Ratlieff v. City of Fort Lauderdale, 748 F.Supp.3d 1202, ____ (S.D. Fla. 2024) ("Because it is undisputed that the Off-Site Defendants were not physically located at the scene; did not personally participate in the alleged violations; did not direct subordinates to deploy tear gas or KIPs; and do not appear to have had any reason to know their subordinates were acting unlawfully, the Court concludes that Ratlieff has not established the requisite 'causal connection between actions of the supervising official and the alleged constitutional violation.'. . Accordingly, the Off-Site Defendants cannot be held liable for alleged violations of Ratlieff's First Amendment rights under a § 1983 supervisory theory of liability as a matter of law. . . . In contrast to the Off-Site Defendants, all agree that Dietrich, Cristafaro, and Figueras ("On-Site Defendants") were at the Intersection between 7:01 p.m. and 7:07 p.m when Ratlieff was gassed and struck. As it is undisputed that the On-Site Defendants were present at the Intersection and each had the authority to order and/or put a stop to Ratlieff's alleged First Amendment violations, Dietrich, Cristafaro, and Figueras's supervisory liability is again contingent upon whether the situation on the ground at the Intersection between 7:01 p.m and 7:07 p.m. justified the skirmish line's continued deployment of less-lethals without a dispersal order. Under Ratlieff's version of the facts, which a reasonable jury could accept or reject, she has demonstrated 'facts which support an inference that the supervisor directed the subordinates to act unlawfully or knew that the subordinates would act unlawfully and failed to stop them from doing so.'. . Accordingly, Ratlieff has demonstrated a genuine dispute of material fact as to the On-Site Defendants' supervisory liability, and summary judgment in their favor upon this basis is premature.")

Barefield v. Dunn, No. 2:20-CV-917-WKW, 2023 WL 5417550, at *17 (M.D. Ala. Aug. 22, 2023) ("[D]espite some confusion by the parties, this supervisory-causal-connection framework supplements (not supplants) the general rule that officials, whether or not they bear the title of supervisor, may be held liable for their own unconstitutional conduct. And here, according to Farmer v. Brennan and its progeny, officials—even if they bear the title of supervisor—personally violate the Eighth Amendment by the nature of their own conduct if they manifest deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm, which causes a plaintiff's injuries. . . That is, under excessive-inmate-violence claims, liability may attach to 'supervisor' defendants so long as the Farmer standard is met as applied against them because they 'personally participated in the unconstitutional conditions of confinement due to the responsibility wielded by such officials for control and maintenance of the facilities.'. .Accordingly, the court need not restrict itself to the supervisory-causal-connection framework for subordinate action where Barefield alleges that a defendant's individualized deliberate indifference to an excessive risk of inmate violence caused his injuries. And Eleventh Circuit case law clearly confirms this approach. When analyzing excessive-inmate-violence claims, the Eleventh Circuit has repeatedly determined personal liability by asking whether a defendant, regardless of his supervisory status, demonstrated deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm, without analyzing the subordinate-action-causal-connection framework.")

Mathis v. Corizon Health Inc., No. 3:14CV469/MCR/EMT, 2015 WL 3651088, at *4 (N.D. Fla. June 11, 2015) ("The factual allegations of the complaint must plausibly show that the supervisory official acted with the same mental state required to establish a constitutional violation against his subordinate; therefore, the court must first identify the precise constitutional violation charged and explain what the violation requires. . . For example, in the Eighth Amendment context, a violation requires deliberate indifference; therefore, the plaintiff's factual allegations must show that the supervisory defendants actually knew that the subordinate posed a risk of serious harm.")

Kendall v. Sutherland, No. 1:13-CV-04263-RWS, 2014 WL 5782533, at *13-14 (N.D. Ga. Nov. 5, 2014) ("[U]nlike the plaintiff in Franklin, Plaintiffs here allege facts beyond conclusory statements. By alleging that Jackson reported abuse to deputies and filed formal complaints, the Court finds—construing all reasonable inferences in favor of Plaintiffs—that Sheriff Warren knew about the abuse because it was reported through a formal grievance process. While Plaintiffs use 'knew or should have known' language like in Franklin, at the motion-to-dismiss stage Plaintiffs' factual allegations about Jackson's formal reports provide a plausible basis to infer Sheriff Warren's subjective knowledge of Sutherland's actions. At this point—September 2012—Sheriff Warren knew that Sutherland posed a serious risk to McLaughlin and others. Sutherland then continued to abuse McLaughlin until January 2013. Apparently, '[n]o action was taken to avoid further contact between Sergeant Sutherland and Plaintiff Kimberly McLaughlin after [Jackson's complaints].'. . Further, after Sheriff Warren became aware of this risk, Sutherland victimized Plaintiff Brooks in December 2012 or January 2013 and then raped Plaintiff Kendall in January 2013. In view of the facts in the Second Amended Complaint, Plaintiffs plausibly allege that Sheriff Warren knew Sutherland was going to act unlawfully but failed to stop him. Consequently, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have stated a claim against Sheriff Warren for deliberate indifference.")

Pozdol v. City of Miami, 996 F. Supp. 2d 1290, 1300 (S.D. Fla. 2014) ("The Court finds that the history of widespread use of excessive force by the Miami Police Department during the three year period preceding decedent's shooting was sufficient to put Defendant Exposito on notice of widespread constitutional deprivations, which were not corrected. Moreover, the Court finds that the Complaint's allegations, supported by the findings of the Department of Justice investigation and the Miami Police Department's own finding of a 13% unjustified shooting rate for the 2008 to 2011 period, sufficiently pled the existence of a causal connection between Defendant Exposito's failure to act and decedent's constitutional deprivation. As the Court has determined, Defendant Exposito was put on notice and failed to act, it must next determine whether the right that he failed to protect was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct. . . .At the time of decedent's killing, the law clearly established that supervisory officials could be held liable under section 1983 for their subordinates' constitutional violations where a causal connection exists between the supervisor's failure to act and the constitutional violations. Cottone, 326 F.3d at 1360–61. Moreover, the Supreme Court determined long ago that 'a police officer may not seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead.'. . Having found that Plaintiff has met her burden of alleging sufficient facts to defeat Defendant Borroto's claim to qualified immunity, Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Count II, to the extent that it asserts qualified immunity from civil liability and that Plaintiff failed to state a cause of action demonstrating entitlement to relief, is denied.")

Tolbert v. Trammell, 2:13-CV-02108-WMA, 2014 WL 3892115, *8, *9 (N.D. Ala. Aug. 4, 2014) ("Supervisors can violate federal law and be held individually liable for the conduct of their subordinates under § 1983 'when there is a causal connection between actions of the supervising official and the alleged constitutional deprivation.'. . Such a causal connection exists (1) when 'a history of widespread abuse' put the supervisor on notice of the need to correct the constitutional deprivation, and he failed to do so; (2) when the supervisor's custom or policy resulted in deliberate indifference to constitutional rights; or (3) when facts support the inference that the supervisor directed his subordinates to act unlawfully or knew that they would and failed to stop them. . . Plaintiff's amended complaint uses buzzwords for supervisory liability but contains few supporting factual allegations. Plaintiff claims that 'Defendant Trammell and other officers' obvious, flagrant, and rampant behavior, has continued across a lengthy period of time and in doing so is sufficient to put Defendant Roper ... on notice of the widespread abuse and deprivations which resulted in the violation of citizens' constitutional rights....'. . . The amended complaint also claims that Roper acted with 'deliberate indifference' and 'as a matter of custom and practice.'. . This language clearly mirrors the first two categories of causal connections for supervisory liability above, but the court is not required to accept as true 'legal conclusions[ ] couched as factual allegation[s].'. . Plaintiff's bare assertions that Roper had notice and knowledge do not suffice; the 'conclusory nature' of such assertions 'disentitles them to the presumption of truth.'. . . Without Roper having notice or knowledge, plaintiff cannot demonstrate the causal connection required for supervisory liability under the first two categories. Plaintiff tacitly acknowledges the lack of factual support by stating, 'that is what discovery is for,' emphasizing the pleading standard, and arguing for time to gather more details during discovery. . . Rebutting qualified immunity imposes more of a burden than stating a claim, however, and even stating a claim 'does not unlock the doors of discovery for a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions.'. . Pleadings that fail to state a claim are not entitled to discovery to improve their factual foundation. . . Lacking factual allegations to support plaintiff's bare assertions, the amended complaint does not plausibly show a causal connection between Roper's actions and Trammell's alleged misconduct or satisfy the 'extremely rigorous' standard for § 1983 supervisory liability. . .Therefore, the court concludes that Roper is entitled to qualified immunity, and plaintiff's § 1983 claim as against Roper in his individual capacity based on the Fourth Amendment will be dismissed.")

Fitzgerald v. Corrections Corp. of America, No. 5:13–cv–261–RS–EMT, 2014 WL 1687109, *5, *6 (N.D. Fla. Apr. 29, 2014) ("The factual allegations of the complaint must plausibly show that the supervisory official acted with the same mental state required to establish a constitutional violation against his subordinate. See Franklin v. Curry, 738 F.3d 1246, 1249–51 & n. 7 (11th Cir.2013) (in analyzing plaintiff's claims against supervisory defendants, district court must first identify the precise constitutional violation charged and explain the elements of that particular violation, for example, deliberate indifference or other mens rea; second, the district court must weed out conclusory allegations and determine whether the facts alleged enable the court to draw the reasonable inference that the supervisor is liable for the alleged misconduct); Maxwell v. Cnty. of San Diego, 708 F.3d 1075, 1097 (9th Cir.2013) ("To bring a § 1983 action against a supervisor, the plaintiff must show: (1) the supervisor breached a legal duty to the plaintiff; (2) the breach of duty was 'the proximate cause' of the plaintiff's constitutional injury, and (3) the supervisor had at least the same level of mens rea in carrying out his superintendent responsibilities as would be required for a direct violation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights ...") (citing Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949); Dodds v. Richardson, 614 F.3d 1185, 1204 (10th Cir.2010) (after Iqbal, "[a]plaintiff may [ ] succeed in a § 1983 suit against a defendant-supervisor by demonstrating: (1) the defendant promulgated, created, implemented or possessed responsibility for the continued operation of a policy that (2) caused the complained of constitutional harm, and (3) acted with the state of mind required to establish the alleged constitutional deprivation."); Whitson v. Stone Cnty. Jail, 602 F.3d 920, 928 (8th Cir.2010) (after Iqbal, a supervisory defendant is liable only if he or she personally displayed the same mental state required to establish a constitutional violation by his or her subordinate). Filing a grievance with a supervisory person does not, alone, make the supervisor liable for the allegedly violative conduct brought to light by the grievance, even if the grievance is denied. See Gallagher v. Shelton, 587 F.3d 1063, 1069 (10th Cir.2009); Grinter v. Knight, 532 F.3d 567, 576 (6th Cir.2008); Shehee v. Luttrell, 199 F.3d 295, 300 (6th Cir.1999); see also Lomholt v. Holder, 287 F.3d 683, 683 (8th Cir.2002) (defendants' denial of plaintiff's grievances did not state a substantive constitutional claim). . . . Plaintiff has not alleged facts suggesting Doyle actually knew of his serious medical need; nor has he alleged facts showing that Doyle personally participated in the delays in treatment, directed medical staff to delay, or knew that staff would delay and failed to stop them from doing so. Therefore, Plaintiff failed to state an Eighth Amendment claim against Defendant Doyle. The same is true with regard to Plaintiff's claim against Defendant Warden Ellis. Plaintiff alleges Ellis failed to 'fix the situation' even after a CCA official directed him to do so. However, this vague allegation, devoid of any further factual enhancement, is insufficient to support an inference that Warden Ellis actually knew that his subordinates' conduct posed a risk of serious harm, and that he disregarded that risk by conduct that was more than gross negligence.")

Higginbotham v. City of Pleasant Grove, No. CV–12–BE–252–S, 2013 WL 5519577, *47 (N.D. Ala. Sept. 30, 2013) ("The court notes that Defendants' argument that a 'knowledge and failure to stop' cause of action is insufficient to state a cause of action after Iqbal is misplaced and ignores the discrimination context of Iqbal. Because the instant case does not allege discrimination based on race, religion, sex, or national origin, the requirement of 'purposeful discrimination' for supervisory liability that applied in Iqbal does not apply here.")

Smith v. City of Sumiton, No. 6:12–cv–03521–RDP, 2013 WL 3357573, *4 n. 11 (N.D. Ala. July 2, 2013) ("Defendant argues '[p]ost-Iqbal, there can be no § 1983 liability against a supervisor who did not personally participate in the alleged constitutional violation, and who took no affirmative action to directly cause the alleged constitutional violation.'. . However, in its post-Iqbal case law, the Eleventh Circuit has not limited supervisory liability to merely personal participation on the part of the supervisor, but instead has continued to allow liability with sufficient allegations of a 'causal connection between supervisory actions and the alleged deprivation.'")

Powell v. Barrett, No. 1:04–CV–1100–RWS, 2012 WL 567065, at *4, *5 (N.D. Ga. Feb. 17, 2012) ("Plaintiffs seek to establish deliberate indifference on the part of Defendant to Plaintiffs' constitutional rights by showing that Defendant was on notice of the over-detentions and yet failed to take action to stop them. Specifically, Plaintiffs allege that Defendant 'engaged in a pattern of continued inaction in the face of employees' documented widespread abuse of [Plaintiffs' constitutional rights] by failing to ensure their release on their Release Dates.'. . In support of her Motion for Summary Judgment, Defendant does not deny the problem of over-detentions; on the contrary, she admits that such a problem existed but argues that she 'vigorously addressed [it] with a wide variety of actions' and thus was 'anything but deliberately indifferent' to it. . . . In support of her argument that she was not deliberately indifferent to the problem of over-detentions, Defendant alleges that she took the following actions: '(1) request[ed] funding for additional staff; (2) [took] steps to increase the efficiency of existing staff; (3) work[ed] to improve the transfer of information from the courts to the Jail, so that releases could be processed more efficiently; and (4) hir[ed] a new Chief Jailor to study and improve Jail processes, particularly including the release process.'. . . In this case, Plaintiffs argue that the aforementioned measures Defendant took were insufficient to address the problem of over-detentions and at times led to perverse results (i.e., longer delays). . . However, the question the Court must answer is not whether Defendant approached the problem in the best way or achieved the best results, but whether she was 'deliberately indifferent'—that is, whether she failed to take corrective action. As stated above, this is an 'extremely rigorous' standard to meet. . . . In spite of the evidence of negligence on the part of Defendant, under the rationale of West, the Court cannot conclude, based on the conduct set forth above, that Defendant acted with deliberate indifference to the problem of over-detentions at the Jail. Accordingly, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have failed to satisfy the standard for supervisory liability."), aff'd in part by Powell v. Sheriff, Fulton County Georgia, 511 F. App'x 957 (11th Cir. 2013).

McDaniel v. Yearwood, No. 2:11–CV–00165–RWS, 2012 WL 526078, at *16 (N.D. Ga. Feb. 16, 2012) ("In this case, the Court concludes that Plaintiff has failed to establish supervisory liability on the part of Sheriff Smith based on any failure to properly train or supervise the deputies. As a threshold matter, while Plaintiff makes vague and conclusory allegations of failure to train and supervise, Plaintiff has failed to allege facts making a plausible showing that Sheriff Smith in actuality failed to train or supervise the deputies in this case. Plaintiff does not allege what training or supervision the deputies did receive, if any, or what training or supervision was lacking and needed. Furthermore, and more importantly, Plaintiff has not alleged, much less with plausibility, that Sheriff Smith knew of a need for further training or supervision. Indeed, Plaintiff fails to allege even a single other incident in which a BCSO sheriff's deputy conducted an unlawful arrest or used excessive force. By failing to allege any other incident of abuse, much less a history of widespread abuse, Plaintiff has failed to show that Sheriff Smith was on notice of a need to further train or supervise. Plaintiff has thus failed to show 'the necessary causal connection between [Sheriff Smith] and the unconstitutional conduct at issue for supervisory liability to be imposed.'")

C.C. ex rel. Andrews v. Monroe County Bd. of Educ., No. 00-753-CG-M, 2011 WL 6029758, at *2, *3 (S.D. Ala. Dec. 5, 2011) ("On this second appeal, the Eleventh Circuit vacated and remanded the court's order in light of the fact that the United States Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009), was issued after briefing in this case had closed but before the court entered its summary judgment order. (Doc. 123, p. 8). The Eleventh Circuit instructed this court to reconsider the summary judgment order on the equal protection claim in light of Iqbal. . . . The court finds that this evidence is not sufficient for a reasonable jury to conclude that Payne purposefully discriminated against the plaintiffs because they are female. As Payne points out, one of the four students allegedly molested by Floyd, JH, was male. . . Yet there is no allegation, nor any evidence, that Payne acted any more diligently or decisively with regard to JH's allegation of abuse than with regard to the plaintiffs' allegations. This is an admittedly low bar by which to judge Payne's conduct. But, where Iqbal requires "purpose rather than knowledge" in order to overcome qualified immunity, . . . the court finds the converse: kno No. 00-753-CG-M.wledge, but no purpose. This want of factual allegations as to Payne's purposeful, discriminatory intent against female students based upon their gender compels the court to find that Payne is entitled to qualified immunity with regard to the § 1983 equal protection claim only.")

Howell v. Houston County, Ga., No. 5:09-CV-402 (CAR), 2011 WL 3813291, at *25 n. *13 (M.D. Ga. Aug. 26, 2011) ("In Ashcroft v. Iqbal, the Supreme Court noted that in the context of section 1983 suits 'the term "supervisory liability" is a misnomer' because 'each Government official, his or her title notwithstanding, is only liable for his or her own misconduct.'. . The Supreme Court's statement in Iqbal suggests that some of the Eleventh Circuit's language regarding supervisory liability − for instance, the statement in Gonzalez regarding '[t]he standard by which a supervisor is held liable in her individual capacity for the actions of a subordinate' − is perhaps no longer technically accurate. Nonetheless, the Eleventh Circuit's actual standards for 'supervisory liability' appear to only impose liability on a supervisor for his own misconduct. Indeed, the Eleventh Circuit has continued to quote its pre-Iqbal 'supervisory liability' standards after Iqbal, See Bryant, 575 F.3d at 1299.")

Steen v. City of Pensacola, 809 F.Supp.2d 1342, 1346-48 (N.D. Fla. 2011) ("In short, the plaintiff may pursue the same claims against the City of Pensacola (official claim) and Chief Mathis (individual claim). The real question is whether, following the Supreme Court's Iqbal decision in 2009, there is still such thing as a claim for individual supervisory liability under the factual circumstances in this case and, if so, whether Chief Mathis is entitled to the defense of qualified immunity on the facts presented. . . . Based on the plaintiff's briefing and pleadings, the substantial amount of time spent discussing it during oral argument, and the language of Count III itself, the gravamen of the plaintiff's claim against Chief Mathis is that he failed his 'duty to create, adopt, and implement rules, regulations, practices and procedures which clearly direct police officers as to the appropriate use of Tasers' (emphasis added); his failure to do so, the plaintiff maintains, constituted a 'de facto' custom, policy and practice that led to 'the blatant use of excessive force' by Officer Ard, which included 'two high voltage [taser] darts' that 'intruded upon Steen's physiological functions and physical integrity, and caused Steen extreme pain and death.'. . The claim against Chief Mathis, as noted, is premised on a theory of supervisor liability, since the allegation is not that Chief Mathis used excessive force (he was not even there), but that his policies brought about Officer Ard's use of excessive force. As will be shown, individual supervisory liability in Section 1983 cases is muddled and unsettled. . . . . [T]he Supreme Court fomented disagreement on the availability of individual supervisory liability when it issued its split 5-4 decision in Iqbal, supra. . . . The courts have thus arrived at differing interpretations following the decision in Iqbal. . . . Despite uncertainty among academics and in some circuits, in the Eleventh Circuit, supervisory liability appears to have survived Iqbal – at least for the time being. See, e.g., Harper v. Lawrence County, Ala., 592 F.3d 1227, 1236 (11th Cir.2010) (referencing without discussion the same, pre-Iqbal standard for supervisory liability); Gross v. White, 340 F. App'x 527, 531 (11th Cir.2009) (same). While the Eleventh Circuit has recognized that, 'in a § 1983 action, a plaintiff must [now] plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution,'. . . it appears that the court continues to allow supervisory liability when a causal connection is established (even when no 'individual actions' are present), for example, when the supervisor merely knows of a constitutional violation, has the authority to stop it, and fails to do so. . . The plaintiff alleges in Count III that Chief Mathis 'knew that his officers were using [tasers]' in such a way that posed 'a serious risk of personal injury,' and, in particular, that he was 'allowing his police officers to use excessive and unreasonable force by ... fir[ing] Tasers into moving vehicles or at persons in operation of moving vehicles, in reckless disregard and deliberate indifference to the health and welfare of suspects [including Steen].' This would appear to be an allegation of 'knowledge,' not 'purpose,' and would therefore seem to fall within the Iqbal supervisory liability limitation. However, despite uncertainty concerning the viability of individual supervisory liability in some circuits and academia, this allegation would appear sufficient to state a claim under the 'causal connection' prong of individual supervisory liability and survive dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) in the Eleventh Circuit.")

Brandon v. Williams, No. CV410-183, 2011 WL 1984619, at *4 (S.D. Ga. May 19, 2011) ("The pivotal allegation here, however, is that the gym-herding was routine (discovery may reveal if it was routine enough to impute notice to him) and that Williams himself saw the exposed baseball bats. '[W]hen facts support an inference that the supervisor ... knew that the subordinates would act unlawfully and failed to stop them from doing so,' Harper, 592 F.3d at 1236, the pleading threshold has been crossed. Brandon has just barely alleged that here, so Williams shall also remain in this case.")

Drury v. Volusia County, No. 6:10-cv-1176-Orl-28DAB, 2011 WL 1625042, at *6 (M.D. Fla. Apr. 28, 2011) ("Sweat argues that he is not alleged to have directly participated in the underlying sexual activity and that a basis for supervisory liability against him has not been sufficiently set forth. Sweat notes that 'the Plaintiff attempts to establish a causal connection by alleging widespread abuse of which Defendant Sweat either knew or should have know[n].' . . Sweat's assertion that the Complaint's allegations are insufficient to overcome qualified immunity at this stage of the case is not well-taken. . . Plaintiff has described widespread abuse and has set forth a factual basis for Sweat's knowledge or reason to know and his failure to take corrective action. She has sufficiently alleged a constitutional violation by Sweat, and Sweat will not be granted qualified immunity at this stage of the case.")

Allen v. City of Grovetown, No. CV 110-022, 2010 WL 5330563, at *8 (S.D. Ga. Dec. 20, 2010) ("The crux of Plaintiff's claim against Defendant Robinson, individually, is that he failed to properly train or supervise Defendants Harden and Freeman in the methods of suicide prevention and thus directly contributed to Love's death. . . . Plaintiff neither alleges facts showing that the need for more or different training or supervision was 'obvious' nor facts that could be reasonably construed as putting Defendant Robinson on any kind of notice as to a need for corrective measures. For instance, Plaintiff has not cited to prior instances of suicide or suicide attempts at the Grovetown facility. Likewise, Plaintiff has not set forth any facts indicating that Defendant Robinson had any actual knowledge with regard to the nature of Love's risk of suicide.")

CC v. Monroe County Bd. of Educ., No. 00-0753-CG-M, 2009 WL 4456356, at *7 (S.D. Ala. Nov. 25, 2009) ("[A] principal can be found to have violated a student's right to be free from sexual harassment under supervisory liability theory. Supervisory liability under § 1983 'occurs either when the supervisor personally participates in the alleged constitutional violation or when there is a causal connection between action of the supervising official and the alleged constitutional deprivation.' This causal connection 'may be established and supervisory liability imposed where the supervisor ... [has a] deliberate indifference to constitutional rights.' Hartley v. Parnell, 193 F.3d 1263, 1269 (11th Cir.1999); see also Doe v. Taylor Indep. Sch. Dist., 15 F.3d 443, 452-3 (5th Cir .1994)("a supervisor can be liable for 'gross negligence' or 'deliberate indifference' to violations of their subordinates."); Stoneking v. Bradford Area Sch. Dist., 882 F.2d 720, 725 (3d Cir .1988); Howard v. Bd. of Educ. of Sycamore Cmty. Unit Sch. Dist., 893 F.Supp. 808, 817-8 (N.D.Ill.1995)(holding that the plaintiffs asserted an adequate equal protection claim against a principal because the plaintiff asserted the principal was notified of harassment and intentionally took no action to stop the harassment.).").

Diaz-Martinez v. Miami-Dade County, No. 07-20914-CIV, 2009 WL 2970468, at *15 (S.D. Fla. Sept. 10, 2009) ("Defendants Calvert and Keller argue that Iqbal eliminates 'supervisory liability' claims, thereby foreclosing Plaintiff's claim in Count VI. Defendants Calvert and Keller further contend that they are not being sued for any action taken as a supervisor (such as an order or instruction to the line officers), but, instead, are being sued for their own personal conduct as police officers. As they are already been sued in Counts I-IV for this alleged conduct, their argument continues, Plaintiff should not be permitted to maintain a redundant count for supervisory liability, when he is not suing Defendants Calvert and Keller for any supervisory actions, and when such a count is no longer recognized by the Supreme Court. The Court rejects Defendants Calvert and Keller's reading of Iqbal as overbroad. The above-quoted passage from Iqbal stands for the proposition that a supervisor cannot be vicariously liable solely for the acts of a subordinate. However, there is no indication that the Supreme Court intended to wipe out the well-developed body of law surrounding supervisory liability, and Eleventh Circuit decisions post-Iqbal have given no indication that § 1983 supervisory liability claims are now barred. See Gross v. White, 2009 U.S.App. Lexis 15939 (11th Cir. July 17, 2009) (citing Iqbal and, in another part of the opinion, summarizing Eleventh Circuit case law on supervisory liability claims). Additionally, regarding Defendants' argument that Plaintiff's supervisory liability claim against Defendants Calvert and Keller is redundant because it realleges conduct that they are already being sued for in Counts I through IV, this argument fails because Plaintiff is 'the master of the complaint,' Holmes Group, Inc. v. Vornado Air Circulation Sys., 535 U.S. 826, 831 (2002), and therefore he has the right to assert multiple and alternative theories of liability and have each considered on its own merits.").

Young v. Holmes, No. CV409-118, 2009 WL 2914188, at *2 (S.D. Ga. Sept. 3, 2009) ("Here, Young names Ms. Miles, the head of the medical staff, and McArthur Holmes, the jail's administrator, as defendants. Nowhere in the complaint, however, does he offer any facts showing that they were directly involved in or caused any of the deprivations or injuries Young complains of. His only contact with Holmes was in a letter complaining of the incident, and he sat down with Miles to discuss it. . .Their knowledge of the incidents, standing alone, is an insufficient basis for § 1983 liability. See Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949. Nor does his statement that such 'incidents like the ones stated have become a classic routine practice at' the jail cure the supervisory problem. . . As discussed below, such conclusory statements, unsupported by factual allegations, are simply insufficient to show deliberate indifference on the part of the supervisory staff. See Iqbal, at 1949-50. Thus, Miles and Holmes should be dismissed from this suit.")

Morales v. Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office, No. 09-80636-CIV, 2009 WL 2589489, at *3 (S.D. Fla. Aug. 19, 2009) ("Under appropriate circumstances the failure to adequately train may give rise to a claim cognizable under § 1983, see City of Canton, Ohio v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989). Mere conclusory allegations of failure to train, however, are not enough; and the courts have generally held that there is no affirmative constitutional duty on the part of a supervising public official to train, supervise, or discipline subordinates so as to prevent constitutional torts, except where the supervisor has contemporaneous knowledge of an offending incident or knowledge of a prior pattern of similar incidents, and circumstances under which the supervisor's inaction could be found to have communicated a message of approval to the offending subordinate. . . The Eleventh Circuit has held that nothing less than a showing of gross negligence is required to establish liability for inadequate training. Cannon v. Taylor, 782 F.2d 947, 951 (11 Cir.1986).").

Sutherland v. St. Lawrence, No. CV407-096, 2009 WL 2900270, at *4 n.9 (S.D. Ga. Aug. 17, 2009) (" In Iqbal, the Supreme Court held that 'the term Asupervisory liability'' is a misnomer.... Because vicarious liability is inapplicable to Bivens and § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. . Thus, it rejected the plaintiffs claim that a supervisory official can be liable for purposeful discrimination based only upon his knowledge and acquiescence in the conduct (i.e., something less than purpose). . .The dissent characterized the majority holding as a major break from prior precedent that will severely limit a litigant's ability to maintain a § 1983 or Bivens action against supervisory officials. . . Indeed, it states that the Court has done away with supervisory liability entirely. . . This Court, however, is not convinced that Iqbal presents such a sea change; instead, it is a clarification. Plaintiffs must offer facts showing that defending supervisory officials acted with the same level of culpability as their subordinates when they and their subordinates are charged with violating the same constitutional right. That holding is entirely consistent with past precedent. After all, the deliberate indifference framework has always required more than a supervisor's'mere knowledge' that a constitutional violation has occurred in order to state a viable claim against that official. The plaintiff must allege some facts showing that the supervisory official was, like his subordinate, deliberately indifferent to the plaintiff's constitutional rights. The Iqbal dissent, on the other hand, seeks to impose a new rule. It would mix the culpability standards, allowing a supervisory claim based upon a lesser showing of culpability. Viewed in that light, this Court will continue to rely upon past precedent in making its supervisory liability inquiry.").

Russell v. Douglas County, No. 1:09-CV-20-RWS, 2009 WL 2240387, at *1 n.2 (N.D. Ga. July 27, 2009) ("The principles of supervisory liability that apply in § 1983 cases parallel the principles applied in Bivens actions. . . Writing in dissent, Justice Souter stated that the Supreme Court 'eliminat[ed] Bivens supervisory liability entirely' this past Term. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, __U.S. __, __, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1957, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (Souter, J., dissenting). If Justice Souter fairly characterized the scope of the majority opinion in Iqbal, then it follows that supervisory liability under § 1983 has been 'eliminated' as well, and Russell's claim fails for that reason.").

G. No Qualified Immunity From Compensatory Damages for Local Entities; Absolute Immunity From Punitive Damages

Although an official sued in his or her individual capacity may raise qualified immunity in a suit brought against the individual for damages, see generally Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800 (1982) and Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635 (1987), the Court has held that a local government defendant has no qualified immunity from compensatory damages liability. Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U.S. 622 (1980).

See also Kimberly Regenesis, LLC v. Lee County, 64 F.4th 1253, 1259-60 (11th Cir. 2023) ("The Supreme Court has made clear, for example, that 'an official in a personal-capacity action may ... be able to assert personal immunity defenses' (like quasi-judicial immunity) but that 'these defenses are unavailable' in a suit against a municipality. . . Put another way, '[t]he[ ] defenses of absolute immunity and qualified immunity are the official's personal privileges for his official acts. They do not belong to the governmental entity, and the entity itself is not allowed to assert them.'. . Indeed, courts have widely held that a municipality—or an official sued in his official capacity (which is the equivalent of a suit against the municipality)—cannot assert quasi-judicial immunity. [collecting cases] What all of this means is that any official immunity—including quasi-judicial immunity—belongs to the commissioner, not the county. . . The county conceded as much at oral argument. Because the immunity does not belong to the county, the county is not aggrieved by the district court denying the immunity. And so the denial of quasi-judicial immunity did not give the county standing to bring this interlocutory appeal challenging the denial of the commissioner's alleged immunity."); Barna v. Bd. of Sch. Directors of Panther Valley Sch. Dist., 877 F.3d 136, 142-43, 148-50 (3d Cir. 2017) ("Barna cites to no case of controlling authority from the Supreme Court or our Court supporting his position, and we have found none. To the contrary, we have twice upheld the temporary removal of a disruptive participant from a limited public forum like a school board meeting. . . .Notwithstanding the absence of precedential authority, Barna urges us to recognize that the right to participate in school board meetings despite engaging in a pattern of threatening and disruptive behavior was clearly established based on a handful of district court decisions, only some of which predate the defendants' institution of the ban. . . .Turning to that inquiry, we believe that the circumstances of this case compel our review here. The District Court's legally incorrect holding granting 'judgment in favor of the Defendants on the basis of qualified immunity,'. . . directly contravenes the Supreme Court's holding in Owen. The availability of qualified immunity for a municipal entity is thus precisely the type of 'pure question of law' that commands our attention. . . Holding otherwise would problematically permit the District Court's pure legal error to stand uncorrected. . . .[W]e conclude that there are exceptional circumstances permitting review of the otherwise forfeited issue of the Board's entitlement to immunity. Because the District Court erred in awarding qualified immunity to the Board, we will vacate with respect to the grant of summary judgment in the Board's favor."); Manning v. Cotton, 862 F.3d 663, 671 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Deciding to uphold the district court's denial of qualified immunity for the Officers does not resolve whether the City is entitled to summary judgment on the municipal liability claims. Moreover, this circuit has explicitly held that the question of whether a city 'is liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for failing to train its police force is not "coterminous with, or subsumed in"' the question of whether a city's officers are entitled to qualified immunity because 'resolution of these two issues requires entirely different analyses.'"); Soto v. Gaudett, 862 F.3d 148, 162-63 (2d Cir. 2017) ("The defense of qualified immunity protects a government official, sued for actions he took under color of state law, from claims for damages against him in his individual capacity. That defense does not belong to the governmental entity; the entity itself is not allowed to assert that defense. . . And since a suit against a government official in his official capacity is the equivalent of a suit against the government entity, see generally Kentucky v. Graham, 473 U.S. 159, 165-66 (1985), the defense of qualified immunity is also unavailable to the individual sued in his official capacity[.]"); Mendiola-Martinez v. Arpaio, 836 F.3d 1239, 1249-50 (9th Cir. 2016) ("The district court never determined whether the County Defendants' policies led to a violation of Mendiola-Martinez's rights under Monell. Instead, it ruled that Maricopa County and Sheriff Arpaio were entitled to qualified immunity on the shackling claims and granted summary judgment on that basis. The district court erred in doing so. . . .As permitted under Pearson, . . . the district court began with the second part of this inquiry and found that the constitutional right Mendiola-Martinez was seeking to enforce—to be completely free of restraints during labor and postpartum recovery—was not clearly established when she was in MCSO custody. But as a threshold matter, Maricopa County is not eligible for qualified immunity because counties 'do not enjoy immunity from suit—either absolute or qualified—under § 1983.'. . . Sheriff Arpaio is likewise not eligible for qualified immunity. When a county official like Sheriff Arpaio is sued in his official capacity, the claims against him are claims against the county. . . Mendiola-Martinez brought this action against Sheriff Arpaio in his official capacity as the person who 'oversees the operations of the Maricopa County jails and is responsible for and accountable for ultimate decisions of the Office.' She does not contend that Sheriff Arpaio is personally liable for the alleged constitutional violations, nor does she allege that he is liable as a supervisor under a vicarious liability theory. . . Accordingly, Sheriff Arpaio, like Maricopa County, is not eligible for qualified immunity and awarding summary judgment on that basis was improper"); Capra v. Cook County Bd. of Review, 733 F.3d 705, 712 (7th Cir. 2013) ("Given Monell and the history of the Civil Rights Act, extending absolute immunity to the Board here would be a dramatic expansion of immunity that would severely limit the scope of section 1983 further than Congress intended and further than the Supreme Court ever has. Insulating municipalities from suit on a theory of quasi-judicial immunity when a policy, custom, or policymaker has violated the Constitution would, as the Supreme Court noted in Monell, drain that important decision of its meaning. . . The Board is not protected by quasi-judicial absolute immunity [for decision revoking property tax reduction]."); Beedle v. Wilson, 422 F.3d 1059, 1068 (10th Cir. 2005) ("The Hospital nonetheless contends it is not liable because at the time it filed its state suit and opposed Mr. Beedle's various motions to dismiss, the Hospital had a good-faith basis for believing it was not a governmental entity for § 1983 purposes and thus was not precluded from bringing a libel action. . . This contention approximates a qualified immunity defense in that the Hospital claims a reasonable official would not have known its actions violated a clearly established federal right. . . Such an argument is misplaced because a governmental entity may not assert qualified immunity from a suit for damages. . . A qualified immunity defense is only available to parties sued in their individual capacity."); Langford v. City of Atlantic City, 235 F.3d 845, 850 (3d Cir. 2000) ("[W]e are satisfied and accordingly hold, as do Monell and Carver, that a municipality (in this case, Atlantic City) can be held liable for its unconstitutional acts in formulating and passing its annual budget."); Berkley v. Common Council of City of Charleston, 63 F.3d 295, 302 (4th Cir. 1995) (en banc) (holding "that a municipality is not entitled to an absolute immunity for the actions of its legislature in suits brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983."). Accord Carver v. Foerster, 102 F.3d 96, 105 (3d Cir. 1996) ("We know of no circuit that currently accepts the doctrine of municipal legislative immunity under Section 1983."); Goldberg v. Town of Rocky Hill, 973 F.2d 70, 74 (2d Cir.1992); Woodall v. County of Wayne, No. 17-13707, 2020 WL 373073, at *6, *8 (E.D. Mich. Jan. 23, 2020) ("[I]f Defendants continue to defend individual suits by invoking qualified immunity, plaintiffs may never even be able to reach the question of whether an underlying constitutional violation occurred unless they also prove Monell liability. . . The Wayne County Sherriff's alleged Monell liability may very well be the lynch pin of all potential Wayne County illegal strip search cases. Answering the question once, for everyone, is the most efficient course of action. . . . Plaintiffs' proposed class, and their four proposed subclasses, will be certified as for allegations against Wayne County and the Wayne County Sherriff under Monell."); Kessler v. City of Providence, 167 F. Supp.2d 482, 490, 491 (D.R.I. 2001) ("In this case, Plaintiff is not seeking damages against Defendants Prignano and Partington; instead she seeks one day's wages from the Police Department that she lost from the suspension. Therefore, Defendants can not assert the doctrine of qualified immunity as an affirmative defense. For this reason, the individual Defendants' motion for summary judgment is denied; and therefore, the Defendant City of Providence's motion to dismiss, which is inexorably tied to Prignano and Parrington's motion for summary judgment, is also denied.").

See also Campos v. Fresno Deputy Sheriff's Association, No. 1:18-CV-1660 AWI EPG, 2021 WL 1577816, at *4, *8, *10 & n.7 (E.D. Cal. Apr. 22, 2021) ("Together, Owen, Leatherman, and Evers can be read as standing for the proposition that, in order to redress constitutional wrongs, a municipality will be held liable for constitutional injuries caused by its practice, policy, or custom, irrespective of its officers' ability to assert qualified immunity and irrespective of any good faith reliance on state statutes. This proposition would seem to undercut application of a good faith affirmative defense to a municipality. Recognizing the good faith defense for a municipality could negate Owen's balancing and goal of ensuring the availability of compensation for injuries caused by municipal policies and practices. To the Court's knowledge, and as confirmed by the parties' briefing, no court in a reasoned decision has extended the good faith affirmative defense to municipalities. In light of Owen, Leatherman, and Evers, until the Supreme Court or the Ninth Circuit holds otherwise, this Court cannot hold that the County is entitled to assert the good faith affirmative defense. . . . In sum, after applying Harper, the Court concludes that Janus is to be applied retroactively. . . .The parties have been unable to find any cases post-Janus in which a municipality like the County has been held liable for pre-Janus conduct. . . . [T]he law is unsettled in the Ninth Circuit with respect to a municipality's liability under § 1983 when the municipality is following or acting in accordance with state law. Some courts find that there is no liability when the municipality follows a non-discretionary mandatory state law because the municipality did not make a policy decision. [citing cases] Some courts find or suggest that following state law, even if a non-discretionary, mandatory, state law duty is involved, does not relieve a municipality of liability. [citing cases] Other courts have noted that the issue has not been definitively settled. . . Within the Ninth Circuit, at least, part of the disagreement involves how to interpret Evers. Given the divide, the Court will not decide the issue without more in depth briefing from the parties. . . . [U]ntil further proceedings occur, the Court cannot hold that the fact that Chandavong and Her are challenging the taking of vacation hours is immaterial. In sum, this appears to be a unique case. The ultimate resolution of the County's liability (if any) will have to await further proceedings. . . In light of the arguments made in connection with the FDSA's motion to dismiss the SAC and the supplemental briefing received, the Court will not dismiss the third cause of action against the County for vacation hours involuntarily taken from Chandavong and Her pre-Janus when they were not members of the FDSA. . . .The Court at this time is not resolving the question of whether the County was under a mandatory duty, or what the effect of a non-discretionary mandatory duty on the County would be for purposes of § 1983. The Court is only noting the potential issues surrounding the proper classification of the vacation hours taken.")

But see Allen v. Santa Clara County Correctional Peace Officers Ass'n, 38 F.4th 68, 70-75 (9th Cir. 2022) ("Although left undecided in Danielson, that case preordains our decision here. In Danielson, we held that a union may assert a good faith defense in an action to recover retroactive agency fees if the union relied on binding Supreme Court precedent and state law in assessing the fees. . . Private parties may 'rely on judicial pronouncements of what the law is, without exposing themselves to potential liability for doing so.'. . And precedent recognizes that municipalities are generally liable in the same way as private corporations in § 1983 actions. . . It therefore follows that the rule announced in Danielson for unions also applies to municipalities. We thus hold that municipalities are entitled to a good faith defense to a suit for a refund of mandatory agency fees under § 1983. . . . Contrary to the Employees' contention, the Supreme Court did not rule out such a defense for municipalities in Owen. In Owen, the Court rejected 'a construction of § 1983 that would accord municipalities a qualified immunity for their good-faith constitutional violations.'. . In explaining its rationale, the Court stated that the 'municipality may not assert the good faith of its officers or agents as a defense to liability under § 1983.'. . The Employees take this statement to mean that a municipality may not assert a good faith defense. We do not read Owen so broadly. When speaking of 'good faith,' the Court discussed it only in terms of qualified immunity, not the affirmative defense of good faith at issue here. . . . The takeaway is that Owen was a case about qualified immunity, so its references to 'good faith' were made only in that context, not to the affirmative defense of good faith available to private litigants. . . . At the time, the County acted under a presumptively valid state law permitting the payroll deductions. . . And because unions may assert a good faith defense in an action to recover these compulsory fees as a matter of law, . . . so too may municipalities. We decline to hold municipalities to a different standard than we held unions in Danielson. . . . Because, under Danielson, unions get a good faith defense to a claim for a refund of pre-Janus agency fees, . . . and municipalities' tort liability for proprietary actions is the same as private parties, . . . the County is also entitled to a good faith defense to retrospective § 1983 liability for collecting pre-Janus agency fees.")

While punitive damages may be awarded against individual defendants under § 1983, see Smith v. Wade, 461 U.S. 30 (1983), local governments are immune from punitive damages. City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, 453 U.S. 247 (1981). Note, however, that "City of Newport does not establish a federal policy prohibiting a city from paying punitive damages when the city finds its employees to have acted without malice and when the city deems it in its own best interest to pay." Cornwell v. City of Riverside, 896 F.2d 398, 399 (9th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 497 U.S. 1026 (1990).. See also Trevino v. Gates, 99 F.3d 911, 921 (9th Cir. 1996) ("Councilmembers' vote to pay punitive damages does not amount to ratification [of constitutional violation].").

See also City of Hartford v. Edwards, 946 F.3d 631, 636 (2d Cir. 2020) ("Edwards also argues that, because excessive force is not a specific intent based claim, see Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386, 397 (1989), the jury did not need to determine whether Officer May's conduct was wilful or wanton in order to award compensatory damages. This highlights the fatal defect in Edwards's reading of the statute. The problem is not what the jury needed to find to award compensatory damages; the problem is that the jury expressly found that Officer May's conduct was 'done maliciously or wantonly or [in] reckless disregard or indifference to the rights' of Edwards. . . Such a finding is all that is necessary to trigger section 7-465's exception for wilful or wanton conduct under the facts of this case. Finally, Edwards argues that excusing municipalities from paying any damages on behalf of their employees when punitive damages are awarded would be an absurd result. This is an argument better directed to the Connecticut legislature, which has the authority to draft and amend statutes. But even as a policy matter, Edwards's argument is unpersuasive. Edwards himself recognizes that not all excessive force claims are predicated on wilful or wanton conduct. . . Moreover, there remains a multitude of situations in which plaintiffs can seek assumption of liability under section 7-465. For example, had the jury not awarded punitive damages, had Edwards not sought punitive damages, or had Edwards brought multiple claims against Officer May and the jury awarded punitive damages for one claim and not for another, this would have been a different case. Edwards exercised his right to seek punitive damages, which necessarily put the wilful or wanton nature of Officer May's actions at issue. The jury agreed with Edwards that Officer May's conduct caused him personal injury for which it awarded compensatory damages and that the nature of that same conduct required a punitive damages award. It is for this reason that Hartford need not pay on behalf of Officer May."); Chestnut v. City of Lowell, 305 F.3d 18, 21, 22 (1st Cir. 2002) (en banc) (vacating award of punitive damages against City, remanding and giving plaintiff option of having new trial on issue of actual damages against City); Schultzen v. Woodbury Central Community School District, 187 F. Supp.2d 1099, 1128 (N.D. Iowa 2002) (After an exhaustive survey of the case law and a comprehensive discussion of the issue, the court concludes : 'In light of the well-settled presumption of municipal immunity from punitive damages and the absence of any indicia of congressional intent to the contrary, the court finds that punitive damages are unavailable against local governmental entities under Title IX."); Saldana-Sanchez v. Lopez-Gerena, 256 F.3d 1, 12, 13 (1st Cir. 2001) (discussing cases where waiver of City of Newport immunity has been found).

But see Moore v. LaSalle Management Company, L.L.C., 41 F.4th 493, 509-13 (5th Cir. 2022) ("Plaintiffs also contend that they raised fact disputes on punitive damages against the Corporate Defendants and all the Individual Defendants, except for Mitchell. The district disagreed and concluded that punitive damages under § 1983 aren't available against the Corporate Defendants as a matter of law. We agree with Plaintiffs. . . To begin, the parties dispute whether the Corporate Defendants are immune from punitive damages under § 1983. The Corporate Defendants concede that private corporations typically are not immune. What they argue, though, is that private prison-management companies are. Why? Because private prison-management companies are 'engaged in the performance of acts for the public benefit.' The district court agreed with the Corporate Defendants. But we agree with Plaintiffs: Private companies may be held liable for punitive damages under § 1983 whether they performed acts for the public benefit or not. The parties agree that the Supreme Court's decision in City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc. governs this question. . . There the Court faced a question of statutory interpretation: When Congress enacted § 1983, did it abolish common-law municipal immunity from punitive damages? . . . The Court answered no. . . .Municipalities had 'well established' immunity from punitive damages at common law, said the Court. . . And nothing about § 1983 showed Congress intended to abrogate it. . . Therefore, municipal immunity from punitive damages survived § 1983. The Corporate Defendants, though, can't get past City of Newport's first step. They cannot point to a well-established history of common-law immunity from punitive damages because it doesn't exist. Indeed, the Corporate Defendants do not point to a single case showing that any private corporation had a common-law immunity from punitive damages—whether it was 'engaged in the performance of acts for the public benefit,' or not. . . . The district court erred in concluding that the Corporate Defendants were immune from punitive damages. Nothing supports that they would have been immune at common law. We cannot create that immunity for them now."); Revilla v. Glanz, 8 F.Supp.3d 1336, 1342, 1343 (N.D. Okla. 2014) ("The specific question presented by CHC's argument is whether the Court's holding in City of Newport should be extended to preclude recovery of punitive damages against a private entity such as CHC. As noted, CHC has presented no legal authority directly on point, and plaintiffs cite a few authorities in which district courts determined that punitive damages may be recovered against a private entity in a § 1983 suit. [collecting cases] Based upon all of these authorities, the Court is unable to apply the punitive damages immunity afforded municipalities under the City of Newport case to CHC, which is a private corporation. The reasoning of City of Newport seems largely hinged upon the fact that the traditional purposes of punitive damages (punishment and deterrence) would not be served by imposing punitive damages upon local governments, because taxpayers would foot the bill, governments would likely have to increase taxes or reduce public services, and such an award would place the local government's financial integrity in serious risk. . . Those same purposes do not apply to a private corporation. Accordingly, CHC's motion to dismiss the punitive damages claim is denied at this time.")

The Supreme Court had granted certiorari to address the following question: "Whether, when a decedent's death is alleged to have resulted from a deprivation of federal rights occurring in Alabama, the Alabama Wrongful Death Act, Section 6-5-410 ("la. 1975), governs the recovery by the representative of the decedent's estate under 42 U.S.C. Section 1983?" In City of Tarrant v. Jefferson, 682 So.2d 29 (1996), cert. dismissed, 118 S. Ct. 481 (1997), plaintiff sued individually and as a personal representative for the estate of his mother, alleging that Tarrant firefighters, based upon a policy of selectively denying fire protection to minorities, purposefully refused to attempt to rescue and revive his mother. On appeal from an interlocutory order in which the trial court held that the question of the survivability of Ms. Jefferson's cause of action for compensatory damages under section 1983 was governed by federal common law rather than by Alabama's Wrongful Death Act, the Supreme Court of Alabama reversed, holding that Alabama law governed plaintiff's claim. Under the Alabama wrongful death statute, compensatory damages are not available. The statute allows only punitive damages.

Compare Estate of Gilliam ex rel. Waldroup v. City of Prattville, 639 F.3d 1041, 1048 (11th Cir. 2011) ("Gilliam, who died seven hours after the use of force, could not file a § 1983 claim that would have survived under Ala.Code § 6-5-462. At the same time, Gilliam's estate could not assert a § 1983 claim through the wrongful death statute, Ala.Code. § 6-5-410, because it could not produce admissible evidence that the use of force caused Gilliam's death. This case is, therefore, an unusual one, where application of Alabama law does not provide for survivorship. But, just because applying Alabama law causes the Estate to lose in this unusual case does not mean Alabama law is generally inconsistent with federal law. . . . And, with no inconsistency between Alabama law and federal law, we cannot, as the dissent proposes, craft a highly specific federal common law rule of survivorship that applies to the unique facts of this case. . . .Because the Alabama survivorship statute is not inconsistent with federal law, we must apply the statute as written to the facts of this case.") with Estate of Gilliam ex rel. Waldroup v. City of Prattville, 639 F.3d 1041, 1050 (11th Cir. 2011) (Martin, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent from the Majority's opinion because I cannot agree that there is 'no inconsistency between Ala.Code § 6-5-462 and federal law.' To the contrary, I would conclude that the Alabama survivorship statute, to the extent that it permits the abatement of tort actions for wrongful conduct that immediately contributes to a person's death, is inconsistent with both the abuse prevention and compensation goals underlying and embodied in 42 U.S.C. § 1983.").

A municipality may still be subject to Monell liability where the individual officer is able to invoke qualified immunity. See, e.g., Palmerin v. City of Riverside, 794 F.2d 1409, 1415 (9th Cir. 1986).

Courts sometimes confuse the consequences that flow from two very different determinations. If the court or jury concludes that there is no underlying constitutional violation, then City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796 (1986), would dictate no liability on the part of any defendant. (See discussion of "Derivative Nature of Liability," infra) If, however, the determination is that there is no liability on the part of the individual official because of the applicability of the second prong of qualified immunity, the law was not clearly established, it does not necessarily follow that there has been no constitutional violation and that the municipality cannot be liable.

See, e.g., Meier v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 934 F.3d 824, 829 (8th Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 2566 (2020) ("St. Louis also argues that regardless of its policy, it cannot be held liable because Meier has not brought claims against any individual SLMPD employee. It relies on Whitney v. City of St. Louis, 887 F.3d 857 (8th Cir. 2018), in which we stated that 'absent a constitutional violation by a city employee, there can be no § 1983 or Monell liability for the City.'. . This argument misreads Whitney. Municipal liability requires a constitutional violation by a municipal employee, but it does not require the plaintiff to bring suit against the individual employee. See Webb v. City of Maplewood, 889 F.3d 483, 487–88 (8th Cir.) ("[O]ur case law has been clear ... that although there must be an unconstitutional act by a municipal employee before a municipality can be held liable, there need not be a finding that a municipal employee is liable in his or her individual capacity." (cleaned up)), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 139 S. Ct. 389, 202 L.Ed.2d 289 (2018). Assuming that the seizure of Meier's truck violated her constitutional rights—an assumption that St. Louis does not dispute at this juncture—Meier has adduced evidence sufficient to establish St. Louis's liability for that violation."); Horton by Horton v. City of Santa Maria, 915 F.3d 592, 603 (9th Cir. 2019) ("When a municipal defendant's motion for summary judgment is 'inextricably intertwined' with issues presented in the individual officers' qualified immunity appeal, this court may exercise pendent party appellate jurisdiction. . . . In this context, the 'inextricably intertwined' concept is a narrow one. . . . Here, appellate resolution of the collateral appeal does not 'necessarily' resolve the pendent claim, for several reasons. . . First, as we have explained, our qualified immunity determination with respect to Officer Brice rests solely on the 'clearly established' law prong; we do not reach the question of whether Officer Brice's actions gave rise to a constitutional violation."); Evans v. City of Helena-West Helena, Arkansas, 912 F.3d 1145, 1146 (8th Cir. 2019) ("While a municipality cannot be held liable without an unconstitutional act by a municipal employee, there is no requirement that the plaintiff establish that an employee who acted unconstitutionally is personally liable. . . So even if the clerk personally has absolute or qualified immunity from suit and damages, that immunity does not foreclose an action against the City if the complaint adequately alleges an unconstitutional policy or custom and an unconstitutional act by the clerk as a city employee."); Bustillos v. El Paso Cty. Hosp. Dist., 891 F.3d 214, 222 n.6 (5th Cir. 2018) ("In dismissing the county liability claims, the district court stated that it had found the Doctors and Nurses 'did not violate the constitution.' This is not our understanding of the district court's qualified immunity analysis, which found 'the second qualified immunity prong dispositive.' Granting of qualified immunity on the 'clearly-established' prong is not the same as holding that no constitutional violation occurred. That would conflate the two prongs of qualified immunity. Thus, a grant of qualified immunity based on the 'clearly-established' prong does not necessarily negate the constitutional violation element of a county liability claim, as the district court erroneously assumed."); Webb v. City of Maplewood, 889 F.3d 483, 486-87 (8th Cir. 2018) ("[E]ven if we accepted the City's premise that its officials all enjoy personal immunity from suit, it hardly follows that they did not engage in any unlawful acts or that the City is thereby immune as well. Whether the challenged acts occurred, whether they were unlawful, and whether the City is liable for them under Monell v. Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658, 98 S.Ct. 2018, 56 L.Ed.2d 611 (1978), would still be open questions. . . .We have not always been as clear as we could have in discussing the relationship between individual and municipal liability. As the City notes, we have stated in the past that it is 'a general rule' that 'for municipal liability to attach, individual liability first must be found on an underlying substantive claim.' See McCoy v. City of Monticello, 411 F.3d 920, 922 (8th Cir. 2005). But in McCoy we used that language to explain why a city could not be held liable 'on either an unconstitutional policy or custom theory or on a failure to train or supervise theory' once it has been determined that the underlying official conduct was 'objectively reasonable' and thus did not violate the plaintiff's rights. . . In McCoy we cited six cases that allegedly applied the 'general rule'; in five of them we simply held that because the challenged official conduct was not unconstitutional, the municipality had nothing to be liable for. . . . [I]t is now clear that the absolute immunity of its policymakers does not shield a city from liability for its policies. . . .[D]espite our occasional use of overbroad language, our case law has been clear since Praprotnik that although 'there must be an unconstitutional act by a municipal employee' before a municipality can be held liable, . . there 'need not be a finding that a municipal employee is liable in his or her individual capacity.'"); Moya v. Garcia, 895 F.3d 1229, 1240 (10th Cir. 2018) (McHugh, J., concurring in the result in part and dissenting in part), (amended opinion on denial of rehearing en banc), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 1323 (2019) ("I would reverse the district court's order dismissing Plaintiffs' claims against the County. But because the Defendants did not violate clearly established law, I would hold that the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity and, on that basis alone, partially affirm the district court's order."); Groden v. City of Dallas , Texas, 826 F.3d 280, 283 n.2 (5th Cir. 2016) ("The city argues we need not reach the merits of Groden's appeal because the jury verdict in favor of Officer Gorka blocks Groden from appealing the dismissal of his suit against Dallas for the same constitutional violation. The city points out that, according to Groden's complaint, Gorka was the only officer who carried out Dallas' allegedly unconstitutional policy. Thus, if a jury found that Gorka did not violate the Constitution, then Dallas could not have violated the Constitution through Gorka. Under the city's reasoning, the jury verdict renders the dismissal of Groden's claims against the city correct—even if the dismissal had been erroneous when it occurred. See City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796 (1986) (per curiam). As we have said above, the city's argument is flawed: we do not know whether the jury found that Gorka acted constitutionally when arresting Groden. The jury was charged on both the constitutional issue and on qualified immunity and subsequently rendered a general verdict. We cannot know which issue the jury found to be decisive. Heller's holding applies only when 'no issue of qualified immunity was presented to the jury.'. . Accordingly, the jury's verdict for Gorka does not prevent Groden from appealing the dismissal of his claims against Dallas."); Askins v. Doe No. 1, 727 F.3d 248, 253-55 (2d Cir. 2013) ("In dismissing Askins's claim against the City, the district court relied on the proposition 'that the City cannot be liable under Monell where Plaintiff cannot establish a violation of his constitutional rights.'. . The court explained: 'All of the alleged constitutional violations in this case are either time-barred or barred by the doctrine of qualified immunity. Therefore, it cannot be said that any allegedly illegal City policy caused Plaintiff a constitutional remediable injury, and no Monell claim lies against the City.'. . .This conclusion reflects a misunderstanding of the relationship between the liability of individual actors and municipal liability for purposes of Monell. The court was entirely correct in stating that the City 'cannot be liable under Monell where Plaintiff cannot establish a violation of his constitutional rights.'. . Unless a plaintiff shows that he has been the victim of a federal law tort committed by persons for whose conduct the municipality can be responsible, there is no basis for holding the municipality liable. Monell does not create a stand-alone cause of action under which a plaintiff may sue over a governmental policy, regardless of whether he suffered the infliction of a tort resulting from the policy. Liability under section 1983 is imposed on the municipality when it has promulgated a custom or policy that violates federal law and, pursuant to that policy, a municipal actor has torturously [sic] injured the plaintiff. . . Establishing the liability of the municipality requires a showing that the plaintiff suffered a tort in violation of federal law committed by the municipal actors and, in addition, that their commission of the tort resulted from a custom or policy of the municipality. . .It does not follow, however, that the plaintiff must obtain a judgment against the individual tortfeasors in order to establish the liability of the municipality. It suffices to plead and prove against the municipality that municipal actors committed the tort against the plaintiff and that the tort resulted from a policy or custom of the municipality. In fact, the plaintiff need not sue the individual tortfeasors at all, but may proceed solely against the municipality. . .Where the plaintiff does proceed against both the municipal actors alleged to have inflicted the tort and the municipality that promulgated the offensive policy, the plaintiff's failure to secure a judgment against the individual actors would, indeed, preclude a judgment against the municipality if the ruling in favor of the individual defendants resulted from the plaintiff's failure to show that they committed the alleged tort. But where the plaintiff has brought a timely suit against the municipality and has properly pleaded and proved that he was the victim of the federal law tort committed by municipal actors and that the tort resulted from an illegal policy or custom of the municipality, the fact that the suit against the municipal actors was untimely, or that the plaintiff settled with them, or abandoned the suit against them, is irrelevant to the liability of the municipality. By the same token, the entitlement of the individual municipal actors to qualified immunity because at the time of their actions there was no clear law or precedent warning them that their conduct would violate federal law is also irrelevant to the liability of the municipality. . . . The doctrine that confers qualified immunity on individual state or municipal actors is designed to ensure that the persons carrying out governmental responsibilities will perform their duties boldly and energetically without having to worry that their actions, which they reasonably believed to be lawful at the time, will later subject them to liability on the basis of subsequently developed legal doctrine. . . That policy, however, has no bearing on the liability of municipalities. Municipalities are held liable if they adopt customs or policies that violate federal law and result in tortious violation of a plaintiff's rights, regardless of whether it was clear at the time of the adoption of the policy or at the time of the tortious conduct that such conduct would violate the plaintiff's rights. . . To rule, as the district court did, that the City of New York escapes liability for the tortious conduct of its police officers because the individual officers are entitled to qualified immunity would effectively extend the defense of qualified immunity to municipalities, contravening the Supreme Court's holding in Owen. The district court did not rule that Askins failed in his amended complaint to allege that he was the victim of a constitutional tort committed by municipal actors, or that he failed to allege that the tort resulted from an unconstitutional custom or policy of the City, or that the suit against the City was untimely or otherwise defective. So far as the court has ruled up to now with respect to the suit against the City, the court has identified no deficiency in the plaintiff's amended pleading. . . Accordingly, there was no basis for dismissing the complaint against the City."); International Ground Transportation v. Mayor and City Council of Ocean City, 475 F.3d 214, 220 (4th Cir. 2007) ("In this case, the verdict form shows that the jury found that the City deprived IGT of procedural and substantive due process but that the individual defendants did not. The City argues that these findings trigger application of the Heller rule and require that judgment as a matter of law be entered in its favor. However, the jury was instructed that it could find the individual defendants not liable based on qualified immunity. Thus, the jury could have found that constitutional violations were committed but that the individual defendants were entitled to immunity. Indeed, this is the only way the jury's verdict may be read consistently, and we must 'harmonize seemingly inconsistent verdicts if there is any reasonable way to do so.'. . The jury was specifically instructed that it could find the individual defendants not liable based on qualified immunity. However, the verdict form submitted to the jury allowed the jury to find that the individual defendants committed constitutional violations but were entitled to qualified immunity only by checking the 'No' answers to the questions asked regarding the individual defendants (e.g. 'Do you find that the following persons deprived White's Taxi of procedural due process?"). The City, in fact, conceded at oral argument that there was no way for the jury to find that qualified immunity applied except by answering 'No' to the questions asking whether the individual defendants had committed constitutional violations. Moreover, because the jury made specific findings that the City had committed constitutional violations, the only way to read the jury's verdict consistently is to read the questions asked of the individual defendants as encompassing qualified immunity. As we are required 'to determine whether a jury verdict can be sustained, on any reasonable theory,'. . . we must conclude that the language of the verdict form permitted the jury to find that the individual defendants committed constitutional violations but were entitled to qualified immunity."); Roberts v. City of Shreveport, 397 F.3d 287, 292 (5th Cir. 2005) ("Plaintiffs allege that Chief Prator failed to train Officer Rivet sufficiently. Chief Prator responds that this issue is foreclosed in his favor because the jury verdict in Officer Rivet's trial found Rivet's conduct objectively reasonable. Chief Prator is incorrect. The jury, after all, found that Officer Rivet violated Carter's constitutional rights, even though it also accepted Officer Rivet's defense that his conduct was objectively reasonable. Under such circumstances, Chief Prator remains vulnerable to a failure to train claim because the plaintiffs may be able to demonstrate that by his failure to train or supervise adequately, he both caused Carter's injuries and acted deliberately indifferent to violations of Fourth Amendment rights by Shreveport police officers, including Officer Rivet. . . . Nevertheless, even assuming that lack of training 'caused' Carter's injuries, the plaintiffs have not provided sufficient evidence of either Prator's failure to train (the first requirement) or his deliberate indifference to Carter's constitutional rights (the third requirement) to create a triable fact issue. . . A plaintiff seeking recovery under a failure to train or supervise rationale must prove that the police chief failed to control an officer's 'known propensity for the improper use of force.' . . Moreover, to prove deliberate indifference, a plaintiff must demonstrate 'at least a pattern of similar violations arising from training that is so clearly inadequate as to be obviously likely to result in a constitutional violation.'"); Scott v. Clay County, Tenn., 205 F.3d 867, 879 (6th Cir.2000) ("[I]f the legal requirements of municipal or county civil rights liability are satisfied, qualified immunity will not automatically excuse a municipality or county from constitutional liability, even where the municipal or county actors were personally absolved by qualified immunity, if those agents in fact had invaded the plaintiff's constitutional rights."[emphasis in original, footnote omitted]); Myers v. Oklahoma County Board of County Commissioners, 151 F.3d 1313, 1317-18 (10th Cir. 1998) ("[I]f a jury returns a general verdict for an individual officer premised on qualified immunity, there is no inherent inconsistency in allowing suit against the municipality to proceed since the jury's verdict has not answered the question whether the officer actually committed the alleged constitutional violation. . . In this case, the defendants moved for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity, but the district court denied that motion. . . The defendants may have attempted to raise the issue at trial as well. . . On the record before us, we are unable to determine the grounds for the jury's decision. The jury verdict form was a general one. The form instructed the jury only to declare the defendants 'liable' or 'not liable' on the use of excessive force claim. In addition, neither party placed a copy of the jury instruction in the record. Therefore, it is possible that the jury based its decision on qualified immunity. With that ambiguity lurking, the Heller rule does not foreclose the suit against the County."); Hinton v. City of Elwood, 997 F.2d 774, 783 (10th Cir. 1993) ("An individual municipal officer may . . . be entitled to qualified immunity . . . because the officer's conduct did not violate the law. When a finding of qualified immunity is predicated on this latter basis, such a finding is equivalent to a decision on the merits of the plaintiff's claim. ... In such a case, a finding of qualified immunity may preclude the imposition of any municipal liability."); Doe v. Sullivan County, Tenn., 956 F.2d 545, 554 (6th Cir. 1992) ("To read Heller as implying that a municipality is immune from liability regardless of whether the plaintiff suffered a constitutional deprivation simply because an officer was entitled to qualified immunity would . . . represent a misconstruction of its holding and rationale."). Adkins v. City of New York, 143 F.Supp.3d 134, 141-42 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("The defense of qualified immunity is, however, unavailable to one defendant in this case, the City of New York (the 'City'). . . . Qualified immunity of individual actors is irrelevant to Monell liability. Askins v. Doe No. 1, 727 F.3d 248, 254 (2d Cir.2013). Monell liability does require that plaintiff adequately allege a policy or pattern of misconduct. . . . Plaintiff has alleged that both eyewitness accounts and internal police documents show the existence of a specific pattern of misconduct, viz., handcuffing transgender detainees to railings, and further show official inaction in the face of this pattern. Plaintiff claims that an internal NYPD recommendation called for changes in the department's treatment of transgender people, but the NYPD chain of command took no steps in response to it. . . . The Court does not and need not take any position on the admissibility or ultimate sufficiency of plaintiff's possible evidence. It asks only whether plaintiff has 'nudged [his] claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.'. . He has done so."); Bell v. City of New York, No. 13–CV–5317 (JG)(VMS), 2013 WL 6268083, *3 n.1 (E.D.N.Y. Dec. 4, 2013) ("It appears that, in addition to asserting qualified immunity on behalf of the officers, the City may also be arguing that because the officers should be afforded qualified immunity, the claims against the City should also be dismissed. If the City is indeed making that argument, it is mistaken. It is true that a municipality cannot be liable under Monell unless the plaintiff is harmed by the illegal act of a municipal employee. But a municipality may be liable for adopting an illegal policy or custom even though the individuals implementing that policy or custom are immune because none of them violated clearly established law. See generally Askins v. Doe No. 1, 727 F.3d 248, 253–54 (2d Cir.2013). A contrary rule would effectively extend qualified immunity from individuals to municipalities."); Pinter v. City of New York, 976 F.Supp.2d 539, 552-70 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) ("The Second Circuit held in Pinter II that the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from Pinter's false arrest and malicious prosecution claims because even according to Pinter's allegations, 'the officers had arguable probable cause to arrest Pinter' for prostitution. . .The Second Circuit left open the question, however, of whether the individual defendants had actual probable cause. . . .Drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Pinter, a jury could find that Pinter's arrest was not based on probable cause. This is not to question the Second Circuit's conclusion that 'UC 31107 could have reasonably believed that Pinter had agreed to be compensated in exchange for allowing UC 31107 to act on his desire to perform oral sex on Pinter.'. . Rather, the facts of this case, viewed in the light most favorable to Pinter, illustrate the distinction between arguable probable cause and actual probable cause. On the one hand, applying the standard for qualified immunity as settled by the Second Circuit's Summary Order, it would be inaccurate to say that UC 31107 was ' "plainly incompetent"' or must have ' "knowingly violate[d] the law"' in concluding that Pinter had agreed to engage in prostitution. . .Because UC 31107 had arguable probable cause for an arrest, he is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .On the other hand, declaring Pinter's arrest—according to his version of events—to be based on actual probable cause would dilute the Fourth Amendment's protection of individual liberty from unreasonable government intrusion. An officer does not have probable cause to believe a person is a prostitute simply because the person remained silent after being inexplicably offered a fee for what he expected to be consensual, gratuitous sex. . .To allow the police to arrest such a person for prostitution—moments later, and without so much as an attempt at confirmation—would invite abuses. . . . Because a reasonable jury could find that UC 31107 lacked probable cause for Pinter's arrest, Pinter could establish at trial that he was subject to a violation of his constitutional right to be free from unreasonable seizure under the Fourth Amendment. This conclusion leads to a dilemma. The Second Circuit held in its Summary Order that 'Pinter's Monell claims are derivative of his claims against the individual defendants, and therefore any claims dismissed as against the individual defendants must also be dismissed as against the City.'. . Accordingly, the Second Circuit ordered that this Court 'shall not permit the plaintiff to pursue Monell claims derived from either the false arrest or malicious prosecution claims.'. . In a subsequent, published opinion, Askins v. Doe No. 1, however, the Second Circuit held that 'the entitlement of ... individual municipal actors to qualified immunity because at the time of their actions there was no clear law or precedent warning them that their conduct would violate federal law is ... irrelevant to the liability of the municipality.'. . .Askins conflicts with Pinter II. The latter holds that where a plaintiff has suffered a constitutional tort at the hands of an officer who is entitled to qualified immunity, the City is immune from a Monell claim based on the tort; the former holds the opposite. . . . Defendants attempt to reconcile the holdings of Askins and Pinter II by arguing that Pinter II held not only that the arresting officers had arguable probable cause, but that they had actual probable cause, and thus that Pinter suffered no constitutional injury. . . Defendants' interpretation is not plausible. If the Second Circuit had intended to make a holding that the arresting officers had probable cause—a holding with significant implications for the Fourth Amendment—it would have done so explicitly, rather than through a debatable inference. In addition, the Second Circuit would have analyzed probable cause, not arguable probable cause, and would not have used the redundant qualifier 'arguable' when characterizing its holding. . . . Because of the conflict between Pinter II and Askins, this Court cannot proceed without violating one of the two Second Circuit authorities. Either this Court must disregard the law of the case as articulated in the Pinter II, as well as the explicit directions with which Pinter II concludes, or this Court must disregard Askins. While this Court is extremely wary of failing to comply with an explicit directive of the Second Circuit, it is equally wary of failing to adhere to a subsequent and more authoritative statement of Second Circuit law. Askins is a published opinion that extensively analyzed this issue, while the unpublished decision in Pinter II has no precedential effect beyond this immediate case. . .Because Askins provides a thorough, binding, directly on-point analysis that conflicts with the unpublished decision in Pinter II, I follow Askins and conclude that the Second Circuit's grant of qualified immunity to the individual defendants does not bar Pinter from bringing Monell claims against the City that derive from his arrest having lacked probable cause. . . In particular, the Second Circuit's qualified immunity finding does not by itself bar Pinter's false arrest and malicious prosecution claims against the City. A reasonable jury could find based on the record evidence that the City had a custom of carrying out arrests like Pinter's, and that the City was deliberately indifferent to the obvious risk of arresting gay men for prostitution without probable cause. . . . Pinter offers evidence that could support a finding that the NYPD engaged in a pattern of arresting gay men without probable cause for prostitution at video stores, and especially at the Blue Door. . . .Pinter also cites numerous excerpts from depositions and other evidence tending to show that the NYPD failed to train undercover officers to avoid arresting gay men for prostitution without probable cause based on a misunderstanding of the circumstances. . . . A reasonable jury could find that the City was deliberately indifferent to the obvious risk of false arrests like Pinter's, as discussed above. A reasonable jury could also find that the City abused the criminal process for illegitimate ends by carrying out prostitution arrests not in order to obtain convictions but in order to improve its position in nuisance abatement negotiations, as discussed below. This scenario provides sufficient support for the conclusion that Pinter's arrest resulted from a municipal custom of commencing criminal proceedings such as his not with a desire to see the ends of justice served, but based on the improper motive of seeking leverage in nuisance abatement negotiations. This conclusion would be sufficient to establish 'actual malice' in the limited sense required for a malicious prosecution claim . . . . Finally, the City is not entitled to summary judgment on Pinter's excessive force claim. A reasonable jury could find that the officers in the van acted in accordance with an unconstitutional policy or custom of the City to leave arrestees in unduly tight handcuffs for hours at a time in police vans while other prisoners were collected, without training NYPD officers concerning the proper use of 'double locked' handcuffs or how to respond to complaints regarding pain caused by handcuffs. . . . Drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Pinter, there is also sufficient evidence in the record for a jury to find that the City had a custom of arresting gay men for prostitution without probable cause in order to obtain the collateral objective of commencing nuisance abatement proceedings against video stores frequented largely, although not entirely, by members of the gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender communities. . . . In light of the above, a reasonable jury could conclude that the custom of prostitution arrests that resulted in Pinter's arrest constituted an abuse of criminal process. . . Pinter has a triable abuse of process claim under Section 1983 against the City. However, the Second Circuit's conclusion that the individual defendants had arguable probable cause forecloses Pinter's abuse of process claims against them."); Sunn v. City & County of Honolulu, 852 F. Supp. 903, 907 (D. Haw. 1994) ("[T]he circuits which have considered the issue have held that Heller is inapplicable to cases where police officers are exempt from suit on qualified immunity grounds." citing cases); Munz v. Ryan, 752 F. Supp. 1537, 1551 (D. Kan. 1990) (no inconsistency in granting official qualified immunity, while holding municipality liable for constitutional violations if caused by final policymaker).

See also Taylor v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Department, No. 219CV995JCMNJK, 2019 WL 5839255, at *14–15 (D. Nev. Nov. 7, 2019) ("'[A]n officer who acts in reliance on a duly-enacted statute or ordinance is ordinarily entitled to qualified immunity.' Grossman v. City of Portland, 33 F.3d 1200, 1209 (9th Cir. 1994). . . . In Grossman, an individual officer arrested plaintiff pursuant to an unconstitutional ordinance. . . The Ninth Circuit held that the individual officer was entitled to qualified immunity, but the city remained liable. . . . Here, as in Grossman, determining chapter 16's constitutionality as applied to plaintiff is dispositive of claims 7, 9, and 12. Officers Young, Ferguson, and Albright acted in reliance on chapter 16 of the CCC which, as this court noted, is a facially constitutional regulation aimed at addressing pedestrian congestion on public walkways. Plaintiff displayed his table on the sidewalk, which necessarily means that it was in plain view and in a public place. In furtherance of chapter 16's policy of preventing obstructive uses of sidewalks, Officers Young, Ferguson, and Albright cited plaintiff for his expressive conduct and seized his table. However, § 16.11.020 of the CCC specifically exempts tables used in furtherance of First Amendment activity from the definition of an 'obstructive use' unless the table is 'actually obstructing' the sidewalk. Plaintiff has alleged that, because of his positioning on the sidewalk, he did not actually obstruct the walkway. Further, plaintiff has clearly demonstrated that his table was essential to his live drawing. For that reason, the court, as discussed above, finds that plaintiff has stated a colorable as-applied constitutional challenge to chapter 16 of the CCC. Consequently, Officers Young, Ferguson, and Albright either relied on an unconstitutional interpretation of chapter 16 or unconstitutionally applied chapter 16 to plaintiff's expression. Thus, these erroneous applications of chapter 16 stymied plaintiff's First Amendment rights. Further, plaintiff's First-Amendment-protected expression cannot support probable cause. . . But the individual officers were relying on the policy and interpretation promulgated by LVMPD. . . One way a plaintiff may demonstrate municipal liability for a constitutional violation is by showing that the violation occurred as a result of inadequate training on the part of the municipality. . . Therefore, plaintiff has sufficiently pleaded a Monell claim against LVMPD for promulgating the policy of citing street performers for obstruction per se when they use a table or other object for First Amendment expression. On the other hand, the individual officers are entitled to qualified immunity for their good faith reliance on the duly-enacted statute as interpreted by LVMPD. Accordingly, the LVMPD defendants' motion to dismiss is granted in part and denied in part as to claims 7, 9, and 12. The individual officers are dismissed as defendants. LVMPD itself is not.")

See also Pinter v. City of New York, 976 F.Supp.2d 539, 575 (S.D.N.Y. 2013) ("Section 1292(b) of Title 28 of the United States Code allows a district judge to certify a question or order to the appellate court when it is 'not otherwise appealable under this section' if she is 'of the opinion that such order involves a controlling question of law as to which there is substantial ground for difference of opinion and that an immediate appeal from the order may materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation.' The instant case involves a controlling question of law where two panels of the Second Circuit have reached conflicting conclusions. Furthermore, immediate appeal would materially advance the ultimate termination of the litigation. If the Second Circuit holds that its prior ruling in Pinter controls despite the more recent conflicting holding in Askins, it may find that any claim where lack of probable cause is an element must be dismissed-that is, the false arrest, malicious prosecution and abuse of process claims against the City. This would leave only Pinter's excessive force claim for trial, which is a claim based on a much narrower and more limited set of facts than the other three. I am sympathetic to plaintiff's argument that this case already has a lengthy and complicated history and that this will be the second interlocutory appeal to the Second Circuit. However, proceeding with trial before the Second Circuit rules on this issue puts the Court at risk of expending scarce judicial resources by trying what may be unviable claims. For the foregoing reasons, the following question is certified for appeal to the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit: Is the Second Circuit's decision in Pinter v. City of New York, 448 F. App'x 99 (2d Cir.2011) overruled by its decision in Askins v. Doe No. 1, 727 F.3d 248 (2d Cir.2013)?"). (certification denied, Nov. 25, 2013.)

But see Jiron v. City of Lakewood, 392 F.3d 410, 419 n.8 (10th Cir. 2004) ("Plaintiff argues that dismissal of the claims against the remaining defendants was improper because summary judgment was granted to Officer Halpin on the basis of qualified immunity. Plaintiff is correct that some dismissals against the officer on the basis of qualified immunity do not preclude a suit against the municipality. . . However, when a finding of qualified immunity is based on a conclusion that the officer has committed no constitutional violation − i.e., the first step of the qualified immunity analysis − a finding of qualified immunity does preclude the imposition of municipal liability."); Turpin v. County of Rock, 262 F.3d 789, 794 (8th Cir. 2001) ("Having concluded that the district court properly granted Officer Svoboda and Deputy Anderson summary judgment on qualified-immunity grounds, we likewise conclude that the county was entitled to summary judgment. See Abbott v. City of Crocker, 30 F.3d 994, 998 (8th Cir.1994) (municipality cannot be liable unless officer is found liable on underlying substantive claim)."); Mattox v. City of Forest Park, 183 F.3d 515, 523 (6th Cir. 1999) (exercising pendent appellate jurisdiction over City's interlocutory appeal on grounds that "[i]f the plaintiffs have failed to state a claim for violation of a constitutional right at all, then the City of Forest Park cannot be held liable for violating that right any more than the individual defendants can.").

See also Grim v. Baltimore Police Department, No. CV ELH-18-3864, 2020 WL 1063091, at *4 (D. Md. Mar. 5, 2020) ("To be sure, 'Monell...and its progeny do not require that a jury must first find an individual defendant liable before imposing liability on [a] local government.'. . Thus, although an individual defendant may be entitled to qualified immunity, the local government entity can be liable under § 1983. . . However, in such a scenario, the plaintiff still must establish that the individual defendant committed constitutional violations in order for the entity defendant to be held liable under § 1983."); Glenn v. City of Columbus, No. 4:07-CV-52 (CDL), 2010 WL 2600718, at *2 (M.D. Ga. June 23, 2010) ("Although this Court finds the holding and rationale of the Court of Appeals to be remarkably charitable to law enforcement officers who used deadly force against an unarmed man under dubious circumstances, the Court of Appeals's holding and rationale lead to the inescapable, albeit perhaps puzzling, result that if the Court of Appeals had to decide the remaining claims in this case, it would find that they fail as a matter of law. Duty bound to follow the dictates of the Court of Appeals, the Court therefore finds in favor of Defendants on the remaining claims for the following reasons. First, regarding the federal law claims against the City of Columbus, although the holding of the Eleventh Circuit's opinion focused upon the qualified immunity issue, the opinion suggests in much broader terms that the Eleventh Circuit found the use of force was reasonable under the circumstances and, therefore, no constitutional violation occurred. Second, the Eleventh Circuit's opinion contemplates that, even if a constitutional violation occurred, the beanbag munition policy cannot be a basis for municipal liability because the Eleventh Circuit concluded that the policymaker was entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' claims against him, suggesting that the training could not amount to a deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the officers using the beanbag munition come into contact."); Strain v. Borough of Sharpsburg, Pa., 2007 WL 1630363, at *7 n.9 (W.D. Pa. June 4, 2007) ("The Supreme Court has held that qualified immunity section 1983 does not extend to municipalities. . . This is true even where the individual officers of the municipality are entitled to qualified immunity because the law that they are alleged to have violated was not clearly established at the time. . . Where, however, qualified immunity is granted to individual officers on the ground that there was no constitutional violation, the grant of qualified immunity precludes municipal liability."); Martin v. City of Oceanside, 205 F. Supp.2d 1142, 1154, 1155 (S.D.Cal. 2002) ("If a court finds the officers acted constitutionally, the city has no liability under § 1983. Here, the Court has already concluded that the officers' conduct was not unconstitutional. It is true that the Court has answered the first Saucier question, whether plaintiff alleges facts that show a constitutional violation by the officers, in the affirmative. However, it is equally clear from the Court's analysis above that in answering the second Saucier question, in the course of which the Court is permitted to review both parties' summary judgment papers, rather than just plaintiff's complaint, the Court has determined that the uncontradicted facts show the officers did not violate plaintiff's constitutional rights. First, the Court has determined that the officers' entry into plaintiff's home was justified by the 'emergency aid' exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement. Second, the Court has found that the officers' alleged failure to announce their presence and purpose, even if true, did not make their search of plaintiff's home unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. Third, the Court has determined that the officers' pointing guns at plaintiff did not constitute excessive force under the circumstances. Therefore, because the officers' conduct did not violate plaintiff's constitutional rights, there is no unconstitutional action which can be charged against the City, and plaintiff's Monell claim against the City fails."), aff'd, 360 F.3d 1078 (9th Cir. 2004); VanVorous v. Burmeister, No. 2:01-CV-02, 2001 WL 1699200, at *10 (W.D. Mich. Dec. 26, 2001) (not reported) ("The Court has determined that the Individual Defendants, including Burmeister, are entitled to qualified immunity. Unlike the court in Doe v. Sullivan County, however, this conclusion was not based solely on the reasonableness of the officers' belief that their conduct was lawful. Under Saucier, the Court was first required to determine whether VanVorous suffered a constitutional violation at all before asking whether that right was clearly established. The Court concluded that the Individual Defendants acted reasonably in using deadly force and did not violate VanVorous' Fourth Amendment rights. More recent Sixth Circuit opinions have made clear that a determination that the individual defendants committed no constitutional violation, whether by a court on summary judgment or by a jury, precludes municipal liability under § 1983. [citing cases] When there is no underlying constitutional violation by individual officers, there can be no municipal liability either.Therefore, the Court will grant the City of Menominee's motion for summary judgment of Plaintiff's claims.").

In Hegarty v. Somerset County, 53 F.3d 1367, 1380 (1st Cir. 1995), the court noted:

> The determination that a subordinate law enforcement officer is entitled to qualified immunity from suit under section 1983 is not necessarily dispositive of the supervisor's immunity claim. Nevertheless, it does increase the weight of the burden plaintiff must bear in demonstrating not only a deficiency in supervision but also the essential causal connection or "affirmative linkage" between any such deficiency in supervision and the alleged deprivation of rights.

H. No Eleventh Amendment Immunity for Local Entities/State Immunities Not Applicable

Political subdivisions of the state have no Eleventh Amendment protection from suit in federal court. Moor v. County of Alameda, 411 U.S. 693, 717-21 (1973). See also Northern Ins. Co. of New York v. Chatham County, Ga., 126 S. Ct. 1689, 1693 (2006) ("A consequence of this Court's recognition of preratification sovereignty as the source of immunity from suit is that only States and arms of the State possess immunity from suits authorized by federal law. . . Accordingly, this Court has repeatedly refused to extend sovereign immunity to counties. [citing Lake Country Estates, Inc. v. Tahoe Regional Planning Agency, 440 U.S. 391, 401 (1979); Workman v. New York City, 179 U.S. 552, 565 (1900); Lincoln County v. Luning, 133 U.S. 529, 530 (1890)] See also Jinks v. Richland County, 538 U.S. 456, 466, 123 S.Ct. 1667, 155 L.Ed.2d 631 (2003) ("[M]unicipalities, unlike States, do not enjoy a constitutionally protected immunity from suit").

This is true even when, as respondent alleges here, 'such entities exercise a Aslice of state power.'' Lake Country Estates, supra, at 401, 99 S.Ct. 1171.").

See also Peart v. Seneca County, 808 F.Supp.2d 1028, 1034 (N.D. Ohio 2011) ("Defendants argue that I should follow those district courts holding "counties, as political entities, are not sui juris; they are held accountable through their elected representatives, to wit, their commissioners." McGuire v. Ameritech Servs., Inc., 253 F.Supp.2d 988, 1015 (S.D. Ohio 2003). . . . Ohio courts have treated the question of a county's capacity to be sued as turning on the extent to which a county is an instrumentality of the state. . . Defendants assert that Ohio counties thus lack capacity for the same reason counties in the past asserted sovereign immunity − Ohio law treats them as an arm of the state. But the Supreme Court has held that a political subdivision is not 'the State' and cannot enjoy sovereign immunity from a § 1983 suit. Mt. Healthy City Sch. Dist. Bd. of Educ. v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 280-81 (1977). . . . Moreover, in the special context of § 1983 actions, 'a state law that immunizes government conduct otherwise subject to suit under 1983 is pre-empted ... because the application of state immunity law would thwart the congressional remedy.' Felder v. Casey, 487 U.S. 131, 139 (1988). Section 1983 preempts Ohio law where it imposes a barrier to bringing an otherwise valid claim, and therefore Rule 17(b) does not bar this suit against the county."); Stack v. Karnes, 750 F.Supp.2d 892, 894-99 (S.D. Ohio 2010) ("[T]he issue before the Court is whether a county's lack of capacity to sue or be sued under Section 301.22 precludes the ability of such county to become amenable to a § 1983 claim pursuant to Monell. Ohio federal courts have dealt with this issue inconsistently. [collecting cases] Moreover, the Sixth Circuit has not directly dealt with this issue. . . . Because of the inconsistent manner in which Ohio district courts have dealt with this issue and because the Sixth Circuit has not squarely addressed the issue, this Court will consider it in depth. . . . [T]he Court must determine the applicability of the Eleventh Amendment to local governments, such as Franklin County, and the effect, if any, of the immunity from suit provided to such counties under Ohio Revised Code Section 301.22 on a § 1983 claim. . . . [T]he Eleventh Amendment does not apply to local governments unless they are considered an arm of the state. . . In that regard, the Supreme Court has consistently refused to apply Eleventh Amendment protection to counties because they are not arms of the state. . . .With the immunity afforded by the Eleventh Amendment being inapplicable to Franklin County, the Court turns to the effect of Section 301.22 on Franklin County's amenability to suit on a § 1983 claim. . . . While Ohio law is free to define and set forth the ability of political subdivisions, like Franklin County, to retain and ultimately waive immunity under state law, the Eleventh Amendment is controll[ing] as a matter of federal law. . . .Ohio counties are precluded from claiming protection to suit on grounds of lack of capacity pursuant to Section 301.22. . . . The fact that Ohio counties, absent application of Section 301.22, are not 'bodies politic and corporate' for purposes of Ohio law is not the appropriate inquiry. . . Rather, the meaning of 'person' for purposes of § 1983 focuses on the intent of Congress, not that of the individual states. . . . Thus, pursuant to Plaintiff's Monell claim, Franklin County is considered a 'person' for purposes of § 1983 and the immunity afforded under Sections 301.22 and 2743.01, respectively, is inapplicable.")

Furthermore, a state court may not refuse to entertain a § 1983 action against a school board on the ground that common law sovereign immunity barred the suit. Howlett v. Rose, 496 U.S. 356, 110 S. Ct. 2430 (1990). See also Martinez v. California, 444 U.S. 277, 284 (1980) ("Conduct by persons acting under color of state law which is wrongful under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 ... cannot be immunized by state law."); Rodriguez v. City of Camden, No. 12–2652 (JEI/AMD), 2013 WL 530863, *2 n.3 (D.N.J. Feb. 11, 2013) ("In light of the disposition of the Motion, the Court does not reach Defendants' alternative argument concerning qualified immunity pursuant to N.J.S.A. § 59:3–3. However, the Court notes that no state statute can provide a qualified immunity defense to a federal cause of action pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1983. Moreover, even under federal law, qualified immunity applies to individual government officials, not municipalities."); Turner v. City of Toledo, 671 F.Supp.2d 967, 971, 972 (N.D. Ohio 2009) ("Courts have generally treated questions of whether a § 1983 suit may be brought against a 'political subdivision' of a state, as this Court did in its two previous opinions on this matter, under the rubric of Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity analysis, and have looked to whether the governmental entity in question shares the state's own immunity from suit. Thus, the Sixth Circuit has expressly permitted suits under § 1983 to proceed against Ohio counties, on the ground that counties do not enjoy sovereign immunity. . . So too, the Supreme Court has reasoned that a municipality, unlike a state, is a 'person' under § 1983 because a state enjoys sovereign immunity, while a municipality does not. . . . [A] governmental entity's status under state law is not conclusive of whether that entity may be sued under federal law, though state law does provide evidence of whether a given entity is, in fact, 'the State.' In the present case, there is no question that Lucas County, like the school board in Mt. Healthy, is a 'political subdivision' of the State of Ohio, see Ohio Rev.Code ' 2743.01(B). Thus, Mt. Healthy (as the Court has noted in both of its previous decisions on this issue) precludes the argument that Lucas County cannot be sued under § 1983.An additional problem with Lucas County's position is that, in the special context of § 1983 actions, 'a state law that immunizes government conduct otherwise subject to suit under 1983 is pre-empted, even where the federal civil rights litigation takes place in state court, because the application of the state immunity law would thwart the congressional remedy.' Felder v. Casey, 487 U.S. 131, 139 (1988). . . . Therefore, under Felder, Ohio law is pre-empted insofar as it would impose any barrier to bringing an otherwise-valid § 1983 action, and there is thus no Rule 17(b) problem with Lucas County's status as a party to this case. But even assuming that all of the preceding discussion is incorrect and Lucas County cannot, in fact, be made a party to any action, even a § 1983 action in federal court, there is no question that the Board of Commissioners could nonetheless be sued on the County's behalf.").

See also Williams v. Reed, 145 S. Ct. 465, 469-70 & nn. 2, 3 (2025) ("The Secretary argues that Alabama's exhaustion requirement constitutes a 'neutral rule of judicial administration' and that the Alabama Supreme Court permissibly applied that statutory rule to bar the claimants' § 1983 suit in state court. Haywood v. Drown, 556 U. S. 729, 738 (2009). The claimants respond that Alabama may not preclude § 1983 suits on failure-to-exhaust grounds when, as here, plaintiffs challenge the Department's delays in processing their claims. Otherwise, they say, Alabama's rule would create a catch-22 preventing adjudication of, and in effect immunizing state officials from, this narrow category of § 1983 claims about delays in the administrative process.[2] [fn. 2: The claimants also contend, more broadly, that this Court's § 1983 precedents—especially Patsy v. Board of Regents of Fla., 457 U. S. 496 (1982), and Felder v. Casey, 487 U. S. 131 (1988)—categorically bar both federal and state courts from applying state administrative-exhaustion requirements to § 1983 claims. We need not address that broader argument.] In light of this Court's precedents, we agree with the claimants. In the unusual circumstances presented here—where a state court's application of a state exhaustion requirement in effect immunizes state officials from § 1983 claims challenging delays in the administrative process—state courts may not deny those § 1983 claims on failure-to-exhaust grounds. . . . [fn. 3: In Haywood, the Court declined to address 'whether Congress may compel a State to offer a forum, otherwise unavailable under state law, to hear suits brought pursuant to § 1983.'. . This case similarly does not require us to address that underlying question: Alabama 'has made this inquiry unnecessary by creating courts of general jurisdiction that routinely sit to hear analogous § 1983 actions.']")

See also Haywood v. Drown, 129 S. Ct. 2108, 2115-18 (2009) ("Correction Law § 24 violates the Supremacy Clause. In passing Correction Law § 24, New York made the judgment that correction officers should not be burdened with suits for damages arising out of conduct performed in the scope of their employment. Because it regards these suits as too numerous or too frivolous (or both), the State's longstanding policy has been to shield this narrow class of defendants from liability when sued for damages. [footnote omitted] The State's policy, whatever its merits, is contrary to Congress' judgment that all persons who violate federal rights while acting under color of state law shall be held liable for damages. . . . That New York strongly favors a rule shielding correction officers from personal damages liability and substituting the State as the party responsible for compensating individual victims is irrelevant. The State cannot condition its enforcement of federal law on the demand that those individuals whose conduct federal law seeks to regulate must nevertheless escape liability. . . . While our cases have uniformly applied the principle that a State cannot simply refuse to entertain a federal claim based on a policy disagreement, we have yet to confront a statute like New York's that registers its dissent by divesting its courts of jurisdiction over a disfavored federal claim in addition to an identical state claim. The New York Court of Appeals' holding was based on the misunderstanding that this equal treatment of federal and state claims rendered Correction Law § 24 constitutional. . . To the extent our cases have created this misperception, we now make clear that equality of treatment does not ensure that a state law will be deemed a neutral rule of judicial administration and therefore a valid excuse for refusing to entertain a federal cause of action. . . . We therefore hold that, having made the decision to create courts of general jurisdiction that regularly sit to entertain analogous suits, New York is not at liberty to shut the courthouse door to federal claims that it considers at odds with its local policy. [footnote omitted] A State's authority to organize its courts, while considerable, remains subject to the strictures of the Constitution. . . We have never treated a State's invocation of 'jurisdiction' as a trump that ends the Supremacy Clause inquiry, see Howlett, 496 U.S., at 382-383, and we decline to do so in this case. . . .[T]he dissent's fear that 'no state jurisdictional rule will be upheld as constitutional' is entirely unfounded. . . Our holding addresses only the unique scheme adopted by the State of New York-a law designed to shield a particular class of defendants (correction officers) from a particular type of liability (damages) brought by a particular class of plaintiffs (prisoners). Based on the belief that damages suits against correction officers are frivolous and vexatious, . . . Correction Law § 24 is effectively an immunity statute cloaked in jurisdictional garb. Finding this scheme unconstitutional merely confirms that the Supremacy Clause cannot be evaded by formalism.")

Haywood v. Drown, 129 S. Ct. 2108, 2135, 2136, 2138 (2009) (Thomas, J., with whom Roberts, C.J., Scalia, J., and Alito, J., join as to Part III, dissenting) ("Unlike the Florida immunity rule in Howlett, NYCLA § 24 is not a defense to a federal claim and the dismissal it authorizes is without prejudice. . . For this reason, NYCLA § 24 is not merely 'denominated' as jurisdictional-it actually is jurisdictional. . . . It cannot be that New York has forsaken the right to withdraw a particular class of claims from its courts' purview simply because it has created courts of general jurisdiction that would otherwise have the power to hear suits for damages against correction officers. The Supremacy Clause does not fossilize the jurisdiction of state courts in their original form. Under this Court's precedent, States remain free to alter the structure of their judicial system even if that means certain federal causes of action will no longer be heard in state court, so long as States do so on nondiscriminatory terms. . . . By imposing on state courts a duty to accept subject-matter jurisdiction over federal § 1983 actions, the Court has stretched the Supremacy Clause beyond all reasonable bounds and upended a compromise struck by the Framers in Article III of the Constitution. Furthermore, by declaring unconstitutional even those laws that divest state courts of jurisdiction over federal claims on a non-discriminatory basis, the majority has silently overturned this Court's unbroken line of decisions upholding state statutes that are materially indistinguishable from the New York law under review. And it has transformed a single exception to the rule of state judicial autonomy into a virtually ironclad obligation to entertain federal business. I respectfully dissent.")

But see Winston v. County of Franklin, No. 2:10-CV-1005, 2011 WL 2601562, at *4 (S.D. Ohio June 30, 2011) ("[T]he Board in this case was under no duty to provide a safe detention space in the Franklin County Juvenile Detention Center because the Board lacks the statutory authority to create policies related to the safety and protection of detainees. Rather, it is the juvenile judge who submits an annual written request for an appropriation to the board of county commissioners that includes reasonably necessary expenses for the maintenance and operation of the detention facility, and the care, maintenance, education, and support of detainees. . . . The Board's statutory authority is essentially limited to funding the detention center's budget, and constructing, leasing and/or purchasing juvenile detention centers. . . . Thus, pursuant to Pembaur, because the Board did not have any final policymaking authority related to the maintenance of safety for detainees of the creation of the standards of safety, it cannot be held vicariously liable for actions of employees at the juvenile detention center in allegedly failing to meet safety standards through different policies and customs. . . . Franklin County is not sui juris and, therefore, lacks the capacity to sue or be sued except where specially authorized by statute. . .The Ohio Revised Code establishes the capacity of a county to sue or be sued. See O.R.C. §§ 301.22. That section provides that only a county that adopts a 'charter or an alternative form of government' may be considered 'a body politic and corporate for the purpose of enjoying and exercising the rights and privileges conveyed under it by the constitution and the laws of this state' and is 'capable of suing and being sued, pleading and being impleaded.' Franklin County has not adopted a charter or an alternative form of government and, therefore, is not a body corporate and politic amenable to suit as provided by O.R.C. §§ 301.22. Thus, Franklin County cannot be sued, and the Plaintiffs' claim against this Defendant fails.")

See also Tafari v. McCarthy, 714 F.Supp.2d 317, 384 (N.D.N.Y. 2010) ("In 2009, the United States Supreme Court held that § 24 is unconstitutional to the extent that it precludes inmates from pursuing § 1983 actions. Haywood v. Drown, __ U.S. __, 129 S.Ct. 2108, 173 L.Ed.2d 920 (2009). However, at least two judges in this District have observed that because Haywood's focus is on concerns about civil rights claims and the Supremacy Clause, the decision 'does not affect the question of whether this Court has proper jurisdiction to hear [a] pendent state law claim.' Crump v. Ekpe, No. 9:07-CV-1331, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 10799, 2010 WL 502762, at * 18 (N.D.N.Y. Feb.8, 2010) (Kahn, J. and Peebles, M.J.); May v. Donneli, No. 9:06-CV-437, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 85495, 2009 WL 3049613, at *5 (N.D.N.Y. Sept.18, 2009) (Sharpe, J. and Treece, M.J .). . . Therefore, I recommend that Defendants' motion for summary judgment be granted with respect to Plaintiff's pendent state claims.").

In Hess v. Port Authority Trans-Hudson Corp., 115 S. Ct. 394 (1994), the Court held that injured railroad workers could assert a federal statutory right, under the FELA, to recover damages against the Port Authority and that concerns underlying the Eleventh Amendment- "the States' solvency and dignity"- were not touched. The Court explained, id. at 406:

> The proper focus is not on the use of profits or surplus, but rather is on losses and debts. If the expenditures of the enterprise exceed receipts, is the State in fact obligated to bear and pay the resulting indebtedness of the enterprise? When the answer is "No" . . . then the Eleventh Amendment's core concern is not implicated.

See also Guertin v. State of Michigan, 912 F.3d 907, 936, 941 (6th Cir. 2019*), reh'g and reh'g en banc denied*, 924 F.3d 309 (2019), cert. denied sub nom. City of Flint v. Guertin, 140 S. Ct. 933 (2020) and cert. denied sub nom. Busch v. Guertin, 140 S. Ct. 933 (2020) ("Flint readily concedes municipalities do not enjoy sovereign immunity. That would normally end our analysis, but this is not a typical case. At the time of the crisis, Flint was so financially distressed that the State of Michigan had taken over its day-to-day local government operations by way of a statutory mechanism enacted to deal with municipal insolvency—gubernatorial-appointed individuals who 'act for and in the place and stead of the governing body and the office of chief administrative officer of the local government.'. . Flint contends it became an arm of the state because of the State of Michigan's takeover. We thus find it more appropriate to resolve whether this extraordinary factor dictates a different outcome. . . On de novo review, . . . we agree with the district court that the City of Flint is not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . . In sum, Flint has not met its burden to show that when under emergency management, it was an

'arm of the state' protected by the Eleventh Amendment. The foremost consideration—the state's potential liability for judgment—counsels against a finding of Eleventh Amendment immunity, and the remaining factors do not 'far outweigh' this factor."); Brent v. Wayne County Dep't of Human Servs., 901 F.3d 656, 681-82 (6th Cir. 2018) (" 'The state's potential legal liability for a judgment against the defendant "is the foremost factor" to consider in our sovereign immunity analysis.'. . Here, state law strongly suggests, although perhaps does not conclusively establish, that the State of Michigan would be responsible for judgments entered against Wayne County DHS. To start, the Michigan legislature abolished county departments of social services in 1975 and replaced them with a single statewide Department of Human Services (formerly called the Family Independence Agency). . . Numerous district courts have thereby concluded that county-level 'child protective services offices are therefore not county agencies, but are merely local offices of the state DHS.'. . Given that county DHS offices are merely local subdivisions of the state DHS, and given that state agencies are required to pay for court judgments, it follows that the State of Michigan—and not Wayne County—is liable for judgments against Wayne County DHS."); Karns v. Shanahan, 879 F.3d 504, 518-19 (3d Cir. 2018) ("After giving equal consideration to all three factors, we weigh and balance them. We no longer adhere to the balancing analysis conducted in Fitchik in light of intervening changes in Eleventh Amendment immunity analysis articulated by the Supreme Court. Applying the revised analysis, we determine that while the state-treasury factor counsels against awarding Eleventh Amendment immunity, the state law and autonomy factors both tilt in favor of immunity. Indeed, in the intervening years since our decision in Fitchik, it has become apparent that the state law factor weighs heavily in favor of a finding of immunity. Weighing and balancing the qualitative strength of each factor in the context of the circumstances presented, we hold that NJ Transit is an arm of the state. We therefore conclude that NJ Transit is entitled to claim the protections of Eleventh Amendment immunity, which in turn functions as an absolute bar to any claims in this case against NJ Transit and the officers in their official capacities."); Maliandi v. Montclair State University, 845 F.3d 77, 85-86, 99 (3d Cir. 2016) ("[W]e are mindful of the near unanimity among the Courts of Appeals that the factors relevant to an Eleventh Amendment inquiry typically favor immunity in the state college setting. However, because the particulars of our Fitchik test differ from analogous tests in other Circuits and because each entity seeking immunity warrants an individualized analysis, these cases do not dictate the answer to the question of first impression with which we are presented today. That question has bedeviled district judges in our Circuit, who are divided in their application of the Fitchik test to MSU. . . .We now resolve this dispute by concluding that MSU is an arm of the State, and in the process, we seek to synthesize our jurisprudence regarding the Fitchik factors for the benefit of district courts in future Eleventh Amendment cases. . . .After undertaking our own analysis of MSU's Eleventh Amendment immunity, we cannot agree with the District Court's determination that all three Fitchik factors counsel against immunity. For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that the funding factor counsels against immunity, but that the status under state law and autonomy factors—while close—tilt in favor of extending MSU immunity from suit. On balance, because two of the three coequal factors support MSU's claim for immunity, we hold that MSU is an arm of the State that enjoys the protections afforded by the Eleventh Amendment. . . .The upshot of our review is that

Fitchik's funding factor weighs against immunity, but its status under state law and autonomy factors both favor immunity. Thus, on balance, the Fitchik factors favor MSU's claim to Eleventh Amendment protection. . . We recognize that, absent recourse to the federal courts, Maliandi may have limited and unsatisfying avenues to obtain relief for the alleged discrimination she suffered. Yet, comity and state sovereignty are constitutional precepts and lynchpins of our federalist system of government, and where, as here, the State creates an entity that functions on balance as an arm of the State, the Eleventh Amendment's protection must carry the day. Accordingly, the constitutional right of the State of New Jersey to be free from private suit in federal court must be respected, and, unless the District Court determines on remand that New Jersey has waived its immunity for Maliandi's NJLAD claim, the suit against MSU must be dismissed."); Lowe v. Hamilton County Dept. of Job & Family Services, 610 F.3d 321, 325, 326 (6th Cir. 2010) (setting out four-part test for determining whether entity is political subdivision or arm of state and concluding that the fact that "the state may reimburse HCJFS for these damages does not change the fact that HCJFS is the party legally liable for the judgment. The question of legal liability is paramount because it is 'an indicator of the relationship' between the state and the entity asserting sovereign immunity."); Cash v. Hamilton County Dept. of Adult Probation, 388 F.3d 539, 545 (6th Cir. 2004) ("The County argues that it is entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity from suit because the Hamilton County Department of Adult Probation is an arm of the common pleas and municipal courts of the state of Ohio. To support this contention, the County cites a number of Ohio statutes. . . . The bald assertion that the Department is an arm of the common pleas and municipal courts is insufficient by itself to garner Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . Rather, this argument is one of many factors that must be considered by the district court. We have recognized that the most important factor is 'will a State pay if the defendant loses?' . . . The County raised the issue of Eleventh Amendment immunity in its motion for summary judgment. Although the district court granted the County's motion, the order provides no findings or analysis pertaining to the Eleventh Amendment. A final resolution of this issue will turn on factual findings regarding whether the Department of Adult Probation is part of the Ohio court system and whether the State or the County would pay damages for a constitutional violation perpetrated by the Department. We therefore remand this issue to the district court for further development."); Manders v. Lee, 338 F.3d 1304, 1328 n.51 (11th Cir. 2003) (en banc) ("Hess says that the state treasury factor is a 'core concern' of Eleventh Amendment jurisprudence. . . . It is true that the presence of a state treasury drain alone may trigger Eleventh Amendment immunity and make consideration of the other factors unnecessary. Thus, this is why some decisions focus on the treasury factor. If the State footed the entire bill here, there would be no issue to decide.The Eleventh Amendment, however, does not turn a blind eye to the state's sovereignty simply because the state treasury is not directly affected. Moreover, the United States Supreme Court has never said that the absence of the treasury factor alone defeats immunity and precludes consideration of other factors, such as how state law defines the entity or what degree of control the State has over the entity. As mentioned earlier, although the state treasury was not affected, the Hess Court spent considerable time pointing out how that lawsuit in federal court did not affect the dignity of the two States because they had ceded a part of their sovereignty to the federal government as one of the creator-controllers of the Compact Clause entity in issue. If the state-treasury-drain element were always determinative in itself, this discussion, as well as the other control discussion, would have been unnecessary."); Endres v. Indiana State Police, 334 F.3d 618, 627 (7th Cir. 2003) ("Sharing of authority among units of government complicates both practical administration and legal characterization. Even if as a matter of state law the counties act as agents of the state in raising and remitting revenues, it remains a matter of federal law whether this makes each county's department part of the state. . . The dispositive question is more 'who pays?' than 'who raised the money?'. . . . The combination of J.A.W. and the 2000 legislation leads us to conclude that county offices of family and children in Indiana now must be classified as part of the state for purposes of the eleventh amendment. This does not require the overruling of Baxter, which dealt with superseded legislation. It is enough to say that the statutes now in force make county offices part of the state, as J.A.W. held and as the formal organization chart now shows them."); Alkire v. Irving, 330 F.3d 802, 813 (6th Cir. 2003) ("Unfortunately, we find ourselves with virtually no evidence on the most important point − who is responsible for a monetary judgment against the Holmes County Court − as it was not briefed by the parties, who assumed Mumford [v. Basinski, 105 F.3d 264, 268 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 522 U.S. 914 (1997)] was binding precedent. As we shall hold that a remand is in order in any event, we choose to remand this issue to the district court. The district court can make the initial determination whether Ohio would be legally liable for a judgment against the Holmes County Court, as well as an evaluation of the other factors that may bear on whether the Holmes County Court should receive sovereign immunity."); Hudson v. City of New Orleans, 174 F.3d 677, 683 (5th Cir. 1999) ("Ultimately we are most persuaded by the fact that the state treasury will in all likelihood be left untouched if damages were to be levied against the Orleans Parish District Attorney's office. It is well established that this . . . factor is crucial to our Eleventh Amendment arm of the state analysis. . . . In sum, we conclude that the Orleans Parish District Attorney's office is not protected from suit in federal court by the Eleventh Amendment."); Harter v. Vernon, 101 F.3d 334, 340 (4th Cir. 1996) ("In sum, when determining if an officer or entity enjoys Eleventh Amendment immunity a court must first establish whether the state treasury will be affected by the law suit. If the answer is yes, the officer or entity is immune under the Eleventh Amendment."). But see Sales v. Grant, 224 F.3d 293, 298 (4th Cir. 2000) (concluding that a promise of indemnification does not alter the non-immune status of state officers sued in their individual capacities).

See also Harvey v. Cty. of Hudson, No. 14-3670 (KM), 2015 WL 9687862, at *6-7 (D.N.J. Nov. 25, 2015) ("I find that training and supervision of a detective as to the permissible use of deadly force is no mere administrative or personnel matter. It lies at the core of the HCPO's law enforcement functions. For claims arising from that training, the HCPO would be entitled to indemnification under the NJTCA. . . Accordingly, because (1) the state will, in fact, be responsible for any judgment against the HPCO, and (2) the HCPO's supervision and training of officers is a law enforcement function, the first Fitchik factor weighs strongly in favor of sovereign immunity with respect to these allegations. . . .Because all three of the Fitchik factors weigh in favor of sovereign immunity, I find that the HCPO must be treated as an arm of the State for purposes of these claims, which arise from the training and supervision of investigative officers. Accordingly, these claims are barred by the Eleventh Amendment and are dismissed with prejudice for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. . . . Administrative tasks concerning personnel—hiring, firing, promotion, demotion—are to be distinguished from law enforcement functions. . . When performing such administrative functions, the HCPO has more autonomy; it acts more as a component of county government, rather than as an arm of the State. . . As to a judgment arising from claims involving these administrative functions, the NJTCA would not mandate indemnification by the State. . . Therefore, as to the claims of negligent hiring or failure to discipline, the first Fitchik factor weighs against sovereign immunity. For the same reason, the second and third Fitchik factors also lean against the application of sovereign immunity. The HCPO points to no statutory or de facto domination of its administrative or personnel functions by the State. Administrative tasks are not part of the HCPO's core law enforcement function, and therefore would not be regarded as state functions under Wright. The Fitchik factors therefore work against the application of sovereign immunity with respect to claims arising from the HCPO's ordinary administrative or personnel decisions. Accordingly, I will not dismiss on jurisdictional grounds the Complaint's allegations of negligent hiring and failure to discipline.")

See also K. J. by & through Johnson v. Jackson, 127 F.4th 1239, 1251 n.8 (9th Cir. 2025) ("We have held that California public school districts are 'to be treated as an arm of the State partaking of the State's Eleventh Amendment immunity.'. . We take no position on whether this holding should be revisited given our new test for evaluating whether an entity is an arm of the state under the Eleventh Amendment. See Kohn v. State Bar of California, 87 F.4th 1021 (9th Cir. 2023) (en banc), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 144 S. Ct. 1465, 218 L.Ed.2d 694 (2024). In any case, K.J.'s request for expungement falls within the Ex Parte Young exception to Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity."); Walker v. Jefferson Cnty. Bd. of Educ., 771 F.3d 748, 757 (11th Cir. 2014) ("'Whether [an entity] is an "arm of the [s]tate" must be assessed in light of the particular function in which the [entity] was engaged when taking the actions out of which liability is asserted to arise.' Manders, 338 F.3d at 1308. Both of the cases before us concern employment-related decisions (i.e., hiring, assignment, and compensation), and under Stewart, 908 F.2d at 1509–11, local school boards in Alabama are not arms of the state with respect to such decisions. Accordingly, the Jefferson County Board of Education and the Madison City Board of Education are not immune under the Eleventh Amendment from suits challenging those decisions under federal law."); Cash v. Granville County Bd. of Educ., 242 F.3d 219, 226, 227 (4th Cir. 2001) ("[W]e conclude that upon our consideration of each of the factors identified for determining whether a governmental entity is an arm of the State and therefore one of the United States within the meaning of the Eleventh Amendment, the Granville County Board of Education appears much more akin to a county in North Carolina than to an arm of the State. . . . . In reaching our conclusion in this case, we continue to follow our jurisprudence, as stated in Harter, Gray, Bockes, and Ram Ditta, and in doing so, we believe that we are faithfully applying the relevant Eleventh Amendment jurisprudence announced by the Supreme Court in Regents, Hess, Lake Country Estates, and Mt. Healthy. We therefore reject the district court's view that the Supreme Court's recent decisions in Regents and McMillian overruled our decisions in Harter, Gray, Bockes, and Ram Ditta."); Belanger v. Madera Unified School District, 963 F.2d 248, 251 (9th Cir. 1992) (holding school districts in California are state agencies for purposes of the Eleventh Amendment). See generally

Eason v. Clark County School Dist., 303 F.3d 1137, 1141 n.2, 1144 (9th Cir. 2002) (holding school district in Nevada is local or county agency, not state agency and collecting cases from circuits); Doe v. Montgomery County Board of Education, No. CV 21-0356 PJM, 2021 WL 6072813, at *8 (D. Md. Dec. 23, 2021) ("Defendants correctly point out that members of this Court have consistently held that county boards of education in Maryland, including the Board at bar, are state agencies and thus immune from suit under § 1983."); Dennis v. Bd. of Educ. of Talbot Cnty., 21 F.Supp.3d 497, 501-02 (D. Md. 2014) ("County school boards and their officials are considered state agencies and state officials. . . Because the Board and individually named Defendants in their official capacities are a county school board and school officials, they are not 'persons' and cannot be sued under § 1983. The Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment claims will be dismissed against them accordingly."); Weaver v. Madison City Bd. of Educ., No. 5:11–cv–03558–TMP, 2013 WL 2350181, *9 (N.D. Ala. May 29, 2013)("Since Stewart, courts in the Eleventh Circuit, and particularly district courts in Alabama, have consistently found that local boards of education are not protected by the Eleventh Amendment as 'arms of the State.' Rather, there is a consistent line of authority holding them to be local political subdivisions, comparable to counties and municipalities."); Stevenson v. Owens State Community College, 562 F.Supp.2d 965, 968 (N.D. Ohio 2008) ("With regard to how the state courts treat the entity for state sovereign immunity purposes, Ohio courts have held that state community colleges organized under Ohio Rev.Code Chapter 3358, like Owens, are state entities protected by Ohio's sovereign immunity.[collecting cases] This Court agrees with that analysis and accepts these cases as authority that Ohio courts treat community colleges as arms of the state.").

In Regents of the University of California v. Doe, 117 S. Ct. 900, 905 (1997), the Court held that "[t]he Eleventh Amendment protects the State from the risk of adverse judgments even though the State may be indemnified by a third party."

I. States: Section 1983 Does Not Abrogate 11th Amendment Immunity and States Are Not "Persons" Under Section 1983

In the absence of consent to suit or waiver of immunity, a state is shielded from suit in federal court by virtue of the Eleventh Amendment. The state may raise sovereign immunity as a defense to a federal claim in state court as well. See Alden v. Maine, 527 U.S. 706 (1999). A damages action against a state official, in her official capacity, is tantamount to a suit against the state itself and, absent waiver or consent, would be barred by the Eleventh Amendment. A state may waive its 11th Amendment immunity by removing to federal court state law claims as to which it has surrendered its sovereign immunity in state courts. See Lapides v. Bd. of Regents, 535 U.S. 613 (2002). Congress may expressly abrogate a state's sovereign immunity pursuant to its enforcement power under the Fourteenth Amendment. Pennhurst State School and Hospital v. Halderman, 465 U.S. 89, 98-100 (1984). See also United States v. Georgia, 126 S. Ct. 877 (2006); Tennessee v. Lane, 124 S. Ct. 1978 (2004); Nevada Dep't of Human Resources v. Hibbs, 538 U.S. 721 (2003). The Court has held that Section 1983 does not abrogate Eleventh Amendment immunity of state governments. Quern v. Jordan, 440 U.S. 332, 345 (1979).

See also Wisconsin Dep't of Corrections v. Schacht, 118 S. Ct. 2047, 2051-52 (1998) ("We now conclude, contrary to the Seventh Circuit, that the presence in an otherwise removable case of a claim that the Eleventh Amendment may bar does not destroy removal jurisdiction that would otherwise exist. . . . The Eleventh Amendment. . . does not automatically destroy original jurisdiction. Rather, the Eleventh Amendment grants the State a legal power to assert a sovereign immunity defense should it choose to do so. The State can waive the defense. . . Nor need a court raise the defect on its own. Unless the State raises the matter, a court can ignore it."); Constantine v. Rectors and Visitors of George Mason University, 411 F.3d 474, 482 (4th Cir. 2005) (noting that Eleventh Amendment immunity is not strictly an issue of subject-matter jurisdiction but that court should address issue promptly once the State asserts its immunity); Parella v. Retirement Board of the Rhode Island Employees' Retirement System, 173 F.3d 46, 55 (1st Cir. 1999) ("[T]he Supreme Court has now clearly stated that courts are free to ignore possible Eleventh Amendment concerns if a defendant chooses not to press them."). Compare David B. v. McDonald, 156 F.3d 780, 783 (7th Cir. 1998) (With no reference to Schacht, holding "the eleventh amendment, extended in Hans v. Louisiana . . . to federal-question cases, deprives the court of jurisdiction.") with Endres v. Indiana State Police, 334 F.3d 618, 623 (7th Cir. 2003) ("Because the eleventh amendment does not curtail subject-matter jurisdiction (if it did, states could not consent to litigate in federal court, as Lapides holds that they may), a court is free to tackle the issues in this order, when it makes sense to do so, without violating the rule that jurisdictional issues must be resolved ahead of the merits.").

See also Stevenson v. City of Chicago, No. 17 CV 4839, 2018 WL 1784142, at *12 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 13, 2018) ("Here, the ISP Defendants did not consent to removal because Plaintiffs had not served the ISP Defendants until after the City of Chicago Defendants removed this action to federal court. With this in mind, it is well-settled that the waiver of Eleventh Amendment immunity must be clear. . . Thus, Plaintiffs' contention that ISP's failure to move to remand under 28 U.S.C. § 1447(c)—assuming that the ISP Defendants had a legal basis to do so—was a clear declaration of Eleventh Amendment immunity waiver is simply too attenuated under the circumstances. To clarify, the Supreme Court in Lapides and the Seventh Circuit in Board of Regents focused on the voluntary, active nature of the state's consent to proceed in federal court. . . As discussed, ISP did not make a voluntary, active decision to litigate this action in federal court nor are the ISP Defendants taking advantage of the federal forum for any unfair purpose or advantage as contemplated by Lapides and its progeny. . . As such, ISP has not waived its Eleventh Amendment protection under the circumstances[.]")

In Will v. Michigan Dep't of State Police, 491 U.S. 58 (1989), the Court held that neither a state nor a state official in his official capacity is a "person" for purposes of a section 1983 damages action. Thus, even if a state is found to have waived its Eleventh Amendment immunity in federal court, or even if a § 1983 action is brought in state court, where the Eleventh Amendment has no applicability, Will precludes a damages action against the state governmental entity. This holding does not apply when a state official is sued in his official capacity for injunctive relief.

491 U.S. at 71 n. 10. See also Lane v. Cent. Alabama Cmty. Coll., 772 F.3d 1349,1351-52 (11th Cir. 2014) ("Here, Lane seeks equitable relief in the form of reinstatement of his employment. We have determined previously that requests for reinstatement constitute prospective injunctive relief that fall within the scope of the Ex parte Young exception and, thus, are not barred by the Eleventh Amendment. . . .In the light of our reinstatement precedents, we conclude that the district court erred in dismissing Lane's official-capacity claim against Franks as barred by the Eleventh Amendment. We affirm in part and vacate in part; and we remand the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion and with the Supreme Court's decision in Lane v. Franks, 134 S.Ct. 2369 (2014).")

See also Gerlach v. Rokita, 95 F.4th 493, 500-01 (7th Cir. 2024) ("A plaintiff cannot circumvent the sovereign immunity enjoyed by states and their employees in their official capacities simply by pleading a cause of action against those same employees as individuals. Where 'the judgment sought would expend itself on the public treasury or domain,' the suit is against the sovereign, not the individual. . . Even if the sought after compensation would not definitively be paid out of the state treasury, if the amount the plaintiff seeks 'should have been paid by the State,' the suit is likely one against the state itself. . . Any compensation Gerlach seeks correlates directly to the interest her property earned while in state custody—interest that flowed to the state, not individual state employees. . . The money Gerlach seeks is in the state coffers, not the personal bank accounts of Indiana's current and former attorneys general. Targeting individual state employees for those funds does not change the fact that the amount she claims she is owed should have been paid by the state. . . Because the State of Indiana benefited from retaining interest earned on Gerlach's property, we conclude that Gerlach's suit for compensatory relief is actually against the State of Indiana. . . Since Gerlach's claim for compensatory relief is against the state, her claim is doubly barred—first because § 1983 does not create a cause of action against a state and second because Indiana enjoys sovereign immunity under the Eleventh Amendment. . . Finding that Gerlach's claim is really against the state, we need not resolve whether an individual can be held liable for a Fifth Amendment takings violation. Accordingly, the district court correctly dismissed her claim for compensation under § 1983."); Hohenberg v. Shelby County, Tennessee, 68 F.4th 336, 342-44 (6th Cir. 2023) ("[T]he Environmental Court is not a 'person' under § 1983. For one, 'person's' semantic content suggests as much. The Environmental Court is not a natural person, and it is not a 'bod[y] politic [or] corporate.'. . Even if 'person' extends to 'corporations, both private and public,' as Will held, courts are not private or public corporations. They 'exercise ... judicial power, by the proper officer or officers, at a time and place appointed by law.'. . All of this explains why we have held that 'a court'—in that case the Akron municipal court—'is not a "person" within the meaning of § 1983.'. . The Environmental Court also operates as an organ of the State of Tennessee rather than of a 'body politic or corporate.' Its powers and responsibilities flow from Tennessee's Constitution and laws, not from a corporate or municipal charter. As part of the General Sessions court, the Environmental Court exercises the Volunteer State's 'judicial power.'. . State statutes delimit the Court's jurisdiction and many of its procedures. . . And superior Tennessee courts, up to the Tennessee Supreme Court, hear appeals from its judgments. . .Turn to traditional federalism and immunity principles, 'presuppositions of our ... history' that § 1983 honors. . . Lawsuits against state courts, like laws regulating state judges, strike at the heart of state sovereignty. . . .Section 1983 actions against the Environmental Court also would clash with core sovereign immunity principles. '[C]ase after case' describes state courts, including local courts like this one in Michigan and Ohio, as arms of the State and beneficiaries of their State's sovereign immunity. . . We know of no case charting a different course. As the Court observed in Will, it is difficult to understand why § 1983 would create a right to sue an entity that could always assert immunity from suit. Hohenberg and Hanson push back. They say that the Environmental Court is an arm of Shelby County, not the State of Tennessee, making it a § 1983 'person.'. . But we rejected a similar argument in Walsh . . . and it has no more force today. It does not matter that Tennessee law sometimes treats the Environmental Court as a county entity. . . . [T]he meaning of 'person' under § 1983 turns on federal, not state, law. . .It does not matter that Shelby County funds the Court. It does so in accordance with a state statute requiring as much . . . and at any rate the Court's receipt of County funds does not outweigh the other factors making it a State entity[.] . . It does not matter that Shelby County's voters, rather than the State of Tennessee's voters, pick the Environmental Court's judges. A similar reality holds for every Tennessee inferior court judge, who 'shall be elected by the qualified voters of the district or circuit to which they are to be assigned.'. . Once again, local elections do not counterbalance the other factors that paint the Court as an instrumentality of the State. . . All told, because the Environmental Court is not a 'person' and because it is instead an arm of the State, claimants' § 1983 action against it fails."); Laborers' Int'l Union of North America, Loc. 860 v. Neff, 29 F.4th 325, 331-32 (6th Cir. 2022) (concluding that the [Cuyahoga County, Ohio] Juvenile Court is an arm of the State); Jones v. Cummings, 998 F.3d 782, 786-87 (7th Cir. 2021) ("Our sister courts routinely have held that prosecutors and district attorneys in states with comparable laws are state officials. . . . Likewise, this court and the District Court for the Southern District of Indiana have held that Indiana's county prosecutors are state officials when they are prosecuting criminal cases. . . . Recognizing this, he asks this court to hold that 'unlawful rogue actions of a prosecutor are not "a decision, a duty, an obligation, a privilege, or a responsibility of the prosecuting attorney's office[ ]"' and thus his suit against Cummings would not be captured by Ind. Code § 33-39-9-4 (requiring the state to pay expenses incurred by an action against a prosecuting attorney). But any such exception would sweep away the rule—immunity would mean nothing if it existed only when the prosecutor would win on the merits. Jones has sued Cummings for performing his duty to bring charges against criminal defendants. He took that action as an officer of the state, and that, under Will, is the end of it."); McLean v. Gordon, 548 F.3d 613, 618 (8th Cir. 2008) ("We need not address the question of whether the State waived its Eleventh Amendment immunity by voluntarily removing this matter to federal court. Section 1983 provides for an action against a 'person' for a violation, under color of law, of another's civil rights. As the Supreme Court reminded us, 'a State is not a Aperson' against whom a § 1983 claim for money damages might be asserted.' [citing Lapides and Will] Thus, the district court erred in failing to grant summary judgment for DSS, an agency or 'arm [ ] of the State,' on the section 1983 claim brought by McLean."); Harper v. Colorado State Bd. of Land Commissioners, 2007 WL 2430122, at *4 (10th Cir. Aug. 29, 2007) (not published) ("The Harpers maintain that '[t]he reason a state agency (or a state itself) is generally not a 'person' for purposes of a suit for damages under [§ 1983] is because of the 11th Amendment ..., which immunizes states from federal court suits for damages.'. . This argument is not persuasive. The Supreme Court has recognized a distinction between the immunity afforded by the Eleventh Amendment and the limitations in the scope of § 1983 arising from the terms of the statute. . . Accordingly, because the § 1983 claims at issue in this appeal are asserted against the Land Board, an entity that is not a 'person' under that statute, the district court's grant of summary judgment was proper."); Manders v. Lee, 338 F.3d 1304, 1328 n.53 (11th Cir. 2003) (en banc) ("If sheriffs in their official capacity are arms of the state when exercising certain functions, then an issue arises whether Manders's § 1983 suit is subject to dismissal on the independent ground that they are not 'persons' for purposes of § 1983. [citing Will] This statutory issue, however, is not before us as it was neither briefed nor argued on appeal."); Gean v. Hattaway, 330 F.3d 758, 766 (6th Cir. 2003) ("[T]he need for this court to undertake a broad sovereign immunity analysis with respect to the § 1983 claims is obviated by the fact that the defendants in their official capacities are not recognized as 'persons' under § 1983. Even if Tennessee's sovereign immunity has been properly waived or abrogated for the purposes of the federal statute the defendants allegedly violated, a § 1983 claim against the defendants in their official capacities cannot proceed because, by definition, those officials are not persons under the terms of § 1983."); Garrett v. Talladega County Drug and Violent Crime Task Force, 983 F.Supp.2d 1369, 1376. 1377 (N.D. Ala. 2013) ("In this case, the evidence clearly shows that the Task Force is created by, and controlled by, the office of the Talladega County District Attorney. It is a subdivision of that office. All District Attorney's offices are deemed to be agencies of the State of Alabama. . . Accordingly Eleventh Amendment immunity applies to deprive this court of jurisdiction over the claims against the Task Force. . . .As an agency of the Talladega County District Attorney, the Task Force 'is not a legal entity subject to being sued' under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . Accordingly, the section 1983 claims are due to be dismissed for this alternative reason as well."); Tower v. Leslie-Brown, 167 F. Supp.2d 399, 403 (D. Me. 2001) ("Defendants Peary and Leslie-Brown therefore enjoy the same immunity from suit in their official capacities that their employing agencies do.").

See also Inyo County v. Paiute-Shoshone Indians of the Bishop Community of the Bishop Colony, 123 S. Ct. 1887, 1892 (2003) ("Although this case does not squarely present the question, the parties agree, and we will assume for purposes of this opinion, that Native American tribes, like States of the Union, are not subject to suit under § 1983.") and Inyo County v. Paiute-Shoshone Indians of the Bishop Community of the Bishop Colony, 123 S. Ct. 1887, 1894 (2003) ("[W]e hold that the Tribe may not sue under § 1983 to vindicate the sovereign right it here claims."); Waukegan Potawatomi Casino, LLC v. City of Waukegan, 128 F.4th 871, 876-77 (7th Cir. 2025) ("We have yet to determine whether tribes, or their arms, can sue to vindicate non-sovereign rights under § 1983. Courts have grappled with this issue since Inyo County. On one hand, it is a foundational principle of statutory interpretation that a term is presumed to have the same meaning throughout a statute. . . This presumption is 'at its most vigorous when a term is repeated within a given sentence.'. . Indeed, § 1983 references both persons who may be sued and persons who may sue in the same breath. Building off this presumption and sovereign immunity to suit under § 1983, the Fourth Circuit has found that an arm of the state is incapable of maintaining § 1983 actions regardless of the nature of its claims. Va. Off. for Prot. & Advoc. v.

Reinhard, 405 F.3d 185, 189–90 (4th Cir. 2005) (analyzing Inyo County's implications in the context of a state agency and finding no "evidence of statutory intent to allow suits by sovereigns under § 1983 that would overcome the general presumption that 'person' in a statute does not include the sovereign"). In a similar vein, the Tenth Circuit has remarked that 'a "person" within the meaning of § 1983 possesses neither 'sovereign rights" nor "sovereign immunity."'Muscogee (Creek) Nation v. Okla. Tax Comm'n, 611 F.3d 1222, 1236 (10th Cir. 2010). On the other hand, this reasoning renders Inyo County's painstaking analysis of the 'legislative environment' of the word 'person' and the sovereign/non-sovereign rights distinction entirely gratuitous. The Sixth Circuit recognized as much when it dispensed with a similar argument. Keweenaw Bay Indian Cmty. v. Rising, 569 F.3d 589, 596 & n.5 (6th Cir. 2009). For their part, the Ninth and Tenth Circuits seem to recognize the sovereign rights divide but have not affirmatively held that tribes can sue to vindicate non-sovereign rights. Muscogee (Creek) Nation, 611 F.3d at 1234–36; Skokomish Indian Tribe v. United States, 410 F.3d 506, 514–15 (9th Cir. 2005). To add even more confusion to the mix, tribes have mounted attempts to bring § 1983 suits as parens patriae to enforce quasi-sovereign rights, with varying degrees of success. Compare Dep't of Health & Soc. Servs. v. Native Vill. of Curyung, 151 P.3d 388, 399–402 (Alaska 2006) (permitting parens patriae action), with Chemehuevi Ind. Tribe v. McMahon, 934 F.3d 1076, 1082 (9th Cir. 2019) (finding parens patriae action inconsistent with § 1983).This is a difficult question that should not be taken lightly given its significant implications for federalism and tribal governance. However, we need not answer it today because WPC's claim would fail on the merits if allowed to proceed."); Pistor v. Garcia, 791 F.3d 1104, 1112-14 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Although '[t]ribal sovereign immunity "extends to tribal officials when acting in their official capacity and within the scope of their authority,"'. . . tribal defendants sued in their individual capacities for money damages are not entitled to sovereign immunity, even though they are sued for actions taken in the course of their official duties. . . .The principles reiterated in Maxwell foreclose the tribal defendants' claim to tribal sovereign immunity in this case. The gamblers have not sued the Tribe. The district court correctly determined that the gamblers are seeking to hold the tribal defendants liable in their individual rather than in their official capacities. . . . Even if the Tribe agrees to pay for the tribal defendants' liability, that does not entitle them to sovereign immunity: 'The unilateral decision to insure a government officer against liability does not make the officer immune from that liability.'").

A state official sued in her individual capacity for damages is a "person" under § 1983. See Hafer v. Melo, 502 U.S. 21 (1991). Hafer eliminates any ambiguity Will may have created by clarifying that "[T]he phrase 'acting in their official capacities' is best understood as a reference to the capacity in which the state officer is sued, not the capacity in which the officer inflicts the alleged injury." Id. at 26.

See also State Emp. Bargaining Agent Coalition v. Rowland, 718 F.3d 126, 137 (2d Cir. 2013) ("While acknowledging that the Eleventh Amendment generally does not bar claims for monetary damages against state officials in their individual capacities, the district court nonetheless held that plaintiffs' claims were barred because the action, 'though nominally against the Governor and the Secretary of OPM,' was in reality a suit against the State, as a damages award would cause 'the loss of substantial public resources.'. .The district court erred. Where a complaint 'specifically seeks damages from [ ] defendants in their individual capacities[,] ... the mere fact that the state may reimburse them does not make the state the real party in interest.'. . That is true even if the award is quite large, as we noted in Huang v. Johnson, where the plaintiffs sought a $50 million award. 251 F.3d 65, 70 (2d Cir.2001) (holding that the fact that defendants 'might not be able to pay [the award] on their own [did] not transform the claim into one against [defendants] in their official capacities'). We therefore hold that the claims for monetary damages against the defendants in their individual capacities are not barred by the Eleventh Amendment."); Ritchie v. Wickstrom, 938 F.2d 689, 692 (6th Cir. 1991) (Eleventh Amendment did not bar suit against individual sued as policymaker for state institution, even "[i]f the State should voluntarily pay the judgment or commit itself to pay as a result of a negotiated collective bargaining agreement...."); Kroll v. Bd. of Trustees of Univ. of Ill., 934 F.2d 904, 907 (7th Cir. 1991) ("Personal capacity suits raise no eleventh amendment issues."), cert. denied, 112 S. Ct. 377 (1991).

See also Sossamon v. Lone Star State of Texas, 131 S. Ct. 1651, 1659, 1660 (2011) (Provision of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA) creating private cause of action for violations of the RLUIPA, and authorizing person to assert such violations as claim or defense to obtain "appropriate relief" against government, did not clearly and unequivocally notify states that, by accepting federal funds, they were waiving their sovereign immunity to suits for money damages under the RLUIPA, and did not result in waiver of state's immunity from damages suit by prisoner whose free exercise rights were allegedly burdened; Congress, by using phrase "appropriate relief," did not clearly manifest its intent to include damages remedy."). But see Tanzin v. Tanvir, 141 S. Ct. 486, 492-93 (2020) ("A damages remedy is not just 'appropriate' relief as viewed through the lens of suits against Government employees. It is also the only form of relief that can remedy some RFRA violations. For certain injuries, such as respondents' wasted plane tickets, effective relief consists of damages, not an injunction. . . Given the textual cues just noted, it would be odd to construe RFRA in a manner that prevents courts from awarding such relief. Had Congress wished to limit the remedy to that degree, it knew how to do so. . . Our opinion in Sossamon does not change this analysis. Sossamon held that a State's acceptance of federal funding did not waive sovereign immunity to suits for damages under a related statute—the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000—which also permits '"appropriate relief."'. . The obvious difference is that this case features a suit against individuals, who do not enjoy sovereign immunity. . . . We conclude that RFRA's express remedies provision permits litigants, when appropriate, to obtain money damages against federal officials in their individual capacities. The judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is affirmed.")

See also Barnett v. Short, 129 F.4th 534, 539-43 (8th Cir. 2025) ("Though our court has said without explanation in two nonbinding opinions that RLUIPA doesn't permit the recovery of damages, . . . we conclude that RLUIPA's reference to 'appropriate relief' encompasses damages. Damages are 'the traditional form of relief offered in the courts of law.'. . Far from being unusual, damages are more nearly the default remedy in American courts in most circumstances, and nowhere in RLUIPA has Congress affirmatively excluded this commonplace recovery. . . As Barnett and several amici point out, moreover, damages are many times the only relief that a jail inmate can obtain. That's because jail inmates are often housed in particular jails for less time than it takes to litigate a case to completion, and their transfer or release from those facilities will typically moot their requests for injunctive relief, as here. RLUIPA specifically extends its protection to jail inmates, see 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000cc–1(a), 1997(1)(B)(ii), and so, since opportunities for injunctive relief will frequently be fleeting, damages are even more 'appropriate' than they otherwise would be. Furthermore, the congressional admonition that RLUIPA 'shall be construed in favor of a broad protection of religious exercise, to the maximum extent permitted by the terms of this chapter and the Constitution,'. . . would be hard to square with a congressional intent to place the most common form of relief outside the bounds of what is appropriate. The Supreme Court's decision in Tanzin v. Tanvir, 592 U.S. 43, 141 S.Ct. 486, 208 L.Ed.2d 295 (2020) furnishes instructive guidance. In that case, the Court considered a question under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) similar to the one we now confront. The Supreme Court has described RFRA as RLUIPA's 'sister statute,' and indeed Congress enacted RLUIPA to fill part of the void created when the Court held that RFRA did not apply to states and their subdivisions. . . Like RLUIPA, RFRA permits a plaintiff to sue to recover 'appropriate relief against a government' when it substantially burdens a person's exercise of religion without furthering a compelling governmental interest. . .The Court in Tanzin unanimously held that a damage remedy fits the bill. . . It explained that 'damages have long been awarded as appropriate relief' in suits against government officials and are still 'commonly available' against them, such as in § 1983 suits for clearly established violations of the First Amendment. . . The Court also observed that Congress knew how to limit RFRA plaintiffs to injunctive relief but did not do so. . . The same could be said for the availability of damages in a RLUIPA action given the similar contexts in which RFRA and RLUIPA operate and the fact that Congress knows how to limit the types of relief available no less with RLUIPA than with RFRA. . . . We therefore conclude that the district court erred in dismissing Barnett's RLUIPA claim against the county. We recognize that there might be some uncertainty as to whether Barnett is seeking to hold the county liable simply because it employs Short and, if so, whether RLUIPA permits claims based on vicarious liability. But the district court did not consider these questions, and the parties on appeal do not discuss them. So we leave it for the district court on remand to resolve these matters in the first instance should the parties choose to raise them. Though Barnett's RLUIPA claim against the county may proceed, his RLUIPA claim against Short is a different matter. We do not disagree with Barnett's contention that RLUIPA's text appears to subject Short to liability for damages. Once again, RLUIPA permits claims against a 'government,'. . . and it defines 'government' to include county officials and 'any other person acting under color of State law.'. . That language permits suits against individual defendants in both their official and individual capacities. . . But we conclude that Congress's authorization of suits against non-recipients of federal money in their individual capacities exceeds its spending power. That's because 'the legitimacy of Congress' power to enact Spending Clause legislation rests not on its sovereign authority to enact binding laws, but on whether the recipient voluntarily and knowingly accepts the terms of that "contract."'. . Short has not consented to any conditions of federal funding, so it's hard to understand how Congress's spending power can be brought to bear on her directly. . . . We do not decide whether Short's acceptance of employment at the jail somehow amounts to her consent to the conditions Congress imposed on her employer because Barnett doesn't argue the point; he simply says that Short's consent isn't required, but we disagree. It appears we are in the company of every other circuit to have considered the matter, both before and after the Supreme Court held in Tanzin . . . that plaintiffs could assert RFRA claims against defendants in their individual capacities. See, e.g., Tripathy v. McKoy, 103 F.4th 106, 114 (2d Cir. 2024); Landor v. La. Dep't of Corr. & Pub. Safety, 82 F.4th 337, 342–44 (5th Cir. 2023). As the Fifth Circuit once explained, 'only the grant recipient ... may be liable for its violation,' since 'individual RLUIPA defendants are not parties to the contract in their individual capacities.'")

Compare Haight v. Thompson, 763 F.3d 554, 568-70 (6th Cir. 2014) ("In the face of Sossamon, the inmates make a thought-provoking, but in the end unconvincing, argument. For all of the similarities between this case and that one, they note, one thing is missing: Sossamon considered lawsuits against prison officials in their official capacity, not a claim against the prison officials in their individual capacity. Because lawsuits against state officials in their official capacity amount to lawsuits against the State for purposes of Eleventh Amendment (and other constitutional) immunities, and because lawsuits against state officials in their individual capacity do not, they insist that the clear-statement rule does not apply to this claim for monetary relief. Put another way, even if Sossamon establishes that the phrase 'appropriate relief' fails to satisfy the clear-statement rule, it does not establish that the clear-statement rule applies to this claim for relief. In making this argument, the inmates understate the coverage of the clear-statement rule. Clarity is demanded whenever Congress legislates through the spending power, whether related to waivers of sovereign immunity or not. . . One of the distinguishing features of the spending power is that it allows Congress to exceed its otherwise limited and enumerated powers by regulating in areas that the vertical structural protections of the Constitution would not otherwise permit. . . So long as States consent to the bargain—receiving federal funds in return for allowing Congress to regulate where it otherwise could not—the Constitution permits the arrangement. This feature of the spending power requires clarity throughout, not just in money-damages actions against state officials sued in their official capacity. . . . Because the imperative of clarity applies in all of these settings and because Sossamon establishes that the phrase 'appropriate relief' does not clearly entitle a claimant to money damages, the claimants' request for money damages must fail. . . . We have considerable company in reaching this conclusion. Every circuit to consider the question, whether before Sossamon or after, has held that RLUIPA does not permit money damages against state prison officials, even when the lawsuit targets the defendants in their individual capacities. See Washington v. Gonyea, 731 F .3d 143, 145–46 (2d Cir.2013); Stewart v. Beach, 701 F.3d 1322, 1334–35 (10th Cir.2012); Sharp v. Johnson, 669 F.3d 144, 153 (3d Cir.2012); Nelson v. Miller, 570 F.3d 868, 886–89 (7th Cir.2009); Rendelman v. Rouse, 569 F.3d 182, 186–89 (4th Cir.2009); Sossamon v. Texas, 560 F.3d 316, 327–29 (5th Cir.2009); Smith v. Allen, 502 F.3d 1255, 1271–75 (11th Cir.2007). Some of these cases, it is true, chart a different path. Some hold that because spending-power legislation is in the nature of a contract and because the State, not the defendant prison officials, receives money under the federal legislation, it would be inappropriate to impose a money-damages remedy on local prison officials. . . With respect, this approach proves too much. If accepted, it would mean that even an eminently clear statute—say, that 'plaintiffs could obtain money damages in actions against state and local prison officials, whether sued in their official or individual capacity'—would not permit money damages. That is not consistent with Dole or Arlington Central or Pennhurst itself.") with Haight v. Thompson, 763 F.3d 554, 570-72 (6th Cir. 2014) (Cole, J., concurring) ("Although I agree that the plaintiffs cannot recover from the prison officials in their individual capacities, I respectfully depart from the majority's analysis. I do so for two reasons: first, to explain why Sossamon v. Texas, 131 S.Ct. 1651 (2011), does not resolve the money-damages claim, and second, to express my view that we do not need to reach the plaintiffs' argument that RLUIPA's Commerce Clause basis authorizes money damages. There can be no question that Sossamon was decided on narrow grounds specific to the legal framework at issue in that case—namely, sovereign immunity. Indeed, the Court noted that 'the word "appropriate" is inherently context-dependent,' and then went on to conclude that '[t]he context here—where the defendant is a sovereign—suggests ... that monetary damages are not "suitabl"' or "proper."'. . Sossamon does not establish that RLUIPA's provision for 'appropriate relief' categorically excludes monetary damages. It establishes only that the term 'does not so clearly and unambiguously waive sovereign immunity to private suits for damages that we can be certain that the State in fact consents to such a suit.'. . The majority's reliance on Sossamon has the virtue of simplicity, but it ignores the fact that courts operate under different presumptions when encountering a request for monetary relief from a state, as opposed to a request for monetary relief from an officer sued in his or her individual capacity. When a plaintiff sues the state, we presume that money damages are unavailable, unless the state has consented to an express waiver of its immunity. . . In contrast, we regularly grant monetary relief to plaintiffs who successfully sue officers in their personal capacities. . . It is therefore fair to assume that a provision for 'appropriate relief' would not authorize money damages from the state absent the state's waiver, but would authorize them from personal-capacity defendants absent some other legal principle limiting the scope of the term 'appropriate.' That other legal principle can be found in Arlington Central—a case that should be central to our Spending Clause analysis. There, the Court extended Pennhurst's clear-statement principle to apply not only to the conditions a Spending Clause enactment places on participating states, but also to the remedies the enactment makes available when a state fails to comply. . .Thus, the Court concluded that a provision allowing plaintiffs to collect 'reasonable attorneys' fees as part of the costs' of bringing suit did not encompass expert fees because the statute had failed to put the states on notice that they could be liable for this expense. . . Arlington Central controls here and requires that RLUIPA 'furnish[ ] clear notice regarding the liability at issue.'. . In my view, RLUIPA's provision for 'appropriate relief' does not 'unambiguously authorize' prisoners to recover money damages from prison officials. . . I therefore agree with my colleagues that the relief the plaintiffs seek is not available.")

See also Davila v. Gladden, 777 F.3d 1198, 1209-12 (11th Cir. 2015) ("After careful consideration, we conclude that Congress did not clearly waive sovereign immunity to authorize suits for money damages against officers in their official capacities under RFRA. Also, even if we were to assume the statute authorizes suits for money damages against officers in their individual capacities, we hold that the Defendants here would be entitled to qualified immunity. . . .In Sossamon v. Texas, . . . the Supreme Court held that identical 'appropriate relief' language in the related statute RLUIPA did not waive states' sovereign immunity from money damages. . . .The only two circuit courts to address whether RFRA waived the federal government's sovereign immunity have held that it did not. [citing Oklevueha Native Am. Church of Haw., Inc. v. Holder, 676 F.3d 829, 841 (9th Cir.2012) and Webman v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, 441 F.3d 1022, 1026 (D.C.Cir.2006)]. . . . We recognize that in Sossamon, the Court was addressing the sovereign immunity of the states. . . However, the Court's analysis in addressing the ambiguity of 'appropriate relief' applies equally to issues of federal sovereign immunity. Congress did not unequivocally waive its sovereign immunity in passing RFRA. RFRA does not therefore authorize suits for money damages against officers in their official capacities. . . . Second, we decline to address whether RFRA authorizes suits against officers in their individual capacities. Even if RFRA did authorize individual-capacity suits for money damages, these Defendants would be entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Whether or not the District Court concludes that the Defendants violated Mr. Davila's rights under RFRA at trial, the law preexisting the Defendants' conduct did not compel the conclusion that their actions violated RFRA. . . . Officers are entitled to clear notice about how their actions violate federal rights. In order to do away with qualified immunity for these offices, it must have been clearly established under RFRA that a prisoner can get religious property from outside sources when the religious items available through authorized means are not sufficient to meet the prisoner's religious needs. Mr. Davila has offered no prior case clearly establishing that proposition. . . . So even if Mr. Davila is successful at trial in proving a RFRA violation, these Defendants would be protected from paying money damages in their individual capacities.")

See also McNeil v. Community Probation Services, LLC, 803 F. App'x 846, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) ("All factors considered, Tennessee private probation companies do not act for the State and thus may not invoke Tennessee's sovereign immunity in this lawsuit. Reinforcing this conclusion is a more concrete reality: We know of no case in which a private probation company has successfully invoked sovereign immunity."); Kreipke v. Wayne State Univ., 807 F.3d 768, 775 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Which test we should apply to determine whether WSU is a state agency and therefore not a 'person' under the FCA is a matter of first impression in this Circuit. The circuits that have considered this issue have unanimously held that courts should apply the same test used to determine whether an entity is an 'arm of the state' entitled to sovereign immunity under the Eleventh Amendment. See U.S. ex rel. Lesinski v. S. Fla. Water Mgmt. Dist., 739 F.3d 598, 602 (11th Cir.2014) (joining the Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Tenth Circuits in adopting the 'arm of the state' analysis under the Eleventh Amendment for purposes of the FCA). These other circuits reached this conclusion based, in part, on the Supreme Court's observation in Stevens that the scope of the inquiry into whether an entity is a 'person' under the FCA is virtually identical to the sovereign immunity inquiry under the Eleventh Amendment. . . Indeed, the Supreme Court has since underscored 'the virtual coincidence of scope' between the two inquiries, Stevens, 529 U .S. at 780, by holding that, in contrast to states and state agencies, the term 'person' under the FCA includes local governments and municipalities. . .The definition of a 'person' under the FCA therefore parallels the limitations on sovereign immunity under the Eleventh Amendment, as Eleventh Amendment immunity extends to state and state agencies, but not to local governments and municipalities. In light of this similarity and consistent with the Supreme Court's guidance in Stevens, we also adopt the arm-of-the-state analysis under the Eleventh Amendment to determine whether an entity is a state agency excluded from liability under the FCA.")

J. 28 U.S.C. § 1367(a): Supplemental Jurisdiction

28 U.S.C. § 1367(a) states that:

> Except as provided in subsection (b) and (c) or as expressly provided otherwise by Federal statute, in any civil action of which the district courts have original jurisdiction, the district courts shall have supplemental jurisdiction over all other claims that are so related to claims in the action within such original jurisdiction that they form part of the same case or controversy under Article III of the United States Constitution. Such supplemental jurisdiction shall include claims that involve the joinder or intervention of additional parties.

The statute applies to actions commenced on or after the date of its enactment, December 1, 1990, and responds to the Supreme Court's refusal to acknowledge pendent party jurisdiction without a clear indication of Congressional intent to create such jurisdiction. See Finley v. United States, 490 U.S. 545 (1989).

By expanding the scope of the federal court's power to hear claims that previously would have kept the litigation in state court, ' 1367(a) will no doubt serve to increase the number of section 1983 suits filed in the federal forum.

1. With respect to local government defendants, § 1367(a) permits plaintiffs to include the governmental entity as a pendent party defendant when no policy or custom claim may exist under § 1983, but where state law might allow recovery on a respondeat superior basis. Given § 1367(a), the rationale of Aldinger v. Howard, 427 U.S. 1 (1976), rejecting pendent party jurisdiction in such a setting, would no longer be controlling. See, e.g., Cameron v. Craig, 713 F.3d 1012, 1023-24 (9th Cir. 2013) ("Because California has rejected the Monell rule, see Cal. Gov't Code § 815.2, state law 'imposes liability on counties under the doctrine of respondeat superior for acts of county employees; it grants immunity to counties only where the public employee would also be immune.' Robinson, 278 F.3d at 1016. The defendants do not raise any state statutory immunities. Thus, should Cameron prevail on her excessive force claim, liability could extend to the County.")

2. Supplemental jurisdiction would also allow retention of state law claims against individual officials who might be dismissed from the § 1983 action on grounds of qualified immunity, assuming that the § 1983 action remains alive against the local government unit.

3. Section 1367(a) would provide supplemental jurisdiction for claims against purely private actors, where those claims are appropriately related to the § 1983 claims against the state actors.

4. Where a state has waived its Eleventh Amendment immunity and consented to suit, a state may be named as a defendant on a state law claim, where that claim is part of the same "case or controversy" as the § 1983 claim(s) against the state actors. Rosen v. Chang, 758 F. Supp. 799, 803-04 (D.R.I. 1991).

NOTE: Section 1367(d) provides in part that '[t]he period of limitations for any claim asserted under subsection (a) ... shall be tolled while the claim is pending and for a period of 30 days after it is dismissed unless State law provides for a longer tolling period.' The Supreme Court has rejected a constitutional challenge to that section. See Jinks v. Richland County, 123 S. Ct. 1667, 1673 (2003) ("Section 1367(d) tolls the limitations period with respect to state-law causes of action brought against municipalities, but we see no reason why that represents a greater intrusion on 'state sovereignty' than the undisputed power of Congress to override state-law immunity when subjecting a municipality to suit under a federal cause of action. In either case, a State's authority to set the conditions upon which its political subdivisions are subject to suit in its own courts must yield to the enactments of Congress. This is not an encroachment on 'state sovereignty,' but merely the consequence of those cases. . .which hold that municipalities, unlike States, do not enjoy a constitutionally protected immunity from suit.").

K. Pre-Iqbal: No Heightened Pleading Requirement For Monell Claims

Although Fed. R. Civ. P. 8 requires only "notice pleading," plaintiffs attempting to impose Monell liability upon a governmental unit had been required, in some circuits, to plead with particularity the existence of an official policy or custom which could be causally linked to the claimed underlying violation. See, e.g., Strauss v. City of Chicago, 760 F.2d 765 (7th Cir. 1985).

In Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 113 S. Ct. 1160 (1993), the Supreme Court unanimously rejected the "heightened pleading standard" in cases alleging municipal liability. While leaving open the question of "whether our qualified immunity jurisprudence would require a heightened pleading in cases involving individual government officials," [See Blum's Qualified Immunity Outline] the Supreme Court refused to equate a municipality's freedom from respondeat superior liability with immunity from suit. 113 S.Ct. at 1162.

Finding it "impossible to square the 'heightened pleading requirement' . . . with the liberal system of 'notice pleading' set up by the Federal Rules[,]" the Court suggested that Federal Rules 8 and 9(b) would have to be rewritten to incorporate such a "heightened pleading standard." Id. at 1163. The Court concluded by noting that "[i]n the absence of such an amendment, federal courts and litigants must rely on summary judgment and control of discovery to weed out unmeritorious claims sooner rather than later." Id.

In Crawford-El v. Britton, 118 S. Ct. 1584 (1998), the Court addressed the "broad question [of] whether the courts of appeals may craft special procedural rules" for cases in which a plaintiff's substantive constitutional claim requires proof of improper motive and "the more specific question [of] whether, at least in cases brought by prisoners, the plaintiff must adduce clear and convincing evidence of improper motive in order to defeat a motion for summary judgment." Id. at 1587. In striking down the D.C. Circuit's "clear and convincing" burden of proof requirement in such cases, a five-member majority of the Court, in an opinion written by Justice Stevens, clarified that the Court's holding in Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 731 (1982), that "bare allegations of malice" cannot overcome the qualified immunity defense, "did not implicate the elements of the plaintiff's initial burden of proving a constitutional violation." 118 S. Ct. at 1592. The Court noted that "although evidence of improper motive is irrelevant on the issue of qualified immunity, it may be an essential component of the plaintiff's affirmative case. Our holding in Harlow, which related only to the scope of an affirmative defense, provides no support for making any change in the nature of the plaintiff's burden of proving a constitutional violation." Id. The Court explained that the subjective component of the qualified immunity defense that was jettisoned in Harlow "permitted an open-ended inquiry into subjective motivation [with the] primary focus . . . on any possible animus directed at the plaintiff." Id. at 1594. Such an open-ended inquiry precluded summary judgment in many cases where officials had not violated clearly established constitutional rights. "When intent is an element of a constitutional violation, however, the primary focus is not on any possible animus directed at the plaintiff; rather, it is more specific, such as an intent to disadvantage all members of a class that includes the plaintiff . . . or to deter public comment on a specific issue of public importance." Id.

Sensitive to the concerns about subjecting public officials to discovery and trial in cases involving insubstantial claims, the Court noted that existing substantive law "already prevents this more narrow element of unconstitutional motive from automatically carrying a plaintiff to trial[,]" and "various procedural mechanisms already enable trial judges to weed out baseless claims that feature a subjective element . . . ." Id.

First, under the substantive law on which plaintiff relies, there may be some doubt as to the whether the defendant's conduct was unlawful. The Court gave as an example the question of whether the plaintiff's speech was on a matter of public concern. Second, where plaintiff must establish both motive and causation, a defendant may still prevail at summary judgment by, for example, showing that defendant would have made the same decision in the absence of the protected conduct. Id.

The Court noted two procedural devices available to trial judges that could be used prior to any discovery. First, the district court may order a reply under Fed. R. Civ. P. 7(a), or grant a defendant's motion for a more definite statement under Rule 12(e). As the Court noted, this option of ordering the plaintiff to come forward with "specific, nonconclusory factual allegations" of improper motive exists whether or not the defendant raises the qualified immunity defense. 118 S. Ct. at 1596-97. Second, where the defendant does raise qualified immunity, the district court should resolve the threshold question before discovery.

> To do so, the court must determine whether, assuming the truth of the plaintiff's allegations, the official's conduct violated clearly established law. [footnote omitted] Because the former option of demanding more specific allegations of intent places no burden on the defendant-official, the district judge may choose that alternative before resolving the immunity question, which sometimes requires complicated analysis of legal issues. If the plaintiff's action survives these initial hurdles and is otherwise viable, the plaintiff ordinarily will be entitled to some discovery. Rule 26 vests the trial judge with broad discretion to tailor discovery narrowly and to dictate the sequence of discovery.

Id. at 1597.

The majority opinion concluded that "[n]either the text of § 1983 or any other federal statute, nor the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, provides any support for imposing the clear and convincing burden of proof on plaintiffs either at the summary judgment stage or in the trial itself." Id. at 1595. Instead of the categorical rule established by the Court of Appeals, the Court endorsed broad discretion on the part of trial judges in the management of the factfinding process. Id. at 1598.

Chief Justice Rehnquist dissented, and formulated the following test for motive-based constitutional claims:

> [W]hen a plaintiff alleges that an official's action was taken with an unconstitutional or otherwise unlawful motive, the defendant will be entitled to immunity and immediate dismissal of the suit if he can offer a lawful reason for his action and the plaintiff cannot establish, through objective evidence, that the offered reason is actually a pretext.

Id. at 1600 (Rehnquist, C.J., joined by O'Connor, J., dissenting).

Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, dissented and proposed the adoption of a test that would impose "a more severe restriction upon 'intent-based' constitutional torts." Id. at 1604. (Scalia, J., joined by Thomas, J., dissenting). Under Justice Scalia's proposed test, > [O]nce the trial court finds that the asserted grounds for the official action were objectively valid (e.g., the person fired for alleged incompetence was indeed incompetent), it would not admit any proof that something other than those reasonable grounds was the genuine motive (e.g., the incompetent person fired was a Republican).

Id.

For the Court's most recent reinforcement of the proposition that heightened pleading is not required unless specified by the Rules, see Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 2200 (2007) ("It was error for the Court of Appeals to conclude that the allegations in question, concerning harm caused petitioner by the termination of his medication, were too conclusory to establish for pleading purposes that petitioner had suffered 'a cognizable independent harm' as a result of his removal from the hepatitis C treatment program. . . . The complaint stated that Dr. Bloor's decision to remove petitioner from his prescribed hepatitis C medication was 'endangering [his] life.' . .It alleged this medication was withheld 'shortly after' petitioner had commenced a treatment program that would take one year, that he was 'still in need of treatment for this disease,' and that the prison officials were in the meantime refusing to provide treatment. . . This alone was enough to satisfy Rule 8(a)(2). Petitioner, in addition, bolstered his claim by making more specific allegations in documents attached to the complaint and in later filings. The Court of Appeals' departure from the liberal pleading standards set forth by Rule 8(a)(2) is even more pronounced in this particular case because petitioner has been proceeding, from the litigation's outset, without counsel."); Hill v. McDonough, 126 S. Ct. 2096, 2103 (2006) ("Specific pleading requirements are mandated by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and not, as a general rule, through case-by-case determinations of the federal courts."); Swierkiewicz v. Sorema, 122 S. Ct. 992, 998 (2002) ("Rule 8(a)'s simplified pleading standard applies to all civil actions, with limited exceptions. Rule 9(b), for example, provides for greater particularity in all averments of fraud or mistake. [footnote omitted] This Court, however, has declined to extend such exceptions to other contexts. . . . Just as Rule 9(b) makes no mention of municipal liability under Rev. Stat. '1979, 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (1994 ed., Supp. V), neither does it refer to employment discrimination. Thus, complaints in these cases, as in most others, must satisfy only the simple requirements of Rule 8(a).").

See also Jones v. Bock, 127 S. Ct. 910, 918, 919, 921, 926 (2007) ("There is no question that exhaustion is mandatory under the PLRA and that unexhausted claims cannot be brought in court. . . What is less clear is whether it falls to the prisoner to plead and demonstrate exhaustion in the complaint, or to the defendant to raise lack of exhaustion as an affirmative defense. The minority rule, adopted by the Sixth Circuit, places the burden of pleading exhaustion in a case covered by the PLRA on the prisoner; most courts view failure to exhaust as an affirmative defense. . . We think petitioners, and the majority of courts to consider the question, have the better of the argument. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a) requires simply a 'short and plain statement of the claim' in a complaint, while Rule 8(c) identifies a nonexhaustive list of affirmative defenses that must be pleaded in response. The PLRA itself is not a source of a prisoner's claim; claims covered by the PLRA are typically brought under 42 U. S. C. § 1983, which does not require exhaustion at all, see Patsy v. Board of Regents of Fla., 457 U. S. 496, 516 (1982). Petitioners assert that courts typically regard exhaustion as an affirmative defense in other contexts. . . and respondents do not seriously dispute the general proposition. . . The PLRA dealt extensively with the subject of exhaustion, see 42 U. S. C. ''1997e(a), (c)(2), but is silent on the issue whether exhaustion must be pleaded by the plaintiff or is an affirmative defense. This is strong evidence that the usual practice should be followed, and the usual practice under the Federal Rules is to regard exhaustion as an affirmative defense. In a series of recent cases, we have explained that courts should generally not depart from the usual practice under the Federal Rules on the basis of perceived policy concerns. [citing Leatherman, Swierkiewicz and Hill] . . . . We think that the PLRA's screening requirement does not − explicitly or implicitly − justify deviating from the usual procedural practice beyond the departures specified by the PLRA itself . . . . We conclude that failure to exhaust is an affirmative defense under the PLRA, and that inmates are not required to specially plead or demonstrate exhaustion in their complaints. We understand the reasons behind the decisions of some lower courts to impose a pleading requirement on plaintiffs in this context, but that effort cannot fairly be viewed as an interpretation of the PLRA. 'Whatever temptations the statesmanship of policy-making might wisely suggest,' the judge's job is to construe the statute − not to make it better.'. . . We are not insensitive to the challenges faced by the lower federal courts in managing their dockets and attempting to separate, when it comes to prisoner suits, not so much wheat from chaff as needles from haystacks. We once again reiterate, however − as we did unanimously in Leatherman, Swierkiewicz, and Hill − that adopting different and more onerous pleading rules to deal with particular categories of cases should be done through established rulemaking procedures, and not on a case-by-case basis by the courts."); Albino v. Baca, 747 F.3d 1162, 1166 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc) ("First, although it may be more a matter of a change of nomenclature than of practical operation, we overrule Wyatt v. Terhune, 315 F.3d 1108, 1119 (9th Cir.2003), in which we held that a failure to exhaust under § 1997e(a) should be raised by a defendant as an 'unenumerated Rule 12(b) motion.' We conclude that a failure to exhaust is more appropriately handled under the framework of the existing rules than under an 'unenumerated' (that is, non-existent) rule. Failure to exhaust under the PLRA is 'an affirmative defense the defendant must plead and prove.' Jones v.. Bock, 549 U.S. 199, 204, 216 (2007). In the rare event that a failure to exhaust is clear on the face of the complaint, a defendant may move for dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6). Otherwise, defendants must produce evidence proving failure to exhaust in order to carry their burden. If undisputed evidence viewed in the light most favorable to the prisoner shows a failure to exhaust, a defendant is entitled to summary judgment under Rule 56. If material facts are disputed, summary judgment should be denied, and the district judge rather than a jury should determine the facts. Second, we hold that Albino has satisfied the exhaustion requirement of § 1997e(a). Defendants have failed to prove that administrative remedies were available at the jail where Albino was confined. Because no administrative remedies were available, he is excused from any obligation to exhaust under § 1997e(a). We therefore direct the district court to grant summary judgment to Albino on the issue of exhaustion.").

On exhaustion requirements under the PLRA, compare Garrett v. Wexford Health, 938 F.3d 69, 84 & n.21, 86-91 (3d Cir. 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. ___ (2020) ("When he filed the TAC, Garrett was no longer a prisoner and therefore was not subject to the PLRA's administrative exhaustion requirement. . . Thus, because it relates back to the original complaint, the TAC cures the original filing defect. . . . A recent decision by the Tenth Circuit, May v. Segovia, 929 F.3d 1223 (10th Cir. 2019), takes a contrary view of the operation of Rule 15. In May, the Court decided that Rule 15 relates back to the original complaint for purposes of the PLRA's exhaustion requirement, concluding that an amended complaint 'supersedes the original complaint's allegations but not its timing.'. . In addition, the May Court took the view that relation back for purposes of cure is only permissible when the pleading flaw is jurisdictional in nature and is therefore an affirmative pleading requirement. . . The Tenth Circuit's approach is at odds with our decision in T Mobile. We therefore decline to adopt it. . . . We acknowledged the Commonwealth's concession that Ahmed would not have been barred from filing a new § 1983 complaint following his release, and that any new matter would not have been subject to the PLRA's strictures. But we declared that Ahmed was 'bound by the PLRA because his suit was filed ... almost three years before he was released from prison.'. . In applying Ahmed to Garrett's case, the District Court concluded that the filing of the initial complaint was the unalterable starting point from which to consider a plaintiff's status as a prisoner. This over-reads Ahmed, the post-judgment posture of which renders it inapposite to Garrett's case. Ahmed was a prisoner subject to the PLRA when he filed his complaint, and he remained a prisoner subject to the PLRA when the District Court entered its final judgment. Because he sought to reopen a final judgment, the policy favoring the finality of judgments was implicated. The permissive policy favoring amendment under Rule 15 was simply not relevant. . . In the post-judgment context, the narrow grounds for relief set forth in Rules 59 and 60 must guide a District Court's decision about whether an otherwise-final judgment should be disturbed. . . . Thus, a different set of rules emphasizing vastly different policies pertained to the motion in Ahmed, and those rules do not apply to Garrett's case. . . .Bock teaches, then, that the usual procedural rules apply to PLRA cases unless the PLRA specifies otherwise, and that a decision about whether to apply the usual procedural rules should not be guided by 'perceived policy concerns.'. . Applying these important principles, we conclude that the PLRA does not override the usual operation of Rule 15 here. Accordingly, Garrett's status as a non-prisoner at the time he filed the TAC is determinative of the Medical Defendants' administrative exhaustion defense. . . . Looking beyond our own case law, a sister Circuit has applied Bock to circumstances similar to Garrett's, and that Court reached a conclusion consistent with how we decide the instant matter. In Jackson v. Fong, 870 F.3d 928 (9th Cir. 2017), the Ninth Circuit considered whether Jackson, a prisoner who filed an initial complaint before administratively exhausting his claims, and who was granted leave to amend his complaint after his release, continued to be subject to the PLRA's exhaustion requirement. As the Ninth Circuit summed up the matter, Jackson's case turned on 'whether the court should look to the initiation of the suit (when Jackson was a prisoner, and had not exhausted his remedies), or to Jackson's operative third amended complaint (filed when Jackson was not a prisoner, and the exhaustion requirement did not apply).'. .The Ninth Circuit observed that the operative complaint 'completely supersedes' any earlier complaints, and that Bock directs that an exhaustion defense under the PLRA should be considered within the framework of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. . . Applying these principles, the Court concluded that Jackson's 'amended complaint, filed when he was no longer a prisoner, obviates an exhaustion defense.'. . In reaching its decision, the Ninth Circuit explicitly chose not to follow our opinion in Ahmed, both because Ahmed predates Bock and because it did not apply Rule 15. . .The Jackson Court dismissed several of the defendants' policy concerns about the potential for its holding to lead to litigation abuse by prisoners. It observed, for instance, that Rule 15 permits a District Court discretion to deny leave to amend, particularly where a prisoner appears to be 'gaming the courts' in some manner. . . In addition, the Court observed that an administrative exhaustion requirement after a prisoner's release would not serve the purpose of permitting officials to address problems internally because, after release, 'there is no internal [grievance] process left to undermine.'. . Because Jackson could have chosen to file a new suit but did not do so, his decision to amend promoted judicial economy. Id. Finally—and most importantly—the Ninth Circuit observed that, under Bock, it did not have license to rely on policy concerns in carving out exceptions to the Federal Rules in any event. . . Here, the Medical Defendants contend that we should not follow Jackson. . . . The[ir] arguments are unpersuasive. The decision of whether to permit a plaintiff to file an amended or supplemental complaint under Rule 15 is within a District Court's discretion and is guided by Rule 15's liberal standards. . . . The problem with [defendants'] arguments is that they are the sort of 'perceived policy concerns' that the Supreme Court has directed cannot dictate whether we apply the usual pleading rules. . . .We decline to adopt the Eleventh Circuit's analysis. Harris, which was decided prior to the Supreme Court's decision in Bock, purports to rely on the 'plain and ordinary meaning' of the language of the PLRA—namely, the '[n]o ... action may be brought' language. . . In Bock, the Supreme Court described the nearly identical language of the PLRA's exhaustion provision as 'boilerplate language' that should not 'lead to the dismissal of an entire action if a single claim fails to meet the pertinent standards.'. . Applying Bock, as we must, we cannot agree with the Eleventh Circuit's interpretation. The PLRA is not sufficiently plain in its meaning to override the usual operation of Rule 15. . . In sum, we conclude that there is nothing in the PLRA to indicate that a plaintiff cannot employ Rule 15 to file a supplemental pleading to cure an initial filing defect. Because Garrett filed the TAC as a non-prisoner, administrative exhaustion was not an appropriate basis for its dismissal. We will therefore vacate the District Court's dismissal of Garrett's claims against the Medical Defendants for failure to exhaust administrative remedies.") with May v. Segovia, 929 F.3d 1223, 1228-29, 1231-34 (10th Cir. 2019) ("According to Mr. May, the SAC superseded his previous complaints when it was deemed filed in January 2016. Because the filing occurred after his release, he argues that, for the purposes of the exhaustion requirement, his prisoner status must be determined at that point. . . . The amended complaint, as the operative complaint, supersedes the original complaint's allegations but not its timing. . . . Mr. May relies on the Ninth Circuit's opinion in Jackson v. Fong, 870 F.3d 928 (9th Cir. 2017), for the proposition that we look only to the timing of the SAC when determining the applicability of the PLRA. Fong presents a factual scenario similar to Mr. May's. The plaintiff in Fong—Mr. Jackson—was a prisoner in the midst of his final administrative appeal when he filed his original complaint. . . Shortly after filing his suit, Mr. Jackson moved to amend his complaint. But before that motion was granted, as with Mr. May, he was released from custody. .

. . Relying on Jones and circuit caselaw, the [Ninth Circuit] determined that to require Mr. Jackson to exhaust would 'ignore[ ] the general rule' that 'a supplemental complaint "completely super[s]edes any earlier complaint, rendering the original complaint non-existent and, thus, its filing date irrelevant."'. . Despite the similar facts, Fong is distinguishable. There, the operative complaint was 'a supplemental complaint within the meaning of Rule 15(d).'. . Under Rule 15(d), a plaintiff may amend his complaint to account for 'any transaction, occurrence, or event that happened after the date of the pleading to be supplemented.'. . It is axiomatic that a supplemental complaint, filed after the plaintiff has been released from prison and raising claims that 'happened after the date of the pleadings to be supplemented,' would not be subject to the exhaustion requirement. Such claims would have been 'brought' for purpose of the PLRA by a non-prisoner. As Jones implies, the district court reviewing an amended complaint filed under Rule 15(d) would have the responsibility, when the exhaustion defense is raised, to differentiate between claims that are exhausted—or to which the exhaustion requirement does not apply because they were first brought after the plaintiff was released from prison—and claims that are unexhausted, dismissing the latter and allowing the former to proceed. . . But that is not this case. The SAC was not filed under Rule 15(d) because Mr. May's Bivens claim did not arise from transactions or events that occurred after the First Amended Complaint. Indeed, it is undisputed that his only claim on appeal was first raised, at the latest, in the First Amended Complaint, which was filed eight months prior to his release. But even if we were to agree that Fong is on point, Mr. Segovia contends the PLRA would still require Mr. May to exhaust his administrative remedies. Fong cited another Ninth Circuit case—Rhodes v. Robinson—approvingly, and there the Ninth Circuit held that new claims were 'brought' for purposes of the PLRA exhaustion requirement when the supplemental complaint was 'tendered' to the court for filing, not when the court deemed it filed. . . .We have not yet adopted this approach in the Tenth Circuit. Mr. Segovia argues, for the first time on appeal, that we should do so now. . . Mr. May contends that a combination of Jones and our circuit precedents forecloses adoption of the tender rule. . . . The timing of the claims, as opposed to the sufficiency of the allegations, was not before us in Murray, and our opinion there should not be construed as addressing the timing-allegation distinction. Thus, Murray does not preclude us from adopting the tender rule and we do so now. . . .In summary, we conclude that Mr. May was a prisoner within the meaning of the PLRA when he brought his due-process claim, irrespective of which complaint first introduced his due process claim, and thus, he was required to exhaust any available administrative remedies as to that claim.")

See also Hayes v. Dahlke, 976 F.3d 259, 270-71 (2d Cir. 2020) ("We therefore hold that, because the DOCCS Inmate Grievance Procedure imposes a mandatory deadline for the CORC to respond, an inmate exhausts administrative remedies when he follows the procedure in its entirety but the CORC fails to respond within the 30 days it is allocated under the regulations. We decline to impose a 'reasonableness' requirement found nowhere in the text, which would leave inmates – and courts – to blindly speculate how long one must wait before filing suit. . . . In reaching this decision, we join six other circuits that have considered state prison procedures with similar mandatory deadlines and found that the administrative remedies were either exhausted or 'unavailable' when the prison did not respond within the allotted time. . . .Because we rule on exhaustion alone, we decline to consider whether the administrative procedures here were so 'opaque' that they are 'unavailable' under Ross. In doing so, we avoid wading into the often complex and highly fact-specific inquiries of the unavailability exception.")

L. Twombly, Iqbal, and Post-Iqbal Cases Asserting Monell Claims

Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1968, 1969, 1974 (2007) ("Justice Black's opinion for the Court in Conley v. Gibson spoke not only of the need for fair notice of the grounds for entitlement to relief but of 'the accepted rule that a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief.'. . This 'no set of facts' language can be read in isolation as saying that any statement revealing the theory of the claim will suffice unless its factual impossibility may be shown from the face of the pleadings; and the Court of Appeals appears to have read Conley in some such way when formulating its understanding of the proper pleading standard . . . . On such a focused and literal reading of Conley's 'no set of facts,' a wholly conclusory statement of claim would survive a motion to dismiss whenever the pleadings left open the possibility that a plaintiff might later establish some 'set of [undisclosed] facts' to support recovery. So here, the Court of Appeals specifically found the prospect of unearthing direct evidence of conspiracy sufficient to preclude dismissal, even though the complaint does not set forth a single fact in a context that suggests an agreement. . . . [A] good many judges and commentators have balked at taking the literal terms of the Conley passage as a pleading standard. [citing cases and commentators] We could go on, but there is no need to pile up further citations to show that Conley's 'no set of facts' language has been questioned, criticized, and explained away long enough. . . . [A]fter puzzling the profession for 50 years, this famous observation has earned its retirement. The phrase is best forgotten as an incomplete, negative gloss on an accepted pleading standard: once a claim has been stated adequately, it may be supported by showing any set of facts consistent with the allegations in the complaint. . . .Conley, then, described the breadth of opportunity to prove what an adequate complaint claims, not the minimum standard of adequate pleading to govern a complaint's survival. . . . [W]e do not require heightened fact pleading of specifics, but only enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face. Because the plaintiffs here have not nudged their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible, their complaint must be dismissed.").

Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1942, 1943, 1949-54 (2009) ("This case . . . turns on a narrower question: Did respondent, as the plaintiff in the District Court, plead factual matter that, if taken as true, states a claim that petitioners deprived him of his clearly established constitutional rights. We hold respondent's pleadings are insufficient. . . . Two working principles underlie our decision in Twombly. First, the tenet that a court must accept as true all of the allegations contained in a complaint is inapplicable to legal conclusions. Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice. . . . Rule 8 marks a notable and generous departure from the hyper-technical, code-pleading regime of a prior era, but it does not unlock the doors of discovery for a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions. Second, only a complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives a motion to dismiss. . . Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will, as the Court of Appeals observed, be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense. . . But where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged-but it has not 'show[n]'-'that the pleader is entitled to relief.'. . In keeping with these principles a court considering a motion to dismiss can choose to begin by identifying pleadings that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth. While legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint, they must be supported by factual allegations. When there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief. . . . We begin our analysis by identifying the allegations in the complaint that are not entitled to the assumption of truth. Respondent pleads that petitioners 'knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject [him]' to harsh conditions of confinement 'as a matter of policy, solely on account of [his] religion, race, and/or national origin and for no legitimate penological interest.'. .The complaint alleges that Ashcroft was the 'principal architect' of this invidious policy. . .and that Mueller was 'instrumental' in adopting and executing it. . . .These bare assertions, much like the pleading of conspiracy in Twombly, amount to nothing more than a 'formulaic recitation of the elements' of a constitutional discrimination claim. . .namely, that petitioners adopted a policy ' Abecause of,' not merely Ain spite of,' its adverse effects upon an identifiable group.'. .As such, the allegations are conclusory and not entitled to be assumed true. . . It is important to recall that respondent's complaint challenges neither the constitutionality of his arrest nor his initial detention in the MDC. Respondent's constitutional claims against petitioners rest solely on their ostensible Apolicy of holding post-September-11th detainees' in the ADMAX SHU once they were categorized as Aof high interest.'. . To prevail on that theory, the complaint must contain facts plausibly showing that petitioners purposefully adopted a policy of classifying post-September-11 detainees as 'of high interest' because of their race, religion, or national origin. This the complaint fails to do. Though respondent alleges that various other defendants, who are not before us, may have labeled him a person of 'of high interest' for impermissible reasons, his only factual allegation against petitioners accuses them of adopting a policy approving 'restrictive conditions of confinement' for post-September-11 detainees until they were ' "cleared" by the FBI.' . . Accepting the truth of that allegation, the complaint does not show, or even intimate, that petitioners purposefully housed detainees in the ADMAX SHU due to their race, religion, or national origin. All it plausibly suggests is that the Nation's top law enforcement officers, in the aftermath of a devastating terrorist attack, sought to keep suspected terrorists in the most secure conditions available until the suspects could be cleared of terrorist activity. Respondent does not argue, nor can he, that such a motive would violate petitioners' constitutional obligations. He would need to allege more by way of factual content to 'nudg[e]' his claim of purposeful discrimination 'across the line from conceivable to plausible.'. . . [R]espondent's complaint does not contain any factual allegation sufficient to plausibly suggest petitioners' discriminatory state of mind. His pleadings thus do not meet the standard necessary to comply with Rule 8. It is important to note, however, that we express no opinion concerning the sufficiency of respondent's complaint against the defendants who are not before us. Respondent's account of his prison ordeal alleges serious official misconduct that we need not address here. Our decision is limited to the determination that respondent's complaint does not entitle him to relief from petitioners. . . . Our decision in Twombly expounded the pleading standard for 'all civil actions'. . .and it applies to antitrust and discrimination suits alike. . . . Because respondent's complaint is deficient under Rule 8, he is not entitled to discovery, cabined or otherwise. . . .It is true that Rule 9(b) requires particularity when pleading 'fraud or mistake,' while allowing '[m]alice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind [to] be alleged generally.' But 'generally' is a relative term. In the context of Rule 9, it is to be compared to the particularity requirement applicable to fraud or mistake. Rule 9 merely excuses a party from pleading discriminatory intent under an elevated pleading standard. It does not give him license to evade the less rigid-though still operative-strictures of Rule 8. . . . And Rule 8 does not empower respondent to plead the bare elements of his cause of action, affix the label 'general allegation,' and expect his complaint to survive a motion to dismiss.")

Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1959-61 (Souter, J., joined by Stevens, J., Ginsburg, J., Breyer, J., dissenting) ("The complaint . . . alleges, at a bare minimum, that Ashcroft and Mueller knew of and condoned the discriminatory policy their subordinates carried out. Actually, the complaint goes further in alleging that Ashcroft and Muller affirmatively acted to create the discriminatory detention policy. If these factual allegations are true, Ashcroft and Mueller were, at the very least, aware of the discriminatory policy being implemented and deliberately indifferent to it. Ashcroft and Mueller argue that these allegations fail to satisfy the 'plausibility standard' of Twombly. They contend that Iqbal's claims are implausible because such high-ranking officials 'tend not to be personally involved in the specific actions of lower-level officers down the bureaucratic chain of command.'. . But this response bespeaks a fundamental misunderstanding of the enquiry that Twombly demands. Twombly does not require a court at the motion-to-dismiss stage to consider whether the factual allegations are probably true. We made it clear, on the contrary, that a court must take the allegations as true, no matter how skeptical the court may be. . . The sole exception to this rule lies with allegations that are sufficiently fantastic to defy reality as we know it: claims about little green men, or the plaintiff's recent trip to Pluto, or experiences in time travel. That is not what we have here. . . . Iqbal's claim is not that Ashcroft and Mueller 'knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject' him to a discriminatory practice that is left undefined; his allegation is that 'they knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject' him to a particular, discrete, discriminatory policy detailed in the complaint. Iqbal does not say merely that Ashcroft was the architect of some amorphous discrimination, or that Mueller was instrumental in an ill-defined constitutional violation; he alleges that they helped to create the discriminatory policy he has described. Taking the complaint as a whole, it gives Ashcroft and Mueller 'Afair notice of what the Y claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.'"") Johnson v. City of Shelby, Miss., 135 S. Ct. 346, 346-47(2014) ("We summarily reverse. Federal pleading rules call for 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief,' Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 8(a)(2); they do not countenance dismissal of a complaint for imperfect statement of the legal theory supporting the claim asserted. . . In particular, no heightened pleading rule requires plaintiffs seeking damages for violations of constitutional rights to invoke § 1983 expressly in order to state a claim. See Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 164, 113 S.Ct. 1160, 122 L.Ed.2d 517 (1993) (a federal court may not apply a standard 'more stringent than the usual pleading requirements of Rule 8(a)' in 'civil rights cases alleging municipal liability'); Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N. A., 534 U.S. 506, 512, 122 S.Ct. 992, 152 L.Ed.2d 1 (2002) (imposing a 'heightened pleading standard in employment discrimination cases conflicts with Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2)'). The Fifth Circuit defended its requirement that complaints expressly invoke § 1983 as 'not a mere pleading formality.'. . The requirement serves a notice function, the Fifth Circuit said, because '[c]ertain consequences flow from claims under § 1983, such as the unavailability of respondeat superior liability, which bears on the qualified immunity analysis.'. . This statement displays some confusion in the Fifth Circuit's perception of petitioners' suit. No 'qualified immunity analysis' is implicated here, as petitioners asserted a constitutional claim against the city only, not against any municipal officer. . . 34 Our decisions in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009), are not in point, for they concern the factual allegations a complaint must contain to survive a motion to dismiss. A plaintiff, they instruct, must plead facts sufficient to show that her claim has substantive plausibility. Petitioners' complaint was not deficient in that regard. Petitioners stated simply, concisely, and directly events that, they alleged, entitled them to damages from the city. Having informed the city of the factual basis for their complaint, they were required to do no more to stave off threshold dismissal for want of an adequate statement of their claim. . . For clarification and to ward off further insistence on a punctiliously stated 'theory of the pleadings,' petitioners, on remand, should be accorded an opportunity to add to their complaint a citation to § 1983. . . .For the reasons stated, the petition for certiorari is granted, the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

CASES IN THE CIRCUITS

D.C. CIRCUIT

Bell v. D.C., 82 F.Supp.3d 151, 159 (D.D.C. 2015) ("Unlike Singh and Muhammad, Plaintiff's complaint in this case lacks the kind of 'factual content' to support her allegation of an 'increasing number of complaints ... claiming racial profiling, harassment and continuous violations of the constitutional rights of African Americans.'. . The complaint does not, for instance, state the number, nature, and timing of the complaints of police misconduct; the identity of the officers who were the subject of the complaints; or even whether complaints were made against Officer John Doe. Absent such facts, Plaintiff's generalized assertion of ignored and unanswered complaints of harassment and police misconduct amount to little more than 'an unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation' that does not pass muster under Iqbal . . . . Because Plaintiff's complaint fails to plead sufficient 'factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged,' the court must grant the District's motion to dismiss Count II.")

Robinson v. District of Columbia, 736 F.Supp.2d 254, 265 (D.D.C. 2010) ("Taking these allegations together, the Court finds plaintiff has alleged a specific form of misconduct: intimidating and harassing motorcyclists by, inter alia, swerving into their lanes of traffic and causing them to fall or lose control of their vehicles. She alleges the District should have known about this misconduct because it was 'commonplace' and reported, but the District refused to investigate or otherwise pursue the reports. Finally, she presents a plausible causal connection between the District's alleged failure to train, supervise, or discipline officers regarding the alleged misconduct and the constitutional deprivation Mr. Robinson allegedly suffered. . . Plaintiff has alleged enough facts to suggest she may be entitled to relief against the District; accordingly, it would be inappropriate to dismiss her claim at this stage of the proceedings.")

Robertson v. District of Columbia, No. 09-1188 (RMU), 2010 WL 3238996, at *7, *8 (D.D.C. Aug. 16, 2010) ("Relying on Atchinson, the plaintiff asserts that she has stated a § 1983 claim against the District, noting that she has alleged an instance of misconduct, inadequate training and 'deliberate indifference' on the part of the District. . . Yet the portion of Atchinson holding that a plaintiff adequately pleads 'deliberate indifference' simply by invoking the phrase in his or her complaint appears to have been superseded by the Supreme Court's ruling in Ashcroft v. Iqbal. . . Although the plaintiff in this case alleges that the District acted with deliberate indifference in failing to train its officers, the complaint contains no facts suggesting that the District knew or should have known of any deficiencies in the training of its officers with respect to potentially suicidal detainees. . .Accordingly, the complaint fails to state a § 1983 claim against the District based on improper training of MPD officers. The plaintiff's more general claim that the District maintained a policy or custom of failing to provide adequate care to potentially suicidal detainees suffers from the same defect. As with the failure to train claim, the complaint contains no facts indicating that the District knew or should have known of any deficiencies in the treatment or care provided to potentially suicidal detainees like the decedent. . .These deficiencies require dismissal of the plaintiff's § 1983 claim against the District.")

Matthews v. District of Coumbia, 730 F. Supp.2d 33, 37, 38 (D.D.C. 2010) ("Here, plaintiffs allege that five different individuals were subjected to invasive public strip searches by numerous MPD officers on six different occasions and in six different locations in 2006 and 2007. . . These searches occurred even though the MPD has issued a general order detailing when strip searches are permissible, and indicating that strip searches are prohibited in public areas. . . Based on the number of instances of alleged unlawful misconduct, and the number of officers involved, it is 'plausible,' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949, that the officers' behavior resulted from the District's failure to train or supervise its employees. Indeed, the Court can plausibly infer from the facts animating plaintiffs' allegations that the strip searches were not the result of rogue officers acting contrary to their training. . . . In denying the District's motion to dismiss, the Court is not ruling on whether plaintiffs' allegations, if proven, would be sufficient to establish that the District actually failed to train or supervise its employees. . . . At this stage of the litigation, and drawing all 'reasonable inference[s]' in plaintiffs' favor, the Court merely concludes that plaintiffs have 'state[d] a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'")

Martin v. District of Columbia, 720 F.Supp.2d 19, 23, 24 (D.D.C. 2010) ("Plaintiff's conclusory statements − unsupported by additional factual allegations − are simply insufficient to state a claim under § 1983 against the District. . . Accordingly, because plaintiff has provided only ' " formulaic recitation"' of the elements of a § 1983 failure-to-train claim, the Court GRANTS defendant's motion to dismiss as to plaintiff's municipal liability claim. This claim is hereby dismissed without prejudice. . . . In the event that plaintiff seeks leave of the Court to file an amended complaint reasserting municipal liability, plaintiff should be mindful that he must assert a factual basis for his municipal liability claim sufficient to overcome the more stringent pleading standards imposed by the Supreme Court's decisions in Twombly . . . and Iqbal. . . . Specifically, plaintiff must plead 'factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged,' not mere conclusory statements regarding the District's alleged liability.")

Smith v. District of Columbia, 674 F.Supp.2d 209, 212-14 & n.2 (D.D.C. 2009) ("Here, Ms. Smith adopts the 'deliberate indifference' theory of municipal liability − where ' "the municipality knew or should have known of the risk of constitutional violations," but did not act.'. . Ms. Smith offers two allegations to support her claim that the District was deliberately indifferent. First, she contends that there were systemic problems associated with referrals for off-site medical treatment of inmates and specialists care that were known to defendant D.C. The defendant failed to take reasonable actions to ensure that systemic problems were addressed. . . Second, she asserts that defendant knew or should have known that there were unreasonable delays associated with the deceased's treatment and failed to take the steps necessary to correct systemic problems associated with such delays. . . In short, Ms. Smith alleges that the District knew or should have known about supposedly ongoing Eighth Amendment violations regarding Gilbert Smith's medical care. These allegations, however, cannot survive the District's motion to dismiss. They do nothing more than recite the requisite causal elements of custom or policy liability based on deliberate indifference − that is, that the District 'knew or should have known' about possible constitutional violations yet failed to act. . . But '[a] pleading that offers "labels and conclusions" or "a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do."' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949 . . . . Ms. Smith's allegations regarding the District's knowledge therefore 'are conclusory and not entitled to be assumed true.'. . . Ms. Smith's complaint, and indeed the entire record, is devoid of any facts or allegations that the District of Columbia knew or should have known about Gilbert Smith's supposed mistreatment. Nowhere does she allege that, for example, Gilbert Smith forwarded complaints or grievances about his treatment to the District of Columbia. . . Although she alleges that '[o]n almost a daily basis, the deceased made requests for medical care, treatment, and attention,' Compl. & 12, the Court cannot reasonably infer that these requests were made to or forwarded to the District. The District neither operated, nor provided medical care at, the Correctional Treatment Facility. . . Therefore, even if this allegation is true, it does not plausibly suggest that the District knew or should have known about Gilbert Smith's medical treatment, but failed to act. . . . Ms. Smith's allegations supporting her claim of custom or policy based on deliberate indifference, then, 'amount to nothing more than a 'formulaic recitation of the elements' of' the claim for liability . . . . To be sure, the D.C. Circuit previously held that a plaintiff need only plead that a municipality ' Aknew or should have known' about the ongoing constitutional violations' to sustain a claim for Monell liability predicated on deliberate indifference. . . But Warren preceded Iqbal, and must now be interpreted in light of that subsequent Supreme Court decision. Under Iqbal, such conclusory pleadings are no longer sufficient to state a claim on which relief may be granted. . . This Court concludes that, notwithstanding Warren, the sufficiency of Ms. Smith's allegations here must be assessed under the standard set by the Supreme Court in Twombly and Iqbal.")

Smith v. Corrections Corp. of America, Inc., 674 F.Supp.2d 201, 206, 207 (D.D.C. 2009) ("Ms. Smith offers two allegations to support her claim that CCA was deliberately indifferent. First, she contends that there were systemic problems associated with referrals for off-site medical treatment of inmates and specialists care that were known to defendant CCA and Unity. These defendants failed to take reasonable actions to ensure that systemic problems were addressed. . .Second, she asserts that defendants knew or should have known that there were unreasonable delays associated with the deceased's treatment and failed to take the steps necessary to correct systemic problems associated with such delays. . . In short, Ms. Smith alleges that CCA knew or should have known about supposedly ongoing Eighth Amendment violations regarding Gilbert Smith's medical care. These allegations, coupled with Ms. Smith's specific factual allegations, are sufficient to survive CCA's motion to dismiss. To be sure, the allegations in paragraphs fifteen and twenty-one of the complaint do not, by themselves, state a section 1983 claim based on deliberate indifference. Indeed, they do nothing more than recite the requisite causal elements of custom or policy liability based on deliberate indifference − that is, that [CCA] 'knew or should have known' about possible constitutional violations but failed to act. . . . The allegations in paragraphs fifteen and twenty-one, standing alone, 'are conclusory and not entitled to be assumed true .'. . But Ms. Smith bolsters these allegations with factual allegations that plausibly suggest she is entitled to relief. Ms. Smith alleges that '[o]n almost a daily basis, the deceased made requests for medical care, treatment, and attention including, but not limited to, providing medication ..., providing prompt and adequate dressing changes ..., providing of sanitary cell conditions ..., [and] providing of prompt transfers to medical facilities.'. . Because CCA operated the Correctional Treatment Facility, the Court can reasonably infer that these complaints and grievances were made to CCA. Accordingly, Ms. Smith has properly pleaded that CCA knew of the supposed unconstitutional medical care and treatment Gilbert Smith received. And Ms. Smith's allegation that CCA 'failed to take reasonable actions to ensure that systemic problems were addressed,' Compl. & 15, coupled with the absence of any indication that Gilbert Smith's medical care and treatment improved during his incarceration, plausibly suggests that CCA failed to act in the face of its employees' allegedly unconstitutional behavior. Hence, Ms. Smith has sufficiently alleged that Gilbert Smith's supposed unconstitutional medical treatment resulted from CCA's deliberate indifference.").

FIRST CIRCUIT

Abdisamad v. City of Lewiston, 960 F.3d 56, 60-61 (1st Cir. 2020) ("Abdisamad argues that his claims fall into a 'state-created danger' exception discussed in Irish. But that is simply not accurate. Our opinion in Irish observed that other 'circuits have recognized the existence of the state-created danger theory' but that '[w]hile this circuit has discussed the possible existence of the state-created danger theory, we have never found it applicable to any specific set of facts.'. . We also noted that 'we "may elect first to address whether the governmental action at issue is sufficiently conscience shocking" before considering the state-created danger element,'. . . and that 'mere negligence would be insufficient to maintain a claim of substantive due process violation[.]'. . The record in Irish contained no information about police protocol and training. Given the specific facts alleged as to the individual defendants, these were 'relevant both to the substantive due process and qualified immunity inquiries,'. . . and we vacated the dismissal and remanded for discovery[.]. . Abdisamad argues that Irish requires vacatur of the dismissal in this case to allow him to take discovery about what protocol and training might have been violated in the events that gave rise to this lawsuit. Not so. This case does not resemble Irish for many reasons, including that Irish dealt with the liability of individual police officers, not municipal liability, and that Abdisamad does not allege that the City Defendants' policies caused R.I.'s death, but rather that R.I.'s death resulted from the City Defendants' failure to follow those policies. '[A] different standard is used to determine liability for individual and municipal defendants.'. . Individual government officials may be sued 'for federal constitutional or statutory violations under § 1983,' though 'they are generally shielded from civil damages liability under the principle of qualified immunity.'. . But 'liability can be imposed on a local government only where that government's policy or custom is responsible for causing the constitutional violation or injury.'. . Municipal liability 'cannot be based on respondeat superior but requires independent liability based on an unconstitutional policy or custom of the municipality itself.'. . Although municipalities' policies 'not authorized by written law' can nevertheless be actionable, they must be 'so permanent and well settled as to constitute a "custom or usage" with the force of law.'. . A 'municipality's failure to train or supervise ... only becomes a basis for liability when "action pursuant to official municipal policy of some nature caused a constitutional tort."'. . Abdisamad's amended complaint does not plausibly allege that a Lewiston policy or custom led to R.I.'s death. Its factual allegations do not support a plausible inference that the City Defendants' actions resulted from an unconstitutional policy or custom. They include no facts whatsoever about a Lewiston policy that would be unconstitutional and create municipal liability. To the contrary, the amended complaint alleges that R.I.'s death resulted from defendants' 'failure ... to follow their protocols,' rather than from defendants' actions that were consistent with a Lewiston policy or custom. That allegation cannot serve as the basis for municipal liability and in fact precludes such liability.")

Saldivar v. Racine, 818 F.3d 14, 20, 23 (1st Cir. 2016) ("Saldivar argues that she has stated a plausible Monell claim because her complaint alleges that Racine was acting as a final policymaker for the City when he made decisions regarding Pridgen's retention, supervision, and training in response to Pridgen's disciplinary violations. But even assuming that the allegation that Racine is a final policymaker is plausible, that allegation is not enough. A City is liable under Monell for the acts of a final policymaker only if those acts constitute deliberate indifference. See Connick, 563 U.S. at 61; Young v. City of Providence, 404 F.3d 4, 26 (1st Cir.2005). And so here, too, Saldivar's § 1983 claim may survive the motion to dismiss only if the complaint plausibly alleges that Racine was deliberately indifferent to the grave risk of harm that Pridgen posed. But that claim is not plausible for the reasons we have just given regarding the limited allegations contained in the complaint. And thus here, too, we agree with the District Court that the claim cannot go forward. . . .We end by emphasizing that to survive a motion to dismiss a claim must merely be 'plausible on its face.'. . Moreover, we have said that in cases 'in which a material part of the information needed is likely to be within the defendant's control,' ' "some latitude may be appropriate" in applying the plausibility standard.'. . In such cases, we have said that 'it is reasonable to expect that "modest discovery may provide the missing link" that will allow the appellant to go to trial on her claim.'. . But the missing link that is common to the claims at issue in the case before us has not been alleged 'upon information and belief,' as it was in Menard, . . . and is not plausible simply by appeal to common sense, as in García–Catalán, see 734 F.3d at 103. Here, the gap between the allegations in the complaint and a plausible claim is wider than it was in those cases. Importantly, Saldivar was allowed modest discovery before she filed her amended complaint, namely access to Pridgen's disciplinary record, upon which Saldivar's allegations are based. There is no indication from that record, however, that any of the violations involved violent conduct. Simply put, the complaint alleges conduct by a member of the City police force that is shocking. But the complaint seeks to hold the officer's supervisor and the City liable. Absent more facts than the complaint contains, we cannot discern a plausible claim for doing so under § 1983 or under the law of negligence in Massachusetts. Accordingly, the decision of the District Court dismissing Saldivar's complaint is affirmed.")

Freeman v. Town of Hudson, 714 F.3d 29, 38 (1st Cir. 2013) ("The Freemans have advanced only a 'final authority' theory of municipal liability. The complaint, however, references no state or local laws establishing the policymaking authority of any individual or group of individuals. The complaint alleges misconduct from many separate actors, but gives no guidance about which acts are properly attributable to the municipal authority. Absent this information, the complaint fails to state more than respondeat superior liability on the part of the Town and the Commission. This is not enough to support a section 1983 action against a municipality, Monell, 436 U.S. at 691, and the district court correctly dismissed the claims against the Town and the Commission.")

