passively-resistant subject does not result in per se excessive force, and summary judgment on the Monell claim is warranted.")

Rattray v. Woodbury Cnty., Iowa, 908 F. Supp. 2d 976, 998-1000 (N.D. Iowa 2012) ("As in Florence, jail officials in this case 'have a significant interest in conducting a thorough search as a standard part of the intake process,' in order to detect lice or contagious infections, wounds or other injuries, gang affiliation, and contraband, including drugs and weapons, but also including unauthorized items that might become objects of trade or that could be used as weapons or to make weapons. . . Also, much as in Florence, I reject the plaintiffs' argument that detainees who have been arrested only on serious misdemeanor or higher offenses and who will not be put into 'general population' per se should be exempt from a strip search unless they give officers a particular reason to suspect them of hiding contraband. . . As the Court concluded in Florence, it was reasonable for jail officials to conclude that such an exemption would be 'unworkable,' that 'the seriousness of the offense is a poor predictor of who has contraband,' and 'that it would be difficult in practice to determine whether individual detainees fall within the proposed exemption.'. .What makes this so here is the now undisputed (or undisputable), authenticated evidence from the County Jail's 'booking logs' that even detainees initially held alone in separate temporary holding cells, away from the jail's 'general population,' (1) may nevertheless be 'doubled up' in light of the limited number of temporary holding cells—which undisputedly occurred in Lambert's case—for example, because of the varying volume of arrests and the limited number of temporary holding cells, and (2) may be shackled with other detainees for transportation to court—which undisputedly occurred in Rattray's and Mathes's cases—even before the expiration of their twenty-four hour exclusion from 'general population.' These circumstances are reasonably likely to involve the 'substantial' contact with other detainees that concerned the Court in Florence. . . Although the plaintiffs complain that the County is relying only on 'potential' contact with other detainees, it is also reasonable to conclude that it is 'unworkable[]' . . . to use a 'wait and see' approach to see if detainees actually have contact with others before strip searching them. Such a 'wait and see' approach would require jail officials to strip search detainees only when detainees actually had to be 'doubled up' or only when detainees actually had to be shackled with others for transportation to court. Thus, such a 'wait and see' procedure would impose the extra burden of conducting strip searches of detainees 'doubled up' at precisely the time when the influx of arrestees would already be complicating jail intake procedures, and the strip search of detainees before shackling them together would complicate procedures at precisely the time when several detainees would have to be managed for transportation to court. It also would not prevent detainees from secreting contraband in temporary holding cells during the time that they were alone in those cells. Finally, such a "wait and see" procedure would offer considerably less safety to jail officers, who might have numerous contacts with a detainee who has never been strip searched and, consequently, might be hiding a weapon or something that could be used as a weapon, or who could expose them to infectious disease, and it might require them to intervene in an altercation between detainees not recognized as members of rival gangs. . . Where there is a realistic potential that detainees will have substantial contact with other detainees, even if they are not put into the jail's 'general population' during the first twenty-four hours of detention, requiring reasonable suspicion before searching all detainees at the County Jail arrested on serious misdemeanor charges or higher 'would limit the intrusion on the privacy of some detainees but at the risk of increased danger to everyone in the facility, including the less serious offenders themselves.'. . The fact that all three of the plaintiffs had contact with other detainees, either in their holding cells or when they were transported to court, demonstrates that the potential for such contact here was realistic. Moreover, it is reasonable to assume that not all of the detainees shackled together for their initial court appearance will be released—most likely because some of them will be unable to post bond immediately. Therefore, some of them may be returned to the jail and placed in 'general population.'The plaintiffs have failed to generate a genuine issue of material fact that strip-searching them without reasonable suspicion was an exaggerated response to the situation. . . Instead, they are trying to pound the square peg of their circumstances into the uncertainly defined, but nevertheless roundish—or perhaps oval or elliptical—hole of the Florence exception. They have generated no evidence that the jail officials reasonably could have kept all detainees separately detained and separately transported at all times during their detention and first trip to court; the record evidence is to the contrary. . .Thus, they have failed to generate genuine issues of material fact that their cases fall within the as-yet not fully defined exception, based on factual circumstances, to the general rule of Florence that reasonable suspicion is not required to strip search detainees. The strip search of the plaintiffs without reasonable suspicion, to the extent that such a search did not involve touching by an inspecting officer, 'struck a reasonable balance between inmate privacy and the needs of the institutions' and, consequently, did not, as a matter of law, violate the Fourth Amendment. . . The County is entitled to summary judgment on each plaintiff's 'no reasonable suspicion' strip-search claim.")

NINTH CIRCUIT

Verdun v. City of San Diego, 51 F.4th 1033, 1035, 1046 (9th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 73 (2023) ("We are asked to decide whether the longstanding practice of chalking tires for parking enforcement purposes violates the Fourth Amendment. It does not. Even assuming the temporary dusting of chalk on a tire constitutes a Fourth Amendment 'search,' it falls within the administrative search exception to the warrant requirement. Complementing a broader program of traffic control, tire chalking is reasonable in its scope and manner of execution. It is not used for general crime control purposes. And its intrusion on personal liberty is de minimis at most. We hold that municipalities are not required to obtain warrants before chalking tires as part of enforcing time limits on city parking spots. We affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to the City of San Diego. . . . [W]e respectfully part ways with the Sixth Circuit's decision in Taylor v. City of Saginaw, 11 F.4th 483, 488–89 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Taylor II"), which held that tire chalking was not subject to the administrative search exception (but which expressed no opinion on whether chalking might be subject to some other exception to the warrant requirement). While we are reluctant to create a possible circuit split, we do not find Taylor II's analysis persuasive.")

Bull v. City and County of San Francisco, 595 F.3d 964, 980, 981 (9th Cir. 2010) (en banc) ("We agree with the reasoning of the Eleventh Circuit that the rights of arrestees placed in custodial housing with the general jail population 'are not violated by a policy or practice of strip searching each one of them as part of the booking process, provided that the searches are no more intrusive on privacy interests than those upheld in the Bell case,' and the searches are 'not conducted in an abusive manner.' Powell, 541 F.3d at 1314; cf. Archuleta v. Wagner, 523 F.3d 1278, 1284 (10th Cir.2008) (upholding searches of arrestees intermingled with general population of a corrections facility, but not those awaiting bail, and stating that when an arrestee is kept in a holding cell the "obvious security concerns inherent in a situation where the detainee will be placed in the general prison population are simply not apparent"). We therefore overrule our own panel opinions in Thompson and Giles. We do not, however, disturb our prior opinions considering searches of arrestees who were not classified for housing in the general jail or prison population. . . The constitutionality of searches of arrestees at the place of arrest, searches at the stationhouse prior to booking, and searches pursuant to an evidentiary investigation must be analyzed under different principles than those at issue today. . . . In light of governing Supreme Court precedent, and given the circumstances presented here, we conclude that San Francisco's policy requiring strip searches of all arrestees classified for custodial housing in the general population was facially reasonable under the Fourth Amendment, notwithstanding the lack of individualized reasonable suspicion as to the individuals searched. Because the policy did not violate plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights, we reverse the district court's denial of Sheriff Hennessey's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, and in doing so necessarily reverse the district court's grant of plaintiffs' motion for partial summary judgment as to Fourth Amendment liability.").

Johannes v. Alameda County Sheriff Dept., No. 06-16739, 2008 WL 740305 (9th Cir. Mar. 18, 2008) ((upholding blanket strip search policy of jail "providing for visual strip searches of 'inmates who have been ... outside of the secured facility ... upon return to the facility or housing unit.'")

TENTH CIRCUIT

Tucker v. City of Oklahoma City, No. CIV–11–922–D, 2013 WL 5303730, *16, *17 (W.D. Okla. Sept. 20, 2013) ("On its face, the written policy is fully consistent with Casey and Cavanaugh. The use of a taser was permitted only for violent or dangerous persons in situations where it was necessary to subdue the person, the person was actively resisting the officer, or the officer perceived a credible threat. Plaintiff's reliance on Chief Citty's deposition testimony is similarly unavailing. Chief Citty testified that the use of a taser on Plaintiff under the circumstances stated in the officer's reports was justified. Unlike Plaintiff's version of events, the arresting officers stated that Plaintiff was actively resisting efforts to handcuff him, that three officers used other control techniques first without success, and that Officer Bemo did a warning arc-display before employing his taser on Plaintiff. While these facts are disputed in this case, Chief Citty's testimony assumed them to be true. Further, the change of policy to which Chief Citty testified was that the current OCPD policy prohibits the use of a taser 'unless a person is actively aggressive towards the officer' rather than simply resisting arrest and failing to comply. . . This change, and other modifications of the policy, were based on company recommendations, nationwide studies, court rulings, and developments in best practices indicating that a taser should not be used solely for compliance. . . The changes were not based on a particular court ruling or case. . . They were not compelled by Casey or Cavanaugh, in which a taser was used under circumstances that did not involve an effort to control a noncompliant subject. Regarding OCPD's allegedly unconstitutional taser policy, Plaintiff's argument is not that the policy in effect in 2010 directed officers to use tasers under circumstances where doing so would be unconstitutional but, instead, that the policy failed to limit officers' discretion in determining when to use a taser. However, the fact that OCPD gave its officers discretion to determine if they could lawfully use a taser on a person who was resisting efforts to handcuff him does not suggest that its policy was unconstitutional. Under binding case law, '"discretion in the exercise of particular functions does not, without more, give rise to municipal liability based on an exercise of that discretion."' Novitsky v. City of Aurora, 491 F.3d 1244, 1260 (10th Cir.2007) (quoting Pembaur v. City of Cincinnati, 475 U.S. 469, 482 (1986)). In Novitsky, the court of appeals found no proof of an unconstitutional policy regarding police officers' use of a 'twist lock' procedure to remove a person from a vehicle based solely on the fact that the police department's policy allowed officers to determine when circumstances justified the use of the procedure. Here, as in Novitsky, Plaintiff has not presented any more than a policy of discretion in the exercise of particular functions. Accordingly, like the court of appeals in Novitsky the Court finds that '[n]o reasonable jury could infer the existence of an unconstitutional policy' based on the facts and evidence presented by Plaintiff.")

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

White v. Berger, No. 16-11606, 2017 WL 4082876 (11th Cir. Sept. 15, 2017) (not reported) ("White's argument is that the County's construction of the isolation chambers itself was an official government policy that caused a violation of White's constitutional rights. The problem with White's argument is that—even assuming the decision to construct the isolation chambers was made by an individual with final policymaking authority—the complaint does not suffice to meet the strict causation standard applicable in municipal liability case . . . .Here, mere construction of the isolation units is insufficient to support a claim of municipal liability. Legitimate law enforcement functions support virtually all of the cells' features. The presence of a camera in the cells and the need for constant lighting, for example, can be important for the prison to monitor particularly dangerous inmates at all hours. . . Although we have concerns about White's allegations, which we must take as true at this stage of the proceedings, that his cell was being broadcast to a public area of the prison, the complaint contains no facts suggesting that those broadcasts were a function of the prison's construction. Liberally construing White's pleadings, then, the crux of his claims is that these conditions were gratuitously imposed upon him even though he posed none of the risks the isolation units might have been designed to contain and that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to the harmful effects isolation had on him. As alleged, the 'moving force' behind the alleged constitutional deprivation was not the construction of the isolation cells—the features of which may well have had legitimate purposes—but was instead the decision of certain individuals to use the isolation cells to inflict extreme and unnecessary punishment on White. . .The district court therefore properly dismissed White's claims against Seminole County.")

Luke v. Brown, No. 1:05-CV-264-CAP, 2007 WL 4730648, at 14-16 (N.D.Ga. Feb. 23, 2007) ("[T]he court concludes that DeKalb County's policy of training its officers to shoot twice in rapid succession when confronted with a suspect who is wielding an edged weapon in a threatening manner and the suspect is approaching the officer at a distance of 21 feet or less from the officer is not facially unconstitutional. . . . Luke has cited no binding precedent establishing that the firing of a second shot immediately after the first shot renders the second shot unconstitutional under the circumstances described in DeKalb County's policy. . . . In support of her deliberate indifference argument, Luke has presented expert testimony from Tate that the generally accepted standard in contemporary law enforcement is for police departments to train officers to 'Evaluate and Shoot, Evaluate and Shoot.'. . Luke contends that the lack of evaluation between shots constituted deliberate indifference by DeKalb County. However, 'an expert's conclusory testimony does not control this court's legal analysis of whether any need to train and/or supervise was obvious enough to trigger municipal liability without any evidence of prior incidents putting the municipality on notice of that need.'. . Likewise, Luke's presentation of an expert's conclusory testimony cannot control the court's legal analysis of whether the alleged inadequacies of DeKalb County's policy was obvious enough to trigger municipal liability. The Eleventh Circuit has repeatedly held 'that without notice of a need to train or supervise in a particular area, a municipality is not liable as a matter of law for any failure to train or supervise.'. . Although there is clearly a need to train officers with respect to the constitutional limitations regarding the use of deadly force, . . . it is undisputed that DeKalb County does provide training with respect to the use of deadly force. Luke, moreover, has failed to present any evidence that DeKalb County's decision to train its officers to use the double-tap method when a suspect is advancing on them from a distance of 21 feet or less wielding a knife in a threatening manner has led to prior constitutional violations or illegal use of excessive force. Aside from Bates' experience, Luke presented no evidence of a single prior incident in which a DeKalb County police officer caused an injury by excessive force because of the double-tap method. Although Bates' circumstances are unfortunate, Luke has failed to present any evidence from which the jury could find that the DeKalb County created a municipal policy with deliberate indifference as to Luke's constitutional rights. For this reason, DeKalb County is entitled to summary judgment on Luke's § 1983 claim.")

Ott v. City of Mobile, 169 F. Supp.2d 1301, 1313 (S.D. Ala. 2001) ("The City has a formal policy requiring off duty officers to carry a firearm. . . The City has another formal policy prohibiting off duty officers subject to department recall or mobilization from consuming alcohol to an extent that would render them incapable of proper performance if called to duty. . . The plaintiffs argue that these policies allow off duty police officers to drink and require them to carry firearms while doing so. The plaintiffs further argue that these policies were the 'moving force' behind Gamble's allegedly unconstitutional actions. . . . The plaintiffs have not asserted, much less established, that the City's firearms and alcohol policies, separately or in tandem, are themselves unconstitutional.")

2. Entity Liability for Facially Neutral Policy Adopted With Impermissible Motive

In Scott-Harris v. City of Fall River, 134 F.3d 427 (1st Cir.1997), cert. denied, 118 S.Ct. 1184 (1998), the First Circuit addressed the question of "[h]ow many municipal legislators (or, put another way, what percentage of the legislative body) must be spurred by a constitutionally impermissible motive before the municipality itself may be held liable under section 1983 for the adoption of a facially neutral policy or ordinance?" Id. at 437. The court "eschew[ed] for the time being a bright-line rule." Id. at 438.

> Rather, we assume for argument's sake (but do not decide) that in a sufficiently compelling case the requirement that the plaintiff prove bad motive on the part of a majority of the members of the legislative body might be relaxed and a proxy accepted instead. Nevertheless, any such relaxation would be contingent on the plaintiff mustering evidence of both (a) bad motive on the part of at least a significant bloc of legislators, and (b) circumstances suggesting the probable complicity of others. . . . We do not think it is a coincidence that in every analogous > case in which municipal liability has been imposed on evidence implicating less than a majority of a legislative body, substantial circumstantial evidence existed from which the requisite discriminatory animus could be inferred. . . . In this case no such evidence exists. Nothing suggests the City Council deviated from its standard protocol when it received and enacted the ordinance that abolished the plaintiff's job. Nothing suggests that the vote took place in an atmosphere permeated by widespread constituent pressure. Putting speculation and surmise to one side, it simply cannot be inferred that more than two of the council members who voted to abolish the plaintiff's position did so to punish her for protected speech.

Id. at 438, 439.

McCarthy v. City of Cordele, Georgia, 111 F.4th 1141, 1146-47 (11th Cir. 2024) ("[W]hen the final policymaker for a challenged employment decision was a multimember body, the plaintiff must allege that 'a majority' of the members voted in favor of the decision 'for an unconstitutional reason.' Matthews v. Columbia County, 294 F.3d 1294, 1295 (11th Cir. 2002). When policymaking authority rests with a collegial body 'as an entity,' allegations that fewer than a 'majority' of the members harbored unconstitutional motives are 'insufficient to impute an unconstitutional motive' to the entity 'as a whole.'. .The City argues, and the district court ruled, that McCarthy failed to allege that a majority of the commissioners voted to fire him because of his race. The City does not dispute that McCarthy plausibly alleged that both Deriso and Reeves had racially discriminatory motives. But because Deriso did not vote, the City argues that McCarthy plausibly alleged only that one of the commissioners who voted to fire him was motivated by racial animus. And an 'unconstitutional motive on the part of one member of a three-member majority is insufficient to impute an unconstitutional motive to the Commission as a whole.'. . We disagree with the City. The allegations in McCarthy's complaint, viewed in his favor, permit the reasonable inference that the commissioners who voted to fire him did so because of his race. McCarthy alleged that Deriso 'led, directed, and encouraged' his fellow commissioners to fire McCarthy and replace him 'with an African American candidate'; that, even before the new commissioners took office, Deriso and Reeves had garnered enough support for their discriminatory plan to tell McCarthy that he was being replaced with a black woman; that, immediately upon entering office, a majority of the commissioners voted to fire McCarthy, even though he was an exemplary employee and the former Commission had renewed his contract one month earlier; that the Commission hired a black woman to replace McCarthy, as Deriso and Reeves had promised; and that all the commissioners who voted to fire McCarthy were black[.] . . Taken together, these allegations 'nudge[ ]' McCarthy's race-discrimination claims 'across the line from conceivable to plausible.'. .McCarthy plausibly alleged that the Commission discriminated against him because he is white, and the district court erred by dismissing his claims of racial discrimination against the City. Federal law is no more tolerant of discrimination against whites than it is discrimination against members of any other race.")

Cine SK8, Inc. v. Town of Henrietta, 507 F.3d 778, 785, 786 (2nd Cir. 2007) ("[O]ur court, unlike the Eleventh Circuit, has never adopted the rule that a plaintiff must demonstrate that a majority of a public body acted with racial animus or in an otherwise unconstitutional manner in order for that plaintiff to hold the municipality liable for constitutional violations. Rather, we have held only that if a defendant public body (or its members) proves that, despite the unconstitutional actions of a minority, a majority based their actions on legitimate grounds, it, or its individual members, may prevail. . . There is an obvious difference between the two standards − a difference that, in our view, is critical given the ease with which public officials motivated by racial animus or other unconstitutional purposes can hide their true intentions and thereby prevent injured parties from obtaining the redress to which they are entitled. As the First Circuit aptly explained, 'because discriminatory animus is insidious and a clever pretext can be hard to unmask ... it may be overly mechanistic to hold [a plaintiff] to strict proof of the subjective intentions of a numerical majority of council members.' Scott-Harris v. City of Fall River, 134 F .3d 427, 438 (1st Cir.1997), rev'd on other grounds sub nom. Bogan v. Scott-Harris , 523 U.S. 44 (1998) . . . And, as we have acknowledged in other contexts that involve groups of people combining to make an allegedly discriminatory decision, it is possible that, even if a majority of the individuals that participate in the decision lack unconstitutional motives, the unconstitutional intentions of a minority of those involved can taint the ultimate outcome. . . . Given these considerations, we believe that in appropriate circumstances a plaintiff seeking to hold a municipality or public officials liable based on the actions of a public body may prevail − and, at the very least, should survive summary judgment − even when the plaintiff has not presented evidence that a majority of the individual members of that body acted with unconstitutional motives. In our view, even if a plaintiff does not demonstrate directly that a majority of a public body acted with unconstitutional motives, he should be permitted to take his case to trial if he proffers evidence that strongly indicates that discrimination was a significant reason for a public body's actions and the defendant body, or its members, fails to counter that evidence with its own clear evidence that a majority acted with permissible motives. . . . We need not definitively resolve this issue here, however, because plaintiffs, in fact, did offer evidence that at least raises a genuine issue of fact as to whether a majority of the Board acted with racial animus in voting to amend the special use permit.").

Scarbrough v. Morgan County Bd. of Educ., 470 F.3d 250, 261-63 (6th Cir. 2006) ("In this case, Scarbrough has offered sufficient evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Lively, Strand and Spurling were motivated by animus against homosexuals. . . . .On its face, however, the Board's decision to hire Freels over Scarbrough evidences no improper motivation; thus, in order to hold the Board liable Scarbrough must prove that the Board acted out of a constitutionally impermissible motive. . . The district court held that the Board could not be held liable under § 1983 because Scarbrough failed to prove that a majority of the Board acted with an improper motive in selecting Freels over him. . . . Circuits are split on how to determine if a board, rather than its members, acts with improper motive. The Second, Third, and Ninth Circuits have implied that a board is liable for actions that it would not have taken 'but for' members acting with improper motive. . . Thus, where improperly motivated members supply the deciding margin, the board itself is liable. We decline to follow the approach suggested by Scarbrough from Scott-Harris v. City of Fall River, 134 F.3d 427, 437 (1st Cir.1997), rev'd on other grounds sub nom. Bogan v. Scott-Harris, 523 U.S. 44 (1998). In that case, board liability only existed where the plaintiff established both: '(a) bad motive on the part of at least a significant block of legislators, and (b) circumstances suggesting the probable complicity of others.' Id. That approach would be difficult to apply, because it leaves many questions unanswered. Among the most important of these is what constitutes a 'significant bloc of legislators' or 'circumstances suggesting the probable complicity of others.' The 'but for' approach from the Second, Third and Ninth Circuit cases is more in accord with the decision from Mt. Healthy. In that case, the Court set up a burden-shifting regime in which a key question was whether a board would have acted the same way, absent improper motive. Applying the 'but for' approach here, Scarbrough has submitted enough evidence to hold the Board itself liable. He has submitted evidence showing Lively, Strand and Spurling voted with improper motivation. The Board would not have taken the action it did were it not for their votes. Thus, the Board is not entitled to summary judgment on this issue.").

Laverdure v. County of Montgomery, 324 F.3d 123, 125 (3d Cir. 2003) ("It is undisputed that only a majority of the three-member Board is authorized to establish policy on behalf of the County. . . Therefore, whatever the contents of Marino's statements, because he was only one member of the Board, those comments do not constitute County policy.")

Dixon v. Burke County, Georgia, 303 F.3d 1271, 1276 (11th Cir. 2002) ("For purposes of summary judgment, the District Court assumed that the Grand Jury was a final policymaker for Burke County but found no liability on the facts presented. We are constrained to agree. As the District Court cogently recognized, there has not been a sufficient showing that any member of the Grand Jury, other than Perry, may have been improperly motivated by gender considerations, as opposed to the substantive merits of the applicants. A jury would have to resort to pure speculation as to why the other grand jurors acted as they did. As noted above, we see nothing in the record to indicate that Perry had any coercive effect on those that voted. In sum, no municipal liability can attach for one tainted vote out of twelve cast for Chandler.' [footnote omitted])

Matthews v. Columbia County, 294 F.3d 1294, 1297, 1298 (11th Cir.2002) ("Because policymaking authority rests with the Commission as an entity, the County can be subject to liability only if the Commission itself acted with an unconstitutional motive. An unconstitutional motive on the part of one member of a three-member majority is insufficient to impute an unconstitutional motive to the Commission as a whole. . . . That Titus and Ford may have known about the unconstitutional basis of Reynolds's selection and vote or that Reynolds may have affected Titus and Ford's votes by his influence is not enough to show that they ratified the unlawful basis by also voting for the RIF [reduction in force]. . . . A well-intentioned lawmaker who votes for the legislation − even when he votes in the knowledge that others are voting for it for an unconstitutional reason and even when his unconstitutionally motivated colleague influences his vote − does not automatically ratify or endorse the unconstitutional motive.")

Jamieson v. Poughkeepsie City School District, 195 F. Supp.2d 457, 474, 475 (S.D.N.Y. 2002) ("In voting on the renewal of plaintiff's contract, the School Board, as a whole, had the sole decisionmaking authority. Thus, Samselski is a decisionmaker even though she is only one of five Board members who voted on the renewal of plaintiff's contract. Moreover, the impermissible bias of a single individual can infect the entire group of collective decisionmakers. . . . Defendant Samselski was a policymaker as a member of the Board, and the Board possessed final authority over the Superintendent's employment contract. If Samselski is found by a trier of fact to have exercised the requisite amount of authority to influence the policy of the Board with respect to plaintiff's contract renewal, then she would be a policymaker, and the District could be found liable by a reasonable jury.")

Esperanza Peace and Justice Center v. City of San Antonio, No. SA-98-CA-0696-O, 2001 WL 685795, at *15 (W.D.Tex. May 15, 2001) (not reported) (discussing different approaches of various courts and noting "[t]he argument against the Scott-Harris approach is that holding a municipality liable for the discriminatory motivations of a minority of its council does not meet the 'official policy' requirement articulated by the Supreme Court in Monell. On the other hand, few legislators will admit to unconstitutional motivations behind their vote. It thus becomes an exceedingly difficult and perilous enterprise to establish the intent of a lone legislator. And when the legislative body consists of numerous legislators, each with his or her own myriad and conflicting motivations, the plaintiff's burden is multiplied, if not impossible. . . . It is precisely because the plaintiff's burden of proof is so onerous that Scott-Harris left open the possibility of a 'relaxed' approach, and City of Birmingham, and the Massachusetts decisions have applied it. The Court believes the Scott-Harris approach is preferable because it strikes the proper balance between difficulty of proving a legislative body's motivation and the fact that a municipal ordinance can only become law by majority vote of council. . . It the present case, however, as will be explained below in discussing the evidence of viewpoint discrimination, the Court finds that plaintiffs' constitutionally protected conduct was a substantial or motivating factor in the decision of a majority of council members. Thus resort to Scott-Harris will only become necessary if the Court is mistaken in its tally of the member's motivations.")

Scully v. Borough of Hawthorne, 58 F. Supp.2d 435, 455, 456 (D.N.J. 1999) ("In the instant case, Scully was required to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, the Borough Council was substantially motivated to deny funds for his promotion by the exercise of his First Amendment Rights. This presents the question of what percentage of the Borough Council must have been spurred by a constitutionally impermissible motive before the Borough Council itself may be held liable for a violation of Section 1983. This question does not appear to be an issue that has been settled in this Circuit. Some courts that have been presented with this question have determined that a majority of the members of a legislative body must have been motivated by a constitutionally impermissible motive for liability to attach to a municipality or legislative body. . . Another court, however, acting in the area of race discrimination, determined liability could be premised upon proof a significant percentage of those who were responsible for the challenged action acted on the basis of an impermissible motive. . . The Scott-Harris approach appears to strike an appropriate balance between the difficulty of proving the motivation of a legislative body and the fact a municipal ordinance can only become law by a majority vote of the municipal council.")

a. Entity vs. Individual Liability for Officials Performing Quasi-Judicial or Legislative Functions

Lonzetta Trucking and Excavating Company v. Schan, No. 04-2758, 2005 WL 730363, at *4 (3d Cir. Mar. 9, 2005) (unpublished) ("[Z]oning officials, including the supervisors of Hazle Township, members of the Hazle Township Zoning Board, and the Zoning Officer of Hazle Township would be entitled to absolute immunity in their individual capacities if they were performing 'quasi-judicial' functions. However, the zoning officials in their official capacities, the Hazle Township Zoning Board, and the Hazle Township are not entitled to absolute immunity. The planning board as a governmental agency has no immunity whatsoever.")

Morris v. Lindau, 196 F.3d 102, 111, 112 (2d Cir. 1999) ("The immunities Town Board members enjoy when sued personally do not extend to instances where they are sued in their official capacities. In other words, municipalities have no immunity defense, either qualified or absolute, in a suit under § 1983. . . . Being absolutely immune for their legislative acts, the Town Board members cannot be found personally liable for the abolition of the Police Department. But plaintiffs also named the Town as a defendant. The elimination of the Police Department, a legislative act passed by the Town Council, qualifies under Monell as a municipal act for which the Town may be held liable.")

b. Legislative Immunity & Testimonial Privilege

Lee v. City of Los Angeles, 908 F.3d 1175, 1188 (9th Cir. 2018) ("We recognize that claims of racial gerrymandering involve serious allegations: 'At the heart of the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection lies the simple command that the Government must treat citizens "as individuals, not 'as simply components of a racial ... class.'"'. . Here, Defendants have been accused of violating that important constitutional right. But the factual record in this case falls short of justifying the 'substantial intrusion' into the legislative process. . . Although Plaintiffs call for a categorical exception whenever a constitutional claim directly implicates the government's intent, that exception would render the privilege 'of little value.'. . Village of Arlington Heights itself also involved an equal protection claim alleging racial discrimination—putting the government's intent directly at issue—but nonetheless suggested that such a claim was not, in and of itself, within the subset of 'extraordinary instances' that might justify an exception to the privilege. . . Without sufficient grounds to distinguish those circumstances from the case at hand, we conclude that the district court properly denied discovery on the ground of legislative privilege.")

Cunningham v. Hill, No. 6:06CV69, 2006 WL 1999188, at *3 (E.D. Tex. July 18, 2006) ("[I]t is reasonable to conclude that the rationales for applying the testimonial privilege to federal, state, and regional legislators apply with equal force to local legislators. Accordingly, local legislators are protected by the testimonial privilege from having to testify about actions taken in the sphere of legitimate legislative activity.")

Jama Investments, L.L.C. v. Incorporated County of Los Alamos, No. CIV 04-1173 JB/ACT, 2006 WL 1304903, at *6 (D.N.M. Jan. 20, 2006) ("The Court concludes that the same policy considerations that bar suit against legislators for legislative acts also prevents the Court from compelling them to testify about legislative acts.")

Knights of Columbus v. Town of Lexington, 138 F. Supp.2d 136, 139, 140 (D. Mass. 2001) ("[T]he doctrine of legislative immunity precludes inquiry into the individual defendants' state of mind. Moreover, since one of the purposes of the doctrine is to safeguard legislators from being burdened with the demands of discovery, the objective facts which can be used to challenge regulations should, if at all possible, come from sources other than the testimony of legislators. Therefore, unless the plaintiffs can establish that they cannot get the factual information they need from other sources, they are hereby precluded from taking the depositions of any of the Selectmen.")

East High Gay/Straight Alliance v. Bd. of Educ. of Salt Lake City School Dist., 81 F. Supp.2d 1199, 1204 (D. Utah 2000) ("If scrutiny of legislative motive would be inappropriate for the court itself to undertake at this stage of this case, it seems likewise inappropriate for parties to invoke the court's machinery to conduct the same kind of scrutiny of individual Board members' motivations through deposition discovery.")

Cooper v. Lee County Board of Supervisors, 966 F. Supp. 411, 416 (W.D. Va. 1997) ("Although the defendant Board agrees that it is not immune from suit, it contends summary judgment is appropriate as to it because the individual board members, immune from suit, cannot be compelled to testify as to their motives, Schlitz v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 854 F.2d 43, 46 (4th Cir.1988), overruled in part by Berkley, 63 F.3d at 303, and thus the suit against the Board is barred. It is true that the individual board members enjoy a testimonial privilege flowing from the doctrine of legislative immunity. See Burtnick v. McLean, 76 F.3d 611, 613 (4th Cir.1996). However, while the plaintiff therefore must establish his prima facie case without the benefit of the supervisors' testimony, it does not necessarily follow that the suit against the Board is barred by the supervisors' privilege. Were that the case, Fourth Circuit precedent declining to extend immunity to a legislative board would in effect be defeated any time individual board members were entitled to exercise immunity. Further, the testimonial privilege may be waived.").

c. Waiver of Testimonial Privilege

Trombetta v. Bd. of Education, Proviso Township High School District 209, No. 02 C 5895, 2004 WL 868265, at 2-5 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 22, 2004) ("In their present motion, the District and Jackson seek reconsideration of the Court's denial of their motions in limine nos. 4 and 10. In those motions, defendants sought an order barring questioning of any School Board members at trial regarding their motivations for what they characterize as the reorganization (plaintiff characterizes

it as a termination of his employment) on the grounds of legislative immunity from suit, as well as any comment about those motivations by Trombetta or his attorneys (motion # 4), and any reference to their motives regarding the 'termination' (motion # 10). . . . Defendants' request to preclude any inquiry or mention of their motives amounts to a request for entry of summary judgment. Were the Court to grant what defendants request, the case would be over. A claim of retaliation for the exercise of First Amendment rights requires the plaintiff to prove that he suffered adverse action because of his exercise of protected rights, or, to put it another way, that 'the defendants' actions [were] motivated by [the plaintiff's] constitutionally protected speech.'. . The plaintiff cannot conceivably prevail without introducing evidence of, and arguing, the motivation of those who made the decision he attacks − in this case, Superintendent Jackson, Mayor Serpico, and the Board as a whole. Thus if defendants prevail on their motion for reconsideration, they are entitled to judgment in their favor. This request amounts to a motion for summary judgment which is not made in timely fashion. . . . There is another significant reason why defendants' claim is without merit. The District and Jackson argue that the Board members' legislative role entitles them to a testimonial privilege against inquiry about their reasons for acting. Even were this a viable claim, it is beyond question that the Board members have waived any such privilege. Each of the Board members appeared, without objection, for a deposition (nearly a year ago) and testified fully and completely about all of the events surrounding the termination / reorganization, including inquiries about their motives in acting as they did. If a testimonial privilege existed, it existed when the depositions were taken. Yet the Board members testified at their depositions about their reasons for acting, and they made no effort to seek a protective order barring inquiries about their reasons for acting as they did. . . . Finally, other than citing a plethora of cases, most of them either state-law decisions or non-controlling decisions of other district courts, defendants have made no effort to focus the Court in on any cases like this one in which the decision under attack is an employment-related decision by a public body and the plaintiff's claim is one that, as noted earlier, requires inquiry into the motivating factors for the decision. Based on our quick review, most of the cases appear to concern zoning matters, not the termination of a person's employment. If the purported evidentiary privilege proposed by the District and Jackson barred inquiry into the motivations of the members of a public entity that made employment decisions, it effectively would amount to a grant of immunity not just to the entity's individual members, but to the entity as a whole. If accepted, this would not only contravene Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U.S. 622 (1980), in which the Supreme Court held that municipal bodies sued under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 are not entitled to the immunities from suit available to government officials, but would also effectively abrogate prohibitions against employment discrimination (Title VII, the ADEA, the ADA) for any municipal body whose "legislative" members are given decision making authority over employment matters. Defendants have marshaled no support for such a sweeping rule.").

3. Whose Policy is It?

a. Local Officials Enforcing State Law

It is important that the challenged policy statement, ordinance, regulation, or decision be adopted or promulgated by the local entity. A local government's mere enforcement of state law, as opposed to express incorporation or adoption of state law into local regulations or codes, has been found insufficient to establish Monell liability. Surplus Store and Exchange, Inc. v. City of Delphi, 928 F.2d 788, 793 (7th Cir. 1991).

See also Wilkins v. Herron, No. 24-80, 2024 WL 5200177, at *2 (9th Cir. Dec. 23, 2024) (not reported) ("Wilkins claims that the School District violated his constitutional rights by enforcing Oregon's regulatory vaccine and mask mandates for public school employees. . .Wilkins does not dispute that the School District was bound by state law to enforce these mandates, but he argues that the School District may nevertheless be held liable based on Evers v. Custer County, 745 F.2d 1196 (9th Cir. 1984). Evers is distinguishable. There, the plaintiff's claimed injury—the deprivation of her property interests without due process—was caused by municipal conduct that was not required by state law. Although a state law had made it the 'duty of the commissioners to record as public highways roads which have become such by use,'. . . it left the determination of whether the road in question was a public highway to the commissioners and did not prohibit them from providing the plaintiff with notice and an opportunity to be heard. By contrast, Wilkins has failed to allege that his injuries were caused by any conduct of Defendants not required by state law. Instead, he concedes that state laws required school employees to be vaccinated and to wear masks and that those laws were binding on the School District. Accordingly, Wilkins has failed to allege that his injuries are traceable to any policy or custom of the School District, as opposed to state law."); Buffin v. California, 23 F.4th 951, 962-65 & n.7 (9th Cir. 2022) ("Here, the San Francisco County Sheriff was charged by state law with enforcing a state-mandated bail regime. We must resolve whether the Sheriff was a state or local official for the purposes of this claim. To do so, we must first home in on the challenged actions the Sheriff took. County officials like the Sheriff can act as county or state officials, depending on the particular context. . . For such officials who 'serve two masters,' we examine whether 'the particular acts the official is alleged to have committed fall within the range of his state or county functions.'. . As the district court explained in great depth when it ruled on the County and Sheriff's motions to dismiss, California's statutory bail regime enlisted the County Sheriff and compelled her to set bail in line with a state-created bail schedule. California law permits a sheriff to set bail using only a bail schedule set by the state court; she must set bail at the amount listed in that document. . . Moreover, the Sheriff has no discretion over when to release or hold a pre-trial detainee. If the detainee makes bail, the Sheriff must release her; if not, the Sheriff must keep her in jail pending her court proceedings. . . The district court viewed the State as the Sheriff's master as she set bail under the state-mandated bail schedule. The court therefore concluded that the Sheriff 'act[ed] on behalf of the State' when setting bail. . . Thus, 'the Sheriff [wa]s the actor responsible for enforcing the challenged state law in San Francisco,'. . . and the State was 'the relevant actor when the Sheriff detains a person who does not pay bail[.]'. . Given that unchallenged ruling, the district court did not err in concluding that the Sheriff in her official capacity acted as the State's agent for the purposes of assessing attorney's fees. . . For when a state statutory regime comprehensively 'directs the actions of an official, as here, the officer, be he state or local, is acting as a state official,' i.e., a state agent. . . In other words, instead of exercising control over the Sheriff by signing her paycheck, the State here used its plenary power over the structure of California's government to enlist the Sheriff and command her to do its bidding when she set bail using a bail schedule. The State may make that choice. But in doing so, the State makes the Sheriff a state official in this context, and so bears responsibility for the unconstitutional actions it mandated she take. . . Despite the State's protest, no further factual information was necessary to establish that the Sheriff acted as an agent of the State. California's own bail law—'the official policy of the State,'. . .—was all the evidence the district court needed. The other provisions of California law generally 'labeling' sheriffs 'as local officials' cannot overcome the fact that—in this particular context—the Sheriff acted for the State. . . Indeed, any other conclusion at the attorney's fees stage would have led to an untenable dissonance with the district court's earlier Eleventh Amendment holding. The district court had noted that the Sheriff was 'entitled to immunity from suit for money damages under the Eleventh Amendment.'. . But the Sheriff could possess that immunity only if she was being sued in her official capacity as a state official. For in an official-capacity suit, a defendant can claim only those 'forms of sovereign immunity that the entity' she represents 'may possess, such as the Eleventh Amendment[.]'. . And only a state, its arms and instrumentalities, and its officials (when sued in their official capacities) enjoy that kind of immunity; the county does not. . . In other words, here the Sheriff's successful assertion of Eleventh Amendment immunity was a telltale sign that she was being sued as a state official—i.e., an agent of the State—in her official capacity. . . That principle also sinks the State's main line of attack in this case. The State's argument that the district court 'conflated the Sheriff's entitlement to immunity as a "state actor" with respect to damages, with the Sheriff's purported status as an agent of the State' entirely misunderstands the import of an official-capacity defendant successfully invoking Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . Indeed, we struggle to imagine a situation where an official-capacity defendant, entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity from monetary relief, would not be an agent of the State and thus a state official. Thus, the district court correctly found that the Sheriff acted as a state official for the purposes of this action, subjecting the State to liability for attorney's fees under § 1988. . . Nor will we reverse the district court's award of attorney's fees because the State's attorneys did not represent the Sheriff throughout this case. Whether a county employee is a state or local official turns on what capacity he acts in when he enforces an unconstitutional law or policy—not which legal office represents him in court. . . And it was the Office of the Attorney General that chose not to represent the Sheriff or to intervene to defend the state bail laws—despite knowing the Sheriff's position that the laws were unconstitutional. . . . Despite the State's apprehension, our holding here does not mean that the State will need 'to intervene to defend the [S]tate's interests every time a local official is sued for purportedly enforcing state law.'. . We simply affirm that a county official who enjoys Eleventh Amendment damages immunity and acts as a discretion-less instrument of the State is a state official. If plaintiffs prove that such an official acted unconstitutionally at the State's command—as the Sheriff did here—the State can face § 1988 fees liability. . . .Given our reasoning here, we need not determine what bearing, if any, the 'state policymaker' test under McMillian has on sovereign immunity inquiries under the Eleventh Amendment or on determinations of whether an official-capacity suit targets a state official or a local official. This case does not raise, and we do not here decide, whether an official-capacity suit against a hypothetical 'state policymaker' under McMillian who is not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity from monetary relief would constitute an official-capacity suit against a 'state official.'. . To the extent the McMillian merits inquiry plays any role, the district court's ruling on that issue would only further buttress our conclusion that the Sheriff was a state official."); Ness v. City of Bloomington, 11 F.4th 914, 922 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Ness alleges that the City and the officers were 'acting under color of state law' when enforcing the harassment statute. But she fails to allege that a city policymaker adopted the state harassment statute as the official policy of the City of Bloomington, or that the City has a policy or custom of enforcing the statute in an unconstitutional manner. The complaint does not allege that the City incorporated the state statute into its municipal code, or that a policymaker like the chief of police was responsible for the enforcement action. . . We decline to make the 'conceptual leap' that the enforcement of a state statute by city police officers supports a claim that the alleged unconstitutional statute was adopted as a city policy. Surplus Store & Exch., Inc. v. City of Delphi, 928 F.2d 788, 790-92 (7th Cir. 1991). 'It is difficult to imagine a municipal policy more innocuous and constitutionally permissible, and whose causal connection to the alleged violation is more attenuated, than the 'policy' of enforcing state law.'. . Ness's claim against the City for nominal damages is therefore premised on making the municipality vicariously liable for the actions of its police officers. Her complaint states that she 'ceased her filming activity,' because of the August 2019 'threat by the City, through its police officers Defendants Meyer and Roepke, to enforce the Harassment Statute.' . . Because these allegations are based on the actions of city employees and not on a policy or custom of the City, Ness's claim for nominal damages is insufficient to state a claim. Monell[.]"); Ermold v. Davis, 936 F.3d 429, 433-35 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Whether sovereign immunity protects an official from being sued in her official capacity. . . depends on her role in government. Sometimes the inquiry is easy. A governor obviously is a state official; a mayor obviously is not. But not all officials operate within jurisdictional silos—some have hybrid duties in which they serve both state and local government. In such scenarios, immunity depends on which entity the official serves when engaging in the challenged conduct. McMillian v. Monroe Cty., 520 U.S. 781, 785 & n. 2 (1997). And that inquiry turns on how state and local law treat the official. . . Here, plaintiffs contend that when Davis stopped issuing marriage licenses, she acted on the County's behalf. Caudill and the County, however, claim Davis acted on Kentucky's behalf. To resolve this dispute, we must examine and balance six factors:

1. The State's potential liability for a judgment;
2. How state statutes and courts refer to the official;
3. Who appointed the official;
4. Who pays the official;
5. The degree of state control over the official; and
6. Whether the functions involved fell within the traditional purview of state or local government.

. . . . The first and fourth factors are neutral. . . . The second and third factors weigh in favor of

Davis having acted on the County's behalf. . . . The fifth and sixth factors . . . show that Davis acted on the State's behalf. . . . Plaintiffs acknowledge Kentucky's general control over marriage, but they contend that when Davis refused to issue licenses, she made a discretionary policy on Rowan County's behalf. If true, sovereign immunity wouldn't shield Davis because when an official applies state law that leaves the method of application to her discretion, she acts on behalf of local government. . . . In comparing Davis's actions to those of the coroner in Brotherton (and to other, similar cases), plaintiffs conflate discretion with insubordination. Whereas Ohio's cornea-harvesting law left to officials the method of application, Kentucky's marriage-licensing laws gave county clerks no wiggle room. Kentucky required Davis to issue marriage licenses to eligible couples. . . . Plaintiffs have cited no authority suggesting that if a county official acting on the State's behalf fails to do her job, that failure transforms the source of her power from the State to the county. Indeed, such a proposition would make little sense; for whom an official acts has nothing to do with how well she acts. Davis's refusal to issue licenses, then, did nothing to change the government she acted for. Because Davis acted on Kentucky's behalf when issuing (and refusing to issue) marriage licenses, sovereign immunity protects her (and now Caudill, as the current county clerk) from an official-capacity suit."); Ohio ex rel. Moore v. Brahma Inv. Group, Inc., 723 F. App'x 284, 288 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Because Berkowitz [City Law Director] brought the nuisance action on behalf of the State, not the City, all claims against the City and [Mayor] Williams were properly dismissed. See Ohio Rev. Code § 3767.03; Cady v. Arenac Cty., 574 F.3d 334, 345 (6th Cir. 2009) (holding that county prosecutor was acting as agent of the State of Michigan rather than the county when he issued criminal charges); Pusey v. City of Youngstown, 11 F.3d 652, 659 (6th Cir. 1993) (same)."); Snyder v. King, 745 F.3d 242, 246-50 (7th Cir. 2014) ("Snyder sued the County Defendants in their official capacities under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, which is essentially another way of suing the county-affiliated entity they represent. This means that Snyder can only proceed against the County Defendants to the extent that he would be able to proceed against the county—or, more specifically, against the St. Joseph County Voter Registration Board—itself. . . Section 1983 only permits an individual to sue a 'person' who deprives that individual of his or her federally-guaranteed rights under color of state law. Local governing bodies—and the officers thereof, acting in their official capacities—do generally qualify as 'persons' under the statute. . . . But that is not true when a local governing body acts solely as an extension of the State, because State governments and State officials are not 'persons' within the ambit of Section 1983. . . As a result, whether or not a plaintiff has stated a Section 1983 claim against a municipal entity typically hinges on the extent to which that municipal entity was independently responsible for the allegedly unconstitutional act. In answering that question, courts have focused on whether 'there is a direct causal link between a municipal policy or custom and the alleged constitutional deprivation.'. . . To say that any such direct causal link exists when the only local government 'policy' at issue is general compliance with the dictates of state law is a bridge too far; under those circumstances, the state law is the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. . . This is the rule to which the district court was referring when it invoked Bethesda: a county 'cannot be held liable under Section 1983 for acts that it did under the command of state or federal law.'. . The operative complaint in this case is devoid of any remotely specific allegation that a county-level policy or custom caused Snyder's harm. That alone is grounds for dismissal. .

. . [T]here is no opportunity for the County Defendants—as members of the voter registration board—to decide what constitutes 'a crime' under Section 3–7–46–2. The county sheriff, if anyone, decides who qualifies for the disenfranchisement list; all the voter registration board does is delete the names the sheriff provides. The role of the local voter registration boards is therefore purely reactionary. It is easy to see, given the flaws in the first two steps in Snyder's argument, why the third step and his conclusion are also wide of the mark. Snyder hopes to paint this case as one in which the County Defendants made an independent choice from among various alternatives authorized by state law, but that characterization is based on an inaccurate understanding of the Indiana system. The statute in question does not merely authorize removal from the voter rolls for incarcerated convicts. The statutory language is compulsory. . . And to the extent that any discretion is permitted, it is exercised by actors other than the County Defendants. . . .For all of these reasons, this situation does not support a finding of Monell liability. When state law unequivocally instructs a municipal entity to produce binary outcome X if condition Y occurs, we cannot say that the municipal entity's 'decision' to follow that directive involves the exercise of any meaningful independent discretion, let alone final policymaking authority. . . It is the statutory directive, not the follow-through, which causes the harm of which the plaintiff complains. . . .Finally, we note that it makes no difference that the County Defendants exercise broad independent discretion with respect to other matters of election law and procedure; the question is whether the plaintiff has identified the decisionmaker 'responsible for establishing final policy with respect to the subject matter in question.'. . The subject matter in question is the removal of incarcerated convicts from the voter rolls, and the only 'policy' the County Defendants established with respect to that issue was to follow the mandatory mechanism laid out by statute. Whether one views their role as merely implementing the statutory directive, or as carrying out the removal of those identified as statutorily appropriate by the local sheriff, the local voter registration boards simply do not make an independent policy judgment."); Slaven v. Engstrom, 710 F.3d 772, 780, 781 & n.4 (8th Cir. 2013) ("In the present case, the Slavens' complaint is devoid of any allegations of an unconstitutional Hennepin County policy separate and distinct from Minnesota law. As set forth supra, Counts I and II of their complaint repeatedly reference specific Minnesota statutes, rules, and procedures as depriving them of due process. . . .Hennepin County lacks any policymaking authority regarding the handling and scheduling of the EPC [Emergency Protective Custody] hearing and formal hearing. The Slavens' complaint essentially alleges that Minnesota law, and the state court judge's application of that law—not an independent Hennepin County policy—caused the procedural due process violations. Hennepin County cannot be liable to the Slavens under § 1983 for the violation of their procedural due process rights based on the allegations contained in this complaint. . . . Whether, and if so when, a municipality may be liable under § 1983 for its enforcement of state law has been the subject of extensive debate in the circuits. See Vives v. City of New York, 523 F.3d 346, 351–53 (2d Cir.2008) (collecting and analyzing cases). We need not decide whether a municipality may ever be liable for enforcing state law because, here, there is no evidence or even allegation that Hennepin [County] was enforcing state law, as opposed to merely being present in a proceeding where a state court, applying state law, allegedly violated the Slavens' constitutional rights."); Gottfried v. Medical Planning Services, Inc., 280 F.3d 684, 693 (6th Cir. 2002) ("Sheriff Alexander's obligations under the state court injunction clearly flow from the State. He did not have any discretionary authority regarding the state court injunction. Rather, he was bound to enforce it by its terms and there is no evidence that it was ever enforced otherwise. As such, any action taken in connection with the injunction would be action taken as an arm of the State for which Sheriff Alexander would be entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . . Indeed, it is the state court injunction that allegedly caused [Plaintiff's] injury, not any 'policy' or 'custom' of the state, city or county, and the Sheriff acted as an arm of the state in enforcing it."); Bethesda Lutheran Homes and Services, Inc. v. Leean, 154 F.3d 716, 718 (7th Cir. 1998) ("When the municipality is acting under compulsion of state or federal law, it is the policy contained in that state or federal law, rather than anything devised or adopted by the municipality, that is responsible for the injury. Apart from this rather formalistic point, our position has the virtue of minimizing the occasions on which federal constitutional law, enforced through section 1983, puts local government at war with state government. . . . [T]he state of mind of local officials who enforce or comply with state or federal regulations is immaterial to whether the local government is violating the Constitution if the local officials could not act otherwise without violating state or federal law. The spirit, the mindset, the joy or grief of local officials has no consequences for the plaintiffs if these officials have no discretion that they could exercise in the plaintiffs' favor."); Pusey v. City of Youngstown, 11 F.3d 652, 657 (6th Cir. 1993) ("City prosecutors are responsible for prosecuting state criminal charges ... Clearly, state criminal laws and state victim impact laws represent the policy of the state. Thus, a city official pursues her duties as a state agent when enforcing state law or policy."), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 2742 (1994); Woods v. City of Michigan City, Indiana, 940 F.2d 275, 279 (7th Cir. 1991) (state judge's bond directive was not policy of City or County); Echols v. Parker, 909 F.2d 795, 801 (5th Cir. 1990) ("county official pursues his duties as a state agent when he is enforcing state law or policy").

See also Diaz v. Cantu, 123 F.4th 736, 745-46 (5th Cir. 2024) ("This circuit has not determined whether a county judge whose office was created by the Texas Constitution serves as an arm of the state. . . The precedents cited by English Cantu concern Texas district judges, not constitutional county judges. . . Admittedly, there is language in some of our opinions similar to this: 'Texas judges are entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity.' Davis v. Tarrant County, 565 F.3d 214, 228 (5th Cir. 2009). Context matters, and that opinion and the ones it cited all dealt with Texas district judges. . . The question here concerns an official who, though having the title of 'judge' and the authority to act in a judicial capacity, also has substantial other authority and duties. Thus, even if most or all other Texas judges are entitled to state sovereign immunity, we still must determine if this judge–administrator also enjoys that immunity. A fresh arm-of-the-state analysis is necessary. [court does analysis] . . . . We conclude that Texas's constitutional county judges are not arms of the state and are therefore not entitled to state sovereign immunity. The district court correctly denied English Cantu state sovereign immunity on his official-capacity claim."); Teagan v. City of McDonough, 949 F.3d 670, 672, 675-78 & n.3 (11th Cir. 2020) ("The McDonough municipal court was exercising its judicial power under Georgia law to adjudicate a state-law offense—and not a violation of a city or county ordinance—and therefore was not acting on behalf of the City when it took the actions that Ms. Teagan complains of. . . . [T]he critical and threshold question is whether the McDonough municipal court, through Chief Judge Patten, was acting on behalf of the City when it took the actions which form the basis for the constitutional violations alleged by Ms. Teagan. If it was not, the City cannot be held liable under § 1983. . . Whether an official or entity acts on behalf of a municipality or the state 'in a particular area, or on a particular issue,' is—labels aside—a federal question that is 'dependent on an analysis of state law.'. . Although we have not yet addressed this question with respect to municipal courts in Georgia, our decision in Familias Unidas v. Briscoe, 619 F.2d 391 (5th Cir. 1980), provides a critical starting point. . . . 'The practical test articulated in Familias Unidas ... is whether the decisionmaker, by virtue of his official conduct, serves as the "final authority or ultimate repository of county power."'. . The narrow question here is whether under Georgia law the McDonough municipal court, through Chief Judge Patten, acted on behalf of the state or the City when adjudicating Ms. Teagan's state-law misdemeanor offense. As we explain, we conclude that Chief Judge Patten acted on behalf of the state because he was exercising his authority under state law to preside over a state misdemeanor offense.[3] [fn. 3: Because this case does not present the question, we leave for another day whether a municipal court judge acts on behalf of a municipality when he or she exercises judicial authority with respect to local ordinances enacted by the municipality. Compare Walker v. City of Calhoun, 901 F.3d 1245, 1256 (11th Cir. 2018) (concluding, at the preliminary injunction stage, that a Georgia municipal court acted on behalf of the city in setting bail policy, and therefore was not immune from § 1983 liability in an indigent arrestee's class action lawsuit challenging the court's standing bail order); ODonnell v. Harris Cty., 892 F.3d 147, 155–56 (5th Cir. 2018) (holding that a county judge was a policymaker for the county in establishing an "unwritten, countywide process for setting bail that violated both state law and the Constitution"); Anela v. City of Wildwood, 790 F.2d 1063, 1066–67 (3d Cir. 1986) (holding that a municipal court judge's "cash bail schedule," which failed to comply with a state supreme court rule, constituted a municipal practice for which the city could be held liable under Monell).] Ms. Teagan correctly points out that municipal courts in Georgia are generally creatures of local government—Georgia law, after all, gives municipalities the power to create municipal courts, appoint judges to those courts, and fix their compensation. . . And the judges of the McDonough municipal court may be removed from office by the mayor and city council. . . But the question here is not whether municipal courts in Georgia should be generally viewed as state or municipal actors. It is, instead, is a more narrow one: whether municipal courts in Georgia act on behalf of the state or on behalf of the municipality when they adjudicate misdemeanor offenses under state law. . . Although the Georgia Supreme Court has sometimes characterized municipal courts as municipal bodies 'discharging strictly municipal functions,' Ward v. City of Cairo, 276 Ga. 391, 583 S.E. 2d 821, 823 (Ga. 2003), such a definitive across-the-board classification is not accurate. As noted earlier, municipal courts in Georgia have jurisdiction to adjudicate state-law misdemeanor traffic offenses pursuant to Georgia Code § 40-13-21(a)-(b). . . The Georgia Supreme Court has explained that the 'General Assembly's exercise of its constitutional authority to enact legislation vesting municipal courts with jurisdiction over various state misdemeanor offenses ... imbues the municipal court with limited state judicial power when it tries a defendant for violations of the state misdemeanors the General Assembly has placed within its jurisdiction.'. . Ms. Teagan was charged with driving without insurance, which constitutes a state-law misdemeanor offense. . . Under Georgia law and the rationale of Familias Unidas, Chief Judge Patten was acting on behalf of the state when he presided over her case, found her guilty, sentenced her, signed a warrant for her arrest, issued a $100 'contempt charge' for her failure to pay the fine, and ordered her to serve the 60-day sentence that had been suspended. . . And because a conviction in a Georgia municipal court for a state-law misdemeanor traffic offense is appealable to the superior court, . . . we cannot say that under Georgia law the City had 'control over' Chief Judge Patten or the McDonough municipal court with respect to the adjudication of Ms. Teagan's state-law misdemeanor traffic offense. . . We therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to the City on Ms. Teagan's § 1983 claims."); Teagan v. City of McDonough, 949 F.3d 670, 680, 683-84 (11th Cir. 2020) (Jordan, J., concurring) ("I join the court's opinion. The City of McDonough cannot be held liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 because the municipal court was not acting on its behalf when adjudicating Ms. Teagan's state-law misdemeanor for failing to maintain automobile liability insurance. I write separately, however, to express my concern that the McDonough municipal court acted unconstitutionally by jailing Ms. Teagan for failing to pay a fine without determining whether her failure to pay was willful. This practice, which does not appear to be isolated throughout municipal courts in Georgia, flouts the venerable and long-standing principle that debtors' prisons are unconstitutional. . . . Ms. Teagan's ordeal seems to exemplify a broader problem. The City of McDonough is not the only municipality in Georgia that raises a significant portion of its revenue from collecting fines—or that collects these fines through its municipal court's vigorous enforcement of traffic violations. . .Nor is Georgia the only state where local governments collect a significant portion of their revenues from fines. . . Some commentators have noted that municipal courts' aggressive enforcement of the payment of fines—including unconstitutionally imprisoning defendants for their debt—has been on the rise since the 2008 recession, when local governments became increasingly strapped for funds. . . Not surprisingly, multiple lawsuits have been filed in our Circuit challenging these types of practices on various grounds, and in at least some cases, district courts have denied motions to dismiss. [collecting cases] Some courts in other parts of the country have likewise allowed these types of claims to proceed past the dismissal or summary judgment stages, or even granted summary judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. [collecting cases] But what happened to Ms. Teagan should not be a common occurrence. . . Jailing a defendant for failing to pay a fine—without any determination that her failure to pay was willful—is a flagrant violation the U.S. Constitution. . . A municipal court cannot shirk its duties to protect indigent defendants' constitutional rights in order to line its city's coffers.").

See also Lindke v. King, No. 19-CV-11905, 2024 WL 3240612, at *6–7 & n.6 (E.D. Mich. June 28, 2024) ("The first question the Court must answer is: may the Defendants invoke state sovereign immunity even though they are county-level officials and not state officials? They may. While Defendants are not employees of the State, their conduct at issue in this action – i.e., entering the Ex Parte PPO into the LEIN system – is compelled by the PPO Statute. Indeed, as noted above, the PPO Statute requires Defendants to enter into the LEIN system all PPOs that they receive. . . Under these circumstances, Defendants are acting as an 'arm of the State' when they enter PPOs into the LEIN system (or when they cause such entry), and they are thus entitled to invoke state sovereign immunity. . . Because the PPO Statute compels the Defendants to enter PPOs into the LEIN system, Defendants may invoke state sovereign immunity. . . . The Court next turns to whether any exception to state sovereign immunity applies here and permits Lindke to proceed with his claims against Defendants in their official capacity. Lindke invokes the exception described in Ex parte Young, 209 U.S. 123 (1908). . . . To fall within the Ex parte Young exception, (1) the 'state official must possess some connection with the enforcement of the challenged law' and (2) it 'must be likely that the official will enforce the law against the plaintiff.'. . Both elements of the exception are met here, and thus Lindke's remaining claims are not barred by state sovereign immunity. . . .Of course, the doctrine of state sovereign immunity would not bar a claim against Kays for damages in his personal capacity, but the Court previously dismissed that claim on the basis of qualified immunity."); Sroga v. City of Chicago, No. 18 C 1749, 2020 WL 2112373, at *7 (N.D. Ill. May 4, 2020) ("The City cites Milwaukee Cty. Pavers Ass'n v. Fiedler, 922 F.2d 419 (7th Cir. 1991), for the proposition that Sroga cannot challenge the City's use of the P.O.W.E.R. test as that is a test created by the State. Fielder is not directly on point. In Fielder, the Seventh Circuit concluded that the plaintiffs could not challenge a state's application of a federal statute while conceding that the federal statute was constitutional. . . Here, unlike in Fielder, and given the leniency this Court must apply, the amended consolidated complaint is construable as challenging the underlying state statute and the City's application of it. The City has otherwise failed to support its argument that a plaintiff can never challenge a municipality's application of state law, and so the Court will not reach that argument."); Brewster v. City of Los Angeles, No. EDCV142257JGBSPX, 2019 WL 7707886, at *6-8 * n.6 (C.D. Cal. July 29, 2019) ("Here, Plaintiffs allege an officially promulgated policy of general applicability that is itself unconstitutional and that directs officers to impound vehicles for 30 days without first securing a warrant. . . .SO7 is a 'decision officially adopted and promulgated' by the Board of Police Commissioners. . . Thus, promulgation of the policy and impoundment of the vehicles pursuant to the policy is the type of activity to which Monell liability applies. Under Evers, that the Impound Policy implements state law has no bearing on the Monell analysis. . . Moreover, a number of Ninth Circuit district court decisions have found municipalities could be liable for actions taken pursuant to state statutes. [collecting cases] The Court acknowledges that the County Commissioners in Evers had discretion in shaping the process by which they determined whether the requirements of Idaho Code § 40-103 had been met. There is thus some question whether Evers applies when a local government implements a mandatory state law that leaves no room for discretion, as Defendants argue is the case here. . . Other circuits have held that municipal action pursuant to a fully mandatory state law cannot give rise to Monell liability, while action pursuant to a law that is merely permissive or leaves room for discretion in its implementation may give rise to Monell liability. [citing Vives and Snyder] [fn. 6: Notwithstanding this out-of-circuit authority, the Court is not convinced that a municipality may not be found liable for enforcing a mandatory state law. Evers suggests that the fact that a municipal defendant acted pursuant to state law is irrelevant to the Monell analysis. . . At least one Ninth Circuit district court has indicated that, 'even if a municipality enforces a mandatory, but unconstitutional, state or federal law, Monell liability may attach even though the municipality does not know that the statute is unconstitutional.' Miranda-Olivares v. Clackamas Cty., 2014 WL 1414305, at *4 n. 5 (D. Or. Apr.

11, 2014). Moreover, a rule that a local government cannot be liable for enforcing an unconstitutional but mandatory state statute would leave plaintiffs who suffer injuries due to the enforcement of such statutes without redress. See Vives v. City of N.Y., 524 F.3d at 350 ("As a practical matter, ... damages are not available against the state because it is not a person within the meaning of Section 1983. Moreover, ... individual employees will often be able to successfully assert qualified immunity. Thus, the plaintiff will often be left to assert his damages claim only against the municipality.") . . . However, the Court need not decide the issue, as it finds the City had discretion in implementing § 14602.6(a)(1).] Plaintiffs counter that Defendants had 'discretion to select between at least two statutory options for impounding vehicles like Plaintiffs'.'. . Under the Vehicle Code, an officer who encounters a person driving with a suspended or revoked license or without ever having had a license may seize the vehicle under § 14602.6(a)(1), seize the vehicle under § 22651(p), or decide not to seize the vehicle. . . . However, once an officer invokes § 14602.6(a)(1) as the impound authority, the 30-day hold is mandatory, with certain exceptions. . . Thus, SO7's instruction that officers use § 14602.6(a)(1) effectively mandated the 30-day hold of Plaintiffs' vehicles. Moreover, that some vehicles owners may be able to recover their vehicles prior to the passing of 30 days under the procedure outlined in § 14602.6(b) does not solve the constitutional problem because subsection (b) puts the burden on the owner to request a hearing and demonstrate mitigating circumstances. Constitutionally, the burden is on the City to justify holding the vehicle beyond the initial seizure. . . Accordingly, regardless of whether a 30-day hold resulted every time § 14602.6(a)(1) was used as the impound authority, the decision to use § 14602.6(a)(1) necessarily led to the seizure of vehicles without the required justification. As the Ninth Circuit noted on appeal, Defendants could have avoided the constitutional issues associated with impoundment under § 14602.6(a)(1) by directing officers to use only the impound authority provided by § 22651(p). . . In summary, the Impound Policy is exactly the type of official, generally applicable policy for which local governments may be held liable pursuant to Monell. Ninth Circuit precedent instructs that the fact that a municipal defendant acted pursuant to state law 'goes only to the question of [the individual officials'] good faith in applying the statute' and is irrelevant to whether a municipal action is a policy under Monell .. . Even if municipalities may not be held liable for enforcing mandatory state laws that allow no meaningful discretion at the local level, as other circuits have held, the City is subject to liability because it exercised its discretion by directing officers to use § 14602.6(a)(1) in circumstances where § 22651(p) was equally applicable. Accordingly, the Court DENIES the Motion insofar as it seeks to dismiss Plaintiffs' § 1983 claims."); Phillips v. City of Cincinnati, No. 1:18-CV-541, 2019 WL 2289277, at *11 (S.D. Ohio May 29, 2019) ("The Third Amended Complaint contains no allegations that Hamilton County had an official illegal policy or custom. Instead the only potential allegation that Defendant Hamilton County had an illegal policy or custom relates to the action of Defendant Prosecutor Deters as an official with final decision-making authority. In Ohio, 'a county prosecutor has final decision-making authority with regard to the operation of their offices and discharge of their duties.'. . Therefore, Prosecutor Deters is a final decision-maker for the purpose of Hamilton County municipal liability. Regarding Plaintiffs' Monell claim, the only action taken by Prosecutor Deters is that he 'acted in [his] official capacity and under color of law when filing a Complaint and Motion for Ex Parte Temporary Restraining Orders in case number A1804285.'.

. Even assuming arguendo that this single action by Prosecutor Deters was unconstitutional, '[p]roof of a single incident of unconstitutional activity is not sufficient to impose liability under Monell, unless proof of the incident includes proof that it was caused by an existing, unconstitutional municipal policy, which policy can be attributed to a municipal policymaker.'. . Again, Plaintiffs do not identify any existing, unconstitutional policy of Hamilton County. The only potentially unconstitutional polices alleged by Plaintiffs are the City's Encampment Policy and the State Court Order – neither of which are Hamilton County policies. Therefore, because Plaintiffs fail to allege that a policy or custom of Hamilton County was the moving force behind the deprivation of their rights, Plaintiffs claims against Hamilton County for municipal liability under Monell fail as a matter of law. Accordingly, Hamilton County is dismissed from this action."); Welchen v. County of Sacramento, 343 F.Supp.3d 924, 934-36 (E.D. Cal. 2018) ("Neither Streit nor Cortez apply to the facts at hand. The Bail Law is a state law, and the Bail Schedule is set by the Sacramento County Superior Court. . . As such, the Bail Law is not a sheriff-established policy that might be considered an administrative action like the policies at issue in Streit or Cortez. . . .Moreover, district courts within this circuit have determined that California Sheriffs act as representatives of the state, and not a county, when enforcing state laws, including the Bail Law. . . . Despite Plaintiff's argument that Ninth Circuit precedent bars a finding that the Sheriff is a state actor, Plaintiff's Ninth Circuit cases are distinguishable from the instant case. Further, federal district courts determined sheriffs act on behalf of the state when they are detaining an individual based on court orders. . . Similarly, the Sheriff implements the Bail Law according to the Sacramento County Superior Court's Bail Schedule because he is tasked to do so under state law. . . Thus, the Court determines that Ninth Circuit precedent does not preclude a finding that the Sheriff is a state actor. . . .Despite its title, the Sacramento County Superior Court is an arm of the State. . . . [A]fter carefully analyzing the Bail Law, in Buffin, the court determined that 'the Sheriff lacks discretion to release the arrested person outside the bounds of the statute.'. . . As in McNeely, where the court found that Cal. Pen. Code § 4004 requires sheriffs to detain arrestees 'until legally discharged,' here, the Sheriff similarly does not have discretion when implementing the Bail Law. . . For these reasons, the Court finds that the Sheriff acts on behalf of the state in implementing the Bail Law. Accordingly, the Eleventh Amendment shields the Sheriff from suit for money damages. However, based on the Ex Parte Young exception to sovereign immunity, Plaintiff may seek declaratory or injunctive relief against the Sheriff for allegedly unconstitutional conduct related to the Bail Law. . . . Because the Court has determined that the Sheriff acts on behalf of the state on this issue, the County is not liable for the Sheriff's implementation of the Bail Law."); Cambridge Taxi Drivers v. City of Cambridge, No. CV 16-11357-NMG, 2017 WL 373491, at *5 (D. Mass. Jan. 25, 2017) ("As explained above defendants are preempted from regulating TNCs [Transportation Network Companies]. Consequently, state policy, not municipal policy, now prevents defendants from regulating TNCs. Because municipalities are liable only for their own illegal acts, Connick v. Thompson, 563 U.S. 51, 60 (2011), defendants cannot be held liable for the conduct alleged in the complaint. See Yeo v. Town of Lexington, 131 F.3d 241, 257 (1st Cir. 1997) (Stahl, J., concurring) (citing Surplus Store & Exch., Inc. v. City of Delphi, 928 F.2d 788, 791-92 (7th Cir. 1991))."); Fant v. The City of Ferguson, No. 4:15-CV-00253-AGF, 2016 WL 6696065, at *3, *6 (E.D. Mo. Nov. 15, 2016) ("[T]he City argues that each of the claims at issue arises out of a municipal court judge's allegedly improper action (or inaction) in carrying out judicial functions as part of the Ferguson Municipal Court, which, according to the City, is an arm of the state and is outside the control of the City as a matter of state law. The City then cites a line of federal cases following the United States Supreme Court's decisions in Pembaur v. City of Cincinnati, 475 U.S. 469 (1986), and City of St. Louis v. Praprotnik, 485 U.S. 112 (1988), for the proposition that 'the actions of a municipal judge in his or her judicial capacity to enforce state law do not act as a municipal official or lawmaker for purposes of municipal liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.'. . .The federal circuit courts of appeal (in the line of cases relied upon by the City) have applied this rule to find that a municipal judge does not act as a final policymaker of the municipality for purposes of municipal liability when she makes a judicial decision under the authority of state law and appealable to the state's higher courts. See, e.g., Granda v. City of St. Louis, 472 F.3d 565, 569 (8th Cir. 2007); Ledbetter v. City of Topeka, Kan., 318 F.3d 1183, 1189–90 (10th Cir. 2003); Eggar v. City of Livingston, 40 F.3d 312, 314–16 (9th Cir. 1994); Johnson v. Moore, 958 F.2d 92, 94 (5th Cir. 1992); Woods v. City of Michigan City, Ind., 940 F.2d 275, 277–78 (7th Cir. 1991). In each of these cases, the plaintiffs 'by naming [a particular municipal court judge acting in his judicial capacity] as the source of the constitutional deprivation, detach[ed] the local governments from the unconstitutional policy.' Woods, 940 F.2d at 279. But Plaintiffs do not seek to hold the City liable for the judicial decisions made by a municipal court judge in particular cases. Indeed, as noted above, Plaintiffs allege that the constitutional deprivations here took place largely outside of any judicial process. Instead, Plaintiffs' complaint is replete with allegations that each of the injuries alleged was caused by the City's own unconstitutional policies and by the continuing and pervasive unconstitutional practices of a wide range of City employees. The Court finds that Plaintiffs have pleaded enough facts to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence to support their claim of municipal liability under § 1983, which is all that is required at this stage."); Frobe v. Village of Lindenhurst, No. 11 C 1722, 2014 WL 902878, *9, *10 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 7, 2014) ("For the reasons explained earlier, the officers' enforcement of a facially valid state law does not violate the Fourth Amendment. In any event, Plaintiff's real challenge to the eavesdropping arrest is to the validity of the law itself—but the state law is a state law, not municipal policy. . . . In Surplus Storage, a store brought a § 1983 action against a municipality after a municipal police officer, acting in accordance with state law, seized property from the plaintiff without a judicial hearing. . . The district court dismissed the action against the city, and the Seventh Circuit affirmed, because no municipal policy had caused the violation: state statutes provided authority for the officer to seize such property without a judicial hearing. . . As in this case, the Surplus Storage plaintiff did not 'claim that the alleged constitutional violation was caused by' a formal policy or an entrenched practice with the effective force of a formal policy, 'that was itself unconstitutional.'. . Instead, the plaintiff argued that the state statutes were unconstitutional and that the municipality could be held liable 'for the deprivation of [plaintiff's] property because [the municipality] ha[d] a "policy" of allowing or instructing its police officers to enforce the challenged statutes.'. .The court rejected the notion that a policy of enforcing state law could be a basis for Monell liability. . . . Plaintiff Frobe believes that a policy of training and encouraging officers 'to enforce a flagrantly unconstitutional state law could be a basis for Monell liability'. . . but, as the court has already concluded, the IEA cannot be characterized as so

'flagrantly unconstitutional' that its enforcement violates the Constitution. Moreover, the authorities that Plaintiff himself cites confirm the rationale of Surplus Storage: in the cases he cites, the defendant municipality was adhering to its own unconstitutional policy. See Wessel v. Village of Monee, No. 04 C 3246, 2010 WL 2523574, at *4 (N.D. Ill. June 14, 2010) (complaint adequately stated a cause of action because it alleged that the 'gender-based enforcement' of state statutes was a regular pattern or practice); Pembaur v. City of Cincinnati, 475 U.S. 469, 483–84 (1986) (county prosecutor's command for police to forcibly enter a property was a final municipal policy that itself violated plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights). Count V, the claim against Defendant Village, is dismissed."); N.N. ex rel. S.S. v. Madison Metropolitan School Dist., 670 F.Supp.2d 927, 932 -41 (W.D. Wis. 2009) ("Instead of trying to defend the constitutionality of its racial balancing plan, defendant's primary response is to put the blame on the state of Wisconsin. To the extent it used race to make transfer decisions, defendant says, it was the direct result of Wis. Stat. ' 118.51(7). Under that statute, a 'school board ... shall reject any application for transfer into or out of the school district ... if the transfer would increase racial imbalance in the school district.' According to defendant, ' 118.51(7) left it with no constitutional alternative. 'The culpability of one who harms another under coercion is, and has always been, a subject of intense debate, raising profound questions of moral philosophy and individual responsibility.' Negusie v. Holder, 129 S.Ct. 1159, 1169 (2009) (Scalia, J., concurring). Similar questions arise for courts determining whether a municipality should be held accountable for implementing an unconstitutional state law or policy. On one hand, courts emphasize repeatedly that liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 is 'predicated upon fault,' e.g., Wolf-Lillie v. Sonquist, 699 F.2d 864, 869 (7th Cir.1983), suggesting that municipalities should not be required to pay damages for simply doing what they are told to do. After all, as the Supreme Court has recognized, municipalities are simply creatures of the state. E.g., Ysursa v. Pocatello Education Association, 129 S.Ct. 1093, 1100 (2009). They are not protected from 'commandeering' by the state as are states by the federal government, Printz v. United States, 521 U.S. 898 (1997), because they have no independent sovereignty. Rather, a municipality derives all of its authority from the state, which may choose to withdraw that authority whenever it wishes. . . On the other hand, courts often reject a defense of 'I was just following orders' when it is asserted by individual defendants in a civil or criminal case, including cases under § 1983. [citing cases] In the context of § 1983, the reason for rejecting such a defense is the idea that, under the Supremacy Clause, public officials have an obligation to follow the Constitution even in the midst of a contrary directive from a superior or in a policy. . . These competing concerns may be the reason circuit courts have come to varying conclusions on the questions whether and to what extent municipalities may be held liable under § 1983 for following state laws. The overarching questions in any case involving municipal liability under § 1983 are whether the unconstitutional act 'may fairly be said to represent official policy' of that municipality and whether the policy was the 'moving force' behind the violation. . . Stated another way, the question is whether there is a 'direct causal link,' City of Canton, Ohio v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378, 386 (1989), between the violation and a 'deliberate choice [by the municipality] to follow a course of action ... made from among various alternatives.' . . Although this standard is well established, the Supreme Court has yet to discuss its application in the context a municipality's enforcement of a state law. In this vacuum, lower courts have come to their own unique conclusions.[collecting cases] . . . . Although different courts may use a different part of the standard to frame their analysis, all of them seem to be trying to resolve the same question that Justice Scalia raised in Negusie, which is under what circumstances is it fair to impose punishment for 'just following orders'? Some courts believe that a municipality should not have to choose between violating (or even simply ignoring) state law and violating the Constitution; other courts believe that constitutional rights always take precedence over state law. (In Vives, 524 F.3d at 356, the court hinted at a compromise position, that a municipality could be held liable for complying with state mandates that 'are so obviously and deeply unconstitutional that the mere fact of their enforcement gives rise to a strong inference that the municipality must have made a Aconscious choice' to enforce them.") Taking the former position means that municipalities are protected from the heavy burden of undertaking an independent analysis of every state directive for compliance with the Constitution and risking a standoff with state government whenever the municipality concludes that a particular directive does not pass the test. However, it also means that victims of constitutional violations may go without a remedy; although the state might seem to be the more appropriate defendant in such cases, the Supreme Court has concluded that Congress did not intend to include states within the reach of § 1983. . . This circuit's take on the issue is set forth in two opinions, Surplus Store and Exchange, Inc. v. City of Delphi, 928 F.2d 788, 791-92 (7th Cir.1991), and Bethesda Lutheran Homes and Services, Inc. v. Leean, 154 F.3d 716, 718 (7th Cir.1998), but the discussions in both cases are relatively brief and not necessarily completely consistent. . . . . Surprisingly, the parties do not discuss the tension between Bethesda Lutheran and Surplus Store. Because it does not affect the outcome of the case, I will apply the standard in Bethesda Lutheran, which is more favorable to plaintiff.. . . Whether it is framed as an issue of 'causation,' 'policy' or 'choice,' the question under Bethesda Lutheran is whether the municipality enforcing a state law has enough discretion in implementation to make the municipality 'responsible' for any constitutional violation that occurred. . . In this case, the parties agree that, on its face, Wis. Stat. ' 118.51(7) does not give school districts a choice to comply. It states that the school district 'shall' reject transfer requests that 'would increase racial imbalance in the school district.'. . However, the difference between this case and Bethesda Lutheran is that defendant was not simply applying ' 118.51(7) directly, but applying its own interpretation of the law in its own guidelines. Although the statute requires school districts to adopt a resolution 'specifying ... the limitation on transfers into or out of the school board under sub. (7),' Wis. Stat. ' 118.51(4)(a)5, it does not tell the district how to 'specify' that 'limitation.' Plaintiff argues that the discretion left to the school district is enough to make the policy its own and justify a damages award under § 1983.. . . An important question is whether defendant could have applied Wis. Stat. ' 118.51(7) in a manner that was consistent with the Constitution. If defendant had 'various alternatives' in front of it, some constitutional, some not, but it made the 'deliberate choice to follow a course of action' that violated the Constitution, . . that would weigh heavily in favor of finding that defendant adopted an unconstitutional policy that caused plaintiff's injury. . . . In sum, defendant could not have used the discretion it had to create a constitutional transfer plan that was consistent with Wis. Stat. ' 118.51(7). Even if defendant had not used a binary racial classification system or had allowed greater racial disparities within particular schools or the school district as a whole, its plan would still be unconstitutional under Parents Involved. Defendant's transfer plan was unconstitutional not because of a particular interpretation of ' 118.51(7), but because of the statute's directive to deny all transfer requests that would 'increase racial imbalance.' . . . In this case, the policy choice was made by the state: to prohibit transfers that increase racial balance. Although it was defendant that defined 'increase racial balance,' it did so in the context of trying to implement a state mandate and a state policy. . . . In sum, I conclude that a municipality cannot be held liable under § 1983 for efforts to implement a state mandate when the plaintiff cannot point to a separate policy choice made by the municipality. In that situation 'it is the policy contained in that state or federal law, rather than anything devised or adopted by the municipality, that is responsible for the injury.'. . . Plaintiff's last argument is that defendant may be held liable because it made the 'choice' to comply with Wis. Stat. ' 118.51(7) rather than the Constitution. Although plaintiff advances a number of legitimate arguments in favor of this approach to municipal liability (mostly tracking the reasoning of Davis and Caminero), plaintiff recognizes that circuit precedent forecloses it. Under Bethesda Lutheran, 154 F.3d at 718, municipalities do not have to choose between following their own interpretation of the Constitution and putting themselves at 'war with state government.'"); Lui v. Commission on Adult Entertainment Establishments of the State of Delaware, 213 F.R.D. 166, 174, 175 (D. Del. 2003) ("Under Delaware constitutional, statutory, and decisional law, the County acts only as an agency of the State in exercising its zoning authority. . . . The County simply has no alternative but to maintain and enforce the State's policy in this regard. It would be a strange and unfair result, then, to hold that the State is immune from suit for imposing the 2,800 foot restriction but to simultaneously allow the County to be sued for following a State mandate that requires the same restriction."), aff'd on other grounds, 369 F.3d 319 (3d Cir. 2004); Johnson v. Fink, No. 1:99-CV-35-R, 1999 WL 33603131, at *3 (W.D. Ky. Sept. 17, 1999) (not reported) ("Kentucky sheriffs are county officials. However, the particular actions at issue are attributable to the state, and thus, the sheriffs were acting as state officials when they were executing the search warrant."); West v. Congemi, 28 F. Supp.2d 385, 394, 395 (E.D. La. 1998) ("The Fifth Circuit has long recognized that simply following the mandatory dictates of state law cannot form a predicate for Monell liability. . . . Chief Congemi was enforcing a constitutional Louisiana state statute, the terms of which mandate termination in the situation at issue. Once it was found that the actions of the plaintiff fell under the definition of proscribed 'direct or indirect' political activity, then the plaintiffs' § 1983 claims against the City of Kenner must necessarily fail."); Hill v. Franklin County, Ky., 757 F. Supp. 29, 32 (E.D. Ky. 1991) (decision to release intoxicated arrestee was not result of county policy where arrest and release policy was governed by state statutes), aff'd, 948 F.2d 1289 (6th Cir. 1991) (Table).

Compare Crabbs v. Scott (Crabbs I), 786 F.3d 426, 429-31 (6th Cir. 2015) ("At first blush, then, this case looks easy. Sheriff Scott is an officer of the county, not the State, and accordingly he may not invoke the State's sovereign immunity. But law-enforcement officers sometimes wear multiple hats, acting on behalf of the county and the State. In that setting—today's setting—the immunity question is not whether the officer acts for the State or county 'in some categorical, "all or nothing" manner.'. . Immunity hinges on whether the officer represents the State in the 'particular area' or on the 'particular issue' in question. . . And that depends on how state and local law treat the officer in that setting. . . Relevant factors include: (1) the State's potential liability for a judgment; (2) how state statutes and courts refer to the officer; (3) who appoints the officer; (4) who pays the officer; (5) the degree of state control over the officer; and (6) whether the functions involved fall within the traditional purview of state or local government. . . . Measured by these six factors, Sheriff Scott acted as a county, not a state, official in this instance. One: The county, not the State, would satisfy any judgment against the sheriff in this case, as the parties agree.

Two: Ohio law classifies county sheriffs as 'county officials' and 'employees.' Ohio Rev.Code §§ 301.28(A)(3), 2744.01; see Thurlow v. Bd. of Comm'rs of Guernsey Cnty., 91 N.E. 193, 194 (Ohio 1910).

Three: The voters of each county elect their own sheriff. Ohio Rev.Code § 311.01(A).

Four: Each county, not the State, pays the salary of its sheriffs and funds their offices. Id. §§ 325.01, 311.06.

Five: Each county board has 'final authority' over the sheriff's budget, State ex rel. Trussell v. Meigs Cnty. Bd. of Comm'rs, 800 N.E.2d 381, 386 (Ohio Ct.App.2003), and the sheriff serves as the county's 'chief law enforcement officer' with jurisdiction 'coextensive with' the county's borders, In re Sulzmann, 183 N.E. 531, 532 (Ohio 1932).

Six: A sheriff's law enforcement duties at common law represented local functions. See 70 Am.Jur.2d Sheriffs, Police, & Constables § 2. To be sure, the governor can initiate removal proceedings against the sheriff and issue some orders to him, Ohio Rev.Code §§ 3.08, 107.04, but that does not outweigh the rest of Ohio law and its treatment of sheriffs as local officials. Nothing in the Ohio Constitution says anything to the contrary. Cf. McMillian, 520 U.S. at 787–89. All of this explains why Ohio county sheriffs generally are treated as county policymakers. . . And all of this explains why official-capacity lawsuits against the Franklin County Sheriff challenging his law-enforcement and jail-maintenance policies normally proceed as suits against the county itself. . . Sheriff Scott tries to fend off this general rule and the application of these considerations by arguing that, for purposes of DNA collection, he serves as an officer of the State. Why? Because state law—in this case, § 2901.07—controls his DNA-collection policies. 'Where county officials are sued simply for complying with state mandates that afford no discretion,' he adds, 'they act as an arm of the State' under the Eleventh Amendment. Brotherton v. Cleveland, 173 F.3d 552, 566 (6th Cir.1999); see also, e.g., Vives v. City of N.Y., 524 F.3d 346, 353 (2d Cir.2008) (asking 'whether the City had a meaningful choice' of action under state law); Richman v. Sheahan, 270 F.3d 430, 440 (7th Cir.2001) (treating sheriff as county officer because there was 'no state policy directing the sheriff's actions'). The sheriff is right in one respect but not in another. He is right that sovereign immunity would bar this lawsuit if state law required him to take the actions he took. See Gottfried v. Med. Planning Servs., Inc., 280 F.3d 684, 692–93 (6th Cir.2002); Brotherton, 173 F.3d at 565. But he is wrong to claim that state law required him to swab Crabbs' cheek after his acquittal. '[T]he essential question is the degree of discretion possessed by the official ... implementing the contested policy.' Cady v. Arenac Cnty., 574 F.3d 334, 343 (6th Cir.2009). If Sheriff Scott's policies 'mechanically adopt and enforce' Ohio's DNA-collection law, he may invoke the State's sovereign immunity to deflect Crabbs' suit. . . If not, the State's sovereign immunity offers him no refuge. Scott's application of his DNA-collection policy to Crabbs does not flow inevitably from § 2901.07. For even if Ohio law permitted collecting Crabbs' DNA, a point we need not decide, § 2901.07 did not require it in his case for two independent reasons. For one reason, Crabbs' March 2012 arrest for violating the conditions of his bond—the only one occurring after mandatory collection of DNA from arrestees began in July 2011—was not an arrest 'for a felony offense.' . . .For another reason, no State law required Sheriff Scott to hold Crabbs for a cheek swab after the jury acquitted him. . . .In no way, then, did Sheriff Scott's DNA-collection and ID-hold policies 'mechanically adopt and enforce' Ohio law. . . Because Scott 'could have opted to act differently, ... he did not act as an arm of Ohio when he formulated and implemented the contested polic[ies].'. . That does not make those policies unconstitutional or otherwise illegal, to be clear. But it does leave the sheriff in his normal capacity as a county officer.") with Cady v. Arenac County, 574 F.3d 334, 342-45 (6th Cir. 2009) ("The defendants, in particular, never put forth an argument that Broughton was functioning as an agent of the state − and is thus entitled to sovereign immunity − in his dealings with Cady. We nonetheless conclude that Broughton was in fact acting as an agent of the state and that Cady's suit against him in his official capacity is barred by the Eleventh Amendment. . . . Relying on Brotherton v. Cleveland, 173 F.3d 552 (6th Cir.1999), the concurring opinion concludes that because County Prosecutor Broughton was not 'rotely' enforcing state law when he entered into the DPA [Deferred Prosecution Agreement], he was not acting as an arm of the state. . .We respectfully disagree. . . . The Brotherton court explained that when considering whether a contested policy is state policy, the essential question is the degree of discretion possessed by the official in question in implementing the contested policy. . . But the language of Brotherton makes clear that the 'essential question' of discretion applies only to policy choices and not to individual acts by the official in enforcing state law. The reason for this distinction is that even in 'rote' enforcement actions, a prosecutor must make a myriad of choices, such as 'whether to prosecute, what targets of prosecution to select, what investigative powers to utilize, what sanctions to seek, plea bargains to strike, or immunities to grant.'. .If any of these decisions negated 'state action" simply because the prosecutor could have 'act [ed] differently, or not at all,'. . . then very few prosecutorial actions would be considered 'state action.' Such a position is not supported by Brotherton or by other caselaw. . . This case concerns a single action − the decision to enter into the DPA − by County Prosecutor Broughton. A widespread 'policy' is not implicated here. As the concurrence points out, the DPA was the first and only such agreement ever entered into by the county prosecutor's office. The question, therefore, is not whether Broughton could have resolved the case in another manner, but whether the DPA was carried out as part of his prosecutorial duties in enforcing state law. We conclude that the situation here is analogous to a plea bargain, which has long been considered to be one of the 'critical prosecutorial decisions.'. . Prosecutor Broughton had determined, pursuant to his duty as a state prosecutor, that the best way to resolve Cady's case was to drop charges against Cady in exchange for a six-month 'cooling off' period. His actions were sufficiently analogous to plea bargaining to be considered as duties executed as an arm of the state. . . . [W]hen County Prosecutor Broughton made the decisions related to the issuance of state criminal charges against Cady, the entry of the DPA, and the prosecution of Cady, he was acting as an agent of the state rather than of Arenac County. His actions therefore cannot be attributed to Arenac County, and Arenac County cannot be held liable for Broughton's actions even if those actions violated Cady's rights.").

McNeil v. Community Probation Services, LLC, 945 F.3d 991, 993-97 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Under Tennessee law, a county sheriff enforces probation-violation warrants and the bail amounts are established by state law and set by a local judge. The district court granted the probationers a preliminary injunction against the county's and sheriff's enforcement of the bail requirements. The county and sheriff do not challenge the preliminary constitutional ruling. They argue for now only that the probationers should have sued the state judges who determine the bail amounts instead of suing the county and sheriff who enforce them. We affirm. . . .The probationers say that the county and sheriff violated their 'substantive right against wealth-based detention' by detaining them after arrest until they pay bail. . . The problem, say the probationers, is that the judges set the bail amount 'without reference to the person's ability to pay,' outside the person's presence, and without determining whether the person poses 'a danger to the community or a risk of flight.'. . The district court granted the plaintiffs a preliminary injunction against the county and sheriff on this theory. The injunction prohibits them from 'detaining any person on misdemeanor probation ... based on a secured financial condition of release.'. . The probationers acknowledge that a bail-based detention determined through a different process would work. To that end, the injunction permits the county and sheriff to enforce bail accompanied by evidence of the probationer's ability to pay, the necessity of detention, and the alternatives to bail. Sheriff Helton and Giles County appeal. Accepting the preliminary constitutional ruling for purposes of this appeal, they argue only that the district court permitted the plaintiffs to sue the wrong party and thus imposed the wrong remedy. Instead of enjoining them from enforcing the arrest warrants, they say, the court should have enjoined the judges from issuing them. . . . Start with the sheriff—and his amenability to suit. The short answer is that the plaintiffs can sue the sheriff, and it makes no difference whether he acts for the State or the county. If he acts for the State, Ex parte Young permits this injunction action against him. If he acts for the county, neither sovereign immunity, qualified immunity, nor any other defense stands in the way at this stage of the case. The longer answer, the more precise answer that accounts for some of the sheriff's arguments, requires us to consider some details of the Tennessee bail system. The threshold question is whether Sheriff Helton acted for the county or the State when he enforced the bail amounts by detaining probationers until payment. . . When a county official commits an alleged constitutional violation by 'simply [ ] complying with state mandates that afford no discretion, they act as an arm of the State,' not the county. . . Tennessee law suggests that Sheriff Helton acted for the State when he enforced the bail amounts. The Tennessee Constitution creates the office of county sheriff. . . And the state legislature prescribes a sheriff's 'qualifications and duties.'. . The legislature requires sheriffs to 'obey the lawful orders and directions of the court[s]' as well as to '[t]ake charge and custody' of the county jail 'and of the prisoners therein ... and keep them ... until discharged by law.'. . Discharged by law as told by whom? The Tennessee Supreme Court tells us. When Tennessee law does not assign anyone the duty to determine whether a county jail detainee is eligible for release, the county sheriff has the responsibility. . . When Tennessee law by contrast assigns that duty to an entity, the sheriff 'is not authorized to release' the county jail detainee until notified by the decisionmaker. . . In this instance, the condition of release is the bail amount. Tennessee entrusts the determination of that amount to its judges. . . That means

Tennessee directs Sheriff Helton to hold probationers in the county jail until they pay bail. . . And that, in turn, means he acts for the State when he takes the challenged action, detaining probationers under judge-set bail amounts. That leaves the question of whether the sheriff can be sued in an injunction action as an official enforcing state policies. In accordance with Ex parte Young, . . . sovereign immunity does not stand in the way of a lawsuit against a public official 'actively involved with administering' the alleged violation. . . Tennessee statutes command that involvement when they place the sheriff in charge of keeping detainees in the county jail. . . As a factual matter, the parties agree that Sheriff Helton carries out his statutory responsibility by detaining arrestees in the county jail. All in all, Sheriff's Helton's actions come within Ex parte Young's domain. The Sheriff disputes this conclusion on a few fronts. He claims that his detention of the probationers is not the real violation. The true problem, he says, is the way the judges set bail amounts. There's something to the point. Think of the difficulty of describing the alleged violation without mentioning a judge's action. Fair though the point is, it does not come to grips with another reality—that an alleged violation may involve two actors and the potential immunity of one does not necessarily free the other from suit. Consider the alleged violation to be two actions. Action one: A judge determines a bail amount without considering ability to pay or adequacy of alternatives. Action two: Sheriff Helton detains the probationer until she pays the bail amount. The alleged constitutional violation is detention on an improperly determined bail amount. The plaintiffs might have employed a different theory and sued the judges, if not immune themselves, for their part in carrying out the alleged harm. But 'the plaintiff is the master of the complaint' and free to choose between legal theories. . . Absent some other bar, they are free to sue the sheriff. Sheriff Helton insists that this approach unduly expands Ex parte Young by permitting an injunction against an official who implements a constitutional violation caused by another official, citing our observation that courts 'have not read Young expansively.'. . The probationers, he says, should have sought an injunction against the judges themselves, and we should not expand Ex parte Young when the probationers could receive relief by structuring their lawsuit differently. But this objection suffers from the same flaw as the last. The probationers are free to structure their complaint as they wish. Plus, this approach does not expand Ex parte Young anyway. There are plenty of cases allowing injunction actions like this one. . . . It also remains unclear whether the plaintiffs could structure their lawsuit by suing the judges who set the bail amounts. Judges have absolute immunity from suits based on their judicial acts, except in matters over which they clearly lack jurisdiction. . . Although declaratory relief is sometimes available against judges, our sister circuits have pointed out that there is usually no case or controversy between judges acting as adjudicators and litigants displeased with litigation outcomes. . . . All of this leaves the matter more complex and less settled than defendants suppose, especially given that 'we err on the side of granting [judicial] immunity in close cases.'. . For this reason too, we cannot fault the plaintiffs for taking the well-trodden path marked by Ex parte Young instead of charting a new-to-our-circuit course through the comparative jungle of judicial immunity. . . .The lawsuit also may proceed against the county for now. The county does not deny that it employs the sheriff. Nor does it deny the sheriff's involvement in the challenged detention. Nor does it claim he acted against its commands when he detained the plaintiffs. Nor does sovereign immunity protect counties from lawsuits. . . The county, it is true, may be able to raise defenses to this § 1983 claim. It may be able to show, for example, that no constitutional violation occurred or that a county policy or custom did not trigger it. . . But a few considerations counsel against resolving that defense today. At this phase of the case, the county has accepted plaintiffs' allegations that the bail system violates the federal constitution but reserved its right to defend the system during the permanent injunction phase of the case. There's value in assessing the role of any county policy in these alleged constitutional violations in the context of a concrete debate about what those violations are or are not. Discovery may shed light on whether there is a pertinent county policy or not, as the only facts in evidence are a stipulation solely for preliminary injunction purposes. And it's hard to see a practical difference between affirming a preliminary injunction against the sheriff alone and affirming it against both the county and the sheriff, at least in the context of a case in which neither one thus far defends the constitutionality of the practices here. All of that said, the district court may wish to resolve the Monell defense promptly on remand. We affirm."); Webb v. City of Maplewood, 889 F.3d 483, 484-86 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Cecelia Webb and five other motorists have filed a putative class action against the City of Maplewood, Missouri, under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, claiming its policy or custom violates their constitutional rights. They assert the City automatically issues an arrest warrant whenever someone ticketed for violating its traffic and vehicle laws fails to pay a fine or appear in court. Once arrested, the motorist is allegedly presented with a Hobson's choice: Either pay a bond the amount of which was set in advance without any determination of his ability to pay it, or sit in jail possibly for days. The plaintiffs further contend that once a warrant has been issued, a motorist cannot avoid it by voluntarily returning to the municipal court or paying the outstanding fine, but must either submit to a custodial arrest or retain a lawyer to argue a motion before the municipal judge to vacate the warrant. If the court does not grant the motion, the motorist, whose presence in court the judge allegedly demands, will be arrested and jailed. Jail, the plaintiffs assert, is the means by which the City attempts to coerce the motorist into paying the bond to secure his release. The complaint indicates that the City's policy or custom involves additional steps that can ensnare motorists in repeated cycles of arrest, jailing, and pressure to pay a bond irrespective of their ability to do so. The plaintiffs maintain that since their poverty makes it difficult if not impossible to pay the bond, the City thereby violates, among other things, their due-process and equal-protection rights. . . . The City appeals from the order denying it immunity, and we affirm. We review a district court's decision about whether a party is immune from suit de novo. . . The City argues that it enjoys immunity for two reasons: first, under the Eleventh Amendment since the municipal court, which is an arm of the State of Missouri, is responsible for most of the disputed practices and is thus the real party in interest here; and second, because the absolute immunity of the responsible officials renders the City immune as well. The City is wrong in both respects. . . . [I]n arguing for sovereign immunity, the City does not contend that it enacted or maintains the contested practices as an arm of the State, but that virtually all of the practices revolve around the municipal court, a separate and distinct entity over which it disclaims any control, and it is the court that is the arm of the State. But if the municipal court rather than the City is responsible for the practices, the City will have a defense on the merits but not immunity from suit. . . Even if the court were entitled to immunity—an issue we do not opine on—that immunity would not shield the City from its separate liability if any.")

b. Local Government Liability Where Local Entity Exercises Discretion or Control Over Enforcement of State Law

See Crabbs v. Scott (Crabbs I), 786 F.3d 426, 429-31 (6th Cir. 2015) (supra, in previous section). See also Todman v. Mayor & City Council of Baltimore, 104 F.4th 479, 487-95 (4th Cir. 2024) ("Section 1983 claims against municipalities require that a plaintiff show not only that his rights were violated, but also that the municipality was responsible for that violation. . . Although the Todmans had 'moved for summary judgment only on whether their constitutional rights were violated,' the district court found that they were also 'entitled to summary judgment on the issue of the City's responsibility for the constitutional violation.'. . The City did not object to this sua sponte ruling below, and the district court entered judgment against the City and scheduled a trial on damages. After a three-day damages trial, a federal jury awarded the Todmans $36,000 in compensatory damages and $150,000 for emotional distress. The City has not challenged the amount of that award on appeal. The City instead appeals the district court's summary judgment rulings. It argues that neither the Abandonment Ordinance nor its application to the Todmans violated due process, and that even if it did that application cannot be laid at the feet of the City. It also contends that the district court erred procedurally when it granted summary judgment on the City's responsibility without allowing the City to brief the issue first. . . . We start with the City's contention that the Todmans' procedural due process rights were not violated at all. Due process is guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment, which prohibits the states from 'depriv[ing] any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.' To establish a procedural due process violation under § 1983, plaintiffs must show (1) that they were deprived of a cognizable liberty or property interest (2) through some form of state action (3) with constitutionally inadequate procedures. . .The Todmans clearly meet the first two requirements. First, they were deprived of a protected property interest. Ownership interests in personal belongings are protected under the Due Process Clause. . . .Second, the City's Abandonment Ordinance (which is clearly a form of state action) caused that deprivation. . . .We thus conclude that the Todmans were deprived of a cognizable property interest by state action—namely, the operation of the City's Abandonment Ordinance. The first two requirements having been met, we turn to the third: whether the procedures provided here were constitutionally adequate. 'The essence of due process is the requirement that "a person in jeopardy of serious loss [be given] notice of the case against him and opportunity to meet it."'. . . The Todmans, however, received neither. . . . Here, the Todmans needed to be notified of the threat of abandonment should their personal possessions be left in the leased premises at eviction. None of the pre-hearing notices given to the Todmans as part of the state-law eviction procedures even mentioned the possibility of personal-property abandonment. So those cannot possibly have provided sufficient notice. The only notice that could even be said to have attempted to inform the Todmans of the possibility of abandonment was the copy of the warrant of restitution in their case sent to them by mail on July 17. But this notice was not sufficient either. While delivery by mail is a constitutionally sufficient method of providing notice, . . . the content of the notice mailed to the Todmans was not reasonably calculated to convey the relevant information. . . .The City points out that the warrant of restitution is a form created by the Maryland judiciary, and that the City has no control over its content. But if the state judiciary is not providing sufficient notice of the City's ordinance, the City must step in to provide that notice if it wants its ordinance to survive a due process challenge. As mentioned above, the Abandonment Ordinance includes just such additional notice requirements for other types of evictions. The City retorts that it is prohibited from requiring additional notice in holdover cases by Maryland law, which says that after satisfying the steps laid out by state law, landlords are entitled to an eviction order 'without any additional notice.' Md. Code, Pub. Local Laws, art. 4 § 9-19. But that law says they are entitled to an eviction order, not to their tenants' belongings. The City could still (consistent with state law) condition the triggering of the Abandonment Ordinance on the landlord's providing additional notice. Or it could undertake to provide such notice itself. What it cannot do is evade the requirements of the Due Process Clause by throwing up its hands and saying, 'We don't make the notice form.' Respecting one of the Constitution's most basic guarantees should be simple and straightforward. The notice due plaintiffs such as the Todmans should include the date of the eviction and the threat and consequences of abandonment. Critically, the notice should be readily accessible and easily understood and should be of a form that drafters of the ordinance would appreciate if their own property were at risk. The notice here was not sufficient. . . .Application of the three Mathews factors here makes clear that the Todmans were entitled to more process than the City provided before their personal property rights were extinguished. . . . . Given the absence here of any opportunity at all to contest the abandonment, additional safeguards would be quite valuable. Even a short post-deprivation reclamation period could decrease the risk of error significantly. . . .The City has not suggested to us any way in which its interest in keeping eviction chattels off the streets would be harmed by these additional procedures. . . . There are any number of ways, including those adopted by other jurisdictions. . . for the City to achieve its undeniably legitimate aims without extinguishing evicted tenants' entire property rights with no semblance of proper notice or opportunity for reclamation. The three Mathews factors weigh in favor of the Todmans and against the current procedural regime. It is not our job to tell the City how to achieve its objectives. The City must, however, achieve its goals in a way that complies with both state and federal law—and that includes the due process protections guaranteed in the United States Constitution. . . . We turn now to the final question: whether the City can be held liable for the due process violation the Todmans suffered. Recall that plaintiffs seeking § 1983 damages from a municipality must show not only that they suffered a constitutional violation, but also that the municipality was responsible for the violation and its attendant harm. . . Local government entities are considered responsible only for unconstitutional actions that 'implement[ ] or execute[ ] a policy statement, ordinance, regulation, or decision officially adopted and promulgated by that body's officers.'. . . The City's Abandonment Ordinance is just such an official municipal policy. . . An unconstitutional policy, however, does not immediately entitle a plaintiff to compensation. There must be a 'direct causal link' between the municipal policy and the constitutional deprivation[.] . . Here, the causal link is clear. The Abandonment Ordinance was what gave the Todmans' landlord the right to claim possession of their things with legal impunity. As a self-executing statute, it operated automatically without the interference of any other actors upon the Todmans' eviction. And the unconstitutional lack of procedure here was no accident. The Abandonment Ordinance was implemented against the Todmans in conformity with the exact procedures the municipality chose. When a municipal policy 'directly commands or authorizes constitutional violations, the causal connection between policy and violation is manifest and does not require independent proof.'. . The Abandonment Ordinance here commanded that the Todmans should forfeit their property with no notice requirement and no reclamation rights. There is thus a direct causal link between the City's policy and the violation of the Todmans' constitutional rights and the City can fairly be held responsible to them for the suffering and loss that resulted. The City tries to evade that responsibility by insisting that it does not control the eviction process—and therefore should not bear responsibility if the process was administered unconstitutionally. The City is right that evictions are administered by the Maryland state judiciary, but that is of no moment here. The procedures of the eviction process are not being challenged; the procedures surrounding the Abandonment Ordinance are what we have held were insufficient. And the confiscatory aspect of the Abandonment Ordinance is not governed by the state eviction process. State-judiciary-led eviction proceedings do not generally purport to encompass tenants' rights to their personal property or the abandonment of the same. . . . In short, the State generally provides procedures related to the disposition of the premises (a disposition that is governed by state law); procedures for carrying out the City's Abandonment Ordinance are left to the City to sort out for itself. It is true that the state judiciary (and not the City) authored the warrant of restitution that we held above provided insufficient notice. But the failure of process does not become the responsibility of the State just because the State has elected to provide some notice of the City's policy in the course of its administering evictions. When a municipality passes an ordinance purporting to affect the rights of its citizens, the municipality is the entity responsible for making sure that the ordinance does so constitutionally. Contrary to the City's protestations, this principle is in line with the edicts of Monell. Monell says that a municipality is not responsible when individuals working on behalf of the municipality commit a constitutional violation in the absence of a municipal policy. . .But each of the actors here—the state judiciary, the sheriff, and Collins—operated within the Abandonment Ordinance's scheme. The City's policy, embodied in its own ordinance, is specifically not to require notice for holdover tenants and not to provide a reclamation period. It cannot then point the finger elsewhere when notice is not given and reclamation not provided for. In sum, we think it eminently fair to hold a municipality responsible for harm caused by a failure of due process when it passes a confiscatory ordinance that fails to provide for the process due. We therefore hold that the City is responsible for the Todmans' constitutional harms and liable to them for their damages under § 1983, and affirm the district court as to the same."); Fox v. Saginaw County, Michigan, No. 21-1108, 2022 WL 523023, at *6 (6th Cir. Feb. 22, 2022) (not reported) ("Like these individual officers, the county defendants were obligated to follow Michigan law once they decided to foreclose upon property units. Unlike other county officials, however, their actions leading up to that point were entirely voluntary. The Act on its face is not a mandatory statutory scheme. See Mich. Comp. Laws § 211.78(6) (establishing that foreclosure is voluntary). The counties were not required to act as an FGU [foreclosing governmental unit] or to foreclose on any given property, and yet they chose to do so. Because it is clear that the counties 'could have opted to act differently, or not to act,' they did not act as an arm of the State of Michigan. [citing Brotherton] Accordingly, they are not entitled to sovereign immunity."); Bruce & Tanya & Assocs., Inc. v. Bd. of Supervisors of Fairfax Count., Virginia, No. 19-1151, 2021 WL 1854750, at *8–10 (4th Cir. May 10, 2021) (not reported) ("We have not definitively addressed whether Monell liability can be predicated on a local government's policy of enforcing state law. . . The majority of our sister circuits to consider the question have suggested that a local government can be subjected to Monell liability if it makes an independent choice to enforce or follow parameters set by state law, rather than being obliged to do so. [collecting cases]We find Vives instructive. There the City of New York chose to enforce a New York criminal statute that was later found to infringe the First Amendment. . . . The Vives court reasoned that '[f]reedom to act is inherent in the concept of "choice,"' and a state law 'mandating enforcement' by local government officials cannot be considered the product of a conscious choice. . . Local governments therefore 'cannot be liable under Monell in th[at] circumstance.'. . By contrast, if a local government entity 'decides to enforce a statute that it is authorized, but not required, to enforce, it may have created a ... policy' for which it can be liable. . . In sum, whether a local government entity's policy of enforcing a state statute renders it susceptible to Monell liability turns on 'whether a municipal policymaker has made a meaningful and conscious choice that caused a constitutional injury.'. . . The County can be held liable for its policy of enforcing Section 1224 because it consciously chose to enforce that particular state statute after requisite deliberation. . . Section 1225 authorizes—but does not require—Fairfax County to enter into a cooperative agreement with the Commissioner to enforce Section 1224. . . Likewise, the Agreement authorizes but does not mandate the County to enforce Section 1224 and sets parameters on its enforcement. Fairfax County's authority to enforce Section 1224 required the Board's acquiescence; it was under no obligation to enforce this state statute. In other words, the decision to enter the Agreement required county policymakers to make a conscious choice from among the various alternatives, including the alternative not to enforce the statute at all. As a result, the policy of enforcing Section 1224 is one 'for which the [County] is actually responsible' in accord with the principles of Monell liability. . .The County's policy, however, differs from the Commonwealth's policy; although the two overlap, they are not coextensive. The Commonwealth is responsible for applying the entire Code to all outdoor advertising. The County, by contrast, has decided to enforce only Section 1224, to enforce it only on certain roads and certain days of the week, and to fine only egregious violators. . . The County's policy does not incorporate other provisions of Virginia's sign regulations but is limited to signs within the limits of highways. Perhaps for that reason, the County's policy does not incorporate Section 1204, which excepts certain categories of outdoor advertising from particular provisions of Virginia's sign regulations 'if securely attached to real property or advertising structures.'. . . [O]ur question is not whether the County is complying with state law but whether the policy it voluntarily adopted and follows—whether in step with other state regulations or not—caused the alleged infringement of BTA's constitutional rights. The County did not adopt the exceptions in the pre-amendment version of Section 1204 into its policy, therefore the County cannot be liable for harms allegedly caused by those exceptions. The target of BTA's First Amendment claim is Virginia's sign regulations. Although the County can be liable for enforcing a state regulation it has voluntarily adopted as its own, it cannot be held liable for state statutes it has not consciously adopted into its own policy. Because BTA has not alleged a link between the County's policy of enforcing Section 1224 and its alleged injury, BTA's Section 1983 action against the County for violation of its First Amendment rights fails."); Sandoval v.

County of Sonoma, 912 F.3d 509, 513-14, 517-18 (9th Cir. 2018) ("California state law provides that a peace officer may impound a vehicle for 30 days if the vehicle's driver has never been issued a driver's license. Relying on this statute, local authorities in California impounded two vehicles because their drivers had not been issued California driver's licenses. . . . Section 14602.6 does not define 'driver's license.' Following a similar practice of local officials throughout the state, the Sonoma County Sherriff's Office interpreted section 14602.6 as applying to individuals who had never been issued a California driver's license. The County impounded drivers' vehicles for 30 days—pursuant to the statute—when they had never been issued a California driver's license, even if they had a license from another jurisdiction. . . . Sandoval and Ruiz also sought to hold the County and City liable for money damages as the final policymakers who caused the constitutional violations. The defendants opposed, arguing that section 14602.6 permits impoundment when the driver has never been issued a California driver's license, and that they could not be liable for enforcing state law. The district court concluded that section 14602.6 did not permit impoundment for drivers who had previously been issued foreign driver's licenses, and that the municipalities' policies interpreting section 14602.6 to do so—contrary to the law—thus caused the constitutional violations. . . . On appeal, the County and City do not dispute that they had a policy of impounding vehicles for 30 days when the drivers had never been issued a California driver's license. Instead, they argue that the 30-day impounds were mandated by state law, and that they cannot be liable under section 1983 for enforcing state law. However, California Vehicle Code § 310 defines 'driver's license' as 'a valid license to drive the type of motor vehicle or combination of vehicles for which a person is licensed under this code or by a foreign jurisdiction.'. . . Accordingly, a driver who has been issued a driver's license in a foreign jurisdiction for the type of vehicle seized has not driven that vehicle 'without ever having been issued a driver's license,' and section 14602.6 does not authorize impounding their vehicles. The impoundment of plaintiffs' vehicles was thus not caused by state law, but by the defendants' policies of impounding vehicles when the driver had never been issued a California driver's license. The district court did not err by granting summary judgment to the plaintiffs on this issue. The City argues at great length that section 14602.6 applies to any driver who has never been issued a California driver's license. But the City's arguments cannot overcome the plain language of section 310, which includes licenses by a foreign jurisdiction. . . . Given the plain meaning of section 14602.6, the County's argument that state law caused the violation of Sandoval's rights is without merit. We thus need not decide whether the County's and City's policies of towing pursuant to section 14602.6 could have given rise to liability under Monell even if the statute had authorized the impoundment of the plaintiffs' vehicle."); Newton v. City of New York, 779 F.3d 140, 151 (2d Cir. 2015) ("If procedures followed by a municipality rather than a State prove to be constitutionally inadequate, even in the context of facially adequate State procedures, then a defendant may sue the municipality for violating his due process rights on the ground that the municipality's implementation of State procedures is inadequate."); Cooper v. Dillon, 403 F.3d 1208, 1222, 1223 (11th Cir. 2005) ("Similarly, we reject Dillon's argument that, based on the reasoning in Surplus Store & Exchange, Inc. v. City of Delphi, 928 F.2d 788, 791 (7th Cir.1991), Key West cannot be liable for enforcing an unconstitutional state statute which the municipality did not promulgate or adopt. First,§ 1983 liability is appropriate because Key West did adopt the unconstitutional proscriptions in Fla. Stat.

ch. 112.533(4) as its own. See Key West, Fla., Code of Ordinances '42-1 ("It shall be unlawful for any person to commit, within the city limits, any act which is or shall be recognized by the laws of the state as an offense."). Second, Surplus Store is inapposite because it involved the enforcement of a state statute by a municipal police officer who was not in a policymaking position. . . In this case, by contrast, Dillon was clothed with final policymaking authority for law enforcement matters in Key West and in this capacity he chose to enforce the statute against Cooper. While the unconstitutional statute authorized Dillon to act, it was his deliberate decision to enforce the statute that ultimately deprived Cooper of constitutional rights and therefore triggered municipal liability. . . Thus, Dillon's decision to enforce an unconstitutional statute against Cooper constituted a 'deliberate choice to follow a course of action ... made from among various alternatives by the official or officials responsible for establishing final policy.' . . Accordingly, we find that the City of Key West, through the actions of Dillon, adopted a policy that caused the deprivation of Cooper's constitutional rights which rendered the municipality liable under § 1983."); Denton v. Bedinghaus, No. 00-4072, 2002 WL 1611472, at *4 (6th Cir. July 19, 2002) (unpublished) ("Whether a local government official or entity acts as an alter ego of the state for Eleventh Amendment purposes depends on the state-law definition of that official's or entity's functions. . . .Here, defendants argue that when they were enforcing the orders of a state court, they acted as alter egos of the state and were entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. Defendants' argument comes undone before we can fully address the merits of their Eleventh Amendment defense. The amended complaint alleges that defendants initiated and carried out the confiscation policy at issue. As explained above, based on those allegations, defendants were acting independently of a state-court order."); Richman v. Sheahan, 270 F.3d 430, 439, 440 (7th Cir. 2001) ("In determining whether the sheriff is an agent of Illinois government when performing particular functions, we have looked to the degree of control exercised by Illinois over the conduct at issue and whether the Eleventh Amendment policy of avoiding interference with state (as opposed to county) policy is offended by the lawsuit. . . . Richman's claim against the sheriff's office is based on its alleged unconstitutional policy (its failure adequately to train and supervise the deputies in deliberate indifference to the plaintiff's rights) regarding the use of force when arresting persons in the courtroom pursuant to a judge's order. Therefore, we must determine whether that alleged policy represents state policy or instead county policy. . . . The sheriff has no discretion in whether to obey a judge's orders, but we are aware of no state policy directing the sheriff's actions regarding the training and supervision of deputies in the use of force in carrying out state court orders. The evidence may show otherwise, but at this stage of the proceedings, we cannot conclude as a matter of law that the alleged unconstitutional policy represents state policy."); DePiero v. City of Macedonia, 180 F.3d 770, 786, 787 (6th Cir. 1999) ("Municipalities that meet the requirements of Ohio Rev.Code ' 1905.01 are authorized to convene mayor's courts. The statute does not, however, require a municipal corporation or its mayor to establish or maintain a mayor's court. . . . In this case, the Mayor of Macedonia is undeniably vested with the authority to make official policy regarding whether to hold and how to structure a mayor's court. . . . A mayor's decision whether to hold a mayor's court at all, and if so, whether to preside over it one's self, appoint a magistrate, or perhaps do both, are policy decisions addressing the administration of the municipality. We therefore hold that the City of Macedonia is not immune from liability for plaintiff's deprivation of due process."); Brotherton v. Cleveland, 173 F.3d 552, 563-67 (6th Cir. 1999) ("Ohio law permitted Dr. Cleveland to harvest corneas, but it did not prescribe a specific policy, especially not one which sought to prevent eye bank technicians from inquiring about objections to corneal removal. [footnote omitted] We see this case as controlled more by our decision in Garner v. Memphis Police Department. . . than by Pusey. . . .Ohio law allowed Dr. Cleveland to harvest corneas in the course of his actions as a county coroner, but it did not dictate a method. Dr. Cleveland, acting without state compulsion, chose to harvest corneas, and he selected a policy for Hamilton County; he thus acted as an agent of Hamilton County, not of Ohio."); Doby v. DeCrescenzo, 171 F.3d 858, 868, 869 (3d Cir. 1999) ("The Dobys' suggestion that the enforcement procedures should be considered a municipal or county, rather than a state, policy has merit; because the statute itself does not specify how the county delegate is to receive information and issue warrants, LVF and the county presumably have some discretion in deciding how to implement the warrant application procedure. The Garner court found the existence of such discretion determinative in deciding that a municipality could be held liable for enforcing the use of deadly force by its police officers. Ultimately, however, we believe that we need not decide whether a county or state policy is at issue because we conclude that the enforcement policy adopted by LVF and the county is constitutional."); McKusick v. City of Melbourne, 96 F.3d 478, 484 (11th Cir. 1996) ("We agree with McKusick that the development and implementation of an administrative enforcement procedure, going beyond the terms of the [state court] injunction itself, leading to the arrest of all antiabortion protestors found within the buffer zone, including persons not named in the injunction nor shown by probable cause to be acting in concert with named parties, would amount to a cognizable policy choice."); Garner v. Memphis Police Dep't, 8 F.3d 358, 364 (6th Cir. 1993) (court rejects defendants' argument that they had no choice but to follow state fleeing felon policy, holding that "[d]efendants' decision to authorize use of deadly force to apprehend nondangerous fleeing burglary suspects was, . . . a deliberate choice from among various alternatives...."), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 1219 (1994).

See also Augustus v. City of Los Angeles, No. 2:22-CV-02640-SB-AGR, 2023 WL 4291437, at *13 (C.D. Cal. May 31, 2023) ("The City also argues that the policy of conducting high-risk stops in these circumstances is taught to officers statewide by the California Commission on Peace Officer Standards and Training (POST), and therefore, it is authorized by POST and not the City. But the POST document cited by Defendants makes clear that individual law enforcement agencies have the discretion to determine which types of crimes should be considered 'high-risk' and worthy of a high-risk stop. Moreover, the City cites no authority suggesting that by adopting a policy or practice that originated elsewhere, it can insulate itself from liability when its officers follow that policy or practice. On this record, the uncontroverted evidence establishes that the LAPD had a policy of conducting high-risk stopes on cold-plated vehicles and that this policy was the moving force behind the officers' interactions with Plaintiff. . . . Because it is clear on this record that the LAPD's official policy of using high-risk stops was the moving force behind the officers' actions, Plaintiff is entitled to partial summary judgment on that aspect of its Monell claim. The Court makes no summary judgment determination as to whether the policy is constitutional. The City's motion for summary judgment is denied."); Dumiak v. Village of Downers Grove, 475 F.Supp.3d 851, 854-57 (N.D. Ill. 2020) ("The Village argues that plaintiffs fail to state a claim against the Village under Monell[.] . . The Village argues that plaintiffs were injured not by the Village ordinance, but by the Illinois statute. A municipality 'cannot be held liable under section 1983 for acts that it did under the command of state or federal law.' Bethesda Lutheran Homes & Servs., Inc. v. Leean, 154 F.3d 716, 718 (7th Cir. 1998). But the Village was under no command to enact a content based panhandling ordinance— an ordinance replicating the same constitutional flaws that doom the Illinois statute. . . . The statute allows charitable organizations to solicit money 'when expressly permitted by municipal ordinance.'. . The Village cites no provision ordering municipalities to adopt such ordinances. Panhandling might have violated both ordinance and statute, but the laws—if unconstitutional—inflicted separate harms. Village officers who enforced an unconstitutional municipal law might be liable even if state officers could have enforced an identical, equally unconstitutional state law. The Village also argues that plaintiffs never alleged that the Village cited plaintiffs for violating the ordinance. Plaintiffs allege the dates that they received citations under the Illinois statute and describe how some those citations were resolved. Plaintiffs allege little about having received citations under the Village ordinances—certainly nothing as specific as their allegations about the statute. Still, plaintiffs' allegations raise an inference that they were injured even if they were never cited under the ordinance. The ordinance discriminates against the content of plaintiffs' speech—it bans panhandling yet allows petitioning. That discrimination, even without fines, violates the First Amendment. '[I]n civil rights cases, nominal damages are appropriate when a plaintiff's rights are violated but there is no monetary injury.'"); RHJ Medical Center, Inc. v. City of DuBois, 754 F.Supp.2d 723, 764, 765 (W.D. Pa. 2010) ("The Defendant seems to assert that it is the sovereign state, and not the municipality, that should be held liable for enacting unconstitutional laws which are applied by the municipality. This cannot be correct. According to the Supreme Court's interpretation of the 11th Amendment, a state as sovereign cannot be sued in federal court by a citizen. . . . Ex parte Young would not apply in this case, as the actor seeking to enforce the state law was the City of DuBois, not an official of the Commonwealth. A suit could not proceed against any state official under Ex parte Young. According to the Defendant's theory, a suit could not lie against the City, because it was simply enforcing a state law. If the Court were to adopt the Defendant's theory, Plaintiff would be unable to sue the municipality, and would be unable to sue the state − there would be a clear violation of rights, without a remedy. This inappropriate and unacceptable conclusion would stand in the face of the bedrock principles upon which our Republic was founded. . . This holding also conflicts with the responsibility of government officials to comport their actions with our Constitution. . . . Municipalities cannot shirk their responsibility to follow this oath, and do not receive immunity for blindly following laws passed by a state."); Lowden v. County of Clare, 709 F.Supp.2d 540, 566-68 (E.D. Mich. 2010) ("The County contends that Plaintiffs have failed to allege a facially plausible municipal liability claim against it under Monell. . . . The County contends that Plaintiff's complaint does not contain any facts that support the existence of an official 'policy, custom, or practice' of the County other than a 'policy' of enforcement of state law. The County contends that an arrest, or any injury, under a Michigan statute is necessarily part of a policy of the State of Michigan, rather than any 'policy' devised or adopted by the County. The County quotes Pusey v. Youngstown, for the proposition that 'state criminal laws ... represent the policy of the state. Thus, a city official pursues her duties as a state agent when enforcing state law or policy.'. . . Plaintiffs . . . contend that the County is liable pursuant to § 1983 because enforcement of the Michigan funeral protest statute is discretionary and the County exercised its discretion to enforce it. . . . Plaintiffs contend that an officer is not required to arrest an individual who violates the funeral protest statute, and that Clare County made a deliberate policy decision to enforce the statute in the way that it did. . . . Despite the County's attempt to characterize Plaintiffs' claims otherwise, Plaintiffs contend that the Lowdens' arrests were the result of a policy choice made by the an appropriate official of the County to enforce the funeral protest statute through specific instructions to law enforcement in advance of the funeral. Plaintiffs contend that the County is liable for that policy even if it happens to be consistent with a state law. On that basis, and the reasonable inferences that can be drawn from the facts alleged in the complaint, it is plausible that Plaintiffs may be able to develop facts to demonstrate the actual existence of a municipal policy. Thus, Plaintiffs' claims for municipal liability survive Defendants' motion to dismiss or for judgment on the pleadings."); O'Donnell v. Brown, 335 F.Supp.2d 787, 816, 817 (W.D. Mich. 2004) ("The City Defendants inaptly depict the policies or customs that the police followed in entering the O'Donnell home and removing the children as those of Child Protective Services (a state agency), not of the Police Department (an entity of the City of Lansing). They contend that no Police Department policies or customs were the moving force behind the alleged violations of Plaintiff's constitutional rights. Rather, they argue, they acted based on the CPS policy that verbal authorization by a referee was adequate for entry and removal of the children. The Court rejects this characterization. There can be no question that the Lansing Police Department officers worked according to and under the authority of the Lansing Police Department's policies, and not CPS's. It is true that the family court issued orders relating to the removal of children and that CPS workers took children into custody. But it was police officers who actually performed the act of forcibly entering the home to assist in executing the court order. In fact, CPS social workers, as they themselves acknowledge, cannot go into a home to remove children unless the police lead them in. The family court may have had a 'policy' of issuing verbal orders, but it was the Police Department's 'policy' to assist CPS in carrying out those orders − and it was that departmental policy that resulted in constitutional harms to Plaintiffs in this case and thus implicates the City Defendants."); Laurie Q. v. Contra Costa County, 304 F.Supp.2d 1185, 1199-1202 (N.D. Cal. 2004) ("Defendant has failed to recognize the distinction between a government actor who correctly and faithfully carries out a policy set by the state, and one who commits non-state-sanctioned violations of law in the course of her duties under a state program. When the County accurately applies the state's mandatory foster care payment schedule (or when a law enforcement officer serves a warrant pursuant to a mandate from a state court), it acts as the former, and a plaintiff may seek recourse only against the state for establishing the policy. However, if the County incorrectly calculates benefits or embezzles funds from foster children (or when a law enforcement officer unlawfully assaults a suspect taken into custody pursuant to a mandate from state court), it acts as the latter, and a plaintiff may seek recourse against the County. . . . The court finds that the County acts as an independent policymaker (rather than a state instrumentality) for the purposes of section 1983 when it misapplies, miscalculates, or otherwise fails to distribute foster care benefits in violation of state and federal law."); Hale O

Kaula Church v. Maui Planning Commission, 229 F.3d 1056, 1069 (D. Haw.2002) ("The State of Hawaii has delegated its discretionary power to grant or deny special use permits for small lots. Nothing, however, indicates it will pay or indemnify for money judgments against counties for damages for the counties' unconstitutional exercise of such discretion. The government function at issue is a County function, even if done pursuant to the State Land Use Law."); Allen v. Leis, 154 F. Supp.2d 1240, 1263, 1264 (S.D. Ohio 2001) ("Where county officials are sued simply for complying with state mandates that afford no discretion, they act as an arm of the State. . . . In contrast, this case implicates Sheriff Leis and the Commissioners in their official policymaking capacity. . . Rather than merely enforcing prescribed Ohio law, the County Defendants voluntarily implemented a Pay-for-Stay Program and they chose the means of enforcing this Program using the Book-in-Fee guidelines. . . Therefore, all of the named Defendants acted as agents of Hamilton County, not of the State of Ohio."); Community Health Care Association of New York v. DeParle, 69 F. Supp.2d 463, 475, 476 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) ("The question posed on this motion is whether the County can be held responsible for the violation of federal law where its RFP [request for proposal] was approved by the HCFA [Health Care Financing Administration]. . . . Our Court of Appeals has not addressed the issue of what effect, if any, the federal government's mandate or authorization of a municipal policy has on that municipality's liability for the policy under § 1983. The Court in Caminero, however, conducted an extensive examination of this issue to hold that in cases in which a plaintiff alleges that a municipality violated a constitutional right by adopting an unconstitutional policy that was in some way authorized or mandated by state law, the municipality can be held liable under § 1983. . . . Likewise, where, as here, the County is responsible for administration of the Medicaid managed care program, a finding of liability on the part of the County is not inappropriate despite the Federal government's supervisory role. Here, County defendant adopted a policy, authorized by the HCFA, which did not guarantee reasonable cost reimbursement in Medicaid managed care contracts and did not allow for its election."); Smith v. City of Dayton, 68 F. Supp.2d 911, 917, 918 (S.D. Ohio 1999) ("In Kallstrom, the Sixth Circuit held the City of Columbus could be liable despite the fact that it, like the City of Dayton here, was carrying out an unconstitutional state-created policy, rather than its own policy. While it seems anomalous to hold a city liable for following a mandatory state law which had not yet been declared unconstitutional, the Sixth Circuit did not pause on this question. This Court accordingly assumes a municipality may be held liable under § 1983 for carrying out an unconstitutional state law, even though the law has not yet been held unconstitutional."); Rossi v. Town of Pelham, No. CIV. 96-139-SD, 1997 WL 816160, *20 (D.N.H. Sept. 29, 1997) (not reported) ("Rossi claims that Pelham officials enforced New Hampshire Revised Statutes Annotated (RSA) 41:36, which requires the outgoing tax collector's documents to be surrendered to the board of selectmen, in an unconstitutional manner by deploying Officer Cunha to perform a warrantless search of Rossi's office. Thus, the 'policy' is constituted by the unconstitutional manner that Pelham officials chose to enforce state law, rather than, as in Surplus Store, the 'innocuous' act of enforcing state law. This Pelham policy was the moving force behind the constitutional violation, not the otherwise lawful RSA 41:36."); Davis v. City of Camden, 657 F.Supp. 396, 402-04 (D.N.J.1987) (defendant county could be held liable under Section 1983 for its official adoption of an unconstitutional policy of strip searching persons in county jail even though that policy was mandated by state law).

See generally Caminero v. Rand, 882 F. Supp. 1319, 1325 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (reviewing cases in this area and concluding that cases "suggest a reasoned distinction between (1) cases in which a plaintiff alleges that a municipality inflicted a constitutional deprivation by adopting an unconstitutional policy that was in some way authorized or mandated by state law and (2) cases in which a plaintiff alleges that a municipality, which adopted no specific policy in the area at issue, caused a constitutional deprivation by simply enforcing state law. While allegations of the former type have been found to provide a basis for Section 1983 liability, [cites omitted] allegations of the latter variety may not [footnote omitted] provide a remedy against the municipality[. cites omitted]").

See also Bruce & Tanya & Assocs., Inc. v. Bd. of Supervisors of Fairfax Count., Virginia, No. 19-1151, 2021 WL 1854750, at *8–10 (4th Cir. May 10, 2021) (not reported) ("We have not definitively addressed whether Monell liability can be predicated on a local government's policy of enforcing state law. . . The majority of our sister circuits to consider the question have suggested that a local government can be subjected to Monell liability if it makes an independent choice to enforce or follow parameters set by state law, rather than being obliged to do so. [collecting cases] We find Vives instructive. . . . The Vives court reasoned that '[f]reedom to act is inherent in the concept of "choice,"' and a state law 'mandating enforcement' by local government officials cannot be considered the product of a conscious choice. . . Local governments therefore 'cannot be liable under Monell in th[at] circumstance.'. . By contrast, if a local government entity 'decides to enforce a statute that it is authorized, but not required, to enforce, it may have created a ... policy' for which it can be liable. . . In sum, whether a local government entity's policy of enforcing a state statute renders it susceptible to Monell liability turns on 'whether a municipal policymaker has made a meaningful and conscious choice that caused a constitutional injury.'. . . The County can be held liable for its policy of enforcing Section 1224 because it consciously chose to enforce that particular state statute after requisite deliberation. . . Section 1225 authorizes—but does not require—Fairfax County to enter into a cooperative agreement with the Commissioner to enforce Section 1224. . . Likewise, the Agreement authorizes but does not mandate the County to enforce Section 1224 and sets parameters on its enforcement. Fairfax County's authority to enforce Section 1224 required the Board's acquiescence; it was under no obligation to enforce this state statute. In other words, the decision to enter the Agreement required county policymakers to make a conscious choice from among the various alternatives, including the alternative not to enforce the statute at all. As a result, the policy of enforcing Section 1224 is one 'for which the [County] is actually responsible' in accord with the principles of Monell liability. . . The County's policy, however, differs from the Commonwealth's policy; although the two overlap, they are not coextensive. The Commonwealth is responsible for applying the entire Code to all outdoor advertising. The County, by contrast, has decided to enforce only Section 1224, to enforce it only on certain roads and certain days of the week, and to fine only egregious violators. . . The County's policy does not incorporate other provisions of Virginia's sign regulations but is limited to signs within the limits of highways. Perhaps for that reason, the County's policy does not incorporate Section 1204, which excepts certain categories of outdoor advertising from particular provisions of Virginia's sign regulations 'if securely attached to real property or advertising structures.'. .

Neither Section 1225 nor the Agreement mention Section 1204, and although the DCC Policy explicitly lists exceptions to enforcement, it does not include the exceptions in Section 1204 or otherwise purport to apply that statute. BTA's complaint does not allege any other source of County policy regarding the enforcement of Section 1224 or any custom outside the written policy. But BTA contends that the County's policy must implicitly incorporate Section 1204's exceptions in order to comply with state law. The County persuasively explains how its enforcement policy accords with the broader scheme of Virginia sign regulation. But more fundamentally, our question is not whether the County is complying with state law but whether the policy it voluntarily adopted and follows—whether in step with other state regulations or not—caused the alleged infringement of BTA's constitutional rights. The County did not adopt the exceptions in the pre-amendment version of Section 1204 into its policy, therefore the County cannot be liable for harms allegedly caused by those exceptions. The target of BTA's First Amendment claim is Virginia's sign regulations. Although the County can be liable for enforcing a state regulation it has voluntarily adopted as its own, it cannot be held liable for state statutes it has not consciously adopted into its own policy. Because BTA has not alleged a link between the County's policy of enforcing Section 1224 and its alleged injury, BTA's Section 1983 action against the County for violation of its First Amendment rights fails."); Vives v. City of New York, 524 F.3d 346, 349-58 (2d Cir. 2008) ("Where a plaintiff claims a constitutional violation as a consequence of the decision of a municipality to enforce an unconstitutional state statute, blame could theoretically be allocated three ways: first, to the state that enacted the unconstitutional statute; second, to the municipality that chose to enforce it; and third, to the individual employees who directly violated plaintiff's rights. As a practical matter, however, damages are not available against the state because it is not a person within the meaning of Section 1983. Will v. Mich. Dep't of State Police, 491 U.S. 58, 64 (1989). Moreover, like the individual defendants in this case, individual employees will often be able to successfully assert qualified immunity. Thus, the plaintiff will often be left to assert his damages claim only against the municipality. . . . The crux of the City's argument is that although it has a 'policy in fact' of enforcing the Penal Law, it is the State's enactment of Section 240.30(1) that caused Vives's constitutional violation. The City contends that '[a] municipality does not implement or execute a policy officially adopted and promulgated by its officers when it merely enforces the Penal Law of the State that created it.'. . . The issue of whether − and under what circumstances − a municipality can be liable for enforcing a state law is one of first impression in this circuit. It is also one of great significance both to injured citizens, who may be able to recover against a municipality when other avenues of recovery are cut off if we rule in favor of Vives, and to municipalities, which may incur significant and unanticipated liability in the same event. Like the district court, we look to the decisions of other circuits for guidance, but we bear in mind that these decisions are useful only insofar as they illuminate the foundational question of whether a municipal policymaker has made a meaningful and conscious choice that caused a constitutional injury. Three circuits − the Sixth, Ninth, and Eleventh − have issued decisions that, to varying degrees, support plaintiff's contention that a municipality engages in policy making when it determines to enforce a state law that authorizes it to perform certain actions but does not mandate that it do so. . . . While these decisions can be read to suggest that a distinction should be made between a state law mandating municipal action and one that merely authorizes it, in each case the policymaker was alleged to have gone beyond merely enforcing the state statute. . . . The City's position is supported − again to varying degrees − by Fourth, Seventh, and Tenth Circuit authority. . . . As with the cases supporting plaintiff's position, none of these decisions is squarely on point. . . . Freedom to act is inherent in the concept of 'choice.' Therefore, in addressing the conscious choice requirement, we agree with all circuits to address state laws mandating enforcement by municipal police officers that a municipality's decision to honor this obligation is not a conscious choice. As a result, the municipality cannot be liable under Monell in this circumstance. . . On the other hand, if a municipality decides to enforce a statute that it is authorized, but not required, to enforce, it may have created a municipal policy. However, we do not believe that a mere municipal directive to enforce all state and municipal laws constitutes a city policy to enforce a particular unconstitutional statute. In our view, the 'conscious' portion of the 'conscious choice' requirement may be lacking in these circumstances. While it is not required that a municipality know that the statute it decides to enforce as a matter of municipal policy is an unconstitutional statute, . . . it is necessary, at a minimum, that a municipal policymaker have focused on the particular statute in question. We, therefore, hold that there must have been conscious decision making by the City's policymakers before the City can be held to have made a conscious choice. . . Evidence of a conscious choice may, of course, be direct or circumstantial. . . These conclusions lead us to two subsidiary questions, neither of which can be resolved on the record before us: (1) whether the City had a meaningful choice as to whether it would enforce Section 240.30(1); and (2) if so, whether the City adopted a discrete policy to enforce Section 240.30(1) that represented a conscious choice by a municipal policymaker. . . . Among the questions on remand is whether the City had the power to instruct its officers not to enforce a portion of Section 240.30(1) because it was unconstitutional or a waste of resources, or for some other reason. . . . We found no precedent addressing the issue we believe to be controlling: whether the Police Department's policy makers can instruct its officers not to enforce a given section-or portion thereof − of the penal law. . . . In an effort to resolve our uncertainty concerning the existence of a state mandate to enforce state penal law, we directed the parties to consider whether New York City Charter ' 435(a) constitutes such a mandate. It provides: The police department and force shall have the power and it shall be their duty to ... enforce and prevent the violation of all laws and ordinances in force in the city; and for these purposes to arrest all persons guilty of violating any law or ordinance for the suppression or punishment of crimes or offenses. . . . The City argues that because Section 435(a) derives from state-enacted Section 315, it 'is ... a generalized State policy, not a municipal enactment.'. . However, the City also steadfastly refuses to deny that it lacks case-by-case discretion in determining whether to enforce any particular penal statute and suggests that it can make policy decisions about which statutes to enforce in the course of allocating its resources. Focusing on the charter provision as it exists today and not on its history, Vives contends that it cannot be viewed as a mandate from the state because it was adopted by the voters of the City. . . . In light of the unclear case law and the parties' differing positions on Section 435(a), the central question of whether the City is mandated by New York State to enforce all penal laws remains unresolved. We would benefit − and we believe the district court would as well − from the New York Solicitor General's view of the obligation of the New York Police Department to enforce the Penal Law. Further, the state has an interest in this question that is not adequately represented by either of the parties. Vives, of course, seeks to maximize the City's permissible discretion. And, while it may be in the City's interest in this case to claim that it has an overall duty to enforce the penal law, it might not be in its interest generally to argue that its discretion is constrained. Since the City's apparent concession on this point may not be definitive, we expect on remand that the district court as well as the parties would welcome the views of the New York Solicitor General on this issue. . . . We have held today that a municipality cannot be held liable simply for choosing to enforce the entire Penal Law. . . In light of that holding, we must know whether the City went beyond a general policy of enforcing the Penal Law to focus on Section 240.30(1). Section 435(a) on its face establishes that the City has a general policy of enforcing state penal law. This is not enough. However, there is some evidence − albeit not conclusive evidence − that the City did make a conscious choice to enforce Section 240.30(1) in an unconstitutional manner. This evidence is in the form of examples of how an individual can violate Section 240.30(1) that are contained in police department training manuals issued to prospective police officers. . . . Resolution of the policy issue should also resolve the issue of causation. Relying principally on Board of County Commissioners of Bryan County v. Brown, 520 U.S. 397 (1997), the City urges that the violation of Vives's constitutional rights was not caused by its intentional act. Rather, the City contends, the injury to Vives was a result of actions taken by the actors who have immunity in this case − the state, which enacted Section 240.30, and the individual officers. While we agree that Bryan County sets out the appropriate test for determining whether a municipal action caused a constitutional injury, we disagree with the City's claim that application of the Bryan County test to the facts of this case does not allow a finding that the City's policy caused Vives's injury. . . . In light of Bryan County and Amnesty America, the answer to the causation inquiry must flow from the district court's unappealed holding that Section 240.30 is unconstitutional, and the determination − yet to be definitively made − of whether a City policymaker made a conscious choice to instruct officers to enforce Section 240.30(1) when the City was not required to do so."); Panzella v. Sposato, 863 F.3d 210, 218 n.8 (2d Cir. 2017) ("The County also argues that its adherence to New York law regarding the treatment of the firearms did not constitute a 'policy' as required for a county to be liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 pursuant to Monell v. Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658 (1978). See Vives v. N.Y.C., 524 F.3d 346, 353–56, 358 (2d Cir. 2008) (holding that city's enforcement of the entire state penal code would not constitute a "city policy" because the city was required to follow state law). Leaving aside the fact that we are here dealing with an injunction and not liability, this argument has no application here, because there was no state law being applied.").

See also Brewster v. City of Los Angeles, 672 F.Supp.3d 872, ___ (C.D. Cal. 2023) ("As it has claimed throughout this case, even though there is no question that the Impound Policy qualifies as a municipal 'policy' for purposes of finding Section 1983 liability, the City asserts that Plaintiffs have no basis to assert Monell . . . liability against it. The City's argument can be summarized as follows: Section 14602.6 authorized and/or required it to do what it did, and the statute therefore caused Plaintiffs' injuries, not the City. Defendants know the implications of this argument. Since damages are not available against the State of California, and any individual state official may be eligible for qualified immunity, Defendants' position is this: even if the impounds violated the constitutional rights of tens of thousands of people, there is nothing Plaintiffs can do about it. Fortunately, Defendants are wrong: the Impound Policy caused Plaintiffs' injuries and the City of Los Angeles is thus liable for them. . . . Essentially, now that the Ninth Circuit has held that Defendants' longstanding view of their legal authority is wrong, and because they have no real argument that their actions were constitutional under the framework set out in Brewster . . . and Sandoval, . . . the City has sent its lawyers to convince this Court that they never had a choice in the matter, and thus they cannot be held liable. But that is not true: the City had choices. It chose to exercise its policymaking discretion in favor of a particular approach. . . . . And since all of this is essentially a plea to impermissibly smuggle in good faith or qualified immunity principles into the Monell context, as noted below, the City remains liable even if the Impound Policy was, in part, a means to enforce a particular statute. . . . The Supreme Court decisions on which Defendants rely – and, indeed, much of the case law on Monell liability – clarifies the line between municipal liability and the liability of individual officers where there is no clearly adopted, generally applicable policy. But the Supreme Court has not offered much guidance on the key question here: to what extent can a municipality be liable under § 1983 for enacting a policy that, in part, enforces a state statute? . . . . Before applying relevant lower court authorities, it is useful to explain why the statutory scheme afforded Defendants' complete discretion to enforce Section 14602.6 at all, and certainly did not require them to apply it in an unconstitutional manner. . . . Having determined the broad discretion within which Defendants chose to act, the Court returns to the circuit and district court authority that further establishes the propriety of Monell liability in this case. The central Ninth Circuit authority on this question is Evers v. County of Custer, in which the Ninth Circuit considered the defendant county's argument that it was not liable 'because it was merely acting according to state law, rather than carrying out County policy.'. . . Applying Evers, a number of Ninth Circuit district court decisions have found municipalities could be liable for actions taken pursuant to state statutes. [collecting cases] The Second Circuit's framework set out in Vives, . . . is also instructive. . . . A straightforward application of Vives here makes the City liable: the City made a 'meaningful and conscious choice' because it knew it had complete discretion as to how to enforce Section 14602.6 or whether to enforce it all, it exercised that discretion by enforcing it as to some people but not others, and it made that choice based on punishment and deterrence rationales that are inconsistent with the Fourth Amendment. . . . In summary, the Impound Policy is exactly the type of official, generally applicable policy for which local governments may be held liable pursuant to Monell. The Impound Policy was the but-for and proximate cause of Plaintiffs injuries; the City's Impound Policy was the 'moving force' behind the constitutional violations and the City 'itself is the wrongdoer.'. . Ninth Circuit precedent instructs that the fact that a municipal defendant acted pursuant to state law 'goes only to the question of [the individual officials'] good faith in applying the statute' and is irrelevant to whether a municipal action is a policy under Monell. . . 'Good faith' is simply not a defense to municipal liability. Towards the end of their briefing on Monell liability, Defendants finally say the quiet part out loud when they argue that 'S07 could not be a proximate cause because it is not reasonably foreseeable that subjecting a vehicle to a 30-day impound would violate someone's Fourth or Fifth Amendment rights.'. . If that sounds like a plea for qualified immunity based on the assertion that it did not 'foresee' that Brewster . . . would come out the way it did, that is because it is. Or, put another way, it is an improper appeal for 'backdoor municipal immunity.' See Joanna C. Schwartz, Backdoor Municipal Immunity, 132 YALE L.J. FORUM 136 (2022). It has long been the law that 'municipalities do not enjoy immunity from suit -- either absolute or qualified -- under § 1983.'. . The City may wish the law were otherwise, but municipalities cannot escape liability for constitutional violations by arguing that the law was not clearly established at the time of the violations."); Martin v. Gross, 340 F.Supp.3d 87, 92-101 (D. Mass. 2018) (on summary judgment motion), affirmed in part, vacated in part and remanded by Project Veritas Action Fund v. Rollins, 982 F.3d 813 (1st Cir. 2020) ("These two cases challenge the application of Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 272, § 99 ("Section 99") to secret audio recordings in Massachusetts. . . Section 99, in relevant part, criminalizes the willful 'interception' of any 'communication.'. . An 'interception' occurs when one is able 'to secretly hear, secretly record, or aid another to secretly hear or secretly record the contents of any wire or oral communication through the use of any intercepting device' without the consent of 'all parties to such communication.'. . Thus, the statute does not apply to open (or non-secret) recording or to video recording (without audio). . . The plaintiffs in Martin argue that Section 99 violates the First Amendment insofar as it prohibits the secret audio recording of police officers performing their duties in public. The plaintiff in Project Veritas makes a similar, though broader, argument: that Section 99 violates the First Amendment insofar as it prohibits the secret audio recording of government officials performing their duties in public. The parties in each case also clash over certain ancillary issues that are discussed in more detail below. On the core constitutional issue, the Court holds that secret audio recording of government officials, including law enforcement officials, performing their duties in public is protected by the First Amendment, subject only to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions. Because Section 99 fails intermediate scrutiny when applied to such conduct, it is unconstitutional in those circumstances. . . . [T]he Court interprets Glik as standing for the proposition that the First Amendment protects the right to record audio and video of government officials, including law enforcement officers, performing their duties in public, subject only to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions. . . . The police commissioner . . . argues that merely training police officers on how to enforce Section 99 is not a municipal policy for purposes of a § 1983 claim. More pointedly, he argues that even under the framework of Vives v. City of New York, 524 F.3d 346 (2d Cir. 2008), the record does not demonstrate a municipal 'choice' to enforce Section 99. He also argues that the plaintiffs' fear of making secret recordings is caused by Section 99 itself, not by any municipal policy to enforce Section 99, and therefore the plaintiffs have failed to show a causal connection between any municipal policy and their alleged harm. The plaintiffs argue that nothing requires BPD to enforce Section 99 against individuals who secretly record police. Therefore, enforcement of the law must be the result of a conscious policy choice by the city, as evidenced by repeated efforts to train officers on Section 99. The plaintiffs further argue that answering the question on the existence of a municipal policy simultaneously resolves the causation question. . . . The parties first dispute the appropriate legal standard for evaluating the existence of a 'policy' for purposes of a Monell claim -- an issue on which courts have diverged. The plaintiffs argue that the Court should apply the Second Circuit's framework from Vives, as it did at the motion to dismiss. Under Vives, the existence of a municipal 'policy' depends on '(1) whether the City had a meaningful choice as to whether it would enforce [the statute in question]; and (2) if so, whether the City adopted a discrete policy to enforce [the statute in question] that represented a conscious choice by a municipal policymaker.'. . The police commissioner urges the Court to adopt the Seventh Circuit's decision in Surplus Store & Exchange, Inc. v. City of Delphi, which stated:

It is difficult to imagine a municipal policy more innocuous and constitutionally permissible, and whose causal connection to the alleged violation is more attenuated, than the "policy" of enforcing state law. If the language and standards from Monell are not to become a dead letter, such a "policy" simply cannot be sufficient to ground liability against a municipality.

928 F.2d 788, 791–92 (7th Cir. 1991). The First Circuit has not weighed in on this question, aside from brief dicta in a concurrence that positively cited Surplus Store. . . Surplus Store does not govern here because the record demonstrates that BPD has done more than merely 'enforc[e] state law.' Rather, BPD has highlighted what it believes Section 99 allows (open recording of police officers) and does not allow (secret recording of police officers). To show the existence of a municipal policy, the plaintiffs rely on an array of BPD training materials that discuss Section 99, including a video and a training bulletin. . . . These materials -- particularly the video and bulletin -- demonstrate why Surplus Store is inapt here. They instruct officers that Section 99 permits open, but not secret, recording of police officers' actions. But Glik did not clearly restrict itself to open recording. Rather, it held that the First Amendment provides a 'right to film government officials or matters of public interest in public space.'. . The right is 'fundamental and virtually self-evident,' subject only to reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions. . . The BPD training materials narrowly read this holding, which amounts to more than mere enforcement of state law.

The same considerations demonstrate the existence of a policy under the two-prong Vives test. The parties do not dispute the first prong. That is, they seem to agree -- correctly -- that local police have discretion about whether and when to enforce Section 99. The second prong asks whether BPD has adopted a 'discrete policy' to enforce Section 99 that 'represent[s] a conscious choice by a municipal policymaker.'. . The police commissioner does not dispute that these training materials exist and have been disseminated to BPD personnel. Because there is no genuine dispute as to this factual basis for the alleged municipal policy, the only remaining question is one of law, appropriate for resolution on summary judgment: Do these training materials evince a conscious choice' by BPD to enforce Section 99? The answer is yes. Although an individual police officer retains discretion about whether to arrest someone for violating Section 99, the training materials cited above make clear that BPD 'put flesh on the bones' of Section 99 and 'apparently instructed officers that they could make arrests' for what the plaintiffs now claim was constitutionally protected conduct. . . The video, bulletin, and manuals all speak with one voice regarding when Section 99 is and is not violated. The Court concludes, as a matter of law, that this evidence demonstrates a 'conscious choice' and amounts to a municipal policy for purposes of a Monell claim. The police commissioner protests that BPD's guidance was in accordance with, and pursuant to, cases interpreting Section 99, and it is unfair to subject BPD to liability for trying to ensure that its officers comply with the law. He also argues that finding a municipal policy here will create 'a perverse incentive not to train police officers.' But the training materials go beyond telling officers when it is impermissible to arrest; taking a narrow construction of Glik, they also communicate that it is permissible to arrest for secretly audiorecording the police under all circumstances. In other words, it gives the green light to arrests that, as the Court holds below, are barred by Glik. As the plaintiffs predicted, this analysis also resolves the causation question. 'Where a plaintiff claims that a particular municipal action itself violates federal law, or directs an employee to do so, resolving these issues of fault and causation is straightforward.'. . Here, the commissioner acknowledges that BPD's training materials were intended to ensure that officers complied with Glik. But Glik did not distinguish between First Amendment protection applicable to audio and video recording. BPD's policymakers interpreted (in the Court's view, misinterpreted) the case as permitting arrest for secret audio recording in all circumstances without regard for the First Amendment interest at stake of police performing their duties in public. BPD's policies narrowly interpreting Glik caused the injury complained of in this case. Accordingly, the Court concludes that the plaintiffs have proven the existence of a municipal policy and causation for purposes of their Monell claim against the police commissioner."); Martin v. Evans, 241 F.Supp.3d 276, 284-85 (D. Mass. 2017) (on motion to dismiss) ("BPD Commissioner Evans argues that the complaint does not adequately plead Monell liability because the city is enforcing a statute passed by the state legislature, not adopting its own policy. He argues that a city cannot be liable for simply enforcing state law. This legal issue has not yet been fully addressed by the First Circuit. . . .Evans argues that the BPD cannot be liable for enforcing state law because a municipality's enforcement of state law is not a city policy or custom within the meaning of Monell . . . Evans relies primarily on the Seventh Circuit's decision in Surplus Store & Exchange, Inc. v. City of Delphi, which stated: 'It is difficult to imagine a municipal policy more innocuous and constitutionally permissible, and whose causal connection to the alleged violation is more attenuated, than the "policy" of enforcing state law. If the language and standards from Monell are not to become a dead letter, such a "policy" simply cannot be sufficient to ground liability against a municipality.'. . The First Circuit has not weighed in on this question, aside from brief dicta in a concurrence, Yeo v. Town of Lexington, 131 F.3d 241, 257 (1st Cir. 1997) (Stahl, J., concurring), that positively cited Surplus Store. But the Second Circuit later wrote: '[W]e agree with all circuits to address state laws mandating enforcement by municipal police officers that a municipality's decision to honor this obligation is not a conscious choice. As a result, the municipality cannot be liable under Monell in this circumstance. On the other hand, if a municipality decides to enforce a statute that it is authorized, but not required, to enforce, it may have created a municipal policy. However, we do not believe that a mere municipal directive to enforce all state and municipal laws constitutes a city policy to enforce a particular unconstitutional statute.... [I]t is necessary, at a minimum, that a municipal policymaker have focused on the particular statute in question. We, therefore, hold that there must have been conscious decision making by the City's policymakers before the City can be held to have made a conscious choice.' Vives v. City of N.Y., 524 F.3d 346, 353 (2d Cir. 2008) . . . The Second Circuit remanded to the district court for determination of '(1) whether the City had a meaningful choice as to whether it would enforce [the statute in question]; and (2) if so, whether the City adopted a discrete policy to enforce [the statute in question] that represented a conscious choice by a municipal policymaker.'. .Applying the framework articulated by the Second Circuit, the complaint sufficiently alleges a conscious decision by the BPD to enforce Section 99. The complaint alleges: 'BPD's official training materials instruct officers that they may arrest and seek charges against private individuals who secretly record police officers performing their duties in public.'. . The complaint also alleges that a BPD Academy Training Bulletin 'instructs police officers that they have a "right of arrest" whenever a person' secretly records oral communications. . . Finally, the complaint alleges that a 2010 BPD training video 'instruct[ed] police officers that they could arrest private individuals who secretly recorded police officers performing their duties in public.'. . These factual allegations suggest that the BPD has affirmatively and consciously chosen to educate officers about Section 99 and its particular application to the recording of officers' activities. The plaintiffs adequately plead a Monell claim against BPD Commissioner Evans.")

c. Inter-Governmental Agreements/ Task Forces

See, e.g., S.M. v. Lincoln Cty. Missouri, 874 F.3d 581, 585-89 (8th Cir. 2017) ("A unique aspect in applying these established municipal-liability principles to this case is the central role played by the multi-agency Drug Court. Though generally authorized by state statute, the Drug Court was established by a lengthy August 2006 Memorandum of Understanding ("MOU") between the Forty-Fifth Circuit Court, 'the local Defense Bar, The Sheriffs of Lincoln and Pike Counties, Department of Corrections District Office of Probation and Parole, and designated substance abuse treatment providers.'. . .In Krigbaum, we noted that '[t]he Drug Court's multi-agency membership resulted in significant confusion and ignorance regarding who was supervising Edwards on a day-to-day basis when he served as tracker.'. . .Lincoln County argues the evidence was insufficient to show that the County is liable for failing to supervise Edwards while he worked as Drug Court tracker because Sheriff Krigbaum thought the Drug Court supervised Edwards when serving as tracker, Krigbaum lacked actual knowledge of Edwards's misconduct, and no testimony connected the Sheriff's Department to knowledge of Edwards's misdeeds. But this argument fails to take into account the failure-to-supervise instructions submitted to the jury without objection. For each plaintiff, the jury was instructed that its verdict will be against Lincoln County if it finds:
First: The Lincoln County Sheriff, as policy maker for Defendant Lincoln County, was responsible for supervising Scott Edwards as Drug Court Tracker; and Second: Defendant Lincoln County's supervision of Scott Edwards as Drug Court Tracker was inadequate; and Third: The need for supervision by Defendant Lincoln County was so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of [each Plaintiff's] constitutional rights, that the policy maker for Defendant Lincoln County can reasonably be said to have been 'deliberately indifferent' to the need for such supervision; and Fourth: The failure of Defendant Lincoln County to supervise Scott Edwards as Drug Court Tracker was the cause of the injuries to [each Plaintiff].
Two aspects of this instruction are of critical importance to this appeal. In the first instruction, the person identified as Lincoln County policy maker was not Sheriff Michael Krigbaum; it was 'The Lincoln County Sheriff.' Thus, in determining supervisory responsibilities, the jury was instructed that it could consider, as plaintiffs argued, that 'the Sheriff' signed an MOU agreeing to be a fully participating Drug Court team member, whether or not Krigbaum ever understood the Sheriff's Drug Court responsibilities or even read the MOU. The Third instruction, which exactly tracked the above-quoted liability standard from Canton as quoted by this court in Liebe, permitted the jury to find that the need for supervision was 'so obvious' because of danger signals that were apparent to other Drug Court team members but were never conveyed to Sheriff Krigbaum, who ignored Drug Court activities altogether. In a 'no supervision' case involving a municipal-liability claim against one agency participant, a novel and potentially critical legal issue is whether a need for supervision that became obvious to other agencies' officials can establish the deliberate indifference of a Lincoln County Sheriff who was unaware of the danger signals. However, as Lincoln County failed to object to the district court's verdict director, the only issue before us is whether the trial evidence permitted a reasonable jury to find for the plaintiffs on the elements of the claim as instructed. Turning to the specific sufficiency issues, the County's principal defense at trial was that Sheriff Krigbaum was not responsible for supervising Edwards as Drug Court tracker. But the trial evidence was clearly sufficient to permit a reasonable jury to find, as they were instructed, that the Lincoln County Sheriff, as a Lincoln County policy maker, was responsible for supervising Scott Edwards as Drug Court Tracker. The terms of the MOU, standing alone, support this finding. And the testimony of Judge Burkemper that the Drug Court considered the agency providing a particular team member to be that person's 'supervisor' gave the jury a common-sense basis for resolving an issue that, in hindsight, was left unresolved when the Drug Court was established, with disastrous results. One of the two critical fact issues at trial was whether the need to supervise Edwards as tracker was, in the words of the jury instruction, 'so obvious ... that the policy maker for Defendant Lincoln County can reasonably be said to have been "deliberately indifferent" to the need for such supervision.' Though this instruction followed the language of the deliberate indifference test articulated in Canton, it arguably did not give the jury an accurate sense of how rigorously the standard must be applied 'to ensure that the municipality is not held liable solely for the actions of its employee.'. . But as there was no objection to the instruction, that issue is not before us and we do not consider it. . . .Viewed in toto, we conclude that this evidence, while not overwhelming, was sufficient to permit a reasonable jury to find that (i) it was so obvious to Drug Court team members that failing to provide any supervision of Edwards as Drug Court tracker would result in the violation of sexually vulnerable participants' constitutional rights as to constitute deliberate indifference to the need for supervision, and (ii) this deliberate indifference was attributable to the Sheriff of Lincoln County as the Drug Court team member responsible for supervising tracker Edwards.").

See also Hernandez v. United States, 939 F.3d 191, 210 (2d Cir. 2019) ("In defending this appeal, the Government and the City point fingers at each other. The Government argues that the City was responsible for Hernandez's confinement and the City argues that it continued to detain Hernandez only because it was complying with the Government's detainer. The Complaint, however, has plausibly alleged that both the Government and the City were at fault, for it plausibly alleges that both failed to make an inquiry when circumstances warranted an inquiry, and verification could have been obtained with minimal effort. As a consequence of those failings, Hernandez was deprived of his freedom for four days."); City of El Cenizo, Texas v. Texas, 890 F.3d 164, 185-91 (5th Cir. 2018) (Texas law provision requiring that law enforcement agencies having custody of a person subject to an immigration detainer request comply with, honor, and fulfill any request made in the detainer request and inform the person that the person is being held pursuant to that request, was not facially unconstitutional under the Fourth Amendment; under Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) policy, an immigration detainer request evidenced probable cause of removability in every instance, the immigration detainer mandate authorized and required state officers to carry out federal detention requests, it would remain ICE agent who made underlying removability determination, and mandate would not require officers to ignore facts that would negate probable cause.); Galarza v. Szalczyk, 745 F.3d 634, 636, 639, 640, 645 (3d Cir. 2014) ("We agree with Galarza that immigration detainers do not and cannot compel a state or local law enforcement agency to detain suspected aliens subject to removal. Accordingly, we vacate and remand for further proceedings. . . .Regarding his Fourth Amendment rights, Galarza contends that his detention resulted from Lehigh County's stated policy and practice of enforcing all immigration detainers received from ICE, regardless of whether ICE had, or even claimed to have, probable cause to detain the suspected immigration violator. . . . Regarding his procedural due process claim, Galarza contends that, under Lehigh County's policies, he was held for three days without any notice of the basis for his detention or a meaningful opportunity to explain that he was a U.S. Citizen, despite his repeated requests to contest his detention. At oral argument, counsel for Lehigh County conceded that the policies as alleged would be unconstitutional, and that Lehigh County's sole basis for seeking dismissal of Galarza's claims is the allegedly mandatory nature of ICE detainers. In this light, the only question on appeal is whether Galarza has sufficiently pleaded facts to support his claims that Lehigh County's unconstitutional policies or customs caused the deprivations of his Fourth Amendment and procedural due process rights. . . .Lehigh County argues that the phrase 'shall maintain custody' contained in § 287.7(d) means that detainers issued under § 287.7 are mandatory. Lehigh County acknowledges that § 287.7(d) is titled 'Temporary detention at Department request' and that § 287.7(a) provides that '[t]he detainer is a request.' However, Lehigh County maintains this language is overshadowed by the use of the word 'shall' in § 287.7(d). According to Lehigh County, the word 'shall' means that the 'request' is not really a request at all, but an order. Meaning, Lehigh County cannot be held responsible for Galarza's three-day detention after he posted bail. Galarza argues that the word 'shall' serves only to inform an agency that otherwise decides to comply with an ICE detainer that it should hold the person no longer than 48 hours. We believe that Galarza's interpretation is correct. . . .However, even if we credit that the use of the word 'shall' raises some ambiguity as to whether detainers impose mandatory obligations, this ambiguity is clarified on numerous fronts. First, no U.S. Court of Appeals has ever described ICE detainers as anything but requests. Second, no provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA"), 8 U.S.C. § 1101 et seq., authorize federal officials to command local or state officials to detain suspected aliens subject to removal. Lastly, all federal agencies and departments having an interest in the matter have consistently described such detainers as requests. . . .For these reasons, we conclude that 8 C.R.F. § 287.7 does not compel state or local LEAs to detain suspected aliens subject to removal pending release to immigration officials. Section 287.7 merely authorizes the issuance of detainers as requests to local LEAs. Given this, Lehigh County was free to disregard the ICE detainer, and it therefore cannot use as a defense that its own policy did not cause the deprivation of Galarza's constitutional rights. Accordingly, the District Court's judgment dismissing Galarza's complaint against Lehigh County is VACATED and the matter is REVERSED for proceedings consistent with this opinion.").

See also Gaffett v. City of Oakland, No. 21-CV-02881-RS, 2021 WL 4503456, at *3 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 1, 2021) ("Defendants frame an overriding issue: does a mutual aid agency need to abide by the requesting agency's policies and procedures? Defendants believe the answer is no, or at least that it is unclear, and this dooms Plaintiffs' case. The answer is indeed not clear. See Anti Police-Terror Project, et al., v. City of Oakland, et al., No. 20-CV-03866-JCS 2020 WL 6381358, at *30 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 31, 2020) (arising from the same protests at issue here). Defendants also raise a policy argument: the answer must be no, because to hold otherwise would be unworkable and chill mutual aid by exposing agencies to liability for others' policies. Whatever dire consequences might ensue, Plaintiffs now insist they do not depend on this issue's resolution. To be fair, Defendants' reading of the Complaint is reasonable. At times, it seems like Plaintiffs are using the failure to follow Oakland's policies as a basis for their Complaint. However, Plaintiffs' current position is only intended to explain why the Sheriff's Office acted unconstitutionally. It is part of their factual narrative, they insist, not a purported basis for relief. Plaintiffs do not presume Oakland's policies create a private right of action, or that violating them is per se evidence of a constitutional violation."); Chaaban v. City of Detroit, No. 20-CV-12709, 2021 WL 4060986, at *1, *8-9 (E.D. Mich. Sept. 7, 2021) ("In May of 2019, Plaintiff was arrested and taken to the Detroit Detention Center, a detention facility that holds pre-arraigned detainees for up to 72 hours. . . The Detroit Detention Center operates under an interagency agreement between the Detroit Police Department and MDOC. . . Under that agreement, MDOC 'provides custody and security services' to the Detroit Police Department and the Michigan State Police for up to 200 arrestees. . .While in custody, during the booking process, Plaintiff alleges she was subject to MDOC's Prisoner Photographic Identification Policy (the 'Photograph Policy'). Section 04.04.133(B) of the Photograph Policy states that when an individual is processed into the MDOC, a photo shall be taken of the prisoner's face and directs that 'headgear shall not be worn.'. . Plaintiff states that under the Photograph Policy, she was forced to remove her hijab for her booking photograph in the presence of male staff and despite her objection that removing her hijab violated her religious beliefs. . . According to the Amended Complaint, MDOC and City of Detroit officers ordered Plaintiff to remove her hijab and threatened to make her 'sleep on the concrete floor of the booking cell without a bed, blanket, mattress, or pillow' if she did not comply. . . Plaintiff states she complied and removed her hijab as a result of those threats. . . . Plaintiff has alleged wearing her hijab is a sincerely held religious belief 'core to her identity' and that wearing the hijab is 'a mandatory aspect of [her] Muslim identity and faith.'. . Defendant City of Detroit does not dispute these allegations, but instead argues Plaintiff fails to state a claim against it because Plaintiff has not identified any City of Detroit policy that substantially burdens religious exercise. Plaintiff was 'confined to an institution' at all relevant times for purposes of RLUIPA. It is also undisputed that the Photograph Policy under which Plaintiff was made to remove her hijab is a policy belonging to MDOC, not the City of Detroit. . . Nevertheless, Plaintiff has alleged the City of Detroit implemented the policy by 'forc[ing] arrestees who wear religious head coverings to remove those head coverings for a photograph.'. . This is a task the City of Detroit is 'bound to perform.'. . Moreover, Plaintiff alleges City of Detroit officers 'falsely stated that the law necessitated for the removal of [her] hijab; threatening to make [her] sleep on the concrete floor of the booking cell

without a bed, blanket, mattress, or pillow if she continued to be noncompliant' and that Plaintiff removed her hijab as a direct consequence. . . According to the allegations in the Amended Complaint, these actions by the City of Detroit 'substantially burdened Plaintiff's religious exercise' in several ways—by requiring to remove her hijab to be photographed . . .; by creating a permanent public record of that image which has been and could continue to be released to the public . . . ; and by requiring Plaintiff to wear the photograph on a wristband and present it to male staff . . . .These allegations, accepted as true and construed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, are sufficient to state a claim under RLUIPA. . . . Plaintiff's second cause of action, brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleges Defendants, including the City of Detroit, violated Plaintiff's right to freely exercise her religion pursuant to the First Amendment to the United States Constitution. Section 1983 creates a federal cause of action against 'any person' who deprives someone of a federal constitutional right while acting under color of state law. . . Although § 1983 does not abrogate state sovereign immunity, the statute provides a vehicle to sue local governments for constitutional violations. . . . Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged a constitutional violation. See Section III(E)(1) of this opinion, supra. The issue here is whether the City of Detroit can be held liable for a policy which did not originate with the City, but which has been alleged to be enforced by the City and its officers under the authority of the interagency agreement between the City of Detroit and MDOC. . . Per the terms of the agreement, the Detroit Police Department '[s]hall be made aware of and not contravene MDOC policy and procedure.' . . Thus, the City of Detroit was aware of the Photograph Policy and promulgated that policy or, at a minimum, adopted 'a custom of tolerance or acquiescence of federal rights violations.'. . Because the City of Detroit has not identified any authority to suggest that it cannot be held responsible under existing law, the Court finds that dismissal of Plaintiff's claim at this stage of the proceeding is improper."); Morales v. Chadbourne, 235 F. Supp. 3d 388, 407–08 (D.R.I. 2017) ("Director Wall is entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable corrections director in May 2009 would not have understood that his conduct violated Ms. Morales' constitutional rights. In light of that definition, the Court looks at the law and policy in May 2009 to determine whether Director Wall would have been on notice that his conduct in honoring the ICE detainer constituted an unlawful seizure. It is important to note at the outset that even Ms. Morales concedes that RIDOC officials are not equipped or required to make citizenship and/or removability determinations. Her position seems inconsistent with her argument that Director Wall and/or his corrections employees should have independently assessed Ms. Morales' citizenship both when she was processed initially at the ACI on the state charges and when she returned from court, held solely on the ICE detainer, to somehow ensure that the detention was constitutional. And while the law across the circuits is clear today that the RIDOC was not required to detain Ms. Morales pursuant to the ICE investigatory detainer, it was not so clearly established in 2009 such that Director Wall acted unreasonably in honoring the detainer. See Orellana v. Nobles Cty., No. CV 15–3852 ADM/SER, 230 F.Supp.3d 934, 939–41, 2017 WL 72397, at *4 (D. Minn. Jan. 6, 2017) (legality *408 of ICE detainers has shifted, citing several 2014 court decisions that held a detainer was a mere request rather than a mandatory requirement); Galarza v. Szalczyk, Civil Action No. 10–cv–06815, 2012 WL 1080020 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 30, 2012), vacated and remanded by Galarza v. Szalczyk, 745 F.3d 634 (3d Cir. 2014); Rios–Quiroz v. Williamson Cty., TN, No. 3–11–1168, 2012 WL 3945354 (M.D. Tenn. Sept. 10, 2012).

The Court has previously found, and the First Circuit confirmed, that there could be no question in 2009 that immigration detainers had to be issued based on probable cause. Morales II, 793 F.3d at 211. Therefore, when the State was confronted in 2009 with an ICE-issued detainer, it would have been reasonable for it to assume that ICE had probable cause to issue it. Director Wall has consistently maintained and the facts established that he believed that RIDOC's long-standing policy of honoring ICE detainers was legal and not capable of violating any individual's constitutional rights. Moreover, in 2009 it was reasonable to assume that honoring the ICE detainer was mandatory. This is especially true here where the language of the detainer itself, citing federal law, stated that it was mandatory. See 8 C.F.R. § 287.7 (section "requires that you detain the alien for a period not to exceed 48 hours ... to provide adequate time for DHS to assume custody of the alien."). Indeed, before 2009, most state and local law enforcement in New England, honored ICE detainers without independently assessing probable cause, and it was ICE's expectation that the states would hold individuals when ICE issued a detainer. . . Therefore, the Court finds that it was reasonable for Director Wall and RIDOC to conclude in 2009 that the ICE detainer it received was valid, supported by probable cause, and mandatory. His 'reasonable, although mistaken, conclusion about the lawfulness of [his] conduct' does not subject him to personal liability. . . . In light of the facts and the law, the Court finds that based on the totality of the circumstances and undisputed facts, Director Wall is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim."); Ayala v. Cty. of Imperial, No. 15CV397-LAB (NLS), 2017 WL 469016, at *7–8 (S.D. Cal. Feb. 3, 2017) ("A serious flaw in the FAC's allegations is that it fails to allege a relationship between the County and the Task Force that would make the County liable. For example, it does not allege the County supervised or had authority over officers while they were working for the Task Force, or that it had a role in deciding what Task Force officers would do, or that it dictated the Task Force's policies, or anything else that would tend to make the County responsible for what the Task Force did. A Monell claim requires that the municpality's policy be the 'moving force' behind the constitutional violation. . . If some other agency's policy, or the Task Force's own policy were the driving force, and if the County did not create that policy, the County would not be liable. . . Furthermore, the County points out that the unidentified officers who shot Ayala are only alleged to be members of the Task Force—not County officers who were deputized. If the Task Force is not under the County's control, its officers are not automatically County officers. The FAC alleges that the officers came from 'various Imperial County and Federal law enforcement agencies' and were assigned to the Task Force. . .Doe Defendants 1–6, the officers who shot Ayala, could have been deputized officers of some other municipality, or even federal officers. The County argues that the FAC fails to even allege that one of its officers shot Ayala, and this argument is well-taken. If none of the County's officers shot Ayala, the County cannot be liable under a Monell theory, or any other theory. This is an instance where all that can be inferred is 'the mere possibility of misconduct,' leaving open the obvious possibility that the Plaintiffs are not entitled to relief from this Defendant."); Orellana v. Nobles Cty., 230 F.Supp.3d 934, ___ (D. Minn. 2017) ("ICE requested Defendants maintain custody of Orellana simply because it had 'reason to believe [Orellana] is an alien subject to removal.'. . As demonstrated, this alone does not provide a constitutionally sufficient basis to further detain Orellana beyond the time he would have otherwise been released. Without any showing that Orellana was likely to escape before a warrant could be secured, the warrantless arrest made under § 1357(a)(2) violates the Fourth Amendment. . . .Orellana argues that Nobles County's official policy of continuing to detain individuals beyond when they are eligible for release solely because of an ICE detainer caused the constitutional violation in this case. Orellana's argument is well taken. Berkevich, testifying on behalf of Nobles County, stated that in November 2014, if a person subject to an ICE hold was incarcerated and bail had been set and paid, that person would not be released but would be held for up to 48 hours longer. It was Nobles County's adherence to this policy that resulted in Orellana being detained after he was eligible for release. As discussed above, this additional period of detention was made without probable cause, thereby exceeding the warrantless arrest power conferred by § 1357(a)(2). . . .Orellana was arrested and detained while immigration detainer policies were changing across the country and in Nobles County. The record does not show any ill will by Nobles County or any of its employees, and the policy that may have resulted in Orellana's constitutional rights being violated was changed shortly after the events in this case. But a jury could determine that Orellana was detained illegally for 10 days pursuant to an official Nobles County policy that was in effect at that time."); Villars v. Kubiatowski, 45 F.Supp.3d 791, 802 (N.D. Ill. 2014) ("The Seventh Circuit has yet to address the issue, but a very recent Third Circuit case points out that every federal court of appeals that has considered the nature of ICE detainers characterizes them as 'requests' that impose no mandatory obligation on the part of the detainer's recipient. Galarza v. Szalczyk, 2014 WL 815127, at *5 (3d Cir. Mar. 4, 2014). Agreeing with the First, Second, Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Circuits, the Third Circuit emphasized that Congress did 'not authorize federal officials to command state or local officials to detain suspected aliens subject to removal,' that 'all federal agencies and departments having an interest in the matter have consistently described such detainers as requests,' and that to conclude otherwise would offend the Tenth Amendment, which prohibits the federal government from 'command[ing] the government agencies of the states to imprison persons of interest to federal officials.'. . Setting aside the fact that the detainer in Villars's case was not even addressed to the VRLB Defendants (but was instead, for some reason, addressed to the sheriff of Will County), the detainer self-identifies as a 'request,' a clarification that DHS added to the detainer form in 2010 when the agency also removed any mention of the word 'require' from the form. . . The Third Circuit's well-reasoned opinion and the plain language of the detainer itself persuade the Court that the VRLB Defendants were not obligated to detain Villars pursuant to the ICE detainer. In light of that conclusion and the Seventh Circuit's decision in Harper, it would be premature at this stage of the litigation—taking Plaintiff's allegations as true and without the benefit of a fully-developed record—for the Court to decide whether the VRLB Defendants had sufficient justification to detain Villars after he posted bond. Accordingly, the Court denies the VRLB Defendants' motion to dismiss Villars's allegations that they violated his Fourth Amendment and procedural and substantive due process rights."); Miranda-Olivares v. Clackamas Cnty., 3:12-CV-02317-ST, 2014 WL 1414305, *3-*8, *11 (D. Or. Apr. 11, 2014) ("Miranda–Olivares challenges her confinement by the County from March 15 through March 30, 2012, and specifically the County's custom and practice of incarcerating persons who are subject to ICE detainers after the lawful custody on state charges has ended. The County responds that federal law requires this custom and practice because ICE detainers (Form I–247) are issued pursuant to 28 CFR § 287.7 which, it its view, mandates the detention of a suspected alien by a local law enforcement agency for up to 48 hours. . . . Miranda–Olivares does not challenge an express policy adopted by the County. . . Instead, she challenges the County's undisputed practice or custom of detaining a person based entirely on an ICE detainer even after that person is entitled to release from custody by posting bail or resolving the criminal charges. Based on its interpretation of the language in the ICE detainer and 8 CFR § 287.7, the County argues that its practice or custom does not violate either the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendments because it is mandated by federal law. . . .The County's case relies heavily on the theory that a municipality cannot be liable under Monell based on a custom and practice of complying with a mandatory federal law. In support, it points to several decisions from the federal circuits holding that a municipality is not subject to Monell liability as a result of enforcing mandatory state law. See, e.g., Vives v. City of N.Y., 524 F.3d 346, 351–52 (2nd Cir.2008) (summarizing the circuit decisions). These courts reason that a municipality's decision to honor the obligation to enforce a mandatory state law is not a conscious choice. . . Although these cases address only state law, their reasoning appears to apply if a municipality had an analogous obligation to follow federal law. . . . However, as explained below, the federal regulation in question, 8 CFR § 287.7, does not mandate detention by local law enforcement, but only requests compliance in detaining suspected aliens. As the Second Circuit posited, albeit without deciding, 'if a municipality decides to enforce a statute that it is authorized, but not required, to enforce, it may have created a municipal policy,' subjecting it to Monell liability. . . In this case, any injury Miranda–Olivares suffered was the direct result of the County exercising its custom and practice to hold her beyond the date she was eligible for release based solely on the ICE detainer. The County argues that it had no choice because the ICE detainer mandated her detention pursuant to 8 CFR § 287.7. . .The County finds support for its interpretation of the ICE detainer and regulation in several district court cases. However, those cases are not persuasive. [discussing cases and noting Galarza] . . . . [A] conclusion that Congress intended detainers as orders for municipalities to enforce a federal regulatory scheme on behalf of INS would raise potential violations of the anti-commandeering principle. A non-mandatory interpretation is also consistent with the general interpretation of the character of INS detainers in other contexts. No federal circuit court 'has ever described ICE detainers as anything but requests.'. . .[T]his court concludes that 8 CFR § 287.7 does not require LEAs to detain suspected aliens upon receipt of a Form I–247 from ICE and that the Jail was at liberty to refuse ICE's request to detain Miranda–Olivares if that detention violated her constitutional rights. Accordingly, the County cannot avail itself of the defense that its practice and custom did not cause the allegedly unlawful detention. . . . There is no genuine dispute of material fact that the County maintains a custom or practice in violation of the Fourth Amendment to detain individuals over whom the County no longer has legal authority based only on an ICE detainer which provides no probable cause for detention. That custom and practice violated Miranda–Olivares's Fourth Amendment rights by detaining her without probable cause both after she was eligible for pre-trial release upon posting bail and after her release from state charges. Thus, Miranda–Olivares is granted summary judgment as to liability on the Second Claim.")

But see Galarza v. Szalczyk, 745 F.3d 634, 645-47 (3d Cir. 2014) (Barry, J., dissenting) ("I am deeply concerned that the United States has not been heard on the seminal issue in this appeal, an issue that goes to the heart of the enforcement of our nation's immigration laws. And make no mistake about it. The conclusion reached by my friends in the Majority that immigration detainers issued pursuant to 8 C.F.R. § 287.7 do not impose any obligation on state and local law enforcement agencies to detain suspected aliens subject to removal, but are merely requests that they do so, has enormous implications and will have, I predict, enormous ramifications. . . .The sole appellee in this case is Lehigh County, whose only involvement with reference to the central issue before us on appeal is that Galarza was briefly housed in one of its prisons, and that it, through its prison, complied with the immigration detainer once the detainer kicked in. The County, not surprisingly, argued to the District Court why the 'shall maintain custody' language was mandatory—it had, it said, no choice in the matter. Galarza, also not surprisingly, argued that the language was not mandatory, and that the District Court's erroneous conclusion to the contrary was the result of a 'misunderstanding of immigration detainers' because of Lehigh County's arguments, 'not the federal government's.'. . .And the record before the District Court on the central issue before us was barebones. In this connection, it bears emphasis that that issue, i.e. whether or not detainers issued pursuant to § 287.7 impose a mandatory obligation to detain on state and local law enforcement agencies, was but one of numerous issues raised in the District Court against the various defendants and combinations of defendants. The District Court issued an extremely thoughtful and very thorough 56–page Opinion, with its finding as to the issue before us essentially tucked away in little more than one paragraph near the end, see JA 55–56, undoubtedly because there had been no emphasis on the issue in the District Court and little record made as to it. In the face of all of this, the Majority, in a sweeping Opinion, has decided this enormously important issue. And it did not stop there. Rather, it went on to conclude that '[e]ven if there were any doubt about whether immigration detainers are requests and not mandatory orders,' to read § 287.7 to mean that a federal detainer is a command to a law enforcement agency to detain an individual would violate the anti-commandeering principle of the Tenth Amendment. . . . Maybe it would, and maybe it wouldn't, even assuming, with no great confidence, that the Tenth Amendment issue should have been reached. . . . All of this makes me very uncomfortable. Given the posture of the case before the District Court, I'm not sure how, if at all, the United States could have been brought in. What I am sure of is that we have gone very far in this very important case without any input from the United States, and we should pull back now. For now, though, I'm not prepared to say, on what has essentially been a one-sided presentation, that 'shall' really doesn't mean 'shall' but, instead, means 'please.' I respectfully dissent.")

