movement, Orozco was seized within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. It matters not whether the Officers intended to shoot Orozco or whether they even knew he was present as a passenger. Under clearly established precedent at the time, Orozco was seized."); Fagre v. Parks, 985 F.3d 16, 22 n.2 (1st Cir. 2021) ("In Landol-Rivera v. Cruz Cosme, 906 F.2d 791 (1st Cir. 1990), we held that a hostage was not 'seized' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment when a police officer shot the hostage while firing into a car containing both the hostage and a fleeing suspect). . . Fagre argues that Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. 249, 127 S.Ct. 2400, 168 L.Ed.2d 132 (2007), requires us to revisit our holding in Landol-Rivera because Brendlin says that when a police officer intentionally stops a vehicle, the officer subjects all of the vehicle's occupants to a Fourth Amendment seizure. . . Because we hold that Trooper Parks's actions were objectively reasonable, we do not need to reach this issue."); Davenport v. Borough of Homestead, 870 F.3d 273, 279 (3d Cir. 2017) ("The Supreme Court has 'express[ed] no view' on whether a passenger in Davenport's position may recover under a Fourth Amendment theory. Plumhoff v. Rickard, ––– U.S. ––––, 134 S.Ct. 2012, 2022 n.4, 188 L.Ed.2d 1056 (2014). And the federal appellate courts appear divided on the issue. [citing cases] Nevertheless, the majority of circuits have suggested that a passenger in Davenport's position may seek relief under the Fourth Amendment; those circuits that have suggested otherwise reached their decisions on this issue before the Supreme Court decided Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. 249, 127 S.Ct. 2400, 168 L.Ed.2d 132 (2007). . . . Accordingly, even if the officers' intended application of force would have only incidentally seized Davenport, because her freedom of movement was terminated 'by the very instrumentality set in motion or put in place in order to achieve' Burris's and her detention, . . . there is no set of facts that precludes a finding of a Fourth Amendment seizure. Today we join the majority of circuits in holding that a passenger shot by an officer during the course of a vehicular pursuit may seek relief under the Fourth Amendment. Because Davenport may do so, the Fourth Amendment, 'not the more generalized notion of "substantive due process," must be the guide for analyzing these claims.'. . Consequently, the District Court erred in independently analyzing Davenport's Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment claims."); Nakagawa v. County of Maui, No. 111CV00130DKWBMK, 2017 WL 1192209, at *1 (9th Cir. Mar. 31, 2017) (not reported) ("Because appellants admitted that the defendant officers intentionally directed their force towards the driver (and not towards the appellants, any passenger in the vehicle, or the vehicle in general), the district court concluded properly as a matter of law that no Fourth Amendment seizure occurred. Because no Fourth Amendment seizure occurred, appellants' Fourth Amendment claims fail as a matter of law."); Tubar v. Clift, 286 F. App'x 348, 351 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Because both Morehouse and Tubar were suspects at the time that Clift shot at the vehicle, Clift's intent to stop the vehicle also constituted intent to seize both of them. Accordingly, we conclude that by shooting Tubar, Clift seized Tubar for purposes of the Fourth Amendment."); Fisher v. City of Memphis, 234 F.3d 312, 318, 319 (6th Cir. 2001) ("Here, Becton's car was the intended target of Defendant's intentionally applied exertion of force. By shooting at the driver of the moving car, he intended to stop the car, effectively seizing everyone inside, including the Plaintiff. Thus, because the Defendant 'seized' the Plaintiff by shooting at the car, the district court did not err in analyzing the Defendant's actions under the Fourth Amendment.").

See also Williamson v. Edgley, No. 4:19-CV-00099-BLW, 2020 WL 6531010, at *6–7 (D. Idaho Nov. 4, 2020) ("The Ninth Circuit has not directly decided whether a passenger in a car struck by a bullet, fired at the vehicle by police, may pursue an excessive force claim under the Fourth Amendment, instead of a due process claim under the Fourteenth Amendment. However, the majority of circuits that have reached the issue have held that a passenger, in Williamson's position, may seek relief under the Fourth Amendment. Davenport v. Borough of Homestead, 870 F.3d 273, 279 (3d Cir. 2017) (collecting cases). The circuits that have held otherwise reached their decisions before Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. 249 (2007) was decided. . . '[T]here can be no question that apprehension by the use of deadly force is a seizure subject to the reasonableness requirement of the Fourth Amendment.' Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 7 (1985). A person is 'seized' under the Fourth Amendment 'when [an] officer, by means of physical force or show of authority, terminates or restrains his freedom of movement, though means intentionally applied.' Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. 249, 254 (2007) (internal quotations and citations omitted). Both the driver and passenger of a car are seized when police stop a car, and 'an unintended person may be the object of the detention, so long as the detention is willful and not merely the consequence of an unknowing act.'. . The Supreme Court in Brendlin held that what matters in determining whether a seizure has occurred is the 'intent [that] has been conveyed to the person confronted,' not the 'subjective intent' of the officer. . . In Brower v. County of Inyo, 489 U.S. 593 (1989), the Court held that the plaintiff was seized when the car he was driving crashed into a roadblock officers had set to stop him. . . Brendlin explained that 'if the car had had another occupant, it would have made sense to hold that he too had been seized when the car collided with the roadblock,' rejecting the defendant's argument that 'for a specific occupant of the car to be seized he must be the motivating target of an officer's show of authority.'. .Likewise, in Nelson v. City of Davis, 685 F.3d 867 (9th Cir. 2012), the Ninth Circuit held that a student was seized when officers fired pepperballs at a group of partygoers, striking the student in the eye. Although the officers made no further contact with the student – he fell to the ground, heard officers pass by him, and then was transported to the hospital – the Court held that the officers' intentional act of firing pepperballs toward the crowd was sufficient 'intentional governmental force' to constitute a seizure. . . In Nelson, the Court contrasted intentional conduct with unintentional or accidental conduct of the officer. . . 'For an act to be unintentional, the governmental conduct must lack the element of volition; an absence of concern regarding the ultimate recipient of the government's use of force does not negate volition.'. . Here, the officers intentionally stopped Chacon's car, in which Williamson was a passenger. The officers knew that Williamson was in the car with Chacon. Williamson put her hands up, demonstrating her understanding that she was not free to leave. When Chacon started driving forward the officers intentionally fired at the vehicle, striking Williamson. . .The officers stated that it was their intent to fire at Chacon, or Chacon's general location, however even taking this as true, the officers' subjective intent is irrelevant. . . 'The intent that counts under the Fourth Amendment is the intent [that] has been conveyed to the person confronted, and the criterion of willful restriction on freedom of movement is no invitation to look to subjective intent when determining who is seized.'. .The Court therefore finds that Williamson was seized and may pursue her claims against the officers under the Fourth Amendment."); Littlejohn v. New Orleans City, 493 F. Supp. 3d 509

(E.D. La. 2020) ("Littlejohn argues that C.K.'s position as the vehicle's passenger, rather than the driver, should influence this analysis. . . Specifically, she argues that C.K., as a passenger, 'had no role in the decision to flee or be pursued[.]'. . Assuming, as we must, that this is true, the police did not intentionally stop C.K. any more than they intentionally stopped B.W. That C.K.'s "flight" was not his choice but B.W.'s is tragic, but it does not change the legal analysis. The pursuing officers violated neither occupants' Fourth Amendment right to freedom from unreasonable seizure. . . The Court finds that plaintiff has failed to plausibly allege a violation of the Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable seizure. Accordingly, the claim against the City based on same must be dismissed."); Mondragon v. City of Fremont, No. 18-CV-01605-NC, 2020 WL 5106928, at *6 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 31, 2020) ("Defendants argue that Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claims fail because in other cases where bystanders were accidentally shot by police officers, those shootings did not constitute a 'seizure' under the Fourth Amendment. . . Their argument is essentially that because officers were aiming at Rico Tiger and only accidentally shot Elena Mondragon, Elena was not 'the object of the detention or taking.'. . But Defendants miss the much more obvious seizure that clearly occurred in this case: the felony traffic stop. Here, the officers blocked the BMW into the cul-de-sac, turned on their lights and sirens, yelled at the BMW's driver to exit the vehicle, and tried to prevent the car from leaving using both their vehicles and their AR-15s. It is well established that a traffic stop is a seizure, and that such a seizure applies to all occupants of the vehicle. Heien v. North Carolina, 572 U.S. 54, 60 (2014); Brendlin v. California, 551 U.S. 249, 255–259 (2007). When the officers initiated the felony traffic stop on the BMW as Elena Mondragon sat in its front passenger seat, she was seized for purposes of the Fourth Amendment."); Ortiz on behalf of L.J. v. Mora, No. 118CV00713JCHKRS, 2019 WL 6717184, at *6 n.4 (D.N.M. Dec. 10, 2019) ("The parties dispute whether Jim was 'seized' in the first place. Defendants say that Jim was the unintentional victim of Mora's otherwise intentional shooting at the Dodge. The majority of federal circuits have ruled that a passenger shot by an officer during the course of a vehicle chase is 'seized.' Apparently the Tenth Circuit has acknowledged, but not decided the issue. See Carabajal, 847 F.3d at 1212 (declining to address issue, and instead holding that qualified immunity shielded officer who fired his weapon at a car full of people because the law was unclearly established as to whether a passenger could be seized). But in Carabajal, the Tenth Circuit also suggested that if an officer reasonably seized the driver of a car, then it 'follows' that any seizure of a passenger is also reasonable. . . Thus, the starting point for the Court's analysis is whether Mora acted reasonably. If so, it follows that any seizure of Jim was reasonable."); M.J.L.H. v. City of Pasadena, No. CV 18-3249-JFW(SSX), 2019 WL 2249545, at *9-10 (C.D. Cal. May 24, 2019) ("In Plumhoff, . . . the Supreme Court recognized a circuit split 'as to whether a passenger [in a shooting] ... can recover under a Fourth Amendment theory,' but declined to express a view on the issue. Although the Ninth Circuit has yet to address this issue in a published decision, the Ninth Circuit did address the issue in the unpublished decision of Arruda ex rel. Arruda v. County of Los Angeles, 373 Fed. Appx. 798 (9th Cir. 2010). In Arruda, an officer accidentally struck a fellow officer with a stray bullet when that officer was standing outside of the room where the shooting occurred. . . Because the injured officer was not the 'object' shot at by the officer, the Ninth Circuit held that there was no seizure under the Fourth Amendment. . . The Ninth Circuit in Arruda cited to Landol–Rivera v. Cruz Cosme, 906 F.2d 791 (1st Cir. 1990), where an officer who shot at a car to protect a hostage and unintentionally hit the hostage and the First Circuit held that there was no seizure of the hostage under the Fourth Amendment. . . In addition, in Fletes v. City of San Diego, 2015 WL 13326240 (S.D. Cal. Sep. 30, 2015), the district court applied Arruda and Landol in a case where officers shot at the driver of a car, fearing that he would run them over, and inadvertently hit the passenger. . . In deciding a motion for summary judgment, the district court held that the passenger was not seized because the officer who knew the passenger was in the car only shot at the driver, and other two officers were unaware of the passenger's presence. . . The Ninth Circuit subsequently affirmed the district court's decision in an unpublished opinion. Fletes v. City of San Diego, 687 Fed. Appx. 640 (9th Cir. 2017). Thus, the Court concludes, in light of Arruda, Landol, and Fletes, and the evidence that the Individual Defendants did not intentionally shoot at Strohm that Strohm was not seized under the Fourth Amendment. . . Although Strohm was not seized under the Fourth Amendment, the Supreme Court has held that where there has been no 'seizure' under the Fourth Amendment, a claim may proceed under the more general contours of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . When viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the undisputed facts in this case establish that Strohm's injuries were the direct result of the Individual Defendants' legitimate law enforcement objective and efforts and, therefore, the Individual Defendants' conduct does not shock the conscience. Accordingly, the Individual Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on Strohm's Fourteenth Amendment claim."); Hernandez v. Parker, No. 217CV01218KRSGJF, 2018 WL 6441030, at *3–6 (D.N.M. Dec. 7, 2018) ("Under Lewis, the question is whether Sheriff Parker terminated Hernandez's 'freedom of movement through means intentionally applied.' In Scott v. Harris, the Supreme Court explained a botched PIT maneuver satisfied this standard. . . Drawing all reasonable inferences in the Estate's favor, Sheriff Parker attempted a PIT maneuver whereby his truck bumped the Lincoln to end the pursuit. Lopez described the end of the pursuit in that manner, and two witnesses testified that that Sheriff Parker bumped or pushed Hernandez's car with his patrol vehicle. Taking the Estate's contention that the bumping was intentional and designed to end the chase, that bumping action by Sheriff Parker amounts to a seizure of Hernandez under the Fourth Amendment. Hernandez's status a passenger, and arguably not the object of Sheriff Parker's use of force, does not change the analysis. While the Tenth Circuit has not spoken directly to this issue, . . . the Supreme Court held in Brendlin v. California, that a traffic stop seizes both the driver and any passenger. . . The Third Circuit has extended Brendlin's logic to a passenger in a police-pursuit scenario that ended when a police officer fired into the fleeing car. Davenport v. Borough of Homestead, 870 F.3d 273, 279 (3d Cir. 2017). Although the court identified a circuit split as to whether a passenger is seized along with a driver, the court observed that 'those circuits that have suggested otherwise reached their decisions on this issue before the Supreme Court decided Brendlin[.]'. . . In line with Brendlin and Davenport, the Court concludes that the Fourth Amendment applies to the Estate's federal claims. . . . It is hard to see how Scott's holding does not dictate the outcome in this case. Here, upon arrival at the motel and exiting his truck, Sheriff Parker observed Lopez and Hernandez in Hernandez's vehicle. It appeared that Hernandez was reaching for something while Lopez started the Lincoln. Although Sheriff Parker was dressed in a hoodie, Lieutenant Sanchez was in full uniform as the two stood on either side of the town car. Sheriff Parker and Lieutenant Sanchez drew their guns, but Lopez backed up and maneuvered around Sheriff Parker's pickup, striking Sheriff Parker in the process, a felony under New Mexico law. . . Sheriff Parker, of course, pursued Lopez, at this point a fleeing suspect. It is true Sheriff Parker's duty vehicle was unmarked, but it was equipped with internal lights and sirens, which Sheriff Parker says he engaged. Lopez concedes he heard the siren. Nonetheless, Lopez did not stop, and a chase ensued that reached speeds of over 100 miles per hour. Lopez drove through residential neighborhoods, near schools and a university, and nearly collided with another vehicle, and ran stop signs. The pursuit terminated when Sheriff Parker employed a PIT or similar maneuver. Sheriff Parker's truck struck the Lincoln sending the Lincoln into the ditch and culminating in Hernandez's death. As in Scott, Lopez was the catalyst of entire chain of events. Viewed objectively, from Sheriff Parker's perspective, Lopez battered a police officer, intentionally placed himself, Hernandez, and the public in danger by fleeing and not stopping in response to sirens and lights, nearly colliding with a car, and running stop signs. As in Scott, it was reasonable to end the pursuit and the danger it posed by bumping the back of the sedan. Although Hernandez died, her rights under the Fourth Amendment were not violated. The Estate argues that Lopez thought he was being mugged because Sheriff Parker was in a hoodie. What Lopez thought, however is irrelevant to the governing, objective standard of reasonableness. . . Even if it was initially unclear to Lopez, Lieutenant Sanchez was in full uniform and Lopez concedes he heard the siren from Sheriff Parker's unmarked police truck. Lopez also made comments subsequent to the incident that he fled from the motel because he wanted to protect Hernandez from being charged for possession of drugs, which suggests he knew that Sheriff Parker was a law enforcement officer when he fled. . . The Estate also suggests Sheriff Parker had a duty to retreat from 'harm's way' but instead stood in front of the Lincoln where he could be hit. Putting aside the underlying assumption that Sheriff Parker would have had to know that Lopez would drive into him, Sheriff Parker's position directly in front of the car Lopez was driving is of no constitutional significance. The Estate points to no case law, and the Court could not find any, requiring Sheriff Parker to move out of the way. The Estate also insists Sheriff Parker did not know that Lopez intended to injure others and 'the Sheriff's own investigator [determined] bumping Mr. Lopez off the road was an inappropriate use of deadly force because of the circumstances surrounding the possible charges or crime committed didn't warrant deadly force.'. . The Fourth Amendment, however, does not require Sheriff Parker to divine Lopez's intentions at all. Instead, Sheriff Parker was required to examine the totality of the circumstances and use force that was objectively reasonable. It is undisputed that Lopez nearly struck another driver during the pursuit, drove at very high rates of speed in residential areas and near schools and a university, and ran stop signs. Protecting the public from further harm featured prominently in the Supreme Court's determination that the officer's PIT-like maneuver in Scott was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . .The Estate's underlying assumption that Sheriff Parker should have simply stopped chasing Lopez and thereby ended the threat to Lopez, Hernandez, and the public does not withstand scrutiny. As the Supreme Court explained in Scott, 'there would have been no way to convey convincingly to [Lopez] that the chase was off, and that he was free to go.'. . . Additionally, requiring Sheriff Parker to capitulate would create obvious, 'perverse incentives' that a 'fleeing motorist would know that escape is within his grasp, if only he accelerates to 90 miles per hour, crosses the double-yellow line a few times, and runs a few red lights.'. . As did the Supreme Court in Scott, the Court here rejects the Estate's implication that Sheriff Parker was required to stop the chase and give up.")

Compare Johnson v. City of Ferguson, Missouri, 926 F.3d 504, 505-07 (8th Cir. 2019) (en banc), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 553 (2019) ("We agree with the panel opinion's identification of the governing issue in this case: 'The crux of the motion to dismiss and this resulting appeal centers on the issue of whether there was a seizure. Johnson concedes that if there was no seizure virtually all of his claims fall away.'. . We disagree with the panel's ruling that a seizure occurred, and thus we hold that the district court erred in not granting the defendants' motion to dismiss based upon their claim of qualified immunity. Whatever one might say about Wilson's expletive-expressed directive that Brown and Johnson move from the street to the sidewalk, Johnson's complaint concedes that neither he nor Brown was ordered to stop and to remain in place. Johnson's decision to remain by Brown's side during Brown's altercation with Wilson rather than complying with Wilson's lawful command to return to the sidewalk was that of his own choosing. That he was able to leave the scene following the discharge of Wilson's weapon gives the lie to his argument that the placement of Wilson's vehicle prevented him from doing so. As was the case in United States v. Hayden, 759 F.3d 842, 847 (8th Cir. 2014), Wilson's police vehicle constituted no barrier to Johnson's ability to cross to the sidewalk. Any physical or weapon-related contact by Wilson was directed towards Brown alone in the first instance. . . . Because there was no verbal or physical impediment to Johnson's freedom of movement, there was no submission to authority on his part even in a metaphysical sense of the meaning of that word. Accordingly, in the absence of any intentional acquisition of physical control terminating Johnson's freedom of movement through means intentionally applied, as occurred in both Brower v. County of Inyo . . . and in Tennessee v. Garner, . . . we conclude that no seizure occurred in this case. . . .In light of our holding that no seizure and thus no constitutional violation occurred in this case, Johnson's claim of supervisory liability against Chief Jackson necessarily fails, as perforce does any claim of municipal liability against the City of Ferguson.") with Johnson v. City of Ferguson, Missouri, 926 F.3d 504, 508-11(8th Cir. 2019) (en banc) (Melloy, J., with whom Smith, C.J., Kelly and Erickson, JJ., join, dissenting), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 553 (2019) ("Here, I believe that Officer Wilson made a show of authority communicating that Johnson 'was not at liberty to ignore the police presence and go about his business.' Bostick, 501 U.S. at 437, 111 S.Ct. 2382. As stated above, the only facts relevant at this procedural posture are those alleged in the complaint. And the Court must accept those facts as true and view them in the light most favorable to Johnson. . . .By crudely ordering Johnson to move and then abruptly reversing his vehicle and stopping it inches away and directly in Johnson's path, Officer Wilson communicated an intent to use a roadblock to stop Johnson's movement. Despite Defendants' (and amicus curiae's) argument that the roadblock did not foreclose all of Johnson's avenues of travel, a reasonable person would understand the roadblock's purpose was to serve as a 'physical obstacle' conveying an order to stop—not an order to go around the vehicle and continue on one's way. . . ..Officer Wilson's abrupt stopping of his vehicle inches away from Johnson, thereby creating a roadblock, coupled with the threat of using his service weapon, was a show of force communicating to a reasonable person the necessity to stop and not continue on one's way. . . . The majority seems to imply that Officer

Wilson's use of a weapon was directed at Brown only and that, while Brown may have been seized, Johnson was not. I do not believe the complaint can be parsed that finely. Both Brown and Johnson were walking together, Officer Wilson pulled his vehicle in front of both, both eventually fled, and Officer Wilson fired his weapon in the direction of both, striking and killing Brown but missing Johnson. In short, I do not believe that from the perspective of a reasonable person encountering Officer Wilson, it can be reasonably said Officer Wilson intended to seize Brown but not Johnson. If one of the two were seized, both were seized. One difficulty surrounding this issue is whether Johnson's 'submission to [the] show of governmental authority takes the form of passive acquiescence' that rises to the level of a submission to authority. . . The Supreme Court in Brendlin held that 'what may amount to submission depends on what a person was doing before the show of authority: a fleeing man is not seized until he is physically overpowered, but one sitting in a chair may submit to authority by not getting up to run away.'. . There, the Court considered 'whether a traffic stop subjects a passenger,' who merely remained in the car throughout the traffic stop, 'to Fourth Amendment seizure.'. . The Court held that the passenger was seized. . . In so holding, the Court adopted a test for determining whether a claimant's passive acquiescence to a show of authority qualifies as submission to that show of authority: 'We resolve this question by asking whether a reasonable person in [the claimant's] position ... would have believed himself free to "terminate the encounter" between the police and himself.'. . .Johnson's stop was not passive acquiescence to a show of authority. For one, Johnson did take some action to actively acquiesce to Officer Wilson's show of authority: Johnson stopped walking. This is more than the passive acquiescence in Brendlin where the defendant, a passenger, merely remained in his seat as the driver pulled over the vehicle. . . Also, even assuming Johnson passively acquiesced to the show of authority by merely remaining throughout the encounter, 'a reasonable person in [Johnson's] position ... would [not] have believed himself free to "terminate the encounter" between the police and himself,'. . . for the reasons discussed above.").

13. Derivative Nature of Liability

In City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796 (1986), the Court held that if there is no constitutional violation, there can be no liability on the part of the individual officer or the government body. "If a person has suffered no constitutional injury at the hands of the individual police officer, the fact that the departmental regulations might have authorized the use of constitutionally excessive force is quite beside the point." Id. at 799 (emphasis in original). To borrow an analogy from Judge Rosenn, where there is no "kick," neither the foot nor the head can be inculpated. Andrews v. City of Philadelphia, 895 F.2d 1469, 1481 (3d Cir. 1990). See also Vasquez v. District of Columbia, 110 F.4th 282, 289 (D.C. Cir. 2024) ("On appeal, Mr. Vasquez attacks two MPD policies: (1) its protocols for handling teletype messages and (2) its protocols (or lack thereof) for determining whether a person has been correctly identified as a fugitive from justice. In so doing, Mr. Vasquez attempts to make the general point that if MPD had better policies and protocols in place, Mr. Vasquez would not have been misidentified and wrongly detained. Maybe so. But municipalities are not liable under Section 1983 for all 'harm-causing ... policies,' and Mr. Vasquez does not cite to a single case that explains how MPD's alleged negligence is unconstitutional. . . Thus, we reiterate one of Lane's closing takeaways, it is 'inconceivable' that a municipality is liable under Monell where the plaintiff fails to show a 'predicate constitutional violation.'. . To the extent that Mr. Vasquez alleges that the District of Columbia violated the Fourth Amendment based on the actions of MPD officers, that argument is foreclosed by Monell itself: 'a municipality cannot be held liable solely because it employs a tortfeasor—or, in other words, a municipality cannot be held liable under [Section] 1983 on a respondeat superior theory.'"); Cohen as next friend of Cohen v. City of Portland, 110 F.4th 400, 407-08 (1st Cir. 2024) ("A municipality is liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 'if [an] employee has not been adequately trained and [a] constitutional wrong has been caused by that failure to train.'. . Thus, a finding of municipal liability under a failure-to-train theory requires a predicate constitutional violation by an individual defendant. . . The municipality's liability must 'run through' the unconstitutional actions of its untrained employee. . . Here, the only employees that the estate says were untrained are Rand and Gervais. The estate notes that both officers were behind on their required annual crisis intervention training. And the estate argues that both officers violated Cohen's due process rights by failing to employ crisis intervention techniques to rescue him. Basically, in the estate's view, the City's failure to train those two officers caused Cohen's eventual death. . . As we have explained, the district court correctly dismissed the complaint against both officers. This meant that, at the summary judgment stage, there was no longer an individual defendant through whom municipal liability for allegedly deficient police training could 'run.'. . This fundamental defect dooms the estate's failure-to-train claim. We therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment without analyzing its remaining reasoning.")

Compare Nichols v. Wayne County, Michigan, 822 F. App'x 445, ___ n.4 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2716 (2021) ("It is an open question in this circuit 'whether a municipality's liability under § 1983 is predicated on first finding that an individual officer or employee is also liable.' Rayfield, 768 F. App'x at 511 n.12 (noting conflicts in our caselaw). We need not resolve this question here because we ultimately conclude that Nichols fails to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6) on other grounds. We do note our confusion, however, at the ire this brief footnote draws from our dissenting colleague. Rayfield ably documented 'our unsettled precedent on this issue,'. . . and though the dissent strives to untangle our caselaw, we reiterate that we are not resolving the question here.") with Nichols v. Wayne County, Michigan, 822 F. App'x 445, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) (Moore, J., dissenting in part), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2716 (2021) ("[T]he majority states that '[i]t is an open question in this circuit "whether a municipality's liability under § 1983 is predicated on first finding that an individual officer or employee is also liable."'. . The majority's statement is erroneous, but it is true that several opinions issued after the first published one resolving this question have muddied the waters. Originally, we stated that 'it is possible that city officials may be entitled to qualified immunity for certain actions while the municipality may nevertheless be held liable for the same actions.'. . This scenario could arise if a municipal employee, acting pursuant to a municipal policy or custom, committed a constitutional violation, but escaped personal liability because the plaintiff's constitutional right was not clearly established at the time of the violation. But in Winkler v. Madison County, 893 F.3d 877 (6th Cir. 2018), the panel mistakenly said that our decision in Watkins v. City of Battle Creek, 273 F.3d 682

(6th Cir. 2001), 'broadly state[d] that the imposition of municipal liability is contingent on a finding of individual liability under § 1983.'. . Yet Watkins does not say this. It says only that '[i]f no constitutional violation by the individual defendants is established, the municipal defendants cannot be held liable under § 1983.'. . Winkler's gloss on Watkins was plainly incompatible with our prior, published holdings—that the precondition for municipal liability is the presence of a constitutional violation, not a finding of individual liability. On this specific issue regarding municipal liability, there was no confusion until Winkler introduced it. Thus, citing to Winkler, we uttered the line that the majority now quotes: 'It is undecided whether a municipality's liability under § 1983 is predicated on first finding that an individual officer or employee is also liable.' Rayfield, 768 F. App'x at 511 n.12. It should be clear, by now, that this statement was in error. There is no 'open question in this circuit,'. . . about whether a plaintiff must first show individual liability in order to show municipal liability. Our controlling precedent says that there is no such requirement. . . Beyond the qualified-immunity escape hatch, there are still other instances in which a lack of individual liability will not foreclose a municipal-liability claim. As Judge Cole's thoughtful concurrence in Epps v. Lauderdale County, 45 F. App'x 332 (6th Cir. 2002), lays out, there are numerous ways in which municipalities themselves may be held responsible for constitutional violations, including when 'a government actor in good faith follows a faulty municipal policy,' when 'municipal liability is based on the actions of individual government actors other than those who are named as parties,' and when 'no one individual government actor ... violate[s] a victim's constitutional rights,' but the combined acts of a group of actors cause such a violation.")

See also Johnson v. City of Cheyenne, 99 F.4th 1206, 1233 (10th Cir. 2024) ("We last turn to whether the district court erred in dismissing Mr. Johnson's § 1983 claims against the City of Cheyenne. Mr. Johnson 'asserts that the City's customs, or written policies or procedures (or lack thereof), regarding handling and disclosure of crime scene photos caused' the alleged violations of his constitutional rights under Brady and Trombetta/Youngblood. . . We cannot agree. 'A municipality may not be held liable where there was no underlying constitutional violation by any of its officers.'. . 'If a person has suffered no constitutional injury at the hands of the individual police officer, the fact that the departmental regulations might have authorized [unconstitutional conduct] is quite beside the point.'. . Mr. Johnson has failed to demonstrate that Officer Spencer or Detective Stanford—or any other person within the Cheyenne Police Department for that matter—violated his constitutional rights. It therefore follows that his '§ 1983 municipal liability claim against the City necessarily fails.'. . Therefore, the district court correctly dismissed Mr. Johnson's § 1983 claim against the City of Cheyenne."); Teel v. Lozada, 99 F.4th 1273, 1288 (11th Cir. 2024) ("At oral argument, . . . the Estate conceded that if we allow the jury's verdict to stand, the Monell claim necessarily fails under the first element. This concession is correct in light of controlling precedent. '[N]either Monell ..., nor any other of our cases authorizes the award of damages against a municipal corporation based on the actions of one of its officers when in fact the jury has concluded that the officer inflicted no constitutional harm.' [citing cases] To be clear, when the district court granted summary judgment to the Sheriff after remand, it correctly refrained from granting judgment under the first element of Monell. At that time, we had determined on appeal that there was a material dispute of fact as to whether there was an underlying constitutional violation. See Teel I, 826 F. App'x at 889. But now, the jury has spoken, finding that Deputy Lozada did not violate the Fourth Amendment by shooting Mrs. Teel. Because there is no underlying constitutional violation, '[w]e may affirm the judgment below on any ground supported by the record.'. . We thus affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the Sheriff on the Estate's Monell claim based on the first element of Monell."); Smith-Dandridge v. Geanolous, 97 F.4th 569, 579 (8th Cir. 2024) ("Smith-Dandridge must show that the deficient training caused WCDC defendants to be deliberately indifferent to Bell's substantial risk of suicide. . . The basis for the municipality's liability—here, failure to train—must be the 'moving force' that led to the alleged deprivation of a constitutional right. . . In this case, Smith-Dandridge's theory of municipal liability is 'entirely dependent on the [County's] responsibility for the [individual defendants'] alleged unconstitutional acts.'. . As a result, Smith-Dandridge's failure-to-train claim falls with the individual claims."); Grote v. Kenton County, Kentucky, 85 F.4th 397, 414-16 (6th Cir. 2023) ("[W]e note that it is proper to consider possible constitutional violations committed by a municipality qua municipality, even in the absence of a showing of a constitutional violation by any one individual officer. In City of Los Angeles v. Heller, the Supreme Court stated that a damages award against a municipality is unwarranted 'based on the actions of one of its officers when in fact the jury has concluded that the officer inflicted no constitutional harm.'. . But we, as well as circuits across the country, have recognized that Heller does not preclude a finding of municipal liability even if no individual officer violated the Constitution where constitutional harm has nonetheless 'been inflicted upon the victim' and the municipality is responsible for that harm. [collecting cases] Our precedent has not been a model of consistency on this point. In Winkler v. Madison County, a panel, though considering the possibility of municipal liability despite no constitutional violations by individuals, raised the issue whether 'a municipality's liability under § 1983 is always contingent on a finding that an individual defendant is liable for having committed a constitutional violation.'. . This statement is imprecise; the potential for municipal liability notwithstanding an individual's lack of liability has always existed, as in cases when an individual officer receives qualified immunity. . . Instead, the question is whether a municipality may be liable when no individual has committed a constitutional violation. Moving past qualified immunity, there are still scenarios when no officer may have acted unconstitutionally, but the municipality has nonetheless inflicted constitutional harm on a victim. 'In many cases, a finding that no individual defendant violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights will also mean that the plaintiff has suffered no constitutional violation.'. . But, as here, when the constitutional harm complained of relates to lack of action due to a failure to train, the municipality may still be liable. . . Rightfully, the parties, as well as the district court, did not simply conclude that Kenton County is not liable despite the lack of a constitutional violation by any individual defendant. Applied here, Grote fails adequately to show that Kenton County is liable under Monell. As it relates to the 911 policy enshrined in the Policy and Procedures for the Kenton County Detention Center, Grote submits no evidence that Kenton County officials were inadequately trained on the policy or that they failed to follow the policy in this case. Instead, he appears to contend that the policy itself—which in the first instance directs officers to contact supervisors or medical staff in the event of an emergency—is unreasonable. . . But this argument shows neither that the officers' training was inadequate for tasks that they needed to perform (tasks which, as the district court notes, Grote failed to identify), nor that the alleged inadequacy resulted from deliberate indifference. Moreover, because Grote relies on a failure-to-train theory and does not identify a pattern of similar constitutional violations, he can prove such deliberate indifference only by showing ' "a single violation of federal rights, accompanied by a showing that [Kenton County] has failed to train its employees to handle recurring situations presenting an obvious potential" for a constitutional violation.'. . Though Kenton County could certainly better prepare officers for situations in which not running medical emergencies up the chain is warranted, as in Winkler Grote does not explain how the officers' training was deficient or how such training would have made the possibility for a constitutional violation obvious. . . Finally, we previously noted that Grote erroneously directed a failure-to-train claim against Carl, when in actuality such claim is one for municipal liability. The premise of this claim is that officers did not receive adequate training on treating and recognizing drug overdoses. . . But here again, Grote runs into the same issues. The record appears muddled with respect to whether the individual Kenton County Defendants in fact received training related to substance abuse and overdose. . . . Grote, however, does not contest the Kenton County Defendants' argument (accepted by the district court), that officers were adequately trained in recognizing basic medical emergencies and seeking medical attention when necessary. Brown sought medical attention for Grote, although Brand failed to provide adequate care. Lack of overdose and drug-related training can certainly create municipal liability where, for instance, officers are principally responsible for handling medical care. . . But in circumstances like here, where officials are trained to recognize medical issues and have access to and do access medical providers, we have not held that a lack of more specific training with respect to medical issues presents an obvious risk of a constitutional violation. . . At least in this particular instance, holding otherwise would contradict the general (though limited) principle that officers may reasonably rely on a medical provider's opinion. . . There is a certain risk that finding no municipal liability in a case such as this one may appear to condone a municipality's practices. This should not be the message. This case lays bare myriad issues in our jails and prisons even if in this narrow instance they do not rise to a constitutional dimension for the Kenton County Defendants. Undoubtedly, people will continue to die or be seriously injured in our jails and prisons without better training and greater resources for staff. The municipal defendants in this case recognize that overdoses and other drug-related issues are rampant in our jails and prisons. But those same facilities appear woefully unprepared to handle such issues, at least to a degree that would prevent needless death. Under a different set of facts, a municipality may be constitutionally liable."); Colemon on behalf of Virgil v. City of Cincinnati, No. 21-5968, 2023 WL 5095804 (6th Cir. Aug. 9, 2023) (not reported) ("Although Virgil continues to allege that Cincinnati is liable for violations of his rights by its officers, he has voluntarily dismissed his Brady claim against the individual officers themselves. Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit precedent holds that a constitutional injury is required to pursue a Monell claim. . . But '[i]t is undecided whether a municipality's liability under § 1983 is predicated on first finding that an individual officer or employee is also liable.'. . As we held in Winkler v. Madison County, municipalities 'may be held liable under § 1983 in certain cases where no individual liability is shown,' including when the municipality itself directly caused the violation, or the violation was caused by a combination of government-sponsored conduct not easily traceable to one individual official, 'where municipal liability is based on the actions of individual government actors other than those who are named as parties'—a situation that would be functionally similar to Virgil's voluntary dismissal of the individual government actors here. . . Our Circuit has previously determined a defendant municipality's Monell liability by evaluating only a non-party's actions, suggesting that a party's liability is not required, as long as the court finds a constitutional violation occurred. . . But we need not decide whether a municipality's Monell liability is always contingent on finding an individual defendant liable for a constitutional violation. As explained below, even assuming that Virgil may proceed with his § 1983 claim against the City of Cincinnati without also suing the individual Cincinnati officers, he has not presented facts from which a jury could find that the officers violated his due process rights under Brady."); Baker v. City of Madison, Alabama, 67 F.4th 1268, 1282 (11th Cir. 2023) ("Here, because there was no underlying constitutional violation, Baker's municipal liability claim against the City fails as a matter of law. "); Clugston v. City of Garden Grove, No. 22-55203, 2023 WL 2400876, at *1 (9th Cir. Mar. 8, 2023) (not reported) ("Plaintiffs alleged the City failed to adequately train its police officers on the proper conduct of high-speed pursuits, allows pursuits for minor traffic violations, and failed to discipline officers who 'recklessly place innocent bystanders in harm's way by initiating unjustifiable high-speed pursuits.' In such cases hinging on an individual officer's conduct, the plaintiff must establish both a deprivation of a constitutional right and that a municipal policy, custom or practice was the cause in fact of that deprivation. . . As we explained in Quintanilla v. City of Downey, a public entity cannot be liable under § 1983 'under a policy that can cause constitutional deprivations, when the factfinder concludes that an individual officer, acting pursuant to the policy, inflicted no constitutional harm to the plaintiff.'. . We therefore agree with our sister circuits which have held in the specific context of police pursuits that there can be no municipal liability without an underlying constitutional violation by the officers. See, e.g., Graves v. Thomas, 450 F.3d 1215, 1225 (10th Cir. 2006); Sitzes v. City of W. Memphis Ark., 606 F.3d 461, 470–71 (8th Cir. 2010); Evans v. Avery, 100 F.3d 1033, 1039–40 (1st Cir. 1996); S.P. v. City of Takoma Park, 134 F.3d 260, 272 (4th Cir. 1998); Scott v. Clay Cnty., 205 F.3d 867, 879 (6th Cir. 2000). The district court correctly dismissed the claim against the City because there was no underlying constitutional violation by Officer Hadden."); Harmon v. City of Norman, Oklahoma, 61 F.4th 779, 794-95 (10th Cir. 2023) ("Our precedent disposes of the demonstrators' failure-to-train claim. . . 'A municipality may not be held liable where there was no underlying constitutional violation by any of its officers.'. . As Robertson committed no constitutional violation, Norman cannot be liable for a purported failure to train. And even if the demonstrators could clear that hurdle, they'd immediately run into another one: nothing in the record establishes that Norman was deliberately indifferent. At best, the demonstrators point to inadequate First Amendment training for Norman police officers. That is not enough to show 'a pattern of tortious conduct' or an 'obvious potential for constitutional violations.'. . . Particularly on this enforcement record of § 15-503(3), we agree with the district court that the demonstrators' failure-to-train claim must fail."); Frey v. Town of Jackson, Wyoming, 41 F.4th 1223, 1239 (10th Cir. 2022) ("The crux of a municipal-liability claim is that a municipal policy or custom caused the plaintiff to suffer a constitutional injury. . . Without a constitutional violation, Plaintiff has suffered no injury for which a municipality can be liable.