Haley v. City of Boston, 657 F.3d 39, 52, 53 (1st Cir. 2011) ("The City also contends that both municipal liability claims fail as a matter of pleading to meet the Supreme Court's recently elucidated 'plausibility' requirement. . . This contention elevates hope over reason. The complaint alleges that the detectives' withholding of the sisters' statements occurred pursuant to a standing BPD policy, under which Boston police officers regularly kept helpful evidence from criminal defendants. The complaint further alleges that this policy was designed to encourage successful prosecutorial outcomes despite the existence of evidence pointing to innocence. The complaint contrasts the BPD's policy with that of the district attorney's office, which it alleges had a standing policy to disclose all known exculpatory and impeachment evidence in full compliance with Brady. Haley argues that, in his case, the district attorney's office was unable to fulfill its salutary (and constitutionally mandated) disclosure policy because the BPD failed to apprise it of the sisters' statements. The end result was Haley's wrongful conviction. Haley's second municipal liability claim draws on many of these same facts. The difference is the allegation, made in the alternative, that the BPD's unconstitutional suppression of the sisters' statements, if not the result of a standing policy, was precipitated by poor training, to which the City was deliberately indifferent. For its part, the City vigorously disputes the accuracy of these allegations. It denies that the BPD either put in place an unconstitutional policy or turned a blind eye to the need for training. But this is neither the time nor the place to resolve the factual disputes between the parties. Whether Haley can prove what he has alleged is not the issue. At this stage of the proceedings, we must take the complaint's factual allegations as true, and those allegations paint an ugly but plausible picture. If proven, that picture will support a finding of municipal liability. We do not reach this conclusion lightly. Evaluating the plausibility of a pleaded scenario is a 'context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense.'. . Disclosure abuses are a recurring problem in criminal cases, see United States v. Osorio, 929 F.2d 753, 755 (1st Cir.1991), and the BPD's failure to disclose the sisters' statements is wholly unexplained. Given the volume of cases involving nondisclosure of exculpatory information and the instant failure to disclose statements that clearly would have undermined the prosecution's theory of the case, we think that the municipal liability claims pleaded by Haley step past the line of possibility into the realm of plausibility. . . Indeed, if the detectives intentionally suppressed the discoverable statements even when such activity was condemned by the courts (as Haley has alleged), it seems entirely plausible that their conduct was encouraged, or at least tolerated, by the BPD. Although couched in general terms, Haley's allegations contain sufficient factual content to survive a motion to dismiss and open a window for pretrial discovery. . . Consequently, the district court erred in dismissing Haley's section 1983 claims against the City.")

Palermo v. Town Of North Reading, 370 F. App'x 128, 130 n.4 (1st Cir. 2010) ("The Palermos asserted at oral argument that Paragraph 26 of the amended complaint raised a sufficient Monell claim for purposes of a motion to dismiss. That paragraph alleged that 'the actions, decisions, and policies' of the Town 'deprived the Plaintiffs of all economically beneficial use of the Premises.' Under Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007), this allegation is not nearly sufficient to support a Monell claim because the complaint as a whole contained no factual assertions whatsoever regarding Town policy. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, __ U.S. __, __, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009) ("To survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to Astate a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'") (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570). As noted above, the factual premise of the amended complaint was that the Palermos had been treated differently from other property owners, not similarly in accordance with Town policy.")

Pope v. City of Boston, No. 24-CV-10980-DJC, 2024 WL 4712857, at *3–4 (D. Mass. Nov. 7, 2024) ("Pope alleges that the City is liable because for many years, the City and certain police officers engaged in various patterns and practices of 'fabricating, withholding, and destroying evidence, inducing false testimony, suppressing statements that were legally required to be provided to the defense, deliberately failing to investigate the actual perpetrators, assisting potential exculpatory witnesses in being unable to testify, and engaging in improperly suggestive identification procedures.'. . The complaint alleges that BPD and the City 'failed to train, discipline, and supervise officers who conducted investigations into homicides' and the City 'was, or should have been, aware of the potential for misconduct and actual misconduct of its officers, but failed to act.'. . The complaint further alleges that throughout 'the 1970s and 1980s, officers of the [City] regularly withheld and fabricated evidence, leading to botched investigations and wrongful convictions.'. . In support of a pattern and practice, the complaint alleges that there were at least five other cases involving O'Malley both before and after Pope's investigation and conviction in which he demonstrated misconduct by 'facilitat[ing] flawed identifications,'. . . pressured a witness to provide false testimony. . . and several years later was the lead detective in a 'botched investigation' that included using false information in relation to search warrant affidavits[.] . . The complaint also points to two reports from the 1990s as support that O'Malley engaged in practices of threatening witnesses to provide false testimony, including the St. Clair Committee Report which described that the BPD in general had inadequate training, supervision and discipline. . . Pope further alleges that BPD's 'widespread practices, which were so well settled as to constitute the de facto policy of the [City], were allowed to exist because the municipal policymakers with authority over the same exhibited, at minimum, deliberate indifference to the problem' and these widespread practices were the 'moving force' behind the misconduct that constituted the constitutional violations in Pope's case. . . The City challenges that Pope's allegations do not support a pattern and practice of deliberate indifference because the alleged allegations from the cited cases fail to show a history of constitutional violations by the City and even the alleged incidents could not have put the City on notice of a failure to train because the incidents alleged occurred after 1986, the year in which Pope was convicted. . . Most instructive here is Haley v. City of Bos., 657 F.3d 39, 52 (1st Cir. 2011) in which the First Circuit affirmed that more generalized allegations were sufficient at the pleading stage. In Haley, the First Circuit held that plaintiff had adequately alleged a Monell violation that the BPD had a standing policy or practice of withholding exculpatory information and had failed to train its officers based on BPD withholding certain exculpatory witness statements from the prosecution and that BPD 'regularly kept helpful evidence from criminal defendants' to secure successful prosecutions. . . In reversing the dismissal, the First Circuit relied upon 'the volume of cases involving nondisclosure of exculpatory information' and further held that the motion to dismiss stage was 'neither the time nor the place to resolve the factual disputes between the parties.'. . In light of Haley and its progeny, the Court agrees that Pope's allegations are sufficient at the pleading stage to allege a Monell claim that the City was on notice of constitutional violations. Although '[t]hat a particular officer may be unsatisfactorily trained will not alone suffice to fasten liability on the city, for the officer's shortcomings may have resulted from factors other than a faulty training program,' . . . here, it has been alleged that O'Malley engaged in falsification of evidence, coercion of witnesses and untruthful testimony both pre-dating and post-dating Pope's investigation, arrest and conviction which are a plausible pattern and practice widespread enough to plausibly put the City on notice of same. . . Although '[a] pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees is ordinarily necessary to demonstrate deliberate indifference for purposes of failure to train,'. . . Pope has also alleged that throughout 'the 1970s and 1980s, officers of the [City] regularly withheld and fabricated evidence, leading to botched investigations and wrongful convictions.'. . Pope further points to evidence from Haley v. City of Bos. . . in which testimony from the former BPD Commissioner indicated that 'there was no policy or practice in the BPD [in 1971 and 1972] requiring the disclosure of exculpatory and/or impeachment evidence to state prosecutors or to defendants.'. . Multiple instances of misconduct, especially when perpetrated by the same department or even individual officer, may demonstrate a failure to train or discipline. . . Here, Pope's allegations, in combination with the various instances of misconduct by O'Malley and the fact that the City had been sued previously for similar constitutional violations based on the same time period, at a minimum, suggest that the City had notice of constitutional violations committed by its officers, exacerbated by inadequate training and discipline, and was deliberately indifferent to the rights of its residents. . . Accepting the allegations as true and drawing reasonable inferences in favor of Pope, the Court holds that Pope has plausibly stated a Monell claim under § 1983.")

Mazza v. City of Boston, No. CV 24-10333-NMG, 2024 WL 4505328, at *4 (D. Mass. Oct. 15, 2024) ("Here, plaintiff contends that officers withheld exculpatory evidence from him, namely the statement made by Anderson's brother, conspired to prosecute and deprive him of his rights, and failed to intervene on his behalf. Regarding the witness statement, plaintiff blames his conviction on the City, whose policies, regulations, rules, and practices he alleges were prejudicial. Moreover, plaintiff claims that municipal authorities had notice of police misconduct yet allowed it to continue with deliberate indifference to the harm caused. Such allegations are analogous to those in Haley v. City of Boston and are therefore sufficient to state a plausible Monell claim. In Haley, plaintiff claimed the BPD withheld exculpatory statements made by his sister and that the withholding was pursuant to standing BPD policy. . . Plaintiff's complaint contrasted the policy with that of the district attorney's office, which purportedly had a policy of disclosing all exculpatory evidence as required, and asserted that the difference caused his conviction. . . On these facts, the First Circuit recognized the Monell claim as plausible. . . Contrary to the City's assertion, plaintiffs are not required to detail the alleged unconstitutional policies with specificity at the pleading stage. . . . Plaintiff here claims that the officers' unconstitutional actions resulted from the City's failure properly to train and supervise its officers on appropriate procedures, namely the proper handling of evidence and witness interviews. . . Plaintiff contends that the City was responsible for training its officers and that the City's failure adequately to train or supervise them caused the alleged unconstitutional withholding of evidence. Such allegations, unlike plaintiff's more general claims with respect to the City's policies, fail to survive the City's motion to dismiss. Plaintiff has not alleged anything that would amount to 'deliberate indifference,' as the First Circuit has defined it. . . Specifically, his complaint fails to allege that his harm is related in any way to a history of recurring rights violations, nor does he claim another instance of an unconstitutional withholding of evidence or improper interview that would constitution a Monell violation. . . While there are instances where a violation is 'so obvious' that a failure to train is self-evident, plaintiff makes no assertion that this is such a case. . . Instead, as courts have recognized, the criteria for liability in failure-to-train cases are 'exceptionally stringent' and difficult to prove, and the instant case is no exception. . . Because failure-to-supervise claims are subject to the same stringent standard as failure-to-train claims, plaintiff's allegation that the City is liable for failure to supervise is equally unavailing. . . Allegations of one's own injury, unmoored from a pattern of conduct by the municipality, thus cannot support a Monell claim on a theory of failure either to train or supervise.") Huffman v. City of Boston, No. 21-CV-10986-ADB, 2022 WL 2308937, at *7–8 (D. Mass. June 27, 2022) (" The City moves to dismiss the Monell claim because, in its view, Plaintiffs have made only bare assertions and recitations of the claim elements. The Court finds that Plaintiffs have, albeit just barely, done more than 'say the magic words "custom" and "policy"' as the City suggests. . . To support their claim that the City has a custom of failing to investigate or discipline police misconduct, Plaintiffs point mainly to BPD's failure to diligently pursue investigations into the uses of forces against Chambers-Maher and Huffman, Hall's experience being deterred from filing her complaint, and the inaction of all other officers on scene, as well as previous admissions from the City that BPD officers were generally pressured to adhere to a code of silence regarding officer misconduct, and that civilians felt discouraged from filing complaints. . . To further bolster their claim, Plaintiffs also offer examples of past confirmed occasions where BPD failed to investigate or discipline police misconduct, though those incidents did not involve the use of force against protestors. . . Plaintiffs' allegation that the City condones a code of silence within its police force can support a Monell claim. . . To be sure, Plaintiffs' support for this claim is presently thin, particularly since Plaintiffs have done little to link their allegations together to present a 'systemic pattern' of persistent failure to discipline or investigate, but more is not required at the pleading stage. Plaintiffs have specifically articulated that the City knew constitutional violations occurred and either chose not to investigate or otherwise delayed or discouraged investigation. Taking Plaintiffs' factual allegations as true and viewing the Amended Complaint in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the allegations allow for a reasonable inference that the City has a custom of failing to discipline police misconduct. . . To the extent Plaintiffs also contend that the City, acting through BPD, had a custom of using excessive force against the May 2020 protestors, . . . that claim has also been sufficiently pleaded for the purposes of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. The Amended Complaint contains numerous allegations that officers used OC spray, batons, and other physical force against the four Plaintiffs during the May 31 protest. Plaintiffs sufficiently allege, though just barely, that similar constitutional violations occurred on May 29, giving decisionmakers sufficient notice that officers would continue to use unreasonable force against peaceful protestors in the demonstrations to come. The City's argument that the allegations are not enough to support a Monell claim because they rest only on 'one night of civil unrest' is unavailing. . . In addition to the fact that Plaintiffs have suggested that similar conduct occurred during demonstrations on surrounding days, 'egregious instances of misconduct' even when 'relatively few in number but following a common design, may support an inference that the instances would not occur but for municipal tolerance of the practice in question.'. . Here, Plaintiffs describe four similar incidents of excessive force used against peaceful protesters. Further, Plaintiffs may not know, or cannot know, without discovery the full extent of the unreasonable force used by the City against protesters during the May 2020 protests. This Court, in line with several other district courts presented with similar facts, finds that Plaintiffs have sufficiently pleaded that the City had notice of the unlawful use of force against protestors and was deliberately indifferent to those constitutional violations. . . Finally, as a separate basis of liability, Plaintiffs also claim that the City, acting through its policymaker Commissioner Gross, failed to properly handle the May 2020 protests. This claim rests on the contention that Commission Gross's decisions to distribute and endorse the use of riot batons against peaceful protestors and to limit the public's ability to leave the protest area, led to the constitutional deprivations. . . Government policy or custom may be established by 'a single decision by municipal policymakers under appropriate circumstances.'. . In other words, liability may attach where there is 'a deliberate choice to follow a course of action [ ] made from among various alternatives by the official ... responsible for establishing final policy with respect to the subject matter in question.'. . Because three of the four Plaintiffs' injuries occurred while they were trying to leave the protest area and some of the alleged injuries were caused by blows from riot batons, it can be reasonably inferred that Commissioner Gross's policy decisions led to the constitutional deprivations. Plaintiffs will have to overcome significant issues of proof if they are to prevail at trial. Nonetheless, the Court finds that, at this stage, Plaintiffs have adequately pleaded municipal liability based on the role that City customs and policies allegedly played in the constitutional violations. While the Court does 'not lightly infer a municipal policy or practice from a few scattered claims ... neither should [it] blind [itself] [.]") Bannon, for the Estate of Root v. Godin, No. CV 20-11501-RGS, 2020 WL 7230902, at *1–2 (D. Mass. Dec. 8, 2020) ("The City argues that plaintiff has failed to plead an actionable claim because the Complaint neither identifies with specificity the deficiency in training that led to Justin Root's death nor sets out a pattern of unconstitutional conduct by Boston officers that would have placed the City on notice of a need for further training of its officers. The court agrees that the Complaint, while rich in generalities, is rather thin on detail. However, at this early stage of the litigation, to withstand a Rule 12(b)(6) attack, a Complaint need not be replete with factual allegations; rather a plaintiff's burden is to set out 'plausible grounds' for an entitlement to relief. . . While this standard 'requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action's elements will not do,'. . . here the sparsity of the Complaint may be fairly attributed to the infancy of the litigation and the plaintiff's lack of access to the discovery tools that are typically deployed to flesh out the factual underpinnings of a liability claim. That said, the court does not find the Complaint so devoid of factual detail as to leave the City clueless about the nature of the plaintiff's claims. She identifies thirteen areas, albeit in general terms, in which she alleges that the City allegedly failed to provide adequate training as well as several specific policies which the City allegedly failed to enforce to insure officer compliance with constitutional mandates. . . She also alleges that the City 'knew or should have known that their police officers ... might be in a position to consider the use of deadly force on a suspect such as Mr. Root that (a) did not pose any immediate danger to police officers or others, (b) did not have a firearm, (c) was severely injured and covered in blood, and (d) lying on the ground,' and thus that the purported inadequate training and supervision 'amount[ed] to deliberate indifference to clearly established constitutional rights of others, including Mr. Root, to be free from the use of excessive force and the deprivation of life without due process of law.' . . These allegations suffice, for present purposes, to withstand the motion to dismiss.")

Regis v. City of Boston, No. 19-CV-10527-IT, 2020 WL 2838862, at *3 (D. Mass. June 1, 2020) ("Here, Plaintiffs make a number of allegations as to why the City Defendants are liable under § 1983 for both the City Defendants' policies and customs and for their failure to train its employees. Specifically, they allege the City Defendants have a policy that the warrant affiant is not to be present where and when the BPD deploys 'SWAT' teams to execute a no-knock raid, . . . an absence of a city policy requiring officers to check the names of individuals on a warrant with the names of individuals residing in a unit that is being raided before executing the raid, . . . an absence of a city policy requiring officers conducting a raid to double check the property address against the warrant address before executing the raid, . . . an absence of a policy requiring officers conducing the raid to survey the home the day before the raid so as to ensure that the activity in the home is consistent with that described in the warrant, . . . an absence of a policy requiring officers to immediately compare the names and described features of those individuals named in the warrant with those encountered in the property being raided, . . . and, a failure to train officers on how to interact with children encountered in a home that is being raided[.] . . Plaintiffs Amended Complaint [#20] sets forth short and plain statements of the claim for which they are seeking relief, and these statements are sufficient to provide the City Defendants with notice as to the basis for the claims. The City Defendants do not dispute this. Nevertheless, the City Defendants move for dismissal pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). The City Defendants argue that the complaint only describes an 'isolated incident' and that the City's existing policies on executing no-knock raids, which the City attaches to its opposition, show 'quite the opposite of "deliberate indifference" with regard to ensuring entries at correct addresses.'. . Maybe so, but these arguments go to the merits of Plaintiff's claims that there is a direct causal link between the City's policies and the alleged violation of the Regis's family's rights and that the City was deliberately indifferent to how their failure to train its officers caused the alleged violations under the federal Constitution. . . They do not undermine the sufficiency of the pleadings.")

Henriquez v. City of Lawrence, No. 14-CV-14710-IT, 2015 WL 3913449, at *3 (D. Mass. June 25, 2015) ("While admittedly a close question, this court finds that Henriquez's allegations are sufficient at this stage to state a plausible claim for an unconstitutional policy or custom. Henriquez alleges that Officer Camacho and other officers in the Department engaged in prior incidents of excessive force and denial of medical care constituting a 'history or pattern' of such conduct, citizens complained about officers' use of excessive force and denial of medical care, the City was on notice of such complaints, and the City failed to take any action in response to the complaints, including failing to investigate, supervise, discipline, and train the officers. Although Henriquez does not provide many factual details as to the prior incidence of misconduct and prior complaints, she provides more than legal conclusions or a recitation of the elements of the cause of action. . .

Henriquez alleges facts that, taken as true and taken together with the reasonable inferences from those facts, state a plausible claim.")

Bochart v. City of Lowell, 989 F.Supp.2d 151, 155 (D. Mass. 2013) ("The Court acknowledges that there is an inherent difficulty in pleading a § 1983 action against a municipality. Under the federal system of notice pleading, a complaint need only allege a 'short and plain statement of the claim.'. . Publicly-available information concerning similar constitutional violations may often exist only as allegations only, not facts. Early dismissal on that basis could inappropriately prevent or discourage plaintiffs from asserting their constitutional rights. On the other hand, a municipality can be held liable only if a policy or custom actually exists, and should not be forced to expend its limited resources conducting discovery in every case where a plaintiff makes a bare allegation of a 'policy or custom.'. .Moreover, what suffices to state a custom or practice varies from case to case. The size of the municipality, the frequency of the alleged violations, the length of time during which the alleged violations have occurred, and the similarity in character of the alleged violations are among the factors to be considered in determining whether a series of incidents has risen to the level of a 'custom' or 'practice.' There is no set formula for ascertaining the appropriate degree of specificity or plausibility in a complaint, and each case must be considered on its own merits.")

Comeau v. Town of Webster, Mass., No. 11–40208–TSH, 2012 WL 3042384, *8 (D. Mass. July 24, 2012) ("Here, to survive the motion to dismiss, Plaintiffs must have pled facts to show it is plausible that the Board of Health adopted and implemented spoilage/storage/contamination policies, not for the purpose of a neutral health and safety reason, but for the purpose of violating Plaintiffs' civil rights. . .In support of their § 1983 claim, Plaintiffs merely contend Webster's Board of Health: (1) 'has a duty and an obligation of reasonable care to administer, properly supervise, direct, and control those agents acting on its behalf ...,' Compl., ¶ 161; and (2) had policies and customs in place for the purpose, including but not limited to administering, directing, supervising and controlling inspection and disposition of food products.'. . None of Plaintiffs' allegations identify a policy that caused a violation of their right to due process. Instead, Plaintiffs attempt to implicate the town by parroting the elements of a § 1983 claim. On such meager allegations, Plaintiffs' claim for municipal liability cannot succeed. . . . Plaintiffs' formulaic allegation that the Board of Health 'had policies and customs in place' is precisely the type of blanket, conclusory allegation that the Supreme Court has determined should not be given credit when standing alone.")

Chalifoux v. City of Lowell, No. 10-11847-RGS, 2011 WL 841068, at *1, *2 (D. Mass. Mar. 8, 2011) ("[I]t is doubtful in this age of Twombly-Iqbal pleading that the Complaint as presently drafted would survive unscathed a well-crafted motion to dismiss. A post-Twombly complaint must allege 'a plausible entitlement to relief.'. . . Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will, as the Court of Appeals observed, be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense. . . . Here, while the Complaint alleges plausible causes of action against Officer Panek and perhaps one or more of the unidentified officers, the claims against the City of Lowell are set out in a formulaic recitation of every theory of municipal and supervisory liability recognized by federal law. None of theories, however, is given any factual anchoring. For example, the failure by the City to properly train Officer Panek in the use of pepper spray is alleged in apparent obliviousness of the long-established rule that a single instance of employee incompetence will not support a recovery for a failure to train. . . Similarly, supervisory liability is alleged without any identification of the supervisor or the individual failures on that supervisor's part that are alleged to have caused a constitutional wrong. . . That said, this is not a well-crafted motion to dismiss. As plaintiff fairly points out, the bulk of the City's supporting memorandum appears to have been copied verbatim from an earlier and apparently successful pleading filed before Magistrate Judge Bowler in a separate case, including the inadvertent incorporation of factual references to that case. While there is nothing particularly wrong with boilerplate − it gets used because it is reusable − it is more effective when molded to the shape of the boiler it is meant to reinforce. . . For the foregoing reasons, the City of Lowell's Motion to Dismiss itself from the Complaint is DENIED without prejudice. The court ORDERS the bifurcation of the municipal and supervisory liability claims brought against the City (and presumably certain superior officers of the Lowell Police) from the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment claims brought against the individual officers.")

Counter v. Healy, No. 09-12144-RGS, 2010 WL 2802179, at *6 (D. Mass. June 28, 2010) ("Whether or not Counter's allegations against the City of Cambridge suffice to state a claim for municipal liability pursuant to Section 1983 presents a closer question, but Counter has advanced enough facts to proceed to discovery on this claim. To be sure, Count III, standing alone, reads as a boilerplate recitation of the elements of a Monell claim, without supporting factual allegations. . . Counter, however, has pleaded that he serves as a mentor to students of color at Harvard and is aware of, and has discussed with the Police Department, numerous instances of 'mistreatment of students of color by the Cambridge Police.'. . These allegations, combined with the specific allegations regarding the two different criminal complaints Counter faced, are sufficient to state a claim for relief that is plausible on its face.")

SECOND CIRCUIT

Hu v. City of New York, 927 F.3d 81, 106-07 (2d Cir. 2019) ("In short, the Amended Complaint provides no basis for concluding that the defendants' discriminatory enforcement actions against the plaintiffs 'represent[ed] the conscious choices of the municipality itself.'. . While it can reasonably be inferred that the plaintiffs have been the victims of persistent harassment by several subordinate officers at DOB, the factual allegations do not 'compel[ ] the conclusion that the local government has acquiesced in or tacitly authorized its subordinates' unlawful actions.'. . Accordingly, we affirm the District Court's dismissal of the plaintiffs' Monell claim.")

- Raymond v. Brusino, No. 23-CV-552-LJV-JJM, 2025 WL 470159, at *4–8 (W.D.N.Y. Feb. 12, 2025) ("Raymond's remaining objections relate to Judge McCarthy's review of the sufficiency of his proposed Monell claims against the City of Niagara Falls and Niagara County. Judge McCarthy deemed the proposed amendments futile because they included only conclusory allegations about the municipalities' policies (or lack thereof) and a single incident of alleged misconduct. . . . To state a Monell claim, a plaintiff must plead three elements: '(1) an official policy or custom that (2) causes the plaintiff to be subjected to (3) a denial of a constitutional right.'. . . Although Raymond does not specify the type of Monell claims he tries to bring in his proposed second amended complaint, he seems to assert two theories of liability: 1) the existence (or non-existence) of a custom, policy, or practice and 2) deliberate indifference on the part of municipal policymakers. The Court will address the plausibility of each in turn. . . . In essence, Raymond says that because the detectives and deputies who raided his apartment did not use body cameras, the two municipalities must either 1) not have had a policy requiring the use of body cameras or 2) had policies exempting certain employees from using body cameras while serving warrants. But nowhere in his proposed amendments—or even in his briefing—does Raymond allege any other time when Niagara Falls or Niagara County law enforcement officers did not wear body cameras, either during the execution of a warrant or while performing other duties. And as courts throughout the Second Circuit routinely hold at the pleading stage, a single incident is not enough to establish a custom, policy, or practice under circumstances like these. . . . Even construing the allegations in the proposed second amended complaint in the light most favorable to Raymond, they suggest nothing more than one incident of allegedly unconstitutional conduct. And as Judge McCarthy found, . . . that is not enough for Monell liability. What is more, even if all that were not true—even if Raymond had plausibly alleged the lack of a policy requiring detectives or 'Sheriff's Office personnel' to use body cameras or an exemption from such a policy when serving warrants—his Monell claim still would fail because there is no causal link between those allegations and the injury he allegedly suffered. According to the first two versions of Raymond's complaint and now his proposed second amended complaint, his rights were abridged when law enforcement officers beat him while executing a search warrant at his apartment. . . Based on those circumstances, the sort of alleged municipal custom, policy, or practice that might give rise to a viable Monell claim would be one that encouraged or condoned the use of excessive force by officers. Raymond tries to connect his alleged injury with either the supposed lack of a body camera policy or policies permitting exemptions based solely on speculation about how law enforcement officers are likely to behave without body cameras. That thin connection is not enough. . . . To hold otherwise would require a breathtaking logical leap: that because there was no policy requiring body cameras to be used by law enforcement during law enforcement activities, or because certain law enforcement officers were exempt from such a policy when executing warrants, the municipalities were complicit in the excessive use of force. That logical leap is neither appropriate nor warranted. Indeed, if what Raymond suggests is true, then whenever excessive force was used by a police officer, the municipality employing that officer would face Monell liability unless it required the use of body cameras. And that is not the law. . . In sum, Raymond has not alleged a viable Monell claim both because his proposed pleading is factually deficient and because his theory of liability is faulty. For either and both of those reasons, his objection to Judge McCarthy's R&R is misplaced. . . .

> Raymond's proposed pleading does not specifically allege a failure to train, supervise, or discipline on the part of the City of Niagara Falls or Niagara County. But by repeatedly referring to 'deliberate indifference,' he seems to suggest that the municipalities' failure to act here demonstrates their failure to educate law enforcement about the constitutional rights of citizens, or to properly supervise or discipline law enforcement, and thus gives rise to Monell liability. . . . That legal theory fails as well. . . . First, Raymond has not even raised an explicit claim that the two municipalities failed to train law enforcement. Second, the implicit claim alleges nothing more than the particular circumstances of the single raid on his apartment. He does not allege other incidents that would put municipal policymakers on notice of the risk of constitutional violations from not requiring employees to wear body cameras. He does not allege any facts about the frequency with which City of Niagara Falls or Niagara County law enforcement officials encounter situations like the raid he describes. Indeed, other than the incident at issue, he does not point to a single failure to discipline. And even with respect to this incident, he does not even suggest that a municipal policymaker learned about the failure to wear body cameras during the raid on Raymond's apartment so that they could have disciplined the officers involved. Raymond's proposed second amended complaint therefore falls well short of plausibly alleging the deliberate indifference on the part of a municipal policymaker that might possibly give rise to Monell liability. Accordingly, the Court agrees with Judge McCarthy's conclusion that the proposed amendments are futile.") (See also Flannery v. County of Niagra, 2024 WL 5395718 (W.D.N.Y. May 15, 2024))

Greene v. City of New York, No. 21-CV-05762 (PAC), 2024 WL 1308434, at *18–20 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 26, 2024) ("A plaintiff may allege 'an official policy or custom' by showing one of the following: (1) a formal policy officially endorsed by the municipality; (2) actions taken by government officials responsible for establishing the municipal policies that caused the particular deprivation in question; (3) a practice so consistent and widespread that, although not expressly authorized, constitutes a custom or usage of which a supervising policy-maker must have been aware; or (4) a failure by policymakers to provide adequate training or supervision to subordinates to such an extent that it amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of those who come into contact with the municipal employees. Staboleski v. City of New York, No. 19 Civ. 8834, 2021 WL 796616, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 1, 2021). Here, Plaintiffs allege that the City is liable on three theories: (1) a formal policy by way of the EDP and Involuntary Removal Policy; (2) a custom of using excessive force against those identified as EDPs; and (3) deliberate indifference to the rights of people with actual or perceived mental disabilities. . . All three theories fail. . . First, the formal Policies do not violate the Constitution. Both Policies implement New York Mental Hygiene Law § 9.41, which permits the police to 'take into custody any person who appears to be mentally ill and is conducting himself or herself in a manner which is likely to result in serious harm to the person or others.' It is well settled—and Plaintiffs do not challenge—that § 9.41 is constitutional. . . As the challenged Policies merely implement a constitutional state law, they cannot form the basis of Plaintiffs' Monell claim. . . . Accordingly, Plaintiffs cannot rely on a formal policy to sustain their Monell claim. . . . Plaintiffs alternatively allege that the use of 'excessive force' against the mentally disabled is so widespread that it constitutes a de facto policy or practice. . . . Here, to demonstrate a de facto policy of excessive force, Plaintiffs point to several reports—issued by the Office of the Inspector General ("OIG Report") and the Urban Justice Center ("UJC Report")—documenting deficiencies in the City's response to mental health calls and to various incidents where the NYPD has used lethal force against the mentally disabled. None of these allegations, in totality or in isolation, indicates a custom of excessive force. . . . Plaintiffs' reference to numerous incidents of police violence towards the mentally disabled also fails to support a finding of a de facto policy or custom. In addition to the claims brought by the Individual Plaintiffs, the SAC details 24 separate instances since 1984 where officers used lethal force against a mentally ill person. . . These 24 instances over some 40 years are too few to establish a de facto policy. As alleged in the SAC, the 'NYPD responds to approximately 200,000 "EDP" calls a year[, but i]n fact, this number is likely much larger.'. . Even if all 30 incidents alleged in the SAC occurred in a single year, they would represent only a fraction of a percent of all EDP calls responded to by the NYPD annually. Moreover, Plaintiffs do not allege that any of the incidents resulted in findings of liability against the City. . . Here, because the number of alleged incidents of excessive force is vanishingly small and because Plaintiffs have failed to show that any resulted in liability against the City, they have failed to demonstrate a de facto policy. . . . Plaintiffs' deliberate indifference theory fails for the same reasons. To demonstrate deliberate indifference adequately, a plaintiff must plead that the City 'had notice of a potentially serious problem of unconstitutional conduct, such that the need for corrective action or supervision was obvious, and the policymaker's failure to investigate or rectify the situation evidences deliberate indifference, rather than mere negligence or bureaucratic inaction.'. . As with the de facto policy claim, the relatively small number of incidents culled from a nearly forty-year period, none of which is alleged to have resulted in liability, is not sufficient to put the City on notice that its policies caused constitutional violations. Without more, the Court cannot find that Defendants were deliberately indifferent to the rights of the mentally ill. . . In sum, Plaintiffs have failed adequately to plead 'the existence of a municipal policy or custom' under either a formal, de facto, or deliberate indifference theory. . . As such, Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' Monell claim is GRANTED.") Colon v. City of Rochester, 419 F.Supp.3d 586, ___ (W.D.N.Y. 2019) ("In their thirteenth and fourteenth claims for relief, plaintiffs allege respectively that the City has maintained unconstitutional policies with respect to the use of excessive force in making arrests, and by permitting the RPD's use of 'cover' charges to punish so-called 'contempt of cop.' In support of the thirteenth claim, plaintiffs have set forth allegations about several RPD officers, none of whom were involved in the incident giving rise to this suit, asserting that those officers have used excessive force and were never disciplined for their actions. . . There is no bright-line rule for determining whether allegations of prior incidents involving other officers and different alleged victims are sufficient to make out a Monell claim. On the one hand, a plaintiff asserting a Monell claim must go beyond merely reciting a 'litany of other police-misconduct cases' involving the same municipality. . . But that does not mean that past incidents are irrelevant, or that they can never support a claim of municipal liability. A plaintiff asserting a Monell claim based on a municipality's ongoing practice or custom will typically need to rely on past cases involving police misconduct. . . The question on a motion to dismiss is whether, assuming the truth of the plaintiffs' factual allegations, those past incidents give rise to a plausible claim of deliberate indifference on the part of the municipality to the types of constitutional violations alleged in the case before the court. In making that determination, courts typically consider both the number of alleged prior incidents and the degree of similarity that they bear to the incident that gave rise to the lawsuit at bar. . . In the case before me, plaintiffs have set forth allegations about six RPD officers who have allegedly used excessive force in the past, but never been disciplined for doing so. . . Those twelve incidents took place between July 15, 2001 and September 18, 2015.

Some of the incidents alleged are factually quite dissimilar from the incident that occurred here. . . . Some of the alleged incidents, however, do bear some similarity to the one alleged in this case. . . . The other incidents alleged fall at various points on the spectrum in terms of their similarity to the incident here, but in they all involve alleged uses of excessive force by RPD officers, who were not disciplined for their actions. As stated, plaintiffs assert in the thirteenth cause of action that the City has been deliberately indifferent to RPD officers' use of excessive force, both in carrying out arrests and in non-arrest interactions with civilians. Plaintiffs allege that at the time of the incident giving rise to this suit, the RPD essentially had no standards governing officers' use of force. In other words, officers were given free rein to use force as they saw fit. Given those allegations, the Court cannot simply disregard the allegations about prior incidents. If the claim is that the City and the RPD have routinely ignored officers' use of force, no matter how excessive or unwarranted, then the fact that some of the prior alleged incidents involved uses of force that were more egregious than what is alleged here is not dispositive. In making this determination, the Court is mindful that this is not a motion for summary judgment. On a motion to dismiss, the Court must accept the truth of plaintiffs' factual allegations, and construe all reasonable inferences in their favor. Applying that standard, I conclude that plaintiffs' thirteenth claim should be allowed to proceed. . . The fourteenth claim alleges that the City and RPD have created and maintained a custom and policy of wrongfully arresting people without probable cause. Plaintiffs allege a number of aspects in which those arrests are wrongful, such as: the use of false 'cover' charges like disorderly conduct, trespass, resisting arrest, etc.; so-called 'contempt of cop' arrests based on the arrestee's perceived lack of respect for the officer; and making arrests without probable cause, simply to meet the goals of temporary law-enforcement initiatives. Plaintiffs also allege that the City's and RPD's policies in this regard proximately caused their injuries. In particular, plaintiffs allege that the arrests of plaintiffs were made in part to carry out an RPD policy then in effect, known as 'Operation Cool Down,' pursuant to which RPD officers were instructed to aggressively engage citizens in public areas, in an ostensible effort to deter crime and violence in Rochester. . . As in the thirteenth cause of action, plaintiffs have alleged and rely upon other past incidents involving RPD officers. . . . While the matter is not free from doubt, the Court will deny defendants' motion to dismiss this claim. The mere fact that lawsuits were filed in connection with these incidents is not in itself probative of the existence of a municipal custom or policy. . . But as with the excessive force claim, that does not mean that the underlying incidents themselves may not be considered in determining whether plaintiffs have adequately stated a claim. Again, this is not a motion for summary judgment, and accepting the truth of plaintiffs' allegations, I conclude that they have presented a facially viable Monell claim in their fourteenth cause of action. It bears repeating that this decision is based on the relatively lenient standard applicable to Rule 12(b)(6) motions. It remains to be seen whether, after discovery, summary judgment may be appropriate.")

Newson v. City of New York, No. 16CV6773ILGJO, 2019 WL 3997466, at *8-10 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 23, 2019) ("Plaintiff's Monell claims are structured similarly to those in Benitez. He alleges that the City instituted and implemented 'unlawful policies, procedures, regulations, practices and/or customs concerning the continuing obligation to make timely disclosure to the defense' and avers that there was 'deliberate indifference by policymaking officials at the [QCDA] in its obligation to properly train, instruct, supervise and discipline its employees, including the ADAs involved in the prosecution of the plaintiff's case, with respect to such matters.'. . Importantly, Plaintiff cites 87 cases of prosecutorial misconduct by the QCDA between 1985 and 2004, including 28 cases in which the QCDA withheld Brady or Rosario material. . . This list of cases largely overlaps with the one submitted in Benitez and, as in Benitez, the Court finds that it is circumstantial evidence of a pattern and practice of which municipal policymakers 'must have been aware.'. . . To be sure, discovery may reveal that no such policy existed at the time of the proceedings against Plaintiff, if it ever existed at all. But 'a well-pleaded complaint may proceed even if it strikes a savvy judge that actual proof of those facts is improbable, and "that a recovery is very remote and unlikely."'. . For purposes of this motion to dismiss, Plaintiff's allegations push his Monell claim over the line from 'mere[ly] possib[le]' to 'plausible.'. . Accordingly, the City's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's Monell claim as it relates to the conduct of the QCDA is denied. . . .[I]n this case, Plaintiff does not expressly allege that the NYPD wrongfully withheld evidence from prosecutors. Instead, his only § 1983 claim as it relates to the NYPD is that it 'withheld favorable material evidence from the plaintiff and his attorney.'. . This fails to state a constitutional violation. As the Second Circuit held nearly three decades ago, 'the police satisfy their obligations under Brady when they turn exculpatory evidence over to the prosecutors.'. . Thereafter, it is the responsibility of the prosecutors, not the police, to ensure that Brady material is disclosed to the defense. . . Because Plaintiff has failed to explicitly allege a constitutional violation by the NYPD, he cannot maintain a Monell claim against the City based on the NYPD's alleged misconduct. . . . In this case, the Court deems it appropriate to allow Plaintiff to amend his § 1983 claim to include an explicit allegation that the NYPD failed to forward exculpatory evidence to the QCDA. As noted above, the factual portion of the complaint amply supports the inference that the NYPD did not disclose evidence to prosecutors when it should have. . . It is plausible that, had the ballistics evidence and cellphone been received by the QCDA more promptly, they would have influenced the decision to continue the charges against Plaintiff rather than dismiss them without further action. It is also plausible that the belated disclosure of this evidence contributed to the QCDA's own failure to abide by its obligations under Brady, which itself resulted in the postponement of trial and prolonged the amount of time that Plaintiff would remain incarcerated. Therefore, allowing Plaintiff to amend the complaint will not be futile. The amended complaint, in its current form, does not allege any facts—only 'mere assertion[s],'. . . that there was a municipal pattern or practice that caused the NYPD to withhold evidence from prosecutors, or that tolerated or ratified such conduct. . . The compendium of judicial decisions attached to the amended complaint describes occasions where the QCDA withheld evidence, not where the NYPD did so. Accordingly, should Plaintiff desire to amend the complaint, he must furnish additional facts from which such a policy or custom can be inferred. Alternatively, Plaintiff may join individual police officers as defendants under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 21, . . .in which case a showing of a municipal custom or policy will not be required. For the reasons stated above, Plaintiff's § 1983 claim as it relates to the conduct of the NYPD is dismissed with leave to amend.")

Price v. City of New York, No. 15 CIV. 5871 (KPF), 2018 WL 3117507, at *19–20 (S.D.N.Y. June 25, 2018) ("Plaintiff . . . asserts a Monell claim against the City based upon its alleged failure to train its employees about the interplay between social media use and the First Amendment. . . . In order for municipal liability to attach on a failure-to-train theory, 'a municipality's failure to train its employees in a relevant respect must amount to "deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the [untrained employees] come into contact."'. . 'A pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees is ordinarily necessary to demonstrate deliberate indifference for purposes of failure to train.'. . . Plaintiff alleges that '[t]he City's failure to train employees on the proper use of social media carries a high risk that deleting comments or blocking users will cause violations of those users' First Amendment rights.'. . This allegation, without more, does not 'nudge[ ] [Plaintiff's] claims across the line from conceivable to plausible,'. . . and fails to meet the 'rigorous standard of culpability and causation' required to plead municipal liability based upon alleged municipal inaction[.]. .Plaintiff's bare allegation therefore does not state a claim of deliberate indifference by the City. . . . It may well be that this lawsuit, and this Opinion, place the City on notice of the need to train its employees that viewpoint discrimination is unlawful in forums governed by the Free Speech Clause, including the City's official Twitter accounts. Indeed, the Court hopes that it does. But that does not mean that the City's alleged failure to train—when it had no reason to believe 'to a moral certainty' that its failure would result in constitutional violations. . . caused the violation of Plaintiff's First Amendment rights.")

Price v. City of New York, No. 15 CIV. 5871 (KPF), 2018 WL 3117507, at *20–21 (S.D.N.Y. June 25, 2018) ("[A]lthough the FAC is not entirely clear, it can be read to suggest that the City should be liable because its employees failed to correct the problem—that is, unblock Plaintiff on Twitter—after Plaintiff made them aware of what had happened. . . . By making these allegations, Plaintiff may be attempting to argue that the City of New York itself undertook the alleged conduct pursuant to a policymaker's adoption or ratification of his subordinates' conduct. . . . It is true that Commissioner O'Neill is a 'policymaker' for Monell purposes, such that his decisions can bind the City of New York. . . But Plaintiff's bare allegation that she 'complained orally to NYPD Commissioner James O'Neill about being blocked on Twitter' is insufficient to show that O'Neill knew that his subordinates blocked Plaintiff for unconstitutional reasons. . . Because Plaintiff fails to allege that O'Neill knew that Obe and Brooks blocked Plaintiff because of her viewpoint, and because the allegations do not suggest that O'Neill agreed with his employees' decision to engage in viewpoint discrimination, Plaintiff fails to allege plausibly that the City ratified or adopted the conduct of Brooks and Obe. For these reasons, the Court grants the City Defendants' motion to dismiss the Monell claim against the City of New York, and the official-capacity claims against Obe, Brooks, and Pierre-Louis, related to the their blocking of Plaintiff from the subject Twitter accounts.")

Turner v. City of New York, No. 17-CV-8563 (KBF), 2018 WL 2727889, at *3–4 (S.D.N.Y. June 6, 2018) ("Plaintiff attempts to support his claim that the Officers were acting pursuant to a pervasive NYPD policy or custom based on: (1) vague reference to 'numerous lawsuits, complaints and notices' brought against the City, the NYPD, and individual NYPD officers that allege similar constitutional violations; (2) certain statements made by Judge Shira A. Scheindlin in an unrelated civil case, Floyd v. City of N.Y., 813 F. Supp. 2d 417 (S.D.N.Y. 2011); . . . (3) a conclusory assertion that '[t]housands of individuals, like plaintiff, have been arrested and prosecuted for trespassing without probable cause,' and that the City is aware of such instances 'through lawsuits, notices of claims, complaints filed with the NYPD's Internal Affairs Bureau, and the Civilian Complaint Review Board, and extensive media coverage'; (4) the decision of Judge Sheindlin in another unrelated case, Davis v. City of N.Y., 959 F. Supp. 2d 324, 355 (S.D.N.Y. 2013); (5) various conclusory assertions that the City and NYPD are broadly aware of such policies and/or customs and have failed to take any corrective measures. . . But those purported bases, even when considered in their totality and viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, are plainly insufficient to support a municipal liability claim capable of withstanding defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings. First, plaintiff's various references to other individuals who have been wrongfully searched and/or arrested are vague and insufficient to state a claim to relief that is plausible in this case under Iqbal and Twombly. Plaintiff asserts, in a conclusory fashion, that the City and NYPD have violated 'thousands' of other people's constitutional rights. But plaintiff does not make any specific factual allegations regarding those other people, their claims, or why they are relevant to the allegations raised herein. Besides noting that the City and NYPD (and some individual officers) have faced other complaints and lawsuits, and making the conclusory allegation that those previous complaints involved similar conduct, the SAC does not even attempt to describe or explain the actual similarities between those previous complaints/lawsuits and the incident giving rise to this lawsuit. A complaint must allege 'more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully,' and more than 'facts that are merely consistent with a defendant's liability.'. . The SAC's vague and conclusory assertions regarding previous constitutional violations does neither. Second, plaintiff's reference to statements made by Judge Scheindlin in two entirely unrelated cases (Floyd and Davis) does nothing to bolster his Monell claim against the City in this case. Plaintiff does not describe how or why the facts or allegations in Floyd or Davis are relevant to the misconduct alleged herein. Further, plaintiff does not even attempt to explain how or why Judge Scheindlin's statements are relevant to the question at hand, which is whether the Officers in this case acted pursuant to a policy and/or custom of the City. The cited statements from Floyd and Davis, as presented in the SAC, are irrelevant to the Court's analysis of the pending motion. Even assuming that plaintiff did successfully allege a custom or practice for unlawful searches and/or arrests, however, the allegations in the SAC do not create a plausible inference that any such custom or practice was pervasive. . . As previously noted, plaintiff does not even attempt to actually explain how the 'thousands' of other instances of misconduct relate to the misconduct alleged herein, or, critically, how many of those previous instances actually involved misconduct. Without further factual support, the other lawsuits and complaints referenced by plaintiff represent nothing more than unproven allegations that are plainly insufficient to support a municipal liability claim. Additionally, reference to certain statements made by Judge Scheindlin (which, the Court notes, were specific to the facts and legal questions at issue in those cases) are immaterial. Whatever evidence was before Judge Scheindlin is not currently before the Court, and is not laid out in the SAC. In short, the SAC is devoid of the types of factual allegations regarding a pervasive policy or custom that is required to sustain a Monell claim against a municipal entity like the City. For that reason, plaintiff's municipal liability claim must be dismissed.")

Paul v. City of New York, No. 16-CV-1952 (VSB), 2017 WL 4271648, at *6–7 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 25, 2017) ("Whether an individual officer has violated the Fourth Amendment during a particular encounter is an entirely separate question from whether a municipal policy caused a constitutional violation. While the municipal policy must be the 'moving force' behind the ultimate constitutional injury, . . it need not be facially unconstitutional[.]. . Here, Plaintiffs have adequately alleged that the NYPD had a policy that needlessly escalated otherwise safe situations by breaching doors of contained EDPs, which caused constitutional violations to which the City was deliberately indifferent. While Plaintiffs are of course required to plead an actual constitutional injury that resulted, they have done so here, which Defendants implicitly concede by choosing not to move to dismiss the excessive force and unlawful entry claims. Defendants also argue the Banks Communication does not support a plausible inference of the existence of an unconstitutional policy, and is 'more fairly construed as raising a thoughtful inquiry as to law enforcement best practices in light of evolving experience with EDPs.'. . Again, Defendants' arguments display a fundamental misunderstanding of Monell doctrine; Plaintiffs need not establish that the municipal policy itself is facially unconstitutional. . . Defendants also misconstrue the force of the Banks Communication, which cites 'several occasions in the past,'. . . and supports Plaintiffs' allegation that the Police Commissioner was on notice of the danger posed by partial door breaches involving emotionally disturbed persons. The Amended Complaint also alleges that at least two other EDPs have died during interactions with NYPD officers. . . Moreover, the fact that the Banks Communication could also be viewed as 'a thoughtful inquiry as to law enforcement best practices in light of evolving experience with EDPs,'. . . does not mean that the Communication is not relevant to and/or evidence of a policy and an alleged Monell violation. Thus, Plaintiffs have plausibly asserted a municipal policy and inaction in light of notice of constitutional deprivations on the part of the NYPD. Next, Defendants argue that the Amended Complaint fails to plausibly allege failure to train. The Amended Complaint does not specify a particular deficiency in the NYPD's training program. However, Plaintiffs do allege that the ESU is a 'specialized unit' tasked with handling people experiencing 'emotional disturbances,'. . . which implies some amount of additional training on interacting with mentally disturbed individuals. Moreover, plaintiffs cannot be expected to know the specifics about a municipality's training program or be able to name the alleged deficiencies at the pleading stage. . . Therefore, dismissal of Plaintiffs' Monell claim at the motion to dismiss stage is premature under the circumstances presented here, and Defendants' motion to dismiss the Monell claim is DENIED.")

An v. City of N.Y., No. 16 CIV. 5381 (LGS), 2017 WL 2376576, at *3–5 (S.D.N.Y. June 1, 2017) ("The Complaint adequately alleges the equivalent of an official policy based on a failure to supervise or train. The allegations satisfy all three requirements for deliberate indifference under Walker. First, the Complaint plausibly alleges that the City knows to 'a moral certainty' that NYPD officers will confront individuals filming them. . . The City issued the FINEST Message, entitled 'Recording of Police Action by the Public,' that reminded officers that the public may legally record police interactions. Second, the Complaint plausibly alleges a history of employees mishandling the situation in which an officer is being recorded. The Complaint cites 47 lawsuits, 18 news reports and hundreds of complaints to the CCRB involving allegations that NYPD officers arrested or otherwise interfered with individuals who were recording them in public. Further, the CCRB concluded that complaints regarding police interactions in which the officer was being filmed warranted an Issued-Based Report, a document the CCRB produces if its investigation 'reveals problems that go beyond specific acts of misconduct and suggest the need for a change in police department policy, procedures, or training.' At this stage of the litigation, these allegations support the inference of a history of NYPD officers mishandling situations in which individuals film police activities in public. . . Third, the Complaint plausibly alleges that the 'wrong choice' by a police officer will 'frequently' deprive an individual of a constitutional right. . . The FINEST Message expressly warns officers that 'intentional interference such as blocking or obstructing cameras or ordering the person to cease ... violates the First Amendment.' The allegations regarding the numerous lawsuits, news reports, complaints to the CCRB between 2014 and 2016 and the CCRB's decision to prepare the so-called 'bystander report' not only support the inference that the City's need for more or better supervision to protect against constitutional violations was obvious, they also support the inference that the City failed to make meaningful efforts to address the risk of harm. . . The City's argument that a plaintiff cannot rely on these sources because they contain hearsay is unavailing; although this objection may prevail on summary judgment, it does not on this Rule 12 motion. . . Accordingly, the Complaint plausibly alleges a municipal policy based on a failure to supervise or train. The City argues that Plaintiff lacks standing in light of the FINEST Message, which it contends is a constitutionally-adequate official policy. . . . The City reasons that Plaintiff cannot allege standing because the FINEST Message did not authorize the NYPD officers to arrest Plaintiff in July 2014 solely for recording a police interaction. Neither Curtis nor Lyons stands for the proposition that a plaintiff is foreclosed from alleging standing whenever the municipality has a written policy that is constitutionally adequate. As subsequent cases make clear, a 'municipal policy' may be found '[w]here a city's official policy is constitutional, but the city causes its employees to apply it unconstitutionally.'")

Brown v. City of New York, No. 13-CV-06912, 2017 WL 1390678, at *14 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 17, 2017) ("Brown alleges numerous times that the DOC allows—even invites the Bloods to control DOC facilities such as GMDC. . . Standing alone, these allegations are conclusory and are insufficient to support a plausible Monell claim based on Brown's single incident. But Brown also claims that the Bloods perpetrated a similar attack on another inmate a few days before he was attacked, . . . and he cites an assortment of cases and articles reporting on corruption and gang-related violence at Rikers. Granted, many of these reports offer no support for Brown's allegation that the City has an unofficial custom of allowing gang activity to occur at GMDC. Certain ones, however, bear enough factual similarity to the incident that is the subject of this lawsuit to allow Brown's Monell claim to survive the City's motion to dismiss. For example, Brown cites a New York, Times article about the killing of a teenage inmate at Rikers by other inmates in 2008. . . In that case, the teen's attackers had allegedly been enlisted by correction officers to act as enforcers to help maintain control over the jail. The scheme, nicknamed 'the Program,' also gave certain inmates special privileges such as deciding who was allowed to use chairs in common rooms. Brown also cites a 2007 Village Voice article reporting on violence at Rikers. . . That article, which quotes deposition testimony by a former correction officer, describes how certain inmates were deputized as enforcers by correction officers to control other inmates. The article also discussed an alleged practice known as 'write with us,' in which DOC personnel conspired to make false reports on incidents involving inmates. These articles, which contain allegations that are strikingly similar to the factual allegations here, plausibly support Brown's contention that the DOC has not adequately responded to a pattern of misconduct. At this stage in the litigation, the court finds that Brown has adequately alleged the existence of a municipal policy or custom. To state a claim for municipal liability under § 1983, a plaintiff must not only establish the existence of a municipal policy or custom, but also show a causal connection, or 'affirmative link,' between the policy and the deprivation of his constitutional rights. . .The City argues that, even if Brown has sufficiently alleged the existence of a municipal policy, he has not plausibly alleged that his constitutional rights were violated as a result of that policy. If the City has a custom of enlisting gang members to help control other inmates, it is plausible that the attack on Brown—and the correction officers' lack of response—was directly connected to this policy. Accordingly, the City's motion to dismiss Brown's claim for municipal liability based on an unofficial custom or practice is denied.")

An v. City of New York, 230 F.Supp.3d 224, 229-31 (S.D.N.Y. 2017) ("The Complaint fails to allege that the City has a practice that is 'so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law.'. . Plaintiff cites six lawsuits filed between 2012 and 2016 and one newspaper report. But the Complaint fails to allege that any of the six lawsuits, which were filed over a course of four years, resulted in a finding that the NYPD officers violated the plaintiffs' First Amendment rights. . . .The Complaint also cites a newspaper report about an incident in which an officer was charged with official misconduct after arresting a person who was filming him. These lawsuits and the one newspaper article do not plausibly support an inference of a widespread illegal custom of violating individuals' First Amendment rights at the time of Plaintiff's arrest. . . .Plaintiff argues that the lawsuits and newspaper article show that the City had notice of 'repeated allegations of misconduct, including after the FINEST message was issued, and yet took no corrective action.' Plaintiff's argument is unavailing as to both parts—that the City had notice that the need to act was obvious and that it took no corrective action. First, the six lawsuits and one newspaper article over the span of four years is insufficient to plausibly allege the need was obvious. The district court opinions that Plaintiff cites in his brief in which the court held a plaintiff had pleaded deliberate indifference involved significantly more instances of similar misconduct than that alleged in the Complaint. . . .Second, the Complaint is insufficient in alleging that the City, once on notice, failed to take corrective action required to show deliberate indifference. As to the incident cited in the news article, the officer was charged with a crime after the arrest. As to the other incidents, the Complaint does not allege any specific facts regarding whether the City investigated or disciplined the officers that arrested Plaintiff or the officers in any of the six lawsuits cited in the Complaint. . . . In sum, because the Complaint does not adequately allege the existence of an official policy or its equivalent, Plaintiff lacks standing to pursue injunctive relief against the City.")

Williams v. City of New York, No. 14-CV-5123 NRB, 2015 WL 4461716, at *7 (S.D.N.Y. July 21, 2015) ("We agree with our colleagues, who have consistently held boilerplate allegations such as the ones in this case to be inadequate. The Complaint assures us that some policy or custom drives officers to arrest falsely, to apply excessive force, and to prosecute maliciously, but utterly fails to identify any specific policy or custom. Likewise, the Complaint mentions the ideas of deliberate indifference and failure to train, but fails to identify any widespread pattern of conduct to which the City blinded itself or any deficiency in the City's oversight and training. At bottom, the Complaint alleges that, at one particular place and time, NYPD officers used excessive force in falsely arresting one criminal suspect. Seasoning an allegation of one-off conduct with catchphrases from leading Supreme Court cases is not sufficient to state a Monell claim. Therefore, we dismiss the section 1983 against the City.")

Adams v. City of New Haven*,* No. 3:14-CV-00778 JAM, 2015 WL 1566177, at *4 (D. Conn. Apr. 8, 2015) ("What facts does a plaintiff asserting a § 1983 failure-to-train claim need to plead in order to withstand a motion to dismiss? Over a decade ago, the Second Circuit suggested that such plaintiffs 'need only plead that the city's failure to train caused the constitutional violation,' in view of the fact that '[i]t is unlikely that a plaintiff would have information about the city's training programs or about the cause of the misconduct at the pleading stage.' Amnesty Am. v. Town of W. Hartford, 361 F.3d 113, 130 n. 10 (2d Cir.2004). Since then, however, the pleading standards have been 'substantially reworked' in Twombly and Iqbal, and so district courts 'have generally required that plaintiffs provide more than a simple recitation of their theory of liability, even if that theory is based on a failure to train.' Simms v. City of New York, 2011 WL 4543051, at *2 n. 3 (E.D.N.Y.2011), aff'd, 480 F. App'x 627 (2d Cir.2012). The Second Circuit has endorsed this approach (albeit in an unpublished disposition), stating that, '[w]hile it may be true that § 1983 plaintiffs cannot be expected to know the details of a municipality's training programs prior to discovery, ... this does not relieve them of their obligation under Iqbal to plead a facially plausible claim.'")

Kucharczyk v. Westchester Cnty., No. 14-CV-601 KMK, 2015 WL 1379893, at *6 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 26, 2015) ("Although there is no heightened pleading requirement for complaints alleging municipal liability under § 1983, . . . a complaint does not 'suffice if it tenders naked assertion [s] devoid of further factual enhancement,'[citing Iqbal]. . . Thus, to survive a motion to dismiss, Plaintiffs cannot merely allege the existence of a municipal policy or custom, but 'must allege facts tending to support, at least circumstantially, an inference that such a municipal policy or custom exists.'. . Put another way, conclusory allegations of a municipal custom or practice of tolerating official misconduct are insufficient to demonstrate the existence of such a custom unless supported by factual details.")

Tieman v. City of Newburgh, No. 13-CV-4178 KMK, 2015 WL 1379652, at *20-23 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 26, 2015) ("[T]he Court concludes that Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged that the need for more or better supervision was obvious. There is no bright line rule for how many complaints of civil rights violations is sufficient to show the need for more supervision, nor is there a bright line rule for how recent those complaints must be. The City asserts that the complaints relied on by Plaintiff regarding excessive force incidents that occurred between 2005 and 2008 are too sparse and too remote to support an inference of obviousness. . . However, the City provides no authority to support the notion that a plaintiff must cite a certain number of complaints in a certain time period to make out a Monell claim. Indeed, the case law supports Plaintiff's position here. [collecting cases] The Court does not see any material difference between the seventeen excessive force claims in seven years in McCants, the fifteen excessive force claims in five years in Farrow . . . and the thirteen claims alleged in nine lawsuits in five years here. . . While there may be questions about the quantum of proof Plaintiff has regarding these other complaints at summary judgment, Plaintiff's allegations allow the Court to plausibly infer that the City was on notice that the police officers were using excessive force in making arrests. . . However, an allegation of numerous claims of excessive force by itself is insufficient to raise an inference of deliberate indifference due to failure to supervise. Instead, a plaintiff must allege that 'meaningful attempts to investigate repeated claims of excessive force are absent.'. . Put another way, '[f]or deliberate indifference to be shown, the response must amount to a persistent failure to investigate the complaints or discipline those whose conduct prompted the complaints.'. . Here, Plaintiff does not offer any allegations plausibly establishing that the City failed to investigate the listed complaints of excessive force. The only allegation Plaintiff makes regarding the City's response to the other lawsuits and the complaints made in the public forum is that '[u]pon information and belief, the officers that were the subject of these lawsuits were not disciplined by [the City] for their actions.'. . This is insufficient. There are two ways to plausibly plead deliberate indifference with respect to failure to supervise/discipline. First, a plaintiff may plead (1) that there was a pattern of allegations of or complaints about similar unconstitutional activity and (2) that the municipality consistently failed to investigate those allegations. Second, a plaintiff may plead (1) that there was a pattern of actual similar constitutional violations and (2) the municipality consistently failed to discipline those involved. However, what Plaintiff alleges here is (1) that there was a pattern of allegations of or complaints about similar unconstitutional activity and (2) that those allegedly involved were not disciplined. This does not plausibly plead a claim for deliberate indifference. There is no basis for the Court to conclude that Plaintiff plausibly alleged that the past conduct was actually unconstitutional, and therefore it would not be deliberately indifferent of the City to fail to punish police officers for conduct that was not improper or that they did not commit. Indeed, to plausibly allege a deliberate indifference failure to discipline claim under the second strategy, Plaintiff must allege a consistent pattern of a failure to discipline unconstitutional action. . . Finally, Plaintiff's allegation that the Matrix Report concluded that the City's 'discipline guidelines and decisions are unstructured' and recommended that certain changes be made is insufficient to plausibly plead that there was a consistent failure to investigate allegations of misconduct or punish incidents of unconstitutionally excessive force to meet the stringent standard of deliberate indifference. In particular, Plaintiff alleges no causal link between the allegedly 'unstructured' discipline guidelines and the unconstitutional practice of not investigating allegations of use of excessive force. For the above reasons, the Court holds that Plaintiff has not plausibly alleged a failure to supervise/discipline case against the City. . . .[S]ince Twombly and Iqbal, 'courts in this district have generally required that plaintiffs provide more than a simple recitation of their theory of liability, even if that theory is based on a failure to train.'. . To state a claim for municipal liability based on failure to train, Plaintiff therefore must allege facts that support an inference that the municipality failed to train its police officers, that it did so with deliberate indifference, and that the failure to train caused his constitutional injuries. . . Other than Plaintiff's boilerplate assertions discussed above, the sole fact Plaintiff pleaded with respect to the City's failure to train its officers is that, 'only 43% of sworn officers who responded to the polling in the [Matrix Report] agreed that they received appropriate training to do their job well.'. . This factual allegation is just not enough to nudge Plaintiff's claim from possible to plausible. The polling data is not specific as to training regarding the use of excessive force. Nor has Plaintiff pleaded any facts suggesting that an alleged training deficiency caused his constitutional injury, for example by identifying 'procedural manuals or training guides' or by 'highlight[ing] relevant particular aspects of police training or supervision.'. . The allegation that, three years after the incident in question took place, only 43% of officers who responded to polling stated that they received appropriate training to do their job well does not allow the Court to plausibly conclude that, at the time of the incident, the City's training as to the use of force during arrest was insufficient and that that insufficiency led to Plaintiff's injuries. . . For the foregoing reasons, Plaintiff fails to state a claim against the City under Monell. However, the Court will give Plaintiff one last chance to plead a Monell claim against the City.")

A. ex rel. A. v. Hartford Bd. of Educ., 976 F.Supp.2d 164, 197 (D. Conn. 2013) ("The Supreme Court of the United States has held that there is no heightened pleading standard for civil rights actions alleging municipal liability under Section 1983. . . Instead, a plaintiff need do little 'more than plead a single instance of misconduct,' and plaintiff's complaint need include little more than 'a short plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief[]'. . . .The Court concludes that, under the facts alleged in Plaintiffs' Amended Answer and Counterclaims and for reasons discussed at length supra, a claim that the Board evinced deliberate indifference to the allegations of discrimination as to show that the defendant intended the discrimination to occur is plausible, and consequently survives a motion to dismiss.")

Cooper v. City of New York, No. 12 Civ. 8008(SAS), 2013 WL 5493011, *6, *7 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 2, 2013) ("Cooper alleges that the City has a policy of racial profiling that led to his arrest and subsequent prosecution in violation of his constitutional rights. . . Specifically, Cooper alleges that the City's de facto policies include the failure to properly train police officers, resulting in the racial profiling of African–Americans. He alleges, [u]pon information and belief, the CITY OF NEW YORK failed to screen, hire, supervise and discipline their police officers, including the DEFENDANT DETECTIVE MICHAEL MacDOUGALL herein, for racial bias, particularly with respect to the treatment of African–Americans, lack of truthfulness, and for their failure to protect citizens from unconstitutional conduct of other police officers, thereby permitting and allowing the defendant DETECTIVE MICHAEL MacDOUGALL herein to be in a position to maliciously prosecute the plaintiff and violate his federal constitutional rights, and/or permit these actions to take place with their knowledge and consent. . . .

Drawing all inferences in favor of Cooper, Cooper has failed to properly plead a plausible Monell claim against the City. The Complaint contains nothing more than '[t]hreadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements,' which 'do not suffice' to withstand defendants' motion to dismiss. . . Cooper has failed to allege any fact which would give rise to an inference that the City had a constitutionally violative policy or that a policymaking individual was deliberately indifferent to the NYPD's alleged lack training. . . Therefore, Cooper's Monell claim against the City is dismissed with leave to amend.") Guzman v. U.S., No. 11 Civ. 5834(JPO), 2013 WL 5018553, *4-*6 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 13, 2013) ("Given that Leatherman predates both Twombly and Iqbal, the City highlights that it 'does not set forth the proper standard under which a Court should evaluate whether a run-of-the-mill complaint is sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss under Rule 8.'. . The City also contests the Court's citation of Rheingold for the proposition that *Leatherman'*specifically rejected the argument that a plaintiff must do more than plead a single instance of misconduct to establish municipal liability under section 1983.'. . Additionally, the City notes that the Second Circuit has continued to cite its opinion in Dwares v. City of New York, 985 F.2d 94 (2d Cir.1993), for the proposition that 'merely asserting the existence of a municipal policy is insufficient absent allegations of underlying facts'. . . despite the Supreme Court's rejection of Dwares' central holding that Monell claims require a heightened standard in Leatherman. The City is correct in noting that, when alleging a pervasive, albeit unofficial, pattern or practice carried out by officials without final policymaking authority, '[a] single incident alleged in a complaint, especially if it involved only actors below the policymaking level, generally will not suffice to raise an inference of the existence of a custom or policy.'. . Additionally, with respect to the failure to train theory of municipal liability, advanced by Plaintiff in paragraphs 502–506 in his Complaint, the alleged deprivation must have 'occurred as the result of a faulty training program, "rather than as a result of isolated misconduct by a single actor...."'. . . This requirement-the so-called 'identified training deficiency'-together with a 'close causal relationship' between the training failure and the constitutional wrong, reflects a requirement that 'plaintiffs [ ] prove that the deprivation occurred as the result of a municipal policy rather than as a result of isolated misconduct by a single actor, ensur[ing] that a failure to train theory does not collapse into respondeat superior liability.'. .The City wrongly assumes that the Court disregarded Twombly, Iqbal, and their progeny. The Court's prior opinion clearly outlined the applicable legal standard for a motion to dismiss, citing both cases. Moreover, the Court's analysis of Guzman's Monell claim reflected a conclusion that Guzman's allegations with respect to the City's policy, custom, or practice were plausible on their face, highlighting the Court's awareness of the relevant precedent and its effect. . . Nevertheless, it was error to maintain the Monell claim in light of the Complaint's boilerplate allegations and this particular claim's lack of factual support. As this Court has previously observed, '[t]o state there is a policy does not make it so.'. .And while respondeat superior is a valid theory by which a plaintiff may assert a state tort claim against a municipality, as Guzman has done here, a Monell claim pursuant to § 1983 requires something more, and is not to be equated with, nor subsumed into, agency theory. . . At bottom, Guzman's Complaint merely recites, without factual support, that the threats and coercion to which he was subjected are the products of an unofficial policy, carried out by officers and sanctioned by the City. Additionally, with respect to the failure to train theory, there are no allegations from which the Court could infer deliberate indifference on the part of policy-making officials or even the required causal link between a failure to train and the resultant harm. Accordingly, upon reconsideration, Guzman's Monell claim is dismissed.")

Goode v. Newton, No. 3:12cv754 (JBA), 2013 WL 1087549, *7, *8 (D. Conn. Mar. 14, 2013) ("While the parties largely agree on the ultimate requirements under Monell, they disagree about the nature of the pleading standard for Monell claims on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. Plaintiff argues that the proper standard for pleading a Monell claim is articulated in Leatherman v. Tarrant Cnty. Narcotics Intelligence & Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163 (1993), which, according to Plaintiff, makes clear that a Monell claim can survive on conclusory allegations, so long as the pleading gives fair notice to Defendants. . . Plaintiff claims that Leatherman remains good law, notwithstanding the Supreme Court's decisions in Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, and Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662. Leatherman does not, however, represent a substantive carve-out for Monell claims, but rather stands for the proposition that courts may not impose a more rigorous pleading standard to Monell claims. . . To survive a motion to dismiss, a Monell claim must include enough factual material to be plausible. . . That said, in evaluating the plausibility of Monell claims, courts are mindful of the Second Circuit's observation that '[i]t is unlikely that a plaintiff would have information about the city's training programs or about the cause of the misconduct at the pleading stage.'. .The question, then, is whether the nonconclusory allegations in the Amended Complaint are sufficient to render the Monell claims plausible. The Court recognizes that this presents a close question, but concludes that Plaintiff has pled sufficient facts 'to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence' of inadequate training or supervision . . . . First, the Court notes that Plaintiff alleges two separate violations—six months' apart—committed by New London officers, which share a common thread: manufactured criminality. According to the Amended Complaint, Officer Newton planted drugs and falsified his police report, and Officer Lynch lied to obtain a 'no trespassing' letter from the NLHA that then served as the basis for a pretextual arrest. Second, notwithstanding Defendants' characterization of the Francovilla incident as 'completely unrelated' to this suit . . . , the Francovilla matter involves allegations that New London policemen falsified police reports and manufactured criminal charges in 2009 . . . . Third, as Plaintiff notes, the New London police force is relatively small, consisting of approximately eighty sworn officers. . . In light of the small size of the police force, the prior allegations of falsifying police reports in 2009, and the continued practice of falsifying reports in 2010, the Court finds that it is plausible that Defendants had an informal custom of 'tolerating police misconduct' and that this custom caused the violations alleged in Counts Four and Six. . . Accordingly, the City Defendants' motion to dismiss is denied as to the Monell counts.")

Sherwyn Toppin Marketing Consultants, Inc. v. City of New York, No. 08 CV 1340(ERK)(VVP), 2013 WL 685382, *5, *6 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 25, 2013) ("Claims against municipalities under § 1983 are not subject to a heightened pleading standard. . . Nevertheless, such claims must meet the requirements of Rule 8 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and satisfy the plausibility standard articulated in [Ashcroft and Twombly] . . .Moreover, 'boilerplate allegations of unconstitutional policies and practices' are insufficient to survive a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. . .Here, the complaint lacks sufficient factual details concerning Monell liability and contains mere conclusory statements regarding the City's alleged unconstitutional policies and practices. In this regard, the amended complaint includes only two brief allegations. First, plaintiffs allege that the 'process of setting up illegal roadblocks as a form of harassment is a specific practice and policy of the New York City Police Department and has been utilized on numerous occasions against similarly situated establishments in Brooklyn.'. . No evidence is cited in support of this statement in the amended complaint and the 'illegal roadblocks' are not mentioned in plaintiffs' memorandum of law in the discussion of their claims against the City. Moreover, it is not clear which cause of action the alleged 'illegal roadblocks ... practice and policy' would support, even if evidence of such a practice and policy had been presented. Second, plaintiffs allege that '[d]efendants' illegal actions were undertaken pursuant to municipal defendants' customs, practices and policies.'. . This allegation is insufficient to state a cause of action against the City.")

Collins v. City of New York, 923 F.Supp.2d 462, 477-79 & n.7 (E.D.N.Y. 2013) ("The First and Ninth Circuit have followed Grandstaff's logic. . . The Court is likewise persuaded. Subsequent events may, as the City argues, reflect only Hynes's support for a subordinate accused of wrongdoing. But the lack of any corrective action might also reflect a tacit policy on Hynes's part to condone whatever his subordinates deemed necessary to secure a conviction. Collins is, for now, entitled to the latter inference. . . In any event, Collins's theory does not hinge solely on Hynes's response to an isolated incident. He further alleges that despite scores of cases involving Brady violations and other prosecutorial misconduct, Hynes has never disciplined an assistant for such misconduct, even after the violations were confirmed by court decisions. The City claims that the prior instances of misconduct were not precisely the same as those alleged by Collins. Those differences might lead a jury to agree that there was no underlying policy connecting each incident. But the Court's role at this stage is to determine whether Collins has alleged facts that support a plausible theory. . . The Court concludes that Collins's allegations regarding Hynes's response—or lack thereof—to misconduct by Vecchione and other assistants make plausible his theory that Hynes was so deliberately indifferent to the underhanded tactics that his subordinates employed as to effectively encourage them to do so. . . Hynes himself is not named as a defendant and would,

in any event, be entitled to the same absolute immunity that protects Vecchione. . . . Since Collins's complaint is governed by Iqbal, it is subject to a higher standard than the Second Circuit applied in Walker. He must allege, not only a viable theory, but facts that render the theory plausible. In that regard, allegations of Brady violations are unhelpful. Better training as to what Brady requires might increase officer awareness of what information must be disclosed to prosecutors, but it could not plausibly have prevented the egregious conduct alleged here because Vecchione, according to the allegations, was well aware of what Gerecitano and Hernandez had done to secure Oliva's testimony. Further, the Court agrees with the City that the litany of other police-misconduct cases are insufficient to make a plausible case for Monell liability. The cases either involve Brady violations, post-date Collins's conviction, or involve something less (settlements without admissions of liability and unproven allegations) than evidence of misconduct. Zahrey, by contrast, involves actual evidence of analogous misconduct during the relevant time frame. But the wrongdoing in Zahrey occurred, as noted, in the Internal Affairs Bureau. Without more, the Court would be hard-pressed to conclude that two incidents in two completely separate units within the NYPD were sufficient to plausibly establish the City's deliberate indifference. The Mollen Report, however, establishes—at least for present purposes—that the misconduct underlying this case and Zahrey was sufficiently widespread to support an inference of deliberate indifference. An entire section of the Report is devoted to 'Perjury and Falsifying Documents,' which is described as 'a serious problem facing the Department.'. . It describes testimonial and documentary perjury—'as when an officer swears falsely under oath in an affidavit or criminal complaint'—as 'probably the most common form of police corruption facing the criminal justice system today, particularly in connection with arrests for possession of narcotics and guns.'. . Finally, it notes that '[s]everal officers ... told us that the practice of police falsification in connection with such arrests is so common in certain precincts that it has spawned its own word: "testilying."'. . Of course, the Report's findings are not conclusive. But they at least make it plausible that the type of misconduct that led to Collins's arrest and prosecution was endemic within the NYPD. A jury could reasonably infer from that circumstance, if proven, that the department's policymakers were aware of a serious risk of constitutional violations, and that the failure to take any action in response to the problem—whether through training or otherwise—was the result of deliberate indifference.") Triano v. Town of Harrison, NY , 895 F.Supp.2d 526, 539-41 (S.D.N.Y. 2012) ("After Twombly and Iqbal, the Second Circuit has made clear that Plaintiff must do more than merely state that the municipality's failure to train caused his constitutional injury. . . . To state a claim for municipal liability based on failure to train, Plaintiff therefore must allege facts which support an inference that the municipality failed to train its police officers, that it did so with deliberate indifference, and that the failure to train caused his constitutional injuries. [citing cases] Plaintiff's mere claim that the Town failed to train and supervise its police officers is a 'boilerplate assertion[ ]' and is insufficient, without more, to state a Monell claim. . .Nor has Plaintiff pled any facts suggesting that an alleged training deficiency caused his constitutional injury, for example by identifying 'procedural manuals or training guides' or by 'highlight[ing] relevant particular aspects of police training or supervision.'. . The only facts which Plaintiff includes in the Amended Complaint relate to his interactions with Barone on the night of his arrest . . ., but 'the facts provided in connection with the single incident experienced by [ ][P]laintiff does not put the [Town] on notice as to what its policymakers have done or failed to do that amount[s] to deliberate indifference to unconstitutional conduct by its police force,' Rodriguez v. City of New York, No. 10–CV–1849, 2011 WL 4344057, at *5 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 7, 2011). Because Plaintiff has done no more than make conclusory assertions, he has not adequately alleged that the Town's training policies caused Plaintiff's injuries, thus providing an independent basis to dismiss this claim.")

Castilla v. City of New York, No. 09 Civ. 5446(SHS), 2012 WL 3871517, *3-*5 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 6, 2012) ("Castilla does not claim that the City's liability pursuant to Monell and its offspring arises from a formal City policy or an unconstitutional act by an authorized decision-maker. Rather, she alleges, under the third and fourth theories, a widespread custom of at least tolerating male police officers' sexual misconduct, and a failure to train, supervise, and/or discipline male police officers in connection with their handling female detainees and informants. Taking plaintiffs' allegations as true, the Court finds that Castilla has sufficiently pled claims for Monell liability against the City of New York. This finding is based, in part, on the Second Circuit's recognition that '[it] is unlikely that a plaintiff would have information about the city's training programs or about the cause of the misconduct at the pleading stage, and therefore need only plead that the city's failure to train caused the constitutional violation.' Amnesty Am. v. Town of West Hartford, 361 F.3d 113, 130 n. 10 (2d Cir.2004). The Second Circuit has not yet addressed whether Iqbal has heightened the pleading requirements for such a municipal liability claim, but district courts in this Circuit have continued, post-Iqbal, to apply the pleading standard articulated in Amnesty to a Monell claim based on a failure to train. [citing cases] Thus, in assessing the sufficiency of plaintiff's Monell claims—particularly the failure to train claim—the Court keeps in mind that plaintiff has not yet had the full benefit of discovery. The City's position cannot be ignored. The City contends that this case simply concerns an isolated incident involving a single rogue police detective. The City may be right. However, the alleged facts, taken as true for purposes of this motion, plausibly suggest otherwise. Plaintiff alleges that multiple detectives and officers helped Sandino threaten, abuse, and sexually assault Castilla over many hours and in many locations, including at a police precinct. The complaint specifically alleges concerted action by other police officers in addition to Sandino who were not supervised and at least not immediately stopped or disciplined. Sandino is alleged to have continued for weeks after the assault to contact, proposition, and threaten Castilla. When Sandino paid Castilla a visit at her family's home, Sandino was accompanied by another officer. Furthermore, Castilla alleges that the police officers maintained a 'code of silence' to cover up their misconduct. In Michael v. County of Nassau, the U.S. district court in the Eastern District of New York found, on a motion to dismiss decided under Iqbal, that an informal custom 'of at least tolerating police misconduct' and/or a failure to properly train police officers could be inferred where the alleged conduct took place over several hours, including at police headquarters, and several officers participated in the repeated denials of the plaintiff's rights. . . Castilla, like the plaintiff in the Michael case, alleges a string of incidents in which she was repeatedly victimized by multiple officers in multiple locations, both on and off City property. More than that, Castilla alleges various other instances of male police officers taking sexual advantage of females under their custody or control. . . Although the City challenges the admissibility of the evidence plaintiff cites as relevant examples of police misconduct, the Court need not decide that issue at this time. Finally, the City argues that plaintiffs' allegations do not demonstrate an unconstitutional policy or custom, but rather show the opposite: a readiness on the part of the City to investigate and discipline police officers who misbehave. In particular, the City points to the IAB's responsiveness to Castilla's IAB complaint and the fact that Sandino was ultimately punished for his wrongdoing. While these facts inure to the City's benefit on this motion, Castilla also alleges that not all the individual perpetrators have been investigated and disciplined. In any event, the issue of whether the City eventually investigates and disciplines employees accused of misconduct is distinct from whether the City was deliberately indifferent to the violation of citizens' constitutional rights in the first place. In other words, even if the City took corrective action, its training and supervision of male officers vis-a-vis female detainees and informants still may have been inadequate. The Court is not evaluating the ultimate merits of plaintiff's Monell claims here. The Court is simply finding that the allegations of very serious police misconduct, supported by adequate facts, raise an inference of municipal liability that is plausible enough to permit the claims to proceed. . . .Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the City's motion for judgment on the pleadings with respect to Castilla's claims against the City is denied. Plaintiff is entitled to discovery regarding the City's policies and practices regarding training, supervision, and discipline in connection with male officers' handling of female suspects, prospective confidential informants, and inform")

Rodriguez v. City of New York, No. 10 Civ. 1849(PKC), 2011 WL 4344057, at *5 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 7, 2011) ("[T]he facts provided in connection with the single incident experienced by the plaintiff does not put the City on notice as to what its policymakers have done or failed to do that amount to deliberate indifference to unconstitutional conduct by its police force. The actions at issue were undertaken by perhaps two police officers in a single precinct. The plaintiff provides no facts relating to any action undertaken by any City policymaker or any facts referencing established City policies in, for example, training manuals or otherwise. Plaintiff's vague reference to the existence of additional incidents of unjust arrest, detention and incarceration based on improperly reviewed bench warrants occurring prior to the alleged incident on February 15, 2007 (Compl.¶ 67), without providing even the most basic facts pertaining to such incidents, cannot be said to establish a policy of deliberate indifference putting the City on notice of the grounds upon which the plaintiff's Monell claim rests. Accordingly, plaintiff has failed to state a claim upon which relief can be granted against the City of New York.").

Plair v. City of New York, No. 10 Civ. 8177, 2011 WL 2150658, at *7, *8 (S.D.N.Y. May 31, 2011) ("Following Iqbal and Twombly, Monell claims must satisfy the plausibility standard: It is questionable whether the boilerplate Monell claim often included in many § 1983 cases, including this one, was ever sufficient to state a claim upon which relief could be granted. . . In light of [Ashcroft and Twombly] it is now clear that such boilerplate claims do not rise to the level of plausibility. [citing cases] Here, the complaint lacks sufficient factual details concerning Monell liability and contains boilerplate allegations of unconstitutional policies and practices. . . Specifically, Plaintiff conclusorily alleges that the City 'permitted, tolerated and was deliberately indifferent to a pattern and practice of staff brutality and retaliation by DOC staff at the time of plaintiff's beatings [which] constituted a municipal policy, practice or custom and led to plaintiff's assault.'. . . As discussed above in reference to Plaintiff's claims under Colon, the prior violent incidents relied upon by Plaintiff are too attenuated and isolated from his own injury to plausibly establish (a) a policy or custom of violence against prisoners, and (b) that his injury was linked to that policy or custom. Plaintiff relies on conclusory allegations to fill the gaps in his complaint, rendering his Monell allegations insufficient under Iqbal and Twombly.")

Michael v. County of Nassau, No. 09-CV-5200(JS)("KT), 2010 WL 3237143, at *4, *5 & n.2 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 11, 2010) ("Defendants . . . contend that Plaintiff has not sufficiently pled a Monell claim for municipal liability. . . The Court disagrees. Plaintiff's Complaint does not identify any official Nassau County policy or custom that resulted in the alleged constitutional violations. Nor does Plaintiff's Complaint identify a policymaker who promulgated such a policy or custom through his acts. But, at least at this stage, the law does not require him to do so. . . . On the surface, it might be argued that Amnesty America conflicts with the Iqbal and Twombly standard, by permitting a plaintiff to assert a Monell 'failure to train' claim without amplifying the complaint with enough facts to render the claim 'plausible.' But such an argument sees the forest while ignoring the trees. The Supreme Court has instructed that assessing a complaint's plausibility 'is context-specific, requiring the reviewing court to draw on its experience and common sense.'. . Though pre- Iqbal, the Second Circuit, drawing upon its experience and common sense, has recognized that plaintiffs should be afforded a lenient pleading standard on failure to train claims, because they have no realistic way to learn about a municipality's training programs without discovery. Amnesty America, 361 F.3d at 130 n. 10. Here, the Complaint pleads sufficient facts to infer that Nassau County had: (1) an informal policy, or a custom, of at least tolerating police misconduct; and/or (2) failed to properly train its officers, thereby expressing deliberate indifference to the potential for violations. The conduct alleged in the Complaint took place over several hours. At least five officers allegedly participated in repeated denials of Plaintiff's rights, including his right to be free from arrest without probable cause, his right to counsel, and his right to be free from excessive force. Some of the officers allegedly mocked Plaintiff during the ordeal, including for invoking his right to counsel. (Compl ¶¶ 40, 53, 65, 79.) Much of the alleged conduct took place at police headquarters. (Compl.¶¶ 45-82.) This includes an alleged beating Plaintiff suffered in a public hallway at headquarters. (Compl.¶ 70.) And it also includes an incident where officers allegedly interrupted a video recording of Plaintiff's interrogation so they could beat him. (Compl.¶¶ 72-77.) Thus, Plaintiff has not alleged one isolated incident of police misconduct. . . He has alleged multiple incidents over a long, continuous time period. And, assuming Plaintiff's allegations as true, the fact that so much of this happened at headquarters, including in a public hallway, suggests that the officers involved did not fear supervisory personnel observing their conduct, intervening to stop them, or subjecting them to disciplinary action for their misdeeds. . . And this, in turn, suffices − at this stage − to create the plausible inference that Nassau County had an informal policy or custom of at least tolerating police misconduct. . . Likewise, the alleged involvement of numerous officers, the mocking Plaintiff allegedly received when invoking his right to counsel, and the headquarters location, suffices to suggest that Nassau County poorly trained and/or supervised its officers concerning the need to not violate suspects' civil rights.")

Araujo v. City of New York, No. 08-CV-3715 (KAM)(JMA), 2010 WL 1049583, at *9 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 19, 2010) ("In the context of a motion to dismiss, '[t]o allege the existence of an affirmative municipal policy, a plaintiff must make factual allegations that support a plausible inference that the constitutional violation took place pursuant either to a formal course of action officially promulgated by the municipality's governing authority or the act of a person with policymaking authority for the municipality.' Missel v. County of Monroe, No. 09-0235-cv, 2009 U.S.App. LEXIS 24120, at *4 (2d Cir. Nov. 4, 2009) (citing Vives v. City of New York, 524 F.3d 346, 350 (2d Cir.2008)); see also Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1951; Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555. Mere 'boilerplate' assertions that a municipality has such a custom or policy which resulted in a deprivation of the plaintiff's rights is insufficient to state a Monell claim. . . Here, plaintiff's Complaint contains only a conclusory allegation that the Municipal Defendants had 'de facto policies, practices, customs, and usages of failing to properly train, screen, supervise, or discipline employees ... [which] were a direct and proximate cause of the unconstitutional conduct alleged.' . . Plaintiff alleges no facts to indicate any deliberate choice by municipal policymakers to engage in unconstitutional conduct. Moreover, plaintiff's allegation that the Municipal Defendants acted pursuant to 'de facto policies, practices, customs, and usages' (Compl.& 58), without any facts suggesting the existence of the same, are plainly insufficient to state a Section 1983 claim against the Municipal Defendants.").

Cuevas v. City of New York, No. 07 Civ. 4169(LAP), 2009 WL 4773033, at *3, *4 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 7, 2009) ("Plaintiff's boilerplate allegations against the City of New York satisfy neither the elements enumerated above, nor the pleading requirements set forth in Iqbal. In conclusory fashion, Plaintiff makes the following allegations against the City of New York: That all of the aforesaid actions, errors and omissions by defendants including the City of New York's and New York City Police Department's failures to supervise or properly train 'John Doe's [sic] and Jane Doe Numbers '1' through '5' [sic] inclusive, and their agents, servants and employees, were intentional, reckless, and grossly negligent; and moreover evidenced a deliberate callous and reckless indifference to the plaintiff [sic] constitutional rights; all of which constituted a policy of supervisory indifference and a pattern and practice of indifferent conduct by defendants. (Compl.& 18) That there was direct affirmative culpability on the part of defendant CITY for the actions, errors and omissions of the aforesaid officers and supervisory personnel in this matter. . . That all of the aforesaid actions, errors and omissions, and those alleged hereinafter, of the said defendants and their agents, servants, employees and subordinate officials, were particularly egregious; were morally culpable; were actuated by evil and reprehensible motives; constituted wrongs directed at the general public; implied and entailed a criminal indifference to civil and administrative obligations; implied a policy, custom and practice of deliberate, callous and reckless indifference and constitutional violations of the citizens of the City of New York; established an inference of gross negligence and failure to train; and/or involved a wanton and reckless disregard of and indifference to plaintiff's rights. . . That all of the aforesaid actions ... constituted a single, unusually brutal and egregious beating administered by a group of municipal employees, sufficiently out of the ordinary to warrant an inference that such act was attributable to inadequate training or supervision amounting to deliberate indifference and/or gross negligence. . . While these allegations are heavy on descriptive language, they are light on facts. Baldly asserting that Plaintiff's injuries are the result of the City's policies does not show this Court what the policy is or how that policy subjected Plaintiff to suffer the denial of a constitutional right. After stripping away the bare legal conclusions, the Complaint is devoid of any 'well-pleaded factual allegations ... plausibly [giving] rise to an entitlement to relief.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1950. Accordingly, Plaintiff's claims against the City of New York are dismissed.").

Colon v. City of New York, Nos. 09-CV-8, 09-CV-9, 2009 WL 4263362, at *1, *2 (E.D.N.Y. Nov. 25, 2009) ("The Colons claim to have been falsely arrested, imprisoned, subjected to an illegal strip search, and maliciously prosecuted. . . The City is said to be liable under section 1983 for the Colons' injuries, pursuant to Monell v. Dept. of Social Servs., 436 U.S. 658 (1978), because the acts complained of were the result of the 'customs, policies, usages, practices, procedures, and rules' of the City. . . The following are alleged to be City customs or policies: (a) wrongfully arresting minority individuals on the pretext that they were involved in drug transactions; (b) manufacturing evidence against individuals allegedly involved in drug transactions; (c) using excessive force on individuals who have already been handcuffed; (d) unlawfully strip-searching pre-arraignment detainees in the absence of any reasonable suspicion that said individuals were concealing weapons or contraband; and (e) arresting innocent persons in order to meet 'productivity goals' (i.e. arrest quotas). . . The Colons assert that such customs and policies may be inferred from the existence of other similar civil rights actions that have been brought against the city, Complaints & 85 (listing example cases), and from a January 2006 statement by Deputy Commissioner Paul J. Browne that police commanders are permitted to set 'productivity goals,' Complaints & 86.In support of its motion to dismiss, the City argues that the Colons fail to identify any actual custom or policy of the city, and that their allegations are too speculative and inconclusive to meet the pleading standard established in Bell Atlantic v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007) and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). Absent a viable federal claim against the City, the court is urged to decline supplemental jurisdiction over the Colons' state-law claims with respect to the City. '[D]etermining whether a complaint states a plausible claim is context-specific, requiring the reviewing court to draw on its experience and common sense.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1940 (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556). Informal inquiry by the court and among the judges of this court, as well as knowledge of cases in other federal and state courts, has revealed anecdotal evidence of repeated, widespread falsification by arresting police officers of the New York City Police Department. Despite numerous inquiries by commissions and strong reported efforts by the present administration − through selection of candidates for the police force stressing academic and other qualifications, serious training to avoid constitutional violations, and strong disciplinary action within the department − there is some evidence of an attitude among officers that is sufficiently widespread to constitute a custom or policy by the city approving illegal conduct of the kind now charged.It would be desirable to quantify this general reputation, but such quantification is beyond the scope and capacity of the court on this motion. Upon inquiry at oral argument, neither party was able adequately to address what documentation may exist supporting or refuting the existence of such a policy or custom. . . Nevertheless, there are substantial issues: first, whether this reputation is predicated on a significant number of misstatements by police officers − even though the overwhelming majority of the police force does not engage in such fabrications; and, second, whether failure to train, supervise, or discipline members of the police force that do commit such fabrications constitutes a policy or custom under Monell. . . While the charge may prove to be completely unfair to the city and its generally outstanding police force, there are sufficient issues of fact to warrant further proceedings under Monell. Neither Twombly nor Iqbal can trump the Constitution. Under these circumstances, the Colons have 'nudged their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible,' and state viable section 1983 claims against the City.").

THIRD CIRCUIT

Estate of Roman v. City of Newark, 914 F.3d 789, 798-801, 805-06 (3d Cir. 2019) ("Although a policy or custom is necessary to plead a municipal claim, it is not sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss. A plaintiff must also allege that the policy or custom was the 'proximate cause' of his injuries. . . He may do so by demonstrating an 'affirmative link' between the policy or custom and the particular constitutional violation he alleges. . . This is done for a custom if Roman demonstrates that Newark had knowledge of 'similar unlawful conduct in the past, ... failed to take precautions against future violations, and that [its] failure, at least in part, led to [his] injury.'. . Despite these requirements, Roman does not need to identify a responsible decisionmaker in his pleadings. . . Nor is he required to prove that the custom had the City's formal approval. . .The pleading requirements are different for failure-to-train claims because a plaintiff need not allege an unconstitutional policy. . . Instead, he must demonstrate that a city's failure to train its employees 'reflects a deliberate or conscious choice.'. . For claims involving police officers, the Supreme Court has held that the failure to train 'serve[s] as [a] basis for § 1983 liability only where [it] ... amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the police come into contact.'. . . In view of this case law, Roman has not pled a municipal policy, as his amended complaint fails to refer to 'an official proclamation, policy, or [an] edict.' However, he has sufficiently alleged a custom of warrantless or nonconsensual searches. He has also adequately pled that the City failed to train, supervise, and discipline its police officers. . . . We conclude that the allegations regarding Newark's failure to train, supervise, and discipline are strong enough to survive a motion to dismiss. . . Among them are: a failure to train officers on obtaining a search warrant . . . and on 'issuing truthful investigative reports,'. . .; a failure to supervise and manage officers, . . .; and a failure to discipline officers, . . . first by 'refus[ing]' to create a well-run Internal Affairs Department, . . . and second by 'inadequately investigating, if investigating at all, citizens' complaints regarding illegal search and seizure[.]'. . . The result was a 'complete lack of accountability' and of 'record keeping,'. . leading to a culture in which officers 'knew there would be no professional consequences for their action[s]'. . . As the amended complaint alleges, it should come as no surprise that these conditions led to a federal investigation. . . . Roman has sufficiently alleged a municipal liability claim against the City of Newark under § 1983. He cites various examples of inadequate police training, poor police discipline, and unheeded citizen complaints.

He tells us certain police officers did not receive training for over 20 years, and their training did not cover the basic requirements of the Fourth Amendment. In his pleadings, he states the Newark Police Department did not discipline officers who engaged in police misconduct, . . . including unlawful searches and false arrests[.] . . He also notes the public filed formal complaints about improper searches and false arrests that were disregarded almost wholesale. . . These alleged practices were ongoing when Roman's search and arrest occurred, and the City had notice of them at that time. While the proof developed to support these allegations may or may not be persuasive to a finder of fact, they are enough to survive dismissal at this stage. Based on this conclusion, we part with the District Court's holding that Roman failed to state a § 1983 claim against the City. Though we affirm otherwise, we vacate and remand its decision on municipal liability.")

Brookins v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 24-470, 2024 WL 1889242, at *8–9 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 30, 2024) ("The City argues Ms. Brookins cannot establish municipal liability because (1) she does not plead a municipal policy or custom, (2) she does not allege conduct by a municipal policymaker, and (3) she does not allege prior instances of misconduct to support a failure to train claim. The City misunderstands Ms. Brookins's theory of liability. Ms. Brookins is proceeding on a single incident failure-to-train theory of municipal liability. Our Court of Appeals instructs Ms. Brookins does not need to establish a policy or a policymaker to support a failure-to-train claim. . . . And Ms. Brookins does not need to allege earlier instances or a pattern of misconduct to state a claim if she pleads the need for training the City's police officers in handling death scene photographs of deceased individuals is 'so obvious,' failure to do so constitutes 'deliberate indifference' to citizens' constitutional rights. Ms. Brookins relies on our Court of Appeals's decision in Berg v. County of Allegheny involving a single incident failure-to-train claim against Allegheny County based on a warrant clerk's clerical error prompting the police to arrest the wrong person. . . Mr. Berg alleged police wrongfully arrested him based in part on the County's 'failure to provide sufficient procedural or technical safeguards against errors such as the one that resulted in Berg's arrest.'. . Judge Ambrose granted summary judgment on Mr. Berg's municipal liability claim against Allegheny County. Our Court of Appeals reversed, finding an issue of fact remained as to whether the County was deliberately indifferent to an obvious risk. Our Court of Appeals likened the County's alleged failure to provide protective measures against the clerk's mistake to 'a failure to equip law enforcement officers with specific tools to handle recurring situations.'. . We are also guided by Judge Marston's analysis a year ago in Alexander v. Bucks County. Mr. Alexander sued Bucks County correctional officers under section 1983 for violations of his constitutional rights. . . Mr. Alexander alleged Bucks County failed to adequately train correctional officers on the use of force with inmates with mental illnesses. . .The County moved to dismiss the Monell claim arguing the County did not describe the nature of the County's training program or whether officers acted consistent with the program or policy. . . Judge Marston reasoned Mr. Alexander is not required to plead details of the training program with specificity at the motion to dismiss stage. . . 'Instead, the complaint must identify the training program that the plaintiff believes is deficient, describe that deficiency, and explain how the deficiency caused the plaintiff's injuries.'. .Judge Marston found Mr. Alexander satisfied this standard because he alleged the County had no use-of-force policy for officers encountering incarcerated people with mental illnesses despite its knowledge officers will regularly interact with incarcerated people with mental illnesses and at times officers will be required to use force on them. Judge Marston inferred the County's failure to train presents an 'obvious risk' from the fact the facility places individuals with mental illnesses in a different unit than individuals without mental illnesses. . . Ms. Brookins identifies the allegedly deficient training program as the failure 'to maintain any policies or training regarding the privacy rights of family members in the context of photographing or sharing photographs of deceased individuals.'. . Ms. Brookins's allegations point to a recurring situation of officers needing to respond to suicides, homicides, or accidents resulting in death. Much like Mr. Berg's allegations the County did not equip its clerks with the necessary tools, Ms. Brookins alleges the City did not equip officers with the tools necessary to respond to a recurring situation—death scenes—because it did not employ policies or training on the privacy rights of family members of the deceased. Ms. Brookins need not detail with specificity the allegedly inadequate training at the motion to dismiss stage. The parties may explore in discovery the obviousness of the need for training and the risk presented by a failure to train.")

Siehl v. City of Johnstown, No. CV 18-77J, 2019 WL 762933, at *10 (W.D. Pa. Feb. 20, 2019) ("Here, Plaintiff has alleged with great specificity that Defendant Johnstown caused the deprivation of his rights by its failure to employ policies and protocols regarding the training, supervision, and discipline of its police officers including, but not limited to, the initiation of prosecution only on a finding of probable cause, and police responsibility not to fabricate evidence or interfere with a criminal suspect's attorney-client relationship. . . Constitutional injuries are a 'highly predictable consequence' of a failure to train (and likewise supervise and discipline) police officers in the handling of recurring situations involving investigations and arrest. . . Plaintiff has alleged a plausible claim pursuant to Monell and Bryan County. Therefore, the Court must deny Defendant City of Johnstown's Motion to Dismiss Count VI.")

Lansberry v. Altoona Area Sch. Dist., No. 3:18-CV-19, 2018 WL 3520496, at *14 (W.D. Pa. July 20, 2018) ("After several careful readings of the Amended Complaint, the Court finds that Lansberry failed to state a plausible Monell claim. As noted above, to state a plausible claim for deliberate indifference in the § 1983 context, a plaintiff generally must allege that the government entity had notice of a pattern of similar constitutional violations by employees who had not been properly trained. . . However, Lansberry's Amended Complaint fails to allege that AASD had notice of a pattern of constitutional violations. For example, Lansberry does not allege that AASD had received, and failed to adequately respond to, previous reports of bullying. Nor does he allege that other students' rights to bodily integrity had been violated due to known bullying incidents that the school failed to properly address. In other words, while Lansberry alleges that W.J.L. experienced bullying, he does not allege a wider bullying problem at AASD that could have plausibly put AASD on notice that the constitutional rights of its students were being violated. Accordingly, Lansberry does not plausibly allege that, given the conditions at Altoona Junior High with regard to bullying, the need for additional training was 'so obvious' and the status quo so likely to result in constitutional violations that AASD 'can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.'. . Therefore, the Court finds that Lansberry failed to state a plausible Monell claim.")

Estate of Bard v. City of Vineland, No. 117CV01452NLHAMD, 2017 WL 4697064, at *5 (D.N.J. Oct. 19, 2017) ("As in Iqbal, and also in Zampetis, Plaintiff's conclusory contention that an infirm policy, or custom, or training practice by the City of Vineland, and the police chiefs' knowledge of one or all of these infirmities, caused Bard's shooting death is insufficient to properly plead a viable Monell claim. Plaintiff is required to provide facts – not simply regurgitate all the legal bases for liability under Monell - to support her contentions and adequately plead her claims against the City and the police chiefs. Because of Plaintiff's failure to do so, Plaintiff's claims against the City of Vineland, Codispoti, and Beu must be dismissed.")

Wichterman v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV16-5796, 2017 WL 1374528, at *4 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 17, 2017) ("In this case, plaintiff alleges that 'reasonably trained...police supervisors were aware of their responsibilities to train...police to recognize the signs of overdose and to intervene to reverse the effects of overdose.'. . Plaintiff also alleges that '[d]efendant City of Philadelphia, as an entity that operates a prison system and police holding cells, is aware of the need to train its employees as described above.'. . In similar circumstances, courts have concluded that failure-to-train claims based on a single incident state a claim under Monell. . . . At this stage, plaintiff's allegations with respect to the lack of training on monitoring and treating detainees on opiates are sufficient to state a Monell claim against the City based on a failure-to-train theory.")

Geist v. Ammary, No. 11–07532, 2012 WL 6762010, *7 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 20, 2012) ("In the Complaint, Plaintiff alleges the following:

> 38. At all relevant times the Defendant, City of Allentown, gave the Defendant, Ammary, a Taser, despite actual notice that the Ammary was not a candidate for using a taser [sic] because of his propensity to use excessive force against the public.
> 39. At all times herein relevant Defendant, City of Allentown, intentionally, purposefully, and knowingly, had a policy, practice, regulation or custom of giving minimal training about the usage of the taser [sic], especially on a non violent female minor.
> 40. At all times herein relevant the policy of the Defendant, City of Allentown, practice, regulation or custom caused Plaintiff to be subject to arrest and abuse by Defendant, Jason Ammary.
> 43. The Defendant, City of Allentown, failed to use adequate training before issuing a taser [sic] to Defendant, Ammary.

I find these allegations sufficient to survive the instant motion to dismiss. If Plaintiff can prove that Defendant had policies or customs that condoned the use of excessive force in effectuating seizures of suspects, the municipality could be liable. Plaintiff identifies a 'policy and practice' which potentially constitutes deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of citizens, namely, failing to create a policy or train officers regarding proper Taser gun use and deployment. Likewise, if the Plaintiff can prove that the municipality did not provide training to police officers on procedures to avoid the use of excessive force in arresting suspects, she could prevail on her excessive-force claim. These allegations are not merely a recitation of the elements of a Monell claim, but point towards specific failings in training that led to the specific violation of constitutional rights here alleged. Plaintiff is entitled to discovery to determine whether her allegations of inadequate training and corrupt policy are true. The court will therefore deny the motion on this point.")

Ford v. City of Philadelphia, No. 12–2160, 2012 WL 3030161, *6, *7 (E.D. Pa. July 24, 2012) ("In the instant case, Plaintiff contends that the City maintained a policy, practice or custom that failed to account for additional or different training, supervision, investigation, or discipline that related to: (a) Legal cause to stop, detain, and/or arrest a citizen; (b) police officers' duties and responsibilities to engage in proper investigative techniques; (c) proper police procedure for interviewing juvenile witnesses to a crime; (d) police officers' duties not to coerce witnesses into identifying a suspect; (e) police officers' constitutional duties to disclose to the prosecution exculpatory information; (f) the failure to identify and take remedial or disciplinary action against police officers who were the subject of prior civilian or internal complaints of misconduct; (g) the hiring and retention of officers who are unqualified for their employment position; and (h) the failure to properly sanction or discipline officers who are aware of and conceal and/or aid and abet violations of constitutional rights of citizens by other Philadelphia police officers. . . Defendant contends that these allegations are nothing more than 'threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action,' and that Plaintiff 'appears to take a scattershot approach by launching a barrage of legal conclusions at the wall to see which ones will stick.'. . More specifically, Defendant avers that Ford's Monell claim must be dismissed because he has not identified a precise policy, practice, or custom which demonstrates that the City was deliberately indifferent to his constitutional rights. . .The Court disagrees. In order for Ford to prevail on his municipal liability claim, he needs to show that the City was deliberately indifferent 'to the rights of people with whom the police c[a]me into contact.'. . To properly do so, Ford must establish that the City had a pattern of engaging in constitutional violations such as those present in this case, and that this pattern lead to his eventual constitutional injuries. . . Ford cannot, however, prove such a pattern without a sufficient period of discovery to adduce this evidence. . . As such, Plaintiff's claim that the City maintained a policy that failed to properly train, supervise, investigate, or discipline its officers is still too premature for the Court to dismiss from suit at this time. Accordingly, Defendant's request for dismissal on these grounds is denied.")

Zenquis v. City of Philadelphia, 861 F.Supp.2d 522, 531, 532 (E.D. Pa. 2012) ("The City argues that the amended complaint contains only 'a formulaic recitation of the elements of a failure to train argument' and otherwise 'does not allege a pattern or practice of The City of Philadelphia to violate the rights of its citizens by acts of "vigilante justice."'. . .As pleaded, this is not a situation in which there was a single exceptional incident of constitutional misconduct. . . After the mistaken public dissemination of Zenquis's name and photograph as a suspect in the rape, the police are alleged to have adopted the same tactic to apprehend Carrasquillo— i.e., instructing private citizens to detain the suspect and to use force to do so, with the understanding that force could be used 'with impunity.' At the least, the two alleged incidents of vigilante behavior instigated by the police (together with the other allegations catalogued above) are sufficient to place the City on notice of the factual basis for the claim of municipal liability.")

Washington v. City of Philadelphia, No. 11–3275, 2012 WL 85480, at *7 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 11, 2012) ("Though Leatherman v. Tarrant County. . . makes plain that § 1983 claims are not subject to a heightened pleading standard, Iqbal's unambiguous extension of Twombly to 'all civil actions' leaves the ordinary notice pleading requirement intact for those claims. . . .Under this standard, a pleading may not simply offer 'labels and conclusions'. . . and '[t]hreadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice.'. . . Plaintiff's municipal liability claims fail Rule 8's notice pleading requirement under Iqbal and Twombly. Plaintiff's allegations are conclusory for they 'express[ ] ... factual inference[s] without stating the underlying facts on which the inference[s][are] based.'. . Aside from the single incident of alleged police misconduct, the complaint pleads no other facts necessary to establish a municipal liability claim.")

Halterman v. Tullytown Borough, No. 10-7166, 2011 WL 2411020, at *8, *9 (E.D. Pa. June 14, 2011) ("All of Halterman's allegations as to Tullytown policy are conclusory. Halterman's claims as to Tullytown's failure to train or supervise its employees include no factual details as to Tullytown's training programs, the history of cognate violations allegedly committed by its employees, or Tullytown's supposed failure to respond to these violations with discipline. Halterman thus fails to provide 'enough facts to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of the necessary element.'. . Instead, it appears that Halterman has merely imagined what types of training deficiencies or failures to discipline might support municipal liability in the present case and then asserted that these deficiencies and failures indeed exist. She thus on the complaint as drafted fails to state a cause of action against Tullytown as a municipality for violation of § 1983.")

Mitchell v. Township of Pemberton, No. 09-810 (NLH)("MD), 2010 WL 2540466, at *6 (D.N.J. June 17, 2010) ("The Supreme Court's and, accordingly, the Third Circuit's recent clarification of the standard for reviewing a complaint to determine whether a valid claim has been advanced instructs that a plaintiff, such as Plaintiff in this case, cannot merely claim that a racial profiling policy or custom caused a constitutional violation, without a single fact, aside from the Plaintiff's particular incident, to support such a claim. This rule prevents a defendant from being subjected to a plaintiff's fishing expedition through discovery in the hope that facts will be unearthed to support plaintiff's speculation. . . . Despite this, the Court recognizes that Plaintiff's racial profiling claim against the mayor, the police chief and the town may not be foreclosed to him in the future, for two reasons. First, pro se complaints, 'however inartfully pleaded, must be held to less stringent standards than formal pleadings drafted by lawyers[.]'. . . Second, information concerning a town's customs or policies, the policymakers' motivations behind such policies, or the facts surrounding police department customs, are typically unavailable to an outsider, so that pleading facts to sufficiently advance a racial profiling claim may be impossible without some assistance through litigation tools such as request for admissions, interrogatories, document requests, and depositions. With these two considerations in mind, the Court will not grant Plaintiff leave to amend his complaint with regard to his claims against the mayor, police chief and town, as it does not appear that during the time since Plaintiff filing his original complaint, he has gathered the requisite factual basis to support his racial profiling claim. The Court notes, however, that Plaintiff's case remains pending, and discovery has commenced, as to Plaintiff's constitutional violation claims against the two officers invovled in the February 2007 stop. Should Plaintiff, by developing his case against the officers, discover facts to support that the officers were acting pursuant to a racial profiling policy or custom promulgated by the mayor or the police chief, the Court will entertain a motion for leave to amend the complaint at that time. . . As it stands now, Plaintiff's claims are too specious to go forward.")

Lease v. Fishel, No. 1:07-CV-0003, 2010 WL 1390607, at *6 (M.D. Pa.Mar.31, 2010) ("Defendants argue that Lease has made only conclusory allegations in the amended complaint that are insufficient to state a valid cause of action against Hamilton Township. . . The Court must agree. Lease alleges in the amended complaint that Hamilton Township failed to properly train and supervise its employees 'by acquiescing to Beard, Balutis, and Fishel retaliating against the Plaintiff for seeking a redress of his grievances.' . . He further alleges that though Hamilton Township has been properly notified about Beard, Balutis, and Fishel's retaliatory actions, no action has been taken to prevent continued retaliation. . . Even considering these allegations and the entire amended complaint in a light most favorable to Lease, the allegations are not sufficient to sustain the claim against Hamilton Township. The Court is not satisfied that the amended complaint contains 'sufficient factual matter' to show that this claim is facially plausible. These allegations are more in the form of bare-bones legal conclusions that are not sufficient in light of the newly articulated pleading standard in Twombly and Iqbal. For instance, there is no allegation and no inference to be drawn from the allegations that specific training was needed or that the absence of specific training was the moving force behind Lease's First Amendment injuries. Accordingly, the Court will dismiss this claim. Lease will have an opportunity to cure these deficiencies in complying with this Court's order granting Defendants' motion for a more definite statement, discussed below. See Alston v. Parker, 363 F.3d 229, 235 (3d Cir.2004) (court must generally sua sponte extend leave to amend dismissed civil rights claims).").

Griffin v. Township of Clark, No. 09-4853 (JLL), 2010 WL 339031, at *8 (D.N.J. Jan. 22, 2010) ("A history of a policy or custom is not always necessary to state a Monell claim . . . . Officer Griffin has alleged that Chief Connell is a policy-maker − he is the Chief of Police for the Township. Additionally, this Court found above that Officer Griffin has adequately plead, for purposes of a motion to dismiss, that Chief Connell violated his First Amendment rights. Thus, the Court also will allow Officer Griffin's Monell claim against the Township based on a theory of policy-maker liability to proceed at this time. Defendants' motion to dismiss this claim is denied. . . . . With respect to [the failure to train] claim, Officer Griffin simply alleges in his Complaint

'Pursuant to official policy or custom and practice, [the] Township of Clark intentionally, knowingly, or with deliberate indifference to the rights of the Plaintiffs failed to train, instruct, supervise, control and/or discipline ... Defendant Chief Connell and other officials, known and unknown, in the performance of their duties.' (Compl. & 29.) This bare allegation lacks the requisite specificity required by Iqbal to survive a motion to dismiss. Officer Griffin's Monell claim based on this theory is dismissed without prejudice.").

Swift v. McKeesport Housing Authority Action, No. 08-275, 2009 WL 3856304, at *9 (W.D. Pa. Nov. 17, 2009) ("In the instant case, plaintiff in a conclusory fashion alleges that MHA is liable under § 1983 because MHA has a policy or custom that led to the deprivation of plaintiff's rights afforded by the Fourteenth Amendment and the USHA and recites a number of circumstances, which he asserts violated his rights under the Constitution and Section 8. To support his claim, plaintiff alleged that a MHA employee and the employee's relative expressed to plaintiff adverse and inflammatory remarks about plaintiff's faith and disabilities, made repeated false statements to authorities about plaintiff, and sent plaintiff a letter through an attorney expressing a desire to sue plaintiff. Plaintiff alleged that MHA's policies and practices deprived him of property rights available to him under Section 8 voucher program. Plaintiff alleged that he was not permitted the proper or the same amount of time allowed to other Section 8 voucher participants of different religions or who lack a disability and that his Section 8 benefits were terminated without providing him a fair and proper informal hearing, before determining the outcome of plaintiff's grievance proceedings. Plaintiff's allegations, however, are mere conclusions that policies or practices exist. Conclusory allegations are not entitled to assumption of truth. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555. Liberally construing the alleged facts, the court would have to speculate whether these specific circumstances were a single instance or part of an official policy or custom. Plaintiff failed to implicate one of the three ways the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit identified as necessary to show municipal liability for the actions of the municipality's employees. First, plaintiff did not identify a policy or procedure long accepted by defendant, i .e., plaintiff did not set forth factual allegations concerning any similar incidents that have occurred in the past to prove some pattern of conduct or identify a specific municipal ordinance or regulation that could establish a custom or policy. Second, plaintiff did not set forth factual allegations concerning the identity of the MHA employee who made the decision to terminate plaintiff's Section 8 voucher or concerning the policy making authority of the employee who was ultimately responsible for the decision to terminate plaintiff's voucher. Whether one has the authority to formulate official municipal policy is a matter of state law. . .Third, plaintiff did not set forth any factual allegations that show an official with authority ratified the alleged violations. Therefore, the court cannot conclude that the complaint raises a plausible claim that municipal liability can attach to MHA. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1950. Because plaintiff did not sufficiently state a claim under § 1983 for municipal liability, the court will grant defendant's Motion to dismiss plaintiff's § 1983 claims without prejudice. Plaintiff may file an amended complaint within thirty days; provided, that plaintiff is able to set forth a sufficient factual basis to support a plausible claim for municipal liability.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Owens v. Baltimore City State's Attorneys Office, 767 F.3d 379, 403, 404 (4th Cir. 2014) ("Although prevailing on the merits of a Monell claim is difficult, simply alleging such a claim is, by definition, easier. For to survive a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6), a complaint need only allege facts which, if true, '"state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face."'. . The recitation of facts need not be particularly detailed, and the chance of success need not be particularly high. . . A plaintiff fails to state a claim only when he offers 'labels and conclusions' or formulaically recites the elements of his § 1983 cause of action. . .In support of his claim, Owens alleges that '[r]eported and unreported cases from the period of time before and during the events complained of" establish that the BCPD had a custom, policy, or practice of knowingly and repeatedly suppressing exculpatory evidence in criminal prosecutions. He further alleges that 'a number of motions were filed and granted during this time period that demonstrate that [the BCPD] maintained a custom, policy, or practice to allow this type of behavior either directly or ... by condoning it, and/or knowingly turning a blind eye to it.' The assertions as to 'reported and unreported cases' and numerous 'successful motions' are factual allegations, the veracity of which could plausibly support a Monell claim. That BCPD officers withheld information on multiple occasions could establish a 'persistent and widespread' pattern of practice, the hallmark of an impermissible custom. . . If (but only if) the duration and frequency of this conduct was widespread and recurrent, the BCPD's failure to address it could qualify as 'deliberate indifference.'. . Urging a different result, the BCPD contends that Owens alleges nothing more than 'unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation[s].'. . We recognize, of course, that courts have dismissed Monell claims when the plaintiff has alleged nothing more than a municipality's adherence to an impermissible custom. But Owens has done more than that: Owens has alleged facts—the existence of 'reported and unreported cases' and numerous 'successful motions'—which, if true, would buttress his legal conclusion. Owens's brief, but non-conclusory, allegations closely resemble those in Haley v. City of Boston, 657 F.3d 39 (1st Cir.2011). There, a defendant was convicted of murder when two Boston police officers suppressed a witness's statement casting doubt on his guilt. . . The defendant discovered this Brady material, and after thirty-four years in prison, obtained his release; he then sued the Boston Police Department under § 1983. The First Circuit reversed the district court's dismissal of the claim, holding that the defendant had stated a plausible Monell claim against the Boston Police Department in view of the 'wholly unexplained' nature of its officers' suppression of evidence and the alleged (but not identified in the opinion or record) 'volume of cases' involving similar violations in the Boston Police Department. . . The Haley court concluded that this 'volume' of other cases documenting officers' suppression of evidence lent credence to the claim that policymakers 'encouraged, or at least tolerated' an impermissible practice. . . Accordingly, '[a]lthough [the complaint was] couched in general terms,' the court concluded that the complaint nonetheless 'contain[ed] sufficient factual content to survive a motion to dismiss.'. . The same reasoning applies here. Of course, to prevail on the merits, Owens will have to do more than allege a pervasive practice of BCPD misconduct; he must prove it. But at this early stage in the proceedings, we must conclude that Owens has pled sufficient factual content to survive Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal.")

Fordham v. Doe, No. 4:11-CV-32-D, 2011 WL 5024352, at *6 (E.D.N.C. Oct. 20, 2011) ("Assuming without deciding that the 21 sustained complaints imparted constructive notice on city policymakers of improper taser use, Fordham has failed to show that knowledge of these 21 sustained complaints gives rise to a 'specific intent or deliberate indifference ... to correct or terminate' the officers' improper behavior. . . Although Fordham claims that the city did not respond to these complaints, he provides no factual basis for this assertion. . . Rather, he merely asserts that the city, as a matter of policy, fails to inform complaining citizens of corrective action taken against officers found to have used their tasers improperly. However, the failure to inform citizens of corrective action does not necessarily suggest that such corrective action was not taken or suggest that any improper taser use equates to an excessive use of force. In short, Fordham has failed to plausibly allege that the city policymakers failed to respond to complaints of excessive force arising from improper taser use, much less that any failure met the scienter standard required by Randall and Carter. Without providing plausible allegations that support deliberate indifference on the part of the city policymakers, Fordham cannot show that any indifference caused his injuries.")

Jackson v. Brickey, No. 1:10CV00060, 2011 WL 652735, at *9 (W.D. Va. Feb. 11, 2011) ("Jackson's current allegations are limited to mere conclusory statements regarding the police department's failure to train, and thus these statements amount to the 'naked assertion[s] devoid of further factual enhancement' that I must disregard for pleading purposes. . . As above, Jackson's references to generalized deficiencies within the department do not sufficiently flesh out his allegations. . . Once again, I am not applying a heightened pleading standard to Jackson's claims, but rather requiring Jackson to provide some basis for determining that his allegations are plausible.")

Harden v. Montgomery County, No. 8:09-CV-03166-AW, 2010 WL 3938326, at *3 (D. Md. Oct. 6, 2010) ("Even though the Court assumes the veracity of the allegations against the individual officers and grants the Plaintiff all reasonable inferences from those allegations, the Complaint does not 'plausibly establish' the inference that a policy or custom of the County is responsible for the actions of the individual Defendants. . . . Plaintiff counters that section 1983 claims are not subject to a 'heightened pleading standard[]'. . . . However, the Court is simply applying the generally-applicable pleading standard of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a), as interpreted by the Supreme Court in Iqbal and Twombly; the Court is not fashioning a special form of heightened pleading for section 1983 claims. Thus, Leatherman and Jordan are inapplicable, and the Plaintiff's section 1983 claims against the County must be dismissed.")

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Ford v. Anderson County, Texas, 102 F.4th 292, 320 (5th Cir. 2024) ("Plaintiffs' proposed third amended complaint properly pleads a municipal liability claim against Anderson County for its alleged policy of requesting PR bonds for detainees requiring hospitalization. The district court abused its discretion in deciding that Plaintiffs' evidence of the PR bond policy was so inadequate that it would be futile for Plaintiffs to amend their complaint. Jail Captain Choate admitted that Anderson County Jail seeks PR bonds '[a]nytime that [jail staff] believe someone is going to go to the hospital.' Furthermore, Choate admitted that this practice was carried out due to jail staffing concerns, and Nurse Green allegedly admitted that his ability to send detainees to the hospital was curtailed by Sheriff Taylor. Sheriff Taylor also admitted to participating in the process of coordinating a PR bond for Newsome. Because Plaintiffs have presented evidence that this policy existed, that Sheriff Taylor seemingly knew of the policy, and that the delay caused by the policy contributed to Newsome's death, Plaintiffs' attempt to state a municipal liability claim against Anderson County should not have been considered futile. Furthermore, Plaintiffs' proposed third amended complaint states that the PR bond policy applied 'anytime an inmate/detainee was experiencing a serious medical need,' including 'emergency situations such as Rhonda Newsome's.' Plaintiffs have not pleaded a pattern of prior constitutional violations, as is typically required to establish that a municipal policy was implemented with deliberate indifference. However, given our prior cases indicating that a delay in medical care to a critically ill detainee can constitute deliberate indifference, . . . we find that a constitutional violation would be a 'highly predictable' consequence of a policy that purposefully delays emergency care to detainees requiring hospitalization. We note that at this stage in the litigation, we decline to determine whether Plaintiffs' evidence of the alleged PR bond policy is sufficient to overcome a motion for summary judgment. For Plaintiffs to establish that this policy was implemented with deliberate indifference and prevail on their municipal liability claim based on a single incident, they will have to show that the PR bond policy indeed was a blanket practice that applied even to emergency situations. Alternatively, they could establish deliberate indifference by showing a pattern of prior constitutional violations. At this juncture, however, Plaintiffs simply need to plead allegations that are sufficient to survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. . . They have done so. Because Plaintiffs have presented evidence indicating that their allegations related to the PR bond policy are not the products of pure speculation, we find that the district court abused its discretion in denying Plaintiffs the opportunity to properly plead these allegations against Anderson County.")

Ratliff v. Aransas Count., Texas, 948 F.3d 281, 284-85 (5th Cir. 2020) ("[W]e note that the ordinary Twombly pleading standard applies. It is, of course, true that Leatherman, a pre-Twombly case, held that courts must not apply a 'heightened' pleading standard to Monell claims. . . Although Ratliff argues otherwise, however, Leatherman did not require courts to accept 'generic or boilerplate' pleadings in this case or in any other context. Indeed, our precedents make clear that the Twombly standard applies to municipal liability claims. . . 'To survive a motion to dismiss, Ratliff's Monell pleadings 'must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'")

Prince v. Curry, 423 F. App'x 447, 451-52 (5th Cir. 2011) ("[W]e conclude on this de novo review that even when taking this factual content into consideration, Prince still fails to state a claim for relief against Tarrant County that is plausible on its face. The facts discussed in Prince's motion to supplement relate to one other case involving a sex offender whose sentence was found to have been mistakenly enhanced by Tarrant County officials, as well as the trial court and defense counsel, under circumstances similar those of Prince's case. . . . The existence of only one or, at most, two other similarly situated defendants does not plausibly suggest that Tarrant County has a policy or custom of unconstitutionally subjecting sex offenders to enhanced sentences that is 'so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law.' . .Nor does the existence of one or two prior incidents indicate that Tarrant County was deliberately indifferent to defendants' rights or had a pattern of failing to train personnel to comply with the relevant sex offender classification system. . . Prince's factual allegations are simply not enough to meet the 'stringent standard of fault' for establishing a municipality's deliberate indifference, which requires showing that 'a municipal actor disregarded a known or obvious consequence of his action.'. . Furthermore, Prince's claim clearly does not fall into what the Court recently described as the extremely narrow category of claims where 'the unconstitutional consequences of failing to train could be so patently obvious that a city [or other local government] could be liable under § 1983 without proof of a pre-existing pattern of violations.'. . Accordingly, we hold that accepting Prince's factual allegations as true, Prince's complaint does not contain enough factual matter to state a plausible claim for relief against Tarrant County.")

Delacruz v. City of Port Arthur, No. 1:18-CV-11, 2019 WL 1211843, at *14-15 (E.D. Tex. Mar. 14, 2019) ("Plaintiffs allege that the City did not provide officers de-escalation and crisis intervention techniques training ("CIT training") for interacting with persons with mental impairments. They allege that a 2005 Texas state law requiring officers to undergo such training put the City's policymakers on notice that the City's training policy was insufficient. Plaintiffs contend that the City's deliberate indifference to providing officers this state-mandated training caused the defendant officers to resort to unreasonable and excessive force by treating Manuel as a criminal resisting arrest rather than as a person with mental impairments, which was a violation of Manuel's constitutional rights. The City argues that the Complaint is conclusory and fails to establish causation and deliberate indifference. It maintains that Plaintiffs have not identified any policymaker who knew the alleged lack of training would cause, or had caused, any previous constitutional violations. The City argues that the Texas statute requiring such training places that burden on the Texas Commission on Law Enforcement ("TCOLE"), not the City, and that even if a statutory violation were found, that does not equate to a constitutional violation. Further, the City points out that Plaintiffs concede that two of the City's officers have the training, which indicates that the City has conducted such training. . . . [Plaintiffs] allege that the named Officers did not receive the state-mandated training and that only two of the City's officers have received such training. These facts are sufficient, particularly under the 12(b)(6) standard, to infer that the City failed to train the involved officers adequately. . . The City argues that Plaintiffs do not identify a policymaker or an established policy not to train officers in techniques related to interactions with mentally disabled persons. At the 12(b)(6) stage, however, 'the specific identity of the policymaker is a legal question that need not be pled; the complaint need only allege facts that show an official policy, promulgated or ratified by the policymaker, under which the municipality is said to be liable.'. .Similarly, Plaintiffs' allegation that only two of the City's police officers had received the state-mandated CIT training suggests that inadequate training existed within the ranks of the police department. The City also argues that because these two officers received the training, it shows that the municipality did, in fact, offer the training. Conversely, the same evidence suggests that the City knew this training was required, but still failed to comply with the mandate throughout the force. If anything, it underscores the inadequate training of the City's police force. The City also argues that its failure to comply with state law does not equate to a constitutional violation. While this is accurate, it similarly misses the point: the constitutional violation at issue is the alleged excessive force purportedly exerted by the Officers, not the failure to comply with state law. This lack of compliance, however, could support a 'failure to train' finding. . . Plaintiffs do not seek to hold the City accountable for non-compliance with Texas law, but rather to hold it responsible for a constitutional violation allegedly stemming from the lack of adequate training.")

Delacruz v. City of Port Arthur, No. 1:18-CV-11, 2019 WL 1211843, at *17-18 (E.D. Tex. Mar. 14, 2019) ("Plaintiffs do not cite to any officially adopted or promulgated policy, or to any pattern or sequence of events, that could allow the court to infer that the City has a policy or custom of dispatching improperly trained officers to mental health calls. While the limited number of CIT-trained officers could plant the seed of an inference that the City likely does not dispatch these officers to every CIT-related call, the complaint lacks any 'factual enhancements' that would permit the court draw such an inference. Rather, this allegation relies solely on the incident that gave rise to Manuel's demise, which is insufficient to plead a practice 'so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law.'. . Because Plaintiffs' claim lacks particularity that would raise the claim above the speculative level, the court cannot conclude that Plaintiffs have sufficiently stated a claim against the City for instituting a policy to dispatch only non-CIT trained officers, or alternatively, for failure to institute a policy to dispatch CIT-trained officers to situations where their expertise is needed. Plaintiffs have also, at times, framed this claim as a failure to train dispatchers about when to dispatch CIT-trained officers. Any such claim is similarly devoid of adequate facts to survive the City's motion to dismiss.")

Arevalo v. City of Farmers Branch, Texas (Arevalo II), No. 3:16-CV-1540-D, 2017 WL 5569841, at *6-7 (N.D. Tex. Nov. 20, 2017) ("Arevalo's conclusory assertions are insufficient to enable the court to reasonably infer that Chief Fuller is a final policymaker. As the court notes above, decisionmaking authority and policymaking authority are distinct concepts under Monell. Policymakers possess not only the discretion to direct specific actions, but also the 'final authority to establish municipal policy' with respect to those actions. . . And that authority is delegated by the city through either express delegations—such as state or local law—or implied customs and behavior. Here, however, Arevalo has failed to allege any state or local law or evidence of custom that would enable the court to reasonably infer that the Farmers Branch chief of police possesses final policymaking authority. She instead relies solely on the repeated, conclusory assertions that Chief Fuller is a 'final policymaker.' These threadbare recitations of a Monell element are insufficient to plausibly plead that Chief Filler is a final policymaker. . . This is because the policymaking authority of chiefs of police within their own department is not something that can be inferred from their title alone. Courts that have determined that chiefs of police are final policymakers have done so because the particular governmental body has provided the chief of police with policymaking authority. . . Other government entities, such as the City of Dallas, do not delegate final policymaking authority to their chief of police. . . Thus without any additional well-pleaded facts regarding a particular police chief's policymaking authority, the court cannot reasonably infer that the chief of police is a de facto final policymaker. . . . For the foregoing reasons, the court concludes that Arevalo has failed to plausibly plead that Chief Fuller was a final policymaker for Farmers Branch. Absent final policymaking authority, neither his decision not to train Officer Johnson nor his decision to hire him can qualify as official city policy. And absent any other basis to hold Farmers Branch liable to Arevalo under § 1983, the court holds that Arevalo's second amended complaint fails to state a claim for municipal liability against Farmers Branch.")

Sanders v. Vincent, No. 3:15-CV-2782-D, 2016 WL 5122115, at *4 (N.D. Tex. Sept. 21, 2016) ("These conclusory allegations are insufficient to support a reasonable inference that there existed an official city policy or custom that led to the violation of Sanders' constitutional rights. First, Officer Bagley's alleged statement that '[r]ight now what you are doing is violating a policy that you should not be doing this okay,'. . . is insufficient to plausibly allege that the Town of Addison actually had a policy against videotaping police activities. Second, even assuming that all of the facts alleged in the amended complaint are true, Sanders has alleged only that a single episode occurred in which Officer Bagley, Officer Jones, and Lt. Vincent violated his constitutional rights. . . Sanders does not allege that there was any prior instance in which an Addison police officer prohibited the videotaping of police activities, interfered with individual citizens' exercise of their First Amendment rights, or arrested individuals 'merely for failing to provide...identification.'. . The court is therefore unable to draw the reasonable inference that there was a widespread practice that was so common and well-settled as to constitute a custom that fairly represented municipal policy. Nor does he allege any facts that enable the court to draw the reasonable inference that Addison police officers received insufficient training. 'A mere allegation that a custom or policy exists, without any factual assertions to support such a claim, is no more than a formulaic recitation of the elements of a § 1983 claim and is insufficient to state a claim for relief.'. . Without factual allegations that are sufficient to support a reasonable inference that such official policies or customs exist, Sanders' amended complaint fails to state a plausible § 1983 claim against the Town of Addison, and defendants' motion to dismiss must be granted.")

Schaefer v. Whitted, 121 F. Supp. 3d 701, 718-20 (W.D. Tex. 2015) ("Defendants attack the factual sufficiency of Plaintiff's municipal liability pleadings, arguing they amount to a 'bare-bones' recitation of elements of a Monell claim. . . In Leatherman, . . .the Supreme Court rejected the Fifth Circuit's application of the heightened pleading standard to § 1983 claims against municipalities, reaffirming 'all the Rules require is a "short and plaint statement of the claim" that will give the defendant fair notice of what the plaintiff's claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.'. . Leatherman predates the 'plausibility' requirement of Twombly . . . and Iqbal . . . . It remains unresolved how and to what extent the directives of Twombly and Iqbal alter the Leatherman pleading standards for municipal liability claims. However, the Court agrees, for now, the standards can be reconciled in the manner articulated in Thomas v. City of Galveston, 800 F.Supp.2d 826, 842–45 (S.D.Tex.2011). To state a claim, the complaint must contain 'more than boilerplate allegations' but need not contain 'specific facts that prove the existence of a policy.'. . .The Court finds Plaintiff's allegations concerning the City's policy or custom are inadequate to state a claim for relief. Plaintiff's allegations are simply a reformulation of the elements of a claim for municipal liability based on an unconstitutional custom or practice devoid of any factual enhancement or support. . . To survive a motion to dismiss, Plaintiff must allege the existence of a sufficient number of similar prior violations rather than isolated instances. . . Without specifically identifying policies promulgated by City policymakers, and without providing specific examples of persistent and widespread abuse, Plaintiff fails to provide the City with fair notice of the grounds for its claim. . . These allegations are no more than 'generic, boilerplate recitations of the elements of claims against a municipality for an unconstitutional custom or practice' and thus do not raise a plausible claim City police adopted unconstitutional customs or practices. . . . In contrast, Plaintiff's failure to train or supervise claims pass muster. Plaintiff alleges the City failed adequately train or supervisors its officers concerning: (a) the use of deadly force; (b) interactions with individuals legally entitled to possess and carry weapons; and (c) citizens' Second Amendment right to possess weapons for self-defense in their homes. . . To substantiate these claims, Plaintiff alleges the City does not 'properly train officers on how to interact with [lawfully armed citizens], or educate them on the laws concerning the lawful possession of weapons and the rights of citizens to lawfully possess weapons' nor does it 'train officers about the legal distinction between possessing weapons in one's home versus public areas.'. . Plaintiff also alleges the City 'trains its officers it is always permissible to shoot a person with a weapon, even when the officer has been given a warning and the arrested citizen is non-threatening'. . . Plaintiff alleges the City knew the 'obvious consequences of these policies was that City of Austin Police officers would be placed in recurring situations' similar to those faced by Officer Whitted, 'these policies made it highly predictable that the particular violations alleged here ... would result,' and yet with deliberate indifference to Schaefer's rights, failed to train its officers in these areas. . . While Plaintiff fails to allege sufficient instances of similar past conduct by City police tending to substantiate the claim they were subjectively aware of the risk of failing to train its police force, . . . the Court finds, taking Plaintiff's allegations as true, 'the need for more or different training [was] obvious, the inadequacy so likely to result in violations of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the city can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.'. . Indeed, it is highly predictable failing to train officers regarding how to act with individuals legally entitled to carry firearms would result in the constitutional violation alleged here and this failure to train was a moving force behind Schaefer's death. Because these allegations refer to 'the specific topic of the challenged policy or training inadequacy,'. . . they provide the City with adequate notice of the claims against it. Accordingly, Defendants' motion to dismiss is DENIED as to these claims.")

Thomas v. City of Galveston, Texas, 800 F.Supp.2d 826, 841-45 (S.D. Tex. 2011) ("In Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163 (1993), the Supreme Court rejected the Fifth Circuit's application of a heightened pleading standard to Section 1983 claims against municipalities, reaffirming that 'all the Rules require is "short and plain statement of the claim" that will give the defendant fair notice of what the plaintiff's claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.'. . However, Leatherman pre-dates Twombly and Iqbal, and courts have split as to the appropriate pleading requirements for municipal liability following those cases. Some courts have allowed generic or boilerplate assertions of the grounds for holding the municipality liable. [collecting cases] Other courts have treated Twombly and Iqbal as dramatically altering the pleading requirements for municipal liability claims. [collecting cases] The Court believes that Leatherman and Iqbal may be reconciled, without allowing boilerplate allegations, on the one hand, or requiring plaintiffs to plead specific factual details to which they do not have access before discovery, on the other. Iqbal instructed that '[d]etermining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief' is 'a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense.'. . In the context of municipal liability, as opposed to individual officer liability, it is exceedingly rare that a plaintiff will have access to (or personal knowledge of) specific details regarding the existence or absence of internal policies or training procedures prior to discovery. . . Accordingly, only minimal factual allegations should be required at the motion to dismiss stage. Moreover, those allegations need not specifically state what the policy is, as the plaintiff will generally not have access to it, but may be more general. . . Unlike the context presented in Iqbal, where high-ranking government officials were sued in their individual capacities, the concerns of protecting public servants from the 'concerns of litigation, including avoidance of disruptive discovery,' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct at 1953, are not present in suits against municipalities. . . Moreover, municipal liability claims do not occur in a vacuum, but rather arise in the context of a plaintiff's specific allegations of misconduct by individual officials to which he was personally subjected. Still, a plaintiff suing a municipality must provide fair notice to the defendant, and this requires more than genetically restating the elements of municipal liability. Allegations that provide such notice could include, but are not limited to, past incidents of misconduct to others, multiple harms that occurred to the plaintiff himself, misconduct that occurred in the open, the involvement of multiple officials in the misconduct, or the specific topic of the challenged policy or training inadequacy. Those types of details, or any other minimal elaboration a plaintiff can provide, help to 'satisfy the requirement of providing not only "fair notice" of the nature of the claim, but also "grounds" on which the claim rests,'. . . and also to 'permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct.'. . This balance, requiring more than boilerplate allegations but not demanding specific facts that prove the existence of a policy, is in line with the approach of other courts post- Iqbal. Where a plaintiff provides more than a boilerplate recitation of the grounds for municipal liability, and instead makes some additional allegation to put the municipality on fair notice of the grounds for which it is being sued, 'federal courts and litigants must rely on summary judgment and control of discovery to weed out unmeritorious claims sooner rather than later.' Leatherman, 507 U.S. at 168- 69. . . . The Court finds that Plaintiff has provided only generic, boilerplate recitations of the elements of claims against a municipality for an unconstitutional custom or practice, failure to adequately train or supervise, and negligent hiring of officials. Although Plaintiff's allegations are fairly lengthy, they consist only of a list of number of broadly-defined constitutional violations (for example, 'excessive force' and 'unlawful searches and seizures") followed by the assertion that there was a pattern of such violations, that there was a failure to train, or that the violations resulted from improper hiring. This does not provide the city with fair notice of the grounds for which it is being sued, or allow the Court to plausibly infer actionable misconduct by the city. As discussed above, Plaintiff must provide at least minimal factual allegations regarding the city's liability that go beyond generic restatements of the elements of such a claim. Because he has not done so, Defendants' Motion to Dismiss is granted without prejudice with respect to this claim." footnotes omitted)

Mills v. City of Bogalusa, Nos. 12–991, 12–997, 12–1078, 13–5477, 2013 WL 6184984, *8, *9 (E.D. La. Nov. 25, 2013) ("Fifth Circuit cases since Twombly and Iqbal have continued to disapprove of complaints that merely recite failures to train, supervise, or discipline as an element of a municipal liability claim. . . Persuasive authority holds that a plaintiff can transcend bare, conclusory allegations to state a plausible claim for relief by identifying in the complaint, among other things, 'past incidents of misconduct to others, multiple harms that occurred to the plaintiff himself, misconduct that occurred in the open, the involvement of multiple officials in the misconduct, or the specific topic of the challenged policy or training inadequacy.'. .Turning to the present case, plaintiff alleges that Sheriff Crowe failed to train officers in the appropriate use of force against detainees, failed to discipline officers who used unnecessary force, failed to train commanders in the supervision of deputies, and sanctioned the use of solitary confinement and other material deprivations as forms of punishment. . . Contrary to defendants' argument, these allegations concern very narrow, plausible subject areas. That plaintiff's constitutional injuries occurred in the Washington Parish Jail around other inmates and officers or with command authorization is a specific factual allegation that adds to the overall plausibility of his municipal liability claims. . . In light of these allegations and the authority cited above, plaintiff has adequately stated a claim for relief that may proceed to trial if founded on evidence.")

Oporto v. City of El Paso, No. EP-10-CV-110-KC, 2010 WL 3503457, at *5, *6, *8 (W.D. Tex. Sept. 2, 2010) ("Here, Plaintiffs allege thirty-two prior incidents, spanning fifteen years, in which El Paso Police Department officers allegedly made use of excessive deadly force. . . The incidents are described in varying degrees of detail, with some described in a few sentences and some simply listed with a date and police report number. . . . This case, in which thirty-two incidents of excessive deadly force have been alleged, falls within the acceptable range of 'sufficiently numerous prior incidents' needed to allege a pattern at this stage. The Court notes that the procedural posture of this case is distinguishable from much of the case law on establishing a pattern. Discovery has not occurred in this case, whereas many decisions on this subject concern post-discovery motions. . . . The key common element, made sufficiently clear in the pleadings, is the alleged repeated use of excessive deadly force, often with fatal results. Thus, Plaintiffs have alleged a custom or widespread practice in sufficient detail, similar enough in nature to the alleged facts underlying the instant suit, to allow their pleadings to withstand the City's motion to dismiss. . . . Even with the higher pleading standards of Twombly Plaintiffs have alleged sufficient prior incidents to defeat Defendant's motion. . . . Here, where Plaintiffs' allegations are asserted with some level of detail, Plaintiffs should also at least be entitled to discovery. . . .")

Charles v. Galliano, No. 10-811, 2010 WL 3430519, at *6 (E.D. La. Aug. 26, 2010) ("The Supreme Court has expressly prohibited the application of a heightened pleading standard to § 1983 claims against municipalities. . . Instead, a plaintiff need only comply with notice pleading requirements by presenting a 'short and plain statement of the claims showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.'. .Boilerplate allegations of inadequate municipal policies or customs are generally sufficient. See, e.g., Mack v. City of Abilene, 461 F.3d 547, 556 (5th Cir.2006); Ortiz v. Geo Group, Inc., 2008 WL 219564 at *2 (W.D.Tex. Jan. 25, 2008); Jacobs v. Port Neches Police Dept., 1996 WL 363023, *13-15 (E.D.Tex. June, 26, 1996); DeFrancis v. Bush, 839 F.Supp. 13, 14 (E.D.Tex.1993). Plaintiff alleges that after he reported to his supervisor that Galliano had harassed him, 'The City of Kenner, thorough its defendant employees, and through policy, custom, or practice did not take prompt remedial action to protect Charles from further racism, discriminatory acts or threats to his safety.'. .Plaintiff further alleges: The City of Kenner did not adequately or timely address Charles' numerous and documented claims of severe and pervasive harassment, discrimination, and abuse. The City of Kenner and its employees and mayor allowed Charles to be subjected to retaliation at the workplace after he made repeated complaints to supervisory personnel about the hostile work environment in which he was forced to work due to ongoing racially-discriminatory acts. Thus, it was the practice of the City of Kenner and its employees and mayor to ignore complaints of discriminatory behavior. . . Considering the foregoing, the Court finds that plaintiff has alleged a municipal policy or custom sufficient to survive defendants' motion to dismiss.")

Wright v. City of Dallas, Texas, No. 3:09-CV-1923-B, 2010 WL 3290995, at *3, *4 & n.4 (N.D. Tex. July 19, 2010) ("Plaintiff argues that based on Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163 (1993), there is no heightened pleading standard for municipal liability under § 1983. . . In Twombly and Iqbal, the Supreme Court clarified that the pleading requirement for facts rather than conclusions lies within Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a), not any heightened pleading standard. The difference between the Rule 8(a) pleading standard and an impermissible heightened pleading standard is in the factual particularity or specificity needed to state a claim. . . A heightened pleading standard requires that a plaintiff 'allege "specific facts" beyond those necessary to state his claim and the grounds showing entitlement to relief.'. . The Twombly court did not find that 'the allegations in the complaint were insufficiently "particular[ized]"; rather, the complaint warranted dismissal because it failed in toto to render plaintiffs' entitlement to relief plausible.' . Requiring Plaintiff to allege facts sufficient to infer the existence of an official custom or policy does not impose an impermissible heightened pleading requirement. In conclusion, because Plaintiff alleges only one incident to support his inference of an official custom or policy, his factual allegations are insufficient to nudge his claims of municipal liability from conceivable to plausible, and the City's motion to dismiss should be granted. . . . Plaintiff urges the Court to deny the motion to dismiss as premature because he is 'entitled to discovery ... prior to any ruling from this Court.'. . Rule 8 'does not unlock the doors of discovery for a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions.'")

Dwyer v. City of Corinth, Tex., No. 4:09-CV-198, 2009 WL 3856989, at *8, *9 (E.D. Tex. Nov. 19, 2009) ("Plaintiff argues that Defendants' 'failure to train, supervise, test, regulate, discipline or otherwise control its employees and the failure to promulgate and enforce proper guidelines for the use of Tasers constitutes a custom, policy, practice and or procedure in condoning unjustified use of force.' SECOND AMEND. COMP. at 11. Plaintiff argues that 'the Corinth Police Department's Use of Force Policy ... makes clear that the use of the Taser is only permitted to prevent harm to an Officer or some other person.'. . Plaintiff alleges that the 'excessive use of the Taser' is a 'de facto policy' of the City of Corinth. . . Defendants argue that Plaintiff's claims of 'improper training, supervision/discipline, and retention' should be dismissed because the allegations are insufficient to state a claim. . . According to Defendants, Plaintiff does not make allegations of 'deliberate indifference' in regard to his claims. Here, Plaintiff has alleged facts that allow the Court to conclude that he is entitled to relief. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1950 (quoting Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 8(a)(2)). The Supreme Court has expressly prohibited the application of a heightened pleading standard to section 1983 claims against municipalities. Jones v. Bock, 549 U.S. 199, 212-13 (2007) (citing Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U .S. 163, 168 (1993)). Instead, a plaintiff need only comply with notice pleading requirements by presenting a 'short and plain statement of the claims showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.'. . 'Boilerplate' allegations of inadequate municipal policies or customs are generally sufficient. . . Plaintiff has alleged that the policy or custom of Defendants, which includes poor training and discipline of law enforcement officers, played a part in the deprivation of his rights. While the allegations alleged by Plaintiff, standing alone, do not contain the sort of specificity normally required, the allegations are nonetheless sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss at the pleadings stage. . . Plaintiff need not set forth all the details of his case against a municipality under section 1983 at the pleadings stage. Leatherman, 507 U.S. at 168. Based on the Court's 'judicial experience and common sense,' Plaintiff's alleged facts give rise to a plausible entitlement to relief under the FHA. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1950 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555.). Taken as true, Plaintiff's allegations could plausibly entitle Plaintiff to relief under section 1983. Therefore, the Court recommends that Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's section 1983 claims against the City of Corinth for a failure to properly train and discipline officers and for improper retention should be denied.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Linden v. City of Southfield, Michigan, 75 F.4th 597, ___ (6th Cir. 2023) ("While the Second Amended Complaint asserts that the City provided the First Responders with inadequate training, it marshals no facts to support this bare conclusion. For example, the Second Amended Complaint does not contain any factual allegations about the content or extent of training that the First Responders received. The Second Amended Complaint also does not allege other similar incidents that would have put the City on notice of a need for more training. Finally, its factual allegations do not give rise to a plausible inference that the need for training to avoid incidents like what happened to Beauchamp was so 'obvious' that any failure to provide such training would have amounted to deliberate indifference. . . If anything, the fact that numerous laypersons recognized signs that Beauchamp was still alive suggests that the City could reasonably have expected the First Responders not to pronounce Beauchamp dead without special training on the topic. In the same vein, the obvious signs of life Beauchamp displayed also undermine the inference that the First Responders would have acted differently had they received more or different training from the City. . .We therefore affirm the district court's dismissal of Linden's claims against the City on the alternative ground that Linden failed to plead the elements of Monell liability, again without deciding whether the First Responders' conduct violated Beauchamp's constitutional rights.")

Red Zone 12 LLC v. City of Columbus, 758 F. App'x 508, 515-17 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Here, Red Zone claims that the City is responsible for potential constitutional violations because its employee—Pfeiffer—improperly pursued a nuisance abatement suit against it. Though the district court addressed whether a city can be liable under § 1983 when a city prosecutor acts on behalf of the state in enforcing state law, we need not do so because the critical question is whether he acted pursuant to City policy. Thus, Red Zone must identify a City policy or custom that was the moving force behind the violation. We affirm because we conclude that Red Zone did not adequately allege that Pfeiffer acted pursuant to city custom or policy in bringing the nuisance action. Throughout Red Zone's complaint, attached exhibits, and briefs, it contends that the City 'had a custom and policy by which it used the city attorney as its sole investigator and decision maker concerning whether and when to exert pressure on a recalcitrant business/property owner by filing a nuisance action to effectuate its urban redevelopment program.'. . To support the contention that the City has a custom of using the city attorney to file inappropriate nuisance actions on behalf of the state, Red Zone points to two public websites. First, Red Zone notes that the City's website includes a redevelopment plan for the area where Red Zone operated. Red Zone alleges that the City's redevelopment plan indicates that the City has a custom of pursuing unconstitutional nuisance actions. But this argument proves too much. Many cities have redevelopment plans. Without more, the simple existence of a redevelopment plan does not indicate a custom of constitutional violations. Second, Red Zone points to the Columbus city attorney website's description of its 'Zone Initiative Team.' Here, Red Zone quotes the team's description: 'This is a team of attorneys and others assembled from several divisions whose goal it is to use civil nuisance abatement actions to rid the City of dilapidated buildings. The team addresses issues from the neighborhood perspective, and focuses on what is popularly referred to as quality of life issues.'. . Again, even if true, this website fails to support the argument that the City has a custom of using the nuisance abatement system unconstitutionally. Nuisance abatement actions are constitutional. Counterintuitively, Red Zone also argues that the City is liable under § 1983 because '[t]he city's policy of contacting and working with business and property owners to resolve any alleged nuisance was never utilized.'. . But this argument cuts against the heart of a § 1983 claim—that official policy or custom was the 'moving force' behind the constitutional violation. . . If this case was an aberration from normal City policy, as Red Zone contends that it was, then this is precisely the type of claim for which § 1983 was not intended. . . Thus, under the facts that Red Zone has alleged, its allegation that the City has a custom of using nuisance abatement actions in an unconstitutional manner is no more than a 'sheer possibility.'. . It might be true that the City has a custom of pursuing unconstitutional nuisance actions. But Red Zone has not sufficiently pled facts which give its claims facial plausibility. . . Rather, Red Zone conclusively and repeatedly argues that the City's 'use of the civil nuisance action process has unfortunately become a city policy, custom, and/or practice.' . . But without facts supporting that the City has ever filed a similarly inappropriate nuisance action against another business, or that Pfeiffer served as an official municipal policymaker under the circumstances, we cannot find that the City '"cause[d]" one of its employees to violate the plaintiff's constitutional right.'. . We therefore conclude that the district court correctly dismissed the § 1983 claims against the City on the grounds that Red Zone did not adequately allege a municipal custom or policy.")

Osberry v. Slusher, 750 F. App'x 385, ___ (6th Cir. 2018) ("Osberry's complaint also contains a claim that Chief Martin is responsible for the Officers' conduct. To raise such a claim, Osberry 'must demonstrate that the alleged federal violation occurred because of a municipal policy or custom.'. . Osberry can establish an illegal policy or custom by showing one of the following: '(1) the existence of an illegal official policy or legislative enactment; (2) that an official with final decision making authority ratified illegal actions; (3) the existence of a policy of inadequate training or supervision; or (4) the existence of a custom of tolerance or acquiescence of federal rights violations.'. . . The district court analyzed Osberry's claim under the third option, as a 'failure to train' claim. This requires Osberry to plead '(1) a clear and persistent pattern of illegal activity, (2) which the City knew or should have known about, (3) yet remained deliberately indifferent about, and (4) that the City's custom was the cause of the deprivation of her constitutional rights.'. . In other words, Osberry must allege that Chief Martin ignored a 'clear and persistent pattern of misconduct' that should have prompted corrective training for the Officers. . . For this type of Monell claim, the municipal liability arises from the history of misconduct that created 'notice that the training in this particular area was deficient and likely to cause injury.'. . . This is a close call. Osberry alleges that the Officers used the same unlawful tactics here as they used in six specific cases ranging from 2012 to 2017. We do not know the facts or circumstances of these cases, but the district court inferred that these prior instances could establish a pattern of misconduct, so it granted Osberry's request to amend her complaint to add these allegations about prior instances. And the Officers concede that the amended complaint is sufficient. . . . Thus, despite our skepticism, if we accept Osberry's allegations as true, she sufficiently pleaded a failure to train claim. This does not end our inquiry into Osberry's Monell claim. Even though the district court analyzed Osberry's claim as a failure to train claim, the allegations in her amended complaint perhaps fit best within the first option—the classic Monell case that an illegal, official policy existed. Under this theory, a plaintiff must '(1) identify the municipal policy or custom, (2) connect the policy to the municipality, and (3) show that his particular injury was incurred due to execution of that policy.'. . Here, according to Osberry, Chief Martin affirmatively taught the Officers to:
(1) yell out 'stop resisting' and 'stop obstructing' to imply that all defendants whom they are attacking or manhandling are resisting arrest and/or obstructing official business . . . (2) include a resisting arrest charge in any criminal complaint against any citizen who is injured during an arrest or search . . . ; and (3) overwhelm and intimidate suspects, regardless of the level of probable cause, and to over respond to and escalate casual interactions with citizens to allow officers to use excessive and abusive . . . . Looking at these allegations, Osberry's Monell claim seems more about the affirmative policies of Chief Martin—how he taught and instructed the Officers to perform their duties—and less about topics left out of the Officers' training. To be sure, these conclusory allegations, without more, may be insufficient to survive a motion to dismiss. . . . Osberry, however, provides more detailed allegations in her amended complaint—the six cases from 2012 to 2017 where the Officers employed Chief Martin's unlawful tactics. . . This factual allegation nudges Osberry's Monell claim 'across the line from conceivable to plausible.'. . And while this type of a Monell claim is also a close call, it is at least plausible that Chief Martin's affirmative policies caused this pattern of misconduct. In sum, Osberry has sufficiently pleaded a viable Monell claim under either theory. But which theory Osberry ultimately pursues (or which theory can survive summary judgment) may largely depend on discovery and whether any evidence suggests that Chief Martin implemented an illegal, official policy—or alternatively, that Chief Martin ignored a pattern of misconduct that should have prompted corrective training. We need not answer that question now. The district court correctly denied the Officers' motion to dismiss the Monell claim.")

Bailey v. City of Ann Arbor, 860 F.3d 382, 388-89 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Bailey maintains that, in reviewing a motion to dismiss a Monell claim, the plausibility standard of Twombly and Iqbal does not apply. He insists that the 'no set of facts' pleading standard articulated in Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 45–46 (1957), remains good law and applies to this claim. That is wrong. The Supreme Court overruled the Conley standard in Twombly. 550 U.S. 544, 561–62 (2007). That means district courts may not rely on contrary language in Petty v. County of Franklin, 478 F.3d 341, 345 (6th Cir. 2007), which is inconsistent with the Supreme Court's more recent and precedentially superior decisions in Twombly and Iqbal.")

Robertson v. Lucas, 753 F.3d 606, 623 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Appellants do not plead that appellees maintained a policy or custom of refusing to turn over exculpatory or impeachment evidence. Appellants' nebulous assertions of wrongdoing in the form of 'flawed investigations' and 'unconstitutional searches and seizures' do not pertain to the alleged Brady violations; rather, appellants assert constitutional violations in the conduct leading up to but not including the disclosure of exculpatory evidence. Rule 8 requires that a plaintiff's pleadings 'give the defendant fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.'. . Appellants' complaint, which fails to claim that their rights were violated by a policy or custom of refusing to turn over exculpatory or impeachment evidence, cannot be said to have given appellees fair notice of this claim. As this deficiency is manifest from the face of appellants' complaint, we affirm the district court's dismissal of appellants' Monell claims alleging Brady violations against Richland County and the City of Cleveland.")

Howard v. City Of Girard, Ohio, 346 F. App'x 49, 2009 WL 2998216, at *2, *3 (6th Cir. Sept. 21, 2009) ("To prevail on a claim against the city under § 1983, plaintiff must establish both: (1) the deprivation of a constitutional right, and (2) the city's responsibility for that violation. . . Despite the fact that Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2) requires only 'a short and plain statement of the claim' at the complaint stage, we hold that plaintiff's amended complaint falls short of the Twombly threshold. The district court noted correctly that while plaintiff argues '[The City of] Girard was deliberately indifferent to Howard's Aright to due process of law,'' he does not 'identify which particular right Girard violated.' Moreover, the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment does not generally require a municipality to protect an individual from harm by third parties.")

Laning v. Doyle, No. 3:14-CV-24, 2015 WL 710427, at *12 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 18, 2015) ("Plaintiffs' allegations in this case go beyond conclusory allegations of inadequate training or a pattern of unconstitutional behavior. Plaintiffs have specifically alleged that Officer Doyle has been the subject of 'internal complaints and at least one other lawsuit.' Plaintiffs further allege that the City knew about these complaints, and yet failed to take any remedial action. . .In the Court's view, these factual allegations satisfy the requirements of Iqbal and Twombly, and state a plausible claim against the City. Whether Plaintiffs will be able to prevail on this claim, or even survive summary judgment, remains to be seen. However, the Court agrees that, at a minimum, Plaintiffs are entitled to discovery. In Scott v. Giant Eagle, Inc., No. 1:12–cv–3074, 2013 WL 1874853 (N.D. Ohio May 3, 2013), the court noted that 'applying Iqbal too strictly in situations where knowledge of a custom, policy, or practice is unobtainable absent some preliminary discovery could lead to unfair results.'. . This is particularly true when the evidence needed is within the exclusive, or almost exclusive, possession of the opposing party. Accordingly, the Court overrules Defendants' motion to dismiss the § 1983 claim asserted against the City of Huber Heights.")

Minick v. Metro. Gov't of Nashville, 3:12-CV-0524, 2014 WL 3817116, *2, *3 (M.D. Tenn. Aug. 4, 2014) ("Here, Ms. Minick claims that ¶¶ 4.30–4.38 of her Amended Complaint are sufficient to state a claim for municipal liability against Metro Nashville under § 1983. However, the referenced allegations are boilerplate and conclusory and contain no specific factual assertions. In numerous cases, courts (including this one) have found that boilerplate allegations premised on a single incident of alleged police brutality—i.e., the incident that caused the plaintiff's injury—are insufficient to state a municipal liability claim, thereby justifying dismissal under Rule 12(b) (6). . .Here, the Amended Complaint does not identify or describe any of Metro Nashville's policies, procedures, practices, or customs relating to training; it does not identify any particular shortcomings in that training or how those shortcomings caused the alleged violation of Minick's rights; and it does not identify any other previous instances of excessive force or similar violations that would have put Metro Nashville on notice of a problem. . . Accordingly, the court finds that the Amended Complaint does not contain sufficient allegations to state a claim for municipal liability against Metro Nashville. The court recognizes that presenting municipal liability claims is more difficult after Twombly and Iqbal, but the prevailing view within this circuit and within this district is that allegations that essentially amount to notice pleading of a municipal liability claim are insufficient. . . In sum, Ms. Minick's § 1983 claims against Metro Nashville will be dismissed. Because it is conceivable that Ms. Minick could allege sufficient facts to support a § 1983 municipal liability claim, the dismissal will be without prejudice.")

Hamer v. County of Kent, No. 1:13–CV–504, 2014 WL 1276563, *6 (W.D. Mich. Mar. 27, 2014) ("Twombly and Iqbal did not overrule Leatherman. Even after Twombly and Iqbal, a district court would err in imposing a heightened pleading standard on a complaint alleging municipal liability. Rather, the district court must now apply the new pleading standard applicable to all federal cases as a result of Twombly and Iqbal. Under that standard, a plaintiff must allege 'enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'. . In short, although Twombly and Iqbal did not overrule Leatherman, they did overrule Conley v. Gibson by enunciating a new pleading standard applicable to all federal cases.")

A.M.S. v. Steele, No. 1:11–cv–298, 2012 WL 2130971, at *5, *9 (S.D. Ohio June 8, 2012) (R & R) ("With respect to the City of Cincinnati, plaintiffs allege that in response to a gang-related increase in drug and crime activity the City has developed a custom, policy and practice of arresting young black males for little or no reason, or on false or inflated charges, or on no charges at all, in order to empty the streets of suspected or potential criminals. . . Further, plaintiffs allege that although the official policy is that parents of minors are to be notified when a minor is arrested and before they are taken to the Juvenile Detention Center, the actual policy, custom and practice among Cincinnati Police is to routinely detain minors without notifying their parents. . . This actual practice, which is contrary to the official policy, is used to deny minors access to counsel (a likely result of notifying a parent) and interrogate and extract evidence or confessions. . . Further, the City's official policy requires that interviews with suspects be recorded in their entirety, but the actual policy, custom and practice among police detectives is to browbeat, threaten, deceive, and otherwise coerce minors in custody into agreeing to provide confessions off-tape and then record only the false confessions or statements. . . This practice makes it appear that the confessions are voluntary and more credible, when they are not, to obtain more criminal convictions. . . . Regarding the City of Cincinnati, plaintiffs allege that the City, by and through its policymakers (John Doe Defendants 4–10), is liable for plaintiffs' constitutional injuries for the failure to provide adequate training to police officers and detectives and for establishing, permitting or condoning policies, practices or procedures of: 'arrest first, investigate later' and 'the ends justify the means' in policing high-crime neighborhoods such as Northside; coercing confessions 'off-tape' and selectively recording portions of confessions to enhance their credibility and increase conviction rates; not notifying guardians of minors that are held for questioning to avoid the possibility of counsel being obtained for the minors; allowing police officers and detectives to present skewed information and evidence to grand juries to increase indictment rates; and allowing rogue officers like Steele to operate without intervention, thus failing to prevent known or obvious police misconduct. . . Plaintiffs further allege that these policies, practices, and procedures resulted in the violations of plaintiffs' clearly established constitutional rights under the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendments. . . Notably, these allegations are in addition to the extensive factual allegations, recited supra, pertaining to specific acts of defendants Steele and Mathis. . .Plaintiffs have alleged sufficient facts at this juncture showing that the City of Cincinnati's practices and policies are insufficient to protect the rights of minor suspects and have caused the deprivation of plaintiffs' constitutional rights. Accepting plaintiffs' allegations as true and drawing all inferences in a light most favorable to plaintiffs, the undersigned finds that plaintiffs have sufficiently pled a § 1983 Monell claim against the City of Cincinnati. Accordingly, defendants' motion to dismiss plaintiffs' § 1983 claim against the City of Cincinnati should be denied.")

Rucker v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:10 CV 2613, 2011 WL 52486, at *1 (N.D. Ohio Jan. 6, 2011) ("The Court has reviewed Mr. Rucker's Complaint against the City, alongside the standard enunciated in Twombly, and concludes as a matter of law that there are no allegations demonstrating a plausible right of recovery against the City. Mr. Rucker's conclusory allegations against the City fail to meet the pleading standards set forth in Fed.R.Civ.P. 8. Accordingly, the Court will grant the City's motion to dismiss Mr. Rucker's Complaint against it, pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6), for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted.")

Cunningham v. Cleveland Police Dept., No. 1:10-CV-453, 2010 WL 5636778, at *5, *6 (N.D. Ohio Dec. 22, 2010) ("[A]lthough Plaintiff's second cause of action recites the key elements of a § 1983 claim against the City of Cleveland, it does so only in a conclusory manner. The gravamen of Plaintiff's argument is that the City failed to train its officers on proper seizure and forfeiture procedures. But, Plaintiff failed to assert any factual allegations to support its conclusion that the city had a policy of failing to train officers on these issues, or encouraging officers to take actions contrary to its written policy, which Plaintiff acknowledged was lawful. Instead, Plaintiff repeatedly made unsupported blanket assertions that the City's inadequate training, or lack thereof, was accountable for the alleged unlawful behavior by the officers in question. For example, Cunningham states:

To be sure, as we see it, it has to be the fault of the City, and those who supervise them [the officers], if these officers did not know the State of Ohio Legislature provided a statutory remedy for people to get their property back when officers seize it without probable cause − the situation here.

(Doc. 18, p. 12). Such statements are conclusory and are not sufficient to state a plausible claim. As stated by the Supreme Court in Iqbal, conclusory statements are not entitled to be assumed as true. . . When accepting Plaintiff's remaining factual allegations as true, it is possible to infer that Defendant City acted unlawfully, but it is not plausible. For instance, Plaintiff failed to assert facts from which the Court can do more than speculate that the City's training, or lack thereof, caused the alleged harm. Furthermore, the Court cannot find any facts from which to infer that the City acted with deliberate disregard to its citizen's rights. In order to survive a motion to dismiss, Plaintiff's Amended Complaint had to allege facts showing that the City's failure to train amounted to deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the police come into contact. . . In this case, the Plaintiff's filings, consisting of a Complaint, Amended Complaint, Response to Defendant's Motion for a More Definite Statement and Response to Defendant's Motion to Dismiss, do not allege sufficient facts to survive Defendants' motion and proceed to the next stage of the judicial process. Plaintiff made no factual allegations to support that the City acted intentionally to harm persons such as Plaintiff or to show that the City had a long-standing history of unlawful conduct in this area. Although Plaintiff suggests that he will provide convincing proof of the City's unconstitutional policy at trial, that proffer does not negate Plaintiff's duty pursuant to Fed.R.Civ.P. 8 to plead facts plausibly showing that the City acted unlawfully at the pleading stage. There are no facts in the Amended Complaint that reasonably describe a specific policy or custom of the City of Cleveland that violated Cunningham's rights. Accordingly, Plaintiff's conclusory allegations do not suffice to satisfy the pleading standard announced in Iqbal and Twombly.")

Johnson v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County, No. 3:10-0589, 2010 WL 3619790, at *4 (M.D. Tenn. Sept. 13, 2010) ("Plaintiff must produce facts showing a plausible right to relief because Metro was deliberately indifferent to the need to train, supervise or discipline police officers or Metro was deliberately indifferent to improper pursuit policies or customs, and that such inadequacies were likely to result in the violation of a citizen's constitutional rights. . . Plaintiff Sweat's pleading on municipal liability has 'stop[ped] short of the line between possibility and plausibility of entitlement to relief.'. . Thus, the § 1983 claims against Metro must be dismissed for failure to state a claim.")

Modd v. County of Ottawa, No. 1:10-cv-3372010, 2011 WL 5860425, at *7 (W.D. Mich. Aug. 4, 2010) ("Certainly, Leatherman must be read in conjunction with Twombly and Iqbal, such that allegations of municipal policy or custom must be sufficient to raise a 'plausible' inference that officers were acting pursuant to municipal custom or policy. At the pleading stage, however, no more is necessary. Under this standard, the amended complaint is sufficient. Plaintiff alleges that the existence of a policy, pattern, or practice of withholding or denying prescription medication is evidenced by the fact that plaintiff was denied all prescription medication for a seven-day period. . . Plaintiff further alleges that on at least twelve occasions prior to plaintiff's incarceration, incoming inmates at the Ottawa County Jail were denied medications which had previously been prescribed for them. . . These factual allegations, accepted as true, are sufficient to meet plaintiff's rather light burden of alleging a plausible claim of a county custom or policy. Further inquiry into this question must await discovery and summary judgment, or trial.")

Fletcher v. Michigan Dept. of Corrections, No. 09-CV-13904, 2010 WL 2376167, at *6 (E.D. Mich. June 9, 2010) ("Although pre-Twombly, Petty provides guidance in assessing the sufficiency of Plaintiff's complaint. Similar to Petty's allegation that Franklin County had a policy of failing to 'adequately and reasonably train, supervise and discipline officers in such a way to properly protect the constitutional rights of citizens,' Plaintiff alleges that the Oakland County Sheriff's Office had the policy or custom 'to inadequately train or supervise its officers, deputies, nurses and counselors, with respect to the constitutional rights of the inmates.'. . This allegation, however, was the least specific allegation regarding the customs or policies of the Sheriff's Office. Plaintiff goes on to allege six more specific policies relating to the handling of mentally ill inmates, including failure to comply with maintenance orders, as well as inmate abuse and the improper handling of complaints of abuse. Moreover, other courts in the Eastern District of Michigan have found less specific allegations concerning a municipality's customs or policies to be sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss. [collecting cases] Although the court certainly does not find Plaintiff's pleadings to be more than sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss, based on the above-cited case law and applying the Rule 12(b)(6) standard, the court finds Plaintiff's allegations to be minimally sufficient. Defendants' motion to dismiss will therefore be denied as to Sheriff Bouchard in his official capacity.")

Lott v. Swift Transp. Co., Inc., No. 2:09-cv-02287, 2010 WL 937769, at *3 (W.D. Tenn. Mar. 17, 2010) ("[T]he Court disagrees that Plaintiffs' failure to identify in their complaint the particular policy or custom responsible for the alleged deprivation of their rights necessarily mandates dismissal under Rule 12. Although Swift correctly notes that a private corporation can only be held liable under § 1983 when it has a policy or custom that causes a civil rights violation, see Street v. Corrections Corp. of Am., 102 F.3d 810, 818 (6th Cir.1996), complaints under § 1983 are not subject to any heightened pleading standards, Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination, 507 U.S. 163, 167-68 (1993). Instead, a plaintiff's complaint − whether it seeks relief under § 1983 or under any other legal theory − must be plausible and not merely conceivable. See Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1950-51. Identifying the precise policy or custom may help make the complaint's allegations more plausible, but categorically viewing such a failure as dispositive in every case involving § 1983 claims risks imposing a higher standard of pleading than the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure mandate.").

Birgs v. City of Memphis, No. 09-2468, 2010 WL 625401, at *4 (W.D. Tenn. Feb. 18, 2010) ("To state a successful claim under § 1983 for failure to train, the municipality's failure must 'amount [] to deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the police come into contact.'. . A plaintiff must demonstrate that the municipality 'has ignored a history of abuse,' and was on clear notice that its training was deficient to prove that the municipality was deliberately indifferent. . . The easiest way for an individual to meet her burden is to point to past incidents of similar police conduct that authorities ignored. . . Birgs argues that her Complaint meets these criteria. She points to the following excerpt as evidence: 21. Defendant City of Memphis permitted, encouraged, and tolerated an official pattern, practice or custom of its employees' violation of the constitutional rights of the public at large, including the Plaintiff's. 22. Defendant City of Memphis failed to properly train and instruct the individual Defendants in the proper use of force. Defendant City of Memphis acquiesced in the use of excessive force and/or ratified the actions of the Defendant Officers in the use of excessive force. 23. The actions of all Defendants constitute willful misconduct or an entire want of such care or recklessness as to raise a presumption that the actions were done with conscious indifference to the consequences in a willful and wanton manner and that Plaintiff is entitled to have punitive damages assessed against Defendants. . . The allegations are nothing more than 'a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action.'. . Stripped of legal language, Plaintiff's Complaint contains no facts that could plausibly lead one to believe that the City deliberately ignored a history of abuse by officers in the Memphis Police Department. . . The Complaint also fails to allude to any incident of brutality other than the one Birgs allegedly suffered. . . Although intensive fact pleading is not required, a plaintiff has the burden to plead more than conclusory statements. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949. Because Birgs' Complaint fails to allege 'more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully,' the Court GRANTS the City's Motion to Dismiss Birgs' failure-to-train claim.").

Hutchison v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County, 685 F.Supp.2d 747, 751 (M.D. Tenn. 2010) ("In the context of Section 1983 municipal liability, district courts in the Sixth Circuit have interpreted Iqbal's standards strictly. [collecting cases] . . . . Plaintiff's claim regarding Defendant Metropolitan Government's custom, policy or practice of stopping vehicles and ordering passengers to exit the vehicles without sufficient cause and in disregard of passengers' disabilities is just such a conclusion without additional factual assertions of any kind. While Plaintiff details the events of the traffic stop, he does not include any facts related to a municipal policy on probable cause and traffic stops, or a municipal custom, policy or practice regarding drivers or passengers who are disabled. Similarly, beyond the assertion that Defendant Metropolitan Government failed to adequately train its officers in stopping vehicles and/or ordering passengers out of those vehicles in disregard of their disabilities and injuries, Plaintiff gives no additional factual support. Therefore, Plaintiff's pleadings have 'stop[ped] short of the line between possibility and plausibility' regarding municipal liability. The Supreme Court's decisions in Twombly and Iqbal seem to suggest a shift from notice back toward fact pleading. See e.g ., Wright & Miller ' 1216; West Group, Federal Practice & Procedure Supplemental Service ' 1357 (referencing the Notice Pleading Restoration Act of 2009, S. 1504, introduced in the Senate to reinstate pre-Twombly standards for the motion to dismiss); and Jay S. Goodman, Two, New, U.S. Supreme Court Cases Raise the Question: Is Notice Pleading Dead?, 58 Feb R.I. B.J. 5 (2010). This reversal of over fifty years of Federal Rules of Civil Procedure interpretation will likely bring vast consequences in fairness to plaintiffs while doing little to increase fair notice to defendants. See Wright & Miller ' 1216 ("the function of the complaint is to afford fair notice to the adversary of the nature and basis of the claim asserted and a general indication of the type of litigation involved") (quoting Robert Millar, Civil Procedure of the Trial Court in Historical Perspective 190-93 (1952)). Although Plaintiff's Amended Complaint cannot survive the Motion to Dismiss after Iqbal, the Court must note that it is uncomfortable with this pleading standard as now applied, especially in the context of Section 1983 and municipal liability.").

Buster v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:09 CV 1953, 2010 WL 330261, at *8, *9 (N.D. Ohio Jan. 21, 2010) ("The complaint contains no suggestion of a custom or policy of the City of Cleveland which may have resulted in the deprivation of a federally protected right of the plaintiff. Buster states in a generic recitation that the City of Cleveland 'had in effect certain explicit and de facto policies, practices and customs which were applied to the treatment of persons engaged and/or arrested by City of Cleveland Police.'. . He further alleges that the City 'failed to adequately train properly or supervise properly each and all of the individual defendants named (including DOE 1,2, and 3) above.'. . As noted above, a pleading must more than unadorned, 'the defendant unlawfully harmed me' accusations. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, __ U.S. __, __, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009). A pleading that offers only 'labels and conclusions' or 'a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do.'. . Nor does a complaint suffice if it tenders naked assertions devoid of further factual enhancement. . . There are no facts in the Amended Complaint that reasonably describe a specific policy or custom of the City of Cleveland that violated Buster's constitutional rights. Instead, he merely recites the elements of a cause of action to hold the City of Cleveland responsible for the actions of its employees. This is precisely the type of claim that is not actionable in a § 1983 action. Thus, the fifth cause of action is dismissed.").

Williams v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:09 CV 1310, 2009 WL 2151778, at *4 (N.D. Ohio July 16, 2009) ("A municipality can only be held liable under § 1983 if the complaint alleges that Plaintiff's injury directly resulted from the municipality's policies or customs. . . Under the heightened pleading standard articulated by the Supreme Court of the United States in recent decisions, Plaintiff's amended complaint does not sufficiently state a § 1983 claim. . . Plaintiff's amended complaint recites the critical element of a § 1983 claim against a municipality − a policy or custom − but does so in a conclusory manner. Plaintiff makes no factual allegations that can support the conclusion that the City has a policy or custom of ignoring exculpatory evidence and continuing with prosecutions. To merely state that the City has a policy or custom is not enough; Plaintiff must allege facts, which if true, demonstrate the City's policy, such as examples of past situations where law enforcement officials have been instructed to ignore evidence. Here, while Plaintiff has alleged facts sufficient to demonstrate that exculpatory evidence was ignored in his case, he has not alleged facts from which it can be inferred that this conduct is recurring or that what happened in his case was due to City policy. Accordingly, the amended complaint would not state a claim cognizable under federal law. Thus, Plaintiff's motion for leave to amend the complaint is denied as futile and Count V of Plaintiff's complaint against the City is dismissed.").

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Williams v. Dart, 967 F.3d 625, 639 (7th Cir. 2020) ("[T]he Sheriff faults plaintiffs for failing to plead 'the nature or severity of their own pending charges or criminal backgrounds.' We search Rule 8 and cases interpreting it in vain for a requirement that a plaintiff plead the defendant's defenses for him. . .The Sheriff would also have us ignore as 'conclusory,' for example, plaintiffs' allegation that his 'administrative review' policy was based on 'racist assumptions about the likelihood that people from primarily African American neighborhoods pose a public safety risk or are likely to reoffend.' Because we can think of no cause of action that contains as an element proof of racist assumptions about neighborhoods in Chicago, plaintiffs' allegation cannot fairly be characterized as conclusory. . . Finally, leaning heavily on Iqbal, the Sheriff argues there are good reasons to believe his policy was race-neutral in conception and execution. That may or may not be so, but in any event '[l]itigants are entitled to discovery before being put to their proof.'. . Iqbal is not a mandate to weigh a plaintiff's likelihood of ultimate success at the pleading stage. . . Instead it demands 'more than a sheer possibility' of liability. . . Alleging merely that defendants 'approved' a policy of arresting and detaining 'Arab Muslim men' was not enough in that case arising in the immediate wake of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, . . . but there is a good deal more to plaintiffs' complaint here. The district court erred in dismissing plaintiffs' equal protection claims on the pleadings.")

Swanigan v. City of Chicago, 881 F.3d 577, 585-87 (7th Cir. 2018) (Hamilton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I respectfully dissent. . . from the decision to affirm dismissal of Swanigan's challenge to the 'cleared-closed case' policy. He alleges that the Chicago Police Department maintains a file on him that effectively—but falsely—identifies him as the 'Hard Hat Bandit.' This is not a case where the police suspected him of those crimes but were unable to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. There is no doubt here, as my colleagues acknowledge. Swanigan was not the Hard Hat Bandit. In my view, he has standing to raise this claim, and on the merits he should be allowed to proceed past the pleadings. . . .Next, consider how any traffic stop of Swanigan in Chicago is likely to unfold as long as the false information is in his police file. When the police carry out a traffic stop, they are entitled to demand the driver's identification, of course, and it is routine to check the driver's record for active war-rants, driving history, and criminal history. Those checks are done for important reasons, including officer safety. If the files are checked, the officer checking Swanigan may well be told that the police department believes he committed a series of armed robberies. At that point, an officer's normal caution will give way immediately to extreme caution, putting Swanigan at a much higher risk that any movement might be misinterpreted as dangerous. And note that this scenario assumes lawful and reasonable actions by both Swanigan and a police officer. How many cases have we seen in this country of unarmed subjects, especially men of color, being shot and even killed by police based on hair-trigger responses to innocent actions? In my view, these risks for Swanigan—today—are not speculative but substantial. He has alleged, and should be allowed to prove, that he has standing to challenge the 'cleared-closed case' policy as applied to him. On the merits of this claim, Swanigan would face a challenge. Ordinarily a civilian has no cognizable legal interest in what police investigative files say about him. Paul v. Davis, 424 U.S. 693, 697 (1976), held that even a public accusation by the police that a civilian was an 'active shoplifter' did not violate the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. But what Swanigan alleges here is an extreme case with substantial risk of tangible harm not present in that case. And there is virtually nothing to be said here for the integrity of the police files. At this point, after the conviction of the real Hard Hat Bandit, the police refusal to correct the files falsely labelling Swanigan the Hard Hat Bandit is arbitrary and capricious—and dangerous. Constitutional law (not to mention common sense) establishes that the police are entitled to rely on such information in their files, . . . even if it turns out to be mistaken. . . .Based on Swanigan's allegations, it is hard to understand how the false information that is still in his police file is the product of anything other than knowing falsity or deliberate indifference to the truth. Why not allow a civilian who faces substantial risk of harm due to false police information an opportunity to have that information corrected? And on the other side of the scales, what harm would the Chicago police or public suffer if the plainly false information were corrected? Again, that information is not just unproven or contestable—it is false. I cannot think of any harm such a correction would cause the police, and it might well help avoid a tragedy. I would allow Swanigan to pursue this claim on the merits beyond the pleadings so that the courts could address it and its potential ramifications based on real evidence rather than allegations and theoretical arguments.")

White v. City of Chicago, 829 F.3d 837, 843-44 (7th Cir. 2016) ("The Supreme Court held in Leatherman . . . that federal courts may not apply a ' "heightened pleading standard"—more stringent than the usual pleading requirements of Rule 8(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure—in civil rights cases alleging municipal liability under ... 42 U.S.C. § 1983.' The Court emphasized that 'Rule 8(a)(2) requires that a complaint include only a "short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief."'. . The Leatherman holding has survived the Court's later civil pleading decisions in Iqbal and Twombly, which require the pleader to allege a 'plausible' claim. . . White alleged in his amended complaint: 'In accordance with a widespread practice of the police department of the City of Chicago: O'Donnell requested the judge to issue a warrant on the basis of O'Donnell's conclusory allegation that other law enforcement officers claimed or believed plaintiff had committed an offense, and O'Donnell did not present the judge with an affidavit setting out any affirmative allegation of facts that would indicate that plaintiff had committed an offense.' Together with the individual claim against O'Donnell and the standard printed form that does not require specific factual support for an application for an arrest warrant, this allegation was enough to satisfy the 'short and plain statement of the claim' requirement of Rule 8(a)(2). White was not required to identify every other or even one other individual who had been arrested pursuant to a warrant obtained through the complained-of process. . . In the end, however, Officer O'Donnell's sworn testimony about the NAGIS Report provided sufficient evidence to establish probable cause. Probable cause also establishes that White did not suffer a constitutional injury, which is a necessary element of a Monell claim. City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796, 799 (1986). Since White's Monell claim fails on other grounds, the error on the sufficiency of the pleading was harmless.")

McCauley v. City of Chicago, 671 F.3d 611, 616-19 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Though the district court's analysis was faulty, the equal-protection claim against the City was properly dismissed. To state a Monell claim against the City for violation of Mersaides's right to equal protection, McCauley was required to 'plead[ ] factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference' that the City maintained a policy, custom, or practice of intentional discrimination against a class of persons to which Mersaides belonged. . . He did not meet this burden. . . . We have interpreted Twombly and Iqbal to require the plaintiff to 'provid[e] some specific facts' to support the legal claims asserted in the complaint. . . The degree of specificity required is not easily quantified, but 'the plaintiff must give enough details about the subject-matter of the case to present a story that holds together.'. . The required level of factual specificity rises with the complexity of the claim. . . . This case is more like Brooks than Swanson. Many of the alleged 'facts' are actually legal conclusions or elements of the cause of action, which may be disregarded on a motion to dismiss. . . For example, McCauley alleges that the City 'has an unwritten custom, practice and policy to afford lesser protection or none at all to victims of domestic violence' and that '[t]here is no rational basis' for this purported policy. Similarly, McCauley alleged the following:

[The City], through its agents, employees and/or servants, acting under color of law, at the level of official policy, practice, and custom, with deliberate, callous, and conscious indifference to McCauley's constitutional rights, authorized, tolerated, and institutionalized the practices and ratified the illegal conduct herein detailed, and at all times material to this Complaint, [the City] had interrelated de facto policies, practices, and customs.

These are the legal elements of the various claims McCauley has asserted; they are not factual allegations and as such contribute nothing to the plausibility analysis under Twombly/Iqbal.Once the legal conclusions are disregarded, just one paragraph of factual allegations remains: Defendant violated McCauley's constitutional rights under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 by:

a. failing to provide adequate security and promptly arrest Martinez;
b. failing to promulgate any policy to ensure the prompt arrest of individuals guilty of violating protective orders;
c. maintaining a policy or custom of failing to timely arrest violators of protective orders;
d. maintaining a custom and practice of failing to adequately train officers concerning the necessity of promptly arresting individuals guilty of violating protective orders;
e. maintaining a policy or custom of failing to have safeguards in place to ensure that violators of protective orders were timely arrested;
f. failing to have a custom, practice and policy in effect to verify whether someone who is arrested for domestic violence is on parole;
g. failing to have a custom, practice and policy to communicate with state officials and law enforcement officials regarding domestic violence arrests;
h. failing to have a custom, practice and policy in effect in order to communicate with parole agents on domestic violence arrests;
i. failing to have a custom, practice and policy in effect to verify whether an arrestee of a domestic violence offense is on parole prior to issuing an order of protection; and
j. maintaining a custom, practice and policy of ignoring the seriousness of domestic violence arrests.
McCauley maintains that these allegations are sufficient to state a Monell equal-protection claim against the City. We disagree. In order to state a facially plausible equal-protection claim under Monell, the factual allegations in McCauley's complaint must allow us to draw the reasonable inference that the City established a policy or practice of intentionally discriminating against female victims of domestic violence in the provision of police protection. That is, McCauley needed to allege enough 'by way of factual content to "nudg[e]" his claim of purposeful discrimination "across the line from conceivable to plausible."' Because the Equal Protection Clause is 'concerned ... with equal treatment rather than with establishing entitlements to some minimum of government services, [it] does not entitle a person to adequate, or indeed to any, police protection.'. . . 'On the other hand, selective withdrawal of police protection, as when the Southern states during the Reconstruction era refused to give police protection to their black citizens, is the prototypical denial of equal protection.'. . The allegations in the paragraph quoted above do not plausibly suggest that the City maintained a policy or practice of selective withdrawal of police protection. To the contrary, the complaint alleges that the City failed to have particularized practices in place for the special protection of domestic-violence victims. In essence, the complaint alleges that the City failed to promulgate specific policies for this particular class of crime victims, not that the City denied this class of victims equal protection. At most, the factual allegations in the complaint plausibly suggest the uneven allocation of limited police-protection services; they do not plausibly suggest that the City maintained an intentional policy or practice of omitting police protection from female domestic-violence victims as a class. Just as in Brooks, McCauley's factual allegations are entirely consistent with lawful conduct − here a lawful allocation of limited police resources. . . And the complexity of McCauley's equal-protection claim distinguishes this case from Swanson.")

McCauley v. City of Chicago, 671 F.3d 611, 620, 622-25, 627-29 (7th Cir. 2011) (Hamilton, J., dissenting in part) ("I agree with my colleagues that plaintiff has failed to state a claim against defendant Walker. I respectfully dissent from the rejection of plaintiff's equal protection claim against the City of Chicago. I am skeptical about plaintiff's ability to prove the claim, but his complaint should be sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, even under the new and subjective pleading standards announced in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). I explain first my skepticism, then some of the problems raised by Iqbal, and finally why the complaint should survive the motion to dismiss. Mr. McCauley's suit seeks to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection requirements on the decisions of a major city police force about how to allocate its resources. Plaintiff's only viable equal protection theory is that the Chicago police department made a deliberate decision to minimize the police protection available to victims of domestic violence, and that the police did so because of an intentional animus against women, who make up the vast majority of adult victims of domestic violence. . . . As a subordinate federal court, it is our responsibility to do our best to apply the law as stated in Iqbal. My colleagues do so here, and the Iqbal standard is clearly decisive for the panel majority. The problem here is that it also our responsibility to do our best to apply other Supreme Court decisions involving pleading standards, including Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163 (1993); Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89 (2007); and Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506 (2002), as well as the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure as adopted by the Court and approved by Congress, and the form pleadings that are part of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and that were also approved by the Court and Congress. Iqbal is in serious tension with these other decisions, rules, and forms, and the Court's opinion fails to grapple with or resolve that tension. I do not believe it is an exaggeration to say that these decisions, rules, and forms simply conflict with Iqbal. As a result of this unresolved tension, since Iqbal was decided, the lower federal court decisions seeking to apply the new 'plausibility' standard are wildly inconsistent with each other, and with the conflicting decisions of the Supreme Court. . . .First, Iqbal's reasoning and holding conflict with Rule 9(b), which requires that a party alleging fraud or mistake 'state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake.' As for other states of mind, however, the rule provides: 'Malice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind may be alleged generally.'. . . Second, Iqbal conflicts with other recent Supreme Court decisions. Iqbal did not overrule or question a number of the Court's prior cases on notice pleading. . . . Third, Iqbal conflicts with the form complaints approved by the Supreme Court and Congress as part of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Rule 84 provides that the forms in the appendix 'suffice under these rules and illustrate the simplicity and brevity that these rules contemplate.' Iqbal did not purport to overrule or amend Rule 84 or the forms, but it is difficult to reconcile the new 'plausibility' standard with those forms. Many of the approved forms require virtually no explanation of the underlying facts as long as the defendant is informed of the event or transaction that gave rise to the claim, according to the broad notice purpose of the rules. . . . Unless one can plausibly explain away the tension between Iqbal and Rule 9(b) and the Rule 84-endorsed form complaints, then Iqbal conflicts with the Rules Enabling Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2071 et seq., and the prescribed process for amending the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. . . . Fourth, Iqbal's reliance on the fact/conclusion dichotomy is highly subjective, and returns courts to the long disapproved methods of analysis under the regime of code pleading. . . . Iqbal's reliance on the fact/conclusion dichotomy makes the difference indeterminate. Application of the dichotomy is leading to judge-specific and case-specific differences in outcome that confuse everyone involved. . . . Fifth, Iqbal's reliance on 'judicial experience and common sense' invites the highly subjective and inconsistent results that have been observed. The Iqbal concept of plausibility is 'context-specific.'. . As a practical matter, the concept invites district judges to exercise their individual views of the likely merits of the case at the outset, when the only information available is the complaint. Worse still, an uncritical reading of the Court's 'obvious alternative explanation' reasoning seems to invite judges to weigh competing explanations for alleged conduct and dismiss cases merely because they believe one explanation over another. . . In application, this standard bears a striking resemblance to the most stringent pleading requirement in American civil law, for pleading scienter in securities fraud claims, pursuant to the specific direction of Congress in the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act. See 15 U.S.C. § 78u-4(b)(2) (requiring plaintiff to 'state with particularity facts giving rise to a strong inference that the defendant acted with the required state of mind"); accord, Tellabs, Inc. v. Makor Issues and Rights, Ltd., 551 U.S. 308, 323-24 (2007) (explaining that a 'strong inference' must be 'cogent and compelling, thus strong in light of other explanations' for the defendant's actions). Congress has not imposed such a demanding standard for pleading in any other context − including civil rights and employment discrimination cases, which often turn on whether a defendant's explanation for a decision is legitimate or merely a pretext covering for unlawful bias. Rule 9(b) and the Supreme Court decisions in Swierkiewicz and Leatherman permit plaintiffs to plead intent generally, meaning without the sort of specifics required under the PSLRA. But if the Iqbal pleading standard is applied in the district court, plaintiffs who already face the uphill battle of proving secret intent must now contend with the possibility of pre-discovery dismissal whenever the alleged pretext asserted by defendants in their motion to dismiss sounds plausible to the common sense of the particular judge. The potential harm of Iqbal in this context is that outcomes will vary based on how different judges view the plausibility of, for example, a police policymaker harboring and acting on improper motives toward women who complain of domestic violence. . . . In the face of all these problems, what are the lower federal courts to do? . . . . The first thing we can do is recognize the uncertainty that litigants, their lawyers, and district courts now face. As a result of that uncertainty, the courts of appeals should insist that in all but the most unusual situations, a party whose pleading is dismissed based on the Iqbal plausibility standard should be entitled to an opportunity to amend the pleading after the court has made its decision. . . . We should exercise caution to avoid punishing parties for imperfect predictions as to how the subjective and inconsistent Iqbal standard might be applied in their case. . . .But where that approach is not enough to resolve the case, I believe we must take care not to expand Iqbal too aggressively beyond its highly unusual context − allegations aimed at the nation's highest-ranking law enforcement officials based on their response to unprecedented terrorist attacks on the United States homeland − to cut off potentially viable claims. Iqbal exemplifies the old adage about hard cases. The failure of the Supreme Court to address all of the law that would conflict with broad application of the case should weigh heavily against that broad application, at least until the Supreme Court provides clearer guidance about how to reconcile Iqbal with its prior cases, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and their accompanying forms. Reading the present complaint as a whole, plaintiff McCauley has alleged the particulars of a plausible Monell claim. As the majority points out, McCauley has alleged the elements of such a claim using the relevant legal language. While some of these statements are conclusory in nature, they serve to notify defendants and the court of the type of claim being brought. There can be no doubt that the complaint provides sufficient notice of the circumstances that gave rise to the claims. McCauley made factual allegations that Chicago police failed to arrest Martinez despite knowledge of his harassment and violations, ¶ 25, and that this failure resulted from a custom of untimeliness and indifference with regard to the seriousness of domestic violence, ¶ 125(c) and (j). McCauley alleges 'deliberate indifference' generally, see ¶ 126, but elsewhere describes numerous specific failures to act that are factually consistent with such an intent. See, e.g., ¶ 51. It is difficult to imagine what more McCauley might allege on the crucial question of intent without reciting a list of specific states of mind that Chicago police policy-makers might have. We did not require such a recital in Swanson and we should not do so here. By extending Iqbal to dismiss plaintiff McCauley's equal protection Monell claim against the City of Chicago, the majority runs afoul of Leatherman, Rule 9(b), and the form complaints approved by the Supreme Court and Congress as part of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Perhaps the Supreme Court majority intended Iqbal to work such a revolution in federal civil practice, but if so, the Court failed to grapple with the conflicts and did not express any direct rejection of these other governing sources of law. Under these circumstances, therefore, I would reverse the dismissal of plaintiff's equal protection claim against the City of Chicago and give him an opportunity to pursue discovery. Even if I agreed that the current version of the complaint failed to state a claim, I would remand with instructions to give plaintiff an opportunity to file an amended complaint to try to comply with the new and uncertain standards of Iqbal.") Cosby v. Rodriquez, 711 F.Supp.3d 983, ___ (N.D. Ill. 2024) ("Plaintiff Cosby alleges two primary theories of Monell liability against the City of Chicago. First, he alleges that the City (and Superintendent Brown) were 'deliberately indifferent to the widespread unconstitutional practices within CPD that caused Plaintiff's injuries.'. . Second, he argues that Superintendent Brown, as a 'final policymaker' for the city, 'authorized and directed the officers' unlawful conduct at the summer 2020 protests.'. . For the reasons discussed below, the court sustains Plaintiff's claim with respect to the former theory, but not the latter. . . .The Second Amended Complaint thus paints a picture of a widespread practice of specific forms of police abuse of protesters from 2003 onward—including excessive force using batons, other escalatory behavior—which Mr. Cosby alleges played out widely during the 2020 protest, injuring both him and other protesters. Plaintiff Cosby's Second Amended Complaint thus plausibly states that CPD officers customarily engaged in practices similar to those Cosby alleges they inflicted on him at the 2020 protests. The Second Amended Complaint's allegations go well beyond 'mere isolated event[s]' and state the existence of 'general pattern[s] of repeated behavior' that could be construed, in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, as municipal customs. . . Moreover, the fact that numerous internal and external investigations and reports repeatedly pointed out these failures plausibly implies that the City was

'aware of the risk created by the custom[s] or practice[s] and ... fail[ed] to take appropriate steps to protect the plaintiff.'. . Finally, Plaintiff plausibly alleges that these customs—and the City's deliberate indifference in the face of those customs—were a 'moving force' behind his injury. . . It is reasonable to infer from his Second Amended Complaint that the City's repeated failure to hold officers accountable for the use of excessive force—including through a culture of silence—emboldened officers to harm Mr. Cosby; indeed, the Second Amended Complaint specifically alleges that a code of silence results in officers' feeling 'they can abuse and violate the rights of individuals without consequence.'. . And Cosby's own injuries are alleged to result from excessive force and retaliatory animus toward protestors, the unlawful practices he has alleged. . . Nor does the existence of the Consent Decree require dismissal of Plaintiff's Monell claim. Emphasizing Plaintiff's allegations concerning that Decree, the City urges that those allegations themselves 'demonstrate that there are express policies in place that prohibit the very conduct he alleges caused his injuries, and that the City has been anything but deliberately indifferent to the alleged constitutional violations.'. . The Consent Decree is a 'binding contract' that 'directly contradict[s]' Plaintiff's claims that abusive police tactics are official policy of the City, Defendants contend. . . The law is clear, however, that Monell liability may be predicated not only on official or written policies but also on 'implicit polic[ies] or a gap in expressed policies,' or '"a series of violations [that confirm] the premise of deliberate indifference."'. . . Valuable as it is, the Consent Decree does not defeat a finding that the CPD in fact engaged in other policies or widespread practices in connection with the BLM protests. . . The bulk of the Defendants' argument on this score is that the City's 'ongoing efforts to implement the terms of the Consent Decree demonstrate that it is not deliberately indifferent to Plaintiff's constitutional rights ....'. . . In support, the City asserts that it has 'dedicated tens of millions of dollars, countless hours, and vast resources to work towards implementing the Consent Decree to improve police practices in Chicago.'. . As a preliminary matter, this argument goes beyond the four corners of Plaintiff's complaint; the complaint makes no mention of how much money or time the City has spent combating the alleged code of silence or the use of excessive and retaliatory force at protests. . .The sources the City does cite on this issue do not satisfy the court that the Consent Decree's existence requires dismissal of Plaintiff's Monell claim . . . . [D]rawing inferences in Mr. Cosby's favor (as the court must at this stage), the City's failure to change its policies in time for the 2020 protests tells a 'story that holds together' about its deliberate indifference to the means of unconstitutional policing Mr. Cosby alleges he suffered. . . The court makes no findings on these issues. But Cosby has plausibly alleged that the City's deliberate indifference to widespread unlawful practices on the part of its officers resulted in his injuries. These allegations are sufficient to support a claim for Monell liability.") Cosby v. Rodriquez, 711 F.Supp.3d 983, ___ (N.D. Ill. 2024) ("Plaintiff's separate theory of Monell liability—that Superintendent Brown, as a final policy maker for the City, directed and authorized unlawful conduct—requires only brief discussion. . . As the City points out, Plaintiff relies mostly on conclusory allegations in support of this theory. . .For example, Plaintiff alleges that Brown 'made all command decisions about the Chicago Police Department's systemic response to protesters during the 2020 uprisings ....'. . . According to Mr. Cosby, that included his encouragement and permission to CPD officers to 'target, attack, and harass' those protesting, and that he was 'physically present' for one—Mr. Cosby does not specify which—protest during which he did not intervene to stop officers' violent behavior. . . The Second Amended Complaint also alleges that, in the months following the protests, Brown defended officers in various ways. . . Nowhere in these allegations can the court find more than 'bare assertions' concerning Brown's implementing a specific policy directly traceable to Mr. Cosby's harm. . .The court thus agrees with the City that Plaintiff has not plausibly pleaded this latter theory of Monell liability.") Hendrick v. Bryant, No. 20-CV-00249, 2021 WL 4502159, at *1–5 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 30, 2021) ("Hendrick claims that the City has a history of using excessive force, particularly against young African-American men such as him. . . Yet, according to Hendrick, the City does not document when police officers point their weapons at people. . . And the United States Department of Justice ("DOJ") found that, '[the] CPD does not investigate or review these force incidents involving less than lethal force to determine whether its responses to these events were appropriate or lawful, or whether force could have been avoided.'. . Further, the DOJ found that even though police officers are technically required to report when they use force, in practice they do not provide enough detail about their actions to allow for review and investigation. . . As a result, the DOJ concluded, 'there is no meaningful, systemic accountability for officers who use force in violation of the law or CPD policy.'. . Hendrick further alleges that the CPD was required to take certain actions to increase accountability for police use of force by January 1, 2019 according to a consent decree. . . Specifically, the CPD was ordered to develop a training bulletin identifying when police officers 'should and should not point a firearm at a person.'. . It was also required to clarify in policy that police officers must document every time they 'point[ ] a firearm at a person to detain the person' and that police officers can only point firearms at people 'when objectively reasonable under the totality of the circumstances.'. . Further, the City was required to mandate, by July 1, 2019, that CPD officers report every time they point a gun at someone to detain them to the Chicago Office of Emergency Management and Communications. . . However, the City failed to comply with these requirements and did not implement any policy addressing police officers pointing firearms at people. . . . Hendrick has filed a six-count Complaint, but the City's motion to dismiss only concerns Count I, which asserts a claim for excessive force pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . . As pleaded, Count I is intelligible and gives the City fair notice of Hendrick's intention to pursue a Monell claim for excessive force. Specifically, the count alleges that the City failed to ensure oversight and accountability when its police officers pointed guns at people. It includes several specific factual allegations in support of that claim. . . Indeed, the City's arguments in its motion to dismiss demonstrate that it has identified and understood the basis of Hendrick's Monell claim against it. Requiring Hendrick to replead this claim via a separate count would serve no purpose and is not required by the letter or the spirit of Rule 10(b). . . . Hendrick's allegation that the City has no policy specifically regarding police officers pointing guns at people is a factual contention, not a legal conclusion. If Hendrick merely alleged a conclusion, such an allegation could be disregarded. . . But Hendrick is specific about the alleged problem with the City's gun-pointing policy: it does not have one. . . This allegation is not vague and does not smuggle in any legal conclusions, nor does it merely state an element of a Monell claim, such as deliberate indifference by the City. . . . Finally, the City contends that Hendrick's Complaint is insufficient because he only alleges one instance of unconstitutional conduct and has not alleged 'additional facts probative of a widespread practice or custom.'. . But Hendrick has pointed to such facts through his allegations that the City agreed to, and then failed to, adopt a gun-pointing policy under the consent decree. A single instance of unconstitutional conduct, when combined with allegations indicating a broader practice, can suffice to state a Monell claim. . . . Hendrick has pleaded that the 'moving force' of his injury was 'CPD's refusal to train and document when its officers point a weapon at someone.'. . Hendrick's say-so that the lack of training caused his injury is, of course, entitled to no deference. But Hendrick's factual allegations—including the City's awareness of its gun-pointing problem, its failure to comply with court orders regarding new policies and training, and the specific injury suffered by Hendrick—allow the Court, making inferences in Hendrick's favor, to conclude that Hendrick has plausibly alleged the necessary connection. He will, of course, have to support that causal link with proof to avoid summary judgment and, eventually, at trial. But for now, his allegations are sufficient to state a claim.")