See also Burger v. County of Macon, 942 F.3d 372, 374-76 & n.3 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Regardless whether Burger's firing violated her rights, we face this critical question: Was the firing an act for which Macon County is responsible? We conclude the answer is no. Any state actor who deprives a person of federally guaranteed rights can be sued under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. But for a local government to be liable under § 1983, the rights-depriving act must carry out an official policy made by the local government's lawmakers or officials 'whose edicts or acts may fairly be said to represent' the local government's policy. . . In other words, an act is an official local-government policy when the decision to adopt a particular course of action 'is properly made by that government's authorized decisionmakers.'. .Whether an official has local-government policymaking authority is a question of state law. . . We therefore turn to Illinois state law to determine whether the alleged rights-depriving acts are part of a Macon County policy. Burger's complaint implies that she was fired because State's Attorney Scott and Assistant State's Attorney Kroncke decided to discharge Burger from her position in the State's Attorney's Office. . . We've recognized that Illinois State's Attorneys are state, rather than county, officers. . . And the same is true of Assistant State's Attorneys, even while at least part of their salaries—like portions of State's Attorneys' salaries—are paid out of the county treasury. . . .But whether Kroncke, like Scott, is a state officer does not resolve the issue. This is because even decisions by a state officer may constitute county policy in certain situations—specifically, when the county can and does delegate county policymaking authority to the state officer. . . In this case we conclude that Macon County could not delegate the relevant authority to the State's Attorney. An Illinois statute gives exclusive control over the internal operations of the State's Attorney's Office directly to the State's Attorney; the county cannot choose otherwise. . . . The statute provides: 'The State's Attorney shall control the internal operations of his or her office and procure the necessary equipment, materials and services to perform the duties of that office.'. . In carrying out this and other statutory responsibilities, Assistant State's Attorneys 'are in essence surrogates for the State's Attorney.'. . Accordingly, when it comes to the internal operations of the office, '[t]he State's Attorney is responsible for the professional conduct and acts of his or her assistants.'. . Kroncke and Scott's management of the State's Attorney's Office culminated in their decision to discharge Burger from her position within the Office. Because Macon County lacked authority—in the first place—to direct or control any decisions about the State's Attorney's Office's internal operations, it could not have delegated any decisional authority on internal-operation matters to Scott and Kroncke. Indeed, by statutory prescription, this managerial authority to hire and fire rested exclusively with the State's Attorney, a state officer. So, the county could not be 'responsible for establishing final policy with respect to the subject matter in question,'. . . and Burger's firing may not 'fairly be said to represent' the county's policy[.] . . Thus, on the one count Burger asserted on federal law, she did not state a basis for county liability under Monell. Without a viable federal claim, dismissal was appropriate. . . . This is not to say that for some other claim, the county would necessarily lack responsibility for payment of an adverse judgment against a state officer. . . But we need not address that situation. No judgment against a state officer could be issued on Burger's count resting on § 1983, as she did not assert that count against a state officer, like Scott."); Burley v. Gagacki, 729 F.3d 610, 619 (6th Cir. 2013) ("In this case, plaintiffs conceded in their complaint that Gagacki, the only Wayne County employee alleged to have participated in the execution of the search warrant at their home, was 'deputized as a federal drug enforcement agent working under the auspices of the federal government.' As such, with regard to the raid itself, the district court properly concluded that the federal government's policies and customs were at issue, and not those of Wayne County. . . .Plaintiffs' theory based on a failure to train similarly fails. A municipality's duty to train extends only to 'its employees,'. . . and it can be liable only if its failure to train was 'closely related to' or 'actually caused' the plaintiff's injuries. . . . Plaintiffs have failed to provide proof on either essential element. There is no evidence in the record that anyone in Wayne County's employ, other than Gagacki, participated in the execution of the search warrant at 20400 Greeley. To the contrary, the evidence indicates that the individuals who executed the search warrant were either directly employed by, or, like Gagacki, working under the supervision of, the DEA. Any duty to train rested with the DEA, and only the DEA's inadequate training could form the basis of a failure-to-train claim. In short, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, no reasonable jury could find municipal liability under § 1983."); Tucker v. Williams, 682 F.3d 654, 659 (7th Cir. 2012) ("To determine if a particular entity is a state agency, i.e., an arm of the state, courts look at: (1) the extent of the entity's financial autonomy from the state; and (2) the 'general legal status' of the entity. . . Of the two, the entity's financial autonomy is the 'most important factor.'. . . Taking into account these factors in light of the Interagency Agreement, we conclude that the Task Force is a state agency. According to the Interagency Agreement, the Illinois State Police approves the use of all official funds and supervises all Task Force operations. The Interagency Agreement also provides that the Director of the Illinois State Police appoints personnel to the Task Force, and such personnel are considered employees of the State, and are indemnified and represented by the State as state employees. The Interagency Agreement further provides that the Illinois State Police supply all facilities, training, and specialized equipment. Under these facts, the Task Force is an extension of the Illinois State Police and, as such, is entitled to the same immunity protections afforded to the State Police. Summary judgement for the Task Force was proper."); Willis v. Neal, 2007 WL 2616918, at *9 n.9 (6th Cir. 2007) (Dowd, J., dissenting) ("[T]he Interlocal Cooperation and Mutual Aid Agreement, under which the Twelfth Judicial District Drug Task Force had enlisted the aid of the officers of these various governmental entities for this takedown, recognizes that officers do not relinquish any responsibility simply by participating in the Task Force activities. The Agreement provides, in part, as follows: 12. LIABILITIES. Officers Assigned to the Drug Task Force Remain Employees of Their Hiring Agency. Each law enforcement officer assigned to the Drug Task Force will remain an employee of the local government by which the officer was employed prior to the assignment. The conduct and actions of such officer will remain the responsibility of the local government employing the officer. Any civil liability arising from the actions of a law enforcement officer engaged in Drug Task Force activities will be assumed by the employing local government in the same manner and to the same extent as if the actions were committed within the jurisdiction of the employing local government during the normal course of the officer's employment, independent of the Drug Task Force...."); Johnson v. Deep East Texas Regional Narcotics Trafficking Task Force, 379 F.3d 293, 310, 311 (5th Cir. 2004) (" What happened at 419 Otis Street starting at about 9 a.m. on March 9, 2001, was entirely determined by DEA agent Marshall, who was in charge and whose directions all officers present were required to and did follow. . . . Marshall's decision to force entry, rather than seek entry by consent, and to do so without further information, was entirely his own decision. There is no evidence suggesting that Marshall made that decision for any reason related to any County policy or any understanding thereof which he may have had, or for any reason other than that he thought that decision to be appropriate in the light of his own training and experience as a DEA agent and DEA policy and procedures. Indeed the uncontradicted evidenced is that Marshall's decision in this respect was contrary to County policy and practice. If there was causative fault on the part of the authorities, the fault was Marshall's and/or the DEA's, not the County's.' (footnotes omitted)); Young v. City of Little Rock, 249 F.3d 730, 736 (8th Cir. 2001) ("As the City points out, it does not operate the jail. The City of Little Rock has no jail of its own.

It contracts with the County for the housing of City prisoners. What the County does with prisoners, therefore, the City says, is not its problem, and there is no vicarious liability under § 1983. Although this line of argument has some surface appeal, we do not believe that the jury had to accept it. City employees were aware of the custom of chaining prisoners, and they knew that Ms. Young was being taken back to the jail. Strip searching of prisoners is routine procedure, and the jury could reasonably infer that the City knew that a person entering the jail, in jail clothing with a group of other detainees, would be strip searched. In these circumstances, it is far from unfair to attribute to the City the policies routinely used by the County jail in the housing and processing of City prisoners."); Eversole v. Steele, 59 F.3d 710, 716, 717 (7th Cir. 1995) ("The law enforcement officers involved in the RUFF Drug Task Force, including Detectives McQuinley and Sherck, were acting pursuant to the rules and regulations of their respective law enforcement agencies, in this instance the Fayette County Sheriff's Department and the Connersville Police Department but were not acting pursuant to any policies established by the RUFF Drug Task Force. The RUFF Drug Task Force was simply a multi-jurisdictional effort of law enforcement agencies joined together in a coordinated effort to stop or at least control drug activity in the four-county area. Each participant in the Task Force remained obliged to follow the rules and regulations of his or her respective law enforcement agency. . . . Because the Task Force was nothing more than a joint effort of four counties in the State of Indiana to implement existing law enforcement policies, no new or unique policies were needed.").

See also Estate of Perry v. Wenzel, 872 F.3d 439, 457 (7th Cir. 2017) ("The district court concluded that Perry's § 1983 claims against the County defendants failed as a matter of law because Perry was never in the County's custody and therefore, none of the County defendants owed him a constitutional duty. However, the district court's conclusion that Perry was not in the County's custody was based upon Nurse Virgo's decision not to accept Perry as an inmate because of the condition in which he arrived. We disagree with the district court's analysis, as it improperly substituted the County's booking policy for the proper constitutional analysis. It is the Fourth Amendment and not a County's policy that governs Perry's claim. The district court erred when it permitted the County, via its own policy, to determine whether or not the United States Constitution applied to its actions. Such a rule would allow municipalities to easily isolate themselves from liability by enacting policies that have the effect of dictating when their constitutional duties begin. We reject this rule. Instead, the district court should have applied the constitutional analysis for determining whether a seizure has occurred, as the Fourth Amendment protects 'against unreasonable searches and seizures.'. . When determining whether there has been a seizure, 'the traditional approach is whether the person believed he was "free to leave."'. . This is an objective standard, which focuses on how a reasonable person in the suspect's position would have understood the situation. . . Here, no reasonable jury could conclude that Perry was not in the County's custody. County officers assisted in dragging Perry into the facility and placed him inside the facility, behind a door that could only be opened by a County officer. Further, while Nurse Virgo examined Perry, two County officers (not City officers) physically restrained him on the bench. A reasonable person in Perry's position would not have believed that he was free to leave the County facility. Further, a reasonable person would have believed that it was the County that was restricting his movement, based upon the fact that the County controlled the entrance and that County Correctional Officers were physically restraining him. Therefore, we hold that Perry was in the County's custody when he died even though the formal booking process was not completed.")

See also Tolley v. Rockbridge Regional Drug Task Force, No. 7:19-CV-00863, 2020 WL 2499705, at *3 (W.D. Va. May 14, 2020) ("To state a claim under § 1983, plaintiff must allege a violation by a person acting under color of state law. . . The Rockbridge Regional Drug Task Force is not a person and is therefore not subject to suit. See Clinton v. Berkeley Cty., No. 3:08-CV-10, 2009 WL 35331, at *6 (N.D.W. Va. Jan. 6, 2009) ("[I]t is well settled that a drug task force is not a 'person' [amenable] to suit under § 1983."); Jackson v. Commonwealth of Virginia, No. 7:06-CV-00306, 2006 WL 1700655, at *1 (W.D. Va. June 16, 2006) (dismissing claim against Northwest Virginal Regional Drug Task Force because it is not a person under § 1983). Thus, this defendant will be dismissed."); Rivera v. Lake County, 974 F.Supp.2d 1179, 1197, 1198 (N.D. Ill. 2013) ("There is authority for the idea that a 'multijurisdictional law enforcement agency' is subject to suit under § 1983. In Maltby, the Seventh Circuit found that a law-enforcement 'Task Force' could be sued where the Task Force was organized pursuant to the Illinois Constitution and to the Intergovernmental Cooperation Act, 5 Ill. Comp. Stat. 220/1. Maltby v. Winston, 36 F.3d 548, 560 n. 14 (7th Cir.1994). At the same time, a mere collaboration of other municipal entities that exists in name only would not be amenable to suit, just as a municipality's departments cannot be sued in their name if they lack independent legal existence. . . . Ultimately, whether the Task Force is amenable to suit is a question of fact. Resolution of that question depends on, among other things, whether the Task Force has an independent legal existence and is organized as a separate municipal entity under Illinois law. This Court cannot resolve that question at this stage, so the Motion to Dismiss the Task Force is denied."); Sefick v. Hunter, No. 11 C 50145, 2012 WL 5342408, *2, *3 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 29, 2012) ("Paragraph IV of the agreement contains language that is in fact dispositive of the Monell issue. That provision states, in pertinent part, that '[n]ot-withstanding anything herein to the contrary' the Sheriff retains control over 'all matters incidental to the performance of the police protection and law enforcement services,' including but not limited to, the 'methods of rendering such services,' the 'level of standards of performance,' the 'discipline of any personnel,' and the 'general control' over all assigned personnel. Moreover, this same paragraph provides that '[a]t no time shall any officer, official, or employee of the Village undertake to direct any of the assigned personnel as to matters incidental to the performance of police protection and law enforcement services.' This language virtually closes the door on plaintiff's claim that the Village is liable as a policymaker under Monell. There is simply no way that any Village official, including Mayor Strickland, could be considered to be a policymaker as it relates to the function of law enforcement personnel or services provided under the agreement. Pursuant to the agreement, all such control over policing was unequivocally retained by the Sheriff exclusively. This conclusion is bolstered by the undisputed evidence of Strickland who stated repeatedly in his deposition that neither he nor any other Village official had any control over the police operations provided by the County under the agreement. Plaintiff also argues that the act of entering into the agreement itself was an official policy of the Village sufficient to create Monell liability. This contention fails for two reasons. First, even if it was a policy-making decision, there is no evidence to show that entering into the agreement caused any of plaintiff's alleged injuries. There is no evident connection between the decision to enter into the agreement and any specific actions by Wagner that are alleged to have harmed plaintiff. Nor is there any evidence demonstrating that the Village sought to impose any unconstitutional police activities on its citizenry via the agreement or the decision to engage the County to provide for its law enforcement needs. Second, this argument is foreclosed by Ross v. United States, wherein the Seventh Circuit held that imposing liability on a city that had no authority to influence a county's public safety procedures under an intergovernmental agreement would effectively create the respondeat superior liability that the Supreme Court has soundly condemned. . . A contrary result would effectively read potential § 1983 liability into every intergovernmental agreement in the State of Illinois. . . The reasoning of Ross applies to the facts of this case and refutes plaintiff's argument. Because the undisputed evidence in this case establishes that the Village had no policymaking authority over Deputy Chief Wagner or any other law enforcement personnel, under the agreement or otherwise, the Village is entitled to summary judgment as to all of plaintiff's § 1983 claims."); Rush v. City of Mansfield, 771 F.Supp.2d 827, 846-57 (N.D. Ohio 2011) ("In sum, the Court agrees with Judge McHargh that ASORT is subject to suit as an unincorporated association and DENIES ASORT's Motion for Summary Judgment (Doc. 171) to the extent that it is based on the argument that ASORT is not sui juris. ASORT is not a government entity, meets the definition of an unincorporated association under Rule 17(b)(3)(", and is not somehow shielded from suit by Ohio law. . . . The Plaintiffs agree that the Sixth Circuit's segmenting analysis and the Sixth Circuit's jurisprudence regarding the propriety of using deadly force when confronted with an armed suspect − regardless of why the suspect may happen to have been armed − would prohibit such a claim in this case. . .They argue, instead: Plaintiffs did not sue Officer Gouge or Officers Bammann and Frazier, who in the last moments of the raid, fired the deadly shots. Under existing precedent (particularly that requiring a segmenting analysis) those officers did not act unreasonably and/or would be entitled to qualified immunity. But the fact that particular individuals may not be liable does not mean that Plaintiffs did not suffer a constitutional violation or that other Defendants are free of liability. Plaintiffs correctly sued the entities and persons who placed the ASORT team in this dangerous position as they executed a warrant seeking stolen property in a manner that masked their identity as police officers.... It was this plan that was set at night utilizing blinding lights; this plan that triggered a huge disorienting explosion simultaneously with the knock and announce; this plan that relied on misleading intelligence to improperly ramp up the arsenal used to confront the Rush/Hedrick family over stolen property; this plan, in short, that caused the individual ASORT officers to fire the deadly and terrorizing shots at a confused and surprised Gilbert Rush and his family. The plan was the moving force behind the constitutional violation. The Defendants responsible for this plan violated the Fourth Amendment rights of the Plaintiffs. . . .Based on this argument, the Plaintiffs are asserting two somewhat interrelated claims. The Plaintiffs' claim first that the decision to use ASORT in the above manner was not reasonable under the circumstances. . .In other words, the Plaintiffs contend that the search and seizure would have been unconstitutional even if Gilbert Rush never had been shot and killed. . . . The Plaintiffs' also claim that the Defendants failed to identify themselves in a constitutionally reasonable manner. . . . . In light of these claims, an additional threshold issue remains: what measure of damages is recoverable if the execution of the warrant is unreasonable, but the decision to use deadly force was not excessive when made? It does not appear that any court within the Sixth Circuit has considered previously whether a defendant may be liable for physical injury resulting from the improper execution of a warrant absent a viable claim of excessive force. On this issue, there is some tension between the Sixth Circuit's segmenting approach to use of force claims and the Supreme Court's concern that the unconstitutional service of a warrant might itself give rise to the need for excessive force, and, thus, to physical harm. . . . [C]ourts have exercised care to only hold law enforcement officers liable for harms that proximately flow from their unconstitutional conduct. Thus, where no unconstitutional use of force occurs at the point when force is employed, the Sixth Circuit's segmenting approach assures that officers are not held liable for their earlier constitutional actions, no matter how negligent or unwise. [collecting cases] Understood properly, these cases explain that the reasonable use of force is not rendered unconstitutional simply because officials exercise poor judgment that is distinct from the otherwise reasonable use of force, even where that poor judgment may have helped create the circumstances necessitating the later use of force. None of the cases hold, however, that officers are immune from harms that flow proximately from their own unconstitutional conduct simply because a later use of deadly force might not be unconstitutionally excessive. . . . These cases do not go so far. . . as to insulate officers from harm caused by their unconstitutional acts simply because their later dealings with a plaintiff may not be independently actionable. . . . It is this basic principle of proximate cause that Hudson applies: 'an unannounced entry may provoke violence in supposed self-defense by the surprised resident.'. .The rule is simple: when a constitutional violation occurs, liability attaches for harm that is the direct and proximate result of that constitutional violation, but only for such harms. . . Applying that principle to this case, then, if the Defendants failed to knock-and-announce their presence as required by the Fifth Amendment, or otherwise committed a constitutional violation when executing the warrant, and if that failure was the proximate cause of Gilbert Rush's death, the Plaintiffs may recover under § 1983 for that harm."); Cline v. City of Mansfield, 745 F.Supp.2d 773, 795-97, 800 (N.D. Ohio 2010) ("The suggestion that a private social organization could form a SWAT-type team that would be immune from suit certainly goes against the original intent behind § 1983, which was enacted to allow recourse against a private 'law enforcement' entity whose policies, practices, and procedures deprived citizens of their civil rights. . . . ASORT [Allied Special Operations Response Team] is governed by a private organization, and, to the extent there is evidence in the record that the leader of ASORT reports to any authority higher than himself for purposes of setting ASORT's policy, practices, or procedures, that authority is vested in this same private organization. This alone would seem to establish that ASORT is not a 'government unit[ ], subdivision[,] or agenc[y].' Although ASORT points this Court to an Ohio statute that allows municipalities to form multijurisdictional police task forces, that statute does not somehow transform ASORT into a unit of government. . . . ASORT also seems to argue that it is a government entity because it is performing a traditional municipal function, but this is exactly wrong: that ASORT is performing a traditional municipal function is what makes it subject to suit under § 1983, not what makes it immune from it. . . It is true, of course, that the members of ASORT are themselves public officials who receive their equipment and salaries from local municipalities, but this does not automatically make ASORT a part of those municipalities. . . . In sum, the Court concludes that, because ASORT is formed and governed by a private organization, it is not a government unit, subdivision, or agency. . . . ASORT is not a government entity, meets the definition of an unincorporated association under Rule 17(b)(3)("), and is not somehow shielded from suit by Ohio law. Whether ASORT is actually liable in this action, of course, will depend upon whether it proximately caused a violation of a constitutional right."); Buckheit v. Dennis, No. C 09-5000 JCS, 2010 WL 3751889, at *6, *7 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 24, 2010) ("In the absence of control over the arresting officers, the County must not be held liable for their conduct under § 1983. . . Here, the allegations are that: 1) there was a written and/or oral agreement whereby the Town of Atherton agreed to follow an alleged discriminatory policy set by the County, and 2) the County agreed to train officers from the Town of Atherton. The County is alleged to have had control over the officers and to have been a moving force behind their misconduct. Although a close question, the Court finds that these allegations are sufficient to state a claim. . . . There is no allegation that the County participated in Plaintiff's arrest. There is no allegation that the arresting officers were employed by the County. The allegations of the SAC make it clear that it is the Town of Atherton, not the County, which allegedly 'required' Atherton's officers to implement a discriminatory policy. However, the SAC also alleges that there was a contract (either oral or written) pursuant to which the Town of Atherton required its officers to carry out the County's training policies. Although the allegations that the County controlled the officers are sparse, and there are no allegations suggesting that the officers were 'a mere conduit for carrying out [the County's] will'. . . , the facts alleged in the Third and Fourth Claims for relief must be accepted as true on a 12(b)(6). Plaintiff alleges that the Town of Atherton and the County of San Mateo entered into an agreement providing that the County would promulgate or adopt a discriminatory policy, and further agreed that the Town of Atherton would instruct or require its officers to carry out this allegedly discriminatory policy. . . And in the Fourth Claim, the Plaintiff alleges that County and the Town of Atherton entered into an agreement whereby the Atherton police officers would be trained in the discriminatory policies of the County. . . These allegations are sufficient at the pleading stage."); Clinton v. Berkeley County, 2009 WL 35331, at *6 (N.D.W.Va. Jan. 6, 2009) ("To the extent that the plaintiff asserts a claim against the Task Force, it is well settled that a drug task force is not a 'person' amendable to suit under § 1983. See Harvey v. Estes, 65 F.3d. 784 (9th Cir.1995) (a multi-jurisdictional drug task force is not a person under § 1983); Jackson v. Commonwealth of Virginia, 2006 WL 1700655 (W.D.Va.2006) (same); Timberlake v. Benton, 786 F.Supp 676 (M.D.Tenn.1992) (same). Accordingly, the Task Force is not a proper party defendant in this case and should be dismissed."); Cutter v. Metro Fugitive Squad, No. CIV-06-1158-GKF, 2008 WL 4068188, at *12 (W.D. Okla. Aug. 29, 2008) ("[A]n intergovernmental task force made up of various local, county and state agencies may be subject to suit under § 1983 if the parties that created it intended to create a separate legal entity. . .It is premature to determine at this stage of the proceedings whether MFS is subject to suit under § 1983. There is no record evidence regarding the creation of MFS, whether the creators of MFS intended to establish a separate legal entity subject to suit, whether there is a joint operating agreement among the government entities, whether MFS has an independent operating budget, whether its member entities retain responsibility for the employment, salary, benefits, and terms and conditions of all employees, whether MFS is vested with policymaking authority or has promulgated any rules or regulations for the law enforcement activities of its members, or whether the MFS participants remain obliged to follow the rules and regulations of his or her respective law enforcement agency. . . Thus, MFS's motion to dismiss on the basis that it is not an entity subject to suit under § 1983 is denied without prejudice to reassertion in a motion for summary judgment."); Pettiford v. City of Greensboro, No. 1:06cv1057, 2008 WL 2276962, at *13, *17, *23 (M.D.N.C. May 30, 2008) ("The City argues that Plaintiffs could not 'establish that the municipality actually caused the alleged constitutional deprivation' because any harm suffered by Plaintiffs occurred at the direction of the Federal Parties rather than pursuant to its own official policy or custom. . . . At oral argument, the City was hard-pressed to identify a legal framework for analyzing whether its employees acted as federal agents during the underlying investigation of the Pettifords and whether such a determination, if found, compels dismissal for want of subject matter jurisdiction based on derivative federal immunity. . . . The court has conducted independent research, which demonstrates that other courts have articulated at least four frameworks to determine whether a local law enforcement officer or official may be deemed a federal agent for purposes of tort liability: (1) statutory cross-deputation; (2) totality of the circumstances; (3) borrowed servant doctrine; and (4) government contractor defense. Although these frameworks arise in different contexts, they share common principles, especially the emphasis on day-to-day control or supervision of the employee(s) in question. [The court engages is a lengthy discussion of each.] . . . . In sum, on the present record the City continues to face legal and factual hurdles in its quest to benefit from derivative federal sovereign immunity. Cooperation between federal and local authorities is critical to effective law enforcement, and the court is sensitive to the need to encourage, not hinder, such efforts. It is for this reason that the court engaged in the lengthy analysis above based on research independent from the parties' briefing. . . . The above analysis reveals that the City's motion as styled is misdirected. The question is not whether the City, the sole defendant, is immune because it was acting as a federal agent. Rather, because no liability lies under section 1983 for actions taken under color of federal law, . . . the real issue for the City is whether it can show that Plaintiffs cannot prove an element of their section 1983 claim − that the City acted under 'color of state law' − because all the GSO PD officers involved were allegedly acting as federal agents. The City's motion, therefore, is more properly made on summary judgment, after discovery and based on a more fully developed record. Accordingly, the City's motion to dismiss the section 1983 claim for want of subject matter and personal jurisdiction based on derivative sovereign and prosecutorial immunities is DENIED, without prejudice to its being raised on summary judgment."); Arias v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement Div. of Dept. of Homeland Sec, Civ. No. 07-1959 ADM/JSM, 2008 WL 1827604, at *13-*15 (D. Minn. Apr. 23, 2008) ("The City Defendants contend that Plaintiffs' individual-capacity § 1983 claims against them must be dismissed. As a threshold matter, the Court must consider whether § 1983 even applies in this case. The City Defendants assert they were assisting ICE agents in enforcing the immigration laws. . . Congress has addressed this situation in 8 U.S.C. § 1357, which 'specifically empower[s] the Attorney General ... to contract with state and local agencies for assistance in enforcing immigration laws and incarcerating illegal aliens.' . . A formal agreement is unnecessary for a state or local officer 'to communicate with the Attorney General regarding the immigration status of any individual ... or otherwise to cooperate with the Attorney General in the identification, apprehension, detention, or removal of aliens not lawfully present in the United States.' 8 U.S.C. § 1357(g)(10). 'In performing a function under this subsection, an officer or employee of a State or political subdivision of a State shall be subject to the direction and supervision of the Attorney General.' 8 U.S.C. § 1357(g)(3). Significantly, Congress has provided that '[a]n officer or employee of a State or political subdivision of a State acting under color of authority under this subsection, or any agreement entered into under this subsection, shall be considered to be acting under color of Federal authority for purposes of determining the liability, and immunity from suit, of the officer or employee in a civil action brought under Federal or State law.' 8 U.S.C. § 1357(g)(8). The Second Amended Complaint alleges that the City Defendants assisted in the planning and execution of Operation Cross Check, which is a DHS operation implemented by ICE. Although the City Defendants apparently assume that § 1983 applies, it is difficult to discern how their participation in Operation Cross Check occurred under color of state law. Instead, it appears from Plaintiffs' allegations that the City Defendants acted under color of federal authority pursuant to 8 U.S.C. § 1357(g)(8). If so, then Plaintiffs' § 1983 claims should be construed as Bivens claims. . . . Although the parties have not briefed the issue, Congress's statutory directive in ' 1357(g)(8) is clear. Accordingly, assuming Plaintiffs' allegations are true, the Court finds that the City Defendants were acting under color of federal authority . . . . [T]o the extent Plaintiffs are asserting that Kulset and Reed Schmidt are liable as supervisors, the Court finds Plaintiffs' allegations fail to state a claim. Under 8 U.S.C. § 1357(g)(3), any Willmar or Atwater officers who assisted ICE in executing Operation Cross Check did so under 'the direction and supervision of the Attorney General.' Because officers of the federal government supervised the Willmar and Atwater police officers during Operation Cross Check, Kulset and Reed Schmidt cannot be liable as supervisors. . . . Although the City Defendants do not address the full implication of 8 U.S.C. § 1357(g), the Court finds that the statute bars Plaintiffs' Monell claims against the City Defendants in their official capacities. Plaintiffs seek to hold the City Defendants liable in their official capacities for assisting ICE in implementing Operation Cross Check, which is a federal immigration initiative executed pursuant to federal policy. The City Defendants' assistance falls squarely within the ambit of ' 1357(g). Accordingly, the City Defendants are considered to be acting under color of federal authority and under the supervision of the Attorney General and the DHS Secretary. . . Therefore, Plaintiffs cannot assert a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 Monell claim because the City Defendants were not acting under color of state law, and they were not the final policymakers regarding Operation Cross Check. Alternatively, even if ' 1357(g) does not apply, Plaintiffs have still failed to allege a city policy that was the moving force behind the alleged constitutional violations. Plaintiffs' claims arise from the federal policies embodied in the planning and implementation of Operation Cross Check, and not from any city or county policies. . . The Court grants the City Defendants' motion to dismiss the official-capacity Bivens claims against them."); Howell v. Polk, No. 04-CV-2280-PHX-FJM, 2006 WL 463192, at *1, *8 & n.8, *14 (D. Ariz. Feb. 24, 2006) ("The Prescott Area Narcotics Task Force ("PANT") is an intergovernmental organization comprised of Yavapai County area municipalities and aimed to reduce unlawful narcotics activities. . . . The PANT Board governs the PANT. . . Plaintiffs claim that the PANT Board is responsible for training all PANT officers, and that all Board Defendants are liable for failing to adequately train all PANT Defendants with regard to the execution of search warrants. There is no evidence to show that PANT Board members were only responsible for the functioning of the PANT with regard to PANT officers employed by a common municipality. . . .The intergovernmental agreement which established the PANT states that "each [municipality] shall be solely responsible for its own acts or omission and those of its officers and employees by reason of its operations under this agreement." . . . While this provision may affect the distribution of ultimate liability among the parties to the agreement, it cannot supplant federal constitutional law with regard to supervisor liability. . . . Therefore, with regard to this claim, it is irrelevant whether Board Defendants and PANT Defendants are employed by the same municipality. . . . Plaintiffs also claim that all defendants are liable in their official capacities, by which plaintiffs claim that the municipalities for which each defendant works failed to properly train PANT defendants with regard to the execution of search warrants. . . . As with regard to plaintiffs' claims against Board Defendants, there is insufficient evidence from which to conclude that the need for more or different training was so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the municipalities for which each defendant worked were deliberately indifferent to the need for training."); Johnson v. Bd. of Police Commissioners, 370 F.Supp.2d 892, 902 (E.D. Mo. 2005) ("Plaintiffs allege that Defendants City of St. Louis and Police Board acted in concert pursuant to a 'policy or persistent, common, and well-settled practice and custom of intimidating and driving homeless and homeless appearing people from downtown St. Louis,' which has resulted in a pattern of misconduct by Defendant City of St. Louis and its employees. . . . Defendant City of St. Louis claims it has no legal authority to create policy for Defendant Police Board. Without legal authority, the City of St. Louis argues that there is no 'legal tie' between Defendants City of St. Louis and Police Board, and Defendant City of St. Louis cannot be liable for alleged actions taken by police officers. Notwithstanding this assertion, the Court finds that the fact that the Defendants are separate legal entities does not prevent them from acting in concert to deprive constitutional rights pursuant to a joint policy or custom, as alleged in the Complaint. . . Plaintiffs have alleged that Defendant City of St. Louis developed, and acted together with Defendant Board of Police, to implement the policies responsible for the alleged unconstitutional conduct at issue in this case. The fact that Defendant Police Board and Defendant City of St. Louis are separate legal entities does not warrant dismissal. Plaintiffs have adequately alleged the elements of municipal liability.); Pond v. Bd. of Trustees, No. 1:03-CV-755-LJM-VSS, 2003 WL 23220730, at *4 (S.D. Ind. Nov. 25, 2003) ("Because the Muncie Police Department did not have the authority to set policy for the Ball State officers, Pond cannot argue that action pursuant to a Muncie Police Department policy caused the Fourth Amendment violation. In addition, the jurisdiction extension Agreement between the Muncie Police Department and Ball State did not give Muncie policymaking authority over Ball State's Police Department. Indiana law limits the jurisdiction of university police officers to a university's real property, but allows municipal police chiefs like Chief Winkle to grant them additional jurisdiction. . . In accordance with ' 20-12-3.5-2, Chief Winkle granted the Ball State police officers jurisdiction throughout Muncie. The additional jurisdiction provision is contained in the same chapter of the Indiana Code that grants the board of trustees the ability to appoint and set policy for university police officers, and nothing in the chapter indicates that a grant of additional jurisdiction by the relevant law enforcement agency would divest the board of trustees of policymaking authority over the university officers."); Tyson v. Willauer, No. 301CV01917(GLG), 2003 WL 22519876, at *2 n.4 (D.Conn. Nov. 1, 2003)(not reported) ("[A]t all times relevant to plaintiffs' complaint, Willauer was acting in his capacity as a deputized DEA Task Force Agent, not as a Bloomfield police officer. It is highly questionable as to whether plaintiffs could establish any causal link between any policy of the Town and the actions of Willauer that resulted in their alleged constitutional deprivations."); Silberberg v. Lynberg, 186 F.Supp.2d 157, 170 n.11 (D. Conn. 2002) ("The court notes that the town defendants can be liable, in cases such as this, as the 'real parties in interest' behind the VSCU [Valley Street Crime Unit]. . . As the court indicated when it dismissed the VSCU as a party, the formation of an interlocal agreement does not create an independent legal entity capable of being sued. . . But that does not mean that simply by acting jointly, the towns can escape all liability for their actions. Several of the town defendants have argued that because no officer from that particular town was involved in the arrest or prosecution of Silberberg, the town can not be liable. However, the towns, as the 'real parties in interest', may be liable for any unlawful actions taken by the VSCU."); Ford v. City of Boston, 154 F. Supp.2d 131, 148-50 (D. Mass. 2001) ("City liability for the Jail searches of BPD arrestees poses an interesting question of institutional responsibility. . . . The plaintiffs point to an express agreement between the City and the County Sheriff, under which the County agreed to 'take custody of and house' BPD arrestees at the Jail. This case is thus best analyzed as involving a subcontract between the City and the County, under which Jail employees, acting as agents of the City, supervised and cared for City arrestees. . . As such, the City had an affirmative obligation − as is present in the more standard models for municipal liability − to ensure that the policy of the Jail officials did not lead to widespread violation of BPD arrestees' constitutional rights. . . . Having established that the City had an affirmative obligation to monitor conditions for BPD arrestees housed at the Jail, I must next assess whether the City failed to meet that obligation. In so doing, I find the 'deliberate indifference' standard of City of Canton readily applicable. . . . [T]he City effectively used the County Jail as its own facility for almost a decade. To permit the City to escape liability in this case would be to sanction willful disregard of municipal obligations. The City presumably could have chosen to build a municipal facility for women, or to hold arrestees in one of the ten existing City police station lockups. . . That it chose instead to contract with the County to house female arrestees did not entitle it to bury its head in the sand and ignore the manner in which the County treated those arrestees. . . . Under these circumstances, there can be no question that the City's liability in damages for Jail violations of BPD arrestees' Fourth Amendment rights is coextensive with that of the County.").

But see Deaton v. Montgomery County, Ohio, 989 F.2d 885, 888-90 (6th Cir.1993) ("The duty to manage and operate the facility belongs to the City and the custom or policy it chooses to implement does not become that of the County because the City has separate statutory authority to house prisoners. Therefore, any constitutional violations of the plaintiffs' rights were the result of City, not County, policy. . . . The interdependence in this instance does not make the County a joint participant since each governmental entity is required to be in compliance with Ohio law. Moreover, because each entity is required to be in compliance with Ohio law, we do not believe the County adopts the City's policy by default absent a showing of deliberate indifference. . . . We do not believe that the Sheriff of Montgomery County has an affirmative duty to discover whether the city is following state law. There are no facts presented indicating that the sheriff knew or should have known that strip searches were conducted in violation of state law. In other cases where deliberate indifference has been found, the county was held liable for its own action or inaction, or that of a private entity. The instant case deals with another governmental entity governed by the same laws as the County. The City has independent statutory authority to house prisoners and in doing so was required to comply with Ohio law. It is for this reason that we find that Montgomery County is not liable."); Pelka v. Ware County, Georgia, No. CV 516-108, 2018 WL 4343401, at *2–4 (S.D. Ga. Sept. 11, 2018), appeal dismissed, No. 19-11039-FF, 2019 WL 4621966 (11th Cir. June 27, 2019) ("The City argues that the Court's September 29 Order concluding that the City's liability under Section 1983 can be imputed from its contract with Ware County is a clear error. Specifically, the City contends that the Court's reliance on Ancata is misplaced and that the City cannot be liable for the County's policies. As such, a review of Ancata and related precedents is appropriate. In Ancata v. Prison Health Servs., Inc., 769 F.2d 700 (11th Cir. 1985), the Eleventh Circuit held that a municipal government could be held liable for the alleged unconstitutional policies of the private medical provider it contracted with to provide health services to its prison. . . The court reasoned that since governments have a 'non-delegable' duty to provide medical care to incarcerated individuals, they can be held liable for violations of that duty, even where the medical care was provided by a private third party entity. . . Ancata is, however, distinguishable from this case in that the municipality contracted with a private entity for medical services, whereas the City here was contracting with another governmental unit with its own independent duty to provide incarcerated individuals with medical care. This distinction was recognized in Deaton v. Montgomery Cnty., 989 F.2d 885 (6th Cir. 1993), where the Sixth Circuit held that a county was not automatically liable for the strip search policies of a city by virtue of a contract to house county prisoners in the city jail. . . The court explained that unlike Ancata, the city had independent authority to house prisoners and was required to follow the same laws as the county. Because of that distinction, the court held that the county did not adopt the city's policy by default absent a showing of deliberate indifference. . . The Deaton court went on to find the plaintiff failed to allege facts that showed any deliberate indifference on the part of the county or its agents. . . The court noted that neither the county nor its sheriff had 'an affirmative duty to discover whether the city is following state law.'. . And, moreover, the plaintiff presented no facts indicating the sheriff knew or should have known that the strip search policy was in violation of state law. . . Finally, the court pointed out that the act of filing a suit challenging a policy could be sufficient to put the county on notice in the future. . . Some courts have been critical of the reasoning in Deaton. In Ford v. City of Boston, 154 F. Supp. 2d 131 (D. Mass. 2001), the court found that the city was liable for the county's strip search policy. . . The court clarified that it was not subjecting the city to respondeat superior liability. Instead, 'the question is City liability for promulgation and implementation of an express County policy, not City liability for the negligent acts of County employees acting as agents of the City.'. . The court also rejected the distinction Deaton made between private and governmental entities. By contracting with another governmental entity, the city had an affirmative obligation to ensure that the county's policies complied with constitutional standards. Nevertheless, the court still applied the deliberate indifference standard to determine if the city met its obligation. . . Similarly, in Trujilo v. City and Cnty. of Denver, 2016 WL 5791208 (D. Colo. Sept. 7, 2016), the court applied the reasoning from Ford to find the city could be liable for the health care policies of the public entity in charge of the prison's health services. . . The court discussed Deaton, but, importantly, focused on the allegations necessary to show deliberate indifference on the part of the city. . . Unlike the insufficient allegations in Deaton, the Trujilo court found the plaintiff in its case alleged facts showing the city was deliberately indifferent, namely that the city had a significant history of failing to train its personnel properly to administer health care to inmates. . . There was further evidence adduced by the plaintiff to show the city was aware of a previous inmate's death, was involved in litigation and an eventual settlement related to that death, and dealt with public outcry stemming from that incident. These facts were sufficient to put the city on notice and 'allege [ ] plausibly that the [c]ity was deliberately indifferent.'. . Finally, Warren v. Dist. of Columbia, 353 F.3d 36 (D.C. Cir. 2004), clarifies the contours of the deliberate indifference standard. In that case, the plaintiff sued the District of Columbia and the private prison it contracted with to house plaintiff and other inmates for constitutional violations under Section 1983. . . Discussing the deliberate indifference theory of municipal liability, the court explained that the required culpability involves more than just negligence. . . 'It does not require the city to take reasonable care to discover and prevent constitutional violations.'. . The Warren court did, however, state that either actual or constructive knowledge of its agents' constitutional violations could be enough to impose liability on a municipality. Accordingly, even under the most lenient standard, a plaintiff must still show that the municipality had sufficient notice of the policy to find it demonstrated deliberate indifference. In the instant case, Plaintiff failed to allege facts that show the City had notice of WCJ's policy. Plaintiff does contend that the policies were a matter of public record, available through the Georgia Open Records Act. . . Access to the public record, however, is insufficient to put the City on notice, particularly under the rigorous standards of culpability required to hold a municipality liable for deliberate indifference. . . Additionally, if making a policy public was enough to satisfy notice, any state with a public record would put every municipality on notice of every promulgated government policy. Finding knowledge based on public records would vitiate the deliberate indifference standard. Plaintiff must allege that the City knew about WCJ's policies or that such knowledge can be inferred from its obviousness. . . Plaintiff, however, failed to allege facts that demonstrate that the City had notice of WCJ's policy or that it was deliberately indifferent to the alleged unconstitutional policies. Plaintiff alleges no prior similar incidents at WCJ or previous lawsuits filed that could provide notice. . . For these reasons, Plaintiff has failed to allege a basis for the City's liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. Accordingly, refusing to grant the City's motion to dismiss was an error and its motion for reconsideration (doc. 92) is GRANTED."); Hinckley v. Thurston County, No. C05-5458 RJB, 2006 WL 1705897, at *4(W.D. Wash. June 14, 2006) ("Plaintiff's argument is insufficient because Thurston County's policy of transferring inmates to another jail governed by the same constitutional, statutory, and regulatory standards it faces has no causal relationship with Plaintiff's injuries. Since the record is devoid of any evidence that Thurston County should have known Yakima County ran a constitutionally deficient jail, if indeed that is determined at another stage of this case, the simple decision to transfer an inmate under a contract sanctioned by State law cannot be said to establish direct liability.").

See also Martinez v. Carson, 697 F.3d 1252, 1253-56 (10th Cir. 2012) ("The incident underlying this action began when Defendants Gary Carson and Don Mangin, employees of the New Mexico Department of Corrections, observed Plaintiffs Phillip Martinez and Ricardo Sarmiento sitting or standing with a third man in a low-lit area outside an apartment building in a high-crime neighborhood at night. Defendants, who had been patrolling the area as task force members with police officers from the Rio Rancho Department of Public Safety, pulled up to the apartment building in an unmarked police car and turned on the emergency lights. The third man fled into the apartment building when Defendants approached, and Rio Rancho police officer Lieutenant Camacho pursued him. Meanwhile, Defendants forced Plaintiffs to the ground, handcuffed them, drew weapons, and conducted a pat-down search. When additional Rio Rancho officers arrived on the scene a few minutes later, Defendants transferred Plaintiffs, still in handcuffs, into the custody of these officers. The Rio Rancho police officers eventually arrested and booked Plaintiffs, holding Mr. Martinez for twelve hours and Mr. Sarmiento for five hours before their release. . . .We conclude that a reasonable jury could find Defendants' conduct to be the proximate cause of at least some portion of Plaintiffs' prolonged detention following Defendants' transfer of custody to the Rio Rancho officers. The jury found that Defendants had no reasonable suspicion of criminal activity when they forced Plaintiffs to lie on the ground, handcuffed them, and transferred them, still in handcuffs, to the custody of Rio Rancho police officers. We conclude that a reasonable jury could further find this initial illegal detention and transfer of custody was the but-for cause of Plaintiffs' further detention in Rio Rancho custody—a jury could reasonably find that Plaintiffs' arrests and prolonged detentions would not have occurred had Defendants not seized them and transferred them to the custody of Rio Rancho officers. Finally, we conclude that the facts and reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom could support a jury finding that Defendants knew or should have known their illegal seizure and transfer of custody would result in Plaintiffs' prolonged detention after the transfer of custody. Although Defendants may not have foreseen the full extent of the detention, a jury could certainly find that they foresaw at least some additional period of detention while, for instance, the Rio Rancho officers conducted an investigation into probable cause. The extent to which Defendants can be held liable for the further detention depends upon what they reasonably foresaw when they transferred Plaintiffs to police custody, and we conclude that this question is sufficiently disputed to require resolution by a jury.").

See also Breitkopf v. Gentile, 12-CV-1084 JFB AKT, 2014 WL 4258994, *27, *28 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 29, 2014) ("The Court's research uncovered no cases holding that a municipality must continue to monitor or address a trainee's conduct in order to avoid Section 1983 liability, even though that trainee no longer works or never worked for the municipality and/or is under the control and supervision of another municipality. . .That responsibility lies with the employer. . . .Here, Gentile never worked for the NYPD, and he graduated from the Academy in 2006. Even assuming arguendo that there were deficiencies in the Academy's instruction, no rational jury could find a direct causal link between any such shortcomings and Breitkopf's death, because (1) the City had no control over Gentile and no responsibility to continue training him; (2) the MTAPD provides in-service training independent of the NYPD—training plaintiff claims taught Gentile to shoot first and ask questions later if he encounters an armed, plainclothes individual; and (3) as discussed supra (in connection with the Section 1983 claim against the MTA), there is no evidence that the training was constitutionally defective or that any such defects caused Gentile's actions.")

d. Government Entity/Private Prison Management Agreements

See e.g., Burke v. Regalado, 935 F.3d 960, 996 n. 17 (10th Cir. 2019) ("For supervisory liability, a supervisor may be liable even if the person who committed the underlying constitutional violation was not an employee. . . For municipal liability, courts have held entities liable for the actions of independent contractors. In King v. Kramer, 680 F.3d 1013 (7th Cir. 2012), the Seventh Circuit held a county could be liable for the deliberate indifference of jail medical providers employed by an independent contractor to which the county had delegated 'final decision-making authority ... over inmates' access to physicians and medications.'. . In Crooks v. Nix, 872 F.2d 800 (8th Cir. 1989), the Eighth Circuit explained that prison officials could be liable for the deliberate indifference of contracted medical personnel."); Payne v. Sevier County, 681 F. App'x 443, 448 (6th Cir. 2017) (Donald, J., concurring) ("While I agree with the majority that Mr. Payne has not made the requisite showing to support a finding of Monell liability, I find it necessary to emphasize that this rule does not allow, nor does this Court condone, a municipality attempting to escape its constitutional duties by hiring a contractor to provide a fundamental service without supervision. Mr. Payne argues that because Sevier County's duty to provide adequate medical care to its inmates is non-delegable, it maintains responsibility for constitutional deprivations caused by its medical contractor's policies or customs. In making this argument, Mr. Payne relies on Ancata v. Prison Health Services, Inc, an Eleventh Circuit decision, in which the Court states in dicta that the county 'remains liable for any constitutional deprivations caused by the policies or customs' of the medical contractor. . . To refute this argument, Defendant Sevier County argued in briefing and at oral argument that a municipality may only be liable for the decisions of a contractor where the municipality 'officially abdicated its right to review and influence the subordinate's decisions.'. .Sevier County asserts that under this rule, even where the municipality 'granted an actor wide discretion to perform a duty and was lax or even negligent in it supervision,' it will not be liable unless it has delegated its policy-making authority. . . Sevier County is correct that '[s]imply going along with discretionary decisions made by one's subordinates ... is not a delegation to them of the authority to make policy.'. . However, this precedent does not absolve municipalities of liability for actions of contracted medical providers. Nor does it relieve municipalities of their constitutional responsibilities as completely as Sevier County has argued here. A municipality may be liable for the decisions of a contractor not only where a supervising policymaker 'expressly approved' a decision by a subordinate that was 'cast in the form of a policy statement,' but also where 'a series of decisions by a subordinate official manifested a "custom or usage" of which the supervisor must have been aware.'. . As the majority opinion makes clear, Mr. Payne has not made a requisite showing that either a custom or policy attributable to Sevier County caused his injury. However, this opinion should not be read to shield a municipality that attempts to discharge its constitutional duties by hiring contractors to provide fundamental services to those in the municipality's care and then placing its head in the sand to remain oblivious to violations."); Daniel v. Cook County, 833 F.3d 728, 737 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Daniel's suit names as defendants the Cook County Sheriff's Office, Cook County Sheriff Dart in his individual capacity, and Cook County itself. The Sheriff's Office argues that it cannot be liable for Daniel's injuries because it was not responsible for his medical care. Instead, all treatment was to be handled by Cermak Health & Hospitals System, which is a medical facility separate from the Jail itself. But the constitutional duty under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments to provide adequate health care rests on the custodian. . . As the district court correctly noted, a government entity 'cannot shield itself from § 1983 liability by contracting out its duty to provide medical services.'. . There is also a close relationship between the Jail and Cermak. The Cermak facilities are physically located within the Jail, and Jail personnel are responsible for delivering patients to Cermak for care. Even if the care Daniel received at Cermak was inadequate, Daniel has offered evidence that the Sheriff's Office exacerbated the problems by failing to communicate with Cermak and failing to deliver Daniel to his appointments. The Sheriff's Department is therefore a proper defendant."); Doe v. United States, 831 F.3d 309, 317-19 (5th Cir. 2016) ("We next examine summary judgment. . . for state actor Williamson County on the plaintiffs' Section 1983 claim. . . . The plaintiffs here do not challenge the transport policy itself. Instead, they argue that evidence shows Williamson County adopted the transport policy by entering into the service agreement with ICE, knew of the potential consequences to detainees if CCA employees violated the policy, and then failed to monitor the detention center properly to ensure no such violation occurred. . . .To the extent that the plaintiffs argue Williamson County is liable directly for the CCA defendants' failure to follow the transport policy, we cannot agree. '[U]nder § 1983, local governments are responsible only for their own legal acts.'. . Contrary to the facts in some of the non-binding cases cited by the plaintiffs, Williamson County did not 'delegate[ ] final policy-making authority' to CCA in regard to protocol for transporting detainees. In fact, in the subcontract, Williamson County expressly mandated that CCA comply with all provisions of the service agreement, which required adherence to ICE's transport policy. Williamson County is not directly responsible for CCA's failure to follow policy, and Williamson County did not otherwise act with deliberate indifference in monitoring the detention center. Summary judgment for Williamson County was proper."); King v. Kramer, 680 F.3d 1013, 1020, 1021 (7th Cir. 2012) (King I) ("The Supreme Court has confirmed that the infliction of unnecessary suffering through the failure to provide adequate medical care for inmates is covered by the Eighth Amendment (and thus, in our setting, by the Fourteenth). . . The County cannot shield itself from §1983 liability by contracting out its duty to provide medical services. (Indeed, the Court's recent decision in Filarsky v. Delia, 132 S.Ct. 1657 (2012), to the effect that private contractors are entitled to assert qualified immunity, suggests by parity of reasoning that they are state actors for other purposes as well.) The underlying rationale is not based on respondent superior, but rather on the fact that the private company's policy becomes that of the County if the County delegates final decision-making authority to it. Ancata v. Prison Health Servs., Inc., 769 F.2d 700, 705–06 (11th Cir.1985). The evidence presented for summary judgment purposes shows that the County's policy was to entrust final decision-making authority to HPL over inmates' access to physicians and medications. Nothing in the record as of now suggests that the County had higher aspirations for the care it was providing, but that those standards were not met. The contract the County had with HPL at the time of King's incarceration states that HPL was responsible for providing a physician to attend weekly sick call 'for an estimated minimum of one hour and an estimated maximum of three hours except as is medically necessary.' The contract also states that 'HPL shall provide monitoring of pharmacy usage as well as development of a preferred drug list.' HPL's practice at the time of King's incarceration was to have Dr. Erickson at the jail for visits with patients for no more than four hours a week. The on-call physician, Dr. Cullinan (who was in Peoria and thus not able to back up Dr. Erickson for personal visits), was not expected to prescribe medications in person. HPL trained its nurses to follow a protocol when inmates arrived with medications excluded from HPL's formulary: Ask the inmate how long he has been on the medication and then notify Dr. Cullinan so that he would be in a position to write orders over the phone to transfer the inmate to a permitted drug. We are not saying here that prescription formularies are per se unconstitutional, or that restricted physician access is by definition inappropriate. It is instead the County's endorsement of the particulars of the arrangements in this case and the way the two policies interacted, that caused it to run afoul of the Constitution (if we believe King's account). The County's express policies as embodied in the contract show that the County delegated to HPL final authority to make decisions about inmates' medical care. We have previously said that a municipality would violate the Eighth Amendment under Monell if it had a policy requiring jail staff to throw away all prescription medications without implementing an appropriate mechanism for providing alternative treatment. Calhoun v. Ramsey, 408 F.3d 375, 379–80 (7th Cir.2005). This case eerily tracks that hypothetical example: HPL routinely switched patients off prescribed medications without appropriate oversight by a physician. Even if the County had not delegated final decision-making authority to HPL, it was on notice that HPL's physician- and medication-related policies were causing problems at the jail. If the County is 'faced with actual or constructive knowledge that its agents will probably violate constitutional rights, [it] may not adopt a policy of inaction.'. . There were at least seven articles published by the La Crosse Tribune expressing alarm over HPL's medication policy. Steve Helgeson, who became the Sheriff on January 1, 2007, testified that he was aware of the discussions involving the jail's problems with medication distribution to inmates in 2004 and 2005. This is enough evidence to create a question of material fact whether the County was aware at the relevant time that HPL had policies that violated inmates' constitutional rights. In summary, King has pointed to significant evidence that the County's policies violated his constitutional rights. Mondry–Anderson was concerned about taking King off alprazolam at booking, but she was required to abide by HPL's policy of switching him to the formulary. King was prescribed dramatic changes in his medication by an 'on-call' physician nearly 300 miles away who took no steps to educate himself about King's condition. These policies caused King to suffer severe seizures that ultimately contributed to his death. We therefore hold that King has presented sufficient evidence to survive summary judgment with respect to the County.").

See also Nielsen v. Thornell, 101 F.4th 1164, 1168-69 (9th Cir. 2024) (as amended) ("Arizona, like many other states, relies on privately run prisons to house some of its inmates. The NAACP's Arizona chapter and two former prisoners challenge the constitutionality of private prisons, alleging that their profit-motivated mission makes them less safe and secure than state-run prisons. While there may be compelling policy reasons against—or for—private prisons, there can be little debate that private prisons pass constitutional muster. Inmates do not have a protected liberty interest in avoiding private prisons because such prisons do not impose an 'atypical or significant hardship' beyond ordinary prison conditions. Nor do the plaintiffs have a valid Thirteenth Amendment claim based on involuntary servitude because the Amendment expressly carves out an exception for 'punishment for crime.' And their cruel and unusual punishment claim fails, too, because the Eighth Amendment does not cover the type of intrusions into prisoners' 'dignity' as alleged in this case. Finally, inmates do not have a fundamental right to be free from alleged commodification in private prisons. In sum, the Constitution does not prohibit states from turning to private companies to help run their correctional systems. The plaintiffs' arguments are better directed to Arizona's representatives and the citizens who elect them—not the courts. We affirm the district court's dismissal of the lawsuit."); Nielsen v. Thornell, 101 F.4th 1164, 1177-78 (9th Cir. 2024) (as amended) (Nguyen, J., concurring in the judgment) ("Notwithstanding plaintiffs' failure here to state a 'structural bias' claim, a state's private prison scheme in theory could lead to such a biased decisionmaking process that it denies inmates due process. Prison officials, like other administrative prosecutors, must be 'accorded wide discretion' and 'need not be entirely "neutral and detached."'. . But we 'should be chary of schemes that inject "a personal interest, financial or otherwise, into the enforcement process [and] may bring irrelevant or impermissible factors into the prosecutorial decision and in some contexts raise serious constitutional questions."'. . Here, as Judge Lee explains, Arizona incorporates certain statutory guardrails into its private prison scheme to ameliorate conflict of interest concerns. Although private prison contracts must provide the state 'cost savings,' Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 41-1609.01(G), they must also provide 'a level and quality of services' equaling or surpassing what the state would otherwise provide, id. § 41-1609.01(H). In addition, private prison contracts may not authorize prison operators to control inmate custody classifications or release dates—either directly or indirectly. . . And to better align incentives, prison contractors must self-insure against 'civil rights claims and liabilities,' id. § 41-1609.01(K)(2), and waive any defense based on sovereign immunity, id. § 41-1609.01(L). Plaintiffs allege that despite these protections, inmates in Arizona's private prisons 'experience greater deprivations of liberty' due to 'higher levels of incident reporting' than in state-run prisons. According to plaintiffs, private prisons have an incentive to over-report inmate misconduct because Arizona 'pays a predetermined ... rate to each prison corporation for each day each prisoner occupies a cell or bed in a private prison,' and an inmate 'generates more revenue and profit to a private prison corporation the longer the prisoner remains in the private prison.'. . . Without more, private prison employees' greater vigilance in reporting inmate misconduct does not in and of itself violate inmates' due process rights. Plaintiffs also fail to explain why individual correctional officers—as distinguished from the corporations employing them—are incentivized to over-charge inmate misconduct.")

See also Tressler v. Centre County, No. 1:24-CV-00456, 2024 WL 4989315, at *16 (M.D. Pa. Dec. 5, 2024) ("Centre County may also be suggesting that because it contracted with

PrimeCare to provide medical care, it cannot be liable. If that is what it is suggesting, it is wrong. Centre County had a constitutional obligation to provide medical care to its prisoners and detainees. . . The fact that it contracted with PrimeCare to provide that medical care does not absolve the County of its duty. . . Rather, despite the contract, ' "the county itself remains liable for any constitutional deprivations caused by the policies or customs of"' its contract-medical provider. . . " 'In that sense, the county's duty is non-delegable."'. .Thus, Centre County 'has potential liability stemming from its own, independent obligation to police its medical services contract with PrimeCare Medical, Inc.'. . [collecting cases] And '[w]hile the Court recognizes that "prison officials cannot be required to second guess the medical judgment of the [staff] physician," [the County's] contractual position vis-à-vis PrimeCare Medical, Inc. is an altogether different type of relationship than that between an on-the-ground medical provider and a correctional officer working' at the prison. . . The County's 'potential liability arises from its policy of contracting away of a nondelegable duty coupled with its [alleged] failure to ensure that the contract was properly carried out and the nondelegable duty met.'. .Based on the foregoing, to the extent that Centre County is suggesting that it cannot be liable because PrimeCare was providing contract medical care to its prisoners and detainees, we reject that suggestion. In sum, the complaint states a denial-of-medical-care claim upon which relief can be granted against Centre County."); Quinn v. US Prisoner Transport Inc., No. 2:18-CV-00149-DBH, 2019 WL 257980, at *11-13 (D. Me. Jan. 17, 2019), R&R adopted, 2019 WL 1474389 (D. Me. Apr. 3, 2019) ("Decisions related to the conditions under which a prisoner is transported as part of the extradition process are not discretionary decisions within the scope of absolute immunity afforded prosecutors. . . .In this case, Defendant allegedly chose to use private contractors to transport Plaintiff, rather than public employees. Although there are few cases that directly address public officials' screening, training, and supervisory duties with respect to contractors, as opposed to employees, the lack of a specific case involving a public official's responsibility for a private contractor's alleged constitutional deprivations during the transport of prisoners is not dispositive of the qualified immunity issue. . . At the time the Transport Defendants transported Plaintiff to Maine, the law was clearly established that Transport Defendants' alleged conduct was in violation of Plaintiff's constitutional protections. In fact, at this stage of the proceedings, Defendant does not challenge Plaintiff's assertion that the Transport Defendants' performance was constitutionally deficient. The central question as to Defendant Robinson is whether the law was clearly established that a governmental official, such as Defendant Robinson, alleged to be involved in the transport decision, is absolved of responsibility for assuring that during transport, the treatment of the prisoners satisfied basic constitutional requirements, by simply contracting with a third-party to transport the prisoners, without an assessment of and regardless of the quality of the services provided by the third-party. . . . [T]he law was clearly established at the time of Plaintiff's transport to Maine, a government official responsible for the safety and well-being of prisoners, cannot abdicate that responsibility by contracting with a third-party. Necessarily, therefore, if a government official is aware or obviously should have been aware that the third-party's practices present a genuine risk of a constitutional deprivation, but the official does not take readily available measures to mitigate the risk, the government official can be legally responsible for the deprivation. Plaintiff has alleged such facts in this case. Contrary to Defendant's argument, therefore, the relevant law was clearly established at the time Plaintiff was transported to Maine."); Lowe v. Cuyahoga County/Board of County Com'rs, No. 1:08–CV–01339, 2012 WL 6960992, at *10 (N.D. Ohio Dec. 8, 2011) ("It is the Court's opinion, from the above law, especially Ancata, that the County could be held liable for 'constitutional deprivations caused by the policies or customs' of the insured—MMS. By allowing MMS to establish and implement policies and procedures for the nondelegable responsibility to provide adequate healthcare to inmates, the County, by law, assumed those policies and procedures as its own. The liability policy does not require a legal determination of 'vicarious liability' or liability based on 'respondeat superior.' The County's liability completely hinged on whether the policies implemented by MMS and its agents satisfied the constitutional duty to provide those incarcerated with legally required medical care. As such, State Auto's argument is not well taken."); Hagan v. California Forensic Medical Group, No. CIV. S-07-1095 LKK/DAD, 2009 WL 728465, at *7 & n.5 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 5, 2009) ("CFMG employees have assumed a public function in providing medical care to inmates on behalf of the County. In performing this function, they are state actors whose conduct is limited by the Eighth Amendment. . . As such, if CFMG employees commit a constitutional violation, and the moving force behind this violation was a County policy manifesting deliberate indifference to constitutional rights, then the County may be liable. The facts that CFMG employees are not directly employed by the county, or that '[n]either BCSO or the jail administration have any supervisorial authority over CFMG,' . . . are relevant only insofar as they speak to these elements. . . Similarly, the County would not be able to limit its liability by delegating policymaking authority to CFMG. See Lytle v. Carl, 382 F.3d 978, 982-84 (9th Cir.2004). Neither party argues that such a delegation has occurred here."); Sumlin v. Gibson, 2008 WL 150687, at *4 (N.D.Ga. Jan. 8, 2008) ("Because the Fulton County Jail relied on the contracted medical provider, the Defendants argue, they never had a duty or responsibility to see that the Plaintiff's medical care was handled appropriately. However, the government's duty to ensure that a prisoner receives appropriate medical care is non-delegable. Ancata, 769 F.2d at 705. Liability may still attach for non-medical defendants even though § 1983 does not allow claims based on respondeat superior. . .For instance, a governmental body could be liable in the event that it or the private health care provider (because it operates under color of state law) adopted a policy or custom of improper treatment of prisoners. . . .Additionally, government defendants could be liable if the private health care provider makes final decisions regarding medical treatment. . . At that point, 'their acts, policies and customs become official policy.'"); Daniels v. Prison Health Services, Inc., No. 8:05CV1392T30TBM, 2006 WL 319260, at *4 (M.D. Fla. Feb. 10, 2006) ("Although Prison Health Services has contracted to perform an obligation owed by the county, the county itself remains liable for any constitutional deprivations caused by the policies or customs of a health service company. . . In this sense, the county's duty is non-delegable"); Martin v. Corrections Corporation of America, No. 05-2181 M1/P, 2006 WL 181966, at *4 (W.D. Tenn. Jan. 17, 2006) ("[T]he parties dispute whether Defendant Shelby County may be held liable for actions that occurred at the Shelby Training Center while it was operated by CCA. . . . A municipality is not relieved of its obligations to provide adequate medical care simply by contracting out its duties."); Herrera v. County of Santa Fe, 213 F. Supp.2d 1288, 1291, 1292 (D.N.M. 2002) ("Very few, if any, courts have addressed the specific issue of municipal or county liability, under § 1983, for the actions of a private company operating a jail or detention center. The Court was able to locate only one case suggesting an appropriate analysis. In Ancata v. Prison Health Servs., Inc., 769 F.2d 700 (11th Cir.1985), the estate of a deceased county jail prisoner filed a § 1983 action against the county and a private health care provider, among others. The Eleventh Circuit, while holding that the plaintiff had adequately alleged the possibility that the county's own actions or policies contributed to the prisoner's death, made the following observations: (1) if a constitutional tort committed by an employee of the private health care provider was not a result of the policy or custom of that private entity, the county would not be liable for the constitutional tort; to hold the county liable would require application of the respondeat superior doctrine, which is not permitted under § 1983; (2) however, where the county has delegated final authority to make decisions to a private entity such as the health care provider in that case, the policies and customs of the private entity become the policies and customs of the county; and (3) if the county, expressly or by default, permitted others to determine policy, the county is liable for their actions if the policy proves unconstitutional. . . The Ancata court based these observations on the fact that, where a county turns over final decision-making or policymaking authority to a certain employee, the county is liable for any decisions or policies of that employee. Similarly, the court reasoned, where the county turns over a government function such as providing inmate health care to a private company, and also grants that company the authority to make decisions concerning the level of care to be provided, the county has in effect delegated final policymaking authority to the private company and is liable for any policies established by the company. . . . This Court need not resolve the conflict between Deaton and Ford, since this case does not involve one governmental entity contracting with another. [footnote omitted] Instead, this case presents the type of case as to which Ancata, Deaton, and Ford all appear to agree − under the rationales of all three of these cases, the county may be held liable for a custom or policy established by Cornell, because the county has contracted with Cornell to perform a significant public function. Furthermore, this conclusion makes sense under traditional municipal-liability analysis. As noted in Ancata, if a local government delegates final policy-making authority to a particular employee, any custom or policy created by that employee is the custom or policy of the local government as well. Here, by contracting with Cornell to take over management and operation of the detention center, the county delegated final policy-making authority for the operation of the detention center to Cornell. [footnote omitted] Any custom or policy established by Cornell with respect to such operation, therefore, constitutes a custom or policy of the county for purposes of § 1983 liability.").

But see Pindak v. Cook County, No. 10 C 6237, 2013 WL 1222038, *7, *8 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 25, 2013) ("Plaintiff adequately alleges that Securitas officers working for MBRE [MB Real Estate Services, LLC], and by extension for PBC [Public Building Commission of Chicago], have a widespread practice of prohibiting panhandling. Plaintiff cites several instances where he was prohibited from panhandling and alleges that Securitas officers told him the prohibition was perpetual. Plaintiff also asserts that the ban was routinely enforced by different Securitas officers over several years. Though Plaintiff's allegations are sufficient to state a claim that Securitas officers are engaged in 'state action,' however, those allegations are not sufficient to state a claim that PBC is liable for them. Plaintiff admits that PBC's written regulations do not explicitly ban panhandling. . . And he has not named any individual decision-maker at PBC who should have had notice that he was being repeatedly banned from the Plaza for panhandling. A municipality cannot be held liable for a constitutional violation without evidence of 'a custom, policy or practice that effectively caused or condoned the alleged constitutional violations.'. . . Plaintiff argues that knowledge about Securitas's alleged practice of violating his constitutional rights can be imputed to PBC based on the widespread nature of the practice itself. . . But Plaintiff fails to allege that PBC had a widespread practice of condoning Securitas officers' denial of his rights. PBC did not even contract directly with Securitas. The court will not assume that PBC was aware of the actions of individual Securitas officers and condoned them, absent more specific allegations from Plaintiff. Because Plaintiff has not sufficiently alleged that PBC was controlling or encouraging Securitas officers' actions, he fails to plead that PBC had a widespread practice of banning panhandling. . . . Plaintiff believes that the need for training about panhandlers' rights is so obvious that Defendants' alleged failure to implement training about it shows deliberate indifference. (Pl.'s Resp. at 14.) The court disagrees. As with Plaintiff's widespread practice argument, Plaintiff fails to allege that anyone at PBC had knowledge that Securitas officers allegedly interfered with Plaintiff's panhandling. Nothing in the record suggests that PBC made a deliberate choice not to train employees about obvious constitutional threats, and negligent conduct is insufficient to establish a violation of § 1983. . . . Plaintiff has adequately alleged that Securitas had a widespread practice of banning peaceful panhandling on Daley Plaza sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss.")

B. Liability Based on "Custom or Usage"

Monell allows the imposition of government liability not only when the challenged conduct executes or implements a formally adopted policy, but also when that conduct reflects "practices of state officials so permanent and well settled as to constitute a 'custom or usage' with the force of law." 436 U.S. at 691. Compare Bouman v. Block, 940 F.2d 1211 (9th Cir. 1991) ("If a practice is so permanent and well settled as to constitute a 'custom or usage' with the force of law, a plaintiff may proceed. . .despite the absence of written authorization or express municipal policy.") and Denno v. School Board of Volusia County, 218 F.3d 1267, 1278 (11th Cir. 2000) ("Given the lack of evidence with respect to the prohibition of the Confederate flag at Pine Ridge or at other schools within the district, we agree with the district court that Denno failed to adduce evidence creating a genuine issue of fact as to a pervasive and well-settled custom of banning the Confederate flag so as to make the Board potentially liable under Monell."). See also Culbertson v. Lykos, 790 F.3d 608, 628-29 (5th Cir. 2015) ("We have already held that the district attorney was not a final policy-maker for the claimed policy here. A policy, though, may be officially promulgated by the governing body, by an official to which policy-making authority has been properly delegated, or by officials or employees of the municipality through a 'persistent, widespread practice' that is 'so common and well settled as to constitute a custom that fairly represents municipal policy.'. . The claimed de facto policy of retaliation, plaintiffs allege, can be inferred from the number of individuals in the DA's Office who participated in the campaign against them and the 'very public nature' of the campaign. The plaintiffs also alleged in the complaint that during the grand jury investigation into the BAT vans, Lykos investigated members of the grand jury and of the prosecutors who conducted the grand jury investigation. Such an act is said also to reflect a policy of retribution. The plaintiffs' complaint falls short of alleging that Harris County had a 'persistent, widespread practice' of retaliation for the exercise of First Amendment rights. . . .Here, the plaintiffs allege there was a retaliatory campaign against them and a retaliatory investigation against the grand jury and its prosecutors, all arising from the same predicate events. The retaliatory campaign against them was publicly known, but they offered no evidence that similar retaliation had victimized others. There was, in other words, no allegation of a 'widespread practice' of retaliation that is 'so common and well settled' as to constitute the policy of Harris County. . .The allegations in this case are limited to the events surrounding the plaintiffs. That is not an allegation of a de facto policy of retaliation by the County. Harris County's potential liability rests solely on the actions of the Commissioners Court in cancelling the Lone Star Contract.")

The "custom or usage" in question will be attributed to the government body when the "duration and frequency of the practices warrants a finding of either actual or constructive knowledge by the...governing body [or policymaker with responsibility for oversight and supervision] that the practices have become customary among its employees." Spell v. McDaniel, 824 F.2d 1380. 1387 (4th Cir. 1987).

See also Franklin v. Franklin County, Kentucky, 115 F.4th 461, 470-71 (6th Cir. 2024) ("Franklin first argues that Franklin County is liable for her sexual assault because of its transportation practices. She specifically asserts that the Jail's practice of permitting a lone male officer to transport a female inmate to the hospital '[c]learly expose[s] sick, vulnerable female inmates to sexual abuse,' in violation of the Eighth Amendment. Franklin thus pursues what this court has called an 'affirmative' custom (or policy) claim against the Jail. . . As an initial matter, the Jail's practice of permitting one male officer to transport a lone female inmate appears to be a custom rather than a policy. . . Nothing in the record suggests that the rules governing cross-gender transportation were 'policies promulgated by the official vested with final policymaking authority for the municipality.'. . The practices governing cross-gender transportation are therefore best characterized as a custom because they instead establish only 'the knowledge of policymaking officials and their acquiescence in the established practice.'. . Neither party disputes that this custom exists. With this understanding in mind, we now turn to the relevant caselaw. . . . In the present case, Franklin argues that the Jail 'had a practice that clearly exposed sick, vulnerable female inmates to sexual abuse.' But this argument shows only that the Jail's transportation custom provided the opportunity for Price's unlawful behavior. Opportunity alone, however, fails to show that the Jail's custom 'direct[ly]' caused Franklin's assault. . . Indeed, Franklin must 'show that the particular injury was incurred because of the execution of that policy [or custom].'. . Franklin fails to explain how her assault was 'a direct result of [the Jail's] ... custom,' as opposed to Price's unilateral, unlawful actions. . . Price's unlawful actions, after all, were not 'pursuant to' the Jail's policy. . . Franklin thus seeks to hold the Jail liable 'for an injury inflicted solely by' Price. . . This theory of liability is based on 'de facto respondeat superior liability[, which is] explicitly prohibited by Monell.'. . We therefore reject Franklin's first theory of Monell liability."); Washington v. Housing Authority of the City of Columbia, 58 F.4th 170, 183-84 (4th Cir. 2023) ("Like Owens, Plaintiff 'has done more' than allege the mere existence of an 'impermissible' municipal custom. . .. Rather, Plaintiff has alleged 'brief, but non-conclusory, allegations' containing facts 'which, if true, would buttress h[er] legal conclusion.'. . Accepting all well-pleaded factual allegations as true, Plaintiff's complaint sufficiently alleges that the constitutional injury—Witherspoon's death by carbon monoxide poisoning resulting from a faulty furnace—'would have been avoided "under a program that was not deficient in the identified respect[s].'". . Had the Housing Authority elected to apply Policy 8-1.C to Allen Benedict Court, a missing carbon monoxide detector and a faulty furnace would have been considered life-threatening conditions requiring immediate attention within twenty-four hours. It's plausible, then, that these particular 'life-threatening conditions' would have been remedied: Witherspoon's detector would have sounded the alarm on the night of January 17, 2019, or the gas-burning furnace would have safely vented the carbon monoxide out of his apartment. In either case, Witherspoon's death 'would have been' averted. . .Similarly, if the Housing Authority had properly staffed inspectors and personnel, operated a uniform repair system, and trained and supervised its employees to comply with applicable housing laws, it is plausible that its employees would have been well-equipped to fix the maintenance issues at the apartments. In fact, Plaintiff alleged that at least one Housing Authority employee complained that he was not trained about carbon monoxide detector requirements. Thus, it appears plausible that had he and other employees been appropriately trained, they would have known to install carbon monoxide detectors, as was required by state and local law. Under such a program, Witherspoon would have had the benefit of a carbon monoxide detector in his apartment, and many of the leaking, gas-burning appliances in Allen Benedict Court would have been repaired. In sum, at this early stage, Plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to establish that the Housing Authority's policies and customs were the moving force behind the constitutional injury."); Moore v. LaSalle Management Company, L.L.C., 41 F.4th 493, 509-12 (5th Cir. 2022) ("Plaintiffs . . . contend that the Corporate Defendants and City are all directly liable under Monell. To prevail, Plaintiffs must show (1) 'an official policy (or custom),' (2) that 'a policy maker can be charged with actual or constructive knowledge,' and (3) 'a constitutional violation whose "moving force" is that policy (or custom).'. . The district court concluded that Plaintiffs could not raise a fact dispute under this test. We disagree. . . . Plaintiffs have raised a fact dispute over Hanson's actual knowledge. We have explained before that policymakers failing to take corrective action after their subordinates violate the constitution is some evidence that they know about an unconstitutional custom. . . Here, some record evidence suggests that guards sprayed Moore with pepper spray and beat him in the Four-Way as punishment. And following Moore's death, Hanson took no disciplinary action against anyone involved. Therefore, a reasonable jury could find on this record that Hanson actually knew that guards used the Four-Way and pepper spray to punish prisoners. Second, Plaintiffs have raised a fact dispute on Hanson's constructive knowledge. Constructive knowledge can be attributed to a policymaker 'on the ground that [he] would have known of the violations if [he] had properly exercised its responsibilities, as, for example, where the violations were so persistent and widespread that they were the subject of prolonged public discussion.'. . Plaintiffs point to evidence of exactly that. . . . Jackson's testimony certainly supports widespread and persistent use of the Four-Way and pepper spray to punish prisoners, and that those customs were subject to prolonged public discussion among prison staff. Therefore, a reasonable jury could find on this record that Hanson constructively knew that guards used the Four-Way and pepper spray to punish prisoners. . . Still, the City contends that it can't be liable since its delegation of authority expressly 'prohibited the use of force to "punish" an inmate.' In other words, that Hanson had no authority to adopt an unconstitutional custom. But the City's argument is too clever by half. . . . [W]e have rejected the City's very argument before. As we explained recently in Arnone v. County of Dallas County, what matters for attributing a policymaker's actions to a local government is not whether the complained of policy does or doesn't violate the law. '[W]hat matters is the precise "function" that the policymaker is exercising'—i.e., are they setting policy for the local government or someone else? . . . And, here, it's undisputed that Hanson set policy for the City when it came to running the prison. Therefore, we cannot agree with the City that it is somehow shielded from Monell liability on this record. . . .In short, Plaintiffs win on most, but not all their contentions about the Corporate Defendants' and City's liability. We do not decide if Plaintiffs can or cannot hold the Corporate Defendants vicariously liable for the Individual Defendants' actions. But Plaintiffs have raised fact disputes on the Corporate Defendants' and City's direct liability under Monell. Therefore, we reserve the vicarious-liability question, but REVERSE on Monell liability."); Prince v. Sheriff of Carter County, 28 F.4th 1033, 1050-51 (10th Cir. 2022) ("Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, a reasonable jury could conclude that CCJ maintained unofficial policies or customs of inadequate training, inadequate staffing, and delays in medical attention, often in violation of its own written policies, all as alleged in the complaint. The next inquiry is whether a reasonable jury could conclude that the municipality acted with deliberate indifference. 'The deliberate indifference standard may be satisfied when the municipality has actual or constructive notice that its action or failure to act is substantially certain to result in a constitutional violation, and it consciously or deliberately chooses to disregard the risk of harm.'. .The record below reflects that the Sheriff had actual knowledge of the numerous and systemic problems with CCJ's health care system. In particular, he was aware that CCJ did not employ a licensed physician in violation of its written policy. . . Moreover, three other CCJ inmates died in the three years prior to Bowker's death after seemingly receiving inadequate medical attention. . . The Sheriff testified that the only action he took in response to Manos' death, which took place seven months prior to Bowker's death and under similar circumstances, was directing the jail administrator to ask Miller to better monitor medication logs. Former jail administrator Michael Armstrong agreed during a deposition that requiring staff without medical training to make inmate medical decisions left CCJ's health care system 'destined to fail.' Given the Sheriff's knowledge of the numerous medical deficiencies at the jail, combined with the circumstances of Manos' death, a reasonable jury could determine that the Sheriff was deliberately indifferent to the risk that inmates would receive constitutionally inadequate medical attention. Finally, a reasonable jury could conclude that CCJ's deliberate indifference caused Bowker's death. As a result of CCJ's customs and policies, Bowker failed to receive medication, experienced delays in medical treatment, and untrained staff failed to timely transport him to the emergency room in his final days. According to Prince's medical expert, there is a reasonable probability that

CCJ's failure to provide continuous medical care to Bowker caused his death. We have recently held that a Sheriff's 'continuous neglect' of medical conditions similar to those in this case could lead a reasonable fact finder to infer causation of a plaintiff's injury sufficient to defeat summary judgment. . . Prince has therefore established a genuine dispute of material fact as to the Sheriff's liability. Accordingly, the Sheriff is not entitled to judgment as a matter of law."); Mitchell v. Kirchmeier, 28 F.4th 888, 901 (8th Cir. 2022) ("In sum, Mitchell has stated a claim for municipal liability under Monell. If the allegations in his complaint are true, then Morton County law enforcement engaged in a persistent pattern of excessive force against peaceful protestors that was tacitly authorized by Sheriff Kirchmeier and that led to Mitchell's injury. The district court erred in dismissing Mitchell's Monell claim against Morton County insofar as the claim asserted liability for the alleged violation of his Fourth Amendment rights."); Lucente v. County of Suffolk, 980 F.3d 284, 297-301, 306-07 (2d Cir. 2020) ("In order to establish Monell liability based upon a 'persistent and widespread' practice by a subordinate municipal employee (or employees) other than a policymaker, the employee's unconstitutional conduct must be 'so manifest as to imply the constructive acquiescence of senior policy-making officials.'. . In other words, there must be 'sufficient instances of tolerant awareness by supervisors of abusive conduct to support an inference that they had a policy, custom or usage of acquiescence in such abuse.'. . It is only at that point that, although not expressly authorized, the unconstitutional conduct is so persistent and widespread that it can constitute a custom or usage of which a supervising policymaker must have been aware. . . Here, the district court characterized Foti's conduct as the 'isolated action of a rogue [ ] officer.'. . Although there was no evidence that officers other than Foti participated in the alleged sexual assaults and sexual harassment of female inmates, there was nothing 'isolated' about his alleged misconduct at the Riverhead Facility. Putting aside the allegations from the 1990s contained in the Internal Affairs investigations and corresponding reports, the record includes testimony from six different female inmates – namely, the original plaintiffs in this case – who accused Foti of sexually assaulting and sexually harassing them at the Riverhead Facility. In addition to the alleged sexual assaults and sexual harassment of these six inmates over a period of approximately 18 months, the record is replete with evidence of inappropriate touching and/or other sexual harassment of female inmates on a regular basis by Foti in or around that same timeframe. . . . In short, construing the evidence in the record most favorably to plaintiffs, a rational jury could conclude that Foti's sexual misconduct against the female inmates (including sexual assaults, verbal harassment, and other inappropriate behavior) was not isolated, but rather was severe, persistent, and pervasive conduct that was executed in a manner that would have been difficult to conceal from supervisory personnel at the Riverhead Facility, including policymakers. . . Thus, the evidence regarding the severity and scope of Foti's misconduct towards female inmates, in combination with the evidence of awareness of various aspects of that sexual misconduct by multiple Suffolk County employees within the Riverhead Facility (discussed infra), provides strong support (if credited by the jury) for plaintiffs' municipal liability claim. . . . Notwithstanding the ambiguities in the record with respect to these incidents, plaintiffs should be able to ask the jury to rationally infer, especially by the time of the fifth report in 1999, that these reports collectively put the Sheriff on notice that Foti was the subject of serious allegations of sexual assault, sexual harassment, and inappropriate behavior toward female inmates both on-duty and off-duty, and that those allegations were not sufficiently investigated and addressed in order to ensure the future safety of female inmates at the Riverhead Facility. In reaching this conclusion, we emphasize that this proof was not the cornerstone of plaintiffs' evidence with respect to their attempt to prove the existence of a municipal policy or custom of acquiescing to unconstitutional conduct by Foti toward female inmates. Instead, the bulk of plaintiffs' evidence . . . related to establishing that there was widespread knowledge among supervisors at the Riverhead Facility of Foti's sexual misconduct towards female inmates from 2009 to 2011 (when plaintiffs were incarcerated there), and that corresponding inaction by those supervisors provided a basis for concluding that the Riverhead Facility's policymakers, who ran the facility, had constructive notice of the misconduct. However, even in that context, plaintiffs should be able to utilize these reports from the 1990s as background to attempt to demonstrate that the Sheriff's lack of response to the earlier allegations against Foti evidenced the beginning of a policy or custom of inaction and acquiescence that continued for well over a decade, which thereby placed female inmates at risk of subsequent unconstitutional conduct that is now alleged to have occurred years later with respect to the plaintiffs at the same Riverhead Facility. It is squarely within the province of the jury to decide, in determining municipal liability, what weight this evidence should receive on the issue of a policymaker's actual or constructive notice of the unconstitutional conduct in light of all the evidence in this case. . . . The district court also erred in concluding that any evidence of knowledge of Foti's misconduct by Fisher and McClurkin was insufficient as a matter of law to trigger municipal liability because neither of these Suffolk County employees was a legislatively authorized policymaker nor was delegated policymaking authority. The legal standard for Monell liability is not that narrow. As noted supra, the Supreme Court has made clear that, if a practice is 'so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law,'. . . actual notice by the policymakers need not be proven. . . . We recognize that, under this theory of Monell liability, 'even if a policy can be inferred from omissions of a municipality, such as where it acquiesces in a pattern of illegal conduct, such a policy cannot be inferred from the failure of those in charge to discipline a single police officer for a single incident of illegality'; instead, there must be 'more evidence of supervisory indifference, such as acquiescence in a prior pattern of conduct.'. . . [I]f plaintiffs' evidence is credited, it would allow a jury to rationally find that, notwithstanding the awareness by supervisory personnel of these allegations of a pattern of misconduct by Foti towards female inmates, no action was taken in response to any of the inmates' complaints. . . .[G]iven the totality of the evidence in this case, a jury should decide whether the supervisory personnel with such alleged knowledge are sufficiently senior, and whether the pattern of unconstitutional conduct by Foti and alleged inaction by supervisory personnel was sufficiently persistent and widespread, to allow an inference of policymaker acquiescence that would trigger Monell liability."); Vega v. Chicago Park District, 954 F.3d 996, 1010-12 (7th Cir. 2020) ("At trial, Vega argued that the Park District was liable under § 1983 because it had a widespread custom of discrimination against Hispanics. . . To prevail on this theory, she had to show both that the custom was widespread and that the local policymakers were aware of the custom and took no measures to correct it. . .The district court held that Vega's § 1983 claim failed as matter of law because even if Vega had sufficient evidence of a widespread custom of discrimination against Hispanics, she had insufficient evidence to show that any 'policymaker' knew about it. Vega challenges this conclusion on appeal, arguing that she presented ample evidence to permit a jury to find that Simpkins, the Park District's Director of Human Resources, was a policymaker and that he was aware of the pervasive discrimination. We need not wade into the 'policymaker' question, though, because Vega failed to show that there was a widespread custom of discrimination against Hispanics in the first place. . . . It is true that Vega had enough evidence to permit a reasonable jury to find in her favor on her Title VII claim for discrimination on the basis of national origin. But the standard of liability is different under § 1983, and the district court correctly concluded that Vega's evidence of discrimination did not satisfy it.").

Compare Sopron v. Cassidy, No. 19-CV-08254, 2022 WL 971563, at *12 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 31, 2022) ("Plaintiff alleges that the City has a longstanding policy or practice of, among other things, fabricating evidence to cause the convictions of innocent people, suppressing exculpatory evidence, condoning and facilitating a code of silence, and failing to discipline its officers for misconduct. . . Plaintiff supports these allegations by stating that, since 1986, 70 cases have come to light in which Chicago police officers have fabricated false evidence or have suppressed exculpatory evidence that led to convictions, . . . describing a Federal Bureau of Investigation report that discusses Chicago police detectives feeding information to witnesses, coercing witnesses into sticking to a specific theory of the case, and physically abusing witnesses . . . and listing several other cases where such pattern of behavior by the Chicago Police Department was found[.] . .Plaintiff has therefore sufficiently stated a plausible Monell claim against City. Accordingly, the City's motion to dismiss Count V is denied.") with Bedford v. Dewitt, No. 19 C 1, 2023 WL 2561757, at *22–25 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 17, 2023) ("Bedford and Jones base their Monell claim on Officer Dewitt's use of force, which Bedford claims deprived her of her Fourth Amendment rights. This claim survives summary judgment, satisfying at this stage the Monell claim's threshold requirement for a constitutional injury. . . They argue that the City 'has a de facto policy, practice, and/or custom of a Code of Silence that conceals and/or suppresses the investigation of officer misconduct and the disciplining of officers who commit misconduct, including the use of unlawful force.'. .They further allege that the City is aware that this custom and practice exists and threatens citizens' constitutional rights but is indifferent to it. . . Finally, they allege this custom and practice directly resulted in Bedford's constitutional injury. . . But the Plaintiffs have failed to adduce evidence at this stage to carry their burden on all three required elements. . . First, Bedford and Jones have failed to adduce sufficient evidence to support a reasonable jury finding that such a code of silence existed and was widespread in June 2018. Beyond their own single incident involving a handful of officers, they rely entirely on the statements of former Mayor Rahm Emanuel in December 2015 and generalized conclusions about the code of silence and officers' use of excessive force from the April 2016 PATF Report and January 2017 DOJ Report. . . These investigations, conducted a year or more before this incident occurred and—notably—before CPD instituted reforms in 2016–17, are insufficient to demonstrate a widespread, pervasive code of silence when Officer Dewitt encountered Bedford. . . Plaintiffs fail to give examples of any misconduct cover-ups at any time after these reports' issuance. If nothing within CPD had changed in the subsequent 18 months or more, other examples should be readily discoverable. . . To suggest that a reasonable jury could find that a code of silence existed within CPD, Plaintiffs cite to several cases from this district that discussed and considered evidence of such a de facto policy. . . But Plaintiffs failed to cite to a single case—other than their own—filed after 2016. Those cases involved incidents that occurred well before the referenced reports, CPD's reforms, and June 2018. . . Plaintiffs argue that all this historic evidence shows there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the City 'defeated the Code of Silence before Pride Parade in 2018.'. . But it is not the City's burden to prove that it defeated the code of silence by 2018. It remains the Plaintiff's burden to establish that such a widespread practice existed at the time relevant to these events. They fail to meet it here. Even if Plaintiffs could carry their burden on the issue of a widespread practice, Plaintiffs cannot demonstrate municipal fault. They must show that the City both knew of the widespread practice and was deliberately indifferent to it. . . But the City made numerous reforms and implemented mechanisms to address excessive-force instances and investigate them. Given such evidence, Plaintiffs face a high bar to show that the City is deliberately indifferent to a purported widespread practice of covering up excessive-force incidents. . . They have not surmounted it. Plaintiffs rely on evidence from independent monitor reports indicating that the City has not reached full compliance with the January 2019 federal consent decree. This, they suggest, demonstrates that the City is not serious about its reforms for CPD. But failure to reach full compliance within a few years is a far cry from a complete failure to act. Moreover, the Plaintiffs point to no specific information within the independent monitor reports that suggests the City remains deliberately indifferent to preventing excessive use of force or investigating such incidents. Indeed, the Plaintiffs point to no specific information in the reports at all. Their evidence purporting to show the City's deliberate indifference remains vague and conclusory. The Plaintiffs also suggest that the Defendant Supervisors' denial of any code of silence within CPD is, itself, evidence of deliberate indifference to the code's existence. This circular reasoning cannot carry the day. True, if a code of silence existed, its adherents would likely deny it. But so, too, would officers deny the existence or their awareness of a code of silence if it truly did not exist, or if they were unaware of it. Finally, the Plaintiffs assert as evidence of the City's deliberate indifference to police misconduct the proposition that Comm. Rubio assigned Officers Dewitt, Galvan, and Patterson to investigate Officer Dewitt's own misconduct. This is both factually inaccurate and off track. Comm. Rubio assigned them to investigate what happened between the Big City Tap employees and Jones, Bedford, and their group. Officer Dewitt did not investigate his own use of force; Comm. Rubio did. Moreover, this returns to the specific facts of this case, which is insufficient to show deliberate indifference to a widespread de facto policy known to the City. . . The final Monell element—causation—similarly falls short. Plaintiffs cannot show by the requisite rigorous standard of causation that the City's action was the 'moving force' behind Bedford's constitutional injury and directly deprived her of her rights. . . The City provided evidence that, according to CPD's reforms and trainings, the Defendant Officers knew their uses of force would be reported and investigated. Indeed, Officer Dewitt's use of force was reported and investigated, both by his supervisor and by COPA. Plaintiffs, in turn, argue that there is genuine issue of material fact as to causation, because they speculate that Officer Dewitt acted as he did because he knew other officers would lie for him to cover up his misconduct. Plaintiffs rely on Cazares v. Frugoli, where the Monell plaintiff showed an officer knew he could act with impunity, such that causation could be inferred. . . But in Cazares, the plaintiff established that the defendant officer had evaded discipline from other acts of misconduct numerous times. . . Here, by contrast, the Plaintiffs suggest only that Officer Dewitt used force in the presence of other witnesses and officers, so he must have known he could act with impunity. In addition to being speculative, this evidence again falls back on the specific facts of this incident detached from any pattern of officers acting with impunity. This is insufficient to show that the City's action directly caused the constitutional injury. . . The Plaintiffs cannot carry their burden of proof on their Monell claim on this record. The City is entitled to summary judgment.") and Walker v. City of Chicago, No. 1:21-CV-02648, 2022 WL 971891, at *6–7 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 31, 2022) ("Although all manner of factual scenarios can give rise to a widespread custom or practice for Monell purposes, a plaintiff must allege, generally speaking, multiple incidents of wrongdoing. . . . Courts are wary of Monell custom claims based on single events because single-event claims veer close to the respondeat superior theory of liability, which the Supreme Court explicitly rejected in Monell. . . Here, the fatal flaw in the Monell claim is that it only describes one event in which fabrication of evidence took place: Walker's own arrest and prosecution. . .This single event is not enough to adequately allege a municipal custom or practice. . . In response, Walker argues that he does not need to 'allege a pattern of constitutional violations to survive a motion to dismiss.'. . It is true that there is no absolute requirement that every Monell custom claim be supported by multiple alleged instances of wrongdoing. . . But context matters. In some cases—like Walker's—the nature and specifics of the underlying constitutional claim demand that more than one instance is needed to make out a plausible inference for the existence of a widespread but unwritten policy or custom with the force of law. In this case, Walker's allegations are much more specific to him, rather than suggestive of a more systemic practice. To go beyond a single event, Walker relies on various examples of research papers and litigation, as well as the United States Department of Justice's 2017 report concerning misconduct within the Chicago Police Department. . . But the Complaint does not specify what about those citations demonstrate a widespread policy or custom of the fabrication of evidence, in contrast to other forms of misconduct (such as fatal shootings) or a 'code of silence' by Chicago Police officers. . . Nor does Walker's response brief try to sift through those sources and identify the fabricated-evidence examples. The Court concludes that these cited sources are too vague (or at the least, Walker presents them that way, without further elucidation on fabricated evidence) to infer that (1) a widespread policy or custom of fabricating evidence existed within the Chicago Police Department or (2) a policy or custom like that was the moving force behind Walker's injury. . . . There are therefore insufficient allegations of an unwritten policy or custom to fabricate evidence.").

See also Boyd v. The City of Buffalo, No. 22-CV-00519, 2025 WL 92362, at *7, *10-12 (W.D.N.Y. Jan. 14, 2025) ("Over the years, courts have commonly recognized that there are several theories by which a plaintiff can establish that a municipality caused – directly or indirectly – the misconduct of its employees: (1) a formal policy officially endorsed by the municipality; (2) actions taken by government officials responsible for establishing the municipal policies that caused the particular deprivation in question; (3) a practice so consistent and widespread that, although not expressly authorized, constitutes a custom or usage of which a supervising policy-maker must have been aware; or (4) a failure by policymakers to provide adequate training or supervision to subordinates to such an extent that it amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of those who come into contact with the municipal employees. . . . Plaintiffs maintain that they 'have pled, and there is evidence to support, at least three theories of Monell liability,' including that the DA's Office 'tolerated an affirmatively illegal series of practices regarding Brady compliance.'. . Because this Court 'need not analyze or articulate every legal or factual theory on which the plaintiff could potentially prevail at trial' to adequately address the present motion, the Court considers only this latter theory here. . . After a thorough review of the evidence, the Court finds that there are genuine disputes of fact as to whether there were widespread customs and practices in the DA's Office during the relevant period that resulted in widespread failures to turn over Brady material that caused the alleged violations of Plaintiffs' constitutional rights detailed above. . . . In the present case, a reasonable juror could interpret the record evidence to suggest that there were widespread practices showing a misunderstanding across the DA's Office of Brady's requirements. . . . The County's expert testified that 'in the '70s and '80s' the DA's Office's position was that evidence 'had to be exculpatory' to constitute Brady material and that evidence that could be used only for impeachment purposes did not need to be disclosed. . . A jury could reasonably find that ADA Drury's and ADA Henry's actions in Boyd's and Walker's trials were consistent with that view. . . . Were a jury to find that there was a widespread practice in the DA's Office during that time period of not properly disclosing Brady material, the 'direct causal link between [the] municipal policy or custom and the alleged constitutional deprivation' would be evident. . . In particular, a jury could find that the practices demonstrating widespread misunderstanding of Brady requirements within the DA's Office caused the constitutional violations described in the previous section."); Salem v. Stoneham Police Department, No. 22-CV-10350-AK, 2024 WL 4335454, at *12 (D. Mass. Sept. 27, 2024) ("In conclusion, a reasonable jury might find that Carroll and Norton violated Salem's Fourth Amendment rights. It might also find that the Town's police department had a custom or unofficial policy of responding to all possible felonies with drawn firearms and handcuffs in disregard of its reporting requirements. It is not difficult to see how a reasonable fact-finder might determine that such a policy created a plainly obvious and unjustifiable risk of constitutional violations and was the 'moving force' behind the actions of the police detectives on Danby Road. Of course, viewing the record in the light most favorable to the Town, these findings are not foregone conclusions. Therefore, the motions of both parties are denied with respect to § 1983 municipal liability for violations of Salem's Fourth Amendment rights. This Court has laid out the § 1983 analysis to make it abundantly clear that one must not die to avail themselves of § 1983; that death is not necessary to allege a flagrant violation of one's constitutional rights; and that a 'patently obvious' standard is often just common sense. The Court notes § 1983 came to life during the Reconstruction era in the Civil Rights Act of 1871. . . Its very purpose was to 'secure the constitutional ideals of freedom and equality for all.'. . With support from the executive office, the Act represented a comprehensive congressional strategy to cope with and challenge the violent resistance to Reconstruction. . . Courts have heeded this call, too, by interposing themselves 'between the States and the people, as guardians of the people's federal rights—to protect the people from unconstitutional action under color of state law.'. . Today, instead of closing the doors of § 1983, this Court elects to keep alive the promise and power intended of it."); Cosby v. Rodriquez, 711 F.Supp.3d 983, ___ (N.D. Ill. 2024) ("Plaintiff Cosby alleges two primary theories of Monell liability against the City of Chicago. First, he alleges that the City (and Superintendent Brown) were 'deliberately indifferent to the widespread unconstitutional practices within CPD that caused Plaintiff's injuries.'. . Second, he argues that Superintendent Brown, as a 'final policymaker' for the city, 'authorized and directed the officers' unlawful conduct at the summer 2020 protests.'. . For the reasons discussed below, the court sustains Plaintiff's claim with respect to the former theory, but not the latter. . . .The Second Amended Complaint thus paints a picture of a widespread practice of specific forms of police abuse of protesters from 2003 onward—including excessive force using batons, other escalatory behavior—which Mr. Cosby alleges played out widely during the 2020 protest, injuring both him and other protesters. Plaintiff Cosby's Second Amended Complaint thus plausibly states that CPD officers customarily engaged in practices similar to those Cosby alleges they inflicted on him at the 2020 protests. The Second Amended Complaint's allegations go well beyond 'mere isolated event[s]' and state the existence of 'general pattern[s] of repeated behavior' that could be construed, in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, as municipal customs. . . Moreover, the fact that numerous internal and external investigations and reports repeatedly pointed out these failures plausibly implies that the City was 'aware of the risk created by the custom[s] or practice[s] and ... fail[ed] to take appropriate steps to protect the plaintiff.'. . Finally, Plaintiff plausibly alleges that these customs—and the City's deliberate indifference in the face of those customs—were a 'moving force' behind his injury. . . It is reasonable to infer from his Second Amended Complaint that the City's repeated failure to hold officers accountable for the use of excessive force—including through a culture of silence—emboldened officers to harm Mr. Cosby; indeed, the Second Amended Complaint specifically alleges that a code of silence results in officers' feeling 'they can abuse and violate the rights of individuals without consequence.'. . And Cosby's own injuries are alleged to result from excessive force and retaliatory animus toward protestors, the unlawful practices he has alleged. . . Nor does the existence of the Consent Decree require dismissal of Plaintiff's Monell claim. Emphasizing Plaintiff's allegations concerning that Decree, the City urges that those allegations themselves 'demonstrate that there are express policies in place that prohibit the very conduct he alleges caused his injuries, and that the City has been anything but deliberately indifferent to the alleged constitutional violations.'. . The Consent Decree is a 'binding contract' that 'directly contradict[s]' Plaintiff's claims that abusive police tactics are official policy of the City, Defendants contend. . . The law is clear, however, that Monell liability may be predicated not only on official or written policies but also on 'implicit polic[ies] or a gap in expressed policies,' or '"a series of violations [that confirm] the premise of deliberate indifference."'. . . Valuable as it is, the Consent Decree does not defeat a finding that the CPD in fact engaged in other policies or widespread practices in connection with the BLM protests. . . The bulk of the Defendants' argument on this score is that the City's 'ongoing efforts to implement the terms of the Consent Decree demonstrate that it is not deliberately indifferent to Plaintiff's constitutional rights ....'. . . In support, the City asserts that it has 'dedicated tens of millions of dollars, countless hours, and vast resources to work towards implementing the Consent Decree to improve police practices in Chicago.'. . As a preliminary matter, this argument goes beyond the four corners of Plaintiff's complaint; the complaint makes no mention of how much money or time the City has spent combating the alleged code of silence or the use of excessive and retaliatory force at protests. . .The sources the City does cite on this issue do not satisfy the court that the Consent Decree's existence requires dismissal of Plaintiff's Monell claim . . . . [D]rawing inferences in Mr. Cosby's favor (as the court must at this stage), the City's failure to change its policies in time for the 2020 protests tells a 'story that holds together' about its deliberate indifference to the means of unconstitutional policing Mr. Cosby alleges he suffered. . . The court makes no findings on these issues. But Cosby has plausibly alleged that the City's deliberate indifference to widespread unlawful practices on the part of its officers resulted in his injuries. These allegations are sufficient to support a claim for Monell liability."); Kurland v. City of Providence by & through Lombardi, 711 F.Supp.3d 57, ___ (D.R.I. 2024) ("A reasonable jury could find that a custom of ordering people on public sidewalks to move without cause exists in the Providence Police Department that caused a constitutional harm to Ms. Kurland. The deposition testimony of Lieutenant Smith, Officer Abenante, Officer Richards, and Police Chief Clements shows that the complained-of conduct in this case arose from a well-settled police department practice of ordering people to move. Officer Richards testified that on the date of Ms. Kurland's arrest, he and Officer Abenante had instructed up to ten people to move in the 45-minute period since their arrival in Kennedy Plaza. . . Police Chief Clements does not dispute that he knew about the practice described by the officers, as noted in the discussion of supervisory liability. The same awareness that supports supervisory liability for Police Chief Clements also supports the conclusion that there was an accepted custom of ordering people to move without cause in the Providence Police Department. The defendants do not dispute that Chief Clements is a policymaking official, and, while he only needed constructive knowledge, he has admitted to possessing actual knowledge of the police department's complained-of custom. He also failed to act to end the practice despite complaints that people were being asked to move without cause. Based on these facts drawn from the testimony of the officers, Lieutenant Smith, and Chief Clements, a reasonable jury could find that policymaking officials failed to end a known custom of moving people on public sidewalks without cause, which caused the alleged harm to Ms. Kurland. Therefore, Ms. Kurland has produced sufficient evidence which, if believed, would support municipal liability under Monell on the part of the City of Providence and its officials in their official capacities."); Estate of Kong v. City of San Diego, No. 22-CV-1858-BAS-DDL, 2023 WL 4939370, at *6-7 (S.D. Cal. Aug. 2, 2023) ("Courts are 'somewhat split' on the level of detail and the number of similar unconstitutional incidents a plaintiff must show to establish a longstanding practice or custom. . . As one district court surveying the relevant case law recently opined, '[T]here is no per se rule' for the number of unconstitutional incidents a pleading must identify to establish a practice or custom under Monell, but '[t]he Ninth Circuit and district courts within the Ninth Circuit have repeatedly declined to infer a custom [or practice] of constitutional violations based on two unconstitutional incidents alone.' Wettstein v. Cnty. of Riverside, EDCV 19-1298 JGB (KKx), 2020 WL 2199005, at *5 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 22, 2020) (citing, inter alia, Meehan v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 856 F.3d 102, 107 (9th Cir. 1988); Oyenik v. Corizon Health Inc., 696 F. App'x 792, 794 (9th Cir. 2017)). The Complaint principally seeks to demonstrate Monell liability through allegations of 'practices' or 'customs.' The problem that plagues Plaintiff's practice-or-custom allegations is different from the one that felled her formal-policy allegations. . . . [S]he fails to posit facts that enable the Court to reasonably infer the practices and customs alleged are of 'sufficient duration, frequency and consistency that the conduct has become a traditional method of carrying out policy.'. . Here, reading the Complaint in a light most favorable to Plaintiff, she attempts to allege only one Fourth Amendment violation attributable to the practices and customs identified: the shooting death of her son. . . This is patently insufficient. . . .In sum, because Plaintiff fails to identify other similar incidents in which the Municipal Defendants' purported practices and customs manifested themselves in constitutional violations, she is precluded from pursuing a Monell claim under a practices-or-customs theory."); Hargrove v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 21-4082, 2023 WL 3229927, at *6 (E.D. Pa. May 3, 2023) ("Plaintiffs have adequately alleged, as supplemented by the news stories in local media discussed, that the City had a policy or custom of releasing inmates late at night into a high crime area with no reliable mode of transportation, proximately causing Hargrove's death. . . Plaintiffs allege that the City of Philadelphia owns and operates the Philadelphia Department of Prisons, which owns, operates, and is responsible for the policies and procedures at CFCF. . . Plaintiffs allege that Warden Gianetta, Warden Farrell, and Commissioner Carney were decision-makers for CFCF and had knowledge and control over the policy of late-night prison releases. . .With respect to custom, Plaintiffs have demonstrated that the City's practice of releasing prisoners late at night with no accessible transportation was a well-settled and permanent one, and that Commissioner Carney knew of and acquiesced to it. . . Additionally, through the same allegations referenced above, Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged this custom was the proximate cause of Hargrove's death."); Torain v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 14-1643, 2023 WL 174951, at *9 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 12, 2023) ("This evidence suggests that the City knew of officers regularly fabricating probable cause in order to substantiate illegal arrests and that it failed to take precautions against such actions in the future. Further, this custom was the 'moving force' behind Plaintiff's injury as fabrication of evidence and probable cause by the Officers is the conduct Plaintiff alleges caused him to be falsely prosecuted and wrongly imprisoned for 13 years. For these reasons, summary judgment is denied as to the custom theory of municipal liability on the issue of fabrication of evidence to support arrest and probable cause."); Johnson v. City of San Jose, No. 21-CV-01849-BLF, 2022 WL 17583638, at *8 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 12, 2022) ("First, looking to the decisions in Samaha, Tirado, and Huffman, the Court declines to decide that the allegations were over too short a timeframe so as to justify dismissing the policy/custom theory at this stage. Further, the Court notes that under Menotti, it can rely on 'repeated constitutional violations for which the errant municipal officers were not discharged or reprimanded' to find a custom or policy. . . Johnson alleged a failure to reprimand at least one police officer for his actions in the protests. . . These allegations, taken as a whole, allow the Court to reasonably infer a custom or policy."); Taylor v. City of Saginaw, No. 1:17-CV-11067, 2022 WL 3160734, at *1-2, *13 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 8, 2022) (on remand) ("Since being filed, this case has been dismissed twice, appealed twice, and remanded twice: first at the pleading stage and then at the summary-judgment stage. . . During that time, the Sixth Circuit has held (1) that tire-chalking constitutes a search that is presumptively unreasonable without a warrant, and (2) that neither the community-caretaker, automobile, nor administrative exceptions to the warrant requirement apply. . .Accordingly, with the class certified, three issues remain: (1) whether any other exception to the warrant requirement applies, (2) whether the City had a custom or policy of chalking for purposes of Monell, and (3) the appropriate remedy if chalking is unconstitutional. . . .No reasonable person would argue that something as trivial and transitory as chalk on a tire offends a reasonable expectation of privacy. But the Fourth Amendment protects more than those expectations that society deems reasonable. As the Supreme Court explained in Jones, the Fourth Amendment also protects the ancient right of the people to exclude the government from their 'houses, papers, and effects.'. . In extending that right to this case, the Sixth Circuit held that chalking was reasonable only if it fell within one of the 'few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions' to the warrant requirement. . . Because no such exception applies, . . . this Court must take the Sixth Circuit's prior decisions one step further: Defendants' chalking was not only a search under the Fourth Amendment, but also a violation of it. . .The next issue is whether the City had a custom or policy of chalking, such that it may be held liable for the conduct of its parking officials. . . . The City argues that it is not liable under Monell because it did not require Hoskins and other parking officials to use chalk or to 'discipline [them] for not chalking.'. . Instead, it merely provided them with chalk 'as a tool that could be used to perform their job.'. . And, in some instances, they apparently performed their job without chalk. . .The City's argument is unconvincing for two reasons. First, as explained, a plaintiff need not demonstrate an official policy to establish Monell liability. '[T]he existence of a custom of tolerance or acquiescence of federal rights violations' is sufficient. . . In this case, the City provided chalk to its parking officers and then issued thousands of parking tickets based in part on their chalking. . . At the very least, the City has 'tolera[ted] or acquiesce[d]' to a pervasive custom of chalking. . . Second, as Plaintiff notes, the City played a more direct role in chalking than it acknowledged. The City provided Defendant Hoskins with not only the chalk but also training for using it, a 'wand' for holding it, and a handheld device for recording when she 'marked' a vehicle. . . Although Defendant Hoskins enjoyed some discretion in deciding when to chalk, the practice of chalking was not hers. In her own words, '[s]he just d[id] what the city t[old] [her] to do.'. . Accordingly, all reasonable jurors would agree that the City had a custom of chalking that caused Plaintiff's injury."); Wynn v. City of Indianapolis, No. 1:20-CV-1638-JMS-MJD, 2022 WL 1120490, at *19–20 (S.D. Ind. Apr. 14, 2022) ("In this case, Ms. Wynn asserts that Mr. Reed's death 'resulted from the unconstitutional custom and practice of IMPD officers who routinely use deadly force to apprehend suspects who are young black men.'. . However, not every use of deadly force amounts to a constitutional violation. It is an unfortunate reality that deadly force is necessary and reasonable in some circumstances. . . So, the relevant question is not whether IMPD officers routinely use deadly force against young Black men, it is whether IMPD officers routinely violate the Fourth Amendment by unreasonably using deadly force against young Black men. Ms. Wynn's claim that IMPD or the City has a widespread practice of using excessive, deadly force against young Black males fails for lack of evidence. The Dashboard provides basic data on office-involved shootings, but does not provide sufficient information regarding the circumstances of each shooting such that the Court or a factfinder could determine whether excessive force was used in any particular situation. A person can look through the Dashboard to determine how many young Black men have been shot by IMPD officers since 2015, how many of those shootings resulted in death, how many shootings were determined to comply with department policy, how many were deemed 'justified' by prosecutors or resulted in charges against the involved officer, and so on, but there is no way to know from looking at the Dashboard alone how many of those incidents amount to constitutional violations for purposes of determining whether a pattern of constitutional violations exists. In analyzing any particular use of force by police, the surrounding facts and circumstances are critical, and the Dashboard simply does not provide all of the information required to determine whether the identified officer-involved shootings involved the use of excessive force. . . Neither does any other admissible evidence provided by Ms. Wynn. . . Ms. Wynn also asserts that, in addition to a pattern or practice of shooting young Black men, the City or IMPD demonstrated a pattern or practice of 'inadequate responses to those incidents.'. . But again, Ms. Wynn failed to present any evidence demonstrating such a pattern. The Dashboard does not provide any information concerning IMPD's response to any particular incident, beyond one- or two-word descriptions of whether the use of force was deemed to comply with policy, whether a prosecutor believed charges were appropriate, and whether the firearms review board reviewed the case. . . As such, the Dashboard does not provide a basis from which a factfinder could conclude that IMPD's response was inadequate. . . Put simply, at the summary judgment stage, 'a party must show what evidence it has that would convince a trier of fact to accept its version of events.'. . Ms. Wynn was required to provide evidence from which a factfinder could conclude that IMPD has a widespread pattern or practice of unconstitutionally shooting young Black men, that the City was deliberately indifferent to that pattern, and that the City's inaction caused a violation of Mr. Reed's constitutional rights. But there is nothing in the current record from which a reasonable finder of fact could draw those conclusions. Accordingly, Ms. Wynn's claim fails as a matter of law, and Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment is GRANTED as to the Monell claim relating to the use of excessive force."); Berry v. Hennepin County, No. 20-CV-2189 (WMW/JFD), 2021 WL 4427215, at *4–5 (D. Minn. Sept. 27, 2021) ("As Plaintiffs have not alleged that their constitutional injury was caused by inadequate training, Plaintiffs' Section 1983 claim against County Defendants necessarily is based on either an official policy or an unofficial custom. . . 'Policy and custom are not the same thing.'. . '[A] policy is an official policy, a deliberate choice of a guiding principle or procedure made by the municipal official who has final authority regarding such matters.'. . . Plaintiffs have not identified an official county policy or alleged facts that would support the existence of an official policy. Nor have Plaintiffs cited any law bestowing policymaking authority on Sheriff Hutchinson or alleged that Sheriff Hutchinson is a policy maker. The Court must, therefore, analyze whether Plaintiffs have adequately alleged an unofficial county custom. To state a claim for Section 1983 liability based on a county custom, a plaintiff must plead facts that establish (1) 'the existence of a continuing, widespread, persistent pattern of unconstitutional misconduct' committed by the county's employees; (2) 'deliberate indifference to or tacit authorization' of the misconduct by policymaking officials after those officials have received notice of the misconduct; and (3) that the plaintiff was injured by acts pursuant to the custom, such that 'the custom was a moving force behind the constitutional violation.'. . Even if a plaintiff is not privy to the facts necessary to describe with specificity the alleged custom, the complaint must allege facts that would support the existence of a custom. . .Because it is dispositive of the issue presented here, the Court begins with the second element, which requires a plaintiff to 'allege facts showing that policymaking officials had notice of or authorized' the misconduct. . . Merely referencing previous complaints made against a local government employee, without more, is insufficient to state a claim for Section 1983 liability based on a custom. . . Plaintiffs do not allege any facts that, if proven, would establish that a policymaking official received notice of any alleged constitutional violations committed by County Defendants' employees. Nor do Plaintiffs allege that a policymaking official authorized or was deliberately indifferent to the alleged constitutional violations committed by County Defendants' employees. And there are no alleged facts from which such an inference could reasonably be drawn. Because Plaintiffs have not alleged any facts to support this necessary element of a claim for Section 1983 liability based on a county custom, Plaintiffs have failed to state a Section 1983 claim against County Defendants. . . Accordingly, the Court must dismiss the Plaintiffs' federal constitutional claims against County Defendants premised on Section 1983 liability, and therefore grant County Defendants' motion to dismiss all such claims against them."); Ballheimer v. Batts, No. 117CV01393SEBDLP, 2020 WL 1317444, at *14-15 (S.D. Ind. Mar. 20, 2020) ("Although as we have determined the Officers are shielded from liability for their unconstitutional conduct, the Town may still be subject to Monell liability. . . Plaintiff so claims. The Town resists. . . . Ballheimer alleges the existence of a widespread custom within the Town of unconstitutionally utilizing forced catheterizations to obtain urine samples from suspects. No 'bright-line' rule defines a widespread custom or practice, but a plaintiff generally 'must introduce evidence that acquiescence on the part of the policymakers was and amounted to a policy decision.' Dixon v. Cty. of Cook, 819 F.3d 343, 348 (7th Cir. 2016); Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Dept., 604 F.3d 293, 303 (7th Cir. 2010). 'There is no clear consensus as to how frequently such conduct must occur to impose Monell liability, except that it must be more than one instance or even three.'. . The Town argues that the evidence establishes that no such custom or practice existed. While Officer Batts testified that he directed the use of forced catheterizations, executed pursuant to warrants authorizing reasonable force to obtain urine, on 'several occasions,'. . . there is no evidence that Chief Anderson was aware of the technique employed before Officer Batts. In fact, Chief Anderson unequivocally testified that he was not aware. Officer Batts testified to the opposite effect, but both he clarified that Chief Anderson would only become aware of the forced catheterizations (absent an explicit conversation on the subject, which both Chief Anderson and Officer Batts deny occurring) by reading the corresponding matter's incident report. However, Chief Anderson does not always read incident reports, and he denies doing so in any case where a forced catheterization may have been used. Chief Anderson maintains that he had no knowledge that officers may be utilizing this practice. According to the Town, this evidence establishes that any forced catheterizations were 'isolated' occurrences. We disagree that this evidence forecloses finding that a widespread custom or practice existed. Officer Batts testified that he has utilized forced catheterizations in similar circumstances on 'several' occasions. We are without even a ballpark estimate as to what 'several' means. Three? Ten? Fifty? Without even slight quantification as to how often the unconstitutional conduct occurred, we cannot conclude that the violations occurred on fewer than the minimally required 'one or three instances' as discussed in the case law is necessary to establish a widespread custom. Additionally, the Town has not presented any evidence as to whether other officers were partaking in this conduct. Officer Batts's testimony that he 'did not know' if his fellow officers utilized this technique does not establish as an evidentiary matter that it was not an ongoing practice, as the Town apparently believes. The Town next argues that Ballheimer cannot prevail because Chief Anderson did not actively participate in the deprivation. . . . The relevant question, overlooked by both parties, is whether Chief Anderson was 'deliberately indifferent' as the 'known or obvious consequences' of his actions. Deliberate indifference, in the context of a widespread practice theory, means 'a reasonable policymaker [would] conclude that the plainly obvious consequences of [his] actions would result in the deprivation of a federally protected right.'. . These consequences may be plainly obvious when one knows or should know of their existence. . . 'The question of whether the defendants' conduct constituted deliberate indifference is a classic issue for the fact finder.'. . We cannot determine whether the evidence is so pervasive that it forecloses a reasonable jury from finding that the Town acted deliberately indifferently when it has failed to apply the relevant legal standards. We also note that the Town fixates on Sheriff Anderson's purported lack of actual knowledge without ever addressing the fact that the determination of 'conscious disregard' is not limited to consideration of only his actual knowledge. . . One of Sheriff Anderson's reporting officers utilized the forced catheterizations on numerous occasions, which were documented in his incident reports. That same officer testified that he discussed doing so with other lieutenants. . . Based on this evidence, a reasonable juror is not barred from finding that Sheriff Anderson should have known of the violations irrespective of what he actually knew."); McIntyre v. Unified Government of Wyandotte County, No. CV 18-2545-KHV, 2020 WL 1028303, at *34 (D. Kan. Mar. 3, 2020) ("Here, plaintiffs' allegations plausibly show that Unified Government had a pattern and practice of allowing Golubski to openly assault, harass and coerce women like Rose while investigating and collecting evidence. These allegations are sufficient to show that Unified Government had actual or constructive notice of the conduct that Golubski employed against Rose and Lamonte, and deliberately chose to disregard the substantial risk of constitutional violations. Plaintiffs have therefore satisfied the custom or policy element of their Monell claims for purposes of the motion to dismiss."); Villegas v. City of El Paso, No. EP-15-CV-00386-FM, 2020 WL 981878, at *16–17 (W.D. Tex. Feb. 28, 2020) ("The City attempts to characterize this plethora of constitutional violations as a single incident violating only Plaintiff's rights and therefore insufficient to demonstrate 'persistent, often repeated, constant violations' as required to establish municipal liability. . . However, considered in their entirety, these facts establish a pattern of similar violations that is a far cry from a single incident of abuse of authority by one wayward officer. The sheer number of abuses alleged and the degree of coordinated involvement of multiple members of the El Paso police department show a plausible accepted standard of practice within the department rising to the level of unwritten custom. . . The City also asserts Plaintiff fails to identify a policymaker responsible for this conduct. . . However, Fifth Circuit precedent indicates that a police chief may be an official policymaker. . . Even if Plaintiff does not say the magic words naming the Chief of the El Paso Police Department as the relevant policy maker, all of the violations alleged come from within the police department and Plaintiff pleads these violations are the product of policies implemented by 'command personnel.'. . The Chief of Police is clearly command personnel. Therefore, the City is sufficiently on notice of the nature of the claim. Plaintiff pleads the police department's leadership had actual knowledge of unconstitutional practices. . . Additionally, the extensive coordination by various members of the police department allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that a policymaker had at least constructive knowledge of the misconduct alleged. . . Even assuming the Chief of Police did not actually know that a minimum of seven officers under his command coordinated to coerce false statements from eight individuals and destroyed evidence undermining the prosecution's theory of the case, the breadth of malfeasance indicates he or other command personnel had constructive knowledge. Plaintiff pleads numerous instances of fabricated and suppressed evidence: four witness statements implicating other suspects, four confessions by other suspects, destruction of a possible murder weapon, and evidence tying a suspect who confessed to the murder weapon. In sum, Plaintiff pleads sufficient facts to state a claim for municipal liability under an implied policy theory."); Case v. City of New York, No. 14 CIV. 9148 (AT), 2019 WL 4747957, at *9 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 30, 2019) ("Defendants argue that Plaintiffs' citation to various lawsuits brought against the City does not establish proof of notice for deliberate indifference purposes. . . . Here, the Court holds that the number and persistence of legal challenges brought, sometimes resulting in plaintiffs' verdicts and other times in settlements, is sufficient to create a jury question on the issue of notice."); Thomas v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 17-4196, 2019 WL 4039575, at *24-25 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 27, 2019) ("Finally, the defendants argue that the plaintiff's Monell claim should be dismissed because he failed to identify a specific final policymaker who was responsible for the alleged constitutional violations. . . . At trial, the Court will follow Jett and Andrews and instruct the jury that it cannot find the City liable unless it attributes the alleged misconduct to a final policymaker. At this stage, however, based on the evidence discussed at great length above, the Court concludes that a reasonable jury may attribute the Police Department's alleged failure to train, supervise, and discipline to the appropriate policymaker, i.e, the police commissioner, even though acquiescence by the commissioner has not been specifically identified on the record."); Britton v. Maloney, 901 F. Supp. 444, 450 (D. Mass. 1995) ("Unlike a 'policy', which comes into existence because of the top-down affirmative decision of a policymaker, a custom develops from the bottom-up. Thus, the liability of the municipality for customary constitutional violations derives not from its creation of the custom, but from its tolerance of or acquiescence in it.").

Compare Jackson v. Valdez, 852 F. App'x 129, ___ (5th Cir. 2021) ("We recognize that Jackson is without the benefit of discovery, and that we have no rigid rule regarding numerosity to prove a widespread pattern of unconstitutional acts. Though it is a close call, for a Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal, we cannot conclude that allegations of two incidents of strip searches and four incidents of sex-based classifications of two transgender people in a span of five years support the reasonable inference that a practice of strip searches and classifications of transgender detainees solely on their biological sex is 'so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law.'. . . Such isolated violations 'are not the persistent, often repeated, constant violations that constitute custom and policy.' Bennett, 729 F.2d at 768 n.3. We conclude that the district court properly dismissed Jackson's municipal liability claim based upon her 'policy' theory.") with Jackson v. Valdez, 852 F. App'x 129, ___ (5th Cir. 2021) (Southwick, J., dissenting in part) ("On the merits, my only disagreement is that we should not affirm dismissal of the municipal-policy claim. I will explain. . . . The majority concludes that Jackson has failed to allege enough incidents to prove a policy through the existence of a custom. In my understanding, a plaintiff is not required pre-discovery to distinguish between a formal policy and a custom. The evidence creating a plausible claim of a policy before a suit is filed may not create clarity about the form in which the policy is expressed. We know that a complaint's assertion of a customary policy can take the form of claiming a pattern of unconstitutional conduct by municipal actors or claiming a policymaker's single unconstitutional action. . . Thus, even if no relevant, formal policy exists, a plaintiff may offer evidence 'demonstrat[ing] the governing body's knowledge and acceptance of the disputed conduct.'. . Municipal liability 'attaches where — and only where — a deliberate choice to follow a course of action is made from among various alternatives by the official ... responsible for establishing final policy with respect to the subject matter in question.'. . An '"official policy" often refers to formal rules or understandings — often but not always committed to writing.'. . In my view of the complaint, Jackson has sufficiently pled a policy that may ultimately be proven under either theory. . . . Dallas County employees told Jackson that they had a policy. She must plead facts that plausibly allege that the policy existed. Jackson did. After discovery, her allegations about the policy her jailers were referencing may become clearer, or, instead, discovery may reveal there is no policy in any form.It is too early at this stage to conclude that she cannot show a policy simply because she has not yet discovered enough incidents. Jackson's complaint alleged four instances of placing transgender detainees based on their anatomy and two strip searches for determining physical sex characteristics. As the majority correctly states, 'we have no rigid rule regarding numerosity to prove a widespread pattern of unconstitutional acts.' The complaint also quotes jail personnel as saying, 'It's not uncommon for men that look like women to be sitting in the men's section and vice versa. You'll probably see some like you over there. You aren't the first and you won't be the last,' implying that Jackson was part of a larger and continuing collection of people subjected to this treatment. In other words, the quoted statement supports that the way Jackson was treated was the norm rather than the exception. In my view, Jackson has plausibly pled facts which, if true, support the existence of a county policy. . . Whether it exists as an official policy 'formally announced by an official policymaker,'. . . or a persistent, widespread custom 'so common and well settled as to constitute a custom that fairly represents municipal policy,'. . . is irrelevant at this stage. I would not charge Jackson with knowing what form the policy takes until she has had a chance to discover it. Respectfully, I dissent.")

Compare Lipman v. Budish, 974 F.3d 726, 748-49 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Based on the facts alleged in the complaint, a juror could reasonably infer that DCFS and the county had a custom of allowing caseworkers to interview potential abuse victims in the presence of their alleged abusers. The original complaint alleges six different instances, involving multiple different caseworkers, in which Ta'Naejah was interviewed about her abuse in front of Crump and Owens. At the motion-to-dismiss stage, without the benefit of discovery, these facts are enough to draw the reasonable inference that this custom was widespread throughout DCFS and known to policymakers within the county. See, e.g., Gregory v. City of Louisville, 444 F.3d 725, 757 (6th Cir. 2006) (finding a custom under Monell at the summary judgment stage based on repeated violations and other evidence of an established practice). . . Accordingly, the district court erred in dismissing Plaintiffs' claim against Budish [in his official capacity].") with Lipman v. Budish, 974 F.3d 726, 754-56 (6th Cir. 2020) (Nalbandian, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur in the majority's disposition of all the issues here except for municipal liability. . . First off,

'[m]unicipalities may be held liable under § 1983 for constitutional violations committed by their employees if the violations result from municipal practices or policies.'. . But '[i]f no constitutional violation by the individual defendants is established, the municipal defendants cannot be held liable under § 1983.'. . I would have rested the failure of the municipal liability claim on the lack of any substantive due process right, had Defendants properly raised and argued the issue. In any case, the question here is whether Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that a county custom or informal policy exists in the face of a formal, written policy to the contrary. In their complaint, Plaintiffs point to five or six instances of officials interviewing the same child—Ta'Naejah—in October 2016, February 2017, and March 2017. But we have concluded that 'five instances of alleged misconduct, over three months, all involving the plaintiff himself is not enough to prove a custom.' Payne v. Sevier County, 681 F. App'x 443, 447 (6th Cir. 2017) (citing Thomas v. City of Chattanooga, 398 F.3d 426, 433–34 (6th Cir. 2005)). . . The plaintiff must 'reach beyond' his own situation and cannot 'solely ... point[ ] to the facts of his own case.'. . Pointing to a few sole instances involving the same person does not plausibly allege a custom 'so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law.'. . And the complaint contains no allegations that the county itself embraced this informal practice of a few employees violating the written, formal policy the county had. . . Nor does the complaint contain allegations that the county was even aware of some of its employees ignoring its written, formal policy and that it then took no action to stop those employees' violations. . . The complaint lacks any facts plausibly alleging a custom so ingrained that it supports a theory of municipal liability. I respectfully dissent on the issue.")

Compare Hildreth v. Butler, 960 F.3d 420, 426-30 (7th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1527 (2021) ("Because Wexford is a 'private corporation that has contracted to provide essential government services [it] is subject [under § 1983] to at least the same rules that apply to public entities.'. . Hildreth does not point to an official unconstitutional policy; instead, he claims Wexford has a custom of delaying prescriptions. . .To support a § 1983 claim on this theory, Hildreth must show: (1) defendants' practice in refilling prescriptions violated his constitutional rights; and (2) that practice was 'so pervasive that acquiescence on the part of policymakers was apparent and amounted to a policy decision.'. . This requires 'more than a showing of one or two missteps.'. . There must be 'systemic and gross deficiencies.'. . Even if such deficiencies exist, Hildreth must show policymakers knew of the deficiencies and failed to correct them, manifesting deliberate indifference. We put the first requirement to the side because Hildreth has not provided enough evidence on the second to show a practice of delaying prescriptions was widespread, which is the 'pivotal requirement' of his § 1983 claim. . . Hildreth's claim fails on two axes: first, his allegations of delays are insufficiently widespread, as they involve only him; and second, the alleged delays are insufficiently numerous, as he has substantiated only three. . . .We agree with the district court that this case is comparable to Grieveson v. Anderson, 538 F.3d 763 (7th Cir. 2008). In Grieveson, on four occasions over a period of about eleven months, jail guards gave the plaintiff his entire prescription at once, exposing him to the risk of theft by other inmates. Those four instances were insufficient to establish a widespread practice or custom. . . As Grieveson explained, 'evidence of four incidents that [plaintiff] alone experienced is 'simply not enough to foster a genuine issue of material fact that the practice was widespread.'. . Accordingly, granting summary judgment in Wexford's favor was proper. Our dissenting colleague attempts to distinguish Grieveson. Grieveson complained once, while Hildreth complained three times, and Grieveson did not allege widespread non-compliance with official policy. But a single complaint of four incidents over eleven months is not materially different than three complaints, each of a single incident, over nineteen months. And like Grieveson, Hildreth did not allege a widespread failure. Hildreth's allegations concern only himself. He sued on his own behalf and not for others. Indeed, the term 'widespread' is absent from Hildreth's amended complaint, which was filed with the assistance of counsel. Our reasoning and conclusion here agree with other circuits that have considered the frequency of instances to establish a widespread practice or custom. Those cases have concluded that four or more incidents over varying periods—sometimes less than nineteen months—are insufficient to qualify as a widespread practice or custom.[6] [fn. 6: collecting cases] . . . . The dissent states we adopt a 'bright-line rule' as to the number of incidents to establish an unconstitutional custom under Monell. . . But rather than set a number, we have considered and applied the precedents of this and other courts to these facts, nothing less and nothing more. Hildreth has not shown five incidents of prescription refill delay, much less eight. And under that law three delays over nineteen months for a single individual does not establish a widespread custom or practice of delaying medication. So we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to Wexford on Hildreth's § 1983 claim.") with Hildreth v. Butler, 960 F.3d 420, 432-41 (7th Cir. 2020) (Hamilton, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1527 (2021) ("Plaintiff Hildreth has offered sufficient evidence that Wexford knew of his serious health needs—which required reliable, timely refills of his Parkinson's medication—and acted unreasonably in response to those needs. Wexford established prescription refill and renewal systems, i.e., policies, that did not include warnings and back-ups to correct inevitable and serious mistakes. That's enough to show deliberate indifference under Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 843–44, 114 S.Ct. 1970, 128 L.Ed.2d 811 (1994), and Glisson v. Indiana Dep't of Corrections, 849 F.3d 372, 382 (7th Cir. 2017) (en banc). I respectfully dissent. . . . [P]laintiff Hildreth has come forward with evidence that defendant Wexford's policies for renewing and refilling prescriptions reflect deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of Hildreth himself and other prisoners who depend on reliable refills of prescriptions for medicines that are not kept on-site at the prison. . . . As applied, then, the formal policies did not reliably supply Hildreth with his Parkinson's medication. The record contains evidence of at least three medication lapses over a period of nineteen months. . . . For claims against municipal governments under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, we apply the familiar Monell standard: respondeat superior liability does not apply, and the plaintiff must show instead that the constitutional violation was caused by a municipal policy or a custom or practice so pervasive as to reflect municipal policy. . . The Supreme Court has not applied the Monell standard to private corporations that act under color of state law, like prison and jail health-care providers. Our precedents have applied Monell to such private corporations, though that doctrine has been questioned within the court and the academy. See Shields v. Illinois Dep't of Corrections, 746 F.3d 782, 789–90 (7th Cir. 2014). In this case, the correct focus is on Wexford's systems (i.e., its policies) for prescription refills and renewals. Monell liability may apply even in the absence of individual liability where the institutional policies themselves show deliberate indifference to inmates' serious medical needs. Glisson v. Indiana Dep't of Corrections, 849 F.3d 372, 378 (7th Cir. 2017) (en banc) (contractor chose not to provide for coordinated care for prisoners with multiple, complex illnesses). . . . This doctrinal niche is often relevant in prison health-care cases, particularly where health care is delivered by a combination of government employees and a private contractor like Wexford. The combination diffuses responsibility between government and contractor and among many individuals. Inmates can suffer because of health-care providers' lack of policy, systematic failures to follow official policy, or obvious gaps in policy. . . In such cases, it may be that no facially unconstitutional policy tells employees to take actions that violate someone's constitutional rights. Instead, the government or its contractor adopts or tolerates practices that predictably lead to constitutional harms. . . . Hildreth has presented sufficient evidence of a Monell policy or custom for his claim to survive. A jury could conclude that 'the failure to establish adequate systems' for providing essential medication 'was so pervasive that acquiescence on the part of policymakers was apparent and amounted to a policy decision.'. . Hildreth has identified a policy—or rather, a network of policies and key policy gaps—that can form the basis of Wexford's Eighth Amendment liability. The issue is not exactly how often the policy failed Hildreth. The issue is whether the system established by Wexford policymakers reflected deliberate indifference to the inevitability of human mistakes. A prisoner asserting a deliberate-indifference claim must show that the defendant had actual knowledge of the danger or serious condition the prisoner faced, and that the defendant failed to take reasonable steps in the face of the risk. . . . Ample evidence showed that Wexford had actual knowledge of Hildreth's Parkinson's disease, his prescription, and the need to ensure a steady supply of the medicine. Wexford surely had actual knowledge that some prisoners would have similarly urgent needs for critical prescriptions not available on-site at the prison. Given that actual knowledge of serious medical needs, Wexford had a constitutional duty to take reasonable steps to avoid or minimize the risk of lapses in medication. In other words, Wexford had a constitutional duty to put in place a reasonably reliable system for renewing and refilling such critical non-formulary drugs and to monitor the performance of that system. A jury could easily find that Wexford's system was not reasonably calculated to be reliable because the system had no warning channel and back-up mechanisms by which it could fix mistakes without unnecessary suffering. Wexford's system is not required to be perfect and fail-safe. But for a system so critical to health—and one with many possible points of failure—it lacked warnings to alert Wexford to inevitable mistakes or oversights. This not only prevented Wexford from catching mistakes before patients suffered but apparently prevented Wexford from learning about even repeated failures. Such an unreasonable 'conscious decision not to take action' in the face of a serious medical risk is akin to the decision of the defendant in Glisson to forgo a protocol for coordinated care to chronically ill inmates. . . Where there is an obvious risk created by a health-care policy gap—like coordinated care in Glisson or medication refill oversight here—a plaintiff need not show some minimum number of injuries to prevail. . . .In Hildreth's case, Wexford's system for providing medication led to a series of serious delays in providing him with his medication—at least three times in nineteen months. Each time this happened, we must assume, Hildreth did everything he could to avoid the problem and then to make Wexford aware of it. . . . Wexford's lack of involvement in the grievance process makes it more culpable and strengthens Hildreth's claim. Humans make mistakes. In implementing systems known to be critical to life, health, and safety, a company like Wexford must allow for such mistakes and take reasonable steps to provide warnings and back-up systems. Federal courts do not and should not design the specifics. As noted, though, the Eighth Amendment requires reasonable responses to known risks where prisoners cannot protect their own health and safety. Wexford's admission that it lacked any policy to learn about inmates' complaints supports the conclusion that its prescription policies created an unacceptable risk of harm resulting from this form of deliberate indifference to Hildreth's serious medical needs. . . . The law should not do what the majority opinion's reasoning does here: reward divided responsibility and deliberate ignorance by those who control prisoners' only access to health care. Hildreth's grievances give the impression of a person in pain, screaming into a void. Wexford ignored Hildreth's grievances, seemingly by design. And when Hildreth used the only other avenue available—communication with nurses—he was told only to 'wait and see' if the refill would come. On this record, we should reverse summary judgment for Wexford. . . . The majority opinion adopts a highly restricted approach to establishing a Monell custom that is at odds with our precedent. The majority looks only to the raw number of alleged failures and the time period over which they took place. . . It views the broader policy decisions and context surrounding the violations as immaterial. This approach divorces the legal doctrine from its purpose of identifying those cases in which a government or corporate policy causes and fails to address predictable failures to provide needed medical care. After acknowledging that we have adopted no 'bright-line rules' for establishing a Monell custom, the majority opinion adopts one by saying that the number of possibly unconstitutional incidents 'must be more than three.'. . There are at least two problems with the approach. First, Hildreth does not present the kind of pure custom case where institutional culpability is inferred solely from repeated employee misconduct and the question is whether the corporation can be held liable for tolerating them. While Hildreth uses the term 'custom' in his briefing—presumably because he asks us to infer something from the repeated medication lapses he experienced—his theory of Monell liability implicates both official policies and unofficial customs. Hildreth specifically points to Wexford's admission that it is 'not involved in the grievance process' as evidence of its deliberate indifference. He asks us to infer from Wexford's medication refill policy, its prescription renewal policy, a pattern of noncompliance with each of those policies, a pattern of medication lapses, and—importantly—the utter failure of Wexford to provide a functioning pathway to fix these problems, that Wexford tolerated 'systematic and gross deficiencies' in its process for providing inmates with medication. . . And as described above, the lack of a policy for reporting and correcting failures—undoubtedly a failing attributable to Wexford itself rather than a rogue employee—should be decisive. Second, even when addressing what could be called pure custom cases, we have never held that some minimum number of incidents is needed to establish municipal liability. Rather, the question is one of corporate knowledge and responsibility, as is always the case under Monell. . . The majority opinion's per se rule is at odds with our approach to Monell, which focuses broadly on indicia of municipal or corporate responsibility rather than just the number of incidents. . . As we said in Woodward, a prison health-care company 'does not get a "one free suicide" pass.'. . Grieveson v. Anderson, 538 F.3d 763 (7th Cir. 2008), which the majority opinion treats as controlling, is easily distinguishable.

An inmate alleged that the jail maintained a customary practice of failing to distribute inmate prescriptions properly after four instances in which his entire prescription was distributed at once and then stolen by other inmates. . . We held that these four incidents were insufficient to establish a custom. Grieveson differs in two critical ways from this case: the inmate complained to the prison officials only once, and the inmate did not allege widespread noncompliance with official policy. Here, by contrast, Hildreth filed at least three grievances and made even more frequent complaints to nurses where Wexford's system failed, and nothing happened. And he described frequent noncompliance with Wexford's refill and renewal policies. Wexford's just-in-time refill system left little room for mistakes, and such a system demands warnings and back-ups where health and safety are at stake. The repeated and foreseeable mistakes in refilling Hildreth's prescription and the failure to respond to his complaints make for a much stronger case of systemic deficiencies here than in Grieveson. I would reverse and remand for trial, and I would add a strong suggestion that Hildreth be permitted to pursue additional discovery to expand the evidence of deliberate indifference.")

See also Hildreth v. Butler, 971 F.3d 645, 645-47 (7th Cir. 2020) (Hamilton, J., joined by Rovner, Wood, and Scudder, JJ., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1527 (2021) ("This case poses important questions about Monell liability in the context of prison healthcare. We may assume that convicted prisoners deserve their punishment in prison, but the Eighth Amendment imposes limits on that punishment. In important ways, prisoners are dependent and vulnerable. Their custodians may not act with deliberate indifference toward serious dangers to their prisoners or to their serious health needs. . . Custodians who learn of such dangers or needs must respond reasonably to them, whether the threat comes from violence at the hands of other prisoners, Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 844–45 (1994), hazards in the prison environment, Helling v. McKinney, 509 U.S. 25, 33 (1993), suicide, Woodward v. Correctional Medical Services, 368 F.3d 917, 929 (7th Cir. 2004), or injury, illness, or pain. Estelle, 429 U.S. at 104–05. . .The question worth deciding en banc in this case is whether plaintiff Hildreth has come forward with evidence sufficient to find that defendant Wexford acted with deliberate indifference to his and other prisoners' serious medical needs by establishing unreasonable systems ('policies' in the language of Monell) for refilling and renewing prescriptions for needed medicines. . . As the health care contractor for the prison, Wexford of course knew of the need for timely and reliable prescription refills and renewals. As explained in the panel dissent, a reasonable jury could also find that Wexford failed to take reasonable steps to meet that need. Hildreth v. Butler, 960 F.3d 420, 435 (7th Cir. 2020) (Hamilton, J., dissenting). Wexford designed and implemented systems that left plenty of room for human error or even malice, but without alerts or safeguards to learn of and correct inevitable problems with prescription refills and renewals. As a result, plaintiff Hildreth repeatedly suffered easily avoidable pain and debilitation, for days or more than a week at a time, while waiting for the medicine he needed for his Parkinson's disease. The broader legal question posed here is whether the panel majority decision is consistent with our recent en banc decisions on Monell liability in Glisson v. Indiana Dep't of Corrections, 849 F.3d 372, 382 (7th Cir. 2017) ("There is no magic number of injuries that must occur before [defendant's] failure to act can be considered deliberately indifferent."), and J.K.J. v. Polk County, 960 F.3d 367, 380 (7th Cir. 2020) (" 'in a narrow range of circumstances,' deliberate indifference could be found when the violation of rights is a 'highly predictable consequence' of a failure to provide officers what they need to confront 'recurring' situations"), . . . as well as whether it is consistent with Woodward v. Correctional Medical Services, 368 F.3d 917, 929 (7th Cir. 2004) ("CMS does not get a 'one free suicide' pass."). In both Glisson and J.K.J., we held that plaintiffs were entitled to a jury trial or verdict on their Monell claims without requiring proof of a minimum number of previous failings. In both cases, the Monell defendant was on notice of a serious risk of harm to certain prisoners. In Glisson it was the risk to patients with complex disease combinations if there were no effort to coordinate care. In J.K.J., it was notice of the risk of sexual abuse by guards. Both Glisson and J.K.J. applied two key lessons from Farmer v. Brennan. First, knowledge of a danger or serious health need may be inferred from circumstantial evidence, including the obviousness of the risk or need. . . Second, a state actor with actual knowledge of such a danger or need is expected to take reasonable, though not perfect, steps to address the danger or need. . . More generally still, this case poses the question whether courts need to channel Monell claims into separate and distinct categories depending on how the plaintiff characterizes his claim, whether as one based on a 'pattern' of violations showing an unconstitutional custom or as one based on a more direct challenge to an explicit policy of the governmental or corporate defendant. The panel majority erred by adhering too rigidly to these categories as separate channels and failing to engage with the policy problem and holding of Glisson. As a result, the panel majority allowed Wexford to treat the case as only a 'pattern' case, which in turn allowed Wexford to defend itself by saying that it had not known—and had no way to know—of the repeated acts of individual oversight or malice that delayed Hildreth's medicine. That defense was actually an unintentional admission that Wexford's systems (i.e., its policies) for prescription refills and renewals were themselves unreasonable. They were unreasonable in the face of inevitable human error precisely because they did not include means for monitoring whether or not urgent medical needs were being met. The categories for Monell cases can be helpful, but we should not let them distract us from the central issue. Regardless of how the claim is categorized, 'The central question is always whether an official policy, however expressed (and we have no reason to think that the list in Monell is exclusive), caused the constitutional deprivation.'. . I respectfully dissent from the denial of rehearing en banc.")

Compare Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1075-76 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) ("[T]he entity defendants argue that the architecture of the West Hollywood police station's sobering cell cannot be a policy, custom, or practice. We need not decide that question, because the design of the cell is not the custom or practice alleged by the plaintiff and found by the jury. Whether or not the design of the cell is a policy, custom, or practice, it is a fact; the sobering cell lacked audio monitoring and video surveillance. . . That is, the design of the cell is only the backdrop for the entity defendants' policy or custom, as described in the jury instructions and as reflected in the record. The LASD and the County made deliberate choices in light of the poor design and location of the sobering cell. There was a custom of housing intoxicated inmates in sobering cells that contained inadequate audio monitoring. A representative of the County admitted that other options existed; there were other cells in which to detain intoxicated prisoners. The entities chose a policy to check on inmates only every 30 minutes. A representative of the County testified that supervision of the sobering cell consisted of 'half-hour checks by the jailer.' These routine practices were consciously designed and, together, they amount to a custom or policy. . . The custom or policy, in summary, was to use a sobering cell that lacked adequate audio surveillance to detain more than one belligerent drunk person while checking the cell visually only once every half hour. . . . The jury found that LASD's and the County's custom or practice caused Castro's injury. Substantial evidence supports the jury's findings.") with Castro v. County of Los Angeles, 833 F.3d 1060, 1082-84 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) (Callahan, J., joined by Bea and Ikuta, JJ., dissenting in part)("Here, there was no 'known or obvious consequence,' there was nothing 'so obvious' or 'so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights' as to support a determination of deliberate indifference, and there was no substantial certainty. Castro was attacked by Gonzalez who, pursuant to the County's express policy, should not have been placed in the cell occupied by Castro. There is nothing to suggest that the County should have anticipated violations of its policy. Moreover, the majority observes that the jury found that the individual officers 'knew or should have known that the jail's policies forbade placing the two together in the same cell in those circumstances.' . . Fairly viewed, the record is devoid of evidence that the County 'disregarded a known or obvious consequence,'. . . and there is neither the obviousness nor the likelihood of a violation of a constitutional right necessary to support a finding of deliberate indifference. . . .The majority's need to cobble together different 'choices' in order to construct a policy of deliberate indifference also reflects the fact that there is no direct causal link between the policy perceived by the majority and Castro's injury. Castro was injured by Gonzalez, a violent detainee who was placed in the sobering cell with Castro in direct contravention of the County's clear policy against such placement. . . .On the record before us, holding the County liable is tantamount to de facto respondeat superior liability, which the Supreme Court has consistently disapproved. . . . Castro's tragic injuries were a preventable tragedy, and we affirm the jury's determination of the individual defendants' culpability. However, the evidence proffered by Castro at trial does not support a finding that the County had a policy or custom that reflected deliberate indifference that led to Castro's injuries. Castro presented insufficient evidence that audio monitoring was required for the West Hollywood station's sobering cell in 2009. The adoption of California Building Code standards for audio and visual monitoring did not give the County even constructive notice that monitoring at the West Hollywood police station might be substandard because the Code includes a grandfather clause stating that the new standards are not applicable to existing structures. Moreover, there was no evidence of any prior incidents. The other alleged 'choices' manufactured by the majority—the availability of other cells and 'a policy to check inmates only every 30 minutes'—do not support a determination of deliberate indifference. Moreover, the immediate cause of Castro's injuries was the individual officers' placement of Gonzalez in Castro's cell in direct violation of the County's policy. In sum, there is insufficient evidence to support a finding of deliberate indifference by the County and there is no direct causal link between the County's maintenance of the West Hollywood sobering cell and Castro's injuries. Accordingly, I would vacate the award against the entity defendants.").

Compare Brass v. County of Los Angeles, 328 F.3d 1192, 1201, 1202 (9th Cir. 2003) ("To the extent Brass's claim rests on the County's policy or custom of not starting to process a particular day's releases until it has received all information, including wants and holds, relating to the prisoners scheduled for release, we cannot say the County thereby violated Brass's constitutional rights. To the contrary, we think that that aspect of the County's release program was justified and reasonable in light of the County's problems and responsibilities in processing the large number of prisoner releases it handles. . . . It is unclear, however, whether the 48-hour period applied to probable cause determinations is appropriate for effectuating the release of prisoners whose basis for confinement has ended. One might conclude that when a court orders a prisoner released − or when, for example, a prisoner's sentence has been completed − the outer bounds for releasing the prisoner should be less than 48 hours. We need not determine that question here, however, since we have concluded that in the circumstances of this case, the 39-hour delay in releasing Brass was reasonable and did not violate his constitutional rights.") with Berry v. Baca, 379 F.3d 764, 768, 770, 771 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Here, in contrast to Brass, the plaintiffs do not limit their challenge to the County's specific policies. Rather, as argued in their briefs to this Court, they challenge the policy 'in toto ... that simply delays all releases until the system, in its sweet time, and with the resources it chooses ... is ready to make releases.' Stated another way, the plaintiffs in this case challenge the implementation of the County's policies, rather than the specific policies themselves. They claim that the County's unreasonably inefficient implementation of its administrative policies amounts to a policy of deliberate indifference to their constitutional rights. . . . [T]he plaintiffs here contend that they were over-detained for twenty-six to twenty-nine hours because the County's policies are being implemented in a manner that is deliberately indifferent to their right to freedom from incarceration. We cannot determine whether the County's implementation of its policies is in fact reasonably efficient based solely on the defendants' self-serving declarations. This would be an improper basis for summary judgment, as the County's explanations and defenses 'depend on disputed facts and inferences' that are proper for jury determination. . . Based on the County's declarations, a juror could find that its explanations reasonably justify a twenty-nine hour delay in release from jail. On the other hand, a juror could also find that the time each necessary administrative task reasonably requires simply does not add up to twenty-nine hours. . . . While the County in both Brass and the instant cases has provided some explanation of the steps necessary prior to release, its declarations offer only general assertions as to why these steps would reasonably take up to forty-eight hours. In order to determine if this length of time is, in fact, reasonable, the jury must be presented with the administrative processes, the volume of bookings and releases, as well as other considerations that affect the County's ability to process releases. It may very well be that a reasonable juror would conclude that, given the necessary administrative tasks and voluminous demands on the county, the delays at issue were justified. However, we conclude that this is a factual determination that is appropriately left to the jury to decide.").

Compare Price v. Sery, 513 F.3d 962, 971, 973-74 (9th Cir. 2008) ("We are satisfied that our case law does not support Price's contention that 'reasonable belief' is a lesser standard than 'probable cause' as a matter of law. Both standards are objective and turn upon the circumstances confronting the officer rather than on the officer's mere subjective beliefs or intentions, however sincere. Our case law requires that a reasonable officer under the circumstances believe herself or others to face a threat of serious physical harm before using deadly force. Moreover, as the Supreme Court clarified in Scott, the touchstone of the inquiry is 'reasonableness,' which does not admit of an 'easy-to-apply legal test.'. . The City's policy requires that an officer have a reasonable belief in an 'immediate threat of death or serious physical injury' and thus comports with the requirement. Accordingly, the district court correctly concluded that the City's policy governing the use of deadly force was not, as written, contrary to the requirements of the Fourth Amendment. . . . [W]e agree with the district court that the City's official policy concerning the use of deadly force, as written, does not violate the requirements of the Constitution. Further, we agree with the district court that Price has not made a sufficient showing of a failure to train on the part of the City to survive summary judgment. We conclude, however, that a genuine issue of material fact exists as to whether a 'longstanding' practice or custom of the City might in fact have deprived Perez of his constitutional rights.") with Price v. Sery, 513 F.3d 962, 981(9th Cir. 2008) (Fisher, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part and concurring in the judgment) ("A reasonable jury could conclude on the basis of this evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to Price, that the City 'disregarded a known or obvious consequence' of its training practices. . . The Streed Declaration reasonably supports the inference that, quite apart from the letter of the City's deadly force policy, officers were being instilled with a 'shoot first' mindset that foreseeably would result in unjustified applications of deadly force. . . In addition, a logical inference from Chief Foxworth's admission − as the City's highest ranking police officer and head of the Portland Police Bureau − that he erroneously thought that reasonable belief embodied a lesser standard than probable cause within the context of the City's deadly force policy is that the training of the police force also reflected this mistaken understanding. A reasonable jury could conclude training based on this misconception constituted a failure to train. Therefore, I would permit Price also to pursue that theory of liability on remand.").

See also Sleater v. Benton County, No. 19-35459, 2020 WL 3867400, at *1 (9th Cir. July 9, 2020) (not reported) ("Sleater brought this class action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against the County on behalf of those arrested pursuant to the 'Pay or Appear' Program. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of the County, holding that Sleater had failed to establish municipal liability under Monell v. New York City Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658 (1978), and that the County was protected by quasi-judicial immunity. We disagree on both counts. First, the record contains sufficient evidence to create a genuine dispute as to whether Sleater's injuries were the result of a municipal policy or custom as required for municipal liability under Monell. There is evidence in the record to support a conclusion that the County Clerk's actions in connection with the 'Pay or Appear' Program 'may fairly be said to represent official policy' of the County, and therefore may give rise to municipal liability under § 1983. . . As a matter of state law, the County Clerk has statutory authority over the collection of LFOs. . . The County Clerk's authority over LFO collection includes the discretion to review the appropriateness of collection schedules and to request changes to an LFO debtor's payment schedule based on changes in the debtor's financial circumstances. . . When the County Clerk exercises this discretion

(or, as Sleater alleges, systematically declines to do so), the Clerk acts as a county official with 'final policymaking authority.'. . The record also includes evidence from which a reasonable juror could conclude that the County Clerk had a major role in designing, continuing, and ultimately ending the policy. We reject the County's argument that because the authority to issue an arrest warrant lies exclusively with Superior Court judges, the County Clerk's actions here may not be imputed to the County. A custom or practice may give rise to municipal liability under Monell even where that practice is ultra vires under state law. . . A reasonable juror could conclude based on record evidence that the Clerk's Office issued arrest warrants without reviewing an LFO debtor's ability to pay as a matter of custom."); Wright v. City of Euclid, Ohio, 962 F.3d 852, 880-81(6th Cir. 2020) ("Wright argues that he can establish municipal liability under three of the four methods: (1) a custom of tolerance or acquiescence of federal rights violations; (2) inadequate training and supervision; and (3) ratification of illegal actions by an official with final decision-making authority. . . . Wright points to the Euclid Police department training on use of force to support his argument that the City has a custom of allowing excessive force. First, there is the link in the training materials to the YouTube video of the Chris Rock comedy sketch discussed earlier. As noted, it is entitled 'How not to get your ass kicked by the police!'. It includes numerous vignettes depicting police officers beating African-American suspects, with commentary from Rock about Rodney King and other matters as also described earlier. The evidence further includes, as also noted, a slide from the same training titled 'Defensive Tactics Training.' The slide includes a cartoon in which a stick figure police officer in riot gear is shown beating a prone and unarmed civilian with a club with the caption 'protecting and serving the poop out of you.'. . Again, as noted, Murowsky testified that he did not believe that the image conveys that the Euclid Police Department 'beat[s] the hell out of people,' . . . but that he didn't know what other message could possibly be taken away from the image. Finally, the use-of-force training contains a meme that depicts two officers with their guns drawn and aimed at something. It is captioned 'Bed bug! Bed bug on my shoe!'. Murowsky testified that he believed the image conveyed that the officers were overreacting to and escalating a situation. Wright has produced enough evidence such that a reasonable jury could find that the City's custom surrounding use of force is so settled so as to have the force of law and that it was the moving force behind violations of Wright's constitutional rights. We therefore REVERSE the district court's grant of summary judgment on the issue of municipal liability under § 1983."); Perez v. Cox, 788 F. App'x 438, ___ (9th Cir. 2019) ("The Plaintiff-Appellees, members of the decedent Carlos Perez's family, allege that the Supervisor Defendants promulgated, maintained, or ratified—as well as trained, supervised, or controlled their subordinates pursuant to—the 'actual practice, custom and de facto policy' to, inter alia: use live birdshot as a means of inmate control; encourage the use of deadly force to respond to non-deadly circumstances; and rely primarily on shotguns to maintain prison order. Inexplicably, the dissent focuses solely on the written policy, which it dubs 'the Use of Force Regulation.' It is well established that § 1983 liability may attach based on a 'policy, practice, or custom.' See, e.g., Pierce v. Multnomah Cty., 76 F.3d 1032, 1039 (9th Cir. 1996) (emphasis added). The dissent criticizes the majority for not citing the written policy, overlooking that the focus of the complaint is the 'actual practice, custom, and de facto policy' the Supervisor Defendants adopted and condoned. The written policy is immaterial."); Meier v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 934 F.3d 824, 828-29 (8th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 2566 (2020) ("Meier claims that SLMPD has a policy, albeit an unwritten one, of reporting vehicles as wanted on REJIS in hopes of detaining the vehicle against the owner's wishes and without a warrant. To establish the existence of such an 'unwritten or unofficial policy,' Meier must demonstrate '(1) the existence of a continuing, widespread, persistent pattern of unconstitutional misconduct by the [municipality's] employees; (2) deliberate indifference to or tacit authorization of such conduct by the [municipality's] policymaking officials after notice to the officials of that misconduct; and (3) that [she] was injured by acts pursuant to the [municipality's] custom, i.e., that the custom was a moving force behind the constitutional violation.'. . We conclude that Meier has adduced evidence from which a reasonable juror could find that each of these three elements is met. . . .A reasonable jury could find that Meier's truck was towed and held pursuant to SLMPD's unwritten but widespread and persistent policy of reporting vehicles as wanted for the purpose of detaining them without a warrant."); Nehad v. Browder, 929 F.3d 1125, 1141-42 (9th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 141 S.Ct. 235 (2020) ("Appellants need not show evidence of a policy or deficient training; evidence of an informal practice or custom will suffice. . . Appellants submitted evidence that: (1) 75% of the San Diego Police Department's officer-involved shootings were avoidable; (2) the Nehad shooting was approved by the department, which took no action against Browder; and (3) the department looks the other way when officers use lethal force. Indeed, Chief Zimmerman explicitly affirmed that Browder's shooting of Nehad 'was the right thing to do,' and the department identified Browder as the victim of the incident and conducted his interview several days after the shooting, once Browder had watched the surveillance video with his lawyer. This evidence is sufficient to create a triable issue at least as to the existence of an informal practice or policy and, thus, Monell and supervisory liability."); Rodriguez v. County of Los Angeles, 891 F.3d 776, 803 (9th Cir. 2018) ("We have recognized that a § 1983 plaintiff may prove the second type of Monell liability, deliberate indifference, through evidence of a 'failure to investigate and discipline employees in the face of widespread constitutional violations.'. . Thus, it is sufficient under our case law to prove a 'custom' of encouraging excessive force to provide evidence that personnel have been permitted to use force with impunity. [collecting cases] Appellees presented substantial evidence to show that the LASD had a custom of ignoring or condoning excessive force, and that this custom proximately caused the beatings at issue here. That evidence included the CCJV report; Olmstead's testimony; evidence that LASD had not used their force-tracking system to monitor force used against many prisoners, including appellees; and evidence that supervisory staff had observed the practices proved at trial but had done nothing. In declining to grant judgment as a matter of law to appellants on this issue, the district court ruled that the LASD had tolerated excessive force at the jail and had created an atmosphere of wanton violence and impunity. The court wrote that within the jail itself, 'Captain Cruz ... perpetuated a culture where excessive force was encouraged, openly joked with the deputies about force, and promoted the practice of incomplete and ineffective investigations into deputy misconduct.' The record amply supports the jury's verdict and the district court's ruling. There was substantial evidence of repeated constitutional violations, of LASD's awareness of those violations, and of LASD's failure to take any remedial action. Our precedents permitted the jury to infer that LASD had adopted a custom or practice of condoning excessive force and that this culture of violence and impunity proximately caused the injuries inflicted on appellees."); Larson v. Napier, 700 F. App'x 609, 611 (9th Cir. 2017) ("Although the Sheriff does not have a written policy for either responding to reports of domestic violence or call out and containment – the procedure employed at the Larsons' home – there was ample evidence at trial of 'practices so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law.'. . This evidence included: an admission by the Sheriff that the deputies complied with the department's policy; Bureau Chief Byron Gwaltney's testimony that, in a similar situation, he would expect deputies to do the same thing; . . . Gwaltney's testimony that, in responding to Warfe's call about the Larsons, the deputies used tactics 'taught and accepted as the department approach'; various deputies' testimony that they acted consistent with the standard procedures of the department; and the fact that the deputies followed the same procedure at the house next door shortly after the warrantless search of the Larsons' home. Although the Sheriff argues that a general call out and containment procedure in and of itself is not unconstitutional, the record reflects that the district court based its ruling on the specific custom or practice of the Pima County Sheriff's Department – namely, seizing individuals and searching their homes before establishing a factual basis for doing so."); Montano v. Orange Cty., Texas, 842 F.3d 865, 875-76, 879 (5th Cir. 2016) ("A formal, written policy is not required to establish a 'condition or practice'. As our court previously noted, 'a condition may reflect ... [a] de facto policy, as evidenced by a pattern of acts or omissions "sufficiently extended or pervasive, or otherwise typical of extended or pervasive misconduct by [jail] officials, to prove an intended condition or practice"'. . . . As plaintiffs contend, the consistent testimony of jail employees is sufficient to prove an established de facto policy. Jail employees testified to familiarity with the Orange County Sheriff's Office Correctional Facility Operations Plan, which prescribed a guideline range of four-to-eight hours for detainee detoxification. In contravention, the jail's explicit custom was to isolate seemingly-intoxicated detainees in the bubble, and to leave them there until either they became coherent and could be booked, or a contract physician visited. . . . The county emphasizes, as noted, that plaintiffs did not provide specific examples of other instances of detainees who suffered Mr. Montano's fate as a result of the de facto policy. But, as also noted, such specific examples are not required to meet the 'condition or practice' element. In that regard, although 'isolated examples of illness, injury, or even death, standing alone, cannot prove that conditions of confinement are constitutionally inadequate', the evidence was sufficient for a reasonable juror to infer a de facto policy that every seemingly detoxifying detainee was left in the bubble without emergency medical care. . . Given the striking uniformity of the jail employees' testimony, further evidence was not required for a reasonable juror to infer a de facto policy for conditions or practices. Similar to the challenge in Shepherd, plaintiffs do not challenge 'the acts or omissions of individuals but the jail's system of providing medical care' to detainees who were seemingly detoxifying. . . Although the Shepherd plaintiffs presented a broader variety of evidence than the uniform testimony of the sheriff and jail employees in the action at hand, the result is the same: the uniformity of the evidence allows a reasonable juror to infer a de facto jail policy. . . Jurors heard consistent testimony that a given protocol was followed for every similarly-situated detainee. . . In sum, for the unconstitutional-condition-of-confinement claim, the court properly denied the county JMOL against the jury's finding the condition. Trial testimony adequately established the protocol exercised in Mr. Montano's experience was standard jail practice; the record demonstrates his experience was not a mere 'isolated example', but was, instead, a 'pervasive pattern of serious deficiencies in providing for his basic human needs'."); Mendiola-Martinez v. Arpaio, 836 F.3d 1239, 1243, 1254-56 (9th Cir. 2016) ("We are presented with an important and complex issue of first impression in our circuit: whether the U.S. Constitution allows law enforcement officers to restrain a female inmate while she is pregnant, in labor, or during postpartum recovery. We hold today that in this case, the answer to that question depends on factual disputes a properly instructed jury must resolve. We therefore vacate and remand the district court's grant of summary judgment for the County Defendants on most of Mendiola-Martinez's shackling claims. . . [W]e find that Mendiola-Martinez has presented sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to conclude that by restraining Mendiola-Martinez when she was in labor. . . and postpartum recovery, the County Defendants exposed her to a substantial risk of serious harm. Instead of disputing the risk posed by the Restraint Policy, the County Defendants seek to justify the policy by arguing that it 'serves a legitimate government purpose, specifically the safety and security of the inmate, detention officers, hospital personnel, as well as the general public.'. . . [I]n excessive force and conditions of confinement cases, we instruct juries to defer to prison officials' judgments in adopting and executing policies needed to preserve discipline and maintain security. . . Such deference is generally absent from serious medical needs cases, however, where deliberate indifference 'can typically be established or disproved without the necessity of balancing competing institutional concerns for the safety of prison staff or other inmates.'. . Therefore, whether the County Defendants are entitled to deference depends on the type of claim Mendiola-Martinez brings against them: do her shackling claims challenge the conditions her confinement? Or are they of the medical-needs variety? Mendiola-Martinez contends that her shackling claims are a hybrid of both. We agree that her shackling claims do not fit neatly into either category. . . .In such unusual situations, the district court must instruct the jury to defer to the prison officials who adopted and executed a practice or policy needed to preserve discipline and maintain internal security. . .That deference, however, comes with an important caveat: 'The [Supreme] Court has held that deference must be given to the officials in charge of the jail unless there is "substantial evidence" demonstrating their response to the situation is exaggerated.'. . . A jury could find in this case that the restraints used on Mendiola-Martinez were an 'exaggerated' response to the County Defendants' safety concerns. Mendiola-Martinez was arrested for a nonviolent crime, and the County Defendants have failed to show she was a danger to others. Nor is there any evidence that Mendiola-Martinez was a flight risk. In fact, Officer Hertig, who escorted Mendiola-Martinez to the hospital and was with her during the C-section and shortly afterward, testified that Mendiola-Martinez was not a specific security threat and did not give any indication that she would try to escape. Mendiola-Martinez's physical condition when she was transported to the Medical Center and after her C-section also make it highly unlikely that she would flee or fight. . . . Without more than a broad assertion about the penological interest in restraining all inmates—even one who is in labor—a reasonable jury could find that the Restraint Policy exposed Mendiola-Martinez to a substantial and unjustified risk of harm. . . . [A] jury could conclude that the County Defendants were aware of the risk caused by restraining an inmate in labor and deliberately indifferent to that risk by restraining Mendiola-Martinez during transport. A jury could also infer the County Defendants' awareness of the risk of restraining Mendiola-Martinez while she was in labor because the risk is obvious. . . .Whether the County Defendants were deliberately indifferent to any risk created by restraining women in postpartum recovery is a closer question. Such a risk is not as obvious as restraining an inmate in labor. Mendiola-Martinez's expert states that walking 'without restraint' after a C-section is necessary to prevent blood clots. But Mendiola-Martinez testified that she could walk around the room with the six-to-eight foot 'leg tether,' which was longer than the other chains used to restrain her, and that nurses came into the room to help her walk around. The use of a leg tether long enough to permit Mendiola-Martinez to walk around indicates that the County Defendants were aware of the risk of restraining woman in postpartum recovery and sought to neutralize the risk, not disregard it. Therefore, we conclude that a reasonable jury could not find that the use of the leg tether constituted deliberate indifference to Mendiola-Martinez's health and safety in violation of her constitutional rights. Summary judgment on this aspect of Mendiola-Martinez's shackling claims was proper."); D.E. v. Doe, 834 F.3d 723, 733 (6th Cir. 2016) (Keith, J., concurring in the judgment) ("I am deeply troubled that the CBP has established a pattern and practice of violating the Fourth Amendment. Direct evidence of this practice is the laminated card. The laminated card provided by the CBP states that the person receiving the laminated card is being allowed to turn around without crossing the border. The same card also states that the person (and his or her belongings) are still subject to search by a customs official. This card is written evidence that the CBP has a practice of searching persons and items that have not and will not cross an international border without probable cause and without reasonable suspicion. Because the 'single fact' that makes border searches reasonable—i.e. a border crossing—is completely absent under those circumstances, the CBP's practice cannot pass constitutional muster. . . . I am even more troubled by the majority's choice to rubberstamp this conduct. I am concerned that if government officials can escape the bounds of the U.S. Constitution by simply forming their lips to say compliance is too difficult, eventually there will be little left of a Constitution to protect, much less a society unburdened by unreasonable intrusions."); Daniel v. Cook County, 833 F.3d 728, 734-36 (7th Cir. 2016) ("In this case, Daniel has not tried to hold any one doctor responsible for his injury. On this record, it is hard to see how he might have done so. This case reflects a common scenario: an institution 'structured its affairs so that no one person was responsible for [the inmate's] care,' and such diffused responsibility can make it very difficult to show individual responsibility for health care failures. Shields, 746 F.3d at 795; see also Glisson, 813 F.3d at 666 (majority opinion) (divided panel decision, now vacated, on whether private corporation contracting to provide health care for prisoners had policy amounting to deliberate indifference to prisoners' health). Daniel contends instead that the delays and confusion that caused his injury were caused by systemic problems in the health care system for the Cook County Jail that reflect deliberate indifference to inmates' health needs as a matter of official custom, policy, or practice. To hold defendants liable under § 1983 and Monell, Daniel must demonstrate that the defendants' 'official policy, widespread custom, or action by an official with policy-making authority was the "moving force" behind his constitutional injury.'. . An unconstitutional policy can include both implicit policies as well as a gap in expressed policies. . . Similar to the plaintiff's claim in Dixon, Daniel argues that the Jail had both an unlawful official policy and widespread custom that led to his injury. At bottom, though, he is essentially attempting to prove 'that the unlawful practice'—the failure to establish adequate systems for scheduling health care, keeping health care records, and addressing inmate grievances about health care—'was so pervasive that acquiescence on the part of policymakers was apparent and amounted to a policy decision.'. . Even setting aside for now the 2008 Department of Justice Report, the Agreed Order, and the Monitor Report, Daniel provided substantial evidence of systemic deficiencies in the Jail's medical care, including extensive testimony from Jail medical staff. . . .The evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to Daniel, raises a genuine issue of material fact as to whether his injury resulted from systemic, gross deficiencies in the Jail's medical care. His indirect evidence shows more than a mere 'one or two missteps,' Dixon, 819 F.3d at 348, or isolated problems. Daniel has also offered substantial evidence that Sheriff Dart, who is a relevant policymaker for health care for Jail inmates, knew of these deficiencies and failed to take reasonable corrective action. . . .We are satisfied that the plaintiff has come forward with enough evidence, including his own experience and the extensive deposition testimony from Jail staff, to demonstrate systemic problems with health care scheduling and record-keeping. This is so even without the substance of the Department of Justice Report. And when we include the Report and related documents to prove notice and the apparent absence of a response by the sheriff, it would be reasonable, though not necessary, to infer an official custom, policy, or practice of deliberate indifference toward inmates' serious health needs."); Groden v. City of Dallas , Texas, 826 F.3d 280, 286-87 (5th Cir. 2016) ("If the city had a policy of arresting people without probable cause in retaliation for annoying-but-protected speech, such a policy would be unconstitutional. . . Since Groden has alleged that the city had exactly this policy, he successfully alleged that the city had an unconstitutional policy, and the district court erred by dismissing his complaint on that ground. Further, Groden has pled that Officer Gorka arrested him based on this crackdown policy. He thus pled sufficient facts to show that the alleged crackdown policy—not the ordinance—was the moving force behind the city's alleged unconstitutional arrest."); Dixon v. County of Cook, 819 F.3d 343, 348-49 (7th Cir. 2016) ("The essence of Lula's claim against the County is that it implemented a records policy that created barriers to informed care. She relies on Monell v. Dep't of Soc. Servs. of the City of New York, . . . which requires a plaintiff suing a municipality or comparable entity to demonstrate that the entity's official policy, widespread custom, or action by an official with policy-making authority was the 'moving force' behind his constitutional injury. . . An unconstitutional municipal policy can 'take the form of an implicit policy or a gap in expressed policies.' Thomas v. Cook Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 604 F.3d 293, 303 (7th Cir.2009). This part of the case was resolved on summary judgment, and so the question before us is whether Lula presented enough in response to Cook County's motion to demonstrate genuine issues of material fact requiring a trial. Lula relies primarily on Cook County's official policy with respect to medical records in the jail; to a certain extent, she also relies on 'widespread custom' and action by an official with final authority. In order to prove the policy, she looks both to written records and to indirect proof. For the latter, a 'plaintiff must introduce evidence demonstrating that the unlawful practice was so pervasive that acquiescence on the part of policymakers was apparent and amounted to a policy decision.'. . This requires more than a showing of one or two missteps. . . As applied to a case such as this one, we look to see if a trier of fact could find 'systemic and gross deficiencies in staffing, facilities, equipment, or procedures' in a detention center's medical care system. And even if there are such deficiencies, a Monell claim can prevail only if a policy-making official knows about them and fails to correct them. . . Lula alleges that the County's records policy led inexorably to inadequate medical care for inmates. The problem was twofold: first, there were both a paper record-keeping system and an electronic record-keeping system, and the two were not coordinated; second, to the extent the County for whatever reason was still relying primarily on paper records, access to them was haphazard. The predictable result was that its medical providers were hamstrung in their ability to reach a proper diagnosis and treatment. Lula argues that if all the doctors involved in treating Dixon had access to all his records, he would not have experienced such a delay in diagnosis and thus his pain would have been addressed much sooner. . . . Taking the County's records policy, the evidence from Dr. Hart, the evidence from Dr. Cruz, the DOJ report, and the additional testimony from Dr. Greifinger together, we conclude that a reasonable jury could find that pervasive systemic deficiencies in the detention center's healthcare system were the moving force behind Dixon's injury. It was therefore error to grant summary judgment in the County's favor on the Monell claim."); Harvey v. D.C., 798 F.3d 1042, 1053-54 (D.C. Cir. 2015) ("The District argues that the legislature's enactment of the intellectual disabilities rights statute in 1979 is sufficient to rebut evidence that it had a policy of deliberate indifference. The District's statutory policy is of 'little value,' where, as in this case, 'there is evidence ... that the municipality was deliberately indifferent to the policy's violation.' Daskalea v. District of Columbia, 227 F.3d 433, 442 (D.C.Cir.2000). In the absence of evidence of actual enforcement of its paper policy, the District has failed to create an issue of triable fact. The District also argues that while it was aware of systemic failures in its care for the intellectually disabled, it was not aware that these failures 'could lead to threats to the life and safety of disabled individuals.'. . Regardless of whether the District had actual knowledge of constitutional violations, the evidence establishes that the District should have known that its policy of deliberate indifference was likely to result in the violation of rights of the committed person. As noted above, in 1996, a federal district court warned the District that intellectually disabled individuals are 'ill-equipped' to 'defend against the city's failure to assist their care providers in giving them the care and treatment they desperately need.'. . The District's own compliance monitor warned that class members are 'physical[ly] injur[ed]' because of the denial of health care services. The evidence shows that the District knew that its 'entire mental retardation and developmental disabilities system was fundamentally unable to deliver even the most basic services," Evans v. Williams, 139 F.Supp.2d at 97, but did not act to cure the problem. Under these facts, we conclude that the District had a custom or policy of deliberate indifference to the needs of the intellectually disabled, and that this policy caused the violation of Suggs's constitutional rights. Harvey has shown that Suggs's substantive due process rights were violated as a result of the District's custom of deliberate indifference. The District has failed to present evidence creating a triable issue of fact regarding its § 1983 liability. We therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to Harvey on his § 1983 claim against the District."); Perez v. Fenoglio, 792 F.3d 768, 780 (7th Cir. 2015) ("Perez's complaint alleges that Nurse Brooks 'told [him] that there was no doctor there therefore she couldn't stitch [his] wound and just wrapped [his] hand.' The question before us is thus whether this statement is sufficient to identify an unconstitutional policy or practice maintained by Wexford. In light of our duty to construe Perez's pro se complaint liberally, . . . and to draw all reasonable inferences in his favor, . . . we find that Perez sufficiently alleges that Wexford maintained a policy or practice that prevented nurses from stitching wounds or prescribing medication without a 'doctor there.' We further infer from his complaint the allegation that Wexford maintained a policy or practice of not having a full-time doctor stationed at the prison at all times (or on call to suture open wounds as necessary). Because these alleged policies are capable of causing delays in treatment—which could result in a constitutional deprivation, . . . the claim against Wexford should have been allowed to proceed."); B.S. v. Somerset County, 704 F.3d 250, 270-72, 274, 275 (3d Cir. 2013) ("Mother contends that the County violated her procedural due process rights by failing to afford her a prompt post-removal hearing after Daughter was removed from her custody on May 5, 2006, and through Eller's actions in meeting ex parte with Judge Cascio on June 23, 2006, and providing him with what Mother alleges is false information about her treatment of Daughter. She also argues that the County violated her substantive due process rights because Daughter's removal was based on Eller's 'concoct[ed] facts' and 'manipulate[ed] ... evidence.'. . .Even if Mathews's flexible standard permitted less process here than in a case where the state takes custody of a child—and that is a question on which we express no opinion at this time—that would not mean that no hearing was needed to address the deprivation effected by the removal of Daughter from Mother's custody. The deprivation of a parent's custodial relationship with a child is among the most drastic actions that a state can take against an individual's liberty interest, with profound ramifications for the integrity of the family unit and for each member of it. From the parent's perspective, there may be little meaningful difference between instances in which the state removes a child and takes her into state custody and those in which the state shifts custody from one parent to another, as occurred here. In either case, the government has implicated a fundamental liberty interest of the parent who loses custody. The state has caused a deprivation and risks having done so wrongly. . . . Therefore, assuming the 'fiscal and administrative burdens,'. . . of affording such parents a prompt post-removal hearing do not outweigh the need for one—and it is hard to imagine when they would—such a hearing ought to be held. . . . It is no adequate response to say, as the District Court did and as the County continues to argue, that Mother was given an opportunity to be heard because she filed a habeas petition on her own and received a hearing in connection with that. Some courthouse somewhere may be open to someone aggressive and knowledgeable enough to initiate legal action, but that does not meet the state's burden of providing an 'opportunity to be heard at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner' to a parent deprived of custody, . . . particularly when, as here, no notice was ever given as to how a hearing could be scheduled and the hearing occurred 40 days after Daughter's removal. . . Nor is it sufficient that Mother's custodial rights were eventually addressed after Eller's abuse investigation was concluded. The constitutional deprivation at issue at this point is Daughter's initial removal from Mother's home, so being heard much later, after the deprivation, fails to address the harm. . . . The only remaining question, then, is whether the County is accountable to Mother for whatever damages a jury finds she sustained as a result of that constitutional violation . . .With respect to municipalities such as the County, that inquiry turns on whether the due process violation was a result of the County's 'policy or custom, whether made by its lawmakers or by those whose edicts or acts may fairly be said to represent official policy.'. . . Although the record does not support a conclusion that the County has a formal policy against providing hearings for parents such as Mother, the evidence does demonstrate, as the County essentially admits in its briefing . . . that, amidst abuse allegations, the County has a custom of removing children from a parent's home without conducting a prompt post-removal hearing if another parent can take custody. . . . Thus, while the relevant policymaker is not readily apparent, . . . the evidence shows conclusively that, when a non-custodial parent is available to take a child, it is customary for the County to temporarily suspend the other parent's custody rights without a hearing, when abuse is suspected. That custom was utilized with official approbation in this case. And, because there is no question that what the County calls its 'Summary and Order procedure'. . . violated Mother's right to a prompt post-removal hearing, we conclude that the County is liable under § 1983 for whatever damages a jury may deem appropriate to redress that violation."); Hunter v. County Of Sacramento, 652 F.3d 1225, 1236 (9th Cir. 2011) ("We hold that the District Court prejudicially erred in refusing to instruct the jury that, for purposes of proving a Monell claim, a custom or practice can be supported by evidence of repeated constitutional violations which went uninvestigated and for which the errant municipal officers went unpunished. We therefore vacate the judgment and remand for a new trial."); Bass v. Pottawatomie County Public Safety Center, 425 F. App'x 713, ___ (10th Cir. 2011) ("Having carefully reviewed the trial testimony and other evidence in this case, and viewing all the evidence in Mr. Bass's favor, we conclude that the jury was presented with sufficient evidence to support reasonable inferences that: (1) the Jail maintained a policy and/or custom of permitting jailors to commingle unclassified, intoxicated detainees with unclassified, non-intoxicated detainees, and the Jail's policy and/or custom created a substantial risk that intoxicated detainees such as Mr. Bass would be seriously injured; (2) the Jail was aware of the substantial risk that intoxicated detainees such as Mr. Bass would be assaulted; (3) the Jail disregarded the risk by allowing jailors to inadequately supervise the drunk pod; and (4) the Jail's deficient supervision practices were a proximate cause of Mr. Bass's injuries."); Shepherd v. Dallas County, 591 F.3d 445, 453 (5th Cir. 2009) ("Shepherd's claim . . . does not implicate the acts or omissions of individuals but the jail's system of providing medical care to inmates with chronic illness. His original complaint contains the full theory of the case: The jail's evaluation, monitoring, and treatment of inmates with chronic illness was, at the time of Shepherd's stroke, grossly inadequate due to poor or non-existent procedures and understaffing of guards and medical personnel, and these deficiencies caused his injury. Shepherd relied on evidence showing that the inadequate treatment he received in a series of interactions with the jail's medical system inevitably led to his suffering a stroke. . . To demonstrate the existence of an unlawful condition, he presented extensive independent evidence on the jail's treatment of inmates with chronic illness. This evidence included a comprehensive evaluative report commissioned by the County, the DOJ report, affidavits from employees of the jail and its medical contractor attesting to the accuracy and applicability of the reports, and a plethora of additional documentary evidence. From this evidence, the court could reasonably infer a de facto jail policy of failing properly to treat inmates with chronic illness."); Okin v. Village of Cornwall-On-Hudson Police Dept., 577 F.3d 415, 439, 440 (2d Cir. 2009) ("Okin's claim of municipal liability, although focused on the Village's alleged failure-to train, is fairly construed to articulate a claim that the Village had a custom whereby it acquiesced in unconstitutional conduct by its officers. The record shows more than a dozen contacts between Okin and the Village, that involved a number of officers, including high-ranking officials like Sergeant Weber and Captain Williams, and that recurrently concerned complaints of domestic violence. These incidents suggest a consistent pattern of failing to adequately respond to Okin's complaints, to implement the New York mandatory arrest statute, to interview the alleged abuser, or to file domestic incident reports, a pattern which may have encouraged further violence. We therefore find sufficient evidence in the record to create a genuine issue of fact as to whether the officers' conduct indicates a practice, tacitly endorsed by the Village, that 'was so persistent or widespread' as to constitute 'a custom or usage with the force of law.'"); Williams v. DeKalb County, No. 07-14367, 2009 WL 1215961, at *6, *7 (11th Cir. May 6, 2009) (not published) ("Williams offered testimony from at least five members of the DeKalb County Police Department who had some knowledge of a homeless relocation policy. One officer testified that he had heard of the practice while he was still in the police academy. Another officer noted that he had heard from his superiors that officers needed to take homeless citizens 'somewhere' if officers could not think of a reason to arrest them. A third officer stated that it was 'common knowledge' that supervisors encouraged officers to relocate the homeless. A fourth officer admitted that officers actually did relocate the homeless. Finally, a supervisory officer testified that relocation was 'done all the time' and had been going on for twenty years. Despite the fact that none of the officers could name any specific officer who had relocated a homeless person, and none of the five admitted to having done it himself, we think their testimony is enough from which a jury could find that the County had a policy of involuntarily relocating homeless citizens. While the circumstantial nature of the officers' testimony may lead a jury to conclude that Williams has not sufficiently proved a policy existed, that is the jury's decision to make. . . . In addition to the evidence about what happened to him, Williams presented an expert in police policy and procedure who testified in deposition that a homeless relocation policy would make constitutional violations like the ones Williams sustained 'very definitely foreseeable.' The expert's report also concluded that '[m]ore likely than not, if the custom and practice of DeKalb County of taking homeless and other undesirables and transporting them over the county line to other jurisdictions did not exist, the false arrest and injuries sustained by Mr. Williams would not have occurred.' We cannot agree with the district court's conclusion that there was 'no evidence' that homeless people were harmed as a result of the alleged relocation policy. Williams' own injuries and his expert's opinion may not be overwhelming evidence that the alleged policy was the 'moving force' behind the violation of his constitutional rights, but they are sufficient evidence of a 'causal link' between the policy and the injuries to get the case to a jury."); Gregory v. City of Louisville, 444 F.3d 725, 754, 755, 757 (6th Cir. 2006) ("Plaintiff also alleges that the City had a custom of using overly suggestive show-ups and that the City failed to train its officers in proper identification techniques. The district court dismissed this claim, finding that Plaintiff had failed to make a showing of other complaints about the City's use of show-ups. In so holding, the district court overlooked both facts in this case and a significant prong of this Court's jurisprudence. First, Plaintiff need not present evidence of a pattern of complaints consistent with his own if he presents evidence of a written policy unconstitutional on its face. . . The facts of this case show that the City's written line-up 'waiver' form is direct evidence of a custom or practice, obviating the need for circumstantial evidence a court might otherwise seek. . . Second, Plaintiff need not present evidence of other complaints if he can show that the City failed to train its officers in proper identification techniques, and that such failure to train had the 'obvious consequences' of leading to constitutional violations of the sort experienced by Plaintiff. . . . The remaining question for this Court is whether the evidence, when viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, is such that a reasonable jury could conclude that the City had a custom or practice of using show-ups without consideration of the circumstances, and that pursuant to this custom, Tarter employed a show-up with Plaintiff without consideration of Plaintiff's due process rights. Plaintiff puts forth evidence that the City had a custom of using show-ups in lieu of line-ups in non-exigent circumstances. Plaintiff's evidence includes affidavits from two police practice experts who opined that there existed systematic deficiencies in police officer training; that supervising LDP officers found it 'perfectly acceptable' to conduct non-exigent show-ups days after a crime if an officer could get a suspect to sign a 'waiver;' and that it was established practice to ask suspects in for a line-up, fail to take affirmative actions to constitute a line-up, and request consent to a show-up. . . Plaintiff presents further evidence that using such show-ups was expressly approved through the existence of pre-printed waiver forms. . . Such forms are evidence of established practice. . . Given this evidence, we cannot say that a reasonable jury could not conclude that the City had a custom or practice of conducting show-ups without consideration of the constitutional implications of such show-ups, and thus that the City was 'deliberately indifferent' to the due process rights of its citizens. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to the City."); Baron v. Suffolk County Sheriff's Dep't, 402 F.3d 225, 239 (1st Cir. 2005) ("This is not a case, then, of attributing liability to the municipality based on a single incident of isolated employee conduct. Rather, the record demonstrates a pattern of ongoing harassment that the jury could have found high-ranking Department officials were aware of and did not stop. . . .The Department was therefore not entitled to judgment as a matter of law or a new trial on the basis of insufficient evidence of the code of silence."); Monistere v. City of Memphis, 115 F. App'x 845, 2004 WL 2913348, at *4 (6th Cir. Dec. 17, 2004) (City's practice of allowing its police investigators to conduct administrative investigations into complaints against its police officers without any defined parameters was a 'custom' that had the 'force of law' for purpose of establishing city's liability under § 1983 for investigator's conduct in ordering strip search of two officers, in response to a motorist's complaint that officers stole from him during a traffic stop"); Cash v. Hamilton County Dept. of Adult Probation, 388 F.3d 539, 543, 544 (6th Cir. 2004) ("Contrary to the declaration of the district court that the supervising police officers' testimony was 'undisputed,' the plaintiffs presented substantial evidence suggesting that the City [of Cincinnati] and County had a custom and practice of hauling to the dump all unattended property found at the sites in question. . . . Smith [Field Supervisor for the Hamilton County Adult Probation Department] testified that the standard cleanup procedure was that a Cincinnati police officer would direct the probationers to put all of the items in bags and then place the bags into a sanitation truck. In direct opposition to the testimony that the district court relied upon, Smith testified that he never observed a Cincinnati police officer segregating any of the items and saying that some should be saved. Smith stated that the items are all 'hauled off to the trash, to the dump.' Testimony from Cincinnati Police Officer Thomas J. Branigan also supports the plaintiffs' contention that the City had a custom of destroying homeless individuals' property without notice or the right to reclaim the items taken. . . . [A] genuine issue of material fact exists as to whether the property of homeless persons like the plaintiffs was being discarded as part of the City's official policy. The district court therefore erred in granting summary judgment to the City and County on the basis that the relevant testimony was uncontested. A genuine issue of material fact also exists over whether adequate notice was provided to homeless individuals like the plaintiffs. The established precedent is that individuals whose property interests are at stake are entitled to a 'notice and opportunity to be heard.'. . The key inquiry in such circumstances is whether the notice is 'reasonably calculated, in all the circumstances, to appraise interested parties of the pendency of the action and afford them an opportunity to present their objections.' . . The City submits that it published a notice in the local newspaper, which was available for anyone in the Cincinnati area to pick up and read. By contrast, the plaintiffs contend that such a notice is per se insufficient, particularly when the educational and financial restraints of the homeless community are considered. This is an issue for the district court to resolve on remand."); Alkire v. Irving, 330 F.3d 802, 815 (6th Cir. 2003) ("Alkire asserts that, after the new Holmes County jail opened in 1994, Sheriff Zimmerly established a policy of detaining persons who could not post immediate bail until their initial appearance, because they now had adequate jail space. The record also reflects that, as a matter of course or custom, because the Holmes County Court is a part-time court, the first- available court date was often not until Tuesday mornings; court was never held on weekends or holidays. . . . Thus, the record reflects that, after 1994, any warrantless arrest from late afternoon Friday through Sunday morning, where the defendant did not post bond, would very likely run afoul of the forty-eight hour time limit established in Riverside. These policies or customs of the Holmes County Jail are the very sort of 'policy or custom' referred to by Monell. It is not necessary that Holmes County officially endorsed these policies or customs through legislative action for it to carry its imprimatur."); In the Matter of Foust v. McNeill, 310 F.3d 849, 862 (5th Cir. 2002) ("Thigpen and McNeill testified that the sheriff's office routinely seized a debtor's entire premises to secure personal property and fixtures. Neither the bankruptcy court nor the district court mentioned this testimony, and the defendants do not address it. If the department repeatedly went beyond the scope of the writs to seize real property, its policy may have violated the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. The department was deliberately indifferent to those results, i.e., the seizure of the real property and exceeding the scope of the writ, even if unaware of the unlawfulness of the actions. The Fousts have created a fact question about whether the department's policy of seizing the premises violated the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments, so this portion of the district court opinion is reversed."); Daskalea v. District of Columbia, 227 F.3d 433, 442, 443 (D.C. Cir. 2000) ("[A] 'paper' policy [against sexual harassment] cannot insulate a municipality from liability where there is evidence, as there was here, that the municipality was deliberately indifferent to the policy's violation. . . That evidence included not only the continued blatant violation of the policy, but also the fact that the policy was never posted, that some guards did not recall receiving it, that inmates never received it, and that there was no evidence of the training that was supposed to accompany it."); Stauch v. City of Columbia Heights, 212 F.3d 425, 432 (8th Cir. 2000) ("The City argues that the Stauches cannot prove that a municipal policy or custom caused their injury. Specifically, it asserts that the Stauches' allegation that city officials failed to follow the procedures set forth in the Code for license renewal is tantamount to saying that the officials acted contrary to City policy. We disagree. The City argued at trial and in its brief on appeal that the Stauches could not claim a protected property interest in license renewal because they knew that the City's practice was to require property to pass inspection prior to renewal. . .The City cannot simultaneously argue that it required a property to pass inspection prior to license renewal but yet characterize the actions of its officials in implementing this requirement as being 'contrary to City policy.'"); Blair v. City of Pomona, 223 F.3d 1074, 1080, 1081 (9th Cir. 2000) (as amended) ("Th[e] evidence, if believed by the jury, would be sufficient to establish that the Department had the custom of chastising whistleblowers. It would also be sufficient to establish that the Department had failed to train its members not to retaliate against whistleblowers and/or that the Department had failed to discipline those members of the Department who retaliated against whistleblowers. It would be open to the jury to conclude that one or more of these customs or policies was made by those in charge of the Department who were aware of the police code of silence; that the custom or policy amounted to at least deliberate indifference to Blair's right to speak; and that the policy was the moving force resulting in the constitutional deprivation suffered by Blair. . . . The evidence presented to the district court, if believed at trial, and the inferences if drawn by the jury, would justify the conclusion that the Department had a custom, approved by its policy-makers, of at the very least deliberate indifference to the right of a member of the Department to report to a superior the misconduct of a fellow officer. The seriousness of such a custom and the need of a civil rights remedy for it is underlined by what has been observed around the country as to the code of silence in police departments."); Sharp v. City of Houston, 164 F.3d 923, 935 (5th Cir. 1999) ("Sharp relies on retaliations for violations of the 'code of silence' as the city's custom and practice. She presented ample evidence that a code of silence exists. . . . Furthermore, the code can be perpetuated only if there is retaliation for violations of it. The jury instructions, to which the city did not object, included retaliation as part of what defines a code of silence. The city argues that it does not condone the code of silence and has taken actions to discourage it. Based on the evidence presented at trial, however, the jury could have decided that the HPD tolerated and even fostered an attitude of fierce loyalty and protectiveness within its ranks, to the point that officers refused to address or report each others' misconduct. A jury further could conclude that the city's steps to eliminate the code were merely cosmetic or came too slowly and too late to rebut tacit encouragement. The jury could have surmised that Sharp's co-workers and supervisors enforced this HPD-wide 'code of silence' by retaliatory acts. As we have noted, any officer who violated the code would suffer such a pattern of social ostracism and professional disapprobation that he or she likely would sacrifice a career in HPD. . . . Furthermore, the failure of Sharp's supervisors all the way up the chain of command, including Nuchia, to take any real action when made aware of the retaliation supports a conclusion by the jury that the HPD had a policy, custom, or practice of enforcing the code of silence."); Ware v. Jackson County, 150 F.3d 873, 886 (8th Cir. 1998) ("The jury was entitled to infer that a pattern of unconstitutional conduct existed from the evidence of CO Toomer's sexual misconduct, which spanned five months and involved extortion, deception, and repeated sexual acts with an inmate of limited mental capacity, culminating in the rape of Ware. The pattern is also evidenced by the Stone, White, and Jackson incidents. That there was a gap of three years between CO Toomer's misconduct and that of other officers does not amount to a series of isolated incidents so far apart in time that CO Toomer's misconduct may be considered a single act upon which custom or usage cannot be based."); McNabola v. Chicago Transit Authority, 10 F.3d 501, 510-11 (7th Cir. 1993) (jury could reasonably conclude that "the CTA had a custom or policy of terminating white per diems" and replacing them with African-Americans); Gentile v. County of Suffolk, 926 F.2d 142, 152 & n. 5, 153 (2d Cir. 1991) (malicious prosecution causally linked to County's long history of negligent disciplinary practices and cover-ups as to law enforcement personnel); Bordanaro v. McLeod, 871 F.2d 1151, 1155-58 (1st Cir. 1989) (City police department had longstanding, wide-spread, unconstitutional practice of breaking down doors without a warrant when arresting a felon); Watson v. City of Kansas City, Kansas, 857 F.2d 690, 695-96 (10th Cir. 1988) (reversing grant of summary judgment in favor of City where plaintiff alleged policy or custom of affording less protection to victims of domestic violence than to victims of nondomestic attacks); Jones v. City of Chicago, 856 F.2d 985, 995-96 (7th Cir. 1988) (custom of keeping "street files" was department wide and long standing, entitling jury "to conclude that it had been consciously approved at the highest policymaking level for decisions involving the police department...").