As explained above, Plaintiff's allegations reveal that Karnes had probable cause to arrest Plaintiff, meaning that the arrest did not violate the First or Fourth Amendments. Plaintiff also suffered no constitutional violation from Officer Karnes's search of his person incident to the arrest. Even if Plaintiff is correct that Jackson and the Airport have policies authorizing or requiring unconstitutional searches, the only search Plaintiff experienced was incident to a lawful arrest and therefore constitutional. Plaintiff alleged no constitutional injury. Finally, Plaintiff argues that the district court should not have dismissed his First Amendment retaliation claim arising from his detention at the Teton County Jail. Plaintiff claims that Jackson and Teton County have a policy or custom of prolonging detention for those who engage in protected speech—specifically, those who request legal counsel. But, as with his claims arising out of the arrest and search, Plaintiff did not plead a First Amendment violation because he failed to allege that probable cause did not support his detention or that jail officials treated him differently than similarly situated arrestees not engaged in the same speech. . . Thus, Plaintiff alleged no constitutional injury."); Doxtator v. O'Brien, 39 F.4th 852, 864 (7th Cir. 2022) ("With respect to the Monell claim, 'a municipality cannot be liable under Monell when there is no underlying constitutional violation by a municipal employee.' Sallenger v. City of Springfield, Ill., 630 F.3d 499, 504 (7th Cir. 2010). With respect to the failure-to-train claim, '[a] failure to train theory or a failure to institute a municipal policy theory requires a finding that the individual officers are liable on the underlying substantive claim.' Tesch v. Cty. of Green Lake, 157 F.3d 465, 477 (7th Cir. 1998). Because we affirm the dismissal of the § 1983 claim against O'Brien, we also affirm the dismissal of the failure-to-train and Monell claims against the City of Green Bay and Chief Smith."); Estate of Burgaz by & through Zommer v. Bd. of County Commissioners for Jefferson County, Colorado, 30 F.4th 1181, 1190 (10th Cir. 2022) ("In other types of Monell claims, such as those alleging an unconstitutional policy or custom, plaintiffs need not demonstrate an individual officer committed a constitutional violation. Instead, 'the combined acts or omissions of several employees acting under a governmental policy or custom may violate an individual's constitutional rights.'. . In situations where 'the municipal [customs] devolve[ ] responsibility across multiple officers,' the customs 'may be unconstitutional precisely because they fail to ensure that any single officer is positioned to prevent the constitutional violation.'. . Even so, the Estate's last remaining basis for its Monell claim—the sheriff's alleged custom of ignoring safety policy violations—also fails. The Estate argued that a Monell claim requires 'a municipal employee [have] committed a constitutional violation.'. . It failed to raise the argument that the combined actions of deputies can suffice for certain Monell claims. Because the Estate predicates its unconstitutional-custom claim on the existence of an individual constitutional violation, and no individual deputy committed a constitutional violation here, the claim fails. To be sure, the Estate could have argued that the deputies' combined actions or omissions somehow violated Ms. Burgaz's rights. . . But the Estate failed to do so, and instead only made the general allegation that '[Ms.] Burgaz would still be alive' had the sheriff 'actually enforced [the corrective] policies.'. . Thus, that argument is waived before this court. . .For those reasons, we conclude the dismissal of the Monell claim was proper."); Buckley v. Hennepin County, 9 F.4th 757, 765 (8th Cir. 2021) ("Buckley alleges a Monell claim against Hennepin County, its hospitals, and all individual defendants. She argues these claims were improperly dismissed because she plausibly alleged that the paramedics violated her constitutional rights by sedating her with ketamine, and those violations resulted from Hennepin County's ketamine policy. We agree with the district court that these claims must be dismissed because Buckley failed to establish that the paramedics violated her Fourth Amendment or substantive due process rights."); M.J. by & through S.J. v. Akron City School District Bd. of Educ., 1 F.4th 436, 452 (6th Cir. 2021) ("A municipality 'can only be held liable if there is a showing of an underlying constitutional violation by' its officials. . . In other words, '[t]here can be no ... municipal liability under § 1983 unless there is an underlying unconstitutional act.' Wilson v. Morgan, 477 F.3d 326, 340 (6th Cir. 2007). And here, none of the school employees is liable under plaintiffs' substantive due process theory. So the district court correctly granted summary judgment for defendants on this claim."); Lachance v. Town of Charlton, 990 F.3d 14, 30-31 (1st Cir. 2021) ("Unlike public officials, municipalities do not enjoy qualified immunity, so the fact that officers may be entitled to such immunity for some action does not automatically absolve their municipal employer from being liable for that same action. . . .The district court's order was based on the premise that, because the defendant officers enjoyed federal qualified immunity on the excessive force claim as to the push, the town could not be liable under Monell and the individual officers could not be liable under state tort law for injuries that might have resulted from the push. This was error. . . . We have in the past held that '[w]here a plaintiff alleges both a § 1983 excessive force claim and common law claims for assault and battery, our determination of the reasonableness of the force used under § 1983 controls our determination of the reasonableness of the force used under the common law assault and battery claims.'. . That rule is inapposite here where the district court did not assess the reasonableness of the officers' actions in granting the defendants' motion. . . .[T]he district court ruled only that no reasonable jury could find a constitutional violation as to the kneel due to the lack of evidence of causation; it did not rule at summary judgment or after the trial that no reasonable jury could find that the push was not a constitutional violation. The defendants offer numerous alternative bases for affirmance. We decline to exercise our discretion to affirm on any of those bases, finding it "appropriate to leave such a matter for the district court to address in the first instance on remand, especially when the grounds are not fully developed or fairly contested on appeal," as is the case here. . . Accordingly, we vacate the district court's order granting the defendants' motion for judgment as a matter of law."); First Midwest Bank Guardian of Estate of LaPorta v. City of Chicago, 988 F.3d 978, 987, 989-93 (7th Cir. 2021) ("A Monell plaintiff must establish that he suffered a deprivation of a federal right before municipal fault, deliberate indifference, and causation come into play. LaPorta's claim fails at this first step. He did not suffer a deprivation of a right secured by the federal Constitution or laws. It's undisputed that Kelly was not acting under color of state law when he shot LaPorta. His actions were wholly unconnected to his duties as a Chicago police officer. He was off duty. He shot LaPorta after they spent a night out drinking together and had returned to his home to continue socializing at the end of the evening. Kelly's actions were those of a private citizen in the course of a purely private social interaction. This was, in short, an act of private violence. . . .[W]e have repeatedly applied DeShaney's holding that the state has no due-process duty to prevent harm from private actors unless one of the limited exceptions applies. [collecting cases] This rule is not controversial. All circuits read DeShaney the same way. [collecting cases] . . . . LaPorta resists application of DeShaney by shifting the focus to the Monell framework for municipal liability. The judge agreed with this approach, reasoning that because the jury found that the City's policy failures 'caused' Kelly to shoot LaPorta, DeShaney was inapplicable. Other judges in the Northern District of Illinois have issued similar rulings. [collecting cases] These decisions reflect a basic misunderstanding of the relationship between Monell and DeShaney. Monell and DeShaney are not competing frameworks for liability. The two cases concern fundamentally distinct subjects. Monell interpreted § 1983 and addressed the issue of who can be sued under the statute; the Court held that a municipality is a 'person' under § 1983 and may be liable—just like an individual public official—for its own violations of federal rights. . . Monell did not address the substance of any right under the federal Constitution or laws. It has nothing to say on that subject. It's a statutory-interpretation decision. DeShaney, on the other hand, addressed the substance of the constitutional right to due process. . .The Court interpreted the Due Process Clause and defined its scope, strictly limiting the circumstances under which a privately inflicted injury is cognizable as a due-process violation. LaPorta had the burden to prove a constitutional violation in addition to the requirements for municipal liability under Monell. . . . Applying DeShaney, as we must, it's clear that the City is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. It had no due-process duty to protect LaPorta from Kelly's act of private violence. LaPorta has never argued that one of the DeShaney exceptions applies. Rightly so; he was not in state custody at the time of his injury, and no evidence supports the exception for state-created dangers. And because LaPorta was not deprived of his right to due process, the City cannot be held liable for his injuries under § 1983—and that is so even if the requirements of Monell are established. Simply put, LaPorta suffered a common-law injury, not a constitutional one. . . . As we've noted, the judge relied heavily on our decision in Gibson, both at summary judgment and in rejecting the City's motion for judgment as a matter of law. Gibson involved a Chicago police officer who was found mentally unfit for duty and placed on medical leave. . . The Chicago Police Department prohibited him from carrying his gun or exercising any police authority; it also collected his star, shield, and identification card—but not his gun. . . . [In Gibson] we held that the estate's factual allegations were sufficient to permit the Monell claim to proceed beyond the pleading stage under the DeShaney exception for state-created dangers. This case is different. LaPorta never invoked the DeShaney exception for state-created dangers. He neither pleaded nor attempted to prove up a state-created danger, and the jury was not instructed on the legal elements of that type of due-process violation. So the judge simply misapplied Gibson. We did not hold that a Monell claim is exempt from DeShaney's general rule that the state has no constitutional duty to prevent acts of private violence. Nor could we. Nothing in Gibson suspended the DeShaney rule for Monell plaintiffs. The judge's misreading of Gibson led him to overlook a fundamental defect in LaPorta's Monell claim, both at summary judgment and in rejecting the City's posttrial motion. Under DeShaney the City had no due-process duty to protect LaPorta from Kelly's act of private violence. . . . LaPorta suggests that his novel theory against the City finds support in Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Department, 604 F.3d 293 (7th Cir. 2010), but that case does not help him. Thomas involved a pretrial detainee who died in jail from pneumococcal meningitis. A jury cleared the individual defendants but found the sheriff's department liable for failing to adequately respond to Thomas's medical needs. . . We concluded that 'a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.'. . The verdicts in Thomas were easily reconcilable. The jury found that the sheriff's department was deliberately indifferent to the detainee's medical needs—a constitutional violation—because its policies for processing medical-request forms were clearly insufficient. That finding was not at all inconsistent with its exoneration of the individual officers. . . Nothing in our decision in Thomas lifted the plaintiff's burden to prove a predicate constitutional violation. To the contrary, because pretrial detainees have a constitutional right to medical care while in custody, the sheriff's department could be found liable for violating that right even though the individual defendants were not. . . LaPorta also relies on Glisson v. Indiana Department of Corrections, 849 F.3d 372 (7th Cir. 2017) (en banc), but that case too is distinguishable. There, a state prisoner died from acute renal failure. We concluded that a jury could find that the prison's failure to enact a coordinated-care policy for prisoners with chronic illnesses amounted to deliberate indifference to the high likelihood that prisoners would die. . . It did not matter that no individual medical provider could be found liable; the problem was that 'no one was responsible for coordinating [Glisson's] overall care.'. . Again, nothing in our decision in Glisson removed the plaintiff's burden to prove an underlying constitutional violation. The case involved the prisoner's Eighth Amendment right to adequate medical care. . . This case is fundamentally different. Here there was no constitutional violation because the City had no due-process duty to protect LaPorta from Kelly's private violence. . . . LaPorta's case is tragic. His injuries are among the gravest imaginable. His life will never be the same. But § 1983 imposes liability only when a municipality has violated a federal right. Because none of LaPorta's federal rights were violated, the verdict against the City of Chicago cannot stand. We REVERSE and REMAND for entry of judgment for the City."); Pulera v. Sarzant, 966 F.3d 540, 555 (7th Cir. 2020) ("Because Pulera's individual claims against the nurses fail, so too must his Monell claims against VNCC and the county. Although individual liability is not always a prerequisite for municipal liability, see Glisson v. Ind. Dep't of Corr., 849 F.3d 372, 378 (7th Cir. 2017) (en banc), Pulera argues only that the facility inadequately trained its nurses and had a de facto policy permitting them to delegate all their duties to correctional officers. Even assuming Pulera could prove the training inadequate or the lax policy unconstitutional, he cannot show causation. . . The nurses acted appropriately under the circumstances, both generally and to the extent they relied on correctional officers, so their alleged lack of training and overreliance on officers could not have caused Pulera's injuries. See City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796, 799, 106 S.Ct. 1571, 89 L.Ed.2d 806 (1986) (per curiam) ("If a person has suffered no constitutional injury ... the fact that the departmental regulations might have authorized the use of constitutionally excessive force is quite beside the point.")."); King v. Hendricks County Commissioners, 954 F.3d 981, 987 (7th Cir. 2020) ("As discussed above, King has not established facts sufficient to allow a fact-finder to conclude that Hays's use of deadly force violated Bradley's Fourth Amendment rights. There is thus no constitutional violation for which the institutional defendants and Sheriff Clark may be liable. Unlike in the Eighth Amendment context, where we have said that an agency may be subject to Monell liability for deliberate indifference at the policy level to prisoners' serious medical needs even when its individual agents did not act with deliberate indifference, see Glisson v. Indiana Dep't of Corrs., 849 F.3d 372, 378 (7th Cir. 2017), a government entity cannot passively commit a Fourth Amendment violation. This is the case even if we accept, for purposes of argument, King's assertion that Hendricks County fails to give reserve police officers such as Hays and Thomas adequate training in how to deal with the mentally ill and how to de-escalate situations so that the use of deadly force can be avoided. Even supposing that the county would have been better advised to respond to persons experiencing mental-health crises with medical personnel or social workers, rather than armed police officers, its failure to do so does not automatically lead to liability. For liability to attach, there must be an unreasonable search or seizure, not just negligence or a failure to choose the best option. Because there was no underlying Fourth Amendment violation, summary judgment for the Municipal Defendants on the section 1983 claim against them was proper."); Meier v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 934 F.3d 824, 829 (8th Cir. 2019) ("St. Louis also argues that regardless of its policy, it cannot be held liable because Meier has not brought claims against any individual SLMPD employee. It relies on Whitney v. City of St. Louis, 887 F.3d 857 (8th Cir. 2018), in which we stated that 'absent a constitutional violation by a city employee, there can be no § 1983 or Monell liability for the City.'. . This argument misreads Whitney. Municipal liability requires a constitutional violation by a municipal employee, but it does not require the plaintiff to bring suit against the individual employee. See Webb v. City of Maplewood, 889 F.3d 483, 487–88 (8th Cir.) ("[O]ur case law has been clear ... that although there must be an unconstitutional act by a municipal employee before a municipality can be held liable, there need not be a finding that a municipal employee is liable in his or her individual capacity." (cleaned up)), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 139 S. Ct. 389, 202 L.Ed.2d 289 (2018). Assuming that the seizure of Meier's truck violated her constitutional rights—an assumption that St. Louis does not dispute at this juncture—Meier has adduced evidence sufficient to establish St. Louis's liability for that violation."); Cook v. Hopkins, 795 F. App'x 906, ___ (5th Cir. 2019) ("We agree with the district court that Plaintiffs are mistaken as to the City's argument: 'The City does not argue that the law requires that once all personal capacity claims are dismissed, the municipal-liability claims must also be dismissed.' Instead, the City argues that because we have 'unambiguously determined' that the Individual Defendants did not violate Deanna's or Vickie's equal protection rights, we must affirm the City's motion for summary judgment under Heller as no constitutional deprivation occurred. In sum, we agree with the district court and the City that the Brown v. Lyford footnote is sufficient to support our holding here that, under Heller, because we have found no constitutional violations on the part of the Individual Defendants, the City cannot be subjected to municipal liability."); Edwards v. Jolliff-Blake, 907 F.3d 1052, 1062 (7th Cir. 2018) ("The district court properly entered judgment for the City of Chicago on the Monell claim. The Monell claim arises out of the Chicago Police Department's policy and practice of using John Doe informants and, most importantly, is premised on the same conduct upon which the Edwardses base their claims against the individual officers. Because the Edwardses cannot make out a constitutional violation in their claim against the individual officers, there can be no viable Monell claim based on the same allegations. City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796, 799, 106 S.Ct. 1571, 89 L.Ed.2d 806 (1986); see also White v. City of Chicago, 829 F.3d 837, 844 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Probable cause also establishes that White did not suffer a constitutional injury, which is a necessary element of a Monell claim.")."); Medrano-Arzate v. Sheriff of Okeechobee County, 691 F. App'x 603, 604 (11th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 658 (2018) ("The complaint arises out of the death of Hilda Medrano on December 1, 2013, when the vehicle in which she was a passenger collided with a vehicle driven by Deputy Joseph Anthony Gracie of the Okeechobee County Sheriff's Office. Appellants filed suit against May, individually and in his capacity as Sheriff, and Okeechobee County, but did not file suit against Deputy Gracie. Appellants alleged that certain policies implemented by the Appellees, pursuant to which Deputy Gracie was unable to operate his lights and sirens while responding to an emergency call, caused the collision and Hilda Medrano's death. While we agree with the district court that Hilda Medrano's death was tragic, we also agree that the Appellants have failed to state a claim against the Appellees under § 1983. As Appellants do not allege that Deputy Gracie's conduct amounted to a deprivation of Hilda Medrano's constitutional rights, Appellants cannot maintain an action against Appellees under § 1983 based upon the policies alleged to have caused Hilda Medrano's death."); Lowry v. City of San Diego, 858 F.3d 1248, 1255-56, 1260 (9th Cir. 2017) (en banc) ("Lowry has not sued the police officers but only the City, asserting a single cause of action seeking to establish the City's liability under Monell v. Department of Social Services of New York, 436 U.S. 658 (1978). To prevail on her Monell claim, Lowry must establish that (1) SDPD's use of Bak amounted to an unconstitutional application of excessive force, and (2) the City's policy caused the constitutional wrong. . . Lowry contends that summary judgment should not have been granted to the City because there were genuine disputes of material fact and because the district court abused its discretion in excluding evidence that could have established a genuine dispute of fact. She argues that the force used against her was unreasonable and excessive, in violation of the Fourth Amendment. She further asserts that the City's policy regarding the use of police dogs was itself unconstitutional and that it caused her injury. We disagree. . . . Because there are no genuine issues of material fact and 'the relevant set of facts' has been determined, the reasonableness of the use of force is 'a pure question of law. . . Although Lowry has not sued the individual police officers, her Monell claim against the City first requires her to establish that the force used against her was unconstitutionally excessive. . . . Here, the force used was not severe, and the officers had a compelling interest in protecting themselves against foreseeable danger in an uncertain situation, which they reasonably suspected to be an ongoing burglary. We conclude that the use of Bak under these circumstances did not violate Lowry's rights under the Fourth Amendment. . . .Because we conclude that Lowry did not suffer a constitutional injury, she cannot establish liability on the part of the City. See City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796, 799 (1986). As a result, we do not reach the issue of whether the district court properly granted summary judgment on the alternative ground that Lowry failed to satisfy the additional requirements for municipal liability under Monell."); D.S. v. E. Porter Cnty. Sch. Corp., 799 F.3d 793, 800 (7th Cir. 2015) ("[A] municipality cannot be found liable under Monell when there is no underlying constitutional violation by a municipal employee. Sallenger v. City of Springfield, Ill., 630 F.3d 499, 504 (7th Cir.2010). Since D.S. cannot show a violation of her constitutional rights under either the Due Process or Equal Protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, the defendants cannot be held liable under Monell."); Stricker v. Township of Cambridge, 710 F.3d 350, 365 (6th Cir. 2013) ("The standard for municipal liability in negligent hiring, training, and retention is deliberate indifference. . . However, '[e]ven before reaching the issue of whether the municipality was deliberately indifferent ... the plaintiff must demonstrate a constitutional violation at the hands of an agent or employee of the municipality.'. . Because Plaintiffs did not demonstrate that there were any constitutional violations, their municipal liability claim fails as well."); Evans v. Chalmers, 703 F.3d 636, 654, 655 & n.11 (4th Cir. 2012) ("We recognize that because cities do not possess qualified immunity from § 1983 claims, Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U .S. 622, 638 (1980), we do not have appellate jurisdiction under the collateral order doctrine to hear the City's appeal of the Monell claims. However, because our determinations of the individual officers' qualified immunities fully resolve the issue of the City's Monell liability, we exercise pendent appellate jurisdiction over these claims. . . . All of these claims require a predicate constitutional violation to proceed. For 'supervisors and municipalities cannot be liable under § 1983 without some predicate "constitutional injury at the hands of the individual [state] officer," at least in suits for damages.'. . Similarly, a plaintiff bringing a 'stigma-plus' claim under Paul must allege both a stigmatic statement and a 'state action that "distinctly altered or extinguished"' his legal status. . . Because we hold that all plaintiffs failed to state predicate § 1983 claims against the individual officers, we must also hold that all plaintiffs have failed to state supervisory liability, Monell liability, and 'stigma-plus' claims. . . Thus, we reverse the district court's denial of the defendants' motions to dismiss these derivative claims."); Cutlip v. City of Toledo, No. 10–4350, 2012 WL 2580818, at *4 (6th Cir. July 5, 2012) (not reported) ("Cutlip has sued only the City of Toledo, a municipality, but he must still show that the police officers involved with Rocky's death violated Rocky's constitutional rights under one of the exceptions to the DeShaney rule."); Matthews v. City of East St. Louis, 675 F.3d 703, 709 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Matthews and Gillespie argue that even if the officers are not liable for false arrest, the City may still be, citing Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Dep't, 604 F.3d 293 (7th Cir.2009). Thomas is quite instructive in this instance. There, Cook County argued it could not be liable if all its employees were acquitted, relying on Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796 (1986), for that proposition. . . The Court disagreed, noting that Los Angeles was a case in which the municipality could not be found liable when its officers committed no constitutional violation in arresting the plaintiff. . . We specifically noted that the situation would differ if the officers were acquitted based on a defense of good faith, because there is still an argument that the city's policies caused the harm, though the officer was acting in good faith. Here, there was no constitutional violation, therefore no municipal liability."); Carnaby v. City of Houston, 636 F.3d 183, 189, 190 (5th Cir. 2011) ("In support of her claim that the city's policymaker was deliberately indifferent in adopting the high-risk-vehicle-approach ('HRVA') training policy, . . . Mrs. Carnaby points to two pieces of evidence, neither of which is sufficient to defeat summary judgment. First, she points to a high-profile incident that occurred in 1998: the shooting of Derek Kaeseman. . . In that case, there was evidence that the HRVA training received by the officers was deficient. Yet, the mandatory training in 2004 occurred after the Kaeseman shooting, and Mrs. Carnaby has produced no evidence that shows that HPD failed to modify its training protocols after the Kaeseman incident. Even if the Kaeseman shooting put policymakers on notice that their training methods were deficient, the 2004 training could be viewed as a response to those possible deficiencies. Thus, Mrs. Carnaby must show—but has not shown—that the policymakers were deliberately indifferent to the deficiencies of the 2004 training, not the prior training. . . .Second, Mrs. Carnaby claims that in HPD there is a pattern of violating the HRVA policy, which would suggest deliberate indifference to the weaknesses of the training given to officers. In support of that claim, Mrs.

Carnaby points to a series of Internal Affairs Division reports that she claims show possible violations of the HRVA policy that were not adequately investigated. Many of the incidents Mrs. Carnaby cites to, however, occurred before the mandatory training given in 2004 and are thus irrelevant to the question whether the policymakers were deliberately indifferent to the training given in 2004. Of the remaining incidents, many are factually distinguishable from the facts of this case. Reading all the reports in a manner favorable to Mrs. Carnaby, only two reports appear to address incidents that could be construed as a possible violation of the HRVA policy comparable to the violation that occurred here. Two reports over a period of four years, in a city the size of Houston, do not constitute a pattern of violating the HRVA policy. . . Mrs. Carnaby can point to no concrete evidence that any of the relevant policymakers were deliberately indifferent to any possible weaknesses in the HRVA training."); Claudio v. Sawyer, No. 10-0145-cv., 2011 WL 454515, at *1 (2d Cir. Feb. 10, 2011) (not published) ("Like the district court, we conclude that plaintiffs failed sufficiently to allege that Sawyer, an off-duty police officer, acted under color of state law in shooting Jayson Tirado, as required for a § 1983 claim. . . Nothing in plaintiffs' complaint suggests that Sawyer identified himself or was recognizable as a police officer, or otherwise engaged in any conduct arguably invoking 'the real or apparent power of the police department.'. . Thus, plaintiffs' § 1983 claim against Sawyer was properly dismissed. This pleading defect further doomed plaintiffs' Monell claim against the City for failure to properly train its officers regarding off-duty weapons use as such a claim must be based on an independent constitutional violation by a state actor. . . . In urging otherwise, plaintiffs assert that even if Sawyer was not a state actor, the City is liable because its purported failure to train off-duty officers and encouragement of them carrying weapons increased the likelihood of Sawyer privately inflicting harm on Jayson Tirado. We are not persuaded. The 'state-created danger' doctrine holds government officials liable for private harms if their 'affirmative conduct ... communicates, explicitly or implicitly, official sanction of private violence.'. . Although liability under this doctrine may extend to a municipality if its policy or custom causes an official's unconstitutional encouragement of private harm, plaintiffs do not here allege that any official affirmatively condoned Sawyer's tragic actions. . . Put another way, absent some individual state actor whose unconstitutional conduct might be traceable to the City's alleged lack of training, plaintiffs' claims impermissibly seek to create 'a separate cause of action for the failure by the government to train its employees' under the guise of a state-created danger. Accordingly, dismissal was warranted."); Sallenger v. City of Springfield, Ill., 630 F.3d 499, 504, 505 (7th Cir. 2010) ("The Estate's failure-to-train claim is premised mainly on the fact that the City permitted its officers to use hobbles but did not train them in the proper use of this device. But a municipality cannot be liable under Monell when there is no underlying constitutional violation by a municipal employee. . . Two alleged constitutional violations might have formed the basis for Monell liability: (1) the claim that the officers used excessive force against Sallenger, resulting primarily from their alleged misuse of the hobble; and (2) the claim that the officers inadequately responded to his medical needs during the arrest. But all three officers were cleared of any constitutional wrongdoing on the excessive-force claim following jury trials; the Estate does not challenge these verdicts on appeal. It is true as a general matter that we review the district court's entry of summary judgment on the Monell claim by reference to the evidentiary record made on summary judgment, not at trial. . . But the jury verdicts are now the law of this case, and they conclusively establish that no excessive force occurred. . . Nor can the medical-care claim against the officers provide an alternative basis for Monell municipal liability. For reasons we have already explained, the officers' conduct did not violate the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, because there is no underlying constitutional violation, the City cannot be liable under Monell."); Kennedy v. Town Of Billerica, 617 F.3d 520, 536 (1st Cir. 2010) ("[T]he Town may be liable even if individual officers are ultimately exonerated, for instance because the officers are granted qualified immunity or for failure of proof, but plaintiffs must still show some underlying constitutional tort attributable to the Town."); Martinez v. Beggs, 563 F.3d 1082, 1091, 1092 (10th Cir. 2009) ("A county or sheriff in his official capacity cannot be held 'liable for constitutional violations when there was no underlying constitutional violation by any of its officers.'. . . Likewise, Beggs cannot be held liable in his individual capacity for implementing county policies or for the actions of county officers under a theory of supervisory liability, when there was no violation of Ginn's constitutional rights. . . . Martinez finally argues that if no single individual county employee is found liable, the county may still be liable for a 'systemic injury' caused by 'the interactive behavior of several government officials, each of whom may be acting in good faith.'. . .To the extent this argument suggests that the county can be liable, even if no individual government actor is liable, it is precluded by our prior precedent."); Estate of Bennett v. Wainwright, 548 F.3d 155, 177 (1st Cir. 2008) ("With respect to the County, it is worth noting as a threshold matter that 'it is not impossible for a municipality to be held liable for the actions of lower-level officers who are themselves entitled to qualified immunity.' . . . The establishment of § 1983 liability against either Herrick or the County would ultimately depend on plaintiff proving the commission of an underlying constitutional violation by the subordinate officers. . . Because we hold that the subordinate officers are entitled to qualified immunity under the third prong of the Saucier analysis, we did not reach, in our foregoing analysis, the merits of whether actions taken during the attempt to place Bennett in protective custody amounted to a constitutional violation. We need not reach this question here either. Even if an underlying substantive constitutional violation by subordinate officers were stated by plaintiffs, we nevertheless agree with the district court that plaintiffs offer insufficient evidence to allow a reasonable factfinder to find a policy, custom, practice or any deliberate indifference on the part of either Herrick or the County that bears the requisite causal relationship to the alleged constitutional deprivation to establish liability under a supervisory theory. . . The estate can point to no proper record evidence that suggests deficient training or supervision."); Willis v. Neal, 2007 WL 2616918, at *5, *6 (6th Cir. 2007) ("The conclusion that Willis's arrest was supported by probable cause necessarily means that her § 1983 claim against all of the defendants fails because she has not established that her constitutional rights were violated, and the district court properly granted the defendants' summary judgment motions. Because Willis has failed to establish a deprivation of her constitutional rights, she cannot establish liability against the defendant municipalities. . . Our judgment in the case should not be read as condoning either the actions of the Task Force or the apparent willingness of the defendant municipalities to participate in Task Force operations based on little information in cases where time is not of the essence. However, Willis has not presented any argument to this court other than one based on the physical participation of the individual officers in her arrest."); Best v. Cobb County, Ga., 239 F.

App'x 501, ____ (11th Cir. 2007) ("The plaintiffs presented expert testimony regarding police pursuits in Cobb County. Their expert testified that 87.5% of all pursuits in Cobb County involve misdemeanor offenses or traffic violations. Out of more than 650 pursuits initiated, officers terminated only 11 during the course of the pursuit. The expert also testified that Cobb County officers are not required to balance the need to apprehend a suspect against the public's safety, and no action is taken against them for policy violations during pursuits. Of the 650 pursuits reviewed, 380(58%) resulted in accidents, including 93(14%) with injuries and at least 4 fatalities. In 2001, a Cobb County grand jury recommended that the county revise its vehicle pursuit policy to make the safety of the public and police officers a top priority. The grand jury noted that if the suspect's identity is readily ascertainable through a license tag or other means and the suspect is not a dangerous felon, police should discontinue the pursuit. The grand jury also recommended that the county use helicopters to aid in vehicle pursuits. Cobb County did not implement any of the grand jury's specific recommendations. The preamble to the county's vehicle pursuit policy provides:

> The Department recognizes that it is the duty and responsibility of an officer to apprehend a violator. Criminals often attempt to flee to escape apprehension for their crime. The exact crime for which the violator is fleeing from, may or may not be known to the pursuing officer. The policy of the Department is to use all reasonable means to apprehend a fleeing violator. The primary consideration during a vehicle pursuit will be that of safety, both the officer and the community.

The plaintiffs assert that Cobb County has a 'pursue at all costs' policy. They further assert that, while the county may teach pursuit maneuvers, it does not properly train officers on when to initiate and when to call off a pursuit or give corrective instruction when accidents occur. In sum, the plaintiffs contend that Cobb County was deliberately indifferent in training its officers because its policy does not require officers to limit pursuits to situations where the need to apprehend the suspect justifies the grave risk to innocent motorists and pedestrians. . . . This case is unique because the plaintiffs did not name the police officer involved in the pursuit as a defendant, nor do they claim that he personally violated their constitutional rights. Instead, the plaintiffs focus on the county's vehicle pursuit policy, arguing that the defendants were deliberately indifferent to their constitutional rights, and therefore the county is responsible for their injuries. . . . .[I]n order to hold Cobb County liable for the plaintiffs' injuries, the plaintiffs must establish a constitutional violation, municipal culpability, and causation. If the plaintiffs are unable to prove any of the three, their challenge necessarily fails. The plaintiffs rightfully concede that under the facts of this case Officer Smith did not violate their Fourth Amendment or Fourteenth Amendment rights. . . Although the police pursuit ended tragically, there was no constitutional violation. Consequently, the plaintiffs' claim against the county cannot survive summary judgment."); Segal v. City of New York, 459 F.3d 207, 219 (2d Cir.2006) ("Monell does not provide a separate cause of action for the failure by the government to train its employees; it extends liability to a municipal organization where that organization's failure to train, or the policies or customs that it has sanctioned, led to an independent constitutional violation."); Hicks v. Moore, 422 F.3d 1246, 1251, 1252 (11th Cir. 2005) ("Plaintiff contends Clouatre (pursuant to the Jail's practice) violated Plaintiff's rights under the Fourth Amendment by strip searching her without reasonable suspicion. She also claims that Sheriff Moore, Captain Ausburn, and Sergeant Gosnell are liable to her based on a theory of supervisory liability because they failed to train jailers properly about when to conduct strip searches, instead adhering to the general practice that required strip searches of all detainees regardless of the charge or circumstances. We will assume that it was the practice of Habersham County to strip search every detainee who was to be placed in the general population of the Jail. . . And given the Circuit's precedent, we must conclude the search of Plaintiff cannot be justified under the Constitution on the single ground that Plaintiff was about to be placed in the Jail's general population. . .That conclusion, however, does not mean that Plaintiff's own constitutional rights were violated when she was searched: just because she was strip searched at a jail that had a search practice that would generally violate the Constitution does not mean every search that was conducted actually violated the Constitution. . . We said in Skurstenis that ' Areasonable suspicion' may justify a strip search of a pretrial detainee.'. . Because we conclude that reasonable suspicion existed for this particular strip search, we also must conclude that no constitutional right was violated by the search."); Young v. City of Providence, 404 F.3d 4, 26, 27 (1st Cir. 2005) ("At the outset, we agree with the district court's reasoning that any proper allegation of failure to train must be aimed at Solitro's lack of training and not at the deficiencies in Saraiva's or Cornel's training, and must allege that Solitro's lack of training caused him to take actions that were objectively unreasonable and constituted excessive force on the night he shot Cornel. Such a theory, when the evidence is looked at most favorably to the plaintiff, can be made out in this case: a jury could find that Solitro's shooting of Cornel was unreasonable, inter alia, because he should have recognized Cornel as an off-duty officer (due to Cornel's demeanor and verbal commands) or not shot Cornel so rapidly without making sure of his identity. A jury could find that Solitro made such mistakes because of the PPD's lack of training on on-duty/off-duty interactions, avoiding misidentifications of off-duty officers, and other issues relating to the City's always armed/always on-duty policy. Further, a jury could find that this training deficiency constituted deliberate indifference to Cornel's rights."); Crocker v. County of Macomb, No. 03-2423, 2005 WL 19473, at *5, *6 (6th Cir. Jan. 4, 2005) (unpublished) ("If the plaintiff fails to establish a constitutional violation by an individual officer, the local government unit cannot be held liable for a failure to train under § 1983. . . More specifically, where there exists no constitutional violation for failure to take special precautions to prevent suicide, then there can be no constitutional violation on the part of a local government unit based on its failure to promulgate policies and to better train personnel to detect and deter jail suicides. . .Because no individual defendant violated Tarzwell's constitutional rights, Macomb County necessarily is not liable to plaintiff under a failure to train theory or on the theory that the County failed to promulgate effective policies for suicide prevention. Even if the County could be held liable absent liability on the part of an individual defendant, plaintiff has not identified any policy or custom that evidences deliberate indifference on the County's part either to the risk that Tarzwell would try to kill himself or to the problem of suicide attempts by pretrial detainees in general. The court notes in this regard that the alleged failure to comply with a regulation governing the visibility of holding cells alone does not rise to the level of a constitutional violation. . . Finally, plaintiff has not shown that defendant had a deliberate and discernible county policy to maintain a jail that was inadequately designed and equipped for the prevention of suicides. For these reasons, the district court did not err by granting summary judgment in favor of Macomb County."); Bowman v.

Corrections Corporation of America, 350 F.3d 537, 546, 547 (6th Cir. 2003) ("In Speer, the Eighth Circuit held that there must be a violation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights in order for liability to attach to either the individual defendants or to the municipal authority under § 1983. In Speer, the plaintiff's constitutional rights were violated, but not by the Mayor. Here, if we uphold the jury's findings as to Dr. Coble and Warden Myers, there was no violation of Bowman's rights by anyone, even if CCA's policy implicitly authorized such a violation. The similarity between this case and Heller is that the constitutional violation claimed either occurred or did not occur as a direct result of the actions of at least one person, in this case Dr. Coble. This is not a scenario in which the 'combined actions of multiple officials' could give rise to the violation at issue. For these reasons, we affirm the district court's denial of Bowman's motion for a judgment as a matter of law against the defendants in this case."); Jarrett v. Town of Yarmouth, 331 F.3d140, 151 (1st Cir. 2003) (per curiam) ("[I]t appears that the jury initially concluded that the Town of Yarmouth's bite and hold policy was unconstitutional, and reasoned that any application of that policy must be unconstitutional per se. Their reasoning was erroneous as a matter of law. We conclude after conducting the Graham balancing test that Officer McClelland's release of a dog trained to bite and hold did not violate Jarrett's Fourth Amendment rights as a matter of law. Our determination that Jarrett suffered no constitutional injury is dispositive of his municipal liability claim against the Town of Yarmouth."); Cuesta v. School Bd. Of Miami Dade County, 285 F.3d 962, 970 n.8 (11th Cir. 2002) ("Because we hold that Cuesta suffered no deprivation of her constitutional rights, we need not decide the question of whether the County's policy, in which all felony arrestees are strip searched, might deprive others of their constitutional rights."); Curley v. Village of Suffern, 268 F.3d 65, 71 (2d Cir.2001) ("Following Heller, we have recognized that a municipality cannot be liable for inadequate training or supervision when the officers involved in making an arrest did not violate the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . . Further, the verdict form in this case reveals the jury found no deprivation of rights in the first instance, without ever reaching the question of whether qualified immunity insulated defendants' conduct as objectively legally reasonable. This point is significant because case law further suggests Heller will not save a defendant municipality from liability where an individual officer is found not liable because of qualified immunity."); Trigalet v. City of Tulsa, 239 F.3d 1150, 1154-56 (10th Cir. 2001) ("[W]e consider whether a municipality can be held liable for the actions of its employees if those actions do not constitute a violation of a plaintiff's constitutional rights. We conclude, based on Lewis and Brown, as well as decisions from this and other circuits, . . . that a municipality cannot be held liable under these circumstances. . . . Here, the threshold issue is whether the action causing the harm (police pursuit resulting in death of innocent bystander) states a constitutional violation at all. Because there was no evidence that the officer intended to harm the decedents, Lewis dictates that no constitutional harm has been committed. Therefore, plaintiffs cannot meet the first prong of the test set forth in Collins v. City of Harker Heights. . . . Thus, even if it could be said that Tulsa's policies, training, and supervision were unconstitutional, the City cannot be held liable where, as here, the officers did not commit a constitutional violation. . . . In sum, we hold that absent a constitutional violation by the individual police officers whose conduct directly caused plaintiffs' injuries, there can be no municipal liability imposed on the City of Tulsa on account of its policies, customs, and/or supervision with regard to the individual defendants."); Young v. City of Mount Ranier, 238 F.3d 567, 579 (4th Cir. 2001) ("The law is quite clear in this circuit that a section 1983 failure-to-train claim cannot be maintained against a governmental employer in a case where there is no underlying constitutional violation by the employee. . . . Because the Parents have failed to allege a constitutional violation on the part of any law enforcement officer, the district court properly dismissed the failure-to-train claims asserted against the governmental employers."); Treece v. Hochstetler, 213 F.3d 360, 364 (7th Cir. 2000) ("[B]ecause a jury has determined that Hochstetler was not liable for committing a constitutional deprivation (tort) against Treece, it is impossible under existing case law for the City to be held liable for its knowledge or inaction concerning its officer's activity."); Hayden v. Grayson, 134 F.3d 449, 455 (1st Cir. 1998) ("Normally . . . a municipality cannot be held liable unless its agent actually violated the victim's constitutional rights."); S.P. v. City of Takoma Park, 134 F.3d 260, 272, 274 (4th Cir. 1998) ("Even assuming for the purposes of summary judgment that the training of its officers was unconstitutional, Takoma Park cannot be held liable when, as here, no constitutional violation occurred because the officers had probable cause to detain Peller. . . . Because the officers had probable cause to detain Peller for the limited purpose of transporting her to WAH for an emergency mental evaluation, no constitutional violation occurred. As such, Takoma Park necessarily is not liable for any alleged injuries."); Wyke v. Polk County School Board, 129 F.3d 560, 568-69 (11th Cir. 1997) ("[T]o prevail on a § 1983 claim against a local government entity, a plaintiff must prove both that her harm was caused by a constitutional violation and that the government entity is responsible for that violation. . . Canton discussed only the second issue, i.e., whether the city's 'policy' was responsible for its employee's violation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights. For purposes of its discussion, the Court assumed that those rights had indeed been violated. . . . We cannot make the same assumption. Before addressing whether the School Board can be held liable for a failure to train its employees, we must first determine whether those employees violated any of Wyke's constitutional rights by failing to discharge some constitutional duty owed directly to Shawn (and thus indirectly owed to Wyke), or some constitutional duty owed directly to Wyke. . . DeShaney, at least in part, mandates that we answer that question in the negative."); Estate of Phillips v. City of Milwaukee, 123 F.3d 586, 597 (7th Cir. 1997) ("Neither the City nor the police officers' supervisor can be held liable on a failure to train theory or on a municipal policy theory absent a finding that the individual police officers are liable on the underlying substantive claim."); Hunt v. Applegate, No. 95-1062, 1996 WL 748158, *2 (6th Cir. Dec. 31, 1996) (unpublished) (Panel decision on petition to rehear) ("It is impossible to establish deliberate indifference to a constitutional violation through the failure to train when the constitutional violation itself does not exist or is left completely undefined and unformed and when the municipal policy makers at fault are not identified. Thus, in the absence of a constitutional injury committed by municipal employees and caused by a lack of training, there is no viable 'failure to train' theory under City of Canton v. Harris."); Wilson v. Meeks, 98 F.3d 1247, 1255 (10th Cir. 1996) ("The district court correctly concluded no municipal liability could be found in this case because there was no constitutional violation committed by any of the individual defendants."); Quintanilla v. City of Downey, 84 F.3d 353, 355 (9th Cir. 1996) ("Plaintiff cites [Chew and Hopkins v. Andaya] for the proposition that a police department may be liable under § 1983 for damages caused by unconstitutional policies notwithstanding the exoneration of the individual officer whose actions were the immediate cause of the constitutional injury. While this may be true if the plaintiff established that he suffered a constitutional injury, and the officer's exoneration resulted from qualified immunity, . . . this proposition has no applicability here. Plaintiff failed to establish that he suffered a constitutional injury."); Hinkle v. City of Clarksburg, 81 F.3d 416, 420 (4th Cir. 1996) ("In the absence of any underlying use of excessive force against [plaintiff], liability cannot be placed on either the non-shooting officers, a supervisor, or the City."); Thompson v. City of Lawrence, 58 F.3d 1511, 1517 (10th Cir. 1995) (no municipal liability where no underlying constitutional violation by officers); Webber v. Mefford, 43 F.3d 1340, 1344 (10th Cir. 1994) ("Because Defendant Griffin did not violate Plaintiffs' constitutional rights, the district court correctly dismissed Plaintiffs' claims against the City of Sapulpa for inadequate training, supervision, and pursuit policies. A claim of inadequate training, supervision, and policies under § 1983 cannot be made out against a supervisory authority absent a finding of constitutional violation by the person supervised."); Scott v. Henrich, 39 F.3d 912, 916 (9th Cir. 1994) ("[Plaintiff] contends that even if the conduct of the individual officers was objectively reasonable, the municipal defendants may still face liability under City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378 (1989). While the liability of municipalities doesn't turn on the liability of individual officers, it is contingent on a violation of constitutional rights. Here, the municipal defendants cannot be held liable because no constitutional violation occurred."); Thompson v. Boggs, 33 F.3d 847, 859 (7th Cir. 1994) (where no underlying constitutional violation by officer, no liability on the part of the City or Police Chief); Abbott v. City of Crocker, 30 F.3d 994, 998 (8th Cir. 1994) ("The City cannot be liable in connection with either the excessive force claim or the invalid arrest claim, whether on a failure to train theory or a municipal custom or policy theory, unless Officer Stone is found liable on the underlying substantive claim."); Spears v. City of Louisville, 27 F.3d 567 (Table), 1994 WL 262054, *3 (6th Cir. June 14, 1994) ("[T]here must be a constitutional violation for there to be § 1983 municipal liability ... Because there was no deprivation of constitutional rights here, there is no basis for liability under § 1983, municipal or otherwise. Whether Louisville had an 'informal' policy of permitting its police officers to engage in high-speed pursuits for non-hazardous misdemeanors is irrelevant to the question of whether there was a deprivation of constitutional rights, a prerequisite to the imposition of § 1983 liability."); Temkin v. Frederick County Commissioners, 945 F.2d 716, 724 (4th Cir. 1991) (no claim of inadequate training can be made against supervisory authority, absent finding of constitutional wrong on part of person being supervised); Apodaca v. Rio Arriba County Sheriff's Dept., 905 F.2d 1445, 1447 (10th Cir. 1990) (when no underlying constitutional violation by a county officer, no action for failing to train or supervise the officer); Belcher v. Oliver, 898 F.2d 32, 36 (4th Cir. 1990) (where it was clear there was no constitutional violation, no need to reach question of whether a municipal policy was responsible for the officers' action); Williams v. Borough of West Chester, 891 F.2d 458, 467 (3d Cir. 1989) (where no viable claim against any individual officer, no Monell claim against the Borough).