Liggins v. City of Chicago, No. 1:20-CV-04085, 2021 WL 2894167, at *7 (N.D. Ill. July 9, 2021) ("The City first argues that Liggins makes only 'formulaic, conclusory statements' about municipal policies. . . The Court strongly disagrees. The allegations in Liggins' Complaint are overwhelmingly factual, and they clearly meet the relevant pleading standard. Liggins alleges, inter alia, that on more than 70 specific occasions in the last few decades Chicago police officers have fabricated witness identifications, fabricated witness statements, manipulated witnesses to influence their testimony, and concealed exculpatory evidence, in order to arrest and prosecute suspects such as Liggins. . . These allegations are corroborated by an FBI report containing the personal observations of an Assistant State's Attorney, as described in the Complaint. . . The Complaint cites the 2017 Department of Justice report that described the pervasive lack of training, discipline, and accountability in the Department. . . According to the Complaint, that Department of Justice report found that supervising investigators did not 'diligently review the investigative records to determine whether witnesses have lied in police reports or whether supervisors have blindly approved reports without attempting to determine whether the reports are fabricated.'. . A 2016 Chicago Police Accountability Taskforce report, also cited in the Complaint, made similar findings. These two reports cover the span of time during which Alonzo and Egan are alleged to have fabricated evidence against Liggins. Moreover, the Complaint alleges that '[b]etween 2004 and 2016, the City paid more than $500 million in settlements or judgments in police misconduct discovery, without even conducting disciplinary investigations in more than half of the cases.'. . The Complaint also explains that '[b]etween 2011 and 2015, nearly half of complaints filed against Chicago police officers were not even investigated' and 'fewer than 4% of those cases' resulted in discipline. . . According to the Complaint, former Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel, former Superintendent of the Chicago Police Charlie Beck, and the president of the Chicago police officer's union have all acknowledged that there is a 'code of silence' that protects police officers from discipline. . .Liggins also cites a cotemporaneous case in which it was found that there was a pattern or practice of 'failing to adequately discipline officers' and of a 'code of silence' about officer misconduct. . . These factual allegations support the Plaintiff's assertion that '[a]s a matter of both policy and practice, municipal policymakers and department supervisors condoned and facilitate [sic] a code of silence within the Chicago Police Department,' had a 'practice of not tracking and identifying police officers who are repeatedly accused of the same kinds of serious misconduct, failing to investigate cases in which the police are implicated in a wrongful charge or conviction, [and] failing to discipline officers accused of serious misconduct' which allowed and emboldened officers such as Alonzo and Egan to violate the constitutional rights of civilians like Liggins. . . These . . . specific factual allegations covering the approximate time of the alleged constitutional violations are more than the pleading standard requires. It is difficult to imagine how the Plaintiff could be any more specific without the benefit of discovery.")

Page v. City of Chicago, No. 19-CV-07431, 2021 WL 365610, at *2–3 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 3, 2021) ("First, Page alleges that the City of Chicago maintains widespread practices of failing to discipline, supervise, and control its police officers. While the Second Amended Complaint contains myriad allegations pertaining to the City of Chicago's alleged practices, these allegations are insufficient to support such findings. For example, Page alleges that prior to his arrest the CPD 'facilitated the type of misconduct at issue by failing to adequately punish and discipline prior instances of similar misconduct[.]'. . He also alleges that CPD officers 'abuse citizens in a manner similar to that alleged herein on a frequent basis, yet the Chicago Police Department makes findings of wrongdoing in a disproportionately small number of cases.'. . These allegations are general and unsupported by the facts. Similarly, Page alleges that four of the Defendant Officers 'had dozens of citizens' complaints filed against them without the City of Chicago implementing any significant discipline against them.'. . As stated earlier, these allegations—without more information connecting the complaints to the alleged constitutional violation at issue here—are insufficient to support Page's Monell claim. . . To further support, Page claims that '[a]s a matter of express policy, the City of Chicago refuses to take into consideration patterns of [unsustained] allegations of civil rights violations when evaluating the merits of a complaint.'. . This claim is simply too vague and unclear to support a plausible inference that the CPD maintains any widespread practice that caused Page's injury. Page also alleges that the CPD maintained a widespread practice referred to as the 'code of silence' under which officers do not report other officers' misconduct. . . According to Page, the City of Chicago was 'aware of, and condone[d] and facilitate[d]' this practice through their inaction. . . To support his allegation, Page alleges that Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel admitted in a December 2015 television interview that a 'code of silence exists among Chicago police officers[.]" (Id. at ¶ 59-60). The Court notes that Mayor Emanuel's statement was made in the context of an excessive force case involving a police shooting. This is distinguishable from the facts alleged here. Page further alleges that the "code of silence' is the moving force behind his constitutional injuries because Defendant Officers' 'decision to violate plaintiff's civil rights was proximately caused by a belief that they were impervious to consequences due to the City's willingness to tolerate a code of silence and failure to investigate.'. . While the Mayor's address sufficiently supports the allegation that the CPD maintained a 'code of silence,' Page has failed to adequately allege facts showing the requisite causal connection to allow the Court to plausibly infer that the 'code of silence' was the moving force behind his injury. . . Page also alleges that his constitutional deprivation arises out of the

CPD's widespread practice of failing to train its officers. Failure to train 'may serve as the basis for § 1983 liability only where the failure to train … amounts to deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of persons with whom the police come into contact.'. . A prerequisite to deliberate indifference is that 'the defendant must have actual or constructive notice of a problem.'. . Actual or constructive notice can be shown by a 'pattern of similar constitutional violations by untrained employees.'. . Here, Page has failed to plead a claim for failure to train. Specifically, he has not alleged any other similar constitutional violations by Chicago police officers other than his own, he has not identified the type of training the City failed to provide, nor does he allege sufficient facts linking a failure to train to his injuries. In support of his claim, Page merely asserts that 'CPD does not provide officers or supervisors with adequate training and does not encourage or facilitate adequate supervision of officers in the field.'. . He broadly explains that '[t]hese shortcomings in training and supervision result in officers who are unprepared to police lawfully and effectively; supervisors who do not mentor or support constitutional policing by officers; and a systemic inability to proactively identify areas for improvement, including Department-wide training needs and interventions for officers engaging in misconduct.'. . Outside of these generic statements, there are no further facts substantiating these allegations. Because no other facts link these allegations to particular instances of police misconduct, there is not enough for this Court to plausibly infer that the CPD is liable under this theory. Page attempts to overcome the factual deficiencies in the Second Amended Complaint by citing to the Department of Justice's January 2017 report on the Chicago Police Department ("DOJ Report"), which mainly addresses the CPD's deficiencies as it relates to the use of excessive force. Page's argument is unavailing because he has not brought an excessive force claim and he has failed to show how any of the deficiencies identified in the DOJ Report relate to his claim that Defendant Officers arrested him without probable. . . Therefore, the Court dismisses Page's Monell claim without prejudice.")

Mack v. City of Chicago, No. 19 C 4001, 2020 WL 7027649, at *5–6 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 30, 2020) ("Some case law suggests that general allegations of a 'code of silence' and failure 'to train, supervise, discipline, and control its police officers' are insufficient to state a Monell claim, and that a plaintiff seeking to assert such a claim must identify other instances of misconduct similar to what he has experienced in order to show 'that there is a true municipal policy at issue, not a random event.'. . The Court of Appeals considered this issue in White v. City of Chicago, 829 F.3d 837, 844 (7th Cir. 2016), where the plaintiff alleged little more than that he had been arrested on an inadequately-supported warrant 'in accordance with a widespread practice of the police department of the City of Chicago.' The district court's dismissal of the Monell claim was error, the court held: 'White was not required to identify every other or even one other individual' who had been the victim of the alleged constitutional violation. . . Since White, many courts have declined to grant motions to dismiss that are premised on the argument that the complaint does not contain allegations beyond those relating to the plaintiff. . . At summary judgment or trial, Plaintiff will have to offer evidence of widespread unlawful practices and its failure to train officers, and demonstrate how those practices and failures caused the alleged wrongdoing in this case. He need not do so at the pleading stage. The City's motion to dismiss Count VI is denied.")

Watson v. City of Chicago, No. 15 C 11559, 2017 WL 11565719, at *3–4 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 23, 2017) ("Watson relies primarily on two sets of facts to support his contention that the City had a custom of condoning or failing to discipline police brutality. First, he argues that the City's own April 13, 2016 Police Accountability Task Force Report concluded that the City failed to train the police, perpetuated a code of silence, and encouraged the use of excessive force. . . Because the facts supporting that conclusion are already contained in a document created by the City itself, Watson contends that he does not need to repeat those facts in the Amended Complaint. . . It is true that nothing prevents Watson from mining the Task Force Report for factual support, and indeed Watson (or any other plaintiff, for that matter) can rely on facts in the Report to satisfy Rule 11's requirement that every factual assertion has evidentiary support, or likely will have evidentiary support after reasonable discovery. . . But it is one thing to dig up specific facts set forth in the Task Force Report and assert them as allegations, and quite another to simply rely on the bare conclusions in the Task Force Report. Put another way, Watson does not actually identify any specific facts in the Report that illustrate the existence of a police code of silence or a widespread custom of turning a blind eye to policy brutality, nor does Watson allege facts that establish a causal link between the City's practices and his own injury. In the Amended Complaint, Watson simply states that the Task Force Report 'conclu[des] that the Defendant City of Chicago and its law enforcement parastatals have for decades systemically failed in ways that cause extrajudicial injury at the hands of the police ....'. . . Conclusory allegations alone cannot sustain a Monell claim. . . Litigation via 'executive summary' will not cut it. Instead, only when specific factual allegations are asserted can the Court evaluate whether a Monell claim has been adequately stated. The Task Force Report might very well contain specific factual material that would support a Monell claim. But in an adversarial system of litigation, it is not for the Court to sift through a 183-page report, looking for facts to support Watson's attempt to state a claim. . . Aside from the Task Force Report, the other set of facts that Watson relies on emanates from a statement made by Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel on December 9, 2015. . . Specifically, Watson quotes the mayor as saying the following:

They [The Police Accountability Task Force] have to examine decades of past practices that have allowed abusive police officers with records of complaints to escape accountability....This problem is sometimes referred to as the Thin Blue Line. Other times it is referred to as the code of silence. It is the tendency to ignore, deny or in some cases cover-up the bad actions of a colleague or colleagues. No officers should be allowed to behave as if they are above the law just because they are responsible for upholding the law. Permitting and protecting even the smallest acts of abuse by a tiny fraction of our officers leads to a culture where extreme acts of abuse are more likely.

. . . . Unlike the plaintiff in Spearman, here Watson has not supplied other factual allegations to bolster his Monell claim (as discussed earlier, the Task Force Report's conclusions do not count). Nor does Watson allege that Mayor Emanuel would have personal knowledge that policymakers knew, in January 2015, of a widespread custom that caused the constitutional violations, or that the policymakers who did know of a custom condoned the custom or were deliberately indifferent that violations would occur. The Amended Complaint, even when read in Watson's favor, lacks sufficient factual specificity. 4 One final point is worth noting: the Court is of course not applying a heightened pleading standard to Monell claims. Time and again the Supreme Court has emphasized that Section 1983 claims are not subject to a Rule 9(b)-type standard. But Iqbal and Twombly do instruct that 'determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will ... be a context-specific task ....'. . . A claim involving a more complex substantive standard—both on knowledge (or deliberate indifference) and on causation—often will require more detail, both to give the opposing party notice of what the case is about and to adequately plead the claim. . . In this case, Watson not only attempts to state a claim against a municipality for its failure to train and control the police, but also alleges that the City perpetuated a code of silence and encouraged the use of excessive force. To succeed, ultimately he must prove that the City exhibited deliberate indifference to the systemic problems—and that the constitutional deprivation he suffered was caused by that deliberate indifference instead of being an isolated violation. . . Yet Watson provides nothing more than a quote from the Mayor and a restatement of the Executive Summary from the Task Force Report as factual support for his Monell claim. Iqbal requires factual allegations; legal conclusions and conclusory allegations are not entitled to the presumption of truth. . . So Watson's allegations are insufficient to state a claim of municipal liability.")

Barnett v. City of Chicago, No. 18 C 7946, 2020 WL 4336063, at *4 (N.D. Ill. July 28, 2020) ("The City Defendants argue that Barnett may not rely only on his personal experience as the basis for his Monell claim. But the Seventh Circuit has indicated that at the motion to dismiss stage, a plaintiff may do just this instead of having to plead examples of other individuals' experiences. [collecting cases]")

Hill v. Cook County, No. 18-CV-08228, 2020 WL 2836773, at *15 (N.D. Ill. May 31, 2020) ("Hill offers more than mere boilerplate. Even if the additional cases that Hill cites are not on all-fours with his claims here, '[p]ost-White courts analyzing Monell claims...have "scotched motions to dismiss" premised on arguments that the complaint does not contain allegations beyond those relating to the plaintiff." Williams v. City of Chicago, 2017 WL 3169065, at *9 (N.D. Ill. 2017) (collecting cases) (citing White v. City of Chicago, 829 F.3d 837, 844 (7th Cir. 2016)). Courts in this district have generally stuck with this approach when addressing motions to dismiss municipal Monell claims. See, e.g., Hill v. City of Chicago, 2020 WL 509031, at *4 (N.D. Ill. 2020); Pursely v. City of Rockford, 2019 WL 4918139, at *6–7 (N.D. Ill. 2019); Hallom v. City of Chicago, 2019 WL 1762912, at *4 (N.D. Ill. 2019); Williams v. City of Chicago, 315 F. Supp. 3d 1060, 1078–79 (N.D. Ill. 2018). Discovery may or may not yield proof that there is a widespread practice of violating constitutional rights. But in the meantime, Hill has alleged enough to support a plausible Monell claim against both municipal defendants.")

Jones v. Hunt, No. 19 C 4118, 2020 WL 814912, at *2–3 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 19, 2020) ("The City argues that Jones still fails to plead enough facts to proceed on a failure to train claim against it. To determine whether Jones has sufficiently alleged a widespread practice courts sometimes consider allegations of other similar instances of misconduct. . . But this is not a requirement, and Jones need not 'identify every other or even one other individual' who was arrested because of the same misconduct at the pleadings stage. . . Alternatively, courts have looked to other factual allegations to buttress a plaintiff's claim. . . In White, for example, the plaintiff alleged that the defendant officer sought an arrest warrant, knowing he lacked probable cause, based upon conclusory allegations that the plaintiff had committed a criminal offense. . . The plaintiff also attached a copy of the 'standard complaint form' that did 'not require specific factual support for an application for an arrest warrant.'. . The Seventh Circuit found that plaintiff's allegations of a widespread practice of requesting warrants based on conclusory allegations, '[t]ogether with the individual claim against [the officer] and the standard printed form,' were enough to state a claim. . . Here, Jones offers no additional factual allegations beyond his conclusory assertions that the alleged violations 'can be proven to have occurred in thousands of instances.'. . . Jones levies broad accusations of misconduct that are not 'tailored to identify particular police training procedures or policies.'. . Accordingly, he has not pleaded enough facts to nudge his claim 'across the line from conceivable to plausible,'. . . or to 'put the [City] on proper notice of the alleged wrongdoing[.]". . Because Jones may be able to cure the complaint's shortcomings, the Court dismisses the Monell claim without prejudice.")

Hill v. City of Chicago, No. 19 C 6080, 2020 WL 509031, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 31, 2020) ("Plaintiffs appear to rely on a widespread practice theory of liability. To be successful on such a claim, 'the plaintiff must demonstrate that there is a policy at issue rather than a random event. This may take the form of an implicit policy or gap in expressed policies, or "a series of violations to lay the premise of deliberate indifference."'. . Defendants contend that Plaintiffs fail to allege the policy at issue, or that any such policy has a causal link to their claims. In so arguing, Defendants set the bar too high for a motion to dismiss. True, Plaintiffs allege several practices and customs unrelated to the claims in this case. But the complaint also alleges that the Chicago Police Department had a widespread practice of suppressing and manufacturing evidence and contriving false narratives against innocent persons that they coerced witnesses into adopting. . . The complaint then supports those allegations by stating that at least 70 cases have come to light since 1986 in which Chicago Police Department officers have fabricated evidence or suppressed exculpatory evidence that led to convictions, . . . describing a Federal Bureau of Investigation report that discusses Chicago police detectives feeding information to witnesses and working with them to rehearse false narratives, . . . and describing the department's pattern of suppressing exculpatory information which they support by citing to several other cases,[.]. . Moreover, the complaint alleges that the Defendants acted in accordance with these widespread practices in securing the wrongful conviction of Plaintiffs. This is enough to make the Plaintiffs' Monell claim plausible. Defendants' motion to dismiss Count V is denied.")

Harper v. Flores, No. 18 CV 6822, 2019 WL 6033597, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 14, 2019) ("These allegations raise an inference that Crest Hill has a practice of concealing and condoning officer misconduct. And that alleged practice plausibly insulated Flores from professional discipline and criminal prosecution, allowing him to kill Samantha with impunity. The Harers 'present a story' of indifference to or approval of officer misconduct 'that holds together,' even if that story is not the truth about what 'really' goes on in Crest Hill. . . That is enough for the Harers' Monell claim to survive Crest Hill's motion to dismiss. . . . And although the court agrees that Flores's drinking problem, as alleged, may have had nothing to do his shooting of Samantha, Crest Hill's alleged failure to act on that drinking problem is a 'bad act' supporting the inference that Crest Hill generally condones police misconduct.")

Bishop v. White, No. 16 C 6040, 2019 WL 5550576, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 28, 2019) ("Plaintiff alleges that the City of Chicago has an 'informal policy of encouraging its police officers to use unnecessary force in effecting arrests of male black citizens and to make false arrests of male black citizens,' it 'fails to train its police officers' not to make such improper arrests, and plaintiff's arrest is 'merely one of many instances of such misconduct.'. . To state a claim of municipal liability based on an unconstitutional custom or policy under Monell, . . . plaintiff must ' "plead[ ] factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference" that the City maintained a policy, custom, or practice' that caused a deprivation of his constitutional rights. . . 'An official policy or custom may be established by means of [1] an express policy, [2] a widespread practice which, although unwritten, is so entrenched and well-known as to carry the force of policy, or [3] through the actions of an individual who possesses the authority to make final policy decisions on behalf of the municipality or corporation.'. . Plaintiff identifies no express policy or final policymaker, so his claim of an 'informal policy' apparently falls within the category for practices so widespread and deeply entrenched that, though unwritten, they carry the force of policy. But plaintiff's purely conclusory allegation that his arrest is 'merely one of many instances of such misconduct' is insufficient. Plaintiff must provide 'some specific facts' to support his claim, . . . and 'the Seventh Circuit has made clear that isolated incidents are insufficient to establish a practice or custom under Monell.'. . Plaintiff does not make any specific, non-conclusory factual allegations to support an inference of a widespread practice other than to allege that he, himself, suffered a constitutional deprivation. That is the sort of conclusory allegation of an isolated incident that falls short of the Twombly/Iqbal standard, . . . because, rather than 'plausibly suggesting...an entitlement to relief,' it is 'merely consistent with' it[.]").

Mendez v. City of Chicago, No. 1:18 C 6313, 2019 WL 4934698, at *3–4 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 7, 2019) ("Failure to train or turning a blind eye to repeated excessive force violations could both give rise to Monell liability. . . . Plaintiffs alleging a pattern or practice of constitutional violations may incorporate admissible evidence from official investigations, although they are not required to do so at the pleading stage. . . Plaintiff alleges facts sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss on his Monell claim. Plaintiff alleges that the City's practice of foot pursuits raises the risk of excessive force. . . Plaintiff alleges he was shot during precisely such a foot pursuit, in similar circumstances to those explicated in the portion of the Department of Justice report cited in his complaint. . . Plaintiff alternatively alleges systemic training failures giving rise to Chicago Police's repeated unnecessary use of force, particularly against fleeing suspects. . . Finally, Plaintiff alleges the CPD fails to adequately train or enforce rules related to use of force, undermining deterrence value of those policies in a systematic way. . . Plaintiff thus directly alleges a claim of the type the Supreme Court approved in Harris and the Seventh Circuit approved of in Glisson, along with allegations supporting his claim in the form of several reports on CPD's practices. . . These allegations state a claim for a Monell violation as to unreasonable and excessive use of force, because taken as true they suggest the City's practices or customs proximately caused the use of excessive force against the Plaintiff. . . Plaintiff alleges no facts specific to his claim that the City has a pattern of unlawful searches. . . Plaintiff's complaint primarily focuses on documenting the CPD's failure to train officers about use of force. . . Although a facially plausible complaint need not give 'detailed factual allegations,' it must allege facts sufficient 'to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.'. . Mr. Mendez does not allege facts suggesting a pattern or custom of unlawful stops, despite alleging such a pattern exists when seeking relief. . . Since he fails to allege specific facts, we dismiss his Monell claim as to a pattern of unlawful searches.")

Hallom v. City of Chicago, No. 1:18 C 4856, 2019 WL 1762912, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 22, 2019) ("Hallom has sufficiently pleaded a Monell claim against the City by alleging that it has a widespread practice or custom of covering up police misconduct and that this practice was the cause of his injuries. Hallom alleges that the City 'has known and has encouraged a "code of silence" among its police officers.'. . Citing a report from the Department of Justice, Hallom alleges that the City's code of silence is furthered by CPD police officers lying about police misconduct, or intentionally omitting material facts about police misconduct, to hide such misconduct. . . Hallom alleges, again citing the report from the Department of Justice, that high-level CPD officials, current CPD officers, the City's Mayor, and the president of the CPD officers' union all know of this practice. . . In addition to alleging his own injury—his wrongful pretrial detention—Hallom's allegations give rise to the reasonable inference that others have suffered similar injuries because of the City's alleged custom of covering up police misconduct with intentional lies or omissions concerning material facts. . . Ultimately, Hallom need not provide 'evidentiary support' at this stage of his lawsuit. . . Rather, all Hallom needs to do is allege facts sufficient for us to 'draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.'. . Hallom has plausibly alleged his Section 1983 claim against the City, and we therefore deny defendants' motion to dismiss that claim.")

Austin v. City of Chicago, No. 18 C 7268, 2019 WL 4750279, at *3-4 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 30, 2019) ("Austin contends that the Chicago Police Department's code of silence fostered an environment in which officers could act with impunity, which in turn led the officers to violate his civil rights. . . In so arguing, it appears that Austin is alleging an implicit policy exists, which is properly analyzed under a widespread practice – not an express policy – theory of Monell liability. . . . Austin argues that the police department's code of silence and lack of an effective early warning system to mitigate unlawful police conduct led to the officers' violation of his civil rights. Both allegations are insufficient to state a Monell claim. There are two main problems with Austin's allegations against the City of Chicago. First, Austin does not allege any facts to explain how these policies caused or related to his own experience. Rather, Austin merely recites the elements of a Monell claim in conclusory fashion. That is not enough to survive a motion to dismiss . . . Second, while it is not impossible for a plaintiff to demonstrate the existence of an unofficial policy or custom based on his own experience, it is 'necessarily more difficult...because "what is needed is evidence that there is a true municipal policy at issue, not a random event."'. . There is nothing in the complaint that allows the Court to infer there was a widespread practice of false arrests or fabrication of evidence at the Chicago Police Department. The closest Austin comes to alleging his experience was not a random event is listing complaints filed against two of the defendant officers in his response to the motion to dismiss. But Austin provides no information about how (if at all) those complaints relate to the officers' conduct towards him. In short, Austin's allegations against the City of Chicago consist only of boilerplate legal conclusions. Thus, to the extent Austin asserts a Monell claim against the City of Chicago, it is dismissed without prejudice.")

Stidimire v. Watson, No. 17-CV-1183-SMY-SCW, 2018 WL 4680666, at *4 (S.D. Ill. Sept. 28, 2018) ("Plaintiff asserts that Watson, in his official capacity as the St. Clair County Sheriff, was deliberately indifferent to the serious risk that Stidimire would commit suicide, because the jail had no suicide prevention policy, provided inadequate training and supervision for employees regarding detainee suicide prevention, and had a practice of routinely denying detainees with mental health problems access to mental health professionals and suicide-proof cells. Plaintiff also alleges that Watson was aware of the risk of suicide in the jail as there had been two suicides and fourteen suicide attempts in the jail during the seventeen months preceding Stidimire's death. A Monell claim subjects a local governing body, such as the County, to monetary damages under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 'if the unconstitutional act complained of is caused by (1) an official policy adopted and promulgated by its officers; (2) a governmental practice or custom that, although not officially authorized, is widespread and well settled; or (3) an official with final policy-making authority.'. . Here, Plaintiff alleges that the policies and widespread informal practices of the St. Clair County Sheriff's Department were the moving force behind the failure to protect Stidimire from the known risk of suicide in the jail. Heightened pleading standards do not apply to Monell claims. . . Therefore, drawing all inferences in Plaintiff's favor as the Court must do at this stage, the Court finds these allegations sufficient to put the County on notice of the claims against it. Defendants' motion to dismiss Count II is denied.")

Taylor v. City of Chicago, No. 17-CV-03642, 2018 WL 4075402, at *6-7 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 27, 2018) ("Taylor has sufficiently alleged a constitutional injury. Moreover, he has numerous specific factual allegations showing that the City authorized and had a custom approving of this unconstitutional conduct. Specifically, he alleges that the City knew that O'Brien frequently fabricated evidence. Moreover, the City authorized and maintained a code of silence amongst its police department that discouraged police officers from blowing the whistle on such misconduct. These allegations are supported by a report from the Department of Justice, . . . a factual finding from a federal jury, . . . a public acknowledgment from the Mayor, . . . and a finding made by the City's Police Accountability Task Force[.]. . Courts in this District have found similar allegations arising from the Chicago Police Department's code of silence sufficient to state a Monell claim against the City. See, e.g., Powell, 2018 WL 1211576, at *9; Bolden, 2017 WL 8186995, at *5–6. This Court follows suit here. Thus, Defendants' motion to dismiss Taylor's Monell claim is denied.")

Williams v. City of Chicago, No. 17 C 5186, 2018 WL 2561014, at *10 (N.D. Ill. June 1, 2018) ("[T]he City argues that Williams's Monell claim is deficient because it 'mainly references his own alleged incident.'. . But even this argument acknowledges that Williams has included allegations of other instances with regard to the street files. . . Not only that, a plaintiff raising a Monell claim may rely solely on his own experience, rather than being required to plead examples of other individuals' experiences. [citing White v. City of Chicago] In determining whether a plaintiff has sufficiently pled a widespread practice in a Monell claim, the Court looks to the instances of misconduct alleged, the circumstances surrounding the alleged constitutional injury, and additional facts probative of a widespread practice or custom. . . Looking at all of the circumstances here, Williams has alleged that no less than three GPRs were destroyed or lost and that multiple reports were falsified by the Officers (or numerous reports selectively omitted exculpatory information gained in witness interviews). Based on these allegations, Williams has sufficiently pled that the City has a policy or custom that violates the Constitution. . . Moreover, the Officers remain potentially liable on the underlying claims, so the Court denies the City's motion to dismiss the Monell claim against it at this stage.")

Leibowitz on behalf of Estate of Jacoby v. DuPage County, No. 12 C 6539, 2018 WL 1184731, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 7, 2018) ("Jacoby's evidence, viewed in a light most favorable to him, does not permit an inference that any of his Monell theories could succeed, primarily because he presents no evidence that it is highly, or even somewhat, predictable that an officer who lacks specific tools to handle an individual who presents in an agitated state and refuses to cooperate in a medical assessment is likely to violate his constitutional rights such that failure to train amounts to deliberate indifference. Although it may have been obvious to the officers that Jacoby was severely obese, plaintiff has no evidence specific to obesity that would distinguish such a person from any other detainee in the same situation. For example, he proffers no expert testimony about law enforcement practices that suggest that acceptable practices in correctional or detention settings should include particular protocols for obese or agitated detainees, nor does he identify a course of training that might have made a difference here. In short, the issue in this case is straightforward. It is whether the individual defendants used excessive force against Jacoby on this single occasion in violation of the Fourth Amendment. For these reasons, the Sheriff is entitled to summary judgment on the failure-to-train claim.")

Powell v. City of Chicago, No. 17-CV-5156, 2018 WL 1211576, at *9 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 8, 2018) ("According to Plaintiff, the 'code of silence' permeated throughout CPD, enabling 'the individual officer defendants to engage in egregious misconduct for many years.'. . Plaintiff specifically alleges that the 'code of silence' was not just an unspoken rule, but part of the customary course of instruction at the Chicago Police Academy. . . Based upon those allegations, Plaintiff sufficiently pleads that the City has a policy or custom that violates the Constitution. . . Here, the individual officers remain potentially liable on the underlying claims, so this Court denies Defendants' motion to dismiss the Monell claim against the City at this stage.")

Shields v. City of Chicago, No. 17 C 6689, 2018 WL 1138553, at *3-4 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 2, 2018) ("Plaintiff states that it is common knowledge among the CPD that misconduct complaints reviewed by the IPRA do not result in immediate discipline. . . Plaintiff further asserts that when he was detained on June 6, 2016, Defendant Officers knew the City had a policy or practice that did not hold officers accountable for their use of excessive force. . . Also, Plaintiff states that Defendant Officers Josephs and Wiberg knew from their past experience with IPRA complaints that it was highly unlikely that the IPRA would recommend discipline for the alleged misconduct. . . Further adding to this custom or practice, the IPRA did not request statements from the Defendant Officers (as barred by their CBAs). . . Plaintiff also highlights the United States Justice Department's ("DOJ") January 2017 Report concluding that the CPD has engaged in a custom or practice of unreasonable force, due in part, to deficiencies in training, supervision, and accountability. . . Further, Plaintiff points to the existence of a 'code of silence' where Chicago Police Officers conceal police misconduct such as excessive force, including that a Police Accountability Task Force Report found that the CBAs between the police unions and the City have essentially turned the code of silence into an official policy. . . According to Plaintiff, the above widespread custom or practice was deliberately indifferent to his rights secured by the United States Constitution and was the moving force behind his constitutional injuries. . . . In the present motion, the City argues that Plaintiff has failed to adequately allege his Monell claim because he only mentions a single incident, namely, the alleged excessive force surrounding his arrest and detention on June 6, 2016. In response, Plaintiff asserts that he can allege a failure to train claim based on his own experience without alleging other, similar violations. Indeed, the Supreme Court has left open the possibility that in a narrow range of failure to train cases, a plaintiff need not prove a pattern of similar violations to establish deliberate indifference. . . . Outside of this exception, 'Monell claims based on allegations of an unconstitutional municipal practice or custom—as distinct from an official policy—normally require evidence that the identified practice or custom caused multiple injuries.'. . That being said, the Supreme Court's discussions in Connick, Brown, Canton, and the Seventh Circuit's decision in Chatham concern proving a failure to train Monell claim, not pleading one. . . In White, the Seventh Circuit recognized the difference in the standards for pleading a Monell claim based on a widespread practice or custom and proving one. In doing so, the Seventh Circuit clarified that Monell claims are not subject to a heightened pleading standard in the context of allegations that the CPD has a custom or practice where police officers submit arrest warrant applications without enough information to establish probable cause for arrest. . . In his complaint, the plaintiff in White alleged his own experience in which the officers submitted an inadequate application for his arrest warrant and also included the standard CPD form used for arrest warrants, which on its face did not require specific factual support. . . Under these circumstances, the Seventh Circuit concluded that the plaintiff had sufficiently alleged a Monell custom or practice claim because he alleged more than his own constitutional injury based on the attached form. . . Here, Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged his Monell claim against the City by alleging factual details concerning the CPD's alleged widespread practice or custom of covering-up police officers' unconstitutional use of excessive force and that this practice was the moving force behind his constitutional injuries. In particular, not only has Plaintiff alleged his own Fourth Amendment excessive force injury, but he has also alleged that the Police Accountability Task Force Report and January 2017 DOJ Report highlight the deficiencies in relation to the CPD's use of excessive force that are sufficiently similar to Plaintiff's excessive force allegations – raising a reasonable inference that he is not alone in suffering constitutional injuries resulting from this alleged practice or custom. . . Moreover, despite the City's argument to the contrary, Plaintiff's allegations – read as a whole – include more than mere legal conclusions and boilerplate language. . . In particular, Plaintiff gives context to his Monell claim by explaining that Chicago Police Officers' CBAs prohibit the IPRA from properly investigating complaints of excessive force and that by delegating responsibility to the IPRA to investigate and recommend discipline of Chicago Police Officers, the City enables the 'code of silence' of covering-up police misconduct involving the use of excessive force. In addition, the City's arguments that Plaintiff's allegations do not 'establish' the existence of a widespread policy are misplaced because at this stage of the proceedings, the Court must determine whether Plaintiff has stated a plausible claim for relief, not that he has 'established' or 'proven' his claims. . . For these reasons, the Court denies the City's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's Monell claim as alleged in Count V of the Amended Complaint.")

Santos v. Curran, No. 17 C 2761, 2018 WL 888758, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 14, 2018) ("Curran complains that Santos uses only boilerplate language and refers only to a single problem he personally experienced, which cannot give rise to a claim for a widespread practice. But recently, the Seventh Circuit has reminded courts not to apply a 'heightened pleading standard' to Monell claims. White v. City of Chicago, 829 F.3d 837, 844 (7th Cir. 2016) (quoting Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence & Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 164, 113 S. Ct. 1160, 122 L.Ed. 2d 517 (1993)). A plaintiff may rely solely on his own experience to state a Monell claim, rather than pleading examples of other individual's experiences. See id. at 844 (noting that plaintiff "was not required to identify every other or even one other individual who had been arrested pursuant to a warrant obtained through the complained-of process"); Williams v. City of Chicago, No. 16-cv-8271, 2017 WL 3169065, at *8–9 (N.D. Ill. July 26, 2017) ("Post-White courts analyzing Monell claims ... have 'scotched motions to dismiss' premised on arguments that the complaint does not contain allegations beyond those relating to the plaintiff." (collecting cases)). Therefore, Santos' allegation that he was unconstitutionally detained pursuant to a policy or practice of indefinitely detaining individuals pursuant to ICE immigration detainers, which the Sheriff enforced, suffices at this stage to state a Monell claim against Curran in his official capacity. See Barwicks v. Dart, No. 14-cv-8791, 2016 WL 3418570, at *4 (N.D. Ill. June 22, 2016) (at summary judgment, single incident cannot establish Monell claim, but at the motion to dismiss stage, a plaintiff "need only allege a pattern or practice, not put forth the full panoply of evidence from which a reasonable factfinder could conclude such a pattern exists"). Additionally, Santos has pleaded that Curran developed and implemented the detention policies and practices at the Lake County Jail, which would include the alleged unconstitutional policy of detaining individuals indefinitely pursuant to an ICE detainer. Because 'Illinois sheriffs have final policymaking authority over jail operations,' DeGenova v. Sheriff of DuPage County, 209 F.3d 973, 976 (7th Cir. 2000), Santos has also sufficiently pleaded a claim pursuant to the third theory of Monell liability[.] . . The Court therefore allows Santos' claim against Curran in his official capacity to proceed.")

Arrington v. City of Chicago, No. 17 C 5345, 2018 WL 620036, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 30, 2018) ("The City also argues that Plaintiff's claim of investigatory procedures that protect officers from excessive force claims is insufficient because it is based on 'broad conclusory allegations about the investigative practices of the Chicago Police Department detectives and a former IPRA investigator.' But a "conclusory" allegation is one that reaches a legal conclusion. As detailed above, Plaintiff does not merely allege that the City's investigatory procedures encourage excessive force. That allegation alone is conclusory. Plaintiff, however, goes on to make several factual allegations about specific customs and practices the City employs to investigate allegations of excessive force, and how those customs and practices permit police officers to protect themselves from discipline or punishment. . . Contrary to the City's attempt to dismiss these allegations as 'conclusory,' they are allegations of fact, which is what is required under Twombly to make a claim plausible. Of course, the City may contend that these allegations are false. But that is not the question on a motion pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6). The City also attacks Plaintiff's Monell claim by separately arguing that 'Plaintiff does not sufficiently allege a widespread practice of false reporting,'. .; that 'Plaintiff failed to set forth a widespread practice of failure to adequately document claims,'. . .; and that 'Plaintiff failed to allege a widespread practice of failure to discipline officers when they commit perjury and false reports[.]'. . This is another way of arguing that Plaintiff's allegations are conclusory. But as discussed, Plaintiff provides additional factual details about how the City conducts excessive force investigations. It is certainly plausible that the alleged opportunity for officers to be privy to the facts discovered by investigators would result in widespread false reporting and inadequate documentation. Furthermore, a failure to discipline is inherent in these allegations. Lastly, the City argues that even if the police department has a custom of condoning excessive force and protecting officers accused of excessive force, it 'strains plausibility' to allege that this policy was the moving force behind the crash at issue here. . . The City contends that Officer Ewing would not 'choose' to 'ram' his vehicle into another vehicle at high speed, because it is 'an act totally against self-preservation.'. . But it is not implausible for a police officer to engage in a high speed chase. Indeed, the Chicago police department has issued a general order to its officers regarding when it is permissible to engage in a high speed chase. . . The Court also does not find it implausible that in certain circumstances, an officer might use his vehicle to impede a fleeing suspect's vehicle, and such an action could plausibly be the basis for an excessive force claim. Although it is danger of a different kind, the Court is not convinced that using a police vehicle to impede the escape of a suspect's vehicle is necessarily any more dangerous than other circumstances police officers face in the course of their duties, at least such that it pushes Plaintiff's Monell causation allegations out of the realm of plausibility. To the extent the City condones or enables police officers to use excessive force, the fact that Officer Ewing is alleged to have used his vehicle to commit the act of excessive force—as opposed to his fist or gun—does not undermine the causation element of Plaintiff's Monell claim.")

Turner v. M.B. Financial Bank, No. 14-CV-9880, 2017 WL 4390367, at *8–9 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 3, 2017) ("Plaintiffs are plainly asserting a Monell claim in the complaint. . . Plaintiffs allege that '[a]s a matter of both policy and practice, the Chicago Police Department directly encourages, and is thereby the moving force behind, the very type of misconduct at issue here by failing to adequately train, supervise and control its officers, such that its failure to do so manifests deliberate indifference.'. . They allege that Defendant 'facilitates the very type of misconduct at issue here by failing to adequately investigate, punish and discipline prior instances of similar conduct, thereby leading Chicago Police Officers to believe their actions will not be scrutinized and, in that way, directly encouraging future abuses such as those affecting Plaintiff.'. . They contend that 'officers of the Chicago Police Department abuse citizens in a manner similar to that alleged by Plaintiffs in this Count on a frequent basis, yet the Chicago Police Department makes findings of wrongdoing in a disproportionately small number of cases.'. . Moreover, Defendant is 'aware of,' 'condone[s],' and 'facilitate[s]' by their inaction a "code of silence" in the Chicago Police Department.'. . In particular, 'officers routinely fail to report instances of police misconduct and lie to protect each other,' are not disciplined for this behavior, and Defendant has 'failed to act to remedy the patterns of abuse' despite its knowledge of these problems. . .While these allegations bare some resemblance to boilerplate, they have sufficient factual content to make Plaintiffs' claim plausible. Plaintiffs allege that the City fails to adequately investigate and punish past instances of excessive force by police, which has the effect of condoning and encouraging excessive force by police in the future, such as the alleged excessive force that occurred here. . . Similarly, Defendant's 'disproportionately small' number of findings of police wrongdoing and alleged indifference to the underreporting of excessive force claims because of the police's 'code of silence' are factual allegations that reinforce plausibility of any 'policy or custom.' . .These are more than simply legal conclusions, and Defendant does not explain why these allegations are insufficient. Although borderline, there are enough factual allegations in the third amended complaint to 'nudge[ ]' this claim 'across the line from conceivable to plausible.'. . Therefore, Plaintiff states a claim under Monell against the City of Chicago in Count I.") Scheidler v. Metro. Pier & Exposition Auth., No. 16-CV-4288, 2017 WL 1022077, at *5-6 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 16, 2017) ("Rule 8 'does not unlock the doors of discovery for a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions.'. . Pleading that an unspecified number of lawsuits filed at unspecified times involving unspecified actors and unspecified allegations that violate unspecified rights does not plead sufficient factual allegations to show is plausible that MPEA acted with deliberate indifference regarding NPI's security practices in the face of a 'pattern of constitutional violations.'. .Nor does Plaintiff's hazy allegation that there were 'one or more lawsuits' allege a number of incidents by which one could infer a 'pattern' of relevant unconstitutional conduct. The closest Plaintiff comes is his allegation that 'prior litigation involving a different victim' alleged that NPI maintained a 'policy, custom and practice of confiscating video recording equipment,' and MPEA was aware of this 'policy' because NPI was sued. . . There is no factual content to this allegation beyond asserting that there is a generalized policy of confiscation that applies in unspecific circumstances and was referenced in an unspecified 'prior litigation.' That is insufficient. . . . Here, Plaintiffs' Monell claims are high on the complexity scale—consisting of multiple 'policies' that violate multiple constitutional rights and purportedly corrupt all of NPI's interactions with protestors. But Plaintiff does not plead any facts suggesting why it would be 'plainly obvious' that allowing NPI to handle Navy Pier security would result in a 'substantial risk' that visitors to Navy Pier would have their rights under the First, Fourth, and Fourteenth Amendments violated. . . Merely asserting that there will be 'predictable violations' of the Constitution because 'MPEA failed to adopt and implement any policy or policies limiting the actions of security personnel' does not make that allegation plausible.")

Stokes v. Ewing, No. 16 C 10621, 2017 WL 2224882, at *2-5 (N.D. Ill. May 22, 2017) ("In essence, Stokes is suing the City for instituting an implicit policy, custom, or practice that rewards officers in proportion to the number of guns confiscated and licenses the arrest of individuals on false charges unless they can obtain and turn over a gun. . . This policy, as applied to him, allegedly violated his rights under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . The City contends that Stokes' Complaint fatally lacks the requisite specificity to allege a plausible Monell claim. Conclusory and boilerplate allegations, the City points out, leave a complaint stranded. Further, the City argues that Stokes has not provided facts permitting an inference that the alleged policy was the driving force behind his injury – 'that a widespread reward system directed or even influenced the Defendant Officers' actions' – or that the City was deliberately indifferent to the effects of its policy. . . In addition, the City maintains that the Complaint fails to elevate what happened to Stokes and his co-arrestee above a 'random event,' because it does not identify other instances of the conduct claimed to be 'widespread.'. . Stokes, on the other hand, warns against applying a heightened pleading standard to Monell claims and notes that his Complaint sufficiently puts the City on notice of the factual basis for his suit. . . . Contrary to the City's facile assertion, 'deliberate indifference' is not an absolute pleading requirement for Monell claims. Rather, the Seventh Circuit has typically regarded it as an alternative to an implicit policy of the sort alleged here. . . . Here, . . . Stokes charges the City with active participation in maintaining a policy that itself licenses unconstitutional conduct. As such, 'deliberate indifference' is conceptually superfluous to the implicit policy alleged here, and Rule 8(a) does not require corresponding allegations in Stokes' Complaint. The City's most substantial attack on the Complaint concerns the absence of allegations beyond those relating to Stokes (and, ostensibly, his co-arrestee). This argument merits more consideration but is ultimately rejected in view of White v. City of Chicago, 829 F.3d 837 (7th Cir. 2016). . . . White was not required to 'identify every other or even one other individual who had been arrested pursuant to a warrant obtained through the complained-of process.'. . To be sure, at summary judgment, impropriety from a single incident may not give rise to liability on the sort of Monell claim at issue. . . But that was not the procedural posture in White, and it is not the situation presented here. Post-White courts analyzing Monell suits have scotched motions to dismiss premised on the same arguments as the City's. . . .In this case, Stokes alleges the City's complicity not in failing to train, supervise, or prevent misconduct, but in establishing a widespread custom or implicit policy that licenses unconstitutional conduct. A 'series of bad acts' is not required to state such a claim. . . Thus, Seventh Circuit precedent clearly maps the proper course here. Pursuant to White and Jackson, Stokes need not plead the factual circumstances of additional instances of misconduct pursuant to the alleged policy. Of course, the Court does not opine on Stokes' chances on the merits, but is merely content that Stokes' Complaint adequately meets the pleading requirements of Rule 8(a). Presented with no sound basis for dismissing Stokes' Monell claim, the Court denies the City's Motion to Dismiss.")

Clay v. Cook Cty., No. 14-CV-10515, 2017 WL 878451, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 6, 2017) ("Plaintiff's allegations are sufficient to state a Monell claim based on Defendants' alleged practice, custom, and/or policy of holding individuals beyond the constitutionally required time for a bond hearing (two days) where those individuals were being held for other charges. . . Plaintiff cites to (1) his own personal experience at the Cook County Jail; (2) alleged admissions made to Plaintiff by Cook County Jail personal; (3) alleged knowledge of other instances in which individuals being held for other charges were not provided a bond hearing within two days; and (4) another lawsuit in this district in which the same alleged policy, practice, and/or custom was raised. . .The Seventh Circuit case on which Defendants' motion to dismiss relies, McCauley, 671 F.3d 611, does not support dismissal of Plaintiff's Monell claim. In McCauley, the plaintiff failed to state a Monell claim against the City of Chicago for failure to maintain policies to protect victims of domestic violence from persons who violate parole or court orders, where the complaint contained no factual allegations supporting the plausibility of the claim, and the facts alleged were 'actually legal conclusions or elements of the cause of action.'. . Here, by contrast, Plaintiff cites not only his own experience at the Cook County Jail, but also the alleged experience of other inmates who were waited more than two days for a bond hearing when they were being held on other charges, alleged admissions from Cook County Jail personnel that this was its policy or practice, and another lawsuit alleging the same alleged policy or practice. From these allegations, the Court is able 'to draw the reasonable inference' that the Cook County Jail maintained a policy or practice that caused Plaintiff's alleged constitutional deprivation.")

Klinger v. City of Chicago, No. 15-CV-1609, 2017 WL 736895, at *16–18 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 24, 2017) ("The issue here is whether Plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to move beyond the pleadings stage on her Monell liability claim against Sheriff Kaupas. The Court holds that she has not. Plaintiff alleges in only a conclusory fashion that the Sheriff has 'a policy and/or custom ... to inadequately and improperly investigate citizen complaints of police misconduct,' and to 'inadequately supervise and train officers of the Will County Sheriff's Office, ... thereby failing to adequately discourage further constitutional violations on the part of these officers.'. . Her further allegation that 'Kaupas and other County policy makers are aware of, and condone and facilitate by their inaction, an environment within the Will County Sheriff's Office in which officers fail to report misconduct committed by other officers, such as the misconduct at issue in this case'. . . also is conclusory. No other facts alleged in the complaint regarding the Sheriff or the Sheriff's office are alleged from which the Court could infer a factual basis for these conclusory Monell allegations. . . . [C]ourts in this district generally dismiss Monell claims in which '[a]ll of the allegations in the Complaint pertain exclusively to [the plaintiff].'. . . Plaintiff makes no allegations about any similar incidents or complaints against Sheriff Kaupas from which the Court can infer that the Sheriff was at fault either for Griebel's use of force against Plaintiff or the alleged conspiracy to cover-up Griebel's identity after the assault occurred. To the extent that Plaintiff's Monell claim is based on a failure to train, supervise, and discipline, Plaintiff's allegations too are not supported by non-conclusory facts. . . . Plaintiff does not allege any similar constitutional violations by which a failure to train can plausibly be inferred. . . Absent any factual allegations that would give rise to a credible inference that Sheriff Kaupas's own conduct contributed to the alleged constitutional violations, Plaintiff's Monell claim against the Sheriff must be dismissed. . . .Unlike the allegations against Sheriff Kaupas, the factual allegations regarding a police cover-up involving at least two Chicago police officers at different times and places (Officer Maas, at the scene of the incident, and Detective Callaghan, a few days later when Plaintiff went to the station to file a criminal complaint against the person who assaulted her) nudge Plaintiff's Monell claim against the City of Chicago slightly closer to the pleading threshold of plausibly suggesting the existence of an informal policy or custom by which acts of misconduct of other law enforcement officers (Griebel) could be said to be tolerated. The two Chicago police officers in question are alleged to have intentionally misled Plaintiff with the joint purpose of thwarting Plaintiff's efforts to discover the identity of the officer who assaulted her, falsified information on a police report, and made threats of pursuing a criminal prosecution against Plaintiff if she continued her efforts. . . . This Court is not convinced that the involvement of the two police officers here is sufficient to implicate the City of Chicago as an entity. The second source of support for Plaintiff's Monell claim against the City of Chicago is found in LaPorta, 102 F. Supp. 3d at 1020-21. In that case, the court held that the plaintiff's Monell allegations of a widespread practice in the Chicago Police Department of 'failing to investigate, discipline, or otherwise hold accountable its police officers' to be plausible where the plaintiff had alleged that 'complaint registers' and 'repeater lists' made publicly available by order of the Illinois appellate court 'revealed that officer misconduct was prevalent within the CPD, but largely condoned, and to the extent possible, hidden from the public.'. . This information, however, is not specific enough for the Court to conclude that the type of police misconduct referenced in the LaPorta case (as shown in the publicly released complaint registers and repeater lists), is sufficiently similar to the allegations of police misconduct at issue here. . . Accordingly, the Court finds that the inference of a municipal unofficial policy or custom in this case is too weak based solely on the allegations of the current complaint, which do not involve allegations of other similar complaints or incidents. The Court cannot plausibly infer from the complaint that the actions of the defendant police officers are attributable to an informal policy or custom of the City of Chicago arising out of its deliberate indifference to similar events. . . For this reason, the Court concludes that Plaintiff's Monell claim against the City of Chicago must be dismissed.")

White v. Watson, No. 16-CV-560-JPG-DGW, 2016 WL 6277601, at *4 (S.D. Ill. Oct. 27, 2016) ("Here, the plaintiff has alleged that the policies – including the policy to have no policy – and widespread practices of the St. Clair County Sheriff's Department listed above were the moving force behind the failure to protect Scarpi from the known risk of suicide in the Jail. This is sufficient to state a § 1983 claim under Monell for deliberate indifference to a detainee's safety needs. That fourteen suicides attempts in the Jail were, for one reason or another, unsuccessful does not foreclose the possibility that inadequate policies amounted to a constitutional violation.

Additionally, the plaintiff's failure to allege the specific aspects of the existing Jail staff training that are inadequate will not render the Amended Complaint insufficient as to Count II.")

Cheatham v. City of Chicago, No. 16-CV-3015, 2016 WL 6217091, at *6–7 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 25, 2016) ("Plaintiff alleges that the City had an official policy involving the use of excessive force. 'An official policy or custom may be established by means of [1] an express policy, [2] a widespread practice which, although unwritten, is so entrenched and well-known as to carry the force of policy, or [3] through the actions of an individual who possesses the authority to make final policy decisions on behalf of the municipality or corporation.' Rice ex rel. Rice v. Corr. Med. Servs., 675 F.3d 650, 675 (7th Cir. 2012). Plaintiff appears to allege an express policy: 'Defendant City of Chicago planned and implemented a policy, practice, custom and usage of interrogating person[s], that was designed to and did preempt lawful activities by illegally detaining persons, using excessive force against persons, retaliating against witnesses to police misconduct, and discouraging police officers from reporting the misconduct of other officers.'. . However, Plaintiff does not allege anything more than that such a policy exists. Conclusory allegations of a 'policy or practice' in support of a Monell claim 'are not factual allegations and as such contribute nothing to the plausibility analysis under Twombly /Iqbal.' McCauley, 671 F.3d at 617-18. Plaintiff also alleges that the City had a policy of inadequately training, supervising, and disciplining police officers. A failure to train or supervise employees rises to the level of an official policy or custom only where that failure to train amounts to 'deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the untrained employees come into contact.'. .Plaintiff has alleged that, prior to February 22, 2015, the City of Chicago was aware of several complaints of police misconduct involving the use of excessive force and numerous claims of constitutional violations involving Medina specifically. Plaintiff also alleges that the City inadequately and improperly investigated citizen complaints of police misconduct and instead tolerated that misconduct. The allegations that the City knew about, failed to properly investigate, and tolerated misconduct raises a plausible claim that the City was deliberately indifferent through a policy or custom of inadequately training, supervising, and disciplining police officers. The City of Chicago's Motion to Dismiss Count III is granted to the extent that Plaintiff alleges an express policy and denied to the extent that Plaintiff alleges the City was deliberately indifferent and had a policy or custom of inadequately training, supervising, and disciplining police officers.")

Collier v. Ledbetter, No. 4:14-CV-4103-SLD-JEH, 2016 WL 5796765, at *4–6 (C.D. Ill. Sept. 30, 2016) ("To demonstrate municipal liability under the second prong of Monell, a custom-or-practice theory, a plaintiff must show that the municipality's widespread custom or practice was the 'moving force' behind his injury. . . The Seventh Circuit has declined to adopt any 'bright-line rules defining a widespread custom or practice.'. . Nor has it reached a conclusion as to 'how frequently [unconstitutional conduct] must occur to impose Monell liability, except that it must be more than one instance, or even three.'. . Ultimately, a plaintiff must persuade the finder of fact 'that there is a policy at issue rather than a random event.'. .To successfully plead a custom-or-practice Monell claim, a plaintiff must also plead facts suggesting actual or constructive notice on behalf of the municipality—that is, the custom or practice alleged must be 'so persistent and widespread that ... policymakers should have known about the behavior.'. . Where a municipality is alleged to have acquiesced to a harmful practice or custom, the plaintiff will ultimately have to show that policymakers were 'deliberately indifferent' to the harm the custom or practice might precipitate. . . A policymaker will be deemed deliberately indifferent 'where the plainly obvious consequence of [his or her] decision ... would be the deprivation of a third party's federally protected right.'. . . A well-pleaded custom-or-practice Monell claim will not only 'identify a custom or policy' as the source of a plaintiff's injury but also 'specify what exactly that custom or policy was.'. . Offering as non-conclusory factual support merely the circumstantial weight of five supposedly unconstitutional arrests (none of which, as pleaded, have resulted in an adjudication of guilt or liability for the City), Collier leaves it to the Court to infer that the Rock Island Police Department's hiring, training, investigation and disciplinary practices are not only substandard but also the causal forces behind all of these incidents, such that the City should be held liable for its acquiescence. This is not a reasonable inference, and Collier's shotgun suggestion of allegedly faulty practices cannot be relied upon to bridge the gap. To successfully plead that the City's assent to deficient police practices caused his injury and the four others he describes in his amended complaint, Collier would need to plead facts that illustrate those deficiencies and not just their purported consequences. . . District courts in the Seventh Circuit have adopted a similar requirement for specificity. For instance, the Northern District of Illinois granted a defendant village's motion to dismiss a custom-or-practice Monell claim where the plaintiff's allegations comprised 'completely conclusory, throw-it-against-the-wall-and-see-what-sticks language,' failing to state a specific policy or practice for which the municipalities could be held liable. . . Arguably, to require Collier to specify more narrowly the custom or practice that could entail the City's Monell liability raises the concern that without the benefit of discovery, he may be foreclosed from acquiring the information he needs to draft a sufficient pleading. The Seventh Circuit has acknowledged this reservation, reasoning nevertheless that under less stringent Monell pleading requirements 'all counsel would need to do would be to concoct some explanation of [a] plaintiff's injury that implicated the municipality—for example, a custom and practice of hiring as police officers those with a history of brutality—and the doors of the federal courtroom would swing open.' Strauss, 760 F.2d at 769. In addition to inadequately identifying an injurious custom or practice, Collier has failed to plead facts sufficient to fulfill Monell's notice requirement. He has not plausibly alleged that City policymakers deliberately disregarded the plain and obvious consequences of the custom or practice, or that it was so 'persistent and widespread' that policymakers should have been aware of it. . . Although Collier repeatedly alleges that the City's improper police training, inadequate investigation, ineffective discipline and insufficient hiring are 'pervasive practice[s],'. . . the allegation of their pervasiveness is a conclusory assertion merely echoing Monell's 'widespread and well-settled' requirement. It is not entitled to the presumption of truth. Setting aside this blanket allegation, the Court is again left to weigh only the facts pleaded in the accounts of the arrests of Derrell Dickerson, Airlyn Powell, Leonard Robinson, Darrin Langford and Collier himself. Pleading isolated incidents of municipal misconduct is generally insufficient to establish a 'widespread custom or practice.'. . Collier has not alleged that every arrest made by one of the City's officers—or even a substantial percentage thereof—results in a constitutional injury. On the contrary, he has alleged that excessive force was exercised in five of the presumably hundreds of arrests made by Rock Island police between 2011 and 2015—and done so in such a way as to raise no other inference than that lawsuits were filed, in itself no indicator of unconstitutional behavior by the police. The inference cannot reasonably be drawn from these accounts that any excessive force exercised against these individuals was a product any practice or custom that the City should have or would have identified and remedied had it not been deliberately indifferent. Rather, these facts, even if each and every officer in each alleged case had in fact engaged in constitutional violations, plausibly establish only the isolated misconduct of five individual officers. Because Collier does not plead facts that plausibly establish a specific City custom or practice that served as the moving force behind his constitutional injury, and because he fails to support his claim with allegations plausibly suggesting that the forceful arrest he suffered was the product of a pervasive pattern of misconduct toward which the City was deliberately indifferent, Collier's amended complaint fails to adequately state a custom-or-practice Monell claim. The City's motion to dismiss the Monell claim in Collier's amended complaint is granted.")

Lee v. Woodlawn Cmty. Dev. Corp., No. 14 C 06511, 2016 WL 2997902, at *5 (N.D. Ill. May 25, 2016) ("[T]he Amended Complaint fails to allege that anyone at the CHA was aware that Woodlawn Community employees failed to reasonably accommodate disabled residents. In Pindak v. Cook County, the district court dismissed a Monell claim because the plaintiff failed to adequately allege that the Public Housing Commission 'was aware that First Amendment violations were likely, but deliberately chose not to train employees.'. . The Public Building Commission had contracted with third-parties. . . to provide security officers on Chicago's Daley Plaza and the plaintiff alleged that these officers 'routinely interfere[d] with his peaceful panhandling activity ....'. . . .The district court observed that the plaintiff failed to assert 'that anyone at [Public Building Commission] had knowledge that Securitas officers allegedly interfered with Plaintiff's panhandling,' or 'any specific facts about the training [Public Building Commission] employees or agents received.'. . Because '[n]othing in the record suggest[ed] that [Public Building Commission] made a deliberate choice not to train employees about obvious constitutional threats,' the district court dismissed the plaintiff's Monell claim. . . Like the plaintiff in Pintak, Lee does not allege in his Amended Complaint that the CHA was aware that Fourteenth Amendment violations were likely, yet deliberately chose not to train Woodlawn Community's employees. And as in Pintak, the Amended Complaint is void of any facts about the training that CHA employees and agents received. In sum, the Monell claims cannot stand without any factual basis from which to plausibly infer that the CHA was deliberately indifferent to the need for training. Counts Seven and Eight must be dismissed.")

Foy ex rel Haynie, Jr. v. City of Chicago, No. 15 C 3720, 2016 WL 2770880, at *9-10 (N.D. Ill. May 12, 2016) ("Plaintiff's failure-to-train allegations also do not pass muster because they are boilerplate and lack any supporting facts. . . .Plaintiff's allegations of a failure to discipline are also boilerplate and lacking in detail. . . .Plaintiff succeeds in repeating all of the trigger words required of a Monell claim but absolutely no factual content to demonstrate a widespread practice of failing to adequately punish prior instances of similar misconduct. . . .Because Plaintiff has already taken discovery on this claim and after six iterations of her claims has yet to sufficiently state a Monell claim, Plaintiff's Monell claim against the City is dismissed with prejudice.")

Brown v. Evans, No. 15 C 2844, 2016 WL 69629, at *3-5 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 6, 2016) ("Brown's allegations in his Monell claim are focused first on Evans' actions; however, 'a single isolated incident of wrongdoing by a nonpolicymaker is generally insufficient to establish municipal acquiescence in unconstitutional conduct.'. . And Brown's boilerplate policy and practice statements contain no facts that would allow a plausible inference that the City has a practice or policy of failing to train, supervise, or discipline or condones a 'code of silence.'. . Even considering the Complaint in the light most favorable to Brown, the allegations of the City's policy and practice claims are too vague and lacking in sufficient details to give proper notice of their basis. . . In support of his Monell pleading, Brown asks the Court to take notice of additional facts and a newspaper article submitted with his Response. . . In opposing a motion to dismiss, a plaintiff 'may submit materials outside the pleadings to illustrate the facts the party expects to be able to prove' and 'elaborate on his factual allegations so long as the new elaborations are consistent with the pleadings' without converting the motion to one for summary judgment. . . First Brown states that in September 2014 Evans was charged with two felonies for assault on a suspect and was relieved of his duties pending the outcome of that case. This fact supports the Complaint's allegations of misconduct by Evans. The City argues this fact entirely undercuts a theory of failure to discipline; however, Evans served for over ten years before being removed from the force, which could support a theory that the Department 'turned a blind eye' to his conduct until a criminal charge forced the issue. Second, the attached newspaper editorial questions why, with Evans' history of citizen complaints, the Police Department continued to promote him. This article intimates that the Department approved of Evans' 'aggressive policing style' because it resulted in a drop in the homicide rate. . . Again, this relates directly to Evans' actions and the Department's view of his actions. However, it could also support an inference that Evans is one example of a wider failure to discipline. Similarly, Evans' history of citizen complaints and civil rights lawsuits supports Brown's theory that Evans is a bad actor and shows that the Department disciplined Evans in two out of at least forty-five excessive force complaints in a ten-year span. Although a municipality 'cannot be held liable solely because it employs a tortfeasor,'. . . this long history of complaints without corresponding discipline edges the Complaint toward a policies or practice claim. . . . Brown has not clearly stated the linkage between Evans' alleged violations and his Monell claim. He must do so to provide the City sufficient notice of the basis for these allegations. . .The failure to supervise and discipline claims are therefore dismissed without prejudice to re-plead. But none of Brown's new facts support even a stretched inference of a failure to train. . . . Although Monell claims may proceed with conclusory allegations of a policy or practice, some facts must be pleaded to put the defendant on notice of the alleged wrongdoing. . . Brown has not indicated any facts to support a failure to train claim. This aspect of his Monell claim is also dismissed without prejudice and with leave to re-plead. Brown also directs the Court's attention to another case pending against Evans in the Northern District, stating the Monell claim survived dismissal there and has proceeded to discovery. Because the City has already engaged in Monell discovery in that case, Brown argues that it would not be inconvenient for it to do so here. The allegations of a different complaint involving different facts and actors are irrelevant to Brown's claims before this Court. . . Furthermore, the Court is disturbed by Brown's characterization that the Monell claim in that case was found to be sufficient, when in fact that court did not consider the sufficiency of pleading or the merits of that claim. . . Furthermore, that discovery proceeded on the Monell claim in that case has no bearing on the sufficiency of Brown's pleadings. The City's Motion to Dismiss the Monell claim is granted. Count XII is dismissed without prejudice.")

Duff v. Grandberry, No. 14 C 8967, 2015 WL 9259844, at *2-3 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 18, 2015) ("Here, Duff alleges that Grandberry and Reilly violated his constitutional rights by using unreasonable and excessive force to arrest him. . . He further alleges that Maywood's use-of-force policy 'allows the use of any degree of force so long as it does not result in death to effect an arrest regardless of whether the arrestee poses a threat of physical harm to themselves or the officer, regardless of whether the arrestee is resisting arrest and regardless of whether the arrestee was trying to escape.'. . Thus, Duff contends that Maywood's official policy on the use of nondeadly force was the 'moving force' behind the violation of his federally protected right. . . At the pleading stage, these allegations are sufficient to state a viable Monell claim. . . . [A]s alleged in the Amended Complaint, Maywood's use-of-force policy does indicate that '[a]n officer is justified in using force less than deadly force when the officer reasonably believes it is necessary [t]o effect an arrest.'. . But Supreme Court precedent requires that the officer consider the totality of circumstances, including 'the severity of the crime at issue, whether the suspect poses an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, and whether he is actively resisting arrest of attempting to evade arrest by flight,' in determining whether the amount of force to effect an arrest is reasonable. . . Thus, while it is an extremely close call, viewing the allegations in the complaint and all reasonable inferences therefrom in the light most favorable to Duff, as the Court must at the pleading stage, the Court declines to dismiss Count IV.")

Maldonado v. City of Hammond, Ind., No. 214CV310-PPS, 2015 WL 1780133, at *1-3 (N.D. Ind. Apr. 20, 2015) ("This is a § 1983 case in which, according to the complaint, Norma Maldonado's dog (Lilly) was shot and killed by Hammond Police Officer Timothy Kreischer in the presence of two of Ms. Maldonado's minor children. . . . Maldonado alleges that the city had no training in place on how officers should handle barking dogs and that Kreisher was not disciplined for shooting Lilly. Where a total absence of training is alleged concerning as common and ordinary a scenario as barking dogs encountered on patrol, and lethal force was used with no apparent question of its appropriateness by the police department, I find that the failure to train claim (including facts in support of the deliberate indifference prong) has been pled with adequate specificity. To make the 'context-specific' plausibility determination required by Twombly/Iqbal, I draw on my 'judicial experience and common sense.'. . I conclude that Maldonado has pled sufficient 'details about the subject-matter of the case to present a story that holds together' and to permit a reasonable inference that the city is liable on a failure to train theory.")

Hoskin v. City of Milwaukee*,* 994 F.Supp.2d 972, 977, 978 (E.D. Wis. 2014) ("At the outset, the Court must note that Monell claims are subject to the pleading standard set out by the Supreme Court in the Twombly and Iqbal cases and discussed more fully by the Court, above. . .This is an important note because the plaintiff asserts that a liberal pleading standard applies to Monell cases. . . Specifically, the plaintiff asserts that Seventh Circuit precedent allows Monell claims to escape dismissal even when they are 'based on relatively conclusory allegations.'. . Prior to the issuance of the Iqbal and Twombly decisions, it may very well have been possible to state only 'boilerplate allegations,' and survive dismissal in § 1983 cases. . . But, in the time since, the Seventh Circuit has not returned to such a liberal pleading standard. . . In fact, the Seventh Circuit has made clear that Iqbal applies to motions to dismiss in Monell cases, just as it would apply in any other case. . . In that way, under McCauley, the Court must disregard conclusory and boilerplate statements in the pleadings to determine whether, without those, the plaintiff has alleged sufficient factual matter to state a claim for relief that is plausible on its face. . . In other words, there is no liberal pleading standard applicable to Monell claims; rather, the Court must apply Iqbal and Twombly just as it would in evaluating most other claims. However, it is also important to note that this principle swings the other way, too: the Court does not apply a heightened pleading standard to civil rights claims, including Monell claims. . . The Seventh Circuit released its decision in Estate of Sims after the Supreme Court had already issued its Twombly decision. . . Thus, presumably, the Seventh Circuit was aware that the Supreme Court had at least hinted at a change in the Rule 8(a) pleading standard in Twombly, and yet the Seventh Circuit nonetheless declined to apply a heightened pleading standard to Monell claims. . . Moreover, even though Estate of Sims pre-dates Iqbal, the Court has not found any case law following either case that calls into question the proposition that Monell claims are not subject to heightened pleading standards. In fact, district court cases from around the Circuit continue to cite Estate of Sims for precisely that proposition. . .The Seventh Circuit, itself, continues to cite the case approvingly for other purposes in § 1983 litigation, and has never questioned the conclusion that Monell claims are not subject to a heightened pleading standard. . . For this reason, the Court must not apply a heightened pleading standard to the plaintiff's Monell claim. Of course—as with practically all of the case law in this area—there is a further qualification that applies to that conclusion. Recently, the Seventh Circuit reaffirmed McCauley's holding that, for pleadings, ' "the degree of specificity required ... rises with the complexity of the claim."'. . Thus, while there is not a heightened pleading requirement for Monell claims, per se, the Court must also beware to apply a pleading standard that requires a degree of specificity to meet the complexity of such a claim. In essence, all of this is a roundabout way of stating that the Court will apply the standard described in Iqbal and Twombly to the plaintiff's Monell claim. Nothing more and nothing less. It will not apply a heightened pleading standard, but it also will not apply an unduly liberal pleading standard, either.") Hoskin v. City of Milwaukee, 994 F.Supp.2d 972, 980-83 (E.D. Wis. 2014) ("To state a widespread practice claim under Monell, the plaintiff must allege 'facts tending to show that the City policymakers were aware of the behavior of officers, or that the activity was so persistent and widespread that City policymakers should have known about the behavior.'. . The City, however, cannot be liable unless that policy, 'although not authorized by written law and express policy, is so permanent and well-settled as to constitute a "custom or usage" with the force of law'. . . It is necessary that there be some 'true municipal policy at issue, not a random event.'. . . Thus, in order to find a widespread policy, the Supreme Court, in City of Canton v. Harris, and the Seventh Circuit, in other cases, have both looked for circumstances demonstrating that municipal officials were deliberately indifferent to known or obvious consequences of the municipality's action or inaction. . .The plaintiff can plead this deliberate indifference by alleging facts that would establish 'either (1) failure to provide adequate training in light of foreseeable consequences; or (2) failure to act in response to repeated complaints of constitutional violations by its officers.'. . But, whatever the evidence of deliberate indifference, the plaintiff 'must also show a direct causal connection between the policy or practice and his injury, in other words that the policy or custom was "the moving force [behind] the constitutional violation."'. . This is a tall order to fill; even so, the plaintiff has alleged facts sufficient to do so. The plaintiff's factual allegations, taken as true, adequately state a claim that is plausible on its face, and thus dismissal of the plaintiff's Monell claim against the City would be inappropriate at this time. Most importantly, the plaintiff has sufficiently alleged that the City received numerous complaints of illegal searches prior to the incident in question. . . The defendants assert that these allegations are insufficient because they 'fail to assert any facts pertaining to the time, place, or identity of the individuals involved with the other complaints of unlawful searches.'. . This, the defendants argue, means that the plaintiff has failed 'to plead facts which establish that the complaints of other unlawful searches occurred before the subject incident of December 16, 2011.'. . This argument fails for two reasons. First, the plaintiff quite clearly alleged that such complaints were made '[a]s early as 2008.'. . The complaint also discusses that the MPD 'had been receiving complaints for several years before' opening its own investigation. . . On this basis, the Court can draw the reasonable inference, . . . that the plaintiff is alleging that the MPD and the City had received similar complaints prior to the subject incident. Second, the Court does not believe it is necessary for the plaintiff to have pled specifics like the time, place, or identity of the other complaints. General allegations that the City and MPD received complaints is enough to give rise to an inference that its officials had knowledge that other, similar illegal searches were occurring. Frankly, specifics like time, place, and identity would add very little in the way of substance to the allegations of the complaint. Moreover, the plaintiff would not possibly have access to that information without discovery. Finally, the Court reiterates that it should not apply a heightened pleading standard in Monell claims, e.g., Estate of Sims, 506 F.3d at 514; this is not a case that falls under Rule 9 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, such that it must be pled with particularity. For these reasons, the Court finds that the plaintiff's allegations support the conclusion that the City had received complaints of illegal searches prior to the subject incident. Having received those complaints, the City necessarily had knowledge or notice that aggressive searches were occurring and was deliberately indifferent. However, rather than training and disciplining its officers or investigating complaints, the City instead occasionally commended its aggressive officers and ignored or rejected the complaints. . . An obvious consequence of these actions would be for aggressive searches to continue and escalate, such that the City could be found deliberately indifferent if the plaintiff's allegations are true. . . Indeed, the plaintiff alleges that the City not only failed to provide adequate training in light of foreseeable consequences, but also that it failed to act in response to repeated complaints of constitutional violations by its officers, such that he has adequately alleged that the City was deliberately indifferent. . .Finally, the Court points out that, taking the plaintiff's allegations as true, the City's alleged widespread policies ultimately caused the deprivation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights. As the Court has already noted, whatever the evidence of deliberate indifference, the plaintiff 'must also show a direct causal connection between the policy or practice and his injury, in other words that the policy or custom was "the moving force [behind] the constitutional violation."'. . The plaintiff has alleged facts to meet this requirement. At the very least, the Court can infer, . . that the alleged policies were a but-for cause of the plaintiff's injuries, because if the City had, for instance, taken steps to investigate the offending officers, it could have found that they were responsible for other similar incidents and removed them from the force. Likewise, if the City had better disciplined or trained its officers (or perhaps not encouraged them to conduct aggressive searches), it is likely that the officers in question would not have illegally stopped the plaintiff's car, illegally searched the plaintiff, or illegally arrested him. The plaintiff has, therefore, pled facts sufficient to plausibly allege that the City's policies were the moving force behind the constitutional deprivation that he suffered. To be sure, the plaintiff's complaint is not a model of clarity in relation to his Monell claim: some of its assertions are vague and border on the sort of conclusory statements that the Court can disregard . . . . At this stage of the proceedings, the Court is obliged to deny the defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings on the plaintiff's Monell claim against the City.")

Listenbee v. City of Harvey, No. 11 C 03031, 2013 WL 5567552, *3-*5 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 9, 2013) ("Despite disclaiming any responsibility to provide evidence at the pleading stage, Listenbee attaches to his response brief a 2012 report from the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice, which investigated the use of force by Harvey police officers and made findings and recommendations to improve 'serious deficiencies' that 'create an unreasonable risk that constitutional violations will occur.'. . This letter is properly considered in support of Listenbee's claims at the motion-to-dismiss stage. In opposing a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, a plaintiff may elaborate on his factual allegations, so long as the new elaborations are consistent with the pleadings, and may submit materials outside the pleadings to illustrate the facts he expects to be able to prove. Geinosky v. Chicago, 675 F.3d 743, 746 n.1 (7th Cir.2012) (citing numerous cases). Indeed, the Seventh Circuit has advised that, in the wake of Twombly and Iqbal, a plaintiff 'who can provide such illustration may find it prudent to do so.' Id. Here, the DOJ letter lends plausibility to Listenbee's allegations that his beating was not an isolated incident but the product of systemic shortcomings. . . The same is true for the denial of medical care claim, here governed by the Fourteenth Amendment's due process guarantee, rather than the Eighth Amendment, although the 'deliberate indifference' standard applies either way. . . Listenbee contends that the detainees at the Harvey jail are 'routinely' denied medical care. According to the complaint this routine practice is attributable to the absence of an appropriate system for accurately documenting and administering medical and medication needs, observing the health status of detainees, and promptly reviewing medical requests from detainees, among other shortcomings. . . The DOJ letter suggests that Harvey officers routinely fail to state whether arrestees 'sustained any injuries or received medical care,' which lends plausibility to Listenbee's allegations that Harvey lacks systems for appropriately acknowledging and documenting arrestee's injuries, let alone providing access to medical care for them. The DOJ letter also recommends that the Harvey police department make it a policy to have supervisors report to the scene of any arrest involving the use of force that caused serious injury, 'to ensure that all injured are provided care.' Again, this bolsters Listenbee's allegation that in 2010, the Harvey police did not have policies that ensured all injured arrestees were provided care. . . Listenbee's deliberate indifference claim is also rendered plausible by the allegations regarding his own experience while locked up in the Harvey jail. For instance, he alleges that multiple police officers or staff saw his condition and failed to provide any help or relief. He alleges that he complained to anyone within hearing distance that he was in severe pain, and he was either ignored or told that nothing could be done for him. These allegations permit the inference that, rather than being an isolated incident, Listenbee's experience at the jail was the product of a policy of indifference to the health of detainees. . . . Because the complaint plausibly alleges that de facto policies of the City caused his injuries arising from the use of excessive force and subsequent denial of medical care, the City of Harvey's motion to dismiss the plaintiff's Monell claims is denied.")

Sacks v. Niles Tp. High Schools, Dist. 219, No. 12 C 4553, 2013 WL 3989297, *2, *3 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 2, 2013) ("District 219 contends that Sacks's claim should be dismissed because he has not identified which Monell prong he is pursuing and, regardless, he failed to set forth the basis for his Monell claim. Sacks, however, is not held to a heightened standard in pleading a Monell claim, even after Twombly and Iqbal. . . Sacks's failure to explicitly identify the Monell prong is not fatal to his claim against District 219, for a plaintiff need not plead legal theories if the alleged facts are sufficient to show that the claim is plausible. . . Moreover, Sacks clarified in his response that he is arguing that District 219 maintains an express policy—the school code—that when enforced, as alleged here, causes a constitutional deprivation. Although the specific details of the policy are lacking, Sacks has sufficiently provided defendants with notice of the alleged wrongdoing, citing to Heintz's testimony in the 2012 administrative hearings.")

Ingoldsby v. Triplett, No. 12–681–GPM, 2013 WL 3337841, *3, *4 (S.D. Ill. July 2, 2013) ("Plaintiffs' amendment fails to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face because Plaintiffs have simply tacked on a bare policy allegation to their already deficient complaint. . . While a heightened pleading standard is not required to state a Monell claim against a municipality, Leatherman v. Tarrant County, 507 U.S. 163, 164, (1993), a plaintiff cannot simply allege the existence of a policy or practice. Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 678, (2009). The plaintiff 'must do more than merely parrot the language of Monell' to state a claim. . . Plaintiffs' proposed amendment is utterly devoid of any facts plausibly establishing that the policy or custom actually exists. Plaintiffs' allegations are based soley on their own experience, and there is nothing to suggest that any other similar incidents have occurred. Thus, at best, Plaintiffs allegations support an isolated incident of improper conduct unrelated to municipal policy. Since Plaintiffs' amendment fails to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face, leave to amend is denied.")

Stacey v. Peoria County, Ill., No. 13–CV–1051, 2013 WL 3279997, *6, *7 (C.D. Ill. June 27, 2013) ("The Leatherman Court held that courts may not impose a heightened pleading standard for § 1983 municipal liability cases beyond that which is required of all cases under Rule 8. . . This Court is following Leatherman and is not imposing a heightened pleading standard. This Court is applying the pleading standard announced by in the Supreme Court in Twombly and Iqbal which applies to all cases in federal court subject to the pleading standards in Rule 8. . . This Court is properly applying the principles announced in Leatherman, and so, is not refusing to apply controlling precedent. . . .Stacey must meet the generally applicable pleading standards announced in Twombly and Iqbal in order to state a claim. Stacey's municipal liability claim fails to meet that standard.")

Jacoby v. DuPage County Ill., No. 12 CV 6539, 2013 WL 3233339, *2, *3 (N.D. Ill. June 26, 2013) ("Because Jacoby has sued the Sheriff only in his official capacity, the court need only consider whether he has sufficiently pleaded a Monell claim against him. . . Jacoby is not held to a heightened standard in pleading a Monell claim, even after Twombly and Iqbal. . . . Jacoby first argues that he has stated a claim because the County and the Sheriff have admitted in their motion to dismiss that the Sheriff is the final policymaking authority for the jail. Further, Jacoby alleges that '[t]he policies and customs at the DuPage County Jail failed to safeguard' him. . . Although vague, Jacoby does allege that he suffered an injury at the hands of unknown officers or jail guards, that he complained of this injury to various jail employees, and that his injury went untreated for two days because of a failure to properly address the medical needs of detainees. . . .Lacking access to information, Jacoby is not in a position to allege whether the Sheriff was aware of his injury or of the alleged failure to treat that injury, or whether the Sheriff actively condoned the failure. Nor is Jacoby likely to be privy to information about other instances of detainees with similar experience. Nonetheless, he does allege that he made repeated complaints over an 11–day period and that he was repeatedly denied medical care. This series of incidents at least minimally permits the inference that there was a widespread practice that had the force of policy to disregard the legitimate medical needs of detainees. . .The motion to dismiss this claim against the Sheriff is denied.")

Ford v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., No. 12 C 4558, 2013 WL 474494, *9 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 7, 2013) ("In the motion to dismiss, Wexford argues that Ford has failed to allege a custom or practice of deliberate indifference to his medical needs. Despite Wexford's argument to the contrary, Ford has alleged a widespread practice among Wexford employees of delaying medical treatment that caused him unnecessary pain and suffering. . . Specifically, he alleges facts showing a custom or practice of: (1) delayed delivery of medical permits . . . ; failure to administer medication or administration of ineffective medication . . . ; and delayed scheduling of medical appointments . . . . Viewing these allegations in a light most favorable to Ford, taking as true all well-pleaded factual allegations and making all possible inferences from the allegations in Ford's favor, these allegations support a permissible inference that Wexford has a widespread custom or practice of treating inmates' medical needs with deliberate indifference. . . Because Ford has sufficiently alleged a Monell claim that is plausible on its face under the federal notice pleading standards, the Court denies Wexford's motion to dismiss.")

Winchester v. Marketti, No. 11 CV 9224, 2012 WL 2076375, at *4 & n.3 (N.D. Ill. June 8, 2012) ("The precise pleading requirements for failure to train claims in the post-Iqbal world are not entirely clear. On the one hand, failure to train claims are clearly not subject to a heightened pleading standard over and above Rule 8. [citing Leatherman] On the other hand, given its 'nebulous' nature, . . . it would seem that a relatively high level of factual specificity is required at the pleading stage to make a failure to train claim facially plausible. . . The instant Complaint is sorely lacking in factual specificity. No details are given as to when Plaintiff began suffering seizures, how many seizures he suffered, how long the seizures lasted, when he notified Defendants of his condition, or whether any Defendants actually observed him having a seizure. Nevertheless, as discussed in greater detail below, I am allowing most of the individual claims through. What is fatal to the Monell claims, however, is that Plaintiff makes no attempt to plead a pattern of similar constitutional violations with any degree of factual specificity. . . .I cannot say precisely where the facial plausibility line should be drawn for post- Iqbal failure to train claims. But I can say with a fairly high degree of certainty-particularly in light of the Supreme Court's recent ruling in Connick, emphasizing the 'tenuous' nature of failure to train liability and the need to demonstrate a pattern of recurring constitutional violations-that this complaint falls short of that line. . . The claims against Grundy County, CHC and HPL are dismissed without prejudice. Plaintiff may replead against these Defendants in a more fact-specific manner. Of particular importance, Plaintiff must give more details concerning other similar constitutional violations that have occurred at the Grundy County Jail such that Defendants' deliberate indifference to the consequences of a failed training program can be plausibly inferred. . . . To be clear, Connick is not about pleading standards. However, the opinion makes clear that the Supreme Court considers a failure to train claim to be among the most difficult theories for a § 1983 Plaintiff to prevail under because of its factual complexity. If Iqbal plausibility operates as a sliding scale based on the inherent complexity of a claim, as the Seventh Circuit has suggested it does, . . . then failure to train claims demand a relatively high level of factual specificity at the pleading stage.")

Adams v. City of Chicago, No. 06 C 4856, 2011 WL 4628703, at *1, *2 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 29, 2011) ("Defendant City of Chicago argues that Plaintiffs fail to state a proper Monell claim. A municipality or other local government may be liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 'if the governmental body itself "subjects" a person to a deprivation of rights or "causes" a person "to be subjected" to such deprivation.'. . To properly state a Monell claim, a plaintiff must allege that: '(1) the City had an express policy that, when enforced, causes a constitutional deprivation; (2) the City had a widespread practice that, although not authorized by written law or express municipal policy, is so permanent and well settled as to constitute a custom or usage within the force of law; or (3) plaintiff's constitutional injury was caused by a person with final policymaking authority.'. . Plaintiffs allege that Defendant City of Chicago violated their constitutional rights pursuant to widespread practices: (1) that the City failed to properly train, supervise, discipline, and control its officers; (2) that the City failed to identify and respond to officers who repeatedly engaged in patterns of misconduct, including the Special Operations Section; (3) that through its inaction the City condoned and facilitated a 'code of silence' in the Chicago Police Department; and (4) that Defendant Officers had and continued to engage in a pattern of misconduct similar to the misconduct against Plaintiffs. Further, Plaintiffs allege that these practices were known by municipal policy-makers of the City both before and after Plaintiffs' arrests. Defendant City of Chicago argues that these allegations are insufficient because they make broad and generalized allegations without identifying the specific custom, policy, or practice of which they complain. The Court disagrees. The Court finds these allegations sufficient to satisfy Twombly and its progeny.")

Knapp v. City of Markham, No. 1:11-CV-00093-DLB PC, 2011 WL 3489788, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 9, 2011) ("With respect to the City of Markham, Knapp's complaint adequately alleges municipal liability. Plaintiffs in a § 1983 suit against a municipality need not meet any heightened pleading standards, but must only comply with conventional pleading standards. . . Throughout his complaint, Knapp alleges that the City of Markham 'has a pervasive and unconstitutional custom, practice, and policy of condoning discrimination against nonAfrican-American employees.'. . He claims that the City has intentionally targeted and discriminated against Caucasian employees for years and lists examples of other employees who have filed complaints. . . Knapp alleges that the City Council appointed an African-American to the position of Deputy Chief after the Defendants demoted Knapp because of his race. . . This allegation is in line with Knapp's broader claim that the City of Markham maintains a practice of treating African-American employees more favorably than Caucasian and other non-African-American employees. Knapp's allegations are sufficient to state a claim of municipal liability at this stage.")

Roberts v. City of Indianapolis, No. 1:10-cv-1436-TWP-DML, 2011 WL 2443672, at *2, *3 (S.D. Ind. June 14, 2011) ("Plaintiff's Monell-related allegations are fairly scant, limited to two statements: the Chief of Police (1) failed 'to take corrective action with respect to police personnel, whose vicious propensities were notorious' and (2) 'failed to assure proper training and supervision of the personnel, or to implement meaningful procedures to discourage lawless official conduct.'. . These bare-bones assertions, Defendants argue, fail to state a plausible claim that the City has a custom, policy, or practice which caused Plaintiff's alleged constitutional deprivation. This argument is well-taken. That said, it is also important to note that the Supreme Court has expressly rejected heightened pleading standards for Section 1983 claims against a municipality. [citing Leatherman]And, significantly, even after Twombly and Iqbal, district courts in the Seventh Circuit have affirmed this principle, holding that plaintiffs are not required to plead specific facts to prove the existence of a municipal policy. [collecting cases] Here, Plaintiff has alleged that he suffered injuries after police officers locked him in a police car without air conditioning and with the windows closed. The clear upshot of Plaintiff's allegations is that this injury was a consequence of the City's failure 'to assure proper training and supervision' and 'implement meaningful procedures' to discourage officer misconduct. At bottom, the Court finds that Plaintiff has, by the slimmest of margins, stated a plausible Monell claim.")

Suber v. City of Chicago, No. 10 C 2876, 2011 WL 1706156, at *4 (N.D. Ill. May 5, 2011) ("It's worth repeating that the Court does not apply a heightened pleading standard to § 1983 cases (or, for that matter, to any other claims that fall outside Rule 9(b) or statutes that required heightened pleading). But Iqbal and Twombly do instruct that '[d] etermining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will ... be a context-specific task....'. . . . Suber is trying to state a claim against a municipality for a failure to train, which requires the high-culpability standard of deliberate indifference to the deprivation of a constitutional right. On top of that, the underlying constitutional right asserted by Suber (as best as can be deciphered) is substantive due process, specifically, conscience-shocking executive action in the context of an injury inflicted on a bystander, yet another high-culpability standard to meet. Yet to support the failure to train claim, Plaintiff alleges no facts other than the single episode of the injury inflicted on him, and does not even allege that the City acted with 'deliberate indifference.' That is insufficient to state a claim of municipal liability in this context.")

Tugle v. Stith, No. 10-849-GPM, 2011 WL 1627332, at *2 (S.D. Ill. Apr. 28, 2011) ("Defendants also argue that Ms. Tugle fails to sufficiently plead a § 1983 claim against the Village because she 'failed to allege any express policy' that caused the Constitutional violation . . . Defendants are correct that municipal liability for a § 1983 claim cannot be based on respondeat superior, but must arise from a claim of municipal policy or custom. . . Here, Ms. Tugle alleges that the Village 'had customs, policies, and practices that violated the [Fourth Amendment] rights of its arrestees' including, inter alia, failure to 'properly train, investigate, discipline, and/or fire Officer Stith'. . . This is sufficient to survive Defendants' Rule 12(b)(6) challenge.")

Jordan v. Diaz, No. 10 C 1178, 2010 WL 5476758, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 23, 2010) ("As the Sheriff defendants note in their motion to dismiss, an 'official capacity claim must at a minimum include allegations in conclusory language that a policy existed, buttressed by facts alleging wrongdoing by the governmental entity.' No heightened pleading standard applies to Monell claims. Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 168 (1993). Thus, a plaintiff need not plead particular facts on which his claim of an official policy or custom is based; a 'short and plain statement' that the official policy or custom caused his injury will suffice to survive a motion to dismiss. . . Plaintiff's second amended complaint, filed after the Sheriff defendants moved to dismiss his first amended complaint, successfully remedied their concern that the first amended complaint failed to allege 'any policy, practice, or custom at all as required in Monell.' The second amended complaint alleges 'a policy or widespread custom at the Cook County Jail of ignoring detainees' serious medical conditions" and 'unconstitutionally denying detainees' treatment for their serious medical condition.' Plaintiff further alleges that defendants Dart and Thomas either 'established this policy or allowed a de facto policy of denying procedures necessary to treat the serious medical conditions of detainees,' and that they 'allowed the custom and practice of denying detainees' necessary medical treatment and thereby endorsed it.' These allegations are sufficiently specific to state a Monell claim.")

Aleman v. Dart, No. 09-cv-6049, 2010 WL 4876720, at *7 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 23, 2010) ("Plaintiff is not required to meet a heightened pleading standard for a § 1983 official-capacity claim. . . Thus, Plaintiff need not plead particular facts upon which he bases his claim of an official policy or custom, and a 'short and plain statement' that a government entity's official policy or custom caused his injury is sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss. . . . Plaintiff's complaint sufficiently alleges Monell liability under § 1983. Plaintiff alleges that the customs, policies, and practices of the institutional Defendants caused Plaintiff's harm and that the institution charged with ensuring adequate health care to pre-trial detainees repeatedly and consistently failed to provide adequate health care to inmates with obvious, serious medical needs. Plaintiff describes the alleged failures as including the failure to recognize the risk of harm to inmates, the failure to provide adequate care for obvious conditions, the failure to acknowledge complaints of serious medical needs, and the failure to ensure that inmates with serious medical needs were taken to the appropriate medical facilities. Plaintiff also alleges that Defendants repeatedly violated his constitutional rights: his requests for treatment were repeatedly ignored and they continued to be ignored even after he informed staff that he was still in pain. Furthermore, Plaintiff alleges that the previously-referenced DOJ report found that the medical care provided by Cook County Jail fell below the constitutionally required standards of care, conceivably putting the institution on notice of constitutional violations within the jail. Plaintiff's complaint contains a sufficiently "short and plain statement" that a government entity's official policy or custom caused his injury. When read in a light most favorable to Plaintiff, the facts alleged adequately state a cause of action for § 1983 municipal liability, and Plaintiff's complaint, when taken as a whole, sufficiently alleges the existence of official policies or customs that deprived Plaintiff of his constitutional rights.")

Jones v. Navia, No. 09-cv-6968, 2010 WL 4878869, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 23, 2010) ("Plaintiff's claims here amount to little more than 'boilerplate allegations' that Cities and Cook County policymakers knew of and tacitly supported unspecified customs. . . Therefore, he fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted under Monell. [citing Iqbal] Accordingly, we dismiss Count VII as to all relevant parties, including Cities and Cook County.")

Evans v. City of Chicago, No. 10 C 542, 2010 WL 3075651, at *2, *3 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 5, 2010) ("While Plaintiff's allegations of a practice within the police department are conclusory, such conclusory allegations suffice 'so long as facts are pled that put the defendants on proper notice of the alleged wrongdoing.'. . Here, Plaintiff's allegation of a practice within the police department gives Defendant 'fair notice' of what the 'claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.'. . Plaintiff defines what the practice is − to conduct warrantless searches and make arrests without probable cause when investigating the use of deadly force by Chicago police officers − and what that policy is meant to accomplish − to produce evidence, without regard to its reliability, that exonerates the officer from allegations of wrongdoing in his use of deadly force. This level of specificity, along with Plaintiff's description of how the practice was applied to her particularly, provides Defendant sufficient notice of the claim against it. Defendant argues that Plaintiff's claim should fail because she only alleged one instance in which the policy was applied, without further facts substantiating the existence of the policy. This case, though, is distinguishable from many cases in which a plaintiff asks the court to infer the existence of a policy from only a single incident, without articulating a specific policy. . . . Here, . . . Plaintiff identified the alleged policy with specificity, so the fact that she has only alleged one instance in which the policy was applied does not defeat the claim.")

Wiek v. Keane, No. 09 CV 920, 2010 WL 1976870, at *4 (N.D. Ill. May 12, 2010) ("Monell claims are not subject to a heightened pleading standard. . . Wiek's burden is simply to allege facts that would give the City notice of his municipal liability claim. In his amended complaint, Wiek alleges that he was held overnight after being arrested in his home without a warrant. He further alleges that the officers held him pursuant to a City policy allowing police officers to 'hold an arrestee overnight so that the arrestee could be exhibited in a corporeal identification procedure.'. . There is nothing more Wiek can allege. He is not required to provide extrinsic evidence that a policy existed. Wiek correctly relies on Willis v. City of Chicago for the proposition that when officers make an arrest without a warrant, they may not hold the arrestee in custody for the purposes of gathering additional evidence to justify the arrest. . . Therefore, Wiek's assertions that the officer's held him overnight in accordance with a municipal policy are sufficient to put the City on notice of his claim.")

Anderson v. City of Blue Island, No. 09C5158, 2010 WL 1710761, at *2 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 28, 2010) ("Anderson alleges that Blue Island acted with deliberate indifference in failing to train its police officers to respect the constitutional rights of mentally ill arrestees despite the frequency with which Blue Island police officers would confront persons suffering from mental illness. Anderson claims that the police officers who subdued him on the night in question were not trained in crisis intervention for mentally ill persons and that this particular deficiency in their training was the moving force behind the violation of his constitutional rights. Anderson's complaint highlights a specific alleged deficiency in the training provided to the Blue Island police officers he encountered on the night in question and presents a plausible causal connection between the training and the constitutional deprivation he allegedly suffered. Anderson has alleged enough facts to suggest he may be entitled to relief against Blue Island; dismissal of his claim at this stage would be inappropriate.").

Maldonado v. Racine County, No. 09-C-1173, 2010 WL 1484235, at *3, *4 (E.D.Wis. Apr. 12, 2010) ("In the present case, Maldonado does more than merely recite the elements of a § 1983 claim. She alleges that she was harmed by a specific policy or custom of Racine. Although Racine is correct in stating that Maldonado does not present any supporting facts to establish that such a policy actually exists, under the circumstances of this case, such pleading is not required. At this stage, Maldonado need only sufficiently inform the defendants of the nature of her claim and persuade the court that the complaint states [a] plausible claim for relief. Whether or not Maldonado is able to muster evidence of the actual existence of such a policy or custom is a hurdle she will have to clear should the defendants move for summary judgment. . . First, is the complaint sufficient to inform the defendants of the nature of the plaintiff's claim? As for this question, the court concludes that the amended complaint is sufficient. Maldonado does not merely baldly allege that she was harmed by a policy or custom but rather identifies the specific policy or custom of Racine that she alleges resulted in her injury, i.e. Racine's policy or custom 'to disregard the investigation and substantiation requirements of Article 3, Section D.17. of the Agreement.'. .Second, the court must ask, is the claim plausible? This is a 'context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense' to determine whether the well-pleaded facts alleged in the complaint are sufficient to 'permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct.'. . . On this question as well, the court finds that Maldonado has satisfied the minimal requirements imposed by Rule 8(a).")

Miller v. City of Plymouth, No. 2:09-CV-205 JVB, 2010 WL 1474205, at *4, *6 (N.D. Ind. Apr. 9, 2010) ("[A] plaintiff is not held to a heightened standard in pleading a Monell claim. . . And here, although they are at times confusing, the Plaintiffs' allegations attempt to fit within the second method of establishing a Monell claim in that Plaintiffs allege that the City failed to adequately train and supervise its employees in conducting traffic stops, using dogs in the field, and in keeping records of vehicle stops and the use of police dogs. . . . The Supreme Court's ruling in Iqbal has created some skepticism in the various circuits as to whether the Supreme Court's decisions in Twombly and Iqbal suggest a shift from notice-pleading back toward fact-pleading. . . For its part, however, the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit is proceeding cautiously and continues to emphasize that neither Twombly nor Iqbal have changed the fundamentals of pleading. See, e.g., Bissessur v. Ind. Univ. Bd. of Trustees, 581 F.3d 599 (7th Cir.2009) ("Our system operates on a notice pleading standard; Twombly and its progeny do not change this fact."). . . . In the context of section 1983 municipal liability, district courts in the Seventh Circuit post Twombly and Iqbal, have continued to apply Leatherman's holding that plaintiffs are not held to a heightened pleading requirement nor are they required to plead specific facts to prove the existence of a municipal policy. [collecting cases] The Millers have alleged facts related to the traffic stop which create a plausible claim for relief under the First, Fourth, and Fourteenth Amendments. They allege that they were wrongfully stopped by Weir and the other officers because of their race, subjected to searches by the officers, subjected to an illegal canine sweep of the car and their persons, handcuffed, and detained for nearly an hour, all under false pretenses. In addition, they have alleged that the impetus for their claims is the inadequate training of the officers by the City (and County) as it relates to vehicle traffic stops and the use of police dogs in searches. Finally, they have set out the alleged policies they believe led to the inadequate training of the officers, i.e., the failure to require reports of officers regarding traffic stops and the deployment of canine searches, the failure to train regarding a proper search of a vehicle, etc. Even after Twombly and Iqbal, a plaintiff doesn't have to come forward with evidence to survive a motion to dismiss. Moreover, giving the Millers' the benefit of liberal pleading standards due to their pro se status, it appears that they have pled sufficient facts to assert a plausible claim under Monell and sufficient facts to put the City on notice of the claim. The Motion to Dismiss is, therefore, DENIED.")

Diaz v. Hart, No. 08 C 5621, 2010 WL 849654, at *7 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 8, 2010) ("Defendants argue that Diaz fails to adequately define the custom, policy, or practice at issue and that the factual allegations in the complaint do not meet the pleading requirements set out in Iqbal. Post-Twombly and Iqbal, other courts in this district have continued to apply Leatherman's holding that plaintiffs are not required to plead specific facts to prove the existence of a municipal policy. [collecting cases] Diaz's allegations regarding a widespread custom are specific enough to alert defendants to the policy he alleges infringes on his constitutional right. Diaz alleges in significant detail that (1)

he had an injury that required surgery; (2) he was examined by doctors at the Jail, NRC, and Stroger who said he needed surgery; and (3) no surgery was ever performed. These allegations, which include dates, names of parties, accounts of doctors' visits, and the locations of those visits, are specific enough to put defendants on notice of the policy Diaz is seeking to hold them liable for.")

S.J. v. Perspectives Charter School, No. 09 C 444, 2010 WL 502752, at *5, *6 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 9, 2010) ("To state an actionable § 1983 claim based on policy, practice, or custom, a plaintiff cannot merely assert the existence of a policy. . . . Here, S.J. alleges no specific 'policies, practices and customs' of 'Defendants' other than 'failure to properly train employees.'. . S.J.'s pleading of this Count amounts to mere 'legal conclusion' without "show[ing] that [S.J.] is entitled to relief.'. . In its statement of facts, moreover, S.J. fails to allege or describe any incidents other than the search of S.J., and claims that this shows failure to properly train employees. . . . [A]lthough the single strip search alleged is 'consistent with' S.J's theory of liability, S.J. has failed to plead facts sufficient to state a failure to train claim.").

Riley v. County of Cook, 682 F.Supp.2d 856, 861, 862 (N.D. Ill. 2010) ("[T]he Supreme Court has expressly rejected a heightened pleading standard for § 1983 claims against a municipality. Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence & Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 165-66 (1993). Courts in this district have affirmed this principle post-Twombly. See Eckert v. City of Chicago, 2009 WL 1409707, at * 6 (N.D.Ill. May 20, 2009); Jones v. Bremen High Sch. Dist. 228, 2009 WL 537073, at *4 (N.D.Ill. Mar. 4, 2009). Thus, an official capacity claim can survive even with conclusory allegations that a policy or practice existed, so long as facts are pled that put the defendants on proper notice of the alleged wrongdoing. McCormick v. City of Chicago, 230 F.3d 319, 325 (7th Cir.2000). In this case, Defendants contend that Plaintiff's official liability claims against all Defendants are deficient. As to Counts I and II against Andrews and Dart, Defendants urge that they contain unsupported conclusions that Defendants acted with deliberate indifference by failing to maintain appropriate suicide prevention policies. However, given the above standards, the Court disagrees. Plaintiff's Complaint alleges that Andrews and Dart were responsible for the care and management of the prisoners at Cook County Jail, and had policymaking authority to implement appropriate procedures to do so. Plaintiff further alleges that Andrews and Dart acted with deliberate indifference by failing to institute suicide prevention practices at Cook County Jail, and elaborates six specific examples of inadequate procedures as well as the failure to adequately monitor the jail cells. Plaintiff claims that Hopkins' suicide was the result of this direct indifference. Plaintiff has clearly gone beyond bare legal conclusions and provided Defendants with fair notice of the basis for her claim. Plaintiff's assertions are therefore sufficient to establish official capacity claims against Andrews and Dart.").

Gilbert ex rel. James v. Ross, No. 09-cv-2339, 2010 WL 145789, at *2, *3 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 11, 2010) ("Plaintiff is not required to meet a heightened pleading standard for a § 1983 official-capacity claim. See Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence & Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 168 (1993); Simpson v. Nickel, 450 F.3d 303, 306 (7th Cir.2006). Thus, Plaintiff need not plead particular facts upon which he bases his claim of an official policy or custom, and a 'short and plain statement' that a government entity's official policy or custom caused his injury is sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss. Id.; see Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(2). Citing McCormick v. City of Chicago, 230 F.3d 319, 325 (7th Cir.2000), Defendants concede that the law does not require Plaintiff to meet a heightened standard of pleading to state an official-capacity claim, but emphasize McCormick's statement that Monell requires conclusory allegations to be 'buttressed by facts alleging wrongdoing' by the relevant government entity. See McCormick, 230 F.3d at 325-26. This language should not be read to require more than notice pleading, but only to require that the pleadings allege that the government entity is responsible for the constitutional deprivation resulting from the alleged policy or custom. . . In fact, as McCormick explicitly notes, '[t]he Supreme Court has made it very clear that federal courts must not apply a heightened pleading standard in civil rights cases alleging § 1983 municipal liability.'. . Plaintiff's complaint sufficiently alleges official capacity liability under § 1983 as to Counts I and II. Plaintiff alleges that Officer Ross and an unknown officer were acting in their official capacities as Cook County and Village of Maywood police officers. Plaintiff further alleges that the Cook County Sheriff and the Cook County Sheriff's Department, as well as the Village of Maywood, directly encourage the misconduct at issue here by a failure to train, supervise, and control officers. The misconduct is described in detail in paragraphs fifteen through eighteen of the complaint, where Plaintiff specifically describes being randomly stopped, physically abused, forced into a police car without probable cause for an arrest, and dropped off near known gang members. Plaintiff alleges that the municipalities encourage this conduct by failing to punish or scrutinize it. Plaintiff also alleges that other Cook County and Village of Maywood citizens have been similarly mistreated but that there have been no findings of misconduct by the municipalities; rather, Plaintiff claims that there is a 'code of silence' by which similar misconduct is not reported. These facts, when read in a light most favorable to Plaintiff, adequately state a cause of action for § 1983 municipal liability. Defendants, relying on Sivard v. Pulaski County, 17 F.3d 185, 188 (7th Cir.1994), also argue that Plaintiff's claim must be dismissed for failure to allege more than a single instance of wrongdoing. Although Plaintiff has not identified any other person who was a victim of Defendants' alleged policies, he does, as described above, allege that the failure to train, supervise, and scrutinize, as well as the 'code of silence,' is an ongoing practice that continually harms the citizens of Cook County and the Village of Maywood. Furthermore, Sivard involved a motion for summary judgment, not a motion to dismiss, and does not address notice pleading standards. . . Plaintiff's complaint, when taken as a whole, sufficiently alleges the existence of official policies or customs that deprived Plaintiff of his constitutional rights.").

Gardunio v. Town of Cicero, No. 09-CV-1162, 2009 WL 4506318, at *9 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 30, 2009) ("Defendants also argue that Plaintiff's allegations regarding Dominick's actions are insufficient to establish the Town's liability because Plaintiff has failed to allege when or how Dominick orchestrated Plaintiff's arrest and prosecution. But as Defendants themselves note, Section 1983 claims against municipalities are not subject to a heightened pleading standard. See Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence & Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 165-66 (1993). Therefore, even post-Twombly, Plaintiff is required only 'to allege Aenough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'' Eckert v. City of Chicago, 2009 WL 1409707, at *6 (N.D.Ill.

May 20, 2009) (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570); see also Jones v. Bremen High Sch. Dist. 228, 2009 WL 537073, at *4 (N.D.Ill. Mar. 4, 2009) (holding that under Twombly, Plaintiff 'is not required to plead with specificity the existence of a municipal policy").")

Wilson v. City of Chicago, No. 09 C 2477, 2009 WL 3242300, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 7, 2009) ("[T]he City argues that the Court should dismiss claims against it because Wilson has not adequately pleaded municipal liability. The City argues that cursory allegations of Monell liability are insufficient to plead a claim against the City. Specifically, the City argues that Wilson has not provided any other examples of the alleged 'widespread practices' about which he complains. Monell claims, however, are not subject to a heightened pleading standard. Lanigan v. Village of E. Hazel Crest, Ill., 110 F.3d 467, 479 (7th Cir.1997). And notice pleading does not require Wilson to plead all of the facts logically entailed by the claim. Tamayo v. Blagojevich, 526 F.3d 1074, 1081 (7th Cir.2008). It is not reasonable to expect a plaintiff to have information about other incidents at the pleading stage; instead, a plaintiff should be given the opportunity to develop an evidentiary record to determine whether he can provide support for his claims. McCormick v. City of Chicago, 230 F.3d 319, 325 (7th Cir.2000) (error to dismiss Monell claims on the ground that they were too conclusory); Sledd v. Lindsay, 102 F.3d 282, 288-289 (7th Cir.1996) (reversing dismissal of Monell claims where dismissal based on plaintiff's failure to identify specific factual patterns in the complaint). Wilson's pleadings makes it clear that he alleges that the individual Defendants coerced false testimony in order to frame him and then withheld the knowledge that the testimony was false from him. Wilson's pleadings further makes it clear that he alleges that the City of Chicago turned a blind eye to its officers' practice of withholding exculpatory information and that failure emboldened the Defendants causing them to believe they could get away with framing him. Such allegations are more than labels and conclusions; rather they provide a factual basis that sets forth a short and plain statement that the government entity's official policy or custom is the cause of his injury. If the Court accepts these allegations as true, as it must, Wilson's factual allegations more than adequately raise his right to relief above the speculative level and the Court need not draw any further inferences to conclude that the City would be liable for the misconduct alleged. The Court DENIES the City's Motion to Dismiss.").

Eckert v. City of Chicago, No. 08 C 7397, 2009 WL 1409707, at *6 (N.D. Ill. May 20, 2009) ("'[T]he Supreme Court has rejected any heightened pleading requirement for claims against a municipality.'. . Post-Bell Atlantic, other courts in this district have affirmed Leatherman's holding that plaintiffs are not required to plead with specificity the existence of such a municipal policy. . .We agree with Defendants that under the post-Bell Atlantic pleading standard, a plaintiff must provide more than boilerplate allegations to survive a motion to dismiss. . . However, Bell Atlantic only requires plaintiffs to allege 'enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'").

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Watkins v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 102 F.4th 947, 953-54 (8th Cir. 2024) ("Watkins argues she is not required to specifically plead the existence of an unconstitutional policy or custom to withstand the City's motion to dismiss. This is true. . . But she still 'must allege facts which would support the existence of an unconstitutional policy or custom.'. . Dismissal is proper when a complaint does not contain any 'allegations, reference, or language by which one could begin to draw an inference that the conduct complained of ... resulted from an unconstitutional policy or custom ....'. . .Although we hold Watkins has pled sufficient facts to support her § 1983 claims against the individual officers, we agree with the district court that Watkins has not alleged sufficient facts to support her § 1983 claims against the City on any of the Monell bases. First, Watkins has not alleged the existence of an unconstitutional official policy because she has not identified 'a deliberate choice of a guiding principle or procedure made by the municipal official who has final authority regarding such matters.'. . Second, Watkins has not alleged facts that support the existence of an unconstitutional unofficial custom. Watkins's complaint does not allege facts plausibly suggesting '(1) the existence of a continuing, widespread, persistent pattern of unconstitutional misconduct by the governmental entity's employees; (2) deliberate indifference to or tacit authorization of such conduct by the governmental entity's policymaking officials after notice to the officials of that misconduct; and (3) an injury by acts pursuant to the government entity's custom.'. . Instead, Watkins simply makes conclusory assertions that such misconduct occurred. Indeed, the only facts in Watkins's complaint that might support these conclusory allegations are the facts of her own arrest, and '[g]enerally, an isolated incident of alleged police misconduct ... cannot, as a matter of law, establish a municipal policy or custom creating liability under § 1983.'. .Third, Watkins has not alleged facts stating a claim for failure to train or supervise. Watkins's complaint does not allege facts plausibly suggesting (1) the City's 'officer training practices were inadequate;' (2) the City 'was deliberately indifferent to the rights of others in adopting these training practices, and' the City's 'failure to train was a result of deliberate and conscious choices it made;' and (3) the City's 'alleged training deficiencies caused [Watkins's] constitutional deprivation.'. . As before, Watkins's allegations are conclusory, and she does not assert specific instances or provide specific examples of inadequate officer training or supervising practices that could support an inference of an unconstitutional policy or custom. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's dismissal of Watkins's § 1983 claims against the City.")

Smith v. Allbaugh, 987 F.3d 905, 911-12 (10th Cir. 2021) ("Ms. Smith fails to assert sufficient facts to support a causal link between Defendants' actions and the constitutional violation. Ms. Smith asserts five policies and procedures that Defendants failed to promulgate or enforce. She pleads two policies that Defendants failed to 'enforce': (1) a policy requiring facility nurses and staff to immediately inform the facility medical provider when facing complaints of difficulty breathing or complaints relating to the abdomen; and (2) a policy requiring facility nurses and staff to immediately contact emergency services if an inmate complained of severe difficulty breathing or experienced a sudden onset of altered medical status. . . However, Ms. Smith only alleges that JHCC medical staff failed to follow such procedures, . . . not that Defendants failed to enforce these policies. Indeed, Ms. Smith fails to plead any facts tending to show that Defendants were aware of prior instances of these policies not being followed and that they failed to rectify those situations. Ms. Smith further pleads that Defendants failed to 'promulgate, implement, and/or enforce policies' (1) 'requiring medical staff to inform a physician and/or refer an inmate to a hospital when an inmate complained of difficulty breathing, experienced acute stomach pain, or showed obvious signs of medical distress;' (2) 'requiring a facility physician to conduct an in-person examination of a critically ill patient or arrange for their transfer to a facility where a physician's examination was available;' and (3) 'regarding necessary protocols when an inmate lacks capacity to refuse medical treatment.'. . However, the first two policies are the same policies that Ms. Smith argues should have been enforced above. As for the final policy, Ms. Smith attaches a copy of the Waiver of Treatment/Evaluation Form in the complaint that states protocols that must be followed by the medical staff when completing the form. . . Again, while the medical staff may not have followed the protocol, Ms. Smith fails to allege facts that Defendants knowingly failed to enforce the policy and therefore fails to assert a causal link between their actions and the constitutional violation. Ms. Smith also failed to plead sufficient factual allegations to support deliberate indifference on the part of these defendants. First, Ms. Smith alleges that Defendants 'were aware that the policies and procedures they created, promulgated, implemented, and/or enforce[d]—or failed to create, promulgate, implement, or enforce—resulted in grossly deficient medical care to inmates at Joseph Harp.'. . However, such conclusory allegations, without sufficiently pleaded supporting facts, are insufficient to state a claim. . . Second, Ms. Smith alleges that Mr. Allbaugh referred to JHCC as a 'sinking ship.' However, such a broad statement is inadequate to demonstrate that Mr. Allbaugh knew there were specific policies being violated and failed to enforce them. It is likewise inadequate to demonstrate awareness of an absence of specific policies to prevent the violation of inmates' constitutional rights.")

Whitney v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 887 F.3d 857, 861 & n.5 (8th Cir. 2018) ("Whitney Sr. contends that the district court was wrong when it concluded that absent a constitutional violation on the part of Sharp, the City had no Monell liability. He claims that Monell liability is still possible because other jail personnel who were not named as defendants 'arguably fulfilled a "do nothing" Jail policy vis-a-vis an inmate committing suicide.' This claim fails for the same reason as the claim against Sharp. The complaint alleges that unnamed jail personnel were deliberately indifferent while Whitney was hanging himself. Tellingly, the complaint does not allege any facts to support this legal conclusion. The surmise of the allegation is unsupported by sufficient factual allegations. There is, for example, no claim that any identifiable jail official had knowledge that Whitney was in the process of committing suicide or even that a particular jail official suspected that he might be committing an act of self-harm. In short the complaint fails to allege any constitutional violation arising out of a municipal policy that would expose the City to Monell liability. . . . We also note that a failure to implement a specific policy does not equate to a failure to adopt a constitutionally adequate policy.")

B.A.B., Jr. v. Board of Educ. of City of St. Louis, 698 F.3d 1037, 1040, 1041 (8th Cir. 2012) ("It is well-established that § 1983 claims based on the Board's failure to train its employees require proof that '(1) the [Board's] training practices [were] inadequate; (2) the [Board] was deliberately indifferent to the rights of others in adopting them, such that the "failure to train reflects a deliberate or conscious choice by [the Board]"; and (3) an alleged deficiency in the ... training procedures actually caused the plaintiff's injury.' . . Plaintiffs must prove that 'the need for more or different training is so obvious, and the inadequacy so likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of the [Board] can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need.'. . .Plaintiffs' Complaint did not come close to meeting these rigorous standards. The substantive due process claim of Ms. Allen required proof of conscience-shocking behavior. The Complaint alleged that Nurse Franklin told B.A.B. she would administer the vaccine by shot, not by nasal mist, the allegedly harmful alternative, because his asthma put him in need of the H1–N1 vaccination. However inappropriate it may have been to override Ms. Allen's refusal to consent, this was not conscience-shocking behavior by a public school nurse. B.A.B.'s Fourth Amendment claim failed to allege that he refused to consent to this minimally invasive procedure, only that he told Nurse Franklin his mother did not consent. Adding these insufficiencies to the inadequate and conclusory allegations regarding the Board's failure to train, we conclude these § 1983 claims were properly dismissed, either for failure to plead a plausible claim, or for failure to state a claim.")

Cole v. Does, No. 21-CV-1282 (PJS/JFD), 2021 WL 5645511, at *3-4, *8 (D. Minn. Dec. 1, 2021) ("Following Twombly and Iqbal, some confusion in the case law arose because in a decision that preceded Twombly and Iqbal—Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence & Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 113 S.Ct. 1160, 122 L.Ed.2d 517 (1993)—the Supreme Court had appeared to hold that a claim against a municipality for failing to adequately train police officers who violated the plaintiff's civil rights was adequately pleaded, even though the claim provided nothing more than what Twombly described as 'a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action.' Despite the apparent tension between Leatherman, on the one hand, and Twombly and Iqbal, on the other, Iqbal did not even mention Leatherman, and Twombly cited it only once in a footnote (with no hint of disapproval). . . In the aftermath of Twombly and Iqbal, the federal courts took two positions regarding the continued viability of Leatherman. Some courts read Leatherman narrowly to hold only that the lower court had erred in applying a heightened pleading standard to Monell claims, but to express no opinion as to whether the complaint at issue was adequate under the correct ("un-heightened") pleading standard. Other courts read Leatherman more broadly to hold that the complaint at issue was adequate. Because Leatherman had not been overturned, these courts applied Leatherman in finding that formulaic Monell claims passed muster. The undersigned took the latter view in Gearin v. Rabbett, No. 10-CV-2227 (PJS/AJB), 2011 WL 317728 (D. Minn. Jan. 28, 2011), which declined to dismiss a Monell claim premised on the deliberate indifference of municipal policymakers to the unconstitutional conduct of an official named Kantrud. . . .Understandably, Cole and Hennessy-Fiske have cited this Court's order in Gearin in arguing that a lenient Leatherman pleading standard—rather than a stricter Iqbal/Twombly pleading standard—should apply to supervisory-liability claims brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (claims that are similar, although not identical, to Monell claims). . . On reflection, however, the Court concludes that it erred in Gearin, and that there is no 'civil rights' exception to the Iqbal/Twombly standard. In the more than 10 years since Gearin was decided, numerous appellate and trial courts have applied the Twombly/Iqbal pleading standard to Monell and supervisory-liability claims. [collecting cases] In reconciling Leatherman with Twombly and Iqbal, these courts have persuasively argued that Leatherman did not hold that the bare-bones complaint at issue in that case was adequate. Rather, Leatherman simply held that Monell claims should be evaluated under the Rule 8 pleading standard—whatever that standard requires—and not under a heightened pleading standard. Accordingly, the Court will apply the Twombly/Iqbal standard to plaintiffs' claims again Dwyer and Salto. . . . Like the allegations at issue in Iqbal, Cole and Hennessy-Fiske's allegation that Dwyer and Salto authorized or approved the Doe defendants' use of force against the journalists is a ' "naked assertion[ ]" devoid of "further factual enhancement."'. . Nowhere in their complaint do Cole and Hennessy-Fiske explain how they know what Dwyer and Salto said to the Doe defendants or provide any details about when or how Dwyer and Salto authorized and approved of the Doe defendants' use of force against the journalists. As a result, the Court cannot find that Cole and Hennessy-Fiske have satisfied their burden to plead 'enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'")

Taylor ex rel. Taylor v. Isom, No. 4:11–CV–1351 CAS, 2013 WL 2447602, *4, *5 (E.D. Mo. June 5, 2013) ("The Supreme Court has rejected any heightened pleading requirement for claims against a governmental entity. . . To survive a motion for judgment on the pleadings, however, a complaint must allege facts sufficient 'to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'. . Considering this pleading standard, in order to state a viable § 1983 claim against the Board or Isom, plaintiff was required to plead facts sufficient to show at least an inference that her constitutional rights were violated as a result of action taken pursuant to an official policy, or as a result of misconduct so pervasive among non-policymakers as to constitute a widespread custom and practice with the force of law. . .Assuming arguendo that plaintiff suffered a constitutional deprivation, she has pleaded no facts in the Complaint that would demonstrate the existence of either an official policy or a widespread custom or practice that caused the deprivation. Plaintiff's allegations concerning official policy and custom are mere labels and conclusions, which are inadequate to state a claim. . . Although plaintiff need not identify the specific unconstitutional policy to survive a motion for judgment on the pleadings, see Crumpley–Patterson v. Trinity Lutheran Hospital, 388 F.3d 588, 591 (8th Cir.2004), she must, at the least, allege facts that would support the drawing of an inference that the conduct complained of resulted from the existence of an unconstitutional policy or custom. Id. Plaintiff does not plead any facts that would support the existence of an unconstitutional policy or custom. Rather, all the facts alleged relate to the actions of the police officer defendants themselves. . .In the absence of any factual allegations to support the existence of an unconstitutional policy or custom, there is no basis upon which to hold the Board or Isom liable under § 1983. These defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings should therefore be granted.")

NINTH CIRCUIT

J. K. J. v. City of San Diego, 42 F.4th 990, 999 (9th Cir. 2021) (amended opinion) ("[E]ven recognizing that 'a failure to train can be a "policy" under Monell,'. . . J.K.J. alleged no facts that would indicate any 'deficiency in training actually caused the police officers' [alleged] indifference to [Jenkins'] medical needs[.]'. . On the contrary, the amended complaint claimed that San Diego officers 'are trained in accordance with ... Police Department policies to take immediate action to summon medical care' in circumstances like those Taub and Durbin encountered when they met Jenkins. Indeed, J.K.J. alleged that Durbin acted 'in direct contravention to the policy and training of the ... Department.' These allegations suggest that the moving force behind the alleged constitutional violation was not a failure to train, but the officers' failure to heed their training. J.K.J. resists this conclusion. He appears to argue that the officers' alleged deviation from training indicated 'the need for more or different training.'. . But the amended complaint never identified what additional training was required beyond what Taub and Durbin received. Nor did it allege facts indicating that this supposed failure to enhance officer training was the moving force behind Jenkins' injuries. Accordingly, J.K.J. failed to state a claim for municipal liability.") Hyun Ju Park v. City and County of Honolulu, 952 F.3d 1136, 1141-43 (9th Cir. 2020) ("When, as here, a plaintiff pursues liability based on a failure to act, she must allege that the municipality exhibited deliberate indifference to the violation of her federally protected rights. . . We agree with the district court that Park's Monell claim must be dismissed because she has not plausibly alleged that the County's inaction reflected deliberate indifference to her Fourteenth Amendment right to bodily integrity. . . . Park premises her claim against the County on the failure of the relevant policymaker—here, the Chief of Police—to address deficiencies in the two Honolulu Police Department policies or customs mentioned earlier. As to Policy 2.38, Park contends that the Chief of Police failed to amend the policy to prohibit officers from carrying firearms whenever they consumed alcohol in any amount. As to the 'brotherhood culture of silence,' Park alleges that the Chief of Police failed to implement mandatory whistleblowing policies, which would have rooted out the culture of silence. Even accepting those allegations as true, Park has not plausibly alleged that the Chief of Police had actual or constructive notice that his inaction would likely result in the deprivation of her federally protected rights. . . . Park has not plausibly alleged that the Chief of Police was aware of prior, similar incidents in which off-duty officers mishandled their firearms while drinking. In her complaint, she alleges only that, on two prior occasions, she witnessed Kimura drunkenly brandish his firearm in the presence of Naki and Omoso while drinking at the bar. As Park acknowledges, however, the Chief of Police did not learn of those incidents before her injury, and she alleges no other prior incidents that would have alerted the Chief of Police that officers were interpreting Policy 2.38 to require conduct that endangered members of the public. Instead, she asserts that the Chief of Police knew or should have known of Policy 2.38's foreseeable consequences because the Honolulu Police Department referenced on its website a Hawaii statute prohibiting individuals with alcohol-abuse disorders from possessing firearms. That allegation falls far short of establishing deliberate indifference. . . . Park's allegations concerning the 'brotherhood culture of silence' fare no better. Park asserts that the Chief of Police had actual notice of the foreseeable consequences of his inaction because he knew about three prior instances in which officers attempted to conceal each other's misconduct. But Park offers no details about the type of misconduct allegedly committed by these officers or the extent to which their actions implicated community members' federally protected rights. Without any information about the nature of the prior incidents, we cannot reasonably infer that the Chief of Police knew or should have known that the culture of silence would likely result in the deprivation of Park's constitutional rights.")

Hyun Ju Park v. City and County of Honolulu, 952 F.3d 1136, 1144-49 (9th Cir. 2020) (Smith, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I respectfully disagree with the majority's analysis of Park's Monell claim against the County. . . . Park plausibly alleges that Officer Kimura handled his revolver on the night in question for HPD reasons, not personal reasons. Construing the facts in Park's favor, Officer Kimura therefore acted under color of law. . . . On the facts plausibly alleged in the SAC, I have no doubt that Officer Kimura's drunken wielding of his revolver in a bar full of people was an abuse of power 'possessed by virtue of state law and made possible only because the wrongdoer is clothed with the authority of state law.'. . Thus, I believe that the majority's assumption that Officer Kimura acted under color of law in fact reflects the correct result. I therefore also have no doubt that Park has plausibly alleged a Fourteenth Amendment violation of her right to bodily integrity, given the plausible allegation of a state actor, and of deliberate indifference by the County as I discuss below. . . . Park points to many policy corrections that plausibly would have prevented her injuries, including a prohibition on firearm possession while consuming alcohol in any amount, guidance regarding assessing impairment and preventing firearm misuse by impaired officers, mandatory reporting of officer misconduct, and whistleblower protections for reporting officers. I would reject Defendants' suggestion that a policy prohibiting firearm carrying while 'drinking' would have been just as ineffective as the actual policy—prohibiting firearm carrying while 'impaired'—because 'impairment starts with the first sip.' Most people do not consider themselves impaired after 'one sip.' Similarly, I disagree with the majority's conclusion that HPD Policy No. 2.38 did not require HPD officers to carry their firearms with them to a bar. It is unclear when exactly the majority reads the policy to direct (or even permit) officers to dispossess themselves of their holstered pistols in relation to a plan to drink at a bar, nor is it clear what the officers should then do with the pistol. Officers who fail to carry their pistol while at a bar but not impaired would violate the policy's plain terms. Officers who become impaired while carrying a holstered pistol are dangerous. . . . I disagree with the majority's conclusion that Park has failed to plausibly allege that the County had notice here. Officer Kimura's repeated engagement in drunken and dangerous weapons handling occurred in the presence of other HPD officers. This put the County on at least 'constructive' notice of the substantial risk of harm, whether on account of its policies generally or on account of its policies' effects on Officer Kimura specifically. I certainly would not shield the County from being charged with 'constructive notice' of Officer Kimura's past behavior where the very reason individual policymakers may not have had 'actual' notice was the offending brotherhood culture of silence. To the extent that the majority identifies additional facts that, if alleged, would have made out a more compelling case for constructive or actual notice, Park should be given leave to amend. . . For the foregoing reasons, I respectfully dissent as to the dismissal of Park's Monell claims against the County. I would reverse the district court and allow that portion of Park's lawsuit to proceed.")

Garmon v. Cty. of Los Angeles, 828 F.3d 837, 846 (9th Cir. 2016) ("A local government may be liable under § 1983 for an official's conduct where the official had final policymaking authority concerning the action at issue, and where the official was the policymaker for the local governing body for the purposes of the particular act. Goldstein v. City of Long Beach, 715 F.3d 750, 753 (9th Cir. 2013). In fact, a municipality may be liable for an 'isolated constitutional violation when the person causing the violation has final policymaking authority.' Lytle v. Carl, 382 F.3d 978, 983 (9th Cir. 2004) (citation omitted). A municipality's failure to train its employees may also constitute an actionable policy or custom under § 1983 if it amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the untrained employees come into contact. . .A pro se complaint must be held to less stringent standards than formal pleadings drafted by an attorney. . . Because Garmon filed her operative complaint pro se, we "construe the pleadings liberally" and afford her 'the benefit of any doubt.' Hebbe v. Pliler, 627 F.3d 338, 342 (9th Cir. 2010) (quoting Bretz v. Kelman, 773 F.2d 1026, 1027 n.1 (9th Cir. 1985) (en banc)). Although the operative complaint states that Garmon is suing the County Defendants for violating a county policy, it includes other allegations that might support viable theories for county liability. For example, the operative complaint states that 'Steve Cooley ... is [a] policy maker for the District Attorney's office.' An amended complaint could add allegations to bolster a claim that the facts alleged constitute an isolated constitutional violation stemming from Cooley's actions as a final policymaker. . . The operative complaint also states that Hanisee, 'acting on behalf of the County of Los Angeles ... acted negligently ... by misusing the power of her office.' Garmon might be able to allege more facts that would support a claim that Hanisee's actions were performed as a final policymaker. Likewise, the operative complaint alleges claims for 'Negligent training' and 'Negligent supervision.' Garmon could allege additional facts relating to the County's failure to train and supervise. . . Allegations based on these theories could be consistent with the operative complaint, rather than necessarily inconsistent with it as the district court concluded. Thus, it was an abuse of discretion to deny leave to amend. The court shall grant Garmon leave to amend on remand.")

AE ex rel. Hernandez v. County of Tulare, 666 F.3d 631, 637 (9th Cir. 2012) ("Our circuit precedent, articulated first in Shah v. County of Los Angeles, 797 F.2d 743, 747 (9th Cir.1986), and most recently in Whitaker, 486 F.3d at 581, requires plaintiffs in civil rights actions against local governments to set forth no more than a bare allegation that government officials' conduct conformed to some unidentified government policy or custom. The County argues that our precedent has been implicitly overruled by the reasoning of intervening Supreme Court decisions, including Ashcroft v. Iqbal. . . . Yet briefing on this appeal was completed before our decision in Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202 (9th Cir.2011). There, we identified and addressed conflicts in the Supreme Court's recent jurisprudence on the pleading requirements applicable to civil actions. . . .[W]hatever the difference between [Swierkiewicz, Dura Pharmaceuticals, Twombly, Erickson, and Iqbal], we can at least state the following two principles common to all of them. First, to be entitled to the presumption of truth, allegations in a complaint or counterclaim may not simply recite the elements of a cause of action, but must contain sufficient allegations of underlying facts to give fair notice and to enable the opposing party to defend itself effectively. Second, the factual allegations that are taken as true must plausibly suggest an entitlement to relief, such that it is not unfair to require the opposing party to be subjected to the expense of discovery and continued litigation. . . This standard applies to Monell claims and should govern future pleadings in this case. The district court abused its discretion when it denied AE the opportunity to allege additional facts supporting the claim that Portillo's, Wampler's, and Felix's alleged constitutional violations were carried out pursuant to County policy or custom. AE's allegation of plausible facts supporting such a policy or custom could have cured the deficiency in the Monell claim.")

Dougherty v. City of Covina, 654 F.3d 892, 900, 901 (9th Cir. 2011) ("Here, Dougherty's Monell and supervisory liability claims lack any factual allegations that would separate them from the 'formulaic recitation of a cause of action's elements' deemed insufficient by Twombly. . . Regarding the Monell claim, Dougherty alleged only that (1) 'Defendant CITY's policies and/or customs caused the specific violations of Plaintiff's constitutional rights at issue in this case[ ]' and (2) 'Defendant CITY's polices and/or customs were the moving force and/or affirmative link behind the violation of the Plaintiff's constitutional rights and injury, damage and/or harm caused thereby.' The Complaint lacked any factual allegations regarding key elements of the Monell claims, or, more specifically, any facts demonstrating that his constitutional deprivation was the result of a custom or practice of the City of Covina or that the custom or practice was the 'moving force' behind his constitutional deprivation. Regarding supervisory liability, Dougherty alleged only 'negligent' hiring and training and pointed to no instances of deliberate indifference. Dougherty failed to plead 'enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'")

Cariega v. City of Reno, No. 316CV00562MMDWGC, 2017 WL 1900980, at *3–4 (D. Nev. May 8, 2017) ("The FAC alleges that the City of Reno has a 'pattern and practice of not processing traffic citation payments and quashing the related arrest warrants of Native Americans and/or other minorities in a proper and timely manner.'. . The FAC's mere legal conclusion that there is a 'pattern or practice' without pointing to specific decisions of the City of Reno's lawmakers, specific acts of the City's policymaking officials, or factual examples of practices so persistent as to have the force of law, is insufficient under the pleading standards of Iqbal/Twombly to withstand a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). Therefore, the Court grants Defendant's Motion. The Court has discretion to grant leave to amend and should freely do so 'when justice so requires.'. . As pleaded, the FAC does not contain sufficient factual allegations to state a claim for relief under § 1983. However, the Court is unclear on whether amendment would be futile. Accordingly, the Court grants Plaintiff leave to amend the FAC if Plaintiff is able to cure the deficiencies identified in this Order.")

Lopez v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, No. CV 15-01745 MMM MANX, 2015 WL 3913263, at *7-8 (C.D. Cal. June 25, 2015) ("After Iqbal, Monell allegations must identify the challenged policy, custom, or failure to train, explain why it is deficient, and state how it harmed plaintiff. Where a claim is based on a failure to train, the complaint must also plead facts showing that the municipality's conduct amounted to deliberate indifference. . . .Plaintiffs' complaint fails to plead a plausible Monell claim based on defendants' alleged policies and practices. . . Plaintiffs do not sufficiently identify the specific policy, custom, or failure to train being challenged, explain why it is deficient, or state how it harmed Gabriel or them. Nor do plaintiffs allege facts showing that the defendants acted with deliberate indifference in failing properly to train their employees. Rather, plaintiffs do little more than recite the elements of a municipal liability claim. This is not sufficient under Twombly and Iqbal.")

Hernandez v. City of Beaumont, No. EDCV 13–00967 DDP (DTBx), 2013 WL 6633076, *5 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 16, 2013) ("Plaintiffs' complaint does not meet the heightened pleading standards for municipal liability after Iqbal. Nowhere does Plaintiffs' complaint contain specific allegations regarding the customs, policies, and practices that they allege are insufficient. Instead, Plaintiffs plead simply that City, Coe, and Does 1–10 'act[ed] with gross negligence and with reckless and deliberate indifference' in (1) employing and retaining Clark and Velasquez, who they knew or should have known had dangerous propensities; (2) inadequately training, supervising, and disciplining Clark and Velasquez; (3) maintaining inadequate procedures for reporting misconduct; (4) failing to adequately train officers in their use of the JPX pepper spray gun; and (5) maintaining an unconstitutional policy or practice of arresting and detaining individuals without probable cause and through use of excessive force. . . Plaintiffs plead no facts regarding what policies and practices City used in training, hiring, disciplining, and supervising their officers in the use of the JPX pepper spray gun, let alone why those policies and practices were deficient. Plaintiffs also fail to plead any facts as to why Clark and Velasquez had 'dangerous propensities' or why Coe and City should have known about them. Therefore, the Court GRANTS the motion to dismiss this cause of action against City, with leave to amend should Plaintiffs be able to allege specific facts giving rise to an inference of Monell liability.")

Tien Van Nguyen v. City of Union City, No. C–13–01753–DMR, 2013 WL 3014136, *9, *10 (N.D. Cal. June 17, 2013) ("Plaintiff's Monell allegations are little more than conclusory. Although the allegations allude to the possibility of a deficient policy regarding the use of canines, they do not describe the policy. Plaintiff's broad charges are insufficient to give fair notice to the City about the specific basis for municipal liability, such that the City could defend itself. . . .Plaintiff has thus failed to sufficiently allege a Section 1983 claim against the City for municipal liability and Defendants' motion to dismiss this claim is granted with leave to amend.")

Mateos-Sandoval v. County of Sonoma, 942 F.Supp.2d 890, 898-900 (N.D. Cal. 2013) ("The Supreme Court, in Leatherman v. Tarrant Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, cited with approval to Karim–Panahi in rejecting a 'heightened pleading standard' for Monell claims. . . Karim–Panahi has not been overruled, but the Ninth Circuit has recognized that, under the Supreme Court's recent pleading jurisprudence, it is no longer clear that, without more, an allegation that an officer's conduct 'conformed to official policy, custom, or practice' continues to be sufficient to state a claim under Monell. See A.E. ex rel. Hernandez v. County of Tulare, 666 F.3d 631, 637–38 (9th Cir.2012); Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 556 (2007); Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678. In Starr v. Baca, the Ninth Circuit attempted to reconcile the apparent inconsistency between the Supreme Court's decisions in Twombly and Iqbal and other recent cases in which the Court construed Rule 8(a) in a way that would permit more claims to survive a motion to dismiss. . . .Recently, in A.E. ex rel. Hernandez v. County of Tulare, the Ninth Circuit applied the Starr standard to a Monell claim. . . . In the present case, as in A.E., Plaintiffs base their Monell claims on the theory that County Defendants had deliberate customs, policies, or practices that were 'the "moving force" behind the constitutional violation [Plaintiffs] suffered.'. . But Plaintiffs' allegations, in contrast those offered by the plaintiffs in A.E., specify the content of the policies, customs, or practices the execution of which gave rise to Plaintiffs' Constitutional injuries. . . Plaintiffs allege that County Defendants 'routinely enforce' § 14602.6 by: seizing and impounding vehicles on the basis that the driver does not have a current, valid California driver's license, including when the vehicle was not presenting a hazard or a threat to public safety; keeping the vehicle [even though] someone was available to pay the impound fee to date, usually for the 30 day period specified by § 14602.6; seizing and impounding vehicles even though the driver has previously been licensed, whether in California or a foreign jurisdiction; failing and refusing to [provide] a hearing on the justification for impounding the vehicle for 30 days; failing and refusing to provide notice of the reason for impounding the vehicle for 30 days; and, on information and belief, charging an above-cost administrative fee. (Docket No.1, at p. 4.) These allegations, in contrast those set out by the plaintiffs in A.E., specify the content of the policies, customs, or practices the execution of which gave rise to Plaintiffs' constitutional injuries. . . The allegations are sufficient to 'give fair notice and to enable the opposing party to defend itself effectively,' particularly since information relating to the policies, customs, and practices of County Defendants in enforcing § 14602.6 and related statutory sections is likely to be easily available to them. . . As to Starr's second prong—whether the allegations 'plausibly suggest entitlement to relief"—it is inherently plausible that Plaintiffs' constitutional claims, which largely are based in the alleged misconstruction of or failure to comply with California statutory law, arose as a result of the County Defendants' customs, policies, or practices. . . To the extent that Plaintiffs' allegations relating to each individual Constitutional claim satisfy Rule 8(a), plaintiffs therefore have pled facts sufficient to state a claim that County Defendants are liable under Monell.")

Brown v. Contra Costa County, No. C 12–1923 PJH, 2012 WL 4804862, *11, *12 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 9, 2012) ("Prior to Iqbal and Twombly, the long-standing rule was that a plaintiff need only make 'a bare allegation that the individual [defendants'] conduct conformed to official policy, custom, or practice.' Karim—Panahi, 839 F.2d 621, 623 (9th Cir.1988). Indeed, the Supreme Court rejected a heightened pleading standard for Monell claims in Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 168 (1993). While neither Iqbal nor Twombly overruled Leatherman, the pleading standard for Monell claims has been thrown into question, and, in the Ninth Circuit at least, appears to have been modified. In Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1216 (9th Cir.2011), cert. denied, 132 S.Ct. 2101 (2012), the Ninth Circuit considered the impact of Iqbal and Twombly, and concluded that a pleading of municipal liability 'must contain sufficient allegations of underlying facts to give fair notice and to enable the opposing party to defend itself effectively,' and that the facts must 'plausibly suggest an entitlement to relief.' Id. at 1216 (citations omitted); see also AE ex rel. Hernandez v. County of Tulare, 666 F.3d 631, 636–38 (9th Cir.2012) (noting impact of recent Supreme Court decisions, including Twombly/Iqbal, on pleading standards, and applying Starr to municipal liability claims, holding that 'plausible facts supporting a policy or custom ... could ... cure[ ] the deficiency in [a] Monell claim'). Here, the court finds that while the FAC alleges all three bases for Monell liability, it asserts legal conclusions only. That is, there are no facts pled in support of any of these theories of liability. Accordingly, the motion to dismiss must be GRANTED with leave to amend to allege facts sufficient to state a claim against the County under §§ 1981 and 1983.")

Cannon v. City of Petaluma, No. C 11–0651 PJH, 2012 WL 1183732, at *19 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 6, 2012) ("Prior to the U.S. Supreme Court's decisions in Twombly and Iqbal, a claim of municipal liability based on nothing more than a bare allegation that the individual officers' conduct conformed to official policy, custom, or practice was sufficient to state a claim. . . However, the Supreme Court has now made clear that conclusory, 'threadbare' allegations that merely recite the elements of a cause of action will not withstand a motion to dismiss. . . In light of Iqbal, it appears that the prior Ninth Circuit pleading standard for Monell claims—'bare allegations'—is no longer viable.")

Smith-Downs v. City of Stockton, No. 2:10–cv–02495–MCE–GGH, 2012 WL 671932, at *9, *10 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 29, 2012) ("In arguing that the FAC sufficiently states a Monell claim against the City, Ulring, and Moore, Plaintiffs rely on the Ninth Circuit's pre-Iqbal decision in Karim–Panahi, 839 F.2d 621, 624 (9th Cir.1988), which held that 'a claim of municipal liability under section 1983 is sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss even if the claim is based on nothing more than a bare allegation that the individual officers' conduct conformed to official policy, custom, or practice.'. . Plaintiffs' reliance on pre-Iqbal law to demonstrate sufficiency of their complaint is misplaced. The Supreme Court in Iqbal made it clear that conclusory, 'threadbare' allegations merely reciting the elements of a cause of action cannot defeat the Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. . . Thus, a viable Monell claim against the City, Ulring and Moore requires more than 'labels and conclusions' or 'a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action.'. .The FAC does not contain any factual allegations plausibly demonstrating that the City, Ulring or Moore had official or de facto policies of failure to train police officers and deputy sheriffs. Plaintiffs have failed to identify what training practices the City, Ulring or Moore had and how these practices were deficient. . . .Accordingly, construing the facts in the light most favorable to the non-moving party, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have failed to state a Monell claim upon which relief can be granted.")

Tandel v. County of Sacramento, Nos. 2:11–cv–00353–MCE–GGH, 2:09–cv–00842–MCE–GGH, 2012 WL 602981, at *17 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 23, 2012) ("A pre- Iqbal Ninth Circuit decision held that 'a claim of municipal liability under section 1983 is sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss even if the claim is based on nothing more than a bare allegation that the individual officers' conduct conformed to official policy, custom, or practice.' Whitaker v. Garcetti, 486 F.3d 572, 581 (9th Cir.2007). However, the Supreme Court in Iqbal made it clear that conclusory, 'threadbare' allegations merely reciting the elements of a cause of action cannot defeat the Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. . . Thus, a Monell claim against the County requires more than 'labels and conclusions' or 'a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action.' ")

J.K.G. v. County of San Diego, No. 11CV305 JLS (RBB), 2011 WL 5218253, 7 (S.D. Cal. Nov. 2, 2011) ("In order to withstand a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, a Monell claim must consist of more than mere 'formulaic recitations of the existence of unlawful policies, customs, or habits.' Warner v. Cnty, of San Diego, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14312, at *10 (S.D.Cal., Feb. 14, 2011). Prior to the Supreme Court's holdings in Twombly and Iqbal, the Ninth Circuit had held that 'a claim of municipal liability under section 1983 is sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss "even if the claim is based on nothing more than a bare allegation that the individual officers' conduct conformed to official policy, custom, or practice."'. . In light of Twombly and Iqbal, however, something more is required; mere conclusory allegations are insufficient. . . Here, the Court finds that Plaintiff's complaint does not meet the pleading requirements of Twombly and Iqbal. Plaintiff merely recites the existence of unlawful policies, practices, and customs, without supporting these conclusory allegations with specific facts. Plaintiff has provided no facts from which to infer that the County 'condones' the use of excessive force, unlawful searches and seizures, or the filing of false police reports, outside this one alleged instance.")

Von Haar v. City of Mountain View, No. 10-CV-02995-LHK, 2011 WL 782242, at *5 n.2 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 1, 2011) ("The Ninth Circuit does not appear to have considered whether the Supreme Court's decisions in Iqbal and Twombly would require something more than 'bare allegations' regarding municipal liability. Here, however, Plaintiff alleges more than bare legal conclusions and identifies three specific areas in which the City of Mountain View, pursuant to practice and custom, allegedly fails to adequately train its officers. Such a claim is cognizable under Section 1983, although liability will not ultimately attach unless Plaintiff can prove deliberate indifference.")

Kelly v. Spokane Airport Bd., No. CV-10-0312-LRS, 2011 WL 204867, 4 (E.D. Wash. Jan. 20, 2011) ("Taking all of Plaintiff's allegations together, the Court finds Plaintiff has sufficiently pleaded a claim of municipality liability against SIA. Plaintiff has gone beyond the minimal 'bare allegations' standard followed by the Ninth Circuit. Plaintiff has alleged Defendant Olsen deprived Plaintiff of certain constitutional rights, that Defendant SIA had a policy which amounts to deliberate indifference to Plaintiff's and others' constitutional rights, that the Defendants acted pursuant to such policy, and that the policy was the moving force behind the constitutional violations. Plaintiff has plausibly alleged facts which suggest but do not prove that the Defendants may have legal liability herein. However, without basic discovery, Plaintiff cannot reasonably be expected to go further at this time. Plaintiff is not required at this stage in the litigation to state with any extra specificity the nature and extent of this de facto policy by Defendant. Defendant SIA's motion to dismiss should be denied in this respect.")

Canas v. City of Sunnyvale, No. C 08-5771 JF (PSG), 2011 WL 1743910, at *6, *7 (N.D. Cal. Jan. 19, 2011) ("Despite the length of these allegations, the Court concludes that the facts alleged are insufficient to support a theory of municipal liability. Although '[t]he Ninth Circuit has held that a bare allegation that individual officials' conduct conformed to official policy, custom, or practice suffices to plead a Monell claim in this circuit'[citing cases], these cases no longer are controlling in the post- Iqbal/ Twombly era. . . . Although Plaintiffs have been litigating their claims for more than three years and have had several opportunities to amend, their Monell allegations still are conclusory in nature. Other than alleging that the officers' EMT training was inadequate [to] enable them to assist the Decedent after he was shot, Plaintiffs do not explain in detail how the City's alleged policies or customs are deficient, nor do they explain how the alleged policies or customs caused harm to Plaintiffs and the Decedent. . . . [On the inadequate training claim], [a]lthough Plaintiffs allege that the City provides less training in police work than is required by POST standards, they do not identify the relevant standards or otherwise explain how the City's policies result in 'diluted training.'. . To the extent that Plaintiffs' seek to establish municipal liability based on the theory that the City ratified the alleged unconstitutional conduct of the officers, the claim also fails to meet the Iqbal standard. Plaintiffs' ratification claim appears to be based solely on the fact that the City's investigation did not result in disciplinary action against the officers.")

Ward v. Nevada, No. 3:09-CV-00007-RCJ-VPC, 2010 WL 1633461, at *5 (D. Nev. Feb. 26, 2010) ("Here, plaintiff's complaint mentions that one of the defendants failed 'to instruct, supervise, and train their employees and agents' in the delivery of medical care to detainees. . . . Then plaintiff alleges that both defendants acted 'pursuant to policies, customs, practices, rules, regulations, ordinances, statutes and/or usages of the State of Nevada.'. . These bare allegations lack the required factual content to overcome a motion to dismiss. The Supreme Court has explained in Iqbal that, under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a), a plaintiff must support claims with factual content. . . . However, Karim-Panahi v. Los Angeles Police Dep't, 839 F.2d 621, 624 (9th Cir.1988), notes that § 1983 claims for municipal liability can be 'based on nothing more than a bare allegation that the individual officers' conduct conformed to official policy, custom, or practice.' The Ninth Circuit's ruling in Karim-Panahi gathered support under Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 168 (1993), which rejected any heightened pleading standard with respect to § 1983 claims for municipal liability. Accord Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 515 (2002) (holding that plaintiff in Title VII discrimination claim need not allege 'specific facts' beyond those necessary to state a claim). Nonetheless, Leatherman held that the pleading of municipal liability claims is to remain consistent with those standards under Rule 8. See Leatherman, 507 U.S. at 168. Turning to the most recent controlling law on Rule 8, Iqbal and Twombly declare that allegations must be supported by factual content, and the Court makes no exceptions for § 1983 municipal liability claims. Therefore, plaintiff's amended complaint should seek to include factual content to support his allegations.").

Coric v. County of Fresno, No. 1:08cv1225 JTM (BLM), 2010 WL 364322, at *3, *4 (E.D. Cal. Jan. 25, 2010) ("Plaintiff alleges that despite Sheriff Mims' 'warning' to county officials of the over crowding and under staffing in the jail, the County continued to inadequately fund the jail, even after Plaintiff was beaten in the absence of sufficient supervision. . . Construing this factual allegation as true and in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the Court finds it is possible to draw an inference that the County acted consciously in its budget decisions regarding funding to the jail. . . . Plaintiff alleges, 'the County of Fresno were [sic] well aware that they were under staffed[ ] for the amount of inmates housed in Fresno County Jail' and 'ignored the risk of injuries (in this case serious) as a result of being under staff [sic].'. . Plaintiff further states, among other things, 'the Sheriffs dept. had clearly informed the County that the over-crowding and under staffing was a real issue.'. . Again, if the Court assumes the factual content of Plaintiff's Complaint to be true, the information about under staffing and over crowding that was given to County officials by Sheriff Mims, and the attack on Plaintiff itself (documented in letters and medical reports), provide a plausible claim that both the Sheriff and County knew, or that it was obvious, that over crowding and under staffing would eventually lead to a violation of detainees' constitutional right to protection. . . . According to Plaintiff, had there been sufficient numbers of officers on duty at the time he was attacked, the attacks would not have happened, nor would the perpetrators have had the time and opportunity to drag him back to the scene for a second beating when he attempted to leave for help. Plaintiff asserts 'there wasn't any staff watching out for inmates safety during the time Plaintiff was [ ] beaten! Plaintiff wasn't beaten once (1), but twice (2), Plaintiff dragged back to a second beating for attempting to leave and find someone to Help him. A period of time passed for both attacks to happen.'. . Taken as true, and construed in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff, these facts lead to a reasonable inference that inadequate funding for sufficient staff presence led to the attack on Plaintiff. Having assessed the four conditions that need to be alleged under Monell, the Court finds Plaintiff's Complaint contains sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, that allows the Court to draw a reasonable inference of liability on the part of Defendant. Iqbal, 556 U.S. __, 129 S.Ct. at 1949, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009).").

Kassim Abdulkhalik v. City of San Diego, No. 08CV1515-MMA (NLS), 2009 WL 4282004, at *10, *11 (S.D. Cal. Nov. 25, 2009) ("A plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to assert a Monell claim ' Aeven if the claim is based on nothing more than a bare allegation that the individual officers' conduct conformed to official policy, custom, or practice.'' Karim-Panahi v. Los Angeles Police Department, 839 F.2d 621, 624 (9th Cir.1988) (quoting Shah v. County of Los Angeles, 797 F.2d 743, 747 (9th Cir.1986)). Here, Plaintiff's allegations are sufficient under the standards set forth supra. Specifically, Plaintiff alleges: Defendant City of San Diego effectively has condoned and ratified the use of excessive and unnecessary force and other violations of constitutional rights of persons in San Diego by failing to thoroughly investigate such violations, punish those responsible, and modify its training, procedures, and policies to prevent the recurrence of same, which caused the violation of Kassim Abdulkhalik's rights. By ratifying and condoning the violation of its citizens' constitutional rights, including the rights of Mr. Abdulkhalik, Defendant City of San Diego has encouraged the future use of excessive force and other constitutional violations. . . Plaintiff alleges that the City has adopted a custom or policy of failing to investigate violations of constitutional rights or modify its training, procedures, and policies to prevent future constitutional violations. Plaintiff alleges that by adopting this policy, the City has essentially condoned and ratified the use of excessive and unnecessary force, which led to the injuries ultimately alleged by Plaintiff. Plaintiff also alleges facts to support his allegations that the City indeed has such a policy by alleging facts that McBeth filed a complaint of harassment with the San Diego Police Department against McMurrin, but that the SDPD never contacted Mr. Abdulkhalik in connection with this complaint and never bothered to tell Mr. McBeth how his complaint was addressed − if at all.' (Id . at & 16.) Plaintiff's allegations are sufficient to state a claim for liability under Monell. Thus, the Court hereby DENIES Defendants' motion for judgment on the pleadings on this claim.").

Carnes v. Salvino, No. CV-08-1846-PHX-GMS, 2009 WL 2568643, at *5 (D. Ariz. Aug. 18, 2009) (" 'In [the Ninth Circuit], a claim of municipal liability under § 1983 is sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss even if the claim is based on nothing more than a bare allegation that the individual officers' conduct conformed to official policy, custom, or practice.'' Whitaker v. Garcetti, 486 F.3d 572, 581 (9th Cir.2007); see also Lee v. City of Los Angeles, 250 F.3d 668, 682-83 (9th Cir.2001); Peschel v. City of Missoula, No. CV 08-79- M-JCL, 2009 WL 902438, at *4 (D. Mont. Mar. 27, 2009) (citing multiple Ninth Circuit district court cases that have applied the "bare allegations" standard post-Twombly).")

Young v. City of Visalia, No. 1:09-CV-115 AWI GSA, 2009 WL 2567847, at *6 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 18, 2009) ("In light of Iqbal, it would seem that the prior Ninth Circuit pleading standard for Monell claims (i.e. "bare allegations") is no longer viable.").

TENTH CIRCUIT

McCubbin v. Weber County, No. 1:15-CV-132, 2017 WL 3394593, at *20 (D. Utah Aug. 7, 2017) ("In this case, Plaintiffs' allegations hue much more closely to municipal action or inaction that itself violated federal law, rather than a single bad decision tied to a facially valid policy or practice. Thus, issues of fault and causation are less difficult here. Plaintiffs allege that Weber County's policy of identifying who to serve with the gang-specific injunction itself violated the Constitution by being wholly discretionary, and inviting subjectivity and improper ethnic considerations into the service and enforcement of the injunction. Plaintiffs' allegations also appear to involve a pattern of tortious conduct by Weber and Ogden agents: Hispanics were disproportionately targeted and served, at least two non-gang members were successfully prosecuted under the injunction, and at least two non-gang members remain on a gang database for future enforcement actions. Whether these pattern allegations simply reinforce the claim that municipal policy or practice itself violated the constitution, or also suggest some other, narrower theory of liability, such as failure to train or supervise, the allegations plausibly support an inference of deliberate indifference on the part of the municipality itself to the consequences of the policy or practice, that is, injury to the Plaintiffs' First Amendment and due process rights. And whether these allegations more appropriately support that a decisionmaker, like Mr. Allred, promulgated an actual policy attributable to the County, or that the County permitted a practice so persistent as practically to have the force of law—or whether the evidence fails to live up to either view—will become apparent as discovery proceeds. . . For now, the allegations on the whole support both theories. Plaintiffs have stated plausible § 1983 claims for municipal liability in these circumstances.")

Bark v. Chacon, No. 10-cv-01570-WYD-MJW, 2011 WL 1884691, at *3, *4 (D. Colo. May 18, 2011) ("Here, I find that Plaintiff's allegations regarding the City's and County's failure to adequately train and supervise its police officers are not sufficient to state a claim for municipal liability under § 1983 and Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6). While Plaintiff generally alleges that the City and County have not properly trained or supervised the individual Defendants with respect to certain tasks such as obtaining search warrants, recognizing exigent circumstances, giving Miranda warnings, questioning suspects, as well as concepts of reasonable suspicion and probable cause, he fails to allege specific deficiencies in training and supervision, or explain how the incident described in the Amended Complaint could have been avoided with different or better training and supervision. Mere conclusory allegations that an officer or group of officers are unsatisfactorily trained will not 'suffice to fasten liability on the city.'. . . Even construing the allegations in the Amended Complaint in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, I find that Plaintiff has set forth only a 'formulaic recitation' of the elements of a § 1983 claim based on failure to train and supervise and, therefore, Plaintiff's claims against the City and County based on inadequate training and supervision should be dismissed under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6).")

Twitchell v. Hutton, No. 10-cv-01939-WYD-KMT, 2011 WL 318827, at *6 (D. Colo. Jan. 28, 2011) ("[H]ere, since Plaintiff has set forth only a 'formulaic recitation' of the elements of a § 1983 claim based on failure to train, Plaintiff's inadequate training allegation should be dismissed against the City under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6).")

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Plowright v. Miami Dade County, 102 F.4th 1358, 1370-71 (11th Cir. 2024) ("In the first count of his second amended complaint, Plowright alleged in conclusory fashion that the county 'had a county wide custom of shooting ... dogs.'. . Without any additional details about the circumstances of past incidents, however—including whether the dogs in question posed an imminent threat—Plowright failed to allege facts plausibly indicating that there was such a custom or, even if there was, that the custom 'constituted deliberate indifference to [his] constitutional right[s].'. . Plowright's bare assertion that Rondon and Cordova were 'act[ing] in their role as decision makers for the county' when they encountered Niles, . . . is likewise too conclusory to carry his claim[.] . .Plowright's second claim against the county fares no better. Although a municipality can be held liable under § 1983 for a 'policy- or custom-based failure to adequately train or supervise its employees,' Plowright alleged no facts indicating that the county 'was aware of the need to train or supervise its employees' on encounters with domestic animals before the incident giving rise to his complaint. . . Once again, Plowright's naked statement that the county 'knew or should have known [Rondon and Cordova] did not have adequate policy training' about how to deal with domestic animals, . . . is insufficient to satisfy the pleading standard. To the extent that Plowright seeks to rely on the news article attached to his second amended complaint, that attempt also fails. The article does not show that these incidents happened before Cordova shot Niles or that they involved circumstances in which a reasonable officer could not have believed that the dogs posed an imminent danger. Because Plowright failed to state a claim under Monell, the district court properly dismissed his claims against the county.")

Hoefling v. City of Miami, 811 F.3d 1271, 1280 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Although Mr. Hoefling may ultimately have to identify (and provide proof concerning) a single final policymaker in order to survive summary judgment or prevail at trial, . . . we do not think that he had to name that person in his complaint in order to survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. All he needed to do was allege a policy, practice, or custom of the City which caused the seizure and destruction of his sailboat. And that, as we detail below, he did.")

Banuchi on behalf of the Estate of Foster v. City of Homestead, No. 20-25133-CIV, 2021 WL 2333265, at *5–6 (S.D. Fla. June 8, 2021) ("In count four, Banuchi alleges the City had a number of unofficial customs or practices, falling, more or less, into three general categories: (1) insufficient investigations or processing of complaints of officer misconduct . . . (2) inadequate recordkeeping . . . and (3) maintenance of a 'code of silence' among City officers. . . According to Banuchi, these practices resulted in Foster's shooting death. . . In its motion to dismiss, the City argues that, despite summarily identifying a long list of what Banuchi describes as 'de facto policies, practices and/or customs,' Banuchi has failed to set forth any actual factual allegations establishing that the City has a widespread pattern and practice of inadequately handling police misconduct complaints, insufficient recordkeeping, or an improper 'code of silence.' The Court agrees. Banuchi says that the factual basis of her claim rests on her allegations of the City's 'continued use of an officer with a well-known history of on-duty shootings and on-duty killings of civilians.'. . Banuchi maintains her complaint 'alleges five prior on-duty shootings plus a catalogue of other misconduct and police violence by Green prior to the Foster shooting.'. . She also says that count four 'details the customs and practices that allowed Green to remain armed despite numerous on-duty shootings and numerous investigations into alleged excessive force, neglect of duty, unbecoming conduct, unreasonable searches and seizures, illegal arrests, illegal seizures, and other misconduct.'. . But Banuchi's allegations, along with her characterization of those allegations, are problematic. First, the vast majority of Banuchi's allegations are comprised of vague and conclusory assertions, devoid of factual support. For example, Banuchi lists dozens of 'de facto policies, practice, and/or customs'. . . but provides no factual support that would establish the necessary widespread and persistent practice required for municipal liability. Similarly, Banuchi's vague claims that 'complaints have been lodged against ... Green for excessive force, neglect of duty, unbecoming conduct, unreasonable search and seizure, illegal arrest, illegal seizure, and other misconduct'. . . are both factually unsupported and, in any event, insufficient. Banuchi provides no context for the 'complaints': Who submitted them? When were they submitted? To whom were they submitted? How many were there? What did they say? Further, even if Banuchi had set forth facts supporting the existence of the alleged complaints, she fails to allege whether the complaints were ever substantiated in any way. Lastly, her reference to Green's having 'used deadly force against three others and excessive force not resulting in death against a fourth'. . . is also conclusory and vague: missing is any allegation that the deadly force was improper or any facts showing that the force, against the fourth person, was actually excessive.

Banuchi's summarily labelling it as excessive, is simply not enough. Banuchi's separate allegations, as to Green's prior shooting incidents, elsewhere in her complaint fare no better. While she provides more details about the shootings, she fails to even allege that any of them amounted to excessive force. . . In sum, Banuchi fails to allege facts supporting the kind of widespread, known, and substantially similar constitutional violations that are required to state a Monell against the City. Second, Banuchi's characterization of her complaint's allegations, in her response, is misleading. She argues that her complaint 'alleges ... a catalogue of ... misconduct and police violence by Green prior to the Foster shooting.'. . Tellingly, she provides no citation to her complaint to support her claim. And, indeed, there is no factual support for Banuchi's portrayal of Green's prior 'misconduct' or unconstitutional 'police violence' anywhere in the complaint. Accordingly, then, Banuchi has failed to allege facts showing a pattern of prior known, constitutional violations that rise to the level of establishing any kind of unofficial policy that could have led to Green's shooting of Foster. Accordingly, the Court dismisses count four. . . . In count five, Banuchi identifies a number of City 'failures': a failure to maintain or utilize an 'early warning system' to detect personnel problems . . . a failure to identify officers with the highest numbers of complaints . . . and a failure to 'act on' the identification of officers with the highest number of personnel complaints[.] . . Once again, like her allegations in count four, Banuchi's claims of 'de facto policies, practices, and/or customs' are wholly unsupported by any accompanying facts. The cases Banuchi relies on as support prove the point: in contrast to her own allegations, the complaints in those cases allege actual facts establishing a history of excessive force. . . And so, for the same reasons set forth above, in the preceding section, the Court dismisses count five because Banuchi fails to allege facts showing a pattern of prior known, constitutional violations that rise to the level of establishing an unofficial policy that led to Green's shooting of Foster.")

Burns v. City of Alexander City, 110 F.Supp.3d 1237, 1250 (M.D. Ala. 2015) ("As to the Alexander City Defendants' contention that the Second Amended Complaint does not satisfy the basic requirements of notice pleading, Plaintiffs argue that they have alleged enough at this point, in light of Judge Thompson's holding in Porter, supra, in which the plaintiffs brought a claim for § 1983 municipal liability against the City of Enterprise, Alabama. . . . The complaint in Porter and the Second Amended Complaint in the present case are similar enough that Porter is persuasive. Here, Plaintiffs allege that a deliberate indifference is at work in Alexander City based on what Plaintiffs contend are acts of unlawful uses of force prior to Mr. Crayton's death that were known to Alexander City, which is like enough to arguing a 'consistent' failure by the City to train. Upon consideration of Porter, the Alexander City Defendants' argument that the Second Amended Complaint is insufficient under Twombly, Iqbal, and Rule 8, Fed.R.Civ.P., is not compelling. . . . Accordingly, the motion to dismiss the municipal liability claims is due to be denied.")

Bell v. Shelby County, Ala., No. 2:12–CV–2991–LSC, 2013 WL 5566269, *3-*5 (N.D. Ala. Oct. 8, 2013) ("Counties in Alabama do not participate in the day to day governance of the jail or the creation of its policies; they merely provides the funding. . . Nonetheless, a county may be liable if its failure to provide funding 'constituted deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm to the prisoners.'. . In this case, therefore, Shelby County could be liable for its own actions in providing (or failing to provide) the funding for the jail. Plaintiff must therefore plead facts that allow the court to plausibly infer that the County government acted with deliberate indifference regarding this funding. In her pleadings, Plaintiff alleges two potential factual bases for a finding of deliberate indifference on the part of Shelby County. First, she alleges the County failed to provide funding for the medical treatment of prisoners. . . Secondly, Plaintiff alleges Shelby County failed to provide funding for the maintenance of the jail, including its plumbing system. . . The factual support for these two claims varies greatly in Plaintiff's pleadings, and the Court will thus address them separately. The first claim, regarding funding for the medical treatment of prisoners, is due to be dismissed. In Ancata, the Eleventh Circuit held that counties had a non-delegable duty to provide for indigent prisoners' medical treatment. . . Thus, if Shelby County had taken any action that contributed to the violation of Allred's constitutional right to treatment, it could not hide behind an outside contractor to avoid liability for it. However, this does not absolve Plaintiff of her duty to plead facts that plausibly allege that the County actually did something to contribute to the violation. . .Here, Plaintiff alleges only that 'the lack of funding for appropriate medical care for inmates, caused or contributed to the utter denial of treatment to Allred, as a cost saving mechanism.'. . This conclusory statement cannot suffice to survive a motion to dismiss, especially when Plaintiff has not even pleaded any facts that support a conclusion that a lack of funding existed in the first place. Plaintiff presents no facts, or even allegations, concerning the jail's budget, or any decision by the County to cut or limit that budget by limiting prisoner healthcare. Plaintiff provides no factual basis to infer that the jail nurse who turned Allred away without treatment did so because of a lack of funding. She does not allege that jail officials failed to notice Allred's illness because the jail was understaffed or because of security problems that could be tied to a funding failure. . . Likewise, Plaintiff presents no facts alleging that any of the other incidents mentioned in her Third Amended Complaint were caused by a lack of funding. . .Even in Ancata, which was decided prior to the Supreme Court's abrogation of the 'any set of facts' standard, the Plaintiff provided considerably more substance from which to infer a lack of funds from the county. . . In that case, the prisoner was twice denied treatment until a court order was obtained, so the court could legitimately infer at least the possibility of a county policy requiring such an order. . . Here we have only the fact that the decedent received no treatment. The Court is permitted to infer 'obvious alternative explanation[s]' that reflect lawful conduct instead of the violations Plaintiff claims. . . The facts here make it at least as likely that Shelby County properly funded a contract that should have served the prisoners' needs, and that the denial of treatment stemmed from either the mistakes or the deliberate indifference of entities other than Shelby County. The County cannot be held liable under § 1983 for any actions not its own. . . Therefore, Plaintiff has not stated a claim against Shelby County for failure to fund medical treatment, and this claim must be dismissed. It does not follow, however, that the same result must be reached regarding Plaintiff's allegations that Shelby County failed to properly fund the maintenance of the jail. Plaintiff provides considerably more factual support for this claim. She claims that the plumbing system was not maintained in proper order. More specifically she alleges that drinking fountains were inoperable and that the hot water regulation failed at multiple times during Allred's incarceration. Because this regulation failed, the water was sometimes too hot to cup in one's hands or drink. Deterioration in the physical upkeep of the jail can serve as the basis of a complaint that prisoners' constitutional rights have been violated. . . While the maintenance problems alleged in the present case may not be as severe as those in Marsh, the Court is not prepared to dismiss this claim. Plaintiff further alleges that the plumbing problems in the jail contributed to Allred's injuries by leading to dehydration, which is one cause of hepatic encephalopathy. Dehydration could also have contributed to the severity of Allred's bronchopneumonia. The Court may thus plausibly infer that Shelby County's failure to maintain the jail was one cause of Plaintiff's injuries. At the least, these facts form a framework that makes it reasonably likely that discovery will reveal further evidence. . . Therefore, Plaintiff's claim against Shelby County set out in Count I for failure to maintain the plumbing system in the jail survives this motion to dismiss.")

Rykard v. City of Dothan, No. 1:10-cv-868-MHT, 2011 WL 3875609, at *3 (M.D. Ala. Aug. 9, 2011) ("The City argues that Plaintiff fails to point to any pervasive custom or practice of city jail personnel failing to give prisoners the medication. However, a review of the complaint clearly shows that Plaintiff specifically averred '[t]he City of Dothan through its agents and employees and pursuant to a policy of the city failed to provide the plaintiff with the medication prescribed.'. . Further, there is no heightened pleading standard as to § 1983 claims asserted against municipal defendants. . . Thus, Plaintiff must simply satisfy the basic pleading requirement of Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(2) which requires a 'short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.' In order for the plaintiff to satisfy his 'obligation to provide the grounds of his entitlement to relief,' he must allege more than 'labels and conclusions'; his complaint must include '[f]actual allegations [adequate] to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.'. . Further, the Supreme Court has further stated that '[t]o survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face ... A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.'. . . Turning to the complaint at issue, the Court finds that there are sufficient allegations which allow the Court to reasonably infer that the defendant may be liable for the alleged misconduct. Taking the facts as true − as the Court must do − Plaintiff informed numerous jail personnel of her worsening medical condition and all these personnel ignored and neglected her over some period of time. There are reasonable facts to infer that a policy and custom exists where multiple city employees repeatedly ignore a detainee's ongoing requests for medical care despite obvious serious symptoms. Thus, the Court determines that dismissal is inappropriate as this nascent phase of the lawsuit. The claim is more properly addressed at summary judgment.")

Cooper v. City of Starke, Fla., No. 3:10-cv-280-J-34MCR, 2011 WL 1100142, at *6-*8 (M.D. Fla. Mar. 23, 2011) ("To the extent Plaintiffs contend that Smith is subject to supervisory liability on the basis of a 'failure to train and/or supervise,' Plaintiffs have failed to identify any specific deficiency or deficiencies in Smith's training and/or supervision of Watson and Crews. Moreover, Plaintiffs do not adequately allege that the failure to train amounted to deliberate indifference because Plaintiffs do not set forth any facts demonstrating that Smith had notice of a need to train and/or supervise. . . . Although, in their introductory paragraphs Plaintiffs assert in a conclusory fashion that Defendants have 'tolerated, condoned and encouraged a pattern of brutality and excessive force,'. . . the Amended Complaint is devoid of any facts in support of this contention. . . . Thus, the Court finds that Plaintiffs' vague references to unidentified failures, policies, and patterns are not sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss. . . .Similar to the principles for supervisory liability, a municipality also may not be held liable for constitutional deprivations on the theory of respondeat superior. Upon review, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs' boilerplate and conclusory allegations of municipal policy or practice − devoid of factual development − are insufficient to state a § 1983 claim. Plaintiffs fail to identify any actual policies or decision makers and, in describing only the single incident of force involving Plaintiffs, fail to offer any facts to support the existence of a widespread custom.")

Oliver v. City of Montgomery, Ala., No. 2:10-cv-467-MHT, 2011 WL 833954, at *9 (M.D. Ala. Feb. 15, 2011) ("The Supreme Court has made it clear that courts may not impose a heightened pleading requirement for claims pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against municipal entities. See Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence & Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 167-68, 113 S.Ct. 1160, 1162-63, 122 L.Ed.2d 517 (1993). However, this Court does not attempt to impose any kind of 'heightened' requirement, but rather the basic pleading requirements of Fed.R.Civ.P. 8. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, __ U.S. __, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949 (2009). . . A careful review of the plaintiffs' facts fail to show a claim that any deprivation of their rights was attributable to a policy or custom of the City of Montgomery.")

Robbins v. City of Miami Beach, No. 09-20804-CIV, 2009 WL 3448192, at *2 (S.D. Fla. Oct. 26, 2009) ("Here, Robbins's alleges that the City of Miami Beach's failure to investigate excessive force complaints is a 'custom or policy' that was the 'moving force [behind] the constitutional violation' at issue. . . In the pleadings, Robbins submits that the City has refused to properly investigate excessive force complaints and failed to discipline or prosecute police officers for using excessive force. The plaintiff claims that when incidents of excessive force are investigated, the investigation reports omit unfavorable evidence, exclude statements of non-police witnesses, and rely solely on the word of the police officers involved. These factual allegations are sufficient to support municipal liability for constitutional violations pertaining to excessive force. However, no facts whatsoever have been alleged to support municipal liability under § 1983 for equal protection violations or for the alleged conspiracy, and, therefore, these claims must be dismissed.").

M. Ethical Concerns for Government Attorneys

Note the ethical problems for government attorneys who might be required to defend both the government body and its employees. After Monell, there is the potential for a conflict of interest between the local government body and its employee when both are named as defendants in a § 1983 suit. It is in the interest of the local government unit to establish that the employee was not acting pursuant to any official policy or custom. The employee, on the other hand, may avoid or substantially reduce personal liability by asserting that his conduct was pursuant to official policy. See Dunton v. County of Suffolk, 729 F.2d 903 (2d Cir. 1984). But see Patterson v. Balsamico, 440 F.3d 104, 114, 115 (2d Cir. 2006) ("In Dunton, . . . this court declined to create a per se rule requiring disqualification whenever a municipality and its employees are jointly represented in a Section 1983 case. . . Rather, a case-by-case determination is required, and it is clear that the facts of this case do not rise to the level of those in Dunton. It is true that Gorman represented all defendants from the time this action was first filed on December 18, 2000 until shortly after this Court remanded the case to the district court. However, Gorman had successfully obtained the dismissal of all claims against all defendants in the district court, and there was no apparent conflict in the interests Gorman represented on appeal. Balsamico's position was that he did not participate in the January 1999 incident. That position was not inconsistent with the County's position. Moreover, on September 17, 2004, approximately five weeks before the commencement of trial on October 25, 2004, a new lawyer, Diodati, was substituted for Gorman to represent Balsamico. At trial, therefore, Balsamico was represented by counsel who had no potential conflict of interest. This case is materially distinguishable from Dunton, where the same attorney represented both the municipality and an individual defendant at trial and where there was an actual conflict of interest in the positions that were of benefit to the two clients. This Court has found a new trial unnecessary even where municipal counsel actually represented individual officers employed by the municipality at trial where there was no actual conflict of interest. Rodick v. City of Schenectady, 1 F.3d 1341, 1350 (2d Cir.1993). The defense attorney in Rodick, as here, had jointly represented the municipality and individual police officers prior to trial, and had successfully sought dismissal of the claims against the municipality. Although, unlike this case, the same attorney remained on the case on behalf of the individual defendants throughout the trial, this Court concluded that whatever potential conflict may have existed did not require a new trial because defense counsel advanced and argued all possible defenses available to the officers, including the qualified immunity defense. . . This case more closely resembles Rodick than Dunton. We required a new trial in Dunton because the defense attorney had in fact advanced arguments at trial that were directly contrary to the individual officer's interests. . . . It is clear that, as was true in Rodick, Balsamico cannot make the required showing of a sufficiently serious actual conflict of interest. The particular conflict cited in Dunton as inherent in Section 1983 actions against municipalities, namely that the municipality can escape liability by arguing that its employees were not acting within the scope of official employment while the employee can escape liability by arguing the opposite, is simply not present here. At no time did Gorman assert that Balsamico was acting 'outside the scope of his employment' during the January 1999 assault, as the attorney had in Dunton. Rather, Balsamico's defense, before and during trial, was that he had not actively participated in the January 1999 assault."); Moskowitz v. Coscette, No. 02-7097, 2002 WL 31541004, at *2 (2d Cir. Nov.15, 2002) (unpublished) ("We have recognized that a potential conflict can arise between the interests of a municipal employee and the interests of the municipality when both are defendants in a lawsuit arising out of the municipal employee's alleged misconduct. See Dunton v. Suffolk County, 729 F.2d 903, 907 (2d Cir.1984). For the reasons that follow, however, we do not believe that any conflict of interest here warrants Rule 60(b)(6) relief. It is true that the fact that a police officer acts pursuant to orders can bolster a qualified immunity defense where the officer could reasonably have believed that he was not violating any rights. . . .

It is also certainly possible that the jury would have viewed Coscette as less culpable had it perceived him merely to be following orders, and would not have awarded (or would have awarded lower) punitive damages. . . . Coscette's reliance on our decision in Duton v. Suffolk County, 729 F.2d 903 (2d Cir.1984), is misplaced. In Dunton, the attorney representing the municipality and the officer sacrificed the officer's interests to those of the municipality by arguing that the officer acted not as a police officer but as an irate husband. Id. at 907-08. Here, in contrast, the defense attorney did not argue that Coscette's actions went beyond the scope of his employment, and the Town had in fact conceded that Coscette's actions were taken under the color of state law. There is simply no indication that at any time before, during, or after the trial the defense attorney took a position, advanced an argument, or adopted a strategy that benefitted the Town at Coscette's expense."); Lieberman v. City of Rochester, 681 F.Supp.2d 418, 425, 429, 430 (W.D.N.Y. 2010) ("District courts have interpreted Dunton to require disqualification of counsel representing both an individual officer and the municipal employer in Section 1983 cases only where counsel acts in a way that is actually against the officer's interests. . . . In other words, a potential conflict is insufficient to warrant disqualification; rather, the employee must show that an actual conflict exists. Further, in the absence of a showing of actual prejudice to the employee, the Second Circuit has declined to disturb jury verdicts against municipal employees in Section 1983 actions where the employee was jointly represented with the municipality. . . .These post-Dunton decisions refute any suggestion by the Officers that Dunton stands for the proposition that joint representation of a municipality and its employee is prohibited in all Section 1983 cases. . . . Although the City's and the Officers' involvement in three separate proceedings arising from the same incident appears unusual, any potential conflict arising from their roles in those proceedings has been adequately addressed by the City's retention of outside counsel to represent it in the Article 75 proceeding and the Officers' Section 1983 lawsuit. To require the City to retain outside counsel in a third action − this case − without a demonstrable showing that Corporation Counsel is laboring under an actual conflict would impose an even greater financial burden on the City that is not justified under controlling precedent. My determination on the important and sensitive issues raised in this motion, however, does not exclude the possibility that circumstances may arise or change as this litigation proceeds that will necessitate revisiting those issues. For that reason, I deny the motion without prejudice to renewal.").

In Coleman v. Smith, 814 F.2d 1142 (7th Cir. 1987), the Seventh Circuit noted that it was "troubled by the Second Circuit's broad holding that after Monell an automatic conflict results when a governmental entity and one of its employees are sued jointly under section 1983." Id. at 1147-48. The court in Coleman found no conflict of interest warranting disqualification where the Village acknowledged that the individual defendants were acting in their official capacities and where the claim against the Village was of an "entirely different character" than the claim against the individual defendants. Id. at 1148.

In Silva v. Witschen, 19 F.3d 725 (1st Cir. 1994), the court upheld an award of attorney fees to the City of East Providence, Rhode Island, for fees by counsel appearing for five individual defendants, and by the City Solicitor appearing on behalf of the City and the same five individuals in their official capacities. The First Circuit agreed 'that it was reasonable for the five defendants, in their individual capacities, to obtain representation by their own counsel while the merits of plaintiffs' claims remained in litigation, since counsel to the City represented the individual defendants in their official capacities only.' Id. at 732. The court also affirmed the disallowance of fees for counsel for the individual defendants for services rendered 'after the point in time when it became clear that no conflicts of interest precluded the individual defendants' joint representation by counsel to the City.' Id.

In Atchinson v. District of Columbia, 73 F.3d 418 (D.C. Cir. 1996), the court of appeals affirmed the district court's denial of leave to amend the complaint on the eve of trial to name a police officer defendant in his individual, rather than official, capacity. The court noted that "the district court's concerns regarding Officer Collins's choice of counsel and litigation strategy seem well-founded." Id. at 427. The court further observed:

> Municipal officials sued only in their official capacities may early on, as here, agree to be represented by the municipality's attorneys. Subsequently naming the officials in their individual capacities, however, may make continued joint representation problematic, if not impossible. A municipality and officials named individually may have mutually exclusive defenses. For example, officials sued individually may find it advantageous to agree with a plaintiff that training was inadequate, for a jury might conclude that officials without proper training should not be liable for any harm caused. Because of these potential conflicts, it is possible that had the officials known all along of the potential for personal liability, they would never have agreed to joint representation at the outset. [Id.]

In Johnson v. Board of County Commissioners for the County of Fremont, 85 F.3d 489, 493-94 (10th Cir. 1996), the court adopts the following position on the conflict issue:

> While some courts have held separate representation is required in the face of the potential conflict, see, e.g., Ricciuti v. New York City Transit Auth, 796 F.Supp. 84, 88 (S.D.N.Y. 1992); Shadid v. Jackson, 521 F.Supp. 87, 90 (E.D.Tex. 1981), we decline to adopt a per se rule. We hold that when a potential conflict exists because of the different defenses available to a government official sued in his official and individual capacities, it is permissible, but not required, for the official to have separate counsel for his two capacities. See Silva v. Witschen, 19 F.3d 725, 732 (1st Cir. 1994); Richmond Hilton Assocs. v. City of Richmond, 690 F.2d 1086, 1089 (4th Cir. 1982); Clay v. Doherty, 608 F.Supp. 295, 303 (N.D.Ill. 1985). Obviously, if the potential conflict matures into an actual material conflict, separate representation would be required. [citing Dunton and Clay] Model Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 1.7. Though separate representation is permissible, an attorney may not undertake only the official capacity representation at his or her sole convenience. Under Colorado Rules of Professional Conduct, Rule 1.2(c), a > lawyer may limit the objectives of her representation only "if the client [consents] after consultation." In the case where an attorney has been hired to represent a government official in only his official capacity in a suit where the official is also exposed to liability in his individual capacity but has no representation in that capacity, this rule serves an important function. When adhered to properly, the rule ensures the defendant is adequately informed about the workings of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and the potential conflict between the defenses he may have in his separate capacities. Above all else, the attorney and the district court should ensure the official is not under the impression that the official capacity representation will automatically protect his individual interests sufficiently. Courts have recognized a "need for sensitivity" to the potential for conflict in this area, and have advised that "[t]he bar should be aware of potential ethical violations and possible malpractice claims." Gordon v. Norman, 788 F.2d 1194, 1199 n. 5 (6th Cir. 1986) (quotation omitted). In the service of these interests, we embrace the Second Circuit's procedure whereby counsel notifies the district court and the government defendant of the potential conflict, the district court determines whether the government defendant fully understands the potential conflict, and the government defendant is permitted to choose joint representation. See Kounitz v. Slaatten, 901 F.Supp. 650, 659 (S.D.N.Y. 1995). In addition, the defendant should be told it is advisable that he or she obtain independent counsel on the individual capacity claim We reinforce that, as with many issues relating to the relationship between attorney and client, the crucial element is adequate communication.

See also DeGrassi v. City of Glendora, 207 F.3d 636 (9th Cir. 2000), where the court affirmed the district court's rejection of a former city council member's claim to indemnification from the city for attorney fees incurred in defending a slander action. The city had complied with its obligation to provide a defense when it offered defense of the slander action against the city council member subject to the condition that the city control the litigation and approve of any potential settlement. The city council member rejected the offer and retained her own counsel. In rejecting her request for indemnification, the court noted that 'there is no authority entitling DeGrassi to retain independent counsel on the strength of her unilateral assertion of a conflict of interest involving the City. Section 995.2(a)(3) permits the public entity to refuse to provide a defense if it determines that the defense would create a conflict of interest between the entity and the employee. See id. That section does not entitle the employee to independent counsel simply because she asserts the existence of a conflict of interest.' Id. at 643.

In Maderosian v. Shamshak, 170 F.R.D. 335 (D. Mass. 1997), the court held that a conflict of interest that arose from town counsel's joint representation of the town, the town's selectmen, and the police chief, warranted relief from the judgment with respect to plaintiff's due process claim against the police chief in his individual capacity. Plaintiff, a part-time police officer, had sued defendants for terminating him without due process. The police chief, in his motion to set aside the judgement, submitted an affidavit in which he stated that, with respect to the termination of the plaintiff, town counsel had advised the police chief that plaintiff was an 'at will employee' who was not entitled to notice and a hearing prior to termination. Id. at 337. At the trial for the wrongful termination, town counsel did not elicit any testimony concerning his conversation with the police chief, the advice the chief had received or the fact that the chief had relied on counsel's advice. Id. at 341.

The court concluded:

> There is no question that Town Counsel's dual representation of the Town, its Selectmen and Chief Shamshak presented a conflict of interest. Although in hindsight the potential conflict of interest should have been readily apparent, at the time of trial, I did not recognize this conflict and therefore, failed to inquire of the parties as to whether or not they were aware of the conflict, the potential prejudice which this conflict presented and whether they knowingly and voluntarily wished to proceed with Town Counsel as trial counsel in this matter. Chief Shamshak as a lay person cannot be expected to recognize the potential conflict and therefore, cannot be said to have waived his objection to multiple representation. . . . It is obvious that there was an actual conflict of interest between Chief Shamshak and Town Counsel, who was also acting as his trial counsel and that Town Counsel's failure to advise Chief Shamshak to testify as to his conversation with Town Counsel, a conversation during which Town Counsel may have given Chief Shamshak erroneous legal advice, resulted in prejudice which may well have affected the jury's verdict in this case. Additionally, I am convinced that Chief Shamshak's interests may have been prejudiced by the actual conflict of interests created by Town counsel's simultaneous representation of him and the Town.

Id. at 340-42.

In Guillen v. City of Chicago, 956 F. Supp. 1416 (N.D. Ill. 1997), plaintiff sued the City and several police officers for their role in the death of her husband. The court denied plaintiff's motion to disqualify the City's corporation counsel from reprensenting the paramedic employees of the City who transported her husband to the hospital and who were to be witnesses, but not parties, in the legal proceedings. The court held that City counsel could continue to represent the paramedics at their depositions, 'but with one caveat: City counsel must fully inform its clients of the pros and cons of joint representation. . . . For instance, what if the statements given to City Counsel by the paramedics do tend to establish liability of the City or the officers? What then? Under these circumstances, City counsel should candidly disclose the potential hazards of common representation to Marlow and O'Leary. The paramedics will then be in a position to decide whether or not retaining City counsel is in their best interests.' Id. at 1426, 1427.

II. HECK v. HUMPHREY & WALLACE v. KATO : INTERSECTION OF SECTION 1983 AND HABEAS CORPUS

A. Heck v. Humphrey

In Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994), the Supreme Court held that a state prisoner cannot bring a § 1983 suit for damages where a judgment in favor of the prisoner would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction or sentence.' Id. at 486. If a successful suit would necessarily have such implications on an outstanding conviction or sentence, the complaint must be dismissed and no § 1983 action will lie unless and until the conviction or sentence has been invalidated, either on direct appeal, by executive order, or by writ of habeas corpus. Id. at 487. The statute of limitations on the section 1983 claim would then begin to run from the time of the favorable termination.

See also Brennan v. Cass County Health, Human & Veteran Services, 93 F.4th 1097, 1101 (8th Cir. 2024) ("Brennan's predominant claim in this action is that she was civilly committed in 2019 in violation of her constitutional rights and Minnesota law. Because Brennan's civil commitment order stands, she cannot proceed in this Court with a wrongful commitment claim. . . . This Court has determined Heck, which barred claims challenging the validity of still-valid criminal judgments, applies to constitutional claims challenging a civil commitment order. . . Brennan's attempt to distinguish Thomas on the ground that she was a patient in a hospital while Thomas was a state prisoner is a distinction without a difference. The pertinent inquiry turns not on the status of the person being committed but rather on the nature of the underlying proceeding. Because Brennan's state civil commitment order remains valid, we dismiss her wrongful commitment claim without prejudice."); Bell v. Raoul, 88 F.4th 1231, 1233-35 (7th Cir. 2023) ("We have no published decisions in which we have applied the Heck doctrine to civil detainees such as those incarcerated in Illinois as sexually violent persons, though we have done so a handful of times in nonprecedential dispositions. . . Today, in accordance with every other circuit that has considered this issue, we too apply Heck to those civilly confined under the Illinois SVPCA and similar statutes. Like a prisoner wishing to challenge a criminal conviction or sentence, a civil detainee cannot sue a state official under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for violating his constitutional rights when a judgment in the plaintiff's favor would necessarily imply the invalidity of his confinement, unless the grounds for the confinement have already been set aside in other proceedings. . . . By no means are we alone in holding that Heck's reasoning applies to challenges to state-law based civil commitments like the one imposed on Timothy Bell. Indeed, if we consider unpublished decisions, five circuits have reached that exact conclusion. [collecting cases] Our research shows no circuit adopting a contrary position. Bell's § 1983 claim squarely challenges the validity of his continued civil commitment pursuant to Illinois law. His complaint seeks money damages and an injunction, yet entitlement to either remedy would necessarily require him to prove in the first instance the illegality of his civil commitment. Therein lies the Heck barrier: Bell cannot use § 1983 to pursue those remedies unless and until he succeeds through a different outlet in favorably terminating or otherwise showing the invalidity of his civil commitment under the SVPCA. . . .

Nor does it matter that Bell is no longer confined within the Rushville Treatment and Detention Facility. He remains in the state's SVPCA program despite recently being released to home confinement—a form of state custody. . . . Indeed, our conclusion extends further. The Heck bar applies after a detainee's release until the judgment that caused the detention is invalidated. See Savory v. Cannon, 947 F.3d 409, 419 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc) (holding that a defendant's § 1983 claim accrued only when he obtained a pardon, not when he was released from prison). Bell must therefore wait until he receives a favorable termination of his civil commitment before seeking relief under § 1983 for his allegedly excessively long confinement."); Thomas v. Eschen, 928 F.3d 709, 711-13 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Thomas's claim . . . collides with the rule from Heck v. Humphrey. In Heck, the Supreme Court held that a claim for damages is 'not cognizable under § 1983' if it would undermine a still-valid state criminal judgment. . . To be sure, Thomas's claim involves a civil-commitment order, not a criminal conviction, and neither this court nor the Supreme Court has applied Heck in this particular context, at least in a published decision. . . Even so, Heck's logic reaches Thomas's wrongful-commitment claim too. . . . [A]s in Heck, Thomas is trying to use section 1983 to bring what is essentially a malicious-prosecution claim. Courts have long recognized that individuals like Thomas can sue those who pursue 'unfounded proceedings ... to have [them] declared insane' for malicious prosecution, even if the proceedings are 'not criminal in their nature.'. . .To bring such an action, however, the plaintiff ordinarily has to 'prove the termination of the former proceeding in his favor.'. . . Given that Thomas has not done so, we have little trouble concluding that his claim 'is not cognizable under § 1983.'. . To hold otherwise would undermine 'finality and consistency' and encourage 'parallel litigation.'. . Thomas argues that Heck does not apply because his wrongful-commitment claim is based on the underlying 'conduct' of prison officials, not on the 'fact of [his] civil commitment itself.' He reasons that, because Heck does not apply to constitutional claims that, 'if successful, would not necessarily imply that the ... conviction was unlawful,'. . . his claim may proceed. His theory is that facts other than the deceptive and manipulative conduct of prison officials led to his commitment, particularly the extent of his mental illness. But Thomas's attempt to distinguish this case from Heck conflicts with both his theory of the case and the description of the injury he allegedly suffered. He does not claim that encouraging him to misbehave, by itself, violated his constitutional rights or injured him. Rather, he alleges that relying on his misbehavior to civilly commit him is what gave rise to his cause of action. Indeed, as Thomas told the district court, his 'constitutional rights were violated because [prison officials] obtained a civil commitment against him.'. . In short, Thomas's real complaint is that he never should have been committed in the first place. This has also been his central argument throughout the Iowa proceedings, and each time the Iowa courts have disagreed with him. As long as those judgments stand, he cannot proceed with his wrongful-commitment claim."); Magee v. Reed, 912 F.3d 820, 822-23 (5th Cir. 2019) ("Magee's claims stem not from his arrest but from his denial of bail. In Eubanks v. Parker County Commissioners Court, we held that Heck was inapplicable to violations stemming from a denial of bail because a denial of bail has 'no bearing' on the validity of the underlying convictions. . . Even assuming Magee was guilty of the crime he was arrested for, he was still entitled to bail under the Louisiana Constitution. LA. CONST. art. I, § 18. Success on Magee's false imprisonment and free speech retaliation claims would not invalidate his initial arrest or guilty plea. Thus, the district court erred in relying on Heck to dismiss Magee's false imprisonment and free speech retaliation claims."); Huber v. Anderson, 909 F.3d 201, 208 (7th Cir. 2018) ("We recognize that many of Huber's claims relate to events that are now more than 20 years in the past. But that is a natural consequence of the Heck rule. And this is not a situation in which the doctrine of laches has any role to play. As our account of Huber's saga illustrates, he did try to contest his custody, but he was acting pro se and did not know what steps he needed to take. He did not sit on his rights. If wrongful custody lasts for a long time, then Heck will require both parties to litigate over dated civil claims. That is simply the price of the Heck doctrine, which normally ensures that civil litigation does not undermine the basis of criminal convictions and sentences."); Smith v. Hood, 900 F.3d 180, 185-86 (5th Cir. 2018) ("This circuit has thus far applied the Heck doctrine only to claims that implicate criminal convictions or sentences. In Smith's case, however, the district court concluded that there was 'no reason not to' apply Heck to the civil commitment context, citing other courts that have done so. . . In Huftile, the Ninth Circuit reasoned that Heck is equally applicable to people who are civilly committed because, as with a criminal sentence, the appropriate avenue to challenge the validity of civil confinement is through a habeas petition, not § 1983. . . Because Heck's holding was based at least in part on 'prevent[ing] a person in custody from using § 1983 to circumvent the more stringent requirements for habeas corpus,' the Ninth Circuit held that Heck's reasoning therefore applies to the civil commitment context as well. . . Though we note that the Ninth Circuit's and other courts' reasoning on this issue is persuasive, whether Heck extends to civil commitments is still a res nova question in this circuit. However, Smith's case is an unusual one because the parties, including Smith, all assume that the Heck doctrine does apply in a civil commitment case. Smith, in a peculiar move on appeal, concedes that Heck should bar any claim that would challenge the validity of his underlying civil commitment. He argues only that some of his claims are viable because they are, allegedly, conceptually distinct from the commitment itself. As to some of these claims, however, we reject his argument that they are, in fact, distinct. Additionally, he fails to demonstrate a denial of a federal right with regards to other claims. . . . Ultimately, we conclude that Smith raises only one § 1983 claim that is both conceptually distinct and asserts a denial of a constitutional right: his allegation that Defendants McMichael, Chastain, and Savoie confined him using leather and metal restraints in violation of his due process rights. . . . Smith's claim that those Defendants' use of restraints amounted to a due process violation is a challenge to the conditions of his confinement rather than the fact of his confinement itself, and is thus unquestionably not barred by Heck. . . As to this claim, the district court incorrectly concluded that 'any award for damages under the theories advanced by the plaintiff would necessarily include a finding by this court that he is wrongfully held [at the State Hospital].' Accordingly, we find that the district court erred by dismissing this claim."); Karsjens v. Piper, 845 F.3d 394, 406 (8th Cir. 2017) ("This action . . . would not necessarily imply the invalidity of any of the plaintiffs' commitment. See Huftile v. Miccio-Fonseca, 410 F.3d 1136, 1140 (9th Cir. 2005) (noting Heck applies to civilly committed persons as well as prisoners). They do not allege that their initial commitment was invalid. Nor is it alleged that any specific class members should be immediately released. Instead, the plaintiffs claim that they should receive relief including regular, periodic assessment reviews to determine if they continue to meet the standards for civil commitment. It is conceivable that upon receiving an assessment none of the plaintiffs would be eligible for release, despite the district court's finding otherwise. Because the injunctive relief sought would not necessarily imply the invalidity of the plaintiffs' commitment, this action is not barred under Heck or Preiser."); Kuhn v. Goodlow, 678 F.3d 552, 555 (7th Cir. 2012) ("We have previously reserved judgment on whether Heck applies to 'an administrative proceeding or a finding of a violation of a city ordinance,' Justice v. Town of Cicero, 577 F.3d 768, 773 (7th Cir.2009), and we continue to reserve judgment until the issue can be more thoroughly considered from a carefully maintained record."); Hoog-Watson v. Guadalupe County Tex, 591 F.3d 431, 434 (5th Cir. 2009) ("For the purposes of a Heck-based motion for summary judgment, a proceeding's civil or criminal nature is a question of fact. . . . In other words, the existence (or not) of a prior criminal proceeding is, like many other concrete circumstances, a fact to be proven by the party asserting the § 1983 claim. . . . Thus, we evaluate the defendants' motion for summary judgment by determining whether Hoog-Watson's evidence created a genuine question of fact with respect to the animal cruelty proceeding's criminal or civil nature."); Cougle v. County of Desoto, Miss., 303 F. App'x 164, 165 (5th Cir. 2008) ("Heck applies to proceedings that call into question the fact or duration of probation. . . . The district court correctly recognized that the allegations of unlawful search and arrest in this case, if true, would necessarily imply the invalidity of the revocation of Cougle's probation, which was based, at least in part, on the same search and arrest. Cougle has not demonstrated that the revocation of his probation has been reversed, expunged, set aside or called into question as required by Heck as a prerequisite for this case to proceed.").

See also Bryant ex rel. Bryant v. City of Ripley, Miss., No. 3:12CV37-B-A, 2015 WL 686032, at *3 (N.D. Miss. Feb. 18, 2015) ("To date, the Fifth Circuit has had no occasion to address the role and effect of Section 43–21–51(5) for Heck purposes; so this court has no binding authority to guide it on the issue. A number of courts in other circuits have addressed the issue in similar circumstances, however. Among them is an Arizona district court in the case of Dominguez v. Shaw, No. CV 10–01173–PHX–FJM, 2011 WL 4543901 (D.Ariz. Sept. 30, 2011). In Arizona, as in Mississippi, a juvenile court adjudication 'shall not be deemed a conviction of crime.'. . The minor plaintiff in Dominguez was adjudicated a delinquent for resisting arrest and later brought a § 1983 action to recover for, inter alia, alleged false imprisonment and excessive force claims. . . Citing a number of cases in which various courts applied Heck to juvenile adjudications, the Dominguez court recognized that Arizona (like Mississippi) treats a minor who has committed a crime differently than an adult who has committed the same crime, but the court found no reason why this distinction should extend to Heck analysis. . . The court stated, 'Whether the juvenile court's finding is labeled a conviction or an adjudication is, for Heck purposes, irrelevant.'. . This court finds accordingly.")

B. Application to Fourth Amendment Claims

In the wake of Heck, there has been considerable confusion and debate about whether and when certain Fourth Amendment claims might run afoul of the Heck rule that requires deferral of the § 1983 action until there has been a favorable termination of the criminal proceeding. Much of the confusion stems from a footnote in Heck, where the Court noted:

> For example, a suit for damages attributable to an allegedly unreasonable search may lie even if the challenged search produced evidence that was introduced in a state criminal trial resulting in the § 1983 plaintiff's still-outstanding conviction. Because of doctrines like independent source and inevitable discovery. . .and especially harmless error. . . such a § 1983 action, even if successful, would not necessarily imply that the plaintiff's conviction was unlawful. In order to recover compensatory damages, however, the § 1983 plaintiff must prove not only that the search was unlawful, but that it caused him actual, compensable injury. . . which, we hold today, does not encompass the 'injury' of being convicted and imprisoned (until his conviction has been overturned).

Heck, 512 U.S. at 487 n.7. See also Ballenger v. Owens, 352 F.3d 842 , 846, 847 (4th Cir. 2003) (Heck precluded § 1983 claim where suppression of evidence seized pursuant to challenged search would necessarily invalidate criminal conviction).

But see Graff v. Aberdeen Enterprizes, II, Inc., 65 F.4th 500, 521-22 (10th Cir. 2023) ("The causes of action set out in the SACAC, taken together with the SACAC's prayer for relief, do not threaten to imply the invalidity of Plaintiffs' underlying convictions or any component part of the sentences imposed. . . Thus, those claims are not Heck barred and 'should be allowed to proceed.'. . In reaching the opposite conclusion, the district court reasoned that application of Heck to the SACAC is 'all the more appropriate' because 'some Plaintiffs pled guilty and voluntarily entered into plea agreements, and their sentences were the primary issue for consideration in the plea proceedings.'. . This court does not perceive the relevance of the district court's analysis. No claim set out in the SACAC calls any aspect of the underlying criminal judgments into question, whether obtained by a jury verdict or plea agreement. If the district court intended to imply that individual plaintiffs who entered into plea agreements setting out an agreed-upon fine, fee, or cost forever thereafter gave up the right to challenge any method employed by state and private actors to collect court debts, it did not identify any precedent supporting such a result. Such a rule does not appear anywhere in Heck or this court's decisions interpreting Heck."); Rollins v. Willett, 770 F.3d 575, 576-77 (7th Cir. 2014) ("Rollins pleaded guilty. There isn't any doubt that he was guilty—that he'd been driving on a suspended or revoked license. If he can prove that the action of the police in forcing him to get back in his car and show them his driving papers was unconstitutional, that cannot change the fact that he was driving without a valid license. Illegal searches and seizures frequently turn up irrefutable evidence of guilt. The evidence can be suppressed if the government attempts to present it at trial, but there was no trial. A finding that the defendant was illegally seized—the finding he seeks in this suit—would therefore have no relevance to the validity of his guilty plea and ensuing conviction. The case is like Reynolds v. Jamison, 488 F.3d 756 (7th Cir.2007). The plaintiff had pleaded guilty to telephone harassment and then brought a false-arrest claim. Whether the arresting officer had probable cause to arrest the plaintiff had no bearing on the validity of the guilty plea and conviction, and so Heck was irrelevant. Id. at 767. Lockett v. Ericson, 656 F.3d 892 (9th Cir.2011), is similar. The plaintiff had pleaded nolo contendere to charges that he was driving under the influence and then sued the police for having searched his home without probable cause and in the course of the search having obtained evidence concerning the DUI charge. The court held that whether the search had been unlawful could not affect the plaintiff's conviction because the conviction had not been based on any evidence introduced against him, so again Heck was inapplicable. . . And in this case as well. The district judge did say that the 'plaintiff should also understand that his remaining claims fail, even if they are not Heck-barred,' such as his claim that the police had unlawfully demanded that he show them his driver's license and when he refused ordered him out of the car and subjected him to a full custodial search and arrest. But the judge ignored the fact that there was no evidence that the police had seized the plaintiff lawfully by ordering him back into his car—the action that precipitated his arrest, thus extending the seizure. The case must be remanded for reconsideration of the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim, unclouded by Heck."); Lockett v. Ericson, 656 F.3d 892, 896. 897(9th Cir. 2011) ("Lockett pled nolo contendere after the superior court denied his California Penal Code section 1538.5 suppression motion. He was not tried, and no evidence was introduced against him. Therefore, like the convicted plaintiffs in Ove, Lockett's conviction 'derive[s] from [his] plea[ ], not from [a] verdict[ ] obtained with supposedly illegal evidence.'. . 'The validity of' Lockett's conviction 'does not in any way depend upon the legality' of the search of his home. . . We therefore hold that Heck does not bar Lockett's § 1983 claim."); Apampa v. Laying, 157 F.3d 1103, 1105 (7th Cir. 1998) (as in the parallel case of an illegal search, a Title III suit by a convicted defendant need not challenge the conviction and so does not fall afoul of Heck); Simpson v. Rowan, 73 F.3d 134, 136 (7th Cir. 1995) (claims relating to illegal search and arrest not barred by Heck because neither claim, if successful, would necessarily undermine validity of conviction for felony murder).