See also Rettew v. Cassia County, No. 1:20-CV-00386-BLW, 2022 WL 623206, at *14 (D. Idaho Mar. 3, 2022) ("Plaintiffs have . . . submitted evidence that a 'culture' or 'unwritten rule' existed in the jail discouraging jail staff from calling 'medical too often because they didn't want to pay overtime or not call the ambulance if you don't have to be of not wanting—the county not wanting to pay the bill.'. . Viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to Plaintiff, a jury could conclude that this 'culture' or 'unwritten rule' of discouraging the deputies from calling for medical assistance after hours, coupled with the official policy of only maintaining on-site medical staff from 8:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m., Monday through Friday, effectively foreclosed the inmates' ability to make their medical needs known to the medical staff, and this amounted to deliberate indifference. . . A jury could further find that this alleged custom or practice of not summoning medical assistance after hours, which resulted in effectively denying inmates access to medical care, was a substantial factor in causing Rettew's death. Plaintiffs therefore may proceed on their Monell claims against the Counties on this theory."); Alsaada v. City of Columbus, 536 F.Supp.3d 216, ___ (S.D. Ohio 2021) ("In the present case, Plaintiffs allege that the City has an unwritten policy, practice, or custom of condoning the use of excessive force against some protestors, such as those protesting police violence. They argue specifically that the use of excessive force and the quelling of speech by police during peaceful protests demonstrated Defendants' deliberate indifference in the policies, training, supervision, and discipline needed to prevent officers and mutual-aid law enforcement personnel from violating constitutional rights. This alleged failure to investigate or discipline, or to make any meaningful policy reforms, suggests a conscious choice to allow the pattern of alleged conduct to continue. Plaintiffs also allege that Defendants' custom of acquiescence was the cause of their injuries. The Sixth Circuit has held that a municipality's failure to act in the face of obvious constitutional violations is properly treated as the cause of subsequent, similar violations. . . Defendants state that Plaintiffs have failed to provide any evidence of a pattern or practice of CPD using excessive force on nonviolent protestors or retaliating against them on the basis of their speech and assembly. As a legal matter, Defendants concede that a failure to discipline or investigate can demonstrate a municipal policy or custom 'if the plaintiff can show that the municipality historically failed to investigate or discipline similar conduct such that the municipality's inaction represents an unofficial custom or tolerance.'. . But Defendants assert that Plaintiffs' claim still is insufficient because, per Sherrod v. Williams, 'an after-the-fact approval of an officer's conduct cannot logically be the moving force behind the constitutional violation.'. . Accepting Plaintiffs' allegations as true, it is at least plausible that CPD's alleged failure to act on city officials' knowledge of potential constitutional violations over the course of several days of protests was the 'moving force' behind subsequent violations of the same type. Therefore, in addition to the 'ratification' theory of liability, Plaintiffs have also adequately pled all four elements of the 'inaction theory' of municipal liability under Monell. Thus, even though the mayor and then-Chief Quinlan admitted officers' video-recorded conduct was improper, there have been zero reports by officers of excessive force by others during the protests, zero disciplinary actions or criminal charges for excessive force, and zero efforts to relieve violent officers from duty or remove them from special response teams. . .The video and testimonial evidence presented by Plaintiffs suggests that police have used physical violence, tear gas, and pepper spray against peaceful protestors without provocation, and city officials have done nothing or not enough to condemn and correct these actions. This evidence leads to the inference that Plaintiffs have a likelihood of success in establishing that unconstitutional conduct by police was carried out pursuant to an official policy or custom."); Savory v. Cannon, No. 17 C 204, 2021 WL 1209129, at *8-9 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 31, 2021) ("To bring about Monell liability under a 'widespread practice or custom' theory, a municipality's employees' conduct must occur frequently enough to give rise to a reasonable inference that the municipality is 'aware that public employees engage in the practice and do so with impunity.'. . Although there are no 'bright-line rules' concerning how often the offending conduct must occur to rise to the level of a custom, 'there must be some evidence demonstrating that there is a policy at issue rather than a random event or even a short series of random events.'. . Contrary to Defendants' submission, . . . Savory has alleged facts giving rise to a reasonable inference that the alleged constitutional violations were not isolated occurrences or random events. The complaint alleges in detail that the City looked the other way in the face of an entrenched pattern of unconstitutional conduct. . . . And the complaint identifies several criminal defendants who allegedly were subject to misconduct at the hands of Peoria police officers similar to the misconduct alleged by Savory. . . Those allegations are enough to survive a motion to dismiss."); Sampson v. Fresno Police Officers, No. 120CV00322DADSAB, 2021 WL 1060506, at *9 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 19, 2021) ("Here, through incorporation, plaintiff's complaint points to multiple incidents suggesting the existence of a custom or practice of denying police protection to abused women because of animus toward their gender or domestic situations. . . Plaintiff alleges that as far back as 2008, the FPD has denied female domestic abuse victims full police protection. . . Plaintiff has also provided in his complaint multiple examples in which FPD officers failed to follow simple protocol while carrying out a domestic violence investigation. For example, according to the allegations of plaintiff's complaint, FPD officers failed to properly conduct investigatory interviews, interviewing the male abuser before speaking with the female abuse victim. . . Plaintiff also alleges FPD officers engaged in a practice of failing to document signs of abuse, such as refusing to photograph injuries suffered by female victims or treating such injuries as having been self-inflicted. . . These instances, coupled with plaintiff's allegations that defendant officers made misogynistic comments to and about the decedent, are a sufficient basis, if proven, upon which to reasonably infer the FPD had a custom or practice of denying female domestic violence victims equal police protection because of animus toward their gender. That is all that is required. Accordingly, defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiff's Monell claim will be denied."); Carter v. City of Montgomery, 473 F.Supp.3d 1273, 1298-99 (M.D. Ala. 2020) ("In this Circuit, private entities 'acting in the place of a municipality' in carrying out a traditional government function are subject to liability on the same basis as municipalities. . . . Mr. Carter has produced enough evidence to find that JCS [Judicial Correction Services, Inc.] had an established custom of asking the Municipal Court to revoke probation when it knew that a probationer had not willfully failed to pay fines and fees. To demonstrate a custom, Mr. Carter must point to a 'permanent and well settled' course of behavior. . . Courts in this Circuit routinely reject attempts to find customs in isolated incidents. . . But they have also found customs based on as few as three occurrences. . . In determining whether a custom exists, the Court also looks to the time frame over which the incidents occurred. . . And it looks to how similar the incidents are to one another. . . Mr. Carter points to a widespread pattern of unlawful incarceration. The record indicates that JCS asked the Municipal Court to revoke hundreds of probations, . . . and that the Municipal Court incarcerated offenders without assessing their ability to pay on 'many occasions[.] . . And a jury could find that JCS filed revocation petitions when it had reason to believe that probationers could not make their payments because JCS kept records of probationers' employment or lack thereof. . . Those records included a log of when probationers received retirement and disability benefits. . .. More than 200 probationers whom JCS knew to be unemployed, disabled, or receiving Supplemental Security Income benefits served jail time after the Municipal Court revoked their probation. . . These hundreds of revocations followed the same pattern and occurred over less than four years. This case centers around a systemic practice in Montgomery: the unlawful incarceration of indigent defendants for failing to pay traffic fines. In filing revocation petitions, JCS fed the system. If among a single city's probationers 217 instances of a practice over less than four years would not allow a jury to find that a custom exists, the Court cannot imagine what would. A jury could find an established custom on this record."); D.C. by Cabelka v. County of San Diego, No. 18-CV-13-WQH-MSB, 2020 WL 1674583, at *14 (S.D. Cal. Apr. 6, 2020) ("The alleged violations of the Adoption Act occurred over multiple years, and Plaintiffs allege that multiple County employees lied and failed to provide information to Cabelka about D.G.'s history and background. 'It is difficult to discern from the caselaw the quantum of allegations needed to survive a motion to dismiss a pattern and practice claim.'. . However, 'where more than a few incidents are alleged, the determination appears to require a fully-developed factual record.'. . The Court can infer from Plaintiffs' allegations that the County had a policy or custom that caused the alleged violations of the Adoption Act. . . The Court concludes that Cabelka has stated a claim against the County under § 1983 at this stage in the proceedings for violations of her federal rights under the Adoption Act."); Nasir v. Town of Foxborough, No. 19-CV-11196-DJC, 2020 WL 1027780, at *4-5 (D. Mass. Mar. 3, 2020) ("Like in Bordanaro, it is difficult to imagine these facts—a civilian knowing to request certain police action, requesting this action, the police documenting this request, advising the civilian on how to proceed the following day with the request to effectuate this action, then different officers, the following day, effectuating this action, all using common terminology—absent a custom in Foxborough of that practice. Accordingly, the Nasirs have plausibly alleged that Foxborough has a custom of effectuating civil standbys. The Nasirs do not contend, however, that the custom or policy of effectuating a civil standby is facially unconstitutional. . . .When the alleged municipal policy itself is not unconstitutional, the causal and fault elements for municipal liability require 'significantly more.'. . . Specifically, parties premising municipal liability on a facially constitutional custom or policy must plead facts that the 'policy maker was at least deliberately indifferent to the possibility that the policy in question would lead to a deprivation of a federally-protected right.'. . . [T]he Nasirs have pled no facts suggesting that any policy maker was deliberately indifferent to the possibility that the practice of effectuating civil standbys might lead to a deprivation of federally protected rights. Unlike in Howie, the Nasirs have not pled that any policy maker was aware of any instance of misconduct related to civil standbys. Nor have the Nasirs alleged any other facts indicative of Foxborough's knowledge of a risk of potential violations of constitutional rights of persons in such circumstances, and its subsequent failure to undertake any actions that may mitigate such a risk. As such, the Nasirs have not pled facts sufficient to satisfy the causation and fault requirements of Section 1983 municipal liability claims."); Vann v. City of Rochester, No. 6:18-CV-06464(MAT), 2019 WL 1331572, at *9 (W.D.N.Y. Mar. 25, 2019) ("The Court finds that Vann has affirmatively alleged the existence of a longstanding RPD policy or practice of filing false charges and testifying falsely against arrestees that, while not officially memorialized, is sufficiently widespread that it fairly can be said to represent official RPD policy. In particular, the Amended Complaint alleges that Sheppard, the former chief of the RPD, has admitted in sworn testimony that the RPD has a policy pursuant to which RPD officers are instructed to issue dispersal orders to individuals lawfully present on public sidewalks and, if the individuals fail to display the proper degree of deference or subservience, to arrest them on trumped-up 'cover charges' such as disorderly conduct, trespass, obstruction of governmental administration, and harassment. . .The Court offers no opinion on the likelihood that Vann will be able to prove this allegation at trial; however, at this motion to dismiss stage, the Court is required to accept it as true. Moreover, Vann has set. . . forth allegations concerning multiple specific instances wherein this policy, practice, or custom was employed by RPD officers in performing their policing duties. . . Accordingly, the Court finds that dismissal is not warranted on this claim."); Doe on behalf of B.G. v. Boston Public Schools, No. 17-CV-11653-ADB, 2019 WL 1005498, at *8–9 (D. Mass. Mar. 1, 2019) ("There are two requirements to prove a Section 1983 claim based on a municipal custom. First, the custom 'must be attributable to the municipality' such that it is 'so well settled and widespread that the policymaking officials of the municipality can be said to have either actual or constructive knowledge of it yet did nothing to end the practice.'. . 'Second, the custom must have been the cause of and "the moving force behind" the constitutional violation.'. . Evidence of a single incident of a constitutional deprivation 'is insufficient, in and of itself, to establish a municipal "custom or usage" within the meaning of Monell.'. . Evidence of 'multiple incidents of misconduct' that suggest a 'systemic pattern of activity,' however, may support an inference of a municipal custom. . . Moreover, a municipality's failure to train its employees can be an actionable custom under Section 1983. . . Here, Plaintiffs claim that school officials had a custom of discouraging and delaying the filing of 51A Reports about sexual assaults committed by students. . . Plaintiffs allege multiple incidents of sexual assault committed by students, including sexual assaults committed by A.J. on ten classmates, that spanned over three school years. . . In addition, a liberal reading of the Amended Complaint reveals that school staff learned of many sexual assaults committed by A.J. and were required to file 51A Reports to DCF in connection with them, but as a result of the school custom, only one 51A Report was ever filed and, in retaliation for filing that Report, a school teacher was fired. . . Further, Plaintiffs allege that there was a municipal custom of inadequate training of school staff on the proper filing of 51A Reports. . . Plaintiffs claim that these customs were the moving force behind the violation of B.G.'s and A.R.'s constitutional right to bodily integrity. . .The existence of a municipal custom that discouraged the filing of 51A Reports is a reasonable inference to be drawn from Plaintiffs' allegations of a systematic pattern of school staff failing to submit 51A Reports to DCF following multiple sexual assaults. Given that no 51A Reports were filed in connection with known sexual assaults by A.J. on nine children other than B.G., the Court can also infer that school staff were insufficiently trained on the filing of such Reports and that this training inadequacy amounted to deliberate indifference in light of A.J.'s known pattern of sexual assaults. The Amended Complaint could be more fulsome with respect to the alleged municipal customs, and Plaintiffs will have to overcome significant issues of proof if they are to prevail at trial. Nonetheless, the Court finds that, at this stage, Plaintiffs have adequately pleaded municipal liability for violations of B.G.'s and A.R.'s right to bodily integrity based on the role that municipal customs allegedly played in the constitutional violations, and they are entitled to discover and present evidence on Count II. The Municipal Defendants' motion to dismiss Count II is denied."); Lynch v. City of New York, No. 17CV7577, 2018 WL 4660371, at *6-8 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 28, 2018) ("Plaintiffs sufficiently plead that DOC has a practice of forcing detainees who have already paid bail to remain detained until a critical mass forms such that their releases may be approved and processed in one fell swoop. According to Plaintiffs, there is no justification for this practice aside from convenience. At this stage of the litigation and especially given the primacy of the right to be free from bodily restraint, Plaintiffs plausibly allege that the City acted with deliberate indifference based on its purported knowledge from the CCI Report that its deficiencies in bail processing and release could result in unnecessary over-detentions of pre-trial detainees. . . . .A municipal policy or custom may be demonstrated by '(1) a formal policy officially endorsed by the municipality; (2) actions or decisions made by municipal officials with decision-making authority; (3) a practice so persistent and widespread that it constitutes a custom of which policymakers must have been aware; or (4) a failure by policymakers to properly train or supervise their subordinates, such that the policymakers exercised deliberate indifference to the rights of the plaintiff and others encountering those subordinates.'. . Plaintiffs offer the latter two as independent bases for municipal liability. But the Complaint, taken as true, sufficiently alleges municipal liability based on the City's widespread practices of immediately transporting detainees to DOC facilities to begin an intake process during which they are categorically ineligible for release and continuing to detain those who have paid bail so that releases may be approved and processed in the aggregate. . . Drawing all inferences in favor of Plaintiffs, the Complaint alleges more than mere over-detentions isolated to the named Plaintiffs, but that the City's systemic practices are 'so manifest as to imply the constructive acquiescence of [DOC's] policy-making officials.'"); Watson v. City of Kingston, No. 115CV1356BKSDEP, 2018 WL 4509488, at *6–7 (N.D.N.Y. Sept. 19, 2018) ("Here, Plaintiff has presented evidence that, in addition to the incident at issue in this case, Kingston police officers have twice subjected him to excessive force, once in 1995 when Kingston police officers hit him during an arrest and he was attacked by a police dog, and again on July 29, 2012, when he Kingston police officers choked him and wrestled him to the ground during an arrest 'for obstructing governmental administration.'. . These three instances, however, are insufficient to show 'a practice that is "so persistent or widespread" as to justify the imposition of municipal policy.' Giaccio v. City of New York, 308 F. App'x 470, 472 (2d Cir. 2009) (finding the plaintiff's identification of 'four examples where the defendants might have disclosed positive drug test results' was insufficient to show a persistent or widespread practice); see also Jones v. Town of E. Haven, 691 F.3d 72, 85 (2d Cir. 2012) (finding that where the 'Plaintiff's evidence showed two instances, or at the most three, over a period of several years in which a small number of officers' engaged in unconstitutional conduct, "and one incident in which an officer indicated a disposition" to do so, the "evidence fell far short of showing a policy, custom, or usage of officers engage in the alleged unconstitutional conduct" and far short of showing abusive conduct among officers so persistent that it must have been known to supervisory authorities'). Plaintiff also asserts that there are seven cases of 'excessive force/false arrest filed against' Defendants City of Kingston and Kingston Police Department which evidence of the pattern or practice of excessive force during arrests. . . Three of these cases, however, post-date his October 2012 arrest in this case, and therefore do not evidence a custom or policy in October 2012 of which supervisory authorities must have been aware. . . One of the cases cited by Plaintiff, Clayton v. City of Kingston, 44 F Supp. 2d 177 (2d Cir. 1999), did not involve a claim of excessive force or false arrest. Without evidence of the facts underlying the remaining three cases, whether Defendants investigated them, or how they were resolved, they fail to raise a question regarding a municipal policy or custom under Monell. See Outlaw v. City of Hartford, 884 F.3d 351, 379–80 (2d Cir. 2018) ('The lists of the lawsuits filed and the claims sent to the City's insurer might have led to evidence from which an inference of deliberate indifference to excessive force could properly be drawn, but as noted by the district court, there was no evidence as to the facts underlying those claims or how thoroughly they were investigated by the City. The simple fact that claims were made and that some of them were settled would not permit an inference that the City was deliberately indifferent in the supervision of HPD officers with respect to the use of excessive force.'). . . Accordingly, Defendants' motion for summary judgment with respect to the Monell excessive force claim is granted."); Parada v. Anoka County, No. CV 18-795 (JRT/TNL), 2018 WL 3621210, at *6-9 (D. Minn. July 30, 2018) ("Parada alleges that Coon Rapids has a policy or custom of arresting Hispanic drivers for misdemeanor traffic offenses and that its policy of refusing to accept the Matrícular Card is pretext for arresting aliens to detain them for immigration authorities. . . Parada alleges that Oman arrested her pursuant to this policy, even though Oman did not witness her driving without a license. . . Indeed, Oman told Parada that his 'supervisor told him to bring her in to get her prints' to identify her, which suggests that both Oman and his supervisor were acting pursuant to a policy to (1) disregard the Matrícular Card and (2) arrest Hispanic individuals to detain them for immigration authorities. . . This inference is supported by allegations that the Defendants waited to take her prints until after they had spoken with ICE agents. The alleged policy caused Oman to overstep the boundaries of Minnesota law and, possibly, the protections of the Fourth Amendment. The Court concludes that Parada states

a Monell claim against Coon Rapids based on (1) the prolonging of the traffic stop and (2) Oman's absence during the commission of the crime. Accordingly, the Court will deny the Coon Rapids Defendants' Motion to Dismiss with respect to the Fourth Amendment claims arising from Parada's initial arrest. . . . The Court must decide whether Parada can maintain a Monell claim against Coon Rapids based on her Fourth Amendment claim. As discussed above, Parada alleges that Coon Rapids has an unwritten policy of 'arresting Hispanic motorists for pre-textual reasons to place them in immigration custody' and has deliberately failed to train its officers on individuals' Fourth Amendment rights. . . This policy of arresting and detaining Hispanic individuals solely for immigration purposes led to Parada's continued detention. Because Coon Rapids has a policy of detaining Hispanic individuals based on their perceived immigration status, the Court concludes that Parada states a Monell claim against Coon Rapids. Accordingly, the Court will deny the Coon Rapids Defendants' Motion to Dismiss with respect to the Fourth Amendment claims arising from Parada's continued detention. . . . Parada alleges that Coon Rapids has a custom or policy of selectively enforcing traffic laws against Hispanic individuals. . . As described above, Parada's allegations surrounding Oman's conduct support a reasonable inference that Coon Rapids officers – as a matter of policy – refuse to accept the Martrícular Card to arrest and detain Hispanic individuals for immigration authorities. Because Parada states an equal-protection claim arising from selective enforcement, the Court concludes that Parada states a Monell claim against Coon Rapids. Accordingly, the Court will deny the Coon Rapids Defendants' Motion to Dismiss with respect to Parada's equal-protection claim."); Alcorn v. City of Chicago, No. 17 C 5859, 2018 WL 3614010, at *15, *17 (N.D. Ill. July 27, 2018) ("Plaintiff brings each of the Monell claims in Counts II, VI, and VIII under both an 'express policy' and a 'widespread practice' theory of liability. There are two varieties of 'express policy' claims under Monell. The first applies, 'as the name suggests, where a policy explicitly violates a constitutional right when enforced.'. . To prevail on this first variation, Plaintiff must identify specific language in the policy that explicitly violates a person's constitutional rights. . . 'Under this type of claim, one application of the offensive policy resulting in a constitutional violation is sufficient to establish municipal liability.'. . The second variation of an 'express policy' claim applies where the plaintiff 'object[s] to omissions in the policy,' i.e., that the policy fails to address certain issues. . . Such claims 'require more evidence than a single incident to establish liability.'. .To prevail on a 'widespread practices' claim, Plaintiff must show that the City engaged in a practice 'so permanent and well settled as to constitute a custom or usage with the force of law.'. . Like the second variation of 'express policy' theory, a 'widespread practice' is 'not tethered to a particular written policy' and 'requires more evidence than a single incident to establish liability.'. . Plaintiff must provide 'evidence that there is a true municipal policy at issue, not a random event.'. . The Seventh Circuit has declined to adopt bright-line rules defining a 'widespread practice', recognizing that 'there is no clear consensus as to how frequently such conduct must occur to impose Monell liability, except that it must be more than one instance ... or even three.'. . . To successfully plead a 'widespread practice' claim, Plaintiff must allege facts showing that at least more than one instance of the alleged conduct occurred to establish that a practice in fact exists and that Lumar's allegedly unconstitutional arrest was not merely a random event. . . Plaintiff may rely on incidents relating only to him, see White v. City of Chicago, 829 F.3d 837, 844 (7th Cir. 2016), but he still must allege multiple such incidents such that the Court can draw the reasonable inference that the alleged practice was 'so permanent and well settled' as to constitute custom with the force of law. Plaintiff fails to identify a single other instance in which CPD arrested him or any other detainee at Cook County Jail without probable cause. Additionally, Plaintiff provides no details about the 'records' that allegedly reveal such a widespread practice, for example, what the records report or even what kind of records they are. Without more, Plaintiff's statement about what the records purportedly show is merely conclusory and an insufficient basis for the 'widespread policy' claim. . . The Complaint contains no other allegations that would support the existence of the alleged 'widespread practice.'"); Rodriguez v. City of Chicago, No. 17 CV 7248, 2018 WL 3474538, at *2 (N.D. Ill. July 19, 2018) ("According to the complaint, Defendant Officers' refusal to investigate Rodriguez's complaint and pursuit of an investigation against her instead stem from a 'code of silence' that requires Chicago Police Officers to remain silent about police misconduct. The code of silence is a de facto policy, practice, or custom of concealing officer misconduct, which includes failing to investigate misconduct and fabricating evidence against the complaining individual. The City allegedly also has a de facto policy, practice, or custom of investigating complaints against off-duty officers differently than complaints against other people. These policies caused Rodriguez's injuries because they motivated Defendant Officers to engage in wrongful acts against her."); Hernandez v. Colon, No. 3:16-CV-30089-KAR, 2018 WL 2422008, at *19 (D. Mass. May 25, 2018) ("There is no dispute that the City did not have a written policy on shut-off procedure and did not offer training. 'When a plaintiff points to no specific unconstitutional policy ... as is the case here, a claim of municipal liability must be grounded in a custom as evidenced by widespread action or inaction by public officials.'. . 'The First Circuit has explained the difference between official policy and unofficial custom: "[u]nlike a 'policy,' which comes into existence because of the top-down affirmative decision of a policymaker, a custom develops from the bottom-up.'. . Morales, who had participated in 'numerous' shut-offs, explained the department's practice or custom in the event occupants of a residence refused to open the door to permit the utility personnel and the police to enter to terminate the services by stating that '[t]here is not much you can do if they refuse. If they don't open the door, we just leave'. . . . This practice meets the definition of a 'custom' and Plaintiff does not argue to the contrary. It is a custom that is not violative of residents' Fourth Amendment rights. Plaintiff has not established a ' "direct causal link"' between the City's custom when participating in utility shut-offs and the deprivation of her constitutional right. . . If Morales had followed the standard practice, he would not have entered. The fact that Morales did not follow this practice does not make the City liable. '[A] "single incident" of misconduct, without other evidence, cannot provide the basis for municipal liability under § 1983. Such a result would be the equivalent of imposing respondeat superior liability upon the municipality.'. . Plaintiff has not established the City's liability for any § 1983 claim."); Stevenson v. City of Chicago, No. 17 CV 4839, 2018 WL 1784142, at *8 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 13, 2018) ("Here, Plaintiffs allege that the City of Chicago had a formal policy or an informal but widespread custom or practice of covering up police misconduct and excessive force. With regard to the formal policy, Plaintiffs do not cite, quote, or otherwise identify any official City or CPD policies that allegedly caused their constitutional violation. As for Plaintiffs' allegations that the City has a widespread custom or practice of such violations, Plaintiffs allege details of six incidents of police misconduct between 2005 and 2015—three involving high-speed vehicle crashes and three involving shootings. While Plaintiffs do not link the shooting allegations to this case, the other vehicle pursuits are similar. Plaintiffs certainly present more than one example in addition to their own July 1, 2016, incident. They have sufficiently alleged that these are not isolated events, but a pattern of the City of Chicago's custom and practice of using excessive force and covering up wrongdoing. . . Plaintiffs successfully allege that CPD has a culture of false reporting and covering up of vehicle pursuits. Plaintiffs include four car crash incidents in their pleadings, counting the present case, which describe instances where CPD officers allegedly lied or made a false report after another police officer used excessive force. Plaintiffs explain that CPD's lack of accountability manifests itself in multiple ways—from false reporting and destruction of evidence to failure to adequately discipline and investigate misconduct—and they specifically allege that such actions occurred here. . . . Plaintiffs have alleged a direct causal link between the de facto policy regarding vehicle incidents and their excessive force claim. CPD's culture plausibly assured Officer Ewing that he could use excessive force in his pursuit of the gold sedan and not worry about being meaningfully disciplined. Plaintiffs' factual allegations are enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level and states a claim to relief that is plausible on its face."); Cordero v. City of New York, No. 15-CV-3436, 2017 WL 4685544, at *11 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 17, 2017) ("There is sufficient evidence for plaintiff to proceed on the grounds that: (1) New York city's overtime policy incentivizes officers to make false arrests; and (2) police malfeasance in general and as related to the overtime policy is inadequately monitored to prevent abuse. A reasonable jury may find that this practice is not isolated to a few 'bad' police officers, but is endemic, that NPYD officials are aware this pattern exists and that they have failed to intervene and properly supervise."); Estate of Williams v. City of Milwaukee, No. 16-CV-869-JPS, 2017 WL 3381235, at *20–21 (E.D. Wis. Aug. 4, 2017) ("When viewing the evidence most favorably to Plaintiffs, the Court concludes that they have raised triable issues of fact as to both of their Monell theories. As with Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim, the Court will not belabor the point. For the failure to train claim, Plaintiffs' evidence and Clark's opinions suggest a lack of adequate training on how to approach complaints of breathing difficulties. Plaintiffs have further shown that the City knew or should have known that its training was deficient prior to the Williams incident. For the code of silence claim, Plaintiffs' evidence admittedly appears scattershot. Nevertheless, Plaintiffs have woven at least a tenuous thread through the history of alleged MPD misconduct, including the strip search scandal, as well as Clark's opinions, the various studies, and the Williams incident itself, showing that the code existed with Flynn's knowledge and approval, and that this is what motivated Defendants' inactions on the morning of July 6, 2011. Whether the thread will snap under the strain of the City's opposing evidence is for the jury to decide. The City's arguments to the contrary lack merit. First, the City maintains that it provided at least some medical training to MPD officers, defeating any assertion of indifference. It is for a jury, however, to determine whether this is sufficient to disprove the City's alleged indifference. Second, the City contends that it could not be expected to train its officers, who were given limited first responder training, to recognize that Williams was suffering from a sickle cell crisis. Not only does this assume that Williams was in such a crisis—a matter in dispute—but it also mischaracterizes Plaintiffs' failure to train claim. Plaintiffs assert that the City's training on respiratory distress was not only inadequate, but entirely incorrect; the 'if you can talk you can breathe' principle was taught even though the MPD should have known it was wrong. Further, MPD policy allowed officers to exercise discretion to determine whether a breathing complaint was genuine. . . Flynn later acknowledged that the training was mistaken by changing the policy. . .Third, the City attacks Plaintiffs' code of silence evidence by showing that nothing prior to the Williams incident involved sickle cell crisis. In the same vein, the City asserts that circumstances of the strip search cases are factually distinguishable, and thus offer no support for a purported code of silence or lack of discipline. Plaintiffs' theory is not so narrow. They argue that the code of silence and lack of discipline enabled Defendants to treat Williams callously, as they believe occurred in prior incidents like those involving Perry and Jude. Finally, the City argues that the code of silence theory fails because the moving force behind Williams' death was the Officer Defendants' failure to recognize the seriousness of his medical condition, not some underlying, institutionalized freedom to mistreat African-American men. The parties' positions are, unsurprisingly, diametrically opposed on this point and a jury must be called upon to find the truth."); Thomas v. Town of Chelmsford, 267 F.Supp.3d 279, ___ (D. Mass. 2017) ("The plaintiffs claim that Chelmsford schools had a custom of encouraging a win-at-all-costs sports culture that did not apply the same rules to star athletes, and that the municipality was aware of and perhaps even encouraged the culture. As a matter of formal policy, the CSC did implement a Bullying Intervention Plan in 2010 and entered into a Memorandum of Understanding with the Chelmsford Police to work together to respond to bullying. The plaintiffs allege that in practice, though, CSC had a practice of not applying its bullying policies and looking the other way from sexual misconduct and sexual harassment by star athletes. The plaintiffs allege that this culture was the moving force behind the First Amendment retaliation against Matthew by his teachers. The plaintiffs adequately plead municipal liability for First Amendment retaliation based on the role that municipal policy or custom allegedly played in the constitutional violation."); Castellani v. City of Atl. City, No. CV 13-5848 (JBS/AMD), 2017 WL 3112820, at *20 (D.N.J. July 21, 2017) ("Viewing the evidence in a light most favorable to Plaintiff, a reasonable jury could find from this evidence that the City had a custom of ignoring or failing to properly and promptly investigate unconstitutional excessive force complaints against Atlantic City police officers for years preceding this incident, and by its inaction was deliberately indifferent to the need for such investigations to protect persons against excessive force during arrests, and was thus in part complicit in the misconduct that ensued. . . . A reasonable jury could find evidence in the record connecting the failure to investigate and the ACPD condoning the use of excessive force by its officers without fear of discipline with the constitutional violation at issue in this case."); Santiago v. Lafferty, No. CV 13-12172-IT, 2017 WL 1217115, at *13 (D. Mass. Mar. 31, 2017) ("In sum: if a reasonable jury could conclude that the City of Lowell (through its Superintendent of Police) adopted a custom with deliberate indifference to known or obvious consequences, and through that action caused the constitutional injuries alleged, summary judgment cannot enter. The record allows Plaintiffs the opportunity to try to meet this burden at trial. The 1989 Informant Policy may demonstrate the municipality's knowledge of the need for safeguards to protect against the risks inherent in using confidential informants, and the municipality's systematic failure to enforce that policy—which, given that failure's ubiquity, may amount to the actual 'custom' to be analyzed—

may demonstrate deliberate indifference to the very risks that policy was intended to mitigate. . . Superintendent Lavallee—the relevant municipal actor—was potentially aware of officer complaints about the inaccessibility of written policies. In addition, the cavalier or simply non-existent enforcement of safeguards meant to protect against risks inherent to confidential informants, as described by Plaintiffs, may have been so extensive that a jury could conclude it occurred with Superintendent Lavallee's blessing. A jury could further conclude that refusing to supervise the use of confidential informants—including by allowing confidential informants to be used without any documentation or meaningful check—obviously leads to and causes the malfeasance described here, including officers' blindness to the possible planting of evidence to secure easy arrests. Thus, action properly attributable to the city potentially caused Plaintiffs' constitutional injuries, precluding summary judgment on the Monell claims."); Price v. City of Chicago, No. 16-CV-8268, 2017 WL 36444, at *10–11 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 4, 2017) ("Plaintiffs have alleged sufficient instances of improper enforcement of the Ordinance to state a plausible claim under Monell. As recounted in the Background section, Plaintiffs have alleged numerous—at least fifteen—examples of improper enforcement of the Ordinance at a variety of locations involving various pro-life advocates and police officers. These instances include, for example, treating the Ordinance as a 50-foot buffer zone, referring to distances not mentioned in the Ordinance, enforcing the Ordinance based on the distance from a parking lot gate rather than the entrance door to a clinic, or prohibiting pro-life advocates from standing in a particular place without reference to whether they were 'approaching' another person as the Ordinance requires. Plaintiffs also allege at least seven occasions in which (1) the police told pro-life advocates that they could not stand in a particular location without telling the same thing to pro-choice advocates or (2) the police appeared to reflexively favor pro-choice advocates over pro-life advocates. Additionally, the Plaintiffs allege that pro-choice advocates regularly violate the Ordinance without any police intervention. Taking these allegations as true and adding in the many times the police have intervened against Plaintiffs, the Court can reasonably draw an inference that permits Plaintiffs' selective enforcement theory to survive the current motion to dismiss. In short, taking all of Plaintiffs' allegations as true and making reasonable inferences in their favor, the complaint sufficiently alleges a pattern of conduct that indicates a widespread custom or practice of discriminatory enforcement of the Ordinance, deliberate indifference to the widespread unconstitutional enforcement of the Ordinance, or a training policy that is 'so inadequate that it amounts to a "policy" of "deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the police come into contact."'"); Fant v. The City of Ferguson, No. 4:15-CV-00253-AGF, 2016 WL 6696065, at *4 (E.D. Mo. Nov. 15, 2016) ("Although the Court is not convinced that Plaintiffs have sufficiently pleaded that their warrants were based on knowingly or recklessly false information, upon reconsideration and focusing on Plaintiffs' allegations in Paragraph 203 of the complaint, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have plausibly pleaded that the City has a policy of issuing warrants for 'failure to appear' without probable cause. . . Municipalities may be liable under § 1983 if an action 'pursuant to official municipal policy,' including 'practices so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law,' cause the plaintiffs' injuries. . . In Paragraph 203 of their complaint, Plaintiffs allege that, as a matter of routine, the City issues arrest warrants for a person's 'failure to appear' after City officials have given the person paperwork crossing out their court date or have moved the court date without informing the person. Whether Plaintiffs can prove that such practices are 'so persistent and widespread' as to have the force of law may be determined at a later stage. At this stage, the Court finds Plaintiffs' allegations sufficient to state a plausible Fourth Amendment claim against the City."); Bush v. City of Utica, New York, No. 6:12-CV-1444, 2016 WL 3072384, at *8 (N.D.N.Y. May 31, 2016) ("In sum, viewing the evidence in the record in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, one could conclude that UFD decision-makers, primarily Chief Brooks, made a conscious choice to endorse or sanction an unwritten policy of employing more conservative fire fighting and rescue operations in low-income areas like James Street than those employed elsewhere, that this policy was motivated in some measure by discriminatory animus, and that this policy resulted in the failure of UFD personnel to rescue one or more of the decedents. . . Notably, the Second Circuit left open the possibility that qualified immunity might yet shield Chief Brooks from individual liability when rejecting defendants' appeal at the pleadings stage. . . But now that the record has been more fully developed in discovery, the disputed facts, viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, make it even more clear that Chief Brooks would not be entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . Indeed, as the Second Circuit previously stated, a policy 'of withholding protective services from the decedents because they lived in a low-income neighborhood,' if such a policy did in fact exist, would clearly lack the requisite rational relation to a legitimate governmental purpose. . . Finally, the disputed facts set forth above, the identified deficiencies in yearly rescue training, and the lack of an explanation in the record as to why the stated training requirements differ for, or do not apply to, supervisory personnel such as Chief Brooks or Deputy Kelly, considered together along with the alleged adherence by UFD personnel to the 'don't go in policy' for fires at low-income properties, preclude summary judgment on plaintiffs' failure to train theory as well."); Foy ex rel Haynie, Jr. v. City of Chicago, No. 15 C 3720, 2016 WL 2770880, at *7-9 (N.D. Ill. May 12, 2016) ("Plaintiff does not allege the existence of an express policy that caused Haynie's constitutional deprivation nor does she allege that Haynie's death was directly caused by a person with final policymaking authority. Thus, the only way Plaintiff may assert a Section 1983 claim for deliberate indifference to a medical need against the City is by alleging a widespread practice 'so permanent and well-settled that it constitutes a custom or practice.'. . In order for a plaintiff to prevail on a deliberate indifference claim in this context, the municipality or city official 'must have been aware of the risk created by the custom or practice and must have failed to take appropriate steps to protect the plaintiff.'. . In addition, a plaintiff pursuing a widespread practice claim generally must allege more than one, and sometimes more than three, instances of misconduct. . . This requirement is intended to 'demonstrate that there is a policy at issue rather than a random event.'. . Finally, a plaintiff must also allege causation—specifically, that the policy or custom was the 'moving force' behind the constitutional violation. . . .In support of her claim that the City maintained a series of widespread practices that result in the deliberate indifference to pretrial detainees' medical needs, Plaintiff cites to the fact that eight other inmates have died at the Harrison Police Station between 2007 and 2015. . . .While these tragic deaths are unfortunate, there are no allegations that these deaths and Haynie's death share substantive similarities. Simply put, the conclusory reliance on other deaths between 2007 and 2015 at the Harrison Police Station does not establish the possibility that the City's alleged widespread practices are so well-settled that they amount to an unconstitutional custom or policy."); Spalding v. City of Chicago, 186 F.Supp.3d 884, 916-17 (N.D. Ill. 2016) ("The record contains no evidence that the City had an express policy that violates the Constitution. Rather, Plaintiffs' Monell claim rests on the CPD's alleged widespread and unwritten 'code of silence.' According to Plaintiffs, CPD officers are trained under the code to ignore their fellow officers' misconduct and to retaliate against any officer who does not. . . Plaintiffs submit that the retaliation they suffered as a result of their protected speech resulted from their breaking the code, the existence of which Reiter's expert report and testimony support. . .The Seventh Circuit recently addressed a similar Monell claim in Rossi v. City of Chicago. Doubek, an off-duty Chicago police officer, participated in an assault on Rossi. Mathews, a CPD detective assigned to investigate the assault, 'exerted no discernible effort' on and then closed the investigation. Doubek faced no discipline for her role in the assault. Rossi brought a Monell claim against the City 'for perpetuating a "code of silence" that shields police officers from investigation and promotes misconduct by police.'. . In affirming summary judgment for the City, the Seventh Circuit held:

[T]he facts of this case … raise serious questions about accountability among police officers. But a Monell claim requires more than this; the gravamen is not individual misconduct by police officers (that is covered elsewhere under § 1983), but a widespread practice that permeates a critical mass of an institutional body. In other words, Monell claims focus on institutional behavior; for this reason, misbehavior by one or a group of officials is only relevant where it can be tied to the policy, customs, or practices of the institution as a whole.

Id. at 737. The Seventh Circuit added that Rossi did not adduce sufficient evidence of a widespread practice, noting that he 'did not retain a defense expert for his case and his pre-trial disclosures failed to identify any expert reports addressing' the code of silence. . . Unlike Rossi, Plaintiffs here have retained an expert, Lou Reiter. Reiter is a former Deputy Chief of Police of the Los Angeles Police Department who since 1983 has provided law enforcement consultation in police training and management, including with the Civil Rights Division of the U.S. Department of Justice. . . By his own estimate, Reiter has been involved in fifteen civil litigation matters involving the CPD since the late 1980s, including four in which the City retained him as an expert. . . Reiter has testified regarding the CPD's code of silence in five other cases. . . Based on his expertise and his review of the record, including depositions of the City's Rule 30(b)(6) witnesses, Reiter opines that the City maintains a code of silence whereby police officers do not report the misconduct of other police officers out of fear of retaliation. According to Reiter, the code is advanced by the City's conscious decision to fail to acknowledge it, to take affirmative steps to minimize its influence, and to fail to discipline officers who engage in misconduct. . . . Reiter's opinions find support in the record. The fact that the defendant officers are not clustered in a single unit or precinct, range widely in seniority and supervisory authority, and engaged in retaliatory acts against Plaintiffs over a lengthy period suggests that retaliation against those who report misconduct 'permeates a critical mass of' the CPD. . . Further, Hanna testified that instructors at the CPD police academy stress the importance of not breaking the code of silence. . . Considered together with Reiter's report, that evidence 'lays the premise of the system of inference' sufficient for Plaintiffs to forestall summary judgment on their Monell claim. . . Defendants also argue that Plaintiffs have not adduced evidence that the retaliatory aspect of the code of silence was sufficiently widespread to support Monell liability; in support, Defendants maintain that Plaintiffs identified only three other cases of alleged retaliation against officers who reported misconduct by other officers, while Reiter identified only one. . . Defendants further contend that because Reiter provides no statistical evidence on the rate of retaliation within the CPD, his report 'offers no evidence of a widespread municipal policy or custom to retaliate against officers' who break the code. . . This argument fails to persuade. The Seventh Circuit has declined to 'adopt any bright-line rules defining a "widespread custom or practice" … [b]ut the plaintiff must demonstrate that there is a policy at issue rather than a random event.'. . With the support of Reiter's report, Hanna's deposition testimony that all new CPD officers are trained in the code, and the facts of the case, Plaintiffs have done just that. Defendants cite to no precedent requiring empirical evidence to illustrate the existence of a widespread custom, and the weight of Reiter's report and Hanna's testimony creates a genuine issue of fact regarding pervasiveness of the code. This is all that is required on summary judgment."); Shultz v. Dart, No. 13 C 3641, 2016 WL 212930, at *9 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 19, 2016) ("Shultz has adduced enough evidence to show that the floor's security officer maintains his other responsibilities while relieving a tier officer of his duties during the tier officer's lunch break. Shultz has also adduced enough evidence to show that the tier officers station themselves in the hallway rather than in the dorm's doorway. These policies and practices would place the guard responsible for supervising inmates out of sight and hearing of those inmates, which a reasonable jury could find violated due process as interpreted by Hart. Shultz therefore may survive summary judgment if the record would permit a jury to find that this conduct was 'a widespread practice that, although not authorized by written law or express municipal policy, is so permanent and well settled as to constitute a custom or usage with the force of law.'. .The Seventh Circuit has declined to 'adopt any bright-line rules defining a "widespread custom or practice."'. . 'But the plaintiff must demonstrate that there is a policy at issue rather than a random event.'. . Shultz has done just that. As to his claim that having security officers relieve tier officers creates a dangerous situation, there is a notable gap in the jail's express policies—namely, who performs a security officer's duties for the four hours during which he covers for tier officers out on lunch? Dominguez testified that a tier officer processes returning inmates during the time a security officer is relieving the absent tier officer. . . But then who is supervising the first tier officer's inmates while he performs the security officer's tasks? As to Shultz's claim that the tier officers in practice station themselves outside of the tiers, Shultz's testimony, together with the depositions from the other two cases, give rise to a reasonable inference that the guards' placement on the day of the assault was not an isolated event. The consequence of the jail's policies and practices is that detainees, including particularly vulnerable detainees like Shultz, can go for stretches of time without supervision by tier officers. Finally, Shultz has adequately established the causal link between the jail's supervision practices and his injury. A reasonable jury could fund that, had an officer been stationed in the doorway of W House instead of sitting out in the hallway, the officer could have seen several detainees follow Shultz into the bathroom and been able to prevent or interrupt the assault. Accordingly, Shultz may proceed to trial on his claims against Dart and Cook County."); Smith v. City of Chicago, 143 F.Supp.3d 741, 754 (N.D. Ill. 2015) ("[T]he City's argument that Plaintiffs' Monell claims must fail because Plaintiffs have not identified an express, written policy that is unconstitutional on its face is misplaced because Plaintiffs' Monell claims rely on the unofficial stop and frisk policy articulated above. . . . Plus, Defendants can be liable for applying a facially neutral policy – like the City's written anti-racial profiling policy – to Plaintiffs in an intentionally racially discriminatory manner in violation of the Equal Protection Clause. . . .Accordingly, Plaintiffs are not required to base their Monell claims on an express, written policy as the City suggests."); Pindak v. Dart, 125 F.Supp.3d 720, 757 (N.D. Ill. 2015) ("Plaintiffs may also proceed on the theory that Securitas condoned and encouraged a widespread practice. . . . To establish a widespread practice, Plaintiffs must show a series of violations and establish that Securitas was 'aware of the risk created by the custom or practice and ... failed to take appropriate steps to protect the plaintiff[s].'. . They have identified several instances, spanning multiple years, when Securitas guards removed panhandlers from the Plaza. . . .A jury might also reasonably find Securitas' failure to enact new Post Orders or train its employees in response to these repeated incidents reflects deliberate indifference. . . .A jury could reasonably conclude that Securitas' failure to respond to this actual notice or to provide adequate training to its employees before the summer of 2012 showed deliberate indifference to the rights of those panhandlers on Daley Plaza."); Schoolcraft v. City of New York, 103 F.Supp.3d 465, 515-17 (S.D.N.Y. 2015), reconsidered in part in Schoolcraft v. City of New York, 133 F.Supp.3d 563 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("Monell claims can be brought against a municipality notwithstanding the fact that the same claims were barred by the doctrine of qualified immunity as asserted against individual officers. . . . Schoolcraft points to two categories of evidence that he contends demonstrates a policy or custom sufficient to survive summary judgment. The first relates to expert testimony and reports regarding the existence of what has been termed the 'blue wall of silence' (or 'Wall'). . . .The second category of evidence offered by Schoolcraft to prove a custom or policy involves officer testimony and accounts of the Wall. This category includes recent incidents of purported retaliatory conduct involving other NYPD officers who revealed crime statistics manipulation. . . . The various reports, expert testimony and the testimony of other officers that were the purported victims or witnesses to this type of retaliation are sufficient to give rise to a question of fact as to whether a custom or policy of retaliation against 'rats' existed and, if so, whether it was the direct cause of Schoolcraft's injuries brought pursuant to Section 1983. While City Defendants are correct that 'contemporaneous or subsequent conduct cannot establish a pattern of violations that would provide notice to the city and the opportunity to conform to constitutional dictates,' the subsequent conduct testimony does not stand alone. . . Similarly, a triable issue exists with respect to causation. It is for a jury to decide whether DI Mauriello labelled Schoolcraft a 'rat,' and whether that designation resulted in the alleged retaliatory conduct discussed above. Several courts have found an issue of triable fact where, as here, 'plaintiff produced records of the testimony of experts, fellow officers, and [a] former Police Commissioner ... before the Mollen Commission to the code of silence that existed among police officers to prevent officers from breaking ranks'. . . If this evidence is admissible, the arguments propounded by the City Defendants in opposition to it can be presented to the jury. It is for a jury to decide whether the commission and IAB reports, drafted several decades ago, are persuasive indications of today's NYPD culture or whether Schoolcraft's harm was the direct result of the NYPD's custom of retaliation against 'rats.' It remains a triable issue whether the other officers' accounts of retaliation, viewed in light of the Wall, are adequate indications of a larger trend. Such questions are not, however, resolvable as a matter of law.");

Cole v. City of Memphis, 97 F. Supp. 3d 947, 958-59 (W.D. Tenn. 2015) ("With respect to Plaintiffs' claims against the City of Memphis for Fourth Amendment violations, Defendant argues that 'Plaintiffs' assert no basis upon which to attach municipal liability.'. . According to Defendant City of Memphis, municipal liability does not exist based on Fourth Amendment violations because Plaintiffs do not assert that the Beale Street Sweep 'constitutes a per se violation of the Fourth Amendment.'. . Defendant misapprehends the test for municipal liability to attach to a claim. Once a custom is established, the inquiry properly focuses on causation. . . The standard for causation, as set forth by the Supreme Court, is the existence of 'a direct causal link between a municipal policy or custom and the alleged constitutional deprivation.'. . Defendant submits no authority that the policy or custom must be per se unconstitutional for liability to attach. Plaintiffs' failure to challenge the Beale Street Sweep as per se unconstitutional under the Fourth Amendment is inapposite to the causation inquiry specifically and the responsibility inquiry generally. Ostensibly, Defendant's argument relies on the concept that an as-applied challenge necessarily requires a showing of 'deliberate indifference.' The test in the Sixth Circuit for applying a 'deliberate indifference' standard, however, is whether a plaintiff challenges the municipality's inaction versus an affirmative policy or custom. . . That Plaintiffs bring an as-applied challenge under the Fourth Amendment, rather than a facial challenge, does not affect the outcome. In the present case, Plaintiffs have submitted sufficient evidence that the Fourth Amendment violations allegedly suffered by Plaintiffs directly resulted from the Beale Street Sweep. . . .The Court agrees with Plaintiffs that, assuming the Beale Street Sweep custom as alleged is factually established, the existence of the custom also establishes the City's responsibility for the custom. The relevant Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit precedent applies the 'deliberate indifference' standard in cases where a plaintiff asserts a § 1983 claim against a municipality for failure to act to protect an individual's constitutional right. . . Contrary to Defendant's position, the 'deliberate indifference' standard is inapplicable to the present case. Plaintiffs do not assert a claim against the City of Memphis for its 'inaction.' Rather, Plaintiffs assert that an unconstitutional custom exists to affirmatively remove individuals from the Beale Street area in violation of their constitutional rights. . . Because the alleged custom is an affirmative one, if Plaintiffs are able to factually establish the existence of the custom, Defendant City of Memphis' responsibility for the custom would be established. . .Plaintiffs cite to case law from other circuits to support the proposition that a facially unconstitutional custom or policy inherently satisfies the deliberate indifference standard. . . Sixth Circuit precedent does not go so far as to establish a bright line rule that a facially unconstitutional custom is exempt from the 'deliberate indifference' standard. The line drawn in Sixth Circuit case law is whether a plaintiff claims a constitutional violation based on a municipality's inaction. Accordingly, the Court declines to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims for failing to provide evidence of deliberate indifference."); Awalt v. Marketti, 74 F.Supp.3d 909 (N.D. Ill. 2014) ("Like municipalities, '[p]rivate corporations acting under color of state law may ... be held liable for injuries resulting from their policies and practices.'. . . Plaintiff argues that the Sheriff's Office and CHC/HPL's decision not to implement a standardized grievance mechanism led to a widespread practice at the Jail of ignoring or delaying response to grievances and medical requests made by detainees. . . .The County Defendants argues that 'Plaintiff has produced no evidence of a widespread custom or practice that put the Sheriff's Office on notice that there were such problems with these topics, or that such problems directly caused Awalt's death.'. . There is sufficient evidence, however, in the deposition testimony and affidavits of detainees at the Jail that Jail officers routinely ignored grievances. Further, Plaintiff's expert testified that a failure to routinely address detainee grievances created a substantial risk of injury. . . This is sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to find a 'cognizable policy[]'. . . of failing to establish a reliable grievance process. Furthermore, this evidence is also a sufficient basis for a reasonable jury to find that this failure was the moving force behind Awalt's death. A reasonable jury could conclude that if the Jail had a practice of routinely following up with grievances and medical requests that Awalt's condition would have been addressed. And furthermore, a reasonable jury could also find that if Awalt's condition had been addressed, the seizure that led to his death would have been prevented or treated such that it would not have caused his death. . . . A reasonable jury could find that the lack of training at the Jail was so stark that the correctional officers were left without any reasonable frame of reference to determine when the attention of a medical professional was required. Common sense says that more training would create in the correctional officers a heightened awareness of, and sensitivity to, the detainees' medical needs. Regardless of whether training could change the correctional officer's ability to determine when a medical condition required professional attention, a reasonable jury could conclude that more extensive training would simply have made it more likely that a correctional officer would have been motivated to alert a medical professional to Awalt's condition in time to prevent his death. Although it is a close question on this factual record, the Court finds that there is sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to find that the Sheriff's Office and CHC/HPL's failure to train the correctional officers caused Awalt's death. . . .Plaintiff has highlighted evidence showing that three detainees besides Awalt had seizure conditions, and were either not provided the medication they required or were ignored by the correctional officers while they suffered seizures at the Jail. Plaintiff has also identified six other detainees who did not receive the medical care or medication they needed while they were at the Jail. Furthermore, Plaintiff's expert has testified that of the 24 detainees booked at the Jail during the three months leading up to Awalt's booking, seven (including Awalt) identified a medical issue at intake, but were denied timely access to medical care or received medical care that fell far below the standard for correctional health care. Plaintiff's expert also testified that this rate of failure to provide medical care indicated that there was a systemic failure to provide medical care at the Jail. This is sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to find that the Sheriff's Office and CHC/HPL had an implicit policy of deliberate indifference to the medical care provided to detainees. The County Defendants also contend that the denials of medical care Plaintiff cites are not 'sufficiently similar' to Awalt's experience. The County Defendants argue that Awalt must show that the Sheriff's Office and CHC/HPL have a widespread practice of causing detainee deaths by denying them anti-seizure medication. The County Defendants cite Hahn v. Walsh, 762 F.3d 617 (7th Cir.2014), in which the plaintiff claimed that his wife's death was caused by a jail's failure to have a policy to treat a diabetic detainee who refused to participate in her own care. The plaintiff in Hahn relied of evidence that seven other detainees had died in the defendant's jail from causes unrelated to diabetes. The court held the seven deaths were insufficient to alert the jail to any problem with its policy (or lack of a policy) for treating detainees like the plaintiff's wife. . . Here, by contrast, Plaintiff does not claim merely that the Sheriff's Office and CHC/HPL have a policy of specifically denying detainees anti-seizure medication. Rather, Plaintiff argues that the Sheriff's Office and CHC/HPL are reckless in their medical care of detainees generally, and Awalt's death was caused by this general recklessness. In this case, evidence that detainees did not receive proper medical attention or were denied their medication is sufficiently similar to Awalt's experience because he too did not receive proper medical attention or medication."); Doe v. City of San Diego, 35 F.Supp.3d 1233, 1239-40, 1244-45 (S.D. Cal. 2014) ("While the City implicitly acknowledges that a 'code of silence' may qualify as a type of custom able to invoke Monell liability, the City contends that Plaintiff has not sufficiently demonstrated that the SDPD abides by one. Instead, the City contends that Plaintiff's claim is 'premised solely on conclusions and assumptions using 20/20 hindsight.'. . The City argues that Arevalos was a rogue officer who acted alone, and that the SDPD had no evidence to suggest that Arevalos would sexually assault Plaintiff. . . According to the City, 'Plaintiff's theories are cobbled together by use of isolated incidents, conclusory opinions and opinions based upon non-existent or inadmissible facts. Plaintiff point[s] to events which have no relationship to one another and clearly fail to prove a City custom or policy that amounts to a widespread and longstanding practice.'. . In considering whether triable issues of fact remain, the Court disagrees. Plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence of a code of silence that exists within the SDPD, and which could constitute the moving force behind her constitutional injuries. Specifically, Plaintiff presents: (1) evidence of Arevalos' tenure with the SDPD, during which numerous bad acts went undocumented and largely undisciplined; (2) testimony from former police officers acknowledging the code of silence; (3) expert testimony opining as to the existence and scope of a code of silence. In light of this evidence, the Court finds that there are genuine issues of fact material to the resolution of Plaintiff's claim. . . . Based on the evidence cited, the Court finds that genuine issues of material fact remain with respect to whether a code of silence exists within the SDPD. Arevalos' history with the department serves as primary evidence of the custom. His police record was virtually impeccable, even though he sexually abused a number of women, had a reputation for seeking out and pulling over females, and called himself the 'Teflon Don.' Moreover, Plaintiff's experts, after reviewing the facts of the case, conclude that the code of silence is strictly adhered to within the SDPD. Moreover, Plaintiff's expert, Jeffrey Noble opines on the SDPD's deficient complaint acceptance and investigatory procedures, which, together, make it 'nearly impossible' for an officer to be held accountable for their misconduct. All of these facts demonstrate that there remain genuine disputes as to material facts with respect to whether a code of silence exists. . . . The City attempts to mitigate Plaintiff's evidence, arguing that the SDPD was not officially aware of several of the sexual assault cases until after Arevalos was arrested following the Jane Doe incident. Moreover, the City asserts that Plaintiff has 'cobbled together' unrelated facts from an 18–year period to establish her claim. However, the City fails to address the opinions rendered by Plaintiff's experts, which contain admissible evidence of the SDPD's inadequate reporting policies and pervasive nature of the code of silence. The expert opinions, combined with Arevalos' unfortunate history with the SDPD and the other facts cited previously, create genuine issues of material fact which the Court may not resolve."); Haley v. City of Boston, No. 09–10197–RGS, 2013 WL 4936840, *6 (D. Mass. Sept. 12, 2013) ("The bottom line is that the testimony of Commissioner DiGrazia and Wasserman, if credited by a jury, would establish that Brady and possibly Mooney violations were rampant within the BPD and possibly linked to the BPD's use of outdated policy manuals and deficient training in the constitutional obligations of police with respect to exculpatory evidence. That in turn would support a finding that constitutional violations were 'well settled' and 'widespread,' such that 'the policymaking officials of the municipality can be said to have either actual or constructive knowledge of it yet did nothing to end the practice.'. . The City's argument that the testimony is disputed and generic in many of its recitals is well-taken, but its weight and force are ultimately for the jury to decide."); Floyd v. City of New York, 959 F.Supp.2d 540, 658-67 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) ("Plaintiffs established the City's liability for the NYPD's violation of their Fourth Amendment rights under two theories, either of which is adequate under Monell: first, plaintiffs showed that senior officials in the City and at the NYPD were deliberately indifferent to officers conducting unconstitutional stops and frisks; and second, plaintiffs showed that practices resulting in unconstitutional stops and frisks were sufficiently widespread that they had the force of law. . . . The NYPD's senior officials have violated section 1983 through their deliberate indifference to unconstitutional stops, frisks, and searches. They have received both actual and constructive notice since at least 1999 of widespread Fourth Amendment violations occurring as a result of the NYPD's stop and frisk practices. Despite this notice, they deliberately maintained and even escalated policies and practices that predictably resulted in even more widespread Fourth Amendment violations. . . The NYPD has repeatedly turned a blind eye to clear evidence of unconstitutional stops and frisks. Further evidence of deliberate indifference is found in the City's current positions as expressed at trial. The City continues to argue that no plaintiff or class member was subjected to an unconstitutional stop or frisk. . . .Throughout the class period, the need for better supervision, monitoring, training, and discipline to protect against constitutional violations was obvious, but senior officials at the NYPD '"fail[ed] to make meaningful efforts to address the risk of harm to plaintiffs."'. . .Despite the NYPD's deliberate failure to collect accurate data regarding stops that violate the Fourth Amendment, there is sufficient evidence of such stops to establish Monell liability based on 'practices so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law.'. . .The NYPD's practice of making stops that lack individualized reasonable suspicion has been so pervasive and persistent as to become not only a part of the NYPD's standard operating procedure, but a fact of daily life in some New York City neighborhoods. . . . Plaintiffs have established the City's liability for the NYPD's violation of plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment rights under two theories, either of which is adequate under Monell. First, plaintiffs showed that the City, through the NYPD, has a policy of indirect racial profiling based on local criminal suspect data. Second, plaintiffs showed that senior officials in the City and at the NYPD have been deliberately indifferent to the intentionally discriminatory application of stop and frisk at the managerial and officer levels. . . . Throughout this litigation the City has acknowledged and defended the NYPD's policy of conducting stops based in part on criminal suspect data, of which race is a primary factor. The NYPD implements this policy by emphasizing to officers the importance of stopping 'the right people.' In practice, officers are directed, sometimes expressly, to target certain racially defined groups for stops. . . .Racial profiling constitutes intentional discrimination in violation of the Equal Protection Clause if it involves any of the following: an express classification based on race that does not survive strict scrutiny;. . . the application of facially neutral criminal laws or law enforcement policies 'in an intentionally discriminatory manner;'. . .or a facially neutral policy that has an adverse effect and was motivated by discriminatory animus. . .The City's policy of targeting "the right people" for stops clearly violates the Equal Protection Clause under the second method of proof, and, insofar as the use of race is explicit, the first. . . .This policy far exceeds the permissible use of race in stopping suspects as set forth in Brown v. City of Oneonta, New York. There, the Second Circuit held that when the police carry out stops as part of a 'search[ ] for a particular perpetrator,' the use of racial information from the victim's description of the suspect is not an express racial classification subject to strict scrutiny. . . .The NYPD's policy of targeting 'the right people' for stops, by contrast, is not directed toward the identification of a specific perpetrator. . . Rather, it is a policy of targeting expressly identified racial groups for stops in general. . . . In a case alleging that a municipality bears Monell liability based on senior officials' deliberate indifference to equal protection violations by subordinates, it is not necessary for plaintiffs to provide direct evidence that the senior officials were motivated by a discriminatory purpose. Rather, it is sufficient if plaintiffs show that: (1) subordinates followed a course of action in part because of its adverse effects on an identifiable group, and (2) senior officials were deliberately indifferent to those adverse effects in such a way that a reasonable inference can be drawn that those officials intended those adverse effects to occur. . . . Plaintiffs in this case did provide direct evidence of discriminatory intent, as discussed above. But plaintiffs also showed that senior officials in the City and at the NYPD have been deliberately indifferent to the discriminatory application of stop and frisk at the managerial and officer level such that a reasonable inference of discriminatory intent can be drawn. . . .The City and the NYPD's highest officials also continue to endorse the unsupportable position that racial profiling cannot exist provided that a stop is based on reasonable suspicion. . .This position is fundamentally inconsistent with the law of equal protection and represents a particularly disconcerting manifestation of indifference. . . . The Equal Protection Clause's prohibition on selective enforcement means that suspicious blacks and Hispanics may not be treated differently by the police than equally suspicious whites. . . .For the foregoing reasons, the City is liable for the violation of plaintiffs' Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights."); Hall v. City of Chicago, No. 12 C 6834, 2012 WL 6727511, *6, *7 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 28, 2012) ("In their Complaint, Plaintiffs allege that the City knew or should have known that law enforcement officers were illegally stopping Plaintiffs because S04–13–09 requires patrol officers to submit their Contact Information Cards to supervisory officers. Plaintiffs suggest that the supervisory officer's knowledge is then imputed to the City. The Court disagrees. The Seventh Circuit recently held that a police supervisor is not a final policymaker for the purposes of § 1983 liability. . . .Notwithstanding this, Plaintiffs assert their Complaint sufficiently states a widespread practice theory under Monell because knowledge can be imputed to the City because of the pervasive nature of the practices at issue. As support for the widespread nature of the alleged unconstitutional practices, Plaintiffs provide statistical data in their Complaint which claims 'that unreasonable stops, warrant checks, and questionable justifications for reasonable suspicion have been occurring throughout the City on a regular basis for at least a decade.' . . .The City argues that Plaintiffs' data overstates the number of alleged unconstitutional seizures. The City contends that if Plaintiffs' statistical data for the last ten years are broken down annually, then the data would reveal that approximately 21.4 incidents occurred allegedly without reasonable suspicion and this 'hardly support[s] a conclusion that a

"widespread and pervasive" practice exists that was so systematic and permanent and well-settled that it had the force of law.'. . Given that the Court is required to accept as true all well-pleaded facts in the Plaintiffs' Complaint at the dismissal stage, the Court finds here that Plaintiffs' allegations with respect to the pervasive nature of the alleged constitutional violations is sufficient to establish that the practice was widespread enough to impute constructive knowledge to the City."); R.S. ex rel. S.S. v. Minnewaska Area School Dist. No. 2149, 894 F.Supp.2d 1128, 1137 (D. Minn. 2012) ("Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged a custom of punishing and searching private out-of-school online communications by the school defendants."); Zaborowski v. Dart, No. 08 C 6946, 2011 WL 6660999, at *6 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 20, 2011) ("Plaintiffs have presented sufficient evidence raising a genuine dispute as to the material fact that the Sheriff's Office had a widespread practice of shackling pregnant detainees during labor, delivery, and/or recovery following delivery and that policymakers were aware of the custom or practice and did not take appropriate steps to protect the Class Plaintiffs."); Floyd v. City of New York, 813 F.Supp.2d 417, 423-56 (S.D.N.Y. 2011) (Floyd I) ("[P]laintiffs contend that the City's actions have been woefully inadequate − in fact, so inadequate that the City has constructively acquiesced in a widespread pattern of unconstitutional stops and frisks, and exhibited deliberate indifference to the need for sufficient training, supervision, monitoring, and discipline to avert such constitutional violations, thereby warranting the imposition of municipal liability.Notably, this is not a question of municipal liability for an unusual yet foreseeable violation − an accident waiting to happen-but rather for a situation that thousands of NYPD patrol officers confront on a daily basis: deciding whether they are justified in stopping a resident based on factors giving rise to reasonable suspicion. . . . In short, there are numerous disputed issues of fact as to the constitutional sufficiency of the NYPD's practice of training, monitoring, supervising, and disciplining its officers for stops and frisks conducted in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . A duty to train arises so that subordinates entrusted with the discretionary exercise of municipal power can distinguish between lawful and unlawful choices. Because the exercise of such discretion can arise in myriad circumstances, the 'nuance' of a particular training need may only become apparent to municipal policy makers after a pattern of violations arises in substantially similar circumstances. . . . The City does not have a written policy requiring or permitting stops and frisks of persons without reasonable suspicion, nor do plaintiffs allege that it does. The question is whether municipal officials have a widespread custom or practice of unconstitutional stops and frisks that is 'so permanent and well settled as to constitute a "custom or usage" with the force of law,' or whether a custom or practice of subordinate employees is 'so manifest as to imply the constructive acquiescence of senior policy-making officials.' Plaintiffs focus their argument primarily on the latter standard. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, I conclude that there are disputed issues of fact as to whether or not the City has acquiesced in a widespread custom or practice of unconstitutional stops and frisks. . . . In addition to alleging a widespread practice or custom of suspicionless stops, plaintiffs separately allege that NYPD supervisors have a widespread practice of imposing illegal stop and frisk, summons, and arrest quotas on officers, and that high-level policymakers have been aware of the quotas and have sometimes even encouraged their use 'by pressuring borough and precinct commanders to increase enforcement activity numbers.' . . . Proof that such quotas and/or pressure have caused the pattern of suspicionless stops will necessarily consist largely of circumstantial evidence. Plaintiffs have presented the smoking gun of the roll call recordings, which, considered together with the statistical evidence, is sufficient circumstantial evidence for this claim to survive summary judgment. Even if plaintiffs' evidence of quotas or pressure post-dates the last stop alleged in the Complaint, plaintiffs allege an ongoing pattern that includes, but is not limited to, the specifically alleged incidents. Thus, I find defendants' argument in this respect to be unavailing. In sum, I find that there is a triable issue of fact as to whether NYPD supervisors have a custom or practice of imposing quotas on officer activity, and whether such quotas can be said to be the 'moving force' behind widespread suspicionless stops. Therefore, I deny defendants' motion for summary judgment on plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claims against the City. . . . For an Equal Protection claim, discriminatory purpose may be proven through statistics alone. The statistical evidence in the instant case, while strong enough to show a disparate impact, is likely not strong enough to show discriminatory purpose standing alone. However, plaintiffs have presented other proof in addition to the statistical evidence-namely, the inadequacy of the City's efforts to take remedial steps to reduce the racial disparity of stops, as detailed above and further below. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, and in view of the repeated notice of disparate impact and competing contentions over how complete the City's efforts to implement change have been, I cannot say that the City's purported corrective actions have been sufficient to negate the inference that intentional discrimination was the City's 'standard operating procedure.' I therefore deny defendants' summary judgment motion on plaintiffs' Equal Protection claims against the City. . . . This is clearly not a situation in which the City has taken no remedial steps. Nonetheless, considering the statistical evidence in conjunction with the narrative evidence of significant shortcomings in the ways that the City's policies have been put into practice, I find that there is a triable issue of fact as to whether the NYPD leadership has been deliberately indifferent to the need to train, monitor, supervise, and discipline its officers adequately in order to prevent a widespread pattern of suspicionless and race-based stops. I therefore deny defendants' summary judgment motion on plaintiffs' failure to train, supervise, monitor, and discipline claims against the City."[footnotes omitted]), on reconsideration, 813 F.Supp.2d 457 (S.D.N.Y. 2011)(motion to reinstate claims arising out of plaintiff's stop and frisk granted); Walden v. City of Chicago, 755 F.Supp.2d 952, 972 (N.D. Ill. 2010) ("The Court finds that viewing all facts and all reasonable inferences in Walden's favor, he has presented sufficient evidence to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Defendant had policies, practices, or customs of coercing confessions and preventing arrestees access to counsel, particularly in the case of African-American men, and whether those policies were the 'moving force' behind Walden's Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment injuries."); McElroy v. City of Lowell, 741 F.Supp.2d 349, 355 (D. Mass. 2010) ("In this case. . . plaintiff fails to provide facts showing sufficient involvement of more than one officer that would justify holding the City liable. Plaintiff does state that there were multiple officers on scene and that they failed to intervene. Plaintiff, however, fails to provide facts that would demonstrate that officers engaged in a concerted action with the aim of violating his civil rights that is in any way similar to the conduct at issue in Kibbe, Bordanaro or Webster. The mere fact that other officers were in the vicinity, without facts showing active participation in the misconduct, is insufficient to state a plausible claim of municipal liability. Plaintiff additionally argues that it is not the concerted action of multiple officers that justifies imputing liability to the City but rather the fact that so many officers failed to intervene while witnessing the alleged instance of excessive force and unlawful arrest. Plaintiff thus suggests that the inaction of the officers in the current case is analogous to the concert of action by officers found in the other cases and, therefore, the existence of a custom should similarly be inferred and liability thereby imputed to the City. Again, and unlike the instant case, the officers' conduct in Kibbe, Bordanaro and Webster was so egregious that even a layperson would have been aware that it violated the victims' civil and constitutional rights. In this case, however, the arresting officer's conduct is not so obviously improper. Even if later found to be unconstitutional, it is not such a flagrant violation that it would allow an inference of improper custom simply because witnessing officers did not intervene on plaintiff's behalf."); Lausin ex rel. Lausin v. Bishko, 727 F.Supp.2d 610, 637 (N.D. Ohio 2010) ("Chief Rowe's actions in this case do not support any contention that the City of Richmond Heights has a custom of tolerance for federal rights violations. In order to support a claim for municipal liability on the basis of an unwritten policy of tolerating federal rights violations, a plaintiff must show: (1) the existence of a clear and persistent pattern of [illegal activity]; (2) notice or constructive notice on the part of the [defendant]; (3) the [defendant's] tacit approval of the unconstitutional conduct, such that their deliberate indifference in their failure to act can be said to amount to an official policy of inaction; and (4) that the [defendant's] custom was the 'moving force' or direct causal link in the constitutional deprivation. . . Plaintiffs fail to make the required showing in several respects. First, Plaintiffs point only to the actions taken against Gina. Thus, they have failed to show a clear and persistent pattern of unconstitutional conduct. The presence of a custom or policy that is unconstitutional cannot be established by evidence of a single instance of allegedly unconstitutional conduct."); McIllwain v. Weaver, No. 1:08CV00057-WRW, 2010 WL 670118, at *9 (E.D. Ark. Feb. 22, 2010) ("Sheriff Weaver testified that the policy was to strip search all arrestees going to general population. Officer Roberts testified likewise. There is evidence that training practices were inadequate. That there is a written policy requiring reasonable suspicion to search misdemeanor arrestee calls into question whether the alleged failure was a deliberate choice; and it is a question of fact whether any alleged failure to train caused Plaintiff's harm − if she was harmed. Because there are genuine issues of material fact in connection with Plaintiff's failure to train claim, both Defendants' Motions for Summary Judgment are denied on this issue."); Oxley v. Penobscot County, No. 09-cv-21-B-W, 2010 WL 582222, at *14 (D. Me. Feb. 12, 2010) ("[T]his evidence is sufficient to support a finding that Penobscot County has a custom of subjecting misdemeanor arrestees to strip searches and cavity searches based on a watered down reasonable suspicion standard and fails to differentiate between arrestees destined for release on personal recognizance in short order and those who are destined for placement amidst the general prison population when it comes to strip search practices."); Cavanaugh v. Woods Cross City, No. 1:08-CV-32-TC-BCW, 2009 WL 4981591, at *2, *5 (D. Utah Dec. 14, 2009) ("Woods Cross has a written policy stating Tasers may only be used when 'a subject is threatening himself, an officer, or another person with physical force and where alternative restraint tactics have been or are reasonably likely to fail.'. . . But Woods Cross Police Chief Paul Howard testified that he instructed use of force trainers to abandon this continuum of force policy and employ a 'reasonably necessary' test for the use of force. . . He also testified that contrary to the City's Use of Force policy, which states that '[i]t must be stressed that the use of force is not left to the unfettered discretion of the involved officer,' officers were told that use of the Taser was entirely within their subjective judgment based on the totality of the circumstances. . . Chief Howard acknowledged that this difference created an ambiguity in the use of force policy for any officer applying it in the field. . . . Plaintiffs argue that the City's written policy, which implemented the continuum of force analysis for use of a Taser, was acceptable under the Constitution, but that Woods Cross had an unwritten policy that was the moving force behind this alleged constitutional deprivation. Specifically, Plaintiffs allege that Woods Cross's unwritten policy, established by Chief Howard, allowed for use of a Taser in the sole discretion of the officer without reference to warnings, violence of the offender, or danger to others. . . Chief Howard clearly testified that he ordered trainers to abandon the written use of force policy and replace it with a 'reasonably necessary' policy. Although Chief Howard's deposition is somewhat confused, he also consistently and repeatedly testified that officers were told in their training that the decision to use force is a solely subjective analysis. . .If true that a policy existed in which officers were trained to use only their own subjective judgment when firing a Taser, such a policy would be in violation of the constitutional standards for use of force. See Graham, 490 U.S. at 396. Therefore, provided it was the moving force behind the violation, the policy would subject the municipality to liability. . . In this case the Plaintiffs have shown that there are disputed issues of material fact regarding what policy was implemented in Woods Cross regarding use force. Accordingly, the City of Woods Cross's motion for summary judgment is DENIED."), aff'd by Cavanaugh v. Woods Cross City, 625 F.3d 661 (10th Cir. 2010); Bullock v. Dart, 599 F.Supp.2d 947 (N.D. Ill. 2009)(County's policy and practice of segregating female possible discharges from remainder of female court returns, such that female actual returns could elect to avoid strip searches, but not segregating male possible discharges in similar manner, was not gender-neutral on its face, for purposes of Equal Protection Clause, even though all court returns were subject to strip searches if they returned to their divisions, where county excepted female actual discharges from requirement of returning to their living quarters.); Portis v. City of Chicago, No. 02 C 3139, 2008 WL 4211558, at *1 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 9, 2008) (summary judgment on liability issue for Plaintiffs challenging practice and custom of City of detaining persons arrested for non-jailable ordinance violations "for more than two hours (and in some cases for as long as 16 hours or more) after it completed all of the administrative steps necessary to determine that they were eligible for release."); Brazier v. Oxford County, No. 07-CV-54-B-W, 2008 WL 2065842, at *8, *9 (D. Me. May 13, 2008) ("Other courts have concluded that a well-settled, widespread custom cannot be established on the basis of two or three incidents involving a solitary officer. . . . [W]hen a particular officer engages in misconduct in the field, on his or her own, the inference that there is an underlying custom giving rise to the conduct is not logically drawn based exclusively on the incident itself, unless and until it is shown that the conduct is participated in by multiple officers or by the same officer on multiple occasions that have come to the attention of policymakers who have not addressed the misconduct through training or discipline. On the other hand, when a particular officer repeatedly engages in unlawful conduct during a routine procedure like processing a misdemeanor arrestee who fails to make bail or a misdemeanor detainee returning from court in shackles who is entitled to immediate release by court order, it is relatively difficult to understand how it would happen, or why any rational corrections officer would wish to perform such a search, in the absence of a customary practice that has somehow endured despite the existence of a contrary written policy. . . . Ultimately, my recommendation is to deny summary judgment to Oxford County on count I due, essentially, to the fact that the processing that resulted in the alleged strip searches presumably followed a routine jail procedure, because Arlene Kerr's alleged conduct was similar under two separate and distinct scenarios, neither of which should have resulted in a strip search, and because of the potential finding that Arlene Kerr admitted to Brazier that her conduct conformed to the Jail's practice. This evidence appears minimally sufficient to support a finding that Brazier was subjected to unconstitutional strip searches arising from an established custom that could not or should not have gone unnoticed and would not have existed without the acquiescence of policymaking officials and, by extension, without an awareness of an obvious need for additional or different training."); Estate of Fields v. Nawotka, No. 03-CV-1450, 2008 WL 746704, at *8, *9 (E.D. Wis. Mar. 18, 2008) ("The plaintiffs set forth that their claims are not based upon a failure to train; rather, they are based upon the failure of the Milwaukee Police Department's policy makers to formulate and execute an internal administrative review of officer shootings and discipline those that have been found to unreasonably use deadly force. . . The court determines that, based upon this theory, there is a genuine issue of material fact that precludes summary judgment. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the court determines that there is a material factual issue regarding the police department customs. Unlike this court's previous decisions relating to Monell claims for a failure to investigate, the plaintiffs articulate and present evidence about Milwaukee Police Department's investigation practices that could establish their inadequacy. [relying on statements in Lou Reiter's expert affidavit]. . . . [T]he court finds that the plaintiffs' record evidence and supporting affidavits create genuine issues of material fact as to whether or not the investigation process did create a de facto policy of ratifying officer use of deadly force; the court further finds that the plaintiffs' submissions create a genuine issue for trial regarding the causal link between the review process and the fatal shootings."); Lopez v. City of Houston, 2008 WL 437056, at *9, *10 (S.D.Tex. Feb. 14, 2008) ("In light of the severity, duration, and frequency of the alleged violations, as well as 'other evidence,' . . . the Court concludes there is a genuine fact issue as to the existence of an HPD custom in 2002 of using mass detention without individualized suspicion as a law enforcement tool. The following, viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, support this conclusion: (1) mass detentions without individualized suspicion occurred on three nights over a two month period; . . . . (2) HPD was focused on street racing during the summer of 2002, and created and vetted several plans to combat the racing, with the last plans (the Jackson and Game Plans) expressly incorporating mass detentions into the operation; . . . . (3) the operations on August 16 and 17 were extensively pre-planned by HPD; and (4) the HPD officers assigned to carry out Operation ERACER believed that mass detentions were acceptable and had been approved by high-ranking HPD officials. . . . Viewed together, and drawing all inferences in Plaintiffs' favor, the incidents within the summer of 2002 are sufficient to demonstrate a fact question as to whether HPD had a custom of mass detention without individualized reasonable suspicion. . . . When this evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, a jury could reasonably conclude that Chief Bradford had actual or constructive knowledge of an HPD custom of mass detention without individualized reasonable suspicion."); Monaco v. City of Camden, 2008 WL 408423, at *14, *15 (D.N.J. Feb. 13, 2008) ("[A] reasonable jury could find, based on the evidence in the record, that it was the 'well settled' custom of the City and the Police Department not only to fail to conduct timely investigations into allegations of excessive force, . . . but that when such investigations were ultimately performed, they were directed less toward detecting and correcting misconduct than toward shoring up the Department's and the officers' defenses. A jury could reasonably find that such inattention to the question of whether police misconduct actually occurred was 'so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights' as to evidence the City's deliberate indifference to its officers' use of excessive force. There is, moreover, a strong 'connection between the ... [allegedly inadequate policy identified] and the specific constitutional violation' Plaintiff alleges took place. . . That is, Plaintiff's evidence, if proved at trial, indicates that the City was indifferent to the risk that its officers would use excessive force, which is, according to Plaintiff, precisely what allegedly took place on May 31, 2002."); Henderson v. City and County of San Francisco, 2007 WL 2778682, at *2 n.2 (N.D. Cal. Sept.21, 2007) (not reported) ("Defendant contends that, in addition to proving that the custom was the moving force behind their injuries, Plaintiffs must also show that it constitutes deliberate indifference on the part of the government entity in order to establish municipal liability. . . Not so. A plaintiff must demonstrate deliberate indifference when it seeks to hold a municipality liable for 'failing to prevent a deprivation of federal rights.'. . Here, by contrast, Plaintiffs argue that an affirmative custom exists of requiring pre-trial and post-conviction detainees to sleep on the floor. 'Where a plaintiff claims that a particular municipal action itself violates federal law, or directs an employee to do so, ... [s]ection 1983 itself contains no state-of-mind requirement independent of that necessary to state a violation of the underlying federal right.'. . Therefore, Plaintiffs need not show deliberate indifference to establish a threshold of potential liability under Monell. However, Plaintiffs must nonetheless 'establish the state of mind required to prove the underlying violation.'"); Mitchell v. CCA of Tennessee, Inc., No. 04-1031-A, 2007 WL 837293, at *6 (W.D. La. Mar. 15, 2007) ("In the present case, Plaintiff alleges that CCA has a 'custom' of ignoring inmates' complaints directed toward their employees. . . . Warden Todd and Chief Maxwell's failure to report or investigate Mitchell's complaint of sexual harassment, if true, creates a genuine issue of material fact as to whether CCA maintained an official custom of ignoring prisoner complaints against their employees. Moreover, proof of such a custom would suffice to show a direct causal link between CCA's policy and the deprivation of Plaintiff's federal rights. That is, absent CCA's failure to report or investigate Mitchell's allegation of sexual harassment in April of 2003, the sexual assault on Plaintiff in May 2003 would not have likely occurred."); Hogan v. City of Easton, No. 04-759, 2006 WL 3702637, at *9, *10 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 12, 2006) (" The City argues that the Hogans have presented absolutely no evidence of a pattern of similar prior violations, which, as stated, they seek to limit to 'complaints or lawsuits in the prior ten years in which an EPD officer unjustifiably fired his weapon and/or was permitted to do so by EPD officials,' . . so as to support a policy or custom. Citing several decisions applying Eleventh Circuit law, they contend that the law requires evidence be 'of a specific nature and of prior incidents of similar alleged misconduct' to support the finding of a policy or custom. . . . There is no basis in our own Circuit law to limit the 'similar alleged conduct' in this case to only shooting incidents, when the Hogans' complaint alleges a more general policy and custom claim on the use of excessive force. It is clear that when a plaintiff alleges that an officer violated his constitutional rights by using excessive force, municipal liability may be imposed under § 1983 if that same officer has a history of excessive force conduct.[citing Beck] To establish deliberate indifference on the part of supervisors and the municipality, a plaintiff also may point to evidence of deficient treatment of prior, similar complaints against that officer. . . . Even without consideration of the Chiefs' Evaluation and the Keystone Study, the Hogans have come forward with sufficient evidence that, if believed, would establish a claim of deliberate indifference by the City Defendants to the use of excessive force by the officers involved in the Hogan shooting. They have shown that Defendant Beitler was involved in three excessive force incidents before the Hogan standoff, but was appointed to the SWAT Team and later to the Criminal Investigation Division. Defendant Marraccini was involved in two excessive force incidents before the Hogan standoff, but was appointed to the SWAT Team, and was involved in other incidents thereafter. Captain Mazzeo allegedly has an extensive record of excessive force complaints filed against him during his career, resulting in substantial monetary settlements. The Hogans have identified at least 12 incidents of excessive force involving Mazzeo, 22 incidents of excessive force involving defendant Michael Orchulli, 6 incidents involving defendant Lawrence Palmer, and 2 involving defendant John Remaley. Combined with the Grand Jury Report − which found that, at the time of the Hogan incident, the City had no Code of Conduct, written safety rules, or recognized manual of policies, and that the command structure failed to identify and remedy obvious safety deficiencies − and the report of plaintiffs' expert Clark − who opined that the use of force here was excessive − the Hogans have satisfied their summary judgment burden of coming forward with sufficient evidence to establish the existence of a policy or custom of deliberate indifference to the use of excessive force by EPD members."); Mayes v. City of Hammond, No. 2:03-CV-379-PRC, 2006 WL 1876979, 2006 WL 1876979, at *53 (N.D. Ind. July 5, 2006) (Plaintiff offered sufficient evidence that the HPD had a widespread policy or custom of failing to train its detectives in minimally acceptable police practices and of failing to supervise such that the City had not adopted an adequate policy regarding the preservation and production of exculpatory evidence."); Marriott v. County of Montgomery, 426 F.Supp.2d 1, 9 (N.D.N.Y. 2006) ("Defendants' argument is seriously flawed. First, constitutional analysis of a procedure does not stop with analysis of the written policy. Both parties here have provided ample evidence that whatever the written policy stated, the procedure that was followed in fact by the COs required all admittees to remove their clothes, submit to a visual examination by the CO conducting the 'change out,' and shower, without the CO making any individual determination that the arrestee possessed contraband. Constitutional words cannot erase unconstitutional conduct."); Castillo v. City and County of San Francisco, No. C 05-00284 WHA, 2006 WL 194709, at *9 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 23, 2006) ("Given the facts of this case, the thrust of the inquiry is whether it was likely that arrestees would be hurt unnecessarily because the city told its officers to handcuff them behind their backs unless the prisoners needed immediate medical care, even if they were otherwise complaining of pain. . . . San Francisco's policy, when seen in the light most favorable to plaintiff, is to refuse to adjust handcuffs for anyone who does not have an immediate need for medical attention. As in Alexander, there was no appearance in the instant case of an immediate need for medical attention at the time plaintiff asked to have the handcuffs adjusted. The Ninth Circuit held that, in those circumstances, police had used excessive force. A reasonable jury, fully crediting plaintiff's evidence, similarly could conclude that San Francisco's policy obviously was inadequate to prevent such a tort and that the city thereby exhibited deliberate indifference. This Court therefore cannot hold that the City and County of San Francisco is entitled to summary judgment on the Monell excessive-force claim."); Hare v. Zitek, No. 02 C 3973, 2005 WL 3470307, at *25 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 15, 2005) ("In an effort to show that the Village's retaliation was inflicted consistent with the Village's widespread practice of retaliation, Mr. Hare has presented testimony from numerous Stickney Police officers, who cooperated with the SAO [State's Attorney's Office]. These officers all testified that they were passed over for promotions, reprimanded, or terminated as a result of their cooperation. This testimony is sufficient to establish a series of violations and create a factual dispute on the issue of whether the Village had a widespread practice of retaliation against those who spoke against the alleged Village corruption."); Jackson v. Marion County Sheriff's Dep't., No. 103CV0879 DFHTAB, 2005 WL 3358876, at *8 (S.D. Ind. Dec. 9, 2005) ("On the overcrowding issue, however, there is sufficient evidence to present to a jury. Jackson has come forward with evidence of extreme overcrowding of the Lock-Up that was so prolonged as to amount to a government custom or policy reflecting deliberate indifference to likely violations of the constitutional rights of detainees. A jury could reasonably find on this record that the overcrowding presented a substantial risk of serious injury to detainees, that the Sheriff failed to take appropriate steps to protect inmates in this situation, and that the failure caused the beating of Jackson. The Sheriff is not entitled to summary judgment on this claim. Jackson has put forth evidence showing that at least as of May 1999 (27 years after the lead lawsuit was filed), the Sheriff was on notice that the overcrowded conditions of the Lock-Up led directly to inmate-on-inmate violence in violation of constitutional protections. In May 1999, for example, Judge Dillin found that due to overcrowding in the Lock-Up, 'fights in the cellblocks are commonplace, supervision within the cellblocks is minimal, fortuitous, or nonexistent, and injuries from the conflicts are an everyday occurrence.... These are conditions of 'current and ongoing' constitutional violations, and in this court's view are the result of the overcrowding in the Lockup.'. . .Three days before Jackson was beaten, the Sheriff was served with a Verified Petition for Contempt asserting that the overcrowding continued. The Sheriff responded to this petition by moving for a continuance of the contempt proceedings to determine if interim measures would resolve 'the overpopulation problems in the Marion County Lockup.'. . The Sheriff points to some of these interim measures as evidence of his efforts to alleviate the overcrowding and to improve conditions in the Lock-Up. However, Jackson has put forth evidence that on the day he was beaten, the Lock-Up was packed far beyond its 213 detainee population cap, and that the specific cell block where Jackson was kept was filled far beyond its capacity as well. Though evidence of Jackson's mental illness is incapable of supporting an independent claim for relief, it is still relevant to the issue of whether the overcrowding presented a substantial risk of serious injury to Jackson. Likewise, the Sheriff's intake and segregation policies may indeed be relevant to determining whether the Sheriff took appropriate steps to protect detainees from the substantial risk of serious harm posed by overcrowding."); Tardiff v. Knox County, 397 F.Supp.2d 115, 131, 132 , 135, 136 (D.Me. 2005)("While Knox County Policies C-120 and D-220 have clearly stated, since October 1994, that misdemeanor detainees are not to be strip searched without reasonable suspicion, the record presents undisputed evidence that substantial numbers of persons arrested for misdemeanor offenses were routinely strip searched without reasonable suspicion at the Knox County Jail. The reports generated by the Department of Corrections following the 1994 Jail Inspection and the 2000 Jail Inspection find, based on staff statements made at those times, that corrections officers at the jail were strip searching all detainees charged with misdemeanors. . . . Based on the undisputed evidence presented in the summary judgment record, the record shows, without cavil, that the practice by corrections officers of strip searching misdemeanor detainees was so widespread that the policymaking officials of the municipality had constructive knowledge of it. Moreover, the Court concludes that Knox County personnel with policy-making authority had actual notice that the corrections officers were unlawfully strip searching misdemeanor detainees without reasonable suspicion. . . . Even though it failed to promulgate new written procedures to eliminate the unconstitutional practice, Knox County could have employed a training regime directed at correcting the unconstitutional practice. . . . However, even if new officers' initial training on strip searches was conducted in accord with the written policy, such training was not aimed at stopping the corrections officers who were engaged in institutionally entrenched unconstitutional practice of strip searching all misdemeanor detainees brought to the Knox County Jail. The result was an ongoing practice that was far removed from the written policy. . . .The record before the Court contains no evidence that any official from Knox County directed, by way of written policy or procedure, training, or other means, that the unconstitutional practice stop. It could be argued that the direction to stop strip searching all misdemeanor detainees was implicit in the new procedures and training. Given the strong evidence of the persistence of the unconstitutional practice even after the 2001 procedural changes, no reasonable person could conclude that the actions of Knox County were directed at stopping the practice. At some point, it must have been evident to Knox County officials that the corrections staff had not gotten the message. Yet, there is no evidence that, even after the 2000 Jail Inspection Report indicated that the practice of strip searching all misdemeanor detainees who were housed continued, Sheriff Davey or any other official from Knox County promulgated any procedures, conducted any training, or engaged in any closer oversight, directed at eliminating the unconstitutional misdemeanor search practices of the corrections officers at the Knox County Jail. . . .The Court will, therefore, grant Plaintiffs' Motion for Partial Summary Judgment against Knox County on that part of Count I as to liability alleging that Plaintiffs' constitutional rights were violated as a result of the custom and practice of strip searching all misdemeanor detainees without reasonable suspicion."); Santiago v. Feeney, 379 F.Supp.2d 150, 159 (D. Mass. 2005) ("Plaintiff does not argue that the City's strip search policy is unconstitutional. Plaintiff contends that the City promotes a custom of illegal strip searches because its policy is ambiguous regarding how non-custodial strip searches must be authorized and conducted. . . While it can be argued that the City's strip search policy is ambiguous concerning whether a warrant must expressly authorize a strip search, it cannot be said that the City promoted a custom of unconstitutional strip searches."); Lingenfelter v. Bd. of County Commissioners of Reno County, 359 F.Supp.2d 1163, 1170, 1171 (D. Kan. 2005) ("Although he acknowledges his status as a county decision-maker and the jail's caretaker, Sheriff Rovenstine contends that he has no duty to ensure that detainees arrested without a warrant receive a probable cause hearing or gain release. Sheriff Rovenstine believes that someone else, perhaps the arresting officer or the prosecutor, is responsible for the period of confinement between a warrantless arrest and a judicial determination of probable cause. We find unconvincing the sheriff's attempt to shrug off his federal constitutional responsibilities toward detainees confined in the Kosciusko County Jail who have not yet had a probable cause hearing. . . . In the final analysis, the sheriff is the custodian of the persons incarcerated in the jail, and as such, it is he who is answerable for the legality of their custody. . . . Although it is true that the custodian of an arrestee does not have authority to force a judge to make a determination of probable cause, the custodian does have the power to release an arrestee if no timely probable cause finding has been made. Moreover, a failure by a custodian to notify a court of the need for a probable cause determination or a failure to ascertain whether a judicial determination of probable cause has been made are situations in which a custodian's actions could be found to be a proximate cause of a Gerstein violation. And if such actions are the result of a municipal policy or custom, as is alleged here, the municipality itself could be liable for having caused the violation."); Gremo v. Karlin, 363 F.Supp.2d 771, 792 (E.D. Pa. 2005) ("In the present case, plaintiff has sufficiently alleged that Gremo's harm was caused by a constitutional violation and that the municipal defendants, the City of Philadelphia and the School District of Philadelphia, may be held responsible for that constitutional violation because of their policies and/or customs. The municipal defendants' policies and/or customs alleged in the amended complaint included concealing information about violence, failing to address safety concerns, failing to train employees to avoid violations of constitutional rights, and cultivating an atmosphere where employees of the municipal defendants would fail to report incidents of violence. Gremo has satisfactorily stated a claim that defendants the City of Philadelphia and the School District of Philadelphia can be held constitutionally liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for violating plaintiff's substantive due process right to bodily integrity secured by the Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution."); Panaderia La Diana, Inc. v. Salt Lake City Corp., 342 F.Supp.2d 1013, 1036 (D. Utah 2004) ("A city cannot shield itself from all liability for potential constitutional violations by the simple expedient of enacting a general policy statement that it is the city's policy to not violate constitutional rights."); Otero v. Wood, 316 F.Supp.2d 612, 627 (S.D. Ohio 2004) ("There are two distinct bases that support municipal liability in this case. First, liability may be based on the City policy that allows the use of wooden baton rounds as a 'first resort' − before the use of less dangerous alternatives. Plaintiff has presented evidence that the City has a policy of discouraging the use of tear gas. Curmode testified that she was ordered by the Deputy Chief of the CDP to discourage the SWAT unit's use of tear gas. This order originated from the policy level of the City and therefore represents City policy, even though it is an unwritten policy. This order was a moving force behind the decision to use wooden baton rounds, or at least to use wooden baton rounds as the first resort, so soon after providing a warning. The Court has already held that the mere use of knee knocker rounds under the circumstances here was excessive force, at least under the facts as presented by Plaintiff. Whatever policy the City had regarding the use of riot guns loaded with wooden baton rounds allowed those guns to be used before extensive warnings, warning shots, or tear gas − all of which would have decreased the risk of serious bodily injury. The City therefore had a policy that caused the excessive force, thereby causing Plaintiff's injury. The second ground for municipal liability here is based on the City's ratification of the unlawful conduct. Defendants are correct that, generally speaking, evidence of later events cannot establish that a given violation was caused by an official custom or policy. . . A municipality may, however, ratify its employees' acts − thereby subjecting itself to § 1983 liability − by failing meaningfully to investigate those acts. . . Viewed in this light, evidence that a municipality inadequately investigated an alleged constitutional violation can be seen as evidence of a policy that would condone the conduct at issue."); Barry v. New York City Police Department, No. 01 Civ.10627 CBM, 2004 WL 758299, at *13 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 7, 2004) (not reported) ("Unlike other cases in which courts have found insufficient evidence of a custom of retaliation, plaintiff's witnesses speak from firsthand experience about the blue wall of silence and plaintiff alleges to have suffered a wide range of retaliatory acts as opposed to one discrete instance of retaliation. . . . Moreover, in contradistinction to the cases defendants cite in defense of their claim that the court should disregard the factual findings of the Mollen Report, here, plaintiff complains of acts that are of the precise nature as the customs and practices described in the Report. As such, the Report is admissible with regard to its factual findings. . . . On balance, in light of the evidence before the court, a reasonable jury could find that a widespread custom of retaliating against officers who expose police misconduct, with officials willfully ignoring if not facilitating the practice, pervades the NYPD."); Leisure v. City of Cincinnati, 267 F. Supp.2d 848, 857, 858 (S.D. Ohio 2003) ("Though the City runs through a laundry list of 'constitutionally adequate policies and procedures' it has on the books, Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint, as explained above, can be read to attack an unwritten custom articulated by the Chief of Police. That unwritten custom, Plaintiffs allege, makes a game of pursuits, that 'cops like a good foot pursuit...the thrill of victory the agony of defeat' . . Defendant correctly cites to Doe v. Tennessee, 103 F.3d 495 (6th Cir.1996) for authority on unconstitutional custom, including the proposition that such custom 'must be so permanent and well settled as to constitute a custom or usage with the force of law' . . . Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint alleges that an unwritten custom has persisted for many years, citing to events and history that Defendant challenged as 'unrelated' and 'irrelevant' to Plaintiffs' injury. The Court finds that Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint adequately pleads that the City has had unconstitutional customs so permanent and well settled as to meet the Sixth Circuit's definition in Doe."); Garcia v. City of Chicago, No. 01 C 8945, 2003 WL 1845397, at 3-5 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 8, 2003) (not reported) ("The relevant question is whether Garcia's injury would have been avoided had the City adequately investigated, disciplined, and prosecuted its police officer employees, instead of protecting them from taking responsibility for their misconduct. . . . In Latuszkin, after concluding that there was no basis to find that any city policymakers' were directly involved in the acts at issue, which is a finding under the third method of establishing a municipal policy, the Seventh Circuit went on to find that furthermore, 'nothing in Mr. Latuszkin's complaint suggests that a few parties held in a police department parking lot should have come to the attention of City policymakers.'. . This determination constitutes a finding under [] the second method of proving a municipal policy existed, whether there was a widespread practice. In this case, it is true that Garcia did not present evidence that the final policymaker for the City of Chicago, the City Council, directly participated in the failure to investigate and discipline Chicago Police officers who allegedly committed acts of excessive force. Instead, this court's denial of summary judgment was based upon Garcia's presentation of evidence that the failure to investigate and discipline was

'so persistent and widespread that the City policymakers should have known about the behavior.' . . . evaluating all the facts in the light most favorable to Garcia, and drawing all reasonable inferences in Garcia's favor, a reasonable juror could conclude that a custom or policy of not investigating alleged misconduct of police officers, whether they are acting under color of law or as private citizens, would result in police officers, such as Oshana, believing they could use excessive force against civilians, such as Garcia, with impunity."); Garrett v. Unified Government of Athens-Clarke County, 246 F. Supp.2d 1262, 1279, 1280 (M.D. Ga. 2003) ("[T]he Unified Government had no formal, written policy instructing officers to hog-tie suspects in a manner that would violate their constitutional rights. Therefore, the Court must now determine whether the Unified Government had informally adopted a custom of unconstitutionally hog-tying suspects . . . .The Court finds that Plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence to show that the Unified Government had a widespread custom of using the hog-tie restraint on suspects. . . . However, a finding that there was widespread use of the hog-tie restraint does not automatically equate to a finding that there was widespread unconstitutional use of the hog-tie restraint so as to impose municipal liability. . . . Although Plaintiff has presented evidence that Athens-Clarke County officers regularly used the hog-tie restraint, she has not presented any evidence from which a reasonable jury could infer that the hog-tie restraint was persistently employed in an unconstitutional manner so as to constitute a custom of the Unified Government."), reversed and remanded on other grounds, 378 F.3d 1274 (11th Cir. 2004); Sarnicola v. County of Westchester, 229 F. Supp.2d 259, 276 (S.D.N.Y. 2002) ("Sgt. McGurn's actions did not accord with the written strip search/body cavity search policy of Westchester County, which requires reasonable suspicion based on the circumstances of the case. . . However, while the search was a violation of the written policy of Westchester County, it may have been undertaken pursuant to the actual practices and usual customs of the Westchester County police. The deposition testimony of both Sgt. McGurn and Officer Beckley suggest that stip searching all felony narcotics arrestees (possibly including a visual body cavity search) was a routine practice of the County Police. . . The potential contradiction between the policy and the practices of the Westchester County Police preclude summary judgement."); Williams v. Payne, 73 F. Supp.2d 785, 798 (E.D. Mich. 1999) ("One clear and reasonable conclusion that can be drawn from these admissions is that the City of Pontiac, through its police department, maintained a widespread practice to take suspects whom they believed to have ingested narcotic evidence to a hospital for a stomach pumping procedure. These admissions also suggest that one of the ordinary, foreseeable tasks of a police officer is to confront people who are suspected of engaging in the illicit drug market, and that such people commonly ingest drug-related evidence. The facts, when taken in the light most favorable to the opponent of the motion, are sufficient to create a genuine issue of a material fact as to whether a claimed unconstitutional police practice was so widespread as to evince deliberate indifference on the part of the City which resulted in a violation of Williams' constitutional rights."); Flores v. City of Mount Vernon, 41 F. Supp.2d 439, 446 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) ("No Monell motion has been made by the municipal defendants here, and none would lie, since the search was conducted pursuant to an admitted policy of strip searching everyone who was arrested for narcotics activity."); Open Inns, Ltd. v. Chester County Sheriff's Dep't, 24 F. Supp.2d 410, 429, 430 (E.D. Pa. 1998) ("[W]e find that the Chester County Sheriff's Department has an admitted unconstitutional custom or practice of authorizing its officers, at any hour of the day or night, to be hired by private parties to accompany and assist them in serving process in civil actions and then to remain on the premises at the behest (and expense) of the private parties while those private parties carry out seizures, without any inquiry into the legality of such actions, such as whether the seizures are taken pursuant to an antecedent court order or writ."); Gary v. Sheahan, No. 96 C 7294, 1998 WL 547116, *6 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 20, 1998) (not reported) ("[T]his court finds that there is no issue of material fact regarding whether a municipal policy existed that required the routine strip searching of women while men were not routinely subjected to such a strip search in the receiving room upon returning from court. The fact that such a policy is not a written policy or, indeed conflicts with a written statement of policy, does not defeat the plaintiffs' claim that such a policy existed. This court finds that the practice under review was so widespread so as to constitute a de facto policy."); Brown v. City of Margate, 842 F. Supp. 515, 518 (S.D. Fla. 1993) ("[A] smaller number of incidents where the investigation and resulting disciplinary actions were inadequate may be more indicative of a pattern than a larger number of incidents where the department fully and satisfactorily addressed the matter and responded appropriately. . . . While the six incidents of alleged excessive use of force in Carter [v. District of Columbia] may not have been statistically significant in Washington, D.C., three such incidents may be sufficient to establish a pattern in Margate."), aff'd, 56 F.3d 1390 (11th Cir. 1995); Pottinger v. City of Miami, 810 F. Supp. 1551, 1561 (S.D. Fla. 1992) (Class of homeless persons established that unconstitutional arrests and property seizures by city police were executed pursuant to city custom or policy, so as to make city liable under section 1983.); Gomez v. Metro Dade County, Fla., 801 F. Supp. 674, 679 (S.D. Fla. 1992) ("In order to impose liability under a 'custom or usage' theory of municipal liability, [plaintiff] must prove a longstanding and widespread practice that is deemed authorized by policymaking officials because they must have known about it and failed to stop it."); McDonald v. Dunning, 760 F. Supp. 1156, 1170 (E.D. Va. 1991) (policy of incarcerating persons arrested on warrant for failure to appear to serve sentence previously imposed without permitting such persons appearance before judicial officer).

See also McDowell v. District of Columbia, 233 F.R.D. 192, 200, 201, 204 (D.D.C. 2006) ("Plaintiff's theory of the case is that Officer S. Williams ("Williams") of the Metropolitan Police Department violated her rights by conducting an illegal strip search and body cavity search. Plaintiff is suing both the District of Columbia and Williams, in her individual capacity. As a result of the difficulties faced by plaintiff in trying to obtain discovery in this case, plaintiff seeks an order granting summary judgment against the District as to the 'practice of allowing in the field strip searches or searches that involve viewing or touching inside the clothes searches' as well as costs and attorneys' fees incurred by plaintiff as a result of defendants' failure to produce the requested discovery materials, namely, the spreadsheet and PD 163's. . . Plaintiff moves under Rule 37 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. . . . By requesting that the court granted summary judgment as to her claim that defendants engage in a practice of allowing improper strip searches, plaintiff is in essence seeking a default judgment. In general, courts favor disposing of cases on their merits. . . Thus, courts must take care, especially when contemplating a litigation-ending sanction, to ensure that it is proportional to the underlying conduct. . .This care requires consideration of three factors: 1) the resulting prejudice to the opposing party, 2) the resulting prejudice to the judicial system, and 3) the need to deter such behavior in the future. . . . As in Caldwell, an award of attorneys fees is indeed warranted here. But for the inefficiencies in defendants' filing system, taken as a whole, discovery in this case would never have dragged on as it has. Such an award, therefore, coupled with a carefully worded instruction to the jury, explaining that a negative inference may be drawn from defendants' inability to locate information within its possession, will more than suffice. . . . Defendants' conduct in this case, while exasperating, in no way suggests any underlying bad faith. The resulting prejudice to the court is not as great as it could have been, because trial dates have not yet been set. On the other hand, the resulting prejudice to plaintiff, the probable inability to obtain the discovery necessary to make out her Monell claim, is significant. However, this resulting prejudice, coupled with the need to deter such behavior in the future, can be adequately remedied by the imposition of attorneys' fees and costs against defendants and the possibility of a jury instruction that addresses plaintiff's lack of evidence as to her Monell claim.").

Note that liability is attributed to the government unit in custom type cases through a policymaker's actual or constructive knowledge of and acquiescence in the unconstitutional custom or practice. See, e.g., Baron v. Suffolk County Sheriff's Dep't, 402 F.3d 225, 240-43(1st Cir. 2005) (The Department assigns error to the district court's identification of 'the Department' as the relevant policymaker, arguing that the failure to identify a specific final policymaker within the Department was erroneous because it allowed the jury to find municipal liability if any Department employee knew of Baron's harassment claims. . . Although the district court's instruction would be error if understood this way, . . . it must be read as qualified by the court's later statement that liability could be imposed only if 'Department policymakers' were aware of the custom of retaliation and Baron's situation. It is highly unlikely that the jury interpreted the phrase 'Department policymakers' to mean 'any Department employee,' particularly in light of evidence that the Department superintendent, not just 'any' employee, was aware of Baron's complaints. Yet, even this qualified version of the court's statement might be too broad under the case law because it is only a policy made by the final policymaker that exposes a municipality to liability . . . . Therefore, in a case alleging an affirmative wrongful policy (as opposed to a custom acquiesced in), the court would have to identify an individual or body as the final policymaker, and the jury would have to determine whether the policy at issue could be attributed to that policymaker. . . However, Baron claims not that an individual or body adopted an unconstitutional policy but that the Department had a custom tolerated by policymakers who should have intervened to correct it. In this custom context, our past language has sometimes referred to policymakers in the plural, rather than to a final policymaker. . . The requirement in the affirmative policy cases that the district court identify a final policymaker may therefore not apply in those cases based on custom. . . . We need not resolve this question here; under the plain error standard, it is enough that any error in the district court's reference to 'Department policymakers' without identification of a specific final policymaker is not clear. Moreover, even if the district court should have identified a final policymaker in this custom case, the Department is not entitled to a new trial because it cannot show prejudice resulting from the error. In a post-trial ruling, the district court concluded without explanation that the superintendent and deputy superintendent set policy for the jail in the relevant areas, implying that it believed Feeney was the relevant policymaker. . . If Feeney did set final policy for the House of Correction, the Department was not prejudiced by the verdict because he admitted that he knew that the code of ilence existed, that there could be consequences for violating it, and that Baron had complained of harassment. In other words, the jury could have found that Feeney had knowledge of the custom that resulted in a deprivation of Baron's constitutional rights and that he acquiesced in the custom by failing to take actions to stop it. The Department asserts, however, that Sheriff Rouse, not Feeney, was the final policymaker under state law. Although there is no evidence on this issue in the record, it seems self-evident that the sheriff is the final policymaker within the Department as a matter of law. . . Emphasizing that Baron did not present any evidence regarding the Sheriff's actual knowledge of the code of silence and retaliatory harassment, the Department contends that a legal determination that the Sheriff was the final policymaker conclusively establishes prejudice. On this point, the Department is wrong. It is true that Baron did not demonstrate that the Sheriff actually knew of the custom that led to his constructive discharge. Although Rouse may not have had actual knowledge of the custom, however, municipal liability can also be based on a policymaker's constructive knowledge − that is, if the custom is so widespread that municipal policymakers should have known of it. . . If the jury had been instructed that Rouse was the policymaker, it might have agreed that there was insufficient evidence to establish that he acquiesced in or condoned enforcement of the code of silence. On the other hand, the jury might also have concluded that if Superintendent Feeney was aware of the code of silence as third-in-command in the Department, constructive knowledge was also attributable to Rouse. . . . n short, the code of silence charged by Baron was real and pervasive. Viewing the verdict against this background, we conclude that the jury instruction's failure to identify a policymaker was not an error (if an error at all) that 'seriously affect[s] the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of judicial proceedings.'"); Jeffes v. Barnes, 208 F.3d 49, 64 (2d Cir. 2000)("In sum, a jury could permissibly find that the code of silence was part of Barnes's standard operating procedure at the Jail and that his affirmative actions were a direct cause of the violations of plaintiffs' First Amendment rights. In light of the scope, duration, openness, and pervasiveness of the retaliation against officers who broke the code of silence, the jury could find that Barnes was well aware of the existence and thrust of those acts of retaliation. Based on his failure to make any effort to forestall, halt, or redress the retaliatory conduct, the jury could well find that, even if Barnes did not directly cause the retaliation, he either acquiesced in it or was deliberately indifferent to the reprisals against officers who exercised their First Amendment rights in breach of the code of silence. Given our conclusion as a matter of law that Barnes was the County's final policymaker with respect to the conduct of his staff members toward one another in this area, any of these findings would suffice for the imposition of liability on the County."); McNabola v. Chicago Transit Authority, 10 F.3d 501, 511 (7th Cir. 1993) ("A municipal 'custom' may be established by proof of the knowledge of policymaking officials and their acquiescence in the established practice."); Sorlucco v. New York City Police Department, 971 F.2d 864, 871 (2d Cir. 1992) ("[A] § 1983 plaintiff may establish a municipality's liability by demonstrating that the actions of subordinate officers are sufficiently widespread to constitute the constructive acquiescence of senior policymakers."); Brown v. City of Fort Lauderdale, 923 F.2d 1474 (11th Cir. 1991) ("[A] longstanding and widespread practice is deemed authorized by the policymaking officials because they must have known about it but failed to stop it."); Bielevicz v. Dubinon, 915 F.2d 845, 854 (3d Cir. 1990) (jury could infer that policymakers knew of custom of using charge of public drunkenness to incarcerate individuals who were not intoxicated).

See also M.N.O. v. Magana, Nos. Civ. 03-6393-TC, Civ. 04-1021-TC, Civ. 04-6017-TC, Civ. 04-6018-TC, Civ.04-6183-TC, Civ. 04-6443-TC, 2006 WL 559214, at *11, *12 (D. Ore. Mar. 6, 2006) ("When the Chief learned in April 2002 of Magana's stop of Dean, and everyone from the IA investigator, to the auditor, to the Chief himself believed Magana was probably lying about what happened, the need for more or different action was obvious, as the existent policy of dealing with the supervision of officers and the handling of reports of sexual misconduct was clearly likely to result in the violation of someone's constitutional rights. Although defendant alleges that the Chief could not have known from the Dean report the ultimate extent of Magana and Lara's activities, and that they were going to deprive women of their rights to be free from sexual assault from officers, it is quite clear that the Chief was aware that Magana was likely stopping Dean without a reasonable basis to do so, which is a constitutional violation itself. Further, a factfinder could reasonably conclude that an obvious possible conclusion of these sorts of stops would carry into the realm of sexual assault. A police officer who 'hits' on women he encounters while on duty and lies about his conduct is a flagrant and transparent concern. At a minimum, the incident should have alerted the Chief to the need for greater supervision of Magana's contacts with women while on patrol. In sum, a factfinder could find that the Chiefs' collective failure to do anything, even after Buchanan learned of the Dean incident, constituted deliberate indifference. Finally, it is an easy call that whether such deliberate indifference was a causal factor in causing plaintiffs' constitutional injuries is a jury question. If the jury concludes that policymakers were deliberately indifferent in their failure to act to protect plaintiffs' constitutional rights and that such amounted to an official policy or custom of inaction, that jury could conclude that such policy of inaction was a direct causal link in causing the injuries. For the above reasons, defendant's motion for summary judgment on plaintiffs' claims alleging Monell liability against the City is denied."); Brown v. Mitchell, 327 F.Supp.2d 615, 634, 635, 646 (E.D. Va. 2004) ("In sum, therefore, at least as respects capital improvements and the Jail, as a matter of local law, although the City Manager certainly has the duty to advise and to make recommendations, Dr. Jamison's office is not the repository of final policymaking authority. . . Rather, the City Charter vests that role in the City Council. As a matter of law, the Court holds that, as respects Brown's Section 1983 suit against the City, the City Council constitutes the final policymaking entity. That holding, however, is not fatal to Brown's Section 1983 case against the City because the record contains substantial evidence that, when construed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, would permit the jury to conclude that the City Council itself had knowledge of the conditions at the Jail and engaged in an official policy or custom of inaction towards the Jail in the period leading up to Stevenson's death. . . And, because the City Council constitutes the final policymaking authority respecting the Jail, this evidence is sufficient for purposes of summary judgment and the Monell 'custom or policy' requirement. . . . Taken as a whole, the record would permit a reasonable jury to find that the City Council, and hence the City, was aware of the long history of overcrowding, poor ventilation, and structural defects at the Jail and the risks that those conditions posed, including the risk of spreading infectious disease. Moreover, a jury could conclude that the Jail's conditions violated established federal constitutional rights. And, the record clearly would permit a reasonable jury to conclude that the well-established custom and policy of the City was to be deliberately indifferent to the rights allegedly violated. . . . Simply put, the record here would support a finding that Mitchell, who is statutorily responsible for the safe housing of the City's inmates, knowingly maintained a dangerously overcrowded facility. And, when construed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, the fact that Mitchell, by bringing the overcrowding issue to the attention of various City officials, took some steps to alleviate this serious problem does not eliminate the prospect that a jury would so conclude. To be sure, Mitchell can offer that evidence to establish her state of mind. But, that evidence, considered with the record as a whole, merely creates a disputed issue of fact. It does not keep the case from the jury."); Blair v. City of Cleveland, 148 F. Supp.2d 894, 915 (N.D. Ohio 2000)("Plaintiffs in the case sub judice cannot establish that there was a persistent, pervasive practice, attributable to a course deliberately pursued by official policy-makers, which caused the deprivation of Pipkins' constitutional rights. Absent such a course of conduct on the part of the City of Cleveland, to hold the City liable under a failure to investigate theory would be to hold the City liable solely for the actions of its employees. Accordingly, with regard to Plaintiffs' failure to investigate theory, the City of Cleveland is entitled to judgment as a matter of law."); Smith v. Blue, 67 F. Supp.2d 686, 689 (S.D. Tex. 1999) ("Throughout the Complaint, Plaintiffs specifically allege that the practice of pre-recording and then avoiding visual checks was so pervasive as to constitute a custom or policy, and that such a practice was the result of inadequate training. While municipal liability based on inadequate training is difficult to establish, Plaintiffs have alleged facts that support such a theory. Specifically, individual Defendants' admission that it was a routine practice to fill out inspection records beforehand, to save time on paperwork, and evidence that Defendants had lied about the visual checks even after the discovery of Justin's death provide support for that theory."); Culberson v. Doan, 65 F. Supp.2d 701, 716 (S.D. Ohio 1999) ("[W]e conclude that Plaintiffs sufficiently allege in their Complaint that Defendants intentionally engaged in the activity of 'selective enforcement' in violation of § 1983 by failing to act upon her reports of abuse and beatings by Defendant Doan. Such actions of 'selective enforcement' based on race, nationality, religion, or gender can give rise to a claim under § 1983. . . Plaintiffs also sufficiently allege in their Complaint that Defendant Payton, the Chief of the Blanchester Police Department, acted under a policy or custom of the Blanchester Police Department to engage in 'selective enforcement' in this case."); Jones v. Thompson, 818 F. Supp. 1263, 1269 (S.D. Ind. 1993) ("Defendants' actions and inaction were the result of both policymakers of Madison County . . . and of the custom and practice to apply restraints without medical consultations and keep them on for extended and undocumented periods without review."); McLin v. City of Chicago, 742 F. Supp. 994, 1002 (N.D. Ill. 1990) (plaintiffs' allegations "that the code of silence is widespread and that policymaking individuals knew of the code of silence but failed to take steps to eliminate it...are sufficient to state a claim against the City for a policy or custom."). Accord Myatt v. City of Chicago, 1991 WL 94036 (N.D. Ill. May 23, 1991) (not reported) (finding significant the alleged admission of high-ranking police officials that a code of silence exists).

See also Myers v. County of Orange, 157 F.3d 66, 69, 77 (2d Cir. 1998) ("We hold that a policy by a police department or district attorney's ("DA") office favoring an initial complainant over a later one without giving primary regard to the particular facts involved in the case violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. We also hold that, where a district attorney in New York implements a policy directing a police department and assistant district attorneys not to entertain cross-complaints, that policy is imputed to the county, not the State of New York, for purposes of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 liability. . . . In the instant case, the County was found liable not for ADA Brock's decision to prosecute Myers, but for a DA policy that directed the Port Jervis police and county ADAs to engage in investigative procedures that violated Myers' equal protection rights. Orange County's liability for the DA's managerial decision to implement the cross-complaint policy is on a par with a DA's 'direct[ion to] the police to arrest and detain [plaintiff] without a warrant,' Claude H., 626 N.Y.S.2d at 935-36, a DA's 'long practice of ignoring evidence of police misconduct and sanctioning and covering up wrongdoing,' Walker, 974 F.2d at 301 (citing Gentile, 926 F.2d at 152 n. 5), and a DA's 'decision not to supervise or train ADAs on Brady and perjury issues,' id., all of which would result in county liability. Thus, Orange County was properly found liable.").

See also Benfer v. City of Baytown, Texas, 120 F.4th 1272, 1286 & n.14 (5th Cir. 2024) ("Benfer's amended complaint identifies five instances of Baytown police allegedly using dogs to apprehend suspects impermissibly. But Benfer fails to provide the needed factual context for four of those incidents—his threadbare complaint notes only the existence of K-9 encounters that resulted in bites. He does not detail the facts surrounding those encounters or make any attempt to show the needed 'similarity and specificity' between events. . . Those five instances also occurred over the span of four years (2019–2022). Five incidents of excessive force over four years in a city as large as Baytown[14] [fn. 14: Baytown had a population of 83,701 according to the 2020 census] is not enough to meet the heavy burden of showing that Baytown had a custom of allowing officers to use police dogs unconstitutionally. Cf. Davidson v. City of Stafford, 848 F.3d 384, 396–97 (5th Cir. 2017) (noting that three incidents over three-and-a-half years were insufficient to establish a pattern of constitutional violations). Therefore, the district court did not err in finding that Benfer had failed plausibly to allege that the City of Baytown had inadequate written policies concerning the use of police dogs or had a pattern/custom of using police dogs to inflict injuries on non-threatening suspects."); Bridges v. Dart, 950 F.3d 476, 478-81 (7th Cir. 2020) ("According to Bridges, the defendants had a policy, practice or procedure to ignore medically necessary prescriptions for lower bunk placements. In support of this claim, Bridges cited in his complaint five lawsuits filed by Department detainees who alleged that, between 2005 and 2012, they were injured when using upper bunks after their lower bunk prescriptions were ignored. . . .We have not adopted bright-line rules defining 'widespread custom or practice,' but there must be some evidence demonstrating that there is a policy at issue rather than a random event or even a short series of random events. . . As we noted in Thomas, we have rejected claims of widespread custom or practice in cases involving a single incident, or three incidents. . . .In the district court, Bridges relied on five inmate complaints over a seven-year period to demonstrate that the defendants had a widespread practice of refusing to honor lower bunk prescriptions. On appeal, Bridges relies on only three of those cases. Two of them settled without any admission of liability and the third was dismissed. Bridges nevertheless asserts that these lawsuits put the defendants on notice that lower bunk prescriptions were being ignored with enough frequency to constitute a widespread practice. . . . These incidents were so few and far between that they could not plausibly be described as 'so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law.'. .We suppose that if the Cook County Department of Corrections housed as few inmates as Sheriff Andy Taylor's two-cell lockup in small town Mayberry, three or five incidents in a short period of time might create a question for a jury regarding whether a practice is widespread. But more than five million people reside in Cook County, and the Department houses thousands of detainees, with hundreds entering and leaving on a daily basis. In this context, three or five incidents over a seven-year period is inadequate as a matter of law to demonstrate a widespread custom or practice."); Payne v. Sevier County, 681 F. App'x 443, 447 (6th Cir. 2017) ("The custom that harmed Payne here, he says, is the County's alleged practice of forwarding grievances against First Med to First Med itself. But Payne submitted no evidence that the County followed that putative custom when dealing with inmates other than Payne. Indeed, Payne's only proof were his own five grievance forms, all submitted within a three-month window. Per our decision in Thomas, five instances of alleged misconduct, over three months, all involving the plaintiff himself is not enough to prove a custom. . . Moreover, as Payne himself points out, Lieutenant Loveday allegedly said that he forwarded Payne's grievances to First Med because he was 'too busy' to address them himself. That suggests that the handling of Payne's grievances was due more to Loveday's personal circumstances than to a widespread custom. Payne has therefore failed to raise a genuine dispute that a custom caused his injuries."); Davidson v. City of Stafford, Texas, 848 F.3d 384, 395-96 (5th Cir. 2017) ("Here, the underlying conduct by Officers Flagg and Jones, while unconstitutional, was not sufficiently extreme to qualify for a finding of ratification. . . Chief Krahn's conduct is more analogous to the conduct in Zarnow, where we did not find ratification when a municipality defended the constitutionality and propriety of its officers' actions, despite our later determination that the officers' actions violated the Fourth Amendment. . . Chief Krahn's actions in investigating Officers Flagg's and Jones's conduct thus cannot support an allegation of ratification resulting in an official policy on the part of the City. Davidson's final argument attempts to impute a policy of unconstitutionally enforcing § 38.02 to the City by relying on seven incidents between January 2010 and June 2013 in which Stafford PD arrested individuals due to, among other things, a violation of § 38.02. In order to find a municipality liable for a policy based on a pattern, that pattern 'must have occurred for so long or so frequently that the course of conduct warrants the attribution to the governing body of knowledge that the objectionable conduct is the expected, accepted practice of city employees.'. . A pattern requires similarity, specificity, and sufficiently numerous prior incidents. . . But Davidson's evidence of an alleged pattern lacks the detail necessary to find a policy on the part of the City. As an initial matter, Davidson provides no evidence that any of the previous arrests resulted in subsequent litigation alleging a constitutional violation. Looking to these prior arrests, most appear to involve facts demonstrating that the arrestees had committed or were in the act of committing another crime, in addition to their failure to identify. Under this court's precedent, these arrests likely did not involve a constitutional violation, as the officers likely had probable cause to arrest these defendants for the other crime. . . . If we remove these cases from our consideration, Davidson's pattern relies on three cases (two from the records obtained by Davidson and Davidson's case) over three-and-a-half years to form the basis of the alleged pattern of constitutional violations. Without further context of the size of Stafford PD or the amount of arrests made over the corresponding period, these incidents are insufficient to establish a pattern of constitutional violations by the Stafford PD. See, e.g., Carnaby v. City of Houston, 636 F.3d 183, 189–90 (5th Cir. 2011) (no pattern: two reports of violations of a policy in four years in Houston); Peterson, 588 F.3d at 851 & n.4 (no pattern: twenty-seven complaints of excessive force over four years in Fort Worth); Pineda v. City of Houston, 291 F.3d 325, 329 (5th Cir. 2002) (no pattern: eleven incidents of warrantless searches in Houston). Because Davidson's arguments on an official policy on the part of the City and ratification based on Chief Krahn's conduct also fail, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the City on Davidson's § 1983 municipality liability claim."); Carnaby v. City of Houston, 636 F.3d 183, 189, 190 (5th Cir. 2011) ("Mrs. Carnaby alleges that the city failed to train the officers properly in how to approach a high-risk vehicle and that it was the officers' improper approach to Carnaby's car that led to their objectively reasonable belief that deadly force was necessary. In other words, Mrs. Carnaby urges that if the officers had properly approached Carnaby's stopped vehicle, they would not have been in a position in which they would have been at risk from Carnaby's possible firearm, so they would not have shot him. We have yet to address, directly, whether a municipality can ever be held liable for failure to train its officers adequately where the officers did not commit any constitutional violation; we need not decide that issue here. Even if the answer were in the affirmative, Mrs. Carnaby has not produced sufficient evidence to meet all the requirements for municipal liability. To succeed on her failure-to-train claim, she must show that (1) the training procedures were inadequate; (2) the city's policymaker was deliberately indifferent in adopting the training policy; and (3) the inadequate training policy directly caused Carnaby's injury. . . Mrs. Carnaby fails on the second requirement. . . . At the most basic level, she has provided no direct evidence that the policymakers should have known that the training provided in 2004 was insufficient to educate officers, such that those policymakers were deliberately indifferent to the training's weaknesses. Thus, even if the city could be liable for failure to train in the absence of a constitutional violation, Mrs. Carnaby has not produced sufficient evidence to defeat summary judgment."); Jones v. Muskegon County, 625 F.3d 935, 946, 947 (6th Cir. 2010) ("Although Plaintiff did present evidence that several inmates' medical requests were ignored by jail personnel, including Jones's, a jury could not reasonably infer from these five incidents alone that the County had a widespread, permanent, and well-settled custom of ignoring inmate requests. . . Furthermore, Nurse Yonker's statement that inmates are 'not supposed to feel good' does not demonstrate any purported custom by the County Jail, only an unfortunate statement by one prison employee. Because Plaintiff failed to establish a custom of deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of inmates at the Muskegon County Jail, the court affirms the district court's grant of summary judgment in the County's favor."); Clouthier v. County of Contra Costa, 591 F.3d 1232, 1251, 1252, 1254 (9th Cir. 2010) ("Drawing all inferences in favor of the Clouthiers, a reasonable jury could conclude that the custodial and mental health staff were deficient in their implementation of the County's written policy, because the custodial staff failed to ensure they had the approval of mental health staff before moving Clouthier. However, that does not create a triable issue of fact on the question whether the County itself is liable for this deficiency. There is no evidence that the County had a longstanding custom or practice of moving detainees from an observation cell into general population without consultation with mental health staff or contrary to their recommendations. Nor is there evidence of a longstanding custom or practice of miscommunication between mental health staff and custodial staff. There is no evidence that the County was on actual or constructive notice that deficiencies in the implementation of its policy would likely result in a constitutional violation. Moreover, nothing in the record indicates that improper transfers of suicidal inmates happened so frequently that the need for corrective measures 'must have been plainly obvious to the city policymakers.'. . In fact, the evidence in the record indicates that between 2001 and 2006, out of more than 175,000 inmates processed at the County's Martinez Detention Facility, 158 suicide attempts were discovered and only six inmates succeeded in committing suicide. . . The County's expert testified that this suicide rate is 'far lower than the statewide average, and far lower than the rate in jails in most counties with similar population sizes.' Not only did the Clouthiers fail to adduce evidence of a pattern of repeated tortious conduct by County staff, but they also failed to adduce evidence of even a single other suicide resulting from the improper transfer of an inmate from an observation cell into the general population. . . . The Clouthiers have not produced sufficient evidence to create a triable issue as to the question whether Clouthier's death was due to a long-standing custom or practice of the County, an omission that amounted to deliberate indifference, or actions the County adopted as policy when it failed to discipline Blush. Holding the County liable for the missteps of its employees in this case would therefore amount to 'de facto respondeat superior liability,' an avenue rejected in Monell."); Peterson v. City of Fort Worth, Tex., 588 F.3d 838, 850-52 (5th Cir. 2009) ("A pattern is tantamount to official policy when it is 'so common and well-settled as to constitute a custom that fairly represents municipal policy.'. . . A pattern requires similarity and specificity; '[p]rior indications cannot simply be for any and all Abad' or unwise acts, but rather must point to the specific violation in question.' Estate of Davis ex rel. McCully v. City of North Richland Hills, 406 F.3d 375, 383 (5th Cir.2005). A pattern also requires 'sufficiently numerous prior incidents,' as opposed to 'isolated instances.' [discussion of Pineda] The district court, relying on Pineda, held that the 27 complaints on which Peterson relies were insufficient to establish a pattern of excessive force. After careful examination of the record, we conclude the district court did not err. Peterson presented evidence that, according to the City's internal affairs records, at least 27 complaints of excessive force were filed between 2002 and 2005. Almost all arose from officers' investigations of what may be called small crimes; the injuries suffered, however, ranged from minor lacerations to broken bones. In one incident, officers allegedly stopped a suspect who was riding a bicycle and, after he had dismounted the bicycle and lay on the ground, beat him until his face bled and his nose and eye socket were fractured. In another incident, an officer who detained an individual as a suspect in the burglary of a car wash knee-struck him in the back and broke his jaw; that individual turned out to be, not a suspect, but one of the car wash's owners. In yet another incident, officers allegedly punched and beat a suspect until he suffered a head injury; although the officers claimed that the suspect was carrying a crack pipe, they were unable to produce the pipe. And finally, in an even more alarming incident, officers responding to a call alleging tampering with an electrical box entered an apartment without a warrant and allegedly tased an individual until he was unconscious and had stopped breathing. The incidents allege use of force that, if true, would be emphatically excessive. Nevertheless, assuming their truth, the incidents do not, on the basis of this record, tell us that the City maintained an official policy of condoning excessive force. The failure of the evidence is that the plaintiffs have failed to provide context that would show a pattern of establishing a municipal policy. . . For example, the record does not indicate the size of the Fort Worth Police Department or how many arrests were made by the department between 2002 and 2005. We have previously indicated that the size of a police department may be relevant to determining whether a series of incidents can be called a pattern. . . Although the record omits any evidence of the department's size or the number of its arrests, the department's own website indicates that it presently employs more than 1,500 officers, and that there were more than 67,000 incidents of crime in the last year alone. Given the department's size, and absent any evidence of its total number of arrests during the same time period, 27 incidents of excessive force over a period of four years do not reflect a pattern that can be said to represent official policy of condoning excessive force so as to hold the City liable for the acts of its employees' unconstitutional conduct. To hold otherwise would be effectively to hold the City liable on the theory of respondeat superior, which is expressly prohibited by Monell. . . . In sum, the 27 incidents, in the context of this record, do not suggest a pattern 'so common and well-settled as to constitute a custom that fairly represents municipal policy.'. . In conclusion, there was sufficient evidence to establish Peterson's excessive force claim. Peterson, however, did not sue the officer or officers who violated his constitutional rights. Instead he sought to impose liability on the City of Fort Worth for the misconduct of its employees. In this connection, he failed to produce evidence to satisfy the demanding standards required by Monell and its progeny to hold the City liable, all for the reasons we have detailed in this opinion."); James v. Harris County, 577 F.3d 612, 618, 619 (5th Cir. 2009) ("[N]othing in Wilkinson's own testimony suggested his actual personal knowledge of the Sheriff's policy (a policy which the family has alleged and we have assumed), of pretermitting a thorough investigation and discipline in officer-involved shootings. Thus, to show that the policy was the cause of Wilkinson's use of excessive force, the family was required to establish Wilkinson's knowledge of the policy through other means. To that end, the family sought to establish that a policy of not conducting a thorough investigation of officer-involved shootings was so widely known that it created in the department an expectation of impunity for the use of excessive deadly force, and Wilkinson's personal knowledge reasonably could be assumed. To establish that the policy was widely known, the family relied exclusively on the expert testimony from Dr. David A. Klinger, a criminologist, that line officers tend to break institutional rules if they are not enforced. . . . After a thorough review, we do not find that this testimony supplies the direct causal link to Wilkinson's use of excessive force, because it simply does not connect Dr. Klinger's general theory to Wilkinson's knowledge that the Sheriff had a lax investigation and discipline policy."); Grieveson v. Anderson, 538 F.3d 763, 773-75 (7th Cir. 2008) ("Grieveson has not presented any evidence showing that the Marion County Jail's grievance procedure − the formal policy itself and the allegedly 'sham' manner in which it was carried out − caused his injuries. . . . Likewise, Grieveson's evidence of four incidents that he alone experienced 'fails to meet the test of a widespread unconstitutional practice by the Jail's staff that is so well settled that it constitutes a custom or usage with the force of law.'. . This simply is not enough to foster a genuine issue of material fact that the practice was widespread − from that evidence alone an inference does not arise that the county itself approved, acquiesced, or encouraged the disbursement of entire prescriptions at once."); Gates v. Texas Dept. Of Protective And Regulatory Services, 537 F.3d 404, 437 (5th Cir. 2008) ("Although there was testimony from several TDPRS employees that they never obtain court orders before removing children from their homes, there was a lack of corresponding evidence that those prior entries and removals were not made on the basis of parental consent or exigent circumstances. Therefore, the only case in which we can say with certainty that a constitutional violation may have occurred is the present one − when the TDPRS employees and Fort Bend deputies allegedly entered the Gateses' home without consent. . . . . Because it is permissible in some circumstances to remove a child from his home without a court order, the Gateses needed to present evidence that the prior removals were not based on consent or exigency before an unconstitutional custom can be shown. Therefore, the Gateses have failed to present evidence of a policy or custom that caused their alleged constitutional deprivation with respect to the entry into their home. The analysis regarding the seizure of Travis and Alexis from their schools is similar. The Gateses present no evidence that children were routinely or customarily removed from school in the absence of a court order or a reasonable belief of abuse. Thus, we are left with two instances of unconstitutional conduct. We conclude that this is not sufficient to support a finding that TDPRS customarily and unconstitutionally seized children from their schools in order to interview them at a central location. Therefore, the Gateses' claim fails on this count as well."); Alexander v. City of South Bend, 433 F.3d 550, 557, 558 (7th Cir.2006) ("The sum total of Alexander's accusations is that South Bend's police manual had no information on how to conduct proper witness interviews, photo arrays, or lineups, and that South Bend made several errors handling his case. Allegations about what is not in the manual hardly establish that South Bend adopted a policy or had a custom of suggestive interviews, photo arrays, or lineups, or that it was indifferent to people's rights. In addition, the shortcomings in this investigation are not indicative of a custom or policy; rather, they are indicative of one flawed investigation. Alexander cites to no other suggestive lineups or photo arrays, no other conspiracies against blacks, and no other incidents of destroyed evidence. Alexander's Monell claim fails for a complete absence of evidentiary support."); Thomas v. City of Chattanooga, 398 F.3d 426, 433, 434 (6th Cir. 2005) ("Appellants' best argument is that the Department has a custom of mishandling investigations of excessive force complaints. . . . All this aside, appellants must show not only that the investigation was inadequate, but that the flaws in this particular investigation were representative of (1) a clear and persistent pattern of illegal activity, (2) which the Department knew or should have known about, (3) yet remained deliberately indifferent about, and (4) that the Department's custom was the cause of the shooting here. . . . As this Court noted in Doe, deliberate indifference 'does not mean a collection of sloppy, or even reckless oversights; it means evidence showing an obvious, deliberate indifference' to the alleged violation. . . The Doe Court found that even where a school board had some information that one of its teachers may have sexually abused students in the past and the board failed to remove him before he abused the plaintiff, the school board could not be found liable for having a policy, custom, or practice of condoning such abuse because there was no evidence that the school board

failed to act regarding other teachers in similar circumstances; thus there was no evidence of any deliberate pattern. . .Doe makes clear that the plaintiff bears a heavy burden in proving municipal liability, and he cannot rely solely on a single instance to infer a policy of deliberate indifference. Despite the extreme circumstances here, appellants have not met their burden of showing that there is a genuine issue of whether an illegal Police Department policy exists. Appellants' expert inferred an illegal municipal policy from the Department's potentially insufficient investigation of Thomas's case, just as the plaintiff in Doe attempted to infer an illegal municipal policy from the school board's failure to remove the dangerous teacher at issue. Appellants' expert did not reach beyond the facts of this case to show any possibility of a pattern. Appellants point to this Court's finding in Leach v. Sheriff of Shelby County, 891 F.2d 1241 (6th Cir.1989), in support of the notion that deliberate indifference can be demonstrated by a municipality's failure to adequately investigate claims. However, in Leach, this Court was convinced that the municipality had a policy of deliberate indifference to prisoners' medical needs based on the fact that there were several separate instances where the prison failed to investigate prisoner mistreatment. . . Unlike the plaintiffs in Leach, appellants have failed to show several separate instances of the alleged rights violation. Furthermore, the fact that Crumley stated that she would find officer Abernathy 'justified' in his shooting if she had to make the same decision again, does not show a pattern of deliberate indifference that goes beyond the facts of appellants' own case. Rather, Crumley's statement was about a hypothetical situation that was based entirely on the facts of Thomas's own case. Therefore, appellants' argument falls prey to the problem of collapsing the municipal liability standard into a respondeat superior standard."); Milam v. Ctiy of San Antonio, Nos. 03-50862, 03-50937, 2004 WL 2469572, at *1, *2, *5 (5th Cir. Nov. 3, 2004) (unpublished) ("Milam sought to hold the City liable for its employees' illegal conduct by introducing evidence that City policymakers were aware of and were indifferent to a pattern of illegal arrests by park rangers, that the rangers were inadequately trained and supervised, and that the City failed to respond meaningfully to Milam's complaints. The City moved for judgment as a matter of law at the close of Milam's case and again at the close of the evidence, but the court denied the motions and sent the case to the jury. The jury found that the arrest was illegal, and the City does not challenge that finding. For purposes of the present appeal, two of the questions on the verdict form − both relating to municipal liability for the illegal arrest − are relevant. In Question 2, the jury was asked the following:Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the city of San Antonio was consciously and deliberately indifferent to intentional and illegal arrests of individuals without probable cause by its park rangers, condoning a pattern or practice of such arrests by its park rangers? In Question 3, the jury was asked the following:Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the City's policy-making authority, ratified the wrongful conduct of its officers in violation of Mr. Milam's constitutional rights? The jury answered 'no' to Question 2 and 'yes' to Question 3. Pursuant to the verdict form's directive that the jury should proceed to consider damages if it answered 'yes' to either Question 2 or Question 3, the jury awarded $100,000. The evidence adduced at trial might have provided a legally sufficient basis for the jury to determine that the City's policymakers had tolerated a pattern of illegal arrests that rose to the level of customary policy. The jury, though, specifically rejected a pattern-and-practice theory in its negative answer to Question 2. Milam is therefore left with the task of trying to hang the evidence presented at trial onto the doctrinal hooks of the ratification theory. It is not an easy fit because, at least facially, an illegal arrest that is completed without the involvement of any policymaker does not look like the typical situation in which a policymaker could 'approve[ ] [the employee's] decision and the basis for it' such that municipal policy can be said to have caused the harm. . . Milam attempts in a few different ways to provide evidentiary support for the ratification verdict, but we conclude that the evidence does not support this theory of liability. . . . Milam's primary argument is that his ratification theory is aimed at situations in which policymakers have tacitly permitted informal practices to rise to the level of official municipal policy. It is certainly true, as we discussed above, that Monell recognizes that informal customs and usages, no less than formally promulgated pronouncements and ordinances, can come to represent a type of municipal policy. . . Actions taken pursuant to such a customary policy can then subject the municipality to § 1983 liability. Nonetheless, this does not help Milam's case. If Question 2 on the verdict form had limited the jury to considering whether the City had a policy of the formal-pronouncement type, then perhaps Milam's evidence that the City had allowed a pattern of illegal arrests could be shoe-horned into Question 3, the ratification interrogatory. But Question 2 was not so limited; rather, it fully contemplated the possibility that the City had tacitly adopted a customary policy. It did not ask the jury whether the City had promulgated ordinances or the like, but it instead asked them whether the City had 'condon[ed] a pattern and practice' of illegal arrests. The jury answered that it had not. Milam's attempt to equate ratification with liability for customary policy strips the ratification theory of any independent content within the circumstances of this case. . . . To be clear, we do not say that lackluster disciplinary responses are never relevant in a Monell case and can never cause constitutional injuries. First, municipal policymakers who fail to supervise and to discipline their police officers, acting with deliberate indifference to the citizens' rights, could create municipal liability if the lack of supervision then caused a deprivation. . . Second, even though a policymaker's response to a particular incident may not cause the injury, the response might provide evidence of the content of a municipality's policies. That is, the failure to take disciplinary action in response to an illegal arrest, when combined with other evidence, could tend to support an inference that there was a preexisting de facto policy of making illegal arrests: the policymaker did not discipline the employee because, in the policymakers' eyes, the employee's illegal conduct actually conformed with municipal policy."); Burge v. St. Tammany Parish, 336 F.3d 363, 369, 370 (5th Cir. 2003) (Burge IV) ("Burge maintains that the constitutional violation he suffered resulted from two claimed deficiencies in the St. Tammany Parish Sheriff's Office, namely: (1) an alleged longstanding practice of failing to deliver all material information uncovered during the course of an investigation to the District Attorney; and (2) assertedly inadequate training in the maintenance and transfer of sheriff's records. . . . Knowledge on the part of a policymaker that a constitutional violation will most likely result from a given official custom or policy is a sine qua non of municipal liability under section 1983. . . . The knowledge requirement applies with equal force where a section 1983 claim is premised on a failure to train or to act affirmatively. . . . Both of Burge's theories, therefore, required proof of deliberate indifference. . . . There is no question in this case that the Sheriff of St. Tammany Parish is a final policymaker or that Burge suffered a Brady violation in his original trial and conviction for the 1980 murder of Douglas Frierson. . . . The issue on appeal is thus narrowed to whether Burge presented sufficient evidence to establish knowledge or deliberate indifference to the likelihood of a constitutional violation on the part of the Sheriff. We conclude that he did not."); Pineda v. City of Houston, 291 F.3d 325, 329-331 (5th Cir. 2002) ("Eleven incidents each ultimately offering equivocal evidence of compliance with the Fourth Amendment cannot support a pattern of illegality in one of the Nation's largest cities and police forces. The extrapolation fails both because the inference of illegality is truly uncompelling − giving presumptive weight as it does to the absence of a warrant − and because the sample of alleged unconstitutional events is just too small. Opinion evidence resting heavily on this data added little if anything. Left without legs, the opinions were little more than suspicion, albeit by informed persons. The weakness in the approach is apparent in its practical effects. It requires the City to defend 'cases within cases' from historical records to justify searches conduced without a warrant. . . . . Even if this proof was, contrary to our view, sufficient to create a disputed issue of fact on custom, there remains the burden of demonstrating actual or constructive knowledge of the policy-making official for the municipality. . . . The plaintiffs do not allege that the policymakers for the City, the Police Chief and his Assistant Chiefs, had actual knowledge of the pattern of unconstitutional searches relied upon by the district court. Instead they argue that the pattern of unconstitutional searches by the SWGTF [Southwest Gang Task Force] is sufficient to survive summary judgment because it was widespread enough to impute constructive knowledge to the policymakers. We are not persuaded. First, the weakness in proof of any pattern of illegalities aside, the plaintiffs provided no evidence that the incidents were the 'subject of prolonged public discussion or of a high degree of publicity.' Rather they urge that any municipality that collects numerous offense reports, a small proportion of which include warrantless searches ostensibly, from the investigating officer's perspective, within an exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement, maintains not only a custom of unconstitutional searches, but that knowledge of this should be imputed to the municipal policymakers. This is functionally the respondeat superior regime the Supreme Court has repeatedly rejected. . . Second, the plaintiffs provide opinion evidence that the offense reports and number of warrantless searches performed by the SWGTF sent a clear signal to supervisors and policymakers that a pattern of unconstitutional behavior existed within the SWGTF. Such opinions as to whether or not policymakers had constructive knowledge do not create a fact issue, as the 'experts' were unable to muster more than vague attributions of knowledge to unidentified individuals in 'management' or the 'chain of command.' In fact, the offense reports were summarized and presented in digest form and the plaintiffs' experts failed to demonstrate how the unconstitutionality of the reported searches could be gleaned from these summary reports. All of this assumes that policymakers may not rely on the representations of police officers as to the existence of an exception to the warrant requirement. These offense reports are insufficient to establish actual knowledge of a pattern even in the hypothetical case that the plaintiffs provided proof that the policymakers had read the individual reports. It follows, then, that there can be no constructive knowledge of an unconstitutional custom from the reports passing through the 'chain of command' in summary form. [footnotes omitted]); Latuszkin v. City of Chicago, 250 F.3d 502, 505 (7th Cir. 2001) ("Mr. Latuszkin's complaint must be dismissed . . . because he claimed no more than a policy or custom of the CPD [Chicago Police Department]. Nowhere did he claim a policy or custom of the City. A municipality may only be held liable where it is the moving force behind the injury because some policymaker made a deliberate choice to act or not act in a certain way. . . The City correctly notes that the complaint only alleges that the CPD and its supervisory officials turned a blind eye to the parties. The complaint does not allege any facts tending to show that City policymakers were aware of the behavior of the officers, or that the activity was so persistent and widespread that City policymakers should have known about the behavior."); Gregory v. Shelby County, 220 F.3d 433, 440-42 (6th Cir. 2000) ("No one disputes that the written policy for J-Pod was that only one cell door could be opened at a time. . . . While any rational trier of fact could find that the written policy was not followed on more than one occasion, Appellant has wholly failed to point to evidence in the record suggesting that this lapse of compliance with the written policy was so well settled as to constitute a custom thereby attaching liability to Shelby County. . . Appellant contends that the County's responsibility is embodied in its toleration of the custom of leaving cell doors randomly open. Appellant's argument that the custom was tolerated suggests that the County must have either actual or constructive notice of that alleged custom. There is no evidence, however, that the County or any authorized decisionmaker was on notice that two or more cell doors were open at the same time."); Floyd v. Waiters, 133 F.3d 786, 795 (11th Cir. 1998) ("[Plaintiffs] contend that the longstanding and widespread custom was that male security guards transported female students from school campuses to the 'Playhouse,' which was operated by the security department for the purposes of engaging in illicit sex. [footnote omitted] We conclude, however, that this conduct does not constitute a school district 'custom' that could support section 1983 liability. . . . [A] 'custom' requires that policymaking officials knew about the widespread practice but failed to stop it. . . Here, Plaintiffs have provided no evidence that policymaking officials − the BOE [Board of Public Education and Orphanage for Bibb County] − knew about the Playhouse or the activities that occurred there."); Jane Doe A v. Special School District, 901 F.2d 642, 646 (8th Cir. 1990) (no liability on the basis of custom could be attributed to school district where individual defendants had no notice of pattern of unconstitutional acts and did not display deliberate indifference to or tacitly authorize the violation of plaintiffs' constitutional rights).

See also Cox v. City of Rochester, No. 22-CV-6207-FPG, 2025 WL 50340, at *7-8 (W.D.N.Y. Jan. 8, 2025) ("Plaintiff identifies nine officers that have shot dogs and describes the circumstances of those shootings. Regarding the descriptions of shootings by Officers Zimmerman, Celentano, Laureano, Nellist, Kelly, and Algarin, Plaintiff either does not allege or does not provide evidence that these shootings were unreasonable. . . The Court acknowledges that Plaintiff claims in a few of these descriptions that officers were illegally searching or illegally present on private property when a dog shooting occurred. . . However, the Supreme Court has held that a separate Fourth Amendment violation may not be used 'to manufacture a [seizure] claim where one would not otherwise exist.' County of Los Angeles v. Mendez, 581 U.S. 420, 427 (2017). Therefore, the reasonableness of the search or the officer's presence on the property is irrelevant when evaluating the reasonableness of a dog shooting because the dog shooting is a separate seizure. . . As such, the Court does not consider any allegations of the unreasonableness of a search or the officer's presence on a property allegations that the officers acted unreasonably in shooting the dogs in those cases. On the other hand, Plaintiff alleges that Officers Cala, Pickney, and Leach acted unreasonably in shooting dogs. Officer Cala was involved in multiple dog shootings, but Plaintiff only claims that one was unreasonable in 2018. . . Officers Pinckney and Leach were involved in one alleged unreasonable shooting each in 2019 and 2020 respectively. . . Therefore, Plaintiff has identified three cases of misconduct over three years. The Court declines to decide if the officers acted unreasonably in these cases because, even assuming that they did, three incidents of misconduct over three years are insufficient to establish a pattern of misconduct for the Monell claim. . . . [T]his case is distinguishable from the hypothesized scenario in Canton because in the Canton example, the armed police officers were not given any training on the constitutional limits of deadly force. In this case, it is undisputed that RPD provides officers with training related to using deadly force against dogs and that the training discusses the Fourth Amendment implications of using deadly force against dogs. . . Additionally, even assuming that everything the Plaintiff has said about the inadequacies of the training is correct, it is insufficient to meet the deliberate indifference standard. Plaintiff's only objections are to the content and the duration of the training, which are just arguments that the training is not in the precise form that Plaintiff would prefer. . . Thus, the evidence proffered by Plaintiff is not enough to show that municipality's failure to train amounts to deliberate indifference and therefore, Plaintiff has failed to establish municipal liability. In sum, Plaintiff has failed to establish municipal liability because she has not demonstrated a pattern of misconduct, which is required to support her custom or usage, failure to train, and failure to supervise Monell claim. Additionally, she has failed to show that her claim falls into a narrow range of circumstances in which establishing such a pattern is not required. Therefore, the Court grants summary judgment to Defendants on the First Claim.

"); Reyes v. City of Austin, No. 1:21-CV-992-RP, 2024 WL 5088385, at *8–9 (W.D. Tex. Dec. 12, 2024) ("The Court credits the analysis of the United States Magistrate Judge on this point and responds to Reyes' objections. Reyes acknowledges that there is no official written or otherwise specifically articulated policy on which he can rely. As the City emphasizes, it has a written policy that 'its officers shall not arrest people for or otherwise prevent people from recording police activity.'. . Given the lack of an official or written policy violating his rights, Reyes advances two alternate theories of municipal liability. First, Reyes alleges that his repeated arrests by APD officers while he was filming police activity were part of a 'persistent pattern of illegal conduct' that was so common and well-known to policymakers that it constitutes a custom that fairly represents official policy. . . Second, he also alleges the City is liable because it ratified the illegal conduct by failing to discipline the APD officers involved in his arrests. . .To Reyes' first argument, the existence of a pattern, the Court finds that he has not alleged so many instances that a reasonable jury could find City of Austin liable based on the existence of a persistent pattern. . . . When prior incidents are used to prove a pattern, they 'must have occurred for so long or so frequently that the course of conduct warrants the attribution to the governing body of knowledge that the objectionable conduct is the expected, accepted practice of city employees.'. . . 'It is thus clear that a plaintiff must demonstrate a pattern of abuses that transcends the error made in a single case.'. .A pattern also requires 'sufficiently numerous prior incidents,' as opposed to 'isolated instances.'. . In Pineda v. City of Houston, . . . eleven incidents of warrantless entry did not support a pattern of unconstitutional warrantless entry. . . . Similarly, '27 incidents of excessive force over a period of four years do not reflect a pattern that can be said to represent official policy of condoning excessive force so as to hold the City liable for the acts of its employees'

unconstitutional conduct. To hold otherwise would be effectively to hold the City liable on the theory of respondeat superior, which is expressly prohibited by Monell.'. . Similarly, three incidents over the course of three-and-a-half years were found in Davidson v. City of Stafford, Texas insufficient to constitute a pattern as would support Monell liability. . . As described above, Reyes has produced summary evidence to show a material dispute of fact as to the existence of a First Amendment violation in a maximum of five instances. The Court notes that Pineda and Peterson are not directly applicable, as they refer to a city-wide set of incidents instead of incidents as to a specific individual. But Reyes also has not produced authority showing that a pattern existed showing the City has a policy to arrest him in retaliation to his views. . . If twenty-seven incidents in Peterson and eleven in Pineda were insufficient to show a pattern of First Amendment violations, the Court finds that five alleged violations—even if all were found to reflect a First Amendment violation—as to Reyes cannot demonstrate repetition so pervasive within the entire City of Austin as to create a pattern. Rather, Reyes has shown the existence of potential 'isolated instances' that cannot give rise to municipal liability. . . Reyes also does not give examples of the City of Austin having a practice persistent and widespread beyond his case, as would support a showing of a custom, policy, or practice of First Amendment retaliatory arrest. . . .The evidence Reyes brings forward shows that the APD was critical of him and labelled him anti-police, and that some officers described him to others using inappropriate language, but the evidence does not create a reasonable inference that the APD had a widespread policy or custom of arresting him or others in retaliation for his views. For those reasons, the Court finds that Reyes does not show a persistent pattern of conduct that gives rise to a City of Austin custom, practice, or policy."); Black Lives Matter D.C. v. Trump, 544 F.Supp.3d 15, 51-52 (D.D.C. 2021) ("As support for D.C.'s alleged failure to train its officers, the Black Lives Matter plaintiffs point to five past incidents, unrelated to the Lafayette Square events, in four of which the Metropolitan Police Department used chemical irritants on crowds. . . The incidents span a period of twenty years. . . The Buchanan plaintiffs, meanwhile, cite a news article which asserts that use-of-force incidents by MPD officers has steadily increased in the last five years . . . and point to the MPD's response to protestors during the 2017 inauguration, where 'police pinned hundreds of protesters into city blocks, used frequent flash-bang grenades, and heavily deployed tear gas[.]'. . The Buchanan plaintiffs do not provide specific allegations as to Arlington County's policies or customs, . . . but instead conclude in their briefing that 'Arlington County was deliberately indifferent when it failed to properly train ... Arlington law enforcement officers, on how to appropriately provide mutual aid at the June 1, 2020 Lafayette Park protest.'. . They argue that 'President Trump publicly urged a violent and aggressive law enforcement response,'. . . and '[i]n light of these statements, and the nature of the preceding protests, Arlington County should have known that the Arlington Defendants needed to receive "more or different" training on the use of force at upcoming protests.'. .Accepting these allegations as true, these isolated incidents over the course of two decades in a metropolis as large as Washington D.C. are insufficient to meet the high bar for alleging a municipal policy or custom, as they are too far removed in time to be 'so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law.'. .What is more, many of these alleged incidents are too far removed from the specific facts alleged here to have put the District on constructive or actual notice of a failure in training. . . . Although other Courts have found past incidents of MPD use of tear gas to be sufficient to state a claim for municipal liability, see, e.g., Horse v. District of Columbia, No. 17-cv-01216 (D.D.C. Sept. 27, 2019), the Court finds here that these particular allegations are insufficiently similar. 'Because [the majority of alleged] incidents are not similar to the violation at issue here, they could not have put [the District] on notice that specific training was necessary to avoid this constitutional violation.' [citing Connick] Accordingly, the municipal liability claims will be dismissed."); White v. City of Vineland, 500 F.Supp.3d 295, 306-07 (D.N.J. 2020) ("Plaintiffs have evidence to support their clam that the City had a custom of permitting officers to use excessive force. The evidence, taken in the light most favorable to the Plaintiffs, shows that the City received 45 complaints about Officer Platania, including 17 involving allegations of excessive force. Although investigators did not sustain any of those investigations, Plaintiffs have evidence suggesting that the investigations were incomplete, at best. The Third Circuit has explained that having an investigative process in place does not protect against municipal liability unless the investigative process is real. . . A reasonable juror could conclude that the City's process was not real. Defendants ask the Court to disregard these incidents because they are not sufficiently factually similar to the case at hand. Defendants' argument, for purposes of a summary judgment motion, are too granular. Often, Defendants rely on the fact that other incidents did not involve the use of a police dog, but that is not the only basis on which Plaintiffs assert the excessive use of force. The Court rejects Defendants' invitation to weigh the evidence. A reasonable juror could conclude from the history of complaints about Officer Platania specifically and other officers more generally that the City had a custom of permitting officers to use excessive force. Contrary to Defendants' argument, the Third Circuit's decision in Forrest does require the Court to parse the complaints. It stands only for the unremarkable proposition that the incidents to which a plaintiff points must be of a 'similar nature' to the incident at issue and close enough in time. . . Plaintiffs have made that showing when the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to them. Defendants can argue about distinctions in the past complaints, and about their import, to the jury, which is the forum for weighing of evidence. The outcome is different for Plaintiffs' false arrest claim, however. The incidents on which Plaintiffs base their claims are complaints about excessive force. They have not pointed the Court to a history of complaints about false arrests. They therefore fail in their burden to identify evidence from which a reasonable juror could conclude that the City has a custom of tolerating false arrests by its officers."); Nigro v. City of New York, No. 19-CV-2369 (JMF), 2020 WL 5503539, at *5–6 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 11, 2020) ("[A] plaintiff 'need not prove the absence of probable cause to maintain a claim of retaliatory arrest against the City.' Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, Fla., 138 S. Ct. 1945, 1955 (2018). Thus, Nigro's Monell claims against the City — predicated on the City's alleged policy and practice of arresting people in retaliation for reporting on police activity and its failure to properly train its officers on the rights of the media — require additional analysis. Nigro's Monell claim based on the first theory — that the City has a policy and practice of arresting people in retaliation for reporting on police activity — fails as a matter of law. In particular, Nigro fails to plausibly allege that the City has a pattern that is 'so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law.'. . Nigro cites only a handful of incidents, most of which occurred in 2011 and 2012, in which NYPD officers 'interfered with the ability of journalists and other individuals to document interactions between the public and police officers.'.

. But few, if any, of these incidents involved claims of retaliatory arrest or are alleged to have resulted in a lawsuit or otherwise formal complaint. . . .In any event, ninety-six incidents over two years is not, without more, enough to establish that the City had a policy or practice of retaliating against the media at the time of Nigro's arrest. By contrast, Nigro raises a plausible failure-to-train claim. . . .Nigro plausibly alleges that the NYPD's training on encounters with the media is inadequate, consisting of nothing more than unenforced instructions in the NYPD Patrol Guide and three FINEST Messages issued in 2011, 2014, and 2018 'to remind members of the service of their obligations to cooperate with media representatives acting in a news-gathering capacity at the scene of police incidents.'. . And second, although Nigro's citations to unrelated police encounters, letters, and post-hoc reports are not enough to establish a widespread custom or practice of retaliating against the press and public, 'they do permit a plausible inference of deliberate indifference.'. . In particular, the alleged incidents plausibly establish a history of NYPD officers mishandling situations where the press is involved, resulting in the repeated deprivation of constitutional rights. Finally, contrary to Defendants' contentions, Nigro adequately pleads that the failure to train caused his injuries. . . In short, Nigro adequately pleads a failure-to-train claim against the City, which means Defendants' motion on that score must be and is denied."); Petropoulos v. City of Chicago, No. 19-CV-03206, 2020 WL 1433826, at *4–5 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 24, 2020) ("The Petropouloses argue that allegations based on their own experience – a single instance of misdirected mail – is enough to allege a policy. They contend that the '[c]ase law indicates that for purposes of this motion, the Plaintiffs need not provide any other examples of the Defendant's practice to allege a Monell claim.'. . .The Seventh Circuit has not adopted any bright-line rules defining 'custom or practice,' but it has found that 'it must be more than one instance.'. . Indeed, even three instances may not be sufficient in some cases, as the Seventh Circuit has found that an allegation of three incidents did not amount to a 'persistent and widespread practice.'. . A random event does not give rise to a Monell claim. . . Requiring a number of examples is a way of enforcing the bar against vicarious liability. A plaintiff could blame almost any slip-up by a municipal employee on a lack of a policy, or insufficient training or supervision. If that allegation were enough to state a claim, the exception would swallow the rule, and Monell wouldn't provide much of a barrier. It would be open season on claims against municipalities. It is difficult to sufficiently allege a Monell claim by pointing to only one example, particularly when that example is the plaintiff's own experience. . . One data point doesn't show much of a trend. While it is not impossible for a single plaintiff to establish a widespread practice or custom with his own experience, it is 'necessarily more difficult' to do so. . . . The Petropouloses don't allege that other families received the same type of startling mail. Instead, they allege only their own experience. That isolated incident – as alarming as it may have been – is not enough to support an inference of a custom or practice."); Thomas v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 17-4196, 2019 WL 4039575, at *13-14, *19-21 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 27, 2019) ("In his response to the defendants' motion for summary judgment, the plaintiff frames his § 1983 claim against the City as a failure to train, supervise, and discipline claim. . . . [T]he plaintiff need not establish that the municipal policymaker had actual knowledge of a pattern of constitutional misconduct. Constructive knowledge or a showing that the municipal policymaker 'should have known' about the pattern of constitutional misconduct is sufficient. . . .The defendants first argue that the plaintiff has not presented sufficient evidence for a jury to determine that there was a prior pattern in the Police Department involving the fabrication and concealment of evidence, the use of improper interrogation methods, and the intentional suppression of evidence that negated probable cause. The Court disagrees. As discussed above, the plaintiff supports his claim that there was an alleged and reported upon pattern of similar incidents in the early 1990s by pointing to: (1) the 1978 Philadelphia Inquirer series; (2) eight specific incidents similar to the plaintiff's allegations that occurred between 1988 and 1994 (all within five years of the plaintiff's arrest in 1993); (3) the 39th District Scandal; (4) deposition testimony from Department police officers, including Detectives Devlin and Worrell; and (5) and Dr. McCauley's expert report. In their briefing, the defendants attack these pieces of evidence individually. . . .The defendants claim that if eleven out of 500 incidents could not create a triable issue of fact in Pineda, eight incidents out of over 2,200 homicides that occurred in Philadelphia from 1990-1994 is similarly insufficient. . . However, the cases relied on by the defendants are, once again, distinguishable. In Jones and Peterson, excluding the similar events identified by those plaintiffs, there was no evidence of an unlawful pattern. . . And in Pineda, although the plaintiff filed an expert report to support his claim in addition to highlighting the eleven similar incidents, the court discounted the expert report because it relied heavily on those eleven incidents. . . Here, in contrast, the plaintiff has presented a collection of other evidence as listed above. Moreover, in addition to the eight specific incidents, Dr. McCauley bases his report on his review of over 1,000 IAD investigations, reports from the IAO, and more. . .Moreover, courts in this circuit—including the court of appeals—have accepted similar numbers of incidents as evidence of a pattern and have been more prone to do so when such evidence is accompanied by additional support, such as an expert report or the deposition testimony of officers. . . .Based on all of the evidence discussed above, considered in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, a reasonable jury could conclude that, prior to the plaintiff's arrest and conviction, Philadelphia Police Department officers engaged in a pattern of similar misconduct."); Moore v. City of Ferguson, No. 4:14-CV-1443 SNLJ, 2016 WL 5791461, at *5-7 (E.D. Mo. Oct. 4, 2016) ("Plaintiffs' main evidence in support of the existence of a 'continuing, widespread, persistent pattern of unconstitutional conduct' by FPD officers is contained in the DOJ Report. The Report concluded that the FPD engages in a pattern of excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment and that, specifically, the FPD's use of 'electronic control weapons' ("ECWs") such as Tasers is 'unreasonable.' Furthermore, the Report observed that the '[o]verwhelming majority of force --- almost 90% --- is used against African Americans' and that the FPD demonstrated a 'pattern of insufficient sensitivity to, and training about, the limitations of those with mental health conditions or intellectual disabilities.' Plaintiffs cite to at least five incidents of excessive force that occurred before Jason Moore was Tased. Those incidents occurred between August 2010 and August 2011 and involved ECWs or Tasers. At least four of the five involved African-American men. Although defendants dispute the details of these incidents, five instances of excessive force --- involving Tasers --- predating the events of this matter over the course of just one year constitutes more than isolated incidents. . . .Moreover, although the Report noted that the FPD had a procedure for documenting and reviewing use of force by officers, the DOJ determined that the 'requirements are not adhered to in practice.' The DOJ further stated that it 'learned of many uses of force that were never officially reported or investigated from reviewing emails between FPD supervisors.'.