See also Wells for Estate of Locke v. Hanneman, No. 23-CV-273 (ECT/DLM), 2024 WL 3326070, at *6 (D. Minn. July 8, 2024) ("The City's only argument against Count Two is that Officer Hanneman's qualified immunity precludes the claim. The determination that Officer

Hanneman is not entitled to qualified immunity defeats this contention. Regardless, whether Officer Hanneman has qualified immunity for Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim is not dispositive of the claim that City practices and customs violate the Equal Protection Clause. '[A] municipality may be held liable for its unconstitutional policy or custom even when no official has been found personally liable for his conduct under the policy or custom.'Webb v. City of Maplewood, 889 F.3d 483, 486 (8th Cir. 2018)."); Cruz v. Guevara, No. 23 C 4268, 2023 WL 8934940, at *10-11 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 27, 2023) ("The City has stated correctly the legal rule for what happens to Section 1983 Monell claims if a plaintiff does not prove constitutional torts by the individual officers. In City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796, 799 (1986), the Supreme Court held that municipal liability is contingent on officer liability. But our court of appeals has noted a narrow exception to the rule in Heller where the Monell claim is factually distinct from the claims against the individual officers. See Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Dep't, 604 F.3d 293, 305 (7th Cir. 2009) ("a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict"). The possibility that Plaintiff may retain a Monell claim factually distinct from the claims against the individual officers weighs against staying Monell discovery in this case."); Bentler v. Nederostek, No. CV 3:22-1107, 2023 WL 3510822, at *8 (M.D. Pa. May 17, 2023) ("While it is true, as Bentler points out, the Third Circuit has stated in several cases that '[i]t is possible for a municipality to be held independently liable for a substantive due process violation even in situations where none of its employees are liable,' the Court in those cases 'note[d] that, for Monell liability to attach, "there must still be a violation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights."'. . Here, for the reasons articulated above, Bentler's substantive due process rights were not violated when the County Dispatchers left out important details when relaying the substance of his 911 call to emergency personnel. Accordingly, 'there can be no derivative municipal claim.'. . And thus, the court will dismiss Bentler's municipal liability claim against Susquehanna County."); Enoch v. Hamilton County Sheriff's Office, No. 1:16-CV-661, 2021 WL 2223894, at *7, *10, *12 (S.D. Ohio June 2, 2021) ("This Court disagrees with plaintiffs' interpretation of the Sixth Circuit's findings and decision in Enoch II and how they impact this Court's findings on remand. The Sixth Circuit did not 'assume' in Enoch II that an underlying constitutional violation occurred, as plaintiffs claim. . . Rather, the Sixth Circuit considered the record evidence and explicitly found that plaintiffs' arrests were supported by probable cause because the deputies reasonably believed that Rule 33(D)(6) prohibited recording in the hallway outside Judge Nadel's courtroom. . . The court found, 'To be reasonable is not to be perfect, and so the Fourth Amendment allows for some mistakes on the part of government officials, giving them "fair leeway for enforcing the law in the community's protection."'. . The Sixth Circuit found, based on the record before it, that '[Nobles and Hogan] had probable cause to arrest Enoch and Corbin for violating Rule 33(D)(6).'. . The Sixth Circuit also found that because there was probable cause for the arrests, there was no wrongful arrest in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . Having found that a constitutional violation was not established, the Sixth Circuit concluded that defendants Nobles and Hogan were entitled to qualified immunity on the wrongful arrest claims brought against them in their individual capacity. . . The Sixth Circuit's findings and decisions are binding on this Court. Consistent with those findings and conclusions, plaintiffs cannot show that their arrests and seizures violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . [I]t follows from the Sixth Circuit's finding of no Fourth Amendment violation that liability cannot be imposed on defendants in their official capacity on the Fourth Amendment claims. The Sixth Circuit found unequivocally that there was probable cause for plaintiffs' arrests and there was no wrongful arrest, and defendants were therefore entitled to qualified immunity. The court in Lane acknowledged that in a situation like this, where there has been no violation of a constitutional right and the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, then the city or county 'cannot be held liable for violating that right any more than the individual defendants can.'. . Thus, even though Nobles and Hogan acted pursuant to a 'common practice' of the County in arresting plaintiffs, the County cannot be held liable for a Fourth Amendment violation because the Sixth Circuit found one did not occur. . . Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claims against defendants in their official capacity must be dismissed."); Harell v. City of Chicago, No. 18 C 7781, 2019 WL 2611036, at *3-4 (N.D. Ill. June 25, 2019) ("[T]he question on Plaintiffs' claims as Plaintiffs frame them is whether the City can be held liable under Section 1983 in the absence of a constitutional violation by any of its officers. Plaintiffs argue that Fagan authorizes the suit that they envision. . . .The problem for Plaintiffs, however, is that the Seventh Circuit quickly and resoundingly rejected the rule of Fagan. Thompson v. Boggs, 33 F.3d 847, 859 n.11 (7th Cir. 1994). Disagreeing with the Third Circuit's interpretation of Heller, the Seventh Circuit explained in Thompson that it 'follow[s] the clear holding of Heller that "[i]f a person has suffered no constitutional injury at the hands of the individual police officer, the fact that the departmental regulations might have authorized the use of constitutionally excessive force is quite beside the point."'. . Accordingly, to establish municipal liability and prevail on their Monell claim, it is not enough for Plaintiffs to allege that an alleged policy or procedure of the City injured them. . . Instead, Plaintiffs must allege both that they suffered a constitutional injury and that the City authorized or maintained a policy, procedure, or custom allowing or approving of the unconstitutional conduct. . . . Plaintiffs' Monell claims fail for an additional reason. Despite Plaintiffs' allegations about a host of policies and practices that Plaintiffs ascribe to the City, Plaintiffs allege no facts that suggest that any particular one of them caused the injuries complain of here. . . . The Court is sympathetic to the tragedy suffered by the plaintiffs. Yet, this Court is required to follow the Seventh Circuit's decision in Thompson which under the circumstances presented means that Counts IV and V must be dismissed."); Shanaberg v. Licking County, No. 2:16-CV-1209, 2018 WL 4334632, at *10–11 (S.D. Ohio Sept. 11, 2018) ("Plaintiff concedes that this is not a case where the officers went rogue, '[r]ather, they did exactly what they were supposed to do—they followed their "Use of Force" policy to the letter.'. . Licking County's taser policy states: 'Personal weapons or empty-hand self-defense is encouraged after verbal orders/warnings have been ignored. . . Plaintiff asserts that this policy on its face violates clearly established Sixth Circuit case law. Plaintiff states that the 'Officers were not just permitted, but "encouraged," to use tasers when confronted with "passive resistance"—i.e. noncompliance with verbal instructions.'. . The Court agrees that the risk of this policy is that an officer is empowered to use personal weapons, including a taser, stun devices, and expandable batons, when the suspect is ignoring verbal orders/warnings, rather than when a suspect actually posed an immediate threat to the officer's safety or the safety of others. However, in this case, the Court has already found that Plaintiff posed a potential threat to the officers involved. The officers had to make a split-second decision when faced with a suspect who was becoming increasingly agitated and defiant. The officers were forewarned that the suspect was armed and dangerous. Plaintiff repeatedly ignored the officers' warnings. There was a threat that the suspect could have a weapon, or obtained a weapon nearby. In short, the officers had reason to believe the situation could have escalated quickly. Plaintiff's claim that Licking County's use of force policy is unconstitutional must fail because the Court held that no constitutional violations occurred. Accordingly, Defendants are entitled to summary judgment on Plaintiff claim that Licking County's use of force is unconstitutional and all other claims related to Licking County and Coshocton County's policies, customs, or practices."); Boddie v. City of Lima, No. 16-CV-1850, 2018 WL 1847934, at *5 (N.D. Ohio Apr. 18, 2018) ("Here, there was no constitutional violation. As noted above, there are no facts to indicate Patrolman Montgomery violated Williams' Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights by pursuing the high-speed chase with intent to cause harm. Therefore, there is no basis for the failure to train or failure to promulgate policies claims against the City of Lima and Lima Police Department Chief Kevin Martin. Accordingly, all § 1983 claims are dismissed."); Jones v. Chapman, No. CV ELH-14-2627, 2017 WL 2472220, at *44–45 (D. Md. June 7, 2017) ("To be sure, 'Monell ... and its progeny do not require that a jury must first find an individual defendant liable before imposing liability on [a] local government.' Anderson v. City of Atlanta, 778 F.2d 678, 686 (11th Cir. 1985). There are some narrow circumstances in which 'a finding of no liability on the part of the individual municipal actors can co-exist with a finding of liability on the part of the municipality.' Int'l Ground Transp., Inc., 475 F.3d at 219; see also, e.g., Thomas v. Cook Cnty. Sheriff's Dept., 604 F.3d 293, 305 (7th Cir. 2010). But, in such cases, municipal liability under Monell is limited to situations in which 'such a finding would not create an inconsistent verdict' as to the individual defendants. . . For example, 'the combined acts or omissions of several employees acting under a governmental policy or custom may violate an individual's constitutional rights,' even if the conduct of 'no one employee may violate' those rights. [citing Garcia v. Salt Lake Cnty., 768 F.2d 303, 310 (10th Cir. 1985) and Speer v. City of Wynne, Arkansas, 276 F.3d 980, 986 (8th Cir. 2002)] But, these situations most often arise in cases where a plaintiff alleges understaffing by the municipality. Courts have also determined that municipal liability under Monell is appropriate in the absence of liability for individual officers where 'the injuries complained of are not solely attributable to the actions of named individual defendants.' Barrett v. Orange Cnty. Human Rights Comm'n, 194 F.3d 341, 350 (2d Cir. 1999). Such a theory is appropriate, for example, where there are unknown defendants. Moreover, courts have determined that municipal liability is appropriate in the absence of a finding of individual officer liability under § 1983 where the individual officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . None of these circumstances is applicable here. I have concluded that, as to the traffic stop and the arrest, and as to any claim regarding deliberate indifference to a serious medical need, none of the individual officers violated the constitutional rights of Mr. West. 'As such, there [are] no underlying constitutional violation[s] that can serve as the basis for ... derivative § 1983 Monell or supervisory liability claim [s]....'. . . Accordingly, as to the Fourth Amendment claim regarding the traffic stop and Mr. West's arrest, and as to the Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference claim, the § 1983 Monell and supervisory liability claims against the BPD Defendants fail as a matter as law. But, because I have concluded that the BPD Officers are not entitled to summary judgment as to the use of force claim or the claim related to the search of the passenger compartment of Mr. West's vehicle, the BPD Defendants are not entitled to summary judgment as to these claims."); Garcia v. Bloomberg, No. 11-CV-6957 JSR, 2015 WL 5444122, at *2-3 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 10, 2015) ("[B]ecause Monell does not provide a separate cause of action but rather extends the liability of individual municipals [sic] actors to the municipality, if a plaintiff cannot show she has been a victim of a tort committed by municipal actors, the municipality cannot be held liable. . . Here, if plaintiffs cannot show that they were falsely arrested, then they cannot established [sic] municipal liability. . . .Plaintiffs argue that the Second Circuit did not adjudicate whether their constitutional rights were violated but only addressed the qualified immunity issue. . . It is true that the ultimate issue on appeal was whether the individual NYPD officers were entitled to qualified immunity. However, to reach its conclusion, the Second Circuit repeatedly made clear that its analysis applied to the law of probable cause, as well as the law of qualified immunity. . . Plaintiffs and this Court are bound by the Second Circuit's holdings on probable cause and, consequently, its impact on municipal liability under Monell."), aff'd, 662 F. App'x 50 (2d Cir. 2016); White v. City of Trenton, 848 F.Supp.2d 497, 501-06 (D.N.J. 2012) ("As explained by the First Circuit in Wilson v. Town of Mendon, '[t]here is ... nothing to prevent a plaintiff from foregoing the naming of an individual officer as a defendant and proceeding directly to trial against the municipality....' . . . Plaintiffs do not often choose this route because '[t]he predicate burden of proving a constitutional harm on the part of a municipal employee remains an element of the case regardless of the route chosen and is much easier to flesh out when the tortfeasor is a party amenable to the full powers of discovery.'. . Moreover, proving a Monell claim based on constitutional harm inflicted by unnamed officers is difficult; a plaintiff must show not only that he suffered constitutional harm but also that the municipality had a policy or custom that encouraged excessive force and that said policy or custom was a motivating factor in the officers' unconstitutional conduct. . . . Here, Plaintiff does not dispute that his Monell claim is predicated on Officers Kurfuss' and Kmiec's conduct, nor that he failed to name these officers as defendants. .. However, the record in this case does not suggest that Plaintiff engaged in pleading gamesmanship. As noted, Plaintiff attempted to amend his First Amended Complaint to substitute the officers names for the 'John Doe' defendants he originally named. Unlike the plaintiff in Wilson, Plaintiff sought to name the individuals officers but simply failed to do so in timely fashion. There is no indication in the record that Plaintiff sought some sort of competitive advantage in not naming the officers as defendants. . . . Because Plaintiff was not permitted to substitute the unnamed officers for the John Doe defendants, no judicial determination as to the officers' liability has been made. This distinguishes Heller and its progeny because, in those cases, there had been a judicial determination that the officers did not inflict constitutional harm. So, while the general rule is that 'municipal liability will only lie where municipal action actually caused an injury,' Grazier, 328 F.3d at 124, see also Simmons v. City of Philadelphia, 947 F.2d 1042, 1064 (3d Cir.1991), until a judicial determination as to whether Officers Kurfuss and Kmiec inflicted constitutional harm is made on summary judgment or at trial, there is no basis for granting summary judgment at this juncture on Plaintiff's Monell claim. . . . In the event the City Defendants do not successfully move for summary judgment on whether Plaintiff has proven constitutional harm and this matter advances to trial, I may exercise my discretion to bifurcate the trial. . . Should the Court bifurcate, Plaintiff will first be required to establish that Officers Kurfuss and Kmiec used excessive force and that he suffered constitutional harm during the November 2004 incident. Only after a jury returns a verdict in his favor will Plaintiff then be allowed to present evidence on the Monell claim and submit that claim to the jury. Even if I elect not to bifurcate the trial, Plaintiff is reminded that he will be required to first establish he suffered constitutional harm in order for his claim against the municipality to succeed. . . . The Court further reiterates that, in addition to the constitutional harm element of his Monell claim, Plaintiff must establish existence of the custom that implicitly encouraged excessive force and that the custom was a motivating factor in the officers' use of excessive force in the November 2004 incident."); Barham v. Town of Greybull Wyo., No. 10-CV-261-D, 2011 WL 2710319, at *16 (D. Wyo. July 11, 2011) ("The Tenth Circuit has specifically held that a county cannot be held liable for constitutional violations if there is no underlying constitutional violation by any of its officers. Martinez v. Beggs, 563 F.3d 1082, 1091 (10th Cir.2009) (quoting Olsen v. Layton Hills Mall, 312 F.3d 1304, 1317-18 (10th Cir.2002)). . . . The Court finds that the Martinez holding is material to Plaintiff's claims against the Town of Greybull, Wyoming and the Greybull Police Department in this case. Because the Court finds the Police Officer Defendants had probable cause to arrest Plaintiff and search his property, therefore Plaintiff's constitutional rights were not violated. It follows that the Town of Greybull, Wyoming or the Greybull Police Department cannot be held liable where a constitutional violation was not committed."); Claudio v. Sawyer, 675 F.Supp.2d 403, 410 (S.D.N.Y. 2009) ("In their opposition memorandum, plaintiffs argue that even if Sawyer was not acting under color of law, the City was 'undeniably a state actor' when it promulgated customs and policies that led to Tirado's death. . . Plaintiffs allege that the City failed to properly train and supervise Sawyer, and that it encouraged its officers to carry guns off-duty, even while drinking alcohol. Despite the tragic facts alleged in the complaint, Second Circuit case law holds that where an off-duty officer did not act under color of law, the injury inflicted on the victim is one of private violence. . . Without a state actor, there can be no 'independent constitutional violation.' If there is no 'independent constitutional violation,' a Monell claim against the City will necessarily fail. . . That is the case here. Because Sawyer did not act under color of law, there was no independent constitutional violation, and the shooting death of Tirado was an act of private violence. The City is not liable under Monell for the private acts of its employees."); Wilkins v. City of Oakland, No. C 01-1402 MMC, 2006 WL 305972, at *1 n.2 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 8, 2006) ("Relying on Hopkins v. Andaya, 958 F.2d 881, 888 (9th Cir.1992), plaintiffs argue that even if an individual officer is found not to have committed a Fourth Amendment violation, a municipality nevertheless can be held liable on an improper training and/or supervision theory. The language in Hopkins on which plaintiffs rely is dicta, however, as the individual officer therein was not exonerated. Moreover, in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Heller as well as the Ninth Circuit cases, cited infra, expressly holding to the contrary, Hopkins should not be read as standing for the proposition that a municipality may be held liable in the absence of a constitutional violation by the individual defendant."); Dye v. City of Warren, 367 F.Supp.2d 1175, 1189, 1190 (N.D. Ohio 2005) ("As the United States Supreme Court explained in City of Canton v. Harris,. . . a municipality's failure to train is in general not enough to prove a constitutional violation. . . Instead, Section 1983 plaintiffs can use a municipality's failure to train as one way to make the required showing that a municipal policy or custom was the 'moving force' behind an already established constitutional deprivation. . . Therefore, Mr. Dye's failure-to-train claim, like his basic excessive force claim against the Chief, requires a predicate showing that Chief Mandopoulos did violate Mr. Dye's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force. Accordingly, this Court's finding that the Chief was not liable for any constitutional deprivation against Mr. Dye forecloses the plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claims against the City."); Butler v. Coitsville Township Police Dep't, 93 F. Supp.2d 862, 868 (N.D. Ohio 2000) ("Because the Court has found insufficient evidence of any constitutional violation by the defendant law enforcement officers, the defendant government entities cannot be held liable under § 1983 and are therefore entitled to judgment as a matter of law."); Sanchez v. Figueroa, 996 F. Supp. 143, 147 (D.P.R. 1998) (In action against supervisory official for failure to train and failure to screen/supervise, plaintiff must first establish that non-supervisory officer violated plaintiff's decedent's constitutional rights.); Friedman v. City of Overland, 935 F. Supp. 1015, 1018 (E.D. Mo. 1996) ("It is clearly established that a municipality cannot be held liable under § 1983, whether on a failure to train theory or a municipal custom and policy theory, unless the municipal/state employee is found liable on the underlying substantive constitutional claim."); Dismukes v. Hackathorn, 802 F. Supp. 1442, 1448 (N.D. Miss. 1992) ("[T]he court's conclusion that there is insufficient evidence to raise a factual issue as to the officer's recklessness [in high speed pursuit] requires summary judgment in the claims against Starkville and the police chief. If Officer...did not violate plaintiffs' constitutional rights, the same applies to the police chief and the city of Starkville."); Montgomery v. County of Clinton, Michigan, 743 F. Supp. 1253, 1257 (W.D. Mich. 1990) ("If [officers] inflicted no constitutional injury, though their conduct was enabled by policy, custom or deficient training, the County and Sheriff could bear no liability."), aff'd, 940 F.2d 661 (6th Cir. 1991) (Table).

But see Griffith v. El Paso County, Colorado, 129 F.4th 790, 822-23 (10th Cir. 2025) ("Ms. Griffith's claim is Sheriff Elder's policies caused unconstitutional conditions of confinement through a number of channels, none of which necessarily depends on particular subordinates' actions. . . The law permits this kind of Monell claim. . . We thus agree with Ms. Griffith that her claim against Sheriff Elder in his official capacity does not necessarily depend on unconstitutional conduct by a subordinate named in the same suit, as the magistrate judge seemed to conclude. Still, affirmance is required because Ms. Griffith has not plausibly alleged deliberate indifference by Sheriff Elder or stated facts to support that his policy was the legally relevant cause of the harassment, assaults, and other mistreatment—carried out by others—underlying this claim. . . Under these circumstances, we affirm the district court's dismissal of Ms. Griffith's Fourteenth Amendment conditions of confinement claim."); Stucker v. Louisville Metro Government, No. 23-5214, 2024 WL 2135407, at *5–6 (6th Cir. May 13, 2024) (not published) ("Our sister circuits have expressly and widely held that a municipality may be liable for constitutional violations even absent a successful claim against an offending officer if the outcome is not inconsistent with Monell's holding. [collecting cases] Monell requires a constitutional injury, not the joinder of an officer acting unconstitutionally. . . . Given the language of Monell, Colemon, and other circuit precedent, a Monell claim against a municipality may proceed without a claim against the offending officer, so long as it remains consistent with finding a constitutional violation. The district court's ruling here did not absolve Troutman of constitutional wrongdoing; it merely dismissed the claims against him based on the statute of limitations. Thus, recovery can be had against LMPD in Troutman's absence, provided Plaintiffs can prove a constitutional violation caused by LMPD's policy or customs."); Mervilus v. Union County, 73 F.4th 185, 196-97 (3d Cir. 2023) ("'[A] municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.'. . Where it is possible for the Monell defendant to cause constitutional harm without any individual defendant violating the plaintiff's rights, it is not inconsistent for a jury to find only the Monell defendant liable. [collecting cases] But where a finding for the individual defendant necessarily means the plaintiff suffered no constitutional deprivation, there is no basis for a Monell claim, and thus it too must fall. . . Here, it would be consistent for the jury to find Kaminskas not liable because he lacked bad faith in conducting the exam, while simultaneously holding the County liable for failing to train or supervise him. . . Thus, Mervilus may ultimately prevail on his failure to train and supervise theory against Union County even if Kaminskas avoids liability. On the other hand, Mervilus's second Monell theory—that the County customarily fabricated exams—depends on Kaminskas being complicit in that scheme, and thus would be untenable if the jury finds for Kaminskas. To be clear, our analysis is limited to determining whether either of Mervilus's Monell theories depends on his claim against Kaminskas. We express no view on whether his claims based on these theories are triable. The result is a remand for the District Court to decide in the first instance as to Union County."); Rogers v. Sheriff of Santa Rosa County, Florida, No. 21-13994, 2023 WL 2566087, at *6–7 (11th Cir. Mar. 20, 2023) (not reported), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 377 (2023) ("The Sheriff asserts that the jury was required to find either Gaddis or Bauman liable under § 1983 as an element of Monell liability. He is incorrect. We begin by briefly explaining the Sheriff's argument. As stated previously, a plaintiff bringing a Monell claim must show (1) the violation of a constitutional right, (2) that a municipality had a custom or policy of deliberate indifference to that right and (3) that the custom or policy caused the violation. . . In the Sheriff's view, the first component—a constitutional violation—requires a plaintiff to establish the same elements that form an individual § 1983 claim. That is, to show a constitutional violation for the purposes of Monell liability, a plaintiff must establish, as to an individual, '(1) a substantial risk of serious harm; (2) the [individual's] deliberate indifference to that risk; and (3) causation.'. . But in this case, the jury found only (1) and (2) as to Gaddis and Bauman and attributed (3), causation, to the Sheriff instead. According to the Sheriff, because the jury found that Gaddis and Bauman were not liable under § 1983, no constitutional violation occurred, and Rogers' Monell claim necessarily failed. The issue before us, then, is whether individual liability under § 1983 is a necessary element of municipal liability under Monell. We addressed this question in Barnett v. MacArthur, 956 F.3d 1291 (11th Cir. 2020). [Court discusses Barnett] The jury's verdict represents a finding that the Jail's policies—not the actions of the individual deputies—were the '"moving force"' [behind] the constitutional violation.'. . The Sheriff conflates the elements of a § 1983 claim against an individual officer with Monell's requirement of a constitutional violation. They are not one and the same. Barnett forecloses the Sheriff's argument, and accordingly, we find no abuse of discretion in the district court's denial of relief under Rule 59(e)."); Richards v. County of San Bernardino, 39 F.4th 562, 574 (9th Cir. 2022) ("[T]his Court has rejected the view that municipal liability is precluded as a matter of law under § 1983 when the individual officers are exonerated of constitutional wrongdoing. See Fairley v. Luman, 281 F.3d 913, 917 (9th Cir. 2002). Instead, '[i]f a plaintiff established he suffered constitutional injury by the County, the fact that individual officers are exonerated is immaterial to liability under § 1983.'. . 'This is true whether the officers are exonerated on the basis of qualified immunity, because they were merely negligent, or for other failure of proof.'. . Here, Richards puts forth at least two Monell claims that are not premised on a theory of liability that first requires a finding of liability on the part of the individual officers: (1) that the County's policy of prohibiting coroner investigators from entering a crime scene until cleared by homicide detectives resulted in the loss of exculpatory time-of-death evidence, and (2) that the lack of any training or policy on Brady by SBSD resulted in critical exculpatory evidence being withheld by the prosecution. Irrespective of the merits of these claims, the district court erred by not addressing whether Richards could show that he suffered a constitutional injury by the County unrelated to the individual officers' liability under § 1983."); Crowson v. Washington County State of Utah, 983 F.3d 1166, 1187-92 & n.10 (10th Cir. 2020) ("In Williams v. City & County of Denver, we 'emphasize[d] the distinction between cases in which a plaintiff seeks to hold a municipality liable for failing to train an employee who as a result acts unconstitutionally, and cases in which the city's failure is itself an unconstitutional denial of substantive due process.'[10] [fn.10: Although the opinion in Williams was vacated, it was not reversed by the en banc court. . . Thus, its expressions on the merits may have at least persuasive value.] We explained that a city may not be held liable for failure to train 'when there has been no underlying constitutional violation by one of its employees.'. . By contrast, where the claim is premised upon a formally promulgated policy, well-settled custom or practice, or final decision by a policymaker, we held 'the inquiry is whether the policy or custom itself is unconstitutional so as to impose liability on the city for its own unconstitutional conduct in implementing an unconstitutional policy.' . . Although Williams has a complex subsequent history, nothing in that history casts doubt on the determination that a failure-to-train claim may not be maintained without a showing of a constitutional violation by the allegedly un-, under-, or improperly-trained officer. . . Thus, under Williams, our conclusion that the claim against Nurse Johnson fails on summary judgment necessarily also defeats the failure-to-train claim against the County, which is premised only upon the County's failure to train its nurses. Where the claim against the municipality is not dependent upon the liability of any individual actor, however, our precedent is less clear. Recall that in Garcia, we held: 'Deliberate indifference to serious medical needs may be shown by proving there are such gross deficiencies in staffing, facilities, equipment, or procedures that the inmate is effectively denied access to adequate medical care.'. . More recently, however, we reached a contrary conclusion. See Martinez v. Beggs, 563 F.3d 1082 (10th Cir. 2009). . . . In Martinez . . . we went beyond Olsen in holding that a § 1983 deliberate indifference claim against a municipality based on systemic failures cannot survive in the absence of a constitutional violation by at least one individual defendant. . . . We are unable to reconcile the holdings in Martinez and Garcia. However, Garcia is the earlier published decision, and 'when faced with an intra-circuit conflict, a panel should follow earlier, settled precedent over a subsequent deviation therefrom.' . . . The subsequent development of our municipal liability caselaw confirms that Heller did not undermine Garcia. [discussing cases] As previously discussed, in Collins the Supreme Court recognized a type of § 1983 claim against a municipality that may survive even in the absence of a constitutional violation by a municipal employee. [discussing Collins] We dissected the meaning of Collins for § 1983 municipal liability in Williams. [discussing Williams] We returned to the relevant question in Trigalet v. City of Tulsa. . . There, 'we consider[ed] whether a municipality can be held liable for the actions of its employees if those actions do not constitute a violation of a plaintiff's constitutional rights.'. . We held 'even if it could be said that Tulsa's policies, training, and supervision were unconstitutional, the City cannot be held liable where, as here, the officers did not commit a constitutional violation.'. . . Under Trigalet, there is no question that where the actions of a municipality's officers do not rise to the level of a constitutional violation and the claim against the municipality is based on it serving as the driving force behind those actions, liability cannot lie. But the question here, and in Garcia, is different: whether, even where no individual action by a single officer rises to a constitutional violation, a municipality may be held liable where the sum of actions nonetheless violates the plaintiff's constitutional rights. Garcia answers that question in the affirmative. And the Supreme Court's subsequent decision in Heller does not cast doubt on Garcia; in Heller the theory of municipality liability was predicated on the actions of one officer who was determined not to have violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. Because Garcia is not undermined by a subsequent Supreme Court decision, and it also predates Martinez, Garcia is controlling here. . . . Because municipalities act through officers, ordinarily there will be a municipal violation only where an individual officer commits a constitutional violation. But, as in Garcia, sometimes the municipal policy devolves responsibility across multiple officers. In those situations, the policies may be unconstitutional precisely because they fail to ensure that any single officer is positioned to prevent the constitutional violation. Where the sum of multiple officers' actions taken pursuant to municipal policy results in a constitutional violation, the municipality may be directly liable. That is, the municipality may not escape liability by acting through twenty hands rather than two. The general rule in Trigalet is that there must be a constitutional violation, not just an unconstitutional policy, for a municipality to be held liable. In most cases, this makes the question of whether a municipality is liable dependent on whether a specific municipal officer violated an individual's constitutional rights. But Garcia remains as a limited exception where the alleged violation occurred as a result of multiple officials' actions or inactions. With this legal background in place, we now proceed to the question of whether our resolution of the claims against the individual defendants forecloses the County's liability. We conclude that it does with respect to the failure-to-train claim, but not as to the theory based on a systemic failure of medical policies and procedures. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment to the County on the failure-to-train claim, but we lack jurisdiction over the claim against the County based on its allegedly deficient policies and procedures."); Ouellette v. Beaupre, 977 F.3d 127, 144-45 (1st Cir. 2020) ("It is well established that, without a finding of a constitutional violation on the part of a municipal employee, there cannot be a finding of § 1983 liability on the part of a supervisor or municipality. . . However, contrary to appellees' assertion, we have never held that the dismissal of a § 1983 claim against an individual officer on the basis of the statute of limitations compels dismissal of timely supervisory and municipal liability claims premised on that officer's alleged constitutional violations. . .Indeed, in Wilson v. Town of Mendon, we explicitly held that '[t]here is ... nothing to prevent a plaintiff from foregoing the naming of an individual officer as a defendant and proceeding directly to trial against the municipality.'. . In reaching that conclusion, we rejected the argument that such a scenario would require a court to adjudicate the rights of an individual not before it. . . Rather, we held that, for a plaintiff to prevail under such circumstances, a jury would merely have to make 'a factual finding regarding the implications of [the individual officer's] conduct for the possible liability of the [municipality] as her employer.'. . In this case, if Ouellette is to prevail on his § 1983 claims against appellees, he will have to convince a jury to make a preliminary factual finding that Gaudette violated his constitutional rights. Of course, that finding will not be binding on Gaudette or subject him to damages liability, given that the constitutional claims against him are barred by the statute of limitations. . . Rather, such a finding will merely establish the possibility that appellees may be held responsible for Gaudette's allegedly unconstitutional conduct under Ouellette's theory of deliberate indifference."); Quintana v. Santa Fe County Board of Commissioners, 973 F.3d 1022, 1033-34 (10th Cir. 2020) ("In this case, the plaintiffs sought leave to amend to add a Monell claim under § 1983 against Santa Fe County for its allegedly deficient medical intake protocol. . . The district court concluded that amendment would be futile because the plaintiffs could not state a Monell claim without a viable claim against an individual defendant. But that blanket justification does not square with circuit precedent holding that municipal liability under Monell may exist without individual liability. . . Indeed, we concluded in Garcia that even where 'the acts or omissions of no one employee may violate an individual's constitutional rights, the combined acts or omissions of several employees acting under a governmental policy or custom may violate an individual's constitutional rights.'. . Thus, in light of Garcia, the district court's legal basis for its finding of futility is contrary to our circuit's precedent. But that does not end the inquiry. Although the district court's finding of futility is not consistent with Garcia, the proposed amended complaint must still allege facts that, under Garcia and Monell, plausibly state a cause of action against Santa Fe County. To state a claim against the County, the plaintiffs must allege facts showing: (1) an official policy or custom, (2) causation, and (3) deliberate indifference. . . The plaintiffs' proposed amendment alleges: (1) Santa Fe County maintained an unconstitutional custom of failing to treat detainees for withdrawal, which resulted in a deficient medical intake protocol, (2) that custom caused Ortiz's injury, and (3) the County's actions (or inaction) stemmed from deliberate indifference. Although we are not sure whether the plaintiffs can prove each of those elements at trial or even survive summary judgment, they allege sufficient facts supporting each element for their claim to proceed past the motion-to-dismiss stage. . . . The plaintiffs pleaded facts indicating that Ortiz never received or did not take the kick kit withdrawal medications. That allegation supports the plaintiffs' claim that the jail had a process problem—even though we cannot pin the failure to administer the kick kit on any one individual. The plaintiffs also pleaded that three other inmates at the same jail recently experienced withdrawal-related deaths. And a 2003 Department of Justice study put Santa Fe County on notice about deficiencies in the jail's 'intake medical screening, assessment, and referral process.'. .The plaintiffs further allege that these deficiencies contributed to Ortiz's death. Finally, the plaintiffs alleged that the jail previously provided Ortiz with deficient intakes over the course of eight separate incidents of incarceration at the jail. Altogether, the allegations of intake failures preceding Ortiz's death and past process failures sufficiently state a Monell claim at this early stage in the proceedings. . . Thus, we conclude that the proposed amendment would not be entirely futile in this case."); Barnett v. MacArthur, 956 F.3d 1291, 1301-03 (11th Cir. 2020), cert. denied sub nom Lemma v. Barnett, 141 S. Ct. 1373 (2021) (" One final matter warrants discussion. The Sheriff contends that he cannot be liable under Monell because the jury found in favor of Deputy MacArthur on the individual Fourth Amendment detention claim against her. As the Sheriff sees things, the jury verdict means that there was no Fourth Amendment violation, and without a Fourth Amendment violation there cannot be municipal liability under Monell. . . The syllogism is superficially seductive, but on this record it does not work. It is true, as the Sheriff says, that 'an inquiry into a governmental entity's custom or policy is relevant only when a constitutional deprivation has occurred.' Rooney v. Watson, 101 F.3d 1378, 1381 (11th Cir. 1996). But the problem for the Sheriff is that the jury verdict in favor of Deputy MacArthur does not constitute a finding that Ms. Barnett suffered no Fourth Amendment violation as a result of the detention. We have held that 'Monell ... and its progeny do not require that a jury must first find an individual defendant liable before imposing liability on local government.' Anderson v. City of Atlanta, 778 F.2d 678, 686 (11th Cir. 1985). For example, municipal liability can exist if a jury finds that a constitutional injury is due to a municipal policy, custom, or practice, but also finds that no officer is individually liable for the violation. . . This is not a controversial concept, as many of our sister circuits have come to the same conclusion. [collecting cases] Where, as here, a jury has returned a verdict in favor of an individual defendant on a § 1983 claim, the question is whether that verdict 'can be harmonized with a concomitant verdict or decision imposing liability on the municipal entity. The outcome of the inquiry depends on the nature of the constitutional violation alleged, the theory of municipal liability asserted by the plaintiff, and the defenses set forth by individual actors.'. . We conclude that the jury verdict in favor of Deputy MacArthur does not preclude a finding of municipal liability due to the Sheriff's mandatory eight-hour hold policy. . . .Because the jury found only that Deputy MacArthur had not 'intentionally committed acts that violated [Ms.] Barnett's Fourth Amendment right ... not to be arrested or detained without probable cause,'. . . its verdict says nothing about whether the continued detention of Ms. Barnett—after her breathalyzer tests and after posting bond—due to the Sheriff's hold policy violated the Fourth Amendment. Stated differently, the jury was asked to decide only whether Deputy MacArthur was personally responsible (due to 'intentionally committed acts') for any Fourth Amendment violations, and not whether Ms. Barnett suffered a Fourth Amendment violation due to her continued detention. Under the circumstances—including the evidence presented, the defense theory, the jury instructions, and the verdict form—the jury's verdict in favor of Deputy MacArthur does not insulate the Sheriff from a § 1983 claim under Monell for Ms. Barnett's continued detention pursuant to the eight-hour mandatory hold policy."); Rayfield v. City of Grand Rapids, Michigan, 768 F. App'x 495, 511 n.12 (6th Cir. Apr. 15, 2019) ("It is undecided whether a municipality's liability under § 1983 is predicated on first finding that an individual officer or employee is also liable. See, e.g., City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796, 799 (1986) ("If a person has suffered no constitutional injury at the hands of the individual police officer, the fact that the department regulations might have authorized the use of constitutionally excessive force is quite beside the point."); accord Watkins v. City of Battle Creek, 273 F.3d 682, 687 (6th Cir. 2001); but see Winkler v. Madison County, 893 F.3d 877, 899–901 (6th Cir. 2018) (noting that Heller and Watkins did not consider instances in which the municipality directly caused the violation, the violation was caused by government officials not named in the complaint, or the violation was caused by a combination of government-sponsored conduct that is not easily traceable to one individual official). Recognizing our unsettled precedent on this issue, because we ultimately conclude that Rayfield's Monell claim fails to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6), we need not resolve this issue as it applies to Rayfield's appeal."); Horton by Horton v. City of Santa Maria, 915 F.3d 592, 604-05 (9th Cir. 2019) ("[M]unicipal defendants may be liable under § 1983 even in situations in which no individual officer is held liable for violating a plaintiff's constitutional rights. As we have previously acknowledged, constitutional deprivations may occur 'not ... as a result of actions of the individual officers, but as a result of the collective inaction' of the municipal defendant. . . Here, a reasonable jury might be able to conclude that Horton suffered a constitutional deprivation 'as a result of the collective inaction' of the Santa Maria Police Department, . . . or of officers' adherence to departmental customs or practices[.] . . . For example, taking the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, a jury might find that the Santa Maria Police Department failed to ensure compliance with its written policy of removing belts from detainees. . . . Second, a reasonable jury might find that the Police Department failed to assure proper monitoring of its security cameras. . . . We do not decide whether any of these specific acts or omissions, or any other, if proven, would give rise to a municipal constitutional violation. Rather, our inquiry into the Monell claims at this stage is purely jurisdictional. For that purpose, we conclude that our holding that Officer Brice is entitled to qualified immunity does not preclude the possibility that a constitutional violation may nonetheless have taken place, including as a result of the collective acts or omissions of Santa Maria Police Department officers."); Evans v. City of Helena-West Helena, Arkansas, 912 F.3d 1145, 1146 (8th Cir. 2019) ("While a municipality cannot be held liable without an unconstitutional act by a municipal employee, there is no requirement that the plaintiff establish that an employee who acted unconstitutionally is personally liable. . . So even if the clerk personally has absolute or qualified immunity from suit and damages, that immunity does not foreclose an action against the City if the complaint adequately alleges an unconstitutional policy or custom and an unconstitutional act by the clerk as a city employee."); North v. Cuyahoga County, 754 F. App'x 380, 389-94 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Even if no individual violated North's Eighth Amendment rights, North argues that the County can still be held liable for his injury because its policies and customs caused North to be denied constitutionally adequate medical care. There must be a constitutional violation for a § 1983 claim against a municipality to succeed—if the plaintiff has suffered no constitutional injury, his Monell claim fails. . . A court's finding that an individual defendant is not liable because of qualified immunity, however, does not necessarily foreclose municipal liability. . . .Several other circuits have interpreted Heller to permit municipal liability in certain circumstances where no individual liability is shown. . . . In many cases, a finding that no individual defendant violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights will also mean that the plaintiff has suffered no constitutional violation. In a subset of § 1983 cases, however, the fact that no individual defendant committed a constitutional violation—e.g., acted with deliberate indifference to an inmate's serious medical need—might not necessarily 'require a finding that no constitutional harm has been inflicted upon the victim, nor that the municipality is not responsible for that constitutional harm.'. . .The type of claim North advances—one premised on failure to act rather than affirmative wrongdoing—might fit within this analysis. Assuming that our caselaw allows for such an approach, we consider his affirmative policy or custom and failure-to-train claims in turn. . . . As discussed above, in addition to demonstrating a constitutional violation, a plaintiff pursuing an affirmative policy or custom claim against a municipal entity must (1) show the existence of a policy, (2) connect that policy to the municipality, and (3) demonstrate that his injury was caused by the execution of that policy. . . . This does not require a showing that the municipality acted with deliberate indifference to the risk of constitutional violations. . . Here, however, because North has not demonstrated that any individual jail employee violated his Eighth Amendment right to adequate medical care by acting with deliberate indifference, he must show that the municipality itself, through its acts, policies, or customs, violated his Eighth Amendment rights by manifesting deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. . . . On this record, North has not demonstrated systemic County deficiencies that rise to the level of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . . Although some of the factors relevant in Shadrick are present here, there are also some important differences. In addition to LPNs, the jail employed nurses and medical providers with more advanced training and certifications (e.g., registered nurses (RNs), nurse practitioners (NPs), and physicians) to treat inmates. NPs, like Mirolovich, have Master's degrees in nursing, may assess and treat patients, and practice under a 'collaborative agreement' with a physician. Mirolovich did not recall receiving or reviewing jail policies, but he did receive some training on providing care in the correctional setting during staff meetings. Nurses typically went through a two-week orientation training program when they began working at the jail and received and signed off on having reviewed a copy of the jail policies; policy updates were provided and discussed at staff meetings. There is no evidence that nurses were permitted to use the policies at their discretion or to define the scope of their practice and no indication that nurses or providers refused to provide care unless an inmate requested it. In sum, the County's training program is not so inadequate that failing to provide additional training constitutes deliberate indifference to an obvious risk of injury."); Winkler v. Madison County, 893 F.3d 877, 900-01 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Despite the fact that Watkins [v. City of Battle Creek, 273 F.3d 682 (6th Cir. 2001)] broadly states that the imposition of municipal liability is contingent on a finding of individual liability under § 1983, other cases from this circuit have indicated that the principle might have a narrower application. [Court discusses Epps v. Lauderdale County, 45 F. App'x 332 (6th Cir. 2002) and Garner v. Memphis Police Dep't, 8 F.3d 358, 365 (6th Cir. 1993)] There is no indication that Watkins considered any of the situations discussed in Epps or Garner when it stated that municipal liability is contingent on a finding of individual liability. And the only case relied on by Watkins for that proposition, City of Los Angeles v. Heller, . . is not nearly so sweeping regarding the scope of Monell liability. . . In fact, several other circuits have considered Heller and concluded that a municipality may be held liable under § 1983 in certain cases where no individual liability is shown. [collecting cases] But we need not decide whether, under our court's precedent, a municipality's liability under § 1983 is always contingent on a finding that an individual defendant is liable for having committed a constitutional violation. Even if we assume a negative answer to that question, Winkler has not presented facts from which a jury could find that the County had a policy or custom that caused a violation of Hacker's constitutional right to adequate medical care."); Winger v. City of Garden Grove, 690 F. App'x 561, 563 (9th Cir. 2017) ("We affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to the City of Garden Grove on Winger's Monell claim. . . The district court erred in concluding that municipalities can never be held liable absent constitutional violations by the individual defendants. See Gibson v. Cty. of Washoe, 290 F.3d 1175, 1186 n.7 (9th Cir. 2002) overruled on other grounds by Castro, 833 F.3d at 1076. We nonetheless affirm, as Winger provided little evidence that the city's training of police and fire personnel were inadequate. Winger relies almost exclusively on the report of her expert, which criticized the behavior of the individual officers, not the city's policies. The alleged inadequacies of the city do not rise to the level of unconstitutional deliberate indifference for a failure to train."); Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Dept., 604 F.3d 293, 304, 305 (7th Cir. 2009) ("The testimony at trial leads us to conclude that the jury had a sufficient basis to find a widespread practice of CMTs failing to collect medical request forms, and that this failure caused Smith's death. Furthermore, we find unpersuasive the County's argument that it cannot be held liable under Monell because none of its employees were found to have violated Smith's constitutional rights. In support of its argument, the County cites Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796 (1986). . . . The County, in this case, appears to push for a rule that requires individual officer liability before a municipality can ever be held liable for damages under Monell. This is an unreasonable extension of Heller. What if the plaintiff here had only sued the County, or didn't know, because of some breakdown in recording shifts, who the CMTs on duty were? The actual rule, as we interpret it, is much narrower: a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict. . . So, to determine whether the County's liability is dependent on its officers, we look to the nature of the constitutional violation, the theory of municipal liability, and the defenses set forth. . . The plaintiff in this case alleged that the failure to respond to Smith's medical requests caused his death and violated his right to due process. The jury instructions on the claim listed three elements, each of which the jury had to find by a preponderance of the evidence: "1. Norman Smith had a serious medical need; 2. [t]he [d]efendant was deliberately indifferent to Norman Smith's serious medical need; and 3.[t]he [d]efendant's conduct caused harm to Norman Smith." (emphasis added). Based on these instructions, the jury could have found that the CMTs were not deliberately indifferent to Smith's medical needs, but simply could not respond adequately because of the well-documented breakdowns in the County's policies for retrieving medical request forms. It is not difficult to reconcile the verdicts in this instance, and we see nothing amiss in holding the County liable even though none of the CMTs were individually responsible."); Willis v. Neal, 2007 WL 2616918, at *8, *9 (6th Cir. 2007)(Dowd, J., dissenting) ("I read Heller to prohibit municipal liability only when the victim suffers no constitutional injury at all, not when the victim fails to trace that constitutional injury to an individual police officer. . . . My concern is focused on what may be the separate official policies of the City of Dunlap, Sequatchie County, and Rhea County, to permit their law enforcement personnel to participate in 'takedowns' by the Task Force without any attempt to ascertain for themselves whether there is a factual basis to believe there is probable cause for an arrest. . . . In my view, the problem here is not so much what happened at the airport but what happened at a policy level before October 7, 2003. As explained above, it is the apparent policy of these governmental entities to permit their officers and deputies to rather blindly participate in activities initiated by the Task Force without any independent assurance that there is a factual basis for those activities."); Gray v. City of Detroit, 399 F.3d 612, 617-19 (6th Cir. 2005) ("When an officer violates a plaintiff's rights that are not 'clearly established,' but a city's policy was the 'moving force' behind the constitutional violation, the municipality may be liable even though the individual officer is immune. . . . It is arguable, therefore, that the District Court erred in its conclusion that '[i]f no constitutional violation by the individual defendants is established, the municipal defendants cannot be held liable under § 1983.' Assuming for the sake of argument that this Circuit permits a municipality to be held liable in the absence of any employee's committing a constitutional violation, the remaining question for us then is whether the City's policy makers' decisions regarding suicide prevention were themselves constitutional violations, as plaintiff contends. . . . A municipality may be liable under § 1983 where the risks from its decision not to train its officers were 'so obvious' as to constitute deliberate indifference to the rights of its citizens. . . As applied to suicide claims, the case law imposes a duty on the part of municipalities to recognize, or at least not to ignore, obvious risks of suicide that are foreseeable. Where such a risk is clear, the municipality has a duty to take reasonable steps to prevent the suicide. Very few cases have upheld municipality liability for the suicide of a pre-trial detainee. . . . Pre-trial detainees do not have a constitutional right for cities to ensure, through supervision and discipline, that every possible measure be taken to prevent their suicidal efforts. Detainees have a right that city policies, training and discipline do not result in deliberate indifference to foreseeable and preventable suicide attempts. Here, the plaintiff never made any statements that could reasonably be interpreted as threatening to harm himself, and none of his destructive acts were self-directed. There was no indication that he would turn his anger and agitation upon himself. The city's agents complied with city policies regarding medical care. Gray was transferred to the Receiving Hospital because of his physical complaints. He was screened by an intake nurse before being placed in a cell. . . . Plaintiff has documented twenty in-custody deaths, other than Gray's, that occurred in the city's various holding facilities over the eight year period between June 24, 1993, and August 3, 2001. Of these, only two were suicides, with one occurring in 1998 and one in 1999. Plaintiff argues that policymakers failed to adequately discipline or enforce their policies with respect to monitoring, but as of Gray's death no other inmate had ever committed suicide in a Receiving Hospital cell."); Epps v. Lauderdale County, No. 00-6737, 2002 WL 1869434, at *2, *3 (6th Cir. Aug. 13, 2002) (Cole, J., concurring)(unpublished) ("I concur with the majority that this high speed pursuit is governed by County of Sacramento v. Lewis, 523 U.S. 833 (1998), and that Appellants fail to allege facts sufficient to establish individual officer liability for injuries pursuant to the substantive due process doctrine. I also agree that no municipal liability exists in the present case. I write separately, however, to clarify my understanding of City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796 (1986) (per curiam), that a municipality may still be held liable for a substantive due process violation even when the individual officer is absolved of liability. . . . I read Heller to prohibit municipal liability only when the victim suffers no constitutional injury at all, not when the victim fails to trace that constitutional injury to an individual police officer. . . . A given constitutional violation may be attributable to a municipality's acts alone and not to those of its employees − as when a government actor in good faith follows a faulty municipal policy. . . A municipality also may be liable even when the individual government actor is exonerated, including where municipal liability is based on the actions of individual government actors other than those who are named as parties. . . Moreover, it is possible that no one individual government actor may violate a victim's constitutional rights, but that the 'combined acts or omissions of several employees acting under a governmental policy or custom may violate an individual's constitutional rights.'"); Gibson v. County of Washoe, 290 F.3d 1175, 1186 n.7, 1188, 1189 n.9 & n.10 (9th Cir. 2002) ("The municipal defendants . . . assert that if we conclude, as we do, . . . that the individual deputy defendants are not liable for violating Gibson's constitutional rights, then they are correspondingly absolved of liability. Although there are certainly circumstances in which this proposition is correct, . . . it has been rejected as an inflexible requirement by both this court and the Supreme Court. For example, a municipality may be liable if an individual officer is exonerated on the basis of the defense of qualified immunity, because even if an officer is entitled to immunity a constitutional violation might still have occurred. . . Or a municipality may be liable even if liability cannot be ascribed to a single individual officer. . . And in Fairley v. Luman, 281 F.3d 913 (9th Cir.2002), we explicitly rejected a municipality's argument that it could not be held liable as a matter of law because the jury had determined that the individual officers had inflicted no constitutional injury. . .In any event, in this case, the constitutional violations for which we hold the County may be liable occurred before the actions of the individual defendants at the jail, so the County is not being held liable for what those deputies did. The County's violations . . . involved the decision to commit Gibson to the custody of the jail deputies despite his mental illness, and to do so with no direction to treat that illness while he was in jail or to handle him specially because of it. . . . When viewed in the light most favorable to Ms. Gibson, the record demonstrates that the County's failure to respond to Gibson's urgent need for medical attention was a direct result of an affirmative County policy that was deliberately indifferent, under the Farmer standard, to this need. . . Because that is so, we do not address whether it is necessary to prove the subjective Farmer state of mind in suits against entities rather than individuals. . . . [T]he Supreme Court has commented that it is difficult to determine the subjective state of mind of a government entity. . . This statement does not, however, preclude the possibility that a municipality can possess the subjective state of mind required by Farmer. First, it is certainly possible that a municipality's policies explicitly acknowledge that substantial risks of serious harm exist. Second, numerous cases have held that municipalities act through their policymakers, who are, of course, natural persons, whose state of mind can be determined. . . .To find the County liable under Farmer, the County must have (1) had a policy that posed a substantial risk of serious harm to Gibson; and (2) known that its policy posed this risk."); Fairley v. Luman, 281 F.3d 913, 916, 917 (9th Cir. 2002) (per curiam) ("The City claims the Supreme Court's decision in City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796 (1986), and this court's decisions in Scott v. Henrich, 39 F.3d 912 (9th Cir.1994), and Quintanilla v. City of Downey, 84 F.3d 353 (9th Cir.1996), preclude municipal liability as a matter of law under § 1983 when the jury exonerates the individual officers of constitutional wrongdoing. . . . Heller, Scott and Quintanilla control John's excessive force claim. Exoneration of Officer Romero of the charge of excessive force precludes municipal liability for the alleged unconstitutional use of such force. To hold the City liable for Officer Romero's actions, we would have to rely on the § 1983 respondeat superior liability specifically rejected by Monell. However, these decisions have no bearing on John's Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment claims against the City for arrest without probable cause and deprivation of liberty without due process. These alleged constitutional deprivations were not suffered as a result of actions of the individual officers, but as a result of the collective inaction of the Long Beach Police Department. . . . The district court did not err by denying the City's motion for' judgment as a matter of law on the Monell claim based on the jury's exoneration of the individual officers alone. If a plaintiff establishes he suffered a constitutional injury by the City, the fact that individual officers are exonerated is immaterial to liability under § 1983. . . Otherwise, municipal liability may attach where a constitutional deprivation is suffered as a result of an official city policy but no individual officer is named as a defendant, see City of Canton, but not where named individual officers are exonerated but a constitutional deprivation was in fact suffered. In either case, a constitutional deprivation − the touchstone of § 1983 liability − was a consequence of city policy."); Speer v. City of Wynne, 276 F.3d 980, 985-87 (8th Cir. 2002) ("Our court has previously rejected the argument that Heller establishes a rule that there must be a finding that a municipal employee is liable in his individual capacity as a predicate to municipal liability. . . . The appropriate question under Heller is whether a verdict or decision exonerating the individual governmental actors can be harmonized with a concomitant verdict or decision imposing liability on the municipal entity. The outcome of the inquiry depends on the nature of the constitutional violation alleged, the theory of municipal liability asserted by the plaintiff, and the defenses set forth by the individual actors. We do not suggest that municipal liability may be sustained where there has been no violation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights as a result of action by the municipality's officials or employees. Cf. Trigalet v. City of Tulsa, 239 F.3d 1150, 1156 (10th Cir.2001) (concluding that a municipality may be held liable only if the conduct of its employees directly caused a violation of a plaintiff's constitutional rights); Schulz v. Long, 44 F.3d 643, 650 (8th Cir.1995) ("It is the law in this circuit ... that a municipality may not be held liable on a failure to train theory unless an underlying Constitutional violation is located."). After all, a municipality can act only through its officials and employees. However, situations may arise where the combined actions of multiple officials or employees may give rise to a constitutional violation, supporting municipal liability, but where no one individual's actions are sufficient to establish personal liability for the violation. . . . The district court's decision to impose liability on the City here is potentially reconcilable with its judgment in favor of Mayor Green. The district court found that Mayor Green publicized the allegations against Speer, but the constitutional violation accrues only when an employee is denied the opportunity to clear his name. It is possible, for instance, that the district court relied on the fact that some other city official or officials with final employment-policymaking authority (such as the city council) refused Speer the opportunity to clear his name. If so, Mayor Green's conduct would have been insufficient to support individual liability, yet the City would be liable for the act of its policymaker who did deny Speer that opportunity. Municipal liability may attach based on the single act or decision of a municipal decisionmaker if the decisionmaker possesses final authority to establish municipal policy over the subject matter in question. . . It may also be possible that the district court found that a final policymaker ratified the decision to discharge Speer without a hearing, which could also form the basis for municipal liability. . . . Because the district court did not make findings concerning which City policymakers violated Speer's rights and did not make specific conclusions of law concerning the theory of municipal liability supporting its judgment against the City, we cannot say with any certainty that the court's decisions can or cannot be harmonized. We therefore find it necessary to remand this case to the district court to make specific findings of fact and conclusions of law explaining the basis for the City's liability and explaining the basis for Mayor Green's dismissal."); Kneipp v. Tedder, 95 F.3d 1199, 1213 (3d Cir. 1996) ("The precedent in our circuit requires the district court to review the plaintiffs' municipal liability claims independently of the section 1983 claims against the individual police officers, as the City's liability for a substantive due process violation does not depend upon the liability of any police officer."); Chew v. Gates, 27 F.3d 1432, 1438 (9th Cir. 1994) ("A judgment that [police officer] is not liable for releasing [police dog], given all of the circumstances, would not preclude a judgment that by implementing a policy of training and using the police dogs to attack unarmed, non-resisting suspects, including [plaintiff], the remaining defendants caused a violation of [plaintiff's] constitutional rights. Supervisorial liability may be imposed under section 1983 notwithstanding the exoneration of the officer whose actions are the immediate or precipitating cause of the constitutional injury."); Fagan v. City of Vineland, 22 F.3d 1283, 1292 (3d Cir. 1994) (Fagan I) (holding, in context of "a substantive due process case arising out of a police pursuit, an underlying constitutional tort can still exist even if no individual police officer violated the Constitution . . . . A finding of municipal liability does not depend automatically or necessarily on the liability of any police officer. Even if an officer's actions caused death or injury, he can only be liable under section 1983 and the Fourteenth Amendment if his conduct 'shocks the conscience.' [footnote omitted] The fact that the officer's conduct may not meet that standard does not negate the injury suffered by the plaintiff as a result. If it can be shown that the plaintiff suffered that injury, which amounts to deprivation of life or liberty, because the officer was following a city policy reflecting the city policymakers' deliberate indifference to constitutional rights, then the City is directly liable under section 1983 for causing a violation of the plaintiff's Fourteenth Amendment rights. The pursuing police officer is merely the causal conduit for the constitutional violation committed by the City."); Simmons v. City of Philadelphia, 947 F.2d 1042, 1058-65 (3d Cir. 1991) (no inconsistency in jury's determination that police officer's actions did not amount to constitutional violation, while city was found liable under § 1983 on theory of policy of deliberate indifference to serious medical needs of intoxicated and potentially suicidal detainees and failure to train officers to detect and meet such needs); Parrish v. Luckie, 963 F.2d 201, 207 (8th Cir. 1992) ("A public entity or supervisory official may be liable under § 1983, even though no government individuals were personally liable."); Rivas v. Freeman, 940 F.2d 1491, 1495-96 (11th Cir. 1991) (Sheriff found liable in his official capacity for failure to train officers regarding identification techniques and failure to properly account for incarcerated suspects, while deputies' actions which flowed from lack of procedures were deemed mere negligence); Gibson v. City of Chicago, 910 F.2d 1510, 1519 (7th Cir. 1990) (dismissal of claim against officer on grounds that he did not act under color of state law not dispositive of claim against City where allegations of municipal policy of allowing mentally unfit officers to retain service revolvers).