Compare Byrd v. Phoenix Police Dep't, 885 F.3d 639, 643-45 (9th Cir. 2018) ("Heck does not prohibit a habeas corpus petition and a § 1983 action from proceeding simultaneously; indeed the Court seemed to anticipate this possibility. . . The critical question under Heck is a simple one: Would success on the plaintiff's § 1983 claim 'necessarily imply' that his conviction was invalid? . . Answering this question, we find that Heck does not bar Byrd's § 1983 claims. Because Byrd's conviction resulted from a plea agreement and Byrd alleged no facts in his complaint suggesting that the plea was not knowing and voluntary, success in the § 1983 action would not affect his conviction. Our conclusion finds support in Ove v. Gwinn, 264 F.3d 817 (9th Cir. 2001), which reviewed the dismissal of a § 1983 case involving plaintiffs who were convicted pursuant to plea agreements of driving under the influence. . . . Similarly, Heck poses no bar to Byrd's claims. He pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit possession of a dangerous drug for sale. No evidence was produced against him at his plea hearing. Thus, success on his § 1983 claims would not necessarily demonstrate the invalidity of his conviction. Appellees argue that Whitaker v. Garcetti, 486 F.3d 572 (9th Cir. 2007) and Szajer v. City of Los Angeles, 632 F.3d 607 (9th Cir. 2011), support the district court's application of the Heck bar. . . We find those cases are distinguishable. In those cases, as here, the plaintiffs were convicted pursuant to pleas of guilty and nolo contendere to crimes of possession—possession of illegal drugs in Whitaker, and possession of an illegal assault weapon in Szajer. . . The evidence supporting the possession convictions in those cases and the conspiracy conviction here was found in the challenged search. . . . In Whitaker and Szajer, however, the plaintiffs' civil suits 'challenge[d] the search and seizure of the evidence upon which their criminal charges and convictions were based.'. . Therefore, in both cases, the court concluded that if the plaintiffs prevailed on the § 1983 claims, 'it would necessarily imply the invalidity of their state court convictions.'. . Here, in contrast, Byrd's conviction was based on methamphetamine he threw when the police were questioning him, which they subsequently recovered 'a distance away from where he was at.' Byrd's civil suit concerns allegations that the police illegally searched his person and used excessive force on him—after they discovered the drugs, for all we know—which has nothing to do with the evidentiary basis for his conspiracy conviction. . . Therefore, success in Byrd's § 1983 action does not 'necessarily imply' that his conviction was invalid.") with Byrd v. Phoenix Police Dep't, 885 F.3d 639, 645-46 (9th Cir. 2018) (Eaton, J., concurring) ("I join in the panel's reasoning in all respects other than those dealing with the Heck bar. Under Heck, where a plaintiff's § 1983 claim for damages, 'even if successful, will not demonstrate the invalidity of any outstanding criminal judgment against the plaintiff, the action should be allowed to proceed, in the absence of some other bar to the suit.'. . Applying this rule, some of this Circuit's opinions have concluded that, because no evidence is presented against a plaintiff where a conviction results from a plea agreement, a § 1983 case is not barred by Heck[.] . . I believe this analysis to be correct, and thus would not draw the distinction, apparently made in Whitaker and Szajer, that would impose the Heck bar in cases where the § 1983 action involves the seizure of evidence that might have been used to prosecute a defendant had there been a trial. . . . This rule regarding pleas has been adopted elsewhere, and, it seems to me, should be adopted here. . . . Thus, I would allow Byrd's § 1983 claims to proceed, not because he pled guilty to conspiracy, and there was no way of knowing whether he threw the drugs away before or after the complained of civil rights violations, but because his conviction resulted from a plea agreement and was thus based on no evidence at all.").

See also Szajer v. City of Los Angeles, 632 F.3d 607, 611, 612 (9th Cir. 2011) ("§ 1983 claims premised on alleged Fourth Amendment violations are not entirely exempt from the Heck analysis, as the Szajers suggest. Nonetheless, the Szajers urge this Court to follow two Seventh Circuit cases: Copus v. City of Edgerton, 151 F.3d 646 (7th Cir.1998) and Booker v. Ward, 94 F.3d 1052 (7th Cir.1996). In those cases, the plaintiffs were allowed to pursue § 1983 claims based on Fourth Amendment violations although their criminal convictions were not challenged. The Seventh Circuit read footnote seven to mean that § 1983 claims based upon Fourth Amendment violations may proceed because Heck simply does not bar such claims. . . These holdings, however, are in direct conflict with Ninth Circuit precedent. . .We decline to take up the Szajers' invitation to follow the Seventh Circuit's approach because this Court must follow its own precedent."); Crooker v. Burns, 544 F.Supp.2d 59, 62, 63 (D. Mass. 2008) ("Circuit courts have split on whether the Supreme Court's allusion to this possibility signifies that civil Fourth Amendment claims should receive a blanket exception from the application of Heck or whether courts should analyze such complaints on a case-by-case basis. As Judge Neiman ably explained, the Seventh, Eighth, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits have adopted the 'blanket exception' approach, while the Second, Sixth, and Ninth Circuits, and arguably the Fifth Circuit as well, follow the 'case-by-case' approach. [citing cases] The First Circuit has not weighed in on this issue. Defendants do not appear to challenge Judge Neiman's recommendation that this court apply the 'case-by-case" approach. Indeed, evolving authority seems to favor this mode of analysis, rather than the 'blanket exception' approach taken by some courts. . . Leaving aside the merits of the arguments relied on by the circuit courts that have addressed this issue, the Supreme Court itself recently appeared to confirm the position that Heck might apply to Fourth Amendment claims in dicta appearing in Wallace v. Kato, 127 S.Ct. 1091 (U.S.2007). In that case, the Court observed, in a slightly different context, 'that a Fourth Amendment claim can necessarily imply the invalidity of a conviction, and that if it does it must, under Heck, be dismissed.' . . This statement strongly suggests that the Supreme Court never meant footnote seven of Heck to completely exempt Fourth Amendment claims from its holding.").

Depending upon the facts of the case, the courts have found Heck applicable to both false arrest claims and excessive force claims. For false arrest claims, see, e.g., Patrick v. City of Chicago, 81 F.4th 730, 737 (7th Cir. 2023) ("Patrick seems to be alleging that police officers engaged in a conspiracy to hold him without probable cause in order to give law enforcement time to build a stronger case against him. In the Third Amended Complaint, Patrick maintains that he was acting in self-defense when he shot at Freeman. This evidence, including the overwhelming evidence that Freeman instigated the shoot-out, was allegedly ignored by the prosecution. According to Patrick, he discharged his weapon to scare Freeman away. Under Illinois law, self-defense is an affirmative defense to aggravated discharge of a firearm. . . Because Patrick's self-defense allegations, if accepted as true, would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction, we must conclude that this claim is Heck-barred. . . Accordingly, for these reasons, Patrick's § 1983 unlawful pretrial detention claim cannot proceed."); Wiley v. City of Chicago, 361 F.3d 994, 997 (7th Cir. 2004) ("If, as alleged, Wiley was arrested and prosecuted solely on the basis of drugs planted by the arresting officers, then any attack on the arrest would necessarily challenge the legality of a prosecution premised on the planted drugs."), cert. denied, 125 S. Ct. 61 (2004) ; Case v. Milewski, 327 F.3d 564, 567, 568 (7th Cir. 2003) ("Because Case plead guilty to resisting arrest . . . his claim is barred by Heck . . . . If this court were to allow Case to recover damages because he was arrested without probable cause, Case's conviction would be rendered invalid because, under Illinois law, so long as there is physical resistance an officer has probable cause to arrest someone who resists an arrest attempt."); Snodderly v. R.U.F.F. Drug Enforcement Task Force, 239 F.3d 892, 899 (7th Cir. 2001) ("The issuance of an arrest warrant is an act of legal process that signals the beginning of a prosecution. Therefore, Snodderly's sec.1983 wrongful arrest claim seeks damages for confinement imposed pursuant to legal process, thereby making it akin to a malicious prosecution claim and triggering the application of Heck."); Covington v. City of New York, 171 F.3d 117, 123 (2d Cir. 1999) ("[I]n a case where the only evidence for conviction was obtained pursuant to an arrest, recovery in a civil case based on false arrest would necessarily impugn any conviction resulting from the use of that evidence."); Hudson v. Hughes, 98 F.3d 868, 872 (5th Cir. 1996) ("[B]ecause a successful section 1983 action for false arrest on burglary charges necessarily would imply the invalidity of Hudson's conviction as a felon in possession of a firearm, Heck precludes this claim.").

But see Shultz v. Buchanan, 829 F.3d 943, 949 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Success on Shultz's Fourth Amendment claim . . . would not demonstrate the invalidity of his conviction for public intoxication. All of the conduct relating to the public intoxication offense necessarily occurred in public and before Buchanan's entry into Shultz's home. See Ark. Code Ann. § 5-71-212. Shultz's claim is thus not barred by Heck."); Nelson v. Jashurek, 109 F.3d 142, 145-46 (3d Cir. 1997) (Heck did not bar § 1983 suit where plaintiff did not charge officer falsely arrested him, but charged officer effected a lawful arrest in an unlawful manner); Brooks v. City of Winston-Salem, 85 F.3d 178, 182 (4th Cir. 1996) ("[A] charge that probable cause for a warrantless arrest was lacking, and thus that the seizure was unconstitutional, would not necessarily implicate the validity of a subsequently obtained conviction − at least in the usual case.") Mackey v. Dickson, 47 F.3d 744, 746 (5th Cir.1995) (claim of unlawful arrest, standing alone, does not necessarily implicate validity of criminal prosecution following arrest); Brown v. Gorman, No. CV 07-026-BLG-RFC-CSO, 2008 WL 2233497, at *4 (D. Mont. Apr. 29, 2008) ("Plaintiff alleges that he was racially profiled because as an African American he was stopped for speeding by Defendant Gorman while white motorists traveling at speeds in excess of the speed limit were not stopped. This is sufficient to state a claim for denial of equal protection on the basis of race. Plaintiff is not challenging his conviction, and his racial discrimination claim, if successful, would not necessarily imply the invalidity of his underlying conviction. Accordingly, Plaintiff's claims are not barred by Heck[.]")

See also Irizarry v. City & County of Denver, No. 21-CV-01490-PAB-SKC, 2023 WL 2528782, at *5–6 (D. Colo. Mar. 15, 2023) ("In claims four, six, seven, and nine, Mr. Irizarry and Mr. Shockley assert that they were prevented from exercising their First Amendment rights and were arrested in retaliation for engaging in protected speech on June 2, 2019. . . The Court finds that these four claims are barred by Heck. To prevail on a First Amendment free speech or retaliation claim, a plaintiff must establish that his activities are protected by the First Amendment. . . Mr. Irizarry and Mr. Shockley argue that they were engaged in protected speech by conducting protests on police brutality and Denver's treatment of the homeless. . . However, a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs on these claims would imply the invalidity of their convictions for Disturbing the Peace. The Denver ordinance that plaintiffs were convicted under is the 'fighting words' exception to the right to free speech. . . A § 1983 judgment in plaintiffs' favor would find that Mr. Irizarry and Mr. Shockley were engaged in constitutionally protected speech, which would invalidate their convictions for disturbing the peace. Mr. Irizarry and Mr. Shockley have not demonstrated that their convictions have been overturned on appeal, expunged, or called into question by a writ of habeas corpus. . . As a result, claims four, six, seven, and nine are barred under Heck. . . .In claims one and three, Mr. Irizarry and Mr. Shockley assert unlawful arrest claims against Sergeant Ingersoll and Denver for their arrests on June 2, 2019. . . Mr. Irizarry and Mr. Shockley argue that Sergeant Ingersoll arrested them for 'protesting homelessness and for saying the phrase "Fuck the Police,"' yet Sergeant Ingersoll never witnessed any violence or heard them use fighting words. . . Plaintiffs argue that Sergeant Ingersoll had no probable cause for the arrests.

. . The Tenth Circuit has held that Heck does not universally bar Fourth Amendment unlawful arrest claims. . . Defendants argue that a judgment in plaintiffs' favor would imply the invalidity of their convictions for Disturbing the Peace because it would conclude there was no probable cause to arrest plaintiffs on June 2, 2019. . . In support of their argument, defendants cite Talmadge v. Marner, No. 21-cv-01829-STV, 2022 WL 1591600, at *4 (D. Colo. May 19, 2022), where the court found that Heck barred a plaintiff's Fourth Amendment unlawful arrest claim. . . However, the Court finds that Talmadge is distinguishable because the plaintiff in that case was arrested for resisting arrest. . . A plaintiff convicted of resisting arrest, which is defined as 'intentionally preventing a peace officer from effecting a lawful arrest,' is barred from bringing a § 1983 claim for unlawful arrest because such a claim negates an element of the underlying offense, the lawfulness of the arrest. . . Mr. Irizarry and Mr. Shockley's allegation that Sergeant Ingersoll lacked probable cause for the arrests would not be barred under Heck because a finding that Sergeant Ingersoll lacked probable cause would not negate an element of the disturbing the peace convictions. . . As a result, claims one and three are not barred under Heck. . . . In claims ten and eleven, plaintiffs challenge the constitutionality of RTD's [Regional Transportation District] Wynkoop Plaza Rules. . . Defendants cursorily state that claims ten and eleven should be dismissed under Heck, but provide no legal argument for dismissal. . . Plaintiffs were convicted of Disturbing the Peace under Den. Rev. Mun. Code § 38-89(a). Id. at 1. A finding that the RTD Wynkoop Plaza Rules are unconstitutional would not imply the invalidity of the convictions for Disturbing the Peace under the Denver Code. Consequently, claims ten and eleven are not barred under Heck."); Calabrese v. Tierney, No. 19-12526 (FLW), 2020 WL 1485944 (D.N.J. Mar. 27, 2020) ("Plaintiff's claims solely involve the police officers' basis for the motor vehicle stop, and his conviction presumably stems from marijuana and drug paraphernalia discovered on Plaintiff's person or in Plaintiff's vehicle during the traffic stop. Because the instant lawsuit only requires the Court to ascertain the validity of the traffic stop, such a determination will not impact the validity of Plaintiff's conviction. In a civil rights suit, doctrines such as 'fruit of the poisonous tree' and the 'exclusionary rule' are inapplicable, and therefore, in analyzing whether Plaintiff's constitutional rights were violated by an unlawful stop, the Court need not reach the ultimate questions of whether the evidence seized during the traffic stop should have been suppressed or the ultimate validity of Plaintiff's conviction. See Hector v. Watt, 235 F.3d 154, 158 (3d Cir. 2000) (explaining that the exclusionary rule "is not a personal constitutional right of the party aggrieved" and thus, victims of such violations "cannot be compensated for injuries that result from the discovery of incriminating evidence and consequent criminal prosecution" (internal citations and quotation marks omitted)); Price v. City of Philadelphia, 239 F. Supp. 3d 876, 903 (E.D. Pa. 2017)("[t]he 'fruit of the poisonous tree' doctrine likewise cannot be used by a plaintiff in a civil suit to avoid consideration of evidence obtained through police misconduct") Accordingly, Plaintiff's civil rights claim does not impugn the validity of his guilty plea or conviction and the Heck bar does not apply.")

1. Wallace v. Kato and False Arrest Claims

The Supreme Court has now made clear that the statute of limitations on a section 1983 false arrest claim begins to run at the time legal process is initiated. In Wallace v. Kato, 127 S. Ct. 1091(2007), the Court held:

> We conclude that the statute of limitations on petitioner's § 1983 [false arrest/false imprisonment] claim commenced to run when he appeared before the examining magistrate and was bound over for trial. Since more than two years elapsed between that date and the filing of this suit—even leaving out of the count the period before he reached his majority—the action was time barred. . . . If a plaintiff files a false arrest claim before he has been convicted (or files any other claim related to rulings that will likely be made in a pending or anticipated criminal trial), it is within the power of the district court, and in accord with common practice, to stay the civil action until the criminal case or the likelihood of a criminal case is ended. . . . . If the plaintiff is ultimately convicted, and if the stayed civil suit would impugn that conviction, Heck will require dismissal; otherwise, the civil action will proceed, absent some other bar to suit. . . . We hold that the statute of limitations upon a § 1983 claim seeking damages for a false arrest in violation of the Fourth Amendment, where the arrest is followed by criminal proceedings, begins to run at the time the claimant becomes detained pursuant to legal process. Since in the present case this occurred (with appropriate tolling for the plaintiff's minority) more than two years before the complaint was filed, the suit was out of time.

Id. at 1097, 1098, 1100.

2. Post-Wallace Cases:

Yoast v. Pottstown, No. 22-1960, 2023 WL 4418213, at *2 n.5 (3d Cir. July 10, 2023) (not reported) ("Yoast argues that the Supreme Court in Wallace v. Kato, 549 U.S. 384 (2007), held that false arrest claims can never be barred by Heck. He is incorrect. The Court in Wallace determined that the statute of limitations began to run for Wallace's false arrest claims when Wallace was arraigned and held pursuant to legal process. . . It rejected Wallace's arguments that his claim did not accrue until his conviction was vacated because the claim would have been barred by Heck. The Court noted that a defendant could file a false-arrest claim before he was convicted and the matter could be stayed pending the resolution of the criminal proceedings. The Court explained that '[i]f the plaintiff is ultimately convicted, and if the stayed civil suit would impugn that conviction, Heck will require dismissal.'")

Mills v. City of Covina, 921 F.3d 1161, 1166-68 (9th Cir. 2019) ("We begin by determining whether Mills's § 1983 claims for unlawful stop and detention, false arrest, false imprisonment, failure to screen and hire properly, failure to train properly, and failure to supervise and discipline are time-barred. The parties and the district court agree that those claims accrued on April 14, 2013, when the search was conducted and Mills was arrested. That is correct. '[T]he accrual date of a § 1983 cause of action is a question of federal law ....' . . . Mills had complete and present causes of action for all but his malicious prosecution and Monell liability claims when he was subjected to a search in violation of the Fourth Amendment and was arrested; therefore, those claims accrued at that time. Next, to determine whether the statute of limitations ran on Mills's claims, we 'apply [California's] statute of limitations for personal injury actions, along with [California's] law regarding tolling, including equitable tolling, except to the extent any of these laws is inconsistent with federal law.'. . California's two-year statute of limitations for personal injury actions thus applies to Mills's claims. . . Mills filed his claims on September 22, 2016, roughly three years and five months after the search and arrest. His claims would therefore be time-barred absent tolling. The parties agree that California Government Code § 945.3 tolled the statute of limitations during Mills's criminal proceedings in the Superior Court, but not during his criminal appeal. The parties also agree that, but for additional tolling, the statute of limitations elapsed during Mills's criminal appeal. Mills, however, argues that California Code of Civil Procedure § 356 tolled the statute of limitations during the pendency of his criminal appeal because he was legally prevented from bringing those claims during that period by the Supreme Court's decision in Heck. We disagree. Under § 356, '[w]hen the commencement of an action is stayed by injunction or statutory prohibition, the time of the continuance of the injunction or prohibition is not part of the time limited for the commencement of the action.' As Appellees argue, a judicially created bar to commencing an action appears to fall outside § 356 based on its plain language. The California Supreme Court, however, has explained that § 356 'has been applied in situations where the action is legally prohibited by other means than injunctions or statutory prohibition.'. . Indeed, while the California Supreme Court has not specifically addressed the impact of a judicially created bar on § 356, it has held 'that the running of the statute of limitations is suspended during any period in which the plaintiff is legally prevented from taking action to protect his rights.'. . We are bound by this interpretation. . . Notably, however, in Hoover and each case it discussed, a definitive bar to commencing an action was required to trigger tolling under § 356, regardless whether the prohibition was by statute, injunction, or otherwise. . . Because we hold the Heck bar did not operate as such a definitive bar to the commencement of Mills's action, we need not decide whether a judicially created bar can trigger tolling under § 356. . . . [W]e find that where, as here, a § 1983 claim accrues pre-conviction, the possibility that Heck may require dismissal of that 'not-yet-filed, and thus utterly indeterminate, § 1983 claim,' is not sufficient to trigger tolling under California Code of Civil Procedure § 356. In such circumstances, it is not known whether the claim is barred by Heck until the claim is filed and the district court determines that it will impugn an extant conviction. Until that determination is made, a plaintiff is not 'legally prevented from taking action to protect his rights.'. . Mills nevertheless implores us to adopt a rule allowing California plaintiffs to wait until the resolution of their criminal appeals to file their § 1983 claims, leaving district courts to retroactively pronounce the applicability of the Heck bar and, in turn, tolling under § 356. As discussed above, however, the Supreme Court rejected the petitioner's invitation to adopt a similar rule in Wallace in part because '[d]efendants need to be on notice to preserve beyond the normal limitations period evidence that will be needed for their defense; and a statute that becomes retroactively extended, by the action of the plaintiff in crafting a conviction-impugning cause of action, is hardly a statute of repose.'. . We likewise decline to adopt such a rule. Ultimately, nothing prevented Mills from commencing his suit during his criminal appeal. Had he done so, the district court could have determined whether his claims impugned his conviction. If so, the district court could have dismissed those claims without prejudice, and Mills could have refiled the claims once his conviction was reversed. . . If Mills's claims did not impugn his conviction, the suit could have proceeded. Because Mills was not legally precluded from commencing his § 1983 claims during the pendency of his criminal appeal, he was not 'legally prevented from taking action to protect his rights' and tolling under § 356 was not triggered. . . We therefore affirm the district court's holding that all but Mills's claims for malicious prosecution and Monell liability are time-barred.")

[See also Cross v. City and County of San Francisco, No. 18-CV-06097-EMC, 2019 WL 1960353, at *7–10 (N.D. Cal. May 2, 2019) ("Here, § 945.3, on its face, provides for tolling of the statute of limitations in a civil action while criminal charges are pending before a 'superior court.' Cal. Gov't Code § 945.3. The purpose of § 945.3 is clear. The statute has three objectives: (1) civil damage complaints should not be used as plea bargaining levers in the pending criminal proceeding; (2) civil actions should not be used as a discovery device in the pending criminal proceeding; and (3) criminal defendants should be encouraged to await the outcome of the criminal action before bringing a § 1983 case. . . As to these objectives, it does not matter whether criminal charges are pending in a state superior court or in a federal district court. That is, if criminal charges are pending before a federal district court, the same three objectives would still be served by applying tolling. . . . Only two other courts appear to have considered whether § 945.3 could be applied where criminal charges are pending in a federal trial court, instead of a state superior court. . . Both held that statutory tolling should apply. . . .Accordingly, the Court holds that statutory tolling is applicable in the instant case and thus there is no time bar to Plaintiffs' claims. . . . Even if Plaintiffs could not rely on statutory tolling, their claims still would not be time barred because equitable tolling also applies. . . . As the Court noted at the hearing, Plaintiffs' decision to wait for the federal criminal proceedings to be completed before proceeding with their civil action was justified given that (1) more likely than not, the court in the civil action would stay the case until the federal criminal proceedings were completed and that (2) Plaintiffs could not realistically litigate their civil action while federal criminal proceedings were still ongoing without putting their Fifth Amendment rights in the criminal proceedings in jeopardy. . . The Court also notes that the facts in the case at bar also bear some similarity to facts in those cases that have allowed for equitable tolling because the plaintiff has been pursuing an alternate remedy before initiating suit. . . Here, Plaintiffs were litigating the issue of selective enforcement in an alternate forum, i.e., the criminal proceedings, before moving on to file a civil action. Defendants argue still that equitable tolling should not be permitted here because they would suffer prejudice if the Court were to allow this civil case to proceed. More specifically, they argue prejudice because 'the records retention policy for Department of Emergency Management records is three years, and those records have now disappeared. [Also], [m]emories have faded, and because the USAO and DEA created the paperwork and prosecuted these matters, the SFPD lacks their normal investigatory records to refresh recollection.'. . But none of these arguments is particularly compelling, at least at this juncture of the proceedings.")]

Johnson v. Winstead, 900 F.3d 428, 436-39 (7th Cir. 2018) ("The Heck bar is normally raised defensively to win dismissal of a § 1983 claim when the plaintiff's conviction has not been overturned; if the bar applies, the plaintiff's claim must be dismissed as premature. In contrast, Heck's rule of deferred accrual is raised offensively to overcome a statute-of-limitations defense. The Court's decision in Wallace was such a case. . . . Our cases since Wallace have sent mixed signals on the methodological question. Some take a categorical approach to Heck questions, either implicitly or explicitly. . . Others approach Heck questions on a fact-intensive, case-by-case basis. . . .[T]he analysis in Moore was categorical, based on the theory of relief; we did not undertake a factual evaluation of each plaintiff's criminal case to determine what role the constitutionally tainted trial evidence played in his conviction. That makes sense in this context. Applying Heck categorically is sound as a matter of limitations law where the need for clear rules is especially acute. Moore points the way toward greater consistency in evaluating Heck questions. Applying it here, we hold that Heck's rule of deferred accrual applies to § 1983 claims for violation of the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. A claim of this kind seeks a civil remedy for a trial-based constitutional violation that results in wrongful conviction and imprisonment. Such a claim, if successful, necessarily implies the invalidity of the conviction and under Heck is neither cognizable nor accrues until the conviction has been overturned. As we've noted, the Eighth Circuit reached the opposite conclusion in Simmons v. O'Brien, holding that Heck categorically does not apply to a § 1983 claim for violation of the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. 77 F.3d at 1095. More specifically, in Simmons the plaintiff was convicted of murder based in part on his videotaped confession, and his conviction was upheld on direct appeal and post-conviction review. He then brought a § 1983 claim alleging that his confession was obtained without Miranda warnings and while he was under physical and mental duress. The district court thought the claim was premature under Heck 'until a habeas court ruled on the validity of [the] conviction.'. . The Eighth Circuit disagreed. Leaning heavily on the reference to harmless-error doctrine in Heck's footnote 7, the court held: 'Because harmless error analysis is applicable to the admission at trial of coerced confessions, judgment in favor of [the plaintiff] on this § 1983 action challenging his confession will not necessarily demonstrate the invalidity of his conviction.'. .This misreads footnote 7 for the reasons we've already explained. More fundamentally, the Eighth Circuit's holding is irreconcilable with Heck itself. The claims at issue there included a challenge to the admission at trial of an unlawful voice identification. . . A constitutional error in admitting identification evidence at trial is subject to harmless-error review. . . If the Eighth Circuit is right, Heck would have come out differently, at least as to the unlawful-identification claim. Finally, the Eighth Circuit's approach cannot be reconciled with our decision in Moore, which held that claims for trial-based constitutional violations are indeed Heck-barred until the conviction is overturned. For these reasons, we decline to follow Simmons. . .Our holding that Heck applies does not mean that all of Johnson's Fifth Amendment claims may proceed. To the extent that Johnson seeks damages associated with alleged Fifth Amendment violations at his first trial in 2007, the claims are indeed time-barred. That conviction was reversed in 2010, and the two-year time clock began to run then. The limitations period expired long before he filed this suit in 2015. The claims arising from the second trial in 2012 are timely, however. That conviction was reversed in 2014, and Johnson filed suit less than a year later.")

Mordi v. Zeigler, 870 F.3d 703, 707-09 (7th Cir. 2017) ("A plaintiff is the master of his own complaint . . . and so we must examine what Mordi is asking for, before we can decide whether he may pursue his section 1983 action or if the Heck line of cases stands in his way. . . As the Supreme Court put it in Muhammad v. Close, . . . 'Heck's requirement to resort to state litigation and federal habeas before § 1983 is not ... implicated by a prisoner's challenge that threatens no consequence for his conviction or the duration of his sentence.' In addition, 'when a defendant is convicted pursuant to his guilty plea rather than a trial, the validity of that conviction cannot be affected by an alleged Fourth Amendment violation because the conviction does not rest in any way on evidence that may have been improperly seized.'. . Mordi insists that he is complaining only about the improper racial profiling that led to his traffic stop, and about the officers' decision to prolong his detention while they waited for the drug-sniffing dog to arrive. If he were to prevail on either or both of these points, his conviction would be unaffected. . . . [E]ven if [Mordi] were to prevail on his racial-profiling and prolonged-detention arguments, the discovery of the cocaine found within the car would be just as secure, his guilty plea would stand, and his conviction would, too. All he can hope for in his Fourth Amendment case would be some form of damages for the loss of his time and the dignitary insult inflicted by racial discrimination. Despite the fact that Mordi insisted in his complaint that he was not challenging his conviction (a point that the district court recognized), the state urges us to read the complaint as if he were. There is an exception to the Heck bar, under which a challenge may be brought to actions such as searches and seizures or a false arrest that do not have any necessary effect on the validity of a conviction. . . . The state acknowledges the Wallace exception, but, it argues, there is an exception to that exception. The second-layer exception comes into play if a plaintiff's allegations necessarily imply the invalidity of a conviction (even one based on a guilty plea); in that case, it says, the Heck bar springs back into existence. . . .The worst one can say about Mordi's case is that he made a few half-hearted attempts to assert his innocence between the time the police arrested him and the time he found himself facing federal charges. But those efforts did not make their way into his complaint as anything but background information or an account of what he said at the time. . . . Mordi is not asking for any form of relief that would undermine his guilty plea or his conviction. He is raising a civil rights complaint, and he is raising the type of complaint that Wallace says accrues at the time of the stop and arrest. In addition, even if Mordi filed a complaint that included some Heck-barred contentions and other cognizable arguments, we have held that the proper response is not to toss the entire complaint. Instead, the judge must carve off any Heck-barred contentions and proceed with what remains. . . The district court cut off this case at the screening stage, based on a finding that it could not properly proceed under section 1983. This was in error, and so we Reverse and Remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Morrill v. City of Denton, 693 F. App'x 304, ___ (5th Cir. 2017) ("The statute of limitations for a section 1983 claim is determined by the forum state's limitations period for personal injury torts.

. . In Texas that is two years from the date the cause of action accrues. . . So if Morrill's claim accrued the day the officers allegedly used excessive force, then the statute of limitations expired in August 2014, months before he filed his complaint. Morrill disputes the date of accrual. He argues his claim did not accrue until the state dismissed a resisting arrest charge against him in March 2014. Federal law determines when a section 1983 cause of action accrues. . . It does so when the plaintiff has 'a complete and present cause of action.'. . An excessive force claim generally accrues on the date when the force is inflicted. . . Morrill tries to distinguish his case because he was charged with resisting arrest. He contends his cause of action did not accrue until the resisting arrest charge was dismissed because: (1) the charge was 'fraudulent concealment' that kept him from knowing of his injury; (2) his excessive force claim is analogous to a malicious prosecution claim, which does not accrue until the underlying prosecution ends; and (3) although he knew he had been hurt when the excessive force occurred, he did not know the force was excessive as a constitutional matter until the charge was dismissed.

We reject his attempts to avoid the normal accrual rule. First, the resisting arrest charge did not conceal facts necessary to Morrill's cause of action. For fraudulent concealment to toll a limitations period, a plaintiff cannot be aware of the critical facts underlying a cause of action and must instead reasonably rely on a defendant's deception that obscures those facts. . . Even if Defendants were deceptive, Morrill's complaint does not allege facts showing he reasonably relied on the resisting arrest charge to conclude that the officers did not use excessive force. Instead, his complaint alleges he knew the critical facts all along: he did not resist arrest and complied with officer commands, yet officers kicked and tased him 'without provocation or justification.' It says he immediately and at all times 'steadfastly refused to even discuss [the] possibility of agreeing ... that he in any way, shape, or form resisted arrest.' Second, Morrill's excessive force claim is not analogous to a malicious prosecution claim. A malicious prosecution claim only accrues once the criminal charges are dismissed because an element of that tort is the termination of a criminal prosecution in the plaintiff's favor. . . Thus, no cause of action exists until the prosecution is resolved. The same is not true of a section 1983 excessive force claim, which can be brought whether or not the defendant is prosecuted for resisting arrest. . . We have repeatedly held that a pending criminal charge does not delay accrual of an excessive force claim arising out of an arrest for that charge. . . Morrill claims this case is different because resisting arrest is more closely linked with the amount of force an officer may lawfully use than was true for the crimes in these prior cases. Determining whether force is excessive does require consideration of whether a plaintiff was 'actively resisting arrest.'. . But we do not see why this makes a difference. Even if Morrill's excessive force claim would call into question a conviction for resisting arrest, mere pending charges would not prevent the claim from accruing. . . And, as discussed above, Morrill was aware of the factual basis for his claim long before the state dismissed the resisting arrest charge, and the existence of his claim, unlike the existence of a malicious prosecution claim, 'did not depend on the outcome of the subsequent criminal proceedings.'. .Finally, Morrill argues that although he was aware of his personal injury in August 2012, he had no actionable constitutional claim until the resisting arrest charge was dismissed. He cites no caselaw for this proposition, and this court has long held that a plaintiff need only know the facts underlying a cause of action for accrual to begin, not that a claim is legally viable. . . Morrill's constitutional injury was complete on the day the alleged excessive force took place. His section 1983 claim thus accrued in August 2012, more than two years before he filed suit.")

King v. Harwood, 852 F.3d 568, 578-79 (6th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 640 (2018) ("The Supreme Court clarified in Wallace that the rule in Heck does not extend to claims for false arrest or false imprisonment, in which the limitations period begins when the allegedly false imprisonment ends, such as by the commencement of legal process. . . Whereas some circuits, including ours, see, e.g., Shamaeizadeh v. Cunigan, 182 F.3d 391 (6th Cir. 1999), had held that Heck applied to pre-conviction claims for false arrest, Wallace limited the rule in Heck to claims of malicious prosecution. In short, under Heck, a malicious-prosecution claim is not available before the favorable termination of criminal proceedings, nor does the limitations period for such a claim begin until the favorable termination of criminal proceedings. Here, the district court recognized that King's § 1983 suit was 'based upon a malicious prosecution claim.' Nevertheless, the district court applied the rule in Wallace to hold that King's 'cause of action accrued and the statute of limitations began to run on the date the judgment was vacated on July 18, 2014, rather than the date the charges were dropped.'. . This language comes from Wallace, where the Supreme Court held that the date on which charges are dropped is not necessarily the date on which a false-imprisonment claim accrues, because such a claim instead accrues when the false imprisonment ends, which may be the date of indictment or arraignment. . .When the Kentucky Court of Appeals granted King relief, it vacated her Alford plea, but it did not result immediately in a 'termination of the ... criminal proceeding in favor of the accused,' as Heck would require for the limitations period to begin. . . Rather, King's case was remanded for trial on the same charges that formed part of the malicious prosecution for which King now seeks relief. Accordingly, the one-year statute of limitations period did not begin until October 9, 2014, when King's indictment was dismissed, and King's complaint—filed October 1, 2015—is timely under Heck. The district court therefore erred in holding that King's malicious-prosecution claims were time-barred.")

Buckley v. Ray, 848 F.3d 855, 867 (8th Cir. 2017) ("The Supreme Court's decision in Wallace controls Buckley's claim. The trial court invalidated Buckley's 1999 conviction on November 1, 2010. No extant conviction exists for his § 1983 claims to impugn. The possibility that the State may have re-tried and convicted him of the cocaine charges—"an anticipated future conviction"—does not implicate the Heck rule. . . .The Brady violation committed against Buckley by the Law Enforcement Defendants caused him damage when he was convicted and incarcerated in 1999. The trial court vacated his conviction on November 1, 2010. That is the date on which his cause of action accrued. The limitations period on Buckley's claims, in accordance with Arkansas law, ended on November 1, 2013. His claims against the Law Enforcement Defendants, filed over a year later, are time-barred.")

Rapp v. Putman, 644 F. App'x 621, 625 (6th Cir. 2016) ("For plaintiff's retaliatory-prosecution claim, 'what would otherwise be the accrual date,' Wallace, 549 U.S. at 393, was when defendants initiated the prosecution. At that point, plaintiff had engaged in protected activity (first element), defendants took an adverse action (second element) by initiating a prosecution of plaintiff purportedly motivated by plaintiff's protected conduct (third element) and without probable cause (fourth element). . . Notably, in contrast to the malicious-prosecution claim at issue in Heck, a plaintiff need not prove favorable termination of the prosecution in order to establish a retaliatory-prosecution claim. . . Thus, once defendants initiated the prosecution against plaintiff, each element of the cause of action was present and his claim became actionable. . . At that point, plaintiff had no 'extant conviction which success in [a] tort action would impugn.'. . Therefore, Heck would not have barred the claim. As a consequence, Heck's delayed-accrual rule does not apply. . . Because Heck does not apply in this situation, the general accrual standard controls. Under that standard, plaintiff's claim accrued in September 2008, when defendants initiated the prosecution. The governing statute of limitations for § 1983 claims arising in Michigan is three years. . . Thus, as the district court held, plaintiff's November 2014 complaint is untimely as it pertains to his First Amendment retaliatory-prosecution claim.")

Smith v. Campbell, 782 F.3d 93, 100-02 (2d Cir. 2015) ("While the applicable statute of limitations in a § 1983 case is determined by state law, 'the accrual date of a § 1983 cause of action is a question of federal law that is not resolved by reference to state law.'. . Rather, 'it is the standard rule that accrual occurs when the plaintiff has a complete and present cause of action, that is, when the plaintiff can file suit and obtain relief.'. . . Accordingly, [Smith's] cause of action for First Amendment retaliation accrued on November 26, 2007, more than three years prior to the filing of the initial complaint. That the full scope of her injury was not known at that time, including whether or not she would be convicted of the traffic infractions and that Campbell would continue harassment. . . does not alter the date that her cause of action accrued. . . Plaintiff argues that the accrual of her claim was delayed until after her trial or appeal and incorrectly cites Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994), for this proposition. Quite apart from whether Heck is at all relevant, her argument mistakenly conflates the Fourth Amendment tort of malicious prosecution with the First Amendment tort of retaliation. These two kinds of claims are not subject to the same standards. . . . [I]it may be that had Smith's claim been one for malicious prosecution in violation of her Fourth Amendment rights, that claim would not have accrued until after the trial and appeal related to her tickets. That, however, is not the cause of action which plaintiffs have pressed in this case. As the Supreme Court explained in Wallace, delayed accrual of the constitutional tort in Heck occurred because in that case there was an extant criminal conviction that, unless otherwise expunged, a federal court's finding of a constitutional violation under § 1983 would necessarily 'impugn.'. . Put another way, Heck only comes into play potentially to delay accrual of an action when a resolution of that action in a plaintiff's favor could not be reconciled with an extant criminal conviction. . . The Heck rule does not delay the accrual of 'an action which would impugn an anticipated future conviction.' Wallace, 549 U.S. at 393. Nor does the Heck rule operate as a toll on the statute of limitations when a criminal conviction that would be impugned by a § 1983 action occurs after the accrual of the § 1983 action. . . .In this Circuit, First Amendment claims, even those arising out of the same series of events that give rise to Fourth Amendment claims, do not require a favorable termination in the criminal action to be cognizable as a matter of law. . . Moreover, the First Amendment retaliatory prosecution claim here presents itself in a temporal posture similar to the unlawful arrest claim that the Supreme Court's decision in Wallace held accrued prior to any conviction. Just as in a false arrest claim, the cause of action here accrues when all of the elements necessary to state the claim are present, even though later developments in a related criminal action may ultimately effect the viability of the claim and a stay of the § 1983 action may be appropriate while the criminal action pends. . . As a consequence of the foregoing analysis, there is nothing in our prior case law that delays the accrual of Smith's claim for retaliatory prosecution in violation of her First Amendment rights. Having not been delayed or otherwise tolled, Smith's claim accrued on November 26, 2007. Thus, the district court was correct that Smith's claim for retaliatory prosecution, filed more than three years later on June 24, 2011, is barred by the statute of limitations. The holding of the district court as to this claim is affirmed.")

Moore v. Burge, 771 F.3d 444, 446 (7th Cir. 2014) ("[C]laims based on out-of-court events, such as gathering of evidence, accrue as soon as the constitutional violation occurs. That's because misconduct by the police does not (at least, need not) imply the invalidity of any particular conviction. See not only Wallace but also, e.g., Rollins v. Willett, No. 14–2115 (7th Cir. Oct. 21, 2014); Booker v. Ward, 94 F.3d 1052 (7th Cir.1996). These decisions deal with the Fourth Amendment's rule against unreasonable searches and seizures; their holdings are equally applicable to contentions that police tortured suspects during interrogation, because that misconduct is actionable whether or not a suspect confesses, and whether or not any statement is used in evidence at trial. To the extent that Burton, Dungey, Freeman, and Tillis may be arguing that police violated their rights by giving false testimony, or that during trial prosecutors withheld material exculpatory evidence about misconduct during their interrogations, Heck indeed bars relief until a conviction is set aside. The district court must modify its judgment so that any claims based on proceedings in court are dismissed without prejudice under Heck. Absolute immunity for prosecutors and witnesses, see Rehberg v. Paulk, —— U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. 1497, 182 L.Ed.2d 593 (2012); Buckley v. Fitzsimmons, 509 U.S. 259, 113 S.Ct. 2606, 125 L.Ed.2d 209 (1993), would make it hard for these plaintiffs to recover damages based on the conduct of the trials even if their convictions should be vacated some day. That may be why all five plaintiffs stress the injuries they say they suffered at the hands of the police before judicial proceedings began. Those claims are unaffected by Heck and are outside the scope of anyone's absolute immunity.")

Matz v. Klotka, 769 F.3d 517, 530, 531 (7th Cir. 2014) ("Under Heck, a plaintiff may not recover damages under § 1983 when a judgment in his favor would necessarily imply the invalidity of a criminal conviction or sentence that has not been reversed, expunged, invalidated, or otherwise called into question. . . There is no question that Matz's conviction and sentence have neither been invalidated nor called into question. . . The only question is thus whether Matz's conviction or sentence necessarily depended on his allegedly coerced confession. We conclude, like the district court, that success on Matz's Fifth Amendment claim would necessarily imply the invalidity of Matz's sentence. At sentencing, the judge relied heavily on Matz's confession as well as his subsequent decision to recant his admissions. Specifically, Matz explained to the judge that he confessed out of loyalty to his fellow Latin King codefendants in the hopes that he could take the fall and the rest of them 'would be able to go home.' The sentencing judge rejected the notion that Matz confessed because 'it was the right thing to do,' and opined instead that Matz thought he could be out in 'five—ten years' and emerge in his 'rightful spot' as the leader of the Latin Kings brotherhood because he had stepped up and taken responsibility for the 'weaklings' beneath him. The judge believed that when the reality of the prison sentence Matz was facing set in and it came to light that his fellow Latin Kings had inculpated him in the crime, he was scared and realized that it was not worth taking the fall for his confederates. The court accordingly concluded that Matz had only a 'sort of a selfish, self-centered remorse' and thus posed a high risk of reoffending. Matz's confession and the sentencing judge's assessment of the reasons behind it thus figured prominently in the court's decision to sentence Matz consecutively on the two counts of conviction. Because that sentence remains intact, Matz cannot pursue a § 1983 claim for damages premised on his allegedly coerced confession because success on his claim would call into question his sentence. Heck thus bars Matz's Fifth Amendment claim.") Hornback v. Lexington-Fayette Urban County, Government, No. 12–6589, 2013 WL 5544580, *2, *3 (6th Cir. Oct. 8, 2013) (not reported) ("The district court correctly concluded Hornback knew or had reason to know of the unlawful search of his bedroom on the day of the search. On August 31, 2010, Hornback knew he was not under the supervision of the Division of Probation and Parole, Appellees did not have a warrant or his consent to search his bedroom, and that Appellees nonetheless had searched his bedroom. On that date, Hornback had a 'complete and present cause of action' and could have sued for relief. . . Hornback fails to identify any case law in support of his contention that the Supreme Court's ruling in Wallace is applicable only to claims of false arrest. While the Wallace Court issued a case-specific ruling, the driving principle behind that ruling that the deferred accrual rule of Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994), does not apply to actions 'which would impugn an anticipated future conviction' is generally applicable, including to claims such as Hornback's. . . Hornback correctly notes Wallace distinguishes between causes of action for malicious prosecution and those for false arrest. . . The Court drew this distinction based on the nature of the claims, however; unlike malicious prosecution, some torts redressable under § 1983 (like false arrest) 'accrue before the setting aside of indeed even before the existence of the related criminal conviction.'. . Claims of illegal search are analogous to claims of false arrest, as a potential plaintiff very often has a complete cause of action even before criminal proceedings commence. While Hornback argues he could not know his rights had been violated until the trial judge granted his motion to suppress, he fails to identify any authority in support of his contention. Hornback had a colorable claim for the violation of his Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights on the day of the search, and the statute of limitations began to run on that date. Hornback also asserts that if this court declines to apply the Wallace holding to § 1983 illegal search claims, 'orderly adjudication of illegal search claims would take place, the risk of inconsistent legal determinations would be minimized, and the clogging of courts with unnecessary filings would be avoided.' The Wallace Court, however, announced a procedure for lower courts to follow when confronted with scenarios such as the one Hornback faced: If a plaintiff files a false-arrest claim before he has been convicted (or files any other claim related to rulings that will likely be made in a pending or anticipated criminal trial), it is within the power of the district court, and in accord with common practice, to stay the civil action until the criminal case or the likelihood of a criminal case is ended. Wallace, 549 U.S. at 393–94 . . . Hornback's arguments concerning judicial efficiency are unpersuasive and ultimately irrelevant to the question of when his legal injury arose.")

Franklin v. Burr, No. 13–1154, 2013 WL 5738891, *1, *2 (7th Cir. 2013) (not published) ("There is no necessary inconsistency between the propositions that (a) a conviction based on a guilty plea is valid, and (b) the police violated the accused's rights at the time of arrest or interrogation. One court of appeals held otherwise in Trimble v. Santa Rosa, 49 F.3d 583, 585 (9th Cir.1995), but that decision predates Wallace and cannot be considered authoritative. Given Wallace, Franklin's claim is not barred by Heck—which means that the claim accrued in 1996 and that this suit is untimely. The judgment of the district court is affirmed.")

Serino v. Hensley, 735 F.3d 588, 591 (7th Cir. 2013) ("The general rule is that a § 1983 claim accrues 'when the plaintiff knows or has reason to know of the injury which is the basis of his action.'. . There is a specific rule, however, for false arrest claims. The Supreme Court held that for these claims, the action begins to run 'at the time the claimant becomes detained pursuant to legal process'—that is, when the arrestee is bound over by a magistrate or arraigned on charges. . . Thus, Serino needed to bring his false arrest claim by September 15, 2010—two years after his arraignment. He did not file his complaint until March 28, 2012. His claim is time-barred. Serino argues that the statute did not begin to run until March 31, 2010, the day the state dropped his second criminal charge. He invokes Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994), in which the Supreme Court held that a § 1983 claim based on an unconstitutional conviction does not accrue until the conviction has been invalidated. . . Serino's theory is that the Heck rule operated to delay the accrual of his false arrest claim—a claim that could imply that the charges against him were meritless—until there was no longer a pending state criminal proceeding. But this argument is a non-starter, because Heck relied on the principle 'that civil tort actions,' as opposed to habeas corpus petitions,'"are not appropriate vehicles for challenging the validity of outstanding criminal judgments.'. . And in Wallace, the Supreme Court explicitly clarified that 'the Heck rule for deferred accrual is called into play only when there exists a "conviction or sentence that has not been ... invalidated," that is to say, an "an outstanding criminal judgment."'. . Here, as in Wallace, Serino was never convicted. As such, at the time Serino's false arrest claim began to accrue, 'there was in existence no criminal conviction that the cause of action would impugn.'. . Heck cannot help Serino here.")

Gakuba v. O'Brien, 711 F.3d 751, 752, 753 (7th Cir. 2013) ("Heck does not apply absent a conviction. . . It is Younger v. Harris, 401 U.S. 37 (1971), with which we must be concerned. Younger holds that federal courts must abstain from taking jurisdiction over federal constitutional claims that may interfere with ongoing state proceedings. See SKS & Assocs., Inc. v. Dart, 619 F.3d 674, 677 (7th Cir.2010). Gakuba's claims of damages resulting from illegal searches, seizures, and detentions meet that description: they involve constitutional issues that may be litigated during the course of his criminal case. . . . Deciding those issues in federal court could undermine the state court proceeding. . . . Because monetary relief is not available to him in his defense of criminal charges, however, and because his claims may become time-barred by the time the state prosecution has concluded, the district court should have stayed rather than dismissed Gakuba's civil-rights claims.")

Moore v. Mahone, 652 F.3d 722, 725, 726 (7th Cir. 2011) ("[I]n the wake of Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949 (2009), complaints must be dismissed if they fail to state a 'plausible' basis for relief. The basis for relief stated in our plaintiff's complaint is, given Heck, implausible, for it is that the plaintiff was the victim of an utterly unprovoked assault, and while that conceivably is true, it is barred by Heck. The judge could have retained the case (minus the deliberate-indifference claim) on the authority of Evans, and just have forbidden the plaintiff to embroider his claim with the rejection of the disciplinary board's findings. But likewise he could do what he did − dismiss it. But not with prejudice. The plaintiff was proceeding pro se. He may not have heard of Heck v. Humphrey when he filed his complaint. All the judge said in dismissing the claim was that 'as plaintiff lost good time regarding the March 2, 2007, altercation with [the two officers], his claim that they used excessive force against the plaintiff is barred by Heck v. Humphrey.' This was too terse, and in fact was erroneous. That the plaintiff was disciplined didn't trigger the application of Heck, as the judge implied; what triggered it was the fact that the plaintiff was challenging the findings of the disciplinary board. The judge should have said that, and rather than dismissing the case with prejudice should either have retained it but warned the plaintiff that he could not challenge the findings made by the disciplinary board or have permitted him to file a second amended complaint that would delete all allegations inconsistent with those findings. . . . The case must be returned to the district court to decide whether to dismiss the complaint without prejudice or not dismiss but warn the plaintiff that he cannot challenge the disciplinary board's findings.")

Evans v. Poskon, 603 F.3d 362, 363, 364 (7th Cir. 2010) ("The district court did not discuss Wallace v. Kato, 549 U.S. 384 (2007), doubtless because neither side cited it. But Wallace holds that a claim that accrues before a criminal conviction may and usually must be filed without regard to the conviction's validity. The Court held that a claim asserting that a search or seizure violated the fourth amendment − and excessive force during an arrest is such a claim, see Graham v. Connor, 490 U.S. 386 (1989) − accrues immediately. The prospect that charges will be filed, and a conviction ensue, does not postpone the claim's accrual. Wallace added that a conviction does not un-accrue the claim, even if the arguments advanced to show a violation of the fourth amendment also imply the invalidity of the conviction. . . Instead of dismissing the § 1983 suit, the district judge should stay proceedings if the same issue may be resolved in the criminal prosecution (including a collateral attack). . . . Evans's situation illustrates how a fourth-amendment claim can coexist with a valid conviction. He contends three things: (1) that he did not resist being taken into custody; (2) that the police used excessive force to effect custody; and (3) that the police beat him severely even after reducing him to custody. (Evans says that his skull was fractured and his face mangled, leading to three surgeries and bone grafts. He also contends that his vision has been permanently impaired. These are not normal consequences of arrest.) Proposition (1) is incompatible with his conviction; any proceedings based on this contention must be stayed or dismissed under Wallace or Heck. But propositions (2) and (3) are entirely consistent with a conviction for resisting arrest. . . . These aspects of the suit can proceed. And if Evans is willing to abandon proposition (1), there would be no need for a stay of any kind.")

Dique v. New Jersey State Police, 603 F.3d 181, 187, 188 (3d Cir. 2010) ("Dique argues that Gibson is binding precedent that we must follow. The Officers, by contrast, argue that the Supreme's Court 2007 decision in Wallace repudiates Gibson and mandates accrual when the wrongful conduct occurred. Because an intervening Supreme Court decision is a 'sufficient basis for us to overrule a prior panel's opinion,' we are able to bypass our general rule of not overruling a prior panel's opinion without referring the case to the full Court. . . . Although, as we just noted, a Fourteenth Amendment selective-enforcement claim will accrue at the time that the wrongful act resulting in damages occurs, Dique's claim did not accrue until July 2001 because the discovery rule postponed accrual. In 1990 he was reasonably unaware of his injury because Mulvey purported to stop his car for a speeding violation. It was not until July 2001, when his attorney became aware of the extensive documents describing the State's pervasive selective-enforcement practices, that Dique discovered, or by exercise of reasonable diligence should have discovered, that he might have a basis for an actionable claim. His claim accrued at that time. Because he asserted his selective-enforcement claim over two years later, the statute of limitations bars it.").

Dominguez v. Hendley, 545 F.3d 585, 588, 589 (7th Cir. 2008) ("A § 1983 claim for a due process violation based on the denial of a fair criminal trial may be brought only after the conviction is set aside. Otherwise, that civil claim would imply the invalidity of the outstanding conviction and would thus constitute a collateral attack on the conviction through an impermissible route. . . So viewed, Dominguez's claim did not accrue until 2002 and is therefore timely. Hendley argues, however, that the underlying reason why Dominguez asserts that his trial was unfair relates to his arrest, and thus we should find that his claim accrued no later than the time when his unlawful seizure was terminated − that is, the time of his arraignment. Fourth Amendment claims for false arrest or unlawful searches accrue at the time of (or termination of) the violation. . . .Even if no conviction could have been obtained in the absence of the violation, the Supreme Court has held that, unlike fair trial claims, Fourth Amendment claims as a group do not necessarily imply the invalidity of a criminal conviction, and so such claims are not suspended under the Heck bar to suit. Hendley, however, is assuming that Dominguez's claim is limited to his arrest and does not also include independent charges of due process violations. That assumption overlooks critical parts of the case. Dominguez has asserted all along that the defendant officers violated his right to due process by manipulating or tampering with identification and testimonial evidence. He backed up these allegations with evidence at the trial. His due process claim is thus more than a Fourth Amendment claim by another name, and for that reason, it is not barred by the limitations rule announced in Wallace. Dominguez's right to sue arose only after his criminal conviction was set aside, and, as the district court held, he filed within the two years permitted by law.").

Johnson v. Dossey, 515 F.3d 778, 783 (7th Cir. 2008) ("We turn to the pendent state law claims of malicious prosecution, false arrest, and false imprisonment. Relying on Wallace v. Kato, the defendants argue that the claims are time-barred. At least two things prevent us from agreeing.

Wallace involved the accrual date for a claim of false arrest and false imprisonment, but not as to state law accrual dates. The Court specifically stated that, while the statute of limitations in § 1983 cases is derived from the analogous state law, the 'accrual date of a § 1983 cause of action is a question of federal law that is not resolved by reference to state law.'. . Wallace has no effect on Illinois law.").

Meadows v. Whetsel, No. 06-6211, 2007 WL 1475279, at *2 (10th Cir. May 22, 2007) (not published) ("Meadows does not dispute that Okla. Stat. tit. 12, ' 95(")(3) furnishes the applicable statute of limitations for his case. Instead, he takes issue with the district court's determination that his cause of action 'accrued' in 2002 when the alleged police misconduct took place. . . .To the extent Meadows alleges constitutional violations based on his arrest and imprisonment on May 29 to June 7, 2002, these claims are barred by the two-year statute of limitations. . . . Next, Meadows contends police did not have probable cause to arrest him on May 29, 2002 and subsequently violated his rights to due process by holding him in custody for ten days without filing formal charges. In addition, he claims he was entitled to, but never received, a prompt judicial determination on probable cause under the Supreme Court's ruling in Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103, 114 (1975). . . Under the applicable precedents, these claims are barred by the two-year statute of limitations since they stem from police action that occurred roughly four years before Meadows filed his complaint. . . . . But to the extent we construe Meadows's complaint as alleging a claim for malicious prosecution, that claim may not be time-barred. In Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994), the Supreme Court held that where a § 1983 plaintiff has been convicted and is challenging the prosecution leading to that conviction, a malicious prosecution claim does not mature until the conviction has been invalidated. . . We have extended the Heck rule to situations like this one in which a malicious prosecution claim relates to charges that have been dismissed, holding that the claim does not ripen until the charges are dismissed. . . It is unclear exactly when the charges were dismissed, but the record suggests the state court did not formally dismiss them until February 2005. He filed his complaint in February 2006. Thus, his malicious prosecution claim may not be barred by the two-year statute of limitations. . . Because the district court did not address the merits of the malicious prosecution claim and we decline to do so for the first time on appeal, we remand this issue to the district court.").

Fisher v. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms (ATF), No. 22-CV-6440-CJS, 2023 WL 2082552, at *17 n.32 (W.D.N.Y. Feb. 17, 2023) ("Assuming that the PAC otherwise stated a plausible claim for false arrest, the claim would be potentially actionable even though the criminal charges related to the arrest are still pending against Fisher in Ontario County and could result in a conviction. . . The Court, though, would stay the claim until Fisher's criminal matter was resolved, and then consider whether it was barred by Heck.")

Olaizola v. Foley, No. 16-CV-3777 (JPO), 2019 WL 428832, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 4, 2019) ("[T]he Court takes no view on whether Olaizola's detention ended upon his release from the Bronx precinct office. . . And although the Court doubts that an arresting officer's unilateral issuance of a Desk Appearance Ticket constitutes the sort of legal process that triggers accrual of a false-arrest claim, the Court need not decide that issue either. . . Instead, the Court notes only that Olaizola was arraigned on September 11, 2012, in connection with the challenged arrest. Because arraignment unquestionably constitutes legal process, . . Olaizola's false-arrest claim against Foley accrued at the latest on September 11, 2012. And because Olaizola's April 4, 2016 complaint was not filed within three years of that date, Olaizola's false-arrest claim is time-barred. . . The Court therefore grants summary judgment to Foley on Olaizola's false-arrest claim.")

Miller v. Stallworth, No. 3:17-CV-01711 (JAM), 2018 WL 3974730, at *4 (D. Conn. Aug. 20, 2018) ("[T]he Second Circuit has ruled that a false arrest claim under Connecticut law requires proof of a favorable termination. . . Moreover, the Connecticut Supreme Court has also observed that '[t]he same reasoning which makes conviction a defense in an action for malicious prosecution would apply as strongly to such a cause of action for false imprisonment as is here asserted, and if conviction is a defense in one, so it should be in the other.'. . I am required to follow this precedent and to conclude for purposes of a constitutional claim of false arrest that arises in Connecticut that favorable termination of a prosecution is a required element of the cause of action for false arrest. Although plaintiff vacillates between whether he pleaded no contest to the charges from his arrest of June 21, 2015, or whether those charges remain pending . . . , he has not alleged that any charges from his arrest of June 21, 2015, have been favorably terminated.")

Harris v. City of Chicago, No. 15 CV 3859, 2018 WL 835350, at *4-5 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 13, 2018) ("The standard rule is that a claim accrues when a plaintiff has 'a complete and present cause of action.'. . Harris asserts that defendants coerced his confession, interrogated him in a manner that shocks the conscience, fabricated evidence and his confession, failed to intervene in each other's wrongful acts, and conspired with each other along the way. Each of these claims stems from the same alleged wrongs—that defendants engaged in unlawful and untruthful acts during their investigation and then used that wrongfully obtained evidence in legal proceedings against Harris. Harris had a complete and present cause of action for each of these claims once his confession was used against him to deprive him of his liberty—which occurred when he entered a plea of guilty based on his confession and was sentenced to 15 years in prison. Heck deferred that accrual, but once his conviction would no longer have been impugned by claims about the confession and the Heck bar was removed, the statute of limitations on these claims began to run. State law governs the length of the statute of limitations, which is two years in Illinois. Wallace, 549 U.S. at 388; 735 ILCS § 5/13-202. Harris filed this suit in May 2015, more than two years after the clock began to run on his claims, and so they are time barred. . . .Harris argues that his claims are akin to malicious prosecution, so they did not accrue until the proceedings ended in his favor—here when charges against him were dropped in May 2013. I disagree. The reason a malicious prosecution claim cannot be brought before the accused has prevailed on his criminal case is that to allow otherwise could lead to inconsistent judgments. See Heck, 512 U.S. at 484. The same cannot be said for Harris's claims. As discussed above, once he prevailed on his motion to suppress and the state did not appeal, there was no longer a risk of contradictory outcomes. As such, there is no justification for incorporating this element of malicious prosecution into Harris's due-process based, coerced confession and fabrication of evidence claims and so his suit is dismissed as untimely.")

Saunders v. City of Chicago, No. 12-CV-09158, 2015 WL 7251938, at *5-7 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 17, 2015) ("Applying the general rule that accrual of § 1983 claims occurs when the plaintiff has a complete and present cause of action, Fifth Amendment claims alleging self-incrimination violations accrue within the criminal proceeding itself. Under a strict reading of Wallace, though, because a violation within a criminal proceeding necessarily occurs before a conviction, it would not be eligible for Heck's delayed accrual rule. That being said, Wallace applies only to Fourth Amendment § 1983 claims, which usually relate to police conduct that occurs before a criminal proceeding is initiated. . . The Supreme Court has not applied Wallace to Fifth Amendment § 1983 claims, which can be predicated on state action occurring all the way up to the point of conviction (i.e., during the criminal proceeding or at sentencing). . . As such, applying Wallace equally to § 1983 claims brought under the Fourth and Fifth Amendments would result in the exclusion of all pre-conviction § 1983 claims from deferred-accrual eligibility, essentially erasing Heck tolling. This is an unreasonable result. Since the Court's initial ruling in this case, the Seventh Circuit has addressed this issue, explaining that the relevant inquiry for determining Heck-tolling eligibility is whether the alleged constitutional violation occurred 'in court' or 'out of court,' thus clarifying the 'pre-conviction/post-conviction' delineation discussed in Wallace. See Moore v. Burge, 771 F.3d 444, 446 (7th Cir. 2014). . . . To be clear, the in-court/out-of-court distinction impacts the applicability of Heck tolling, not necessarily Heck barring; a § 1983 claim can necessarily imply the invalidity of a conviction or a sentence but nonetheless be ineligible for Heck's deferred-accrual rule. . . . Here, Plaintiffs' Fifth Amendment self-incrimination claims are based on Defendants' use of Plaintiffs' incriminating statements in their respective criminal convictions and sentencings. . . Because Plaintiffs' claims are based on 'in court' violations under Moore, Wallace does not apply, and Plaintiffs' self-incrimination claims are eligible for deferred accrual under Heck. . . But the inquiry does not end there. Just because a Fifth Amendment self-incrimination claim is Heck eligible does not mean that the claim necessarily implies the invalidity of the conviction. . . .Both Hill v. Murphy and Matz v. Klotka post-date the Court's initial ruling on Defendants' motion to dismiss, and both opinions show that Heck can apply to Fifth Amendment self-incrimination claims. To determine whether a § 1983 claim necessarily implies the invalidity of a conviction or sentence, a court 'must consider the factual basis of the claim,' including the factual allegations in the complaint. . . . Plaintiffs have adequately pled that their incriminating statements played a significant-enough role in their respective criminal proceedings such that the invalidity of those confessions necessarily implies the invalidity of Plaintiffs' convictions. . . . For these reasons, the Court now vacates its dismissal of Count I of Plaintiffs' complaints as time-barred and reinstates Count I in its entirety in each of Plaintiffs' complaints. Defendants are free to re-raise this argument at the summary judgment stage should evidence surface indicating that Plaintiffs' incriminating statements did not figure prominently in their respective convictions and sentences, such that the invalidity of those confessions does not call Plaintiffs' convictions and sentences into question.")

Pipitone v. City of New York, 57 F. Supp. 3d 173, 186 n.15 (E.D.N.Y. 2014) ("In Wallace v. Kato, 549 U.S. 384, 127 S.Ct. 1091, 166 L.Ed.2d 973 (2007), the Supreme Court held that § 1983 claims are governed by "the standard rule that accrual occurs when the plaintiff has a complete and present cause of action, that is, when the plaintiff can file suit and obtain relief," id. at 388, 127 S.Ct. 1091 (internal quotation and punctuation marks omitted). In Gabelli v. SEC, —– U.S. ——–, 133 S.Ct. 1216, 185 L.Ed.2d 297 (2013), a case that had nothing to do with § 1983, the Supreme Court quoted the Wallace language for the proposition that claims normally accrue at the time of the injury, rather than its discovery, id. at 1221–22. Yet following Gabelli, the Second Circuit continued to hold that § 1983 claims accrue upon discovery of the injury rather than occurrence of the injury. See, e.g., Hogan, 738 F.3d at 518; Walters, 517 Fed.Appx. at 42. We note the apparent tension between Wallace, Gabelli, and Second Circuit § 1983 precedent only for purposes of transparency, and to illustrate the complexities and ambiguities of accrual doctrine. That tension does not affect the holding here because, as explained below, the accrual of these claims is governed by the diligence-discovery rule.")

Taylor v. City of Chicago, No. 14 C 737, 2015 WL 739414, at *5 n.2, *6 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 19, 2015) ("Since Wallace, the courts in this district have been split on whether the Heck bar rule applies to Fifth Amendment invalid confession claims. [collecting cases] Where a criminal defendant pleads guilty and his allegedly invalid confession plays no part in the criminal proceeding, Franklin instructs that Heck is inapplicable, and thus a Fifth Amendment claim based upon an invalid confession will be deemed to have accrued when the coerced confession took place. On the other hand, where a confession is used in the criminal proceeding and a civil claim that successfully challenges the confession would effectively nullify the conviction or sentence, Heck will bar such a claim, and the claim does not accrue until after the conviction is overturned or otherwise invalidated. Finally, where a plaintiff alleges a coerced confession (by torture or otherwise), to the extent that the constitutional claim is actionable in and of itself without regard to whether any self-incriminating statements were extracted or such statements were used during a criminal proceeding, Heck would neither bar such a claim nor defer its accrual. Consistent with Heck and Wallace, the crux of the inquiry in all three situations remains the same–whether the civil claim based upon a coerced confession 'necessarily impugns the validity of the conviction.'. . Here, Plaintiff alleges that the Defendant Officers coerced him into making self-incriminating statements and these statements were later used during the criminal proceeding to convict him. . . Furthermore, Taylor alleges as part of his claim that his conviction rested largely on the unconstitutional use of these coerced statements at trial. . . Because success as to Plaintiff's Fifth Amendment claim would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction, the Court concludes that, under Heck's deferred accrual rule, Taylor's claim did not begin to accrue until his conviction was set aside in 2013. Taylor filed his Complaint in February 2014, well within the two-year statute of limitations. Accordingly, his Fifth Amendment coerced confession claim is not time-barred, and the motion is denied as to Count I.")

Bryant ex rel. Bryant v. City of Ripley, Miss., No. 3:12CV37-B-A, 2015 WL 686032, at *3 (N.D. Miss. Feb. 18, 2015) ("To date, the Fifth Circuit has had no occasion to address the role and effect of Section 43–21–51(5) for Heck purposes; so this court has no binding authority to guide it on the issue. A number of courts in other circuits have addressed the issue in similar circumstances, however. Among them is an Arizona district court in the case of Dominguez v. Shaw, No. CV 10–01173–PHX–FJM, 2011 WL 4543901 (D.Ariz. Sept. 30, 2011). In Arizona, as in Mississippi, a juvenile court adjudication 'shall not be deemed a conviction of crime.'. . The minor plaintiff in Dominguez was adjudicated a delinquent for resisting arrest and later brought a § 1983 action to recover for, inter alia, alleged false imprisonment and excessive force claims. . . Citing a number of cases in which various courts applied Heck to juvenile adjudications, the Dominguez court recognized that Arizona (like Mississippi) treats a minor who has committed a crime differently than an adult who has committed the same crime, but the court found no reason why this distinction should extend to Heck analysis. . . The court stated, 'Whether the juvenile court's finding is labeled a conviction or an adjudication is, for Heck purposes, irrelevant.'. . This court finds accordingly.")

O'Laughlin v. City of Pittsfield, No. 13–cv–10111–MAP, 2013 WL 6858171, *5 (D. Mass. Dec. 30, 2013) ("Plaintiff's second argument is that, given his case's up-and-down procedural history (e.g., the Massachusetts Appellate Court's reversal of his conviction and the SJC's reinstatement of it), a reasonably prudent person in his shoes would not have known that his cause of action accrued on the date the writ of habeas corpus issued instead of the date that the Supreme Court denied certiorari, thus truly expunging Plaintiff's conviction. Unfortunately for Plaintiff, no authority supports this basis for equitable tolling. As Wallace makes clear, the proper course for Plaintiff would have been to file his section 1983 claims within three years of the issuance of the writ of habeas corpus when he knew that his conviction had been called into question. If necessary, the court could have stayed the action pending the Supreme Court's decision on the Commonwealth's petition for certiorari. . . .Heck establishes that Plaintiff's claim accrued when his conviction was 'called into question' by the issuance of habeas relief. . . That date was, at the latest, September 1, 2009, when Judge Young, on instructions from the First Circuit, issued the writ of habeas corpus and released Plaintiff on conditions. . . Starting at that point, Plaintiff had a full three years to file his lawsuit, up to September 1, 2012. By the time Plaintiff filed his complaint on January 18, 2013, his claims were untimely.")

Shakleford v. Hensley, No. 12–194–GFVT, 2013 WL 5371996, *4 (E.D. Ky. Sept. 24, 2013) ("Based on the aforementioned authority from the Supreme Court and the Sixth Circuit, as well as the persuasive reasoning of the sister-district courts in this circuit, the Court finds that Shakleford's Section 1983 search and seizure claims are time barred. Trooper Hensley came to Shakleford's home on August 6, 2007 looking for a television and a VCR, which Shakleford voluntarily produced. Trooper Hensley then proceeded to search Shakleford's home on the authority of an invalid warrant. At this point, Shakleford had a 'complete and present cause of action,' which triggers the accrual of his Section 1983 illegal search and seizure claim. And this injury was not hidden from Shakleford. He was present to see the search take place, and it is this knowledge, rather than the legal knowledge of the sufficiency of the warrant, that is relevant to the accrual analysis. Therefore, Shakleford's Section 1983 claims for illegal search and seizure accrued on August 6, 2007, the date of the search and seizure, and as he did not raise them until he initiated this action six years later, the claims are time barred and properly dismissed.")

Telfair v. Tandy, No. 08-731 (WJM), 2008 WL 4661697, at *7, *8 (D.N.J. Oct. 20, 2008) ("Based on the Supreme Court's language in Wallace, it would appear that Wallace effectively supersedes the Third Circuit's reasoning in Gibson, . . .and that Heck is inapplicable here . . . and that Smith v. Holtz likewise is abrogated by Wallace. . . . Thus, under Wallace, any Fourth Amendment claim must be brought and, in all likelihood, stayed pending resolution of the underlying charges. . . In the event of a conviction on the underlying charges, the stay may extend for years while post-conviction relief is sought. . . This is not an ideal situation because of the potential to clog the court's docket with unresolvable cases. However, in this case, there does not appear to be any clear basis to dismiss the illegal search and seizure claim on the merits. Therefore, this Court is constrained at this time to also allow this claim to proceed, but stay the action until plaintiff's criminal proceedings are concluded.")

Kamar v. Krolczyk, No. 1:07-CV-0340 AWI TAG, 2008 WL 2880414, at *7 (E.D. Cal. July 22, 2008) ("In light of Wallace , the Heck bar did not prohibit Plaintiff from filing this action until the criminal charges against him were dismissed. The rules announced in Wallace apply retroactively to Plaintiff because the Supreme Court applied these rules to the parties in Wallace . . . Because the Heck bar did not apply to the filing of this action, this action accrued at the time of the search and Plaintiff is not entitled to a later accrual date. Plaintiff contends that Wallace does not apply to this action and Harvey is still good law because Wallace and Heck concerned false arrest and malicious prosecution claims. Plaintiff argues that Harvey still applies to this civil rights claims based on Fourth Amendment violations. The court disagrees. Nothing in Wallace appears to limit it to certain types of civil rights violations.")

Jefferson v. Kelly, No. 06-CV-6616 (NGG)(LB), 2008 WL 1840767, at *4, *5 (E.D.N.Y. Apr. 22, 2008) ("Based upon the allegations in Plaintiff's Complaint, the latest date of accrual for any of these claims (false imprisonment, false arrest, excessive force, and coerced confession) is July 18, 2003, the day on which Detective Greco and his partner questioned Plaintiff and obtained his written statement. Thus, Plaintiff's December 11, 2006 Complaint was not filed within the three-year limitations period applicable to section 1983 claims. . . . To the extent that Plaintiff's allegations may be read as an attempt to state a malicious prosecution claim, the claim is not similarly time-barred.").

Barnhill v. Strong, No. JFM 07-1678, 2008 WL 544835, at *6 (D. Md. Feb. 25, 2008) ("Wallace dictates that these claims be dismissed. As in Wallace, the claims here of unlawful search, seizure, and excessive force are analogous to the common law torts of false arrest and imprisonment, and Wallace makes clear that despite the pendency of criminal proceedings, the statute of limitations on such claims begins to run at the time the legal process is initiated. Here, any search, seizure, or excessive force ended on September 12, 2001, when plaintiffs were brought before the state Commissioner. Any remaining claims form part of a malicious prosecution case. Accordingly, even though plaintiffs' motion to suppress was not granted for several years, the statute of limitations for these federal claims expired on September 12, 2004.") **.

Fulton v. Zalatoris, No. 07 C 5569, 2008 WL 697349, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 12, 2008) ("[D]ismissing the false arrest claim rather than staying the proceedings would act in practical effect to bar Plaintiffs from later refiling the claim. Although Plaintiffs' initial filing was timely, if the claim was dismissed, Plaintiffs would no longer be able to comply with Illinois' two-year statute of limitations. . . As in this case, where a claim 'for monetary relief cannot be redressed in [a parallel] state proceeding,' a stay must be ordered. Deakins v. Monaghan, 484 U.S. 193, 202 (1988).").

Cash v. Bradley County, 2008 WL 501338, at *2 (E.D.Tenn. Feb. 21, 2008) ("Plaintiff argues Wallace should not apply because it was not decided until 2007, well after the incident in question occurred. Unfortunately for Plaintiff, the Supreme Court's interpretation of the law is binding, regardless of whether there was a different interpretation a decade ago. If the Supreme Court had not decided Wallace, the Sixth Circuit's decision in Shamaeizadeh may have allowed Plaintiff to bring his case. But in that hypothetical scenario, if Plaintiff had won his case and Defendants appealed, the Supreme Court could have issued a ruling setting out the same holding as in Wallace, which would hold Plaintiff's claim to be time-barred.").

Porter v. City of Davis Police Dept., 2007 WL 4463344, at *5 n.2 (E.D. Cal. Dec. 17, 2007) (" Heck was based on the premise that no cause of action has accrued until the conviction has been vacated or expunged. . . Until Wallace, Heck was seen as barring any defendant/prisoner tort claim which might impugn the criminal judgment. The conceptual bases of Heck and Wallace seem irreconcilable. Wallace does not answer the situation where a cause of action might be accruing, but not expired when the entry of final judgment in a criminal action is entered. If Heck is to be followed, the cause of action which once commenced running would then be deemed never to have accrued. Even more confusing would be the situation where a cause of action had expired during the pendency of the criminal action, but according to Heck would not have even accrued upon entry of final judgment. Confusing, to say the least. Perhaps Heck now only applies to suits which sound in malicious prosecution.")

Mallard v. Potenza, 2007 WL 4198246, at *3 (E.D.N.Y. Nov. 21, 2007) ("Plaintiff cites no authority for the proposition that Wallace does not apply in the context of § 1983 claim for an illegal search and seizure. Indeed, at this relatively early stage, the only courts to consider the expansion of Wallace to the search and seizure context have made this rather modest leap. [collecting cases] In sum, the Court fails to see any reasoned basis to distinguish between claims for false arrest and search and seizure, and therefore holds that Wallace applies with equal force to a claim for an illegal search and seizure.").

Richards v. County of Morris, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 49290, at *11, *12, *15, *16 (D.N.J. July 5, 2007) ("Unless their full application would defeat the goals of the federal statute at issue, courts should not unravel states' interrelated limitations provisions regarding tolling, revival, and questions of application. [citing Wilson v. Garcia, 471 U.S. 261, 269 (1985)] . . . . When state tolling rules contradict federal law or policy, in certain limited circumstances, federal courts can turn to federal tolling doctrine. . . . Based on the Supreme Court's language in Wallace, this Court concludes that Wallace effectively supersedes the Third Circuit's reasoning in Gibson,. . . and that Heck is inapplicable here. Consequently, Plaintiff's allegations of false arrest, false imprisonment, racial profiling, and unlawful search and seizure in violation of his Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights are time-barred, because plaintiff's claims actually accrued on April 15, 1997, the date of the unlawful search and arrest. This Complaint was submitted on April 23, 2007, long after the statute of limitations had expired on April 15, 1999. Plaintiff alleges no facts or extraordinary circumstances that would permit statutory or equitable tolling under either New Jersey or federal law. Rather, plaintiff pleads only ignorance of the law and his incarceration, neither excuse being sufficient to relax the statute of limitations bar in this instance.").

Hayhurst v. Upper Makefield Tp., 2007 WL 1795682, at *8, *9 (E.D.Pa. June 21, 2007) ("Although Ms. Hayhurst's claim for false arrest is barred by Heck, the Court will not dismiss it at this time. Heck only bars § 1983 claims that suggest the invalidity of a criminal conviction until that conviction is overturned or declared invalid. If Ms. Hayhurst's pending appeal of her disorderly conduct appeal is successful, Heck will no longer apply. Ms. Hayhurst has therefore requested that, if the Court finds her false arrest claim barred by Heck, it should stay the entire case pending resolution of her criminal appeal. The defendants have filed an opposition to this request, asking that Ms. Hayhurst's false arrest claim be dismissed outright and that the remaining excessive force claim be allowed to proceed to trial. Having found that Ms. Hayhurst's false arrest claim should be stayed under Heck until the resolution of her criminal appeal, the Court believes that Ms. Hayhurst's excessive force claim should be stayed as well. Although the excessive force claim is not barred by Heck, it arises out of the same facts and involves the same evidence as the false arrest claim. Declining to stay the excessive force claim would therefore risk having two separate trials on each of plaintiff's claims, should Ms. Hayhurst succeed in her appeal. Although the Court is sympathetic to the defendants' desire to have this claim resolved expeditiously, the Court believes a stay of all claims is necessary to prevent the risk of essentially duplicative proceedings.")

Finwall v. City of Chicago, 490 F.Supp.2d 918, 921-23 (N.D. Ill. 2007) ("It is undisputed that Finwall was arraigned on April 13, 2001 and therefore the limitations period ended on April 13, 2003, well before Finwall filed suit. Finwall nevertheless contends that his false imprisonment claims are timely because his claims were also the subject of a class-action lawsuit, the filing of which tolled the statute of limitations. . . . In short, probable cause and length of detention would both have been at issue in the class action proposed in Lopez, and therefore the statute of limitations was tolled for both false arrest and unlawful detention claims. The tolling continued until May 20, 2004, the date the plaintiff in Lopez withdrew his motion for class certification, freeing Finwall to file his individual suit two months later. In summary, Lopez tolled the accrual of Finwall's false arrest and unlawful detention claims until May 20, 2004. Therefore his claims, filed July 15, 2004, are timely. However, the only defendant common to both Lopez and the instant suit is the City of Chicago, and therefore Finwall's false arrest and unlawful detention claims against individual defendants Garcia and Boyd (Counts I & III) are time-barred. Finwall's argument that his claims against Garcia and Boyd are timely under the discovery rule is unfounded: although he may not have learned the specifics of the detectives' alleged fabrication of evidence until their depositions, he knew at the time of his arrest that no probable cause existed.").

Hill v. City of Chicago, No. 06 C 6772, 2007 WL 1424211, at *3, *4 (N.D. Ill. May 10, 2007) (Fourth Amendment claims foreclosed by Wallace, but not equal protection and coerced confessions claims, which claims accrued when convictions were vacated).

Caldwell v. City of Newfield, Civil Action No. 05-1913 (RMB), 2007 WL 1038695, at (D.N.J. March 30, 2007) ("Under Wallace, any Fourth Amendment claim must be brought and, in all likelihood, stayed pending resolution of the underlying charges. . . In the event of a conviction on the underlying charges, the stay may extend for years while post-conviction relief is sought. . . Because of Wallace's potential to clog the Court's docket with unresolvable cases, this Court will reach Defendant's arguments under Heck last, only where dismissal of Plaintiff's claims on other grounds is unavailable.").

3. Excessive Force Claims

For cases involving excessive force claims, see, e.g., Torres v. Madrid, 60 F.4th 596, 600-02 (10th Cir. 2023) (appeal after remand) ("[I]n cases where there are multiple uses of force or a continuing use of force, Heck may bar the plaintiff's claims as to some force but not all. . . The analysis of whether Heck bars the entirety of a plaintiff's excessive-force claims thus requires 'compar[ing] the plaintiff's allegations to the offense [s]he committed.'. . Recall that Ms. Torres pleaded no contest to two offenses: (1) aggravated flight, which requires 'willfully and carelessly driving [her] vehicle in a manner that endangers the life of another person' after being instructed to stop, . . . and (2) assault upon a peace officer causing the officer to 'reasonably believe that [she] is in danger of receiving an immediate battery[.]'. . Both convictions are based on Ms. Torres's decision to step on the gas, placing Defendants in potential peril. Ms. Torres therefore properly acknowledges that her plea could 'foreclose[ ] an excessive force claim based on shots fired by Defendants at the moment [she] initially pulled forward to leave the parking space.'. . But we have repeatedly recognized that a reasonable use of force—such as when an officer is subject to a direct physical threat—may become unreasonable even seconds later when force persists after the threat has passed. . . Ms. Torres's plea, justified by the alleged danger in which she placed Defendants at the moment her vehicle advanced, is therefore not 'necessarily inconsistent' with a claim that Defendants later used excessive force when, despite any danger having passed, they fired additional bullets into the rear of her vehicle, including the one that struck her in the back. . . . Ms. Torres concedes that Heck precludes recovery for force used as she drove toward the officers. Instead, she bases her claims on the bullet that hit her—one, among others, that was fired at the back of the vehicle, allegedly after any threat had passed. Ms. Torres has therefore presented a theory of liability that is not inconsistent with her plea. . . .We therefore conclude that Defendants lack a Heck defense to Ms. Torres's claims that they employed excessive force after the vehicle had passed the officers. The district court's grant of summary judgment must therefore be set aside insofar as it relies on Heck. Should this case proceed to trial, the district court will need to instruct the jury on the appropriate scope of Ms. Torres's claims.").

See also Hall v. Merola, 67 F.4th 1282, 1292 & n.4 (11th Cir. 2023) ("Factual allegations bar claims under Heck in only narrow circumstances: 'where the allegation in the § 1983 claim is a specific one that both necessarily implies the earlier decision is invalid and is necessary to the success of the § 1983 suit itself.'. . 'When a plaintiff alleges a fact that, if true, would conflict with the earlier punishment, but that fact is not necessary to the success of his § 1983 suit, the Heck bar does not apply.'. .Applying that guidance here, we must conclude that the district court erred. If a factual allegation contradicts a guilty verdict, our case law requires district courts to consider whether the fact is 'necessary' to the success of the § 1983 suit itself. . . Here, Hall's factual allegation—that he wasn't tampering with the sprinkler system—could be false and Hall could still succeed on his lawsuit if Officers Watson and Wright used more force than constitutionally permissible in stopping Hall from tampering with the sprinkler system. That is, Hall's denial of tampering with the sprinkler isn't 'necessary' to the success of his excessive-force claim. . . . Judge Newsom's thoughtful concurrence on this point is, really, we think just a question of semantics. Here's why: Hall sued for excessive force. The question is whether Hall's factual allegation—that he didn't tamper with the sprinkler—means that Heck bars his claim. Judge Newsom agrees that, if Hall admitted tampering, then there'd be no problem with Hall's suit because an officer can use more force that constitutionally permissible—that is, excessive force—in effecting discipline that is otherwise warranted. . . But that agreement means Hall's denial that he tampered with the sprinklers isn't 'necessary' to success in his suit. In other words, if we removed that factual allegation, or flipped it to an admission, Hall's suit could succeed just the same. All Hall needs to do is show that the officers used excessive force. So the denial isn't logically necessary. . . . The point is this: a factual allegation that denies the truth of a disciplinary conviction doesn't mean that Heck bars the suit if—as is the case here—the plaintiff could succeed if he or she admitted the truth of the disciplinary conviction. . . To the extent Judge Newsom contends that Hall couldn't succeed on an 'I didn't do it' theory, we agree that Hall couldn't use a § 1983 suit to overturn his disciplinary conviction. But that doesn't mean his excessive-force claim is Heck-barred because the validity or invalidity of Hall's disciplinary conviction is irrelevant to whether the officers used excessive force against him."); Hall v. Merola, 67 F.4th 1282, 1300-01 (11th Cir. 2023) (Newsom, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("I agree with pretty much everything in the majority opinion. I write separately only to offer one tiny clarification. The majority opinion correctly concludes that, in the particular circumstances of this case, Hall's Eighth Amendment claim isn't barred by Heck v. Humphrey . . . and its progeny. . . For me, though, that conclusion turns on exactly what kind of 'excessive force' claim Hall is pursuing. Has he raised only what I'll call an 'I didn't do it' claim—i.e., a claim that he didn't tamper with the sprinkler in his cell and, therefore, that any force that Officers Watson and Wright used to subdue him was, by definition, constitutionally excessive—or has he also raised an 'I did it but the force used to subdue me was nonetheless constitutionally excessive' claim? As the majority opinion explains, the district court seemed to think that Hall had presented only an 'I didn't do it' claim: 'The district court noted in a footnote that this was "not a case in which Plaintiff admitted that yes, he tampered with the security device ... but the officers used excessive force in subduing him. Instead, Plaintiff alleges in his complaint that he was not tampering with a safety device in his cell and Defendants Watson and Wright chemically gassed him for various retaliatory or discriminatory reasons."'. . If that were indeed the only type of excessive-force claim that Hall had pleaded, Heck, in my view, would foreclose it. . . .All of which is to say that if we were stuck with the premise that the lone excessive-force claim that Hall pleaded was of the 'I didn't do it' variety, I'd have to conclude that Heck barred it. But—and for me it's a big but—I don't think we're stuck with that premise. Rather, I think that Hall's pro se complaint, liberally construed, is properly read to present an 'I did it but the force used to subdue me was nonetheless constitutionally excessive' claim. . . . So, as I see it, Hall alleged an 'I did it but ...' claim. That claim—unlike any I didn't do it' claim that he might also have brought—is not Heck-barred because it doesn't necessarily imply the invalidity of the prison disciplinary proceeding. To the contrary, it acknowledges the result of that proceeding and insists that Officers Watson and Wright violated the Eighth Amendment for independent reasons."); Surat v. Klamser, 52 F.4th 1261, 1273-74 (10th Cir. 2022) ("In concluding Ms. Surat had met her burden on the first prong of qualified immunity, the district court relied on the following facts: (1) she was convicted of resisting arrest and obstruction of a peace officer; (2) she was a twenty-two-year-old, 115-pound woman, who was unarmed, and restrained in a wrist hold by an officer twice her size. The district court also concluded a reasonable jury could find (3) Ms. Surat did not hit Officer Klamser or physically assault him as he attempted to place her in handcuffs, but that (4) she did use physical force to resist her arrest by pulling away from his grip, attempting to pry his fingers off of her arm, and pawing at his arms. These facts do not conflict with her underlying convictions for obstructing a peace officer or resisting arrest. The district court does not suggest Ms. Surat did not use physical force against Officer Klamser, or that her physical force was justified. Instead, it acknowledges she resisted arrest by using physical force against Officer Klamser. And the conclusion that the jury could find Ms. Surat used physical force rather than violence is not inconsistent with the elements of her convictions. . . Ms. Surat's use of physical force against Officer Klamser is also not inconsistent with a conclusion that she did not pose an imminent threat of danger to him, or that more than minimal force was unreasonable in response. Accordingly, we reject Officer Klamser's Heck-based challenges to the district court's assessment of the facts and turn to whether Ms. Surat has shown a reasonable jury could find Officer Klamser violated her Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force."); Jefferson v. Lias, 21 F.4th 74, 86-87 (3d Cir. 2021) ("Lias argues that Jefferson's claims are barred by Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477, 114 S.Ct. 2364, 129 L.Ed.2d 383 (1994). There, the Supreme Court held that a § 1983 action is barred if 'a judgment in favor of the plaintiff would necessarily imply the invalidity of [a prior] conviction or sentence.'. . The conviction at issue here is second-degree eluding under N.J. Stat. Ann. § 2C:29-2(b), to which Jefferson pled guilty. A person may be convicted under New Jersey's eluding statute if he (1) knowingly flees or attempts to evade police while driving on a street or highway; (2) after having received a signal from the police officer indicating he should stop; and (3) creating a risk of death or injury to any person. Because

'creating a risk of death or injury to any person' is an essential element of the conviction, Lias contends Jefferson's excessive force claim cannot proceed as Lias was justified in using deadly force to prevent the risk from continuing. Lias's argument is unavailing for a number of reasons. For one, as we have explained above, precedent in our Circuit (and in accordance with opinions issued by our sister circuits) establishes that the unbounded use of deadly force is not justified against an individual in flight simply whenever they have precipitated risk to others. See Lytle, 560 F.3d at 415 ("Nearly any suspect fleeing in a motor vehicle poses some threat of harm to the public ... the real inquiry is whether the fleeing suspect posed such a threat that the use of deadly force was justifiable."). If an individual has engaged in risky flight, but no longer is threatening to officers or the public, the use of deadly force against the individual may no longer be reasonable. The analysis as to whether the use of deadly force to halt a suspect's escape is 'objectively reasonable' depends on the resolution of the kind of intensive, multi-factor analysis articulated by Graham and our subsequent Fourth Amendment excessive force precedent. For another, we have declined to apply Heck to bar Fourth Amendment excessive force claims under § 1983 when we have found that the quantum of force used may have been disproportionate to the conduct implicated by the underlying conviction, even in cases involving resisting arrest and assaulting officers. See, e.g., Nelson v. Jashurek, 109 F.3d 142, 145 (3d Cir. 1997) (holding Heck did not foreclose excessive force claim, noting that "the fact that Jashurek was justified in using 'substantial force' to arrest Nelson does not mean that he was justified in using an excessive amount of force and thus does not mean that his actions in effectuating the arrest necessarily were objectively reasonable"); Lora-Pena v. FBI, 529 F.3d 503, 506 (3d Cir. 2008) (per curiam) (also declining to apply Heck to bar an excessive force claim, noting "Lora–Pena's convictions for resisting arrest and assaulting officers would not be inconsistent with a holding that the officers, during a lawful arrest, used excessive (or unlawful) force in response to his own unlawful actions."). Consequently, Lias's reliance upon Heck to defeat Jefferson's excessive force claim is misguided."); Sanders v. City of Pittsburg, 14 F.4th 968, 971-73 (9th Cir. 2021) ("Here, Sanders was charged with resisting arrest under § 148(a)(1), which prohibits 'resist[ing], delay[ing], or obstruct[ing]' a police officer during the discharge of his duties. Under California law, a conviction under this statute requires that the defendant's obstructive acts occur while the officer is engaging in 'the lawful exercise of his duties.'. . The use of excessive force by an officer is not within the performance of the officer's duty. . . Thus, the 'lawfulness of the officer's conduct' is necessarily established as a result of a conviction under § 148(a)(1). . . In other words, a defendant can't be convicted under § 148(a)(1) if an officer used excessive force at the time of the acts resulting in the conviction. Consequently, an excessive force claim can't survive the Heck bar if it's predicated on allegedly unlawful actions by the officer at the same time as the plaintiff's conduct that resulted in his § 148(a)(1) conviction. . . Such an allegation would undermine the validity of the § 148(a)(1) conviction. On the other hand, if the alleged excessive force occurred before or after the acts that form the basis of the § 148(a) violation, even if part of one continuous transaction, the § 1983 claim doesn't 'necessarily imply the invalidity of [a] criminal conviction under § 148(a)(1).'. . Sanders contends that his claim is not Heck-barred because his conviction could have been based on his fleeing officers prior to his arrest in the gully. Under that theory, success on his § 1983 claim would leave the conviction undisturbed since his act of resistance occurred before the dog bite and arrest. Sanders relies primarily on Hooper, which held that resisting arrest 'does not lose its character as a violation of § 148(a)(1) if, at some other time during that same "continuous transaction," the officer uses excessive force or otherwise acts unlawfully.'. . . We allowed Hooper's excessive force claim to proceed because Heck is no impediment 'when the conviction and the § 1983 claim are based on different actions during "one continuous transaction."'. . Hooper's § 1983 action could separately target one action—the allegedly unlawful dog bite—without disturbing the § 148(a)(1) conviction. Accordingly, Hooper merely holds that Heck presents no bar to an excessive force claim when an officer's allegedly unlawful action can be separated from the lawful actions that formed the basis of the § 148(a)(1) conviction, even if they occurred during one continuous transaction. Here, we cannot separate out which of Sanders's obstructive acts led to his conviction since all of them did. As part of his guilty plea, Sanders stipulated that the factual basis for his conviction encompassed the three instances of resistance identified in the preliminary hearing transcript. Specifically, Officer Bryan testified that he ordered his dog to bite Sanders's right calf as he observed other officers struggling to apprehend Sanders's arms in the gully. So unlike Hooper, the dog bite in this case is unquestionably part of the actions that formed the basis of Sanders's conviction. Under these facts, there is no way to carve out the dog bite from the § 148(a)(1) conviction without 'necessarily imply[ing]' that the conviction was invalid. . . Because the dog bite was part of the § 148(a)(1) conviction's factual basis, it was necessarily lawful for purposes of the Heck analysis. And while Hooper held that a continuous transaction can be broken into 'different actions' for purposes of a § 1983 action, it did not suggest we may slice up the factual basis of a § 148(a)(1) conviction to avoid the Heck bar. On the contrary, Yount—the case relied on by Hooper—specifically rejected this argument. . . . Indeed, we have previously held that a jury conviction for § 148(a)(1) based on multiple acts of resistance necessarily means that officers' actions throughout the whole course of the defendant's conduct' was necessarily found lawful and any action alleging excessive force based on those actions would be Heck-barred. . . Similarly, Heck bars any § 1983 claim alleging excessive force based on an act or acts constituting any part of the factual basis of a § 148(a)(1) conviction. In sum, we hold that Sanders cannot stipulate to the lawfulness of the dog bite as part of his § 148(a)(1) guilty plea and then use the 'very same act' to allege an excessive force claim under § 1983. . . Success on such a claim would 'necessarily imply' that his conviction was invalid. . . Sanders's claim against Officer Bryan is, therefore, barred under Heck."); Poole v. City of Shreveport, 13 F.4th 420, 426-27 (5th Cir. 2021) ("We agree with the district court that Heck is no barrier to Poole's claim. The law Poole violated criminalizes 'the intentional refusal of a driver to bring a vehicle to a stop' under circumstances that endanger human life. . . At the time the shooting occurred, Poole had already stopped driving and exited his truck. Poole's excessive force claim therefore is 'temporally and conceptually distinct' from his flight offense. . . Put another way, it would not be inconsistent with the state court's finding that Poole fled the police for a jury to conclude that an officer used excessive force after that flight ended."); Lopez v. Sheriff of Cook County, 993 F.3d 981, 987 (7th Cir. 2021) ("Lopez pleaded guilty to aggravated discharge of a firearm, which requires a person to knowingly or intentionally fire in the direction of another person. . . Under Illinois law, however, a person can be found guilty of that offense without posing a threat of serious harm to another. . .This means Lopez can be guilty of aggravated discharge of a firearm while also having had excessive force used against him by an officer after the fact. These two realities are not mutually exclusive. So Heck does not bar Lopez's § 1983 claim."); Hooks v. Atoki, 983 F.3d 1193, 1201 (10th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. ___ (2021) ("Heck bars Mr. Hooks from recovering damages based on the first four alleged uses of force. Mr. Hooks's no contest plea to two counts of assault and battery of a police officer means he admitted repeatedly hitting the officers before he was subdued. For Mr. Hooks to prevail on his excessive force claim with respect to these uses, he would need to prove that it was unreasonable for the officers to defend themselves by subduing him. In other words, Mr. Hooks would need to show 'he did nothing wrong.'. . That inquiry would necessarily entail an evaluation of whether and to what extent Mr. Hooks used force against the officers, an inquiry that would take aim at the heart of his criminal plea, thereby violating the spirit of Heck. . . The fifth and sixth uses of force are different. Those allegations align with the examples we articulated in Havens, i.e., 'the claim may be ... that the officer used force after the need for force had disappeared.'. . Mr. Hooks alleges that after Officer Irby tased him once, he fell, hit his head, and lay unmoving, on his stomach on the ground. Yet, Officer Irby tased him again and Officer Harding placed him in a chokehold. An officer can be liable for using excessive force against a suspect who 'no longer posed a threat.'. . Drawing all reasonable inferences in Mr. Hooks's favor, it is plausible that the officers were on notice that Mr. Hooks no longer posed a threat after he collapsed on his stomach on the ground."); Harrigan v. Metro Dade Police Dep't Station #4, 977 F.3d 1185, 1193-97 (11th Cir. 2020) ("[W]e conclude that Heck does not bar Harrigan's suit. Officer Rodriguez focuses on just two of Harrigan's state-court convictions -- for aggravated assault and fleeing to elude, conceding as he must that Harrigan's remaining convictions could not be negated if his § 1983 action were to succeed. Rodriguez says that Harrigan's § 1983 claim 'is directly at odds with' those two convictions and that Harrigan's 'version of events, if proven to be true at trial, would show that' he 'was wrongly convicted.' Harrigan's essential claim in this excessive-force suit is that Officer Rodriguez shot him while he was sitting 'stationary' in his vehicle, stopped at a red light. He claims that 'it was only after being shot by Officer Rodriguez that [he] then accelerated [his] vehicle.' Thus, the shooting was unprovoked and without any justification. Nothing in the record before us 'irrefutably' contradicts that claim; the fact is that 'both [Rodriguez's] excessive use of force and' Harrigan's convictions 'are not a logical impossibility.'. . As we see it, a jury could have found that Officer Rodriguez shot Harrigan first, and that Harrigan then committed aggravated assault and fled the scene. The jury could have found the following: Officers Carter, Baldwin, and Rodriguez stopped Harrigan at the intersection of SW 216th Street and Allapattah Road. The vehicle was stationary at a red light. Officers Baldwin and Rodriguez got out of their police cars and approached Harrigan as he sat in the stolen Ford pickup truck. Without provocation, Officer Rodriguez opened fire. Then, and only then, did Harrigan drive his truck at Officer Baldwin before fleeing the intersection and leading the officers on a high-speed chase. That finding would be consistent with the jury's general guilty verdicts for aggravated assault and fleeing to elude. And, under this set of facts, a federal jury still could find for Harrigan on his § 1983 claim without undermining -- much less negating -- his aggravated-assault and fleeing-to-elude convictions. The 'facts required for' Harrigan 'to prove his § 1983 case do not necessarily logically contradict the essential facts underlying' those convictions, and that means 'Heck does not bar the § 1983 action from proceeding.'. . . Officer Rodriguez may be right. Perhaps the jury rejected Harrigan's necessity defense because it concluded that Rodriguez shot Harrigan only after Harrigan gunned his truck at Officer Baldwin. But because the jury returned general verdicts, we don't know that for certain. . . Perhaps the jury rejected Harrigan's necessity defense for a different reason. Maybe it thought Harrigan had intentionally caused the danger that existed -- after all, Harrigan's encounter with police officers began because he had stolen a truck. The jury could have believed that Officer Rodriguez shot Harrigan; that Harrigan then committed aggravated assault and fled the scene; and that Harrigan was not entitled to the necessity defense he sought. That 'construction of the facts' allows for Harrigan's success in his § 1983 suit without undermining his 'underlying conviction[s].'. . The long and short of it is that the jury's rejection of Harrigan's necessity defense does not 'necessarily' bring his § 1983 suit within Heck's grasp. Finally, Officer Rodriguez invokes what we've called the 'inconsistent-factual-allegations rule.'. . He says that Heck bars Harrigan's § 1983 claim because Harrigan's 'complaint makes specific factual allegations that are inconsistent with the facts upon which his punishment was based.'. . As we've explained, the inconsistent-factual-allegations rule on which Rodriguez relies -- itself 'an additional gloss on the Heck analysis,'. . . applies only in a 'narrow category of cases': 'where the allegation in the § 1983 complaint is a specific one that both necessarily implies the earlier decision is invalid and is necessary to the success of the § 1983 suit itself.'. . 'When a plaintiff alleges a fact that, if true, would conflict with the earlier punishment, but that fact is not necessary to the success of his § 1983 suit, the Heck bar does not apply.'. . It still remains true that a trial jury could sustain Harrigan's excessive-force § 1983 complaint without negating his state-court convictions. . . . Harrigan says that, after Officer Rodriguez began shooting at him, Harrigan 'backed up' before deliberately swerving around Officer Baldwin in front of him. Though this claim is inconsistent with Harrigan's conviction for aggravated assault on Officer Baldwin, the claim is not necessary to the success of Harrigan's § 1983 suit. As in Dixon, the gravamen of Harrigan's lawsuit is that Officer Rodriguez used excessive force by shooting him without provocation. Whether Harrigan intentionally threatened to harm Officer Baldwin or tried only to avoid him -- and we know from his conviction that the former is true -- does not answer whether Officer Rodriguez used excessive force. That Harrigan committed aggravated assault on Officer Baldwin does not necessarily doom his § 1983 claim. The entry of a judgment in Harrigan's favor on his § 1983 excessive-force suit would not necessarily imply the invalidity of his state-court convictions. That means Heck does not bar Harrigan's lawsuit, and the district court's conclusion that it does was error."); El v. City of Pittsburgh, 975 F.3d 327, 339 (3d Cir. 2020) ("Will was convicted of 'creat[ing] a hazardous or physically offensive condition' with 'intent to cause public inconvenience, annoyance or alarm.'. . Therefore, his § 1983 claim would be barred by Heck if, in order to prevail, he needed to demonstrate that he did not do so. But, even if an individual is engaged in disorderly conduct, there still could be a level of responsive force that is reasonable and a level that is 'excessive and unreasonable.'. . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Will, a jury could conclude that Officer Welling's use of force was objectively unreasonable, even taking Will's disorderly conduct into account."); Aucoin v. Cupil, 958 F.3d 379, 381-84 (5th Cir. 2020) ("[A]n inmate cannot bring a § 1983 claim for excessive use of force by a prison guard, if the inmate has already been found guilty for misconduct that justified that use of force. But Heck does not bar a § 1983 claim for a prison guard's excessive use of force after the inmate has submitted and ceased engaging in the alleged misconduct. . . In this case, Prisoner Layne Aucoin complains that Lieutenant Andrew Cupil and Master Sergeant Reginald Robinson, guards at the Dixon Correctional Institute, assaulted him. He says they first assaulted him in his cell—and then again later in the prison lobby and shower. At a subsequent prison disciplinary proceeding, Aucoin was found guilty of defiance, aggravated disobedience, and property destruction for misconduct in his cell. But his misconduct ceased while he was in his cell. We conclude that Heck bars his § 1983 claim as to the alleged use of force in his cell—but not as to the alleged use of force in the prison lobby and shower. That is what the district court held at one point as well, but the court subsequently changed its mind and dismissed Aucoin's entire claim under Heck. We therefore reverse and remand for further proceedings. In doing so, we of course express no comment on the merits of Aucoin's § 1983 claim. We hold only that portions of his claim are not barred by Heck. . . . So when a plaintiff brings multiple § 1983 claims, Heck may bar those claims that potentially conflict with the factual underpinnings of a prior conviction, while posing no bar to other claims. Put simply, there is no Heck bar if the alleged violation occurs 'after' the cessation of the plaintiff's misconduct that gave rise to his prior conviction. . . .Applying this analytical framework here, we hold that Aucoin's excessive force claims for events occurring in his cell are barred by Heck—but that the alleged beatings in the prison showers and lobby are not. Aucoin argues that Heck does not apply to any of his claims, because he never challenged the loss of the time credits and, by extension, the validity of the underlying conviction. We disagree. First, it is of no consequence that he does not contest the loss of his good-time credits. . . Second, Aucoin overlooks one critical failing: He does challenge the conviction by maintaining his innocence in the events that led up to his disciplinary conviction. Specifically, he alleged both in his complaint and in his live testimony that prison staff 'snuck up' on him, sprayed him with mace, and beat him—all unprovoked. He has insisted, in other words, that he is wholly blameless for the use of force against him in his cell. But a claim is barred by Heck if the plaintiff's factual allegations supporting the claim are necessarily inconsistent with the validity of the conviction. . . That is the case here: If the factual account of Aucoin's complaint is taken as true, then he cannot be guilty of defiance, aggravated disobedience, and property destruction—in direct conflict with his disciplinary conviction. As we have stated before, when a plaintiff's claim 'is based solely on his assertions that he ... did nothing wrong, and was attacked by the [ ] officers for no reason,' that suit 'squarely challenges the factual determination that underlies his conviction' and is necessarily at odds with the conviction. . . It is precisely this 'type of claim that is barred by Heck in our circuit.'. . The district court was therefore right to dismiss his claim for excessive force within the cell and up to the point that he was restrained. But the district court erred in dismissing all of Aucoin's claims under Heck. Aucoin's pleadings include allegations that he was beaten and maced in the prison showers and lobby after he had surrendered. His complaint makes clear that these actions occurred after whatever he may have done in his prison cell, and it does so with at least as much specificity as the plaintiff did in Bush. So, as in Bush and Bourne, the plaintiff challenges the exercise of force distinct and isolated from the facts leading to the disciplinary conviction. As a result, 'the factual basis for the conviction is temporally and conceptually distinct from the excessive force claim[s].'. . Heck does not bar those subsequent, discrete claims. . .In sum, Heck bars Aucoin's claims of assault while he was in the cell, up to the point he was restrained. But it does not bar the alleged assault in the showers and lobby after he surrendered—allegations we must take as true at the motion to dismiss stage. We reverse and remand."); Sconiers v. Lockhart, 946 F.3d 1256, 1268-70 (11th Cir. 2020) ("As background, and as we have noted, following the incidents between Sconiers and Lockhart, Sconiers pled guilty to resisting or obstructing an officer without violence. Lockhart argues that Sconiers's guilty plea to this charge precludes him under Heck and Florida collateral estoppel from 'asserting that he was obeying Lockhart's orders to sit down so the area could be cleared and did not lunge at the officer.' Lockhart is mistaken. In Heck, the Supreme Court was concerned about prisoners using § 1983 to implicitly invalidate their convictions, thus making an 'end-run around habeas.'. . To prevent this from happening, the Heck Court erected a wall preventing prisoners from obtaining damages under § 1983 in any action where success would necessarily imply the prisoner's state conviction was invalid. . . If a judgment in favor of a prisoner in a § 1983 case would have this effect, the court must dismiss the complaint unless the prisoner can show that the related state conviction has already been invalidated. . . But when the facts required for a prisoner to prove his § 1983 case do not necessarily logically contradict the essential facts underlying the prisoner's conviction, Heck does not bar the § 1983 action from proceeding. . . .Sconiers pled guilty to resisting, obstructing, or opposing Lockhart, 'who was then and there in the lawful execution of a legal duty ... , to-wit: clearing the ro[v]er's area, without offering or doing violence to the person of such officer.' Crucially, the charging information provides no further facts, and the record similarly fails to identify any facts Sconiers admitted when he entered his guilty plea. So we can look to nothing to illuminate the sequence of events, including who said what when and who hit whom when. As a result, we are left with no way to determine whether Lockhart's use of force was necessarily responsive to Sconiers's non-violent resistance. . . For instance, Sconiers could have 'resisted' by standing up when he should not have or failing to sit when instructed to do so. But following that, Sconiers could have been fully compliant with Lockhart's demands. And Lockhart could have nonetheless used unnecessary force on Sconiers at that time. Or Sconiers's failure to heed Lockhart's commands could have occurred after Lockhart engaged in an unwarranted use of force. For these reasons, similar to the facts in Hadley, both Lockhart's excessive use of force and Sconiers's resistance are not a logical impossibility. Lockhart responds that the arrest affidavit irrefutably establishes he used force only in response to Sconiers's cursing at him and defiance of him, even after Lockhart warned him that he would be pepper-sprayed if he continued his intransigence. But the problem for Lockhart is that he has not established the arrest affidavit was incorporated into Sconiers's guilty plea. Indeed, the plea agreement is not even in the record here. Without that, we cannot determine that Sconiers pled guilty to that recitation of events. As a result, Heck does not bar Sconiers's excessive-force claim against Lockhart because Lockhart has not established that Sconiers's admitted in his plea that his resistance prompted Lockhart's use of force."); Johnson v. Rogers, 944 F.3d 966, 968 (7th Cir. 2019) ("The district court's two reasons for ruling against Johnson—qualified immunity and Heck—are incompatible. A suit barred by the doctrine of Heck is premature and must be dismissed without prejudice, because Heck holds that the claim does not accrue until the conviction has been set aside. . . By contrast, a claim barred by the doctrine of qualified immunity fails on the merits and must be dismissed with prejudice. Here the district court dismissed with prejudice, an inappropriate step when Heck governs. It is possible to bypass Heck and address the merits—after all, Heck concerns timing rather than subject-matter jurisdiction. See Polzin v. Gage, 636 F.3d 834, 838 (7th Cir. 2011). But the district court did not bypass Heck. Relying on it, the court concluded that suit had been filed too soon, and a premature suit must be dismissed without prejudice. We therefore start with Heck to determine whether it is appropriate to consider immunity at all. Heck concludes that a person cannot use § 1983 to collect damages on a theory irreconcilable with a conviction's validity, unless that conviction has been set aside. (Whether this rule extends past the end of imprisonment is a subject before the en banc court in Savory v. Cannon, No. 17-3543 (argued Sept. 24, 2019). We assume for current purposes that it does.) Defendants contend that any recovery for excessive force used at the time of arrest would be inconsistent with Johnson's conviction for resisting arrest. Yet Wallace v. Kato, 549 U.S. 384, 127 S.Ct. 1091, 166 L.Ed.2d 973 (2007), holds that a claim of wrongful arrest may proceed even if a person has been convicted of the offense that led to the arrest. Whether the police had probable cause to arrest is distinct from the question whether a criminal conviction, on a different factual record or a guilty plea, is valid. Likewise when the arrested person contends that the police used excessive force. The propositions 'the suspect resisted arrest' and 'the police used too much force to effect the arrest' can be true at the same time. And so we held in Evans v. Poskon, 603 F.3d 362 (7th Cir. 2010), and its successors, such as Mordi v. Zeigler, 870 F.3d 703 (7th Cir. 2017), and Hill v. Murphy, 785 F.3d 242 (7th Cir. 2015). . . . Johnson, however, does not deny that he tried to obstruct the police from maintaining custody after his arrest. He contends only that Rogers used force that was unreasonable in relation to the nature of his obstruction. This contention can be resolved in Johnson's favor without casting any doubt on the validity of his conviction. It follows that Heck does not block this suit."); O'Brien v. Town of Bellingham, 943 F.3d 514, 529-30 (1st Cir. 2019) ("Whether Heck bars § 1983 claims is a jurisdictional question that can be raised at any time during the pendency of litigation. . . In this case, the record reflects that O'Brien's excessive force claims arising from the incident in the woods are 'so interrelated factually' with his state convictions arising from those events that a judgment in O'Brien's favor would 'necessarily imply' the invalidity of those convictions. . . Indeed, if the officers had used excessive force against O'Brien while arresting him in the woods, as he now claims, their unlawful behavior would have provided O'Brien with a defense against the charges for resisting arrest and assault and battery under state law. . . . Similarly, the district court correctly found that Heck bars any claim that Officer Melanson and Sergeant Perry used excessive force leading up to when O'Brien struck them with the phone handset. Granting a judgment against Officer Melanson and Sergeant Perry would have implied that O'Brien's conduct was justified, while the officers' actions were unjustified, which would have necessarily undermined the validity of O'Brien's assault and battery convictions. As we explained in Thore, although '[a] § 1983 excessive force claim brought against a police officer that arises out of the officer's use of force during an arrest does not necessarily call into question the validity of an underlying state conviction ... [,] it is not necessarily free from Heck' either. . . And because O'Brien has not specified any theory of relief, let alone attempted to identify a factual scenario which would survive Heck, we need not go any further, as any argument to that effect is waived. . . .The arguments that O'Brien does raise on appeal are confusing, conclusory, and easily discarded. First, O'Brien's assertion that the Defendants waived

a defense based on Heck is unavailing as we have already noted that it is a jurisdictional issue that can be raised sua sponte by the court."); Hunter v. City of Leeds, 941 F.3d 1265, 1274-76 & n.12 (11th Cir. 2019) ("Before we can decide whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity based on their conduct, we must first determine what exactly that conduct was. . . Although we must view the facts in the light most favorable to Hunter, as the nonmoving party, the officers' primary argument on appeal is that the District Court erred in crediting Hunter's assertion that he never pointed his gun at Kirk or any of the officers. They argue that his guilty plea to menacing prevents him from relitigating whether he pointed his gun, on the ground of either judicial or collateral estoppel, or the Supreme Court's decision in Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477, 114 S. Ct. 2364 (1994). We conclude that collateral estoppel bars Hunter from asserting, contrary to his guilty plea, that he never pointed his gun at Kirk, but does not bar him from contesting Kirk's statements regarding the number of times that Hunter allegedly pointed his gun. . . . Since we conclude that collateral estoppel bars this assertion, we do not reach the officers' claim that judicial estoppel also bars the assertion. Furthermore, the facts properly asserted—i.e., not barred by collateral estoppel—do not 'necessarily imply the invalidity of [Hunter's] conviction.'. . Because it is logically possible that Hunter pointed his gun at Kirk, and that Kirk nonetheless used excessive force in response, the Heck bar does not apply. . . . Although Hunter's guilty plea to menacing constitutes an admission that he pointed his gun at Kirk, it cannot fairly be construed as an admission that he pointed his gun at Kirk all three times. The only fact necessarily decided by his guilty plea is that Hunter pointed his gun at Kirk (at least) once. The indictment upon which his guilty plea was based stated only that Hunter 'attempt[ed] to intentionally cause the death of another person, Robert Kirk, by pointing a pistol at Peace Officer Robert Kirk,' which could be based on a single act of gun-pointing, or three, or ten. Though Hunter cannot dispute that he did in fact point his gun at Kirk, it would not be inconsistent with his guilty plea to permit him to dispute when he pointed his gun, or whether he pointed his gun multiple times as Kirk claims. Therefore, while collateral estoppel prevents Hunter from denying simply that he ever pointed his gun at Kirk, it does not go so far as to prevent him from denying Kirk's claims that he pointed his weapon multiple times."); Harris v. Pittman, 927 F.3d 266, 278 (4th Cir. 2019) ("Pittman offers an alternative justification for going beyond our mandate and refusing to adopt Harris's account in evaluating the reasonableness of Pittman's use of force: According to Pittman, doing so would require invalidating Harris's state court conviction, something a federal court may not do under Heck v. Humphrey[.] . . This argument – also raised for the first time on appeal – is without merit. Nothing about Harris's § 1983 suit calls into question his North Carolina judgment of conviction on charges of assaulting Officer Pittman while in possession of Pittman's gun. Harris would remain guilty on those charges even if Pittman were found to have used excessive force when he arrested Harris following Harris's commission of his crimes."); Bourne v. Gunnels, 921 F.3d 484, 491 (5th Cir. 2019) ("Bourne was convicted of tampering with his cell door and creating a disturbance in connection with the use of force, resulting in a forfeiture of thirty days' good-time credit. The district court determined that Heck bars the excessive-force claims because, 'if true, [they would] implicate the validity of his disciplinary conviction for creating the disturbance that resulted in the use of force.' To the contrary, Bourne's § 1983 excessive-force claims implicate neither the validity of his underlying conviction nor the duration of his sentence. Bourne's underlying conviction is for aggravated assault with a deadly weapon. A finding of excessive force here would have no bearing on that conviction. Nor would it negate his disciplinary conviction, potentially affecting the duration of his sentence by restoring his good time credits. Bourne was disciplined for '[t]ampering with a locking mechanism or food tray slot and '[c]reating a [d]isturbance' resulting from his jamming the food-tray slot to his cell and refusing to relinquish it, thereby requiring the use of force by prison officials. Conversely, the § 1983 excessive-force claims arise from the specific force defendants used after he was restrained on his cell floor. The basis of Bourne's § 1983 excessive-force claims, therefore, is distinct from the basis of his disciplinary conviction. A finding of excessive force would not negate the prison's finding that Bourne violated its policies and was subject to disciplinary action as a result. A ruling in Bourne's favor on his excessive-force claims would not affect his underlying conviction, his disciplinary conviction, or the duration of his sentence. Accordingly, Heck and its progeny do not bar Bourne's excessive-force claims."); Phillips v. Curtis, No. 18-5868, 2019 WL 1551698, at *1–2 (6th Cir. Apr. 10, 2019) (not reported) ("Generally speaking, for example, if an individual is convicted of resisting arrest, that conviction bars claims that the police used excessive force during an arrest. . . . A victory in a damages suit thus would mean that the officer used force improperly, while the conviction for resisting arrest would dictate the opposite conclusion. . . . That is a classic Heck problem. But a person convicted of resisting arrest may still allege that an officer used excessive force after the arrest occurred. In that situation, the civil suit and the conviction potentially deal with separate moments and potentially can coexist without contradicting one another. . . In this case, Phillips purports to identify two separate incidents, one when she endangered Curtis, the other when he opened fire. To be sure, if the two incidents happened at roughly the same time—or in legitimate response to one another—Heck would bar her lawsuit. For placing Curtis in substantial danger of serious death or injury would mean that, at that moment, Curtis could use deadly force. . . But Phillips says that she placed Curtis's life in jeopardy at point one, she ceased to be a threat at point two, and only after that did Curtis shoot her. Under that scenario, assuming a material gap in time between the two events, her victory in this lawsuit would not necessarily invalidate her criminal conviction. All of this means that the district court applied Heck prematurely in granting the defendants' motion to dismiss. Limited discovery should flesh out the nature of Phillips's plea and the timing of her conduct and the shooting. We realize that seven years have passed since the events in question. Under these circumstances, it is imperative that the district court require Phillips (and, where necessary, the officers) promptly to provide answers to these questions or the lawsuit should be dismissed for failure to prosecute it."); Dixon v. Hodges, 887 F.3d 1235, 1237-40 (11th Cir. 2018) ("Dixon was punished and lost gain time, but his § 1983 suit, if successful, would not necessarily imply that his punishment is invalid. Because success in this § 1983 suit would not necessarily be 'logically contradictory' with the underlying punishment, this suit is not barred by Heck. . . .Pollock admits, in an accurate statement of the law, that '[i]t is possible for an excessive-force action and a battery conviction to coexist without running afoul of Heck.'. . A prisoner may be punished for battery on a prison guard, and that prison guard may be held liable for using excessive force on the prisoner in subduing him; both may be true. At first glance, then, it appears Heck is inapposite. Pollock contends that Heck nonetheless applies here because Dixon alleges that he did not lunge at Pollock before

Pollock used force against him. Because Dixon's disciplinary punishment is grounded in those facts, and Dixon is alleging contrary facts in his § 1983 complaint, Pollock claims that Heck should bar the suit. We have recognized that, in some cases, Heck may bar a prisoner's suit 'if his § 1983 complaint makes specific factual allegations that are inconsistent with the facts upon which his [punishment was] based.'. . This footnote in Dyer, relied upon by Pollock, is a recitation of the inconsistent-factual-allegations rule from McCann v. Neilsen, 466 F.3d 619 (7th Cir. 2006). McCann is a Seventh Circuit decision that reversed a district court's dismissal of a § 1983 complaint under Heck. . . It approvingly discusses the inconsistent-factual-allegations rule, an 'additional gloss on the Heck analysis,' only in the context of one case: Okoro v. Callaghan, 324 F.3d 488, 490 (7th Cir. 2003). . . In Okoro, the plaintiff brought a § 1983 suit following his conviction of a drug crime after heroin was discovered in a search of his home. . . His defense in the criminal drug case was that he sold gems, not heroin, and that police officers had stolen his gems during their search. . . After his drug conviction, he alleged in his § 1983 complaint that the police officers who searched his home had violated his civil rights by illegally seizing his gems. . . The Seventh Circuit determined that the plaintiff's suit was barred under Heck because his § 1983 suit had the effect of 'challenging the validity of the guilty verdict by denying that there were any drugs and arguing that he was framed.'. .To the extent we adopted the inconsistent-factual-allegation gloss on Heck in our Dyer decision, we agree with the Seventh Circuit that it is only apposite in the narrow category of cases like Okoro: where the allegation in the § 1983 complaint is a specific one that both necessarily implies the earlier decision is invalid and is necessary to the success of the § 1983 suit itself. The 'logical necessity' of conflict between the punishment and the § 1983 suit, itself 'at the heart of the Heck opinion,' is present only in these circumstances. . . When a plaintiff alleges a fact that, if true, would conflict with the earlier punishment, but that fact is not necessary to the success of his § 1983 suit, the Heck bar does not apply. Such is the case here. The gravamen of Dixon's § 1983 complaint is that Pollock used excessive force against him. The success of this claim is not necessarily dependent on whether Dixon lunged at Pollock or not. His disciplinary punishment, of course, establishes that he did. . . But that factual finding is not determinative of whether Pollock used excessive force against Dixon. It is logically possible both that Dixon lunged at Pollock and that Pollock used excessive force against him. Because 'there is a version of the facts which would allow the [punishment] to stand' alongside a successful § 1983 suit, Heck does not control. . . . We conclude that Heck and its progeny, including Balisok, do not bar this lawsuit. On the contrary, Dyer requires that the suit be allowed to proceed through the threshold gates of Heck. We therefore vacate the judgment of the District Court and remand for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion."); Viramontes v. City of Chicago, 840 F.3d 423, 427-29 (7th Cir. 2016) ("This court has held that a plaintiff's conviction for assaulting a police officer does not 'necessarily imply' that the officer used appropriate force during the course of arrest after the assault. . . A subsequent excessive-force claim may, however, imply the invalidity of a conviction if the plaintiff attempts to testify in a way that contradicts the conviction's factual basis. To balance this tension, we held in Gilbert that the district court should implement Heck by instructing the jury that it must take as true the facts proved at the earlier criminal or disciplinary proceeding. . . The district court gave this exact instruction. . . . [W]e expressly stated in Gilbert that an instruction could be read to the jury 'at the start of trial, as necessary during the evidence, and at the close of the evidence.'. . The district court did exactly what we stated district courts should do and thus did not err. Despite the plain language in Gilbert, Viramontes argues that this case is distinguishable because the court in Gilbert was faced with a plaintiff who 'encountered difficulty adhering to an agnostic posture on' the disciplinary board's factual findings. . . Viramontes argues, then, that no instruction should be given until a defendant contradicts a prior conviction. Although Viramontes correctly articulates the factual situation in Gilbert, we decline to adopt his narrow interpretation of the rule. In most cases, a district court judge won't know before trial whether a plaintiff will remain agnostic about a prior conviction. Indeed, before trial, all plaintiffs must claim to remain agnostic in order to have their day in court. . . Waiting to instruct the jury to take certain facts as true until the plaintiff claims innocence or disputes the conviction's factual basis might confuse the jury. An instruction before the presentation of evidence solves this potential problem—the jury knows upfront that it must decide all facts except for the facts already stipulated. Even if the rule was not as plain as we make it here, the district court's decision would still withstand scrutiny because Viramontes proved that he could not remain agnostic about his conviction. Viramontes claimed in his deposition that he never tried to hit Officer Lapadula, a claim that directly contradicts his conviction. Further, at trial, Viramontes testified that he 'never resisted'. . . and was 'innocent[.]'. . . Far from remaining agnostic, Viramontes's conduct makes clear why a Gilbert instruction is necessary in these cases. Because the district court was within its discretion to give the Gilbert instruction at the beginning of trial, the timing of the instruction was appropriate."); Tolliver v. City of Chicago, 820 F.3d 237, 242-44 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Tolliver pled guilty to aggravated battery of a peace officer. . . .[I]n order to be guilty of aggravated battery to a peace officer, Tolliver must have (1) known that Sobieraj was a peace officer performing his official duties; and (2) intentionally or knowingly; (3) voluntarily; (4) without legal justification; (5) caused bodily harm to Officer Sobieraj. . . . In Tolliver's current version of the shooting, he concedes that he knew that Sobieraj was a peace officer performing his duties and that Sobieraj was injured when he attempted to move away from Tolliver's car as it rolled towards him. But Tolliver's version of the event denies any act that was knowing, intentional, voluntary and lacking legal justification that caused the harm to Officer Sobieraj. Instead, Tolliver affirmatively asserts that he did not intentionally drive the car towards the officers, and that after the first, unprovoked shot, he was paralyzed, fell over, and could not see what was happening. He argues that it is reasonable to infer that he knocked the gear shift into a forward gear when he fell or 'ducked' to the right after being shot, and he assumes his car drifted towards the officers. Without any acknowledgment of the mental state necessary for a conviction for aggravated battery, Tolliver's version of the shooting thus implies the invalidity of his conviction. . . .Tolliver's conviction was based on voluntarily, and knowingly or intentionally causing bodily harm to Officer Sobieraj, without legal justification. But if the incident unfolded as Tolliver alleges in his civil suit, then he could not have been guilty of aggravated battery of a peace officer because the officer shot him without provocation and was injured as a result of involuntary and unintentional actions by a paralyzed Tolliver. Because Tolliver is the master of his ground, and because the allegations he makes now necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction, Heck bars his civil suit. . . . Tolliver could have brought a suit for excessive force that occurred after the crime was complete. . . .If Tolliver had conceded that he voluntarily and intentionally or knowingly drove towards the officers, or if Tolliver had even remained agnostic on who struck the first blow, he could have brought a claim that the officers' response of firing fourteen bullets at him constituted excessive force and that claim . . . would not be barred by Heck. . . But Tolliver's version of events negates the mental state necessary to support his conviction for aggravated battery of a peace officer and thus necessarily implies the invalidity of his conviction."); Parvin v. Campbell, No. 15-5566, 2016 WL 97692, at *4-5 (6th Cir. Jan. 8, 2016) (not reported) ("As we have previously found that an officer's excessive use of force is a defense to a charge of resisting arrest under Tennessee law, Parvin's resisting arrest conviction barred his excessive force claim because he did not raise excessive force as a defense. Parvin's excessive force claim challenges his underlying conviction and is, therefore, barred under Heck. But the analysis does not end here. For Heck to bar a § 1983 claim, success on the claim must necessarily imply the invalidity of the conviction. Accordingly, both the § 1983 claim and the conviction must arise out of the same events. . . On the other hand, an excessive force claim is not barred when the alleged use of force occurred after the suspect was handcuffed and brought under control. . . In such a case, the force would not be 'inextricably intertwined' with the suspect's resistance to arrest. This case falls much closer in that spectrum to the Cummings situation. Parvin made no effort to argue excessive force after arrest to the district court, nor does he do so on appeal. Both Parvin's and Campbell's versions of facts describe Parvin being handcuffed after he was pepper-sprayed. Parvin specifically argues that Campbell used excessive force before he was handcuffed. Therefore, under our prior holdings, Parvin's excessive force claim arises out of the same conduct that led to his conviction. Moreover, Parvin's claim is not that Campbell used excessive force after Parvin stopped resisting or to stop his resistance. Rather, his claim is based solely on his assertions that he did not resist arrest, did nothing wrong, and was attacked by Campbell for no reason. Thus, Parvin's suit 'squarely challenges the factual determination that underlies his conviction for resisting an officer' and, if he prevails, 'he will have established that his criminal conviction lacks any basis.'. . This is exactly the type of claim that is barred by Heck."); Hill v. Murphy, 785 F.3d 242, 248 (7th Cir. 2015) ("'Imply' is not synonymous with 'invalidate.' A judgment in favor of Hill's claim in this civil suit that his conviction of making a false statement was unconstitutional because it rested on police coercion would not invalidate the conviction, or provide a ground for a suit for postconviction relief (release from prison), but it would cast a shadow over the conviction. It would allow Hill to argue that he had been determined by a court to have been unjustly convicted and sentenced but was forbidden to obtain relief on the basis of that finding. It would thus enable him to indict the legal culture. This Heck forbids. . . . Hill thus can't be permitted in his civil suit to prove that his first statement was coerced, though he can complain about the beating or threats or other brutalities that induced the three statements to the extent the brutalities inflicted injuries (whether physical or mental) for which tort damages can be awarded. All that matters, in short, is that Hill be forbidden to assert on remand that the statement on which his conviction of making a false statement to the government was predicated was coerced, for if it was coerced then an element of his conviction would be negated."); Havens v. Johnson, 783 F.3d 776, 782-83 (10th Cir. 2015) ("An excessive-force claim against an officer is not necessarily inconsistent with a conviction for assaulting the officer. For example, the claim may be that the officer used too much force to respond to the assault or that the officer used force after the need for force had disappeared. . . . Havens pleaded guilty to attempted first-degree assault of Defendant Johnson. A person commits first-degree assault if '[w]ith intent to cause serious bodily injury to another person, he causes serious bodily injury to any person by means of a deadly weapon.'. . And a person commits attempted first-degree assault if 'acting with the kind of culpability otherwise required for commission of" an assault (intent to cause serious bodily injury), 'he engages in conduct constituting a substantial step toward the commission of' the assault. . . In short, Havens pleaded guilty to intentionally taking a substantial step toward causing serious bodily injury to Johnson. At Havens's plea hearing his lawyer partially stated the factual basis for the plea: a police officer was in front of Havens's car and Havens was gunning the engine in an effort to get away. Havens's plea is incompatible with his § 1983 claim. His complaint did not allege, and his opening brief does not argue, that Johnson used excessive force in response to an attempted assault by Havens. Rather, he contends that Johnson's use of force was unreasonable because Havens did not have control of the car, he did not try to escape, he never saw Johnson, he did not drive toward Johnson, and he was hit by police vehicles and shot almost instantly after arriving on the scene. In other words, he did nothing wrong and did not intend or attempt to injure Johnson. This version of events could not sustain the elements of attempted first-degree assault under Colorado law and the factual basis for Havens's plea. Havens does not present an alternative scenario consistent with his attempted-assault conviction. . . Because Havens's only theory of relief is based on his innocence, and this theory is barred by Heck, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to Johnson."); Hayward v. Cleveland Clinic Found., 759 F.3d 601, 613-14 (6th Cir. 2014) ("This Court does not pass judgment on whether Defendants' conduct constituted excessive force. Rather, this Court acknowledges that under current Sixth Circuit precedent, pre-arrest excessive force is an affirmative defense to a charge of resisting arrest in Ohio, and would therefore render invalid a conviction for resisting arrest. Because the factual circumstances in this case indicate that Defendants' allegedly excessive force occurred during Plaintiff's resistance to the arrest, the district court properly dismissed Plaintiff Aaron Hayward's excessive force claim based on Heck. . . . If Plaintiff were to succeed on an illegal home entry claim, it would render his arrest unlawful and imply the invalidity of his underlying guilty plea for resisting arrest. Therefore, the district court properly denied this claim as barred under Heck."); Green v. Chvala, 567 F. App'x 458, 459, 460 (7th Cir. 2014) ("Green was convicted of recklessly endangering others by speeding away from the officer, and an officer may reasonably use deadly force when a suspect 'poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others.' Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U .S. 1, 11–12 (1985); see also Plumhoff v. Rickard, 134 S.Ct. 2012, 2021–22 (2014). Thus, Heck would bar any allegation that Schroeder used excessive force after Green began driving recklessly under § 941.30(2), the offense of conviction. But Heck does not bar Green's claim here because, construing his allegations liberally, see Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 94 (2007), we understand him to allege that Schroeder used deadly force before the reckless driving that led to his conviction. Green alleges that Schroeder fired at him as he slowly drove past Schroeder, before he sped away. Heck does not bar that claim because, if it did, then resistance that did not jeopardize safety, such as the low-speed driving that Green describes, would invite the police 'to inflict any reaction or retribution they choose.'. . We caution, though, that Green survives Heck only if, as his complaint implies, the conviction is for conduct that occurred after the shooting."); Suarez v. City of Bayonne, 566 F. App'x 181, 184-86 (3d Cir. 2014) ("The District Court held that Suarez's excessive force and unreasonable seizure claims amounted to a collateral attack on his simple assault conviction, and were therefore barred by the Supreme Court's decision in Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477, 114 S.Ct. 2364, 129 L.Ed.2d 383 (1994). We disagree. . . We have recognized that Heck does not automatically bar a § 1983 claim for excessive force against an officer even though the plaintiff was convicted of resisting arrest (or, as here, simple assault) based on the same interaction with police. . . This is so because law enforcement officers can 'effectuate[ ] a lawful arrest in an unlawful manner.'. . It is important to separate, for purposes of our Heck analysis, Suarez's arrest on East 11th Street and the fracas at police headquarters. The District Court concluded that the East 11th Street incident 'began the chain of events leading to [Suarez's] guilty plea for simple assault on Detective Rhodes,' and therefore a verdict in Suarez's favor would undermine his conviction. . . We disagree with this conclusion. If a jury were to credit Suarez's version of the East 11th Street incident, that would not imply the invalidity of his simple assault conviction based on the incident at police headquarters. Under New Jersey law, Suarez would have been entitled to resist an unlawful use of force by the Detectives, but such a right would have dissipated once he had been taken into custody and the excessive use of force abated. . . Even if the Detectives employed excessive force on East 11th Street, Suarez's right to resist would have expired by the time he was searched at police headquarters, and therefore he would still be guilty of simple assault. Hence, the claim is not barred by Heck. The analysis is a bit more subtle with respect to the tussle at headquarters. Suarez pleaded guilty to kicking Rhodes in the groin while undergoing the second search. To the extent that Suarez claims either: (1) that he did not kick Rhodes at all and he was beaten wholly without provocation; or (2) that he used a reasonable amount of force when he kicked Rhodes after Rhodes attacked hi m, his claim is barred by Heck. With respect to the former, the reason is that such a theory would undermine the factual basis for his guilty plea insofar as he admitted to kicking Rhodes at his change of plea hearing. With respect to the latter, by pleading guilty to the criminal offense of simple assault, Suarez has conceded that he did not use reasonable force when he kicked Rhodes in response to an excessive and unreasonable use of force. . . He testified at his deposition, however, that Carey hit him at least twice, on his head and in his ribs, and that Rhodes hit him more than once. . . Suarez did not plead guilty to any conduct relating to Detective Carey, and thus if the jury were to credit Suarez's testimony and find that Carey used excessive force in restraining him, his conviction for assaulting Rhodes would not be undermined. Similarly, if the jury found that Rhodes continued to beat Suarez beyond the point necessary to secure him after his brief resistance, the jury could return a verdict in Suarez's favor without undermining his assault conviction. We conclude that the District Court erred in holding that Suarez's excessive force and unreasonable seizure claims are barred by Heck, and we will accordingly reverse the District Court's grant of summary judgment to the Detectives on these claims."); Helman v. Duhaime, 742 F.3d 760, 762, 763 (7th Cir. 2014) ("In this case, the only viable theory of § 1983 liability is Helman's theory that he did not attempt to draw his weapon until after shots were fired at him. That theory is inconsistent with his conviction for Resisting Law Enforcement under Ind.Code § 35–44–3–3.We begin by considering that criminal provision. The language of Ind.Code § 35–44–3–3 provides that '[a] person who knowingly or intentionally ... forcibly resists, obstructs, or interferes with a law enforcement officer ... while the officer is lawfully engaged in the execution of [his] duties ... commits resisting law enforcement....' Cases interpreting that provision have held that the officer is not 'lawfully engaged in the performance of his duties' if he is employing excessive force, and therefore a person who reasonably resists that force cannot be convicted under that provision. . . Accordingly, Helman would not be criminally liable under that statute if he attempted to draw his weapon in response to excessive force. It follows, then, that the criminal conviction under that statute necessarily entails a finding that at the time he drew his weapon, he did not face the use of excessive force by the officers. Helman's § 1983 action, however, is premised upon the assertion that he drew his weapon only in response to the officers' use of excessive force. Specifically, he asserts that when the flash bang device detonated, he had a cup of coffee and a bottle of water in his hands. He maintains that he did not reach for his gun until after the officers began firing at him, and that they fired at him only because he possessed a weapon, not in response to any action by him in reaching for it. In fact, he argues to this court that the transcript of his guilty plea does not contain any admission that he reached for his gun prior to being shot. The problem is that Helman's version of the facts would necessarily imply the invalidity of his state court conviction for resisting law enforcement. It would have been objectively unreasonable for officers to open fire on a person who was not reaching for a weapon or otherwise acting in a threatening manner, and therefore the officers would have been employing excessive force if they did so. . . If Helman attempted to access the gun only after the officers began firing at him, then Helman would have been attempting to draw a deadly weapon in response to excessive force. Accordingly, under Heck, Helman may not pursue a § 1983 claim premised upon that factual scenario. Helman is left, then, with an argument under § 1983 that the officers violated his Fourth Amendment rights in shooting him when he was reaching for his firearm. That claim, however, cannot survive summary judgment because such a response is objectively reasonable. In fact, Helman does not even argue that he could pursue a § 1983 claim under such scenario. The district court properly held that Helman was precluded by his conviction from pursuing this § 1983 action."); Sharif v. Picone, 740 F.3d 263, 269 n.5, 270 (3d Cir. 2014) ("District courts in our Circuit have relied upon Heck and Walker in tandem for the proposition that nolo contendere pleas, and the resulting convictions, bar pleaders from bringing 42 U.S.C. § 1983 claims in certain instances. We need not decide that question because even Appellees concede that Sharif's claim of excessive force does not amount to a collateral attack on his aggravated assault conviction. They further concede that he did not admit any 'facts which would indicate no civil liability on the part of' the corrections officers. . . Indeed, we held in Nelson v. Jashurek, that Heck does not bar an excessive force claim because the claim can stand without challenging any element of the conviction. . . Regardless of whether he engaged in assaultive conduct, Sharif remains free to contend that the reaction of the corrections officers was such that it constituted excessive force in comparison to the threat he posed. Thus, Walker is distinguishable from this case. District courts within the Third Circuit that have chosen to consider or admit past nolo pleas, have done so largely on the basis of collateral estoppel principles discussed in Heck. As explained above, those principles are not applicable in this case, particularly given our holding in Nelson that Heck does not bar an excessive force claim because such a claim would not negate any element of the conviction. . . Given these considerations, we hold that Rule 410 barred the admission of Sharif's plea of nolo contendere."); Navejar v. Iyiola, 718 F.3d 692, 697, 698 (7th

Cir. 2013) ("Navejar cannot deny that he disobeyed orders or assaulted Iyiola because those denials would 'necessarily imply' the invalidity of his discipline. . . But Navejar's assault on Iyiola is not necessarily inconsistent with his sworn contention that the guards answered his assault with excessive force after they subdued him. . . . Without a lawyer for Navejar to advocate the limits of Heck, the court mistakenly barred Navejar from arguing that, after he assaulted Iyiola, the guards responded with disproportionate force."); Daigre v. City of Waveland, Miss., 549 F. App'x 283, 286, 287 (5th Cir. 2013) ("Daigre pleaded guilty to violating Mississippi Code § 97–9–73, which prohibits 'any person [from] obstruct[ing] or resist[ing] by force, or violence, or threats, or in any other manner, his lawful arrest.' However, her complaint contains several statements that contradict an admission of guilt under § 97–9–73. For example, Daigre's complaint alleges, 'At no time did [Daigre] physically resist or assault the Defendant Officers in any way, and the force used against her was unnecessary, unreasonable and excessive.' The complaint further states that '[a]t no time during the events described ... was [Daigre] ... a threat to the safety of herself or others, or disorderly.' Bluntly, the complaint says, '[Daigre] committed no criminal offenses.' The complaint elsewhere summarizes, '[T]he Defendant Officers' assault, arrest, and detainment of [Daigre] was illegal, wrongful and false, where [Daigre] had committed no crime, and there was no need for any amount of force—excessive or otherwise—to be administered against her.' The total effect of these statements is clear: Daigre's excessive-force claim is barred because she 'still thinks [she is] innocent.'. . Unlike the allegations in Bush, Daigre's broad claims of innocence relate to the entire arrest encounter, and not merely a discrete part of it. . . The result is dismissal under Heck."); Schreiber v. Moe, 596 F.3d 323, 335 (6th Cir. 2010) ("We conclude that under these circumstances, Schreiber's § 1983 excessive-force claim does not challenge his conviction for attempting to resist his arrest. . . The Heck doctrine applies only where a § 1983 claim would 'necessarily' imply the invalidity of a conviction. . .'To hold otherwise [would be to] cut off [a] potentially valid damages action[ ] as to which [Schreiber] might never obtain favorable termination − [a] suit[ ] that could otherwise have gone forward had [Schreiber] not been convicted.'. .Therefore, Schreiber should be permitted to proceed on his claim that Moe used excessive force during the course of the arrest."); Connors v. Graves, 538 F.3d 373, 377 (5th Cir. 2008) ("Because section 14:20(2) authorized the use of any force in response to Connors's decision to fire at the officers, a finding that the officers used excessive force would necessarily mean that Connors had not violated section 14:94(E). Thus, Heck bars Connors's excessive force claim because he has not proven that his conviction under section 14:94(E) has been reversed or invalidated."); Lora-Pena v. F.B.I., 529 F.3d 503, 506 (3rd Cir. 2008) ("[C]onvictions for resisting arrest and assaulting officers would not be inconsistent with a holding that the officers, during a lawful arrest, used excessive (or unlawful) force in response to his own unlawful actions."); Hadley v. Gutierrez, 526 F.3d 1324, 1331(11th Cir. 2008) ("The parties spend considerable time debating at what point during the encounter Hadley resisted. Because of his guilty plea, we assume he resisted at some point during the night. What we do not definitively know, however, is whether the punch complained about occurred at a time when Hadley was resisting. The resisting arrest count to which Hadley pleaded guilty is general in nature, and offers no insight into the sequence of events surrounding Hadley's arrest, including at what point Hadley resisted. . .It is theoretically possible that Hadley was punched then resisted, or even that he resisted first, but was punched after he stopped resisting. So the question becomes, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Hadley, whether a jury could conclude that at some point Officer Ortivero punched Hadley in the stomach when he was not resisting? If so, there is a constitutional violation not barred by Heck. The jury is free to disbelieve Hadley's deposition testimony that he never resisted outside of the Publix, yet also believe that he was nonetheless punched at a time when he was not resisting. Under that version of facts . . . there is no Heck bar."); Bush v. Strain, 513 F.3d 492, 498 (5th Cir. 2008) ("As Ballard illustrates, a § 1983 claim would not necessarily imply the invalidity of a resisting arrest conviction, and therefore would not be barred by Heck, if the factual basis for the conviction is temporally and conceptually distinct from the excessive force claim. Accordingly, a claim that excessive force occurred after the arrestee has ceased his or her resistance would not necessarily imply the invalidity of a conviction for the earlier resistance. . . In this case, there is conflicting evidence about whether Bush was injured before or after her resistance ceased, and the crux of the dispute is whether the factual basis for Bush's excessive force claim is inherently at odds with the facts actually or necessarily adjudicated adversely to Bush in the criminal proceeding. . . . Because Bush has produced evidence that the alleged excessive force occurred after she stopped resisting arrest, and the fact findings essential to her criminal conviction are not inherently at odds with this claim, a favorable verdict on her excessive force claims will not undermine her criminal conviction. The magistrate judge's contrary conclusion was erroneous."); Gilbert v. Cook, 512 F.3d 899, 901, 902 (7th Cir. 2008) ("Just as Wallace v. Kato, 127 S.Ct. 1091 (2007), holds that Heck does not affect litigation about police conduct in the investigation of a crime, so we hold that Heck and Edwards do not affect litigation about what happens after the crime is completed. Public officials who use force reasonably necessary to subdue an aggressor are not liable on the merits; but whether the force was reasonable is a question that may be litigated without transgressing Heck or Edwards. . . . .Only a claim that 'necessarily' implies the invalidity of a conviction or disciplinary board's sanction comes within the scope of Heck. . . .There remains the fact that Gilbert encountered difficulty adhering to an agnostic posture on the question whether he had hit a guard. . . . Instead of insisting that Gilbert confess in open court to striking a guard, the judge should have implemented Heck and Edwards through instructions to the jury at the start of trial, as necessary during the evidence, and at the close of the evidence. It would have sufficed to tell the jurors that Gilbert struck the first blow during the fracas at the chuckhole, that any statements to the contrary by Gilbert (as his own lawyer) or a witness must be ignored, and that what the jurors needed to determine was whether the guards used more force than was reasonably necessary to protect themselves from an unruly prisoner.This case must be retried, and Gilbert must be allowed to present evidence about what the guards did to him after he extended his hands through the chuckhole."); Dyer v. Lee, 488 F.3d 876, 879, 881(11th Cir. 2007) ("It is not the case that a successful § 1983 suit by the plaintiff would 'necessarily imply the invalidity of [her] conviction' for resisting arrest with violence. . . . Other courts to have addressed the applicability of Heck in situations similar to the instant case have emphasized the importance of logical necessity and the limited scope of the Heck holding. [collecting cases] . . . . [F]or Heck to apply, it must be the case that a successful § 1983 suit and the underlying conviction be logically contradictory. Here, that is not the case. . . . Heck was not intended to be a shield to protect officers from § 1983 suits. It was intended to protect habeas corpus and promote finality and consistency.

Provided those goals are met, a § 1983 suit is not barred by Heck."); Thore v. Howe, 466 F.3d 173, 180 (1st Cir. 2006) ("A § 1983 excessive force claim brought against a police officer that arises out of the officer's use of force during an arrest does not necessarily call into question the validity of an underlying state conviction and so is not barred by Heck. . . Even the fact that defendant was convicted of assault on a police officer does not, under Heck, as a matter of law necessarily bar a § 1983 claim of excessive force. . . In this case Thore asserts two theories. The first is that he was not guilty of assault at all, and so Officer Howe's use of force was excessive. That theory is plainly barred by Heck. The more modest second theory is that his excessive force claim need not impugn his convictions for assault and battery with a dangerous weapon in order to establish that Officer Howe used excessive force. Thore says that even if his car had previously hit the cruisers and brushed Officer Dibara's body, by the time of the shooting, Thore was stationary in a car, boxed in with nowhere to go, and posed no threat to the officers, who had been told that he had no gun. Just as it is true that a § 1983 excessive force claim after an assault conviction is not necessarily barred by Heck, it is also true that it is not necessarily free from Heck. The excessive force claim and the conviction may be so interrelated factually as to bar the § 1983 claim. . . Officer Howe argues, relying on Cunningham, that this is such a case: that Thore's third conviction for assault and battery with a dangerous weapon was based on his refusal to obey commands to get out of his car, and on his gunning his engine to start to get away. In doing so, he endangered the two officers: Officer Dibara on foot and Officer Howe in his cruiser. We cannot tell from the record before us whether this is so. While we conclude that Heck does not automatically bar consideration of an excessive force claim by an individual who has been convicted of assault, the record before us does not permit a determination of the requisite relatedness."); McCann v. Neilsen, 466 F.3d 619, 622, 623 (7th Cir. 2006) ("The question for us, then, is not whether McCann could have drafted a complaint that steers clear of Heck (he could have), but whether he did. In other words, does the complaint contain factual allegations that 'necessarily imply' the invalidity of his convictions. . . On this question, we find it dispositive that the district court took an ambiguously worded paragraph in the complaint − one that could be read to avoid the Heck bar − and construed it in a manner that favored the defendant. In deciding a Rule 12(c) motion, we accept the facts alleged in the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. . . Giving McCann the benefit of all reasonable inferences, we conclude that his complaint can reasonably be read in a manner that does not implicate Heck. To repeat, the operative paragraph of the complaint states as follows: At the time and date aforesaid, the plaintiff did not pose a threat of violence or great bodily harm to the defendant, was not in the commission of a forcible felony nor was he attempting to resist, escape or defeat an arrest otherwise [sic] acting so as to justify the use of deadly force by the defendant. (Emphasis added.) The district court read this paragraph to constitute a categorical denial by McCann that he ever posed a threat of violence to the deputy, or ever attempted to resist or defeat arrest. Given the convoluted syntax employed, this reading is not completely unreasonable, and, so read, this paragraph renders McCann's allegations arguably inconsistent with his assault and obstruction convictions. But there is an equally plausible construction that avoids inconsistency with McCann's assault and obstruction convictions. That is, by reference to the concluding and qualifying clause emphasized above, the paragraph can be read as alleging that McCann never posed a threat of violence, attempted escape, or resisted arrest to a degree that would have justified the use of deadly force as a response. Read in this way, McCann is not denying his assaultive and obstructive conduct, but is alleging that regardless of what he may have done, the deputy's use of deadly force as a response was not reasonable. Given our obligation at this stage of the proceedings to construe the complaint in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, we give the complaint this construction and hold that McCann's claim is not barred by Heck. On remand, McCann should be given an opportunity to file an amended complaint that clarifies and implements this reading of his allegations."); Riddick v. Lott, No. 05-7882, 2006 WL 2923905, at *2 (4th Cir. Oct. 12, 2006) (not reported) ("In this case, the record is sparse. Without knowing the factual basis for Riddick's plea, we cannot determine whether his claim of police brutality would necessarily imply invalidity of his earlier conviction for assaulting an officer while resisting arrest. . . It is not clear from Riddick's pro se complaint whether the officer's alleged punch preceded, coincided with, or followed Riddick's resistance and assault. If the officer's alleged punch caused Riddick to engage in the conduct that undergirds his conviction, then a successful § 1983 suit would necessarily imply invalidity of that conviction, since a person cannot be found guilty of resisting arrest if he is simply protecting himself, reasonably, against an officer's unprovoked attack or use of excessive force. . . If, however, there is no legal nexus between the officer's alleged punch and Riddick's resistance and assault; that is, the alleged punch occurred, independently, either before Riddick resisted arrest, or after his resistance had clearly ceased, then a successful §1983 suit for excessive force would not imply invalidity of the conviction. . . . In analogous cases, courts have ruled that Heck does not bar 1983 actions alleging excessive force despite a plaintiff's conviction for resisting arrest because a 'state court's finding that [a plaintiff] resisted a lawful arrest ... may coexist with a finding that the police officers used excessive force to subdue [the plaintiff].' . . In a similar vein, Riddick's conviction may coexist with a finding that the officer's alleged attack was unprovoked and occurred independently of Riddick's own resistance. Because the timing of the events is unclear, we vacate the district court's order dismissing Riddick's action without prejudice pursuant to Heck and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion."); Swiecicki v. Delgado, 463 F.3d 489, 495 (6th Cir. 2006) ("The specific language of the Cleveland resisting-arrest ordinance (requiring that the arrest be lawful in order to convict) in combination with the applicable Ohio caselaw (where a finding of excessive force invalidates the lawfulness of an arrest) dictates the result here. Swiecicki's success on his excessive-force claim would therefore necessarily imply the invalidity of his Ohio state-court conviction for resisting arrest. Thus, the statute of limitations did not begin to run until Swiecicki's state-court conviction was overturned."); Ballard v. Burton, 444 F.3d 391, 399, 400 (5th Cir. 2006) ("The Texas statute in Sappington and Hainze authorized use of deadly force upon reasonable belief that there was imminent danger of serious bodily injury. Those decisions turned on the fact that, because serious bodily injury to the defendant was an element of the § 1983 plaintiff's conviction, it was impossible for the defendant to have used excessive force because the statute authorized use of deadly force to defend against the bodily injury that the § 1983 plaintiff had inflicted upon him. . . . Hainze and Sappington each involved a conviction for aggravated assault under Texas law where the assault was against a defendant in the § 1983 claim for excessive force. Each of those convictions required proof that the § 1983 plaintiff had caused serious bodily injury. By contrast, Ballard's conviction was for assault, by physical menace, on an officer who is not a defendant in his§ 1983 claim. Ballard's conviction did not require proof that he caused bodily injury, serious or otherwise. Not a single element of Ballard's simple assault conviction would be undermined if Ballard were to prevail in his excessive force claim against Burton or Oktibbeha County. For this reason, unlike the Hainze and Sappington convictions, Ballard's Mississippi conviction for simple assault does not, as a matter of law, necessarily imply that Burton did not use excessive force as alleged in the instant complaint. . . . A finding that Burton's use of force was unreasonable would imply neither that Ballard did not attempt by physical menace to put Boling in fear of imminent bodily harm, nor that Ballard's assault on Boling was in necessary self defense. Although we have distinguished Sappington, our method of analysis remains consistent. . . . Based on the events described in the summary judgment record, we conclude that a judgment in Ballard's favor on his § 1983 claim against Burton and Oktibbeha County could easily coexist with Ballard's conviction for simple assault of Boling, without calling into question any aspect of that conviction."); Hainze v. Richards, 207 F.3d 795, 796, 797 (5th Cir. 2000) (Where plaintiff had been convicted of aggravated assault under Texas law, court held, Aas in Sappington, the force used by the deputies to restrain Hainze, up to and including deadly force, cannot be deemed excessive."); Sappington v. Bartee, 195 F.3d 234, 237 (5th Cir. 1999) (§ 1983 suit barred where plaintiff's criminal conviction "required proof that he caused serious bodily injury to [officer]. [Officer] was justified in using force up to and including deadly force to resist the assault and effect an arrest. As a matter of law, therefore, the force allegedly used by [officer] cannot be deemed excessive."); Hudson v. Hughes, 98 F.3d 868, 873 (5th Cir. 1996) ("Because self-defense is a justification defense to the crime of battery of an officer, Hudson's claim that Officers . . . used excessive force while apprehending him, if proved, necessarily would imply the invalidity of his arrest and conviction for battery of an officer.").

See also Beets v. County of Los Angeles, 669 F.3d 1038, 1040, 1041, 1044-48 (9th Cir. 2012) ("We hold that Heck bars plaintiffs' suit. Plaintiffs seek to show that Deputy Winter used excessive force, but the jury that convicted GPR's accomplice has already determined that the deputy acted within the scope of his employment and did not use excessive force. Accordingly, a verdict in plaintiffs' favor would tend to undermine Morales' conviction. Moreover, Morales, GPR's accomplice, challenged the propriety of Deputy Winter's actions in her criminal trial, her interests in doing so were in no way inconsistent with plaintiffs' interests, and Morales was convicted by a jury. Under these circumstances, plaintiffs' § 1983 action is barred by Heck. . . .Morales' conviction for felony resisting arrest and assault with a deadly weapon on a peace officer were under an aiding and abetting theory. As such, the jury had to have found that Rose committed those crimes. The jury was specifically instructed that it could not find that Rose committed the crimes unless it determined that Officer Winter was in the lawful performance of his duties and did not use excessive force. As such, Morales' conviction necessarily rested on the jury's findings as to the actions of Deputy Winter with respect to Rose. That is, the jury found that Deputy Winter was in the lawful performance of his duties and did not use excessive force. . . .Plaintiffs raise two issues on appeal. First, they argue that Heck should be strictly interpreted and may not be applied to § 1983 actions where the plaintiffs have not been convicted or charged with any crimes. Second, they argue even if Heck were applicable, it would not bar their civil action. They argue that they should be allowed to show that Deputy Winter had managed to move to one side of the truck when he shot GPR through a side window, and accordingly Deputy Winter was no longer in danger when he shot, and the shooting occurred subsequent to GPR's criminal activity. We address their arguments in reverse order because our conclusion that Heck would otherwise bar this action focuses our consideration of whether the preclusion extends to these plaintiffs who were not criminally prosecuted or convicted. . . . Our reasoning in Cunningham is persuasive here. There was no break between GPR's assault with the pickup truck and the police response. Deputy Winter acted during the course of GPR's and Morales' criminal activity and brought that activity to an end. Deputy Winter's actions were 'within the temporal scope of [GPR's and Morales'] crime and [were] part of a single act for which the jury found that[Morales] bears responsibility.'. . There was no separation between GPR's criminal actions and the alleged use of excessive force such as existed in Smithart (alleged assault occurred after Smithart got out of the truck) or City of Hemet (alleged assault occurred after Smith was detained). Thus, even were it determined that the maroon pickup truck had come to a stop a fraction of a second before Deputy Winter fired, the shots would remain part of the temporal scope of GPR's and Morales' crimes. . . .In sum, the record shows that the jury that convicted Morales determined that Deputy Winter acted within the scope of his duties and did not use excessive force, and that plaintiffs seek to show that the very same act constituted excessive force. Thus, if GPR rather than Morales had been convicted, there is no doubt that this civil action would have to be dismissed pursuant to Heck. Similarly, it is clear that Morales' conviction bars her from bringing a § 1983 action based on Deputy Winter's action. . . . The remaining question is whether the Heck bar extends to the plaintiffs in this case who were not tried or convicted. . . . Our description of the Heck preclusion doctrine in City of Hemet references 'a criminal conviction,' not 'the plaintiff's' criminal conviction. . . Our choice of language suggests that the Heck preclusion doctrine may apply to civil actions brought by individuals other than the convicted criminal if such application does not otherwise violate any constitutional principles. . . . Plaintiffs argue that they have not had an opportunity to litigate the factual issues underlying their § 1983 action and that Morales' criminal proceedings should not bar them from their day in court. . . .Here, as in Cunningham, the first two prongs are satisfied: (1) the issue in Morales' criminal proceeding and in this § 1983 action are identical—whether Deputy Winter used excessive force; and (2) Morales' conviction constitutes a judgment on the merits—Deputy Winter did not use excessive force. However, plaintiffs were not parties to the criminal prosecution of Morales. Accordingly, Heck preclusion can only apply if plaintiffs 'had an identity or community of interest with, and adequate representation by, the losing party in the first action,' and under the circumstances 'should reasonably have expected to be bound by the prior adjudication.'. . . We conclude that under the particular facts of this case, plaintiffs should reasonably have expected to be bound by the jury's decision in Morales' criminal proceeding and because a favorable decision in plaintiffs' civil action would undermine her conviction, the civil action is barred by Heck. . . .[W]e hold that where more than one person engages in a concerted criminal act during the course of which one of the criminals is killed by the police, then when the propriety of the officer's action is critical to the conviction of a surviving criminal, and the deceased's interests in the issue are in no way inconsistent with the surviving criminal's interest in the issue, the 'community of interest' is such that the deceased and those asserting claims through the deceased may reasonably be bound by the determination of the issue by a jury in the criminal proceeding."). But see Eberhardinger v. City of York, 782 F. App'x 180, ___ n.2 (3d Cir. 2019) ("Officer Smith also argues on appeal that Officer Smith cannot be found to have violated Eberhardinger's constitutional rights under clearly established law because such a conclusion would be inconsistent with Foster having pleaded nolo contendere to, among other offenses, reckless endangerment. To support this position, he cites Heck v. Humphrey, which held that 'in order to recover damages for allegedly unconstitutional conviction or imprisonment, or for other harm caused by actions whose unlawfulness would render a conviction or sentence invalid, a § 1983 plaintiff must prove that the conviction or sentence has been reversed' or otherwise invalidated. . . But Heck concerned the relationship between a prisoner's criminal conviction and his own § 1983 suit, . . . and it has been applied to bar a third party's § 1983 suit only where the convict was the third party's accomplice, see Beets v. County of Los Angeles, 669 F.3d 1038, 1048 (9th Cir. 2012) (holding that "where more than one person engages in a concerted criminal act during the course of which one of the criminals is killed by the police, then when the propriety of the officer's action is critical to the conviction of a surviving criminal, and the deceased's interests in the issue are in no way inconsistent with the surviving criminal's interest in the issue," the Heck doctrine may apply); see also Hayward v. Cleveland Clinic Found., 759 F.3d 601, 616 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Heck does not apply to third-party § 1983 claims."). That is not the case here, so regardless of whatever relevance Foster's conviction may have at trial, it does not dictate a different result in our review of the District Court's qualified immunity determination."); Hayward v. Cleveland Clinic Found., 759 F.3d 601, 616 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Heck does not apply to third-party § 1983 claims. In Heck, the Supreme Court addressed a situation where 'a state prisoner seeks damages in a § 1983 suit" and a "district court [would have to] consider whether a judgment in favor of the plaintiff would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction or sentence.'. . The Court was concerned that '§ 1983 and the federal habeas corpus statute, 28 U.S.C. § 2254, were "on a collision course."'. . Because such a concern does not extend to the civil rights claims of third parties, the district court erred in applying Heck to bar Plaintiffs Annie and Essex Hayward's § 1983 claim."); Thomas v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 17-4196, 2019 WL 4039575, at *9 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 27, 2019) ("[D]efendants ignore a critical distinction between there being an outstanding criminal conviction of a plaintiff versus that of a third-party witness. In Heck, the Supreme Court explained that 'when a state prisoner seeks damages in a § 1983 suit, the district court must consider whether a judgment in favor of the plaintiff would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction or sentence; if it would, the complaint must be dismissed unless the plaintiff can demonstrate that the conviction or sentence has already been invalidated.'. . However, 'if the district court determines that the plaintiff's action, even if successful, will not demonstrate the invalidity of any outstanding criminal judgment against the plaintiff, the action should be allowed to proceed.'. .The cases cited by the defendants involved a plaintiff's claim being barred by his own conviction, not a witness's testimony being barred by the witness's conviction, and the Court's separate research reveals no cases extending Heck in such a way.").

Compare Martell v. Cole, 115 F.4th 1233, 1234-35, 1237-41 (9th Cir. 2024) ("Under Heck, a § 1983 action cannot be maintained by a plaintiff who has been convicted of a crime if 'a judgment in favor of the plaintiff would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction or sentence.'. . A conviction under § 148(a)(1) requires that the criminal defendant resist or obstruct lawful conduct by an officer. Lemos v. County of Sonoma, 40 F.4th 1002, 1006 (9th Cir. 2022) (en banc). A subsequent § 1983 action for excessive force is therefore barred by Heck if the force that the plaintiff challenges as unlawful is the same force that the plaintiff was convicted of resisting. . . . In this case, Martell engaged in multiple acts of resistance or obstruction that could serve as a factual predicate for his § 148(a)(1) conviction, both before and after the use of force he claims was excessive. His guilty plea did not specify which act was the basis of his conviction. Success in his § 1983 lawsuit therefore would not undermine his guilty verdict because the verdict could be based on any one of his acts of resistance or obstruction. Because '[a]n action under section 1983 is barred if—but only if—success in the action would undermine the [guilty verdict] in a way that "would necessarily imply or demonstrate that the plaintiff's earlier conviction was invalid,"' Heck does not bar Martell's suit. . . . In Lemos, our en banc court rejected the view that Heck precludes a plaintiff's suit absent a clear 'temporal or spatial distinction or other separation between the conduct for which [the plaintiff] was convicted ... and the conduct which forms the basis of her Section 1983 claim.'. . To determine whether a § 148(a)(1) conviction bars a subsequent damages claim for excessive force, a court must look to the particular act or acts for which the plaintiff may have been convicted. . . The court cannot conclude generally that the plaintiff's conviction was 'based on the entire incident as a whole,' such that a finding of excessive force at any time during the incident would necessarily conflict with the conviction. . . We held in Lemos that Heck does not bar a § 1983 action even when the plaintiff alleges the officer used excessive force during one of several resisting or obstructing acts that 'could be the basis for the guilty verdict' if the record does not show that this particular act was the factual predicate for the plaintiff's § 148(a)(1) conviction. . . . Our cases resolve this appeal. Martell's guilty plea under § 148(a)(1) did not specify which act (or acts) of resistance or obstruction was (or were) the basis of his plea. His plea could have been based on any of several acts of resistance or obstruction, either before or after the use of force he challenges. . . .Our en banc decision in Lemos did not suggest that its Heck analysis depended on the precise amount of time or space between the act of obstruction for which the plaintiff was convicted and the use of force the plaintiff challenged as excessive. . . In all cases involving the application of Heck to a § 148(a)(1) conviction, the question is whether the specific act for which the plaintiff was convicted was resistance to the particular use of force the plaintiff alleges was unlawful. If it was not, 'success on the merits' of the plaintiff's § 1983 action 'would not "necessarily imply that the plaintiff's conviction was unlawful."'. . As Lemos and Hooper make clear, this principle holds true regardless of the number of seconds or minutes between the plaintiff's act of resistance or obstruction and the officer's allegedly unlawful use of force. . . . In this case, as in Hooper and Lemos and in contrast to Sanders, the record is silent about which one (or more) of Martell's resisting or obstructing acts was (or were) the factual predicate of his guilty plea. Because of that silence, a finding that the deputies used excessive force when Martell 'was thrown face first down to the ground' would not necessarily imply the invalidity of Martell's conviction. Absent an indication in the record that the factual predicate for his conviction was resistance to or obstruction of the specific use of force he now challenges, Martell's conviction would be sufficiently supported by any of his resisting or obstructing actions before and after that use of force. . . . In sum, we held in Lemos that a § 1983 excessive force suit may proceed after a § 148(a)(1) conviction unless the obstructive act that was the factual basis for the conviction was resistance to the use of force the plaintiff now alleges was unlawful. . . We further held that when the factual predicate of the conviction is unclear from the record and conduct that would be sufficient to support the conviction was not obstruction of or resistance to the allegedly excessive force, success in the plaintiff's § 1983 suit would not necessarily imply the invalidity of the plaintiff's conviction, and the suit would not be barred. . . Our holdings in Lemos, Hooper, and other cases require us to reverse the dismissal of Martell's complaint. . . .Heck does not bar a § 1983 action following a § 148(a)(1) conviction unless the factual basis for the conviction was resistance to or obstruction of the particular use of force the plaintiff alleges was excessive. When the factual predicate of the conviction is not clear from the record and the conviction could have been based on an act of resistance or obstruction different from the plaintiff's conduct during the allegedly unlawful use of force, a judgment in the plaintiff's favor in the § 1983 action would not 'necessarily imply the invalidity of [the] conviction.'. . Because Martell's conviction is adequately supported by his resisting or obstructing conduct that took place both before and after the deputies' allegedly unlawful use of force, we reverse the judgment of the district court and remand for further proceedings.") with Martell v. Cole, 115 F.4th 1233, 1241 (9th Cir. 2024) (Lee, J., dissenting) ("In September 2020, several San Diego Sheriff's Deputies busted through the door of Ronald Martell's apartment after receiving a 911 call about an ongoing domestic violence incident. As the body camera footage shows, the deputies yelled at Martell to put up his hands and get on the ground. Martell did neither, kneeling with his hands by his sides. The deputies immediately twisted Martell's arms behind his back and pushed him to the floor as he instinctively resisted.' This entire exchange lasted seconds. The deputies sat with Martell for several minutes before handcuffing him and escorting him out of the home. Martell pleaded guilty to one violation of California Penal Code § 148(a)(1), stating only that he 'willfully obstructed or delayed a peace officer in the performance of his official duties.' He then sued under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, alleging that the officers used excessive force during this arrest. Given the broad factual basis of his plea, Martell contends that his claim is not barred by Heck v. Humphrey, which precludes § 1983 actions that would necessarily require the plaintiff to prove the unlawfulness of his conviction.'. . The majority opinion agrees. To get there, the majority opinion separates Martell's brief scuffle with the deputies into several seconds-long intervals such that his guilty plea can be read to cover only one of those artificially severed events. That holding is just another step in this circuit's slow erosion of the Heck bar. We have already said that spatial and temporal distinctions are not dispositive when analyzing convictions under § 148(a)(1). Now, the majority opinion goes even further and slices a fleeting incident into multiple isolated events—even though Martell's entire interaction was a single, inseverable event—to evade the Heck bar. I respectfully dissent.")

Compare Lemos v. County of Sonoma, 40 F.4th 1002, 1003-09 (9th Cir. 2022) (en banc) ("[B]ecause the record does not show that Lemos's section 1983 action necessarily rests on the same event as her criminal conviction, success in the former would not necessarily imply the invalidity of the latter. We therefore reverse and remand for further proceedings. . . . The district court granted summary judgment to the defendants. The court reasoned that '[g]iven [Lemos's]

and her cohorts' continuous screaming and provoking,' there was 'no temporal or spatial distinction or other separation between the conduct for which Lemos was convicted, by a jury, and the conduct which forms the basis of her Section 1983 claim.' The court concluded that "Holton's actions ... form[ed] one uninterrupted interaction and the jury's finding that he did not use excessive force would be inconsistent with a Section 1983 claim based on an event from that same encounter.'A divided three-judge panel of this court affirmed. . . We voted to rehear the case en banc. . . .To decide whether success on a section 1983 claim would necessarily imply the invalidity of a conviction, we must determine which acts formed the basis for the conviction. When the conviction is based on a guilty plea, we look at the record to see which acts formed the basis for the plea. . . We follow the same approach when the conviction is based on a jury verdict. As several other courts of appeals have recognized, a court must look at the record of the criminal case—including the jury instructions—to determine which facts the jury necessarily found. . . .This case involves a conviction for resisting, delaying, or obstructing a peace officer, in violation of California Penal Code section 148(a)(1). That offense has three elements: '(1) the defendant willfully resisted, delayed, or obstructed a peace officer, (2) when the officer was engaged in the performance of his or her duties, and (3) the defendant knew or reasonably should have known that the other person was a peace officer engaged in the performance of his or her duties.'. . The second element is particularly significant because California courts have held that an officer who uses excessive force is acting unlawfully and therefore is not engaged in the performance of his or her duties. . . For that reason, the jury at Lemos's criminal trial was instructed that '[a] peace officer is not lawfully performing his or her duties if he or she is ... using unreasonable or excessive force.' It follows that Heck would bar Lemos from bringing an excessive-force claim under section 1983 if that claim were based on force used during the conduct that was the basis for her section 148(a)(1) conviction. . . In that circumstance, to prevail in the section 1983 action, she would have to prove that Holton used excessive force, thus 'negat[ing] an element of the offense' of which she was convicted. . . But, crucially, the jury was told that it could find Lemos guilty based on any one of four acts she committed during the course of her interaction with Holton: making physical contact with Holton at the door to the truck; placing herself between Holton and Labruzzi; blocking Holton from opening the truck door; and pulling away from Holton when he attempted to grab her. Because the jury returned a general verdict, we do not know which act it thought constituted an offense. Although any one of the four acts could be the basis for the guilty verdict, Lemos's section 1983 action is based on an allegation that Holton used excessive force during only the last one; at oral argument, Lemos expressly stated that she understood that act to refer to her pulling away from Holton just before he tackled her, and she disavowed any claim based on force used by Holton earlier in their encounter. There would be no contradiction in concluding (as the criminal jury may have) that Lemos obstructed Holton during the lawful performance of his duties by, say, blocking him from opening the truck door while also concluding (as Lemos alleges in this action) that Holton used excessive force when he tackled her five minutes later. Thus, if Lemos were to prevail in her civil action, it would not necessarily mean that her conviction was invalid. The action is therefore not barred by Heck. . . . Although Beets did involve a jury verdict, both the criminal prosecution and the section 1983 action involved the same event: Officers fatally shot a man who was driving a truck toward them. . . The passenger in the truck was convicted of aiding and abetting

the driver's assault on the officers, and the parents of the deceased driver brought a section 1983 claim, alleging that the officers used excessive force. . . We held that Heck precluded the section 1983 action because success would have necessarily implied the invalidity of the passenger's criminal conviction. . . We explained that 'there are not multiple factual bases for [the passenger's] conviction for aiding and abetting in the assault.'. . In other words, the section 1983 action was predicated on the same conduct that the criminal jury had already determined was lawful. . . Although we disapprove of Beets's repetition of the Smith dictum, the reasoning of Beets does not undermine our holding here. In this case, unlike in Beets, the jury was instructed that multiple acts could serve as the predicate for the criminal conviction, and we do not know which the jury chose. Because the district court erred in holding that Lemos's action was barred by Heck, we reverse the grant of summary judgment to the defendants.") with Lemos v. County of Sonoma, 40 F.4th 1002, 1009-13 (9th Cir. 2022) (en banc) (Callahan, J., joined by Lee, J., dissenting) ("Like a wolf in sheep's clothing, the majority opinion may appear at first blush to simply dispense with the Heck preclusion doctrine due to the unique factual scenario presented, but something more troubling lingers beneath the surface. The majority's reasoning presupposes that an uninterrupted interaction with no temporal or spatial break between a § 1983 plaintiff's unlawful conduct and an officer's alleged excessive force can be broken down into distinct isolated events to avoid the application of the Heck bar. In this way, the decision creates an escape hatch to Heck. . . . Of course, an allegation of excessive force by a police officer is not barred by Heck if the alleged act is distinct temporally or spatially from the factual basis for the section 148(a)(1) conviction, because such an allegation would not 'necessarily' imply the invalidity of the conviction. . . But the court must determine whether there is a legitimate analytical way to parse the individual's obstructive acts from the officer's use of force. The majority apparently concludes that the four acts identified in the jury instructions provide all the court needs to make its Heck determination. . . . [T]he fact that the jury instructions offered four acts which could form the basis for Lemos's section 148(a)(1) conviction cannot alone be determinative of whether the Heck bar applies. Under California law, the question remains whether Lemos's obstructive acts can be separated, temporally or otherwise, from Deputy Holton's alleged excessive force. Here, they cannot. The cases tend to fall into two categories: the first, where the alleged excessive force occurs after the chain of events underlying the section 148(a)(1) conviction . . . , such as in Hooper v. Cnty. of San Diego, 629 F.3d 1127, 1134 (9th Cir. 2011) and Sanford v. Motts, 258 F.3d 1117, 1118 (9th Cir. 2001) (the Heck bar does not apply), and the second, where the alleged excessive force occurs during the chain of events underlying the section 148(a)(1) conviction, such as in Beets and Sanders v. City of Pittsburg, 14 F.4th 968, 970 (9th Cir. 2021) (the Heck bar applies). Thus, if Lemos had been bitten by a police dog after she had been arrested for violating section 148(a)(1), for example, her conviction for resisting an officer would not have barred her § 1983 lawsuit. But the facts underlying Lemos's conviction, including each of the four acts listed in the jury instructions and Deputy Holton's alleged excessive force, all occurred during a single indivisible chain of events before her arrest, and therefore her § 1983 is barred by Heck. . . . [T]he majority engages in the 'temporal hair-splitting' cautioned against by courts time and again in search of a distinct break between Lemos's criminal act and Deputy Holton's alleged use of force where none meaningfully exists. . . Because no such break exists, Lemos could only have been convicted if the jury found that Deputy Holton did not use excessive force throughout the interaction, an element of the conviction which the jury was instructed on. But Lemos can only prevail on her § 1983 claim if she proves that Deputy Holton did use excessive force during that same interaction. Thus, allowing Lemos's § 1983 action to proceed violates the holding of Heck and creates conflicting resolutions arising out of a single event. Because the majority opinion 'expand[s] opportunities for collateral attack' on criminal convictions despite clear Supreme Court guidance to the contrary, I respectfully dissent.")

See also Hooper v. County of San Diego, 629 F.3d 1127, 1131-34 (9th Cir. 2011) ("The facts of Smith allowed us to differentiate cleanly between two phases of the encounter with the police. In the first phase, when Smith stood on his porch and refused the officers' lawful orders, he violated § 148(a)(1) by 'resist[ing], delay[ing], or obstruct[ing]' the police in the performance of their duties. In the second phase, when the police arrested him, Smith may or may not have violated § 148(a)(1), depending on whether the police acted lawfully in effecting the arrest. . . . Four years after Smith, the California Supreme Court held that a conviction under § 148(a)(1) can be valid even if, during a single continuous chain of events, some of the officer's conduct was unlawful. Yount v. City of Sacramento, 43 Cal.4th 885 (2008). According to the Court, a conviction under § 148(a)(1) requires only that some lawful police conduct was resisted, delayed, or obstructed during that continuous chain of events. In other words, the California Supreme Court interpreted the elements of § 148(a)(1) differently than did the California Court of Appeal in Susag, the decision upon which we relied in Smith. . . . The Court's decision in Yount does not mean that our holding in Smith was wrong. But it does mean that our understanding of § 148(a)(1) was wrong. Section 148(a)(1) does not require that an officer's lawful and unlawful behavior be divisible into two discrete 'phases,' or time periods, as we believed when we decided Smith. It is sufficient for a valid conviction under § 148(a)(1) that at some time during a 'continuous transaction' an individual resisted, delayed, or obstructed an officer when the officer was acting lawfully. It does not matter that the officer might also, at some other time during that same 'continuous transaction,' have acted unlawfully. We are, of course, bound by the California Supreme Court's interpretation of California law. . .We therefore apply Heck to § 148(a)(1) as the California Supreme Court interpreted it in Yount. . . The question before us is the basic Heck question − whether success in Hooper's § 1983 claim that excessive force was used during her arrest 'would "necessarily imply" or "demonstrate" the invalidity' of her conviction under § 148(a)(1). . . Given California law, as clarified by Yount, we hold that it would not. The chain of events constituting Hooper's arrest was, in the words of the Court in Yount, 'one continuous transaction.' A holding in Hooper's § 1983 case that the use of the dog was excessive force would not 'negate the lawfulness of the initial arrest attempt, or negate the unlawfulness of [Hooper's] attempt to resist it [when she jerked her hand away from Deputy Terrell].'. . . In so holding, we agree with many of our sister circuits in similar cases. . . . To the extent the state law under which a conviction is obtained differs, the answer to the Heck question could also differ. Nonetheless, the decisions of our sister circuits are instructive, for many state statutes that criminalize resisting lawful arrest and other lawful police conduct are very similar. It is thus not surprising that most of the circuit courts that have addressed the Heck bar in cases involving such statutes should have given the same answer, and that we, in turn, agree with that answer. In sum, we conclude that a conviction under California Penal Code § 148(a)(1) does not bar a § 1983 claim for excessive force under Heck when the conviction and the § 1983 claim are based on different actions during 'one continuous transaction.' In the case now before us, we hold that Hooper's § 1983 excessive force claim is not Heck-barred based on her conviction under § 148(a)(1)."); VanGilder v. Baker, 435 F.3d 689, 692 (7th Cir. 2006) ("Here, VanGilder was originally charged with felony battery on a police officer. After plea bargaining, the charge was reduced, and VanGilder was convicted instead of resisting a law enforcement officer, a misdemeanor. Thus, whether this suit is barred by Heck hinges on whether an action against Baker for excessive use of force necessarily implies the invalidity of VanGilder's conviction for resisting. The answer is no. Exactly what happened during the blow-by-blow in the St. Elizabeth's emergency room, and thus whether VanGilder is entitled to damages, is a question to be decided at trial. But as a threshold matter, it is clear that a judgment for VanGilder, should he prevail, would not create 'two conflicting resolutions arising out of the same or identical transaction.' . . VanGilder does not collaterally attack his conviction, deny that he resisted Baker's order to comply with the blood draw, or challenge the factual basis presented at his change of plea hearing. Rather, VanGilder claims that he suffered unnecessary injuries because Baker's response to his resistance − a beating to the face that resulted in bruises and broken bones − was not, under the law governing excessive use of force, objectively reasonable. . . Were we to uphold the application of Heck in this case, it would imply that once a person resists law enforcement, he has invited the police to inflict any reaction or retribution they choose, while forfeiting the right to sue for damages. Put another way, police subduing a suspect could use as much force as they wanted − and be shielded from accountability under civil law − as long as the prosecutor could get the plaintiff convicted on a charge of resisting. This would open the door to undesirable behavior and gut a large share of the protections provided by § 1983."); Smith v. City of Hemet, 394 F.3d 689, 696 (9th Cir. 2005) (en banc) ("A conviction based on conduct that occurred before the officers commence the process of arresting the defendant is not 'necessarily' rendered invalid by the officers' subsequent use of excessive force in making the arrest."); Washington v. Summerville, 127 F.3d 552, 556 (7th Cir. 1997) ("Washington's success on either his unlawful arrest or excessive force claim would not have necessarily implied the invalidity of a potential conviction on the murder charge against him."); Smithart v. Towery, 79 F.3d 951, 952 (7th Cir. 1996) ("Because a successful section 1983 action for excessive force would not necessarily imply the invalidity of Smithart's arrest or conviction, Heck does not preclude Smithart's excessive force claim.").

See also Peterson v. Johnson, 714 F.3d 905, 911-18 (6th Cir. 2013) ("[W]e are squarely presented with the question of first impression regarding what kind of preclusive effect we must give to the hearing officer's finding that Peterson grabbed Johnson's hand and not vice versa. The answer to that question turns first on federal law and then on Michigan law. . .The federal courts in this Circuit have occasionally given preclusive effect to factfinding from Michigan prison hearings. . . . Enter the Supreme Court's opinion in University of Tennessee v. Elliott, which explained that 'when a state agency acting in a judicial capacity resolves disputed issues of fact properly before it which the parties have had an adequate opportunity to litigate, federal courts must give the agency's factfinding the same preclusive effect to which it would be entitled in the State's courts.'. . Elliott addressed a state agency determination that had not been appealed to state court, and found that the agency's factual determinations were binding in the plaintiff's collateral § 1983 action. . . Thus, while Elliott obviously does not speak directly to Michigan hearing-officer findings, it does establish four criteria for, in the context of a § 1983 case, according preclusive effect to a state administrative agency's unreviewed factual determination. We take each one in turn. [Court finds all four criteria satisfied] Neither the Michigan Supreme Court nor the Michigan Court of Appeals has yet determined whether preclusive effect should be given to a major misconduct hearing's factfinding. Thus, we will have to be guided by their standard rules on agency issue preclusion. [Court concludes that "Michigan courts would grant preclusive effect to the hearing officer's finding that Peterson grabbed Johnson's hand."] Sometimes explaining what something is not goes a long way toward showing what it is. And because this is an issue of first impression, we wish to make perfectly clear that our preclusion analysis is distinct from two other parallel lines of law. First, we are not suggesting that the hearing officer's legal conclusion that Peterson committed assault and battery has any bearing on whether Johnson treated Peterson with excessive force. It does not. As this Court explained in Lockett v. Suardini, 526 F.3d 866, 873 (6th Cir.2008), an assault-and-battery conviction is analytically distinct from an excessive force claim; a prisoner can commit the former and simultaneously be the victim of a guard's excessive force. Rather, what we hold is that the hearing officer's factual finding that Peterson was the one who grabbed Johnson's hand precludes a contrary finding in federal court. That being true, the question then becomes whether, on the facts of this case, a reasonable jury could find that Johnson's brief struggle to free his hand and then return Peterson to his cell was a malicious and sadistic use of excessive force. . . We find that it could not and accordingly affirm the district court. Further, our holding includes only factual issues decided by a state agency. Both Elliott and the state cases on which we rely were explicit that the preclusive effect they recognized concerned purely factual determinations, and that limitation makes good sense. Had the hearing officer purported to make a legal conclusion regarding Peterson's federal constitutional rights, our analysis would necessarily be different and we could not likely be so deferential. . .Second, we are not relying on the rule from Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994), and Edwards v. Balisok, 520 U.S. 641 (1997), that rejects a prisoner's § 1983 claim where vindicating it would necessarily imply the invalidity of a prison agency's disciplinary determination. That rule applies only where a prisoner's § 1983 challenge 'threatens ... his conviction or the duration of his sentence.' Muhammad v. Close, 540 U.S. 749, 751 (2004) (per curiam). Peterson's challenge threatens neither. He does not seek relief for any effect that the assault-and-battery conviction may have had on good-time credits nor does anything in the record show that good-time credits were implicated, and there is no indication that his underlying murder conviction or sentence is in any way affected by his claim. Instead, Peterson seeks solely financial damages for Johnson's alleged excessive force. Thus, the Heck/Edwards rule has no relevance here.").

See also Westbrook v. City of Cincinnati, No. 1:21-CV-476, 2025 WL 437211, at *4–6 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 7, 2025) ("Here, Westbrook asserts a § 1983 claim based on the Officers' alleged use of excessive force. Helpfully, the Sixth Circuit has specifically identified two scenarios in which Heck may bar a § 1983 excessive force claim. . . 'The first is when the criminal provision makes the lack of excessive force an element of the crime.'. . 'The second is when excessive force is an affirmative defense to the crime[.]'. .That is because, in both situations, 'the § 1983 suit would seek a determination of a fact that, if true, would have precluded the conviction.'. . Beyond merely laying out the applicable framework, Hayward also provides helpful instruction on how that excessive force framework plays out in the context of Ohio's resisting-arrest statute, Ohio Rev. Code § 2921.33—the statute underlying one of Westbrook's convictions here. In that setting, Hayward adopts a bright-line rule: Heck bars § 1983 claims resting on allegations of pre-arrest excessive force, but not those resting on post-arrest excessive force. . . In explaining the basis for that rule, Hayward acknowledged some confusion in Ohio law as to whether the lack of excessive force is actually an element of the crime of resisting arrest. . . But whatever tension may exist on that front, the court noted it was beyond dispute that the presence of excessive force would constitute an affirmative defense. . . Thus, one way or the other, 'a § 1983 claim of [pre-arrest] excessive force would necessarily imply the invalidity of an underlying conviction for resisting arrest." Id. And that, in turn, means Heck bars pre-arrest excessive force claims by plaintiffs convicted of resisting arrest. By contrast, Heck does not 'bar § 1983 suits alleging post-arrest excessive force.'. . That's because 'excessive force occurring after' a plaintiff's resistance and arrest does 'not necessarily imply the invalidity of the underlying conviction for resisting arrest.'. . So to discern whether Heck bars a plaintiff's § 1983 excessive force claim 'a court must carefully examine the facts and the temporal sequence of the underlying offense and the alleged unconstitutional conduct' to determine when the allegedly unlawful force was used in relation to when the officers accomplished the arrest. . . In other words, whatever other factual disputes may exist here, only one set of facts matters for resolving the Heck question: Whether the Officers allegedly used excessive force before they arrested Westbrook, or after. . . . Even viewing the facts in Westbrook's favor (as the Court must at summary judgment), the record reveals that Westbrook's excessive force claim challenges exclusively pre-arrest conduct. . . . All told, because the state court found Westbrook guilty of resisting arrest, and because Westbrook bases his excessive force claim only on the Officers' pre-arrest conduct, Heck prevents this Court from considering his § 1983 claim. The Court thus GRANTS the Officers' motion for summary judgment and dismisses this action [without prejudice]."); Anderson v. La Penna, No. 18 C 6159, 2019 WL 1239667, at *3–4 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 18, 2019) ("On August 28, 2018, plaintiff pled guilty to misdemeanor resisting arrest and was subsequently sentenced to 364 days in the Cook County Department of Corrections. In exchange for his guilty plea on the misdemeanor charge, the felony charges were dismissed nolle prosequi. Plaintiff's unlawful detention claim alleges that there was no probable cause for the felony charges of armed habitual offender, aggravated unlawful use of a weapon, aggravated battery to a police officer, and felony resisting arrest. Thus, to avoid his claim being barred by Heck, plaintiff will need to prove there was no probable cause for the felony charges without impugning his misdemeanor resisting arrest conviction. The parties agree that the only difference between felony resisting arrest and misdemeanor resisting arrest is that the felony charge requires that the defendant proximately caused an injury to the officer. Defendants argue that this alone shows that a finding that there was no probable cause for the felony charge would impugn plaintiff's misdemeanor conviction. Plaintiff's complaint, however, alleges that the police officer defendants falsified claims of injuries, and that, in fact, plaintiff did not cause any injuries to the officers. At this stage, there is nothing to suggest that a finding that there was no probable cause for the felony resisting arrest charge would necessarily impugn plaintiff's misdemeanor conviction. Nor is there anything to suggest that a finding that there was no probable cause for the other felony charges would necessarily impugn plaintiff's conviction. As currently drafted, however, plaintiff's complaint is inconsistent with his conviction. '[I]f [the plaintiff] makes allegations that are inconsistent with the conviction's having been valid, Heck kicks in and bars his civil suit.'. . .In the instant case, even drawing all reasonable inferences in plaintiff's favor, plaintiff's description of the events in his complaint includes language that implies his conviction is invalid. For example, the complaint states '[d]espite his cooperation, Defendant Officers Swoboda and Giovenco ordered Plaintiff William Anderson to place his hands on the squad car and remain in that position.' The complaint goes on to allege '[a]fter standing with his hands on the squad car for a period of time, Plaintiff William Anderson repeatedly expressed his desire to leave, stating that he had done nothing wrong. As Plaintiff William Anderson turned and told this to Defendant Officers Swoboda and La Penna, Defendant Officers Swoboda and La Penna tackled William Anderson to the ground.' Plaintiff's misdemeanor conviction required a showing that he 'knowingly resist[ed] or obstruct[ed] the performance by one known to the person to be a peace officer...of any authorized act within his or her official capacity.'. . Plaintiff's description of the events is inconsistent with a showing of these elements. Although plaintiff could have drafted his complaint to avoid this inconsistency, as currently drafted, his claims are barred by Heck. The court will allow plaintiff to file an amended complaint to cure this defect."); Garrett v. Needleman, No. 16 CV 1062, 2017 WL 2973481, at *4–5 (N.D. Ill. July 12, 2017) ("A conviction for assault or battery of a peace officer does not necessarily bar a § 1983 claim of excessive force stemming from the same incident, 'so long as the § 1983 case does not undermine the validity of the criminal conviction.'. . 'A contention that a guard struck back after being hit is compatible with Heck. Otherwise guards (and for that matter any public employee) could maul anyone who strikes them, without risk of civil liability as long as the private party is punished by criminal prosecution or prison discipline for the initial wrong.'. . 'An argument along the lines of "The guards violated my rights by injuring me, whether or not I struck first" does not present the sort of inconsistency' that warrants application of the Heck doctrine. . . . In Hardrick, the plaintiff was allowed to proceed on his § 1983 claim that police officers used excessive force after the plaintiff had been subdued and was in custody. . . Likewise, in Brengettcy v. Horton, after having been convicted of battery of a peace officer, the plaintiff filed a civil rights action claiming excessive force alleging that the officer used unnecessary and unreasonable force against him after he struck the officer. . . Success on such a claim in that case 'd[id] not undermine [the plaintiff]'s conviction or punishment for his own acts of aggravated battery.'. . Where the facts alleged by a § 1983 plaintiff contradict or necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction, however, Heck bars the claim. Moore v. Mahone, 652 F.3d 722, 723-24 (7th Cir. 2011). In Moore, a prisoner with a battery conviction could not proceed with his § 1983 claim that a correctional officer used excessive force against him; the prisoner asserted that he had committed no battery on the guard to justify any use of force in response. . . That plaintiff could have argued that officers overreacted to his battery, which might not necessarily have implied the invalidity of his battery conviction. But because the plaintiff asserted and persisted with his claim that he had committed no battery at all to justify any use of force, his claim was barred by Heck. . . It is possible for a plaintiff to remain 'agnostic' about the facts supporting his criminal conviction. . . But 'a plaintiff is master of his claim and can, if he insists, stick to a position that forecloses relief.'. . In this case, plaintiff insists that he was 'willingly compl[ying]' with defendant Needleman's orders when the officer '[s]uddenly and without warning ... pushed [plaintiff] to the ground' and then struck him in the face several times.'. . Regardless of whether plaintiff expressly challenges his convictions, he cannot disavow their factual underpinning without calling into question their validity. . . Plaintiff's position that he was in full compliance with defendants' directives, and that they attacked him without any justification for doing so, requires dismissal of his excessive force claim pursuant to Heck. This case presents a scenario very similar to Tolliver v. City of Chicago. Therein, the plaintiff, in pleading guilty to aggravated battery to a peace officer, stipulated that the evidence would establish that he had driven his vehicle towards an officer who, in fear for his safety, fired his service weapon at the vehicle. . . In the plaintiff's subsequent civil rights action, he maintained that he was paralyzed except for his 'eyeballs' at the time, and was therefore unable to intentionally drive the car, which merely rolled in the officer's general direction. . . The Court of Appeals affirmed summary judgment in favor of the officer, finding that the plaintiff's version of events was Heck-barred for alleging facts inconsistent with his conviction for aggravated battery of a peace officer. . . The Court of Appeals found that 'if the incident unfolded as Tolliver alleges in his civil suit, then he could not have been guilty of aggravated battery of a peace officer because the officer shot him without provocation and was injured as a result of involuntary and unintentional actions by a paralyzed Tolliver.'. . Defendants' unrefuted evidence reflects that plaintiff pleaded guilty to two counts of aggravated battery to a peace officer and one count of aggravated unlawful use of a weapon. As part of the plea colloquy, plaintiff stipulated that he had exited the vehicle, made a quick movement, and pulled away when Needleman attempted to perform a protective pat down. He further conceded that he had scratched Needleman's neck and bitten Peraino on his wrist. Additionally, he admitted that he had drawn a loaded semi-automatic handgun from his waistband. Plaintiff does not contend that defendants resorted to excessive force after he pointed a gun at them or otherwise attempted to harm them; he does not argue that the officers overreacted to his aggressive actions; and he does not suggest that they engaged in force after he was already restrained. Instead, he maintains that the officers took him to the ground and assaulted him without any reason for doing so. Plaintiff's account contradicts the admissions he made at his plea hearing. If plaintiff's current version of the incident is true, these facts would necessarily imply that both of his convictions are invalid. . . Under the facts presented, the Heck doctrine bars plaintiff's excessive force claim. A finding that defendants resorted to force for no reason would necessarily impugn plaintiff's underlying convictions."); Barbosa v. Conlon, 962 F.Supp.2d 316, 330, (D. Mass. 2013) ("While the First Circuit has not addressed the issue, this court will assume, without deciding, that an admission to sufficient facts and a continuance without a finding 'constitutes a conviction for the purposes of the Heck limitation on subsequent § 1983 actions.'. . Nevertheless, there is nothing in the plaintiffs' claims for excessive force that conflicts with or challenges the criminal judgments against the plaintiffs.While the plaintiffs' conduct may be a factor in assessing the defendants' response, the fact that the plaintiffs may have engaged in unruly conduct does not give the police carte blanche to exert unreasonable force against them. The police may still be liable for use of excessive force. . . . [I]n the instant case the plaintiffs' admissions are not per se inconsistent with their claims that the police used force that was unreasonable under the particular circumstances confronting the police at the time of the arrests. Since the plaintiffs' action, 'even if successful, will not demonstrate the invalidity of any outstanding criminal judgment against the plaintiff[s],' their 'action should be allowed to proceed[.]'. . Consequently, the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the plaintiffs' excessive force claim will be denied."); Russo v. DiMilia, 894 F.Supp.2d 391, 406, 407 (S.D.N.Y. 2012) ("'It is well established that an excessive force claim does not usually bear the requisite relationship under Heck to mandate its dismissal.'. . As the 'police might well use excessive force in effecting a perfectly lawful arrest[,] ... a claim of excessive force in making an arrest does not require overturning the plaintiff's conviction even though the conviction was based in part on a determination that the arrest itself was lawful.'. . Here, the excessive force claim does not bear the 'requisite relationship' to Plaintiff's conviction for menacing in the third degree. The jury was instructed that it should convict Plaintiff of menacing DiMilia in the third degree if it found: (1) that Plaintiff 'by physical menace placed or attempted to place John DiMilia in fear of death or imminent serious physical injury or imminent physical injury'; and (2) that Plaintiff 'did so intentionally.'. . . '[A]n officer's decision to use deadly force is objectively reasonable only if the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a significant threat of death or serious physical injury to the officer or others.'. . Because the jury did not specify what exactly Plaintiff did that menaced DiMilia, the Court cannot rule out the possibility that the jury found that Plaintiff placed DiMilia in fear of 'imminent physical injury.' If this is the case, Defendants' use of force could be found excessive without invalidating Plaintiff's conviction for menacing, as the use of deadly force to respond to a threat of 'imminent physical injury,' as opposed to 'death or serious physical injury,' could be found excessive. For this reason, a reasonable jury in this case could find that the shooting of Plaintiff by Algarin and Guedes was an excessive use of force, despite Plaintiff's conviction for menacing DiMilia."); Sekerke v. Kemp, No. 11cv2688 BTM (JMA), 2013 WL 950706, *5, *6 (S.D. Cal. Mar. 12, 2013) ("In several cases, the Ninth Circuit has applied Heck's favorable termination requirement to consider, and sometimes preclude, excessive force claims brought pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983. For example, in Cunningham, the Ninth Circuit found § 1983 excessive force claims filed by a prisoner who was convicted of felony murder and resisting arrest were barred by Heck because his underlying conviction required proof of an 'intentional provocative act' which was defined as 'not in self defense.'. . A finding that police had used unreasonable force while effecting the plaintiff's arrest, the Court held, would 'call into question' the validity of factual disputes which had necessarily already been resolved in the criminal action against him. . . However, in Smith v. City of Hemet, 394 F.3d 689 (9th Cir.2005), the Ninth Circuit considered whether excessive force allegations of a prisoner who pled guilty to resisting arrest pursuant to Cal. Penal Code § 148(a)(1) were also barred by Heck and found that 'Smith's § 1983 action [wa]s not barred ... because the excessive force may have been employed against him subsequent to the time he engaged in the conduct that constituted the basis for his conviction.'. . Under such circumstances, the Ninth Circuit held Smith's § 1983 action 'neither demonstrate[d] nor necessarily implie[d] the invalidity of his conviction.'. . see also Sanford v. Motts, 258 F.3d 1117, 1120 (9th Cir.2001) ("[I]f [the officer] used excessive force subsequent to the time Sanford interfered with [the officer's] duty, success in her section 1983 claim will not invalidate her conviction. Heck is no bar."); cf. Hooper v. County of San Diego, 629 F.3d 1127, 1134 (9th Cir.2011) (holding that a conviction for resisting arrest under Cal.Penal Code § 148(a) (1) does not 'bar a § 1983 claim for excessive force under Heck [if] the conviction and the § 1983 claim are based on different actions during "one continuous transaction."'). Here, Defendants have not shown that Plaintiff's excessive [force] claims against them are necessarily inconsistent with his adjudication of guilt for battery on a peace officer. Thus, this Court cannot say that Plaintiff's excessive force claims 'necessarily imply the invalidity' of his battery conviction under Cal.Code Regs., tit. 15 § 3005(d)(1). . . The factual context in which the force was used is disputed. Plaintiff's Complaint and its exhibits contain allegations by both him and a fellow inmate witness that he was nonresistant when Kemp and Andersen entered the office and used force against him. . . Plaintiff's own exhibits also contain allegations by Defendants Andersen, Kemp, and Crespo which contradict Plaintiff's version of events. . . Thus, while Defendant Savala, the hearing officer presiding over Plaintiff's CDC 115 hearing, considered this evidence and found it 'substantiated' a charge of assault on a peace officer, . . . Defendants Kemp, Andersen and Crespo may still be found liable if, as Plaintiff alleges, they punched, kicked, and beat him with a baton while he lie on the floor 'on [his] stomach with [his] hands behind [his] back.'. . .For these reasons, the Court DENIES Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Plaintiff's excessive force claims on grounds that they are barred by Heck."); Michaels v. City of Vermillion, 539 F.Supp.2d 975, 992-94 (N.D. Ohio 2008) ("The *Swiecick*i court recognized the particularly close relationship between the offense 'resisting arrest' and the use of force by the police in accomplishing an arrest. While Heck bars excessive force claims that imply the invalidity of a resisting arrest conviction under Ohio law, . . . the use of force that gives rise to an excessive force claim could potentially occur after a lawful arrest was accomplished. Under these circumstances, the excessive force claims do not imply the invalidity of the resisting arrest conviction. The Sixth Circuit thus expressly limited the applicability of Heck based on the timing of the alleged excessive force. . . Heck only bars § 1983 claims when the force at issue is allegedly used prior to, or in conjunction with, the suspect's resistance. . . When the alleged excessive force is used after the suspect ceases resisting arrest, the Heck rule does not apply. . . . . Taking the facts as set forth by the Plaintiffs, Officer Grassnig allegedly tased Michaels after the arrest had been effectuated, after Michaels had ceased resisting, and while Michaels was fully inside the squad car. Although this is a close question given that the events at issue occurred in quick succession, the Court finds that the Plaintiffs have raised a material issue of fact with respect to whether the tasing incident to Michaels' lawful arrest is distinct from the gratuitous tasing the Plaintiffs assert as the basis of their excessive force claims. This case thus falls into the narrow category described by the dicta in Swiecicki: Because Michaels has alleged that the police tased him gratuitously after he resisted arrest (and after he had ceased resisting arrest), Swiecicki does not require the Court to apply the Heck-bar."); Bramlett v. Buell, No. Civ.A.04-518, 2004 WL 2988486, at *3, *4 (E.D. La. Dec. 9, 2004) (Distinguishing Hainze, Sappington, and Hudson as cases in which 'the force used by the officer occurred simultaneously with the force exhibited by the plaintiff.' Here, Aif the jury were to conclude that the officers' decision to shoot Bramlett was excessive in light of their asserted goal of protecting the bystanders, that would do nothing to undermine the fact that seconds earlier Bramlett had committed an aggravated battery upon Officer Major.").