. Similarly, the DOJ Report observed that Ferguson supervisory personnel have a custom of failing to 'review critical evidence even when it is readily available.' In keeping with the FPD's failure to adhere to its own policies related to use of force review, plaintiff further points out that the FPD's investigation of this matter was limited --- in fact, no one at the FPD initiated the 'data download' for the Taser used on Mr. Moore until four years after the incident, after this lawsuit was well underway. This evidence is perhaps more germane to the second factor, however, to which the Court turns next. . . .Having set forth evidence of a pattern of the use of excessive force by Ferguson officers, plaintiffs must next set forth evidence supporting that the City of Ferguson and Chief Jackson were deliberately indifferent to or tacitly authorized police officers' use of excessive force. Again, the DOJ Report supports plaintiffs' claims. The Report concludes that Ferguson police officers do not minimize their use of force but rather 'respond with impatience, frustration, and disproportionate force' and that 'FPD's weak oversight of officer use of force…facilitates this abuse.' Although official FPD policy 'prohibits use of force unless reasonable alternatives have been exhausted or would clearly be ineffective,' the DOJ found that 'FPD officers routinely engage in the unreasonable use of ECWs, and supervisors routinely approve their conduct.' Specifically, '[s]upervisors seem to believe that any level of resistance justifies any level of force' and those supervisors 'almost never actually investigate force incidents.' In fact, 'though contrary to policy, supervisors almost never interview non-police witnesses, such as the arrestee or any independent witnesses' and, critically, '[t]hey do not review critical evidence even when it is available.' As Chief of Police at the time of the incident in question here, defendant Chief Jackson was the individual designated by the Mayor and City Council to 'have general supervision and control of the police department, including the enforcement of discipline among the members thereof and the instruction of the members in their duties.' City of Ferguson Code of Ordinances, § 33-18. Chief Jackson testified that he had never disciplined an officer for using excessive force. Although the fact that Chief Jackson had never disciplined an officer for using excessive force is not at all dispositive, it is some evidence that supports plaintiffs' claims, particularly in light of the DOJ Report's findings. Plaintiffs have adequately shown that evidence exists to support their contention that the defendant Chief Jackson and City of Ferguson have been deliberately indifferent to or tacitly authorized the FPD's custom of using excessive force. The DOJ found that the custom and practice of use of excessive force was the direct result of the failure to properly supervise and discipline officers by investigating and enforcing the FPD's own use of force policies."); Walker v. City of New York, No. 14-CV-808 ER, 2015 WL 4254026, at *9-10 (S.D.N.Y. July 14, 2015) ("Here, in addition to claiming that the thirty-six actions listed demonstrated a pattern of false arrests, the TAC provides a list of lawsuits that Officers Pantaleo, Howard, Torres, Vaccarino, Cataldo, and Sergeant Conca have all been parties to. . . The Court's independent inquiry revealed that, although most of the purported thirty-six lawsuits that Plaintiff cites consist of false arrest claims, much like Tieman, none of them attribute liability to the particular Officers or the City. Nor have any of the lawsuits against the individual Defendants resulted in a finding of liability. . . In fact, they either settled or are currently pending. . . Furthermore, Plaintiff cites lawsuits that span across thirteen years without describing them in any detail-thereby making his case even weaker than Tieman, in which the plaintiff listed and described lawsuits filed during the five years before the incident at issue. . . Thus, like Tieman, the lawsuits that Plaintiff cites, even when combined with the rest of his allegations, 'are insufficient to plausibly support an inference of a widespread custom.'. . In his opposition papers, Plaintiff characterizes Defendants' motion as 'asking the Court to ... disbelieve the numerous people of color who have brought these lawsuits,' concluding '[t]his is not only a form of deliberate indifference itself, but racially discriminatory indifference.'. . However, that is neither what the City is requesting the Court to do, nor does it describe the Court's role in this case. The City is asking the Court not to presume that a constitutional violation took place in cases in which no finding of liability was ever made or acknowledged. . . Indeed, although it is routine for courts to take judicial notice of court documents, they do so 'not for the truth of the matters asserted in the other litigation, but rather to establish the fact of such litigation and related filings.'. . It is not within this Court's purview to assess the veracity of either the claims of outside plaintiffs, or the defenses presented against them in cases that have settled or are pending before other judges. While Plaintiff attempts to show a widespread policy or pattern of abuse, he has failed to allege sufficient facts to establish that the City has adopted such an abusive policy towards people of color. Plaintiff fails to satisfy this third factor of the Second Circuit's municipal liability test."); Moreno v. City of Dallas, No. 3:13-CV-4106-B, 2015 WL 3890467, at *9 (N.D. Tex. June 18, 2015) ("The City also argues that Plaintiff's allegations fail to support an inference of a persistent and widespread practice of the use of excessive force. . . .The Court agrees. Although Plaintiff has pointed to eight instances, over the course of five years, in which an officer wounded or killed an individual, these allegations do not support an inference of a pattern of abuses that can be distinguished from mere isolated incidents. . . In view of the size of the Dallas Police Department, and bearing in mind courts' prior holdings in similar cases, facts suggesting an average of less than two incidents of excessive force per year over the course of five years are not sufficient to indicate a pattern of abuses, especially without any further context from Plaintiff."); Estate of Shafer ex rel. Shafer v. City of Elgin, Or., No. 2:12-CV-00407-SU, 2014 WL 6633106, at *23-24 (D. Or. Nov. 21, 2014) ("As discussed above for the claim against Chief Lynch, plaintiff's expert Mr. Yerger opined Officer Kilpatrick should have been required to engage in remedial training after Chief Lynch or the City Council received citizen complaints about Officer Kilpatrick. The evidence shows prior to the shooting of Richard Shafer, Officer Kilpatrick had pointed his guns at other Elgin residents. Chief Lynch testified he provided the annual use of force training to Officer Kilpatrick as required by the Use of Force Policy. . . However, Chief Lynch testified he never provided any specific training to Officer Kilpatrick about when he should or should not draw his gun. . . Therefore the court finds issues of fact over whether the City failed to train Officer Kilpatrick about when to point his gun at a citizen. Defendants argue even if the City failed to adequately train Officer Kilpatrick, the failure to train a single officer is insufficient to establish a municipality's deliberate policy under Monell. . . In Blankenhorn, the Ninth Circuit explained 'absent evidence of a "program-wide inadequacy in training" any shortfall in a single officer's training "can only be classified as negligence on the part of the municipal defendant—a much lower standard of fault than deliberate indifference."'. . . Defendants fail to recognize the small population size of Elgin. . . The Elgin Police Department is a municipal police department with a full-time staff consisting of a police chief, one police sergeant, and one police officer. . . After Sgt. Pallis left the department in June 2011, Officer Kilpatrick was the only police officer in Elgin. As such, even applying Blankenhorn, a reasonable jury could find the City's failure to train Officer Kilpatrick a 'program-wide inadequacy in training' for purposes of Monell. . . Plaintiff also brings the claim against the City under a failure to discipline theory. A municipal policy may be inferred from 'widespread practices or evidence of repeated constitutional violations for which the errant municipal officers were not discharged or reprimanded.'. . A plaintiff may prove a widespread practice where several different officers independently engage in the same unconstitutional conduct. . . For the same reasons as the failure to train theory, the court finds given the small size of the Elgin police department, a reasonable jury could conclude the City failed to discipline Officer Kilpatrick. Plaintiff's expert Mr. Yerger opined Officer Kilpatrick should have been disciplined after Chief Lynch or the City Council received citizen complaints about Officer Kilpatrick's use of force. As such, a reasonable jury could also conclude the City's failure to discipline Officer Kilpatrick constituted a policy for purposes of Monell. Finally, defendants argue there is no evidence of a causal connection between the City's actions or inactions and the shooting of Richard Shafer. . . The court disagrees. Plaintiff has raised issues of fact regarding whether the Use of Force Policy was sufficient to protect the constitutional rights of Richard Shafer, how the City handled citizen complaints about Officer Kilpatrick, whether Officer Kilpatrick was properly trained in use of force by the City, and whether the City properly disciplined Officer Kilpatrick for prior use of force. The issue of causation is for a jury to decide. . . Therefore, defendants' motion for summary judgment on the Monell claim against the City is denied."); McCants v. City of Newburgh, No. 14 CV 556 VB, 2014 WL 6645987, at *4-5 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 21, 2014) ("The amended complaint alleges the City failed to monitor officers and train them in the use of excessive force, then details seventeen excessive force claims made against the City in the seven-year time period prior to Lembhard's death in 2012. Defendants argue plaintiffs' evidence does not establish a custom or policy because a majority of the claims were settled for nuisance value, did not involve deadly force, and are removed in time from the instant action. The Court is unpersuaded by defendants' arguments. Defendants are correct the seventeen instances simply demonstrate 'other individuals [ ] plausibly alleged that they experienced similar violations ... not that these violations actually occurred.'. . However, it matters not that the instances only prove a claimant asserted a violation, because they evidence the City was on notice to the possible use of excessive force by its police officers on seventeen different occasions. . . Plaintiffs allege the City, in the face of these instances of alleged police misconduct, failed properly to discipline its officers or train them in the use of excessive force. This evidences deliberate indifference because, at least at this stage in the proceedings, the Court must take as true plaintiffs' allegations the police officers involved were not disciplined or sanctioned for their conduct. . . Further, it matters not that only one of the instances involved deadly force, as plaintiffs allege a failure to monitor and train officers adequately in the correct and restrained use of force in general. And, the seventeen instances of alleged police misconduct, as well as the alleged police misconduct resulting in Lembhard's death, involve a pattern of excessive force likely to be proven by evidence of the officers' correct or incorrect use of force. . . And finally, although the claims span a seven-year period, with a majority occurring from 2005 to 2007, this simply evidences the City has allegedly long condoned police misconduct. Accordingly, the Court declines to dismiss plaintiffs' Monell claim."); Flanagan v. City of Dallas, Tex., 48 F.Supp.3d 941, 954 (N.D. Tex. 2014) ("The undersigned finds Pineda to be of limited persuasiveness given the factual differences between it and the present case. First, although the appellate court does not say so, the 11 sample cases that the Pineda court looked at spanned a four-year period. . . In this case, Plaintiffs allege that DPD police shot at least 12 unarmed people in 2013, the year that Allen died (although it is not known how many of these incidents occurred after his death). . . Plaintiffs discussed three of those shooting incidents in sufficient detail in their amended complaint to denote the similarities to the allegations regarding Allen's shooting, namely that the individuals involved were not provoking or resisting the police when they were shot. . .Second, a warrantless entry differs significantly in seriousness and presumably in frequency from the shooting by a police officer of an unarmed person, whatever the circumstances of the shooting may turn out to be. Therefore, it is reasonable to allow a lower number of incidents to establish a pattern of conduct in a shooting case. . . Further, Plaintiffs allege that, on average, more than four unarmed people have been killed by DPD officers each year for the past dozen years and that there are nearly 100 open internal affairs investigations into such shootings and have been nearly as many grand jury proceedings. While it is a close call, taking all of their allegations to be true, Plaintiffs have pled sufficient facts, at the motion to dismiss stage, from which one could make a reasonable inference of a persistent, widespread practice by DPD officers of using excessive force rising to the level of a custom having the force of official City policy."); Price v. Tunica County, Miss., No. 2:08cv262-P-A, 2011 WL 3426182, at *3 (N.D. Miss. Aug. 5, 2011) ("The court concludes that three dismissed pro se inmate lawsuits and ten unsubstantiated inmate grievances over a period of approximately four years (from the first election of Sheriff Hamp in 2004 to the filing of the complaint on December 18, 2008) is insufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact of whether there was a 'persistent, widespread practice' or custom of unconstitutionally inadequate medical care in the Tunica County Jail. First, none of these prior incidents were ever substantiated, rendering them mere allegations. Second, the Supreme Court ruled in Connick that four prior incidents of failure to provide exculpatory evidence under Brady − all four of which occurred in the same county prosecutor's office and were all substantiated in court proceedings resulting in reversals of the convictions − were insufficient to establish an unconstitutional custom. . . Third, the Fifth Circuit in Pineda v. City of Houston concluded that 11 prior reports of warrantless entries into houses by the Houston Police Department were insufficient to establish an unconstitutional custom or pattern given that Houston, Texas was a large city. . . Though Tunica County, Mississippi is not comparable in size to Houston, Texas, the population of the Tunica County Jail over a four year period is large enough to render three dismissed inmate lawsuits and ten inmate grievances of inadequate medical care similarly insufficient to establish a unconstitutional custom or 'persistent, widespread practice.'"); Oporto v. City of El Paso, No. EP-10-CV-110-KC, 2010 WL 3503457, at *9 (W.D. Tex. Sept. 2, 2010) ("There is no bright line rule for determining when a number of incidents taken together comprise a pattern of conduct serious enough to impute constructive knowledge to municipal policymakers. . . However, incidents cited by Plaintiffs appear to have occurred for so long and are sufficiently numerous that they tend to show the existence of a custom and knowledge and acceptance of that custom by policymakers. In Pineda, eleven incidents of warrantless searches were held not to be widespread enough to impute constructive knowledge to policymakers; however in Escobar v. City of Houston, twenty-six incidents of accidental gun discharges were found to be sufficient to create a fact issue regarding the City's knowledge of the need for additional training. . . Escobar, at the summary judgment phase, uses fewer incidents than in the present case. Thus, at the motion to dismiss stage, thirty-two incidents appear to be sufficiently numerous to infer knowledge of that custom by policymakers. Additionally, excessive use of deadly force can be described as flagrant or severe, which reduces the frequency and pattern length needed to establish constructive knowledge. The Court thus finds that the pleadings properly allege that the City, Wiles and Allen had constructive knowledge of the policy."); Washburn v. Fagan, No. C 03-0869 MJJ, C 03-1194 MJJ, 2006 WL 1072057, at *6 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 21, 2006) ("The Court finds that Plaintiffs' ratification theory fails for the simple reason that Plaintiffs have produced no evidence demonstrating which municipal officers have final policymaking authority for the City. . . In Plaintiffs' opposition brief, they contend that Sergeant Stansberry, Officer Kristal, and Assistant Police Chief Alex Fagan Sr. were aware of Fagan's alleged misconduct. Plaintiffs also assert that 'Fagan's conduct was widely known to other members of the SFPD.'. . However, there is no evidence to support the conclusion that any of these individuals were authorized policymakers for the City. Accordingly, Plaintiffs have not established a genuine issue of material fact as to the question of whether City policymakers ratified Fagan's actions."); Barnett v. City of Columbus, No. 2:04-CV-1113, 2006 WL 406614, at *11 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 17, 2006) ("In the Court's view, the evidence proffered with respect to allegations of a pattern or policy of use of excessive force by Columbus police officers falls far short of the foregoing standard. The incidents do not serve to show that the City of Columbus condoned conduct amounting to excessive force or that it acted with deliberate indifference so as to amount to the City having an official policy of inaction.'. . All of the thirteen incidents cited by Plaintiff were investigated and found to be without merit. While these incidents involved differing versions of the facts, this Court has no record or factual basis from which to conclude that the Internal Affairs Bureau acted illegally or otherwise condoned unconstitutional behavior."); Martin v. City of Columbus, No. 2:03CV161, 2005 WL 2671372, at *4, *5 (S.D. Ohio Oct. 19, 2005) ("Here, there was an investigation of Martin's allegations against Officer Haas. However, because Martin's allegations were brought more than sixty days after the incident, the Internal Affairs Bureau determined that Martin's allegations were unfounded. . .Under Article 8.12 of the collective bargaining agreement between the City and the Fraternal Order of Police a citizen complaint must be received by the City within sixty days after the date of the alleged event giving rise to the complaint. The exceptions to this rule are: (1) allegations of conduct which is criminal on its face; (2) allegations of conduct that could reasonably lead to criminal prosecution; and (3) allegations of non-criminal conduct that is the same or similar to conduct that resulted in the recent termination of a member, and the termination was upheld by an arbitrator or the Civil Service Commission. This provision of the CBA has come under this Court's scrutiny before. In Otero v. Wood, 316 F.Supp.2d 612, 629 (S.D.Ohio 2004) (Marbley, J.), the officer who took the plaintiff's complaint filled out an 'incident report' (used to inform the police of any unlawful incident) instead of a 'citizen complaint' (used to complain to the police department about the conduct of an officer). The incident report was not converted to a citizen complaint until after the 60-day time period had already run. . . The plaintiff alleged that the use of an incident report rather than a citizen complaint was not an accident, but was deliberately done as a part of the City's policy to insulate officers from discipline. . .This Court found that if the plaintiff's claims were true, the City had a policy of dealing with citizen complaints in such a way as to virtually ensure that offending officers will not be disciplined for their misconduct. . . Here, Martin states that he did not file his citizen complaint because there were criminal charges pending against him. Martin filed his complaint on May 15, 2002. Yet, Martin's charges were not dismissed until December 30, 2002. Regardless of the reason for the delay, this case is factually distinguishable from Otero. It was Martin himself who caused the complaint to be filed outside the 60-day time period, not the City. As this Court has previously recognized, in general, one does not have a constitutional right to have a police investigation conducted in a particular manner, or to have one conducted at all. . . The CBA provision does not preclude all investigation, it only precludes investigation of complaints which are brought outside the 60-day time period and do not meet one of the listed exceptions."); Perrin v. City of Elberton, Georgia, No. 3:03-CV-106(CDL), 2005 WL 1563530, at *10 (M.D. Ga. July 1, 2005) ("In this case, the evidence viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff establishes that City of Elberton police officers regularly applied for arrest warrants without providing a sworn statement to the issuing judge. Instead, the officers submitted unsworn warrant applications and unsworn police reports and expected the judge to make a probable cause determination based solely upon these documents. As discussed supra, a probable cause determination cannot legally be predicated upon unsworn statements, so this process is not constitutionally sound. The officers followed this process hundreds of times over a period of at least eight years. This history of widespread use of the unsworn warrant application process was sufficient to notify Welsh of the need to take corrective action. Furthermore, there is evidence that Welsh had firsthand knowledge of the process. However, Welsh failed to correct it. Genuine issues of material fact exist as to whether Welsh's supervisory conduct violated Plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . . [I]t is reasonable to conclude that Welsh, the City's Chief of Police, authorized the unsworn warrant application process. It is also reasonable to conclude that Welsh knew of a need to train the City's officers in this area and made a deliberate choice not to take any action to train the officers differently. . . For these reasons, the City of Elberton is not entitled to summary judgment with regard to its alleged unsworn warrant application process."); Mosser v. Haney, No. Civ.A.3:03CV2260-B, 2005 WL 1421440, at *4 (N.D. Tex. June 17, 2005) (not reported) ("Here, the Dallas City Charter states that, while the Chief of Police has immediate control over the police department, the Chief of Police is still subject to the supervision of the City Manager. . . . Thus, the Chief of Police is not the policymaker for Dallas's police department, as he remains subject to the rules and supervision of the City Manager. . . . Because the General Orders were not issued by a policymaker, the Court cannot find that the General Orders constitute the policy of the City of Dallas. For the same reason, the Court also finds that the General Orders do not constitute a custom of the City of Dallas. As noted above, proof of a custom requires the plaintiff to demonstrate actual or constructive knowledge of the custom to the governing body or a policymaker. . . Mosser has not produced any evidence connecting the General Orders with the City Manager or City Council or even showing that the City Manager or City Council were aware of the General Orders. As such, the Court finds that Mosser has failed to demonstrate that the General Orders of the Dallas Police Department are a policy or custom of the City."); Lewis v. City of Chicago, No. 04 C 3904, 2005 WL 1026692, at *8 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 26, 2005) (not reported) ("Lewis argues CPD intentionally covered up Hicks' homicide. He points to obvious omissions in

Detective Galbreth's report, and OPS' failure to conduct a thorough investigation. . . . He presents no evidence that the city was deliberately indifferent to excessive force complaints prior to Hicks' death. He relies exclusively on evidence relating to CPD's and OPS' deficiencies in investigating Hicks' death. His evidence falls far short of a practice, custom or policy with respect to investigations or discipline. . . Lewis presents no evidence that CPD's alleged failure to investigate excessive force allegations and discipline officers proximately caused Hicks' constitutional injury. Absent evidence of a causal link between the alleged failure to investigate and discipline and Hicks' death, Lewis' § 1983 claim cannot stand."); Allen v. York County Jail, Nos. Civ. 01-224-P-C, Civ. 02-158-P-C, 2003 WL 221842, at *9 (D. Me. Jan. 30, 2003)("In order for a 'custom or usage' to become the basis of municipal liability, the duration and frequency of the practice must be so widespread and longstanding that the decision making officials' actual or constructive knowledge of the custom can be established. . . . Applying this analysis to Allen's two complaints, it becomes apparent that the serious constitutional deprivations that he alleges were committed by corrections officers who took pains to engage in schemes and conspiracies to keep their conduct hidden. Allen does not actually allege that pretrial detainees were routinely raped and abused by fellow inmates at the behest of correctional officers. He describes in detail a series of events that happened to him personally and a number of corrections officers, some named and some unnamed, who acted improperly vis-a-vis his detention. The apparent theory is that a number of officers intentionally conspired together to deprive an individual of his constitutional rights and they then devised schemes to keep their conduct secret, pursuant to an established 'custom' that was known or should have been known by York county's official decision makers (presumptively Sheriff Cote). While this complaint alleges a significant number of officers conspired to deprive Allen of his rights, it simply does not allege that sort of behavior was so widespread that the official decision maker can be said to have acquiesced in it . . . ."); Burns v. Goodman, No. CIV. A. 3:99CV0313-L, 2001 WL 498231, at *6, *7, *9 (N.D. Tex. May 8, 2001)(not reported) ("A pervasive, widespread practice . . . is insufficient to constitute official policy for purposes of imposing municipal liability under § 1983 unless policymakers had actual or constructive knowledge of the practice. . . . The court concludes that Burns has not established a genuine issue of material fact as to the City's constructive knowledge of a pervasive, widespread practice of illegal strip searches on the night shift at the Garland jail. . . . Because of a lack of evidence as to constructive notice of the alleged practices, the City has dodged a bullet. . . . Although the City escapes liability in this case, it is now on notice. If there are any future incidents under such circumstances, the City will not be able to shield itself from liability by asserting lack of notice."); Samarco v. Neumann, 44 F. Supp.2d 1276, 1289 (S.D. Fla. 1999) ("Like the policy issue, Samarco has not presented any evidence of a widespread custom of using its canine force in an unconstitutional manner, and which was known and ratified by Sheriff Neumann, the final policymaker for the Sheriff's Office. Moreover, Samarco has not shown the existence of an illicit custom that was so widespread as to constitute the force of law. He merely points to some incidents where other fleeing felony suspects were injured. Such isolated episodes, dispersed over several years, are insufficient to substantiate the existence of a widespread custom violative of § 1983."); Doe v. New Philadelphia Public Schools Bd. of Ed., 996 F. Supp. 741, 747 (N.D. Ohio 1998) ("[I]n the present case, the court is not of the opinion that Plaintiffs have established a custom on the part of New Philadelphia regarding the intentional, deliberate, or even reckless dismissal of allegations of sexual misconduct on behalf of its employees. To be sure, with the clarity of 20-20 hindsight it can be said that Ms. Banks and Ms. Potosky's investigative and preventative measures in response to the allegations against Ms. McCune were grossly insufficient. It can even be said in light of J.T. Milius' prior allegations that Ms. Banks was reckless for not raising an antenna when she heard that Ms. McCune was leaving the building with a minor student. These two incidents of neglectful conduct on the part of two New Philadelphia officials are troubling, but they do not rise to the level of a custom within the district, and certainly do not implicate the School Board in any way. Plaintiff is therefore unable to make out a crucial element of a 1983 claim under these circumstances, and summary judgment must be awarded to Defendant New Philadelphia.").

Acts of omission may serve as the predicate for a finding of municipal liability based on deliberate indifference to violations of constitutional rights. See, e.g., Scanlon v. County of Los Angeles, 92 F.4th 781, 811-13 (9th Cir. 2024) ("We have . . . observed three ways a plaintiff can satisfy Monell's policy requirement: The municipal government acts pursuant to an express official policy, the government maintains a longstanding practice or custom, or the act was committed or ratified by an official with policy-making authority. . . Official nonfeasance can constitute a Monell violation when the municipality in effect 'has a policy of inaction and such inaction amounts to a failure to protect constitutional rights.'. .This is not our first occasion to consider Monell liability as it pertains to a county's child-removal policy. Unlike the warrant-based seizure at issue here, in Kirkpatrick, social workers took a newborn from the hospital without securing a warrant. . . . Here, DCFS operated under a more formal policy than the one at issue in Kirkpatrick, removing the children pursuant to a warrant. . . .More than merely referencing the relevant standards, DCFS's Application and Statement of Cause thus requires social workers to vet the validity of a proposed removal against the requirements of probable cause and California state law. Despite DCFS's nominal compliance with federal and state standards, there is evidence in the record from which a jury could find that the Department's policy governing the preparation of warrant applications is insufficient in practice to protect the constitutional rights of parents like these. Specifically, there is evidence that DCFS maintains a practice of omitting exculpatory information from petitions for removal in a manner tantamount to an official 'policy of inaction.'. . . Drawing all inferences in the Parents' favor, as we must on a motion for summary judgment, a jury could conclude that DCFS's practices are inadequate to protect against constitutional violations such as those now claimed. We therefore remand the Monell claim to the district court for additional consideration."); Ingram v. Kubik, 30 F.4th 1241, 1255-56 (11th Cir. 2022) ("Ingram's complaint alleges that there was a causal connection between Dorning's conduct and the excessive force used against Ingram. The complaint alleges that Dorning established a policy that 'incidents of possible, likely, or known misconduct were not investigated, with the foreseeable result that deputies like Kubik believed they could get away with violating Ingram's rights.'. . And Ingram's complaint alleges that Kubik had that belief when he used excessive force. The complaint alleges 'multiple incidents, or multiple reports of prior misconduct by' officers. . . that were not investigated by Dorning. . . .Dorning allegedly 'was copied on all use of force reports' and 'approved of the excessive uses of force without having any of them investigated.' '[N]o officer was disciplined, let alone terminated, for excessive force or for otherwise violating a citizen's constitutional rights during Dorning's 16-year tenure.' During that tenure, Dorning's website 'identified no person or division to contact with a complaint [against] a deputy.' In response to requests for 'records of internal investigations of deputy misconduct,' Ingram's lawyer was 'told no such records existed,' despite a 'policy and procedure manual' that 'requires thorough and prompt investigations' of allegations of misconduct. And '[d]espite widespread knowledge of the incident' involving Kubik and Ingram 'up the chain of command (including Dorning)[,] ... the incident was not ... investigated.' . . . The allegations of 'multiple reports of prior misconduct,'. . . with no investigation by Dorning 'allow[ ] the court to draw the reasonable inference,'. . . that there is a causal connection between Dorning's failure to investigate any allegations of serious misconduct and Kubik's belief that he could act with impunity. The factual allegations, if true, establish the 'absence of a policy' of investigating excessive force violations, . . . of which Dorning had knowledge[.] And the complaint relies on more than the incident at issue to establish the custom or policy."); Jackson v. Barnes, 749 F.3d 755, 763, 764 (9th Cir. 2014) ("In inaction cases, the plaintiff must show, first, 'that [the] policy amounts to deliberate indifference to the plaintiff's constitutional right.'. . This requires showing that the defendant 'was on actual or constructive notice that its omission would likely result in a constitutional violation.'. . Second, the plaintiff must show 'that the policy caused the violation in the sense that the municipality could have prevented the violation with an appropriate policy.'. . Jackson's claim against the Sheriff's Department, when liberally construed, . . .adequately states a policy of inaction. Jackson's alleged 'policy of inaction' is the Department's 'complete failure to supervise the practices of [its] deputies.' He adequately states that the Department was on actual or constructive notice that this failure to supervise would likely result in a constitutional violation: he asserts that Barnes 'routinely declined to read Miranda warnings' and that, because of the regular nature of Barnes's illegal activity, the Department 'should have known or knew that this unconstitutional conduct was occurring.' Finally, he asserts that this policy was the cause of the constitutional violation here; '[i]n the instant case,' he alleges, 'we are confronted with' the Department's failure to supervise its deputies. In reviewing the district court's judgment on the pleadings, we assume that the facts that Jackson alleges are true, . . . that is, we assume that Barnes in fact routinely declined to give Miranda warnings, and that the Department in fact did not supervise the practices of its deputies. With this assumption, Jackson has pleaded a policy of inaction, and therefore the district court erred in granting defendants judgment on the pleadings on that basis. . . . Construing Jackson's complaint liberally, Jackson has met the Iqbal standard if only because he has made a critical factual allegation that renders his complaint specific: that Barnes has admitted that he routinely deprived suspects of Miranda warnings as a 'ploy' to elicit confessions. Thus, Jackson's contention that the Sheriff's Department knew or should have known about Barnes's unconstitutional conduct, is not merely possible, but plausible. Moreover, Jackson does not state without more that the Department's policies generally caused the violation at issue here: he states specifically that the violation is the result of the Department's 'complete failure to supervise the practices of [its] deputies.' These allegations are sufficiently particular to state a plausible claim of a policy of inaction under Iqbal."); Conn v. City of Reno, 591 F.3d 1081, 1104 (9th Cir. 2010) (order and amended opinion, denying rehearing en banc)

("As the Conns have presented sufficient evidence of a failure to adopt and implement suicide-prevention policies so as to give rise to a jury question, the rest of our analysis mirrors that which we described above regarding the failure to train. Given the predictability of suicide risk among detainees, and the likelihood of constitutional violations if suicide threats go unreported, the plaintiffs have presented a genuine issue for the jury on whether the failure to adopt and implement policies on suicide prevention was deliberately indifferent, and whether that deliberate indifference was a 'moving force' behind the violation of Clustka's constitutional rights."), cert. granted, 131 S. Ct. 1812 (2011) (judgment vacated and remanded in light of Connick v. Thompson, 131 S. Ct. 1350 (2011) and on remand, Conn v. City of Reno, 658 F.3d 897 (9th Cir. 2011) ("We reinstate the opinion at 591 F.3d 1081, except that in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Connick v. Thompson , 131 S.Ct. 1350 (2011), we affirm in all respects the district court's grant of summary judgment as to municipality liability."); Johnson v. Holmes, 455 F.3d 1133, 1145 (10th Cir. 2006) ("Villareal argues that extreme short-staffing at the Department is the cause of any failures on her part during this period. Undisputed testimony shows that Villareal was both covering the large number of cases Perez left behind and serving as a supervisor to other social workers. . . . However, Villareal does not present evidence that budgetary problems at the Department caused her complete failure to investigate. Existence of budgetary problems is not an automatic free pass for unprofessional behavior, and the record is not clear about whether Villareal's workload, and not some less benign explanation, made her unable to investigate the questionable situation in Bogey's home. Summary judgment on this issue was therefore inappropriate."); Long v. County of Los Angeles, 442 F.3d 1178, 1187, 1188, 1190 (9th Cir.2006) ("The County argues that, as a matter of law, a policy of reliance upon the trained professional doctors and nurses who worked in the MSB [Medical Services Bureau] cannot amount to deliberate indifference because the alleged deficiencies identified by Appellant fall within the province of medical and nursing schools, and nothing in the record suggests that the County had reason to believe the professional medical training received by the MSB doctors and nurses was deficient. This argument is contrary to this court's case law, which holds that, even where trained professionals are involved, a plaintiff is not foreclosed from raising a genuine issue of triable fact regarding municipal liability when evidence is presented which shows that the municipality's failure to train its employees amounts to deliberate indifference. Indeed, the County's argument would allow municipalities to insulate themselves from liability for failing to adopt needed policies by delegating to trained personnel the authority to decide all such matters on a case by case basis, and would absolve the governmental agencies of any responsibility for providing their licensed or certified teachers, nurses, police officers and other professionals with the necessary additional training required to perform their particular assignments or to implement the agency's specific policies. . . . The evidence creates a triable issue of fact regarding whether the County's policy of relying on medical professionals without training them how to implement proper procedures for documenting, monitoring and assessing patients for medical instability within the confines of the MSB amounted to deliberate indifference. . . . We conclude that Appellant has presented evidence that creates a triable issue regarding whether the County's failure to implement a policy for responding to the fall of a medically unstable patient, a policy providing for prompt medical assessment if an MSB patient refuses necessary treatment, and a transfer policy, directing MSB staff immediately to transfer patients no longer medically stable, amounted to deliberate indifference to Mr. Idlet's constitutional rights."); Calhoun v. Ramsey, 408 F.3d 375, 379-81 (7th Cir. 2005) ("The express policy theory applies, as the name suggests, where a policy explicitly violates a constitutional right when enforced. . . . A second way of complaining about an express policy is to object to omissions in the policy. This, as we understand the argument, is what Calhoun is doing. In fact, we think that it is more confusing than useful to distinguish between claims about express policies that fail to address certain issues, and claims about widespread practices that are not tethered to a particular written policy. In both of these situations, the claim requires more evidence than a single incident to establish liability. . . This is because it is necessary to understand what the omission means. No government has, or could have, policies about virtually everything that might happen. The absence of a policy might thus mean only that the government sees no need to address the point at all, or that it believes that case-by-case decisions are best, or that it wants to accumulate some experience before selecting a regular course of action. At times, the absence of a policy might reflect a decision to act unconstitutionally, but the Supreme Court has repeatedly told us to be cautious about drawing that inference. . . Both in the 'widespread practice' implicit policy cases and in the cases attacking gaps in express policies, what is needed is evidence that there is a true municipal policy at issue, not a random event. If the same problem has arisen many times and the municipality has acquiesced in the outcome, it is possible (though not necessary) to infer that there is a policy at work, not the kind of isolated incident that Brown held cannot support municipal liability. . . . Whether we look at this case as one in which Calhoun was complaining about the failure of the County's express policy to make provision for advance verification of medications, or if we look at it as one in which Calhoun is arguing that the County has an implicit policy reflected in an alleged widespread practice of impeding detainee access to medication (a distinction Calhoun has discussed at length), the result is the same. Because he cannot point to any language in the jail's policy that is constitutionally suspect, he must provide enough evidence of custom and practice to permit an inference that the County has chosen an impermissible way of operating. . . . Having argued that the jail had a 'practice of refusing' to pre-verify medication, Calhoun cannot now turn around and argue that the district court erred by instructing the jury on a custom or usage theory. Indeed, the instructions were consistent with Calhoun's proposed instructions and provided an alternative theory for his claim. His effort to hold Kane County liable on the basis of this single incident is inconsistent with Brown, and the district court was correct to reject instructions that would have misstated the law."); Garretson v. City of Madison Heights, 407 F.3d 789, 796 (6th Cir. 2005) ("Garretson argues that Madison Heights's conduct, and that of its police officers, was premised on an unwritten custom of not providing medical attention to pre-trial detainees prior to arraignment[,] a policy or custom of inaction. She refers to the 'Madison Heights Policy on Medical Care while in Custody' to support her position. Such an alleged policy of inaction 'must reflect some degree of fault before it may be considered a policy upon which § 1983 liability may be based.' . . . Garretson must show: (1) a clear and persistent pattern of mishandled medical emergencies for pre-arraignment detainees; (2) notice, or constructive notice of such pattern, to Madison Heights; (3) tacit approval of the deliberate indifference and failure to act amounting to an official policy of inaction; and (4) that the custom or policy of inaction was the 'moving force,' or direct causal link, behind the constitutional injury. . . Here, there is no evidence that Madison Heights, or its Police Department, had a custom of denying medical treatment to pre-arraignment detainees. Nor is there evidence that Madison Heights had notice of a 'clear and persistent pattern' of such treatment demonstrating the existence of a policy of inaction. Nor, as the district court noted, is there evidence that Madison Heights was the 'moving force' behind Garretson's injuries. Therefore, the decision of the district court that the City, and its Police Department, are entitled to summary judgment on the§ 1983 claims is AFFIRMED."); Williams v. Paint Valley Local School District, 400 F.3d 360, 369 (6th Cir. 2005) ("To state a municipal liability claim under an 'inaction' theory, Doe must establish: (1) the existence of a clear and persistent pattern of sexual abuse by school employees; (2) notice or constructive notice on the part of the School Board; (3) the School Board's tacit approval of the unconstitutional conduct, such that their deliberate indifference in their failure to act can be said to amount to an official policy of inaction; and (4) that the School Board's custom was the 'moving force' or direct causal link in the constitutional deprivation. . . The Monell custom requirement is an essential element of this claim. The evidence must show that the need to act is so obvious that the School Board's 'conscious' decision not to act can be said to amount to a 'policy' of deliberate indifference to Doe's constitutional rights.' emphasis original); Blackmore v. Kalamazoo, 390 F.3d 890, 900 (6th Cir. 2004) ("A review of the record reveals that Blackmore presented evidence that the County did not have a formal written policy on how to deal with prisoner illnesses, and that the jail's practice was not to provide a substitute nurse if the on-duty nurse calls in sick, resulting in times when a nurse is not on duty. Because we hold that verifying medical evidence is not required to state a claim for deliberate indifference where, as here, the seriousness of prisoner's need for medical care is obvious, and because the record presents an issue of fact regarding the total lack of any County policies, practices, and adequate training for this type of constitutional claim, and regarding whether the harm complained of resulted from the County policies, or lack thereof, we reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment for the County."); Hayes v. Faulkner County, Arkansas, 388 F.3d 669, 674 (8th Cir. 2004) ("The County's policy was to submit the names of confinees to the court and then wait for the court to schedule a hearing. That policy attempts to delegate the responsibility of taking arrestees promptly before a court. In Oviatt v. Pearce, 954 F.2d 1470 (9th Cir.1992), a policy was deliberately indifferent where the jail had no internal procedures to track whether inmates had been arraigned. . . Because the County's policy here attempts to delegate the responsibility of bringing detainees to court for a first appearance and ignores the jail's authority for long-term confinement, the policy is deliberately indifferent to detainees' due process rights."); A.M. v. Luzerne County Juvenile Detention Center, 372 F.3d 572, 583 (3d Cir. 2004) ("Although this issue presents a close question on whether the Center's failure to establish a written policy and procedure for reviewing and following up on incident reports amounts to deliberate indifference, we conclude that a reasonable jury could conclude from the evidence that by failing to establish such a policy the Center disregarded an obvious consequence of its action, namely, that residents of the Center could be at risk if information gleaned from the incident reports was not reviewed and acted upon."); Natale v. Camden County Correctional Facilitiy, 318 F.3d 575, 585 (3d Cir. 2003) ("A reasonable jury could conclude that the failure to establish a policy to address the immediate medication needs of inmates with serious medical conditions creates a risk that is sufficiently obvious as to constitute deliberate indifference to those inmates' medical needs.

The failure to establish such a policy is a 'particular[ly] glaring omission' in a program of medical care . . . PHS [Prison Health Services] 'disregarded a known or obvious' consequence of its actions, i.e., the likelihood that the medical conditions of some inmates may require that medication be administered within the first 72 hours of their incarceration."); Gibson v. County of Washoe, 290 F.3d 1175, 1195, 1196 (9th Cir. 2002) ("County officials actually knew that some detainees who arrived at the jail would have urgent medical and mental health needs requiring immediate hospitalization. The policymakers also knew that people suffering from mental illness are sometimes combative. In addition, the County had created a mental health screening position, so policymakers knew that jail employees needed to identify and address mental illnesses in order not to neglect the medical needs of prisoners. Given that the County policymakers actually knew that the jail staff would regularly have to respond to detainee mental health needs, it should have been obvious that the County's omission could well result in a constitutional violation. . . Because county policy forbids medical evaluations on incoming detainees who are combative and uncooperative, it was obvious that someone who had a mental illness that made them combative and uncooperative would not be evaluated. If, however, a combative detainee arrives with prescription psychotropic medication in their own name, there is an alternative way to identify those with medical needs. Although a jury could conclude that the nurse actually did identify Gibson as a person in need of mental health treatment, the County's medication policy did not instruct her to act upon this realization. When policymakers know that their medical staff members will encounter those with urgent mental health needs yet fail to provide for the identification of those needs, it is obvious that a constitutional violation could well result"); Fairley v. Luman, 281 F.3d 913, 918 (9th Cir. 2002) (per curiam) ("John presented evidence sufficient to establish the City's warrant procedures constituted a 'policy.' Chief Luman testified at trial that he was 'the chief policymaker for law enforcement matters for the City of Long Beach.' His decision not to instigate any procedures to alleviate the problem of detaining individuals on the wrong warrant could constitute a policy in light of his testimony he knew it was 'not uncommon' that individuals were arrested on the wrong warrant, and that the problem was particularly acute where twins were involved. As in Oviatt, where the city failed to implement internal procedures for tracking inmate arraignments, the policy was one of inaction: wait and see if someone complains."); Griffin v. City of Opa-Locka, 261 F.3d 1295, 1308, 1314 (11th Cir. 2001) ("After reviewing the record in full and taking all inferences in favor of Griffin, the evidence establishes without any question that sexual harassment was the on-going, accepted practice at the City and that the City Commission, Mayor, and other high ranking City officials knew of, ignored, and tolerated the harassment. As such, we are persuaded that the jury's conclusion that sexual harassment was so persistent and widespread as to amount to a unconstitutional policy or custom is amply supported by the evidence. . . . We believe it fair to say that the City's tolerance of gross sexual harassment, its failure to take remedial action despite actual and constructive knowledge of the problem and its complete lack of any sexual harassment policy or complaint procedure taken together clearly constitute a 'moving force' behind the rampant sexual harassment at the City. As such, we uphold the jury's conclusion that the City had a policy or custom of ignoring or tolerating gross sexual harassment."); Munger v. City of Glasgow Police Dep't, 227 F.3d 1082, 1088 (9th Cir. 2000) ("The unconstitutional policy or custom the Mungers allege. . . is not the failure to offer assistance to intoxicated persons, but rather the failure to train officers regarding appropriate assistance and treatment of intoxicated persons. In our view, a custom and policy of helping intoxicated individuals could be in place and yet the departments could have failed to implement the policy because they did not train their officers adequately."); Oviatt v. Pearce, 954 F.2d 1470, 1477 (9th Cir. 1992) (decision not to take any action to alleviate the problem of detecting missed arraignments constitutes a policy for purposes of § 1983 municipal liability); Rivas v. Freeman, 940 F.2d 1491, 1495 (11th Cir. 1991) (liability for failure to establish sufficient and appropriate procedures and policies regarding identification of arrestees, warrantless searches, and computer checks for information); Leach v. Shelby County Sheriff, 891 F.2d 1241, 1247 (6th Cir. 1989) (policy of deliberate indifference to medical needs of paraplegic and physically incapacitated prisoners), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 932 (1990).

See also Little v. City of Morristown, Tennessee, No. 221CV00047DCLCCRW, 2023 WL 2769633, at *12-13 (E.D. Tenn. Mar. 31, 2023) ("[A] reasonable juror could conclude that there was a clear and persistent pattern of reckless disregard to inmate safety of which the County had actual notice. The County's failure to address and resolve these concerns despite pleas for help from Jail administration also creates a genuine dispute as to whether the County tacitly approved the unconstitutional conduct, such that their deliberate indifference to inmate safety could reasonably be said to amount to an official policy of inaction. In the absence of such official policy of inaction, it may also be reasonably inferred that Little would have been properly supervised and secure while at the Jail. . . . A reasonable juror could conclude that had the Jail been adequately staffed with officials who could properly perform security checks, Little's need for medical care would not have been disregarded. . . . [T]he record is sufficient to create a genuine dispute as to whether the County acted with deliberate indifference to the safety and security of inmates at the Jail through a policy of inaction."); Echavarria v. Roach, No. 16-CV-11118-ADB, 2021 WL 4480771, at *27 (D. Mass. Sept. 30, 2021) ("Plaintiff's theory that the City failed to promulgate a policy relating to disclosure requirements will also survive summary judgment. . . . Although there is a dispute as to whether it had policies regarding the disclosure of exculpatory evidence, . . . the City maintains that it was not on notice that failing to have a detailed exculpatory evidence policy would cause a constitutional violation[.] . . Like the failure to train allegation, the failure to promulgate a policy theory also requires a causal link between the City's inaction and the constitutional deprivation, which can normally be shown via a pattern of past violations, but liability may also occur in the face of an 'obvious and known risk.'. . Here, failing to have a policy on disclosing exculpatory evidence creates a known and obvious risk that police officers would withhold such evidence. . . Accordingly, triable issues about the City's liability exist, and the City's motion for summary judgment on Count I is therefore DENIED."); Taylor v. Comanche County Facilities Authority, No. CIV-18-55-G, 2020 WL 6991010, at *9–10 (W.D. Okla. Nov. 25, 2020) ("With respect to state of mind, 'to show that a facially lawful municipal action has led an employee to violate a plaintiff's rights, the plaintiff must show that the action was taken with deliberate indifference as to its known or obvious consequences.'. .The deliberate indifference standard may be satisfied when the municipality has actual or constructive notice that its action or failure to act is substantially certain to result in a constitutional violation, and it consciously or deliberately chooses to disregard the risk of harm. In most instances, notice can be established by proving the existence of a pattern of tortious conduct. In a narrow range of circumstances, however, deliberate indifference may be found absent a pattern of unconstitutional behavior if a violation of federal rights is a highly predictable or plainly obvious consequence of a municipality's action or inaction. . . .The record before the Court allows a reasonable inference that the alleged conditions and attendant risks to inmate safety were known to CCDC staff and administrators. . . Based on this evidence, there is a genuine dispute as to whether CCFA, as the entity responsible for operating the jail, knew about the complained-of conditions (i.e., overcrowding, understaffing, insufficient camera monitoring, and institutional tolerance of inmate disobedience), knew such conditions posed a substantial risk of serious harm to inmates, and nonetheless neglected to take any ameliorative action. . . Defendants, for their part, do not directly dispute the cited instances where CCDC exceeded its inmate capacity or the CCDC officers' testimony regarding the allegedly deficient jail conditions, emphasizing instead that Plaintiff does not cite a specific incident 'similar to the attack on Plaintiff.'. . Defendant Hobbs' signed declaration is silent as to Plaintiff's conditions-of-confinement allegations, instead focusing upon the training protocols and written policies that apply to the facility, as well as the training of the specific officers present at the incident. . . But a governmental entity can be held liable for its actions and inaction (e.g., 'permitting conditions' that precipitate an inmate attack or failing 'to adequately train and supervise the detention officers on duty') even if the entity's official policy 'is not unlawful on its face.'. . Nor do Defendants contend that Defendant CCFA 'tried to correct the deficiencies but was hindered' by circumstances beyond its control, such as a lack of funding. . . Considered in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the evidence in the record is sufficient to create a material fact issue as to whether Defendant CCFA was deliberately indifferent to an excessive risk to inmate safety and to the obvious consequences of its conduct in operating CCDC in this regard. . . . In sum, a jury could conclude from the evidence before the Court that Defendant CCFA was or should have been aware of a significant risk of harm to inmate safety at CCDC, that Defendant CCFA 'failed to take reasonable steps to abate the risk,' and that Defendant CCFA's 'policy of no or ineffective action was the moving force behind the conditions which created the risk of harm in the first place.'. . Defendant CCFA is therefore not entitled to summary judgment on Plaintiff's municipal-liability failure-to-protect claim."); Martin v. Hermiston School District 8R, No. 3:18-CV-02088-HZ, 2020 WL 6547638, at *19-23 (D. Or. Nov. 4, 2020) ("To prevail on a municipal liability claim under § 1983, Plaintiffs must show that a municipal custom or policy caused the violation of their constitutional rights. . . If no constitutional violation occurred, then a municipal liability claim fails under § 1983. . . To establish Monell liability, Plaintiffs must show a constitutional violation caused by (1) an employee acting under an expressly adopted official policy; (2) an employee acting under a longstanding practice or custom that amounts to an official policy; or (3) an employee acting as a final policymaker. . . The Court has found that a question of fact remains about whether a constitutional violation occurred, so the Court analyzes each of the avenues through which Plaintiffs allege Monell liability against the School District to determine whether the School District is entitled to summary judgment on Plaintiffs' Monell claims. . . .An official policy under § 1983 may be a policy of action or inaction. . . A government body's 'failure to implement procedural safeguards to prevent constitutional violations' is a policy of inaction that may cause a constitutional violation. . . To establish a policy of deliberately indifferent inaction,

Plaintiffs must show that the School District ' "was on actual or constructive notice that its omission would likely result in a constitutional violation" and that "the policy caused the violation in the sense that the municipality could have prevented the violation with an appropriate policy."'. . Whether a government entity acted with deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of citizens generally is a jury question. . . . Plaintiffs produced undisputed evidence that the School District had no procedure to ensure that coaches did not return athletes to play after they sustained a concussion without medical clearance. . . . Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, a jury could conclude from th[e] facts that the School District acted with deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of its players. The School District lacked a process for identifying which players required medical clearance before returning to practice and play. . . . With no way to verify with accuracy that only players who had received medical clearance following a concussion participated in practices and games, it should have been obvious to the School District that a coach could return a concussed player to practice and play without medical clearance. It was also obvious that a player could suffer a serious injury or even death if the player sustained another head injury. As a result, a reasonable juror could conclude that the inadequacy of the School District's informal memory-dependent method of tracking student concussions was so obvious and the risk of a constitutional violation so likely to occur that the School District was deliberately indifferent to the constitutional rights of C.M. and his parents."); Oliver v. Gusman, No. CV 18-7845, 2020 WL 1303493, at *6–9 (E.D. La. Mar. 19, 2020) ("Plaintiff here challenges systemic deficiencies within OJC and OPSO that he alleges not only violated his constitutional rights but also resulted in numerous other instances of officers failing to protect inmates, which readily distinguishes many of the cases the Moving Defendants rely on. . . Plaintiff's complaint alleges that he was exposed to a substantial risk of serious harm from other inmates in light of OPSO officers' inadequate supervision of inmates and that the Moving Defendants were aware of this risk from the numerous prior instances of inmate-on-inmate assaults where officers failed to intervene, yet they failed to correct the polices that allowed these assaults to continue. Plaintiff has stated a claim for deliberate indifference to his constitutional right to safety. . . . Here, Plaintiff has alleged that the Moving Defendants knew of a substantial risk of serious harm to inmates in their custody from assaults by other inmates that officers would be unlikely to prevent because a pattern of similar incidents had been ongoing for several years before Plaintiff was attacked. Thus, their failure to correct policies known to cause constitutional violations or to implement new policies is objectively unreasonable, regardless of whether the Moving Defendants knew that Plaintiff specifically was at risk."); Ballheimer v. Batts, No. 117CV01393SEBDLP, 2019 WL 1243061, at *11–12 (S.D. Ind. Mar. 18, 2019) ("Defendants' chief argument in opposition to Ballheimer's Monell claim is a complete nonstarter: 'Contrary to Plaintiff's claims, there were no policies and procedures in place with regards to these issues. If this claim is recognized, it does not rise to the level of a constitutional violation and/or there is no evidence in support of it.'. . And again: 'The undisputed evidence is that there were no policies and procedures in place with regard to the catheterization issue.'. . Rejecting this argument does not require breaking new ground in this area; to the contrary, [the Seventh Circuit] has recognized these principles for years. In Sims v. Mulcahy, 902 F.2d 524 (7th Cir. 1990), [the court] observed that 'in situations that call for procedures, rules or regulations, the failure to make policy itself may be actionable.'. . In the same vein, [the court] said in Thomas v. Cook Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 604 F.3d 293 (7th Cir. 2010), that 'in situations where rules or regulations are required to remedy a potentially dangerous practice, the County's failure to make a policy is also actionable.'. . see also King v. Kramer, 680 F.3d 1013, 1021 (7th Cir. 2012) (where municipality has 'actual or constructive knowledge that its agents will probably violate constitutional rights, it may not adopt a policy of inaction')."); Siehl v. City of Johnstown, 365 F.Supp.3d 587, 599-600 (W.D. Pa. 2019) ("Here, Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged that the County caused the deprivation of his rights by its failure to employ policies and protocols regarding the DNA testing of biological evidence at a time when law enforcement agencies throughout the United States knew that such testing could provide conclusive evidence of guilt or innocence in a criminal case. Plaintiff further alleges that the County's failure to establish guidelines as to who would pay for the testing after it was determined that such testing was necessary, delayed the DNA testing until all blood samples were consumed in non-DNA testing. . . Plaintiff avers as follows: Had investigating officers conducted or arranged for DNA testing, that testing could have exonerated Mr. Siehl as none of his blood or other biological material was present in an area that would show that he was the murderer. Further, that testing could have provided evidence as to the identity of the real killer. . . .Taking all of Plaintiff's allegations as true, as it must at this stage of the proceedings, the Court finds at the pleading stage that Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged a claim for municipal liability against Cambria County."); Turner v. Cook County Sheriff's Office, No. 19 CV 5441, 2020 WL 1166186, at *3-4 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 11, 2020) ("The Seventh Circuit has not 'adopt[ed] any bright-line rules defining a "widespread custom or practice."'. . In fact, 'there is no clear consensus as to how frequently such conduct must occur to impose Monell liability, except that it must be more than one instance, or even three.'. . A plaintiff must sufficiently allege a policy as opposed to a random event. . . At this stage, the Court finds that Plaintiff has met that burden. The Amended Complaint alleges that Jail inmates regularly overdose because of inadequate or nonexistent policies that allow inmates easy and frequent access to drugs. Plaintiff alleges that these policies were the moving force behind the violation of Ms. Scott's constitutional right to be free from deliberate indifference to her drug overdose and ultimate death. In support, Plaintiff cites several inmate overdoses, many occurring within the past five years. Plaintiff also alleges that 'top policymakers' in Cook County publicly acknowledged the problem, cited failures in policy, and were aware of the substantial risk these failures posed to inmates. . . According to Plaintiff, Sheriff Dart knew about the problem and the inmate risk, yet he did nothing. . .Plaintiff's Amended Complaint also claims failure to train and supervise Jail staff to screen for drugs and to appropriately respond to drug overdoses. There are limited circumstances in which a failure to train claim will be characterized as a 'policy' under § 1983 and Monell. City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378, 388 (1989). A failure to train or supervise claim is actionable only if the failure amounted to deliberate indifference to the rights of others. . . In this context, deliberate indifference exists where: (1) the defendant failed to provide adequate training considering foreseeable consequences; or (2) failed to act in response to repeated complaints of constitutional violations by its officers. . . Basically, 'the defendant must have actual or constructive notice of a problem.'. .Although Plaintiff arguably alleges other constitutional violations in the form of overdoses and Jail suicides, Plaintiff does not plead any examples of repeated complaints related to those incidents. Thus, Plaintiff pleads only the first kind of failure to train claim. Specifically, Plaintiff alleges that the Jail was aware of, and publicly acknowledged, a persistent drug smuggling problem that resulted in several inmate overdoses and deaths. Yet, the Amended Complaint alleges that Sheriff Dart failed to adequately train Jail staff on drug screening methods, inmate supervision, drug treatment, and drug overdose response. These allegations are sufficient to establish notice of the problem, its consequences, and a failure to act. Sheriff Dart argues that Plaintiff's allegations are insufficient because the Amended Complaint details one example of drug smuggling, mentions instances where Jail staff administered overdose antidotes, and discusses unrelated cases of overdose from alcohol and legally obtained medication. These arguments quibble with red herring factual details and fail to address Plaintiff's overarching allegations—that inmate overdoses regularly occur, Sheriff Dart and Jail staff know that, the Jail's policies (if they exist) do not adequately address the problem, Jail staff are not appropriately trained or supervised as to drug screening or overdose treatment, and because of all that, Ms. Scott overdosed and died. Sheriff Dart's arguments might be more well-received on a motion for summary judgment, but the Court finds them lacking here. . . . [T]he Amended Complaint contains sufficient allegations to put Sheriff Dart on notice of the bases for Plaintiff's official liability claims."); Deloney v. County of Fresno, No. 117CV01336LJOEPG, 2018 WL 3388921, at *11 & n.22 (E.D. Cal. July 11, 2018) ("[T]he facts alleged do not lead the Court to find this to be in the narrow range of circumstances where single incident liability is appropriate. In Conn v. City of Reno, a case involving a pretrial detainee's suicide, the Ninth Circuit held that '[t]he failure to train officers on how to identify and when to report suicide risks produces a "highly predictable consequence": that police officers will fail to respond to serious risks of suicide and that constitutional violations will ensue.'. . . However, after the Supreme Court's decision in Connick v. Thompson, the Ninth Circuit specifically vacated the portion of its prior opinion pertaining to Monell claims for both failure to train and failure to implement a policy–indicating that single-incident liability does not attach to cases involving inmate suicides presumably because failing to implement policies on suicide prevention did not constitute a 'highly predictable consequence' of such policy failures. . . . In Conn, the Ninth Circuit did not explicitly consider whether plaintiffs had established a pattern for purposes of Monell liability, but after vacating the opinion on the theory of single incident liability for failure to train and failure to implement policies, affirmed summary judgment for Defendant on those Monell claims despite six suicides in the jail in question in less than two years. . . In Connick, the Supreme Court found that four overturned convictions because of Brady violations committed by Connick's assistant district attorneys did not establish a pattern of violations to put Connick on notice for a need for better Brady training because none of those cases involved the failure to disclose the type of evidence involved in Thompson's case."); T.E. v. Pine Bush Cent. Sch. Dist., 58 F. Supp. 3d 332, 377-79 (S.D.N.Y. 2014) ("Here, Plaintiffs have proffered sufficient evidence to survive summary judgment on Monell grounds based on the District's response, or lack thereof, to anti-Semitic harassment. As discussed, there are issues of material fact as to whether the District had actual knowledge of the harassment that Plaintiffs allege. . . Moreover, there is specific evidence in the record that the Board had actual notice that school administrators were confronting numerous instances of anti-Semitic bullying. . . .Moreover, the emails and the meeting provided the Board with information that anti-Semitic harassment presented administrators and teachers with 'difficult choice[s]' concerning discipline and prevention, there was a pattern of school personnel 'mishandling the[se] situation[s],' and that those choices had 'cause[d] the deprivation of [students'] rights' to be free from harassment and bullying based on their race. . . The Court also notes that Defendants have not presented any evidence nor do they make any claim that Meier or Greer or the Board in general took steps to address harassment, monitor the administrators' response to anti-Semitism or bullying in general, or independently investigate Plaintiffs' claims after the emails or the June 2011 meeting. . . . In light of evidence of the Board's knowledge of anti-Semitic harassment and its failure to respond in any reasonable way, including through training of school administrators and teachers, a jury could find that the facts demonstrate the District's 'inaction was the result of conscious choice and not mere negligence.'. . Accordingly, Defendants are not entitled to Summary Judgment under Monell."); Hughes v. City of Chicago, No. 08-cv-627, 2011 WL 5395752, at *6 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 8, 2011) ("Plaintiffs' claim comes down to whether not having a policy regarding field testing and not training officers on the use of field test kits constitutes deliberate indifference on the part of the City to its citizens' rights. Plaintiffs theorize that because Officers Uczen and Iza had no knowledge of the field test kits (and, even if they did, were not trained on how to use them), Plaintiffs' rights were violated and Monell liability follows. However, Plaintiffs' theory ignores the training that the officers had (and followed) regarding the recovery of suspect narcotics at the scene of an arrest. That the policy does not provide instruction on how or when to use field test kits does not automatically mean that it should. Rather, given that Plaintiffs have offered no evidence of additional alleged violations beyond the present incident to support their claims at the summary judgment stage, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs have not come forward with enough to overcome the concerns expressed by the Supreme Court in Tuttle and the Seventh Circuit in Calhoun. In short, although Defendant Officers remain in the case to answer for their individual conduct at trial, Plaintiffs have fallen short of demonstrating that gaps in the City's policies and training were the moving force behind Plaintiff Dewitt's injuries or that the City was deliberately indifferent to their constitutional rights."); Finch v. City of Stamford, No. 3:10cv748 (MRK), 2011 WL 5245422, at *5 (D. Conn. Nov. 2, 2011) ("If, as Ms. Finch claims, a policy about treating intoxicated or drugged arrestees was needed in Stamford, then it must also be the case that training in that policy was also needed. In sum, the Court cannot imagine a lack-of-policy claim under § 1983 that is not also, and more relevantly, a failure-to-train claim. Both ultimately focus the Court's attention on the same issue: whether the City should have done more to prevent a clearly foreseeable constitutional violation from happening. . . .[A] plaintiff needs to inquire during discovery into the ways the City's police officers are trained, and what policies and practices they routinely follow. She needs to investigate whether past incidents have suggested a need for different practices, or more stringent policies and training. And she must adduce evidence showing that, by ignoring this need, the city caused the injury in question − that things might have gone differently if the City had fostered different practices. Ms. Finch has done none of this. . . .Ms. Finch has not offered evidence to suggest that Stamford's police officers were insufficiently trained at identifying arrestees' medical needs. Nor has she offered evidence that Stamford's practices have ever led to an injury or death other than Mr. Avalone's. Finally, since no medical expert was deposed, no evidence indicates that Mr. Avalone would have survived even if the City's policies had required police to take him immediately to the hospital."); Blanchard v. Swaine, No.

08-40073-FDS, 2010 WL 4922699, at *11, *12 (D. Mass. Nov. 29, 2010) ("[I]t is doubtful that there is a perfect congruence in any municipality between its written policies (which are often set out in a three-ring binder on a shelf) and the policies as implemented in the field (which often occurs under fast-paced and difficult circumstances). But there are at least two relevant ways, alone or in conjunction with one another, in which such a connection could be drawn. The first is where a city's failure to follow its written policies prevents its management from becoming aware of incidents as they arise and implementing appropriate training and discipline in response. . . Here, the Leominster police did not normally file a separate use-of-force report, did not send a detective to investigate use-of-force incidents, and 'usually' (but not always) informed the chief of police of such incidents. A factfinder might reasonably conclude that the LPD was not taking steps to ensure that it was informed of problems as they arose, and thus could not implement appropriate training and discipline in response. It is true, of course, that there is no evidence that the LPD had a history of the use of excessive force, or a history of failing to discipline wayward officers. But that same evidence might be said to support the argument that the LPD was not keeping itself fully informed, rather than refute the causative link. . . The second way a causal connection could be drawn is where a city's failure to follow its written policies sends a message to officers that rules will not be strictly enforced and that officer violations will not be disciplined. . . Although this case does not present highly egregious circumstances of institutional misconduct, a reasonable jury could nonetheless draw such an inference here. . . In summary, a reasonable factfinder could conclude under the circumstances that the City's failure to follow its written policy could have constituted the direct cause of Blanchard's injury. . . Summary judgment will therefore be denied with regard to the claims of failure to supervise, discipline, and investigate."); Johnson v. City of Chicago, No. 05 C 6545, 2009 WL 1657547, at *10 (N.D. Ill. June 9, 2009) ("Contrary to the City's argument, however, Johnson has pointed to evidence in the record that could lead a reasonable jury to believe that the City's practice of inadequate investigation and discipline of rogue officers caused these officers to violate his rights."); Arias v. Allegretti, No. 05 C 5940, 2008 WL 191185, at *4, *5 (N.D.Ill. Jan. 22, 2008) ("Whether the City's actions in 1997 and 1998 requiring simply a contract change without taking any legislative action shows a lack of deliberate indifference should be left for the trier of fact. The evidence in the instant case shows that in January 2000 Alderman Beavers submitted an official resolution recognizing that 'Chicago police officers who do not carry out their responsibility in a professional manner have ample reason to believe that they will not be held accountable, even in instances of egregious misconduct.' A committee hearing was held, but nothing was done. In 2003, a jury returned a $1 million verdict against the City, finding a plaintiff's injuries were directly caused by the City's custom and practice of not adequately investigating, disciplining or prosecuting off duty police officers who used excessive force. Garcia v. City of Chicago, 2003 WL 22175618 (N.D.Ill.2003). Although that $1 million damage award was later reduced by remittitur, the City Council was certainly made aware that its so-called efforts to correct the problems of inadequate investigation and discipline was failing. Yet, nothing more was done at that time. Finally, in 2005 a proposal to amend the Municipal Code was introduced that would have addressed many of the issues raised by Alderman Beavers. The proposal called for sweeping changes in the investigation process. That proposal failed to pass the City Council, and the Chicago Police Department's disciplinary system remains unchanged to date. Based on the evidence plaintiffs have presented, they are entitled to argue to a jury that the City Council has been deliberately indifferent to the problem of police sexual misconduct, resulting in plaintiffs' injuries. Accordingly, the City's motion for summary judgment on Count I is denied."); Samples v. Logan County, Ohio, No. C2-03-847, 2006 WL 39265, at *10 & n.6 (S.D. Ohio Jan. 6, 2006) ("As a matter of law, the Court cannot say one way or another whether the outcome would have been different had the jail's screening policy involved asking questions about alcohol history. . . However, it is not unreasonable to think that, considering the symptoms Susan was exhibiting in the night, and considering the special precautions the jail takes when an inmate has a known risk of withdrawal, placing Susan in a special observation cell could have made a difference. The Court therefore finds plaintiffs have alleged sufficient facts to establish that the accident happened because of the County's policy. Accordingly, defendants' motion is denied on this claim. . . . The jail has since changed its policy to now include questions about alcohol use. . . Plaintiff's expert, Dr. Gottula, testified that it is common practice at other prisons to ask specific questions at intake about the risk of alcohol withdrawal. These questions have been routinely asked since the late 1990s."); Brown v. Mitchell, 327 F.Supp.2d 615, 631(E.D. Va. 2004) ("In sum, on this record, a reasonable jury could find a pattern or practice for purposes of Monell by finding that the City Manager's Office, in its long-standing failure to act in the face of the known conditions at the Jail, acted with deliberate indifference to a known constitutional deprivation."); Solis v. City of Columbus, 319 F.Supp.2d 797, 809-11 (S.D. Ohio 2004) ("Because, under a no-knock warrant, a citizen loses the protection that would prevent the wrong house from being raided, the city should provide the citizen with the alternative protection of greater care being taken to ensure that the targeted address is correct before the warrant issues. The governmental interest in not having in place some sort of procedural safeguards to prevent terrifying and potentially tragic invasions of the wrong homes seems to this Court to be slight. When compared with the interest of innocent citizens in not undergoing the sort of ordeal experienced by Nicole and Carmen Solis, . . . the Court has no problem in concluding that a jury could find the City to have been deliberately indifferent to the rights of its inhabitants by failing to have such a policy. . . . The evidence reveals that Cox simply was not, in several small ways, as careful as he could have been. But why should he have been more careful, when there was no City policy requiring it? A reasonable jury also could find that, had such a policy been in place, Cox would have given the additional attention to accuracy that would have led to a different result. For the foregoing reasons, Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment is DENIED as to the City and the individual Defendants in their official capacities based on the City's failure to have in place an operational policy that would require more than usual care to be taken in the interests of obtaining an accurate address for the no-knock search warrant that led to the violation of Plaintiffs' rights."); Brown v. Mitchell, 308 F.Supp.2d 682, 693, 694 (E.D. Va. 2004) ("[T]he housing of inmates in a grossly overcrowded, poorly ventilated, and unsanitary jail facility such as is described in the Complaint is so likely to result in inmate sickness and suffering that there is an obvious likelihood of constitutional deprivations to an identifiable group of persons having a special relationship to the municipality. And, that likelihood of deprivation to those persons is so apparent and obvious that, under Milligan, municipal inaction, even standing alone and without a pattern of actual sickness or disease transmissions, can constitute a cognizable 'official policy or custom' for purposes of Monell."); Kelsay v. Hamilton County, Tennessee, No. 1:02-CV-054, 2003 WL 23721334, at *11 (E.D. Tenn. Dec. 9, 2003) ("Kelsay contends that the Hamilton County Sheriff's Department has a higher than normal use of force at the jail against prisoners and there is a history or pattern of ignoring complaints by prisoners of excessive force. There is a dispute whether the Sheriff's Department conducted a meaningful investigation of the incident involving Kelsay, even though Kelsay's mother made jail supervisors aware of his serious injuries. According to Kelsay, no officer submitted an incident report about his injuries even though the Sheriff's Department's manual required an officer to notify the nurse and prepare an incident report upon learning that a prisoner has been injured. Kelsay also asserts that Coppinger had been named in two or three other civil suits involving assaults at the jail but Hamilton County had not conducted an investigation of Coppinger. Furthermore, Kelsay asserts that officers who use excessive force in the jail are not investigated and disciplined. Other jail officers who witness the use of excessive force against prisoners are not disciplined for failing to report it to the proper authorities. Kelsay argues that this lack of training, supervision and control over corrections officers adds up to and constitutes a policy or custom of deliberate indifference toward the constitutional rights of prisoners at the jail, and that this policy or custom of allowing excessive force at the jail was a proximate cause of the violation of Kelsay's constitutional rights. There are genuine issues of material fact in dispute concerning whether Hamilton County can be held liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for the assault committed upon Kelsay in his jail cell. . . . Kelsay may proceed to trial on his claim that Hamilton County failed to adequately train and supervise its corrections officers."); Murvin v. Jennings, 259 F. Supp.2d 180, 186, 187 (D. Conn. 2003) ("Murvin contends that the Town is liable for its police officers' failure to insure that the exculpatory information pertaining to the charges against him was actually transmitted to the prosecuting authority. Murvin claims that the Town's liability can be based on its failure to have an official policy that insures that exculpatory material is properly transmitted to prosecuting authorities as required by state statute. The court agrees. . . . Here, the Town cannot avoid liability as a matter of law merely because it does not have a policy, custom or practice that governs the transmittal of exculpatory material to prosecuting officials. To the contrary, as the foregoing case law clearly establishes, the Town may be liable under § 1983 for its failure to take action to insure that the constitutional rights of criminal suspects are not violated and that its police officers abide by the statutorily-imposed duty to disclose exculpatory information to prosecuting authorities."); Terry v. Rice, No. IP 00-0600-C H/K, 2003 WL 1921818, at *20, *22, *23 (S.D. Ind. Apr. 18, 2003) (not reported) ("Plaintiff does not argue that there was an application of a policy that resulted in a constitutional violation or that as a policymaker, Sheriff Rice made a decision concerning Donald's treatment that resulted in a constitutional violation. Rather, plaintiff argues that the relevant policy was the absence of a policy − the failure to implement proper procedures for dealing with inmates who are mentally ill or suicidal, as well as a failure to implement proper procedures for obtaining inmates' medical records who were transferred to the jail from RDC. . . . The Montgomery County Jail had no official suicide watch policy. . .The policy for dealing with mentally ill inmates that was in place during the relevant time period dealt only with inmates as they were booked into the jail and did not provide any kind of screening mechanism or address the needs of established inmates, such as Donald. . . . Furthermore, there is little to no evidence concerning what training, if any, the jail officers received as a part of their job. The record evidence does indicate that, at a minimum, jailers were supposed to receive first-aid and CPR training. . . However, there is no indication that any of the jail officers, who would have had the most opportunity to observe the inmates, were ever 'trained regarding recognition of symptoms of mental illness' pursuant to 210 Ind. Admin. Code § 3-1-11(j) (1998) . . . Not having such policies concerning mentally ill inmates effectively allows jail officers to remain blissfully ignorant to a known and serious threat, and can lead directly to the harm of inmates. A reasonable juror could conclude that whatever procedures were in place concerning a suicide watch option were so inadequate as to amount to deliberate indifference."); McDermott v. Town of Windham, 204 F. Supp.2d 54, 67-69 (D. Me. 2002) ("The Court finds sufficient evidence in the summary judgment record to demonstrate that Chief Lewsen established a policy or custom of encouraging officers to handcuff all suspects in the course of arresting them. Nevertheless, Plaintiff has not established that this policy is violative of any clearly established federal right. Plaintiff has not shown that she had a clearly established right not to be handcuffed incident to her arrest. . . . The fact that the police department had no specific written policy dictating precisely when the use of handcuffs is justified does not amount to a deliberate choice to follow a course of action likely to lead to a constitutional violation or to deliberate indifference on Lewsen's part. To the contrary, Lewsen and the Town provided guidance to officers in effectuating arrests, including with regard to the use of force. Accordingly, the Court will grant summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity to Defendant Lewsen on Plaintiff's claim of excessive force. . . . The Windham police department's custom, encouraged by Chief Lewsen, to handcuff suspects in the ordinary course of an arrest is not such as to condone constitutional violations."); Booker v. City of Boston, No. CIV.A.97-CV-12534MEL, CIV.A.97-CV-12675MEL, CIV.A.97-CV-12691MEL, 2000 WL 1868180, at *3 (D. Mass. Dec. 12, 2000) ("The city policy in question is its policy for dealing with allegations of sexual molestation. In a school setting such a policy is of course of vital importance . . . .Under the circumstances, the city enacted what appeared to be a constitutional policy. The crux of the plaintiffs' allegations is that the city utterly failed to distribute copies of the policy to its employees or to train them as to the action the policy required. They have provided evidence which could support a finding that the city did little more than develop the policy, distribute it to its principals in the middle of almost 1000 pages of other documents, and assume that from these actions its employees would understand their mandatory reporting obligations under ' 51A. Not surprisingly, this expectation was not met when the girls complained in the Spring of 1995. As would be expected, under such a 'paper tiger' system, all four school employees (three of whom were administrators) who should have reported the incidents under ' 51A failed to do so. As a result, a jury could conclude that the city was a 'moving force' behind any violation occurring after the girls first reported the incident to Hill."); Connors v. Town of Brunswick, No. 99-331-P-C, 2000 WL 1175641, at *9, *10 (D. Me. Aug. 16, 2000) ("[T]he fact that the Town considered batons important enough to mandate that they be carried but then failed to enforce that policy could support a conclusion that the Town was deliberately indifferent to the need to ensure that its officers were adequately equipped to avoid the usage of unnecessary deadly force. . . . In view of the plaintiff's evidence that failure to carry an impact weapon deprives an officer of a necessary weapon in the continuum of force and that Cap-Stun is an inadequate substitute, one could also infer that Hinton acted recklessly, taking the risk that lack of an impact weapon or an adequate substitute would result in his officers' use of unjustified deadly force. Such an omission by Hinton could, in turn, be linked to what a jury could find to have been the unreasonable use of deadly force against Weymouth."); Andrews v. Camden County, 95 F. Supp.2d 217, 229, 230 (D.N.J. 2000) ("It is well established that in § 1983 suits, a municipality may be held liable for not having in place a policy that is necessary to safeguard the rights of its citizens, or for failure to act where inaction amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of persons affected. . . . [I]if defendants knowingly failed to enforce the requirements that a Medical Director be in place and that medical rounds be conducted daily to visit segregated prisoners, this is evidence of reckless disregard of a condition creating an unreasonable risk of violation of inmates' Eighth Amendment rights . . . ."); Winton v. Bd of Commissioners of Tulsa County, 88 F. Supp.2d 1247, 1268 (N.D. Okla. 2000) ("The Court finds that there is evidence in the record from which a reasonable jury could conclude that the County's action or inaction in response to the risk of harm present in the Jail was not reasonable. . . . There is evidence in the record from which a jury could conclude that the only practical way for the County to have significantly abated the risk of violence at the Jail was to build a new facility. There is also evidence in the record that the County was hampered in its efforts to build a new jail by the voters of Tulsa County, who refused to pass bond issues prior to September 1995. While the Court recognizes the plight of the County, '[t]he lack of funding is no excuse for depriving inmates of their constitutional rights.' Ramos, 639 F.2d at 573, n. 19 (citing several cases). The voters of Tulsa County had a choice. The County could pay on the front end to protect the constitutional rights of inmates by building a new jail, or the County could pay on the back end by satisfying judgments in meritorious civil rights actions based on unconstitutional conditions at the Jail. Until a new jail was built in 1999, the voters in Tulsa County had necessarily chosen the second of these options as the County's response to violence at the Jail. . . . A reasonable jury could find that the County's inaction or ineffective action was the moving force behind the conditions at the Jail which caused or permitted a serious risk of inmate harm to exist in the Jail. A jury could find that overcrowding, under-staffing, lack of adequate inmate supervision, lack of inmate segregation and classification, lack of inmate exercise time, dormitory-style housing, all of which existed over a long period of time, were all de facto policies of inaction by the County which created and or contributed to the conditions which created a serious risk of harm in the Jail."); Simmons v. Justice, 87 F. Supp.2d 524, 533 n.11 (W.D.N.C. 2000) ("Defendants cite City of Canton v. Harris . . . in support of their argument that Plaintiff has not shown any 'deliberate indifference' on the part of the City of Spindale as is required to show a viable § 1983 claim. . . However, this requirement applies only to a 'failure to train' allegation. . . . Because Plaintiff is not alleging 'failure to train,' this authority is not applicable to his § 1983 claim. For liability to attach to the City of Spindale, Plaintiff will have to prove the city irresponsibly failed 'to put a stop to or correct a widespread pattern of unconstitutional conduct by police officers of which the specific violation is simply an example.' Kopf, at 262."); Massey v. Akron City Bd. of Education, 82 F. Supp.2d 735, 746, 747 (N.D. Ohio 2000) ("The plaintiffs do not say that the Defendant Akron Board of Education had an explicit policy of condoning sexual abuse. No school board could have such a policy. Because the plaintiffs do not claim that the Akron Board adopted an official policy, they must show that a 'custom' was adopted through the decision making process that led to Bennett abusing them. . . The plaintiffs say the Board of Education had a custom of failing to prevent sexual abuse by teachers after repeated notice of trouble with the teacher that should have suggested the teacher was a pedophile. . . . Here, a reasonable jury could find the Akron Board of Education manifested a 'policy' of deliberate indifference to sexual abuse of students by teachers or counselors. . . There are facts sufficient to support a jury in finding a deliberate indifference to Bennett's sexual abuse and harassment of students. These facts are sufficient to support a jury finding that such deliberate indifference reflects a custom of inaction that was a 'moving force' in the constitutional deprivation. The plaintiffs show evidence that the Defendant Akron Board of Education tolerated a pervasive custom, which directly caused the deprivation at issue."); Wright v. City of Canton, 138 F. Supp.2d 955, 966 (N.D. Ohio 2001) ("Based on Marchese and Leach, Wright can establish his municipal liability claim by showing (1) a final municipal policymaker approved an investigation into Jackson and Vinesky's conduct (2) that was so inadequate as to constitute a ratification of their alleged use of excessive force. Wright offers sufficient evidence to make this showing. The parties do not dispute that Canton Police Chief Thomas Wyatt approved the internal affairs investigation into the incident that led to Wright's injuries. Under Ohio Revised Code ' 737.12, the chief of police is the final policymaker with regard to investigations that do not result in disciplinary action. Because the investigation into Jackson and Vinesky's conduct did not result in their discipline, Wyatt's approval of the investigation constitutes municipal policy."); Weaver v. Tipton County, 41 F. Supp.2d 779, 789 (W.D. Tenn. 1999) ("In general, to state a municipal liability claim under an 'inaction' theory, Weaver must establish the existence of a clear and persistent pattern of unconstitutional conduct by municipal employees and notice or constructive notice of that pattern on the part of the municipality. . . Weaver must then demonstrate that the municipality's inaction reflected deliberate indifference such that its failure to act reflects an official policy of inaction, and that this policy is the moving force behind the constitutional violation at issue."); Cox v. District of Columbia, 821 F. Supp. 1, 13 (D.D.C. 1993) ("[T]he District of Columbia's maintenance of a patently inadequate system of investigation of excessive force complaints constitutes a custom or practice of deliberate indifference to the rights of persons who come in contact with District police officers."), aff'd, 40 F.3d 475 (D.C. Cir. 1994); Rubeck v. Sheriff of Wabash County, 824 F. Supp. 1291, 1301, 1302 (N.D. Ind. 1993) ("[I]n situations that call for procedures, rules, or regulations, the failure to make a policy itself may be actionable."); Timberlake by Timberlake v. Benton, 786 F. Supp. 676, 696 (M.D. Tenn. 1992) ("A local governing body does not shield itself from liability by acting through omission. Thus, when a city provides no guidance to its officers regarding such intrusive actions as strip searches, it must face the consequences of its inaction by being subject to suit.").

See also Linthicum v. Johnson, No. 1:02-CV-480, 2006 WL 1489616, at *29, 32-34 (S.D. Ohio May 26, 2006) ("Linthicum argues that the City's disciplinary code must be evaluated not in the abstract, but rather as applied . . . in the Officers' arbitrations. . . She reasons that as such, the City must be held accountable for the arbitrators' decisions to reinstate the Officers with (in Johnson's case) a non-disciplinary corrective action and (in Kidd's case) three days' unpaid leave. . . She also suggests the City had − but failed to use − ultimate authority over whether to let the Officers return to work, because the City did not 'exercise its right to appeal' the arbitrators' reinstatements. . . . Because Linthicum's allegations that Kidd and Johnson were inadequately disciplined hinge largely on the Officers' reinstatements by arbitrators after their terminations, an important threshold issue is the extent to which the City may be held liable, under§ 1983, for the arbitrators' applications of the police disciplinary code. . .Unfortunately, neither party offers any specific legal authority on this point. The City reasons that it should not be bound by interpretations of the disciplinary code that are 'poorly reasoned' and in conflict with the police department's own interpretations during the Officers' initial disciplinary proceedings. . . Linthicum responds that the City must be held accountable for the arbitrators' applications of the code as a matter of contract law or general public policy, because the City should not able to shield itself from liability for police misconduct 'simply by negotiating and delegating away its authority to terminate' police officers in a collective bargaining agreement. . .While Linthicum's contractual privity theory has considerable logical appeal, the Supreme Court has suggested that it applies in the§ 1983 context only to the extent that a defendant municipality has delegated its authority to make disciplinary policy along with its authority to terminate individual employees pursuant to that policy. . . . Linthicum has not set forth any facts which suggest that the independent arbitrators who reinstated Officers Kidd and Johnson under the City's official disciplinary code were delegated responsibility for promulgating that code in the first instance. . . The Court is sympathetic to Linthicum's argument that constructions of § 1983 like the one cited above may allow municipalities to limit their § 1983 liability for inadequate discipline by contracting their enforcement authority, under facially constitutional policies, to independent entities. Nonetheless, on the facts of this case, the Court feels itself bound by the authority above. The Court thus concludes that the City cannot be liable for the arbitrators' applications of the police disciplinary code, because Linthicum has not established a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the arbitrators actually made or adopted that code − as opposed to simply applying it in individual disciplinary appeals. . . . While the City is not accountable under § 1983 for the arbitrators' direct applications of the disciplinary code to reinstate Officers Kidd and Johnson, it remains accountable for failing to exercise any discretion it retained to override or otherwise challenge those reinstatements. As Linthicum observes in her papers, it appears 'the City did not even exercise its right to appeal' the arbitrators' decisions reinstating Kidd and Johnson. . . A reasonable jury could construe this apparent neglect of an opportunity to keep the Officers off the police force as evidence of the City's indifference to police discipline. However, because the failure to appeal concerns only Officers Kidd and Johnson, it is not independently sufficient to establish 'deliberate indifference' under§ 1983. . . Therefore, the Court must consider whether Linthicum has shown at least a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether the City has inadequately disciplined other officers. . . .While the City emphasizes that it initially terminated Underwood and Ewing for their misconduct, it also does not dispute Linthicum's assertion that it did not attempt to preserve those terminations by appealing Underwood and Ewing's reinstatements by arbitrators − or sixteen of the seventeen other reinstatements between 1994 and 2004 − to a court of law. The Cincinnati Police Chief has testified that in his experience, '100 percent' of police terminations are appealed to arbitration. . . The Chief has also testified that the City Manager and legal department decide − with input from the Chief − whether to appeal arbitrators' reinstatements of terminated officers like Kidd and Johnson. . . These facts could reasonably be construed to suggest that the City has exhibited 'deliberate indifference' to police discipline, either because it terminated officers with the expectation that they would be reinstated by arbitrators, or because it acquiesced in the arbitrators' reinstatements by failing to exercise its discretion to appeal to a court of law. . . . [I]t appears that a reasonable jury armed only with the present statistics and other cited evidence could, in reviewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Linthicum, conclude that the City has engaged in an unofficial custom or policy of 'deliberate indifference' to police discipline. The City's claim for summary judgment as to this issue is therefore DENIED.").

But see Cartia v. Beeman, 122 F.4th 1036, 1045 (8th Cir. 2024) ("Cartia and Adams have not identified a custom. They point to the sheer number of excessive-force lawsuits brought against Lincoln County over the past 10 years, but they provide no details about any of them, including whether they were successful. Without more, the existence of a 'municipal custom of permitting or encouraging excessive force' is just speculation. . . Nor do they have evidence that the Lincoln County Sheriff, a 'policymaking official[ ],' ignored 'unconstitutional misconduct.'. . They claim he effectively admitted to doing so during his deposition, but all he did was answer hypothetical questions. And each one of his responses tracked the law: reasonableness depends on the surrounding facts, including the level of resistance encountered. . . The Fourth Amendment requires nothing more."); Franklin v. Franklin County, Kentucky, 115 F.4th 461, 472-74 (6th Cir. 2024) ("Franklin next argues that the County is liable for Price's actions due to the Jail's alleged policy of 'inaction.' She specifically maintains that 'Franklin County knew that female inmates were particularly vulnerable to sexual assault, that they would be subjected to cross-gender supervision and transport, and that these circumstances carried an obvious risk of sexual misconduct.' Relying heavily on her claims that the Jail was 'aware that multiple instances of sexual misconduct had occurred within the facility' and that 'cross-gender supervision required a greater level of care,' Franklin asserts that the Jail, 'through its inaction, inculcated a "culture of indifference" toward the sexual abuse and assault of female inmates and staff in the Jail.' She thus argues that Franklin County had a policy or custom of inaction toward the sexual abuse of inmates. To succeed on a municipal-liability claim under an 'inaction' theory, a plaintiff must show '(1) the existence of a clear and persistent pattern of' unconstitutional conduct; (2) 'notice or constructive notice' on the part of the municipality; (3) the municipality's 'tacit approval of the unconstitutional conduct, such that [its] deliberate indifference in [its] failure to act can be said to amount to an official policy of inaction'; and (4) 'that the [municipality's] custom was the "moving force" or direct causal link in the constitutional deprivation.'. . Franklin must first show a clear and persistent pattern of unconstitutional conduct. . . With respect to how many instances are required to constitute a 'clear and persistent pattern,' this court has observed that a plaintiff '"cannot rely solely on a single instance" to prove the existence of an unconstitutional custom.' . .This court, however, has concluded that five similar incidents over the course of three years were sufficient to constitute a pattern. . . But it has also concluded that three instances of similar misconduct revealed in one police investigation did not establish a clear and persistent pattern. . . Another ambiguity in this area is that 'our circuit does not appear to have explained how "similar" past incidents must be to constitute a "pattern of similar constitutional violations."'. . But this court's unpublished opinion in Berry v. Delaware Cnty. Sheriff's Off., 796 F. App'x 857, 862 (6th Cir. 2019), provides persuasive guidance in addressing 'similarity.' The Berry court held that the similarity between a plaintiff's claim and an alleged pattern of constitutional violations 'must be particularized.'. . What that means in practical terms is that 'the prior examples of wrongdoing must violate the same constitutional rights [as the plaintiff's] and violate them in the same way.'. . The alleged pattern of similar unconstitutional conduct, however, need not be identical, or even 'almost identical' to that which a plaintiff alleges occurred in her case. . . Using this framework, Franklin would need to show that there was a pattern of Eighth Amendment violations at the Jail (i.e., the same constitutional right that Price violated), that involved some sort of sexual assault on inmates (i.e., the right was violated in the same way as Franklin's was). . . But she would not need to demonstrate that the assault specifically occurred on a transportation vehicle. . .. Given the fact-specific nature of allegations concerning patterns of similar constitutional violations, this inquiry is necessarily context-dependent. In the present case, the three incidents of misconduct highlighted by Franklin are insufficiently similar to Price's conduct. . . .The record instead demonstrates that Price's actions were 'rogue.' Price himself admitted that he knew that he was violating the Jail's policy by sexually assaulting Franklin. Franklin's constitutional violation thus 'resulted from factors other than a faulty [County policy].'. . . Indeed, this is not a case in which there is a 'total lack of any County policies' governing the prevention of sexual assault. . .The Jail's policies explicitly prohibit sexual contact between inmates and staff, require information to be given to each inmate about preventing and reporting such incidents, subject all employees who fail to comply with the Jail's PREA policy to disciplinary action or termination, and require all employees who witness or have knowledge of any sexual activity to report it. We therefore conclude that the County is not liable on a municipal-liability theory of inaction."); Mosier v. Evans, 90 F.4th 541, 549 (6th Cir. 2024) ("Inaction can support municipal liability when: (1) there is a clear and persistent pattern of illegal activity; (2) the municipality has notice or constructive notice of it; (3) the municipality tacitly approves of the illegal activity, such that its deliberate indifference can be said to establish an official policy of inaction; and (4) that policy caused the constitutional deprivation. . . Mosier presents no argument that there is a pattern of constitutional violations, that the County had notice of that pattern, or that the County was deliberately indifferent to that pattern. . . His inaction theory therefore fails.); Robinson v. Midland County, Texas, 80 F.4th 704, 710 (5th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 1010 (2024) ("[A] pattern is not sufficient to establish a policy where the municipality had no knowledge of the pattern. There are no allegations that anyone other than the Soluta employees were aware, or should have been aware, of the nurses' failure to provide adequate medical care. . . Plaintiffs freely admit that the nurses' actions were counter to the standard course of treatment and that the nurses 'fabricated' Hall's flo-sheet. This implies that neither Soluta nor Midland County . . . knew of the 'policy' of failing to follow the proper medical procedures. It would be possible to allege that Soluta had a policy of failing to know what their nurses were doing—but that is not what was pleaded. Instead, plaintiffs' theory hinges entirely on the idea that if enough individuals do something, it becomes the fault of the policymaker. Without a showing of knowledge and acquiescence, such a theory is no more than vicarious liability and cannot survive a motion to dismiss. "); Austin v. City of Pasadena, Texas, 74 F.4th 312, 332-33 (5th Cir. 2023) ("We have recognized that a municipality may be liable for failing to adopt policies. . . 'While the municipal policy-maker's failure to adopt a precaution can be the basis for § 1983 liability, such omission must amount to an intentional choice, not merely an unintentionally negligent oversight.'. . '[M]unicipal failure to adopt a policy does not constitute such an intentional choice unless it can be said to have been deliberately indifferent.'. . 'A failure to adopt a policy can be deliberately indifferent when it is obvious that the likely consequences of not adopting a policy will be a deprivation of constitutional rights.'. . [court sets out Pasadena's "use of force" policy and Electronic Control Weapons policy] Plaintiffs assert the City's formal use-of-force and ECW policies are 'so vague and general that they amounted to no policy at all that meaningfully restrained an individual officer's use of force.' Rather, allegedly, the City's 'actual policy, custom, or practice was to tolerate and encourage excessive force.' Such customs and practices are said to include 'the failure to adopt any policy limiting the use of force against detainees suffering from an epileptic seizure; the failure to utilize pepper spray as a lesser means of force than Tasers; the failure to forbid shooting a Taser into a detainee's chest; and using unlicensed PSOs as jailers.' Plaintiffs rely on the fact that multiple jailers — including a supervisor, as well as a police officer — all acted similarly, and none objected to the unconstitutional actions of the others, to demonstrate the existence of a widespread custom that shows this 'was accepted as the way things are done and have been done' in the City of Pasadena. See Grandstaff v. City of Borger, 767 F.2d 161, 171 (5th Cir. 1985). Defendants respond that the City's use-of-force and ECW policies are typical and in line with Texas law. We find that the record is insufficient to support a jury question that the use-of-force and ECW policies were so vague that they amounted to no policy at all. These policies 'may have been inadequate,' and while a jury might conclude that the City was negligent in not requiring Plaintiffs' specified actions, 'that, of course, is not enough under § 1983.'. . 'Without evidence showing that the higher level of care was obviously necessary, we cannot see how the jury could conclude' that the use-of-force and ECW policies were deliberately indifferent. . . . We affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment as to municipal liability against the City."); Martinez v. Nueces County, Texas, 71 F.4th 385, 389 (5th Cir. 2023) ("A Monell claim does not require the plaintiff to identify a written policy. In some situations, a plaintiff can succeed by pointing to similar incidents that are 'sufficiently numerous' and have 'occurred for so long or so frequently that the course of conduct warrants the attribution to the governing body of knowledge that the objectionable conduct is the expected, accepted practice of city employees.' Peterson v. City of Fort Worth, 588 F.3d 838, 850–51 (5th Cir. 2009) (quotations omitted). Martinez has attempted to plead Monell in this way, providing a list of examples that he claims support his allegations that Nueces County had a policy of 'ignoring the serious medical needs of those entrusted to [its] care.'. . In Bond v. Nueces County, No. 20-40050, 2022 WL 4595000, at *5 (5th Cir. Sept. 30, 2022) (unpublished), we accepted this way of establishing a policy. But we cannot accept Martinez's version: Martinez fails because the pattern of examples must have 'similarity' and 'specificity.'"); Howell v. NaphCare, Inc., 67 F.4th 302, 318-19 (6th Cir. 2023) ("The Estate argues that NaphCare had a custom of authorizing its nurses to order restraint chairs, which practice led to Howell's inadequate medical care. As for the County, the Estate contends it was deliberately indifferent in failing to train its officers on proper restraint-chair monitoring. The district court granted summary judgment to both Defendant entities. . . .A private corporation performing traditional state functions can be held directly liable under § 1983 if its customs, practices, or policies led to a constitutional deprivation. . . A custom that has not been formally approved may still serve as a basis for liability if 'the relevant practice is so widespread as to have the force of law.'. . The Estate bears 'a heavy burden in proving municipal liability, and [it] cannot rely solely on a single instance to infer a policy of deliberate indifference.'. . The Estate argues that 'there is evidence showing that nurses routinely ordered restraint chairs,' and that custom 'caused the denial of adequate medical care' to Howell. If such a custom existed, it violated jail policy that the 'application of any clinically ordered restraints must be ordered by an advanced clinical provider.' The Estate contends that this caused Howell's injury because if Jordan had complied with policy, a doctor would have been contacted and that doctor likely would have ordered Howell to the emergency room. The Estate points to only one piece of deposition testimony that, according to a corrections officer, shows that it was 'typical for nurses to be the ones who are authorizing the restraint chair.' Notably, this single piece of evidence does not make clear that it was 'typical' for nurses to order restraint chairs without first receiving authorization from an advanced medical provider, which the policy permitted to be provided 'in writing or via telephone consultation.' That testimony alone is insufficient to show a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether there was a custom of nurses ordering restraints in violation of policy that was 'so widespread as to have the force of law.'. .The district court's grant of summary judgment to NaphCare on the Estate's Monell claim is affirmed."); Guillot on behalf of T.A.G. v. Russeli, 59 F.4th 743, 752-53 (5th Cir. 2023) ("Similar to custom, a de facto policy is defined as a persistent widespread practice that, although not authorized by an officially adopted policy, is so common and well settled as to constitute a custom that fairly represents a municipal policy. . . '[I]solated acts' cannot establish the existence of a custom or practice. Instead, prior incidents 'must have occurred for so long or so frequently that the course of conduct warrants the attribution to the governing body of knowledge that the objectional conduct is the expected, accepted practice.'. . According to Guillot, the custom at OCC was to apply heightened observation, which has no written definition, to inmates exhibiting suicidal tendencies. She alleges that on February 18 and March 3, 2020, Powell exhibited such tendencies. Most concerningly, on February 18, he had asked for help, was withdrawn, had a blank stare, and had wrist abrasions, yet he was not sent to suicide watch and instead was placed under heightened observation. Guillot maintains that it is a custom that allows deputies to shirk their responsibility to observe the inmates and meticulously log their observations. Under this deficient de facto policy, she claims Powell was denied his Eighth Amendment rights. Nevertheless, even taking all of Guillot's factual assertions as accurate, she has not stated sufficient facts that indicate the alleged policy was a de facto policy. Moreover, she does not demonstrate that even if it was a de facto policy, that policy was the moving force behind the purported constitutional violation present here. This circuit has consistently rejected the notion that one-off actions constitute a policy. . . Guillot has alleged only two violations, namely, the inaction by guards after Powell's concerning acts on February 18 and March 3. Even taking at face value that Powell should have been moved to suicide watch both times, this does not prove a widespread custom of violating constitutional rights. These are one-off actions, and Guillot has not shown any other valid examples of persistent violations."); Leonard v. St. Charles County Police Department, 59 F.4th 355, 363-64 (8th Cir. 2023) ("Leonard's final claim seeks to hold St. Charles County liable for the actions of its employees. For most of them, the lack of a constitutional violation means 'there can be no § 1983 or Monell ... liability.'. . There is one possible exception. Assuming Nurse Martin violated Leonard's constitutional rights, St. Charles County could be liable if a county-wide 'policy or custom' was to blame. . . There is no argument here that an 'official policy' requires jail officials to withhold prescription medications from inmates. . . The only other possibility is a custom[.] . . . The evidence of a custom is weak. The best Leonard can do is point to a handful of unconnected incidents, ranging from failing to give ulcer medication to one inmate to refusing to accommodate the food allergies of another. On these facts, no reasonable factfinder could conclude that Leonard carried his 'heavy burden' to show a 'widespread, persistent pattern' of withholding prescription medication."); Holloway v. City of Milwaukee, 43 F.4th 760, 770 (7th Cir. 2022) ("The Supreme Court has recognized that omissions, such as failures to act or to train, may provide a basis for Monell liability. . . But to be liable for its inaction, a municipality must have notice of the risk of a constitutional violation and fail to act even in the face of such notice. . . Plaintiffs may show such notice in one of two ways: 'Sometimes the notice will come from a pattern of past similar violations; other times it will come from evidence of a risk so obvious that it compels municipal action.' J.K.J., 960 F.3d at 381. Holloway has adduced no evidence of a pattern of prior violations that would have put the City on notice of the risk of the violations he alleges. And as troubled as we are by the overly suggestive identification procedures, we do not believe a reasonable jury could conclude that the risk of the alleged violations was so obvious as to place this case in the narrow set where 'obvious[ness] ... compels municipal action.'. . Thus, summary judgment was also appropriate on Holloway's Monell claims."); Moore v. LaSalle Management Company, L.L.C., 41 F.4th 493, 518 (5th Cir. 2022) (Ho, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("A custom may give rise to liability under Monell only if the unlawful practice is 'so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law.'. . The pattern of behavior 'must have occurred for so long or so frequently that the course of conduct warrants the attribution to the governing body of knowledge that the objectionable conduct is the expected, accepted practice of ... employees.'. . A pattern thus requires 'similarity, specificity, and sufficiently numerous prior incidents.'. . 'Showing a pervasive pattern is a heavy burden.'. . The majority nowhere acknowledges this heavy burden. . . . In this appeal from the grant of summary judgment, we construe the evidence in Plaintiffs' favor. But that doesn't give us license to prop up Plaintiffs' case with evidence that doesn't exist—or to treat Plaintiffs' briefing as if it were the record. Nor does it license us to make legal pronouncements contrary to our precedent. I respectfully dissent in part."); Finch v. Rapp, 38 F.4th 1234, 1245 & nn. 2 &3 (10th Cir. 2022) ("Finch alleges that Police Department officers had a custom of shooting unthreatening suspects.[2] [fn. 2: We note that there is no need for a plaintiff to provide evidence of successful constitutional litigation to prove a municipal liability claim. To the extent the district court's order is read that way, it misstated the proof necessary for a Monell claim. . . But a plaintiff must provide evidence of a pattern of relevant conduct—here, the use of excessive force on unthreatening civilians.] In support, he cites police-involved shootings that occurred over the six years preceding the incident with Finch. But Finch does not argue that all of the more than 20 shootings he cites constituted excessive force. Instead, he points to only a handful of police-involved shootings that '[a] jury could conclude ... were unconstitutional.'. . These alleged constitutional violations have widely varying facts and lack a common theme or pattern. Some do not involve excessive force. Even assuming the subset of cases drawn from the six-year period were constitutional violations, they are isolated when considered in the circumstances presented in this case.[3] [fn. 3: Three cases do not necessarily constitute a pattern of excessive force, contrary to Finch's argument. Quintana v. Santa Fe County Board of Commissioners, 973 F.3d 1022, 1034 (10th Cir. 2020), does not require us to find three incidents are sufficient. That case was at the more lenient motion-to-dismiss stage, which we emphasized constituted 'a low bar.'. . Further, there were more than three incidents alleged there. In Quintana, the decedent allegedly never received withdrawal medication even though prison staff acknowledged that he was going through withdrawal when he entered the jail. He alleged that three other inmates had 'recently' died from drug withdrawals. He pointed to a DOJ study warning the county of its inadequate medical screening procedures. He finally alleged that he had deficient intake procedures over the eight previous times he was incarcerated at the facility. In Quintana, the plaintiff offered proof of many more than three incidents. Thus, the case cannot stand for the proposition that three incidents necessarily establish a pattern of unconstitutional conduct for the purposes of Monell liability."); Novak v. City of Parma, Ohio, 33 F.4th 296, 310 (6th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 773 (2023) ("Finally, Novak contends that Parma had an established custom and pattern of 'indifference to protected speech in criminal investigations.'. . And he runs through a list of cases where Parma had to reverse course over protected-speech claims. But he does not explain how this list of cases could form a 'clear and persistent pattern' so strong that it resembles official policy condoned by the City. . . Perhaps unsurprising, since it's a 'heavy burden' to show municipal liability based on custom. . . Novak doesn't even suggest (as he must) that this pattern resulted from a deliberate choice 'from among various alternatives' that amounts to an unwritten 'legal institution.'. . Nor does he explain how that policy—despite independent warrants from Magistrate Judge Fink and Judge O'Donnell—caused a constitutional violation. . . He simply argues that 'Parma should have known better.'. . This is not enough to support a finding of municipal liability, so we affirm."); Hurd v. District of Columbia, 997 F.3d 332, 337-40 (D.C. Cir. 2021) ("In Monell, the Supreme Court held that, under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, municipalities can be held liable for constitutional violations committed by their employees only if a plaintiff shows that the municipality is the 'moving force' behind the constitutional violation, meaning that an 'official municipal policy of some nature caused a constitutional tort[.]' . . Generally speaking, such an official policy exists when (1) the municipality adopts a policy that itself violates the Constitution; (2) the unconstitutional action was taken by a 'policy maker' within the government; (3) the employees' unconstitutional actions 'are so consistent that they have become [a] "custom"' of the municipality of which the supervising policymaker must have been aware; or (4) the municipality knew or should have known of a risk of constitutional violations, but showed 'deliberate indifference' to that risk by failing to act. . . So to survive summary judgment, Hurd had to show that the District or one of its official policymakers directly violated the Constitution, allowed constitutional violations so widespread that they amounted to a municipal custom, or was deliberately indifferent to the risk of constitutional violations. Hurd presents two theories for municipal liability. First, he argues that there has been a pattern of similar unconstitutional practices within the District's Department of Corrections, such that the District either tacitly adopted the employees' conduct as custom or was deliberately indifferent to the constitutional rights of detainees. Second, Hurd argues that the District's official detention policy violated his constitutional rights. Hurd's first theory of liability fails, but the second may succeed depending on as-yet unresolved factual determinations. . . As to his first theory, Hurd argues that his sudden incarceration without due process was part and parcel of a 'pattern of similar violations' by the District, and also showed the District's deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of inmates eligible for release. . . To make that showing, Hurd places great weight on two prior class actions—Bynum v. District of Columbia, 257 F. Supp. 2d 1 (D.D.C. 2002), and Barnes v. District of Columbia, 793 F. Supp. 2d 260 (D.D.C. 2011)—and claims that they 'established [a] record of [the District] ignoring the constitutional rights of prisoners held in the D.C. Jail.'. . .To hold a municipality liable based on a pattern of similar constitutional violations, a plaintiff must show that the municipality 'knowingly ignore[d] a practice that was consistent enough to constitute custom.'. . The practice must be 'persistent and widespread[.]'. . And the actions or 'series of decisions' can only confer liability on the municipality if the custom was so engrained that it amounted to a 'standard operating procedure' of which municipal policymakers must have been aware. . . Hurd did not come forward with summary judgment evidence demonstrating such a widespread practice or custom of spontaneous incarceration after a record review by legal instrument examiners (or by other District employees). Bynum and Barnes do not do the job for Hurd. Both cases involve failures by the District that bear little resemblance to the type of unconstitutional conduct asserted by Hurd. In both Bynum and Barnes, the plaintiffs challenged the District's release procedures for inmates who had concluded their sentences and alleged that the District's procedures delayed release and resulted in additional hours or a day of incarceration beyond the end of the imposed sentence. . . Those constitutional violations involving the timing of inmate releases did not put District policymakers on notice of the type of incarceration problem at issue in Hurd's case. The over-detentions in Barnes and Bynum involved the delayed release of inmates who had fully served their sentences and as to whom the District asserted no lawful basis for any further detention (e.g., no claimed warrants, detainers, or unserved sentences). . . In contrast, Hurd asserts that the District intentionally incarcerated him for an unserved sentence for different offenses—his misdemeanor sentences—after he was mistakenly released from the halfway house four years earlier. Spontaneous incarceration for what is believed to be an unserved sentence is factually and legally distinct from an administratively delayed release at the completion of a sentence for which no lawful basis for further detention is claimed. The governmental activity giving rise to the constitutional claim, which here involved individual record assessments by District employees that led to incarceration for totally different crimes, is distinct from the bureaucratic misadministration of general inmate release protocols in Bynum and Barnes. More to the point, a District employee could hardly have looked at the conduct at issue in Bynum and Barnes as a 'standard operating procedure' that caused Hurd's incarceration[.] . . [T]o establish a pattern giving rise to deliberate indifference, the other asserted violations must have materially similar legal implications so as to put the municipality on notice of the probability of future constitutional violations. Hurd failed to make that type of showing. The evidence he points to involving delayed inmate release practices could not have put the District on notice of its need to revise its incarceration policies for newly discovered unserved sentences. Hurd nonetheless insists that his case is similar enough, citing to Daskalea v. District of Columbia, 227 F.3d 433 (D.C. Cir. 2000). That case is no help to Hurd. In Daskalea, we held that the District was deliberately indifferent to a pattern of sexual harassment and assault in its jails. . . Hurd argues that, under Daskalea, different forms of constitutional violations can combine to establish a custom. . . But that overreads Daskalea. In that case, just seven months before the plaintiff's sexual abuse in the District jail, the District had been found liable for similar sexual mistreatment by its correctional officers. . . The only difference between the two cases was the gender of the prison guards—a fact of no legal moment. . .In Hurd's case, by contrast, the character of the constitutional violations and the asserted policies that led to the constitutional violation are distinct. In Bynum and Barnes, the delays in release were the result of administratively sluggish release procedures, rather than the purposeful incarceration because of the discovery of a distinct unserved sentence. For Hurd, the problem was not the pace of his release from his weekend detention for marijuana possession, but that he was physically reincarcerated to serve a different sentence for different crimes."); Nichols v. Wayne County, Michigan, 822 F. App'x 445, ___ (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2716 (2021) (" We can . . . readily dispatch Nichols' related claim that the municipalities have a custom or policy of failing to promptly institute the forfeiture proceedings provided for under MITPA. As he now explains it, municipalities may satisfy the Constitution either by holding a continued-detention hearing, separate and apart from any forfeiture proceeding, or by instituting a forfeiture proceeding quickly enough under MITPA (within 50 days of notice). But because Nichols is not entitled to elect his preferred procedures, he can adequately state a constitutional claim only if he alleges both that the municipalities have a custom or policy of failing to provide a stand-alone continued-detention hearing and that the municipalities have a custom or policy of failing to initiate constitutionally-timely MITPA forfeiture proceedings. Yet Nichols' only allegation about the timing of forfeiture proceedings is that '[i]t can take months, or even years, for the [municipalities] to initiate a case in state court seeking forfeiture of the vehicle.' The mere assertion that it can take months or years to initiate a forfeiture proceeding does not allege a 'policy or custom' to that effect. He points neither to an 'official policy or legislative enactment,'. . . nor to a 'well settled' 'course of action deliberately chosen from among various alternatives[.]'. . In short, he has failed to allege a 'custom or policy' that would show that his 'injury ar[ose] directly from a municipal act.'. . The most that could be said for Nichols' complaint in this regard is that it 'relies on the absence of a policy' that would require county prosecutors to more quickly initiate forfeiture proceedings. . . But, as in Arrington-Bey, that is just another way of saying that the municipalities failed to train the prosecutors to bring forfeiture hearings within the putative 50-day window. . . 'With such a claim, [Nichols] must show that the allegedly violated right was clearly established. And for the reasons noted earlier, [he] cannot do so.'"); Howse v. Hodous, 953 F.3d 406, 410-11 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1515 (2021) ("Howse faces an uphill battle in trying to prove that Cleveland's (alleged) inadequate training caused his (alleged) constitutional injuries. That's because he must show (1) the training program did not adequately prepare the officers for the tasks they must perform, (2) the inadequacy resulted from the municipality's deliberate indifference, and (3) the inadequacy either closely related to or caused Howse's injury. . . Howse cannot show that these three elements are met here. Cleveland's training academy's standards exceed state requirements, and Cleveland's police force has explicit written policies instructing officers not to use excessive force. Howse offers no evidence to the contrary—at least relevant to the claims here. On top of that, Howse hasn't shown how any inadequacy in the training program led to his constitutional injuries. This causation requirement is 'rigorous.'. . And it's not met here because Howse hasn't offered any argument that links the legal harm he allegedly suffered back to Cleveland. . . Nor can Howse succeed under a custom-of-inaction theory. To win on this claim, Howse would need to show that Cleveland had notice (or constructive notice) of a 'clear and persistent pattern' of unlawful activity. . . Then he would need to show that Cleveland tacitly approved of that unlawful activity by doing nothing. . . And then he would need to show that Cleveland's tacit approval was the moving force behind his constitutional violation. . . Howse points to a Department of Justice memo as evidence of a pattern of unlawful activity. But even assuming that's enough (and we're not sure it is), Howse hasn't shown that Cleveland approved of that unlawful activity or that any such approval caused Howse to suffer a constitutional injury. Mere blanket assertions that Cleveland 'tolerated' or 'condoned' officer misconduct aren't enough. . . On the contrary, Cleveland has taken affirmative steps to combat the unlawful use of excessive force. Those steps include a thorough use-of-force policy and active enforcement of that policy. Take this case. After Hodous and Middaugh filed their Use of Force reports, several other officers reviewed those reports to make sure that the force used was reasonable. In sum, Howse hasn't shown that Cleveland can be held responsible for any constitutional wrongs that Hodous, Middaugh, or the John Doe might have committed."); Hamilton v. City of Hayti, Missouri, 948 F.3d 921, 930 (8th Cir. 2020) ("Hamilton further argues that, even if Judge Ragland's bond practice was not an official policy, it was an unconstitutional municipal custom 'so permanent and well settled as to constitute a "custom or usage" with the force of law.' . . To prevail on this theory, he must demonstrate (1) '[t]he existence of a continuing, widespread, persistent pattern of unconstitutional misconduct by the governmental entity's employees'; (2) '[d]eliberate indifference to or tacit authorization of such conduct by the governmental entity's policymaking officials after notice to the officials of that misconduct;' and (3) 'proof that the custom was the moving force behind the constitutional violation.'. . Applying this standard, even if we considered Judge Ragland's judicial bond practice to be part of municipal custom or usage, given Hamilton's right to challenge his conditions of release, we would affirm the dismissal of the municipal liability claim because there is no evidence that Judge Ragland, Overbey, or any City employee set the cash-only bond condition with deliberate indifference to Hamilton's rights as an indigent arrestee."); Ruiz-Cortez v. City of Chicago, 931 F.3d 592, 598-600 (7th Cir. 2019) ("At summary judgment, Ruiz-Cortez complained of two City customs: the practice of using paid, active criminals as informants and the failure to supervise informants and their officer-handlers. We can generously assume, for analytical purposes only, that both customs were widespread and attributable to the City, thus meeting the first step of Monell. (And we can also assume, again for analytical purposes only, that Ruiz-Cortez in fact suffered a Brady injury by virtue of Lewellen's failure to disclose his criminal activity.) Ruiz-Cortez's claim against the City still falters at Monell's other steps: there is no record evidence of culpability or causation. Start with the first custom. Even assuming that there was a custom of using paid criminal informants, that practice is not 'itself' violative of any federal right, including Brady. So Ruiz-Cortez must, as he concedes, show that the City engaged in that practice with deliberate indifference to the fact that it would lead officers to violate federal law. . . .Without evidence that could have put the City on notice of the Brady risks in employing informants, there is no issue of fact regarding the City's lack of culpability. Ruiz-Cortez's first custom suffers an even greater causation problem. Causation under Monell requires a 'direct causal link' between the municipal action and the constitutional injury. . . Ruiz-Cortez has not identified such causation-related evidence, which makes sense: there is a real gap between a custom of paying criminal informants, even handsomely paying prolific informants, and Ruiz-Cortez's alleged Brady injury, which resulted from an officer's corruption. Indeed, as far as the record shows, Lewellen's rogue decision to engage in a drug conspiracy entirely gave rise to the Brady injury. The City, therefore, cannot be liable; Monell does not subject municipalities to liability for the actions of misfit employees. . . .Ruiz-Cortez's second custom fares no better. Failure-to-supervise claims, like failure-to-train claims, are a 'tenuous' form of Monell liability. . . This is because such claims seek to hold a municipality liable not for directly inflicting injury, as was the case in Monell, but rather for causing an employee's misconduct. . . Municipal failure claims are thus available only in 'limited circumstances,'. . and they are subject to 'rigorous' fault and causation requirements[.] . . As to fault, here too Ruiz-Cortez must show deliberate indifference. . . Ruiz-Cortez's failure-to-supervise claim does not meet these high requirements. There is, to start, no issue of fact relating to the City's deliberate indifference. The record does not contain evidence that would have, or should have, notified the City that the informant-handler relationship would devolve into a drug conspiracy and give rise to Brady problems. . . Most conspicuously absent: any evidence that others, besides Lewellen, committed Brady violations like the ones Ruiz-Cortez allegedly suffered. That kind of evidence is normally required for a failure-to-supervise or a failure-to-train claim."); Cipolloni v. City of New York, No. 18-1765-CV, 2018 WL 6600212, at *2 (2d Cir. Dec. 14, 2018) (not reported) ("Cipolloni alleges that the City has a 'systemic problem' with its database that results in innocent persons being arrested based on vacated or dismissed orders of protection. . . Cipolloni has plausibly alleged that the City has a practice of failing to update the NYPD database to reflect changes to orders of protection. For example, Cipolloni alleged that the NYPD database 'contains no information about the disposition of the case for which the order of protection was issued,' and when the NYPD receives information that the order of protection has been 'modified, vacated, or dismissed, this information is not properly and timely entered into the NYPD database.'. . Cipolloni has failed to plausibly allege, however, that the City has a persistent and widespread practice of arresting individuals based on the NYPD database errors so as to constitute a municipal policy. Cipolloni argues that 'available evidence, and common sense, tells us that the problem ... necessarily affects numerous people.'. . But his complaint provided no concrete information to support the conclusion. His complaint cited only three isolated acts over a more than 20-year period: his own arrest and two other arrests from 1994 and 2011. . . Both of these cases, however, resulted in dismissals of the complaints. . . Cipolloni also cited statistics showing that 9.8% of arrests based on violations of orders of protection from January 2013 to November 2017 were dismissed prior to arraignment. . . But the reasons for these dismissals were not provided, and the mere fact that charges were dismissed does not mean the arrests were 'false.' The sheer possibility that some of these dismissals may be attributable to erroneous NYPD database entries is insufficient to state a claim. Cipolloni, therefore, has failed to plausibly plead that the City has a persistent and widespread practice of making arrests based on NYPD database errors."); Brewington v. Keener, 902 F.3d 796, 802 (8th Cir. 2018) ("[I]n the face of an express municipal policy prohibiting excessive force, two incidents of excessive force—even assumed to be true—cannot be considered a pattern of widespread and pervasive unconstitutional conduct. . .

. In the alternative, Brewington argues that because Sheriff Jeffery was a final policymaker, his action constitutes the creation of an unofficial custom. . . .Other than Deputy Keener's hearsay testimony that a higher-ranked officer told him of an excessive force custom, Brewington offers no evidence that Sheriff Jeffery ever instituted the custom or practice. Brewington's evidence therefore failed to demonstrate the existence of an unofficial excessive force custom or practice that has the effect or force of law in the County. Finally, even assuming the existence of an unconstitutional custom, Brewington cannot show that the policy was the 'moving force' behind Deputy Keener's conduct."); Winkler v. Madison County, 893 F.3d 877, 902 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Winkler's next argument in support of imposing liability on the County appears to be that there was a custom or practice at the Detention Center of not following the County's own established policies for the provision of healthcare to inmates. To show that the County had such a custom or practice of inaction in the face of unlawful conduct by jail personnel and the medical staff, however, Winkler would have to present proof of a persistent pattern of unconstitutional conduct, and that the County had constructive notice of that pattern. . . But Winkler discusses only Hacker's treatment, and therefore cannot establish that the County had a custom of deliberate indifference to the serious healthcare needs of all the inmates incarcerated at the Detention Center."); Stanfield v. City of Lima, 727 F. App'x 841, 851-52 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Stanfield claims that the City of Lima cultivated a custom of tolerance or acquiescence toward uses of excessive force. To prove this, a plaintiff must show: '(1) the existence of a clear and persistent pattern of [illegal activity]; (2) notice or constructive notice on the part of the [defendant]; (3) the [defendant's] tacit approval of the unconstitutional conduct, such that their deliberate indifference in their failure to act can be said to amount to an official policy of inaction; and (4) that the [defendant's] custom was the "moving force" or direct causal link in the constitutional deprivation.'. . On appeal, Stanfield attempts to establish the first element of this test, the pattern of illegal activity, by referencing eight complaints filed against Montgomery in the years between 2008 and 2016—all for verbally aggressive or physically violent conduct. The investigation reports in the record show that the police department investigated each of these complaints. Montgomery was exonerated of wrongdoing following each complaint. Therefore, there is no record of illegal activity by Montgomery, making it impossible for the City to have ignored a pattern of it. Stanfield argues, 'Logically, if the municipality is actually ignoring the problem of repeated constitutional violations, there will be no record of repeated constitutional violations. Any investigation will find no wrongdoing, since the municipality will be deliberately ignoring any wrongdoing. Thus, the only evidence of a pattern ... in a situation like this is the complaints themselves.' While Stanfield's point is well taken, the facts of this case do not allow him to overcome Defendants-Appellees' summary judgment motion. The mere existence of complaints, without more, is not sufficient evidence to allow a reasonable jury to find the existence of a clear and persistent pattern of illegal activity. . . Therefore, Stanfield cannot establish that the City had a custom of tolerance for federal rights violations. Accordingly, the City of Lima and its police chief are not liable under § 1983."); Estate of Perry v. Wenzel, 872 F.3d 439, 461 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Perry asserts that the City and Chief Flynn are liable for enacting an unwritten policy of ignoring detainee's medical complaints. Perry contends that because Chief Flynn testified that the phrase, 'If you're talking, you're breathing,' was an adage that was used during training, there was a de facto policy of failing to provide medical attention to those who complained of difficulty breathing. But, this argument misconstrues the record evidence. The record indicates that this adage was used as part of a training program that taught City officers how to assess whether an individual had an emergent medical need. There is no evidence that this was the end of the inquiry, but rather the phrase was used as one aspect of an overall inquiry into an individual's health. While here, Officer Kroes used the adage, as discussed above, in a way that the jury might conclude was evidence of his objectively unreasonable response to Perry's complaints, a reasonable jury could not conclude that this was a City policy or custom sufficient to invoke Monell liability."); Hicks-Fields v. Harris County, 860 F.3d 803, 810-11 (5th Cir. 2017) ("In sum, even with the DOJ report, Plaintiffs have not met their evidentiary burden of showing a genuine dispute of material fact as to the existence of a 'persistent, widespread practice of city officials or employees, which, although not authorized by officially adopted and promulgated policy, is so common and well settled as to constitute a custom that fairly represents municipal policy.'. . Quite simply, under our precedent, Plaintiffs have not produced sufficient evidence. . . of similar acts. . . to move to trial. To hold that this evidence is sufficient to establish an official policy of Harris County 'would be effectively to hold the [County] liable on the theory of respondeat superior, which is expressly prohibited by Monell.'"); Gill v. City of Milwaukee, 850 F.3d 335, 344 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Gill . . . failed to plead a plausible Monell claim. His complaint states that the City of Milwaukee has a de facto policy of 'placing an emphasis on clearing cases and convicting suspects over seeking truth,' which led to the coercion of his confession and the concealment of exculpatory evidence. A municipal body may be liable for constitutional violations 'pursuant to a governmental "custom" even though such a custom has not received formal approval through the body's official decisionmaking channels.'. . To succeed on this de facto custom theory, the plaintiff must demonstrate that the practice is widespread and that the specific violations complained of were not isolated incidents. Jackson v. Marion Cty., 66 F.3d 151, 152 (7th Cir. 1995). At the pleading stage, then, a plaintiff pursuing this theory must allege facts that permit the reasonable inference that the practice is so widespread so as to constitute a governmental custom. . . Gill's complaint fails to do so. It does not provide examples of other Milwaukee police officers taking actions similar to those complained of here. More importantly, it does not plausibly allege that such examples exist. Instead, it simply states that this de facto policy caused the 'Defendant Detectives named supra to commit the aforesaid wrongful acts against Plaintiff.' The specific actions of the detectives in Gill's case alone, without more, cannot sustain a Monell claim based on the theory of a de facto policy."); Rossi v. City of Chicago, 790 F.3d 729, 737-38 (7th Cir. 2015) ("Rossi's second contention is closer to the mark as it alleges a 'code of silence,' namely a failure on the part of the police department to discipline and train officers regarding ethical conduct. The district court ruled against Rossi on evidentiary grounds, not because this theory was defective. Indeed, the facts of this case—where Mathews and Chengary conducted superficial investigations and Doubek faced no official discipline for her actions—raise serious questions about accountability among police officers. But a Monell claim requires more than this; the gravamen is not individual misconduct by police officers (that is covered elsewhere under § 1983), but a widespread practice that permeates a critical mass of an institutional body. In other words, Monell claims focus on institutional behavior; for this reason, misbehavior by one or a group of officials is only relevant where it can be tied to the policy, customs, or practices of the institution as a whole. Rossi failed to do that here. He did not retain a defense expert for his case and his pre-trial disclosures failed to identify any expert reports addressing this particular issue. Rossi did offer three expert reports that were submitted in a separate case, Obrycka v. City of Chicago, 2012 WL 601810 (N.D.Ill. Feb.23, 2012). The district court declined to consider these reports because they did not comply with the disclosure requirements of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. See Fed.R.Civ.P. 26(e)(2). The exclusion of non-disclosed evidence is 'mandatory under Rule 37(c)(1) unless non-disclosure was justified or harmless.'. . In the context of this case, the non-disclosure was neither harmless nor justified because it deprived the city of any opportunity to retain its own experts to analyze the merits of the factual claims of the expert reports. The district court, therefore, did not abuse its discretion in declining to consider the expert reports."); McCoy v. Board of Educ., Columbus City Schools, No. 12–3040, 2013 WL 538953, *5, *6 (6th Cir. Feb. 13, 2013) (unpublished) ("[T]he McCoys' § 1983 claim against the Board is that the Board had no policy, leaving individual complaints to be dealt with contextually per an administrator's discretion. While the McCoys attempt to classify this as an official policy of inaction, the mere showing of the absence of a policy is insufficient: the McCoys must also prove that the need to act was obvious and that the Board's decision not to have a policy in place was a conscious one. . . Having failed to demonstrate both, the McCoys have no valid basis for asserting a § 1983 claim against the Board. The McCoys also argue that the aggregate of instances in which an individual supervisor (e.g., Kunz or Tornes) failed to further investigate a reported incident collectively constitutes an official policy of inaction that reflected the Board's conscious decision to be deliberately indifferent. Even if it were true that these supervisors were recklessly passive and reckless in their failure to probe further into the allegations against Stroup, their collective failure to act was not a Monell custom in the sense that there was no conscious act on the part of the school board to deliberately engage in a course of action or inaction in light of Stroup's unconstitutional conduct. . .Therefore, the district court properly dismissed the McCoys' § 1983 claims against the Board."); Conn v. City of Reno, 591 F.3d 1081, 1085 (9th Cir. 2010) (order and amended opinion, denying rehearing en banc) (Chief Judge Kozinski, with whom Judges O'scannlain, Kleinfeld, Tallman, Callahan, Bea and Ikuta join, dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) ("Until this opinion came along, police officers weren't required to serve as babysitters, psychiatrists or social workers, and judges didn't run suicide-prevention programs. Responsibility for preventing suicide rested with the individual and the family, not the state. But the panel has discovered that the Constitution demands a change in job description: Judges will henceforth micromanage the police, who in turn will serve as mental health professionals. The panel's reasoning has no stopping point, and our decision to let it stand threatens unprecedented judicial intervention in our local institutions."), cert. granted, judgment vacated and remanded in light of Connick v. Thompson, 131 S. Ct. 1350 (2011) and on remand, Conn v. City of Reno, 658 F.3d 897 (9th Cir. 2011) ("We reinstate the opinion at 591 F.3d 1081, except that in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Connick v. Thompson , 131 S.Ct. 1350 (2011), we affirm in all respects the district court's grant of summary judgment as to municipality liability."); Brumfield v. Hollins, 551 F.3d 322, 327(5th Cir. 2008) ("Brumfield has failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact demonstrating that Sheriff Stringer is not entitled to qualified immunity on the basis of failing to promulgate policies Y concerning inmate supervision and medical care. Brumfield places great weight on the fact that Sheriff Stringer had no written policies and procedures at the Old Jail similar to the ones at a nearby facility known as the 'New Jail.' From this, she concludes that Sheriff Stringer implemented no policies at all. But we have acknowledged that 'the validity of prison policies is not dependent on whether they are written or verbal. A policy is a policy....' Talib v. Gilley, 138 F.3d 211, 215 (5th Cir.1998). Indeed, verbal policies existed concerning inmate supervision and medical care, and Sheriff Stringer, Bryant, Louge, Hollins, and Thornhill all testified to that effect."); Szabla v. City of Brooklyn Park, 486 F.3d 385, 392 (8th Cir. 2007) (en banc) ("Brooklyn Park's written policy concerning the use of dogs is lawful on its face. . . . Brooklyn Park's directives do not affirmatively sanction the use of the dogs in an unconstitutional manner. The policy is simply silent concerning the circumstances under which an officer should provide a warning before a canine is directed to bite and hold a suspect. The directives do not reflect a deliberate choice by policymakers to refrain from warning citizens about the use of dogs. . . .[A] written policy that is facially constitutional, but fails to give detailed guidance that might have averted a constitutional violation by an employee, does not itself give rise to municipal liability. There is still potential for municipal liability based on a policy in that situation, but only where a city's inaction reflects a deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of the citizenry, such that inadequate training or supervision actually represents the city's 'policy.'. . . The evidence presented on this record is insufficient to make a submissible case of deliberate indifference. The evidence does not show that Brooklyn Park had a history of police officers unreasonably using canines to apprehend suspects without advance warning, such that the need for additional training or supervision was plain. . . So far as the record reveals, this was a one-time incident, and there is no evidence of a pattern of constitutional violations making it 'obvious' that additional training or safeguards were necessary."); Doe v. Dallas Independent School District, 153 F.3d 211, 217 (5th Cir. 1998) ("Plaintiffs . . . contend that DISD's failure to adopt an official policy should subject them to liability. . . . Plaintiffs point to no evidence suggesting that, at the time of the sexual abuse, the lack of an official policy on this issue was the result of an intentional choice on the part of the board of trustees. Moreover, in Spann v. Tyler Independent School District, we held that a school board's decision to vest school principals with complete discretion to address allegations of sexual abuse was a 'perfectly reasonable policy for dealing with reported instances of sexual abuse.'. . . If an explicit policy delegating the matter to principals was 'perfectly reasonable,' and thus did not constitute deliberate indifference on the part of the school district, then we cannot say that a custom tantamount to such a policy was not also reasonable. [footnote omitted] Thus, the district court was correct in granting summary judgment in favor of DISD.").

See also Barnes v. City of El Paso, No. EP-22-CV-161-KC, 2023 WL 4097075, at *12 (W.D. Tex. June 12, 2023) ("Barnes alleges that the City caused her injury by failing to equip EPPD officers with body-worn cameras. . .She alleges that 'El Paso remains the largest city in Texas without police body worn cameras by conscious choice.'. . And while she acknowledges that 'the El Paso Mayor and City Council did, in March 2022, pass a measure for body worn cameras,' she notes that the 'timetable of deployment remains unknown.'. . These statements fail to plausibly allege the causation required for Monell claims. The connection between a municipal policy and a plaintiff's injuries 'must be more than a mere "but for" coupling between cause and effect. The deficiency ... must be the actual cause of the constitutional violation.'. . Here, Barnes provides no factual allegations linking the City's policies on body cameras to her injuries, outside of unadorned, conclusory assertions. . . Nor does Barnes provide any factual allegations that might give rise to a causal inference, such as allegations about reports or statistics showing the effect of body-worn cameras in other cities. Without more, Barnes' First Amended Complaint fails to 'raise a right to relief above the speculative level.'. . While the Court is unaware of any Fifth Circuit decision considering a Monell claim predicated on the failure to equip officers with body cameras, courts from other circuits have rejected such claims. [collecting cases] The Court finds these cases persuasive and holds that Barnes has failed to plausibly plead that the City's failure to implement body-worn cameras caused her injuries. The City's Motion to Dismiss is therefore granted as to the body camera claim."); Barnes v. City of El Paso, No. EP-22-CV-161-KC, 2023 WL 4097075, at *12-13 (W.D. Tex. June 12, 2023) ("Barnes raises a Monell claim against the City for its failure to indemnify its officers in § 1983 suits. . .Barnes alleges that the City 'has no requirement to satisfy judgments entered against its police for violations of civil rights,' and that it encourages its employees not to obtain insurance or indemnification 'so that they remain "judgment proof" in the event of litigation.'. . This policy, Barnes argues, 'actively discourages litigants and attorneys from filing lawsuits because there is often no ability to recover just compensation for violations of constitutional rights.'. . And because judgment-proof officers 'are not held accountable for Constitutional and civil rights violations, this creates an official policy, or unofficial custom, of normalizing the Constitutional and civil rights violations by police and other [City] employees.'. . These statements fail to plausibly allege that the City's indemnification policy caused Barnes' injury. Barnes' theory of liability assumes that (1) the City's indemnification policies will cause § 1983 plaintiffs to bring fewer suits, (2) EPPD officers are aware of this fact, (3) those officers will conclude that they are less likely to face consequences for constitutional violations as a result, and (4) they will change the way they interact with civilians accordingly. This attenuated causal connection falls well short of the 'moving force' causation required to sustain a Monell claim. . . Indeed, the link between officer indemnification and constitutional violations is so attenuated that multiple plaintiffs have advanced the exact opposite argument that Barnes advances here. That is, multiple plaintiffs have argued that a practice of indemnifying officers—rather than failing to indemnify them—caused the constitutional harms they suffered. . . Each of those courts concluded that the link between an officer's actions and municipal indemnification policy is too tenuous to give rise to municipal liability. . . That courts have rejected the inverse of Barnes' indemnification claim only underscores its fatal flaw. It is conceivable that a policy of indemnification could encourage constitutional violations by lessening the direct impact of liability verdicts on individual officers. It is also conceivable that a failure to indemnify officers could encourage constitutional violations by reducing the number of § 1983 suits. But conceivability is not the same as plausibility. As with Plaintiff's claim based on the failure to implement body cameras, Plaintiff offers nothing more than speculation regarding the effects of the City's indemnification policy. And speculation does not suffice to state a plausible claim. . . At bottom, Barnes' indemnification theory fails to state a claim because 'there are too many variables involved' to make out a plausible causal connection between the City's lack of an indemnification policy and Plaintiff's injury.");

Price v. City of New York, No. 15 CIV. 5871 (KPF), 2018 WL 3117507, at *19 (S.D.N.Y. June 25, 2018) ("Plaintiff does not allege that any person besides herself was blocked by the City's social media moderators. She instead alleges that an informal but widespread custom must have existed because she was blocked on three occasions by three separate City employees. . .But Plaintiff's allegations of three similar constitutional violations do not allow the Court plausibly to infer the existence of a widespread custom or practice that can be attributed to the City. [collecting cases]"); Othman v. City of Chicago, No. 11 C 05777, 2014 WL 6566357, at *5-7, *9 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 20, 2014) ("In their amended complaint, Plaintiffs assert several Monell-type allegations. However, in their response brief, Plaintiffs abandon the majority of their Monell allegations except for claims related to the City's alleged failure to retrieve Defendant Carranza's weapon and to restrict his police powers while he was on medical leave . . . . Thus, the Court focuses solely on these allegations and any evidence (or lack thereof) in the record to the support the allegations. . . . [E]ven where a plaintiff is attacking gaps in an express policy, the plaintiff must present evidence that a 'true municipal policy' is at issue rather than a random event by demonstrating that the 'same problem has arisen many times and the municipality has acquiesced in the outcome.'. . Here, Plaintiffs have not presented any evidence that a gap in the City's written policies or that its unofficial practices caused widespread constitutional violations. . . .Plaintiffs' claim that Defendant Carranza's 14 shots, taken together, constitute a widespread or longstanding deficient practice of the CPD is unavailing. It is well-established that an isolated problem with a single police officer does not provide a basis for municipal liability. . . .Even more problematic for Plaintiffs' novel argument is that it would be impossible for the City's final policymakers, presumably the City Council, to be placed on 'notice' of each purported constitutional violation (each shot fired) and have an opportunity to take action because all of the shots were fired within seconds of each other. . . . In sum, Plaintiffs have failed to present sufficient evidence to create a genuine issue of material fact as to each of the legal requirements necessary to establish municipal liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. In particular, Plaintiffs fail to put forth any evidence to establish that (1) the City's alleged unconstitutional practices actually exist, (2) that the City's final policymakers were 'deliberately indifferent' to these purported practices, and (3) that these alleged practices were the 'moving force' behind Ramiz Othman's alleged constitutional violations. Because Plaintiffs bear the burden of proof as to each of these elements and have wholly failed to present such evidence, the City is entitled to summary judgment on Plaintiffs' municipal liability claims against it."); Guzman-Martinez v. Corrections Corp. of America, No. CV 11–02390–PHX–NVW, 2012 WL 2873835, *10 (D. Ariz. July 13, 2012) ("The agreement between ICE and the City requires the City to house immigration detainees in accordance with certain standards, which Plaintiff does not allege require the City to house transgender women in single-occupancy cells or women's facilities or to keep them away from contact with male detention officers. At most, the Complaint alleges that NCCHC recommends that custody staff be aware that transgender people are common targets for violence and appropriate safety measures should be taken and that the ACA Standards provide that single-occupancy cells should be available for inmates likely to be exploited or victimized. The Complaint does not allege that if custody staff had been provided awareness training or if Plaintiff had been provided a single-occupancy cell, neither detention officer Manford nor detainee Vigil would have subjected Plaintiff to the December 7, 2009 and

April 23, 2010 incidents from which Plaintiff's claims of deprivation of constitutional rights arise. Causation is even more attenuated because even if the City were to adopt certain unidentified policies, they could only be implemented by CCA. Thus, the City's failure to adopt policies regarding housing and protecting transgender women immigration detainees is not the 'moving force' behind the December 7, 2009 and April 23, 2010 incidents from which Plaintiff's claims of deprivation of constitutional rights arise."); Logan v. City of Pullman, No. CV-04-214-FVS, 2006 WL 120031, at 2-4 (E.D. Wash. Jan. 13, 2006) ("To impose liability against the City by liability through omission, Plaintiffs must demonstrate that (1) a City employee violated Plaintiffs' constitutional rights; (2) the City has customs or policies that amount to deliberate indifference; and (3) these policies were the moving force behind the employee's violation of Plaintiffs' constitutional rights. . . As the Court ruled previously in its Order Re: Qualified Immunity, Plaintiffs have already set forth evidence establishing that their constitutional rights under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments were violated by the individual Defendant Officers' on the night in question. Thus, the first prong of the Gibson test has been satisfied and the focus shifts to the second and third prongs. Under the second prong of the Gibson test, Plaintiffs must present evidence showing the City has a policy that amounts to deliberate indifference to the Plaintiffs' constitutional rights. . . Plaintiffs contend their constitutional rights to be free from excessive force were violated because Chief Weatherly approved a facially unconstitutional policy directive equating the use of O.C. spray with the same level of force as a peaceful escort. . . .However, assuming, without deciding, that equating the use of O.C. spray with an escort does constitute an official 'policy' approved by Chief Weatherly, to establish liability, Plaintiffs must still demonstrate this policy amounts to deliberate indifference. . . . Moreover, even if Plaintiffs had presented sufficient evidence to create an issue of material fact as to whether the portion of the City's PPD Manual that equates the use of O.C. spray with an escort was deliberately indifferent to the Plaintiffs' constitutional right to be free from excessive force, Plaintiffs have not satisfied the third prong of Gibson. Plaintiff have not presented any evidence illustrating that such policy was the 'moving force' behind the Plaintiffs' constitutional deprivations."); Brown v. Mitchell, 308 F.Supp.2d 682, 700, 701 (E.D.Va. 2004) ("Considering the . . . fact that a Virginia sheriff has no authority to construct or modify local jail facilities, Mitchell argues that, because she is required to accept 'all persons' committed to the Jail, she cannot have been deliberately indifferent or grossly negligent as to the alleged overcrowding conditions at the Jail. It is true that, by statute, the locality, not the sheriff, is required to build and maintain a jail of a reasonable size to house the inmate population. . . . A Virginia sheriff, by contrast, has no duty or ability to build, expand, or otherwise improve the structural facilities of a jail. As discussed above, as a constitutional officer, Mitchell's duties and responsibilities are created solely by statute.. . Her statutory duties include maintaining records on all prisoners, formulating and enforcing jail rules, providing security in the jail, and keeping inmates clothed and fed. . . There is no statute, however, requiring or allowing a sheriff to build, add to, or otherwise improve the physical structure of a jail. Thus, Mitchell is correct respecting her inability to remedy the problem of overcrowding by building a new jail or modifying the existing one. Her failure, therefore, to build a new jail or remedy the existing one cannot be considered gross negligence or deliberate indifference. However, Mitchell's argument that, as a matter of law, she is exonerated from either a state-law wrongful death action or an action under Section 1983 by virtue of Va.Code Ann. § 53.1-119 et seq. is misplaced because the argument simply ignores the remainder of the statutory scheme of which Va.Code Ann. § 53.1-119 et seq. is a part. . . . Under § 53.1-74, which also is a part of Chapter 3 of Title 53: 'When a ... city is without an adequate jail ... the circuit court thereof shall adopt as its jail, the jail of another county or city until it can obtain an adequate jail.' The ensuing sections of Chapter 3 provide for the procedures that are to be followed after such an adoption and set forth mechanisms for providing payment to the adopted jurisdiction. Thus, the General Assembly has provided a means for eliminating overcrowding when overcrowding would render a jail inadequate other than the structural remedies of constructing a new jail facility or expanding an existing one. And, although the authority for arranging for the use of other facilities lies in the local circuit courts, . . . Chapter 3 requires the sheriff to know, and keep records reflecting, the population of the local jail. . . Indeed, the sheriff must report thereon to the Compensation Board and, if asked, to the local circuit court. . . Thus, when a Virginia sheriff knows that a local jail is so overcrowded as to render it inadequate, that sheriff is not, contrary to Mitchell's arguments, without recourse or ability to remedy the overcrowding because, under Virginia's statutory scheme, alternate arrangements can be made by informing the local circuit court of the fact of overcrowding. Indeed, the Virginia legislature provides, quite clearly, that when so informed, the circuit court 'shall adopt as its jail, the jail of another county or city until it can obtain an adequate jail.' . . . Additionally, under another section of the statute, the circuit court can, upon Petition for Writ of Mandamus, command a governing body to put its own jail in good repair and be made otherwise adequate. . . Mitchell, whose job includes the operation of the Jail in accord with the dictates of Title 53, is charged with knowledge of these statutes. And, she is charged with knowledge of conditions in the Jail over which she has charge. Her failure to use these statutory mechanisms in the face of known overcrowding to the extent of the inadequacy as alleged in the Complaint certainly can be considered 'deliberate indifference' within the meaning of Eighth Amendment jurisprudence or gross negligence under Virginia's wrongful death jurisprudence."); Ivory v. City of Minneapolis, No. Civ. 02-4364JRTFLN, 2004 WL 1765460, at *7 (D. Minn. Aug. 4, 2004) ("Plaintiff asserts that defendants' actions violated numerous department rules, and that these violations were not investigated by the Minneapolis Police Department. Specifically, plaintiff claims that Morrison, Ramsdell, and Kaneko violated a number of Minneapolis Police Department Manual Rules that, taken together, detail the appropriate use of force, including deadly force, by police officers and prescribe reporting and review requirements related to the use of force. Plaintiff seems to contend that the alleged lack of an investigation into violation of these rules indicates that such violations are commonplace and condoned by the City and Department. The Court disagrees. Plaintiff has not identified any official policy that arguably played a role in his getting shot. To the contrary, the department rules identified by plaintiff, if followed, help to protect plaintiff from unconstitutional behavior by the police. Further, there is insufficient evidence from which a jury could find that the City and Department had a custom of encouraging or permitting unconstitutional violation of these rules. A single incident of unlawful behavior cannot establish a custom of permitting such behavior, and cannot give rise to municipal liability. . . Further, it is undisputed that the St. Paul police department investigated the use of deadly force during this incident and determined that the officers acted appropriately. The Minneapolis police department reviewed the St. Paul report and on that basis determined that the officers had followed all necessary rules and procedures. Thus, the City did not fail to investigate the alleged violation of plaintiff's constitutional rights, and there is no evidence of a custom of either deliberate indifference to or tacit authorization of such conduct. The City is entitled to summary judgment on this claim.'[footnote omitted]); La v. Hayducka, 269 F.Supp.2d 566, 586 (D.N.J. 2003) ("In contrast to the blatantly damaging evidence uncovered in Russo, plaintiffs rely solely on the fact that the SBPD [South Brunswick Police Department] did not have a written policy regarding use of force against EDPs. To implicate a municipality, a plaintiff must 'demonstrate that, through its deliberate conduct, the municipality was the moving force behind the injury alleged.'. . . Although the officers acknowledged that they did not receive specific EDP training, Hayduka testified that he had received training regarding the practice of contacting the UMDNJ and accompanying mental health evaluators to on-site screenings. . . . Furthermore, the officers each testified that they were trained in a variety of situations and in using several methods of dealing with people of varying psychological states. When asked if he received training regarding use of force against mentally disturbed individuals, Hayduka stated he received extensive on-the-job training, as well as training on handling people with Alzheimer's Disease. . .Officer Schwarz stated that in continuum of force training, topics included discussions of rational as well as irrational persons. . . Moreover, unlike in Russo, plaintiffs have not offered any internal documentation that would establish that the SBPD was aware of a lack of training in dealing with EDPs, or that there existed the potential for rampant injustice as a result of alleged lack of training."); Goodwin v. Furr, 25 F. Supp.2d 713, 717 (M.D.N.C. 1998) ("[P]laintiff's complaint is deficient because it never alleges that the County officially sanctioned or ordered the seizure. It never identifies (1) what 'illegal custom' compelled, much less allowed seizure, (2) any county official who was involved in the seizure, and (3) why the sheriff or deputies may be considered the county's final policymaker with respect to the seized vehicles. The complaint merely states that the County failed to correct unconstitutional practices of the Sheriff and as a result created a custom of illegal practices. Unlike the situation in Dotson v. Chester,. . . plaintiff makes no claim that under North Carolina law, the County had either a right or obligation to fund, maintain or operate the seizure program and that it appointed the sheriff to carry out the program.").

C. Liability Based on Inadequate Training, Supervision, Discipline, Screening or Hiring

1. In City of Oklahoma City v. Tuttle, 471 U.S. 808, 813 (1985), the Court disapproved a jury instruction to the effect that "a single, unusually excessive use of force may ... warrant an inference that it was attributable to inadequate training or supervision amounting to 'deliberate indifference' or 'gross negligence' on the part of the officials in charge."

Chief Justice Rehnquist questioned whether there could be a "policy" of "inadequate training" at all for Monell purposes, if the word "policy" implies some deliberate, conscious choice of a course of action. Id. at 823. He also raised doubts as to "whether a policy that itself was not unconstitutional . . . can ever meet the 'policy' requirement of Monell." Id. at 823 n.7.

Even assuming such a policy could satisfy Monell, the plurality concluded that "considerably more proof than the single incident will be necessary in every case to establish both the requisite fault on the part of the municipality, and the causal connection between the 'policy' and the constitutional deprivation." Id. at 823.

Justice Brennan agreed that a government policy of inadequate training could not be inferred from a single incident of excessive use of force by a police officer. He did not share the plurality's doubts about whether inadequate training could be viewed as a "policy" under Monell, nor did he think that Monell required the policy itself to be unconstitutional in order to find government liability. So long as the government policy caused an individual to be subjected to a deprivation of a constitutional right, Monell-type liability could attach. Id. at 833 n.8 (Brennan, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment). The only clear consensus reached in Tuttle was that municipal liability based on a policy of inadequate training cannot be derived from a single incident of police misconduct. See also Robinson v. District of Columbia, 403 F.Supp.2d 39, 54, 55 (D.D.C. 2005) ("Perhaps recognizing the need for more than a single incident, but providing no analysis whatsoever, Plaintiff attaches a letter summarizing and referencing a Memorandum of Agreement ("MOA") between the United States Department of Justice ("DOJ"), the District of Columbia, and the MPD, and relies entirely on this document as proof of a pattern or practice by the District of failing to investigate and discipline officers for their excessive use of force. . . Having conducted a searching review of this letter, the Court joins with the Byrd court in rejecting Plaintiff's lame attempt to transform the mere existence of a MOA into a policy or custom of deliberate indifference, for the MOA does not provide any evidence of specific instances of the District's failure to discipline, and if anything, it demonstrates not deliberate indifference, but rather, an effort to improve its practices and procedures relating to the investigation and discipline of police misconduct. . . . As Plaintiff seems to suggest, . . .it may be fair to infer that the MOA reflects an awareness by the District of serious allegations relating to its use of excessive force and its investigations of such use of force. However, a mere awareness of a problem in January 1999 and a need for improvement is not, as a matter of law, sufficient to impose municipal liability for an incident that occurred in October 2000. When analyzing the introductory letter attached by Plaintiff and descriptions of the MOA, two important legal points become obvious. First, and perhaps most significantly, the MOA conclusively demonstrates that the District was not indifferent to the problems with the MPD, as suggested by Plaintiff. Rather, the District was taking affirmative steps as early as January 1999 to remedy the situation. Indeed, the DOJ itself commended the District's 'unprecedented request' for the DOJ's investigation and recommendations and notes that this request 'indicated the City and the Chief's commitment to minimizing the risk of excessive use of force in [MPD] and to promoting police integrity.' . . . Plaintiff's reliance on the existence of the MOA to support her claims is inherently illogical. Under Plaintiff's approach, 'a municipality would be ill-advised to evaluate its operational practices or to institute reforms lest its efforts be labeled as a policy or custom of deliberate indifference.'"); Byrd v. District of Columbia, 297 F.Supp.2d 136, 139, 140 (D.D.C. 2003)("In support of his claim, plaintiff recounts the facts surrounding his claim of excessive force and then, without citation, claims that 'it is without question a fact that no real investigation of the facts surrounding his beating ever took place.'. . While the District appears not to dispute plaintiff's claim that the incident at issue here was not properly investigated, that does not resolve the matter. For, even assuming the truth of plaintiff's claim, which one must do at this stage, that is not sufficient under the law for purposes of imposing liability on a municipality, since a single incident is clearly insufficient to establish the existence of a policy amounting to 'deliberate indifference.'. . Recognizing the need for more than a single incident, plaintiff cites to a Memorandum of Agreement (MOA) between the United States Department of Justice (DOJ), the District of Columbia, and the MPD, and relies entirely on this document as proof of a pattern or practice by the District of failing to investigate and discipline officers for their excessive use of force. . . Having reviewed this MOA, [footnote omitted] the Court must reject plaintiff's lame attempt to transform the mere existence of a MOA into a policy or custom of deliberate indifference, for the MOA does not provide any evidence of specific instances of the District's failure to discipline, and if anything, it demonstrates not deliberate indifference, but rather, an effort to improve its practices and procedures relating to investigation and discipline of police misconduct. . . . From the MOA, it is clear that the District was adopting a proactive remedial approach, and it was, as early as 1999, attempting to reform its practices to eliminate the problems of the past."), aff'd. by Byrd v. Gainer, 2004 WL 885228 (D.C. Cir. 2004).

2. In City of Springfield, Mass. v. Kibbe, 480 U.S. 257, 107 S. Ct. 1114 (1987), the Court had granted certiorari to decide the question of whether a municipality could be held liable under section 1983 for the inadequate training of its employees. The Court, however, dismissed the writ as improvidently granted because of an inability to reach and decide the closely related question of "whether more than negligence in training is required in order to establish such liability." 107 S. Ct. at 1115.

Four members of the Court dissented from the dismissal of the writ of certiorari. Justice O'Connor (joined by C.J. Rehnquist, and JJ. White and Powell) took the position that inadequate training could serve as a basis for imposing section 1983 liability on a local government, but "only where the failure to train amounts to a reckless disregard for or deliberate indifference to the rights of persons within the [government's] domain." Id. at 1121 (O'Connor, J., dissenting). The plaintiff in an "inadequate training" case must show reckless disregard or deliberate indifference in the inadequacy of the training program in order to establish the requisite "causal connection between omissions in a police training program and affirmative misconduct by individual officers in a particular instance . . . ." Id.

3. In City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989), the Supreme Court addressed the questions left unresolved in Tuttle and Kibbe. In City of Canton, the plaintiff claimed a deprivation of her right to receive necessary medical care while in police custody. She asserted a claim of municipal liability for this deprivation based on a theory of "grossly inadequate training." The plaintiff presented evidence of a policy that gave police shift commanders complete discretion to make decisions as to whether prisoners were in need of medical care, accompanied by evidence that such commanders received no training or guidelines to assist in making such judgments. Id. at 382.

The Sixth Circuit upheld the adequacy of the district court's jury instructions on the issue of municipal liability for inadequate training, stating that the plaintiff could succeed on her failure-to-train claim " [where] the plaintiff . . . prove[s] that the municipality acted recklessly, intentionally, or with gross negligence." Id.

In an opinion written by Justice White, the Court unanimously rejected the City's argument that municipal liability can be imposed only where the challenged policy is itself unconstitutional and concluded that "there are limited circumstances in which an allegation of a 'failure to train' can be the basis for liability under § 1983." Id. at 387. Noting the substantial disagreement among the lower courts as to the level of culpability required in "failure to train" cases, the Court went on to hold that "the inadequacy of training policy may serve as the basis for § 1983 liability only where the failure to train amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the police come into contact." Id. at 388. The Court observed, id. at 390, that:

> [I]t may happen that in light of the duties assigned to specific officers or employees the need for more or different training is so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the city can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need. In that event, the failure to provide proper training may fairly be said to represent a policy for which the city is responsible, and for which the city may be held liable if it actually causes injury. [footnotes omitted]

The "deliberate indifference" standard has nothing to do with the level of culpability that may be required to make out the underlying constitutional wrong, but rather has to do with what is required to establish the municipal policy as the "moving force" behind the constitutional violation. Id. at 388 n.8.

The Court made it clear that on remand the plaintiff would have to identify a particular deficiency in the training program and prove that the identified deficiency was the actual cause of plaintiff's constitutional injury. It would not be enough to establish that the particular officer was inadequately trained, nor that there was negligent administration of an otherwise adequate program, nor that the conduct resulting in the injury could have been avoided by more or better training. The federal courts are not to become involved "in an endless exercise of second-guessing municipal employee-training programs." Id. at 390-91.

Justice O'Connor elaborated on how a plaintiff could show that a municipality was deliberately indifferent under City of Canton. First, where there is "a clear constitutional duty implicated in recurrent situations that a particular employee is certain to face, ... failure to inform city personnel of that duty will create an extremely high risk that constitutional violations will ensue." Id. at 396 (O'Connor, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

For example, all of the Justices agreed that there is an obvious need to train police officers as to the constitutional limitations on the use of deadly force, see Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985), and that a failure to so train would be so certain to result in constitutional violations as to reflect the "deliberate indifference" to constitutional rights required for the imposition of municipal liability. 489 U.S. at 390 n.10.

Justice O'Connor was also willing to recognize that municipal liability on a "failure to train" theory might be established "where it can be shown that policymakers were aware of, and acquiesced in, a pattern of constitutional violations involving the exercise of police discretion, ... [which pattern] could put the municipality on notice that its officers confront the particular situations on a regular basis, and that they often react in a manner contrary to constitutional requirements." Id. at 397 (O'Connor, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part). See also Spell v. McDaniel, 824 F.2d 1380 (4th Cir. 1987).

Thus, City of Canton provides a plaintiff with two different approaches to a failure-to-train case. First, a plaintiff may establish deliberate indifference by demonstrating a failure to train officials in a specific area where there is an obvious need for training to avoid violations of citizens' constitutional rights. Second, plaintiff may rely on a pattern of unconstitutional conduct so pervasive as to imply actual or constructive knowledge on the part of policymakers, whose deliberate indifference, evidenced by a failure to correct once the need for training became obvious, would be attributable to the municipality. See also Young v. Bd. of Supervisors of Humphreys County, Mississippi, 927 F.3d 898, 905 & n.2 (5th Cir. 2019) ("The deliberate-indifference standard typically applies when a governmental entity failed to act. . . . Not surprisingly, the cases the Board cites on appeal to contend that deliberate indifference was the proper standard all concern a government entity's failure to act.")

See, e.g., Franklin v. Franklin County, Kentucky, 115 F.4th 461, 474-75 (6th Cir. 2024) ("The final theory of Monell liability asserted by Franklin is based on Franklin County's alleged failure to train, supervise, or discipline its employees with regard to the sexual abuse of inmates. . . . In the present case, Franklin contends that the training that the Jail staff received was constitutionally inadequate because the County made 'deliberate choices not to ... have written policies on preventing sexual misconduct' or to train officers on PREA's requirements regarding prevention [of sexual abuse].' But her contention that the Jail did not have written policies on preventing sexual abuse is belied by the record. The Jail's written policy about sexual misconduct expressly acknowledges that the '[PREA] establishes a zero tolerance standard for incidence of inmate sexual assault and rape; [and] makes prevention of inmate sexual assault and rape a top priority in [the] facility.' Moreover, the written policy forbids 'sexual activity between staff and inmates, volunteers, contract personnel, or work site supervisors and inmates regardless of consensual states [sic],' and it subjects offenders to 'administrative and criminal disciplinary sanctions.' Information is also 'provided to ... inmates about sexual abuse/assault[,] including prevention/intervention [and] reporting sexual abuse/assault. ... [This] [i]nformation [is] communicated orally and in writing at the time of booking[,and] [t]he inmate will sign [a document] acknowledging receipt of this information.' Further undermining Franklin's position is that all Jail officers must undergo a PREA training course before ever interacting with inmates, where the officers learn how to prevent sexual abuse. These facts demonstrate that, contrary to Franklin's contention, the Jail did have written policies concerning the prevention of sexual misconduct. The policies provide that the prevention of sexual assault is a top priority of the Jail, and they require that inmates be provided information about preventing such conduct. This is not a case where there is a 'total lack of any County policies' governing the prevention of sexual assault.' . . Franklin's failure-to-train argument on this point is accordingly unpersuasive because there are in fact written policies (and trainings) governing the prevention of sexual assault in the Jail."); Shadrick v. Hopkins Cnty., Ky., 805 F.3d 724, 741-42 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Shadrick can demonstrate SHP's [Southern Health Partner's] failure to provide LPN nurses with adequate training and supervision in one of two ways. She can show '[a] pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees' and SHP's '"continued adherence to an approach that [it] knows or should know has failed to prevent tortious conduct by employees," thus establishing 'the conscious disregard for the consequences of [its] action—the "deliberate indifference"—necessary to trigger municipal liability.' . . . Alternatively, Shadrick can establish 'a single violation of federal rights, accompanied by a showing that [SHP] has failed to train its employees to handle recurring situations presenting an obvious potential' for a constitutional violation. . . This second mode of proof is available 'in a narrow range of circumstances' where a federal rights violation 'may be a highly predictable consequence of a failure to equip [employees] with specific tools to handle recurring situations.'. . . This method of proof does not require Shadrick to show that SHP had actual or constructive notice that its nurses were deficiently trained, as asserted in the dissent; proof of actual or constructive notice is necessary only when a plaintiff pursues § 1983 liability on the pattern theory of constitutional violations."); Sornberger v. City of Knowville, 434 F.3d 1006, 1029, 1030 (7th Cir.2006) ("Establishing Monell liability based on evidence of inadequate training or supervision requires proof of 'deliberate indifference' on the part of the local government. . . This proof can take the form of either (1) failure to provide adequate training in light of foreseeable consequences; or (2) failure to act in response to repeated complaints of constitutional violations by its officers. . . . Here, Teresa's proferred evidence suffices to create triable issues with respect to both forms of deliberate indifference. Teresa first cites evidence that Galesburg had a policy of coercing confessions out of female suspects by threatening to have DCFS take away their children. . . . This evidence gives rise to triable issues with respect to Galesburg's municipal liability on theories of both failure to train and refusing to correct complained-of behavior. On this record, summary judgment dismissing the City of Galesburg was therefore improper."); Dunn v. City of Elgin, 347 F.3d 641, 646 (7th Cir. 2003) ("Deliberate indifference may be shown in one of two ways. First, a municipality shows deliberate indifference when it fails to train its employees to handle a recurring situation that presents an obvious potential for a constitutional violation and this failure to train results in a constitutional violation. . . . Second, a municipality shows deliberate indifference if it fails to provide further training after learning of a pattern of constitutional violations by the police."); Cherrington v. Skeeter, 344 F.3d 631, 646, 647 (6th Cir. 2003) ("Given the dearth of case law addressing the issue, it cannot be said that police officers routinely confront the question of what to do with children upon arresting their parent or guardian. Thus, the Defendant City cannot be deemed deliberately indifferent to an obvious need for officer training in this area. [footnote omitted] Likewise, Plaintiffs have failed to identify any similar incidents or prior complaints that might have alerted the Defendant City to the need to cover this topic in its officer training. Absent some form of notice that its officers might confront such a situation, the Defendant City cannot be held liable under a 'failure to train' theory for any alleged deprivation of Daija King's constitutional rights."); Brown v. Shaner, 172 F.3d 927, 931 (6th Cir. 1999) ("The Court [in Canton] indicated at least two types of situations that would justify a conclusion of deliberate indifference in the failure to train police officers. One is failure to provide adequate training in light of foreseeable consequences that could result from the lack of instruction. . . . A second type of situation justifying a conclusion of deliberate indifference is where the city fails to act in response to repeated complaints of constitutional violations by its officers."); Cornfield v. Consolidated High School District No. 230, 991 F.2d 1316, 1327 (7th Cir. 1993) ("[I]t may be that a municipality could fail to train its employees with respect to a clear constitutional duty implicated in recurrent situations that a particular employee is certain to face. [cite omitted] Given the nebulous standards governing student searches, school districts and school district administrators cannot be held accountable on this ground because the particular constitutional duty at issue is not clear. Alternately, municipal liability would be proper for a failure to train when the need is not necessarily obvious from the outset, but the pattern or frequency of constitutional violations would put the municipality on notice that its employees' responses to a recurring situation are insufficient to protect the constitutional rights involved. [cite omitted] In other words, the policymakers had acquiesced in a pattern of constitutional violations."); Thelma D. v. Board of Education of the City of St. Louis, 934 F.2d 929, 934-45 (8th Cir.1991) (analysis clearly illustrates the two different methods of establishing City of Canton deliberate indifference.). See also Palmquist v. Selvik, 111 F.3d 1332 (7th Cir. 1997); Young v. City of Augusta, Georgia, 59 F.3d 1160, 1172 (11th Cir. 1995) (same).

See also Smith v. City of Chicago, 143 F.Supp.3d 741, 752-53 (N.D. Ill. 2015) ("In the Amended Complaint, the named Plaintiffs base their Fourth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment Equal Protection Clause Monell claims on the City's and Superintendent McCarthy's acts and omissions in relation to: (1) failing to properly screen, train, and supervise CPD officers; (2) inadequately monitoring CPD officers and their stop and frisk practices; (3) failing to sufficiently discipline CPD officers who engage in constitutional abuses; and (4) encouraging, sanctioning, and failing to rectify the alleged unconstitutional practices. . . Plaintiffs not only base their Monell claims on a widespread unofficial practice, but also on Defendant Superintendent McCarthy's deliberate acts as a decision-maker with final policy-making authority. . . In relation to failure to train and supervise claims, under 'limited circumstances, a local government's decision not to train certain employees about their legal duty to avoid violating citizens' rights may rise to the level of an official government policy for purposes of § 1983.'. . Under this standard, a local government's failure to train must amount to the deliberate indifference of the rights of the citizens whom the officers encounter. . . 'Deliberate indifference' is a term used in both Eighth Amendment claims and constitutional actions against governmental entities. . . Specifically, 'deliberate indifference serves under the Eighth Amendment to ensure that only inflictions of punishment carry liability.'.

. On the other hand, the 'term was used in the Canton case for the quite different purpose of identifying the threshold for holding a city responsible for the constitutional torts committed by its inadequately trained agents.'. . Proof of deliberate indifference in the context of a failure to train case 'can take the form of either (1) failure to provide adequate training in light of foreseeable consequences; or (2) failure to act in response to repeated complaints of constitutional violations by its officers.'. .Accepting Plaintiffs' allegations as true and all reasonable inferences in Plaintiffs' favor, not only have Plaintiffs alleged enough factual details regarding their failure to train and supervise claim under the federal pleading standards, they have alleged sufficient facts that the City and Defendant McCarthy acted with deliberate indifference under Sornberger."); Hall v. City of Chicago, No. 12 C 6834, 2012 WL 6727511, *7-*9 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 28, 2012) ("The City claims that Plaintiffs' bald assertion that the City's municipal policymakers acted with deliberate indifference to the rights of the Plaintiffs fails to satisfy the Plaintiffs' pleading requirements. Plaintiffs respond arguing that deliberate indifference can be 'imputed' to the City because of the City's failure to train its officers adequately and because of its failure to monitor and discipline its officers. . . A municipality will be held liable under Monell for 'failure to adequately train or supervise its officers only when the inadequacy in training amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of the individuals with whom the officers come into contact.'. . . Plaintiffs reference Sornberger v. City of Knoxville and Robles v. Fort Wayne as support that their pleadings allege sufficiently that the City has acted with deliberate indifference. The Court disagrees. . . .Plaintiffs here fail to plead that the City failed to provide adequate training to Chicago Police Officers despite 'foreseeable consequences,' and fail to plead that the City has received repeated complaints of constitutional violations with respect to S04–13–09. Indeed, based on the Court's prior determination that S04–13–09 does not on its face permit officers to conduct compulsory seizures absent reasonable suspicion, the Court cannot see how the City could predict that patrol officers would conduct unconstitutional seizures when enforcing S04–13–09. Moreover, . . . Plaintiffs fail to make any allegations that the City was aware of a pattern of wrongful conduct involving S04–13–09. While the Court concedes that Plaintiffs' allege that a number of the Contact Information Cards indicate officers were conducting Fourth Amendment seizures without reasonable suspicion, Plaintiffs fail to allege that the City ever received information of constitutional violations and after receiving such information, declined to take any action to correct such violations. . . Thus, the Court finds that Plaintiffs' Monell widespread practice theory claims based on the City's failure to train and failure to monitor adequately and discipline officers fails because the Plaintiffs fail to plead that the City acted with deliberate indifference."); Brown v. Mitchell, 308 F.Supp.2d 682, 706 (E.D.Va. 2004) ("At bottom, as Justice O'Connor's separate opinion in Harris makes clear, there are, in fact, two categories of failure to train cases, one involving a pattern of constitutional deprivations and one involving singular deprivations of more obvious rights. And, due to the fair notice requirements of Monell, each category proceeds somewhat differently as respects what must be pleaded and proved to establish deliberate indifference. Mitchell, who contends that the Complaint fails to state a claim because it fails to allege a pattern of constitutional deprivations at the Jail, is really asking the Court to place this action in the second O'Connor category, i.e., the category at- issue in Lytle. If, however, the Complaint concerns 'a clear constitutional duty implicated in recurrent situations that a particular employee is certain to face,' . . . it does not need to allege a pattern of constitutional deprivation to state a legally cognizable claim. . . Count II resonates in that category of failure to train cases involving singular violations of clear and recurrent rights rather than in the pattern- mode category of failure to train cases. The Complaint alleges that Mitchell had a duty to ensure that her subordinates were adequately trained to recognize and adequately respond to serious medical conditions presented by inmates under their charge. The constitutional requirements imposed by the Eighth Amendment on the individual employee guards is clear: they must not be deliberately indifferent to a serious medical situation. Moreover, that Eighth Amendment duty is implicated in recurrent situations because, during his or her tenure, every Jail guard is almost certain to be in charge of inmates with serious medical conditions. Thus, as a case implicating a clear and recurrent constitutional right, Brown's Complaint is a cognizable failure to train claim under Harris.").

Note that the second method of establishing government liability was recognized by courts prior to City of Canton. See,e.g., Eddy v. City of Miami, 715 F. Supp. 1553, 1555 (S.D. Fla. 1989) ("A municipality's continuing failure to remedy known unconstitutional conduct of police officers is a type of informal policy or custom that is amenable to suit under [§ 1983].").

In Spell v. McDaniel, 824 F.2d 1380 (4th Cir. 1987), a pre-City of Canton case, the court drew a similar distinction between government liability based on a policy of deficient training and liability based on a pattern or custom of unconstitutional conduct condoned by government policymakers. Id. at 1389. The court noted an important substantive distinction between the two theories. While government liability can attach for the first constitutional injury that is caused by a proven policy of inadequate or deficient training, there must be some pattern of unconstitutional conduct actually or constructively known to policymakers before government liability can be based on a theory of condoned custom or usage. Id.

See also Hernandez v. United States, 939 F.3d 191, 209-10 (2d Cir. 2019) ("[T]o plead a failure-to-train claim, a plaintiff must allege that a municipality's failure to train its employees amounted to 'deliberate indifference' to the rights of individuals with whom the untrained employees have come into contact. This 'stringent standard of fault' is not met here, where the Complaint alleges that the City's employees acted not with deliberate indifference, but because of a purported policy of complying with federal immigration detainers without question, even when circumstances exist to question the validity of the detainer. If there is a constitutional violation, it is because of the City's policy, not because of the City's failure to train its employees. The employers' 'shortcomings,' assuming there were shortcomings, resulted from factors other than a faulty training program. . . Accordingly, the district court properly dismissed Hernandez's failure-to-train claim."); Forrest v. Parry, 930 F.3d 93, 105-07, 117-18 (3d Cir. 2019) ("Plaintiffs that proceed under a municipal policy or custom theory must make showings that are not required of those who proceed under a failure or inadequacy theory, and vice versa. Notably, an unconstitutional municipal policy or custom is necessary for the former theory, but not for the latter, failure or inadequacy theory. . . .This difference can be significant because a plaintiff presenting an unconstitutional policy must point to an official proclamation, policy or edict by a decisionmaker possessing final authority to establish municipal policy on the relevant subject. And, if alleging a custom, the plaintiff must evince a given course of conduct so well-settled and permanent as to virtually constitute law. . . On the other hand, one whose claim is predicated on a failure or inadequacy has the separate, but equally demanding requirement of demonstrating a failure or inadequacy amounting to deliberate indifference on the part of the municipality. . . This consists of a showing as to whether (1) municipal policymakers know that employees will confront a particular situation, (2) the situation involves a difficult choice or a history of employees mishandling, and (3) the wrong choice by an employee will frequently cause deprivation of constitutional rights. . . . Although we have acknowledged the close relationship between policy-and-custom claims and failure-or-inadequacy claims, . . . the avenues remain distinct: a plaintiff alleging that a policy or custom led to his or her injuries must be referring to an unconstitutional policy or custom, and a plaintiff alleging failure-to-supervise, train, or discipline must show that said failure amounts to deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of those affected. That is not to say that the plaintiffs cannot be one and the same, with claims sounding in both. They can. . . At the outset, we emphasize that, properly considered, there are two ways in which Forrest's § 1983 claim against Camden may have proceeded: first, that Camden's policy or custom of permitting excessive force, false arrest, or other constitutional violations led to Forrest's injuries; and/or second, that Camden's failure to supervise, discipline, or train its officers amounted to deliberate indifference to the rights of the individuals with whom those officers would come into contact. As a result, the bare notion that a custom or policy of 'essentially unsupervised' officers led to Forrest's injury has no basis in law. . . We therefore consider his claim as sounding in the latter—that Camden's failure to supervise, investigate, and train its officers amounted to deliberate indifference. . . .[R]ecall that the onus of demonstrating an official policy or custom only falls on a plaintiff whose municipal liability claim is predicated on an unconstitutional policy or custom, but that such a plaintiff need not show deliberate indifference on the part of the municipality. On the other hand, a plaintiff advancing a claim predicated on a municipality's failure or inadequacy in training, supervision, or otherwise is spared from demonstrating the existence of an unconstitutional policy or custom but must make the deliberate indifference showing. To the contrary, the jury here was incorrectly instructed that, in order to find a municipal liability for inadequate supervision, it had to find that Camden adopted a policy or custom of inadequate supervision amounting to deliberate indifference to the fact that it would 'obviously result in the violation of an individual's right to be free from unlawful arrest and excessive force.'. . Indeed, in relevant part, the instructions begin by stating that the jury must find 'that an official policy or custom of [Internal Affairs] caused the deprivation [of his constitutional rights].'. . And, after presenting the requirements for determining whether a policy or custom existed, it frames Forrest's claim as '[Camden] adopted a policy of inadequate supervision and that this policy caused the violation of [Forrest's] right[s] ....'. . . It then immediately follows with instructions that the jury must also find that Internal Affairs failed to adequately supervise Officers Stetser and Parry, and that said supervision amounted to deliberate indifference. . . The result is confusion as to whether the policy or custom finding is antecedent to reaching the deliberate indifference inquiry, or if the two are intertwined in some other way.")

Compare Valle v. City of Houston, 613 F.3d 536, 546-50 (5th Cir. 2010) ("[W]e find that there is sufficient evidence of causation to survive summary judgment with respect to the escalation of force after the officers' entry. . . . At best, the City's evidence raises a factual dispute whether failure to train all of the patrol officers involved in the incident in CIT tactics was a moving force in the precipitous escalation of force following their entry, which violated Esparza's constitutional rights. . . . The Valles presented some evidence that the City's decision not to implement the 2004 CIT training proposal could potentially lead to the deprivation of constitutional rights. Contrary to the district court's findings, we think that the 2004 proposal was, at least in part, intended to address the potential for the unconstitutional use of excessive force against mentally ill persons. . . . However, the Valles did not link this potential for constitutional violations to a pattern of actual violations sufficient to show deliberate indifference. The proposal does not detail any prior specific instances of the use of excessive force by non-CIT officers. Nor did the Valles elicit testimony that City officials were aware of prior shootings of unarmed mentally ill individuals. . . .We further note that it is difficult to show deliberate indifference in a case such as this one where the City has implemented at least some training. The very fact that the City trained a corps of officers in CIT tactics, demonstrates that it was not deliberately indifferent to the dangers of police interactions with mentally ill residents. The City considered the proposal, as well as resource constraints, and determined that the best allocation of limited resources and personnel was to keep the CIT training at the then-current levels. We do not mean to say that anytime a municipality must make decisions about resource allocations, such a decision will preclude a finding of deliberate indifference. Indeed, we can imagine scenarios in which a municipality's decision not to allocate resources to training necessary to prevent constitutional violations would constitute deliberate indifference. But that is not the case before us. As we indicated in the discussion of causation, additional training both in terms of the number of officers who were so trained and the quantity of training that each officer received may have made a difference for Esparza. But without a demonstrated link showing constitutional violations, notwithstanding the level of training the City had already implemented, we cannot say that the City was deliberately indifferent. . . . Proof of deliberate indifference is difficult, although not impossible, to base on a single incident. . . The 'single incident exception' is extremely narrow. . . . In the one case in which we found a single incident sufficient to support municipal liability, there was an abundance of evidence about the proclivities of the particular officer involved in the use of excessive force. . . . On the other hand, we have rejected claims of deliberate indifference even where a municipal employer knew of a particular officer's propensities for violence or recklessness. . . . This court has been wary of finding municipal liability on the basis of a single incident to avoid running afoul of the Supreme Court's consistent rejection of respondeat superior liability. . . . Here, the Valles did not allege or offer evidence that the officers who responded to their call had a propensity for using excessive force, violence, or were otherwise reckless. Our case law does not specifically require evidence of such character traits, but such evidence certainly is probative in determining that a 'highly predictable' consequence of sending the particular officers into a particular situation would be a constitutional violation. . . . Although the evidence shows the possibility-perhaps even the likelihood-of recurring situations involving mental health consumers, the evidence is far more equivocal on the question whether there was an obvious potential for the violation of constitutional rights and an obvious need for more or different training. . . . We find the actions and decisions of the officers involved in this unfortunate shooting to be very troubling, indeed. However, the Valles did not present sufficient evidence to show that the highly predictable consequence of sending non-CIT officers in response to their call for help would result in the shooting of their son."); Whitfield v. Melendez-Rivera, 431 F.3d 1, 13, 14 (1st Cir. 2005) ("[T]he fact that neither Lebron nor Mangome was disciplined for this incident . . . does not provide a sufficient basis by itself to support the jury's verdict. . . . In this case. . . there was an investigation into the shooting incident. According to Mangome, the investigation concluded that Lebron and Mangome had been justified in their use of force. Given that the question of whether Lebron and Mangome were justified in firing at Whitfield was fact-based and was hinged on competing versions of the events, it is not surprising that two different fact-finders (the police investigators and the jury in this case) came to two different conclusions. Standing alone, the lack of any disciplinary charges against Lebron and Mangome is not probative of a 'well settled and widespread' policy or custom.. . Nor does it establish deliberate indifference by the city."); Estate of Davis by and through Dyann v. City of North Richland Hills, 406 F.3d 375, 385, 386 (5th Cir. 2005) ("We do not suggest that a single incident, as opposed to a pattern of violations, can never suffice to demonstrate deliberate indifference.. . It is true that there is a so-called 'single incident exception,' but it is inherently 'a narrow one, and one that we have been reluctant to expand.' . . 'To rely on this exception, a plaintiff must prove that the 'highly predictable' consequence of a failure to train would result in the specific injury suffered, and that the failure to train represented the 'moving force' behind the constitutional violation.'"); Burge v. St. Tammany Parish, 336 F.3d 363, 373 (5th Cir. 2003) (Burge IV) ("The single incident exception . . is a narrow one, and one that we have been reluctant to expand. . . Accordingly, the exception will apply only where the facts giving rise to the violation are such that it should have been apparent to the policymaker that a constitutional violation was the highly predictable consequence of a particular policy or failure to train. . . It is not reasonably inferable [sic] from the evidence in this case that a Brady violation was a highly probable consequence of the Sheriff's policies. Unlike the facts of Bryan County, there is no evidence in the present case that the employees of the Sheriff's records room had a reputation for recklessness, or that the on-the-job training those employees received was inadequate. Nor do we accept Burge's argument that the single-incident exception should be expanded based on the latent nature of a Brady claim. . . . We decline, therefore, to extend the single-incident exception to the present case, and Burge is accordingly left with the burden of showing deliberate indifference by establishing proof of a pattern of similar violations, a burden he has been unable to carry."); Pineda v. City of Houston, 291 F.3d 325, 335 (5th Cir. 2002) ("In the only case in this circuit to apply the single incident exception to a failure to train claim, Bryan County, we stressed the requirements of notice and causation. . . Assuming arguendo that the plaintiffs have raised a fact issue with respect to whether or not GTF officers were performing specialized narcotics operations, the void in the record remains: the summary judgment record sheds no light on any lack of training in the application of the rules of search and seizure or any evidence of a causal relationship between a lack of training and the death of Oregon. The plaintiffs' single incident argument proves too much, as it essentially requires, again, that any Fourth Amendment violation be sufficient to satisfy the exception."); Piotrowski v. City of Houston (Piotrowski II), 237 F.3d 567, 582 (5th Cir. 2001) ("As is the case with allegations of failure to adequately screen prospective police officers, it is nearly impossible to impute lax disciplinary policy to the City without showing a pattern of abuses that transcends the error made in a single case. . . . A pattern could evidence not only the existence of a policy but also official deliberate indifference."); Estate of Novack ex rel. Turbin v. County of Wood, 226 F.3d 525, 531 (7th Cir. 2000) ("[P]laintiffs may prove their allegation that the County was deliberately indifferent to the constitutional violations WCJ personnel were inflicting on mentally ill inmates by presenting either a series of unconstitutional acts from which it may be inferred that the County knew WCJ officers were violating the constitutional rights of WCJ inmates and did nothing or by direct evidence that the WCJ policies, practices or training methods were unconstitutional. Plaintiffs have not shown that there was a pattern of suicide at WCJ from which we can draw the inference that the County was aware that WCJ policies for treating mentally ill inmates at risk for suicide were inadequate and chose to do nothing in the face of this knowledge. Even if we were to find that Novack's suicide itself was a result of unconstitutional conduct, a single instance of allegedly unconstitutional conduct does not demonstrate a municipality's deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of its inhabitants. . . . In the absence of a series of constitutional violations from which deliberate indifference can be inferred, the plaintiffs must show that the policy itself is unconstitutional."); Gabriel v. City of Plano, 202 F.3d 741, 745 (5th Cir. 2000) ("In failure to train cases, the plaintiff can prove the existence of a municipal custom or policy of deliberate indifference to individuals' rights in two ways. First, he can show that a municipality deliberately or consciously chose not to train its officers despite being on notice that its current training regimen had failed to prevent tortious conduct by its officers. . . Second, under the 'single incident exception' a single violation of federal rights may be sufficient to prove deliberate indifference. . . The single incident exception requires proof of the possibility of recurring situations that present an obvious potential for violation of constitutional rights and the need for additional or different police training. . . We have consistently rejected application of the single incident exception and have noted that 'proof of a single violent incident ordinarily is insufficient to hold a municipality liable for inadequate training.' Snyder v. Trepagnier, 142 F.3d 791, 798 (5th Cir.1998 . . . .") and Hanno v. Sheahan, No. 01 C 4677, 2004 WL 2967442, at *13 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 29, 2004) ("Plaintiffs invite the court to conclude that the Sheriff's failure to discipline the deputies is sufficient to establish a liability. The court declines the invitation. Although some Circuits have held that a policy of inadequate discipline of police officers could evidence deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of citizens, those courts have emphasized that 'it is nearly impossible to impute lax disciplinary policy to [a municipality] without showing a pattern of abuses that transcends the error made in a single case.' . . The Seventh Circuit has held that in order to establish municipal liability in the absence of an express policy, a plaintiff must establish 'a widespread practice that, although not authorized by written law or express municipal policy, is so permanent and well settled as to constitute a custom or usage with the force of law.' . . With respect to the wrongful seizure or excessive force bases of their Fourth Amendment claims, no such evidence is offered. The wrongful seizure and excessive force claims against Sheriff Sheahan are, therefore, dismissed.") with Brown v. Bryan County, 219 F.3d 450, 458-60 (5th Cir. 2000) ("[I]f Monell liability is to be imposed, it must be done on the grounds of the single decision by Sheriff Moore to require no training of Burns before placing him on the street to make arrests. . . . . We think it is clear from the Court's decisions in City of Canton . . .and Bryan County, that, under certain circumstances, § 1983 liability can attach for a single decision not to train an individual officer even where there has been no pattern of previous constitutional violations. . . . Liability of the county depends upon whether it should have been obvious to Sheriff Moore − or stated differently, whether Sheriff Moore had sufficient notice − that the failure to train Burns in his task of making arrests was likely to lead to a violation of the Fourth Amendment rights of those he would encounter. Furthermore, liability attaches only if there is direct causation between the policy and the injury. The City of Canton also suggests that a single incident of an alleged constitutional violation resulting from the policy may serve as a basis for liability so long as that violation was an obvious consequence of the policy. Thus, City of Canton is persuasive that a pattern of misconduct is not required to establish obviousness or notice to the policymaker of the likely consequences of his decision."). See also Brown v. Mitchell, 308 F.Supp.2d 682, 704, 706 (E.D. Va. 2004) ("[U]nder Harris, the absence of an allegation of a pattern is not necessarily fatal to a failure to train claim. . . . [A]s a majority of justices in Harris held, a failure to train claim also can be based on a municipality's failure to train its employees concerning an obvious constitutional duty that the particular employees are certain to face. . . Thus, when a failure to train claim posits the deprivation of a clear constitutional right that is implicated in recurrent situations, the presence of a pattern is not an element of the claim. . . . The Complaint's lack of an allegation respecting a pattern of constitutional deprivations, therefore, contrary to Mitchell's argument, is not fatal. Construed liberally in favor of the plaintiff, . .. the Complaint alleges that Mitchell was deliberately indifferent by failing to institute a proper training program respecting the clear and recurrent Eighth Amendment right of inmates to have their serious medical needs attended to. Thus, Count II fairly alleges that Mitchell acted with deliberate indifference, hence satisfying the second element of a Section 1983 failure to train claim.").

See also Novak v. City of Parma, Ohio, 33 F.4th 296, 309-10 (6th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 773 (2023) ("Novak claims that Parma should have trained its officers 'that pure speech is not a crime' save for a few exceptions. . . Novak's claim can survive summary judgment if he points to evidence that Parma 'fail[ed] to provide any training on key duties with direct impact' on free-speech issues. . . He says that's the case because Parma officers' only First Amendment training covered protests. There was no discussion of the complexities of parody or other forms of protected speech. What Novak fails to appreciate is that the intricacies of parody are not part of the officers' 'key duties' the way protest management is. So there was no duty to further train them here. What's more, Novak cannot show that deficiencies in training caused the alleged constitutional violations. Indeed, the officers were trained to contact the Law Department (namely, Dobeck) when difficult questions arose. That's just what they did: Riley and Connor looked to Dobeck for advice before pursuing a case. Once he assured them of probable cause, they obtained independent warrants for Novak's arrest and the search of his apartment from two different judges. As the district court pointed out, it strains belief to think an introductory primer on the First Amendment would have led the officers to a different conclusion than three trained lawyers. So Novak can't show that any failure to train actually caused or closely relates to his objections.");

McClendon v. City of Columbia (McClendon I), 258 F.3d 432, 442, 443 (5th Cir. 2001) ("We find this case distinguishable from Bryan. Although there is no evidence that disputes McClendon's claim that the City of Columbia does not provide specific training for its officers regarding the use of informants, there is a difference between a complete failure to train, as in Bryan, and a failure to train in one limited area. Even if this failure to train is considered sufficiently culpable conduct, however, McClendon has failed to prove a causal connection between this failure to train and his injury. He points to no evidence demonstrating that any training on behalf of the City with regards to the use of informants would have prevented Carney from providing Loftin with the gun used in this case."), portion of opinion reinstated by McClendon v. City of Columbia (McClendon II), 305 F.3d 314, 321 n.3 (5th Cir. 2002) (en banc).

See also Walker v. City of New York, 974 F.2d 293, 299 (2d Cir. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1387 (1993), where plaintiff, who spent nineteen years in prison for a crime he did not commit, claimed the police department was deliberately indifferent to his rights by failing to train and supervise officers "not to commit perjury or aid in the prosecution of the innocent."

The plaintiff argued in Walker that the duty to train in the area of not committing perjury was just like the duty to train in the use of deadly force, that "city policymakers know to a moral certainty that police officers will be presented with opportunities to commit perjury or proceed against the innocent . . . [and that] a failure . . . to resist these opportunities will almost certainly result in injuries to citizens." Id.

The Court of Appeals rejected plaintiff's "obviousness" claim, however, noting that plaintiff's argument had "misse[d] a crucial step":

> It is not enough to show that a situation will arise and that taking the wrong course in that situation will result in injuries to citizens . . . City of Canton also requires a likelihood that the failure to train or supervise will result in the officer making the wrong decision. Where the proper response . . . is obvious to all without training or supervision, then the failure to train or supervise is generally not 'so likely' to produce a wrong decision as to support an inference of deliberate indifference by city policymakers to the need to train or supervise.