See also Donahue for Estate of McIntyre v. Borough of Collingdale, No. CV 22-1695, 2024 WL 387455, at *1, *7, *9, *11-12 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 1, 2024) ("High-speed police pursuits, however necessary for law enforcement, also pose an incredible danger to the public. This danger is not new. In the last forty-five years over 11,500 people have lost their lives as a result of a pursuit, . . . averaging several hundred deaths per year . . . The need for police training and proper departmental policy is self-evident, reported, . . . and of great concern to law enforcement. . . At summary judgment, this Court confronts two distinct questions. First, did the officers' behavior, in choosing to engage in this high-speed pursuit, 'shock the conscience?' And second, regardless of officer liability, did the municipalities demonstrate deliberate indifference to the public, by allowing a custom of reckless pursuits or failing to train officers on police pursuits, that caused Plaintiffs' injuries? As to question one, the officers are entitled to summary judgment because they did not intend to harm McIntyre or Munafo while pursuing an actively fleeing suspect. However, the claims against the municipal Defendants will proceed to trial. Genuine disputes over three material facts require this decision. Because the municipalities were on notice of prior dangerous pursuits that may have violated their pursuit policies, the municipalities took no remedial action—investigation, discipline, or retraining—after these prior pursuits, and the municipalities may have failed to provide any meaningful training to their officers for when to engage in high-speed pursuits, a jury must decide if their actions, as established at a trial in this case, constituted deliberate indifference to the public's wellbeing. . . . This Court recognizes that Fagan I has triggered much commentary, including from the Third Circuit, since its publication. . . Yet grumblings are not grounds for reversal. To the contrary, the Third Circuit has confirmed that a municipality may be 'independently liable for a substantive due process violation' even when no officer is liable since Fagan I. . . And most recently, the Court reaffirmed that municipal liability is cognizable, even when officer liability is not, so long as its finding would not create an 'inconsistent verdict.' . . Following Fagan I, because the level of 'shocks the conscience' culpability is different for officers and municipalities in police pursuit cases, municipal liability is not inconsistent with granting summary judgment for the officers. . . . Between 2013 and this incident, Collingdale disclosed involvement in 26 vehicle pursuits. . . Darby disclosed involvement 30 to 35 vehicle pursuits. . . . Moreover, Darby designee and current Police Chief Joseph Gabe testified that the several of Darby's past incidents, based on the police reports transcribing the events, violated the pursuit policy. . . . Neither Collingdale nor Darby recalled providing any formal training on pursuit decision-making or driving beyond giving officers the written policies. . . In Police Academy officers learned how to maneuver their vehicles, including how to pursue suspects. . . However, the State training did not include, and the Boroughs could remember, conducting any training for deciding when to pursue beyond providing the written policy. . . Neither Borough could recall any post-pursuit reviews, investigation, or discipline for any of the pursuits between 2013 and 2020. . . Additionally, both Boroughs had failed to follow Pennsylvania law that requires police departments report all vehicle pursuits to a state-wide database prior to this incident. . . Darby did not report any of its pursuits. . . Collingdale reported four. . . . [V]iewing the record in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the Boroughs failed to provide any training on when or how to conduct vehicle pursuits beyond, at most, providing officers with the written documents. Collingdale and Darby's pursuit policy 'training' consisted of handing officers hundreds of pages of police procedure, which included the pursuit policy, and telling them to read it. . . While officers received classroom training on how to operate a vehicle during a pursuit at police academy, no evidence suggests they received any corresponding training for when to initiate a pursuit. Justice O'Connor's oft-repeated scenario reflects this exact point. In Harris, she explained that a municipality, 'arm[ing] its officers with firearms,' would be liable if they did not also train them on when to deploy force. . . Considering the uncontested danger high-speed pursuits pose to the public, no matter how deftly an officer operates his vehicle, inadequate training on when to pursue predictably leads to injury. . . .Altogether, a reasonable jury could find the past pursuits, and the Boroughs' lack of remedial actions in their wake, established a custom of authorizing pursuits with a deliberate indifference to the dangers they presented. Similarly, the history of pursuits and resulting damage may have put the Boroughs on notice that training was woefully inadequate to protect the publics' constitutional rights, such that failure to act evinced a deliberate indifference to them. Based on this same history of potential violations, their predictable recurrence, and the Boroughs' refusal to take any remediation, a jury could conclude the custom and failure to train caused and were the moving forces behind the officers' policy violations, and, consequently, Plaintiffs' injuries."); Taylor v. Comanche County Facilities Authority, No. CIV-18-55-G, 2020 WL 6991010, at *5 n.5 (W.D. Okla. Nov. 25, 2020) ("Contrary to Defendants' suggestion, there is no per se rule 'requir[ing] individual officer liability before a municipality can ... be held liable for damages under Monell.' Thomas v. Cook Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 604 F.3d 293, 305 (7th Cir. 2010); see also Cordova v. City of Albuquerque, No. Civ. 11-806-GBW/ACT, 2013 WL 12040727, at *4 (D.N.M. Feb. 22, 2013). Indeed, 'municipal liability can exist if a jury finds that a constitutional injury is due to a municipal policy, custom, or practice, but also finds that no officer is individually liable for the violation.' Barnett v. MacArthur, 956 F.3d 1291, 1301 (11th Cir. 2020), petition for cert. filed, No. 20-595 (U.S. Nov. 5, 2020); accord Garcia v. Salt Lake Cnty., 768 F.2d 303, 310 (10th Cir. 1985)."); Byrne v. City of Chicago, 447 F.Supp.3d 707, 712-13 (N.D. Ill. 2019) ("The complaint alleges a constitutional violation. The Due Process Clause protects bodily integrity against 'very serious battery.'. . Byrne alleges that she was shot, . . . resulting in 'serious and permanent … traumatic facial injuries,'. . . with 'pieces of [her] jaw, tongue, teeth, and cheek … splattered' about[.]. . That qualifies as a 'very serious battery' for purposes of the due process component of her Monell claim. . . . As the City observes, Byrne alleges in the alternative that she shot herself at Schuler's prodding. . . But even if it would not have violated due process or the Fourth Amendment to prod Byrne to shoot herself, Rule 8(d)(2) allows Byrne to plead in the alternative and provides that where, as here, 'a party makes alternative statements, the pleading is sufficient if any one of them is sufficient.'. . .The complaint also adequately alleges that an official policy or custom of the City was the moving force behind the constitutional violation. Byrne alleges that the City failed (1) to discourage and to disallow a code of silence amongst CPD officers . . . ; (2) to investigate CPD misconduct adequately and impartially. . . ; (3) to implement an early warning system to detect and intervene with corrective measures for potentially dangerous officers. . . ; (4) to re-train or to discipline officers accused of misconduct. . . ; and (5) to terminate problematic officers[.] The complaint further alleges that those policies and practices were the moving force behind Byrne's injuries because they 'caused [Schuler] to act with impunity and to feel and act as though his acts of misconduct would go unpunished and uninvestigated.'. . These allegations suffice to forestall dismissal at the pleading stage. . . . The City retorts that it cannot be held liable under Monell because Schuler did not act under color of state law. . . This argument fails to recognize that, for purposes of Monell liability, the pertinent state action is the City's, not Schuler's. That is precisely why the 'conclusion that [an officer] did not act under color of state law does not permit summary judgment on [a] municipal liability claim.' Gibson, 910 F.2d at 1519. As the Seventh Circuit explained: 'On a municipal liability claim, the City policy itself must cause the constitutional deprivation. Therefore, the municipality itself is the state actor and its action in maintaining the alleged policy at issue supplies the "color of law" requirement under § 1983.'. . . DeShaney is inapposite. While the municipality in DeShaney was alleged to have failed to act to prevent private violence, Byrne alleges that the City acted by implementing unofficial policies and customs that put Schuler in a position to injure her. . . In any event, DeShaney acknowledged that it had nothing to say about Monell. . . In the end, the complaint alleges 'that an official policy or custom … caused [a] constitutional violation, [and] was the moving force behind [the violation].'. . That suffices to state a Monell claim."); Gardner v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Dept., No. 2:17-CV-00352-PAL, 2019 WL 1923634, at *13 (D. Nev. Apr. 29, 2019) ("In this case, NaphCare argues that Gordon does not apply because the newly announced standard only applies to claims against individual defendants. However, Gordon explicitly rejected this argument. Gordon involved claims against both individuals and municipal entities, and it overturned summary judgment on the Monell claim as improper in light of the new standard. The Ninth Circuit recently addressed Gordon's applicability to municipal entities in Crowell v. Cowlitz County, 726 F. App'x. 593 (9th Cir. 2018) (unpublished). Crowell noted that Gordon's new standard for deliberate indifference claims against individual defendants bears on a municipal liability claim 'because, under its newly-announced standard for individual liability, [plaintiffs] may be able to show that one or more individuals violated their rights by exhibiting "reckless disregard" for their well-being, and that those violations are attributable to Defendants.'. . As Crowell explained, a municipal entity can be liable under § 1983 even when a plaintiff does not sue an individual defendant if the plaintiff shows (1) one or more individuals violated his rights by exhibiting 'reckless disregard' for his well-being, and (2) those violations are attributable to the municipal entity."); Igwe v. Skaggs, 258 F.Supp.3d 596, 609 (W.D. Pa. 2017) ("In this Circuit, a municipality may be independently liable even where none of its employees are liable. . . Under Fagan, a municipality 'can independently violate the Constitution if it has a policy, practice, or custom of deliberate indifference that causes the deprivation of some constitutional right through the actions of an officer, the "causal conduit."'. . Mr. Igwe bases his Monell claim on a failure to train and failure to supervise based on Officer Skaggs's culpability as well as under a Fagan theory of liability. We find genuine issues of material fact preclude summary judgment including Officer Skaggs's subjective belief to determine the culpability standard for conscience shocking behavior required to prove a Monell claim and whether Monroeville failed to train its officers on how to operate their police vehicles when responding in 'Emergency Response mode' as distinguished from pursuit."); Igwe v. Skaggs, 2017 WL 395745, at *7-8 (W.D. Pa. Jan. 30, 2017) ("While Officer Skaggs is entitled to qualified immunity from the § 1983 substantive due process claim, our Court of Appeals requires we independently review Monroeville's liability in the context of a substantive due process claim for injuries sustained in high-speed police chases. . . The Court of Appeals adopts this independent standard with the understanding '[a] municipality would escape liability whenever the conduct of the acting police officer did not meet the "shocks the conscience" standard, even though municipal policymakers, acting with deliberate indifference or even malice, implemented a policy which dictated his injury-causing actions.'. . Mr. Igwe's claims arise directly from injuries arising out of a high-speed police pursuit. Our Court of Appeals holds, in the police pursuit context, a municipality may be held independently liable 'for a substantive due process violation even in situations where none of its employees are liable.'. . Monroeville can independently violate the Constitution if it 'has a policy, practice or custom of deliberate indifference that causes the deprivation of some constitutional right through the actions of an officer, the "causal conduit."'. .Mr. Igwe alleges Monroeville had a policy, practice or custom resulting in it being deliberately indifferent to a serious risk of Officers Skaggs, Supancic or others of depriving other individuals of their life or liberty interest. An officer depriving an individual of such an interest may act as a conduit through which Monroeville caused constitutional harm. . . We recognize our Court of Appeals' view in Fagan is not followed by other Courts of Appeals, . . . but we are guided by our Court of Appeals and its specific direction the '[c]ity's policymakers, with a wealth of information available to them, are fully aware of those dangers but deliberately refuse to require proper training. The officer may escape liability because this conduct did not "shock the conscience." It does not follow, however, that the city should also escape liability. The city caused the officer to deprive the plaintiff of his liberty; the city therefore has violated the plaintiff's Fourteenth Amendment rights.'. . Mr. Igwe specifically alleges Monroeville, while implementing a pursuit policy, did not implement or provide training on how its officers should operate their police cars when responding to an incident which does not involve pursuit. He further alleges, even if they were in a high-speed police pursuit, the officers through custom and habit, routinely ignore Monroeville's written pursuit policy and Monroeville does not supervise, enforce or discipline officers who 'routinely flouted and ignored the written policies with impunity....'. . .Igwe also pleads Monroeville's § 1983 Monell liability extends to failing to implement a policy which established the maximum speed of which it was safe for police vehicles to approach an Opticom controlled intersection to ensure the Opticom system operated as designed. Igwe further pleads Monroeville failed to train its officers to proceed at an appropriate speed to guarantee the Opticom system would pre-empt the traffic signal and turn the signal green in favor of the emergency vehicle as it approached the intersection. Igwe specifically pleads Officer Supancic proceeded through at least seven (7) intersections against red traffic signals and Officer Skaggs proceeded through at least two (2) intersections against red traffic signals and, as of December 8, 2014, Monroeville had exhibited a custom and practice of acquiescing such conduct resulting in a failure to properly supervise and arguing Monroeville's conduct is deliberately indifferent to Ms. Robinson's life and well-being. These specific allegations under our Court of Appeals' guidance in Fagan, require further discovery into Igwe's Monell supervisory liability claim against Monroeville."); Smith v. Burge, 222 F.Supp.3d 669, 689-90 (N.D. Ill. 2016) ("Plaintiff has plausibly alleged violations of his Fourteenth Amendment and Fifth Amendment rights under the federal pleading standards. Moreover, Plaintiff alleges that the CPD had a de facto pattern and practice of systemic torture and physical abuse of African-American suspects at Area 2, including the use of cattle prods, electric shock boxes, plastic bags, telephone books, nightsticks, and shotguns; that certain Defendants supervised, encouraged, sanctioned, condoned, and ratified brutality and torture by other CPD detectives; and that Defendants' torture and abuse caused Plaintiff to falsely confess to crimes that he did not commit. . . Examining these facts and all reasonable inferences in Plaintiff's favor, he has plausibly alleged a Monell claim under the dictates of Iqbal and Twombly. Despite Plaintiff's well-pleaded allegations, the City argues that because Plaintiff has failed to state an actionable constitutional violation, it cannot be liable under Monell citing Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796, 106 S.Ct. 1571, 89 L.Ed.2d 806 (1986). Over six years ago, the Seventh Circuit rejected the argument that Heller requires individual officer liability before a municipality can ever be held liable for under Monell. See Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Dept., 604 F.3d 293, 305 (7th Cir. 2010). Instead, the Seventh Circuit construed the Heller holding more narrowly, namely, 'a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.'. . The City has failed to address this distinction. Because Plaintiff has plausibly alleged his Monell claim under the federal pleading standards and the City has failed to address the Thomas distinction, the Court denies the City's motion to dismiss Count IV of the Complaint."); Brown v. Novacek, No. 1:14-CV-00988, 2014 WL 5762952, at *7-8 (M.D. Pa. Nov. 5, 2014) ("According to Defendants, Plaintiff must show that Novacek's actions 'shocked the conscience' in order to establish a constitutional violation, and that absent a showing that Novacek himself committed a constitutional violation, the municipality cannot be held liable under Section 1983. . . Defendants' position, while consistent with the law in other jurisdictions, is not an accurate statement of jurisprudence in the Third Circuit. Elsewhere, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit has held that a Section 1983 substantive due process claim for failure-to-train 'cannot be maintained against a governmental employer in a case where there is no underlying constitutional violation by the employee.' Young v. City of Mt. Ranier, 238 F.3d 567, 579 (4th Cir.2001). The United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, however, has repeatedly come to the opposite conclusion . . . . Because the law in the Third Circuit does not require a plaintiff to show a constitutional violation on the part of the individual employee in substantive due process failure-to-train claims based on Section 1983, Plaintiff need not do so here."); Barrow v. City of Chicago, 13 C 8779, 2014 WL 4477945, *3 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 11, 2014) ("The City specifically argues that because the Court dismissed Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claims as untimely and Plaintiff's Brady claim as untenable, there is no underlying constitutional violations supporting Plaintiff's Monell claim. It appears that the City is arguing that the Court must dismiss Plaintiff's Monell claim because the City's liability is contingent on the individual officers' liability, an argument the Seventh Circuit rejected in Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Dep't . . . . That being said, accepting Plaintiff's well-pleaded facts and all reasonable inferences as true, Plaintiff has failed to cure the pleading deficiencies that the Court pointed out in its April 21, 2014, Order. In particular, although Plaintiff sets forth general allegations for a failure to train claim pursuant to City of Canton. . . a failure to train claim is not a stand alone constitutional violation. . . Instead, allegations of a failure to train supply a basis for municipal liability claims. . . As such, Plaintiff must sufficiently allege an underlying constitutional deprivation connected with the City's failure to train, which he has failed to do. Specifically, although Plaintiff alleges police misconduct in relation to security guards arrested for AUUW, he does not supply any details or explain how this misconduct constitutes a constitutional deprivation. The Court therefore grants the City's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's Monell claim without prejudice and grants Plaintiff leave to file an amended Monell claim. The Court will not grant Plaintiff further leave to amend this claim if Plaintiff does not properly allege a Monell claim in his Second Amended Complaint."); Washington-Pope v. City of Philadelphia, 979 F.Supp.2d 544, 573-80 (E.D. Pa. 2013) ("The issue that the Supreme Court has not addressed . . . is whether municipal liability may lie independent of proof that a municipal employee violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. In the Third Circuit, it may: 'It is possible for a municipality to be held independently liable for a substantive due process violation even in situations where none of its employees are liable.' Brown v. Commw. of Pa. Dep't of Health Emergency Med. Servs. Training Inst., 318 F.3d 473, 482 (3d Cir.2003) (citing Fagan v. City of Vineland (Fagan I), 22 F.3d 1283, 1292 (3d Cir.1994)). . . .Ms. Washington–Pope has argued that Fagan applies to her facts. At this stage of the litigation, without more, the Court must agree and allow discovery to continue. If Officer Bailey's conduct deprived Ms. Washington–Pope of her liberty (not to mention the obvious—that it risked her life), then even if Officer Bailey was in a diabetic trance precluding him from developing any intent, and so did not himself violate Ms. Washington–Pope's constitutional rights, the City's potential independent liability must be evaluated. The theory, as explained by the Fagan I Court, is that the perpetrating officer, although he does not commit a violation himself, acts as a 'causal conduit for the constitutional violation committed by the City.'. . . The question is whether the City itself has committed an independent constitutional violation. . . Indeed, Fagan I stands for the proposition that the City can independently violate the Constitution if it has a policy, practice, or custom of deliberate indifference that causes the deprivation of some constitutional right through the actions of an officer, the 'causal conduit.' If, as Ms. Washington–Pope alleges, the City had a policy, practice, or custom pursuant to which it was deliberately indifferent to a serious risk that Officer Bailey or diabetic officers like him might deprive other individuals of their life or liberty interests, and an officer does deprive an individual of such an interest, then those officers will have acted as a conduit through which the City caused constitutional harm. . . . Even if Ms. Washington–Pope, like the plaintiffs in Heller and Grazier, had not presented substantive due process claims against both Officer Bailey and the City, Grazier is at best inapposite. It is difficult to escape the tautological maze of the Grazier opinion—because there is no constitutional violation, there can be no constitutional violation. Grazier thus stands for the proposition that if the police officers did not use Fourth Amendment excessive force, the City cannot be liable for causing them to use excessive force (or, presumably, for using excessive force through them). But the case that the Grazier Court did not confront, and which would be analogous here, would be if the police officers there had, in a health-related trance, used excessive force but had done so unintentionally, such that they could not be individually liable, whereas the City had a custom, policy, or practice pursuant to which it was deliberately indifferent to the known risk of such conduct by officers with such significant chronic conditions, including the named individual defendants, under its command. That this scenario may sound factually unlikely does not mean it would not lead to liability as a matter of law under Fagan I. By contrast, the Fagan I Court was dealing with a more plausible scenario, in which the distance between what the officers had done and what the City had done could render the City liable even if the officers were not. Indeed, the ostensible reason that an officer can serve as a causal conduit while not committing a constitutional violation in his own right is that the standards for individual officers and municipalities differ—'shocks the conscience' for the former and deliberate indifference for the latter. . . Although the Fagan I Court was not confronted with a scenario, like the one here, in which the individual officer did not violate the Constitution because he did not act under color of law (or, if a jury were to so find, because he lacked the requisite intent to effectuate a Fourth Amendment seizure or even 'shock the conscience'), its rationale is broad enough to encompass Ms. Washington–Pope's claim, where there was no violation by an individual officer because he did not act under color of law. . . .[T]he Third Circuit Court of Appeals appears not to have been confronted with a case in which a constitutional harm cognizable under any other amendment (say, the Fourth) has been established in all respects except for an intent or color of law element. Such cases would be distinct from Heller and Grazier, in which juries found that no constitutional harm at all was caused because space for independent municipal liability would potentially exist for a finding that the City's deliberate indifference, through a policy, custom, or practice, caused the constitutionally violative behavior by the individual officers. In any case, notwithstanding any persuasive power the City's effort to distinguish Fagan I might have, Ms. Washington–Pope's Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claim against Officer Bailey also means that even if the Third Circuit Court of Appeals would limit the Fagan doctrine in the hypothetical circumstances described above, it still applies here. Though Fagan I has been criticized, . . . and several other courts of appeals, declining to follow it, have thereby created a circuit split,. . . Fagan I remains the law of this Circuit. . . .For these reasons, the Court denies the City's Motion for Summary Judgment—more specifically, Section C of its Motion—with prejudice because it is an incorrect account of the governing law. Further discovery will determine whether Ms. Washington–Pope has raised a triable issue of fact. To prevail on her Fourteenth Amendment independent municipal liability claim, she will ultimately have to prove that the City had a policy or custom of failing to train or supervise as well as 'a direct causal link between [that] municipal policy or custom and the alleged constitutional deprivation.'"); Pacheco v. Toledo-Davila, No. 10–1480 (ADC), 2013 WL 4017885, *5 (D.P.R. Aug. 6, 2013) ("Here, Sgt. Rosario, at the time of Andrades's murder, had been summarily suspended from his position with the POPR. He, like the officer in Gibson, thus lacked the authority to use any police power, much less misuse it. As such, he was not acting under color of state law, and his actions cannot form the basis for the Supervisory Defendants' liability. . . In Gibson, the court, though it dismissed the cause of action against the line officer on 'color of law' grounds, it reversed the district court's grant of summary judgment against the municipality. Gibson v. City of Chicago, 910 F.2d 1510, 1519–20 (7th Cir.1990). It reversed, however, because the plaintiff's theory of municipal liability was premised on a municipal policy claim, not a failure to supervise. . . As to the policy claim, the court correctly held that 'the municipality itself is the state actor,' and there was therefore no 'color of law' problem with regard to the municipality. . .The matter is discussed in more detail below, but, among other problems, Plaintiffs never make a policy-type claim that effectively explains how the supposed policy could have actually prevented Sgt. Rosario from committing the crime against Andrades given that Sgt. Rosario had already essentially been removed from the POPR; thus, the claim would fail because no issue of material fact exists as to whether there was an 'affirmative link' between the policy and the harm."); Ott v. City of Milwaukee, No. 09-C-870, 2010 WL 5095305, at *2 (E.D. Wis. Dec. 8, 2010) ("A municipality can be held liable even if its individual officers are not liable or if the officers are granted an affirmative defense, such as qualified immunity. . . Thomas specifically states that a rule requiring individual officer liability before a municipality can ever be held liable for damages under Monell is an unreasonable extension of Heller. . . Even if the individual officers are granted qualified immunity, a municipality may be liable if its customs, policies, or practices may have caused a violation of a plaintiff's constitutional rights. . .The rule in Thomas is narrower than the rule the Defendants adopt from Heller. Thomas states, 'a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.'. . Therefore, to determine whether the City could be liable in this case, even if the individual Defendants are not, the Court must consider the nature of the constitutional violation, the theory of municipal liability, and the defenses set forth. . .Ott alleges that his constitutional rights were violated by employees and agents of the City, including individual Defendants, by withholding exculpatory evidence and fabricating other evidence pursuant to the policies and practices of the City. . . Pursuant to Thomas, it is plausible that the individual Defendants may not be liable, but the City could be held liable if the customs and policies of the municipality were the cause of Ott's constitutional rights being violated. The Defendants have not provided an adequate reason to hold otherwise."); Hunt ex rel. Chiovari v. Dart, 754 F.Supp.2d 952, 974-76, 981 (N.D. Ill. 2010) ("[T]he defendant argues that since the plaintiff hasn't identified any responsible individuals, there can be no constitutional injury and no Monell claim. But there are situations in which a Monell claim can be maintained even when there are no liable officers. An officer might plead qualified immunity as a defense. If successful, it could be found that a 'plaintiff's constitutional rights were indeed violated, but that the officer could not be held liable. In [such a] case, one can still argue that the ... policies caused the harm, even if the officer was not individually culpable.'. . In Thomas, which was a failure-to-provide-medical-treatment case, the jury found the County liable even though it found the medical technicians were not. . . . The Seventh Circuit rejected the County's championing of a rule that would require individual liability before there could be municipal liability in light of just such potentialities. . . The actual rule to be derived from Heller, the court explained, was 'much narrower: a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.'. . The question then becomes whether there was a constitutional injury − or more accurately, whether plaintiff can prove Mr. Hunt suffered a constitutional injury − even though there is no evidence of who, if anyone, caused Mr. Hunt to collapse. . . . [F]or the plaintiff to succeed on the excessive force claim, he must demonstrate that the unidentified Cook County Correctional officers acted 'maliciously and sadistically' to cause Mr. Hunt harm. . . . Without identifying any responsible officer, or providing any admissible evidence regarding what happened to Mr. Hunt or what Mr. Hunt or any officers in the vicinity were doing at the time of Mr. Hunt's collapse, the plaintiff cannot possibly stave off summary judgment on the excessive force claim. There is no way to assess the phantom officer's mental state or the circumstances of the purported use of excessive force. Plaintiff was earlier able to withstand a motion to dismiss premised on this very basis, simply because the time had not yet come to present evidence. It has now. . . . We simply cannot take the leap from Mr. Hunt collapsing and later dying with multiple bruises on his body to an unconstitutional policy of understaffing − or any policy − on the part of the Sheriff without more from plaintiff to fill in the

gap. This is especially true in light of the extensive injuries suffered by the plaintiff five months earlier which resulted in traumatic brain injury, skull fracture, facial fracture, aphasia, and impaired cognition. The Sheriff is entitled to summary judgment on plaintiff's failure to intervene claim."); Marcelle v. City of Allentown, No. 07-CV-4376, 2010 WL 3606405, at *4 n.2 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 16, 2010) ("The City also takes issue with the fact that the court allowed the hiring claim to proceed to a jury even though it found Mr. Guth himself had not engaged in conscience shocking conduct. The court reminds the City that, pursuant to well-settled jurisprudence, the conduct of Mr. Guth was evaluated under a strict 'intent to harm' standard, while the conduct of the City was evaluated under the less demanding 'deliberate indifference' standard."); Wells v. Bureau County, 723 F.Supp.2d 1061, 1083, 1084 (C.D. Ill. 2010) ("The Court is unpersuaded by Defendants argument that there can be no official liability under Monell because none of its employees were found to have violated Wells' constitutional rights. First, allegations that individual officers were deliberately indifferent are evaluated under a subjective awareness standard, while allegations that a municipality was deliberately indifferent are considered under an objective analysis. Farmer, 511 U.S. at 841. Second, the Seventh Circuit has held that 'a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.' Thomas, 604 F.3d at 305. Here, it would not be unreasonable to conclude that the individual defendants were not deliberately indifferent to Wells' safety because they lacked actual knowledge of his imminent intent to harm himself and could not have responded differently because of Sheriff Thompson's policy directing that they not conduct personal observations of the rear cells during the overnight shift or at any other time that there were not two correctional officers on duty. . . This conclusion would be supported by evidence indicating that timely cell-checks were done during the time that at least two correctional officers were present, suggesting that officers would have performed timely cell checks on the overnight shift if staffing had been adequate. . . . It would likewise not be unreasonable to conclude that there was, or should have been, an objective awareness of the risk of harm even if there was no subjective awareness; while insufficient to establish individual liability, objective awareness can form the basis for municipal liability where a risk is obvious. There is arguably a link between the Sheriff's policy and Wells' suicide, as he was left alone and unsupervised for almost eight hours. . . .Where an existing, unconstitutional official policy attributable to a municipal policymaker itself causes injury, proof of a single incident is sufficient to support a finding of liability under Monell. . . After careful consideration, the Court finds that while the causal link is somewhat tenuous, the record is sufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact with respect to whether Sheriff Thompson maintained a policy that sanctioned that maintenance of conditions that infringed upon the constitutional right of prisoners to reasonable safety during their detention. . . In other words, a jury must decide whether Sheriff Thompson's policy was 'deliberately indifferent to [the] known or obvious consequences' of prohibiting correctional officers from observing or checking on detainees for up to eight hours or more at a time."); Bell v. City of Chicago, No. 09 C 4537, 2010 WL 432310, at *2 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 3, 2010) ("The City's reliance on Heller in the instant case is misplaced. In Thomas, the Seventh Circuit specifically addressed the holding in Heller and stated that to interpret the holding in Heller to constitute a 'rule that requires individual officer liability before a municipality can ever be held liable for damages under Monell' is 'an unreasonable extension of Heller.' 588 F.3d at 455. . . . Thus, as Bell correctly points out, it is possible for there to be municipal liability even in the absence of underlying individual liability."); Morales v. City of Jersey City, No. 05-5423 (SRC), 2009 WL 1974164, at *11 (D.N.J July 7, 2009) ("Even if an officer's actions caused death or injury, he can only be liable under section 1983 and the Fourteenth Amendment if his conduct 'shocks the conscience.' The fact that the officer's conduct may not meet that standard does not negate the injury suffered by the plaintiff as a result. If it can be shown that the plaintiff suffered that injury, which amounts to deprivation of life or liberty, because the officer was following a city policy reflecting the city policymakers' deliberate indifference to constitutional rights, then the City is directly liable under section 1983 for causing a violation of the plaintiff's Fourteenth Amendment rights. The pursuing police officer is merely the causal conduit for the constitutional violation committed by the City. Id. (internal citation and footnote omitted). Thus, this Court's finding that, as a matter of law, Plaintiff cannot establish that Officers Sarao and Cook violated the Fourteenth Amendment in failing to provide the medical assistance to which Plaintiff claims a constitutional right does not automatically result in a similar finding that Jersey City cannot be liable for a due process violation in failing to train the officers appropriately."); Arnold v. City of York, 340 F.Supp.2d 550, 552, 553 (M.D. Pa.2004) ("We find that Plaintiffs have properly pled a Section 1983 claim against Defendants by alleging that they acted with deliberate indifference in failing to provide adequate training for handling encounters with mentally ill and emotionally disturbed persons, and that this failure to train resulted in Decedent's death. . . Defendants argue that because Plaintiffs are not suing the individual officers involved in the incident, this fact somehow establishes that the officers did not violate Decedent's constitutional rights and, in turn, the City and its Police Chief cannot be held liable. We disagree. As Magistrate Judge Mannion correctly noted, the Third Circuit has held that a municipality can be liable under Section 1983 and the Fourteenth Amendment for a failure to train its police officers, even if no individual officer violated the Constitution. . . The Third Circuit so held because claims against officers at the scene differ from claims against a municipality in that they 'require proof of different actions and mental states.'. . Even if we were to agree with Defendants' argument that Fagan's holding is on dubious grounds,. . . based on Plaintiffs' allegations and at this early stage in the litigation, we are unwilling to hold that no constitutional violation occurred."); Thomas v. City of Philadelphia, No. Civ.A. 01-CV-2572, 2002 WL 32350019, at *3, *4 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 7, 2002) (not reported) ("In this case, the fact that no individual police officer may be liable under § 1983 for lack of the requisite intent under Lewis does not necessarily mean that Plaintiff has not suffered a constitutional injury for which the municipality may be held independently liable. . . . Other circuit courts have explicitly disagreed with the decision in Fagan regarding independent municipal liability, and some Third Circuit case law subsequent to Fagan appears to cast doubt upon its analysis.Until the Court of Appeals decides to the contrary, however, the Court must follow the law in this circuit as laid out in Fagan.' [footnotes omitted])); Estate of Cills v. Kaftan, 105 F. Supp.2d 391, 402, 403 (D.N.J. 2000) (In the context of a prison suicide case, the court relied on Simmons and Fagan to conclude that Ain the present case, the fact that the Court finds that none of the Low-Level Employees violated Cills' constitutional rights does not preclude the Court from finding that the Department may be independently liable for an unconstitutional policy. . . . A reasonable factfinder could conclude that the absence of qualified mental health personnel who could assist the Department employees in making an assessment of an inmate's suicidal vulnerability was a serious deficiency in the Department's suicide policy that created a serious risk that injury or death would result from an inmate's attempted or successful suicide."); Kurilla v. Callahan, 68 F. Supp.2d 556, 557, 565 (M.D. Pa. 1999) ("I find that the momentary use of force by a school teacher is to be judged by the shocks the conscience standard. I also find that Callahan's conduct, which consisted of striking a blow to Kurilla's chest that resulted in bruising but otherwise did not require medical care, was not so '"brutal" and "offensive to human dignity"' as to shock the judicial conscience. . . . While Callahan's conduct did not violate substantive due [process] standards, Mid-Valley School District may nonetheless be held accountable for having established a policy or custom that caused the injury allegedly sustained by Kurilla. . . . . Consistent with the reasoning of Fagan, Kneipp, and Simmons, Mid-Valley School District may be held liable if it had a custom or policy condoning use of excessive force by teachers that evidenced a deliberate indifference to the student's constitutional rights in bodily integrity protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment."); Burke v. Mahanoy City, 40 F. Supp.2d 274, 285, 286 (E.D. Pa. 1999) ("This court finds that we are required to follow Third Circuit law and examine the possibility of municipal liability under § 1983, although the individual officers have not been held liable in this situation. The present case is close in identity to Fagan because Plaintiff has alleged substantive due process claims. . . Moreover, Plaintiff has also independently alleged constitutional claims against the City, Police Department and Chief of Police. . . . Under either scenario for municipal liability, the deliberate indifference or policy and custom of the municipality must inflict constitutional injury. . . . Thus, the mere existence of a policy of inaction or inadequate training of officers with respect to drinking and disorderly conduct is not actionable under § 1983 if such conduct does not inflict constitutional injury. . . . Even if we accept that the existence of a municipal policy or custom resulted in the failure of individual officers to address the city's problems of underage drinking, loitering and fighting, such municipal inaction cannot be said to inflict constitutional injury. Thus, we need not reach the issue of whether Defendants are subject to Monell liability where, as here, we have concluded that no constitutional right was violated."), aff'd, 213 F.3d 628 (3d Cir. 2000); Gillyard v. Stylios, No. Civ.A. 97-6555, 1998 WL 966010, at 6-8 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 23, 1998) (not reported) ("The City maintains that, if the individual officers are not liable under § 1983, then the municipality is not liable. [citing cases] But in the Third Circuit a municipality can be liable for 'failure to train its police officers with respect to high-speed automobile chases, even if no individual officer participating in the chase violated the Constitution,' [citing Kneipp and Fagan] The City of Philadelphia may be liable for its failure to train police officers with respect to emergency use of their vehicles even if Stylios and Fussell did not individually violate the Constitution for lack of the requisite intent. The Court of Appeals may reexamine municipal liability; language in Lewis casts doubt on the continued tenability of this position. . . But until the Court of Appeals decides to the contrary, this court must follow the clearly established law in this circuit. Defendants correctly assert that there is no municipal liability absent a constitutional violation but that does not mean an individual officer must be liable for that violation. . .A municipal body may violate the Constitution if its policies reflect deliberate indifference towards the constitutional rights of those with whom its agents have contact. . . . The court cannot say that a reasonable jury could not find the City of Philadelphia deliberately indifferent to the harm to private citizens caused by its failure to prevent the reckless driving of its police officers; summary judgment will be denied."); Lawson v. Walp, 4:CV-94-1629, 1995 WL 355733, *4 (M.D. Pa. June 6, 1995) (not reported) ("[A] municipality may be held liable for a policy or failure to train which causes one of its employees to deprive a person of a constitutional right. Regardless of whether the individual employee is liable for the independent constitutional tort or whether the policy itself is unconstitutional, the municipality may be liable under a theory of a substantive due process violation for its policy or failure to train. The elements of the cause of action are: (1) an individual is deprived of a constitutional right (2) through the action of an officer or employee of the municipality (3) caused by (4) a policy or failure to train on the part of the municipality (5) if the policy was implemented with deliberate indifference to constitutional rights."); Carroll v. Borough of State College, 854 F. Supp. 1184, 1195 (M.D. Pa. 1994) ("The absence of individual liability on the part of [defendant police officer] is not a bar to plaintiff's proceeding with his claim against the Borough."), aff'd, 47 F.3d 1160 (3d Cir. 1995); Plasko v. City of Pottsville, 852 F. Supp. 1258, 1265 (E.D. Pa. 1994) ("Although we acknowledge that plaintiff can fail to state a cause of action under Section 1983 as to individual municipal employees while properly pleading a case with respect to the municipality directly, we nonetheless find that this action cannot be maintained against the City on the basis of the bare allegations that Pottsville's safety policies and failure to train officers amount to deliberate indifference to the needs of a detainee."); Andrade v. City of Burlingame, 847 F. Supp. 760, 767 (N.D. Cal. 1994) ("In certain circumstances, a municipality may also be held liable under section 1983 even if no individual employee can be held liable."), aff'd by Marquez v. Andrade, 79 F.3d 1153 (9th Cir. 1996); Fulkerson v. City of Lancester, 801 F. Supp. 1476, 1485 (E.D. Pa. 1992) (acknowledging in high speed pursuit context that "the individual police officer named as a defendant could be a causal conduit for the constitutional violation, without committing such a violation himself."), aff'd, 993 F.2d 876 (3d Cir. 1993) (Table).