C. Heck Does Not Apply to False Arrest Claims That Might Impugn an Anticipated Criminal Conviction

Prior to the Supreme Court's decision in Wallace v. Kato, 127 S. Ct. 1091(2007), a number of circuits applied Heck to claims that, if successful, would necessarily imply the invalidity of an anticipated conviction on a pending criminal charge. See, e.g., Smith v. Holtz, 87 F.3d 108, 113 (3d Cir. 1996). See also Harvey v. Waldron, 210 F.3d 1008, 1014 (9th Cir. 2000) ("We agree with the Second, Third, Sixth, Seventh, Tenth and Eleventh Circuits and hold that Heck applies to pending criminal charges, and that a claim, that if successful would necessarily imply the invalidity of a conviction in a pending criminal prosecution, does not accrue so long as the potential for a conviction in the pending criminal prosecution continues to exist."); Beck v. City of Muskogee Police Dep't, 195 F.3d 553, 557 (10th Cir. 1999) ("Heck precludes § 1983 claims relating to pending charges when a judgment in favor of the plaintiff would necessarily imply the invalidity of any conviction or sentence that might result from prosecution of the pending charges. Such claims arise at the time the charges are dismissed."). Accord Cummings v. City of Akron, 418 F.3d 676 (6th Cir. 2005); Shamaeizadah v. Cunigan, 182 F.3d 391, 397-99 (6th Cir. 1999); Covington v. City of New York, 171 F.3d 117, 124 (2d Cir. 1999); But see Brown v. Taylor, No. 04-51280, 2005 WL 1691376, at *1 (5th Cir. July 19, 2005) (unpublished) ("To the extent that Brown's allegations concerned pending criminal charges, however, the district court's dismissal of his civil-rights complaint under Heck was erroneous. Insofar as it remains unclear whether Brown has been tried or convicted on those charges, the district court should have stayed the instant action until the pending criminal case against Brown has run its course. [citing Mackey v. Dickson, 47 F.3d 744, 746 (5th Cir.1995)].").

Wallace now makes clear that the Heck doctrine does not bar the filing of false arrest claims where there is no outstanding criminal conviction but only an "anticipated future conviction." The Court explains:

> [T]he Heck rule for deferred accrual is called into play only when there exists 'a conviction or sentence that has not been ... invalidated,' that is to say, an 'outstanding criminal judgment.' It delays what would otherwise be the accrual date of a tort action until the setting aside of an extant conviction which success in that tort action would impugn. . . . What petitioner seeks, in other words, is the adoption of a principle that goes well beyond Heck: that an action which would impugn an anticipated future conviction cannot be brought until that conviction occurs and is set aside. The impracticality of such a rule should be obvious. In an action for false arrest it would require the plaintiff (and if he brings suit promptly, the court) to speculate about whether a prosecution will be brought, whether it will result in conviction, and whether the pending civil action will impugn that verdict,

> . . . all this at a time when it can hardly be known what evidence the prosecution has in its possession.

Wallace, 127 S. Ct. at 1098.

Post-Wallace Cases:

Haas v. Noordeloos, No. 19-3473, 2020 WL 591565, at *1 (7th Cir. Feb. 6, 2020) (not reported ("[T]o the extent the district court implied that Haas's claims are barred by Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477, 487 (1994), we conclude that such a holding is premature. Wallace v. Kato, 549 U.S. 384, 393–94 (2007) makes clear that an anticipatory Heck bar is not a valid ground for dismissal. Because this case was resolved by the district court at such an early stage, it is difficult to assess precisely what legal theories the pro se plaintiff intends to pursue. To the extent he wishes to collaterally attack his pending criminal prosecution, the appropriate action here is 'to stay the civil action until the criminal case or the likelihood of a criminal case is ended.'. . On remand, the district court should evaluate at an appropriate time what claims Haas intends to pursue and whether they implicate or are ancillary to his pending criminal case. This may also require consideration at some point of the issues of potential claim and issue preclusion, but we are unable to sort those out at this stage. Once the claims are clarified, the civil defendants in this case should be served, and the district court should consider the possibility of a stay pursuant to Wallace.")

Mills v. City of Covina, 921 F.3d 1161, 1166 n.1 (9th Cir. 2019) ("Prior to Wallace, the rule in this circuit was that a § 1983 action like this one 'alleging illegal search and seizure of evidence upon which criminal charges are based does not accrue until the criminal charges have been dismissed or the conviction has been overturned.' Harvey v. Waldron, 210 F.3d 1008, 1015 (9th Cir. 2000). District courts have expressed confusion over whether this deferred accrual rule survived the Supreme Court's decision in Wallace. . . The deferred accrual rule we announced in Harvey for Fourth Amendment claims was based on our more general holding 'that Heck applies to pending criminal charges, and that a claim, that if successful would necessarily imply the invalidity of a conviction in a pending criminal prosecution, does not accrue so long as the potential for a conviction in the pending criminal prosecution continues to exist.'. . That general holding is 'clearly irreconcilable' with Wallace's holding that 'the Heck rule for deferred accrual is called into play only when there exists a conviction or sentence that has not been ... invalidated.'. .Thus, Harvey's deferred accrual rule has been effectively overruled' and is no longer good law.")

Jordan v. Blount County, 885 F.3d 413, 415-16 (6th Cir. 2018) ("The question here is whether, as the district court held, Jordan's claim accrued when his conviction was vacated, or whether instead it accrued upon his later acquittal. . . . The closest common-law analogy to a Brady claim is one for malicious prosecution, because that claim, unlike one for false arrest, 'permits damages for confinement imposed pursuant to legal process.'. . One element of a malicious-prosecution claim 'is termination of the prior criminal proceeding in favor of the accused.'. . A Brady claim under § 1983 cannot accrue, therefore, until the criminal proceeding so terminates. Thus, the more specific question here is whether Jordan's 'criminal proceeding' terminated in 2011, when the state court of appeals vacated his conviction and remanded for further proceedings in the trial court. Our decision in King v. Harwood, 852 F.3d 568 (6th Cir. 2017), makes clear that the answer is no. . . .The defendants argue that, per our decision in D'Ambrosio v. Marino, 747 F.3d 378, 384 (6th Cir. 2014), Jordan's § 1983 claim accrued as soon as his conviction was vacated. But that reading elides the difference between the vacatur in that case and in this one. There, a federal district court vacated D'Ambrosio's conviction by means of an unconditional writ of habeas corpus, which by its terms barred the state from retrying him. . .Thus, the vacatur itself terminated the state criminal proceeding, and D'Ambrosio's claim accrued once that vacatur 'became final[.]'. . For that reason our comments about the import of any 'anticipated future conviction[,]'. . . were merely dicta. Jordan's claim therefore accrued at the same point D'Ambrosio's did: when his criminal proceeding ended. The district court's judgment is reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

D'Ambrosio v. Marino, 747 F.3d 378, 385, 386 (6th Cir. 2014) ("We see no reason not to apply Wallace's pretrial principles to the retrial context, as D'Ambrosio's position requires the same 'speculat[ion] about whether a prosecution will be brought, whether it will result in conviction, and whether the pending civil action will impugn that verdict' that was fatal to the petitioner's position in Wallace. . . Contrary to D'Ambrosio's argument, the possibility that his § 1983 claims 'might impugn an anticipated future conviction d[oes] not trigger the Heck rule for deferred accrual.'. . By a similar token, though, defendants improperly ignore the requirement that § 1983 claims like D'Ambrosio's, which imply the invalidity of a prior conviction, accrue only when the conviction 'is reversed or expunged.'. . .Application of this rule to D'Ambrosio's case is straightforward. Until the vacatur of D'Ambrosio's state conviction became final, Heck barred his § 1983 claims, which clearly implied the invalidity of his conviction. . . Crucially, a panel of this court held that D'Ambrosio's state conviction had not been vacated before the grant of the unconditional writ, which occurred—at earliest—in 2010. . . His § 1983 suit was filed in 2011. Because D'Ambrosio's civil rights claims did not accrue until his state conviction was vacated and the Heck bar was lifted, the two-year statute of limitations does not bar his current claims.")

Garza v. Burnett, 672 F.3d 1217, 1218 (10th Cir. 2012) ("Prior to 2007, this court applied the Heck bar to both extant and anticipated convictions. See Beck v. City of Muskogee Police Dep't, 195 F.3d 553, 557 (10th Cir.1999). However, the Supreme Court held in 2007 that Heck's bar and its principle of deferred accrual do not apply to anticipated convictions. Wallace v. Kato, 549 U.S. 384, 388 (2007). These shifting authorities have placed appellant Gerardo Thomas Garza in an unusual position. Garza filed a civil-rights complaint just days before the Supreme Court handed down Wallace. He contends that under pre- Wallace Tenth Circuit precedent, his complaint was timely when it was filed. But Garza concedes that his complaint is now untimely in light of Wallace. He argues that this intervening change in the legal landscape entitles him to equitable tolling under Utah law, and moves to certify the equitable tolling question to the Utah Supreme Court. . . . Garza's complaint was timely under Tenth Circuit precedent at the time of filing, but was rendered untimely by Wallace. Accordingly, the equitable tolling issue is dispositive of this appeal. Because it is unclear whether Utah would toll the statute of limitations based on an intervening change in controlling circuit precedent, we grant Garza's request to certify this issue to the Utah Supreme Court.") [See Garza v. Burnett, 547 F. App'x 908, 910 (10th Cir. 2013) (Pursuant to the Utah Supreme Court's response to the certified question, Garza is entitled to equitable tolling and the judgment of the United States District Court for the District of Utah is hereby REVERSED. The case is REMANDED for further proceedings consistent with this order and judgment and the newly stated Utah law.")]

Arroyo v. Starks, 589 F.3d 1091, 1095 (10th Cir. 2009) ("Courts disagree as to whether the Heck bar applies to pre-trial programs similar to diversion agreements. Compare, e.g., S.E. v. Grant County Bd. of Educ., 544 F.3d 633, 639 (6th Cir.2008) (holding Heck inapplicable to pre-trial diversion agreements); and Butts v. City of Bowling Green, 374 F.Supp.2d 532, 537 (W.D.Ky.2005) (same), with Gilles v. Davis, 427 F.3d 197, 211-12 (3d Cir.2005) (holding that § 1983 claims of a plaintiff who had participated in pre-trial probationary programs were barred by Heck). In our judgment, holding that the Heck bar applies to pre-trial diversions misses the mark. The Supreme Court in Wallace made clear that the Heck bar comes into play only when there is an actual conviction, not an anticipated one.").

Zarro v. Spitzer, 274 F. App'x 31, 2008 WL 1790431, at *3 (2d Cir. Apr. 18, 2008) ("The State, in its amicus brief, suggests that Heck bars any claims relating to the July 2003 charges because those charges have not yet been resolved in Plaintiff's favor. . . While the State may be correct in suggesting that Plaintiff's Complaint fails to state a claim for malicious prosecution based on the July 2003 charges because those charges have not been resolved in Plaintiff's favor, . . . Heck itself is inapplicable to those charges, as there is no extant conviction that a judgment in Plaintiff's favor could impugn [citing Wallace].")

Eidson v. State of Tennessee Dept. of Children's Services, 510 F.3d 631, 640, 641 (6th Cir. 2007) ("[I]rrespective of the difference between types of § 1983 claims asserted, the rule of Heck cannot be divorced from its post-conviction setting. This is the teaching of Wallace . Wallace simply cannot be fairly read to imply that the accrual of a § 1983 malicious-prosecution-type claim is necessarily and indefinitely delayed in a pre-conviction setting until there is some accused-favorable resolution of pending or anticipated future prosecution. The Wallace court even referred to the 'Heck-required setting aside of the extant conviction' as it explained the 'impracticality' of the urged 'bizarre extension' of Heck to the pre-conviction setting. . . The court went on to observe that '[i]f a plaintiff files a false arrest[-type § 1983] claim before he has been convicted (or files any other claim related to rulings that will likely be made in a pending or anticipated criminal trial), it is within the power of the district court, and in accord with common practice, to stay the civil action until the criminal case or the likelihood of a criminal case is ended.'. . Recognizing that a § 1983 plaintiff's right to relief could be preserved in this manner, the Wallace court deemed it unnecessary to extend the rule of Heck to the pre-conviction setting. The Wallace court thus took the same approach employed in this case by the district court, which held first, that the pendency of juvenile court proceedings did not delay the accrual of plaintiff Eidson's § 1983 cause of action; and second, that plaintiff was required to proceed with his claims within twelve months after they accrued and obtain an abstention-based stay pending resolution of the juvenile court proceedings or suffer dismissal for filing beyond the period of limitation. Plaintiff maintains this approach is not equitable. He observes that Wallace refrained from holding that the running of the statute of limitations on the § 1983 action would be equitably tolled during any abstention-based dismissal or stay of the § 1983 action. . . Hence, he argues that Wallace affords no assurance that the statute of limitations would be tolled during the pendency of an abstention-based stay. Plaintiff's protest is overstated. The Wallace court did not hold that the running of the limitation period could not be tolled; only that tolling is traditionally a matter of state law and that adoption of an 'omnibus' federal tolling rule would not be appropriate. . . The Wallace court was content to entrust the matter of tolling to abstaining district courts in the exercise of their discretion on a case-by-case basis. Yet, prerequisite to obtaining any such tolling relief, of course, is the timely filing of the § 1983 action that will prompt abstention during the pendency of related state court proceedings. Because plaintiff did not timely file his § 1983 action, he forfeited any hope of such relief. It follows that the district court did not err in refusing to recognize the Shamaeizadeh extension of the rule of Heck. Although its given reason for doing so is questionable, its decision has been subsequently vindicated by Wallace and Fox, and we are free to affirm the district court's ruling on other grounds. . . Accordingly, because we conclude that the rule of Heck does not apply in the pre-conviction setting to delay accrual of plaintiff's due process cause of action, we concur in the district court's ruling that plaintiff's § 1983 claims are time-barred.").

Fox v. DeSoto, 489 F.3d 227, 233, 234 (6th Cir. 2007) ("[T]he Supreme Court's decision in Wallace, issued during the pendency of this appeal, effectively abrogates the holding in Shamaeizadeh and clarifies that Heck has no application to the § 1983 claims in this case. . . . This court, drawing on the reasoning in Heck and acknowledging that Heck did not resolve the issue, joined other courts in extending application of Heck and its effect on the statute of limitations to certain pre-conviction circumstances. . . In no uncertain terms, however, the Court in Wallace clarified that the Heck bar has no application in the pre-conviction context. . . . Wallace clarifies the distinction between claims of malicious prosecution, such as the one addressed in Heck, and claims of false arrest and false imprisonment. As noted above, Heck held that a claim of malicious prosecution does not accrue until the underlying conviction is invalidated. . . and this holding was reaffirmed in Wallace. . . The statute of limitations for a claim for false arrest, however, 'where the arrest is followed by criminal proceedings, begins to run at the time the claimant becomes detained pursuant to legal process.' . . The Wallace Court rejected both the argument that the statute of limitations on a false arrest claim should begin only after 'an anticipated future conviction ... occurs and is set aside,'. . and that the statute of limitations on such a claim should be tolled until an anticipated future conviction is set aside. . . . Accordingly, the possibility that the plaintiff's already-accrued § 1983 claims might impugn an anticipated future conviction did not trigger the Heck rule for deferred accrual. Thus, we not only affirm the dismissal of the state law claims as time-barred, but also find that the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claims were likewise barred by the one-year statute of limitation and should have been dismissed as untimely.").

DeLeon v. City of Corpus Christi, 488 F.3d 649, 652, 656 (5th Cir. 2007) ("This appeal turns on whether a deferred adjudication in Texas is a 'sentence or conviction' for the purposes of Heck. We hold that it is. . . . We conclude that a deferred adjudication order is a conviction for the purposes of Heck's favorable termination rule. This case does not require that we decide whether a successfully completed deferred adjudication, with its more limited collateral consequences under Texas law, is also a conviction for the purposes of Heck, and we do not decide that question.' [footnotes omitted])

McClish v. Nugent, 483 F.3d 1231, 1251 & n.19 (11th Cir. 2007) ("Holmberg's § 1983 claim arose out of his arrest for allegedly interfering with the ongoing arrest of McClish by Deputies Terry and Calderone. The deputies arrested Holmberg for 'resisting arrest without violence,' see Fla. Stat. § 843.02, and the charge was eventually dismissed without prejudice pursuant to Florida's pretrial intervention program, see Fla. Stat. § 843.02. The district court determined that Heck barred Holmberg from bringing a § 1983 claim because of his participation in PTI. Although we have never determined that participation in PTI barred a subsequent § 1983 claim, the district court cited to Second, Third, and Fifth Circuit cases holding that a defendant's participation in PTI barred subsequent § 1983 claims. Dist. Ct. Order at 19- 20 (citing Gilles v. Davis, 427 F.3d 197 (3d Cir.2005); Taylor v. Gregg, 36 F.3d 453 (5th Cir.1994); Roesch v. Otarola, 980 F.2d 850 (2d Cir.1992)). The district court then concluded that 'Holmberg's participation in PTI, which resulted in a dismissal of the charge of resisting arrest without violence, is not a termination in his favor, and therefore, he is barred from bringing a § 1983 claim for false arrest.' We disagree. Heck is inapposite. The issue is not, as the district court saw it, whether Holmberg's participation in PTI amounted to a favorable termination on the merits. Instead, the question is an antecedent one − whether Heck applies at all since Holmberg was never convicted of any crime. The primary category of cases barred by Heck − suits seeking damages for an allegedly unconstitutional conviction or imprisonment − is plainly inapplicable. Instead, the district court based its Heck ruling on the second, indirect category of cases barred by Heck: suits to recover damages 'for other harm caused by actions whose unlawfulness would render a conviction or sentence invalid.' . . . The problem with using this second Heck category to bar Holmberg's § 1983 suit is definitional − to prevail in his § 1983 suit, Holmberg would not have to 'negate an element of the offense of which he has been convicted,' because he was never convicted of any offense. [citing Heck and Wallace] . . . . Even if we were to assume that Heck somehow applies to this case, Holmberg correctly cites to Abusaid v. Hillsborough County Board of County Commissioners, 405 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir.2005), for the proposition that the Supreme Court has apparently receded from the idea that Heck's favorable-termination requirement also applies to non-incarcerated individuals. . . . The logic of our reasoning in Abusaid, although dicta, is clear: If Heck only bars § 1983 claims when the alternative remedy of habeas corpus is available, then Heck has no application to Holmberg's claim. Holmberg was never in custody at all, and the remedy of habeas corpus is not currently available to him.").

Whitehurst v. Harris, No. 6:14-CV-01602-LSC, 2015 WL 71780, at *9 (N.D. Ala. Jan. 6, 2015) ("While Heck is concerned with state-federal comity in the context of § 1983 claims, it does not in itself dictate that courts stay a third party's § 1983 suit whenever the defendant still faces the prospect of criminal proceedings in state court.")

Wharton v. County of Nassau, No. 07-CV-2137(RRM)(ETB), 2010 WL 3749077, at *4 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 20, 2010) ("For the same reasons announced in Hargroves, Plaintiffs in this case are entitled to equitable tolling on their § 1983 false arrest claim. Plaintiffs, through no fault of their own, relied on then-authoritative Second Circuit precedent to their detriment, and strict application of Wallace would effectively deprive Plaintiffs of their cause of action. See Kucharski v. Leveille, 526 F.Supp.2d 768 (E.D.Mich.2007) (equitably tolling plaintiffs' false arrest claim in light of the change in law occasioned by Wallace). Moreover, Plaintiffs have acted with reasonable diligence to pursue their claims. Plaintiffs filed suit within thirteen months of obtaining a favorable termination, and while they had approximately ten months after Wharton's acquittal where the claim would have been timely even under Wallace, they could no better predict the upcoming change in law than the Hargroves plaintiffs. Finally, although Plaintiffs waited approximately three months after the Wallace decision to file their claim, this short delay is insufficient to diminish the extraordinary circumstance for which equitable tolling now applies. Accordingly, this Court finds that Plaintiffs' § 1983 false arrest claim is timely.")

Wilson v. Maxwell , No. 08-4140 (FLW), 2008 WL 4056364, at *5 (D.N.J. Aug. 28, 2008) ("Based on the Supreme Court's language in Wallace, it would appear that Wallace effectively supersedes the Third Circuit's reasoning in Gibson . . . and that Heck is inapplicable here . . . and that Smith v. Holtz likewise is abrogated by Wallace . . . Thus, under Wallace, any Fourth Amendment claim must be brought and, in all likelihood, stayed pending resolution of the underlying charges. . . In the event of a conviction on the underlying charges, the stay may extend for years while post-conviction relief is sought. . . This is not an ideal situation because of the potential to clog the court's docket with unresolvable cases.").

Kamar v. Krolczyk, No. 1:07-CV-0340 AWI TAG, 2008 WL 2880414, at *6 (E.D. Cal. July 22, 2008) ("The court finds that the recent Supreme Court case of Wallace v. Kato, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 1091, 166 L.Ed.2d 973 (2007), has effectively overruled Harvey. In Wallace , the plaintiff contended that any civil rights action that would impugn his anticipated future conviction could not be brought until that conviction occurs and is set aside. . . The Supreme Court refused to embrace what the Supreme Court entitled a 'bizarre extension of Heck.'. . In Wallace , the Supreme Court overruled those circuits that had applied the Heck to bar Section 1983 claims when criminal charges were only pending.")

Kennedy v. City of Villa Hills, No. 07-122-DLB, 2008 WL 650341, at *5, *6 (E.D.Ky. Mar. 6, 2008) ("Wallace still stands for the principle that courts should refrain from considering alleged § 1983 claims where there are pending or potential state criminal proceedings and resolution of the constitutional tort claims would impugn the integrity of a possible future criminal conviction. The difference, post-Wallace versus pre-Wallace , is that now the proper procedure is to stay the action rather than dismiss the claims without prejudice pursuant to Heck, which is what this Court did in Kennedy's prior action. In light of the Supreme Court's decision in Wallace, this Court's previous dismissal of Plaintiff's Complaint without prejudice pursuant to Heck and Shamaeizadeh may. . .now present statute of limitations problems for Plaintiff that this Court in its prior order stated would not occur. Yet, there is a critical difference between the case now before this Court and the decisions of Wallace and Fox. In Wallace and Fox, the plaintiffs did not file their civil complaint in the first instance until after their criminal charges had been dismissed or overturned. Plaintiff here did file his initial Complaint while his disorderly conduct charge was still pending. The Court is not inclined to unilaterally punish Kennedy for circumstances not of his own making. The Court ordered Kennedy's claims dismissed as premature based on then binding precedent. Plaintiff relied upon the Court's directive of when his claims would accrue, and that reliance was not misplaced. Under these circumstances, application of equitable principles is appropriate and has been similarly recognized where a party relied to its detriment upon a court's order. . . To hold otherwise would unfairly prejudice the Plaintiff in this case. . . Moreover, the Wallace decision also reveals that the Supreme Court considered the possibility of a factual situation similar to that before this Court, noting the potential harm to a plaintiff that could result. [citing footnote 4 of Wallace] Holding that Plaintiff's claims herein are now time-barred post- Wallace by the applicable statutes of limitation would result in Heck ultimately producing immunity for the Defendants, a scenario the Supreme Court deemed unacceptable. At least a few lower courts have also been faced with similar quagmires. In Kucharski v. Leveille, 526 F.Supp.2d 768 (E.D.Mich.2007) the court highlighted this note in Wallace as support for its conclusion that plaintiff's claims should not be time-barred despite being filed outside the statute of limitations. . . The Kucharski court also looked to equitable tolling in saving plaintiff's claims from a strict application of Wallace . On the other hand, in Sandles v. U.S. Marshal's Service, No. 04- 72426, 2007 WL 4374080 (E.D.Mich. Oct. 18, 2007) (unpublished decision), the court declined to apply Wallace's footnote 4 exception because the plaintiff had waited ten months after his criminal conviction was reversed before filing his claims. More importantly, these two cases signify Wallace considered the possibility that strict application of its holding might produce § 1983 immunity when civil claims with associated criminal proceedings were filed and then dismissed pursuant to Heck, 'a result surely not intended.' Wallace , 127 S.Ct. at 1099 n. 4. . . . Plaintiff here diligently pursued his rights as evidenced by his first filing. Given the Court's Memorandum Order dismissing his claims and instructing him to refile upon resolution of the criminal proceedings, there was no reason for him to know of any other filing requirement, and there is no true prejudice to Defendants as previously noted herein. Accordingly, for these and all of the other reasons previously discussed herein, the Court finds that Plaintiff's second filing is deemed timely and assertion of his federal claims is not otherwise time-barred.").

McCray v. City of New York, 2007 WL 4352748, at *14 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 11, 2007) ("Plaintiffs argue that, because they have alleged fraudulent concealment and fabrication of evidence, they are entitled to the equitable tolling of their false arrest and imprisonment claims. . . The doctrine of equitable tolling is to be applied only upon a showing that 'rare and exceptional circumstances' prevented a party from timely asserting his or her claim, and that the party, 'acted with reasonable diligence throughout the period he sought to toll.' . . 'A plaintiff seeking equitable tolling of a limitations period must demonstrate that defendants engaged in a fraud which precluded him from discovering the harms he suffered or the information he needed to file a complaint.'. . In this case, while Plaintiffs have alleged that the Defendants engaged in fraudulent concealment, they have not shown that this fraud precluded them from discovering that they were allegedly falsely arrested and falsely imprisoned. Plaintiffs have not explained why they were unable to assert their federal and state false arrest and imprisonment causes of action when these claims originally accrued. As a result, the Court can find no basis to toll the statute of limitations. Moreover, with respect to § 1983 false arrest actions, accrual governed by the Heck delayed accrual rule is limited by Wallace v. Kato, 127 S.Ct. 1091 (2007). In Wallace, the Supreme Court ruled that, 'the statute of limitations upon a § 1983 claim seeking damages for a false arrest in violation of the Fourth Amendment, where the arrest is followed by criminal proceedings, begins to run at the time the claimant becomes detained pursuant to legal process.'. . Here, Plaintiffs claim that their convictions could not have been obtained in the absence of their inculpatory statements, which they allege were products of their false arrest and imprisonment. Wallace settles that Plaintiffs' federal claims for false arrest and imprisonment accrued against Defendants no later than April 1989, when Plaintiffs were arraigned on felony complaints for the April 19, 1989 crimes. . . Plaintiffs filed their federal claims in this action in 2003. Because the time limits on their false arrest and false imprisonment claim accordingly expired three years later, in April 1992, those claims are clearly time-barred and are accordingly DISMISSED WITH PREJUDICE.") Kucharski v. Leveille, 526 F.Supp.2d 768, 770-75 (E.D.Mich. 2007) ("In its last order, the Court held that the plaintiffs' complaint was filed out of time because the cause of action accrued at the time of the illegal seizure, not when the state court convictions were overturned. Although the later conclusion was ordained by a well-established line of Sixth Circuit precedent, . . . that precedent was overturned by the Supreme Court in Wallace. The Court in Wallace held that a false arrest claim accrues when the illegal detention ends − in Wallace's case, when the arrested suspect was taken before a judicial officer. A section 1983 case must be filed, the Court held, within the period of limitations measured from that date. With respect to the complication potentially caused by Heck, the Court noted that a district court could 'stay the civil action until the criminal case or the likelihood of a criminal case is ended.'. . Then, '[i]f the plaintiff is ultimately convicted, and if the stayed civil suit would impugn that conviction, Heck would require dismissal; otherwise, the civil action will proceed, absent some other bar to suit.'. . Because the Wallace Court did not allow equitable tolling to save the plaintiff's claim in that case, this Court did not consider the possibility in the present matter. However, just as limitations periods are taken from state law, so are the rules regarding equitable tolling. . . . Michigan courts . . .recognize the concept of equitable tolling to relieve a party of the effect of a statute of limitations in certain circumstances. For instance, the Michigan Supreme Court has allowed tolling, thereby allowing a case to proceed, when the plaintiff's failure to comply with the statute is a result of the confusing state of the law. . . . Based on the foregoing state court precedents, this Court finds that Michigan recognizes the doctrine of equitable tolling, and that a plaintiff may obtain relief from a statute of limitations thereunder if the delay in filing 'is the product of an understandable confusion about the legal nature of her claim,'. . . that confusion is created by the courts themselves, . . . and the delay does not result simply from the plaintiff's lack of diligence . . . . Moreover, where a specific statute controlling the period of limitation is found to abrogate the common law, courts must resort to the statutory tolling rules. The Court believes that this case qualifies under Michigan law for the application of equitable tolling. First, there is confusion in the jurisprudence that is not clarified by any statutory pronouncement. The confusion results not from the length of the applicable statute of limitations, but from a determination when the statute starts to run. That confusion has been created by the courts themselves, as evidenced by Wallace's overruling of this Circuit's precedents. Wallace altered the understanding of Heck v. Humphrey's effect on the time a section 1983 claim for unlawful arrest accrues. . . . Although Heck involved a plaintiff who already had been convicted in state court, most if not all circuits concluded that Heck barred a section 1983 claim by a plaintiff with criminal charges pending against him if success in the 1983 suit would be inconsistent with a future conviction. . . . There can be no question that the plaintiffs relied on Sixth Circuit precedent to their prejudice in this case. The untimeliness of the plaintiffs' complaint results from an understandable confusion about the state of the law as to when their claim accrued. That confusion was created by the courts themselves. The delay did not result from the plaintiffs' failure to diligently pursue the claim. In fact, the plaintiffs filed their complaint less than one year after their convictions were reversed. Moreover, strict application of Wallace to this case effectively deprives the plaintiffs of their cause of action. If the plaintiffs had filed their case immediately after the search on May 4, 2001, Sixth Circuit precedent would have required dismissal of the case as barred by Heck. Once the law changed, the plaintiffs' convictions having been reversed on September 30, 2004, the plaintiffs would be barred by the statute of limitations under Wallace. This is 'a result surely not intended.'. . Rather, this is the unusual case that fits neatly within the doctrine of equitable tolling. The Court concludes that Michigan law tolled the three-year statute of limitations while the plaintiffs' convictions were still viable, and filing this case within three years of the reversal of those convictions does not result in a statute of limitations bar.").

Pethtel v. Washington County Sheriff's Office, 2007 WL 2359765, at 7 -10 (S.D.Ohio, Aug. 16, 2007) ("The holding in Shamaeizadeh has been severely undermined by the Supreme Court's recent decision in Wallace v. Kato . . . . In Wallace, the Court held that the statute of limitations on a § 1983 claim of false arrest accrues on the date the plaintiff appears before a magistrate and is arraigned on the charges filed against him. . .The Court also held that Heck's deferred accrual rule does not apply when the cause of action accrues before a criminal conviction has taken place. . .Because . . . Plaintiff's § 1983 and Bivens claims accrued prior to the date he pleaded no contest to the reduced charge of disorderly conduct, the Heck bar does not apply. Moreover, because Plaintiff's sentence consisted of a fine rather than imprisonment, a habeas remedy was never available to him. As the Sixth Circuit has noted, five justices of the Supreme Court are of the belief that the Heck bar, requiring a plaintiff to have his sentence or conviction invalidated before filing a § 1983 suit, does not apply when the plaintiff has not been sentenced to a term of imprisonment.

. . . For all of these reasons, the Court rejects Defendants' argument that Plaintiff's claims are barred by Heck.' Court goes on to find all claims barred by statute of limitations after Wallace)

Curry v. Hennessey, 2007 WL 1394531, at *2 (N.D. Cal. May 10, 2007) ("After Wallace, the Ninth Circuit's holding that Heck applies to cases directed to pending criminal charges is limited to the situation where there is an extant conviction at the time the federal case is filed. In cases such as this one, where there is no extant conviction, it is appropriate to follow the Supreme Court's suggestion and stay the case.")

Lopez v. Unknown Galveston Police Officer #1, No. G-06-0371, 2007 WL 1108736, at * 5 (S.D. Tex. Apr. 11, 2007) ("Despite Fifth Circuit decisions that previously held otherwise, see Price, 431 F.3d at 892, and Brandley, 64 F.3d at 196, the Supreme Court's decision in Wallace establishes that regardless of the potential effect on pending or future criminal proceedings, a plaintiff must file a § 1983 action within the relevant limitations period.")

Jackim v. City of Brooklyn, No. 1:05 cv 1678, 2007 WL 893868, at *26, *27 & n.41 (N.D. Ohio Mar. 22, 2007) ("Until February 21, 2007 the law was fairly settled, in this Circuit and most others, that application of the principle in Heck required a dismissal of all claims subject to the bar arising therefrom. . . . On February 21, 2007 the Supreme Court altered the landscape surrounding the interplay between § 1983 claims and Heck. In Wallace, . . .in the context of determining when the statute of limitations for a § 1983 claim for false arrest begins to run, the Supreme Court concluded that the principle of Heck technically only applies to 'extant' convictions − i.e., those which have been entered and have not been set aside. Thus, the Court concluded that Heck does not prevent an action from being instituted under § 1983 where a conviction is no more than a future possibility. . . . Thus, while the Supreme Court does not seem to agree with the Sixth Circuit that it is Heck that bars consideration of § 1983 claims in the face of ongoing state criminal proceedings, it does make clear that it does not contemplate that such civil proceedings will proceed in those circumstances. Rather, the Supreme Court indicated that a stay of civil proceedings should be imposed pending a resolution of pending criminal charges, and, presumably, any appeals or habeas corpus proceedings attendant thereto. Indeed, the majority's decision made it clear that a stay of proceedings is likely the only just way to deal with potentially conviction − impugning § 1983 claims when it went on to find that Heck never tolls the statute of limitations on such § 1983 claims − whether they be mere future possibilities, or even extant convictions still subject to attack. Thus, whether this Court is bound by existing Sixth Circuit precedent which applies Heck to future convictions (because the Supreme Court did not overturn any specific Circuit decision so holding) or is correct in concluding that the Wallace decision effectively overrules that authority by its express discussions of Heck, the result is the same − Bruce Jackim's remaining claims may not proceed while the criminal charges are still pending. As to those remaining claims, all further proceedings in this matter are stayed pending further order of this Court. . . . The inefficiency of this result is not lost on the Court. In this era where district courts are judged, in substantial measure, by how efficiently they resolve or dispose of cases on their docket, an order which could potentially stall a case (or many such cases) for years to come makes little practical sense.").

Watts v. Epps, 475 F.Supp.2d 1367, 1369 (N.D. Ga. 2007) ("Despite several lower court decisions that have previously held otherwise, [citing cases from circuits], the Supreme Court's decision in Wallace makes clear that tolling under Heck does not apply in the pre-conviction context. . . Regardless of its potential effect on pending or future criminal proceedings, a plaintiff must file a § 1983 action within the relevant limitations period. . . . Wallace teaches that it is the issuance of a stay − and not the tolling of an action − that is the appropriate prophylactic device to prevent federal courts from undercutting state criminal convictions by preordaining in § 1983 actions the constitutionality of arrests or seizures.")

D. Fabrication-of-Evidence Claims: McDonough v. Smith

McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149, 2154-61 & n.10 (2019) ("Relying in part on this allegedly fabricated evidence, Smith secured a grand jury indictment against McDonough. McDonough was arrested, arraigned, and released (with restrictions on his travel) pending trial. Smith brought the case to trial a year later, in January 2012. He again presented the allegedly fabricated testimony during this trial, which lasted more than a month and ended in a mistrial. Smith then reprosecuted McDonough. The second trial also lasted over a month, and again, Smith elicited allegedly fabricated testimony. The second trial ended with McDonough's acquittal on all charges on December 21, 2012. On December 18, 2015, just under three years after his acquittal, McDonough sued Smith and other defendants under § 1983 in the U. S. District Court for the Northern District of New York. Against Smith, McDonough asserted two different constitutional claims: one for fabrication of evidence, and one for malicious prosecution without probable cause. The District Court dismissed the malicious prosecution claim as barred by prosecutorial immunity, though timely. It dismissed the fabricated-evidence claim, however, as untimely. McDonough appealed to the U. S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, which affirmed. . . .The statute of limitations for a fabricated-evidence claim like McDonough's does not begin to run until the criminal proceedings against the defendant (i.e., the § 1983 plaintiff) have terminated in his favor. This conclusion follows both from the rule for the most natural common-law analogy (the tort of malicious prosecution) and from the practical considerations that have previously led this Court to defer accrual of claims that would otherwise constitute an untenable collateral attack on a criminal judgment. . . . Although courts look to state law for the length of the limitations period, the time at which a § 1983 claim accrues 'is a question of federal law,' 'conforming in general to common-law tort principles.' Wallace v. Kato, 549 U. S. 384, 388 (2007). That time is presumptively 'when the plaintiff has "a complete and present cause of action,"'. . . though the answer is not always so simple. . . Where, for example, a particular claim may not realistically be brought while a violation is ongoing, such a claim may accrue at a later date. . . . Though McDonough's complaint does not ground his fabricated-evidence claim in a particular constitutional provision, the Second Circuit treated his claim as arising under the Due Process Clause. . . McDonough's claim, this theory goes, seeks to vindicate a '"right not to be deprived of liberty as a result of the fabrication of evidence by a government officer."'. . We assume without deciding that the Second Circuit's articulations of the right at issue and its contours are sound, having not granted certiorari to resolve those separate questions. . . . McDonough is correct that malicious prosecution is the most analogous common-law tort here. . . . We follow the analogy where it leads: McDonough could not bring his fabricated-evidence claim under § 1983 prior to favorable termination of his prosecution. As Heck explains, malicious prosecution's favorable-termination requirement is rooted in pragmatic concerns with avoiding parallel criminal and civil litigation over the same subject matter and the related possibility of conflicting civil and criminal judgments. . . The requirement likewise avoids allowing collateral attacks on criminal judgments through civil litigation. . . These concerns track 'similar concerns for finality and consistency' that have motivated this Court to refrain from multiplying avenues for collateral attack on criminal judgments through civil tort vehicles such as § 1983. . . . Because a civil claim such as McDonough's, asserting that fabricated evidence was used to pursue a criminal judgment, implicates the same concerns, it makes sense to adopt the same rule. . . . This case differs from Heck because the plaintiff in Heck had been convicted, while McDonough was acquitted. Although some claims do fall outside Heck's ambit when a conviction is merely 'anticipated,' Wallace, 549 U. S., at 393, however, McDonough's claims are not of that kind[.]. . As articulated by the Court of Appeals, his claims challenge the validity of the criminal proceedings against him in essentially the same manner as the plaintiff in Heck challenged the validity of his conviction. And the pragmatic considerations discussed in Heck apply generally to civil suits within the domain of habeas corpus, not only to those that challenge convictions. . . The principles and reasoning of Heck thus point toward a corollary result here: There is not ' "a complete and present cause of action,"'. . . to bring a fabricated-evidence challenge to criminal proceedings while those criminal proceedings are ongoing. Only once the criminal proceeding has ended in the defendant's favor, or a resulting conviction has been invalidated within the meaning of Heck, . . . will the statute of limitations begin to run. . . . Smith suggests that stays and ad hoc abstention are sufficient to avoid the problems of two-track litigation. Such workarounds are indeed available when claims falling outside Heck's scope nevertheless are initiated while a state criminal proceeding is pending, . . .but Smith's solution is poorly suited to the type of claim at issue here. When, as here, a plaintiff's claim 'necessarily' questions the validity of a state proceeding, . . . there is no reason to put the onus to safeguard comity on district courts exercising case-by-case discretion—particularly at the foreseeable expense of potentially prejudicing litigants and cluttering dockets with dormant, unripe cases. . . The accrual rule we adopt today, by contrast, respects the autonomy of state courts and avoids these costs to litigants and federal courts. In deferring rather than inviting such suits, we adhere to familiar principles. The proper approach in our federal system generally is for a criminal defendant who believes that the criminal proceedings against him rest on knowingly fabricated evidence to defend himself at trial and, if necessary, then to attack any resulting conviction through collateral review proceedings. McDonough therefore had a complete and present cause of action for the loss of his liberty only once the criminal proceedings against him terminated in his favor. . . . Smith is correct that Heck concerned a plaintiff serving a sentence for a still-valid conviction and that Wallace distinguished Heck on that basis, but Wallace did not displace the principles in Heck that resolve this case. A false-arrest claim, Wallace explained, has a life independent of an ongoing trial or putative future conviction—it attacks the arrest only to the extent it was without legal process, even if legal process later commences. . . That feature made the claim analogous to common-law false imprisonment. . . By contrast, a claim like McDonough's centers on evidence used to secure an indictment and at a criminal trial, so it does not require 'speculat[ion] about whether a prosecution will be brought.'. . It directly challenges—and thus necessarily threatens to impugn—the prosecution itself. . . Second, Smith notes (1) that a fabricated-evidence claim in the Second Circuit (unlike a malicious prosecution claim) can exist even if there is probable cause and (2) that McDonough was acquitted. In other words, McDonough theoretically could have been prosecuted without the fabricated evidence, and he was not convicted even with it. Because a violation thus could exist no matter its effect on the outcome, Smith reasons, 'the date on which that outcome occurred is irrelevant.'. . Smith is correct in one sense. One could imagine a fabricated-evidence claim that does not allege that the violation's consequence was a liberty deprivation occasioned by the criminal proceedings themselves. . . To be sure, the argument for adopting a favorable-termination requirement would be weaker in that context. That is not, however, the nature of McDonough's claim. As already explained, McDonough's claim remains most analogous to a claim of common-law malicious prosecution, even if the two are not identical. . . Heck explains why favorable termination is both relevant and required for a claim analogous to malicious prosecution that would impugn a conviction, and that rationale extends to an ongoing prosecution as well: The alternative would impermissibly risk parallel litigation and conflicting judgments. . . If the date of the favorable termination was relevant in Heck, it is relevant here. It does not change the result, meanwhile, that McDonough suffered harm prior to his acquittal. The Court has never suggested that the date on which a constitutional injury first occurs is the only date from which a limitations period may run. . . To the contrary, the injury caused by a classic malicious prosecution likewise first occurs as soon as legal process is brought to bear on a defendant, yet favorable termination remains the accrual date. . . Third and finally, Smith argues that the advantages of his rule outweigh its disadvantages as a matter of policy. In his view, the Second Circuit's approach would provide more predictable guidance, while the favorable-termination approach fosters perverse incentives for prosecutors (who may become reluctant to offer favorable resolutions) and risks foreclosing meritorious claims (for example, where an outcome is not clearly 'favorable'). These arguments are unconvincing. We agree that clear accrual rules are valuable but fail to see how assessing when proceedings terminated favorably will be, on balance, more burdensome than assessing when a criminal defendant 'learned that the evidence was false and was used against him' and deprived him of liberty as a result. . . And while the risk of foreclosing certain claims and the potential incentive effects that Smith identifies could be valid considerations in other contexts,[10] [fnote 10: Because McDonough's acquittal was unquestionably a favorable termination, we have no occasion to address the broader range of ways a criminal prosecution (as opposed to a conviction) might end favorably to the accused. . . To the extent Smith argues that the law in this area should take account of prosecutors' broad discretion over such matters as the terms on which pleas will be offered or whether charges will be dropped, those arguments more properly bear on the question whether a given resolution should be understood as favorable or not. Such considerations might call for a context-specific and more capacious understanding of what constitutes 'favorable' termination for purposes of a § 1983 false-evidence claim, but that is not the question before us.] they do not overcome the greater danger that plaintiffs will be deterred under Smith's theory from suing for redress of egregious misconduct, . . . nor do they override the guidance of the common law and precedent. . . .The statute of limitations for McDonough's § 1983 claim alleging that he was prosecuted using fabricated evidence began to run when the criminal proceedings against him terminated in his favor—that is, when he was acquitted at the end of his second trial. The judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is therefore reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149, 2161-62 (2019) (Thomas, J., with whom Kagan, J. and Gorsuch, J. join, dissenting) ("We granted certiorari to decide when 'the statute of limitations for a Section 1983 claim based on fabrication of evidence in criminal proceedings begins to run.'. . McDonough, however, declined to take a definitive position on the 'threshold inquiry in a [42 U. S. C.] § 1983 suit': ' "identify[ing] the specific constitutional right" at issue.'. . Because it is only '[a]fter pinpointing that right' that courts can proceed to 'determine the elements of, and rules associated with, an action seeking damages for its violation,'. . . we should have dismissed this case as improvidently granted. McDonough's failure to specify which constitutional right the respondent allegedly violated profoundly complicates our inquiry. McDonough argues that malicious prosecution is the common-law tort most analogous to his fabrication-of-evidence claim. But without ' "identify[ing] the specific constitutional right" at issue,' we cannot adhere to the contours of that right when 'applying, selecting among, or adjusting common-law approaches.'. . McDonough also contends that his suit is timely because he suffered a continuing constitutional violation, but this argument is similarly difficult to evaluate without identifying precisely what that violation was. Moreover, because the constitutional basis for McDonough's claim is unclear, we are unable to confirm that he has a constitutional claim at all. In my view, it would be both logical and prudent to address that antecedent question before addressing the statute of limitations for that claim. McDonough also urges us to resolve the question presented by extending Preiser v. Rodriguez, 411 U. S. 475 (1973), and Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U. S. 477 (1994). But the analysis under both cases depends on what facts a § 1983 plaintiff would need to prove to prevail on his claim. . . And McDonough declines to take a position on that issue as well. . . Further complicating this case, McDonough raised a malicious-prosecution claim alongside his fabrication-of-evidence claim. The District Court dismissed that claim on grounds of absolute immunity. McDonough has not fully explained the difference between that claim and his fabrication claim, which he insists is both analogous to the common-law tort of malicious prosecution and distinct from his dismissed malicious-prosecution claim. . . Additionally, it appears that McDonough's fabrication claim could face dismissal on absolute-immunity grounds on remand. . . The Court, while recognizing that it is critical to ascertain the basis for a § 1983 claim when deciding how to 'handl[e]' it, . . . attempts to evade these issues by 'assum[ing] without deciding that the Second Circuit's articulations of the right at issue and its contours are sound.' . . But because the parties have not accepted the Second Circuit's view that the claim sounds in procedural due process, . . . that claim as 'articulated by the Court of Appeals' might be different from the claim McDonough actually brought. . . The better course would be to dismiss this case as improvidently granted and await a case in which the threshold question of the basis of a 'fabrication-of-evidence' claim is cleanly presented. Moreover, even if the Second Circuit were correct that McDonough asserts a violation of the Due Process Clause, it would be preferable for the Court to determine the claim's elements before deciding its statute of limitations. . . McDonough asks the Court to bypass the antecedent question of the nature and elements of his claim and first determine its statute of limitations. We should have declined the invitation and dismissed the writ of certiorari as improvidently granted. I therefore respectfully dissent.").

Post-McDonough Cases

First Circuit

Jordan v. Town of Waldoboro, 943 F.3d 532, 545-46 (1st Cir. 2019) ("Jordan argues that the magistrate erred in granting summary judgment for the defendants on his federal constitutional claims for malicious prosecution. The parties agree that to make out a claim for malicious prosecution, Jordan must show that 'the defendant (1) caused (2) a seizure of the plaintiff pursuant to legal process unsupported by probable cause, and (3) criminal proceedings terminated in plaintiff's favor.'. . The district court held that -- even assuming Jordan could meet the first two requirements -- he could not show that the criminal proceedings terminated in his favor, and it therefore concluded that summary judgment was appropriate. It was recently a live question in our circuit whether post-Hernandez-Cuevas Supreme Court precedent rendered the favorable termination element 'an anachronism.'. . But the Supreme Court arguably resolved this question when it reiterated that a plaintiff cannot bring a section 1983 fabricated-evidence claim that is analogous to the common-law tort of malicious prosecution 'prior to favorable termination of [the] prosecution.' McDonough v. Smith, —— U.S. ——, 139 S. Ct. 2149, 2156, 204 L.Ed.2d 506 (2019). And in any event, Jordan's brief to this court accepts the Hernandez-Cuevas elements, and Jordan has therefore waived any argument that he need not satisfy the favorable termination element of a malicious prosecution claim. . . So, we face the question of whether the state criminal proceedings against Jordan terminated in Jordan's favor. . . Jordan concedes that, to satisfy the favorable termination element, a plaintiff must show that the prosecution was terminated in such a way as to imply the plaintiff's innocence. . . The district attorney dismissed the criminal proceedings against Jordan because '[t]he victim and key witness in the case for the State, Scott Jordan[,] Sr[.], ha[d] died.' . . . Jordan's criminal case was dismissed because the death of the key witness made the prosecution impracticable. Therefore, the dismissal was not sufficiently favorable to the accused, and Jordan cannot satisfy the favorable termination element under Hernandez-Cuevas[.]")

Jordan v. Town of Waldoboro, 943 F.3d 532, 550-55 (1st Cir. 2019) (Barron, J., concurring) ("Scott Jordan, Jr. brings a pair of claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for damages that target the pretrial criminal detention that he allegedly endured in violation of the Fourth Amendment of the federal Constitution. He styles his first such § 1983 claim, which targets the pretrial detention that followed his initial warrantless arrest, as one for 'false arrest.' He styles his second such § 1983 claim, which targets the pretrial detention that, it appears, followed a criminal complaint and summons, as one for 'malicious prosecution.' Without assessing the relative strength of the underlying alleged Fourth Amendment violations, we hold that this 'false arrest' § 1983 claim may proceed but that this 'malicious prosecution' § 1983 claim may not. The question that prompts this concurrence thus arises: how can our different treatment of these two § 1983 claims be justified? Our answer relies on Jordan's concession that a 'favorable termination' requirement applies to this 'malicious prosecution' § 1983 claim but not to this 'false arrest' § 1983 claim. . . Because the criminal proceedings ended upon the alleged victim's death before the criminal trial and not after, say, an acquittal, Jordan cannot satisfy that requirement. . . I thus join our opinion in full. I write separately, however, to register my doubt that the 'favorable termination' requirement applies to a § 1983 claim that targets a pretrial criminal seizure simply because it is made pursuant to an arrest warrant, as some of the precedent that Jordan cites in support of his concession appears to indicate. . . Even an arrest pursuant to a warrant violates the Fourth Amendment if law enforcement secures it by tricking the magistrate into finding probable cause. . . I am thus not convinced that a plaintiff must show that any follow-on criminal proceedings ended in his favor when he seeks damages under § 1983 for a seizure pursuant to an arrest warrant. Or, at least, I am not convinced that a plaintiff should have to make that showing even when the challenged seizure occurs so early in the criminal case that it precedes a grand jury handing up an indictment or a prosecutor filing a criminal information. . . For, as our treatment of Jordan's 'false arrest' § 1983 claim demonstrates, a plaintiff need not make that showing when he seeks damages for the harm caused by a similarly early-stage warrantless seizure. . . . Jordan's 'false arrest' § 1983 claim borrows its elements from the common-law tort of false arrest, which permits recovery for an unlawful seizure without legal process and which does not impose the 'favorable termination' requirement. . . . Because both the § 1983 and common-law types of 'false arrest' claims target seizures that precede any criminal process, moreover, it makes sense that no 'favorable termination' requirement applies. Neither the seizure's lawfulness nor the harm that it inflicts turns on how any follow-on criminal proceedings end. There is, however, another type of Fourth Amendment-based § 1983 claim that also takes aim at a seizure that occurs early in a criminal case and thus before even, say, a grand jury has handed up an indictment or a prosecutor has filed a criminal information. . . But, this type of Fourth Amendment-based § 1983 claim targets a seizure that is made pursuant to at least some legal process, as it targets a seizure that is made pursuant to an arrest warrant. Thus, in accord with how plaintiffs often style such § 1983 claims, the common-law tort of malicious prosecution, which is subject to a 'favorable termination' requirement, is often thought to supply the proper common-law analog for this type of § 1983 claim, as our precedent has also indicated. . . But, although this type of § 1983 claim, like the claim for the common-law tort of malicious prosecution, seeks recovery for a seizure pursuant to legal process, the two types of claims differ in important ways. A claim for the common-law tort of malicious prosecution focuses on whether 'criminal proceeding[s]' have been initiated or continued with malice and without probable cause. . . . [T]he initiation of the criminal process -- and the stigma inherent in its initiation -- is the source of the injury for the common-law tort of malicious prosecution. Thus, such a claim for that tort 'always involves defamation' while 'detention or confinement is no part of the issue,'. . . and 'any damages recoverable' must be based 'on the wrongful use of judicial process rather than detention itself[.]'. . The source of the injury for a Fourth Amendment-based § 1983 claim that seeks recompense for a seizure pursuant to legal process, however, is the detention itself, not the legal process used to effect it. . . Thus, per Congress's instruction in 42 U.S.C. § 1988, we likely must look beyond the common-law tort of malicious prosecution to determine this type of § 1983 claim's requirements. . . Manuel also supports our doing so. The plaintiff contended there that his pretrial detention violated the Fourth Amendment because the magistrate's finding of probable cause relied on evidence that law enforcement authorities had fabricated. . . Manuel permitted that Fourth Amendment-based § 1983 claim, even though the plaintiff had styled it as one for 'malicious prosecution,' to proceed, without referring to the § 1983 claim at issue as one for 'malicious prosecution.'. . . Manuel ultimately left open whether a 'favorable termination' requirement applied to the claim there at issue, . . . and, prior to Manuel, we did state that the 'favorable termination' requirement applied to such a claim, see Hernandez-Cuevas, 723 F.3d at 99 n.8. But, Hernandez-Cuevas declined to borrow the requirements of the common-law tort of malicious prosecution wholesale in defining the requirements for that Fourth Amendment-based § 1983 claim, even though it involved a seizure made pursuant to an arrest warrant. . . And, after Manuel, we suggested that the 'favorable termination' might not apply to such a Fourth Amendment-based § 1983 claim, notwithstanding that it seeks recompense for a seizure made pursuant to legal process. See Pagán-González, 919 F.3d at 602; id. at 605-11 (Barron, J., concurring) (discussing the possible need for adjustment of the probable-cause and favorable-termination elements). . . .But, while all these signs point away from applying the 'favorable termination' requirement to this type of Fourth Amendment-based § 1983 claim for damages from a seizure pursuant to an arrest warrant, there is one important sign that arguably does not. In McDonough, the Supreme Court recently held that the 'favorable termination' requirement did apply to the 'malicious prosecution' § 1983 claim at issue there, even though the plaintiff sought damages, in part, for restraints on his liberty that he attributed to his pretrial seizure. . . Thus, I must address whether McDonough calls for a different analysis than the one that, in Pagán-González, I suggested would be proper. I do not think that McDonough does. The Court described the § 1983 claim in that case as one that targeted 'the integrity of criminal prosecutions undertaken "pursuant to legal process"' rather than only the plaintiff's initial seizure pursuant to an arrest warrant. . . Nor did McDonough indicate that -- like the claims in Manuel and Pagán-González, and like the claim that Jordan brings -- the § 1983 claim there was based on the Fourth Amendment as opposed to, for example, the federal constitutional right to procedural due process. Moreover, while McDonough did identify practical reasons for applying a 'favorable termination' requirement to the § 1983 claim before it, I am not convinced that these practical reasons apply equally to all purely Fourth Amendment-based § 1983 claims that seek damages for the harm caused by a warrant-based seizure. McDonough invoked the need to prevent a 'ticking limitations clock on criminal defendants as soon as they become aware that fabricated evidence has been used against them,' given 'practical problems in jurisdictions where prosecutions regularly last nearly as long as -- or even longer than -- the relevant civil limitations period' and thus where 'criminal defendants could face an untenable choice between (1) letting their claims expire and (2) filing a civil suit against the very person who is in the midst of prosecuting them.'. . But, that concern would not necessitate the imposition of a 'favorable termination' requirement if such a Fourth Amendment-based § 1983 claim would not accrue until the assertedly unlawful detention terminates. Such termination could occur upon either the plaintiff's release from detention (including bail conditions) or the emergence of a separate legal basis for the detention -- whether that separate legal basis takes the form of a subsequent lawful arrest warrant, the handing up of an indictment by a grand jury, or a prosecutor's filing of a criminal information -- and thus would have nothing to do with the way that any follow-on criminal proceedings end. McDonough also explained that the 'favorable termination' requirement 'avoid[s] parallel criminal and civil litigation over the same subject matter and the related possibility of conflicting civil and criminal judgments.'. . But, the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement stems from concerns about trusting law enforcement to assess probable cause for itself. . . Thus, a Fourth Amendment-based § 1983 claim for damages from a warrant-based arrest -- at least when that seizure precedes a grand jury's indictment or a prosecutor's filing of a criminal information -- poses no greater inherent risk of interfering with follow-on state criminal proceedings than does a § 1983 claim that targets an equally early-stage warrantless arrest. Yet, 'in accord with [the] common practice,' a federal court that faces a § 1983 claim of that latter, warrantless-seizure-based sort may simply 'stay the civil action until the criminal case or the likelihood of a criminal case is ended.'. . McDonough did also emphasize that 'clear accrual rules are valuable.'. . A termination requirement such as I have described, however, would not appear to be unduly hard to administer. That is especially so, given how uncertain even the 'favorable termination' requirement itself can be. . .The time that a criminal defendant may spend in pretrial detention after a warrant-based arrest but before a prosecutor files a criminal information or a grand jury hands up an indictment may be brief. But then, so too is the time that a criminal defendant may spend in such early-stage detention after a warrantless arrest. The brevity of that detention has never been thought to justify conditioning a plaintiff's right to recover damages under § 1983 for that detention on his capacity to show that any criminal proceedings that may thereafter ensue ended in his favor. That is why we permit Jordan's 'false arrest' § 1983 claim to proceed. But, for that very reason, I am not convinced that a plaintiff should have to make that 'favorable termination' showing to obtain such recompense under § 1983 when he seeks damages for the harm caused by an equally early-stage unconstitutional seizure just because it is made pursuant to an arrest warrant. For, brief though the detention caused by that seizure may have been, there are few protections more basic than the right to be free from unjustified imprisonment, and thus there are few that are more in need of the kind of fulsome remedy that Congress supplied in § 1983 -- even if the common law itself does not supply one, too.")

Jordan v. Town of Waldoboro, 943 F.3d 532, 551 n.10 (1st Cir. 2019) (Barron, J., concurring) ("I focus in this concurrence on whether, just because a seizure is made pursuant to an arrest warrant, the 'favorable termination' requirement applies to a Fourth Amendment-based § 1983 claim for damages from that seizure. Jordan's 'malicious prosecution' § 1983 claim does not, however, involve a seizure made pursuant to an arrest warrant. Rather, according to the stipulated facts, following his warrantless arrest on November 21, 2014, law enforcement personnel served Jordan with a Uniform Summons and Complaint that same day for a violation of Me. Stat. tit. 17-A, § 353.1A.2 by unauthorized taking/transfer. Law enforcement then transported Jordan to Two Bridges Jail, from which Jordan was released that same day on bail with conditions of release pursuant to a bail bond. It thus appears that this Fourth Amendment-based § 1983 claim -- unlike his Fourth Amendment-based 'false arrest' § 1983 claim -- seeks damages for a period of detention that followed some legal process, in which that legal process took the form of the issuance of a mere criminal complaint and summons, which, under Maine law, may occur even without the involvement of a prosecutor and simply upon the action of a law enforcement officer. . . I do not address whether detention that follows that kind of relatively informal legal process -- unlike detention that follows legal process that takes the form of an indictment, a criminal information filed by a prosecutor, or some comparable charging event -- justifies subjecting a Fourth Amendment-based § 1983 claim to a 'favorable termination' requirement to ensure that its pursuit will not interfere with any state criminal prosecution that may ensue. . . I also do not address whether the seizure that grounds this claim ended upon Jordan's release on bail or instead only upon the termination of certain bail conditions that restricted his liberty.") Tempest v. Remblad, No. 120CV00523MSMLDA, 2022 WL 2817865, at *7-10 & nn.18, 19 (D.R.I. July 19, 2022) ("Several courts have assessed Heck in this context, where a first conviction allegedly resulted from constitutional violations for which the defendant-turned-plaintiff seeks civil recompense, but after which a second conviction was entered. If the integrity of the second conviction is not impugned by the civil action, they have ruled, there is no Heck bar because the first conviction that is impugned had in fact been invalidated. Where this has happened, a successful civil verdict does not even implicitly challenge the second conviction, the only one left standing. There are no parallel ongoing proceedings which could result in inconsistent determinations. And, finally, since the 'tainted' conviction has already been vacated, it cannot be attacked by habeas corpus, so Heck's concern that the civil action not improperly substitute for a habeas petition is not implicated. Support for this construct comes from a line of cases following Poventud v. City of New York, 750 F.3d 121 (2d Cir. 2014) (en banc). . . . The correctness of an analysis separating the two convictions in this kind of case and barring the civil action only if the conviction whose integrity is impugned has not been invalidated receives strong support from a First Circuit pre-Poventud opinion written by Chief Judge Sandra Lynch. A second pre-Poventud opinion provides support for the idea that in a case like this the two convictions are not fungible, and the Heck analysis is not broad-brush but instead affects only those convictions 'necessarily' impugned by the civil action. . . .In this case, Mr. Tempest's claims are aimed at the first conviction, not the second and, therefore, they are not barred by Heck. . . . This would be the end of the matter and the due process claim of Count II could proceed unimpeded were it not for a limitations question. While state law determines the applicable limitations period, federal law determines the accrual date. . . The defendants maintain that the due process action accrued when the first conviction was invalidated, removing any Heck bar. That would mean an accrual date of either July 13, 2015, when the state PCR was granted or, at the latest, July 14, 2016, when the Supreme Court affirmed. In either event, the limitations period would have expired at least 18 months before December 18, 2020, when this action was filed. There is some support for this position in McDonough v. Smith, ___ U.S. ___, 139 S. Ct. 2149, 2158 (2019), which held that the statute of limitations in a lawsuit for fabricated evidence accrued when the criminal prosecution terminates in the plaintiff's favor 'or a resulting conviction has been invalidated' within the meaning of Heck. In that case, the acquittal marked the end of the prosecution. Mr. Tempest maintains that the action did not accrue until the prosecution terminated with his Alford plea, conviction, and sentence to time served. According to him, the action was filed one-day shy of the limitation's expiration. . . The pivotal question is whether Heck would have been a bar to filing this lawsuit after the first conviction was overturned but while the criminal charges were still pending. According to the Complaint, the state threatened to use at a second trial much of the very same infirm evidence that had caused the reversal in the first place. . . And, indeed, again according to the Complaint, the Superior Court had denied Mr. Tempest's motions in limine to exclude that evidence from the later prosecution. Thus, Mr. Tempest argues, had a conviction resulted after a second trial, the civil action would 'impugn' its validity and Heck would be a bar. He argues that he could not be expected to file this civil action until the possibility of that prospect no longer existed.[18] [fn. 18: The Court is mindful of the fact that the state of the law with respect to Heck allows a situation to exist in which prosecutors who had committed or permitted the commission of violations of constitutional rights would be incentivized to continue prosecutions in order to protect themselves from the consequences of the earlier constitutionally infirm prosecution. Instead of dismissing cases that should be dismissed they would instead benefit from forcing a plea, even an Alford plea, and threatening lengthy further prison in order insulate themselves from the consequences of their prior bad acts. While the Court does not opine about whether that was the state of play in this case it is interesting to note that the prosecution's threat to use infirm evidence and seek more prison time had Mr. Tempest proceeded to trial certainly indicates that it may well have been the case here. This systemic flaw, however, is one that cannot be resolved within the context of this case.] At one time, there was some federal support for that position. [citing cases] The First Circuit has not addressed this question, but it seems clear under Wallace v. Kato that Mr. Tempest's argument that he was precluded by Heck from bringing this action until September 18, 2017, when the case finally terminated, would not be successful. . . The Court is thus constrained to hold that the cause of action accrued no later than July 14, 2016, and the three-year statute of limitations expired. . . . [fn. 19: Had Mr. Tempest brought this action while the criminal charges were pending, it could have been stayed until such time as they were resolved, satisfying Wallace v. Kato. . . That course has been followed in this Circuit.")

Second Circuit [Note that Kee, Smalls, and Ashley are all pre-Thompson v. Clark]

Kee v. City of New York, 12 F.4th 150, 162-63, 165, 169-70 (2d Cir. 2021) ("On appeal, the defendants do not dispute that the dismissal of Kee's criminal prosecution on speedy trial grounds is a favorable termination under state law in the context of his state tort claim for malicious prosecution. We agree and reiterate that, under New York State law, dismissal of a criminal prosecution on speedy trial grounds . . . is generally a favorable termination for the purpose of a New York tort claim for malicious prosecution. . . The dispute on appeal as to this element is whether, as a matter of federal law, a speedy trial dismissal satisfies the favorable termination element for purposes of a malicious prosecution claim brought under Section 1983. Kee challenges the district court's determination that, under federal law, a dismissal on speedy trial grounds does not qualify as a favorable termination. Specifically, he asserts that under general principles of traditional common law, and following the precedent of our Circuit, speedy trial dismissals are favorable. In contrast, defendants assert that the district court correctly granted them summary judgment on Kee's Section 1983 malicious prosecution claim because, under federal law, a plaintiff must show that the underlying prosecution terminated in a manner indicating innocence and that the dismissal of Kee's prosecution on speedy trial grounds is merely 'neutral as to innocence and equally consistent with guilt.'. . The district court, as well as defendants, support their analysis by relying upon our decision in Lanning v. City of Glens Falls, 908 F.3d 19 (2d Cir. 2018). As discussed below and in Lanning, New York state tort law has diverged from traditional common law with respect to what qualifies as a favorable termination. This divergence has unfortunately been the source of some confusion in Section 1983 litigation, and district courts in the Circuit have reached different conclusions regarding the impact of our decision in Lanning on the question of whether a speedy trial dismissal is a favorable termination in the context of a federal malicious prosecution claim. Compare Blount v. City of New York, 15-CV-5599 (PKC) (JO), 2019 WL 1050994, at *5 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 5, 2019) ("Lanning makes clear that, as the Circuit consistently held pre-Lanning, dismissals on speedy trial grounds are terminations in the favor of the accused."), with Minus v. City of New York, 488 F. Supp. 3d 58, 66 (S.D.N.Y. 2020) (concluding, after reviewing Lanning and prior case authority, that "a speedy trial dismissal is not a favorable termination for purposes of a Section 1983 claim without an affirmative indication of the accused's innocence"); see generally Herrera-Amador v. N.Y.C. Police Dep't, 16-CV-5915 (NGG) (VMS), 2021 WL 3012583, at *4 (E.D.N.Y. July 16, 2021) (collecting cases). We now clarify that Lanning did not modify, but rather re-affirmed, the longstanding 'indicative of innocence' standard for Section 1983 malicious prosecution claims under which this Court has repeatedly held, and holds again today, that a speedy trial dismissal generally constitutes a 'favorable termination.'. . . Therefore, we again hold that Murphy is good law and binding precedent—namely, a speedy trial dismissal is generally a favorable termination for purposes of a malicious prosecution claim under Section 1983. In clarifying that a dismissal on speedy trial grounds is generally a favorable termination, we note the qualifier. Although such dismissals are generally (or presumed to be) favorable, the defendant may attempt to present evidence to rebut this presumption. Thus, as explained in Murphy, a plaintiff will prevail on this 'favorable termination' element as a matter of law when there was a speedy trial dismissal unless the defendant produces evidence of a 'non-merits-based explanation for the failure to pursue the prosecution' of the plaintiff. . . . Even though defendants acknowledge that a fair trial claim is cognizable even in the absence of a trial under Frost, they argued in their brief that Kee still must satisfy a 'favorable termination' requirement that is identical in its scope to that same element in the context of a malicious prosecution claim, and they asserted Kee failed to meet that requirement. The Supreme Court recently held that a fair trial claim based on fabricated evidence does not accrue until the underlying criminal proceeding terminates in the plaintiff's favor. See McDonough v. Smith, —— U.S. ——, 139 S. Ct. 2149, 2158–61, 204 L.Ed.2d 506 (2019). Moreover, in McDonough, the Supreme Court suggested that there may be a need 'for a context-specific and more capacious understanding of what constitutes "favorable" termination for purposes of a § 1983 false-evidence claim.'. . However, because the plaintiff's acquittal on the underlying criminal charges 'was unquestionably a favorable termination,' the Supreme Court had 'no occasion to address the broader range of ways a criminal prosecution ... might end favorably to the accused' in the fair trial context. . . As an initial matter, because we have already concluded that Kee has met the

'favorable termination' requirement mandated for a malicious prosecution claim, defendants' argument is moot because, even if that identical standard were to be applied to a fair trial claim, Kee would still satisfy that requirement. In any event, in Smalls v. Collins, —— F.4th ——, 2021 WL 3700194 (2d Cir. Aug. 20, 2021), we recently addressed this issue in the wake of McDonough and rejected the precise argument asserted by the defendants here . . . . Instead, we held that '[w]here the plaintiff asserts a section 1983 fair-trial claim based on fabricated evidence, all that is required is that the underlying criminal proceeding be terminated in such a manner that the lawsuit does not impugn an ongoing prosecution or outstanding conviction.'. . Applying that standard here, because Kee's underlying criminal proceeding was dismissed on speedy trial grounds, his fair trial claim does not impugn an ongoing prosecution, nor would it potentially invalidate any outstanding conviction if he were to prevail. Accordingly, this dismissal on speedy trial grounds constitutes a favorable termination under the standard articulated in Smalls, which is necessary for the accrual of a fair trial claim based upon fabricated evidence under McDonough.") Smalls v. Collins, 10 F.4th 117, 131-40 (2d Cir. 2021) ("The plaintiffs argue on appeal that the district courts erred in granting the defendants' motions because (1) McDonough does not require plaintiffs asserting section 1983 fair-trial claims based on fabricated evidence to demonstrate that their underlying criminal proceedings terminated in a manner indicative of innocence; and (2) their underlying criminal proceedings were terminated in such a way that satisfies McDonough's accrual rule. For the reasons explained below, we agree. . . . In contrast to malicious prosecution claims, which require a plaintiff to demonstrate 'that the underlying criminal proceeding ended in a manner that affirmatively indicates his innocence,' Lanning, 908 F.3d at 22, we have long held 'that Section 1983 liability attaches for knowingly falsifying evidence even where there simultaneously exists a lawful basis for [the] deprivation of liberty' that the plaintiff suffered. . . . The same is true of other types of section 1983 fair-trial claims, such as those alleging the withholding of exculpatory or other impeachment material in violation of Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963). . . This is because malicious-prosecution and fair-trial claims 'arise out of different constitutional rights, protect against different constitutional injuries, and implicate different constitutional concerns.'. . Malicious-prosecution claims 'essentially allege[ ] a violation of the plaintiff's right under the Fourth Amendment to be free from unreasonable seizure,' the 'touchstone' of which is 'reasonableness.'. . . A section 1983 fair-trial claim, by contrast, will not be defeated by evidence of probable cause because it 'cover[s] kinds of police misconduct not addressed by ... malicious prosecution claims' and vindicates a different constitutional right – the right to due process protected by the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. . . The due process clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments prohibit the government from 'depriv[ing] any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law,' U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 2; accord U.S. Const. amend. V, and thus, unlike a plaintiff asserting a Fourth Amendment violation, a plaintiff may assert a violation of her due process rights even where the relevant deprivation was otherwise '[ ]reasonable,' U.S. Const. amend. IV. 'Like a prosecutor's knowing use of false evidence to obtain a tainted conviction, a police officer's fabrication and forwarding to prosecutors of known false evidence works an unacceptable "corruption of the truth-seeking function of the trial process,"' and deprivation of life, liberty, or property under such circumstances violates the accused's right to due process. . . 'No arrest, no matter how lawful or objectively reasonable, gives an arresting officer or his fellow officers license to deliberately manufacture false evidence against an arrestee.'. . . We have therefore never required that a plaintiff alleging a section 1983 fair-trial claim establish a favorable termination indicative of innocence. . . . In Heck, the Supreme Court announced an accrual rule for section 1983 actions involving an underlying criminal conviction. . . . In McDonough, the Supreme Court extended the rule announced in Heck to ongoing criminal prosecutions. . . . Relying extensively on its prior decision in Heck, the Court found it useful to analogize McDonough's fabricated-evidence claim to the common-law tort of malicious prosecution, noting that malicious prosecution's favorable-termination requirement 'is rooted in pragmatic concerns with avoiding parallel criminal and civil litigation over the same subject matter and the related possibility of conflicting judgments.'. . The Court explained that 'similar concerns for finality and consistency' had motivated it to limit the 'avenues for collateral attack on criminal judgments through civil tort vehicles such as § 1983' and to adopt Heck's 'favorable-termination requirement.'. . Although McDonough differed from Heck because the plaintiff in Heck had been convicted while the plaintiff in McDonough was acquitted, the Court reasoned that McDonough's claims challenged the validity of the criminal proceedings against him 'in essentially the same manner' as the plaintiff in Heck. . .A criminal defendant therefore cannot 'bring a fabricated-evidence challenge to criminal proceedings while those criminal proceedings are ongoing.'. . 'Only once the criminal proceeding has ended in the defendant's favor, or a resulting conviction has been invalidated within the meaning of Heck, will the statute of limitations begin to run.'. . Applying this newly formulated rule, the Court reversed the judgment of the Second Circuit, concluding that the statute of limitations for McDonough's section 1983 fabricated-evidence claim did not begin to run until the criminal proceedings against him 'terminated in his favor – that is, when he was acquitted at the end of his second trial.'. . . McDonough did, however, announce a new accrual rule for fabricated-evidence claims. Relying on Heck's 'favorable-termination requirement,' the Supreme Court concluded that '[t]here is not a complete and present cause of action to bring a fabricated-evidence challenge to criminal proceedings while those criminal proceedings are ongoing.'. . To bring a fabricated-evidence claim, a plaintiff must therefore establish – as a condition precedent to suit – that the claim has accrued within the meaning of McDonough. The core question at the heart of these appeals is what constitutes a favorable termination sufficient to trigger McDonough's accrual rule for fabricated-evidence claims. The defendants point out that McDonough's accrual rule for fabricated-evidence claims was premised on an analogy to malicious-prosecution claims and argue that McDonough's favorable-termination requirement should thus be interpreted to be coextensive with malicious prosecution's favorable-termination requirement, under which a plaintiff must establish that the proceeding ended in a manner indicative of innocence. This argument is inconsistent with the reasoning and holding of McDonough and, we think, lacks merit. . . . Notably, Heck's analogy to malicious prosecution did not result in the Supreme Court's adoption of a termination-indicative-of-innocence requirement for all section 1983 claims premised on an underlying conviction. Rather, to guard against parallel litigation and promote finality and consistency, the Court adopted an accrual rule designed to avoid inconsistent results and new avenues of collateral attack. . . Under the Heck Court's favorable-termination requirement, . . . if a section 1983 plaintiff establishes – before bringing suit – that the 'action, even if successful, will not demonstrate the invalidity of any outstanding criminal judgment against the plaintiff, the action should be allowed to proceed, in the absence of some other bar to the suit.'. . A plaintiff may satisfy this requirement by demonstrating 'that the conviction or sentence has been reversed on direct appeal, expunged by executive order, declared invalid by a state tribunal authorized to make such determination, or called into question by a federal court's issuance of a writ of habeas corpus, 28 U.S.C. § 2254.'. . None of these resolutions requires an affirmative showing of innocence. . . . [T]he McDonough Court found itself confronted with a set of facts that raised concerns similar to those present in Heck and simply extended Heck's reach to section 1983 lawsuits brought during pending criminal prosecutions. . . Although the McDonough plaintiff's claims did not fall within Heck because, unlike the plaintiff in Heck, he had been acquitted and there was therefore no outstanding conviction, the Supreme Court decided that the 'pragmatic considerations' underlying the Heck rule apply with equal force to 'ongoing' criminal proceedings. . . .In reaffirming the Heck rule while extending it to ongoing prosecutions, McDonough no more required an affirmative indication of innocence than Heck did. Indeed, the notion that McDonough established malicious prosecution's favorable-termination requirement as the accrual rule for section 1983 fair-trial claims is inconsistent with the rule announced in McDonough. The Supreme Court phrased its accrual rule disjunctively, making clear that invalidation of a conviction within the meaning of Heck or termination of an ongoing criminal proceeding in the defendant's favor would be sufficient to trigger the statute of limitations. . . Further, while the Court had 'no occasion to address the broader range of ways a criminal prosecution (as opposed to a conviction) might end favorably to the accused' because the plaintiff's 'acquittal was unquestionably a favorable termination,' it suggested that a 'context-specific and more capacious understanding of what constitutes "favorable" termination' might be appropriate for fabricated-evidence claims in light of prosecutors' broad discretion over 'the terms on which pleas will be offered or whether charges will be dropped[.]'. . This language undercuts any suggestion that McDonough's accrual rule is merely coextensive with malicious prosecution's favorable-termination requirement. Requiring a plaintiff alleging fabricated-evidence claims to establish that the underlying criminal proceeding ended in a manner that affirmatively indicates his innocence would also be fundamentally inconsistent with our longstanding distinction between section 1983 fair-trial and malicious-prosecution claims. As noted above, malicious-prosecution and fair-trial claims assert the violation of different constitutional rights and protect against different constitutional injuries. It makes sense to require a favorable termination indicative of innocence in the context of malicious prosecution claims where the essence of such a claim 'is the alleged groundless prosecution[.]'. . Absent affirmative indications of innocence, the termination of the proceeding does not necessarily mean that the government lacked reasonable grounds for initiating the prosecution; a favorable termination indicative of innocence is therefore critical to determining whether the plaintiff has a viable claim. . . A section 1983 fair-trial claim, by contrast, focuses on the constitutionality of the process and addresses a different constitutional injury – deprivation of life, liberty, or property due to corruption of due process by official misconduct. . . Whether the proceeding was terminated in a manner indicative of innocence therefore is not dispositive in the context of a section 1983 fair-trial claim, and we have never required that a plaintiff alleging such a claim establish a favorable termination indicative of innocence. Accordingly, McDonough's accrual rule does not import malicious prosecution's favorable-termination requirement onto section 1983 fair-trial claims. Where the plaintiff asserts a section 1983 fair-trial claim based on fabricated evidence, all that is required is that the underlying criminal proceeding be terminated in such a manner that the lawsuit does not impugn an ongoing prosecution or outstanding conviction. . . This requirement may be satisfied where a criminal conviction has been invalidated or a criminal prosecution has been terminated in the criminal defendant's favor because, in such circumstances, there is no risk that a section 1983 plaintiff's claim will impugn an existing conviction or the basis for an ongoing prosecution. . . . Smalls's section 1983 fabricated-evidence claim poses no risk of demonstrating the invalidity of any outstanding criminal judgment because there is no such judgment. And his lawsuit does not run parallel to, nor does it impugn, any pending prosecution or existing conviction because there is no conviction and there are no pending charges. Smalls has therefore satisfied McDonough and there is no bar to his suit")

Smalls v. Collins, 10 F.4th 117, 140-44 (2d Cir. 2021) ("Relying on Manuel v. City of Joliet, 137 S. Ct. 911 (2017), the Daniel defendants argue that, even if a termination indicative of innocence is not required under McDonough, Daniel's claim – which involves a pretrial deprivation of liberty – is governed by the Fourth Amendment and therefore collapses into a malicious-prosecution claim. According to the Daniel defendants, this means that Daniel must demonstrate that his underlying criminal case was resolved in a manner indicative of innocence as is required for malicious-prosecution claims. The Daniel defendants essentially assert that, in Manuel, the Supreme Court categorically precluded due process fabricated-evidence claims seeking damages for pretrial detention. They argue that the Supreme Court held that such claims may only be brought under the Fourth Amendment and that, as a result, a fabricated-evidence claim seeking damages for pretrial detention is subsumed under the elements of a malicious-prosecution claim. But in Manuel, the Supreme Court granted certiorari to decide only whether a section 1983 claim based on a 'pretrial detention following the start of legal process' could 'give rise to a Fourth Amendment claim.'. . The Court answered this question in the affirmative. . . We have held that Manuel did not rule out the possibility that, in such circumstances, the Constitution also permits a due process claim that the plaintiff was deprived of life, liberty, or property as a result of the use of fabricated evidence. In Frost v. New York City Police Department, 980 F.3d 231 (2d Cir. 2020), we concluded that the district court erred in granting the defendants' motion for summary judgment as to Frost's section 1983 fair-trial claim, which was premised on his pretrial detention. . . In reaching this conclusion, the majority rejected the dissent's argument that Frost's claim failed as a matter of law because, under Manuel, it arose under the Fourth Amendment and there was 'ample probable cause for Frost's arrest, [pretrial] detention, and prosecution.'. . The dissent – like the Daniel defendants – essentially argued that Frost's fair-trial claim was more accurately described as arising under the Fourth Amendment, rather than the Due Process Clause, because the allegedly fabricated evidence was only used to initiate pretrial proceedings against Frost (and was not, in fact, introduced at trial). . . The majority found this argument unpersuasive, concluding that our precedent established that, in this context, 'the (perhaps imprecisely named)

fair trial right protects against deprivation of liberty that results when a police officer fabricates and forwards evidence to a prosecutor that would be likely to influence a jury's decision, were that evidence presented to the jury.'. . Accordingly, '[n]otwithstanding the nomenclature, a criminal defendant's right to a fair trial protects more than the fairness of the trial itself[;] [i]ndeed, a criminal defendant can bring a fair trial claim even when no trial occurs at all.'. . The majority in Frost reconciled this result with Manuel, explaining:

The Supreme Court's holding in Manuel v. City of Joliet ... does not compel a different result. In Manuel, the Supreme Court held that a § 1983 plaintiff could challenge his pretrial detention based on purportedly fabricated evidence under the Fourth Amendment, even after a judge determined that this evidence constituted probable cause. But just as a Fourth Amendment claim survives the initiation of "legal process," our precedents establish that a fair trial claim under the Due Process Clause may accrue before the trial itself. Accordingly, the holding of Manuel does not preclude Frost's fair trial claim.

Id. at 251 n.14 . . . The defendants' argument is therefore foreclosed by Frost. Under our precedent, Daniel may assert a fabricated-evidence claim related to his pretrial detention under the Due Process Clause. . . . It is therefore an open question as to whether the dismissal of Daniel's charges pursuant to an ACD constitutes a favorable termination for purposes of McDonough. The pragmatic concerns animating McDonough counsel in favor of concluding that it does. As explained above, McDonough extended Heck to section 1983 fabricated-evidence claims filed during an ongoing prosecution because allowing such suits would impugn the basis for a pending prosecution and 'impermissibly risk parallel litigation and conflicting judgments.'. . These concerns are not implicated where, as here, the charges against the plaintiff are dismissed pursuant to an ACD. When a defendant accepts an ACD in New York state court, his criminal prosecution is 'adjourn[ed] ... without [a] date ordered' for it to resume. . . While the government retains the right to move to 'restore the case to the calendar,' it must make such a motion within 'six months' – or in some cases 'one year' – after the defendant accepts the ACD. . . If the government does not move within the prescribed time period, 'the accusatory instrument is, at the expiration of such period, deemed to have been dismissed by the court in furtherance of justice' and 'the arrest and prosecution shall be deemed a nullity.'. . In such circumstances, there is no risk of parallel litigation because the charges have been dismissed. Nor is there any risk of conflicting judgments because no determination of guilt or innocence was made, and no judgment was entered. Rather, once the charges against Daniel were dismissed, any concerns about the possibility of 'two-track litigation' dissipated. . . This conclusion is reinforced by the rationales underlying our enduring distinction between malicious-prosecution and fair-trial claims. While a termination indicative of innocence is necessary in the context of malicious-prosecution claims to ensure that there were no reasonable grounds for the prosecution, see Lanning, 908 F.3d at 28, depriving an individual of life, liberty, or property by fabricating evidence violates due process regardless of whether there was probable cause because '[n]o arrest, no matter how lawful or objectively reasonable, gives an arresting officer or his fellow officers license to deliberately manufacture false evidence against an arrestee.'. . In contrast to a malicious-prosecution claim, which focuses on the validity of the initiation of the prosecution, a section 1983 fair-trial claim predicated on fabricated evidence guards against the deprivation of life, liberty, or property as a result of the corruption of due process, . . . and therefore does not require a favorable termination indicative of innocence. . . Consistent with this distinction, it is well-settled that acceptance of an ACD bars a malicious-prosecution claim because it leaves the question of innocence or guilt unanswered and is thus not a termination indicative of innocence. . . And it was similarly well-accepted, prior to McDonough, that an ACD did not preclude a fair-trial claim. . . McDonough did not impose malicious prosecution's favorable-termination requirement onto fair trial claims or overrule our precedent concerning the contours of fabricated-evidence claims. . . Rather, as explained above, McDonough simply extended Heck's favorable termination requirement to ongoing prosecutions under circumstances that implicate Heck's pragmatic concerns for finality and consistency. Such concerns are not present where, as here, the charges against Daniel were dismissed pursuant to an ACD. . . . The dismissal of Daniel's charges pursuant to an ACD therefore constituted a favorable termination within the meaning of McDonough and McDonough poses no bar to suit.")

Ashley v. City of New York, 992 F.3d 128, 139-42 (2d Cir. 2021) ("Civil contends that under McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149 (2019), plaintiffs asserting a fabricated-evidence claim must establish that the underlying prosecution terminated in their favor. He asserts that, because Ashley has not shown a favorable termination, any possible errors in the jury instructions were harmless. We hold, however, that Ashley's criminal case did terminate favorably to him. Our favorable-termination analysis here relies on our precedents regarding favorable termination in the malicious-prosecution context. The Supreme Court explained in McDonough that fabricated-evidence claims might merit a 'context-specific,' and indeed 'more capacious,' understanding of what constitutes a favorable termination. . . But even assuming, arguendo, that the favorable termination requirement for fabricated-evidence claims is identical to that used for malicious prosecution claims, we believe that our malicious prosecution precedents compel the conclusion that Ashley's prosecution terminated in his favor. In the malicious prosecution context, we have held that, to be deemed a favorable termination, the prosecution's 'final disposition [must be] such as to indicate the accused is not guilty.' Singleton v. City of New York, 632 F.2d 185, 193 (2d Cir. 1980). This requirement is most easily met with a judgment of acquittal. But we have long recognized that a termination may be favorable when, although the termination is 'not based on the merits, ... the failure to proceed implies a lack of reasonable grounds for the prosecution.'. . This principle, which we have repeatedly and consistently recognized, . . . is stated most clearly in Murphy v. Lynn, 118 F.3d 938 (2d Cir. 1997). There, we explained that whether a non-merits termination is 'indicative of innocence depends on the nature and circumstances of the termination; the dispositive inquiry is whether the failure to proceed implies a lack of reasonable grounds for the prosecution.'. . And although we held in Murphy that, as a 'general[ ]' matter, 'certain types of dispositions'—such as dismissals for facial insufficiency in which the prosecution has 'fail[ed] to allege sufficient facts to support the charge'—do not qualify as favorable terminations, we emphasized that the determination is context-specific. . . Here, the circumstances surrounding the termination of Ashley's prosecution show favorable termination, even though the disposition was denoted as a dismissal for facial insufficiency. . . .[T]he problem with the prosecution's case did not stem from a deficiency in the pleading, but rather from the court's sense that the prosecution's case without more simply did not support a charge of unlawful possession of marijuana against Ashley. Indeed, although the prosecution was offered multiple opportunities to strengthen its case and supersede the deficient pleading, it declined to do so. . . It follows that the prosecution's dismissal would 'indicate [that Ashley is] not guilty.'. . As a result, we need not decide whether and how the favorable-termination standard for fabricated-evidence claims may be 'more capacious' than the favorable-termination standard for malicious prosecution claims, . . . because we hold that in the circumstances before us, Ashley's state criminal case terminated favorably to him even under our malicious prosecution precedents.")

McDonough v. Smith, 783 F. App'x 91, ___ & n.1 (2d Cir. 2019) ("This case is before us on remand from the Supreme Court, which reversed our decision in McDonough v. Smith, 898 F.3d 259 (2d Cir. 2018), and remanded for further proceedings consistent with the Supreme Court's opinion. See McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149, 204 L. Ed. 2d 506 (2019). We now VACATE the judgment of the district court and REMAND for further proceedings consistent with the opinion of the Supreme Court. . . .We express no view as to whether Smith has waived or forfeited the argument that absolute immunity bars McDonough's fabricated-evidence claim. See Brown v. City of New York, 862 F.3d 182, 187-88 (2d Cir. 2017).")

Perez v. City of New York, No. 20-CV-1359 (LJL), 2022 WL 4236338, at *1-14 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 14, 2022) ("Defendants' primary argument is that Plaintiff cannot show favorable termination of her criminal proceedings. That argument is without merit. Defendants contend that an 'ACD bars a malicious-prosecution claim because it leaves the question of innocence or guilt unanswered and is thus not a termination indicative of innocence.'. . That argument may have had merit when Defendants filed their opening brief in support of the motion for summary judgment on January 21, 2022. On April 4, 2022, however, the Supreme Court decided Thompson v. Clark, 142 S. Ct. 1332 (2022), rejected the Second Circuit test for favorable termination, and held that '[t]o demonstrate a favorable termination of a criminal prosecution for purposes of the Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983 for malicious prosecution, a plaintiff need only show that his prosecution ended without a conviction[.]'. . In light of Thompson, Defendants' argument is meritless. . . . Based on Thompson, Plaintiff has established favorable termination. . . Perez's case ended in an ACD. . . That ACD culminated in a dismissal of all her charges.")

Smith v. Town of Lewiston, No. 17-CV-959-LJV-LGF, 2022 WL 3273241, at *8–9 (W.D.N.Y. Aug. 11, 2022) ("Prior to Thompson, for a federal malicious prosecution claim to succeed in the Second Circuit, the favorable-termination element required some affirmative indication of the plaintiff's innocence in the underlying proceeding. Lanning v. City of Glens Falls, 908 F.3d 19, 25 (2d Cir. 2018). In Thompson, however, the Supreme Court deciphered 'the elements of the most analogous tort as of 1871 when § 1983 was enacted, and concluded that '[i]n most American courts that had considered the question[,] ... the favorable termination element of a malicious prosecution claim was satisfied so long as the prosecution ended without a conviction.'. . Indeed, the Court noted that several courts during that era employed identical language: they asked only whether the prosecution was 'at an end.'. . Based on that historical analysis, the Supreme Court concluded that

'a Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983 for malicious prosecution does not require the plaintiff to show that the criminal prosecution ended with some affirmative indication of innocence.'. . Instead, '[a] plaintiff need only show that the criminal prosecution ended without a conviction.'. . That standard is clearly met here: the judge dismissed the action with prejudice. . . Therefore, in light of Thompson, Smith has satisfied this element of his federal malicious prosecution claim as a matter of law. In contrast, under New York State law, a prosecution is favorably terminated when it cannot be brought again and when its termination is not inconsistent with the innocence of the accused. . . .In this case, it is unclear whether the criminal proceedings were favorably terminated under New York State law. The order dismissing the proceeding simply states that the information was dismissed with prejudice on Smith's motion with no opposition from the prosecution. . . Smith's counsel presented several arguments for dismissal in that motion, including that: (1) the information was defective on its face; (2) the underlying conduct was protected by the First Amendment; and (3) depending on the availability of certain audio recordings, the charge should be dismissed based on spoliation of evidence and due process grounds. . .The transcript from the proceedings provides no clarity; on the contrary, it only adds confusion. . . .[I]t is possible that the proceedings were dismissed because the prosecution and Smith agreed for some reason that the prosecution would not object to dismissal and would effectively abandon the prosecution. On the other hand, it also is possible that the charge was dismissed on its merits. Therefore, there is a material issue of fact on that element of Smith's state law malicious prosecution claim. In sum, the underlying proceedings were terminated in Smith's favor for the purpose of his federal law malicious prosecution claim, but there is a material issue of fact as to this element under state law standards.")

Fourth Circuit

Smith v. Travelpiece, 31 F.4th 878, 884-88 (4th Cir. 2022) ("[I]dentifying when Plaintiffs' cause of action accrued requires that we first isolate the precise constitutional violation alleged. Plaintiffs' § 1983 claim focuses on an improper search warrant. The search warrant, it is alleged, was improper because the Defendant made false statements and material omissions in his affidavit in support of the warrant. Plaintiffs claim that this violated their right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures under the Fourth Amendment and their right to due process under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . When an officer improperly obtains a search warrant using deceptive falsities or omissions and uses that ill-gotten warrant to search and seize property, the Fourth Amendment's right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures is violated. . . Plaintiffs claim that the improper search warrant also violated their procedural due process rights under the Fourteenth Amendment. In short, they claim that Trooper Travelpiece's lies and omissions during the warrant process deprived them of the fair procedures that are required before a search and seizure of property can occur. But '[t]he Fourth Amendment was tailored explicitly for the criminal justice system, and its balance between individual and public interests always has been thought to define the "process that is due" for seizures of person or property in criminal cases.'. . Dressing a Fourth Amendment claim up in due process language does not transform it into a Fourteenth Amendment claim. . . One might just as well dress up any Fourth Amendment claim this same way. When a police officer searches a suspect's home with no warrant, one might complain that the officer did not follow the procedures laid out in the Fourth Amendment requiring a warrant by oath or affirmation from an impartial judge. But no matter its dress, that is a Fourth Amendment unreasonable-search claim and not a due-process claim. So too here. Nor do the allegations here implicate claims for improper detention or prosecution. . . To raise those claims, Plaintiffs would have needed to allege Trooper Travelpiece acted improperly after the search. . . Plaintiffs fail to allege Trooper Travelpiece infringed their constitutional rights after the search and seizure was complete. Trooper Travelpiece's only improper actions occurred in making deceptive statements and omissions in his search-warrant affidavit. Thus, Plaintiffs only plead a single constitutional violation—an unreasonable search and seizure of property in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Having identified the claim as a Fourth Amendment unlawful-search-and-seizure-of-property claim, we must next identify its best common-law-tort analogy. This requires turning to 'common-law principles that were well settled' in 1871 when Congress enacted § 1983. . . And common-law courts have long considered the government's illegal search and seizure of property to be a trespass. . . In 1763, the English Court of Common Pleas recognized that an action brought by the victim of an illegal search and seizure by government officers pursuant to an unlawful warrant was 'an action of trespass' and upheld a large jury verdict for the plaintiff. . . . So trespass is the most natural common-law analogy for a Fourth Amendment unreasonable-search-and-seizure claim. When Congress passed § 1983, a trespass was '[a]ny entry upon land in the rightful possession of another, without license or permission.'. . That claim accrued at 'the time it was committed, and not from the time when the full extent of the injury was ascertained.'. . Once the wrongful entry occurred, Plaintiffs 'could have filed suit' with a 'complete and present cause of action.'. .That accrual rule, well-settled in the common law of 1871, is consistent with the Fourth Amendment as well. The Fourth Amendment protects people's interest in property as well as 'certain expectations of privacy.'. . And those interests are violated as soon as an unlawful search and seizure of property occurs—no further prosecution is required. . . Given that the Fourth Amendment is concerned with property and privacy—not guilt or innocence—the values of the Fourth Amendment are served by ensuring that a § 1983 plaintiff can vindicate their interests in property and privacy when they are violated, no matter if a prosecution is commenced. . . Our Court previously adopted the rule that the statute of limitations for a § 1983 claim based on an unconstitutional search and seizure of property runs from the time of the search and seizure. . . And although we lacked the Supreme Court's recent guidance on § 1983 accrual rules, Cramer's conclusion conforms to that guidance, the common law of 1871, and the requirements of the Fourth Amendment. So Plaintiffs' § 1983 claim based on an unconstitutional search and seizure of property accrued at the time of the search. . . As Plaintiffs filed suit more than two years after the search, we agree with the district court that the § 1983 claim is time barred. One final argument must be considered. Plaintiffs argue that even if a Fourth Amendment search claim typically accrues at the time of the search, this particular search claim did not accrue until the charges against them were dismissed because the claim 'necessarily threatens to impugn' their prosecutions. . . Based on language in Heck and McDonough, Plaintiffs argue that a favorable-termination accrual rule is required anytime a § 1983 claim 'necessarily threatens to impugn' a prosecution. . . We disagree. Both Heck and McDonough applied the favorable-termination accrual rule only after determining that the claim's appropriate analog was malicious prosecution. . . We are instead governed by Wallace, which involved a constitutional claim of unlawful seizure of a person analogous to the tort of false imprisonment. . . In Wallace, the plaintiff had been convicted of murder based on a confession the police obtained after arresting the plaintiff without probable cause. . . The confession was held inadmissible on appeal and prosecutors dropped the charges against the plaintiff. . . Even though the particular facts showed that the alleged unlawful seizure would impugn the prosecution, the Supreme Court rejected the malicious-prosecution analogy and held the tort accrued without favorable termination of a future prosecution. . . Wallace rejected the 'bizarre extension of Heck' that Plaintiffs ask us to adopt here—'that an action which would impugn an anticipated future conviction [or prosecution] cannot be brought until that conviction [or prosecution] occurs and is set aside.'. . Adopting that extension 'would require the plaintiff (and if he brings suit promptly, the court) to speculate about whether a prosecution will be brought ... and whether the pending civil action will impugn that [prosecution].'. . If accrual depends on the prosecutor's conduct after the completion of the constitutional violation, § 1983 plaintiffs are left to a guessing game of if, or when, their claims will ever accrue. . . The appropriate common-law-tort analogy for a constitutional violation, and accordingly its accrual date, is based on the nature of the constitutional violation when it is complete. . . Plaintiffs only allege a search and seizure of property that violated the Fourth Amendment. That claim accrued when Trooper Travelpiece performed the unlawful search in 2014. And the applicable two-year statute of limitations ran out well before they sued in 2019. So the suit is time-barred and must be dismissed.")

Burley v. Baltimore Police Department, No. CV ELH-18-1743, 2019 WL 6253251, at *24 (D. Md. Nov. 22, 2019) ("The ruling of the Supreme Court was consistent with decisions of several circuits, concluding that a fabricated evidence claim begins to run when the criminal proceedings resolve in the defendant's favor. See Floyd v. Attorney Gen., 722 F. App'x 112, 114 (3d Cir. 2018); Mills v. Barnard, 869 F.3d 473, 484 (6th Cir. 2017); Bradford v. Scherschligt, 803 F.3d 382, 387-389 (9th Cir. 2015); Mondragon v. Thompson, 519 F.3d 1078, 1083 (10th Cir. 2008); Castellano v. Fragozo, 352 F.3d 939, 959-60 (5th Cir. 2003) (en banc). . .In light of the Supreme Court's ruling in McDonough, I conclude that the limitations period as to plaintiffs' fabricated evidence claim began to run when the criminal proceedings against them terminated in their favor, that is, when their convictions were vacated in December 2017. Therefore, plaintiffs' due process/fabricated evidence claim in Count I was timely filed.")

Sixth Circuit

Anderson v. Knox County, No. 22-5280, 2023 WL 4536078, at *8 n.8 (6th Cir. July 13, 2023) (not reported) ("Our sister circuits are split on the issue of whether a plaintiff can bring a fabrication claim after acquittal and what that claim looks like. Compare Black, 835 F.3d at 371 (the Third Circuit allowing such a claim) and Zahrey v. Coffey, 221 F.3d 342, 348–49 (2d Cir. 2000), with Saunders-El v. Rohde, 778 F.3d 556, 562 (7th Cir. 2015) (not allowing such a claim). Moreover, the Supreme Court's decision in McDonough v. Smith impliedly recognized fabrication claims based on acquittal. See 139 S. Ct. 2149, 2161 (2019) ("The statute of limitations for McDonough's § 1983 claim alleging that he was prosecuted using fabricated evidence began to run when the criminal proceedings against him terminated in his favor—that is, when he was acquitted at the end of his second trial."). Under the Second Circuit's view, a plaintiff must show that the fabricated evidence 'critically influenced' the prosecutor's 'decision to prosecute.' See Frost v. N.Y. City Police Dep't, 980 F.3d 231, 248 (2d Cir. 2020). Under the Third Circuit's view, which allows a fabrication claim upon acquittal, to prevail, a plaintiff must demonstrate that 'there is a reasonable likelihood that, absent that fabricated evidence, [he] would not have been criminally charged,' i.e., that probable cause didn't otherwise exist. . . The problem for Anderson is that he doesn't establish that the supposedly fabricated evidence critically influenced the prosecutor's decision to prosecute or that probable cause didn't otherwise exist. Nor does he suggest another way to make out a fabrication claim on acquittal. So Anderson can't prevail here even if we were to adopt a separate acquittal test—a question that we leave for another day.")

Hamann v. Township of Van Buren, No. 20-10849, 2021 WL 534487, at *6 (E.D. Mich. Feb. 11, 2021) ("McDonough does not alter the principle that a plaintiff has a complete and present cause of action and can file suit and obtain relief for an unlawful search and seizure at the time the search occurs. See Heck, 512 U.S. at 487 n.7. It follows, then, that the three-year statute of limitations on the plaintiffs' claims attacking the 2015 search-and-seizure expired well before they file their complaint in 2020.")

Friskey v. Bracke, No. CV 2:17-056-WOB, 2020 WL 465026, at *9–11, *13 (E.D. Ky. Jan. 28, 2020) ("[T]here is a split amongst the Circuit Courts of Appeal regarding the viability of a fabrication of evidence claim after an acquittal. For example, in Saunders-El v. Rohde, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit recognized that a plaintiff's claim based on allegations that 'the prosecutor and investigators conspired "to manufacture false evidence and bring trumped-up charges,"' was foreclosed by the plaintiff's acquittal. . . In contrast, in Black v. Montgomery Cty., 835 F.3d 358, 371 (3d Cir. 2016), as amended (Sept. 16, 2016), the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit held that 'an acquitted criminal defendant may have a stand-alone fabricated evidence claim against state actors under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment if there is a reasonable likelihood that, absent that fabricated evidence, the defendant would not have been criminally charged.'. . . Consistent among the courts that recognize that a fabrication of evidence claim may survive a criminal defendant's acquittal is that the plaintiff asserting the claim must show some sort of connection between the alleged fabrication of the evidence and a due process 'injury.'. . A causation requirement is also consistent with the United States Supreme Court's decision in McDonough, which found that, like malicious prosecution (which the Court found was the most analogous common-law tort), the tort of fabrication of evidence requires the plaintiff 'to show that the criminal proceedings against him – and consequent deprivations of his liberty – were caused by [Defendant's] malfeasance in fabricating evidence.'. . Thus, assuming (without deciding) that Friskey's fabrication of evidence claim is still viable after his acquittal, he must still point to some causal connection between the allegedly fabricated evidence and consequent deprivations of his liberty resulting from the criminal proceedings against him. This Friskey simply does not do, as Friskey fails to point to any specific deprivation of his liberty at any point during the criminal proceedings (either resulting from his arrest, his criminal prosecution, or his sentence imposed after his conviction for drug manufacturing) caused by the alleged alterations to the rifle. Nor could he, as any 'deprivation of liberty' derived from Friskey's arrest and/or prosecution could not have been 'caused' by the alleged alterations. . . .It is true that the Sixth Circuit recognized in Stemler that a fabrication of evidence claim 'does not require a conclusion that the state did not have probable cause to prosecute the claimant.'. . However, this does not require the Court to ignore as irrelevant Friskey's admitted drug manufacturing activities and the abundance of other evidence found with the CN-Romarm rifle when evaluating whether the alleged post-seizure/pre-trial alterations to the rifle 'caused' Friskey to be deprived of liberty by virtue of his arrest and prosecution. Friskey does not argue that, absent the alleged alterations to the rifle, he would have never been arrested or prosecuted. Nor could he credibly do so, in light of the abundance of evidence against Friskey (i.e., the .22 rifle, the ammunition, 571 marijuana plants, equipment for cultivating marijuana, and $8015), his own admissions to criminal activity prior to trial, and the fact that he was, indeed, convicted of manufacturing 100 plants or more of marijuana, a charge that was independent of his possession of the CN-Romarm rifle. In these circumstances, it simply cannot be said that the allegedly fabricated evidence (the alterations made to the rifle prior to trial) 'caused' his arrest or prosecution, as he certainly would have been arrested and prosecuted for his significant drug activities without it. . . . In summary, Friskey cannot show that he suffered from any deprivations of his liberty (or any other injury) as a result of the alleged alterations to the CN-Romarm rifle, which he must do to succeed on a tort claim for fabrication of evidence. McDonough, 139 S.Ct. at 2156. Nor has Frisky pointed to any probative evidence suggesting that Muse is the individual who removed the scope and bi-pod from the CN-Romarm rifle prior to trial, much less that he 'knowingly fabricated' the CN-Romarm rifle before it was introduced into evidence at Friskey's trial. Rather, Friskey is left with only his own speculation and conclusory allegations, which are simply insufficient to withstand summary judgment. For all of these reasons, Muse is entitled to summary judgment on Friskey's fabrication of evidence claim.") Pippin v. City of Reynoldsburg, No. 2:17-CV-598, 2019 WL 4738014, at *6-7 (S.D. Ohio Sept. 27, 2019) ("Nothing in the logic of McDonough is necessarily limited to a deprivation of liberty claim and therefore this Court finds the analogy applies to Plaintiff's claim for unconstitutional taking of property. By the logic in McDonough, Plaintiff's claim accrued when the prosecutor entered the nolle prosequi in December 2016. His Complaint, filed seven months later, was therefore timely. On the face of the Complaint, this Court cannot rule out the possibility that Plaintiff's claim for unconstitutional taking of property would have been barred by Heck because a judgment in his favor would have undermined the then-valid conviction. . . .This Court concludes that, whether under the Fourth Amendment or under the Fifth Amendment, Plaintiff has properly stated a claim for relief, alleging that Defendants unconstitutionally seized or effected a taking of his personal property. This claim accrued when the proceedings against him terminated in his favor with the nolle prosequi. Therefore, his Complaint was timely filed. Defendants' Motions to Dismiss are denied. . . .Wallace concluded that 'the standard rule' is that a plaintiff's § 1983 claim accrues 'when the plaintiff has a complete and present cause of action.'. . Courts must first 'identify the specific constitutional right at issue.'. . In McDonough, the plaintiff's fabricated-evidence claim was understood to arise under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment. . . The McDonough court concluded that a plaintiff has a 'complete and present cause of action…only once the criminal proceedings against him terminated in his favor.'. . With McDonough as with Knick, this Court informed the parties at a telephonic status conference that the outcome of the case had the potential to be dispositive in this matter. . . In their supplemental brief filed after this Court resumed consideration of this matter, Defendants attempt to argue that McDonough does not apply to the instant matter because Plaintiff has not asserted a fabricated evidence claim. . . To the contrary, this Court finds Plaintiff has done exactly this, stating in his Amended Complaint that 'Mauger, alone and/or with others including Downard, caused false search warrants to be presented to judges…, executed search warrants he knew to be based on false information, including the Pippin search warrant…'. . . And because McDonough squarely addresses the statute of limitations in fabricated-evidence cases, this Court finds McDonough controls the analysis here.")

Seventh Circuit

Towne v. Donnelly, 44 F.4th 666, 671-74 (7th Cir. 2022) ("In the context of a First Amendment retaliation claim, we have held that, '[g]enerally, the statute of limitations clock begins to run ... immediately after the retaliatory act occurred,'. . . so long as the plaintiff 'knows or should know that his or her constitutional rights have been violated[.]' . . At least two circuits have held that this general accrual rule for First Amendment retaliation claims applies equally to First Amendment retaliatory prosecution claims and that, consequently, the cause of action typically accrues when the retaliatory charges are brought. . . At that point, a plaintiff can state a complete claim by alleging that (1) he participated in an activity protected by the First Amendment; (2) he suffered a harm—that is, the criminal charges—likely to deter future protected activity; and (3) the charges were motivated by retaliation. . . For a First Amendment retaliatory prosecution claim, the plaintiff also must plead a lack of probable cause supporting the charge. . . The district court correctly determined that Mr. Towne's First Amendment retaliatory prosecution claim accrued when he learned that the defendants indicted him on charges that he believed to be retaliatory. According to Mr. Towne's complaint, he learned of the unlawful charges in September 2017, when the indictment was issued by a state's attorney with whom he had a history of conflict and personal animosity. . . .In McDonough, the question before the Court was when the statute of limitations begins to run for a § 1983 action based upon allegations of fabricated evidence. The district court and the court of appeals had concluded that the limitations period 'began to run when the evidence was used against [the plaintiff].'. . The Supreme Court reached a different conclusion. Analogizing these claims to the tort of malicious prosecution, an element of which is a favorable termination of proceedings, the Supreme Court held that due process claims based on fabricated evidence do not accrue until the favorable termination of the underlying criminal proceedings. . . . Mr. Towne maintains that, for two reasons, McDonough supports the view that all First Amendment retaliatory prosecution claims do not accrue until the prosecution is favorably terminated. First, he contends that, like a due process claim based on fabricated evidence, a retaliatory prosecution claim is akin to the common-law tort of malicious prosecution and therefore also should include a favorable-termination requirement. Second, Mr. Towne asserts that the practical concerns supporting the decision in McDonough apply equally to First Amendment challenges to a state prosecution. We examine in turn each of these arguments. We are not convinced that a First Amendment retaliatory prosecution claim has the strong parallels to malicious prosecution that are present with a due process claim based on the fabrication of evidence. In comparing the evidence-fabrication claim to malicious prosecution, the Court drew upon its reasoning in Heck[.] . . In Heck, it had determined that the 'common-law cause of action for malicious prosecution provides the closest analogy' to a due process claim for destruction and fabrication of evidence because 'it permits damages for confinement imposed pursuant to legal process' and therefore necessarily impugns the entire legal process. . . The Court explained, '[t]he essentials of McDonough's claim are similar: His claim requires him to show that the criminal proceedings against him—and consequent deprivations of his liberty—were caused by Smith's malfeasance in fabricating evidence. At bottom, both claims challenge the integrity of criminal prosecutions undertaken "pursuant to legal process."'. . . Under established law, however, to bring a retaliatory prosecution claim under the First Amendment, a plaintiff need only plead and prove an absence of probable cause for the underlying charge. . . Thus, the plaintiff's allegations do not necessarily impugn or implicate the entire prosecution. Additionally, a plaintiff need not assert or establish that he was confined or deprived of liberty as a result of the charges. . . Indeed, in Gekas, we pointedly said that 'First Amendment retaliation claims and malicious prosecution claims are fundamentally different causes of action.'. . McDonough itself noted that 'the argument for adopting a favorable-termination requirement [is] weaker' in situations where there is not a 'liberty deprivation occasioned by the criminal proceedings themselves.'. . Mr. Towne sees things differently. He submits that in Hartman, the Supreme Court already has analogized First Amendment retaliatory prosecution claims to malicious prosecution and therefore set the groundwork for requiring favorable termination. We cannot accept this argument. In Hartman, the Supreme Court observed that it 'could debate whether the closer common-law analog to retaliatory prosecution is malicious prosecution (with its no-probable-cause element) or abuse of process (without it).'. . The Court declined to engage in that debate, however. Instead, it adopted a no-probable-cause requirement for retaliatory prosecution claims because these claims require that retaliation be the 'but-for cause' of the charge. . . To be sure, the events that led to the lawsuit in McDonough and those underlying Mr. Towne's claim are undeniably similar because the basis for both is a prosecution that is based on false evidence and not supported by probable cause. . . . There is, however, an important difference between Mr. Towne's claim and the one in McDonough: Mr. Towne claims a violation of the First Amendment. Such a claim—unlike an evidence-fabrication claim under the Due Process Clause—does not necessarily focus on the entire prosecution, and, in that respect, is not akin to malicious prosecution with its favorable-termination requirement. . . Mr. Towne also submits that the pragmatic concerns motivating the favorable-termination requirement in McDonough are equally present in the context of a First Amendment retaliatory prosecution claim. For instance, litigants who wish to challenge an ongoing prosecution as retaliatory 'could face an untenable choice between (1) letting their claims expire and (2) filing a civil suit against the very person who is in the midst of prosecuting them.'. . The latter choice involves undesirable risks of 'tipping his hand as to his defense strategy, undermining his privilege against self-incrimination, and taking on discovery obligations not required in the criminal context.'. . Because of these concerns, Mr. Towne maintains, a litigant should not be required to file his claim before the proceedings against him are completed in his favor. We agree with Mr. Towne that many of the practical concerns expressed in McDonough . . . apply also to First Amendment retaliatory prosecution claims that challenge ongoing state prosecutions. Nevertheless, we are not convinced that these interests justify extending the favorable-termination requirement to retaliatory prosecution claims arising under the First Amendment. Requiring a favorable termination in a First Amendment retaliatory prosecution claim because of these pragmatic concerns would narrow First Amendment protections. As the law now stands, a First Amendment claim accrues when a person is prosecuted without probable cause in retaliation for protected activity, even if evidence is later discovered to support the charge and lead to conviction. . . Perhaps for this reason, Mr. Towne points to no circuit that imposes such a favorable-termination requirement on retaliatory prosecution claims. On the other hand, as discussed earlier, several circuits have concluded that First Amendment retaliatory prosecution claims accrue when the retaliatory charges are brought. . . Further, if several of the concerns about parallel litigation become acute in a particular case, those concerns can be assuaged through the prudent use of stays and abstention. . . This practice is preferable to delayed accruals in situations like this one, where the action impugns an indictment as without probable cause but not necessarily the entire prosecution.")

Brown v. City of Chicago, No. 20-CV-03599, 2021 WL 6102980 (7th Cir. Dec. 22, 2021) (not reported) ("[W]e agree with the district court that Brown's Fourth Amendment claims—which relate to whether he was arrested and detained without probable cause—are untimely. There is a two-year statute of limitations for an Illinois-based § 1983 claim. . . And Brown's claims accrued when his pretrial detention ended, decades before his complaint in 2020. See Manuel v. City of Joliet, Ill., 903 F.3d 667, 669–670 (7th Cir. 2018) (Fourth Amendment claim of unlawful pretrial detention accrues when detention ends), enforcing 137 S. Ct. 911, 920–22 (2017). With respect to Brown's claim of unlawful posttrial detention, however, we agree with Brown that the dismissal here was too hasty. In his amended complaint, Brown directly attacks the procedure and evidence used to convict him and send him to prison. According to the complaint, he was convicted and imprisoned because police presented a 'false and incomplete version of events to prosecutors,' wrote false reports, and gave false statements and testimony, while the prosecutors knew what the police were doing and, rather than intervening, happily played along. This set of allegations is properly characterized as a Due Process claim because, after a criminal conviction, 'the Fourth Amendment drops out,' and a challenge to the conviction or ensuing incarceration arises under the Due Process Clause. Manuel v. City of Joliet, Ill., 137 S. Ct. at 920 n.8; see also Lewis v. City of Chicago, 914 F.3d 472, 480 (7th Cir. 2019). This type of claim did not accrue along with the Fourth Amendment challenge to the arrest and pretrial detention. Under the Supreme Court's decisions in Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994), and McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149 (2019), Brown could not pursue a § 1983 claim about his prosecution while his convictions remained valid because, if he succeeded, the integrity of the convictions would necessarily be called in to doubt. As Brown argues, his Due Process claim was barred until his convictions were vacated based on later developments in the law. Contrary to the district court's ruling, moreover, our decision in Savory v. Cannon, 947 F.3d 409 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc), makes clear that a federal claim's similarity to the state-law tort of malicious prosecution is not fatal. The plaintiff in Savory was pardoned after spending 30 years in prison; he then brought § 1983 claims that 'strongly resemble[d] the common law tort of malicious prosecution.'. . We concluded that, until his pardon, those claims—which were premised on harms the plaintiff suffered after his criminal conviction—were barred by Heck . . . Brown, too, challenges not just his arrest but his postconviction detention. And like the plaintiff in Savory, and for that matter in Heck, he therefore raises cognizable federal claims.")

Sanders v. St. Joseph County, Indiana, 806 F. App'x 481, ___ & n.2 (7th Cir. 2020) ("Under the Supreme Court's decisions in Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994), and Edwards v. Balisok, 520 U.S. 641 (1997), Sanders could not have used § 1983 to contest his custody while it was ongoing. So his claim of unlawful detention accrued, at the earliest, when he was released from jail.[2] See Manuel, 903 F.3d at 670; Tobey v. Chibucos, 890 F.3d 634, 645 (7th Cir. 2018). . . . If, however, a conclusion that Sanders's confinement was unconstitutional would imply the invalidity of an ongoing criminal proceeding or a prior criminal conviction, then Heck would continue to bar Sanders's claim after his release and until either those proceedings terminated in his favor or the conviction was vacated. See McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149 (2019); Savory v. Cannon, 947 F.3d 409, 414 (7th Cir. 2020).")

Camm v. Faith, 937 F.3d 1096, 1110-11 & n.3 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Our conclusion that the Brady claim may proceed in part requires us to address the defendants' argument that the claim is barred by the statute of limitations. Unlike the Fourth Amendment limitations issue, the defendants preserved an untimeliness defense below in opposition to the Brady claim. Nonetheless, it's a nonstarter under circuit precedent. In Johnson v. Dossey, 515 F.3d 778, 782 (7th Cir. 2008), we held that a similar Brady claim accrued when the defendant was finally acquitted. We relied heavily on the Supreme Court's decision in Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477, 114 S.Ct. 2364, 129 L.Ed.2d 383 (1994), which bars a criminal defendant from seeking damages for an allegedly unlawful conviction unless and until the criminal proceedings have terminated in his favor. . . .The Supreme Court recently reached the same conclusion in a closely related context. In McDonough v. Smith, —— U.S. ——, 139 S. Ct. 2149, 204 L.Ed.2d 506 (2019), a special prosecutor was accused of fabricating evidence and using it against a criminal defendant at two trials. The first ended in a mistrial; the second ended with an acquittal. The Court held that the limitations period for a claim of that nature does not begin to run until the criminal proceedings against the defendant have terminated in his favor with a final acquittal. . . To be clear, no Brady claims were at issue, and the Court emphasized that it was not expressing any opinion about the accrual of anything but the claim before it. . . But much of the Court's reasoning lends support to what we held in Johnson. Most importantly, the Court emphasized Heck's 'pragmatic concerns with avoiding parallel criminal and civil litigation over the same subject matter and the related possibility of conflicting civil and criminal judgments.'. . In the same vein, the Court stressed that '[t]here is not a complete and present cause of action to bring a fabricated-evidence challenge to criminal proceedings while those criminal proceedings are ongoing.'. . . Both considerations have just as much force in the Brady context. We therefore reiterate once more that the statute of limitations for a Brady claim does not accrue until the criminal proceedings terminate in the defendant's favor. Here, as in Johnson, the proceedings did not terminate until Camm was finally acquitted. He filed his complaint just one year after that, so his Brady claim is timely.")

In re: Watts Coordinated Pretrial Proceedings, No. 19-CV-1717, 2022 WL 9468253, at *9 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 14, 2022) ("A fair reading of Seventh Circuit fabricated evidence jurisprudence, from Whitlock to Patrick, reveals that the due process violation occurs once the material fabricated evidence is introduced 'in some way'—or more precisely, 'in his criminal case'—that results in the criminal defendant's conviction and ultimately deprives him of his liberty. . . One such way, but not the only way, is through a conviction following a trial. Another way is when the fabricated evidence is used to coerce the defendant to plead guilty. Any reading to the contrary would reward egregious deliberate misconduct from state actors by making conviction following trial the only pathway to vindicate constitutional violations. The Court can discern no cogent basis for such a distinction. Therefore, the Court does not find Defendants' argument persuasive.")

Stephenson v. City of Chicago, No. 21 C 0338, 2022 WL 1556380, at *2–3 (N.D. Ill. May 17, 2022) ("Stephenson's argument involves characterizing his claim as more than a straight-forward pretrial detention claim because he also alleges that defendant officers fabricated a story that he illegally possessed a firearm in order to arrest and later prosecute him. In McDonough, the Supreme Court determined that Heck's favorable termination requirement applied not only to plaintiffs who have been convicted, but also to plaintiffs who were subject to ongoing criminal proceedings. See McDonough, 139 S.Ct. at 2154-57; Savory v. Cannon, 947 F.3d 409, 417 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc). In doing so, the Supreme Court reasoned that plaintiffs who are subject to ongoing criminal proceedings do not have a 'complete and present cause of action' for accrual purposes until the criminal proceedings have ended in plaintiffs' favor. . . Under Stephenson's allegations that the defendant officers used fabricated evidence to arrest and prosecute him, Heck supplies the rule for accrual, and thus Stephenson's Fourth Amendment and conspiracy claims are timely because they accrued on the favorable termination date, January 29, 2020. . . Simply put, 'given the nature of his Fourth Amendment claim, a finding that [Stephenson's] detention in jail was unconstitutional would imply the invalidity of the charges brought against him, Heck barred that claim until those charges were dismissed.' Culp v. Flores, 454 F.Supp.3d 764, 769 (N.D. Ill. 2020) (Feinerman, J.).")

Walker v. City of Chicago, No. 1:21-CV-02648, 2022 WL 971891, at *3–4 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 31, 2022) ("Walker misapplies McDonough and Heck to his false-arrest claim. Unlike in McDonough, a false-arrest claim is brought under the Fourth Amendment—not the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. The nature of the claim is a key difference: the Fourth Amendment prohibits unreasonable seizures—like false arrests—and measures the reasonableness of the search exactly at the time of the seizure. There either is probable cause—or there is not—right at the time of the seizure. . . How the false arrest plays a role in the later prosecution (if there even is one) does not matter; indeed, the actual arrest might not play a role at all in a later prosecution, particularly if law enforcement gathers and relies on other evidence. In contrast, a fabricated-evidence claim always relies on the use of the fabricated evidence in a criminal prosecution, and is thus akin, as McDonough says, to the common law tort of malicious prosecution. . . This distinction is 'significant enough to warrant dissimilar treatment under Heck.'. . Because Fourth Amendment claims 'merely anticipate convictions,' they do not 'represent the same threat to an existing prosecution as the due process case in McDonough ....'. . . As a result, Walker's claim 'should accrue when the Fourth Amendment wrong ends.'. . Put another way, the false-arrest claim in late October 2015 when Walker's arrest ended and legal process began. Walker points to two other cases to support his accrual argument: Jackson v. City of Chicago, 2021 WL 3883111 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 31, 2021), and Culp v. Flores, 454 F. Supp. 3d 764 (N.D. Ill. 2020). Both cases are distinguishable from Walker's. In Jackson, the district court concluded that the plaintiff's conviction was 'inextricably tied up' in his Fourth Amendment false-arrest claim, . . . so the plaintiff's claim did not accrue until the criminal proceedings 'were fully terminated.'. . Citing Culp, the court in Jackson reasoned that the police officers in that case based the arrest on 'false allegations, testimony[,] and fabricated police reports.'. . Culp, however, pre-dates the Seventh Circuit's decision in Smith. And because McDonough explicitly left intact Wallace's holding 'that a Fourth Amendment claim is not barred by Heck even if it could possibly affect a future prosecution,'. . . the Court must continue to apply Wallace to false-arrest claims. Walker's false-arrest claim is dismissed on limitations grounds. . . . [A]n evidence-suppression claim under Brady v. Maryland. . . is not the same as an evidence-fabrication claim. . . As the Seventh Circuit explained in Avery, a Brady disclosure allows the accused to use the exculpatory evidence at trial so that 'the jury has a fair opportunity to find the truth[.]'. . Fabricated evidence, on the other hand, 'will never help a jury perform its essential truth-seeking function,' and thus inherently violates the defendant's right to due process. . . What's more, the requisite elements are different for each claim. To win a Brady claim, 'a plaintiff must demonstrate that the evidence in question was favorable to him, the police suppressed the favorable evidence, and prejudice ensued because the suppressed evidence was material.'. . But to prove an evidence-fabrication claim, a plaintiff must demonstrate that 'the defendant officers created evidence that they knew to be false' and that 'the evidence was used in some way to deprive [him] of liberty.'. . To be sure, Walker could have more clearly pleaded the evidence-fabrication claim in the Complaint or at least explained it more clearly in his response brief. A claim for pretrial detention based on fabricated evidence, for example, stems from the Fourth Amendment's right to be free from seizure without probable cause. . . This is different from the use of false evidence to convict someone, which comprises a violation of the right to a fair trial under the Due Process Clause. . . Although Walker was eventually convicted, it is unclear if he spent any time in pretrial detention. In any event, Walker did spend time in prison pursuant to the conviction and sentence, so the evidence-fabrication claim remains viable for the alleged violation of due process that caused his imprisonment.")

Cusick v. Gualandri, No. 20-CV-06017, 2021 WL 5447041, at *5–6 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 22, 2021) ("Count II alleges unlawful pretrial detention in violation of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. In Lewis v. City of Chicago, 914 F.3d 472, 475, 478 (7th Cir. 2019), the Seventh Circuit relied on Manuel . . . to hold that the 'Fourth Amendment, not the Due Process Clause, governs a claim for wrongful pretrial detention.'. . Cusick acknowledges Lewis but argues that the Supreme Court's decision in McDonough has upset that precedent. In McDonough, the Court assumed without deciding that pretrial confinement can serve as a deprivation of liberty under the Due Process Clause. . . The Court explicitly declined to offer an opinion on this assumption, limiting itself to the statute of limitations issue on which it had granted certiorari. . . Since McDonough, the Seventh Circuit has affirmed its holding in Lewis without necessarily requiring an analysis of McDonough. . .This Court acknowledges the uncertain viability of a Fourteenth Amendment unlawful detention claim in this Circuit, and that district courts here are divided about how to handle these claims. However this Court agrees with other district courts that have declined to dismiss on the pleadings a Fourteenth Amendment unlawful detention claim brought in conjunction with a Fourth Amendment claim. . . . Considering the allegations in this case and having reviewed the parties' briefs and the case authority, the Court believes the better course in this case is to allow the claims to proceed as pled. The requests to dismiss the Fourteenth Amendment claim in Count II is denied. . . . Cusick filed this lawsuit on October 8, 2020. He contends that his claim accrued on December 13, 2019, when he was acquitted at trial. This would put him comfortably within the statute of limitations. The defendants, meanwhile, assert that the clock started running on March 3, 2017, when Cusick posted bond and was released from pretrial detention. In that case, Cusick's claim would be untimely. Defendants argue that the Seventh Circuit's recent decision in Smith, 3 F.4th 332 controls. Smith was arrested in 2013, detained for seven months, released on bond in 2014, and acquitted in 2016. He filed suit in 2018, bringing an unlawful pretrial detention claim. . . Smith alleged that 'the officers violated § 1983 by using fabricated evidence to place him in custody in violation of the Fourth Amendment.'. . The Seventh Circuit held that his claim accrued upon his release from custody and therefore was untimely. . . The Court identified the 'contours of the constitutional right' of Smith's claim—the 'wrong…is the detention rather than the existence of criminal charges.'. . Smith distinguished McDonough, . . .which held that a § 1983 fabrication of evidence claim accrued upon acquittal. Smith's claim could 'be separated from his overall prosecution'; indeed the allegedly fabricated evidence in his case 'was not used at his trial, and nothing in his complaint suggests that it was.'. . The Seventh Circuit explained that '[a] due process claim attacks the whole prosecution, while the Fourth Amendment claim—whether about a search, arrest, or pretrial detention—can sometimes be severed from the rest of the prosecution.'. . Smith is easily distinguishable from the allegations in the present case. Count II 'attacks the whole prosecution'. Unlike in Smith, where Plaintiff alleged only that officers used fabricated evidence to place him in custody, Cusick alleges that Defendants fabricated evidence and presented false information to the grand jury to obtain an indictment and at his trial to convict him. . . In Savory v. Cannon, 2021 WL 1209129, at *6 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 31, 2021), on remand from the Seventh Circuit, the court explained that 'McDonough makes clear that a plaintiff must wait until the favorable termination of the criminal proceedings to bring a § 1983 claim that, if successful, would be incompatible with his guilt.' The plaintiff in Savory challenged the integrity of the criminal prosecution itself, and the court found his Fourth Amendment claim timely because it did not accrue until his pardon by the Governor—9 years after his release from prison. . . Here, a fair reading of the complaint shows Cusick challenges the integrity of the whole prosecution. His claim did not accrue until he was acquitted on December 13, 2019.")

Ochoa v. Lopez, No. 20-CV-02977, 2021 WL 4439426, at *5-8 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 28, 2021) ("Johnson predates McDonough and several judges in this District have questioned its continued viability. [collecting cases] Instead of distinguishing Johnson, Ochoa insists that Brown, 2019 WL 4694685, at *1, a post-Johnson case is highly instructive. . . . In reviewing Ochoa's claims, the Court finds that the above-referenced cases, especially Brown, support Ochoa's position. True, as Officer Defendants claim, unlike the plaintiffs in some of these cases, Ochoa was never acquitted . . . , but acquittal is not the sine qua none of deferred accrual under Heck, and making such a nuanced distinction ignores Supreme Court and Seventh Circuit precedent. Officer Defendants invite the Court to ignore McDonough and apply Wallace, . . . a pre-McDonough case, instead. . . . The Court declines the invitation. It cannot be disputed that the principles that emanate from McDonough and its Seventh Circuit progeny stand for the proposition that a criminal defendant/Section 1983 plaintiff cannot initiate certain Section 1983 constitutional claims which call into question the validity of his conviction until his criminal proceedings are over. Notably, but perhaps not surprisingly, Officer Defendants' motion fails to mention McDonough or Savory. The Court finds that Ochoa's Section 1983 compelled self-incrimination claim, which necessarily implicated the validity of his conviction, did not begin to accrue until October 23, 2019, when the State of Illinois dismissed all charges against him. . . Accordingly, his self-incrimination claim is timely. . . . Officer Defendants argue that Ochoa's Fourth Amendment claim for wrongful pre-trial detention is also time-barred. . . Ochoa counters that his claim is not time-barred, as a Fourth Amendment claim for wrongful pretrial detention accrues when the wrongful conviction ends. . . The Court agrees. In Manuel II . . . on remand, the Seventh Circuit stated that under the Fourth Amendment, 'there is a constitutional right not to be held in custody without probable cause. Because the wrong is the detention rather than the existence of criminal charges, the period of limitations also should depend on the dates of the detention.'. . The court further rationalized its holding based on the principle that a claim cannot accrue until the potential plaintiff is entitled to sue, but the detention itself forbids a suit for damages contesting that detention's validity. Based on this reasoning, the court held that the claim accrued when detention ends. . . However, as Officer Defendants point out, the Fourth Amendment is no longer a basis for relief for post-conviction detention once a defendant is convicted of a criminal offense. . . Once a defendant is convicted, if he challenges the sufficiency of the evidence to support his conviction and any ensuing incarceration, he must do so under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . Yet, Officer Defendants concede that Ochoa could proceed with his Fourth Amendment claim of prolonged pretrial detention for the period between when his conviction was reversed on February 15, 2017 . . . and when he was released on October 23, 2019. . . . The Court disagrees with Officer Defendants that Ochoa has not specifically pled this claim, as the time period of February 25, 2017 through October 23, 2019 is accounted for in Count IV. For the time period prior to February 15, 2017, during Ochoa's post-conviction detention and before the Illinois Appellate Court reversed his second conviction, Ochoa still has a valid claim under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Missing from Officer Defendants' Reply is any authority that holds that the statute of limitations has expired for Ochoa's claim as it relates to this time period. Officer Defendants suggest that the clock started ticking when Ochoa's pretrial detention ended, and his post-trial custody began. But, as the court in Hill v. Cook Cnty. noted, the Seventh Circuit has rejected this approach because it would essentially leave Ochoa out of luck. . . . A criminal defendant cannot use Section 1983 to contest his custody while it is ongoing, and a claim of unlawful detention can only accrue once he is released from jail. . . At no point was Ochoa released from custody following his initial arrest in 2002 until his release in 2019. Because Ochoa was not released from custody until October 23, 2019 . . . , his Fourth Amendment and Fourteenth Amendment claims did not begin to accrue until that date. Again, because Ochoa filed his complaint on May 19, 2020, less than a year after October 23, 2019, Count IV is not time-barred by the statute of limitations.")

Jackson v. City of Chicago, No. 20 C 5886, 2021 WL 3883111, at *3–5 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 31, 2021) ("The Seventh Circuit recently observed that Manuel II does not, on its own, answer the question of whether a favorable termination of criminal proceedings is necessary for a statute of limitations to accrue on a Fourth Amendment Claim. See Smith v. City of Chi., 3 F.4th 332, 340 (7th Cir. 2021) (noting that in Manuel II, by the time the plaintiff was released there was no prosecution his Section 1983 suit could impugn and therefore nothing that could bring the Heck rule into play). In Smith, the court explicitly held that 'even when charges remain outstanding, a Fourth Amendment claim for unlawful pretrial detention accrues upon the plaintiff's release from detention, and not upon the favorable termination of the charges against the plaintiff.'. . Smith noted the distinction between a due process claim and a Fourth Amendment claim: '[a] due process claim attacks the whole prosecution, while the Fourth Amendment claim—whether about a search, arrest, or pretrial detention—can sometimes be severed from the rest of the prosecution.'. .'At bottom, the court said, 'the Court in McDonough did not explicitly overrule Wallace's holding that a Fourth Amendment claim is not barred by Heck even if it could possibly affect a future prosecution. We will not do so, either.'. . In the Court's view, however, Smith is distinguishable on its facts and does not dictate the result in this case. In Smith, the Seventh Circuit pointed out the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim could be separated from the overall prosecution. . . The allegedly fabricated evidence in the plaintiff's case was not used at his trial, and therefore 'Heck would not require a court to bar Smith's claim if he had brought it immediately upon his release on bond.'. . In contrast, Jackson's conviction is inextricably tied up in his Fourth Amendment claim. The Court finds persuasive Judge Feinerman's analysis in Culp v. Flores, 454 F. Supp. 3d 764 (N.D. Ill. 2020). In Culp, the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim alleged that the plaintiff committed no crime, that the defendants did not have any reason to believe the plaintiff violated any law, and that the defendants 'based the arrest, detention and/or prosecution of [the plaintiff] on their false allegations, testimony and fabricated police reports.'. . These allegations are akin to those presented in this case. Citing Savory v. Cannon, 947 F.3d 409 (7th Cir. 2020), and Sanders v. St. Joseph Cnty., 806 F. App'x 401 (7th Cir. 2020), Judge

Feinerman concluded that success on the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim 'would be incompatible with a conviction on the charges for which Culp was arrested, detained, and prosecuted,' and therefore 'there is no logical way to reconcile the claim with a valid conviction.'. . . So too, here. Any legal challenge to Jackson's Fourth Amendment claim 'would have automatically implicated the validity of [Jackson's] criminal convictions because both injuries are premised on the same set of facts.'. . Accordingly, the statute of limitations on Jackson's Fourth Amendment claim did not begin to run until the criminal proceedings terminated in his favor. But when did that occur in this case? Defendants advocate for September 20, 2018, the date Jackson's motion for a new trial was granted following an appeal process. Jackson, on the other hand, asserts his claim accrued on October 18, 2018, the date the circuit court issued a disposition of nolle prosequi. The Court agrees with Jackson. . . . In the Court's view, prevailing on a motion for a new trial does not complete the story. Jackson was still subject to pending charges; the case against him was not conclusively terminated. Accordingly, Jackson's claim did not accrue until the entry of the nolle prosequi disposition, at which time the criminal proceedings were fully terminated. . . Therefore, the Officer Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Count I is denied. . . . The parties do not appear to dispute that the statute of limitations on Jackson's Due Process claim began to run at the time the criminal proceedings were terminated in Jackson's favor. Given the Court's conclusion regarding the nolle prosequi disposition, the Officer Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Count II is also denied.")

Fulton v. Bartik, No. 20 C 3118, 2021 WL 2712060, at *9 (N.D. Ill. July 1, 2021) ("Here, a judgment for plaintiffs on the unlawful pretrial detention claim would have undermined the validity of their convictions because both their pretrial detention and convictions were based on the same allegedly fabricated evidence. Therefore, a judgment in plaintiffs' favor on the unlawful pretrial detention claims 'directly challenges—and thus necessarily threatens to impugn—the prosecution itself.' McDonough, 139 S. Ct. at 2159 (citing Heck, 512 U.S. at 486– 487). 'There is no logical way to reconcile th[e] claim[ ] with a valid conviction.' Savory, 947 F.3d at 417. While City Defendants urge this court to follow Brown v. City of Chicago, No. 18 C 7064, 2019 WL 4694685, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 8, 2019), in which the court concluded that McDonough did not save a plaintiff's unlawful detention claim, that decision predated Savory and Sanders and did not have the benefit of their guidance on whether an unlawful pretrial detention claim can operate as a collateral attack on a criminal conviction. City Defendants offer no argument that success on this claim does not run into Heck. Instead, they recast the claim as 'essentially a false arrest claim' . . . but that is not correct. . . Count III stands.")

Camm v. Clemons, No. 4:14-cv-00123-TWP-DML, 2021 WL 2661626, at *7-8 (S.D. Ind. June 29, 2021) ("In this case, Camm's Fourth Amendment claim for wrongful detention necessarily implies the invalidity of his conviction, so his claim accrued when he obtained a favorable termination of the underlying criminal proceedings against him. This follows the direction from the Supreme Court in McDonough and Heck and is consistent with the Seventh Circuit's recent decision in Savory. Relying on language from the Supreme Court's decision in Heck, the Defendants contend that Camm obtained a favorable resolution when his first criminal conviction was reversed on direct appeal on August 10, 2004. While the reversal by the Indiana Court of Appeals was a favorable decision, it was not a favorable termination of the criminal proceedings against Camm. When reversing the first conviction, the Indiana Court of Appeals explicitly noted that Camm was subject to being retried, and the State continued to pursue the criminal charges against him all the way through two more trials. This Court agrees with the district court in Savory: '[b]ecause the State elected to re-try [the plaintiff] after the state appellate court's [ ] reversal of the convictions entered at his first trial, [the plaintiff] remained fully subject to pending criminal charges. Those are precisely the circumstances in which, according to McDonough, a § 1983 claim has not yet accrued.'. . On October 24, 2013, Camm was acquitted of all the criminal charges against him, and he was released from custody. It was at that point that Camm obtained a favorable termination of the underlying criminal proceedings against him. Therefore, Camm's Fourth Amendment claim for wrongful arrest and detention accrued on October 24, 2013, and he brought the claim one year later on October 24, 2014. Thus, Camm's Fourth Amendment claim was timely filed and is not barred by the statute of limitations. The Defendants' Joint Motion for Partial Summary Judgment based on the statute of limitations argument is denied.")

Cruz v. City of Chicago, No. 20-CV-250, 2021 WL 2645558, at *10 (N.D. Ill. June 28, 2021) ("After McDonough, the Seventh Circuit had the chance to abandon its ruling in Lewis. But instead of overturning Lewis, the Court of Appeals doubled down. In Camm v. Faith, 937 F.3d 1096, 1105 (7th Cir. 2019), the Seventh Circuit reiterated that the Fourth Amendment, not the Due Process Clause, governs a claim about an unlawful pretrial detention. . . .The same result applies here. Micaela Cruz invokes both the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments, but the claim 'is really one for wrongful arrest and detention in violation of the Fourth Amendment.'. . The Fourteenth Amendment does not govern unlawful pretrial detention claims, so Count II is dismissed.")

Grayer v. City of Chicago, No. 20-CV-00157, 2021 WL 2433661, at *1-3 (N.D. Ill. June 15, 2021) ("No party disputes that the Fourth Amendment applies to claims arising from pretrial detention. But the Fourteenth Amendment comes into play only for claims that arise following a criminal conviction. Because Plaintiffs were never convicted of a crime, the Fourteenth Amendment plays no permissible role in Plaintiffs' complaint. Accordingly, Defendants' partial motion to dismiss is granted. . . . Plaintiffs allege they were subjected to pretrial detention without probable cause in violation of their Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. . . No party disputes that a Section 1983 claim alleging wrongful pretrial detention arises under the Fourth Amendment. . . But the question remains: can a challenge to pre-trial incarceration also arise under the Fourteenth Amendment? In short, the answer is no. . . . In the wake of Manuel I and II, the Seventh Circuit has further clarified that the pre/post-conviction line permits no equivocation: pretrial claims arise under the Fourth Amendment, and post-conviction claims arise under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . Despite this precedent, Plaintiffs argue that Lewis is contrary to the Supreme Court's decision in McDonough v. Smith[.] . . This Court respectfully disagrees. Contrary to Plaintiffs' suggestion, McDonough did not hold that 'unlawful pretrial detention can also sound in the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . McDonough, rather, addressed when the statute of limitations for a fabricated evidence claim begins to run. . . Acknowledging that 'the Second Circuit treated [the plaintiff's claim] as arising under the Due Process Clause,' the Supreme Court pointedly noted that '[w]e assume without deciding that the Second Circuit's articulations of the right at issue and its contours are sound, having not granted certiorari to resolve those separate questions.'. . In view of this qualification, this Court cannot find that Lewis—which directly applied Manuel I—and later on-point Seventh Circuit cases were abrogated by implication through McDonough. . . Moreover, this conclusion is bolstered by the Seventh Circuit's post-McDonough application of Manuel I and Lewis in Kuri and Young—neither of which mention McDonough. . . Plaintiffs attempt to avoid the effect of Lewis and related decisions by distinguishing, for claim-accrual purposes, between allegations of fabricated evidence (e.g., McDonough) and those involving unlawful detention (e.g., Lewis and Manuel I). . . This distinction does not make a difference—at least not in this case. Although Plaintiffs cite some decisions explaining that a later date of accrual should apply to fabrication of evidence claims, . . . at issue here is the legal basis of the claimed right of action, not the marker for when that action accrues. And on that score, the law is against Plaintiffs: Lewis rejected any distinction between pretrial fabrication of evidence claims and those based on wrongful pretrial detention. Lewis, 914 F.3d at 479 ("all § 1983 claims for wrongful pretrial detention— whether based on fabricated evidence or some other defect—sound in the Fourth Amendment"). . . Because that rule is the controlling law in this circuit, Plaintiffs' reliance upon the Fourteenth Amendment is foreclosed.")

Weston v. City of Chicago, No. 20 C 6189, 2021 WL 2156459, at *5 (N.D. Ill. May 27, 2021) ("The Seventh Circuit did not specifically address the accrual of the coerced-confession due process claim, and on remand in Savory, the defendants maintained that the claim was untimely because it accrued at the time of the coerced confession. The district court explained that the argument 'presents the difficult question whether Moore ...survived McDonough, which holds that the Heck bar applies when a claim, as pleaded, would necessarily imply the invalidity of criminal proceedings or a conviction.'. . The court saw no reason to 'run to ground' this challenge to the due process claim at the pleading stage because 'discovery on the Fourteenth Amendment coerced confession claim will be no broader than discovery on the Fifth Amendment claim' asserting a violation of the plaintiff's self-incrimination privilege. . . Therefore, it denied the motion to dismiss, without prejudice to renewal at summary judgment. . . This case is similar to Savory, and the Court is inclined to follow the same approach that the district court followed on remand there. It will not significantly change the scope of discovery in this case to put off this 'difficult question,' given that plaintiff has raised a similar coerced-confession claim under the Fifth Amendment. And putting the question off may prove to simplify it, when it is considered in the light of a full factual record and any intervening authority that might arise in the interim. Defendants' motion is denied as to the due process coerced-confession claim, without prejudice to renewing the argument at summary judgment.")

Jordan v. City of Chicago, No. 20-CV-4012, 2021 WL 1962385, at *3–4 (N.D. Ill. May 17, 2021) ("Defendants rely on a dictum in Knox v. Curtis, 771 F. App'x 656, 658 (7th Cir. 2019), for the proposition that a Fourth Amendment claim based on fabrication of evidence accrues when a person is released from custody or convicted. . . This court finds the Knox dictum unpersuasive in light of the Supreme Court's accrual analysis in McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149 (2019), and the Seventh Circuit's en banc accrual analysis in Savory v. Cannon, 947 F.3d 409 (7th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 251 (2020). The Supreme Court analyzed a very similar accrual question in McDonough, except that the plaintiff brought a claim under the due process clause rather than the Fourth Amendment. The Court held that '[t]he statute of limitations for a fabricated-evidence claim...does not begin to run until the criminal proceedings against the defendant (i.e., the § 1983 plaintiff) have terminated in his favor.'. . The Seventh Circuit similarly held in Savory, 947 F.3d at 418, that the plaintiff's fabricated evidence claim under the due process clause accrued not when he was released from custody, but when the then-governor of Illinois later pardoned him. The Seventh Circuit expressly declined to decide when the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim accrued and left the question for the district court on remand. . . Although McDonough and Savory considered when a due process claim accrued, the reasoning of both cases parallels the Seventh Circuit's analysis of the accrual date of the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim in Manuel II. As the Manuel II court explained, under ordinary accrual principles 'a claim does not accrue before it is possible to sue on it.'. . . In both McDonough and Savory, the court held that the plaintiff's claim accrued when the plaintiff was released and Heck ceased to bar his § 1983 civil suit. . . . Significantly, the Supreme Court did not phrase the accrual rule it adopted in McDonough in terms of the source of the constitutional right the plaintiff invoked. The Court's opinion set out an accrual rule for 'fabricated-evidence claim[s].'. . As the district court recognized on remand in Savory, a § 1983 suit alleging evidence fabrication calls the validity of the criminal charges into question and triggers the Heck bar—regardless of whether the claim is brought under the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment. . . This court therefore holds that under Manuel II, a Fourth Amendment evidence fabrication claim accrues when (1) the defendant is released from custody, and (2) Heck no longer bars the plaintiff's § 1983 claim. With favorable inferences, Jordan alleges that his Fourth Amendment pretrial detention claim would have called the validity of his conviction into question, making it Heck-barred until the prosecutor dismissed the charges against him and he was released in December 2019. . . Because Jordan filed his complaint within two years of that date, his Fourth Amendment pretrial detention claim is timely.") Savory v. Cannon, 532 F.Supp.3d 628, ___ (N.D. Ill. 2021) ("Before proceeding, the court pauses to describe what the Seventh Circuit did and did not resolve regarding the various limitations issues implicated by Savory's claims. In its 2017 dismissal order, this court held, based on the Seventh Circuit's then-prevailing understanding of the Heck doctrine, that Savory's claims accrued in December 2011, when he was released from state custody upon the termination of his parole. . . Because the limitations period for § 1983 claims in Illinois is two years, . . . this court dismissed Savory's § 1983 claims—which he did not file until January 11, 2017—as time-barred. . . The Seventh Circuit reversed, ruling that 'a § 1983 cause of action for damages attributable to an unconstitutional conviction or sentence does not accrue until the conviction or sentence has been invalidated.'. . Thus, as a general matter, Savory's claims accrued only when the Governor pardoned him on January 12, 2015, just under two years before he filed suit. . . The 'as a general matter' hedge in the preceding sentence reflects that the Seventh Circuit expressly left open for this court's consideration three questions that might possibly result in a different accrual date for some of Savory's claims. The first question concerns when Count III—which, as noted, alleges malicious prosecution and wrongful pretrial detention under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments—accrued insofar as it states an otherwise viable cause of action. . . As the Seventh Circuit observed, . . . answering that question requires attention to Manuel v. City of Joliet, 137 S. Ct. 911 (2017), and its own opinion on remand from that decision, Manuel v. City of Joliet, 903 F.3d 667 (7th Cir. 2018). The second question concerns whether there are two accrual dates for Savory's claims—one in April 1980, when the state appellate court reversed Savory's convictions at his first trial, and the other in January 2015, when the Governor pardoned him for the convictions at his second trial—or just one accrual date, the day of the pardon. . . [A]nswering that question requires consideration of whether McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149 (2019), overruled in pertinent part Johnson v. Winstead, 900 F.3d 428 (7th Cir. 2018). The third question, related to the first, is whether 'McDonough dictates—contrary to [the Seventh Circuit's] 2018 Manuel opinion—that [Savory's] claim for unlawful detention after legal process accrued at the same time as all of his other claims, specifically at the time of his pardon.'. . . McDonough held that Heck barred a plaintiff whose first trial ended in a mistrial, and who was then retried and acquitted, from bringing a fabricated evidence claim until 'the underlying criminal proceedings ha[d] resolved in [his] favor,' meaning until his acquittal—which in turn means that the claim did not accrue until that time. . . To support its holding, the Supreme Court invoked 'pragmatic concerns with avoiding parallel criminal and civil litigation over the same subject matter and the related possibility of conflicting civil and criminal judgments.'. . The Court explained that the contrary result would impose upon '[a] significant number of criminal defendants … an untenable choice between (1) letting their claims expire and (2) filing a civil suit against the very person who is in the midst of prosecuting them,' adding that 'the parallel civil litigation that would result if plaintiffs chose the second option would run counter to core principles of federalism, comity, consistency, and judicial economy.'. .The dual-accrual rule of Johnson cannot be reconciled with the Supreme Court's analysis in McDonough, at least under the circumstances of this case. Because the State elected to re-try him after the state appellate court's April 1980 reversal of the convictions entered at his first trial, Savory remained fully subject to pending criminal charges. Those are precisely the circumstances in which, according to McDonough, a § 1983 claim has not yet accrued— circumstances where, if the claim had accrued in April 1980, Savory would have been compelled to bring parallel civil litigation involving the facts of his criminal case against the very persons who were the moving force behind his continued prosecution, and where there would have been a risk of conflicting judgments if Savory prevailed in the civil case and the State prevailed in the criminal case. . . . It follows that Savory's Fifth Amendment coerced confession claim accrued only once, when he received his pardon, because only then did the criminal proceedings fully resolve in his favor. In sum, Savory's Fifth Amendment coerced confession claim is timely in its entirety, having been filed within two years of his pardon that, after nearly four decades, terminated the criminal proceedings in his favor. . . . Defendants correctly contend that no malicious prosecution claim may be grounded in the federal constitution or pursued under § 1983. . . As the Seventh Circuit has made clear, 'when a plaintiff alleges that officials held him in custody before trial without justification, "[m]alicious prosecution is the wrong characterization. There is only a Fourth Amendment claim—the absence of probable cause that would justify the detention."'. . The § 1983 malicious prosecution claim accordingly is dismissed with prejudice. As for the Fourth Amendment unlawful detention claim, Defendants contend that it is untimely, having accrued, at the latest, when Savory's pretrial detention ended in May 1981 upon his second conviction. . . In support, Defendants rely on the Seventh Circuit's decision on remand in Manuel, which held that a pretrial detention claim accrues 'when the detention ends.' . . Defendants could just as well have argued that Savory's unlawful detention claim accrued when he was released from prison in December 2006, or from parole in December 2011. Savory contends that McDonough compels the conclusion that his unlawful detention claim accrued only when he was pardoned. . . Savory is correct. As noted, McDonough makes clear that a plaintiff must wait until the favorable termination of the criminal proceedings to bring a § 1983 claim that, if successful, would be incompatible with his guilt. . . That describes Savory's unlawful detention claim, for his allegation that he was detained without probable cause and 'in spite of the fact that [the officers] knew [he] was innocent,' . . . 'challenge[s] the integrity of [the] criminal prosecution[ ]' and 'directly challenges—and thus necessarily threatens to impugn—the prosecution itself,[.] . . Because Savory's unlawful detention claim did not accrue until his pardon, it is timely. See Sanders v. St. Joseph Cnty., 806 F. App'x 481, 484 n.2 (7th Cir. 2020) (recognizing that an unlawful detention claim "that impl[ies] the invalidity of an ongoing criminal proceeding or a prior criminal conviction" is Heck-barred even "after [the plaintiff's] release and until either those proceedings terminated in his favor or the conviction was vacated"); Culp v. Flores, 454 F. Supp. 3d 764, 769 (N.D. Ill. 2020) (same).")

Spencer v. Village of Arlington Heights, No. 18-CV-00528, 2020 WL 4365640, at *2 (N.D. Ill. July 30, 2020) ("Defendants argue that Spencer's only remaining claim, Count 3, is barred by the applicable statute of limitations. . . Count 3 is a claim for unlawful pretrial detention based on the Fourth Amendment. . . Spencer filed the complaint on January 23, 2018. . . If Spencer's claim accrued upon his release from jail on August 15, 2015, the claim is untimely. . . If Spencer's claim accrued when the criminal charges were dismissed on January 25, 2016, the claim is timely. . . Defendants appropriately cited authority that existed when they filed their briefs, but since then the Seventh Circuit and district courts in this district have issued additional decisions in this area. After McDonough, the Seventh Circuit stated, in the context of a claim for unlawful pretrial detention, that the plaintiff's 'claim of unlawful detention accrued, at the earliest, when he was released from jail.'. . The Seventh Circuit further explained: 'If, however, a conclusion that Sanders's confinement was unconstitutional would imply the invalidity of an ongoing criminal proceeding or a prior criminal conviction, then Heck [v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994)] would continue to bar Sanders's claim after his release and until either those proceedings terminated in his favor or the conviction was vacated.'. .Applying those principles, the question is whether Spencer's claim would imply the invalidity of the criminal proceedings. Spencer's claim is premised on his allegations that he committed no crime. . . Spencer alleges that the defendant officers filed a false complaint under oath and committed perjury. . . Spencer alleges that, as a result of the complaint, 'he was illegally detained and jailed.'. . If successful, the claim would imply the invalidity of the criminal proceedings. . . Thus, Spencer's claim did not accrue until the proceedings terminated in his favor, in other words, until the charges were dismissed on January

25, 2016. . . Spencer filed the claim on January 23, 2018, within the two-year statute of limitations.")

Barnett v. City of Chicago, No. 18 C 7946, 2020 WL 4336063, at *2–4 (N.D. Ill. July 28, 2020) ("Although Barnett purports to base his claim in the Fourteenth Amendment, he cannot successfully raise a Fourteenth Amendment due process fabrication of evidence claim. While it is beyond doubt that 'a police officer who manufactures false evidence against a criminal defendant violates due process,' that violation becomes actionable only 'if that evidence is later used to deprive the defendant of her liberty in some way.'. . Barnett was only subject to pretrial detention and bond conditions; he does not allege any post-trial deprivation of liberty. . . As the Seventh Circuit recently clarified, 'all § 1983 claims for wrongful pretrial detention—whether based on fabricated evidence or some other defect—sound in the Fourth Amendment.'. . To state a claim for fabrication of evidence sounding in the Fourth Amendment, Barnett must allege that Kulisek knowingly, intentionally, or with reckless disregard for the truth made false statements that were necessary to the probable cause determination. . . Barnett alleges that Kulisek made false statements in the police report and that those statements formed the basis for the probable cause determination. Therefore, Barnett has sufficiently pleaded a Fourth Amendment fabrication of evidence claim against Kulisek. . . . A Fourth Amendment claim for wrongful pretrial detention accrues when the wrongful detention ends. . . Because Barnett has alleged that false statements provided the basis for the probable cause determination against him, he has alleged that his detention remained wrongful even after he was formally charged. . . In such cases, wrongful detention claims based on falsified probable cause accrue upon the detainee's release. . . Barnett's amended complaint reveals that he was released from custody on October 1, 2016, more than two years before he filed his complaint. But the Court must also consider the effect of the ongoing criminal proceedings on Barnett's ability to bring suit on his wrongful detention claim. Under Heck v. Humphrey, Barnett could not bring a § 1983 suit concerning his confinement until the criminal proceedings terminated in his favor if the suit would 'necessarily imply' the invalidity of an outstanding criminal conviction or sentence. . . In McDonough, the Supreme Court emphasized that the Heck bar extends to a fabrication of evidence claim based on evidence used to secure an indictment given that such a claim 'directly challenges—and thus necessarily threatens to impugn—the prosecution itself.'. . Although McDonough concerned a Fourteenth Amendment fabrication of evidence claim, rather than one based in the Fourth Amendment, its application of Heck applies to Barnett's Fourth Amendment claim. . . . Here, Barnett alleges that the Chicago Police 'had no information to lead them to believe that Barnett had committed a crime,' aside from the false assertions in the arrest report. . . Barnett's wrongful detention claim 'centers on evidence used to secure an indictment and at a criminal trial' and so 'directly challenges—and thus necessarily threatens to impugn—the prosecution itself.'. . This means that the claim did not accrue until Barnett's acquittal on December 2, 2016, making the filing of his complaint on December 3, 2018 timely. . . Therefore, the statute of limitations does not bar Barnett's wrongful detention claim based on fabrication of evidence.")

Hill v. City of Chicago, No. 19 C 6080, 2020 WL 4226672, at *2–3 (N.D. Ill. July 23, 2020) ("Seventh Circuit law governing Fourth Amendment pretrial detention claims has changed in recent years. In Manuel v. City of Joliet, the Supreme Court overturned Seventh Circuit precedent and held that the Fourth Amendment governs claims for unlawful pretrial detention both before and after the initiation of formal legal process (i.e. when a criminal defendant has been brought before a judge). . . The Supreme Court declined to decide when such claims accrue, leaving that question for the Seventh Circuit. . . On remand, the Seventh Circuit held that unlawful pretrial detention claims accrue on the date the detention ends. . . But because the charges against the plaintiff in Manuel II were dismissed, the Seventh Circuit did not have occasion to consider whether a conviction (and thus the end of the pretrial detention) triggers accrual. Knox v. Curtis, 771 F. App'x 656 (7th Cir. 2019), appeared to provide some insight on that question. In Knox, the plaintiff sued a witness and a police officer after he was convicted of improperly communicating with the witness about his alleged criminal activity, blaming their false statements for his arrest and ultimate conviction. The Seventh Circuit held that the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment unlawful pretrial detention claim was timely and that it accrued either when he was released on bond or when he was convicted. . . In rejecting the Defendant officer's argument that Heck barred the plaintiff's claim, the Knox court stated that '[t]o the extent that [plaintiff] challenges his post-conviction detention, Heck indeed bars his § 1983 suit. However, [plaintiff] also challenges his pretrial (pre-bond) detention, the unlawfulness of which does not have "any necessary effect on the validity of [his] conviction."'. . Plaintiffs contend that the Knox court's statement was specific to the facts of that case (i.e. that Heck applies to some Fourth Amendment pretrial detention claims, it just did not apply there). While that may be true, so far as the Court can tell, Knox alleged that his arrest, pretrial detention, and conviction were based on the same false statements, which is exactly what Plaintiffs allege here (nor does Plaintiffs' motion explain where the difference in the facts lies). Accordingly, because the facts in Knox were similar to the facts here, the Court found the decision persuasive (albeit not binding) and concluded that Plaintiffs' pretrial detention claims accrued upon their convictions. . . Following the Court's ruling, however, the Seventh Circuit clarified the impact of Heck on pretrial detention claims in Sanders v. St. Joseph's County, 806 F. App'x 481 (7th Cir. 2020). In Sanders, the Seventh Circuit reversed the district court's dismissal of the plaintiff's unlawful pretrial detention claim on statute of limitations grounds, holding that his claim accrued, at the earliest, when he was released from jail. . . In so holding, the court qualified that '[i]f, however, a conclusion that [plaintiff's] confinement was unconstitutional would imply the invalidity of an ongoing criminal proceeding or a prior criminal conviction, then Heck would continue to bar [plaintiff's] claim after his release and until either those proceedings terminated in his favor or the conviction was vacated.'. . Defendants correctly point out that Sanders is not precedential, but the analysis still addresses the accrual question here. And since Sanders was decided, several district courts have held that unlawful pretrial detention claims are subject to Heck. See Culp v. Flores, 2020 WL 1874075, at *2-3 (Apr. 15, 2020); Hill v. Cook County, 2020 WL 2836773, at *11 (N.D. Ill. May 31, 2020); Serrano v. Guevara, 2020 WL 3000284, at *18 (N.D. Ill. June 4, 2020). The Court finds the reasoning in those decisions persuasive. Here, Plaintiffs allege that they were 'arrested, charged, and incarcerated' as a result of 'Defendants' false allegations and fabricated evidence.'. . In turn, the only fabricated evidence the complaints discuss is the stories the Defendant officers allegedly made up by manipulating Harris and McKinnie. . .The complaints also allege that at trial 'Harris's and McKinnie's statements were the only evidence linking [Plaintiffs] to the shooting' and the 'judge convicted [Plaintiffs] on the basis of Harris['s] and McKinnie's pretrial statements,' which were 'entirely the result of Defendants' fabrication.'. . Because Plaintiffs allege that Defendants used the same evidence to support their pretrial detention that also secured their convictions, a finding that their detentions were unconstitutional would necessarily imply the invalidity of those convictions. As such, Heck barred Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claims until their convictions were overturned in September 2018. . . Because Plaintiffs filed their claims within two years of that date, they are timely.")

Hill v. Cook County, No. 18-CV-08228, 2020 WL 2836773, at *9-11 (N.D. Ill. May 31, 2020) ("Drawing upon McDonough, the Seventh Circuit recently expounded on when a claim accrues in Savory v. Cannon, 947 F.3d 409 (7th Cir. 2020). The plaintiff in Savory claimed that the government had suppressed and fabricated evidence. . . The Seventh Circuit found that 'no section 1983 claim could proceed until the criminal proceeding ended in the defendant's favor or the resulting conviction was invalidated within the meaning of Heck.'. . Savory was released from state custody in 2011 with a conviction on his record. . . The Seventh Circuit held that his claim accrued only 'when the governor of Illinois pardoned him,' not when he was released. . . 'Until that moment, his conviction was intact and he had no cause of action under section 1983.'. . The pardon started the statute-of-limitations clock ticking. Here, Defendants try to make the same argument that failed in Savory. They argue that the clock started ticking when Hill's pretrial detention ended (and his post-trial custody began). . . But the 'rule urged by the defendants would result in claims being dead on arrival in virtually all section 1983 suits brought in relation to extant convictions.' . . By their logic, Hill's section 1983 claim would have accrued upon his conviction, 'even though preclusion rules would effectively prevent [him] from bringing any claim inconsistent with' his criminal conviction. . . Under Defendants' approach, Hill could never bring an unlawful detention claim. If he filed after his conviction, but before his conviction was overturned, he would file too soon. But if he filed after dismissal of the indictment, he would file too late. It would create a heads-I-win-tails-you-lose dynamic against criminal defendants. And in Savory, the Seventh Circuit flatly rejected the notion that criminal defendants are simply out of luck. In Sanders v. St. Joseph County, 2020 WL 1531354 (7th Cir. 2020), the Seventh Circuit returned to the issue of when a pretrial detention claim accrues. Sanders himself brought an unlawful detention claim. . . The Seventh Circuit held that Sanders 'could not have used § 1983 to contest his custody while it was ongoing,' and his 'claim of unlawful detention accrued, at the earliest, when he was released from jail.'. . The Court qualified its ruling in two footnotes. First, if the plaintiff 'meant to challenge the legitimacy of his initial seizure, any claim related to his arrest that does not implicate the ensuing custody expired two years after the arrest.'. . That is, when a plaintiff challenges the initial detention, and a finding in his favor wouldn't undermine the later incarceration, then the claim accrues when the initial detention ends. . . Second, if the claim does implicate a conviction and ensuing incarceration, then the claim accrues only if the criminal defendant ultimately prevails:

If, however, a conclusion that [plaintiff's] confinement was unconstitutional would imply the invalidity of an ongoing criminal proceeding or a prior criminal conviction, then Heck would continue to bar [plaintiff's] claim after his release and until either those proceedings terminated in his favor or the conviction was vacated.
. . . Hill bases his Fourth Amendment claim on the assertion that he did nothing wrong. He claims that the Robbins Defendants made up a story that he was the getaway driver, coerced witnesses into implicating him, suppressed exculpatory evidence, and fabricated other evidence. . . The Robbins Defendants then passed off their investigation to the Cook County Sheriff Defendants. . . The Cook County Sheriff Defendants relied on the tainted investigation, and then proceeded to suppress exculpatory evidence and coerce false statements from witnesses. . . Defendants based Hill's arrest, detention, and prosecution on falsified police reports and fabricated evidence. . . To secure his conviction, they used the same evidence that supported his pretrial detention. . . If Hill had brought his pretrial detention claim while incarcerated for murder, and prevailed, that finding would imply that he was innocent. Much like the plaintiffs in Heck and Savory, Hill 'assert[s] the suppression of exculpatory evidence and the fabrication of false evidence in order to effect a conviction.'. . 'There is no logical way to reconcile those claims with a valid conviction.'. . Another court in this district recently addressed this very issue. See Culp v. Flores, 2020 WL 1874075 (N.D. Ill. 2020). In Culp, the plaintiff claimed that he was arrested and charged without probable cause, and that his subsequent detention was based on fabricated police reports prepared by the arresting officers. . . The defendants argued that Culp's claims were time-barred because he was released from prison in 2013, two years before he brought suit. . . Judge Feinerman analyzed Culp's claims under the Seventh Circuit's framework in Savory and Sanders, and held that 'given the nature of his Fourth Amendment claim, a finding that Culp's detention in jail was unconstitutional would imply the invalidity of the charges against him, [and] Heck barred that claim until those charges were dismissed.'. . '[S]uccess on that claim would be incompatible with a conviction on the charges for which Culp was arrested, detained, and prosecuted,' so the claim 'did not accrue until the charges against him were dismissed.'. . The same analysis applies here. Hill's unlawful detention claim didn't accrue until the Circuit Court of Cook County dismissed the indictment in December 2017. He filed this lawsuit one year later. So he satisfied the statute of limitations, with one year to spare.")

Moore v. City of Chicago, No. 19 CV 3902, 2020 WL 3077565, at *4 (N.D. Ill. June 10, 2020) ("Heck's favorable termination rule applies to plaintiff's unlawful detention claims. Those claims turn on allegations of fabricated evidence. And those allegations of fabricated evidence necessarily would have implied the invalidity of plaintiff's ongoing criminal prosecution. Last year the Supreme Court applied the favorable termination rule to a claim of fabricated evidence. Plaintiffs who bring such claims 'challenge the integrity of criminal prosecutions undertaken pursuant to legal process.' [citing McDonough] They 'challenge the validity of the criminal proceedings against him in essentially the same manner as the plaintiff in Heck challenged the validity of his conviction.'. . The Court thus held: 'There is not a complete and present cause of action to bring a fabricated-evidence challenge to criminal proceedings while those criminal proceedings are ongoing. Only once the criminal proceeding has ended in the defendant's favor, or a resulting conviction has been invalidated within the meaning of Heck, will the statute of limitations begin to run.'. .Defendants argue that Heck has nothing to do with unlawful pretrial detention claims brought under the Fourth Amendment. They argue that plaintiff's claims expired almost a decade ago, two years after he was released on bond. Not so. Plaintiff claims that he was unlawfully detained based solely on fabricated evidence. His claims 'directly challenge[ ]—and thus necessarily threaten[ ] to impugn — the prosecution itself.'. . His claims thus could not have accrued until his sentence was vacated and his charges were dismissed.")

Culp v. Flores, No. 17 C 252, 2020 WL 1874075, at *2-3 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 15, 2020) ("The Fourth Amendment claim alleges that Defendants 'lacked probable cause to criminally charge and prosecute' Culp and that they 'based the arrest, detention and/or prosecution of [him] on their false allegations, testimony and fabricated police reports.'. . The statute of limitations for this claim is two years. . . Citing Manuel v. City of Joliet, 903 F.3d 667 (7th Cir. 2018), and Mitchell v. City of Elgin, 912 F.3d 1012 (7th Cir. 2019), for the proposition that a Fourth Amendment pretrial detention claim accrues when the seizure ends, Defendants contend that Culp's claim is time-barred because he was released from jail on April 30, 2013, well over two years before he filed suit. . . Citing the Supreme Court's subsequent decision in McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149 (2019), Culp argues under the Heck doctrine that his Fourth Amendment claim did not accrue until January 12, 2016, when the criminal case was dismissed. . . In the alternative, he argues that because his bond conditions were severe enough under the standard articulated in Mitchell to effectuate a continued seizure, his claim did not accrue until those restrictions were lifted upon the dismissal of his criminal case. . . The law governing the accrual date for § 1983 claims like Culp's has been fluid, and both sides present reasonable and cogent arguments. Culp's position prevails based on the understanding of McDonough and Heck expressed by the en banc Seventh Circuit in Savory. Two aspects of the Seventh Circuit's analysis are pertinent here. First, Savory observes that McDonough establishes that the Heck doctrine applies to § 1983 claims brought not only by plaintiffs who have standing convictions, but also by plaintiffs who have not been convicted and are subject to ongoing criminal proceedings. . . Second, Savory explains that when a plaintiff subject to ongoing criminal proceedings brings a § 1983 claim that, if successful, would be incompatible with a conviction on those charges, McDonough establishes that, under Heck, the claim does not accrue 'until the criminal proceeding end[s] in the [plaintiff's] favor.'. .Culp's Fourth Amendment claim is premised on the complaint's allegations that he committed no crime, . . . that Defendants 'did not have any reason to believe that [he] had violated … any city, state or federal law,'. . . and that Defendants 'based the[ir] arrest, detention and/or criminal prosecution of [him] on their false allegations, testimony and fabricated police reports[.]'. . Because success on that claim would be incompatible with a conviction on the charges for which Culp was arrested, detained, and prosecuted, '[t]here is no logical way to reconcile th[e] claim[ ] with a valid conviction.'. . It follows under Savory's understanding of McDonough and Heck that Culp's Fourth Amendment unlawful detention claim—even if that claim were limited to the time he spent in jail, and did not extend through the time he was on bond—did not accrue until the charges against him were dismissed on January 12, 2016. This, in turn, renders that claim—brought one year later—timely under the two-year statute of limitations. This result finds strong support in Sanders v. St. Joseph Cnty., __ F. App'x __, 2020 WL 1531354 (7th Cir. Mar. 31, 2020). The plaintiff in Sanders brought an unlawful detention claim, presumably under the Fourth Amendment, alleging that he was wrongfully jailed for several months. . . The district court dismissed the claim on statute of limitations grounds, and the Seventh Circuit reversed. . . Citing Manuel, the Seventh Circuit held that the plaintiff 'could not have used § 1983 to contest his custody while it was ongoing,' and therefore that his 'claim of unlawful detention accrued, at the earliest, when he was released from jail.'. . Standing alone, that passage in Sanders supports Defendants' position that Culp's Fourth Amendment wrongful detention claim accrued upon his release from jail. In a footnote, however, the Seventh Circuit added this qualification:

If, however, a conclusion that [the plaintiff's] confinement was unconstitutional would imply the invalidity of an ongoing criminal proceeding … , then Heck would continue to bar [his] claim after his release and until either those proceedings terminated in his favor or the conviction was vacated. See McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149 (2019); Savory v. Cannon, 947 F.3d 409, 414 (7th Cir. 2020).

Id. at *2 n.2. This analysis directly answers the accrual issue here: Because, given the nature of his Fourth Amendment claim, a finding that Culp's detention in jail was unconstitutional would imply the invalidity of the charges brought against him, Heck barred that claim until those charges were dismissed. And because Culp's wrongful detention claim is timely even if it is limited to the time he spent in jail, it is unnecessary at this juncture to decide whether, under Mitchell, his seizure continued for Fourth Amendment purposes while he was on bond. . . .As with the Fourth Amendment claim, the parties' arguments regarding the Fourteenth Amendment claim are reasonable and cogent, but unlike the question of when the Fourth Amendment claim accrued, Seventh Circuit case law does not conclusively answer whether Culp has a viable Fourteenth Amendment claim. Resolving that very difficult question would have no impact on this case at this juncture because, regardless of its answer, the case will remain in federal court (as the Fourth Amendment claim survives), and because discovery on the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment claims will be coextensive (as both rest on the same factual predicate). Accordingly, the court declines to dismiss the Fourteenth Amendment claim on the pleadings, knowing that it will have an opportunity to address the claim when Defendants renew their challenge at summary judgment.")

Hill v. City of Chicago, No. 19 C 6080, 2020 WL 509031, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 31, 2020) ("[T]he Heck bar does not toll the statute of limitations on Fourth Amendment unlawful pretrial detention claims. . . McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149 (2019), does not change this result. As Brown points out, McDonough was concerned with avoiding 'collateral attacks on criminal judgments through civil litigation.' Brown, 2019 WL 4958214, at *3 (quoting McDonough, 139 S. Ct. at 2157). And 'unlike fair trial claims, Fourth Amendment claims as a group do not necessarily imply the invalidity of a criminal conviction, and so such claims are not suspended under the Heck bar to suit.' Dominguez v. Hendley, 545 F.3d 585, 589 (7th Cir. 2008). Rather, the Seventh Circuit recently clarified that a wrongful pretrial detention claim accrues upon conviction (if not sooner). Knox v. Curtis, 771 Fed. Appx. 656, 658 (7th Cir. 2019) ("[plaintiff's] claim that he was arrested and detained without probable cause accrued either in August 2017 (when he was released on bond), or in November 2017 (when he was convicted).") (internal citations omitted); see also Brown, 2019 WL 4958214, at *3 (concluding the same). Accordingly, the Plaintiffs' wrongful pretrial detention claims accrued no later than January 31, 2013, and the statute of limitations has long since run. Defendants' motion to dismiss Count II of the complaints is granted.") Andersen v. City of Chicago, No. 16 C 1963, 2019 WL 6327226, at *5–6 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 26, 2019) ("The Seventh Circuit has said that 'a Fourth Amendment claim for wrongful detention accrues when the detention ends.'. . Defendants argue, based on this premise, that Andersen's pretrial detention ended in 1982, when he was convicted, and he should have brought his claim within two years of that date. Further, Defendants note, Andersen was released from any detention in 2007 (when he was released from prison), which is also more than two years before he brought suit. . . In response, Andersen argues that Heck applies to his Fourth Amendment claim—to challenge his pretrial detention would impugn his conviction because it would challenge his confession and other evidence withheld and destroyed. Therefore, he asserts, he could not have brought his Fourth Amendment claim until favorable termination of his conviction. . . Defendants' argument that this claim accrued when Andersen was convicted is unsupported. Andersen's detention did not end when he was convicted. In Camm, the Seventh Circuit discussed, without deciding, a similar statute of limitations issue. . . In that case, the plaintiff had been held pretrial, convicted, then retried twice ending in an acquittal. The Court allowed the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim to move forward based on the initial probable-cause affidavit issued in the case. Though the defendant had been convicted (twice) after the submission of that affidavit, at no point did the Court suggest that the claim accrued at the time of conviction. . . Although not binding for that purpose, Camm indicates that the Seventh Circuit's understanding is not that all Fourth Amendment claims accrue at the time of conviction. But that would only get Andersen to 2007, still too late to bring his claim. Even if a court were to determine that his detention ended at the end of his supervised release in 2010, he would still come up short. That is where Heck comes in. Although Defendants argue that Heck has no place in the pre-conviction context, in certain situations, Heck applies to ongoing prosecutions. . . In some cases, the harm is distinct and accrues without regard to Heck, because at that point whether a prosecution will be brought is merely speculative. See Wallace v. Kato, 549 U.S. 384, 390–91 (2007) (claim for arrest without a warrant accrues once detention is pursuant to legal process); see also McDonough, 139 S. Ct. at 2159 ("A false-arrest claim, Wallace explained, has a life independent of an ongoing trial or putative future conviction—it attacks the arrest only to the extent it was without legal process, even if legal process later commences."). . . A claim, however, that 'centers on evidence used to secure an indictment and at a criminal trial...does not require speculation about whether a prosecution will be brought....It directly challenges—and thus necessarily threatens to impugn— the prosecution itself,' thereby implicating the concerns addressed in Heck. . . Andersen's Fourth Amendment claim centers on the argument that he was wrongfully detained based on a coerced confession that implicated withheld and/or destroyed evidence. That confession was used to secure the charges against him, proceed with his prosecution, and convict him at trial. As such, Heck applies to his Fourth Amendment claim. To bring the claim earlier would have impermissibly challenged an extant conviction. Andersen's Fourth Amendment claim, therefore, accrued with the favorable termination of his case and is timely.")

Brown v. City of Chicago, No. 18 C 7064, 2019 WL 4958214, at *3 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 8, 2019) ("Count VI states a claim for federal malicious prosecution. The court dismissed this count in its ruling on the City's motion to dismiss because the Seventh Circuit does not recognize such a claim. . . The Estate Defendants have also moved to dismiss Count VI to the extent Plaintiff has restated the claim as one for pretrial detention without probable cause. But the court also rejected Plaintiff's attempt to restate this count as a Fourth Amendment claim in its earlier ruling. . . Moreover, any unlawful pretrial detention claim that Plaintiff might have asserted would be time-barred under Seventh Circuit precedent holding that such a claim is not subject to the delayed accrual rule from Heck. . . Plaintiff's reliance on Manuel v. City of Joliet, 903 F.3d 667 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Manuel II"), is misplaced. While the Seventh Circuit in Manuel II, 903 F.3d at 670, held that a claim for pretrial detention without probable cause begins to accrue when the pretrial detention ends, Knox, 771 Fed. Appx. at 658, clarified that pretrial detention can be considered as ending upon conviction. . . Thus, Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claims for his detention before his 1990 and 2008 trials needed to be filed in 1992 and 2010, respectively. McDonough does not save Plaintiff's claim for pretrial detention without probable cause either. As already noted, McDonough, 139 S. Ct. at 2157, is grounded in a concern for avoiding 'collateral attacks on criminal judgments through civil litigation.' A Fourth Amendment claim does not constitute such a collateral attack. See Dominguez v. Hendley, 545 F.3d 585, 589 (7th Cir. 2008) ("Even if no conviction could have been obtained in the absence of the violation, the Supreme Court has held that, unlike fair trial claims, Fourth Amendment claims as a group do not necessarily imply the invalidity of a criminal conviction, and so such claims are not suspended under the Heck bar to suit."). The delayed accrual embraced by the Supreme Court in McDonough is not implicated here.")

Brown v. City of Chicago, No. 18 C 7064, 2019 WL 4694685, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 26, 2019) ("Although the McDonough plaintiff had never been convicted, the Court held that Heck applies because a fabricated-evidence claim brought before a favorable termination in the criminal proceedings could result in 'conflicting civil and criminal judgments' and 'collateral attacks on criminal judgments through civil litigation.'. . Concluding otherwise would mean that '[a] significant number of criminal defendants would face an untenable choice between (1) letting their claims expire and (2) filing a civil suit against the very person who is in the midst of prosecuting them.'. . Not only does that second option 'risk[ ] tipping [a plaintiff's] hand as to his defense strategy, undermining his privilege against self-incrimination, and taking on discovery obligations not required in the criminal context,' but such parallel litigation also 'run[s] counter to core principles of federalism, comity, consistency, and judicial economy.'. . This same reasoning from McDonough was embraced by the Seventh Circuit in its recent decision in Camm, 2019 WL 4267769, at *10–11, in which the court held that a Brady claim did not accrue until after the plaintiff in that case—who, like Mr. Brown, had been convicted at two trials—was acquitted at the third trial.The outcome in Winstead, like the one that Defendant advocates, would have required Plaintiff to file his claims related to his 1990 trial and convictions in 2005 when he was granted a new trial. In other words, according to Defendant, Mr. Brown should have filed his suit at the same time that the State was preparing to prosecute him again—the exact situation McDonough cautioned against. . . The court concludes that Defendant's motion to dismiss Counts I through V of Brown's complaint, as they relate to the 1990 trial and convictions, must be denied. Count I states a fabrication-of-evidence claim—specifically, that the Individual Defendants fabricated a number of items of evidence, including Plaintiff's confession, depriving Mr. Brown of a fair trial. As in McDonough, . . . Plaintiff's fabrication-of-evidence claim regarding the 1990 trial and convictions did not begin to accrue until 2017, when his convictions were vacated and the charges against him were finally dropped. This complaint, filed less than a year later, states a timely fabrication claim.") [Accord, Brown v. City of Chicago, 2019 WL 4958214 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 8, 2019) (applying same reasoning in refusing to dismiss claims against Estate Defendants)]

Switzer v. Village of Glasford, Ill., No. 1:18-CV-1421, 2019 WL 3291519, at *2-5 (C.D. Ill. July 22, 2019) ("The Supreme Court has held that pretrial detention without probable cause is actionable under § 1983 as a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . However, the Court left open the question of when the claim accrues. . . Although Manuel v. City of Joliet ("Manuel II"), 903 F.3d 667 (7th Cir. 2018), determined that a claim for unlawful pretrial detention under the Fourth Amendment accrues when the detention ends, the Seventh Circuit declined to decide whether a plaintiff's pretrial release on bond constitutes a prolonged seizure within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. That is the core of the case at hand. On June 20, 2019, the Supreme Court held that the statute of limitations for a fabricated-evidence claim does not begin to run until the criminal proceedings against the defendant (i.e., the § 1983 plaintiff) have terminated in his favor. See McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149 (June 20, 2019). . . . Initially, Defendants assert Plaintiff was never seized as contemplated by the Fourth Amendment because his pretrial release restrictions were not an onerous restriction on travel, nor a significant restriction on liberty. Plaintiff's pretrial release conditions are provided as follows: Plaintiff must (1) appear for future hearings; (2) submit to the orders and process of the court; (3) not depart the state without leave; (4) give written notice of any change of address; and (5) not violate any criminal statutes. . . Defendants further argue Plaintiff was never actually housed or incarcerated, but rather, he was arrested 'at such a late time that Plaintiff did not arrive to the jail until the early morning hours of the next day[.] Plaintiff was simply booked and released on October 1, 2015.'. . .Here, the totality of the circumstances indicate that a seizure did, in fact, occur. While Defendants focus on the travel restrictions stipulation, it is not the only factor the Court considers. Plaintiff was pulled over, arrested, physically placed into a police car, taken to Peoria County Jail, required to bond out of jail, and also had travel restrictions placed upon him. . . Under the Mendenhall standard, Plaintiff surely did not feel he was free to leave the backseat of a police vehicle—let alone leave the jail where law enforcement was currently booking him for a crime—even if he did understand that he could request permission to leave the state while on pretrial release. Defendants' specific emphasis on 'onerous travel restrictions' as the threshold for a seizure overlooks the fact of his initial detention. Moreover, the Court assesses the entirely of the restrictive situation, not just the pretrial release travel restrictions. A plaintiff's liberty may certainly be restrained in other ways, as it was here. . . Additionally, Defendants seem to incorrectly equate a seizure with spending time in jail. The Supreme Court has previously offered examples of circumstances that might indicate a seizure without physical incarceration. Such examples include, but are not limited to, 'the threatening presence of several officers, the display of a weapon by an officer, some physical touching of the person of the citizen, or the use of language or tone of voice indicating that compliance with the officer's request might be compelled.'. . Since the Supreme Court has not specified that a Fourth Amendment seizure must physically incarcerate the seized individual, Defendants' argument is unpersuasive. . . .Next, Defendants argue that any recognizable seizure must be limited in time and scope to any actual detention that did occur. From Defendants' perspective, Plaintiff did not remain seized within two years of the date of the filing of his original Complaint, and thus his claims fall outside the statute of limitations. Plaintiff was arrested late in the evening of September 30, 2015, released on bond on October 1, 2015, and filed his original Complaint more than two years later on November 21, 2018. . .. Because a seizure did occur as alleged in Count I, the question in this case becomes when the statute of limitations begins to run—either upon Plaintiff's pretrial release on October 1, 2015, or when the charges were dismissed on December 7, 2017. . . . It is true that the concept of a 'continuing seizure' has been previously rejected by the Seventh Circuit. . . However, several 'sister circuits have adopted the minority approach that 'pretrial release might be construed as a "seizure" for Fourth Amendment purposes if the conditions of that release impose significant restrictions on liberty.'. . Such significant restrictions have been broadly defined. [collecting cases] Understanding this position is the minority, there is still 'out-of-circuit support for the proposition that the concept of "seizure" under the Fourth Amendment extends beyond physical detention.'. . .Here, in order to prevent alleged police misconduct from escaping Fourth Amendment oversight, it is appropriate to find that Plaintiff's pretrial release on bond is classified as a significant restriction on liberty. Accordingly, pretrial release on bond is included in the definition of a Fourth Amendment seizure. . . .In June 2019, the Supreme Court faced a similar predicament in McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149 (June 20, 2019), which is dispositive to the issue presented here. Similar to how Burgess allegedly falsely swore in a complaint and falsely testified, the defendant in McDonough fabricated evidence and presented fabricated testimony. The Court held that the statute of limitations for a fabricated-evidence claim, and ultimately for a § 1983 plaintiff, does not begin to run until the criminal proceedings against the defendant have terminated in his favor. . . This favorable termination requirement 'applies whenever "a judgment in favor of the plaintiff would necessarily imply" that his prior conviction or sentence was invalid.'. . . In sum, under the McDonough standard, the statute of limitations for a § 1983 plaintiff begins to run 'when the criminal proceedings against him are terminated in his favor.'. . For McDonough, that meant when he was acquitted at the end of his second trial; for Plaintiff, that means when his charges were dismissed on December 7, 2017. Applying the two-year statute of limitations to the accrual date of December 7, 2017, Plaintiff's Complaint is timely so far as it was brought before December 7, 2019. Plaintiff's claim is therefore timely as his original Complaint was filed on November 21, 2018. Here, for the aforementioned reasons, Plaintiff's pretrial release on bond can be classified as a significant restriction on liberty and, since the Supreme Court has now provided favorable authority, is thus included in the definition of a Fourth Amendment seizure. Accordingly, Defendants' Motion to Dismiss with respect to Count I is DENIED.")

Mayo v. Lasalle County, No. 18 CV 01342, 2019 WL 3202809, at *3 n.3 (N.D. Ill. July 15, 2019) ("Following Manuel I, the Seventh Circuit has held that the Fourth Amendment is the exclusive ground for a claim of unlawful pretrial detention, even when based on allegations of fabrication of evidence. . . In McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149 (2019), however, the Supreme Court addressed the question of the accrual date for a pretrial due process claim based on allegations of fabrication of evidence and involving pretrial restrictions on liberty. The Court assumed without deciding that the framing of the claim as implicating the Due Process Clause was appropriate. . . That assumption seems to cast some doubt on the Seventh Circuit's view that Manuel I foreclosed grounding a claim of pretrial restriction of liberty based on the use of fabricated evidence on the Due Process Clause in addition to the Fourth Amendment. But the plaintiffs have not defended their complaint by asserting that they have a fabrication of evidence due process claim and even if they had, this Court could not disregard the Seventh Circuit's interpretation of Manuel I based on the Court's mere assumption—rather than holding—that such a claim is viable.")

Mayo v. Lasalle County, No. 18 CV 01342, 2019 WL 3202809, at *4 n.5 (N.D. Ill. July 15, 2019) ("The Supreme Court's holding in McDonough again bears noting. In McDonough, the Court held that that Heck does apply to toll the accrual date of a due process claim for fabrication of evidence (assuming such a claim exists) until termination of the charges in the civil plaintiff/criminal defendant's favor because until that time, a fabrication of evidence claim impugns the integrity of the prosecution or conviction. That is understandable; as the Seventh Circuit observed in Lewis, a conviction 'premised on deliberately fabricated evidence will always violate the defendant's right to due process.'. . Pursuing such a claim before a criminal proceeding has been terminated in a manner consistent with the claim would contravene Heck's principle that civil actions are not the appropriate means for contesting the validity of a criminal prosecution or conviction. But McDonough's holding has no bearing here, because Mayo and Burt, like the plaintiffs in Wallace and unlike the plaintiffs in McDonough, challenge the validity of their detention on Fourth Amendment grounds; they do not challenge the validity of a subsequent prosecution in terms of Due Process or assert a fabrication of evidence claim.")

Eighth Circuit

Martin v. Julian, 18 F.4th 580, 584 (8th Cir. 2021) ("[T]he Supreme Court has not clearly decided whether there is a § 1983 cause of action for malicious prosecution under either the Fourth Amendment or the Due Process Clause. See McDonough v. Smith, —— U.S. ——, 139 S. Ct. 2149, 2155-58, 204 L.Ed.2d 506 (2019), reviewing when the statute of limitations begins to run on a § 1983 fabricated-evidence claim; Wallace, 549 U.S. at 390 n.2, 127 S.Ct. 1091, noting the Court 'ha[s] never explored the contours of a Fourth Amendment malicious prosecution suit under § 1983.' As the district court recognized, we have held that 'an allegation of malicious prosecution without more cannot sustain a civil rights claim under § 1983.'. . This means that Defendants' alleged wrongful conduct must also infringe 'some provision of the Constitution or federal law.'. . Here, the alleged Fourth Amendment violations -- false imprisonment and seizure of property based on fabricated evidence -- occurred before legal process began and are time-barred, despite Plaintiffs' claim that the unlawful seizures continued even after the criminal charges were nolle prossed. . . The only due process claim alleged in the complaint was failure to disclose evidence (the recruitment of confidential informant Miller) in violation of Brady. Plaintiffs do not contest the dismissal of their Brady claims on appeal. Nor did they include § 1983 malicious prosecution claims in the substantive Counts of their complaint. On this record, we conclude the district court did not abuse its discretion in declining to vacate or set aside its initial dismissal Order because Plaintiffs failed to state plausible § 1983 malicious prosecution claims under controlling Eighth Circuit precedent.") Bonelli v. Grand Canyon University, 28 F.4th 948, 952-55 (9th Cir. 2022) (" The general rule is that a civil rights claim accrues under federal law 'when the plaintiff knows or has reason to know of the injury which is the basis of the action.'. . .We have held that this traditional accrual rule applies to the constitutional and statutory violations that Bonelli asserts here. For Fourth Amendment violations, 'federal law holds that a cause of action for illegal search and seizure accrues when the wrongful act occurs ... even if the person does not know at the time that the search was warrantless.'. . By his allegations, Bonelli knew that he was wrongfully detained, and his student ID wrongfully seized, on the days that each incident occurred. The statute of limitations on Counts 1 and 2, both § 1983 claims premised on Fourth Amendment violations, thus began to run on February 19, 2017 and July 25, 2017, respectively. We have likewise applied the traditional accrual rule to § 1983 claims alleging First Amendment violations, including First Amendment retaliation. . . .Thus, Bonelli's Count 3 § 1983 claim alleging First Amendment violations also accrued on February 19, 2017. . . . We have explained that the usual accrual rule—that a claim "accrues under federal law when the plaintiff knows or has reason to know of the actual injury"—governs § 1981 claims alleging racial discrimination, as well as federal civil rights claims generally. . . .We thus conclude that Bonelli had 'complete and present cause[s] of action' by August 24, 2017, at the latest. . . But Bonelli did not file his complaint until January 20, 2020, more than two years later. Under traditional accrual principles, his action is untimely. . . Resisting this, Bonelli invokes Heck to argue that his claims did not accrue until August 29, 2018, when GCU rescinded Bonelli's disciplinary warning. But we conclude that Heck does not apply to Bonelli's claims. . . . Heck analogized to the common law tort of malicious prosecution, one element of which 'is termination of the prior criminal proceeding in favor of the accused.'. . It is this aspect of Heck that Bonelli latches onto. He argues we should apply Heck's deferred accrual rule so that his claims did not accrue until GCU rescinded his disciplinary warning, which was less than two years before he filed suit. Bonelli's reliance on Heck is misplaced. . . . As we have explained, '[w]here there is no "conviction or sentence" that may be undermined by a grant of relief to the plaintiffs, the Heck doctrine has no application.'. . .Bonelli cannot show how his §

Ninth Circuit

1983 claims would be at odds with any conviction or sentence. By its terms, Heck does not apply here. . . . To the extent that Bonelli seeks not the direct application of Heck, but a Heck-like rule of delayed accrual, his argument fares no better. If a plaintiff has a 'complete and present cause of action,' his claim accrues under federal law. . . . Bonelli's more subtle reliance on Heck consists of attempting to analogize his claims to the tort of malicious prosecution, which Heck also invoked by way of analogy. . . Malicious prosecution has a favorable-termination requirement, . . . and Bonelli suggests that his claims likewise required the favorable termination of his university disciplinary warning. The problem for Bonelli is that his claims are not properly analogized to the tort of malicious prosecution, either factually or legally. Sections 1981 and 2000d protect against racial discrimination; neither of these claims sounds in malicious prosecution. The same is true with Bonelli's § 1983 claims. None of Bonelli's claims depended on GCU rescinding the disciplinary warning. Bonelli knew or had reason to know of his claimed injuries—alleged seizures of his person and property, curbing of his First Amendment rights and related retaliation, and discrimination—when those acts occurred. Based on the allegations of his complaint, the disciplinary warning was perhaps an outgrowth of these same incidents. But the tort of malicious prosecution 'challenge[s] the integrity of criminal prosecutions undertaken "pursuant to legal process."' McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149, 2156 (2019) (quoting Heck, 512 U.S. at 484). And that is not the nature of Bonelli's claims. Setting aside that this lawsuit is not about criminal prosecutions, Bonelli challenges not the process that was brought to bear against him through the disciplinary warning, but discrete incidents that allegedly produced immediate injuries. It is not apparent that any of his claims would necessarily imply the invalidity of his disciplinary warning, either. . . . Of course, even in a 'classic malicious prosecution' situation, the injury 'first occurs as soon as legal process is brought to bear on a defendant.' McDonough, 139 S. Ct. at 2160. And in that context the law steps in and does provide for a later accrual only upon the favorable termination of the prosecution. . . But the reason for that customized accrual rule is important, and it shows why Bonelli's attempted analogy to malicious prosecution is unpersuasive. As the Supreme Court explained in McDonough, we impose a favorable-termination requirement for malicious prosecution based on 'pragmatic concerns with avoiding parallel criminal and civil litigation over the same subject matter and the related possibility of conflicting civil and criminal judgments.'. . . Whatever facial similarities that might exist between a university disciplinary process and a state criminal prosecution, Bonelli has not explained how the 'core principles' reinforcing the malicious prosecution analogy—'federalism, comity, consistency, and judicial economy,'. . . support extending this analogy to the collegiate code-of-conduct inquiry alleged in his complaint. Bonelli cites no case taking that approach. . . . If Bonelli had filed suit during the pendency of GCU's review of his disciplinary warning, the district court could have considered whether to stay the case pending completion of that process. . . But Bonelli's position on appeal would mean he would have no cognizable § 1983 claim at all, unless and until that process terminated in his favor. . . Although that would conveniently prevent Bonelli's own claims from now being untimely, it would likely forestall many other § 1983 claims, without adequate legal justification. And it would do so in a context much different than Heck or McDonough. Here, the implication of Bonelli's argument is that if his university disciplinary warning had not been rescinded (i.e., favorably terminated), he might have no further recourse at all. We do not think the malicious prosecution analogy can be stretched to impose such a hard bargain in the context before us.")

Meza v. Quidort, No. EDCV 23-01379 DDP (SHKX), 2024 WL 4152347, at *3 (C.D. Cal. Sept. 10, 2024) ("Here, the Officer Defendants assert that the standard two-year statute of limitations, and not the 'favorable termination' accrual rule, applies because this is a suppression of evidence case rather than a fabrication of evidence case, and therefore McDonough is inapt. . . This is a distinction without a difference. As the Court explained in McDonough, the 'accrual analysis begins with identifying the specific constitutional right alleged to have been infringed.'. . Although the Court assumed without deciding that a fabrication of evidence claim arises under the Due Process Clause, so too would a suppression of evidence claim. Comparing fabrication of evidence claims to malicious prosecution claims, the Supreme Court observed that '[a]t bottom, both claims challenge the integrity of criminal prosecutions undertaken "pursuant to legal process."'. . The same is equally true of a suppression of evidence claim, and indeed, Plaintiff has also alleged a malicious prosecution claim against Karakesisoglu. Accordingly, the favorable termination rule, and not the more generally applicable two-year statute of limitations, applies to Plaintiff's § 1983 claim. Because that claim did not accrue until the felony charges against Plaintiff were dismissed in 2021, the claim was timely filed.")

Jimenez-Bencebi v. State of Arizona, No. CV-23-02075-PHX-DWL, 2024 WL 2923715, at *19 (D. Ariz. June 10, 2024) ("Plaintiffs' reliance on McDonough is misplaced. There, the Supreme Court held that the defendant 'could not bring his fabricated-evidence claim under § 1983 prior to favorable termination of his prosecution.'. . The Court explained that the 'favorable-termination requirement is rooted in pragmatic concerns with avoiding parallel criminal and civil litigation over the same subject matter and the related possibility of conflicting civil and criminal judgments. The requirement likewise avoids allowing collateral attacks on criminal judgments through civil litigation.'. . The principles animating McDonough are not present here, where the underlying proceeding was a civil dependency proceeding. Macias v. Kaplan-Siekmann, 2024 WL 83448, *5 (D. Ariz. 2024) ("Here, Plaintiffs did not have to wait until the dependency proceedings terminated prior to filing their claims because Plaintiffs' § 1983 claims do not involve any allegations pertaining to unlawful criminal proceedings. Therefore, Plaintiffs should have brought their claims forward once they knew that they were injured.").")