Id. at 299-300. See also J.H. v. Williamson County, Tennessee, 951 F.3d 709, 723-24 (6th Cir. 2020) ("While the details of Cruz's alleged assault on J.H. are troubling, J.H. has not met his burden to establish municipal liability. We have held in unpublished cases that 'opportunity alone, without reason to suspect that it will lead to a constitutional violation, does not establish deliberate indifference.'. . There was no clear pattern of sexual abuse at JDC, and Cruz had no history of misconduct at JDC. And there is no authority to support the offensive claim that a sexual assault is the obvious consequence of an official's sexual orientation. J.H. argues that Mize and Magoffin are inapposite because, in those cases, the defendants were not charged with assuming responsibility of the plaintiffs in the way that Cruz's job required. But that does not change the fact that '[t]he intentional, violent act that' Cruz is alleged to have 'performed far outside the scope of his duties' was not 'something that was "obvious" to occur.'. . Furthermore, J.H. has not shown a 'direct causal connection' between the failure to train Cruz and his alleged assault of J.H.—in other words, it is far from clear that any lack of training was the 'moving force' behind Cruz's decision to sexually assault a child. . .Thus, we affirm the district court on this claim."); Marsh v. Phelps County, 902 F.3d 745, 752-53 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Even were we to determine that allowing one employee unfettered access to female inmates constitutes a policy or custom of the same sufficient to support a claim of liability against Phelps County under § 1983, there is no evidence of such acquiescence on the part of the County in the record before us, despite Marsh's assertions to the contrary. That coworkers and inmates from Phelps County Jail later revealed to investigators they had concerns about Campana's interactions with female inmates, and some even talked to Campana about those concerns does not establish a County policy of allowing access. These recollections about access were not from officials with authority over such matters nor is there evidence that these concerns were conveyed to those with authority. On these facts, it is patently incorrect to claim that there was a 'widespread' practice of ignoring the 'widespread' knowledge that Campana engaged in sexually inappropriate behavior. At the time the County hired Campana, a current corrections employee that had previously worked with Campana expressed that Campana might possibly have problems working around females. However, receipt and knowledge of that information upon hiring does not establish a policy of allowing Campana 'unfettered access' to that inmate population, let alone that any such alleged access was the moving force behind the constitutional violation alleged here. In fact, the evidence establishes that the County counseled Campana regarding his too-friendly nature with the female inmates and his unprofessionalism in that same regard, which evidences the opposite of a policy condoning the conduct. At bottom, Marsh identifies no evidence that evinces a deliberate choice of a guiding principle or procedure made by Phelps County authorizing officers to engage in this behavior and no evidence suggests that one existed in the first instance. . .Additionally, as to the argument that the County failed to train its employees (and Campana, specifically) not to engage in sexually deviant behaviors, this court has held that there is no patently obvious need to train an officer not to sexually assault detainees in light of the regular law enforcement duties of officers and the fact that '[a]n objectively reasonable officer would know that it is impermissible' to engage in such behavior. . . While it might be wise and useful to plainly articulate such expectation in a training course, not doing so does not result in causing an officer to actually sexually assault a female detainee. . . Nothing in the record amounts to proof that any failure to train Campana caused Campana to sexually assault Marsh or other female inmates or that the County was deliberately indifferent to Marsh's rights as articulated in her complaint."); Flores v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 758 F.3d 1154, 1159-61 (9th Cir. 2014) ("The isolated incidents of criminal wrongdoing by one deputy other than Deputy Doe 1 do not suffice to put the County or Baca on 'notice that a course of training is deficient in a particular respect,' nor that the absence of such a course 'will cause violations of constitutional rights.'. . Neither Baca nor the County was faced with a pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees. . . Nor does Flores's failure to train claim fall within the 'narrow range of circumstances [in which] a pattern of similar violations might not be necessary to show deliberate indifference.'. . . There is . . . every reason to assume that police academy applicants are familiar with the criminal prohibition on sexual assault, as everyone is presumed to know the law. . . There is no basis from which to conclude that the unconstitutional consequences of failing to train police officers not to commit sexual assault are so patently obvious that the County or Baca were deliberately indifferent. . . . Flores's claim for failure to train fails because it is not plausible on its face. . . Flores's sole factual allegation regarding the alleged failure to train consists in the absence of language in the Sheriff's Department Manual that would instruct deputies not to sexually harass or sexually attack women with whom they come into contact. . . Given that the penal code prohibits sexual battery, it is not plausible that inclusion in the Manual of the language that Flores proposes would have prevented the assault on Flores. . . If the threat of prison time does not sufficiently deter sexual assault, it is not plausible to assume that a specific instruction not to commit sexual assault will provide such deterrence, and therefore failure to include such instruction does not constitute deliberate indifference absent a longstanding pattern of such criminal behavior. We agree with our sister circuits that '[i]n light of the regular law enforcement duties of a police officer' there is not 'a patently obvious need for the city [ ] specifically [to] train officers not to rape young women.'. .Accordingly, we hold that Flores has failed to allege sufficiently that the failure to train sheriff's deputies not to commit sexual assault constitutes deliberate indifference to the risk of such assault by a deputy. Given the absence of any pattern of sexual assaults and the clear criminality of the conduct, we also hold that instructions in an employment manual not to sexually harass or sexually assault women cannot plausibly be considered an effective means to prevent sexual assault, when the employees are peace officers sworn to uphold the law which prohibits such assaults. . . . Flores has not alleged facts sufficient to state a claim against the County or Baca, and the district court properly dismissed the action for failure to state a claim."); Lewis v. Pugh, No. 07-40662, 2008 WL 3842922, at *6 (5th Cir. Aug. 18, 2008) (not published) ("The actions of Pugh in raping and assaulting Lewis in March 2005 were entirely caused by Pugh. There is simply no evidence in the record that Pugh made the decision to rape Lewis for any reason related to any City policy or custom or understanding thereof which he may have had, or for any reason other than his own motivations for assaulting Lewis. In fact, Lewis herself has referred to Pugh as a 'rogue' police officer. In sum, the evidence shows no causal connection between the City's allegedly unconstitutional policy and the actions of Pugh."); Atkins v. County of Riverside, 151 F. App'x 501, 508 (9th Cir. 2005) ("There is no indication that the County needed to train officers to not lie on a police report, or to suppress a lie once told. Atkins has not explained how a failure to train or supervise on Brady obligations was the 'moving force' behind Miller's alleged fabrication and concealment."); Carr v. Castle, 337 F.3d 1221, 1232 (10th Cir. 2003)("Even if Carr is viewed from the most favorable perspective in terms of the Officers not having been trained to know how to react exactly to an individual who had just thrown a four-inch piece of concrete, one thing is certain: They were not trained by the City to shoot him repeatedly in the back after he no longer posed a threat. In sum, even if some inadequacy in training had been shown, Carr cannot demonstrate how it was a direct cause of the Officers' actions and of Randall's consequent death."); Hernandez v. Borough of Palisades Park Police Dep't., 58 F. App'x 909, 914 (3d Cir. 2003) ("Here, it was hardly obvious that police officers, sworn to uphold the law, would burglarize the homes of the very citizens whom they were duty-bound to protect because they lacked training that instructed them that such activity was unlawful. . . . Here, there is nothing to suggest that there is an inherently high risk that police officers will commit robberies absent ethics training. Thus, the failure to train police officers that they should not commit burglaries, or the failure to supervise them to ensure that they do not commit such felonies, is not so likely to result in a violation of a constitutional right as to demonstrate deliberate indifference by Borough policymakers."); Kitzman-Kelley v. Warner, 203 F.3d 454, 459 (7th Cir. 2000) ("Kitzman-Kelley must show one of two things: that there is a history of child welfare employees molesting the children in their care; or that someone inclined to commit child abuse could be deterred through proper training. In considering this latter question, it is necessary to determine, of course, whether the sort of sexual assault alleged here can be avoided by 'training' the perpetrator."); Barney v. Pulsipher, 143 F.3d 1299, 1308 (10th Cir. 1998) ("Even if the courses concerning gender issues and inmates' rights were less than adequate, we are not persuaded that a plainly obvious consequence of a deficient training program would be the sexual assault of inmates. Specific or extensive training hardly seems necessary for a jailer to know that sexually assaulting inmates is inappropriate behavior."); Hayden v. Grayson, 134 F.3d 449, 457 n.14 (1st Cir. 1998) ("[T]here has been no showing that whatever training was not provided to Grayson could have thwarted any such purposeful discrimination. Whereas law enforcement training might inform an officer about the proper methods to be used in mediating and diffusing crimes of domestic violence, for example, it does not necessarily follow that an officer intent on discriminating against a particular class of crime victims would be deterred from doing so by 'enlightenment' training, especially given the contraindications implicit in plaintiffs' other evidence that the challenged decisionmaking by Grayson resulted from alcohol abuse, lassitude, or personal animosity toward individuals."); Floyd v. Waiters, 133 F.3d 786, 796 (11th Cir. 1998) ("Applying the reasoning of Sewell and Walker to the facts of this case, we conclude that the BOE [Board of Public Education and Orphanage for Bibb County] did not act with deliberate indifference to the training and supervision of the security department. Booker's conduct and the operation of the Playhouse were clearly against the basic norms of human conduct. The pertinent conduct was a crime in Georgia. Without notice to the contrary, the BOE was entitled to rely on the common sense of its employees not to engage in wicked and criminal conduct. The record contains no evidence that this reliance ever rose to the level of deliberate indifference by policymaking officials."); Sewell v. Town of Lake Hamilton, 117 F.3d 488, 490 (11th Cir. 1997) (rejecting plaintiff's claim that officer's sexual molestation of arrestee resulted from deliberate indifference in training and supervision); Andrews v. Fowler, 98 F.3d 1069, 1077 (8th Cir. 1996) ("In light of the regular law enforcement duties of a police officer, we cannot conclude that there was a patently obvious need for the city to specifically train officers not to rape young women."); Doe v. City of New York, No. 18-CV-670 (ARR) (JO), 2018 WL 3824133, at *9 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 9, 2018) ("The first two categories of Monell liability are irrelevant here as plaintiff does not allege that Hall and Martins's actions were undertaken pursuant to a formal municipal policy or that these actions were ordered or ratified by a municipal policymaker. She also does not allege any prior incidents, let alone a formal policy, of police officers threatening and intimidating the victims of sexual assaults in order to prevent them from coming forward. Nor does plaintiff plausibly allege that there was a pattern of officers sexually assaulting individuals in police custody that was 'sufficiently persistent or widespread as to acquire the force of law.'. . Indeed, none of the incidents of prior sexual misconduct by Brooklyn South Narcotics officers alleged in the complaint involved individuals in police custody. . . Doe argues that, due to the inherent power dynamics of the relationship between police officers and arrestees, '[w]hen on duty police [request] to trade sex for drugs or anything else that is spelled rape.'. . But trading drugs for sex is simply not the same thing as sexually assaulting someone in police custody. Moreover, viewing this case as part of a pattern of sexual misconduct sufficiently persistent or widespread to constitute a custom, this is not a case where 'a local government is faced with a pattern of misconduct and does nothing.'. . Instead, the complaint alleges that an Internal Affairs investigation resulted in 15 Brooklyn South Narcotics officers being 'placed on desk duty,'. . . as well as the transfer of 'the commanding officer of citywide narcotics, the head of Brooklyn South Narcotics ... and two captains in the unit[.] . . Nor, for essentially the same reason, does Doe plausibly allege a failure to supervise Monell claim: she does not allege facts that support a reasonable inference of a 'failure to investigate or rectify' a 'potentially serious problem of unconstitutional conduct' that 'evidences deliberate indifference.'. . Finally, Doe does not plausibly allege a failure to train Monell claim because she does not identify a training deficiency that ' "actually caused" the constitutional deprivation'—here, her sexual assault. . . While this is not the first time an on-duty New York City police officer stands accused of rape, . . . plaintiff provides no reason to believe that this behavior was caused by a failure to properly train officers. Indeed, deciding not to rape someone is not the kind of 'difficult choice of the sort that training or supervision will make less difficult.'"); Castellani v. City of Atl. City, No. CV 13-5848 (JBS/AMD), 2017 WL 3112820, at *22 (D.N.J. July 21, 2017) ("While there is ample evidence to support Plaintiff's claim with respect to failure to supervise or failure to discipline, there is less evidence regarding the failure to train aspect of the claim, as Plaintiff does not appear to allege negligent training. . . Defendant argues that it is absurd to suggest that this incident happened because the officers were not properly trained "not to beat a defenseless person and instruct a dog to maul him for sport or out of uncontrolled anger." (Reply Br. at 10.) The Court agrees, as the City has produced records indicating that ACPD officers regularly undergo yearly in-service training specifically in the area of use of force. . . Accordingly, the Court will deny summary judgment on the aspect of Plaintiff's Monell claim dealing with failure to supervise and failure to discipline, but will grant summary judgment with respect to failure to train."); Campbell v. Anderson County, No. 3:06-CV-444, 2010 WL 503141, at *7 (E.D. Tenn. Feb. 8, 2010) ("The court agrees with the reasoning set forth in the cases cited above. Refraining from raping women in police custody is so obvious that even if Anderson County were silent about such conduct, it would not give rise to a constitutional violation. The court finds that Anderson County's training procedures were sufficient as a matter of law, and that no specific training was necessary to inform officers not to rape or sexually assault women in their custody. Accordingly, Anderson County is granted summary judgment on Campbell's claim based on inadequate training."); Doe v. Dickenson, No.CV-07-01998-PHX-GMS, 2009 WL 1211812, at *5, *6 (D. Ariz. Apr. 30, 2009) ("It is well-established, however, that a municipality is not deliberately indifferent in failing to train law enforcement officers to not sexually assault those with whom they come into contact. . . . In short, the City's failure to train Dickenson to not molest John Doe was not deliberate indifference because it is obvious that Dickenson should not do such a thing."); Hemmer v. Gayville-Volin School Dist., No. CIV. 07-4079, 2009 WL 462705, at *8 (D.S.D. Feb. 20, 2009) ("The Court concludes that Oakley was clearly abusing his position of authority and trust as a teacher by engaging in a sexual relationship with a sixteen-year-old high school student whom he was coaching and any alleged deficiency in GVSD's sexual harassment training cannot be considered to be the moving force behind Plaintiff's injuries. Oakley's conduct in this case was clearly wrong and grossly immoral. The Court therefore grants Defendants' motion for Summary Judgment as it pertains to Plaintiff's failure to train claim."); Breland v. City of Centerville, Georgia, 2008 WL 2233595, at *3, *4 (M.D. Ga. 2008) ("Plaintiff's argument regarding inadequate training fails because the offense Ware committed against Plaintiff was obviously wrong and was not connected to any training he received or should have received. For liability to attach to Centerville based on deficient training, 'the identified deficiency in [its] training program must be closely related to the ultimate injury.'. . No training is required to teach police officers not to commit sexual assaults. Sexual assault is illegal, and police officers can reasonably be expected to know, without training, that they are not allowed to take sexual advantage of their prisoners. Ware knew that what he was doing was improper and unlawful. . . . An officer does not need to be trained not to commit sexual assault, and even the best training program will not stop an officer who has a criminal intent from committing a crime."); Ejchorszt v. Daigle, No. 3:02CV1350(CFD), 2007 WL 879132, at *7, *8 (D. Conn. Mar. 21, 2007) ("Here Fusaro arguably knew that Daigle was likely to work with young female volunteers during his alcohol sting operations. However, there is no evidence, and it cannot reasonably be argued, that Daigle was faced with a difficult choice in deciding whether or not to abuse his position of authority to take partially nude photos of Ejchorszt. Further, even if Daigle's acts reflect a mistake in judgment rather than wilful misconduct, there is no evidence that his mistake was the result of a faulty training program. Daigle did not need more training to convince him that this conduct was wrong; any reasonable person − or police officer − would likely know that this conduct was entirely inappropriate and could not be justified. Thus there is no genuine issue of fact about whether Daigle's conduct was caused by a faulty training program."); Santiago v. City of Hartford, No. 3:00 CV 2386 WIG, 2005 WL 2234505, at *5 (D. Conn. Sept. 12, 2005) (not reported) ("In the instant case, Plaintiff Santiago, like the plaintiffs in Amnesty America, has failed to proffer any evidence concerning the City's training programs and has failed to identify any specific training deficiency. Other than proffering evidence that the sexual assault occurred and that, over a six-year period, there had been reports of fourteen other incidents involving Hartford police officers, which complaints were investigated with discipline imposed against certain individuals, Plaintiff has failed to offer any evidence in support of her claim that the City's training program was deficient in any manner whatsoever and that such deficiency amounted to a deliberate indifference by the City to the rights of people with whom the police would come into contact. Additionally, even if specific deficiencies in training had been identified by Plaintiff, she has failed to advance any theory as to how those training deficiencies, as opposed to some unrelated circumstance not implicating liability on the part of the City, caused Officer Camacho to sexually assault her. The proper conduct for a police officer, refraining from sexual assault and rape of an arrestee, is patently obvious. It is difficult to conceive of how additional training could have prevented the intentional sexual assault of Plaintiff by Officer Camacho so as to justify a finding of liability on the part of the City."); Ice v. Dixon, No. 4:03CV2281, 2005 WL 1593899, at *9 (N.D. Ohio July 6, 2005) (not reported) ("[V]arious courts have found that causation and culpability of municipal entities are lacking based merely upon an absence of specific training or deficient training of jailers not to sexually assault inmates as 'the proper course of conduct − refraining from sexual assault and rape − is patent and obvious; structured training programs are not required to instill it. Consequently, the absence of such programs (even if such absence was proven) is not so likely to cause improper conduct so as to justify a finding of liability.'"); Harmon v. Grizzel, No. 1:03CV169, 2005 WL 1106975, at *8 (S.D. Ohio Apr. 21, 2005) (not reported) ("Harmon also argues that the training recruits receive regarding sexual misconduct is inadequate. Regardless of the adequacy of the City's training program, the Court finds it difficult to believe that the lack of training was a 'moving force' in the deprivation of the Harmon's rights. Grizzel did not need to be instructed that luring a female into a parking lot under false pretenses, getting into her car, grabbing her nipple without her consent and masturbating was inappropriate and potentially illegal."); Johnson v. CHA Security Officers, No. 97 C 3746, 1998 WL 474138, *6 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 6, 1998) (not reported) ("In this case, CHA was not constitutionally deficient for failing to train its officers not to sexually assault tenants and visitors of CHA complexes since such assaults were clearly contrary to the basic duties of CHA officers and fundamental norms of human conduct. In this type of situation we follow the sound reasoning of our sister circuits and find that a municipal entity cannot be liable under § 1983 for the failure to train its employees not to engage in actions which are so repugnant to the common standards of human decency that common sense should serve as a sufficient deterrent.").

But see Drake v. City of Haltom, 106 F. App'x 897, 900 (5th Cir. 2004) (per curiam) ("The City cites Barney v. Pulsipher, 143 F.3d 1299 (10th Cir.1998), for the proposition that sexual assault of detainees is not an obvious consequence of a City's failure to train or to supervise its jailers. Barney, however, was decided on a motion for summary judgment, not a motion to dismiss, and the summary-judgment record in Barney showed that the jailer who committed the assaults had received instruction on 'offenders' rights, staff/inmate relations, sexual harassment, and cross-gender search and supervision.' Id. at 1308. We are unwilling to say, at this point, that it is not obvious that male jailers who receive no training and who are left virtually unsupervised might abuse female detainees. Thus, we hold that Appellants have stated cognizable claims against the City under § 1983."); Vasconcelloes v. City of New York, No. 12CIV. 8445(CM)(HBP), 2016 WL 403474, at *3-6 (S.D.N.Y. Jan. 28, 2016) ("The City's argument why the Court should grant summary judgment in its favor and dismiss the Monell claim is now markedly different from the argument the City made in its October 2014 letter. It had been the City's position that, after years of litigation, there was no evidence to controvert the police-officer defendants' story of a justified shooting of a person carrying a pistol; therefore, no evidence that the individual defendants committed a constitutional violation and, as such, no basis for a Monell claim against the City. . . That was before non-party witness Derbie Michel—present at the scene when Vasconcellos was shot by the police—was deposed by the parties. Michel testified inter alia that he was twenty feet away from Vasconcellos when he witnessed the police officers fire their weapons at an unarmed Vasconcellos, who was on his knees, with his hands in the air, telling the officers 'I Give up.'. . .Pivoting away from its argument that summary judgment in its favor was warranted because there was no evidence that the defendant officers' shooting of Vasconcellos was not justified, the City now argues that the Court should grant it summary judgment 'because any Monell discovery plaintiff could ultimately be provided if the motion were denied, would never demonstrate that the officers' decision to kill Vasconcellos in such an unjustified and cruel manner was a difficult choice of the sort that training or supervision would make less difficult.'. . The City posits that 'common sense dictates that the heinous murder of Vasconcellos—as described by Michel—was unconstitutional and illegal without the need for training or supervision,' and that 'the City is entitled to rely on a common sense theory that its officers—even without training—would not behave this way.'. . The City cites various case[s] for the proposition that Monell liability cannot lie for a municipality's failure to train its officers, where the bad behavior of its officers was so obviously unconstitutional that the municipality was entitled to rely on a common sense assumption that its officers would not behave in such an egregious manner. . . .The City's attempt to shield itself from the scrutiny of Monell discovery by cleverly characterizing this case as falling under the cited 'common sense' line of cases is unavailing. Accepting as true that the police chased, shot, and killed a surrendering, unarmed Vasconcellos—a version of events wholly contradicted by the individual defendants' deposition testimony, as well as other evidence in the record—the officers' decision to use deadly physical force against Vasconcellos was nonetheless precisely the type of 'difficult choice' the Second Circuit talked about in Walker . . . . A reasonable jury could easily conclude that once the chase was initiated, rightfully or wrongfully, a difficult choice was presented to the officers, and that for some reason short of premeditated murder —perhaps some deficiency in training that made the officers misperceive the situation, or something intrinsic about one or more of the officers that could and should have been addressed through appropriate supervision—one or more of the officers made the fatally wrong choice. In short, what happened on the night Dashawn Vasconcellos was shot and killed by the police, and whether the individual defendants truly violated Vasconcellos Constitutional rights are open questions, preluding summary judgment in favor of the City on the Monell claim. The City's insistence that the record of the shooting can only be construed as being the cold blooded execution of Vasconcellos would certainly have been in the light most favorable to plaintiff had this been a motion for summary judgment in favor of the individual defendants. However, this is a motion for dismissal of the Monell claims against the City defendant only. The construal of the record on this motion must therefore be in the light most favorable to plaintiff on this motion. Plaintiff's argument in the present motion is not necessarily that the officers murdered Vasconcellos in cold blood, but that they killed an unarmed man for lack of proper training in handling the particular situation and for firing multiple, and an excessive number of rounds without assessing the situation properly. It is clear that a rational jury might very well conclude that this was a cold blooded execution by rogue cops for which the City is not liable. But a rational jury looking at conflicting testimonies as they are now known might indicate that the officers shot an unarmed man as a result of poor training, or that the shooting was enabled by the City's failure to supervise one or more of the individual defendants. The City's motion for summary judgment is denied.")

The plaintiff in Walker did state a claim against the City based on "a complete failure by the DA in 1971 to train ADAs on fulfilling Brady obligations." 974 F.2d at 300. The Brady standard was not so obvious or easy to apply as to require no training. Id. But see Burge v. Parish of St. Tammany, 187 F.3d 452, 475 (5th Cir. 1999)(Burge III) ("Under the record evidence, however, the cause of the violation cannot be attributed reasonably to the District Attorney's failure to adequately supervise or train his personnel or to diligently seek Brady material from the Sheriff's Office. The undisclosed evidence favorable to the defense was of such a quality and quantity that any reasonably qualified and experienced prosecuting attorney would have recognized it as Brady material that he was required to disclose. The assistant district attorneys who reviewed the Burge file possessed credentials even superior to those reasonably required by their positions. Thus, there was no obvious need for more or different training to enable them to recognize the particular undisclosed Brady material in this case and know that they were required to disclose it.").

Although the court rejected plaintiff's "obviousness" theory as to the New York City Police Department defendants, it concluded that the claim could withstand summary judgment if plaintiff could "produce some evidence that policymakers were aware of a pattern of perjury by police officers but failed to institute appropriate training or supervision. . . . " 974 F.2d at 300. Accord Carter v. City of Philadelphia, 181 F.3d 339, 357 (3d Cir. 1999).

See also Ambrose v. City of New York, No. 02-CV-10200 (KMK), 2009 WL 890106, at *20, *21 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 31, 2009) ("As to Defendants' final argument − that the 'obligation not to ... prosecute innocent individuals is so obvious that no training ... is required' − they rely on Walker v. City of New York, which rejects rather than supports their position. . . . Though the plaintiff in Walker had 'not expressly alleged a history of police perjury,' the Second Circuit reversed the district court's dismissal of his Monell claims, holding that he 'should be allowed to pursue discovery in order to determine whether there was a practice of condoning perjury . . . or a pattern of police misconduct sufficient to require the police department to train and supervise police officers to assure they tell the truth.' . . Accordingly, the Court concludes that Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged that the City is liable for causing, through its failure to train, supervise, or discipline, its employees, the false arrest and malicious prosecution of Plaintiff in violation of his Fourth Amendment rights. Defendants' motion to dismiss those claims against the City is therefore denied."); Davis v. Schule, 1993 WL 58408, *2 (E.D.N.Y. March 4, 1993) (not reported) ("Under the 'duty to train' theory as explicated in City of Canton v. Harris [cite omitted], a plaintiff's claim against a municipality with respect to perjured evidence might survive summary judgment, despite the fact that the duty not to commit perjury is obvious to all without training and supervision, if a plaintiff could produce evidence that 'policymakers were aware of a pattern of perjury by police officers but failed to institute appropriate training or supervision.").

4. Illustrative Post-Canton Cases

a. "obviousness" cases

For examples of cases in which courts have found the evidence sufficient to put to a jury the issue of municipal liability based on a failure to train or supervise in an area where the need for training or supervision is obvious, see, e.g., Favors v. City of Atlanta, 849 F. App'x 813, 817-22 (11th Cir. 2021) ("We begin by addressing whether the City was on notice of the need to train in the particular area that allegedly caused the constitutional violation here—namely the use of deadly force in apprehending a suspect in a vehicle. . . The district court found the City was on notice. Specifically, it found that 'the City was on notice of the need to train its officers about the proper justifications for the use of deadly force and of using such force by shooting into vehicles to stop fleeing felons,' including the 'precise type of situation' that Thompson faced. The court noted the repeated incidents of APD officers shooting into vehicles, including two reported incidents (and a potential unreported incident) in 2013, two in 2014, and six in 2015, the year Thompson shot Favors. . .Given this evidence, the court ruled that the City should know to a 'moral certainty' that its officers would be 'required to deal with suspects attempting to flee in vehicles and need to know when the use of deadly force is appropriate.' The City does not contest the district court's determination and agrees that the 'undisputed evidence ... showed that the City was on notice that its officers needed training on the use of deadly force.'. . . In granting judgment to the City as a matter of law, the district court focused its analysis on the number of hours of training Thompson received overall. The court relied on the fact that the APD provided additional basic training beyond that required by the Peace Officers Standards and Training Counsel. The court also observed that the City maintained written policies regarding the appropriate use of deadly force. And it ultimately decided that this record foreclosed a failure-to-train theory of liability. The City echoes this reasoning on appeal. We conclude the district court's, and the City's, focus is misplaced. To be sure, the record shows that Thompson received training on the use of force generally and also received annual in-service training. But the question is whether such training addresses the scenario the City was on notice to prepare for—the fact that its police officers would be 'required to deal with suspects attempting to flee in vehicles and need to know when the use of deadly force is appropriate.' . . . That Thompson received training on other matters of firearm usage is no answer to whether he received adequate training on the 'usual and recurring' use of deadly force when pursuing a suspect fleeing in a vehicle. . .The district court did not discuss this Court's precedent in Depew or Vineyard. Instead, it relied on out-of-circuit authority to find that a record of some training undercuts a finding of deliberate indifference. . . But that is not the law in this circuit. As this Court made clear in Gold, deliberate indifference can be shown by 'evidence that the municipality knew of a need to train and/or supervise in a particular area and the municipality made a deliberate choice not to take any action.'. . When we evaluate the evidence of the City's training on the use of deadly force with respect to a suspect in a moving vehicle, we find that genuine disputes of material fact remain. Favors presented evidence that the City failed to provide Thompson with annual training on the circumstances that justify the use of deadly force under O.C.G.A. § 17-4-20. The City also failed to provide Thompson with a copy of the statute, as required. . . . Favors also presented evidence showing that in 2015, when the shooting occurred, the City had six reported incidents in which officers discharged their firearms into a vehicle. But none of the reports prepared for these incidents contained information regarding the facts justifying the shootings, or documentation of a supervisor's evaluation of the shootings. There was also a lack of incident reports with proper information and evaluation for the years 2013 and 2014 as well. These incomplete reports are contrary to APD.SOP.3010's reporting requirements. In addition to this evidence, Favors offered expert testimony that proper documentation and review following the use of force are important in reducing the number of such occurrences. . . . Finally, we dispatch with the notion that the City cannot be held liable for a failure to train that results in an officer's use of deadly force. In arguing for affirmance, the City says Thompson 'made an individual decision to shoot at the moving SUV which resulted in [Favors] being shot.' This characterization, however, is belied by the frequency and predictability of the scenario Thompson faced, which the City itself acknowledged it was on notice to address. . . .We have held that a single constitutional violation may establish municipal liability when there is 'sufficient independent proof that the moving force of the violation was a municipal policy or custom.'. . The City argues that Favors has provided 'no link' between the City's training and his constitutional injury. This record suggests otherwise. For instance, Favors provided evidence that Thompson was not trained in the use of less-than-lethal force in the 22 months leading up to the shooting. Favors's expert stated that this lack of training 'possibly caused' Thompson to resort to lethal force. He opined that Thompson's 'immediate[ ] resort[ ] to a lethal force option' reflected the fact that the only training besides defensive tactics that Thompson had received since he graduated from the police academy was to use lethal force. The expert witness stated that officers typically 'fall back"'on their training, 'especially in a time of a real or perceived crisis.' Our precedent indicates that this kind of expert testimony can create a genuine dispute of material fact. . . . Because triable issues remain on Favors's municipal liability claim, we vacate the entry of summary judgment to the City and remand for further proceedings."); Kirkpatrick v. County of Washoe, 843 F.3d 784, 794-97 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) ("Contrary to the dissent's suggestion, evidence of a pattern of constitutional violations is not always required to succeed on a Monell claim. . . The Supreme Court has reaffirmed that 'in a narrow range of circumstances' a particular 'showing of "obviousness" can substitute for the pattern of violations ordinarily necessary to establish municipal culpability.'. . Such a situation is 'rare'—'the unconstitutional consequences of failing to train' must be 'patently obvious' and the violation of a protected right must be a 'highly predictable consequence' of the decision not to train. . . . The County does not dispute that, at the time of B.W.'s seizure, it had no policy or procedures for obtaining warrants before removing children from parental custody, or for training its social workers to recognize that a warrant may be required. The lack of a formal policy is not necessarily unconstitutional if DSS removes children only in cases in which the removal is justified by exigent circumstances. . . .However, the evidence that the social workers violated B.W.'s Fourth Amendment rights, in conjunction with Wilcox and Kennedy's testimony that the County had no policy of obtaining warrants before removing children from parental custody and that it was social workers' regular practice to remove children regardless of the risk of imminent bodily harm, raises more than a spectre of deliberate indifference by Washoe County. . . This is therefore a case in which the municipality's 'inadequacy [is] so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights' that a jury could reasonably find § 1983 liability without needing a pattern of violations to find the County culpable. . . . Given the work performed by DSS social workers, the need for DSS to train its employees on the constitutional limitations of separating parents and children is 'so obvious' that its failure to do so is 'properly ... characterized as "deliberate indifference" to [the] constitutional rights' of Washoe County families. . . Accordingly, a question of material fact exists regarding whether Washoe County maintained an unconstitutional, unofficial policy. Summary judgment on this claim is inappropriate.") [But see Kirkpatrick v. County of Washoe, 843 F.3d 784, 802 (9th Cir. 2016) (en banc) (Kozinski, J., joined by O'Scannlain, Rawlinson, and Bea, JJ., and Watford, J., joining with respect to Part 2, dissenting in part) (" 'A pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees is "ordinarily necessary" to demonstrate deliberate indifference for purposes of failure to train.' Connick, 563 U.S. at 62 (emphasis added) (citation omitted). Here, there is no evidence that the County unconstitutionally removed any other child because it failed to train social workers on how to get warrants. The majority derives a pattern from a single data point. * * * The majority gets it almost right. I dissent because, when life or death are concerned, 'almost right' isn't.")]; Shadrick v. Hopkins Cnty., Ky., 805 F.3d 724, 740-41 (6th Cir. 2015) ("LPN nurses complete a level of medical training, they obtain a Kentucky license, and they arrive on the job with a limited set of medical skills. . . . It is predictable that placing an LPN nurse lacking the specific tools to handle the situations she will inevitably confront in the jail setting will lead to violation of the constitutional rights of inmates. A reasonable jury, therefore, could determine that SHP's failure to train and supervise its LPN nurses in meeting their constitutional obligations demonstrates SHP's own deliberate indifference to the highly predictable consequence that an LPN nurse will commit a constitutional violation. . . A jury could find that 'the unconstitutional consequences of failing to train' are 'so patently obvious' that SHP should be held 'liable under § 1983 without proof of a pre-existing pattern of violations.'. . The lack of training and supervision by SHP is clearly evidenced by the blanket inability of the LPN nurses who worked at HCDC to identify and discuss the requirements of SHP's written policies governing their work. . . .Most troubling is the admission of Angela Pleasant, SHP's on-site nursing manager at HCDC, that she was not familiar with the SHP policies she was specifically designated to enforce. Key here also is her open acknowledgement that SHP nurses followed an undocumented policy and custom of providing medical assistance only if an inmate asked for it, despite the existence of written policies, procedures, and treatment protocols mandating that nurses take particular actions at particular times. Two high-level supervisors disclaimed any responsibility for training and supervising the LPN nurses. . . .Shadrick traced the lack of adequate training and supervision to the top of SHP's organization. . . . Shadrick's expert witness opined that SHP failed to provide adequate training and supervision to the LPN nurses. . . Taking this evidence in a light most favorable to Shadrick, . . . a reasonable jury could find that SHP was deliberately indifferent to the need to train and supervise its LPN nurses to provide adequate medical care to inmates, especially in view of the obvious risk that the Constitution could be violated without such training and supervision. . . . Neither the Supreme Court's decision in Connick nor this court's decision in D'Ambrosio v. Marino, 747 F.3d 378 (6th Cir.2014), compel a different result."); Conn v. City of Reno, 591 F.3d 1081, 1103 (9th Cir. 2010) (order and amended opinion, denying rehearing en banc) ("The failure to train officers on how to identify and when to report suicide risks produces a 'highly predictable consequence': that police officers will fail to respond to serious risks of suicide and that constitutional violations will ensue."), cert. granted, judgment vacated and remanded in light of Connick v. Thompson, 131 S. Ct. 1350 (2011) and on remand, Conn v. City of Reno, 658 F.3d 897 (9th Cir. 2011) ("We reinstate the opinion at 591 F.3d 1081, except that in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Connick v. Thompson, 131 S.Ct. 1350 (2011), we affirm in all respects the district court's grant of summary judgment as to municipality liability."); Moldowan v. City of Warren, 578 F.3d 351, 393 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Because we already have determined that the police have a duty to preserve and turn over to the prosecutor evidence that the police recognize as having exculpatory value or where the exculpatory value of the evidence is apparent, Harris dictates that the City has a corresponding obligation to adequately train its officers in that regard."); Gregory v. City of Louisville, 444 F.3d 725, 754 (6th Cir. 2006) ("This Court finds that the district court erred when it failed to consider that evidence of failure to train on the proper handling of exculpatory materials has the 'highly predictable consequence' of constitutional violations. . . A custom of failing to train its officers on the handling of exculpatory materials is sufficient to establish the requisite fault on the part of the City and the causal connection to the constitutional violations experienced by Plaintiff. . . Plaintiff has carried his burden for summary judgment. . . . We therefore reverse the district court's grant on summary judgment to the City on Plaintiff's Monell liability theory for failure to train on the handling of exculpatory materials."); Young v. City of Providence, 404 F.3d 4, 28, 29 (1st Cir. 2005) ("Although there was no evidence of a prior friendly fire shooting, a jury could find from the testimony of Commissioner Partington, Melaragno, and Boehm that the department knew that there was a high risk that absent particularized training on avoiding off-duty misidentifications, and given the department's always armed/always on-duty policy, friendly fire shootings were likely to occur. A jury could conclude that the severity of the consequences of a friendly fire shooting forced the department to take notice of the high risk despite the rarity of such an incident. Dr. Fyfe's report could lead the jury to conclude that it was common knowledge within the police community that the risk of friendly fire shootings with an always armed/always on-duty policy was substantial, and it was also common knowledge that particularized training on on-duty/off-duty interactions (and particularly on the risk of misidentifications) was required to lessen this risk. . . We think, in short, that the jury could find that the department knew that a friendly fire shooting in violation of the Fourth Amendment was a predictable consequence of the PPD's failure to train on on-duty/off-duty interactions, and therefore that the department was deliberately indifferent to Cornel's constitutional rights."); A.M. v. Luzerne County Juvenile Detention Center, 372 F.3d 572, 583 (3d Cir. 2004) (In our view, the evidence supports an inference that the potential for conflict between residents of the Center was high. Taken as a whole, we believe the evidence concerning the Center's failure to train its child-care workers in areas that would reduce the risk of a resident being deprived of his constitutional right to security and well-being was sufficient to prevent the grant of summary judgment."); Flores v. Morgan Hill Unified School District, 324 F.3d 1130, 1136 (9th Cir. 2003) ("The plaintiffs have also produced sufficient evidence that the defendants failed to adequately train teachers, students, and campus monitors about the District's policies prohibiting harassment on the basis of sexual orientation. The record contains evidence that training regarding sexual harassment was limited and did not specifically deal with sexual orientation discrimination. The defendants also inadequately communicated District anti-harassment policies to students despite defendants' awareness of hostility toward homosexual students at the schools, and in some cases despite plaintiffs' requests to do so. A jury may conclude, based on this evidence, that there was an obvious need for training and that the discrimination the plaintiffs faced was a highly predictable consequence of the defendants not providing that training."); Miranda v. Clark County, Nevada, 319 F.3d 465, 471 (9th Cir. 2003) (en banc) ("The complaint . . . construed liberally, alleges not merely an isolated assignment of an inexperienced lawyer, but a deliberate pattern and policy of refusing to train lawyers for capital cases known to the county administrators to exert unusual demands on attorneys. Under pleading standards now applicable, see Galbraith, 307 F.3d at ee a1125, the allegations are sufficient to create a claim of 'deliberate indifference to constitutional rights' in the failure to train lawyers to represent clients accused of capital offenses."); Sell v. City of Columbus, No. 00-4467, 2002 WL 2027113, at *9 (6th Cir. Aug. 23, 2002) (unpublished) ("If Columbus failed to instruct or train the officers responsible for emergency evictions about their constitutional responsibility to provide a hearing in all but 'extraordinary situations' where exigent circumstances preclude them from doing so, . . . that shortcoming is one that is so likely to lead a violation of the constitutional right to due process as to be deliberate indifference to citizens' constitutional rights, and give rise to municipal liability under § 1983."); Brown v. Gray, 227 F.3d 1278, 1290 (10th Cir. 2000) ("The always armed/always on duty policy was part of the Department's written regulations. Expert testimony established that always armed/always on duty policies present serious safety risks, to officers and to the public, if officers are not trained in off-shift implementation. Captain O'Neill knew to a moral certainty that the policy would result in some officers taking police action while off-shift, yet he pursued a training program that did not adequately prepare the officers to do so. The failure to train officers in implementing this policy was, by Captain O'Neill's own admission, a conscious decision based on the perception that on-and-off-shift situations were the same. The jury was thus presented with sufficient information to conclude that Denver policymakers were aware of and deliberately indifferent to the risks presented by the training program's deficiencies."); Allen v. Muskogee, 119 F.3d 837, 843, 844 (10th Cir. 1997) ("When read as a whole and viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff as the party opposing summary judgment, the record supports an inference that the City trained its officers to leave cover and approach armed suicidal, emotionally disturbed persons and to try to disarm them, a practice contrary to proper police procedures and tactical principles. . . . The evidence is sufficient to support an inference that the need for different training was so obvious and the inadequacy so likely to result in violation of constitutional rights that the policymakers of the City could reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need."); Zuchel v. City and County of Denver, 997 F.2d 730, 741 (10th Cir. 1993) (finding evidence clearly sufficient to permit jury reasonably to infer that Denver's failure to implement recommended periodic live "shoot-don't shoot" range training constituted deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of Denver citizens.); Davis v. Mason County, 927 F.2d 1473, 1483 (9th Cir. 1991) ("Mason County's failure to train its officers in the legal limits of the use of force constituted 'deliberate indifference' to the safety of its inhabitants as a matter of law."), cert. denied, 112 S. Ct. 275 (1991).

See also Monteiro v. Cormier, No. 121CV00046MSMLDA, 2023 WL 6314658, at *9 (D.R.I. Sept. 28, 2023) ("Unlike the situation in, for example, Seekamp v. Michaud, 109 F.3d 802, 808 (1st Cir. 1997), where the police had received some training in high-speed chases, the evidence here could support a finding of no training by the PPD in DNA. There is no dispute that the only training Pawtucket officers in general, and Det. Cormier in particular, had received in DNA was

how to take a swab. . . In an era when DNA testing is an established tool of law enforcement investigations, and the PPD had been using DNA evidence since 2005, a jury could find that total failure grossly negligent. Moreover, Mr. Monteiro has proffered the opinion of Sue Peters, a retained consultant in police protocols. Ms. Peters' declaration offers the opinion that a detective investigating major crimes, as Det. Cormier did, could be expected to have received sufficient training to understand how DNA evidence worked before applying for a warrant and making an arrest. . . Ms. Peters' opinion is that training in Pawtucket fell 'well below the standards of practice in law enforcement criminal investigations,'. . . and that the warrant affidavit included information 'that was misrepresented, not factual, and unverified.'. . PPD officers received no training in how to draft applications for warrants, what those applications should include, or how they should handle exculpatory evidence. There was no policy in place mandating inclusion of any exculpatory evidence in warrant applications, nor was there any policy in place requiring oversight by supervisors before warrants were sought. . . In addition to the overall situation regarding training, Pawtucket as an entity had specific knowledge about Det. Cormier's alleged shortcomings, even if individual supervisors did not. She had received the lowest grade in the police training academy and supervisors had reported inadequate investigations after she made detective. In her early career, she was reprimanded for not properly investigating 40 cases, but was required to follow up with a supervisor for only a month. . .The plaintiff has produced sufficient evidence to warrant a denial of Pawtucket's claim for summary judgment."); Ratlieff v. City of Fort Lauderdale, Florida, No. 22-CV-61029-RAR, 2023 WL 3750581, at *16-17 (S.D. Fla. June 1, 2023) ('The 'so obvious' theory of failure to train liability was first articulated in City of Canton, where the Supreme Court left open the possibility that a municipality could be liable in the absence of a pattern of similar constitutional violations. . . . Here, Ratlieff does not allege the need to train the City's officers was 'so obvious.' Thus, clarification is needed to the extent she intends to travel under this theory, and the Court will afford Ratlieff an opportunity to amend her complaint. . . In granting leave, however, the Court emphasizes the narrowness of this theory. . . Ratlieff must establish that the need to train officers in the use of KIPs [kinetic impact projectiles] was 'obvious' enough to trigger municipal liability without any evidence of prior incidents putting the municipality on notice—a high bar under existing caselaw."); Martinez v. City of Santa Rosa, No. 20-CV-04135-VC, 2020 WL 6503406, at *2 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 5, 2020) ("The plaintiffs . . . make various allegations about the City's inaction, including that Santa Rosa lacks any written policy on tear gas and has failed to train its officers in the use of chemical agents and less-lethal projectiles. As discussed at the hearing, the Court has concerns about the veracity of these allegations. But that's not a reason to grant a motion to dismiss. . . And the allegations, if they somehow turn out to be true, describe a failure to train so colossal that it reflects deliberate indifference by the City towards the constitutional rights of its citizens. . . The City notes that a single failure by a municipality to prepare police officers for a particular scenario cannot give rise to municipal liability unless it is a scenario that the municipality knows will arise frequently. . . But that's what the complaint describes. Although a police department may not need to use tear gas frequently, it certainly needs to engage in crowd control frequently, and that would be obvious to any municipality (particularly a city like Santa Rosa, the largest city in, and the business center of, Sonoma County). It would thus be obvious to the City that it needed to train its officers in crowd control, including in the use of major crowd-control tools like the tear gas it had on hand for this very purpose."); Smith v. City of Greensboro, No. 1:19CV386, 2020 WL 1452114, at *11–12 (M.D.N.C. Mar. 25, 2020) ("Plaintiffs have alleged, with appropriate specificity, certain deficiencies in the way Greensboro trains its officers to use hobble restraints. [court lists specific allegations] The second factor—whether the training represents a deliberate or conscious choice by the municipality, made with indifference to the rights of its citizens—likewise finds support in the complaint's factual allegations. . . . Here, Plaintiffs have alleged that Greensboro was aware that the improper use of a hobble restraint could result in severe injury. The Directive acknowledges that placing undue stress on an arrestee's chest and diaphragm can 'contribute to positional asphyxia.'. . Further, the manufacturer's warning accompanying RIPP Hobbles allegedly contains the admonition 'NEVER Hog-Tie a Prisoner,' the inference being that hogtying is dangerous. . . Thus, it is at least plausible that Greensboro understood that, without appropriate training, its officers in the field would use hobble restraints in a manner which violated citizens' rights to be free from excessive force. . . . [T]he complaint alleges that Greensboro fails to train its officers on how to safely restrain people who, like Smith, are in the 'throes of a mental health crisis.'. . Therefore, Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged an 'affirmative link' between the violation of Smith's rights and the inadequacy of the training provided: that while Greensboro officers are equipped with hobbles, in the absence of proper training, there is a 'reasonable probability' that they will use those hobbles in an excessive fashion. In sum, the complaint contains factual allegations supporting each element of a failure-to-train claim. . . . Accordingly, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs have sufficiently pleaded a Monell claim against Greensboro for failing to train its officers with respect to the improper use of hobble restraints."); Thomas v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 17-4196, 2019 WL 4039575, at *22 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 27, 2019) ("Although the defendants are free to argue to the jury that the alleged misconduct was not obvious to City policymakers, the evidence on record could convince a jury otherwise. Indeed, a contrary ruling at this stage of the case would 'put a premium on blinders.'. . . As discussed above, there is some admissible evidence that Detectives Devlin and Worrell used force and various threats to coerce the Stallworths into testifying against the plaintiff and that they did not include exculpatory evidence in their affidavit of probable cause for the plaintiff's arrest warrant. There is also evidence that Detectives Devlin and Worrell, and other Police Department officers, engaged in similar misconduct on multiple occasions in the early 1990s. Detectives Devlin and Worrell both testified that they were not trained to include exculpatory information in affidavits of probable cause. And other police officers have testified that there was no policy prohibiting the use of low-level force in interrogation rooms in the 1990s. A reasonable jury could find that City policymakers were aware that Department officers, particularly homicide detectives, would repeatedly be in a position to interrogate suspects and witnesses and submit affidavits of probable cause. A reasonable jury could also find that that these situations create a difficult choice 'because the officers will be motivated to bring a suspect to justice,' and that the wrong choice by officers will frequently cause deprivation of constitutional rights. . . In the face of this need to train, supervise, and discipline police officers, a reasonable jury may conclude that the City's inaction 'communicated a message of approval' regarding Detectives Devlin's and Worrell's alleged conduct. . . Therefore, it is for the jury to decide if the City's alleged failure to train, supervise, and discipline in this case rises to the level of deliberate indifference.");Virgil v. City of Newport, No. CV 16-224-DLB-CJS, 2018 WL 344986, at *15 (E.D. Ky. Jan. 9, 2018), aff'd, 745 F. App'x 618 (6th Cir. 2018) ("In this case, Virgil has not alleged a pattern of constitutional violations. Instead, he has alleged that the City of Newport acted with deliberate indifference in failing to train its police officers regarding 'prompt disclosure of ... evidence that exonerates a defendant following his arrest or conviction' and fabrication of evidence. . . Virgil's allegations, taken as true, fall within the 'narrow range of circumstances' that the Supreme Court contemplated in Harris. Connick, 563 U.S. at 63, 70 (holding that failure to train prosecutors in their Brady obligations did not satisfy the single-incident liability theory, but noting that police officers are not "equipped with the tools to find, interpret, and apply legal principles," absent training). In support of his claim, Virgil has put forth factual allegations detailing the Individual Newport Defendants' fabrication of inculpatory evidence and withholding of exculpatory evidence. Along with those allegations, Virgil claims that the City of Newport failed to train its officers on their duty to disclose exculpatory evidence and the impropriety of fabricating evidence. . . 'Given the known frequency with which police' obtain exculpatory evidence and their obligation to collect reliable evidence, the City of Newport's alleged failure to train constitutes deliberate indifference to the 'highly predictable consequence' of the violations of criminal defendants' constitutional rights. . . Moreover, Virgil has adequately alleged that the failure to train was the 'moving force' behind the violation of his constitutional rights. . . Therefore, the Second Amended Complaint has sufficiently stated a § 1983 failure-to-train claim."); Manzanillo v. Lewis, No. 12-CV-05983-JST, 2017 WL 131979, at *10 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 12, 2017) ("In a failure-to-train case, . . a plaintiff need not always prove that there have been repeated violations. Even in the absence of a prior pattern of constitutional violations, Canton instructs that in some situations the need for training is 'so obvious' and 'so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights,' that 'the failure to provide proper training may fairly be said to represent a policy for which the city is responsible, and for which the city may be held liable if it actually causes injury.'. . In the rare case, 'a particular showing of obviousness can substitute for the pattern of violations ordinarily necessary to establish municipal culpability.'. . If a violation of a protected right is a 'highly predictable consequence' of a decision not to train, it is possible to establish a 'failure in a ... training program ... so obviously deficient that it could lead to liability for damages resulting from a single violation.'. . A complete absence of training supports an inference of deliberate indifference. . .As previously noted, many witnesses testified that Control Booth Officer on-the-job training is not effective unless the trainee officer observes inmate movement and actually works the control panel to operate the doors in the SHU. . . .Moreover, because the purpose of control booth training is in large part to prevent violence against inmates and staff, a reasonable factfinder could conclude that the violation of an inmate's protected rights would be a 'highly predictable consequence' of the prison's decision not to properly train Brown."); Alcis v. Sch. Dist. of Philadelphia, No. CV 16-1684, 2016 WL 7209938, at *7 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 13, 2016) ("[P]laintiffs have alleged circumstances in which a constitutional violation was a 'highly predictable' result of defendants' failure to train or supervise their employees. The Second Amended Complaint avers that defendants had a policy which limited the circumstances in which students were allowed to use the bathroom. . . As the teacher responsible for supervising Alain and Benjamin on the trip to the bathroom, Ms. Furley was responsible for enforcing this policy. . . 'Despite their awareness of the risk of sexual assault,' defendants did not train or supervise teachers in enforcing this policy. . . In sum, plaintiffs allege that defendants were aware of a risk of sexual assault involved when students used the bathroom at the same time and had a policy in place to prevent this situation from occurring. A sexual assault between two students in a bathroom together and unsupervised is thus a highly predictable consequence of failing to train or supervise the teachers in charge of enforcing this policy. The Court thus concludes that plaintiffs have adequately pled the elements of a Monell claim against defendants."); Askew v. City of Memphis, No. 14-CV-02080-STA-TMP, 2016 WL 3748609, at *12-14 (W.D. Tenn. July 8, 2016) ("Here, there is no evidence in the record showing 'prior instances of unconstitutional conduct demonstrating that [Defendant City] has ignored a history of abuse and was clearly on notice that the training in this particular area was deficient and likely to cause injury.'. . Therefore, to survive summary judgment, Plaintiffs must point to evidence in the record showing (1) disputed issues of fact as to whether Askew's rights were violated when he was shot, which, as noted previously, they have already done, and (2) disputed issues of fact showing that Defendant City failed to train Defendant Officers 'to handle recurring situations presenting an obvious potential for such a violation.' Plaintiffs must set forth facts to indicate that there was a 'likelihood that the situation would recur' and that it was predictable 'that an officer lacking specific tools to handle that situation would violate citizens' rights.'. . The Court finds that there is evidence in the record which, if believed by the trier of fact, shows 'a likelihood that the situation would recur.' Officer Randolph testified that he had been confronted with the situation of 'a guy passed out behind the wheel dozens of times.'. . Additionally, Defendant Officer Aufdenkamp testified that 'while being a police officer, I've dealt with people slumped back' in a vehicle.' There is also evidence in the record from which the trier of fact could find that Defendant Officers lacked the 'specific tools' or training to handle the situation of such a high risk stop. The evidence shows that Defendant Officers Aufdenkamp and Dyess received basic training on search and seizure and the use of force, including deadly force, under the Fourth Amendment, and this training complies with the State of Tennessee's requirements for training. . . Each officer also received forty hours of in-service training each calendar year of employment. . . Defendant Officer Dyess testified in his deposition that he had received training in how to approach a vehicle in an unknown situation, DUI detection, and the use of force in a deadly force situation. . . However, he acknowledged that '[t]here is no specific guideline for an unknown risk traffic stop where the occupant may be drunk.' From this evidence, the trier of fact could find that Defendant City failed to adequately train MPD officers in how to effectuate high risk stops and that failure was the 'moving force' that resulted in Askew's death and the violation of his constitutional rights. . . Thus, Plaintiffs have presented sufficient evidence to survive summary judgment on their failure to train claim, and this portion of Defendant City's motion is DENIED."); Schaefer v. Whitted, 121 F. Supp. 3d 701, 719-20 (W.D. Tex. 2015) ("Plaintiff's failure to train or supervise claims pass muster. Plaintiff alleges the City failed adequately train or supervisors its officers concerning: (a) the use of deadly force; (b) interactions with individuals legally entitled to possess and carry weapons; and (c) citizens' Second Amendment right to possess weapons for self-defense in their homes. . . To substantiate these claims, Plaintiff alleges the City does not 'properly train officers on how to interact with [lawfully armed citizens], or educate them on the laws concerning the lawful possession of weapons and the rights of citizens to lawfully possess weapons' nor does it 'train officers about the legal distinction between possessing weapons in one's home versus public areas.'. . Plaintiff also alleges the City 'trains its officers it is always permissible to shoot a person with a weapon, even when the officer has been given a warning and the arrested citizen is non-threatening'. . . Plaintiff alleges the City knew the 'obvious consequences of these policies was that City of Austin Police officers would be placed in recurring situations' similar to those faced by Officer Whitted, 'these policies made it highly predictable that the particular violations alleged here ... would result,' and yet with deliberate indifference to Schaefer's rights, failed to train its officers in these areas. . . While Plaintiff fails to allege sufficient instances of similar past conduct by City police tending to substantiate the claim they were subjectively aware of the risk of failing to train its police force, . . . the Court finds, taking Plaintiff's allegations as true, 'the need for more or different training [was] obvious, the inadequacy so likely to result in violations of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the city can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.'. . Indeed, it is highly predictable failing to train officers regarding how to act with individuals legally entitled to carry firearms would result in the constitutional violation alleged here and this failure to train was a moving force behind Schaefer's death. Because these allegations refer to 'the specific topic of the challenged policy or training inadequacy,'. . . they provide the City with adequate notice of the claims against it. Accordingly, Defendants' motion to dismiss is DENIED as to these claims."); Roberts v. Town of Bridgewater, No. 15-10266-DJC, 2015 WL 4550783, at *5 (D. Mass. July 28, 2015) ("Accepting the allegations as true, then, the Court can infer, at least, a municipal custom of providing inadequate training to its officers in takedown and arrest techniques, . . . which is an area where the need for 'training is so obvious' that its absence is 'likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights' such that the Town 'can reasonably be said to have been reasonably indifferent to the need.'"); M.H. v. County of Alameda, 62 F.Supp.3d 1049, (N.D. Cal. 2014) ("As in Gibson, 'a jury could conclude that County policymakers knew that inevitably some prisoners arrive at the jail with urgent health problems requiring hospitalization.'. . Here, the County was on notice of the dangers of alcohol withdrawal in inmates, a recurring problem in correctional facilities. Indeed, its own policies appear to provide for training that, a reasonable jury could find, was never provided, or was not provided adequately. . . Plaintiffs may prevail at trial on their failure to train claim without showing a pattern of constitutional violations because a jury may find that the failure to provide Harrison adequate medical care – a constitutional right held by pre-trial detainees – was a ' "highly predictable consequence of a failure to equip law enforcement officers with specific tools to handle recurring situations[]'. . . . " Finally, a reasonable jury could conclude that the County's policy and practice failures were the 'actionable cause' of, or 'moving force' behind, the County's failure to provide adequate medical care to Harrison. . . As discussed above, there were several opportunities for County personnel to prevent the onset of Delirium Tremens, or, at a minimum, to detect its onset, provide adequate treatment, and transfer Harrison to a hospital in compliance with national and County standards. For these reasons, the Court will deny the County's motion for summary judgment with respect to Plaintiffs' Monell claims against it arising out of its training concerning alcohol withdrawal."); Lucas v. City of Visalia, No. 1:09–CV–1015 AWI JLT, 2013 WL 1915854, *19, *20 & n. 19 (E.D. Cal. May 8, 2013) ("This case reflects that the City dispatches its police officers in support of

'medical aid' calls. . . In a 'medical aid' call situation, it is foreseeable that police officers will deal with individuals who are upset, who do not want to receive medical treatment, and who do not want personnel to be present. Although there certainly may be overlap, it would seem that the concerns inherent in a medical aid call would not necessarily be the same as the concerns in a 'criminal investigation' call. . . .To be sure, the City contends that Lucas was not tased because he was refusing medical treatment. However, Lucas's position, that the officers should have left when Lucas refused treatment and were ordered all to leave, is not unreasonable, especially when the emergency personnel were out of the residence. . . If the officers had respected Lucas's refusal for treatment and left the residence at any one of Lucas's many requests, Esparza would not have used her taser. There appears to be no training regarding when force may be used in a medical aid call, whether it is appropriate to use a taser on someone who may be having medical problems, and how to deal with an individual who is refusing medical treatment. . .Given that City officers respond to medical aid calls, and considering that a different dynamic is likely to be involved in medical aid calls than in criminal investigation calls, a reasonable jury could find the absence of such training reflects deliberate indifference. Summary judgment on this theory of Monell liability will be denied. . . To be clear, the Court is not holding that police officers are to receive paramedic training. If a police officer either promptly summons medical assistance or takes an injured arrestee for medical treatment, then the officer meets his constitutional obligations. . . The Court is merely holding that, based on the evidence presented, there appears to be a different dynamic in a medical aid call. The absence of training concerning that different dynamic is problematic."); Guizan v. Town of Easton, No. 3:09cv1436 (JBA), 2012 WL 3775876, *20 (D. Conn. Aug. 29, 2012) ("Consistent with its own statement of purpose, that SWERT 'is formed for the purpose of providing for the rapid ... deployment of specially trained law enforcement personnel and resources to any incident involving tactical operations, ... or any situation requiring immediate augmentation of local law enforcement personnel to preserve life and protect property'. . . , a reasonable jury could conclude that the need to train SWERT officers in the constitutional limitations on the use of force associated with dynamic entry was 'so obvious' that 'failure to do so could properly be characterized as "deliberate indifference" to constitutional rights.'. . Thus, the Town Defendants are not entitled to summary judgment on Plaintiffs' municipal liability claims."); Campbell v. City of Springboro, Ohio, 788 F.Supp.2d 637, 678, 679 (S.D. Ohio 2011) ("The evidence related to the training and supervision of the SPD's canine unit is described in detail above. That evidence, when viewed in a light most favorable to Plaintiffs, at the very least creates a question of fact as to whether the need for more adequate supervision and training was so obvious and the likelihood that the inadequacy would result in the violation of constitutional rights was so great as to amount to deliberate indifference to Plaintiffs' rights. First and foremost, the evidence shows that Spike was not subject to continual and regular maintenance training although such training was necessary to prevent the deterioration of Spike's performance and responsiveness to Officer Clark's commands. . . .The evidence indicates that Officer Clark's inability to keep up with Spike's maintenance training resulted from a systematic lack of supervision and training throughout the upper levels of the police department. For example, the SPD never developed any clear guidelines for the operation of the canine unit. There are questions of fact as to whether the SPD actually adopted a formal canine policy prior to 2008. The policy that defendants claim was in force − an

IACP model policy that Officer Clark obtained from internet − was never disseminated amongst the staff and was not placed in all of the policy manuals. To the extent that Officer Clark's supervisors were aware of the policy, it provided only vague guidelines for training and certification. For example, the IACP Policy does not actually set out specific training requirements. Rather, it simply states that training requirements must be met. Neither Chief Kruithoff nor anyone else in the SPD ever set forth any written guidelines for the amount and type of training that the SPD would require its canine unit to complete. A policy stating that training requirements must be met is meaningless unless it also states what those requirements are. . . . The SPD never put into place any formal system for monitoring the canine unit. . . . Additionally, there is no evidence that the supervising officers received any training or instruction regarding the use of a police dog as a use of force. Furthermore, despite starting a canine unit, the SPD never amended its use of force policy to address canine use. . . . Indeed, the Court finds that when the evidence is viewed in a light most favorable to Plaintiffs, this is not simply a case in which the training could have been better or a case in which a sound training program was administered negligently. This is a case in which, aside from the initial training that Officer Clark and Spike undertook prior to Spike's certification, there was a complete, across the board absence of training and supervision with regard to the canine unit. Under such circumstances, the inadequate training and supervision may be fairly said to represent the policy of the city. Accordingly, the Court cannot at this point conclude as a matter of law that the City of Springboro could not be held liable for violations of Plaintiff's constitutional rights."); Buben v. City of Lone Tree, No. 08-cv-00127-WYD-MEH, 2010 WL 3894185, at *5, *6 (D. Colo. Sept. 30, 2010) ("Plaintiff contends that Lone Tree's written policy regarding TASER use is inadequate in that (1) it does not prohibit the use of TASERS against passively resisting subjects and (2) it does not prohibit the use of TASERS against a subject who is on an elevated surface. Plaintiff notes that warnings against the use of TASERS in these circumstances were clearly set forth in the TASER International training CD provided to Lone Tree. In order to establish municipal liability for inadequate training on the use of force, Plaintiff must demonstrate: (1) the Deputies exceeded constitutional limitations on the use of force; (2) the use of force arose under circumstances that constitute a usual and recurring situation with which police officers must deal; (3) the inadequate training demonstrates a deliberate indifference on the part of the city towards persons with whom the police officers come into contact, and (4) there is a direct causal link between the constitutional deprivation and the inadequate training. . . I find that Plaintiff has created disputed issues of fact as to all of these elements. First, Defendants concede that there are material issues of fact as to whether their actions exceed constitutional limitations on the use of force. As to the second factor, Plaintiff has come forward with a witness it will seek to qualify as an expert in police policies and procedures who will state that '[e]ncountering persons with abnormal mental conditions is a usual and recurring situation for police officers,' and that Lone Tree should have trained its police officers on how to deal with mentally ill persons. Similarly, there are disputed issues of fact as to whether the failure to train officers in specific skill needed to handle recurring situations − i.e. skills for interacting with mentally ill person and skills regarding the use of TASERS on individuals on elevated surfaces, or who are passively resisting − presented an obvious potential for constitutional violations rising to the level of deliberate indifference. . . It is undisputed that Lone Tree does not have a written policy specifically addressing the handling of mentally impaired individuals. It is also undisputed that Lone Tree's TASER policy does not contain a directive limiting TASER use to persons who are actively resistant, or a specific admonition concerning deployment of a TASER on a subject on an elevated surface. Plaintiff maintains that policies adopted by the International Association of Chiefs of Police ("IACP"), the Police Executive Research Forum ("PERF"), and numerous police departments prohibit use of a TASER on a passively resistant subject and individuals on an elevated surface. In addition, there are disputes as to whether Lone Tree provided adequate training in these areas. Sergeant Cavenah and Officer Berry testified that they could not recall specific training regarding dealing with mentally impaired individuals. In addition, Plaintiff has raised an issue of fact as to whether Sergeant Cavenah and Officer Berry were re-certified in TASER use at the time of the incident. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Lone Tree's failure to address these issues in a written policy or in its training may reasonably be seen by a jury as deliberate indifference to a foreseeable need. Finally, it is clear that the alleged constitutional violations are directly related to the allegations of inadequate training. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Defendants would not have needed to deploy their TASERS if they had other skills at their disposal, and they would not have disregarded the danger of deploying a TASER on an individual on an elevated surface. Because Plaintiff has demonstrated the existence of disputed issues of material fact, I find that summary judgment is inappropriate as to Plaintiff's Third Claim for Relief against Defendants Lone Tree and LPD for failure to train."); Bowen-Soto v. City of Liberal, Kan. No. 08-1171-MLB, 2010 WL 4643350, at *6 (D. Kan. Nov. 9, 2010) ("The court finds that a reasonable jury could find that defendant was aware of the risk it created by inadequately training its officers on hog-tying. As noted above, Supervisor Mulunax was aware of both the Cruz case and that other departments were experiencing in-custody deaths as a result of excited delirium. Yet, Supervisor Mulunax did not instruct his officers to not use the hog-tie restraint on individuals suffering from excited delirium. In fact, Supervisor Mulunax failed to inform his officers that the hog-tie restraint was inappropriate when restraining an individual with any type of diminished capacity. Defendant's officers were given the discretion to use the hog-tie restraint when dealing with a combative person. Thus, a reasonable jury could find that defendant was deliberately indifferent to people like Soto."); Montes v. County of El Paso, Tex., No. EP-09-CV-82-KC, 2010 WL 2035821, at *16, *17 (W.D. Tex. May 18, 2010) ("The Fifth Circuit has held that failure-to-supervise liability requires that 'it at least must have been obvious that the highly predictable consequence of not supervising its officers was that they would apply force in such a way that the Fourth Amendment rights of citizens were at risk.' Peterson v. City of Fort Worth, 588 F.3d 838, 850 (5th Cir.2009) . . . The Fifth Circuit has also stated that failure to take complaints and to discipline officers may give rise to municipal liability if there were policies of regularly ignoring complaints and failing to investigate alleged wrongdoing on the part of the officers. . . Plaintiffs' claims survive summary judgment on this point. It is at least arguable, on the evidence already adduced, that Gamboa was unduly absent from his office, that the supervisory system he set up using his senior staff was inadequate, and that the only system for monitoring the use of force − the taking of citizen complaints by members of the Precinct 6 Constable's office at large − was run in a way which actively degraded its effectiveness for this purpose. . . . Where the need to take some action to control government actors is obvious, and the existing policies are non-existent or clearly inadequate, a failure to act can count as a deliberate and actionable municipal policy choice. . . Both Gamboa, as Ramos's supervisor, and the County, as the ultimate policy-making body, arguably failed to implement adequate supervision and discipline. . . . At this point, the Court need not hold that it is conclusively proved that it was 'obvious that the highly predictable consequence' of these supervisory lapses was that Ramos would violate the Fourth Amendment rights of the Plaintiffs. . . The Court holds, however, that the County has not shown that such a jury finding would be unreasonable, given the evidence already adduced. . . There is some evidence that the County had a policy of inadequately supervising the constables, and that the lax systems left in place at the precinct levels could predictably result in unchecked patterns of police brutality. Under the Supreme Court's rule in City of Canton, where the need for municipal action to control police officers is 'obvious,' and the 'inadequacy' of existing policy is 'likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights' by those uncontrolled officers, governmental liability will attach. . . The evidence here at least plausibly meets this test, and so must go to a jury. Accordingly, summary judgment in favor of the County is inappropriate as to the failure to supervise and discipline theory."); Scozzari v. City of Clare, No. 08-10997-BC, 2010 WL 1626419, at *23 (E.D. Mich. Apr. 21, 2010) ("Based on the limited legal authority advanced by the City, the City has not demonstrated its entitlement to summary judgment. In particular, the City has not explained how such limited training, consisting of a 'module' on dealing with persons with mental problems and disabilities, is sufficient to establish that the City did not have a policy of deliberate indifference to individuals with mental health problems. There is at least a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the Officers knew, based on Scozzari's conduct and appearance, that Scozzari had mental health problems. There is also at least a genuine issue of material fact as to a causal connection between the Officers' conduct resulting in Scozzari's death and the Officers' lack of training on how to address individuals known to have mental health problems."); Lucas v. City of Visalia, No. 1:09-CV-1015 AWI DLB, 2010 WL 1444667, AT *5 (E.D. Cal. Apr. 12, 2010) ("Police officers encounter many different persons in a variety of situations. As illustrated by this case, it is foreseeable that police officers will often deal with persons who need or appear to need medical treatment. The absence of training regarding individuals who refuse medical treatment, like the absence of monitoring, investigating, and discipline for excessive force, could indicate deliberate indifference. Lucas has stated a Monell claim regarding the absence of training about the appropriateness of using a taser on someone who refuses to receive medical treatment. . . . However, it is not apparent to the Court that the absence of training regarding shocking individuals with episodic seizures amounts to deliberate indifference. Lucas is focusing on a very specific medical condition. There are myriad medical conditions that may afflict a given person/suspect, and it is not reasonable to expect police officers to be trained as to every condition. It may well be that officers should be trained regarding taser use on persons with known seizure disorders, but additional allegations are necessary to show deliberate indifference. By way of example, an allegation that the City knew that its officers would likely encounter individuals who experience episodic seizures, knew that shocking such individuals involved a significant risk of injury/danger, and yet chose not to train on the issue could show deliberate indifference. . . Since it is not clear that amendment would be futile, the Court will dismiss with leave to amend the Monell claim that is based on the absence of training regarding the dangers of using tasers on, and administering multiple taser shocks to, persons with a history of episodic seizures."); Wilhere v. Delaware County, Civil Action No. 09-22, 2010 WL 1381664, at *8, *9 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 1, 2010) ("The county's training for the use of a taser satisfies the three-factors set out in Carter. The county knows that its sheriffs are often presented with the difficult decision of when and where to use their tasers on an arrestee and that the wrong choice will result in the deprivation of the arrestee's constitutional rights. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, a jury could find that the training provided to the deputy sheriffs in the use of their tasers is deficient. The manual for the taser used by the deputy sheriffs warns of the dangers inherent in applying the taser in drive stun mode to the actor's groin. The manual advises that the taser should be used in such a way only when the officer is defending himself from a violent attack. Corporal Snyder, however, testified that he instructed the deputy sheriffs that it was permissible for them to apply their tasers to a person's groin in drive stun mode. He further testified that the deputy sheriffs were taught only to avoid the head, face and eye area. . . A jury could find that evidence of such training, in contravention of the taser manual's instructions, amounts to the deliberate indifference necessary to sustain a Monell claim against the defendant county."); Newsome v. Higham, No. 7:08-CV-8 (HL) No. 7:08-CV-8 (HL)2010 WL 1258013, at *5 (M.D. Ga. Mar. 29, 2010) ("Examining the facts in light of the standard set out above, the jury could conclude that Sheriff Norton was deliberately indifferent in failing to train Higham. The fact that Georgia law requires POST training for all prison officials, and that prison officials who fail to complete POST training within six months of hire are prohibited from working as prison officials, shows that there is an obvious need to train prison officials. Norton therefore made the deliberate choice not to train Higham, and to allow Higham to serve as a prison official despite the fact that Higham was prohibited by statute from so serving. Moreover, there is a causal connection between Norton's failure to train and Higham's sexual assault of the Plaintiff. Norton has argued the contrary, stating that there is no evidence 'that being P.O.S.T. certified would necessarily have prevented a male employee of a sheriff's department from engaging in sexual contact with a female detainee.' While this may or may not be the case, what is true is that if Sheriff Norton had followed Georgia law and refused to allow Higham to serve as a prison official due to his lack of training, Higham would not have had the opportunity to abuse his position by sexually assaulting the Plaintiff. Sheriff Norton's failure to train Higham was the result of deliberate indifference, therefore, he is not entitled to summary judgment on the Plaintiff's claim for failure to train."); Klemash v. Monroe Tp., No. 07-4190 (RMB), 2010 WL 455263, at *11 (D.N.J. Feb. 4, 2010) ("Plaintiff has proffered sufficient evidence to establish a factual question regarding whether Monroe Township maintained an unconstitutional policy or practice and whether Monroe Township's failure to provide training on the appropriate use of handcuffs under the Monroe Township SOPs was deliberately indifferent to the risk of constitutional harm. . . . The use of force in requiring a disabled or injured person to place his or her arms behind the back, despite his or her physical incapacity to do so, falls within 'the narrow range of circumstances' where a violation of citizens' right to be free from excessive force would be a highly predictable consequence of a failure to train officers to handle such situations. Similarly, the failure to train officers as to how to transport a handcuffed person from a prone position to a standing position would predictably result in constitutional violations where, as alleged here, an officer picked up a person by the handcuffs and caused physical injury. Because the Court is unable to determine that Monroe Township was not deliberately indifferent to these risks as a matter of law, and because it appears, giving Plaintiff the benefit of all reasonable inferences, that Plaintiff can maintain a claim that Monroe Township executed an unconstitutional handcuffing policy and that the Township's failure to train caused Plaintiff's constitutional injury, these issues must be addressed by a jury."); Odom v. Matteo, Action No. 3:08-cv-1569 (VLB), 2010 WL 466000, at *9 (D. Conn. Feb. 3, 2010) ("Pendleton and the City of Waterford had an obligation to train police officers regarding the proper use of a Taser, and specifically, to train police officers to forbear from using a Taser on a member of the public with a medical condition rendering her particularly susceptible to harm from being Tasered. If Odom's allegations are true, the failure of Pendleton and the City of Waterford to properly train and supervise Matteo could constitute deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of the public. Accordingly, the Court will not dismiss Count Fifteen at this stage of the proceedings."); Swofford v. Eslinger, 686 F.Supp.2d 1277, 1285-87 (M.D. Fla. 2009), aff'd, 2010 WL 3422565 (11th Cir. Sept. 1, 2010) ("The Court finds that there is sufficient evidence of record from which a reasonable jury could conclude that the County's failure to provide adequate S/DS training resulted in the violation of Mr. Swofford's Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force. . . . Defendant Eslinger has identified evidence to suggest that the SCSO officers complete significant training, with a portion of that training directed toward instructing officers on how to use deadly force. From the undisputed fact that Mr. Swofford received multiple shots to the abdomen, the Court has little doubt that the officers were trained on accuracy. However, the pertinent issue for the Court's consideration is whether the officers were instructed on when to use deadly force.In this regard, the County's experts acknowledge that firearms training ought to include an element of training on judgment as to when it is proper to discharge a weapon. . . . [W]hile the Court is loathe to second-guess the decisions of officers put in harm's way by the call of duty, the Court cannot say that permitting an officer, without the benefit of any meaningful training, to rely solely on the officer's instincts or personal judgment as to the presence of a deadly threat and the need to resort to deadly force satisfies the Supreme Court's clear mandate. The evidence in this case, viewed in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff, illustrates this point graphically. Officers Morris and Remus entered Mr. Swofford's property without first indicating their presence. Morris and Remus, themselves forcible intruders on Mr. Swofford's property, encountered Mr. Swofford in his own yard in the middle of the night. At the mere sight of Mr. Swofford holding a gun, which was trained to the ground, not chambered or in a firing position, the Officers opened fire, shooting Mr. Swofford multiple times. They did not announce beforehand their authority as law enforcement officers or direct him to drop his weapon. And, they knew that he was not their suspect, but that he was probably the 'homeowner.'. . . Upon consideration of the foregoing, the Court finds that, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Mr. Swofford, a reasonable jury could conclude that the County's failure to provide adequate S/DS training to its officers resulted in the violation of Mr. Swofford's Fourth Amendment right against excessive force. Assuming, in the absence of contrary evidence, that the SCSO provides no judgmental S/DS training, a reasonable jury could conclude that the County's abject failure to offer such training constitutes deliberate indifference to the innocent victims of deadly force. Assuming that FATS and simunitions training do contain a judgmental element of training, a reasonable jury could still find the County deliberately indifferent by the SCSO's failure to provide such training on a regular basis."); Swofford v. Eslinger, 686 F.Supp.2d 1277, 1288 (M.D. Fla. 2009), aff'd, 2010 WL 3422565 (11th Cir. Sept. 1, 2010) (Mr. Swofford does not identify a pattern of prior conduct equating to notice to the SCSO that deficiencies in its K-9 training programs hazarded potential violations of citizens' Fourth Amendment rights against unlawful entry onto property. Therefore, Mr. Swofford must show that the need for this specific type of training was so obvious in light of the constitutional dilemmas SCSO officers face in recurring situations that the failure to train in this area is proof sufficient of deliberate indifference to the lives of affected citizens. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Mr. Swofford, the Court finds that a jury could so find, and therefore, the Plaintiff has carried this burden. The SCSO has five fulltime K-9 units. . . Corporal Weissman admitted that, as a K-9 officer, he has personally encountered a startled homeowner in his or her backyard 'many times.'. . Thus, a reasonable jury could conclude that SCSO K-9 officers are put in recurring situations in which they must determine whether to enter or continue deeper onto private property based on a perceived tracking signal of a K-9 unit.Further, there is evidence from which a reasonable jury could determine that the County does not train its K-9 teams to 'track' suspects, but to alert to any individual who happens to be present during the search, including homeowners and innocent by-standers."); Estate of Gaither ex rel. Gaither v. District of Columbia, 655 F.Supp.2d 69, 94 (D.D.C. 2009) ("Given the duties generally assigned to the Jail's correctional officers to protect the inmates' health and safety, the Court concludes that there is sufficient evidence in the record from which a reasonable jury could find that the Defendant Officials' failure to implement any training program in 2002 − including training on security procedures, such as the closing of cellblock doors and obtaining relief to ensure staffing remains adequate at all times − was deliberately indifferent to the safety of Gaither. Moreover, although the record regarding causation is minimal, the Court is cognizant of the D.C. Circuit's position that '"the proximate cause of an injury is ordinarily a question for the jury."'. . . The Court therefore DENIES Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to Plaintiff's allegation of inadequate training."); Pelzer v. City of Philadelphia, No. 07-38, 2009 WL 2776493, at *13, *14 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 31, 2009) ("Here, there was no stated policy or custom, but a reasonable jury could find the failure to establish pursuit policies creates a sufficiently obvious risk to the rights of pursuit subjects. Foot pursuits are hardly uncommon for a police force serving a city as large and populous as Philadelphia. Accepting this statement as true, the failure to provide a policy or guidelines could be considered an apparent or obvious omission. A jury may also be able to conclude that the issue of pursuit and patrol policies are the result of a policymaker's decision, and that the City's omission was the moving factor behind the plaintiff's injury. . . . I believe there is a genuine issue regarding the obviousness of a need for additional patrol policies. The plaintiff's evidence raises serious questions regarding officer training. Though the officers were given extensive instruction on the use of force, the focus on foot pursuits was allegedly wanting. Given the serious risks and regularity of foot pursuits, a jury may find the City was deliberately indifferent to the adequacy of existing practices and the need for new or additional policies. Because the plaintiff has produced sufficient evidence to raise a question regarding the need for additional policies, I will deny the motion as to this point."); Dyshko v. Swanson, No. 5:08cv587, 2009 WL 1545462, at *9, *10 (N.D. Ohio June 2, 2009) ("While Defendants have stressed the impracticality of having a translator available for every conceivable language that they may encounter in the Stark County Jail, the Court cannot overlook the fact that no policy existed outlining a method for protecting the rights of anyone in Mrs. Dyshko's situation. As discussed above, one of the contract provisions between Stark County and CHCG [Correctional Health Care Group] was the requirement that CHCG obtain accreditation from NCCHC [National Commission on Correctional Health Care], whose standards included the requirement that interpreters be made available to communicate with inmates whose communication abilities are hindered by a language barrier or hearing problems. A situation in which a non-English, non-Spanish speaker comes into the jail is entirely foreseeable, as is the need to protect that detainee's physical safety and her constitutional rights. Other than Defendants' assertion that the jail attempted to contact a Ukrainian church . . . , the record reflects no attempt by jail personnel to find an objective party − someone other than a relative of a jail official − to help Mrs. Dyshko, nor is there any evidence that any protocol (policy, custom or otherwise) existed to outline or direct any such an attempt, which a jury may reasonably find amounts to a failure by Stark County to train jail officials. The jail officials' unguided last-minute effort to communicate with Mrs. Dyshko resulted in a miscommunication that a jury may reasonably find cost Mrs. Dyshko her privacy and substantive due process rights. The Court finds that the failure to provide a policy for the processing of non-English, non-Spanish speaking detainees may reasonably be seen by a jury as deliberately indifferent to a foreseeable need. . . Further, a jury may reasonably find that this failure resulted in a direct injury to Mrs. Dyshko, including a violation of her substantive due process rights, as outlined above. For that reason, summary judgment is denied as to Stark County on Plaintiffs' failure to train claim under § 1983."); Quatroy v. Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office, Nos. 04-451, 04-1425, 2009 WL 1380196, at *6-*8 (E.D. La. May 14, 2009) ("The Court agrees with the analyses in these cases and finds that the Sheriff, not the Parish Council, is the relevant policymaker with regard to plaintiffs' claims. Plaintiffs allege that Quatroy's death was because of the Sheriff and JPCC's policies of not providing Methadone to inmates and observing, rather than treating, detoxifying inmates. These allegations go to the management of healthcare within the jail, not the ex ante appointment of an adequate physician or healthcare provider. Louisiana law makes the Sheriff the relevant policymaker in this regard. . . . Plaintiffs have not stated whether or not they contend that these customs are facially unconstitutional, but they allege that the Sheriff maintained the customs with deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of prisoners. . . The complaint explains that because of the policy, the employees of the JPCC 'were left with little or no direction as to how to care for an inmate experiencing deadly withdrawal.'. . The Court finds the allegation that the Sheriff knew of the policy, and maintained it, despite the 'obvious consequence' that a policy of nontreatment of withdrawal symptoms could result in deliberate indifference to a prisoner's serious medical needs, see Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97, 103-04 (1976), sufficient to state this element of municipal liability. . . . Plaintiffs' factual pleadings also provide grounds for his allegation that there was an 'official custom' of not treating detoxifying inmates. . . . Plaintiffs allege that instead of being treated, Quatroy was placed in an observation suicide cell. . . . Defendant's arguments that plaintiffs failed to plead facts that would show proof of deliberate indifference or facts showing a pattern of similar violations has no merit under Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U .S. 163 (1993). There, the Supreme Court held that suits involving municipal liability under section 1983 were not subject to the heightened pleading standard required by the Fifth Circuit at the time. . . The Court rejected respondents' argument that a plaintiff must plead more than a single instance of misconduct to state a claim for municipal liability. . . Rather, the Court held that such suits are governed by the liberal 'notice pleading' requirement outlined in Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a), which requires a complaint to include 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.'. . . Boilerplate allegations of inadequate municipal policies or customs usually suffice."); Wallace v. Hounshel, No. 1:06-cv-1560-WTL-TAB, 2009 WL 734714, at *11 (S.D. Ind. Mar. 19, 2009) ("Viewed in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff, the evidence of record in this case supports the Plaintiff's argument that Jackson County did not have a sound training program for its jail officers regarding handling inmate medical issues. It appears that none of the jail officers received any specific training regarding the proper use of the Chest Pain Protocol or any other specific protocol; rather, the training that they received from ACH only gave them general instructions regarding the use of the protocols. That general training may well have been adequate if the protocols were self-explanatory and did not require the exercise of any medical discretion. The Chest Pain Protocol did require the exercise of discretion, however, in that it required the officer to determine whether an inmate was experiencing cardiac chest pain, which required a physician referral, or chest pain related to an injury or muscle strain, which did not. There is simply no evidence of record that the jail had a policy in place that required its officers to be trained on how to make that type of determination. . . The record also suggests that the County did not keep track of which of its officers received ACH's training regarding the general use of the protocols and that none of the officers on duty at the time of Wallace's first chest pain episode had attended that training. A reasonable jury could find that the need to train jail officers with regard to handling an inmate's complaints of chest pain was obvious and that the County disregarded that obvious need in deliberate indifference to a substantial risk to its inmates."); Lee v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County, 596 F.Supp.2d 1101, 1124-25 (M.D. Tenn. 2009), aff'd in part on other grounds, 432 F. App'x 435 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Metro's own Student Guide left taser-certified officers with a potentially confused understanding as to when and how the taser device should be activated, particularly if the first application did not have immediate effect. As noted in the factual discussion, on June 28, 2005, Taser sent a bulletin to, among others, Metro, specifically warning that 'repeated ... exposures to the Taser electrical discharge may cause strong muscle contractions that may impair breathing and respiration ... users should avoid ... extensive multiple discharges whenever practicable in order to minimize the potential for over-exertion of the subject or potential impairment of full ability to breathe over a protracted time period.' . . .There appears to have been no attempt by Metro to organize any training based on the information in the Bulletin, to engage taser-certified officers in any discussion about the information contained in the Bulletin, or even to assure that taser-certified officers had read the Bulletin, and not just the e-mail to which the Bulletin was (supposedly) attached. Therefore, even assuming that the taser-certified officers here retained anything useful from the vague training that they received while auditing a course on a single November morning almost a year prior to the Lee incident, it is safe to say that the taser-certified officers such as Mays and Scruggs had little, if any, information about the fact that repeated applications of the taser device could have profound health consequences."); Bibbins v.

City of Baton Rouge, 489 F.Supp.2d 562, 583 (M.D. La. May 2007) ("There is no dispute that identifications are routinely used in the vast majority of criminal investigations. The City is quick to point out that the Louisiana Law Enforcement Handbook in 1986 explained how to conduct a proper identification. However in this case, the summary judgment evidence shows that the City provided its officers with practically no training whatsoever in conducting identifications. The reasonable inferences drawn from the evidence . . . can support a finding that Officers Remington and Davis showed Canty proceeds of the crime (the broken radio) before asking Canty to make an identification of Bibbins. This is the exact sort of conduct that is avoidable with proper training. The court therefore holds that a reasonable jury could find that the total lack of training was the moving force that made it 'highly predictable' that an unconstitutionally suggestive show-up would occur."); LeBlanc v. City of Los Angeles, 2006 WL 4752614, at *18 (C.D.Cal. Aug. 16, 2006) ("Here, the LAPD training materials in the record provide no guidance on how and whether Taser should be used when dealing with narcotically intoxicated individuals, even though LAPD officers probably confront such individuals on a routine basis. Given the testimony of Plaintiff's experts that Taser is highly dangerous when used against such individuals, a reasonable jury can find that the LAPD's failure to instruct officers on Taser use against intoxicated individuals amounts to a deliberate indifference to likely constitutional violations in such circumstances. This is particularly so in light of Colomey's deposition testimony that he was not reprimanded for this incident, and would handle the situation in exactly the same way if confronted with it again. . . . Plaintiff also alleges that the LAPD failed to supervise or audit Taser use by LAPD officers. Each Taser unit contains a digital microprocessor that records every discharge, and the recorded data can be downloaded for audit and examination. After the LeBlanc incident, the Taser unit used against him was sent by the LAPD to Taser Inc. for audit and analysis. However, Taser Inc. could not recover an audit trail for the discharges on LeBlanc, because the device's internal clock battery died and prevented the chip from recording the charges. Taser Inc.'s analysis showed that the last recorded discharge occurred two months before the LeBlanc incident. Plaintiff argues that the fact that the LAPD had to send the unit to Taser Inc. for analysis rather than download the data on its own, and the fact that the unit was not properly maintained, demonstrates a custom of deliberate indifference to the abusive use of Taser in the field. In Plaintiff's view, if the LAPD properly maintains Taser clock batteries, the present of an audit trail would deter its officers from using the weapon in abusive ways. The absence of an audit trail on a single weapon is not, by itself, sufficient to establish a failure to supervise. If the challenged municipal practice is not a formal policy, Plaintiff must show the existence of a custom that is 'so persistent and widespread that it constitutes a permanent and well-settled city policy.'. . That said, the lack of an audit trail on the specific Taser unit at issue can still support an inference of deliberate indifference on Plaintiff's failure-to-train theory."); Estate of Harvey v. Jones, 2006 WL 909980, at *12 (W.D. Wash. Apr. 6, 2006) ("In the instant case, both Officer Jones and Officer Kalich state that they never received any training on how to interact with mentally disturbed persons or persons under the influence of drugs. At the same time, Officer Jones notes that he had been coming in contact with a lot of mentally ill people 'on the streets.' In addition, plaintiff submits evidence that the City of Everett failed to so train police officers even after a similar incident had occurred in 1996, in which a man by the name of Douglas Reagan was arrested while naked and agitated, struggled with police officers, and ultimately died. The Court finds that this evidence creates a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the City of Everett's failure to train its police officers on how to deal with mentally disturbed persons or persons under the influence of drugs amounted to a deliberate indifference to Mr. Harvey's constitutional rights. Accordingly, the Court agrees with plaintiff that summary judgment on this issue is not appropriate."); Allison v. Michigan State University, No. 5:03-CV-156, 2005 WL 2123852, at *12 (W.D. Mich. Aug. 31, 2005)(not reported) ("Although the ELFD's [East Lansing Fire Department] decontamination policy addressed the need for privacy, the evidence of how the procedure was actually conducted is sufficient to raise an issue of fact for trial as to whether the privacy training received by the ELFD was adequate. Because there is no evidence of prior complaints of privacy violations by the ELFD that would put the City on notice that its officers needed additional training in decontamination procedures, the focus of this Court's analysis must be on whether the City provided adequate training in light of foreseeable consequences that could result from the lack of instruction. A wet decontamination procedure requires detainees to take off their clothes and to be washed off. Such a procedure necessarily implicates privacy issues. Because privacy concerns are foreseeable, a reasonable jury could find that an agency that undertakes responsibility for conducting wet decontaminations must train its employees on how to address privacy concerns and that the failure to provide adequate privacy training amounts to deliberate indifference. There is also evidence in this case from which a jury could find that the privacy training was inadequate. There is evidence that all of the detainees were women, that little effort was made to address the detainees' concern for having a female decontamination officer, that windows from the outside were not covered, that males who were not involved in the decontamination procedure were milling around the decontamination area, that there were no privacy curtains around the decontamination pools, and that some of the detainees were treated in a sexually derogatory manner. These facts are sufficient to create an issue for trial on the adequacy of the training provided by the City of East Lansing to its Fire Department employees who were assigned to carry out this procedure."); Freedman v. America Online, Inc., 412 F.Supp.2d 174, 194 (D. Conn. 2005) ("This Court is persuaded that Plaintiff has established a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the Town had an unconstitutional official policy permitting its officers to send unsigned warrants to ISPs for subscriber information. Plaintiff has proffered evidence that Young understood that the Town, although not having a formal rule, had adopted a particular course of action-sending unsigned search warrants to ISPs-which, according to the testimony of Young and Sambrook, had been followed consistently over time. . . .[T]he Town reasonably should have known to a moral certainty that the officers would confront situations in which they would need to execute a warrant for an individual's ISP subscriber information. The fact that police officers routinely execute search warrants, combined with the proliferation of internet use, makes it evident that the officers would increasingly confront the situation presented in this case. . . .Defendants point out that the Town provided its officers with training. The most recent training provided to either Young or Bensey, however, occurred more than ten years before the incident involved in this case. Second, the situation presented the Defendant officers with a difficult choice of the sort that training or supervision would make less difficult. The choice in this case was not difficult by way of degree. Rather, it was a choice in which Young, with the proper training, could have presented the warrant application to a judge before sending it to the ISP. It was therefore a situation that would have made Young's decision less difficult by guiding him as to the proper procedure. . . . Although there is no history of employees mishandling the situation, a single action taken by a municipality is sufficient to expose it to liability, and repeated complaints are not a prerequisite to establishing that a policymaker's inaction was the result of a 'conscious choice,' and not mere negligence. . . . Lastly, Young's decision to send the unsigned warrant to AOL is a wrong choice that would frequently cause the deprivation of a citizen's constitutional rights. As previously stated, police officers routinely execute warrants to ascertain the identity of an anonymous internet speaker. Consequently, the failure to obtain any level of judicial review of the request before it is submitted to an ISP may potentially result in violations of the First and Fourth Amendments."); Watkins v. New Castle County, 374 F.Supp.2d 379, 386, 387 (D. Del. 2005) ("Plaintiffs may be able to establish that the County acted with 'deliberate indifference,' under City of Canton, by the fact that it included discussions of positional asphyxia and cocaine-induced excited delirium in its training materials for new officers but allegedly did not require its veteran officers to undergo similar training. . . In a case based on similar facts and evidence, the United States District Court for the Southern District of Ohio held that 'a reasonable jury could find that the City had notice of the potential hazards of agitated delirium with restraint and that the City was deliberately indifferent in failing to adequately train the police and firefighters on how to deal with 'at risk' persons.' Johnson v. City of Cincinnati, 39 F.Supp.2d 1013, 1020 (S.D.Ohio 1999) (internal citation omitted). Thus, Plaintiffs' have presented evidence to adequately establish that genuine issues of material fact preclude a grant of summary judgment for the County on Plaintiffs' 'failure to train' claims. . . . The Plaintiffs have failed to present similar evidence of 'deliberate indifference' with regard to the Town. They have not argued that the Town possessed information regarding the risks of excited delirium or prone restraint and then failed to train its officers in such matters. Therefore, the defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment . . . will be granted insofar as it pertains to the Town."); Lewis v. City of Chicago, No. 04 C 3904, 2005 WL 1026692, at 5-7 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 26, 2005) ("The city argues Lewis cannot demonstrate deliberate indifference because CPD trains its police recruits not to use choke holds and neck restraints. The city's argument misses the point because it relies on CPD's current training program. The current training program is not at issue. The issue is whether CPD adequately retrained officers who were originally trained to use neck restraints. Lewis presents evidence that CPD taught neck restraints, including a choke hold or sleeper hold, in the police academy until at least 1983. Officer Soto attended the police academy in 1977. For purposes of this motion, the present training program is irrelevant. The court must focus on Officer Soto's training. Lewis presents evidence the city stopped teaching choke holds after Officer Soto left the police academy, presumably due to risk of injury or death. According to Lieutenant Mealer, CPD stopped teaching choke holds in response to public concern raised over their use. . . . There is no evidence CPD provided any written directive or order to police officers to stop using neck restraints. Indeed, the evidence is to the contrary. . . Although Officer Soto testified he was told not to use choke holds, he could not remember when, how or by whom. There is no evidence he or other police officers trained to use neck restraints were later provided retraining on alternative restraint tactics. Lewis presents evidence that police officers received no retraining on restraint tactics after police academy training. Based on this evidence, a jury could reasonably find the need for retraining was so obvious and the failure to provide it so likely to result in a constitutional violation that the city's failure to provide retraining amounts to deliberate indifference. CPD is aware police officers are required to arrest fleeing suspects. CPD taught its officers control and restraint tactics, in part, to allow them to accomplish this task. CPD determined choke holds were too dangerous to use, trained new police recruits not to use them, but failed to retrain officers who were originally taught to use choke holds in alternative restraint methods. Even though Officer Soto acknowledged he was later instructed not to use a choke hold, a reasonable jury could conclude that he used the choke hold because CPD failed to train him in alternative restraints. . . .The city relies on Latuszkin v. City of Chicago. . . to argue that Lewis has not shown policymakers were aware of the alleged training deficiencies. . . . Latuszkin is distinguishable on many grounds. First, Latuszkin was not a failure to train case. Thus, it did not involve a policy decision to prohibit use of choke holds because of the known associated risks. Second, unlike Latuszkin, Lewis presents evidence that city policymakers should have known of the risk of injury if police officers trained to use choke holds were not retrained in alternative restraint methods. Lewis presents evidence that a policy decision was made to prohibit choke holds in response to public concern over the risk of using neck restraints. . . Neither party identifies the policymaker. Under ' 2-84-030 of the Chicago Municipal Code, the Police Board has the power to adopt rules and regulations governing CPD. It is reasonable to infer that the Police Board knew or should have known of the policy change and the reasons for it. Lewis' expert testified that the need to retrain police officers in restraint techniques is obvious because those skills diminish over time. . . Several high ranking CPD officials acknowledged that restraint skills fade over time. . . A jury could reasonably conclude from this evidence that CPD policymakers were deliberately indifferent to the need to retrain police officers on restraint techniques."); Solis v. City of Columbus, 319 F.Supp.2d 797, 812, 813 (S.D. Ohio 2004) ("In addition to being subject to § 1983 liability based on its deficient operational policy, as outlined above, the City also may be liable, for the same reasons, based on its failure to train officers to comply with that policy. In other words, the jury may find the City liable for its failure to train officers to exercise something more than ordinary care when obtaining addresses for no-knock search warrants. . . .The need occasionally to have another officer complete the visual verification of a search warrant address is a recurring situation in law enforcement. The constitutional violation that occurred here is a predictable result of the failure to give officers the tools to handle this situation by training them in how to insure that information is fully and accurately transmitted and that the final address obtained is correct."); Foster v. City of Philadelphia, No. Civ.A. 01-CV-3810, 2004 WL 225041, at 13-15 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 30, 2004) (not reported) ("In conclusion, the record reveals that the City has proven the existence of comprehensive written policies regarding the handling detainees who are high-risk for suicide. The City, however, has offered insufficient evidence to refute the Plaintiffs contention that the content of the City's training program was inadequate. . . Thus, the adequacy of the content of the City's training program remains a disputed issue of material fact. . . Inadequacy of training in the area of suicide detection and reduction may be viewed as 'so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the city can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.' . . . On the whole, the record of this particular incident, viewed in a light most favorable to Plaintiff, as it must be on summary judgment, would support a fact-finder in drawing an inference that many of the officers involved failed to follow the City's policies. To be sure, the Supreme Court has cautioned against creating an inference of a failure to train from an isolated incident. 'The existence of a patterns [sic] of tortious conduct by inadequately trained employees may tend to show that the lack of proper training, rather than a one-time negligent administration of the program or factors peculiar to the officer involved in a particular incident, is the 'moving force' behind the plaintiff's injury.' . . This record would amply support a conclusion by a reasonable jury that the performance shortcomings were a result of constitutionally inadequate training practices, and were not simply the result of isolated negligence. Ultimately, however, the constitutional adequacy of the City's training program for suicide risk reduction among detainees is a matter for determination in light of all of the facts and circumstances presented at trial, when a full evidentiary record can be developed. At the summary judgment stage, however, the City has not established, as a matter of law, the absence of disputed issues of material fact as to the adequacy of the content of training programs for the identification and handling of high-risk potential suicidal detainees. Therefore, summary judgment must be denied.."); Estate of Carpenter v. City of Cincinnati, No. C-1-99-227, 2003 WL 23415143, at *12 (S.D. Ohio, Apr. 17, 2003) ("Plaintiff's evidence creates a dispute of material fact, however, as to whether the City's police department had policies of 1) not asking subjects of traffic stops to put their cars in park and turn off the engines and 2) dealing with obstinate subjects by pulling them out of their cars, even when their engines are running. At the very least, the evidence raises an issue as to whether the City failed to train its officers with respect to disabling cars and reaching into cars during traffic stops. During CPRP's investigation of the Timothy Blair incident, Chief Streicher told CPRP that the City had no policy on disabling automobiles at traffic stops. Yet, the Curriculum that the City purports to follow instructs that officers tell every subject of a traffic stop to turn off his engine. Also, Officer Miller testified that the City never trained him to ask a suspect to put the car in park during a routine traffic stop, and Officer McCurley, Officer Miller's field training officer, testified that he never told Officer Miller to ask Mr. Carpenter to turn the engine off or put the car in park because he trusted Officer Miller's judgment. These statements together suggest that, despite the dictates of the official curriculum, the official custom of the City's police department was not to train officers to disable automobiles at the beginning of every traffic stop but to give them wide latitude on this front. In addition, Officer Carder's statement to the CPRP during its investigation of the Timothy Blair shooting that he had once been commended by the City for an extraction similar to that which he attempted on Mr. Blair raises an issue of fact as to whether the City's official policy was for officers to try to yank suspects out of running cars during traffic stops. This analysis all begs the question of whether such policies would create liability for the City under § 1983. If the City failed to train Officer Miller to ask the subject of a traffic stop to put his car in park and turn off the engine and had a policy whereby officers were to reach into running cars to extricate recalcitrant suspects, this might have been a moving force behind a constitutional violation − the use of deadly force against Mr. Carpenter. If the officers shot Mr. Carpenter dead because his car moved forward or backward, then the City's failure to train Officer Miller regarding the proper disabling of a car during a traffic stop was a proximate cause and, thus, a 'moving force' behind the deadly excessive force violation. Surely it would be foreseeable to the City that if it did not train its officers to disable vehicles at the beginning of a traffic stop and did not train their officers to refrain from reaching in to those running vehicles, officers would reach into moving vehicles, struggles would ensue, drivers would lose control of their vehicles, and officers would feel compelled to escalate their use of force in response. A failure to train its officers on easy ways to avoid such tragic events would evince 'deliberate indifferen[ce]' on the part of the City. The City's motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff's § 1983 claim against the City is DENIED."); Fakorzi v. Dillard's, Inc.,252 F. Supp.2d 819, 831 (S.D. Iowa 2003) ("The reasoning of Harris applies with equal force to the case at bar. The City of Coralville gives its officers handcuffs with the expectation that they will use them in arresting suspected criminals when necessary. Just as the officers in Harris were 'certain to be required on occasion to use force in apprehending felons,'. . . Coralville police officers have recurring occasions to make arrests and must frequently determine whether to handcuff potential suspects. The Court finds that a failure to train officers in the appropriate use of handcuffs is 'so likely to result in a violation of constitutional rights that the need for training is patently obvious.'. . Therefore, notice to the City is implied in this case."); Keeney v. City of New London, 196 F.Supp.2d 190, 201 (D. Conn. 2002) ("Keeney did submit an expert report . . . that noted Persi's comments about an increased population of mentally ill individuals in New London and statements by Mugovero and Persi that they did not receive any training on how to handle mentally compromised persons. Further, the expert report concluded that common police policies recognized the futility of standard techniques of intimidation and force against mentally ill individuals. The court concludes that the expert's report raises material issues of fact for each Walker factor − whether municipal officials knew to a moral certainty that officers would encounter mentally ill individuals, whether those encounters presented officers with a difficult choice regarding the use of force, and whether the wrong choice would lead to a deprivation of citizen's rights − that preclude summary judgment on this ground for municipal liability."); Smartt v. Grundy County, Tennessee, No. 4:01-CV-32, 2002 WL 32058965, at *3 (E.D. Tenn. Mar. 26, 2002) (not reported) ("[P]laintiff provides the Court with deposition testimony of defendants Womack and Meeks indicating that neither of them knew or were trained about the proper legal standard for the use of deadly force. Deputy Womack testified that the use of deadly force is appropriate when valuable personal property is in danger. . . . He further stated that this belief was consistent with his in-service training. . . Similarly, Sheriff Meeks explained during his deposition that personal property could appropriately be protected with deadly force. . . . He further stated that he had not discussed the appropriate use of deadly force with his officers. . . Tennessee law clearly provides that deadly force is not appropriate to protect personal property. . . The statements of Womack and Meeks might support a finding that Grundy County is liable for a failure to train that amounted to deliberate indifference."); Blair v. City of Cleveland, 148 F. Supp.2d 894, 908-10 (N.D. Ohio 2000) ("Plaintiffs seek to hold the City of Cleveland liable based upon its alleged failure to adequately train its officers in the use of choke holds and neck restraints. In order to hold a municipality liable for its officers' alleged use of excessive force on a theory of failure to adequately train its officers, Plaintiffs must first show that the City's officers were, in fact, inadequately trained. Second, Plaintiffs must establish that the City's failure to adequately train its officers directly caused Pipkins' injuries. Finally, Plaintiffs must establish that the City was deliberately indifferent to a clear need for such training. . . . [R]easonable jurors could find that the City of Cleveland knew that situations such as the instant case would arise, in which officers were faced with struggling arrestees, and were forced to decide just what amount and what type of force would be reasonable under the circumstances. . . . Viewing the evidence presented in a light most favorable to Plaintiffs, this court holds that a reasonable juror could find that the City of Cleveland failed to adequately train its officers in the use and/or advisability of neck restraints."); Hockenberry v. Village of Carrollton, 110 F. Supp.2d 597, 602 (N.D. Ohio 2000) (denying Village's motion for summary judgment where plaintiff offerered evidence Asuggesting that the Village provides relatively little training regarding the policies and procedures associated with pursuing a suspect."); Weaver v. Tipton County, 41 F. Supp.2d 779, 790, 792 (W.D. Tenn. 1999) ("The court must thus determine whether in light of the duties assigned to employees at the Tipton County Jail the need for increased staffing, training, or supervision was 'so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the [municipality] can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.'. . . Based on the evidence before it, the court finds a reasonable juror could conclude that Tipton County's failure to ensure that adequate staffing, training, and/or supervision polices were in place and enforced would so obviously result in the violation of prisoners' constitutional rights that Tipton County could be found deliberately indifferent. Furthermore, it is possible that plaintiff's evidence could convince a reasonable juror that but for the inadequate policies, Weaver would not have had his constitutional rights violated. Accordingly, Tipton County's motion for summary judgment is denied."); Johnson v. City of Cincinnati, 39 F. Supp.2d 1013, 1019, 1020 (S.D. Ohio 1999) ("Plaintiff provides evidence from which a reasonable jury could infer that dealing with highly agitated persons was a recurring situation for law enforcement officials nationwide and in Cincinnati and that a violation of civil rights is predictable result of being inadequately trained to handle such persons. Plaintiff provides evidence that City officials knew of the potential danger of the prone restraint before Wilder's death. . . . On the basis of this evidence the Court believes that a reasonable jury could find that the City had notice of the potential hazards of agitated delirium with restraint and that the City was deliberately indifferent in failing to adequately train the police and firefighters on how to deal with 'at risk' persons."); Taziloy v. City of Philadelphia, No. CIV. A. 97-CV-1219, 1998 WL 633747, *15 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 10, 1998) (not reported) ("With respect to the claim that Defendants failed to rectify a dangerous situation, the Court finds that given the nature of the duties assigned to caseworkers, the need for training and supervision is so obvious, and an inadequacy in this regard so likely to result in a violation of a child's constitutional right, that the DHS policymakers can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the consequences of employing untrained, overworked, and unsupervised caseworkers."); Doe v. Estes, 926 F. Supp. 979, 988 (D. Nev. 1996) ("Certain situations present a potential for constitutional violations that is so obvious and so clearly likely to occur, that a local government entity's failure to take prophylactic measures may well rise to the level of deliberate indifference even before any particular violation has been brought to the attention of the entity's policymakers. . . . It is the judgment of the court that a reasonable jury could find from the evidence in the record on summary judgment that the danger of children being sexually abused at school is so obvious that a school district's failure to take action to prevent sexual abuse of its students by its teachers − even in the absence of actual knowledge of such abuse − constitutes deliberate indifference, especially where the school district took no steps to encourage the reporting of incidents of such abuse."); Hurst v. Finley, 857 F. Supp. 1517, 1523 (M.D. Ala. 1994) ("The court now finds that the City's failure to train its law enforcement personnel in the proper procedures to be followed when arresting an individual suspected of driving under the influence of alcohol was closely related to plaintiff Hurst's alleged injury, which was the deprivation of her Fourth Amendment right to be free of search and seizure without probable cause. Furthermore, the court finds that the City's lack of policy requiring that one or a battery of field sobriety tests be administered before placing a suspected driver under arrest was the motivating force behind the alleged violation of Hurst's Fourth Amendment right. . . . As a result, the court finds that Hurst has submitted sufficient evidence from which a jury could find. . . deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of plaintiff Hurst."), aff'd, 63 F.3d 1112 (11th Cir. 1995); McClain v. Milligan, 847 F. Supp. 970, 979 (D. Me. 1994) ("If, as Plaintiff asserts, an optional videotape and a written policy on the use of force are the only materials dealing with the proper use of force that a Rumford police officer might be exposed to, these facts could establish an inadequate training policy sufficient for a finding of municipal liability under section 1983."); Simpkins v. Bellevue Hospital, 832 F. Supp. 69, 75 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) (City of Canton "is equally applicable to claims concerning training of medical personnel and hiring and supervision of medical personnel. . . . [C]laim that plaintiff's injuries were caused by the city's failure to assure proper hiring or supervision or training of surgeons assigned to perform operations on inmates is one that should not be dismissed at this stage."); Feerick v. Sudolnik, 816 F. Supp. 879, 887 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) (motion to dismiss by police dept. defendants denied where plaintiffs alleged that "the NYPD failed to train or supervise its officers regarding the handling of P.G. 118-9 interrogations and the need to separate the investigative and interrogative agencies within the NYPD and the DAO."), aff'd, 2 F.2d 403 (2d Cir. 1993) (Table); Frye v. Town of Akron, 759 F. Supp. 1320, 1325 (N.D. Ind. 1991) (town's complete failure to train officers on subject of high speed pursuits can be characterized as deliberate indifference); Doe v. Calumet City, 754 F. Supp. 1211, 1225 (N.D. Ill. 1990) (City was deliberately indifferent to the need to train officers in the constitutional limits of strip searches).

See also Mitchell v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:03CV2179, 2005 WL 2233226, at *6 (N.D. Ohio Sept. 12, 2005) (not reported) ("Whether the officers were trained according to general minimum standards set forth by the state for police officers is largely irrelevant, however, because Plaintiff's injuries were not the result of her arrest. Rather, Plaintiff's injuries were the result of the behavior of certain IG's during her booking and detention. The question of whether training is adequate must be assessed by considering the extent of 'jail training.' The Defendants fail to specifically state what 'jail training' the IG's received or even to explain what policies were in place for IG's. The Defendants do not describe, for instance, whether and to what extent training was provided to IG's regarding treatment of injured or disabled prisoners, the removal of personal property from an uncooperative prisoner, or the administration of medical treatment. Given that the Plaintiff required two separate surgeries, '[s]uch undisciplined conduct on the part of law enforcement officers speaks ab initio of a lack of training and discipline.' . . While Plaintiff's showing in response to Defendant's motion for summary judgment is certainly not strong, Defendants bore the burden in the first instance of coming forward with a 'well supported' motion under Rule 56. On the question of IG training, they simply have not done so. Accordingly, the Court finds that questions of fact exist regarding the adequacy of the training provided to the IG's, and whether any inadequacies in that training were a moving force behind Plaintiff's injuries."); Johnson v. City of Richmond, Virginia, No. Civ.A.3:04 CV 340, 2005 WL 1793778, at *9, *10 (E.D. Va. June 24, 2005) (not reported) ("Relying on expert testimony, the Plaintiff has presented evidence that, although the City's training program appears adequate on the surface, a more thorough review of the training program reveals that it is not consistent with nationally accepted police standards and practices. In that regard, the Plaintiff points to evidence that there is no mandated use of force training that officers must receive after graduating from the Academy, and that there is no evidence that officers are given regular use of force training following graduation. Plaintiff's expert explained that national standards require training on the agency's use-of-deadly force policies at least annually. As further evidence on this issue, the Plaintiff quotes from the depositions of several current officers who demonstrated ignorance of the use of force policies outlined in the General Order on which the City so heavily relies to show that it provides adequate training in the use of force. The expert witness offered by the Plaintiff has opined that, when the City does provide use of force training, it is limited and ineffective. In that regard, the expert explains that the City fails to train its officers on a Use of Force Continuum, which is recommended by DCJS. This continuum teaches the several steps, ranging from less to more lethal alternatives, which are to be taken before using deadly force. The current Richmond Chief of Police, Chief Monroe, acknowledged publicly that there was a gap in the City's training when it came to alternatives to deadly force. There is evidence that, according to generally accepted practice, use of force training must include so-called 'shoot/no shoot' scenarios, to train officers when it is proper to shoot and when it is not. The City's training in this area is limited to the use of simulation machines, which, according to the Plaintiff's expert, is not in keeping with accepted practices and standards. Further, the City keeps no record on the simulation training and thus does not know whether Melvin received this training or how well he did. Without this critical information, the City, according to the Plaintiff's expert, is unable to show that its training is adequate. Again, the new Chief of Police recently has confirmed that adequate training should include both live 'shoot/no shoot' scenarios and situational training as part of the use of force training. To that general evidence, the Plaintiff offered testimony tending to show that the City did not provide adequate training on arrest procedures implicating the use of deadly force. For instance, all of the police officers who were deposed in this case said they did not receive any post-Academy training on arrest and the use of force. And, several officers were unaware of the City's putative policy of the use of force. Through her expert witness, the Plaintiff also offered evidence about four key areas of arrest procedure that are lacking in the City's training program. In each instance, the expert will opine that the deficiency offends general standards or practices. First, the expert opined that Richmond police officers are inappropriately trained on how to respond to suspects who put their hands in their pockets. The expert noted that there is a standard police practice, which has been given to Richmond police officers by an FBI agent, and which calls for the officer to instruct the suspect to keep his hands in his pocket until they can be safely removed upon arrest. Instead of following that procedure, the City teaches its officers to instruct suspects to remove their hands immediately, which, according to the expert, increases the likelihood that force must be used.

Second, the expert opined that the City fails adequately to train its officers in the use of cover and lighting, which also increases the likelihood of the use of force. The Academy provides training on these issues, but there is no evidence of training on lighting in nighttime operations or any post-Academy training on the use of cover. Third, the expert opined that the City fails adequately to train its officers on how to handle high-risk operations. The City has training on 'raids,' but only requires this training for officers who execute search warrants, and not for officers who serve arrest warrants at a suspect's home. Melvin, for example, did not receive this training until after Johnson's death. Fourth, the expert opined that the City fails adequately to train specialized units like the Task Force in high-risk situations. While City policy requires that 'specialized units' receive training on high-risk situations that the unit is likely to encounter, this Task Force received no such training, although it was labeled a 'specialized unit.' The evidence offered by the Plaintiff concerning the deficiencies in the City's training program, particularly with respect to use of force, is disputed by the City and its expert. However, a reasonable jury could conclude that the City acted with deliberate indifference as to adequate training in the use of force, which is an essential part of any training program.").

In Doe v. Borough of Barrington, 729 F. Supp. 376 (D.N.J. 1990), plaintiff sued on her own behalf and on behalf of her children, for harm suffered as a result of an invasion of their constitutional right to privacy. The court found that disclosure by a police officer to neighbors that plaintiffs' husband and father had AIDS, was disclosure of a "personal matter" protected from government disclosure by the Fourteenth Amendment. Id. at 382.

Plaintiffs' assertion of liability against the Borough was based on a theory of failure to train its employees about AIDS and the importance of keeping the identity of AIDS carriers confidential. In granting summary judgment in favor of the plaintiffs on the issue of municipal liability, the court held that "[t]he need to train officers about AIDS and its transmission and about the constitutional limitations on the disclosure of the identity of AIDS carriers is so obvious that failure to do so is properly characterized as deliberate indifference." Id. at 390.

The court rejected the Borough's defense that there was no deliberate indifference where no other municipality or state agency had adopted a policy on AIDS. "That other municipalities do not have policies regarding AIDS is not material to the analysis set forth in City of Canton v. Harris...." Id. The court expressly noted that it was not deciding whether the municipality could disclose a person's affliction with AIDS to someone actually at risk of contracting the disease from the identified AIDS carrier. Id. Finally, the court was careful to restrict the municipality's liability to failure to train about the disease AIDS. Id. Compare Doe v. City of Cleveland, 788 F. Supp. 979, 986 (N.D. Ohio 1991) (where City's AIDS policy reflected sufficient awareness of need for confidentiality, City could not be held liable where one officer circumvented the policy); Soucie v. County of Monroe, 736 F. Supp. 33, 38 (W.D.N.Y. 1990) (claim against county based on failure to train probation personnel as to the confidentiality of juvenile pre-sentence reports failed to satisfy City of Canton where there were no allegations that County repeatedly ignored or failed to investigate prior disclosures).

For examples of cases where plaintiffs have alleged specific deficiencies in training and courts have found no deliberate indifference under City of Canton, see, e.g., Sabbe v. Washington County Board of Commissioners, 84 F.4th 807, 829 (9th Cir. 2023) ("Monell requires that plaintiffs show the need 'for more or different action is so obvious, and the inadequacy of existing practice so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the [county] can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.'. . Here, Sergeant Braun testified as the County's deposition designee that he had never heard of using an armored vehicle to execute a PIT maneuver and it was 'not something we ever thought of' and thus 'not something we've ever addressed under policy.' Though a jury could decide that the second PIT maneuver constituted deadly force, the record does not give rise to a genuine dispute that the County's failure to establish guidelines for using the V150 to execute PIT maneuvers rose to the level of deliberate indifference."); Winkler v. Madison County, 893 F.3d 877, 902-03 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Winkler further argues that the County is liable under § 1983 for its failure to adequately train its jail personnel. To succeed on a claim based on inadequate training, Winkler 'must prove the following: (1) the training or supervision was inadequate for the tasks performed; (2) the inadequacy was the result of the municipality's deliberate indifference; and (3) the inadequacy was closely related to or actually caused the injury.'. . Even assuming that Winkler could show that the County's training of its jail personnel was inadequate, she presented no proof to show that this inadequacy resulted from deliberate indifference. This court in Ellis noted that there are two situations justifying a conclusion of deliberate indifference in claims of failure to train or supervise. 'One is failure to provide adequate training in light of foreseeable consequences that could result from a lack of instruction.' ... 'A second type of ... deliberate indifference is where the city fails to act in response to repeated complaints of constitutional violations by its officers.' . . Because Winkler does not provide evidence of any previous instances where inmates have received constitutionally inadequate healthcare at the Detention Center, the second situation is not in play here. 'The [first] mode of proof is available "in a narrow range of circumstances" where a federal rights violation "may be a highly predictable consequence of a failure to equip [employees] with specific tools to handle recurring situations."'. . Winkler's argument is that '[a]lthough jail policies and state regulations guarantee access to emergency medical care, there is no evidence that any jailer received training on anything other than basic first aid and CPR, even though the jailers were the only medical providers at the jail all but 40 hours per week.' But Winkler does not identify what other medical training she believes that the jail personnel should have received. Nor does she explain how the quality of the medical training provided put the County on notice of the likelihood that jail personnel would respond inadequately to an inmate's medical emergency. . . . We therefore see no basis to conclude that the County exhibited deliberate indifference by failing to provide additional medical training to jail personnel. . . . Winkler's final failure-to-train argument is that 'the deputies in this case were not trained or instructed on how to monitor a patient when no medical personnel were available, and as a result did not adequately monitor Clint Hacker.' But she does not cite to the record to support her proposition that jail personnel received no training on how to monitor inmates. Moreover, she acknowledges that the usual practice at the Detention Center was for a physician to provide detailed guidance to jail personnel about how to monitor individual inmates if the physician determined that monitoring for a medical condition was necessary. In sum, Winkler has failed to show that jail personnel's monitoring of Hacker was constitutionally inadequate in this case. We therefore uphold the grant of summary judgment in favor of the County."); Porter v. Epps, 659 F.3d 440, 448 (5th Cir. 2011) ("In sum, no reasonable juror could determine that it was 'obvious that the likely consequence[ ]' of not adopting more specific policies in the records department would be a deprivation of civil rights. While it is unfortunate that the records department erred in interpreting the sentencing order for Porter, this error does not support a finding that Epps's policies involving the records department were objectively unreasonable. Accordingly, Epps is entitled to qualified immunity in this regard. . . . There is insufficient evidence to support a finding that Epps's training or supervision of the employees in the records department was objectively unreasonable. . . . Without more, the fact that an employee erred in one instance does not provide sufficient evidence to show that Epps's alleged actions in failing to train were objectively unreasonable."); Valle v. City of Houston, 613 F.3d 536, 544, 545 (5th Cir. 2010) ("To show that the City's training was inadequate, the Valles presented evidence that the City chose not to implement a 2004 proposal for additional mandatory CIT training, prepared at the direction of the Executive Assistant Chief of Police. According to the proposal, CIT training is 'a proven curriculum for helping officers safely de-escalate situations involving individuals in serious mental health crises.'. . . The Valles have failed to present sufficient evidence of causation as to the entry of their home. That decision was made by Captain Williams, the head of the tactical SWAT team, who was trained in CIT tactics. Moreover, although CIT Officer Broussard testified that she was neither told nor consulted about making entry into the home, she further testified that she did not disagree with the decision to enter. While we are troubled that Captain Williams never spoke directly with the only CIT officer on the scene prior to ordering the forceful entry of the Valles' home, any alleged lack of CIT training was not the 'moving force' in the decision to enter the home."); Parrish v. Ball, 594 F.3d 993, 999 (8th Cir. 2010) ("As in Andrews, where we found no patently obvious need to train an officer not to rape young women even in the face of actual knowledge of deviant behavior, we do not believe that there is a patently obvious need to train an officer not to sexually assault women, especially where there is no notice at all that such behavior is likely. An objectively reasonable officer would know that it is impermissible to touch a detainee's sexual organs by forcible compulsion. . . .Moreover, Fite himself acknowledged in his testimony that he knew such behavior was wrong. Thus, while it may have been wise to tell officers not to sexually assault detainees, it is not so obvious that not doing so would result in an officer actually sexually assaulting a female detainee."); Sanders-Burns v. City of Plano, 594 F.3d 366, 381, 382 (5th Cir. 2010) ("Sanders-Burns's claims against Plano fail. Sanders-Burns fails to produce evidence demonstrating that Plano's training policy procedures were inadequate. While Cabezuela and King both testified that they never received training regarding positional asphyxia, Cabezuela did receive training on how to deal with individuals at a high risk of custodial death due to being handcuffed in a prone position − the cause of Sanders's death by positional asphyxia. The record also demonstrates that Cabezuela was trained in proper procedures for handcuffing individuals, the importance of monitoring individuals in custody, and when it is necessary to obtain medical help for an individual. . . Furthermore, we previously explained that when officers have received training required by Texas law, the plaintiff must show that the legal minimum of training was inadequate. . . Here, Cabezuela completed the state-mandated training for police officers. Sanders-Burns does not allege that the state requirements are inadequate. . . . With regard to single-incident liability, Sanders-Burns has failed to provide evidence to support her claim that the need for more training was 'obvious and obviously likely to result in a constitutional violation.' . . Thus, Sanders-Burns has failed to provide evidence under which a reasonable jury could conclude that Plano acted with deliberate indifference to the rights of its inhabitants with respect to training its police officers regarding the dangers of positional asphyxia."); Peterson v. City of Fort Worth, Tex., 588 F.3d 838, 849, 850 (5th Cir. 2009) ("We have previously held that to hold a municipality liable for failure to train an officer, it must have been obvious that 'the highly predictable consequence of not training' its officers was that they 'would apply force in such a way that the Fourth Amendment rights of [citizens] were at risk.'. . Peterson points to no evidence that the City was aware of any risk of injury from knee strikes, and the City showed that officers otherwise go through extensive training on the use of force. Particularly in the absence of evidence that the use of knee strikes had caused serious injuries on previous occasions, Peterson has presented no material fact question to show that it should have been obvious to the policymakers that the risk of serious injury was a 'highly predictable consequence' of the failure to train. . . . In a similar vein, Peterson alleges the City was deliberately indifferent to the need to supervise its officers adequately. Again, for the City to be liable for failure to supervise, it at least must have been obvious that 'the highly predictable consequence' of not supervising its officers was that they 'would apply force in such a way that the Fourth Amendment rights of [citizens] were at risk.'. . The department's failure to reprimand one officer for an instance of faulty recordkeeping would not alone raise a genuine issue of material fact on whether the obvious and 'highly predictable consequence' of the department's actions was that citizens' Fourth Amendment rights would be violated, and Peterson has otherwise provided no evidence of inadequate supervision. We find no evidentiary support to submit municipal liability to the jury on the theory that the department failed to supervise its officers."); Lewis v. City of West Palm Beach, Florida, 561 F.3d 1288, 1293, 1294 (11th Cir. 2009) ("To establish a city's deliberate indifference, 'a plaintiff must present some evidence that the municipality knew of a need to train and/or supervise in a particular area and the municipality made a deliberate choice not to take any action.' Gold v. City of Miami, 151 F.3d 1346, 1350 (11th Cir.1998). A city may be put on notice in two ways. First, if the city is aware that a pattern of constitutional violations exists, and nevertheless fails to provide adequate training, it is considered to be deliberately indifferent. Id. at 1351. Alternatively, deliberate indifference may be proven without evidence of prior incidents, if the likelihood for constitutional violation is so high that the need for training would be obvious. Id. at 1351-52. Appellant's argument rests on the latter premise. Appellant claims that the need for training on the proper use of hobble restraints and the proper placement of weight on an arrestee's back during the restraint process is 'so obvious' that it requires proactive training by the City to ensure avoidance of constitutional violations. In establishing this form of notice, the Supreme Court referenced the proper use of firearms and the correct use of deadly force as an area that would be so obvious as to require adequate training by the municipality to avoid liability. City of Canton, 489 U.S. at 390 n. 10. In comparison, this Court refused to acknowledge the proper response to handcuff complaints as so obvious as to put the municipality on notice that training is required. Gold, 151 F.3d at 1352. Similarly, the application of a hobble does not rise to the level of obviousness reserved for 'a narrow range of circumstances [where] a violation of federal rights may be a highly predictable consequence' of a failure to provide adequate training. . . Despite the questionable use of the hobble in this particular situation, hobbles do not have the same potential flagrant risk of constitutional violations as the use of deadly firearms. Failure to provide training on hobbles is not a 'particular glaring omission in a training regimen.'. . Notably, in both the case at bar and as previously decided in Garrett v. Athens-Clarke County, 378 F.3d 1274, 1280 (11th Cir.2004), hogtying or 'fettering' under the given circumstances does not violate the Fourth Amendment. The City is therefore unlikely to be on notice of its potential legal ramifications in this context. Thus, the hobble, and the understanding of its proper application, does not carry a high probability for constitutional violations in the manner intended by the 'so obvious' notice that would open the door to municipal liability. Additionally, the City of West Palm Beach does provide training on the use of the hobble. . . . While not under a specific constitutional duty under § 1983, the City takes actions to ensure that arrestees are not subjected to unnecessary or painful procedures when restrained. Because the City of West Palm Beach did not maintain a deliberate indifference to a potentially obvious constitutional violation and because the City provides some training on the use of hobbles, the City cannot be held liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983."); Beard v. Whitmore Lake School Dist., 244 F. App'x 607, 2007 WL 1748139, at *1, *4, *5 (6th Cir. June 19, 2007) ("This case concerning the unconstitutional strip search on May 24, 2000, of 24 students in the Whitmore Lake High School District reaches this court for the second time. See Beard v. Whitmore Lake Sch. Dist., 402 F.3d 598, 601 (6th Cir.2005). In the first appeal, this court found that qualified immunity protected the school teachers who engaged in the illegal search. . . This appeal, in contrast, concerns the liability of the District for the conduct of the teachers. . . . [T]he need for additional training was not 'so obvious' to establish the District's deliberate indifference for several reasons. First, it is not inherently foreseeable that teachers would have ignored the District's policy and guidelines and engaged in an excessive and unconstitutional search. The District, as discussed above, provided teachers with the relevant policies and guidelines and could reasonably expect them to review the policies. . . . The teachers disregarded the District's written policies and engaged in a search that this court has found to have been unconstitutional. Second, while the need to have some policy on unconstitutional searches might be obvious, the need to have a training program above and beyond the policy is not obvious in this case. Clearly, the District recognized that there was a risk that teachers might engage in unconstitutional searches and that having a policy was an appropriate course of action. The risk that unconstitutional searches might occur, however, is distinct from the risk that unconstitutional searches might occur despite the existence of the District's policy limiting such searches. . . . Third, and relatedly, the District's decision not to give a higher priority to search training is consistent with the District's position that the need for additional training was not obvious. . . . . Fourth, the students did not present evidence that teachers routinely encountered situations in which the teachers might have engaged in unconstitutional searches of students without proper training. . . . Fifth, this court previously found that the 'law, at the time the searches were conducted, did not clearly establish that the searches were unreasonable under the particular circumstances present in this case.'. . Given that it was not clear at the time that the search at issue in this case was unconstitutional, it is unlikely that the need for training to prevent the unconstitutional search was

'so obvious' that the District was deliberately indifferent to the need to prevent the search. . . Finally, it is important not to conflate our ex post view of the District's policy from the District's ex ante decision not to engage in additional training. . . . The District has numerous policies and guidelines and it would be impossible to provide sufficient training to cover every possible contingency; a decision to have training on one issue might inevitably lead to insufficient training on another. The Supreme Court in City of Canton only required districts to focus on 'obvious' risks; it did not require them to account for every possible risk."); Gray ex rel Alexander v. Bostic, 458 F.3d 1295, 1308, 1309 (11th Cir. 2006) ("Gray emphasizes that Deputy Bostic received no training specifically addressing the detention of students. She contends that Sheriff Sexton should have foreseen that unwarranted handcuffed detentions of students were 'bound to happen' without such training. Thus, Gray is arguing that the need to train was 'so obvious' that the failure to do so constituted deliberate indifference without prior notice. . . . We . . . conclude that the need for training regarding the detention of students specifically is not obvious in the abstract and that a lack of such training is a 'possible imperfection,' but not a 'glaring omission' from a training regimen. Deputy Bostic received training, at both the police academy and the Tuscaloosa County Sheriff's Department, on the proper use of force and the principles of probable cause. The failure to provide specific training regarding the detention of students, in addition to general training regarding use of force during detention and arrest, was not 'so likely' to result in the violation of students' Fourth Amendment rights that Sheriff Sexton reasonably can be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need for this particularized training without any prior notice."); Ciminillo v. Streicher, 434 F.3d 461, 469, 470 (6th Cir. 2006) ("In arguing that the City of Cincinnati violated his constitutional rights by failing to train its officers in the use of beanbag propellants, Ciminillo points to an agreement entered into between the City of Cincinnati, the Cincinnati Police Department, and the United States Department of Justice regarding, among other things, the use of beanbag propellants. That agreement was entered into less than one month before the events that underlie this action. Furthermore, Ciminillo points to Knight's affidavit, in which Knight states:

> I was trained in use of the bean bag shotgun in the Police Academy consecutively every year at the Police firing range. Part of training is review of Department Policy and Procedure about when you can and can't deploy bean bag shotguns, distances that are safe to deploy the weapon at a subject, and appropriate areas of the body to aim for.

Although Ciminillo argues that a jury could infer from that agreement and Knight's affidavit that the City had not completed the training of its officers, nothing in the record supports such an inference. To the contrary, both the agreement itself and Knight's affidavit suggest that the City was affirmatively taking steps to train officers in the use of beanbag propellants. Furthermore, Ciminillo has submitted no additional evidence regarding the number of incidents of beanbag misuse, delays in the implementation of the Department of Justice agreement, or any other evidence that suggests that the City's training of officers in the use of beanbags is, or ever was, constitutionally defective."); Whitfield v. Melendez-Rivera, 431 F.3d 1, 10, 11 (1st Cir. 2005) ("The parties agree that the Puerto Rico Police Department had promulgated regulations governing the proper use of deadly force and that these regulations were applicable to the municipal police as well as to the Commonwealth police. . . The district court, however, found that there was a factual dispute as to whether Fajardo had adopted these regulations and trained police officers in accordance with them. The plaintiffs' primary evidence establishing this claim was testimony by the mayor and the police commissioner to the effect that there were no municipal regulations concerning the use of deadly force. According to the court, the jury could infer from this evidence, and from Whitfield's testimony concerning the officers' conduct in violating his constitutional rights, that the officers had not been properly trained in the use of deadly force. Such an inference was not warranted on the undisputed facts of this case. The undisputed evidence is that both officers were in fact trained by the Puerto Rico Police according to the policies of the Puerto Rico Police Department. . . . The defendants' evidence included diplomas certifying that both officers had successfully completed the intensive preparatory course administered by the Puerto Rico Police Department, certificates of training received by both officers establishing that they had participated in ongoing training in the proper handling and use of firearms, and the testimony of Mangome and Lebron that they had been trained concerning the constitutional standard for employing deadly force. . . . Whether Fajardo promulgated its own regulations is irrelevant to the lack of training claim, and the plaintiffs' evidence does not otherwise rebut or contradict the evidence that Lebron and Mangome were trained in accordance with the Municipal Police Act and the related Police Department regulations governing the use of force. The testimony of the mayor and the police commissioner does not create a factual dispute as to whether Fajardo had actually adopted or enforced these regulations."); St. John v. Hickey, 411 F.3d 762, 776 (6th Cir. 2005) ("While St. John can point to evidence in the record tending to show that Sheriff Hickey did not provide specific training on the issue of detaining and transporting disabled and/or wheelchair-bound persons,. . . this in and of itself does not support the conclusion that the need for such training was obvious in order to prevent violations of citizens' constitutional rights. St. John does not argue that the Sheriff failed to provide training on the core constitutional obligations of arresting officers, such as the requirement that an arrest be supported by probable cause and that it be carried out in a reasonable manner under the circumstances. A complete lack of training on concepts so fundamental as these may enable a plaintiff to survive summary judgment 'without showing a pattern of constitutional violations.' . . But such a case is very rare; indeed, the plaintiff must show that a violation of constitutional rights is 'a highly predictable consequence of a failure to equip law enforcement officers with specific tools to handle recurring situations.' . . Although it is reasonable, as St. John contends, to assume that arresting officers in Vinton County will encounter disabled and/or wheelchair-bound persons, this assumption alone does not support the conclusion required for § 1983 liability to attach − i.e., that officers' general training on the manner of effectuating an arrest and using 'common sense' is so insufficient that a 'highly predictable consequence' will be recurring violations of the rights of disabled and/or wheelchair-bound persons. . .Because St. John did not produce evidence that Sheriff Hickey ignored a pattern of constitutional violations, nor that the failure to train on the specific issue of arresting and transporting wheelchair-bound persons was highly likely to result in widespread violations of constitutional rights, this Court must affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to Defendants in their official capacities."); Larkin v. St. Louis Housing Authority Development Corporation, 355 F.3d 1114, 1117, 1118 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Because the Constitution may require more training for some officers than for others, the Authority may not be protected from liability simply by relying on the requirements of the licensing agency. . . But the burden is on Larkin to proffer evidence establishing that conditions were such that the officers at Cochran Gardens needed additional training. She has failed to meet this burden. Johnson testified at his deposition that his duties at Cochran Gardens included patrolling in the complex's buildings and facilities, interdicting drug activities, and protecting tenants from harmful situations. He stated that he had the authority to arrest those who committed crimes, to search for and seize evidence in connection with an arrest, and to use lethal force where there 'would be bodily harm or more serious' harm. But there was no evidence that these tasks were any different from those which all armed security guards are expected to be able to perform, and are, in fact, trained to perform. . . . Conclusory statements about the conditions at Cochran Gardens and the duties of its security guards are not sufficient for Larkin to meet her burden at summary judgment. Accordingly, we conclude that a reasonable juror could not find that the Authority's reliance on the training provided for licensure was inadequate, given the lack of evidence that Cochran Gardens' officers were required to perform unusually challenging duties under unusually challenging conditions. . . . A reasonable juror could not find, from the evidence provided, that a violation of constitutional rights was inevitably going to occur at Cochran Gardens. Although Dr. Fyfe did testify that the three days of training Johnson received, when coupled with the type of situations he could expect to see at Cochran Gardens, made 'it inevitable that those situations will be mishandled and that a tragedy will occur,' he never testified that the inevitability would have been patently obvious to the Authority. Thus, no reasonable juror could find, after considering the evidence regarding the nature of the property and the circumstances regularly faced by the security guards, that the Authority had actual or constructive notice of any inadequacy of the training it provided to the guards."); Dunn v. City of Elgin, 347 F.3d 641, 646 (7th Cir. 2003) ("Plaintiffs contend that the City of Elgin showed deliberate indifference by failing to provide any training regarding standby service. They argue that because child custody disputes implicate protected constitutional rights, the City had a responsibility to instruct its officers on how to proceed with regard to custody orders. However, Plaintiffs' argument cannot succeed because the City did adequately train its officers regarding standby service. . . . The fact that two police officers did not follow the policy set forth by the City of Elgin is not enough to prove deliberate indifference by the City. Rather, Plaintiffs had to show that the City was aware that unless further training was given the officers would undermine the constitutional rights of others."); Lytle v. Doyle, 326 F.3d 463, 473, 474 (4th Cir. 2003) ("[T]he Lytles argue that the City should be liable because it showed deliberate indifference to their rights by failing to adequately train Norfolk police officers in citizens' First and Fourteenth Amendment rights. . . . The training provided to officers in the Norfolk Police Department is extensive, varied, and on-going. The officers must attend basic recruit school, receive four months of field training, and attend inservice training and regular seminars on special topics. The Lytles have not provided any evidence that additional training would have resulted in Lieutenant Brewer or the other Norfolk police officers responding any differently. Officers cannot be expected to analyze the complex issues of law surrounding every statute they are required to enforce and then to decide whether the statute is constitutional. And the City cannot be required to anticipate every situation that officers will face. . . The situation here was hardly one that occurred with sufficient frequency such that a failure to properly train officers to handle it reflected a reckless indifference to the Lytles' rights."); S.J. v. Kansas City Missouri Public School Dist., 294 F.3d 1025, 1029 (8th Cir. 2002) ("[T]here was no showing of a 'pattern of misconduct,' and there is, in our view, no 'patently obvious' need for public schools to train volunteers not to commit felonies at home and in their private lives. We are aware of no authority suggesting that public schools have any such obligation, and we do not believe that the evidence can reasonably support a conclusion that Mr. Robertson's crimes can be attributed in any way to a lack of proper training from the school district."); Pineda v. City of Houston, 291 F.3d 325, 333, 334 (5th Cir. 2002) ("The summary judgment record cannot support the plaintiffs' assertion that the training the SWGTF officers received was inadequate. The plaintiffs presented no evidence regarding additional training the SWGTF officers should have received that would have prevented the incident here − they only repeat that 'specialized narcotics training' was required, without ever defining the content of that statement. This conflates the issue of whether GTF officers were performing certain types of unauthorized investigations with whether they were properly trained in Fourth Amendment law. The plaintiffs must create a fact issue as to the inadequacy of the Fourth Amendment training received by GTF officers. The plaintiffs do not allege, and do not provide evidence, that the officers were so untrained as to be unaware that warrantless searches of residences absent an applicable Fourth Amendment exception, such as consent, were unconstitutional. And we think that ignorance of such basic rules is most unlikely. This stands in marked contrast to Brown v. Bryan County and City of Canton v. Harris. In Bryan County the deputy who caused the plaintiff's injury had received no training in proper pursuit and arrest techniques. In City of Canton the officer had received rudimentary first-aid training, but allegedly not enough to recognize a detainee's serious illness. There is no evidence in the summary judgment record to indicate that the SWGTF officers' Fourth Amendment instruction was deficient as to when warrantless searches could be performed. Without this evidence plaintiffs cannot survive summary judgment. . . . In this case, the plaintiffs' experts do not reference the Fourth Amendment training the officers had received prior to the shooting. Even assuming the plaintiffs have created a genuine issue of material fact as to whether or not GTF officers were performing narcotics investigations in violation of HPD policy, and that GTF officers were not adequately trained to perform such investigations, that does not mean that their lack of training caused the injury to Oregon, which for these purposes we assume was the result of a warrantless search of a residence in violation of the Fourth Amendment. There is no competent summary judgment evidence of any causal relationship between any shortcoming of the officers' training regarding warrantless searches of residences and the injury complained of. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the record fails to put at issue whether additional training would have avoided the accident.' [footnotes omitted)); Cozzo v. Tangipahoa-Parish Council-President Government, 279 F.3d 273, 288. 289 (5th Cir. 2002) ("Although we agree with the district court that the testimony of Ms. Cozzo's expert witness, stating that Joiner never attended Louisiana's 320-hour peace officer training course, provided evidence sufficient for the jury to infer that Sheriff Layrison failed to train Deputy Joiner, we emphasize that proffering this testimony did not end Ms. Cozzo's evidentiary burden. Even taking the evidence in the light most favorable to the jury's verdict that Sheriff Layrisson's failure to train Deputy Joiner actually caused Ms. Cozzo's injury, Ms. Cozzo still bore the onus to prove that this failure to train constituted deliberate indifference to her right not to be unconstitutionally dispossessed of her property. Kent's testimony alone is, however, insufficient to meet this burden. See Conner, 209 F.3d at 798 (stating that plaintiffs generally cannot show deliberate indifference through the opinion of only a single expert). Moreover, Captain Peoples's attestation that, in nineteen years of working for the Sheriff's Department, he had received and was aware of no citizens' complaints against any employee regarding the manner in which orders are served cuts against Ms. Cozzo's failure to train supervisory liability claim. Specifically, the elapsing of almost two decades without any such complaint being lodged suggests that the inadequate training was not 'obvious and obviously likely to result in a constitutional violation.' . . Ms. Cozzo pointed to no other evictions based on TROs or any such similar events in the Sheriff Department's history and therefore neglected to proffer proof of the possibility of recurring situations that present an obvious potential for violation of constitutional rights and the need for additional or different training. As such, Ms. Cozzo adduced evidence legally insufficient to support the jury's finding of deliberate indifference. Accordingly, this case does not fit within the single incident exception, and Sheriff Layrisson has persuasively argued that the district court erred in concluding that Ms. Cozzo demonstrated failure to train supervisory liability."); Isbell v. Ray, 208 F.3d 213 (Table), 2000 WL 282463, at *8 (6th Cir. Mar. 8, 2000) (" We hold that Isbell has failed to demonstrate that Dekalb County had a policy or custom of inadequately training its law enforcement officers with respect to strip searches. There was a policy. . . that strip searches were to be conducted only upon 'reasonable belief that a person could have drugs, any kind of contraband or weapons.' . . . Although the jailer Tom Lassiter, who allegedly participated in the search, expressed ignorance about the rules for conducting a strip search and stated that he had never been given a policy statement on this subject, this fact alone is not enough to show a deliberate policy of inadequate training on the part of the county. . . . Isbell has not pointed to any other cases of inappropriate strip searches conducted by Dekalb County officers. . . Nor has he shown that his case fits into that narrow class of circumstances in which the risk of injury is so obvious, and constitutional violations are so predictable, that the failure to train officers in strip search procedure is, without more, evidence of deliberate indifference. . . Isbell's conclusory statement that the risk of constitutional violation is particularly obvious because Dekalb County deputies are authorized to conduct strip searches in a recurring set of circumstances is not sufficient to meet this test. He has pointed to nothing unique about the nature of strip search procedure that would put it in this narrow category of cases."); Conner v. Travis County, 209 F.3d 794, 797 (5th Cir. 2000) ("The Conners did not attempt to prove that the County's failure to train its staff in distinguishing between emergency and non-emergency conditions was deliberately indifferent by showing that prior incidents gave the County or Keel notice of the need for specific training. Instead, they rely on the single episode with Mr. Conner and on their experts' statements about the need for more training. We have previously noted the difficulty plaintiffs face in attempting to show deliberate indifference on the basis of a single incident. . . .We can reasonably expect − if the need for training in this area was 'so obvious' and the failure to train was 'so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights' − that the Connors would be able to identify other instances of harm arising from the failure to train. The fact that they did not do so undercuts their deliberate indifference claim.").

See also Sigle v. City of Chicago, No. 10 C 04618, 2013 WL 1787579, *9, *10 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 25, 2013) ("Sigle offers various complaint registers, lawsuits, and public documents as evidence, but has not proffered any expert testimony opining on the integrity of the complaint register investigations, nor has he adduced deposition testimony of OPS or IPRA investigators familiar with the City's investigation and discipline process. Without more, the plaintiff cannot show that there was an obvious need for further discipline, or that the investigatory and disciplinary procedures in place were plainly inadequate. Without such evidence, a jury could not reasonably conclude that the City had a widespread policy of indifference based only on the defendant officer's complaint register histories, civil rights lawsuits, and statistics regarding the rate of sustained complaints."); Bowen-Soto v. City of Liberal, Kan. No. 08-1171-MLB, 2010 WL 4643350, at *7, *8 (D. Kan. Nov. 9, 2010) ("There is no Tenth Circuit case similar to Cruz which explicitly holds that a police officer violates a person's constitutional rights by failing to recognize excited delirium, nor is there any Tenth Circuit case which holds that a police officer commits a constitutional violation by failing to immediately summon medical assistance for someone suffering from excited delirium. Finally, there is no Tenth Circuit case which holds that a municipality can be 'deliberately indifferent' for failing to train its officers to immediately summon medical help for someone who is experiencing excited delirium. The undisputed facts are that medical assistance was summoned within 9 minutes of Soto being subdued. This may not have been soon enough in the opinion of plaintiff's police expert, but the 'delay' does not amount to deliberate indifference by the officers under City of Canton and Tenth Circuit case law."); Sabo v. City of Mentor, No. 1:10-CV-00345, 2010 WL 4008823, at *7, *8 (N.D. Ohio Oct. 12, 2010) ("Here, the Plaintiff makes no allegation of repeated complaints and instead relies upon the claim that it was foreseeable that not training officers on when to summon the hostage negotiation team would result in the death of barricaded suspects. . . To prove deliberate indifference under this approach, a plaintiff must show that there was an 'obvious' potential for a constitutional violation. . .Aside from pointing to the statements of Captain Knight that the City of Mentor had no formal training program in place, the Plaintiffs proffer no evidence supporting their claim of deliberate indifference. In light of the heavy showing required to prove deliberate indifference, the Plaintiff fails to create a genuine issue of material fact on the second element of the failure to train claim."); Trinidad v. City of Boston, No. 07-11679-DPW, 2010 WL 2817186, at *13 (D. Mass. July 16, 2010) ("As a result of these two incidents, LoPriore was disciplined by the City of Boston, which imposed a sixty-day suspension without pay, with twenty days to be served and the remainder to be held in abeyance for one year as well as a permanent placement on administrative duty as of May 21, 2004. By imposing this sanction on LoPriore, the City cannot be said to have disregarded 'a known or obvious risk of serious harm.' Young, 404 F.3d at 28. To the contrary, placing LoPriore on administrative duty appeared, at the time, to be an adequate and measured sanction to known and knowable conduct by LoPriore and adequately designed to prevent the recurrence of the type of violations arising out of the two prior incidents. . . . Under these circumstances, I find that no reasonable jury could conclude that the City of Boston's investigation of these two incidents, as well as the discipline imposed on LoPriore as a result thereof, demonstrate that it acted in 'deliberate indifference' of Trinidad's constitutional rights."); Montes v. County of El Paso, Tex., No. EP-09-CV-82-KC, 2010 WL 2035821, at *17 (W.D. Tex. May 18, 2010) ("In failure-to-train cases, the Fifth Circuit has created a burden-shifting test and has explicitly held that when police officers 'have received training required by Texas law, the plaintiff must show that the legal minimum of training was inadequate.' Sanders-Burns v. City of Plano, 594 F.3d 366, 382 (5th Cir. 2010). . . . [T]he Plaintiffs have not carried their burden as to the failure-to-train theory, because they have not mustered enough evidence, even when viewed in a light favorable to them, to show that Ramos was inadequately trained."); Pickens v. Harris County, Civil Action No. H-05-2978, 2006 WL 3175079, at *18 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 2, 2006) ("The inability to show a causal link between the training Jones received and his failure to identify Pickens as an off-duty officer is not the only basis to distinguish Young. As noted, in Young, the off-duty officers operated under a more rigid 'always on, always armed' policy than was present in this case. In Young, the First Circuit applied a different standard for deliberate indifference than the Fifth Circuit follows. . . .[I]n the Fifth Circuit, . . . a plaintiff 'usually must demonstrate a pattern of violations and that the inadequacy of the training is obvious and obviously likely to result in a constitutional violation.' . . . The record does not show a pattern of misidentification that would put Harris County on notice of an obvious need for additional, particularized training, so as to make the failure to provide it deliberate indifference. The defendants offer evidence of three previous friendly-fire incidents, two involving plainclothes on-duty officers, and one involving a uniformed on-duty officer. . . Pickens is the first off-duty law-enforcement officer in Harris County to be shot by on-duty officers. . . The plaintiffs did not produce any additional evidence of friendly-fire shootings. . . . The plaintiffs offer no evidence that inadequate training in on-duty/off-duty officer encounters caused Jones to shoot Pickens. The plaintiffs offer suggestions as to additional training for off-duty officers like Pickens, not on-duty officers like Jones. . . . The record does not support a finding that a particular defect in Jones's training caused him to act in an objectively unreasonable way. In this case, unlike Young, the record does not raise a fact issue as to whether, had Jones received specific additional or different training, he would have recognized Pickens as an officer and the shooting would not have occurred. Summary judgment is granted on the failure-to-train and related claims."); Williams v. City of Beverly Hills, Mo., No. 4:04-CV-631 CAS, 2006 WL 897155, at *16 (E.D. Mo. Mar. 31, 2006) ("Plaintiff's contention that the municipalities should have offered their officers training in ramming or PIT maneuvers does not establish a genuine issue of material fact on his failure to train claims. Plaintiff has cited no cases in which courts have held that failure to train in ramming or PIT maneuvers resulted in a violation of constitutional rights where officers were trained in pursuits and defensive driving tactics. In addition, there is no evidence in the record that Beverly Hills or Pine Lawn had notice that their procedures were inadequate or likely to result in a violation of constitutional rights. There is no evidence that prior instances of ramming occurred in either municipality, or that any complaints concerning ramming were made to either municipality. Thus, it cannot be said that the need for more or different training is so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the municipalities were deliberately indifferent to the need."); Logan v. City of Pullman, No. CV-04-214-FVS, 2006 WL 120031, at *5 (E.D. Wash. Jan. 13, 2006) ("Here, Plaintiffs argue that in failing to provide 'meaningful, substantive, and practical training regarding the use of O.C. spray in indoor locations, the use of non-violent techniques, and the limits of constitutional force,' the City acted with deliberate indifference to Plaintiffs' constitutional right to be free from excessive force. . . To succeed on this cause of action, Plaintiffs must show the need to train the officers on using O.C. spray indoors was so obvious and the failure to adopt such a specific training program was so egregious that it rose to the level of deliberate indifference. . . . Plaintiffs have produced no evidence showing the alleged inadequacy of the City's training was the result of a 'deliberate' or 'conscious' choice, which, under Canton, is necessary to establish a municipal policy. Absent any evidence showing the alleged inadequacy in the officers' training was the result of a 'conscious' or 'deliberate' choice, any shortcomings in the training can only be classified as negligence on the part of the City, which is a much lower standard than deliberate indifference standard adopted by the Supreme Court in Canton."); Atak v. Siem, No. Civ. 04-2720DSDSRN, 2005 WL 2105545, at *5 (D. Minn. Aug. 31, 2005) (not reported) ("Plaintiff's claim against the City is based upon the single incident with defendant Siem. To support his claim, plaintiff points only to an expert's testimony that the need to train officers 'is so obvious' that the City's failure to adequately train officials 'can only be seen as deliberate indifference.' . . Plaintiff's expert emphasizes that the City failed to train officers to carry the Taser on the weak side of their body. However, plaintiff must show that the training deficiency was 'so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the city can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.'. . Plaintiff has failed to make such a showing or to offer any evidence of recurring situations that alerted or should have alerted the City to any obvious need to further train its officers. Therefore, summary judgment in favor of the City is appropriate."); Leonard v. Compton, No. 1:03CV1838, 2005 WL 1460165, at *8 (N.D. Ohio June 17, 2005)(not reported) ("Other than relying on the constitutional violation itself to establish the existence of inadequate training, plaintiffs have presented no evidence to suggest that the City of Cleveland disregarded an obvious need for training or that such disregard culminated with Ms. Leonard's injury. Although plaintiffs argue that the City of Cleveland has failed to properly train officers on the enforcement of Civil Domestic Relations Orders, they have not pointed to any evidence in the record which actually demonstrates whether or not the City of Cleveland specifically conducts training on this issue. . . Even assuming that the City of Cleveland provides no specific training on this issue, plaintiffs' claim would still fail as they have provided nothing to suggest that the failure to conduct training in this area constitutes a deliberate choice to disregard an obvious risk of constitutional violations. On the contrary, the evidence in this case does not suggest the need for such training to avoid the constitutional injury suffered by Ms. Leonard. Indeed, Officer Durbin testified that this incident was the first time in his ten-year career that he arrested someone when effectuating a parent's court-ordered visitation rights. . . . Because plaintiffs have failed to provide sufficient evidence that the City of Cleveland's deliberate indifference to an obvious need for training led to Ms. Leonard's constitutional injury, the City of Cleveland is entitled to summary judgment on plaintiffs' Section 1983 claim."); Perez v. Miami-Dade County, 348 F.Supp.2d 1343, 1352, 1353 (S.D. Fla. 2004) ("A court must look to the 'particular area' of need to determine whether training was so obviously necessary that failure to provide training constituted deliberate indifference. . . Thus, in City of Miami, the Court determined that a claim of inadequate training in the use of handcuffs failed because the Plaintiff 'presented no evidence of a single prior incident in which a City police officer caused an injury by excessive force in handcuffing.' . . Similarly, here, Plaintiff has provided no evidence of any incident where Defendant's police officer unlawfully used a vehicle as a deadly weapon. On the other hand, Defendant has presented evidence that it has a training program that teaches its officers not to use their vehicles in a deadly manner except when necessary to protect their life or the lives of others. In such a case, the Court must find that the County did not inadequately train its officers in the use of vehicles as a deadly weapon or systematically cover-up the improper use of vehicles by its officers."); Brown v. City of Milwaukee, 288 F.Supp.2d 962, 980, 981 (E.D. Wis. 2003) ("The City does not dispute that it had an express policy that, under certain circumstances, officers stopping vehicles for investigative purposes were to surround the vehicle and order the driver out at gunpoint while shouting commands laced with profanities. The City admits that it trained police officers to use this tactic. Plaintiff does not contend that the City's policy was facially unconstitutional but, rather, that it was unconstitutional as applied to the stop of her vehicle. . . . . Plaintiff argues that the City failed to provide any supervision, monitoring or oversight of police officers who implemented the policy, and that such failure amounted to deliberate indifference to the policy's obvious consequences. The City does not dispute that, at the time of the incident, the policy contained no mechanism to review its use. The policy did not require officers who used the sensory overload tactic to advise their superiors of such use or document their actions and the results in reports. Plaintiff argues that it should have been obvious to the City that without supervision and monitoring the consequences of a policy endorsing such highly intrusive conduct would be that individuals' constitutional rights would be violated. However, under Seventh Circuit law, a City cannot be held liable for deliberate indifference unless the plaintiff establishes that the City was or should have been aware of a pattern of constitutional violations caused by its policy. . . Here, plaintiff does not present evidence of a pattern of constitutional violations caused by the use of the sensory overload tactic; she refers only to her own experience. Thus, plaintiff may not prevail on her theory that the City was deliberately indifferent to the known or obvious consequences of its policy approving of the use of this tactic."); Pliakos v. City of Manchester, No. 01-461-M., 2003 WL 21687543, at *17 (D.N.H. July 15, 2003) (not reported) ("The fact that the Manchester Police Department produced a training video discussing the risk factors associated with positional asphyxia suggests that it was engaged in a reasonable effort to keep its officers informed of the latest information available concerning safe methods by which subjects might be restrained. That the individual defendants in this case may not have seen the training video until after the events at issue here, or that they saw but did not benefit from it, does not, without more, amount to 'deliberate indifference' on the part of the municipality."); But see Gray v. City of Columbus, No. IP98-1395-C H/G, 2000 WL 683394, at *4 (S.D. Ind. Jan. 31, 2000) ("The written policy plays a critical role in shaping the legal issues in this case. Both Officers Yentz and Darnall testified they were aware of no such policy. Chief Latimer was also not aware of the policy, or else his memory of it was buried so deeply that he did not remember it even when he was personally responding to a document request for policies on searches in a case alleging unconstitutional strip searches and body cavity searches. On this record, a jury could reasonably conclude that the city went to the trouble of formulating a policy on this subject but was deliberately indifferent to the need to provide officers with at least some minimal guidance or training on the subject.").

See also Ross v. Town of Austin, 343 F.3d 915, 918, 919 (7th Cir. 2003) ("42 U.S.C. § 1983 imposes upon municipalities no constitutional duty to provide law enforcement officers with advanced, specialized training based upon a general history of criminal activity in the community. Here, the fact that APD officers had dealt with armed felons in the past did not obligate Appellees to anticipate the utility of hostage negotiation or tactical combat training. In the context of a failure-to-train claim, deliberate indifference does not equate with a lack of strategic prescience. The fact that Noble, a police officer in a town with a population of fewer than 5000, completed training from the Indiana Law Enforcement Academy and had met all other statutorily mandated training standards, is further evidence that, as a matter of law, it was not the policy of Appellees inadequately to train police officers. By creating a law requiring municipalities to exceed the standards for police training established by state law, not only would this court exceed the scope of our judicial authority by usurping the policy-making authority of state legislators, but we would also impose upon smaller municipalities such as Austin, the untenable burden of maintaining the same standards of law enforcement training specialization as those of large cities or even national armies. Even were it within the province of this court to establish such a policy, it seems neither wise nor practical. Finally, neither Richey's preference for 'street' training of police officers nor his failure to attend a mandatory state training program for chiefs of police evinces an official policy of inadequately training APD officers or a deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of the citizens of Austin. It does not follow logically from Richey's more favorable opinion of the value of on-the-job experience that he or the APD eschewed formal training as a matter of policy. Nor does his own failure to attend the mandatory training program demonstrate that he, the APD, or the Town had adopted a policy of failing to train Noble or other officers. Tamra does not suggest, and we do not discern, what constitutional harm might have been avoided by Richey's attendance of the training program."); Pena v. Leombruni, 200 F.3d 1031, 1033 (7th Cir. 1999) ("[F]ailing merely to instruct police on the handling of dangerous people who appear to be irrational cannot amount to deliberate indifference, at least on the facts presented in this case. The sheriff had announced a policy that . . . the deputies were not to use deadly force unless they (or other persons) were threatened by death or great bodily harm, and this policy covered the case of the crazy assailant, giving him all the protection to which constitutional law entitled him. Maybe despite what we have just said it would be desirable to take special measures to render such a person harmless without killing or wounding him, . . . but if so the failure to adopt those measures would not be more than negligence, which is not actionable under section 1983."); Gold v. City of Miami, 151 F.3d 1346, 1351, 1352 (11th Cir. 1998) ("This Court repeatedly has held that without notice of a need to train or supervise in a particular area, a municipality is not liable as a matter of law for any failure to train and supervise. . . . In City of Canton v. Harris, . . . the Supreme Court in dictum left open the possibility that a need to train could be 'so obvious,' resulting in a City's being liable without a pattern of prior constitutional violations. . . . [T]o date, the Supreme Court has given only a hypothetical example of a need to train being 'so obvious' without prior constitutional violations: the use of deadly force where firearms are provided to police officers."); Febus-Rodriguez v. Betancourt-Lebron, 14 F.3d 87, 93 n.6 (1st Cir. 1994) ("[W]e do not find that the need to extensively train officers about how to identify and deal with mentally handicapped persons is so obvious, that failure to give this training supports a finding of reckless or callous indifference to constitutional rights."); Benavides v. County of Wilson, 955 F.2d 968, 975 (5th Cir. 1992) (no deliberate indifference based on Sheriff's failure to conduct further investigations of his deputies, beyond good-faith investigation of applicant's known arrest record), cert. denied sub. nom. Bassler v. County of Wilson, 113 S. Ct. 79 (1992); Graham v. Sauk Prairie Police Commission, 915 F.2d 1085, 1104 (7th Cir. 1990) (where villages had taken a number of reasonable steps to investigate police applicant's background, failure to take additional screening steps was not so obvious as to constitute deliberate indifference to constitutional rights); Dorman v. District of Columbia, 888 F.2d 159, 164 (D.C. Cir. 1989) (need for specific training in suicide prevention beyond what officers received, in contrast with need for training in use of deadly force, was not so obvious that city's policy could be characterized as deliberately indifferent); Holiday v. City of Kalamazoo, 255 F. Supp.2d 732, 738, 739 (W.D. Mich. 2003) ("The deficiency in KDPS' training that Holiday alleges is a failure to specifically instruct the officers in situation where the canine handler is incapacitated and not present at the scene of a canine apprehension. While such a situation occurred in the instant case, it is nonetheless a very unlikely scenario. Under Harris, KDPS is only required to adequately train its officers 'to respond properly to the usual and recurring situations which they must deal,' not every remotely-possible situation the imagination can conjure. . . KDPS' training program was adequate to train its officers to deal with routine apprehensions involving police dogs and their handlers."); Owens v. City of Fort Lauderdale, 174 F. Supp.2d 1282, 1297, 1298 (S.D. Fla. 2001) ("The plaintiffs also contend that this case fits into the narrow range of circumstances in which the need to train was so obvious that the failure to do so can be said to have been deliberately indifferent. . . The only hypothetical example the Supreme Court has given of a need to train that is 'so obvious' without prior constitutional violations is the use of deadly force when officers are provided with firearms. . . . The plaintiffs contend that this case falls within the 'narrow range of circumstances, [when] a violation of federal rights may be a highly predictable consequence of a failure to equip law enforcement officers with specific tools to handle recurring situations.' . . . The plaintiffs analogize the failure to train officers specifically in the use of neck restraints to the failure to train officers in the use of firearms. I do not think the analogy is apt. This is simply not the type of case in which Byron's injury was 'a highly predictable consequenc' of a failure to train regarding neck restraints. . . . The plaintiffs can simply not show that the likelihood that officers will be forced to restrain citizens − and especially mental patients such as Byron − using choke holds, or lateral vascular neck restraints is so obvious, and constitutional violations so likely to result that the failure of the City to train on the use of choke holds was deliberately indifferent."); Tennant v. Florida, 111 F. Supp.2d 1326, 1335 (S.D. Fla. 2000) ("The court concludes that this case is like Gold, where the Eleventh Circuit concluded that the need to train police in the proper response to handcuff complaints is not so obvious that it would support a finding of deliberate indifference without proof of prior incidents."); Bullard v. City of Mobile, No. CIV. A. 00-0114-CB-M, 2000 WL 33156407, at *8 n.6 (S.D. Ala. Dec. 11, 2000) ("It can hardly be said . . . that failure to train every police officer in negotiating tactics or in the use of a bean bag gun or to pick up a knife within thirty seconds would so obviously lead to the violation of a constitutional right that the City could be considered deliberately indifferent."); Guseman v. Martinez, 1 F. Supp.2d 1240, 1261 (D. Kan. 1998) ("It would not have been 'known or obvious' to a reasonable policymaker that a failure to provide immediate further training would likely result in a deprivation of constitutional rights. Such an eventuality would have seemed remote prior to this incident. Despite the fact that the city had no policy prohibiting restraint techniques of the type challenged, no person had ever before died of positional asphyxiation while in Wichita police custody. There were no known court decisions finding that the use of prone restraint techniques on a person who had resisted arrest was a violation of the person's constitutional rights. The materials in the record indicate that positional asphyxiation is a relatively rare event brought on by a unique combination of circumstances. Plaintiffs cite no evidence that the dangers of positional asphyxiation were widely understood prior to this incident or that police departments in general considered such information to be an essential part of their training regimens."); Barber v. Guay, 910 F. Supp. 790, 801 (D. Me. 1995) ("A failure to train claim must establish deliberate indifference. Here there is no evidence that [Sheriff] Havey knew of any poor police work on the part of Guay to the extent that Havey's failure to supplement Guay's training would necessarily lead to the violation of constitutional rights."); Dansby v. Borough of Paulsboro, No. CIV. A. 92-4558(JEI), 1995 WL 352995, *16 (D.N.J. June 7, 1995) (not reported) ("While plaintiff has adduced evidence that the Paulsboro police received no training on the enforcement of municipal ordinances or the sign-posting statute, this Court simply cannot believe that a small municipality must provide each police officer with extensive training on every obscure state statute and local ordinance. Indeed, plaintiff's assertion that the statutes at issue were rarely, if ever, enforced undercuts his argument that municipal policymakers were deliberately indifferent to the rights of citizens that were violated by the enforcement of these laws."); Anderson v. City of Glenwood, 893 F. Supp. 1086, 1090 (S.D. Ga. 1995) ("The State training is modelled on minimum legal standards under Georgia law, and without other evidence to support a finding of deliberate indifference, the fact that an officer received most of his training through the State and not from his small town police force is not nearly enough to accuse that town of deliberate indifference to the needs of its citizenry. [cites omitted] Anderson also has failed to reveal a direct causal link between not studying the Glenwood policies and procedures (as opposed to general State procedures) and the shooting in this case."); Wyche v. City of Franklinton, 837 F. Supp. 137, 144-45 (E.D.N.C. 1993) ("As evidence that the Town of Franklinton displayed deliberate indifference, the plaintiff relies on the fact that the Town of Franklinton had no written policy on training, responding to 'abnormal mental behavior' calls, hiring, supervision, or equipping officers. In further support of her contention, the plaintiff submitted documents showing that the Town of Franklinton spent less than 1% of its annual budget on police training; that only one officer was on duty during the 8:00 p.m. to 8:00 a.m. shift; that the Town of Franklinton had no specific policy or procedure for investigating complaints against police officers; and, that alternative forms of restraint, such as chemical sprays or stun guns, were not available to [defendant]. The defendants do not dispute that the above facts are true. However, these facts do not aid the plaintiff in meeting her burden of showing deliberate indifference. The plaintiff has not shown that Franklinton police officers needed additional training in the use of force or had a history of using excessive force."); Fittanto v. Children's Advocacy Center, 836 F. Supp. 1406, 1418 (N.D. Ill. 1993) ("Absent any evidence that the Village should have been on notice of the need for specialized training [in investigation of child sexual abuse], a reasonable jury could not conclude that the need was so obvious and the inadequacy so likely to result in constitutional violation that the Village could be said to have been consciously indifferent."); Behrens v. Sharp, CIV. A. No. 92-1498, 1993 WL 205078, *4 (E.D. La. June 8, 1993) (not reported) ("There is no evidence that the alleged inadequate training of detectives to investigate cases of alleged sexual abuse of a child was 'so obvious ... and likely to result in violations of constitutional rights' that Sheriff Canulette can be said to have been deliberately indifferent to such rights in adopting his training policy."), aff'd, 15 F.3d 180 (5th Cir. 1994)(Table), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 2711 (1994); Fulkerson v. City of Lancaster, 801 F. Supp. 1476, 1486 (E.D. Pa. 1992) (no "obvious need" for specialized training in high-speed pursuits, beyond what was given), aff'd, 993 F.2d 876 (3d Cir. 1993); Brown v. City of Elba, 754 F. Supp. 1551, 1558 (M.D. Ala. 1990) (failure to train officers in handling of domestic disputes is not so obviously likely to result in constitutional violations as to satisfy deliberate indifference standard); East v. City of Chicago, 719 F. Supp. 683, 694 (N.D. Ill. 1989) (unlike use of force problem, ingestion of drugs by arrestees was not so common or obvious that City should have recognized need for training in that area).

Compare Carswell v. Borough of Homestead, 381 F.3d 235, 245 (3d Cir. 2004) ("[W]e have never recognized municipal liability for a constitutional violation because of failure to equip police officers with non-lethal weapons. We decline to do so on the record before us. . . . Mandating the type of equipment that police officers might find useful in the performance of their myriad duties in frequently unanticipated circumstances is a formidable task indeed. It is better assigned to municipalities than federal courts. We conclude that the judgment as a matter of law in favor of the Borough and Chief Zuger as well as that in favor of Snyder must be affirmed.") with Carswell v. Borough of Homestead, 381 F.3d 235, 246-50 (3d Cir. 2004) (McKee, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("As the majority ably discusses, the fact that a jury could conclude that Snyder used excessive force to subdue Carswell and thus violated Carswell's Fourth Amendment rights is not enough, standing alone, to deprive him of qualified immunity. It is, however, enough to support a finding that the use of excessive force resulted from the Borough's policy and custom of providing police officers only with guns, i.e. lethal weapons.[footnote omitted] The jury could conclude from Snyder's testimony that, at the very moment he fired the fatal shot, he believed that he was using excessive deadly force where non-lethal force would suffice. Indeed, if the jury accepted his testimony as true, it would have been hard to conclude anything else. The jury could therefore reason that the officer had to resort to excessive force solely because the Borough left him no alternative but to use his gun in a situation where non-lethal force could reasonably have been employed to subdue Carswell. . . . I believe that a jury could reasonably conclude that this record establishes such deliberate indifference because the Borough's training left Officer Snyder with no reasonable alternative to the use of deadly force. . . . Police Chief Zuger compiled the policy manual for the Borough's police department pursuant to his authority as police chief. . . The manual contains the Borough's official policy for the police department, and all police officers in the Borough were required to familiarize themselves with it and attest to having read it. It prescribes an official policy of 'progressive force' for the Borough's police, stating that '[t]he use of force will be progressive in nature, and may include verbal, physical force, the use of non-lethal weapons or any other means at the officer's disposal, provided they are reasonable under the circumstances.' . . Chief Zuger testified further that '[t]he policy of the Homestead Police Department is to use only the amount of force which is necessary in making an arrest or subduing an attacker. In all cases, this will be the minimum amount of force that is necessary.' . . . [footnote omitted] However, as the majority notes, the Borough provided only guns to its officers. It did not equip them with any non-lethal weapons. Rather, an officer had to request any non-lethal weapon he/she might wish to carry and the request had to be approved by Zuger. If the request was approved, the officer then had to undergo additional training with the new weapon and become certified to use it. . . Although Chief Zuger was not asked about training in lethal force, the fact that officers were equipped with a gun and had to be trained in any approved non-lethal weapon they may have carried certainly supports the inference that the Borough only trained officers in the use of lethal force unless the Borough approved an individual request for a non-lethal weapon. It is obviously foreseeable that an officer who is equipped only with a lethal weapon, and trained only in the use of lethal force, will sooner or later have to resort to lethal force in situations that officer believes could be safely handled using only non-lethal force under the Borough's own 'progressive force' policy. This record therefore presents that 'narrow range of circumstances, [where] the violation of federal rights [is] a highly predictable consequence of a failure to equip law enforcement officers with specific tools to handle recurring situations.' . . . [D]efining our inquiry in terms of whether the Constitution creates an approved 'equipment list' for police is both misleading and counterproductive. That is simply not the issue, and that formulation of the issue obfuscates our inquiry rather than advancing it. Given the duties of a police officer, it was certainly foreseeable that the Borough's policy of equipping officers only with guns and training them only in the use of deadly force would sooner or later result in the use of unjustifiable deadly force. . . . The result is. . .not a mandated equipment list, but a mandated alternative to using deadly force in those situations where an officer does not believe it is necessary to use deadly force. . . . Moreover, interpreting the Fourth Amendment as requiring municipalities to provide reasonable alternatives to the use of deadly force imposes no undue burden. In fact, here, it would do nothing more than effectuate the Borough's own announced policy of 'progressive force.' My colleagues imply that the Borough can not be liable under a failure to train theory because its police officers were properly trained in the use of deadly force. . . . However, plaintiff never argued that liability should be imposed on the basis of a failure to train in the use of deadly force. Rather, plaintiff argues that the Borough should be liable because its policy of requiring training only in using deadly force and equipping officers only with a lethal weapon, caused Officer Snyder to use lethal force even though he did not think it reasonable or necessary to do so. Moreover, as I have already noted, given the duties of a police officer, it does not require a 'pattern of underlying constitutional violations' to alert the Borough to the fact that its policies would cause police to unnecessarily use deadly force. Rather, as I have argued above, this record satisfies the teachings of Brown because plaintiffs have established that 'narrow range of circumstances, [where] a violation of federal rights may be a highly predictable consequence of a failure to equip law enforcement officers with specific tools to handle recurring situations.'. . Thus, even without a pattern of abuse, '[t]he likelihood that the situation will recur and the predictability that an officer lacking specific tools to handle that situation will violate citizens' rights could justify a finding that policymakers' decision ... reflected Adeliberate indifference' to the obvious consequence of the policymakers' choice.'").

See also Estate of Larsen v. Murr, No. 03 CV 02589 MSK OES, 2006 WL 322602, at *6 (D. Colo. Feb. 10, 2006) ("The Estate also contends that, at the time of Mr. Larsen's death, the City engaged in a custom of not arming officers with 'less-lethal' weapons. In 2000, the City assembled a committee to address whether to provide 'less-lethal' weapons to patrol officers, but the committee had not finished its work by the time of Mr. Larsen's death. 'Less-lethal' weapons such as Tasers, the 'less-lethal' shotgun, and the pepper ball were available at the time of Mr. Larsen's death but had not been provided to patrol officers. It was not until April 2003 that the City began deploying Tasers to patrol officers. It did not deploy the less-lethal shotgun or pepper ball to patrol officers until later that year. It is unclear that the City engaged in a deliberate decision not to deploy 'less-lethal' weapons between 2000 and 2003. However, assuming it did and that such behavior amounts to a 'custom or policy', there is no evidence in the record that Officer Murr would have acted any differently had he been equipped with a 'less lethal' weapon. He testified that he believed that Mr. Larsen was going to kill him. The Court cannot speculate that if Officer Murr had been issued a 'less-lethal' weapon, he would have chose to use it in these circumstances. Thus, the Court cannot conclude that the failure to issue 'less-lethal' weapons caused Mr. Larsen's death.").

Under some circumstances, having no policy may constitute deliberate indifference. See, e.g., Vineyard v. County of Murray, Georgia, 990 F.2d 1207, 1212 (11th Cir. 1993) ("The evidence demonstrates that the Sheriff's Department had inadequate procedures for recording and following up complaints against individual officers. . . . no policies and procedures manual. . . . [and] inadequate policies of supervision, discipline and training of deputies in the Murray County Sheriff's Department. . . ."); Oviatt v. Pearce, 954 F.2d 1470, 1477-78 (9th Cir. 1992) (decision not to take any action to alleviate the problem of detecting missed arraignments constitutes a policy of deliberate indifference to the obvious likelihood of prolonged and unjustified incarcerations); Reynolds v. Borough of Avalon, 799 F. Supp. 442, 447 (D.N.J. 1992) ("We hold that a reasonable jury might find that the risk of sexual harassment in the workplace is so obvious that an employer's failure to take action to prevent or stop it from occurring − even in the absence of actual knowledge of its occurrence − constitutes deliberate indifference, where the employer has also failed to take any steps to encourage the reporting of such incidents."); DiLoreto v. Borough of Oaklyn, 744 F. Supp. 610, 623-24 (D.N.J. 1990) ("By not creating and implementing a policy and not training its employees regarding accompanying detainees to the bathroom, the Borough has expressed deliberate indifference to the fourth amendment rights of detainees....").

Note also that at least one court of appeals has rejected the notion "that a municipality may shield itself from liability for failure to train its police officers in a given area simply by offering a course nominally covering the subject, regardless of how substandard the content and quality of that training is." Russo v. City of Cincinnati, 953 F.2d 1036, 1047 (6th Cir. 1992) (simple fact that officers received some training in course entitled "Disturbed-Distressed Persons" and that Department had policy of handling barricaded persons, did not necessitate finding that training was adequate as matter of law).

b. constructive notice cases

In Kerr v. City of West Palm Beach, 875 F.2d 1546 (11th Cir. 1989), the court of appeals reinstated a verdict against the City, concluding that there was sufficient evidence from which the jury could have found that the plaintiffs' injuries were caused by the failure of the City and the former police chief to adequately train and supervise performance of the police department's canine unit, and that this failure constituted deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of the plaintiffs. Id. at 1555-56. The evidence introduced included the following:

*officers in City's canine unit resorted to use of canine force more frequently than did officers in other cities

*the high ratio of bites to apprehensions was viewed in other canine units as a sign of irresponsible use of force

*officers in the canine unit often used excessive force when subduing individuals suspected of minor misdemeanor offenses

*reports were filed by officers whenever apprehensions resulted in bites; such reports were reviewed by the police chief

* City was aware of the deficiencies in the training and supervision of the canine unit

The jury could reasonably conclude the City's failure to take any remedial action amounted to deliberate indifference. Id. at 1557.

But see D.H. v. City of New York, 309 F.Supp.3d 52, ___ (S.D.N.Y. 2018) ("In an attempt to establish the City's awareness of the purported unlawful enforcement of section 240.37, the amended complaint references three lawsuits since 2008 in which the plaintiffs in those lawsuits alleged that NYPD officers effected unlawful arrests under section 240.37, none of which resulted in a finding of liability or an admission of liability. . . Three allegations of wrongdoing over the course of eight years in a police department with more than 35,000 officers do not indicate that that unlawful enforcement of the statute is a known or obvious result. . . Further, plaintiffs have not asserted that any of these alleged unlawful arrests were related to the challenged municipal acts, nor have they indicated that the City failed to take any remedial action after the lawsuits were initiated. . .Additionally, plaintiffs present a statement from a former NYPD officer that performance goals and arrest quotas cause officers to target the black, Hispanic, and LGBT communities. . . This statement was made on March 1, 2016—after each of the alleged violations. . . Even if the Court assumes that a statement by a single officer in a department with over 35,000 officers would suffice to establish that unlawful enforcement is a known or obvious result of performance goals and arrest quotas, the City would not have known, based on that statement, until after the alleged the violations occurred, meaning that deliberate indifference in light of this allegation could not have caused plaintiffs' injuries. Plaintiffs have not adequately alleged that the City was deliberately indifferent."); Samarco v. Neumann, 44 F. Supp.2d 1276, 1288 (S.D. Fla. 1999) ("Evidence of a pattern or series of incidents is required to subject a government entity to liability. . . Proof of one or two incidents is not enough. . . Samarco must submit evidence of deficiencies on the Sheriff Office's general training of all its canine deputies, which he has failed to do. . .Thus, he has not produced evidence creating a genuine issue of material fact that the Sheriff's Office has a policy of failing to train its canine units on the proper use and limits of force. Absent a policy to use the canine teams in an unconstitutional manner or evidence that Sheriff Neumann was deliberately indifferent regarding the training of these teams, summary judgment in favor of Sheriff Neumann in his official capacity is warranted.").

See also Okin v. Village of Cornwall-On-Hudson Police Dept., 577 F.3d 415, 440, 441 (2d Cir. 2009) ("Municipal liability may also be premised on a failure to train employees when inadequate training 'reflects deliberate indifference to ... constitutional rights.'. . .We have no trouble in finding that policymakers would know that officers will confront domestic violence situations, that training assists officers to employ criminal justice strategies attuned to the complexities of domestic violence, and that in Okin's case, the record indicates a history of mishandling her complaints. There is also a strong likelihood that the officers' repeated failures to meaningfully respond to Okin, potentially enhancing the risk of violence, qualifies as a pattern of misconduct that would frequently cause violations of a citizen's constitutional rights and that suggests training so inadequate as to give rise to an inference of deliberate indifference. . . . A closer question is whether Okin, in order to proceed beyond summary judgment on the failure-to-train theory, has 'identif[ied] a specific deficiency in the city's training program and establish[ed] that that deficiency is closely related to the ultimate injury, such that it actually caused the constitutional deprivation.'. . . A pattern of misconduct, while perhaps suggestive of inadequate training, is not enough to create a triable issue of fact on a failure-to-train theory. . . . We agree with the district court's observation that the record shows more than a pattern of misconduct. Because some of the officers were unable during their depositions to remember basic details regarding their training on domestic violence, a reasonable factfinder could plausibly infer that the training program failed to impart with the necessary frequency or specificity how to appropriately respond to domestic violence complaints, including the circumstances that call for interviewing suspects and witnesses, filing domestic incident reports, and making an arrest. It is questionable whether evidence of the officers' inability to recall the substance of their training could alone create a triable issue of fact on the adequacy of a training program. . .The record in this case is not so limited, however. . . . The repeated failure of high-ranking officers to properly respond to domestic violence complaints, when those same officers were responsible for teaching subordinates how to respond [to] domestic violence, suggests a fundamental flaw in the training program − placing training responsibility in the hands of those who may themselves not understand the problem or the appropriate response. . . . We therefore conclude, although the question is close, that Okin offers evidence of a specific training deficiency and that, but for this deficiency, the alleged violations could have been avoided."); Arledge v. Franklin County, Ohio, 509 F.3d 258, 264 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Plaintiffs claim that Franklin County inadequately trained its caseworkers such that they were not required to contact law enforcement agencies in the county of placement to insure that prospective care givers did not have criminal backgrounds. This failure resulted in Daniel's placement with Mr. Powers despite Mr. Powers's conviction for aggravated menacing, which would have precluded his eligibility as a possible residence for Daniel.As the district court held, in order to meet the deliberate indifference standard outlined in Berry and City of Canton v. Harris, the failure to train must reflect a deliberate or conscious choice made by the municipality. . . The County may be held liable only if 'the need for more or different training is so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the policy makers of the city can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.' . . We agree with the district court that plaintiffs have not established deliberate indifference; rather, the plaintiffs have shown only negligence. As discussed earlier, it is obvious that more could have been done, and that better training and procedures may have helped to prevent Daniel's death. But it cannot be said that the inadequacy of the training provided by the county was so obviously inadequate as to likely result in a violation of constitutional rights. There was no history of this type of violence in Franklin County; only Daniel's tragic incident is presented as evidence of the alleged unconstitutional policy and practice. Accordingly, it cannot be said that Franklin County was deliberately indifferent to the need for more or different training in this context."); Pena v. Leombruni, 200 F.3d 1031, 1033, 1034 (7th Cir. 1999) ("If Winnebago County had seen a rash of police killings of crazy people and it was well understood that these killings could have been avoided by the adoption of measures that would adequately protect the endangered police, then the failure to take these measures might, we may assume without having to decide, be found to manifest deliberate indifference to the rights of such people."); Chew v. Gates, 27 F.3d 1432, 1445 (9th Cir. 1994) ("Where the city equips its police officers with potentially dangerous animals, and evidence is adduced that those animals inflict injury in a significant percentage of the cases in which they are used, a failure to adopt a departmental policy governing their use, or to implement rules or regulations regarding the constitutional limits of that use, evidences a 'deliberate indifference' to constitutional rights. Under such circumstances, a jury could, and should, find that Chew's injury was caused by the city's failure to engage in any oversight whatsoever of an important departmental practice involving the use of force.").

In Bordanaro v. McLeod, 871 F.2d 1151 (1st Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 110 S. Ct. 75 (1989), plaintiffs, severely beaten by police officers of the City of Everett, claimed that their injuries "were the direct result of an unconstitutional police department custom of breaking down doors without a warrant whenever its officers were apprehending a felon. Second, the plaintiffs maintained that their injuries had been caused by a custom or policy of gross negligence amounting to deliberate indifference in the recruitment, training, supervision or discipline of Everett's police officers." 871 F.2d at 1155. The First Circuit affirmed the jury's imposition of liability on the City on both theories.

Based on testimonial evidence (uncontradicted version of arrest practice) and inference from the event itself (involvement of entire night watch acting in concert demonstrated shared set of rules, customs and pre-existing practices), the existence of the unconstitutional custom was established. Id. at 1156. Furthermore, the court found that the custom was so widespread that the Chief of Police, a policymaker for the police department, should have known of the unconstitutional practice. Allowing the practice to continue amounted to deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of the citizens of Everett.

The court concluded that the Chief's "failure to eradicate this facially unconstitutional practice from the police department attributes that custom to the municipality." Id. at 1157.

In affirming the jury's finding that the City failed to provide minimally acceptable standards of recruitment, training, supervision and discipline of its police force, the First Circuit noted the substantial evidence presented to the jury on this issue. This was not a case where the jurors were asked to infer a policy of inadequate training from a single, though egregious, incident. The evidence included:

* the City was operating under a 1951 set of rules and regulations

* officers received little or no training after initial police academy course

* City discouraged officers from seeking supplementary training

* no supervisory or command training was required upon promotion to a higher rank

* too much discretion existed at all operating levels

* background checks of prospective officers were superficial

* discipline meted out inconsistently and infrequently

* no disciplinary action had been taken against officers involved in this incident until after they had been indicted

* a full, internal investigation by Everett Police Department did not occur until over one year after incident 871 F.2d at 1159-60.

The court also concluded that it was reasonable for the jury to attribute the established inadequacies to the municipality by finding that the Chief of Police and Mayor had express knowledge of the inadequacies and were deliberately indifferent to these failings. Id. at 1161-62. Finally, the jury could have found that the inadequacies in training, supervision and discipline "led directly to the constitutional violations . . . . " Id. at 1162.

In Bordanaro, the First Circuit upheld the trial court's admission of post-event evidence (lack of proper internal investigation and failure to discipline officers involved) for the purpose of establishing what customs were in effect in the City before the King Arthur incident. Id. at 1166.

"Post-event evidence can shed some light on what policies existed in the city on the date of an alleged deprivation of constitutional right." Id. at 1167. Accord Beck v. City of Pittsburgh, 89 F.3d 966, 973 (3d Cir. 1996) (recognizing that post-event incident "may have evidentiary value for a jury's consideration whether the City and policymakers had a pattern of tacitly approving the use of excessive force."); Foley v. City of Lowell, 948 F.2d 10, 13-15 (1st Cir. 1991); Grandstaff v. City of Borger, 767 F.2d 161, 171 (5th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 480 U.S. 916 (1987).