Compare Sarmiento v. County of Orange, No. 09–55512, 2012 WL 5838393, *1, *2 & n.2 (9th Cir. Oct. 22, 2012) (not reported) ("Although the jury found that LeFlore and Hernandez did not use excessive force against Sarmiento, this finding does not rule out Orange County's liability under Monell as evidenced by the actions of the other deputies involved. . . The dissent seems to suggest that Sarmiento's inability to identify specifically the agents who harmed him undermines his claim that the County is liable under Monell. Our precedent does not support this view. While we have recognized that a plaintiff cannot establish municipal liability for excessive force 'when the jury exonerates the individual officers of constitutional wrongdoing,' Fairley v. Luman, 281 F.3d 913, 916 (9th Cir.2002), this rule is inapplicable here precisely because the 'exoneration' of LeFlore and Hernandez does not bear on whether the County may be responsible for constitutional wrongdoing by other officers. . . . We disagree with the dissent's apparent conclusion that, because other parts of Sarmiento's proposed verdict form may have contained legal errors, the district court was free to reject it. The question we must address is 'whether the questions in the form were adequate to obtain a jury determination of the factual issues essential to judgment.'. . The district court abused its discretion by preventing the jury from considering plaintiff's argument that the County was liable for the actions of unnamed officers under a 'custom, practice or policy' theory. If Sarmiento's proposed form was indeed 'error-laden,' the appropriate course of action would have been for the district court to correct the errors while leaving intact the correct Monell inquiries—not to substitute its own erroneous form. Because we reverse the judgment in favor of Orange County, the award of costs in favor of Orange County is also reversed.") with Sarmiento v. County of Orange, No. 09–55512, 2012 WL 5838393, *2-*4 (9th Cir. Oct. 22, 2012) (not reported) (Leavy, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part) (I concur in that portion of the majority's disposition that affirms as to certain defendants. I dissent from that portion that reverses as to the County of Orange. I disagree with the majority's conclusion that the district court committed error in rejecting Sarmiento's proposed verdict form. The majority remands for a new trial against Orange County on Sarmiento's claim that 'unnamed deputies,' while acting pursuant to a custom, practice or policy, used unreasonable force. Sarmiento did not articulate this theory of harm by 'unnamed deputies' in the final pretrial order nor did he present this theory at trial. Sarmiento's proposed verdict form contained erroneous questions for the jury. Therefore, the district court properly rejected Sarmiento's proposed verdict form. . . .Plaintiff's first claim is that deputies acted under color of law and that unreasonable force was used. The only persons identified as 'deputies' are Hernandez and LeFlore. No reference is made to unnamed persons in the recitation of plaintiff's first claim for unreasonable force. The second claim is plaintiff's custom, practice, or policy claim against County of Orange, the Orange County Sheriff's Department, and former Sheriff Carona. No deputy is named as an actor, nor is it contended that an unnamed person used unreasonable force. After the allegation that the defendants had a policy of causing, permitting, and/or condoning the use of unreasonable force against jail inmates, it is simply contended that plaintiff sustained damages as a proximate result of defendant County of Orange's custom, practice, or policies. I disagree with the majority's holding that plaintiff should be given a new trial so he can attempt to prove that someone he cannot identify, and never described in the final pretrial order as an unknown person, inflicted unreasonable force on him. . . . If, as the majority holds, plaintiff could recover on the custom, practice, or policy claim by proving that an agent of Orange County other than Hernandez or LeFlore used unreasonable force, it would have been necessary to instruct the jury that plaintiff could recover only if the excessive force was the result of a custom, practice, or policy, and not because of a failure to train, because plaintiff's failure to train claim was limited to damages sustained 'as a proximate result of defendant's failure to train defendant officers.' . . . [A] remand for further proceedings in accordance with the disposition will pose a quandary for the district court because footnote 1 says that Sarmiento intended to pursue the theory that Orange County failed to train its employees. The final pretrial order, however, provides that one of the facts required to be established on plaintiff's failure to train claim is'"that plaintiff sustained damages as a proximate result of defendant's failure to train defendant officers.' Plaintiff does not claim he was damaged as a result of the failure to train anyone else.")

See also Barrett v. Orange County Human Rights Commission, 194 F.3d 341, 349, 350 (2d Cir. 1999) ("Barrett argues that under the Supreme Court's decision in Monell a municipality may be found liable for constitutional violations under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 even if no named individual defendants are found to be liable. He asserts that it was therefore error for the district court to remove the question of municipal liability from the jury once the jury determined that Lee and Colonna were not liable. We agree. Other circuits have recognized that a municipality may be found liable under § 1983 even in the absence of individual liability. [citing cases] We agree with our sister circuits that under Monell municipal liability for constitutional injuries may be found to exist even in the absence of individual liability, at least so long as the injuries complained of are not solely attributable to the actions of named individual defendants. Cf. City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796, 798-99, 106 S.Ct. 1571, 89 L.Ed.2d 806 (1986) (per curiam) (where alleged constitutional injury is caused solely by named individual defendant who is found not liable, municipal liability cannot lie). It is therefore possible that a jury could find the Commission and the County of Orange liable for the alleged violations of Barrett's First Amendment rights even after finding that Lee and Colonna are not liable. Lee and Colonna may have been the most prominent figures in Barrett's termination; they may have issued plaintiff's termination letter. But the Commission is a multi- member body that makes its determinations as a group, and many of the adverse employment actions complained of by Barrett, including the decision to terminate him as Executive Director of the Commission, were taken by the Commission as a whole, not by Lee and Colonna by themselves. It is therefore possible that the defendant commissioners did not as individuals violate Barrett's rights, but that the Commission did."); Sforza v. City of New York, No. 07 Civ. 6122(DLC), 2009 WL 857496, at *9 n.11, *10, *11 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 31, 2009) ("Despite the City's argument, 'municipal liability for constitutional injuries may be found to exist even in the absence of individual liability, at least so long as the injuries complained of are not solely attributable to the actions of named individual defendants.' Barrett v. Orange County Human Rights Comm'n, 194 F.3d 341, 350 (2d Cir.1999). In Barrett, the Second Circuit held that the Human Rights Commission could be liable for infringing Barrett's constitutional rights even though the most prominent members of the Commission, who were named as individual defendants, were found not to be liable. Id. The court reasoned that the Commission was a multi-member body whose decisions were made by a vote of all the members; therefore, its acts could be independent of two of its members and Barrett's alleged injuries were not solely attributable to the actions of the named defendants. Id. . . . . [W]here claims against the individual officers have been dismissed without reaching their merits, it is still possible for a jury to find a constitutional violation for which a municipality may, though its policies, practices, or customs, be liable. . . . The plaintiff has adequately identified a municipal policy and practice for at least some of her claims. The Third Amended Complaint alleges that the customs, policies, usages, practices, procedures and rules of the City of New York and the New York City Police Department included, but were not limited to, arresting and prosecuting individuals solely because they are transgender, manufacturing false charges against such individuals, using excessive force against such individuals, and allowing members of the opposite sex to search such individuals. (Emphasis supplied). The City's argument that plaintiff alleges only one incident in support of her Monell claim, and that one incident is insufficient evidence of a City policy, is similarly unpersuasive. Monell liability may spring from a single violation, as long as the conduct causing the violation was undertaken pursuant to a City-wide custom, practice, or procedure."); Phillips ex rel. Green v. City of New York, No. 03 Civ. 4887(VM), 2006 WL 2739321, at *26 ((S.D.N.Y. Sept. 25, 2006) ("The Court first must address an erroneous contention by the City Defendants. The City Defendants argue that because Plaintiffs have failed to establish a constitutional violation by any of the named individual City defendants, the City itself cannot be liable. According to the City Defendants, absent a constitutional violation by a named defendant, there can be no municipal liability under Monell. In support of this argument, the City Defendants cite City of Los Angeles v. Heller, which held that a municipality could not be liable for the actions of one of its officers when the jury concluded that the officer inflicted no constitutional harm. . . However, the Second Circuit has, since Heller, expressly held that 'under Monell municipal liability for constitutional injuries may be found to exist even in the absence of individual liability, at least so long as the injuries complained of are not solely attributable to the actions of named individual defendants.' Barrett v. Orange County Human Rights Comm'n, 194 F.3d 341, 350 (2d Cir.1999) (emphasis added). . . Thus, the absence of a constitutional violation by a named defendant does not mandate summary judgment for the City if the allegedly unconstitutional injuries Antonia, Green, and Phillip complain of were based in part on the actions of other persons under the City's employ or control but not named as defendants. Here, Plaintiffs have alleged that Antonia was injured while at the ACS pre-placement facility . . .and that those involved in Antonia's care − including those not named as defendants − collectively failed to supervise, protect, or provide adequate medical treatment, causing Antonia's injuries. Thus, the injuries Plaintiffs complain of are not solely attributable to the named individual defendants, but instead arise from all those involved in Antonia's care while she was at the ACS facility. As a result, Plaintiffs' Monell claim against the City cannot be dismissed on this basis.").

See also Lopez v. LeMaster, 172 F.3d 756, 763 (10th Cir. 1999) ("The district court determined that appellant failed to establish causation sufficient to hold the county liable for conditions at the jail. The district court relied on the principle that to hold the county liable, a plaintiff must demonstrate that its policy was the moving force behind the injury alleged; that is, that the county took official action with a requisite degree of culpability and there is a direct causal link between the action and deprivation of federal rights. [citing Brown] While these rigid standards of proof clearly apply to appellant's claim that an improperly-trained jailer returned him to a cell with inmates who attacked him, they do not govern his claim that the county maintained a policy of understaffing its jails which resulted in his injury. If appellant's summary judgment materials demonstrate the existence of an official municipal policy which itself violated federal law, this will satisfy his burden as to culpability, and the heightened standard applicable to causation for unauthorized actions by a municipal employee will not apply . . . .Appellant has made a sufficient showing, for purposes of summary judgment, that the county maintains an unconstitutional policy of understaffing its jail and of failing to monitor inmates. He must also show, however, that this policy is maintained with the requisite degree of culpable intent. . . The requisite degree of intent in this case is, of course, deliberate indifference to inmate health or safety. . . Appellant has shown the requisite deliberate indifference in this case in two different ways. First, there is evidence that the county's legislative body was itself deliberately indifferent to conditions at the jail. As mentioned, Sheriff LeMaster told a jail investigator that the county commissioners failed to provide funding for correction of deficiencies at the jail likely to lead to assaults against inmates even though such funding was required by the Oklahoma statutes. . . .

Alternatively, the county may be liable on the basis that Sheriff LeMaster is a final policymaker with regard to its jail, such that his actions 'may fairly be said to be those of the municipality.'. . There is evidence sufficient to survive summary judgment showing that Sheriff LeMaster's failure to provide adequate staffing and monitoring of inmates constitutes a policy attributable to the county, and that he was deliberately indifferent to conditions at the jail.").

See generally the following discussion of this problem in Mark v. Borough of Hatboro, 51 F.3d 1137, 1153 (3d Cir. 1995):

> In Monell, the Supreme Court held that "when execution of a government's policy or custom, whether by its lawmakers or by those whose edicts or acts may be fairly said to represent official policy, inflicts the injury then the government as an entity is responsible under § 1983." [cite omitted] Post-Monell cases often have reflected confusion with the actual standard governing the imposition of liability, but two subsequent Supreme Court cases have delineated those situations more clearly. In City of Canton v. Harris, ... the Court held that 'the inadequacy of police training may serve as the basis for § 1983 liability ... where the failure to train amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the police come into contact.' In that case, however, the Court 'assume[d] that respondent's constitutional right ... was denied by city employees,' ... and went on to assess whether the failure to train ever could give rise to municipal responsibility. Thus, the case cannot be read to stand for the proposition that a policy evincing willful disregard, though not causing a constitutional violation, can be the basis for section 1983 liability. In short, City of Canton dealt with responsibility for an assumed constitutional violation. In Collins v. City of Harker Heights ... the Court clarified still further the issue of when a municipality may be liable. In that case, the plaintiff's decedent, a city employee, died of asphyxia after entering a manhole. The plaintiff claimed that her decedent 'had a constitutional right to be free from unreasonable risks of harm to his body, mind and emotions and a constitutional right to be protected from the City of Harker Heights' custom and policy of deliberate indifference toward the safety of its employees.'... The Court this time assumed that the municipality was responsible for the injury and asked whether the injury was of constitutional proportions. Thus, it reversed its focus from that in City of Canton. In so doing, it inquired into: (1) whether 'the Due Process Clause supports petitioner's claim that the governmental employer's duty to provide its employees with a safe working environment is a substantive component of the Due Process Clause,'...; and (2) whether 'the city's alleged failure to train its employees, or to warn them about known risks of harm, was an omission that can properly be characterized as arbitrary, or conscience-shocking, in a constitutional sense.'... Reasoning that there was no affirmative constitutional duty, and that the city's actions were not conscience-shocking or arbitrary, a unanimous Court held that there could be no section 1983 liability. It did not matter whether a policy > enacted with deliberate indifference to city employees caused the injury, because the injury could not be characterized as constitutional in scope. Thus, Collins made clear that in a Monell case, the 'proper analysis requires us to separate two different issues when a § 1983 claim is asserted against a municipality: (1) whether plaintiff's harm was caused by a constitutional violation, and if so, (2) whether the city is responsible for that violation.'

The panel opinion in Mark made this observation about Fagan:

> [T]he Fagan panel opinion appeared to hold that a plaintiff can establish a constitutional violation predicate to a claim of municipal liability simply by demonstrating that the policymakers, acting with deliberate indifference, enacted an inadequate policy that caused an injury. It appears that, by focusing almost exclusively on the 'deliberate indifference' prong of the Collins test, the panel opinion did not apply the first prong-establishing an underlying constitutional violation.

51 F.3d at 1153 n.13.

See also Johnson v. City of Philadelphia, 975 F.3d 394, 403 n.13 (3d Cir. 2020) ("The District Court believed that Appellant's inability to state a claim against an individual City employee meant that she could not state a Monell claim against the City. In Fagan v. City of Vineland, we held that 'an underlying constitutional tort can still exist even if no individual [employee] violated the Constitution.'. . But we later 'carefully confined Fagan to its facts: a substantive due process claim resulting from a police pursuit.'. . At least two of our post-Grazier opinions have continued to assert that a municipality may be 'independently liable for a substantive due process violation' even if no municipal employee is liable. See Sanford v. Stiles, 456 F.3d 298, 314 (3d Cir. 2006) (per curiam); Brown v. Pa. Dep't of Health Emergency Med. Servs. Training Inst., 318 F.3d 473, 482 (3d Cir. 2003). But both opinions note that, for Monell liability to attach, 'there must still be a violation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights.'. . As Appellant's Monell claim fails in any event, we need not wade into this discussion."); Grazier v. City of Philadelphia, 328 F.3d 120, 124 n.5 (3d Cir. 2003) ("Our Court has distinguished Heller in a substantive due process context, Fagan v. City of Vineland, 22 F.3d 1283, 1291-94 (3d Cir.1994), but not in a way relevant to this case. In Fagan, we observed that a municipality could remain liable, even though its employees are not, where the City's action itself is independently alleged as a violation and the officer is merely the conduit for causing constitutional harm. . . We were concerned in Fagan that, where the standard for liability is whether state action 'shocks the conscience,' a city could escape liability for deliberately malicious conduct by carrying out its misdeeds through officers who do not recognize that their orders are unconstitutional and whose actions therefore do not shock the conscience. . . Here, however, like Heller and unlike Fagan, the question is whether the City is liable for causing its officers to commit constitutional violations, albeit no one contends that the City directly ordered the constitutional violations. Therefore, once the jury found that Hood and Swinton did not cause any constitutional harm, it no longer makes sense to ask whether the City caused them to do it. Additionally, recognizing that Heller had addressed a closely related issue, we carefully confined Fagan to its facts: a substantive due process claim resulting from a police pursuit. . . By contrast, both this case and Heller involve primarily a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim."); Brown v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania Dept. of Health Emergency Medical Services Training Institute, 318 F.3d 473, 482 & n.3, 483 (3d Cir. 2003) ("It is possible for a municipality to be held independently liable for a substantive due process violation even in situations where none of its employees are liable. [citing Fagan and noting in footnote that there is a split among the courts of appeals on this issue] . . . . However, for there to be municipal liability, there still must be a violation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . . It is not enough that a municipality adopted with deliberate indifference a policy of inadequately training its officers. There must be a 'direct causal link' between the policy and a constitutional violation. . . This is where Appellants' municipal liability claim fails. They allege that the City of Philadelphia had a number of policies involving EMTs which were enacted with deliberate indifference and which caused harm to them and their son. Even if we accept everything Appellants allege as true, they will have still failed to establish that the City's policies caused constitutional harm. The City was under no constitutional obligation to provide competent rescue services. The failure of the City and its EMTs to rescue Shacquiel Douglas from privately-caused harm was not an infringement of Appellants' constitutional rights. [footnote omitted] There has been no constitutional harm alleged. Hence, there is no municipal liability under § 1983."); Hansberry v. City of Philadelphia, 232 F. Supp.2d 404, 412, 413 (E.D. Pa. 2002) ("[L]ocal government bodies may be held liable if a state actor acts unconstitutionally pursuant to a government policy or custom. . . Plaintiffs do not, however, have to demonstrate unconstitutional actions by Lt. Herring or Officers Schneider and Hood to make our their claim under § 1983. The Third Circuit has held that plaintiffs can establish liability based solely on a municipal policy or custom if the plaintiffs have both connected the policy to a constitutional injury and 'adduced evidence of scienter on the part of a municipal actor [with] final policymaking authority in the areas in question.' Simmons v. City of Philadelphia, 947 F.2d 1042, 1062 (3d Cir.1991). . . . Plaintiffs cannot establish municipal liability based on Monell for two reasons. First, they cannot demonstrate that a municipal policy or custom, as carried out by the individual defendants, inflicted an unconstitutional injury because they have presented no evidence that the officers violated Raymond's 14th Amendment rights. Second, were they to argue under Simmons that a municipal policy by itself deprived Raymond of his substantive due process rights, they would have needed to present evidence of a constitutional violation, a particular policy, and an identifiable policymaker. See Simmons, 947 F.2d at 1062. They have presented no such evidence. Consequently, they cannot satisfy the requirements of Monell."); White v. City of Philadelphia, 118 F. Supp.2d 564, 575, 576 (E.D. Pa. 2000) ("In this case, plaintiffs allege separate, independent claims against the City, claiming that the City was deliberately indifferent in its (1) failure to adopt and implement a 911 policy to handle Priority 1 calls and (2) failure to train. . . . Regardless of the theory under which suit is brought against the City, the first inquiry in any § 1983 claim 'is to identify the specific constitutional right allegedly infringed.' [citing Albright and Collins] . . . .As the Court determined above, this claim fails to identify a cognizable constitutional injury because the Officers' conduct did not satisfy the four part test set forth in Mark v. Borough of Hatboro, 51 F.3d 1137, 1152 (3d Cir.1995). In addition, even if the Court assumes that the City has a policy or custom of providing poor 911 service or failing to train officers to perform adequate rescue services, this failure did not inflict constitutional injury − substantive due process under the Fourteenth Amendment does not secure a right to rescue services under the facts of this case."); Russoli v. Salisbury Tp., 126 F. Supp.2d 821, 863 n.26 (E.D. Pa. 2000) (Fagan applies only to "acts challenged under substantive due process."); Leddy v. Township of Lower Merion, 114 F. Supp.2d 372, 377 (E.D. Pa. 2000) ("As Mark suggests, the first prong is essential to the rationale of Monell − that a municipality should be held accountable not on the basis of vicarious liability, but only for misconduct it has approved or fostered. Or as succinctly and metaphorically couched in Andrews: [I]t is impossible on the delivery of a kick to inculpate the head and find no fault with the foot." Andrews, 895 F.2d at 1481."); Cannon v. City of Philadelphia, 86 F. Supp. 2d 460, 475, 476 (E.D. Pa. 2000)("In sum, I am presented with various conflicting interpretations of the appropriate level of culpability applicable in a § 1983 case against a municipality in which the individual state actors are not liable. The confusion regarding how to evaluate a municipality's liability is buttressed by the seeming disagreement between present Chief Judge Becker and past Chief Judge Sloviter in Simmons and the Third Circuit's recognition in Mark of Fagan I's failure to evaluate the applicable standard for the underlying constitutional violation. . . . While Lewis did not address municipal liability, the instruction of Lewis arguably intimates that a contextual approach may be applied in evaluating a municipality's liability in the absence of an individual state actor's liability. In order for a municipality to commit the necessary underlying constitutional tort, an expansive reading of Lewis may suggest that the municipality's policy, custom or failure to train, viewed contextually, must shock the conscience. The conduct that satisfies this standard may differ depending on the circumstances. Therefore, while a state actor's behavior may not shock the conscience, the municipality's policy, custom or failure to train may be conscience shocking. . . . [R]egardless of which standard applies plaintiff fails to demonstrate that the City's policies, customs, or failure to train are deliberately indifferent or shock the conscience. Therefore, even assuming the existence of an underlying constitutional violation and that the City need only be deliberately indifferent to trigger municipal liability, I will grant the defendants' summary judgment motion.").

See also Contreras v. City of Chicago, 119 F.3d 1286, 1294 (7th Cir. 1997) ("We would first note that much of the plaintiffs' argument reflects a confusion between what constitutes a constitutional violation and what makes a municipality liable for constitutional violations. Both in the District Court and here on appeal, the plaintiffs invoked 'failure to train' and 'deliberate indifference' theories as the basis for the substantive due process claim. . . . Notions of 'deliberate indifference' and 'failure to train,' however, are derived from municipal liability cases such as [Monell, Canton] and most recently [Bryan County.] Those cases presume that a constitutional violation has occurred (typically by a municipal employee) and then ask whether the municipality itself may be liable for the violations. . . . The liability of the City of Chicago for any deliberate indifference or for failing to train DCS inspectors is therefore secondary to the basic issue of whether a constitutional guarantee has been violated."); Evans v. Avery, 100 F.3d 1033, 1039 (1st Cir. 1996) (declining invitation to adopt Fagan analysis "because we believe that the Fagan panel improperly applied the Supreme Court's teachings."); Regalbuto v. City of Philadelphia, No. CIV. A. 95-5629, 1995 WL 739501, *4 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 12, 1995) (not reported) ("In [Mark], . . . the [Court] reiterated the Collins standard that unless plaintiff first establishes that he or she has suffered a constitutional injury, it is irrelevant for purposes of § 1983 liability whether the city's policies, enacted with deliberate indifference, caused an injury.").

See also Williams v. City and County of Denver, 99 F.3d 1009, 1019 (10th Cir. 1996), vacated and remanded for further proceedings in light of County of Sacramento v. Lewis and Bd. of County Comm'rs of Bryan County v. Brown, Williams v. City and County of Denver, 153 F.3d 730 (10th Cir. 1998) (per curiam) (en banc), where the court explains:

> In holding that the City may be liable for its own unconstitutional policy even if Officer Farr is ultimately exonerated, we emphasize the distinction between cases in which a plaintiff seeks to hold a municipality liable for failing to train an employee who as a result acts unconstitutionally, and cases in which the city's failure is itself an unconstitutional denial of substantive due process. Heller and Hinton are cases belonging in the first category. In those cases, the unconstitutional acts were committed by individual officers. Derivative liability against the city was predicated upon a municipal policy under which the city was allegedly legally responsible for the individual officer's unconstitutional conduct. In order to impose liability in such cases, the policy need not itself be unconstitutional. . . Rather, the inquiry is whether an otherwise constitutional policy is the moving force behind unconstitutional conduct by a municipal employee. . .In the second category of cases, liability against the city is sought not derivatively on the basis of unconstitutional conduct by an individual officer, but directly on the basis of the unconstitutional nature of the city's policy itself. Collins belongs in this category. . . . Municipal policy thus performs two separate functions, as the court in Collins attempted to clarify. In a Heller/Hinton case and in Canton, the inquiry is whether the policy may impose liability on the city solely for the unconstitutional acts of its employee. In such cases, the policy, even if constitutional, will nonetheless be a basis for municipal liability if that policy amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of the public with whom the municipal employee comes in contact. In a Collins case, on the other hand, the inquiry is whether the policy or custom itself is unconstitutional so as to impose liability on the city for its own unconstitutional conduct in implementing an unconstitutional policy.

See also Williams v. City and County of Denver, No. 90 N 1176, slip op. at *28, *29 (D. Colo. Sept. 27, 1999) (on remand):

> Williams renews her argument that the City's policies are unconstitutional by asserting that (1) the Supreme Court's decisions in Lewis and Brown mandate that the City's liability must be considered under the less stringent standard of deliberate > indifference . . . . I disagree. First, neither Lewis nor Brown alters the conscience-shocking standard required to establish direct municipal liability. Brown dealt with whether a municipality could be held liable on a single decision to hire when the hired employee violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . Lewis, on the other hand, did not even deal with direct municipal liability. To the contrary, the issue before the Lewis court was whether an individual police officer's deliberate or reckless indifference to life in a high-speed automobile chase which caused a death amounted to violation of substantive due process under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . [W]hile Williams may pursue her deliberate-indifference claims against the City under Canton based on the unconstitutional conduct of Farr, she may not pursue her deliberate-indifference claims under a Collins theory of direct municipal liability.

See also Crowson v. Washington County State of Utah, 983 F.3d 1166, 1187 n.10 (10th Cir. 2020) ("Although the opinion in Williams was vacated, it was not reversed by the en banc court. See 153 F.3d 730 (10th Cir. 1998) (unpublished). Thus, its expressions on the merits may have at least persuasive value.") (Crowson appears in more detail in this outline, supra).

14. Impact of Qualified Immunity on Monell Liability

Although local governments have no qualified immunity under § 1983, the court in Watson v. Sexton, 755 F. Supp. 583 (S.D.N.Y. 1991), dismissed plaintiff's claim against the City Department of Sanitation for failure to train its employees in proper administration of a substance abuse policy, where individual defendants had prevailed on qualified immunity grounds.

The court held that "[t]o be 'deliberately indifferent' to rights requires that those rights be clearly established. Therefore, even if plaintiff could prove that her Fourth Amendment rights were violated by current standards because the City inadequately trained its employees, plaintiff cannot show that the City was deliberately indifferent to rights that were not clearly established [at the time the challenged actions were taken]...." Id. at 588.

See, e.g., Campbell v. Riahi, 109 F.4th 854, 862 (6th Cir. 2024) ("[A] municipality 'cannot exhibit fault rising to the level of deliberate indifference to a constitutional right when that right has not yet been clearly established.'. . Thus—because Officer Riahi did not violate a clearly established right—it follows that her employer, Butler County, was not deliberately indifferent to such a right. . . Butler County is entitled to summary judgment on these claims."); Atkinson v. Godfrey, 100 F.4th 498, 509 (4th Cir. 2024) ("[W]e have not concluded that Godfrey did not violate Atkinson's Fourth Amendment rights. Instead, under prong two of the qualified immunity analysis, we held that the constitutional rights Atkinson claimed Godfrey violated were not clearly established at the time of Godfrey's conduct. And since we have not held that Godfrey did not violate Atkinson's constitutional rights, our disposition of the claim against Godfrey does not necessarily resolve the claim against Coats. While it may be less likely that a municipality may be found liable when the constitutional terrain was as murky as that here, the rules of pendent jurisdiction counsel staying our hand. For that reason, we decline to exercise jurisdiction over the appeal with respect to Coats as the issues it presents are not inextricably intertwined with our resolution of the qualified immunity issues."); Atkinson v. Godfrey, 100 F.4th 498, 510 (4th Cir. 2024) (Wilkinson, J., concurring) ("Municipalities, of course, do not have qualified immunity. Yet the whole idea of fair notice that lies at the heart of qualified immunity for individuals need not be wholly abandoned when policymakers are concerned. In other words, it is not immediately apparent why the municipal fisc should be burdened in the absence of any ascertainable federal standards by which municipal policies can be gauged. While municipal bodies may have more time or legal advice at their disposal than individual officials do, they are also uniquely taxed with devising workable and even novel solutions to their own sets of pressing problems. The majority notes, 'While it may be less likely that a municipality may be found liable when the constitutional terrain was as murky as that here, the rules of pendent jurisdiction counsel staying our hand.' . . I agree with that statement and I thus concur in Judge Quattlebaum's excellent opinion for the majority."); Dundon v. Kirchmeier, 85 F.4th 1250, 1257-58 (8th Cir. 2023) ("The protestors also maintain that the municipalities failed to train their officers in how to use force in the context of crowd control, and failed to supervise their officers during the protest. Municipal liability may be established where a constitutional violation is accompanied by a showing that the municipality 'failed to train its employees to handle recurring situations presenting an obvious potential for such a violation.'. . To determine whether the need for training and supervision was obvious, we consider whether the officers violated a 'clear constitutional duty.'. . '[A] municipal policymaker cannot exhibit fault rising to the level of deliberate indifference to a constitutional right when that right has not yet been clearly established.' [citing Szabla] That is because the 'absence of clearly established constitutional rights ... undermines the assertion that a municipality deliberately ignored an obvious need for additional safeguards to augment its facially constitutional policy.'. . It was not clearly established in November 2016 that the officers' use of force to disperse protestors violated a constitutional right under the Fourth Amendment. Thus, the need for training and supervision on dispersal of protestors was not so obvious that it can be characterized as deliberate indifference to the protestors' rights to be free from unreasonable seizures. The protestors similarly contend that Sheriff Kirchmeier, Sheriff Kaiser, and Chief of Police Ziegler are liable as supervisors under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. In § 1983 actions, however, a supervisor is liable only for his or her own misconduct. . . When a claim is premised on the conduct of subordinates, a supervisor may be liable only upon a showing of deliberate indifference to the offensive conduct. . . As with the municipalities, there is insufficient evidence here of deliberate indifference by supervisors where the alleged constitutional right was not clearly established."); Vanegas v. City of Pasadena, 46 F.4th 1159, 1167 (9th Cir. 2022) ("Vanegas alleged a failure to train and argues that factual disputes exist on whether the City of Pasadena failed to train its officers on the 'well-established' right to refuse to identify oneself prior to arrest. But, as we discussed above, we doubt that any such right is so 'well established' that its alleged omission from training would constitute deliberate indifference on the part of the City."); Lombardo v. City of St. Louis, 38 F.4th 684, 692 (8th Cir. 2022) (on remand from the Supreme Court), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 2419 (2023) ("Lombardo . . . argues that the district court erred in granting summary judgment to the City on the unconstitutional-policy and failure-to-train claims. Lombardo alleges that the City's policy for restraining detainees in holding cells is facially unconstitutional and caused a violation of Gilbert's rights and that the City's failure to train its officers or enact constitutional policies amounts to deliberate indifference. We apply a de novo standard of review to a district court's grant of summary judgment even where qualified immunity is not involved. . . 'Where the municipality has not directly inflicted an injury, however, "rigorous standards of culpability and causation must be applied," and a showing of deliberate indifference is required.'. . And a deliberate indifference claim fails in '[t]he absence of clearly established constitutional rights,' so-called '"clear constitutional guideposts" for municipalities in the area.'. . '[T]he lack of clarity in the law precludes a finding that the municipality had an unconstitutional policy at all, because its policymakers cannot properly be said to have exhibited a policy of deliberate indifference to constitutional rights that were not clearly established.'. . Because we have concluded that the constitutional right at issue here was not clearly established, Lombardo cannot prevail on her claims against the City. The district court thus did not err in granting summary judgment to the City."); Graham v. Barnette, 5 F.4th 872, 891-92 (8th Cir. 2021) (on remand from Supreme Court) ("'[T]he lack of clarity in the law' concerning the appropriate standard of cause needed to justify a mental-health hold 'precludes a finding that the municipality had an unconstitutional policy at all, because its policymakers cannot properly be said to have exhibited a policy of deliberate indifference to constitutional rights that were not clearly established.'. . In other words, because the right at issue was not clearly established, Graham cannot meet the 'demand that deliberate indifference in fact be deliberate.' Arrington-Bey v. City of Bedford Heights, 858 F.3d 988, 995 (6th Cir. 2017) (discussing and adopting the Eighth Circuit's approach)."); Nichols v. Wayne County, Michigan, 822 F. App'x 445, ___ (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2716 (2021) ("We begin with Nichols' allegation that the county prosecutor 'failed to train and supervise attorneys acting for the defendants in the need to ... provide for prompt post-seizure, pre-forfeiture hearings in front of neutral decision maker.' This allegation fails to state a claim. When a plaintiff attempts to establish municipal liability based on a 'failure to train employees,' he must show the municipality's 'deliberate indifference to constitutional rights.'. . But 'a municipal policymaker cannot exhibit fault rising to the level of deliberate indifference to a constitutional right when that right has not yet been clearly established.'. . Nichols has not directed us to any 'Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit case that' establishes his right to the initiation of forfeiture proceedings within 50 days of notice, or indeed within any particular time frame. . . He refers us only to two out-of-circuit decisions, which is alone insufficient to 'clearly establish' a constitutional right. . . . Rather than point us to any clearly established time frame within which post-seizure hearings must be initiated, Nichols asks us to draw that line for the first time in his case. That is fatal to his failure-to-train claim."); Stewart v. City of Euclid, Ohio, 970 F.3d 667, 675–76 (6th Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2690 (2021) ("The Euclid Police Department's deadly force training program involved inappropriate and tasteless elements. The presentation materials included jokes trivializing the use of force, such as a graphic showing an officer beating a prone and unarmed suspect with the caption '[p]rotecting and serving the poop out of you.' The presentation linked to a Chris Rock comedy routine in which Rock repeatedly jokes about police beating citizens on grounds of race and shows clips of officers beating suspects. Even the components of the program that can be stomached appear skimped, such as the single genre of factual scenarios used to test officers. But Stewart cannot sue the City of Euclid for its distasteful, perhaps inadequate, training program. A municipality may be held liable for the constitutional violations of its employees when the municipality's custom or policy led to the violation. . . . Here, Stewart's rights were not clearly established in the precedent of this circuit or otherwise. Thus, violation of his rights cannot be the 'known or obvious consequence' disregarded by the City of Euclid through its training program and the Monell claim fails."); Tlapanco v. Elges, 969 F.3d 638, 657-58 (6th Cir. 2020) ("This court has consistently held that a municipality cannot be held liable on a failure to train theory where a right was not clearly established. . . Because there was no clearly established right not to have an electronic device seized pursuant to a search warrant, mirrored, and the forensic mirror retained, Oakland County was not deliberately indifferent to the potential constitutional violation."); Contreras on behalf of A.L. v. Doña Ana County Bd. of County Commissioners, 965 F.3d 1114, 1123-25 (10th Cir. 2020) (Carson, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1382 (2021) ("The district court determined that Plaintiff's claim against the Board failed as a matter of law because she did not satisfy the third element for municipal liability—deliberate indifference. The district court determined that the Board could not be deliberately indifferent to a constitutional right unless the right is clearly established. See, e.g., Arrington-Bey v. City of Bedford Heights, 858 F.3d 988, 994 (6th Cir. 2017). And because the district court found the right was not clearly established, it ruled the Board could not have been deliberately indifferent to A.L.'s rights. I agree. Whether a municipal policymaker can be liable for deliberate indifference to a constitutional right that has not yet been established is an interesting one. And the answer depends on the type of claim alleged against the municipality. Consider first a claim based directly on a municipal act such as the termination of a municipal employee without due process. In that case, 'the violated right need not be clearly established because fault and causation obviously belong to the city.'. . But then consider a claim based on a municipality's failure to properly train its employees. There, the theory stems from the municipality's failure to teach its employees not to violate a person's constitutional rights. In that posture, the 'municipality's alleged responsibility for a constitutional violation stems from an employee's unconstitutional act [and the municipality's] failure to prevent the harm must be shown to be deliberate under "rigorous requirements of culpability and causation."'. . Thus, the violated right in a failure to train case 'must be clearly established because a municipality cannot deliberately shirk a constitutional duty unless that duty is clear. . . The Second, Sixth, and Eighth Circuits have each reached this conclusion. Townes v. City of New York, 176 F.3d 138, 143–44 (2d Cir. 1999); Arrington-Bey, 858 F.3d at 995; Szabla v. City of Brooklyn Park, 486 F.3d 385, 393 (8th Cir. 2007) (en banc). Judge Baldock believes that in application this means the district court inappropriately granted the Board qualified immunity. I agree that municipalities cannot invoke the doctrine of qualified immunity. . . But this case differs remarkably from Owen. Owen arose from a claim of deliberate municipal indifference where the municipality directly caused the constitutional injury. . . Here, by contrast, Plaintiff advances a failure to train theory in which she 'must show not only that an employee's act caused a constitutional tort, but also that the city's failure to train its employees caused the employee's violation and that the city culpably declined to train its "employees to handle recurring situations presenting an obvious potential for such a violation."'. . The Supreme Court's statement 'obvious potential for such a violation' requires that the constitutional violation be obvious (i.e., clearly established). Requiring that the right be clearly established in this context does not give qualified immunity to municipalities; it simply follows the Supreme Court's demand 'that deliberate indifference in fact be deliberate.'. . Plaintiff alleged the County engaged in deliberate indifference by failing to adequately train its correction officers. For the reasons discussed above, however, Plaintiff's claim must fail because she cannot show the right the Board violated was obvious. I would therefore affirm the district court's order granting summary judgment to the Board on the Monell claim. I thus concur in the judgment on the Monell claim, although on a different ground than Chief Judge Tymkovich who concluded no constitutional violation occurred."); J.H. v. Williamson County, Tennessee, 951 F.3d 709, 721 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Having already concluded that J.H.'s substantive due process right was not clearly established as of 2013, we must also conclude that J.H.'s Monell claim against Williamson County cannot succeed. [citing Arrington-Bey] We thus affirm the district court on this claim."); Vaduva v. City of Xenia, 780 F. App'x 331, ___ (6th Cir. 2019) ("[W]hen the harm is the result of a failure to train, we apply '"rigorous requirements of culpability and causation"—holding a municipality liable if it has been deliberately indifferent to constitutional rights.' . . In contrast, when the harm is the result of 'the straightforward carrying out of a municipal policy or custom, the determination of causation is easy.'. . In this case, Plaintiff alleges only that his harm is the result of a failure to train. . . . Deliberate indifference also requires that '[t]he violated right ... be clearly established because a municipality cannot deliberately shirk a constitutional duty unless that duty is clear.' Arrington-Bey v. City of Bedford Heights, 858 F.3d 988, 995 (6th Cir. 2017); see also Sumpter, 868 F.3d at 490 n.8. But see Garner v. Memphis Police Dep't, 8 F.3d 358, 366 (6th Cir. 1993). And as discussed above, Officer Defendants did not violate Plaintiff's clearly established constitutional rights because, at the time that they issued Plaintiff a citation for soliciting donations for charity, they were enforcing a properly enacted ordinance that was not grossly and flagrantly unconstitutional. Thus, there is no genuine dispute of material fact regarding whether the City is responsible for the alleged violation of Plaintiff's constitutional rights. Accordingly, we hold that the City is entitled to summary judgment with regard to Plaintiff's challenges to the constitutionality of XCO § 648.12 based on lack of standing, and is entitled to summary judgment with regard to Plaintiff's claim that the City executed an unlawful policy or custom based on failure to demonstrate deliberate indifference."); Rayfield v. City of Grand Rapids, Michigan, 768 F. App'x 495, 510-12 (6th Cir. 2019) ("Rayfield bases his Monell claim on the City's alleged failure to train City officials on how to ensure that, following an individual's arrest by City police officers, a person is not detained in excess of 48 hours if he is transferred to the County's custody. . . . A Monell claim for failure to train may be brought '[o]nly where a municipality's failure to train its employees in a relevant respect evidences a "deliberate indifference" to the rights of its inhabitants,' thereby showing the necessary 'policy or custom' to establish § 1983 liability. . . Thus, Rayfield must show: '(1) that a training program is inadequate to the tasks that the officers must perform; (2) that the inadequacy is the result of the [municipality's] deliberate indifference; and (3) that the inadequacy is closely related to or actually caused [his] injury.' . . Finally, in the context of a deliberate-indifference Monell claim, a plaintiff must also show that the right underlying the failure-to-train claim is clearly established. . . As an initial matter, and assuming we can consider the merits of Rayfield's Monell claim after finding that the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, . . . it is easily conceivable that, when two municipalities share custody over a pre-hearing detainee and fail to train their officials to ensure compliance with County of Riverside, a detainee's Fourth Amendment rights may well be violated. . . This possibility is particularly heightened for individuals who are arrested by one municipality and transferred to the custody of another, as the likelihood of miscommunication or administrative delays when more than one governmental entity is involved may well extend a person's detention beyond the time frame established in County of Riverside. Despite this constitutionally precarious system, Rayfield's claim fails. Specifically, because we have already concluded that, even assuming Rayfield has plausibly alleged a constitutional violation, Rayfield's particular constitutional rights were not 'clearly established,' we must affirm the district court's dismissal of Rayfield's Monell claims for failure to state a claim. . . And although Rayfield contends that the City 'had a nondelegable duty to ensure that the County of Kent did not violate the constitutional rights of arrestees,'. . . Rayfield cites only one out-of-Circuit appellate court and various district courts for support[.] . . . Moreover, to the extent the Eighth Circuit's decision in Young v. City of Little Rock, 249 F.3d 730 (8th Cir. 2001), is instructive on the issue of delegable duties between municipalities, we have previously suggested a difference in opinion. . . Given this Circuit's case law, as well as the limited authority identified by Rayfield, we cannot say that, as applied to the City, Rayfield's constitutional rights were 'clearly established' in October 2014. We thus affirm the district court's dismissal of Rayfield's Monell claims."); Brennan v. Dawson752 F. App'x 276, 287 (6th Cir. 2018) ("A municipality cannot be deliberately indifferent to the violation of a constitutional right—and thus liable under § 1983—if that right is not clearly established. . . .In Arrington-Bey, we clarified the apparent conflict between Hagans and Scott. . . We explained that there is a significant difference between a Monell claim alleging that a municipal policy or custom caused a constitutional violation—as in Scott—and a Monell claim alleging that the municipality's failure to train amounted to deliberate indifference—as in Hagans. . . When a constitutional injury arises directly from municipal action, 'such as firing a city official without due process ... or ordering police to enter a private business without a warrant ... the violated right need not be clearly established because fault and causation obviously belong to the city....'. . . . But if the constitutional injury arises from an employee's unconstitutional act, 'the city's failure to prevent the harm must be shown to be deliberate....'. . . . If a plaintiff alleges that the municipality acted with deliberate indifference, the violated right 'must be clearly established because a municipality cannot deliberately shirk a constitutional duty unless that duty is clear.'. . Brennan's Monell claim alleges that the County was deliberately indifferent to individuals' constitutional rights, meaning that Hagans governs our analysis. Because we hold that the scope of Dawson's implied license was not clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct, Brennan's claim against the County fails. The County could not have been deliberately indifferent to a right that was not clearly established when the alleged misconduct occurred. We also note that Brennan advanced no facts at summary judgment to establish a pattern of constitutional violations committed by the County deputies. This alone is fatal to Brennan's claim. [citing Connick] As a result, we affirm the district court's decision to grant the County's summary judgment motion."); Alvarez v. City of Brownsville, 904 F.3d 382, 391-94 (5th Cir. 2018) (en banc), cert. denied, 139

S. Ct. 2690 (2019) ("Alvarez points to no case from any circuit that premises § 1983 municipal liability on a policymaker's deliberate indifference to a constitutional right that a circuit court has expressly held does not exist—e.g., the defendant's right to be presented with Brady material before entering a guilty plea. No deliberate indifference was shown to establish municipal liability under this alternative theory proposed by Alvarez. In conclusion, the City of Brownsville should not have been liable as a matter of law for Alvarez's § 1983 action. . . . Prior to this court granting Alvarez's petition for rehearing en banc, settled precedent in this circuit held that there was no constitutional right to Brady material prior to a guilty plea. . . Alvarez argues that under Brady the videos of the incident between him and Officer Arias constituted exculpatory evidence that he was constitutionally entitled to before the entry of his guilty plea. . . This court declines the invitation to uproot its precedent. . . .The First, Second, and Fourth Circuits also seem to have doubts about a defendant's constitutional entitlement to exculpatory Brady material before entering a guilty plea. . . .The Seventh, Ninth, and Tenth Circuits, however, recognized the possible distinction noted by the Supreme Court in Ruiz between impeachment and exculpatory evidence in the guilty plea context. . . . In sum, case law from the Supreme Court, this circuit, and other circuits does not affirmatively establish that a constitutional violation occurs when Brady material is not shared during the plea bargaining process. The en banc court will not disturb this circuit's settled precedent and abstains from expanding the Brady right to the pretrial plea bargaining context for Alvarez."); Bustillos v. El Paso Cty. Hosp. Dist., 891 F.3d 214, 222 (5th Cir. 2018) ("The Amended Complaint's county liability theory is premised on the District's 'deliberate indifference' to the need 'to train its personnel in how to handle government request[s] for body cavity searches.' However, a 'policymaker cannot exhibit fault rising to the level of deliberate indifference to a constitutional right when that right has not yet been clearly established.' Hagans v. Franklin Cty. Sheriff's Office, 695 F.3d 505, 511 (6th Cir. 2012) (quoting Szabla v. City of Brooklyn Park, 486 F.3d 385, 393 (8th Cir. 2007) (en banc)). The district court properly dismissed the county liability claim."); Sumpter v. Wayne County, 868 F.3d 473, 490 n.8 (6th Cir. 2017) ("We also note that, because Sumpter has not shown that the group Registry searches violated clearly established law, Wayne County cannot be liable for failing to train its officers to avoid them. Municipalities are liable for a failure to train when the failure amounts to a deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom its officers come into contact. City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378, 388 (1989). But a municipality cannot be deliberately indifferent for failing to train officers to avoid constitutional violations that have not been clearly established as such. Hagans v. Franklin Cty. Sheriff's Office, 695 F.3d 505, 511 (6th Cir. 2012); Arrington-Bey v. City of Bedford Heights, Ohio, 858 F.3d 988, 995 (6th Cir. 2017)."); Arrington-Bey v. City of Bedford Heights, 858 F.3d 988, 994-96 (6th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 738 (2018) ("Arrington-Bey must show that the City's 'failure to train' officers to properly identify and secure treatment for mental conditions like Omar's 'amounts to deliberate indifference.'. . But 'a municipal policymaker cannot exhibit fault rising to the level of deliberate indifference to a constitutional right when that right has not yet been clearly established.'. . The absence of a clearly established right spells the end of this Monell claim. . . . Police officers face tough judgment calls about what to do with the mentally ill. Arrestees do not normally arrive at jail toting their medical records. Psychiatric problems do not always manifest themselves with clarity. And not even clear psychiatric problems always reveal their potential for serious harm—as here a heart attack. Perhaps those truths counsel in favor of more policies and training designed to minimize tragic injuries and deaths like Omar's. And perhaps police would be wise to err on the side of calling a doctor in cases like this one. But the United States Constitution and Ohio law do not elevate any deviation from wise policy into a cognizable lawsuit for money damages against the City or the relevant law enforcement officers."); Hollingsworth v. City of St. Ann, 800 F.3d 985, 992 (8th Cir. 2015) ("While a single constitutional violation arising out of a lack of safeguards or training may be sufficient to establish deliberate indifference where the need for such safeguards or training is 'obvious,' a municipality 'cannot exhibit fault rising to the level of deliberate indifference to a constitutional right when that right has not yet been clearly established.' Szabla, 486 F.3d at 393. As it was not clearly established in July 2009 that force resulting in only de minimis injury could violate the Fourth Amendment, the City did not act with deliberate indifference by failing to train its officers that use of a Taser in these circumstances was impermissible."); Rodgers v. Knight, 781 F.3d 932, 942-43 (8th Cir. 2015) ("Greg has not established a submissible claim that the municipalities were deliberately indifferent to the rights of citizens to carry concealed weapons. It was not clearly established that a citizen without a permit is permitted to carry a concealed weapon in common areas of an apartment complex or other leasehold. The lack of clarity regarding the scope of Mo.Rev.Stat. § 571.030 .3 'undermines the assertion that a municipality deliberately ignored an obvious need for additional safeguards.' Szabla, 486 F.3d at 394."); Roberts v. City of Omaha, 723 F.3d 966, 975, 976 (8th Cir. 2013) ("The district court also denied summary judgment to the city, reasoning '[t]here are ... issues of fact with respect to the adequacy of the City's training.' We ordinarily only have '"jurisdiction on interlocutory appeal ... [to resolve] the issue of qualified immunity."'. . However, we have pendent appellate jurisdiction over certain claims that are 'inextricably intertwined' with the qualified immunity analysis. . . . Roberts alleged the city deprived him of the benefits of a public service—safe and lawful police detention—because the city failed properly to train its employees under the ADA and Rehabilitation Act. As is the case for failure to train claims arising under § 1983, actions under the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act require proof of deliberate indifference. . . In Szabla, we held, where the constitutional right allegedly violated by individual officers was not clearly established at the time of the occurrence, the municipality could not be liable for failure to train because the risk of harm 'was not so obvious at the time of th[e] incident that [the municipality's] actions [could] properly be characterized as deliberate indifference.'. .Roberts can only prevail on his ADA and Rehabilitation Act claims by showing the city's deliberate indifference to his alleged right to be free from discrimination in the circumstances of this case, but the city, like the individual officers, lacked notice the officers' actions might have violated Roberts's asserted rights. . . Our decision granting qualified immunity to the individual officers necessarily forecloses liability against the municipality on Roberts's failure to train claims as well. . . The issue of the city's liability therefore is 'inextricably intertwined' with the qualified immunity issues in this appeal. . . Having jurisdiction over this pendent appellate claim, we reverse the district court's denial of the city's motion for summary judgment on Roberts's ADA and Rehabilitation Act failure to train claims against the city."); Hagans v. Franklin County Sheriff's Office, 695 F.3d 505, 511 (6th Cir. 2012) ("To hold the Sheriff's Office liable, Hagans must show that its 'failure to train' officers on the proper use of tasers 'amounts to deliberate indifference.'. .