Manansingh v. United States, No. 2:20-CV-01139-DWM, 2021 WL 2080190, at *4-5 & nn. 2, 3 (D. Nev. May 24, 2021) ("Plaintiffs first argue that their claims would have been barred by Heck had they pursued them prior to the June 21, 2018 dismissal of Manansingh's indictment. The argument is unpersuasive. 'Heck established the now well-known rule that when an otherwise complete and present § 1983 cause of action would impugn an extant conviction, accrual is deferred until the conviction or sentence has been invalidated.' Bradford v. Scherschligt, 803 F.3d 382, 386 (9th Cir. 2015). While the Ninth Circuit determined at one point that the Heck bar extended to pending criminal proceedings, . . . the Supreme Court subsequently held in Wallace, that 'Heck applies only when there is an extant conviction and is not implicated merely be the pendency of charge[.]'. . Here, no conviction was ever obtained, let alone invalidated, so Heck does not apply. 'Consequently, the resolution of this [case] hinges on traditional rules of accrual and not on the extension of Heck to [these] proceedings.' Bradford, 803 F.3d at 386. . . . Plaintiffs' substantive due process claim (Claim 4) includes a properly pled Fifth Amendment fabricated evidence claim. . . . That claim is also timely, as it did not accrue until 'the criminal proceedings against [Manansingh] terminated in his favor.' McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149, 2161 (2019). Here, the criminal case against Manansingh was dismissed by order of the district court on June 21, 2018. Although it was not a final assessment of innocence, courts have held that dropping charges or a nolle prosequi is an affirmative choice to terminate criminal proceedings for purposes of claim accrual. [citing cases] Because Plaintiffs brought their fabrication claim within two years of the dismissal of the criminal charges against Manansingh, that claim is timely. . . . 'Favorable termination' in this context is not necessarily concomitant with the 'favorable termination' element of malicious prosecution. See Roberts v. City of Fairbanks, 947 F.3d 1191, 1202 n.12 (9th Cir. 2020) (malicious prosecution claim may require termination 'dispositive of the defendant's innocence'). . . . Apart from a dispute over what qualifies as 'favorable termination,' the parties do not appear to dispute that this claim is timely under McDonough.")

Caldwell v. City of San Francisco, No. 12-CV-01892-DMR, 2020 WL 6270957, at *5–7 & n.3 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 26, 2020) ("McDonough did not address whether a plaintiff must show favorable termination of a criminal case in order to prevail on a constitutional claim challenging the use of fabricated evidence in that case. Instead, McDonough considered the question of when the statute of limitations begins to run on a section 1983 fabricated evidence claim. . . . Relying on its decision in Heck, and noting that it was 'follow[ing] the analogy [to malicious prosecution claims] where it leads,' the Court concluded that the plaintiff 'could not bring his fabricated-evidence claim under § 1983 prior to favorable termination of his prosecution.'. . McDonough discussed Heck at length. It explained that in Heck, the Court held that 'in order to recover damages for allegedly unconstitutional conviction or imprisonment, or for other harm caused by actions whose unlawfulness would render a conviction or sentence invalid,' a section 1983 plaintiff must prove that his or her conviction had been invalidated. . . A plaintiff may do so by showing that the conviction 'has been [1] reversed on direct appeal, [2] expunged by executive order, [3] declared invalid by a state tribunal authorized to make such determination, or [4] called into question by a federal court's issuance of a writ of habeas corpus.'. . McDonough reasoned that 'malicious prosecution's favorable-termination requirement is rooted in pragmatic concerns with avoiding parallel criminal and civil litigation over the same subject matter and the related possibility of conflicting civil judgments' and 'avoids allowing collateral attacks on criminal judgment through civil litigation.'. . The Court then concluded that '[b]ecause a civil claim such as McDonough's, asserting that fabricated evidence was used to pursue a criminal judgment, implicates the same concerns, it makes sense to adopt the same rule.'. . Therefore, a statute of limitations on a fabricated evidence claim begins to run 'once the criminal proceeding has ended in the defendant's favor, or a resulting conviction has been invalidated within the meaning of Heck[.]'. . Here, Defendants distort McDonough by asserting that it imposed a 'favorable termination' requirement for fabricated evidence claims that is identical to the requirement for malicious prosecution claims. See Mot. 10 (citing Mills v. City of Covina, 921 F.3d 1161, 1170-71 (9th Cir. 2019) (malicious prosecution claim requires a termination reflecting plaintiff's innocence)). According to Defendants, Caldwell cannot allege that the criminal proceedings terminated in his favor as he was never acquitted or declared innocent of the charges. Defendants are wrong. McDonough made no such ruling. Instead, it decided the question of when a claim for fabricated evidence accrues; it noted that it was not deciding the 'contours' of such a claim, and it did not hold that such a claim is identical to a malicious prosecution claim. . . In fact, Defendants' interpretation of McDonough contradicts the express ruling in McDonough that a fabricated evidence claim does not accrue until 'the criminal proceeding has ended in the defendant's favor, or a resulting conviction has been invalidated within the meaning of Heck[.]'. . In a recent opinion, the Ninth Circuit examined this exact language and held that '[b]y posing the favorable-termination rule and invalidation under Heck disjunctively,' 'McDonough firmly undermines the . ..insinuation that they are coterminous.'. . Here, it is undisputed that Caldwell's conviction was 'invalidated within the meaning of Heck' because it was 'declared invalid by a state tribunal authorized to make such determination.'. . Roberts is directly on point here. It held that the favorable termination rule applicable to malicious prosecution claims is distinct from the 'four means of favorable termination' articulated in Heck. In Roberts, the Ninth Circuit addressed the question of 'whether § 1983 plaintiffs may recover damages if the convictions underlying their claims were vacated pursuant to a settlement agreement.'. . The settlement agreement provided that the parties would ask a court to vacate the plaintiffs' convictions, and specifically recognized that '[t]he parties have not reached agreement as to [the plaintiffs'] actual guilt or innocence.'. . . After a state court vacated the plaintiffs' convictions and they were released from prison, the plaintiffs filed a section 1983 action alleging deprivation of liberty, malicious prosecution, and several other claims. . . The district court dismissed their claims as barred by Heck, holding that the 'vacatur of convictions pursuant to a settlement agreement was insufficient to render the convictions invalid[.]'. .The Ninth Circuit reversed, holding that the Heck bar was inapplicable because the plaintiffs' convictions were vacated and the underlying indictments had been dismissed. The court ruled that in the absence of a criminal judgment or charges pending against the plaintiffs, Heck did not apply as a bar to the subsequent civil rights action. . . The defendants argued that even though the convictions were vacated, they had not been 'declared invalid' as required by Heck because the settlement did not establish the plaintiffs' innocence and thus did not meet the 'favorable-termination' rule for a malicious prosecution claim. . . The Ninth Circuit rejected this argument as improperly conflating 'the favorable-termination rule in the tort of malicious prosecution with Heck's four distinct means of favorable termination.'. . It expressly found that 'Heck's favorable-termination requirement is distinct from the favorable-termination element of a malicious-prosecution claim.'. . According to Roberts, the argument forwarded by the defense (which is the same argument asserted by Defendants in this case) 'contravenes the plain language of Heck' because convictions can be invalidated on the grounds set forth in Heck without 'indicat[ing] the innocence of the accused,' as is required for a malicious prosecution claim. . . It noted that '[c]onvictions "called into question by a federal court's issuance of a writ of habeas corpus" routinely terminate in a manner that could not sustain a malicious-prosecution action.'. . . Defendants acknowledge that in Roberts, the Ninth Circuit clearly stated that the favorable termination element of a malicious prosecution claims should not be conflated with the favorable termination requirement of Heck, and that Heck does not bar a 1983 suit unless the plaintiff could succeed in a malicious prosecution action. But Defendants go on from there to pronounce that '[t]he converse...is also true—a plaintiff cannot succeed in a malicious prosecution or fabrication of evidence action merely by overcoming the Heck bar.'. . Defendants cite two cases which purportedly support their pronouncement, but neither do. Mills v. City of Covina, 921 F.3d 1161, 1170-71 (9th Cir. 2019) discusses the elements of a malicious prosecution claim, including the favorable termination element, but says nothing about fabrication of evidence claims. In Bradford v. Scherschligt, 803 F.3d 382, 386-89 (9th Cir. 2015), the court held that a Devereaux claim for fabrication of evidence accrues when the conviction or sentence is invalidated, but in the retrial context, it accrues on the date the plaintiff is acquitted in a retrial. Bradford does not hold that a fabrication of evidence claim requires a favorable termination. . . . In sum, Roberts considered and rejected the exact position taken by Defendants here. . . Accordingly, Caldwell does not have to plead that the underlying criminal proceedings terminated in his favor in order to proceed with his section 1983 due process claim against Crenshaw.")

E. Edwards v. Balisok

In Edwards v. Balisok, 520 U.S. 641 (1997), the Supreme Court extended the principle of Heck to prisoners' § 1983 challenges to prison disciplinary proceedings, claiming damages for a procedural defect in the prison administrative process, where the administrative action taken against the plaintiff resulted in the deprivation of good-time credits. Where prevailing in the challenge would necessarily affect the duration of confinement, by restoration of good-time credits, the § 1983 claim will be dismissed and plaintiff will have to invalidate the disciplinary determination through appeal or habeas corpus before pursuing a damages action. Id. at 648. The prisoner in Edwards also sought prospective injunctive relief, "requiring prison officials to date-stamp witness statements at the time they are received." The Court recognized that "[o]rdinarily, a prayer for such prospective relief will not 'necessarily imply' the invalidity of a previous loss of good-time credits, and so may properly be brought under § 1983.' However, because neither the Ninth Circuit nor the District Court considered the claim for injunctive relief, the Supreme Court left the matter for consideration by the lower courts on remand. 520 U.S. at 648, 649. Compare, e.g., Clarke v. Stalder, 154 F.3d 186, 189-91 (5th Cir. 1998) (en banc) ("[U]nlike the sort of prospective relief envisioned by the Supreme Court in Edwards that may have only an 'indirect impact' on the validity of a prisoner's conviction, . . . the type of prospective injunctive relief that Clarke requests in this case − a facial declaration of the unconstitutionality of the 'no threats of legal redress' portion of Rule 3 − is so intertwined with his request for damages and reinstatement of his lost good-time credits that a favorable ruling on the former would 'necessarily imply' the invalidity of his loss of good-time credits.") with id. at 194 (Reynaldo G. Garza, J., dissenting) ("The majority must remember that Justice Scalia in Heck established that if a federal judicial action would 'necessarily imply' the invalidity of a prison conviction the court may not act. . . . Justice Scalia's words are 'necessarily imply' not 'possibly imply' or 'probably imply.'").

See also Olivier v. City of Brandon, Mississippi, No. 22-60566, 2023 WL 5500223, at *4 (5th Cir. Aug. 25, 2023) (not reported), reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, ___ F.4th ___ (5th Cir. Nov. 14, 2024) ("Clarke squarely applies to Olivier's case. As in Clarke, Olivier also seeks to enjoin a state law under which he was convicted. . . He likewise requests 'prospective injunctive relief ... on grounds of facial unconstitutionality.'. . Under Clarke, such relief 'necessarily implies' the invalidity of the conviction and is barred under Heck. . . It also goes without saying that, as an en banc decision, Clarke is binding. . . Olivier's attempts to distinguish Clarke do not persuade us. For starters, he argues that the only relief he seeks is to enjoin the prospective enforcement of the Ordinance, not damages. Not so: Olivier sought compensatory and nominal damages at the district court. And either way, Clarke would still bar his challenge. Damages notwithstanding, Clarke makes clear that Heck forbids injunctive relief declaring a state law of conviction as 'facially unconstitutional.'. . Simply put, a '[c]onviction based on an unconstitutional rule is the sort of "obvious defect" that, when established, results in nullification of the conviction.'. . True, unlike the inmate in Clarke, Olivier is not serving his sentence. But in this circuit, Heck applies even if a § 1983 plaintiff is 'no longer in custody' and 'thus [cannot] file a habeas petition.'. . . There is admittedly friction between Clarke and these decisions. On one hand, Skinner suggests that an injunction would not 'necessarily' imply the invalidity of a conviction unless that outcome is 'inevitable.'. . Yet enjoining a law as unconstitutional may not 'inevitably' lead to the invalidity of the underlying conviction; preliminary injunctions 'merely [ ] preserve the relative positions of the parties until a trial on the merits can be held.'. . .But on the other hand, the injunctive relief in Wilkinson (parole review) and Skinner (DNA testing) resemble the one in Edwards (date-stamping): they concern matters that are entirely separate from the underlying conviction. . . That is different from a challenge to the constitutionality of the very law that led to plaintiff's conviction, as in Clarke. Again, Clarke distinguished Edwards on this very basis: it found the relief sought in Edwards had 'only an indirect impact on the validity of [the] prisoner's conviction.'. . Still, we need not bridge the gap between Clarke and these decisions today. Olivier does not claim that Clarke is no longer good law; he only seeks to distinguish it. We have already rejected those efforts above. Finally, Olivier urges us to carve out an independent exception to Heck for prospective challenges like his. That is what the Ninth Circuit did in Martin when it permitted several homeless individuals to enjoin two ordinances that banned camping and lodging on public property. . . In so doing, the Martin court reasoned that Heck ensured the 'finality and validity of previous convictions'—not to 'insulate future prosecutions from challenge.'. . But again, that brings us right back to Clarke, which Olivier does not seek to overturn. . . And because we have rejected Olivier's invitation to distinguish Clarke, we likewise leave this question for another day. All this leads to one conclusion: affirmance. But we will make one modification to the judgment. The district court denied Olivier's claims 'with prejudice.' That mandate, however, would bar Olivier from pursuing his claims even if his conviction were later 'reversed,' 'expunged,' or 'declared invalid.'. . To avoid this outcome, we have explained that the 'preferred' language under Heck is to dismiss the claims 'with prejudice to their being asserted again until the Heck conditions are met.'. .Under Clarke, Olivier's request to enjoin the enforcement of the Ordinance as unconstitutional would 'necessarily' imply the invalidity of his conviction. . . Thus, the Heck bar applies.").

But see Olivier v. City of Brandon, Mississippi, No. 22-60566, 2024 WL 4797535, at *2 n.2 , *3 (5th Cir. Nov. 14, 2024) (Ho, J., joined by Elrod, C.J., and Smith, Willett, Duncan, and Oldham, JJ., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc) ("At least two of our sister circuits also construe Heck not to apply in cases such as this. See also Martin v. City of Boise, 920 F.3d 584, 615 (9th Cir. 2019) ("Heck ... serves to ensure the finality and validity of previous convictions, not to insulate future prosecutions from challenge."); Lawrence v. McCall, 238 F. App'x 393, 396 (10th Cir. 2007) ("Heck does not bar ... prospective relief"). In City of Grants Pass v. Johnson, ––– U.S. ––– (2024), the Supreme Court abrogated Martin's interpretation of the Eighth Amendment. Grants Pass does not undermine Martin's analysis of Heck. . . .Clarke not only misreads Heck. It also defies common sense. The fact that Olivier was previously convicted under the ordinance should make him not just a permissible but a perfect plaintiff. But instead, Clarke uniquely prohibits citizens like Olivier from bringing suit. That gets things entirely backwards. And it sends an odd message to citizens who care about defending their constitutional rights. On the one hand, we tell citizens that you can't sue if you're not injured. But on the other hand, we tell them that you can't sue if you are injured. Once again, when it comes to suits against the government, the message is: 'Heads I win, tails you lose.' Tucker v. Gaddis, 40 F.4th 289, 293 (5th Cir. 2022) (Ho, J., concurring). Citizens like Olivier deserve their day in court. Clarke turns the law upside down. We should have granted rehearing en banc to overturn it."); Olivier v. City of Brandon, Mississippi, No. 22-60566, 2024 WL 4797535, at *3-4 (5th Cir. Nov. 14, 2024) (Oldham, J., joined by Elrod, C.J., and Jones, Smith, Richman, Willett, Ho, and Duncan, JJ., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) ("As we recently said while sitting en banc: '[A] suit seeking prospective injunctive relief does not implicate Heck's favorable-termination requirement (or, for that matter, Preiser's habeas-channeling rationale).' Wilson v. Midland Cnty., 116 F.4th 384, 398 n.5 (5th Cir. 2024) (en banc) (emphasis added) (citing Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994), and Preiser v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 475 (1973)). The panel in this case nevertheless applied the Heck bar to a street preacher's claim for injunctive relief. That result is indefensible. . . . As our en banc court recently explained, Heck bars the retrospective use of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 to collaterally attack criminal convictions. . . Contrariwise, Heck permits prospective-relief claims that (1) do not implicate the habeas remedy of release from custody, and that (2) do not resemble 'tort suits that would undermine criminal proceedings and judgments.'. . Heck plainly does nothing to bar Olivier's prospective-relief claim. In relevant part, Olivier seeks a court order 'enjoin[ing] named defendants from taking specified unlawful actions'—namely, enforcing a law that abridges his constitutional rights in the future. Injunctions do not work backwards to invalidate official actions taken in the past. Rather, they operate to prevent future official enforcement actions upon threat of contempt. . . 'All that a court can do is announce its opinion that the statute violates the Constitution, decline to enforce the statute in cases before the court, and instruct executive officers not to initiate enforcement proceedings.'. . None of that does anything to undermine, collaterally attack, or otherwise impose tort liability on Olivier's previous conviction. . . . The grant of a forward-looking injunction. . . does not invalidate Olivier's previous conviction. Viewed in this light, it is clear that Heck does not bar § 1983 claims for prospective injunctive relief. Indeed, at least one of our sister circuits has expressly rejected this interpretation of Heck. See Martin v. City of Boise, 920 F.3d 584, 614 (9th Cir. 2019) ("The logical extension of the district court's interpretation is that an individual who does not successfully invalidate a first conviction under an unconstitutional statute will have no opportunity to challenge that statute prospectively so as to avoid arrest and conviction for violating that same statute in the future. Neither Wilkinson nor any other case in the Heck line supports such a result. Rather, Wolff, Edwards, and Wilkinson compel the opposite conclusion."). * The panel's decision is unpublished, so it carries no precedential effect under our rule of orderliness. It also conflicts with Wilson. So if there is a saving grace, it is that future panels can do the right thing—notwithstanding today's error. That is hollow solace to Gabriel Olivier, of course. He deserves better. I respectfully dissent.")

Compare Hebrard v. Nofziger, 90 F.4th 1000, 1008, 1010-13 (9th Cir. 2024) ("[W]e find that under this case law, it is clear from the face of Hebrard's complaint that his claim is Heck-barred. His claim is materially similar to the claim in Edwards that was found to be barred by Heck. . . . [I]f Hebrard's complaint makes clear that he wants to obtain a judicial determination that his disciplinary 'conviction was wrongful,' his claim is barred by Heck even though he did not request 'damages directly attributable to' the loss of his earned-time credits in his prayer for relief. . . A plain reading of Hebrard's complaint reveals that his § 1983 claim seeks such a ruling. . . . [C]ontrary to the position taken by the Second Circuit in Peralta, . . . a prisoner's conscious decision not to request relief for the loss of his earned-time credits does not mean his claim does not challenge the validity of the duration of his confinement. . . Rather, as the Edwards Court explained, a prisoner's due process challenge 'to the procedures' employed at his disciplinary hearing 'necessarily impl[ies] the invalidity of the deprivation of his [earned]-time credits'—even if he affirmatively declines to bring a direct challenge to 'the result[ing]' revocation of his earned-time credits—so long as the alleged 'procedural defect,' if proven, would demonstrate the 'invalidity of the judgment' in his disciplinary hearing. . . That is precisely what Hebrard's due process claim demands. . . He seeks a judicial determination that he was improperly adjudged guilty and thereby impermissibly sanctioned for baseless rule violations because of Nofziger's unconstitutional actions: Nofziger's alleged refusal to call witnesses, to present evidence of wrongdoing, to conduct an investigation, or to permit Hebrard to put on a defense. Because Edwards resolved a due process challenge that is factually analogous to the claim in Hebrard's complaint, it compels the result we reach here. Namely, although Hebrard does not seek to recover for his lost earned-time credits, his claim is barred by Heck because he challenges the constitutional validity of his disciplinary conviction, which constitutes an implied challenge to the validity of the sanctions imposed as a result.") with Hebrard v. Nofziger, 90 F.4th 1000, 1014, 1017-22 (9th Cir. 2024) (Sung, J., dissenting) ("Plaintiff Alexander Hebrard, an Oregon state prisoner, filed a claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 challenging a prison disciplinary action that resulted in various sanctions, including revocation of 27 days of earned-time credits. The district court sua sponte dismissed Hebrard's § 1983 claim for failure to state a claim based on Heck v. Humphrey[.] I agree with the majority that Heck is an affirmative defense, and that the defendant, Nofziger, bears the burden of proving it applies. I also agree with the majority that Hebrard's § 1983 action, if successful, would necessarily imply the invalidity of the revocation of Hebrard's earned-time credits—even though his complaint does not seek restoration of those credits. . . However, I disagree with the majority's conclusion that the district court properly dismissed Hebrard's claim as Heck-barred. . . .The question at the heart of this case is: Would restoration of Hebrard's earned-time credits necessarily lead to his immediate or speedier release from custody? On this record, we simply do not know the answer to that question. Under Oregon law, it is possible that Hebrard is receiving earned-time credits that cannot lead to his immediate or speedier release. And we can't rule out that possibility because we don't know what sentence or sentences Hebrard is serving, or what his underlying conviction or convictions are. Because we can't be certain that restoration of Hebrard's earned-time credits would necessarily affect the duration of his custody, we can't be certain that his claim is Heck-barred. . . . We can't tell from the record whether restoration of Hebrard's earned-time credits would necessarily affect the length of time he must serve. Therefore, we can't tell whether his claim was properly dismissed under Heck. . . . In this case, Nofziger conceded at oral argument that we have no way of knowing on this record that Hebrard is not serving an indeterminate sentence. This means it is possible that Hebrard (like Engweiler and Nettles) is serving an indeterminate sentence that is eligible for earned-time credits but a parole board retains discretion to decide when to release him (if ever). If so, then restoration of Hebrard's earned-time credits would not necessarily lead to his immediate or earlier release, and his claim is not Heck-barred. . . . I agree with the majority that, because the district court dismissed Hebrard's complaint for failure to state a claim, we should 'affirm the district court's dismissal of his claim only if the Heck bar is obvious from the face of his complaint.' However, I disagree with the majority's conclusion that the Heck bar is obvious from the face of Hebrard's complaint. . . .Moreover, it was Nofziger's burden to prove that the Heck affirmative defense applies—Hebrard was not required to plead enough facts in his complaint to show that Heck does not apply. The majority and I agree that Heck is an affirmative defense. Therefore, compliance with Heck is 'not a pleading requirement.'. . . Because it is not obvious from the face of Hebrard's complaint that his claim is Heck-barred, and Heck compliance is not a pleading requirement, the district court erred in concluding that Hebrard 'failed to state a claim' based on Heck. Further, because Hebrard did not fail to state a claim, the district court erred in concluding that it was obliged to dismiss his claim under 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii). . . .We don't know whether Hebrard's claim is actually Heck-barred. But even assuming that Nofziger could have met his burden to prove that Heck applies (and simply neglected to do so), I fear that the majority's decision will have unintended consequences for future cases. . . . The majority's decision . . . effectively turns the Heck affirmative defense into a pleading requirement for prisoners proceeding in forma pauperis under the PLRA, at least in cases that involve postconviction credits. Unless the prisoner makes clear on the face of the complaint that restoration of the prisoner's credits would not necessarily lead to their immediate or earlier release, then, under the precedent set by the majority's opinion, the district court will be required under § 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii) to sua sponte dismiss the complaint for failure to state a claim. . . . On this record, we do not have the information we need to be certain that Hebrard's claim is within the core of habeas and properly dismissed as Heck-barred. Because the record does not include that essential information, the district court erred in (1) determining that the Heck bars Hebrard's claim, and (2) dismissing his complaint for failure to state a claim. Hebrard was not required to plead around the Heck affirmative defense. Moreover, Nofziger forfeited (and possibly waived) the Heck affirmative defense and failed to meet his burden to prove that Heck applies despite having multiple opportunities to do so. For these reasons, I would reverse the district court's dismissal of Hebrard's § 1983 claim as barred by Heck, and I respectfully dissent.")

See also Moskos v. Hardee, 24 F.4th 289, 295-96 (4th Cir. 2022) ("Moskos alleges that the defendants violated his substantive and procedural due process rights by conducting a sham investigation, following which he was convicted of several disciplinary infractions and lost good-time credits. Moskos brought his suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, which provides a cause of action for individuals seeking damages for constitutional violations. But § 1983 does not provide a cause of action in the circumstances present here. The Supreme Court has long held that 'habeas corpus is the appropriate remedy for state prisoners attacking the validity of the fact or length of their confinement' and that this 'specific determination must override the general terms of § 1983.'. . This principle applies just as clearly to prison disciplinary convictions resulting in the loss of good-time credits as it does to other convictions, since the restoration of good-time credits is 'within the core of habeas corpus in attacking the very duration of [the prisoner's] physical confinement itself.'. .It has long been settled law, therefore, that a plaintiff may not challenge the validity of a disciplinary conviction through a damages suit under § 1983. In particular, 'when a state prisoner seeks damages in a § 1983 suit, the district court must consider whether a judgment in favor of the plaintiff would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction or sentence.'. . If so, 'the complaint must be dismissed unless the plaintiff can demonstrate that the conviction or sentence already has been invalidated,' whether on direct appeal, by executive order, by a state tribunal, or by a federal court's issuance of a writ of habeas corpus. . . In Edwards v. Balisok, . . . the Supreme Court made clear that this rule applies not merely to substantive challenges to convictions, but also to those challenges to internal prison procedures that would be 'such as necessarily to imply the invalidity of the judgment.'. . . And Balisok was emphatic as to how the courts should handle such claims: '[A] claim is either cognizable under § 1983 and should immediately go forward, or is not cognizable and should be dismissed.'. . Here, as in Balisok, Moskos brings a due process challenge to the disciplinary investigation conducted against him, which resulted in the loss of good-time credits. Here, as in Balisok, Moskos has not invalidated his disciplinary convictions. And here, for virtually identical reasons as in Balisok, Moskos's due process challenge would 'necessarily imply the invalidity of the punishment imposed.'. .After all, the gravamen of Moskos's due process argument is that the defendants falsified information, because of which 'Moskos was ultimately found guilty of three prison disciplinary offenses that he did not commit,' causing him to lose good-time credits. . . [A] conclusion that prison staff fabricated evidence to cover up their involvement clearly would imply that Moskos's disciplinary convictions were invalid. Indeed, Moskos states repeatedly that he was wrongfully convicted 'based solely' on the due process violations he alleges. . . Because his claims would necessarily imply the invalidity of the judgment, they must be dismissed under Balisok. If Moskos believes that he has been wrongfully convicted of these disciplinary infractions, he is of course free to seek legal recourse. But if he seeks to do so in federal court, he must use the channel that Congress has provided for such claims. That path is through a habeas petition, subject to those statutory requirements that Congress carefully crafted to respect the finality of state judgments. In law, unlike in history, not all roads lead to Rome. Since Moskos did not take a proper road, we affirm the district court as to his due process claim."); Colvin v. LeBlanc, 2 F.4th 494, 499 (5th Cir. 2021) ("Colvin maintains that he should be released in 2023, not 2052, and challenges the methodology used to calculate his release date. Regardless of whether Colvin challenges the application of good time credit or the failure to credit his state sentence with federal time served, his claim ultimately challenges a single issue: the duration of his state sentence. A claim for speedier release is actionable by writ of habeas corpus. . . and a § 1983 damages action predicated on the sentence calculation issue is barred by Heck because success on that claim would necessarily invalidate the duration of his incarceration."); Lennear v. Wilson, 937 F.3d 257, 267, 276-77 (4th Cir. 2019) ("On March 6, 2017, Petitioner filed a habeas petition under 28 U.S.C. § 2241 in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia. . . on grounds that the disciplinary review process violated his due process rights because he was denied access to and official consideration of video surveillance evidence of the incident, citing Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539 (1974). . . . In Edwards v. Balisok, 520 U.S. 641 (1997), the Supreme Court expressly rejected the use of Hill's 'some evidence' standard in the procedural due process context. In particular, the Court held that Hill's 'some evidence' standard addresses the 'evidentiary requirements of due process' but 'in no way abrogate[s] the due process requirements enunciated in Wolff.'. . Accordingly, Hill's 'some evidence' standard is 'irrelevant' in determining whether a denial of procedural due process is harmless. . . Rather than applying Hill's 'some evidence' standard, courts tasked with determining whether prison officials' failure to disclose or consider testimonial or documentary was harmless have considered whether the excluded evidence could have 'aided' the inmate's defense. . . Accordingly, we hold that in evaluating whether prison officials' failure to disclose or consider evidence was harmless, courts must determine whether the excluded evidence could have aided the inmate's defense."); James v. Pfister, 708 F. App'x 876, ___ (7th Cir. 2017) ("We agree with James that the district court erred in relying on Heck as a reason to dismiss his lawsuit. Heck and Edwards do not bar review of prison disciplinary proceedings under § 1983 unless that review could imply the invalidity of the plaintiff's continued custody. . . As we explained in Simpson, . . . Heck and Edwards are 'beside the point' for inmates whose infractions are punished by disciplinary segregation or restrictions on recreation, since neither penalty 'is a form of "custody" under federal law.' In contrast, Heck and Edwards will be an obstacle for an inmate who tries using § 1983 to regain good time that was revoked after a disciplinary hearing, since he remains in 'custody.' But James did not lose good time, a fact confirmed by an attachment to his appellate brief."); LaFountain v. Harry, 716 F.3d 944, 950 (6th Cir. 2013) ("In substance, LaFountain's claim based on his misconduct charges is a claim that the defendants entrapped him. But entrapment is generally a complete defense. . . Thus, if true, the prison should not have convicted LaFountain of the misconduct charges that resulted in the loss of his good-time credits. Moreover, LaFountain alleged that Barbier 'purposefully falsified evidence in order to assure that [LaFountain] would be found guilty[.]' This allegation, too, implies the invalidity of the prison's misconduct findings and thus the deprivation of LaFountain's good-time credits. . . And the duration of LaFountain's confinement is directly affected by the loss of his good-time credits. . . Thus in this appeal, as in an earlier one, 'LaFountain's challenges to his misconduct hearings and the resultant loss of "good time" credits[ ] affect the length of his sentence and ... are barred under Edwards and Heck.'. . LaFountain tries to circumvent Heck by citing Thomas v. Eby, 481 F.3d 434 (6th Cir.2007). There, the court allowed a prisoner to proceed with a retaliation claim based on a misconduct charge even though the prisoner was convicted of the misconduct. But Thomas involved disciplinary credits, not good-time credits. And 'disciplinary credits ... do not determine when a sentence ... is completed[.]'. . Here, in contrast, the prison deprived LaFountain of good-time credits, which do result in a reduction of a prisoner's sentence. . .Thomas is therefore inapposite."); White v. Fox, 294 F. App'x 955, ___ (5th Cir. 2008) ("A 'conviction,' for purposes of Heck, includes a ruling in a prison disciplinary proceeding that results in a change to the prisoner's sentence, including the loss of good-time credits. . . . A claim for damages based on a failure to receive a written statement of the evidence relied on in a prison disciplinary proceeding is cognizable under § 1983. Therefore, the district court in this case erred in dismissing White's § 1983 claim in its entirety. . . .On remand, the district court should decide White's § 1983 claim to the extent that White seeks damages for the disciplinary board's failure to provide him with a written statement of the evidence relied on during the disciplinary proceeding. The court should also consider the 'snitch' claim and the alleged harm that resulted from this designation. We caution, however, that the damages cannot encompass the 'injury' of being deprived of good-time credits, and must stem solely from 'the deprivation of civil rights.'")

Compare Yarbrough v. Decatur Housing Authority, 941 F.3d 1022, 1028-30 (11th Cir. 2019) ("[T]he precedents holding that procedural due process prohibits decisions predicated on no evidence must not be understood to license review of the correctness of an agency decision. Instead, these precedents establish only that a procedure that permits decisions founded on no evidence violates the Due Process Clauses. . . .As the Supreme Court explained in Hill, the form of minimal evidentiary review mandated in some contexts by procedural due process requires only 'some evidence' that 'supports the decision' in question. . . . The decision to terminate Yarbrough's voucher satisfies this standard. The Authority's decision was based on testimony from Gray, two grand jury indictments, arrest records, and testimony from Yarbrough herself. As noted, Yarbrough admitted the arrests and did not deny that she had sold prescription medications to an undercover informant or otherwise dispute the factual basis of the charges. This evidence supported the conclusion reached by the Authority, . . . namely, that Yarbrough had engaged in drug-related criminal activity. . . .As we have explained, no procedural due process violation follows from an agency's failure to introduce evidence sufficient under the applicable standard of proof. Although due process may require a particular standard of proof in a certain kind of proceeding, . . . the Due Process Clauses do not forbid garden-variety errors in applying standards of proof, regardless of the legal source of those standards. As a result, we conclude that the decision to terminate Yarbrough's voucher easily passes muster under the 'some evidence' standard. Yarbrough argues that procedural due process prohibits a housing authority from rendering a termination decision based solely on unreliable and non-probative hearsay, but we need not reach that issue. Nor must we decide whether procedural due process requires some assessment of the reliability and probative value of hearsay evidence. Yarbrough's indictments and arrest records, especially in the light of her own testimony, bear sufficient indicia of reliability and are adequately probative to constitute 'some evidence' in support of the Authority's decision.") with Yarbrough v. Decatur Housing Authority, 941 F.3d 1022, 1031 (11th Cir. 2019) (Martin, J., concurring) ("In my view, due process requires more than Hill's 'some evidence' standard for the voucher-termination decision. The Majority Opinion suggests that Supreme Court 'precedents establish only that a procedure that permits decisions founded on no evidence violates the Due Process Clauses.'. . But this statement overlooks the additional requirements described in Wolff[.] . . . As the Supreme Court clarified, Hill 'in no way abrogated' Wolff; rather, Hill should be considered 'in addition to' the earlier Wolff decision. . . So, in addition to 'some evidence,' due process in this voucher-termination case also requires: (1) advance 'written notice of the charges'; and (2) 'a written statement by the factfinders as to the evidence relied on and reasons for the disciplinary action.'. . .I therefore concur in the Majority's judgment that the Authority did put forth some evidence to support its decision to terminate Yarbrough's Section 8 housing voucher, but not in the Majority Opinion's propositions that Hill rejected the 'substantial evidence' standard and that the due process requirements in Hill are exhaustive.")

See also Elder v. McCarthy, 967 F.3d 113, 124, 126, 129-30 (2d Cir. 2020) ("[A] sentence requiring an inmate to serve time in the SHU represents a substantial loss of liberty even for a lawfully imprisoned person. As noted above, the confinement is much more restrictive and other conditions, such as unrelenting light and lack of exercise, are harsh. Accordingly, our prior rulings have left no room to doubt that 'certain due process protections must be observed before an inmate may be subject to confinement in the SHU.'. . These protections include providing the inmate with 'advance written notice of the charges; a fair and impartial hearing officer; a reasonable opportunity to call witnesses and present documentary evidence; and a written statement of the disposition, including supporting facts and reasons for the action taken.'. . As the Supreme Court has observed, '[c]hief among the[se] due process minima ... [i]s the right of an inmate to call and present witnesses ... in his defense before the disciplinary board.'. . An inmate's request to call witnesses may be denied due to 'irrelevance or lack of necessity,' or where 'granting the request would be unduly hazardous to institutional safety or correctional goals.'. . The burden to defend such a denial, however, 'is not upon the inmate to prove the official's conduct was arbitrary and capricious, but upon the official to prove the rationality of the position.'. . .Due process principles require prison authorities 'to provide assistance to an inmate in marshaling evidence and presenting a defense when he is faced with disciplinary charges.'. . When the inmate is confined before the hearing, 'the duty of assistance is greater because the inmate's ability to help himself is reduced.'. . Such required assistance includes 'gathering evidence, obtaining documents and relevant tapes, and interviewing witnesses.'. .This constitutional obligation is violated by a 'failure to ... interview an inmate's requested witnesses without assigning a valid reason.'. . As with the failure to make witnesses available at a disciplinary hearing, '[t]he burden is not upon the inmate to prove the [assistant's] conduct was arbitrary and capricious, but upon the [assistant] to prove the rationality of his position.'. .The Supreme Court instructed in 1985 that due process prohibits disciplinary action affecting an inmate's liberty interest without 'some evidence' of guilt. . . A reviewing court's application of this standard 'does not require examination of the entire record, independent assessment of the credibility of witnesses, or weighing of the evidence.'. . Rather, the court considers 'whether there is any evidence in the record that could support the conclusion reached by the disciplinary board.'. .Read at its most expansive, the Court's 1985 articulation suggests a low standard indeed. In this Circuit, however, we have not 'construed the phrase "any evidence" literally.' Rather, we have required that such disciplinary determinations be supported by some 'reliable evidence' of guilt. . . .[W]e conclude that Kling's findings that Elder was guilty of both forgery and theft were not supported by some reliable evidence. . . Although the record demonstrates that Kling inspected the Lawrence disbursement forms and concluded that the handwriting on those forms was similar to the handwriting on Elder's documents, the entire proceeding rested on the assumption—one unsupported by any direct evidence and supported by McCarthy's report only by inference—that forgery and theft had occurred. The hearing record lacked any direct evidence that Lawrence had complained of theft or forgery, or that money was withdrawn from Lawrence's account against his will. Further, the hearing record before Kling contained no samples of withdrawal forms submitted by Lawrence in the past, or any reliable sample of Lawrence's signature to suggest that the targeted forms were in fact forgeries. Thus, in the absence of a reliable sample of Lawrence's signature on a withdrawal form, Elder was accused of forgery based merely on the fact that the written signatures on the targeted forms looked similar to his handwriting. This unusual aspect of the record persuades us that, in the circumstances of this case, the evidence before Kling was insufficient to find Elder guilty of theft and forgery.")

F. Muhammad v. Close

In Muhammad v. Close, 540 U.S. 749 (2004) (per curiam), the Supreme Court confirmed the view of a majority of the circuits that 'Heck's requirement to resort to state litigation and federal habeas before § 1983 is not . . . implicated by a prisoner's challenge that threatens no consequence for his conviction or the duration of his sentence.' Id. at 751. Thus, assuming a challenge to such disciplinary administrative determinations raises no implication for the underlying conviction and has no impact on the duration of the sentence through revocation of good-time credits, the Heck favorable-termination rule will not apply. Id. at 754, 755. See also Taylor v. United States Probation Office, 409 F.3d 426, 427(D.C. Cir. 2005) ("Because Taylor's complaint challenges only the fact that he was confined at one facility rather than another and, thus, does not challenge the fact or duration of his confinement, the rule of Heck is inapplicable."); Martinez v. Lunes, No. 1:04-cv-6469-LJO-DLB PC, 2007 WL 4539010, at *2 (E.D.Cal. Dec. 19, 2007) ("In this action, plaintiff challenges the validity of his disciplinary weapon conviction; however, as he points out in his opposition, the conviction does not affect the validity of his confinement or its duration because he did not lose good time credits as a result of the conviction. Plaintiff alleges in his amended complaint, and defendants do not dispute, that as a result of the weapons conviction, plaintiff received a ten-month SHU term and loss of privileges. Because the punishment imposed at the disciplinary hearing does not affect the duration of plaintiff's sentence, this action is not barred by Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477, 487-88 (1994) or Edwards v. Balisok, 520 U.S. 641 (1997).).

Compare Peralta v. Vasquez, 467 F.3d 98, 100 (2d Cir. 2006) ("What is not clear, however, is whether a prisoner who was subject to a single disciplinary proceeding that gave rise to two types of sanctions − one that affected the duration of his custody and the other that affected the conditions of his confinement − can, without needing to satisfy the favorable termination rule, maintain a § 1983 action aimed solely at the second type of sanction. We now resolve this open question and hold that, in 'mixed sanctions' cases, a prisoner can, without demonstrating that the challenged disciplinary proceedings or resulting punishments have been invalidated, proceed separately with a § 1983 action aimed at the sanctions or procedures that affected the conditions of his confinement. But we also hold that he may only bring such an action if he agrees to abandon forever any and all claims he has with respect to the sanctions that affected the length of his imprisonment."); Pollard v. Romero, No. 07-cv-00399-EWN-KLM, 2008 WL 1826187, at *6, *7 (D. Colo. Apr. 23, 2008) ("[T]he single disciplinary proceeding in this case gave rise to a mixed sanction (i.e., segregation) that affects both the conditions of Mr. Pollard's confinement and its terms. . . Mr. Pollard has not introduced any evidence that his disciplinary conviction has been invalidated. . . Therefore, the magistrate judge concluded that his claim should be dismissed. . . This conclusion poses a more pressing question which is now before me, namely, whether and under what circumstances a prisoner may employ section 1983 in a mixed sanctions case to challenge the conditions rather than the terms of his confinement. Neither the Supreme Court of the United States nor the Tenth Circuit has answered this question yet. However, the Second circuit in Peralta v. Vasquez, 467 F.3d 98, 104 (2nd Cir.2006) has addressed the issue. . . . The magistrate judge considered the Peralta court's approach but rejected it without analysis. I disagree and find the Second Circuit's reasoning persuasive. Therefore, considering the state court's pending decision concerning the validity of Plaintiff's disciplinary conviction and considering the possibility that Plaintiff would be willing to abandon his duration claim, . . . staying this proceeding is more appropriate because it will allow Plaintiff to pursue his claim related to the conditions of confinement (assuming he meets the requirements).") with Haywood v. Hathaway, 842 F.3d 1026, 1028-30 (7th Cir. 2016) ("[N]o matter what a prisoner demands, or waives, § 1983 cannot be used to contest the fact or duration of confinement. See Preiser v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 475, 93 S.Ct. 1827, 36 L.Ed.2d 439 (1973). From its outset, this suit has been a quest for money damages. That's not all. The holding of Heck and Edwards is that a claim under § 1983 does not accrue as long as it would imply the invalidity of a conviction or disciplinary sanction that affects the duration of custody. If the claim has not accrued, it cannot matter what relief a prisoner seeks. Yet if it is possible to seek damages while waiving other relief, this must mean that the claim accrues immediately and the statute of limitations runs from the time of the events said to be wrongful. That would surprise the many prisoners who wait patiently until they are entitled to sue under Heck, for if Haywood is right the time to do so could have expired. Haywood relies on Peralta v. Vasquez, 467 F.3d 98 (2d Cir. 2006), which held that a prisoner who foreswears any contest to the length of his confinement may use § 1983 to seek damages. The Second Circuit understood 'the purpose of the Heck favorable termination requirement [to be] to prevent prisoners from using § 1983 to vitiate collaterally a judicial or administrative decision that affected the overall length of their confinement'. . . To disavow any collateral attack on the conviction or revocation of good-time credits is to take the situation outside Heck, the court concluded. We do not agree with that conclusion, which no other circuit has adopted (though none has expressly rejected it, either). Heck and Edwards say that a challenge is not possible as long as it is inconsistent with the validity of a conviction or disciplinary sanction. . . .This is a version of issue preclusion (collateral estoppel), under which the outstanding criminal judgment or disciplinary sanction, as long as it stands, blocks any inconsistent civil judgment. . . It is a rationale considerably different from the one that Peralta attributed to the Court. . . . Nothing in Heck, Edwards, or any of the Court's later decisions suggests that the 'favorable termination' element that the Court thought essential can be elided by a plaintiff's disavowing a kind of relief that Preiser holds is never available under § 1983 in the first place. The approach taken in Peralta is incompatible with Heck and its successors; Peralta is functionally what would happen if the whole sequence were overruled and only Preiser left standing. Peralta is incompatible not only with the Supreme Court's decisions but also with McCurdy v. Sheriff of Madison County, 128 F.3d 1144 (7th Cir. 1997), which held that a plaintiff cannot sidestep Heck by conceding a conviction's validity. Our decision in Burd v. Sessler, 702 F.3d 429, 435–36 (7th Cir. 2012), which holds that a prisoner cannot avoid Heck by waiting until the sentence expires and it is too late to file a collateral attack, also is irreconcilable with the Second Circuit's view that a § 1983 suit for damages is permissible whenever it cannot end in a decision that changes the length of a person's confinement. We decline to follow Peralta, which did not mention McCurdy and therefore created a conflict among the circuits, perhaps unintentionally. We shall stick with the established law of this circuit.")

See also Santos v. White, 18 F.4th 472, 476-77 (5th Cir. 2021) ("Because Heck applies to the duration of confinement, it applies not just to criminal convictions but also to prison disciplinary rulings that 'result[ ] in a change to the prisoner's sentence, including the loss of good-time credits.' Clarke v. Stalder, 154 F.3d 186, 189 (5th Cir. 1998) (en banc). Heck therefore bars claims that would, if accepted, 'negate' a prison disciplinary finding that had resulted in the loss of good-time credits. . . Meanwhile, Heck is not 'implicated by a prisoner's challenge that threatens no consequence for his conviction or the duration of his sentence.'. . Rather, a claim is barred only if granting it 'requires negation of an element of the criminal offense or proof of a fact that is inherently inconsistent with one underlying the criminal conviction.'. . The resulting inquiry is 'fact-intensive' and dependent on the precise nature of the disciplinary offense. . . It is unclear, from the record, whether any of Santos's claims are barred by Heck. In his disciplinary proceeding, Santos was found guilty of nine rules violations: three 'Defiance' violations, four 'Aggravated Disobedience' violations, one 'Property Destruction' violation, and one 'Unauthorized Area' violation. Though the disciplinary reports list factual findings, the elements required to find a prisoner guilty of those violations do not appear anywhere in the record. It is thus impossible to determine which facts were necessary to the disciplinary board's conclusions. It may be that the elements of, for instance, aggravated disobedience would be logically incompatible with some of Santos's claims of excessive force, but the record does not currently permit that inference. Furthermore, not all of the disciplinary board's findings implicate Heck. The board imposed a forfeiture of 180 days of good time for one count each of aggravated disobedience, defiance, and property destruction, all arising from Santos's assault on Wells in the Fox-6 D-Tier area of the prison; his other violations, including all of those in the shower, resulted in sanctions such as loss of canteen and phone privileges. Disciplinary sanctions of that type bear on the 'circumstances of confinement,' rather than on that confinement's 'validity' or 'duration,' and are thus not barred by Heck. . . Moreover, the disciplinary board imposed no sanctions at all on Santos for actions after the administration of the chemical agent in the shower, and it noted that he 'complied with orders' after that point. Thus, Heck does not bar Santos's claims from that point onward. It is not sufficient to deem Santos's claims to be 'intertwined' with his loss of good-time credits. Rather, in applying Heck, a court must bar only those claims that are 'necessarily at odds with' the disciplinary rulings, and only with those rulings that resulted in the loss of good time credits. . . The defendants have thus not met their burden for summary judgment on the current record. Whether the board's findings related to the assault on Wells bar the corresponding claims by Santos must be determined by a fact-specific analysis informed by the elements necessary to establish those violations."); Santos v. White, 18 F.4th 472, 477-79 (5th Cir. 2021) (Willett, J., concurring in the judgment) ("This case involves an all-too-common set of facts: Appellant (a prisoner) claims that Appellees (prison officers) spontaneously and unlawfully abused him. Appellees, on the other hand, insist they used lawful force to control Appellant's misbehavior. Though the majority opinion reaches the correct conclusion—the district court erred in its unqualified dismissal under Heck—I write to emphasize two points of departure. . . First, my colleagues punt on Heck when a hand-off is warranted. Could the record have more information? Absolutely. Do we need more? No. Heck does not categorically compel an element-by-element inquiry, and the majority opinion needlessly complicates things by concluding that the record precludes analysis. This case is Aucoin redux. . . Appellant maintains he was subject to unprovoked, unlawful violence at every stage of the encounter. . . But if true, he 'cannot be guilty of [the offenses for which he lost good-time credit]—in direct conflict with his disciplinary conviction.'. . So we need not dwell on the component elements of Appellant's conviction to determine that most of his claims are incompatible with the disciplinary board's findings. Take the claims arising from the pre-shower salvo. The majority implies that some of these claims may not be Heck barred. . . Sure, Heck is not 'implicated by a prisoner's challenge that threatens no consequence for ... the duration of his sentence.'. . But all of Appellant's pre-shower claims turn on the same narrative: He was attacked without provocation. This is fundamentally inconsistent with the officers' account, which prompted Appellant's loss of good-time credit for property destruction, aggravated disobedience, and defiance. Most of Appellant's suit thereby 'challenges the factual determination that underlies his conviction[s],'. . .meaning most of his claims fail. But most does not mean all. A portion of Appellant's suit alleged violence unrelated to any supposed need to gain control. Appellant pleaded an excessive-force claim against Captain Wells for ordering him to 'spread his butt cheeks' and spraying him 'in the anus with pe[p]per spray.' Appellant also pleaded that Captain Wells threatened and cut him with a knife after he was 'no longer resisting or attempting to flee or, otherwise, commit any crime.' These are not trivial details. Neither the incident report nor any other summary-judgment evidence provides an iota of justification for this alleged force. We are thus left with no circumstance where these claims, if proven true, would conflict with Appellant's disciplinary conviction—let alone those portions that impacted the duration of his confinement. . . This is not to say that the elements underlying an administrative offense are categorically irrelevant under Heck.. . But no case, until today, suggests this information is an analytical prerequisite. . . I nonetheless join the judgment because, as was the case in Aucoin, 'the district court erred in dismissing all of [Appellant's] claims under Heck.'"); Gray v. White, 18 F.4th 463, 468-69 (5th Cir. 2021) ("The record is insufficient to determine whether, or which of, Gray's claims are barred by Heck. The disciplinary reports list various factual findings but do not state which of these findings were necessary to his convictions. It is unclear, for instance, whether commission of 'aggravated disobedience,' as defined by the disciplinary board, would still leave room for the possibility that the officers' use of force in response to Gray's disobedience violated his Eighth Amendment rights—or, to put it differently, whether 'it is possible for [Gray] to have [committed all ten rule violations] and for [the officers' use of force] to have' been applied maliciously and sadistically to cause harm. . . If so, 'Heck does not bar [his] claim.'. . Moreover, not all of Gray's disciplinary violations resulted in the loss of good time credits. The reports of the disciplinary board indicate that he forfeited ninety days' good time as a cumulative sanction for several of his defiance and aggravated-disobedience infractions, all of which were based on conduct occurring within the shower, but that his sanctions for intoxication, contraband, and property destruction instead resulted in fines and loss of privileges. Disciplinary sanctions of this type bear on the 'circumstances of confinement' rather than that confinement's 'validity' or 'duration' and thus are not barred by Heck.. . Because it remains possible reasonably to infer the compatibility of Gray's claims and those findings of the disciplinary board necessary to find Gray guilty of the violations resulting in loss of good time, the defendants have not met their burden for summary judgment with regard to the Heck bar. Whether Gray's claims within the shower are in fact barred on the basis of the disciplinary board's findings of defiance and aggravated disobedience must be determined by a fact-specific analysis informed by the elements necessary to establish those violations."); Gray v. White, 18 F.4th 463, 470-71 (5th Cir. 2021) (Willett, J., concurring in judgment alone) ("I concur in the judgment for the same reasons discussed in my concurrence today in Santos v. White, No. 20-30048, —— F.4th ——, 2021 WL 5346744 (5th Cir. 2021). Rather than reiterate my reservations in a footnote, however, I write separately to address the points of departure unique to this case. . .The majority opinion overlooks two critical facts. First, not all of Appellant's disciplinary violations resulted in the loss of good-time credits. Appellant forfeited 90 days of good-time credit as a cumulative sanction for several of his defiance and aggravated-disobedience infractions, all of which were based on conduct occurring within the shower. But other sanctions—namely, those in his cell for intoxication and contraband—resulted in fines and loss of privileges. This ameliorates any conflict between Appellant's in cell account of unprovoked violence and the Appellees' recollection. Even had these offenses impacted his confinement, Appellant's claim (that Captain Wells used unlawful force) does not contradict the offenses (intoxication and contraband) for which he was found guilty. . .Second, Appellant also alleged that Captain Wells unlawfully assaulted him while en route to the shower. Neither the incident reports nor any coordinate administrative violation provides a justification for this alleged use of force of force. I therefore see no basis to conclude that this facet of Appellant's claim 'squarely challenges [any] factual determination' of the prison disciplinary board. . .As such, I would hold that these claims can proceed and REVERSE.")

See also Morgan v. Schott, 914 F.3d 1115, 1117-22 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Prisoners cannot make an end run around Heck by filing an affidavit waiving challenges to the portion of their punishment that revokes good-time credits. We recently addressed that very tactic and found it incompatible with the Heck line of cases. Haywood v. Hathaway, 842 F.3d 1026 (7th Cir. 2016). Morgan provides no reason to question Haywood, and we reaffirm its reasoning. Morgan's attempt to analogize his case to Wilkinson v. Dotson, 544 U.S. 74, 125 S.Ct. 1242, 161 L.Ed.2d 253 (2005), and Skinner v. Switzer, 562 U.S. 521, 131 S.Ct. 1289, 179 L.Ed.2d 233 (2011), misunderstands those decisions. Judgment in Morgan's favor would necessarily imply the invalidity of his prison discipline. Thus, no § 1983 claim has accrued. This suit is premature and must be dismissed without prejudice. . . .As part of Morgan's strategy to avoid the Heck bar, he filed an affidavit purporting to 'abandon any and all present and future challenges' and 'waiv[e] for all times all claims' pertaining to the portion of his punishment that impacted the duration of his confinement. He preserved only 'claims challenging the sanctions affecting the conditions of [his] confinement.' Morgan argued that his affidavit rendered Heck inapplicable, citing the Second Circuit's decision in Peralta v. Vasquez, 467 F.3d 98 (2d Cir. 2006). The magistrate judge concluded that Heck barred Morgan's suit and entered summary judgment for Schott and Veath, dismissing Morgan's due-process claim with prejudice. The judge rejected Morgan's attempt to use strategic waiver to 'dodge' Heck. He said Morgan's due-process claim 'call[s] into question the validity of the prison discipline[ ] because to accept that claim necessarily implie[s] that the discipline was somehow invalid.'. . .Morgan relies on Peralta v. Vasquez, 467 F.3d 98, in which the Second Circuit considered the mixed-sanctions scenario and chose to embrace strategic waiver as a means of removing the Heck bar. The court held that a prisoner facing condition-of-confinement sanctions and duration-of-confinement sanctions could challenge the former under § 1983 without complying with Heck's favorable-termination requirement. . . All the prisoner must do is 'abandon, not just now, but also in any future proceeding, any claims he may have with respect to the duration of his confinement that arise out of the proceeding he is attacking.'. . We rejected Peralta in Haywood v. Hathaway, 842 F.3d 1026. The approach Morgan urges us to adopt rests on a misunderstanding of Heck. The favorable-termination rule is more than a procedural hurdle that plaintiffs can skirt with artful complaint drafting or opportunistic affidavits. Rather, it is grounded in substantive concerns about allowing conflicting judgments. As we explained in Haywood, the Heck rule is 'a version of issue preclusion (collateral estoppel), under which the outstanding criminal judgment or disciplinary sanction, as long as it stands, blocks any inconsistent civil judgment.'. . Neither Peralta nor Morgan can account for this aspect of Heck. Endorsing Morgan's arguments would undercut another feature of the Court's favorable-termination jurisprudence. Heck held that 'a § 1983 cause of action for damages attributable to an unconstitutional conviction or sentence does not accrue until the conviction or sentence has been invalidated.'. . Morgan's argument is incompatible with that holding. If a prisoner's challenge to a disciplinary hearing implies the invalidity of the resulting sanctions, no § 1983 claim has accrued. And '[i]f the claim has not accrued, it cannot matter what relief a prisoner seeks.' Haywood, 842 F.3d at 1028. Selective waiver simply doesn't alter the analysis. Morgan concedes that Haywood controls his case and asks us to overrule it. But we do not reverse our precedents lightly; we need 'compelling reasons' to do so. . . The Supreme Court has not cast doubt on Haywood, and it does not represent a minority approach among our sister circuits. . . Moreover, we remain convinced that 'Peralta is incompatible with Heck and its successors.'. . State prisoners cannot avoid the favorable-termination rule by engaging in strategic waiver. If judgment for a § 1983 plaintiff would necessarily imply the invalidity of his punishment, the Heck rule applies and favorable termination of the underlying proceeding is a prerequisite to relief. . . .It's worth noting that Morgan could have challenged the Board's ruling in other ways. . . . And after exhausting state review, he could have sought relief under the federal habeas corpus statute. Instead he immediately sued for money damages under § 1983—and ran directly into Heck. Although Morgan does not currently have a cognizable § 1983 claim, it is at least possible that he could convince a state court to provide the favorable termination required by Heck. Illinois courts apply a six-month limitations period to certiorari actions, but a court might hear a late certiorari action if no 'public detriment or inconvenience would result from [the] delay.'. . Heck-barred claims must be dismissed. . . But given the possibility of future state-court proceedings, Morgan's claim should have been dismissed without prejudice. . . We modify the judgment to reflect a dismissal without prejudice. As modified, the judgment is affirmed.")

See also Minter v. Bartruff, 939 F.3d 925, 929 (8th Cir. 2019) ("In this case, the Complaint alleged that Defendants' unconstitutional conduct deprived Plaintiffs 'of their statutory right to accrue earned-time credit ... [and] of receiving a reduction of sentence upon their completion of the SOTP.' Plaintiffs requested damages and an order requiring 'Defendants to recalculate ... the Plaintiffs' accrued earned-time credit under Iowa Code section 903A.2 to reflect each day that the Plaintiffs demonstrated good conduct and a willingness [to participate] despite the IDOC's decision to not place [them] into the SOTP.' Without question, this is a claim for restoration of earned-time credits, so habeas corpus is the exclusive federal remedy. The district court properly concluded this claim is Heck-barred. However, the Complaint also included an Eighth Amendment claim that necessary medical care is being unconstitutionally denied, and claims for prospective injunctive relief to remedy allegedly unconstitutional procedures in administering the SOTP program. 'Ordinarily, a prayer for such prospective relief will not "necessarily imply" the invalidity of a previous loss of good-time credits, and so may properly be brought under § 1983.'. . The district court did not consider these issues in dismissing the entire case without prejudice, and the record on appeal is inadequate to resolve them.")

G. Nance v. Ward; Hill v. McDonough; Nelson v. Campbell

Nance v. Ward, 142 S. Ct. 2214, 2219, 2222-23, 2225-26 (2022) ("This case concerns the procedural vehicle appropriate for a prisoner's method-of-execution claim. We have held that such a claim can go forward under 42 U. S. C. § 1983, rather than in habeas, when the alternative method proposed is already authorized under state law. See Nelson v. Campbell, 541 U. S. 637, 644–647 (2004). Here, the prisoner has identified an alternative method that is not so authorized. The question presented is whether § 1983 is still a proper vehicle. We hold that it is. . . . Both Nelson and Hill, though, reserved the question at issue here: whether the result should be different when a State's death-penalty statute does not authorize the alternative method of execution. See Nelson, 541 U. S., at 645; Hill, 547 U. S., at 580. In each case, the Court observed that using a different method required no change in the State's statute, but only a change in an agency's uncodified protocols. Here, all parties agree that Georgia would have to change its statute to carry out Nance's execution by means of a firing squad. They dispute whether that fact switches Nance's claim to the habeas track. Except for the Georgia statute, this case would even more clearly than Nelson and Hill be fit for § 1983. Since those two cases, we have compelled a prisoner bringing a method-of-execution claim to propose an alternative way for the State to carry out his death sentence. He must, we have said, present a 'proposal' that is 'sufficiently detailed' to show that an alternative method is both 'feasible' and 'readily implemented.'. . In other words, he must make the case that the State really can put him to death, though in a different way than it plans. The substance of the claim, now more than ever, thus points toward § 1983. The prisoner is not challenging the death sentence itself; he is taking the validity of that sentence as a given. And he is providing the State with a veritable blueprint for carrying the death sentence out. If the inmate obtains his requested relief, it is because he has persuaded a court that the State could readily use his proposal to execute him. The court's order therefore does not, as required for habeas, 'necessarily prevent' the State from carrying out its execution. . . Rather, the order gives the State a pathway forward. That remains true, we hold today, even if the alternative route necessitates a change in state law. Nance's requested relief still places his execution in Georgia's control. Assuming it wants to carry out the death sentence, the State can enact legislation approving what a court has found to be a fairly easy-to-employ method of execution. . . . In recognizing that § 1983 is a good vehicle for a claim like Nance's, we do not for a moment countenance 'last-minute' claims relied on to forestall an execution. . . . In deciding whether to grant a stay of execution, courts must consider whether such a challenge 'could have been brought earlier' or otherwise reflects a prisoner's 'attempt at manipulation.'. . And outside the stay context, courts have a variety of tools—including the 'substantive [and] procedural limitations' that the Prison Litigation Reform Act imposes—to streamline § 1983 actions and protect 'the timely enforcement of a sentence.'. . Finally, all § 1983 suits must be brought within a State's statute of limitations for personal-injury actions. . . Here, the District Court held Nance's suit untimely under that limitations period. . . The Eleventh Circuit did not review that holding because it instead reconstrued the action as a habeas petition. Now that we have held that reconstruction unjustified, the court on remand can address the timeliness question, as well as any others that remain.").

Nance v. Ward, 142 S. Ct. 2214, 2226 (2022) (Barrett, J., joined by Thomas, Alito, and Gorsuch, JJ., dissenting) ("An inmate must bring a method-of-execution challenge in a federal habeas application, rather than under 42 U. S. C. § 1983, if 'a grant of relief to the inmate would necessarily bar the execution.' Hill v. McDonough, 547 U. S. 573, 583 (2006). Under this criterion, Michael Nance must proceed in habeas because a judgment in his favor would 'necessarily bar' the State from executing him. . . Nance asked the District Court to 'enjoin the Defendants from proceeding with [his] execution ... by a lethal injection,' claiming that the use of such method would violate the Eighth Amendment as applied to him. . . But lethal injection is the only method of execution authorized under Georgia law. . . Thus, if Nance is successful, the defendants in this case—the commissioner of the Georgia Department of Corrections and the warden—will be powerless to carry out his sentence. That makes habeas the right vehicle for Nance's Eighth Amendment challenge.").

Hill v. McDonough, 126 S. Ct. 2096, 2101, 2103 (2006) ("In the case before us we conclude that Hill's § 1983 action is controlled by the holding in Nelson. Here, as in Nelson, Hill's action if successful would not necessarily prevent the State from executing him by lethal injection. The complaint does not challenge the lethal injection sentence as a general matter but seeks instead only to enjoin the respondents 'from executing [Hill] in the manner they currently intend.' . . The specific objection is that the anticipated protocol allegedly causes 'a foreseeable risk of ... gratuitous and unnecessary' pain. . . . Hill's challenge appears to leave the State free to use an alternative lethal injection procedure. Under these circumstances a grant of injunctive relief could not be seen as barring the execution of Hill's sentence. . . . Any incidental delay caused by allowing Hill to file suit does not cast on his sentence the kind of negative legal implication that would require him to proceed in a habeas action."); Nelson v. Campbell, 541 U.S. 637, 644 (2004) ("A suit seeking to enjoin a particular means of effectuating a sentence of death does not directly call into question the 'fact' or 'validity' of the sentence itself − by simply altering its method of execution, the State can go forward with the sentence.").

See also Boyd v. Warden, Holman Corr. Facility, 856 F.3d 853, 865 (11th Cir. 2017) ("Following Nelson and Hill, we have entertained method-of-execution challenges to specific aspects of a state's lethal injection protocol pursuant to § 1983.); Adams v. Bradshaw, 644 F.3d 481, 482, 483 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Relying on Hill v. McDonough, 547 U.S. 573, 126 S.Ct. 2096, 165 L.Ed.2d 44 (2006), the Warden argued that federal courts lack jurisdiction to consider Adams's lethal-injection claim under § 2254 and that such a claim is cognizable only under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. The district court denied the motion, and we granted the Warden's petition for leave to file this interlocutory appeal. . . . The Warden's contention that Hill 'holds that a challenge to the particular means by which a lethal injection is to be carried out is non-cognizable in habeas' is too broad. Nowhere in Hill or Nelson does the Supreme Court state that a method-of-execution challenge is not cognizable in habeas or that a federal court 'lacks jurisdiction' to adjudicate such a claim in a habeas action. Whereas it is true that certain claims that can be raised in a federal habeas petition cannot be raised in a § 1983 action, . . . it does not necessarily follow that any claim that can be raised in a § 1983 action cannot be raised in a habeas petition, see Terrell v. United States, 564 F.3d 442, 446 n. 8 (6th Cir.2009). Moreover, Hill can be distinguished from this case on the basis that Adams has not conceded the existence of an acceptable alternative procedure. . . Thus, Adams's lethal-injection claim, if successful, could render his death sentence effectively invalid. Further, Nelson's statement that 'method-of-execution challenges [ ] fall at the margins of habeas,' 541 U.S. at 646, 124 S.Ct. 2117, strongly suggests that claims such as Adams's can be brought in habeas.")

H. Wilkinson v. Dotson

In Wilkinson v. Dotson, 125 S. Ct. 1242 (2005), the Court held that Heck and Edwards did not apply to a prisoner's challenge to the procedures used for determining parole eligibility. As the Court pointed out, success for plaintiff would not mean immediate release from confinement or a shorter stay in prison; success meant 'at most new eligibility review, which at most will speed consideration of a new parole application.' Id. at 1248.

Compare Kitchen v. Whitmer, 106 F.4th 525, 539-44 (6th Cir. 2024) ("The district court below—and now Kitchen on appeal—reason that Kitchen's requested relief would not necessarily lead to an early release from prison, so Kitchen can bring his claim under § 1983. . . Defendants disagree. They contend that it is 'flawed' to focus on whether Kitchen will get an early release because it ignores whether success for Kitchen would necessarily imply the invalidity of his sentence. . . And Defendants believe there is 'no way for Kitchen to challenge Michigan's parole jurisdiction statute' without 'invalidating his underlying criminal sentence.'. .Defendants have the better argument. We hold that Kitchen's claim must be brought through habeas for two reasons. First, the district court focused solely on whether a successful claim would spell an early release for Kitchen and overlooked whether the claim implicates the validity of his sentence. Second, once we apply the correct legal test, we see that Kitchen's claim would necessarily imply the invalidity of his sentence if successful. . . . First, the correct legal test. As mentioned, the district court analyzed only whether Kitchen's requested relief would lead to a quicker release and ignored the question of invalidity, an essential part of the Supreme Court's test. . . . [T]he district court erred by considering only whether quicker release will result if Kitchen's challenge succeeds. From Preiser to Wilkinson, the Court has emphasized 'the need to ensure that state prisoners use only habeas corpus' if they try 'to invalidate the duration of their confinement,' either 'directly' by requesting an early release or 'indirectly' through a judicial holding that 'necessarily implies the unlawfulness' of one's custody. . . Both halves of the test are independently dispositive, yet the district court treated only the first half as essential. And once we establish the proper test, the next question is whether Kitchen's claim fails it. . . . The short answer is yes. Kitchen's claim, if successful, would necessarily imply the invalidity of his sentence. Here's the long answer. Kitchen's claim boils down to this: Keeping him in prison for forty-two years before he is eligible for parole violates his Eighth Amendment rights. He claims the Michigan parole statute is to blame for his unconstitutional confinement. But this argument neglects the reality that the statute does not operate alone. He is in prison for that long not just because of the statute but also because of his sentence. When Kitchen was sentenced in 1987, Michigan's parole statute specified that prisoners would not be eligible for parole until they served their minimum sentence. . . In Michigan, therefore, a judgment imposing a minimum sentence of forty-two years could not be understood as anything but a sentence without parole for forty-two years. So a prisoner's minimum sentence and a prisoner's parole eligibility date are inextricable. . . . Kitchen being in prison without parole is not the sole product of Section 791.234(1). It stems from his sentence. It is impossible to challenge the statute as applied to a particular prisoner without attacking the sentence. So when Kitchen complains of being kept in prison without parole, even if he frames it as a complaint against Section 791.234(1), he is inevitably challenging his sentence, the true source of the alleged constitutional injury. . . . . If Kitchen's claim is successful, he will receive relief that effectively cuts short his sentence of forty-two years in prison before parole eligibility and resentences him to thirty-six years in prison before parole eligibility. In short, under Kitchen's original sentence, he must serve a minimum sentence of forty-two years, but under the district court's granted relief, he must serve only thirty-six. Because 'his sentence would be different' after the district court's order, the relief implies 'the unlawfulness of his sentence as originally imposed.'. . . In sum, the court cannot grant Kitchen the relief he seeks without undercutting his sentence. His sentence put him in prison for forty-two years without parole. To order the Parole Board to consider him now rewrites that sentence. . . This sort of adjustment lies in the province of habeas, not § 1983.") with Kitchen v. Whitmer, 106 F.4th 525, 546-52 (6th Cir. 2024) (White, J., dissenting) ("Given that Kitchen seeks '[n]either "immediate release from prison," [n]or the "shortening" of his term of confinement,'. . . his suit does not constitute the classic scenario, involving relief directing immediate or sooner release from confinement, when the habeas-channeling rule comes into play. . . . Two principles expounded in Dotson are critical to Kitchen's case. First, an action attacking a prisoner's 'sentence,' in the relevant sense of the word, involves 'the judgment authorizing the prisoner's confinement.'. . So whether an action is an attack on a 'sentence," such that it cannot be brought under § 1983 and must be brought as a habeas challenge, turns on whether a favorable judgment in the action would invalidate or necessarily imply the invalidity of the State's judicial authorization to confine the prisoner. . . . Kitchen's action is cognizable under § 1983. All his suit necessarily seeks is consideration for parole, which the Parole Board may, in its discretion, deny. Even if a favorable judgment would necessarily imply the invalidity of the minimum-sentence provision of his judgment of conviction, as the majority seems to conclude, that implication is of no consequence because the State cannot deem whatever it pleases to be part of a prisoner's 'sentence' and thereby dictate the statutory vehicle by which the prisoner may vindicate a constitutional right. A 'sentence' in the special Heck-sense of the word is the judgment (or portion thereof) giving the State authorization to confine a prisoner. Here, that authorization comes from the fact of conviction combined with the maximum-sentence provision of Kitchen's judgment, not the minimum-sentence provision. Given that Kitchen seeks mere consideration for parole and that the Parole Board retains discretion to deny it, the State will possess lawful authority to confine him for the same amount of time—his maximum sentence—regardless whether his suit succeeds. Put differently, the lawfulness of Kitchen's ' "continuing confinement' and "imprisonment,"'. . . in the past, present, and future—is not necessarily negated by any implied invalidation of a provision of his judgment that solely defines, by virtue of Michigan Compiled Laws § 791.234, when he is eligible for consideration for parole. Thus, Kitchen's claim does not fall within the habeas-channeling exception to § 1983. . . . [T]he nonimplication of immediate release or a shorter stay in prison in the event of Dotson and Johnson's success determined whether their actions would necessarily imply the invalidity of their sentences. And here, a favorable judgment in Kitchen's suit does not implicate immediate release or a shorter stay in prison, thus indicating an attack on a Michigan minimum-sentence provision—as the majority views this case—is not subject to § 1983's habeas-channeling exception. . . . In sum, Kitchen does not challenge his sentence, but, rather, the State's choice to tie parole eligibility to the minimum term of an indeterminate sentence as violative of the Eighth Amendment as applied to him. But even if Kitchen's challenge is viewed as an action necessarily implying the invalidity of the minimum-sentence provision of his sentence, under Michigan's indeterminate sentencing scheme, success would not necessarily implicate the lawfulness of the State's confinement of Kitchen, either from the start or any time thereafter. Thus, his action is not subject to § 1983's implicit habeas-channeling exception and was properly brought under § 1983.")

See also Courtney v. Butler, 66 F4th 1043, 1046, 1050-53 (7th Cir. 2023) ("Heck extends to civil litigation that would call into question the validity of a parole revocation, at least when the revocation is based on the parolee's wrongdoing. . . The new question here is whether and how Heck applies when release on parole is denied based not on the parolee's actions but on state officials' alleged failures to do their jobs. Plaintiff James Courtney was sentenced to three years in state prison followed by one year of 'mandatory supervised release,' the current name for parole in Illinois. But in a practice known as 'violating at the door,' Courtney's mandatory supervised release was revoked before he ever left prison. The stated reason was not that he had acted wrongly in some way but that he had no arrangements for a place to live that state officials deemed suitable. Courtney spent the one year of his 'mandatory supervised release' in prison. Courtney then brought this suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against current and former administrators of the Illinois Department of Corrections and the Menard Correctional Center. He alleges that defendants failed to investigate living arrangements that he proposed and ignored his grievances. He also alleges that his mandatory supervised release was revoked without evidence that he violated any terms of release and without adequate procedural protections, all in violation of his constitutional rights. The district court dismissed all of Courtney's claims as barred by Heck v. Humphrey. We affirm in part and reverse in part and remand for further proceedings on Courtney's claims that state officials failed to do their jobs so that he could be paroled. . . . Heck's favorable-termination requirement . . . extends to claims that a plaintiff's good-time credit, parole, or supervised release was improperly revoked. Such claims would, if successful, necessarily challenge the duration of a plaintiff's confinement. . . . Courtney's claims do not challenge his original conviction or sentence. Defendants contend instead that Heck bars his claims because a judgment in his favor would necessarily imply that the Prisoner Review Board's November 14, 2013 order revoking his mandatory supervised release was invalid, and that order has not been set aside. To determine whether Heck bars Courtney's claims, we evaluate each in turn. . . . Courtney alleges that the process leading to revocation of his supervised release was procedurally deficient, depriving him of his liberty without due process of law. Specifically, Courtney claims he was not given notice or the opportunity to be heard before he was denied release and that he was not given notice or a chance to be heard at the Prisoner Review Board hearing. He also complains that he was denied the opportunity to procure witnesses or to obtain counsel before the Board's hearing and that the Board's hearing was not held 'within a constitutionally permissible time' after his release was denied. This claim is barred by Heck. The alleged procedural defects would, if proven, imply that the Board's revocation of Courtney's supervised release was improper. . . Before Courtney can bring such a claim, he must show that the order revoking his supervised release has been set aside in some fashion, and that has not happened. . . .Next, we address Courtney's claim that defendants anticipatorily revoked his mandatory supervised release without evidence that he had actually violated any of its terms, in violation of his Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. Courtney claims that because he was 'violated at the door,' he never lived at a host site that violated his supervised release conditions, so the revocation of his supervised release was unconstitutional. This claim is also barred by Heck. A judgment in Courtney's favor would necessarily imply that the revocation of his supervised release was unjustified and invalid. . . . Last, we address Courtney's primary claim, taking at face value his factual allegations: that at least some defendants deliberately or recklessly failed to effect his release on or after October 4, 2013. Courtney alleges that, prior to his scheduled release date, defendants failed to investigate three of the host sites he identified, including the halfway house in East St. Louis. Then, after he was deemed in violation of his conditions on October 4, 2013, Courtney alleges, defendants ignored his communications and grievances complaining that he was being wrongfully detained and imploring defendants to release him to the host sites he had previously identified. Courtney alleges that defendants' actions resulted in longer imprisonment in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. The inquiry under Heck is whether Courtney's claims would necessarily invalidate the Board's order. We analyze separately his allegations regarding defendants' conduct before and after the Board revoked his supervised release. . . . The Board revoked Courtney's supervised release after it determined that he had not identified an approved host site. Courtney's claims that defendants, after November 14, 2013, deliberately or recklessly ignored his grievances and communications regarding possible host sites, if substantiated, would not necessarily imply that the Board's decision to revoke his supervised release on November 14, 2013 was invalid. . . . We also find that Heck does not bar Courtney's claims that defendants deliberately or recklessly failed to investigate potential host sites or to respond to his grievances before November 14, 2013. As noted above, the Board found that Courtney did not have an approved residence, as is required for mandatory supervised release. . . Courtney does not challenge the Board's finding. He agrees that the Department of Corrections never approved a host site for him. His claim is that defendants prolonged his imprisonment by deliberately or recklessly failing to act. Three host sites he submitted were never investigated, nor did the department find or even propose any alternatives. As a result, no host site was approved, and he remained in prison for another year. Defendants cite several cases, all non-precedential or otherwise non-binding, in which Heck barred claims by plaintiffs alleging that their parole was wrongly revoked. In those cases, parole was revoked because the relevant decision-making body determined that the parolee acted or failed to act in some manner that violated conditions of his parole. . .This case is different. Though the Board's order was styled as a 'violation,' the order did not revoke Courtney's supervised release because he engaged in any act of his own volition that violated terms of his mandatory supervised release. As Courtney himself stresses, he never lived at a location that violated the conditions of his release. Rather, his mandatory supervised release was revoked because an item on his release checklist was unchecked: he had no approved host site. . . . Because his release was contingent on the Department of Corrections approving a host site, the Board's order was, at bottom, based not on a finding that Courtney had done anything wrong but on a finding that defendants in the Department had not done something: approved a host site for Courtney. The Board did not find that the host sites Courtney submitted were not suitable. That would be a different case. Here, the Board simply found that no host site had been approved, a task that, as the Department's Administrative Directive 04.50.110 makes clear, Courtney was utterly incapable of achieving by himself. He needed defendants to act, and he alleges they deliberately or recklessly failed to do so. . . .[W]hile violations of state law or policy do not per se violate the Constitution, when those violations result in unjustified deprivations of liberty, the Constitution is implicated. . . .Another way to frame the Heck issue on these claims is to observe that if Courtney had sought relief while in custody, these claims would be understood best as calling for a writ of mandamus—ordering correction officials to find a suitable residence during supervised release—not a writ of habeas corpus. Courtney claims he was wrongfully imprisoned, but he traces his wrongful imprisonment to the defendants' failure to perform their duties, not to a legal infirmity in the Board's decision ordering his continued confinement. If Courtney can prove that defendants deliberately or recklessly failed to investigate host sites and to respond to his grievances, that proof would not imply that the Board acted improperly when it revoked his mandatory supervised release. The Board based its decision upon a finding that the Department of Corrections had not approved a host site. Courtney's allegations are entirely consistent with that finding. Accordingly, Courtney's claims, if successful, would not 'necessarily demonstrate the invalidity of confinement or its duration.'. . Accordingly, Heck poses no bar to Courtney's claims that at least some defendants deliberately or recklessly acted or failed to act in ways that caused him to spend an extra year in prison rather than on mandatory supervised release."); Courtney v. Butler, 66 F.4th 1043, 1054-55 (7th Cir. 2023) (Brennan, J. concurring) ("I agree with my colleagues that Courtney's third claim should proceed, but for slightly different reasons. As noted, the key question under Heck is 'whether a judgment in favor of the plaintiff would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction or sentence.'. . . A judgment in his favor means he should have been released sooner, but it does not necessarily imply the invalidity of his revocation. Comparing a putative judgment in Courtney's favor with the Board's revocation decision shows this. The Board revoked Courtney's MSR because he lacked an approved host site. But a win for Courtney on his § 1983 claim does not necessarily imply the invalidity of his revocation. If Courtney prevails, it means the defendants' deliberate indifference prevented him from obtaining an approved host site and leaving prison on his MSR date. Yet it also confirms the ground for the Board's revocation—that Courtney lacked an approved site. In other words, a judgment for Courtney on his § 1983 claim means the Board's revocation was proper, but that defendants' unconstitutional conduct still caused him to stay in prison longer than he otherwise might have. Courtney's third claim thus falls short of necessarily implying the invalidity of his parole revocation. Heck often plainly bars § 1983 claims bearing on a prison board's parole revocation decision. . . But in this specific circumstance, I agree the Heck bar does not apply to Courtney's third claim that defendants intentionally or recklessly failed to effect his release.")

See also Dimmick v. Bourdon, No. 18-4051, 2019 WL 1849044, at *3 (10th Cir. Apr. 25, 2019) (not reported) ("As we understand it, Dimmick's goal in seeking a new parole revocation hearing is not so much to obtain earlier release but to obtain a new decision from the parole board that does not stigmatize him as a rapist or sex offender. But even if he seeks a new parole revocation hearing in the hope of eventually being returned to parole, Wilkinson indicates he may pursue a claim under § 1983 so long as the Board retains discretion to grant or deny release as a result of any such hearing (and there is no indication that it does not). . . . We therefore reverse the district court's dismissal of this aspect of Dimmick's complaint."); Sampson v. Garrett, 917 F.3d 880, 881-82

(6th Cir. 2019) ("Whether Heck applies to an access-to-the-court claim alleging state interference with a direct criminal appeal is a new question for us. That it is a new question, however, does not necessarily make it a hard question. Because the right of access is 'ancillary to [a lost] underlying claim, without which a plaintiff cannot have suffered injury by being shut out of court,' a successful access claim requires a prisoner to show that the defendants have scuttled his pursuit of a 'nonfrivolous, arguable' claim. . . Sampson maintains that he is entitled to damages because the defendants prevented him from using the trial transcripts and other materials in his direct—and unsuccessful—appeal. He could prevail on that claim only if he showed that the information could make a difference in a nonfrivolous challenge to his convictions. He could win in other words only if he implied the invalidity of his underlying judgment. Heck bars this kind of claim. We are not alone in seeing it this way. [collecting cases] Fuller v. Nelson, 128 F. App'x 584 (9th Cir. 2005), it's true, went the other way. It held that Heck does not bar an access-to-the-court claim alleging that state officials kept a prisoner from filing an appeal. . . As the Ninth Circuit saw it, Heck does not apply where '[t]he remedy for the unconstitutional deprivation ... would not be immediate release.'. . The Ninth Circuit gestured at Wilkinson v. Dotson . . . for that idea. . . That reflects a crabbed reading of Heck as well as Wilkinson. Wilkinson held that Heck does not bar a due process challenge to state parole-eligibility procedures. . . While the Court noted that the prisoners were not requesting release, but rather new procedures in mere hopes of swifter parole, it did not consider Heck inapplicable only because the claims' success would not mean release. . . The Court emphasized that the new parole procedures (or even a grant of parole for that matter) would not imply the invalidity of the prisoners' original sentences. . . By contrast, a favorable judgment on Sampson's access-to-the-court claim would necessarily bear on the validity of his underlying judgment, because that is exactly what he says the defendants kept him from contesting fairly. All of this may explain why the Ninth Circuit's unpublished decision in Fuller does not even appear to have force in the Ninth Circuit. See Pineda v. Nev. Dep't of Prisons, 459 F. App'x 675, 675 (9th Cir. 2011) (per curiam) (Heck bars access-to-the-court claim concerning forced absence from pretrial evidentiary hearing). That takes care of the access claim."); Davis v. U.S. Sentencing Com'n, 716 F.3d 660, 666 (D.C. Cir. 2013) ("Because the Supreme Court has knocked out three of the pillars on which Razzoli rests, we now allow that holding to fall. . . Adopting Wilkinson's habeas-channeling rule, we hold that a federal prisoner need bring his claim in habeas only if success on the merits will 'necessarily imply the invalidity of confinement or shorten its duration.'. . Otherwise, he may bring his claim through a variety of causes of action. . . And so it is with Davis. Success with his equal protection challenges to Amendment 706 or Amendment 750 will not 'necessarily imply the invalidity of [his] confinement or shorten its duration.'. . Success would do no more than allow him to seek a sentence reduction, which the district court retains the discretion to deny. . . His claim for declaratory relief avoids the habeas-channeling rule we announce today, and its dismissal was improper."); Bogovich v. Sandoval, 189 F.3d 999, 1004 (9th Cir. 1999) (not all challenges to parole board's policy implicate invalidity of continued confinement); Anyanwutaku v. Moore, 151 F.3d 1053, 1055-56 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (noting that "a majority of our sister circuits have held that challenges to state parole procedures whose success would not necessarily result in immediate or speedier release need not be brought in habeas corpus, even though the prisoners filed their suits for the very purpose of increasing their chances of parole. [citing cases]"). But see Burd v. Sessler, 702 F.3d 429, 432, 434, 435 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Mr. Burd submits that the favorable termination requirement does not bar his claim for monetary damages because, in this situation, such a judgment would not necessarily call into question the validity of his conviction or sentence. He further argues that the unavailability of collateral relief at this point in the litigation makes Heck's favorable termination requirement inapplicable. We shall examine each of these arguments in turn. . . We address first Mr. Burd's contention that the favorable termination requirement of Heck and its progeny is inapplicable because an award of damages for having been denied an opportunity to research his motion to withdraw his plea or his right to appeal his sentence would not necessarily imply that his conviction or sentence is invalid. Mr. Burd submits that his situation is analogous to those presented to the Supreme Court in Wilkinson v. Dotson . . . and in Skinner v. Switzer. . . .The approach of Nance and Hoard establish the path that we must follow today. Because the underlying claim for which Mr. Burd sought access to the prison law library was the opportunity to withdraw his guilty plea, he cannot demonstrate the requisite injury without demonstrating that there is merit to his claim that he should have been able to withdraw the plea. Such a showing necessarily would implicate the validity of the judgment of conviction that he incurred on account of that guilty plea. The rule in Heck forbids the maintenance of such a damages action until the plaintiff can demonstrate his injury by establishing the invalidity of the underlying judgment. Accordingly, we conclude that Mr. Burd has not established a basis for recovering any type of damage relief under § 1983."); Goodwin v. Ghee, 330 F.3d 446 (6th Cir. 2003) (en banc) (evenly divided en banc court affirming district court's application of Heck to bar prisoner's § 1983 claim that Parole Board's decision was in retaliation for his exercise of First Amendment rights).

See also Collins v. Dallas Leadership Foundation, 77 F.4th 327, 330-31 (5th Cir. 2023) ("The Heck rule applies whether a plaintiff is currently incarcerated or not. See Randell v. Johnson, 227 F.3d 300, 301 (5th Cir. 2000) (per curiam). Collins relies on Dotson for the proposition that Heck does not bar his claim. There, the Supreme Court explained that claims of alleged due process violations during parole proceedings were not barred under the rule laid out in Heck because an attack on the constitutionality of the parole proceeding's procedures would not 'necessarily have meant immediate release or a shorter period of incarceration; the prisoners attacked only the wrong procedures, not the wrong result.'. . But Collins is not really challenging his parole procedures at all. Instead, he argues that the parole board's determination was erroneous because it considered his inaccurate parole documents—an error Reed and Alfredo allegedly inserted into his parole review. In Collins' own words, Reed and Alfredo's actions 'prevented [him] from a favorable review decision that could have expedited his parole release,' and he seeks $1,000 a day 'since his parole was denied.' The implication is clear: But for the error in his paperwork, he would have been released, and he deserves damages because he was not. Collins thus challenges a 'wrong result'—which Dotson specifically prohibits. . . . The purpose of the rule laid out in Heck was to stop civil tort actions for damages where the plaintiff would be required 'to prove the unlawfulness of his ... confinement.'. . Here, Collins believes he is owed money damages because he was not released after his early 2021 parole hearing due to Reed and Alfredo's alleged retaliatory actions. Granting such relief would necessarily imply the invalidity of his confinement after that hearing for reaching the wrong determination. Consequently, Heck renders Collins' claims frivolous."); Pinson v. Carvajal, 69 F.4th 1059, 1071-75 (9th Cir. 2023) ("In short, an action sounds in habeas 'no matter the relief sought (damages or equitable relief), no matter the target of the prisoner's suit ... if success in that action would necessarily demonstrate the invalidity of confinement or its duration.'. . Of course, the Supreme Court has also emphasized the importance of release from custody when considering whether a claim sounds in habeas. . . We do not mean to suggest that the relief requested is immaterial to a claim's characterization: we continue to adhere to the principle that the core of habeas is reserved for claims that seek release from confinement. . .The critical analytical consideration is why such claims are actually at the core of habeas. Thus, the proper analytical tack when determining whether actions like the one brought by Sands are at the core of habeas is to consider why release from confinement is necessary to remedy the underlying alleged violation. It is at this critical step in the analysis that Petitioners and our sister circuits go astray. The question of whether a claim goes to the core of habeas does not turn, as they seem to suggest, solely on whether the prisoner requested release as opposed to some other form of relief. . . Instead, as previously discussed, our review of the history and purpose of habeas leads us to conclude the relevant question is whether, based on the allegations in the petition, release is legally required irrespective of the relief requested. By collapsing the habeas analysis into a simple inquiry of the requested relief, Petitioners, and the authority they cite, fail to account for the historic purpose of the writ and misapprehend the relationship between the nature of a claim and its requested relief. . . Or, stated differently, a successful claim sounding in habeas necessarily results in release, but a claim seeking release does not necessarily sound in habeas. . . . Moreover, we recognize that the Supreme Court has left open the key question of whether there are circumstances when a challenge to the conditions of confinement is properly brought in a petition for writ of habeas corpus. See Ziglar v. Abbasi, 582 U.S. 120, 144–45, 137 S.Ct. 1843, 198 L.Ed.2d 290 (2017) ("[W]e leave to another day the question of the propriety of using a writ of habeas corpus to obtain review of the conditions of confinement, as distinct from the fact or length of confinement.") . . . We conclude that Sands has failed to allege facts to support his legal contention that his detention was unlawful because no set of conditions exist that would cure the constitutional violations at FCI Lompoc. Because Sands's claims lie outside the historic core of habeas corpus, we conclude the district court properly found it lacked jurisdiction to hear Sands's petition."); Hill v. Snyder, 878 F.3d 193, 208-11 (6th Cir. 2017) ("The Heck doctrine instructs that no matter how a § 1983 claim is couched, if its success would necessarily affect the length of a sentence, the litigant must rely on habeas relief. Even if Plaintiffs frame their challenge as one to the sentencing process, Count II functionally asks us to declare sentences of life without parole for juvenile offenders unconstitutional. Such a ruling would necessarily implicate the duration of Plaintiffs' impending sentences by imposing a ceiling, and Heck therefore requires Plaintiffs to follow a different legal path to obtain the relief. Fortunately, multiple avenues remain open for Plaintiffs to challenge life imprisonment without parole, including direct appeal and habeas. But because Count II necessarily implicates the length of their impending sentences, it is not cognizable under § 1983. The district court properly dismissed Count II. . . . The reasoning in Wilkinson and Wershe applies with equal force here, where the Plaintiffs do not seek direct release from prison or a shorter sentence, but instead seek an examination of the "Defendants' policies and procedures governing access to prison programming and parole eligibility, consideration and release." This circuit has already expressly found such challenges cognizable under § 1983. Following this clear precedent, we hold that Heck does not warrant dismissal of Count IV. . . . At least two key Heck cases squarely address the interplay between good time credits and § 1983 challenges. Under the credit system at issue in Preiser, the restoration of credits would have automatically resulted in the deduction of time from the challenged sentence. . . Success on the § 1983 claim necessarily implicated the duration of confinement and was therefore not cognizable. . . By contrast, in Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539, 94 S.Ct. 2963, 41 L.Ed.2d 935 (1974), the Supreme Court evaluated a challenge to prison officials' revocation of good time credits by means of constitutionally infirm disciplinary proceedings. The Court found that the challenge was cognizable under § 1983 because the prisoners could obtain prospective relief—the implementation of valid disciplinary proceedings—without necessitating restoration of their good time credits. . . Because success did not mean earlier release, the § 1983 claim could proceed. . . The differing outcomes of Preiser and Wolff show that the critical question is whether restoring credits automatically results in earlier release. Under Michigan's parole system, credits deducted from a term-of-years sentence do not automatically result in earlier release; they merely hasten the date on which prisoners fall within the jurisdiction of the Michigan Parole Board. Even after an inmate falls within its jurisdiction, the Board retains discretion to grant or deny parole. . . Success on Count V would not, therefore, necessarily shorten the duration of confinement, rendering this case similar to the cognizable § 1983 claim in Wolff. . . Heck does not bar Count V. . . . Heck does not bar claims that implicate the constitutionality of a sentence; it bars claims that necessarily implicate the length or duration of a sentence. Just as the Wolff petitioners could use § 1983 to obtain constitutionally sound disciplinary procedures without running afoul of Heck, Plaintiffs may use Count VI to seek better rehabilitative programming without necessarily expediting their release. Count VI seeks to make the period of confinement more meaningful, which may indirectly result in speedier release. But that indirect result flows from the discretion of the Michigan Parole Board; it does not automatically follow from success on Count VI. Accordingly, Count VI is cognizable under § 1983. In holding that Heck does not bar Counts IV, V, and VI, we adhere to the lines carefully drawn by the Supreme Court and this circuit. We must look to the possible results when determining what remedies are open to prisoners bringing constitutional challenges. Where vindication of a constitutional right would necessarily allow a prisoner to walk free before his sentence expires, Heck instructs that he must pursue his claims via habeas. But where success would not automatically result in speedier release, Wilkinson, Wolff, and this court's decision in Wershe demonstrate that § 1983 remains an available remedy. Because the Michigan Parole Board retains discretion to deny parole to those who are or become eligible, success on Counts IV, V, and VI would not automatically spell speedier release for Plaintiffs. Accordingly, these claims may proceed under § 1983."); Terrell v. U.S., 564 F.3d 442, 445-49 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Terrell commenced his claim by petitioning the district court to enter an order, pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2241, to require the Commission to give him a live in-person parole hearing. Terrell contends that the Commission violated statutory law and his constitutional right to due process when it denied his request for an in-person hearing. He does not contend that remedying the Commission's procedural violation will necessarily entitle him to an earlier release from custody. Release on parole is discretionary. In 1977, in Wright v. U.S. Bd. of Parole, 557 F.2d 74 (6th Cir.1977), we held that a federal prisoner could challenge the process used to make his denial of parole determination as part of a § 2241 habeas petition. . . . Before and since that time, the Supreme Court has made a number of decisions regarding the relationship between habeas and § 1983, starting in 1973 with Preiser v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 465 (1973), and continuing with Wolff v. McDonnell, 418 U.S. 539 (1974), Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994), Edwards v. Balisok, 520 U.S. 641 (1997), and Wilkinson v. Dotson, 544 U.S. 74 (2005), aff'g, 329 F.3d 463 (6th Cir.2003) (en banc). The Court in Preiser, Heck, and Balisok held that a challenge, respectively, of a prisoner's underlying conviction or sentence, that necessarily demonstrated the invalidity of the confinement's legality, or that would result in the restoration of good-time credits which necessarily shortens the duration of confinement, can only be brought under habeas. . . In Wolff and Dotson, the Court held that challenges by state prisoners to procedures that would only lead to new proceedings, discretionary and not necessarily spelling immediate release or a shorter duration of confinement, may be brought under § 1983. . . A question that arises from this line of cases is whether habeas and § 1983 (or the equivalent for a federal prisoner) are mutually exclusive actions. The circuits appear to be in conflict on this question. In Wright, we held that the claim before us could be brought as a § 2241 habeas action. In Dotson, the Supreme Court held that a claim, a constitutional challenge to parole procedures that would at most order a new discretionary hearing, akin to the claim before us, was properly brought under § 1983. If the Presier line of cases, decided since Wright, also indicated that the actions are mutually exclusive, then we must conclude that we lack jurisdiction to entertain Terrell's habeas petition. . . . [T]he Ninth Circuit envisions 'a class of suits outside of the core habeas claims identified in Preiser.'. . Of course, such claims would be § 2241 claims challenging the execution of the prisoner's sentence, not 28 U.S.C. § 2255 claims challenging the imposition or duration of the prisoner's sentence. That captures the dispute between the Seventh Circuit and the Ninth Circuit. The Seventh Circuit considers the claims the Supreme Court held must be brought as habeas actions pursuant to the Preiser line of cases − whether under § 2255 or § 2241 − as coextensive with the claims that can be brought under habeas in its totality. In other words, there are no 'suits outside of the core habeas claims identified in Preiser,'. . . for which jurisdiction might overlap with § 1983 (or the APA). The Supreme Court's opinion affirming our en banc decision in Dotson captures this debate. The majority held that challenges to parole procedures that would not 'necessarily spell speedier release' and claimed 'future relief (which, if successful, [would] not necessarily imply the invalidity of confinement or shorten its duration)' were 'yet more distant' from the 'core' of habeas within which habeas is the exclusive available action. . . Therefore, the challenge could be brought under § 1983. . . . Under the view Justice Scalia shares with the Seventh Circuit, habeas is the exclusive available action for the domain over which habeas is available, which is for claims that would change the level of custody, shorten its duration, or terminate it completely. The majority left open the question we have here of whether the procedural challenge could be brought under both § 1983 and habeas. Our cases have held that the action before us can both be brought under habeas and the equivalent civil action. The upshot of this is that neither the Seventh Circuit's reasoning nor Justice Scalia's reasoning concurring in Dotson applies here because both would deny the existence of the situation before us where a challenge to procedures used in the administration of discretionary parole falls under habeas. Assuming such a situation, the Ninth Circuit is correct that nothing in the Preiser line of cases suggests that Wright has been overruled for the mere reason that the Court has decided that the claim before us also falls under the equivalent of § 1983 for federal prisoners. Thus, we conclude we have jurisdiction to entertain Terrell's habeas petition."); Docken v. Chase, 393 F.3d 1024, 1031(9th Cir. 2004) (holding Athat when prison inmates seek only equitable relief in challenging aspects of their parole review that, so long as they prevail, could potentially affect the duration of their confinement, such relief is available under the federal habeas statute. Whether such relief is also available under § 1983 depends on the application of Heck's favorable termination rule in this case, an issue not before us and one that we do not decide.' (emphasis original)).

See also Thornton v. Brown, 757 F.3d 834, 838, 841-46 (9th Cir. 2014) ("The Supreme Court has not directly considered the application of the Heck doctrine to §1983 actions that challenge conditions of parole. Among the courts of appeals, only the Seventh Circuit has done so, in Drollinger v. Milligan, 552 F.2d 1220 (7th Cir.1977), and Williams v. Wisconsin, 336 F.3d 576 (7th Cir.2003). Consistent with Supreme Court precedent and that of our sister circuit, we hold that such an action is not barred by Heck if it is not a collateral attack on either the fact of a parolee's confinement as a parolee or the parolee's underlying conviction or sentence. Because we conclude that Petitioner's action is not such an attack, we reverse and remand. . . . Here, we hold that Plaintiff's claims, which challenge two parole conditions, do not fall within that [Heck's] exception, because a judgment enjoining enforcement of his GPS [monitoring requirement and residency restrictions will neither affect] the 'fact or duration' of his parole nor 'necessarily imply' the invalidity of his state-court conviction or sentence. . . . Here, Plaintiff does not challenge his status as a parolee or the duration of his parole, and even if he succeeds in this action, nearly all of his parole conditions will remain in effect. Those conditions include drug and alcohol testing and treatment; psychiatric and behavioral counseling; limitations on travel, employment, association with certain individuals, patronage of certain businesses, and the use of motor vehicles; a curfew; numerous sex-offender registration requirements; a duty not to contact his robbery victim; and other restrictions. In these circumstances, we hold that his challenge to two parole conditions does not threaten his 'confinement' as a parolee. . . .Moreover, because Plaintiff challenges only the discretionary decisions of the Department in imposing the GPS monitoring and residency restrictions, his success would not imply the invalidity of his conviction or sentence. . . . Even if successful, Plaintiff's claims will have no effect on his criminal sentence, including the duration of his parole. . . . Because his challenge to discretionary decisions of the Department will not affect his court-imposed prison term or result in release from parole, Plaintiff's possible success in this action would not 'necessarily imply' the invalidity of any state-court judgment. . .We need not and do not decide whether we would reach a different result had the Department merely implemented a parole condition that was required by statute as a direct consequence of a court's judgment of conviction or sentence. . . . In sum, we hold that a state parolee may challenge a condition of parole under § 1983 if his or her claim, if successful, would neither result in speedier release from parole nor imply, either directly or indirectly, the invalidity of the criminal judgments underlying that parole term. Because Plaintiff challenges just two parole conditions, which were imposed through a discretionary decision of the Department, his success would do neither, and Heck does not bar him from proceeding under § 1983."); Thornton v. Brown, 757 F.3d 834, 846, 848(9th Cir. 2014) (Ikuta, J., dissenting) ("As a matter of California law, Thornton's challenges, if successful, would necessarily demonstrate that a portion of his underlying sentence was invalid. Because the Supreme Court has held such challenges must be brought in a habeas petition, not under § 1983, I would affirm the district court. In holding otherwise, the majority misunderstands California law, misapplies Supreme Court precedent, and creates a circuit split with the Seventh Circuit. . . . Because Thornton was sentenced under § 1170 for his 2010 robbery offense, his sentence necessarily included the term and conditions of parole set by the CDCR, Cal.Penal Code § 3000(a)(1), (b)(7). In challenging his parole conditions, then, Thornton is challenging a statutorily mandated component of his sentence, and if he is successful, it would necessarily imply the invalidity of a portion of his sentence. Therefore, under the rules explained in Dotson, he may not bring this challenge under § 1983."); Ford v. Washington, 2007 WL 1667141, at *3, *4 (D. Ore. June 1, 2007) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor the Ninth Circuit has specifically addressed whether a parolee's challenge to the conditions of his parole fits within the core of habeas corpus. Courts that have addressed the issue generally distinguish between situations where (1) the parolee challenges the conditions of his parole in the context of his parole being revoked for violation of those conditions and (2) the parolee preemptively challenges the conditions of his parole even though his parole has not been revoked. Courts have found challenges to parole conditions in the context of revocation for a violation of those conditions are, in effect, challenges of the validity of the parole-revocation decision or the plaintiff's continued imprisonment. Under Heck, therefore, the revocation decision must be found invalid in separate proceedings before a parolee can properly bring a § 1983 action. . . In cases in which there has not been a parole revocation, however, courts have been less consistent.[discussing cases] Although none of these cases is binding on this Court, the Court finds the reasoning of the Yahweh court persuasive especially in light of the Supreme Court's opinion in Wilkinson v. Dotson . . . Applying the Supreme Court's reasoning and adopting the analysis in Yahweh, this Court concludes parole conditions are not part of Plaintiff's sentence. Accordingly, Plaintiff may bring a challenge under § 1983 as to the parole condition of taking polygraph tests.") Accord Lee v. Jones, 2006 WL 44188 (D. Ore. 2006).

See also Murphy v. Raoul, No. 16 C 11471, 2019 WL 1437880, at *12–13 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 31, 2019) ("[T]he plaintiffs' case is about fair procedure and not release from incarceration, although as a remedial matter they might end up there. . . Here, the plaintiffs are neither challenging their sex-crimes convictions nor their sentences, which include their MSR terms of three years to life. Put a little differently, the plaintiffs do not seek to invalidate the fact or duration of their confinement. Rather, they seek to change the processes used in determining the penultimate condition of their confinement—location. In Wilkinson v. Dotson, the Supreme Court held that a civil rights plaintiff may seek a constitutional change in the parole procedures used to adjudicate his confinement status. . . The Court reasoned that, because neither prisoner sought an injunction ordering his immediate or speedier release into the community, a remedy in their favor would mean at most new eligibility for review. . . That might have sped up the consideration of their release, but it did not automatically follow that that the inmates would in fact be released. .

. The Court analyzed Heck's use of the word 'sentence' to mean not prison procedures, but 'substantive determinations as to the length of confinement.'. . That led to the conclusion that prisoners may bring § 1983 challenges to prison administrative decisions. . .The Seventh Circuit has followed suit. . . It is the defendants' position that the plaintiffs are challenging a condition of their confinement because they are 'seeking a different program or location or environment,' turning the question into whether what they ask for amounts to a 'quantum change in the level of custody.'. . Beginning in Graham, the Court of Appeals recognized that '[t]he difficult intermediate case is where the prisoner is seeking not earlier freedom, but transfer from a more to a less restrictive form of custody.'. . The critical distinction from that work-release case to this one is that here, unlike there, the plaintiffs are not claiming entitlement to release. . .Instead, the plaintiffs in this case dispute the procedures used in host site review. . . . The statutory scheme here 'in no way affects the duration, much less the fact, of confinement. [Their] supervised release will still be in place, and it will last just as long.'. . Accordingly, a straightforward application of Richmond carries the day. '[A] challenge to rules that affect placement in community confinement [shall be treated] the same way as rules that affect placement in parole systems.'. . The defendants were wrong to frame the question as prison versus supervised release, but even if they were right, the plaintiffs' claims nonetheless land in § 1983's net. . . The plaintiffs have been consistent since day one in not directly requesting release but asking for a constitutional application of the relevant law and policy to their situations. . . Thus, the plaintiffs properly brought their claims under § 1983."); Murphy v. Madigan, No. 16 C 11471, 2017 WL 3581175, at *6 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 18, 2017) ("Plaintiffs do not allege unlawful acts of the decision makers that would necessarily overturn the decision denying them housing like Edwards' deceit and bias claim. Instead, Plaintiffs allege that the procedure for determining housing is unconstitutional and, like Edwards' claim for injunctive relief, that claim is properly brought under § 1983. . . Should Plaintiffs prevail, some of the Plaintiffs may, hypothetically, be released on MSR because under constitutional procedures because the Defendants may be more likely approve proposed host sites. The possibility of this outcome, however, does not necessarily imply the validity of their sentences and therefore the claims are not barred by the Heck doctrine. . . .Defendants do not clarify the distinction between the two but suggest that under Graham 'claims of entitlement to probation, bond, parole fall within the Heck rule,' and therefore Plaintiffs' claims are barred. . . However, Plaintiffs do not claim 'entitlement' to parole or MSR. Plaintiffs claim entitlement to a constitutional process in determining whether they will be released on MSR, not to release on MSR. Richmond v. Scibana clarifies the distinction first outlined in Graham: 'a prisoner claiming a right to release on parole must use § 2241 (or § 2254 for a state prisoner); but a prisoner claiming that parole officials are apt to use incorrect rules when resolving a future application must use the APA (or 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for a state prisoner).' 387 F.3d 602, 605 (7th Cir. 2004). Here, Plaintiffs do not claim a right to release but instead that officials are using unconstitutional rules. Therefore, Graham and Richmond support Plaintiffs' claims as properly brought under § 1983.")

I. Challenges to Extradition Procedures

There are conflicts in the Circuits as to the applicability of Heck to challenges to extradition procedures. See, e.g., Weilburg v. Shapiro, 488 F.3d 1202, 1204, 1206 (9th Cir. 2007) ("The issue presented is whether the United States Supreme Court's ruling in Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994), bars prospective plaintiffs, who have not otherwise successfully challenged their underlying convictions, from bringing section 1983 actions that are based upon a violation of extradition law. . . . We conclude that Heck v. Humphrey is not a bar to the present action. . . . Here, the gravamen of the complaint is that the defendants returned Weilburg to Illinois in violation of state and federal law, by ignoring established extradition procedures and effectively kidnapping Weilburg. Such allegations, if proven, would not invalidate Weilburg's incarceration in Illinois."); Harden v. Pataki, 320 F.3d 1289, 1301, 1302 (11th Cir. 2003) ("We hold that a claim filed pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 seeking damages and declaratory relief for the violation of a state prisoner's federally protected extradition rights is not automatically barred by Heck. We also hold that such a claim is not barred by Heck, where the specific allegations are that law enforcement officials failed to provide an extradited prisoner with a pretransfer habeas corpus hearing or a signed warrant by the governor of the asylum state, or released him into the hands of a private extradition service instead of government agents."), disagreeing with Seventh Circuit's analysis in Knowlin v. Thompson, 207 F.3d 907 (7th Cir.2000).

J. Suits Seeking DNA Testing

There are also conflicts regarding suits seeking access to evidence for purposes of DNA testing. See District Attorney's Office for Third Judicial Dist. v. Osborne, 129 S. Ct. 2308, 2318, 2319 (2009) (noting that '[e]very Court of Appeals to consider the question since Dotson has decided that because access to DNA evidence . . . does not "necessarily spell speedier release," ibid., it can be sought under § 1983[,]' but not resolving 'this difficult issue.' Court 'assume[s] without deciding that the Court of Appeals was correct that Heck does not bar Osborne's § 1983 claim.' On merits, Court refuses to 'recognize a freestanding [substantive due process] right to DNA evidence untethered from the liberty interests [Osborne] hopes to vindicate with it.' Id. at 2322.); District Attorney's Office for Third Judicial Dist. v. Osborne, 129 S. Ct. 2308, 2331 n. 1(2009) (Stevens, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., Breyer, J., and Souter, J. (as to Part I), dissenting) ("Because the Court assumes arguendo that Osborne's claim was properly brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, rather than by an application for the writ of habeas corpus, I shall state only that I agree with the Ninth Circuit's endorsement of Judge Luttig's analysis of that issue. See 423 F. 3d 1050, 1053-1055 (2005) (citing Harvey v. Horan, 285 F. 3d 298, 308-309 (CA4 2002) (opinion respecting denial of rehearing en banc)); see also McKithen v. Brown, 481 F. 3d 89, 98 (CA2 2007) (agreeing that a claim seeking postconviction access to evidence for DNA testing may be properly brought as a § 1983 suit); Savory v. Lyons, 469 F. 3d 667, 669 (CA7 2006) (same); Bradley v. Pryor, 305 F. 3d 1287, 1290-1291 (CA11 2002) (same)."). But see District Attorney's Office for Third Judicial Dist. v. Osborne, 129 S. Ct. 2308, 2325, 2326 (2009) (Alito, J., joined by Kennedy, J., concurring) ("What respondent seeks was accurately described in his complaint − the discovery of evidence that has a material bearing on his conviction. Such a claim falls within 'the core' of habeas. . . . We have never previously held that a state prisoner may seek discovery by means of a § 1983 action, and we should not take that step here. I would hold that respondent's claim (like all other Brady claims) should be brought in habeas.").

The Supreme Court has resolved a conflict in the circuits by deciding the issue it left open in Osborne. See Skinner v. Switzer, 131 S. Ct. 1289, 1293, 1300 (2011) ("Adhering to our opinion in Dotson, we hold that a postconviction claim for DNA testing is properly pursued in a § 1983 action. Success in the suit gains for the prisoner only access to the DNA evidence, which may prove exculpatory, inculpatory, or inconclusive. In no event will a judgment that simply orders DNA tests 'necessarily impl[y] the unlawfulness of the State's custody.'. . We note, however, that the Court's decision in Osborne severely limits the federal action a state prisoner may bring for DNA testing. Osborne rejected the extension of substantive due process to this area, 557 U.S., at __ (slip op., at 19), and left slim room for the prisoner to show that the governing state law denies him procedural due process, see id., at __ (slip op., at 18). . . . Unlike DNA testing, which may yield exculpatory, incriminating, or inconclusive results, a Brady claim, when successful postconviction, necessarily yields evidence undermining a conviction: Brady evidence is, by definition, always favorable to the defendant and material to his guilt or punishment. . . . Accordingly, Brady claims have ranked within the traditional core of habeas corpus and outside the province of § 1983.") [NOTE: In Reed v. Goertz, 143 S. Ct. 955, 962 (2023), the Court held that "when a prisoner pursues state post-conviction DNA testing through the state-provided litigation process, the statute of limitations for a § 1983 procedural due process claim begins to run when the state litigation ends."]

But see Skinner v. Switzer, 131 S. Ct. 1289, 1304 (2011) ((Thomas, J., joined by Kennedy, J., and Alito, J., dissenting) ("This Court has struggled to limit § 1983 and prevent it from intruding into the boundaries of habeas corpus. In crafting these limits, we have recognized that suits seeking 'immediate or speedier release' from confinement fall outside its scope. . . We found another limit when faced with a civil action in which 'a judgment in favor of the plaintiff would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction or sentence.' Heck, supra, at 487. This case calls for yet another: due process challenges to state procedures used to review the validity of a conviction or sentence. Under that rule, Skinner's claim is not cognizable under § 1983, and the judgment of the Court of Appeals should be affirmed. I respectfully dissent.")

See also Howard v. City of Durham, 68 F.4th 934, 946-48 (4th Cir. 2023) ("Brady's duty of disclosure does not extend post-conviction; rather, a convicted individual's right to due process 'must be analyzed in light of the fact that he has already been found guilty at a fair trial, and has only a limited interest in postconviction relief.' Dist. Att'y's Off. for Third Jud. Dist. v. Osborne, 557 U.S. 52, 69, 129 S.Ct. 2308, 174 L.Ed.2d 38 (2009). Nonetheless, a convicted individual may 'have a liberty interest in demonstrating his innocence with new evidence under state law.'. . When a state enacts a law granting convicted individuals a right to evidence and a procedure for accessing such evidence, that 'state-created right can, in some circumstances, beget yet other rights to procedures essential to the realization of the parent right.'. . And in considering a due process claim challenging state post-conviction procedures, courts must ask whether the state procedure '"offends some principle of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental"' or "transgresses any recognized principle of fundamental fairness in operation."'. . In District Attorney's Office for the Third Judicial District v. Osborne, the Supreme Court held that there is no freestanding substantive due process right to DNA evidence. . . Nevertheless, it did identify a due process liberty interest grounded in Alaska's general post-conviction relief statutes that made evidence from DNA testing available to defendants. . . Based on those statutes, the Court held that Alaska provided the defendant a 'substantive right to be released on a sufficiently compelling showing of new evidence that establishes innocence.'. . Here, Howard claims that Pennica and Soucie violated his due process rights by suppressing exculpatory evidence that a state court ordered to be disclosed under North Carolina's post-conviction relief statutes. As such, we must consider whether North Carolina law created a liberty interest for Howard to demonstrate his innocence post-conviction, and whether there is a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether Pennica and Soucie violated that interest by intentionally withholding evidence of the Jones interview. . . North Carolina has created a constitutionally protected right to demonstrate one's innocence post-conviction with new evidence and DNA testing. . . . [A]lthough a police officer generally does not owe a duty to disclose exculpatory evidence post-conviction, in this case, such a duty became essential to realizing Howard's rights to demonstrate his innocence under state-created procedures. Both by statute and by court order, Howard had a right to access DPD's files. . . And it would transgress 'fundamental fairness' if a police officer could willfully ignore North Carolina's state-created procedures and a court order by withholding evidence to which an inmate seeking post-conviction relief was entitled. . . As such, Howard's rights are entitled to protection under the Due Process Clause 'to insure that [this] state-created right is not arbitrarily abrogated.'"); In re Pruett, 784 F.3d 287, 290-91(5th Cir. 2015) ("In Skinner v. Switzer, 562 U.S. 521, 131 S.Ct. 1289, 179 L.Ed.2d 233 (2011), the Supreme Court held that a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in his § 1983 suit for an order requiring DNA testing 'would not "necessarily imply" the invalidity of his conviction' because the results might prove exculpatory, inconclusive, or might further incriminate the prisoner. . . In concluding that it lacked jurisdiction, the district court held that Pruett's complaint was not properly brought under § 1983 because a judgment granting the relief he sought would necessarily imply the invalidity of his sentence. Relying on Skinner, Pruett argues that his complaint is properly brought under § 1983 because he challenges neither his conviction nor sentence, but only the State's authority to carry out an execution at this time. He asserts that a ruling in his favor would not invalidate his sentence, but would only be a finding that the Eighth Amendment will not allow his execution to proceed at this time because the State's failure to properly preserve evidence is presently preventing him from challenging his conviction. He maintains that when the DNA technology develops in such a manner as to permit him to demonstrate his actual innocence notwithstanding the State's negligent handling of the physical evidence, he will, at that time, be permitted to attack the legality of his conviction in a habeas application. Pruett does not provide any evidence that such technology is likely to develop or, if so, when. In fact, he admits that it is unknown whether it will ever be possible to generate a DNA profile from the torn pieces of the disciplinary report. Thus, he is essentially asking for an indefinite stay of execution based on nothing but speculation. Unlike Skinner, who sought DNA testing, Pruett has already had DNA testing performed using the most current technology presently available. He seeks '[a] declaratory judgment that [his] execution would be in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments because the State's negligently handling the evidence made it impossible for Pruett to prove his innocence.' We agree with the district court that this is a direct challenge to the validity of his sentence and, therefore, cannot be maintained under § 1983. Because Pruett has already unsuccessfully challenged his conviction and sentence in an earlier federal habeas proceeding, his current complaint is successive. Accordingly, the district court correctly determined that it did not have jurisdiction to consider it in the light of the fact that Pruett did not obtain our prior authorization pursuant to § 2244(b)(3)."); Newton v. City of New York, 779 F.3d 140, 147-54, 158 (2d Cir. 2015) ("The City does not genuinely dispute that New York law conferred on Newton 'a liberty interest in demonstrating his innocence with new evidence.' . . Newton retains such an interest even without the City's concession. For the purpose of determining whether a liberty interest exists in this case, we think the New York statute that Newton invokes is materially indistinguishable from the Alaska statute upon which Osborne relied. . . . Moreover, the State's explicit statement on the importance of DNA testing—reflected in its enactment of Section 440.30(1–a) in 1994—only strengthens the case for State recognition of a liberty interest. . . .Fundamental adequacy does not mean that State procedures must be flawless or that every prisoner may access the DNA evidence collected in his case. Nor does it mean that DNA evidence must be stored indefinitely. It means only that when State law confers a liberty interest in proving a prisoner's innocence with DNA evidence, there must be an adequate system in place for accessing that evidence that does not 'offend[ ] some principle of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental,' or 'transgress [ ] any recognized principle of fundamental fairness in operation.' . . .Considering the similarities and differences between the two statutes, we conclude that the liberty interest created by New York law is no narrower than that created by Alaska law; procedures for vindicating this interest therefore should also be evaluated under the standard described in Osborne. . . . Unlike McKithen, Newton readily concedes that the State's statutory procedures are adequate. Instead, he contends that the City, not the State, provided him with fundamentally inadequate process by undermining the State's procedures by its recklessly chaotic evidence management system. Having demonstrated that (in contrast to Osborne and McKithen) he diligently and repeatedly tried the State's procedures for obtaining the necessary DNA evidence, Newton claims that the NYPD's evidence management system was so inadequate as to nullify those procedures. This appeal and Newton's arguments thus present an issue that we have yet to address relating to the interaction between State law and local government in the context of post-conviction relief. We are unaware of precedent that prevents Newton from challenging a municipal custom or practice that, he contends, undermines otherwise adequate State procedures. McKithen certainly does not do so, and so the District Court erred insofar as it held that McKithen squarely foreclosed Newton's claims. Moreover, by pointing out Osborne's failure to avail himself of Alaska's procedures, Osborne appears to have contemplated precisely such as-applied challenges by plaintiffs who attempt unsuccessfully to invoke State post-conviction relief procedures. . . The procedures created by Section 440.30(1–a) require the State, upon a defendant's motion, to 'show what evidence exists and whether the evidence is available for testing.'. . In essence, Section 440.30(1–a) creates an 'essential' corollary procedural right to a faithful accounting of evidence. . . In New York, local government appears to play an integral role in this process. . . and a failure of local government in carrying out its role can nullify the adequacy of State procedures and expose the municipality to constitutional liability. This is hardly a new concept. In other contexts we have permitted plaintiffs to pursue claims against municipalities for deprivations of State-created interests. . . If procedures followed by a municipality rather than a State prove to be constitutionally inadequate, even in the context of facially adequate State procedures, then a defendant may sue the municipality for violating his due process rights on the ground that the municipality's implementation of State procedures is inadequate. Even in the realm of municipal (rather than State) inadequacy, however, we must take care to avoid 'suddenly constitutionaliz[ing]' the area of DNA testing and thereby 'plac[ing] the matter outside the arena of public debate and legislative action.'. . At least three factors help us avoid that pitfall here. . . .First, reinstating the § 1983 verdict against the City will not impair the validity of, or expand the rights provided by, Section 440.30(1–a)(a). As noted, this case presents a challenge to the City's execution of State law, not to the law itself. . . .Second, when, as here, a municipality promulgates policies or practices that affect the criminal procedure laws of the State, those policies or practices may fail to reflect the considered judgment of the State legislature. A local pattern, custom, or practice may frustrate or even obstruct otherwise adequate State law procedures. In those instances, it seems to us, neither Osborne nor Medina mandates the same level of deference to local government as they do to State legislative action. Third, the procedural right at issue here is quite narrow: Newton was not entitled to the preservation of evidence under State law, but only to a faithful accounting of the evidence in the City's possession. We do not decide what specific City procedure is necessary to manage and track evidence. We simply reinstate a jury verdict that found that the then-existing system was inadequate and that the City, through its agents, servants, or employees, intentionally or recklessly administered an evidence management system that was constitutionally inadequate and that prevented Newton from vindicating his liberty interest in violation of his Fourteenth Amendment right to due process. . . .Nevertheless, the City argues that there was insufficient evidence to support the jury's findings that the City's evidence management system was fundamentally inadequate, and that the City officials' failures and misconduct relating to that system reflected a practice or custom. . . .In sum, Newton presented evidence that thousands of sometimes decades-old yellow invoices at the Bronx property clerk's office—out of a total of not more than 3200 such invoices per year—were in old out-to-court folders that had improperly never been closed out; evidence listed as 'out-to-court' for over twenty years was lost; the PCD had lost track of and was unable to retrieve evidence in an unreasonably large number of cases (involving evidence older than five years); several high-level officials tasked with supervising the NYPD's evidence management system were unfamiliar with the PCD's procedures; and the PCD's dysfunction had an unconstitutionally deleterious effect on case closings in a large number of cases, including, obviously, Newton's. The problem in Newton's case was with the retrieval of evidence that was sitting there all along. Despite the preservation of the evidence that proved crucial in exonerating Newton, the PCD was unable to locate it from 1994 to 2005 and inaccurately represented that it had been destroyed either in a fire or pursuant to a regular disposal procedure that may not even have existed. Had Newton accepted the City's recklessly erroneous representations about the evidence at face value, he might have remained in prison far longer than he did. Taken together, this evidence supports a finding that the City, through the poor administration of its evidence management system, perpetuated a practice or custom that was wholly inadequate. . . . [H]ad the City destroyed his DNA evidence according to a legitimate procedure that conformed with State law, Newton would have no claim under § 1983. Without deciding a question not before us, we do not see how an incarcerated defendant (or even a person like Newton) without exonerating evidence obtained by invoking State procedures would have a due process claim for relief under § 1983 based on our holding today. In contrast to Youngblood, the issue here is whether a municipality may be held liable for its reckless maintenance of a system that made it impossible to retrieve evidence that had been preserved, that State law recognized as particularly significant, and that ultimately exonerated the defendant."); Durr v. Cordray, 602 F.3d 731, 736, 737 (6th Cir. 2010) ("We . . . conclude that Durr's request to seek DNA evidence was cognizable under § 1983. But we find that we cannot grant Durr a stay of his execution for these very same reasons: success on his claim would do no more than yield access to the evidence, it would have no direct effect on the validity of his conviction or death sentence, and he would have to bring another, separate action in order to even challenge the conviction or sentence. That is, even if Durr were to prevail on his § 1983 action (and obtain the necklace for DNA testing), success in that action would not directly invalidate or undermine his conviction or sentence. Consequently, there is no nexus between the merits of Durr's underlying claim and his pending execution, so this claim − no matter its merit − cannot justify our interference with the State's enforcement of an otherwise uncontested judgment of conviction and sentence."); Blaine v. Klein, No. CV 10-9038 CJC (VBK), 2011 WL 5313488, at *3, *4 (C.D. Cal. Dec. 17, 2010) ("It appears that Plaintiff is attempting to claim that Defendants denied him access to evidence for DNA testing. Plaintiff's claims are foreclosed by the Supreme Court's decision in District Attorney's Office for the Third Judicial District v. Osborne __ U .S. __, 129 S.Ct. 2308, 2319-23,174 L.Ed.2d 38 (2009), in which the Court held there was no federal constitutional right to obtain post-conviction access to the state's evidence for DNA testing. In particular, a prisoner has no substantive due process right to obtaining DNA evidence after his conviction. . . Rather, a person claiming a due process violation with regard to post-conviction DNA testing must show that he has a protected liberty interest created by the laws of his state 'to prove his innocence even after a fair trial has proved otherwise.'. . If he makes such a showing, he must then show that the state's procedure for obtaining DNA evidence is constitutionally inadequate because it 'offends some principle of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental, or transgresses any recognized principle of fundamental fairness in operation.'. . Because a convicted prisoner has a lesser liberty interest than a criminal defendant who had not yet been convicted, the state correspondingly has more flexibility in demanding what procedural protections to afford in the context of a criminal trial. Here, Plaintiff has failed to allege that he requested the DNA evidence in the California state courts prior to filing the within action in the Federal Court. California Penal Code Section 1405 provides an elaborate scheme under which a person in prison may seek and obtain DNA testing of evidence. . . . Plaintiff has failed to allege that Penal Code Section 1405 offends some fundamental principle of justice or is fundamentally unfair so as to violate due process. . . As a result, the alleged facts, when liberally construed and viewed in a light most favorable to Plaintiff, do not state a claim that Defendants violated his constitutional right to due process by denying his post-conviction request for evidence for DNA testing.")

See also Summers v. Eidson, No. 06-70047, 2006 WL 3071226, at *2 (5th Cir. Oct. 25, 2006) ("Summers argues that the relief sought, namely that this court require that William Spaulding's parole records be turned over to Summers, would not necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction or sentence because a habeas court would then have to determine whether the failure to disclose these records constituted a Brady violation and therefore whether or not to overturn his conviction. Kutzner, however, forecloses this argument."); Bounds v. United States District Court, No. 06-0233, 2007 WL 1169377, at *3 (W.D. La. Apr. 18, 2007) ("As correctly identified by Magistrate Judge Hornsby, an action to disclose evidence that may permit an inmate to challenge his conviction, even if a separate habeas action is required to invalidate the conviction, necessarily implies that the conviction was invalid for purposes of Heck in the Fifth Circuit. . . .A decision granting the disclosure of the Rule 35(b) motion would permit Bounds to adjudicate whether a Brady violation occurred and whether his conviction was unlawfully obtained. Therefore, the Court will not compel disclosure of the Rule 35(b) motion and related documents.").

K. Spencer v. Kemna: Heck's Applicability When Habeas Corpus is Unavailable

There are conflicting opinions on the question of whether and under what circumstances Heck applies when habeas is unavailable. In Spencer v. Kemna, 523 U.S. 1 (1998), the Court addressed the question of whether a petition for a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of invalidating a parole revocation was made moot by the plaintiff's having completed the term of imprisonment underlying the challenged parole revocation. One of plaintiff's "collateral consequences" arguments was that under the doctrine of Heck, he would be precluded from seeking damages under § 1983 for the alleged wrongful parole revocation unless he could establish the invalidity of the revocation through the habeas statute. In an opinion authored by Justice Scalia, the Court noted the following:

> [Petitioner] contends that since our decision in Heck . . . would foreclose him from pursuing a damages action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 unless he can establish the invalidity of his parole revocation, his action to establish that invalidity cannot be moot. This is a great non sequitur, unless one believes (as we do not) that a § 1983 action for damages must always and everywhere be available. It is not certain, in any event, that a § 1983 damages claim would be foreclosed. If, for example, petitioner were to seek damages `for using the wrong procedures, not for reaching the wrong result,'. . . and if that procedural defect did not `necessarily imply the invalidity of' the revocation, . . . then Heck would have no application all.

523 U.S. at 17.

A majority of the Justices, in dicta, expressed the view that Heck has no applicability where the plaintiff is not "in custody" and, thus, habeas corpus is unavailable. See Spencer v. Kemna, 523 U.S. 1, 20, 21 (1998) (Souter, J., joined by O'Connor, Ginsburg, and Breyer, JJ., concurring) ("[W]e are forced to recognize that any application of the favorable-termination requirement to § 1983 suits brought by plaintiffs not in custody would produce a patent anomaly: a given claim for relief from unconstitutional injury would be placed beyond the scope of § 1983 if brought by a convict free of custody (as, in this case, following service of a full term of imprisonment), when exactly the same claim could be redressed if brought by a former prisoner who had succeeded in cutting his custody short through habeas. The better view, then, is that a former prisoner, no longer `in custody,' may bring a § 1983 action establishing the unconstitutionality of a conviction or confinement without being bound to satisfy a favorable-termination requirement that it would be impossible as a matter of law for him to satisfy. Thus, the answer to Spencer's argument that his habeas claim cannot be moot because Heck bars him from relief under § 1983 is that Heck has no such effect. After a prisoner's release from custody, the habeas statute and its exhaustion requirement have nothing to do with his right to any relief.") and id. at 25 n.8 (Stevens, J., dissenting) ("Given the Court's holding that petitioner does not have a remedy under the habeas statute, it is perfectly clear, as Justice Souter explains, that he may bring an action under § 1983.").

Compare Wilson v. Midland County, Texas, 116 F.4th 384, 388, 393-400, 404 (5th Cir. 2024), pet. for cert. filed, No. 24-672 (Dec. 12, 2024) ("Wilson's entire case is built on the premise that the favorable-termination requirement applies only to custodial plaintiffs. But the favorable-termination requirement is unconcerned with custody. It is instead concerned with all § 1983 claims by all civil plaintiffs who seek civil remedies against defective criminal processes. . . . The Supreme Court's subsequent decisions underscore this broad, tort-based conception of the favorable-termination element. Namely, that it applies to all § 1983 suits challenging a tainted conviction or sentence, regardless of whether the plaintiff is in custody. . . . True, the favorable-termination requirement obliquely protects the habeas statute by prohibiting custodial plaintiffs from collaterally attacking their convictions. . . But it sweeps far wider. That's because favorable termination is an element of all § 1983 claims challenging tainted criminal prosecutions, convictions, and sentences, not just those filed by litigants subject to the habeas statute. That is why the Court distinguished between Heck's tort principle and Preiser's habeas principle, which are separate and independent justifications for requiring favorable termination: 'This [favorable-termination] conclusion follows both from the rule for the most natural common-law analogy (the tort of malicious prosecution) and from the practical considerations that have previously led this Court to defer accrual of claims that would otherwise constitute an untenable collateral attack on a criminal judgment.'[citing McDonough] In this way, it vindicates the broader principles justifying the rule at common law: protecting the finality of criminal judgments, preventing inconsistent civil and criminal proceedings, and avoiding friction between state and federal courts. . . And of course, finality, consistency, federalism, and comity are threatened whenever one brings a civil challenge to a criminal conviction, sentence, or prosecution. . . Second, and relatedly, McDonough undermined (if not completely eliminated) any suggestion that the favorable-termination element is required only when the § 1983 plaintiff is in custody. McDonough filed suit outside of custody—three years after he had been acquitted of all charges. . . . McDonough thus followed Heck's footnote 10 and held the favorable-termination requirement does not begin and end with the habeas statute, which is why it 'is not rendered inapplicable by the fortuity that a convicted criminal is no longer incarcerated.'. . So even if it was proper for an inferior court to discount Heck's footnote 10 as 'infamous' and 'the very quintessence of dicta' when the Court decided it, post, at 37 (Willett, J., dissenting), McDonough makes the Court's instructions impossible to ignore. Nor is McDonough aberrational in this regard. Three years later, in Thompson v. Clark, . . . the Court once again subjected a noncustodial plaintiff to the Heck bar. The prosecutor dismissed all charges against Thompson, so he obviously was not in custody. . . But he still had to show favorable termination. . . Today, it should be clear beyond cavil that the favorable-termination element applies regardless of whether the § 1983 claimant was, is, or never could be in custody. . . In sum, Heck's favorable-termination requirement is rooted in tort law principles that apply both inside and outside of prison—not habeas principles. That's why favorable termination is an element of any and all § 1983 claims challenging tainted convictions, sentences, or prosecutions. It's also why Heck's footnote 10 followed logically from the Court's tort-based reasoning. . . Custodial status, in other words, matters not. . . Applying these principles here, Wilson's § 1983 claim is not cognizable. . . . [N]othing in this suit prevents Wilson from pursuing favorable termination upon dismissal. As we have explained, 'a Heck dismissal is a dismissal without prejudice.'. . And the district court correctly entered a without-prejudice dismissal here. Practically, that means Wilson is free to secure favorable termination and then re-raise her claims under § 1983. Until then, her claim is not cognizable and must be dismissed. . . . Instead of parsing Preiser's dicta, Heck performed a comprehensive and independent analysis of § 1983—an analysis that relied on the common law of torts, wholly on the common law of torts, and nothing but the common law of torts. . . The upshot? Whenever a plaintiff seeks money damages under § 1983 for a tainted conviction, sentence, or prosecution (as in Heck, Edwards, McDonough, Thompson, and this case), one required element in that backwards-looking tort claim is favorable termination. . . . Because Heck is rooted in tort, not habeas, it's only natural that Heck's favorable-termination rule transcends custodial status. . . . Put simply: Heck and Preiser announced distinct rules rooted in distinct genealogies. True, Preiser and Heck are superficially similar in the sense that both charted the boundaries of § 1983. But the similarities end there. Heck relied on tort law, while Preiser relied on habeas. That's why Heck applies outside of prison, while Preiser mostly does not. . . . In our view, neither Spencer nor Close undermines Heck's tort-law foundation. . . . The non-custodial question posited but not answered in Spencer and Close is irrelevant. That is because Heck is not a case about custody; it is a case about tort law. And tort law applies inside and outside of prison. . . That is why Heck framed its accrual rule as one focused on the elements of a § 1983 action for damages arising from a tainted conviction—rather than a rule focused on custody, habeas, or anything else. . . And even if there was some debate on any of this—such that the issue was not settled in 2004, when Close was decided—the debate is settled in 2019, when McDonough was decided. In the latter case, the Court applied § 1983's favorable-termination requirement to a non-custodial plaintiff. And that makes perfect sense because, again, the elements of a tort claim have nothing at all to do with the custodial status of the claimant. True, Justice Souter thought custody should've mattered in Heck. And in Spencer and Close, several justices reiterated their defense of Justice Souter's view of the world. But that does not change Heck's tort-law holding. Nor does it empower our inferior court to disregard Supreme Court precedent, including McDonough.. . . All of these doctrines point in the same direction, as the en banc Seventh Circuit held: Section 1983 does not give special priority to a federal forum. . . When invoked to challenge a tainted criminal proceeding, § 1983 includes a favorable-termination requirement. Plaintiffs can satisfy that element in federal court, in state court, or in no court (e.g., through executive expungement). True, favorable termination is sometimes difficult to satisfy. Undoubtedly, as Wilson worries, some plaintiffs will not be able to do so. Heck explains, though, why that high bar must be cleared before seeking civil money damages from a tainted criminal proceeding. The Court sought to avoid parallel litigation on the issue of guilt, preclude the possibility of conflicting resolutions arising out of the same proceeding, prevent collateral attacks on criminal convictions through the vehicle of civil suits, and respect concerns for comity, finality, and consistency. . . We cannot ignore these instructions. . . . [I]t is also important that civil plaintiffs do not put the cart before the horse. Criminal proceedings and criminal judgments require criminal remedies—not civil ones. If and when Ms. Wilson pushes aside her criminal conviction, then but only then can she come back to civil court and ask for money. Until then, her § 1983 suit must be dismissed.") with Wilson v. Midland County, Texas, 116 F.4th 384, 406-08, 410-13, 415-16, 418-22 (5th Cir. 2024) (Willet, J., joined by King, Elrod, Graves, Higginson, and Douglas, JJ., dissenting), pet. for cert. filed, No. 24-672 (Dec. 12, 2024) ("Today's en banc case poses one—and only one—question: Does Heck v. Humphrey's favorable-termination rule apply to noncustodial § 1983 plaintiffs? This question has been hotly debated in the lower courts since Heck was decided three decades ago. Footnoted dicta and vehement concurrences from various Supreme Court justices over the years have played starring roles. The unsurprising upshot is a deep and enduring circuit split.[12] [citing cases] Indeed, we are the second circuit to take the issue en banc in recent years. . . With boundless respect for my eminent colleagues, the plurality. . . has disfigured Heck to impose a favorable-termination requirement as an 'element' for 'all § 1983 claims by all civil plaintiffs who seek civil remedies against defective criminal process.'. . This holding is doubly violative: Americans robbed of their constitutional rights are also robbed of any federal forum to vindicate those rights. I respectfully dissent and would hold that Heck's favorable termination rule applies only to custodial § 1983 plaintiffs. . . .Habeas is the elephant in the room whenever the scope of § 1983 is at issue because § 1983, absent carefully specified limits. . . could sideline the federal habeas statute. But to say that some limits on § 1983 are necessary (because the specific controls the general) is not to establish the validity of the plurality's proposed limitation. . .And the justification of the plurality's limitation is wanting. It is not based on conflict with another statute. It is seemingly based on protecting a set of values (comity, finality, etc.) that, for 153 years now, § 1983 has always opposed—and intentionally so. . . . The plurality today asserts that the Heck Court held that 'favorable termination is itself an element of any § 1983 claim that seeks money damages for a tainted conviction.'. . But Heck's holding was far more limited. It applies only to prisoners whose claims are closely analogous to malicious prosecution. This is evident because: (1) Heck was limited to addressing whether prisoners could use § 1983 to challenge their convictions or confinement; (2) the Heck opinion is framed in terms of the overlap between § 1983 and § 2254, which indicates the Court remained acutely concerned about the statutes' respective scopes in

Heck; and (3) tort law merely served as a 'starting point'. . . in Heck to determine the elements for the prisoner-plaintiff's specific claims, and it would make little sense to apply its holding more broadly. . . .Whether favorable termination should apply to noncustodial plaintiffs was not the question presented—much less answered—in Heck. . . .The Heck Court was clear that Heck was the latest in a line of cases that dealt with the overlap between § 1983 and § 2254. And the Court was acutely focused on delineating when a prisoner could use § 1983 instead of § 2254. . . . In contrast to what I have explained thus far, the plurality misreads Heck to be 'based' only in 'tort law.' While I agree that tort law had a role in Heck's analysis, the plurality elevates tort law to be the sine qua non of Heck. Respectfully, the plurality misunderstands Heck and distorts the Court's precedents on the use of common-law analogs to interpret § 1983 by extending the Heck bar without regard to the proper analogous tort. . . .To sum up, the question presented in Heck was whether prisoners could bring a claim that would necessarily challenge their convictions under § 1983. The Court was deeply concerned about the answer to that question because if the answer was yes, prisoners with outstanding criminal judgments could choose § 1983 over § 2254 and bring claims that, if successful, would require the prisoner's release, which is 'as close to the core of habeas corpus as an attack on the prisoner's conviction.'. .To answer the presented question, the Court had to determine the reach of § 1983. Because § 1983 is not a source of substantive rights, it looked to the common law as a 'starting point' or 'guide' and determined that malicious prosecution was the right fit for Heck's claims. In what was clearly off-the-mark dicta, the Court mused that favorable termination might apply more broadly, but dicta does not bind us. And, as the next section will address, the Court still hasn't resolved whether non-prisoners must prove favorable termination—a point the Court has explicitly acknowledged. Regardless, malicious prosecution is a bad fit for Wilson's claims, and we should not try to shoehorn the favorable-termination requirement where it does not fit. . . . I'll now address the three post-Heck cases that the plurality believes 'underscore [its] broad, tort-based conception of the favorable-termination element. Namely, that it applies to all § 1983 suits challenging a tainted conviction or sentence, regardless of whether the plaintiff is in custody.'. . With greatest respect, the plurality is wrong on all three. [Dissent discusses Edwards, McDonough, and Thompson] In sum, the plurality overreads McDonough. On whether McDonough settled the reach of Heck and enshrined the dicta of footnote 10, I agree with Judge Easterbrook: 'Certainly, McDonough ... did not do so.'. . . Finally, the plurality points to Thompson v. Clark. . . . The plurality infers that because Thompson was not in custody, 'it should be clear beyond cavil that the favorable-termination element applies regardless of whether the § 1983 claimant was, is, or never could be in custody.' . . But the plurality misses a critical point: The reason the Court required favorable termination in Thompson's case is because the analogous common-law tort for Thompson's malicious-prosecution claim was, unsurprisingly, malicious prosecution, which contains favorable termination as an element. The Court never addressed Thompson's custodial status because it had no reason to. So Thompson could not have held that a favorable-termination requirement applied to noncustodial plaintiffs writ large. . . .In sum, not one of the post-Heck cases supports the plurality's position. The plurality fails to track what questions were presented by the cases and under what circumstances. The Supreme Court has never addressed the application of favorable termination to plaintiffs like Wilson who are not in custody and whose claims are not analogous to the common-law tort of malicious prosecution.

In fact, the Court has acknowledged the ongoing debate and pointedly declined to resolve it, expressly stating in Muhammad v. Close that 'this case is no occasion to settle the issue.'. . As none of these cases addressed the issue, I would take the justices at their word and accept their pronouncement that the issue remains unsettled. . . .Whether Wilson might (or might not) be able to prove favorable termination outside of § 1983 only matters if Heck requires her to prove favorable termination in the first place. . . If Wilson is allowed to sue under § 1983, then it matters not whether she might also have state remedies available to her. That's the whole point of § 1983: to give those victimized by state officials a federal forum. The sole issue for us is whether Heck applies to noncustodial plaintiffs—nothing else. The plurality and concurrence particularly focus on the availability of Texas state habeas. Texas's unique habeas statute specifies '[a]t the time the application is filed, the applicant must be, or have been, on community supervision.'. . Not all state habeas statutes reach this far. In this circuit, for example, Mississippi's statute only 'extend[s] to all cases of illegal confinement or detention.'. . Under the concurrence's approach, the line between § 1983 being available or not 'would depend on the vagaries of state law.'. . If Wilson happened to live in another state in this circuit, her case might well turn out differently based on the reasoning in the concurrence. Also, and this cannot be overstated, to consider the existence of state remedies when determining the reach of § 1983 is, respectfully, contrary to the historical record. It was precisely '[b]ecause Congress lacked confidence in state institutions, including state courts, [that] it explicitly gave federal courts jurisdiction over the new civil action.'. . To then turn around, as the concurrence does, and say that there is no federal cause of action because Wilson could also pursue state remedies turns § 1983 on its head . . . Our circuit has been on the wrong side of this fateful split for almost a quarter-century. Today, we squander the opportunity to take '[t]he better view' of Heck by holding that 'a former prisoner, no longer "in custody," may bring a § 1983 action establishing the unconstitutionality of a conviction or confinement without being bound to satisfy a favorable-termination requirement.'. .When Wilson learned that she had been victimized by Petty's mind-boggling conflict of interest, had she read § 1983's sweeping textual command, she would have been heartened to take Congress at its word that she had a federal-court remedy for what she had endured. It may be true that a federal-court remedy isn't guaranteed for every constitutional violation. . . But the historical record shows that § 1983 was enacted to provide one for a wide swath of violations that couldn't be entrusted to protection by the state courts. . . Today, the court 'unjustifiably limit[s]' that 'plain breadth of § 1983,' leaving plaintiffs like Wilson violated but not vindicated. . . There is no justification for applying Heck's favorable-termination requirement so broadly. We are not bound by dicta in Heck's footnote 10, it makes little sense to apply a favorable-termination rule to noncustodial plaintiffs whose claims are not analogous to the common-law tort of malicious prosecution, no post-Heck precedent binds us, and the en banc court's justifications collide head-on with § 1983. When Justice Ginsburg disavowed Heck's footnoted musings on the ancillary question of noncustodial plaintiffs, she cited Justice Frankfurter's maxim that '[w]isdom too often never comes, and so one ought not to reject it merely because it comes late.'. . Unfortunately for our circuit—and unfortunately for Wilson—wisdom remains a no-show. The only hope for wronged noncustodial plaintiffs like Erma Wilson is that the Supreme Court will at last confront the persistent circuit split, seize this 'occasion to settle the issue,'. . . and vindicate a bedrock constitutional guarantee that, sadly, is even more tenuous in today's plea-bargain age than when the Founding generation first enshrined it. Respectfully yet emphatically, I dissent.") Compare Savory v. Cannon, 947 F.3d 409, 417-23, 427-28, 430-31 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc) ("Applying the analytical paradigm of Heck and McDonough to Savory's case, we first look at the nature of his section 1983 claims and conclude that, like Heck's claims, they strongly resemble the common-law tort of malicious prosecution. Indeed, Savory's claims largely echo Heck's complaint, asserting the suppression of exculpatory evidence and the fabrication of false evidence in order to effect a conviction. There is no logical way to reconcile those claims with a valid conviction. Therefore, Heck supplies the rule for accrual of the claim. Because Savory's claims 'would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction or sentence, his section 1983 claims could not accrue until 'the conviction or sentence ha[d] been reversed on direct appeal, expunged by executive order, declared invalid by a state tribunal authorized to make such determination, or called into question by a federal court's issuance of a writ of habeas corpus.'. . In Savory's case, that occurred on January 12, 2015, when the governor of Illinois pardoned him[.] . . Until that moment, his conviction was intact and he had no cause of action under section 1983. . . His January 11, 2017, lawsuit was therefore timely under Heck, and we must reverse the district court's judgment and remand for further proceedings. McDonough supports the same result. Because McDonough (who was not held in custody during his trials) was acquitted rather than convicted, his section 1983 claim would not have infringed upon the exclusivity of the habeas corpus remedy. The Court nevertheless indicated that the other concerns discussed in Heck still guided the outcome, and no section 1983 claim could proceed until the criminal proceeding ended in the defendant's favor or the resulting conviction was invalidated within the meaning of Heck. So too with Savory. Although his sentence had been served and habeas relief was no longer available to him (and thus habeas exclusivity was not at issue), the other considerations raised in Heck controlled the outcome: he had no complete cause of action until he received a favorable termination of his conviction, which occurred when the governor issued a pardon for the subject conviction. . . . The Heck bar accounts for the preclusive effect of state court criminal judgments on civil litigation by lifting the bar only when the plaintiff has achieved a favorable termination of the criminal proceeding. . . Under the defendants' rule, a section 1983 claim would accrue on release from custody even though the conviction remained intact, and even though preclusion rules would effectively prevent the plaintiff from bringing any claim inconsistent with the original criminal conviction. Claimants like Savory, who obtained a pardon several years after release from custody and who may have the most meritorious claims, would be too late. Nothing in Heck requires such a result. . . Although a straight-forward reading of Heck and its progeny (including McDonough) determines the outcome here, we must address the defendant's arguments that concurring and dissenting opinions of certain Supreme Court justices cobbled together into a seeming majority or the opinions of this court may somehow override the prime directive of Heck. Several of our post-Heck cases contain dicta or rely on reasoning that is in conflict with Heck and McDonough, and we must address and clarify those cases as well. . . . [I]n Spencer v. Kemna. . . Justice Souter again filed a concurrence expressing the view that he urged in his Heck concurrence, namely 'that a former prisoner, no longer "in custody," may bring a § 1983 action establishing the unconstitutionality of a conviction or confinement without being bound to satisfy a favorable-termination requirement that it would be impossible as a matter of law for him to satisfy.'. . Justice Ginsburg, who had been in the majority in Heck, this time agreed with Justice Souter (who was also joined by Justices O'Connor and Breyer), joining his concurrence and filing her own. . . . Justice Stevens dissented in Spencer, but he approved Justice Souter's basic premise[.] . . The defendants contended in the district court and maintain on appeal that this dicta in concurring and dissenting opinions, cobbled together, now formed a new majority, essentially overruling footnote 10 in Heck. But it is axiomatic that dicta from a collection of concurrences and dissents may not overrule majority opinions. . . The Supreme Court may eventually adopt Justice Souter's view, but it has not yet done so and we are bound by Heck. . . The defendants also assert that footnote 10 of Heck (which specifically rejected Justice Souter's proposed rule) was dicta, and therefore does not control the outcome here. The plaintiff in Heck, they note, was incarcerated and allowing a section 1983 suit during incarceration would have permitted an endrun around the habeas corpus statute. No such concern is present, they argue, in the scenario addressed in footnote 10 of Heck, specifically, persons who are no longer in custody and cannot bring habeas challenges. But Heck was concerned with more than the exclusivity of the habeas corpus remedy for persons in custody, or the intersection between habeas corpus and section 1983. The favorable termination rule in Heck also rested on concerns arising generally from collateral attacks on extant criminal convictions through civil law suits. Specifically, requiring a section 1983 plaintiff to prove favorable termination of the criminal conviction avoids parallel litigation over the issues of probable cause and guilt, and precludes the possibility that a plaintiff might succeed in a civil tort action after having been convicted in the underlying criminal prosecution, allowing the creation of conflicting judgments arising out of the same transaction. . . These concerns were repeated recently in McDonough as rationales supporting the application of Heck's favorable termination rule in a case that did not implicate concerns about habeas corpus. Because the plaintiff had been acquitted rather than convicted, there was little likelihood of a collision between habeas corpus and section 1983. Yet the Court cited the continued relevance of the favorable-termination rule as being 'rooted in pragmatic concerns with avoiding parallel criminal and civil litigation over the same subject matter and the related possibility of conflicting civil and criminal judgments.'. . In further support of the favorable termination rule, the Court also cited related concerns for finality, consistency, and the avoidance of unnecessary friction between the state and federal court systems. . . Although footnote 10 of Heck addressed a factual scenario that was not before the Court, to dismiss all of footnote 10 as dicta is to divorce a significant part of the Court's rationale from its holding. The Court was simply making clear how broadly it intended its holding to apply. . . . The defendants also asserted below and argued on appeal that this court has abrogated the rule in Heck, citing five cases: DeWalt v. Carter, 224 F.3d 607 (7th Cir. 2000); Simpson v. Nickel, 450 F.3d 303 (7th Cir. 2006); Burd v. Sessler, 702 F.3d 429 (7th Cir. 2012); Whitfield v. Howard, 852 F.3d 656 (7th Cir. 2017); and Sanchez v. City of Chicago, 880 F.3d 349 (7th Cir. 2018). According to the defendants, those cases 'together sensibly hold an individual who is no longer in custody with no access to habeas corpus relief may bring a § 1983 action challenging the constitutionality of a still standing conviction without first satisfying the favorable termination rule of Heck.'. . As we just explained, however, this court may not on its own initiative overturn decisions of the Supreme Court. Although four of those five cases came to correct resolutions, some of our language and reasoning has created confusion regarding the applicability of Heck in cases where habeas relief is not available. Indeed, it was on these cases that the district court relied in concluding that Savory had brought his claims too late. . . . We reaffirm DeWalt's basic holding today: a section 1983 complaint that challenges a disciplinary sanction related only to the conditions of confinement and that does not implicate the validity of the underlying conviction or the duration of the sentence (e.g. loss of good time credits) is not subject to Heck's favorable termination requirement. . . But part of the reasoning and language of DeWalt went further than that and implied that, in all cases where habeas relief is unavailable, then section 1983 must provide an avenue of relief. . . . This language suggesting that a section 1983 remedy must be available when habeas relief is unavailable is in conflict with footnote 10 of Heck and with our holding today. Moreover, it was unnecessary to the holding in DeWalt, and we now disavow that language. . . . Our dissenting colleague urges the court to adopt an accrual rule tied to the end of custody. A claim accrues when a plaintiff has 'a complete and present cause of action.'. . When a section 1983 claim resembles the common-law tort of malicious prosecution, the Court treats favorable termination as an element of the claim. . . Without favorable termination, a plaintiff lacks 'a complete and present cause of action.' Yet the dissent's rule would require a plaintiff to file suit without this essential element of the claim. . . . In requiring favorable termination before allowing a section 1983 claim to proceed, Heck sets a high standard. Undoubtedly, as the dissent asserts, some valid claims will never make it past the courthouse door. Heck explains, though, why a high bar must be cleared before seeking damages in a civil action on claims that imply the invalidity of a criminal conviction. The Court sought to avoid parallel litigation on the issue of guilt, preclude the possibility of conflicting resolutions arising out of the same transaction, prevent collateral attacks on criminal convictions through the vehicle of civil suits, and respect concerns for comity, finality and consistency. . .We are not in a position to alter the Heck standard or set aside these concerns. . . . Heck controls the outcome where a section 1983 claim implies the invalidity of the conviction or the sentence, regardless of the availability of habeas relief. Claims that relate only to conditions of confinement and that do not implicate the validity of the conviction or sentence are not subject to the Heck bar. We disavow the language in any case that suggests that release from custody and the unavailability of habeas relief means that section 1983 must be available as a remedy. That includes the cases on which the district court, in good faith, reasonably relied. McDonough confirms that habeas exclusivity is just one part of the rationale for Heck's holding. Concerns about comity, finality, conflicting judgments, and 'the hoary principle that civil tort actions are not appropriate vehicles for challenging the validity of outstanding criminal judgments' all underpin Heck's favorable termination rule. . . The Supreme Court may revisit the need for the favorable termination rule in cases where habeas relief is unavailable, but it has not yet done so. Savory's claims, which necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction, accrued when he was pardoned by the governor of Illinois. His section 1983 action, filed within two years of the pardon, was therefore timely filed. We reverse the district court's judgment and remand for further proceedings.") with Savory v. Cannon, 947 F.3d 409, 433-34 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc) (Easterbrook, J., dissenting) ("The Justices expressed concern in Manuel and its successor McDonough about a rule starting the time so early that legitimate claims would be lost. We should be equally concerned about a rule starting the time so late that claims never accrue. The majority's approach does just that. Some sentences are too short to allow collateral relief. We routinely see cases in which it has taken a decade to pursue a direct appeal, collateral review in state court, and collateral review in federal court. If confinement ends before collateral review begins, the custody requirement prevents all further review. If the sentence is fully served while state collateral review is ongoing, federal collateral review cannot begin. (Only state prisoners 'in custody' can seek review under § 2254(a).) So a rule under which a § 1983 claim does not accrue as long as the criminal judgment stands means that thousands of defendants sentenced to less than five or ten years in prison can never present a § 1983 claim, no matter how egregious the constitutional violations that led to wrongful conviction and custody. Released prisoners can obtain relief under the majority's approach if their convictions are set aside by pardon (Savory's situation) or certificate of innocence. Yet in most states pardons are rare, and pardons for federal crimes are rarer still. Getting a certificate of innocence is wickedly hard in both state and federal systems, because the applicant must show factual innocence, and even an acquittal does not establish that. . . Proof of innocence—the need to prove a negative—is difficult to come by. Again Savory may be an exception; he eventually found conclusive DNA evidence. Few wrongly convicted persons are so fortunate.")

Compare Teagan v. City of McDonough, 949 F.3d 670, 678-79 (11th Cir. 2020) ("[T]here is an open question as to whether Heck applies to situations where, as here, a § 1983 plaintiff may no longer seek habeas relief because she is no longer in custody. . . It is unclear whether Heck would apply here, as the length of imprisonment was so short 'that a petition for habeas relief could not have been filed and granted while [Ms. Teagan] was unlawfully in custody.' Morrow v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, 610 F.3d 1271, 1272 (11th Cir. 2010). See also id. at 1273 (Anderson, J., concurring) ("[S]everal circuits have recognized an exception from the Heck favorable termination requirement for plaintiffs no longer in custody that were precluded from obtaining habeas relief.") with Teagan v. City of McDonough, 949 F.3d 670, 684 (11th Cir. 2020) (Tjoflat, J., specially concurring) ("I concur in the judgment of the Court. I write separately to state that I believe Teagan's 42 U.S.C. § 1983 claims are barred under Heck v. Humphrey, . . . which requires Teagan to prove that her 'conviction or sentence has been reversed on direct appeal, expunged by executive order, declared invalid by a state tribunal authorized to make such determination, or called into question by a federal court's issuance of a writ of habeas corpus' before her claims are cognizable under § 1983. . . Because Teagan has not offered such proof, the City is entitled to summary judgment on her § 1983 claims regardless of whether the actions of the municipal court could be attributed to the City under Monell.")

See also Hall v. Merola, 67 F.4th 1282, 1293-95 (11th Cir. 2023) ("Hall alleged that Officer Wright violated the First Amendment by 'unlawfully gassing [Hall] with chemical agents because [Hall] file[d] lawsuits and grievances against correctional officers.'The parties disagree about whether Heck applies to Hall now that Hall is no longer in custody on his criminal convictions. . . They spend much of their briefs on the topic—a question that has divided our sister circuits. But we can decide this appeal without resolving this thorny question. As we've mentioned, Hall alleged that Officers Wright and Watson violated the First Amendment by 'unlawfully gassing [Hall] with chemical agents because [Hall] file[d] lawsuits and grievances against correctional officers.' Officers Wright and Watson argue that this claim is most similar to a malicious-prosecution claim, though they don't say why. And Hall himself never explains which common-law tort he thinks is most analogous to his claim. As for us, we don't think it's clear that a malicious-prosecution claim is the best fit here. After all, when we look at Hall's claim, Hall doesn't seem to be complaining that he was aggrieved by the disciplinary report (and accompanying loss of 'gaintime') but rather by the use of the gas itself. To be sure, if Hall's claim is that the guards fabricated a sprinkler-system charge to justify their use of gas on him, then his claim would seem to be most analogous to a malicious-prosecution claim because the wrong would be about the alleged misuse of the prison disciplinary system. We agree that that claim would be barred. . . But on the other hand, if Hall's claim complains that the guards used chemical agents on him to retaliate against him for his First Amendment protected speech (in the form of filing prison grievances), then the most analogous tort might be battery because the wrong in that case is about the use of force. And battery can be part of a First Amendment-retaliation claim. 'To state a § 1983 First Amendment retaliation claim, a plaintiff generally must show: (1) she engaged in constitutionally protected speech, such as her right to petition the government for redress; (2) the defendant's retaliatory conduct adversely affected that protected speech and right to petition; and (3) a causal connection exists between the defendant's retaliatory conduct and the adverse effect on the plaintiff's speech and right to petition.'. . The analogous common-law tort, then, is the retaliatory conduct—the second prong. In the usual case, the retaliatory conduct is an arrest or a prosecution. Nieves v. Bartlett, — – U.S. ——, 139 S. Ct. 1715, 1726, 204 L.Ed.2d 1 (2019). That is, the government arrests or prosecutes someone for their protected speech. Id. In those cases, we look to the common-law torts of false arrest or malicious prosecution. . .But a First Amendment retaliation claim can use any sort of adverse action at its second element: a civil lawsuit, . . . or the termination of employment, Lane v. Franks, 573 U.S. 228, 243, 134 S.Ct. 2369, 189 L.Ed.2d 312 (2014), for instance. Or, as relevant here, the use of force. We see no reason why Hall cannot rely on the use of force to satisfy the 'adverse action' prong. Other circuits agree. [collecting cases] . . . . So that raises the question of which claim Hall is advancing. Is Hall complaining that Officer Wright instigated a disciplinary action against him for his speech? Or is Hall instead saying that Officer Wright used gas against him to punish him for his speech? The former might be barred by Heck as analogous to a malicious-prosecution claim without a favorable termination, but the latter would not. As it turns out, though, we don't need to decide which claim Hall is bringing because we must give him leave to replead."); Vasquez Arroyo v. Starks, 589 F.3d 1091, 1096 (10th Cir. 2009) ("Because we have determined that the Kansas pre-trial diversion agreements are not outstanding convictions and therefore these § 1983 claims impugning their validity are not barred by Heck, we need not decide whether Heck applies when the plaintiff lacks an available remedy in habeas. Although we implied in Butler in dicta that Heck does not apply when a habeas remedy is lacking, 482 F.2d at 1278-81, we decline to reach this issue which the Supreme Court has not resolved, see Close, 540 U.S. at 752 n. 2, and on which the circuits are split. [footnote collecting cases]"); Hanks v. Prachar, 457 F.3d 774, 776 (8th Cir. 2006) ("We agree with Hanks that Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994), likely did not apply, given that he had already served his sentence on the 1998 charges when he filed the instant lawsuit, see Jiron v. City of Lakewood, 392 F.3d 410, 413 n. 1 (10th Cir.2004) (suggesting Heck does not apply when plaintiff is no longer in custody for offense)[.]"); Jiron v. City of Lakewood, 392 F.3d 410, 413 n.1 (10th Cir.2004) (noting that Heck might not apply where plaintiff is no longer "in custody" for offense and therefore "has no vehicle, such as a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, available to her by which she could seek to challenge the underlying felony menacing conviction.").

In Nonnette v. Small, 316 F.3d 872 (9th Cir. 2002), the plaintiff had fully served the period of incarceration imposed as a result of the deprivation of good-time credits and the imposition of administrative segregation, and his release made habeas unavailable. The Ninth Circuit joined the Second, see Huang v. Johnson, 251 F.3d 65, 75 (2d Cir. 2001), and Seventh Circuits, see DeWalt v.Carter, 224 F.3d 607, 616-18 (7th Cir. 2000) [But see Savory v. Cannon, supra], concluding that, under such circumstances, where the unavailability of habeas was due to mootness caused by release from the period of incarceration imposed, which incarceration a successful civil suit would impugn, a § 1983 action was not barred by Heck. Nonnette, 316 F.3d 872, 876, 877 n.6 (9th Cir. 2002).]

See also Covey v. Assessor of Ohio Cnty., 777 F.3d 186, 197-98 & n.11 (4th Cir. 2015) ("[A] civil-rights claim does not necessarily imply the invalidity of a conviction or sentence if (1) the conviction derives from a guilty plea rather than a verdict obtained with unlawfully obtained evidence and (2) the plaintiff does not plead facts inconsistent with guilt. . . This is the case here. Mr. Covey never contested his guilt. Nor did he ever seek to suppress the evidence underlying his conviction. Thus, relief under § 1983 or Bivens for the alleged illegal searches does not implicate the propriety of Mr. Covey's conviction, and Heck acts as no bar. On the other hand, some of Mr. Covey's claims would imply the conviction's invalidity. For example, in a portion of the complaint, Mr. Covey alleges that he was falsely imprisoned and deprived of his liberty. . . We construe this allegation as pertaining to Mr. Covey's period of home confinement. As to Mr. Covey, but not necessarily Mrs. Covey, . . . relief for this 'injury' would necessarily imply the invalidity of Mr. Covey's conviction. . .That conclusion alone, however, does not end our inquiry. We have held once—in an unpublished opinion—that Heck bars a claim that implies the invalidity of a conviction or sentence even if the claimant is no longer in custody, . . . but only if the claimant could have practicably sought habeas relief while in custody and failed to do so. . . At this stage, it is unclear whether Mr. Covey actually pursued or was practicably able to pursue habeas relief for his conviction. Mr. Covey pleaded guilty on March 30, 2010, and was thereafter sentenced to home confinement for a period of not less than one year and no more than five years. The Coveys filed this action on October 20, 2011, after Mr. Covey completed his term of home confinement. If Mr. Covey was unable to pursue habeas relief because of insufficient time or some other barrier, then Heck is wholly inapplicable to the Coveys' § 1983 and Bivens claims. Because we cannot make this determination on the record, we hold that Heck does not bar any of Mr. Covey's claims for purposes of the defendants' motions to dismiss. We leave it to the district court on remand to decide at summary judgment whether Heck bars any of Mr. Covey's claims. . . .Because of inadequate briefing by the parties on this issue, we do not address whether a Heck bar properly applies to a person formerly in custody, even if the person could have practicably sought habeas relief. We simply note that the binding precedent from the Supreme Court and in this Circuit does not clearly impose a 'practicable diligence' requirement for former prisoners."); Hayward v. Cleveland Clinic Found., 759 F.3d 601, 614-16 (6th Cir. 2014) ("In S.E. v. Grant Cnty. Bd. of Educ., 544 F.3d 633, 638–39 (6th Cir.2008), this Court applied Powers to hold that Heck's favorable termination requirement does not apply where, due to the length of a sentence, a petitioner was unable to assert a habeas claim. Powers logically extends to situations in which petitioners elect to participate in pretrial diversion programs to avoid trial and possible jail time. . . . . In the instant case, Plaintiff Aaron Hayward pleaded guilty to resisting arrest and paid a fine rather than spending an extensive amount of time in jail. He was ineligible for habeas review because he did not serve a sentence long enough to assert a claim challenging his conviction. Therefore, he claims that Powers means Heck is inapplicable to his case. . . .Although application of Powers in this case is a question of law, it is not an issue for which resolution is clear beyond doubt, and a district court should have had the opportunity to consider the facts in this case to determine whether Powers applies. Plaintiff has failed to demonstrate any exceptional circumstances that prevented him from asserting this argument before the district court. Plaintiff is not a pro se litigant. He was represented by counsel before the district court, and he continues to be represented by counsel on appeal. He had every opportunity to raise his Powers argument in any one of his three amended complaints or other filings before the district court, yet he failed to do so. As this Court has found waiver in far more sympathetic cases and Plaintiff fails to assert that he is entitled to application of an exception, this Court declines consideration of Plaintiff's Powers argument."); Morris v. Noe, 672 F.3d 1185, 1193 n.2 (10th Cir. 2012) ("[T]he Heck bar does not apply to plaintiffs who have no available habeas corpus remedy. Cohen v. Longshore, 621 F.3d 1311, 1317 (10th Cir.2010); see also Spencer v. Kenna, 523 U.S. 1(1998) (five justices agreeing that Heck's favorable termination requirement did not apply to "a former prisoner, no longer in custody"). Because Morris was never in custody, but merely received a citation, Heck does not bar Plaintiff's unlawful arrest claim. See Klen v. City of Loveland, Colo., 661 F.3d 498, 515 (10th Cir.2011)."); Klen v. City of Loveland, Colo. 661 F.3d 498, 515, 516 (10th Cir. 2011) ("The Heck issue is slightly more complicated than plaintiffs suggest. While Ed Klen paid a fine, he also received a deferred judgment and sentence that required him to 'keep the Court advised of his current business and residential addresses and telephone numbers' and to 'commit no other violations of Title 15 of the Loveland Municipal Code during the deferred period.'. . In the event of a breach of any of these conditions, the Loveland Municipal Court was empowered to enter judgment and impose sentence on his no-contest pleas. . . According to plaintiffs, such a sentence could include incarceration of up to one year on each count. . . . While the restrictions imposed on Ed Klen as a result of his plea required him to do more than pay a fine, they do not appear to qualify as a significant restraint on his liberty sufficient to permit him to invoke a habeas remedy. Thus, his § 1983 claims concerning his conviction are not barred by Heck."); Cohen v. Longshore, 621 F.3d 1311, 1316, 1317 (10th Cir. 2010) ("Under these circumstances, and in light of the fact that Heck involved a petitioner who was still incarcerated, we are not persuaded that Heck must be applied to petitioners without a habeas remedy. We are instead persuaded by the reasoning of the Second, Fourth, Sixth, Seventh [But see Savory v. Cannon, supra], Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits that we are free to follow the five-Justice plurality's approach in Spencer on this unsettled question of law. We are also persuaded that the Spencer plurality approach is both more just and more in accordance with the purpose of § 1983 than the approach of those circuits that strictly apply Heck even to petitioners who have been released from custody. If a petitioner is unable to obtain habeas relief − at least where this inability is not due to the petitioner's own lack of diligence − it would be unjust to place his claim for relief beyond the scope of § 1983 where 'exactly the same claim could be redressed if brought by a former prisoner who had succeeded in cutting his custody short through habeas.' Spencer, 523 U.S. at 21 (Souter, J., concurring). We thus adopt the reasoning of these circuits and hold that a petitioner who has no available remedy in habeas, through no lack of diligence on his part, is not barred by Heck from pursuing a § 1983 claim. The district court therefore erred in holding that Plaintiff's false imprisonment claim lacked merit where Plaintiff's prior attempt to obtain a favorable termination in habeas was dismissed based on mootness."); Morrow v. Federal Bureau of Prisons, 610 F.3d 1271, 1273, 1274 (11th Cir. 2010) (Anderson, J., concurring specially) (unpublished) ("Drawing on Justice Souter's concurrence in Spencer v. Kemna, 523 U.S. 1, 18, 118 S.Ct. 978, 988 (1998) (Souter, J., concurring), several circuits have recognized an exception from the Heck favorable termination requirement for plaintiffs no longer in custody that were precluded from obtaining habeas relief. [collecting cases] Although other circuits have disagreed, I believe the cases from the Second, Sixth, and Ninth Circuits define a sensible application of the favorable termination requirement based on Justice Souter's concurrence in Spencer to plaintiffs that are no longer in custody and who, despite due diligence, could not have obtained habeas corpus relief." [footnotes omitted]); S.E. v. Grant County Bd. of Educ., 544 F.3d 633, 638, 639 (6th Cir. 2008) ("Plaintiffs convincingly assert that Powers v. Hamilton County Public Defender Commission, 501 F.3d 592,603 (6th Cir.2007) [FN3], cert. denied, __ S.Ct. __, 77 U.S.L.W. 3019 (U.S. Oct. 6, 2008) (No. 07-1318), supports their position that Heck poses no bar to the instant suit, because A.E. was never in custody, was not convicted or sentenced, and was never eligible for habeas corpus relief. Accordingly, they argue she was improperly prohibited from 'seek[ing] vindication of her federal rights.' . . . Given the facts of this case, where the plaintiff was neither convicted nor sentenced and was habeas-ineligible, we hold that Heck is inapplicable, and poses no bar to plaintiffs' claims."); Wilson v. Johnson, 535 F.3d 262, 267, 268 & n.8 (4th Cir. 2008) ("Both parties readily recognize that the circuits are split on this issue. Four circuits regard the five justice plurality in Spencer as dicta, and continue to interpret Heck as barring individuals from filing virtually all § 1983 claims unless the favorable termination requirement is met. . . On the other hand, five circuits have held that the Spencer plurality's view allows a plaintiff to obtain relief under § 1983 when it is no longer possible to meet the favorable termination requirement via a habeas action. . . As evidenced by the circuit split, the Supreme Court has yet to conclusively decide if a former inmate can file a § 1983 claim when his habeas avenue to federal court has been foreclosed. . . . Because Wilson's § 1983 claim seeks damages for past confinement, he does not fall squarely within the holdings of Preiser, Wolff, Heck or Spencer. Thus, while Supreme Court dicta in Heck and Spencer provides grist for circuits on both sides of this dilemma, we are left with no directly applicable precedent upon which to rely. We believe that the reasoning employed by the plurality in Spencer must prevail in a case, like Wilson's, where an individual would be left without any access to federal court if his § 1983 claim was barred. Indeed, the reach and intent of the habeas remedy would not be circumscribed by Wilson's § 1983 claim since he filed it after the expiration of his sentence. . . . If a prisoner could not, as a practical matter, seek habeas relief, and after release, was prevented from filing a § 1983 claim, § 1983's purpose of providing litigants with 'a uniquely federal remedy against incursions under the claimed authority of state law upon rights secured by the Constitution and laws of the Nations,' . . . would be severely imperiled. Barring Wilson's claim would leave him without access to any judicial forum in which to seek relief for his alleged wrongful imprisonment. Quite simply, we do not believe that a habeas ineligible former prisoner seeking redress for denial of his most precious right − freedom − should be left without access to a federal court. . . . While Wilson concedes that filing a petition for habeas corpus was theoretically possible, he argues that complying with habeas' administrative exhaustion requirement during the additional confinement was impossible."); Erlandson v. Northglenn Municipal Court, 528 F.3d 785, 787, 789 n.2 (10th Cir. 2008) ("Mr. Erlandson alleges that his municipal court conviction [for littering his own property] resulted only in a monetary fine. However, the imposition of a fine, by itself, does not satisfy the custody requirement. . . Therefore, because Mr. Erlandson is not in custody, the habeas corpus claims he raises seeking to overturn his conviction must be dismissed. . . . . Because we are relying on the Rooker-Feldman doctrine to dispose of any claims asserted by Mr. Erlandson under § 1983, we do not need to decide whether the Supreme Court's 'favorable-termination requirement'. . . applies in cases such as this one where the party seeking relief from a state-court conviction, through no fault of his own, does not have a remedy available under the federal habeas statute. We note, however, that there is currently a split among our sister circuits on this issue. See, e.g., Powers v. Hamilton County Pub. Defender Comm'n, 501 F.3d 592, 601-03 (6th Cir.2007) (discussing circuit split); Mendoza v. Meisel, No. 07-4627, 2008 WL 726860, at *1 (3rd Cir. Mar. 19, 2008) (per curiam) ("The District Court reasoned that Mendoza is barred from asserting a § 1983 claim until the convictions on his challenged motor vehicle offenses are set aside or have otherwise terminated in his favor. . . . We disagree with the District Court that Heck applies to a case such as Mendoza's. Heck does not bar a § 1983 claim where the plaintiff is unable to challenge his conditions of confinement through a petition for federal habeas corpus. . . Because Mendoza was never incarcerated, or otherwise in custody, federal habeas relief has never been available to him and, therefore, Heck cannot apply."); Powers v. Hamilton County Public Defender Com'n, 501 F.3d 592, 601-03 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Drawing on Justice Souter's Heck and Spencer pronouncements, Powers argues that the favorable-termination requirement is inapplicable to his claims because he has been released from prison. As an initial matter, Powers misstates the nature of the Heck limitation that Justice Souter has theorized. What is dispositive in Powers's situation is not that he is no longer incarcerated, but that his term of incarceration − one day − was too short to enable him to seek habeas relief. It seems unlikely that Justice Souter intended to carve out a broad Heck exception for all former prisoners. The better reading of his analysis is that a § 1983 plaintiff is entitled to a Heck exception if the plaintiff was precluded 'as a matter of law' from seeking habeas redress, but not entitled to such an exception if the plaintiff could have sought and obtained habeas review while still in prison but failed to do so. . . .To date, neither we, nor the Supreme Court, have conclusively resolved whether Spencer should be construed as limiting the reach of Heck such that a § 1983 claimant in Powers's shoes is excepted from the favorable-termination requirement. . . . Although we have not yet definitively weighed in on the interplay between Heck and Spencer, our sister circuits are divided on the question. Four circuits, including the First, Third, Fifth, and Eighth Circuits, have rejected Justice Souter's analysis and instead have held that § 1983 claimants must comply with Heck's favorable-termination requirement even if habeas relief was unavailable to them. These courts have reasoned that to recognize an exception to Heck along the lines sketched by Justice Souter would amount to an impermissible deviation from Supreme Court precedent. . . .We disagree with the reasoning of our sister circuits who have decreed themselves bound by Heck to the exclusion of Justice Souter's comments in his Heck and Spencer concurrences. . . . We are persuaded by the logic of those circuits that have held that Heck's favorable-termination requirement cannot be imposed against § 1983 plaintiffs who lack a habeas option for the vindication of their federal rights. Most analogous to Powers's case is Leather v. Ten Eyck, in which the Second Circuit concluded that the plaintiff's § 1983 suit could proceed despite noncompliance with the favorable-termination requirement because the plaintiff had been assessed only a monetary fine in his criminal proceeding and thus was ineligible for habeas relief. . . The Ninth and Eleventh Circuits also have dispensed with the favorable-termination requirement where habeas is unavailable. . . . These Circuits have the better-reasoned view. Powers was fined for his reckless-driving misdemeanor and then imprisoned for at least one, but not more than thirty, days for his failure to pay the fine. Under these circumstances, there is no way that Powers could have obtained habeas review of his incarceration. This is precisely the kind of situation that Justice Souter had in mind when he argued in Heck and Spencer that the favorable-termination requirement could not be deployed to foreclose federal review of asserted deprivations of federal rights by habeas-ineligible plaintiffs. Accordingly, we join the Second, Ninth, and Eleventh Circuits in holding that the favorable-termination requirement poses no impediment to Powers's § 1983 claims.").

See also Sevy v. Barach, No. 17-13789, 2019 WL 3556706, at *5 (E.D. Mich. Aug. 5, 2019) ("In this case, Sevy's retaliation claim clears any Heck bar. For one, Sevy's First Amendment retaliation claim is consistent with his no contest plea. Sevy says Barach and Marshall used force against him because of his protected speech, not that they arrested him for it (or that he was eventually charged and convicted of a minor offense as a pretext). . . Thus, because Sevy might have been both lawfully arrested for disturbing the peace and yet unlawfully subjected to force because of his speech, his First Amendment retaliation claim is consistent with his conviction. In addition, Sevy could not seek habeas review after he pleaded no contest and paid a fine because he was never in custody and so was precluded from challenging his conviction by way of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Thus, Heck does not bar his § 1983 claim for First Amendment retaliation."); Echavarria v. Roach, No. 16-CV-11118-ADB, 2017 WL 3928270, at *6–7 (D. Mass. Sept. 7, 2017) ("Defendants Hollow and the City of Lynn argue in their reply brief that Plaintiff should not be protected by Heck because Plaintiff became ineligible for federal habeas corpus relief by 2000. . . This argument is unsupported by caselaw, and Defendants have not stated a clear reason to impose a Catch-22 upon Plaintiff whereby any § 1983 suit that implicated the validity of his conviction would have been barred by Heck prior to the date his motion for a new trial was granted, but also foreclosed after that point because it was too late to file a moot habeas corpus petition. Defendants cite Figueroa for the proposition that 'the impugning of an allegedly unconstitutional conviction in a separate, antecedent proceeding [is] a prerequisite to a resultant section 1983 action for damages,' but they fail to note that this quotation comes from a section discussing the appellants' attempt to 'collapse the habeas proceedings into their section 1983 action, thereby creating a legal chimera through which they seek simultaneously to invalidate [the] conviction and to recover damages,' and involves a case where the criminal defendant's conviction had not been reversed or vacated but could no longer be challenged through a habeas corpus petition because he was deceased. . . Here, Plaintiff's conviction was vacated, and he has not attempted to conflate a habeas corpus petition with a § 1983 suit. To the extent Defendants intend to argue that the filing of a timely habeas corpus petition should be a prerequisite to obtaining the protection of Heck, they have not cited cases or other persuasive sources . . . to support this assertion. Furthermore, the Court notes that, pursuant to Heck, Petitioner's cause of action did not accrue until his motion for a new trial was granted; therefore, the issue is not whether equitable tolling applies, as Defendants imply, but rather, when his cause of action came into being. . . Accordingly, Plaintiff's suit is not barred by the statute of limitations. Plaintiff's claims did not accrue until, at the earliest, the date his motion for a new trial was granted, April 30, 2015."); D.D. v. Scheeler, No. 1:13-CV-504, 2015 WL 892387, at *8 (S.D. Ohio Mar. 3, 2015) ("The Court also rejects Defendants' argument that S.D.'s claim is barred by Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477 (1994). The Heck rule prohibits § 1983 actions that necessarily require the court to find the conviction underlying an action was invalid. Defendants rely upon S.E. v. Grant County Bd. of Educ., 522 F.Supp.2d 826, 831 (E.D.Ky.2007), aff'd, 544 F.3d 633 (6th Cir.2008) for their argument that S.D.'s participation in a diversion program constitutes a conviction and bars her § 1983 claim pursuant to Heck. In that case, the district court found that there was no material difference between a diversion program entered into by plaintiff, which it deemed was not a favorable termination, and a conviction resulting in probation. . . As discussed, it is disputed whether S.D. participated in a diversion program. But even if she did, Defendants ignore Sixth Circuit case law. On appeal, the Sixth Circuit expressly rejected the Defendants' argument and district court's analysis in S.E. Grant and stated, 'where the plaintiff was neither convicted nor sentenced and was habeas-ineligible, we hold that Heck is inapplicable, and poses no bar to plaintiffs' claims.'. . Accordingly, Defendants' argument that Heck precludes S.D.'s § 1983 claims is inconsistent with Sixth Circuit precedent and must be rejected."); Kirk v. Muskingum County Ohio, No. 2:09-cv-0583, 2010 WL 3719286, at *4 (S.D. Ohio May 24, 2010) ("Like the plaintiff in Powers, Plaintiff was not 'in custody' long enough to have obtained habeas review within his short period of incarceration. . . Consequently, the Heck doctrine does not apply to Plaintiff's claims in this case. See Ballanger v. City of Lebanon, No. 1:07-CV-00256, 2008 WL 4279583 at *4-5 (S.D.Ohio 2008) (holding that the Heck doctrine did not apply to a plaintiff incarcerated for forty-five days)."); Medeiros v. Clark, No. CV-F-09-1177 OWW/GSA, 2010 WL 1812641, at *12 (E.D. Cal. May 5, 2010) ("Here, because Plaintiff was never convicted of any crime, he could not challenge the misdemeanor pretrial diversion through appeal or habeas corpus. Plaintiff was never incarcerated and suffers no collateral consequences as a result of the misdemeanor pretrial diversion. See Nickerson v. Portland Police Bureau, 2008 WL 4449874 at *8 (D.Or., Sept.30, 2008): "With no habeas remedy available, and no allegations of any collateral consequences stemming from a traffic conviction, Heck does not bar plaintiff's section 1983 equal protection claim."); see also Cole v. Doe I Thru 2 Officers of the City of Emeryville Police Dep't., 387 F.Supp.2d 1084, 1092-1093 (N.D.Cal.2005). Defendants' motion to dismiss the First Cause of Action as barred by Heck is DENIED."); Ferrell v. Seagraves, No. 4:07-cv-35, 2008 WL 4763435, at *1 (E.D. Tenn. Oct. 29, 2008) ("As in Powers, Plaintiff was sentenced to only thirty days in jail. . . The length of his sentence effectively precluded him from seeking any resolution to his challenges to his incarceration through federal habeas corpus. . . Accordingly, under the law as it stood at the time of the Court's November 2, 2007 Memorandum and Order, none of Plaintiff's claims were barred by Heck."); Nickerson v. Portland Police Bureau, No. 08-217-HU, 2008 WL 4449874, at *8 (D. Or. Sept. 30, 2008) ("Guerrero underscores the need to examine why habeas relief is unavailable to a section 1983 plaintiff whose claim would, if successful, necessarily invalidate an underlying conviction. As the Guerrero court explained, if habeas relief is unavailable because of a plaintiff's failure to timely pursue habeas remedies, Heck will still bar the section 1983 claim. . . . The facts in the instant case are analogous to those in Nonnette, not Guerrero or Cunningham. Here, the allegations in the Amended Complaint indicate that plaintiff was fined upon conviction of the traffic offense for which Officer Hart cited him, but he was never incarcerated. Thus, he has no habeas remedy available to him. Moreover, the unavailability of habeas is not related to a lack of diligence on plaintiff's part. With no habeas remedy available, and no allegations of any collateral consequences stemming from a traffic conviction, Heck does not bar plaintiff's section 1983 equal protection claim."); El Badrawi v. Department of Homeland Sec., 579 F.Supp.2d 249, 273 (D. Conn. 2008) ("Heck also does not bar El Badrawi's actions based on his false arrest and initial detention. Heck's logic is rooted in the recognition that prisoners need to exhaust their habeas remedies. . . Accordingly, Heck will not bar an action when the prisoner was never in state confinement, and hence never had any remedy in habeas corpus in which he could challenge his conviction or confinement. . . By the same logic, Heck does not bar a claim when the prisoner was in custody for such a brief period of time that any available habeas remedy would have been pointless."); Ballinger v. City of Lebabnon, No. 1:07-CV-00256, 2008 WL 4279583, at *5 (S.D. Ohio Sept. 18, 2008) ("The Sixth Circuit has recently held that 'Heck's favorable-termination requirement cannot be imposed against § 1983 plaintiffs who lack a habeas option for the vindication of their federal rights.' . . That is precisely the case here. In the instant case, plaintiff was incarcerated for forty-five days then released. Like the plaintiff in Powers who was fined for a misdemeanor and imprisoned for at least one, but not more than thirty days for his failure to pay the fine, 'there is no way that [plaintiff] could have obtained habeas review of his incarceration.'. . A person convicted of a crime in state court can obtain a writ of habeas corpus only if he is 'in custody' pursuant to the unlawful judgment of that court. . . Since plaintiff was not 'in custody' long enough to seek habeas corpus relief, Heck's favorable termination requirement is not a bar to plaintiff's Section 1983 action."); Sanabria v. Martins, 568 F.Supp.2d 220, 224-26 (D. Conn. Mar. 26, 2008) ("In Leather v. Eyck, 180 F.3d 420, 424 (2d Cir.1999), the Second Circuit reasoned that, where a § 1983 plaintiff was never incarcerated for a prior offense and thus had no opportunity to raise a constitutional challenge via habeas corpus, Heck does not apply. Here, Sanabria pleaded guilty to violating ' 53a-167(a) and was sentenced to pay a $250 fine without any term of incarceration. . . Like the plaintiff in Leather, Sanabria had no habeas corpus remedy, and so Heck is no bar to his § 1983 action. Under such circumstances, the Leather court concluded, a plaintiff should 'be permitted to pursue his § 1983 claim in the district court unless principles of res judicata or collateral estoppel preclude his suit.' . . . . Whether the question of how to view Sanabria's guilty plea is approached through the lens of preclusion or evidence law, though, the effect would be the same given the present procedural posture. Even if not estopped from denying the facts underlying his plea and conviction, Sanabria cannot create a disputed issue of material fact relevant to the summary judgment analysis simply by contesting the basis for his guilty plea. . . Sanabria pleaded guilty to interfering with a police officer in violation of Connecticut General Statutes ' 53a-167a, a class A misdemeanor offense, thereby conceding the factual basis for the plea and admitting the facts necessary to establish the three elements of that offense: (1) interference with an officer, (2) with intent to so interfere, (3) while the officer is performing his or her duties. His bare assertions in opposition that he offered no resistance, therefore, provide no demonstration of the existence of a genuine issue of material fact on the subject which underlay his conviction. The analysis does not end here, however, because Plaintiff's § 1983 allegations are not wholly congruent with the facts determined by his guilty plea. . . . Sanabria cannot now proceed with a § 1983 action premised on his contention that he did nothing wrong and that Martins acted without provocation. But to the extent Plaintiff is seeking damages based on the quantum of force Martins used after Plaintiff completed the offense of interfering with an officer (or perhaps in response thereto), there remains a genuine issue of material fact for trial."); Denton v. Hanifen, No. 3:06CV00400-JDM, 2008 WL 655984, at *3 (W.D. Ky. Mar. 7, 2008) ("The Sixth Circuit and others . . . have held that Heck is no bar to the claims of a § 1983 plaintiff for whom habeas relief was not available to vindicate their federal rights. Powers v. Hamilton County Public Defender Commission, 501 F.3d 592, 603 (2008)(citing cases from sister circuits). Such is the case here. A person convicted of a crime in state court can obtain a writ of habeas corpus only if he is 'in custody' pursuant to the unlawful judgment of that court. . . A person, even if in pre-trial custody, cannot attack a judgment until it is rendered, or a sentence until he has begun to serve it. . . Thus, even though Mr. Denton was 'in custody' until the court accepted his guilty plea and ordered him released, habeas relief was not available to him because no judgment had been rendered and no sentence imposed based on that judgment. In addition, while those on parole or released on their own recognizance continue to suffer restraints on their liberty, and therefore are considered 'in custody' for purposes of habeas relief even though not physically behind bars, . . . habeas relief is foreclosed to those who have completed their term of incarceration, with no further obligations due, or supervision enforced by, the state. Accordingly, the moment the state court entered its order accepting Mr. Denton's guilty plea and awarded him full credit for time served with no further restraints on his liberty, habeas relief was foreclosed to Mr. Denton. The time between the court's acceptance of Mr. Denton's guilty plea and the order releasing him was only slightly more than one week. Thus, although technically he could have pursued habeas relief during that small window of time, as a practical matter, habeas relief was foreclosed to him once the judge entered the order releasing him and, practically speaking, was never really available. Consequently, Heck poses no bar to plaintiff's assertion of his § 1983 claim in this matter."); Brown v. City of Chicago, No. 04 C 8134, 2006 WL 3320103, at *4, *6 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 9, 2006) ("Plaintiff cannot bring a habeas action because Plaintiff's habeas petition was dismissed on April 27, 2006, by this Court because Plaintiff was not then presently in the custody of the Illinois Department of Corrections or under mandatory supervised release. . . Therefore, the central issue is whether Section 1983 actions should be available to former prisoners, who cannot avail themselves of the habeas remedy, or whether such actions are barred by the Heck doctrine.. . . .[B]ecause Plaintiff is no longer in custody and, therefore, cannot pursue the habeas action, Plaintiff can pursue his Section 1983 claims."); Powell v. Bucci, No. 04-CV-1192, 2006 WL 2052159, at *4 (N.D.N.Y. July 21, 2006) ("At first blush, it appears that the Heck Rule would bar the three remaining Counts. Counts 1, 2 and 3 arise out of the August 13, 2004 seizure that resulted in the traffic tickets and subsequent convictions and seek to 'recover damages for [an] allegedly unconstitutional ... imprisonment, or for other harm caused by actions whose unlawfulness would render a conviction or sentence invalid.' . . . However, the Second Circuit has interpreted Heck as applying only when the subsequent conviction resulted in the plaintiff's incarceration. . . . Here, there is no indication that Plaintiff was incarcerated because of her convictions on the traffic violations, and, therefore, the Heck Rule does not apply to any of the Counts."); Limone v. United States, 271 F.Supp.2d 345 (D. Mass. 2003) (unfair to apply Heck where government had blocked effective access to post-conviction remedies Aby actively subverting [attempts to prevail through] commutation procedures and by withholding critical evidence until years after [convicted men]had died."), aff'd in part and remanded in part, Limone v. Condon, 372 F.3d 39(1st Cir. 2004); Lueck v. Wathen, 262 F. Supp.2d 690, 699 & n.7 (N.D. Tex. 2003) ("[A] prisoner who is effectively barred from raising a non-frivolous claim in a federal habeas proceeding because the state has interfered with his right of access to the courts should be able to sue for money damages, to the extent those damages can be quantified.").

The court in Nonnette distinguished its decision in Cunningham v. Gates, 312 F.3d 1148 (9th Cir. 2003), as amended on denial of reh'g, (Jan. 14, 2003) and cert. denied, 538 U.S. 960 (2003), where Heck was held to bar plaintiff's claim in a situation where the unavailability of habeas was due to a failure to timely pursue habeas remedies. 312 F.3d at 1153 n.3.

See also Galanti v. Nevada Department of Corrections, 65 F.4th 1152, 1153-54, 1156 (9th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 527 (2023) ("We hold that Heck does not apply in this case. Galanti is no longer in custody and is thus unable to raise claims for credit deductions in a petition for habeas corpus. As such, this case falls within the limited exception to Heck we recognized in Nonnette v. Small, 316 F.3d 872, 875–76 (9th Cir. 2002). Because Heck does not bar this lawsuit, we reverse and remand with respect to Galanti's due process claim, which the district court misconstrued as challenging only the denial of credit-deductions from his parole date. . . . Although the district court did not reach the issue, Defendants assert that all of Galanti's claims are barred by Heck because a judgment in his favor would necessarily imply the invalidity of the duration of his sentence. Galanti argues that his claims fall under an exception to Heck recognized by our court in Nonnette because he is no longer incarcerated and thus cannot bring his claim for credit deductions in a habeas petition. Defendants contend that Nonnette is inapplicable because Galanti did not timely pursue habeas relief while in custody. . . . This case is much more like Nonnette than Guerrero. First, Galanti challenges the deprivation of credit-deductions, not his underlying sentence. Second, to the extent that Guerrero imposes a diligence requirement on § 1983 plaintiffs under Nonnette, it does not bar Galanti's claim. Given the timeline Galanti alleges, he had little time to obtain habeas relief. Galanti earned the credits at issue on April 1, 2018, he was released on June 1, 2018, and his parole expired on August 22, 2018, giving him only a few months during which he could have filed a habeas petition. And if his sentence expired during the pendency of his case, which is very likely given the timeframe, it would have been dismissed as moot. This differs from the situation in Guerrero, in which the plaintiff allowed the habeas statute of limitations to lapse and then attempted to 'use his failure to timely pursue habeas remedies as a shield against the implications of Heck.'. . Moreover, Galanti alleges that he made complaints and took other efforts to rectify the situation while in custody, unlike Guerrero, who waited years before taking 'any action at all.'. . Accordingly, Heck does not bar this suit.")

Compare Martin v. City of Boise, 920 F.3d 584, 613-15 (9th Cir. 2019) (amended opinion on denial of rehearing and denial of rehearing en banc), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 674 (2019), abrogated on other grounds by City of Grants Pass, Oregon v. Johnson, 144 S. Ct. 2202 (2024) ("Relying on the concurring and dissenting opinions in Spencer, we have held that the 'unavailability of a remedy in habeas corpus because of mootness' permitted a plaintiff released from custody to maintain a § 1983 action for damages, 'even though success in that action would imply the invalidity of the disciplinary proceeding that caused revocation of his good-time credits.' Nonnette v. Small, 316 F.3d 872, 876 (9th Cir. 2002). But we have limited Nonnette in recent years. Most notably, we held in Lyall v. City of Los Angeles, 807 F.3d 1178 (9th Cir. 2015), that even where a plaintiff had no practical opportunity to pursue federal habeas relief while detained because of the short duration of his confinement, Heck bars a § 1983 action that would imply the invalidity of a prior conviction if the plaintiff could have sought invalidation of the underlying conviction via direct appeal or state post-conviction relief, but did not do so. . . . Here, the majority of the plaintiffs' claims for retrospective relief are governed squarely by Lyall. It is undisputed that all the plaintiffs not only failed to challenge their convictions on direct appeal but expressly waived the right to do so as a condition of their guilty pleas. The plaintiffs have made no showing that any of their convictions were invalidated via state post-conviction relief. We therefore hold that all but two of the plaintiffs' claims for damages are foreclosed under Lyall. . . .The Heck doctrine, in other words, serves to ensure the finality and validity of previous convictions, not to insulate future prosecutions from challenge. In context, it is clear that Wilkinson's holding that the Heck doctrine bars a § 1983 action 'no matter the relief sought (damages or equitable relief) ... if success in that action would necessarily demonstrate the invalidity of confinement or its duration' applies to equitable relief concerning an existing confinement, not to suits seeking to preclude an unconstitutional confinement in the future, arising from incidents occurring after any prior conviction and stemming from a possible later prosecution and conviction. . . As Wilkinson held, 'claims for future relief (which, if successful, will not necessarily imply the invalidity of confinement or shorten its duration)' are distant from the 'core' of habeas corpus with which the Heck line of cases is concerned, and are not precluded by the Heck doctrine. . . In sum, we hold that the majority of the plaintiffs' claims for retrospective relief are barred by Heck, but both Martin and Hawkes stated claims for damages to which Heck has no application. We further hold that Heck has no application to the plaintiffs' requests for prospective injunctive relief.") with Martin v. City of Boise, 920 F.3d 584, 618-20 (9th Cir. 2019) (amended opinion on denial of rehearing and denial of rehearing en banc), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 674 (2019), abrogated on other grounds by City of Grants Pass, Oregon v. Johnson, 144 S. Ct. 2202 (2024) (Owens, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I agree with the majority that the doctrine of Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477, 114 S.Ct. 2364, 129 L.Ed.2d 383 (1994), bars the plaintiffs' 42 U.S.C. § 1983 claims for damages that are based on convictions that have not been challenged on direct appeal or invalidated in state post-conviction relief. See Lyall v. City of Los Angeles, 807 F.3d 1178, 1192 n.12 (9th Cir. 2015).I also agree that Heck and its progeny have no application where there is no 'conviction or sentence' that would be undermined by granting a plaintiff's request for relief under § 1983. . . I therefore concur in the majority's conclusion that Heck does not bar plaintiffs Robert Martin and Pamela Hawkes from seeking retrospective relief for the two instances in which they received citations, but not convictions. I also concur in the majority's Eighth Amendment analysis as to those two claims for retrospective relief. Where I part ways with the majority is in my understanding of Heck's application to the plaintiffs' claims for declaratory and injunctive relief. . . . Edwards . . .leads me to conclude that an individual who was convicted under a criminal statute, but who did not challenge the constitutionality of the statute at the time of his conviction through direct appeal or post-conviction relief, cannot do so in the first instance by seeking declaratory or injunctive relief under § 1983. . . I therefore would hold that Heck bars the plaintiffs' claims for declaratory and injunctive relief. We are not the first court to struggle applying Heck to 'real life examples,' nor will we be the last. . . If the slate were blank, I would agree that the majority's holding as to prospective relief makes good sense. But because I read Heck and its progeny differently, I dissent as to that section of the majority's opinion. I otherwise join the majority in full.")

See also Lyall v. City of Los Angeles, 807 F.3d 1178, 1191-92 & n.12 (9th Cir. 2015) ("We have looked to the separate Spencer opinions for guidance as to whether Heck's favorable-termination requirement applies in all § 1983 cases and have concluded that, at least sometimes, it does not. Two cases, Nonnette v. Small, 316 F.3d 872 (9th Cir.2002), and Guerrero v. Gates, 442 F.3d 697 (9th Cir.2006), define the rough boundaries of the Heck bar, as we have construed it post-Spencer. In Nonnette, a state prisoner, after first exhausting his prison administrative remedies, brought a § 1983 suit against prison officials, alleging that they wrongly revoked some of his good-time credits and placed him in administrative segregation without giving him adequate process. The district court held that his § 1983 action was barred by Heck. By the time we heard his appeal, however, the inmate had been released. We held that because any habeas corpus petition filed by the now-former inmate would be dismissed as moot, he was not barred by Heck from bringing a § 1983 suit. . . We stated that this holding 'affects only former prisoners challenging loss of good-time credits, revocation of parole or similar matters; the status of prisoners challenging their underlying convictions or sentences does not change upon release, because they continue to be able to petition for a writ of habeas corpus.'. .In Guerrero, decided four years later, we distinguished Nonnette and concluded that an ex-inmate's § 1983 suit was barred by Heck. The plaintiff in Guerrero alleged that various LAPD officials had conspired to subject him to excessive force, wrongful arrest, and malicious prosecution. . . He did not file suit until approximately a year after his release from prison. . . Examining our previous decisions, we determined that 'timely pursuit of available habeas relief' is an important prerequisite for a § 1983 plaintiff seeking to escape the Heck bar. . . Thus, we explained, the plaintiff in Nonnette deserved relief from the Heck bar because he 'immediately pursued relief after the incident giving rise to [his] claims and could not seek habeas relief only because of the shortness of his prison sentence.'. . Guerrero, by contrast, never challenged his convictions prior to filing his § 1983 suit, despite having years in custody in which to do so. We held that this 'self-imposed' failure to seek habeas relief was not a ground for allowing Guerrero to escape the Heck bar. Cortez's case is more akin to Guerrero than to Nonnette. . . . We acknowledge that Cortez's inability to obtain federal habeas relief is no fault of his own: He was in custody for only two days after his arrest and was not sentenced to any prison time as a result of his infraction conviction. The brevity of Cortez's time in custody made federal habeas effectively unavailable to him. But Cortez failed to exercise his right, under California law, to a direct appeal from his conviction. See Cal.Penal Code § 1466(b)(1). Cortez's success in his § 1983 suit would imply that his conviction in California was wrongly obtained. Yet his conviction has never been invalidated. Indeed, Cortez has never sought to invalidate it through direct appeal or post-conviction relief. He is thus barred by Heck. . . . We are not an alternative forum for challenging his conviction. We therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to the defendants with respect to Cortez's unreasonable-seizure claim."); Reilly v. Herrera, 622 F. App'x 832, 834 (11th Cir. 2015) ("We have not explicitly ruled on whether a plaintiff may bring a § 1983 action in the event that habeas relief is unavailable, even if success on the merits would call into question the validity of a conviction. We decline to do so here because Mr. Reilly's case does not fit within the framework of scenarios mentioned in Justice Souter's Spencer concurrence. During his three-year term of imprisonment, Mr. Reilly had ample time to pursue an appeal or other post-conviction remedies on the supervised release revocation, yet he did not avail himself of any of them. We doubt that Justice Souter intended to propose a broad exception to include prisoners who had the opportunity to challenge their underlying convictions but failed to do so. [citing Guerrero] Consequently, we conclude that Justice Souter's proposed Heck exception in Spencer, even if adopted, does not apply to Mr. Reilly's case.") [See also Reilly v. Herrera, 729 F. App'x 760, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he thrust of Mr. Reilly's current argument is that he would have been entitled to relief under Spencer but for our erroneous finding that he failed to pursue state court remedies. Under § 1983, a person acting under color of state law may be held liable for causing the deprivation of 'any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution.' 42 U.S.C. § 1983. A § 1983 suit for damages must be dismissed, however, if 'a judgment in favor of the plaintiff would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction or sentence.' Heck, 512 U.S. at 487. In a concurring opinion in Spencer, Justice Souter discussed the implications of Heck and opined that a 'former prisoner, no longer "in custody"' should be allowed to 'bring a § 1983 claim establishing the unconstitutionality of a conviction or confinement without being bound to satisfy a favorable-termination requirement that it would be impossible as a matter of law for him to satisfy.'. . To date, however, neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has applied the exception described in Justice Souter's concurrence in a published opinion. Justice Souter's concurring opinion in Spencer did not overturn Heck's bar on § 1983 actions challenging the validity of the claimant's conviction or sentence. . . Therefore, even if we erred in finding that Mr. Reilly had not pursued his state court remedies, our ruling was not clearly erroneous and did not result in manifest injustice because Heck is still controlling law.")]; Radwan v. County of Orange, 519 F. App'x 490, 490-91 (9th Cir. 2013) ("The district court properly ruled that Heck bars Radwan's § 1983 unlawful search and seizure claim. We have repeatedly found Heck to bar § 1983 claims, even where the plaintiff's prior convictions were the result of guilty or no contest pleas. . . In his § 1983 suit, Radwan challenges the search and seizure of the marijuana that formed the basis of his conviction for marijuana possession under California Health and Safety Code § 11357(b). Were Radwan to succeed on his § 1983 search and seizure claim, such success would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction for marijuana possession. . . Thus, Heck bars this claim. . .Moreover, even though Radwan could not pursue habeas corpus relief, Heck bars his § 1983 search and seizure claim because he failed to meet Heck's favorable termination requirement due to his own lack of diligence."); Guerrero v. Gates, 442 F.3d 697, 704, 705 (9th Cir. 2006) ("Guerrero's prior convictions have never been invalidated. We therefore hold that, with the exception of his excessive force claim, Heck bars Guerrero's § 1983 claims. The fact that Guerrero is no longer in custody and thus cannot overturn his prior convictions by means of habeas corpus does not lift Heck's bar. Although exceptions to Heck's bar for plaintiffs no longer in custody may exist, as suggested by concurring members of the Supreme Court in Spencer v. Kemna and adopted by this court in Nonnette v. Small, any such exceptions would not apply here. The Spencer concurrence suggests that a plaintiff's inability to pursue habeas relief after release from incarceration should create an exception to Heck's bar. The plaintiff in Spencer had diligently sought relief for his claim of invalid revocation of parole. After appealing the denial of his state habeas petition all the way to the state supreme court, he filed a federal habeas petition. His prison term ended, however, before the court could render a decision. . . . In following the reasoning of the concurrence in Spencer, we have emphasized the importance of timely pursuit of available remedies in two cases. In Cunningham v. Gates, we held that Heck barred the plaintiff's § 1983 claims despite the fact that habeas relief was unavailable. Habeas relief was 'impossible as a matter of law' in Cunningham's case because he failed timely to pursue it. . . . Although we held in Nonnette that the plaintiff could bring § 1983 claims despite the Heck bar because habeas relief was unavailable, we did so because Nonnette, unlike Cunningham, timely pursued appropriate relief from prior convictions. Nonnette was founded on the unfairness of barring a plaintiff's potentially legitimate constitutional claims when the individual immediately pursued relief after the incident giving rise to those claims and could not seek habeas relief only because of the shortness of his prison sentence. . . . Thus, a § 1983 plaintiff's timely pursuit of available habeas relief is important. Even so, we emphasized that Nonnette's relief from Heck 'affects only former prisoners challenging loss of good-time credits, revocation of parole or similar matters,' not challenges to an underlying conviction such as those Guerrero brought.").