See also Allen v. Hays, 65 F.4th 736, 750 (5th Cir. 2023), on denial of pet. for reh'g ("To succeed on a claim of excessive force via the ratification theory, plaintiffs would need to show that the city granted the certificate of bravery because the force was excessive. In other words, the constitutional violation itself must have been ratified. Even accepting all of plaintiffs' contentions as true—as we must under Twombly—there are no allegations that the city was aware of the factors that potentially made Hayes's use of force unreasonably excessive. Without such allegations, plaintiffs cannot make out a showing of liability via ratification. Plaintiffs' ratification claims are thus dismissed."); Kirk v. Calhoun County, Michigan, No. 19-2456, 2021 WL 2929736, at *7–8 (6th Cir. July 12, 2021) (not reported) ("Ernest relies almost exclusively on our decades-old Monell jurisprudence for the proposition that a sheriff's failure to investigate one instance of allegedly unconstitutional conduct of its deputies can be considered a 'ratification' of their conduct, thereby subjecting the municipality to Monell liability under § 1983. See Leach v. Shelby Cnty. Sheriff, 891 F.2d 1241, 1248 (6th Cir. 1989); . . . Marchese v. Lucas, 758 F.2d 181, 188-89 (6th Cir. 1985). But, as we recently explained in Pineda v. Hamilton County, we have since restricted the scope of this ratification theory. . . To prove a 'custom-of-tolerance' theory of liability, a plaintiff must show that 'there was a pattern of inadequately investigating similar claims.'. . Without such evidence, 'there is no demonstration of causation to show that the allegedly inadequate investigation caused the constitutional violation in question.'. . Importantly, 'an entity's failure to investigate the plaintiff's specific claim will, by definition, come after the employee's action that caused the injury about which the plaintiff complains.'. . And if there was no custom of tolerating inadequate investigations into illegal conduct, the wrongdoer could not have been motivated by a municipal policy in committing the constitutional violation. 'A series of investigative failures before the plaintiff's injury, by contrast, might at least suggest that the local entity's custom led to the employee's harmful action in the plaintiff's own case.'. .Ernest has not provided any evidence of prior inadequate investigations at Calhoun County that could establish the existence of a custom of tolerating unconstitutional conduct by its deputies."); Pineda v. Hamilton County, Ohio, 977 F.3d 483, 495-96 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Since Leach and Marchese, . . .we have clarified the scope of this 'ratification' theory in a way that dooms Pineda's claim in this case. Because municipal liability requires an unconstitutional 'policy' or 'custom,' we have held that an allegation of a single failure to investigate a single plaintiff's claim does not suffice. . . As a result, 'a claim based on inadequate investigation' requires 'not only an inadequate investigation in this instance,' but also 'a clear and persistent pattern of violations' in earlier instances. . . That is, 'there must be multiple earlier inadequate investigations and they must concern comparable claims.'. . In Leach, for example, 'there was a record of approximately 14 other instances of similar abuse in a two-year period.'. . This requirement (that there be multiple failures to investigate) also follows from § 1983's causation element. To protect against respondeat superior liability, the Supreme Court has held that § 1983 imposes a 'rigorous' causation standard where, as here, a plaintiff seeks to hold a local entity liable for its employee's actions. . . A plaintiff must show that the entity's unconstitutional custom—not just the employee's unconstitutional action—caused the plaintiff's injury. . . In this case's context, there must be a 'link between' the local entity's failure to investigate and the plaintiff's injury. . . And an entity's failure to investigate the plaintiff's specific claim will, by definition, come after the employee's action that caused the injury about which the plaintiff complains. Because the injury will have already occurred by the time of the specific investigation, 'there can be no causation' from that single failure to investigate. . . As the Eleventh Circuit noted, 'a single failure to investigate an incident cannot have caused that incident.'. . A series of investigative failures before the plaintiff's injury, by contrast, might at least suggest that the local entity's custom led to the employee's harmful action in the plaintiff's own case. . . Under this framework, Pineda lacks sufficient evidence for his failure-to-investigate claim against the Hamilton County Sheriff's Office and Sheriff Neil. Pineda challenges only a single failure to investigate his own excessive-force claim and has made no attempt to 'show several separate instances of the alleged rights violation.'. . No matter the adequacy of Steve Minnich's specific investigation, Pineda has not identified evidence from which a reasonable jury could find that the Hamilton County Sheriff's Office has a 'policy' or 'custom' of systematically failing to investigate excessive-force claims. . . Not only that, he has not explained how Minnich's later failure to investigate his one allegation could have caused his earlier injury from the deputy's alleged baton strike. . . Lastly, Pineda presents no evidence that Sheriff Neil even knew of his claim, let alone failed to investigate it. And because Neil can be found liable only for his own actions, Pineda has no evidence whatsoever against the sheriff in his personal capacity. . .In response, Pineda says he need not establish any pattern of failing to investigate. He argues that even a single act from a high-ranking local official can suffice to create a municipal 'policy' and that Chief Deputy Mark Schoonover approved of the allegedly faulty investigation. This response does not save his claim. We need not even consider whether Schoonover qualified as a high-ranking official whose actions could qualify as the actions of the 'entity' itself. . . Whether or not that is so, Pineda has still provided no basis for concluding that any failure to investigate his own claim caused his earlier injury. As we explained when rejecting a similar argument, Schoonover's 'after-the-fact approval of the investigation' did not cause Pineda's injury. . . And a contrary holding 'would effectively make the [sheriff's office] liable on the basis of respondeat superior, which is specifically prohibited by Monell.'"); Wright v. City of Euclid, Ohio, 962 F.3d 852, 882 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Wright argues that Chief Meyer's failure to investigate numerous claims of excessive force amounts to ratification of unconstitutional acts by a final decision-maker. A plaintiff can establish municipal liability by showing that the municipality ratifies the unconstitutional acts of its employees by failing to meaningfully investigate and punish allegations of unconstitutional conduct. . . Wright points us to Chief Meyer's lack of investigation and discipline in the other high-profile use-of-force cases involving Euclid police officers, but those instances occurred after Wright's encounter with Flagg and Williams and cannot show that Meyer's failure to investigate and punish the officers involved in those uses of force led in any way to Wright's injuries. However, Murowsky testified that he had never heard of a use of force incident by a Euclid officer that seemed inappropriate to him. That too moves the needle so that a reasonable jury could decide that use of excessive force is ratified by the department. A reasonable jury could likewise find that Meyer and Murowsky's seeming failure to ever meaningfully investigate excessive force complaints rises to the level of a ratification of use of force by a policymaker."); Young v. Bd. of Supervisors of Humphreys County, Mississippi, 927 F.3d 898, 903 & n.4 (5th Cir. 2019) ("One way of establishing liability is to show that a policymaker ratified the acts of a subordinate. . . . We have 'limited the theory of ratification to extreme factual situations.'. . '[U]nless the subordinate's actions are sufficiently extreme—for instance, an obvious violation of clearly established law—a policymaker's ratification ... is insufficient to establish an official policy or custom.' World Wide St. Preachers Fellowship v. Town of Columbia, 591 F.3d 747, 755 (5th Cir. 2009).[4] [fn.4: The Board suggests that we have limited the ratification theory almost exclusively to cases involving a 'use of excessive force that resulted in bodily injuries or death.' To the contrary, we have regularly applied ratification to economic injuries. . . The Board also wrongly maintains that a ratification theory of liability is appropriate only where the injury is particularly severe. But World Wide Street Preachers Fellowship, 591 F.3d at 755, indicates that the theory applies where a policymaker ratifies, for example, 'an obvious violation of clearly established law.'] There was legally sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to conclude that the Board ratified the unlawful initiation of condemnation proceedings. Drawing all inferences in the light most favorable to Young, testimony at trial showed that Stevens had directed Edwards to post the condemnation notice, even though Young's properties were compliant with state and county law. The Board ratified that action at its next meeting by unanimously voting to proceed with condemnation, and the notice was not withdrawn for over two years. Those facts are 'sufficiently extreme,'. . . to support a finding that the Board approved both Stevens's direction to post the condemnation notice and the underlying implication that the properties were condemnable. . . .The Board takes issue with Jury Instruction 4, which told the jury that it could find the Board liable if it found, by a preponderance of the evidence, one of three things: (1) 'The Board of Supervisors authorized a violation of Mr. Young's property rights,' (2) 'Dickie Stevens had been given the authority by the Board to take the action he took with respect to Mr. Young's property,' or (3) 'The Board ratified Dickie Stevens' actions after the fact.' The Board objects to both the second and third options. The Board contends that the second option erroneously permitted the jury to decide whether the Board gave Stevens final policymaking authority. That, the Board insists, was a question of law for the court, not a fact question for the jury. Even assuming that the court erred in allowing the jury to determine whether Stevens was a policymaker, there was legally sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to hold the Board liable on a ratification theory, as we have explained. Thus, 'any injury resulting from the erroneous instruction is harmless.'. . Regarding the third option, the Board contends that Jury Instruction 4 incorrectly stated the law on ratification because it 'did not require Young to prove the existence of an unconstitutional policy.' The Board continues that the ratification theory requires a plaintiff to prove a separate violation of an official policy or custom, not just that the policymaker ratified a subordinate's action. But that misstates the ratification theory. Showing that a policymaker ratified the actions of a subordinate is one way of making out a § 1983 claim against a county or municipality; it is not an additional factor that must be established."); M.S. by Covington v. Hamilton County Dept. of Education, 756 F. App'x

510, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("Plaintiffs' theory of liability is that Woodmore's principal failed to protect the students from a danger that the principal created, in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . Plaintiffs have alleged that (1) the principal committed affirmative acts by instructing the schoolchildren to board Walker's bus; (2) this direction endangered the students because of Walker's dangerous driving; (3) this danger was specific to those students; and (4) the principal was sufficiently culpable because she knew that Walker's driving was dangerous. The District contests each point other than the third, which we address in turn [Court finds allegations as to each element sufficient to survive motion to dismiss]. . . . And although there are doubtlessly some cases in which a court could determine that a state actor's actions did not shock the conscience at the motion-to-dismiss stage, this is not that case. . . . Because it is conceivable that the principal received complaints such that it would be conscience-shocking for her to have instructed the schoolchildren to board Walker's bus after their receipt, it would be inappropriate to grant a motion to dismiss on this ground. . . .It should also be noted, however, that even if Plaintiffs ultimately prove the principal engaged in unconstitutional activity, this showing does not necessarily entail that the District is subject to Monell liability. To recap, they must also show that there was a clear and persistent pattern of that unconstitutional activity, that the District knew about that pattern, that the District deliberately ignored that pattern, and that the District's ignoring the pattern of unconstitutional activity by the principal had a direct causal link to the deprivation of the students' rights. . . The pleadings allege that the District had knowledge of the principal's unconstitutional actions during the entire period in which they occurred, that the District took no action either to prevent the principal from instructing the students to board the bus or to make the bus safer, and that the District's failure to act in response to this knowledge caused the deprivation of Plaintiffs' constitutional rights. Whether these allegations will be borne out by evidence must wait for a later stage in this litigation, which should not have been terminated at the motion-to-dismiss stage."); Przybysz v.City of Toledo, 746 F. App'x 480, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("Przybysz is required to point us to 'prior instances of unconstitutional conduct demonstrating that [Toledo] ha[d] ignored a history of abuse and was clearly on notice that the training in this particular area was deficient and likely to cause injury.'. . But Przybysz has failed to point to even a single other instance in which the Toledo police has worked with a confidential informant who has been subsequently murdered by the target of the investigation."); Outlaw v. City of Hartford, 884 F.3d 351, 380-81 (2d Cir. 2018) ("[A] municipal policy of deliberate indifference to the use of excessive force by police officers may be shown by evidence that the municipality had notice of complaints of the use of such force but repeatedly failed to make any meaningful investigation into such charges[.] . . . Thus, Monell liability, by its nature, will often turn on evidence concerning victims other than the plaintiffs and alleged misfeasors other than the individual defendants. In addition, a given officer's disciplinary history may be probative of whether it was foreseeable to the municipality that the officer would engage in misconduct yet again. . . To be sure, the right to probative evidence in Monell and other actions is 'not absolute' and will be 'frequently qualified in the interest of protecting legitimate interests.'. . . But objections based on facile claims of undue burden, overbreadth, and lack of relevancy do not take account of these principles. The record before us does not show that Outlaw made requests for information as to the City's 'investigations' of excessive-force complaints; but it does show that he had sought the foundational information as to the existence of such complaints. His effort to obtain that basic preliminary information was largely resisted by the City. . . . Moreover, in response to Outlaw's far more limited request for disciplinary records of just the officers other than Gordon and Allen who were 'involved in the incident/arrest of the Plaintiff referenced in the Complaint,' the City objected that the request was 'overly broad, vague, and unduly burdensome' on the specious ground that the 'interrogatory seeks information from the entire Harford [sic] Police Department based on the term "involved"'. . . . And the City declined to disclose Allen's disciplinary records on the ground, inter alia, that the request 'constitutes an invasion of [Allen's] personal privacy.'. . .The City on appeal criticizes Outlaw for failing to cite any 'evidence of any citizen complaint that was filed and was not investigated'. . . . Yet the City had objected to the interrogatories that sought to identify all filed complaints--even those limited to the officers who, in addition to Gordon and Allen, had been involved in the arrest of Outlaw. However, the record does not show any determined effort by Outlaw to obtain the potentially probative information that defendants declined to provide. Following the discovery responses described above, Outlaw moved for an order compelling the City to produce the information he had requested. But he then withdrew his motion. And the record does not reveal any further motion to compel. Some of the City's objections to some Outlaw requests may have been appropriate. But it was incumbent on Outlaw, who of course had the burden of proving the claims he asserted, to utilize procedures provided by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure to compel responses to his requests that sought necessary information and that were appropriate. Having withdrawn his motion to compel, Outlaw's reliance on the lists of lawsuits and claims filed against the City--one ending in a judgment against the City, dozens being settled, and some perhaps not even involving complaints of excessive force--is flawed by the lack of detailed information he chose not to pursue."); Salvato v. Miley, 790 F.3d 1286, 1296-97 (11th Cir. 2015) ("Salvato's estate argues that 'the Sheriff should be liable because he ratified Miley's use of excessive force in failing to conduct an adequate internal investigation [after] the shooting,' but this argument fails. The sheriff must 'cause[ ],' 42 U.S.C. § 1983, the constitutional violation; that is, he must 'officially sanction[ ] or order[ ]' the action. . . He cannot be held liable on a respondeat superior theory of liability. . . The sheriff did not order Miley to shoot Salvato. Salvato's estate presented no evidence of a policy, approved by the sheriff, that led to Miley's use of excessive force. And Salvato's estate fails to present evidence of any 'custom' not 'approv[ed] through ... official decisionmaking channels,'. . . that led to Miley's use of excessive force. Salvato's estate argues that a failure to investigate a single incident is sufficient to establish that the sheriff ratified Miley's actions, but we disagree. '[W]hen plaintiffs are relying not on a pattern of unconstitutional conduct, but on a single incident, they must demonstrate that local government policymakers had an opportunity to review the subordinate's decision and agreed with both the decision and the decision's basis before a court can hold the government liable on a ratification theory.'. . Only when 'the authorized policymakers approve a subordinate's decision and the basis for it' have they 'ratifi[ed]' that 'decision.'. . The sheriff did not 'review' any part of Miley's actions 'before they bec[a]me final,'. . . much less 'approve' the 'decision and the basis for it[.]'. . [W]here the plaintiffs rely on a 'single incident,'. . . the official must have had an 'opportunity to review' the subordinate's decision 'before [it] become[s] final[.]'. . . Salvato's estate also argues that '[n]umerous courts have recognized post-event evidence of a police department's lack of proper internal investigation of an excessive force incident tends to show the customs and policy that were in effect prior to the excessive force incident,' but this argument is irrelevant. To be sure, '[p]ost-event evidence can shed some light on what policies existed in the city on the date of an alleged deprivation of constitutional right.' Bordanaro v. McLeod, 871 F.2d 1151, 1167 (1st Cir.1989). But '[t]he inferences to be made from these [post-event] facts merely lend weight' to a finding that there was a policy 'behind the actions which led to' the constitutional violation. Kibbe v. City of Springfield, 777 F.2d 801, 809 (1st Cir.1985). Again, no party contests that a 'persistent failure to take disciplinary action against officers can give rise to the inference that a municipality has ratified conduct.'. . But an isolated incident is, by definition, not a 'persistent failure.'").

See also Reyes v. City of Austin, No. 1:21-CV-992-RP, 2024 WL 5088385, at *9–10 (W.D. Tex. Dec. 12, 2024) ("To support his ratification theory, Reyes argues that the City had a policy of making illegal arrests of individuals who film police activity because the City did not discipline the officers involved in his arrests. '[I]f the authorized policymakers approve a subordinate's decision and the basis for it, their ratification would be chargeable to the municipality because their decision is final'. . But Fifth Circuit 'precedent has limited the theory of ratification to "extreme factual situations."'. . Here, the underlying conduct by the officers involved in Reyes' arrests was insufficiently extreme for a finding of ratification. . . Also, a policymaker who defends conduct that is later shown to be unlawful does not necessarily ratify that conduct as would incur Monell liability. . . Reyes relies on 30(b)(6) testimony from the City of Austin stating that the arrests were consistent with their policy, . . . but consistent with the Fifth Circuit's holding in Zarnow and Peterson, a municipality defending the constitutionality of its officers' actions in litigation does not itself constitute 'ratification.'. . For those reasons, the Court finds that Reyes does not show a persistent pattern of conduct or ratification that gives rise to a City of Austin unwritten custom, practice, or policy."); Tatel v. Mt. Lebanon School District, No. CV 22-837, 2024 WL 4362459, at *35 (W.D. Pa. Sept. 30, 2024) ("Ratification by supervising policymakers occurred here. Steinhauer and Irvin were the District's final policymakers responsible to develop and implement policies and practices to protect parental rights. Policy I(J), I(F). The District provided no guidance and instead had a de facto policy to defer to 'teacher prerogative.'. . Williams, a nonpolicymaking official, following the de facto policy, decided that she would observe Transgender Awareness Day by reading noncurricular books and instructing her first-grade students that 'he is now a she' and parents may be mistaken about their children's gender. Neither the books nor the instruction was in the curriculum and Williams did not provide notice to the Parent[.] . . When Plaintiffs lodged objections, Williams' supervisors, including the District's final policymakers, ratified and approved that de facto policy. . . Steinhauer acknowledged that he reviewed the books, which presented a child and a transgender character making the decision about their gender and parents making mistakes about the child's gender. . . While he testified he was not aware of Williams' verbal instruction, Steinhauer knew the content of the books and determined it was appropriate for Williams to teach from the books. . . Steinhauer acknowledged the de facto policy that it was a teacher's prerogative to use noncurricular instructional materials and to determine whether or not notice and opt out rights would be provided to parents. . . Irvin and Bielewicz also approved use of the noncurricular books and Williams' instruction. . . Viewing the record in favor of Defendants, a reasonable jury could only conclude, based on the record, that Steinhauer, Irvin and Bielewicz . . . ratified Williams' conduct, and therefore, are subject to supervisory liability. Because those individuals included the final policymakers for the District, the District is subject to municipal liability on the basis of ratification."); Winzer v. Kaufman County, No. 3:15-CV-01284-N, 2023 WL 2530861, at *6-8 (N.D. Tex. Mar. 14, 2023) ("The Fifth Circuit has cautiously 'cabined' Monell claims against municipalities based on their approval of their officers' conduct because limitations 'are necessary to prevent the ratification theory from becoming [one] of respondeat superior.'. . Accordingly, a municipality does not automatically ratify conduct later deemed to be unlawful by merely failing to discipline officers or even defending the conduct. . . Ratification occurs if a policymaker approves of unconstitutional conduct (1) with knowledge of 'its underlying, improper basis,'. . . or (2) without knowledge of the conduct's true and unlawful nature, but the officer's actions were 'manifestly indefensible,' even if the policymaker 'blindly accepted' the officers' own version of events. . . . Courts have observed the difficulty, if not impossibility, of demonstrating a causal relationship between a single incident of police misconduct and the municipality's subsequent investigation. . . . In Grandstaff v. City of Borger, the Fifth Circuit held that it was proper to infer a preexisting policy or custom where 'no reprimands, no discharges, and no admissions of error' were made following 'incompetent and catastrophic' police performance on a single night. . . Since Grandstaff, courts in this Circuit have continued to 'limit[ ] the theory of ratification to "extreme factual situations."'. . Extreme scenarios include 'obvious violation[s] of clearly established law,'. . . and 'collective conduct of many individuals and multiple bad acts.'. . Courts have been lenient to plaintiffs on the other Monell elements of causation and deliberate indifference where extreme facts were present. . . The 'extreme factual scenario' exception permitting ratification liability has an 'extremely high' bar. . . Accordingly, it 'has not enjoyed wide application in this Circuit,'. . . and it is especially rare in the excessive force context. . .Where constitutional violations do not meet that bar, plaintiffs may nevertheless attempt to pursue an ordinary Monell claim — though without the benefit of exemption from fully demonstrating additional evidence of preexisting policy. . . Plaintiffs ask this Court to forego application of Grandstaff, arguing that some courts have questioned the origins of the limitation. . . But regardless of its wisdom, . . . Grandstaff and its progeny are still good law without any explicit exception, and this Court is bound by Fifth Circuit precedent. . . To premise the County's liability on its investigation of the shooting and failure to discipline the officers involved, the facts must be sufficiently extreme. . . . The Decedent's death is tragic. However, as evidenced by Grandstaff's apparent singularity among excessive force cases, an officer's conduct may have consequences of great magnitude while still falling short of what courts have held to be 'extreme' factual circumstances. Extreme scenarios exist, for one, where there is an 'obvious' violation of 'clearly established law,' and those circumstances are not present. This Court is bound by the Fifth Circuit's determinations in this case: the Decedent's right to be free from excessive force was not clearly established."); Corbitt v. Baltimore City Police Department, No. CV RDB-20-3431, 2022 WL 846209, at *8–9 (D. Md. Mar. 22, 2022) ("Plaintiff has plausibly pled the existence of a persistent and widespread practice of engaging in unconstitutional vehicular chases, and BPD's knowledge of this practice. Plaintiff asserts that there is 'a culture of acceptance and condonation of unconstitutional officer use of force during emergency chases.'. . In support, Plaintiff cites six prior lawsuits and describes five specific instances in which BPD engaged in vehicular chases that resulted in death or injury of innocent civilians. . . Plaintiff also references the DOJ Report's investigation into BPD police practices as evidence of 'a rampant pattern of excessive force.'. . At this stage in the litigation, these allegations are sufficient to plead a pattern of widespread unconstitutional conduct—and BPD's knowledge of the same. Second, Corbitt plausibly pleads BPD's deliberate indifference. To plead deliberate indifference, plaintiff need only allege that the municipality was aware of the alleged pattern or practice and 'that the municipality's failure to discipline its officers "allowed" a custom, policy or practice "of [constitutional] violations to develop.''. . In addition to the lawsuits filed over the past ten years, Plaintiff alleges that the DOJ Report's findings of the use of excessive force during vehicular pursuits provided officers with notice of the issue. . . Additionally, Plaintiff complains that BPD has a custom of 'insufficient or non-existent officer discipline,' despite the fact that BPD had knowledge of lawsuits against them as a result of 'violations of citizens' civil rights during police vehicle pursuits.'. . He further claims that Defendant failed to 'take any corrective action in the face of the continuing lawsuits against [the] BPD for civilian injuries and deaths due to officer emergency car chases.'. . Accepting these allegations as true, Corbitt has plausibly alleged that BPD has ignored its officers' practice of engaging in excessive force during vehicular pursuits that result in civilian injuries and deaths, thereby approving the practice by condonation. . . . As the Fourth Circuit made clear in Owens, a plaintiff need not allege prior instances in great detail at this early stage. Corbitt likewise relies on prior cases against BPD for fatalities of innocent civilians from vehicular pursuit practices. As in Owens, the existence of these cases are factual allegations, which, if true, would bolster Corbitt's Monell condonation claim. Although these allegations may be devoid of detail, they provide sufficient factual content to survive a motion to dismiss. . . Moreover, these claims are supported by his reference to the DOJ Report's findings, which have previously provided a valid predicate for a Monell claim against BPD. . . BPD also contends that the DOJ Report cannot serve as the basis for Plaintiff's Monell claim because Policy 1503 was not the subject or even in effect when the Report was released. . . This argument is inapposite. Under the 'condonation' theory, unlike the 'express policy' theory, a plaintiff need not reference any specific written policy when making their claim—instead, it is sufficient to plead sufficient facts that demonstrate the existence of a widespread pattern or practice. . . Accordingly, Plaintiff has adequately pled facts to establish the elements of the condonation theory of Monell liability under § 1983. . . . Plaintiff cites five prior instances in which innocent bystanders were killed as a result of BPD's practice of engaging in unreasonable vehicular chases. . . He points to six prior lawsuits against BPD for fatalities resulting from BPD's vehicular pursuit practices. . . And he alleges that Davis and Smith were 'on notice of BPD officers' failure to consider the risks posed to civilians when initiating emergency pursuits by virtue of the findings of the [DOJ Report].' . . At this stage of the litigation, these allegations are sufficient to state a claim that Defendants had knowledge of the alleged unconstitutional conduct. Second, Corbitt plausibly claims that Davis and Smith's response to this conduct was so inadequate as to constitute deliberate indifference. Plaintiff contends that, despite their knowledge, Defendants 'failed to correct the behavior of their subordinate officers,' and that those officers were not 'disciplined for their failure to consider factors indicating heightened risk to Baltimore citizens.'. . He also claims that Davis and Smith failed to train their officers on how to properly apply the factors listed in Policy 1503 and thereby 'permitted the trainings to include patently reckless conduct.'. . Although these allegations are insufficient to state a 'failure to train' Monell claim, they are sufficient to allege the inaction necessary to establish deliberate indifference. Plaintiff has adequately alleged that, by failing to discipline their officers or correct their conduct during vehicular pursuits, Defendants showed deliberate indifference to the alleged offensive practice. Third, Plaintiff claims that as a result of the Defendant's failure to act, he suffered a constitutional deprivation. . . This element is supported by the nature of Plaintiff's injury: He was shot in the head during a high-speed police chase. . . Defendants' alleged failure to control officers' conduct during vehicular pursuits, if true, is doubtlessly 'a causative factor' in this injury. . . Accordingly, Plaintiff has sufficiently pled a supervisory liability claim to survive the motion to dismiss stage."); Alsaada v. City of Columbus, 536 F.Supp.3d 216, ___ (S.D. Ohio 2021) ("To establish a § 1983 claim against a municipality based on the ratification theory, a municipal official with the final policymaking authority must approve the subordinate's decision and the basis for it. . . The ratification theory of municipal liability does not require proof of a pattern or custom. . . Instead, ratification of a single violative act is enough for municipal liability to attach. . . An official acting with the final decision-making authority may ratify the unconstitutional acts of its employees in two ways. The first is through 'affirmative approval of a particular decision made by a subordinate.' Feliciano v. City of Cleveland, 988 F.2d 649, 650 (6th Cir. 1993). The second is by 'failing to meaningfully investigate and punish allegations of unconstitutional conduct."' Wright v. City of Euclid, 962 F.3d 852, 882 (6th Cir. 2020) . . . Here, Plaintiffs assert that then-Chief Quinlan was the final policymaker on police practices and provided the 'marching orders' to quell the protests, rather than just to prevent a riot—and that resulted in their constitutional violations. As for proof, Plaintiffs claim that in Columbus, a pattern or practice has long existed of flouting the letter or spirit of CPD policies against excessive use of force, favoring the right to protest, or racially discriminating. What happened to Plaintiffs and other protestors went beyond that pattern or practice because the then-Chief issued the policies the officers were implementing against Plaintiffs and other protestors. Assuming Plaintiffs' allegations are true—that police were armed with military-grade equipment and had a green light to spray pepper spray, deploy tear gas, and fire wooden pellets to inflict pain as a deterrent—then, the consistency of officers' alleged actions supports the assertion that officers were implementing CPD customs or policies. In other words, this Court finds that Plaintiffs have shown a likelihood of success on the merits of a Monell claim, insofar as it is premised upon ratification of illegal actions by officials with final decision-making authority."); Martinez v. City of Santa Rosa, No. 20-CV-04135-VC, 2020 WL 6503406, at *1–2 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 5, 2020) ("The complaint focuses on the Santa Rosa Police Department's response to the Black Lives Matter protests on three nights. It alleges many Fourth Amendment violations, including officers indiscriminately firing tear gas into peaceful crowds. The complaint further alleges that the officers committed these acts '[a]t the direction of the Chief of Police' and that their conduct 'continued despite clear reports of protestors being maimed and suffering serious injuries.' According to the complaint, the police chief subsequently defended his officers' conduct in public, claiming that the protestors were 'far from peaceful and that '[his] officers were put in great danger,' 'acted with restraint,' and only used force 'when provoked by protestors.' These allegations give rise to a claim for municipal liability on a theory of ratification or decision-making by a policymaker. Monell is about responsibility. It limits municipal liability to acts that are 'of the municipality'—ones that the municipality has sanctioned or ordered. . . Thus, in a more typical police case, involving an isolated incident of alleged misconduct against one or two citizens, it is hard to infer that the conduct of a police officer is attributable to the municipality. And in such a case, it might be a stretch to infer—merely from a police chief's after-the-fact general defense of the officer—that the municipality is responsible for the officer's conduct. . . This case involves a different situation. The complaint suggests that the Black Lives Matter protests (along with the activity that spun off from the protests) gripped Santa Rosa, prompting the full attention of the entire police department, from the police chief to command staff to line officers. In times like that, when the department is executing an organized, department-wide response, one can presume that the police chief was in control of his department, either directing that response himself or—at the very least—ratifying the actions of his subordinates. Therefore, it becomes easier to infer that the repeated conduct of individual police officers is really the conduct of the department, particularly when the police chief makes comments that could be interpreted as suggesting that the officers who used force did not meaningfully deviate from the department's plan for how to control the crowds. . . In requesting dismissal of this claim, the City appears to ask the Court to draw an inference that the police chief was not meaningfully aware of either the department's plan for responding to the protests or the degree to which the conduct of the officers involved in these high-profile incidents conformed to that plan. It would not be appropriate to draw that inference at this stage of the case, where the allegations in the complaint must be presumed true and all reasonable inferences must be drawn in the plaintiffs' favor. Instead, it is reasonable to infer that the conduct of the individual officers was directed or ratified by the police chief."); German v. Roberts, No. C15-5237 BHS-DWC, 2017 WL 3407052, at *3-4 (W.D. Wash. Aug. 9, 2017) ("[L]ower courts appear to be divided on whether an internal police investigation that concludes that a shooting by its officers was lawful and within the municipality's policies is alone sufficient to support a theory of ratification for the purposes of Monell liability. For instance, another judge in our district has recently found that such circumstances create a question of fact regarding ratification that should be resolved by a jury. . . On the other hand, other courts have concluded that such an investigation and conclusion will not constitute ratification on their own absent evidence of 'something more,' such as a 'sham investigation' or 'conduct so outrageous that a reasonable administrator should have known that he or she should do something about it.' See Kanae v. Hodson, 294 F. Supp. 2d 1179, 1191–92 (D. Haw. 2003). As noted in Kanae, the Ninth Circuit's leading decision on ratification based on internal police investigations appears to require 'something more' than merely a finding that the shooting was justified. See id. (citing Larez v. City of Los Angeles, 946 F.2d 630 (9th Cir. 1991)). In Larez, the Ninth Circuit found that the result of an internal police investigation approving of an officer's use of force could constitute ratification for the purposes of Monell liability if the investigation was premised on 'flawed procedures' under which, 'at least in the absence of independent, third-party witnesses, [officers] could get away with anything.'. . Based on the analysis outlined in Larez, the Court agrees with Defendants that, when establishing Monell liability under a ratification theory, a plaintiff must present more than just a police investigation that concludes an officer applied reasonable force. A plaintiff must also point to some set of facts to suggest that the investigation's findings reflect a policy or custom that encourages or condones the underlying constitutional deprivation. As subsequently noted by the Ninth Circuit in Watkins v. City of Oakland, Cal., 145 F.3d 1087 (9th Cir. 1998), the Larez decision was based on a set of facts where a jury could find that 'that the police chief was responsible for the constitutional deprivations because he condoned, ratified, and encouraged the excessive use of force.'. . Implicit in this explanation is the concept that the police chief's conduct actually contributed to the plaintiff's constitutional deprivation. Accordingly, it appears that the ratification theory for Monell liability is not premised on the ratification itself creating liability after the fact of injury; but rather, it seems that evidence of ratification is merely a method of proving a preexisting government 'policy, custom, or practice' that proximately causes a plaintiff's constitutional deprivation. Such a formulation of the ratification theory is in keeping with the fundamental principle that Monell liability attaches 'when implementation of ... official policies or established customs inflicts the constitutional injury.'. . .This is not to say that a local government can escape § 1983 liability simply by adopting the version of facts presented by its own officers every time it investigates a police shooting, regardless of the objective evidence. In fact, such a practice would likely have the opposite of its desired effect by showing that the local government's policies and customs in investigating shootings encouraged the constitutional deprivation by signaling to officers that they could 'get away with anything.' Nonetheless, the Court agrees with the statement in Kanae that Monell liability requires 'something more' than 'an investigative group accept[ing] an officer's version over a victim's differing version' of the circumstances surrounding a shooting."); Hobart v. City of Stafford, 916 F.Supp.2d 783, 794-99 (S.D. Tex. 2013) ("Fifth Circuit case law is, at times, less than clear about whether ratification is a truly independent theory of municipal liability, as Praprotnik suggests, or whether ratification is simply indicative of a pre-existing policy or custom, as Grandstaff suggests. Some cases do appear to treat ratification as an independent theory of recovery. [collecting cases] Other post- Praprotnik cases might be read to suggest that ratification is a viable theory of recovery only to the extent that it is indicative of municipal policy or custom. [citing cases] As explained above, this Court understands Praprotnik to have announced an independent theory of municipal liability premised on ratification. To the extent Fifth Circuit and district courts in this Circuit occasionally analyze ratification claims by asking whether a policymaker's approval of a subordinate's act is sufficient to establish a municipal policy, this Court understands those courts to be asking whether that act itself constitutes policy, as they must do under Praprotnik, not whether it is indicative of pre-existing policy. . . . The Praprotnik Court did not explain how, or whether, municipal liability premised on a policymaker's subsequent ratification of acts taken by subordinates was reconcilable with the requirement that a § 1983 defendant be held liable for only those constitutional violations it could be said to have 'caused.' This Court believes that the best way to reconcile the ratification theory announced in Praprotnik with the causation requirement of § 1983 would be to cabin the theory to those cases where subsequent ratification can be said to have, in some sense, caused the deprivation. Praprotnik itself arose in the employment context. . . It is easy to see how, in an employment context, where a subordinate's decision may be subjected to an internal review by a policymaker before becoming final, ratification can be understood to have caused the deprivation; by approving the subordinate's actions, the policymaker, in effect, continues the deprivation. In contrast, it is difficult to understand how the subsequent ratification of a subordinate's excessive use of force is a cause of that completed violation. Indeed, the Fifth Circuit, in an unpublished opinion, has recognized that ratification is 'most readily conceptualized in contexts like employment.'. .However, the Fifth Circuit has never actually limited the ratification theory to the employment context, or to any other context where liability premised on ratification can be reconciled conceptually with the causation requirement of § 1983. In fact, the Fifth Circuit and this district court have, on numerous occasions, considered whether a policymaker's subsequent approval of an allegedly excessive use of force could subject the municipality to liability based on ratification, thus suggesting that a ratification claim is at least theoretically possible in such a context. . . As such, although the Court doubts the propriety of holding municipalities liable on a ratification theory where the constitutional violation is excessive use of force, it concludes that this Circuit apparently tolerates such claims. Causation, however, is only the first of many hurdles a § 1983 claim premised on ratification must overcome. As the Supreme Court explained in Praprotnik, a subordinate's decision is chargeable to the municipality if 'authorized policymakers approve [the] decision and the basis for it.'. . . Moreover, 'the theory of ratification ... has been limited to "extreme factual scenarios."'. . . . This Court does not think there is a principled basis for limiting the ratification theory to so-called 'extreme factual scenarios.' . . . Perhaps there is some logic to limiting Grandstaff to 'extreme factual scenarios;' it may be reasonable to allow the inference of a pre-existing policy from ratification only when the actions that have been ratified are particularly outrageous. . . As explained supra Part III.A, the theory of ratification recognized in Praprotnik does not depend on an inference of pre-existing policy, and this Court sees no reason to limit municipal Praprotnik liability to ratification of only the most extreme constitutional violations. Furthermore, determining whether the underlying violation is an extreme constitutional violation or only a garden-variety constitutional violation is an ill-defined task. Nonetheless, this Court is bound by the Fifth Circuit, which has consistently held that the ratification theory applies only to 'extreme factual scenarios.'. . Limited guidance exists as to the definition of a sufficiently extreme factual scenario. Fifth Circuit cases consistently compare the facts before them to the facts of Grandstaff. . . Although this Court has discussed at length its conclusion that Grandstaff is not a ratification case in the Praprotnik sense, it follows suit and compares the facts of the case before it to Grandstaff. It does so because of the lack of any other successful ratification claims premised on excessive use of force. On that standard, this Court believes the case before it may present a sufficiently extreme factual scenario. . . . The question before the Court is whether the Chief Krahn ratified Officer Estrada's actions and the basis for them. . . A factfinder may conclude that Chief Krahn ratified the alleged unconstitutional basis for the actions if the record supports a conclusion that, even on Officer Estrada's version of the facts, his actions were 'manifestly indefensible.'. . This Court finds genuine issues of material fact as to whether Chief Krahn actually assessed the reasonableness of Officer Estrada's actions, or whether he simply assumed that Officer Estrada's belief that he was facing a threat of death or serious bodily injury necessarily justified the use of deadly force. The combination of physical evidence from the February 18, 2009 incident, and evidence of Officer Estrada's state of mind may lead a jury to conclude that, even on Officer Estrada's own facts, his actions were manifestly indefensible. Even if the record does contain some evidence supporting Officer Estrada's decision, a jury could nonetheless find that the totality of the circumstances here overwhelmingly reveal the indefensibility of his actions. . .The Court admits that ratification is rarely a viable theory in this Circuit. If only a few of the facts in this case were different, this Court would be obliged to conclude that no reasonable jury could find that the City was liable based on ratification. However, the totality of the facts here, including the physical evidence from the February 18, 2009 incident, evidence of Officer Estrada's state of mind, and indications in the record that Chief Krahn did not consider it his role to evaluate the reasonableness of Officer Estrada's assessment of the threat level convince this Court that a reasonable jury could find the City liable on a ratification theory. Accordingly, Defendants' Motion for Summary Judgment Addressing Ratification Theory of Recovery (Doc. No. 94) must be DENIED as to the City of Stafford."); Willis v. Mullins, No. CV F 04 6542 AWILJO, 2006 WL 302343, at *3, *4 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 8, 2006) ("Plaintiff argues that he should be able to find out about payment of punitive damages − after the incident 'because this would be evidence to support plaintiff's Monell claims.' . . He argues he should not be limited to evidence of pre-incident punitive damages payments. Plaintiff is correct, as a general proposition, that post incident events may prove that a policy or custom existed pre-incident. Plaintiff cites to numerous cases in support of his argument. [discussing cases] Thus, post-incident indemnification of punitive damages is probative of the existence that the policy existed pre-incident. From this post-incident evidence, which the jury may imply the existence of a pre-incident policy, the evidence may also infer knowledge and moving force. Although tenuous, plaintiff would be able to argue from this evidence that the officers were aware of the pre-incident policy, and was therefore a moving factor in their conduct. To be the moving force, the 'identified deficiency' in the County's policies must be 'closely related to the ultimate injury.'. . In other words, a plaintiff must show that his or her constitutional 'injury would have been avoided' had the governmental entity not indemnified officers. . .Post-incident evidence is relevant to the existence of a custom or policy, from which a plaintiff may argue it was the moving force in the alleged unconstitutional violation. Therefore, post-incident indemnification of police officers is relevant and probative.").

But see Waller v. City & County of Denver, 932 F.3d 1277, 1286 (10th Cir. 2019) ("Incidents that occurred subsequent to the incident at issue in this case cannot have provided Denver with notice of a deficiency in its training program before that incident, and thus they cannot be used as evidence that, prior to Deputy Lovingier's use of force against Mr. Waller, Denver 'decisionmakers ... deliberately chose[ ] a training program that w[ould] cause violations of constitutional rights.'"); Barkley v. Dillard Dept. Stores, Inc., No. 07-20482, 2008 WL 1924178, at *6, *7 (5th Cir. May 2, 2008) (not published) ("Barkley bases part of his argument on the theory of ratification that we used in Grandstaff v. City of Borger, 767 F.2d 161 (5th Cir.1985), which concerned allegations that the police shot an innocent man. . . . Grandstaff, however, has not enjoyed wide application in our circuit. . . We have limited its ratification theory to 'extreme factual situations.' . . . The instant situation is not an extreme factual situation as in Grandstaff, but is more like Snyder, in which a single officer was involved in shooting a fleeing suspect. Consequently, we decline to apply the theory used by the court in Grandstaff."); Robinson v. D.C., 130 F. Supp. 3d 180, 195-96 (D.D.C. 2015) ("To support her deliberate-indifference theory, Robinson gathered approximately 200 first-hand accounts from dirt-bike riders or bystanders who claim that, like the incident in question here, police officers used their vehicles to chase and then hit dirt-bike riders throughout the District. . . The District, in response, seeks to whittle down the 200 or so to a more digestible (and perhaps less-likely-to-be-liability-inducing) sum by pointing out that only 22 of the statements speak to incidents taking place before the collision at issue—a descriptive observation that Plaintiff does not dispute. . . The first question, then, becomes whether Plaintiff may rely on post-collision events to demonstrate the District's 'deliberate indifference' to the practice that Robinson believes caused her son's death. The Court agrees with Defendants that she cannot. Because Monell requires the municipality's practice to have caused the violation at issue, incidents occurring after the March 6, 2009, collision cannot be used to demonstrate that such a practice was in place on that date."); Dunklin v. Mallinger, No. C–11–01275 JCS, 2013 WL 1501446, *30 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 10, 2013)) ("Here, Plaintiff has requested discovery on the question of whether the Police Chief is a final policy maker. He has stipulated, however, that the FBRD decision only found that the shooting of Mr. Dunklin was within policy and did not purport to make policy. Consequently, even assuming that Police Chief Suhr acted as a final decision maker in adopting that finding, this is not enough to give rise to Monell liability under a theory of ratification. In particular, this Court, like the courts in Kanae and Garcia finds that merely affirming a finding that a particular use of force was 'within policy' does not constitute ratification under the Supreme Court authority discussed above. Therefore, additional discover under this theory is not warranted and Plaintiff's Monell claim fails, as a matter of law, to the extent it is based on a theory of ratification."); Escobedo v. City of Redwood City, No. C 03-3204-MJJ., 2005 WL 226158, at *11, *12, *14 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 28, 2005) (not reported) ("While these cases − Henry, McRorie, Larez, and Grandstaff − stand for the proposition that the failure to reprimand may support a finding of a municipal policy of deliberate indifference to constitutional violations, none stands for the proposition that 'whenever [a municipality's] investigation fails to lead to a reprimand or discharge of an employee,' the municipality is deemed to have a policy or custom giving rise to § 1983 liability. . . Indeed, the Ninth Circuit (and the Fifth) appears to require more than a failure to reprimand to establish a municipal policy or ratification of unconstitutional conduct. . . . In the case at bar, the Court finds that the City's (or its decision-makers") post-event conduct (failure to reprimand and attempts to persuade the coroner not to classify Mr. Escobedo's death a homicide) does not rise to the level of post-event ratification described in the Henry, Grandstaff, Larez, and McRorie cases. Plaintiffs here present no evidence of other instances like this one where no post-event action was taken by the City of Redwood City. Plaintiffs present no evidence that the City of Redwood City routinely exonerates its officers of wrongdoing. While the force used by the officers here may very well have been excessive and unconstitutional,. . . Plaintiffs present no evidence that the officers' conduct rose to the Grandstaff or McRorie levels of gross disregard for human life such that the municipality's failure to reprimand can be found to constitute a policy of deliberate indifference. For these reasons, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have failed to demonstrate that a triable fact exists as to whether the City's post-event conduct evidences a preexisting municipal policy of deliberate indifference to its police officers' unconstitutional treatment of detainees. . . . The Hopkins and Davis cases are substantially different from the case at bar where there is neither evidence of a department-wide practice of failing to adequately train police officers on the use of nunchucks nor of any perception that the training program in existence is a sham. The defendant officers may have used the nunchucks improperly but this does not itself evidence a widespread policy that subjects the City to § 1983 liability. With no other evidence to support a custom or policy, Plaintiffs' argument fails. The Court finds no municipal liability on an inadequacy of training theory for Plaintiffs' claim of excessive force.").

See also Young v. City of Providence, 404 F.3d 4, 28 (1st Cir. 2005) ("Young presented evidence that the general policy of the PPD was to document training, and yet for unclear reasons any on-duty/off-duty training was evidently undocumented. . . . In short, there are substantial unresolved issues of fact with respect to the amount of training that the PPD actually gave to officers, including Solitro, on avoiding misidentifications of off-duty officers. The jury could find that there was, at best, very minimal training on these issues, and no real program of training on them at all. A finding of deliberate indifference requires also that the City have disregarded a known or obvious risk of serious harm from its failure to develop a training program that dealt with off-duty identifications in the context of its always armed/always on-duty policy. We think the jury could reasonably make such a finding here. Such knowledge can be imputed to a municipality through a pattern of prior constitutional violations. . . Young does not rely primarily on this sort of notice, although she does have some evidence from which a jury could find that it was common knowledge within the PPD that misidentifications of off-duty officers responding to an incident often occurred in Providence, particularly misidentification of minority officers. It is clear that a jury could find a pattern of knowledge of prior misidentifications and that this was likely to pose a significant risk of harm."); Amnesty America v. Town of West Hartford, 361 F.3d 113, 128 (2d Cir. 2004) ("The Town argues . . .that the district court correctly concluded that plaintiffs failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact as to McCue's failure to supervise because they have not proffered evidence that the demonstrators repeatedly complained about the excessive force after the demonstrations, or that McCue repeatedly failed to investigate such complaints. This argument is misplaced. While we have held that proof of a policymaker's failure to respond to repeated complaints of civil rights violations would be sufficient to establish deliberate indifference, . . . we have never required such a showing. The means of establishing deliberate indifference will vary given the facts of the case and need not rely on any particular factual showing. The operative inquiry is whether the facts suggest that the policymaker's inaction was the result of a 'conscious choice' rather than mere negligence. . . . Thus, plaintiffs' evidence must establish only that a policymaking official had notice of a potentially serious problem of unconstitutional conduct, such that the need for corrective action or supervision was 'obvious,' . . .and the policymaker's failure to investigate or rectify the situation evidences deliberate indifference, rather than mere negligence or bureaucratic inaction. Considered under this standard, plaintiffs' proffered affidavits are sufficient to withstand summary judgment, because the evidence allows the inference that [Police Chief] McCue himself witnessed (and perhaps encouraged) the unconstitutional conduct, and that the conduct was so blatantly unconstitutional that McCue's inaction could be the result of deliberate indifference to the protesters' constitutional rights."); Olsen v. Layton Hills Mall, 312 F.3d 1304, 1319, 1320 (10th Cir. 2002) ("We reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to Davis County because Appellant has alleged the necessary facts that may establish that Davis County manifested deliberate indifference by failing to train its jail's prebooking officers to recognize OCD and handle sufferers appropriately. . . . Given the frequency of the disorder, Davis County's scant procedures on dealing with mental illness and the prebooking officers' apparent ignorance to his requests for medication, a violation of federal rights is quite possibly a ' Aplainly obvious' consequence'of Davis County's failure to train its prebooking officers to address the symptoms. . . . And this is for a jury to decide. That OCD is relatively common and that the county had procedures in place for dealing with inmates with psychiatric disorders suggest that the municipality may have had constructive notice of the illness' prevalence and consequences. Accordingly, Appellant has raised a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the county had notice of and was deliberately indifferent in its failure to train prebooking officers on OCD."); Henry v. County of Shasta, 132 F.3d 512, 518-20 (9th Cir. 1997), amended on denial of rehearing, 137 F.3d 1372 (9th Cir. 1998) ("Here, factual issues were presented that the county acted in accordance with an established policy or deliberate indifference to violation of rights by stripping and detaining in rubber rooms persons stopped for minor, non-jailable traffic offenses who refuse to sign a notice to appear, or demand to be taken before a magistrate. There was evidence that the county permitted an almost identical incident as that complained of by Henry to occur after the county was sued and after being put on notice unequivocally of its deputies' and nurses' unconstitutional treatment of Henry. . . . In holding that the May and Burns declarations may be used to establish municipal liability although the events related therein occurred after the series of incidents that serves as the basis for Henry's claims, we reiterate our rule that post-event evidence is not only admissible for purposes of proving the existence of a municipal defendant's policy or custom, but may be highly probative with respect to that inquiry. . . When a county continues to turn a blind eye to severe violations of inmates' constitutional rights − despite having received notice of such violations − a rational fact finder may properly infer the existence of a previous policy or custom of deliberate indifference. . . . If a municipal defendant's failure to fire or reprimand officers evidences a policy of deliberate indifference to their misconduct, surely its failure even after being sued to correct a blatantly unconstitutional course of treatment − stripping persons who have committed minor traffic infractions, throwing them naked into a 'rubber room' and holding them there for ten hours or more for failing to sign a traffic ticket or asserting their legal right to be brought before a magistrate − is even more persuasive evidence of deliberate indifference or of a policy encouraging such official misconduct. May's and Burns' declarations are sufficient to show for purposes of summary judgment that such abuse of people who commit minor infractions is 'the way things are done and have been done' in Shasta County, and thus would allow a jury to make a finding as to the existence of a policy or custom.").

In Beck v. City of Pittsburgh, 89 F.3d 966, 973-74 (3d Cir. 1996), "the plaintiff offered in evidence a series of actual written civilian complaints of similar nature, most of them before and some after [the incident in question], containing specific information pertaining to the use of excessive force and verbal abuse by Officer Williams." The court determined that "[w]ithout more, these written complaints were sufficient for a reasonable jury to infer that the Chief of Police of Pittsburgh and his department knew, or should have known, of Officer Williams's violent behavior in arresting citizens, even when the arrestee behaved peacefully, in orderly fashion, complied with all of the

Officer's demands, and offered no resistance." Furthermore, the court "reject[ed] the district court's suggestion that mere Department procedures to receive and investigate complaints shield the City from liability. It is not enough that an investigative process be in place . . . 'The investigative process must be real. It must have some teeth. It must answer to the citizen by providing at least a rudimentary chance of redress when injustice is done. The mere fact of investigation for the sake of investigation does not fulfill a city's obligation to its citizens.' . . . Formalism is often the last refuge of scoundrels." (quoting from appellant's brief). See also Velazquez v. City of Long Beach,793 F.3d 1010, 1027-29 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Velazquez advanced several theories of Monell liability for excessive use of force, one of which was that the City had a policy or custom of failing to investigate and discipline officers who had allegedly committed prior instances of excessive force. In his pre-trial motions, Velazquez represented that Abuhadwan in particular had received 'ten citizen complaints regarding his conduct,' that three of these complaints involved excessive force, and that Abuhadwan had over '30 internal affairs incidents of force since 2007, 19 of them using a baton or flashlight.' At the start of trial, however, without any explanation, the district court granted Defendants' motion in limine to 'preclude reference to complaints, Internal Affairs, and discipline.'. . As a result, the evidentiary basis for a failure-to-discipline Monell theory was never presented to the jury. . . . The excluded evidence was relevant, indeed critical, to prove that the City was aware of Abuhadwan's alleged tendency to use excessive force.The district court may have been concerned that permitting the introduction of evidence of prior complaints would have suggested to the jury that Abuhadwan acted in accordance with these past actions. See Fed.R.Evid. 404(b). But any such suggestion could have been cured short of categorical exclusion by an appropriate limiting instruction. [citing cases] Instead, the district court entirely prevented Velazquez from developing a potentially meritorious Monell claim, without any explanation for its decision. Beck v. City of Pittsburgh, 89 F.3d 966 (3d Cir.1996), is particularly instructive in explaining why the exclusion of the proffered lack-of-discipline evidence was an abuse of discretion. The plaintiff in Beck presented five prior complaints of excessive force against the defendant officer in support of his Monell claim and demonstrated that none of the complaints resulted in disciplinary action. . . Beck recognized that 'evidence of other wrongs or acts [that are] not admissible to prove the character of a person' under Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b) was nonetheless admissible for 'proof of knowledge' on the part of the police department. . . Based on the admitted evidence, Beck held that 'a reasonable jury could have inferred that the Chief of Police knew, or should have known, of [the officer's] propensity for violence when making arrests.'. . As in Beck, a jury might have been able reasonably to infer from prior complaints that the Long Beach Police Department was aware that Abuhadwan had previously used excessive force when making arrests, but had taken no steps to curb his propensity. By precluding any reference to such evidence, the district court prevented Velazquez from even attempting to make such a showing. We thus hold the district court's categorical exclusion of evidence relevant to establishing Velazquez's theory of municipal liability an abuse of discretion. In granting judgment as a matter of law, the district court concluded that 'a reasonable jury would not have a legally sufficient evidentiary basis to find for' Velazquez on his municipal liability claim. Fed.R.Civ.P. 50(a). But when the district court categorically excluded relevant Monell evidence, it 'invaded the province of the jury,' to whom the excluded evidence may well have made a difference. . . The City does not argue that this exclusion of potentially critical evidence was harmless. . . We therefore hold that the 'incorrect evidentiary ruling resulted in the judge erroneously entering judgment as a matter of law for the defendants,'. . . and reverse the district court's grant of judgment as a matter of law on the Monell claims.").

See also Smith v. City of Holyoke, No. CV 17-30078-FDS, 2020 WL 1514610, at *13-14 (D. Mass. Mar. 30, 2020) ("High-speed vehicular pursuits are relatively rare, and certainly so when compared to traffic stops or other citizen encounters. They present unique dangers, and not just to the police and public; there is a strong likelihood that they will terminate in an adrenaline-filled, group encounter between police officers and a suspect, which in turn greatly increases the potential for the exercise of excessive force. A single past episode of a vehicular pursuit gone wrong therefore may have substantial significance in the Monell calculus, even where that would not be true as to other types of police misconduct. Here, a lawsuit had been filed in 2013 alleging the use of excessive force—specifically, the beating of an unarmed and unresisting suspect---after a vehicular pursuit. . . Under the circumstances, a reasonable jury could conclude that the City was on notice as to the propensity of its officers to use excessive force after a vehicular pursuit. A reasonable jury could further conclude that the City was aware that its training on vehicular pursuits and the use of force was inadequate, but nonetheless exhibited deliberate indifference to the unconstitutional effects of those inadequacies. . . .In summary, Smith has raised a genuine dispute of fact as to whether the City of Holyoke failed to train its officers on its written use of force and vehicular pursuit policy, which may have directly caused defendant officers to violate his constitutional right to be free from excessive force."); Duvall v. Hustler, No. CV 18-3278, 2020 WL 1357315, at *17–18 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 19, 2020) ("In light of this long history of inadequate investigations, a jury could find that the dearth of serious supervision and discipline created the conditions for constitutional violations. First, the City knew 'to a moral certainty'—based on the many previous officer-involved shootings it documented, and also because it would be obvious to any law-enforcement agency—that its officers would require supervision and discipline after use-of-force incidents. . . Second, the City was repeatedly admonished, by its own police oversight agency and by the Department of Justice, that its investigative practices were unacceptable. Third, those problematic practices were likely to result in constitutional violations. In the absence of basic accountability measures like conducting interviews promptly and audio- or video-recording them, there was a substantial risk that the main goal of internal investigations would not be impartial factfinding and appropriate discipline, but would instead be 'damage control or cover-up.'. . A jury could find that this lack of accountability demonstrated the City's deliberate indifference to Sowell's constitutional rights. A jury could also find that these practices created 'a culture in which officers "knew there would be no professional consequences for their action[s]"'. . . and thus 'contributed to the specific constitutional violations' asserted here by creating both an opportunity and a safe environment for officers inclined to protect themselves by collectively falsifying their narrative of their own actions. . . Summary judgment will therefore be denied on Count Nine, Plaintiffs' Monell claim, as to their claim of failure to supervise and discipline."); Alwan v. City of New York, No. 14CV4556NGGVMS, 2018 WL 2048366, at *8–9 (E.D.N.Y. May 2, 2018) ("Although the court need not resolve the question, it seems safe to say that Nelson's history of complaints—which includes eight CCRB complaints, two additional IAB complaints, and two lawsuits alleging the use of excessive force, as well as several domestic- or domestic-related violence complaints—would suffice to create a triable issue as to whether it was obvious to the City that there was a risk that Nelson would use excessive force against arrestees. . . Regardless of whether the City was aware of such a risk, however, Plaintiff's failure-to-supervise and failure-to-discipline theories are unavailing because he has not presented evidence from which a rational factfinder could conclude that the City acted with deliberate indifference to this risk. As noted above, 'deliberate indifference may be inferred if [prior complaints of misconduct] are followed by no meaningful attempt on the part of the municipality to investigate or to forestall further incidents,'. . . or if the City's response is 'so patently inadequate to the task as to amount to deliberate indifference[.]'. . . Plaintiff has not identified any complaints to which the City simply failed to respond. To the contrary, it appears to the court that the City investigated the complaints against Nelson and, to the extent those complaints were found to be substantiated, disciplined him, subjected him to increased force monitoring, and warned him that civilian complaints could derail his career. . . To the extent the complaints against Nelson were found to be unsubstantiated or were settled without an admission of liability by the City, those complaints do not provide a valid basis for concluding that the City was deliberately indifferent to his use of excessive force, because they do not, by themselves, establish that he used excessive force in the first place. . . . Complaints, without more, do not prove that a police officer actually violated anyone's constitutional rights, so those unsubstantiated complaints cannot support a rational conclusion that the NYPD's force-monitoring system was 'so deficient as to reflect a policy of deliberate indifference to the civil rights of the citizenry.'. .Because Plaintiff has not produced evidence from which a rational factfinder could conclude that the City acted with deliberate indifference in failing to train, supervise, or discipline NYPD officers in general, or Hernandez and Nelson in particular, regarding the use of force against the public, the court GRANTS Defendants' motion for summary judgment as to Plaintiff's Monell claim."); Douglas v. City of Springfield, No. CV 14-30210-MAP, 2017 WL 123422, at *9–10 (D. Mass. Jan. 12, 2017) ("Here, as in Cox, the question is whether Springfield should have looked behind repeated findings of 'not sustained' to address a possible propensity for an excessive use of force by some of its officers in the execution of search and arrest warrants and in similar encounters with civilians. As in the Cox case, a number of the officers who arrested Plaintiff had very significant histories of civilian complaints. In addition, the city chose to settle out of court with several plaintiffs who filed a § 1983 lawsuit in which the plaintiffs alleged excessive use of force by Bigda or Kent, two of the officers allegedly involved in the assault on Plaintiff. Cases settle for many reasons, and the decision to settle may say little about the merits of the asserted claims. Nonetheless, a settlement of $175,000, as occurred in a case in which Kent was named as a defendant, supports a reasonable inference that at least some of the claims asserted in that suit had merit . . . . 'As with many issues, the question is to a considerable extent one of degree: while a single accusation of excessive force is not enough, at some point as the accusations and claims begin to pile up, a critical mass may be reached requiring an affirmative response from supervisors.' [collecting cases] A reasonable finder of fact could also infer that there were flaws in the city's investigation of civilian complaints that demonstrated deliberate indifference to the risks posed by officers against whom large numbers of civilian complaints about excessive use of force had been made. The IIU documents submitted as evidence by Plaintiff show what appears to be a consistent pattern of rejecting civilian complaints against police officers. . . . Nor does it appear from the evidence that the IIU tracked and weighed the number of complaints against an officer as a factor in its responses to citizen complaints. Any failure to take into account repeated complaints against a particular officer could contribute to an ineffective process for investigating civilian complaints. . .Taking these factors into account, a reasonable finder of fact could conclude that Springfield's investigative process was less than effective at identifying officers prone to the use of excessive force. . .If a jury concluded that Springfield's IIU process was ineffective or weak, it could further conclude that a resulting failure to take appropriate action in response to complaints of excessive force might lead Springfield's officers to believe such conduct would be tolerated. . . In view of the disciplinary histories of Bigda, Kent, Templeman, and, to a lesser extent, Kalish, there are genuine issues of material fact as to whether Springfield was deliberately indifferent to the risk that these officers would use excessive force in executing arrest and search warrants and in other charged interactions with civilians. . . Because Plaintiff claims to have been the victim of excessive use of force during the execution of an arrest warrant, he has 'produce[d] evidence that serious prior incidents similar to the alleged constitutional violation in question put the municipality on inquiry notice of [the officers'] danger to the public and that the police department's policy of ignoring or covering up those incidents was "the moving force" behind the alleged violation.'. . The court draws no conclusions as to whether Plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence to support a determination that Springfield knew about and tolerated or acquiesced in a custom or practice of excessive use of force by some members of its police department. . . This is simply a recommendation that the court should not 'rule in [Springfield's] favor as a matter of law, and that the claims against the [c]ity should be submitted to a jury for resolution.'"); Cox v. Murphy, No. CV 12-11817-FDS, 2016 WL 4009978, at *8–12 (D. Mass. Feb. 12, 2016) ("As to Murphy and Flaherty specifically, the City contends that 'not a single excessive force complaint against either Murphy or Flaherty was substantiated, despite thorough investigation by the Internal Affairs Department ... with respect to each complaint.' . . The difficult question at the heart of this case is whether that is sufficient to exonerate the City as a matter of law. More specifically, the core question is whether a reasonable jury could conclude that the City should have looked beyond the formal findings to address the possible propensity of Murphy and Flaherty to use excessive force, and whether its failure to do so demonstrated a custom or practice of tacitly condoning or approving the use of that excessive force. . . .[E]xperience and common sense suggest that the paper record may not tell the entire story. To begin, claims of excessive force are notoriously difficult for citizens to prove. Many citizens, particularly in poor or minority communities, may be unwilling to file complaints against officers, to pursue those complaints, or to cooperate with investigations into the use of excessive force. Individuals who are here illegally are particularly unlikely to want to draw law enforcement attention to themselves. And surely many officers are aware that they are more likely to be believed in a contest of credibility than an arrestee, particularly if the arrestee is a convicted felon. Of course, the word of multiple officers is likely to carry even greater weight. And that problem may be exacerbated by a 'code of silence' or a similar set of widespread attitudes that inhibits or prevents the reporting of police misconduct. As a result, there is reason to believe that the use of excessive force is underreported, and that even valid claims by citizens do not always result in a finding of 'sustained.'. . Furthermore, complaints of excessive force are not normally distributed randomly throughout police departments. It has been well-documented for decades that a small percentage of police officers is responsible for a large percentage of citizen complaints of abuse. . . With that in mind, police supervisors cannot reasonably assume that no problem exists simply because the accusations against a particular officer have never been formally sustained. Among other things, a supervisor could reasonably infer that when an individual officer accumulates a high or disproportionate number of complaints of excessive force or related misconduct, some further action—whether in the form of further investigation, training, discipline, or some combination of those responses—is warranted. A similar inference might reasonably be drawn when multiple investigations of a particular officer result in a finding of 'not sustained' (as opposed to 'exonerated' or 'unfounded'), or the same officer is named as a defendant in multiple lawsuits for which the municipality ultimately pays a settlement. . . Of course, any one of those accusations or claims may be fabricated. But surely the likelihood that all of them are fabricated decreases considerably as the number begins to mount. For that reason, most of the recent Massachusetts federal cases granting summary judgment to municipalities on Monell-type claims are inapposite. . . By contrast, in Semedo v. Elliott, 2012 WL 2449912 (D. Mass. June 28, 2012), the court denied summary judgment where the plaintiff claimed unlawful arrest based on racial motivation, and produced evidence of 200 complaints against individual officers in the city of Brockton, as well as 12 complaints against 29 officers alleging racial discrimination. . . . The issue is not whether other plaintiffs have proved constitutional violations; it is whether this plaintiff has adduced sufficient evidence that the relevant supervisors were deliberately indifferent to the rights of the citizens with whom Murphy and Flaherty came in contact. There is no clear standard or precise metric by which the Court can measure whether the claim has reached the appropriate threshold to survive summary judgment. The courts should not lightly infer a municipal policy or practice from a few scattered claims, lest every claim of excessive force engender a Monell claim. But neither should the courts blind themselves to reality. As with many issues, the question is to a considerable extent one of degree: while a single accusation of excessive force is not enough, at some point, as the accusations and claims begin to pile up, a critical mass may be reached requiring an affirmative response from supervisors. . . Put simply, a very large amount of smoke could reasonably compel the inference that there must be at least a small amount of fire. This is such a case. Nicholas Cox is by no means the first person to allege that Murphy choked him, punched him, or otherwise used excessive force. Murphy has been the subject of at least ten citizen complaints of excessive force or assault, seven of which occurred before Cox's arrest. . . .In addition to citizen complaints, Murphy was the subject of five lawsuits alleging excessive force, one of which involved an allegation of choking. Three of those lawsuits settled, suggesting that there was at least some degree of potential exposure; one resulted in a finding for Murphy; and one is still pending. . . Murphy has never been disciplined for any of those incidents. For his part, Flaherty has been the subject of four other excessive force complaints (one of which occurred after Cox's arrest) and one lawsuit that ultimately settled. . . . Given that evidence, a reasonable jury could conclude that the City was on notice as to the possible propensity of Murphy, or Murphy and Flaherty together, to use excessive force during arrests. A reasonable jury could further conclude that the City did not take appropriate action in response, and indeed on some occasions did not even conduct a meaningful investigation. Accordingly, there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the City's custom or practice of failing to train, supervise, or discipline the officers demonstrated a deliberate indifference to plaintiff's constitutional rights, and that the custom or practice was the direct cause of the alleged violation. . . . To be clear, the Court is making no finding that Murphy or Flaherty used excessive force on Cox; that they had a propensity to use excessive force; or that their supervisors in the Police Department were aware that they had such a propensity or were deliberately indifferent to that possibility. It is simply deciding that it cannot rule in the City's favor as a matter of law, and that the claims against the City should be submitted to a jury for resolution. Accordingly, the City's motion for summary judgment will be denied as to Cox's claim that the City demonstrated deliberate indifference by failing to supervise, investigate, or discipline its officers for the use of excessive force."); Pipitone v. City of New York, 57 F. Supp. 3d 173, 191-92 (E.D.N.Y. 2014) ("The single action or inaction of a municipal policymaker, such as a specific failure to adequately supervise or discipline an officer, can also form an official policy or custom attributable to a municipality for purposes of municipal liability. . . At the culmination of the 1985 disciplinary process, Commissioner Ward himself approved Mo's recommendation and chose not to discipline Eppolito. Because Ward was the NYPD policymaker for disciplinary purposes, that act is sufficient to bind the City. The fact that Ward was acting on Mo's recommendation is beside the point, because '§ 1983 plaintiffs may establish that the city is liable for their injuries by proving that "the authorized policymakers approved a subordinate's decision and the basis for it."'. . Indeed, Ward was obligated to review the recommendation and decide for himself the appropriate disciplinary outcome. . . .With respect to the 1985 failure to discipline Eppolito, the City argues that the record will not support the inference that Commissioner Ward was deliberately indifferent. Contrary to the City's contention, however, a single disciplinary failure can support an inference of deliberate indifference. . . In Amnesty America, a police chief was present at two protests at which his officers allegedly assaulted protestors. . . The Second Circuit held that the jury could infer, from the chief's presence on the scene, that in each instance he was aware of the assaults but took no action to resolve them, and thus was deliberately indifferent. . . The City seeks to distinguish Amnesty America by noting that the police chief in that case observed his officers commit constitutional violations, whereas in this case Commissioner Ward was aware only that Eppolito allegedly leaked confidential police documents to a well-known mobster, which is not in itself a constitutional violation. Deliberate indifference, however, does not require inaction in the face of a constitutional violation; inaction in the face of a serious and obvious risk of constitutional harm is sufficient. See Jones v. E. Haven, 691 F.3d 72, 81 (2d Cir.2012); Vann v. City of New York, 72 F.3d 1040, 1049 (2d Cir.1995). The failure to discipline a detective who colludes with organized crime plainly courts the risk that that detective will do so again. And it is likewise obvious that collusion between a police detective and organized crime might well lead, as it did in these cases, to unconstitutional harm to members of the public."); Rankin v. Majikes, No. 3:CV-14-699, 2014 WL 6893693, at *11 (M.D. Pa. Dec. 5, 2014) ("Rankin adequately alleges that the City of Wilkes–Barre's failure to train its officers on avoidance of force techniques amounts to deliberate indifference to the unreasonable use of deadly force by its officers, and that its failure to train resulted in a pattern of 'improper shootings of innocent persons.". . Rankin will be permitted to proceed with his Fourth Amendment claim against the City of Wilkes–Barre."); Escobar v. City of Houston, 2007 WL 2900581, at 37-40 (S.D. Tex. Sept. 29, 2007) ("Certainly, as the City states, no amount of training can eliminate the possibility of an accident. Nor can any amount of indexing training ensure that an officer will 'index' his weapon properly each time it is drawn. There are disputed issues, however, as to whether HPD adequately trained officers in safe-weapons handling. The evidence raises fact issues as to whether Officer Carbonneau had been properly instructed and trained on indexing his weapon before a decision to shoot was made. The evidence shows that Officer Carbonneau was not required to take additional training on indexing and related gun-safety issues in the seventeen months after he graduated from the academy. The evidence raises fact issues as to whether this training was inadequate and was a cause of Escobar's death. . . . The Noteworthy incidents raise a fact issue as to whether there is a pattern of weapons mishandling by HPD officers, particularly involving a failure to use weapons-handling techniques − including indexing − intended to prevent accidental discharges. . . . The pattern evidence here is not presented to show the existence of a custom or practice, but rather to show the City's knowledge of the need for additional training in firearms handling, especially indexing. Moreover, the facts described in the Noteworthies are 'fairly similar to what ultimately transpired.'. . . There is a fact issue as to whether the City faced and ignored a pattern of similar incidents. . . . The City argues that its training requirements met and in some respects exceeded the standards set by the State of Texas. . . . Meeting the State's standard, however, does not equate to a finding that as a matter of law, there is no constitutional violation. . . . The evidence shows that HPD's Police Chief receives the Noteworthy and internal affairs investigation of each incident. The relevant comparison is not with the number of times an HPD officer gets through a day without accidentally discharging his or her weapon at or in close proximity to other people, including those in physical encounters. Rather, the issue is whether the number and nature of incidents reveals a pattern showing deficient training that is 'obvious and obviously likely to result in a constitutional violation.' . . . The evidence of twenty-six similar incidents of accidental discharges in five years, coupled with the various inquiries, memos, and letters about HPD's weapons and use-of-force training, the inconsistent evidence as to what training HPD in fact provided on indexing and related techniques, and the obviousness of the risk created if officers are not trained on indexing, raises fact issues that preclude summary judgment."); Hogan v. City of Easton, No. 04-759, 2006 WL 3702637, at *12, *13 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 12, 2006) ("The City Defendants argue that they are entitled to summary judgment on the failure to train claim because the summary judgment record establishes that all EPD members involved in the Hogan incident received the required firearms and deadly force training required by the Pennsylvania Municipal Police Officers Education and Training Commission, 53 Pa.C.S.A. § 2161, et seq ("PMOETC"). . . . We find that the City Defendants reliance on the officers' PMOETC certifications to defeat the failure to train claim is misplaced. The City Defendants do not cite − and the Court has not located − any authority from the Third Circuit to the effect that compliance with firearms training absolutely bars any finding of a policy or custom of deliberate indifference to the need for training on SWAT Team tactics in barricade situations. . . Moreover, the City Defendants again read the Hogans' claim too narrowly. The Hogans do not claim that the officers did not receive firearms and deadly force training. Rather, their complaint pled generally that the City had a policy or custom to inadequately train officers, and the Hogans argue in their response to the summary judgment motion, that the City Defendants had a policy or custom of indifference to the need to adequately train the SWAT team on how to respond to an incident requiring that a distraught man be subdued without the use of deadly force. . . . The Hogans have met their burden of proof of a pattern of underlying constitutional violations and the existence of an issue of material fact as to whether the need for more or different training was so obvious that the policymaker's failure to respond amounted to deliberate indifference. The evidence they adduced on the failure to train issue includes their expert's report that the EPD lacked adequate policies and training regardingill individuals, that the SWAT Team was operating without any written standards, and that permitting non-SWAT officers who had not trained with the SWAT Team to participate in the situation proximately caused the use of excessive force when the SAGE weapon was deployed. As the Hogans have identified these specific failures in the training practices that the City Defendants failed to remedy, they have satisfied their burden of showing evidence that, if believed, would show that the need for more or different training was so obvious that the policymaker's failure to respond amounted to deliberate indifference. Thus, they have created a jury issue on whether the policymaker's failure to respond amounts to deliberate indifference to the EPD SWAT Team's lack of adequate training."); Perrin v. Gentner, 177 F.Supp.2d 1115, 1124, 1125 (D. Nev. 2001) ("From the statements of those who worked with and came in contact with Officer Gentner, it appears that Officer Gentner has a tendency not only to use excessive force, but to misperceive potential safety threats. If Officer Gentner's own fellow officers were afraid to work with him, surely Metro was on constructive notice that Gentner was not only a potential threat to public safety, but that he regularly flaunted constitutional safeguards intended to protect citizens against the use of excessive force. . . . Plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence to demonstrate that she could present proof of a Metro policy tolerating the use of excessive force through inadequate training and supervision. . . . Finally, there is evidence to show that Metro's policy of tolerating the use of excessive force was the "moving force" behind Officer Gentner's killing of Perrin. . . . Here there is evidence that Metro employed inadequate training procedures and failed to reprimand its officers for using excessive force, actions which Metro should have known would cause its officers to inflict constitutional injuries on citizens. Plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence that Metro's policy of inadequate training and supervision was the moving force behind Officer Gentner's use of deadly force against an unarmed jaywalker. . . . Here Metro should have known of the potential for constitutional violations when it placed a gun in the hands of Officer Gentner and should have taken prophylactic measures to ensure that Gentner did not use deadly force without taking constitutionally mandated precautions. The Court concludes that a reasonable jury could find that Metro's failure to train and supervise its officers constituted a policy which led to an unreasonable use of deadly force against Perrin.").

But see Peet v. City of Detroit, 502 F.3d 557, 568 (6th Cir. 2007) ("All told, the plaintiffs have produced only the arrests of Peet, Williams, and Latham as admissible evidence of a city-wide custom of arresting witnesses without probable cause. But that is not enough to create a genuine issue of material fact. A custom or policy must be shown by 'a clear and persistent pattern,' and three discrete instances in one investigation is simply not enough to reasonably draw such a conclusion. . . .Just as this court held in Thomas that no reasonable juror could 'infer a municipal-wide policy based solely on one instance of potential misconduct,'. . . no reasonable juror could infer such a custom or policy based on a mere three instances that are limited to one police investigation."); Beard v. Whitmore Lake School Dist., 244 F. App'x 607, 2007 WL 1748139, at *6 (6th Cir. June 19, 2007) ("The students are also unable to show that the District failed to act in response to 'repeated complaints of constitutional violations by its officers.'. . The students seek to establish a pattern of unconstitutional searches by pointing to a January 6, 2000, incident in which District officials searched student's backpacks and pockets. The district court was correct to conclude as a matter of law that the January 6, 2000, incident does not establish a pattern."); Jenkins v. Bartlett, 487 F.3d 482, 492, 493 (7th Cir. 2007) ("The jury found that Mr. Jenkins' constitutional rights were not violated when Officer Bartlett fired upon him, thus the City cannot be held liable for any failure to train. . . . The evidence Ms. Jenkins presents shows only that four individuals were shot by MPD officers while in a vehicle; it does not show that each or any of these shootings amounted to a constitutional violation. . . This is not enough to provide the City or Chief Jones with actual or constructive knowledge that 'the police ... so often violate constitutional rights that the need for further training must have been plainly obvious.'"); Green v. City of New York, 465 F.3d 65, 81, 82 (2d Cir. 2006) ("We also conclude that plaintiffs offered insufficient evidence to reach the jury on a failure-to-train theory; however, this issue is closer. Although plaintiffs offered no evidence of the number of people in New York who are disabled by their inability to communicate verbally, it is likely true, given the City's enormous population, that there are a substantial number of such people and that a significant subset of that population will, at some point in their lives, experience medical emergencies potentially calling for transportation to a medical facility. Further, emergency medical personnel who respond to a medical emergency involving a person who refuses to accept medical treatment do face a difficult choice between honoring the person's refusal and offering treatment or transportation for treatment that they feel is necessary. Because medical professionals are trained to heal, absent proper training, they may well believe they should override the ill or injured person's refusal. Finally, proper training would increase the likelihood of a constitutionally appropriate response. . . . Two factors, however, cause us to conclude that a reasonable jury could not find for plaintiffs on a failure-to-train theory. First, despite the likelihood of a significant problem, there is no admissible evidence in the record of any problem. Second, and more important, the City did not fail to fulfill any training obligation it may have had. It provided personnel with guidelines that specifically and clearly informed them that they had to evaluate non-verbal refusals of medical treatment. Without evidence that these provisions were ignored prior to the incident at issue in this lawsuit, a reasonable jury could not find that the City had a further training obligation. Therefore, the district court correctly dismissed all Section 1983 claims against the City."); Williams v. Limestone County, Alabama, 198 F. App'x 893, 897, 898 (11th Cir. 2006) ("First, Williams fails to provide any evidence − or even allege − that there was a history or pattern of jail personnel's deliberate indifference to inmates' serious medical needs that would render obvious the need for additional or different medical training. In fact, Williams cites only the incident involving himself. On these facts, this is insufficient to establish Sheriff Blakely's liability for a failure to train the jail staff. . . . Second, there is no indication from the record that Sheriff Blakely had notice his policies, training procedures, or supervision were 'likely to result in the violation of a constitutional right.'. . The contract between Naphcare and Limestone County provided for 24-hour care at the jail, and jail personnel were trained to call Naphcare's on-call nurse should a medical emergency arise outside of the nurses' standard work hours. . . . In this case, Sheriff Blakely promulgated general procedures for dealing with emergency situations, which procedures relied primarily on the medical expertise Naphcare was obligated by contract to provide. The fact that alternative procedures, such as providing jail personnel with additional medical training, might have better addressed Williams' particular needs does not show that Sheriff Blakely was deliberately indifferent to Williams' medical needs."); Ellis ex rel. Pendergrass v. Cleveland Municipal School District, 455 F.3d 690, 701 (6th Cir. 2006) ("Thus, the School District had notice of only two incidents of possible constitutional violations. Pendergrass has not shown how two incidents, over a two-year period, could put the School District on notice of a problem when the School District operated 127 schools with over 69,000 students. To establish deliberate indifference through these reports, Pendergrass would have had to allege and put on some evidence that two incidents of abuse over two years is an excessive number. . . Such a conclusion is compelled by our decision in Thomas v. City of Chattanooga, 398 F.3d 426, 431 (6th Cir.2005). In Thomas, the plaintiff introduced evidence of forty-five suits of excessive force against the Chattanooga Police Department to establish that the department had a custom of condoning excessive force by its officers. . .This court held that such evidence was 'conclusory' because the plaintiff 'did not produce any data showing what a 'normal' number of excessive force complaints would be.'. .Similarly, because Pendergrass has not presented any evidence that two incidents of substitute-teacher abuse is more than what the normal number of incidents would be, she cannot show that the School District had notice of a problem requiring additional training or supervision. Thus, as a matter of law, her claim of failure to train or supervise fails because a reasonable jury could not find the School District deliberately indifferent."); Phillips v. Stevens, 2007 WL 2359758, at *14 (S.D.Ohio Aug. 16, 2007) ("Mollette submitted copies of intra-divisional memos sent by the Internal Affairs Bureau ("IAB") to Paden's supervising commanders on March 1, 2003, July 3, 2003, August 7, 2003, and September 1, 2003. Each memo noted that Paden had been the subject of three or more citizen complaints within the previous 12 months. The memos directed the commanders to bring the information to the attention of Paden's immediate supervisor to determine whether there was a problem developing that needed to be addressed. . . Mollette has submitted two memos sent by Sergeant Thomas Miller to Chief of Police James Jackson in response to the IAB memos. The first memo, dated March 15, 2003, reviewed six citizen complaints stemming from incidents that occurred between February 8, 2002 and November 10, 2002. Some complained of rude or discourteous behavior; others complained of excessive force. While Sergeant Miller concluded that the complaints were unfounded, he nevertheless found that 'the number of complaints within the specified time period warrant some action.'. . Miller ordered Paden to attend classes on the 'Art of Listening' and 'Dealing with Difficult Customers.' Miller also stated that he would 'continue to monitor Officer Paden closely and try to help him reduce these complaints.'. .The second memo, dated March 19, 2003, reviewed three additional citizen complaints involving a use of force. . . Miller concluded that the uses of force were within departmental policy and that he did 'not see a pattern that would reveal a concern of Officer

Paden's discretion to use physical force at this time.' . . These memos are proof that the City is not deliberately indifferent to citizen complaints involving use of excessive force. The City reviewed each complaint and each self-reported use of force to determine whether the officer engaged in wrongdoing. In addition, once a certain number of complaints were filed against a particular officer, a more in-depth investigation was conducted to determine whether there was a problem that needed to be addressed. In Paden's case, after investigating some of the citizen complaints, Sergeant Miller determined that Paden would benefit from classes to improve his interpersonal communication skills. Although Miller also concluded that there was no need to be concerned that Paden was engaged in a pattern of use of excessive force, the fact that he was alerted to a potential problem and conducted an investigation counsels against a finding of deliberate indifference. Based on the evidence presented, no reasonable jury could find that the City was deliberately indifferent to the alleged problem."); Wolfanger v. Laurel County, Ky., No. 6: 06-358-DCR, 2008 WL 169804, at *10 (E.D.Ky. Jan. 17, 2008) ("While Dr. Alpert suggests that the County was 'deliberately indifferent' in its failure to provide its deputies with specialized training in handling mentally ill and/or suicidal individuals, the mere fact that Laurel County did not offer any specialized training in this area does not necessitate a finding that the County acted unconstitutionally. As noted above, a plaintiff's allegations of inadequate training will not trigger § 1983 liability, unless the situation causing the injury is recurring such that the Court may impute prior knowledge and deliberate indifference to the municipality. Here, the Plaintiff has not suggested that this set of circumstances has ever arisen before, let alone occurred with frequency so as to impute liability to the County. Likewise, the Plaintiff has not shown that Deputy Poynter had a history of using excessive force against mentally ill individuals."); Santiago v. City of Hartford, No. 3:00 CV 2386 WIG, 2005 WL 2234505, at *10 (D. Conn. Sept. 12, 2005) ("Although eight of the fourteen complaints of sexual misconduct by police officers occurred prior to December 1997, when Plaintiff was sexually assaulted, . . . all were investigated, with two of the eight resulting in the arrest of the officer. . . To the extent that Plaintiff disagrees with the level of discipline imposed or deficiencies in the citizen complaint process, that does not demonstrate deliberate indifference to serious acts of misconduct, rising to the level of unconstitutional acts. . . . Plaintiff Santiago has produced no evidence that a policymaker had notice of a potentially serious problem involving unconstitutional conduct, such that the need for additional supervision was obvious, and then made a conscious choice not to investigate or rectify the situation. . . . The Court finds that Plaintiff has failed to present any evidence that a policymaker consciously ignored the need for additional supervision or that the lack of supervision caused her injury. Given this lack of evidence to support her claim, the City is entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law on her failure to supervise theory of liability. . . ."); Sauceda v. Dailey, No. 97-2278-JWL, 1998 WL 422811, *12 (D. Kan. June 12, 1998) (not reported) ("Unlike the plaintiff in Beck, Mr. Sauceda has not presented evidence sufficient for a jury to conclude that the county has a custom of dismissing meritorious excessive force complaints. Mr. Sauceda has presented evidence that the county has no system for formally tracking complaints against individual officers, that it treats each complaint as an individual event with no consideration of prior complaints, and that it does not maintain statistics on excessive force complaints. What Mr. Sauceda is missing that the Beck plaintiff had, however, is evidence that the county's investigative system had failed in the past and that it effectively amounted to no investigative system at all. Wyandotte County has presented uncontroverted evidence that Sheriff Dailey has terminated at least one officer on his relatively small staff for employing excessive force, and that he has disciplined other officers for misconduct. While the sheriff's office does not formally track complaints against officers, internal affairs officers do keep informal track of such complaints. The picture painted by this evidence is much different from the picture painted by the evidence in Beck, where excessive force complainants had virtually no chance of having their claims sustained. Accordingly, there is no room here for a jury to conclude that the prior complaints against Lt. Melton or any other officer should have put the county on notice of a substantial risk that its officers would inflict constitutional harm.").

See also Franklin v. Messmer, No. 03-5184, 2004 WL 2203592, at *5, *6 (6th Cir. Sept. 14, 2004) (Cole, J., dissenting) (unpublished) ("Franklin points to statistics which demonstrated − as to Messmer specifically and the police force generally − that the introduction of pepper spray into the police officers' arsenal resulted in a significant increase in the total uses of force. In rejecting Franklin's reliance on these statistics, the district court concluded, and the City now argues, that '[t]he alleged increase in the uses of force ... reflects merely a change in the reporting of uses of force.' This assertion, though superficially appealing, misunderstands the statistics. It is true that with the Department's introduction of pepper spray came the requirement that all uses of pepper spray be reported. But the subsequent conclusion − that the statistics reflected only a change in reporting, not a change in actual use − would suffice only if the use of pepper spray had always been legal and the City simply added the requirement that the use of pepper spray be reported. Here, in contrast, there had never been pepper spray use unaccompanied by reporting. Any increase in the reported use of force, therefore, would have reflected an actual increase in the use of force. How big an increase? Following the introduction of pepper spray, overall use of force by the City's police officers increased by forty to fifty incidents per month. (And as I noted above, Messmer's statistics mirrored this trend.) Thus, the City's rationale − that the introduction of pepper spray allowed officers to restrain hostile individuals with less dangerous means − defies the evidence. Moreover, the use of other types of force decreased by only about six incidents per month following the introduction of pepper spray, belying the City's claim that the use of pepper spray would result in markedly fewer uses of more dangerous force. Of course, another inference from the large increase in the overall use of force following the introduction of pepper spray is that prior to the allowance of pepper spray, the officers were taking too many risks with their own safety. It may have been that there were hundreds of incidents each year in which a police officer used, say, wrist control or verbal commands when even greater force was necessary. And the City might have further supported that inference by introducing evidence about the number of excessive force complaints that had been filed since pepper spray was introduced. On summary judgment, however, we are required to give all inferences to the nonmoving party, Franklin. In any event, the City's failure to investigate the increased use of force by its officers was itself a dereliction of its responsibilities: it was confronted with data that revealed (at the very least) a potential problem and chose to assume that everything was just fine. A reasonable jury could have concluded, therefore, that the City's lack of response to the new data constituted a deliberate indifference to the protection of its citizens from the excessive use of pepper spray by its police officers."); Wallis

by and through Wallis v. Spencer, 202 F.3d 1126, 1143 (9th Cir. 2000) ("A reasonable jury could readily conclude . . . that the moving force behind the removal of the children from the parents' custody was the policy of accepting telephonic representations from CPS without any procedure for checking on the accuracy or validity of the supposed orders. . . . Similarly, a reasonable jury could conclude that the investigatory vaginal and anal examinations were performed on the children pursuant to a Police Department custom and practice of instigating body cavity examinations without first notifying the parents and without seeking prior court authorization whenever its officers place children in protective custody."); Vann v. City of New York, 72 F.3d 1040, 1049, 1051 (2d Cir. 1995) ("An obvious need [for more or better supervision] may be demonstrated through proof of repeated complaints of civil rights violations; deliberate indifference may be inferred if the complaints are followed by no meaningful attempt on the part of the municipality to investigate or to forestall further incidents. . . . [A] rational jury could find that where an officer had been identified by the police department as a 'violent prone' individual who had a personality disorder manifested by frequent quick-tempered demands for 'respect,' escalating into physical confrontations for which he always disavowed responsibility, the need to be alert for new civilian complaints filed after his reinstatement to full-duty status was obvious."); Lasher v. City of Schenectady, No. 02-CV-1395, 2004 WL 1732006, at *11 (N.D.N.Y. 2004) ("Plaintiff provides circumstantial evidence that ranking members of the City police department had notice of incidents of officer misconduct and consciously chose not to take any disciplinary action. Former Schenectady Police Department internal affairs officer Eric Yager stated in an affidavit that he informed Schenectady Police Department Chief Gregory Kaczmarek that some patrol division officers were entering into investigations without proper training, that the officers were not following proper procedures and policies, and that the officers were acting in an illegal manner towards citizens. Yager stated that Kaczmarek did not believe the information and refused to open an investigation. Furthermore, former Schenectady Police Department internal affairs officer Daniel Johnson stated that the chief requested that complaints regarding certain officers be referred to assistant chiefs, but not to Johnson, for investigation. Taking this evidence in the light most favorable Plaintiff, a fair minded trier of fact could reasonably conclude that the City had notice that its officers engaged in illegal activities with citizens, including the excessive use of force, but exhibited deliberate indifference by declining to properly investigate or impose disciplinary measures."); Hayward v. City of New Orleans, No. Civ.A. 02-3532, 2004 WL 258116, at *6, *7 (E.D. La. Feb. 12, 2004) ("In most cases, the deficient training of one officer in one aspect of law enforcement does not evidence deliberate indifference to civil rights. . . Nor does the failure to discipline officers in a single case trigger municipal liability. . . The present case involves a single officer with multiple abuse complaints. Recent cases have left unresolved the question of whether a city's failure to discipline a single officer in light of multiple official abuse complaints can evidence an official policy of deliberate indifference to civil rights. Although Monell liability has yet to be imposed under this factual scenario, prior precedent indicates that a policy maker's failure to discipline an officer conduct could result in municipal liability. The Fifth Circuit recently indicated that in certain circumstances a repeated pattern of lax discipline in light of official abuse complaints may evidence official deliberate indifference to civil rights. Piotrowski, 237 F.3d at 582. Moreover, proof of such a constitutionally inadequate official policy toward officer discipline might be supported by 'a purely formalistic investigation in which little evidence was taken, the file was bare, and the conclusions of the investigator was perfunctory.'. . . Hayward presents evidence of many previous abuse complaints against Philibert and suggests that the investigations of those complaints were formalistic and inadequate. . . Hayward alleges that city officials, such as Superintendent Pennington, were aware that the investigations were cursory and insufficient. She suggests that the prior investigations reveal a systematic inattention to official police complaints by city policy makers. The need to provide 'specific officers' with more or different training can be so obvious and the inadequacy of existing supervision 'so likely to result in a violation of constitutional rights that the city can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need for training.'. . . In the present case questions of fact exist on whether city policy makers had notice of the abuse complaints against Philibert, whether the city was deliberately indifferent to abuse complaints against Philibert, and − if the city was deliberately indifferent in its investigation of previous civil rights claims − whether the city's failure to train or discipline Philibert was the moving force behind Ms. Hayward's injuries. Accordingly, the Defendants are not entitled to summary judgment on the Plaintiff's Monell claim for the city's failure to train or failure to discipline Philibert.' [footnotes omitted]); Fultz v. Whittaker, 261 F. Supp.2d 767, 780, 781 (W.D. Ky. 2003) ("In part, Plaintiff relies on the absence of specific language regarding the use of neck restraints in the Oldham County Police Department's Policy Manual to establish 'deliberate indifference' by the municipality. Admittedly the policy is rather general. . . As a practical matter, however, it would impossible for a single manual to cover the advisability of every police maneuver an officer may elect to use in the field and the precise circumstances under which such maneuvers can be used. The manual itself instructs the police officers to avoid the use of unnecessary force. Given the fairly particularized training police officers receive at the police academy in the use of neck restraints and other specific defense tactics, Oldham County's force policy is reasonable and certainly does not exhibit a deliberate indifference to the rights of Oldham County's citizenry. Had Plaintiff presented specific evidence that the municipality received complaints from its citizens about the use of neck restraints then Plaintiff would certainly have a much stronger argument that the municipality should have taken action or given its officers some clear instruction on the use of this specific defense tactic. The policy standing alone, however, is simply insufficient to establish that Oldham County disregarded a known risk that its officers would ignore their training at the police academy and improperly utilize neck restraints while in action on the field."); Kurilla v. Callahan, 68 F. Supp.2d 556, 568, 569 (M.D. Pa. 1999) ("In this case, there were three (3) incidents involving Callahan in less than one year. There is no evidence of any independent investigation by the School District of any of these incidents. No disciplinary action was taken against Callahan. Even following Callahan's convictions of the summary offense of harassment in connection with his physical abuse of students, no disciplinary action was taken against Callahan. While Callahan's assault on Kurilla was preceded by only one incident, the failure to take any disciplinary action against Callahan following the three incidents in the span of less than one year is probative of the question of whether the School District had a policy or custom to tolerate or be deliberately indifferent to excessive use of force by teachers."); Johnson v. CHA Security Officers, No. 97 C 3746, 1998 WL 474138, *5 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 6, 1998) (not reported) ("Contrary to CHA's position, plaintiff's complaint contains more than bare allegations. She alleges a pattern of sexual misconduct by CHA officers that persisted for a year prior to the incident in question, without a meaningful investigative or disciplinary response by CHA. She also alleges that she was injured as a result of CHA's failure to investigate, causing Pate and Grady to believe that they could get away with their actions. This is therefore not a case where the plaintiff has pled facts that relate only to the specific incident in question and therefore should be dismissed. . . Instead, plaintiff alleges a pattern of misconduct which the CHA failed to investigate. We think that these allegations are sufficient to state a claim that CHA was deliberately indifferent to the citizens with whom its officers came in contact."); Burnell v. Williams, 997 F. Supp. 886, 893 (N.D. Ohio 1998) ("Plaintiff Burnell does not claim that the individuals or the School Board had a custom of affirmatively condoning sexual abuse. Clearly, none exists. Instead, Burnell claims that defendants failed to act to prevent the sexual abuse. To state a claim under an 'inaction' theory, Burnell must establish: (1) the existence of a clear and persistent pattern of sexual abuse by school employees; (2) notice or constructive notice of the School Board; (3) the School Board's tacit approval of the unconstitutional conduct, such that a court can say that their deliberate indifference amounted to an official policy of inaction; and (4) that the School Board's custom was the 'moving force' or direct causal link in the constitutional deprivation." citing Clairborne.); Cox v. District of Columbia, 821 F. Supp. 1, 13 (D.D.C. 1993) ("[T]he District of Columbia's maintenance of a patently inadequate system of investigation of excessive force complaints constitutes a custom or practice of deliberate indifference to the rights of persons who come in contact with District police officers."); Czajkowski v. City of Chicago, 810 F. Supp. 1428, 1440 (N.D. Ill. 1992) ("It was . . . known in the Department that there was a serious problem of domestic violence against wives of police officers. Plaintiffs present sufficient evidence from which a jury could find that police officers would have understood that excessive force and domestic violence would not necessarily be punished. Plaintiffs also present sufficient evidence from which it could be found that a code of silence existed within the Department. . . . it could also be found that there was deliberate indifference to the fact that failure to discipline officers for such conduct did or could result in additional such incidents. There is a sufficient basis for a jury to find that the City was deliberately indifferent or that it tacitly authorized or condoned the conduct that was occurring."); Scott v. Lewis, 1991 WL 71810, *2 (N.D. Ill. April 26, 1991) (not reported) ("[T]he facts are sufficient to allege that the CHA [Chicago Housing Authority] knew of multiple incidents of unconstitutional conduct by privately hired security guards, and failed to adequately supervise or train the guards, or investigate shootings by them."); Doe v. Calumet City, 754 F. Supp. 1211, 1225 (N.D. Ill. 1990) (unconstitutional strip searches were "part of a consistent pattern of behavior that simply would not have occurred in the department-wide manner that it did if the training had been adequate . . . .").

But see Reynolds v. Giuliani, 506 F.3d 183, 194-97 (2d Cir. 2007) ("Although plaintiffs decline to state the argument so bluntly, and speak instead in terms of 'ultimate responsibility,' we understand their position to be that the statutes themselves render the states vicariously liable to plaintiffs. We see no support in the language of the Acts or our case law for the proposition that § 1983 claims arising under the Food Stamp or Medicaid Acts are exempt from the standards governing all other § 1983 claims. . . . Plaintiffs contend state defendants were deliberately indifferent under the test set out in Walker because they had knowledge of an obvious need for supervision and the risk of harm to plaintiffs. . . .State defendants did not sit on their hands in the face of an obvious need to act. . . They did not, as did the municipal defendant in Amnesty, stand idly by, let alone encourage, the City's non-compliance. . . In short, there is little evidence showing the state to be deliberately indifferent. Nonetheless, we do not hold that any action taken by a local government insulates it from supervisory liability. If a supervisor's steps are proven so meaningless or blatantly inadequate to the task that he may be said to be deliberately indifferent notwithstanding his nominal supervisory efforts, liability will lie. . . Here, however, there is no evidence to suggest that the state's phased efforts were meaningless or obviously inadequate, except the fact of the City's continued failure to comply with certain provisions of law. Contrary to the district court's and plaintiffs' suggestion, the extent of state defendants' ultimate success in averting injury cannot be the legal measure of its efforts to do so, as such a standard is tantamount to vicarious liability. . . .Our view that state defendants' efforts to foster compliance preclude a finding of deliberate indifference finds support in our cases and those of our sister circuits addressing claims against supervisors who tried, but failed, to prevent injury to plaintiffs. [citing cases] The rationale underlying these cases is clear. A local government's liability under § 1983 must be based on its policy or custom under Monell. Where, as here, that policy incorporates the defendants' deliberate efforts to protect plaintiffs' rights, it cannot, at the same time, be deemed deliberately indifferent to those rights. . . A natural presumption arises in such cases that any supervisory inadequacies are the result of negligence rather than deliberate choice."); Olsen v. Layton Hills Mall, 312 F.3d 1304, 1328, 1329 (10th Cir. 2002) (Hartz, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I assume that 'constructive notice' of a fact can arise when the fact is widely known by those in the particular field of endeavor. . . In Allen itself the plaintiff had properly relied on an expert who testified that the municipality's procedures were 'out of synch with the rest of the police profession.' . . . If this is a proper interpretation of 'constructive notice,' then Davis County could have constructive notice of an OCD problem (so that the problem is 'obvious") based on information from outside the experience of its own jail. The record before us, however, contains no evidence of 'best practices' in other prisons with respect to treating persons with OCD, nor does it refer to literature on the subject directed to prison administrators or other law enforcement personnel. All the record contains is medical literature. But a matter cannot be considered 'obvious' to jail administrators simply because it is well known to medical professionals or families of those affected by a particular disorder. Prison officials do not have constructive notice of what appears in medical literature. Because Olsen relies only on medical literature, and provides no evidence regarding what was known by Davis County jail administrators or by jail administrators in general, or even what happens in jails in general, he has not established the obviousness required for liability of Davis County."); Hernandez v. Borough of Palisades Park Police Dep't., No. 02-2210, 2003 WL 202441, at * (3d Cir. Jan. 29, 2003) (unpublished) ("Appellant first argues that the existence of a widespread pattern of prior robberies was enough for a reasonable fact-finder to conclude that the policymaker should have known about the constitutional violations. A reasonable fact-finder may conclude that a Police Chief has constructive knowledge of constitutional violations where they are repeatedly reported in writing to the Police Department. [citing Beck] In addition, 'constructive knowledge may be evidenced by the fact that the practices have been so widespread or flagrant that in the proper exercise of [their] official responsibilities the [municipal policymakers] should have known of them.' [citing Bordanaro]. Unlike Beck, where written complaints clearly alleged that a police officer was acting unconstitutionally, or Bordanaro, where officers made no attempt to hide the fact that they would regularly break doors down without warrants, the mere existence of past robberies in the Borough is insufficient to establish that the Police Chief had constructive knowledge that the robberies were being committed by police officers."); Christie v. Iopa, 176 F.3d 1231, 1235 (9th Cir. 1999) ("Plaintiffs cannot satisfy the requirement of a longstanding practice or custom, because they allege to the contrary that a county official has singled them out for unique treatment. A single constitutional deprivation ordinarily is insufficient to establish a longstanding practice or custom."); Snyder v. Trepagnier, 142 F.3d 791, 799 (5th Cir. 1998) ("Even if we accept that this evidence proves Trepagnier was dangerously stressed, there was no probative evidence concerning the stress level in the NOPD as a whole. There was no evidence of a pattern or practice of constitutional violations committed by overstressed New Orleans police officers. There was no evidence showing that the city was aware of the supposedly high stress levels in the NOPD or knew that the absence of a stress management program was likely to endanger the constitutional rights of its citizens. In short, the totality of the evidence does not even approach the City of Canton standard: that the inadequacy be 'so obvious' and 'so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights,' 489 U.S. at 390, that the city can be said to have been deliberately indifferent."), cert. dism'd, 119 S. Ct. 1493 (1999); Andrews v. Fowler, 98 F.3d 1069, 1076 (8th Cir. 1996) (where there was "no evidence that the city ever had received, or had been deliberately indifferent to, complaints of violence or sexual assault on the part of an officer prior to the time [Defendant] raped [Plaintiff,] . . . we conclude that the district court did not err by granting summary judgment to the city on Andrews' failure to investigate . . . claim."); Sargi v. Kent City Board of Education, 70 F.3d 907, 912 (6th Cir. 1995) ("Without notice that students suffering from seizures on school buses were harmed by school bus drivers' lack of 'seizure management training,' the Board's failure to conduct such a training program cannot rise to the level of deliberate indifference."); Donovan v. City of Milwaukee, 17 F.3d 944, 956 (7th Cir. 1994) ("The record is devoid of evidence that the failure to supplement its high speed chase policy with an exhortation to consider the safety of fleeing drivers and their passengers has led to frequent constitutional violations. Even if this case were such an instance, we could not find the City deliberately indifferent. There must be a 'pattern of violations' sufficient to put the City on notice of potential harm to the fleeing drivers."); Wilson v. City of Chicago, 6 F.3d 1233, 1240 (7th Cir. 1993) ("A rational jury could have inferred from the frequency of the abuse, the number officers involved in the torture of [plaintiff], and the number of complaints from the black community, that [the Superintendent of Police] knew that officers in Area 2 were prone to beat up suspected cop killers. Even so, if he took steps to eliminate the practice, the fact that the steps were not effective would not establish that he had acquiesced in it and by doing so adopted it as a policy of the city . . . . Deliberate or reckless indifference to complaints must be proved in order to establish that an abusive practice has actually been condoned and therefore can be said to have been adopted by those responsible for making municipal policy."); Woods v. City of Wellston, No. 2:02 CV 762, 2005 WL 1406105, at 12-14 (S.D. Ohio June 15, 2005) (not reported) ("As the Court understands Plaintiff's claim, Plaintiff alleges that: (1) the City failed to adequately investigate his own complaint of excessive use of force and failed to discipline the arresting officers; and (2) the City had a policy of ignoring citizen complaints involving an excessive use of force, and of failing to discipline officers who engaged in an excessive use of force. Plaintiff first contends that the City failed to conduct an adequate investigation into his complaint of excessive force. . . . Even if Defendants failed to conduct a meaningful investigation into Plaintiff's complaint, this is not enough, standing alone, to establish municipal liability. Once an individual's rights have been violated, a subsequent failure to conduct a meaningful investigation cannot logically be the 'moving force' behind the alleged constitutional deprivation. . .Therefore, to the extent that Plaintiff's claim against the City is based on the City's alleged failure to investigate his own complaint of excessive use of force, the City is entitled to summary judgment. Plaintiff also claims that the City had a policy or custom of ignoring citizen complaints involving an excessive use of force, and of failing to discipline officers who engaged in an excessive use of force. . . . In this case, there is simply no evidence that previous complaints of excessive use of force were ignored by the City of Wellston, or that officers that should have been disciplined were not. Absent any evidence of previous widespread abuse, Plaintiff cannot establish deliberate indifference or the requisite causal connection."); Reed v. City of Lavonia, 390 F.Supp.2d 1347, 1367, 1368 (M.D. Ga. 2005) ("In this case, Plaintiffs fail to point to any specific evidence to suggest that the City was somehow on notice that additional baton training for Officer Masionet was needed. There is no evidence of previous complaints about baton abuse or other claims that Masionet was excessively abusive to arrestees while working for the City of Lavonia. Plaintiffs only vaguely allege that Masionet's previous employment history placed Chief Shirley on notice that Masionet was more inclined to use excessive force during an arrest. The Eleventh Circuit has held, however, that a city is not deemed to have notice of past police misconduct if the plaintiff 'never demonstrated that past complaints of police misconduct had any merit.'. . The panel even added that 'the number of complaints bears no relation to their validity.'. . Here, Plaintiffs apparently rely on the fact that Officer Masionet was accused of using excessive force prior to his employment with the City of Lavonia. Even so, the undisputed record establishes that neither of these excessive force complaints were found to have any merit at the time they were investigated, and no disciplinary action was taken against Masionet as a result of these allegations. Moreover, neither of these previous complaints involved the use of an ASP baton. Such allegations may not serve as notice to the City of a need to re-train Officer Masionet in ASP baton use. This Court thus finds that Plaintiffs have further failed to provide any evidence suggesting that Chief Shirley had knowledge that baton training was needed but deliberately chose not to provide it. The City is accordingly entitled to summary judgment on Reed's failure to train claim."); Beal v. Blache, No. Civ.A.02-CV-12447-RG, 2005 WL 352861, at *7, *8 (D. Mass. Feb. 14, 2005) (not reported) ("There are distinctions between this case and McCabe. In McCabe, the allegations involved repeated instances of misconduct. Blache was accused in a single, albeit very serious, incident. The investigation in McCabe had confirmed the allegations against the Trooper. The investigation into S.T.'s allegations against Blache had come to no firm conclusions. The Trooper in McCabe was suspended without pay for six months. Blache was suspended without pay for a year. While both the Trooper and Blache were required to submit to a psychological examination, the Trooper was virtually guaranteed reinstatement. Blache was not. His reinstatement was conditioned on his not committing 'any criminal act or acts which in the opinion of the Chief would be unbecoming conduct.' While MacDougall might be faulted for not investigating S.T.'s claims further on his own, rather than relying on the State Police investigation, or for having mistakenly believed that the punishment and conditions that he imposed were sufficient to insure the protection of the public, such fault as there was cannot reasonably be seen to constitute deliberate indifference. . . . As much as one might lament the failure of Chief MacDougall to fully apprehend Blache's potential dangerousness, or his failure to discipline Blache more severely, these failures simply do not rise to the level of a conscience shocking and callous disregard for the rights of others, as a finding of deliberate indifference would require."); Ferguson v. Leiter, 220 F. Supp.2d 875, 885 (N.D. Ohio 2002)("Plaintiffs do not dispute or refute Leitter's testimony regarding his training as to various restraint techniques, including neckholds, yet Plaintiffs provide no evidence suggesting that Leitter or any other officer's training was so deficient as to constitute deliberate indifference on the part of the city. Nor do Plaintiffs provide any evidence that as of 1998, the city was on notice that the Fostoria officers' training at that time was constitutionally deficient. There is no evidence in the record of any incidents prior to 1998 regarding neckholds, and thus it cannot be said that as of 1998, Fostoria knew or should have known of a problem regarding its officers' training yet failed to implement corrective measures."); Owens v. City of Fort Lauderdale, 174 F. Supp.2d 1282, 1297 (S.D. Fla. 2001) ("[T]he failure of the City to provide specific training on neck restraints is not unconstitutional such that the single incident with Byron can be said to have been the result of a municipal policy . . . . Given that the plaintiffs have presented only two similar previous incidents, and given that both incidents were unsubstantiated, the plaintiffs have failed to present the kind of pattern or series of violations which would place the City on notice that its training program was inadequate."); Tofano v. Reidel, 61 F. Supp.2d 289, 306 (D.N.J. 1999) ("Plaintiff has presented absolutely nothing which would establish that Ramsey was deliberately indifferent to the rights of its citizens by failing to properly train its officers to deal with mentally unstable individuals. The record is devoid of any evidence of interactions in the past between Ramsey police officers and mentally unstable individuals which would have placed the municipality on notice that its training was inadequate. . . In addition, nothing in the record establishes that it would have been known or 'obvious' to a reasonable policymaker that the training provided to Ramsey police officers concerning interaction with mentally unstable individuals would likely result in the deprivation of constitutional rights."); Guseman v. Martinez, 1 F. Supp.2d 1240, 1260 (D. Kan. 1998) ("There is no evidence here of any similar prior incident in which an individual in custody of Wichita police officers suddenly suffered serious injury or death as a result of positional asphyxia. Thus, the City cannot be said to have been on notice of an inadequate training program by virtue of a history of constitutional violations by its officers."); Triest v. Gilbert, No. Civ. A. 95-1984, 1997 WL 255668, *14 (E.D.Pa. May 8, 1997) (not reported) ("An obvious need for additional or different training is not established by one accident, however horrifying it may be. Plaintiff has adduced no evidence of prior incidents or citizen complaints which might have put the municipal defendants on notice that officers improperly use their police vehicles when responding to emergency situations in general, when responding to domestic disputes in particular, or otherwise."); Hanrahan v. City of Norwich, 959 F. Supp. 118, 124-25

(D. Conn. 1997) ("Plaintiff might be able to establish liability on the part of the City based on police suicides elsewhere if the experience in other jurisdictions made it obvious that more training was needed in Norwich. . . However, the affidavits of plaintiff's proposed experts fall far short of providing a sufficient evidentiary basis for that theory of liability. Plaintiff has presented no proof concerning the number of police suicides in other jurisdictions, the circumstances in which the suicides occurred or the policies and procedures of other police departments for preventing police suicide. On this record, no reasonable juror could find that the City failed to train its police officers in suicide prevention, despite an obvious need for more training, because of deliberate indifference to the need."); Ringuette v. City of Fall River, 888 F. Supp. 258, 271 (D. Mass. 1995) (finding no obvious need for higher level training in signs of drug overdoses); Mendoza v. City of Rome, 872 F. Supp. 1110, 1118 (N.D.N.Y. 1995) ("[T]he mere fact that [Notices of Claims] had been filed against the City of Rome, standing alone, does not establish a pattern, policy, or practice which was causally related to the false arrest and use of excessive force upon the plaintiff."); Jones v. Chieffo, 833 F. Supp. 498, 510 (E.D. Pa. 1993) ("[P]laintiffs have shown no evidence that policymakers in the City or Department knew of or acquiesced in a custom of using police vehicles without sirens in pursuits."), aff'd, 22 F.3d 301 (3d Cir. 1994).

c. jail suicide cases

In a number of jail suicide cases, plaintiffs have relied on City of Canton in an attempt to impose liability upon the governmental entity for a failure to train officers in the detection and prevention of potential suicides or for acquiescence in a policy or custom which is deliberately indifferent to the medical needs of potentially suicidal detainees or inmates.

See e.g., Wever v. Lincoln County, Nebraska, 388 F.3d 601, 607 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Wever's complaint alleges that Carmen was aware of two prior suicides in the Lincoln County jail, one occurring in 1999 while he was sheriff, and one occurring in 1996, prior to his tenure. [footnote omitted] Carmen argues that as a matter of law, one or two suicides are insufficient to put a sheriff on notice that his training and supervision is constitutionally inadequate. Under his proposed rule, a sheriff may sit idly by until at least a third inmate known to be suicidal takes a blanket from an officer and hangs himself, only then ordering his officers not to place a suicidal person in an isolation cell and hand him a blanket. We decline to so hold. We have previously stated that, in most circumstances, a single incident does not provide a supervisor with notice of deficient training or supervision . . . . However, as indicated, this calculus is not rigid, and must change depending on the seriousness of the incident and its likelihood of discovery. In Howard, the alleged constitutional violation was caused by an unsanitary cell. Id. at 136. A supervisor is not expected to be put on notice of constitutionally deficient sanitation training by a single instance of a dirty cell. But we cannot equate death with dirty cells. Our case law reflects this flexible calculus. In Andrews, the plaintiff sued a police chief for failing to supervise an officer who ultimately raped two women. . . We held that the chief's knowledge of two prior complaints against the officer for making inappropriate sexual advances to women during traffic stops was sufficient to create an issue of material fact as to notice, rendering summary judgment improper. . . In some circumstances, one or two suicides may be sufficient to put a sheriff on notice that his suicide prevention training needs revision. In the present case, Wever has alleged that Carmen was placed on notice by two previous suicides, and we cannot say this is insufficient as a matter of law."); Woodward v. Correctional Medical Services of Illinois, Inc., 368 F.3d 917, 927, 928 (7th Cir. 2004) ("[W]e find that there was enough evidence for the jury to conclude that CMS's actual practice (as opposed to its written policy) towards the treatment of its mentally ill inmates was so inadequate that CMS was on notice at the time Farver was incarcerated that there was a substantial risk that he would be deprived of necessary care in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. . . . [A] reasonable jury could find that CMS's custom of repeatedly failing to follow proper procedures led to Farver's successful suicide attempt. . . . The reality is that CMS's actual policy and practice caused its employees to be deliberately indifferent to Farver's serious health needs. . . . Finally, we cannot leave unaddressed CMS's claim that 'the plaintiff's failure to introduce evidence of any suicide at the Lake County jail besides Farver's dooms plaintiff's efforts to prove a custom or practice.' CMS does not get a 'one free suicide' pass. The Supreme Court has expressly acknowledged that evidence of a single violation of federal rights can trigger municipal liability if the violation was a 'highly predictable consequence' of the municipality's failure to act. . . Here, there was a direct link between CMS's policies and Farver's suicide. That no one in the past committed suicide simply shows that CMS was fortunate, not that it wasn't deliberately indifferent. Moreover, we note that CMS's liability is based on much more than a single instance of flawed conduct, such as one poorly trained nurse. It was based on repeated failures to ensure Farver's safety − by Dean, by Mollner, and by Dr. Fernando − as well as a culture that permitted and condoned violations of policies that were designed to protect inmates like Farver."); Cabrales v. County of Los Angeles, 864 F.2d 1454, 1461 (9th Cir. 1988) (in detainee suicide case, plaintiff prevailed against County on ground that County's policy of understaffing its jail with psychiatrists was itself an unconstitutional policy or custom of deliberate indifference to inmates' medical and psychological needs), vacated, 490 U.S. 1087 (1989) (remanded for consideration in light of City of Canton v. Harris, 109 S. Ct. 1197 (1989)), 886 F.2d 235 (9th Cir. 1989) (reinstating prior decision) (City of Canton does not alter previous opinion which was based on finding of unconstitutional policy), cert. denied, 494 U.S. 1091 (1990); Holscher v. Mille Lacs County, Civil No. 11–1458 (MJD/LIB), 2013 WL 588717, *12 (D. Minn. Feb. 11, 2013) ("Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, despite having a valid Policy, the Jail experienced multiple suicide attempts and two successful suicides by persons with suicide red flags who were not referred for further evaluation based solely on their own failure to self-report. Additionally, Heacock testified that, despite undergoing the Jail's required training, he would only refer inmates for further evaluation if they self-reported suicidal thoughts. From these facts, a jury could infer that the County's training was inadequate; the County was deliberately indifferent in failing to revise its training; and this inadequate training caused Plaintiffs' injury."); Mombourquette v. Amundson, 469 F.Supp.2d 624, 651-53 (W.D. Wis. 2007) ("I have little difficulty in concluding that a reasonable jury could find that there is an 'affirmative link' between Amundson's failings and the failure to prevent plaintiff from attempting to commit suicide. At least two related problems with the general operation of the jail contributed to defendants' failure to stop plaintiff's attempted suicide: (1) the lack of a clear delineation of authority with respect to assessing risks of suicide;

and (2) inadequate means of staff communication. . . . The likely reason that each party denies responsibility is that the jail's policy does not squarely place responsibility on anyone. Again, all jail staff are equally responsible under the policy, which not surprisingly means that all staff attempt to fix the blame on someone else. Closely related, effective communication was also sorely lacking at the jail. . . . If the jury believes plaintiff's assessment of the jail under defendant Amundson's tenure, with staff essentially running amok without any supervision from Amundson, it could find reasonably that he was deliberately indifferent to a risk that an inmate like plaintiff would seriously harm herself."); Wilson v. Genessee County, No. 00-CV73637, 2002 WL 745975, at *11, *14 (E.D.Mich. March 26, 2002) (not reported) ("[A] reasonable juror could find that the City of Flint's policy of verbally communicating an individual's suicide risk is inadequate and/or that the City of Flint does not adequately train its police officers regarding its policy, that this failure was the result of the City of Flint's deliberate indifference to Wilson's right to be reasonably protected against taking his own life, and that the inadequacies were closely related to Wilson's eventual suicide. . . . In essence, this case is about a failure to communicate and/or to have policies in place for adequately accessing and communicating an individual's suicide risk at all levels, and especially when transporting an individual from one facility to another. The evidence of record is sufficient to have this issue submitted to a jury to determine whether the individual defendant's actions, and the City of Flint and Genesee County's policies and training amounted to deliberate indifference to Wilson's serious medical need to be adequately screened for suicidal tendencies and to be protected against taking his own life.").

In Dorman v. District of Columbia, 888 F.2d 159 (D.C. Cir. 1989), the court of appeals reversed the district court's judgment for the plaintiff in a detainee suicide case, and remanded with instructions to enter judgment for the defendant District in accordance with defendant's motion for a judgment n.o.v. Id. at 160. The court found the evidence insufficient under City of Canton to establish § 1983 liability on the part of the District.

The court rejected plaintiff's attempt to establish municipal liability by pointing to an obvious need for training, concluding that "the need for specific training in suicide prevention beyond what the officers received ...[was] not 'so obvious' that the city's policy may be characterized as 'deliberately indifferent.'" Id. at 164. In addition, the court could find no evidence of a pattern of constitutional violations acquiesced in by municipal policymakers. Id. at 165.

See also A.H. v. St. Louis County, Missouri, 891 F.3d 721, 728-29 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Here, Plaintiffs must show that the Policy itself reflects deliberate indifference of the County and Bernsen to the risk of inmate or detainee suicide that was the 'moving force' behind the violation of Hartwig's rights. . . At the time of Hartwig's suicide, the Policy required incoming inmates to be screened for suicidal ideations, plans, and behavior. It classified inmates into different risk tiers and mandated successively more stringent precautions for each tier. Inmates on precautionary status were required to be housed with a cellmate, were to have their status evaluated at least every three weeks by a member of the mental health team, and were to be moved to the jail infirmary if required to be transferred out of regular housing for disciplinary reasons. The Policy detailed extensive procedures for handling potentially suicidal detainees and mandated annual employee training. In response to two prior suicides, the Jail removed shelves and modified vents in the segregation area and infirmary that the inmates had used as anchors. Pointing to the two previous suicides in the segregation area and twenty-two attempted suicides between May 2008 and February 2013, Plaintiffs argue St. Louis County was deliberately indifferent because the Policy allowed inmates on precautionary status to be alone in their cells, permitted them to have bed sheets, and did not require them to be monitored more than the inmate population at large when in general housing. Prior cases foreclose this line of attack. A municipal policy 'cannot be both an effort to prevent suicides and, at the same time, deliberately indifferent to suicides.'. . As the district court noted, attempted suicides are not evidence of deliberate indifference. If anything, they show the Policy was effective in avoiding the unfortunate reality of inmate or detainee suicide. For these reasons, we conclude the district court properly granted all defendants summary judgment dismissing Plaintiffs' § 1983 claims."); Whitt v. Stephens County, 529 F.3d 278, 284 (5th Cir. 2008) ("In the absence of 'manifest signs' of suicidal tendencies, a city may not be held liable for a detainee's suicide in a § 1983 suit based on a failure to train."); Evans v. City of Marlin, 986 F.2d 104, 108 (5th Cir. 1993) (City's failure to train police personnel to detect potential suicidal impulses did not give rise to deprivation of constitutional rights of prisoner who committed suicide in city jail cell, absent any manifest signs that prisoner was danger to herself.); Rhyne v. Henderson County, 973 F.2d 386, 393 (5th Cir. 1992) (evidence was insufficient to support finding that county acted with deliberate indifference in adopting policies regarding care of pretrial detainees known to be suicidal); Colburn v. Upper Darby Township, 946 F.2d 1017, 1030 (3d Cir. 1991) (Colburn* II) ("In a prison suicide case . . . . plaintiff must (1) identify specific training not provided that could reasonably be expected to prevent the suicide that occurred, and (2) must demonstrate that the risk reduction associated with the proposed training is so great and so obvious that the failure of those responsible for the content of the training program to provide it can reasonably be attributed to a deliberate indifference to whether the detainees succeed in taking their lives."); Buffington v. Baltimore County, Maryland, 913 F.2d 113, 123 (4th Cir. 1990) (evidence was insufficient under Canton to permit jury to find policy of failure to train officers in suicide prevention actually and proximately caused particular harm), cert. denied, 111 S. Ct. 1106 (1991); Camps v. City of Warner Robins, 822 F. Supp. 724, 737, 738 (M.D. Ga. 1993) ("[P]laintiffs have not shown that any alleged need for further training in suicide prevention was plainly obvious to County policymakers. There is no evidence that the training program in place in 1989 resulted in any suicides prior to the incident involving the decedent. Thus, there is no pattern of similar incidents upon which to base a claim for failure to train."); Smith v. City of Joliet, 1993 WL 18981, *7, *8 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 28, 1993) (not reported) (Even where training was "non-existent or at least inadequate," court concluded "the need for more or different training was not so obvious and the inadequacy of current training not so likely to result in a violation of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the City of Joliet can be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need to train police officers in recognizing the signs and symptoms of potential suicide victims among its detainees.).

But see Grabow v. Cnty. of Macomb*,* 580 F. App'x 300, 313-14 (6th Cir. 2014) (Donald, J., concurring) ("I agree with the panel's analysis and outcome. I write separately to note the troubling statistics surrounding suicides in the Macomb County Jail. The Macomb County Jail has a capacity of 1,238 inmates and processes about 19,000 inmates annually. . . In the year surrounding Prochnow's August 2011 suicide, five Macomb County Jail inmates (including Prochnow) committed suicide. Only six percent of U.S. jails reported two or more deaths by any cause in 2011; eighty-one percent of jails reported no deaths. . . In Michigan, only sixteen percent of jails reported one or more inmate deaths by any cause. . . Macomb County Jail's five suicides alone accounted for nearly twenty percent of Michigan's twenty-four total reported jail inmate deaths by any cause in 2011, . . . despite the fact that the Jail processed only about eight percent of the state's total annual jail inmates and held only seven percent of the state's jail inmates at any one time . . . . This case is not the first time that this Court has taken notice of Macomb County Jail's high suicide rate. In Crocker v. County of Macomb, this Court noted that Crocker's June 2001 suicide was also the fifth suicide at the Jail in less than one year. . . Macomb County Jail's disturbing suicide rate is a microcosm of the larger jail-suicide problem, which accounted for thirty-five percent of all jail deaths in the U.S. in 2011. . . Our decision cites no less than nine prisoner-suicide cases, most of which originate in Michigan. [collecting cases] Our decision could have cited two more cases, both of which occurred prior to Prochnow's suicide, where Macomb County itself was before this Court or district courts in this Circuit as a defendant in an inmate-suicide action. . . . Most of these cases, like the one before us, deal with the suicide of inmates who had a known history of mental illness and suicidal tendencies. And in those cases, like this one, this Court reached the conclusion, first put forward in Danese v. Asman, 875 F.2d 1239 (6th Cir.1989), that there is no recognized constitutional right to be properly screened for suicide risk. Thus, no official or municipality can be held liable under § 1983 for inmate suicides where there has been improper screening or no screening. . . And yet the suicides keep happening. How many times should this question come before this Court before the need for adequate suicide precautions for mentally-ill inmates becomes 'clearly established law' for which officials can be held accountable? . . How many times should Macomb County come before this Court before 'the need for better training [becomes] so obvious' that it should be held liable? . . While current law offers no refuge for Grabow, the time may come for this Court to rethink what constitutional protections are available to mentally ill, potentially suicidal inmates and what sort of liability may be imposed on defendants like Macomb County, where these suicides continue to occur at an alarming rate.").

A common problem for plaintiffs attempting to impose § 1983 liability on a government entity in jail suicide cases is making out the underlying constitutional deprivation that is necessary before a remedy will be available against any defendant under § 1983. Compare Jump v. Village of Shorewood, 42 F.4th 782, 794 (7th Cir. 2022) ("[W]e have no facts that Marciniak told Sgt. Smith or Officer Taraboi he was suicidal. In fact, Sgt. Smith testified Marciniak had affirmatively told both the opposite. . .The dissent concludes that a jury could find Sgt. Smith lied on that count, but it's undisputed the intake form indicated Marciniak affirmatively said the opposite. And Marciniak's general distress and history of psychiatric treatment would give a reasonable officer notice of general distress and a history of psychiatric treatment, not risk of suicide. . . Nor was the

45 minutes between checks unreasonable. Adding in extra checks would be a special precaution—that's why Shorewood policy was to check every 15 minutes for suicide risks. But Marciniak never gave Sgt. Smith reason to think Marciniak might attempt suicide, so no extra steps were required. . . Nor do the facts bear out that the officers consciously treated Marciniak as a suicide risk. Both Officer Taraboi and Sgt. Smith testified Marciniak told them he was not suicidal, and Smith marked down that Marciniak was not contemplating suicide at that time. It is true that Sgt. Smith's failure to fill in the required suicide watch section introduces some ambiguity into this case. But drawing positive inferences in Jump's favor does not require us to conclude that the officers put Marciniak on suicide watch. All we know is that they failed to follow protocol and that—according to the same form—Marciniak had told them he was not contemplating suicide. This is simply not enough to create a reasonable inference that they did in fact treat Marciniak as a suicide risk. And Sgt. Smith's repeated welfare checks weren't suicide watch checks. It's undisputed Sgt. Smith was trying to calm Marciniak down so he could get his paperwork done. What matters is whether Smith's actions were objectively unreasonable. Pulera demands they weren't, and a rational jury couldn't conclude otherwise.") with Jump v. Village of Shorewood, 42 F.4th 782, 794-99 (7th Cir. 2022) (Ripple, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I join Parts I and II of the majority opinion. However, because I disagree with the majority opinion's affirmance of summary judgment on Mr. Jump's failure-to-protect claim, I respectfully dissent as to Part III of the majority opinion. In my view, Mr. Jump has the right have a jury evaluate his failure-to-protect claim. . . .In conformity with the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley v. Hendrickson, . . . we have long held that 'the Fourth Amendment governs the period of confinement between arrest without a warrant and the [probable cause determination].'. . And we have 'since applied the Fourth Amendment's "objectively unreasonable" standard to both "conditions of confinement" and "medical care" claims brought by arrestees who have not yet had their Gerstein hearing.'. . .This case should not be taken away from the jury. Mr. Jump has put forth sufficient evidence from which a reasonable jury could conclude that Sergeant Smith acted in an objectively unreasonable manner when he failed to protect Mr. Marciniak from suicide. . . . Here, one single officer had knowledge that the arrestee had prior psychiatric treatment; that the arrestee was upset, confused, and intoxicated; that the arrestee believed his intimate partner could be severely injured or dead; and that the arrestee began to self-harm by slamming his body against the cell walls. Armed with this knowledge, Sergeant Smith questioned Mr. Marciniak, bringing up his difficult relationship with his son, Mr. Jump. He then failed to check on Mr. Marciniak for forty-six minutes, and when he finally did check on Mr. Marciniak, he found him hanging in his cell. He then falsified the booking sheet. A jury could find this conduct objectively unreasonable. In sum, construing the facts in the light most favorable to Mr. Jump (as we must given the summary judgment posture of the case), a reasonable jury could determine that Sergeant Smith acted unreasonably when he failed to check on Mr. Marciniak. We should not deprive him of his right to present this claim to a jury. For these reasons, I respectfully dissent as to Part III.")

See also Smith-Dandridge v. Geanolous, 97 F.4th 569, 578 (8th Cir. 2024) (" '[W]e expect that jailers will learn from their failures in preventing suicide,'. . . and we are confident the WCDC defendants will do so here. However, 'they are not constitutionally liable for every failure, only those where they are deliberately indifferent to the risk of suicide.'. . On this record, the jailer defendants' inaction to prevent Bell's suicide does not constitute criminal recklessness. The failure to place Bell on suicide watch, or take other suicide-prevention measures, may have been negligent. There were indications that Bell's mental health was unstable, and he showed signs of agitation and anxiety. But there is not enough on the record before us to show the jailer defendants violated Bell's constitutional rights."); Edmiston v. Borrego, 75 F.4th 551, 559-60 (5th Cir. 2023) ("Pursuant to our above-discussed discretion to begin our two-prong qualified-immunity analysis with either prong, we elect to begin with the first. For the reasons that follow, plaintiffs fail to plausibly allege a violation of a statutory or constitutional right. Therefore, we do not reach the second prong (whether clearly-established). To overcome appellants' motions to dismiss based on qualified immunity, plaintiffs must, as stated supra, have pled facts permitting our court to draw a reasonable inference that Borrego, Sheriff Carrillo, and Deputy Melendez '(1) had subjective knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm and (2) responded to that risk with deliberate indifference'. . . In the context of detainee suicide, the requisite substantial risk of serious harm must be specific; plaintiffs must allege defendants 'were aware of a substantial and significant risk that the detainee might kill himself'. . . For the reasons that follow, plaintiffs fail to plausibly allege appellants had the requisite subjective knowledge of a substantial risk of suicide. Accordingly, whether they responded to that putative risk with deliberate indifference does not come into play."); Brabbit as Trustee for Bild v. Capra, 59 F.4th 349, 353-54 (8th Cir. 2023) ("Jails are neither required to provide suicide-proof institutions, nor must they ensure against suicide ever happening. . . In the context of jail suicides, qualified immunity is appropriate if the plaintiff fails to show the jailers acted with deliberate indifference to the risk of suicide. . . To establish deliberate indifference, a plaintiff must show the jailer had actual knowledge of an inmate's 'substantial' risk of suicide and did not take reasonable measures to abate the risk. . . Resolution is not dependent on whether the jailers did all they could have done, but whether they violated the Constitution. . . The constitutional and dispositive question here is whether the uncontroverted measures taken by WCJ were so inadequate as to be deliberately indifferent to Bild's risk of suicide. Our focus in analyzing deliberate indifference is the time in which preventive measures were implemented by the jailers for a known suicide risk. . . A review of the undisputed evidence demonstrates that the preventative measures taken by WCJ were not so inadequate as to constitute deliberate indifference. C400 was specifically designated to hold suicidal inmates for close observation. This area had cameras and large windows, allowing for constant observation of Bild. Bild was assigned to a cell on the bottom floor and prohibited from going upstairs. If he went upstairs, C400 contained a complete barrier on the second floor designed to prevent inmates from jumping. Even though Bild never expressed suicidal ideations to WCJ staff, given Bild's reported prior possible suicide attempt and his unclear mental health condition, WCJ reasonably undertook efforts to monitor and house Bild in an area designed to minimize his risk of suicide. Brabbit's contention that Bild should have been moved from C400 is of no consequence because there is no evidence WCJ had a more suicide-proof cellblock available. . . Likewise, neither the history of jump attempts at WCJ or the correctional officers' failure to report Bild's earlier effort to climb the stairs raises a material fact question given the few jump attempts that have occurred at WCJ over the course of several years and that inmates climb C400's stairs for innocent reasons. Turning to the nurses' conduct, Bild's condition was assessed and evaluated each day for changes in his demeanor or mental health. Under our precedent, Kaphing's and Nelson's decisions not to seek specialized mental health treatment or maintain Bild on Special Close Watch status do not demonstrate deliberate indifference."); George, on behalf of Bradshaw v. Beaver County, 32 F.4th 1246, 1255-58 (10th Cir. 2022) ("Courts treat jail-suicide claims as a failure to provide medical care, . . . which implicates the Eighth Amendment. . . The Fourteenth Amendment's due-process clause provides pretrial detainees the same protection for medical attention as convicted inmates receive under the Eighth Amendment. . . And we apply the same deliberate-indifference standard no matter which amendment provides the constitutional basis for the claim. . . Plaintiff's supervisory-liability claim in this case requires 'a particularized state of mind: actual knowledge by a prison official of an individual inmate's substantial risk of suicide.'. . . Thus, to hold Noel liable as a supervisor, Plaintiff must demonstrate that he had 'actual knowledge ... of [Bradshaw's] substantial risk of suicide.'. . .Plaintiff puts forth no evidence showing Noel had actual knowledge of Bradshaw's substantial risk of suicide. . . Instead, she contends Supreme Court precedent only requires Noel to have known of the 'generalized risks presented by conditions at his jail,' rather than 'the risk to a specific detainee,' to have the culpable state of mind. And she argues that she presented evidence to the district court from which a jury could reasonably conclude that Noel endorsed a widespread custom or policy at BCCF of failing to report suicide risks and that he failed to train officers on suicide prevention. According to Plaintiff, '[t]he very existence of the Suicide Prevention Policy and accompanying procedures ... should have put Sheriff Noel on notice of the substantial risk presented by suicidal detainees' because 'those policies ... required updating and implementation,' and Noel failed to act 'in the face of a substantial risk of suicide to BCCF inmates.' Plaintiff is correct that Farmer v. Brennan. . . 'opened the door to a showing that a supervisory jail official could have the requisite mens rea if he knew of the generalized risks presented by conditions at his jail, not merely the risk to a specific detainee.' Indeed, Farmer states, 'it does not matter whether the risk comes from a single source or multiple sources, any more than it matters whether a prisoner faces an excessive risk ... for reasons personal to him or because all prisoners in his situation face such a risk.'. . But Farmer concerned deliberate indifference to an inmate's safety who 'would be particularly vulnerable to sexual attack,'. . . and we have applied its deliberate-indifference-to-a-generalized-risk requirement in cases involving the risk of sexual assault. . . But in Cox, we determined that supervisory-liability in the inmate-suicide context requires the prison official to have had actual knowledge of an individual inmate's substantial risk of suicide. . . We acknowledged that 'we have taken a different stance on the knowledge of risk that must be alleged' in the prison-sexual-assault context. . . But we found those cases distinguishable because one can assess the risk of sexual assault from the sexual victimizer's characteristics and other external factors, while 'a substantial risk of suicide may be impossible to discern unless the particular inmate reveals indicia of that risk to prison officials.'. . Still, Plaintiff urges us to reject reading Cox to mean 'that no supervisory liability can attach to a jail official unless that official subjectively knows of the suicide risk to a particular inmate.' Under that reading, Plaintiff contends, jail officials could implement unconstitutional policies leading directly to inmate suicide and 'escape liability by simply maintaining ignorance of the day-to-day, inmate-specific operations of their jail.' But Cox is clear: § 1983 jail-suicide supervisory-liability claims require the supervisor to have known that the specific inmate at issue presented a substantial risk of suicide. . . '[W]e are bound to follow our ... precedent, absent en banc reconsideration or a super[s]eding contrary decision by the Supreme Court.'. . Thus, to defeat Noel's summary-judgment motion, Plaintiff must offer evidence showing Noel had actual knowledge of Bradshaw's substantial risk of suicide, rather than a generalized risk. Plaintiff has pointed to no evidence showing Noel had actual knowledge of Bradshaw's substantial risk of suicide. Even if § 1983 jail-suicide supervisory-liability claims only required the actor to have known of a generalized risk of suicide at the prison, the record does not show Noel knew of any generalized risk. That officers ignored portions of the County's suicide-prevention policy is not enough to raise a fact issue that Noel knew about a generalized risk to suicidal detainees, contrary to Plaintiff's argument, because no inmate had ever successfully committed suicide at the BCCF before this incident. . . And, to the extent Plaintiff contends that Noel endorsed a custom or policy of failing to report suicide risks and train officers on suicide-prevention, thus creating a generalized risk to suicidal detainees, Plaintiff failed to show such a custom or policy existed. As discussed above, Plaintiff demonstrated no pattern of untrained employees' constitutional violations showing deliberate indifference to suicide-prevention or shift-change-report training to rise to the level of County policy or custom. . . Rather, Plaintiff only showed a failure to comply with the County's policies in Bradshaw's case. And any argument that Noel affirmatively endorsed not reporting suicide risks in shift-change reports, rather than failing to train on reporting them, also falls short because Plaintiff does not attempt to prove a pattern evidencing that custom. Because there is no evidence that Noel knew Bradshaw presented a substantial risk of suicide, the district court properly granted summary judgment to Sheriff Noel."); Estate of Burgaz by & through Zommer v. Bd. of County Commissioners for Jefferson County, Colorado, 30 F.4th 1181, 1186-89 (10th Cir. 2022) ("When assessing whether a constitutional violation occurred and whether the law was clearly established, we have the discretion to decide which question to answer first. . .Here, we conclude the Estate failed to plausibly allege a constitutional violation against either deputy because it did not plausibly allege that either deputy was deliberately indifferent to Ms. Burgaz's medical needs. Consequently, each deputy is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Claims based on a jail suicide are considered and treated as claims based on the failure of the jail officials to provide necessary medical care for those in their custody. . . Thus, the claims are assessed for deliberate indifference to serious medical needs. . . The test for deliberate indifference has a dual objective and subjective component. For the objective component, the complainant must demonstrate that the deprivation is sufficiently serious to warrant intervention or treatment. . . . [E]ven if a jail official has knowledge of a substantial risk of serious harm to detainees, 'he is not deliberately indifferent to that risk unless he is aware of and fails to take reasonable steps to alleviate that risk.'. . Even so, although this portion of deliberate indifference is a subjective inquiry, a jury is allowed to infer a jail official had actual knowledge of the substantial risk to serious harm based solely on circumstantial evidence. . . We review the relevant alleged facts to determine whether it is plausible each deputy had actual knowledge of Ms. Burgaz's risk of and ability to commit suicide. . . .Taking as true all of the plausible allegations and drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of the Estate, Deputy Pesapane knew many facts about Ms. Burgaz that, taken together, fail to demonstrate the immediate and serious risk of suicide was obvious. Deputy Pesapane knew Ms. Burgaz (1) had attempted suicide previously at the same facility, (2) had various mental illnesses, (3) had a drug addiction, (4) had recently suffered sexual violence, (5) was despondent after hearing she would not be released soon, and (6) was in the least secure room in the SHU. But even so, there were insufficient indicators to put Deputy Pesapane on notice of the immediate risk. At most, Deputy Pesapane could have known she was interacting with a distressed detainee with a history of mental illness and self-harm. But there were no obvious indicators of suicide present. There are no allegations Ms. Burgaz expressed suicidality or intentions to harm herself. Nor did the Estate allege Ms. Burgaz had been placed on suicide watch during this particular stint at the JCDF. Ms. Burgaz's interactions with Deputy Pesapane were for her release, not for any medical attention or psychiatric help. And there is no allegation Deputy Pesapane had been educated to know Ms. Burgaz's grave disappointment at not being released created an imminent risk of suicide. And even though Ms. Burgaz was under some distress, her suicide in the dayroom could not have been obviously foreseen because there is no reason to believe Deputy Pesapane would have thought Ms. Burgaz was capable of committing suicide in the dayroom without being observed and stopped. Ms. Burgaz was physically frail, relying on a walker to move about, so she was relatively immobile and less capable of harming herself. . . And she was in the SHU, where she would ostensibly be watched by deputies manning the security cameras and by deputies conducting the periodic walk-throughs. . .The SHU control room displays sixteen live feeds from the surveillance system, one of which was from a camera in the dayroom. The Estate alleges the camera in the dayroom 'has sufficient clarity that any officer monitoring the live feed would immediately recognize [Ms. Burgaz] was attempting suicide.'. . Although the Estate alleges other suicides have taken place at this jail before, it does not allege that suicides have taken place either in the dayroom or with television cords or on the defendant deputies' watch. There are also no nonconclusory allegations that Deputy Pesapane was aware of the immediate suicide risk posed by the television cords. Consequently, it is not obvious a distressed, physically frail detainee who should have been surveilled constantly would have committed suicide in the dayroom when left alone for twenty minutes. Accordingly, we find the Estate failed to plausibly allege Deputy Pesapane committed a constitutional violation through deliberate indifference to Ms. Burgaz's serious medical needs."); Heidel v. Mazzola, No. 20-1067, 2021 WL 1103507, at *2 (10th Cir. Mar. 23, 2021) (not reported) ("To start, the Estate cannot establish an underlying constitutional violation by any of the jail's officers because they did not have subjective awareness of Ms. Rowell's risk of suicide. Although excessive sleeping, signs of diminished appetite, and refusing to go outside for recreation time can arguably be viewed as suicidal characteristics, they can be 'susceptible to a number of interpretations.'. . Officers viewed this behavior as common among inmates and consistent with Ms. Rowell's previous time at the jail. No evidence suggests that Ms. Rowell mentioned her suicidal thoughts to an officer. Although the Estate argues that the subjective component can be shown by a risk of harm to the inmate population as a whole, our cases have typically required knowledge about a specific inmate's risk of suicide."); Estate of Bonilla by & through Bonilla v. Orange County, Texas, 982 F.3d 298, 306 (5th Cir. 2020) ("The evidence indicates that Bonilla did not request medical help, and her behavior in detention was unremarkable prior to her suicide. This evidence did not give rise to reasonable inferences that the individual defendants were aware of Bonilla's suicidal tendency, much less that they disregarded the risk. The district court correctly awarded summary judgment in the absence of evidence that Shafer or Dickerson 'acted or failed to act with subjective deliberate indifference to the detainee's rights.'"); Troutman v. Louisville Metro Dep't of Corr., 979 F.3d 472, 483 (6th Cir. 2020) ("For prison suicide cases, the subjective standard requires that it was 'obvious that there was a "strong likelihood" that an inmate would attempt suicide.'. . It is insufficient to show that an official 'acted with deliberate indifference to some possibility of suicide, or even a likelihood of suicide.'. . This distinction is critical 'because a finding of deliberate indifference requires a sufficiently culpable state of mind, which the Supreme Court has equated with criminal recklessness.'. . The official's 'state of mind must evince "deliberateness tantamount to intent to punish."'. . Knowledge of the 'strong likelihood' of suicide is a 'question of fact subject to demonstration in the usual ways, including inference from circumstantial evidence.'"); Downard for Estate of Downard v. Martin, 968 F.3d 594, 600-01 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Under the Fourteenth Amendment, pretrial detainees have a 'right to adequate medical care.'. . A prison official violates that right when he acts with 'deliberate indifference' to an inmate's 'serious medical needs.'. . The deliberate indifference standard contains both an objective and subjective component. . . First, under the objective component, an inmate must show a 'sufficiently serious' medical need. . . Second, under the subjective component, an inmate must show both that an official knew of her serious medical need and that, despite this knowledge, the official disregarded or responded unreasonably to that need. . . . Foley and Wallace contend that the district court's factual determinations do not satisfy the subjective component of the deliberate indifference standard. We agree. As noted above, 'it is not enough to establish that an official may have acted with deliberate indifference to some possibility of suicide, or even a likelihood of suicide; the test is a strong likelihood of suicide.'. . This is a high bar and typically requires evidence that the inmate was already on suicide watch, previously attempted suicide under similar conditions, or recently expressed a desire to self-harm. . . The district court here failed to apply the 'strong likelihood' standard, finding only that Foley and Wallace perceived some undefined risk that Tye might attempt suicide. The facts and inferences as found by the district court do not evince a 'strong likelihood' that Tye would commit suicide."); Arenas v. Calhoun, 922 F.3d 616, 624-25 (5th Cir. 2019) ("The Constitution does not require an individual officer to intervene immediately in an apparent suicide without sufficient support where doing so would jeopardize his own safety. . . To be sure, a knowing failure to execute policies necessary to an inmate's safety may be evidence of an officer's deliberate indifference. . . Arenas posits that Calhoun flouted SOP VG68-0001, which 'appl[ies] to all State Institutions and requires an officer to 'call for backup by radio or telephone and then immediately cut down the hanging inmate ... and initiate CPR procedures.'. . At deposition, both Shelby and Dickson stated that an officer must comply with that policy. Additionally, Arenas's expert, Raul Banasco, testified that a correctional officer must provide immediate medical care to any inmate attempting suicide. Hence, as proof of deliberate indifference, Arenas asserts that Calhoun violated GDOC policy by refusing to enter Tavara's cell immediately. That argument is unpersuasive. SOP VG68-0001 pertains to the functional area of 'Program Services/Health Services—Mental Health and is entitled 'Managing Potentially Suicidal, Self-Injurious and Aggressive Behavior.'. . The express purpose of the policy is that 'inmates ... who are potentially suicidal, self-injurious, and/or physically aggressive will be identified, and referred for further evaluation and/or appropriate stabilization-/management.'. .

Indeed, SOP VG68-0001 delineates the procedure for recognizing potentially suicidal and self-injurious inmates and the manner for housing and monitoring them. . . It then concludes with a section on 'Emergency Response' on which Arenas here relies. . . As the GDOC Director of Operations, Steve Upton, clarified, however, that section applies only to inmates who have been identified as potentially suicidal or self-injurious, and, based on such identification, have been placed in a designated stabilization unit. Upton's understanding of the scope of SOP VG68-0001 is not only reasonable but is likely the better reading of the policy in light of its structure, text, and stated purpose. Tavara was neither identified as potentially suicidal nor assigned to a stabilization unit. Rather, he was housed in administrative segregation. Therefore, it was reasonable that Calhoun did not implement the procedures outlined in SOP VG68-0001. And though Banasco urged that an officer must always intervene in a suicide, he did not purport to interpret GDOC protocol. Arenas has therefore failed to show that SOP VG68-0001 is evidence of any deliberate indifference on Calhoun's part."); Hyatt v. Thomas, 843 F.3d 172, 180 (5th Cir. 2016) ("[A]lthough failure to properly execute a suicide prevention policy may amount to deliberate indifference, see Estate of Pollard, 579 F. App'x at 266, in this case, considering the steps that Thomas did take, any potential noncompliance with Callahan County's policy would have been at most negligent. . . We therefore hold that, while not ideal, her failure to exercise even greater care to avoid Hyatt's suicide did not amount to deliberate indifference. . . America faces an epidemic of suicide by individuals in custody. According to the Bureau of Justice Statistics, suicide has been the leading cause of death in jails every year since 2000. Margaret Noonan et al., U.S. Dep't of Justice, Mortality in Local Jails and State Prisons, 2000–2013—Statistical Tables 1 (2015), available at http://www.bjs.gov/content/pub/pdf/mljsp0013st.pdf. In 2013, more than a third of jail inmate deaths were due to suicide. . . In 2015, there were 33 suicides in county jails in Texas. Dana Liebelson & Ryan J. Reilly, Sandra Bland Died One Year Ago, Huffington Post – Highline (July 13, 2016), http://highline.huffingtonpost.com/articles/en/sandra-bland-jail-deaths/. Yet preventing detainee suicides is far from impossible. Brazos County, Texas, makes an effort to keep people with mental health issues out of jail, diverting individuals to mental health facilities instead of charging them with a crime. The county jail also screens inmates twice, first with an officer and then with a nurse. As a result, the jail, which houses roughly 650 inmates, has had only one suicide in the past decade. . . It is clear that more can and must be done to address suicides in prisons and jails. Nevertheless, '[d]eliberate indifference is an extremely high standard to meet.'. . Officer Thomas took measures to prevent Jason Hyatt's suicide: she withheld from him the most obvious potential ligature, placed him under video surveillance, and directed her relieving officer to keep a close watch over him. Although these measures were ultimately, and tragically, insufficient, we cannot say that they constitute deliberate indifference. The judgment of the district court granting summary on grounds of qualified immunity is therefore AFFIRMED."); Jackson v. West, 787 F.3d 1345, 1359 (11th Cir. 2015) ("This case is troubling. The Marion County Jail tragically failed to keep Mr. James safe while he was incarcerated. Under our precedent, however, an officer is liable under § 1983 for the suicide of an inmate only if he had subjective knowledge of a serious risk that the inmate would commit suicide and he disregarded that known risk. Because we find no genuine factual dispute about the subjective knowledge of these seven defendants, we cannot sustain the District Court's ruling. We reverse with the instruction that the District Court grant the defendants' motions for summary judgment."); Belbachir v. County of McHenry, 726 F.3d 975, 982-84 (7th Cir. 2013) ("The judge said that the County could not be liable unless one of its employees was. That's incorrect. What's true is that if a County employee were liable, the County itself would not be liable merely by virtue of the doctrine of respondeat superior; the doctrine is inapplicable in section 1983 cases. But an institution can violate section 1983 just as an individual can. The plaintiff complains that the County failed to provide annual training to its jail staff on how to recognize the risk of suicide (the members of the staff did receive such training when they were hired), failed to have a written suicide-prevention policy, and lacked policies governing communication between the medical staff and the guards. Granted that the sheriff, the County's policymaker regarding the jail, knew of the suicide risk to prisoners, especially new prisoners-there had been a number of suicide attempts in the previous 10 years (though precisely how many we don't know)—nevertheless the grounds on which the plaintiff accuses the sheriff of deliberate indifference to the risk of suicide are thin. The facts in cases in which a county jail or other local jail (or its sheriff) have been held liable for deliberate indifference to prisoners' safety or health are much more favorable to the plaintiff than the facts in this case. . .It's difficult to see why formal policies would be necessary to assure adequate communication between the guards and the members of the medical staff, since they work side by side. More troublesome is the failure either to have provided annual training or to have had a written policy; with neither, a lot of weight was being placed on guards' memory, though no doubt the suicide attempts jogged their memory. But at worst the sheriff's failure to take the additional measures that the plaintiff thinks necessary was negligent, and maybe not even that. For while the immigration authorities, who monitor the jail's treatment of its federal prisoners, rated the jail's suicide-prevention policy 'deficient' in 2002, they rated it acceptable in both 2003 and (the last evaluation before Belbachir committed suicide) 2004. Shortly after the suicide, it is true, the immigration authorities, in what may be an example of hindsight bias, found fault with the jail's suicide prevention policies for (1) forgoing annual training of the jail staff in suicide prevention; (2) having only an incomplete or inconsistent policy governing intake screenings; (3) lacking written procedures on when to place detainees on, or remove them from, suicide watch; and (4) sometimes allowing guards to perform the required 10–minute checks of prisoners on suicide watch by intercom rather than visually. But there is no evidence that the sheriff was aware of any of these failures except the first. And even if the sheriff was culpable for failing to discover and correct the deficiencies argued by the plaintiff, there is no evidence that correcting them before Belbachir arrived at the jail would have prevented her suicide. Once again a causal relation between fault and injury is missing. The critical failure to prevent Belbachir's suicide occurred when defendant Frederick, having decided that Belbachir was not suicidal, failed to tell the guards to put her on suicide watch. Two of the three deficiencies of which the plaintiff complains—the absence of annual training and of a written suicide-prevention policy—are addressed to the guards rather than to the medical staff. The third—the absence of a policy governing communication between the medical staff and the guards—could not have played a causal role either, because Frederick, not thinking that Belbachir was a suicide risk, had no warning to communicate to the guards."); Short v. Smoot, 436 F.3d 422, 427-30 (4th Cir. 2006) (" The right in question here, defined at the appropriate level of specificity, is the right of a detainee, whose jailers know that he is suicidal, to have his jailers take precautions against his suicide beyond merely placing him in a cell under video surveillance. We hold that Brown v. Harris, 240 F.3d 383 (4th Cir.2001), demonstrates that no such right derives from the Eighth Amendment. . . . Importantly, a prison official 'who actually [knows] of a substantial risk to inmate health or safety may be found free from liability if [he] responded reasonably to the risk, even if the harm ultimately was not averted.'. . . Brown demonstrates that the first-shift officers' response to Short's risk of suicide was objectively reasonable and therefore sufficient to prevent liability under the Eighth Amendment. . . . Here, the first-shift officers' response to the risk that Short would kill himself was the same as Ogden's response in Brown: they placed the detainee in a cell under video surveillance. Thus, under Brown, this response was sufficient under the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause regardless of whether additional precautions might also have been advisable. . . . The critical point is that despite the actual failure of the officers' measures to prevent the detainees' suicides, and despite possible inattentiveness of the officers whose duty it was at the time of the suicides to watch the monitors, in both Brown and the present case the officers placed their detainees in video-monitored cells, knowing that someone would be responsible for watching the monitors. . . . Appellants do not dispute that it was clearly established on the day of Short's death that the conscious failure by a jailer to make any attempt to stop an ongoing suicide attempt by one of his detainees would constitute deliberate indifference."); Gray v. City of Detroit, 399 F.3d 612, 616 (6th Cir. 2005) ("Barber confirmed an earlier holding that there is no general constitutional right of detainees to receive suicide screenings or to be placed in suicide safe facilities, unless the detainee has somehow demonstrated a strong likelihood of committing suicide. . . . Here, plaintiff has presented no evidence to support his claim that Officer Gross actually knew that Gray was at risk of committing suicide. All of Gray's complaints had been of a physical nature, and none of his behavior had been self-injurious. He did not demonstrate a 'strong likelihood' of committing suicide. The only conceivable way that any individual officer could have possibly concluded that Gray was a suicide risk was to have obtained and appropriately pieced together the knowledge of every other officer involved in the case. And as the District Court said, '[t]he test for deliberate indifference is a subjective test ... not an objective test or collective knowledge.' Because Gray's conduct and statements did not give rise to a constitutional duty on the part of his jailors to screen or monitor him for suicide, there is no evidence that Officer Gross violated Gray's constitutional rights in any way."); Crocker v. County of Macomb, No. 03-2423, 2005 WL 19473, at *4, *5 (6th Cir. Jan. 4, 2005) (unpublished) ("Jail officials cannot be charged with knowledge of a particular detainee's high suicide risk based solely on the fact that the detainee fits a profile of individuals who purportedly are more likely to commit suicide than those who do not fit the profile in all respects. This is particularly true since if past suicide attempts are factored out, the profile described by plaintiff casts a very wide net, and there is no evidence that the majority of detainees who fit the profile in those respects that would be apparent to an observer are at risk for attempting suicide. Thus, absent evidence that any individual defendant knew Tarzwell had a serious medical need manifesting itself in suicidal tendencies or that such need was obvious, plaintiff cannot prevail on the Fourteenth Amendment claim against the individual defendants under the Estelle analysis. As in another jail suicide case decided by this court, because there is no evidence that the individual defendants knew Tarzwell was at risk of attempting suicide, '[t]he Aright' that is truly at issue here is the right of a detainee to be screened correctly for suicidal tendencies and the right to have steps taken that would have prevented suicide.' . . Indeed, plaintiff identifies the right which forms the basis for the alleged constitutional violation in this manner by arguing that although Officer Murphy knew that Tarzwell met certain criteria for a suicide risk, Murphy failed to take steps to confirm the risk, such as checking law enforcement records or asking Tarzwell about his suicidal ideation, and did not conduct any screening of Tarzwell when he was delivered to the jail. We found in Danese that a right to be screened correctly for suicidal tendencies and to have steps taken to prevent suicide was not clearly established as of the date of that decision, noting that, '[i]t is one thing to ignore someone who has a serious injury and is asking for medical help; it is another to be required to screen prisoners correctly to find out if they need help.'. .Plaintiff has not cited any case decided by the United States Supreme Court or by this Circuit since Danese finding a constitutional right to be screened for suicidal tendencies on the part of either a pretrial detainee or a prisoner entitled to the protections of the Eighth Amendment. Consistent with our prior decisions addressing this issue, we hold that the individual defendants' failure to screen Tarzwell for suicidal tendencies or ideation and to take measures that would have prevented his suicide are not tantamount to punishment under the circumstances of this case and cannot serve as the basis for imposing liability on the individual defendants under § 1983. Accordingly, the district court did not err by granting summary judgment in favor of the individual defendants."); Matos ex rel Matos v.. O'Sullivan, 335 F.3d 553, 557 (7th Cir.2003) (defendant must have had actual knowledge of detainee's risk of suicide); Cagle v. Sutherland, 334 F.3d 980, 987(11th Cir. 2003) (per curiam) ("Cagle concedes, in her brief, that consent decrees can neither create nor expand constitutional rights. She says, however, that the consent decree can still be relevant to a section 1983 action. She claims that the Praytor order put Winston County on notice of the understaffing problem and, in this sense, that the violation of the order establishes deliberate indifference to the risk of jail suicide. We disagree. . . . The Praytor order derived from a jail-condition class action. Suicide was no factor in that litigation. The word 'suicide' appears nowhere in the Praytor complaint and nowhere in the Praytor order. Sheriff Sutherland's requests for an additional nighttime jailer were based on his concerns about escape. His requests make no mention of a risk of suicide. These facts fall short of establishing that the County was aware of a strong likelihood of suicide. In addition, no evidence shows that, before Butler, any prisoner had ever committed suicide in Winston County Jail. Nothing in the record required County officials to conclude that commonly prisoners in the Winston County Jail were substantially likely to attempt suicide."); Boncher v. Brown County, 272 F.3d 484, 488 (7th Cir. 2001) ("The plaintiff is left to argue that the defendants exhibited deliberate indifference to suicide risk by failing to train the intake officers or adopt a better intake questionnaire. It is not clear what good the better training would have done, at least in this case; the basic judgment the intake officers had to make was whether Boncher was joking, and that is not a judgment likely to be much assisted by special training. . . . The form is defective, but because of a rather subtle problem − the failure to specify probing follow-up questions for inmates who indicate mental or emotional problems. That is a serious deficiency and one that ought to be corrected, if only to shield the defendants from liability for commonlaw negligence in suits under state law. But like other courts to consider the issue, we don't see how such a slip, at worst careless, could be proof evidence of something much worse, a deliberate failure to deal with a known high risk of death."); Payne v. Churchich, 161 F.3d 1030, 1041, 1042 (7th Cir. 1998) ("When the § 1983 claim is based on a jail suicide, the degree of protection accorded a detainee is the same that an inmate receives when raising an inadequate medical attention claim under the Eighth Amendment − deliberate indifference. . . . [O]ur cases dealing with § 1983 claims based on a pretrial detainee's suicide have held that a state actor like Deputy Papa can be held liable for a detainee's suicide only if the defendant was deliberately indifferent to a substantial suicide risk. . . . We have held that knowledge of a substantial risk of suicide can be inferred from the obviousness of the risk. . . However, we do not believe that the allegations in the complaint about Mr. Hicks' conduct and tattoo message, without more, indicate an obvious, substantial risk of suicide. There is no allegation of Mr. Hicks' suicidal tendencies, no claim or evidence of past suicide attempts or warnings from family members of a mental disturbance and suicidal condition. . .None of the facts alleged in this case − Mr. Hicks' intoxication, cursing and tattoo − raises an issue of whether Deputy Papa had knowledge of, or even particular reason to suspect, a substantial risk of suicide on Mr. Hicks' part."); Liebe v. Norton, 157 F.3d 574, 578 (8th Cir. 1998) ("The facts of this case are strikingly similar to those in Rellergert. In both cases, the prisons had policies in place for the protection of inmates classified as suicide risks. Tragically, in both cases, despite those preventive policies, inmates were successful in committing suicide. . . . While Norton may have been negligent in not checking on Liebe more often, or in failing to notice the exposed electrical conduit in the temporary holding cell, we cannot say as a matter of law that his actions were indifferent. To the contrary, Norton's actions constituted affirmative, deliberate steps to prevent Liebe's suicide. Despite Norton's ultimate failure to prevent that suicide, Norton did not act with deliberate indifference."); Barrie v. Grand County, 119 F.3d 862, 868, 869 (10th Cir. 1997) ("[W]e conclude that in this circuit a prisoner, whether he be an inmate in a penal institution after conviction or a pre-trial detainee in a county jail, does not have a claim against his custodian for failure to provide adequate medical attention unless the custodian knows of the risk involved, and is 'deliberately indifferent' thereto. Whether the detainee has been taken before a magistrate judge or other judicial officer to determine the legality of his arrest is not material, the custodian's duty is the same in either event. And the same standard applies to a claim based on jail suicide, i.e., the custodian must be 'deliberately indifferent' to a substantial risk of suicide."); Estate of Hocker by Hocker v. Walsh, 22 F.3d 995, 1000 (10th Cir. 1994) ("Here, no facts suggest that the Detention Center staff had knowledge of the specific risk that Ms. Hocker would commit suicide. Nor do the facts suggest that Ms. Hocker's risk of suicide was so substantial or pervasive that knowledge can be inferred. Though the staff obviously knew that Ms. Hocker was intoxicated or under the influence of drugs, intoxication with its accompanying incoherence does not, by itself, give the Detention Center staff knowledge that Ms. Hocker posed a specific risk of suicide." footnote omitted); Bowen v. City of Manchester, 966 F.2d 13, 18, 19 (1st Cir. 1992) ("In cases involving the psychological needs of a potentially suicidal detainee, courts have found officials to have acted with deliberate indifference only when the detainee shows clear signs of suicidal tendencies and the officials had actual knowledge, or were willfully blind, to the large risk that the detainee would take his life."); Manarite v. City of Springfield, 957 F.2d 953, 954 (1st Cir. 1992) ("where police departments have promulgated commonplace suicide-prevention policies, courts ordinarily have found supervisors not liable . . . even if officers did not always follow the department's policy and even if other, better policies might have diminished suicide risks."), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 113 (1992); Hall v. Ryan, 957 F.2d 402, 405 (7th Cir. 1992) (prison officials not entitled to qualified immunity if they actually knew inmate was serious suicide risk, yet failed to take appropriate steps to protect inmate); Schmelz v. Monroe County, 954 F.2d 1540, 1545 (11th Cir. 1992) (no liability for suicide of prisoner who had never threatened or attempted suicide and who was never viewed as suicide risk); Barber v. City of Salem, 953 F.2d 232, 239-40 (6th Cir. 1992) ("[W]e adopt the Eleventh Circuit's holding in Popham that the proper inquiry concerning the liability of a City and its employees in both their official and individual capacities under section 1983 for a jail detainee's suicide is: whether the decedent showed a strong likelihood that he would attempt to take his own life in such a manner that failure to take adequate precautions amounted to deliberate indifference to the decedent's serious medical needs."); Colburn, supra, 946 F.2d at 1023, ("[P]laintiff in a prison suicide case has the burden of establishing three elements: (1) the detainee had a 'particular vulnerability to suicide,' (2) the custodial officer or officers knew or should have known of that vulnerability, and (3) those officers 'acted with reckless indifference' to the detainee's particular vulnerability."); Elliott v. Cheshire County, N.H., 940 F.2d 7, 10-11 (1st Cir. 1991) ("The key to deliberate indifference in a prison suicide case is whether the defendants knew, or reasonably should have known, of the detainee's suicidal tendencies . . . . Moreover, the risk must be 'large,'. . . and 'strong,'. . . in order for constitutional (as opposed to tort) liability to attach." cites omitted); Popham v. City of Talladega, 908 F.2d 1561, 1564 (11th Cir. 1990) (absent knowledge of detainee's suicidal tendencies, cases have consistently held failure to prevent suicide does not constitute deliberate indifference); Burns v. City of Galveston, Texas, 905 F.2d 100, 104 (5th Cir. 1990) (constitutional right of detainees to adequate medical care does not include absolute right to psychological screening in order to detect suicidal tendencies); Belcher v. Oliver, 898 F.2d 32, 36 (4th Cir. 1990) (plaintiffs' attempt to turn case into one for inadequate training is unavailing where no underlying constitutional infraction); Williams v. Borough of West Chester, 891 F.2d 458, 464-467 (3d Cir. 1990) (not enough evidence to prove that officers knew of arrestee's suicidal tendencies).

See also Andrews v. Wayne County, Michigan, 957 F.3d 714, 724-25 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Andrews argues that the Jail's policy of failing to train its employees in suicide risk assessment shows deliberate indifference. . . . As the district court recognized, Andrews cannot prevail on a failure-to-train theory of liability against the County because no constitutional tort was committed. No constitutional tort was committed here because White did not demonstrate a strong likelihood of committing suicide. Like the pretrial detainee who committed suicide in Gray, White 'never made any statements that could reasonably be interpreted as threatening to harm [her]self.'. . During the intake process, White appeared mentally stable during two separate intake interviews and the Jail had no other information to suggest that she was threatening harm. . . She expressly denied suicidal ideation or thoughts of harm when asked (twice). Even her former fiancé failed to flag the issue—because he did not think White was suicidal. . . Furthermore, Carnill testified that had White presented as mentally unstable, he would have taken appropriate precautions, including housing her on the mental health unit and contacting the on-call psychiatrist. Thus, any purported lack of specific suicide risk assessment training did not cause White to commit suicide. Finally, like the defendant city jail in Gray, the County has no history of suicides relative to the KOP program. Thus, as in Gray, any purported failure to train its employees in suicide risk assessment did not cause White's death. Other factors, such as White's use of depression and anxiety medication, did not change the calculus. As Andrews' own expert, Dr. A. E. Daniel, M.D., admitted, 'just because a person has depression, [that] doesn't mean [she is] suicidal,' and 'not all persons with depression or anxiety are suicidal.' Indeed, the fact that White had already taken steps to treat her anxiety and depression suggest that any potential suicidal tendencies were under control, and Carnill followed up by asking White if she had any suicidal thoughts or ideations, which she denied. He also referred her to a social worker for evaluation. In short, Carnill, a trained medical professional in the County's employ and entrusted by it to assess White's mental and physical condition, did not display deliberate indifference towards White. Which brings us back to the only defendant in this case, Carnill's employer, the County. This court has 'continuously held that under § 1983, a county can only be held liable if there is a showing of an underlying constitutional violation by the county's officials.' Burkey v. Hunter, 790 F. App'x 40, 41 (6th Cir. 2020) (listing cases). Axiomatically, '[t]here can be no Monell municipal liability under § 1983 unless there is an underlying unconstitutional act.'. . For this reason, the district court properly held that the County was entitled to summary judgment on the failure to train claim.")

See also Cleveland v. Bell, 938 F.3d 672, 676-77 (5th Cir. 2019) ("In this case, the district court failed to provide any analysis of why it denied qualified immunity to Nurse Bell. Instead, it gave a one-sentence conclusory statement: 'Taking the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs permits a conclusion that, on the night before and morning of Cleveland's death, she acted with deliberate indifference to Cleveland's welfare.'. . The court did not identify which facts showed that Nurse Bell: (1) was aware of information that could lead to the inference that Cleveland was experiencing a life-threatening medical emergency; (2) drew the inference and was subjectively aware of how serious the situation was; and (3) disregarded Cleveland's life-threatening medical emergency, despite appreciating its existence. When the district court fails to identify which facts it relied on, we must review the entire record to determine 'what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed.'. . We then review de novo the district court's application of the law to those facts. . . Having reviewed the record, we find no evidence that on November 11th or 12th, Nurse Bell subjectively 'dr[e]w the inference' that Cleveland was experiencing a life-threatening medical emergency. . . The record contains statements from Nurse Bell indicating that she thought there was nothing wrong with Cleveland and believed he was faking illness. But nothing suggests that these statements reflected anything other than her sincere opinion at the time. Even if we construe her statements in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, they are insufficient to establish that Nurse Bell knew how serious the situation was. The Supreme Court has made clear that actual knowledge is an essential element of Plaintiffs' burden, as mere negligence cannot establish a constitutional violation. . . Given the lack of evidence about Nurse Bell's subjective awareness of a substantial risk of serious harm to Cleveland, Plaintiffs cannot show a constitutional violation at step one of the qualified-immunity analysis.")

But see Sanchez v. Oliver, 995 F.3d 461, 475 (5th Cir. A2021) ("Here, plaintiffs have

alleged that Oliver actually knew Gauna was suicidal, but declined to keep him on suicidal watch regardless. There was no pre-existing provider–patient relationship. Oliver had no reason to believe that Gauna's expressed desire for protection in the infirmary from his own suicidal tendencies was for secondary gain or in any other way insincere. To the contrary, her notes described Gauna as 'cooperative,' albeit 'very, very depressed.' Gauna told Oliver that he had active suicidal ideation, and experienced it 'all the time,' that 'it always crosses my mind,' and that 'there is always a plan' for how he would commit suicide. Oliver had access to ample evidence that Gauna was genuinely suicidal, and has offered no evidence other than a five-word diagnostic note ('no intent "at the moment"') to indicate that she did not actually perceive this risk. Nonetheless, she made the decision—that was solely within her purview to make—that Gauna be taken off suicide watch and placed into the general population, where he would have access to tie-off points and ligatures, including the bedsheets with which he eventually hanged himself. Sanchez has presented enough evidence from which a reasonable jury could conclude that Oliver was aware of facts from which she could draw the inference that Gauna was suicidal, and that she actually did draw that inference but responded with deliberate indifference, to avoid summary judgment on her § 1983 claim under the Fourteenth Amendment."); Rogers v. Santa Rosa County Sheriff's Office, 856 F. App'x 251, ___ (11th Cir. 2021) (not reported) ("The district court applied the correct standard to evaluate the deputies' conduct. 'The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment guarantees pretrial detainees the right to basic necessities that the Eighth Amendment guarantees convicted persons.'. . So detainees have a 'right to be protected from self-inflicted injuries, including suicide.'. . An official who displays deliberate indifference to a detainee's taking of his own life may be liable for violating his substantive right to due process under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . .The district court did not err in determining that the evidence, taken in the light most favorable to Rogers, could lead a jury to find that Gaddis and Bauman knew of a strong risk that Escano-Reyes would attempt to harm himself and deliberately took no action to prevent his suicide. The deputies knew that Escano-Reyes was on suicide watch and had attempted to harm himself a few hours earlier. They heard Escano-Reyes yelling, but they ignored him. The deputies never physically checked Escano-Reyes, and Gaddis falsified records to conceal their inaction. A jury could find that, had the deputies monitored Escano-Reyes, they could have prevented him from committing suicide and that their failure to perform the task assigned to them constituted deliberate indifference."); Lisle v. Welborn, 933 F.3d 705, 717 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Proving actual subjective knowledge of the risk is often difficult, . . . but not here. Nurse South was responsible for monitoring and evaluating Lisle while he was on suicide watch. Lisle met his burden on this half of the subjective prong. . . Lisle also offered evidence to support the second component of this prong—that South intentionally disregarded the risk of suicide. He need not offer evidence of purposeful infliction of harm. Here, Lisle alleges that South was deliberately indifferent to his risk of suicide by taunting him for being unsuccessful and actually encouraging Lisle to kill himself while he was in the infirmary on suicide watch. Assuming Lisle's account is true, as we must, South's statements could be deemed cruel infliction of mental pain and deliberate indifference to his risk of suicide, making summary judgment improper.")

See also Hare v. City of Corinth, 949 F. Supp. 456, 462-63 (N.D. Miss. 1996) (on remand) ("The subjective nature of the Farmer and Hare IV analyses are relevant when determining whether or not the officer had actual knowledge of the existence of the risk, but not at all dispositive of whether or not the risk itself was in fact a substantial one of serious harm. An officer cannot escape liability by being actually aware of an objectively substantial risk of serious harm which he subjectively believes is not substantial. To do so would only protect detainees and inmates from risks of harm that prison officials deem substantial. This portion of the deliberate indifference inquiry focuses upon subjective knowledge, not subjective seriousness."), rev'd on other grounds, 135 F.3d 320 (5th Cir. 1998).

See also Cook v. Sheriff of Monroe County, 402 F.3d 1092, 1115-17 (11th Cir. 2005) ("[T]o succeed on her § 1983 claim, Cook must establish that the Sheriff himself, as representative of Monroe County, was deliberately indifferent to the possibility of Tessier's suicide, since neither respondeat superior nor vicarious liability exists under § 1983. . . . Accordingly, 'our first inquiry ... is the question whether there is a direct causal link between a municipal policy or custom and the alleged constitutional deprivation.' . . . After thorough review of the entire record in this case, we conclude that there is not. Cook in essence offers two municipal policies or customs that she believes establish such a link: first, the County's allegedly deficient procedures for processing and responding to inmate medical requests; and second, the County's failure to adequately train MCDC employees in suicide prevention. However, we need look no further than Cook's failure to establish that the County should have foreseen Tessier's suicide to conclude that any deficiencies that may exist in MCDC polices do not rise to the level of deliberate indifference. Foreseeability, for the purpose of establishing deliberate indifference, requires that the defendant have had 'subjective knowledge of a risk of serious harm,' meaning, in a prison suicide case, knowledge of 'a strong likelihood rather than a mere possibility that the self-infliction of harm will occur.' . . Moreover, because respondeat superior liability does not attach under § 1983, the defendant himself − in this case, the Sheriff (as representative of the County) − must have had this knowledge. The record in this case is devoid of any evidence that the Sheriff had any such knowledge. As we have explained previously, '[n]o matter how defendants' actions might be viewed, the law of this circuit makes clear that they cannot be liable under § 1983 for the suicide of a prisoner who never had threatened or attempted suicide and who had never been considered a suicide risk.'. . Cook has presented no evidence that Tessier had previously attempted suicide or had ever been considered a suicide risk. . . . Cook argues that the MCDC's allegedly defective procedures amount to 'deliberate indifference toward a class of suicidal detainees to which Tessier belongs, and that the deliberate indifference toward that class caused constitutional harm to Tessier individually.'. . However, as we have explained previously, under our precedent, the defendant must have had 'notice of the suicidal tendency of the individual whose rights are at issue in order to be held liable for the suicide of that individual.' . . Deliberate indifference, in the jail suicide context, is not a question of the defendant's indifference to suicidal inmates or suicide indicators generally, but rather it 'is a question of whether a defendant was deliberately indifferent to an individual's mental condition and the likely consequences of that condition.' . . For this reason, '[a]bsent knowledge of a detainee's suicidal tendencies, [our] cases have consistently held that failure to prevent suicide has never been held to constitute deliberate indifference.' . . Thus, even if Cook had established the Sheriff's deliberate indifference toward suicidal inmates in general − and, on this record, precious little evidence points to such a conclusion − this would not suffice to demonstrate the foreseeability of Tessier's suicide and to hold the Sheriff liable under § 1983. . . Because Cook has failed to demonstrate that Tessier's suicide was foreseeable to the Sheriff, the sole defendant in this case, 'there is no legally sufficient evidentiary basis for a reasonable jury to find' deliberate indifference. . . Accordingly, the district court properly entered judgment as a matter of law for the Sheriff on Cook's § 1983 claim."); Tittle v. Jefferson County Commission, 10 F.3d 1535, 1539 (11th Cir. 1994) (en banc) ("[I]n this circuit a finding of deliberate indifference requires that officials have notice of the suicidal tendency of the individual whose rights are at issue in order to be held liable for the suicide of that individual.").

But see Cavalieri v. Shepard, 321 F.3d 616, 623, 624 (7th Cir. 2003) ("Of course, the law did not require Shepard to sit by the telephone all day, communicating with the CCCF about transferred prisoners. The question is what he was supposed to do in the face of the knowledge of a life-threatening situation that he actually had. He made several telephone calls to the CCCF, but he passed by the opportunity to mention that he had been informed that Steven was a suicide risk, and that the jail itself had recognized this only a month earlier. If Shepard had known that a detainee had an illness that required life-saving medication, he would also have had a duty to inform the CCCF, or any other entity that next held custody over the detainee. . . . We conclude that the law as it existed at the time of Steven's suicide attempt provided Shepard with fair notice that his conduct was unconstitutional. The rule that officials, including police officers, will be 'liable under section 1983 for a pre-trial detainee's suicide if they were deliberately indifferent to a substantial suicide risk,' . . . was clearly established prior to 1998. The fact that several state agencies were working together on his case, and that Steven happened to attempt suicide in the county's facility rather than at the police station, does not change this analysis.").

See also Bowens v. City of Atmore, 171 F. Supp.2d 1244, 1253, 1254 (S.D. Ala. 2001) ("Because Farmer requires that the defendant's knowledge of the facts and appreciation of the resulting risk be actual, Eleventh Circuit cases suggesting that merely constructive knowledge is sufficient [footnote reference to Popham v. City of Talladega, 908 F.2d 1561, 1564 (11 th Cir.1990)] are no longer good law. While the defendant's mere denial of subjective awareness is not dispositive, the plaintiff must provide sufficient circumstantial evidence, including the obviousness of the facts and of the resulting inference of risk, to support a finding of subjective awareness and appreciation. . . . The only circumstance recognized as providing a sufficiently strong likelihood of an imminent suicide attempt is a prior attempt or threat."), aff'd, 275 F.3d 57 (11th Cir. 2001), aff'd, 275 F.3d 57 (11th Cir. 2001); Vinson v. Clarke County, 10 F. Supp.2d 1282, 1301 (S.D. Ala. 1998) ("[T]he liability of an Alabama county in this context can only properly be based on an indifference to the obvious needs of detainees in general, or of certain defined classes of detainees. . . . Accordingly, the court finds that, in jail suicide cases involving conditions of confinement, the appropriate inquiry is whether jail conditions and past events made it so obvious that suicide would result from the county's failure to modify its jail facilities that the county could be seen as deliberately indifferent to the interests of all detainees and/or intoxicated detainees.").

The issue of municipal liability for a prison suicide has received extensive consideration by the Third Circuit in Simmons v. City of Philadelphia, 947 F.2d 1042 (3d Cir. 1991). Plaintiff, the mother and administratrix of the estate of the decedent, brought suit under § 1983 against the City and the individual officer who was the "turnkey" on duty when her son hanged himself after being taken into custody for public intoxication. Municipal liability was predicated upon two theories: First, "that the City violated Simmons' constitutional right to due process through a policy or custom of inattention amounting to deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of intoxicated and potentially suicidal detainees" and second "that the City violated Simmons' due process rights through a deliberately indifferent failure to train its officers to detect and to meet those serious needs." Id. at 1050.

The jury in Simmons found that the individual officer, although negligent, did not violate Simmons' constitutional rights, but that the City was liable under § 1983. One of the many issues raised on appeal was whether, in light of City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796 (1986), the City could be held liable under § 1983 where the individual, low-level official was found not to have violated decedent's constitutional rights.

In affirming the verdict against the City, Judge Becker engaged in a lengthy analysis of municipal liability based on a custom, policy, or failure to train, concluding that to establish municipal liability, principles set forth by the Supreme Court in its "Pembaur trio" must be satisfied. Plaintiff must both identify a particular official with policymaking authority in the area and adduce "scienter-like" evidence with respect to that policymaker.

Judge Becker drew support for the imposition of a "scienter-like" evidence requirement not only from the Pembaur trio, but also from Wilson v. Seiter, 111 S. Ct. 2321 (1991), in which the Supreme Court held that a prisoner challenging conditions of confinement under the Eighth Amendment must establish "a culpable state of mind" on the part of particular prison officials. 947 F.2d at 1062-63. Finding the level of care owed to pretrial detainees to be at least the same as that owed to convicted prisoners under the Eighth Amendment, Judge Becker determined that Wilson supported his conclusion that plaintiff was required to adduce "scienter-like" evidence of deliberate indifference of identified policymakers. 947 F.2d at 1064 n.20.

Judge Becker noted that plaintiff need not name the specific policymaker as a defendant, nor obtain a verdict against him to prevail against the municipality. Plaintiff must only present evidence of the policymaker's "knowledge and his decisionmaking or acquiescence." Id. at 1065 n.21. See also Brown v. City of Margate, 842 F. Supp. 515, 519 (S.D. Fla. 1993) ("Defendant argues that because a municipality can only act through natural persons, the City of Margate could not be found liable unless one or more of the individual named Defendants had also been found liable. Defendants do not cite any authority for this argument, and it merits no more than brief consideration here. . . . The jury may not have been able to decide which official was ultimately responsible for the City's policies, and therefore declined to find any particular individual liable. This is not necessarily inconsistent with a finding that someone or some combination of policymakers had implicitly or explicitly condoned a policy of tolerance toward the excessive use of force.").

Judge Becker concluded, 947 F.2d at 1064, that:

> In order to establish the City's liability under her theory that Simmons' rights were violated as a result of a municipal policy or custom of deliberate indifference to the serious medical needs of intoxicated and potentially suicidal detainees, plaintiff must have shown that the officials determined by the district court to be the responsible policymakers were aware of the number of suicides in City lockups and of the alternatives for preventing them, but either deliberately chose not to pursue these alternatives or acquiesced in a longstanding policy or custom of inaction in this regard. [footnote omitted] As a predicate to establishing her concomitant theory that the City violated Simmons' rights by means of a deliberately indifferent failure to train, plaintiff must similarly have shown that such policymakers, likewise knowing of the number of suicides in City lockups, either deliberately chose not to provide officers with training in suicide prevention or acquiesced in a longstanding practice or custom of providing no training in this area.

See also Herriges for the Estate of Herriges-Love v. County of Macomb, No. 19-12193, 2020 WL 3498095, at *9-10 (E.D. Mich. June 29, 2020) ("It is true that 'very few cases have upheld municipality liability for the suicide of a pre-trial detainee.'. . Simmons v. City of Philadelphia is one of them. . . There, the plaintiff's decedent, who was arrested for public intoxication, was placed in a cell by himself and hanged himself with a noose made from his pants. . . In the previous five years, twenty inmates had committed suicide; fifteen had been arrested for public intoxication. . . Because the city policymakers were aware of this 'profile' of typical suicidal detainees and failed to provide even minimal training for all its turnkey officers in how to recognize and respond to the profile, the Third Circuit held that there was sufficient evidence to support the jury's finding of municipal liability. In Gray, the Sixth Circuit reached the opposite conclusion on different facts at the summary judgment stage of the case. . . The Sixth Circuit distinguished Simmons and held that the plaintiff failed to provide evidence that the City of Detroit's policy of inadequate training was the 'moving force' behind the violation of the decedent's constitutional rights. . . 'There was no "profile" that warned officials that plaintiff was a suicide risk [and it was] undisputed that the city produced and disseminated constitutionally adequate policies regarding monitoring for and prevention of suicidal behavior.'. . Of the eight deaths in 'various holding facilities' in eight years, 'only two were suicides, with one occurring in 1998 and 1999.'. . . This case is closer to Simmons than to Gray. First, there is a distinct pattern here. Unlike Gray, the plaintiff has pleaded that '[a]rchaic and outdated communication practices and the inept privatization of mental health services has culminated in disregarding cries for help from pretrial detainees who have repeatedly utilized holes in their bunks and jail-issued bed sheets to attempt and complete suicide.' . . Although the amended complaint does not indicate how many individuals died by hanging themselves from their bunks, it did allege that 22 inmates committed suicide within sixteen years, three of which occurred within two-and-a-half months of Herriges-Love's death. . . Second, unlike in Gray, there is a dispute at the pleading stage over whether CCS 'produced and disseminated constitutionally adequate policies regarding monitoring for and prevention of suicidal behavior.'. . The plaintiff here alleges the exact opposite: '[t]o save time and money, [Correct Care] utilized a computer program which pre-populated Herriges-Love's answers pertaining to his mental health in the negative.'. . The plaintiffs contended this policy was ineffective because (1) 'it failed to require [Herriges-Love]'s intake nurse to ask [Herriges-Love] if he was currently suicidal or planning to commit suicide'; (2) 'it failed to require [Herriges-Love]'s intake nurse to refer [Herriges-Love] to a Qualified Mental Health Professional for a suicide risk assessment;' (3) 'it permitted inexperienced and unqualified employees to ascertain and identify the mental health needs of pretrial detainees;' (4) 'it did not require staff to refer inmates, including [Herriges-Love], to Qualified Mental Health Professionals so long as they were seen by a Qualified Mental Health Professional at some point in the past;' and (5) 'did not require staff to review medical records of inmates, including [Herriges-Love], even though the records were stored electronically in [Correct Care's] computer system.'. . . Finally, unlike in Gray, the plaintiff's decedent did make 'statements that could reasonably be interpreted as threatening to harm himself.'. . Correct Care had access to Herriges-Love's records from 2016, which indicated that he was treated by a psychiatrist 'and was involuntarily committed to a mental institution for three weeks for suicide ideation.'. . And the plaintiff alleged that, on July 14, 2017, Correct Care documented 'that [Herriges-Love] expressed feelings of hopelessness, helplessness, and...that there was nothing to look forward to,' but no one informed a shift commander, no one referred him for a mental health evaluation, and no one placed him on suicide watch."); Plasko v. City of Pottsville, 852 F. Supp. 1258, 1266 (E.D. Pa. 1994) ("[T]o find the City of Pottsville liable for the death of detainee, plaintiff must include in the complaint some allegations indicating that responsible policymakers either deliberately chose not to pursue a policy of securing the personal effects of detainees prior to incarceration or acquiesced in a long-standing policy or custom of inaction in light of a prior pattern of similar incidents."); Herman v. Clearfield County, Pa., 836 F. Supp. 1178, 1188 (W.D. Pa. 1993) ("[A] plaintiff must show that the decedent's rights were violated as a result of a[n] . . . official policy or custom not to train correctional officers, which policy or custom . . . was the product of a conscious decision not to act on a known risk of prison suicides despite the availability of alternatives for preventing such suicides."), aff'd, 30 F.3d 1486 (3d Cir. 1994).

For a recent Third Circuit case involving suicide in a state correctional facility, see Palakovic v. Wetzel, 854 F.3d 209, 224-32 (3d Cir. 2017) ("We clarify today that . . . the vulnerability to suicide framework applies when a plaintiff seeks to hold prison officials accountable for failing to prevent a prison suicide. It does not, however, preclude other types of claims, even if those claims also relate to an individual who committed suicide while in prison. Here, to the extent Brandon could have brought an Eighth Amendment claim contesting his conditions of confinement while he was alive, his family should not be precluded from doing so because he has passed away. We agree with the Palakovics that their original claim need not have to fit within the vulnerability to suicide framework, and the District Court erred in dismissing it solely for that reason. . . . Against this backdrop of the extremely serious and potentially dire consequences of lengthy exposure to the conditions of solitary confinement, we turn to the sufficiency of the Palakovics' claim that prison officials who were aware of his history of mental illness permitted Brandon to be repeatedly exposed to inhumane conditions of confinement and acted with deliberate indifference in doing so. . . .Considering these factual allegations in light of the increasingly obvious reality that extended stays in solitary confinement can cause serious damage to mental health, we view these allegations as more than sufficient to state a plausible claim that Brandon experienced inhumane conditions of confinement to which the prison officials—Wetzel, Cameron, Boyles, Luther, and Harrington—were deliberately indifferent. . . We therefore conclude that the District Court should have allowed this claim to proceed to discovery. . . . Considering these allegations and recognizing the high bar the Palakovics must meet in order to ultimately prevail, we conclude that they have presented allegations sufficient to state a plausible claim warranting discovery: Despite receiving some minimal care, Brandon received mental health treatment while at SCI Cresson that fell below constitutionally adequate standards, and the defendants—both the mental healthcare personnel providing treatment and the supervisory officials and medical corporation responsible for the prison's mental healthcare treatment policies—were deliberately indifferent to Brandon's serious medical needs. Thus, this claim, too, should have survived dismissal. . . .Our statements in Woloszyn and Colburn II requiring a plaintiff to demonstrate a 'strong likelihood' of self-harm were never intended to demand a heightened showing at the pleading stage by demonstrating—as the District Court seemed to require here—that the plaintiff's suicide was temporally imminent or somehow clinically inevitable. A particular individual's vulnerability to suicide must be assessed based on the totality of the facts presented. In our view, the sum of the facts alleged in the amended complaint are more than sufficient to support plausible inferences that there was a 'strong likelihood' that self-inflicted harm would occur, and that Brandon therefore suffered from a particular vulnerability to suicide. . . .Finally, the District Court concluded that the amended complaint failed to adequately plead deliberate indifference on the part of any defendant. In so doing, the District Court erroneously applied a subjective test, examining what the officials 'were actually aware of as opposed to what they should have been aware of.'. . Yet our case law is clear: It is not necessary for the custodian to have a subjective appreciation of the detainee's particular vulnerability. . . Rather, we have held that 'reckless or deliberate indifference to that risk' only demands 'something more culpable on the part of the officials than a negligent failure to recognize the high risk of suicide.'. . After applying the incorrect standard, the District Court then unnecessarily required the Palakovics to demonstrate one of three limited factual circumstances—specifically, where: (1) a defendant took affirmative action directly leading to the suicide; (2) a defendant actually knew of the suicidal tendencies of a particular prisoner and ignored the responsibility to take reasonable precautions; or (3) a defendant failed to take 'necessary and available precautions to protect the prisoner from self-inflicted wounds.'. . . These non-conclusory allegations support an inference that, despite knowing of Brandon's vulnerability and the increased risk of suicide that solitary confinement brings, the defendants disregarded that risk and permitted Brandon to be repeatedly isolated in solitary confinement anyway. That is sufficient to satisfy the plausibility standard and proceed to discovery on the vulnerability to suicide claims as to defendants Harrington, Rathore, Eidsvoog, Boyles, and Luther.")