But 'a municipal policymaker cannot exhibit fault rising to the level of deliberate indifference to a constitutional right when that right has not yet been clearly established.' Szabla v. City of Brooklyn Park, 486 F.3d 385, 393 (8th Cir.2007) (en banc)"); Szabla v. City of Brooklyn Park, 486 F.3d 385, 393, 394 (8th Cir. 2007) (en banc) ("In this case, a constitutional requirement that an officer in Baker's situation give advance warning before commanding a canine to bite and hold a suspect was not clearly established as of August 2000. . . The need for training or other safeguards relating to warnings, therefore, was not so obvious at the time of this incident that Brooklyn Park's actions can properly be characterized as deliberate indifference to Szabla's constitutional rights. While a municipality does not enjoy qualified immunity from damages liability that results from a policy that is itself unconstitutional or from an unconstitutional decision by municipal policymakers, . . . we agree with the Second Circuit and several district courts that a municipal policymaker cannot exhibit fault rising to the level of deliberate indifference to a constitutional right when that right has not yet been clearly established. . . . [T]he lack of clarity in the law precludes a finding that the municipality had an unconstitutional policy at all, because its policymakers cannot properly be said to have exhibited a policy of deliberate indifference to constitutional rights that were not clearly established..").

See also Brown v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, No. 4:18 CV 1676 JMB, 2022 WL 1501368, at *6 (E.D. Mo. May 12, 2022) ("[T]he Eighth Circuit has 'consistently recognized a general rule that, in order for municipal liability to attach, individual liability first must be found on an underlying substantive claim.'. . Both Olsten and Hayden are entitled to qualified immunity on plaintiff's individual constitutional claims against them. Therefore, the City is entitled to summary judgment on her claim of municipal liability."); Ogrod v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 21-2499, 2022 WL 1093128, at *15 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 12, 2022) ("Courts of Appeals in other Circuits have held that a municipality cannot be deliberately indifferent to a right that is not clearly established. [collecting cases] While the Third Circuit has not yet addressed this same issue, district courts in this District have similarly concluded that where rights are not clearly established, there can be no municipal liability under Monell for violations of those rights because there can be no deliberate indifference. . . Here, the Monell claim against the City for municipal liability is grounded in part on the City's alleged failure to exercise sufficient oversight over, or to investigate and/or discipline, officers who used unconstitutional coercive techniques in interrogations, withheld exculpatory evidence, and 'pursue[d] profoundly flawed investigations and prosecutions,' as well as the City's alleged failure to train officers regarding their duties under Brady and other constitutional obligations. . . The precise contours of this claim are not clear, but, based on the caselaw above, we conclude that the claim fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted to the extent that it seeks to impose municipal liability for violations of rights that we have already found were not clearly established in 1996, because the City cannot be deliberately indifferent to such unestablished rights. Thus, we grant the City's Motion to Dismiss the Monell claim in Count IX insofar as it asserts that the City is liable for failure to train, oversee, or punish officers concerning Brady violations, the failure to intervene, the failure to conduct 'constitutionally adequate' investigations, and malicious prosecution in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. In other respects, however, the Monell claim will proceed."); Wiley for Thomas v. City of

Columbus, No. 2:17-CV-888, 2021 WL 2634860, at *14 (S.D. Ohio June 25, 2021) ("[T]he Sixth Circuit 'has consistently held that a municipality cannot be held liable on a failure to train theory where a right was not clearly established.' Tlapanco v. Elges, 969 F.3d 638, 657 (6th Cir. 2020) (collecting cases); see also Stewart v. City of Euclid, 970 F.3d 667, 676 (6th Cir. 2020) ("[The decedent's] rights were not clearly established in the precedent of this circuit or otherwise. Thus, violation of his rights cannot be the 'known or obvious consequence' disregarded by the City of Euclid through its training program and the Monell claim fails.") Because it was not clearly established that police officers responding to a medical emergency call could not apply pressure to the legs and lower back/hip area of a combative, non-compliant person in order to facilitate emergency medical treatment, the City of Columbus 'cannot exhibit fault rising to the level of deliberate indifference to a constitutional right when that right has not yet been clearly established.'"); Shields-Nordness v. Galindo, No. 18-CV-1426 (PJS/DTS), 2019 WL 1003114, at *8–9 & n.5 (D. Minn. Mar. 1, 2019) ("[A] municipality 'cannot exhibit fault rising to the level of deliberate indifference to a constitutional right when that right has not yet been clearly established.'. . That is 'because a municipality cannot deliberately shirk a constitutional duty unless that duty is clear.' Arrington-Bey v. City of Bedford Heights, 858 F.3d 988, 995 (6th Cir. 2017) (citing Szabla, 486 F.3d at 393). . . The Court has already held that, if Shields-Nordness had a constitutional right not to be strip searched and transferred to the general population, that right was not clearly established. In light of that fact, Ramsey County could not have 'exhibit[ed] fault rising to the level of deliberate indifference to [that] constitutional right ....' . . . Because Shields-Nordness has not plausibly pleaded deliberate indifference, she has not plausibly pleaded conduct that would shock the conscience—and because she has not plausibly pleaded conduct that would shock the conscience, she has not plausibly pleaded that Ramsey County deprived her of substantive due process. For that reason, her substantive-due-process claim against Ramsey County is dismissed. . . . In Szabla, the Eighth Circuit was addressing a claim that a municipality should be held liable because it adopted a policy that was constitutional on its face but that 'fail[ed] to give detailed guidance that might have averted a constitutional violation' by a municipal employee. . . Municipal liability attaches in such a case only when a 'city's inaction reflects a deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of the citizenry ....' . . . The Eighth Circuit explained that a municipality cannot act with deliberate indifference to constitutional rights that have not yet been clearly established. . .Here, by contrast, Shields-Nordness is alleging that the conduct of Ramsey County in adopting a facially unconstitutional policy was conscience-shocking and therefore deprived her of substantive due process. In order to hold Ramsey County liable, however, Shields-Nordness must establish that Ramsey County acted with deliberate indifference to her constitutional rights. Thus, Szabla's reasoning appears to apply with equal force in this context: Ramsey County could not have acted with deliberate indifference to a constitutional right of Shields-Nordness unless that right had been clearly established."); Thomas v. City of Philadelphia, 290 F.Supp.3d 371, 387 (E.D. Pa. 2018) ("Though no court within the Third Circuit has weighed in, several courts have held that a municipality cannot be deliberately indifferent to a right that is not clearly established. See Szabla v. City of Brooklyn Park, 486 F.3d 385, 393 (8th Cir. 2007) ("[A] municipal policymaker cannot exhibit fault rising to the level of deliberate indifference to a constitutional right when that right has not yet been clearly established."); see also Townes v. City of New York, 176 F.3d 138, 143–44 (2d Cir. 1999); Williamson v. City of Virginia Beach, 786 F. Supp. 1238, 1264-65 (E.D. Va. 1992); Zwalesky v. Manistee County, 749 F. Supp. 815, 820 (W.D. Mich. 1990). Because the rights at issue in the claims for Fourteenth Amendment malicious prosecution, Brady violations, and failure to investigate were not clearly established in 1994, the Court dismisses the Monell count as to these claims. The Court notes the narrowness of this conclusion: because the City concedes that Mr. Thomas has articulated a Monell claim for Fourth Amendment malicious prosecution and for Fourteenth Amendment fabrication of evidence, the Monell count itself survives.").

See also Jones v. City of St. Louis, 104 F.4th 1043, 1051 (8th Cir. 2024) ("Municipal entities are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . But our jurisdiction to review the denial of qualified immunity to individual supervisory Defendants Carson and Glass includes jurisdiction over pendent claims against the City that are 'inextricably intertwined' with the qualified immunity claims. . . A pendent claim is inextricably intertwined 'if resolution of the qualified immunity claim "necessarily resolves the pendent claim[ ] as well."'. . It is well established that 'there must be an unconstitutional act by a municipal employee before a municipality can be held liable.'. . Our conclusion that Jones has not plausibly alleged that his right not to be detained was violated by any City employee means that the alleged municipal policies and practices did not cause the constitutional injury Jones alleges. Jones's allegations that Defendants 'should have known' that he was incarcerated despite the criminal charges being dismissed fail to state a claim under either the Fourth Amendment or the Due Process Clause. Therefore, our conclusion that Count I must be dismissed for failure to state a claim 'necessarily resolves' the municipal liability issues.")

But see Watson v. Boyd, 119 F.4th 539, 562 (8th Cir. 2024) ("The defendants nonetheless assert that 'even if Officer Boyd's actions did violate Watson's constitutional rights, Officer Boyd is still entitled to qualified immunity because those claimed rights were not "clearly established."'. . 'As a result,' the City argues, it 'is entitled to summary judgment on its Monell claims because where a right is not clearly established, Watson cannot show the City's fault rose to the level of deliberate indifference.'. We disagree. It was clearly established at the time of the event that 'the First Amendment prohibits government officials from subjecting an individual to retaliatory actions ... for speaking out.'. . As a result, we reverse the grant of summary judgment on Watson's Monell claim. . . .Accordingly, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment on all claims except Watson's First Amendment retaliatory use-of-force claim and remand for further proceedings on that claim."); Nichols v. Wayne County, Michigan, 822 F. App'x 445, ___ (6th Cir. 2020) (Moore, J., dissenting in part), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 2716 (2021) ("The majority suggests that . . . Nichols's claim is barred for failure to allege the violation of a clearly established right. But this clearly-established-right defense does not apply '[w]hen an injury arises directly from a municipal act, ... because fault and causation obviously belong to the city.' Arrington-Bey v. City of Bedford Heights, 858 F.3d 988, 994–95 (6th Cir. 2017), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. 738 (2018). . . '[T]here is a significant difference between a Monell claim alleging that a municipal policy or custom caused a constitutional violation ... and a Monell claim alleging that a municipality's failure to train amounted to deliberate indifference.'. . When the first type of Monell claim is at issue, as is the case here, the violated right need not be clearly established. . . The majority argues that, as in Arrington-Bey, the policy-based Monell claim here is actually a failure-to-train claim, so the clearly-established-right defense applies. But we said nowhere in Arrington-Bey that claims based on a municipality's failure to institute a policy were per se identical to claims based on municipality's failure to train their employees. All we said in that case was that a plaintiff relying on a deliberate-indifference theory of municipal liability had to do more than show the lack of a policy. . . This case, unlike Arrington-Bey, is not about the actions of individual municipal employees and whether a municipality's deliberate indifference in training them is what led to the alleged harm. Rather, Nichols alleges that the City and County had a policy of failing to provide retention hearings for owners of vehicles seized pursuant to the MITPA. This claim does not involve failure-to-train allegations, and therefore Nichols need not demonstrate that these municipal defendants violated a clearly established right."); Contreras on behalf of A.L. v. Doña Ana County Bd. of County Commissioners, 965 F.3d 1114, 1139-41 (10th Cir. 2020) (Baldock, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part), cert. denied, 141 S. Ct. 1382 (2021) ("Relying on cases from our sister circuits, the district court alternatively concluded that because a failure-to-train claim requires a showing of deliberate indifference on the part of the DACDC, Plaintiff must also show the asserted right was clearly established at the time of the attack. See Arrington-Bey v. City of Bedford Heights, 858 F.3d 988 (6th Cir. 2017); Szabla v. City of Brooklyn Park, 486 F.3d 385 (8th Cir. 2007) (en banc); Townes v. City of New York, 176 F.3d 138, 143 (2d Cir. 1999). Judge Carson accepts this approach. I have my doubts. To be sure, not all Monell claims are created equal. But neither are all failure-to-train theories. As explained above, the Supreme Court has distinguished deliberate-indifference claims based on 'a pattern of tortious conduct by inadequately trained employees' from those based on 'evidence of a single violation of federal rights.'. . Brown's statement regarding an 'obvious potential for such a violation' concerned the latter. . . As this Court has explained, 'deliberate indifference may be found absent a pattern of unconstitutional behavior if a violation of federal rights is a highly predictable or plainly obvious consequence of a municipality's action or inaction.'. . Conversely, when a deliberate-indifference claim is based on a pattern of tortious conduct by inadequately trained employees, a plaintiff need not also prove the underlying violation was obvious (i.e., clearly established). This is because the pattern of unlawful behavior puts a municipal policymaker on sufficient 'notice that its action or failure to act is substantially certain to result in a constitutional violation[.]'. . Thus, a municipality can manifest deliberate indifference even when its employee (i.e., the individual defendant) did not violate clearly established law. The out-of-circuit authorities Judge Carson cites do not compel a contrary conclusion. In each of these cases, the plaintiff's deliberate-indifference claim was based on evidence of a single violation of federal rights, not a pattern of past tortious conduct by municipal employees. . .Perhaps requiring the violated right to be clearly established is the proper approach when dealing with deliberate-indifference claims premised on an isolated constitutional violation. On the other hand, maybe not. Consider the following hypothetical, which is based on a recent Eleventh Circuit decision:

> A municipal policymaker arms its police officers with firearms because it knows the officers will sometimes need to arrest dangerous individuals. Yet, the municipality fails to > train the officers regarding the lawful use of deadly force. During an investigation, an officer shoots a ten-year-old child lying on the ground within arm's reach of the officer, while repeatedly attempting to shoot a pet dog that wasn't posing any threat. The child's mother sues the officer for excessive force and also brings a Monell claim against the municipality for its failure to train the officer. A court holds, as the Eleventh Circuit did, that the officer is entitled to qualified immunity because his actions did not violate any clearly established rights. See Corbitt v. Vickers, 929 F.3d 1304, 1323 (11th Cir. 2019) ("Because we find no violation of a clearly established right, we need not reach the other qualified immunity question of whether a constitutional violation occurred in the first place."), cert. denied, No. 19-679, —— U.S. ——, —— S.Ct. ——, —— L.Ed.2d ——, 2020 WL 3146693 (U.S. June 15, 2020).

Applying the rule Judge Carson champions today, does this also 'spell the end of th[e] Monell claim' against the municipality? . . . If the answer is 'yes,' I fail to see how this deliberate-indifference standard doesn't effectively afford a form of vicarious immunity to municipalities. . . In my view, these are dangerous waters. . . Fortunately, we have no occasion in this case to lay down a categorical rule one way or the other because Plaintiff's deliberate-indifference claim against the DACDC is based on a pattern of tortious conduct by inadequately trained employees. Both the Supreme Court and this Court have unequivocally held such evidence may satisfy the deliberate-indifference element of a Monell claim. . . Because that settles the issue before us, I would leave for another day the question whether a deliberate-indifference claim based on a single violation of federal rights necessarily requires the asserted right to be clearly established."); Alvarez v. City of Brownsville, 904 F.3d 382, 404-06 (5th Cir. 2018) (en banc), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 2690 (2019) (Graves, J., joined by Costa, J., dissenting) ("I also disagree with the majority opinion's conclusion that a deliberate indifference theory of municipal liability was not viable because at the time we had not recognized a pre-plea right to Brady material. The City never made this 'clearly established' argument in the district court or in our court. By adopting it sua sponte, the court repeats the mistake we recently made in Hernandez v. Mesa, 785 F.3d 117 (5th Cir. 2015) (en banc). We held that a border patrol agent was entitled to qualified immunity for shooting a Mexican national because the law was not clearly established that the Fifth Amendment applied to a foreign citizen injured outside the United States. The Supreme Court reversed, explaining that the agent did not know at the time of the shooting whether the victim was a U.S. citizen. —— U.S. ——, 137 S.Ct. 2003, 2007, 198 L.Ed.2d 625 (2017). The same is true for the similar deliberate indifference inquiry here. When he failed to disclose the exculpatory video, Police Chief Garcia did not know that Alvarez was pleading guilty. Even more than in Mesa, he could not have known as that fact did not yet exist (that is, the plea decision had not yet been made). But Garcia knew that the way to comply with the Brady obligation that has long existed for cases that go to trial is to notify the criminal investigations division of exculpatory material in the IA file so it becomes part of the prosecutor's file later disclosed to the defense. There was not one procedure for transferring exculpatory evidence from the IAD side to the investigations side for 'trial' cases and a separate procedure for 'plea' cases. Because that transfer of the video to the investigations division did not happen, Garcia was deliberately indifferent to the long recognized Brady right for cases that get tried. It is true that some caselaw suggests that deliberate indifference liability applies only when the indifference is to a clearly established right. The idea, the same rationale for qualified immunity, is that liability should attach based on an individual's conduct only if there is a knowing violation of constitutional law. That culpability exists here because Garcia was deliberately indifferent to his constitutional obligation to turn over exculpatory evidence for a case that, like any other, could have resulted in a trial with the long recognized Brady right. Once that deliberate indifference to a clear constitutional right is established, it is just a matter of causation to show that the deliberate indifference to ensuring the criminal file contained exculpatory material led to Alvarez's constitutional injury that Judge Costa's opinion recognizes. . . .That such a complete failure to train on Brady rights is 'likely to result in the violation of constitutional rights' is 'obvious,'. . . because 'in the absence of training, there is no way for novice officers to obtain the legal knowledge they require.'. . Naturally, the resulting '[w]idespread officer ignorance on the proper handling of exculpatory materials would have the "highly predictable consequence" of due process violations.'. . Brownsville's complete lack of training on Brady rights evidences 'deliberate indifference to the [constitutional] rights of persons with whom the police come into contact.'. . .The district court thought the evidence showing municipal liability was so strong that it granted summary judgment on that issue in favor of the plaintiff. The majority opinion does a 180-degree turn and holds there is no municipal liability as a matter of law. For the reasons I have discussed, at a minimum, there are factual disputes that a jury should resolve on municipal liability. I respectfully dissent."); Szabla v. City of Brooklyn Park, 486 F.3d 385, 403, 404 (8th Cir. 2007) (en banc) (Gibson, J., with whom Wollman, Bye, and Melloy, JJ., join dissenting) ("In the face of these two Supreme Court holdings [Owen and Pembaur], our court today holds that in cases of municipal liability that depend on a showing of deliberate indifference (i.e., most of them), a municipality cannot be liable unless the law was clearly established at the time of its action. . . Thus, via the words 'deliberate indifference,' our court imports the qualified immunity standard into municipal liability.").

See also Molina v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, No. 4:17-CV-2498-AGF, 2025 WL 506548, at *8-9, *11-12 (E.D. Mo. Feb. 14, 2025) ("The City argues that it cannot be liable for any violation of a constitutional right that was not clearly established. According to the City, because the Eighth Circuit held that Plaintiffs' First Amendment rights were not clearly established in 2015, the City could not have been deliberately indifferent to any violations of those rights. Plaintiffs argue that the City can still be held liable for tacitly authorizing an unconstitutional custom because failing to hold municipalities accountable for constitutional violations solely because a constitutional right was not clearly established at the time of an incident would de facto grant municipalities qualified immunity. While the Eighth Circuit has not always been clear in discussing the relationship between individual and municipal liability, the Court finds Plaintiffs' arguments more persuasive and consistent with prior Eighth Circuit precedent. . . The City relies principally on Lombardo v. City of St. Louis, 38 F.4th 684 (8th Cir. 2022) and Graham v. Barnette, 5 F.4th 872 (8th Cir. 2021). In both Lombardo and Graham, the Eighth Circuit held that '[w]here the municipality has not directly inflicted an injury… "rigorous standards of culpability and causation must be applied" and a showing of deliberate indifference is required.'. . Furthermore,

'a deliberate indifference claim fails in [t]he absence of clearly established constitutional rights, so-called clear constitutional guideposts for municipalities in the area.'. . This 'lack of clarity in the law precludes a finding that the municipality had an unconstitutional policy at all, because its policymakers cannot properly be said to have exhibited a policy of deliberate indifference to constitutional rights that were not clearly established.'. . Lombardo and Graham, however, address claims of liability based upon municipal policy and a failure to train, not based on custom. Both Lombardo and Graham rely on Szabla v. City of Brooklyn Park, 486 F.3d 385 (8th Cir. 2007) (en banc). . . In Szabla, however, the Eighth Circuit explicitly stated that '[t]he separate doctrine providing for municipal liability in a case of widespread unconstitutional practices that constitute a "custom" or usage with the force of law' was not at issue in the case. . . Plaintiffs argue that the claims in this case are distinguishable from Lombardo and Graham precisely because the City tacitly authorized a custom of unconstitutional conduct. . . They rely principally on Webb v. City of Maplewood for their argument that an unconstitutional custom can be found—and a city held liable—even in cases where 'officials all enjoy personal immunity from suit, [because] it hardly follows that they did not engage in any unlawful acts or that the City is thereby immune as well.'. . Even absent individual liability, '[w]hether the challenged acts occurred, whether they were unlawful, and whether the City is liable for them under [Monell] would still be open questions.'. . The Eighth Circuit has 'long held for that reason that a municipality may be held liable for its unconstitutional policy or custom even when no official has been found personally liable for his conduct under the policy or custom.'. . The City's and Plaintiffs' arguments address two separate concerns in the case law stemming from Monell: (1) ensuring that a finding of municipal liability does not de facto create respondeat superior liability; and (2) ensuring that a finding of qualified immunity for an individual does not create de facto immunity for the municipality. . . . The City has not cited to any case holding that a right must be clearly established before a plaintiff can demonstrate municipal liability based on a custom. . . On the contrary, the Eighth Circuit's test for unconstitutional custom does not require deliberate indifference to a constitutional right. Rather, the custom test requires deliberate indifference to or tacit authorization of unconstitutional misconduct by municipal employees. . . Indeed, in other cases where individual officers were found to have qualified immunity, the Eighth Circuit has not adopted the City's proposed standard and test, but instead has addressed the merits of the claim. See Cartia v. Beeman, 122 F,4th 1036, 1045 (8th Cir. 2024) (applying the Eighth Circuit's typical custom test and analysis even after finding that the officers at issue did not violate a clearly established right); see also Leonard v. St. Charles Cnty. Police Dep't., 59 F.4th 355 (8th Cir. 2023) (same). Under the City's analysis, the finding that the law was not clearly established would make any further analysis unnecessary. . . . Here, Plaintiffs have alleged and presented evidence that creates a question of fact regarding whether the City tacitly approved an unconstitutional custom, that is, that Defendant sanctioned a continuing, widespread, and consistent pattern of unconstitutional misconduct, and that pattern of sanctioned unconstitutional misconduct led to Plaintiffs' injuries. To hold that the City cannot, as a matter of law, be liable for unconstitutional custom merely because the individual officers at issue were entitled to qualified immunity would risk granting the City de facto qualified immunity. Such a reading would be fundamentally inconsistent with Monell and with Eighth Circuit precedent. . . . the existence of a municipal custom is a fact question for the jury. Mettler v. Whitledge, 165 F.3d

1197, 1204 (8th Cir. 1999). Applying the Eighth Circuit's decision and viewing the totality of the evidence in the present record, including the new evidence presented by the City, in a light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the Court believes that a jury could still find that the City's customs and practices permitted officers to deploy chemical munitions in an indiscriminate and retaliatory manner in violation of citizens' First Amendment rights, that the City's officials were notified of unconstitutional misconduct and were deliberately indifferent to it or tacitly authorized it, and that the City's customs and practices were the moving force behind the deprivation of Plaintiffs' rights on August 19, 2015. Because genuine issues of material fact must be resolved by a jury, the City is not entitled to summary judgment on Count IV as it relates to Plaintiffs' First Amendment claims."); Pena v. City of Lancaster, No. CV 21-590, 2023 WL 5807005, at *13 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 7, 2023) ("Defendants argue that for liability to attach to the City, 'Plaintiff must first establish that one of its employees is primarily liable under § 1983.'. . Because this Court found that Officer Arnold is entitled to qualified immunity as to the shooting of Mr. Muñoz, Defendants would have the Court find that there can be no Monell liability for the City as well for purposes of Count II. The case law on this point is not as clear as Defendants would have it. One the one hand, the Third Circuit has held that because the Monell court rejected municipal liability on a theory of respondeat superior, a municipality 'cannot be vicariously liable under Monell unless one of [its] employees is primarily liable under section 1983 itself.' Williams v. Borough of W. Chester, Pa., 891 F.2d 458, 467 (3d Cir. 1989). But on the other hand, a lack of primary liability for a police officer would not necessarily preclude finding, pursuant to Monell, that a municipality maintained a policy or custom that resulted in a constitutional violation, and the Third Circuit has since recognized as much. [citing Kneipp and Simmons] Further complicating the picture, certain courts in this District have endorsed the view—shared by various circuit courts but not addressed by the Third Circuit—that '[i]f the right at issue is not "clearly established" [for purposes of qualified immunity], then any assertion of deliberate indifference is substantially undercut because, by definition, there are no "clear constitutional guideposts" for the municipality to follow in developing policy.', , This Court agrees that the lack of a clearly established right 'undercuts' the likelihood that a municipality was deliberately indifferent to that right, but the Court will not treat such a lack as a per se bar to Monell liability."); Crosland v. City of Philadelphia, No. CV 22-2416, 2023 WL 3898855, at *12-13 & n.17 (E.D. Pa. June 8, 2023) ("Unlike individual government officials, municipalities are not entitled to qualified immunity under § 1983. . . Nonetheless, municipal liability under a 'failure to train, discipline, or supervise' theory requires a showing that the municipality was 'deliberate[ly] indifferen[t]' to the underlying constitutional violation. . . Relying on several out-of-circuit cases and decisions from this district adopting their reasoning, Philadelphia argues that a municipality can only be 'deliberately indifferent' to a constitutional violation if the underlying right was clearly established at the time. Phila. Mot. (ECF 36) at 20.[17] [fn. 17: There is an unresolved circuit split on this question. The First, Fifth, Sixth, and Eighth Circuits have held that a municipality can only be deliberately indifferent to a clearly established right. [collecting cases] Several courts in this district have adopted the reasoning of these decisions. [collecting cases] The Ninth and Tenth Circuits, in contrast, have rejected this categorical rule. [collecting cases] Panels of the Second Circuit have gone both ways. [comparing cases]] Adopting the city's analysis would import the 'clearly established' inquiry from qualified immunity doctrine into the municipal liability standard. . . See Joanna C. Schwartz, Backdoor Municipal Immunity, 132 Yale L.J. F. 136, 138 (2022). I reject this 'conflation' of qualified immunity and municipal liability standards. . .While the Third Circuit has not squarely addressed this question in a precedential opinion, its caselaw suggests that municipal liability should remain untethered to the 'clearly established' qualified immunity standard. In two recent cases, the court found that individual defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because the relevant right was not clearly established, but nonetheless remanded the municipal liability issue to the district court. Fields v. City of Phila., 862 F.3d 353, 362 (3d Cir. 2017); Barna v. Bd. of Sch. Dirs. of Panther Valley Sch. Dist., 877 F.3d 136, 150 (3d Cir. 2017). This approach accords with prior circuit precedent, which 'requires the district court to review the plaintiffs' municipal liability claims independently of the section 1983 claims against the individual police officers, as the City's liability ... does not depend upon the liability of any police officer.'. . Requiring that a right be clearly established in a municipal liability claim would also contravene the Supreme Court's decision in Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U.S. 622 (1980). In that case, the Court held that 'municipalities have no immunity from damages liability flowing from their constitutional violations.' . . Transposing the 'clearly established' inquiry—the crux of the qualified immunity defense—onto the municipal liability standard would 'cut away the core principle of Monell and Owen: [that l]ocal governments ... should be held liable for the losses they cause.'. . And there is simply no need to do so. The Supreme Court and Third Circuit have laid out, in great detail, the standards governing municipal liability claims under § 1983. . . These standards are already demanding. See Fred Smith, Local Sovereign Immunity, 116 Colum. L. Rev. 409, 430-38 (2016); Joanna C. Schwartz, Municipal Immunity, 109 Va. L. Rev. (forthcoming 2023). Absent binding authority from either court, I decline to impose additional requirements on Crosland. The motion to dismiss the municipal liability claim to the extent it relies on rights that were not clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct will therefore be denied."); Quintana v. City and County of Denver, No. 20-CV-0214-WJM-KLM, 2021 WL 2913044, at *5 (D. Colo. July 12, 2021) ("[U]nder Tenth Circuit precedent, a Monell claim is not automatically subject to dismissal upon a determination that the law is not clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. As the Tenth Circuit ruled in Hinton v. City of Elwood, Kansas,

When a finding of qualified immunity is predicated on the basis that the law is not clearly established, it is indeed correct that there is nothing anomalous about allowing [a suit against a municipality] to proceed when immunity shields the individual defendants, for the availability of qualified immunity does not depend on whether a constitutional violation has occurred.

997 F.2d 774, 783 (10th Cir. 1993) . . . Defendants do not contend that Plaintiff's proposed Second Amended Complaint does not plausibly allege constitutional violations under the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment. . . Nor do they argue that Plaintiff has failed to plausibly allege a policy or custom giving rise to Monell liability. . .Because Defendants have failed to demonstrate that amendment as to Plaintiff's Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment claims against Denver would be futile, the Court grants this portion of the Motion.").

See also Estate of Walker v. Wallace, 881 F.3d 1056, 1062 (8th Cir. 2018) (Kelly, J., concurring) ("I agree that Hershell Wallace is entitled to qualified immunity. I write to note that

St. Louis's municipal liability is not before us on this appeal. The plaintiffs made three claims relating to Wallace's Project 87 inspection. One of those claims sought to hold Wallace personally liable—this appeal disposes of that claim. The remaining two claims seek to hold the City of St. Louis liable for an unconstitutional policy under Monell v. Dep't of Social Servs. of N.Y.C., 436 U.S. 658, 98 S. Ct. 2018, 56 L.Ed.2d 611 (1978). We express no opinion on the district court's denial of summary judgment on these Monell claims. And, because we grant Wallace qualified immunity based on a lack of clearly-established law, our ruling is not determinative of whether his employer is liable for effectuating an unconstitutional policy. . . Thus, our opinion does not foreclose the plaintiffs from pursuing their Monell claims based on Project 87 searches.")

See also Ziegler v. Martin Cty. Sch. Dist., 831 F.3d 1309, 1326-27 (11th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e have determined Officer Brush is entitled to qualified immunity, because holding students from the party bus after they had passed the breathalyzer test until all the student passengers had been breathalyzed was not [contrary to] clearly established law at that time. Consequently, there can be no liability for Sheriff Snyder for failing to train Officer Brush in this regard."); Fletcher v. Town of Clinton, 196 F.3d 41, 56 (1st Cir. 1999) ("While a finding that the law was not clearly established may foreclose municipal liability for failure to train, see Joyce, 112 F.3d at 23, a finding that the law was clearly established does not dispose of the municipality's motion for summary judgment. Rather, the court must go on to consider whether allegations of a municipal policy or practice have been made that are sufficient to survive summary judgment."); Joyce v. Town of Tewksbury, 112 F.3d 19, 23 (1st Cir. 1997) ("[O]ur rationale here for granting qualified immunity to the officers − that the unsettled state of the law made it reasonable to believe the conduct in this case constitutional − also precludes municipal liability. Tewksbury could not have been 'deliberately indifferent' to citizens' rights . . . in failing to teach the officers that their conduct was unconstitutional."); Gonzalez v. Ysleta Independent School District, 996 F.2d 745, 760 (5th Cir. 1993) ("It therefore may well be, as several district courts have held, that 'to be deliberately indifferent to rights requires that those rights be clearly established.'" [citing Watson]); Barber v. City of Salem, 953 F.2d 232, 240 (6th Cir. 1992) ("[W]here no constitutional violation exists for failure to take special precautions, none exists for failure to promulgate policies and to better train personnel to detect and deter jail suicides."); Zappala v. Albicelli, 980 F. Supp. 635, 639 (N.D.N.Y. 1997) ("In the present case, the Court notes that its finding that the individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity probably precludes municipal liability for a related 'failure to train' claim. That is because if the independent actors' conduct was objectively reasonable given the circumstances, it logically follows that the unconstitutional nature of the resulting conduct could not have been 'highly predictable' to the Liverpool School District."), aff'd, 173 F.3d 848 (2d Cir. 1999); Mason v. Stock, 955 F. Supp. 1293, 1304 n.9 (D. Kan. 1997) ("A finding that an officer is entitled to qualified immunity because the officer's conduct did not violate the law is equivalent to a decision on the merits of the claim and precludes the imposition of any municipal liability. On the other hand, when qualified immunity is predicated on the basis that the law is not clearly established, the corresponding claim against a municipality may proceed."); B.M.H. v. The School Board of the City of Chesapeake, 833 F. Supp. 560, 572 (E.D. Va. 1993) ("[T]he Court is of the opinion that a § 1983 action based on a 'deliberately indifferent' policy or custom of the School Board first requires an underlying constitutional deprivation in order to stand."); Williamson v. City of Virginia Beach, 786 F. Supp. 1238, 1264-65 (E.D. Va. 1992) ("[T]he conclusion that [constitutional rights] were not clearly established negates the proposition that the city acted with deliberate indifference."), aff'd, 991 F.2d 793 (4th Cir. 1993).

See also Triolo v. Nassau County, 24 F.4th 98, 110-13 (2d Cir. 2022) ("The County is not entitled to qualified immunity, and, despite defendants' contentions otherwise, Lee's immunity does not somehow transfer to his municipal employer. The Supreme Court has explicitly rejected the idea that municipalities are entitled to qualified immunity under federal law. . . . We turn then to the issue of whether the County may be vicariously liable for damages caused by its employee under New York state law, even though that employee is entitled to individual immunity. . . . We agree, as does Triolo, that a municipal employer cannot be vicariously liable in the absence of unlawful conduct. Here, however, Lee engaged in unlawful conduct when he arrested Triolo without probable cause. Thus, the question is whether a municipal employer can be held vicariously liable for its individually immune employee under New York state law when that employee has been found liable for an underlying wrong. It can.New York law is clear that municipalities can be liable for the actions of police officers on false arrest claims under a theory of respondeat superior. . . . The next question is whether New York law categorically bars a principal's vicarious liability when an agent is individually immune. It does not. New York courts have addressed this question in the context of spousal and other immunities. . . And although these cases are plainly distinguishable in that they did not involve municipal liability, they do support the conclusion that an agent's immunity is not a categorical bar to the principal's vicarious liability. Basic agency principles outlined in the Restatement (Second) of Agency (the "Restatement") provide similar guidance. . . Lee was acting within the scope of employment when he arrested Triolo. Defendants do not directly respond to Triolo's argument that the County, just like any other principal-employer, has respondeat superior liability for its agent-employee's wrongdoing, even when that agent is entitled to personal immunity from damages. We see no reason why those basic agency principles would not apply here. . . . In sum, the County remains vicariously liable under New York law for the compensatory damages because (1) municipalities are not entitled to qualified immunity, (2) municipal employers may be vicariously liable on state law claims brought against their police officer employees, (3) a principal remains liable for damages caused by its agent, even when that agent is individually immune, and (4) Lee was acting within the scope of his employment when he arrested Triolo. Thus, even though Lee is shielded from personally paying for the damages he caused by falsely arresting Triolo, the County remains liable for those damages under New York state law.")

See also Chinaryan v. City of Los Angeles, 113 F.4th 888, 893, 902 (9th Cir. 2024) ("It was clearly established in Washington v. Lambert, 98 F.3d 1181 (9th Cir. 1996), and Green v. City & County of San Francisco, 751 F.3d 1039 (9th Cir. 2014), that officers can be held liable for conducting a high-risk vehicle stop based on nothing more than a reasonable suspicion that the vehicle was stolen. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity on plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claims. . . . Defendants are correct that Washington and Green 'did not establish bright-line rules on the reasonableness of high-risk stops.' Nonetheless, these cases established that for summary judgment purposes, reasonable suspicion of vehicle theft alone is not enough to justify the intrusive tactics used here absent some case-specific need for them. . . Because a jury could find that the totality of the circumstances here did not justify the officers' tactics, the district court erred in ruling that the officer defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Taking a different tack, defendants attempt to distinguish Green procedurally. They assert that '[t]his case, unlike Green, is ... on appeal from a jury verdict,' and '[t]here is no question what a reasonable jury might do, because a reasonable jury has already ruled in [defendants'] favor.' But defendants do not explain how the jury verdict in favor of the City and the LAPD bears on whether the district court earlier erred in granting summary judgment to the individual officers. Because it was clearly established under Washington and Green that the officers' conduct, viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, constituted excessive force, we reverse the grant of summary judgment in favor of the individual officers on plaintiffs' § 1983 claims.")