See also Smith v. Ulbricht, No. CV 12–00199–M–DLC, 2013 WL 589628, *1, *2 (D. Mont. Feb. 14, 2013) ("In essence, Smith suggests that an individual not 'in custody' for purposes of the habeas statute may always proceed under a section 1983 action. Accordingly, Smith argues Heck's bar does not apply and his Complaint should not be dismissed. The Court disagrees. At the outset, the Court notes that, as stated by the majority in Heck, the Heck bar does not have an 'in custody' component; it generally applies when a § 1983 action would render a sentence or conviction invalid. . . However, in Spencer, the four concurring justices and one dissenting justice recognized that, in limited circumstances, Heck may not bar a § 1983 action when an individual cannot proceed under a habeas action because he is no longer 'in custody'. . . Relying on Justice Souter's concurring opinion in Spencer, this exception was expressly adopted by the Ninth Circuit in Nonnette v. Small, 316 F.3d 872, 875–877 (9th Cir.2002). In Nonnette, the Ninth Circuit recognized in a § 1983 action challenging the revocation of good time credits that Heck should not preclude Nonnette's claim because he could not maintain a habeas action since he was no longer incarcerated. . . Central to the Nonnette court's decision was the fact that Nonnette had timely and diligently pursued appropriate relief from prior convictions. . . Nonnette's exception to Heck is to be narrowly construed, as evidenced by the court's emphasis that it 'affects only former prisoners challenging loss of good-time credits, revocation of parole or similar matters.'. . Nonnette's exception was clarified in Guerrero v. Gates, 442 F.3d 697 (9th Cir.2003). Guerrero was convicted on narcotics charges and served his sentence. . . After he was released, he filed a § 1983 action challenging, among other things, the validity of his convictions. . . After distinguishing Nonnette, the Court held that Heck barred Guerrero's § 1983 claims . . . .Smith's situation resembles Guerrero far more closely than Nonnette. Unlike Nonnette, Smith has not timely and diligently sought appropriate relief from his prior convictions. According to his Complaint, Smith's first attempt to challenge his June 6, 2008 conviction was April 9, 2012. Smith did not apply for habeas relief and his failure to timely do so was self-imposed. Thus, though habeas relief for Smith may be 'impossible as a matter of law,' he is not entitled to the relaxation of Heck's bar. Accordingly, Smith's objection that Heck does not bar his complaint because he cannot pursue a habeas action since he is not 'in custody' is overruled."); Jean-Laurent v. Hennessy, No. 05-CV-1155 (JFB)(LB), 2008 WL 5274322, at *3, *4 (E.D.N.Y. Dec. 18, 2008) ("In the instant case, the exception to the Heck rule established by the Second Circuit in Jenkins and its progeny does not apply. Plaintiff correctly notes that his habeas petition, which challenged his 2002 Queens County conviction, was dismissed, in part, because plaintiff was not in custody at the time he filed his habeas petition. . . However, plaintiff overlooks the fact that the court also found that his petition was untimely because it was filed over two years after the expiration of the one-year statute of limitations period. . . and there was no basis for equitable tolling. . . . Thus, plaintiff did not file a direct appeal in state court challenging his conviction, and did not file a timely habeas petition in federal court with respect to such conviction. Under these circumstances, the exceptions to the Heck rule do not apply because plaintiff clearly had legal remedies available to him both in state and federal court to challenge his conviction, but failed to avail himself of such remedies in a timely manner. . . Such a situation is distinct from the individual who challenges his conviction in the state and federal courts in a timely manner but, through no fault of his own, is unable to have the federal court consider his challenge because he is no longer in custody at the time his petition is filed. To hold otherwise in the instant case would allow a plaintiff to completely circumvent the Heck rule by filing an untimely habeas petition and then arguing that his Section 1983 claims are not barred by the conviction because his challenge was never heard on the merits by the federal court. There is nothing in Supreme Court nor Second Circuit jurisprudence that warrants such a result."); El v. Crain, 560 F.Supp.2d 932, 944, 945 (C.D. Cal. 2008) ("A complication, not briefed by the parties, arises here because Plaintiff already has completed the 180-day sentence for the underlying conviction. . . In some exceptional situations, Heck may not bar a noncustodial plaintiff − one to whom habeas corpus is not available because he is no longer 'in custody' as required . . . from proceeding with a civil-rights action that, if successful, would imply the invalidity of an adjudicated offense. Five Supreme Court Justices in Spencer v. Kemna, 523 U.S. 1, 118 S.Ct. 97, 140 L.Ed.2d 43 (1998), believed that a 'convict given a fine alone, however onerous, or sentenced to a term too short to permit even expeditious litigation without continuances before expiration of the sentence,' should not be ineligible for § 1983 relief, because his circumstances rendered impossible any successful challenge to his conviction or parole revocation − although this five-Justice view does not have the status of a holding. . . The Ninth Circuit has interpreted Spencer as creating a limited exception to Heck, permitting some litigants who no longer may pursue habeas relief to bring collateral civil rights claims. . . But this exception is narrow, for it is limited to plaintiffs (1) who are 'former prisoners challenging loss of good-time credits, revocation of parole or similar matters,' . . . not collaterally challenging underlying criminal convictions, and (2) who diligently pursued 'expeditious litigation' to challenge those punishments to the extent possible. . . Plaintiff satisfies neither of these tests for an exemption from Heck. First, his current action would imply the invalidity of a criminal conviction, not a mere parole revocation or prison administrative decision. Second, although Plaintiff vigorously challenged that conviction in the state courts, he did not do so entirely 'expeditious[ly]': he missed a critical deadline for filing in the intermediate appellate court, resulting in a procedural default. For the foregoing reasons, Heck bars Plaintiff's claims of excessive force, and Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on those claims."); Adamson v. Los Angeles County, No. CV 06-4384-ODW ("GR), 2008 WL 779519, at *4 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 20, 2008) ("Heck bars Plaintiff's claims even though he has completed his sentence. . . . This is true even though the statute of limitations for filing a petition for writ of habeas corpus has expired. . . . Just as in Guerrero, Plaintiff did not challenge his conviction by any means, including direct appeal or habeas, prior to filing this lawsuit approximately two years after his release from prison. . . . The Ninth Circuit has limited the exception to Heck. 'Nonnette's relief from Heck Aaffects only former prisoners challenging loss of good-time credits, revocation of parole or similar matters,' not challenges to an underlying conviction.' . . Plaintiff challenges his underlying conviction and none of the exceptions apply."); Byrd v. Teater, 2008 WL 495757, at *9 -10 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 21, 2008) ("Plaintiff's sentence was six months incarceration (credit for time-served), voluntary enrollment in a residential alcohol treatment program, and three years felony probation. Plaintiff was still on probation when he filed this action. Plaintiff was not precluded from seeking habeas relief before he completed the sentence. Guerrero makes clear that Nonnette is limited to former prisoner's challenging loss of good-time credits, revocation of parole or similar matters. Plaintiff's claims based on the invalidity of his conviction are barred by Heck v. Humphrey. . . . A claim that the right to a speedy trial has been violated of necessity challenges the validity of the underlying conviction. A claim challenging the sentence imposed is barred explicitly by Heck. Defendants' motions to dismiss the Section 1983 claims on the basis of Heck v. Humphrey are GRANTED WITH PREJUDICE to the extent the Section 1983 claims are based on Plaintiff's alleged false arrest and prosecution, on delay in the criminal proceedings against Plaintiff, and on the sentence imposed. Defendants' motions to dismiss the Section 1983 claims on the basis of Heck v. Humphrey are DENIED to the extent the claims are based on excessive bail. This claim addresses a procedure used that does not depend on the invalidity of Byrd's conviction and for which the availability of habeas corpus expired upon Plaintiff's relief from custody."); Whitmore v. Pierce County Dept. of Community Corrections, 2007 WL 2116402, at *5 (W.D.Wash. July 19, 2007) ("The Ninth Circuit has held that when a person fails to file a habeas petition while in custody and had an opportunity to file one, a civil rights action may be procedurally barred. Guerrero v. Gates, 442 F.3d 697 (9th Cir.2006). Here, there is nothing to indicate Mr. Whitmore attempted to challenge his probation hearings in a habeas action. He is no longer in custody, and he is barred from bringing an action challenging the probation revocation proceedings at this point in time.").

Compare Gilbank v. Wood County Department of Human Services, 111 F.4th 754, 785-86 (7th Cir. 2024) ("Judge Easterbrook's separate opinion argues for a different reason for dismissal of the four claims that the judges joining this opinion find barred by Rooker-Feldman. He treats those claims for injuries inflicted by state-court judgments as not yet having accrued, applying the principles underlying Heck v. Humphrey. . . Perhaps Rooker-Feldman and Heck share deep roots that call for further exploration. . . Nevertheless, the proposed approach would amount to a dramatic and unprecedented expansion of Heck beyond cases complaining about the duration of confinement in criminal cases. I am not prepared to take that step. . . . Nothing on the surface of Heck or Balisok indicates broader extension of their rule to any other categories of federal cases seeking damages for injuries inflicted by state-court judgments. Judge Easterbrook asserts, however, that we must now 'treat Heck as generally applicable to state-court judgments that have not been set aside,'. . . based on this court's decision in Savory v. Cannon, 947 F.3d 409 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc). Savory decided a question of accrual for purposes of applying the statute of limitations to civil claims for wrongful conviction. We held that the plaintiff's conviction remained intact, and his claims had not accrued, until he was pardoned. . . We rejected the civil defendants' and the dissenting judge's arguments that Savory's civil claims accrued earlier, when he was released from state custody but while his convictions remained legally intact. . . The dissent in Savory argued for the rule proposed by Justice Souter in his Heck concurrence. . . Savory did not endorse, explicitly or implicitly, an extension of Heck to claims like this plaintiff's, which do not have anything to do with a criminal conviction or the length of a criminal sentence. Perhaps the Supreme Court might take such a step in the future, but I do not see a basis for taking such a broad and consequential step at this point. Regarding Heck, I should also address Judge Kirsch's reliance upon it and his suggestion that my view of Rooker-Feldman would leave Heck with no work to do. . . It's an interesting and creative argument, but it loses sight of history. Lower federal courts have long had an express grant of jurisdiction to review criminal judgments of state courts, in the form of writs of habeas corpus. . . . Heck was of course a response to civil actions seeking damages under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for wrongful convictions in state court. Heck was tailored to manage the integration of habeas relief and § 1983. To my knowledge there was no suggestion that Rooker-Feldman should apply in the context of challenges to criminal convictions. I do not suggest it should be extended there either, given the different heritages of the relevant statutes and the doctrines that have evolved to manage the respective roles of state and federal courts. If the question were squarely presented in a future case, we could deal with it then.") with Gilbank v. Wood County Department of Human Services, 111 F.4th 754, 796 (7th Cir. 2024) (Kirsch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The Supreme Court shares neither Judge Hamilton's concerns nor a desire for a broader Rooker-Feldman doctrine. The Court has been clear: 'Neither Rooker nor Feldman elaborated a rationale for a wide-reaching bar on the jurisdiction of lower federal courts, and our cases since Feldman have tended to emphasize the narrowness of the Rooker-Feldman rule.'. . And in nearly half a century, the Court 'has never applied Rooker-Feldman to dismiss an action for want of jurisdiction.'. . The breadth of the dissent's position—and its incongruity with the Court's view—is clear when applied to the overlap between Rooker-Feldman's bar and that of Heck v. Humphrey[.]. . Consider a plaintiff alleging malicious prosecution, a Fourth Amendment violation. Heck holds that 42 U.S.C. § 1983 does not authorize him to sue for that violation until his maliciously obtained conviction has been set aside. . . But once that happens, the plaintiff can sue in federal court to remedy the violation of his constitutional rights. The approach in Judge Hamilton's dissent, however, would render Heck's holding superfluous. If the dissent were correct, Roy Heck's § 1983 suit would have been dismissed at the outset on jurisdictional grounds under Rooker-Feldman—he was a state court loser complaining of injuries effectuated by his conviction. . . But Heck is not jurisdictional. . . Under the dissent's unyielding rule, district courts no longer need to (or even have jurisdiction to) invoke Heck. Instead, they must dismiss every suit complaining of injuries that contributed to a state court conviction, whether the conviction has been vacated or not. That is not the law.")

See also Goldsmith v. Garrett, No. 24-1234, 2024 WL 3833300, at *2 (7th Cir. Aug. 15, 2024) (not reported) ([T]he expiration of his custody does not allow Goldsmith to avoid Heck. Although several Justices, and at least one court of appeals, have concluded that a claim under § 1983 accrues when custody ends—see Heck, 512 U.S. at 491–503 (Souter, J., concurring, joined by Blackmun, Stevens & O'Connor, JJ.); Spencer v. Kemna, 523 U.S. 1, 21–22 (1998) (Ginsburg, J., concurring); Leather v. Eyck, 180 F.3d 420, 424 (2d Cir. 1999)—this court held in Savory v. Cannon, 947 F.3d 409 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc), that the rule of Heck continues to apply after a person's release from custody unless the judgment has been set aside by a pardon or equivalent relief. Goldsmith does not contend that his term of supervised release, or any of its conditions, has been set aside by the state's judiciary or by a pardon. He could have sought relief under § 2254 while his supervision lasted yet did not do so."); Wells v. Caudill, 967 F.3d 598, 602 (7th Cir. 2020) ("If while in prison Wells had sought relief from a federal court on the ground that state officials had miscalculated his sentences' ending date, he would have been told to go to state court, for federal collateral relief cannot be used to fix errors of state law. . . Why should the federal role be greater if the prisoner serves out his sentence and then seeks damages? The parties have overlooked a second potential issue too. Heck v. Humphrey . . . holds that a federal court may not award damages under § 1983 when that calls into question the validity of a state conviction. Edwards v. Balisok . . . extends that rule to state procedures that determine the length of the sentence (as by granting or revoking good-time credits). This court recently held that Heck's bar continues even after a prisoner has been released. See Savory v. Cannon, 947 F.3d 409 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc). Unless a pardon or a state court sets aside the conviction or decision about time in prison, damages under § 1983 are unavailable. This could be understood to mean that someone in Wells's position needs to obtain a ruling from a state court establishing his proper release date. We mention these subjects, not to decide them, but to make clear that we have not decided them in passing. They are open for consideration in some future case. We have resolved this case as the litigants presented it. Because the district judge did not make a clearly erroneous finding when concluding that Wells had not shown that Caudill acted with the necessary state of mind, the judgment is AFFIRMED.")

See also Griffin v. Baltimore Police Dep't, 804 F.3d 692, 695-99 (4th Cir. 2015) ("While § 1983 suits seeking DNA testing may proceed around the Heck bar, § 1983 actions based on Brady claims may not. Skinner itself makes this distinction clear. . . . What we have here, then, are § 1983 claims predicated on alleged Brady violations which would, if proven, necessarily imply the invalidity of Griffin's convictions. And those convictions have not been 'reversed on direct appeal, expunged by executive order, declared invalid by a state tribunal ... or called into question by a federal court's issuance of a writ of habeas corpus.'. . Under Heck, therefore, they may not be collaterally attacked through § 1983 now. That Griffin is no longer in custody does not change this result. The Heck bar is 'not rendered inapplicable by the fortuity that a convicted criminal is no longer incarcerated.'. . This rule prevents would-be § 1983 plaintiffs from bringing suit even after they are released from custody and thus unable to challenge their conviction through a habeas petition. Were the rule otherwise, plaintiffs might simply wait to file their § 1983 actions until after their sentences were served, and thereby transform § 1983 into a new font of federal post-conviction review. Successful resolution of Griffin's § 1983 claims would necessarily undermine the validity of Griffin's prior convictions. Griffin's claims would appear therefore to fall within the core of the Heck bar. . . .Together, Covey and Wilson delineate the Heck bar's narrow exception. A would-be plaintiff who is no longer in custody may bring a § 1983 claim undermining the validity of a prior conviction only if he lacked access to federal habeas corpus while in custody. . . . Griffin did not lack access to habeas relief while in custody. While Wilson had only a few months to make a habeas claim, and while Covey had at most a little over a year, Griffin had three decades. And Griffin actually did bring a federal habeas petition during his time in custody. Although his petition was denied, the fact that he was able to file it demonstrates that the concern animating Wilson and Covey—that a citizen unconstitutionally punished might lack an opportunity for federal redress if kept in custody for only a short period of time—is absent in this case. Griffin argues that he never had the opportunity to achieve meaningful habeas relief because evidence necessary to his case remained in the hands of the Baltimore Police Department. . . But likelihood of success is not the equivalent of opportunity to seek relief. And even if it were, nothing in the record suggests that Griffin sought the relevant records (much less encountered resistance to their production) until he filed his Maryland Public Information Act request in 2010. That law, meanwhile, has been in effect since 1970. . . Lack of information did not take away Griffin's opportunity for meaningful habeas relief. While our precedent makes clear that lawful access to federal habeas corpus is the touchstone of our inquiry, Griffin's case is further undercut by the fact that he did eventually receive actual notice of possible official misconduct and still did not pursue additional federal habeas relief. In declining to except Brady claims from the rule in Heck v. Humphrey, Skinner, 562 U.S. at 536–37, the Supreme Court recognized that the adversary process does not as a rule require a potential respondent to give notice to a potential petitioner of every claim, meritorious or otherwise, that the petitioner may possess. Griffin knew of possible police misconduct by, at the latest, August 4, 2011, the date of his evidentiary hearing in the Baltimore City Circuit Court. His custody did not terminate until over sixteen months later, on December 19, 2012. The habeas 'in custody' requirement, moreover, applies only at the time of filing, not throughout the case. . . Griffin would have had only to file his petition during those sixteen months. He did not do so. In sum, Griffin has identified no impediment to habeas access warranting an expansion of the Heck exception. In fact, to dissolve the Heck bar for a damages suit some thirty years after a still-valid conviction for a plaintiff who not only could but did file a federal habeas petition would permit the Heck exception to swallow the rule. . . .We close by noting that our decision sounds in procedure, not substance. We express no opinion on the actual merits of Griffin's Brady claims. Our holding is not meant to bar him from seeking a remedy for possible police misconduct. The remedy of habeas corpus was open to him in the past, and he may retain state remedies he can pursue in the future. We hold only that the vehicle he has presently chosen is not, at least not now, an appropriate one under Supreme Court and circuit precedent. Should his convictions at some point be invalidated, he might again attempt a § 1983 suit free of any Heck bar. Until then, however, we must affirm the judgment of the district court."); Newmy v. Johnson, 758 F.3d 1008, 1010-12 (8th Cir. 2014) ("A landscape consisting of Heck and the collection of opinions in Spencer has resulted in a conflict in the circuits about the scope of Heck's favorable-termination rule. Several courts—counting up the five Justices who opined in concurring and dissenting opinions in Spencer—have concluded that the Heck bar does not apply to a § 1983 plaintiff who cannot bring a habeas action. [collecting cases from 4th, 6th, 7th, 9th, and 10th Circuits] Four other circuits, including this one, have adhered to the conclusion—set forth in footnote 10 of Heck—that the favorable-termination rule still applies when a § 1983 plaintiff is not incarcerated. [cases from 1st, 3d, 5th, and 8th Circuits] After Spencer, the Supreme Court said in Muhammad v. Close, 540 U.S. 749, 752 n. 2, 124 S.Ct. 1303, 158 L.Ed.2d 32 (2004) (per curiam), that it had 'no occasion to settle' whether the unavailability of habeas may dispense with the Heck favorable-termination requirement. We concluded in Entzi that the combination of concurring and dissenting opinions in Spencer did not amount to a holding that binds this court. We opted instead to follow footnote 10 in the opinion of the Court in Heck. . . .As the Third Circuit recently recognized, the Eighth Circuit—like the First, Third, and Fifth—has 'interpreted Heck to impose a universal favorable termination requirement on all § 1983 plaintiffs attacking the validity of their conviction or sentence.' [citing Deemer v. Beard] We recognize that this rule could preclude a damages remedy for an inmate who is detained for only a short time with limited access to legal resources, but that is a consequence of the principle barring collateral attacks that was applied in Heck. The district court correctly followed circuit precedent in dismissing Newmy's claim."); Newmy v. Johnson, 758 F.3d 1008, 1012 (8th Cir. 2014) (Kelly, J., concurring) ("Although I agree the district court correctly applied this circuit's precedent in dismissing Newmy's suit, I write separately to express my concern that our approach 'needlessly place[s] at risk the rights of those outside the intersection of § 1983 and the habeas statute, individuals not "in custody" for habeas purposes.'. . .[A]s the Tenth Circuit recently reiterated, '[i]f a petitioner is unable to obtain habeas relief—at least where this inability is not due to the petitioner's own lack of diligence—it would be unjust to place his claim for relief beyond the scope of § 1983 where "exactly the same claim could be redressed if brought by a former prisoner who had succeeded in cutting his custody short through habeas."' "); Deemer v. Beard, 557 F. App'x 162, 164-66 (3d Cir. 2014), cert . denied, 135 S. Ct. 50 (2014) ("Deemer argues that the District Court erred in applying the Heck v. Humphrey favorable termination bar to the facts of his case. He contends that Heck's rule does not, and should not, apply to § 1983 plaintiffs who, like him, are no longer in custody and who, through no fault of their own, never had alternate access to the federal courts' habeas corpus jurisdiction. In view of our existing precedent, we disagree. . . . The main dispute between the parties before us is in identifying the position staked out by this Court. Taking a cue from the five-justice Spencer plurality, seven courts of appeals have found that the Heck favorable termination rule does not apply to plaintiffs for whom federal habeas relief is unavailable, at least where the plaintiff is not responsible for failing to seek or limiting his own access to the habeas corpus remedy. See Burd v. Sessler, 702 F.3d 429, 435 (7th Cir.2012); Cohen v. Longshore, 621 F.3d 1311, 1315–17 (10th Cir.2010); Wilson v. Johnson, 535 F.3d 262, 267–68 (4th Cir.2008); Powers v. Hamilton Cnty. Pub. Defender Comm'n, 501 F.3d 592, 602–03 (6th Cir.2007); Harden v. Pataki, 320 F.3d 1289, 1298–99 (11th Cir.2003); Nonnette v. Small, 316 F.3d 872, 876–77 (9th Cir.2002); Huang v. Johnson, 251 F.3d 65, 75 (2d Cir.2001). We have not adopted this approach. We, along with three other courts of appeals, have declined to follow the concurring and dissenting opinions in Spencer, and have interpreted Heck to impose a universal favorable termination requirement on all § 1983 plaintiffs attacking the validity of their conviction or sentence. See Williams, 453 F.3d at 177–78; Gilles v. Davis, 427 F.3d 197, 209–10 (3d Cir.2005); Entzi v. Redmann, 485 F.3d 998, 1003 (8th Cir.2007); Randell v. Johnson, 227 F.3d 300, 301 (5th Cir.2000) (per curiam); Figueroa v. Rivera, 147 F.3d 77, 80–81 & n. 3 (1st Cir.1998); see also Cohen, 621 F.3d at 1315 (finding our Court has aligned itself with the First, Fifth, and Eighth Circuits on this question); Powers, 501 F.3d at 602 (same). Thus, our decisions in Gilles v. Davis and Williams v. Consovoy already resolved the issue raised in this case, concluding, as they did, that Heck's favorable termination rule applies to all § 1983 plaintiffs, not just those in state custody. . . . Gilles and Williams dictate that, under Heck, any claimant, even if the door to federal habeas is shut and regardless of the reason why, must establish favorable termination of his underlying criminal proceeding before he can challenge his conviction or sentence in a § 1983 action. We are bound by that precedent); Walker v. Munsell, No. 08-30087, 2008 WL 2403768, at *2 (5th Cir. June 13, 2008) ("Appellant argues that Heck does not apply because he was fined and not imprisoned following his conviction, and he consequently had no opportunity to challenge his conviction on habeas review. This circuit, however, has determined that Heck's bar applies to both custodial and non-custodial § 1983 plaintiffs. Randell v. Johnson, 227 F.3d 300, 301 (5th Cir.2000)."); Abdullah v. Minnesota, No. 06-4142, 2008 WL 283693, at *1 (8th Cir. Feb. 4, 2008) ("We conclude that the district court did not err in dismissing Abdullah's section 1983 claim under Heck, because success on his claim would necessarily render invalid the 'sentence' of a fine imposed for his possession of marijuana, and because he did not allege or show that the fine had been invalidated or that his criminal petty-misdemeanor case had otherwise been resolved in his favor."); Entzi v. Redmann, 485 F.3d 998, 1003 (8th Cir. 2007) ("Entzi argues that because the writ of habeas corpus is no longer available to him on a claim challenging the length of his imprisonment, Heck does not bar his § 1983 suit against the prison officials. The opinion in Heck rejected the proposition urged by Entzi. The Court said that 'the principle barring collateral attacks − a longstanding and deeply rooted feature of both the common law and our own jurisprudence − is not rendered inapplicable by the fortuity that a convicted criminal is no longer incarcerated.' Heck, 512 U.S. at 490 n. 10. Entzi relies on a later decision of the Supreme Court, Spencer v. Kemna, 523 U.S. 1 (1998), in which a combination of five concurring and dissenting Justices agreed in dicta that 'a former prisoner, no longer Ain custody,' may bring a § 1983 action establishing the unconstitutionality of a conviction or confinement without being bound to satisfy a favorable-termination requirement that it would be impossible as a matter of law for him to satisfy.'. . Absent a decision of the Court that explicitly overrules what we understand to be the holding of Heck, however, we decline to depart from that rule."); Williams v. Consovoy, 453 F.3d 173, 177, 178 (3d Cir. 2006) ("Williams cites Huang v. Johnson, 251 F.3d 65 (2d Cir.2001), as support for the argument that because habeas relief is no longer available to him, he should nonetheless be permitted to maintain a § 1983 action. Huang held that a plaintiff for whom habeas relief was no longer available on the ground that he had been released from custody could nevertheless maintain a § 1983 action for false imprisonment. . . Huang relied on the fact that, post-Heck, five Justices took the view in Spencer . . . that § 1983 relief should be available to address constitutional wrongs where habeas relief is no longer available. . . We decline to adopt Huang here. As we recently held in Gilles v. Davis, 427 F.3d 197, 210 (3d Cir.2005), a § 1983 remedy is not available to a litigant to whom habeas relief is no longer available. In Gilles, we concluded that Heck's favorable-termination requirement had not been undermined, and, to the extent that its validity was called into question by Spencer, we observed that the Justices who believed § 1983 claims should be allowed to proceed where habeas relief is not available so stated in concurring and dissenting opinions in Spencer, not in a cohesive majority opinion. . . Thus, because the Supreme Court had not squarely held post-Heck that the favorable-termination rule does not apply to defendants no longer in custody, we declined in Gilles to extend the rule of Heck, and likewise decline to extend it here."); Vickers v. Donahue, 135 F. App'x 285, 2005 WL 1519353, at *4, *5 (11th Cir. June 28, 2005)(not published) (applying Heck where plaintiff had failed to avail himself of appeal with respect to revocation order and resulting nine month sentence); Randell v. Johnson, 227 F.3d 300, 301 (5th Cir. 2000); Figueroa v. Rivera, 147 F.3d 77, 80, 81 (1st Cir. 1998) ("The appellants counter that strict application of Heck works a fundamental unfairness in this case. After all, Rios was attempting to impugn his conviction when death intervened. Although this plaint strikes a responsive chord, it runs afoul of Heck's core holding: that annulment of the underlying conviction is an element of a section 1983 `unconstitutional conviction' claim. . . Creating an equitable exception to this tenet not only would fly in the teeth of Heck, but also would contravene the settled rule that a section 1983 claimant bears the burden of proving all the essential elements of her cause of action.").

See also Batchelor v. City of Chicago, No. 18 C 8513, 2020 WL 509034, at *3-4 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 31, 2020) ("Defendants argue that Heck's prohibition on Batchelor's Section 1983 claims lifted when he was released from prison, which made habeas relief unavailable to him, and thus started the clock on his claims. They point to decisions where the Seventh Circuit concluded Heck did not bar a plaintiff's Section 1983 claims after he was released from custody, Manuel v. City of Joliet, Illinois, 903 F.3d 667, 670 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Manuel II") and Sanchez v. City of Chicago, 880 F.3d 349, 356 (7th Cir. 2018), or after habeas relief was unavailable to a plaintiff, DeWalt v. Carter, 224 F.3d 607, 617-18 (7th Cir. 2000). Defendants calculate that Batchelor was released in 2006 based on his allegation that he 'languished fifteen years in Illinois prison' following his 1991 conviction. They conclude that Batchelor's Section 1983 claims are some ten years late. The Seventh Circuit recently addressed the same accrual arguments in Savory v. Cannon, No. 17-3543, 2020 WL 240447, at *3-14 (7th Cir. Jan. 7, 2020) (en banc). Savory, the plaintiff, was convicted of a double murder that he claimed he did not commit, incarcerated for thirty years, paroled for five years, and then, some three years after his parole ended, received a gubernatorial pardon acquitting him of his conviction. . . Less than two years after his pardon, Savory filed suit against the City of Peoria and certain of its police officers alleging that they fabricated evidence, coerced a false confession from him, fabricated incriminating witness statements, and suppressed exculpatory evidence. . . The court applied the rule set forth in Heck and concluded Savory's Section 1983 claims necessarily implied the invalidity of his conviction and thus accrued when that conviction was invalidated by a pardon. . . The court rejected arguments that Savory's claims accrued when he was released from custody and explicitly stated that its reasoning in prior decisions that the Heck bar lifts when a plaintiff is released from custody was incorrect and does not survive its decision. . . Batchelor's claims that Defendant Officers suppressed exculpatory evidence, fabricated evidence, and coerced his confession in order to secure his conviction echo the claims at issue in Heck and Savory. As in those cases, Batchelor's claims necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction and thus could not accrue until that conviction was vacated. His Section 1983 claims are timely as he filed suit within two years of his conviction being vacated."); Fant v. City of Ferguson, 107 F.Supp.3d 1016, 1028-30 (E.D. Mo. 2015) ("In this case, the Court agrees with Plaintiffs that the only state court convictions at issue are the Plaintiffs' underlying traffic and other minor offenses, which are alleged to have resulted only in fines, not sentences. Plaintiffs allege that their incarceration resulted from post-judgment procedures to enforce non-payment of those fines, but not from any separate conviction or sentence. . . A judgment in Plaintiffs' favor would not necessarily demonstrate the invalidity of Plaintiffs' underlying traffic convictions or fines, but only the City's procedures for enforcing those fines. Nor would Plaintiffs' success in this case 'necessarily' invalidate the fact or duration of their incarceration. Success would mean only a change in the City's procedures prior to incarceration. Even if these procedures were changed, Plaintiffs may still have been found to have willfully refused to pay a fine they were capable of paying and thereafter lawfully incarcerated pursuant to constitutional procedures and conditions. . . The Court notes that the City's discussion of the Sixth Circuit case, Powers v. Hamilton County Pub. Defender Comm'n, 501 F.3d 592 (6th Cir.2007), is misplaced and, more importantly, incomplete. Like this case, Powers involved a putative class action brought by a plaintiff who was incarcerated for non-payment of a fine incurred as a result of a reckless-driving charge. . . The municipal court in Powers appointed a public defender for the plaintiff at both his initial reckless driving hearing and sentencing, as well as a subsequent court hearing after his arrest for failing to pay the court-ordered fine. . . The plaintiff pleaded no contest to both the initial reckless driving charge and the subsequent failure to pay his fine, the public defender did not seek an indigency hearing, and plaintiff served at least one day in jail for failing to pay the fine. . . He then brought a § 1983 action, alleging that the public defender's office had a policy of failing to request indigency hearings for clients facing jail time for nonpayment of court-ordered fines. . .The Sixth Circuit found that the § 1983 action was cognizable, notwithstanding Heck, for two reasons. The first was that the plaintiff's term of incarceration—one day—was too short to enable him to seek habeas relief, and the Sixth Circuit held that Heck's favorable-termination requirement was excused for habeas-ineligible § 1983 plaintiffs. . . As the City correctly notes, this issue is the subject of a circuit split, in which the Eighth Circuit has explicitly disagreed with the Sixth Circuit. . . Therefore, as the City correctly notes, Plaintiffs in this case could not avoid Heck merely by arguing their jail terms were too short to enable them to seek habeas relief. But Plaintiffs do not make this argument. Rather, Plaintiffs argue that Heck is inapplicable for the second reason discussed in Powers—namely, because they do not challenge the fact or duration of their underlying convictions or sentences but only the improper procedures that culminated in their post-judgment incarceration. . . . The same is true in this case. Accordingly, the Court rejects the City's argument that Heck bars Plaintiffs' claims."); Cabot v. Lewis, 241 F.Supp.3d 239, 247-56 (D. Mass. 2017) ("The issue before the Court. . . is the narrow question of whether plaintiff's acceptance of pretrial probation bars his claims. For present purposes, it is irrelevant whether plaintiff was in fact arrested without probable cause, whether he in fact chest-bumped Lewis, or even why he accepted the disposition of pretrial probation. . . . Defendants have moved for summary judgment on the ground that plaintiff's acceptance of pretrial probation bars all of his claims under the rule of Heck v. Humphrey . . . .[M]ore than twenty years since Heck, considerable disagreement has developed as to the scope of its application. Two areas of uncertainty are of potential concern here. First, courts are divided as to whether Heck's favorable-termination requirement applies when a § 1983 plaintiff is not in custody—either because he was never sentenced to prison or has already been released—such that he cannot seek habeas relief. Second, there is disagreement as to whether a disposition other than an ordinary conviction—such as a term of pretrial probation (as occurred here)—can constitute a 'conviction' triggering the favorable-termination requirement of Heck. As to the first issue, the law in the First Circuit is settled: the rule of Heck applies even if the plaintiff is not in custody and therefore cannot obtain habeas relief. [discussing Figueroa) . . . .The second issue is considerably more difficult to resolve. By its terms, the Heck rule applies to actions 'to recover damages for allegedly unconstitutional conviction or imprisonment, or for other harm caused by actions whose unlawfulness would render a conviction or sentence invalid.'. . Plaintiff contends that because he was never convicted, much less sentenced or imprisoned, the Heck rule does not apply. It is certainly true that by its literal terms, the Heck rule applies to 'convictions.' A straightforward plea of guilty to a criminal charge would obviously fall within its scope. Whether Heck applies, however, to other types of criminal dispositions is less obvious. Many courts have held that the Heck rule applies to a plea of nolo contendere. Other courts have held that it applies to a plea pursuant to North Carolina v. Alford, 400 U.S. 25, 91 S.Ct. 160, 27 L.Ed.2d 162 (1970). Some courts, including this one, have held that it applies where the plaintiff admitted to sufficient facts and the court entered a continuance without a finding ("CWOF"). Nolo contendere pleas and

Alford pleas both result in convictions. And although an admission to sufficient facts does not result in a formal conviction, it does require a formal admission, in open court, to a set of facts that are sufficient to support a criminal conviction. Here, the criminal charges against plaintiff were dismissed after he completed a term of pretrial probation. Under Massachusetts law, a defendant may be placed on a term of pretrial probation, without either pleading guilty or admitting to sufficient facts to warrant a finding of guilty, with the understanding that the criminal charges will be dismissed after the successful completion of a term of probation. . . A disposition by pretrial probation does not, under Massachusetts law, result in a conviction. . . Courts are divided as to whether imposition of a pretrial probation (or an analogous disposition, such as pretrial diversion) constitutes a 'conviction' for purposes of the Heck rule. [fn.12 There is some inconsistency in the case law as to how to frame the issue of the applicability of the Heck rule to cases involving dispositions of pretrial probation. The issue is sometimes framed as whether pretrial probation is a 'favorable termination' such that subsequent § 1983 claims challenging the lawfulness of a conviction or sentence may proceed. See Gilles v. Davis, 427 F.3d 197, 209 (3d Cir. 2005). The issue may also be framed as whether pretrial probation constitutes a 'conviction' such that Heck applies at all. The latter appears to be the more appropriate approach. See McClish v. Nugent, 483 F.3d 1231, 1251 (11th Cir. 2007). A favorable termination is only necessary if Heck applies, and Heck only applies as a potential bar to subsequent § 1983 claims if there has been a conviction or sentence—or something sufficiently analogous—the validity of which would be impugned by a successful § 1983 claim.] The Sixth, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits have concluded that Heck does not bar a subsequent lawsuit after disposition of a criminal case through pretrial diversion that ultimately results in dismissal of criminal charges. See S.E. v. Grant Cty. Bd. of Educ., 544 F.3d 633, 637–39 (6th Cir. 2008) (Kentucky juvenile pretrial diversion program); Vasquez Arroyo v. Starks, 589 F.3d 1091, 1095 (10th Cir. 2009) (Kansas pretrial diversion program); McClish v. Nugent, 483 F.3d 1231, 1250–51 (11th Cir. 2007) (Florida pretrial intervention program); see also Butts v. City of Bowling Green, 374 F.Supp.2d 532, 537 (W.D. Ky. 2005) (Kentucky pretrial diversion program). The Second, Third, and Fifth Circuits have reached the opposite conclusion. See Miles v. City of Hartford, 445 Fed.Appx. 379, 382 (2d Cir. 2011) (Connecticut accelerated pretrial rehabilitation program); Gilles v. Davis, 427 F.3d 197, 209–11 (3d Cir. 2005) (Pennsylvania "Accelerated Rehabilitative Disposition" program); DeLeon v. City of Corpus Christi, 488 F.3d 649, 655–56 (5th Cir 2007) (Texas deferred adjudication procedure). . . The First Circuit has not yet addressed the issue. Two judges in this district, however, have concluded that the imposition of pretrial probation under Massachusetts law triggers the rule of Heck and bars a subsequent related claim under § 1983. See Kennedy v. Town of Billerica, 2014 WL 4926348 at *1 (D. Mass. 2014) (pretrial probation bars subsequent related § 1983 claim); Cardoso v. City of Brockton, 62 F.Supp.3d 185, 186 (D. Mass. 2015) (same). The courts that have concluded that the Heck rule does not apply to pretrial probation generally have done so based on the literal terms of Heck. As noted, Heck holds that when a successful § 1983 claim 'would necessarily imply the invalidity of [a] conviction or sentence ... the complaint must be dismissed unless the plaintiff can demonstrate that the conviction or sentence has already been invalidated.'. . . Because the successful completion of a pretrial diversion program results in the dismissal of criminal charges, those courts have concluded that there is no underlying criminal 'conviction' that could be invalidated by a successful § 1983 claim, and Heck therefore does not apply. The view that Heck should be applied narrowly has at least two advantages: it is faithful to the literal language of the opinion, and it imposes a bright-line rule that is relatively easy to apply. That approach is not, however, without its problems. Most notably, the literal approach ignores, and appears to be inconsistent with, the purposes and rationale of Heck. Those may be characterized, in simple terms, as threefold: finality, consistency, and comity. . . . If dispositions of pretrial probation are not accorded finality—and if they leave open the possibility of continuing litigation and potential damages awards—prosecutors will be less likely to agree to them and they will be less available to defendants. . . .If a civil proceeding seeks to reach a result that is fundamentally contrary to the result of a criminal proceeding—particularly on such basic issues as whether there was probable cause to believe that a crime had been committed—similar concerns will arise, even in the absence of a formal conviction. . . .Finally, the Heck decision also appears to have been underpinned, in substantial part, by concerns of federal-state comity that caution against using a federal civil-rights action to impugn the validity of a state criminal proceeding. . . . At a minimum, federal courts should be hesitant to permit claims to proceed that are intended to negate or nullify the outcome of prior state proceedings. The circumstances presented by this case highlight those same concerns. To begin, plaintiff entered into a bargain with the Commonwealth. He essentially consented to a term of probation in exchange for the dismissal of his criminal charges. In doing so, he 'avoid[ed] the possibility of a formal guilty finding but ... he also fore[went] a formal finding that his arrest lacked probable cause.'. . He now seeks to use a federal civil rights action to obtain the formal finding that he avoided in state court. Furthermore, while plaintiff did not plead guilty or admit to sufficient facts, he did accept the state's authority to impose a term of probation. . . A subsequent finding, through a federal civil-rights claim, that defendants were without probable cause to arrest him would completely undermine the state court's imposition of probation. Finally, plaintiff accepted sanctions imposed by the state court, however minimal those sanctions might have been. His liberty was curtailed, at least to some minor degree, during the three-month period of unsupervised probation. Furthermore, the court ordered him to write a letter of apology. While those sanctions, of course, seem trivial compared to a term of imprisonment, they were sanctions nonetheless: a state court judge of competent authority concluded that it was an appropriate consequence under the circumstances. Plaintiff formally accepted that consequence. He now seeks, in substance, to prove that no consequence should have been imposed, because there was no basis for the arrest or the charge. Even his letter of apology would be negated if he were successful; he essentially now contends that he did nothing meriting such an apology. On balance, the considerations favoring the imposition of the favorable-termination rule outweigh the countervailing factors. The Court therefore concludes that the favorable-termination requirement of Heck applies under the circumstances of this case. [fn. 14 While the Court recognizes that there may indeed be some unfairness in precluding § 1983 relief where it does not appear that any other form of relief is available for plaintiff's allegedly unlawful arrest, that alone cannot lift Heck's bar. As the First Circuit held in Figueroa, permitting a § 1983 action to proceed simply because no other form of relief is available would 'run afoul of Heck's core holding.'] That conclusion does not fully answer the question of whether that requirement bars plaintiff's § 1983 claims. The rule bars only those claims that would undermine the validity of his pretrial probation. . . Thus, a more detailed analysis of the relationship between plaintiff's individual theories for relief and his criminal case is required. . . . Plaintiff contends that because his claim is premised on his false arrest, rather than malicious prosecution, the favorable-termination requirement is inapplicable. Plaintiff's contention is premised on too narrow a reading of Heck. Heck states that the favorable-termination requirement applies both to actions to recover damages for 'allegedly unconstitutional convictions or imprisonment' as well as actions to recover damages 'for other harm caused by actions whose unlawfulness would render a conviction or sentence invalid.'. . As an example of the latter category, the court provided the hypothetical of a man convicted of resisting arrest who then sought to bring a § 1983 action against his arresting officers for the violation of his Fourth Amendment rights. . . The favorable-termination rule applies to such a claim, the court explained, because in order to prevail on his § 1983 claim, he would have to negate an element of the offense for which he was convicted— namely, that his arrest was lawful. . .That same reasoning applies here. Plaintiff was arrested for assault and battery on a police officer ("ABPO") for allegedly chest-bumping officer Lewis. The elements of the crime of ABPO are (1) a harmful or offensive touching (2) committed on a public employee engaged in the performance of his duty. . . The § 1983 claim here centers on plaintiff's arrest, which he contends was made without probable cause. To succeed on that claim, plaintiff would need to show that 'defendants acted unreasonably in arresting [him] and taking him into custody.'. . To do that, he would have to show that he did not engage in any harmful or offensive contact with Officer Lewis. In other words, he would have to negate an element of the offense for which he was arrested and for which he received a disposition of pretrial probation. The favorable-termination requirement of Heck therefore applies to plaintiff's false-arrest claim. For that reason, and the reasons stated above, defendants' motions for summary judgment will be granted as to the false-arrest claim. . . .As a preliminary matter, criticizing a police officer and asking for his name and badge number is protected speech under the First Amendment. . . Beyond that, plaintiff's retaliatory-arrest claim becomes more difficult. As discussed above, Heck bars plaintiff from challenging whether there was probable cause for his arrest. . . . Courts are divided as to whether Hartman's no-probable-cause requirement applies to retaliatory-arrest claims. . . The First Circuit has not yet addressed the issue. However, this Court need not now resolve the difficult question of whether there is a right under the First Amendment to be free from a retaliatory arrest even where there was probable cause for that arrest. Whether or not such a right exists, the Supreme Court has held that such a right is not 'clearly established' for purposes of qualified immunity because reasonable officials could conclude that Hartman applies in the context of retaliatory arrests. . . Here, for the purposes of analyzing plaintiff's retaliatory-arrest claim, the Heck rule requires the conclusion that there was in fact probable cause for his arrest. Defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity. . . Under Reichle, it was not clearly established at the time of plaintiff's arrest that a retaliatory arrest that was supported by probable cause could violate the First Amendment. . . Summary judgment will therefore be granted as to the retaliatory-arrest claim. . . .Because plaintiff's challenge to the lawfulness of the alleged strip-search is not a challenge to the fact or length of his confinement, that claim is not barred by Heck. Defendants' motions for summary judgment on Count 1 will therefore be denied as to plaintiff's claim that he was strip-searched in violation of the Fourth Amendment.") (footnotes omitted); Kennedy v. Town of Billerica, CIV.A. 10-11457-GAO, 2014 WL 4926348, *1-*3 (D. Mass. Sept.

30, 2014) ("The question presented by the defendant's motion is whether Mitchell Kennedy's pre-trial probationary disposition bars his § 1983 unlawful arrest claim for damages. While the criminal charges were ultimately dismissed, the dismissal, which followed the successful completion of a period of supervised probation, was not one that was 'consistent with the innocence of the accused,' a criterion generally required in order for a disposition to be considered a 'successful termination.'. .The First Circuit has not ruled specifically on whether a state criminal defendant's acceptance of participation in a pre-trial diversion program bars a later § 1983 false arrest claim. The circuits that have addressed the issue are divided. [collecting cases] At least in the circumstances of this case, I am persuaded by the reasoning of the Second and Third Circuits that Mitchell Kennedy's acceptance of pretrial diversion on terms of probation did not imply that his arrest had been made without probable cause. A defendant agreeing to such a disposition avoids the possibility of a formal guilty finding but, even if he also avoids the necessity of formally admitting that the facts of the case are sufficient to support such a finding, he also foregoes a formal finding that his arrest lacked probable cause. . . .The circuits that have not found that pre-trial diversion bars a § 1983 false arrest claim have focused on the plaintiff's ineligibility to seek habeas relief. . . That reasoning does not apply here because the First Circuit has held that the Heck rule applies even if habeas relief is actually unavailable. . . Mitchell Kennedy's criminal case was resolved by a dismissal that included his acceptance of a period of probationary supervision as well as other limitations on his liberty. His acceptance of that disposition was inconsistent with his claim here that his arrest by Officer Moran lacked probable cause. For that reason, Moran is entitled to judgment in his favor on that claim as a matter of law."); Malden v. City of Waukegan, Ill., No. 04 C 2822, 2009 WL 2905594, at *14 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 10, 2009) ("Having concluded that Mr. Malden's claims in this case, if successful, would necessarily imply the invalidity of his criminal conviction, we now address the question of whether Heck applies where, as here, a civil plaintiff no longer can challenge a criminal conviction through habeas corpus. We conclude that it does. . . . [N]one of the cases Mr. Malden cites for that proposition have held that the favorable termination requirement is inapplicable where a plaintiff: (1) has an underlying criminal conviction, (2) no longer can seek habeas relief in connection with that conviction, and (3) asserts a Section 1983 claim that, if accepted, necessarily would imply the invalidity of that conviction. . . . We hold that Heck's favorable termination requirement applies to this case, and bars Mr. Malden's claim in Count I."); Ference v. Township of Hamilton, 538 F.Supp.2d 785, 790 (D.N.J. 2008) ("Plaintiff was convicted of violating a municipal ordinance of the Township of Hamilton and assessed a minimal fine and court costs. . . He did not appeal his conviction. . . Similar to the plaintiff in Gilles, who entered into Pennsylvania's Accelerated Rehabilitative Disposition program, whereby, after a probationary period his conviction was expunged, Plaintiff here had no recourse to habeas corpus; there was no detention to contest. Nonetheless, pursuant to Gilles, Heck still applies to Plaintiff's section 1983 claims."); Williams v. Donald, 2007 WL 2345254, at *2, *3 (M.D.Ga. Aug. 14, 2007) ("A Circuit split exists regarding whether a former prisoner, who is thus not in custody for federal habeas purposes, may be allowed to attack his conviction or sentence through § 1983. The First, Third, Fifth and Sixth Circuits have held such a non-prisoner plaintiff may not attack a conviction in a § 1983 claim, and the Fourth and Eleventh Circuits have indicated in unpublished opinions they would be likely to render the same holding. [collecting cases] However, the Second and Ninth Circuits have held that Heck only applies to plaintiffs whose confinement can be challenged in post conviction proceedings. [citing cases] Having considered these opposite positions, the Court finds Heck bars Williams' suit for two reasons. First, the Court is mindful of the Supreme Court's admonition that '[i]f a precedent of [the Supreme] Court has direct application in a case, yet appears to rest on reasons rejected in some other line of decisions, [a lower federal court] should follow the case which directly controls, leaving to [the Supreme Court] the prerogative of overruling its own decisions.'. . Second, the Court cannot help but conclude that a judgment in Williams' favor would necessarily imply the invalidity of his sentence − the very outcome Heck seeks to bar. As Donald and Roberson argue, Williams' § 1983 lawsuit specifically challenges the validity of his sentence, but Williams' sentence has not been invalidated. . . Fundamentally, Williams seeks to recover monetary damages for allegedly unconstitutional imprisonment, but the sentence about which he complains was never reversed, expunged, declared invalid or called into question. Indeed, the sentence was upheld in a state habeas proceeding. Accordingly, Williams' claim is not cognizable under § 1983."); Abdullah v. City of Jacksonville, No. 3:04-cv-667-J-32TEM, 2006 WL 2789137, at *4 (M.D. Fla. Sept. 26, 2006) ("The Eleventh Circuit is not the only Circuit to re-examine Heck post-Spencer. In fact, a Circuit split has developed regarding the application of Heck to situations, such as that in Vickers, where a claimant has been released from incarceration and asserts a § 1983 complaint attacking the very reason he was incarcerated. The Third, Fifth and Fourth (in an unpublished opinion) Circuits have held, similar to the Eleventh Circuit's unpublished Vickers opinion, that Heck clearly ruled a plaintiff may not attack a conviction in a § 1983 claim even if the plaintiff is not in prison and thus not in custody for federal habeas purposes. [citing cases] The Ninth and Second Circuits, however, have adopted Justice Souter's position in Spencer that Heck only applies to plaintiffs whose confinement can be challenged in post conviction proceedings. [citing cases] In the present case, the gravamen of plaintiff's § 1983 claim is that the JSO Officers (Brown and Rodgers) unlawfully arrested him and caused him to spend twenty-nine days in prison at the Duval County Pretrial Detention Facility based on 'false charges.' Plaintiff's § 1983 claim attacks the very reason he was arrested and later adjudicated guilty (based on the plea of no contest). Like in Vickers, if plaintiff here is allowed to proceed with his § 1983 claim and prevails, such a result would impliedly render his conviction invalid, which is the precise situation that Heck seeks to preclude. While it appears the Eleventh Circuit would find plaintiff's claim Heck barred, because the City does not raise or rely on Heck, the reach of Heck in these circumstances is not entirely settled in the Eleventh Circuit and plaintiff's § 1983 suit fails for other reasons, the Court declines to decide this case on Heck grounds. The Court, however, thought it prudent to raise the Heck issue sua sponte due to its potential application to plaintiff's claims at bar.").

See also Harrison v. Michigan, 722 F.3d 768, 774 (6th Cir. 2013) ("Powers has no bearing on this case because, as Justice Souter made clear in his concurrence in Spencer, the exception applies only to those § 1983 litigants who are unable as a matter of law to satisfy Heck's favorable-termination requirement or, at least, those unable as a matter of law to satisfy it by means of a federal habeas action. . . . In this case, however, Harrison was not prevented from seeking habeas relief in prison by the brevity of his sentence. Nor was he prevented by law from satisfying the favorable-termination requirement by other means—as is evident by the fact that he succeeded in securing a favorable termination before he brought this § 1983 suit. As a result, both Spencer and Powers are irrelevant to Harrison's claim."); Huftile v. Miccio-Fonseca, 410 F.3d 1136, 1139-42 (9th Cir. 2005) (holding "Heck applies to SVPA [Sexually Violent Predators Act] detainees with access to habeas relief; detainee argued Heck shouldn't apply Abecause he was no longer civilly committed and hence was unable to file a habeas corpus petition[,]' but court of appeals found that "[u]nder California's SVPA scheme, the current petition to recommit Huftile is directly traceable to his initial term of confinement and is thereby sufficient to confer standing for federal habeas purposes.").

Compare Gilles v. Davis, 427 F.3d 197, 209-12 (3d Cir. 2005) ("Petit's underlying disorderly conduct charge and his § 1983 First Amendment claim require answering the same question − whether Petit's behavior constituted protected activity or disorderly conduct. If ARD ["Accelerated Rehabilitative Disposition" ("ARD") program, which permits expungement of the criminal record upon successful completion of a probationary term] does not constitute a favorable termination, success in the § 1983 claim would result in parallel litigation over whether Petit's activity constituted disorderly conduct and could result in a conflicting resolution arising from the same conduct. We recognize that concurring and dissenting opinions in Spencer. . . question the applicability of Heck to an individual, such as Petit, who has no recourse under the habeas statute. . . But these opinions do not affect our conclusion that Heck applies to Petit's claims. We doubt that Heck has been undermined, but to the extent its continued validity has been called into question, we join on this point, our sister courts of appeals for the First and Fifth Circuits in following the Supreme Court's admonition 'to lower federal courts to follow its directly applicable precedent, even if that precedent appears weakened by pronouncements in its subsequent decisions, and to leave to the Court "the prerogative of overruling its own decisions."'. . Because the holding of Heck applies, Petit cannot maintain a § 1983 claim unless successful completion of the ARD program constitutes a 'termination of the prior criminal proceeding in favor of the accused.' . .We have not had occasion to address this issue directly. Our trial courts have held that ARD is not a termination favorable for purposes of bringing a subsequent § 1983 malicious prosecution claim. We find instructive opinions from the Second and Fifth Circuits that have addressed whether similar pre-trial probationary programs are a favorable termination sufficient to bring a subsequent civil suit. [discussing cases] Viewing these factors together, we hold the ARD program is not a favorable termination under Heck. Petit's participation in the ARD program bars his § 1983 claim.' footnotes omitted) with id. at 216-19 (Fuentes, J. dissenting in part) ("Like the District Court, the majority assumes that the favorable termination rule in Heck applies to Petit's claim. But because Petit was not in custody when he filed his § 1983 action, Heck does not apply to his claims. Under the best reading of Heck and Spencer v. Kemna, 523 U.S. 1 (1998), the favorable termination rule does not apply where habeas relief is unavailable. . . . I now turn to the critical question on this point: whether Petit could have brought a habeas petition instead of the present § 1983 action. The duration of Petit's ARD program is not on record, but it could not have exceeded two years. . . Since Petit filed suit about one and a half years after his arrest, his ARD program was likely completed before he brought this suit. Thus, Petit could not have pursued habeas relief. . . . Even if the ARD program was not complete when Petit initiated the instant action, based on my review of the record, I conclude that the ARD program never placed Petit 'in custody' for habeas purposes. ARD is a pre-trial diversionary program, the purpose of which 'is to attempt to rehabilitate the defendant without resort to a trial and ensuing conviction.' . . Although we do not know the precise conditions imposed upon Petit, they do not appear to have required Petit to report anywhere in Pennsylvania since his stated reason for entering ARD was to enable his return to Kentucky as quickly as possible for work. . . . I therefore conclude that, even in the unlikely event that Petit was still in ARD at the time that he filed the present suit, his ARD program was not sufficiently burdensome to render him 'in custody' for habeas purposes. Accordingly, the favorable termination rule does not apply to his claims and the dismissal of his claim on that basis was error.").

See also Teichmann v. New York, 769 F.3d 821, 825 (2d Cir. 2014) (per curiam) ("We denied both motions and directed the parties to file supplemental briefs answering the following question: "Whether this Court should recognize an exception to the preclusionary rule of Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477, 114 S.Ct. 2364, 129 L.Ed.2d 383 (1994), where the plaintiff is no longer in custody when his § 1983 complaint is filed." We decline to reach this question and rule today on a narrower ground. . . .Since Teichmann's allegations fail to state a claim upon which we may properly grant him relief, we dismiss without considering the Heck v. Humphrey issues discussed by the District Court on which we requested additional briefing."); Teichmann v. New York, 769 F.3d 821, 827-28 (2d Cir. 2014) (per curiam) (Livingston, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment in part) ("In 2004, Teichmann was convicted in New York state court on one count of attempted commission of a criminal sex act and twenty-two counts of criminal contempt. In this lawsuit, as we and the district court have construed his complaint, Teichmann asserts a § 1983 claim explicitly asking us to review and overturn his conviction. Under Heck, this claim is 'not cognizable.' To be sure, some Circuits, including our own, have recognized exceptions to *Heck'*s bar in certain circumstances based on two concurrences by Justice Souter that at one point won the support of five Justices. . . Referring to this line of cases, Judge Calabresi describes the 'law in this Circuit' as holding that 'when a plaintiff does not have access to habeas—at least where the plaintiff has not intentionally caused habeas to be unavailable—favorable termination of the underlying sentence or conviction is not required.' . . While our en Banc decision in Poventud v. City of New York may not have disturbed certain precedents in this area, . . . the Poventud panel decision has been vacated . . . and I respectfully disagree with my colleague's characterization of our still-binding case law. We have never said that a plaintiff's access to § 1983 turns on whether he has intentionally caused habeas to be unavailable. We have recognized an exception to *Heck'*s favorable termination requirement when habeas was never reasonably available to the plaintiff through no lack of diligence on his part—that is, where an action under § 1983 was a diligent plaintiff's only opportunity to challenge his conviction in a federal forum. See Leather v. Ten Eyck, 180 F.3d 420, 424 (2d Cir.1999) (plaintiff "is not and never was in the custody of the State"). . . Though there is much to recommend the view that Heck permits no exceptions, those courts recognizing a narrow exception in situations where habeas was never an option have sought to afford access to a federal forum for the adjudication of constitutional claims while, at the same time, preventing those duly convicted of crimes in state proceedings (and whatever their intentions) from mounting attacks on their extant state convictions in disregard of the habeas statute's requirements. This is the balance that we, and every other Circuit to recognize an analogous Heck exception, have struck. . . Perhaps it can be said that a state prisoner who has failed to pursue habeas diligently has 'intentionally' rendered it unavailable. If so, then Judge Calabresi and I agree on the narrow scope of the Heck exception that our precedents have recognized. But I do not believe it is an open question whether claims like Teichmann's are cognizable under § 1983. Teichmann's state-court remedies were exhausted in May 2010. He then waited more than a year, until he was no longer in custody within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 2254, and filed a federal lawsuit seeking a declaration that his prior conviction was unconstitutional. No court has recognized an exception to Heck's bar under such circumstances, and there is no reason to dispose of Teichmann's § 1983 claim on the merits solely to avoid deciding whether we should be the first to do so."); Teichmann v. New York, 769 F.3d 821, 828-31 (2d Cir. 2014) (per curiam) (Calabresi, J., concurring) ("I fully join in today's opinion but write separately because, although we decided this case easily without reference to the Supreme Court's decision in Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477, 114 S.Ct. 2364, 129 L.Ed.2d 383 (1994), both the District Court and the parties addressed it, and it is an issue that continues to cause some consternation in this Circuit. In fact, there are many § 1983 actions, like the one here, that can be disposed of on a motion to dismiss without ever needing to reach any Heck questions or indeed without needing to discuss Heck at all. Because many Heck issues are contentious, I believe that a decision on these other grounds is generally preferable. . . . [W]hat 'necessarily demonstrates' the invalidity of a sentence or conviction is often anything but easy to decide, and hence the applicability vel non of Heck can be, to put it mildly, troublesome. Similarly, if we accept that a § 1983 suit does 'necessarily' attack a conviction or sentence, what happens if the plaintiff is no longer in custody and therefore cannot challenge the lawfulness of his confinement through habeas? On this issue, there is a deep circuit split. . . The law in this Circuit, however, holds—whether correctly or not—that Heck does not bar § 1983 claims when habeas is unavailable, at least so long as the unavailability was not intentionally caused by the plaintiff. See Huang ex rel. Yu v. Johnson, 251 F.3d 65, 75 (2d Cir.2001); Green v. Montgomery, 219 F.3d 52, 60 n. 3 (2d Cir.2000); Jenkins v. Haubert, 179 F.3d 19, 27 (2d Cir.1999); Leather v. Eyck, 180 F.3d 420, 424 (2d Cir.1999). Indeed, it is only because of these seemingly binding Circuit cases that in Poventud v. City of New York the panel majority (as opposed to the en banc majority) reached the Heck-habeas issue that led to en banc consideration in the first place. 715 F.3d 57, 61–62 (2d Cir.2013), aff'd on other grounds on reh'g en banc, 750 F.3d 121 (2d Cir.2014). The animating rationale of this result was stated to be that 'some federal remedy—either habeas corpus or § 1983—must be available' to redress constitutional violations. . . Yet there are clearly many members of our Court who disagree deeply with that rationale and our Circuit's apparent position. . . I believe that the law of our Circuit remains as it was despite our recent en banc decision in Poventud, in which—though the issue was squarely presented—the majority failed to reach the question of Heck's applicability when habeas is unavailable, and ruled instead that because Poventud's § 1983 claim did not undercut his guilty plea, Heck was no obstacle. . . That holding explicitly did nothing to disturb the cases cited above. . . Thus, until the Supreme Court rules that our position is wrong, or we resolve the issue en banc, I think that the law in this Circuit remains what it was: when a plaintiff does not have access to habeas—at least where the plaintiff has not intentionally caused habeas to be unavailable—favorable termination of the underlying sentence or conviction is not required. That said, who can doubt that this position, which has split the circuits and has been forcefully attacked by a significant number of judges on our Court, is controversial and hence to be avoided where other, easier grounds for deciding cases are available? Moreover, what does remain an open question, even in this Circuit, is perhaps even more difficult: whether Heck bars § 1983 suits when the plaintiff has intentionally defaulted his habeas claims. I know of no circuit cases that allow § 1983 claims to proceed in such circumstances, and some have suggested they cannot. . . And despite suggestions to the contrary, Poventud, 715 F.3d at 70 (Jacobs, J., dissenting), the Poventud panel majority did not address, let alone attempt to decide, the issue. . . Nevertheless, there are serious arguments to be made on both sides of the question. To discuss those arguments, however, is beyond the scope of this concurrence. For today, it is enough to suggest that here, too, we would be wise to move cautiously when deciding future cases, ruling narrowly where possible, and confining ourselves to the facts before us. And this brings us back to the beginning of this concurrence. When there are non-controversial, non-Heck grounds for ruling, we and district courts would be well advised to decide on those grounds rather than needlessly on Heck ones.")

See also Poventud v. City of New York, 750 F.3d 121, 132-38 (2d Cir. 2014) (en banc) ("This Court has emphatically and properly confirmed that Brady-based § 1983 claims necessarily imply the invalidity of the challenged conviction in the trial (or plea) in which the Brady violation occurred. . . That should come as no surprise; the remedy for a Brady violation is vacatur of the judgment of conviction and a new trial in which the defendant now has the Brady material available to her. . . .The district court treated Poventud's case as though it were a malicious prosecution claim. . . It measured his admission in the subsequent plea agreement against his claims in his Brady submission. Because his 2006 plea was at odds with his alibi defense at his 1998 trial, Judge Batts concluded that his recovery for a Brady claim would call his plea into question. That view misunderstands Brady and its correlation to § 1983 claims asserting only violations of the right to due process. The district court's view incorrectly presumes that, on the facts of this case, the State could violate Poventud's Brady rights only if Poventud is an innocent man. This last restriction has no basis in the Brady case law; materiality does not depend on factual innocence, but rather what would have been proven absent the violation. . . . In this case, Poventud has the right to argue to the jury that, with the main State witness impeached, he would have been acquitted based on reasonable doubt or convicted on a lesser charge. . . .[H]ad Poventud's complaint sounded in malicious prosecution, rather than in a procedural Brady-based claim, that claim would have been barred because of the favorable termination element of the malicious prosecution tort. . . Finally, Poventud cannot seek to collect damages for the time that he served pursuant to his plea agreement (that is, for the year-long term of imprisonment). Olsen, 189 F.3d at 55. With these limitations in mind, we find that Poventud has stated a § 1983 claim. . . .Were Poventud to win at trial—far from a foregone conclusion—the legal status of his 2006 guilty plea would remain preserved. No element of his § 1983 Brady claim requires Poventud to prove his absence from the scene of the crime; if it did, his claim would be Heck-barred. Poventud's success at trial would mean only that his 1998 conviction was the product of a constitutional violation; in this case, a New York State court has already reached this determination and vacated the conviction as a result. . . .Poventud's claim is one of process. He asserts that members of the New York City Police Department willfully withheld exculpatory evidence that called into question the testimony of the only witness to place him at the scene of the crime. Poventud's claims are not the stuff of prison idleness or self-absorption; he has proven his claims in state court and the State elected not to appeal his victory. Poventud's conviction was vacated because it rested on a constitutional infirmity. Armed with the information previously denied him, Poventud accepted an offer from the State to plead to a lesser offense. He now seeks to recover from those who violated his right to a fair trial. He does not contest the legitimacy of his plea (nor could he). His claim is restricted to the acts of the police officers before and during his trial in 1998. Poventud's victory in state court, securing vacatur of his jury trial conviction, gave life to his claim and separated it from the criminal activity that took place in the Bronx on March 6, 1997. Had Poventud claimed that the entire criminal process was one borne of malice, then our decision would be different. But his claims are circumscribed to the misdeeds of the police prior to his jury trial, and nothing more."); Poventud v. City of New York, 750 F.3d 121, 138-43 (2d Cir. 2014) (en banc) (Lynch, J., concurring) ("The question before the Court is whether the rule of Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477, 486–87 (1994), which prohibits a criminal defendant from obtaining damages for wrongful prosecution, conviction or imprisonment until and unless the conviction he complains of has been overturned, prevents the plaintiff Marcos Poventud from suing the defendants for, as he alleges, obtaining a conviction against him that led to his incarceration for almost nine years by deliberately suppressing evidence that cast doubt on the critical identification testimony of the victim. . . The short answer is that it does not, because the criminal judgment against him was later vacated by the state court that entered it, because the court found that the police had indeed rendered his trial unfair by suppressing exculpatory evidence. The defendants argue, however, that we should nevertheless forbid Poventud from seeking damages for that wrongful conviction and sentence, because Poventud later, after the full facts were known to both sides, pled guilty to a related but lesser offense, and was sentenced to one year of imprisonment. . . . To recapitulate the results of the two trials of Marcos Poventud: at the first proceeding, corrupted by police misconduct, a jury that was ignorant of the truth about the identification witness, convicted him of attempted murder and three other crimes leading to nine years of imprisonment on a ten-to-twenty year sentence; at the second, he was convicted on his plea of guilty to third-degree attempted robbery and was sentenced to one year. Now Poventud seeks damages from those who, in effect, fabricated evidence of his guilt by suppressing evidence that would have shaken, perhaps fatally, the identification testimony used to convict him. The defendants seek to have his suit dismissed, based on the same rule that would have prevented him from suing while his initial conviction stood unchallenged, arguing that a fairly obtained conviction by guilty plea (albeit to a lesser offense with sharply limited consequences) prevents a suit seeking damages for the wrongful conduct that resulted in his earlier, more serious, now-vacated conviction, with its resulting drastically more serious punishments. It seems to me, as it does to a majority of the judges of this Court, that the legal answer is simple. . . . Poventud seeks to recover damages for his initial conviction and for that portion of his lengthy imprisonment that was attributable to that conviction. That conviction exists no longer; a state court declared it invalid, and we must accept the outcome of the legal process that holds him not guilty of those offenses. Heck thus does not bar his suit. It seems to me that the answer is equally simple from the standpoint of simple justice. The state court decided that Poventud was not fairly tried, and that the police deliberately suppressed evidence helpful to the defense in order to make the case against him appear stronger than it was. His conviction of four crimes including attempted murder, and sentence to 10 to 20 years in prison is a legal and moral nullity, the result of a trial deliberately corrupted by the police. Whether or not prosecutors might have successfully appealed that judgment, or obtained the same conviction again after a second, fair trial, they chose not to take those risks; whether or not Poventud would have been acquitted at a second trial, he too elected not to take his chances. Our best—however imperfect—approximation of the result that would have come from a fair trial is the result of the plea bargain: conviction on a single, much less serious count, and a sentence to only a year in prison. We must accept as binding the outcome of these criminal proceedings: that Poventud, at an unfair trial, suffered a much more serious conviction and punishment than he received from a fair proceeding, with all the facts known. By the same token, however, Poventud must accept the other outcome of the legal process: his conviction, by plea of guilty, of the offense of attempted robbery in the third degree, and his sentence to one year of imprisonment. Irrespective of the difficulty of his choice to plead guilty, Poventud is legally guilty of that offense. He therefore may not argue that he was wrongly prosecuted or charged; he cannot claim that he was unfairly convicted of a crime, or that he was wrongly required to serve a year in prison. But he certainly may argue that his initial, more serious conviction was wrong, and wrongful, and that as a result of deliberately unfair and corrupted processes he was forced to serve many additional years in prison. . . .There is thus a certain common sense, rough justice to the idea that Poventud can seek damages for the difference between the outcomes of his first and second processes, the first conducted outside the rules and the second within them. It is reasonable to ask, however, where is the truth in all of this. I think any fair-minded person will agree that the trial that led to Poventud's initial conviction was deeply—and intentionally—corrupted, and that its result is unreliable. But Poventud has now admitted, under oath (albeit under deeply questionable circumstances) that he was indeed involved in the robbery. Are we to award damages, in effect, for the fact that Poventud lost the opportunity to be acquitted of a crime that he may very well have committed because the rules were not followed? I believe that we must. As a matter of law, in order to prevent the horror of convicting an innocent person, we insist that someone charged with a crime may only be convicted and punished if the state can prove his or her guilt by a very demanding standard of proof, beyond a reasonable doubt. If a defendant cannot be thus proven guilty—if the evidence, however suggestive of guilt it may be, does not rise to a sufficient level of strength, that defendant must be declared not legally guilty of the crime charged. And certainly, if a defendant is found legally guilty by a jury that has been deprived of the full story by government misconduct, that conviction is void."); Poventud v. City of New York, 750 F.3d 121, 163, 164 (2d Cir. 2014) (en banc) (Jacobs, J., dissenting) ("Precedent compels us to conclude that the Heck bar blocks Poventud's claim. Poventud's criminal proceeding did not terminate until he pled guilty to a lesser included offense. . . Therefore, Poventud's Brady-based § 1983 claim 'does indeed call into question the validity of his conviction.'. .Because we conclude that Poventud's claim necessarily implies the invalidity of his extant conviction, we reach the issues that launched this rehearing in banc: whether the Heck bar applies only to persons in custody, as the majority of the three-judge panel held; whether there are any exceptions to the Heck bar; and whether any exceptions that may exist would save Poventud's claim. We reject the holding of the majority opinion issued by the three-judge panel, an opinion which has in any event been vacated. Assuming arguendo that there are some exceptions to Heck, we conclude that Poventud's action could not come within them. On the basis of self-described dicta signed by five Supreme Court Justices (three of whom are no longer on the Court), a Circuit split has opened as to whether some exceptions to Heck may be permitted. In a nutshell, these Justices posited that 'a former prisoner, no longer "in custody," may bring a § 1983 action establishing the unconstitutionality of a conviction or confinement without being bound to satisfy a favorable-termination requirement that it would be impossible as a matter of law for him to satisfy.'. .Several Circuits have concluded that the Spencer concurrences cannot override Heck's binding precedent. See, e.g., Entzi v. Redmann, 485 F.3d 998, 1003 (8th Cir.2007); Gilles v. Davis, 427 F.3d 197, 209–10 (3d Cir.2005); Randell v. Johnson, 227 F.3d 300, 301 (5th Cir.2000) (per curiam); Figueroa v. Rivera, 147 F.3d 77, 80 (1st Cir.1998). These courts hold that Heck's bar is absolute, heeding the Supreme Court's admonition that, even if binding precedent 'appears to rest on reasons rejected in some other line of decisions, the Court of Appeals should follow the case which directly controls, leaving to [the Supreme] Court the prerogative of overruling its own decisions.'. . Other Circuits have nevertheless held that Spencer's dicta allows courts to recognize unusual and compelling circumstances in which Heck's holding does not absolutely foreclose a claim. See, e.g., Burd v. Sessler, 702 F.3d 429, 435–36 (7th Cir.2012); Cohen v. Longshore, 621 F.3d 1311, 1317 (10th Cir.2010); Wilson v. Johnson, 535 F.3d 262, 267–68 (4th Cir.2008); Powers v. Hamilton Cnty. Pub. Defender Comm'n, 501 F.3d 592, 603 (6th Cir.2007); Guerrero v. Gates, 442 F.3d 697, 704 (9th Cir.2006); Harden v. Pataki, 320 F.3d 1289, 1298 (11th Cir.2003). There is no need to choose a side in this split because the narrow exception articulated by Justice Souter would be inapplicable here in any event. The motivating concern in the Spencer dicta was that circumstances beyond the control of a criminal defendant might deprive him of the opportunity to challenge a federal constitutional violation in federal court. Poventud is not such a person. Poventud challenged his first conviction in state court and won—making it unnecessary for him to seek federal habeas relief. At that point, Poventud had the option of defending in an untainted trial or of pleading guilty to the same crime on reduced charges and accepting a reduced sentence. He chose to plead. Poventud then had the option of filing a motion to challenge the voluntariness of his plea—and Poventud did so, but he withdrew it prior to an evidentiary hearing. It was therefore by no means 'impossible as a matter of law,' Spencer, 523 U.S. at 21 (Souter, J., concurring), for Poventud to challenge his conviction and thereby satisfy Heck's favorable termination requirement; he simply decided not to.") Compare Taylor v. County of Pima*,* 913 F.3d 930, 935-36 (9th Cir. 2019) ("Taylor seeks damages for wrongful incarceration stemming from the 42 years that he spent in prison. The Supreme Court's holding in Heck v. Humphrey. . . provides an important limitation on Taylor's claims. Under Heck, a plaintiff in a § 1983 action may not seek a judgment that would necessarily imply the invalidity of a state-court conviction or sentence unless, for example, the conviction had been vacated by the state court. . . Here, Taylor's 1972 jury conviction has been vacated by the state court, so Heck poses no bar to a challenge to that conviction or the resulting sentence. But Taylor's 2013 conviction, following his plea of no contest, remains valid. Accordingly, Taylor may not state a § 1983 claim if a judgment in his favor 'would necessarily imply the invalidity of his [2013] conviction or sentence.'. . As the district court summarized, 'Heck does not bar [Taylor] from raising claims premised on alleged constitutional violations that affect his 1972 convictions but do not taint his 2013 convictions.' Recognizing that limitation, Taylor stresses that '[h]e challenges his 1972 prosecution, convictions and sentence and does not challenge his 2013 "no contest" pleas or sentence.'. . Taylor alleges that his 1972 conviction and resulting sentence were plagued by constitutional violations and that those errors initially caused his incarceration. Critically, however, all of the time that Taylor served in prison is supported by the valid 2013 state-court judgment. The state court accepted the plea agreement and sentenced Taylor to time served. For that reason, even if Taylor proves constitutional violations concerning the 1972 conviction, he cannot establish that the 1972 conviction caused any incarceration-related damages. As a matter of law, the 2013 conviction caused the entire period of his incarceration. . . . [W]hen a valid, unchallenged conviction and sentence justify the plaintiff's period of imprisonment, then the plaintiff cannot prove that the challenged conviction and sentence caused his imprisonment and any resulting damages. . . .We agree with the analyses and conclusions of our sister circuits. A plaintiff in a § 1983 action may not recover incarceration-related damages for any period of incarceration supported by a valid, unchallenged conviction and sentence. We take no pleasure in reaching this unfortunate result, given Taylor's serious allegations of unconstitutional actions by the County. But we cannot disregard the limitations imposed by Congress and the Supreme Court on the scope of § 1983 actions.") with Taylor v. County of Pima, 913 F.3d 930, 939-40 (9th Cir. 2019) (Schroeder, J., dissenting as to Part B.2) ("This decision magnifies an already tragic injustice. At the time of Tucson's Pioneer Hotel fire in 1972, Louis Taylor was an African American male of sixteen. Arrested near the hotel, he was convicted on the basis of little more than that proximity and trial evidence that 'black boys' like to set fires. He has spent a lifetime of 42 years in prison following his wrongful conviction. When he filed his state court petition the county that had prosecuted him did not even respond to his allegations of grievous deprivations of civil rights, including the withholding of evidence that the fire was not caused by arson at all, and the indicia of racial bias underlying the entire prosecution. Instead of responding, the county offered Taylor his immediate freedom in return for his pleading no contest to the original charges and agreeing to a sentence of time served. He accepted the offer, since his only alternative was to stay in prison and wait for his petition for collateral relief to wend its way through the courts, a process that could take years. Because his original conviction had been vacated and all of the prison time he had served was as a result of that invalid conviction, he filed this action to recover damages for his wrongful incarceration. Yet the majority holds that he can recover nothing. Why? Because it interprets the few cases with circumstances remotely similar to this one to require the admittedly unfair holding that his plea agreement somehow validates or justifies the original sentence that deprived Taylor of a meaningful life. In my view our law is not that unjust. Our Circuit law actually supports the award of damages for the time Taylor served in prison as a result of an unlawful, and now vacated conviction. Our leading case is Jackson v. Barnes, 749 F.3d 755 (9th Cir. 2014), where, as here, the plaintiff's original conviction was vacated on habeas review. Hence, a claim for damages resulting from wrongful incarceration was not barred by Heck v. Humphrey. . . The majority acknowledges the same is true here. In Jackson the plaintiff could not recover damages, however, because the wrongful conviction had not yet resulted in any wrongful incarceration. This was because he was still serving other, earlier imposed sentences and never began serving the term imposed as a result of the unlawful conviction. In other words, there was a lack of causation. . . Taylor, by contrast, served decades of imprisonment as a result of his first, vacated conviction, so there is no lack of causation here. Under Jackson, he should recover. That Taylor later, in order to gain prompt release, pleaded no contest to the charges and to a sentence of time served, does not undo the causal sentencing chain set in motion after the original, invalid conviction. The majority's discussion is not consistent with Jackson. The Second Circuit's decision in Poventud also supports reversal. Poventud v. City of N.Y., 750 F.3d 121 (2d Cir. 2014) (en banc). Poventud's conviction was vacated on collateral attack, on the basis of a Brady violation, and a new trial was ordered. . . He then pleaded guilty to a lesser charge, pursuant to a plea agreement that dismissed all other charges and stipulated to a one-year sentence, with time already served. . . The Second Circuit held that Poventud's Brady-based claim was not Heck-barred insofar as it related to his first conviction. . . As the en banc court explained, were Poventud to win at trial in his civil rights suit, 'the legal status of his [second conviction] would remain preserved.'. . He was permitted to pursue a claim of damages for the time he served beyond the one year plea agreement stipulation. Judge Lynch's concurrence is also instructive, as it focuses on the injustice of relying on the subsequent guilty plea to deny Poventud a remedy for the unfairness of the first trial. . . The majority's decision ignores such injustice in this case. Taylor's case is even more compelling than those of Jackson and Poventud because his first conviction was so deeply tainted that we now know the disastrous fire may not have been set by anyone, and the prosecution was without adequate foundation from the beginning. He won more than a new trial, but virtual exoneration. His situation is therefore also different from the situation in Olsen v. Correiro, 189 F.3d 52 (1st Cir. 1999), where the plaintiff's murder conviction was overturned but he was subsequently convicted of manslaughter. Far from being the product of a new, constitutionally-conducted second trial, Taylor's second conviction was the product of his desperate circumstances. In his 60's, he faced acceptance of the plea offer or waiting years for a habeas petition to work its way through the courts. We should not tolerate such coercive tactics to deprive persons of a remedy for violations of their constitutional rights. To say such a plea justifies the loss of 42 years, as the majority asserts, is to deny the reality of this situation and perpetuate an abuse of power that § 1983 should redress.").

See also Carson v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 23-2661, 2024 WL 3792223, at *4–6 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 13, 2024) ("The Supreme Court and the Third Circuit Court of Appeals have not yet ruled on the question in this case: does Heck necessarily bar § 1983 claims based on a conviction that was overturned where the plaintiff has a second, valid conviction for the same conduct? The Courts of Appeals that have considered this question have all answered no: 'Heck does not automatically bar a § 1983 claim simply because the processes of the criminal justice system did not end up in the plaintiff's favor. A plaintiff need not prove that any conviction stemming from an incident ... has been invalidated, only a conviction that could not be reconciled with the claims of his civil action.' Poventud v. City of New York, 750 F.3d 121, 132 (2d Cir. 2014) . . . In other words, Carson's suit is not necessarily barred in full, as the City Defendants argue, because he pled guilty to third-degree murder. Under Heck, the Court must analyze each claim's relationship to Carson's convictions individually. The Court begins this analysis with Carson's Fourteenth Amendment claims for denial of due process and a fair trial based on fabrication and withholding of evidence. Fabrication of evidence and withholding of impeachment or exculpatory evidence are two different claims under the Fourteenth Amendment. Fabrication of evidence 'works an unacceptable corruption of the truth-seeking function of the trial process.'. . Hence, 'if a defendant has been convicted at a trial at which the prosecution has used fabricated evidence, the defendant has a stand-alone claim under section 1983 based on the Fourteenth Amendment.'. . Violations of Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963) occur when '(1) the government withheld evidence, either willfully or inadvertently; (2) the evidence was favorable, either because it was exculpatory or of impeachment value; and (3) the withheld evidence was material.'. . Brady claims 'necessarily imply the invalidity of the challenged conviction in the trial ... in which the Brady violation occurred.' Poventud, 750 F.3d at 132 (emphasis in original). Carson's Fourteenth Amendment claims for fabrication and withholding of evidence are premised on Officer Keenan's false testimony at trial, the DA's failure to share three witness statements with Carson's trial counsel, and ADA Desiderio's attempt to pressure Wylie into giving false testimony. These claims undoubtedly implicate Carson's trial and first conviction, which was overturned on collateral review. But the Court concludes the claims do not implicate the validity of Carson's second conviction for two reasons. First, Carson pled guilty to third-degree murder with knowledge of the full body of evidence resulting from Lloyd's murder investigation, including the previously undisclosed witness statements. . . Second, Carson's ultimate guilt or innocence has no bearing on the due process violations alleged. Carson could be guilty of Lloyd's murder, but he would still have claims for fabrication of evidence and Brady violations in the first prosecution. . . Therefore, the Court concludes Heck does not bar these claims as asserted in Count I of the Complaint. Further, to the extent Carson's claims for civil rights conspiracy, supervisory liability, and municipal liability . . . are premised on the alleged fabrication of evidence and Brady violations during his first prosecution, these claims do not implicate his 2021 guilty plea. As such, Heck does not bar those claims. Count III, a malicious prosecution claim against the individual defendants, is the last claim to consider vis-à-vis the Heck bar. To state a malicious prosecution claim, a plaintiff must plead: (1) the defendant[s] initiated a criminal proceeding; (2) the criminal proceeding ended in [his] favor; (3) the defendant[s] initiated the proceeding without probable cause; (4) the defendant[s] acted maliciously or for a purpose other than bringing the plaintiff to justice; and (5) [he] suffered deprivation of liberty consistent with the concept of seizure as a consequence of a legal proceeding. . . Because Carson pled guilty to third-degree murder, this claim fails at the second step: the criminal proceedings related to Lloyd's murder did not end in Carson's favor. For the same reason, this claim is also barred by Heck because success would necessarily call Carson's 2021 plea into doubt. . . The City Defendants' motion to dismiss will be granted as to Count III's claim for malicious prosecution.")

See also Jackson v. Barnes, 749 F.3d 755, 760, 761 (9th Cir. 2014) ("This. . . is a case in which a guilty plaintiff's claim is not barred by Heck. In this case it is Jackson's second conviction for first degree murder that is outstanding. It is undisputed that the second conviction was insulated from the inculpatory statements that are the subject of Jackson's § 1983 suit against Barnes. The first conviction is the case in which the Fifth Amendment violation occurred. Therefore a judgment in Jackson's favor would—far from 'necessarily imply[ing]' the invalidity of his second conviction—not have any bearing on it. The only conviction a judgment in Jackson's favor would bear on is his first conviction, which was 'called into question by a federal court's issuance of a writ of habeas corpus.' In fact, more than 'called into question,' it was reversed. . . Thus, Jackson's § 1983 claim against Barnes for the Fifth Amendment violation is not barred by Heck. Our holding is similar to that of the Second Circuit in Poventud v. City of New York, No. 12–1011–CV, 2014 WL 182313, ___ F.3d ___ (2d Cir. Jan. 16, 2014) (en banc).") and Rosales-Martinez v. Palmer, 753 F.3d 890, 899 (9th Cir. 2014) ("The viability and scope of Rosales–Martinez's § 1983 claim, in relation to Heck v. Humphrey and pursuant to Jackson should be evaluated by the district judge on remand. In that connection, Rosales–Martinez's December 2, 2008 guilty plea to one of the original four counts and the credit he received for 501 days of prison time for that sentence suggests a continuous validity to a portion of his original conviction and sentence, and a possible inconsistency between it and a § 1983 action, which may pose a distinction with Jackson. In Jackson, the entire initial conviction was held invalid; thus, the Ninth Circuit held, the § 1983 case could proceed without violating the rule of Heck v. Humphrey. In our case, Rosales–Martinez pleaded guilty to one of the four counts of his original conviction, with the other three being held invalid. On remand, the district judge might consider if this and other differences between the case before us and the decision in Jackson are significant. For example, the district judge may wish to consider the extent to which Rosales–Martinez can seek compensatory damages based on the convictions that were vacated as invalid, and the time he served on the count that remained valid, for which he was given credit for 501 days of time served. The district judge may also wish to consider whether any of the facts Rosales–Martinez allocuted to in his December 2, 2008 plea are inconsistent with his allegations in this § 1983 action. These questions are illustrations; the district judge is free to pursue all relevant facts and inquiries.")

See also Brown v. Flowers, No. 23-7006, 2023 WL 6861761, at *11 (10th Cir. Oct. 18, 2023) (not reported) ("In a four-Justice concurrence, the Supreme Court later carved out a possible exception to Heck, explaining that 'a former prisoner, no longer in custody, may bring a § 1983 action establishing the unconstitutionality of a conviction or requirement without being bound to satisfy a favorable-termination requirement that it would be impossible as a matter of law for him to satisfy.' Spencer v. Kemna, 523 U.S. 1, 21 (1998) (Souter, J., concurring). We have adopted this exception. Cohen v. Longshore, 621 F.3d 1311, 1316–17 (10th Cir. 2010) ("We are also persuaded that the Spencer plurality approach is both more just and more in accordance with the purpose of § 1983."). Brown maintains that she brought this action after she was no longer incarcerated, so Heck does not apply to her under Spencer. But when Brown filed her complaint in this case, she was serving a suspended sentence while on supervised probation. . . And because a person serving a suspended or stayed sentence is still 'in custody,' we conclude that Brown was in custody for purposes of Heck. . . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment based on Heck."); Rosato v. New York County Dist. Attorney's Office, No. 09 Civ. 3742(DLC), 2009 WL 4790849, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 14, 2009) ("Plaintiff argues that Heck does not bar his § 1983 claims because he is not 'in custody' within the meaning of the federal habeas corpus statute, citing the Second Circuit's decision in Leather, 180 F.3d 420. Plaintiff's attempt to distinguish his case based on the fact that he is not incarcerated fails as a matter of law. The Supreme Court's interpretation of the 'in custody' language in the federal habeas statute is not so narrow as to require that a prisoner be physically confined in order to challenge his sentence on habeas corpus. . . An individual on probation or parole is 'in custody' for purpose of federal habeas corpus proceedings. . . Because plaintiff is still serving his sentence of probation, he is 'in custody' within the meaning of the federal habeas statute and his § 1983 claims are barred by Heck.").

See also Bermudez v. City of New York, 790 F.3d 368, 376-77 & nn. 4, 5 (2d Cir. 2015) ("[W]e conclude that a jury could find that Defendants' alleged failure to inform ADA Rodriguez about problems in the initial questioning of these witnesses could have prevented ADA Rodriguez from making an informed decision about the reliability of that evidence. . . And this would mean that a jury could find that Defendants remained a proximate cause of the deprivation of Bermudez's due process rights. . . . Bermudez additionally brings a due process claim under Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), arguing that Defendant police officers misled ADA Rodriguez as to the nature of the photo identification procedures and the fact that Lopez's testimony was coerced. Bermudez contends that these facts should have been disclosed to him. Police officers can be held liable for Brady due process violations under § 1983 if they withhold exculpatory evidence from prosecutors. . . Thus the same disputed issues of material fact exist concerning Bermudez's Brady claim. If the prosecutor was not informed about this evidence, then Defendant officers could be found to have been a proximate cause of these asserted due process violations as well. . . . In sum, there are triable issues of fact concerning whether ADA Rodriguez's decision to bring charges was tainted by misleading information about how the witnesses originally came to identify Bermudez as the shooter. It was therefore error to grant summary judgment to Defendants on Bermudez's due process claims. . . .Defendants appear to argue that Bermudez's due process claims fail because there was probable cause to bring an indictment. But the absence of probable cause is not an element of a due process claim. See Poventud v. City of New York, 750 F.3d 121, 134 (2d Cir.2014) (en banc) (distinguishing the elements of malicious prosecution from those of other due process claims); Alexander v. McKinney, 692 F.3d 553, 556–57 (7th Cir.2012) (listing the elements of a malicious prosecution claim and the elements of a due process claim under Brady, and naming lack of probable cause as a requirement only of the former). . . .Bermudez's claim for malicious prosecution fails at the summary judgment stage, because no facts in dispute support a lack of probable cause to charge him with the relevant crime. Where, as here, a grand jury indicted the plaintiff on the relevant criminal charge, New York law creates a presumption of probable cause that can only be overcome by evidence that the indictment 'was the product of fraud, perjury, the suppression of evidence by the police, or other police conduct undertaken in bad faith.' Green v.. Montgomery, 219 F.3d 52, 60 (2d Cir.2000) (quoting Marshall v. Sullivan, 105 F.3d 47, 54 (2d Cir.1996)); accord Gisondi v. Town of Harrison, 532 N.Y.S.2d 234, 236 (1988). Bermudez argues that the indictment was the product of police suppression of evidence, because Defendant officers failed to disclose the evidentiary problems to ADA Rodriguez. We need not decide this issue, however, because ADA Rodriguez interviewed the two witnesses who testified at the grand jury hearing—Thompson and Velasquez. Thompson told ADA Rodriguez, and then testified at the grand jury hearing, that he saw Bermudez shoot the victim. Velasquez told ADA Rodriguez, and then testified at the grand jury hearing, that she saw Bermudez reach behind his back for a gun. Even if the ADA had been misled about the overly suggestive photo identification and array procedures and about the alleged coercion of Lopez, these interviews provided ADA Rodriguez with probable cause to prosecute Bermudez. Because we find that probable cause existed to indict Bermudez, we do not reach the other elements of Bermudez's malicious prosecution claim against Defendant officers.")

In Muhammad v. Close, 540 U.S. 749 (2004), the Supreme Court left this issue unresolved. See Muhammad, 540 U.S. at 752 n.2 (2004) ("Members of the Court have expressed the view that unavailability of habeas for other reasons may also dispense with the Heck requirement. . . . This case is no occasion to settle the issue.").

See also Christy v. Sheriff of Palm Beach County, Fla., 288 F. App'x 658, ___ (11th Cir. 2008) ("[W]ith respect to Christy's assertion that his lawsuit must be allowed to proceed because habeas relief is unavailable, we have expressly declined to consider that issue in an opinion where the § 1983 action is otherwise barred under Heck. [citing Vickers and Abusaid]"); Vickers v. Donahue, No. 04-14848, 2005 WL 1519353, at *4, *5 (11th Cir. June 28, 2005)(not published) ("While we have not explicitly ruled on whether a plaintiff who has no federal habeas remedy available to him may proceed under § 1983 despite the fact that success on the merits would undermine the validity of, in this case, an order of revocation and the resulting nine month sentence, we decline to do so here because it is unnecessary to the outcome of Vickers's case. First, as the district court pointed out, Vickers was not without a remedy to seek post-revocation relief. He could have appealed the revocation order and, had he prevailed, his § 1983 claims would not be barred by Heck. Second, unlike in Harden, Vickers's claim here would imply the invalidity of the order of revocation and nine-month sentence he received. . . . Finally, the three cases cited above that permitted a plaintiff to pursue a § 1983 claim because no habeas relief was available did not involve a situation where a conviction itself was called into question. In Nonnette and Carr, the issue was the validity of prison disciplinary proceedings revoking good-time credits, and in Huang the issue was the denial of credit for prison time served and the conviction was not challenged. . . . Here, Vickers's factual basis for his § 1983 claim directly undercuts a signed court order, which found that Vickers had violated his community control for two violations of condition 12. As the district court noted, Vickers insists he did not plead guilty or nolo contendere to these violations, but even taking his assertion as true, the undisputed fact remains that he was found to be in violation, convicted for the violation, and sentenced to nine months' imprisonment. Accordingly, we conclude that the Heck bar applies to Vickers's claim despite the unavailability of relief."); Jones v. David, No. 08-61274-CIV, 2008 WL 5045951, at * 3 (S.D. Fla. Nov. 24, 2008) ("The Supreme Court has not determined whether Heck applies when a plaintiff has been released from custody and is no longer able to challenge past custody in a post-conviction proceeding. . . . The Eleventh Circuit also has not considered this issue. [citing Abusaid and Vickers] Because it is not clear that this case is Heck-barred, either because the plaintiff has a post-conviction remedy or because he filed this action while he was still in custody, it is recommended that the Fourth Amendment claims against Porter proceed.").

A lengthy discussion of the problem, along with a good collection of the cases, can be found in Dible v. Scholl, 410 F.Supp.2d 807, 808, 809, 820-25 & n.15, 828 (N.D. Iowa 2006) ("This controversy brings before the court an issue of first impression within the Eighth Circuit − namely whether the unavailability of a remedy under 28 U.S.C. § 2254, the federal habeas corpus statute, permits a former state prisoner to maintain an action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, . . . even though success in such an action would necessarily imply the invalidity of a conviction or sentence. Specifically, in this case, the court confronts the question of whether a former state prisoner − who is precluded from pursuing a habeas claim − can maintain an action for damages as a result of alleged due process violations that occurred during a prison disciplinary proceeding under § 1983 or whether his rights are nothing more than a mirage − appearing to exist at first glance, but transforming into an illusion upon careful inspection due to the lack of a federal forum in which to enforce them. . . . Following the Court's opinion in Spencer, the federal district and appellate courts have been left to carve out the precise contours of the favorable termination requirement with respect to prisoners who can not access a federal forum via ' 2254. Generally, these federal courts have split into two camps. First, are those courts that find Heck directly controls this issue. Therefore, because Spencer did not overrule Heck, these courts conclude that a prisoner not in custody within the meaning of the habeas statute or whose habeas action has been mooted upon release from incarceration, remains nonetheless precluded from bringing a claim for damages under § 1983 under the language in Heck. Second, are those courts that follow Justice Souter's logic in Spencer and find that Heck did not affirmatively decide the issue, leaving these courts free to conclude that a prisoner without recourse under the habeas statute may bring an action under the broad scope of § 1983. There is no existing Eighth Circuit precedent on this issue. . . . The Fifth, Sixth, and Third Circuits have followed the First Circuit's logic pronounced in Figueroa. See, e.g., Randell v. Johnson, 227 F.3d 300, 301-02 (5th Cir.2000) (relying on the reasoning set forth in Figueroa); Huey v. Stine, 230 F.3d 226, 229-30 (6th Cir.2000) (citing Figueroa), overruled on other grounds by Muhammad v. Close, 540 U.S. 749 (2004); Gilles v. Davis, 427 F.3d 197, 209-10 (3d Cir.2005) (following Figueroa). . . Based on an unpublished opinion, it also appears the Fourth Circuit would follow this same reasoning. See Gibbs v. S.C. Dep't of Prob., Parole, & Pardon Servs., No. 97-7741, 1999 WL 9941, at *2 (4th Cir. Jan. 12, 1999) (affirming district court's grant of summary judgment with respect to released prisoner's claims under § 1983 on the grounds the claim was precluded by Heck). To summarize, the conclusion reached by these courts is premised upon the belief that Heck definitively decided, in the negative, the question of whether a prisoner who is precluded from pursuing habeas relief can file a § 1983 action without first meeting the favorable determination requirement. Based upon this belief, although these courts question the continued viability of Heck's favorable termination requirement when habeas is unavailable, these decisions reflect that ultimately, these courts conclude that they are precluded from following Spencer, when to do so would overrule Heck, a determination solely within the province of the Supreme Court. . . . In contrast, several circuit and district courts have adopted the view articulated by Justice Souter in Spencer and have held that a person who is legally precluded from pursuing habeas relief may bring a § 1983 action challenging a conviction without satisfying the favorable termination requirement of Heck. See Nonnette, 316 F.3d at 875-77 & n. 6.; Huang v. Johnson, 251 F.3d 65, 75 (2d Cir .2001); DeWalt v. Carter, 224 F.3d 607, 616-17 (7th Cir.2000) [But see Savory v. Cannon]; . . . Dolney v. Lahammer, 70 F.Supp.2d 1038, 1041, 1042 n. 1 (D.S.D.1999); Haddad v. California, 64 F.Supp.2d 930, 938 (C.D .Cal.1999); Zupan v. Brown, 5 F.Supp.2d 792 (N.D.Cal.1998). This line of case law does not, as alluded to by the First Circuit in Figueroa, rely upon the contention that Spencer overruled Heck's favorable termination requirement. See, e.g., Nonnette, 316 F.3d at 877 n. 6 ("We conclude that Heck does not control, and reach that understanding of Heck's original meaning with the aid of the discussions in Spencer.") (citing DeWalt, 224 F.3d at 617 n. 5). Rather, these authorities conclude that Heck should be read as creating a favorable termination requirement only for those persons who, like Heck, had the remedy of habeas corpus available to them. . . . After a review of the pertinent case law, this court concludes that it will adhere to Justice Souter's reasoning in Spencer. In doing so, this court aligns itself with the circuit and district courts that have concluded Heck only hints at an answer to the current issue before this court in dicta and therefore, does not constitute directly applicable precedent. . . This is because the prisoner in Heck had the remedy of habeas available to him. . . . . This court does not believe its holding will encourage prisoners to delay their challenges to loss of good time credits until their release from incarceration. As the Ninth Circuit has noted, 'The possibility of release from incarceration is the strongest incentive for prisoners to act promptly to challenge such administrative action by habeas corpus after administrative remedies are exhausted.' Nonnette, 316 F.3d at 878 n. 7. Further, the court's holding today is not without limitations. For example, other courts have declined to hold that a failure to timely pursue habeas remedies takes a prisoner's § 1983 claim out of Heck's purview. See, e.g., Cunningham v. Gates, 312 F.3d 1148, 1154 n. 3 (9th Cir.2002). Thus, the court's holding today potentially affects only a small number of prisoners − former prisoners challenging the loss of good time credits or revocation of parole whose claims, under Spencer, have been mooted by their release from incarceration, or those prisoners challenging their underlying convictions who were never 'in custody,' or served too short of time to physically file a petition for habeas corpus while 'in custody.' This latter group of potentially affected prisoners is further reduced by the fact that, unlike challenges to parole revocation or loss of good time credits, challenges to an underlying conviction are not mooted upon the prisoner's release from incarceration, and a habeas action may still be maintained provided that it was filed at the time the individual was 'in custody.' See Spencer, 523 U.S. at 7-8 (noting collateral consequences have been presumed in cases challenging an underlying conviction) (citing Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40, 55-56 (1968)). . . . The decision issued by this court today ensures that prisoners seeking redress from constitutional violations will have a federal forum available to them. A contrary conclusion would have the untoward consequence of creating a right without a remedy, which is in essence, no right at all."). See also Perry v. Triggs, No. 1:05CV0010 SWW, 2006 WL 751287, at *2, *3 (E.D. Ark. Mar. 23, 2006)

("As could be suspected, following Spencer, a split of authority has developed regarding the application of Heck principles to the situation at hand. The First, Fifth, Sixth, and Third Circuits have found that Heck definitively decided that an individual (whether imprisoned or not) cannot collaterally attack their conviction in a Section 1983 action. [citing cases] The Eleventh and Fourth Circuits have joined this position in unpublished opinions. [citing cases] On the other hand, the Ninth and Second Circuits have followed the logic first expressed by Justice Souter in his concurrence in Heck and again later in Spencer that the rule in Heck only applies to plaintiffs whose confinement can be challenged in post conviction proceedings. [citing cases] The Seventh Circuit has indicated that it would find an exception to the Heck favorable termination rule for individuals who had no way to collaterally attacked their conviction or sentence. [citing cases] Based upon the language of the Heck opinion, the undersigned believes that the holding of Heck applies with equal force to inmates and those who have been released, until such time as Supreme Court may find it appropriate to limit its reach. . . As recognized by the First Circuit, any other conclusion would pervert the core holding of Heck and would ignore the requirement that a Section 1983 plaintiff prove all elements of the cause of action. Thus, although Spencer may cast doubt upon the Heck favorable termination requirement, we 'leave to the Court the prerogative of overruling its own decisions .'[citing Figueroa]").

But see Dible v. Scholl, No. C05-4089-PAZ, 2008 WL 656076, at *4 (N.D. Iowa Mar. 7, 2008) (Paul Zoss, US Chief Magistrate Judge) ("In considering the defendants' motion to dismiss in the present case, Judge Bennett specifically recognized that 'a ruling in Dible's favor would necessarily vitiate his underlying conviction [on the disciplinary charge.]'. . . Judge Bennett further acknowledged that both Supreme Court and Eighth Circuit precedent would bar Dible's section 1983 action, 'unless there is some other reason to take Dible's claims outside the ambit of Heck's favorable termination requirement.' . . Judge Bennett distinguished Dible's claim based on Spencer v. Kemna, 523 U.S. 1, 118 S.Ct. 978, 140 L.Ed.2d 43 (1998) Although the undersigned concurs with Judge Bennett's reasoning, it appears to be at odds with the Eighth Circuit's refusal to rely on the fragmented opinions of five Justices in Spencer. It is significant that Judge Bennett's order denying the defendants' motion to dismiss was not immediately appealable as of right because it was not a 'final decision' of the court. . . In contrast, the undersigned's order denying the defendants' motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds was appealable as of right under the collateral order doctrine. . . In Dible II, the court noted, 'Although we have some discretion to exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over related rulings that are not themselves immediately, we have not been asked to do so.' . . Thus, the court limited its review to the undersigned's decision to deny qualified immunity, and did not address the order denying the defendants' motion to dismiss. . . This court reluctantly finds it is compelled to follow Entzi, and that failure to do so would be error. Accordingly, the defendants' motion for reconsideration is granted. The denial of the defendants' motion to dismiss is reversed, and this case is dismissed with prejudice on the grounds that the suit is barred by Heck's favorable-termination rule.").

See also Gray v. Kinsey, No. 3:09cv324/LC/MD, 2009 WL 2634205, at *5, *8, *9 (N.D. Fla. Aug. 25, 2009) ("Since Spencer, lower federal courts have grappled with defining the contours of the favorable-termination requirement with regard to § 1983 plaintiffs who cannot access a federal forum via habeas corpus. The recent opinion of District Judge James Cohn in Domotor v. Wennet,. . . provides an in-depth and comprehensive analysis of the legal landscape surrounding the Heck decision. As explained in Domotor, at least five circuit courts (the Second, Fourth, Sixth, Seventh and Ninth Circuits) have found that the concurring and dissenting opinions in Spencer provide 'a patchwork plurality' of five Supreme Court Justices allowing a plaintiff to obtain relief under § 1983 when federal habeas corpus is not available to address the alleged constitutional wrongs. [citing cases] On the other hand, four circuits (the First, Third, Fifth and Eighth Circuits) have decided that despite the view expressed by the plurality in Spencer, Spencer did not overrule Heck, Heck directly controls the issue, and a § 1983 plaintiff not in custody within the meaning of the habeas statute or whose habeas action has been mooted by expiration of his sentence remains prohibited from bringing a claim for damages under § 1983 unless he satisfies the favorable-termination requirement. [citing cases] The Eleventh Circuit has not explicitly decided whether Heck bars § 1983 suits by plaintiffs who are not in custody and thus for whom federal habeas relief is not available. In dicta and unpublished opinions, the court has expressed mixed views on the subject. . . . Although Plaintiff is no longer incarcerated and likely unable to bring a habeas action, this Court holds that Heck's favorable-termination requirement bars Plaintiff from bringing the § 1983 claims alleged in the Amended Complaint. . . . This case involves plaintiff's traffic conviction that resulted in a fine. . . . Were this court to make a determination in plaintiff's favor, it would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction. . . . It is apparent from the nature of the relief plaintiff seeks, as well as the mere 11-day interval between plaintiff's conviction and the filing of this lawsuit, that plaintiff has not obtained an invalidation of his traffic conviction. Despite the unavailability of federal habeas relief, the plaintiff is not without a remedy to seek relief from his conviction through appeal of the traffic conviction. . . . Plaintiff is attempting to substitute this civil rights action for such an appeal. To allow plaintiff to circumvent applicable state procedures and proceed directly to federal court to collaterally attack his conviction through § 1983 would undermine the basis of Heck's favorable-termination requirement."); Domotor v. Wennet, 630 F.Supp.2d 1368, 1375-80 (S.D. Fla. 2009) ("A circuit split has developed regarding the application of Heck to situations where a claimant, who may no longer bring a habeas action, asserts a § 1983 complaint attacking a sentence or conviction. . . Four circuits reject the idea that the plurality in Spencer restricts the favorable-termination requirement of Heck for § 1983 actions challenging the validity of a conviction or sentence. [citing cases from 1st, 3d, 5th, and 8th circuits] On the other hand, Five circuits have found that under certain circumstances the Spencer plurality allows a plaintiff to obtain relief under § 1983 when it is no longer possible to meet the favorable-termination requirement via a habeas action. [citing cases from 2d, 4th, 6th, 9th, and 7th circuits] A cornerstone for many courts that take the latter position is that the holding of Heck does not address whether the favorable-termination requirement applies to plaintiffs who may no longer bring a habeas action. . . .In Guerrero v. Gates, 442 F.3d 697 (9th Cir.2006), the Ninth Circuit articulated narrow circumstances where a § 1983 claim was available to a plaintiff who has not satisfied Heck's favorable-termination requirements. . . . The Eleventh Circuit has not ruled definitively on this issue and has instead sent mixed signals. [discussing Abusaid, Vickers, McClish, Christy] . . . . Heck squarely applies to the facts of this case. First, Plaintiff's § 1983 claims directly 'imply the invalidity' of Plaintiff's convictions. . . . Second, it is undisputed that Plaintiff cannot, at this point, meet Heck's favorable-termination requirement. . . Although Plaintiff is no longer incarcerated and likely unable to bring a habeas action,. . . this Court holds that Heck's favorable-termination requirement bars Plaintiff from bringing the § 1983 claims alleged in the Amended Complaint. . . . Plaintiff's case would present a much more difficult question if her § 1983 claims were based on a latent injury or a conspiracy discovered by the Plaintiff only after expiration of the applicable limitation period to file a habeas petition or a motion for post-conviction relief. In contrast, the facts before this Court reveal that Plaintiff entered into a plea agreement with knowledge of all or substantially all of the allegations that now form the basis of a § 1983 action for damages. The Court finds that to allow the Plaintiff to circumvent applicable state procedures and collaterally attack her convictions in federal court 'is the precise situation that Heck seeks to preclude.'"), aff'd, 356 F. App'x 316 (11th Cir. 2009).

L. What Counts as Conviction or Favorable Termination?

Compare Duarte v. City of Stockton, 60 F.4th 566, 570-73 (9th Cir. 2023) ("We have never considered whether the Heck bar applies when criminal charges were dismissed after entry of a plea that was held in abeyance pending the defendant's compliance with certain conditions. We hold that Heck does not apply in this situation. . . . The Heck bar . . . requires an actual judgment of conviction, not its functional equivalent. . . Heck speaks of challenges that would impugn 'a conviction or sentence,'. . . and Appellees argue that Duarte was effectively sentenced to completing the terms of his plea agreement. But a conviction is a prerequisite to a sentence. . . . To be sure, Duarte pleaded 'no contest' or 'nolo contendere' to the resisting arrest charge. And, under California law, a court ordinarily 'shall find the defendant guilty' upon entry of such a plea, which is 'considered the same as a plea of guilty.'. . But this only serves to underscore that a plea itself is not a conviction. A plea is entered by the criminal defendant, but a conviction does not follow without a subsequent order from the court. . . Indeed, California law provides for several pretrial diversion programs, with terms akin to those in the agreement entered by Duarte, in which this distinction is highlighted. . . Although Duarte entered the equivalent of a guilty plea, the state court never entered an order finding him guilty of the charge to which he pleaded. Instead, the court ordered that its acceptance of Duarte's plea would be 'held in abeyance,' pending his completion of ten hours of community service and obedience of all laws. . . Suspension of the plea is not a finding of guilt or a conviction. After the six months of abeyance elapsed, the charges against Duarte were 'dismissed' in the 'interest of justice on the prosecutor's motion. . . . Dismissal, which imposes no criminal liability, is thus the opposite of a conviction, which imposes such liability. . . Because the charges against Duarte were dismissed, he was never convicted. And because there is no conviction that Duarte's § 1983 claims would impugn, Heck is inapplicable. Our conclusion is consistent with the majority of circuits to consider Heck in the context of pretrial diversion agreements. The Sixth, Eighth, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits have all held that where the conditions of the agreement are satisfied and the criminal charges are dismissed without entry of conviction, Heck does not bar subsequent civil rights claims. See Mitchell, 28 F.4th at 895–96; Vasquez Arroyo, 589 F.3d at 1093–96; S.E. v. Grant Cnty. Bd. of Educ., 544 F.3d 633, 637–39

(6th Cir. 2008); McClish v. Nugent, 483 F.3d 1231, 1250–52 (11th Cir. 2007). The district court relied on a contrary decision by the Third Circuit, which held that the plaintiff's civil rights claims were Heck-barred even though he had never been formally convicted in the state criminal proceedings. See Gilles v. Davis, 427 F.3d 197, 208–12 (3d Cir. 2005). But for the reasons explained above, we find Gilles unpersuasive. Moreover, Gilles predated Wallace, in which the Supreme Court explicitly rejected an argument that Gilles appears to embrace—that § 1983 claims inconsistent with ongoing criminal charges, not just outstanding criminal judgments, could be barred by Heck. . . We recognize the Fifth Circuit has also held 'a deferred adjudication order is a conviction for the purposes of Heck's favorable termination rule' because it is 'a judicial finding that the evidence substantiates the defendant's guilt' and 'a final judicial act.' See DeLeon v. City of Corpus Christi, 488 F.3d 649, 655–56 (5th Cir. 2007). As explained above, we do not adopt that logic. The final judicial act is either the dismissal of the charges or the imposition of a sentence. Moreover, unlike Duarte, the DeLeon plaintiff remained under the conditions of his deferred adjudication agreement and the criminal charges against him had not yet been dismissed. . . Indeed, the Fifth Circuit explicitly declined to decide how it would apply Heck for a plaintiff who, like Duarte, did satisfy the terms of his agreement. . . In sum, Heck's 'core' concern is for preventing the circumvention of habeas exhaustion requirements through § 1983. . . More broadly, Heck seeks to promote finality and consistency by 'refrain[ing] from multiplying avenues for collateral attack on criminal judgments.' McDonough v. Smith, —— U.S. ——, 139 S. Ct. 2149, 2157, 204 L.Ed.2d 506 (2019) (collecting cases). Thus, the sine qua non of Heck is a judgment of conviction and a resultant sentence. . . Challenges that cast doubt on such judgments are the province of direct appeals or habeas—not § 1983. But where, as here, the criminal charges were dismissed and there is no conviction to impugn, the tension with which Heck was principally concerned is missing. Also absent are any concerns about finality, consistency, or comity, when there is no order in the state criminal case with which a decision in the federal civil lawsuit could be inconsistent. Because Duarte was never convicted of a crime, his claims should not have been dismissed under Heck."); Mitchell v. Kirchmeier, 28 F.4th 888, 895-96 (8th Cir. 2022) ("Here, Mitchell was never convicted of—and therefore, a fortiori, never sentenced on—the charges against him. Furthermore, even if the pretrial diversion agreement were a 'conviction or sentence,'. . . the success of Mitchell's § 1983 claims would not imply its invalidity. In North Dakota, a pretrial diversion agreement is simply a contract in which the state agrees to forgo prosecution in consideration for the defendant agreeing not to 'commit a felony, misdemeanor or infraction' for a specified period of time (and, in some cases, agreeing to further conditions). N.D. R. Crim. P. 32.2(a)(1)-(2). The success of Mitchell's § 1983 claims would imply nothing at all about whether his pretrial diversion agreement with the state was a valid contract. Therefore, the favorable-termination requirement does not come into play, and Mitchell's § 1983 claims are not Heck-barred. See Vasquez Arroyo v. Starks, 589 F.3d 1091, 1095 (10th Cir. 2009) (holding that Heck does not apply to pretrial diversion agreements because "there is no related underlying conviction"); McClish v. Nugent, 483 F.3d 1231, 1251 (11th Cir. 2007) (holding that Heck does not apply to pretrial intervention agreements, regardless of whether such an agreement "amount[s] to a favorable termination," because the § 1983 plaintiff "was never convicted of any crime" (emphasis omitted)). The district court reached a contrary conclusion by misreading Heck. According to the district court, Heck bars any § 1983 claim whose success would imply the plaintiff's innocence of charges in a criminal proceeding unless the plaintiff can prove that the proceeding was terminated favorably to him. On this reading, the mere existence of a criminal charge incompatible with the plaintiff's § 1983 claim triggers the favorable-termination requirement. But that is not what the Court said in Heck, 512 U.S. at 487, 114 S.Ct. 2364 (barring only § 1983 claims whose success would imply the invalidity of the plaintiff's "conviction or sentence"), and it conflicts with what the Court has consistently held since, see, e.g., Wallace v. Kato, 549 U.S. 384, 393, 127 S.Ct. 1091, 166 L.Ed.2d 973 (2007) (denying that Heck applied where "there was in existence no criminal conviction that the [§ 1983] cause of action would impugn"). We recognize that the Third Circuit has adopted a reading of Heck like the district court's. See Gilles v. Davis, 427 F.3d 197, 208-12 (3d Cir. 2005). For the reasons explained above, however, we find the cases from the Tenth and Eleventh Circuits that reject this reading more persuasive. See Vasquez Arroyo, 589 F.3d at 1095; McClish, 483 F.3d at 1251."); Vasquez Arroyo v. Starks, 589 F.3d 1091, 1096 (10th Cir. 2009) ("Because we have determined that the Kansas pre-trial diversion agreements are not outstanding convictions and therefore these § 1983 claims impugning their validity are not barred by Heck, we need not decide whether Heck applies when the plaintiff lacks an available remedy in habeas. Although we implied in Butler in dicta that Heck does not apply when a habeas remedy is lacking, 482 F.2d at 1278-81, we decline to reach this issue which the Supreme Court has not resolved, see Close, 540 U.S. at 752 n. 2, and on which the circuits are split. [footnote collecting cases]"); S.E. v. Grant County Bd. of Educ., 544 F.3d 633, 639 (6th Cir.2008) (holding Heck inapplicable to pre-trial diversion agreements) and McClish v. Nugent, 483 F.3d 1231, 1251 & n.19 (11th Cir. 2007) ("Holmberg's § 1983 claim arose out of his arrest for allegedly interfering with the ongoing arrest of McClish by Deputies Terry and Calderone. The deputies arrested Holmberg for 'resisting arrest without violence,' see Fla. Stat. § 843.02, and the charge was eventually dismissed without prejudice pursuant to Florida's pretrial intervention program, see Fla. Stat. § 843.02. The district court determined that Heck barred Holmberg from bringing a § 1983 claim because of his participation in PTI. Although we have never determined that participation in PTI barred a subsequent § 1983 claim, the district court cited to Second, Third, and Fifth Circuit cases holding that a defendant's participation in PTI barred subsequent § 1983 claims. Dist. Ct. Order at 19- 20 (citing Gilles v. Davis, 427 F.3d 197 (3d Cir.2005); Taylor v. Gregg, 36 F.3d 453 (5th Cir.1994); Roesch v. Otarola, 980 F.2d 850 (2d Cir.1992)). The district court then concluded that 'Holmberg's participation in PTI, which resulted in a dismissal of the charge of resisting arrest without violence, is not a termination in his favor, and therefore, he is barred from bringing a § 1983 claim for false arrest.' We disagree. Heck is inapposite. The issue is not, as the district court saw it, whether Holmberg's participation in PTI amounted to a favorable termination on the merits. Instead, the question is an antecedent one − whether Heck applies at all since Holmberg was never convicted of any crime. The primary category of cases barred by Heck − suits seeking damages for an allegedly unconstitutional conviction or imprisonment − is plainly inapplicable. Instead, the district court based its Heck ruling on the second, indirect category of cases barred by Heck: suits to recover damages 'for other harm caused by actions whose unlawfulness would render a conviction or sentence invalid.' . . . The problem with using this second Heck category to bar Holmberg's § 1983 suit is definitional − to prevail in his § 1983 suit, Holmberg would not have to

'negate an element of the offense of which he has been convicted,' because he was never convicted of any offense. [citing Heck and Wallace] . . . . Even if we were to assume that Heck somehow applies to this case, Holmberg correctly cites to Abusaid v. Hillsborough County Board of County Commissioners, 405 F.3d 1298 (11th Cir.2005), for the proposition that the Supreme Court has apparently receded from the idea that Heck's favorable-termination requirement also applies to non-incarcerated individuals. . . . The logic of our reasoning in Abusaid, although dicta, is clear: If Heck only bars § 1983 claims when the alternative remedy of habeas corpus is available, then Heck has no application to Holmberg's claim. Holmberg was never in custody at all, and the remedy of habeas corpus is not currently available to him.") with Gilles v. Davis, 427 F.3d 197, 209-12 (3d Cir. 2005) ("Petit's underlying disorderly conduct charge and his § 1983 First Amendment claim require answering the same question − whether Petit's behavior constituted protected activity or disorderly conduct. If ARD ["Accelerated Rehabilitative Disposition" ("ARD") program, which permits expungement of the criminal record upon successful completion of a probationary term] does not constitute a favorable termination, success in the § 1983 claim would result in parallel litigation over whether Petit's activity constituted disorderly conduct and could result in a conflicting resolution arising from the same conduct. We recognize that concurring and dissenting opinions in Spencer. . . question the applicability of Heck to an individual, such as Petit, who has no recourse under the habeas statute. . . But these opinions do not affect our conclusion that Heck applies to Petit's claims. We doubt that Heck has been undermined, but to the extent its continued validity has been called into question, we join on this point, our sister courts of appeals for the First and Fifth Circuits in following the Supreme Court's admonition 'to lower federal courts to follow its directly applicable precedent, even if that precedent appears weakened by pronouncements in its subsequent decisions, and to leave to the Court "the prerogative of overruling its own decisions."'. . Because the holding of Heck applies, Petit cannot maintain a § 1983 claim unless successful completion of the ARD program constitutes a 'termination of the prior criminal proceeding in favor of the accused.' . .We have not had occasion to address this issue directly. Our trial courts have held that ARD is not a termination favorable for purposes of bringing a subsequent § 1983 malicious prosecution claim. We find instructive opinions from the Second and Fifth Circuits that have addressed whether similar pre-trial probationary programs are a favorable termination sufficient to bring a subsequent civil suit. [discussing cases] Viewing these factors together, we hold the ARD program is not a favorable termination under Heck. Petit's participation in the ARD program bars his § 1983 claim.' footnotes omitted).

See also Aprileo v. Clapprood, No. 3:21-CV-30114-MGM, 2024 WL 3430855, at *4 (D. Mass. May 21, 2024) ("The court is not convinced that the First Circuit would consider the disposition of the criminal charges against Plaintiff a conviction for purposes of Heck. The majority of circuits to consider Heck in the context of pretrial diversion agreements – including the Sixth, Eighth, Ninth, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits – 'have all held that where the conditions of the agreement are satisfied and the criminal charges are dismissed without entry of conviction, Heck does not bar subsequent civil rights claims.'. . . I recommend that the court adopt the position announced by the majority of the circuits to have addressed the issue, which is that Heck does not apply when the criminal charges against a § 1983 plaintiff are dismissed without a formal conviction after successful completion of a pretrial diversion agreement."); Ricci v. State of Rhode Island, No. 120CV00543MSMPAS, 2023 WL 4686025, at *14–15 (D.R.I. July 21, 2023) ("The purpose of Heck was twofold: first, to avoid the use of civil actions to substitute for writs of habeas corpus to challenge convictions; and second, to avoid the prospect of inconsistency between a conviction and a subsequent successful constitutional challenge to that conviction's underpinning in a civil action. Neither is a concern here. One could not have brought a habeas corpus petition to 'undo' a filing since it is not a judgment of the court much less a final one. Nor could such a petition be brought to vacate an expunged conviction. . . Second, neither a successful filing nor an expunged conviction has any continuing legal effect, so no inconsistency could arise were the civil action in this Court successful. Expungement has the same legal effect as a pardon, which 'fulfills the purposes of Heck's invalidation requirement.'. . 'A full pardon removes all legal consequences of the individual's conviction, avoiding the concern of parallel litigation with an outstanding criminal proceeding.'. . 'Heck does not present the same bar to § 1983 suits where the underlying conviction has already been expunged; the conviction is no longer "outstanding."'. . Whether a resolution such as a filing is a bar under Heck has been the object of some attention and differing views in federal courts. In the District of Massachusetts, a case that has been 'continued without a finding'. . . has been held to be a Heck bar, even though once the pretrial probation period passes, the charge is dismissed. Cabot v. Lewis, 241 F. Supp. 3d 239, 250-51 (D. Mass. 2017). Other courts have reached opposite conclusions. See Tomashek v. Raleigh Cnty. Emergency Operating Ctr., 344 F. Supp. 3d 869, 874 (S.D.W. Va. 2018) (collecting cases). In Tomashek, the Court declined to impose a Heck bar because of the defendant's entry into a pretrial diversion program. . . It reasoned that pretrial diversion results in neither an adjudication of guilt nor a conviction; successful completion results in a dismissal. . . The very purpose of the program is to 'avoid[ ] a judgment of criminal guilt – the opposite of a conviction in a criminal action.'. . This Court declines to hold this action precluded by Heck for two reasons. First, although a decision by a sister District, as Cabot is, would normally be entitled to great consideration, Cabot pre-dated Clark v. Thompson, which dramatically softened Heck's preclusion effect. Until Clark, Heck's literal language had required a state court disposition that was 'favorable' to the defendant, which the First Circuit had interpreted as tantamount to an acquittal or other exoneration. In Clark, the Supreme Court set a much lower bar – that the state court criminal charge not have ended in a 'conviction.'. . Cabot itself acknowledged that its narrow view of Heck 'ignores, and appears to be inconsistent with, the purposes and rationale of Heck.'. . Thus, there is reason to believe the Cabot Court would reach a contrary result, consistent with this Court, were it to consider the issue post-Clark. In this Court's view, while pre-Clark one might not have been able to say that a filing was tantamount to an acquittal or exoneration, it certainly is not a conviction which is, post-Clark, now a precondition to Heck preclusion. . . Second, it seems fundamentally unfair to interpose a Heck preclusion on Ricci's claims that law enforcement intentionally fabricated a confidential informant to secure a warrant because Ricci accepted the lowest possible disposition in Rhode Island criminal law to resolve the criminal case. At that time, he did not know of the evidence from which an inference of fabrication could be drawn and, indeed, under the Rules of Criminal Procedure in Rhode Island, no discovery deposition of right is allowed. It is somewhat facetious for the defendants to claim that 'it [was] incumbent upon Plaintiff to challenge the evidence through a Franks [v. Delaware]] hearing.' Ricci had no factual basis at all for requesting a Franks hearing which is gained only after surmounting a high threshold of proffered evidence of falsity. The Court therefore declines to impose Heck v. Humphrey as a bar to this action.")

On "expungement by executive order," see Carr v. Louisville-Jefferson County, 37 F.4th 389, 392-93, 394 n.4 (6th Cir. 2022) ("Carr does not contest that her § 1983 claims implicate Heck. However, she argues her conviction has already been invalidated through her pardon. In Heck, the Court listed four ways a conviction could be invalidated: (1) reversal on direct appeal; (2) executive expungement; (3) declared invalid by a state tribunal; or (4) called into question by a writ of habeas corpus. . . Carr argues her pardon falls under executive expungement. . . We have never previously considered whether a pardoned individual can pursue a § 1983 claim relating to her conviction. Courts that have considered the issue unanimously agree that pardons in some way fall under Heck's reach. [collecting and discussing cases] We join our sister circuits in holding that a pardoned individual has had her conviction expunged by executive order under Heck. . . Defendants argue that Carr's pardon does not invalidate her conviction under Heck because the pardon did not contain language indicating Carr was innocent. . . . A full pardon, even one that does not indicate an individual is innocent, fulfills the purposes of Heck's invalidation requirement. Heck sought to avoid parallel litigation and to prevent collateral attacks on a conviction through a civil suit. . . A full pardon removes all legal consequences of the individual's conviction, avoiding the concern of parallel litigation with an outstanding criminal proceeding. . . .While a full pardon does not always indicate that the individual is innocent, Heck does not require a finding of innocence. Heck did not impose a prerequisite of innocence to seek relief under § 1983. Instead, it gave examples of state procedures amounting to invalidation of a conviction. It did not mention innocence as a requirement, and there is 'no reason to impose that additional limitation [of innocence] on Heck's holding.'. . . The Supreme Court recently addressed the lack of an innocence requirement in a Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983. Thompson v. Clark, —– U.S. ——, 142 S. Ct. 1332, —– L.Ed.2d —— (2022). Thompson was charged in state court proceedings, but 'the charges were dismissed before trial without any explanation by the prosecutor or judge.'. . He sued the police officers who initiated the criminal proceedings under § 1983, alleging they maliciously prosecuted him in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . The Court compared Thompson's Fourth Amendment claim to malicious prosecution, noting that a favorable termination of the underlying criminal proceedings is required to succeed in a malicious prosecution claim. . . Emphasizing the purposes of the favorable termination requirement—to avoid parallel litigation, preclude inconsistent judgments, and prevent improper collateral attacks—the Court held an affirmative showing of innocence is not required. . . Thompson is distinguishable because the plaintiff was never convicted, but the case highlights the purposes of the favorable termination requirement and that an affirmative showing of innocence is not required to satisfy those purposes."); Savory v. Cannon, 947 F.3d 409, 429 (7th Cir. 2020) (en banc) ("The contention that a pardon must be based on innocence in order to serve as a favorable termination finds no support in Heck, and we see no reason to impose that additional limitation on Heck's holding. If the Court had wanted to specify that the pardon must be based on innocence, it certainly could have done so, but it did not. Instead, the Court offered a list of possible resolutions that would satisfy the favorable termination requirement, and none require an affirmative finding of innocence. A conviction need only be 'reversed on direct appeal, expunged by executive order, declared invalid by a state tribunal authorized to make such determination, or called into question by a federal court's issuance of a writ of habeas corpus.'. . Any of these outcomes can occur without a declaration of a defendant's innocence. McDonough added that acquittal is a favorable termination under Heck that starts the clock on claim accrual, another resolution that does not necessarily imply innocence."); Wilson v. Lawrence County, 154 F.3d 757, 760-61 (8th Cir. 1998) ("Wilson asserts that his conviction was 'expunged by executive order' by virtue of his full pardon from the governor. The defendants disagree. The district court, relying on Missouri law, concluded that a person who is pardoned by the governor remains guilty in the eyes of the Missouri court and therefore cannot bring a 1983 claim for wrongful incarceration. In our view, however, the issue in this case is one of federal law. . . . The relevant question is whether Wilson's pardon invalidated his conviction within the meaning of Heck. We find that it did. . . . The gist of Heck is that section 1983 is not an appropriate vehicle for attacking the validity of a state conviction. Wilson does not seek to put it to this improper use. He used the executive clemency process, which the Supreme Court has expressly approved, as the forum in which to challenge his criminal conviction.").

Compare Roberts v. City of Fairbanks, 947 F.3d 1191, 1193-1203 (9th Cir. 2020) ("The primary question before us is whether § 1983 plaintiffs may recover damages if the convictions underlying their claims were vacated pursuant to a settlement agreement. The answer depends on whether such a vacatur serves to invalidate the convictions and thus renders the related § 1983 claims actionable notwithstanding Heck. We conclude that where all convictions underlying § 1983 claims are vacated and no outstanding criminal judgments remain, Heck does not bar plaintiffs from seeking relief under § 1983. . . .The Heck Court was explicit: 'If the district court determines that the plaintiff's action, even if successful, will not demonstrate the invalidity of any outstanding criminal judgment against the plaintiff, the action should be allowed to proceed, in the absence of some other bar to the suit.'. . Because all convictions here were vacated and underlying indictments ordered dismissed, there remains no outstanding criminal judgment nor any charges pending against Plaintiffs. The absence of a criminal judgment here renders the Heck bar inapplicable; the plain language of the decision requires the existence of a conviction in order for a § 1983 suit to be barred. . . . The dissent's view that a conviction vacated by settlement is not 'declared invalid' under Heck appears to arise out of its conflation of the favorable-termination rule in the tort of malicious prosecution with Heck's four distinct means of favorable termination. . . . Heck's favorable termination requirement is distinct from the favorable termination element of a malicious-prosecution claim. Compare Awabdy, 368 F.3d at 1068 (malicious-prosecution plaintiff must "establish that the prior proceedings terminated in such a manner as to indicate his innocence"), with Heck, 512 U.S. at 486–87 (favorable-termination rule satisfied when conviction or sentence is (1) reversed on direct appeal, (2) expunged by executive order, (3) declared invalid by a state court, or (4) called into question by a federal court's issuance of a writ of habeas corpus). . . .The dissent accuses us of creating 'a fifth method of favorable termination' in addition to Heck's four—namely, vacatur-by-settlement. . . Not so. We merely hold that where, as here, a § 1983 plaintiff's conviction is vacated by a state court, that conviction has been 'declared invalid by a state tribunal authorized to make such determination,' . . . and that Heck is therefore no bar to the suit.") with Roberts v. City of Fairbanks, 947 F.3d 1191, 1210-15 (9th Cir. 2020) (Ikuta, J., dissenting) ("Because the plaintiffs' convictions were not 'declared invalid by a state tribunal authorized to make such determination,' nor reversed on direct appeal, expunged by executive order, or called into question by a federal court's issuance of a writ of habeas corpus, . . . the plaintiffs are unable to show that their criminal proceedings were terminated in their favor. They are therefore barred from using a civil action to establish they were wrongly convicted. Thus, the plaintiffs' claim for damages stemming from their allegedly wrongful convictions are 'not cognizable under § 1983.'. . Heck's clear holding resolves this appeal. . . .In sum, the plaintiffs' convictions were not 'declared invalid by a state tribunal.'. . Rather, the convictions were vacated pursuant to settlement agreements, such that the 'criminal judgment[s]' are still 'outstanding,' precluding the plaintiffs' claims for relief. . . . Therefore, the plaintiffs cannot make the necessary showing to bring their § 1983 malicious prosecution action. . . .As an initial matter, Heck makes clear that plaintiffs 'must' show that their convictions were terminated in one of four specific ways. . .Vacatur by settlement is not on the list, and the list is exclusive: Heck does not permit other, unidentified ways of satisfying the favorable-termination requirement. . . Thus, any attempt to recognize additional means of favorable termination is contrary to Supreme Court precedent. . . Moreover, recognizing vacatur by settlement as another method of favorable termination is contrary to Heck's reliance on the common-law cause of action for malicious prosecution, which was the Court's 'starting point' for determining the viability of a § 1983 claim. . . The common law did not recognize vacatur by settlement as a method of favorable termination: For over a century, courts have recognized that a claim for malicious prosecution does not lie if the prosecution was abandoned based on a settlement or compromise. . . . In sum, the majority has no authority to recognize a new means of favorable termination; Heck's list is exclusive. . . And even if the majority could recognize new means of favorable termination, vacatur by settlement is not a favorable termination at common law, so there is no basis for deeming it a method of favorable termination here. . . .Simply stated, the plaintiffs did not have their prior convictions 'declared invalid by a state tribunal authorized to make such determination,'. . . but instead reached an agreement with the state to vacate their convictions. Regardless of the plaintiffs' reasons for doing so, they cannot now claim that the prior convictions were terminated in a manner that provides a basis for bringing § 1983 malicious prosecution claims. In holding otherwise, the majority casts aside the favorable-termination rule articulated by Heck v. Humphrey and thus is inconsistent with Supreme Court precedent. Accordingly, I dissent.")

See also Roberts v. City of Fairbanks, 962 F.3d 1165, 1166-67, 1175 (9th Cir. 2020) (VanDyke, J., joined by Ikuta, J., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) ("The split panel decision in this case created an additional exception to the Heck bar that, as far as I can tell, is unprecedented—not only in our circuit, but across the federal courts. It did so by reinterpreting Heck's favorable termination requirement into something less than even a neutral termination requirement. In doing so, it expressly refused to apply the 'hoary principle[s]' adopted from the malicious prosecution context that were the express basis for the majority's decision in Heck. . . Now, in every situation where a criminal defendant's conviction is ministerially vacated without any judicial determination that the conviction was actually 'invalid,' this new exception casts into doubt the Heck bar's applicability. This includes in the many states in our circuit that have statutes that automatically vacate some convictions once the defendant has served his sentence. Heck is a quarter-century old, and its better-established exceptions already bedevil federal courts across the country, including this one. The fact that no other court has conceived or applied the panel majority's new exception in over 25 years of applying Heck should be reason enough for this Court to rehear this case en banc before cracking this lid on Pandora's box. . . .In the face of controlling Supreme Court precedent, the split-panel majority in Roberts created a novel exception to reach a result inconsistent with Heck. We should have considered this inconsistency en banc before cementing it as binding precedent in our circuit. I respectfully dissent from the denial of rehearing en banc.")

Compare Owens v. Baltimore City State's Attorneys Office, 767 F.3d 379, 390-92 (4th Cir. 2014) ("Because the grant of a new trial does not trigger the limitations period for a malicious prosecution claim, the statute of limitations on Owens's § 1983 claims did not begin to run on the date he was granted a new trial. Instead, the operative limitations period began to run on the date a malicious prosecution claim became ripe at common law, i.e., the date on which the nolle prosequi was entered. It was only on this date that proceedings against Owens were favorably terminated in such manner that they could not be revived. Because Owens filed suit within three years of this date, the statute of limitations does not bar his present cause of action. . . .In sum, we take the Supreme Court at its word. We determine when the statute of limitations on a plaintiff's § 1983 claim begins to run by looking to the common-law tort most analogous to the plaintiff's claim. In general, the limitations period for common law torts commences when the plaintiff knows or has reason to know of his injury. But if the common law provides a 'distinctive rule' for determining the start date of the limitations period for the analogous tort, a court should consider this rule in determining when the limitations period for the plaintiff's claim begins to run. . . Application of this rule to Owens's claims sets the start of the limitations period at the date of the nolle prosequi. Because Owens filed suit within three years of this date, his claims were timely filed.") with Owens v. Baltimore City State's Attorneys Office, 767 F.3d 379, 404-07 (4th Cir. 2014) (Traxler, CJ, concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I concur in parts III, IV.A, and V of the majority opinion. However, I respectfully dissent from parts II and IV.B. First, I believe that Owens' Brady claims were untimely because they accrued when he discovered the exculpatory and impeaching evidence that had not been disclosed, not when the proceeding was subsequently terminated via entry of the nolle prosequi. Second, I would conclude that the district court correctly determined that the individual defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established in the spring of 1988 that a police officer's failure to disclose exculpatory evidence made the officer potentially liable for a violation of a criminal defendant's constitutional rights. . . .For a Brady claim, the plaintiff need only demonstrate 'that prejudice resulted from the suppression.'. . '[A] defendant's right to pre-trial disclosure under Brady is not conditioned on his ability to demonstrate that he would or even probably would prevail at trial if the evidence were disclosed, much less that he is in fact innocent.' [citing Poventud] Brady is meant to ensure a fair trial; '[t]he remedy for a Brady claim is therefore a new trial, as proof of the constitutional violation need not be at odds with [defendant's] guilt.'. . . Accordingly, I would conclude that the proceedings were 'favorably terminated' when Owens' conviction was vacated and he was granted a new trial on June 7, 2007. The Brady violation was complete; 'the harm the alleged Brady violation had done could not be affected by a retrial.'. . His claim was therefore ripe and, assuming he knew about the undisclosed exculpatory evidence in question at that point, the limitations period began running at that time. Alternatively, as previously noted, Owens at the latest was aware of the exculpatory evidence by June 11, 2008, when his attorney filed a motion to exclude that evidence at his retrial. Either way, Owens' claims are untimely.")

In Thompson v. Clark, 142 S. Ct. 1332 (2022), the Supreme Court resolved a split in the Circuits as to whether the "favorable termination" requirement for a Section 1983 malicious prosecution claim requires a disposition with an affirmative indication of innocence or whether favorable termination occurs so long as the criminal prosecution ends without a conviction. See Thompson v. Clark, 142 S. Ct. 1332, 1336-41 & n.2 (2022) ("The Courts of Appeals have split over how to apply the favorable termination requirement of the Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983 for malicious prosecution. In addition to the Second Circuit, some other Courts of Appeals have held that a favorable termination requires some affirmative indication of innocence. See, e.g., Kossler v. Crisanti, 564 F.3d 181, 187 (CA3 2009) (en banc); Cordova v. Albuquerque, 816 F.3d 645, 649 (CA10 2016). By contrast, the Eleventh Circuit has held that a favorable termination occurs so long as the criminal prosecution ends without a conviction. See Laskar v. Hurd, 972 F.3d 1278, 1282 (2020). This Court granted certiorari to resolve the split. . . . In this case, Thompson sued several police officers under § 1983, alleging that he was 'maliciously prosecuted' without probable cause and that he was seized as a result. . . He brought a Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983 for malicious prosecution, sometimes referred to as a claim for unreasonable seizure pursuant to legal process. This Court's precedents recognize such a claim. See Manuel v. Joliet, 580 U.S. 357, 363–364, 367–368, 137 S.Ct. 911, 197 L.Ed.2d 312 (2017); Albright v. Oliver, 510 U.S. 266, 271, 114 S.Ct. 807, 127 L.Ed.2d 114 (1994) (plurality opinion); see also id., at 290–291, 114 S.Ct. 807 (Souter, J., concurring in judgment). And following this Court's precedents, the District Courts and Courts of Appeals have decided numerous cases involving Fourth Amendment claims under § 1983 for malicious prosecution. [collecting cases] . . . . The narrow dispute in this case concerns one element of the Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983 for malicious prosecution. To determine the elements of a constitutional claim under § 1983, this Court's practice is to first look to the elements of the most analogous tort as of 1871 when § 1983 was enacted, so long as doing so is consistent with 'the values and purposes of the constitutional right at issue.'. . . Because this claim is housed in the Fourth Amendment, the plaintiff also has to prove that the malicious prosecution resulted in a seizure of the plaintiff. . . [fn.2: It has been argued that the Due Process Clause could be an appropriate analytical home for a malicious prosecution claim under § 1983. . . If so, the plaintiff presumably would not have to prove that he was seized as a result of the malicious prosecution. But we have no occasion to consider such an argument here.] . . . . Because the American tort-law consensus as of 1871 did not require a plaintiff in a malicious prosecution suit to show that his prosecution ended with an affirmative indication of innocence, we similarly construe the Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983 for malicious prosecution. Doing so is consistent, moreover, with 'the values and purposes' of the Fourth Amendment. . . The question of whether a criminal defendant was wrongly charged does not logically depend on whether the prosecutor or court explained why the prosecution was dismissed. And the individual's ability to seek redress for a wrongful prosecution cannot reasonably turn on the fortuity of whether the prosecutor or court happened to explain why the charges were dismissed. In addition, requiring the plaintiff to show that his prosecution ended with an affirmative indication of innocence would paradoxically foreclose a § 1983 claim when the government's case was weaker and dismissed without explanation before trial, but allow a claim when the government's evidence was substantial enough to proceed to trial. That would make little sense. Finally, requiring a plaintiff to show that his prosecution ended with an affirmative indication of innocence is not necessary to protect officers from unwarranted civil suits—among other things, officers are still protected by the requirement that the plaintiff show the absence of probable cause and by qualified immunity. In sum, we hold that a Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983 for malicious prosecution does not require the plaintiff to show that the criminal prosecution ended with some affirmative indication of innocence. A plaintiff need only show that the criminal prosecution ended without a conviction. Thompson has satisfied that requirement here. We express no view, however, on additional questions that may be relevant on remand, including whether Thompson was ever seized as a result of the alleged malicious prosecution, whether he was charged without probable cause, and whether respondent is entitled to qualified immunity. On remand, the Second Circuit or the District Court as appropriate may consider those and other pertinent questions. We reverse the judgment of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.").

But see Thompson v. Clark, 142 S. Ct. 1332, 1341-47 (2022) (Alito, J., joined by Thomas, J., and Gorsuch, J., dissenting) ("[T]his Court has never held that the Fourth Amendment houses a malicious-prosecution claim, and the Court defends its analogy with just two sentences of independent analysis and a reference to a body of lower court cases. I cannot agree with that approach. The Court's independent analysis of this important question is far too cursory, and its reliance on lower court cases is particularly ill-advised here because that body of case law appears to have been heavily influenced by a mistaken reading of the plurality opinion in Albright v. Oliver, 510 U.S. 266, 114 S.Ct. 807, 127 L.Ed.2d 114 (1994). What the Court has done is to recognize a novel hybrid claim of uncertain scope that has no basis in the Constitution and is almost certain to lead to confusion. . . .The Court asserts that malicious prosecution is the common-law tort that is most analogous to petitioner's Fourth Amendment claim, ante, at ——, but in fact the Fourth Amendment and malicious prosecution have almost nothing in common. . . . The Court does not make a serious effort to justify its analogy between unreasonable seizure and malicious prosecution. Instead, the Court largely relies on the fact that 'most of the Courts of Appeals to consider the question' have drawn that analogy, ante, at ——, but the Court ignores contrary lower court authority. See, e.g., Manuel v. Joliet, 903 F.3d 667, 670 (CA7 2018); Jones v. Clark County, 959 F.3d 748, 776–777 (CA6 2020) (Murphy, J., concurring in part); Pagan-Gonzalez v. Moreno,

919 F.3d 582, 608–617 (CA1 2019) (BARRON, J., concurring). But in any event, we should not decide this important question without independent analysis, and the Court's own cursory analysis is erroneous. The Court claims that the 'gravamen' of petitioner's Fourth Amendment claim is the same as that of a malicious-prosecution claim: the 'wrongful initiation of charges without probable cause.'. . But what the Court describes is not a Fourth Amendment violation at all. As explained, that Amendment protects against 'unreasonable searches and seizures'—not the unreasonable 'initiation of charges.'. . .Instead of clarifying the law regarding § 1983 malicious-prosecution claims, today's decision, I fear, will sow more confusion. The Court endorses a Fourth Amendment claim for malicious prosecution that appears to have the following elements: (1) the defendant 'initiat[ed]' charges against the plaintiff in a way that was 'wrongful' and 'without probable cause,' (2) the 'malicious prosecution resulted in a seizure of the plaintiff,' and (3) the prosecution must not have ended in conviction. . . This tort has no precedent in Fourth Amendment law. It is markedly different from the common-law tort of malicious prosecution, and its dimensions are uncertain. First, it is not clear why this tort requires both a seizure and a prosecution. As noted, the two do not always go together, and if the aim is to permit the victims of malicious prosecution to sue under § 1983, it is not clear why detention should be required. While pretrial detention certainly increases the harm inflicted by a malicious prosecution, such a prosecution can be very damaging even if the victim is never detained. . . The majority's only answer to the question why the claim requires a seizure is that it is 'housed in the Fourth Amendment,'. . . but that response begs the antecedent question whether the Fourth Amendment houses a malicious-prosecution suit at all. Second, where the person bringing suit under § 1983 is arrested and then prosecuted, it is not clear whether both the arrest and the prosecution must have been done without probable cause and without a legitimate law enforcement purpose. An arrest made without probable cause may be followed by a prosecution based on new evidence that clearly establishes probable cause. And by the same token, the evidence that establishes probable cause at the time of arrest may be thoroughly discredited at some point well before the termination of a prosecution. Third and most important, it is not clear what the Court means when it says that the 'gravamen' of the claim is 'wrongful initiation of charges without probable cause.'. . Since the Court refers repeatedly to 'malicious prosecution,' one might think that this requires a guilty mental state, but in a footnote, the Court raises the possibility that the constitutional tort it recognizes may require nothing more than the absence of probable cause. . . If that turns out to be so, it is hard to see even the slightest connection between the Court's new tort and common-law malicious prosecution. Malice is the hallmark of a malicious-prosecution claim. Even if a prosecution is brought and maintained without probable cause, a malicious-prosecution claim cannot succeed without proof of malice. . . And if the Court's new tort has nothing to do with malicious prosecution, what possible reason can there be for borrowing that tort's favorable-termination element? . . . Instead of creating a new hybrid claim, we should simply hold that a malicious-prosecution claim may not be brought under the Fourth Amendment. Such a holding would not leave a person in petitioner's situation without legal protection. Petitioner brought Fourth Amendment claims against respondents for false arrest, excessive force, and unlawful entry, but after trial a jury ruled against him on all those claims. . . Petitioner could have also sought relief under state law. . . New York law appears to recognize a malicious-prosecution tort with an element very much like the favorable-termination element that the Court adopts today, . . . but petitioner chose not to bring such a claim. For these reasons, I would affirm the judgment below, and I therefore respectfully dissent.")

See also Barnes v. City of New York, 68 F.4th 123, 126, 128 (2d Cir. 2023) ("We agree with the district court's dismissal with respect to all of the federal claims alleged by Barnes except for the dismissal of his due process claim based on the use of fabricated evidence as to the drug sale charge of which he was acquitted. Specifically, the district court erred in concluding that because Barnes was arrested, detained, prosecuted, and convicted for drug possession simultaneous to the drug sale proceedings, this precludes, as a matter of law, his ability to plead a deprivation of liberty caused by the drug sale prosecution. Because the prosecution of an individual based on fabricated evidence may itself constitute a deprivation of liberty for purposes of the due process right to a fair trial, Barnes was not required to show that his drug sale prosecution resulted in additional custody or a conviction in order to sufficiently allege a claim at the pleading stage. . . . Barnes's malicious prosecution claim as to the drug sale charge was properly dismissed. However, we affirm the dismissal on a different ground than that relied upon by the district court, which held that Barnes failed to show a deprivation of liberty caused by the drug sale charge, given his contemporaneous detention and conviction on the drug possession charge. Malicious prosecution claims sound in the Fourth Amendment, which proscribes the 'wrongful initiation of charges without probable cause.' Thompson v. Clark, —— U.S. ——, 142 S. Ct. 1332, 1337, 212 L.Ed.2d 382 (2022). '[A] Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983 for malicious prosecution requires the plaintiff to show a favorable termination of the underlying criminal case against him.'. . . Here, although Barnes was acquitted of the drug sale charge, he was convicted of the drug possession charge. He thus cannot allege a favorable termination of his criminal proceedings for purposes of his malicious prosecution claim. See DiBlasio v. City of New York, 102 F.3d 654, 658–59 (2d Cir. 1996) (affirming dismissal of malicious prosecution cause of action where defendant was acquitted of criminal sale of a controlled substance but convicted of criminal possession of a controlled substance). We accordingly affirm the dismissal of Barnes's malicious prosecution claim because he cannot show that his 'criminal prosecution ended without a conviction.'"); Alburg v. Jones, No. 21-2580, 2023 WL 2823895, at * n.13 (3d Cir. Apr. 7, 2023) (not reported) ("Thompson abrogated Kossler's holding that a favorable termination requires an affirmative indication of innocence and held that a plaintiff only needs to show that the prosecution ended without a conviction to establish a favorable termination. . . Thompson did not address whether a proceeding can ever terminate in a plaintiff's favor when the prosecution did not end without a conviction on every charge. Kossler left open the possibility that even when a plaintiff is convicted on one charge but not the other, a court may still hold that the criminal proceeding favorably terminated if the charged offenses 'contained distinct statutory requirements' and 'aimed to punish two different sets of conduct.'"); Shrum v. Cooke, 60 F.4th 1304, 1310–11 (10th Cir. 2023) ("A § 1983 malicious prosecution claim includes five elements, with this argument turning on the second element: (1) the defendant caused the plaintiff's continued confinement or prosecution; (2) the original action terminated in favor of the plaintiff; (3) no probable cause supported the arrest, confinement, or prosecution; (4) the defendant acted maliciously; and (5) the plaintiff sustained damages. . .Under our precedent, a prosecutor's dismissal, without more, did not constitute favorable termination. . . Instead, we required that the prosecution was terminated for reasons tending to indicate the accused's innocence. . . An example of this is when a prosecutor enters a nolle prosqui (a voluntary dismissal of criminal charges) after deciding he cannot prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. But if an official concludes a prosecution out of mercy for the accused, for instance, the termination did not indicate the accused's innocence. The district court correctly found under our existing precedent that Shrum's prosecution did not terminate in a manner that indicated his innocence. After the judgment below the Supreme Court clarified the meaning of 'favorable termination.' The Court found that a criminal prosecution terminates favorably, for the purposes of a § 1983 malicious prosecution claim, when the prosecution ends without a conviction. Thompson v. Clark, —— U.S. ——, 142 S. Ct. 1332, 1335, 212 L.Ed.2d 382 (2022). . . . As a result, our precedents applying the favorable termination element are no longer good law. The district court therefore erred in granting dismissal on this ground."); Smith v. City of Chicago, No. 19-2725, 2022 WL 2752603, at *1–2 (7th Cir. July 14, 2022) (not reported) ("This case returns to this court on remand from the Supreme Court of the United States. Keith Smith sued the City of Chicago and two of its police officers under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for violating the Fourth Amendment. In 2013, Chicago Police Officers stopped a car in which Smith, a felon, was a passenger. A search of the car revealed a firearm—evidence used at a probable-cause hearing to secure Smith's detention for felon-in-possession charges. He spent seven months in jail until being released on bond in 2014. After a bench trial in 2016, a judge acquitted Smith on all charges. Smith filed a civil complaint in 2018 challenging the search of the car, claiming the officers fabricated their reports. The district court dismissed Smith's lawsuit as untimely under the applicable two-year statute of limitations. Smith appealed, and we focused our analysis on when Smith's claim accrued. . . Ultimately, we measured timeliness from Smith's release on bond, . . . so we affirmed the district court's dismissal of Smith's claim. . . In May of this year, the Court granted Smith's petition for a writ of certiorari and vacated this case's judgment in light of Thompson v. Clark, 142 S. Ct. 1132 (2022). The parties submitted Circuit Rule 54 statements addressing Thompson's effect. We have considered those statements and the Thompson decision, and we agree with the parties that Thompson dictates a result opposite to our 2021 opinion. After Thompson, a Fourth Amendment claim for malicious prosecution accrues when the underlying criminal prosecution is terminated without a conviction. . . Here, that was Smith's acquittal date, so his claim was timely. In its Circuit Rule 54 statement, though, the City seeks summary affirmance on alternative grounds. Noting that lack of probable cause is also an element of a Fourth Amendment malicious prosecution claim, . . . the City argues Smith admitted in his petition for a writ of certiorari that on the day he was arrested, a firearm was found in the vehicle in which he was a passenger. This admission, the City asserts, shows that officers had probable cause to arrest Smith and thus extinguishes his Fourth Amendment claim. The City's assertion is odd, and ultimately beside the point. Smith's claim does not turn on whether officers discovered a firearm. Rather, Smith's theory is that law enforcement fabricated a story to justify an unlawful search, and had that search never occurred, law enforcement would have lacked probable cause to arrest and detain him. In other words, Smith contends his seven-month detention (after a probable-cause hearing) was unreasonable because it was based on illegally seized evidence knowingly tendered by the defendant police officers. In other words, legal process has been commenced against the defendant in a way that amounts to an unreasonable seizure under the Fourth Amendment. So, we reject the City's argument that Smith has not presented a Fourth Amendment claim. Therefore, we REVERSE the district court's judgment and REMAND this case to the district court for further proceedings. Smith's corresponding conspiracy and Monell claims may also be considered on remand."); Coello v. DiLeo, 43 F.4th 346, 354-55 (3d Cir. 2022) ("We have little trouble concluding that Coello's § 1983 claims fall in Heck's sphere. At bottom, they allege that her criminal proceedings were begun and conducted unlawfully and without probable cause, resulting in her wrongful conviction. . . . They are, like Heck's claims, most akin to the tort of malicious prosecution. . . Moreover, we see 'no logical way to reconcile [her] claims with a valid conviction,'. . . which means they could not have accrued unless and until Coello's state criminal proceedings were resolved in her favor[.]. .So when, if ever, did Coello's state criminal proceedings favorably end, thereby triggering the two-year filing deadline? Heck did not clarify what it means for a criminal prosecution to end in the § 1983 claimant's favor. In the past, however, we have held that the favorable-termination requirement is met only if the underlying criminal case concludes in a way that affirmatively 'indicate[s] the plaintiff's innocence.'. . But our inquiry has since become simpler. In Thompson v. Clark, the Supreme Court fleshed out the meaning of 'favorable termination' in the context of a Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983 for malicious prosecution. . . Looking to the way American courts interpreted that tort in 1871 (when the Civil Rights Act was enacted), it explained that a malicious prosecution claim could typically move forward merely by a showing that the plaintiff's criminal case ended with no conviction. . . No affirmative indication of innocence was necessary back then; neither, said the Court, is it necessary today. . . Thompson thus abrogated our decision in Kossler and, in the process, streamlined our favorable-termination analysis. A § 1983 claim sounding in malicious prosecution accrues when 'the prosecution terminate[s] without a conviction.'. .Accordingly, because Coello's § 1983 claims sound in malicious prosecution, we hold that the favorable-termination requirement was met on February 26, 2018, when the state court vacated her criminal conviction. We make no inquiry into whether her post-conviction proceedings suggest her innocence of the underlying charges. Coello brought this suit within two years of that date; so, under Heck's deferred-accrual rule, her § 1983 claims were timely. The Linden Defendants, while declining to engage directly with Heck or its progeny, offer one argument in opposition. They contend that Coello's 'unexplained' delay in applying for post-conviction relief 'renders her claims untimely.'. . But if Heck's deferred-accrual rule applies, then Coello's § 1983 claims did not exist until her conviction was vacated; thus they could not be deemed untimely by any delay in seeking post-conviction relief. Read more charitably, the Linden Defendants ask us to impose a new rule cabining a plaintiff's ability to use Heck to overcome a statute-of-limitations defense: if a plaintiff waits too long to fulfill the prerequisite for claim accrual under Heck—that is, waits too long to get her conviction reversed, invalidated, expunged, etc.—she forfeits any civil claims that may accrue on favorable termination. In support, they refer us only to general principles underlying statutory limitations periods, such as the need to create 'stability in human affairs' and 'induce litigants to pursue their claims diligently so that answering parties will have a fair opportunity to defend.'. . While we acknowledge that it could well prove harder to defend a § 1983 action that accrues long after the events underlying the plaintiff's claims have passed, we see no need at this time to complicate further our Heck inquiry by imposing the abstract diligence requirement suggested. Thus our only option is to reverse the dismissal of Coello's § 1983 claims and remand for further proceedings.")

See also Burnam v. Weld County Sheriffs, No. 23-CV-00151-NYW-NRN, 2024 WL 1051949, at *11 (D. Colo. Mar. 11, 2024) (" 'Thompson did not address whether a proceeding can ever terminate in a plaintiff's favor when the prosecution did not end without a conviction on every charge.' Alburg v. Jones, No. 21-2580, 2023 WL 2823895, at *3 n.13 (3d Cir. Apr. 7, 2023). Post-Thompson, a small number of courts have considered whether the disposal of a criminal proceeding pursuant to a plea agreement, wherein a defendant agrees to plead guilty to some charges in exchange for the dismissal of others, amounts to a favorable termination. Based on the Court's research, the weight of authority concludes that such a scenario does not constitute a favorable termination. [collecting cases] Indeed, if criminal charges are dismissed pursuant to a guilty plea which results in the defendant's conviction of at least some charges, the prosecution did not end 'without a conviction.'. . Here, the state court dockets reflect that the criminal charges against Mr. Burnam were consolidated and treated as one criminal prosecution. Mr. Burnam ultimately entered guilty pleas with respect to two charges—and was convicted of those charges— in exchange for the dismissal of the remaining charges against him. Although Mr. Burnam argues that the charges to which he pleaded guilty were 'unrelated to the events and aftermath of December 9th 2020,'. . . there has already been a state-court judicial determination that the subject charges against Mr. Burnam were 'of the same or similar character and were tied to a single scheme and plan,'. . . and the Court cannot disturb this ruling. Accordingly, Mr. Burnam cannot 'show that the criminal prosecution ended without a conviction,' as required by Thompson . . . and he therefore cannot state a malicious prosecution claim."); Mueller v. Walmart Stores East, LP, No. 1:21-CV-04273-VMC, 2023 WL 5742544, at *8 n.16 (N.D. Ga. July 26, 2023) ("The Court has refused to consider Mr. Mueller's arguments regarding claims under Section 1983 above because they were raised in a surreply. But even to the extent that Mr. Mueller could somehow overcome the state action requirement to bring a claim for malicious prosecution against Defendants under Section 1983, such a claim would likely fail for the same reasons as his state law claims did. In response, Mr. Mueller points to the Supreme Court's decision in Thompson v. Clark, 142 S. Ct. 1332, 1341 (2022) which held that 'a Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983 for malicious prosecution does not require the plaintiff to show that the criminal prosecution ended with some affirmative indication of innocence. A plaintiff need only show that the criminal prosecution ended without a conviction.' However, 'Thompson did not directly address proceedings involving multiple charges where some resulted in the plaintiff's conviction and others were dismissed. The court is not persuaded that the application of Thompson to such cases permits a § 1983 claim for malicious prosecution where the charges are related and arise from the same course of conduct conceded by the plaintiff's guilty plea.' Grainger v. Buckhannon, No. 8:22-CV-00354-JMC, 2022 WL 2168079, at *3 (D.S.C. June 15, 2022); see also Hefner v. Jones, No. 1:21-CV-00227-MR, 2022 WL 1598798, at *3 (W.D.N.C. May 19, 2022) (expressing doubt as to whether "Thompson extends to the situation where the charge in question was dismissed as part of a plea agreement whereby the defendant pled guilty to other charges.").); Thompson v. Clark, 673 F.Supp.3d 261, 267-73

(E.D.N.Y. 2023) ("In remanding the case, the Supreme Court did not hold that Plaintiff had prevailed on his malicious prosecution claim or that the claim required a new trial and instead 'remand[ed] for further proceedings consistent with [its] opinion.'. . In doing so, the Court described several additional issues of fact and law that potentially remained relevant to Plaintiff's malicious prosecution claim on remand, 'including whether [Plaintiff] was ever seized as a result of the alleged malicious prosecution, whether he was charged without probable cause, and whether [Defendant] is entitled to qualified immunity.'. . The Court said that 'the Second Circuit or the District Court as appropriate may consider those and other pertinent questions.'. . .Both of the crimes with which Plaintiff was charged, OGA and resisting arrest, are Class A misdemeanors under New York law and, therefore, each subjected Plaintiff to potential punishment of the same magnitude. As in Coleman, Plaintiff 'was released without bail after his arraignment,' and the only deprivation of his liberty was his 'ongoing requirement of appearing in court.'. . This restraint on Plaintiff's liberty would have occurred if Plaintiff had been charged with only OGA, a charge that was indisputably based on probable cause for the reasons explained above. As a result, even if there was no probable cause to charge Plaintiff with resisting arrest, he suffered no additional deprivation of his liberty because of that charge."); Bentler v. Nederostek, No. CV 3:22-1107, 2023 WL 3510822, at *4-5 (M.D. Pa. May 17, 2023) ("The court agrees with the Third Circuit panel in Alburg that Kossler's favorable termination analysis as applied to cases where the plaintiff's underlying prosecution did not end without a conviction on every charge remains intact post-*Thompson.*As indicated above, Kossler's favorable termination analysis prescribes a two-part inquiry to determine whether the plaintiff's criminal prosecution terminated in his favor when he was convicted of some but not all charges. First, we examine the relevant criminal statutes on their face to discern their legal relationship—i.e., we ask whether the offenses of conviction and acquittal involved lesser-included offenses or shared common elements. . . Second, we review the underlying facts of the case—which, for purposes of a motion to dismiss, we draw from the complaint—to determine whether the charges Bentler was convicted of were predicated on the same factual basis as the charges of which he was acquitted. . . If the charges Bentler was convicted of sought to punish the same underlying conduct as the charges of which he was acquitted, then the underlying criminal proceeding cannot be said to have terminated in his favor. But if the charged offenses 'contained distinct statutory requirements' and 'aimed to punish two different sets of conduct,' then acquittal on some of the charges may constitute favorable termination. . . . [T]he court finds that Bentler's charges of attempted murder of a police officer were predicated on the same factual basis as the charges of aggravated assault. A review of the facts alleged in Bentler's complaint reveals the attempted murder of police officer and aggravated assault charges all stemmed from the short, tense interaction between Bentler and law enforcement at the boat launch. . . . Since he was convicted of aggravated assault, the jury ultimately found beyond a reasonable doubt that Bentler 'attempt[ed] by physical menace to put any [police officer], while in the performance of duty, in fear of imminent serious bodily injury.' . . That the judge granted a judgment of acquittal for Bentler on the charges of attempted murder of a law enforcement officer—whether it was because there was not sufficient evidence to show Bentler intended to kill the officers, or whether there was not sufficient evidence to show Bentler's actions did not constitute a 'substantial step' towards a killing, or for some other reason, the Complaint does not

explain—does not take the criminal prosecution as a whole outside the ambit of Kossler and its progeny, which preclude a finding of favorable termination on this record. . . Therefore, since the aggravated assault convictions preclude a finding of favorable termination of Bentler's criminal proceeding, the court will dismiss Bentler's malicious prosecution claim. Dismissal will be without prejudice since Bentler's convictions remain on appeal, and thus it is still possible for Bentler's criminal proceeding to terminate favorably should his convictions be disrupted and the prosecution end."); Reeder v. Vine, No. 6:20-CV-06026 EAW, 2023 WL 2044126, at *8–9 (W.D.N.Y. Feb. 16, 2023) (Wolford, C.J.) ("'To demonstrate a favorable termination of a criminal prosecution for purposes of the Fourth Amendment claim under § 1983 for malicious prosecution, a plaintiff need only show that his prosecution ended without a conviction.' Thompson, 142 S. Ct. at 1335. 'The favorable termination requirement serves multiple purposes: (i) it avoids parallel litigation in civil and criminal proceedings over the issues of probable cause and guilt; (ii) it precludes inconsistent civil and criminal judgments where a claimant could succeed in the tort action after having been convicted in the criminal case; and (iii) it prevents civil suits from being improperly used as collateral attacks on criminal proceedings.'. . In Thompson, the Supreme Court rejected the argument that a favorable termination for purposes of a malicious prosecution claim requires the plaintiff to 'show that his prosecution ended with some affirmative indication of innocence.'. . Here, Plaintiff was convicted in Seneca County Court of criminal possession of a controlled substance in the seventh degree after a bench trial. Plaintiff appealed his conviction to the New York Appellate Division Fourth Department, and his conviction was affirmed. . . Thus, the matter was not favorably resolved in Plaintiff's favor. The fact that Plaintiff was acquitted of the charge for possession of a controlled substance with intent to sell but convicted of the lesser offense does not change this conclusion. DiBlasio v. City of New York, 102 F.3d 654, 659 (2d Cir. 1996) (affirming dismissal of malicious prosecution claim where plaintiff was convicted of lesser included offense of unlawful possession of cocaine). . . . Plaintiff argues that he nonetheless meets the requisite standard in light of the fact that the Ontario County indictment was dismissed, which Plaintiff characterizes as a dismissal 'in the plaintiff's favor for lack of evidence.'. . However, the judge dismissing the indictment expressly stated that the dismissal was a result of a prosecutor's grand jury instruction error, and specifically noted that the dismissal was with leave to re-present. . . Thus Plaintiff's characterization is facially inaccurate. That the prosecutor opted not to re-present the charges to the grand jury and allow the Seneca County charges to go forward instead does not conclusively constitute a favorable termination of the September 2017 charges, particularly in light of how intertwined the two proceedings were, though the Court need not resolve that question on the instant motion because as discussed below, the claim fails for other independent reasons. . . . [E]ven were the Court to conclude that Plaintiff could show a favorable termination, he cannot satisfy the requirement to show a lack of probable cause."); In re Watts Coordinated Pretrial Proceedings, No. 19-CV-1717, 2022 WL 9468253, at *4 n.8 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 14, 2022) ("As discussed in more detail in the Opinion addressing Defendants' motion to dismiss the complaints filed by Plaintiffs represented by the Loevy Firm, the Supreme Court recently confirmed that the Fourth Amendment housed a 'malicious prosecution claim.' Thompson v. Clark, 142 S. Ct. 1332, 1337 (2022). As another court in this District has recently found, the Supreme Court overruled Seventh Circuit precedent that 'a plaintiff subject to a prosecution in Illinois could not bring a malicious prosecution claim under the Fourth or the Fourteenth Amendments ... as to the Fourth Amendment, but not the Fourteenth Amendment.' Navarro v. City of Aurora, 2022 WL 1988990, at *2 (N.D. Ill. June 6, 2022) (internal citations omitted).")

Compare Laskar v. Hurd, 972 F.3d 1278, 1282, 1285-86, 1289-95 (11th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 1667 (2022) ("The main issue in this appeal is whether the dismissal of a prosecution as untimely satisfies the favorable-termination element of a claim for malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment. . . .The officials argue that Laskar did not receive a favorable termination. They explain that several of our sister circuits define favorable terminations as those that 'indicate the innocence of the accused.' [collecting cases] Laskar cannot satisfy the favorable-termination element, they contend, because the trial court dismissed the prosecution against him as untimely, which does not suggest that he was innocent of the charges facing him. This argument requires us to decide whether a termination must contain evidence of a plaintiff's innocence to be favorable. We have held that a claim of malicious prosecution accrues when the prosecution against the plaintiff terminates in his favor. . . We have also held that a prosecutor's unilateral dismissal of charges against a plaintiff constitutes a favorable termination. . . But the details of the favorable-termination requirement, including whether a termination must suggest a plaintiff's innocence, otherwise remain unsettled. This question implicates our 'two-step approach to "defining the contours and prerequisites of a § 1983 claim."'. . We must first look to the common-law principles that were 'well settled' when Congress enacted section 1983. . . 'After identifying the relevant common-law rule, we must consider whether that rule is compatible with the constitutional provision at issue.'. .Because the tort of malicious prosecution is the common-law analogue to the constitutional violation that Laskar alleges, . . . we examine the favorable-termination element of malicious prosecution as it existed when Congress enacted section 1983 in 1871. We then consider whether the relevant common-law rule is compatible with the Fourth Amendment. . . . In the light of this history, we have no trouble discerning a well-settled principle of law to guide our analysis. Although States disputed whether a prosecution could terminate without a court order, every State to reach the issue other than Rhode Island agreed that a prosecution terminated when a court formally dismissed the prosecution and discharged the plaintiff. And the vast majority of courts to consider the favorable-termination requirement either adopted standards that excluded considering the merits of the underlying prosecution or held that particular terminations that did not evidence plaintiffs' innocence could satisfy the requirement. Indeed, outside of Rhode Island, the only final terminations that would bar a plaintiff's suit were those that were inconsistent with a plaintiff's innocence—that is, if a jury convicted the plaintiff or if the plaintiff compromised with his accuser to end the prosecution in a way that conceded his guilt. So we can readily discern from that consensus the following principle: a formal end to a prosecution in a manner not inconsistent with a plaintiff's innocence is a favorable termination. . . . In sum, whether a particular termination affirmatively supported a plaintiff's innocence was not material to the favorable-termination element in the vast majority of States. As common-law courts on both sides of the Atlantic stressed, a termination on technical grounds did not cure the harm that malicious prosecution caused. . . Instead, the favorable-termination requirement prevented plaintiffs from using the tort to collaterally attack ongoing criminal proceedings or unfavorable terminations. . . And under prevailing standards, a plaintiff could satisfy the favorable-termination element of malicious prosecution by proving that a court formally ended the prosecution in a manner that was not inconsistent with his innocence. Because section 1983 is not merely 'a federalized amalgamation of pre-existing common-law claims,'. . . we must determine whether this common-law understanding comports with relevant constitutional principles[.] . . Here, nothing in the Fourth Amendment supports departing from the weight of the common law. A claim of malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment is only 'shorthand' for a claim of deprivation of liberty pursuant to legal process, so the validity of these claims depends on whether the seizure was justified, not whether the prosecution itself was justified[.] . . That question almost always turns on whether the judicial officer who authorized the seizure had sufficient information before him to support the seizure. . . Conversely, limiting favorable terminations to those that affirmatively support a plaintiff's innocence redirects the focus to whether the entire prosecution was justified. In other words, the 'indication-of-innocence' approach to favorable terminations considers the wrong body of information. . . The Fourth Amendment does not require plaintiffs to support their innocence with such a narrow, inapposite source of evidence. Because 'the Fourth Amendment protects against "searches" and "seizures" (and not "prosecutions"),'. . . the favorable-termination requirement functions as a rule of accrual, not as a criterion for determining whether a constitutional violation occurred. Indeed, we have never considered the requirement outside of the accrual context. . . In the light of this limited role, the favorable-termination requirement will bar a suit for malicious prosecution only when the prosecution remains ongoing or terminates in a way that precludes any finding that the plaintiff was innocent of the charges that justified his seizure—that is, when the prosecution ends in the plaintiff's conviction on or admission of guilt to each charge that justified his seizure. . . In other words, a plaintiff can satisfy the favorable-termination requirement by proving that the prosecution against him formally ended in a manner not inconsistent with his innocence on at least one charge that authorized his confinement. . . . We acknowledge that our conclusion departs from the consensus of our sister circuits, but we do not agree with the dissent that these decisions should alter our conclusion. To start, the dissent miscounts the circuits that have adopted the indication-of-innocence approach to claims of malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment. Although seven circuits have done so, [citing cases,] the dissent erroneously relies on decisions applying state or local tort law to conclude that the Fifth, Seventh, and District of Columbia Circuits followed suit. See Lemoine v. Wolfe, 812 F.3d 477, 479 (5th Cir. 2016) (applying Louisiana tort law); Logan v. Caterpillar, Inc., 246 F.3d 912, 925 (7th Cir. 2001) (applying Illinois tort law); Whelan v. Abell, 953 F.2d 663, 669 (D.C. Cir. 1992) (applying D.C. tort law). Indeed, the Seventh Circuit has held that a Fourth Amendment claim for unlawful pretrial detention does not require any favorable termination. See Manuel, 903 F.3d at 670. More importantly, when considering the decisions of our sister circuits, '[w]e are not merely to count noses. The parties are entitled to our independent judgment.'. . And the justification that our sister circuits offered for the consensus view is unpersuasive. Each circuit to embrace the indication-of-innocence approach grounded its decision in a comment in the Restatement (Second) of Torts or the modern decisions of States that adopted that comment. . . . It is far from clear that the Second Restatement reflects even a modern consensus. See Restatement (Third) of Torts: Liability for Economic Harm § 23 cmt. a & n.a (Am. L. Inst. 2020)

(acknowledging a split in authority, rejecting the indication-of-innocence requirement, and endorsing a "not-inconsistent-with-innocence" approach). Indeed, two of the three states in this Circuit, including the one in which Laskar's seizure and prosecution occurred, do not require an indication of innocence. Compare Vadner v. Dickerson, 441 S.E.2d 527, 528 (Ga. Ct. App. 1994) (holding that a dismissal on jurisdictional grounds is a favorable termination if the prosecutor does not recommence the prosecution), and Kroger Co. v. Puckett, 351 So. 2d 582, 585–86 (Ala. Civ. App. 1977) (rejecting the approach in the Second Restatement (citing Adams, 32 So. 503)), with Alamo Rent-A-Car, Inc. v. Mancusi, 632 So. 2d 1352, 1356 (Fla. 1994) (requiring a termination "that indicates the innocence of the accused"). Setting this issue aside, modern common law is not the touchstone when defining a claim under section 1983. '[T]he Supreme Court has clarified that the relevant common-law principles are those that were "well settled at the time of section 1983's enactment."'. . Although the Restatements and modern treatises often reflect ancient legal principles, the indication-of-innocence approach to favorable terminations has no such pedigree. And we cannot base our decision on common-law doctrines that developed long after Congress enacted section 1983. The dissent next faults us for attempting to 'square the tort of malicious prosecution with the Fourth Amendment,'. . . and we readily plead guilty to that charge. Although the dissent acknowledges that the Fourth Amendment does not neatly overlap with the tort of malicious prosecution, it nonetheless contends that we must adhere to the common law. . . This argument turns our approach to malicious prosecution on its head. Our oldest decisions on the subject explained that 'malicious prosecution' is only a 'shorthand way of describing' certain claims for unlawful seizure, not an 'independent Fourth Amendment right ... to be free from a malicious prosecution.'. . . More recently, the Supreme Court has explained that '[c]ommon-law principles are meant to guide rather than to control the definition of § 1983 claims' and that we must 'closely attend' to the 'constitutional right at issue' when defining these claims. . . To give priority to the common law over the Fourth Amendment, we would need to depart from both our earliest decisions on the subject and the decisions of the Supreme Court. Of course, we cannot do so. Finally, the dissent highlights the ostensible policy benefits of the indication-of-innocence approach, such as the 'additional opportunity' it could create 'for courts to stop false claims' at the pleading stage instead of at summary judgment, . . . but we fail to see how the operation of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is relevant to our analysis of the Fourth Amendment. . . We must adhere to the clear commands of the law instead of favoring an alternative policy of judicial economy. . . We need not redefine the favorable-termination requirement to provide extra protection for defendants accused of malicious prosecution. The probable-cause requirement already limits meritless claims by placing the burden on the plaintiff to establish '(1) that the legal process justifying his seizure was constitutionally infirm and (2) that his seizure would not otherwise be justified without legal process.'. . On top of that, the plaintiff must overcome qualified immunity by proving that the absence of probable cause was clearly established. . . And a plaintiff seized without probable cause must prove he suffered an injury to recover compensatory damages for the specific charges he says were unfounded . . . After considering both the common law and Fourth Amendment, we hold that the favorable-termination element of malicious prosecution is not limited to terminations that affirmatively support the plaintiff's innocence. Instead, the favorable-termination element requires only that the criminal proceedings against the plaintiff formally end in a manner not inconsistent with his innocence on at least one charge that authorized his confinement. A formal end to criminal proceedings will satisfy this standard unless it precludes any finding that the plaintiff was innocent of the charges that justified his seizure, which occurs only when the prosecution ends in the plaintiff's conviction on or admission of guilt to each charge that justified his seizure. Because Laskar's complaint alleges that the prosecution against Laskar formally terminated and does not allege that he was convicted or that he admitted his guilt to each charge that justified his seizure, Laskar has alleged that he received a favorable termination.") with Laskar v. Hurd, 972 F.3d 1278, 1298-99, 1303-07 (11th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. ___ (2022) (Moore, J., Chief District Judge, dissenting) ("Today, the majority adopts a legal standard for the favorable termination element of a 42 U.S.C. § 1983 malicious prosecution claim that pushes us out-of-step with our sister circuits and requires the Court to depart from its well-founded opinion in Uboh v. Reno, 141 F.3d 1000 (11th Cir. 1998). The majority contends that (1) it is bound to reject the indication of innocence standard by a review of 'well-settled' common-law principles at the time of § 1983's passage, and (2) the majority's proposed standard better serves the constitutional concerns implicated by § 1983 and the Fourth Amendment. I dissent because there was no 'well-settled' common-law principle as to what was required of a malicious prosecution claimant to meet the favorable termination element in the late 19th century. Further, the rule adopted by majority is an inadequate filter for meritless claims. . . . Based on my own review of 19th century precedent, I respectfully disagree that there is a well-settled legal principle that commands that we abandon our reasoning in Uboh and defy the sound logic exercised in nearly every other circuit. Furthermore, the majority advances a standard that does not appear in any 19th century case, has been rejected by several of our sister circuits, and has not been adopted by any other circuit. The majority argues that its proposed standard more accurately reflects the constitutional considerations at issue under the fourth amendment. However, such considerations do not justify adoption of a rule that appears out of thin air. To be clear, the Majority Opinion does not provide the source of its 'not inconsistent with his innocence on at least one charge that authorized his confinement' rule. . . That is likely because it has not been adopted by any court with persuasive authority before today. . . . Unlike the any-crime rule in Williams, a question that circuit courts were split on, the indication of innocence standard has been adopted by all the circuit courts that have resolved this question. As such, formal adoption of the indication of innocence standard would synchronize the Court with our sister circuits. The First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, Ninth, Tenth, and D.C. Circuits all rely on the indication of innocence standard, and no federal court of appeals has adopted the majority's rule. . . . Although the Fifth, Seventh, and D.C. Circuits have only applied the indication of innocence standard to state-law malicious prosecution claims, they have utilized no alternative standard for the favorable termination element in § 1983 malicious prosecution. Furthermore, those courts' application of the indication of innocence to state-law malicious prosecution is (1) indicative of the confines of a § 1983 claim in that jurisdiction, and (2) further evidence of the indication of innocence standard's pervasiveness throughout the federal court system. . . . That the indication of innocence standard continues to be used in light of Manuel and Nieves speaks to its strength. The Second Circuit in Lanning opined that the indication of innocence standard prohibits defendants from 'relitigat[ing] the issue of probable cause ... thus posing the prospect of harassment, waste and endless litigation.'. . Indeed, allowing the favorable termination requirement to retain its teeth sets the tort of § 1983 malicious prosecution apart from § 1983 false arrest; to hold otherwise would reduce the malicious prosecution inquiry to a mere determination of probable cause. Finally, the Tenth Circuit expressly rejected the not inconsistent with innocence standard. . . In so doing, the Tenth Circuit noted that the indication of innocence test is 'a standard feature of the tort of malicious prosecution and a reflection of the idea that malicious prosecution actions are disfavored at common law.'. . And, the court emphasized the indication of innocence standard balances the important considerations at play—noting that it may bar some meritorious claims, but it serves as 'a useful filtering mechanism, barring actions that have not already demonstrated some likelihood of success.'. . Because almost all courts of appeal have adopted the standard, and our adoption would not only synchronize the circuit courts, but also strike the best balance between filtering out meritless claims and permitting claims that demonstrate some likelihood of success, the Court should adopt the indication of innocence. . . . The majority attempts to massage the favorable termination requirement in a way that will square the tort of malicious prosecution with the Fourth Amendment, thus tying a tidy bow on the debate. However, this Court is not tasked with answering this bigger question, left unanswered by the Supreme Court. Instead, we are asked merely to apply the tort of malicious prosecution under § 1983—a tort which exists, despite some persuasive arguments in favor of its elimination—to a set of facts that might be new to this Court but are far from groundbreaking. If malicious prosecution is a tort that is so incongruous with the Fourth Amendment that it can no longer be cognizable under § 1983, then a court will be asked to prohibit such claims. No one has asked the Court to do so today. Therefore, rather than trying to force § 1983 malicious prosecution to be something completely other than what it is—a tort that concerns the abuse of legal processes—we should apply the law as it lays before us. . . . Accordingly, because the indication of innocence standard (1) has already been applied by this Court, (2) is heralded as the standard in almost every other circuit, (3) permits the dismissal of spurious claims at the motion to dismiss stage, and (4) is not contrary to any well-settled common-law principle at the time of § 1983's passage, I respectfully dissent.")

See also Manansingh v. United States, No. 2:20-CV-01139-DWM, 2021 WL 2080190, at *4-5 & nn. 2, 3 (D. Nev. May 24, 2021) ("Plaintiffs first argue that their claims would have been barred by Heck had they pursued them prior to the June 21, 2018 dismissal of Manansingh's indictment. The argument is unpersuasive. 'Heck established the now well-known rule that when an otherwise complete and present § 1983 cause of action would impugn an extant conviction, accrual is deferred until the conviction or sentence has been invalidated.' Bradford v. Scherschligt, 803 F.3d 382, 386 (9th Cir. 2015). While the Ninth Circuit determined at one point that the Heck bar extended to pending criminal proceedings, . . . the Supreme Court subsequently held in Wallace, that 'Heck applies only when there is an extant conviction and is not implicated merely be the pendency of charge[.]'. . Here, no conviction was ever obtained, let alone invalidated, so Heck does not apply. 'Consequently, the resolution of this [case] hinges on traditional rules of accrual and not on the extension of Heck to [these] proceedings.' Bradford, 803 F.3d at 386. . . . Plaintiffs' substantive due process claim (Claim 4) includes a properly pled Fifth Amendment fabricated evidence claim. . . . That claim is also timely, as it did not accrue until 'the criminal proceedings against [Manansingh] terminated in his favor.' McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149, 2161 (2019). Here, the criminal case against Manansingh was dismissed by order of the district court on June 21, 2018. Although it was not a final assessment of innocence, courts have held that dropping charges or a nolle prosequi is an affirmative choice to terminate criminal proceedings for purposes of claim accrual. [citing cases] Because Plaintiffs brought their fabrication claim within two years of the dismissal of the criminal charges against Manansingh, that claim is timely. . . . 'Favorable termination' in this context is not necessarily concomitant with the 'favorable termination' element of malicious prosecution. See Roberts v. City of Fairbanks, 947 F.3d 1191, 1202 n.12 (9th Cir. 2020) (malicious prosecution claim may require termination 'dispositive of the defendant's innocence'). . . . Apart from a dispute over what qualifies as 'favorable termination,' the parties do not appear to dispute that this claim is timely under McDonough."); Grytsyk v. Morales, No. 19-CV-3470 (JMF), 2021 WL 1105368, at *7–8 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 22, 2021) ("[Defendants] argue that the claim fails because the dismissal of Grytsyk's charges for speedy trial reasons cannot qualify as favorable termination for purposes of malicious prosecution. . . Defendants' argument is foreclosed by binding Second Circuit precedent. [citing Murphy v. Lynn, 118 F.3d 938, 950 (2d Cir. 1997)] To be sure, the Second Circuit's decision in Murphy notwithstanding, Defendants' argument has been accepted by a host of district judges following Lanning v. City of Glens Falls, 908 F.3d 19, 22 (2d Cir. 2018), in which the Court held that, to prevail on a malicious prosecution claim under federal law, a plaintiff must show 'that the underlying criminal proceeding ended in a manner that affirmatively indicates his innocence.'. . And these district judges have admittedly offered some persuasive reasons to question whether Murphy can be squared with Lanning. . . In the Court's view, however, these district judges have gotten too far out over the[ir] proverbial skis. It is well established that a district court must follow a precedential opinion of the Second Circuit 'unless and until it is overruled ... by the Second Circuit itself or unless a subsequent decision of the Supreme Court so undermines it that it will almost inevitably be overruled by the Second Circuit'. . . . First and foremost, the Lanning Court itself cited Murphy favorably. . . Second, since Lanning, the Second Circuit has four times cited Murphy as good law (albeit for more general propositions). [citing cases] And third, a host of other-district judges have adhered to Murphy even after Lanning. . . The ultimate point, of course, is not that Murphy is rightly decided or long for this world; it may not be either. Instead, it is that the Second Circuit, not this Court or any other district court, gets to decide that question. And in light of the Second Circuit's own citations to Murphy, in Lanning and since, not to mention the analyses of Judge Engelmayer and others, the Court certainly cannot say that Lanning renders the holding of Murphy 'untenable.'. . In short, Defendants' argument — that Grytsyk cannot, as a categorical matter, establish favorable termination for purposes of his Section 1983 malicious prosecution claim because the dismissal of his charges was on speedy trial grounds — remains foreclosed by Second Circuit precedent. . . Of course, "'i]n the event that ensuing case law on this point is adverse to this conclusion, the Court will stand ready, at the summary judgment stage, to reconsider this assessment.'"); Moore v. City of Chicago, No. 19 CV 3902, 2020 WL 3077565, at *3 (N.D. Ill. June 10, 2020) ("Defendants equate favorable termination with innocence. Heck demands no such thing. '[T]he [Heck] Court offered a list of possible resolutions that would satisfy the favorable termination requirement, and none require an affirmative finding of innocence.'. . A criminal proceeding can terminate favorably 'without a declaration of a defendant's innocence.'. . Plaintiff's sentence was vacated and his charges were dismissed. That is all he needs to allege for his section 1983 claims to satisfy Heck."); Krause v. Yavapai County, No. CV1908054PCTMTLESW, 2020 WL 1659908, at *5–6 (D. Ariz. Apr. 3, 2020) ("It appears the Ninth Circuit has never squarely addressed the particular circumstances presented in this case, where after his conviction was reversed, Plaintiff could have been retried for the same charges but was not. Defendants' characterization of the issue in this case as 'what knowledge the Plaintiff derived, or should have derived, from the undisputed fact that retrial was not sought by the Rule 8.2(c) deadline' is misplaced. The accrual date of Plaintiff's § 1983 claim does not depend solely on when Plaintiff knew he was injured. As the Supreme Court noted in McDonough, the date on which a constitutional injury first occurs is not the only date from which a limitations period may run. . . 'To the contrary, the injury caused by a classic malicious prosecution [ ] first occurs as soon as legal process is brought to bear on a defendant, yet favorable termination remains the accrual date.'. . Defendants also argue that the prosecution terminated favorably to Plaintiff, at the latest, when, under Arizona's speedy trial rules, the time for the State to retry Plaintiff elapsed, and the State did not retry him. Plaintiff contends that despite the 90-day limitation, the State could have retried him, although the resulting conviction could have been subject to reversal if the delay prejudiced him; therefore, his claim did not accrue until then. . . The Court agrees. . . . Plaintiff for the same charges. Defendants attempt to equate the State's decision to allow the 90 days under the speedy trial rules to elapse to dropping charges. However, unlike allowing a procedural time limit to elapse, dropping charges or a nolle prosequi is an affirmative choice to terminate the criminal proceeding. . . . In this case, Defendants did not choose to drop the charges. Instead, they allowed the time to retry Plaintiff to elapse, and Plaintiff sought enforcement of the Arizona Court of Appeals' Mandate. It was in response to Plaintiff's request that the trial court vacated his conviction and dismissed the indictment. Finally, Defendants erroneously suggest that because Plaintiff knew that any retrial would necessarily exclude the CBLA evidence, this was "sufficient to place Plaintiff on notice that his criminal case had ended favorably" for purposes of accrual by October 2016. . . The question is not whether the State could have successfully retried Plaintiff following the Arizona Court of Appeals' decision. Rather, so long as the State had the option of prosecuting Plaintiff for the same charges, if Plaintiff had filed his § 1983 action during that time, there was still the possibility of 'parallel criminal and civil litigation over the same subject matter' or 'the related possibility of conflicting civil and criminal judgments.'. . For the foregoing reasons, the Court concludes that Plaintiff's § 1983 claims did not accrue until February 22, 2017. His original Complaint, filed on February 19, 2019, was therefore timely. Accordingly, the Court will deny the Yavapai County Defendants' Motion to Dismiss.");

See also Bronowicz v. Allegheny Cnty., 804 F.3d 338, 347-48 (3d Cir. 2015) ("Even though the Superior Court did not expressly address Bronowicz's challenges to the legality of the sentence and revocation proceedings, the Superior Court's order vacating the January 2011 judgment in light of the Commonwealth's concession of 'an error committed at the time of sentencing' is consistent with Bronowicz's claim that the sentence imposed in January 2011 was invalid. Unlike in Kossler and Gilles, the Superior Court order does not imply that the sentence imposed or the proceedings before the Court of Common Pleas in January 2011 were valid. The Superior Court vacated the 'Judgment of Sentence' in its entirety. . . and on remand, the Court of Common Pleas released Bronowicz from custody. . . Neither the Superior Court order nor the subsequent order issued by the Court of Common Pleas vacating Bronowicz's sentence imposed any 'unfavorable' conditions or burdens on Bronowicz that would be inconsistent with his claim that that the January 2011 judgment was imposed illegally. Moreover, the purpose of the favorable termination rule is fully realized by this result because there is no risk that permitting Bronowicz's § 1983 claims to proceed would lead to 'two conflicting resolutions arising from the same transaction.'. . Upon the imposition of the judgment of sentence in January 2011, Bronowicz did exactly what Heck requires—he appealed to a competent state tribunal which declared that judgment invalid. . . Bronowicz's claims stemming from the January 2011 revocation proceedings and sentence do not constitute a collateral attack on his sentence because Bronowicz has already successfully challenged his sentence in state court. . . Success on Bronowicz's § 1983 claims attacking the legality of the January 2011 proceedings would be fully consistent with the Superior Court's order. Thus, the Superior Court's order satisfies the favorable termination rule and fulfills its objectives. We hold that Bronowicz's § 1983 claims arising from the January 2011 proceedings before the Court of Common Pleas are not barred by Heck because Bronowicz has demonstrated that the judgment imposed was invalidated on appeal. The District Court, however, properly dismissed Bronowicz's remaining § 1983 claims, which, if successful, would impugn the validity of the July 2005 and July 2008 revocation proceedings, as Bronowicz has not demonstrated that those proceedings were terminated in his favor."); Kossler v. Crisanti , 564 F.3d 181, 188, 191 (3d Cir. 2009) ("Kossler's argument is problematic because his acquittal is accompanied by a contemporaneous conviction at the same proceeding. We are thus faced with a question of first impression in this Circuit: Whether acquittal on at least one criminal charge constitutes 'favorable termination' for the purpose of a subsequent malicious prosecution claim, when the charge arose out of the same act for which the plaintiff was convicted on a different charge during the same criminal prosecution. On these facts, we conclude that this question should be answered in the negative. As an initial observation, we note that various authorities refer to the favorable termination of a 'proceeding,' not merely a 'charge' or 'offense.'. . . Therefore, the favorable termination of some but not all individual charges does not necessarily establish the favorable termination of the criminal proceeding as a whole. Rather we conclude that, upon examination of the entire criminal proceeding, the judgment must indicate the plaintiff's innocence of the alleged misconduct underlying the offenses charged. In urging us not to hold that 'the favorable termination element ... categorically requires the plaintiff to show that all of the criminal charges were decided in his favor,' Kossler himself argues (correctly) that the result 'depend[s] on the particular circumstances.' The argument goes both ways: The favorable termination element is not categorically satisfied whenever the plaintiff is acquitted of just one of several charges in the same proceeding. When the circumstances − both the offenses as stated in the statute and the underlying facts of the case − indicate that the judgment as a whole does not reflect the plaintiff's innocence, then the plaintiff fails to establish the favorable termination element. . . . We read both the Janetka and Uboh courts' focus on the differences between the offenses charged and the conduct leading to the charges as implying that, under different facts, when the offenses charged aim to punish the same misconduct, a simultaneous acquittal and conviction on related charges may not amount to favorable termination."); Butler v. Compton, 482 F.3d 1277, 1280, 1281(10th Cir. 2007) ("Although Mr. Butler was not convicted of the burglary charges arising out of Officer Compton's arrest, he was convicted of three other unrelated burglary charges after he pled guilty to those charges. He pled guilty to these unrelated burglary charges as part of the same plea agreement in which the burglary charges arising out of Officer Compton's arrest were dismissed. In this § 1983 action, he does not challenge any conduct relating to his conviction on the three burglary charges to which he pled guilty. His sole challenge is to the constitutionality of Officer Compton's conduct during his arrest for the burglary charges that were dismissed. Recognizing that this was an issue of first impression, the district court concluded that it was appropriate to use Mr. Butler's conviction on the unrelated burglary charges as the basis for applying Heck to Mr. Butler's case. The district court reached this conclusion by deciding that, if successful, Mr. Butler's § 1983 action would necessarily call into question the validity of his other unrelated burglary conviction because it was a part of the same plea agreement as the related burglary charges that were dismissed. . . . Mr. Butler's § 1983 action seeks compensatory and punitive damages based on conduct that occurred during an arrest by Officer Compton that resulted in two burglary charges. Mr. Butler was not convicted on those charges because they were dismissed as part of a plea agreement. There is no related underlying conviction therefore that could be invalidated by Mr. Butler's §1983 action. Moreover, the purpose behind Heck is not implicated here because there is no attempt by Mr. Butler to avoid the pleading requirements of habeas. He cannot bring a habeas action because he has no conviction to challenge. Mr. Butler's conviction on unrelated charges may not form the basis for the application of Heck where there is no challenge to that conviction in Mr. Butler's § 1983 action.").

See also Lessard v. Kravitz, No. 16-1351, 2017 WL 1453997, at *4 (10th Cir. Apr. 25, 2017) (not reported) ("Having completed a deferred judgment and sentence under Colorado's deferred-judgment statute, which resulted in the withdrawal of his plea and the dismissal of the criminal charge against him, Mr. Lessard has no existing 'conviction' that could be affected by his malicious-prosecution claim. His claims are thus not subject to the Heck bar. Cf. Vasquez Arroyo v. Starks, 589 F.3d 1091, 1095 (10th Cir. 2009) (holding Heck did not bar § 1983 claim claiming plaintiff's signature had been forged on agreement resulting in deferred prosecution, because under Kansas law, there was "no related underlying conviction that could be invalidated by [a] § 1983 [suit]"). We are therefore not concerned with exceptions Mr. Lessard cites that may be used to avoid or qualify Heck. He has already avoided that bar. . . His challenge is different: he must show a favorable termination that is suggestive of his innocence. The completion of his deferred judgment and sentence, with a resulting dismissal, though evading the Heck bar, does not meet this standard. See Land v. Hill, 644 P.2d 43, 45 (Colo. App. 1981) (holding that vacation of judgment and dismissal of criminal action after guilty plea under Colorado's deferred-judgment procedure did not constitute a "favorable termination" for purposes of malicious prosecution action). Mr. Lessard's decision to plead guilty in exchange for a deferred judgment may have robbed him of his malicious prosecution claim, but 'such trade-offs are a standard feature of malicious prosecution law.' Cordova v. City of Albuquerque, 816 F.3d 645, 652 (10th Cir.

2016)."); Cordova v. City of Albuquerque, 816 F.3d 645, 652-54(10th Cir. 2016) ("Wilkins adopted the traditional common law element that a dismissal must 'indicate the innocence of the accused' to qualify as a favorable termination. . . But in Smith–Hunter, the New York Court of Appeals rejected the traditional rule, holding that any dismissal that is 'not inconsistent ' with innocence qualifies as 'favorable.' 734 N.E .2d at 755 (emphasis added). Not only is Smith–Hunter's conception of the favorable termination requirement at odds with the rule we adopted in Wilkins, it flips the traditional rule on its head by presuming terminations are favorable until proven otherwise. As a result, both Smith–Hunter and the Second Circuit's Rogers decision, 303 F.3d at 160 (applying Smith–Hunter and holding that a speedy trial dismissal is a favorable termination under New York law), are of limited persuasive value. Applying our indicative-of-innocence rule, many courts have found that an abandonment is not favorable even when the crucial evidence was suppressed on constitutional grounds. . . In all of these instances, it was the defendant's exercise of his constitutional right to exclude certain evidence that led to the dismissal. Courts often find that no favorable termination has occurred despite the exercise of statutory or constitutional rights resulting in the termination of a case. . . In fact, most courts follow the Wilkins approach and look to the circumstances surrounding speedy trial dismissals to determine whether they indicate the innocence of the accused. . . That Cordova had a statutory right to dismissal under the Speedy Trial Act thus does not set aside his burden of meeting the indicative-of-innocence requirement. Thus, a plaintiff generally cannot maintain a malicious prosecution action unless his charges were dismissed in a manner indicative of innocence, even when he was entitled to dismissal on statutory or constitutional grounds. Although this rule may produce a dilemma for defendants at least in some applications, it is both a standard feature of the tort of malicious prosecution and a reflection of the idea that malicious prosecution actions are disfavored at common law. . . A speedy trial dismissal, moreover, is unlike the nolle prosequi in Wilkins, in which the prosecution merely dropped the charges. This action by the prosecution is ambiguous, in that we cannot know the reasons for dropping the charges. Here, by contrast, the state court unambiguously granted a motion to dismiss the charges against Cordova. But this distinction is irrelevant. The question we must ask is whether the dismissal was indicative of innocence. It cannot be the case that all dismissals that result from granted motions are favorable terminations for purposes of malicious prosecution actions. The dismissal here does not indicate Cordova's innocence, so it is not a favorable termination. The favorable termination requirement thus serves as a useful filtering mechanism, barring actions that have not already demonstrated some likelihood of success. Although the traditional requirement may bar some meritorious actions, where prosecutorial delay does indicate the innocence of the accused the plaintiff will not be barred from bringing his malicious prosecution claim under our rule. Our conclusion is thus more receptive to Cordova's fairness concerns than many applications in this area of the law traditionally are—a dismissal due to a lack of jurisdiction or of admissible evidence will rarely reflect on the merits of the case and is therefore more likely to bar a meritorious claim. Nor, we should emphasize, does a dismissal of charges create a presumption of innocence or shift the burden of proving the element of favorable termination to the defendant. In sum, we agree with the district court that the dismissal of the underlying assault charges under New Mexico's Speedy Trial Act was not indicative of Cordova's innocence. The undisputed facts reveal the prosecution did not abandon its effort to try Cordova, and nothing suggests the speedy trial dismissal indicated his innocence of the charged crime. Absent such a showing, the district court properly granted summary judgment on the malicious prosecution claim."); Wilkins v. DeReyes, 528 F.3d 790, 803 (10th Cir. 2008) ("To decide whether a nolle prosequi constitutes a favorable termination, we look to the stated reasons for the dismissal as well as to the circumstances surrounding it in an attempt to determine whether the dismissal indicates the accused's innocence. . . . In the circumstances here, the nolle proseques should be considered terminations in favor of Plaintiffs. The dismissals were not entered due to any compromise or plea for mercy by either Wilkins or Buchner. Rather, they were the result of a judgment by the prosecutor that the case could not be proven beyond a reasonable doubt.").