5. Bryan County v. Brown

In Board of County Commissioners of Bryan County v. Brown, 520 U.S. 397 (1997), the Supreme Court revisited the issue of municipal liability under section 1983 in the context of a single bad hiring decision made by a County Sheriff who was stipulated to be the final policymaker for the County in matters of law enforcement.

Plaintiff was injured when she was forcibly extracted from a vehicle driven by her husband. Mr. Brown was avoiding a police checkpoint and was eventually stopped by a squad car in which Reserve Deputy Burns was riding. Burns removed Mrs. Brown from the vehicle with such force that he caused severe injury to her knees.

Plaintiff sued both Burns and the County under section 1983. A panel of the Fifth Circuit affirmed the district court's entry of judgment on the jury's verdict against Burns for excessive force, false arrest, and false imprisonment. The majority of the panel also affirmed the judgment against the County based on the decision of Sheriff Moore to hire Burns without adequately investigating his background. The Fifth Circuit concluded that Moore's inadequate screening and hiring of Burns demonstrated "deliberate indifference to the public's welfare." Brown v. Bryan County, 67 F.3d 1174, 1185 (5th Cir. 1995), rev'd 520 U.S. 397 (1997).

Burns, the son of Sheriff Moore's nephew, had an extensive "rap sheet," but the numerous violations and arrests included no felonies. State law prohibited the Sheriff's hiring of an individual convicted of a felony, but did not proscribe the hiring of someone like Burns.

The Supreme Court, in a five-four opinion written by Justice O'Connor, reversed the Court of Appeals, distinguishing Brown's case, involving a claim that a single lawful hiring decision ultimately resulted in a constitutional violation, from a case where plaintiff claims that "a particular municipal action itself violates federal law, or directs an employee to do so." 520 U.S. at 404. As the Court noted, its prior cases recognizing municipal liability based on a single act or decision attributed to the government entity involved decisions of local legislative bodies or policymakers that directly effected or ordered someone to effect a constitutional deprivation. See, e.g., Pembaur, discussed infra; Fact Concerts, supra; Owen v. City of Independence, supra. In such cases, there are no real problems with respect to the issues of fault or causation.

See also Looper Maintenance Service, Inc. v. City of Indianapolis, 197 F.3d 908, 913 (7th Cir. 1999) ("Looper's counsel claimed at oral argument that a single act motivated by the intent to deny Looper equal bidding access because of his race could constitute municipal policy within the meaning of 42 U. S.C. § 1983. . . While we agree that this is an accurate statement of the law, it is true only when the act complained of is accomplished by a defendant with final policymaking authority. . . . As previously stated, Looper's third amended complaint names only the City and IPHA as defendants. The City and IPHA are municipal entities, not individuals with final policymaking authority. Accordingly, Looper has failed to allege that any named individual possessed final policymaking authority and that such an individual denied him a constitutional right within the meaning of 42 U.S.C. § 1983."); Bennett v. Pippin, 74 F.3d 578, 586 & n.5 (5th Cir. 1996) (County held liable for Sheriff's rape of murder suspect, where Sheriff was final policymaker in matters of law enforcement); Gonzales v. Westbrook, 118 F. Supp.2d 728, 735 (W.D. Tex. 2000) ("In this circuit, then, a single unconstitutional act by a local governmental entity's final policymaker may subject that governmental entity to liability under section 1983. . . However, that act must reflect an intentional, deliberate, decision by a final policymaker and, where the act or omission of the final policymaker personally did not directly cause the violation of a constitutional right, only decisions of the final municipal policymaker which constitute a conscious disregard for a high risk of unconstitutional conduct by others can give rise to municipal liability."). See also Williams v. Kaufman County, 352 F.3d 994, 1014 n.66 (5th Cir. 2003) ("The district court did not need to determine whether Harris's conduct also amounted to deliberate indifference, because that element must be shown only when there is a claim that the municipality's facially lawful action caused an employee to inflict the injury, not when the municipality (through its policymaker) has directly caused the injury, as has occurred here. Thus, it is unnecessary to examine the deliberate indifference issue to establish liability in this instance.").

Because there was no pattern of "bad hires" alleged by the plaintiff in Brown, the argument for County liability was based on Sheriff Moore's alleged deliberate indifference in failing to investigate Burns' background, on the theory that "Burns' use of excessive force was the plainly obvious consequence of Sheriff Moore's failure to screen Burns' record." 520 U.S. at 409.

The majority, however, rejected plaintiff's effort to analogize her inadequate screening case to a failure-to-train case. Justice O'Connor noted:

In attempting to import the reasoning of Canton into the hiring context, respondent ignores the fact that predicting the consequence of a single hiring decision, even one based on an inadequate assessment of a record, is far more difficult than predicting what might flow from the failure to train a single law enforcement officer as to a specific skill necessary to the discharge of his duties. As our decision in Canton makes clear, 'deliberate indifference' is a stringent standard of fault, requiring proof that a municipal actor disregarded a known or obvious consequence of his action. Unlike the risk from a particular glaring omission in a training regimen, the risk from a single instance of inadequate screening of an applicant's background is not 'obvious' in the abstract; rather, it depends upon the background of the applicant. A lack of scrutiny may increase the likelihood that an unfit officer will be hired, and that the unfit officer will, when placed in a particular position to affect the rights of citizens, act improperly. But that is only a generalized showing of risk. The fact that inadequate scrutiny of an applicant's background would make a violation of rights more likely cannot alone give rise to an inference that a policymaker's failure to scrutinize the record of a particular applicant produced a specific constitutional violation.

Id. at 410, 411.

The majority opinion concluded that

> Only where adequate scrutiny of an applicant's background would lead a reasonable policymaker to conclude that the plainly obvious consequence of the decision to hire the applicant would be the deprivation of a third party's federally protected right can the official's failure to adequately scrutinize the applicant's background constitute 'deliberate indifference.'

Id. at 411.

Thus, the majority insisted on evidence from which a jury could find that had Sheriff Moore adequately screened Deputy Burns' background, he "should have concluded that Burns' use of excessive force would be a plainly obvious consequence of the hiring decision." Id. at 412. In the view of the majority, scrutiny of Burns' record produced insufficient evidence from which a jury could have found that Sheriff Moore's hiring decision reflected deliberate indifference to an obvious risk that Burns would use excessive force. Id. at 415.

Justice Souter, joined by Justices Breyer and Stevens, dissented in Brown, characterizing the majority opinion as an expression of "deep skepticism" that "converts a newly-demanding formulation of the standard of fault into a virtually categorical impossibility of showing it in a case like this." 520 U.S. at 421 (Souter, J., dissenting).

Justice Breyer, joined by Justices Ginsburg and Stevens, authored a dissent that criticizes the "highly complex body of interpretive law" that has developed to maintain and perpetuate the distinction adopted in Monell between direct and vicarious liability, and calls for a reexamination of "the legal soundness of that basic distinction itself." 520 U.S. at 430. See also Pinter v. City of New York, 976 F.Supp.2d 539, 551 n.23 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) ("Pinter correctly notes that questions have been raised about the accuracy of Monell's analysis of Section 1983. . . . If it were within the province of a federal district court to question Supreme Court precedent based on indications of dissension, I might be inclined to do so in this case. But this Court's task is to apply Supreme Court and Second Circuit law as it stands. As a result, I am constrained to apply Monell and its progeny, although I add my voice to the chorus of those who would encourage the Supreme Court to revisit Monell's analysis.")

Compare Kovalchuk v. City of Decherd, Tennessee, 95 F.4th 1035, 1038-42 (6th Cir. 2024) ("At issue here is the district court's dismissal of three Monell claims: (1) failure to train, (2) failure to supervise, and (3) failure to screen. At oral argument, however, Kovalchuk's lawyer conceded that the complaint was deficient on all counts . . . . These concessions aside, because Kovalchuk's appeal and oral argument focused mainly on his failure-to-screen claim, we highlight further why this claim was not plausibly pleaded. For such a claim, a plaintiff must plead sufficient facts supporting the conclusion 'that a municipal [hiring] decision reflects deliberate indifference to the risk that a violation of a particular constitutional or statutory right will follow the decision.'. . Unlike failure-to-train claims, which typically involve a pattern of unconstitutional conduct to establish deliberate indifference, . . . failure-to-screen claims usually rest—as Kovalchuk's does here—on a single hiring decision[.] For a 'single hiring decision' by a municipal decisionmaker that resulted in a constitutional violation, which 'can be a "policy" that triggers municipal liability,' there exists a 'particular danger that a municipality will be held liable for an injury not directly caused by a deliberate action attributable to the municipality itself.'. .To mitigate this danger, the Supreme Court in Brown set forth a stringent test: 'To prevent municipal liability for a hiring decision from collapsing into respondeat superior liability,' the plaintiff alleging failure to screen must show that the decisionmaker was deliberately indifferent to the 'known or obvious consequence' of the hiring decision and that the link between the applicant's background and the specific constitutional violation was sufficiently strong. . . Simply choosing not to inquire into an applicant's background does not amount to deliberate indifference. . . 'Only where adequate scrutiny of an applicant's background would lead a reasonable policymaker to conclude that the plainly obvious consequence of the decision to hire the applicant would be the deprivation of a third party's federally protected right can the official's failure to adequately scrutinize the applicant's background constitute "deliberate indifference."'. . As for the causation element of deliberate indifference, establishing that a hiring decision would likely result in any constitutional injury is insufficient to impose municipal liability. . . Instead, the plaintiff must show that 'this officer was highly likely to inflict the particular injury suffered by the plaintiff.'. . . Similar to Brown, the central question here is whether Chief Peterson's failure to adequately screen Ward's background was the moving force behind Ward's unconstitutional misconduct, and, as a result, Kovalchuk's injury. . . According to the complaint, Chief Peterson, acting as 'the final policymaker for the Decherd Police Department' and 'as an agent for the City of Decherd,' made the 'deliberate choice to hire and retain' Ward even though he 'should have known' that Ward was 'unfit to be a police officer and to possess a deadly service weapon.' Chief Peterson 'ordered' his investigator not to consult Ward's background, which would have revealed that Ward's previous employer, the Fort Walton Beach Police Department, asked him to resign due to 'concerns about his demeanor and professionalism,' that Ward had failed to complete a training program at this previous employer, and that Ward had 'issues' during his employment with another police department in Alabama. These ambiguous allegations, which merely allude to negligent hiring by the City, do not establish the necessary causal link for Kovalchuk's deliberate-indifference claim. Kovalchuk was required to plead facts plausibly alleging that a 'known or obvious consequence' of the hiring decision was that 'this officer' (Ward) 'was highly likely to inflict the particular injury suffered by the plaintiff' (being held at gunpoint following an unconstitutional stop). . . Allegations of 'issues,' 'concerns about [Ward's] demeanor and professionalism,' and his 'fail[ure] to complete [a] training program' fall short of plausibly linking the danger of hiring Ward to Kovalchuk being held at gunpoint by Ward following an unconstitutional stop. . . More specifically, the mere fact that Ward may have been likely—even exceedingly likely—to commit unconstitutional conduct in general would not have put the City on notice that Ward would commit the 'specific constitutional violation' here. . . The same can be said regarding Ward's predisposition to violence—that alone is insufficient under Brown. Based simply on the broad allegations in the complaint, Kovalchuk's failure-to-screen claim is not plausible. The district court did not err in dismissing this claim. Kovalchuk contends that discovery would reveal more specific information on Ward's background, and in turn, that he was highly likely to engage in the particular conduct at issue. But a plaintiff cannot use discovery to bridge the gap between a deficient pleading and the possibility that a claim might survive upon further investigation. . . Put simply, a plaintiff is "not entitled to discovery" to determine whether a claim can survive past the pleading stage. . . Kovalchuk cannot rely on speculation about what may be learned during discovery to defeat the City's motion to dismiss. . . Ward's conduct here was egregious, and he undeniably victimized Kovalchuk. No citizen should ever have to face being unconstitutionally seized, let alone by an off-duty police officer who brandishes a firearm in an apparent incident of road rage. While we are sympathetic to Kovalchuk's plight, the pitfall in his case is his attempt to hold the City liable for Ward's misconduct. Ward's unconstitutional actions are not automatically attributable to the City, even if the City negligently hired Ward. To find otherwise would require us to contradict Supreme Court precedent by permitting the City to potentially be liable for its employee's actions via respondeat superior. . . And while adequately pleading a municipal liability claim without the benefit of discovery may be difficult, that task is hardly new. . . Perhaps Kovalchuk could have moved to file an amended complaint after further investigating his claims or in response to the City's motion to dismiss. But he did not, and we must analyze the allegations in the complaint before us, which deficiently pleaded a failure-to-screen claim.") with Kovalchuk v. City of Decherd, Tennessee, 95 F.4th 1035, 1042-47 (6th Cir. 2024) (Clay, J., dissenting) ("When hiring former police officer Mathew Ward, the City of Decherd (the "City") refused to review, or even consider, Ward's alarming history of employment infractions and job-hopping as a police officer. In fact, the City deliberately ordered that Ward's background should not be investigated and, in the same breath, entrusted Ward with the unbridled authority that accompanies a police badge and gun. Unsurprisingly, Ward subsequently used excessive force to unlawfully abuse, intimidate, and seize an innocent man, Plaintiff Ilya Kovalchuk. But when Kovalchuk turned to the federal courts for recourse, he did not see his constitutional rights vindicated. Instead, his claims were prematurely dismissed before they could even get through the gate—an error that the majority affirms today, effectively foreclosing the future consideration of municipal liability claims based on the failure to screen a police applicant's background. Because I would allow Kovalchuk's failure-to-screen allegations to proceed, I respectfully dissent. . . . Instead of viewing these failure-to-screen allegations in the light most favorable to Kovalchuk, the majority jumps to premature conclusions regarding the City's ultimate liability, before affording Kovalchuk the opportunity to gather additional evidence to prove his claims. In doing so, the majority requires § 1983 litigants to surmount a nearly impossible hurdle to survive the early 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss stage. . . . Kovalchuk's strongest claim against the City focuses on Chief Peterson's explicit command that his subordinates refrain from investigating Ward's background or employment history during the hiring process. . . Although under Monell the City cannot be held vicariously liable for Ward's unconstitutional actions, Kovalchuk's complaint alleges more—that the City's deliberately skeletal screening process in hiring Ward led to Kovalchuk's injuries. . . These allegations meet the necessary fault and causation standards to plausibly warrant imposing municipal liability, mandating that Kovalchuk's claims should be allowed to proceed. Indeed, the Supreme Court expressly opened the door to the possibility that a municipality may be liable for failing to adequately screen if 'a full review of [Ward's] record reveals that [his unconstitutional arrest] would be a plainly obvious consequence of the hiring decision.'. . In the context of a hiring decision, Brown articulates that an eventual finding of municipal liability originates from allegations that a cover-to-cover background check would indicate 'that this officer was highly likely to inflict the particular injury suffered by the plaintiff.'. . Contrary to the majority's premature conclusion that Kovalchuk has not 'establish[ed]' this causation standard, . . . Kovalchuk's allegations regarding the City's deliberate dereliction of its investigative duties prior to hiring Ward permits the 'reasonable inference' that the City was the moving force behind Kovalchuk's injuries. . . . The gravity of Chief Peterson's—and by extension, the City's . . . deliberate choice cannot be overstated. Without so much as a call to either former police department employer, the City entrusted Ward with a police badge and a gun, imbued with the implicit authority to decide life or death of citizens. By rewarding the City's 'head in the sand' strategy, the majority insulates the City from turning over a single piece of discovery, thereby endorsing and perpetuating the cyclical hiring of predatory police officers. The majority's approach permits those 'wandering' police officers who are fired or forced to resign under threat of termination to nonetheless seek employment in nearby jurisdictions. . . Even further, this misguided immunization of police hiring practices from liability strips away the City's incentive to competently hire police officers, which should be viewed as particularly imperative for employment that is accompanied by state power and the authority to wield deadly weapons. As Kovalchuk's complaint alleges, Ward burned through two different police departments prior to being hired by the Decherd Police Department. In the face of clear red flags, Chief Peterson ordered his subordinate to cease further background investigation of Ward and avoid finding out any additional information about him. And then, incomprehensibly, the City seeks to skirt its responsibility by subsequently purporting to be surprised that the unvetted 'wandering officer' later brutalized an innocent citizen. . . . Contrary to the majority's misplaced fear regarding the City's liability if we were to reverse the district court's decision, . . . Kovalchuk's plausible allegations should be permitted to move forward. Doing so at this stage of the litigation does not hold a municipality 'liable' for any action. . . Instead, allowing these allegations to proceed to the discovery phase simply affords often-vulnerable plaintiffs the opportunity to attempt to prove their civil rights claims in federal court, a forum historically relied upon for relief from governmental abuse. . . Rather than the conclusive 'smoking gun' evidence that the majority requires, the proper standard requires allegations that only 'nudge[ ] [Kovalchuk's] claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.'. . Kovalchuk has met that burden in this case. Accordingly, the district court erred in dismissing Plaintiff's claims against the City based on a failure-to-screen theory of Monell liability. And the majority, in affirming the district court, improperly raises the plausibility bar presented in Twombly and Iqbal—to the detriment of present and future civil rights plaintiffs. I therefore respectfully dissent.")

6. Connick v. Thompson

Connick v. Thompson, 131 S. Ct. 1350, 1361-63, 1366 (2011) ("Failure to train prosecutors in their Brady obligations does not fall within the narrow range of Canton's hypothesized single-incident liability. The obvious need for specific legal training that was present in the Canton scenario is absent here. . . . Attorneys are trained in the law and equipped with the tools to interpret and apply legal principles, understand constitutional limits, and exercise legal judgment. . . . In light of this regime of legal training and professional responsibility, recurring constitutional violations are not the 'obvious consequence' of failing to provide prosecutors with formal in-house training about how to obey the law. Bryan Cty., 520 U.S., at 409. Prosecutors are not only equipped but are also ethically bound to know what Brady entails and to perform legal research when they are uncertain. A district attorney is entitled to rely on prosecutors' professional training and ethical obligations in the absence of specific reason, such as a pattern of violations, to believe that those tools are insufficient to prevent future constitutional violations in 'the usual and recurring situations with which [the prosecutors] must deal.'. . A licensed attorney making legal judgments, in his capacity as a prosecutor, about Brady material simply does not present the same 'highly predictable' constitutional danger as Canton's untrained officer. . . . A second significant difference between this case and the example in Canton is the nuance of the allegedly necessary training. The Canton hypothetical assumes that the armed police officers have no knowledge at all of the constitutional limits on the use of deadly force. But it is undisputed here that the prosecutors in Connick's office were familiar with the general Brady rule. Thompson's complaint therefore cannot rely on the utter lack of an ability to cope with constitutional situations that underlies the Canton hypothetical, but rather must assert that prosecutors were not trained about particular Brady evidence or the specific scenario related to the violation in his case. That sort of nuance simply cannot support an inference of deliberate indifference here. . . . We conclude that this case does not fall within the narrow range of "single-incident" liability hypothesized in Canton as a possible exception to the pattern of violations necessary to prove deliberate indifference in § 1983 actions alleging failure to train. The District Court should have granted Connick judgment as a matter of law on the failure-to-train claim because Thompson did not prove a pattern of similar violations that would 'establish that the "policy of inaction" [was] the functional equivalent of a decision by the city itself to violate the Constitution.'")

Connick v. Thompson, 131 S. Ct. 1350, 1381-84 (2011) (Ginsburg, J., joined by Breyer, Sotomayor, and Kagan, JJ., dissenting) ("In sum, the evidence permitted the jury to reach the following conclusions. First, Connick did not ensure that prosecutors in his Office knew their Brady obligations; he neither confirmed their familiarity with Brady when he hired them, nor saw to it that training took place on his watch. Second, the need for Brady training and monitoring was obvious to Connick. Indeed he so testified. Third, Connick's cavalier approach to his staff's knowledge and observation of Brady requirements contributed to a culture of inattention to Brady in Orleans Parish. . . . In Canton, this Court spoke of circumstances in which the need for training may be 'so obvious,' and the lack of training 'so likely' to result in constitutional violations, that policymakers who do not provide for the requisite training 'can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need' for such training. . . This case, I am convinced, belongs in the category Canton marked out. . . . In sum, despite Justice Scalia's protestations to the contrary, . . . the Brady violations in Thompson's prosecutions were not singular and they were not aberrational. They were just what one would expect given the attitude toward Brady pervasive in the District Attorney's Office. Thompson demonstrated that no fewer than five prosecutors–the four trial prosecutors and Riehlmann–disregarded his Brady rights. He established that they kept from him, year upon year, evidence vital to his defense. Their conduct, he showed with equal force, was a foreseeable consequence of lax training in, and absence of monitoring of, a legal requirement fundamental to a fair trial.").

See also Truvia v. Connick, 577 F. App'x 317, 324 (5th Cir. 2014) ("To prove that Connick's office was deliberately indifferent to the need to train prosecutors on Brady requirements, Appellants contend that various Orleans Parish prosecutors committed multiple Brady violations in other cases, and the DA office did not have a policy to ensure assistant district attorneys immediately obtained witness statements from police in every case. None of this evidence shows that Connick's office was deliberately indifferent to a need for Brady training before Appellants' criminal trial in 1976. First, the Brady 'violations' Appellants refer to are not proven Brady violations; instead, they are the same discovery requests made by counsel in other, unrelated cases to which the prosecutors responded by denying possession of Brady material. This evidence, as previously discussed, fails to show actual Brady violations, much less an unconstitutional pattern or policy. Second, Appellants' citations to over a dozen federal and state cases to show a 'continuum' of Brady violations are not probative because the vast majority of them occurred after Appellants were convicted in July 1976. The two cases that predated July 1976 . . . surely did not convey the requisite notice under a failure-to-train theory. See Thompson, 131 S.Ct. at 1360 (holding that not even "four reversals could ... have put Connick on notice that the office's Brady training was inadequate") (emphasis added). Third, Appellants have not provided any authority to support their assertion that the DA office was required, above and beyond Brady, to have a policy for obtaining all witness statements from police files. Because Appellants have not shown that Connick was on actual or constructive notice of the necessity of Brady training for the office's attorneys prior to their convictions, the district court correctly held that that Connick is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.")

But see Smith v. Connick, No. 13–52, 2014 WL 585616, *3-*5 (E.D. La. Feb. 14, 2014) ("In Connick v. Thompson, 131 S.Ct. 1350 (2011), a case remarkably similar to the instant matter, the Supreme Court applied the Monell framework to a district attorney's failure train assistant district attorneys in the requirements of Brady. There, the plaintiff was a former death row inmate who spent eighteen years in prison after prosecutors in the Orleans Parish District Attorney's Office (the same office as Defendants here) failed to turn over exculpatory blood evidence in violation of Brady. . .Thompson sued, alleging that the Brady violation was caused by unconstitutional policies at the office, and District Attorney Connick's failure to train the prosecutors in his office to avoid such constitutional violations. . . Thompson won a jury verdict in his favor, but the Supreme Court reversed. . . The Court held that Thompson failed 'to show that Connick was on notice that, absent additional specified training, it was "highly predictable" that the prosecutors in his office would' violate Brady. . . Defendants' Motion to Dismiss recognizes that Connick permits suits against prosecutors for failure to train, or for administration of unconstitutional policies. Likely for this reason, Defendants have not asked the Court to dismiss Plaintiff's official capacity counts, but instead only asks that the Court limit these counts 'to the narrow dictates of Connick v. Thompson.'. . The Court agrees that Connick contains the relevant analysis for official capacity suits against municipal prosecutors for failure to train. If Plaintiff wishes to pursue these claims, he must allege facts 'to show that [Defendants were] on notice that, absent additional specified training, it was "highly predictable" that the prosecutors in [the] office would' violate Brady. . . He has failed to do so at this time. Based on the Complaint before the Court, there is reason to believe that Plaintiff's allegations are more likely to satisfy the requirements for official capacity suits under § 1983 than those alleged in Connick. Chiefly, Connick dealt with the sharing of exculpatory blood evidence. The Supreme Court remarked in its review of the case that Thompson's claim that Connick was on notice of Brady violations in the past was inadequate to put him on notice of potential abuses in the future because '[n]one of those [prior] cases involved failure to disclose blood evidence, a crime lab report, or physical or scientific evidence of any kind.'. . Therefore, Connick could not have been said to be on notice that specific training was necessary to avoid the particular Constitutional violation that occurred. . . Here, the violation of Brady concerned the sharing of exculpatory statements. It is undisputed that Defendants were aware of prior Brady violations regarding exculpatory statements in Defendants' office. Plaintiff was arrested in 1995. Prior to that time, at least six appellate decisions had issued overturing convictions based on the failure of Defendants' office to turn over exculpatory or impeachment statements. [collecting cases] For this reason alone, Plaintiff presents a case distinguishable from the Supreme Court's decision in Connick. However, even that difference being apparent, Plaintiff still must tailor his Complaint to the dictates of Supreme Court precedent. Because the Complaint, as it exists, does not apply the Connick framework, the Court dismisses it without prejudice to reurge. Plaintiff will be given twenty-days from entry of this opinion to amend his complaint in conformance with Connick. Specifically, he must allege facts 'to show that [Defendants were] on notice that, absent additional specified training, it was "highly predictable" that the prosecutors in [the] office would' violate Brady.").

Compare Livermore v. Arnold, No. 10-507-B-M2, 2011 WL 693569, at *5-*7 & n.11 (M.D. La. Jan. 20, 2011) ("Considering that the only way to impose Section 1983 liability against a District Attorney's office is pursuant to a Monell custom/policy claim and that the plaintiff's claims against Perrilloux and Peever, in their official capacities, are to be treated as claims against the District Attorney's office, the only remaining Section 1983 claim for the undersigned to consider is plaintiff's Monell custom/policy claim against the DA's office (i.e., the plaintiff's claim that Perrilloux, as the final policymaker for the D.A.'s office, has implemented an unconstitutional policy of prosecuting all misdemeanor charges without investigation and regardless of whether they have merit). . . . The Western District of Louisiana, in Johnson, faced the precise issue before the Court herein relative to Perrilloux's official capacity liability − whether the Supreme Court's holding in Van de Kamp concerning failure to supervise and train claims mandates the dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint insofar as it asserts a Monell claim against the District Attorney's Office (i.e., against the district attorney in his official capacity). . . . Perrilloux argues that the plaintiffs have failed to state a claim against him in his official capacity because he is entitled to absolute immunity under an extension of Imbler's and Van de Kamp's policies to official capacity claims. However, as with the DA defendants in Johnson, he is unable to point to any cases from a superior court in which a Monell claim against a District Attorney's office has been expressly dismissed on the basis of absolute immunity. . . . This Court also recognizes the uncertainty created by Van de Kamp and the debate over whether municipal liability under Section 1983 is consistent with the doctrine of absolute immunity but agrees with the Western District of Louisiana that there is no binding authority from a superior court holding that the doctrine of absolute immunity applies to Monell claims and that it is inappropriate to speculate as to whether the doctrine will ultimately be expanded beyond its present scope to official capacity claims. Accordingly, because of the lack of any binding authority supporting the argument that Perrilloux is entitled to absolute immunity concerning the plaintiffs' official capacity Monell claim, the plaintiffs may proceed against him on that claim to the extent they have otherwise stated a claim upon which relief may be granted under Monell. . . . What plaintiffs' claim boils down to is an allegation that the District Attorney's Office has a policy of prosecuting all misdemeanors without first investigating them to determine whether they have merit. Thus, the constitutional violation alleged is a failure to investigate prior to initiating and proceeding with misdemeanor prosecutions. The Fifth Circuit has specifically recognized that a claim 'that [a] prosecutor failed to investigate is not of constitutional dimension' because '[t]here is no such due process right.'. . Thus, even though Perrilloux is not entitled to absolute immunity with respect to plaintiffs' Monell claim, such claim should nevertheless be dismissed for failure to state a claim pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6). . . . [E]ven if plaintiffs' Monell claim was not subject to dismissal because of the failure to allege a constitutional violation, it would also be subject to dismissal because the plaintiff has failed to specifically allege a pattern of constitutional violations caused by the alleged general policy (such as any other cases where misdemeanors were prosecuted by the 21st Judicial District D.A.'s office without investigating whether the charges had merit), as required when proceeding under a policymaker theory of liability."); Gearin v. Rabbett, No. 10-CV-2227 (PJS/AJB), 2011 WL 317728, at *7, *8 & n.8 (D. Minn. Jan. 28, 2011) ("Although the Eighth Circuit does not appear to have addressed the question of whether a prosecutor's immunity from § 1983 claims extends to municipalities, . . . the Eighth Circuit has held that defendants who were functionally similar to prosecutors and judges did not enjoy absolute immunity from claims brought against them in their official capacities. . . There is thus substantial authority for the proposition that prosecutorial immunity does not extend to municipalities. The contrary decisions cited by the City − four district-court cases from the 1980s − are not persuasive. Notably, two of those four decisions are from New York federal district courts and thus were overruled by the Second Circuit's decision in Pinaud v. County of Suffolk, 52 F.3d 1139 (2d Cir.1995). The Court therefore concludes that Kantrud's immunity does not extend to the City. . . . [T]he Eighth Circuit has held that, when a plaintiff attempts to pin Pembaur-type liability on a municipality by arguing that the prosecutor is a policymaker, the prosecutor's immunity also shields the municipality. Patterson v. Von Riesen, 999 F.2d 1235, 1238 n. 2 (8th Cir.1993) ("Because of the prosecutors' absolute immunity, Patterson cannot attach liability to the decision in question, and, thus, even if the policy was county policy, Patterson still may not recover damages.") . . . . [T]he Court reads Patterson to hold only that a plaintiff cannot state a Monell claim by alleging that a prosecutor was acting as a policymaker when performing functions protected by absolute prosecutorial immunity."); Johnson v. Louisiana, No. 09-55, 2010 WL 996475, at *11, *12 (W.D. La. Mar. 16, 2010) ("The parties join issue on whether the Supreme Court's holding in Van de Kamp mandates the dismissal of Johnson's complaint insofar as it asserts a Monell claim against the District Attorney's Office. The District Attorney's Office concedes that the Supreme Court addressed only the individual capacity claims asserted by the plaintiff in Van de Kamp, but argues no distinction should be made and that the Supreme Court's ruling in Van de Kamp mandates dismissal of Johnson's Monell claims. . . . The Court's conclusion that absolute immunity does not extend to Monell claims is supported by the exacting requirements a plaintiff must establish in order to recover for a claim based on the policymaker's failure to take affirmative action . . . . Absent a pattern of similar constitutional deprivations, a plaintiff will prevail only where the need for training or other affirmative action 'is so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the [District Attorney's Office] can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.'. . A need for training or other affirmative action 'is considered sufficiently obvious only where the deprivation of constitutional rights is a 'highly predictable consequence' of the training deficiency.'. . . Accordingly, the Court finds that District Attorney Davis and District Attorney Burkett are not cloaked with the protection of absolute immunity insofar as Johnson asserts claims against them in their official capacity − claims which must be treated as Monell claims against the District Attorney's Office itself.") with Hatchett v. City of Detroit, 714 F.Supp.2d 708, 726 & n.6 (E.D. Mich. 2010) ("The court is unaware of any binding authority extending a municipality's training duty to professionally educated and degreed employees, such as prosecutors. . . As Justice O'Connor indicated, a municipality's duty to train arises in two circumstances. The first arises when (1) a clear constitutional duty governs particular employees (e.g., police officers) who are likely to face a certain situation and be called upon to act in a certain way (e.g., using deadly force while attempting to apprehend a fleeing felon), and (2) 'it is ... clear that failure to inform [them] of that duty will create an extremely high risk that constitutional violations will ensue.'. . It is the second of these two requirements that is absent in the case of professionally educated employees − particularly prosecutors, who at the time they are hired presumably are already aware of their constitutional duties by virtue of the fact that they have graduated from law school and passed the bar examination. A municipality need not train prosecutors about that which they already know, including their duties under Brady. . . . An exception might well exist if the municipality were aware that its prosecutors have repeatedly violated citizens' rights under Brady. In this event, a duty to train (or, more aptly, to retrain) could arise under the second circumstance identified by Justice O'Connor − namely, where there is a 'pattern of constitutional violations.'. . Plaintiff does not allege the existence of any such pattern of Brady violations in Macomb County.").

See also Dock v. State of Nevada, No. 2:10-cv-00275-RCJ-LRL, 2010 WL 5441642, at *5 (D. Nev. Dec. 28, 2010) ("The question remains whether immunity should stretch so far as to immunize a municipality itself for its alleged deliberate indifference in failing to train an assistant of the courts, such as a child protective services worker, simply because the latter enjoys immunity for the alleged unconstitutional acts. The Court finds that it does. Last year, the Supreme Court unanimously reversed the Ninth Circuit in holding that a district attorney's office enjoys absolute immunity against failure-to-train claims arising out of one of its attorney's prosecution-related actions. See Van de Ramp v. Goldstein, 129 S. Ct. 855, 862 (2009). The Van de Kamp Court noted that with respect to prosecution-related actions, an office's 'general methods of supervision and training' are not distinguishable from direct supervisory decisions. . .This is a commonsense ruling. If the rule were otherwise, a plaintiff could easily circumvent the immunity doctrines by suing a municipality directly and arguing it 'failed to train' the judge and/or prosecutor. The same reasoning applies to a child protective services worker acting in her investigative capacity. The Court therefore grants the motion to dismiss as to the second cause of action.")

See also Nazir v. County of Los Angeles, No. CV 10-06546 SVW ("GRx), 2011 WL 819081, at *8 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 2, 2011) ("Under Weiner, this Court joins the reasoning of the courts in Goldstein and Neri in concluding that the DA's Office in this case was a state actor when creating a procedure to place police officers on 'Brady Lists.' As discussed in Goldstein, Weiner extends to decisions on how to proceed with a prosecution. Furthermore, as discussed in Neri, evaluating a witness's credibility, determining what constitutes 'Brady Material,' and decisions on whether to use a police officer as a witness in the future, are prosecutorial functions. . . Having found that the alleged policymaker, the DA's Office, was a state actor in implementing the allegedly unconstitutional procedure, the Court holds that Plaintiff's allegations against the DA's Office are alleged against the state and are barred by Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . Further, as the state is the relevant actor, the County cannot be held liable for the allegedly unconstitutional procedures. . . Thus, the County's Motion is GRANTED and the County and the DA's Office, as entities, are DISMISSED WITH PREJUDICE."); Neri v. County of Stanislaus Dist. Attorney's Office, No. 1:10-CV-823 AWI GSA, 2010 WL 3582575, at *8 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 10, 2010) ("Placing Neri's name on a Brady List, disclosing what the district attorneys considered to be Brady Material, and not utilizing objective criteria for Brady List determinations is conduct that requires witness evaluation, involves obligations imposed pursuant to the Supreme Court (Brady v. Maryland), requires the application of legal knowledge, and is associated with the judicial phase of the criminal process. . . As such, the acts of placing Neri's name on a Brady List and disclosing Brady Materials were acts done in a prosecutorial capacity; thus, the acts were done by those who were the agents of the State of California. . . The DAO, and the district attorneys who actually performed the conduct, are entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . Further, because the conduct at issue was on behalf of the State and not the County, no viable claims are alleged against the County.").

7. Post-Brown and Post-Connick Cases

Compare Verastique v. City of Dallas, Texas, 106 F.4th 427, 431-34 (5th Cir. 2024) ("On appeal, plaintiffs challenge only the dismissal of their Monell claims against the City. . . Those allege that the City is liable for constitutional violations resulting from its (A) failing adequately to discipline its police officers and (B) promulgating General Order 609.00, an official—but allegedly facially unconstitutional—policy relating to mass arrests. . . . Though the complaint lists nineteen incidents involving one officer, those incidents do not constitute 'any pattern of conduct—much less a pattern of similar violations.'. . Most are conclusory and devoid of critical factual enhancement. What scant factual details plaintiffs provide affirmatively proves that all nineteen incidents are wholly inapposite to the case at hand. . . . All nineteen incidents described in the complaint lack 'similarity and specificity' and do not 'point to the specific violation in question.' Edwards v. City of Balch Springs, 70 F.4th 302, 313 (5th Cir. 2023) (cleaned up). Therefore, they cannot plausibly establish a pattern of constitutional violations. The district court correctly dismissed plaintiffs' Monell claims premised on the City's failing adequately to discipline its officers. . . . Assume, arguendo, that all nineteen incidents listed in the complaint are sufficiently specific and similar. Even so, plaintiffs' failure-to-discipline claim still fails on an alternate ground. Nothing in their complaint suggests that it was 'obvious that "the highly predictable consequence" of not supervising its officers was that they "would apply force in such a way that the Fourth Amendment rights of [citizens] were at risk."'. . .The complaint includes insufficiently numerous incidents to create a pattern capable of providing constructive notice. It took twenty-three years to amass the nineteen incidents mentioned in the complaint. Plaintiffs posit that the protracted time span works in their favor. In their view, the fact that the incidents occurred over two decades further evinces a consistent pattern of failed discipline. Incorrect. . . . Nineteen allegations over the span of twenty-three years yields a mere annualized incident rate of 0.826. In other words: Plaintiffs—at most—show that, for over two decades, Rudloff, on average, received fewer than one accusation of misconduct per year. Further cutting against plaintiffs' claim of a consistent pattern of failed discipline are the factors our caselaw has identified as 'relevant to determining whether a series of incidents can be called a pattern[.]'. . Those factors—such as department size and number of arrests—provide the context necessary to evaluate whether an alleged department-wide pattern is so obvious as to impart constructive notice. . . .Accordingly, depending on context, an identical number of incidents can strongly support—or render 'truly uncompelling'—an inference of a pattern of illegality. . . . Plaintiffs have no clue whether nineteen incidents over twenty-three years is sufficiently frequent to be obvious in the context of DPD. So, though they purport to discover a pervasive pattern of failure to discipline, in reality they have alleged nothing at all. Had plaintiffs taken a more reasoned approach, they would have acknowledged that DPD employs 3,200 to 3,300 officers and serves one of the largest cities in the nation. . . . Nineteen incidents over twenty-three years does not support any inference of a department-wide pattern of illegality. . . In sum, the nineteen incidents are not sufficiently similar, specific, or numerous. Therefore, the district court correctly dismissed plaintiffs' failure-to-discipline claim.") with Verastique v. City of Dallas, Texas, 106 F.4th 427, 436-41 (5th Cir. 2024) (Graves, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The plaintiffs allege a long-running pattern of violent misdeeds—a total of nineteen incidents—by a Dallas police officer. They argue that Dallas policymakers should have known about the officer's violent history and disciplined him accordingly. Thus, they argue, the city is liable for the officer's attack on them at a protest against police brutality following the murder of George Floyd. According to the majority, the plaintiffs' claims against the city fail. They fail because even if the officer did violently attack them, he did not beat them with his nightstick, or beat them with his flashlight, or beat them while they were intoxicated, or choke them, or shoot at them while they were driving a car. That is, he did not do to them what he allegedly did to others. Thus, the majority says, the city could not expect that he presented a risk of further harm to the community. I concur in the majority's conclusion that the plaintiffs' claim based on General Order 609.00 is foreclosed by Edwards v. City of Balch Springs, 70 F.4th 302 (5th Cir. 2023). But the majority's disposition of the plaintiffs' failure to discipline claim is not supported by the facts or the law. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent from that part of the majority's opinion. . . . The substance of the plaintiffs' allegations is this: Officers, principally Rudloff, responded to the plaintiffs' compliance with their orders by assaulting or shooting them. And Rudloff's actions were only the latest instance in his long and conspicuous history of subjecting Dallas residents to brutal uses of force. . . . The pleading standard for deliberate indifference cases is no higher than it is for other cases. . . When that usual standard applies, we require only enough details to make the plaintiff's basic claims plausible, not to affirmatively prove them. . . Yet the plaintiffs' allegations of Rudloff's past actions are not specific enough, the majority says, because the allegations do not affirmatively state whether Rudloff's actions were justified. Maybe his victims threatened him first, the majority speculates, or maybe they were resisting arrest. That analysis is wrong. We are supposed to make inferences in the plaintiffs' favor, not speculate about how the defendants might overcome their allegations. . . The reasonable inference here is there is no justification for an officer to beat a man with a flashlight just because he wanted to 'beat n—s in the head,' or to beat another man so badly as to require stitches and then lie about it, or to slam a person's head into the ground while making an intoxication arrest. Yet at every turn, the majority sews doubt into well-pled allegations by alternately assuming Rudloff's actions were provoked or that they can be chalked up to 'deficient performance or bad judgment.' If that is true, the city may prove it at summary judgment or trial. Until then, the plaintiffs need only allege that Rudloff's history of violence, which the complaint describes as 'use[s] of excessive force' and 'allegations upon allegations of constitutional violations,' put the city on notice of a serious problem. They have done so. . . .Next, the majority concludes that the plaintiffs' allegations about Rudloff's past acts are not similar enough to his actions here to constitute a pattern that would have put the city on notice. As the majority writes, past violations must be 'similar' to constitute an actionable pattern. . .The complaint satisfies that standard as well. The plaintiffs allege that Rudloff committed years of aggressive, unnecessary, and unjustified violence against members of the community. Their own experiences are just the latest examples. Moreover, if the allegations are true, they raise serious questions about why Rudloff was allowed to continue patrolling the streets. Yet the majority discounts those egregious allegations because they did not specifically involve less-than-lethal projectiles or did not 'occur[ ] in the context of a large-scale, multi-day, city-wide riot.' Alternatively, the plaintiffs were not intoxicated, were not beaten with a nightstick, and were not choked. Our cases simply do not support that punctilious approach. Past violations must be 'similar'; they need not be identical. In Connick, plaintiffs brought a claim based on a prosecutor's failure to disclose a crime lab report. . . The Supreme Court implied that a pattern of failure to disclose 'physical or scientific evidence of any kind' would have been sufficient to show deliberate indifference. . .The plaintiffs' allegations demand a conclusion quite the opposite of the majority's. Because Rudloff's alleged unconstitutional actions were not limited to a single context, or a single means of violence, they show a propensity to use excessive force in any context, by any method. . . . The plaintiffs point to nineteen complaints of excessive force against a single officer. When one officer is the problem, the city is not faced with a scattering of bad apples across a large police force. And indeed, there are allegations here that the department knew about Rudloff's violations. In short, Peterson does not support the majority's analysis. . . .I would conclude that the plaintiffs plausibly pled that the city failed to discipline Rudloff for repeated use of excessive force, that its failure constituted deliberate indifference to a risk of further harm, and that such failure was the moving force in the plaintiffs' injuries. I respectfully dissent from that part of the majority's opinion.")

Compare Taylor v. Hughes, 26 F.4th 419, 435-37 (7th Cir. 2022) ("Monell liability may attach in two limited sets of circumstances. First, if an express municipal policy or 'affirmative municipal action is itself unconstitutional,' a Monell plaintiff has a 'straightforward' path to holding the municipality accountable. . . In such cases, a single instance of a constitutional violation caused by the policy suffices to establish municipal liability. . .The second path to Monell liability runs not through an expressly unconstitutional policy, but instead through 'gaps in express policies' or through 'widespread practices that are not tethered to a particular written policy'—situations in which a municipality has knowingly acquiesced in an unconstitutional result of what its express policies have left unsaid. . . Plaintiffs seeking to impose municipal liability on a theory of municipal inaction must typically point to evidence of 'a prior pattern of similar constitutional violations.'. . This heightened evidentiary burden helps ensure that 'there is a true municipal policy at issue, not a random event,'. . . to comport with Monell's holding that 'a municipality cannot be held liable under § 1983 on a respondeat superior theory.'. . To be sure, there exists a narrow exception to the requirement of evidence of prior violations for the 'rare' case in which 'the unconstitutional consequences' of municipal inaction are 'so patently obvious that a city could be liable under § 1983 without proof of a pre-existing pattern of violations.'. . Such cases are ones where 'a violation of federal rights [is] a highly predictable consequence' of a municipality's failure to act. . . Taylor invokes both theories of Monell liability. He argues first that CPD's investigative alerts system is facially unconstitutional because, in his view, it permits warrantless arrests without probable cause. Taylor further contends that there is a widespread custom of shoddy audits resulting in arrests based on stale alerts. We find neither argument persuasive. The first claim falls well short. Taylor is correct that CPD's investigative alert policy is not a model of clarity, but nothing in the express terms of the policy allows officers to arrest individuals without probable cause. The policy creates two types of alerts: 'Investigative Alert / Probable Cause to Arrest' and 'Investigative Alert / No Probable Cause to Arrest.' And it expressly states that 'AN ARREST IS NOT AUTHORIZED' on the basis of the second type of alert, but only the first. The policy goes on to require an officer creating an alert to specify a '[j]ustification for the investigative alert request.' Presumably, although this is not stated expressly, the 'justification' for an 'Investigative Alert / Probable Cause to Arrest' must include the basis for the determination that there was probable cause to arrest. And, indeed, the investigative alert entered in Taylor's case listed his offense as 'WEAPONS VIOLATION UNLAWFUL POSS OF HANDGUN.' The policy further provides for regular audits 'to ensure investigative alert requests on file are canceled when the subject of the alert has been apprehended or the investigative alert is no longer needed.' The

Fourth Amendment permits warrantless arrests supported by probable cause. . . And one officer's determination of probable cause may be imputed to other officers in the department, who may arrest on the basis of the first officer's finding. . . The City's policy authorizes arrests based upon probable cause, and it provides a mechanism by which stale alerts are to be canceled. But this mechanism does not appear to have worked as planned, at least at the time of Taylor's arrest—which brings us to Taylor's second theory of Monell liability. CPD amended its policy on investigative alerts (formerly called 'stop orders') at least twice in the years prior to 2011, so that the alerts initially expired automatically after seven days, then after six months, and then (in the current system) never unless they are manually deleted. That is where the audits come in—to ensure that stale alerts get purged from the system at regular intervals. But the policy does not specify any particular procedure for conducting these audits, and as the district court found, in 2011 'there were thousands of [open] investigative alerts, yet no record of any audits or a paper trail of accountability.' The ineffectiveness of these audits resulted in Taylor's constitutional injury. Under the terms of the policy, the alert for his arrest should have been canceled in June 2011 when he turned himself in at the police precinct, or at the very least upon his acquittal in November 2011. But it was not, so Taylor was arrested on the same alert in December. And inexplicably, the alert yet again remained active for more than a month after this second arrest, until an officer finally canceled it in January. Taylor says this series of events displays deliberate indifference to an implied policy of inaction on the part of the City of Chicago. But under Monell, an implied policy is typically actionable only with 'considerably more proof than [a] single incident.'. . And here Taylor can point to only one constitutional violation—his December 2011 arrest. If CPD were engaged in a widespread practice of false arrests based on stale investigative alerts, we would have expected discovery in this case to turn up some evidence to that effect—internal documents, citizen complaints or calls for an investigation, or perhaps some form of inquiry by an inspector general. But Taylor has not come forward with anything along these lines. We are therefore not assured that this arrest was the product of 'a true municipal policy' rather than 'a random event'—and a very unfortunate one at that. . . Put another way, we cannot say here that the municipality's failure to implement more concrete auditing procedures was 'the "moving force" behind the injury alleged.'. . Nor is this case one where a false arrest like Taylor's is a 'highly predictable consequence' of a gap in a municipal policy, permitting Monell liability on the basis of a single violation. . . The policy as written requires 'the unit investigative alert file [to be] audited each police period'—roughly every month—to ensure the cancelation of stale alerts. If the policy had been followed as written, Taylor's second arrest would have never happened. Given this express auditing requirement, the likely occurrence of false arrests based on stale alerts was not 'so patently obvious' that the City's failure to provide more direction can be called deliberate indifference. . . We therefore affirm the district court's entry of summary judgment for the City of Chicago on Taylor's Monell claims relating to the investigative alerts policy. . . .What happened to Robert Taylor in the second half of 2011 should be a cautionary tale for the Chicago Police Department. The events reflect a combination of administrative corner-cutting and out-and-out misconduct by a member of the force. In the end, Robert Taylor spent 128 days in jail before being cleared of his charges, only to be arrested again for no reason. All of this could have been avoided had the officers in this case—and Officer Hughes in particular—acted with more deliberation and care. The Fourth Amendment demands nothing less.") with Taylor v. Hughes, 26 F.4th 419, 437-40 (7th Cir. 2022) (Hamilton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I join almost all of Judge Scudder's careful and persuasive opinion. It provides important and pointed guidance on police officers' duty of candor in seeking search warrants. With regret, however, I cannot join one portion of Part III–F. That portion addresses plaintiff's Monell claims against the City of Chicago based on the 'investigative alert' system used by the police department. I agree with much of what is said about the law of Monell in Part III–F, but I respectfully dissent from the application of that law to plaintiff's evidence on one theory. I would reverse summary judgment on plaintiff's claim that his second arrest, in December 2011, was caused by a widespread and unconstitutional city practice of failing to carry out the promised 'audits' to remove stale investigative alerts. Plaintiff has come forward with evidence sufficient to take that claim to trial. Under the investigative alert system, Chicago police maintain a database of such 'alerts,' both with and without probable cause, based on information received from officers. Under the policy, an officer who encounters a person subject to an alert labeled 'Probable Cause to Arrest' is authorized to arrest that person pending further investigation. In other words, an investigative alert with probable cause is the practical equivalent of an arrest warrant. . . But how reliable or stale is the information in the database? According to the written policy, 'the unit investigative alert file is [to be] audited each police period.' The policy does not specify who is supposed to carry out such audits or how, or how thoroughly. And here is how the district court summarized the evidence about real-life, as opposed to paper, auditing: In 2011, at the time of Taylor's arrest, thousands of investigative alerts were inputted into the system. The parties dispute whether any audits took place that year, but there were no records of any audit completed in 2011, no written criteria for performing audits, and no records demonstrating lieutenants were held accountable for conducting audits. . . . Part III–F of the court's opinion correctly finds that the audit provision of the investigative alert policy is essential for the written policy to withstand constitutional challenge. . . The court's opinion also acknowledges that the audit mechanism imagined by the written policy did not work as planned in plaintiff's case. He was arrested on the alert for a second time in December 2011, six months after his original arrest on the same alert and more than a month after he had actually been acquitted on the charge for which that alert had been issued. The court's opinion affirms summary judgment for the city on the failure-to-audit Monell claim because plaintiff has not come forward with evidence of similar, prior unjustified arrests caused by the city's systemic failure to audit pending investigative alerts. . . Such evidence should not be needed here. As the court's opinion acknowledges, evidence of other similar constitutional violations is not required under Monell for a practice or custom claim where '"a violation of federal rights [is] a highly predictable consequence" of a municipality's failure to act.'. . . The danger that stale investigative alerts will produce constitutional violations (and waste police officers' time) is clear enough that the written policy says that monthly audits are required. That danger is also obvious enough that the audit feature is essential to our conclusion that the written policy is constitutional on its face. Yet Monell addresses not just written policies but also actual practices. On this summary judgment record, we must assume that the entire Chicago Police Department carried out zero audits of pending investigative alerts in 2011—that it did exactly nothing the entire year of 2011 to carry out a feature of the written policy that's essential to keep the practice within constitutional bounds.

From that evidence, a reasonable jury could infer (a) that a total failure on that scale over that length of time reflected a de facto policy of at least deliberate indifference to (b) an obvious danger of unconstitutional deprivations of liberty based on stale alerts. The court's requirement of evidence of more unconstitutional incidents to prove Monell liability in this case of obvious dangers provides another data point in our court's conflicting jurisprudence in this important corner of § 1983 law. In a series of cases, we have applied the obvious-danger reasoning of City of Canton and Bryan County to affirm or allow Monell liability without proof of similar prior violations. See J.K.J. v. Polk County, 960 F.3d 367, 382–84 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc) (affirming Monell verdict for plaintiffs; risk that male guards would sexually assault female inmates was so obvious that policymakers' failures amounted to deliberate indifference); Glisson v. Indiana Dep't of Corrections, 849 F.3d 372, 382 (7th Cir. 2017) (en banc) (reversing summary judgment on Monell claim; dangers faced by chronically ill inmates were so obvious that failure to adopt protocols for coordinated, comprehensive care could be deemed deliberate indifference without evidence of similar prior cases); Woodward v. Correctional Medical Services of Illinois, Inc., 368 F.3d 917, 929 (7th Cir. 2004) (affirming verdict for plaintiff under Monell; danger of inmate suicide was so obvious that failure to provide adequate suicide prevention training to jail staff amounted to practice of deliberate indifference without evidence of prior suicides). Compare those decisions, however, to the court's treatment of the issue here, insisting on other similar cases despite the obvious risks posed by systemic failures to audit investigative alerts, and to Dean v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., 18 F.4th 214, 237 (7th Cir. 2021) (reversing Monell verdict for plaintiff; plaintiff failed to show similar prior cases where prison health-care provider's policy of 'collegial review' before outside medical referrals caused similar unconstitutional delays in critical health care), and Hildreth v. Butler, 960 F.3d 420, 426–30 (7th Cir. 2020) (affirming summary judgment on Monell claim for prison health-care provider whose policies for refilling and renewing prescriptions led to predictable delays and harm because plaintiff did not offer evidence of enough incidents to establish 'widespread' practice). It's worth noting that all of the obvious-danger cases just cited, other than Woodward, divided this court. Perhaps the city could convince a jury, as it has convinced my colleagues, that the failure to carry out audits was not as complete as plaintiff's evidence shows or was the result of nothing worse than negligence. But with respect, the dangers of unjustified arrest here are so obvious and the failure so complete, at least according to plaintiff's evidence, that a reasonable jury could find deliberate indifference at the policy-making level of the Chicago police. In response to these views, one might fairly ask why, if the dangers of unjustified arrests are so obvious, plaintiff cannot come forward with at least a few other examples? I expect that such examples would be quite difficult to find. Chicago must have a mountain of arrest records that did not lead to convictions. (In 2019, CPD made more than 90,000 arrests. Chicago Police Dep't, 2020 Annual Report at 50.) We have no indication that the Chicago police themselves keep track of errors resulting from stale or erroneous information in the investigative alert database. More generally, the city itself has recognized that CPD's recordkeeping practices related to litigation and constitutional compliance are not reliable. . . I have trouble imagining a discovery tool or an independent investigative measure that would be likely to work in this case, at least without prohibitive expense. But for now, suffice it to say that the debacle in this case and the evidence of no regular auditing put the Chicago policymakers on notice of the need for action. In Woodward, we said that the defendant there did not 'get a "one free suicide" pass.'. . In this case, Chicago has received a 'one free bad arrest' pass for its practice of failing to audit stale investigative alerts. It should not count on receiving any more.")

Compare Dean v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., 18 F.4th 214, 235-41 (7th Cir. 2021) ("We recently reiterated the elements of a Monell claim in LaPorta. To begin, a § 1983 plaintiff must always show 'that he was deprived of a federal right.'. . Beyond that, the plaintiff must trace the deprivation to some municipal action (i.e., a 'policy or custom'), such that the challenged conduct is 'properly attributable to the municipality itself.'. . There are at least three types of municipal action that may give rise to municipal liability under § 1983: '(1) an express policy that causes a constitutional deprivation when enforced; (2) a widespread practice that is so permanent and well-settled that it constitutes a custom or practice; or (3) an allegation that the constitutional injury was caused by a person with final policymaking authority.'. . Inaction, too, can give rise to liability in some instances if it reflects 'a conscious decision not to take action.' Glisson v. Ind. Dep't of Corr., 849 F.3d 372, 381 (7th Cir. 2017) (en banc); accord J.K.J., 960 F.3d at 378. Next, the plaintiff must show that 'the policy or custom demonstrates municipal fault,' i.e., deliberate indifference. . . 'This is a high bar.'. . If a municipality's action is not facially unconstitutional, the plaintiff 'must prove that it was obvious that the municipality's action would lead to constitutional violations and that the municipality consciously disregarded those consequences.'. . Finally, the plaintiff must show that the municipal action was 'the "moving force" behind the federal-rights violation.'. . This 'rigorous causation standard' requires 'a "direct causal link" between the challenged municipal action and the violation of [the plaintiff's] constitutional rights.'. . In short, a Monell plaintiff must show that some municipal action directly caused him to suffer a deprivation of a federal right, and that the municipality took the action with conscious disregard for the known or obvious risk of the deprivation. Dean relies on an express policy (collegial review), and we assume for present purposes that he has shown a constitutional deprivation. Even so, Dean has not shown municipal fault or moving-force causation—two indispensable prerequisites to Monell liability. Dean concedes that collegial review is not unconstitutional on its face. We held as much in Howell v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., 987 F.3d 647, 659 (7th Cir. 2021). His theory instead is that collegial review caused unconstitutional delays as applied to him. This type of claim presents 'difficult problems of proof.'. . As early as 1985, a plurality of the Supreme Court made clear that a plaintiff seeking to hold a municipality liable for a facially lawful policy generally must prove a prior pattern of similar constitutional violations resulting from the policy. As the Court put it: '[W]here the policy relied upon is not itself unconstitutional, considerably more proof than the single incident will be necessary in every case to establish both the requisite fault on the part of the municipality, and the causal connection between the "policy" and the constitutional deprivation.'. . The Court discussed the rationale behind this requirement in Brown. First, a prior pattern of similar violations puts the municipality on notice of the unconstitutional consequences of its policy, such that its 'continued adherence' to the policy might 'establish the conscious disregard for the consequences of [its] action—the "deliberate indifference"—necessary to trigger municipal liability.'. . Similarly, a pattern of violations may show that the policy itself, 'rather than a one-time negligent administration of the program or factors peculiar to the officer involved in a particular incident, is the "moving force" behind the plaintiff's injury.'. .To be sure, there are limited exceptions to this rule. In some 'rare' cases, the risk of unconstitutional consequences from a municipal policy 'could be so patently obvious that a [municipality] could be liable under § 1983 without proof of a pre-existing pattern of violations.'. . . Again, these cases are the exception. Regardless of the exact form of proof, the question is always whether the municipal policy reflects a conscious disregard for a known or obvious risk of the constitutional deprivation. . . .The dissent contends that we have collapsed the critical distinction between the existence of a policy and the effects of that policy. According to the dissent, pattern or practice evidence is only necessary when the presence of an official policy, custom, or practice is in question. Not so. . . [W]e recently recognized the distinction between a policy that is unconstitutional on its face and one that is not in Calderone. . . There, the plaintiff brought an as-applied constitutional challenge to the City's personnel rules under Monell. The existence of the policy–the written personnel rules–was not at issue. . . Nonetheless, we rejected Calderone's Monell claim because she failed to demonstrate causation and culpability based on her single incident of an alleged constitutional violation. Since she could not establish that the personnel rules were unconstitutional on their face, she had to show a 'series of bad acts[,] creating an inference that municipal officials were aware of and condoned the misconduct of their employees.'. . . Dean did not introduce any substantive evidence of a pattern or practice of similar violations. He did not offer substantive evidence that collegial review had caused unconstitutional delays for other prisoners. He only offered substantive evidence of collegial review causing unconstitutional delays in his own healthcare. Nor does he contend on appeal that his is one of those 'rare' cases where the risk of unconstitutional delays is 'patently obvious' even without proof of other violations. . . The district court relied on the 'obviousness' theory, reasoning that the jury could find that collegial review on its face 'would obviously and inevitably delay urgently needed care for some inmates, including Plaintiff' for no medical reason. But as we discuss below, Wexford allows its medical directors to go outside the normal collegial review process in urgent or emergent situations, so it could not have been obvious from the face of the policy that collegial review would delay urgently needed care. If offsite care was urgent, the policy provided an exception to prevent harmful delays. . . . Dr. Barnett's testimony strongly suggests that the delays in Dean's care resulted from the negligent actions of Wexford's agents, and not from collegial review. Monell requires more; Dean must show that Wexford itself directly caused the constitutional violation. Dean also points to Dr. Nawoor's testimony that Wexford's 'practices' were to blame for the delays in Dean's care. But Dr. Nawoor never testified (nor did anyone else) that collegial review had caused similar problems for other inmates, so his testimony falls short of establishing that collegial review itself was the moving force behind Dean's constitutional injury. . . Consistent with the Supreme Court's guidance, we have repeatedly rejected Monell claims that rest on the plaintiff's individualized experience without evidence of other constitutional violations. [citing cases] We do so again here. While we are sympathetic to Dean's experience, his only substantive proof relates to the delays in care that he himself experienced. He has not proven a pattern of similar constitutional violations or a patently obvious risk of such violations. . . We acknowledge, as we did in Glisson, that there may be other pathways to Monell liability based on a facially lawful policy. But this case does not require us to further explore that possibility. Dean's only other evidence is the 2014 report, which shows, at most, that

Wexford knew an expert in another case had concluded that a materially different version of its collegial review policy had caused delays at some other IDOC facilities. This notice evidence alone cannot establish that Wexford knew of, and consciously disregarded, the risk that collegial review would likely violate Dean's constitutional rights. Nor has Dean shown that collegial review itself rather than 'a one-time negligent administration of the program' was the moving force behind his constitutional injury. . . Anticipating our holding that the Lippert reports do not establish Wexford's deliberate indifference, Dean contends in the alternative that other evidence at trial supported a finding of deliberate indifference. Specifically, Dean points to the testimony of Nurse Lisa Mincey. But Nurse Mincey testified that she complained about Dr. Nawoor's conduct. Indeed, Dean points to her testimony again when defending the jury's finding that Dr. Nawoor was deliberately indifferent. Nowhere in the cited testimony does Nurse Mincey fault Wexford. So, we disagree with Dean that other evidence at trial proved Wexford's deliberate indifference. For its part, the dissent contends that Wexford's knowledge can be inferred from the fact that there were ten collegial reviews in the 207 days between Dean's initial presentation of symptoms and his surgery. But why? The question is not whether Wexford knew that Dean's offsite care requests had to go through collegial review. The question is whether Wexford knew that collegial review would likely violate Dean's constitutional rights. We cannot infer such knowledge from the mere fact that Wexford applied collegial review in Dean's case, even if it did so repeatedly. . . . More broadly, the dissent suggests that we are invading the jury's province and improperly reweighing the evidence. Not so. In this sufficiency of the evidence challenge, our role is to police the evidentiary boundary for Monell liability. As explained above, Dean introduced no evidence permitting a jury to conclude that Wexford knew in advance that collegial review would violate Dean's constitutional rights in this single-incident case. Even though the jury instructions are unchallenged, we must ensure that the jury had a legally sufficient evidentiary basis for holding Wexford liable. Finally, the dissent claims that 'twelve pages' of the Lippert reports are all that stands in the way of affirming the jury's verdict on the Eighth Amendment claim against Wexford. But that is not true. We hold that the 2018 report was inadmissible and that the 2014 report—assuming it was admissible—was not enough to prove Wexford's knowledge. The fundamental problem with Dean's claim, however, is that he has no evidence of Wexford's knowledge. Dean's Monell claim fails because he lacks critical proof, not because he introduced the Lippert reports.") with Dean v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., 18 F.4th 214, 244-48, 253-55 (7th Cir. 2021) (Wood, J., dissenting) ("Twelve pages. Twelve pages admitted into evidence subject to a careful limiting instruction. That is the difference, according to the majority in this case, between allowing plaintiff William Dean to keep the $1 million in compensatory damages and $7 million in punitive damages that the jury awarded him (after a $3 million reduction by the court), and overriding the jury's judgment to take it away. The majority takes the position that the district court's admission of those twelve pages from the so-called Lippert Reports requires this override. But it is not our role to reassess the evidence and second-guess the jury's conclusions. Even if the court erred in admitting those twelve pages (and in my view it did not), they were not so prejudicial either by themselves or alongside the rest of the evidence to require this radical step. I therefore respectfully dissent. . . .Before considering the evidence, it is crucial to be clear about what Dean, having brought an as-applied claim under Monell v. New York City Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658 (1978), must prove. It was not Dean's burden to litigate on behalf of others; this was not a class action, and he did not have to prove that Wexford's policy always led to catastrophic results. He had to show only that Wexford's unwavering policy requiring collegial review amounted to deliberate indifference to his condition. My colleagues have effectively collapsed the critical distinction between the existence of a policy and the effects of that policy by insisting, at every turn and for each of Monell's elements, that Dean demonstrate a prior pattern of constitutional harm wrought by the collegial-review process. Monell requires no such thing. 'Pattern or practice' evidence of a problem or failure is necessary in as-applied challenges only when the presence of an official policy, custom, or practice—Monell's threshold question—is in doubt. In those cases, pattern evidence substitutes an inference from a long-standing practice for the certainty of a written policy. See Glisson v. Indiana Department of Corrections, 849 F.3d 372, 382 (7th Cir. 2017) ("The critical question under Monell remains this: is the action about which the plaintiff is complaining one of the institution itself, or is it merely one undertaken by a subordinate actor."). In Dean's case, collegial review is an explicit, official policy followed by Wexford; everyone, including my colleagues, readily recognizes this fact. No one denies that Dean was attacking Wexford's own policy and actions; he was not making a subterranean vicarious liability argument that would not be cognizable under Monell, nor was he claiming that Wexford dealt with his case pursuant to an implied policy or custom separate from collegial review. A quick overview of some of the key Monell precedents demonstrates the properly circumscribed role of pattern evidence. . . . In some contexts, particularly when unwritten customs or practices are being challenged, the question whether the municipality has recognized an official policy often logically overlaps with these elements, such that pattern evidence provides a clear route to proving each. But this does not mean that pattern evidence is required when, as here, the official policy is not in doubt and the notice and causation requirements are analytically separable. Because Dean's case involves an official policy—collegial review—there is nothing more that needs to be said on that point. I thus move on to the notice and causation elements. In situations such as those presented in Brown, Canton, or Tuttle, the existence of the policy and the municipality's knowledge of the implied policy's risks are two sides of the same coin. The pattern of deficiency shows both the existence of an implicit policy and the municipality's awareness of that policy. . . But in Dean's situation, where the official policy of collegial review is firmly established, the question of notice—was Wexford aware of collegial review's risks—is all that is left. I do not doubt that one way of showing notice would be through pattern evidence—with each additional delay caused by collegial review, Wexford would have been more likely to realize the policy's risks. But awareness can also be proven more directly. For instance, a public report from a respected authority, such as the court-appointed experts who prepared the Lippert Reports or the Department of Justice, would without doubt grab a municipal entity's attention too. Monell's 'moving-force' causation inquiry asks whether the policy itself, as opposed to a negligent act of an officer outside the policy or some other intervening cause, precipitated the constitutional injury. Using pattern evidence to prove the cause of a single instance is something that can be done only with care, and only with close attention to the facts of the incident in question. Direct evidence of the cause of the single incident will always suffice; pattern evidence is not essential. When the Supreme Court referred to causation in Brown, it noted only that 'the existence of a pattern of tortious conduct by inadequately trained employees may tend to show that the lack of proper training ... is the "moving force" behind the plaintiff's injury.'. . That is what makes evidence of past events relevant, though not necessary, in Dean's case. Because collegial review is an established policy of Wexford, Dean must show only that Wexford was aware of collegial review's risks of harmful delays and that it was collegial review, not individual-officer negligence or some other intervening cause, that lay behind the deliberate indifference to the urgency of Dean's medical need. The majority takes the position that Dean failed on both those scores; I do not agree. Indeed, in my view, as I now explain, Dean has satisfied both elements with or without the Lippert Reports. . . . Wexford's knowledge that serious health risks attended collegial review is more than sufficient for satisfying the Monell notice requirement. We have never suggested that a government entity must know with something close to certainty that the application of a policy will cause a constitutional violation—such an extreme view would foreclose Monell liability for facially lawful policies which, by definition, can in theory be applied lawfully. In fact, all that must be shown is that Wexford knew of collegial review's potential patient-safety hazards at the time it applied the policy to Dean, and here the evidence is overwhelming. My colleagues seek to impose a new condition on Monell plaintiffs such as Dean: in addition to demonstrating that Wexford knew of possible problems with collegial review, they contend that Dean needed to provide substantive proof that those problems in fact existed. Framing this as a question of first impression, the majority acknowledges that we have never previously recognized such a condition. But even if this requirement should be created, Dean satisfied it through Dr. Barnett's testimony, which drew upon his past experiences with and observations of collegial review to conclude that the system suffered from general defects. If problems are built into the fabric of collegial review, it follows that they necessarily existed in some form, however inchoate, prior to Dean's case, and the jury could reasonably have reached this conclusion. . . . Substantive proof that problems materialized is not an independent requirement for notice. As I previously noted, it is true that evidence of earlier problems makes it more likely that a municipal entity has learned that its policy is defective. In other words, this kind of evidence is a rough proxy for knowledge, and it may be helpful at the margins if a defendant disputes whether it was aware of a policy's potential risks. But Wexford never contested the Reports' proof of notice, and so this additional evidence is unnecessary. Moreover, even if Wexford had contested the Reports, the jury would have been within its rights to credit them, and thus make a finding of notice, without additional substantiating evidence. . . . The majority draws this requirement from Daniel v. Cook County, 833 F.3d 728 (7th Cir. 2016), where the plaintiff had produced both a Department of Justice report (which, like the Lippert Reports, was admitted by the district court only for notice) as well as additional evidence substantiating the problems documented in the report. But my colleagues fundamentally misread Daniel. Daniel concerned a Monell challenge to Cook County's informal customs and practices, not to any explicit policy it had. . . As I have stressed, the need for pattern evidence to prove a policy's existence arises only when there is no written policy. In Daniel, separate proof was necessary not for notice or for 'moving-force' causation (which was dealt with later in the opinion), but to infer an official policy. . . Because Dean is challenging an explicit policy, either Lippert Report standing alone would be sufficient to demonstrate that Wexford was on notice of collegial review's risks.")

Compare Flores v. City of South Bend, 997 F.3d 725, 73-34 (7th Cir. 2021) ("The district court dismissed Flores's Monell claim against the City of South Bend because it found no underlying constitutional violation by Officer Gorny. Since we are reversing on that point, however, it is appropriate to take a fresh look at Flores's Monell claim, too. . . . Even as the Court has underscored that failure-to-train liability is rare, it has never wavered from the position that this theory remains valid. Most recently in Connick v. Thompson, . . . it recognized that a municipality's 'decision not to train certain employees,' despite actual or constructive notice that their actions constitute deliberate indifference to the rights of the public with whom they come into contact, is the 'functional equivalent of a decision by the city itself to violate the Constitution.'. . Notably, failure-to-train liability does not require proof of widespread constitutional violations before that failure becomes actionable; a single violation can suffice where a violation occurs and the plaintiff asserts a recurring, obvious risk. As the Court put it in Brown, 'we did not foreclose the possibility that evidence of a single violation of federal rights, accompanied by a showing that a municipality has failed to train its employees to handle recurring situations presenting an obvious potential for such a violation, could trigger municipal liability.'. . Applying these principles, we have upheld failure-to-train allegations on at least two occasions. Sitting en banc in J.K.J. v. Polk County, 960 F.3d 367 (7th Cir. 2020), we addressed a case in which two former inmates in the Polk County Jail sued the County for failing adequately to train male guards to prevent their sexual abuse of female inmates. . . The County's training was limited to informing guards that the jail prohibited sexual contact with inmates and holding a single training session that some officers, including the offender in the case, did not attend. . . We found that these allegations sufficed to support failure-to-train liability. . . So too in Woodward v. Correctional Medical Services of Illinois, Inc., 368 F.3d 917 (7th Cir. 2004), we held that a correctional facility's failure to train its employees on suicide prevention (among other shortcomings), resulting in the death of an inmate, supported Monell liability. . . We reached this conclusion even though the plaintiff could not prove that any other inmates had lost their lives because of this failure to train, because the prison did not 'get a one free suicide pass.'. . We realize that the Supreme Court has yet to issue an opinion in which it upholds liability on this ground, but we take the Court at its word that this does not mean it has disapproved the theory. At least one of our sister circuits has upheld Monell liability under a failure-to-train theory, and others have found allegations to be sufficient to survive summary judgment or a motion to dismiss, without any sign of disapproval from the Supreme Court. [collecting cases] With this background in mind, we turn back to Flores's case. The complaint asserts that the City failed to train Gorny not to drive recklessly, in the face of actual knowledge that both Gorny himself and South Bend police officers generally had a history of reckless speeding. It also asserts that the City has a de facto policy of encouraging such behavior. South Bend officers working the night shift, Flores contends, frequently drive above 50 miles per hour, well above posted limits. In addition, she alleges that on at least three occasions before Erica Flores's death, Gorny operated his vehicle at high rates of speed (70 mph, 114 mph, and 60 mph). Yet, despite telling its officers to operate their vehicles only up to a maximum of 50 miles per hour, South Bend never reprimanded anyone for noncompliance with its policies, nor did it require additional training for those who disregarded its guidance. Flores argues that this is enough to support Monell liability under both a theory of failure to train and a theory that the City had a de facto policy of encouraging or permitting excessively fast driving. Taking the latter point first, we do not see enough in this complaint to permit Flores to proceed on the de facto policy theory. Allegations that officers sometimes drive at high rates of speed do not show a sufficiently specific pattern of conduct to 'support the general allegation of a custom or policy.'. . Finding otherwise would stretch the law too far, opening municipalities to liability for noncodified customs in all but the rarest of occasions, as long as a plaintiff can find a few sporadic examples of an improper behavior. Nothing in Brown, Harris, or Connick supports such an outcome. But the failure-to-train theory is another matter. Stressing that we are still at the pleading stage, we conclude that Flores's complaint plausibly alleges that the City acted with deliberate indifference by failing to address the known recklessness of its police officers as a group and Gorny in particular. Looking at Gorny first, the complaint asserts that on at least three prior occasions, Gorny drove in the dark of night at extreme speeds (from 60 to 114 mph), well above the posted limits of 30 miles per hour, and even above the alleged 50 mile-per-hour policy limit. The City knew that its officers routinely drove over 50 miles per hour, but it took no steps to prevent this behavior—no training, no discipline, no reprimands. A municipality can be held liable under a theory of failure to train if it has actual knowledge of a pattern of criminally reckless conduct and there is an obvious need to provide training to avert harm, even if the prior acts have yet to result in tragedy. . . The City urges us to dismiss Flores's claim because (fortunately) Gorny never killed anyone before he took Erica Flores's life. But this is not a 'one-free-bite' situation. The law does not require the death or maiming of multiple victims before a city must institute proper training. Driving with deliberate indifference to the consequences of one's action—in effect, turning oneself into a speeding bullet—can reach the level of criminal recklessness before the worst happens. Flores's allegations are enough to survive a motion to dismiss. We of course offer no opinion on the way this case will look after all parties have had the chance to develop the factual record further.") with Flores v. City of South Bend, 997 F.3d 725, 734-35 (7th Cir. 2021) (Brennan, J., concurring) ("I agree with my colleagues that plaintiff-appellant provided enough facts to state a facially plausible failure-to-train claim. . . I write separately to examine the single-incident theory of failure-to-train liability under Monell . . . and the majority opinion's generalized discussion of it. The majority opinion states that a municipality can be liable for failure to train under the single-incident theory 'if it has actual knowledge of a pattern of criminally reckless conduct and there is an obvious need to provide training to avert harm, even if the prior acts have yet to result in tragedy.'. . Although this statement is not incorrect, I do not know that it fully captures the complexity of Monell jurisprudence in this area. To establish single-incident liability, a plaintiff must prove that municipal policymakers know that its employees will confront a given situation and not train for it, . . . and the need for training must be obvious without consideration of prior violations. . . But there is more. The single-incident theory is reserved for the 'narrow' circumstance when a municipality fails to train its employees, who 'have no knowledge at all of the constitutional limits' that govern their conduct in situations they are certain to encounter. . . This remains true even though there is 'no reason to assume' that the municipal employees are 'familiar with the constitutional constraints' on their own. Liability for failure to train under the single-incident theory remains 'rare.'. . The majority opinion states: 'At least one of our sister circuits has upheld Monell liability under a failure-to-train theory, and others have found allegations to be sufficient to survive summary judgment or a motion to dismiss, without any sign of disapproval from the Supreme Court.' This sentence, which is followed by citations to a number of decisions, could be overread to suggest that liability under this theory is widely endorsed. But of those decisions, only the D.C. Circuit in Parker v. District of Columbia, 850 F.2d 708 (D.C. Cir. 1988)—a case that predates Connick, Bryan County, and Canton—upheld failure-to-train liability. In Smith v. District of Columbia, 413 F.3d 86, 98–99 (D.C. Cir. 2005), the D.C. Circuit only analogized the municipality's lack of monitoring standards to a failure-to-train claim. And in Newton v. City of New York, 779 F.3d 140, 153 n.11 (2d Cir. 2015), the Second Circuit only contemplated a failure-to-train claim because the plaintiff did not pursue the case on that theory. The remaining decisions concern allegations sufficient to survive a dispositive motion. I write separately only so courts and litigants in the future recall the intricacies of Monell jurisprudence and do not misread precedent in this area. I agree with the majority opinion's resolution of this case, and I respectfully concur.")

Compare Sandoval v. County of San Diego, 985 F.3d 657, 682-83 (9th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 711 (2021) ("In granting summary judgment to the County, the district court concluded that Plaintiff could not establish deliberate indifference because there was no evidence that the failure to implement adequate communication safeguards had caused 'prior injury or death to MOC1 inhabitants.' The County does not defend this rationale on appeal, and for good reason. To establish her claim, Plaintiff must show that the County had actual or constructive knowledge that its practices were substantially certain to cause a constitutional violation. . . This standard does not require proof of a prior injury. A constitutional injury can be substantially certain to follow from a practice even if an injury has yet to occur. Otherwise, every Monell defendant would get 'one free ... pass' for policies or practices that are substantially certain to violate an individual's constitutional rights. . . Under the proper standard, it is a close question whether Plaintiff has mustered sufficient evidence to create a triable issue of fact on whether the County was deliberately indifferent. There is certainly enough evidence to support a finding of negligence. But to establish deliberate indifference, Plaintiff must prove that the County had actual or constructive knowledge that the failure to implement protocols necessary to ensure that nurses knew when inmates in MOC1 required medical care was 'substantially certain' to result in inmates failing to receive the proper treatment, creating a likelihood of serious injury or death. . . Ultimately, we conclude that summary judgment should not have been granted on the County's liability under Monell. Plaintiff has put forward sufficient circumstantial evidence of the County's knowledge such that a reasonable jury could find deliberate indifference. To begin, a jury could infer from the more rigorous policies the County put in place for the sobering and safety cells that it was aware of the importance of ensuring that the nursing staff knew which inmates required medical treatment or observation. For the sobering and safety cells, the medical staff listed the name and location of each patient on a whiteboard. Specific nurses were assigned to monitor each cell. And nurses filled out written logs with their observations of the inmates held in those cells. A reasonable jury could conclude that the County implemented these practices because it understood they were necessary to ensure that inmates requiring medical care would not fall through the cracks. . . This conclusion is only reinforced by the fact that, after Sandoval's death, the County put in place a new practice for MOC1. Now, when a deputy places an inmate requiring medical care in MOC1, he must place a magnetic placard on the door indicating that the inmate is there for medical reasons. A jury could view this as an acknowledgement by the County that its prior practices—which relied exclusively on verbal communication—were insufficient. . . And, as explained, it could be reasonably inferred from the fact that the County had implemented more extensive tracking measures for the sobering and safety cells that it knew at the time that relying on verbal communications alone would create a substantial risk that an inmate's serious medical needs could go unaddressed. That is not to say that a jury is required to find deliberate indifference on the record before us. Perhaps the County could show at trial that there were good reasons for treating MOC1 differently from the other medical cells, and that despite the policies put in place for the sobering and safety cells, it was not aware that similar practices were required to provide adequate medical care in MOC1. But viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, we conclude that there is a triable issue of fact as to the County's liability under Monell. . . Viewing the evidence in Plaintiff's favor, a jury could conclude that Ronnie Sandoval would not have died but for the defendants' unreasonable response to his obvious signs of medical distress. The district court therefore erred in granting summary judgment. We reverse and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.") with Sandoval v. County of San Diego, 985 F.3d 657, 695-96 (9th Cir. 2021) (Collins, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 711 (2021) ("The applicable 'deliberate indifference' standard for Monell claims. . . differs from the above-discussed standard that applied to the individual Defendants under then-existing law for qualified immunity purposes: whereas the latter applies both an objective and a subjective standard, the former is purely objective. . . In the context of an analogous claim about inadequate monitoring of jail cells, we held in Castro that the objective deliberate indifference standard for municipal liability under § 1983 requires a showing that '"the facts available to city policymakers put them on actual or constructive notice that the particular omission is substantially certain to result in the violation of the constitutional rights of their citizens."'. . Plaintiff failed to present sufficient evidence to satisfy this demanding standard, and the county was therefore entitled to summary judgment. Plaintiff's evidence of prior confusion concerning why particular inmates were placed in MOC1 may well support a claim that the county was negligent, . . . but that evidence does not come close to showing that the county had '"actual or constructive notice"' that this practice was '"substantially certain"' to result in an unconstitutional disregard of a serious medical need. . . The fact that the county changed its practices concerning MOC1 after this incident—even if admissible for purposes going beyond merely proving that a policy, practice, or custom existed, but see Conn, 591 F.3d at 1104 n.7 (applying Fed. R. Evid. 407 to cabin the use of post-event practice)—does not establish that the county had the pre-incident actual or constructive notice Castro requires. I therefore disagree with the majority's finding that a reasonable jury could infer that the county had actual or constructive knowledge that its practices in regard to the MOC1 cell were substantially certain to result in an unconstitutional disregard of a serious medical need. Plaintiff contends that the constructive notice standard should not apply because here the county's 'policy itself directs the unconstitutional action.' Plaintiff, however, has presented no evidence that the policy itself is unconstitutional. In particular, to the extent that Plaintiff contends that the county had an unconstitutional policy, practice, or custom to affirmatively and completely ignore persons placed in MOC1, there is no evidence that the county had such a policy: it is undisputed that the MOC1 cell is visible to personnel at the nurses' station; and, indeed, it is undisputed that Sandoval's eventual seizure and collapse onto the floor was immediately detected.")

Compare Stucker v. Louisville Metro Government, No. 23-5214, 2024 WL 2135407, at *11 n.4 (6th Cir. May 13, 2024) (not published) ("The Concurrence notes that the Stuckers raise a single-incident (failure to equip) theory of deliberate indifference under Ouza (which does not require evidence of a pattern) and concludes that such a claim requires the court to analyze whether any search warrant training occurred. . . But that is not the only theory of deliberate indifference in this case, as the Concurrence recognizes. It is true that Ouza factually involved a lack of training, . . . and used a lack of training example[.] . . But in addressing the 'fail[ure] to equip' claim, it did not establish that a total lack of training is required; instead, it referenced 'the need for more or different training' to sustain a municipal liability claim. . . What matters under Ouza is not a total lack of training, but rather the obviousness of the need for training and the likelihood that deficient training will 'result in the violation of constitutional rights.'") with Stucker v. Louisville Metro Government, No. 23-5214, 2024 WL 2135407, at *13-14 (6th Cir. May 13, 2024) (not published) (Nalbandian, J., concurring) ("[A]s the majority acknowledges, both inadequate training and acquiescence Monell claims 'require deliberate indifference.'. . Our caselaw recognizes two theories for showing deliberate indifference in the inadequate-training context. See Ouza v. City of Dearborn Heights, 969 F.3d 265, 287 (6th Cir. 2020). The parties argue the issue this way too. . . The most common option is for a plaintiff to show that the 'municipality has failed to act in response to repeated complaints of constitutional violations by its officers.'. . But there is another option, and it is the one Stucker primarily pursues. . . In a 'narrow range of circumstances,' a plaintiff can show what is called 'single-incident liability,' demonstrating that a municipality was deliberately indifferent by 'failing to equip law enforcement officers with specific tools to handle recurring situations.'. . The distinctions between the two prove analytically important. To state the obvious, different theories require different showings: The repeated-complaints theory requires evidence of prior issues that give notice of constitutional violations, whereas the single-incident theory requires showing a lack of 'any training.'. . Stucker believes his case is like Ouza, where the police department failed to 'provide any training' on the use of excessive force. And Stucker goes so far as to say '[a]t the very least, there is a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether Detective Troutman received search warrant training, which is actionable under Ouza.'. . So to analyze this argument, the district court will need to assess whether Troutman received any search-warrant training. . . . Because LMPD offers evidence of Troutman receiving some training that, if true, would defeat single-incident deliberate indifference, we must leave ultimate resolution of this question to the trial court.")

Compare Ouza v. City of Dearborn Heights, Michigan, 969 F.3d 265, 287-88 (6th Cir. 2020) ("[A] plaintiff can show deliberate indifference based on 'single-incident liability' if the risk of the constitutional violation is so obvious or foreseeable that it amounts to deliberate indifference for the city to fail to prepare officers for it. . . Plaintiff in the present case premises her municipal liability claim against Dearborn Heights on this latter type of deliberate indifference. . . She alleges that Dearborn Heights did not provide any training to its police officers regarding excessive force, proper handcuffing technique, or probable cause determinations. Dearborn Heights has not put on any evidence to dispute this, and in fact appears to concede it. Officer Derwick stated in his deposition that he had not received any training from Dearborn Heights with regard to excessive force or probable cause. . . . As Plaintiff points out, Officer Derwick graduated from the Police Academy in 2000, so based on his own testimony, he had not had any training on excessive force or probable cause determinations in the past fourteen years leading up to Plaintiff's arrest. Officer Dottor also acknowledged that he had not received any training on proper handcuffing technique while at the Dearborn Heights Police Department, but instead only received his handcuffing training through the Police Academy. The failure to provide any training on probable cause determinations or use of force (including handcuffing technique) is constitutionally inadequate. Given the frequency with which officers must evaluate probable cause and use force within the course of their duties, we agree with Plaintiff that Dearborn Height's complete failure to provide any type of training as to these two recurring situations may amount to deliberate indifference under City of Canton v. Harris and its progeny.") with Ouza v. City of Dearborn Heights, Michigan, 969 F.3d 265, 295-98 (6th Cir. 2020) (Griffin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("It is possible—but only in a 'narrow range of circumstances'—that 'a failure to equip law enforcement officers with specific tools to handle recurring situations' could violate a plaintiff's constitutional rights if the infringement is 'a highly predictable consequence' of the deficient training. . . However, this rare exception to an already tenuous' theory of liability sets an even higher bar for a plaintiff: 'the unconstitutional consequences of failing to train [must] be so patently obvious that a city could be liable under § 1983 without proof of a pre-existing pattern of violations.'. . Caselaw thus demands two elements: 'It must be obvious that the failure to train will lead to certain conduct, and it must be obvious ... that the conduct will violate constitutional rights.' Arrington-Bey v. City of Bedford Heights, 858 F.3d 988, 995 (6th Cir. 2017). . . . Regarding the specifics of the Monell claim, plaintiff focuses on the City's reliance upon the local police academy's training program and the City's apparent lack of annual performance reviews. The majority view these practices as so deficient and generically concludes that a jury could 'easily' find that this so-called obvious violation caused Ouza's injuries. I disagree in part with their factual recitation, and in whole with their legal conclusion. On the facts, the majority opinion accurately quotes defendant police officer Gene Derwick's deposition testimony regarding his general recollection of training while employed by the Dearborn Heights Police Department. Officer Dottor, however, offered more specifics. He testified that although he received 'most of [his] training in the police academy,' he received 'field training' and was specifically trained while employed by the Dearborn Heights Police Department on 'probable cause to arrest involving a domestic violence crime.' Thus, it is disingenuous to suggest that the record shows the City of Dearborn Heights lacks any training regime for its officers. But even assuming it does, I disagree that the City's reliance upon training these officers received at the police academy is so obviously unconstitutional that we should attach the rarely found single-incident-liability exception. . . . There is no dispute that the City's officers had foundational training on probable cause and excessive handcuffing. Perhaps that foundation was unsatisfactory. Or maybe the officers' shortcomings in applying that training sprung from something other than the training program.

Consider a third (and most likely) possibility—they made mistakes. Whatever the reason may be, City of Canton makes clear it 'says little about the training program or the legal basis for holding the city liable.'. . When a municipal employee has some training, that goes a long way in defeating a deliberate-indifference claim. . . . The majority opinion's afterthought conclusion of 'no performance evaluations equals single-incident liability' is equally problematic. City of Canton requires that the City's failure to conduct routine performance evaluations of its individual officers must be 'closely related' to Ouza's 'ultimate injury'—her false arrest and excessive handcuffing. To my knowledge, we have never accepted a plaintiff's request to condemn a municipality's human-resources system (let alone one that is likely collectively bargained over) to the degree that my colleagues do (and in such a nonchalant and conclusory manner). On the contrary, we have universally rejected the notion that the failure to conduct a performance evaluation both causes a specific constitutional injury and reflects deliberate indifference. . . What is it about Ouza's injuries here that are directly related to the City's failure to annually review its officers' performance? There is no connection, and the majority opinion identifies none. Yet, it approves Ouza's Monell claim. That does not comport with our causation caselaw. . . And even if we were to put all of this aside, our precedent provided the City of Dearborn Heights with ample reason to believe its practices would survive constitutional scrutiny. Just two years before the events at issue occurred here, we decided a nearly identical case involving the City's immediately northern neighbor, Redford Township. In Marcilis v. Township of Redford, the plaintiffs similarly alleged § 1983 excessive-force and false-arrest claims and sought to hold the municipality liable for failing to train and supervise its police officers. 693 F.3d 589, 593 (6th Cir. 2012). They supported their Monell claim the same way Ouza does hers: one officer 'could not remember when he last received training about the use of force,' the other officer 'testified that his only use-of-force training took place during his time at the police academy' and that he 'could not remember when he last received training on arrests and search warrants,' and the municipality did not conduct performance evaluations of its officers. . . Yet we concluded the Monell claim failed because the plaintiffs 'failed to present probative evidence as to the question of deliberate indifference.'. . True, we came to that conclusion by noting an absence of history of abuse that would have put the municipality on notice of deficient training. . . But given those identical facts, it cannot be 'so patently obvious' to the City of Dearborn Heights just two years later that its training of its officers was constitutionally abhorrent. . . There is 'no evidence indicating [that excessive handcuffing or arrests without probable cause] was systematic or widespread, and there [i]s no evidence that the police department's supervisory personnel sanctioned such [conduct] or even knew of its existence.'. . This lack of a 'direct causal link [between] the constitutional deprivation' and the officers' lack of training and performance reviews means Monell liability cannot attach to the City of Dearborn Heights. . . Section 1983 simply 'does not provide plaintiffs or courts carte blanche to micromanage local governments throughout the United States.'. . The majority opinion's authorization of a Monell claim in this instance does just that. I would therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment on plaintiff's Monell claim.") affirmative action to harm them. To the contrary, their theory of Monell liability roots itself in inaction—in gaps in the County's sexual abuse policy and its failure to properly train the jailers in the face of obvious and known risks to female inmates. These failures to act, J.K.J. and M.J.J. contend, were deliberate and together caused their constitutional injuries. The Supreme Court has recognized that Monell liability can arise from such decisions because a 'city's "policy of inaction" in light of notice that its program will cause constitutional violations "is the functional equivalent of a decision by the city itself to violate the Constitution."'. . . But the path to Monell liability based on inaction is steeper because, unlike in a case of affirmative municipal action, a failure to do something could be inadvertent and the connection between inaction and a resulting injury is more tenuous. . . . All agree that Polk County's written policies categorically prohibited sexual contact with inmates and required responses to alleged violations. But J.K.J. and M.J.J. presented evidence that the policy contained material gaps. . . .The trial evidence makes the bottom line plain: the jury could have found that Polk County's sexual abuse prevention program was entirely lacking. The policy stated nothing but the obvious—do not sexually abuse inmates. The County then exacerbated the gap by failing to use training as the means of making the policy prohibition a reality (or, at the very least, mitigating risk) within the institution. The jury could have tallied these gaps as part of finding the conscious, deliberate municipal inaction upon which to rest Monell liability. . . . The Supreme Court has made plain that a failure to act amounts to municipal action for Monell purposes only if the County has notice that its program will cause constitutional violations. . . Demonstrating that notice is essential to an ultimate finding and requires a 'known or obvious' risk that constitutional violations will occur. . . . In many Monell cases notice requires proof of a prior pattern of similar constitutional violations. . . This case presents no such pattern. The district court declined to instruct the jury on the theory because it found insufficient evidence of previous instances of sexual assault known to the County. In so concluding, however, the district court recognized that J.K.J. and M.J.J. had available another path to show Polk County had the requisite notice.The alternative path to Monell liability comes from a door the Supreme Court opened in City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989). The Court observed that there may, as here, be circumstances in which 'the need for more or different training is so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights' that a factfinder could find deliberate indifference to the need for training. . . 'In that event, the failure to provide proper training may fairly be said to represent a policy for which the city is responsible, and for which the city may be held liable if it actually causes injury.'. . Put another way, a risk of constitutional violations can be so high and the need for training so obvious that the municipality's failure to act can reflect deliberate indifference and allow an inference of institutional culpability, even in the absence of a similar prior constitutional violation. . . . Though the Supreme Court has yet to confront a case that presents a viable Monell claim based on a municipality's failure to act in absence of a pattern, our court has done so twice. [Court discusses Glisson and Woodward] Sometimes the notice will come from a pattern of past similar violations; other times it will come from evidence of a risk so obvious that it compels municipal action. But at all times and in all Monell cases based on this theory, the Supreme Court has directed the focus on the presence and proof of 'a known or obvious' risk. . . . The jury had ample evidence to find that Polk County's policy failures—both the prevention and detection gaps in its written policies and the absence of training—occurred in the face of an obvious and known risk that its male guards would sexually assault female inmates. . . . We recognize that policies can always be more robust, and training can always be more thorough. PREA is not a constitutional standard, and jails are not required to adopt it. Our federal structure leaves the choices to state and local authorities. Our conclusion is more limited: the risks to female inmates in the confinement setting are obvious—indeed, PREA owes its very existence to that reality—and N.S.'s report of Jorgenson's misconduct reinforced for Polk County that the risks were real and acute in the jail. Faced with that notice, the County had a legal obligation to act—to take reasonable steps to reduce the obvious and known risks of assaults on inmates. . . Just as a municipality cannot issue firearms to new police academy graduates, wish them Godspeed on the streets, and hope the new officers exercise sound judgment when deciding whether circumstances warrant the use of lethal force—the precise example the Supreme Court provided in City of Canton—Polk County could not, knowing all that it did about the risk within its jailhouse walls, dispatch male guards to stand watch over its female inmates equipped with nothing more than a piece of paper with a flat instruction not to abuse those under their care. The jury had enough to conclude that Polk County deliberately chose a path of inaction when that option was off the table. . . . The County presses a different view. It sees a guard's sexual abuse of an inmate as so patently wrong and so plainly prohibited by Wisconsin law and the jail's policy that no amount of training and no enhancements to the institution's code of conduct could have made any difference. And this is especially so, the County urges, given the lengths to which Christensen went to hide his conduct. Put most bluntly, no amount of training, no policy, no monitoring—nothing, literally nothing—could have prevented or detected what he did to J.K.J. and M.J.J., or so the County would have it. The County's narrow fixation on Christensen exposes its error. Monell liability did not hinge on predictions about whether Christensen would have brought himself to stop abusing J.K.J. and M.J.J. Maybe more robust policies could have fostered a zero-tolerance culture in which Christensen would not have felt free to openly harass female inmates, thereby opening the door to his escalating abuse. Or they could have caused Christensen to curb his conduct because of a greater risk of detection—whether from closer monitoring, more frequent guard rotations, or a policy preventing male officers from being alone with female inmates. But maybe not. The point need not detain us because the evidence allowed the jury to conclude that the County's acting to institute more robust policies—foremost addressing prevention and detection—and then training on those policies would have resulted in another correctional officer, an inmate, or even J.K.J. and M.J.J. taking some step to stop Christensen's sexual assaults. The evidence did not require the jury to accept as inevitable that Christensen's conduct was unpreventable, undetectable, and incapable of giving rise to Monell liability. . . . Nor was the jury compelled to conclude that the sexual abuse suffered by J.K.J. and M.J.J. had one and only one cause. . . The law allowed the jury to consider the evidence in its entirety, use its common sense, and draw inferences as part of deciding for itself. . . . Darryl Christensen's long-term abuse of J.K.J. and M.J.J. more than justified the jury's verdict against him. And the jury was furnished with sufficient evidence to hold Polk County liable not on the basis of Christensen's horrific acts but rather the County's own deliberate choice to stand idly by while the female inmates under its care were exposed to an unmistakable risk that they would be sexually assaulted—a choice that was the moving force behind the harm inflicted on J.K.J. and M.J.J. The jury so concluded, and we AFFIRM.") and J.K.J. v. Polk County, 960 F.3d 367, 386 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1125 (2021) (Hamilton, J., concurring) ("I join Judge Scudder's opinion for the court. In light of comments in the dissenting opinions, it is worth emphasizing that the Monell claims against the county are based on much more than whether guards knew right from wrong or knew that it was a crime to have sex with inmates. The Monell claims are also based on the county's failure to monitor its guards and its failure to provide effective channels for complaints so as to discourage such abuse. To illustrate the point, consider an analogy involving only greed, rather than lust and a guard's horrific abuse of power over inmates. Any bank will train its tellers that they should not steal and that theft is a crime. All tellers know that whether they receive the training or not. Suppose, though, that a bank's managers fail to conduct regular audits of tellers' cash drawers. Most tellers are honest despite the lack of oversight, but one gives in to temptation. Managers later discover that the one teller has been stealing money for years. The risk of embezzlement, even by tellers who know the law and the rules, is obvious. So is the need for audits. The risk and need are so obvious that the bank's stockholders could easily find that its managers (i.e., its policymakers) were not merely negligent but deliberately indifferent (i.e., reckless) toward this obvious and known risk, even if only one teller gave in to the temptation. The same logic applies here to Christensen, who repeatedly gave in to the temptation to abuse his power over inmates.") with J.K.J. v. Polk County, 960 F.3d 367, 386-89 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1125 (2021) (Easterbrook, J., dissenting in part) ("I agree with the majority that the verdict against Christensen is sound and with Judge Brennan that the verdict against Polk County is not. Because this appeal has occasioned so much ink, and my assessment differs somewhat from that of my colleagues, I have concluded that it would be helpful to state briefly why I find the claim against the County lacking. . . . Connick is the only decision in which the Justices assessed on the merits a contention that a unit of government violated the Constitution by inadequate training that failed to avert one particular bad outcome. It rejected the claim. The reasons the Court gave are true of the Jail as well. Christensen is the one and only rapist among the guards; no prior, similar incidents notified the County about looming problems. And as soon as supervisors learned of Christensen's misconduct, the County ended his employment and put him in prison himself. . . . I can see a need for explication about 'emotional' or 'psychological' harassment, but anyone can understand the rule against intimate physical relations between guards and inmates. The Jail made sure that every guard knew about this rule. What training is required to get guards to grasp it? The problem is not a want of comprehension (as in Canton's hypothetical) but a want of compliance. Yet subordinate employees' failure to comply with a valid policy is not a ground of liability against a municipality. . . . In sum, plaintiffs have not tried to show that the rule against guards' intimate contact with prisoners is hard to understand (in general, or for the Jail's guards in particular). That leaves nothing for a jury to consider. The suit fails for legal reasons. Evidence that earlier violations of the Jail's policy were tolerated by slaps on the wrist would be better proof that the 'real policy' differed from the written one, but only if the toleration were attributable to the County rather than to subordinates. If policymakers create a valid rule that is sabotaged by persons lower in the hierarchy, liability is supposed to fall on those persons rather than the governmental entity. That is how Monell differs from respondeat superior. At all events, in a case based on a theory of single-incident liability, which is how my colleagues treat this suit, evidence about laxity concerning less-serious matters is irrelevant. . . .If Monell is to be overruled, and vicarious liability established, that should be done forthrightly (and by the Supreme Court), rather than via the roundabout route the majority has devised.") and J.K.J. v. Polk County*,* 960 F.3d 367, 389, 394, 399-420 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1125 (2021) (Brennan, J., with whom Bauer and Sykes, JJ., join, dissenting in part) ("The majority opinion holds a municipal employer liable under § 1983 for a failure to train and a failure to supplement policies because its employee did what those policies and training expressly forbade him to do. Liability is based on the single-incident theory hypothesized in City of Canton[.] . . The 'rare' and 'narrow circumstances' under which that theory applies do not fit here. . . Nor does this case meet the stringent fault and causation requirements set by the Supreme Court to prove § 1983 liability. The majority opinion upholds a jury verdict finding a county liable for a jail guard's repeated rapes of two inmates. It does so without any evidence that Polk County actually and directly caused the plaintiffs' terrible injuries, and no affirmative link between the County's policies and the guard's crimes. It is undisputed that these horrible crimes were perpetrated without the County's knowledge. It is also undisputed that no pattern of similar violations put the County on notice of a need for specific training that would have prevented these sexual assaults. Yet the majority opinion concludes the same evidence that failed to show notice under pattern liability shows notice under single incident liability, as well as causation. . . .Municipal liability under § 1983 as set by the Supreme Court has traveled a winding route. But that route has a constant beacon to courts: each case examines what federal power may be exercised over state and municipal governments and considers the Court's desire to harmonize § 1983 with the structural limits of federalism. These precedents are dispositive here and warrant detailed review before their application. They prescribe a different outcome than reached by my colleagues in the majority. [Dissent engages in discussion of Supreme Court precedents] . . . . [I]n each of the post-Monell cases discussed—Tuttle, Canton, Bryan County, and Connick—the Court reversed a jury verdict for the plaintiff. . . . These precedents control the consideration of this case. The Supreme Court has never held a municipality liable for a failure to act in the absence of a pattern of prior similar violations. . . This case does not present such a claim either, for the reasons that follow. . . . The majority opinion holds the County employer liable for the crimes of its employee Christensen under the single-incident theory hypothesized in Canton, specifically for failure to train and for failure to supplement County policies. . . Those holdings rest on three conclusions:

Compare J.K.J. v. Polk County, 960 F.3d 367, 378-86 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1125 (2021) ("Here, . . . J.K.J. and M.J.J. do not claim that Polk County took

1. In the absence of a pattern of prior similar sexual assaults at the jail, the rapes of J.K.J. and M.J.J. by Christensen pose one of those 'rare' and 'narrow range of circumstances'. . . the Court hypothesized in Canton's footnote 10, in which the need for training in constitutional requirements is 'so obvious ex ante[.]'. .

2. The jail's omission of sexual assault prevention and detection measures in its written policies amounted to unconstitutional inaction under Monell. . .

3. The failure to train about sexual assault prevention and detection measures, or the omission of such measures from written policies, caused plaintiff's injuries. . .

In reaching these conclusions, the majority opinion departs from the Supreme Court's requirements in Canton, Bryan County, and Connick and oversteps the culpability and causation rules governing § 1983 claims, resulting in respondeat superior liability, an outcome forbidden since Monell. . . . The majority opinion recognizes that this case does not present a pattern of misconduct which gave notice to the County that its training program would cause constitutional violations. . . Nevertheless, it concludes the need to supplement the County's sexual assault training was 'so obvious' that the failure to do so amounted to deliberate indifference under Canton's single-incident theory. . . I respectfully part ways with my colleagues in the majority that the requirements to establish single-incident liability have been met here. . . . The majority opinion concludes repeatedly and with certainty that the jail posed an obvious risk that male guards would sexually assault female inmates. . . . Canton's single-incident hypothetical expressly considers only 'the need to train' officers. . . The Court has never extended single-incident liability outside failure to train. . . The claim at issue involves something different—purported gaps in the County's sexual assault express policies—not failure to train. . . . However phrased, it is not a 'difficult choice' or a 'difficult decision' for a guard not to rape an inmate. Such a decision is mandated by the law, written policies and training here, as well as any moral code. Just so, Christensen had no 'difficult choice.' He was instructed by the written policies, training, and the law not to sexually assault, but he willfully and surreptitiously ignored that training and instruction. For all these reasons, this case does not fit within the narrow and rare single-incident exception to the pattern requirement for municipal liability. . . . Plaintiffs' appalling injuries were not caused by a lack of specific training and policy language about sexual assault prevention and detection. They were caused by a miscreant guard's hidden, willful, and criminal defiance. There is no evidence that Christensen made the decision to assault plaintiffs for any reason related to inadequate training or policies. For example, no evidence shows that Christensen calculatedly exploited training and policy gaps. Nor does any evidence show that such gaps emboldened, let alone caused, Christensen to commit rapes. The record shows that when Christensen assaulted plaintiffs he knew he was acting contrary to his training and in violation of County policies. From this undisputed evidence, any reasonable fact finder would have to conclude that Christensen's bad-faith conduct, in conflicting with his employer's policies and training, caused plaintiffs' injuries. Christensen, not the County, was the 'moving force' that caused plaintiffs' injuries. . . . The constitutional claim against the County never should have reached the jury. Summary judgment should have been granted to the County because the claim was legally deficient, as shown above. . . The legal deficiency of the claim, more than the lack of evidence, should have led to its demise. If summary judgment had not been granted on the claim, judgment as a matter of law should have been granted to the County. . . . The majority opinion expands municipal liability under § 1983 beyond the boundaries established by federal appellate courts, including that of this circuit:

• No federal appellate court has ever extended the single-incident exception to the sexual assault context;

• No federal appellate court has ever extended the single-incident exception when the employee's compliance with the municipality's policy and training would have prevented the injuries; and

• Specialized training is not required to know that rape is wrong. . . .

Cash does not apply a single-incident theory analysis or even cite to Canton's single-incident hypothetical. Cash itself states it is not a failure-to-train case: 'the deliberate indifference concern in this case ... is not with a failure to train prison guards to distinguish between permissible and impermissible sexual contact with prisoners. Nor is it with providing sufficient supervision to ensure that guards make correct choices in this respect.'. . Cash also based its conclusion of liability on a generalized risk rather than a particularized inquiry (violating Bryan County, 520 U.S. at 410–13, 117 S.Ct. 1382), and it ignored the requirement of similar prior violations (violating Connick, 563 U.S. at 62–63, 131 S.Ct. 1350). A failure to supervise case, Cash holds: '[K]nowledge that an established practice has proved insufficient to deter lesser [sexual] misconduct can be found to serve notice that the practice is also insufficient to deter more egregious misconduct.'. . But that holding offers no help. Here, unlike Cash, the district court ruled that plaintiffs' pattern evidence of lesser misconduct failed to show notice of an obvious need for revised policies and training. Plaintiffs did not appeal that ruling. And unlike the majority opinion here, Cash does not deem it obvious that without training male guards will rape female inmates. To the extent the majority opinion may read Cash differently, district courts in the Second Circuit have not followed suit. . . . [S]ingle-incident liability should not be extended to cases involving a rogue officer not complying with uncomplicated and constitutionally sound policies and training. . . . Applying Connick, the inquiry is whether the Polk County Jail trained its guards not to commit sexual assault, not the amount or particulars of that training. . . Nevertheless, the majority opinion is replete with conclusions on the nature, quantity, and timing of the training: what language was and was not included in Polk County's written policies; what topics were and were not discussed in training sessions; when the training did and did not occur; and how the training should have been done, in contrast to how it was done. . . The majority opinion equates its conclusion of insufficient training with no training. But that decides the amount, type, and frequency of training. After Connick, . . . that is not the court's inquiry. . . . A lone correctional officer covertly committed terrible sexual assaults against two jail inmates. That employee is now behind bars for 30 years and has millions of dollars of civil judgments against him. At issue is whether his public employer is also liable for those crimes. Under the majority opinion, a single subordinate employee may secretly override municipal policy and create a new policy under which that public employer is accountable. That is vicarious liability, a collapse into respondeat superior against which the Supreme Court has repeatedly warned for 60 years. By stepping out and recognizing fault and causation on these facts, this decision departs from Supreme Court precedents, imports a negligence standard into the law of deliberate indifference, permits federal encroachment into an area of traditional state authority, and splits with other federal circuits. On these facts and under the controlling law, the employee, not the employer, should be held responsible for these plaintiffs' injuries. Therefore, I respectfully dissent in part.").

Compare Glisson v. Indiana Department of Corrections, 849 F.3d 372, 375-76, 378-82 (7th Cir. 2017) (en banc), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 109 (2017) ("We assume for the sake of argument here that none of these people, and none of the individual providers at the Diagnostic Center, personally did anything that would qualify as 'deliberate indifference' for Eighth Amendment purposes. Most of them had so little to do with Glisson that such a conclusion is quite unlikely. The question before us is instead whether, because of a deliberate policy choice pursuant to which no one was responsible for coordinating his overall care, Corizon itself violated Glisson's Eighth Amendment rights. . . . It is somewhat unusual to see an Eighth Amendment case relating to medical care in a prison in which the plaintiff does not argue that the individual medical provider was deliberately indifferent to a serious medical need. . . But unusual does not mean impossible, and this case well illustrates why an organization might be liable even if its individual agents are not. Without the full picture, each person might think that her decisions were an appropriate response to a problem; her failure to situate the care within a broader context could be at worst negligent, or even grossly negligent, but not deliberately indifferent. But if institutional policies are themselves deliberately indifferent to the quality of care provided, institutional liability is possible. . . . The critical question under Monell, reaffirmed in Los Angeles Cnty. v. Humphries, 562 U.S. 29 (2010), is whether a municipal (or corporate) policy or custom gave rise to the harm (that is, caused it), or if instead the harm resulted from the acts of the entity's agents. There are several ways in which a plaintiff might prove this essential element. . . .Either the content of an official policy, a decision by a final decisionmaker, or evidence of custom will suffice. The central question is always whether an official policy, however expressed (and we have no reason to think that the list in Monell is exclusive), caused the constitutional deprivation. It does not matter if the policy was duly enacted or written down, nor does it matter if the policy counsels aggressive intervention into a particular matter or a hands-off approach. . . . Mrs. Glisson asserts that Corizon had a deliberate policy not to require any kind of formal coordination of medical care either within an institution (such as the Diagnostic Center or Plainfield) or across institutions for prisoners who are transferred. This is not the same as an allegation that Corizon was oblivious to the entire issue of care coordination. Read fairly, she is saying that Corizon consciously decided not to include this service, not that it had never thought about the issue and thus had nothing that could be called a policy. In some cases, it may be difficult to tell the difference between inadvertence and a policy to omit something, but on the facts presented by Mrs. Glisson, this is not one of them. . . .Notably, neither the Supreme Court in Harris, nor the Ninth Circuit, nor the Third Circuit, said that institutional liability was possible only if the record reflected numerous examples of the constitutional violation in question. The key is whether there is a conscious decision not to take action. That can be proven in a number of ways, including but not limited to repeated actions. A single memo or decision showing that the choice not to act is deliberate could also be enough. The critical question under Monell remains this: is the action about which the plaintiff is complaining one of the institution itself, or is it merely one undertaken by a subordinate actor? We reiterate that the question whether Corizon had a policy to eschew any way of coordinating care is not the only hurdle plaintiff faces: she must also prove that the approach Corizon took violated her son's constitutional rights. At trial, there is no reason why Corizon would not be entitled to introduce evidence of its track record, if it believes that this evidence will vindicate its decision not to follow the INDOC guidelines. . . .One does not need to be an expert to know that complex, chronic illness requires comprehensive and coordinated care. In Harris, the Court recognized that because it is a 'moral certainty' that police officers 'will be required to arrest fleeing felons,' 'the need to train officers in the constitutional limitations on the use of deadly force ... can be said to be "so obvious," that failure to do so could properly be characterized as "deliberate indifference" to constitutional rights.'. . A jury could find that it was just as certain that Corizon providers would be confronted with patients with chronic illnesses, and that the need to establish protocols for the coordinated care of chronic illnesses is obvious. And in the final analysis, if a jury reasonably could find that Corizon's 'policymakers ... [were] deliberately indifferent to the need' for such protocols, and that the absence of protocols caused Glisson's death. . . A jury could further conclude that Corizon had actual knowledge that, without protocols for coordinated, comprehensive treatment, the constitutional rights of chronically ill inmates would sometimes be violated, and in the face of that knowledge it nonetheless 'adopt[ed] a policy of inaction.'. . Finally, that jury could conclude that Corizon, indifferent to the serious risk such a course posed to chronically ill inmates, made 'a deliberate choice to follow a course of action ... from among various alternatives' to do nothing. . . Monell requires no more. In closing, we reiterate that we are not holding that the Constitution or any other source of federal law required Corizon to adopt the Directives or any other particular document. But the Constitution does require it to ensure that a well-recognized risk for a defined class of prisoners not be deliberately left to happenstance. Corizon had notice of the problems posed by a total lack of coordination. Yet despite that knowledge, it did nothing for more than seven years to address that risk. There is no magic number of injuries that must occur before its failure to act can be considered deliberately indifferent. . . Nicholas Glisson may not have been destined to live a long life, but he was managing his difficult medical situation successfully until he fell into the hands of the Indiana prison system and its medical-care provider, Corizon. Thirty-seven days after he entered custody and came under Corizon's care, he was dead. On this record, a jury could find that Corizon's decision not to enact centralized treatment protocols for chronically ill inmates led directly to his death.") with Glisson v. Indiana Department of Corrections, 849 F.3d 372, 383-90 (7th Cir. 2017) (en banc), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 109 (2017) (Sykes, J., joined by Bauer, Flaum, and Kanne, JJ., dissenting) ("Today the court endorses Monell liability without evidence of corporate fault or causation. That contradicts long-settled principles of municipal liability under § 1983. The doctrinal shift is subtle but significant. The court rests its decision on the conceptual idea that a gap in official policy can sometimes be treated as an actual policy for purposes of municipal liability under Monell v. Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658 (1978). I have no quarrel with that as a theoretical matter. A municipality's failure to have a formal policy in place on a particular subject may represent its intentional decision not to have such a policy—that is, a policy not to have a policy—and that institutional choice may in appropriate circumstances form the basis of a Monell claim. The Supreme Court's cases, and ours, leave room for this theory of institutional liability under § 1983. . . .But Mrs. Glisson produced no evidence to support the fault and causation elements of her claim. My colleagues identify none, yet they hold that a reasonable jury could find in her favor. I do not see how, without evidence on two of the three elements of the claim. The court's decision thus materially alters Monell doctrine in this circuit. With respect, I cannot join it. . . .Where, as here, the challenged policy or custom is not itself unlawful, something more is required to establish corporate culpability and causation. Helpfully, Brown contains further instructions for Monell claims like this one that do not rest on allegations that a municipal policy on its face violates federal law. This part of Brown begins with a warning that's worth repeating here. The Court cautioned that Monell claims not involving an allegation that the municipal action itself violated federal law ... present much more difficult problems of proof.'. . .[After discussing Monell, Brown, and City of Canton v. Harris the dissent concludes that] Together these decisions stand for the proposition that a Monell plaintiff's own injury, without more, is insufficient to establish municipal fault and causation. The plaintiff must instead present evidence of a pattern of constitutional injuries traceable to the challenged policy or custom—or at least more than one. Only then is the record sufficient to permit an inference that the municipality was on notice that its policy or custom, though lawful on its face, had failed to prevent constitutional torts. Put slightly differently, the plaintiff's own injury, standing alone, does not permit an inference of institutional deliberate indifference to a known risk of constitutional violations. . . .In short, except in the unusual case in which an express policy (or an act of an authorized policymaker) is itself unconstitutional, a Monell plaintiff must produce evidence of a series of constitutional injuries traceable to the challenged municipal policy or custom; the failure to do so means a failure of proof on the fault and causation elements of the claim. Brown is unequivocal on this point: If the plaintiff can point only to his own injury, 'the danger that a municipality will be held liable without fault is high' and the claim ordinarily fails. . . It's true that Brown and Harris do not foreclose the possibility that the requirement of pattern evidence might be relaxed in a narrow set of circumstances where the likelihood of recurring constitutional violations is an obvious or 'highly predictable consequence' of the municipality's policy choice. . . . But the Court took great pains to emphasize the narrowness of this 'hypothesized' exception. . . .Despite the contextual language, I see no reason to think that this hypothetical path to liability in the absence of pattern evidence is open only in failure-to-train cases. So I agree with my colleagues that evidence of repeated constitutional violations is not always required to advance a Monell claim to trial. But it's clear that this path to corporate liability is quite narrow. If the plaintiff lacks evidence of a pattern of constitutional injuries traceable to the challenged policy or custom, Monell liability is not possible unless the evidence shows that the plaintiff's situation was a recurring one (i.e., not unusual, random, or isolated) and the likelihood of constitutional injury was an obvious or highly predictable consequence of the municipality's policy choice. The Court's use of the terms 'obvious' and 'highly predictable' is plainly meant to limit the scope of this exception to those truly rare cases in which the policy or custom in question is so certain to produce constitutional harm that inferences of corporate deliberate indifference and causation are reasonable even in the absence of any prior injuries—that is, in the absence of the kind of evidence normally required to establish constructive notice. Our cases have always followed this understanding of Monell doctrine. . . And in all cases we have consistently required Monell plaintiffs to produce evidence of more than one constitutional injury traceable to the challenged policy or custom (unless, of course, the policy or custom is itself unconstitutional, in which case the singular wrong to the plaintiffs is clearly attributable to the municipality rather than its employees). [collecting cases] Finally, following the Supreme Court's lead in Brown and Harris, we have left open the possibility that a Monell claim might proceed to trial based on the plaintiff's injury alone, but only in rare cases where constitutional injury is a manifest and highly predictable consequence of the municipality's policy choice. . . So far, we've allowed recovery under this exception only once, in a case involving a jail healthcare provider's failure to ensure that its suicide-prevention protocols were scrupulously followed. See Woodward v. Corr. Med. Servs. of Ill., Inc., 368 F.3d 917 (7th Cir. 2004). . . . Although there was no evidence of prior suicides at the jail, we held that Monell liability was appropriate because inmate suicide is an obvious and highly predictable consequence of a jail healthcare provider's thoroughgoing failure to enforce its suicide-prevention program. . . This case is not at all like Woodward. While it's patently obvious that a systemic failure to enforce a jail suicide-prevention program will eventually result in inmate suicide, inmate death is not an obvious or highly predictable consequence of the alleged policy lapse at the center of this case. Mrs. Glisson claims that Corizon's failure to promulgate formal guidelines for the care of chronically ill inmates as required by INDOC Directive HCSD-2.06 caused her son's death. Everyone agrees that nothing in 'the Constitution or any other source of federal law required Corizon to adopt the Directive[ ] or any other particular document.'. . So evidence is needed to prove corporate culpability and causation; in the usual case, this means evidence of a series of prior similar injuries. But Mrs. Glisson presented no evidence that other inmates were harmed by the failure to have protocols in place as required by the Directive. In the absence of prior injuries, Corizon was not on notice that protocols were needed to prevent constitutional torts. So Mrs. Glisson cannot prevail unless she can show that inmate death was an obvious or highly predictable consequence of the failure to promulgate formal protocols of the type specified in HCSD-2.06. She has not done so. . . . It's far from obvious that formal protocols of the sort required by Directive HCSD-2.06 were needed to prevent constitutional torts of the kind allegedly suffered by Nicholas Glisson. . . . Unlike the jail-suicide case, it is neither self-evident nor predictable—let alone highly predictable—that Corizon's reliance on professional standards of medical and nursing care (instead of HCSD-2.06-compliant protocols) would lead to constitutional injuries of the sort suffered by Nicholas Glisson. . . . Monell liability requires proof of culpability significantly greater than simple negligence. It also requires evidence that Corizon's action—not the actions of its doctors and nurses—directly caused the injury. There is no such evidence here. Without the necessary evidentiary support, a jury cannot possibly draw the requisite inferences of corporate fault and causation. On this record, a verdict for Mrs. Glisson is not possible. More broadly, by eliding the normal requirement of pattern evidence and relying instead on sweeping and unsubstantiated generalizations about the obviousness of the risk, my colleagues have significantly expanded a previously narrow exception to the general rule that a valid Monell claim requires evidence of prior injuries in order to establish corporate deliberate indifference and causation. The Supreme Court has instructed us to rigorously enforce the requirements of corporate culpability and causation to ensure that municipal liability does not collapse into vicarious liability. Today's decision does not heed that instruction. Nicholas Glisson arrived in Indiana's custody suffering from complicated and serious medical conditions. Some of Corizon's medical professionals may have been negligent in his care, as Dr. Sommer maintains, and their negligence may have hastened his death. That's a tragic outcome, to be sure; if substantiated, the wrong can be compensated in a state medical-malpractice suit. Under traditional principles of Monell liability, however, there is no basis for a jury to find that Corizon was deliberately indifferent to a known or obvious risk that its failure to adopt formal protocols in compliance with HCSD-2.06 would likely lead to constitutional violations. Nor is there a factual basis to find that this alleged gap in corporate policy caused Glisson's death. Accordingly, I would affirm the summary judgment for Corizon.").

See also Hightower v. City of Philadelphia, 130 F.4th 352, 356-57 (3d Cir. 2025) ("Hightower says the city had a policy or custom of not separating inmates by security-risk level during intake. But he cannot identify any policy saying that. True, the city had a policy of separating general population inmates by security level. But it did not have any separation policy for inmates during intake. And the lack of a policy is not a policy. A policy requires 'an official proclamation, policy or edict by a decisionmaker possessing final authority.'. . Plus, the city did have a different written intake policy that, if followed, would have prevented this attack; Tyler should have gone from the infirmary straight to the general jail population. But the city is not liable just because its employees did not follow this policy. . . Challenges to 'failures and inadequacies by municipalities' must take the deliberate-indifference path, not the custom-or-policy path. . . Nor has Hightower shown a custom that violated his right. Even if he could show that the city had a custom of commingling pretrial detainees that was 'so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law,' the custom would be facially constitutional because the Fourteenth Amendment does not require the city to reshuffle inmates in intake once they are classified. . . And the city's policy of separating general population inmates by security classification does not, as Hightower suggests, make its practice of housing differently classified inmates together in intake for mere hours unconstitutional on its face. For a facial constitutional challenge, it would be too speculative to assume that higher-classification inmates inherently pose a substantial risk of harm to lower-classification ones while they are briefly comingled in intake. . . . Hightower also argues that the city caused his alleged constitutional injury by failing to separate inmates in intake by classification status, a choice that was deliberately indifferent to inmates' rights. Under Monell, deliberate indifference requires 'proof that a municipal actor disregarded a known or obvious consequence of his action.'. . Ordinarily, this means that a plaintiff must show that '[a] pattern of similar constitutional violations' put the city on notice that, by failing to act, it was being deliberately indifferent to inmates' rights. . . Here, too, Hightower falls short. Though a deputy warden testified that other violent inmates in intake had attacked nonviolent ones, she could not identify a single example. And Hightower's expert just rehashed equally empty deposition testimony. Though the expert opined that housing Hightower and Tyler together was like 'mixing predator with prey,' a lurid metaphor, he offered no factual support. Without that support, we cannot say that his opinion could sustain a jury's verdict. . . And at oral argument, counsel could not cite any other evidence of a pattern. Hightower says the city can be liable even absent any pattern because Tyler's attack was such an obvious consequence of the city's failure to reshuffle inmates in intake after classification. But this single incident of a higher-classification inmate assaulting a lower-classification one is not enough to hold the city liable. True, the Supreme Court has 'hypothesized' that 'in a narrow range of circumstances, a pattern of similar violations might not be necessary to show deliberate indifference.'. . But it has never found this bar satisfied. And the only hypothetical example of this liability that it has recognized is extreme: if a city armed its police with guns and set them loose without any legal training on when to use them. . . Not even failing to train prosecutors on their Brady disclosure duties is enough. . . Thus, the risk to Hightower was not 'so patently obvious' that the city can be held liable. . . Failing to temporarily segregate inmates falls far short of giving police guns without training them on the law of deadly force. * * * * * Hightower suffered greatly. But the city cannot be held liable. Because the city adopted a reasonable policy for handling inmates who are often violent and dangerous, we will affirm."); Wadsworth v. Nguyen, 129 F.4th 38, 68-69 (1st Cir. 2025) ("The record contains no information regarding any pattern wherein MSAD school principals, or any other staff member, harassed a student and the harassment did not stop because staff did not know how to report the harassment. Wadsworth nevertheless suggests that no such pattern is needed in her case because this is the type of situation where the consequences of not training staff would have been obvious to MSAD. We disagree. To begin, Wadsworth has failed to explain how these circumstances fit within the rare category where a plaintiff need not point to a pattern of prior violations. . . Further, we are not aware of any case that supports Wadsworth's position. Indeed, there is nothing about this highly unusual situation that would suggest that failing to train school staff on how to report sexual harassment when the harasser is the principal would mean that no staff would report sexual harassment that they were aware of. Especially in light of the existing sexual harassment policy and reporting procedure, which were provided to staff, we cannot see how a failure to train employees 'is so likely to result in a violation of constitutional rights that the need for training is patently obvious.'. . We do, however, echo the district court's admonition that whether MSAD's training program -- or lack thereof -- is a 'best practice' is not currently before us. Thus, we also affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to MSAD on Wadsworth's failure to train claim."); Stapleton v. Lozano, 125 F.4th 743, 754 (5th Cir. 2025) ("[T]he Stapletons alleged no 'pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees.'. . The Stapletons allege that 'Chief Solis had a policy of failing to adequately monitor inmates and ignoring their needs,' and 'all inmates held at the Progreso jail would be left unsupervised for periods of time under the policy if the officers received other calls.' Their allegation that a problematic policy exists—and that this policy could violate a detainee's constitutional rights—is not enough to overcome qualified immunity. The Stapletons do not allege or point to a pattern of similar constitutional violations within the Progreso Police Department, including officers' failure to monitor detainees, which amounted to deliberate indifference to detainees' serious medical needs, and resulting substantial harm. 'Without notice that a course of training is deficient in a particular respect, decisionmakers can hardly be said to have deliberately chosen a training program that will cause violations of constitutional rights.'"); Puente v. City of Phoenix, 123 F.4th 1035, 1066-68 (9th Cir. 2024) ("Plaintiffs base their 'failure to train' argument on the assertion that, although the City of Phoenix extensively trains PPD officers 'on how to use' chemical agents to disperse protesters, it failed to properly teach them 'whether or when' to do so. As previously discussed, we have found no triable issue as to whether Defendants committed a constitutional violation in most claims in this case, but we disposed of Guillen's excessive-force claim solely based on the 'clearly established' prong of qualified immunity. Given that there therefore is a triable issue only as to whether Defendants caused Guillen to suffer a constitutional injury, Plaintiffs' 'failure to train' claim rests on showing that Guillen's injury in particular was the obvious result of the

allegedly inadequate training. . . But Plaintiffs have failed to show that her constitutional injury was such an obvious consequence that PPD's failure to more thoroughly train its officers on the use of chemical agents amounted to 'deliberate indifference' toward her rights. Plaintiffs do not provide any basis to dispute the record evidence showing that the PPD did train its officers about 'whether or when' to deploy chemical agents. The record, including portions cited by Plaintiffs, show that PPD officers received training on the responsibility to protect protesters' 'constitutional rights to assemble and exercise free speech' and were told that chemical agents should only be deployed when 'absolutely necessary' and 'other passive means have failed to restore order.'. . . Rather than cite any 'instance[ ] of similar unlawful conduct' prior to the protest—let alone a pattern—that might provide the City with notice that its existing training program was inadequate, Plaintiffs instead assert that this case presents the 'rare' fact pattern in which evidence of a single violation is enough to establish Monell liability under a 'failure to train' theory. . . But the record indicates that, despite deploying at numerous protests every year, Grenadiers rarely resort to using chemical agents. Plaintiffs do not explain how Guillen's alleged constitutional injury in this case is an 'obvious consequence' of PPD's current training regimen when the record indicates that PPD officers almost never deploy chemical agents, let alone illegally. . . We therefore determine that the district court was correct that Plaintiffs failed to raise a material factual dispute regarding a 'failure to train' for purposes of Monell.* * * We therefore affirm the district court's dismissal of Plaintiffs' claims against Defendant City of Phoenix."); Monacelli v. City of Dallas, Texas, No. 24-10067, 2024 WL 4692025, at *3 (5th Cir. Nov. 6, 2024) (not reported) ("Monacelli invokes a Dallas Police Department report on lessons learned during the George Floyd protests to identify areas where training or communication could improve going forward. The report does identify some areas where gaps existed in the training of Dallas Police Department officers. But even if Monacelli can show these inadequacies are closely related to his injuries, he cannot show deliberate indifference. 'Deliberate indifference is a stringent standard,' more than mere negligence or, even, gross negligence. . . There are two ways to show deliberate indifference. . . first, plausible allegations of a pattern. . .and, second, the 'single-incident exception,'. . . which we've described as 'extremely narrow.'. . Monacelli relies on the single-incident exception to plead deliberate indifference here. But 'our caselaw has "generally reserved" the single-incident method of proving deliberate indifference for cases in which the policymaker provides "no training whatsoever" with respect to the relevant constitutional duty, as opposed to training that is inadequate only as to the particular conduct that gave rise to the plaintiff's injury.'. . Monacelli's complaint does not allege an utter absence of law-enforcement training with respect to the relevant constitutional duty he alleges caused his injuries. Rather, it concedes some law-enforcement training, a point reiterated in the Dallas Police Department's lessons-learned report on which he bases much of his claims. . . The complaint thus fails to plausibly allege a single-incident exception under our caselaw. Monacelli's failure-to-enact claim fails for the same reason. . . The complaint does not plausibly allege either a pattern of violations or the absence of policy under the single-incident exception."); Cosenza v. City of Worcester, 120 F.4th 30, 40-41 (1st Cir. 2024) ("The 1999 DOJ report (and other, similar reports and recommendations issued at that time and relied upon by Cosenza) cannot be said to have put Worcester on 'actual or constructive notice that a particular omission in their training program [would] cause[ ] city employees to violate citizens' constitutional rights.'. . Many of the procedures Cosenza now argues were constitutionally required in 2002 were not required under the Massachusetts Constitution until 2009, . . . and the SJC did not adopt a position consistent with the 1999 DOJ report on which Cosenza relies until 2015[.] . . The Massachusetts Constitution is more protective of due process in this regard than the United States Constitution, which to date incorporates fewer of the precautions advocated for by experts in the field of eyewitness identification than does the Massachusetts Constitution. . . Cosenza also argues that Worcester is liable on similar theories for its officers' alleged fabrication and suppression of evidence. We agree with the district court that Cosenza has not identified any record evidence that Worcester 'had an express policy that caused its officers to fabricate or suppress evidence' or 'fail[ed] to train its officers' in that regard. . . On the contrary, it is undisputed that it was the Worcester Police Department's preferred practice to disclose to the District Attorney's Office all known information about a case. Even if the officers had failed to comply with that practice, that alone is not 'sufficient to establish that they were trained inadequately.'. .On this record, no reasonable factfinder could find deliberate indifference, making summary judgment for the City appropriate."); Bell v. Williams, 108 F.4th 809, 825-26 (9th Cir. 2024) ("While we give deference to the jury's finding that Bell proved his allegations at trial, we hold that Bell's failure-to-train theory fails as a matter of law. Allowing the City to be held liable in this case would extend Monell liability far beyond the circumstances in which the Supreme Court has sanctioned it. Compare the facts of this case with the canonical failure-to-train example from City of Canton v. Harris. There, the Court assumed that a municipality could be held liable if it sent police officers into the streets without training them on when and how to use deadly force. . . Deliberate indifference to such an obvious risk would satisfy the high standard for a failure-to-train theory of liability. In contrast, San Francisco jail officers receive training at several stages of their careers on how to perform cell extractions and when to place detainees in safety cells. They also receive some degree of training on how to accommodate detainees with disabilities. We assume there was no training module focused directly on the overlap between those two topics, but the lack of such a distinct training module does not demonstrate deliberate indifference. Far from resembling the Canton hypothetical, this case aligns more closely with Connick v. Thompson, where the Supreme Court rejected plaintiff Thompson's attempt to hold a municipality liable for its prosecutors' failure to turn over exculpatory evidence in a criminal proceeding against Thompson, resulting in Thompson spending eighteen undeserved years in prison. . . The Supreme Court held that the municipality was not liable for its prosecutors' failure to comply with Brady v. Maryland because, despite any shortcomings in the municipality's training program, the prosecutors' legal education 'equipped [them] with the tools to find, interpret, and apply legal principles.'. . The prosecutors' general familiarity with the Brady rule distinguished Thompson's case from Canton, where the hypothetical armed police officers were given no training on the constitutional limits of deadly force. . . As in Connick, the training program for jail officers in this case covered the relevant topics with reasonable specificity. With the benefit of hindsight, we can poke holes in the training program and find areas that might deserve greater attention, especially in a case like this where cell extractions are performed routinely in a pod with many disabled detainees. But those narrow gaps do not demonstrate deliberate indifference to a known risk. In constructing the training program, the City could reasonably expect jail officers to connect the dots between different training modules when those subjects intersect in real-world situations. Thus, the City's training program does not demonstrate deliberate indifference to a known risk under the 'most tenuous' theory of Monell liability. . . We reverse the district court's decision denying the City's motion for judgment as a matter of law as to Bell's Monell claim based on excessive force."); Bannon v. Godin, 99 F.4th 63, 104 (1st Cir. 2024) (Montecalvo, J., dissenting in part and concurring in part) ("Plaintiff also asserts that the City knows that the police department has a long history of excessive force claims, and it thus follows that the City knew it needed to improve training on the proper use of force. This is far too broad a view of when repeated violations put a municipality on notice that its training is inadequate. Excessive force claims can involve an infinite number of factual scenarios, including highly varying degrees of force itself -- clearly, a use of force can be reasonable in one circumstance yet unreasonable in another. Without more particularized claims that the City's awareness of repeated excessive force claims involving similar policies (such as conduct during multi-officer arrests) or factual scenarios (such as where officers used deadly force against a physically injured arrestee or claims involving the same officers), I cannot conclude on this record that the City had sufficient notice that their training was insufficient as to rise to the level of deliberate indifference. Finally, Plaintiff argues that this case falls within the narrow exception for circumstances where the constitutional violation was highly predictable due to the officers' lack of ability to handle recurring situations. The need to train officers on the constitutional limitations on the use of deadly force, see Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985), can be said to be 'so obvious' that failure to do so could properly be characterized as 'deliberate indifference' to constitutional rights, even without a pattern of violations. . . However, Plaintiff has not asserted that the City offered no training on the use of deadly force, as discussed above. Rather, Plaintiff argues that the training program was 'imperfect' -- imperfection is not sufficient to show deliberate indifference. . . Plaintiff also has not pointed to other areas of training that the officers did not receive to which this exception may apply. Accordingly, because I find that no reasonable juror could find deliberate indifference on the part of the City on this record, I concur with my colleagues in their conclusion that the district court's granting of summary judgment in favor of the City should be affirmed, albeit for different reasons.") (Note: Majority had found no underlying Fourth Amendment violation); Estate of Wallmow v. Oneida County, 99 F.4th 385, 394 (7th Cir. 2024) ("At bottom, the Estate fails on the first prong because the 'policy' it alleges is not a policy at all. Although the facts bear out the Estate's claim that officers did not always conduct cell checks with unflagging rigor—often allowing inmates to leave bed coverings hanging and not always putting eyes on each inmate, since the cameras did not show all parts of each cell—the jail's on-point policy did call on officers to observe each inmate at least once an hour and to look for such abnormalities. The Estate's response is to argue the lax enforcement of the policy is a custom in the jail that amounts to a policy decision. Such claims can prevail only where the lax practice was 'so pervasive that acquiescence on the part of policymakers was apparent.'. . That bar is too high to clear on these facts. To be sure, Symonds testified that some rules and regulations enjoyed stricter enforcement than others, and that the rule against hanging bed coverings fell on the slacker side. But he also explained that the cell block that housed Wallmow was for newer inmates, and longer-tenured inmates would have been told 'you can't hang stuff.' Officers did enforce the policy, even if not against newcomers. There was no acquiescence on the County's part in ignoring the policy, no custom of allowing inmates that small privacy. Nor can the Estate establish, as it must, that the county's inaction bore a 'known or obvious risk' of causing constitutional violations. . . The undisputed evidence here reveals that Wallmow's was the first death by suicide in the jail's 20-year history. Only once before had an inmate made a serious attempt on his own life, and on that occasion an officer intervened to save his life. . . .Wallmow's fate is tragic. Jails should, and often do, have policies that help connect people at risk of death by suicide to mental health resources and get them the help they need. Indeed, Oneida County Jail has those policies and those resources, though no one brought them to bear on Wallmow. The problem with the Estate's claim is that we cannot indulge the temptation to employ hindsight. Wallmow thrice disavowed that he was at risk, the jail took him at his word, and after his talk with Bunce nothing indicated otherwise. So the jail resolved to keep an eye on Wallmow without taking more intrusive steps. That course complies with the Constitution's requirements."); Chisesi v. Hunady, No. 21-11700, 2024 WL 1638587, at *7 (11th Cir. Apr. 16, 2024) (not reported), cert. denied, No. 24-406, 2024 WL 5011732 (U.S. Dec. 9, 2024) and pet. for cert. filed, No. 24-538 (U.S. Nov. 8, 2024) ("In this case, the § 1983 claim asserted against Sheriff Mack rests solely on a single incident—the shooting of Victor—rather than a pattern of unconstitutional conduct. Even if Officer Hunady committed a constitutional violation, the 'narrow circumstances' that justify imposing liability on Sheriff Mack for failure to train on the basis of a single incident are not present here. Chisesi presented evidence that from 2015 to 2018, there were at least 1,000 officer-involved shootings in the United States where the subject appeared to be in a mental health crisis. Although this evidence shows the possibility of recurring situations involving those suffering mental health crises, the evidence is far more equivocal on whether there was an obvious potential for the violation of constitutional rights and an obvious need for more or different training. While certainly important training topics—engaging with mentally ill individuals, handling barricaded subjects, and performing de-escalation techniques—the failure to train officers in those areas does not "carry a high probability for constitutional violations in the manner intended by the 'so obvious' notice that would open the door to [supervisor] liability." Id. Moreover, we cannot say that Sheriff Mack knew to a moral certainty that constitutional violations would result from declining to further train his deputies on engaging with individuals experiencing mental health crises. Thus, Sheriff Mack's failure to train sheriff deputies in these areas falls outside the limited circumstances that the Supreme Court has hypothesized could give rise to single-incident liability for failure to train. Ultimately, we conclude that Sheriff Mack is entitled to summary judgment because Chisesi failed to demonstrate that Sheriff Mack had actual or constructive notice that the particular omissions in the training program were likely to result in constitutional violations."); Perez v. City of Fresno, 98 F.4th 919, 931 (9th Cir. 2024) ("Plaintiffs contend that the following evidence creates a triable issue on their failure-to-train claim: the facts of the incident, testimony regarding the officers' unfamiliarity with the dangers of restraint asphyxia, and Plaintiffs' expert report describing the inadequacies in FPD's and FCSO's training on the risks of prone restraint. But what is missing is any evidence pointing to a pattern of excessive-force incidents by untrained officers that resulted in the outcome here—restraint asphyxia. . . Accordingly, to establish a question of fact regarding municipal liability, Plaintiffs needed to show that the unconstitutional consequences of failing to train officers on restraint asphyxia were 'patently obvious.'. . They did not. As an initial matter, Plaintiffs acknowledge that FPD and FCSO maintain policies to prevent restraint and positional asphyxia. While two FPD officers testified that they were not trained on prone-restraint asphyxia, a third FPD officer testified that he was trained and was taught to monitor a prone individual's breathing. Likewise, a FCSO deputy stated that it is unlikely that an individual would asphyxiate from downward pressure while in a prone restraint but nevertheless explained that he was trained to monitor for signs of restraint asphyxia. The possible inadequate training of two FPD officers about the risks of restraint asphyxia is insufficient to support a Monell claim."); Farris v. Oakland County, Michigan, 96 F.4th 956, 969 (6th Cir. 2024) ("Here, Farris argues that Oakland County has failed to train its officers about when they should use spit hoods on detainees (especially pregnant women). Yet, even if Farris has shown an inadequacy in the county's training, she has fallen short of establishing its deliberate indifference. Farris does not attempt to prove that the deputies have followed a 'pattern' of unconstitutionally using spit hoods. . . And she has not shown that the need to train the officers on this precise practice should have been so 'obvious' that the use of a spit hood on Farris alone could establish the county's deliberate indifference. . . Most notably, Farris identifies no other training defects. To the contrary, the county's use-of-force policy makes clear that the deputies must 'receive annual Use of Force training.'. . The county thus could reasonably conclude that this general training on the need to employ only 'objectively reasonable' force would adequately convey when officers should use spit hoods. . . Farris lastly argues that the county's 'change-out' policy (which allows opposite-sex deputies to help remove an arrestee's personal clothes when necessary) violates Michigan's strip-search law. But again, it is not obvious that a 'change out' equals a 'strip search.' And this state-law issue is irrelevant to this Fourth Amendment claim anyway."); McNeal v. LeBlanc, 93 F.4th 840, 841 (5th Cir. 2024) (Duncan, J., joined by Richman, CJ. and Jones, Smith, Engelhardt, Oldham, and Wilson, JJ., dissenting from denial of en banc rehearing) ("As I've explained before, in the rising tide of suits by overdetained prisoners against Louisiana officials, our court routinely misapplies Connick v. Thompson. . . Yes, we pay lip service to Connick's requirement of a 'pattern' of similar violations, see Parker v. LeBlanc, 73 F.4th 400, 405 (5th Cir. 2023), but in the same breath we read that requirement out of existence. . . The result is that our court has now 'turn[ed] § 1983 into a source of vicarious liability for the heads of State agencies.'. . That mocks Connick and decades of prior precedent. . . Ironically, Connick overruled our en banc court. . . Now that a 9-8 majority has refused to rehear this case and correct our pattern of underruling Connick, our court may have the last word. If this were a movie, it would be called The Fifth Circuit Strikes Back. I dissent."); Mosier v. Evans, 90 F.4th 541, 549-50 (6th Cir. 2024) ("To succeed on a failure to train claim, a plaintiff must show that: '(1) the training or supervision was inadequate for the tasks performed; (2) the inadequacy was the result of the municipality's deliberate indifference; and (3) the inadequacy was closely related to or actually caused the injury.'. . A showing of deliberate indifference requires that the municipality 'completely disregarded' its duty to train. . .Typically, that means total inaction in the face of repeated, known, rights violations. . . In a 'narrow range of circumstances,' when a rights violation is a 'highly predictable consequence' of inadequate training, repeated rights violations need not be shown. . . But in those cases, the risk of rights violations must be 'so obvious,' and the inadequate training 'so likely' to result in such violations, that the municipality can fairly be described as deliberately indifferent. . .Crockett County did not fail to train Evans.

Evans received use-of-force training approved by POST. Mosier's expert, Patrick Looper, concluded that the training was inadequate. But the district court found that Looper's report failed to point to evidence supporting that conclusion and therefore failed to create a genuine dispute of material fact as to the adequacy of Evans' training. Regardless, there is no dispute as to deliberate indifference. Mosier presents no evidence of prior instances of rights violations, so he can rely only on the narrow highly-predictable-consequence theory. Assuming that there was an obvious risk that excessive force might be used against intoxicated detainees, the County made sure that Evans received use-of-force training. Where a municipality provides training that addresses a purported risk, that 'does not present the same "highly predictable" constitutional danger.'. . In situations like this, where relevant training was given, showing that 'additional training would have been helpful' does not establish municipal liability. . . Mosier's failure to train claim fails because it alleges no more than that. For these reasons, the district court properly granted Crockett County summary judgment on Mosier's Monell claim."); McNeal v. LeBlanc, 90 F.4th 425, 435-39 (5th Cir. 2024) (Duncan, J., concurring), reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, 93 F.4th 840 (5th Cir. 2024), cert. denied, 145 S. Ct. 266 (2024) ("I concur in denying Secretary LeBlanc qualified immunity but only because our precedent requires that result. See Parker v. LeBlanc, 73 F.4th 400 (5th Cir. 2023); Crittindon v. LeBlanc, 37 F.4th 177 (5th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 90 (2023). Our precedent is mistaken, however. It makes LeBlanc answerable for the errors of subordinates, creating vicarious liability in contravention of Monell v. Dep't of Soc. Servs., 436 U.S. 658 (1978), and Connick v. Thompson, 563 U.S. 51 (2011). To repair that far-reaching error, our court should rehear this case en banc. We have had several overdetention cases involving DPSC and LeBlanc. . . We will likely have many more. See Hicks v. LeBlanc, 81 F.4th 497, 510 (5th Cir. 2023) ("[O]ur Court remains plagued by claims arising from inexplicable and illegal over-detention in Louisiana prisons[.]"). The question is not whether overdetention is a serious problem (it is) nor whether it should be fixed (it should). The question, instead, is about the proper remedy: whether LeBlanc, the head of a large and complex state agency, can be held personally liable under § 1983 for causing a prisoner's overdetention. To answer that question, our circuit borrows the standard for finding a municipality liable under § 1983. See, e.g., Southard v. Tex. Bd. of Crim. Just., 114 F.3d 539, 551 (5th Cir. 1997) (noting "the close relationship between the elements of municipal liability and an individual supervisor's liability," and holding "the same standards of fault and causation should govern" (quotation omitted)). Under that framework, LeBlanc cannot be vicariously liable for an overdetention caused by a subordinate's error. . . LeBlanc must have caused the overdetention himself. To establish that, one must show that LeBlanc's 'deliberately indifferent' failure to train subordinates caused the overdetention. . . And the usual way of establishing failure-to-train liability is to show '[a] pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees.'. . That's where the problem begins. The pattern requirement is critical because it keeps failure-to-train from collapsing into respondeat superior. . . The prior violations must be closely similar to the present one. Otherwise, a supervisor would not be on notice of a flaw in the agency's training program, nor would he have any idea how to change the training to fix the problem. . . In other words, absent an alarm bell rung by a pattern, the supervisor's liability would depend solely on his subordinate's error, not on anything the supervisor himself failed to do. That is respondeat superior liability, and it is excluded in § 1983 claims. . . The paradigm illustration of the pattern requirement comes from Connick, 563 U.S. 51. A line prosecutor violated Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), by failing to disclose exculpatory evidence. Could the district attorney's office be liable for that misdeed because the office failed to properly train prosecutors on Brady? The answer turned on whether the office had a pattern of previous violations. Critically, though, it wasn't enough to say, 'The office had past Brady violations.'. . The Supreme Court demanded more. Prior violations had to be specific enough to 'put [the district attorney] on notice that the office's Brady training was inadequate with respect to the sort of Brady violation at issue here.'. . Respectfully, our circuit has not correctly applied Connick's pattern requirement in DPSC overdetention cases. Overdetentions occur for many reasons, as our cases show. A department employee may misclassify a prisoner. . . Or an employee may fail to apply time-served credits. . . Or an employee may misapply the law for calculating time-served credits. . . Or local jails may fail to timely transmit pre-classification paperwork to DPSC. . . To make LeBlanc liable for any one of these overdetentions, Connick requires evidence of a pattern of closely similar violations sufficient to notify LeBlanc that his department's flawed training caused the particular violation. . . .Without the pattern evidence required by Connick, a failure-to-train claim against LeBlanc collapses into vicarious liability. That is, under our precedent, LeBlanc can be liable as a supervisory official based merely on the fact that overdetentions and delays in processing release dates, writ large, have occurred within DPSC. If that were enough to prove deliberate indifference, though, Connick would have come out the other way. The district attorney would have been liable for failing to train prosecutors merely because previous Brady violations had occurred in his office. Of course, that is not what Connick held. The required pattern had to show, instead, that 'the office's Brady training was inadequate with respect to the sort of Brady violation at issue [t]here.'. . That stringent evidentiary foundation is missing here because our precedent, in contravention of Connick, rejects it. Our en banc court should correct that far-reaching error. One final note. Our cases speak in the same breath of a supervisor's liability for 'failure to train' and for 'failure to adopt policies.'. . It is unclear to me whether those are meant to be different theories of supervisory liability or different articulations of the same theory. . . If the former, then I seriously doubt that a 'failure to adopt policy' theory has any basis in the Supreme Court's case law. Connick is quite specific that it was addressing liability for a 'failure to train.'. . It said nothing about a generic 'failure to adopt or promulgate policies.' Imposing liability because a supervisor 'fails to adopt policies' opens a much broader vista of supervisory liability than for 'failing to train' subordinates. Indeed, Connick explained that the 'most tenuous' type of deliberate-indifference liability was 'failure to train.'. . That is because the theory is based not on a municipality's action but its omission. Premising liability on failing to 'adopt policies,' however, is even more tenuous. At least a failure to train is focused on a supervisor's omissions with respect to a particular duty (training employees) and in response to a problem that training could solve (a pattern of prior employee violations linked to inadequate training). A 'failure to adopt policies,' by contrast, appears to open supervisors to liability merely for failing to be clairvoyant. That cannot meet the stringent standard of deliberate indifference. . . That problem aside, however, our precedent is clear that a supervisor's liability in a case like this must be grounded on a pattern of prior, similar violations. . . That requirement has not been met here. We should rehear this case to fix the problem. As noted, we will likely have many more overdetention cases against LeBlanc and others. We need to clarify when officials can be liable for overdetaining prisoners. If we fail to do that, we risk turning § 1983 into a source of vicarious liability for the heads of State agencies. In addition to violating Supreme Court precedent, such a misguided project would be futile. The overdetention problem is obviously a serious one. But if evidence does not connect the problem to something LeBlanc himself has done or failed to do, then making him personally liable for overdetentions will solve nothing. I urge our court to rehear this pressing issue en banc."); Sauceda v. City of San Benito, Texas, 78 F.4th 174, 190 (5th Cir. 2023) ("Sauceda conceded below that the 'relevant policymaker' was the San Benito City Commission, not Morales. And there is no record evidence that a policy to arrest individuals for failing to produce identification was adopted or promulgated by the City Commission. Nor has Sauceda produced evidence of 'a widespread practice that [was] so common and well-settled as to constitute a custom that fairly represent[ed] municipal policy.'. . A solitary instance of violating Sauceda's rights cannot confer liability on the City. . . Sauceda alternatively contends that the City is liable for Officer Lopez's actions because it failed to provide him with sufficient training and adequate supervision. Municipal liability for failure to train or supervise attaches when the failure 'reflects a municipality's deliberate or conscious choice' such that the choice is a policy. . . For this liability to attach, Sauceda must also show that '(1) the training or hiring procedures of the municipality's policymaker were inadequate; (2) the municipality's policymaker was deliberately indifferent in adopting the hiring or training policy; and (3) the inadequate hiring or training policy directly caused the plaintiff's injury.'. . It is not enough that the failure to supervise be due to negligence or ineptitude on the part of the City; Sauceda's burden is to prove it was a result of deliberate indifference. . . The fact that this was an isolated incident raises that burden further because the 'single-incident method of proving deliberate indifference' is 'generally reserved' for cases in which 'no training whatsoever' occurred. . . Here, Sauceda did not produce evidence that could establish that Lopez received no training, that his training was intentionally or deliberately inadequate, or that the City had a policy endorsing Officer Lopez's actions. Because of this, the district court found correctly that Sauceda failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact supporting municipal liability."); Parker v. LeBlanc, 73 F.4th 400, 405-06 (5th Cir. 2023) ("LeBlanc argues that this complaint did not adequately allege the requisite 'pattern' of constitutional violations by untrained employees 'ordinarily necessary' under Connick to establish deliberate indifference for purposes of failure to train. . . He contends that Parker's allegations 'identify issues of an entirely different kind than the one that allegedly caused Parker to spend too much time incarcerated.' Essentially, LeBlanc insists that there is a meaningful distinction between Parker's over-detention due to his alleged misclassification as a sex offender, as opposed to over-detention due to miscalculations of his sentence or his status being generally lost in the system. The district court 'decline[d] to draw the line as finely as LeBlanc advances and limit the types of problems involved solely to those instances where individuals have been misclassified as sexual offenders.' The court noted that the real problem alleged in the Legislative Audit report was the Department 'not knowing when [inmates'] proper release date was' and that 'inmate sentences have been "done wrong"' as stated in testimony from Chowns v. LeBlanc. We agree with the district court's assessment. In a similar case about over-detention — against the same defendant — the plaintiff also relied on a study to show a pattern of constitutional violations and allege supervisory liability.

See Crittindon, 37 F.4th at 186–87. We held that 'a reasonable jury could find that Defendants knew of a "pattern of similar constitutional violations," such that their inaction amounted to a disregard of an obvious risk.'. . The court there noted that LeBlanc was 'in a position to adopt policies that would address this delay' and that he could not 'avoid the evidence that the study exposed unlawful detentions of prisoners.'. . Much of the same is true here, though unlike in Crittindon, this case is merely at the 12(b)(6) stage, rather than a motion for summary judgment. . . What LeBlanc may have done to comply with his supervisory obligations is not yet part of the record. Further, Parker has not had the opportunity to conduct discovery. . . . The allegations in the complaint are that there is a 'pattern of over-detention' that renders Parker's own case 'neither unique nor even unusual.' The standard for deliberate indifference requires only a 'pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees,' rather than an exact duplication. . . Parker has alleged that he was detained for 337 days past his release date and has cited three pieces of evidence to support his allegations that LeBlanc was aware of the deficiencies of implemented policies that routinely led to errors like the one that violated his constitutional rights. . . . We agree with Parker that his complaint sufficiently alleges the requisite 'pattern' of constitutional violations by untrained employees to establish deliberate indifference for purposes of failure to train. . . We therefore hold that his complaint should proceed to the next stage of litigation, i.e., tailored discovery. See Carswell v. Camp, 54 F.4th 307, 311 (5th Cir. 2022)."); Edwards v. City of Balch Springs, 70 F.4th 302, 312-14 (5th Cir. 2023) ("'To show deliberate indifference, a plaintiff normally must allege a pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees.'. . 'A pattern requires similarity and specificity; prior indications cannot simply be for any and all "bad" or unwise acts, but rather must point to the specific violation in question.'. . Because deliberate indifference typically requires a pattern, 'we have stressed that a single incident is usually insufficient to demonstrate deliberate indifference.'. . The ' "single incident exception" is extremely narrow,'. . and as an exception to the pattern requirement, it 'is generally reserved for those cases in which the government actor was provided no training whatsoever.'. . Edwards argues that the City 'failed to provide ... appropriate remedial force training.' He relies on a few examples to establish what he sees as a factual question regarding a pattern of violations: (1) Oliver previously 'slamm[ed] Luis Medina, Jr. to the ground ... while Medina was experiencing an epileptic seizure,' and (2) a different officer previously 'sho[t] an unarmed male' and 'assault[ed] an inmate who he claimed verbally assaulted him.' Edwards also points to evidence of 'two other instances in which an officer shot at a moving vehicle.' These examples lack 'similarity and specificity,' and therefore they do not 'point to the specific violation in question.'. . Oliver's prior body-slam is dissimilar to this case because it did not involve a moving vehicle. So too for the different officer's prior shooting and prior assault. While Edwards does point to some scant evidence for two shootings that did each involve a vehicle, he does not describe those instances at all—indeed, he does not identify any evidence that the shootings even violated the department's use-of-force policy. Even for a city as small as Balch Springs, these 'isolated instances' of previous departures from the overall use-of-force policy cannot establish a pattern of deliberate indifference. . . As a result, these examples are not enough to satisfy the causality standard that is Monell's third element. Edwards's failure-to-train claim therefore falls short. . . . Because Edwards has identified no law that requires the City to maintain a 'system to identify and track use of force incidents,' his supervisory and disciplinary theories can succeed only if he identifies 'a pattern of similar constitutional violations.'. . He has not done so. Instead, he points to the 'violations' discussed above, plus two others: (1) Oliver, while off-duty and without provocation, 'pulled a gun on another driver following a routine traffic accident,' and (2) in 2013, Oliver shared a Facebook post which read that 'I will never in my life be as good at anything else as I am at killing people.' As above, these incidences lack 'similarity and specificity,' and so they do not 'point to the specific violation in question.'. .The prior violations that Edwards identifies certainly reflect individual action that is 'bad or unwise,'. . . but as for the City, they do not amount to 'a complete disregard of the risk that a violation of a particular constitutional right would follow.'. . Because deliberate indifference is absent, Edwards's supervisory and disciplinary theories cannot succeed, and that means that Edwards cannot satisfy Monell's third element."); Howell v. NaphCare, Inc., 67 F.4th 302, 319-20 (6th Cir. 2023) ("The Estate sued Sheriff Neil in his official capacity under a failure-to-train theory, a claim that amounts to suit against Hamilton County itself. . . A municipality may be liable under § 1983 for failure to train when it amounts to deliberate indifference. . .To succeed on a failure-to-train claim, a plaintiff must show: '(1) the training or supervision was inadequate for the tasks performed; (2) the inadequacy was the result of the municipality's deliberate indifference; and (3) the inadequacy was closely related to or actually caused the injury.'. . Regarding the second prong, a plaintiff most commonly demonstrates a municipality's deliberate indifference by pointing to a failure to act 'in response to repeated complaints of constitutional violations by its officers.'. . But a plaintiff can rely on a single incident to establish liability in a narrow range of circumstances 'if the risk of the constitutional violation is so obvious or foreseeable' that it amounts to deliberate indifference for the municipality to fail to prepare its officers for it. . . The Estate relies on this latter route to show the County's deliberate indifference. The Estate initially argues that the County did not provide any training on restraint-chair monitoring, but ultimately argues that the County only provided limited on-the-job training that was inadequate. Three types of training regarding observation of inmates in restraint chairs were evinced by the record: training at correctional officer academy; training at orientation; and on-the-job training. One sergeant testified that training was offered by a 'field training officer' after the academy. Collini stated that he received training at the academy and received ongoing on-the-job training; Erwin received the same and showed an awareness and familiarity with the restraint chair policies. Based on the record, it is difficult to ascertain the substance of these trainings—formal or informal—and the Estate's expert only provides in conclusory terms that the County 'failed to properly train and supervise' officers on the 'proper supervision and careful observation of inmates' in restraint chairs. To support its proposition that the County's training was inadequate, the Estate primarily relies on Shadrick v. Hopkins County, which held that a jail medical provider inadequately trained its nurses by providing only 'some limited on-the-job-training.'. . But Shadrick contained no indication that the nurses received 'any type of ongoing training'; the only training provided appeared to be 'some limited on-the-job training when beginning their employment, such as learning where supplies were kept.'. . . The record in Shadrick reveals that the 'limited on-the-job training' offered at the beginning of the nurses' employment on housekeeping issues amounted to no training at all. On this record, we cannot say the same is true regarding the County's training on restraint-chair monitoring. The County offered initial training, and, while it did rely on on-the-job training, that training was ongoing. The Officers displayed knowledge of and familiarity with the relevant polices that governed restraint chairs, which the Estate's expert agreed were reasonable and appropriate. Finally, 'failure-to-train liability is concerned with the substance of the training, not the particular instructional format.'. . Contrary to the Estate's argument, the County did not wholly fail to train its officers on restraint-chair monitoring. The Estate has failed to show a genuine dispute of fact regarding whether the training was deficient in substance. The Estate's failure-to-train claim against the County fails at prong one, and the district court's grant of summary judgment is affirmed."); Valdez v. Macdonald, 66 F.4th 796, 816-21 (10th Cir. 2023) ("Since City of Canton, our court has determined that summary judgment was not appropriate in several single-incident failure-to-train cases. Each of the following cases determined that deliberate indifference and causation presented factual questions that should be decided by a jury. [court discusses Allen, Olsen, and Lance cases] . . . . Lance provided this court's most recent articulation of the single-incident failure-to-train claim: (1) 'the existence of a [municipal] policy or custom involving deficient training'; (2) an injury caused by the policy that is 'obvious' and 'closely related'; and (3) that the municipality adopted the 'policy or custom with deliberate indifference' to the injury. . . On this third element, we adopted the Second Circuit's three-part test for deliberate indifference: (i) the municipality's policymakers 'know to a moral certainty that their employees will confront a given situation'; (ii) the situation 'presents the employee with a difficult choice of the sort that training or supervision will make less difficult'; and (iii) '[t]he wrong choice will frequently cause the deprivation of a citizen's constitutional rights.'. . In each of these cases—Allen, Olsen, and Lance—we determined that summary judgment was not appropriate because there were issues of fact regarding whether the municipality was deliberately indifferent and should be liable for failure to train. . . .Denver's pure legal argument is that we need only look to 'whether [its] officers were trained on the parameters of the use of deadly force' and the inquiry 'stops' there. . . Mr. Valdez counters that Denver failed to train officers on the use of deadly force where, as here, an officer has been shot while pursuing a suspect and catches up to him. . . He does not contend on appeal that there was a pattern of such occurrences, so he relies on the City of Canton test for single incident liability—whether the need for training on this subject is obvious and lack of training is likely to cause a violation of constitutional rights. . . Denver's legal argument runs counter to City of Canton's single-incident liability test that 'in light of the duties assigned to specific officers or employees the need for more or different training' may be 'so obvious' that failing to train constitutes deliberate indifference. . . The district court correctly recognized that just because Denver trains on the constitutional standard for deadly force does not mean there is no 'need for more or different training.'. .The remainder of Denver's deadly force argument is that the 'need for more or different training' should not have gone to trial. This is not a purely legal question. . . The district court allowed Mr. Valdez the opportunity to prove at trial that this need was 'obvious.'. . And because that issue is at least partly factual and the jury considered it at trial, we do not review it on an appeal from the denial of summary judgment. . . . Denver argues that a 'single-incident failure-to-train municipal liability claim' is 'available only when officers are completely "untrained."'. . This is a legal argument, but Denver has waived it, and it otherwise fails on the merits. Denver did not make this argument in its summary judgment motion and thus forfeited it in district court. . . Denver's argument otherwise fails. It reads Connick too narrowly. Connick did not hold that a failure-to-train claim applies only to officers who have received no training at all. For liability, 'a municipality's failure to train its employees in a relevant respect must amount to "deliberate indifference."'. . And, as noted, City of Canton refers to 'the need for more or different training.'. .Connick and City of Canton do not suggest that as long as there is any training on deadly force, a municipality can never be deliberately indifferent. . . Also, Denver's 'completely untrained' argument conflicts with our decisions that have described employees as untrained when they did not receive proper training on a particular aspect of their jobs, not just when they have no training at all. . . . Denver argues that '[t]raining is not required for patently obvious criminal conduct.'. . It contends the district court erred in holding that failure to train officers 'to not shoot others out of anger could establish municipal liability.'. . But Denver's argument oversimplifies Mr. Valdez's failure-to-train claim as a legal matter, and it otherwise raises factual issues. Under City of Canton, failure-to-train municipal liability turns on whether 'the need for more or different training is so obvious' 'in light of the duties assigned' to the officers. . . Denver's argument is legally flawed because it fails to recognize that even if acts are illegal or clearly inappropriate does not mean officers need not be trained to avoid them. . . Indeed, as the Second Circuit has explained, an employee may still need training in circumstances where, 'although the proper course is clear, the employee has powerful incentives to make the wrong choice,'. . . which may include when a suspect has shot a police officer. What remains of Denver's argument is factual. We may not review a post-trial appellate challenge to the district court's determination at summary judgment that a reasonable jury could decide training was obviously needed on when it is constitutional to fire on a suspect after a police chase during which the officer was shot. Denver's 'patently obvious criminal conduct' argument therefore fails. . . . Denver argues the district court (1) erred in concluding Mr. Valdez could show Denver was 'on notice' of the need to train on the use of deadly force when an officer has been shot and is angry, . . . and (2) erred in failing to identify a difficult decision' that additional training 'would have eased[.]' . . These arguments are variations of Denver's general argument that the district court should have granted summary judgment because Mr. Valdez could not show an 'obvious' need for additional training on the use of deadly force under City of Canton. . . Denver's arguments raise mixed questions of law and fact that we may not review on a post-trial challenge to summary judgment. Even if the district court had 'erroneously denied [summary judgment], the proper redress would not be through appeal of that denial but through subsequent motions for judgment as a matter of law ... and appellate review of those motions if they were denied.'. . We do not see how the questions of whether 'the need for more or different training is so obvious' and whether 'the inadequacy [is] so likely to result in violation of constitutional rights,'. . . can be answered as a pure legal determination in this case. As noted above, Denver's assertion that its training of officers on the deadly force standard automatically shields it from municipal liability lacks legal authority and conflicts with City of Canton, but it also leaves much unanswered that depends on factual context. For example, is it 'obvious' that officers chasing fleeing felons will sometimes be shot? Is it 'obvious' that officers need instruction on how being shot and angered affects application of the deadly force standard? Is it 'obvious' that an officer lacking such training is likely to violate an individual's constitutional rights? Denver argues the answers to these questions should be no, but the questions are not purely legal ones, and the answers depend on evidence of the training that was and was not provided. . . Even if Denver could plausibly dispute the district court's determinations that a reasonable jury could find that (1) Denver was on notice' of an obvious need for training and (2) Sergeant Motyka confronted a 'difficult choice' in evaluating whether deadly force was still authorized after he was shot, . . . these are 'factual disputes,' not 'purely legal question[s]'[.]. . . Denver's post-trial challenges to the denial of summary judgment are not appropriate for review."); Orozco v. Dart, 64 F.4th 806, 822-27 (7th Cir. 2023) ("Though Koger's claim fails based on the due process analysis above, summary judgment for the County is appropriate for another reason—Koger falls short of demonstrating municipal liability. Oddly, Koger's briefing neither cites to Monell nor comprehensively explains his theory of municipal liability. But we interpret his arguments as an attempt to establish municipal liability through a 'gap in policy' theory. He agrees that 'the jail did not have any formal policy (written or unwritten) regarding what is to be done with books confiscated pursuant to the jail's three-book/magazine policy,' and argues that such an omission subjects the Jail to liability. Namely, Koger asserts that 'written policies were and are necessary here because they are a protection against willy-nilly destruction of inmates' personal property.' By refusing to implement a policy on how confiscated books were to be handled, Koger believes the Jail 'create[d] a serious risk that inmates will be deprived of their property without due process.' The County disputes municipal liability, contending Koger identifies no actionable policy or custom and falls short of proving fault and causation. . . . Because Koger is suing a municipality, it is not sufficient for him to merely demonstrate a valid due process violation. He must go a step further and show the municipality itself is liable for the harm he suffered. . . . We have identified 'three requirements to establish a Monell claim—policy or custom, municipal fault, and "moving force" causation'. . . Starting with policy or custom, three kinds of municipal action support Monell liability: '(1) an express policy that causes a constitutional deprivation when enforced; (2) a widespread practice that is so permanent and well-settled that it constitutes a custom or practice; or (3) an allegation that the constitutional injury was caused by a person with final policymaking authority.'. . Plus, '[i]naction can also give rise to liability if it reflects the municipality's "conscious decision not to take action."'. . In addition to a policy or custom, a Monell plaintiff must also show municipal fault. . . This requirement is 'easily established when a municipality acts, or directs an employee to act, in a way that facially violates a federal right.'. . But a plaintiff's route becomes more difficult when he alleges only 'that the municipality caused an employee to violate a federal right.'. . . Under those circumstances, '[t]he plaintiff must demonstrate that the municipality itself acted with "deliberate indifference" to [the plaintiff's] constitutional rights.'. . This is a high bar. As the Supreme Court explains, '"[d]eliberate indifference" is a stringent standard of fault, requiring proof that a municipal actor disregarded a known or obvious consequence of his action.'. . Finally, a plaintiff seeking to hold a municipality liable must show causation. . . . Koger points to the three-book policy as causing him injury and giving rise to municipal liability. But we have already held the policy constitutional, . . . so Koger cannot claim that the County's 'affirmative municipal action is itself unconstitutional.'. . Instead, Koger must travel the more difficult liability route and show that the 'municipality caused an employee to violate a federal right.'. . For that, Koger turns to a 'gap in policy' liability theory. Koger suggests that—by creating the three-book policy without any accompanying instructions for how officers are to deal with confiscated books—the County was deliberately indifferent to the constitutional property rights of Jail inmates. . . . As indicated, 'municipal liability can be premised, as here, on municipal inaction, such as "a gap in express policies."'. . Indeed, a municipality can be held liable when it 'has knowingly acquiesced in an unconstitutional result of what its express policies have left unsaid.'. . Yet while 'gap in policy' liability is possible, it entails unique concerns and stringent requirements. We have cautioned 'the path to Monell liability based on inaction is steeper because, unlike in a case of affirmative municipal action, a failure to do something could be inadvertent and the connection between inaction and a resulting injury is more tenuous.'. . So, '[a] gap in policy "amounts to municipal action for Monell purposes only if the [municipality] has notice that its program will cause constitutional violations."'. . 'Demonstrating that notice is essential to an ultimate finding and requires a "known or obvious" risk that constitutional violations will occur.'. . This means Koger must show the County had notice that its gap in policy would cause constitutional violations and was deliberately indifferent to that risk. . . Koger can demonstrate the requisite notice in either of two ways. He can show a pattern of constitutional violations such that the County was put on notice of the constitutional harm its gap in policy was causing. . . Or he can show that the risk of a constitutional violation under the County's existing three-book policy was so high as to be obvious. . . . Option one is closed to Koger, as there is no record evidence showing an actionable pattern of similar constitutional violations. The testimony and declarations in the record show the three-book policy was rarely enforced and offer no evidence of repeated book or magazine destruction. . . . This evidence does not, as a matter of law, establish municipal notice via a pattern. . . That leaves Koger with option two—demonstrating that the risk of unconstitutional property deprivation under the County's policies was so high as to be obvious. . . Here, too, Koger comes up short. Qualifying circumstances under this doctrine are rare, and this is not one of those cases. . . It was not 'blatantly obvious' that implementing the three-book policy without providing additional guidance to correctional officers would result in constitutional violations. . . Without more, the bare fact that a policy authorizes confiscation does not create an imminent risk that Jail staff will unconstitutionally destroy that property. We also emphasize it is not sufficient for Koger to show that a policy could conceivably or potentially lead to a constitutional violation. . . A constitutional violation must be a 'blatantly obvious' consequence of inaction for single-incident liability, . . . and Koger cannot make that showing here. This case closely resembles Bohanon, where we reviewed a § 1983 claim built around a gap in policy liability theory. [court discusses Bohanon] The same reasoning applies here. The three-book policy did not present a glaring risk of constitutional violation such that the Jail should have been on notice of impending harm even with no pattern of past violations. The summary destruction of inmate reading materials does not naturally and imminently follow from the three-book policy. Because Koger does not demonstrate municipal fault, a required element, we decline to weigh in on causation. . . . We . . . conclude that Koger cannot establish municipal liability even if his procedural due process claim were sound. He complains of a gap in the County's policies but provides evidence of only a single possible constitutional violation. With no evidence of a pattern of similar constitutional violations, this court is left having to infer that the severity of the policy gap itself put the County on notice. We decline to hold that the three-book policy is the type of policy that makes a constitutional violation blatantly obvious."); Harris v. City of Saginaw, Michigan, 62 F.4th 1028, 1338-39 (6th Cir. 2023) ("[F]ailure to train is not measured by information retention or whether 'better or more training' would have avoided the incident. Failure to train is measured by inquiring if the City 'completely disregarded' its duty to train its officers on probable cause determinations. . . And here, the record contains undisputed evidence of training per the police chief. . . What is more, when asked in a different manner—not being asked what the Fourth Amendment stands for in general—one of the Officers correctly articulated the probable cause standard and the appropriate considerations when evaluating the evidence. . . Second, we must bear in mind that we are addressing competing motions for summary judgment. As to Harris's motion, we interpret the facts in the light most favorable to the City. The City said they train on probable cause, which Harris did not rebut, instead focusing on potential gaps in training related to the Fourth Amendment more generally. And as to the City's motion, even construing the record in Harris's favor, no reasonable juror could find the City 'complete[ly] fail[ed] to provide any type of [probable cause] training' in light of the police chief's unchallenged testimony. . . Harris also takes issue with the City's policy memo regarding Michigan state law governing warrantless arrests. But substance of the memo aside and accepting Harris's view of its flaws, the memo alone is not in the 'narrow range of circumstances' that establishes single-incident failure-to-train liability. . . This narrow range of circumstances includes situations where a constitutional violation is 'the "obvious" consequence of failing to provide specific [ ] training, and that this showing of "obviousness" [ ] substitute[s] for the pattern of violations ordinarily necessary[.]' . . But where it is understood that an actor receives some training on the constitutional subject matter—even training outside the workplace—that actor 'does not present the same "highly predictable" constitutional danger.'. . As in Connick, '[w]e do not assume that [on-scene officers] will always make correct [probable cause] decisions[.] But showing merely that additional training would have been helpful in making difficult decisions does not establish municipal liability.' . . We conduct a similar analysis for the City's potential liability for failure to supervise, which also turns on whether the City exhibited deliberate indifference to its citizens' constitutional rights. . . We have found the failure to supervise when all of the relevant parties disclaimed responsibility. . . . Here, it is not the case that the Officers lacked supervision. The City identifies the known supervisors—the police chief and lieutenant. Instead, Harris mistakenly attributed supervisory responsibilities to the wrong person: Detective Busch. And as discussed above, Busch did not personally arrest Harris and his involvement occurred only after the arrest had been effectuated. So, Harris is unable to establish City liability for failure to supervise the Officers. Because neither the failure to train nor failure to supervise analysis reveals any genuine disputes of material fact, Harris's motion as to these claims should be denied and the City's should be granted."); Armstrong v. Ashley, 60 F.4th 262, 276-78 (5th Cir. 2023) ("Armstrong does not allege that an officially promulgated policy instructed police to investigate using unconstitutional methods. . . Therefore, she had to rely on a custom or practice 'so common and well settled as to constitute a custom that fairly represents municipal policy,' and '[a]ctual or constructive knowledge of such custom must be attributable' to the policymaker. . . As quoted above, Armstrong pled custom or practice and pattern in a conclusory fashion without meaningful factual content. Although Armstrong also alleges that 'persons with final policymaking authority for the Shreveport Police Department participated personally in the misconduct described in this Complaint,' this, too, is barren of factual support and wholly conclusory. . . Second, Armstrong argues that Shreveport failed to adequately train, supervise, and discipline its officers. . . . Armstrong asserts that Shreveport police officers received subpar training across the board, but this general conclusion is not enough to imply or state that policymakers acted with deliberate indifference. As already discussed, she fails to allege a pattern of similar violations, let alone Shreveport's notice of such a pattern, except in wholly conclusory terms. And she does not point to a 'particular failure to train' that could render a constitutional violation highly predictable. . . This Monell claim based on failure to train, supervise, and discipline fails for lack of factual allegations that support a finding of deliberate indifference. . . . In the alternative, Armstrong argues that Monell liability may be imposed on prosecutors in the Caddo Parish District Attorney's Office because they allegedly suppressed exculpatory evidence pursuant to a policy or custom. James Stewart, the current Caddo Parish District Attorney, stands in as the official defendant. This claim fails for reasons similar to those that stymie Armstrong's Monell claim against Shreveport. Armstrong's allegations of a formal policy and direct policymaker involvement are again entirely conclusory. . . . Armstrong's allegations of an unlawful custom or practice include the same formulaic allegations made against Shreveport . . . .With this claim, however, Armstrong lists nine cases over a 24-year period as examples where exculpatory evidence was suppressed by the District Attorney's practices. But nine constitutional violations over a 24-year period and thousands of prosecutions are hardly sufficient to show a municipal custom. [citing Connick] A more fundamental problem, noted by the district court, is the mischaracterization of these nine cases, none of which found a Brady violation. . . . This proffered litany cannot constitute a plausible allegation that the Caddo Parish DA's office had a custom of suppressing exculpatory evidence. . . As with her Monell claim against Shreveport, Armstrong also alleges failure of the DA's office to adequately train, supervise, and discipline. Just as nine inapposite cases cannot show an unconstitutional custom or pattern, they are insufficient to place the District Attorney on notice as a means to show deliberate indifference. The district court thus properly dismissed Armstrong's Monell claims against DA Stewart."); Helphenstine v. Lewis County, Kentucky, 60 F.4th 305, 323-26 (6th Cir. 2023), reh'g en banc denied, 65 F.4th 794 (6th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 692 (2024) ("Plaintiff also seeks to impose municipal liability on Lewis County. . . A municipality cannot be liable under a theory of respondeat superior; it can only be held liable for 'its own wrongdoing.'. .This requires plaintiff to demonstrate that the alleged federal violation occurred because of a municipal 'policy or custom.'. . A municipality may be held liable under one of four recognized theories: '(1) the existence of an illegal official policy or legislative enactment; (2) that an official with final decision making authority ratified illegal actions; (3) the existence of a policy of inadequate training or supervision; or (4) the existence of a custom of tolerance or acquiescence of federal rights violations.'. . Plaintiff argues that Lewis County failed to adequately train and supervise its jailers regarding medical emergencies. We agree. . . . There are two ways to support a claim that a failure to train or supervise is the result of a municipality's deliberate indifference. Plaintiff may prove (1) a 'pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees' or (2) 'a single violation of federal rights, accompanied by a showing that [the municipality] has failed to train its employees to handle recurring situations presenting an obvious potential for a constitutional violation.'. . Plaintiff has not identified any other constitutional violations, so she must demonstrate that the single violation (Helphenstine's death) was accompanied by Lewis County's failure to train the jailers to handle this potentially recurring situation. This sort of claim is available only 'in a narrow range of circumstances,' where a federal rights violation 'may be a highly predictable consequence of a failure to equip [employees] with specific tools to handle recurring situations.'. . The question here is whether the County's failure to train its employees amounted to deliberate indifference, on behalf of the County, to the rights of detainees. . . Such a claim has three elements. Plaintiff must show (1) that the County's 'training or supervision was inadequate for the tasks performed; (2) the inadequacy was the result of the municipality's deliberate indifference; and (3) the inadequacy was closely related to or actually caused the injury.'. . Here, a reasonable jury could conclude that she has met her burden. . . . At bottom, it appears that defendants were not trained on how to identify or address a medical emergency. A jury could easily conclude that this training program, to the extent that it existed, was insufficient. Second, Lewis County's deliberate indifference. 'Deliberate indifference is a stringent standard of fault, requiring proof that a municipal actor disregarded a known or obvious consequence of his action.'. . If the 'unconstitutional consequences of failing to train' employees are 'patently obvious,' the county 'could be liable under § 1983 without proof of a pre-existing pattern of violations.'. . Asking employees to use professional judgment that lies outside their area of expertise may demonstrate deliberate indifference. . . . The inadequacy of the training and supervision at the jail demonstrates that it results from the County's deliberate indifference to the rights of its inmates because the possible unconstitutional consequences are patently obvious. This is particularly palpable when viewing Lewis County's woeful training policy against the backdrop of Dr. von Luhrte's performance and the County's lack of supervision. . . . The jail doctor was unable to deal with common medical conditions at the jail, and he was rarely present at the jail. The deputy jailers did not have any medical training or medical knowledge, so often, no one at the jail could recognize or treat a medical emergency. But with no medical professionals on site, the County effectively asked the jailers to make determinations about what constituted a medical emergency—a requirement well outside their area of expertise. And the County did not supervise the jailers or Dr. von Luhrte at all. A reasonable jury could easily conclude that these policies were the result of the County's deliberate indifference to inmate health and safety. . . . In sum, a jury could conclude that Helphenstine's death was the result of the County's deliberate indifference."); Liggins v. Duncanville, Texas, 52 F.4th 953, 955-57 (5th Cir. 2022) ("As for the policy requirement, a party may point to a formal declaration, an informal custom, or, sometimes, a 'single decision.'. . But, the 'single decision' exception is 'extremely narrow' and only applies in 'rare circumstances.'. . To warrant application, the constitutional harm in question must've been the 'plainly obvious' consequence of the actor's single decision. . . In practice, that means the decision must've been made despite a very 'high degree of predictability concerning the consequences of the challenged decision.'. . That's a 'stringent standard[ ]' which requires 'unmistakable culpability and clearly connected causation.'. .Here, Liggins argues that Chief Brown's single decision—ordering his officers to enter the Liggins's home—was the 'moving force' behind Liggins's injuries. Liggins admits Chief Brown's order wasn't patently unconstitutional, so instead he contends that it was adopted with a deliberate indifference to Liggins's rights. But, Liggins's claim doesn't pass muster for two reasons: predictability and culpability. First, it wasn't 'highly predictable' that a Fourth Amendment violation would result from Chief Brown's order. The single decision exception—especially when tied to deliberate indifference—applies in rare and narrow scenarios. . . We have only entertained the theory in a few cases, including Brown, 219 F.3d 450. But, in Brown, the outcome was the 'highly predictable consequence[ ]' of the municipal actor's decision. . . There, a sheriff failed to train an officer known to have an 'exuberant and reckless background' on and off the job. . . So, the sheriff was on clear 'notice' that placing him on duty with 'no training' and 'no supervision' could lead to an excessive force incident. . . But, this case isn't like Brown. Instead, it tracks closer to Valle v. City of Houston. In Valle, a police officer ordered his agents to enter the home of a mentally ill man. . . After a brief scuffle, the man was shot and killed. . . There, we found there wasn't evidence of deliberate indifference because 'at least some training' had been provided to the officers and, more importantly, there wasn't a 'pattern of similar violations' to rely on. . . Although a 'pattern of misconduct is not required' to prove predictability, . . . '[w]e have stressed that a single incident is usually insufficient to demonstrate deliberate indifference.'. . After all, repetition may be the only thing that puts a policymaker on 'sufficient notice' that a constitutional violation may spring from their single decision. . . Of course, we don't 'suggest that a single incident, as opposed to a pattern of violations, can never suffice to demonstrate deliberate indifference.'. . Instead, we emphasize the difficulty of proving up such claims without any evidence of a pattern. Here, Liggins provides no genuine evidence of a pattern or any other kind of notice. Instead—to prove predictability—Liggins relies on 'well-known studies and literature' to argue Chief Brown's intervention was contrary to accepted police practices. But, bald factual assertions coupled with informational literature isn't enough to support a deliberate indifference claim—even under Rule 12(b)(6). . . Second, Liggins can't show that Chief Brown, at the time of his order, had the 'requisite degree of culpability,' namely that he completely disregarded any risk to Liggins's Fourth Amendment rights. Liggins had stopped taking his prescription medication and was 'suffering from a severe mental health episode.' His own 'health care providers advised [his mom] to call 911.' Although Liggins's mother told Chief Brown her son wasn't dangerous, Liggins 'was expressing suicidal ideations.' So, Chief Brown—for the safety of Liggins—intervened. While Chief Brown could've waited for a 'crisis intervention team,' failing to do so doesn't show that Chief Brown 'disregarded' any of the 'obvious consequence[s]' of his decision. . . Difficult decisions—like sending armed officers into the home of a person suffering from suicidal thoughts—aren't easy and must be made quickly. But, making them doesn't evidence an intentional ignorance of all the associated risks. At worst, failing to wait or fully recognize the risk of harm to Liggins's rights was negligent. But, mere negligence isn't enough to prove deliberate indifference."); Henderson v. Harris County, Texas, 51 F.4th 125, 131-32 (5th Cir. 2022) ("Here, Henderson concedes that she does 'not allege a pattern of similar constitutional violations' and instead 'contend[s] that [her] claim falls within the single-incident exception.'. . There are at least two problems with that. First, as already noted, this is not a case where 'the government actor was provided no training whatsoever,'. . . because everyone agrees Garduno was trained in proper taser use. Second, Henderson again relies only on the County's 'failure to produce certain policies and procedures' in response to public information requests. She suggests the only possible conclusion to be drawn from the County's failure to respond to those requests is that the County had no policies and offered its officers no training on proper taser use. As the district court rightly concluded, these 'vague allegations are insufficient to establish "deliberate indifference" through the single-incident exception.'"); Bohanon v. City of Indianapolis, 46 F.4th 669, 672-78 (7th Cir. 2022) ("The officers' conduct was egregious, but Bohanon's theory for holding the City liable is flawed. Municipalities cannot be held vicariously liable under § 1983 for the constitutional torts of their employees; for the City to be liable, a municipal policy or custom must have caused Bohanon's constitutional injury. . . A claim against a municipality under § 1983 requires proof of both municipal fault and causation. Bohanon did not prove municipal fault because the narrow exception in the City's substance-abuse policy did not present a policy 'gap' that made it glaringly obvious that off-duty officers would use excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. And because no extreme emergency situation existed at the time of the incident, the City's policies expressly prohibited the officers' conduct and were not the 'moving force' cause of Bohanon's injury. . . .As the Department's investigation revealed, the officers' actions in brutally beating Bohanon were plainly prohibited by the City's express policies. The Department's General Order 3.24 covers substance abuse and was enacted 'to ensure [that officers] are not under the influence of alcohol or other drugs while acting in any law enforcement capacity.' The policy categorically prohibits both on-duty officers and off-duty officers in uniform from having alcohol in their blood. It also prohibits off-duty officers with alcohol in their blood from performing any law-enforcement function subject to a very narrow and precisely stated exception. An officer who has consumed alcohol may engage in a law-enforcement function only 'in extreme emergency situations where injury to the officer or another person is likely without law enforcement intervention.' General Order 3.12, which details the responsibilities of off-duty officers, defines '[a]n extreme emergency ... to be a situation where action is required to prevent injury to the off-duty [officer] or another, or to prevent the commission of a felony or other serious offense.'. . .Bohanon's principal allegation was that the City caused his constitutional injury when the officers used excessive force against him in violation of his Fourth Amendment rights. He also alleged that the City violated his constitutional rights based on Reiger's failure to intervene to stop Serban's conduct, the officers' illegal seizure of the money in his wallet, and their deliberate indifference to his medical needs when they failed to obtain medical assistance. . . . These three requirements to establish a Monell claim—policy or custom, municipal fault, and 'moving force' causation—are by now familiar. And they 'must be scrupulously applied' to avoid a claim for municipal liability backsliding into an impermissible claim for vicarious liability. . . That's especially true of the municipal-fault and causation requirements where (as here) 'a plaintiff claims that the municipality has not directly inflicted an injury, but nonetheless has caused an employee to do so.'. . In these circumstances a rigorous application of the proof requirements is especially important. . . Bohanon's Monell claim is premised on the Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizures. . . The parties agree that his claim satisfies the threshold requirement that the officers acted under color of law when they engaged and then brutally beat Bohanon at Mikie's Pub. . . Bohanon also satisfies the first requirement necessary to bring a Monell claim. General Order 3.24 is an express policy prohibiting police action by off-duty officers who have been drinking (subject to a narrow exception). Bohanon claims that it caused the officers to use excessive force against him. And municipal liability can be premised, as here, on municipal inaction, such as 'a gap in express[ ] policies.'. .It's at steps two and three—municipal fault and 'moving force' causation—that Bohanon's claim collapses. It's undisputed that the officers violated General Order 3.24 when taking off-duty police action while drinking because no extreme emergency situation was present at Mikie's Pub. The parties stipulated to this fact at trial. And it's undisputed that the officers violated General Order 1.30 by using unreasonable force against Bohanon. Therefore, the City's policies expressly prohibited both the officers' off-duty law-enforcement action and the excessive force used against Bohanon. The City's policies prohibiting these actions are clearly not facially unconstitutional. Bohanon's theory is that General Order 3.24 should not have included an exception for extreme emergency situations. He contends that this 'gap' in the policy led to the 'highly predictable' outcome of his assault. In Bohanon's view the existence of any exception permitting off-duty officers to take police action with alcohol in their blood demonstrates that the City was deliberately indifferent to the obvious risk of constitutional violations based on police use of excessive force. We note at the outset that because Bohanon does not allege that the City directly violated his rights, his 'claim presents "difficult problems of proof."' A gap in policy 'amounts to municipal action for Monell purposes only if the [municipality] has notice that its program will cause constitutional violations.'. . Typically notice is established by 'a prior pattern of similar constitutional violations.'. . Here, the parties agree that no similar incident—let alone a pattern of similar incidents—had occurred since General Order 3.24 was enacted. Bohanon therefore must establish that his case is within the 'narrow range of circumstances' where notice can be inferred from the obviousness of the consequences of failing to act. . . These cases are 'rare.'. . To succeed, Bohanon must show that the 'risk of constitutional violations' was 'so high ... that the municipality's failure to act can reflect deliberate indifference and allow an inference of institutional culpability, even in the absence of a similar prior constitutional violation.'. . Bohanon did not clear this high bar. In the rare cases where we have found this standard to be met, the risks of municipal inaction have been blatantly obvious. [collecting cases] In contrast, it is not at all obvious that a policy prohibiting police action while drinking, subject to a narrow and specific exception to protect life and limb, would lead off-duty officers to use excessive force in violation of the Constitution. That's especially true when coupled with the City's policy prohibiting the use of excessive force. Nothing about the text of General Order 3.24 alone put the City on notice that constitutional violations of this kind were likely to occur. . . Bohanon has also failed to prove that the City's policies were the cause of his injuries. . . . There is simply no evidence that the City's policies caused Bohanon's injuries. The officers violated City policy; their actions did not fall within General Order 3.24's narrow exception. At trial Reiger testified that he didn't care if he was disciplined for violating policy. In other words, City policy did not influence Reiger's decision to use excessive force, let alone cause it. Causation is similarly attenuated for Serban, who testified that he used force based on Bohanon's actions, not because of any gap in the City's policies. Bohanon presented no evidence to the contrary. Here, the officers violated City policy that otherwise would have prevented Bohanon's injuries. City policy clearly was not the moving force behind the constitutional violation. What happened to Bradford Bohanon was a tragedy, and we share the district judge's sympathy for Bohanon. But 'a municipality cannot be held liable solely because it employs a tortfeasor.'. . Because Bohanon did not establish municipal fault and moving-force causation, the judge was right to set aside the jury's verdict and enter judgment for the City."); Helbachs Cafe LLC v. City of Madison, 46 F.4th 525, 530–31 (7th Cir. 2022) ("Helbachs does not challenge Order 8 as facially unconstitutional or argue that retaliation was the result of an action by a final policymaker. Rather, its three theories of liability rest entirely on the argument that the retaliation occurred as a result of a municipal custom or practice: (1) that Order 8 was an unconstitutional as-applied express policy because it implicitly prohibited anti-mask signs; (2) that PHMDC had a custom of pre-writing citations which resulted in constitutional deprivations; and (3) that the defendants failed to train PHMDC employees adequately resulting in the violation of Helbachs' constitutional rights. But each theory fails under the same straightforward application of the requirements for Monell. A plaintiff challenging a facially lawful policy (express or implied) 'generally must prove a prior pattern of similar constitutional violations resulting from the policy.'. . Likewise, 'Monell claims based on allegations of an unconstitutional municipal practice or custom ... normally require evidence that the identified practice or custom caused multiple injuries.'. . In most cases (see below), failure to train claims are no different. . . Helbachs provides no evidence of any pattern of similar violations against other businesses, for any of its theories. . . At oral argument, Helbachs conceded there was no evidence to this in the record but claimed that there were additional cases of similar actions taken against other businesses. But Helbachs provided nothing from the record to support this claim (nor do we know what supposed policy or custom it would support—other instances of using Order 8 to prevent businesses from posting a sign? Of pre-writing citations? Of sending poorly trained employees out to violate rights?), so we cannot consider those alleged facts introduced at argument on appeal. . . In turn, Helbachs' as-applied policy claim under Monell dies on the vine—without any evidence of a pattern or practice, no reasonable jury could find that retaliation against Helbachs occurred as a result of any municipal policy, express or implied. Recognizing that rare circumstances arise in which the need for better training 'is so obvious' that the city should have effectively been on notice, even in the absence of past violations, . . . the defendants' public health department compliance training program presents no such obvious risk. . . The compliance program Helbachs takes issue with sends PHMDC employees out to conduct health inspections of restaurants, an activity that presents no obvious risk to the First Amendment rights of food and drink license-holders. Though Helbachs views the risk of unconstitutional retaliation through the issuance of citations as having been obvious, it provides no evidence to that, save for its own experience with PHMDC in this case."); Morgan by next friend Morgan v. Wayne County, Michigan, 33 F.4th 320, 329 (6th Cir. 2022) ("Morgan also argues that Wayne County failed to train and supervise its deputies to ensure the safety of mentally ill inmates. Inadequate training can be the basis for a Monell claim, but '[a] municipality's culpability for a deprivation of rights is at its most tenuous where a claim turns on a failure to train.'. . There are two ways to support a claim that a failure to train or supervise is the result of a municipality's deliberate indifference. Morgan may prove (1) a 'pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees' or (2) 'a single violation of federal rights, accompanied by a showing that [the municipality] has failed to train its employees to handle recurring situations presenting an obvious potential for a constitutional violation.'. . Morgan has not presented proof of any previous sexual assaults at UCH, so the first method is unavailable to her. And she has not shown that any individual defendant violated her constitutional rights, so the second method is unavailable to her. Thus,

Morgan's failure-to-train claim is untenable."); George, on behalf of Bradshaw v. Beaver County, 32 F.4th 1246, 1253-55 (10th Cir. 2022) ("Deliberate indifference requires proof that a municipal actor disregarded a known or obvious consequence of his action. . . . For example, when policymakers have actual or constructive notice that a training deficiency caused city employees to commit constitutional violations, the city may be deliberately indifferent if it chooses to maintain its deficient training program. . . Ordinarily, a plaintiff must prove a pattern of untrained employees' constitutional violations to show deliberate indifference. . . . Plaintiff contends Beaver County was deliberately indifferent to the 'predictable consequences' of failing to train its officers on its suicide-prevention policy and shift-change reports and failing to install CCTV monitoring cameras in the cells housing suicidal inmates. First, concerning Plaintiff's suicide-prevention-policy argument, Plaintiff argues Beaver County neither provided its officers a copy of its suicide-prevention policy nor trained them on it. But BCCF's suicide-prevention policy, along with the rest of the policy handbook, was available to officers 'on every computer in the facility.' And all Beaver County corrections officers complete a twelve-week training program at the Utah POST Academy. POST training includes a four-hour suicide-prevention training, and BCCF sponsors an annual mental-health training, which sometimes includes suicide-prevention training. After POST certification, BCCF officers also receive on-the-job training, called FTO training, to learn how more experienced officers implement BCCF policies. All deputies on duty June 13−15, 2014, were POST-certified officers in good standing. Although some officers testified that they were unfamiliar with BCCF's specific suicide-prevention policy, BCCF officers received some suicide-prevention training and could view the policy. While BCCF could have offered more or better suicide-prevention training, 'showing merely that additional training would have been helpful in making difficult decisions does not establish municipal liability.'. . Plaintiff contends a pattern of misconduct exists showing Beaver County was deliberately indifferent 'to the predictable consequences of failing to train its officers on suicide prevention.' She relies on the following: (1) the arresting officer failed to notify a mental-health provider when Bradshaw asked her to kill him twice; (2) the intake officer placed Bradshaw on suicide watch but did not put him in a suicide smock, log fifteen-minute safety-checks, or notify a mental-health provider that he was suicidal; (3) a booking officer failed to notify a mental-health provider that Bradshaw was suicidal; (4) Corporal Rose transferred Bradshaw to cell three, which lacked CCTV monitoring, without authorization from a mental-health provider; and (5) Rose failed to ensure other officers knew Bradshaw was suicidal, placed him in a suicide smock, or performed fifteen-minute checks. But Plaintiff's examples do not show a pattern of constitutional violations by untrained officers over time. They instead demonstrate that officers failed to comply with the County's suicide-prevention policy during this incident—a showing insufficient to establish deliberate indifference to suicide-prevention training. And Plaintiff does not argue that proving a pattern of constitutional violations is unnecessary here. . . Thus, on the facts taken in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, Plaintiff cannot establish that BCCF has a policy of failing to train its officers on suicide prevention. . . Second, Plaintiff argues Beaver County failed to train its officers on shift-change reports. . . But, like Plaintiff's suicide-prevention-policy argument, a failure to comply with BCCF's shift-change-report policy does not evidence a pattern of constitutional violations amounting to a policy of failing to train on shift-change reports. . . Failing to comply with jail policy does not amount to a constitutional violation on its own. . . And proving deliberate indifference ordinarily requires showing a pattern of similar instances because 'continued adherence to an approach that [policymakers] know or should know has failed to prevent tortious conduct by employees may establish the conscious disregard for the consequences of their action.'. . Plaintiff offers no evidence showing that Beaver County failed to comply with its shift-change-report policy on any occasion other than this incident. Thus, Plaintiff cannot prove Beaver County acted with deliberate indifference in failing to train its officers on shift-change reports. Last, Plaintiff argues that Beaver County's failure to install CCTV monitoring cameras in the cells used for suicidal inmates in violation of its suicide-prevention policy amounted to deliberate indifference. But again, Plaintiff complains only that the County violated its policy here and offers no evidence of a pattern of constitutional violations showing the County's deliberate indifference to the consequences of failing to install CCTV monitoring cameras in those cells. After all, no inmate had ever committed suicide at BCCF before this incident. And Plaintiff does not argue that proving a pattern of constitutional violations is unnecessary. Because Plaintiff cannot show that the County was deliberately indifferent in failing to train its corrections officers on preventing suicide and preparing shift-change reports or in failing to install CCTV monitoring cameras in certain cells, the district court properly granted summary judgment to Beaver County."); Gambrel v. Knox County, Kentucky, 25 F.4th 391, 408-12 (6th Cir. 2022) ("[A] municipality's improper training or supervision must have 'actually caused' the plaintiff's injury. . . This element requires proof of the two types of causation from the common law of torts: but-for (or factual) causation and proximate causation. . . Even if a municipal employee uses excessive force to harm a plaintiff, then, the plaintiff cannot hold the municipality liable without proof that proper training would have prevented this force. . . And even if a plaintiff can establish this factual causation, the plaintiff still must show proximate causation—which requires, for example, that a municipality could reasonably foresee that an employee's wrongful act would follow from the lack of training. . . Before applying these elements here, we start with two points of agreement from the parties about the nature of Gambrel's claim. To begin with, Gambrel does not allege that the Knox County Sheriff's Office had an official policy condoning excessive force. Its use-of-force policy in June 2016 tracked Kentucky's use-of-force standards, which Gambrel does not challenge. . . Gambrel thus agrees that she must prove the 'most tenuous' of claims against a local government—that Knox County failed to properly train or supervise its agents about the proper uses of force. . . Next, Gambrel does not dispute the County's argument that she can hold it liable only for the allegedly inadequate training or supervision of Ashurst (a deputy in the Knox County Sheriff's Office), not Bolton (the Knox County Constable). According to Knox County, Bolton is an agent of Kentucky rather than the County. The Kentucky Constitution creates the office of county constable as an (unpaid) elected position, Ky. Const. § 99, and Kentucky law permits constables to execute warrants and carry concealed firearms, Ky. Rev. Stat. §§ 70.350(1); 527.020(2). Perhaps given their limited roles, Kentucky also exempts constables from the training duties it imposes on other officers. . . The County thus argues that it had no power to train or supervise Bolton, and he received no training on his own. Under the relevant caselaw, whether Bolton qualified as an agent of Kentucky or Knox County raises a complex question. Compare Manders v. Lee, 338 F.3d 1304, 1328–29 (11th Cir. 2003) (en banc), with Crabbs v. Scott, 786 F.3d 426, 429–30 (6th Cir. 2015).