15. Note on Bifurcation

Heller is often cited as support for motions to bifurcate in police misconduct cases where recovery is sought against both the individual officer[s] involved, as well as the government entity. See generally Colbert, Bifurcation of Civil Rights Defendants: Undermining Monell in Police Brutality Cases, 44 Hastings L.J. 499 (1993). See Lund v. Henderson, 807 F.3d 6, 12 (1st Cir. 2015) ("Given our conclusion that the district court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence of other allegations against Henderson, Lund's remaining challenges to the district court's trial rulings fall like dominoes. Excluding evidence in the trial against the two officers of complaints against officers other than Henderson and Walcek was, a fortiori, well within the trial court's discretion. And the decision to hold for a second phase the claims against the Town, in which such evidence might be admissible, was a classic exercise of the trial court's management discretion, see Fed.R.Civ.P. 42(b), especially where there was the possibility that the resolution of the first phase would moot the need for the second phase, Wilson v. Town of Mendon, 294 F.3d 1, 7 (1st Cir.2002) (discussing how bifurcating trials is common when litigation of one issue may eliminate the need to try another issue). Lund is unable to cite to a case in which we have overturned a district court's grant or denial of a Rule 42 motion to consolidate or bifurcate trials. See, e.g., Gonzalez–Marin, 845 F.2d at 1145 (noting the appellant's "fail[ure] to cite a single case in which an appellate court has reversed a decision for failure to bifurcate" and its own inability "to find any"). The record provides no cause to deviate from that pattern."); Wilson v. Morgan, 477 F.3d 326, 339, 340 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Plaintiffs moved to bifurcate the second trial to separate their claims against the individual defendants from their claims against the county, but argued that the claims against the county should proceed first. Plaintiffs argued that the county had a custom and practice of using investigative detentions that amounted to arrest without probable cause that was itself a violation of federal law sufficient to establish municipal liability under Monell . . . . Defendants agreed that separate trials were appropriate, but argued that the claims against the individual officers should proceed first instead. The magistrate judge determined that bifurcation would be an expeditious way to proceed, but decided that, in light of Monell, trial should proceed first on the claims against the individual officers. We find no abuse of discretion in this regard. There can be no Monell municipal liability under § 1983 unless there is an underlying unconstitutional act. City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796, 799, 106 S.Ct. 1571, 89 L.Ed.2d 806 (1986). [citing Heller] . . . . The magistrate judge's decision to bifurcate the trial was eminently reasonable in the interests of judicial economy and avoiding possible juror confusion. It was not an abuse of discretion to bifurcate individual liability from municipal liability, and it would be illogical to try the municipality first since its liability under § 1983 could not be determined without a determination of the lawfulness of the individuals' actions. . . . In fact, because the jury found no constitutional violation by the individual defendants, the county could not have been found liable under Monell for an allegedly unconstitutional custom or policy. Plaintiffs also argue that trying the claims against the individual officers first was prejudicial because it deprived them of the opportunity to present 'habit and practice' evidence that would have shown a practice of investigative detentions and allowed plaintiffs to argue that the officers were acting in conformity with that practice. Bifurcation, however, did not prevent plaintiffs from presenting that evidence. It was rather the magistrate judge's ruling that the evidence was not relevant to the question of individual liability. Plaintiffs attempted to introduce the evidence under Fed.R.Evid. 406, which provides: 'Evidence of the habit of a person or of the routine practice of an organization, whether corroborated or not and regardless of the presence of eyewitnesses, is relevant to prove that the conduct of the person or organization on a particular occasion was in conformity with the habit or routine practice.' The magistrate judge did not err in excluding the evidence under Fed.R.Evid. 401 and 403 because even if the department had a practice of investigative detentions (i.e., arrests based on less than probable cause), such a practice would be irrelevant if the officers had probable cause to arrest."); Wilson v. Town of Mendon, 294 F.3d 1, 7 (1st Cir. 2002) ("Without a finding of a constitutional violation on the part of a municipal employee, there cannot be a finding of section 1983 damages liability on the part of the municipality. [citing Heller] Thus, a defendant's verdict in a bifurcated trial forecloses any further action against the municipality, resulting in less expense for the litigants, and a lighter burden on the court. . . On the other hand, a verdict against the municipal employee will almost always result in satisfaction of the judgment by the municipality because of the indemnification provisions typically found in bargaining agreements between municipalities and their employee unions. There is, however, nothing to prevent a plaintiff from foregoing the naming of an individual officer as a defendant and proceeding directly to trial against the municipality. . . . The added expense aside, the reasons that plaintiffs almost never choose to proceed against the municipality directly are self-evident. The predicate burden of proving a constitutional harm on the part of a municipal employee remains an element of the case regardless of the route chosen and is much easier to flesh out when the tortfeasor is a party amenable to the full powers of discovery. The burden of placing that harm in the context of a causative municipal custom and policy is significantly more onerous than the task of simply proving that an actionable wrong occurred. And finally, an abstract entity like a municipality may present a much less compelling face to a jury than a flesh and blood defendant."); Treece v. Hochstetler, 213 F.3d 360, 365 (7th Cir. 2000) (upholding trial judge's discretion to bifurcate especially in light of fact that City agreed to entry of judgment against itself should jury find individual officer liable); Amato v. City of Saratoga Springs, 170 F.3d 311, 318, 321 (2d Cir. 1999) (upholding bifurcation and plaintiff's right to proceed against the municipality for nominal damages, noting "a finding against officers in their individual capacities does not serve all the purposes of, and is not the equivalent of, a judgment against the municipality.").

See also Tserkis v. Baltimore County, No. CV ELH-19-202, 2019 WL 4932596, at *5–8 (D. Md. Oct. 4, 2019) ("Cases that contain Monell claims 'are good candidates for bifurcation.'. . Bifurcation can advance the efficient and convenient resolution of the case because where there is no 'initial finding that a government employee violated a plaintiff's constitutional rights,....no subsequent trial of the municipality is necessary.'. . In addition, bifurcation might spare the parties from expending valuable resources in discovery, because resolution of the claims as to the individual defendants may obviate the need to litigate the Monell claim. . . Equally important, bifurcation prevents the potential prejudice to individual defendants that may result from the introduction of inflammatory evidence concerning the municipality's policies, practices, or customs. . . This is especially true in excessive force cases, where the Monell evidence would include 'prior incidents of police brutality and policymakers' reactions to such incidents.'. . Although such evidence 'is relevant under the Monell analysis,' it might unfairly bias the jury as to the liability of the individual defendants. . .Courts in this district have consistently ruled that in cases such as this one bifurcation 'is appropriate and often desirable.'. . .Defendants argue that bifurcation of the Monell claim against the County is warranted 'to prevent the [Officers] from suffering unfair prejudice by the introduction of" evidence concerning other instances of police misconduct, and because 'discovery into such "policies or practices" would be unduly burdensome unless and until a constitutional violation is proven in the first place.'. . Plaintiffs disagree. They contend that determining the liability of the Officers first will not expedite the resolution of this lawsuit. They posit that, even if the Officers are found not liable, plaintiffs may nonetheless have a viable Monell claim against the County. . . Further, plaintiffs maintain that bifurcation is unnecessary to prevent prejudice to the Officers because, 'as in criminal trials, the Court can administer "limiting jury instructions"....'. . . In my view, bifurcation is appropriate in this case because it will prevent prejudice to the individual defendants and because it best serves judicial economy. First, bifurcation will protect against the risk of unfair prejudice to the Officer Defendants. . . . As discussed, '[e]vidence of the County's custom, practice or policy may include evidence of "prior incidents of police brutality, the nature of such incidents, and the municipal policy-makers' reaction to them."'. . . . Plaintiffs assert that, in the event this case proceeded to trial, a limiting instruction would easily cure any potential prejudice to the defendants caused by the introduction of Monell evidence against the County. . . But, the introduction of Monell evidence in a trial involving the Officers would inject an issue not necessarily relevant to the individual defendants; it is potentially inflammatory; and the reality is that it would be difficult for the jury to compartmentalize such evidence. . . In short, a limiting instruction is not as effective as bifurcation in guarding against the concerns outlined above. . . Given the far-reaching scope of Monell discovery, it makes good sense to establish first whether a constitutional violation occurred. This is because the absence of such a violation might well make discovery unnecessary with respect to the County. Moreover, bifurcating the claims against the County and the Officer

Defendants would promote judicial economy. . . Determining whether the Officer Defendants violated the Decedent's constitutional rights is a prerequisite to establishing liability against the County. . . Failure to bifurcate the Monell claim would prolong the trial, because plaintiffs would necessarily have to present evidence pertinent to the Monell claim, while also producing evidence as to the Officers. Bifurcation 'preserves scarce judicial and party resources by avoiding expenses related to [plaintiffs'] Monell claims until [they] ha[ve] established the existence of an underlying constitutional violation.'. .In other words, bifurcation will facilitate an expeditious trial as to the individual defendants by avoiding the delay inherent in the discovery process as to the Monell claim. It would also narrow the issues for trial. This would lead to a reduction of costs, without any real prejudice to plaintiff. . . Nonetheless, plaintiffs insist that bifurcating the Monell claim is inefficient because the County could still be liable under § 1983 even if the Officer Defendants are not. To be sure, 'Monell...and its progeny do not require that a jury must first find an individual defendant liable before imposing liability on [a] local government.'. . There are some narrow circumstances in which 'a finding of no liability on the part of the individual municipal actors can co-exist with a finding of liability on the part of the municipality.'. . One such situation is when the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Thus, plaintiffs are correct that bifurcation could theoretically result in two trials, rather than one. However, this possibility does not alter my calculus. The key question is whether the Officers committed constitutional violations, not whether they can be held liable for them. Plaintiffs will have a viable Monell claim against the County, despite the Officers being found not liable, if the fact-finder concludes that the Officers violated Mr. Evans' constitutional rights, and that those rights were not clearly established, such that the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity. On the other hand, if the fact-finder concludes that the Officers are not liable under § 1983 on the ground that they did not violate Mr. Evans' constitutional rights, then plaintiffs' Monell claim would founder as a matter of law. In either circumstance, the question of whether any police officer committed a constitutional violation is central to plaintiffs' claims against the County. . . .In my view, bifurcation is appropriate because it will promote judicial economy, conserve the parties' resources, prevent prejudice to the Officers, and will not prejudice the plaintiffs."); Hutchins v. McKay, No. 3:16-CV-30008-MAP, 2018 WL 443446, at *9–10 (D. Mass. Jan. 16, 2018) ("Defendant's concern about the potential prejudice faced by individual police officers where claims against them and the City are tried jointly is reasonable. It is likely that evidence of 'prior bad acts' by the individual officers may be relevant to the Monell claim but excluded entirely in a separate trial against the officers. On the other hand, Plaintiff's concerns are also legitimate. Where a plaintiff does not prevail in his suit against the named officers, the Monell claim falls away. . . But even where a plaintiff does prevail in the first suit, and receives a full and fair measure of damages, that plaintiff has little incentive to pursue his claim against the City in a second trial. . . The reality is that allowance of a motion for bifurcation, where the trial against the officers proceeds first, can in effect mean that a Monell claim disappears irrespective of its merits. The solution to all these concerns is to allow the motion to bifurcate, but proceed with trial of the Monell claim first. Relevant evidence of prior bad acts may be weighed by the jury in the trial against the City, without risk of prejudice to Defendant officers. Of course, Plaintiff will bear the burden of proving at this trial both the existence of a custom or policy, and a causal connection between the custom or policy and his injuries. Put differently, even if Plaintiff can prove an unconstitutional custom or policy, he will not be entitled to recover unless he can prove a violation of his constitutional rights by the officers stemming from that policy. Admittedly, some considerations of economy may weigh in favor of trying the claims against the individual officers first. If, for example, Plaintiff fails to prove the existence of an unconstitutional custom or policy, or a causal link between that policy and his injury, then the jury will return a verdict for the City on the Monell claim. A trial against the individual officers will thereafter be necessary, with much of the same evidence regarding the January 20, 2013, incident. This, however, is a bearable (and not inevitable) imposition, in order to permit Plaintiff to have his day in court on his Monell claim and to protect the important policy considerations underlying such a claim."); Cordero v. City of New York, No. 15-CV-3436, 2017 WL 4685544, at *2-4 (E.D.N.Y. Oct. 17, 2017) ("In the present case the court will allow the plaintiff to proceed against the City of New York on Monell grounds that allege the failure to take reasonable steps to control lying by police officers is a policy of the NYPD. . . His theory is that the police department has long been aware of a wide-spread practice of false arrests at the end of tours of duty in order to obtain overtime and that it has failed to sufficiently address this practice. . . Plaintiff argues that the city's policy is not to track or adequately discipline policemen for testifying falsely. And that it has failed to supervise or properly discipline police officers with a record of being unsuccessful defendants in Title 42 U.S. Code Section 1983 cases because they fabricated evidence. . . . The city is being sued on the theory that its overtime policy and policy on lying by its officers encouraged their unlawful action. . . One difficulty in administering such a case if it goes to a joint trial on individual and Monell claims is that the City of New York will be prejudiced in defending its liability by evidence about the individual officers' lack of veracity. The individual defendants will suffer prejudice by the introduction of wide-spread municipal misconduct—lying by police officers—needed to prove a municipal policy. Plaintiff may be inhibited by exclusion of relevant evidence prejudicial to the defendants. . . To avoid these evidentiary problems, the court has ordered a bifurcated trial. The first phase will be against the officer defendants, the second phase on the Monell issue will only need to go forward if the jury finds against the individual defendants in the first phase. . . The city, at a hearing on the defendants' summary judgment motion, has in effect admitted liability on the Monell claim if an individual defendant is found liable by stating: 'If plaintiff wins [on the individual claim], we will consent. You can throw the City in the judgment and we will throw a dollar to it and we will avoid the second trial.'. . The dollar damages suggested somewhat contemptuously by the city's counsel is not a convincing argument for rejecting a trial of the Monell phase. Even if the city's damages, whether or not the Monell phase goes forward, will be the same, a finding by a petty jury that a municipal policy encouraged widespread police officer misconduct can be significant. It may indicate the need for more careful tracking of individual police officer's litigation history and a more effective discipline policy to avoid repeated lying by a number of officers. . . . The following claims will be tried in phase I: (1) false arrest against Officer Hugasian; (2) malicious prosecution against Officer Hugasian; (3) denial of a right to a fair trial against Officer Hugasian; (4) unlawful strip search against Officer Rubin; (5) failure to intervene, by Officer Essig, in the alleged strip-search; and (6) supervisory liability against Lieutenant Moran. In phase II Monell claims against the City of New York will be tried, if any of individual claims 1 to 6 are found proven by the jury."); Harrison v. City of Atlantic City, No. 114CV06292NLHAMD, 2017 WL 2256961, at *7–8 (D.N.J. May 23, 2017) ("In this case, if, after a jury has answered its special interrogatories as to Plaintiff's excessive force claims, the Court concludes that none of the defendant officers violated Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights and they are entitled to qualified immunity, the principle announced in Heller and applied by the Third Circuit would appear to warrant the dismissal of Plaintiff's municipal liability claims against Atlantic City. It would seem to be, at a minimum, a waste of judicial resources to assess Plaintiff's Monell claims against Atlantic City now if such claims ultimately may not be viable. . . Accordingly, the Court will direct the parties to show cause as to why Plaintiff's claims against the officers and Plaintiff's claims against Atlantic City should not be bifurcated, where the Court will consider Atlantic City's motion for summary judgment only if Plaintiff prevails on his excessive force claims against at least one defendant officer."); Dickerson v. Rock Island Police Officer Ramirez, No. 413CV04003JESJEH, 2015 WL 5297516, at *3 (C.D. Ill. Sept. 10, 2015) ("The nature of the constitutional violation considered together with the theory of municipal liability as alleged in the Amended Complaint suggest that an inconsistent verdict may be created if the claims are not bifurcated. The Plaintiff alleges that Defendant Ramirez used excessive force and that Defendant City has a pervasive practice and custom of failing to adequately train, supervise, control, discipline, and dismiss its officers concerning the use of excessive force, as well as a policy of inadequately reporting, reviewing, and investigating use of force and excessive force incidents, and finally a code of silence. To hold Defendant City liable under Monell while holding Defendant Ramirez not liable for excessive force would create an inconsistent verdict, at least insofar as the Plaintiff alleges City liability based upon failure to train. . . Stated differently, the Plaintiff's claim against Defendant Ramirez is not sufficiently independent of his claim against Defendant City that a 'not liable' verdict for Ramirez would be consistent with a 'liable' verdict against the City."); Anthony v. City of Bridgeport, No. 3:12CV619 WIG, 2015 WL 3745302, at *1-2 (D. Conn. June 15, 2015) ("Courts in the Second Circuit are generally in favor of bifurcating Monell claims. [citing cases] Here, bifurcation would promote efficiency in that litigating the claims against Officer Lattanzio may obviate the need to try the case against the City. . . 'A jury's conclusion that a plaintiff has suffered no constitutional violation at the hands of an individual defendant generally forecloses a Monell claim.'. . In other words, when a plaintiff's claim 'is caused solely by a named individual defendant who is found not liable, the municipal government cannot be held liable.'. . Because the issue of Officer Lattanzio's liability could be dispositive of the Monell claim, it would save the Court's and the parties' time and resources to bifurcate. Bifurcation in this instance would also protect against unfair prejudice. The type of evidence that Plaintiff would have to present in order to prevail on his Monell claims—evidence showing that the City had a practice of condoning or encouraging civil rights violations—could create undue prejudice against Officer Lattanzio. Specially, Plaintiff intends to offer complaints filed by any third party against any Bridgeport police officer or against the Department as a whole. . . Plaintiff has not persuaded the Court that the instant case differs in any material way from Amato such that bifurcation would not be appropriate. As such, the Court grants Defendants' motion."); Cayo v. Fitzpatrick, No. CIV.A. 13-30113-TSH, 2015 WL 1307319, at *6 (D. Mass. Mar. 24, 2015) ('The Court does not find that on this record, it would be beneficial to undertake an analysis of the municipal and supervisory claims against the City and Commissioner Fitchet. It is the Court's intent to bifurcate the trial. The Section 1983 claim against the Individual Officers will be tried first. If the jury finds that any Individual Officer committed a constitutional violation, the Court will then schedule a separate trial on the supervisory and municipal claims. Prior to such trial, the Court will allow the City and Commissioner Fitchet to renew their motion for summary judgment."); Bombard v. Volp, 44 F.Supp.3d 514, 528-29 (D. Vt. 2014) ("Courts in the Second Circuit generally 'favor bifurcating Monell claims.' Mineo v. City of New York, 2013 WL 1334322, at *1 (E.D.N.Y. Mar. 29, 2013) (citations omitted)). In this case, if the jury decides that Officer Volp did use excessive force, Bombard will indeed be required to litigate a second time, and will likely repeat evidence. However, given that the claims against the City may be moot after the jury resolves the first constitutional question, and that evidence of five years of excessive force claims against Burlington police officers would likely prejudice Officer Volp's efforts to defend his specific actions, the motion to bifurcate is GRANTED. As to the motion to stay discovery, the procedural history of the case suggests that Bombard is still pursuing documentation pertaining to municipal liability. Although the Court has decided to bifurcate the trial in this case, it sees no need at this time to delay discovery with regard to the City. The motion to stay discovery is therefore DENIED."); Martinez v. Cook County, No. 11 C 1794, 2011 WL 4686438, at *1, *2 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 4, 2011) ("Under the doctrine of Monell, a plaintiff in a § 1983 suit may assert charges against the individual actors whom he claims violated his constitutional rights as well as against the relevant municipality. . . . As this Court has said before, a plaintiff can succeed against a municipality under a Monell claim despite failing to prove that any particular individual defendant is liable for violating the plaintiff's constitutional rights so long as the two results are compatible. . . Here, Officer Hopkins has asserted the affirmative defense of qualified immunity. . . This leaves open the real possibility that a jury could find the County liable under Monell while holding Officer Hopkins not liable. If the proceedings were bifurcated, and Officer Hopkins to prevail in asserting her qualified immunity defense, it would be impossible to conclude whether the jury found that she acted in good faith despite having violated Martinez's constitutional rights or if the jury found no constitutional violation at all. If this hypothetical outcome were to occur in a bifurcated case, then the case would have to be relitigated on the Monell claims. Such an outcome would be a waste of judicial resources. Put another way, Martinez's constitutional claims against the County will not be disposed of irrespective of the outcome of a bifurcated case pursued in the first instance against Officer Hopkins individually. It is therefore in the interest of expediency, economy and convenience that Martinez's claims proceed together as a single unified cause of action against all of the Defendants."); Davila-Lynch v. City of Brockton, No. 09-10817-RGS, 2011 WL 4072092, at *6 (D. Mass. Sept. 12, 2011) ("[W]here there is a finding of no liability on the part of the municipal actor, there can be no finding of liability against the municipality itself. . . In recognition of this principle, courts will commonly bifurcate the consideration of any municipal claim until after the trial of the underlying claim of a constitutional violation. As a matter of judicial economy, this makes sense: a second trial is necessary only if a violation is established and then, only if the municipality declines to satisfy the underlying judgment (which in the court's experience is rarely, if ever, the case). See Wilson v. Town of Mendon, 294 F.3d 1, 7 (1st Cir.2002). This 'familiar path' is the one the court will trod in this case."); Cole v. Morgan, No.

3:10cv288/MCR/MD, 2010 WL 4038607, at *3 (N.D. Fla. Oct. 14, 2010) ("A Monell claim may be a good candidate for bifurcation because if the individual government employee is found not to be liable, no subsequent trial of the municipality is necessary. . . Also, bifurcation permits the court to isolate evidence regarding municipal policies and customs (for example, prior incidents of excessive force and the policymaker's response) which would be relevant to a Monell analysis but could be prejudicial to the individual employee. . . Accordingly, courts may sever Monell claims against a municipality from claims against individual police officers . . . and stay litigation of the Monell claims until the rest of the case has been resolved. . . . In this case, the court concludes that conducting discovery into the Monell claim against Morgan likely will be a burdensome and expensive process for Escambia County, and one that will outweigh its probable benefit at this stage of the litigation, given that if a finding of no liability against Coxwell and the other deputies is made with respect to the individual capacity claims, there will be no need to conduct discovery with respect to the official capacity claim against Morgan."); Adams v. City of Boston, No. 07-10698-RGS, 2008 WL 4186275, at *2 (D. Mass. Sept. 9, 2008) ("For the reasons set out in Town of Mendon, the court will ALLOW the City of Boston's motion to bifurcate on condition that the City file with the court within fourteen (14) days a declaration that it will satisfy a judgment returned against one or more of its officers for violation of Adams's constitutional rights, should such be proven at trial."); Ojeda-Beltran v. Lucio, No. 07 C 6667, 2008 WL 2782815, at *4 (N.D. Ill. July 16, 2008) ("Here, we find that bifurcation of the Monell claim is appropriate because: (1) it will promote efficiency and economy both for the parties and for the Court; (2) it will protect Defendant Officers from potential undue prejudice at trial; and (3) it will not be prejudicial to Plaintiffs. Although the City did not specifically request to stay the discovery and trial of the Monell claim as part of its motion to bifurcate, because bifurcation in the absence of a corresponding stay would render many of the City's arguments inapposite, we will assume that the City is seeking such a stay. Armed with this assumption, we address each of the three arguments in support of bifurcation. . . . While the City's stipulation does remove the potential for any economic benefit to Plaintiffs through pursuit of their Monell claim, our inclination is to agree with Plaintiffs that there are non-economic benefits that can be obtained through suing the City that are unavailable through the suit of Defendant Officers. However, we decline to engage in this debate. A necessary premise of the City's and Plaintiffs' arguments on this topic is that bifurcation of Plaintiffs' Monell claim means that the claim cannot go forward. This is a premise that we do not accept. If Plaintiffs are successful in their claims against Defendant Officers, they are free to pursue their Monell claim against the City. In ordering the bifurcation and stay of Plaintiffs' Monell claim against the City, we have simply attempted to balance party convenience, judicial economy, prejudice against Defendant Officers, and prejudice against Plaintiffs. Bifurcation of the Monell claim is not dismissal of the Monell claim."); Wells v. City of Dayton, 495 F.Supp.2d 793, 794-97 (S.D. Ohio 2006) (" The Court concludes that separate trials of Plaintiffs' claims against Cornwell and McCall and their claim under Monell against Dayton are necessary in order to avoid prejudice.' Court engages in discussion similar to that in Brunson, infra.); Lopez v. City of Chicago, No. 01 C 1823, 2002 WL 335346, at *2, *3 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 1, 2002) (not reported) (discussing advantages and disadvantages of bifurcation; concluding bifurcation not appropriate at time where "individual police officers have not offered to waive the defense of qualified immunity and the City has not offered to stipulate to a judgment against the City for any compensatory damages awarded against the individual police officers."); Brunson v. City of Dayton, 163 F.Supp.2d 919, 924, 925, 929 (S.D. Ohio 2001) ("The Court concludes that separate trials of Plaintiff's claims against the individual Defendants and her claim under Monell against Dayton are necessary in order to avoid prejudice. If a single trial were held on all of the claims in this case, evidence offered against Dayton regarding incidents of alleged misconduct by police officers, unrelated to the incident in question in this case but relevant to the question of municipal liability for a policy or practice, would be highly prejudicial to the individual Defendants. The questions regarding the liability of these individual Defendants must be decided by the jury only on the facts of the particular encounter on which this case is based. That is to say, these individual Defendants cannot be made to bear the burden of answering for all of the alleged misdeeds of every past and current Dayton police officer, when defending against the allegations of the Plaintiff as to the incidents that occurred in this case. A jury must be allowed to consider the evidence regarding this incident, with its focus on that evidence unimpaired by a torrent of information concerning the conduct of police officers in other unrelated situations at other times. . . . . The first trial will most probably moot the need for a second trial. A finding by the jury in the first trial, during which the Plaintiff's claims against the individual Defendants will be resolved, that those Defendants had not violated Brunson's constitutional rights, would resolve Plaintiff's claims against Dayton. When the jury finds that an officer did not deprive the plaintiff of her constitutional rights, Monell liability cannot be imposed upon his governmental employer. . . On the other hand, if the first trial were to result in a verdict in favor of the Plaintiff, and Dayton agreed to pay the amount of that verdict, i.e., to indemnify the individual officers for the amount of the jury's verdicts, there would be no need for a second trial to resolve the Plaintiff's Monell claim against Dayton, since she is only entitled to a single recovery for her damages, which would have been accomplished as a result of the jury's verdict in the first trial and the City's agreement to indemnify. If Dayton were to refuse to indemnify the individual Defendants for the amount of the verdict and the Plaintiff could not secure satisfaction of that verdict from payment by the individual officers, then a second trial would be necessary. . . . It is, however, possible that the first trial will not eliminate the need for a second trial. A second trial would be required to resolve Plaintiff's Monell claim against Dayton, if the jury were to find that, although the individual Defendants violated Brunson's constitutional rights, they were protected from liability by qualified immunity. . .However, in this Court's experience, the possibility that the jury will find both that the individual Defendants violated Brunson's rights and that qualified immunity prevents liability from being imposed upon them is quite remote. . . . With this motion, the Defendants request that the Court delay discovery on the Plaintiff's Monell claim against Dayton until such time as the Plaintiffs' claims against the individual Defendants have been resolved. . . This Court will deny that request. Allowing all discovery to be conducted before the initial trial will avoid delaying the ultimate resolution of this litigation. For instance, in the event that the individual Defendants were to be granted summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity, a trial of the Plaintiff's claims against Dayton could proceed expeditiously, if the Plaintiff had already conducted discovery on her Monell claim. In addition, permitting all discovery to be conducted before the first trial will allow the second trial to commence quickly, in the event that such a trial becomes necessary, perhaps even before the same jury which heard the first phase of this litigation. Accordingly, the Court overrules Defendants' Motion to Bifurcate or to Stay Discovery"); Medina v. City of Chicago, 100 F. Supp.2d 893, 896-98 (N.D. Ill. 2000) (noting advantages of bifurcation and fact that Afrom an economic standpoint, a prevailing plaintiff in a § 1983 excessive force case against police officers in Illinois gets nothing more from suing the municipality under Monell than he would get from suing just the officers,' but also noting that bifurcation will not avoid a second trial where individual officer prevails on qualified immunity; refusing to bifurcate while issues of qualified immunity and City's willingness to have judgment entered against it if officer found liable were still on the table, but deferring discovery on Monell claim). See also Quintanilla v. City of Downey, 84 F.3d 353 (9th Cir. 1996); Carson v. City of Syracuse, No. 92-CV-777, 1993 WL 260676 (N.D.N.Y. July 7, 1993) (not reported); Myatt v. City of Chicago, 1992 WL 370240 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 3, 1992) (not reported); Marryshow v. Bladensburg, 139 F.R.D. 318 (D. Md. 1991).

See also Swanigan v. City of Chicago, 775 F.3d 953, 955-64 (7th Cir. 2015) ("Swanigan's Monell suit may indeed face some jurisdictional and merits hurdles, but the judge jumped the gun in dismissing it. The case was stayed in its infancy while the claims against the individual officers proceeded, and Swanigan was entitled to revive it and amend his complaint to try to plead a justiciable claim once the court and the parties returned to it. . . . More specifically, the 'stipulation'—proposed and prepared by the judge—was titled 'Defendant City of Chicago'[s] Certification of Indemnification' and provided that

1. The City of Chicago agrees to indemnify the individual defendant Chicago police officers for any judgment of compensatory damages that may be entered against them in this case.

2. If [Swanigan] prevails in his section 1983 action against individual defendant Chicago police officers, the City of Chicago agrees to indemnify the individual defendants for reasonable attorney fees and costs that [Swanigan] may be entitled to recover pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1988. This agreement is exclusive of such fees and costs that may be attributable to an award of punitive damages against the individual defendants.

3. The City also undertakes to pay nominal damages (not to exceed one dollar) if any compensatory damage award is entered against the individual defendants.

A week later the court entered a minute order stating that '[t]he City informs the Court that it has accepted the stipulation to indemnify the defendant officers.' The first suit proceeded to motions for summary judgment. The judge granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants on all counts except for two of Swanigan's claims under § 1983. On the surviving counts, the judge (1) denied the officers' motion for summary judgment on Swanigan's claim for false arrest; (2) found four officers liable on the claim related to Swanigan's extended detention;. . . and (3) held that the liability of four other officers on the extended-detention claim would be determined at trial, as would the issue of damages. After a five-day trial, a jury rejected Swanigan's claim for false arrest and found three more officers liable for Swanigan's extended detention. The latter finding meant that Swanigan prevailed against seven individual officers on his claim for an unlawfully extended detention. The jury awarded Swanigan $60,000 in compensatory damages and no punitive damages, and the court later awarded Swanigan his costs and attorney's fees as the prevailing party. As posttrial proceedings were underway in the first case, Swanigan turned his attention back to the Monell suit. He moved to lift the stay and explained that he intended to amend his complaint 'in order to narrow the issues, consistent with the jury verdict in [the first suit].' He also said he wanted to 'amend the remedies portion of his complaint in order to clarify that, in addition to damages, nominal or otherwise, he is also seeking declaratory and/or injunctive relief.'. . . He specifically flagged two of the 11 possible theories of liability identified in his original complaint: (1) the officers acted pursuant to a city policy allowing them to 'delay release of a detainee arrested without a warrant solely for the purpose of investigating the detainee for uncharged and unrelated crimes,' even if the delay extends past the next court call at which the suspect could receive a probable-cause determination; and (2) the officers acted pursuant to a city policy allowing them to mark a case report as 'cleared closed,' a designation that listed the suspect as an identified criminal offender even when the State's Attorney refused to prosecute the case. (We'll refer to these as the 'hold claim' and the 'cleared-closed claim.') After briefly touching on the potential viability of these theories, Swanigan again asked that 'the stay of his Monell claim be lifted in order that his case may proceed.' The judge denied the motion to lift the stay and dismissed the case in its entirety. . . The judge concluded that based on the City's Certification, Swanigan would receive in the first suit all the monetary relief he could recover on the hold claim or the cleared-closed claim, which meant that any claim for damages in the Monell suit was moot. The judge also concluded that Swanigan lacked standing to pursue injunctive relief on either the hold claim or the cleared-closed claim. For these reasons—mootness and lack of standing—the judge held that neither claim presented a justiciable case or controversy. In addition, the judge rejected Swanigan's challenge to the cleared-closed policy for failure to state a claim—an argument that the City never made. Although Swanigan gave no indication that he was waiving any of his other asserted grounds for Monell liability, the judge treated the resolution of these two claims as dispositive of the entire suit and entered final judgment dismissing the case. Swanigan appealed. . . . Even assuming that the district court indeed construed the Certification as a Rule 68 offer 'in substance,' the court erred in holding that it mooted Swanigan's case. Municipalities 'can be sued directly under § 1983 for monetary, declaratory, or injunctive relief.'. . Swanigan sought the full range of remedies, but the Certification offered only monetary relief in the form of a promise to indemnify the officers for the judgment in the first suit and pay nominal damages of $1 for any Monell liability. . . The City acknowledges the point but argues that the Certification offered Swanigan all the relief that he was entitled to on the hold claim and the cleared-closed claim. But we repeat: '[T]he defendant must satisfy the plaintiffs' demands; only then does no dispute remain between the parties.'. . The City did not do that here. . . .After concluding that the Certification mooted the Monell claim for monetary relief, the judge held that Swanigan lacked standing to seek an injunctive remedy against either the hold policy or the cleared-closed policy and on that basis held that the entire case was nonjusticiable. This ruling wrongly assumed that Swanigan had waived all other possible theories of Monell liability. He clearly did not. All he said was that he wanted to narrow the Monell suit in light of the verdict in the earlier suit, and he mentioned the hold policy and the cleared-closed policy to illustrate potentially viable claims that he might pursue. But he gave no indication that he was waiving any other aspects of his Monell claim. To the contrary, he reiterated his intention to amend his complaint to focus and refine the claim. The procedural challenges in this case stem in part from the complex development of § 1983 doctrine from Monroe v. Pape, 365 U.S. 167, 187 (1961) (municipalities not liable under § 1983), to Monell, 436 U.S. at 694–95 (municipalities may be liable under § 1983 for injuries caused by municipal policy, custom, or practice), to the establishment of the qualified-immunity defense for individual defendants, see, e.g., Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 641 (1987). If a § 1983 plaintiff seeks only monetary relief, and if a municipal defendant is willing (or required) to indemnify individual defendants for compensatory damages as well as an award of attorney's fees and costs, a Monell claim against the municipality will offer a prevailing plaintiff no additional remedy (aside, perhaps, from nominal damages). In such cases there is no need for the parties to spend time and money litigating a Monell claim. If the plaintiff fails to prove a violation of his constitutional rights in his claim against the individual defendants, there will be no viable Monell claim based on the same allegations. See, e.g., City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796, 799 (1986). Accordingly, the judge's decision to stay the Monell suit while the claims against the individual officers were litigated to judgment was sensible, especially in light of the volume of civil-rights litigation that district courts must manage. In some civil-rights cases, however, a verdict in favor of individual defendants would not necessarily be inconsistent with a plaintiff's verdict on a factually distinct Monell claim. See, e.g., Thomas v. Cook Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 604 F.3d 293, 305 (7th Cir.2009). In still other cases, the plaintiff may want an injunction against future constitutional violations or some other equitable remedy, and he may be willing to invest the time and effort needed to prove his entitlement to that relief. In such cases, and this is one, the plaintiff is entitled to try to prove his Monell claim. Some cases have remedial import beyond the individual plaintiff's claim for monetary damages, and § 1983 provides a vehicle for obtaining other judicial relief against governmental policies that violate constitutional rights. See generally David F. Hamilton, The Importance and Overuse of Policy and Custom Claims: A View From One Trench, 48 Depaul L.Rev. 723, 734–35 (1999). District courts, municipal defendants, and even plaintiffs have incentives to minimize duplication of effort in § 1983 cases that combine claims against individual public officials and a municipal defendant. The stipulation and stay of the Monell suit in this case achieved the goal of avoiding unnecessary complexity and effort. But district courts cannot prevent plaintiffs from pursuing potentially viable Monell claims that seek additional equitable relief or are distinct from the claims against individual defendants. The procedures used in this case prevented a fair test of Swanigan's Monell theories, and that necessitates a remand. Recall that the Monell suit was stayed from the start. No responsive pleading or motion to dismiss had been filed. Swanigan was simply asking to resuscitate the suit, and under Rule 15(a)(1)(B), once the City filed a responsive pleading or motion to dismiss, Swanigan was entitled to amend his complaint to flesh out his original claims or attempt to cure any jurisdictional or legal defects. . . .After learning that Swanigan wanted to amend his complaint, the district court should have lifted the stay and waited for the amended complaint before evaluating any jurisdictional impediments to hearing the case. We do not doubt that Swanigan's Monell claim faces jurisdictional and substantive legal barriers. Principles of double recovery may prevent him from recovering damages to the extent that his injuries are already covered by his successful claim in the earlier suit. He may not be able to establish standing to sue for injunctive relief. But the time to evaluate any jurisdictional or legal impediments to the Monell suit is after Swanigan has amended his complaint, as Rule 15(a)(1)(B) entitles him to do. For all the foregoing reasons, the district court erred in dismissing the Monell suit. Accordingly, we Vacate the judgment and Remand with instructions to grant Swanigan's motion to lift the stay and accept an amended complaint consistent with Rule 15(a)(1)(B).")

For cases where bifurcation was approved, see Rose v. Baltimore County, No. 1:23-CV-02078-JRR, 2025 WL 72669, at *2–4 (D. Md. Jan. 10, 2025) ("While 'the decision of whether to bifurcate is a fact-specific inquiry,'. . . this court has held that '[c]ases that contain Monell claims "are good candidates for bifurcation."'. . . 'Judges in this district have repeatedly ruled that bifurcation "is appropriate and often desirable" in cases involving both § 1983 claims against individual police officers and Monell claims.'. . A plaintiff's § 1983 Monell claim generally 'hinge[s] on his ability to show that [individual defendants] violated his constitutional rights.'. . That notwithstanding, courts have recognized 'narrow circumstances in which "a finding of no liability on the part of the individual municipal actors can co-exist with a finding of liability on the part of the municipality."'. . 'One such situation is when the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.'. . . [W]hile County' liability may co-exist with Officer Defendants non-liability, 'the question of whether any police officer committed a constitutional violation is central to plaintiffs' claims against the County.'. . Moreover, the rationale for bifurcation of Monell claims in § 1983 actions is not just that those claims generally, or often, hinge on individual defendant liability for constitutional violations. Bifurcation (and a related stay) also work to 'spare the parties from expending valuable resources in discovery, because resolution of the claims as to the individual defendants may obviate the need to litigate the Monell claim.'. . Bifurcation also 'prevent[s] the potential prejudice to individual defendants that might result from the introduction of inflammatory evidence concerning the municipality's policies, practices, or customs.'. . .As in Tserkis, bifurcation is appropriate here, because it will 'promote judicial economy, conserve the parties' resources, [and] prevent prejudice to' Officer Defendants. . . .[B]ifurcation will facilitate an expeditious trial as to the individual defendants by avoiding the delay inherent in the discovery process as to the Monell claim. It would also narrow the issues for trial. This would lead to a reduction of costs, without any real prejudice to plaintiff. . . The same rationale is compelling here. Plaintiff has asserted Monell and Longtin claims against the County which Defendants contend, and the court agrees, require 'wide ranging and intensive' discovery. . . Indeed, such claims impose a rather exacting standard. And the risk of prejudice to Officer Defendants is high where Plaintiff's Monell and Longtin claims will focus on previous instances of alleged excessive force. Plaintiff's allegations refer to incidents aged a near decade; as well as excessive force and false arrests allegations against Officer Defendants' specialized unit and others; and reference formal and informal customs, policies, and practices, as well as internal affairs policies. . . The court agrees that discovery into such matters will be substantial. Contrary to Plaintiff's contention, '[s]treamlining the issues and limiting discovery...initially will curb rather than increase costs, and if a second trial is necessary, any issues litigated in the first trial will be binding upon the parties during the second phase.' . . The extensive discovery associated with a Monell (and Longtin) claim would significantly prolong discovery, and therefore delay trial for all parties. Moreover, as Plaintiff acknowledges, bifurcation and a stay will not deprive him of 'discovery regarding any nonprivileged matter that is relevant to any party's claim or defense,' related to his claims against the Officer Defendants, and that is 'proportional to the needs of the case.'. .The court therefore finds bifurcation 'will promote judicial economy, conserve the parties' resources, prevent prejudice to [Officer Defendants],' and will not significantly prejudice Plaintiff."); Torres v. City of New York, No. 21-CV-10832 (LAK), 2023 WL 2775679, at *10 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 4, 2023) ("In this case, bifurcation is warranted on all three bases. First, as the Court of Appeals has observed, Section 1983 actions 'are particularly well suited for bifurcation because the evidence needed to show a "policy and custom" on behalf of the municipal entity is often unnecessary in the suit against the individual official.'. . Second, bifurcation is appropriate because the City's liability depends upon a finding that the individual defendants violated plaintiff's rights. . .Third, there is a danger that, at trial, the evidence relating to claims against the City or the individual officers 'will contaminate the mind of the finder of fact in its consideration of the liability of the other defendant.' . . For the foregoing reasons, the Court bifurcates all claims against the City and stays discovery concerning those claims with one exception. As set forth in the Court's order dated January 31, 2022, the parties may coordinate discovery in this action with discovery in the cases before Judge McMahon to the extent that such coordination would be helpful and appropriate."); Jones v. City of Danville, No. 4:20-CV-20, 2021 WL 1582774, at *5 (W.D. Va. Apr. 22, 2021) ("It would be unduly prejudicial to the Officers to introduce at trial prior incidents unrelated to them of the excessive use of force by City police officers. While relevant to the issue of custom and practice on the Monell claims against the City, such evidence would be unduly prejudicial to the individual Officer defendants in the § 1983 case against them. . . For the foregoing reasons, the court GRANTS defendants' motion to bifurcate the claims against the Officers from the Monell claims against the City. Discovery regarding plaintiff's claims against the City is STAYED to the extent that it does not relate to the claims against the Officers. Discovery is permitted as to the training provided by the City to the Officers on use of force, City policies regarding use of force, and any prior incidents involving use of force by the Officers. An appropriate order will be issued."); Blackmon v. City of Chicago, No. 19 C 767, 2020 WL 1888913, at *4-5 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 16, 2020) ("The City argues that bifurcation would best serve the interests of litigation and judicial economy because the City's liability is entirely dependent on the liability of Officer Defendants. . . .Here, Blackmon alleges the Defendant Officers violated his constitutional rights by depriving him of a fair trial, wrongfully convicting him, fabricating evidence used against him, intentionally ignoring material information or failing to investigate, and concealing exculpatory evidence to which he was lawfully entitled. . . Blackmon's Monell claims relate specifically to these allegedly unconstitutional practices. . . Blackmon alleges six de facto policies, practices and customs that caused him injury, as well as a failure to properly train, supervise, or discipline the Officer Defendants which 'directly and proximately' caused injury to Blackmon. . . Additionally, as the City points out, Blackmon alleges only '"intentional" misconduct of the Defendant Officers…Based on the nature of these alleged constitutional violations, it is clear the City's potential Monell liability is contingent on the officers' liability for the underlying misconduct.'. . Therefore, the City cannot be found liable under Monell unless Blackmon proves that one or more of the Officer Defendants committed a constitutional violation under § 1983 as alleged in Counts I–V. . . . As stated in Ezell, the 'question is whether the Officers committed the constitutional violation(s) underlying [Plaintiff's] Monell claims, not whether they can be held liable for them.' . . It does not matter for the analysis whether the Officer Defendants have qualified or absolute immunity, as the baseline determination is whether the Officers did, in fact, commit the constitutional violations that form the basis for the Monell claims. . . . Here, as in other similar cases, the question of whether the Defendant Officers committed a constitutional violation is dispositive and Blackmon's claims can be resolved without delving into the Monell claims."); Haughie v. Wexford Health Sources, Inc., No. CV ELH-18-3963, 2020 WL 1158568, at *18–20 (D. Md. Mar. 9, 2020) ("In this case, . . . it would appear that the Monell claim depends on a finding of liability on the part of the health care providers. Nevertheless, I express no ruling on whether, if a jury were to exonerate the Individual Medical Defendants, plaintiff would be entitled to proceed on his Monell claim. Regardless, bifurcation is appropriate. . . In my view, bifurcation is appropriate because it will promote judicial economy, conserve the parties' resources, and avoid prejudice to the Individual Medical Defendants, and will not prejudice the plaintiff. As a practical matter, it would save time and resources, and promote judicial economy, to defer consideration of the Monell claim until after a determination of the liability of the Individual Medical Defendants. If Haughie fails to succeed on his claim of constitutionally inadequate medical care, this may obviate altogether the basis for a Monell claim. If he does not succeed on the individual claims, he might also choose to forgo the Monell claim. And, if he does succeed in the claims against the Individual Medical Defendants, Wexford might consider a resolution of the Monell claim, without the need for a trial. Any one of these scenarios would spare the Court and the parties of the burdens and challenges of litigating the Monell claim. Moreover, the scope of discovery in a case with a Monell Claim is far broader than what is appropriate in an inadequate medical care claim. In a Monell case, a plaintiff generally seeks to rely on prior incidents involving other people. . . . Notably, evidence of any prior failures of Wexford to provide adequate care to inmates in unrelated situations may be admissible against Wexford in regard to the Monell claim. But, such evidence is not likely to be admissible against the Individual Medical Defendants. Such evidence is also potentially inflammatory in regard to the individual defendants, and it would be difficult for the jury to compartmentalize such evidence. . . Bifurcation of the Monell Claim will allow the Court to separate issues and evidence as necessary to avoid prejudice. In addition, bifurcation will facilitate an expeditious trial as to the Individual Medical Defendants (assuming the constitutional claim survives to trial), because it avoids the delay inherent in the extensive discovery that would be required to establish a Monell claim. This would lead to a reduction of costs, without any real prejudice to plaintiff. And, if the case goes to trial on the threshold claim, this avoids prolonging the trial. . . And, I am not persuaded by plaintiff's argument that bifurcation would infringe on his Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial. . . . Bifurcation of the Monell Claim against Wexford will not abridge plaintiff's Seventh Amendment rights. As defendants point out, the bifurcation plan under consideration would ensure that the first jury's decision is not reexamined by the second jury. . . In particular, the first jury would consider whether one or more of the Individual Medical Defendants violated Haugie's constitutional rights, while the second jury would be asked to determine whether