See also Northfield Ins. Co. v. City of Waukegan, 701 F.3d 1124, 1130, 1131 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Here, the district court was presented with a complaint that contains slight inconsistencies as to the date of exoneration. Starks initially alleges that the Illinois Appellate Court reversed his conviction on March 23, 2006, (Starks Compl. at 5), although that court did not issue the related mandate returning jurisdiction to the trial court until January 20, 2007. (Id. at 6). Momentarily ignoring the importance of either date, both of these allegations imply that Starks was fully exonerated following action by the Illinois Appellate Court. Alternatively, the complaint alleges that the state's attorney sought to re-prosecute Starks even after the Illinois Appellate Court overturned his conviction. (Id . at 6; n.1.) This allegation, of course, suggests that neither action by the Illinois Appellate Court exonerated Starks, which means that his malicious prosecution claim has not yet ripened. . . Notwithstanding that inconsistency, we can definitively say that Starks's malicious prosecution (and related) allegations do not trigger the two Northfield policies in effect from November 1, 1991, to November 1, 1995. Because Starks was not exonerated during that policy period, Northfield has no duty to defend his malicious prosecution claims. . . . That leaves us with the St. Paul Fire policy, effective November 1, 2006, to November 1, 2009. Because we are charged with liberally construing the complaint and policy in favor of the appellants, we will evaluate the two divergent lines of allegations in Starks's complaint, while granting all reasonable inferences to the appellants. We take the easy strain first and assume as true the allegation that Starks has not yet been exonerated. If true, then Starks's claim for malicious prosecution has not ripened. In other words, Starks was not exonerated during St. Paul Fire's policy period, and thus, the insurer has no duty to defend in this scenario. The other line of allegations suggests that Starks was fully exonerated once the Illinois Appellate Court vacated his conviction. If true, the question for us is which date applies: the date of the reversal or the date of the mandate. This is also a relatively easy question because the law in Illinois clearly provides that the effective date of an Illinois Appellate Court decision is the date of judgment, not the date the mandate was issued. . . Thus, even if we were to read the complaint to suggest that Starks was fully exonerated, the effective date of that exoneration is March 23, 2006, which falls outside of St. Paul Fire's coverage. . . . For civil malicious prosecution matters in Illinois, 'a criminal proceeding has been terminated in favor of the accused when a prosecutor formally abandons the proceeding via a nolle prosequi, unless the abandonment is for reasons not indicative of the innocence of the accused.'. . The Swick rule leaves two possibilities for Starks and the appellants. If the prosecution was abandoned for reasons of Starks's innocence, then May 15, 2012, is the trigger date for his malicious prosecution claim. On the other hand, if the prosecutors dropped Starks's case for some reason not indicative of innocence—such as the unavailability of a key witness—then the nolle prosequi order would not have terminated the prosecution in Starks's favor, leaving Starks yet to be exonerated. We need not decide whether the nolle prosequi order in this case is indicative of innocence because in either scenario, the malicious prosecution occurrence falls outside of St. Paul Fire's policy."); Northfield Ins. Co. v. City of Waukegan, 701 F.3d 1124, 1135, 1136 (7th Cir. 2012) (Hamilton, J., concurring) ("For the reasons explained in Judge Kanne's opinion for the court, I am confident that the two insurers in this case are not required to defend or indemnify the city against these claims. As long as the city has kept liability insurance in place over the decades, though, it is highly likely that the city is entitled to a defense and indemnity from at least one insurer, perhaps from more than one. . . . There is plenty of room for confusion and mutual inconsistency in the ways courts handle these different timing issues in these wrongful conviction cases, not to mention malleability of arguments and outcomes. In any particular case, current Illinois law allows capable counsel to make arguments to justify nearly any resolution that would benefit their client—whether the client is the wrongfully convicted plaintiff, the government, or the insurer. Only the Illinois courts can untangle these knots to provide justice, consistency, and predictability. For example, the city here suggested at oral argument that the statute of limitations might have run on Starks' claims before he could even bring them. The convoluted theory seems to be that Starks was actually exonerated back in 2007 when the Illinois Appellate Court issued its mandate, but that his claims did not accrue until the criminal prosecution ended with the 2012 nolle prosequi. Under this theory, the 2012 nolle prosequi somehow retroactively started the statute-of-limitations clock running back in 2007, effectively barring Starks' claims before they accrued and could be brought. The fact that such an argument could be made with a straight face is a symptom of a need for clarification of Illinois law on these timing issues.")

See also Moman v. Valenzuela, No. 18 C 5678, 2021 WL 3285948, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 2, 2021) ("[T]he Court must address Moman's argument that Heck cannot apply because his juvenile adjudication is not a conviction. See People v. Taylor, 221 Ill. 2d 157, 176 (2006) ("In the absence of a statute expressly defining a juvenile adjudication as a conviction, Illinois courts have consistently held that juvenile adjudications do not constitute convictions."). But Heck does not apply solely to formal criminal convictions, as the Supreme Court and the Seventh Circuit have consistently applied Heck to plaintiffs who have been civilly committed or to prisoner disciplinary determinations. [collecting cases] Moreover, other circuits have held that the Heck doctrine can be applied to juvenile delinquency proceedings. [collecting cases] This Court agrees and finds that the Heck doctrine applies to juvenile adjudications.")

M. Other Miscellaneous Heck Issues

On Heck's application to compassionate release motions, see United States v. Jean, 108 F.4th 275, 285 (5th Cir. 2024) ("[T]he habeas channeling rule is violated only if 'a judgment in favor of the plaintiff would necessarily imply the invalidity of his conviction or sentence.'. . We cannot hold, as the United States would prefer, that 'any argument "that an intervening change to sentencing law provides an extraordinary and compelling reason for early release necessarily implicates the validity of the relevant sentence."' There is no better way to see the distinction between where the habeas channeling rule does and does not apply than to compare the facts of Escajeda to the facts before the court today. In Escajeda, the appellant sought relief because, he argued, his sentence exceeded the statutory maximum and he received ineffective assistance of counsel. . . As we aptly noted then, Escajeda raised 'quintessential arguments for challenging the fact or duration of a prisoner's confinement.'. . Thus, the arguments were not cognizable under § 3582(c). . . Compare that with the arguments raised by Jean. Unlike in Escajeda, Jean did not argue that his original conviction was imposed in violation of the Constitution or the laws of the United States. Rather, Jean argued that his sentence is now unjustly long following the decisions in Mathis, Hinkle, and Tanksley. That a sentence is unfairly long in light of the current state of the law does not 'necessarily imply the invalidity of ... [Jean's] sentence.'. . The district court below said it best: 'Adopting the Government's interpretation of Escajeda would nullify section 3582(c).' Accordingly, the habeas channeling rule does not bar Jean's arguments.")

On the question of Heck's application to immigration orders, see Humphries v. Various Federal USINS Employees, 164 F.3d 936, 946 & n.11 (5th Cir. 1999) ("[I]f Heck were to apply in the context of immigration orders, it would, by analogy, bar only those claims that 'necessarily imply' the invalidity of an INS or BIA order. . . Assuming arguendo that Humphries were to recover damages for the alleged involuntary servitude as well as the alleged mistreatment while in detention, these judgments would in no way imply the invalidity of Humphries' detention or exclusion. . . . [A]t least one scenario comes to mind in which Heck may bar a claim over which we retain jurisdiction under ' 1252(g). An alien whose claim arises from INS misconduct during an exclusion proceeding, for instance, may be able to invoke our jurisdiction despite ' 1252(g), but because that error may in fact impugn the validity of the underlying proceeding, Heck may prove relevant.").

Heck has been applied to claims under Title II of the ADA. See Mayfield v. City of Mesa, No. 23-3222, 2025 WL 890507, at *4–5 (9th Cir. Mar. 24, 2025) ("Although Heck itself concerned claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, we have held that Heck's reasoning applies equally to claims under Title II of the ADA. . . Mayfield contends that Heck is inapplicable to her particular claims, because a ruling in her favor here would not necessarily negate an element of the offense of which she was convicted and would not otherwise imply the invalidity of her conviction or sentence. Reviewing the district court's application of Heck de novo, . . . we agree. To evaluate 'whether success on' an ADA claim 'would necessarily imply the invalidity of a conviction, we must determine which acts formed the basis for the conviction.'. . When, as here, 'the conviction is based on a guilty plea, we look at the record to see which acts formed the basis for the plea.'. . If the plaintiff's success on her claim would ' "negat[e] an element of the offense" of which she was convicted,'. . . then Heck bars that claim. Under our precedent, however, Heck does not apply when (1) the plaintiff committed multiple distinct acts that were each 'sufficient to warrant the filing of a criminal charge'; (2) the plaintiff is challenging police conduct with respect to only one or some of those acts; and (3) 'the record does not reflect which acts underlay [the plaintiff's] plea.'. . Put differently, when the plaintiff's conviction could be based on activity or evidence untainted by purportedly unlawful police conduct, then her claims are not 'necessarily inconsistent with [her] conviction,' and the Heck bar does not apply. . . Applying these principles, we conclude that the district court erred in two respects in its application of the Heck bar here. First, the district court erroneously considered whether Mayfield's claims, if successful, would undermine her original charges for DUI and not merely her ultimate conviction for reckless driving. But as we reiterated in Lemos, Heck only bars claims that 'would necessarily imply the invalidity of a conviction,'. . . and here, Mayfield pleaded guilty to, and was only convicted of, reckless driving in violation of Arizona Revised Statutes § 28-693(A). Indeed, once Mayfield accepted her plea agreement and entered her guilty plea, there were no longer any pending DUI charges against her, because the plea agreement explicitly 'amend[ed] the [criminal] complaint to charge the offense to which [Mayfield] plead[ed].' The Heck inquiry in this case must therefore be focused only on the specific offense of which Mayfield was ultimately convicted. A civil claim that would only undermine a charged offense that was later dropped is not sufficient to trigger the Heck bar. Second, the district court erred in concluding that the City had carried its burden to establish the applicability of the Heck bar in this case. . . The judicially noticed records from Mayfield's criminal case that were submitted in support of the City's motion to dismiss do not contain any recitation of the factual basis for Mayfield's plea, but instead merely state that '[a] basis in fact exists for believing the defendant guilty of the offense[ ] charged.' As a result, the district court erred in concluding that the City had shown that Mayfield's conviction necessarily rested on the evidence obtained during and after the traffic stop, such that success in Mayfield's suit would call into question the legality of the collection of that evidence and her ensuing conviction. Nothing in the factual record or in the relevant Arizona law precludes the equally plausible view that Mayfield's plea and conviction could have sufficiently rested solely on Officer Hall's observation of Mayfield's vehicle weaving on the road prior to the challenged traffic stop. Visibly weaving in traffic may qualify as driving 'in reckless disregard for the safety of persons or property,'. . . and testimony from Officer Hall concerning Mayfield's weaving would be amply sufficient to establish that offense in a way that is completely independent of the merits of this civil suit. Because the record thus does not suffice to establish which of Mayfield's 'temporally [and] spatially' 'distinct' acts—viz., her weaving while driving or her asserted intoxication—underlies her plea and conviction, a ruling in her favor would not necessarily 'demonstrate the invalidity of" her conviction. . . Heck therefore does not bar Mayfield's ADA and RA claims.")

Note that Heck has been applied to federal prisoners and Bivens actions. See, e.g., Martin v. Sias, 88 F.3d 774 (9th Cir.1996). See also Mohamed v. Tattum, 380 F.Supp.2d 1214, 1223 (D. Kan. 2005) ("Just as the actions in Heck and Edwards implied the invalidity of the plaintiffs' conviction and disciplinary action, a finding that defendant failed to protect plaintiff from an attack by his cellmate implies the invalidity of the disciplinary adjudication whereby plaintiff was adjudged guilty of fighting. Plaintiff's Bivens claim bears a sufficient relationship to the disciplinary adjudication such that the claim is not cognizable absent the invalidation of the disciplinary adjudication. If plaintiff's injuries were actually the result of defendant's failure to protect rather than plaintiff's active participation in a fight, the disciplinary hearing findings are necessarily erroneous and must be invalidated. But plaintiff admitted guilt during the disciplinary hearing and has not appealed the disciplinary hearing findings, despite being given an opportunity to do so. Accordingly, his failure to protect action against defendant is not cognizable pursuant to the principles announced in Heck and Edwards."). See also Priovolos v. F.B.I., 632 F. App'x 58, 60 n.2 (3d Cir. 2015) ("It appears that Priovolos is no longer serving his sentence for the murder conviction. . . We have held, however, that Heck's favorable termination rule applies even when the plaintiff is no longer in custody and cannot pursue habeas relief. Gilles v. Davis, 427 F.3d 197, 209–10 (3d Cir.2005). In addition, we have not addressed in a precedential opinion whether Heck applies to FTCA actions. For purposes of this appeal, however, we will 'assume that the exception of Heck extends to FTCA claims.' Morrow v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, 610 F.3d 1271, 1272 (11th Cir.2010); see also Erlin v. United States, 364 F.3d 1127, 1133 (9th Cir.2004) (holding that "a civil action under the Federal Tort Claims Act for negligently calculating a prisoner's release date, or otherwise wrongfully imprisoning the prisoner, does not accrue until the prisoner has established, in a direct or collateral attack on his imprisonment, that he is entitled to release from custody."); Parris v. United States, 45 F.3d 383, 384–85 (10th Cir.1995) (holding that Heck applies to actions brought under the FTCA)."); Johnson v. United States, No. 24 CIV. 872 (DEH), 2024 WL 5083068, at *16–17 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 11, 2024) ("In Wallace v. Kato, the Supreme Court clarified that Heck 'delays what would otherwise be the accrual date of a tort action until the setting aside of an extant conviction which success in that tort action would impugn.'. . Importantly, if no criminal conviction exists at the time a claim accrues, the statute of limitations runs normally and is not delayed by Heck. . . Thus, in Wallace, the Court held that Heck did not delay the accrual of the plaintiff's false arrest claim because his claim became available 'when he appeared before the examining magistrate and was bound over for trial.'. . At that time, 'there was in existence no criminal conviction that the cause of action would impugn; indeed, there may not even have been an indictment.'. . Accordingly, Heck applies only to claims that (1) arose after the entry of a criminal conviction and (2) would necessarily impugn that conviction if successful. The question before the Court is whether Plaintiffs' claims were Heck-barred before their convictions were vacated; if so, then their claims did not accrue until November 2021 and were timely filed in March 2023. To answer that question, the Court must consider three questions: whether Heck applies to FTCA actions; whether Plaintiffs' convictions were in existence at the time their claims accrued; and whether success on Plaintiffs' tort claims 'would necessarily imply the invalidity of [their] conviction[s][.]'. . First, neither the Supreme Court nor the Second Circuit has addressed whether Heck applies to FTCA claims, but the parties do not dispute that it does. . . Heck's holding that § 1983 claims for unlawful conviction or imprisonment are barred unless the conviction or sentence has been rendered invalid (or at least called into question) rested on the principle that 'civil tort actions are not appropriate vehicles for challenging the validity of outstanding criminal judgments.'. . Multiple courts have therefore concluded that Heck is not limited to § 1983 claims, but also applies to FTCA claims based on an invalid conviction or sentence. See, e.g., Erlin v. United States, 364 F.3d 1127, 1132 (9th Cir. 2004) ("The interests the Supreme Court identified in Heck require us to impose the same restriction on FTCA claims that Heck imposed on § 1983 actions."); Parris v. United States, 45 F.3d 383, 385 (10th Cir. 1995) ("[T]he FTCA, like § 1983, is not an appropriate vehicle for challenging the validity of outstanding criminal judgments."). As noted, the Second Circuit has not addressed this question, but it has acknowledged that Heck is not limited to the § 1983 context, holding that 'Heck should apply to Bivens actions as well,' Tavarez v. Reno, 54 F.3d 109, 110 (2d Cir. 1995) (referring to the implied cause of action against the United States for constitutional violations established in Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971)). Because the Supreme Court's reasoning in Heck applies with as much force to FTCA claims as it does to § 1983 or Bivens claims, the Court agrees with the parties that Heck applies in FTCA cases.")

The Ninth Circuit has held that Heck does not operate as an evidentiary bar. Simpson v. Thomas, 528 F.3d 685, 691, 696 (9th Cir. 2008) ("We turn next to yet another issue of first impression in this circuit: whether Heck v. Humphrey may be used to bar evidence in a § 1983 claim for excessive force. We conclude that Heck does not create a rule of evidence exclusion. Therefore, if, as in this case, a party is permitted to proceed on a § 1983 claim, relevant evidence may not be barred under the rule announced in Heck. . . . In light of our analysis of Supreme Court precedent relating to Heck, '§ 1983 and 2254, we hold that Heck is not an evidentiary doctrine. Therefore, we reverse and remand for a new trial. We conclude that even if the district court determines on remand that Simpson may not file a § 1983 lawsuit relating to any injuries stemming from Thomas's alleged punch upon entering the cell, Simpson is still entitled to tell the jury the entire story − in other words, he may present evidence and/or testimony that Thomas initiated the physical confrontation in the cell by punching Simpson.").

The Seventh Circuit has held that the Heck doctrine is not a jurisdictional bar and that it is a defense that is subject to waiver. Polzin v. Gage, 636 F.3d 834, 837, 838 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Mr. Polzin maintains that the district court improperly ruled on the merits of his claims. In his view, the district court could not address his constitutional arguments on the merits because Heck required the court to dismiss his case without prejudice. The Heck doctrine is not a jurisdictional bar. . . Because it is not jurisdictional, the Heck defense is subject to waiver. . . We have implied, but never explicitly held in a published opinion, that district courts may bypass the question of whether Heck applies to decide a case on its merits. We now hold explicitly that district courts may bypass the impediment of the Heck doctrine and address the merits of the case."). See also Courtney v. Butler, 66 F.4th 1043, 1049 n.1 (7th Cir. 2023) ("The procedural status of Heck has divided the circuits. Is the favorable-termination requirement jurisdictional, is it an affirmative defense that must be pled in an answer on pain of waiver, and may a case dismissed without prejudice on Heck grounds count as a 'strike' under the Prison Litigation Reform Act? See Garrett v. Murphy, 17 F.4th 419, 425–28 (3d Cir. 2021) (surveying circuits and holding Heck requirement is non-jurisdictional element of claim and that dismissal on Heck grounds may count as a strike for failure to state a claim). The Seventh Circuit has been in the non-jurisdictional affirmative-defense camp, with the strike question addressed in non-precedential orders. See Polzin v. Gage, 636 F.3d 834, 837–38 (7th Cir. 2011) (not jurisdictional); Carr v. O'Leary, 167 F.3d 1124, 1126 (7th Cir. 1999) (affirmative defense). In light of the circuit split, district courts may find it prudent as a matter of case management to determine earlier rather than later whether a defendant will raise the issue.")

See also Kitchen v. Whitmer, 106 F.4th 525, 533-35 (6th Cir. 2024) ("[T]he circuits are divided on whether Heck is jurisdictional. Though the First Circuit said a Heck issue implicates a court's subject-matter jurisdiction, O'Brien v. Town of Bellingham, 943 F.3d 514, 529 (1st Cir. 2019), the Third, Fifth, and Seventh Circuits think a successful Heck claim shows that the plaintiff does not have a cause of action under § 1983. Vuyanich v. Smithton Borough, 5 F.4th 379, 389 (3d Cir. 2021); Crittindon v. LeBlanc, 37 F.4th 177, 190 (5th Cir. 2022); Polzin v. Gage, 636 F.3d 834, 837–38 (7th Cir. 2011). And the Ninth and Eleventh Circuits are undecided but have cast doubt on the notion that Heck is jurisdictional. Washington v. L.A. Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 833 F.3d 1048, 1056 (9th Cir. 2016); Teagan v. City of McDonough, 949 F.3d 670, 678 (11th Cir. 2020). So although the majority of the circuit decisions point in one direction, they are not unanimous. And we have recently implied that Heck is not jurisdictional. . . See Chaney-Snell v. Young, 98 F.4th 699, 707–11 (6th Cir. 2024). In that case, we determined that we did not have pendent appellate jurisdiction over a Heck argument in a qualified-immunity appeal. . . Although we didn't say that Heck wasn't jurisdictional, we implied as much, noting that (1) 'the Court adopted the Heck bar to resolve a choice-of-law problem,'. . . (2) Heck 'exists to determine whether (and when) a § 1983 plaintiff has "a complete and present cause of action,"'. . . and (3) Heck 'creates only a precondition to a § 1983 suit (invalidation of the prior conviction)—not an absolute bar to the suit[.]'. . So we analyze standing first before proceeding to the Heck issue. . . .And for the same reason that we must address standing before considering Heck, we must also address the Rooker-Feldman issue as a threshold question.")

See also Hebrard v. Nofziger, 90 F.4th 1000, 1004, 1006-07 (9th Cir. 2024) ("Under the Prison Litigation Reform Act ("PLRA"), it was authorized to dismiss Hebrard's in forma pauperis complaint for failure to state a claim, even though it had raised Heck sua sponte. And the court correctly held that were Hebrard's claim successful, it would call into doubt the proper duration of his confinement. As a result, to comply with Heck, Hebrard needed to obtain habeas relief before filing this § 1983 action. Because he did not do so, his claim must be dismissed as Heck-barred. Accordingly, we affirm. . . .We agree with Hebrard that Heck is an affirmative defense that may be waived or forfeited. . . But as explained below, Nofziger did not waive Heck. Nofziger's failure to plead Heck as an affirmative defense clearly constituted only a forfeiture. And as is further explained below, we also hold that the district court did not err when it looked past Nofziger's forfeiture and sua sponte evaluated whether Heck barred Hebrard's claim. This is because the PLRA expressly authorized the district court to dismiss Hebrard's complaint for failure to state a claim at any time, even when it raised the legal basis for the dismissal of its own accord. . . . A finding of waiver requires evidence of a party's actions that evince his intentional relinquishment of a known right. . . Hebrard's failure to identify any of Nofziger's actions in this case that even remotely suggest he 'intentionally relinquished' his Heck defense compels us to conclude that the Heck defense was not waived. . . . Admittedly, the same substantive rules apply to Rule 12(b)(6) and § 1915(e) dismissals for failure to state a claim. . . But under the plain text of the PLRA, § 1915(e) dismissals for failure to state a claim, unlike Rule 12(b)(6) dismissals, are obligatory, even if the court raised the legal basis for the dismissal sua sponte. Thus, Nofziger's forfeiture did not

bar the court's sua sponte application of Heck to Hebrard's claim. Given his in forma pauperis status, § 1915(e) authorized the district court to raise Heck as a defense to his claim at any time of its own accord. And because the district court found that Heck was 'an obvious bar to securing relief on the face of the complaint,'. . . the standard that governs whether a complaint fails to state a claim for relief because the cause of action is barred by Heck—the plain terms of the PLRA mandated the dismissal of Hebrard's complaint for failure to state a claim. . . Thus, under § 1915(e), the district court did not err when it sua sponte resurrected Nofziger's forfeited Heck defense at the summary judgment stage."); Vuyanich v. Smithton Borough, 5 F.4th 379, 389 (3d Cir. 2021) ("Importantly, the Heck decision contains no jurisdictional language. Instead, it holds that a '§ 1983 cause of action for damages attributable to an unconstitutional conviction or sentence does not accrue until the conviction or sentence has been invalidated.'. . Consistent with this approach, at least one of our sister circuits has treated Heck as an affirmative defense rather than a jurisdictional rule. See Carr v. O'Leary, 167 F.3d 1124, 1126 (7th Cir. 1999) ("The failure to plead the Heck defense in a timely fashion was a waiver[.]"); but see O'Brien v. Town of Bellingham, 943 F.3d 514, 529 (1st Cir. 2019) (stating, without analysis, that "[w]hether Heck bars § 1983 claims is a jurisdictional question"). As the Ninth Circuit has opined, 'compliance with Heck most closely resembles the mandatory administrative exhaustion of [Prison Litigation Reform Act] claims, which constitutes an affirmative defense and not a pleading requirement.' Washington v. Los Angeles Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 833 F.3d 1048, 1056 (9th Cir. 2016). We agree that Heck does not implicate a federal court's jurisdiction; thus there is no need to reach Defendants' Heck argument at this time."); Colvin v. LeBlanc, 2 F.4th 494, 498-99 & n.20 (5th Cir. 2021) ("We have routinely characterized a Heck dismissal as one for failure to state a claim, . . . but district courts in this circuit have occasionally characterized Heck as a jurisdictional doctrine. . . We have also, at least once, affirmed a Heck dismissal granted for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. . . We therefore take this opportunity to reiterate that Heck does not pose a jurisdictional bar to the assertion of § 1983 claims. Heck discussed the scope of § 1983 claims, not subject matter jurisdiction. . . It based its holding on the 'hoary principle that civil tort actions are not appropriate vehicles for challenging the validity of outstanding criminal judgments,' and analyzed when and how a § 1983 cause of action accrues. . . By its own language, therefore, Heck implicates a plaintiff's ability to state a claim, not whether the court has jurisdiction over that claim. We therefore hold that Heck does not present a jurisdictional hurdle that would require a remand of this case to state court.[20] [fn. 20: This reading comports with the Seventh Circuit, which has held that '[t]he Heck doctrine is not a jurisdictional bar.' Polzin v. Gage, 636 F.3d 834, 837 (7th Cir. 2011). Other circuits, often in unpublished cases or in dicta, have suggested the same. [collecting cases] This view is not shared by the First Circuit, where '[w]hether Heck bars § 1983 claims is a jurisdictional question that can be raised at any time during the pendency of litigation.' O'Brien v. Town of Bellingham, 943 F.3d 514, 529 (1st Cir. 2019). And the Eleventh Circuit's approach is unclear, having recently endorsed both approaches. Compare Teagan v. City of McDonough, 949 F.3d 670, 678 (11th Cir. 2020) (noting that 'the Supreme Court's own language suggests that Heck deprives the plaintiff of a cause of action—not that it deprives a court of jurisdiction' but noting that it has not 'definitively answered that question'), with Dixon v. Hodges, 887 F.3d 1235, 1237 (11th Cir. 2018) (per curiam)

(calling Heck a rule that 'strips a district court of jurisdiction in a § 1983 suit')."]; Teagan v. City of McDonough, 949 F.3d 670, 678 (11th Cir. 2020) ("In his concurrence, Judge Tjoflat concludes that Ms. Teagan's § 1983 claims are barred by Heck v. Humphrey[.]. . Having already affirmed the grant of summary judgment in favor of the City on the § 1983 claims, we need not address the applicability of Heck. First, the Supreme Court's own language suggests that Heck deprives the plaintiff of a cause of action—not that it deprives a court of jurisdiction. . . As a result, some of our sister circuits have concluded that Heck is an affirmative defense and not a jurisdictional rule. [collecting cases]"); O'Brien v. Town of Bellingham, 943 F.3d 514, 529-30 (1st Cir. 2019) ("Whether Heck bars § 1983 claims is a jurisdictional question that can be raised at any time during the pendency of litigation. . . In this case, the record reflects that O'Brien's excessive force claims arising from the incident in the woods are 'so interrelated factually' with his state convictions arising from those events that a judgment in O'Brien's favor would 'necessarily imply' the invalidity of those convictions. . . Indeed, if the officers had used excessive force against O'Brien while arresting him in the woods, as he now claims, their unlawful behavior would have provided O'Brien with a defense against the charges for resisting arrest and assault and battery under state law. . . . Similarly, the district court correctly found that Heck bars any claim that Officer Melanson and Sergeant Perry used excessive force leading up to when O'Brien struck them with the phone handset. Granting a judgment against Officer Melanson and Sergeant Perry would have implied that O'Brien's conduct was justified, while the officers' actions were unjustified, which would have necessarily undermined the validity of O'Brien's assault and battery convictions. As we explained in Thore, although '[a] § 1983 excessive force claim brought against a police officer that arises out of the officer's use of force during an arrest does not necessarily call into question the validity of an underlying state conviction ... [,] it is not necessarily free from Heck' either. . . And because O'Brien has not specified any theory of relief, let alone attempted to identify a factual scenario which would survive Heck, we need not go any further, as any argument to that effect is waived. . . .The arguments that O'Brien does raise on appeal are confusing, conclusory, and easily discarded. First, O'Brien's assertion that the Defendants waived a defense based on Heck is unavailing as we have already noted that it is a jurisdictional issue that can be raised sua sponte by the court.")

Compare Crittindon v. LeBlanc, 37 F.4th 177, 190 (5th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 90 (2023) ("[W]e cannot agree that Plaintiffs' overdetention claims are barred by Heck and Edwards, a contention no party makes. . . The Supreme Court recently reminded us that our task is not to come up with arguments the parties should have made, but to decide the ones they make. . . When it comes to Heck in particular, our court and others have recognized that it is a defense a party must assert as opposed to some sort of jurisdictional bar. . . In any event, Heck does not bar this suit: The Heck defense 'is not ... implicated by a prisoner's challenge that threatens no consequence for his conviction or the duration of his sentence.'. . Here, the parties agree that Plaintiffs were held in excess of their sentences and Plaintiffs do not challenge their underlying conviction nor the length of their sentence.") with Crittindon v. LeBlanc, 37 F.4th 177, 195 (5th Cir. 2022) (Oldham, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 90 (2023) ("[O]fficers asserting qualified immunity can't forfeit the argument that Heck bars plaintiffs' claims. That's because qualified immunity is no 'mere defense to liability'—it's an 'immunity from suit.'. . And once officers have asserted the qualified-immunity defense, it's plaintiffs' burden to negate that assertion. . . That means plaintiffs must overcome any and all antecedent hurdles before they can subject the immunity-asserting officers to suit. And the question whether plaintiffs have a cause of action is obviously antecedent to the qualified-immunity question. In that respect, it's no different from Bivens. . .Plaintiffs who lack a cause of action under § 1983 cannot sue state officers—just as plaintiffs who lack a cause of action under Bivens cannot sue federal officers. So where the plaintiffs have no cause of action, we should never even get to the qualified immunity question.") and McNeal v. LeBlanc, 90 F.4th 425, 433-35 (5th Cir. 2024) (Jones, J., concurring), reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, 93 F.4th 840 (5th Cir. 2024), cert. denied, 145 S. Ct. 266 (2024) ("I concur that our precedent currently requires that Secretary LeBlanc be denied qualified immunity. See Parker v. LeBlanc, 73 F.4th 400 (5th Cir. 2023); Crittindon v. LeBlanc, 37 F.4th 177 (5th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, --- S. Ct. --- (2023). I further agree with Judge Duncan's special concurrence advocating en banc review of this 'mistaken' precedent, which 'makes LeBlanc answerable for the errors of subordinates, creating vicarious liability in contravention of Monell v. Dep't of Soc. Servs., 436 U.S. 658, 98 S. Ct. 2018 (1978), and Connick v. Thompson, 563 U.S. 51, 131 S. Ct. 1350 (2011).' In this case, for instance, there is nothing at all to connect LeBlanc with the events that resulted in McNeal's overdetention. But I also write separately because McNeal's claims fail for an additional reason: they are barred by Heck v. Humphrey, 512 U.S. 477, 114 S. Ct. 2394 (1994). Judge Oldham explained in depth the reasons for Heck bar in Crittindon v. LeBlanc, as he stated '[b]oth the federal habeas statute, 28 U.S.C. § 2241, and the Civil Rights Act of 1871, 42 U.S.C. § 1983, create causes of action for prisoners with constitutional claims. But the remedies offered by those two statutes—and Congress's limitations on them—differ radically.' 37 F.4th 177, 192 (5th Cir. 2022) (Oldham, J., dissenting). Specifically, 'the habeas statute offers a singular equitable remedy: release from custody. But § 1983 goes further and also offers money damages and attorney's fees.'. . Moreover, § 1983 'comes with none of' the 'numerous severe limitations' that Congress has placed on federal habeas. . . In Heck, the U.S. Supreme Court 'recognized this "potential overlap between" habeas and § 1983, and it cut off access to the latter in cases where the prisoner's claim sounds in the former.'. . 'The upshot is that, where a prisoner can obtain relief through habeas, he cannot sue under § 1983.'. . Heck built on the rule announced twenty years earlier in Preiser v. Rodriguez: 'Congress has determined that habeas corpus is the appropriate remedy for state prisoners attacking the validity of the fact or length of their confinement, and that specific determination must override the terms of § 1983.'. . . In this case, McNeal was released from custody 41 days late because the Louisiana Department of Public Safety and Corrections sent his release paperwork to the wrong facility. Thus, his case concerns a challenge to 'the fact and length of his confinement.'. . 'That means [his] only remedy lies in habeas. And the Heck doctrine plainly bars [him] from ignoring the specific terms of the habeas statute, which "must override the general terms of § 1983."'. . But McNeal made no good faith efforts to seek state habeas relief. Unlike some of the Crittindon plaintiffs, who at least filed petitions for writs of habeas corpus in Louisiana state court, . . . McNeal never made any such filings. At most, he alleges that he 'wrote a letter' to the warden of the facility where he was detained and spoke with some of the officers. These actions fall well short of a good faith effort to seek state habeas relief. Under Heck, only after McNeal successfully obtained such relief via a valid state court order declaring the confinement 'invalid' could he state a claim under § 1983. . . Allowing McNeal and other 'overdetention' plaintiffs to obtain § 1983 relief without requiring them to make even a good faith effort to obtain state habeas relief not only violates the unambiguous language of Heck and Preiser—as well as centuries of habeas jurisprudence—, it yields perverse incentives for litigants as well. . . . This court should not enable overdetained prisoners to neglect their obligation to seek habeas relief and instead bypass that remedy in order to pursue Section 1983 damages by filing for the wrong type of relief in the wrong court at the wrong time. Louisiana has serially defaulted in its obligation to release prisoners on time. It is beyond this panel's purview to analyze, much less solve this critical problem. However, we should have demonstrated confidence in the state courts' ability, through habeas corpus, to resolve individual cases by remitting individuals like McNeal to the state court system for exhaustion of remedies. This seems to me, as to Judge Oldham, a classic situation that Heck intended to address. We should revisit Crittindon en banc and overrule it.")

See also McNeal v. LeBlanc, 93 F.4th 840, 841-45 (5th Cir. 2024) (Oldham, J., joined by Jones, Smith, Ho, Duncan, Engelhardt, and Wilson, JJ., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) ("Brian McNeal sued the Secretary of the Louisiana Department of Public Safety and Corrections ("DPSC"). McNeal alleged the Secretary wrongfully detained him for 41 days. All agree McNeal could have sought habeas relief during those 41 days. But he chose not to do that. He instead slept on his habeas rights, got out of jail, and then sought declaratory relief, compensatory and punitive damages, and attorneys' fees under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. A panel of our court blessed that approach, effectively holding that the federal habeas statute and § 1983 offer prisoners like McNeal an election of remedies: The former allows prisoners to get out of jail, while the latter allows prisoners to stay in jail and then sue for compensation later. That conflicts with multiple Supreme Court cases, so we should have reheard this case en banc. . . . Despite their radically different histories and scopes, § 2241 and § 1983 have one very important commonality: On their faces, they both apply to a prisoner who says he's in state custody in violation of the federal Constitution. . . The Supreme Court has recognized this overlap and held that here, as in so many other areas, the specific controls the general. . . That is, where a prisoner seeks or could seek the specific, singular remedy of habeas (release), he cannot fall back on the general, broader remedies offered by § 1983. . . .The Crittindon-Hicks theory appears to be that the prisoner did not request a habeas remedy; the prisoner did not allege a problem in his conviction or sentence; the prisoner only claimed he was held in jail too long and in excess of his sentence; and therefore, § 1983's gates are wide open to him. The problem, of course, is that the § 1983 plaintiffs in Preiser and Edwards tried the same move and lost. In Preiser, the prisoner alleged only 'that the deprivation of [his] good-conduct-time credits was causing or would cause [him] to be in illegal physical confinement.'. . And in Edwards the prisoner alleged only a defect in the revocation of his good-time credits. Neither prisoner challenged his underlying conviction or sentence—just that he wanted to get out of jail sooner than his custodian planned. Nevertheless, the Court held that neither claim could proceed under § 1983. So it is no answer for the Hicks panel to say the § 1983 claim can forward because it does not challenge the validity of Hicks' sentence. . . .This court has twisted itself into knots to avoid a conclusion that should be obvious: A prisoner who has a habeas remedy cannot sue under § 1983. . . Our precedents embrace a contrary rule and should be overruled. It is a shame that we failed to do that here. And we will not be able to avoid reconfronting these issues when we rehear Wilson v. Midland Cnty., Texas, 89 F.4th 446 (5th Cir. 2023) (en banc rehearing granted Feb. 14, 2024). For now, I respectfully dissent.")

See also Herrera v. Agents of Pennsylvania Board of Probation & Parole, No. 23-1123, 2025 WL 810242, at *2-5 (3d Cir. Mar. 14, 2025) ("Because Herrera alleges that he was detained for seven months past his maximum release date, we construe his claim as one of overdetention. Detention beyond an inmate's maximum term of imprisonment may constitute cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment and give rise to a claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . . [T]o avoid Heck's favorable termination requirement, a plaintiff 'must demonstrate that success on his § 1983 claims would not conflict with the prior judicial resolution of his criminal proceedings.'. . As a result, to determine whether Heck applies, a court must look at the plaintiff's § 1983 claims, assume the plaintiff successfully proves those claims, and evaluate if such a resolution would undermine the legal validity of his conviction or sentence. . . If the court concludes that a judgment in the plaintiff's favor on such a claim would undermine the conviction or sentence, then Heck's favorable termination requirement would apply. If a judgment in the plaintiff's favor would not undermine his conviction or sentence, then Heck's favorable termination requirement would not apply. Under this framework, Heck's favorable termination requirement does not apply to a plaintiff who claims only that he was detained beyond the maximum period of the sentence imposed when such a claim does not imply that his conviction or sentence are legally invalid. Following this same reasoning, several Courts of Appeals have determined Heck does not bar certain overdetention claims. The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit determined Heck was inapplicable to a series of § 1983 claims alleging that ministerial errors caused inmates to serve more time than their maximum imposed sentences. [citing McNeal v. LeBlanc] Likewise, the Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit observed that Heck's favorable termination requirement did not bar a plaintiff's Federal Tort Claims Act complaint asserting overdetention based on prison officials' 'putting down the wrong date as the start date of his incarceration,' because resolution in the plaintiff's favor would not 'impl[y] the invalidity of his conviction or of the sentence imposed.'. . The Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit employed similar reasoning, concluding that Heck did not bar a plaintiff's claims that defendants' deliberate indifference 'caused him to spend an extra year in prison rather than on mandatory supervised release' when the officials did not investigate the residential sites for his supervised release, despite prison directives requiring them to do so. . . We agree with our sister circuits that Heck's favorable termination requirement does not apply to an overdetention claim that accepts the validity of the maximum sentence imposed but alleges that deliberate indifference delayed the execution of an inmate's release beyond that sentence. . . Instead of calling a substantive judgment into question, such a claim accepts the judgment and challenges some separate action or inaction that delays a prisoner's release. Such allegations 'seek[ ] to vindicate,'. . . rather than collaterally attack, a conviction or sentence[.] . . Put differently, Heck does not apply when a prisoner alleges that he and the state agree on the appropriate maximum release date, yet he was held beyond that date.

Here, Herrera alleges that, under the sentence imposed, he should have been released no later than sometime in March 2019, but instead he was released in October 2019. He does not challenge a court order or substantive administrative proceeding, but rather alleges that a ministerial error caused him to remain in prison after the duration of his maximum sentence. . . Reading the complaint in the light most favorable to Herrera, it appears that the Board agreed that Herrera's maximum prison sentence ended on March 4, 2019 and that he was not released until months later. Based on these allegations, if he prevails, the resulting judgment will not undermine his conviction or the sentence imposed. Rather, it would simply reflect that he was held in custody longer than the sentence contemplated. As a result, the allegations and relief sought in Herrera's complaint do not implicate Heck's concerns and, thus, its favorable termination requirement does not apply."); Hicks v. LeBlanc, 81 F.4th 497, 506, 509-10 (5th Cir. 2023) ("As in Crittindon, Hicks does not challenge the validity of his sentence, merely the execution of his release. He seeks to vindicate—not undermine—his sentence. As in Crittindon, the Parties agree that Hicks was held in excess of his sentence. And as in Crittindon, if Hicks were to succeed based on the period he was held beyond his original sentence, it would not invalidate the conviction or its attendant sentence. Crittindon controls this case. Heck is no bar here. . . . The implications of Appellants' arguments expose their weakness. Applying Heck to any case also cognizable under habeas would obviate many § 1983 remedies the Supreme Court continues to recognize, such as those for First Amendment retaliatory arrest, malicious prosecution, and Fourth Amendment unlawful pretrial detention, among others. Expanding Heck as Appellants ask is a request that would overturn a wealth of this Court's precedent on those subjects. In sum, requiring overdetained plaintiffs to rely on state habeas would, in practice, deprive them of a remedy under the federal Constitution. Consider the following: Louisiana requires prisoners to avail themselves of its Administrative Remedy Process, which can take up to 90 days, before asserting the required state habeas claim. The habeas process can take months, all the while the state can defeat a favorable outcome for the plaintiffs by releasing the prisoners during the pendency of the habeas proceedings, as doing so would leave the prisoner without a cognizable § 1983 claim. In other words, under Appellants' conception of Heck, the state can continue to detain prisoners for months past the expiration of their duly imposed sentences without consequence under the federal Constitution. This effectively utilizes the filing of state habeas proceedings as a cover for Louisiana's systemic failures. That, quite simply, is not the law. The district court did not err in concluding that Hicks' claims were not barred by Heck." [footnotes omitted]) Accord, McNeal v. LeBlanc, 90 F.4th 425, 431 (5th Cir. 2024) reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, 93 F.4th 840 (5th Cir. 2024), cert. denied, 145 S. Ct. 266 (2024) (Heck no bar "where McNeal does not challenge his conviction or attendant sentence, but rather the 41 days he was imprisoned beyond his release date.")

On the question of whether a Heck dismissal counts as a "strike" under the PLRA, compare Cotton v. Noeth, 96 F.4th 249, 256-59 (2d Cir. 2024) ("The district court below held that the Lema dismissal constituted a strike, relying on Heck v. Humphrey, noting that other district courts in this circuit have held that Heck dismissals are PLRA strikes. See, e.g., Toliver v. Colvin, No. 12-CV-00227V( ), 2016 WL 11258222, at *10 (W.D.N.Y. Sept. 28, 2016), report and recommendation adopted as modified, No. 12-CV-227(LJV)(LGF), 2017 WL 547963 (W.D.N.Y. Feb. 10, 2017);

McDaniels v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, No. 15-cv-6163 (KMK), 2016 WL 6997525, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 29, 2016). The district court noted, however, that the Second Circuit had not yet ruled on the issue. The Attorney General argues that we need not decide whether the Lema dismissal constitutes a strike. We conclude there is good reason to reach the question. . . . The circuits that have considered the issue are split as to whether Heck dismissals count as PLRA strikes. See Lomax, 140 S. Ct. at 1724 n.2 (noting the circuit split but not reaching the issue). The Third, Fifth, Tenth, and D.C. Circuits agree that Heck dismissals always count as PLRA strikes. See, e.g., Garrett v. Murphy, 17 F.4th 419, 427 (3d Cir. 2021) ("We now join the Fifth, Tenth, and D.C. Circuits in holding that the dismissal of an action for failure to meet Heck's favorable-termination requirement counts as a PLRA strike for failure to state a claim."). The Seventh Circuit, however, has expressly adopted the position Cotton is arguing here. See, e.g., Mejia v. Harrington, 541 F. App'x 709, 710 (7th Cir. 2013) (unpublished) ("Heck ... deal[s] with timing rather than the merits of litigation .... As a result, neither this suit nor the appeal counts as a 'strike' under § 1915(g)."); see also Courtney v. Butler, 66 F.4th 1043, 1049 n.1 (7th Cir. 2023) (noting that the Seventh Circuit is in the "jurisdictional affirmative-defense camp"). The Ninth Circuit has taken a qualified position, holding that "[a] Heck dismissal is not categorically frivolous -- that is, having 'no basis in law or fact,' " because "plaintiffs may have meritorious claims that do not accrue until the underlying criminal proceedings have been successfully challenged." Washington v. L.A. Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 833 F.3d 1048, 1055 (9th Cir. 2016) (citation omitted). At the same time, the Ninth Circuit observed that 'so-called Heck dismissals come in various guises,'. . . and concluded that a Heck dismissal can constitute a PLRA strike for failure to state a claim depending on the circumstances. . . We agree that Heck dismissals do not categorically count as a strike. Rather, we hold that whether a Heck dismissal qualifies as a strike depends on the circumstances. The key is whether the dismissal turned on the merits or whether it was simply a matter of sequencing or timing. As we have explained, the rule created by the Supreme Court in Heck is an 'accrual rule designed to avoid inconsistent results and new avenues of collateral attack.' Smalls v. Collins, 10 F.4th 117, 137 (2d Cir. 2021) (citing Heck, 512 U.S. at 486-89, 114 S.Ct. 2364). Heck dismissals therefore do not reflect a final judgment on the merits; instead, such dismissals 'reflect a matter of "judicial traffic control" and prevent civil actions from collaterally attacking existing criminal judgments.'. . . [O]ne consideration is remediability. There may be cases where it is apparent from the complaint that Heck is an irremediable bar -- for example, if it is clear from a complaint that a plaintiff can no longer challenge an underlying conviction (e.g., for timing reasons or because he has already done so), the Heck dismissal should count as a strike because the failure to invalidate the conviction is irremediable. In these circumstances, the Heck dismissal would constitute a final judgment on the merits. But a dismissal under Heck 'without prejudice as premature until [plaintiff] has succeeded in overturning his conviction,'. . . is not a PLRA strike because it is not 'irremediably defective, and dismissal of such [a case] is not based on a determination that it ultimately cannot succeed.'. . As the dissent acknowledges, the 'presumption' that Heck dismissals are strikes because they are Rule 12(b)(6) dismissals 'may not be absolute.'. . As we concluded in Snider, dismissals for prematurity do not constitute a failure to state a claim 'in the context of the PLRA[.]' . . In other words, even crediting the dissent's conclusion that suits dismissed under Heck functionally do not 'state a claim' under Rule 12(b)(6) because they lack a present cause of action, those dismissals still do not constitute PLRA strikes. While Section § 1915(g) 'refers to any dismissal for failure to state a claim, whether with prejudice or without,'. . . this Court has made clear that 'fail[ure] to state a claim' was not intended to apply to 'suits dismissed without prejudice for failure to comply with a procedural prerequisite.'. .In light of these considerations, here we conclude that the Lema dismissal does not constitute a strike under the PLRA, for the dismissal clearly turned on sequencing and timing rather than the merits. The district court in Lema twice wrote that the basis for dismissal was prematurity. Its language makes clear that it was not passing judgment as to the merits of Cotton's claims in the case, but rather that it was dismissing the claims without prejudice to Cotton returning to court if he succeeded in overturning his conviction. Indeed, the district court surmised that Cotton might have filed the complaint 'prophylactically,' because of concerns that the statute of limitations might run. . . The district court clearly was of the view that the Heck bar was remediable. We also note that the Lema court's citation to Section 1915(e)(2)(B) did not specify which prong of that subsection the court was invoking. . . Because the Lema court may have dismissed Cotton's suit for reasons that are permitted under Section 1915(e)(2)(B) but not enumerated in Section 1915(g), it would be inappropriate to presume there was a strike. . . Section 1915(e)(2)(B) provides three separate grounds for dismissing a prisoner's claim: the action is '(i) frivolous or malicious; (ii) fails to state a claim upon which relief may be granted; or (iii) seeks monetary relief against a defendant who is immune from such relief.'. . Thus, the first two grounds for dismissal under § 1915(e)(2)(B) are also grounds for a PLRA strike under Section 1915(g), but the third is not. As the Third Circuit has explained, a strike is appropriate only where a court gives a basis for dismissal that clearly falls within one of the categories enumerated in Section 1915(g). . . Given the lack of specificity here and the remediable nature of the dismissal, we conclude the Lema dismissal was not a PLRA strike.") with Cotton v. Noeth, 96 F.4th 249, 259-64 (2d Cir. 2024) (Walker, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The majority concludes that an action dismissed under Heck is generally not 'dismissed on the grounds that it ... fails to state a claim upon which relief may be granted,' 28 U.S.C. § 1915(g), except where that dismissal 'constitute[d] a final judgment on the merits[.]'. . I disagree. When a court dismisses a § 1983 action under Heck, it generally does so because the plaintiff has 'fail[ed] to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.'. . And the Supreme Court has held that '[t]he text of Section 1915(g)'s three-strikes provision refers to any dismissal for failure to state a claim, whether with prejudice or without.' Lomax v. Ortiz-Marquez, 590 U.S. ——, 140 S. Ct. 1721, 1723, 207 L.Ed.2d 132 (2020). Therefore, § 1915(g) presumptively imposes a strike for every Heck dismissal. . . .'Heck is clear. Suits dismissed for failure to meet Heck's favorable-termination requirement are dismissed because the plaintiff lacks a valid "cause of action" under § 1983.'. . Favorable termination is an 'element that must be alleged and proved.'. . Without it, an action challenging the validity of a sentence or conviction 'is not cognizable under § 1983.'. . Because Heck determines when a § 1983 suit is 'cognizable,' Heck dismissals are governed by Rule 12(b)(6). Rule 12(b)(6) authorizes dismissal of an action when the initiating complaint 'fail[s] to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.'. . 'Claim' is often synonymous with a 'cause of action.'. . So, when a plaintiff lacks a cause of action, courts dismiss the case under Rule 12(b)(6). . . Cases dismissed under Heck are no exception. . . .Heck expressly rejected the majority's comparison: 'We do not engraft an exhaustion requirement upon § 1983, but rather deny the existence of a cause of action.'. . This is an important distinction, both legally and practically. . . .First, as Heck explained, the two kinds of dismissals have different implications for statutes of limitations. When Heck applies, a § 1983 claim does not accrue until after the contested judgment is invalidated. As a result, a § 1983 plaintiff need not seek equitable tolling of a statute of limitations to preserve his claim 'while state challenges to the conviction or sentence [are] being exhausted.'. . By contrast, when Heck does not apply, the limitations period may continue to run while a § 1983 plaintiff exhausts his administrative remedies. . . Thus, conflating Heck's rule and exhaustion of administrative remedies creates an inconsistency: it treats Heck as creating an administrative bar for purposes of the PLRA, but a claim-accrual rule for purposes of § 1983. Second, and more fundamentally, Heck reflects concern for finality, not just ripeness. Invalidating a prior conviction or sentence ordinarily requires impugning a judgment entitled to the 'presumption of regularity.'. . Partly for this reason, the Supreme Court understood Heck as applying the 'hoary principle that civil tort actions are not appropriate vehicles for challenging the validity of outstanding criminal judgments.'. . No such presumption of regularity arises, however, when exhausting administrative remedies. To the contrary, because exhaustion requires no success on the merits, a failure to exhaust may be 'simply' cured. . . In short, we typically presume that a Heck-barred claim may never be brought, but that an exhaustion-barred claim may be. . . .To sum up: Heck dismissals have little in common with administrative-exhaustion dismissals, whether under the PLRA, broader legal principles, or practically. Heck dismissals therefore must fall under the general rule applicable to all Rule 12(b)(6) dismissals: they presumptively count as strikes under § 1915(g).")

See also Brunson v. Stein, 116 F.4th 301, 304-09 & n.3 (4th Cir. 2024) ("Today, we hold that a Heck dismissal is necessarily for failure to state a claim and thus counts as a PLRA strike. . . . In his complaint, Brunson acknowledged that he had previously filed four § 1983 suits that were all dismissed under Heck. Nevertheless, he moved to proceed in forma pauperis. The district court initially granted Brunson's request. But it later vacated that order after deciding that Brunson was precluded from proceeding in forma pauperis by the PLRA's three-strikes rule. In reaching this decision, the court found that Brunson's prior dismissals under Heck were for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. So Brunson prepaid the $402 fee to file suit. Later, for reasons not relevant here, the district court dismissed his § 1983 complaint. Brunson timely appealed. He then applied to proceed on appeal without prepaying fees. In the application, Brunson argued that he does not have any PLRA strikes because Heck dismissals do not count as strikes under the PLRA. . . . This question is the subject of an entrenched circuit split. . . The Third, Fifth, Tenth, and D.C. Circuits have held that Heck dismissals are necessarily for failure to state a claim. See Garrett v. Murphy, 17 F.4th 419, 427 (3d Cir. 2021); Colvin v. LeBlanc, 2 F.4th 494, 497– 99 (5th Cir. 2021); Smith v. Veterans Admin., 636 F.3d 1306, 1312 (10th Cir. 2011); In re Jones, 652 F.3d 36, 38 (D.C. Cir. 2011). The Second, Seventh, and Ninth Circuits, meanwhile, have held, to varying degrees, that Heck dismissals are not, or sometimes are not, strikes under the PLRA. See Cotton v. Noeth, 96 F.4th 249, 257 (2d Cir. 2024) (holding that "whether a Heck dismissal qualifies as a strike depends on ... whether the dismissal turned on the merits or whether it was simply a matter of sequencing or timing"); Washington v. L.A. Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 833 F.3d 1048, 1055

(9th Cir. 2016) (holding that a Heck dismissal counts as a strike only when "Heck's bar to relief is so obvious from the face of the complaint, and the entirety of the complaint is dismissed for a qualifying reason under the PLRA"); Mejia v. Harrington, 541 F. App'x 709, 710 (7th Cir. 2013) (holding that Heck "deal[s] with timing rather than the merits of litigation").[3] [fn. 3: Whether the First and Eleventh Circuits classify a Heck dismissal as one for failure to state a claim is unclear. Compare O'Brien v. Town of Bellingham, 943 F.3d 514, 529 (1st Cir. 2019) (stating that '[w]hether Heck bars § 1983 claims is a jurisdictional question'), with Figueroa v. Rivera, 147 F.3d 77, 81 (1st Cir. 1998) (describing the favorable-termination requirement as an 'element' of plaintiff's claim); Harrigan v. Metro Dade Police Dep't Station #4, 977 F.3d 1185 n.4 (11th Cir. 2020) (explaining that the circuit's precedents had previously 'said in dicta that Heck strips a federal court of jurisdiction' but also that 'Heck deprives the plaintiff of a cause of action,' and ultimately declining to decide the issue).] Until now, our Circuit had not waded into this conceptual morass. . . Today, we conclude that Heck's favorable-termination requirement is an element of the type of § 1983 claims Heck identified. . . Accordingly, we hold that a dismissal under Heck is necessarily a dismissal for 'failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted' and qualifies as a PLRA strike. . . .[A] Heck-barred plaintiff fails to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. A plaintiff who has no 'cause of action,'. . . has no claim either. . . The Supreme Court has recognized as much: If a plaintiff fails to plead a required element and his claim is thus 'not cognizable under § 1983,' the appropriate remedy is dismissal for failure to state a claim. . . .In sum, everything in Heck points to the conclusion that favorable termination is an element of a plaintiff's cause of action under § 1983. Arguments to the contrary don't hold water. And without a cause of action, a plaintiff has no claim upon which relief may be granted. So the dismissal of an action under Heck is a dismissal for failure to state a claim and thus a strike under the PLRA."); Gilmore v. Dart, 2024 WL 2813340, at *1 n. † (7th Cir. June 3, 2024) (not reported) ("Gilmore has received strikes for three cases in our circuit . . . One of Gilmore's strikes stemmed from a dismissal based on the doctrine of Heck v. Humphrey. . . An appeal by a different plaintiff is pending in this court raising the question of whether a complaint dismissed as Heck-barred qualifies for a strike under 28 U.S.C. § 1915(g), Holmes v. Marion County, No. 22-3032."); Ray v. Lara, 31 F.4th 692, 697-99 (9th Cir. 2022) ("We have held that a Heck dismissal 'may constitute a PLRA strike for failure to state a claim when Heck's bar to relief is obvious from the face of the complaint, and the entirety of the complaint is dismissed for a qualifying reason under the PLRA.' Washington, 833 F.3d at 1055. Thus, we must consider the complaints in Farrell and Basa to determine whether Heck's bar to relief was facially obvious in each case. [court finds Heck bar to relief was facially obvious in both cases and third complaint was facially lacking in merit where absolute prosecutorial immunity was obvious from face of complaint] In sum, the district court properly assessed three strikes based on Ray's prior dismissals in Farrell, Basa, and Friedlander."); Garrett v. Murphy, 17 F.4th 419, 423-24, 427-28 (3d Cir. 2021) ("Because Garrett has filed many fruitless lawsuits, this Court queried whether he should be allowed to avoid prepaying filing fees under the three-strikes rule. 28 U.S.C. § 1915(g). Garrett's eligibility to avoid prepaying fees turns in part on whether suits barred by Heck v. Humphrey are properly dismissed for failure to state a claim. . . Because this is an important question of law that has divided the circuits, we appointed the Georgetown Law Appellate Courts Immersion Clinic as amicus to address this and other issues relevant to Garrett's application. Amicus has ably discharged its responsibilities, but we nevertheless conclude that Garrett has struck out. A suit dismissed under Heck is dismissed for failure to state a claim and counts as a strike. We will deny Garrett's motion to proceed in forma pauperis. To press his appeal, Garrett must first pay the filing fee. . . . Every year, pro se prisoners file over one thousand civil-rights suits in this circuit. . . Many of these suits are barred by Heck's favorable-termination requirement, but courts must nevertheless use their limited time to read the pleadings and dismiss them, delaying justice in other cases. And yet, until now, we have never addressed in a precedential opinion whether a dismissal under Heck counts as a PLRA strike for failure to state a claim. . . Several other circuits have addressed this issue. The Fifth, Tenth, and D.C. Circuits have held that dismissals for failure to meet Heck's favorable-termination requirement count as dismissals for failure to state a claim. Colvin v. Le-Blanc, 2 F.4th 494, 499 (5th Cir. 2021); Smith v. Veterans Admin., 636 F.3d 1306, 1311–12 (10th Cir. 2011); In re Jones, 652 F.3d 36, 38 (D.C. Cir. 2011). The Seventh and Ninth Circuits, however, have characterized Heck's favorable-termination requirement as an affirmative defense subject to 'waiver,' analogous to an exhaustion requirement. Polzin v. Gage, 636 F.3d 834, 838 (7th Cir. 2011); Washington v. L.A. Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 833 F.3d 1048, 1056 (9th Cir. 2016). The First and Eleventh Circuits have described Heck's favorable-termination requirement as both 'jurisdictional' and as an 'element' of a claim for damages arising from a conviction or sentence under § 1983. Compare O'Brien v. Town of Bellingham, 943 F.3d 514, 529 (1st Cir. 2019), with Figueroa v. Rivera, 147 F.3d 77, 81 (1st Cir. 1998); see also Harrigan v. Metro Dade Police Dep't Station #4, 977 F.3d 1185, 1191 n.4 (11th Cir. 2020). For our part, we recently held that Heck's favorable-termination requirement 'does not implicate a federal court's jurisdiction.' Vuyanich v. Smithton Borough, 5 F.4th 379, 389 (3d Cir. 2021). We now join the Fifth, Tenth, and D.C. Circuits in holding that the dismissal of an action for failure to meet Heck's favorable-termination requirement counts as a PLRA strike for failure to state a claim. We do so for a simple reason: Any other rule is incompatible with Heck. Heck is clear. Suits dismissed for failure to meet Heck's favorable-termination requirement are dismissed because the plaintiff lacks a valid 'cause of action' under § 1983, and a cause of action in this context is synonymous with a 'claim' under the PLRA. . . This is consistent with the Supreme Court's consistent interpretation of Heck's favorable-termination requirement as necessary to bring 'a complete and present cause of action' under § 1983. McDonough v. Smith, 139 S. Ct. 2149, 2158 (2019) (citation omitted). It is also consistent with the tort of malicious prosecution Heck relied on. Favorable termination is (and always has been) a necessary element of a malicious prosecution claim. . . .Without favorable termination, a plaintiff lacks a claim, and the complaint must be dismissed as premature for failure to state a claim. . . Dismissals for failure to meet Heck's favorable-termination element therefore count as PLRA strikes for failure to state a claim."); Washington v. Los Angeles Cty. Sheriff's Dep't, 833 F.3d 1048, 1055-56 & n.4 (9th Cir. 2016) ("Washington advances several arguments concerning why Heck dismissals do not qualify as strikes. . . First, we address the legal framework for determining when a Heck dismissal constitutes a strike, including whether such dismissals may be 'frivolous, malicious, or fail[ ] to state a claim' under the PLRA. 28 U.S.C. § 1915(g). Ultimately, we hold that a dismissal may constitute a PLRA strike for failure to state a claim when Heck's bar to relief is obvious from the face of the complaint, and the entirety of the complaint is dismissed for a qualifying reason under the PLRA. Second, we apply this legal framework to the facts of Washington's case, and conclude that the Heck dismissal in question, No. 2:09-CV-3052, does not constitute a PLRA strike. . . . First, Washington contends that a complaint dismissed under Heck, standing alone, is not a per se 'frivolous' or 'malicious' complaint. We agree. A Heck dismissal is not categorically frivolous—that is, having 'no basis in law or fact,'. . . because plaintiffs may have meritorious claims that do not accrue until the underlying criminal proceedings have been successfully challenged. . . For this reason, a Heck dismissal is made without prejudice, such that a prisoner may refile the complaint once his conviction has been overturned. . . . Neither do all Heck dismissals categorically count as dismissals for failure to state a claim under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). We have previously determined that the language 'fails to state a claim upon which relief may be granted' in § 1915(g), tracks the language of Rule 12(b)(6), and that dismissals under Rule 12(b)(6) may constitute strikes within the meaning of the PLRA. . . We now hold that Heck dismissals may constitute Rule 12(b)(6) dismissals for failure to state a claim when the pleadings present an 'obvious bar to securing relief' under Heck. . . We do not hold, however, that a successful challenge to the underlying criminal proceedings, i.e., 'favorable termination,' is a necessary element of a civil damages claim under § 1983. . . Section 1983 merely requires that a litigant allege a 'deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws,' and that the challenged conduct transpire 'under color of [state law].'. . The fact that a conviction has been set aside is not an element of the claim at issue. Indeed, a particular plaintiff's need to demonstrate that his conviction has been set aside is contingent on a threshold legal determination, made by the court, that the requested relief would undermine the underlying conviction. . . Instead, compliance with Heck most closely resembles the mandatory administrative exhaustion of PLRA claims, which constitutes an affirmative defense and not a pleading requirement. . . Like dismissals for lack of administrative exhaustion, Heck dismissals do not reflect a final determination on the underlying merits of the case. . . Rather, Heck dismissals reflect a matter of 'judicial traffic control' and prevent civil actions from collaterally attacking existing criminal judgments. . . Therefore, as with affirmative defenses, a court may properly dismiss a Heck-barred claim under Rule 12(b)(6) if there exists an 'obvious bar to securing relief on the face of the complaint.'. . With respect to No. 2:09-CV-3052, the Heck deficiency was plain from the face of the complaint, as Washington sought a 'recall' of his allegedly unlawful sentence, thereby revealing that it was still extant. . . . In light of the above analysis of Heck, we must next decide whether the dismissal in No. 2:09-CV-3052 triggered a PLRA strike. Before proceeding, however, we clarify that so-called Heck dismissals come in various guises. This is an important distinction because only a complete dismissal of an action under Heck—rather than the dismissal of a particular claim within that action—constitutes a strike. . . Broadly speaking, there are two kinds of cases in which Heck is implicated. The first type was presented in Heck itself, where a prisoner filed a civil suit seeking purely money damages related to an allegedly unlawful conviction. . . Heck barred the suit because an award of damages would undermine the validity of the underlying conviction, and the entire action therefore faced dismissal under Heck. . . Another type is the one we have before us, in which a prisoner seeks injunctive relief challenging his sentence or conviction—and further seeks monetary relief for damages attributable to the same sentence or conviction. The first request, for injunctive relief, sounds in habeas, and is not subject to the PLRA's regime. . . The second request, seeking damages, is intertwined with Washington's plea for injunctive relief, and is therefore subject to dismissal under Heck. When we are presented with multiple claims within a single action, we assess a PLRA strike only when the 'case as a whole' is dismissed for a qualifying reason under the Act. . . Although one portion of Washington's action might have been dismissed for failure to comply with Heck, the remainder sounds only in habeas. A habeas action, as we have held, is not a 'civil action' within the purview of the PLRA because it operates to challenge the validity of a criminal proceeding, and its dismissal does not trigger a strike. . . As a result, Washington has not accrued a strike for the dismissal of his first suit, No. 2:09-CV-3052, because the entire action was not dismissed for one of the qualifying reasons enumerated by the Act. . . Considered from another angle, the Heck-dismissed claims were part and parcel of Washington's legal challenge to his criminal sentence. Washington sought relief from the fact or duration of his confinement, specifically a 'recall of his sentence,' and related monetary damages. This prompted the district court to advise him that habeas proceedings were 'the proper mechanism' for challenges to his sentence. Until Washington has proven the invalidity of that sentence, he is barred from obtaining damages arising from it. . . Because Washington's Heck-barred damages claims are thus intertwined with his habeas challenge to the underlying sentence, we decline to impose a strike with respect to his entire action. This approach squares with the underlying purposes of the PLRA, where Congress was preoccupied with the proliferation of civil-rights suits challenging prison conditions—not criminal convictions. . . . The two circuit courts to consider this issue directly have both held that Heck dismissals may constitute a strike for 'failure to state a claim,' although their reasoning on this score is overbroad. See Smith v. Veterans Admin., 636 F.3d 1306, 1312 (10th Cir. 2011) (holding that "the favorable termination of a habeas case is an essential element of a prisoner's civil claim for damages brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 that necessarily implies the invalidity of the prisoner's conviction"); In re Jones, 652 F.3d 36, 37 (D.C. Cir. 2011) (per curiam) (adopting the reasoning in Smith); see also Hamilton v. Lyons, 74 F.3d 99, 103 (5th Cir. 1996) (holding, with scant analysis, that Heck dismissals are categorically "frivolous").")

III. METHODS OF ESTABLISHING LOCAL GOVERNMENT LIABILITY AFTER MONELL

See generally Stucker v. Louisville Metro Government, No. 23-5214, 2024 WL 2135407, at *9, *12 (6th Cir. May 13, 2024) (not published) ("There are four theories of municipal responsibility: '(1) the existence of an illegal official policy or legislative enactment; (2) that an official with final decision making authority ratified illegal actions; (3) the existence of a policy of inadequate training or supervision; or (4) the existence of a custom of tolerance or acquiescence of federal rights violations.'. . Plaintiffs pursue the third and fourth of these theories by arguing that LMPD had both a policy of inadequate training and a custom of tolerance of, or acquiescence in, issuing invalid warrants. . . .Notably, although the two theories (inadequate training and acquiescence) differ in some ways, they both require deliberate indifference and causation. . . .As was the case in Shadrick, the inadequate training alleged here related to the failure to ensure that municipal employees receive necessary training on one of their job responsibilities—writing and executing warrants. Likewise, here, there is an 'obvious need to train police officers who lack knowledge of [their] constitutional constraints;' a need illustrated by Troutman's admitted lack of knowledge about proper drafting and execution of search warrants. . . Deliberate indifference is also directly implicated by the Heintze Report's finding that LMPD has a 'culture of acceptance' of impropriety, including by ignoring procedures in place to ensure constitutional compliance."); Starbuck v. Williamsburg James City County School Bd., 28 F.4th 529, 532-33 (4th Cir. 2022) ("For the purpose of determining liability under Monell, local school boards in Virginia are treated as municipalities. . . Monell permits suits against a municipality for a federal constitutional deprivation only when the municipality undertook the allegedly unconstitutional action pursuant to an 'official policy' or 'custom.'. .The district court held that Monell limited municipal liability to occasions when the municipality's express policy allegedly violated a constitutional right. Although that may be the most common basis for liability under Monell, it is not the only one. Rather, [a] policy or custom for which a municipality may be held liable can arise in four ways: (1) through an express policy, such as a written ordinance or regulation; (2) through the decisions of a person with final policymaking authority; (3) through an omission, such as a failure to properly train officers, that 'manifest[s] deliberate indifference to the rights of citizens'; or (4) through a practice that is so 'persistent and widespread' as to constitute a 'custom or usage with the force of law.'"); Jackson v. City of Cleveland, 925 F.3d 793, 828 (6th Cir. 2019), rehearing en banc denied (June 27, 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 855 (2020) ("There are four methods of showing the municipality had such a policy or custom: the plaintiff may prove "(1) the existence of an illegal official policy or legislative enactment; (2) that an official with final decision making authority ratified illegal actions; (3) the existence of a policy of inadequate training or supervision; or (4) the existence of a custom of tolerance or acquiescence of federal rights violations." Burgess v. Fischer, 735 F.3d 462, 478 (6th Cir. 2013) (citation omitted).")

See also Sorcan v. Rock Ridge School District, No. 24-1333, 2025 WL 796318, at *3–4 (8th Cir. Mar. 13, 2025) ("The district court determined that Sorcan had failed to state a Monell claim because she had not identified a persistent pattern of unconstitutional misconduct by the District. Under Monell, '[s]ection 1983 liability for a constitutional violation may attach to [the District] if the violation resulted from (1) an "official [government] policy," (2) an unofficial "custom," or (3) a deliberately indifferent failure to train or supervise.'. . 'Policy and custom are not the same thing.'. . A custom is 'a persistent, widespread pattern of unconstitutional conduct of which officials have notice and subsequently react with deliberate indifference or tacit authorization.'. . A policy, by contrast, is 'a deliberate choice of a guiding principle or procedure made by the [government] official who has final authority regarding such matters.'. . A single decision by a government's 'authorized decisionmakers' to adopt a particular course of action 'surely represents an act of official government policy,' regardless of 'whether or not that body had taken similar action in the past or intended to do so in the future.'. . In support of its contention that Sorcan needed to identify a 'persistent pattern of unconstitutional misconduct,' the district court cited Furlow v. Belmar, 52 F.4th 393, 406 (8th Cir. 2022). In Furlow, the court was concerned with whether the plaintiff had established the existence of a 'custom or usage.'. . Had Sorcan sought to demonstrate Monell liability solely on the basis that the District had an unofficial custom of engaging in 'a continuing widespread, persistent pattern of unconstitutional misconduct,' as in Furlow, we could agree with the district court that Sorcan had failed to state a claim against the District. However, even if we assume that the censure itself was not a policy, Sorcan also alleged that the District had an unwritten policy of retaliating against individuals for their protected speech. . . She therefore need not identify a persistent pattern of unconstitutional misconduct so long as she identifies that a constitutional violation resulted from authorized decisionmakers making 'a deliberate choice of a guiding principle or procedure.'. . The district court erred in requiring that Sorcan identify a persistent pattern of unconstitutional misconduct."); Howard v. City of Durham, 68 F.4th 934, 952-54 (4th Cir. 2023) ("Howard . . . argues that the district court erred in granting summary judgment to the City on his Monell claim. He contends that DPD had an express policy requiring that Brady material regarding confidential informants be kept secret, in violation of its constitutional obligations. In the alternative, he argues that DPD's practice of suppressing information regarding confidential informants was persistent and widespread enough to qualify as a custom under Monell. This policy or custom, Howard continues, led to Dowdy's failure to disclose evidence of Jackson's status as a paid police informant and deprived Howard of the right to a fair trial. Howard argues that, without evidence that Jackson was an informant with deep ties to the New York Boys, he was unable to demonstrate her motive to falsely implicate him in the murders and divert attention from the true perpetrators. Ultimately, however, we are not convinced that such a violation can be laid at the City's doorstep. Importantly, 'municipal liability attaches only when the decision maker is the municipality's governing body, a municipal agency, or an official possessing final authority to create official policy.'. . This policymaker involvement is required because, as the Supreme Court has made clear, Monell liability is not respondeat superior liability under a different moniker. . . Municipalities are responsible only for 'their own illegal acts.'. . So, to hold a municipality liable for a constitutional violation under Monell, a plaintiff must prove 'the existence of an official policy or custom that is fairly attributable to the municipality and that proximately caused the deprivation of their rights.'. . The policy or custom may be expressed in one of several forms: (1) [T]hrough an express policy, such as a written ordinance or regulation; (2) through the decisions of a person with final policymaking authority; (3) through an omission, such as a failure to properly train officers, that manifest[s] deliberate indifference to the rights of citizens; or (4) through a practice that is so persistent and widespread as to constitute a custom or usage with the force of law. Starbuck v. Williamsburg James City Cnty. Sch. Bd., 28 F.4th 529, 533 (4th Cir. 2022) . . . Howard seeks to establish a policy or custom through either the first or fourth method. . . . [E]ven accepting that withholding Brady evidence of confidential-informant status was an express policy of DPD's Organized Crime Division, . . . there is no evidence that it was an express policy of the City. Instead, Howard has identified a set of practices followed by the captain of one police department. The creator of these practices is unknown, and there is no evidence regarding whether the police chief or someone with higher authority ever approved of the policy. Notably, '[w]hether an official has sufficient policymaking authority is a question of state law.'. . And critically to this case, this Court has already rejected the idea that a police captain can set policies for a city, absent any state law granting such authority, noting that a 'police department has multiple captains and multiple lieutenants, and it is far-fetched to assert that each of these individuals has the power to be a final policymaker for the city.'. . Howard argues that requiring proof of policy approval by a final policymaker conflates the proof required to show an express policy with that required to demonstrate the second type of Monell liability, a custom or policy shown through the decisions of a person with final policymaking authority. But he misses a foundational principle of Monell liability—that municipalities are liable only for 'acts which the municipality has officially sanctioned or ordered.'. . On this point, it's simple: he cannot show that the policy described by Captain Kelly was an official policy of the City because he's offered no proof it was ever approved of by the City. And in any event, this Court rejected the same arguments Howard now raises in Lytle v. Doyle, where we held that a police captain's memorandum containing 'a fixed plan for dealing with protesters' could not 'constitute an official written policy of the City because it was never approved by the City Manager' or even the police chief. . . In the alternative, Howard argues that DPD had a persistent and widespread practice of failing to disclose the status of confidential informants who were testifying in cases and that this practice is sufficient to satisfy the fourth method for showing Monell liability. But fatally to his claim, Howard offers evidence of only a single incident of unconstitutional activity: the incident in this very case. . . And 'proof of a single incident of the unconstitutional activity charged is not sufficient to prove the existence of a municipal custom.'. . . Nor is it sufficient that, as Howard argues, the Organized Crime Division's custom of keeping confidential informants secret dated back to at least 1990. Even if the City was aware of that custom, to be liable under Monell, the City must have had knowledge of the unconstitutional behavior, not simply DPD's general secrecy regarding confidential informants.In sum, we affirm the district court's decision granting summary judgment to the City of Durham."); Benavidez v. County of San Diego, 993 F.3d 1134, 1154-55 (9th Cir. 2021) ("Each of the Benavidezes' three Monell theories fails. First, the Benavidezes did not sufficiently allege that the County's written 2015 Policy caused the constitutional violations. The 2015 Policy was adopted as part of the settlement agreement that resolved the Swartwood dispute. . . and requires municipal actors 'to obtain parental consent and provide advance notice to the parents so that they can be present at the examination[.]'. . Thus, our previous cases holding that the County's former policy was unconstitutional do not speak to the County's policy as of March 2016. Because the Benavidezes allege that Lisk and Jemison violated the 2015 Policy, the SAC does not support Monell liability on the basis of that policy. Second, the Benavidezes argue that the previous cases finding the County's policy unconstitutional also evince a custom deliberately indifferent to the rights of parents and children that continues to this day, despite the adoption of the 2015 Policy. However, one instance of County employees violating the constitutional rights of parents and children is insufficient to demonstrate a custom supporting Monell liability. . . The implementation of the 2015 Policy, which included the Detention Report form and the juvenile cout order form, indicates a changed policy or custom since the court's previous decisions. Absent a pattern of conduct, alleging that the forms used are worded in a way that allows County employees to circumvent the County's written policies in violation of the Constitution is insufficient evidence of a County custom. . . Third, the Benavidezes characterize their Monell claim as a failure to train, but again support this claim only with a single incident. . . The Benavidezes also argue that the single incident exception previously identified by the Supreme Court should directly apply here. Where, as here, the County employees are not making life-threatening decisions. . . and because micromanaging of municipal policies should be avoided, the single incident exception is inapplicable. Ultimately, none of the allegations regarding the County's alleged unconstitutional policy, practice, custom, or failure to train its employees provides factual support for Monell liability. Therefore, the court affirms the district court's dismissal of the Benavidezes' claims against the County."); Todero for the Estate of Todero v. Blackwell, 383 F.Supp.3d 826, 840-41 (S.D. Ind. 2019) ("The City of Greenwood argues that municipal liability cannot apply because any deprivation of Mr. Todero's constitutional rights was not from its (1) express policies, (2) implicit policies or custom, or (3) failure to train its officers. . . Ms. Todero responds that enough evidence allows a reasonable jury to find the city liable under each of these theories. . . The City of Greenwood cannot be liable under the first express-policy theory that its use-of-force policy allowed Taser use in cases of '[v]erbal non-compliance.'. . That permission is not enough to say that the policy 'causes a constitutional deprivation,'. . . because it does not require officers to tase passively resisting suspects[.] . . . So even though the city consciously chose' its policy, that policy is 'not one that gave rise to a [constitutional] violation.'. . . Here, the designated evidence shows only a policy that 'might lead to "police misconduct"'; such a policy 'is hardly enough to satisfy Monell's requirement that the particular policy be the "moving force" behind a constitutional violation.'. .The second express-policy theory is based on an absence of or gap in express policies. . . Certainly 'in situations that call for procedures, rules, or regulations, the failure to make policy itself may be actionable.' But [t]he key is whether there is a conscious decision not to take action.'. . Here, no designated evidence reveals a 'memo or decision showing that the choice not to act is deliberate.' No designated evidence reveals (as explained below) numerous examples of the constitutional violation in question.'. . And no designated evidence reveals (again, as explained below) an 'absence of protocols,' because the city had a Taser-use policy and provided some Taser training. . . The evidence would not allow a reasonable jury to find that the action was 'one of the institution itself,' rather than 'merely one undertaken by a subordinate actor.'. . The next theory—implicit policy or custom—requires evidence showing more than a 'random event.'. . The key question is whether the City of Greenwood made 'a conscious decision not to take action' in the face of constitutional violations. . . Ms. Todero argues that's the case here because the city did nothing in response to Officer Blackwell's prior use-of-force incidents, which included improper Taser use. . . Ms. Todero, however, points to evidence about the nature of only four incidents, and in two of the four the suspects were more than passively resisting. . .Even if the remaining two prior incidents show evidence of the 'same problem' of Taser use on passively resisting suspects, . . the evidence does not show more than three prior similar incidents as required for Monell liability. . . The final theory is a failure to train, which carries 'a stringent standard of fault' that requires a 'pattern of similar constitutional violations' except when the unconstitutional consequences of failing to train' are 'patently obvious.'. . But as already shown, the evidence does not support a pattern of similar violations. Nor is this the 'rare' case when a single situation allows liability because it was 'patently obvious' that the training would cause constitutional violations. . . That situation exists, for example, when a city arms novice police officers with firearms and provides no training on the constitutional limits of deadly force. . . Here though, the City of Greenwood did provide some Taser training. . . Ms. Todero essentially argues that the city should have provided 'special training,' 'more training,' or 'better training,' but that argument 'would ignore the training the officers did receive.'. . In short, liability from a single incident requires training that leaves an utter lack of an ability to cope with constitutional standards'; Ms. Todero relies instead on the 'sort of nuance [that] simply cannot support an inference of deliberate indifference.'. . Under the stringent and precise limitations on Monell liability established by the Supreme Court and Seventh Circuit, district courts cannot declare a factual record 'close enough' to subject a municipality to potential liability. . . Rather, section 1983 demands rigorous standards of culpability and causation. . . Applying those standards here, the actions that form the basis of Ms. Todero's claims were undertaken only by the individual officers—not by the City of Greenwood itself. The City of Greenwood is thus entitled to summary judgment on Ms. Todero's Monell liability claims.")

See also Duarte v. City of Stockton, 60 F.4th 566, 573-74 (9th Cir. 2023) ("As to the Stockton Police Department, we held over thirty years ago that municipal police departments in California 'can be sued in federal court for alleged civil rights violations.' Karim-Panahi v. L.A. Police Dep't, 839 F.2d 621, 624 n.2 (9th Cir. 1988) (citations omitted). More recently, we reaffirmed this holding and extended it to California's county sheriffs' departments. Streit v. County of Los Angeles, 236 F.3d 552, 565–66 (9th Cir. 2001). We have never overruled Karim-Panahi. The district court reasoned that Karim-Panahi could not be reconciled with a concurring opinion in United States v. Kama, 394 F.3d 1236, 1240 (9th Cir. 2005). There, without citing Karim-Panahi or Streit, a judge commented that 'municipal police departments and bureaus are generally not considered "persons" within the meaning of 42 U.S.C. § 1983.'. . But 'concurring opinions have no binding precedential value.'. . And 'as a general rule, one three-judge panel of this court cannot reconsider or overrule the decision of a prior panel.'. . Therefore, when a subsequent panel makes a 'suggestion' that 'is inconsistent with earlier opinions of this court,' such suggestions are to be disregarded in favor of the earlier, binding holding. . . Neither a lone concurring judge nor the full Kama panel could overrule Karim-Panahi. . . Nor can we. . . The district judge's determination that the City of Stockton and Stockton Police Department are not persons within the meaning of § 1983 is reversed.")

A. Liability Based on Policy Statements, Ordinances, Regulations or Decisions Formally Adopted and Promulgated by Government Rulemakers

The clearest case for government liability under Monell v. Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658 (1978), is the case like Monell itself, where an unconstitutional policy statement, ordinance, regulation or decision is formally adopted and promulgated by the governing body or a department or agency thereof. In Monell, the Department of Social Services and the Board of Education had officially adopted a policy requiring pregnant employees to take unpaid maternity leaves before medically necessary. See also City of Newport v. Fact Concerts, Inc., 453 U.S. 247 (1981) (vote of City Council to cancel license for rock concert); Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U.S. 622 (1980) (personnel decision made by City Council constitutes official city policy). Note that in both Fact Concerts and Owen, decisions officially adopted by the government body itself need not have general or recurring application to constitute official "policy."

See also Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, Fla., 138 S. Ct. 1945, 1951, 1954-55 (2018) ("Lozman's claim is that, notwithstanding the presence of probable cause, his arrest at the city council meeting violated the First Amendment because the arrest was ordered in retaliation for his earlier, protected speech: his open-meetings lawsuit and his prior public criticisms of city officials. The question this Court is asked to consider is whether the existence of probable cause bars that First Amendment retaliation claim.... [W]hether in a retaliatory arrest case the Hartman approach should apply, thus barring a suit where probable cause exists, or, on the other hand, the inquiry should be governed only by Mt. Healthy is a determination that must await a different case. For Lozman's claim is far afield from the typical retaliatory arrest claim, and the difficulties that might arise if Mt. Healthy is applied to the mine run of arrests made by police officers are not present here. . . . Here Lozman does not sue the officer who made the arrest. Indeed, Lozman likely could not have maintained a retaliation claim against the arresting officer in these circumstances, because the officer appears to have acted in good faith, and there is no showing that the officer had any knowledge of Lozman's prior speech or any motive to arrest him for his earlier expressive activities. Instead Lozman alleges more governmental action than simply an arrest. His claim is that the City itself retaliated against him pursuant to an 'official municipal policy' of intimidation. . . In particular, he alleges that the City, through its legislators, formed a premeditated plan to intimidate him in retaliation for his criticisms of city officials and his open-meetings lawsuit. And he asserts that the City itself, through the same high officers, executed that plan by ordering his arrest at the November 2006 city council meeting. The fact that Lozman must prove the existence and enforcement of an official policy motivated by retaliation separates Lozman's claim from the typical retaliatory arrest claim. . . . This unique class of retaliatory arrest claims, moreover, will require objective evidence of a policy motivated by retaliation to survive summary judgment. Lozman, for instance, cites a transcript of a closed-door city council meeting and a video recording of his arrest. There is thus little risk of a flood of retaliatory arrest suits against high-level policymakers. As a final matter, it must be underscored that this Court has recognized the 'right to petition as one of the most precious of the liberties safeguarded by the Bill of Rights.'. . Lozman alleges the City deprived him of this liberty by retaliating against him for his lawsuit against the City and his criticisms of public officials. Thus, Lozman's speech is high in the hierarchy of First Amendment values. . . For these reasons, Lozman need not prove the absence of probable cause to maintain a claim of retaliatory arrest against the City. On facts like these, Mt. Healthy provides the correct standard for assessing a retaliatory arrest claim. The Court need not, and does not, address the elements required to prove a retaliatory arrest claim in other contexts. This is not to say, of course, that Lozman is ultimately entitled to relief or even a new trial. On remand, the Court of Appeals, applying Mt. Healthy and other relevant precedents, may consider any arguments in support of the District Court's judgment that have been preserved by the City. Among other matters, the Court of Appeals may wish to consider (1) whether any reasonable juror could find that the City actually formed a retaliatory policy to intimidate Lozman during its June 2006 closed-door session; (2) whether any reasonable juror could find that the November 2006 arrest constituted an official act by the City; and (3) whether, under Mt. Healthy, the City has proved that it would have arrested Lozman regardless of any retaliatory animus—for example, if Lozman's conduct during prior city council meetings had also violated valid rules as to proper subjects of discussion, thus explaining his arrest here. For these reasons, the judgment of the Court of Appeals is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion."); Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, Fla., 138 S. Ct. 1945, 1955-56 (2018) (Thomas, J., dissenting) ("We granted certiorari to decide 'whether the existence of probable cause defeats a First Amendment claim for retaliatory arrest under [42 U.S.C.] § 1983.'. . Instead of resolving that question, the Court decides that probable cause should not defeat a 'unique class of retaliatory arrest claims.'. . To fall within this unique class, a claim must involve objective evidence, of an official municipal policy of retaliation, formed well before the arrest, in response to highly protected speech, that has little relation to the offense of arrest. . . .No one briefed, argued, or even hinted at the rule that the Court announces today. Instead of dreaming up our own rule, I would have answered the question presented and held that plaintiffs must plead and prove a lack of probable cause as an element of a First Amendment retaliatory-arrest claim. I respectfully dissent. . . .By my count, the Court has identified five conditions that are necessary to trigger its new rule. First, there must be 'an "official municipal policy" of intimidation.'. . Second, the policy must be 'premeditated' and formed well before the arrest—here, for example, the policy was formed 'months earlier.'. . Third, there must be 'objective evidence' of such a policy. . . Fourth, there must be 'little relation' between the 'protected speech' that prompted the retaliatory policy and 'the criminal offense for which the arrest is made.'. . Finally, the protected speech that provoked the retaliatory policy must be 'high in the hierarchy of First Amendment values.'. . Where all these features are present, the Court explains, there is not the same 'causation problem' that exists for other retaliatory-arrest claims. . . I find it hard to believe that there will be many cases where this rule will even arguably apply, and even harder to believe that the plaintiffs in those cases will actually prove all five requirements. Not even Lozman's case is a good fit, as the Court admits when it discusses the relevant considerations for remand. . . In my view, we should not have gone out of our way to fashion a complicated rule with no apparent applicability to this case or any other. . . Turning to the question presented, I would hold that plaintiffs bringing a First Amendment retaliatory-arrest claim must plead and prove an absence of probable cause.")

See also Lozman v. City of Riviera Beach, No. 15-10550, 2019 WL 6492481, at *1–2 (11th Cir. Dec. 3, 2019) (on remand from Supreme court) (not reported) ("Lozman can succeed on his claim by showing that his arrest was motivated by retaliation even if there was probable cause to arrest him, and the City can defeat Lozman's claim by showing that he would have been arrested no matter what. But the Court made clear that Lozman's arrest having been made pursuant to an official City policy to retaliate against him was a prerequisite for application of Mt. Healthy. The Court assumed, but did not decide, that this was the case. . . Further, the Supreme Court instructed: 'This is not to say, of course, that Lozman is ultimately entitled to relief or even a new trial.'. . In this regard, the Supreme Court advised that the lower court, 'applying Mt. Healthy and other relevant precedents, may consider any arguments in support of the District Court's judgment that have been preserved by the City.'. . . The Supreme Court then stated, 'among other matters,' these three questions may be considered on remand:
(1) whether any reasonable juror could find that the City actually formed a retaliatory policy to intimidate Lozman during its June 2006 closed-door session; (2) whether any reasonable juror could find that the November 2006 arrest constituted an official act by the City; and (3) whether, under Mt. Healthy, the City has proved that it would have arrested Lozman regardless of any retaliatory animus—for example, if Lozman's conduct during prior city council meetings had also violated valid rules as to proper subjects of discussion, thus explaining his arrest here.

. . . The district court has not had occasion to answer these questions. Nor has the district court had the chance to assess additional arguments made by the parties in their post-remand briefing, including, for example, Lozman's argument that the offense of disturbing a lawful assembly, Fla. Stat. § 871.01(1), is unconstitutional and the City's various arguments. Given how much the success of Lozman's retaliation claim turns on the 'unusual' facts of his arrest, . . . we think it appropriate to give the district court the first opportunity to scrutinize the record in light of the Supreme Court's instructions. We therefore remand this case to the district court to decide, in the first instance, whether Lozman is owed a new trial.").

See also Estate of Kong v. City of San Diego, No. 22-CV-1858-BAS-DDL, 2023 WL 4939370, at *5 (S.D. Cal. Aug. 2, 2023) ("A Monell claim predicated upon a formal policy differs from one premised upon a practice or custom in two respects. First, formal policies often are committed to writing. . . They include, inter alia, ordinances, regulations, statutes, and policy statements. . . .[7] [fn. 7: Because they are written, demonstrating the existence of a formal policy perhaps is the most straightforward way in which to satisfy the second element of Monell. But despite being straightforward, this route often is elusive, for municipalities have every incentive not to promulgate facially unlawful and unconstitutional edicts as official policy.] Second, a single constitutional violation undertaken pursuant to a formal policy may be sufficient to establish municipal Section 1983 liability. . . In other words, Plaintiff need not attribute a history or pattern of similar constitutional violations attributable to the relevant formal policy in order to pursue her Monell claim. It is sufficient to show the express policy attaches to the constitutional tort at issue.")

1. Examples of "Official Policy" Cases

a. Policies Sufficient for Monell Liability

D.C. CIRCUIT

Frederick Douglass Foundation, Inc. v. District of Columbia, 82 F.4th 1122, 1149-50 (D.C. Cir. 2023) ("We may infer that District policymakers were behind the uniform and unexplained policy exempting individuals expressing 'Black Lives Matter' from enforcement of the defacement ordinance. The sheer scope of non-enforcement supports the Foundation's claim that policymakers promoted or at least allowed an exemption for a favored viewpoint. The Black Lives Matter protests in the District were part of an ongoing, large-scale, national demonstration. People flooded onto the streets in a protest that included painting and marking of 'Black Lives Matter' messages on public and private property. Mayor Bowser commissioned a large street mural proclaiming 'Black Lives Matter.' It is certainly plausible that policymaking officials in the District were aware of the Black Lives Matter protests and the widespread and ongoing violations of the defacement ordinance, and were involved in the ubiquitous non-enforcement of the ordinance against the many individuals who expressed their message on sidewalks, streets, and other property. The Foundation also alleges one officer stated Mayor Bowser effectively opened up the streets to protest messages. It is also plausible District policymakers were involved in the continued enforcement of the ordinance against other groups, including the Foundation. The Foundation sought a permit from the District and spoke with an officer specifically about painting a mural on the street. At the same time, the Foundation sent a letter to Mayor Bowser requesting permission to paint its message. The police department and the Chief of Police were copied on the letter. Although neither Mayor Bowser nor the police department responded to the letter, the District granted the permit, which was signed by the Commander of the police department's Special Operations Division. And on the day of the event six police cars and a number of officers were waiting. The police officers informed the Foundation's members that if they chalked on the sidewalk, they would be arrested. Such a coordinated and immediate police response to the Foundation's rally could certainly have been the work of policymakers. At a minimum, it is plausible at this stage that the District 'knew or should have known of the risk of constitutional violations' and yet deliberately failed to act. . . The alleged facts 'raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence' either that the Special Operations Commander is a policymaker or that other policymakers like the Mayor were involved in exempting individuals who expressed 'Black Lives Matter' messages from the defacement ordinance and continuing to enforce the ordinance against speakers of other messages. . . Furthermore, the Foundation has alleged facts suggesting the District's exemption from enforcement for a favored viewpoint was 'persistent and widespread.'. . Officers were present during many of the Black Lives Matter protests. The officers watched as thousands of messages were painted on the streets, sidewalks, and other public and private property. Yet not a single person was arrested for numerous and clear violations of the defacement ordinance. The unvarying non-enforcement, against large and small acts of defacement, over a period of weeks, was 'persistent and widespread' and so plausibly constituted a custom or policy for Monell liability. . . The District argues there is no evidence of a custom or practice of enforcing the ordinance 'against disfavored messages' and emphasizes the complaint failed to 'allege any other instances where the speech of anti-abortion or other religious groups was targeted for enforcement beyond their own rallies.' But that is not what the Foundation must allege. To make out a First Amendment violation, it is sufficient the District had a policy of exempting a favored view while continuing to enforce the ordinance against everyone else. . . Such an exemption—even in a single, protracted instance—may be sufficient to state a claim under Monell. . . We therefore disagree with the district court's holding that the Foundation failed to allege a policy of selective enforcement under Monell. The Foundation has more than plausibly alleged a 'persistent and widespread' District practice of selective non-enforcement against those who marked and painted 'Black Lives Matter' messages.")

Hurd v. District of Columbia, 997 F.3d 332, 340-42 (D.C. Cir. 2021) ("Hurd's last theory of municipal liability fares better. Hurd alleges that the District has an unconstitutional policy requiring that an inmate be incarcerated rather than released, without due process, whenever a District employee discovers a record indicating that a previous sentence was not fully served. This theory of municipal liability turns on the existence and content of the District's immediate incarceration policy based on record checks by District employees. Importantly, the District does not deny the existence of a policy that led to Hurd's incarceration. The District admits that it (i) employs legal instrument examiners; (ii) tasks them with reviewing the records of inmates prior to their release to identify any basis for additional incarceration; and (iii) forbids employees to release the individual if the examiner finds such a record. . . In its brief to this court, the District agrees that, '[w]hen a court orders an inmate released in a particular case, officials must check all records to determine if there is any other charge or detainer requiring the inmate's detention, and if so, must hold him at the D.C. Jail.'. . The District also acknowledged that it has a specific 'Program Statement' that requires its legal instrument examiners to review computerized record databases 'to determine if there are any outstanding warrants or charges preventing release, prior to an inmate's release from the custody of the [Department of Corrections].'. . And before the district court, the District admitted that the legal instrument examiner in Hurd's case had 'no other options' but to hold Hurd because of the 'unexpired judgment and commitment' from the District of Columbia judge who originally sentenced Hurd. . . . Nevertheless, on appeal, the District has tried to portray what happened to Hurd as just an isolated mistake by one legal instrument examiner, arguing that no District policy mandated that Sibert not release Hurd upon discovery of a record indicating the misdemeanor sentences were not served. The District now insists that the written policy statement only requires that inmates be held if there is an outstanding 'charge or detainer,' and that the policy statement does not address what to do with an unserved sentence. . . Because the nature and contours of the alleged policy present a number of disputed issues of material fact, the district court erred in granting summary judgment for the District. First, the District's materially contradictory descriptions of its policy and, in particular, its application to unserved sentences, are unresolved material facts very much disputed by Hurd and critical to determining the constitutionality of the District's policy. Second, while the District attempts to lay Hurd's incarceration on the shoulders of an assertedly single wayward legal instrument examiner who denied Hurd release, that argument begs the critical factual question of 'then what?' The problem identified by Hurd goes far beyond the initial denial of his release. Hurd contends that he was incarcerated under lock and key for just shy of two years. That incarceration, we can reasonably infer from the record, was the result of a series of determinations undertaken by the Department of Corrections itself, not the product of a single decision made by the legal instrument examiner. For instance, the legal instrument examiner attests that he sought out his supervisor for advice regarding whether to release Hurd, and that the supervisor was the one who ultimately wrote 'Denied' on Hurd's release authorization form. . . Moreover, it was the District's Department of Corrections—not the legal instrument examiner—who subsequently emailed Hurd to inform him that his previous release had been erroneous. . . And when Hurd challenged his incarceration without due process, the decision to incarcerate Hurd was defended in court by the District's attorneys, not the legal instrument examiner. . . So regardless of whether the policy of checking the records alone was lawful, . . . the question posed by Hurd's case is how that policy resulted in an incarceration by the Department of Corrections for almost two years that was defended in court by the District. Because there are conflicting facts and testimony in the record regarding the authority of the Department of Corrections' legal instrument examiners to detain inmates based on record reviews, as well as concerning when and how the District authorizes formal incarceration based on the findings of a legal instrument examiner, we reverse the grant of summary judgment on Hurd's claim that the District's incarceration policy is unconstitutional. On remand, the relevant nature and operation of the District's policy must be factually resolved and its constitutionality evaluated.")

Barnes v. District of Columbia, 793 F.Supp.2d 260, 284, 291 (D.D.C. 2011) ("[B]ecause plaintiffs have demonstrated that the DOC's practice of strip searching all court returns entitled to release, without individualized suspicion, violates the Fourth Amendment, and because that policy was promulgated by an official with final authority to establish such policies for the District and caused plaintiffs' and class members' constitutional deprivations, the District is liable.")

FIRST CIRCUIT

Watchtower Bible & Tract Soc'y of New York, Inc. v. Municipality of San Juan, 773 F.3d 1, 9 (1st Cir. 2014) ("Here, the record amply demonstrates that the municipal defendants have had a policy and custom of issuing permits to urbanizations without attaching conditions sufficient to ensure public access. This policy and custom led directly to the infringement of the plaintiffs' First Amendment rights. No more is exigible to warrant equitable relief against the municipal defendants.")

Petrello v. City of Manchester, No. 16-CV-008-LM, 2017 WL 3972477, at *8-9 (D.N.H. Sept. 7, 2017) ("In sum, the record reveals that Chiefs Mara and Willard—final policymakers for the City—either knew or should have known about this MPD custom or practice, yet did nothing to end it. More importantly, there is nothing in the record to suggest that Chief Mara or Willard in any way disapproved of this custom. The totality of this record supports only one reasonable conclusion: the City is responsible for a custom or practice of charging passive panhandlers, like Petrello, with disorderly conduct under RSA 644:2, II(c) (hereinafter, "MPD Policy"). Because the City does not dispute, nor could it on this record, that the MPD Policy was the cause of and the 'moving force' behind Officer Brandreth's decision on June 3, 2015 to issue the summons to Petrello, . . . the court holds that Petrello has satisfied the threshold test for Monell liability. . . . Unlike the plaintiffs in Joyce, Petrello does not allege that the City is liable under § 1983 for failing to train and supervise its police officers. In fact, Petrello disclaimed her failure to train theory at oral argument. Rather, Petrello alleges that the MPD Policy itself is unconstitutional, which caused Officer Brandreth to violate her First Amendment rights. This distinction is important. 'If the allegation against the municipality involves a failure to train, the plaintiff must put forth evidence of a failure to train that amounts to "deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the police come into contact."'. . In such a case, 'a finding that the law was not clearly established may foreclose municipal liability for failure to train.'. . However, when a plaintiff claims that a municipal policy itself is unconstitutional, 'resolving [the] issues of fault and causation is straightforward.'. . Without a failure to train claim, Petrello's case is distinguishable from Joyce. In short, a municipality can be held accountable for violations of federal law regardless of whether the relevant federal law was clearly established at the time the municipality committed the violation. Municipal liability is not foreclosed simply because the relevant law was not clearly established when Officer Brandreth charged Petrello with disorderly conduct. . . Accordingly, the court DENIES the City's motion for summary judgment on Count II.")

Baggett v. Ashe, 41 F.Supp.3d 114, 114-15, 125 (D. Mass. 2014) ("Plaintiff presents two theories in support of judgment in her favor. First, she contends that the policy of permitting male guards to be present to videotape the strip searches—even if they somehow refrained from actually viewing the inmates while performing the videotaping—violated the Constitution. The court agrees that this policy violated the class members' constitutional rights and that no legitimate, penological interest justified it. Moreover, Defendants are not entitled to the protection of qualified immunity for this violation. . . .In sum, no legitimate penological interest justified the regular practice of using male officers to videotape female inmates while they were being strip searched, even assuming the officers respected the policy requirement to avert their eyes while operating the camera. Moreover, nothing in the record indicates that any emergency situation ever required the use of male officers to handle videotaping. Since the policy violated the Fourth Amendment rights of the class members, and since Turner does not save Defendants, the policy as applied to class members was unconstitutional.")

Farry v. City of Pawtucket, 725 F.Supp.2d 286, 295, 296 (D.R.I. 2010) (City's admission in answer that city police officer who shot and killed emotionally disturbed individual during altercation complied with actual customs, policies, practices, and procedures of city, together with city's concession that there was question of fact as to officer's liability, precluded summary judgment on Monell claims brought by administratrix of individual's estate against city)

SECOND CIRCUIT

Hernandez v. United States, 939 F.3d 191, 206-09 (2d Cir. 2019) ("The Complaint alleges that the City has an official policy of blindly honoring federal immigration detainers. The City argues that such a policy is not adequately alleged in the Complaint. We disagree. The Complaint alleges that the City's policy of acceding to federal immigration detainers was pursuant to the decisions of the City's lawmakers; namely, their passage of Local Law 22 of 2013. Moreover, the Complaint alleges that there was a practice of 'treating federal immigration detainers as though they were mandatory,' and honoring them without inquiry even when circumstances suggested inquiry was warranted. . . At issue here then is whether this alleged policy caused Hernandez's detention. The City argues that it is not liable for Hernandez's detention because (1) his detention was due to his failure to post bail; and (2) the DOC could rely on the immigration detainer. . . .[W]e conclude that the Complaint plausibly alleges that but for the detainer, Hernandez would have been released, and that the City confined him not for his failure to post bail but because of the detainer. . . .The City also argues that, even if the City detained Hernandez only because of the detainer, the Complaint fails to state a viable Monell claim because '[m]unicipal law enforcement officers are permitted to detain a suspect at the request of federal immigration agents who have probable cause to believe that the suspect is removable.'. . Moreover, the City argues that there was probable cause here because the detainer reflected the existence of an order of removal. We are not persuaded. The Complaint adequately alleges that the City lacked probable cause to rely on the detainer. First, the Complaint alleges that the name on the detainer (Luis Enrique Hernandez-Martinez) did not match Hernandez's name (Luis Hernandez). As explained above, the name discrepancy alone is arguably enough to vitiate probable cause, and the Complaint plausibly alleges that a reasonable officer, whether a court officer, corrections officer, or other City official, would have conducted further inquiry before continuing to detain Hernandez. . . Second, the City could not blindly rely on the federal detainer in the circumstances here. The Complaint alleges that Hernandez told multiple DOC employees that he was a U.S. citizen, and the City could have easily verified his citizenship by checking (1) the DOC Inmate Lookup Service, which listed his nativity as 'New York,' or (2) his rap sheet, which apparently noted that he was a U.S. citizen. . . While we do not hold that an officer is required to investigate every claim of innocence, the City had an independent obligation to verify Hernandez's citizenship in the circumstances here. Where there is a discrepancy in the names and an individual's citizenship can be verified with minimal effort, the City is not free to ignore a claim of innocence. . . .Accordingly, as the Complaint plausibly alleges that the City refused to release Hernandez because of its policy, and that the City would have seen that Hernandez was not subject to an immigration detainer if it had checked, Hernandez plausibly alleges that City policy indeed caused the deprivation of his rights.")

Fate v. Charles, 24 F.Supp.3d 337 (S.D.N.Y. 2014) ("These two distinctions—the justification for the search and the relevant burden of proof—separate searches incident to a lawful arrest from detainee safety searches. Both distinctions preclude Florence's application to a discretionary strip search in a police station. A police station is not a jail. In the absence of a large, potentially dangerous, and ever-changing population of detainees, there is a less compelling law enforcement interest to balance against the extreme intrusion of a strip search. The justification for the broad scope of the search, and the higher burden of proof, dissipates almost entirely in an empty holding cell. . . . In the absence of the unique governmental interest in maintaining a jail, a reasonableness inquiry, rather than presumed deference to police officers, is the proper standard to apply. The exception applied in Bell, Turner, and Florence, like all exceptions permitting suspicionless searches, should be 'closely guarded' and confined to the circumstances necessitating deference to government officials. . .The distinction drawn above is not merely academic. Courts are ordinarily careful to distinguish between detention in police stations and jails—and each of the opinions in Florence explicitly drew that distinction. . . . In short, all nine justices explicitly rejected the interpretation that the Defendants argue for here: that the decision in Florence applies to strip searches in a police station. . . There are other reasons that Florence does not permit the suspicionless visual body cavity search at issue in this case. It does not appear that Florence applies to visual body cavity searches at all. . . . [T]he Court's ultimate holding was limited, explicitly, to the searches performed on Florence. . . The opinion cannot be read, as Defendants urge, to authorize suspicionless visual body cavity searches as a matter of law. The line between a strip search and a body cavity search is constitutionally relevant: the scope of a search bears directly on its reasonableness. . . .Second, a judge had not decided whether to commit Fate to the general population of a jail. A majority of the Justices in Florence expressed worry that, although it may be reasonable to conduct suspicionless strip searches upon admission to the general population of a jail, it may not be reasonable to send some arrestees to jail at all. . . . An initial appearance before a judge seems to be important—if not essential—to the applicability of Bell and Turner. At the very least, a majority of the Justices in Florence recognized that, if a jail strip searches every detainee admitted to the general population, the decision to send an arrestee to that jail is functionally a decision to strip search him. Such a decision must be subject to a reasonableness inquiry if it is not made by a judge. Finally, the search here was a discretionary one. There is no evidence or suggestion that the policymakers at the Spring Valley police department had concluded, based on their expertise, that it was appropriate to conduct a visual body cavity search of every arrestee detained at the station. . . . There was no such expert policy judgment here. Florence further justified the policy at issue based on correctional officers' 'essential interest in readily administrable rules.'. . There is no rule to uphold here. Instead, Defendants ask the Court to uphold an individual officer's authority to select unlucky arrestees to be strip searched, for no articulable reason, at the officer's absolute discretion. But in the absence of individualized reasonable suspicion, the existence of a well-reasoned general policy is the only thing protecting an arrestee from an arbitrary (unreasonable) search of his person. Defendants' reading of Florence would effectively circumvent the requirement that searches incident to a lawful arrest must be reasonable in 'scope and manner of execution.'. . Even if a stationhouse strip search were characterized as a species of special needs search—a characterization unsupported by any authority Defendants have cited here—the officer's decision to search would need to be justified either by individualized reasonable suspicion or by a reasonable general policy. Special needs searches must be reasonable. Reasonableness requires reasons. . . . Regardless of whether stationhouse strip searches are incident to a lawful arrest or special needs searches, the discretion of the officer conducting the search must be limited in some meaningful way. Strip searches are an extraordinary invasion of privacy. Courts must demand factual justification supporting either the officer's exercise of his discretion or the policy pursuant to which he acted. In short, Florence does not apply to discretionary visual body cavity searches at a police station. Such searches are still subject to the Hartline standard requiring individualized reasonable suspicion.")

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Sharpe v. Winterville Police Department, 59 F.4th 674, 681-82 (4th Cir. 2023) ("Recording police encounters creates information that contributes to discussion about governmental affairs. So too does livestreaming disseminate that information, often creating its own record. We thus hold that livestreaming a police traffic stop is speech protected by the First Amendment. . . . There is 'undoubtedly a strong government interest' in officer safety. . . And risks to officers are particularly acute during traffic stops. . . But even though the Town has a strong interest in protecting its officers, Defendants have not done enough to show that this policy furthers or is tailored to that interest. Nor is that gap filled here by common sense or caselaw. . .So we cannot conclude, at this stage, that the policy survives First Amendment scrutiny. . . Instead, we hold that Sharpe has plausibly alleged that the Town adopted a livestreaming policy that violates the First Amendment.")

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Robinson v. Hunt County, Texas, 921 F.3d 440, 449-50 (5th Cir. 2019) ("Robinson has sufficiently pleaded an official policy of viewpoint discrimination on the HCSO Facebook page. The complaint alleges that, on January 18, 2017, the HCSO account posted a message warning that 'ANY post filled with foul language, hate speech of all types and comments that are considered inappropriate will be removed and the user banned.'. .As discussed above, a policy of deleting 'inappropriate' comments is viewpoint discriminatory. That the January 18, 2017 post was made in the name of the HCSO lends it some official imprimatur, and gives rise to a reasonable inference that the statement 'can be fairly identified as' an action 'of the government itself.'. . Robinson further alleges that she wrote a critical comment in response to the January 18 post and that HCSO took precisely the actions threatened in the post: removing her comment and banning her from the page. Unfavorable comments by other Facebook users on the same post were also allegedly deleted. These allegations are sufficient to state a claim that HCSO's policy was the 'moving force' behind the violation of Robinson's constitutional rights. . . Hunt County's reliance on Peterson v. City of Fort Worth, Tex., 588 F.3d 838 (5th Cir. 2009), is inapposite because the plaintiff in that case could point to 'no written policy supporting his claim of municipal liability' and instead attempted to establish the existence of an official policy through a pattern of violations. . . Robinson, by contrast, has plausibly alleged that Hunt County had an explicit policy of viewpoint discrimination on the HCSO Facebook page.")

Jauch v. Choctaw County, 874 F.3d 425, 435-36 (5th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 638 (2018) ("Jauch challenges the indefinite detention procedure. Accordingly, the first and second elements of our inquiry reduce to one question: Is the challenged procedure 'an official policy' that was 'promulgated by the municipal policymaker?'. . It is. There is no dispute that Sheriff Halford is the relevant policymaker. . . And, both prior to and during this litigation, Sheriff Halford and Choctaw County have cleaved to the indefinite detention procedure. Their position is that indefinite detention is and must be the policy in Choctaw County. Accordingly, resolution of the first and second elements is as clear as ever it could be. . . It is also obvious that the indefinite detention procedure caused the due process violation Jauch complains of—indefinite detention. 'Where a plaintiff claims that a particular municipal action itself violates federal law, or directs an employee to do so,' the causation determination 'is straightforward.'. . The policy Jauch challenges cannot be separated from the procedure that we have found constitutionally deficient. They are one and the same. In cases like this one, where 'fault and causation' are 'obvious,' 'proof that the municipality's decision was unconstitutional' establishes 'that the municipality itself was liable for the plaintiff's constitutional injury.'. . While courts must be careful not to 'blur[ ] the distinction between § 1983 cases that present no difficult questions of fault and causation and those that do,'. . . we have no trouble concluding that this is an obvious case. Choctaw County's relevant policymaker instituted a policy whereby certain arrestees were indefinitely detained without access to courts or the benefit of basic constitutional rights. This unconstitutional policy was 'the moving force' behind Jauch's constitutional injury. . . Under Monell and its progeny, Choctaw County is liable.")

Maddux v. Officer One, No. 01-20881, 2004 WL 436000, at *19 (5th Cir. Mar. 9, 2004) (unpublished) ("The written policy condoned forcible entry of a third-party premises despite the absence of the Steagald exceptions, and certain testimony in the record causes us to question whether the City in practice went any further in protecting the privacy interests of third parties caught in the melee.")

Luna v. Valdez, No. 3:15-CV-3520-D, 2018 WL 684897, at *9-12 (N.D. Tex. Feb. 2, 2018) ("Defendants move for summary judgment, inter alia, on the grounds that the summary judgment evidence fails to establish any policy, practice, or custom that was maintained or adopted by Sheriff Valdez, as the County's policymaker, with deliberate indifference to the rights of citizens and that was the moving force behind any underlying violation of Luna's constitutional rights. Because Luna has failed to introduce evidence that would enable a reasonable jury to find that his continued detention after his name was mistakenly left off the DMU's April 28, 2015 email was the result of a County policy, practice, or custom, the court grants the County's summary judgment motion in part. But to the extent Luna bases his Fourth Amendment claim on the denial due to the Immigration Detainer of release on bail from April 11 through April 27, 2015, or of release for up to 48 hours after he was sentenced on April 27, 2015, the court denies defendants' motion. . . . Defendants contend that there is no written policy that required Luna's continued incarceration; there is no evidence that Sheriff Department training was so cursory and devoid of thoroughness as to amount to no training at all; there is no evidence of a specific deficiency in the training of DMU employees regarding the input of information into the computers and that such specific deficiency had, prior to April 27, 2015, already caused a pattern of detaining inmates who had served their sentences but were not released to ICE within 48 hours of their discharge from criminal charges; there is no evidence of an 'official policy' that directly caused Luna not to be released on or around April 27, 2015, after he served his sentence on the misdemeanor charge; and the evidence establishes that members of the DMU were specifically trained regarding procedures to assure an individual's timely release either to the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service ("INS") or from all custody. Luna responds that the County and Sheriff Valdez had an official policy, practice, or custom of honoring all 48-hour ICE 'holds' or 'detainer requests' with respect to individuals who, like Luna, were otherwise cleared for release, without requiring probable cause to believe a different criminal offense had been committed to satisfy the Fourth, Fifth, and Fourteenth Amendments. . . Luna maintains that defendants had a policy of not allowing inmates who, like Luna, were the subject of an ICE hold to be released on bond. He also contends that the evidence shows that defendants had a policy, practice, or custom of holding detainees with ICE detainers beyond the 48 hours requested by the ICE hold. Luna cites evidence that, during his three-month confinement, he repeatedly asked officers working in the Jail when he would be released, and they told him that he was being held because of an immigration detainer and that he would be transferred to the custody of ICE 'sometime in the future.'. . Luna posits that '[t]he fact that [he] was consistently told this by several detention officers on numerous occasions provides some evidence of a persistent and widespread custom on the part of the Defendants.'. . . Defendants do not appear to dispute that the County had a policy or custom of refusing to release on bond any inmate for whom an immigration detainer had been issued. . . Nor do they move for summary judgment on the ground that Luna cannot prove that an official policymaker can be charged with actual or constructive knowledge of this policy or that this policy was the 'moving force' behind Luna's alleged constitutional deprivation. Defendants do, however, specifically dispute that there was any policy 'which was the direct cause of Luna not being released on or about April 27, 2015, after he served his time on the misdemeanor charge.'. . The court agrees that Luna has failed to adduce any evidence that would enable a reasonable jury to find that the County had a policy or custom of detaining individuals subject to an immigration detainer beyond the 48 hours requested in the detainer itself. . . .Based on the summary judgment evidence, however, a reasonable jury could find that the County had a policy or custom of honoring ICE immigration detainers requesting that individuals be detained for up to 48 hours after they were otherwise eligible for release. . . .Accordingly, the court grants defendants' motion for summary judgment on Luna's § 1983 Fourth Amendment claim against the County to the extent Luna bases this claim on an alleged policy or practice of detaining individuals subject to an immigration detainer beyond the 48 hours requested in the detainer itself. The court otherwise denies defendants' motion for summary judgment on this claim.")

Mercado v. Dallas Cty., Texas (Mercado II), 229 F.Supp.3d 501, 521 (N.D. Tex. 2017) ("In support of their 'overdetention' claim, plaintiffs allege that Dallas County had a policy and practice of detaining individuals with immigration holds who have otherwise been cleared for release, without requiring probable cause to believe that a different criminal offense has been or is being committed or other authority that would satisfy the Fourth Amendment, and that this policy was the 'moving force' for plaintiffs' § 1983 claim. In addition, they allege that 'Dallas County and Sheriff Valdez are responsible for the policy,' and that '[i]n particular, Sheriff Valdez oversees and is responsible for Dallas County's decision on whether to detain individuals with immigration holds that are otherwise cleared for release.'. . These allegations are sufficient at the Rule 12(b)(6) stage to plausibly allege the elements for municipal liability.")

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Brawner v. Scott County, Tennessee, 14 F.4th 585, 597-600 (6th Cir. 2021), rehearing en banc denied, 18 F.4th 551| (6th Cir. 2021), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 84 (2022) ("With no claims against individual officers remaining, Brawner alleges that various Scott County policies and customs can serve as a basis for imposing liability on the County. As an initial matter, the parties dispute whether Brawner's claim against the County depends on her showing that a county actor violated her constitutional rights. We have not always been consistent in discussing this issue. [comparing cases] But it makes no difference here because Brawner presented evidence from which a reasonable jury could find that Nurse Massengale violated Brawner's constitutional rights and that this violation was the result of the County's policies. To meet her burden to show that Nurse Massengale violated her constitutional right to adequate medical care, Brawner needed to present evidence from which a reasonable jury could find (1) that she had an objectively serious medical need; and (2) that Nurse Massengale's action (or lack of action) was intentional (not accidental) and she either (a) acted intentionally to ignore Brawner's serious medical need, or (b) recklessly failed to act reasonably to mitigate the risk the serious medical need posed to Brawner, even though a reasonable official in Nurse Massengale's position would have known that the serious medical need posed an excessive risk to Brawner's health or safety. . . .Because a reasonable jury could find that Brawner had an objectively serious medical need, and that Nurse Massengale was either subjectively aware of the risk to Brawner from suddenly discontinuing her medications and failed to respond reasonably to that risk, or that Nurse Massengale recklessly failed to act reasonably to mitigate the risk that the serious medical need posed to Brawner, Brawner presented a jury question as to whether Nurse Massengale violated her constitutional rights. . . . Brawner presented evidence that would allow a reasonable jury to find that her injuries were incurred due to the execution of the fourteen-day and no-controlled-substances policies. As discussed above, Scott County's fourteen-day policy allowed the jail to wait fourteen days before giving detainees a medical examination, which includes among other things, checking for required medications. Captain Tucker testified that the policy sometimes results in the untimely administration of medical services. Further, even after Brawner had a seizure and was returned to jail from the hospital, Nurse Massengale still did not complete her medical examination until the end of the fourteen-day period, and Brawner was never prescribed the medications she had previously been taking or provided with an alternative treatment plan. Although Nurse Massengale testified that she could prioritize detainees to be seen earlier if they were on life-sustaining medications, the chain of events in this case suggests that this authority and the County's fourteen-day policy are insufficient to guard against the consequences to detainees like Brawner who are admitted while on medications that are not technically life-sustaining but where the abrupt discontinuation of those medications could have tragic consequences. Further, Brawner would never have received three of her medications because of the jail's blanket ban on controlled substances. Brawner's medical expert and one of her treating physicians testified that they would never recommend abrupt discontinuation of the medications she was taking given the possibility of seizures, and Brawner's medical expert testified that the abrupt discontinuation of these medications caused her seizures. Additionally, we have previously suggested that abrupt discontinuation of substances that could lead to withdrawal symptoms and potential seizures might pose constitutional problems. . . . In short, because it is undisputed that the jail had a ban on controlled substances, and there was testimony that the abrupt discontinuation of Brawner's prescriptions caused her seizures, Brawner presented sufficient evidence to identify the problematic policy, connect it to the County, and show that the policy caused her injuries. We therefore reverse the district court's judgment for Scott County.")

Taylor v. City of Saginaw, 11 F.4th 483, 486-90 (6th Cir. 2021) (Taylor II) ("The City of Saginaw routinely chalked car tires to enforce its parking regulations. In our prior opinion, we held that doing so is a search for Fourth Amendment purposes, and that 'based on the pleadings stage of this litigation, ... two exceptions to the warrant requirement—the "community caretaking" exception, and the motor-vehicle exception—do not apply here.'. . However, we left for another day whether the search could be justified by 'some other exception' to the warrant requirement. . .We consider one of those other exceptions today—specifically, whether suspicionless tire chalking constitutes a valid administrative search. Because we conclude that it does not, we reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the City. But because we conclude that the alleged unconstitutionality of suspicionless tire chalking was not clearly established, the City's parking officer, defendant Tabitha Hoskins, is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . As we held in Taylor I, 'chalking is a search for Fourth Amendment purposes' under the property-based Jones test. . . And we see no reason to depart from that conclusion, which was a logical extension of the Court's holding in Jones that a physical trespass to a constitutionally protected area with the intent to obtain information is a search under the Fourth Amendment. . . . [W]e hold that the administrative-search exception does not justify the City's suspicionless chalking of car tires to enforce its parking regulations. We express no opinion on the remaining exceptions to the warrant requirement because we are 'a court of review, not first view.'. . . [E]very reasonable parking officer would not understand from Jones that suspicionless chalking of car tires violates the Fourth Amendment. . . Accordingly, Hoskins is entitled to qualified immunity.") [But see* Verdun v. City of San Diego, 51 F.4th 1033 (9th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 73 (2023) (holding chalking policy constitutional under "administrative search exception" to the warrant requirement)]

Jackson v. City of Cleveland, 925 F.3d 793, 832-34 (6th Cir. 2019), rehearing en banc denied (June 27, 2019), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 855 (2020) ("None of the rules contained within the Manual, taken individually or collectively, are inconsistent with an interpretation of GPO 19-73 that permits officers to withhold exculpatory information from prosecutors. These rules can be read by a reasonable jury as consistent with a policy of permitting the withholding of exculpatory evidence in violation of Brady. . . .GPO 19-73 and the rules in Cleveland's police manual, read together, could be understood to authorize Cleveland officers to withhold exculpatory witness statements from prosecutors. It is for a jury to consider GPO 19-73 and the rules in the Manual in light of Cleveland's actual practices and determine whether Cleveland had a policy of permitting Brady violations. Because Cleveland does not contest that it promulgated GPO 19-73 or that the individual Defendants were acting in conformance with GPO 19-73 when they withheld Vernon's exculpatory statements, a reasonable jury could find Cleveland liable under Monell.")

Gardner v. Evans, 920 F.3d 1038, 1063 (6th Cir. 2019) ("There is no dispute that it was the City's policy to simply provide the type of notices that plaintiffs received. . . A reasonable jury could find that the harms at issue were caused by the lack of notice. All of the tenant plaintiffs were displaced from their homes due to the red tagging and none appealed the decision. Thus, consistent with the district court's initial conclusion, we likewise conclude that the City is not entitled to summary judgment on the post-deprivation claims.")

Morgan v. Fairfield County, Ohio, 903 F.3d 553, 565-66 (6th Cir. 2018) ("The upshot is that municipalities can be held liable for harms caused by direct actions of the municipalities themselves, . . . harms caused by the implementation of municipal policies or customs, . . . and harms caused by employees for whom the municipality has failed to provide adequate training[.] Each of these different approaches to liability requires a different analysis. But each approach seeks to answer the same fundamental question: did the municipality cause the harm or did an individual actor? When the injury is a result of an action of an employee who has not been trained properly, we apply 'rigorous requirements of culpability and causation'—holding a municipality liable if it has been deliberately indifferent to constitutional rights. . . On the other end of the spectrum, when an act of the municipality itself causes the injury, 'fault and causation obviously apply.'. . Likewise, when an injury is caused by the straightforward carrying out of a municipal policy or custom, the determination of causation is easy. . . In Gregory v. City of Louisville, 444 F.3d 725, 752 (6th Cir. 2006), we concluded that if a challenged policy is facially constitutional, the plaintiff must show that the policy shows a deliberate indifference to constitutional rights. . . Thus, Gregory analyzed failure-to-train claims and challenges to facially constitutional municipal policies under the same standard. But as we held in Garner, and recently reaffirmed in Arrington-Bey, '[t]here are important differences between these types of claims' and so we must analyze them differently. . . That means that we must be careful not to apply Gregory too broadly. Gregory may help to determine municipal liability when an employee's interpretation of a policy causes harm. But that is not the case here. Like Garner, this case presents a straightforward challenge to the county's policy itself. And, as in Garner, we apply a straightforward test: Morgan and Graf must '(1) identify the municipal policy or custom, (2) connect the policy to the municipality, and (3) show that [their] particular injur[ies] [were] incurred due to execution of that policy.'. .Morgan and Graf have made that showing. It is uncontested that the county's policy required officers to enter 'onto the back' of any property during every "knock and talk." And as acknowledged by the sheriff and members of the SCRAP unit, that policy did not give any leeway for the officers to consider the constitutional limits that they might face. The SCRAP unit did not weigh the characteristics of properties to determine what parts of the properties were curtilage (and thus off limits). The policy gave no weight to the core value of the Fourth Amendment—one's right to retreat into his or her home 'and there be free from unreasonable government intrusion.'. . Quite the opposite: the policy commanded that the SCRAP unit ignore those limits. It was not one employee's interpretation of a policy that caused Morgan's and Graf's injuries—the policy was carried out precisely as it was articulated. And so, because the county's policy itself was the cause of Morgan's and Graf's injury, the county should be held liable under Monell.")

Morgan v. Fairfield County, Ohio, 903 F.3d 553, 573-74 (6th Cir. 2018) (Thapar, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Here, the majority is correct that the policy directed officers to enter a constitutionally-protected zone. Morgan and Graf have a right to be secure in their home, which includes the curtilage of the home. . . . But the county policy did not direct officers to gather information while there. As such, there is no search. . . .[T]he county's policy was silent as to any information-gathering mandate for the officers. As such, the policy itself did not direct the officers to violate the Fourth Amendment. . . .Here the county's policy did not direct officers to engage in a purposeful, investigative act of Morgan and Graf's home. Accordingly, since there was no search directed by the policy, no constitutional violation occurred under the original meaning of the Fourth Amendment.")

O'Brien v. City of Grand Rapids, 23 F.3d 990, 1004 (6th Cir. 1994) ("Grand Rapids followed the routine practice of not securing warrants during the management of critical incidents. The trouble is that this policy was illegal.")

Phillips v. City of Cincinnati, No. 1:18-CV-541, 2019 WL 2289277, at *2 n.6 (S.D. Ohio May 29, 2019) ("Although the Sixth Circuit has not addressed the issue, the Ninth Circuit has found that an 'ordinance violates the Eighth Amendment insofar as it imposes criminal sanctions against homeless individuals for sleeping outdoors, on public property, when no alternative shelter is available to them.' Martin v. City of Boise, 920 F.3d 584, 604 (9th Cir. 2019) (emphasis added). As this Court has recognized, 'the County Court's August 7, 2018 TRO effectively made being homeless in most of Cincinnati illegal. If Plaintiff [or others similarly situated] can show that there is not a bed available for [them] in Cincinnati shelters, then [they] can likely succeed on [the] Eighth Amendment claim.'")

S.R. v. Kenton County Sheriff's Office, No. 215CV143WOBJGW, 2017 WL 4545231, at *11–12 (E.D. Ky. Oct. 11, 2017) ("Kenneth Kippenbrock was the SRO Coordinator for the Kenton County Sheriff's Office at the time of these events. . . He testified that Sumner's handcuffing of S.R. and L.G. was consistent with the policy of the sheriff's department. . . He also testified that since the SRO program was initiated, more than ten children have been handcuffed by SROs in schools, and it is possible that the number is more than twenty-five. . . Kenton County Sheriff Korzenborn also testified that Sumner acted in accordance with all applicable Kenton County policies in handcuffing S.R. and L.G. He has never asked Sumner whether Sumner has ever handcuffed other elementary children in the district, and he is not interested in knowing how often his deputies handcuff school children. . . Handcuffing children above their elbows behind their back is acceptable practice by his deputies. . . Korzenborn has not implemented any changes in the training of his SROs since these incidents. . .Given this undisputed testimony, Kenton County is liable as a matter of law for Sumner's unlawful handcuffing of S.R. and L.J.")

Cummerlander v. Patriot Preparatory Acad. Inc., 86 F.Supp.3d 808, 824-25 (S.D. Ohio 2015) ("In contrast to the school's policy in Fewless, the Academy policy concerning search and seizure is patently unconstitutional. . . . The standard for a constitutional search of a student is reasonable suspicion under the circumstances. A school policy that allows for drug testing under threat of expulsion based on rumors alone, regardless of any other circumstances, and without any other considerations or investigations, falls far short of the constitutional standard. Smith cited to this school policy in an email to Plaintiff's counsel as a justification for demanding JT's drug test. Further, in his Deposition, Smith states that he directly relied on this policy when making his decision to test JT. Smith's limited investigation into JT's alleged comments, and Smith's own statement that he relied only on the statements of Kabealo and CP when making his decision to test JT, also show that Smith acted pursuant to this official, unconstitutional policy. Thus, this written school policy can be said to have 'caused' the violation of JT's Fourth Amendment right, and Defendants Smith and McIIrath, sued in their official capacities, and municipal Defendant Academy are not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.")

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Fields v. City of Chicago, 981 F.3d 534, 563 (7th Cir. 2020) ("Here, the district court properly recognized that 'street files' were utilized by law enforcement officers and that a jury could find from the evidence introduced by Fields that there was a 'systemic underproduction of exculpatory materials to prosecutors and defense counsel.'. . The City argues that it was not enough for Fields to produce evidence of ongoing use of street files in which investigative materials were withheld, but Fields must also demonstrate that the withheld evidence would have affected the outcome of the criminal trial. Although knowledge of the risk of constitutional violations is necessary for Monell liability, the City's knowledge of that risk is unquestionable in this case. As the district court recognized, the City was aware as a result of prior litigation that the use of street files and the failure to ensure the production of the evidence within those files presented a constitutional problem. In Jones, 856 F.2d at 996, we recognized that the custom of the maintenance of street files was department-wide and of long standing, and that a jury could therefore conclude it was consciously approved at the highest policy-making level for decisions involving the police department. . . In fact, the City in Jones did not even contest that the use of such a practice presented a due process problem, although the City represented it had abandoned the practice. . . The evidence presented in this case – that such street files were still being used and that exculpatory evidence from such files was still being withheld in criminal cases – allowed a jury to conclude that the City had failed to take the necessary steps to address that unconstitutional practice. Accordingly, the district court did not err in determining that there was a legally sufficient evidentiary basis for a reasonable jury to find for Fields on the issue of Monell liability.")

Luce v. Town of Campbell, Wisconsin, 872 F.3d 512, 517-18 (7th Cir. 2017) ("A regulation of the sort the Town has adopted rests on a belief that overhead signs and banners will cause at least some drivers to slow down in order to read what the banners say, and perhaps to react to them (say, by blowing the car's horn in response to 'HONK TO IMPEACH OBAMA'). Stopping to take a picture is just an extreme version of slowing down. Reading an overhead banner requires some of each driver's attention, and diverting attention—whether to banners or to cell phones and texting—increases the risk of accidents. This effect is well established for cell phones and texting and is the basis for legislation by many jurisdictions, uncontested in court as far as we are aware, though talking and texting are speech. It does not take a double-blind empirical study, or a linear regression analysis, to know that the presence of overhead signs and banners is bound to cause some drivers to slow down in order to read the sign before passing it. When one car slows suddenly, another may hit it unless the drivers of the following cars are alert—and, alas, not all drivers are alert all the time. . . . This is enough to support the district court's rejection of plaintiffs' challenge to the no-signs-on-overpasses rule. But it does not speak to the 100-foot addition, which the Town has not even tried to justify, despite the fact that one plaintiff has filed an affidavit stating that he wants to demonstrate off the overpass but within the 100-foot limit and has refrained from doing so only because of the threat of prosecution. The ordinance forbids a small 'For Sale' sign on the front lawn of any house near the ends of the overpasses. (The parties tell us that two homes are within the 100-foot limits.) It bans every political sign on a home's lawn, every balloon emblazoned 'Happy Birthday' for a party in the back yard, every 'Merry Christmas' banner draped over the front door in December, and every 'Open' sign in the door of any shop near an overpass. These prohibitions apply whether or not the sign is large enough to attract drivers' attention. Time, place, and manner restrictions must serve a 'significant governmental interest' and be no more extensive than necessary. . . It is hard to see why signs off the highway, and too small to cause drivers to react, should be banned. . . Perhaps the Town has some justification for the 100-foot rule, but unless it produces one the district court should ensure that political demonstrations and other speech that does not jeopardize safety can proceed. The judgment of the district court is affirmed, except to the extent that it rejects plaintiffs' challenge to the 100-foot buffer zone. With respect to that issue the judgment is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings.")

Dees v. Davis, No. 1:22-CV-163-HAB, 2024 WL 983651, at *6 (N.D. Ind. Mar. 6, 2024) ("Plaintiff designates the use-of-force policy that appears to facially violate federal law when the facts are taken in a light most favorable to Dees. If the use-of-force policy permits the use of pepper spray in the event of verbal non-compliance and passive resistance, and if Davis followed that policy in pepper spraying a passive Dees, then a jury could conclude that Monell liability exists. Defendants' motion for summary judgment on the Monell claim is denied.")

Housley v. Plasse, No. 222CV00020JRSMKK, 2023 WL 5319766, at *6–7 (S.D. Ind. Aug. 16, 2023) ("To the extent that the Sheriff's Department had a policy to combat COVID-19, a jury could conclude that the few steps taken were so ineffectual as to evince deliberate indifference. There is no evidence that efforts were made to socially distance inmates or to procure tests before December 2020. . . There is no evidence that inmates were provided educational materials about COVID-19. Sheriff Plasse does not explain why jail staff members were not required to wear masks until August 2020. A jury could find that the few policies enacted were insufficient in light of the serious risks posed by COVID-19 and other reasonable measures that could have been taken. . . Many courts have granted summary judgment in favor of municipalities for their responses to the COVID-19 pandemic, but the jail officials in those cases enacted far more comprehensive policies than those presented here. [collecting cases] In this case, however, there are material disputes of fact as to whether the Sheriff was deliberately indifferent to the serious risks of harm given the minimal safety measures he undertook, or at least that are of record. Because there are material disputes of fact as to whether the Vigo County Sheriff's Department COVID-19 policies caused Mr. Whitlock to suffer a constitutional injury, summary judgment must be denied as to the official capacity claim against Sheriff Plasse.")

Santiago v. City of Chicago, No. 19 C 4652, 2020 WL 1304753, at *8-9 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 18, 2020) ("Santiago contends that City's policy on abandoned vehicles expressly fails to address whether it should mail notice before towing and impounding such vehicles or that the City has a widespread practice of never mailing such notice. The Court need not determine whether Santiago objects to a City practice or to an omission in its policies. . . For both types of policies, Santiago ultimately must show 'that there is a true municipal policy at issue, not a random event,' which typically (though not always) requires proof of more than a single incident. . . Santiago's complaint sufficiently alleges an actionable municipal policy. She alleges that the City 'fails to provide any notice by mail whatsoever prior to towing vehicles that it considers abandoned.'. . . And she alleges that the City's failure to mail her notice 'is not an isolated incident, but rather is standard operating procedure by the City,' which, as 'a matter of practice,' does not mail notice before towing and impounding allegedly abandoning vehicles. . . She also alleges that 'the City has unlawfully seized, impounded, and disposed of thousands of vehicles.'. . These allegations are not conclusory, as the City contends. Rather, Santiago has alleged facts that allow a plausible inference that there is an unconstitutional policy, either in the form of an omission in an express policy or a widespread practice. In sum, the Court finds that Santiago has plausibly alleged the existence of a municipal policy that caused a constitutional deprivation.")

Bergquist v. Milazzo, No. 18-CV-3619, 2020 WL 757902, at *5–6 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 14, 2020) ("Generally, municipalities do not face Section 1983 liability unless a plaintiff can show that she suffered injuries of a constitutional magnitude as the result of an official custom, policy, or practice. . . To survive a motion to dismiss, a plaintiff must plead factual content that allow a court to plausibly infer that she: (1) suffered a deprivation of a constitutional right; (2) as a result of either an express municipal policy, widespread custom, or deliberate act of a decision-maker with final policy-making authority; which (3) proximately caused her injury. . . Plaintiff sufficiently pleads her Monell claim against the Cook County Sheriff's Office based upon a widespread policy theory. As discussed above, the SAC plausibly alleges that Plaintiff suffered a constitutional deprivation when Defendants arrested her without probable cause and because she was exercising her First Amendment rights. . . It further alleges that Defendant Milazzo claims the arrest occurred pursuant to a policy to detain with handcuffs individuals taking pictures in or around the courthouse if they refuse to identify themselves, and that both Defendant Milazzo and Defendant Larson claim this policy has been in place 'since the 9/11 terror attacks.'. . Plaintiff also alleges that a chief deputy specifically told Defendant Milazzo of this policy. . . Taking these allegations as true, this Court finds plausible that an express policy existed, leading to Plaintiff's detention.")

Murphy v. Raoul, No. 16 C 11471, 2019 WL 1437880, at *24, *26 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 31, 2019) ("In this case, the IDOC requires releasees to secure a qualifying host site to reside at while on MSR. . . The IDOC exercises the sole discretion to approve or deny an inmate's proposed host site based on a variety of statutes and regulations that restrict where sex offenders may live while on MSR. . . Ultimately, a parole agent must authorize the placement. . . The only time a person can apply for the termination of his or her indeterminate MSR term is after successfully serving three years of that term outside of prison. . .So, for someone who is homeless, it is virtually impossible to comply with the IDOC's application of the host site requirement. . . . The undisputed evidence here establishes that the plaintiffs are indigent, that they have no family or friends with whom they can live, and despite their efforts, homeless shelters, halfway houses, and work-release programs are not permitted to accept them as residents. . . Furthermore, there are no halfway houses or transitional housing facilities in Illinois that will accept a convicted sex offender as a resident. . . On top of that, the IDOC does not permit any sex offender to reside at a homeless shelter while on mandatory supervised release, nor does it allow them to participate in work release programs that it provides to other offenders. . . For the plaintiffs, then, the failure to procure a host site is 'not voluntary conduct merely related to, or derivative of, the status of homelessness, but [is] entirely involuntary conduct that [is] inseparable from [their] status of homelessness.'. . Thus, the defendants' application of the host site requirement constitutes cruel and unusual punishment. . . . Once again, the Court notes that its decision relates to an as-applied challenge and it in no way purports to tell the defendants how to best administer mandatory supervised release for sex offenders. The Court does not order the immediate release of the plaintiffs, nor does it hold that the framework always operates unconstitutionally or that there are no set of circumstances under which it would be valid. The Court only holds that the host site requirement is unconstitutional under the specific facts in this case and as applied to the defendants. It remains the IDOC's job to appropriately exercise its discretion to achieve the goals of the state legislature in implementing mandatory supervised release for sex offenders. . . . The Illinois Legislature thought it best to rehabilitate sex offenders by reintegrating them, like all other convicted felons, into the community after prison. The Constitution thus entitles them to the same conditional liberty that all other releasees receive. Because the defendants' current application of the host-site requirement permits the indefinite detention of the plaintiffs, it breaches the promises enshrined in the Bill of Rights. The Court accordingly grants the plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment . . . as to their equal protection . . . and Eighth Amendment claims[.]")

Brown v. Cook County, No. 17 C 8085, 2018 WL 3122174, at *1, *5 (N.D. Ill. June 26, 2018) ("The plaintiffs in these cases are women who have been victims—often, repeat victims—of these forms of sexual harassment while attempting to do their jobs. They allege that their respective employers, the Law Office of the Cook County Public Defender (CCPD), Cook County, and the Cook County Sheriff's Office (CCSO), which is responsible for security in the jail and courthouse lockups, have not merely failed to protect them from such harassment, but have actually emboldened the harassers by enacting policies and engaging in practices that have led the harassers to believe that they may act with impunity. . . .[T]he plaintiffs have alleged that Dart's official and de facto policies and practices have created an environment in which detainees are emboldened to sexually harass female APDs and law clerks. They have additionally alleged that certain of Dart's policies caused an increase in the frequency with which they experience sexual harassment. That is enough to plausibly allege that Dart's policies and practices were the moving force behind the equal protection violation alleged. The Court therefore denies Dart's motion to dismiss the Brown plaintiffs' equal protection claim.")

Otero v. Dart, No. 12 C 3148, 2016 WL 74667, at *6 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 7, 2016) ("Plaintiff's argument that Defendant's overdetention policy is unreasonable rests on Defendant's lack of policy for pre-screening acquitted male detainees for release and failure to segregate them from the general population after they return from court – like Defendant's policy for acquitted female detainees. Due to this lack of policy, Plaintiff argues that the nature and quality of his continued detention after acquittal was burdensome and unacceptably dangerous, especially because Defendant no longer had any legal right to detain him. . . . [V]iewing the evidence and all reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor – as the Court is required to do at this procedural posture –he has presented sufficient evidence creating a genuine issue of material fact for trial that Defendant's overdetention policy is unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. The Court thus denies Defendant's summary judgment motion in this respect.")

Pindak v. Dart, 125 F.Supp.3d 720, (N.D. Ill. 2015) ("The court has found no cases directly addressing whether an agreement by a private contractor to follow policies written by a separate entity constitutes an 'express policy' for Monell purposes. The Seventh Circuit has explained that 'an official municipal policy is a deliberate choice to follow a course of action from among various alternatives made by officials with final policymaking authority.'. . The difficulty of identifying a final policymaker within a private company, thus, emerges again in this analysis. . .Some principles do guide the court's inquiry. Most relevant here is the admonition that an official is less likely to be considered a final policymaker when that 'official is constrained by policies of other officials or legislative bodies.'. . Applying this principle here, the court believes that, to hold Securitas directly liable, Plaintiffs must show that the instruction in the Post Orders to 'remove any panhandlers' was a deliberate choice by a Securitas official, rather than a direction from MBRE. . . . There are disputes of fact regarding who wrote the Post Orders and whether Securitas has authority to update and edit them. Those disputes preclude summary judgment on the 'express policy' and 'final policymaker' rubrics.")

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Wells for next of kin of Locke v. Hanneman, No. 23-CV-273 (ECT/DLM), 2024 WL 3326070, at *7 (D. Minn. July 8, 2024) ("Plaintiffs allege the City had a policy or custom of executing no-knock warrants and of using excessive force against people of color, and that these policies violate the Equal Protection Clause. . . Plaintiffs describe statistics showing that, in 2021 and 2022, eighty percent of no-knock warrants executed by Minneapolis police targeted Black subjects. . . The Amended Complaint alleges that no warrants of this type were executed against a non-Hispanic white subject. . . Plaintiffs allege that the police officers may have been acting reasonably according to official policy, but that the policy in question—executing no-knock warrants exclusively on people of color—was unconstitutional. The bottom line, then, is that the City's exclusive reliance on Officer Hanneman's entitlement to qualified immunity as the ground to challenge Count Two is not persuasive. The officer is not entitled to qualified immunity, and even if he were, that fact alone would not undermine the plausibility of Count Two's policy or custom claim. . . . As with Count Two, Defendants seek dismissal of Plaintiffs' failure-to-train claim in Count Three solely on the basis that Officer Hanneman is entitled to qualified immunity. 'It is the law in this circuit ... that a municipality may not be held liable on a failure to train theory unless an underlying Constitutional violation is located.'. . Because Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that Officer Hanneman is not entitled to qualified immunity, however, the failure-to-train cannot be dismissed on this basis. Regardless, Plaintiffs' allegations are sufficient. The elements of a § 1983 failure-to-train claim are: (1) that training was inadequate; (2) that the failure to train 'reflects a deliberate and conscious choice' by the municipal entity; and (3) the deficiencies in training actually caused the injury at issue. . . The Amended Complaint alleges that Minneapolis Police Department training regarding the use of force and the use of no-knock warrants was inadequate, that policymakers knew it was inadequate and knew that the inadequate training allowed Minneapolis police officers to violate citizens' rights, and that the failure to adequately train Minneapolis police officers resulted in Amir's death. . . Were these Plaintiffs' only allegations in support of the failure-to-train claim, Defendants would likely be entitled to judgment on this claim. . . Unlike the plaintiffs in B.A.B., however, Plaintiffs here outline the City's knowledge of the Minneapolis Police Department's use of no-knock warrants, including four specific instances where police officers' use of no-knock warrants resulted in injuries and consequent civil lawsuits against the City. . . Plaintiffs also plead that the City had notice that Officer Hanneman specifically had violated other individuals' rights during the execution of search warrants, but that the City did not offer Officer Hanneman, or any other officer, additional training in the constitutional execution of search warrants. . . And Plaintiffs allege that independent investigators, including the United States Department of Justice, found Minneapolis Police Department training regarding the use of force to be constitutionally insufficient.")

Fant v. City of Ferguson, 107 F.Supp.3d 1016, 1030-31(E.D. Mo. 2015) ("Plaintiffs have pleaded sufficient facts to state a plausible claim that the City's policy and practice of jailing Plaintiffs for their inability to pay fines violates the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses. . . .The 11 named Plaintiffs have specifically alleged that, pursuant to a City policy and practice, they were each jailed for failure to pay a fine without any inquiry into their ability to pay and without any consideration of alternative measures of punishment. Therefore, Plaintiffs have stated due process and equal protection claims in Count One.")

[See also Fant v. City of Ferguson, No. 4:15-CV-00253-AGF, 2015 WL 4232917, at *4 (E.D. Mo. July 13, 2015) ("Although the Court is not convinced that Plaintiffs have sufficiently pleaded that their warrants were based on knowingly or recklessly false information, upon reconsideration and focusing on Plaintiffs' allegations in Paragraph 203 of the complaint, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have plausibly pleaded that the City has a policy of issuing warrants for 'failure to appear' without probable cause. . . Municipalities may be liable under § 1983 if an action 'pursuant to official municipal policy,' including 'practices so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law,' cause the plaintiffs' injuries. . . In Paragraph 203 of their complaint, Plaintiffs allege that, as a matter of routine, the City issues arrest warrants for a person's 'failure to appear' after City officials have given the person paperwork crossing out their court date or have moved the court date without informing the person. Whether Plaintiffs can prove that such practices are 'so persistent and widespread' as to have the force of law may be determined at a later stage. At this stage, the Court finds Plaintiffs' allegations sufficient to state a plausible Fourth Amendment claim against the City. . . Therefore, the Court will also grant Plaintiff's motion for reconsideration with respect to Count Six.")]

Meir v. McCormick, 2007 WL 1725701, at *9 (D. Minn. June 15, 2007) ("Policy No. 1.01.22.09 sets forth specific characteristics to help an officer to limit his or her exposure to liability. . . The specific characteristics include 'prepare all official reports with your legal risks in mind,' 'provide information that counters the tactics of adversarial attorneys,' 'articulate details and perceptions that defend your position,' and 'do and say things that will make you win on the street and in court.'. . The Court concludes that, accepting the facts alleged by Meir as true, a reasonable jury could find that McCormick's use of unreasonable force and subsequent 'cover-up' that included naming Derouin as a victim, omitting Koons as a witness, including untruths in an official report, and overcharging Meir with criminal offenses flowed directly from the City's unconstitutional policy. The City's argument that another portion of the policy directs officers not to violate the constitutional rights of citizens does not cure the deficiencies of the policy directives clearly placing officer liability concerns above accuracy in report writing.")

NINTH CIRCUIT

Hartzell v. Marana Unified School District, 130 F.4th 722, 739 (9th Cir. 2025) ("Hartzell presented evidence from which a reasonable jury could infer that (1) Policy KFA allowed the District to ban those whose speech the District deemed offensive or inappropriate, (2) Divijak found Hartzell's advocacy offensive, and (3) she was banned after criticizing Divijak. Thus, as we explain next, Hartzell presented sufficient evidence from which the jury could have concluded that the District banned her for offensive or inappropriate speech pursuant to an official policy in violation of the First Amendment. . . .Accordingly, the district court erred in granting judgment as a matter of law to the District on Hartzell's First Amendment claim because a reasonable jury could conclude that Hartzell was banned pursuant to the District's 'expressly adopted official policy.'")

Shorter v. Baca, 895 F.3d 1176, 1188 (9th Cir. 2018) ("The searches that Shorter challenges are distinguishable from Florence, both in their nature and in the lack of justification for the procedure. At the time that Shorter was detained, officials routinely left noncompliant female inmates shackled to their cell doors for hours, virtually unclothed, and without access to meals, water, or a toilet. These additional procedures distinguish what routinely occurred in the HOH units from what happened in the jails in Florence. When left shackled, the female inmates were visible to both the male and female guards on patrol. Moreover, unlike the search procedures in Florence, which occurred when detainees were admitted to the jail's general population from smaller group holding cells, the search here occurs any time the detainee returns from court, where the detainee has been shackled and monitored by prison guards at all times. The search procedures here are a humiliating and extreme invasion of Shorter's privacy that must be justified by legitimate penological purposes.")

Lowry v. City of San Diego, 858 F.3d 1248, 1266-68 (9th Cir. 2017) (en banc) (Thomas, J., dissenting) ("[B]alancing the intrusion caused by an off-leash, bite-and-hold-trained police dog against the government's interest in the use of canine force under these circumstances, a reasonable jury could find that 'a strong government interest' did not 'compel[ ] the employment of such force.'. . I would therefore hold that the district court erred in concluding, as a matter of law, that the use of a police dog did not constitute excessive force. . . I respectfully suggest that the district court also erred in concluding that the City could not be liable even if excessive force had been established. A municipality may be liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for constitutional violations inflicted by its employees 'when the execution of the government's policy or custom ... inflicts the injury.'. . '[I]n this circuit a policy itself need only cause a constitutional violation; it need not be unconstitutional per se.'. . We have explained that '[c]ity policy "causes" an injury where it is "the moving force" behind the constitutional violation.'. . In this case, Lowry alleged in her complaint that the City had an official policy that caused her constitutional violation. Before the district court and on appeal, Lowry has specifically argued that the City's policy of training its dogs to bite and hold a suspect was the direct cause of her injury. The bite-and-hold policy is properly considered the 'moving force' behind Lowry's injury because the dog lunged at her and immediately bit her, according to his bite-and-hold training. . . Moreover, the City admitted in its answer that 'Sergeant Nulton deployed a police services dog in conformity with the official policies and procedures adopted by the San Diego Police Department.' Accordingly, '[t]here is little doubt that a trier of fact could find that [Lowry]'s injury was caused by city policy.'. .The district court erroneously relied on precedent from the qualified immunity context to conclude that the City's bite-and-hold policy was constitutional as a matter of law, and thus that the City could not be liable even if Lowry's constitutional rights had been violated in this particular instance. But our cases analyzing whether the constitutionality of a bite-and-hold policy was clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity did not hold that all applications of a bite-and-hold policy are constitutional. Indeed, we have recognized that the manner in which bite-and-hold force is employed could be unconstitutional in a particular case. . . In such a case, a municipality could be liable if its bite-and-hold policy is the 'moving force' behind an officer's unconstitutional action, even if the policy is not facially unconstitutional. Here, given the City's concession that Sergeant Nulton acted pursuant to its official policy, a jury could find that the policy caused Lowry's constitutional injury and thus that the City is subject to Monell liability. Finally, contrary to the majority's suggestion, a Monell plaintiff need not show that the government acted with deliberate indifference to her constitutional rights if she can show that the government's officers acted affirmatively, pursuant to an official policy. Our cases requiring a showing of deliberate indifference have dealt with a government's failure to take action or failure to properly train its employees. [collecting cases] Because she did not allege a failure to act and instead alleged that the City's affirmative bite-and-hold policy was the cause of her constitutional injury, Lowry need not demonstrate deliberate indifference. Instead, the City's admission that Sergeant Nulton acted pursuant to official policy adequately demonstrates that the City's policy was the 'moving force' behind Lowry's constitutional violation, thereby satisfying this step of the Monell analysis on summary judgment. Accordingly, I would hold that the district court erred in granting summary judgment on this alternate ground. . . By allowing government entities to be held liable when they violate citizens' constitutional rights, § 1983 helps effect the guarantees of the Fourth Amendment. When, as here, a citizen has succeeded in raising disputes of fact as to whether her Fourth Amendment rights were violated, it is for a jury to decide whether a violation occurred and whether the government is liable for that violation.")

Colwell v. Bannister, 763 F.3d 1060, 1063, 1068 (9th Cir. 2014) ("We hold today, as numerous other courts considering the question have, that blindness in one eye caused by a cataract is a serious medical condition. We also hold that the blanket, categorical denial of medically indicated surgery solely on the basis of an administrative policy that 'one eye is good enough for prison inmates' is the paradigm of deliberate indifference. . . .A reasonable jury could find that Colwell was denied surgery, not because it wasn't medically indicated, not because his condition was misdiagnosed, not because the surgery wouldn't have helped him, but because the policy of the NDOC is to require an inmate to endure reversible blindness in one eye if he can still see out of the other. This is the very definition of deliberate indifference.") (Lengthy dissent filed by Judge Bybee)

Gravelet-Blondin v. Shelton, 728 F.3d 1086, 1096, 1097 (9th Cir. 2013) ("We turn first to the City's policy, no longer in effect, defining tasers as a low level of force—lower than any other hands-on force, including a firm grip. Sgt. Shelton, at one time a taser instructor for the Snohomish Police Department, described the policy as classifying tasers as a 'low,' 'very low,' or 'very, very low' level of force. He also explained that, pursuant to the City's taser policy, 'I don't need to be threatened to use a taser.' The City concedes that its former policy was unconstitutional but contends the policy did not cause Sgt. Shelton's use of unconstitutionally excessive force in this case. . . . No one contends the City had a policy requiring officers to tase non-threatening suspects such that Blondin's tasing could have occurred because a specific policy directed it. Instead, the City's policy told Sgt. Shelton that tasing nonresisting individuals in circumstances like this one was acceptable. It informed him that even a firm grip entails more force than a taser and deputized him with the power to tase an individual who presents no threat at all. A reasonable factfinder could look at this incident, in which Sgt. Shelton acted in accordance with a policy he claims never to have departed from, and conclude that such policy was the moving force behind his use of the taser in this case. The Blondins alternatively allege that the City should be held liable for ratifying Sgt. Shelton's unconstitutional conduct. . . . In a footnote, the district court found it unnecessary to reach the Blondins' ratification-based Monell claim 'because the City readily admits that its policy classifies the taser as a low level of force.' It is unclear why the district court thought this admission would impact the ratification argument, which is not based on the City's taser policy. Because the two theories of liability are different, after rejecting the first the court should have proceeded to consider the second. Both remain available to the Blondins on remand.")

Lanier v. City of Woodburn, 518 F.3d 1147, 1148 (9th Cir. 2008) ("This appeal requires us to decide whether the City of Woodburn's policy requiring candidates of choice for city positions to pass a pre-employment drug test as a condition of the job offer is constitutional, facially or as applied to Janet Lynn Lanier, the preferred applicant for a part-time position as a page at the Woodburn Library. The district court held that it was not. We agree that Woodburn's policy is unconstitutional as applied because the City failed to demonstrate a special need to screen a prospective page for drugs, and affirm on this basis. By the same token, Lanier did not show that the policy could never be constitutionally applied to any City position. We reverse the district court's order to the extent it implies otherwise, and remand for its declaratory judgment to be clarified so that it is consistent with our holding.").

Melendres v. Arpaio, 989 F. Supp. 2d 822 (D. Ariz. 2013), aff'd in part, vacated in part by Melendres v. Arpaio, 784 F.3d 1254 (9th Cir. 2015) (policy of sheriff's office directing deputies to detain vehicle occupants because of belief that occupants were not legally present in the United States violated Fourth Amendment)

Holland v. City of San Francisco, No. C10–2603 THE, 2013 WL 968295, *7, *8 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 12, 2013) ("The Parties agree that Florence leaves undisturbed a line of Ninth Circuit precedent holding that strip searches of detainees 'charged with minor offenses who are not classified for housing in the general jail population' are unlawful unless the officer directing the search has a reasonable, individualized suspicion that the detainee is carrying or concealing contraband. . . Thus, after Florence, a strip search of a detainee charged with a minor offense who has not yet appeared before a magistrate is permissible if: (1) the detainee cannot be held apart from the general jail population; or (2) the officer directing the search has a reasonable, individualized suspicion that the arrestee is carrying contraband. Defendants argue that their strip search of Holland was constitutional under Florence because it was carried out pursuant to Sheriff Department policy and happened as part of the regular intake process for all individuals who are admitted to the jail. While substantial deference is due to jail administrators in matters involving the security of the facilities that they are charged with maintaining, Florence, 132 S.Ct. at 1510, the undisputed fact that Holland's search was carried out pursuant to Defendants' policy does not alone suffice to make the search constitutional. . . In the present case, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Holland, she was arrested for a minor offense and Defendants could have—and in fact did—hold her apart from the jail's general population. Although Defendants assert that they might have had to admit Holland to the general population of the jail at any time, Holland points to evidence suggesting that the jail intended to house her alone, including a sign by her cell that said 'inmate to be housed alone' and a notation in the record of her arrest showing that jail staff was directed to house Holland alone. . . It is not disputed that Holland was strip searched before seeing a magistrate, and Defendants do not contend that they had reasonable, individualized suspicion that Holland was concealing contraband. Accordingly, Holland's Fourth Amendment claim will be permitted to proceed against Barnes, who conducted the strip search. With respect to Holland's Monell claim against Hennessey, Defendants do not dispute that Barnes's strip search of Holland was carried out pursuant to department policy or practice and that Hennessey is a policymaker. Defendants' motion for summary judgment is therefore DENIED as to Holland's Fifth Cause of Action, against Barnes, and Seventh Cause of Action, against Sheriff Hennessey in his official capacity. Holland has not pointed to any evidence supporting her claim against Hennessey in his personal capacity.")

Richards v. Janis, 2007 WL 3046252, at *7 (E.D.Wash. Oct. 17, 2007) ("Plaintiffs presented sufficient evidence to establish a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the City of Yakima had a policy or custom serving as the moving force behind Officer Cavin's taser usage. As stated earlier, the Yakima Police Department's taser policy provides in pertinent part: 'Extra caution shall be given when considering use of a Taser on the following individuals: juveniles under 16 years of age, pregnant females, elderly subjects, handcuffed persons, and persons in elevated positions.'

. . Chief Granato interpreted the Department's taser policy as allowing tasering suspects who are handcuffed as long as they are not standing. . . Officer Cavin cannot recall any YPD restrictions on tasering handcuffed individuals . . . By contrast, the National Law Enforcement Policy Center's model policy prohibits tasering a handcuffed prisoner 'absent overtly assaultive behavior.' . . . Based on Officer Cavin's taser usage history, the Department's apparent acquiescence to Officer Cavin's taser usage, and the Department's broad taser policy, the Court concludes a genuine issue of material fact exists regarding whether the Department had a well-settled policy serving as the moving force behind Officer Cavin's taser use. There is also evidence the City of Yakima ratified the officers' conduct toward Mr. Richards. Yakima Detective Feuhrer received statements of eye witnesses Mick Edvalson, Carli Edvalson, Jennifer Sharp, Sherrie Mathers, Tammie West, and Mike Fairbairn. Declarations of these witnesses to this Court stated Mr. Richards never resisted arrest and the officers' conduct was generally abhorrent. Nevertheless, Detective Fueherer did not request an internal investigation and did not give the witness statements to the prosecuting attorney. . . Failure to conduct an internal investigation demonstrates the Department may condone or has ratified the officers' conduct. . . For this reason, the Court also concludes a genuine issue of material fact exists regarding whether the Department has ratified the officers' conduct.").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Hinkle v. Beckham County Bd. of County Commissioners, 962 F.3d 1204, 1237-42 (10th Cir. 2020) ("Under Florence, the jail could (1) decide that Hinkle 'will be' housed in the jail's general population, and (2) then strip search him before placing him in the general population. . . Here, the County did not decide that Hinkle 'will be' placed in the jail's general population, in fact just the opposite. By acting as it did, the County set the cart before the horse—it strip searched Hinkle before committing itself to admit him into its jail's general population. In Florence, the Court repeatedly stressed that the strip search comes after the facility determines that the detainee 'will be' placed in general population. . . In other words, the 'will be' condition precedes the strip search, which itself precedes placing the detainee in the jail's general population. . . . We would reject any argument that the County—for administrative convenience—could treat all its incoming detainees as bound for its jail's general population, thus allowing universal strip searches. . . Body-cavity strip searches are not so trivial. . . .If we were to accept the County's argument and conclude that Florence permits jail policies by which detainees are first strip searched and later sorted out for jail-housing placement, we would render Florence's general-population condition meaningless. Florence does not sanction such a policy—strip searching detainees not destined for the jail's general population, or even as here, for the jail itself. . . We therefore conclude that Florence does not protect the County's policy. . . . [F]or detainees like Hinkle who will not be housed in the jail's general population, the County needs far more to justify a body-cavity strip search—probable cause that detainee is secreting evidence of a crime. . . The County has not argued that it ever had such probable cause. . .Thus, we conclude that Hinkle was subjected to an unlawful strip search. . . . Here, the testimony from Sheriff Jay, Captain Bilbo, and Detention Officer Atwood, together with the County's own description of its policy, demonstrate that the County had a policy of strip searching all detainees before making housing decisions. With this,

Hinkle has sufficiently shown the County's policy and, thus, has satisfied the first element. . .For the causation and state-of-mind elements, Hinkle can satisfy his burden by demonstrating that the County's policy is facially unlawful. . . The Court has explained that '[w]here a plaintiff claims that a particular municipal action itself violates federal law, or directs an employee to do so, resolving these issues of fault and causation is straightforward.'. . A county's sanctioning of a facially unlawful policy establishes that it 'was the moving force behind the injury of which the plaintiff complains.'. . Further, 'proof that a municipality's legislative body or authorized decisionmaker has intentionally deprived a plaintiff of a federally protected right necessarily establishes that the municipality acted culpably.'. .Thus, the next issue is whether the County's policy is facially unconstitutional. . . Apart from its failed Florence argument, the County advances no argument denying that the policy is unconstitutional in all its applications. Under Florence, jail officials must decide that a detainee 'will be' housed in the general population before strip searching him or her. And here, the County's strip-search policy permits strip searches before the key moment in which the jail official with authority decides that the detainee 'will be' housed in the general population. So in enforcing the County's strip-search policy, jail officials strip search all detainees before reaching the operative decision of whether the detainee will be housed in the general population. For these reasons, we conclude that the County's strip-search policy is unconstitutional on its face. And with this, Hinkle has satisfied the causation and state-of-mind elements. Moreover, even if the County's policy were facially constitutional, Hinkle would still satisfy the causation and state-of-mind elements. . . .[T]he County's policy here reflects a deliberate indifference to the obvious consequences of its decision to strip search all detainees before making final housing assignments. Proceeding as if all inmates will be housed in the general population of the jail overlooks the reality that some detainees will not be placed in the jail's general population—for example, former local police chiefs. Yet the County strip searches all detainees, ignoring that any number of reasons might necessitate that a particular detainee be segregated. Accordingly, even though Hinkle has not pointed out a pattern of tortious conduct, we conclude that this case falls within the 'narrow range of circumstances' in which it was 'plainly obvious' that the County's policy of strip searching all detainees would result in a detainee being needlessly body-cavity strip searched. In sum, we conclude that Hinkle was unlawfully strip searched because Florence does not authorize the County's policy and the search was otherwise unsupported by probable cause. Moreover, we conclude that the County's strip-search policy is facially unconstitutional because it directs jail officials to strip search all detainees immediately upon arrival at the jail, before determining they 'will be' housed in its jail, and in the absence of probable cause that the detainees are secreting evidence of a crime. And even if the County's policy were facially constitutional, Hinkle could satisfy the causation and state-of-mind elements because the County's policy directly caused Hinkle's unlawful strip search and the County was deliberately indifferent as to the obvious effects of the policy. Before subjecting a detainee to the abject abasement of a body-cavity strip search, jail officials should first conclusively decide whether that detainee will be housed in their jail's general population.")

Herrera v. Santa Fe Pub. Sch., 41 F.Supp.3d 1188, 1193 (D.N.M. 2014) ("There is sufficient evidence on which a reasonable jury could find that the SFPS Defendants had a custom or practice of conducting suspicionless searches before school events. The evidence is primarily circumstantial, but there is enough of it that a reasonable jury could conclude that the SFPS Defendants trained its agents in search policy with deliberate indifference: that is, there is enough evidence from which a jury could infer that the suspicionless-search practice was widespread, that the SFPS Defendants were on notice of the practice, and that they were deliberately indifferent to this pattern of constitutional violations. The jury also could reasonably conclude that this deliberate indifference was the moving force behind the Plaintiffs' constitutional injuries, and that the SFPS Defendants acted with a culpable state of mind. Accordingly, summary judgment as to that portion of the Plaintiffs' claims that relates to the suspicionless nature of the searches conducted is inappropriate.")

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Barnett v. MacArthur, 956 F.3d 1291, 1295-1301 (11th Cir. 2020), cert. denied sub nom Lemma v. Barnett, 141 S. Ct. 1373 (2021) ("Even though the breathalyzer tests established that Ms. Barnett was not intoxicated, she was required to remain at the jail for eight hours from the time of her arrest pursuant to the 'hold policy' of the Seminole County Sheriff's Office. Mr. Betham testified that under this policy, even if a DUI arrestee's breathalyzer test results are 0.000, and even if there is no indication that the arrestee is under the influence of drugs, she still must wait eight hours from the time of the arrest to be released—even if she posts bond. Shane Love, the Captain of Operations at the Jail, confirmed at his deposition that it is the policy of the Seminole County Sheriff's Office to detain DUI arrestees for at least eight hours, even if their breathalyzer test results are 0.000. Deputy MacArthur similarly testified that once she arrested Ms. Barnett, she was going to have to stay in jail for eight hours pursuant to this policy. In accordance with the hold policy, Ms. Barnett's jail arrest card stated that she was arrested at 4:10 a.m. and noted that she "can go at 12:10"—eight hours later. D.E. 64-17. Ms. Barnett ultimately was released a little over eight hours from the time of her arrest, at 1:13 p.m., despite having posted bond at 10:58 a.m. . . . The detention claim against the Sheriff in his official capacity is in effect a claim against Seminole County. . . .It is undisputed that the Sheriff's hold policy mandates an eight-hour detention of a person like Ms. Barnett who is charged with a DUI—even if her breathalyzer test results show that her blood alcohol content is .000 and even if she posts bond. . . . In granting summary judgment in favor of the Sheriff, the district court reasoned that the hold policy is consistent with Florida Statute § 316.193(9), which allows the option of holding a person for eight hours after a DUI arrest. . . This constituted error for two independent reasons. First, unlike the hold policy, § 316.193(9) does not mandate the blanket eight-hour detention of all DUI arrestees. Second, even if it did, the statute could be unconstitutional as applied to Ms. Barnett through the Sheriff's hold policy. . . . Unlike the Sheriff's hold policy, pursuant to which officers are required to detain DUI arrestees for eight hours, § 316.193 gives officers discretion in determining when to release a DUI arrestee and allows for three release options (only one of which is an eight-hour hold). . . But even if the Sheriff's hold policy were consistent with (or mandated by) § 316.193, the existence of a state statute does not answer the federal constitutional question. It has long been understood that a state law must conform to the Constitution, and if it does not do so it must yield. . . .On this record, Ms.

Barnett's detention claim against the Sheriff must be decided by a jury. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to her, Ms. Barnett was kept in custody pursuant to (and because of) the Sheriff's mandatory eight-hour hold policy after her two breathalyzer test results registered blood-alcohol readings of 0.000 and after she posted bond. The only remaining question then, is whether a reasonable jury could find that the hold policy, as applied to Ms. Barnett, violated her Fourth Amendment rights. . . .The Sixth Circuit has rejected the argument that '[w]hen subsequent developments disprove the correctness of a previous police determination that probable cause exists, ... the police no longer have justification under the Fourth Amendment to continue the incarceration, and must release the suspect.' Peet v. City of Detroit, 502 F.3d 557, 565 (6th Cir. 2007). We choose not to follow Peet for two reasons. First, the Sixth Circuit incorrectly suggested that there were no cases or authorities supporting the Fourth Amendment proposition it rejected. . . When Peet was decided in 2007, however, the Fifth and Seventh Circuits had already held under the Fourth Amendment that a person must be released from custody if the probable cause that existed for her arrest has dissipated. See BeVier, 806 F.2d at 128; McConney, 863 F.2d at 1185. For some reason, the Sixth Circuit did not acknowledge, consider, or discuss those decisions. Second, the Sixth Circuit was concerned that investigators would have an affirmative duty to re-evaluate the matter of probable cause with every new piece of information or evidence they received. . .The Fourth Amendment standard we announce, borrowed from the McConney decision of the Fifth Circuit, does not place on police officers an affirmative and independent duty to further investigate in order to continually reassess the matter of probable cause in warrantless arrest cases. It only requires that the officers release an arrestee if evidence they obtain demonstrates beyond a reasonable doubt that there is no longer probable cause for the detention. That standard, we believe, properly balances the competing liberty interests and law enforcement concerns and remains faithful to the Fourth Amendment's textual command that seizures and detentions be reasonable.")

McCullough v. City of Montgomery, No. 2:15-CV-463 (RCL), 2017 WL 956362, at *9 (M.D. Ala. Mar. 10, 2017) ("In this case, plaintiffs allege that the City and Judge Hayes created a series of policies to increase municipal revenue through stops, ticketing, and arrests. . . These are 'systemic and related policies, practices and customs.'. . They note these policies resulted in millions of dollars in fines and forfeitures and note that Montgomery raised more than three times as much in fines and more than fifteen times as much in local court costs as did Huntsville, which has a similar population. . . As previously noted, plaintiffs explicitly do not take issue with any judicial actions taken by Hayes or any other municipal judge. Given that municipal revenue generation is not a function normally performed by a judge, these allegations are thus for non-judicial actions. Rather, they concern the creation of policy for the City or for the municipal courts on behalf of the City. Accordingly, Judge Hayes cannot rely on the doctrine of judicial immunity. That is, because the allegations concern actions outside the scope of the judicial role, there is no immunity and the question shifts to the role of Judge Hayes. . . .Plaintiffs' allegations of a series of interwoven policies designed to increase municipal revenue raise factual questions that cannot be resolved at this time. It is possible to understand Judge Hayes' role as creating policy for the municipal court independent of the City, but it is also possible to understand the allegations as Judge Hayes operating as a de facto City official working with the police and others to craft a series of policies to increase municipal cashflow. Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged that these policies were created, but it is not clear at this point the precise nature of Judge Hayes' role. Accordingly, plaintiffs have stated a claim either that Judge Hayes is liable in his official capacity or that the City is liable because he was acting as a City official in creating those policies. Which of these two allegation is correct cannot currently be determined, but plaintiffs have nonetheless stated a claim for this Count.")

Avery v. City of Hoover, No. 2:13-CV-00826-MHH, 2015 WL 4411765, at *5 (N.D. Ala. July 17, 2015) ("Ms. Avery alleges that Hoover 'developed a de facto policy of using police officers in its employ ... to respond to instances of behavioral disruptions of disabled children' by arresting the students, and Hoover 'used suspensions against children with behavioral disabilities.'. . As counsel for Ms. Avery explained at the hearing in this matter, a teacher 'who teaches a special ed student is instructed on [the student's] IEP extensively,' but the City of Hoover does not familiarize school resource officers with students' IEPs. . . Consequently, those officers are unfamiliar with the needs of students who have IEPs, but Hoover nevertheless 'encourage[s] and allow[s] police intervention into behavioral issues' and 'use[s] suspensions against disabled children.'. . Ms. Avery has alleged sufficient facts at this stage to maintain her claim that the City had a policy or custom that is responsible for the injury that Ms. Avery has identified. That policy includes the failure to provide adequate training to officers who interact with students with IEPs.")

a. Policies Not Sufficient for Monell Liability

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT

City of Grants Pass, Oregon v. Johnson, 144 S. Ct. 2202, 2218-2226 (2024) ("Public camping ordinances like those before us are nothing like the law at issue in Robinson. Rather than criminalize mere status, Grants Pass forbids actions like 'occupy[ing] a campsite' on public property 'for the purpose of maintaining a temporary place to live.' Grants Pass Municipal Code §§ 5.61.030, 5.61.010; App. to Pet. for Cert. 221a–222a. Under the city's laws, it makes no difference whether the charged defendant is homeless, a backpacker on vacation passing through town, or a student who abandons his dorm room to camp out in protest on the lawn of a municipal building. . . In that respect, the city's laws parallel those found in countless jurisdictions across the country. . . And because laws like these do not criminalize mere status, Robinson is not implicated. . . . Under Martin [v. City of Boise], judges take from elected representatives the questions whether and when someone who has committed a proscribed act with a requisite mental state should be 'relieved of responsibility' for lack of 'moral culpability.'. . And Martin exemplifies much of what can go wrong when courts try to resolve matters like those unmoored from any secure guidance in the Constitution. . . . To be sure, Martin attempted to head off these complexities through some back-of-the-envelope arithmetic. The Ninth Circuit said a city needs to consider individuals 'involuntarily' homeless (and thus entitled to camp on public property) only when the overall homeless population exceeds the total number of 'adequate' and 'practically available' shelter beds. . . But as sometimes happens with abstract rules created by those far from the front lines, that test has proven all but impossible to administer in practice. . . . As we have stressed, cities and States are not bound to adopt public-camping laws. They may also choose to narrow such laws (as Oregon itself has recently). Beyond all that, many substantive legal protections and provisions of the Constitution may have important roles to play when States and cities seek to enforce their laws against the homeless. . . The only question we face is whether one specific provision of the Constitution—the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause of the Eighth Amendment—prohibits the enforcement of public-camping laws. . . Homelessness is complex. Its causes are many. So may be the public policy responses required to address it. At bottom, the question this case presents is whether the Eighth Amendment grants federal judges primary responsibility for assessing those causes and devising those responses. It does not. . . .Yes, people will disagree over which policy responses are best; they may experiment with one set of approaches only to find later another set works better; they may find certain responses more appropriate for some communities than others. But in our democracy, that is their right. Nor can a handful of federal judges begin to 'match' the collective wisdom the American people possess in deciding 'how best to handle' a pressing social question like homelessness. Robinson, 370 U. S., at 689 (White, J., dissenting). The Constitution's Eighth Amendment serves many important functions, but it does not authorize federal judges to wrest those rights and responsibilities from the American people and in their place dictate this Nation's homelessness policy. The judgment below is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

But see City of Grants Pass, Oregon v. Johnson, 144 S. Ct. 2202, 2228, 2241-44 (2024) (Sotomayor, J., joined by Kagan, J., and Jackson, J., dissenting) ("Sleep is a biological necessity, not a crime. For some people, sleeping outside is their only option. The City of Grants Pass jails and fines those people for sleeping anywhere in public at any time, including in their cars, if they use as little as a blanket to keep warm or a rolled-up shirt as a pillow. For people with no access to shelter, that punishes them for being homeless. That is unconscionable and unconstitutional. Punishing people for their status is 'cruel and unusual' under the Eighth Amendment. . . . Nothing in today's decision prevents these States, cities, and counties from declining to criminalize people for sleeping in public when they have no available shelter. Indeed, although the majority describes Martin as adopting an unworkable rule, the elected representatives in Oregon codified that very rule. . . The Court today does not decide whether the Ordinances are valid under a new Oregon law that codifies Martin. In 2021, Oregon passed a law that constrains the ability of municipalities to punish homeless residents for public sleeping. 'Any city or county law that regulates the acts of sitting, lying, sleeping or keeping warm and dry outdoors on public property that is open to the public must be objectively reasonable as to time, place and manner with regards to persons experiencing homelessness.' Ore. Rev. Stat. § 195.530(2). The law also grants persons 'experiencing homelessness' a cause of action to 'bring suit for injunctive or declaratory relief to challenge the objective reasonableness' of an ordinance. § 195.530(4). This law was meant to ' "ensure that individuals experiencing homelessness are protected from fines or arrest for sleeping or camping on public property when there are no other options."'. . . The panel below already concluded that '[t]he city ordinances addressed in Grants Pass will be superseded, to some extent,'. . . by this new law. . . Courts may need to determine whether and how the new law limits the City's enforcement of its Ordinances. . . The Court today also does not decide whether the Ordinances violate the Eighth Amendment's Excessive Fines Clause. . . . Finally, the Court does not decide whether the Ordinances violate the Due Process Clause. . . .The Due Process Clause may well place constitutional limits on anti-homelessness ordinances. . . .The Eighth Amendment prohibits punishing homelessness by criminalizing sleeping outside when an individual has nowhere else to go. It is cruel and unusual to apply any penalty 'selectively to minorities whose numbers are few, who are outcasts of society, and who are unpopular, but whom society is willing to see suffer though it would not countenance general application of the same penalty across the board.'. .I remain hopeful that our society will come together 'to address the complexities of the homelessness challenge facing the most vulnerable among us.'. . That responsibility is shared by those vulnerable populations, the States and cities in which they reside, and each and every one of us. . . .This Court, too, has a role to play in faithfully enforcing the Constitution to prohibit punishing the very existence of those without shelter. I remain hopeful that someday in the near future, this Court will play its role in safeguarding constitutional liberties for the most vulnerable among us. Because the Court today abdicates that role, I respectfully dissent.")

Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of County of Burlington, 132 S. Ct. 1510 (2012) (In a 5/4 opinion, the Court affirmed the decision of the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, see infra, but a plurality in Part IV of the opinion (not joined by Justice Thomas) noted that "[t]his case does not require the Court to rule on the types of searches that would be reasonable in instances where, for example, a detainee will be held without assignment to the general jail population and without substantial contact with other detainees. . . . The circumstances before the Court. . . do not present the opportunity to consider a narrow exception of the sort Justice ALITO describes, post, at 1524 – 1525 (concurring opinion), which might restrict whether an arrestee whose detention has not yet been reviewed by a magistrate or other judicial officer, and who can be held in available facilities removed from the general population, may be subjected to the types of searches at issue here." 132 S. Ct. at 1522, 1523.)

FIRST CIRCUIT

Burrell v. Hampshire County, 307 F.3d 1, 10 (1st Cir. 2002) ("Hampshire Jail's policy of not screening and then segregating potentially violent prisoners from non-violent prisoners is not itself a facial violation of the Eighth Amendment.")

Sonia v. Town of Brookline, 914 F.Supp.2d 36, 44, 45 (D. Mass. 2012) ("As a duly enacted regulation of the Town's Board of Selectmen, the 'always on duty' policy qualifies as an 'official municipal action' for purposes of a § 1983 claim. However, the 'always on duty' policy could not have caused the plaintiff's injury because the policy forbids the actions of the individual defendants as alleged in the Amended Complaint. . .The plaintiff alleges that the Officers assaulted and arrested him after they refused to pay his company for services that they had requested for a bachelor party. The Officers activated themselves pursuant to the 'always on duty' policy at 'some point' prior to their alleged assault of the plaintiff, while they were intoxicated. The first claim, then, is that the Town's enactment of the 'always on duty' policy caused the plaintiff's injuries because the officers activated themselves pursuant to it during the assault. The Town has attached a copy of the 'always on duty' policy to the instant motion. Because the policy is referred to in the plaintiff's Amended Complaint and its authenticity is not disputed, the Court will treat its contents as part of the allegations for purposes of resolving the motion to dismiss. The 'always on duty' policy explicitly prohibits officers from making an off-duty arrest when the arresting officer is 'personally involved' in the incident and excepts from permitted arrests any arrests in which the officer is 'personally involved.' According to the policy, off-duty officers are "personally involved" whenever they (or their friends or relatives) are engaged in the incident prior to the arrest, unless those off-duty officers are the victims of a crime. Here, the Officers themselves were engaged in a dispute with the plaintiff prior to arresting him. Accepting the plaintiff's allegations as true, the plaintiff took no action that could have made any of the defendants the victim of a crime. The Officers could not have been more 'personally involved' in the dispute, and therefore, acted in plain violation of the 'always on duty' policy enacted by the Town. Because their actions were not authorized by the 'always on duty' policy, the policy could not have caused the plaintiff's injury.")

SECOND CIRCUIT

Jeffery v. City of New York, 113 F. 4th 176, ___ (2d Cir. Aug. 16, 2024) ("[W]e conclude that the district court correctly dismissed plaintiffs' right-to-travel challenge to a week-long nighttime curfew imposed in New York City to curb escalating violence, destruction, and looting occurring in conjunction with otherwise peaceful demonstrations protesting the Minneapolis death of George Floyd. Upon de novo review, we conclude that the challenged curfew withstands even strict scrutiny.")

Murphy v. Hughson, 82 F.4th 177, 185-87 (2d Cir. 2023) ("Florence does not dictate the result of this case because Murphy is not challenging a prison-wide policy on its face or as applied to him; rather, his claim concerns actions taken by an individual officer acting on his own whim and contrary to established jail policy. . . . Defendants do not -- and, in view of the Policy's clear language, cannot -- claim there was a policy requiring that every detainee admitted to the County Jail be strip searched or a policy calling for a strip search of a prisoner with Murphy's characteristics. Nor have they asserted a legitimate penological justification for subjecting Murphy to such a search. Instead, on the facts most favorable to Murphy, which we must accept for these purposes, Murphy was strip searched because of an individual officer's ad hoc decision. We conclude that, in these circumstances, the standard set forth in our pre-Florence case law continues to apply: If a misdemeanor arrestee entering a prison is subjected to an ad hoc strip search, without reasonable suspicion, the Fourth Amendment is violated. . . Florence did not hold that individual actions, ungrounded in legitimate penological purposes and in contravention of a jail's policy, are exempt from the Constitution's requirement that 'a search be justified as reasonable under the circumstances.'. . Absent an actual penological justification or institutional policy, our prior case law on the constitutional boundaries of permissible strip searches continues to apply. Here, the jail did not have a policy calling for strip searching Murphy in the circumstances, nor did it have a legitimate penological interest for doing so. Moreover, the Policy was consistent with our pre-Florence law, permitting strip searches only upon individualized reasonable suspicion. On the record below, a reasonable jury could surely conclude there was no constitutionally cognizable reason justifying the strip search. As the district court recognized, the Justification Sheet did not provide 'any specific reasonable suspicion to justify the strip search.'. . Indeed, Murphy was a 67-year-old man, who was sitting on a bus a little before 9 a.m. He was arrested on a misdemeanor warrant -- not for weapons or drug violations, but for home maintenance and fire code infractions. Moreover, his $750 bail had been or was being posted; he was to be released or reappear in court no later than 1 p.m., only about an hour after the search took place; and he was not likely to be housed in the jail's general population. In these circumstances, there was little -- if any -- reason to suspect he was hiding a weapon or drugs inside his body cavity or that he would bring contraband into the jail's general population.")

Marlin v. City of New York, No. 15 CI V. 2235 (CM), 2016 WL 4939371, at *19 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 7, 2016) ("Plaintiff has not supplied sufficient factual content to sustain a Monell claim based on the City's alleged policies involving NYPD's use of formations and police lines, use of 'force-related policies, procedures, and training' for crowd and disorder control at First Amendment assemblies, or NYPD's inadequate or deficient 'use of force reporting.'")

THIRD CIRCUIT

Reilly v. City of Harrisburg, No. 22-1795, 2023 WL 4418231, at *3 (3d Cir. July 10, 2023) (not reported), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 1002 (2024) ("Here, the District Court was correct that Harrisburg has no policy or custom of over-enforcing the Ordinance to prohibit peaceful sidewalk counseling. The City issued no rules, proclamations, or edicts that could be considered a policy, other than the Ordinance itself, which is constitutional on its face under Bruni. . . Rather than setting a blanket policy, Harrisburg gives each police officer discretion to investigate and determine whether a violation has occurred. Further, at oral argument Harrisburg's counsel explained that the Ordinance bans only the four listed activities, and they do not include peaceful sidewalk counseling. Finally, Reilly and Biter's evidence that Harrisburg admits that it had an unwritten enforcement policy also fails to establish a municipal policy. The litigation statements on which Plaintiffs rely show only that Harrisburg officials misunderstood the Ordinance on its face, not that they had an unwritten policy of unconstitutional enforcement in 2014. Nor is there a custom of restricting such counseling. The record does not reveal one citation or arrest. And although Reilly has evidence of a one-off improper warning in July 2014, she and Biter need 'considerably more proof than [a] single incident' to trigger Monell liability. . . On this record, they have not satisfied that burden. Reilly and Biter may subjectively fear they will be cited or arrested, but that falls short under Monell. Harrisburg has no policy of prohibiting sidewalk counseling, and the appellants have not shown the existence of any custom. Thus the District Court correctly granted summary judgment for the City, and we affirm.")

J.B. ex rel. Benjamin v. Fassnacht, 801 F.3d 336, 341-47 (3d Cir. 2015) ("This is a case of first impression in this Circuit and all others . . . We must determine whether the Supreme Court's holding in Florence extends to juvenile detainees. Analogous to Florence, we must balance a juvenile detainee's privacy interest with the risks to their well-being and the institutional security risks in not performing such searches. . . .We encourage detention centers with blanket strip search policies to maintain protocol minimizing the embarrassment and indignity of such a search for the juvenile. Nevertheless, J.B. did not possess the same reasonable expectation of privacy upon admission to the LYIC as did the schoolchild in Safford. That he was twelve years old when this occurred does not change that fact. Accordingly, we find that these penological interests outweigh the privacy interests of juvenile detainees. Juvenile detainees present risks both similar and unique to those cited in Florence. At bottom, these risks pose significant dangers to the detainee himself, other detainees, and juvenile detention center staff. . . .We do not, however, interpret the Court to have contemplated an exception based on age classifications. Instead, the exceptions contemplated by the Court appear to involve factual scenarios where, for instance, release into the general population of the facility is not necessary. . . Thus, it is reasonable to believe there are scenarios where a juvenile's release into the general population of a detention facility is not necessary. In such a circumstance, the Supreme Court has not ruled on the legality of a strip search and such a search may indeed require a reasonable suspicion analysis as contemplated in Bell v. Wolfish. . . But this is quite a different thing than the Court carving out an exception to its holding based on the individual characteristics of a detainee, of which age is a component. Given that the security risks are similar irrespective of whether the facility hosts adults or juveniles and that an individualized inquiry proves unworkable for both, we do not believe the Supreme Court contemplated such an exception. . . .For all of the reasons stated above, Florence guides our decision to uphold LYIC's strip search policy of all juvenile detainees admitted to general population at LYIC.")

Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of County of Burlington, 621 F.3d 296, 308, 311 (3d Cir. 2010)("Like the Ninth and Eleventh Circuit Courts of Appeals, we conclude that the security interest in preventing smuggling at the time of intake is as strong as the interest in preventing smuggling after the contact visits at issue in Bell. We reject Plaintiffs' argument that blanket searches are unreasonable because jails have little interest in strip searching arrestees charged with non-indictable offenses. This argument cannot be squared with the facts and law of Bell. . . In sum, balancing the Jails' security interests at the time of intake before arrestees enter the general population against the privacy interests of the inmates, we hold that the strip search procedures described by the District Court at BCJ and ECCF are reasonable. Accordingly, we will reverse the District Court's grant of summary judgment on Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment strip search claim and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion."), aff'd, 132 S. Ct. 1510 (2012).

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Monacelli v. City of Dallas, Texas, No. 24-10067, 2024 WL 4692025, at *2 (5th Cir. Nov. 6, 2024) (not reported) ("Monacelli's primary claim concerns policy liability arising from the Dallas

Police Department's General Orders 609.00 (involving "mass arrests") and 902.00 (involving "less-than-lethal"). Monacelli asserts both General Orders were facially unconstitutional as written in 2020, allegations which, if properly pleaded, would satisfy Monell's third factor. . .This Court considered General Order 609.00 in a Monell case arising from the events at issue here and held that General Order 609.00 was not facially unconstitutional. . . Monacelli fails to distinguish Verastique v. City of Dallas, and we find no reason in the record to do so. Monacelli's claim as to General Order 902.00 yields the same result. Verastique instructs that a policy is not facially unconstitutional unless it 'affirmatively allows or compels unconstitutional conduct.'. .What's more, 'a written policy cannot be facially unconstitutional solely due to instructions that it leaves out.'. . Monacelli does not allege that General Order 902.00 compelled unconstitutional conduct but, rather, that it left something out—namely, a prohibition on 'firing or deploying direct contact hits into a crowd of protesters.' These allegations do not plausibly plead that General Order 902.00 was facially unconstitutional.")

Verastique v. City of Dallas, Texas, 106 F.4th 427, 434-36 (5th Cir. 2024) (Plaintiffs attempt to establish the first and third Monell elements . . . by alleging that General Order 609.00 is unconstitutional on its face because it (1) permits DPD officers 'to conduct arrests as they saw necessary to quell a civil unrest incident,' with (2) no further 'guidance or restrictions on arrests.' Put another way, they fault the Order for (1) committing certain decisions to the discretion of municipal employees and (2) failing comprehensively to explain every hypothetical stricture that might touch on the legality of an arrest.For purposes of a Monell claim, an official, written policy is facially unconstitutional if it 'affirmatively allows or compels unconstitutional conduct.' . . General Order 609.00 does neither. . . . Officers are not prohibited from exercising the Order's grants of discretion in a constitutionally valid manner. Nor are they required to disregard restrictions or limitations not expressly mentioned in the text of the Order itself. . . . Plaintiffs' assault on General Order 609.00 cannot be squared with the limitations that § 1983 places on the scope of municipal liability. . . . Monell claims predicated on respondeat superior liability are wholly alien to the plain meaning of § 1983. . . The statute does not 'impose liability vicariously on governing bodies solely on the basis of the existence of an employer-employee relationship with a tortfeasor.'. . Accordingly, a municipality is liable only for its own illegal acts. . . Yet, that's precisely what plaintiffs' theory does: It holds municipalities liable for the unsanctioned and unordered acts of others. . . In sum, plaintiffs have not plausibly pleaded that General Order 609.00 is unconstitutional on its face. Dismissal of their claims premised on facial invalidity was therefore proper.")

Edwards v. City of Balch Springs, 70 F.4th 302, 308-09 (5th Cir. 2023) ("[W]e know of no cases from this circuit explaining how to determine whether a formal, written policy 'itself violates federal law'. . . such that it is 'unconstitutional on its face' rather than 'facially innocuous' under Monell's moving-force element. . . Indeed, a district court recently remarked that it was not 'aware' of a 'guide for analyzing a city's written policy' or of any 'caselaw that provides a roadmap for such analysis.'. . The Supreme Court has held that 'recovery from a municipality is limited to acts that are, properly speaking, acts of the municipality—that is, acts which the municipality has officially sanctioned or ordered.'. . And that Court has indicated that a policy is not facially unconstitutional just because it commits some decisions to an officer's discretion, for '[i]f the mere exercise of discretion ... could give rise to a constitutional violation, the result would be indistinguishable from respondeat superior liability.'. . Following that precedent, some of our sister circuits have held that a written policy cannot be facially unconstitutional solely due to instructions that it leaves out. For example, the Eighth Circuit has held that a policy that 'fails to give detailed guidance that might have averted a constitutional violation by an employee' is not thereby unconstitutional. . . Likewise, the Ninth Circuit has held that a policy's 'failure to implement procedural safeguards to prevent constitutional violations' is an 'omission' and therefore cognizable only under the deliberate-indifference standard. . . And the Eleventh Circuit has held that 'the deliberate indifference standard applies to section 1983 claims basing liability on a municipality's actions in failing to prevent a deprivation of federal rights.'. . We agree. An official, written policy is 'itself' unconstitutional only if it affirmatively allows or compels unconstitutional conduct. . . But where such an official, written policy merely commits some decisions to an individual officer's on-the-scene discretion, or gives some detailed instructions while omitting others, then that policy satisfies Monell's moving-force element only if those features stem from the policymaker's deliberate indifference. Edwards argues that the City's policy is facially unconstitutional because it contains 'no immediacy requirement necessary to justify an officer's use of deadly force' and because it calls 'for an officer to use the officer's own subjective beliefs in determining whether deadly force was justified.' Neither argument succeeds.")

Garza v. City of Donna, 922 F.3d 626, 637 (5th Cir. 2019) ("Assuming Ruben De Leon was a final policymaking authority for the City, Appellants must show a policy or custom of his that was the moving force for the episodic acts or omissions of DPD employees. . . Policy can take the 'form of written policy statements, ordinances, or regulations.'. . It can be 'a widespread practice that is "so common and well-settled as to constitute a custom that fairly represents municipal policy."'. . It can take the form of a failure to train, provided that the failure is 'closely related to the ultimate injury' and not just attributable to a particular officer's shortcomings. . . It can also be a decision to adopt a course of action to handle a particular situation, if made by an authorized decisionmaker. . . Appellants do not attribute the actions of the arresting officer, Silva, or the senior officers who performed CPR, Rosas and Suarez, to any particular policy or custom. What they argue for Silva, Rosas, and Suarez is that De Leon's order to post the 'Welcome to Donna Hilton' and 'Punisher' signs announced an official policy of detainee mistreatment. The import of the signs is too general and inexact for the signs to constitute the sort of specific directive required for municipal liability, and it is too nebulous to constitute a moving force. The episodic acts or omissions of these employees therefore cannot be attributed to the City.")

Alvarez v. City of Brownsville, 904 F.3d 382, 390-91 (5th Cir., 2018) (en banc), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 2690 (2019) ("To establish that the City of Brownsville is liable as a municipality, a policy must have been the 'moving force' behind Alvarez's constitutional violation. . . Stated differently, Alvarez 'must show direct causation, i.e., that there was "a direct causal link" between the policy and the violation.'. . Additionally, Alvarez must demonstrate that the policy was implemented with

'deliberate indifference' to the 'known or obvious consequences' that constitutional violations would result. . . To base deliberate indifference on a single incident, 'it should have been apparent to the policymaker that a constitutional violation was the highly predictable consequence of a particular policy.'. . The causal link 'moving force' requirement and the degree of culpability 'deliberate indifference' requirement must not be diluted, for 'where a court fails to adhere to rigorous requirements of culpability and causation, municipal liability collapses into respondeat superior liability.'. .Assuming that Police Chief Garcia is a policymaker and that the practice of not freely sharing information from the internal administrative investigations with the criminal investigation division constitutes a policy, Alvarez's theory of liability falls short in two respects: (1) there is not a 'direct causal link between the policy and the violation,' and (2) there was no 'deliberate indifference' shown. . . First, there is not 'a direct causal link between the policy and the violation.'. . .This series of interconnected errors within the Brownsville Police Department that involved individual officers was separate from the general policy of non-disclosure of information from the internal administrative investigations. The general policy of non-disclosure was not a direct cause of Alvarez's injury. . . Second, this general policy of non-disclosure was not implemented with 'deliberate indifference.' To show deliberate indifference based on a single incident, there must be evidence that shows that it should have been apparent or obvious to the policymaker that a constitutional violation was the 'highly predictable consequence' of the particular policy. . . While it was established that information from internal administrative investigations is generally not shared, Sergeant Infante, Commander Avitia, Lieutenant Etheridge, and Police Chief Garcia still understood that this policy did not prohibit them from disclosing video recordings. Moreover, if Officer Carrejo requested or inquired about the existence of any videos of the incident, the videos would have been turned over. Because of the understanding throughout the police department that even with the policy that possibly exculpatory evidence such as the videos could be disclosed, it was by no means 'apparent' that a constitutional violation was a 'highly predictable consequence' of the general policy of non-disclosure. . . Put another way, it can not be 'apparent' that a constitutional violation is a 'highly predictable consequence' if no impression is created from the policy that the evidence central to the alleged violation has to be withheld. Accordingly, there was no 'deliberate indifference' shown in implementing this policy. . . .Both of Alvarez's arguments are unavailing. Placing the final decision making authority in the hands of one individual, even if it makes an error more likely, does not by itself establish deliberate indifference.")

But see Alvarez v. City of Brownsville, 904 F.3d 382, 402-03 (5th Cir. 2018) (en banc), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 2690 (2019) (Graves, J., joined by Costa, J., dissenting) ("I write separately to: (1) dissent from the majority's moving force analysis; (2) dissent from the majority's deliberate indifference analysis; and (3) address Brownsville's egregiously inadequate training policies. . . .BPD has a policy. . . that IAD officers do not proactively disclose evidence, including Brady evidence, to CID investigators. Instead, IAD officers pass all Brady evidence up their chain of command to Chief Garcia, who has sole responsibility to ensure that any Brady evidence is properly disclosed. Because these officers do not disclose evidence, there is no evidence form generated for the CID case file. Thus, contrary to the majority's view, the officers committed no 'interconnected errors' in conducting their investigation. The IAD officers faithfully passed the evidence up the chain of command to Chief Garcia without disclosing the evidence to CID. In turn, the CID officer, unaware that relevant evidence existed, conducted no evidentiary follow-up and simply passed the file to the District Attorney's office. This was not error, it was how the system was designed to work. Moreover, while the majority characterizes Garcia's failure to review the file as nothing 'more than negligent oversight,' the record paints a different picture. Indeed, Garcia did not review nine out of thirteen known use of force cases. Even when Garcia did review such files, it may be 'several weeks, even up to a month or more ... after the criminal case had been submitted to the [D]istrict [A]ttorney's office.' Garcia's failure to review the instant case was entirely in line with BPD practice. I therefore respectfully dissent from the majority's conclusion that Alvarez has not established that the non-disclosure policy was the moving force behind the alleged violation. BPD's policy of not disclosing exculpatory evidence to CID investigators was the direct cause of BPD's failure to disclose the video evidence to the District Attorney and the defense.")

Peña v. City of Rio Grande City, 879 F.3d 613, 622 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Peña first cites the police department's written taser policy—reaffirmed six weeks before the incident—that allows for the tasing of moving targets. But that policy is neither unconstitutional on its face nor causally connected to Peña's excessive-force claim. As noted above, Peña's allegations against the officers survive Rule 12(b)(6) not because she was running but because she was a non-threatening non-suspect. A felon in flight presents another matter entirely. Because the written policy that Peña identifies is causally irrelevant, it cannot demonstrate the persistent practice she alleges. . . Aside from the abovementioned policy, the only 'specific fact' in the complaint is the single incident in which Peña was involved. But plausibly to plead a practice 'so persistent and widespread as to practically have the force of law,' Connick, 563 U.S. at 61, a plaintiff must do more than describe the incident that gave rise to his injury. In Spiller, 130 F.3d at 167, we rejected, as 'vague and conclusory,' a claim by a black motorist, arrested without probable cause, that his arrest resulted from the police department's general policy of 'disregard[ing] ... the rights of African American citizens' and of 'engag[ing] [African Americans] without regard to probable cause to arrest.' Though Peña characterizes the relevant policy with greater particularity, her allegations are equally conclusional and utterly devoid of 'factual enhancements.'")

Mabry v. Lee County, 849 F.3d 232, 237-39 (5th Cir. 2017) ("As the district court noted, T.M.'s case 'lies at the intersection' of Safford and Florence: both precedents share important similarities with the facts here, but neither is on all-fours. . . T.M.'s case is like Safford in that it involves the search of a minor student, and it is like Florence in that the search was conducted pursuant to routine intake procedures at a correctional facility. The first question we must address, then, is whether Florence or Safford—or neither—controls in cases when, as here, the inmate who is searched on intake into a correctional facility is a juvenile. Only one of our sister circuits has addressed precisely this question since Florence was decided. . . In J.B. ex rel. Benjamin v. Fassnacht, 801 F.3d 336 (3d Cir. 2015), a minor was strip and cavity searched pursuant to routine intake procedures at a juvenile detention center. The Third Circuit held that Florence controlled