Because Gambrel does not dispute the County's claim that Bolton is not its agent, though, we need not consider that question. Instead, Gambrel seeks to hold Knox County liable for Bolton's conduct on the theory that it should have trained Ashurst not to allow Bolton (a constable untrained on the use of force) to ride with him. We thus must consider Ashurst's training. According to him, Knox County did not provide any use-of-force training on its own. The County instead relied on the training that Ashurst took to become a certified peace officer at the police academy run by the Kentucky Department of Criminal Justice Training. . . At the academy, Ashurst received 18 weeks of training on courses ranging from the use of firearms to the legal rules relevant to police. His training covered, for example, the proper use-of-force continuum that officers should follow when they confront people showing signs of mental incapacitation due to drug use. Apart from this academy training, Ashurst also took separate training to become the certified firearms instructor for the Knox County Sheriff's Office, which required him to attend an additional two-week course on firearms. Lastly, all peace officers must take 40 hours of annual 'in-service training at the Department of Criminal Justice Training' to remain certified. . . Did this training suffice? We need not decide whether Knox County's heavy reliance on Ashurst's academy training was reasonable or instead showed a level of negligence. . . At the least, Gambrel has not produced enough evidence for a reasonable jury to find the deliberate-indifference and causation elements that the Supreme Court has adopted to prevent § 1983 from becoming a vicarious-liability statute. . . Hobbs's allegations that Ashurst gratuitously beat and shot Mills (and allowed Bolton to engage in similar misconduct) foreclose her claim against Knox County under these two 'rigorous' legal elements. . . Start with deliberate indifference. Gambrel has not identified a 'pattern' of excessive force by Knox County agents. . . She thus must establish the County's deliberate indifference under the seemingly 'rare' single-incident theory. . . Yet it would not have been 'obvious' to Knox County that it needed to instruct a certified peace officer like Ashurst not to engage in (or permit Bolton to engage in) the gratuitous violence that Hobbs alleges. . . . [Hobbs] testified that Ashurst and Bolton gratuitously beat Mills and that Ashurst later shot him for no reason. 'Even an untrained' officer—let alone one trained at the academy—would know that wanton violence 'was inappropriate.'. . Because the need for training against this allegedly intentional misconduct was not 'obvious,' Gambrel cannot prove deliberate indifference through a single misdeed alone. . . Turn to causation. Gambrel likewise points to no evidence suggesting that if Knox County had provided additional training about avoiding gratuitous violence, the training 'would have prevented' the assault on Mills that Hobbs describes. . . Indeed, neither Ashurst nor Bolton so much as hinted that they believed that the unnecessary force recounted by Hobbs would have been an acceptable way to arrest Mills. To the contrary, Ashurst specifically testified that he needed to follow the 'use of force continuum' that he learned at the academy. . . So if he engaged in the conduct that Hobbs describes, it would not have been due to the absence of training. It would have been due to the 'intentional disregard' of that training. . . A large body of precedent supports our conclusion. The deliberate-indifference and causation elements regularly foreclose failure-to-train claims against municipalities when rogue employees engage in blatant wrongdoing (say, a sexual assault of an inmate or a gratuitous beating of a detainee). [collecting cases] Gambrel's contrary arguments lack merit. Alleging that a jury could find deliberate indifference based solely on the Officers' use of force against Mills, she cites the Supreme Court's suggestion in Canton that the single-incident theory might apply if a municipality gave no training to officers about the constitutional limits on deadly force. . . In this case, however, the police academy did train Ashurst on the proper use of force against arrestees (like Mills) who are suspected of being under the influence of drugs, so the case does not involve the complete lack of training that Canton hypothesized. . . Indeed, we have regularly relied on academy training to reject claims against municipalities that offered little additional training themselves. . . Gambrel responds that two recent cases have allowed plaintiffs to obtain trials over failure-to-train claims involving a single incident of alleged excessive force. See Ouza v. City of Dearborn Heights, 969 F.3d 265, 289 (6th Cir. 2020); Wright, 962 F.3d at 881–82. These cases confirm our conclusion. In Wright, we did not rely on a city's unofficial custom of failing to train its officers to hold it liable for a single incident. Rather, we relied on 'offensive statements and depictions' in the city's official training (including, for example, 'jokes about Rodney King'). . . We reasoned that a jury could find that the city's problematic training created a culture approving of excessive force and that this culture caused the plaintiff's injury. . . We would expand Wright well beyond its logic if we applied it to this case. Gambrel has not suggested that Knox County had a deliberate policy condoning excessive force. Rather, she seeks to hold the County liable for its alleged deliberate indifference to its inadequate training on the use of force. For the reasons that we have explained, however, she has not shown such indifference. That leaves Ouza. There, the plaintiff claimed that a city's police officers lacked probable cause to arrest her and handcuffed her too tightly when doing so, both in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . We held that a jury could hold the city liable for this single incident because the city provided no additional training to the officers other than the instruction that they received at the police academy over a decade in the past. . . Yet the proper standards for probable cause and the proper methods for handcuffing arrestees are the types of 'technical' issues for which up-to-date training can provide guidance about what is lawful and what is not. . . So Ouza held that a jury might find that it is obvious that officers would need additional training on these technical subjects and that this training would have prevented the alleged improper handcuffing and probable-cause miscalculation. . . The same cannot be said for the gratuitous violence that Hobbs asserted in this case. Unlike mistakes over handcuffing or probable cause, it is 'self-evident' that officers cannot beat up and shoot nonresistant arrestees for no apparent purpose. . . So the need for training against this alleged wrongdoing was not obvious, and no amount of additional training would have prevented the allegedly intentional misconduct. . . That conclusion may follow in most cases, Gambrel lastly argues, but Knox County had specific notice of a need to supervise Ashurst. When Knox County hired him, Gambrel says, he had a history of using excessive force at other police agencies. Suffice it to say that none of the prior incidents put Knox County on notice of the type of wrongdoing that Hobbs alleged. Gambrel's cited evidence at best suggests that Ashurst at times 'demonstrated immaturity or a poor attitude.'. . And the Supreme Court has held that even an officer's criminal record (including an assault-and-battery conviction) did not suffice to make a county deliberately indifferent to the risk that the officer would use excessive force. . . Brown forecloses Gambrel's reliance on the prior incidents here."); Parker v. Blackwell, 23 F.4th 517, 524 (5th Cir. 2022) ("Here, the alleged connection between McClure's prior termination from the Shelby County Jail for abusing detainees and the alleged abuse of Parker and other detainees in the Shelby County Jail is sufficient to state a claim for deliberate indifference in rehiring McClure. . . Adequate scrutiny of McClure's background—that he was fired by Shelby County for abusing one or more inmates of the Shelby County Jail—would lead a reasonable supervisor to conclude that the plainly obvious consequences of the decision to rehire him would be that he would abuse inmates again. . . Indeed, his termination for abusing detainees at the Shelby County Jail and subsequent rehiring at that very same jail is the quintessential 'strong connection between the background of the particular applicant and the specific violation alleged.' . . At this stage, it is enough that Parker has plausibly alleged a violation of clearly established rights. At summary judgment, he will have to produce evidence to support those allegations."); Gomez v. Galman, 18 F.4th 769, 778 (5th Cir. 2021) ("The Supreme Court has emphasized that '[t]he connection between the background of the particular [defendant] and the specific constitutional violation alleged must be strong.'. . Galman's improper strip-search of an arrestee does not make 'plainly obvious' that Galman had a proclivity toward such brutal violence as alleged here. True enough, the fact Galman headbutted a car's mirror suggests that he is willing to improperly do damage to property. But that is different in kind from the act Galman is accused of here, which is aggressive physical violence toward a citizen. These incidents simply do not 'show that [Galman] was highly likely to inflict the particular type of injury [Gomez] suffered.'"); Hyde v. City of Willcox, 23 F.4th 863, 874-75 (9th Cir. 2022) ("While deliberate indifference can be inferred from a single incident when 'the unconstitutional consequences of failing to train' are 'patently obvious,'. . . an inadequate training policy itself cannot be inferred from a single incident. . . Otherwise, a plaintiff could effectively shoehorn any single incident with no other facts into a failure-to-train claim against the supervisors and the municipality. Because Plaintiffs pleaded no facts even suggesting that the training here was defective, they have failed to state a claim of failure to train against Dannels and Hadfield."); Jackson v. Valdez, 852 F. App'x 129, ___ (5th Cir. 2021) ("[W]hen a municipality's policymakers are on actual or constructive notice that a particular omission in their training program causes municipal employees to violate citizens' constitutional rights, the municipality may be deemed deliberately indifferent if the policymakers choose to retain that program. . . Deliberate indifference may be proven in one of two ways. . . . First, 'municipal employees will violate constitutional rights "so often" that the factfinder can infer from the pattern of violations that "the need for further training must have been plainly obvious to the ... policymakers."'. . This proof-by-pattern method is 'ordinarily necessary.'. . Absent proof of pattern, deliberate indifference can still be inferred in a limited set of cases, where 'evidence of a single violation of federal rights, accompanied by a showing that a municipality has failed to train its employees to handle recurring situations presenting an obvious potential for such a violation, [can] trigger municipal liability.'. . This 'single-incident' exception applies when 'the risk of constitutional violations was or should have been an "obvious" or "highly predictable consequence" of the alleged training inadequacy.'. .Jackson attempts to establish deliberate indifference under the 'pattern' theory, so we do not address the 'single-incident' exception. . . Again, it cannot be said that Jackson sufficiently pleaded facts that Dallas County employees conducted strip searches and classified transgender detainees solely on the basis of biological sex 'so often' as to give rise to a pattern. And without such a pattern, the need for training could not have been 'plainly obvious' to Dallas County or its policymakers. Accordingly, the district court did not err in dismissing Jackson's municipal liability claim based on its purported failure to supervise or train."); Howell v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., 987 F.3d 647, 655-59 (7th Cir. 2021) ("Through a bureaucracy that diffuses individual responsibility and accountability, healthcare in a prison or jail may be delivered (or not delivered) so that it is difficult or even impossible to assign the individual responsibility for deliberately indifferent failure that offers the simplest path to § 1983 liability. . . In this case, for example, the jury could reasonably find that Dr. Trost as an individual was not deliberately indifferent to Howell's pain. He repeatedly submitted Howell's case for outside diagnosis and treatment, but his requests were turned down several times through Wexford's collegial review process. Glisson provided a fatal example of this sort of diffused responsibility. The plaintiff suffered from several serious illnesses that required comprehensive and coordinated care. He died of starvation, acute renal failure, and associated conditions only 37 days after he entered custody where no individual was responsible for his overall care. We held in Glisson, however, that a jury could conclude that Wexford had adopted what amounted to a 'policy of inaction' for which Wexford itself could be held liable. . .There are many other, less severe examples where incarcerated plaintiffs have adequately pleaded Monell liability alleging only their individual experiences. . . But the more common paths toward Monell liability require proof either of an express policy that is unconstitutional or a widespread practice or custom affecting other individuals or showing repeated deliberate indifference toward the plaintiff. Despite the absence of bright-line rules, there can be little doubt that a practice or custom theory will be more persuasive if a plaintiff can show that the defendant government or company treated other, similarly situated patients in similar unconstitutional ways. . . . To prove a Monell claim against Wexford for deliberate indifference to his medical needs, Howell sought to offer evidence that Wexford's collegial review process had caused four other incarcerated persons to experience similarly avoidable pain by delaying needed orthopedic care. That evidence was the target of defendants' motion in limine. The district court reviewed the four affidavits and concluded that none was a suitable comparator. . . . Howell argues that the district court erred in granting Wexford's Rule 50(b) motion because the collegial review process was a company policy or widespread practice that caused the violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. We agree with the district court that Wexford's collegial review process is not unconstitutional on its face. We recognize that the collegial review process could be a mechanism for denying or delaying medical care that inmates need. In this case, however, Howell did not offer evidence that would let a reasonable jury find that Wexford's collegial review process is used in a widespread or systemic way to violate constitutional rights.")

Compare Shadrick v. Hopkins Cnty., Ky., 805 F.3d 724, 741-42 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Neither the Supreme Court's decision in Connick nor this court's decision in D'Ambrosio v. Marino, 747 F.3d 378 (6th Cir.2014), compel a different result. . . . This case mirrors the example given in City of Canton. The obvious need to train police officers who lack knowledge of the constitutional constraints on the use of deadly force parallels the obvious need to train LPN nurses who lack knowledge about the constitutional dimensions of providing adequate medical care to inmates in the jail setting. Unlike licensed prosecutors who completed law school, routinely attend ongoing continuing legal education classes, receive on-the-job legal mentoring, and labor under rules of professional responsibility to master their Brady obligations, . . . LPN nurses employed within the prison environment may be required to make professional judgments outside their area of medical expertise. Unless the employer provides necessary training, the LPN nurses lack knowledge about the constitutional consequences of their actions or inaction in providing medical care to inmates. Because it is so highly predictable that a poorly trained LPN nurse working in the jail setting 'utter[ly] lack[s] an ability to cope with constitutional situations,'. . . a jury reasonably could find that SHP's failure to train reflects 'deliberate indifference to the "highly predictable consequence," namely, violations of constitutional rights[]'. . . . Unlike Connick and D'Ambrosio, this case falls squarely within 'the narrow range of Canton's hypothesized single-incident liability.'") with Shadrick v. Hopkins Cnty., Ky., 805 F.3d 724, 751-55 (6th Cir. 2015) (Griffin, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent. I would affirm the summary judgment granted in favor of defendant Southern Health Partners, Inc. (SHP) on both claims. Regarding plaintiff Shadrick's § 1983 claim, the majority opinion acknowledges that SHP maintained a policy requiring its LPNs to monitor and treat Tyler Butler's staph infection under the guidance of its medical director, a licensed physician. Still, it concludes that the LPN training program posed so 'obvious' a risk to Butler's rights that SHP can be held liable 'without proof of a pre-existing pattern of [constitutional] violations.'. . In so holding, the majority expands the theory of 'single-incident' liability beyond the narrow circumstances contemplated in City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989), and Connick, 131 S.Ct. at 1361–63. . . . . Deliberate indifference, unlike negligence, requires intent. It is not enough to demonstrate only that SHP's training regimen did not comport with best practices; Shadrick must establish that SHP was on notice that its training program was constitutionally deficient but consciously decided not to correct it. The evidence submitted by Shadrick does not create a jury question regarding whether SHP consciously decided to adopt a policy that it knew would cause its employees to violate inmates' constitutional rights. . . .Shadrick's claim against the nurses hinges partially on her theory that Butler's death would have been averted had the nurses followed the SHP policies upon which they had been trained. The majority is apparently swayed by this argument, citing multiple instances in which SHP's employees failed to follow, or appeared unfamiliar with, the company's polices. But if the underlying harm was caused by employees' deviation from SHP's policies, then Monell liability cannot lie: the harm is the fault of the individual employees and is not attributable to the governmental entity that employed them. Despite the fact that SHP trained its nurses on applicable policies that—if followed—would have prevented the harm suffered in this case, Shadrick contends that SHP should have trained them more extensively. . . . Shadrick's claim turns on whether a reasonable jury could find that SHP had actual or constructive notice that its nurses were deficiently trained in violation of the Constitution, despite its policies. . . On the evidence Shadrick provided, I submit that it could not. . . . Taking up the mantle of Canton, the majority concludes that an inmate's need for competent medical care is so obvious that SHP's failure to train its nurses regarding when to notify medical directors about suspected staph infections amounts to deliberate indifference. There are two problems with this position. First, the single-incident theory of liability described in Canton applies only rarely outside of the use-of-deadly-force-training example that Canton provided. . . .Connick's reasoning is squarely applicable to the LPNs in the present case. An LPN making a rudimentary decision regarding how severe an inmate's symptoms are is not engaging in the type of professional cross-over envisioned in Canton's hypothetical. Instead, LPNs in such situations are medical personnel making rudimentary medical judgments. Although the majority presents LPNs as if they have no medical ability whatsoever, they are clearly trained in the medical field, have at least some degree of knowledge about medical symptoms presented by inmates, and are expected to make at least basic decisions about identifying circumstances under which further medical examination (such as by a doctor) is necessary. . . . The second point is related. Even with the single-incident theory applied in this context, the particular need at issue—the need for increased training regarding when an LPN should contact a medical director—is far from 'obvious.' In this regard, the majority conflates the generalized need for competent medical care with the much more particularized need for LPNs to be trained regarding the appropriate circumstances under which to refer inmates to a medical director. . . The Canton exception applies, if ever, only when the need is so patent as to be self-evident: training for armed officers on the constitutional boundaries of the use of deadly force, for instance. . . By contrast, the need here is much more particularized. It is not at all obvious that an LPN who has already completed a course of study and has been specifically instructed to follow SHP's written policies will always need more training regarding when to contact a medical director about a suspected staph infection. It is undisputed that SHP did, in fact, have policies in place on this question, which it required its nurses to read and follow. Therefore, Canton's hypothesized single-incident theory does not apply to this case.")

See also Tate v. City of Chicago, No. 18 C 7439, 2024 WL 4651834, at *4–6 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 1, 2024) ('Even if Plaintiffs conclusively establish the existence of a widespread policy or practice, they must also show that the City's final policymakers were deliberately indifferent to the 'known or obvious consequences' of the policies or practices in question. . . Here, the City states that the final policymakers for some policies would be the City Council and for other policies, including police training, the Superintendent of Police. The City contends that for each of the alleged widespread practices, the evidence fails to establish that any of the final policymakers either had knowledge of the widespread patterns or failed to act on them. To the contrary, the City argues that in many cases, it took active steps to combat the issues and that any failed efforts do not amount to an endorsement. But, as Plaintiffs point out, a jury could conclude that the City's final policymakers had actual and constructive notice of the CPD's pattern of excessive force against children. From 2012–2018, both the Independent Police Review Authority ("IPRA") and Civilian Office of Police Accountability ("COPA"), which report to the City Council, had notice of the pattern of complaints of excessive force against children. Thus, a reasonable jury can infer, since the IPRA and COPA report to the City Council, that the City Council were made aware of these allegations. Also, the January 2017 DOJ report also informed the City Council and other final policy makers of the pattern and practice of the use of excessive force against children. Plaintiffs also claim that despite having knowledge of the ongoing issue with the use of excessive force against children, the City was deliberately indifferent to the substantial risk of serious harm. The City had knowledge of hundreds of complaints of the use of excessive force against children, stemming at least six years from the date of the August 2018 incident in this case, and failed to take any substantive action to address this issue. Plaintiffs argue that any changes that were made were insignificant and did not address the actual issue of the use of excessive force against children. Considering that the discussion involves the use of excessive force towards minors, it is reasonable to infer that the risk of a constitutional violation was imminent. Yet, there is a dispute of fact as to whether the City indeed had knowledge of the pattern of excessive force or if the City took adequate steps to address the matter. This is also an issue best suited for a jury. . . .Lastly, the City argues that Plaintiffs are unable to establish the causation element of their claim, namely that the policies at issue were the 'direct cause' or 'moving force' behind the constitutional violation. . . . To establish causation, Plaintiffs must show a direct causal link between the CPD's widespread practices or policies, or the actions or inactions of the City's final policymakers, with their constitutional injuries. The City argues that even if excessive force was used in this case, Plaintiffs have failed to present any evidence establishing causation. . . .While the connection between a municipality's inaction and a plaintiff's constitutional injury might be more demanding, it is not insurmountable. . . As previously discussed, there is evidence in the record that could lead a jury to conclude that the City was deliberately indifferent and failed to address the issue of the use of excessive force against minors. . . If a jury concludes that the risk of constitutional injuries to minors due to the use excessive force was indeed obvious, then the jury could also infer causation. . . Thus, summary judgment on the issue of causation is also denied."); Bjelland v. City and County of Denver, No. 1:22-CV-01338-SKC-SBP, 2024 WL 4165428, at *7 (D. Colo. Sept. 12, 2024) ("As the Court understands their argument, Defendants contend that because these protests were 'unprecedented,' Plaintiffs cannot establish the prior notice necessary for deliberate indifference. But absent a pattern of conduct, notice may nevertheless be found if the violation of federal rights is a 'highly predictable or plainly obvious consequence of a municipality's action or inaction such as when a municipality fails to train an employee in specific skills needed to handle recurring situations.'. . In this case, both expert witness reports support a conclusion that the need for officer training and policies in crowd control and crowd management is obvious for a police department, such that a pattern of conduct is not necessary to establish deliberate indifference. . . Even if a protest of this magnitude was unprecedented in Denver, they are not unprecedented nationwide. It strains credulity to suggest that a protest, regardless of the size, would need to first occur locally before a police force was on notice of the need to train its officers in crowd control and crowd management. The expert reports also suggest that Denver's training was deficient in ways highly relevant to the events of the George Floyd protests. For example, Mr. Maguire attests that Denver's training is outdated and does not reflect current standards for crowd management or the use of less-lethal weapons. . . Consequently, Plaintiffs will be permitted to pursue this theory at trial because there are disputed issues of material fact."); Ratlieff v. City of Fort Lauderdale, 748 F.Supp.3d 1202, ____ (S.D. Fla. 2024) ("Unlike her ratification theory, Ratlieff has demonstrated a genuine issue of material fact as to her 'so obvious' failure-to-train theory under Monell. . . .To prevail on her 'so obvious' failure-to-train theory, Ratlieff needs to establish that (i) her First Amendment rights were violated; (ii) FLPD had a policy of failing to train officers in crowd control techniques with less-lethal weapons constituting deliberate indifference to First Amendment rights; and (iii) FLPD's failure-to-train policy caused the violation of Ratlieff's First Amendment rights. . . .As explained above, there is a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether FLPD violated Ratlieff's First Amendment rights. The Court accordingly proceeds directly to consider whether FLPD's purported failure to train in this context constitued a policy or custom of deliberate indifference. . . Ratlieff has demonstrated a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether FLPD had a policy of failing to train officers in crowd control techniques with less-lethal weapons constituting deliberate indifference to First Amendment rights. . . . Given that FLPD is a relatively large police department located in a major metropolitan area, crowd control with less-lethal weapons presents precisely the kind of highly predictable scenario likely to reoccur in which 'officer[s] lacking specific tools to handle that situation will violate citizens' rights' such that a jury would be justified in 'finding that policymakers' decision not to train the officer[s] reflected "deliberate indifference" to the obvious consequence of the policymakers' choice—namely, a violation of a specific constitutional or statutory right.'. . Here, policymakers for a city of nearly 200,000 people have armed their police with military-grade less-lethal weapons with the high likelihood that they will be regularly required to manage crowds—including individuals exercising their constitutionally protected speech and assembly rights. . . .Here, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Ratlieff, the Court concludes that she has presented more than enough evidence to support the inference that FLPD's training deficiencies caused her alleged First Amendment violations. Apart from the record evidence of training deficiencies and the predictability of this situation recurring—which can itself support an inference of causation, . . . Ratlieff has also offered three expert reports supporting her claim that FLPD did not adequately train its officers in crowd management with less-lethal weapons and that these failures caused her alleged First Amendment violations. . . . In sum, based upon the foregoing analysis regarding each of Ratlieff's theories of Monell liability, summary judgment is warranted in the City's favor as to Ratlieff's ratification theory— but not as to her 'so obvious' failure-to-train theory. The Court is acutely aware that liability under such a theory remains rare. The risk of the constitutional violation must be foreseeable in such a way that it amounts to deliberate indifference when the municipality fails to prepare their officers for it. . . But viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the non-movant, the Court finds that deliberate indifference and causation present factual questions that should be decided by a jury."); Hampton v. Cagle, No. 4:20-CV-04210-SLD-JEH, 2024 WL 3967265, at *4–6 (C.D. Ill. Aug. 28, 2024) ("Municipalities may delegate policymaking authority for traditional public functions to a private entity, which may make the actions that entity takes fall within the scope of state action. . . For example, a court found that ISC [Inmate Services Corporation] acted under color of state law when it transported a prisoner because 'custody of the state prisoners is traditionally an exclusive state function' and 'ISC had authority to transport [the prisoner] only because the state delegated that function to ISC.'. . Here, Hampton established that ISC was performing a traditionally exclusive state function because it was in the business of transporting detainees across state lines and did so in Hampton's case via a delegation of state authority from Pulaski County. . . Therefore, ISC was acting under color of state law when it entrusted Hampton's transport to Nesby. The second showing, a constitutional violation, is easily satisfied—rape is clearly an invasion of one's right to bodily integrity and a violation of the affirmative duties imposed by the Constitution upon the state and its agents when they hold an individual in involuntary custody. . . As to the third showing, that the violation was caused by an official policy or custom, Hampton has argued that the Operative Complaint satisfies this requirement under a variety of theories, . . . but the Court need not consider each theory to determine whether she has demonstrated her entitlement to a default judgment. An official policy or custom of inadequate training 'may serve as the basis for § 1983 liability only where the failure to train amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the [state officials] come into contact.'. . . The Seventh Circuit recently analyzed the issue of Monell liability in the context of jailers sexually abusing female detainees. See generally J.K.J. v. Polk County, 960 F.3d 367 (7th Cir. 2020). A correctional officer employed by the county raped at least two female detainees entrusted to his custody, and the Seventh Circuit found that sufficient evidence supported the jury's implicit finding that the county's 'sexual abuse prevention program was entirely lacking.'. . . Hampton's factual allegations tell a story which closely aligns with Polk County. She describes an obvious power imbalance between herself and Nesby which was materially identical to an inmate and correctional officer. . . ISC exercised delegated policymaking authority over conditions of transport and detention. . . ISC knew of the past allegations and inmate abuse, including Nesby's sexual assault of Arenz mere months prior to October 2018. . . In the face of the obvious risk to detainees' rights to bodily integrity posed by failing to change the policies that enabled Nesby to harm detainees, ISC instead chose to remain inactive. . . It is not hard to infer that these deficient policies caused Hampton to be raped, whether one chooses to fault ISC's decision to not terminate Nesby after he sexually assaulted Arenz, its decision to not monitor his behavior, or its decision to not at least pair him with a female employee to curb his opportunity to overpower and take advantage of detainees. . . ISC's official policy or custom of inadequate training, supervision, and retention of dangerous employees caused Hampton's injuries, and such policy or custom was enacted under color of state law because ISC was exercising authority delegated to it by Pulaski County. Therefore, Hampton has shown that she is entitled to a default judgment under section 1983 against ISC."); Leliaert v. City of South Bend, No. 3:22-CV-359 DRL, 2024 WL 3876146, at *10–11 (N.D. Ind. Aug. 20, 2024) ("[E]ven assuming Officer Morgan did place his knee on Ms. Leliaert's neck for the Monell analysis, the record is clear that this act would have violated the South Bend Police Department's explicit policy. Chief Ruszkowski confirmed that 'South Bend Police Department officers are not trained to use neck restraints on arrestees, because neck restraints are not allowed' and that South Bend's 'use of force policy does not allow for any type of neck restraint'. . . The department's policy considers neck restraints to be deadly force and forbids them 'except when deadly force is required to preserve the life of the officer or others'. . . Officer Williams also confirmed this, testifying that the policy prohibited the use of neck restraints to subdue a subject unless the situation was 'life or death'. . . Ms. Leliaert hasn't shown any other examples of neck restraints that would demonstrate a pattern, and the department policy clearly doesn't allow neck restraints unless deadly force is necessary—something she doesn't dispute. . . No reasonable jury could conclude that the department had a policy, practice, or custom of using excessive force through neck restraints. Second, Ms. Leliaert provides no evidence that the officers were insufficiently trained. A plaintiff may take an 'alternative path to Monell liability' by alleging that the need for more or different training is 'so obvious that the municipality's failure to act can reflect deliberate indifference and allow an inference of institutional culpability, even in the absence of a similar prior constitutional violation.'. . This is known as a failure-to-train theory of liability. . . Though the law does not 'absolutely foreclose the possibility that a plaintiff might succeed in proving a failure-to-train claim without showing a pattern of constitutional violations,' a plaintiff relying on a failure-to-train theory must still eventually 'provide enough evidence of custom and practice to permit an inference that the [municipal entity] has chosen an impermissible way of operating.'. . . Ms. Leliaert hasn't provided any evidence or reason to think that these officers were inadequately trained; no reasonable jury could reach such a conclusion on this record. That just leaves Ms. Leliaert's claim that a failure to discipline and code of silence led to the alleged constitutional violation. A 'defendant's "code of silence" can give rise to a valid Monell claim,' but the claim still requires 'a widespread practice that permeates a critical mass of an institutional body.'. . . Her summary judgment response says she has presented sufficient evidence of a department-wide policy and incidents of excessive force such that it could also be found that there was deliberate indifference to the fact that failure to discipline officers for such conduct did or could result in additional such incidents, but the record does not support this claim. . . .Ms. Leliaert also hasn't shown the 'direct causal link' between the alleged violation and the City's actions or that the City's actions were the 'moving force' behind the force. "); Hight v. Smith, No. 6:21-CV-01307-LSC, 2024 WL 3243465, at *8 (N.D. Ala. June 28, 2024) ("In arguing that Deputy Jackson's use of excessive force was a plainly obvious consequence of his hiring, Plaintiff emphasizes that Deputy Jackson has previously been sued three times, two of which alleged excessive force against the mentally ill. . . In John Skinner v. City of Cordova, the plaintiff alleged that Deputy Jackson forcibly entered his home, stood over him with his firearm drawn, and then assaulted, tased, kicked, and pepper sprayed him. . . In Latonvia Shelton v. Jackson, the plaintiff alleged that Deputy Jackson entered her home unannounced, forced her by her hair into a police car, and then, upon arriving at the jail, beat and maced her. . . But there was never any finding of liability in those cases—each of those cases settled and the claims against Deputy Jackson were dismissed. . . Plaintiff has not demonstrated that any of the excessive force allegations against Deputy Jackson 'had any merit.'. . And it is frankly not shocking to the Court that Deputy Jackson has been sued a couple of times for excessive force, given his nearly thirty-year career as a law enforcement officer. . . Accordingly, Plaintiff has not established that excessive force was the plainly obvious consequence of hiring Deputy Jackson. And even if Plaintiff had made this showing, Plaintiff has not shown that Sheriff Smith's decision violated clearly established law. The only binding case that Plaintiff directed the Court to is Bd. of Cnty. Comm'rs of Bryan Cnty. v. Brown. . . In Bryan Cnty., the Supreme Court held that a sheriff's decision to hire a deputy who was later accused of excessive force was not deliberately indifferent, despite the fact that the deputy had previously pled guilty to various driving infractions and other misdemeanors like assault and battery. . . While both Deputy Jackson and the deputy in Bryan Cnty. were accused by the plaintiffs in their respective cases of excessive force, the comparison ends there. The Bryan Cnty. deputy had previously pled guilty to assault and battery, among other offenses, and the Supreme Court still held that the sheriff's hiring decision was not deliberately indifferent. In contrast, Deputy Jackson was hired after two cases alleged, without proving, that he had used excessive force. Therefore, Sheriff Smith did not violate clearly established law, and he is entitled to qualified immunity."); Flanks v. City of New Orleans, No. CV 23-6897, 2024 WL 2295543, at *8–10 (E.D. La. May 21, 2024) ("In Connick v. Thompson, the Supreme Court considered whether a single Brady violation was sufficient to hold Connick, as the official policymaker for OPDA, liable under Monell for the wrongful conviction of John Thompson. . . The Supreme Court, applying dicta from a prior Supreme Court case, Canton v. Harris, found that the theory of 'single-incident liability' did not apply to prosecutors. . . The Supreme Court also noted that four overturned convictions in Louisiana courts because of Brady violations by OPDA prosecutors under Connick in the 10 years before Thompson's armed robbery trial 'could not have put Connick on notice that the [OPDA's] Brady training was inadequate with respect to the sort of Brady violation at issue here.'. . Thompson contended that OPDA failed to disclose an exculpatory blood swatch as the Brady violation, but the Supreme Court noted that none of the cases Thompson cited involved failure to disclose blood evidence, a crime lab report, or physical or scientific evidence of any kind. . .In Armstrong v. Ashley, the Fifth Circuit affirmed the district court's dismissal of Andrea Armstrong's ("Armstrong") Monell claim against James Stewart, in his official capacity as the District Attorney for Caddo Parish ("Stewart"), on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. . . The Fifth Circuit held that Armstrong's Monell claim against Stewart was conclusory because Armstrong alleged, in part, that 'the District Attorney, through its final policymakers, maintained a policy, custom, or pattern and practice of condoning corruption, that included widespread prosecutorial misconduct, including by failing to supervise, discipline, and train its prosecutors …'. . . Armstrong also listed nine cases over a 24-year period where exculpatory evidence was suppressed by the District Attorney as demonstrating a custom of suppressing exculpatory evidence. . . However, the Fifth Circuit held that 'nine constitutional violations over a 24-year period and thousands of prosecutions are hardly sufficient to show a municipal custom.'. . Further, the Fifth Circuit noted that '[a] more fundamental problem … is the mischaracterization of these nine cases, none of which found a Brady violation.'. . The Fifth Circuit concluded that '[t]his proffered litany cannot establish a plausible allegation that the Caddo Parish DA's office had a custom of suppressing exculpatory evidence.'. . Here, Plaintiff's allegations center on a widespread practice of OPDA prosecutors withholding exculpatory evidence in violation of Brady. . . Plaintiff further alleges that Harry Connick had knowledge of this widespread practice of withholding exculpatory evidence but 'failed to impose reasonable discipline on the employee(s) involved and failed to take other reasonable, remedial measures to deter and prevent such misconduct,' including training and supervising OPDA employees with regard to repeated Brady violations. . . In support of these allegations, Plaintiff states that 'Orleans Parish has the highest per capita exoneration rate of any county or parish in the country.'. . Plaintiff also references '51 criminal cases from New Orleans in which courts have found and/or the prosecution has acknowledged that the OPDA violated Brady, as well as several others in which strong claims of Brady violations existed but the convictions were reversed on other grounds.'. . Plaintiff reasons that, 'the actual total of cases with concealed exculpatory evidence is much higher.'. . Of these 51 criminal cases, Plaintiff identifies and describes 18 of these cases. . .Of these 18 cases, nine appear to predate Plaintiff's conviction in 1985. . . Therefore, the Court only considers the nine cases that predate Plaintiff's conviction. Seven of these nine cases involve the suppression of witness testimony or evidence that the perpetrator did not match the defendant's characteristics. . .The Brady evidentiary violations in these seven cases are similar to Plaintiff's allegations that OPDA suppressed evidence of inconsistent descriptions of the perpetrator and Mrs. Carnesi's inconsistent testimony in identifying Plaintiff. Professor Levenson's expert report, which Plaintiff attached to the Complaint, includes a list of cases where courts have found that OPDA violated Brady. . . Professor Levenson notes 23 cases where a defendant was convicted of a crime prior to December

1985. . . Plaintiff has already identified and described six of these 23 cases in the Complaint. . . Of these 23 cases Professor Levenson identifies, there are eight cases where courts have found that OPDA violated Brady prior to December 1985. . . Professor Levenson also identifies three cases where 'OPDA's conduct amounted to admission of Brady violations.'. . She explains that in these cases, OPDA either offered the defendant a plea agreement for immediate release or filed a joint motion with the defendant for relief when the defendant raised a Brady violation. . .Because Plaintiff alleges that there are 51 cases where OPDA prosecutors committed Brady violations that led to convictions being overturned but only provided specific allegations for 18 'representative cases,' Plaintiff is granted leave to amend the Complaint to clarify if any other of those 51 cases predate Plaintiff's conviction in 1985 and Plaintiff may include cases Professor Levenson has identified. Plaintiff may include these cases in the Complaint to clarify the number of cases where convictions were obtained prior to December 1985 and where a court later found that a Brady violation occurred. The Supreme Court's decision in Connick and the Fifth Circuit's decision in Armstrong did not create a bright line rule as to how many similar cases predating a defendant's conviction where courts have found Brady violations would be sufficient to demonstrate a custom of OPDA violating Brady. . . Granting Plaintiff leave to amend the Complaint will clarify the number of similar cases the Court can consider in its analysis.Plaintiff also asserts theories of Monell liability against Defendant Williams based on OPDA's failure to train, supervise, and discipline its prosecutors based on the same allegation that 51 cases of overturned convictions because of Brady violations in Orleans Parish demonstrates a custom of OPDA's failure to train, supervise, and discipline its prosecutors. For the same reasons already discussed above, Plaintiff may amend the Complaint to clarify the number of similar cases that demonstrate a pattern of OPDA violating Brady and failing to train, supervise, and discipline its prosecutors with regard to Brady."); Evans v. Columbia County, 711 F.Supp.3d256, ___ (M.D. Pa. 2024) ("Here, proceeding under the single-incident theory of liability, Evans points to evidence that the dangers of restraint chair usage were well known such that the need for training was obvious. She notes that there was a prominent warning on the restraint chair that its use could cause injury or death. Evans also points to testimony from her experts that the dangers of use of the restraint chair were well known in the correctional field. . . Further, we note, an inference that officers will confront the situation of a prisoner needing medical care while in restraints is reflected by the fact that the Columbia County Prison had policies regarding both the use of the restraint chair and the provision of medical care to prisoners in restraints.Based on the summary-judgment evidence, a reasonable factfinder could conclude that given the frequency of the use of the restraint chair at the Columbia County prison coupled with the known risks involving prolonged restraint chair use that a violation of a prisoner's right to adequate medical care was a highly predictable consequence of failure to train on the dangers and use of the restraint chair and on how to handle an emergency medical situation involving a prisoner in the restraint chair. In sum, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Evans, she has presented enough evidence to create a genuine, material factual dispute about whether Columbia County was deliberately indifferent. In addition to deliberate indifference, a plaintiff asserting a municipal liability claim based on a failure or inadequacy of training, supervision, or discipline must also establish causation. . . Although causation is an element of a failure-to-train claim that is separate from the deliberate indifference element, in single-incident cases, the same high degree of predictability that a failure to train will lead to a constitutional violation ' "may also support an inference of causation—that the municipality's indifference led directly to the very consequence that was so predictable."'. . Here, Columbia County contends that Evans has not shown what specific training would have made a difference in Tyler's case. But Evans points out that Columbia County failed to provide training on its own written policies concerning the duration of use of the restraint chair and the medical supervision required when a prisoner is restrained. Evans also points out that Columbia County failed to provide training regarding the manufacturer's instructions for use of the restraint chair and on 'basic national correctional and correctional health care standards on restraint chair use.'. . And she points to the opinions of her experts that such lack of training led to Tyler's death. . . This evidence is sufficient for Evans to survive summary judgment as to the causation element. In sum, Evans has presented evidence from which a reasonable factfinder could conclude that Columbia County violated Tyler's right to medical care by failing to adequately train its corrections officers. Accordingly, Columbia County is not entitled to summary judgment as to this claim."); Estate of Jensen by Jensen v. Duchesne County, No. 217CV01031DBBDAO, 2023 WL 5432200, at *3, *16-17 & n.302, *20 (D. Utah Aug. 23, 2023) ("The Estate argues that 'the Tenth Circuit's decision in Lance v. Morris ... changed municipal liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 in failure-to-train medical situations nearly identical to the situation in this case ....'. . . . In Lance, the Tenth Circuit clarified the three-part test for municipal liability for deliberate indifference on a failure-to-train claim, adopting a subtest for the third element. . . For the overarching structure of the claim, the three elements are: (1) 'the existence of a county policy or custom involving deficient training'; (2) 'the policy or custom's causation of an injury'; and (3) 'the county's adoption of a policy or custom with deliberate indifference.'. . Concerning the third element, the court of appeals was 'persuaded by the logic' of a three-part subtest devised by the Second Circuit in Walker v. City of New York. . . The three-part subtest for deliberate indifference requires evidence that (1) '[t]he county's policymakers know "to a moral certainty" that [their] employees will confront a given situation'; (2) '[t]he situation ...presents the employee with a difficult choice of the sort that training or supervision will make less difficult'; and (3) '[t]he wrong choice ... will frequently cause the deprivation of a citizen's constitutional rights.'. . . [T]he Tenth Circuit decided Lance after this court's summary judgment order, and it expressly adopted a new subtest for a failure-to-train deliberate indifference municipal liability claim, making it 'an intervening change in the controlling law.'. . Further, the factual similarity of Lance—in which an inmate who exhibited symptoms that constituted a medical emergency was left untreated for three days because the jail guards did not recognize the medical emergency. . . convinces the court to exercise its discretion under Rule 54(b) to revisit its 2020 Order. . . . [T]he Estate has evidence that the County allowed its Jail staff to assess whether a detainee or inmate was experiencing a 'serious medical emergency,'. . . but it had not trained employees on 'when a medical condition involved an emergency.'. . There is evidence that corrections officers only had first aid training. . . and LPN Clyde was unable to 'conduct any assessments, or diagnose or treat any medical condition.'. . And, according to Sheriff Boren, a corrections officer or LPN Clyde would make a determination about whether something constituted an emergency situation '[j]ust like any other person outside of the correctional setting would.'. . Sheriff Boren expected them to 'use their common sense in making that decision.'. . From this evidence, the fact finder could 'reasonably infer that the county had provided deficient training on how to detect a medical emergency.'. . . On these facts, a reasonable jury could conclude that the County's failure to train its employees on what constitutes a medical emergency directly and proximately caused Ms. Jensen's death. . . . At issue here is whether there is a dispute of material fact precluding summary judgment in the 'narrow range of circumstances' in which 'deliberate indifference may be found absent a pattern.'[302] [fn. 302: The Supreme Court acknowledged the potential for such a situation in City of Canton. . . There, it provided an example of single incident liability: municipal policymakers know 'to a moral certainty that their police officers will be required to arrest fleeing felons and they have 'armed [their] officers with firearms, so the 'need to train officers in the constitutional limitations on the use of deadly force is "so obvious" that failure to do so could properly be characterized as "deliberate indifference" to constitutional rights.'. . Then in Connick v. Thompson, the Supreme Court refused to find such single incident liability where the issue was whether the need to train prosecutors on the law of Brady violations was 'obvious' to result in constitutional violations. . . The Court noted that '[p]rosecutors are not only equipped but are also ethically bound to know what Brady entails and to perform legal research when they are uncertain.'. . Like Canton and unlike Connick, the issue here is whether the Jail staff were trained in a subject different than the training they undertook to perform the large majority of their job functions.] Applying the binding precedent in Lance to the facts of this case, the Estate has offered sufficient evidence for a jury to conclude that the County was deliberately indifferent by failing to train its Jail employees on how to recognize a serious medical emergency."); Irizarry v. City & County of Denver, No. 21-CV-01490-PAB-SKC, 2023 WL 2528782, at *11 & n.9, *13 (D. Colo. Mar. 15, 2023) ("The Court finds that one alleged incident, occurring nearly a year prior to the allegations in this complaint, is insufficient to show a practice so permanent and well settled that it constitutes a custom or usage with the force of law. . . . The Tenth Circuit has held that 'a single incident may suffice when caused by an existing policy that "can be attributed to a municipal policymaker."'. . However, plaintiffs have not alleged the existence of a policy, regarding arresting individuals who criticize the police, that is attributable to a municipal policymaker. . . . The plaintiffs argue that the Court can infer a policy of inadequate training based on Sergeant Ingersoll's belief that it was legal to arrest plaintiffs for using profane language to criticize the police. . . However, a plaintiff may not attempt to fasten liability onto a city solely because 'a particular officer may be unsatisfactorily trained' because 'the officer's shortcomings may have resulted from factors other than a faulty training program.'. . The Court therefore rejects this argument. Because Mr. Irizarry and Mr. Shockley have not plausibly alleged an official policy or a custom, the Court will dismiss their claims against Denver without considering the causation or state-of-mind elements of municipal liability."); Little v. City of Morristown, Tennessee, No. 221CV00047DCLCCRW, 2023 WL 2769633, at *12–13 (E.D. Tenn. Mar. 31, 2023) ("Due to the existence of genuine disputes of fact regarding the County's policy of inaction, the Court need not address Plaintiffs' second theory of liability—systematic failure to train officers on matters affecting inmate safety. Nevertheless, it is important to note that Plaintiffs, at this point, have failed to present sufficient evidence to support such a theory of liability. . . . Plaintiffs have neither provided any similar incidents or prior complaints regarding the failure to medically attend to an inmate suffering from an overdose or similar medical condition at the Jail, nor have they pointed to foreseeable consequences resulting from a lack of instruction. Rather, Plaintiffs focus, for the most part, on Officer Smith's actions of accepting inmates into the Jail without having been trained to do so and his failure to follow established Jail policy regarding the admission and medical evaluation of incoming inmates[.] . . The Jail policy is clear regarding the procedure for admission and the requirement of a medical evaluation. . . . Although it is undisputed Officer Smith did not comply with these policies, to hold the County liable for Officer Smith's actions, without more, would amount to nothing more than vicarious liability, which is an improper basis for municipal liability under Section 1983."); Lee v. Cook County Sheriff, No. 19 C 4560, 2023 WL 2745149, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 31, 2023) ("The allegation that the officers 'directly violated the rules and regulations of the Cook County Sheriff' is irreconcilable with liability due to a formal policy. The fact that the Cook County Sheriff's Office has formal policies that condemn this behavior does not foreclose the possibility of a conflicting unwritten, de facto policy or custom that is unconstitutional, however, with the only alleged instance of misconduct being the one assault of Lee, there are insufficient facts to find one. . . Without facts describing a prior pattern of similar violations making obvious a need for additional training that was not given, a single decision by a final policymaker that resulted in the charged violation, or a ratification of the actions at issue, these avenues to relief remain beyond the reach of Lee's complaint, too. See Connick v. Thompson, 563 U.S. 51 (2011). Because Lee failed to plead facts rendering plausible liability on the part of Cook County Sheriff in either an individual capacity or an official capacity, the Court dismisses Defendant Cook County Sheriff entirely."); Walker v. City of Milwaukee, No. 20-CV-487, 2023 WL 2666537, at *11–12 (E.D. Wis. Mar. 28, 2023) ("Walker . . . argues that the City failed to properly train its police officers with respect to mental health crisis response and intervention and interacting with persons having mental health crises. . . The City does not dispute that prior to and during the relevant time period, encountering individuals who are suffering from mental illness and/or experiencing a crisis situation was a recurring situation that MPD officers faced. . . Boll testified that officers requested a Crisis Intervention Officer, or a 'CIT,' to respond to Walker's residence the morning of April 6, 2014. . . Boll testified that a CIT typically deals with people that are going through a crisis, 'just not in their correct state of mind, so they have had special training on how to deal with those people.'. . Purcelli was the CIT on scene that night. . . Purcelli testified that CIT training included learning how to talk to people in a state of crisis, how to 'de-escalate circumstances so that we can communicate with them and to keep them safe and us safe.'. . Purcelli could not remember when she was trained in CIT or how often she was required to go to trainings. . .On the record before me, a reasonable jury could find that the City inadequately trained officers to address individuals in a state of crisis and that the City's inadequacy in training amounted to deliberate indifference. As stated above, a 'municipality acts with deliberate indifference when, "in light of the duties assigned to specific officers or employees the need for more or different training is so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights," that the deficiency exhibits deliberate indifference on the part of municipal policymakers.'. . Again, while the officers recognized that Walker's alleged mental health crisis necessitated the need for a CIT, Purcelli, the assigned CIT for the encounter, never interacted with Walker. Even though Purcelli testified that part of her CIT training included de-escalating circumstances to keep everyone safe . . . , Purcelli did not even attempt to de-escalate the situation. . . . It is unclear why the CIT officer, trained to deal with individuals experiencing a crisis situation, was stationed the farthest away from the individual in crisis. On this record, a reasonable jury could determinate that 'in light of the duties assigned' to Purcelli, the need for more or different training was obvious. . . Further, a jury could find that the inadequacy was likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights. . . Purcelli clearly understood that people going through mental health and/or crisis situations may be volatile enough to require de-escalation. Thus, a reasonable jury could find that failure to properly train CIT officers to de-escalate volatile situations is likely to lead to the violation of constitutional rights, such as the use of excessive force. For these reasons, the defendants' motion for summary judgment as to Count III is denied."); Clancy v. City of Milwaukee, No. 21-CV-0881-BHL, 2023 WL 2633584, at *10 (E.D. Wis. Mar. 24, 2023) ("Finding Monell liability under a failure-to-train theory without a pattern of prior constitutional violations is a high bar that Clancy has not met. See Bohanon v. City of Indianapolis, 46 F.4th 669, 677 (7th Cir. 2022) ("In the rare cases where we have found this standard to be met, the risks of municipal inaction have been blatantly obvious."). Nothing about the text of the City's curfew order suggests constitutional violations were likely to occur, and '[t]o hold otherwise would significantly expand Monell and lead us down the road to vicarious liability.'. . Defendants' motion for summary judgment on the Monell claim is therefore granted."); Estate of Melvin by & through Melvin v. City of Colorado Springs, No. 20-CV-00991-CMA-STV, 2023 WL 2424838, at *12–13 (D. Colo. Mar. 8, 2023) ("The Court finds that summary judgment in favor of the City is not warranted as to whether the City's training on use of force and Taser use was adequate. Although CSPD's written materials provide that '[a]dditional justification is required for deploying [a Taser] more than 3 times on a single individual,'. . . there is a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether Officers Patterson and Archer were actually trained in accordance with this language. Indeed, Officer Archer testified that he did not recall 'anything stating that it was unsafe to tase someone past three times and that 'there was no set limit on the amount of times you can tase someone.'. . The Officers' supervisors, former Chief Carey and current Chief Vasquez, also testified that officers may repeatedly deploy their Tasers if the officers determine that each Taser use is independently justified after assessing the situation. . . Similarly, Carey and Vasquez affirmed that the 8 deployments used in this case were within policy and that the Officers' conduct was reasonable. . . A reasonable jury could determine that CSPD did not adequately train the Officers on the dangers of repeated Taser deployments and instead trained Officers that repeated tasings are appropriate if 'justified,' with 'additional justification' apparently undefined and left to the Officer's individual discretion. . .Further, the City trained its officers that a Taser deployment is 'effective' if it achieves neuromuscular incapacitation. It is unclear whether CSPD trained its officers that the three deployments in the policy include only 'effective' Taser deployments (using the NMI definition), or any Taser deployments, including those which clearly cause pain but do not achieve NMI. For example, Defendants in this case assert that the Officers reasonably believed that only one of the Taser deployments was 'effective'/achieved NMI. The Court cannot discern if the Officers were trained to therefore understand that Mr. Melvin was subject to only one of the three Taser 'deployments' outlined in the policy, notwithstanding that several of the 7 other deployments clearly caused Mr. Melvin pain. Accordingly, the Court finds that there are genuine disputes of material fact precluding summary judgment on the adequacy of the City's training. . . . The Court also finds that Plaintiff has sufficiently demonstrated that the inadequate training demonstrates deliberate indifference on the part of the City toward persons with whom the police officers come into contact. For a failure to train claim, 'a showing of specific incidents which establish a pattern of constitutional violations is not necessary to put the City on notice that its training program is inadequate.'. . Rather, the Tenth Circuit has held that 'evidence of a single violation of federal rights, accompanied by a showing that a municipality has failed to train its employees to handle recurring situations presenting an obvious potential for such a violation, is sufficient to trigger municipal liability.'. . In this case, the Officers stated that they acted in accordance with their training, and their supervisors, former Chief Carey and current Chief Vasquez, affirmed that the Officers acted reasonably and in accordance with CSPD training. It is undisputed that the Officers' use of force in their encounter with Mr. Melvin was exonerated by the City and that the City did not provide any additional or different training on Taser usage because of Mr. Melvin's death. . .Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the Court concludes that a reasonable juror could find that the Officers 'were trained to act recklessly in a manner that created a high risk of death' and that 'the City could reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent' to the need for different training on Taser use. . . Plaintiff has therefore satisfied the third element. Finally, the Court finds that the fourth element—a causal link between the inadequate training and the constitutional violation—is also met in this case. Because the Officers testified that they acted in accordance with their training, a reasonable jury could determine that the Officers would not have used excessive force—e.g., multiple, repeated Taser deployments—had they been trained differently. . . In sum, the Court finds that Plaintiff has met its burden with respect to each of the four elements of the failure to train claim. Summary judgment is therefore not appropriate, and the City's Motion must be denied."); Torain v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 14-1643, 2023 WL 174951, at *10-11 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 12, 2023) ("There is 'no obligation to specifically train police officers not to engage in criminal conduct that is obviously illegal[,]' including fabricating evidence and probable cause. . . The evidence does not suggest that the officers were confused as to whether their alleged misconduct was illegal, and there is no evidence from which we can infer that any new or different training would have made their conduct less likely. . . For these reasons, summary judgment will be granted on municipal liability under the failure to train theory. . . . In this case, there is sufficient evidence in the record demonstrating a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the City failed to adequately supervise or discipline NFU officers. First, Defendant Walker testified on multiple occasions that supervisors knew NFU officers were violating policies regarding fabrication of probable cause and 'were violating with [them].'. . In addition, the Enforcement Report identifies 'supervisory oversight' and 'discipline' as 'practices [in the Narcotics Bureau] that have created conditions conducive to breeding corruption.'. . . The Report's key findings include that there were excessive delays in resolving disciplinary matters, a lack of accountability for deviations from policy in the disciplinary process, poor tracking of disciplinary actions, and incomplete, unreliable, and uninformative disciplinary databases. . . The Report specifically states that, from 2000 to 2002, nearly half of all the officers, supervisors, and commanders who were found by the IAB to have violated Departmental policies or engaged in serious misconduct were never formally disciplined. . . The Report also identifies

'falsification of evidence' as an area in which these deficiencies of discipline and supervision of officers occurred. . . This evidence creates a genuine issue of material fact as to whether there was adequate supervision and discipline of NFU officers with regard to fabrication of evidence or probable cause. In addition, there is evidence that these failures amount to deliberate indifference. First, municipal policymakers knew that employees would confront situations where they would need to establish probable cause in order to secure a warrant or make an arrest; this is simply a part of the job. The City was also on notice that there had been a history of employees mishandling such situations in the past, as litigation against the City due, in part, to fabrication of evidence and probable cause, was the very purpose of the creation of the IAO and the IAO Reports. . . Finally, the City knew that the misconduct by NFU officers—fabricating evidence or probable cause—would frequently deprive individuals of constitutional rights, as this conduct is illegal and was the source of much litigation against them. For these reasons, we will deny summary judgment on Plaintiff's failure to supervise or discipline theory as there are genuine issues of fact created by the evidence in the record."); Johnson v. City of San Jose, No. 21-CV-01849-BLF, 2022 WL 17583638, at *9 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 12, 2022) ("The Court finds that Johnson has made out a failure to train claim based on the change in policy immediately before the protest regarding the permissible uses of less lethal weapons. . . He alleges that one week before the protest, the police chief sent a memo to all SJPD personnel informing them that the Duty Manual had been revised to permit the use of less lethal weapons for crowd control purposes, a context in which those weapons were previously prohibited. . . Johnson also alleges that while there had been some training on crowd control and the use of less lethal weapons generally, it was not conducted with sufficient frequency, several officers had not received the training, and there was no training on the legally permissible uses of less lethal firearms in a crowd control context in at least the previous five years. . . While failure to train claims are the 'most tenuous' form of Monell liability, . . the Court finds that the allegations are sufficient to state a failure to train claim. . . Without training on how to use less lethal weapons in a crowd control situation, Johnson has pled that the City was deliberately indifferent to his constitutional rights by changing the policy to allow for such uses of less lethal weapons. . .The Court also finds that Johnson has adequately alleged that SJPD's failure to supervise the police officers during the protests constituted deliberate indifference. Johnson has alleged that SJPD was aware of the officers' conduct during the protests, . . and did nothing to change course. Further, Johnson alleged that SJPD went so far as to replenish the stock of less lethal weapons midway through the protest, after a very large amount were used, yet failed to direct the officers to change their behavior. . . This behavior creates a reasonable inference of a deliberate indifference by SJPD as to the rights of the protestors. Johnson also asserts a failure to discipline. The Ninth Circuit has held that 'a custom or practice can be "inferred from widespread practices or evidence of repeated constitutional violations for which the errant municipal officers were not discharged or reprimanded."'. . As discussed above, the Court considered SJPD's failure to discipline its employees in evaluating the custom or policy claim. . . . Another court, in evaluating Monell liability in the context of similar Black Lives Matter protests, stated that 'when [a police] department is executing an organized, department-wide response, one can presume that the police chief was in control of his department, either directing that response himself or—at the very least—ratifying the actions of his subordinates.'. . In such an instance 'it becomes easier to infer that the repeated conduct of individual police officers is really the conduct of the department.'. . Here, the facts alleged in the SAC suggest that SJPD was engaged in 'an organized, department-wide response.'. . In such an instance, the Court can infer ratification by the Department."); Heidel v. Mazzola, No. 20-1067, 2021 WL 1103507, at *3 (10th Cir. Mar. 23, 2021) (not reported) ("Here, the jail has had one suicide-by-hanging from decades ago and one recent attempted suicide-by-drowning. While tragic, this is not a pattern of conduct that would establish actual notice of a substantially high risk of suicide. Nor is this one of those rare circumstances where the jail's operating procedures were so deficient, or the risk of the telephone cord was so obvious, that it would 'be liable under § 1983 without proof of a pre-existing pattern of violations.' Connick v. Thompson, 563 U.S. 51, 64 (2011)."); Anokwuru v. City of Houston, 990 F.3d 956, 965-66 (5th Cir. 2021) ("[A] plaintiff must plausibly allege that the municipality was deliberately indifferent to the need for proper training. . . A plaintiff may do so by alleging that the municipality had '[n]otice of a pattern of similar violations,' which were 'fairly similar to what ultimately transpired.'. . But in this case, Anokwuru points only to his own incident as proof of a policy of deliberate indifference. . . Granted, in certain limited cases, a plaintiff 'may establish deliberate indifference' through 'a single incident.'. . But Anokwuru's allegations do not pass muster under this narrow exception because the single-incident exception is generally reserved for those egregious cases in which the state actor was provided no training whatsoever. . . In sum, Anokwuru has not plausibly alleged that the City's training practices were inadequate or that the City was deliberately indifferent to Anokwuru's rights. We therefore affirm the district court's dismissal of this claim."); Cooper v. Rutherford, 828 F. App'x 619, ___ (11th Cir. 2020) ("Ms. Cooper has not presented any evidence of prior similar incidents where bystanders or hostages were injured due to officers exchanging gunfire with a suspect. Because there was 'no evidence of a history of widespread prior abuse ... [that] put the [S]heriff on notice of the need for improved training or supervision,'. . . there is no jury question on the matter of deliberate indifference. Second, this is not the 'rare' failure to train scenario where the likelihood for constitutional violations is so high that the need for training would be obvious. As Ms. Cooper acknowledges, the Jacksonville Sheriff's Office had a policy generally providing that officers should not discharge their weapons into moving vehicles except as a last resort (i.e., when all other opportunities have been exhausted, to prevent death or great bodily harm to the officer or other persons, or to prevent the escape of a fleeing felon who would pose an imminent threat of death or great bodily harm). That same policy instructed officers to 'exercise reasonable caution in order to avoid unnecessarily endangering the lives of bystanders. When possible, officers should give consideration to the backdrop, bystanders, and location.'. . We recognize that this general admonition did not specifically address the discharge of weapons in a hostage situation involving a non-moving vehicle. But given the general instruction that officers should use reasonable caution to avoid unnecessary danger to others when deciding whether to discharge their weapons, Ms. Cooper and her son cannot create a jury question on deliberate indifference. We note that Officers Black and Griffith were administratively found to have violated the 'response to resistance' and 'deadly force' policies of the Jacksonville Sheriff's Office, and resigned in lieu of termination. So this was not a case of a municipality turning a blind eye to a first-time violation of its policies. Although we do not necessarily agree with the Sheriff that his policies 'exceed' constitutional standards, . .

. we do conclude that they do not demonstrate deliberate indifference."); Hart v. Hillsdale County, Michigan, 973 F.3d 627, 646 (6th Cir. 2020) ("After the 2011 amendments narrowed the category of individuals required to register under SORA, the Municipal Defendants were on notice that the sex offender registry contained individuals who were no longer subject to the Act. We have already held that 'Michigan's SORA imposes punishment.' Snyder, 834 F.3d at 705. Being listed in the sex offender registry 'consigns [registrants] to years, if not a lifetime, of existence on the margins.'. . . Even if the municipalities incorrectly assumed that errors would be caught before any wrongful arrests, prompt action was required to avoid inevitable wrongful listing—wrongful listing that itself implicates constitutional concerns, as explained above. The question that remains is whether the responsibility to undertake that prompt action lay with one or both of the Municipal Defendants. Resolution of that question must await the proceeding below. If the district court determines that the municipalities failed to take reasonable steps to forestall wrongful listings, liability may exist for Municipal Defendants. If the district court determines that the wrongful arrest was foreseeable and that the municipality failed to prepare its officers for that foreseeable risk, municipal liability may result. . . Because those issues are not necessarily and unavoidably resolved by the issues before us, they are entrusted to the district court."); Contreras on behalf of A.L. v. Doña Ana County Bd. of County Commissioners, 965 F.3d 1114, 1139 (10th Cir. 2020) (Baldock, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1382 (2021) ("The district court concluded Plaintiff failed to establish a pattern of tortious conduct surrounding the control panel and therefore DACDC officials would not have understood their failure to train officers on appropriate control panel protocol was substantially certain to result in a constitutional violation. Nonsense. Detainees on four separate occasions within eighteen months of the attack on A.L. inappropriately accessed the control panel in the juvenile pod's dayroom. Fortunately, on the first and fourth occasions no harm resulted. Nonetheless, DACDC officials placed the culprits on pre-disc precisely because they realized such conduct was unacceptable and wrought with peril. On the second and third occasions, neither DACDC officials nor targeted detainees were so fortunate. Rather, targeted detainees were ruthlessly attacked and beaten because the control panel had been left unlocked. These four occasions considered in the aggregate were sufficient to place DACDC officials on notice that an unsecured control panel in the juvenile pod may result in problems of constitutional proportions for the DACDC, making the questions of causation and deliberate indifference in this case for the jury."); Doe v. Edgewood I.S.D., 964 F.3d 351, 365-69 (5th Cir. 2020) ("Doe must prove that this official policy was the 'moving force' behind the violation of her constitutional rights. . . Here, there's no dispute that the sexual abuse Hernandez perpetrated on Doe violated her constitutional rights. . . But this third element—causation—proves fatal to Doe's argument. EISD's hiring policy was not the 'moving force' behind Hernandez's unconstitutional actions. 'Moving force' causation is more than 'but for' causation. . . Doe must show that the final policymaker had the requisite degree of culpability and that EISD's policies were the actual cause of the constitutional violation. . .She has not. When it comes to the 'moving force' behind the sexual abuse of Doe, we agree with the district court that Hernandez's misconduct was the actual cause of the violation. Arguably, the hiring administrator's choice to hire Hernandez without further investigation of his employment and criminal history was negligent. But EISD cannot be held liable for an employee's negligence under a respondeat superior theory. . . .Doe also argues that the hiring administrator's decision to hire Hernandez constitutes a district policy that triggers municipal liability under § 1983. The district court disagreed. And so do we. True, we have recognized that 'a single decision by a policymaker may, under certain circumstances, constitute a policy for which [a municipality] may be liable.'. . But a plaintiff who brings a claim pursuant to this 'extremely narrow' 'single incident exception'. . . must show (1) the hiring decision was made by a final policymaker, and (2) a 'plainly obvious consequence of the decision' is a constitutional violation. . . As for the first prong—the hiring decision must be made by a final policymaker—it's critical to distinguish between 'an exercise of policymaking authority and an exercise of delegated discretionary policy-implementing authority.'. .The former can trigger § 1983 municipal liability; the latter cannot. Here, a hiring administrator screened Hernandez's application and decided to hire him. Unlike the Board, this administrator is not a final policymaker; . . . rather, he or she has only been delegated discretionary policy-implementing authority. By limiting the single decisions that trigger municipal liability to those made by final policymakers, we avoid imposing respondeat superior liability, which the Supreme Court has rejected in the § 1983 context. . . That should be the end of the inquiry: The 'single decision exception' does not apply. But even assuming that Doe satisfied the first requirement, she fails on the second. Specifically, a plaintiff must show deliberate indifference—that a constitutional violation is a plainly obvious consequence of the final policymaker's decision. . . To do so, Doe must provide evidence to show 'a strong connection between the background of [Hernandez] and the specific violation alleged,' such that he 'was highly likely to inflict the particular type of injury suffered.'. . Doe has failed to meet this burden. . . . The information about Hernandez reviewed at the time of hiring simply does not show the requisite 'strong connection' between an arrest in 1983 for official oppression and sexual abuse thirty years later—especially when viewed in light of existing caselaw. Both the Supreme Court and this court have declined to find liability under § 1983 where a local governmental entity hired an officer with one or more prior arrests (including those of a sexual nature), the hiring official failed to investigate the unspecified conduct underlying the arrest(s), and/or the hiring official failed to follow-up with prior employers from which the applicant had been terminated. . . Like the hiring officials in Brown and Rivera, EISD's hiring administrator hired someone with an arrest record without seeking information about the underlying conduct. And like the hiring official in Hardeman, EISD's hiring administrator hired someone without contacting the employer who previously fired him. Arguably, in all these cases, the hiring official inadequately assessed an application and made a poor hiring decision. But '[a] showing of simple or even heightened negligence will not suffice.'. . As the Supreme Court has cautioned, 'predicting the consequence of a single hiring decision, even one based on an inadequate assessment of a record, is far more difficult than predicting what might flow from the failure to train a single law enforcement officer as to a specific skill necessary to the discharge of his duties.'. . 'Where a claim of municipal liability rests on a single decision ... the danger that a municipality will be held liable without fault is high.'. . So the standard for showing that Doe's injury was the 'plainly obvious consequence' of the hiring decision is a high bar. . . And under controlling precedent, Doe cannot scale it. We thus agree with the district court that the hiring administrator's decision to hire Hernandez does not trigger municipal liability. . . .Doe has not shown that, when adopting its hiring policy, the Board had knowledge of anyone else having been injured by an EISD employee who had been arrested—but not convicted—of a crime. Nor has Doe shown a pattern of constitutional violations and a decision by the Board to continue following 'an approach that they know or should know has failed to prevent' such constitutional violations. . . Doe has fallen short of the 'rigorous standards of culpability and causation' that 'must be applied to ensure that [EISD] is not held liable solely for the actions of its employee.'. . The district court got this right too. . . .Jane Doe endured contemptible misconduct, and we do not minimize the cruelty of what she suffered. Both her assailants were criminally punished. But we are bound by on-point precedent, which imposes exacting liability requirements. On these facts, the district court correctly concluded that EISD cannot be held liable under Title IX or § 1983 for its employees' reprehensible acts. We AFFIRM."); Vielma v. Gruler, No. 18-15162, 2020 WL 1672778, at *8-9 (11th Cir. Apr. 6, 2020) (not reported) ("Here, Plaintiffs never suggest that a pattern of prior similar constitutional violations put the City on notice of its need to train officers. Instead, in faulting the City for failing to provide training that would have reduced the loss of life during Mateen's shooting spree, Plaintiffs proceed only under Canton's 'single incident' theory of liability. That is, Plaintiffs acknowledge that nothing like this had ever occurred before in Orlando. . . Although noting that ordinarily a pattern of similar constitution violations by untrained employees will be a prerequisite for a failure-to-train claim, the Supreme Court in Connick reasserted the possibility that 'single-incident' liability could attach to a municipality 'in a narrow range of circumstances' where there was an 'obvious need for specific legal training,' regardless of the absence of prior similar incidents. . . And in the earlier Canton decision, the Court had hypothesized that there may be situations where 'the need for more or different training is so obvious,' given a specific officer's duties, 'and the inadequacy [of the training is] so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the city can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.'. . .The district court concluded that Plaintiffs 'did not plausibly allege that the City of Orlando's failure to train officers on security in public places that are highly susceptible to danger, and how to enter and neutralize an active shooter, fits within the narrow range' of circumstances giving rise to Canton's hypothetical liability for a municipality based on a single incident. The court explained that Plaintiffs had failed to plausibly allege 'that nightclubs are at such great risk of attack that a municipality's failure to train its police officers on how to respond and even "neutralize an active shooter" amounts to deliberate indifference. The incredibly specific training envisioned by Plaintiffs on responding to and neutralizing a hypothetical active shooter without violating anyone's constitutional rights bears no resemblance to the use-of-deadly-force training envisioned in Canton.' The court further observed that neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has ever applied the single-incident liability exception. We agree with the district court that Plaintiffs do not allege the type of factual scenario hypothesized by Canton: a situation in which the risk of a constitutional violation is 'so obvious' that failing to provide specific legal training amounts to deliberate indifference to constitutional rights."); Waller v. City & County of Denver, 932 F.3d 1277, 1285, 1287-88 (10th Cir. 2019) ("Although the complaint alleges that Denver has hired some deputies with criminal records, it does not allege that Deputy Lovingier is one of these deputies, nor does it otherwise include any allegations that would plausibly suggest the individuals who hired him should have concluded that his 'use of excessive force would be a plainly obvious consequence of the hiring decision.'. . We therefore affirm the district court's holding that Mr. Waller did not set forth a plausible municipal liability claim based on Denver's hiring practices. . . . Although Mr. Waller has . . . alleged one similar prior incident, we have found no cases suggesting that a single prior incident can constitute a 'pattern' of conduct giving rise to an inference of deliberate indifference. To the contrary, we have expressly held that '[o]ne prior incident, even if it was a constitutional violation sufficiently similar to put officials on notice of a problem, does not describe a pattern of violations.'. . . [W]e note that the conduct at issue here, unlike in many excessive force cases, did not involve an officer making the wrong call regarding the level of force to employ against an individual who posed a threat to the officer or other individuals or was actively resisting arrest. . . Deputy Lovingier's use of force was improper not because of the amount of force he used, but because no force was warranted in the first place. Even an untrained law enforcement officer should have been well aware that any use of force in this situation—where a restrained detainee was simply addressing a judge at a hearing in a polite, calm voice—was inappropriate. This case does not involve technical knowledge or ambiguous 'gray areas' in the law that would make it 'highly predictable' that a deputy sheriff in Deputy Lovingier's position would need 'additional specified training' to know how to handle the situation correctly. . . . Mr. Waller accordingly has not shown either that there was a pattern of prior similar misconduct or that "'the need for more or different training [was otherwise] so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the city can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.'" We therefore affirm the district court's dismissal of Mr. Waller's failure-to-train theory of municipal liability."); Winkler v. Madison County, 893 F.3d 877, 904-05 (6th Cir. 2018) ("[D]espite Winkler's argument to the contrary, the facts of this case are easily distinguishable from those of Shadrick v. Hopkins County, 805 F.3d 724 (6th Cir. 2015). The evidence in Shadrick revealed that the jail's private healthcare provider did not have a training program for its LPN nurses beyond very limited on-the-job training concerning issues like where supplies were kept. . . According to Shadrick, there is an 'obvious need to train LPN nurses who lack knowledge about the constitutional dimensions of providing adequate medical care to inmates in the jail setting.'. . . Here, there is evidence showing that Healthcare provided training to all of its medical staff concerning the civil rights of inmates, including the right to adequate medical care. This training included an initial one-on-one training session and ongoing group sessions several times a year, as well as specific training on how to provide healthcare to a subgroup of individuals with addictions. Because Winkler has not provided any contrary evidence or otherwise explained how Healthcare's training program was inadequate, the record would not support a jury finding that Healthcare exhibited deliberate indifference toward inmates at the Detention Center by failing to adequately train its medical staff.")

Compare Hobart v. Estrada, 582 F. App'x 348, ___(5th Cir. 2014) ("In Valle v. City of Houston, we indicated that, typically, application of the single incident exception requires evidence of the proclivities of the particular officer involved in the excessive use of force. . . While our case law does not absolutely require evidence of character traits or proclivities of the officer responsible for the single constitutional violation, 'such evidence certainly is probative in determining that a "highly predictable" consequence of sending the particular officer [ ] into a particular situation would be a constitutional violation.'. . Notably, the district court here conducted the Valle analysis of Officer Estrada's proclivities in assessing whether the failure to train on CIT procedures was undertaken with deliberate indifference under the single incident exception. The court did not conduct a similar inquiry discussing Valle and evidence of Officer Estrada's history or proclivities for using excessive force in the context of the claim for failure to train on the use of force. 'This court has been wary of finding municipal liability on the basis of a single incident to avoid running afoul of the Supreme Court's consistent rejection of respondeat superior liability.'. . In fact, we are aware of only one instance in which we found a single incident sufficient to support municipal liability; that case included 'an abundance of evidence about the proclivities of the particular officer involved in the excessive use of force.'. . Here, the district court applied the exception based solely on evidence that the training was deficient, and that officers will naturally find themselves in situations requiring an assessment on the appropriate use of deadly force. Thus, the court in effect concluded, because Chief Krahn must know the risks of not training properly on the use of deadly force, he could be found deliberately indifferent for not providing better training. We conclude that is far too expansive an application of what is supposed to be an extremely narrow rule. It converts general knowledge of the dangers inherent if poor training is given on the use of force to specific deliberate indifference on the part of this police chief to the risks his office's training created. Deliberate indifference flows from knowledge of the effects of decisions or conditions and taking no steps to correct the shortcomings, which is why the single-incident exception rarely can succeed. Instead of showing a prior incident that would have created the knowledge, the Hobarts have done nothing more than show deficient training on the use of force. In the absence of a prior incident, the training deficiencies must have been so obvious that the shooting here would have appeared to Chief Krahn as a 'highly predictable consequence.'. . The Hobarts have not brought to our attention any case, and we are aware of none, supporting a finding of deliberate indifference based on no more than this. . . We find no evidence to support that Chief Krahn was aware that a shooting such as this was a highly predictable result of the training being provided. It was incumbent on the Hobarts to present such evidence. They did not do so in the form of a pattern of violations or the proclivities of Officer Estrada. The Hobarts also did not offer any other evidence to support that deficiencies in the training made Chief Krahn deliberately indifferent when he did not provide better training. Accordingly, the district court erred in concluding the failure to train on the appropriate use of force was undertaken by Chief Krahn with deliberate indifference. Chief Krahn is entitled to qualified immunity on the claim he failed to train on the appropriate use of force. We DISMISS the appeal of the district court's denial of summary judgment for Officer Estrada on the basis of qualified immunity. We REVERSE the district court's denial of summary judgment for Chief Krahn on the claim for failure to train on the appropriate use of force and GRANT Chief Krahn qualified immunity.") with Hobart v. Estrada, 582 F. App'x 348, 2014 WL 4564878, *10-*13 (5th Cir. Sept. 16, 2014) (Graves, J., dissenting, in part, as to Issue II) ("The separate majority essentially eliminates the applicability of the single incident exception to claims for failure to train on the use of deadly force and reverses the denial of summary judgment to Chief Krahn. I disagree. Because I would affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment and dismiss Krahn's appeal, I respectfully dissent only as to Issue II. This court has said that '[s]upervisory officials may be held liable only if: (i) they affirmatively participate in acts that cause constitutional deprivation; or (ii) implement unconstitutional policies that causally result in plaintiff's injury.'. . Krahn asserts that the City's police officer training program exceeds constitutional standards, that he was not deliberately indifferent, and that he was not objectively unreasonable. . .The Hobarts assert that they have presented evidence that Estrada's excessive force actions were entirely consistent with SPD policy and that Krahn was deliberately indifferent in failing to train Estrada on the use of deadly force. In a failure to train case, the Hobarts can prove deliberate indifference either by showing a pattern of tortious conduct providing notice of inadequate training or by using, as is applicable here, the single incident exception. . . Under the single incident exception, a single violation of rights may be sufficient to prove deliberate indifference. . . The majority misapprehends the holding in Valle v. City of Houston, 613 F.3d 536 (5th Cir.2010), as indicating that 'typically, application of the single incidence exception requires evidence of the proclivities of the particular officer involved in the excessive use of force.' Not only is there no such requirement under Valle, but such a requirement would defeat the very notion of a single violation. . . Contrary to the majority's holding here, Valle actually says that, although such evidence may be probative in determining a highly predictable consequence for municipal liability in a situation involving sending a particular officer into a particular situation, there is no requirement of any such evidence. . . Moreover, the United States Supreme Court has made it clear that, 'once a municipal policy is established, "it requires only one application ... to satisfy fully Monell's. . . requirement that a municipal corporation be held liable only for constitutional violations resulting from the municipality's official policy."'. . Thus, any requirement of evidence showing a history of violations pursuant to the policy contradicts controlling precedent. More importantly, while the majority is correct that the single incident exception is narrow, Valle does not in any way suggest that death is not a highly predictable consequence of failure to train on the use of deadly force. Further, in this case, the failure to train on the use of deadly force would clearly represent the moving force behind the constitutional violation stemming from unreasonable use of deadly force. Moreover, this is consistent with Supreme Court precedent, which clearly supports the conclusion that Krahn was deliberately indifferent. . . . Krahn was responsible for ensuring his officers received proper training. Krahn was also the policymaker responsible for promulgating the General Orders of the SPD. The record indicates that an internal investigation found that Estrada's conduct in using deadly force was within the guidelines of the SPD. . . . Both Estrada and Krahn assert that Estrada's use of deadly force was reasonable pursuant to the training, or lack thereof, by Krahn and that he was following the policy promulgated by Krahn. Estrada has failed to establish that his use of deadly force was reasonable, and, thus, he is not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. It clearly follows that Krahn would obviously be deliberately indifferent in not training Estrada in the appropriate use of deadly force. . .As Estrada has failed to establish that his use of deadly force was reasonable, the evidence that Estrada was in compliance with department policy promulgated by Krahn is sufficient to affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment on this issue. Moreover, because Krahn's failure to train on the use of deadly force establishes deliberate indifference, he is not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Compare Cash v. County of Erie, 654 F.3d 324, 334-39, 344 (2d Cir. 2011) ("A municipal policy may be pronounced or tacit and reflected in either action or inaction. In the latter respect, a 'city's policy of inaction in light of notice that its program will cause constitutional violations is the functional equivalent of a decision by the city itself to violate the Constitution.'[citing Connick and Canton] . . . . [D]eliberate indifference may be inferred where 'the need for more or better supervision to protect against constitutional violations was obvious,'. . . but the policymaker 'fail[ed] to make meaningful efforts to address the risk of harm to plaintiffs[.]'. . . In this case, defendants cannot claim that the evidence was insufficient to alert them to the risk of sexual exploitation posed by male deputies guarding female prisoners at ECHC [Erie County Holding Center]. That risk is acknowledged in New York state law, which pronounces prisoners categorically incapable of consenting to any sexual activity with guards, see N.Y. Penal Law § 130.05(3)(e)-(f), and subjects guards to criminal liability for such conduct, see, e.g., id. §§ 130.25(1), 130.60(1). In short, these laws recognize the moral certainty of guards confronting prisoners in sexually tempting circumstances with such a frequent risk of harm to prisoners as to require a complete prohibition on any sexual activity. . . Thus, the question presented by this case is not whether defendants should have realized the need for such a prohibition, but whether defendants could rely simply on guards' awareness of these criminal laws (and ECHC policies implementing them) to deter sexual exploitation of prisoners, or whether defendants had reason to know that more was required to discharge their affirmative protective duty, specifically, precluding or at least monitoring one-on-one contact between guards and prisoners. In concluding that trial evidence was legally insufficient to support the latter finding, the district court observed that a policy permitting unmonitored one-on-one interactions between a guard and a prisoner of different sexes was not itself unconstitutional, and that the lack of prior sexual assaults by male guards of female prisoners failed to alert Gallivan to the fact that such a policy posed a risk of rape to Cash. We take no exception to the district court's first observation, . . . but we cannot agree with its second. To explain, we begin by noting that the pattern ordinarily necessary to prove deliberate indifference in the context of a failure-to-train claim does not neatly transfer to this case. . . A duty to train arises so that subordinates entrusted with the discretionary exercise of municipal power can distinguish between lawful and unlawful choices. . . .The deliberate indifference concern in this case, however, is not with a failure to train prison guards to distinguish between permissible and impermissible sexual contact with prisoners. Nor is it with providing sufficient supervision to ensure that guards make correct choices in this respect. New York affords guards no discretion respecting sexual contact with prisoners; the state's proscription of such contact is absolute. Thus, the deliberate indifference concern here is with the adequacy of defendants' own actions to prevent sexual contact between guards and prisoners consistent with their affirmative duty to protect prisoners in their custody. Mindful of this affirmative duty to protect, a reasonable jury could have concluded that the 1999 Allen complaint would have alerted Gallivan to the fact that mere proscriptions on sexual contact between guards and prisoners had proved an insufficient deterrent to sexual exploitation. The Allen investigation report indicated, at best, that a female prisoner repeatedly had engaged in sexual exhibitionism before various guards, none of whom had reported the activity and some of whom may have paid for it with commissary items. At worst, the report indicated that male guards had engaged a female prisoner in a variety of more intimate sexual activities. . . . A jury could have concluded that this investigative determination should have alerted defendants that they could not rely simply on guards' awareness of a no-tolerance policy to deter sexual misconduct. Likewise, a jury could have determined that Gallivan's conceded awareness of 'highly publicized incidents' at other New York correctional facilities should further have alerted him to the inadequacy of a mere proscriptive policy to deter guards' sexual misconduct. . . . [E]ven if Gallivan had no knowledge of prior sexual assaults, it was hardly speculative for a jury to conclude that, at least by 1999, he knew or should have known that guards at ECHC and other local correctional facilities were engaging in proscribed sexual contact with prisoners, and that continued reliance on penal proscriptions alone was insufficient to protect prisoners from the range of harms associated with such misconduct, of which rape is obviously the most serious example. . . . As the Supreme Court recently reiterated, '[p]olicymakers' continued adherence to an approach that they know or should know has failed to prevent tortious conduct by employees may establish the conscious disregard for the consequences of their action − the "deliberate indifference" − necessary to trigger municipal liability.' Connick v. Thompson, 131 S.Ct. at 1360 (internal quotation marks omitted). That observation, made with reference to a claim of inadequate training, applies with no less force to a supervision claim, particularly where defendants operate under an affirmative duty of protection and their employees are absolutely prohibited by the criminal law from engaging in certain conduct. . . . In so construing the record, we do not suggest that a reasonable jury could not have viewed this trial evidence more favorably to defendants. Indeed, this case presents a close question as to how to weigh the evidence advanced to establish deliberate indifference. But it is not a question that we think must be resolved as a matter of law − rather than fact − for the defendants. When the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to Cash and all inferences are drawn in her favor, a reasonable jury was not compelled to find for defendants. . . Rather, the jury reasonably could have found that defendants knew, by virtue of New York state law, that female prisoners in their custody faced a risk of sexual abuse by male guards; that, by 1999, defendants also knew that a policy simply proscribing all sexual contact between male guards and female prisoners was insufficient to deter such conduct at ECHC; and that, in these circumstances, defendants' mere reiteration of the proscriptive policy unaccompanied by any proactive steps to minimize the opportunity for exploitation, as for example by prohibiting unmonitored one-on-one interactions between guards and prisoners, demonstrated deliberate indifference to defendants' affirmative duty to protect prisoners from sexual exploitation. Accordingly, the district court erred in granting defendants judgment as a matter of law. . . . Because defendants owed plaintiff an affirmative duty of care, and because any sexual contact between a guard and a prisoner is absolutely proscribed by New York state law, a reasonable jury could have found that once defendants learned that guards were violating an absolute proscription in any respect, defendants' actions to prevent future violations were so deficient as to manifest deliberate indifference to a risk of the full range of proscribed sexual conduct, including the sexual assault suffered by plaintiff.") with Cash v. County of Erie, 654 F.3d 324, 344, 346 (2d Cir. 2011) (Jacobs, C.J., dissenting) ("Taking its holdings together, the opinion can be read (and will be read) to impose strict liability on municipalities and policymakers for any incidents that arise in a prison. . . . If the evidence in this case amounts to sufficient warning of a criminal sexual assault, then a supervisor or government is always on notice of the risk of sexual abuses in prisons, and will always be liable when, sooner or later, something bad happens. The majority opinion is thus unbounded: It combines an ever-present risk with an inferred 'proactive responsibility,' Op. at 18, in a way that constitutes strict (and vicarious) liability. And nothing limits the opinion to conduct by guards, or to sexual conduct. Did a warden or sheriff, a guard or a County know that sometime in past years one inmate hit another? Or that a guard observed or tolerated sexual misconduct by an inmate and received insufficient discipline for failing to report it (or for a gift of candy)? Or that something like that happened someplace else in the state? If so, they could be held liable as well for every act of prisoner-on-prisoner violence or sexual misconduct (even rape). To hold a municipality and its policymaker liable in this way eviscerates the Supreme Court's limitations on municipal and policymaker liability. . . . In any event, the risk associated with having men and women interact in a closed environment is bred in the bone; it means nothing to say that the prison authorities should anticipate it. Abating that risk is another matter. If the majority opinion is sound, the only effective solution would be to have no guards of the opposite sex in women's or men's prisons. The majority opinion does not take account of the considerable ramifications. Because male inmates greatly outnumber female inmates, the resulting curtailment of opportunity for female guards would likely trigger valid Title VII suits. People with known same-sex preferences may not be able to serve as guards in any prison. And in another sphere, since military officers are responsible for their subordinates, we could not have mixing of the sexes in the military, unless (I suppose) the officers are paired off.").

See also Estate of Jones by Jones v. City of Martinsburg, West Virginia, 961 F.3d 661, 672 (4th Cir. 2020) ("At least as framed on appeal, Jones's death is an isolated incident of excessive force that cannot fall into the Canton exception, because Martinsburg did have an aggression policy, and the Estate has not shown how or why that policy is deficient—except by pointing to this single incident. MPD's aggression response policy was to 'meet your aggression with the suspect's aggression,' and required that incidents of physical force be necessary, objectively reasonable, and proportionate. . . The Estate does not argue that the policy is facially unreasonable. Instead, it argues that this tragic incident makes obvious that the policy was not sufficiently implemented in training. We take the Estate's point to be that five officers simultaneously violated this policy, and therefore the training must have been deficient. We agree that a reasonable jury could find that the officers' response violated the aggression policy. But Monell's deliberate indifference standard ensures that a municipality either knew or should have known about the deficiency, so it could remedy that deficiency. At its core, the strict Monell test asks for some level of notice. And five officers acting at once could not have put the City on earlier notice of the need to better train its officers as to the existing use-of-force policy. Here, the City apparently understood that it needed a use-of-force policy to avoid the risk of likely constitutional violations, and it had one. The City cannot be liable under Monell because the Estate cannot prove that any deficiency in training 'reflect[ed] a deliberate or conscious choice by a municipality ....'. . .Because we hold that the Estate has not shown deliberate indifference to the need for better or different training on the use of force, we do not reach whether any failure in training was the moving force behind the constitutional violation. As it is framed by the Estate, the Monell claim cannot succeed, and the district court properly granted summary judgment to the

City. We thus affirm the district court's dismissal as to the Monell claim only."); Wright v. City of Euclid, Ohio, 962 F.3d 852, 881 (6th Cir. 2020) ("When determining whether a municipality has adequately trained its employees, 'the focus must be on adequacy of the training program in relation to the tasks the particular officers must perform.'. . A failure-to-supervise claim requires a showing of 'prior instances of unconstitutional conduct demonstrating that the municipality had ignored a history of abuse and was clearly on notice that the training in this particular area was deficient and likely to cause injury.'. . It is undisputed that Euclid police officers received some form of training on the proper use of force, but a reasonable juror could find that this training is deficient. The Euclid Police Department's training policy and procedures mandate that '[t]he department will establish and maintain a training committee.' However, no such training committee apparently has ever existed. The City's training seems to consist initially of simply reading the use-of-force policy to the officers at rollcall until 'it is believed that all the officers have heard it,'. . . which is then followed up with a one-or-two-page quiz that may or may not be given to officers. The City also engages in some sort of practical training exercise in which officers are given scenarios in which they may use force. But according to Murowsky, who implemented these scenario-based trainings, the scenarios never changed, and the officers' performances were never evaluated. And recall that this training also included the graphic and comedy skit discussed above. . . A reasonable jury could find that the City's excessive-force training regimen and practices gave rise to a culture that encouraged, permitted, or acquiesced to the use of unconstitutional excessive force, and that, as a result, such force was used on Wright. Therefore, we REVERSE the district court's grant of summary judgment on Wright's Monell claim based on failure to train or supervise."); Murphy v. City of Tulsa, 950 F.3d 641, 652-55 (10th Cir. 2019) ("Failing to teach police officers about certain constitutional limits can demonstrate a municipality's '"deliberate indifference" to constitutional rights.'. . Given the potential for coercion in interrogations, failing to teach police officers how to lawfully interrogate civilians might trigger municipal liability. But this possibility is belied by the summary-judgment record. The City of Tulsa contends that it did teach officers the constitutional limits of interrogation, pointing to a 1987 legal bulletin that tells officers

• how to apply Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), and

• how to interrogate suspects. . . . We conclude that the training bulletin unambiguously extends beyond Miranda. The bulletin does extensively discuss Miranda, but it also addresses the right to due process. . . . Although the City's evidence of training lacks detail, it is specific enough to prevent municipal liability. In Barney v. Pulsipher, for example, we affirmed summary judgment to a municipality on a claim involving failure to train correctional officers about the sexual assault of inmates. . . The county presented evidence of a state-certified basic officer training program and a single correctional officer course. . . Because the plaintiff failed to present evidence 'pertaining to the adequacy of the instruction [the correctional officer] received in these courses,' we concluded as a matter of law that the training was constitutionally adequate. . . That conclusion is equally fitting here. The City presented evidence that it had taught officers how to interrogate suspects and updated those police officers on relevant legal decisions. And at least one part of that training—the 1987 bulletin—told police officers that they could not make threats during interrogations. Considering the entirety of the training, a fact-finder could not reasonably infer that future constitutional violations would be highly predictable or plainly obvious. Ms. Murphy also relies on her expert's report to argue that this training fell short of professional standards on interrogations. For this argument, Ms. Murphy points to Allen v. City of Muskogee, 119 F.3d 837 (10th Cir. 1997). There we held that municipal liability could reasonably be inferred from a police department's deviation from training provided elsewhere. . .The issue involved the training's substance because the municipality had trained its officers contrary to the national standard. . . In our case, the City trained its police officers to follow standard interrogation procedures. Even if the extent of the City of Tulsa's training might have been inadequate, 'showing merely that additional training would have been helpful in making difficult decisions does not establish municipal liability.'. .Because Ms. Murphy cannot show deliberate indifference, the City cannot incur liability for failing to train police officers."); Jason v. Tanner, 938 F.3d 191, 197-99 (5th Cir. 2019) ("[I]t wasn't the lack of training that caused the risk to Jason. Rather, it was the sufficiency of the overall protocol—having only two guards making rounds and relying on other guards peering out of windows. But that situation might have been a mere reality of the prison's budget. Regardless, even if the district court were right about the first two requirements, its deliberate-indifference analysis runs aground. The deliberate-indifference requirement stems from the Supreme Court's ruling in Monell some 40 years ago, rejecting pure respondeat superior liability under § 1983. . . It was only eight years ago that the Supreme Court, in Connick, fully elaborated on deliberate indifference. . . . Here, there was no repeated pattern of violations. True, there had been three yard fights with brooms and one with a mop. Now there's been one with a yard tool. But prison fights are lamentably common. And three yard fights with brooms and one with a mop just aren't enough to constitute a pattern. Besides, the Supreme Court in Connick required that only very similar violations could jointly form a pattern. . . In that case, Thompson underscored that 'during the ten years preceding his armed robbery trial, Louisiana courts had overturned four convictions because of Brady violations by prosecutors in Connick's office.'. .Yet those cases weren't similar enough for the Court. Similarly, four cleaning-tool incidents don't create a pattern of violation that should've put the prison on notice for a sling-blade incident. That's why in our unreported 2013 Walker case, we held that even a repeated pattern of violence isn't by itself enough to prove deliberate indifference. . . There, the warden put a prisoner in the same cell as a notoriously violent inmate. The violent inmate killed his new cellmate, and the dead cellmate's parents sued the prison for failure to train. Yet we held that the plaintiffs hadn't shown deliberate indifference because they couldn't prove it was the lack of training that caused the violation. . . .[T]here is an exception that will sometimes apply (though not here): single-incident liability as theorized in City of Canton. . . That exception allows liability where a municipality 'fail[ed] to train its employees concerning a clear constitutional duty implicated in recurrent situations that a particular employee is certain to face.'. . One recent Fifth Circuit case used this exception: Littell . . . There, '$50 went missing during a sixth-grade choir class.'. . No one fessed up. So the assistant principal 'took all twenty-two girls in the choir class to the female school nurse, who strip searched them, taking them one at a time into a bathroom, where she checked around the waistband of their panties, loosened their bras, and checked under their shirts.'. . The school district allegedly permitted 'school officials to conduct invasive searches' of students. But it did so with no training whatsoever. . .We found that the facts 'mirror[ed] Canton's hypothetical in all material respects.'. . But here, there was training. There was also a monitoring system in place. Again, it just failed to prevent the attack. Put differently: square peg, round hole. Littell was about a supervisor who didn't train his subordinates; not even at all. Had he adequately trained them, they would've known not to strip search young girls. Yet here, it's not so much about insufficient training. Instead, it's about insufficient protocol. This was the first and only sling-blade attack in a presumably otherwise incident-free program. The prison had instituted safety measures against sling-blade misuse—albeit one that didn't prevent this attack. But the Supreme Court's caselaw and our caselaw emphasize that only inadequate training can establish vicarious liability. Not simply an inadequate protocol. . . .In sum, we REVERSE the district court and grant all three appellants qualified immunity."); Jackson v. City of Cleveland, 925 F.3d 793, 828 n.20, 836-37 (6th Cir. 2019), rehearing en banc denied (June 27, 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 855 (2020) ("Plaintiffs also argue that they have a third Monell claim based on Cleveland's failure to adopt an adequate policy to prevent Brady violations. The district court ruled against Plaintiffs on this theory, finding that they had not established that Cleveland had failed to adopt adequate policies to train officers in Brady's requirements. . . We decline to analyze this theory separately. Plaintiffs cite no Sixth Circuit or Supreme Court case in support of their theory that they have a Monell claim—separate from their failure-to-train claim—based on Cleveland's unconstitutional failure to adopt a policy. Instead, the relevant cases they cite are failure-to-train cases. . . That makes sense: the harm alleged and the analysis required under the failure-to-train theory are functionally indistinguishable from the harm Plaintiffs allege and the analysis they wish us to conduct under the failure-to-adopt-a-policy theory. Indeed, the district court stated that to prevail on their failure-to-adopt theory, Plaintiffs needed to show Cleveland was deliberately indifferent to the high likelihood of violations in the absence of a policy. . . As we discuss below, Plaintiffs must make the same showing for their failure-to-train claim. . . . A plaintiff may meet this standard by showing either (1) 'prior instances of unconstitutional conduct demonstrating that the City had notice that the training was deficient and likely to cause injury but ignored it' or (2) 'evidence of a single violation of federal rights, accompanied by a showing that the City had failed to train its employees to handle recurring situations presenting an obvious potential for such a violation.' Plaintiffs do not contend that they can show Cleveland's failure to train was deliberately indifferent via the first method. . . Instead, Plaintiffs argue that they satisfy the second method of showing deliberate indifference because the 'likelihood that the situation [i.e., a situation requiring police to handle exculpatory evidence] will recur and the predictability that an officer lacking specific tools to handle that situation will violate citizens' rights' mean that failing to train officers in their disclosure obligations demonstrates deliberate indifference to the 'highly predictable consequence' that untrained officers will violate Brady. . . . Plaintiffs have provided testimony sufficient for a jury to find that Cleveland did not in fact train its officers in their disclosure obligations. Gregory therefore controls, and there is sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to find that Cleveland was deliberately indifferent to the risk of Brady violations."); Garza v. City of Donna, 922 F.3d 626, 638 (5th Cir. 2019) ("Appellants put forward no evidence of a pattern of violations stemming from deficient training, so their case depends on the single-incident method of demonstrating deliberate indifference. As we have emphasized, deliberate indifference may be inferred this way 'only in narrow and extreme circumstances,' and decisions by our court drawing the inference are rare. . . Appellants have not carried their burden here. The summary judgment record contains no evidence of the training that Perez did and did not receive, other than that De Leon had trained Perez. Moreover, the record has no evidence about the population that passes through the City's jail or about the jail's operations from which the possibility of recurring situations threatening to constitutional rights might be assessed. It is apparent that this record is inadequate to support a failure-to-train theory as to Perez. Of the jailers, Esteban Garza and Coronado, Appellants note their preoccupation on February 19 with installing signs in the jail, to the detriment of their job duties, and they attribute the jailers' distraction to the directive from De Leon to install the signs. It is true that a decision to adopt 'a course of action tailored to a particular situation' by a municipal government's authorized decisionmaker may constitute an official policy. . . But municipal liability arises only where the 'deliberate choice to follow a course of action is made from among various alternatives by the official or officials responsible for establishing final policy with respect to the subject matter in question.'. . Nothing in the record indicates that De Leon was aware of Garza's presence at the jail, much less that he instructed the jailers to disregard Garza in favor of installing the signs. It thus cannot be said that De Leon's directive was deliberate in the sense meant by Pembaur or that it was tailored to the particular situation of Garza's confinement. Consequently, it is apparent that the record cannot support municipal liability on this basis. In sum, whatever we may think of the various DPD employees' actions on February 19, 2016, Appellants have not set forth evidence by which those actions might reasonably be attributed to the City. Accordingly, the City is entitled to judgment as a matter of law, making the district court's grant of summary judgment to the City the correct outcome on this record."); Doe v. Fort Zumwalt R-II Sch. Dist., 920 F.3d 1184, 1190-91 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Doe argues that the district court applied the wrong legal standard by requiring actual notice and behavior that "shocks the conscience." This court need not address these arguments because, on de novo review, Doe has not presented sufficient evidence to establish deliberate indifference. Doe has not shown that the District had reason to believe that its training and supervision were inadequate. He presented no evidence of a pattern of misconduct that would alert the District that its training and supervision were insufficient to prevent Hansen's conduct. . . Instead, he contends that a 2004 Department of Education report—estimating that at least 4.5 million K-12 students experienced sexual misconduct by a school employee—provided notice. The report addresses sexual misconduct generally, not child pornography. It is insufficient to give the District notice of Hansen's particular misconduct or of the risk he would videotape students in the nude. Doe also argues the District had 'actual notice' because it relied on teenage camp counselors to report inappropriate behavior. In 2006, for instance, a camp counselor observed Hansen in a bunk with a fifth grader. Seeing the counselor, Hansen jumped out of the bunk. The counselor did not, however, report this incident until after Hansen's arrest. There is no evidence the District was aware counselors were not reporting inappropriate behavior. Nor is there evidence the District had any warning of Hansen's misconduct before his arrest in 2012. Without notice, the District's failure to provide more training or supervision is not deliberately indifferent. . . This is also not a case where the risk was 'so obvious' that the District's failure to provide more training or supervision constitutes deliberate indifference. . . Doe claims the District created an 'obvious risk' by assigning only one teacher to each cabin and allowing teachers to bring recording equipment into the cabin.

However, the District's policies prohibited Hansen's conduct. Teachers could not use recording equipment where students had an expectation of privacy. Teachers were to maintain professional relationships and could not engage in any kind of sexual relationship with students. The District relied on camp counselors to report any inappropriate behavior. In light of these policies, Doe cannot prove that the risk that a teacher would engage in this kind of conduct was so obvious that it required additional training or supervision. . . . Hansen's behavior was unlawful and criminal. However, the District's failure to provide more supervision and training did not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. The district court properly granted summary judgment."); Perkins v. Hastings, 915 F.3d 512, 523-25 (8th Cir. 2019) ("In sum, Perkins claims on appeal that the City maintained a custom of facade investigations based on alleged shortcomings in the City's investigations into officer-involved shootings. The actionable municipal custom here must be one of deliberate indifference to a pattern of excessive force, however, which Perkins has not established in light of the fact that she has not shown a pattern of underlying constitutional violations. For the same reason, we uphold the grant of summary judgment on Perkins's claim alleging that the City had failed to train or supervise its police officers. . . For the City to be liable under this theory, the 'municipality's failure to train its employees in a relevant respect must amount to "deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the [untrained employees] come into contact."'. . As set forth above, Perkins has not established a pattern of similar constitutional violations. . . . The Supreme Court has set forth an exacting test for imposing liability based on a hiring decision, requiring a court to 'carefully test the link between the policymaker's inadequate decision and the particular injury alleged.'. . Perkins points to evidence that Thomas was friends with Hastings's father, that Hastings attended a Ku Klux Klan meeting in high school, that there were irregularities in Hastings's polygraph examination, and that a lieutenant advised against hiring Hastings. We conclude that the referred-to evidence cannot establish the essential link between Thomas's decision to hire Hastings and his use of excessive force against Moore. Stated differently, the evidence presents no genuine issue of material fact that a 'plainly obvious consequence of the hiring decision' would be Hastings's unjustified use of deadly force. . .We also reject Perkins's argument that she has presented sufficient evidence to preclude summary judgment on her claim that Thomas failed to adequately train or supervise Hastings. A supervisor may be held liable 'if a failure to properly supervise and train the offending employee caused a deprivation of constitutional rights.'. . . Perkins has not presented sufficient evidence to show that Thomas had notice of a pattern of excessive force by Little Rock officers, nor has she shown that he acted with deliberate indifference. Hastings's disciplinary record indicates that he was a lazy and careless police officer, seemingly unable to complete the paperwork requirements or meet the scheduling demands of police work. He also engaged in unbecoming conduct and used inappropriate language. While those violations of the police department's general orders or rules and regulations speak volumes about Hastings's general unfitness for police work, they do not establish a pattern of constitutional violations, nor do they show that Thomas's failure to train or supervise Hastings resulted in Moore's death. . . With respect to Hastings's use of force over the course of his career, Thomas ordered additional supervision and additional training after Hastings triggered three EIS alerts and one citizen complaint in 2009 and 2010. Following those remedial actions, Hastings had no further EIS alerts or citizen complaints relating to the use of force.

Although Perkins argues that Thomas should have disciplined Hastings for 'body-slam[ming] a mentally-ill, homeless black woman' in July 2010, . . . Hastings reported that the woman had struck him and that he was trying to prevent her from striking him again. Other than his use of the word 'body slam' to describe the takedown, the record does not support an inference that Hastings's use of force was unconstitutional or that Thomas had notice that the report was false. Finally, relying on statistics, Perkins claims that Hastings used force more frequently against racial minorities, but in the absence of evidence that the force used against racial minorities was excessive or otherwise unjustified, those statistics do not support a supervisory claim against Thomas. Perkins has thus not submitted evidence sufficient to show that Thomas had notice that his training and supervision were inadequate and likely to result in the use of excessive force against Moore."); Lapre v. City of Chicago, 911 F.3d 424, 432-38 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Taken as a whole, the measures in place and the changes being made by the City do not demonstrate deliberate indifference under Frake for the City's continued use of cells with horizontal bars. . . . We need not decide whether Lapre has presented sufficient evidence to demonstrate that this care was inadequate or inappropriate because she has presented no evidence that the absence of a suicide kit or a lack of training for lockup personnel proximately caused Ofem's death. . . .[E]ven if we assume that the City had a policy of assessing detainees only on initial entry to the lockup, Lapre's evidence falls short of demonstrating that the City's facially lawful policy was deliberately indifferent to a known or obvious consequence of the policy. . . Lapre has presented no evidence that the policy itself led to additional suicides or that suicides would have been prevented by a different policy. Nor has she shown that the City was aware that this policy was leading to an increase in detainee suicides, for example, and yet persisted in continuing the practice. . . . Lapre has offered no evidence of any particular widespread practice regarding the visual inspections, and so we do not know whether detainees in general were left isolated for extended periods of time, whether they were inspected in person every fifteen minutes or whether there was a combination of in-person and video checks. Moreover, Lapre presents no evidence that the City, as a matter of wide-spread custom or practice, failed to follow the Illinois Lockup Standard of conducting an in-person inspection every half hour. . . . Lapre also failed to offer evidence that in-person inspections of any particular frequency would affect the suicide risk for detainees or that the City was aware that more frequent in-person visits would make a difference. . . . Without evidence of either a wide-spread practice, knowledge of a risk created by a practice, or causation, the claim was properly rejected. . . .Although Lapre asserts both that the City failed entirely to train its officers and that the training provided was inadequate, Lapre has presented no evidence regarding City-wide policies or practices regarding training. She does not point, for example, to evidence that the City has no training program or that the program the City employs has faults. Even if we disregard the City's evidence, Lapre has produced no evidence regarding the City's training practices from which we may infer deliberate indifference. That there may have been lapses in training in the 4th District is not sufficient to allow an inference of deliberate indifference by the City as a matter of policy or wide-spread practice. Finally, Lapre also fails to show causation on her training claim. She has provided no evidence that the City's training program led to Ofem's death, or that the City's program ignored a recurring problem. She has provided nothing more than speculation regarding whether better trained officers would have responded differently, or that a different outcome was possible based on better training. In the absence of this key evidence, summary judgment in favor of the City was appropriate. . . . The suicide of a teenager in a City lockup is an unmitigated tragedy. The question is whether that death occurred as a result of deliberate indifference by the City through its policies, practices or customs. Lapre focused her discovery on the narrow circumstances of Ofem's death rather than on the City's official policies or unofficial but wide-spread practices or customs. As a result, she was unable to provide evidence that the City failed to adequately address the known consequences of its official or unofficial practices in the lockups. Nor did she provide evidence that any policy or policy gap was the moving force in Ofem's death. The judgment in favor of the City is therefore AFFIRMED."); Greene v. City of New York, No. 17-1920, 2018 WL 3486787, at *3 (2d Cir. July 19, 2018) (not reported) ("Greene's only evidence that prosecutors in the KCDAO committed other violations of their disclosure obligations is a list of 36 court decisions, issued over a 22-year span, finding such violations. However, all but two of those decisions were issued after Greene's trial. A plaintiff cannot point to 'contemporaneous or subsequent' violations to 'establish a pattern of violations that ... provide[d] notice to the cit[y] [that it needed] ... to conform [its training or supervising program] to constitutional dictates.'. . The two prior violations Greene cites, which occurred in 1975 and 1979, are not enough to sustain his burden. [citing Jones v. Town of East Haven] Even if two violations could constitute a pattern, the violations Greene cites are inapposite because they do not concern the nondisclosure of the same sort of evidence at issue in this case, viz., an alleged deal between the KCDAO and a potential witness intended to induce his testimony; an audiotape of an interview with a witness; and notebooks containing detectives' notes from interviews with witnesses. . . Accordingly, Greene's showing is insufficient as a matter of law."); Littell v. Houston Indep. Sch. Dist., 894 F.3d 616, 623-29 (5th Cir. 2018) ("That the alleged facts demonstrate a constitutional violation is presently undisputed. A brief discussion of why the alleged search was unconstitutional, however, will nonetheless prove helpful. To search a student's person, school officials must generally have reasonable suspicion that the search will reveal evidence of a violation of school rules or the law. . . . [C]learly established law means that Higgins violated the constitutional rights of the twenty-two girls unless Higgins reasonably suspected that the missing $50 cash (1) would be found on that particular girl's person and either (2) would be found specifically in that girl's underwear or (3) would pose a dangerous threat to students. For what are perhaps obvious reasons, the parties do not dispute that the alleged search failed all three conditions. It was clearly unconstitutional. . . .To be clear, the argument is not that the school district's written search policies are facially unconstitutional or that they caused the alleged constitutional violation by themselves. Rather, the 'official municipal policy' on which Plaintiffs attempt to hang Monell liability is the school district's alleged policy of providing no training whatsoever regarding its employees' legal duties not to conduct unreasonable searches. In other words, as currently presented, this is a 'failure to train' case. . . . Under Canton, when a municipal entity enacts a facially valid policy but fails to train its employees to implement it in a constitutional manner, that failure constitutes 'official policy' that can support municipal liability if it 'amounts to deliberate indifference.'. . . [E]ven absent proof of pattern, deliberate indifference can still be inferred if the factfinder determines that the risk of constitutional violations was or should have been an 'obvious' or 'highly predictable consequence' of the alleged training inadequacy. . . .Here, the alleged facts, taken together and assumed to be true, permit the reasonable inference—i.e., the claim has facial plausibility—that the risk of public officials' conducting unconstitutional searches was or should have been a 'highly predictable consequence' of the school district's decision to provide its staff no training regarding the Constitution's constraints on searches. Indeed, Plaintiffs' allegations mirror Canton's hypothetical in all material respects. . . . Although the Canton hypothetical concerned the Fourth Amendment's constraints on seizures, whereas this case concerns its constraints on searches, 'the precise nature' of both types of obligations is sufficiently clear in the law. . . Indeed, if anything, it is the duties with respect to searches that are defined with greater specificity. Student searches are governed by defined principles such as the need for individualized suspicion, the nexus requirement, and the limit on unduly intrusive means. . . . Because excessive-force law is sufficiently clear to ground failure-to-train liability—as Canton's hypothetical makes plain—we hold the same with respect to the law of unreasonable student searches. Also as in Canton, the constitutional duty not to conduct unreasonable searches is plausibly alleged to arise 'in recurrent situations that a particular employee is certain to face.'. . .Like the city in Canton, moreover, the school district cannot rely on its employees to come pre-equipped with legal knowledge. . . .In these circumstances, the Supreme Court has said, 'there is an obvious need for some form of training.'. . But, critically, the school district here allegedly provides 'no training whatsoever' as to how to conduct a lawful search. . . .[W]e must credit Plaintiffs' factual allegations and proceed on the assumption that the school district has made the conscious choice to take no affirmative steps to instruct any of its employees on the constitutional rules governing student searches—even though at least some of those employees are regularly called upon to conduct such searches. In short, this case presents an alleged 'complete failure to train' of the kind we have found actionable. Plaintiffs' allegations of deliberate indifference survive a motion to dismiss. We emphasize, however, that our conclusion in no way ordains Plaintiffs' ultimate success. Without a pattern of constitutional violations, deliberate indifference can be inferred only in narrow and extreme circumstances like those of Canton's hypothetical. And in the thirty years since Canton issued, actual cases reaching those extremes have proved fortunately rare. . . Perhaps at summary judgment or at trial, the evidence in this case, too, will reveal the allegations of deliberate indifference to have been unfounded. . . . But if Plaintiffs' allegations prove true—that is, if the school district knew or should have known that officials like Higgins would certainly be placed in situations implicating Fourth Amendment search law; if the school district knew or should have known that those officials would lack the legal knowledge necessary to handle those situations; and if the school district nonetheless failed to provide those officials any legal training on the subject—then the factfinder will be entitled (but not required) to infer that the school district acted with deliberate indifference to its students' Fourth Amendment rights. In such a case, '[t]he likelihood that the situation will recur and the predictability that an officer lacking specific tools to handle that situation will violate citizens' rights c[an] justify a finding that policymakers' decision not to train the officer reflected "deliberate indifference" to the obvious consequence of the policymakers' choice—namely, a violation of a specific constitutional or statutory right.'. . .The Supreme Court in Canton 'reject[ed] [the] contention that only unconstitutional policies are actionable under [§ 1983].'. . Instead, Canton permits municipal liability when 'a concededly valid policy is unconstitutionally applied.'. . In such a case, the 'policy' that grounds municipal liability is the failure to train municipal employees regarding their constitutional duties, if that failure amounted to deliberate indifference and caused the plaintiff's injury. . . Plaintiffs need not also demonstrate the invalidity of the written policies themselves."); Winkler v. Madison County, 893 F.3d 877, 901-02 (6th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he record does not support Winkler's theory of liability based on the County's alleged policy. To the extent that she is arguing that the County's policy of contracting with a private medical provider for healthcare services at the Detention Center was facially unconstitutional, she provides no authority to support this contention. And this court has made clear that it is not 'unconstitutional for municipalities and their employees "to rely on medical judgments made by [private] medical professionals responsible for prisoner care[,]"'. . . a holding that necessarily leads us to conclude that a municipality may constitutionally contract with a private medical company to provide healthcare services to inmates. Winkler has therefore failed to identify any County policy that is facially unconstitutional. 'Where the identified policy is itself facially lawful, the plaintiff "must demonstrate that the municipal action was taken with 'deliberate indifference' as to its known or obvious consequences. A showing of simple or even heightened negligence will not suffice."'. . Winkler offers no evidence that Healthcare's staffing or other policies presented an obvious risk to inmates' constitutional rights to adequate medical care. . . Nor does she offer any evidence that the County knew of and disregarded such a risk. And although Winkler contends that Healthcare failed to provide medical policies and procedures, she concedes that the County had its own healthcare policies and that Healthcare established various protocols for the provision of care to inmates like Hacker. Even if we construe Winkler's argument to be that the County had a custom of "inaction" in the face of prolonged unconstitutional conduct by Healthcare, her argument would still fail. Winkler, to support such an argument, would have to allege (1) 'a clear and persistent' pattern of unconstitutional conduct by [Healthcare] employees; (2) the municipality's 'notice or constructive notice' of the unconstitutional conduct; (3) the municipality's 'tacit approval of the unconstitutional conduct, such that [its] deliberate indifference in [its] failure to act can be said to amount to an official policy of inaction'; and (4) that the policy of inaction was the 'moving force' of the constitutional deprivation. . . . This she has failed to do. There is no record of Healthcare providing constitutionally inadequate medical care to inmates in the past, let alone that the County was constructively aware of and thus tacitly approved such hypothetical unconstitutional conduct."); Nunez v. City of New York, 735 F. App'x 756, ___ (2d Cir. 2018) ("[A]s the district court observed, the cited 48 instances of prosecutorial misconduct over 23 years involve sufficiently different conduct from that alleged here—non-disclosure of impeachment materials and the alleged maintenance of a prosecution in the absence of reliable evidence—that they cannot plausibly plead misconduct 'sufficiently persistent or widespread' as to indicate a pattern 'acquir[ing] the force of law.'. . .Thus, Nunez's municipal claims were properly dismissed as against both the City and its alleged policy maker, DA Johnson."); Pena v. City of Rio Grande City, 879 F.3d 613, 623-24 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Peña's proposed complaint identifies multiple alleged inadequacies in the department's taser-training program. She claims the city used uncertified taser trainers, that neither Solis nor Salinas was certified in taser use, and that officers were not trained regarding 'secondary injuries for taser use,' the 'appropriate methods for handling minors,' or 'the legal use of force ... and non-lethal weapons.' Of these many allegations, only the last bears a direct causal relationship to the specific constitutional violation at issue—the deployment of nonlethal weapons against minor non-suspects. . .Unfortunately for Peña, that allegation fails on the third, deliberate-indifference prong. Because the 'standard for [municipal] fault' is a 'stringent' one, '[a] pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees is ordinarily' required to show deliberate indifference. . . As noted above, Peña fails sufficiently to plead such a pattern. Peña suggests, in the alternative, that the single incident in which she was tased plausibly suggests deliberate indifference by the city. Though it is true that 'a plaintiff may establish deliberate indifference' through 'a single incident,'. . . Peña's allegations lie well beyond the reach of this narrow exception. . . .Our caselaw suggests, however, that the exception is generally reserved for those cases in which the government actor was provided no training whatsoever. In Brown v. Bryan County, 219 F.3d 450, 453−54, 462 (5th Cir. 2000), we held the single-incident exception satisfied where a reserve deputy, with 'no training' from the police department applied excessive force during a car chase. Our later decisions have distinguished Brown, emphasizing that 'there is a difference between a complete failure to train[ ] ... and a failure to train in one limited area.'. . Peña's proposed complaint acknowledges that Solis and Salinas received taser training from other officers, so her allegations cannot satisfy the exacting test for the narrow single-incident exception."); D'Alessandro v. City of New York, 713 F. App'x 1, 8, 10-11 (2d Cir. 2017) ("[I]f a district attorney or an assistant district attorney acts as a prosecutor, she is an agent of the State, and therefore immune from suit in her official capacity. . . But if a suit centers 'on the administration of the district attorney's office'—that is, on the 'office policy' that the district attorney sets—then the district attorney is 'considered a municipal policymaker,' and the Eleventh Amendment does not immunize him from suit. . . . D'Alessandro acknowledges that Monell generally requires a plaintiff to establish a pattern or practice of similar constitutional violations. He insists, however, that his complaint sufficiently alleges such a pattern or practice—or, alternatively, that liability may attach here based on the 'single incident' of his own case. As to both points, we disagree. The Supreme Court has emphasized that '[a] municipality's culpability for a deprivation of rights [under § 1983] is at its most tenuous where a claim turns on a failure to train.'. . To establish a 'failure to train' claim, a plaintiff must generally demonstrate that there has been a 'pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees.'. . Only such a pattern may 'ordinarily' be said to put the municipality on notice of its employees' constitutional violations. . . D'Alessandro's complaint does not sufficiently allege a pattern of similar constitutional violations by the District Attorney's Office. The complaint never mentions specific instances of prosecutorial misconduct beyond D'Alessandro's own case. Rather, the complaint merely insists—over and over again, in a conclusory fashion—that a pattern or custom of misconduct existed. . . . To be sure, D'Alessandro correctly notes that 'in a narrow range of circumstances,' a plaintiff can establish a 'failure to train' claim based on a single incident. . . D'Alessandro's specific argument, however, is squarely foreclosed by Connick. The Connick Court explained that because prosecutors are subject to a rigorous 'regime of legal training and professional responsibility,' a municipality cannot be said to be on notice of a recurrent problem in a district attorney's office simply because a prosecutor erred in one case. . . As a result, D'Alessandro cannot sustain a 'failure to train' claim based on the 'single incident' of Morris's actions."); Mann v. Palmerton Area Sch. Dist., 872 F.3d 165, 175 (3d Cir. 2017) ("In this case there is no evidence of a pattern of recurring head injuries in the Palmerton Area football program. Nor is there evidence that Walkowiak or any other member of the coaching staff deliberately exposed injured players to the continuing risk of harm that playing football poses. In the context of the Monell claim, it is also significant that the Pennsylvania General Assembly did not pass legislation that mandated training for coaches to prevent concussions until November 9, 2011, and the legislation did not even go into effect until July of 2012. . . Under these circumstances there is no basis for concluding that a policy or custom of Palmerton Area or its failure to provide more intense concussion training to its coaches caused a violation of Sheldon's constitutional rights."); Estate of Perry v. Wenzel, 872 F.3d 439, 461 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Perry asserts that Chief Flynn and the City of Milwaukee are liable under Monell for two reasons. First, because the Police Department and its policymakers failed to institute an internal review of in-custody deaths and to discipline officers for their involvement in those incidents. Second, because the Police Department had an unwritten policy of ignoring its detainees' medical complaints, particularly complaints regarding trouble breathing. Perry contends that there was a de facto policy of failing to care for the medical needs of prisoners in the City's custody. But to support this assertion, Perry simply refers to the allegations in his Amended Complaint that there were 12 in-custody deaths prior to the night he was taken into custody and that no investigation followed those deaths. . . This is not sufficient to meet his burden at summary judgment, as a plaintiff must do more than simply point to the allegations in his complaint. . . Further, it is also well-established that Perry must do more than simply rely upon his own experience to invoke Monell liability. . . Therefore, Perry's Monell claim based upon the City's failure to adequately investigate in-custody deaths and to discipline its officers for their involvement in these incidents fails, and summary judgment was appropriate."); Rivera v. Bonner, 952 F.3d 560, 566-67 (5th Cir. 2017) ("It does not require an enormous leap to connect an applicant's prior arrests for sex crimes with at least some risk—though perhaps not a plainly obvious one—that the applicant might sexually assault detainees at a jail. . . . As illustrated by the instant case, officers in detention facilities are often able to exercise almost complete control over detainees, which creates real risks that officers will sexually assault the people in their care. These risks have received substantial and deserved attention and should, by now, be well-known to corrections officials. Accordingly, when hiring officers for detention facilities, officials must be careful to thoroughly examine applicants' backgrounds and diligently inquire about the conduct underlying any prior offenses. . . . Nevertheless, under the specific circumstances of this case, the connection between Fierros's prior arrests and the injury to Rivera is not strong enough to show that Appellees were deliberately indifferent in hiring him. Much like the officer in Brown, Fierros's prior arrests for indecency with a child by sexual contact 'may well have made him an extremely poor candidate' for a position as jailer. . . But Fierros's juvenile record provided no detail regarding the alleged offenses, and there was no evidence that Fierros was ever charged or convicted. . . . Fierros was fifteen years old at that point, and it is entirely possible that he was arrested simply for engaging in uncoerced sexual activity with another minor who was under the age of consent—acts that would not necessarily evince an obvious risk that Fierros would engage in future sexual violence. . . .Because the information available to Appellees was vague and inconclusive, a jury could not find that a plainly obvious consequence of hiring Fierros was that he would sexually assault a detainee. We hold that

Rivera has failed to allege facts sufficient to show that Appellees were deliberately indifferent to known or obvious risks associated with hiring Fierros."); Hicks-Fields v. Harris County, 860 F.3d 803, 811-12 (5th Cir. 2017) ("While it may in theory be possible to establish the inadequacy of a training program with a single incident, . . . 'adequately trained officers occasionally make mistakes; the fact that they do says little about the training program or the legal basis for holding the city liable.'. . Plaintiffs allege several training shortcomings, two of which come closer to stating a viable claim: (1) that officers were not properly trained in the use-of-force and (2) that officers were not properly trained in the rendition of medical aid. Again, Plaintiffs primarily rely on the DOJ report as evidence of training deficiencies. But the allegations of the DOJ report are here weak evidence, at best, of a failure to train. Regarding excessive force, the Department's criticisms largely center on improper training regarding restraining prisoners and cell extraction techniques, neither of which are directly at issue here. As for medical aid training, Plaintiffs cite to page twenty-three of the report, which states that '[t]he Jail should increase staff training to ensure that staff is prepared to implement emergency procedures and operate emergency equipment [in] the event of an emergency.' The quoted language is from a section labeled 'Sanitation and Life Safety' and appears to address training in the use of fire safety equipment. Plaintiffs have failed to produce competent summary judgment evidence of Harris County's failure to train regarding responses to assaults by inmates and medical aid following a response incident."); Brossart v. Janke, 859 F.3d 616, 627-28 (8th Cir. 2017) ("A municipal policy or practice is unconstitutional 'on its face' where the policy or practice 'itself violates federal law, or directs an employee to do so.'. . Neither the Nelson County Taser Policy or Use of Force Continuum directs an employee to violate the Fourth Amendment. We concluded that a similar taser policy was facially constitutional in Hollingsworth v. City of St. Ann, 800 F.3d 985, 992 (8th Cir. 2015). Plaintiffs, who first briefed this argument in their Reply Brief, argue that the Taser Policy is facially unconstitutional because it permits the use of a taser on non-violent individuals, and 'failure to discourage the use of tasers against non-violent subjects can lead to constitutional violations.' The argument is both untimely and without merit. '[A] written policy that is facially constitutional, but fails to give detailed guidance that might have averted a constitutional violation by an employee, does not itself give rise to municipal liability.'. . A municipality may also be liable where its policies are lawful on their face but municipal action, such as failure to train or supervise, 'was taken with deliberate indifference as to its known or obvious consequences' and 'led an employee to violate a plaintiff's rights.'. . As we have explained, plaintiffs' failure to train claim against Nelson County is foreclosed by our conclusion that Braathen's tasing of Rodney and Thomas did not constitute excessive force. Moreover, the absence of prior complaints to Nelson County of improper taser use means there was no pattern of constitutional violations demonstrating that 'the need for more or different training [was] so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the city can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.'"); Payne v. Sevier County, 681 F. App'x 443, 447 (6th Cir. 2017) ("According to Payne, the policy that harmed him is the County's alleged practice of letting LPNs diagnose and treat inmates without any supervision from a doctor. That is a problem, Payne contends, because LPNs are not trained to diagnose and treat ailments on their own. As a threshold matter, the purported policy is not facially unconstitutional. Just like a statute, a county policy is facially unconstitutional only if "'he [policy] is unconstitutional in all of its applications.'. . And unsupervised LPNs can—and presumably often do—provide constitutionally adequate medical care. Thus, to establish that the County's use of LPNs constitutes a policy, Payne needed to prove that the practice amounts to deliberate indifference. Payne has not made that showing. He presented no evidence that the LPNs provided subpar treatment to anyone but him. He therefore failed to demonstrate a pattern of 'prior unconstitutional actions' caused by the purported policy. . .Nor did he show that the County's use of LPNs would obviously result in Eighth Amendment violations. Again, to violate the Eighth Amendment, a medical professional must act with deliberate indifference, meaning that she must recognize and consciously disregard a substantial risk to an inmate's health. . .Payne has failed to present evidence that the County's putative policy would cause LPNs to act with that kind of indifference. He has therefore failed to prove the existence of a County policy that harmed him."); Mendoza v. United States Immigration & Customs Enforcement, 849 F.3d 408, 420 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Even if there were no policies or training on how to handle ICE detainers, there must first be an obvious need for the training before a failure to have it will be considered a constitutional violation. . . .Mendoza's real complaint is that the training and policies in place did not include certain steps relevant to Mendoza's particular situation that might have prevented this mistake. However, '[i]n virtually every instance where a person has [allegedly] had his or her constitutional rights violated by a city employee, a § 1983 plaintiff will be able to point to something the city "could have done" to prevent the unfortunate incident.'. . Here, there was general training on ICE detainers but not specific training for this particular situation. Lack of particularized training that might have prevented Mendoza's three-day detention does not establish a constitutional violation. . . Each of the employees allegedly made independent mistakes in their various jobs. Their actions cannot reasonably be attributed to a defective governmental policy or custom. Additionally, the claims against Davis and the County automatically fail for lack of an underlying constitutional violation. . . Thus, the district court was correct in granting summary judgment in favor of Davis and the County on Mendoza's claims of supervisory and municipal liability under § 1983."); Estate of Alvarado v. Shavatt, 673 F. App'x 777, 778 (9th Cir. 2017) ("In Board of the County Commissioners of Bryan County v. Brown, 520 U.S. 397 (1997), the Supreme Court established the standard of liability for hiring decisions: 'Only where adequate scrutiny of an applicant's background would lead a reasonable policymaker to conclude that the plainly obvious consequence of the decision to hire the applicant would be the deprivation of a third party's federally protected right can the official's failure to adequately scrutinize the applicant's background constitute "deliberate indifference."'. . The Supreme Court explained that for liability to exist, there must be 'a finding that this officer was highly likely to inflict the particular injury suffered by the plaintiff.'. . 'The connection between the background of the particular applicant and the specific constitutional violation alleged must be strong.'. .Applying that standard to the allegations in this case, we conclude that Plaintiffs have failed to state a claim for deliberate indifference in hiring. . . Although Tackett's previous law enforcement record included several incidents in which Tackett had committed unlawful searches and seizures, it did not include any incident or other conduct that made it 'plainly obvious' that it was 'highly likely' that, if hired, he would 'inflict the particular injury' that Tachiquin suffered—seizure accomplished through firing a gun, causing her death."); Denham v. Corizon Health, Inc., 675 F.

App'x 935, 942-44 (11th Cir. 2017) ("Denham argues that Volusia County and Corizon failed to provide the correctional officers at the jail with medical training, despite using the officers to perform 'critical medical duties,' and that this need to train was obvious. This argument fails. Denham failed to produce sufficient evidence to prove that it was obvious that the correctional officers at the Volusia County jail needed 'more or different' training. This standard is difficult to meet. The Supreme Court has never determined that the need for 'more or different' training was obvious. It has 'given only a hypothetical example of a need to train being "so obvious" without prior constitutional violations: the use of deadly force where firearms are provided to police officers.'. . The facts in this appeal are not analogous to this hypothetical. Denham contends that it was obvious that the officers at the jail needed medical training because Volusia County and Corizon used the officers 'to perform critical medical duties.' But the record does not establish that the officers performed 'critical medical duties,' let alone medical duties. In fact, the officers were not permitted to perform the functions of medical staff, except in emergency situations, for which the officers were provided emergency medical training. To whatever extent the officers needed training to deal with 'split-second decisions with life-or-death consequences[,]' like armed police contemplating the use of deadly force, Connick v. Thompson, 563 U.S. 51, 64 (2011), that training was provided by virtue of the emergency medical training. Because Denham failed to identify a pattern of similar constitutional violations, she also has not established that the Volusia County officers so often violate constitutional rights that the need for further non-emergency medical-services training must have been plainly obvious to the Volusia County policymakers. . . She cites two incidents—the incident involving Veira and one previous incident where an officer found a dead body. But even assuming that this prior incident constitutes a 'similar constitutional violation,' we have declined to hold a supervisor liable for failure to train where the plaintiff provided evidence of a prior, similar incident with facts similar to the plaintiff's. Keith v. DeKalb Cty., 749 F.3d 1034, 1053 (11th Cir. 2014). We determined that the one prior 'incident did not provide the requisite notice to [the supervisor] that the training provided to detention officers was constitutionally deficient.'. . Likewise, ten complaints filed against one officer did not establish that city officials were aware of past police misconduct because there was no evidence that the past complaints had merit. . . In contrast, we held a city liable where '[t]he evidence revealed several incidents involving the use of unreasonable and excessive force by police officers' that established that the 'city had knowledge of improper police conduct, but failed to take proper remedial action.'. . Denham has produced only two incidents. These incidents do not establish sufficient evidence for a jury to find a pattern of constitutional violations supporting Denham's theory of liability for failure to train on non-emergency medical services. . . .Assuming that 'providing inadequate medical care' could be a custom and assuming that the medical care provided to Denham was inadequate, Denham failed to present evidence of other incidents that prove that Corizon had a custom of providing inadequate medical care. . . .Finally, Denham also seeks to hold Volusia County liable for Veira's death based on an alleged policy or custom of understaffing at the jail. She relies on the declarations of two former Volusia County correctional officers and a licensed practical nurse at the jail to support her assertion. These declarations, however, are insufficient to establish Volusia County's liability in this case. To survive summary judgment, Denham must produce sufficient evidence that a policymaker's specific budget decision was highly likely, and not simply more likely, to inflict a particular injury. . . As we stated in McDowell, to test such a link, we look to whether a complete review of the budget decision and the resulting understaffed jail reveal that the policymaker should have known that Veira's death was a 'plainly obvious consequence' of that decision. . . While the declarations mentioned above may support Denham's contention that the jail was understaffed, Denham has failed to present sufficient evidence that a policymaker's specific budget decision was highly likely to cause, or the 'moving force' behind, Veira's death. . . Although Veira's death was a tragic occurrence, the fact that the County's 'budget practices resulted in understaffing does not amount to a purposeful disregard which would violate any citizen's constitutional rights.'"); Denham v. Corizon Health, Inc., 675 F. App'x 935, 945 (11th Cir. 2017) (Rosenbaum, J., concurring) ("I concur in the panel's decision that the district court's grant of summary judgment to both Corizon Health and Volusia County must be affirmed on the record in this case. I write separately, however, to note that, as to the County, in the eight prior instances where corrections officers either failed to properly maintain watch over inmates or failed to properly document the inmates' activities, the corrections officers were disciplined by only their immediate supervisors and not by a policymaker for the County. Nor does the record in this case contain any evidence that any County policymaker was ever aware that corrections officers regularly and often with the encouragement of their immediate supervisors, falsified inmate watch records. Had such evidence of a County policymaker's knowledge of this practice existed, the result here would have been different because sufficient evidence exists to create a material issue of fact as to whether the practice of falsifying inmate watch records was so widespread as to constitute a custom or policy of Volusia County. What happened here should not happen again. Counsel for Volusia County conceded during oral argument that the facts adduced in this case have since been 'looked at' by County policymakers and would serve as 'pretty firm evidence' of notice in any future litigation. So I would expect that the County will immediately take all necessary remedial actions to correct the systemic failures identified in this tragic and preventable case."); Pecsi v. City of Niles, 674 F.App'x 544, 546-47 (6th Cir. 2017) ("The Supreme Court held in Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders that the Fourth Amendment permits suspicionless strip searches of individuals about to enter the general population of a detention facility. . . And lower courts have split over whether the holding applies to police station lockups. Compare Paulin v. Figlia, 916 F. Supp. 2d 524, 533 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) (it does), with Fate v. Charles, 24 F. Supp. 3d 337, 349 (S.D.N.Y. 2014) (it does not). It's also unclear whether there is necessarily a reasonable suspicion to strip search a person arrested for a drug offense. See Jacobson v. McCormick, 763 F.3d 914, 917–18 (8th Cir. 2014). Be all that as it may, we need not reach these questions. The dispositive reality is that the City did not have a blanket strip-search policy for drug arrestees. Three Niles Police Department officers testified, all without contradiction, that an officer may conduct a strip search only if he thinks an arrestee brought contraband into the police station. Accordingly, even if we assume for the sake of argument that a reasonable-suspicion standard applies to strip searches of drug arrestees at police station lockups, the City's policy meets it. . . .In Pecsi's eyes, the City showed deliberate indifference merely because it permitted officers to strip search arrestees and remove them from their cells without first getting approval from a supervisor. But the Niles Police Department did not have a pattern of illegal strip searches or sexual assaults by its officers that would have notified them of the need for closer supervision. The duty to supervise is not a duty to micromanage. A municipality does not open itself up to liability every time it delegates power to employees. The City, true enough, gave Cross the 'opportunity' to abuse Pecsi by empowering Cross to strip search him and remove him from his cell, but 'opportunity alone, without reason to suspect that it will lead to a constitutional violation, does not establish deliberate indifference.' Mize v. Tedford, 375 F. App'x 497, 501 (6th Cir. 2010). To hold otherwise would create the 'de facto respondeat superior liability' that the Supreme Court has assiduously avoided imposing on city governments under § 1983. City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378, 392 (1989). It matters not whether the City complied with a Michigan statute requiring officers to prepare a written report of every strip search. . . It's not clear how requiring officers to write such reports would have changed Cross's behavior, as someone of his ilk surely would have described only that there was a strip search (and why), not exactly what he did on top of that. The issue at any rate is whether the police department's supervision was constitutionally deficient, not whether it satisfied a higher standard created by state law. . .Pecsi adds that the City was deliberately indifferent to the risk posed by Cross, who had a record of reckless conduct. But none of Cross's actions put the City on notice that he had the propensity to commit sexual assault. Three of the four incidents identified by Pecsi—passing bad checks, speeding and driving on a suspended license, and lying to a superior officer—had nothing to do with this kind of incident. They were nonviolent and did not raise the possibility that Cross might commit a far more serious crime. Chief Huff investigated each incident and disciplined Cross as appropriate."); Brown v. Battle Creek Police Dep't., 844 F.3d 556, 574-75 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Plaintiffs argue that the City did not have a policy instructing officers on when and in what circumstances they should use deadly force against animals. They further claim that there was an unofficial tally system wherein officers would keep a running list of the animals they shot by putting stickers on their lockers to 'brag[ ]' about it, and that it was not uncommon for officers to encounter animals during searches or in the scope of their duties. . . With regard to the tally system, Plaintiffs presented evidence from Officers Angel Rivera, Brad Palmer, Joseph Wilder, and Scott Marshall. Officer Rivera testified that 'it was very common that officers would talk about [how many animals they shot],' and that he could not identify individual officers who did this because 'there were so many of them just bragging about it.'. . With regard to the frequency with which the City's officers encounter animals during searches, Officer Klein testified that '[m]any of the search warrants [he and his team] have executed [have] [involved] aggressive dogs,' and that it was 'not uncommon' when he was 'working road patrol' and when he was on the ERT. . .Despite this evidence, we find that Plaintiffs failed to provide evidence showing that 'the need' for a specific policy and/or training 'was so obvious and the likelihood that the inadequacy would result in the violation of constitutional rights was so great that the [City] as an entity can be held liable here for the extent of [Plaintiffs'] determined damages.'. .This is largely because there was no evidence indicating that participation in the tally system was systematic or widespread, and there was no evidence that the police department's supervisory personnel sanctioned such a system or even knew of its existence. For one, Plaintiffs' constitutional rights were not violated. The seizures of the dogs in this case were reasonable given the specific circumstances surrounding the raid. This finding alone is fatal to their municipal liability claim. . .Second, Plaintiffs did not provide any evidence demonstrating prior instances of unconstitutional dog shootings by the City's police officers. Plaintiffs appear to generally claim that because there have been numerous instances of animal deaths resulting from officer shootings during searches and that officers face animals frequently, these facts demonstrate prior instances of unconstitutional conduct. Plaintiffs do not show how these prior animal shootings were unconstitutional. . . Third, this case does not present one of those rare circumstances in which 'the unconstitutional consequences of failing to train could be so patently obvious that a city could be liable under § 1983 without proof of a pre-existing pattern of violations.'. . The tally system Plaintiffs mention, while not an example of model police behavior, does not provide proof of a pre-existing pattern of similar constitutional violations by police officers. Plaintiffs were unable to provide information as to the number of officers that participated in this tally system, the number of shootings that were tallied, or the number of shootings that were unreasonable exercises of force. Unsubstantiated testimony from a few officers generally describing the tally system while not providing details about the number of officers participating in it or the number of shootings tallied is neither persuasive nor meaningful. Notwithstanding, Plaintiffs provided no evidence that this tally system was sanctioned or encouraged by the BCPD, or that BCPD knew about it and knowingly disregarded it. As the district court stated, based on the 'present record, even crediting everything that's in the record, there's no history, credible history at least, that leads to needless killing of animals in the course of searches in Battle Creek ... and ... under those circumstances the fairly stringent standards for municipal liability by inattention could [not] be met here.'. . Therefore, we find that the district court did not err in granting the City's motion for summary judgment."); Livezey v. The City of Malakoff, 657 F. App'x 274, 276-78 & n.1 (5th Cir. 2016) (per curiam) ("Fierro has a disciplinary record as a police officer. Prior to being hired by the Malakoff Police Department, Fierro worked for the Dallas Police Department. He was terminated by the Dallas Police Department when he rear-ended another vehicle, fled the scene at over 100 mph, subsequently caused another accident, and then filed a false report. Fierro appealed, and his punishment was reduced to a suspension. Fierro, however, voluntarily retired as he was under investigation for other disciplinary matters. He was then hired by the Ferris Police Department, and later terminated under similar circumstances. In sum, his employment history reflects repeated disciplinary actions for vehicle accidents, violations of vehicular chase policies, and filing of false reports. As for the events related to Livezey's death, Fierro was indicted on charges of aggravated assault with a deadly weapon, reckless driving, and official oppression. Fierro accepted a plea deal and was sentenced to nine years' deferred adjudication, fines and court costs, and community service. He was also required to surrender his Texas Peace Officer's License permanently. Livezey's widow, Jeanette, and his children William, John, Susan, and Sandra, brought suit, asserting claims against the defendants for improper hiring, and failure to train and supervise. . . .Before hiring Fierro, Chief Mitchell reviewed Fierro's personal history disclosure forms, requested prior employment records, did a background investigation, and called the Dallas and Ferris police departments. Given that Brown held that an almost complete lack of an investigation was not enough to show deliberate indifference, Chief Mitchell's investigation in this case precludes a determination of deliberate indifference. While the plaintiffs rely on Fierro's prior disciplinary record as an officer in Dallas and Ferris, it cannot be said it was plainly obvious that his hiring would cause the specific constitutional violation in question. We have held that failing to respond to a history of 'bad or unwise acts' that 'demonstrate lack of judgment, crudity, and, perhaps illegalities' is not enough for deliberate indifference. . . . Next, regarding failure to train, the plaintiffs must show: (1) the City's 'training policy or procedure was inadequate'; (2) 'the inadequate training policy was a "moving force" in causing a violation of the plaintiff's rights'; and (3) the City 'was deliberately indifferent in adopting its training policy.'. . There is no indication the City's training was inadequate. Each Malakoff police officer was required to meet state requirements established by the Texas Commission on Law Enforcement ("TCOLE"). The plaintiffs provided no evidence or argument that any officer hired by Malakoff, including Fierro, failed to meet these requirements. The meeting of state standards means there can be no liability unless the plaintiff shows 'that this legal minimum of training was inadequate....' Benavides v. Cnty. of Wilson, 955 F.2d 968, 973 (5th Cir. 1992). The plaintiffs provided no evidence, and indeed offered no argument, that the TCOLE standards are inadequate. In any case, there is no evidence that the City or Chief Mitchell deliberately failed to train officers or were indifferent to the need for additional police policies and regulations. The plaintiffs finally argue that Chief Mitchell and the City failed to supervise Fierro adequately. For municipal liability to rest on this ground, the plaintiffs must show that '(1) the supervisor ... failed to supervise ... the subordinate official; (2) a causal link exists between the failure to ... supervise and the violation of the plaintiff's rights; and (3) the failure to ... supervise amounts to deliberate indifference.'. . 'Proof of more than a single instance of the lack of training or supervision causing a violation of constitutional rights is normally required before such lack of training or supervision constitutes deliberate indifference.'. .The plaintiffs allege that a prior traffic-stop incident involving Fierro is enough to establish a pattern of misconduct or violations of which the City or Chief Mitchell were deliberately indifferent. This prior stop, though, did not result in a complaint being filed against Fierro. Further, while the evidence of this stop suggests that Fierro overreacted, the situation did not involve an arrest, any physical force or reckless driving on the part of Fierro, and the driver that was pulled over admitted that he unintentionally cut Fierro off and was going 75 mph in a 50–mph zone. The events are dissimilar enough not to establish a pattern of violations by Fierro. Regardless, a single prior instance would not establish a pattern. . . . The plaintiffs also argue that Fierro's prior disciplinary record at the Dallas and Ferris Police Departments can help establish a pattern of misconduct. As discussed in the Facts section, however, Fierro's prior record indicates sustained complaints for violations of vehicular chase policies and the filing of false reports. The current case deals mainly with unlawful arrest and excessive force. Fierro's prior record, therefore, does not establish a pattern of violations relevant to this case. . . .The district court properly found no municipal liability for the City."); Bickerstaff v. Lucarelli, 830 F.3d 388, 402 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Bickerstaff claims that the City of Cleveland had a policy of inadequate training and supervision because it allowed the police officers who supervised Lucarelli to do nothing to discipline him or stop him from engaging in inappropriate relationships. But to prevail on such a theory, Bickerstaff must show that the City of Cleveland's policy was 'representative of (1) a clear and persistent pattern of illegal activity, (2) which the [City] knew or should have known about, (3) yet remained deliberately indifferent about, and (4) that the [City's] custom was the cause' of the deprivation of her constitutional rights. . . Bickerstaff's speculative allegations fall short of stating a claim against the City. Beyond the blanket assertions that the City 'condon[ed]' or 'tolerat [ed]' police officer misconduct, she points to no facts that would indicate the existence of such an official policy or custom. Nor does Bickerstaff put forth any facts suggesting that the City ignored a 'clear and persistent pattern' of misconduct. . . With no factual allegations showing a formal policy or any prior incidents to support the City of Cleveland's adoption of such an informal practice or custom, Bickerstaff's Monell municipal-liability claim accordingly fails."); Crepa v. Cochise County, 667 F. App'x 605, 606 (9th Cir. 2016) ("Before hiring Cruver, Cochise County and Dever knew or should have known that Cruver's employment history included: a rejected application for a different law enforcement position; two sexual harassment complaints by coworkers; 'serious' and 'critical' admissions to the pre-hire screening psychologist, including offensive remarks and jokes about minorities, women, and other protected groups; and the death of an arrestee in his custody. After Cochise County hired Cruver, an arrestee alleged that Cruver used excessive force against her. These facts, taken as true, do not support the conclusion that 'adequate scrutiny of [Cruver's] background would lead a reasonable policymaker to conclude that the plainly obvious consequence of the decision to hire [Cruver],'. . . would be that he would violate Crepea's Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights by forcibly entering her property and sexually assaulting her."); Richardson v. Huber Hts. City Schools Bd. of Ed., 651 F. App'x 362, 366-68 (6th Cir. 2016) ("[A] jury would . . . be justified in concluding that school officials turned a blind eye to hazing at Wayne—particularly within its athletic programs—to the extent that a comment from a coach inviting upperclassmen to 'take care of' a problem elicited sexual assault as a preferred alternative to outright violence. Although a jury could find that Soukup may not have precisely envisioned this incident, the evidence supports the inference that school officials could not have been unaware of this culture of student leadership via bullying, and the risk it posed. . . Nevertheless, Richardson's task is not complete. Municipal lability will not attach absent evidence sufficient to 'show that the need to act is so obvious that the School Board's "conscious" decision not to act can be said to amount to a "policy" of deliberate indifference.'. . Richardson must demonstrate:

(1) the existence of a clear and persistent pattern of ... abuse by school employees; (2) notice or constructive notice on the part of the School Board; (3) the School Board's tacit approval of the unconstitutional conduct, such that their deliberate indifference in their failure to act can be said to amount to an official policy of inaction; and (4) that the School Board's custom was the 'moving force' or direct causal link in the constitutional deprivation. . . . Richardson offers no argument or evidence in support of municipal liability. With regard to the first three prongs, even assuming a jury accepts that there was an 'environment of physical abuse and bullying' at Wayne, Richardson must still show 'a clear and persistent pattern of abuse' by school employees—not merely by fellow students—to prevail, and that the Board had notice of it. . . He fails. Moreover, Richardson cannot show that the Board acted with deliberate indifference. In fact, there is evidence of the school's previous, successful responses to instances of bullying or hazing by students. Further, after the incident, K.R.'s assailants were swiftly punished, and inappropriate touching became nearly non-existent afterward. Even if we regard the Board's reactions to reports of abuse as insufficient, more is required: ' "[d]eliberate indifference" in this context does not mean a collection of sloppy, or even reckless, oversights; it means evidence showing an obvious, deliberate indifference to sexual abuse.'. . Critically, Richardson does not attempt to explain the fourth prong of the Doe test—how the Board's 'custom' was the 'moving force' or direct causal link of his injury. . . This element is 'a causation inquiry,' requiring a demonstration of both 'cause in fact' as well as 'proximate cause.'. . Even assuming that Richardson can show that the Board's inaction and indifference to the culture of bullying at Wayne High School was a 'but for' cause of K.R.'s injury, he cannot prove proximate cause—that is, he cannot show that 'it was reasonably foreseeable that the complained of harm would befall [K.R.] as a result of the [Board's] conduct.'. . Put simply, there is no evidence in the record that the Board could foresee that Soukup or any coach at Wayne would authorize upperclassmen to sexually assault underclassmen as a method of reinforcing team discipline. . . No testimony, beyond a brief discussion of a single coach on the basketball team, has accused coaches of fostering such behavior. Accordingly, we need not draw the unreasonable inference that the Board should have foreseen it. . . . Although Richardson has offered significant evidence of an inappropriate and abusive culture among some students at Wayne High School, and of a special danger to K.R., he cannot establish municipality liability under Monell. Summary judgment for the Board was thus appropriate, and we therefore affirm."); Brown v. Chapman, 814 F.3d 447, 462-64 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Plaintiff . . . argues that the City of Cleveland is liable for Chapman's use of excessive force. Plaintiff offers three different theories of municipal liability: that the City's taser policy was unlawful, that the City inadequately trained its officers, and that the City ratified Chapman's violation of Brown's constitutional rights by not conducting a thorough investigation. . . Plaintiff's ratification theory fails because, as discussed above, it requires that plaintiff make allegations against a specific final decisionmaker and plaintiff does not make those allegations. This leaves two theories of liability. . . .Plaintiff claims that the taser policy in place at the time of Brown's death dictated that officers discharge their tasers at 'center mass.'. . Because Chapman fired his taser at Brown's chest, plaintiff argues that this policy was the 'moving force' behind the constitutional violation. . . For the purposes of summary judgment, we agree. When viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, a reasonable jury could find that the City's taser policy was the moving force behind the violation of Brown's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . [On the inadequate training claim, i]n order to impose liability on the City of Cleveland, plaintiff must show '(1) that a training program is inadequate to the tasks that the officers must perform; (2) that the inadequacy is the result of the [City's] deliberate indifference; and (3) that the inadequacy is closely related to or actually caused the plaintiff's injury.'. .Plaintiff meets the first prong easily with her argument that the City did not adequately train its officers how to use a taser—a task they are required to perform. . . As for the second prong, we have interpreted City of Canton v. Harris 'as recognizing at least two situations in which inadequate training could be found to be the result of deliberate indifference.'. . . Plaintiff does not allege that the City of Cleveland 'fail[ed] to act in response to repeated complaints of constitutional violations by its officers.'. . Thus, she must show that the City 'fail[ed] to provide adequate training in light of foreseeable consequences.'. . Plaintiff notes that although Taser International, Inc. (the company that makes the City's tasers) updated its training materials several times before December 31, 2010, the City continued to use old training materials. The difference, plaintiff contends, is significant. The updated materials told officers to avoid chest shots when possible in order to 'reduce[ ] the risk of affecting the heart.'. . The old materials said that '[t]he effective target zone for the TASER device is almost the entire body,' with the exceptions being the head and throat. . . In September 2010, the City's police department trained Chapman using the old materials even though updated materials had been available since May 2010. . . Thus, just months before Chapman's altercation with Brown, the City instructed Chapman that it was safe to discharge his taser at a suspect's chest. Plaintiff argues that the consequences of this inadequate training—that officers would discharge their tasers at suspects' chests—were foreseeable. We agree. Finally, plaintiff must show 'that the inadequacy is closely related to or actually caused [the] injury.'. . Here, the inadequacy is due to the program's failure to instruct officers to avoid discharging their tasers at suspects' chests, and the intrusion on Brown's Fourth Amendment rights involved the discharge of a taser at his chest. Accordingly, we conclude that, when viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, a reasonable jury could find that there was a direct causal link between the City's inadequate training and the intrusion on Brown's Fourth Amendment rights. Thus, we reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment to the City on plaintiff's excessive-force claim."); Blue v. District of Columbia, 811 F.3d 14, 19-20 (D.C. Cir. 2015) ("[Plaintiff] contends that the District's single decision not to reprimand Weismiller after the District investigated the relationship demonstrates a municipal policy of ignoring sexual abuse by teachers. But Blue has cited no decision by this circuit, nor are we aware of one, that supports such a theory of municipal liability. As Blue points out, other circuits have recognized that theory, but in the cases Blue cites, the municipality failed to respond to improper actions by numerous municipal officials. . . . This case is quite different. Not only does it involve the alleged misbehavior of only one municipal employee, but, more important, DCPS's May 2009 investigation concluded that Weismiller never had a sexual relationship with Blue. The District therefore had no reason to fire Weismiller. . . .Blue's second asserted basis for a municipal policy—the District's failure to properly screen Weismiller before hiring him—warrants somewhat more analysis. Blue contends that the District's failure to properly screen Weismiller qualified as a municipal policy because it was a single decision by a final policymaker. The district court rejected this theory because Blue failed to 'allege[ ] ... that the decision to hire Weismiller without an adequate background check was made by a final municipal policymaker.'. . Instead, Blue alleged only that '[the] District has "a custom, policy or practice of failing to adequately investigate the backgrounds of its teachers before hiring them."'. . We agree with the district court that Blue's assertion is insufficient to support a claim that the District, in failing to properly screen Weismiller, acted pursuant to a municipal policy actionable under section 1983. . . . Section 1983 plaintiffs have several ways to allege a municipal policy, each with its own elements. If the plaintiff fails to identify the type of municipal policy at issue, the court would be unable to determine, as required by Iqbal's second step, whether the plaintiff had provided plausible support for her claim. Although the court could try to surmise which theory of municipal liability has the strongest support in the complaint, this is not our role. It therefore follows that to state a valid claim against a municipality under section 1983, a plaintiff must plead the elements of the relevant type of municipal policy. Under this standard, Blue's inadequate screening claim fails because, as she concedes, she never indicated the contours of any type of municipal policy. At most, the complaint suggests that the District made a serious mistake in hiring Weismiller, just as other school districts have done in the past. Although, if true, this would be distressing, the complaint does not allege that the District has a policy of failing to properly screen employees. . . . In other words, in order for the district court to assess whether Blue stated a facially plausible complaint, Blue needed to assert the elements of the type of municipal policy that caused her injury. Blue failed to do so.");

Weiland v. Palm Beach Cnty. Sheriff's Office, 792 F.3d 1313, 1328 (11th Cir. 2015) ("In counts two and four, Weiland claims that the Sheriff's Office maintained two unconstitutional policies: (1) a policy of not training its deputies in the appropriate use of force when seizing mentally ill citizens for transportation to mental health facilities (count two); and (2) a policy of using internal affairs investigations to cover up the use of excessive force against mentally ill citizens (count four). We take the two claims in that order. . . . 'In limited circumstances, a local government's decision not to train certain employees ... to avoid violating citizens' rights may rise to the level of an official government policy for purposes of § 1983.'. . But '[a] pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees is ordinarily necessary to demonstrate deliberate indifference for purposes of failure to train.'. . Count two does not allege a pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees. Although it contains the conclusory allegation that the Sheriff's Office was 'on notice' of the need to 'promulgate, implement, and/or oversee' policies pertaining to the 'use of force' appropriate for 'the seizure of mentally ill persons and their transportation to mental health facilities,' no facts are alleged to support that conclusion . . . Instead, it is clear that the claim outlined in count two arises from a single incident and the actions of two deputies. Our analysis is not altered by the fact that evidence of previous incidents is not required to establish city policy if the need to train and supervise in a particular area is 'so obvious' that liability attaches for a single incident. . . The complaint does not allege that the need for specialized training in the constitutional restrictions on the use of force when dealing with mentally ill citizens is 'so obvious' that the failure to provide such training amounts to deliberate indifference. The district court's dismissal of count two is correct."); Culbertson v. Lykos, 790 F.3d 608, 625 (5th Cir. 2015) ("The plaintiffs have alleged no facts as to the lack of a training program, nor are there sufficient allegations to support a contention that it was obvious to Harris County that the lack of training or supervision would result in the retaliation by prosecutors or others against other public employees or governmental contractors. There would also need to be allegations that the alleged retaliatory conduct occurred with such frequency that Harris County was put on notice that training or supervision was needed. . . No such allegations have been made."); Kitchen v. Dallas Cnty., Tex., 759 F.3d 468, 485, 486 (5th Cir. 2014) ("[T]he record in this case contains no proof, whether in the form of expert evidence or otherwise, that the extraction of mentally ill inmates from jail cells requires specialized training. . . There is no suggestion, for example, that any other municipality in the United States provides such specialized training to detention officers. Plaintiff–Appellant's evidence therefore does not demonstrate the same level of 'patently obvious' risks of 'recurring constitutional violations' that may occur, as hypothesized by the Supreme Court in Canton, 489 U.S. at 390, and Connick, 131 S.Ct. at 1361–63, in instances where a municipality sends 'armed officers into the public to capture fleeing felons without training the officers in the constitutional limitation on the use of deadly force.' . . To summarize, Plaintiff–Appellant has failed to identify any pattern of past constitutional violations similar to the events of the present case, and has not demonstrated that the prospect of constitutional violations should have been 'highly predictable' or 'patently obvious' in the present case. . . Accordingly, Plaintiff–Appellant's claims cannot proceed on the basis that Defendant–Appellee Dallas County failed to provide the proper training to the personnel located in the North Tower."); Thomas v. Cumberland County, 749 F.3d 217, 223, 225-27 (3d Cir. 2014) ("The parties do not challenge the existence of a policy or of a constitutional violation on appeal. The relevant policy for the purposes of municipal liability is the County's decision not to provide conflict de-escalation and intervention training as a part of pre-service training for corrections officers. The alleged constitutional violation stems from the officers' failure to 'take reasonable measures to protect prisoners from violence at the hands of other prisoners.'. . We will focus on whether the failure to provide pre-service training on conflict de-escalation and intervention amounts to deliberate indifference, and whether this deficiency in training caused Thomas's injury. . . .Thomas advances a single-incident theory of liability, arguing that a jury could find that the CCCF was deliberately indifferent 'when "patently obvious" standards, widely-accepted national standard[s] and training relevant to inmate safety were disregarded, at the same time their Corrections Officers were confronting a combustible jail.'. . To find deliberate indifference from a single-incident violation, the risk of Thomas's injury must be a 'highly predictable consequence' of the CCCF's failure to provide de-escalation and intervention training as a part of pre-service training for corrections officers. . . Thomas put forward evidence that fights regularly occurred in the prison. While these fights are not sufficient to create a pattern of violations, because there is scant evidence that they resulted in constitutional violations, they are relevant to whether his injury was a 'highly predictable consequence' of the failure to train on de-escalation techniques for single-incident liability. A reasonable jury could conclude based on the frequency of fights and the volatile nature of the prison that the 'predictability that an officer lacking [de-escalation and intervention training] to handle that situation will violate rights' and the 'likelihood that the situation will recur' demonstrate deliberate indifference on the County's part. . . Thomas also provided expert opinion evidence that the failure to provide conflict de-escalation and intervention training was a careless and dangerous practice not aligned with prevailing standards. Viewing the evidence in the record, including Dr. Kiekbusch's expert opinion, in the light most favorable to Thomas, a reasonable jury could find that the County acted with deliberate indifference. Thomas's case for single-incident liability falls somewhere between the plainly obvious need to train armed police officers 'in the constitutional limitations on the use of deadly force' in Canton . . . and the lack of such an obvious need in Connick, where prosecutors had a legal education and ethical obligations and the allegedly necessary training was nuanced. . . . However, the case here is more similar to the hypothetical in Canton than to the situation in Connick. Like the police officers in Canton, corrections officers have no reason to know how or when to de-escalate a conflict to avoid a constitutional violation for failure to protect. Given the frequency of fights occurring between inmates in the CCCF that could lead to constitutional violations for failure to protect, the lack of training here is akin to 'a failure to equip law enforcement officers with specific tools to handle recurring situations.'. . In contrast to Connick, the officers here have no reason to have an independent education, knowledge base, or ethical duty that would prepare them to handle the volatile conflicts that might lead to inmate-on-inmate violence. Also unlike in Connick, there is no nuance to the training Thomas seeks to require. While the prosecutors in Connick had some knowledge of Brady's requirements, corrections officers had no de-escalation or intervention training as a part of their pre-service training. . . .Causation is a requirement for failure-to-train liability that is separate from deliberate indifference; however, '[t]he high degree of predictability [in a single-incident case] may also support an inference of causation—that the municipality's indifference led directly to the very consequence that was so predictable.'. . . Thomas put forward evidence from Santiago—the first inmate who struck Thomas—that the officers could have stopped the argument before violence broke out. He also presented an inmate witness's statement that the officers allowed the inmates to fight. There is ample evidence in the record that Martinez was present throughout the argument, which lasted for several minutes, before Thomas was struck. Thomas offered expert opinion evidence that the CCCF's lack of de-escalation training, among other things, contributed to the serious injuries that Thomas sustained. . . . Presented with this evidence and using their judgment and common sense, a reasonable jury could have concluded that the lack of training in conflict de-escalation and intervention caused Thomas's injuries."); D'Ambrosio v. Marino, 747 F.3d 378, 386-88 (6th Cir. 2014) ("D'Ambrosio . . . contends that his complaint identified an unconstitutional county policy. Explicitly conceding that he is not pursuing an argument that the county failed to properly train its prosecutors about their Brady obligations, D'Ambrosio instead argues that his complaint adequately alleged that county prosecutors habitually ignored criminal defendants' constitutional rights in a manner that was 'so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law.'. . In this respect, he appears to be arguing not that the prosecutors themselves established a policy of treating criminal defendants unconstitutionally, but that they were simply acting in accordance with a preexisting and ubiquitous county practice that can fairly be deemed to have originated with or at some point been adopted by the municipality. . . But this argument is belied by the allegations of the complaint. The complaint focuses on Marino's rather storied history of improper conduct, alleging that 'Marino had a policy of not allowing defense attorneys to copy relevant documents regarding the case,' that 'Marino and Mason ... created and maintained an official policy' to prosecute D'Ambrosio 'without concern for his constitutional rights,' that 'Marino and Mason ... created and maintained an official policy ... of failing to adequately train' their fellow prosecutors about their Brady obligations, and that Marino has a 'shameful track record of breaking rules to win convictions.' Other than that, the complaint alleges only that '[t]he general practice of withholding exculpatory evidence ... was so common and well settled as to constitute an official policy' of the Prosecutor's Office. In support of this assertion, the complaint alleges that one other prosecutor believed that the entire Prosecutor's Office possessed a view of Brady obligations that was as 'similarly limited' as Marino's. The complaint also alleges that this prosecutor handled D'Ambrosio's case in the same manner that he has handled all of the other cases that he has prosecuted. These allegations are insufficient to plausibly allege the existence of an official county policy of violating criminal defendants' constitutional rights. The thrust of the complaint is that Marino—and perhaps one or two other members of the Prosecutor's Office—instigated and implemented habitually unconstitutional practices, not that they were following municipal policy in doing so. Municipal liability attaches only where the policy or practice in question is 'attributable to the municipality,' Heyerman v. Cnty. of Calhoun, 680 F.3d 642, 648 (6th Cir.2012), but D'Ambrosio's complaint contains no allegations that the practice at issue here was acquiesced to or informed by municipal actors rather than by prosecutors who had adopted the strategy in order to win criminal convictions. . . . Instead of alleging a 'clear and persistent' office-wide pattern of unconstitutional conduct, . . . D'Ambrosio's complaint is limited to allegations regarding the repeated failures of only one prosecutor: Marino. . . . Nor does the complaint plausibly allege the county's 'notice or constructive notice' of habitually unconstitutional conduct. . . .For the Connick

Court, four prior Brady violations over the course of a decade were not enough to place the prosecutor's office on notice that any sort of action was necessary in order to avoid the Brady violations at issue in Connick. . . Here, D'Ambrosio claims that the county had sufficient notice of an office-wide practice of persistent unconstitutional conduct by virtue of only one other Brady violation and nine other non-Brady instances of prosecutorial misconduct—all of which were committed by Marino over two decades. Of these ten cited examples of misconduct, only three had been ruled as improper by the courts prior to D'Ambrosio's conviction in 1989. . .All three of these cases involved Marino's improper trial comments; they did not involve Brady violations. . . In Connick, four previous Brady violations were insufficient to alert the prosecutor's office that another Brady violation might occur in the future in the absence of corrective action. Here, the county's knowledge of only three prior instances in which only one of its prosecutors had made improper comments at trial was less. . . This is true even if the county had been aware of Marino's lone other Brady violation before a court had identified it as such. Until the county had notice of persistent misconduct, it did not have 'the opportunity to conform to constitutional dictates,' nor could its inaction have caused the deprivation of D'Ambrosio's constitutional rights. . . The county cannot have tacitly approved an unconstitutional policy of which it was unaware. . . As we recognized in D'Ambrosio's previous two appeals to this court, there is no question that the individual prosecutors involved in D'Ambrosio's case violated rights secured to him by the Constitution. But D'Ambrosio's complaint amounts to an attempt to hold the county liable for what Marino and his colleagues did wrong. And this is insufficient to state a claim under Monell."); Wilson v. Cook County, 742 F.3d 775, 782-84 (7th Cir. 2014) ("[H]ad the county conducted a thorough background examination prior to allowing Vanaria to work at the hospital, it would have uncovered the fact that he had engaged in grossly inappropriate conduct as recently as seven years earlier. However, it would also have learned that there had been no incidents during the most recent seven-year period of his employment. Given the passage of time without incident and the fact that Vanaria had aged seven years, it is difficult to conclude that Vanaria's misconduct with respect to Almaguer was so obvious that any jury could find causation or deliberate indifference. No doubt Vanaria was more likely to commit sexual misdeeds than someone without his checkered history, but we must recognize that individuals are capable of growth and not necessarily doomed to a life of recidivism. And given that Vanaria was fired from his state position in 1998, it is not implausible to believe that he would have learned from his errors and decided that another infraction would have caused his political support to dry up. Almaguer's argument is more persuasive with the benefit of 20/20 hindsight, but of course we must view things from the perspective of the hospital at the time it hired Vanaria. In 2005, it was far from obvious that he would engage in sexually inappropriate conduct with a complete stranger. Our conclusion is bolstered by a comparison of Vanaria's past conduct with the behavior he exhibited toward Almaguer. Vanaria's modus operandi had been one of abuse of power. As a probation officer, he had attempted to trade favorable probation conditions for sexual favors, and his position of supervisory power was what made his proposals possible. By contrast, Vanaria did not exercise any legitimate power over Almaguer. As detailed above, he was able to entice Almaguer through a ruse he concocted, but the manner in which he operated was a sharp deviation from his past misconduct. That is, even if the county had known about his probation history, it could hardly have expected that Vanaria would have impersonated a human resources employee and lured a complete stranger into the building. He had no history of such conduct. In Brown the Supreme Court made clear that it is not enough that a municipality know an employee would be likely to violate a plaintiff's constitutional rights in some kind of general sense . . . . In other words, a plaintiff must connect the dots between the past conduct and the specific constitutional violation. Vanaria's past conduct involved a straightforward abuse of power, whereas in this case his weapon was not power but trickery and lies. Although the acts against Almaguer obviously share some similarities with Vanaria's past conduct—all incidents involve bartering for sexual favors—the lengths he went to in order to dupe Almaguer, someone over whom Vanaria had no legitimate power, do not find a comfortable place within the predictable arc of his past conduct. . . . In sum, we take the Supreme Court seriously when it instructs us to be wary of imposing municipal liability in circumstances like this. . . . Thus, the bar is set high in terms of both culpability (deliberate indifference) and causation, whereby a plaintiff must link the hiring decision to the particular injury alleged. In our view, imposing liability on Cook County under these facts would substitute conjecture and principles of mere negligence for the 'rigorous standards of culpability and causation' the Supreme Court has imposed. . . Simply put, it is too much of a stretch to say that the county not only should have known Vanaria would commit various sexual misdeeds, but that he would also invent a phony position of power that would allow him to violate the bodily integrity of someone he had no business reason to come in contact with. . . Our conclusion means two things. First, it means that the decision to hire Vanaria was not the cause of Almaguer's injury in anything but the 'but for' sense. . . It was not, in other words, the 'moving force' behind the injury. . . Second, and relatedly, it means that the county lacked the requisite mental state of deliberate indifference. For these reasons, we conclude the substantive due process claim was properly dismissed."); Schneider v. City of Grand Junction Police Dept., 717 F.3d 760, 773 (10th Cir. 2013) ("The evidence indicates that PSA Dyer was not a policymaker or decisionmaker for the City with regard to hiring Officer Coyne. He did not make the hiring decision—Chief Gardner did. Consequently, the hiring claim against the City must be based on Chief Gardner's actions or inactions. As discussed above, the background investigation was not inadequate, and, as with PSA Dyer, there is no evidence that Chief Gardner was deliberately indifferent. . . Moreover, no evidence suggested that the City had actual or constructive notice of the need for any additional background investigation. . . Accordingly, we agree with the district court that no reasonable jury could find that the City acted with deliberate indifference in its decision to hire Officer Coyne."); Jackson v. Wilkins, 517 F. App'x 311, 2013 WL 827725, *8, *9 (6th Cir. Mar. 6, 2013) ("The Estate contends that the City was deliberately indifferent to the rights of its citizens when it failed to train its officers on Benton Harbor Police Department General Order 9. That order states in relevant part that, whenever an officer uses a taser on a suspect, the officer should take that suspect 'to a medical facility for clearance prior to transport to the nearest detention facility or other institution.' Had the City trained its officers on General Order 9, the Estate says, Officer Wilkins would have taken Jackson to the hospital, and Jackson would have lived. The problem with this argument is that the City had not formally adopted that order at the time of Jackson's death. And a municipality cannot 'fail to train' its officers on a policy that did not exist. The Estate's real complaint, therefore, is that the City had not adopted General Order 9. But 'the fact that alternative procedures might have better