Wexford's policies, procedures, and customs were the moving force behind the provision of allegedly inadequate medical care. . . If some or all of the Individual Medical Defendants are found to have violated Haugie's constitutional rights, the second jury will be instructed accordingly and informed that it may not reconsider that issue. . .In sum, I am satisfied that the Court can avoid any risk of infringing on plaintiff's Seventh Amendment rights through the careful crafting of jury instructions and verdict forms. By exercising caution, as judges in this District have done many times under similar circumstances, the Court will ensure that any issues considered by the first jury are not reconsidered by the second jury."); Grim v. Baltimore Police Department, No. CV ELH-18-3864, 2020 WL 1063091, at *5-7 (D. Md. Mar. 5, 2020) ("Cases that contain Monell claims 'are good candidates for bifurcation.'. . Bifurcation can advance the efficient and convenient resolution of the case because where there is no 'initial finding that a government employee violated a plaintiff's constitutional rights,....no subsequent trial of the municipality is necessary.'. . In addition, bifurcation might spare the parties from expending valuable resources in discovery, because resolution of the claims as to the individual defendants may obviate the need to litigate the Monell claim. . .Equally important, bifurcation prevents the potential prejudice to individual defendants that may result from the introduction of inflammatory evidence concerning the municipality's policies, practices, or customs. . . This is especially true in excessive force cases, where the Monell evidence would include 'prior incidents of police brutality and policymakers' reactions to such incidents.'. . Although such evidence 'is relevant under the Monell analysis,' it might unfairly bias the jury as to the liability of the individual defendants. . . Courts in this district have consistently ruled that in cases such as this one bifurcation 'is appropriate and often desirable.'. . . In my view, bifurcation is appropriate in this case because it will prevent prejudice to Officer Paul and because it best serves judicial economy. . . .In other words, bifurcation will facilitate an expeditious trial as to Officer Paul by avoiding the delay inherent in the discovery process and trial that would be required in regard to the contemporaneous pursuit of the Monell Claim. This could lead to a reduction of costs, without any real prejudice to plaintiff. . . Nonetheless, plaintiff insists that bifurcating her Monell claim will result in unfair prejudice by precluding her from obtaining discovery from the BPD concerning Officer Paul. . . This argument is without merit. As the BPD points out, bifurcation will stay discovery related to plaintiff's Monell claim, i.e., evidence of the BPD's policies, practices or customs. It will not, however, effect plaintiff's ability to pursue discovery concerning her claims against Officer Paul. . . Bifurcation therefore erects no barrier to plaintiff's ability to obtain documents pertaining to Officer Paul from the BPD to the extent that the BPD is the custodian of such records. . . In my view, bifurcation is appropriate because it will promote judicial economy, conserve the parties' resources, prevent prejudice to the Officer Paul, and will not prejudice plaintiff. Bifurcation 'streamline[s] the issues for trial [and] it prevents prejudice to the individual defendant that would otherwise arise from the introduction of evidence of prior incidents of police brutality in order to make a case against the municipality.'. . Therefore, I shall grant the Motion to Bifurcate . . . as to Count I. And, discovery pertaining to Count I shall be stayed, pending resolution of plaintiff's claims against Officer Paul."); Batchelor v. City of Chicago, No. 18 C 8513, 2020 WL 509034, at *6–7 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 31, 2020) ("In this case, bifurcation will promote judicial economy. If Batchelor's Section 1983 claims against the individual officers fail, it will likely be unnecessary to litigate his Monell claim. . . Batchelor responds that it may be necessary to litigate his Monell claim even if the jury issues a verdict in favor of the individual officers. He points to Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Department, which held that a 'municipality can be held liable under Monell even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.'. . Thomas involved the death of a jailed detainee who was denied medical care. . . The plaintiff brought Section 1983 claims against the individual defendants alleging that they were deliberately indifferent to the detainee's medical condition and Monell claims against the County based on its lack of procedures for reviewing detainees' medical requests. . . The court held that there was no inconsistency between the jury reaching a verdict in favor of the individual defendants and against the County because the jury could have concluded that the individual defendants were not deliberately indifferent to the detainee's condition but nonetheless failed to respond to plaintiff's medical needs due to failures of the County's policies. . . Batchelor, however, fails to explain how a jury could consistently find the City liable in this case without finding the individual officers liable. He claims that a jury could conclude that Area 2 detectives extracted a confession from defendant without deciding which individual defendant did so. But, as he does not identify any portion of the complaint or other evidence that would support that conclusion, this argument is too speculative to defeat a motion for bifurcation. . . Batchelor also claims that a jury could conclude that exculpatory evidence about Johnson and the phony polygraph was withheld because of the City's policies rather than any officer misconduct. But his complaint states that individual defendants "deliberately withheld" that exculpatory evidence and makes no mention of that withholding being solely due to the City's policies. . . This case is far afield from the circumstances in Thomas. It is not a case where a jury could conclude the City's employees carried out the City's unconstitutional policies but lacked the requisite culpable mindset for individual liability. Rather, Batchelor's Section 1983 claims allege that the individual defendants violated his constitutional rights by coercing his and others' confessions and suppressing and withholding the evidence of such tactics. Monell liability cannot be established based on such allegations without a finding that individual defendants violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . In brief, bifurcation will allow the parties to bypass discovery relating to the Monell claim, which can add significant time, cost, and complications to the discovery process. As the litigation of Batchelor's Monell claim may ultimately prove unnecessary, bifurcation will promote the economical and timely resolution of this case."); Bradford for Estate of Bradford v. City of Chicago, No. 16 CV 1663, 2019 WL 5208852, at *2, *4 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 16, 2019) ("Motions to bifurcate Monell claims are frequently granted in this District because such claims typically require a significant amount of work—including expert discovery—that may ultimately be for naught because in 'many if not most cases, disposition of the individual claims will either legally or practically end the litigation.'. . . Indeed, a plaintiff's failure to prove that he suffered a constitutional injury at the hands of an individual employee typically is fatal to his Monell claim against the municipality. . . On the other hand, if the plaintiff prevails on his constitutional claim against the municipal employee, he is 'likely not to want or need to proceed any further,'. . . because Illinois law requires a 'local public entity to pay...any tort judgment or settlement for compensatory damages...for which it or an employee while acting within the scope of his employment is liable.'. . . Generally, 'a municipality's liability for a constitutional injury "requires a finding that the individual officers are liable on the underlying substantive claim."'. . . But 'a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.'. . . For example, a verdict in favor of individual defendants because of qualified immunity is not inconsistent with a verdict against the municipality (which lacks that defense) . . . This situation is expressly contemplated by the Limited Consent. But Monell liability also exists without individual liability where the individual actor thinks that 'her decisions were an appropriate response' and her failure is 'negligent, or even grossly negligent, but not deliberately indifferent,' yet the 'institutional policies themselves are deliberately indifferent.' Glisson v. Ind. Dep't of Corrs., 849 F.3d 372, 378 (7th Cir. 2017). The Limited Consent contemplates no such scenario. Nor does it contemplate a scenario in which the City's policies made it impossible for the Individual Defendants to protect Bradford's constitutional rights, as may be the case here. Accordingly, the possibility for a 'liability gap' in this case does exist should the Court bifurcate the Monell claim, because there may be scenarios under which the Individual Defendants are not liable but the City is, and to which the Limited Consent does not apply. But while Plaintiff distinguishes this case from others in which bifurcation was ordered because the Monell claim could not proceed absent individual liability (including this Court's opinion in Arrington v. City of Chicago, 2018 WL 3861552 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 14, 2018)), Plaintiff misses that prejudice alone can justify bifurcation. . . Accordingly, that this may be a case that falls into the 'liability gap' is of no moment here, where great prejudice to Defendants is possible in a combined trial."); Ezell v. City of Chicago, No. 18 C 1049, 2019 WL 3776616, at *3-4, *6 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 12, 2019) ("Motions for bifurcation are 'now commonplace' and 'there is a growing body of precedent in this district for both granting and denying bifurcation in § 1983 cases.'. . 'Such motions and the inclination of many judges to grant them stems in large part from the recognition that, often, "claims of municipal liability require an extensive amount of work on the part of plaintiff's attorneys and experts, and an extraordinary amount of money must be spent in order to prepare and prove them."'. . Deciding whether to bifurcate a plaintiff's Monell claim is left to the Court's sound discretion and 'must be done on case-by-case basis, looking at the specific facts and claims presented.'. . In support its Motion, the City stresses that Plaintiffs' Monell claims are dependent first on their claims against the Defendant Officers. . . The City has also offered to consent to a limited entry of judgment against it should the court or a jury find the Defendant Officers committed a violation of Plaintiffs' constitutional rights, even if the Officers are protected from civil liability due to qualified immunity, without Plaintiffs having to prove any of the elements required to hold the City liable under Monell. . . Plaintiffs argue in response that their proposed, 'streamlined' approach to the discovery and presentation of their Monell claims will avoid the great burden the City claims will be imposed on the court and the parties if its Motion is denied and that the City's Motion ignores the prejudice to Plaintiffs and the public if Plaintiffs are deprived of the opportunity to hold the City directly liable for the systemic failures that result in false confessions and wrongful convictions. . . . [T]he City cannot be found liable under Monell unless Plaintiffs prove that one or more of the Defendant Officers committed a constitutional violation under § 1983 as alleged in Counts I–VI. . . . Furthermore, the City has guaranteed that so long as Plaintiffs succeed in showing a constitutional violation occurred, they will recover compensatory damages from the City without anything more—either as indemnification for a judgment entered against the Defendant Officers. . . or, if the Defendant Officers are found to be immune from liability, against the City pursuant to the proposed Limited Consents. . . In either scenario, the question of whether any Defendant Officer committed a constitutional violation is dispositive; Plaintiffs' claims for compensatory damages can be resolved without ever delving into any Monell claim. In fact, having already recovered in their suit against the Officers, Plaintiffs would be barred from then pursuing damages for the same injuries against the City regardless. . . . As both Plaintiffs and the City acknowledge, the case against the Defendant Officers is already complicated, involving four Plaintiffs, more than a dozen named defendants and requiring discovery into events that occurred more than twenty years ago. . . Allowing discovery—much less the presentation of evidence at trial—into Plaintiffs' broad Monell allegations will unquestionably complicate matters further and exponentially increase the cost to the parties and burden on the Court, not to mention require Plaintiffs to wait years longer than is necessary to resolve their claims for compensatory damages. Accordingly, the interest of litigation and judicial economy weighs in favor of bifurcating the Monell claims particularly, whereas here, the costly and time-consuming discovery and litigation of those claims are ultimately unnecessary to Plaintiffs' recovery. . . .Plaintiffs are correct that granting the City's Motion would effectively eliminate any opportunity for Plaintiffs to litigate the merits of their Monell claims. This result is not lost on the Court. Moreover, the Court agrees that § 1983 claims are intended not only to compensate victims for past wrongs but also to deter future constitutional deprivations . . . and that bifurcating Plaintiffs' Monell claims necessarily forecloses the opportunity for deterrence that may come from those particular § 1983 claim, to the extent there is one. Plaintiffs cite several examples of judgments and settlements paid by the City to resolve claims similar to Plaintiffs' here—all without the City ever admitting its own culpability for the alleged misconduct—as proof that unless the City is held directly liable for these unconstitutional practices, they will continue. . . But Plaintiffs fail to explain how Monell liability would necessarily give rise to reform; in fact, Plaintiffs explain that the City will soon adopt a number of police reforms pursuant to a Consent Decree with the Illinois Attorney General—i.e. reform achieved without Monell liability, albeit more slowly than Plaintiffs and others similarly situated are willing to accept. Ultimately, Plaintiffs provide insufficient reason to find that a judgment entered in this case against the City based on the claims against the Defendant Officers would not serve as an adequate deterrent. . . The Court in no way means to minimize Plaintiffs' interest in pursuing their Monell claims for reasons beyond monetary compensation but the Court must consider the issue of bifurcation with a "pragmatic mindset" and, in doing so, finds that bifurcation is appropriate in this case."); Williams v. City of Chicago, No. 17 C 5186, 2018 WL 2561014, at *11-14 (N.D. Ill. June 1, 2018) ("[T]he City claims that bifurcation of (and then staying discovery on) the Monell claim is warranted because: (1) Williams must succeed on his claims against the individual Officers before he can prevail on his Monell claim; (2) bifurcation would serve the interest of litigation and judicial economy, particularly because Williams's Monell claim is so widely pled; (3) and bifurcation will assist in eliminating the risk of unfair prejudice against the parties—that is, prejudice against the Officers.; and (4) bifurcation will not prejudice Williams's recovery of compensatory damages due to the City's contractual obligation to indemnify the Officers. Finally, the City has agreed to the entry of judgment against it—by way of a Limited Consent Agreement—should Williams prevail on his claims against the Officers. . . According to the City, the Limited Consent Agreement means that discovery and trial on the Monell claim may not be necessary and benefits Williams because he would not be required to prove the elements of § 1983 municipal liability. . . . The increasing frequency of bifurcation motions and the willingness of many judges to grant them stems in large part from the recognition that, in many instances, 'claims of municipal liability require an extensive amount of work on the part of plaintiff's attorneys and experts, and an extraordinary amount of money must be spent in order to prepare and prove them.'. . The City first argues that bifurcation is appropriate because Williams must succeed in his action against the individual Officers before he can obtain a judgment against the City pursuant his Monell claim. . . . Williams's Monell claim relates specifically to the City's alleged practices of coercing false testimony, creating false or misleading investigative reports, and failing to preserve and produce exculpatory evidence at times through the use of 'street files.' The City argues that these theories of municipal liability first require a jury to find that the Officers did in fact violate Williams's constitutional rights. Looking first at the allegations of coerced testimony and false reports, those violations depend on individual Officer actions. . . Even if the City had a policy or practice of permitting its officers' to coerce false testimony or to create false investigative reports, the harm caused by the practice could only manifest itself through the officers' actions. The same conclusion applies to the exculpatory evidence and street files allegations. Any harm caused by a policy or practice to withhold from discovery or not preserve exculpatory evidence or an alleged street-file policy or practice could only manifest itself through the Officers actually withholding such evidence or maintaining such files, and therefore a finding of municipal liability is predicated on a finding first that the Officers themselves were liable. . . As such, this case presents 'a significant possibility that after narrowly litigating the underlying Section 1983 claim, proceeding to the more expansive Monell issues may become entirely unnecessary.'. . In response, Williams contends that the Officers' alleged qualified immunity defense creates the possibility that the Officers could be found not liable while the City could be found liable. . . However, whether the Officers can be found liable is beside the point; rather, the issue is 'whether the individual defendants committed a constitutional violation that is a prerequisite for' the City's liability. . . Moreover, the fact that the City has consented to entry of judgment against itself in the event that the Officers are found to have violated Williams's constitutional rights 'even if one or all Defendant Officers is/are further found to be not liable to [Williams] because one or more of the is/are entitled to qualified immunity' undermines Williams's position. . . In sum, because there is no way that a jury could consistently find the City liable without first finding the Officers liable, this factor weighs in favor of bifurcation. . . .Importantly, Williams argues that bifurcation of his Monell claim will frustrate his efforts to seek relief beyond money damages, such as deterring future official misconduct and initiating reform in the police department. . . . [A]lthough Williams may seek to deter future official misconduct by way of a substantial judgment against the City, Williams's complaint does not limit any extraordinarily large judgment to his Monell claim; instead, it is entirely possible that Williams could be awarded a large judgment against the Officers, which presumably send the same message to the City and police department. This is particularly so here, where the City has admitted that it will pay whatever compensatory damages are awarded against its employees. . . This is not to minimize Williams's desired non-economic benefit from bringing suit against the City. But after carefully considering the arguments on both sides, the Court finds bifurcation to be appropriate in this case."); Lindsey v. Orlando, No. 16 C 1967, 2017 WL 449180, at *5-7 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 2, 2017) ("Motions to bifurcate Monell claims from § 1983 claims against individual defendants have become routine. In making such motions, the municipality typically cites the substantial, potentially unnecessary, cost of litigating the question posed by Monell: whether a policy, practice or custom caused a constitutional violation. . . Bifurcating the claims makes particular sense where the Monell claim is wholly dependent on the outcome of the cases against the individual defendants. . . There are, however, situations where the Monell claim is not dependent on the outcome against the individual defendants. In Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Department, 604 F.3d 293 (7th Cir. 2009), ... the individual officers were liable only if they were deliberately indifferent—a showing negated by the existence of the county policy that prevented the employees from treating Smith. . . In this case, in contrast, individual liability turns on two objective assessments: whether there was probable cause to arrest Lindsey and, if so, whether a reasonable officer could have made a mistake about whether probable cause existed. Lindsey need not make any showing concerning the officers' subjective mental state. Several courts of this district have held that a 'split' result like that in Thomas (a verdict in favor of individual officers but against the municipality) cannot occur where individual liability is premised on an objective standard. [collecting cases] Lindsey argues a Thomas result is possible here because the officers could be found to have qualified immunity if the false arrest was in accordance with the city's custom or policies (that is, that the officers 'just followed the rules') . . . , but qualified immunity, too, is assessed on an objective standard. . . The court has doubts that the City's failure to train or discipline the officers could make an officer's mistake about the existence of probable cause objectively reasonable, thereby causing an officer to have qualified immunity on that basis but leaving the City open to liability for the bad policy. The cases Lindsey produces in support of this proposition do not discuss the basis for the assertion of qualified immunity, and do not support the conclusion that a city's failure to train, discipline or investigate renders an officer immune from liability for an unlawful arrest. . .In a case such as this one, the court believes it is unlikely that the City can be held liable under Monell unless the Defendant Officers themselves are found liable. And the City has agreed to entry of judgment against it if the individual officers caused a constitutional injury, regardless of whether the officers are found to have qualified immunity. . . Under that proposal, the City's liability turns on whether the individual officers violated Lindsey's constitutional rights. If they did, the City will pay the judgment; if they did not, the elements of Monell are not met and the case will be over. Plaintiff Lindsey will not be required to litigate the issue of whether the officers made a reasonable mistake, driven by City policy or otherwise, in order to recover for the violation of his rights. Other courts of this district have found this concession weighs in favor of bifurcation. . . .The court recognizes that some of its colleagues have denied motions to bifurcate in circumstances like these. Those decisions are, of course, not binding, and the court believes they are distinguishable. [Discussing cases]"); Andersen v. City of Chicago, No. 16 C 1963, 2016 WL 7240765, at *4-6 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 14, 2016) ("Andersen seeks to distinguish Veal and Taylor on the ground that the Chicago Police Department's history of unconstitutional policies regarding custodial interrogations and street files distinguish it from the police departments in those cases. . . Yet, Andersen fails to explain how an alleged history of unconstitutional policies is in any way relevant to whether municipal liability is dependent upon officer liability here. Finally, Andersen contends that a jury could consistently find only the unknown individual defendants liable, which would then cause a new round of litigation on the Monell claim. Not only is this contention speculative at best, other courts in this district have granted motions to bifurcate where such a possibility existed. . . As such, because there is no way that a jury could consistently find the City liable without first finding the Defendant Officers liable, this factor weighs heavily in favor of bifurcation. . . .Bifurcation can, especially in instances where municipal liability is dependent on individual liability as here, present a number of benefits including the bypassing of significant discovery (and associated discovery complications) related to the municipality's policies and practices and a shorter trial. . . . Accordingly, because the Monell claims are reliant on the individual officers' liability and because the City has agreed to accept liability against itself if the individual officers are found liable, judicial economy counsels in favor of bifurcation. . . .[A]lthough the Court acknowledges that Andersen, as the master of his Complaint, brought his Monell claim to hold the City accountable for its systemic practices, as discussed above, a stay of discovery of the Monell claim does not foreclose him from pursuing his Monell claim at a later date if he is successful against the individual officers. . .Given that Andersen does not present any other arguments alleging prejudice and based on the Court's finding that bifurcation would expedite, rather than delay, a conclusion of this litigation, bifurcation is appropriate in this case."); Harris v. City of Chicago, No. 14-CV-4391, 2016 WL 3261522, at *2-4 (N.D. Ill. June 14, 2016) ("Defendant argues that bifurcation of the Monell claim is in the best interests of efficiency and judicial economy. Plaintiff responds that there will be a second trial on the Monell claim because municipal liability does not depend on a finding of officer liability. . . . The nature of the alleged constitutional violations, fabricating a confession and coercing Plaintiff into making that confession, depends on the individual officers' actions. . . Similarly, the policy of filing false reports and actively covering up illegal interrogations and confessions depends on the actions of individual police officers. The alleged harm to Plaintiff was not caused by any de facto policies independent of any officer's actions; thus, a constitutional violation by an individual officer must be found before the City may be held liable under the Monell claims. . . .In this case the City has offered to waive a qualified immunity defense for the purposes of municipal liability. As to the failure-to-train policies, the Seventh Circuit has stated specifically that 'there can be no liability under Monell for failure to train when there has been no violation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights.'. . For any of the alleged de facto policies, individual violations of Plaintiff's constitutional rights would be required for municipal liability. Therefore, disposition of the individual claims will practically end the litigation, and separation would promote judicial economy. . . Defendant City of Chicago also argues that bifurcating the Monell claim would significantly reduce the possibility of prejudice to the individual Defendants. . . There is a clear danger of prejudice to the individual defendants from the finder of fact hearing evidence on several instances of alleged misconduct that those defendants were not involved in. Plaintiff counters that any risk of such prejudice can be mitigated by limiting instructions. . . Plaintiff also argues that she will be prejudiced by bifurcation by being forced to wait to pursue her Monell claims but does not say how she would be prejudiced. Even with the mitigating factor of limiting instructions and other methods, 'the individual defendants could face unusual difficulty in distinguishing their own acts that allegedly violated Plaintiff's constitutional rights from evidence that would be introduced to support claims against the [City].'. . Prejudice also favors bifurcating the Monell claims. . . . Here, as discussed above, the disposition of the individual claims will essentially end the litigation. Additionally, the offer of judgment would remove the risk to Plaintiff of having to prove the Monell claim. The parties dispute the effect on discovery, but at least some discovery is outstanding. This Court in Lopez also stated some of the disadvantages to bifurcation: the possibility of a second trial if individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity; the possible dispute of payment from a municipal defendant arguing that the individual defendant was not acting within the scope of its employment; and a finding of liability against individual public employees, as compared to a finding of liability against a municipality, may decrease the likelihood of the municipality's acting to prevent future violations. . . However, given the City's offer of entry of judgment as set out above, none of the disadvantages are present here. There is no possibility of a second trial. If any Defendant has violated Plaintiff's rights, judgment will enter against the City. The offer of judgment by the City effectively waives the argument that any individual defendant was not acting within the scope of their employment. As to the final disadvantage, the limited consent to entry of judgment would enter a judgment against the City, albeit without admitting Plaintiff's Monell allegations. Bifurcation would prevent prejudice against the individual Defendants, promote judicial economy, and would not prejudice Plaintiff."); Horton v. City of Chicago, No. 13-CV-6865, 2016 WL 316878, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 26, 2016) ("A stay of the Monell claim until after the claims against Wilson are resolved may . . . avoid the need for Monell discovery. If Plaintiff prevails on his claims against Defendant Walker, then the City's Limited Consent to Entry of Judgment would, as a practical matter, allow Plaintiff to collect judgment from the City without going to the time and expense of litigating the Monell claim. Plaintiff 'seeks only monetary relief' and the City has stipulated that it will 'indemnify [Walker] for compensatory damages as well as an award of attorney's fees and costs.'. . Under such circumstances, the Seventh Circuit has observed that bifurcation of Monell claims is 'sensible,' especially 'in light of the volume of civil-rights litigation that district courts must manage.' Swanigan v. City of Chicago, 775 F.3d 953, 962 (7th Cir. 2015). Both parties recognize that Plaintiff could proceed with his Monell claims against the City if he prevails on his constitutional claims against Wilson. But the parties disagree about whether bifurcation would avoid—as opposed to merely delay—discovery on the Monell claim (Count X) in the event that Plaintiff fails to establish that Wilson violated Horton's constitutional rights. The City argues that bifurcation would allow it to 'avoid burdensome and potentially unnecessary discovery and litigation costs should Plaintiff fail to establish a constitutional violation and thus, as a matter of law, be unable to prove any Monell violation.'. . Plaintiff responds that even if the fact-finder determined that the individual defendants are not liable, Plaintiff still might succeed on his Monell claim against the City. Specifically, Plaintiff argues that 'where—like here—Defendant Officers have asserted an affirmative defense such that a jury may find a constitutional violation but decline to find the officers liability, Plaintiff may still obtain a liability finding against the City.'. .The Seventh Circuit has acknowledged that 'a city's liability is derivative of its police officer's liability,' such that 'a municipality's liability for a constitutional injury "requires a finding that the individual officers are liable on the underlying substantive claim."' . . Nonetheless, the Seventh Circuit has also recognized that 'a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.' . . .Here, Plaintiff's Monell claim against the City alleges that the City encouraged Wilson's excessive use of force by failing to investigate or discipline officers who use excessive force and shoot civilians. A jury could not consistently find that Walker did not use excessive force but that the City's policies encouraged Walker's use of excessive force. However, a jury could consistently find that Walker did use excessive force, but that he was entitled to qualified immunity and therefore not liable for his actions. If that were to occur, and Plaintiff decided to proceed with the Monell claim against the City, then Plaintiff would, hypothetically, still need to conduct Monell discovery. But here, the City has consented to entry of judgment against it in the event that the trier of fact finds that Defendant Walker violated Horton's constitutional rights but is, nonetheless, 'not liable to Plaintiff because he is entitled to qualified immunity.'. . Thus, on balance, the Court finds that bifurcating the Monell claim against the City would promote the goals of efficiency and judicial economy."); Saunders v. City of Chicago, No. 12-CV-09158, 2015 WL 7251938, at *7-10 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 17, 2015) ("Plaintiffs seek to hold the City of Chicago liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 pursuant to Monell v. New York Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658 (1978), for (1) the City's alleged pattern and practice of using unconstitutional means to obtain confessions from suspects and arrestees, (2) the City's alleged policy and practice of fabricating statements, (3) the City's alleged practice of not recording interrogations, and (4) the City's alleged failure to adequately train, supervise, and discipline officers who engaged in the alleged constitutional violations. The City now seeks to bifurcate Plaintiffs' Monell claims against it . . . and to stay discovery and trial on those claims pending resolution of Plaintiffs' § 1983 claims against the individual defendants. . . . The plethora of bifurcation motions and the inclination of many judges to grant them stems in large part from the recognition that, often, 'claims of municipal liability require an extensive amount of work on the part of plaintiff's attorneys and experts, and an extraordinary amount of money must be spent in order to prepare and prove them.'. . But this argument is not always applicable, and so courts must evaluate each motion on its own merits; this Court in particular has both granted and denied motions to bifurcate filed by municipal defendants. Compare Terry v. Cook Cnty. Dep't of Corr., 2010 WL 2720754 (N.D. Ill. July 8, 2010) (denying motion to bifurcate), with Cruz v. City of Chicago, 2008 WL 5244616 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 16, 2008) (granting motion to bifurcate). . . .In short, the potentially-avoidable amount of discovery here—pertaining to four separate Monell allegations—is vast and would place a considerable burden on the City. Second, the parties dispute whether bifurcation would avoid, as opposed to delay, the Monell discovery. Of course, should bifurcation occur and should Plaintiffs succeed in phase one on their individual claims, they would be entitled to proceed with their phase two Monell claims, meaning that the Monell discovery would still occur at some point in the future (barring a settlement of some kind). But the parties disagree as to the fate of the Monell claims should Plaintiffs fail on their phase one claims. The Seventh Circuit has acknowledged that 'a city's liability is derivative of its police officer's liability,' such that 'a municipality's liability for a constitutional injury "requires a finding that the individual officers are liable on the underlying substantive claim."'. . On the other hand, the Seventh Circuit has suggested that 'a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.' Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Dep't, 604 F.3d 293, 305 (7th Cir. 2010). Presumably such a situation could arise in this case should Plaintiffs be unable to recover from the Defendant Officers because of their qualified immunity, but Plaintiffs could still recover from the municipality, which lacks such a protection. The Court is not persuaded in either direction on this issue. Plaintiffs try to devise hypothetical scenarios in which their Monell claims might fall within the so-called Thomas "liability gap," warning that in those instances they might be unjustly precluded from litigating their Monell claims based on their failure to prove liability on their individual claims. But Plaintiffs' concern is premature. Other than the qualified immunity scenario mentioned above, the Court is unable to determine whether Plaintiffs' hypothetical theories are plausible in light of the allegations in Plaintiffs' complaints, or whether these hypothetical scenarios would create a potential inconsistency with some hypothetical verdict in this case. Faced with four separate Monell claims, it is too early for the Court or the parties to presage whether any legitimate 'liability gaps' might exist here; any such determination would need to be made at the conclusion of the trial on individual liability. While this issue may arise again in this litigation, it does not influence the Court's calculus regarding the propriety of bifurcation. Third, the City tries to sweeten the pot by offering a Limited Consent to Entry of Judgment . . . , stating that if the case is bifurcated, and if Plaintiffs were to succeed in establishing that any of the individual police Defendants is liable for violating a Plaintiff's constitutional rights as alleged in the complaint, the City will agree to entry of judgment against it requiring it to indemnify the individual police Defendant(s) for compensatory damages and reasonable attorneys' fees, even if the individual is found to have violated a Plaintiff's constitutional rights but is not liable because he or she is entitled to qualified immunity. Plaintiffs are not moved by the City's (increasingly common) gesture, arguing that the Limited Consent does not offer all of the relief they seek and instead offers economic assurances that the City is required to pay anyway. Regarding the City's indemnification requirements, Illinois state law requires local governments 'to pay any tort judgment or settlement for compensatory damages' for which their employees are liable while acting in the scope of their employment. 745 ILL. COMP. STAT. 10/9-102. But Illinois law permits, rather than requires, indemnification for 'associated attorneys' fees and costs,' meaning that the Limited Consent does go beyond what is required of the City under state law. But ultimately the City's Limited Consent does not factor into the Court's analysis here. Even if the City consents to pay certain monetary liabilities, that does not end the case and controversy as it relates to the City. . . While a Limited Consent such as this might persuade certain plaintiffs to agree to bifurcate or to drop their Monell claims altogether (thus promoting judicial efficiency), Plaintiffs here have claimed allegiance to their efforts to hold the City accountable 'for the systemic practices that cause constitutional harms to its citizens,' regardless of the City's indemnification promises. . . . Because the City's Limited Consent presently does not impact the likelihood of phase two litigation in this case, it does not impact the Court's decision regarding bifurcation. . . . Taking all of these factors into consideration, the Court grants the City's motion to bifurcate Plaintiffs' § 1983 Monell claims against the City, and stays both discovery and trial on those claims. The Court's decision is based on the potential benefits to efficiency and judicial economy, the potential prejudice to the individual Defendants should these claims be tried together, and the lack of any substantial prejudice to Plaintiffs in delaying the adjudication of their Monell claims."); Estate of Paul Heenan ex rel. Heenan v. City of Madison, 111 F.Supp.3d 929, 948-50 (W.D. Wis. 2015) ("The court agrees with defendants that bifurcation is warranted both to avoid prejudice to Heimsness and for judicial economy, especially in light of the City's stipulation. First, introducing evidence of Heimsness's disciplinary history and the recent MDC messages—both of which would be pertinent to plaintiff's Monell claim against the City for deliberate indifference to the need for supervision—in the same phase of the trial in which the jury considers whether Heimsness's use of force was objectively reasonable may well unfairly prejudice Heimsness. . . . Even with a strongly-worded curative instruction that the standard Heimsness must meet is an objective one, the risk is too great that the jury would be unable to ignore the subjective aspects of Heimsness's specific, prior instances of use of force, as well as MDC messages, which arguably reflect a dark humor that sometimes accompanies a very difficult occupation or a disturbingly flippant attitude about shooting someone. . . . Second, the court also agrees with defendants that bifurcation is warranted in light of judicial economy. While there are circumstances where the jury could find the individual defendant not liable, but the municipality could still be on the hook for a constitutional violation—most notably instances where qualified immunity applies—this is not one of those cases. . . Here, if the jury finds Heimsness not liable, then there will be no need to try a Monell claim against the City. In other words, plaintiff's claim against the City is entirely dependent on the success of its claim that Heimsness used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Third and finally, plaintiff argues that the City's stipulation would defeat important 'societal benefits' derived from a jury's determination of the City's liability. Indeed, plaintiff points out, since the City is required to indemnify Heimsness for any damages here, 'the City's offer to stipulate adds nothing to the equation—a judgment against Heimsness already effectively operates as a judgment against the City.'. . The court certainly appreciates plaintiff's argument, but absent a relevant factual question for the jury to decide on plaintiff's Monell liability claim, there is no reason this evidence need be placed before a jury. Of course, a claim for injunctive relief against a municipality under § 1983 might still be ripe. . . The court, therefore, would be open to entertaining requests for an equitable remedy as the evidence may dictate (e.g., requiring different training, methods for supervising officers, etc.). Any disputed facts pertinent to a claim for equitable relief could be heard by the court outside of the jury's presence, while the jury is deliberating on plaintiff's claim against Heimsness. Accordingly, the court will accept the City's stipulation of entry of judgment against it should the jury find in favor of plaintiff on its claim against Heimsness, as well as grant defendants' motion to bifurcate."); Fuery v. City of Chicago, No. 07 C 5428, 2015 WL 715281, at *1-4 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 17, 2015) ("In Thomas, the plaintiff claimed deliberate indifference, alleging that the County had a policy or practice of understaffing that caused systemic failures to respond to medical requests. . .The Seventh Circuit concluded that it was not inconsistent for a jury to find that the individual defendants were not deliberately indifferent to the prisoner's medical needs but rather that they 'simply could not respond adequately because of the well-documented breakdowns in the County's policies for retrieving medical request forms.'. . Instead, the jury could find that County's policies were the driving force behind the constitutional violation alleged. . . Typically, however, a plaintiff cannot prevail on a Monell claim without first establishing an underlying constitutional violation. . . That is the case presented by Plaintiffs here, who are not alleging that the City has a general custom or policy carried out by Szura of using excessive force against women or gay women, of falsely arresting women or gay women, or of generally discriminating against women or gay women. Instead, Plaintiffs allege that Szura used excessive force against them, falsely arrested them and caused them to be unlawfully detained, and illegally targeted them by virtue of their being women and gay in violation of the Equal Protection Clause. Their Monell claims are premised on allegations that the City allowed Szura's violations to occur through its policies of, among others, concealing and suppressing officer misconduct, investigating complaints against off-duty officers differently than complaints against other citizens, failing to maintain accurate records of complaints, and allowing a 'code of silence' to exist in the Chicago Police Department. But unlike in Thomas, the alleged harm to Plaintiffs was not caused independently by these alleged City policies but rather through Szura's actions, and thus Szura must first be found liable before the City may be held liable on Plaintiffs' Monell claims. . .To the extent Plaintiffs also allege the City had a policy of failure to train its police officers, the Seventh Circuit has stated since Thomas that 'a municipality cannot be liable under Monell [for failure to train] where there is no underlying constitutional violation by a municipal employee.' Sallenger v. City of Springfield, Ill., 630 F.3d 499, 504 (7th Cir.2010). And although municipal liability may be possible absent individual liability where the individual has asserted qualified immunity, Thomas, 604 F.3d at 304–05, Szura has not asserted a qualified immunity defense. . . .Plaintiffs' reliance on Obrycka v. City of Chicago, No. 07 C 2372, 2012 WL 601810 (N.D.Ill. Feb. 23, 2012) is not persuasive. Initially, the court found that the City did not properly develop its Heller argument requiring an underlying constitutional violation by the defendant officer prior to a finding of municipal liability by first raising the argument in its reply brief and only in a footnote. Obrycka, 2012 WL 601810 at *11. The court summarily rejected the City's argument without discussion and cited to Thomas. . . Unlike the factual scenario in Obrycka where the plaintiff alleged that her injury was caused by the subsequent cover-up of the incident of which the defendant officer played no part and was the basis of the plaintiff's equal protection claim, here, Plaintiffs allege that their injury directly resulted from Surza targeting them during this violent encounter because they are women and gay. . . . Plaintiffs' claims are factually and legally distinct from those in Obrycka, such that the Court finds there would be an inconsistent verdict if the jury found the City liable based on its de facto policy, but not Surza for his own conduct. Thus, because Plaintiffs may only proceed on their Monell claims against the City if they prevail on their § 1983 claims against Szura, a second trial would not be necessary regardless of the outcome of the first. Substantial time and expense may be saved if a jury finds, for example, that Szura was not acting within the scope of his employment or under color of state law, thus foregoing the need for a trial on the Monell claims. Alternatively, if Plaintiffs prevails, the parties may determine after the conclusion of the trial on the individual § 1983 claims to forego the expense of a second trial on the Monell claims as Plaintiffs would have obtained the monetary recovery to which they are entitled. Next, Plaintiffs argue that the evidence required to present their claims against Szura will substantially overlap with the evidence required to establish their Monell claims against the City. They contend that to prevail on their claims against Szura, they will have to demonstrate that he was acting under color of law and within the scope of his employment, which will necessarily include evidence regarding the scope of authority the City vests in its police officers as a matter of policy or custom. They also maintain that to present their malicious prosecution claim they will have to present evidence of the City's customs and practices regarding covering up police misconduct. Such evidence, according to Plaintiffs, will overlap significantly with the Monell evidence regarding City policies of failing to investigate and discipline and the 'code of silence.' But the presentation of broad evidence of City customs and policies, in the abstract, is not appropriate to prove Plaintiffs' claims against Szura. Introduction of such evidence poses the danger of undue prejudice to Szura and the other individual Defendants, who are not City employees and thus should not be associated with the alleged City policies. . . . Having considered the claims at issue and the possibility of unfair prejudice, the Court fails to see the substantial overlap of evidence that Plaintiffs maintain warrants holding one trial. Third, Plaintiffs argue that no prejudice will result from having the individual and Monell claims tried together and instead that they will be prejudiced by the delay in having the claims tried separately. The Court disagrees, however, as already discussed in connection with the alleged overlap of evidence. Introduction of the Monell claims will prejudice the individual Defendants, particularly the state police officers, who have no involvement with the alleged City policies. . . Plaintiffs and the City have both proffered experts on the City's policies, and the trial of the Monell claims will essentially involve a mini-trial on questions not necessary to the resolution of the remainder of the claims. Monell evidence will draw the jury's attention away from resolving the underlying issues of an incident that occurred over seven years ago. Injecting the Monell issues into the trial will make the case more complicated and potentially cause juror confusion. And although the City did include Monell exhibits and instructions in the proposed pretrial order in response to Plaintiffs' motion to reconsider bifurcation, this does not mean that the City would not be prejudiced by the Court now deciding to try the claims together, particularly as the City had not moved for summary judgment on the Monell claims based on Judge Bucklo's bifurcation order. Moreover, any delay in having the Monell claims separately tried does not warrant reversing the bifurcation decision. Although the Court was prepared to hold a trial in this case immediately upon transfer, that has not occurred for unforeseen circumstances outside of anyone's control. But the fact that this case was pending for seven years before those circumstances arose does not now warrant changing course on the bifurcation decision, particularly where Plaintiffs only moved for reconsideration of the bifurcation motion approximately three months before the originally scheduled trial date, with full knowledge that the City had made known in its summary judgment motions that it intended to file a summary judgment motion on the Monell claims after resolution of the individual claims. Finally, Plaintiffs contend that their Seventh Amendment rights will be violated by a bifurcated trial. Plaintiffs claim that a jury in a second trial on the Monell claims would be asked to determine for a second time whether Szura was acting under color of law. But because the only way that the City could be liable under § 1983 is if the jury in the first trial found that Szura was acting under color of law, a jury in the second trial would not be asked to decide this issue again. . . Thus, Plaintiffs' Seventh Amendment rights would not be violated by a bifurcated trial. Because the Court continues to find bifurcation of the Monell claims appropriate, Plaintiffs' motion to reconsider bifurcation of discovery and trial . . . is denied."); Veal v. Kachiroubas, No. 12 C 8342, 2014 WL 321708, *3-*7 & n.6 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 29, 2014) ("According to Thomas, the court must look to the nature of the constitutional violation, the theory of municipal liability, and the defenses set forth to determine whether a municipality's Monell liability is dependent upon that of its officers. . . The nature of the constitutional violations that Veal alleges against the Village belies his argument that he could prevail against the Village in the absence of officer liability. As set out above, Veal makes three constitutional claims: (1) deprivation of due process; (2) failure to intervene; and (3) conspiracy to deprive Veal of his constitutional rights. For each of these claims, the Village will only be liable if Veal proves injury arising from the individual officers' conduct. . . In other words, even if the absence of policy may be the source of the violation of civil rights, there is no injury to Veal without officer misconduct. Veal's theory of liability against the Village is its failure to institute policies that would have guided the officers engaged in the investigation of the murder, and that the Village could be liable if individual defendants succeed on their asserted defense of qualified immunity. Veal expects that the evidence will show that the Village had no policies or procedures regarding proper investigative techniques or practices regarding exculpatory evidence. It is true that a municipality can be held liable for failure to train and supervise its employees in the appropriate handling of exculpatory evidence, as Veal notes. See, e.g., Wardell v. City of Chicago, 75 F.Supp.2d 851, 856 (N.D.Ill.1999). But that does not mean that could occur without officer liability in Veal's case, where the defense of qualified immunity seems most unlikely to prevail. . . The Dixmoor defendants themselves acknowledge the weakness of this defense. (See dkt. 75 at 7 ("But if Veal's allegations are accepted as true, the individual defendants coerced confessions, manufactured evidence, and suppressed exculpatory evidence. Does Veal believe these allegations fail to make out a constitutional violation?").) Moreover, the cases upon which Veal relies in making this argument are largely distinguishable because the court in those cases considered qualified immunity a viable defense. . . Thus, the mere fact that Morgan and Falica assert qualified immunity defenses does not weigh so heavily against bifurcation as to persuade the court to allow all issues in this suit to proceed together. . . .Moreover, the Seventh Circuit has pronounced since Thomas that 'a municipality cannot be liable under Monell [for failure to train] where there is no underlying constitutional violation by a municipal employee.' Sallenger v. City of Springfield, Ill., 630 F.3d 499, 504 (7th Cir.2010) . . . Thus, to the extent that failure to train underlies Veal's assertion of municipal liability, there can be no Monell liability in the absence of individual officer liability. . . .Judicial economy in this instance favors bifurcation. . . . Veal disputes the argument that bifurcation would serve the interests of judicial economy, stating that this argument 'rests on the faulty assumption that Mr. Veal's Monell [c]laims would not be tried at all if this motion is granted.'. . But, as discussed above, Veal is highly unlikely to succeed on his Monell claims in the absence of a finding of individual liability against Morgan and Falica. If the Dixmoor officials are found liable, the court anticipates that they will be indemnified . . . . The Village has not stipulated to entry of judgment against it if the jury finds an individual employee liable. Such a stipulation, for practical purposes, obviates the need for any Monell discovery. . . . Lacking a stipulation, the Village conceivably could assert that the officials were not acting within the scope of their employment by the Village. Because the other judges who have considered this issue have not made bifurcation conditional and Veal has not raised the issue, the court does not condition bifurcation on such a stipulation. . . . But even in the unlikely event that the Dixmoor officials prevail on a qualified immunity defense, bifurcation does not mean that Veal will be deprived of his chance to pursue his Monell theory or otherwise barred from obtaining compensation if he proves he suffered a constitutional injury. . . If necessary, Veal could pursue any remaining Monell claims after the claims against individual defendants are resolved. . . . Although the court concludes that Veal cannot establish liability of the Village without first showing individual officer liability, in this instance, where the only named individual defendants apparently employed by Dixmoor are former officials of its police department, bifurcation of the claims against them would, in effect, stall Veal's case against Dixmoor. . . . If Veal proves that the supervisors' knowingly or with deliberate, reckless indifference allowed subordinates to violate Veal's constitutional rights, a jury could find them liable without finding the Village liable for failure to implement policy. . . .Since it appears that the Dixmoor officials could be liable even without the Village's being liable, the court concludes that these claims should not be bifurcated. Thus, the court will bifurcate the Monell claims against the Village, described further below, but will not bifurcate the supervisory liability claims against Morgan and Falica."); Carr v. City of North Chicago, 908 F.Supp.2d 926, 929, 930, 934, 935 (N.D. Ill. 2012) ("Where a plaintiff brings a Monell claim against a municipality based on the specific conduct of a municipality employee, the plaintiff cannot prevail on that Monell claim without first showing that the employee violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . Although the Court in Heller did not state that the employee must be liable for the violation, this became a question in the lower courts. In Thomas, the Seventh Circuit addressed whether Heller in fact established a rule that a plaintiff must show that the individual employee is not merely the instrument of plaintiff's harm but is also liable for that harm before a Monell claim can succeed. Thomas concluded that Heller did not establish such a rule. Rather, the rule in Heller is that 'a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.'. . Thomas set forth three factors to consider in determining whether a municipality's liability depends on the actions of its officers: (1) the nature of the constitutional violation that the plaintiff alleges; (2) the theory of municipal liability that supports the Monell claim; and (3) the defenses that the individual defendants have asserted. . . A predicate to recovery under Monell is, of course, a constitutional injury. . . . If there was no excessive force, there was no injury to constitutional rights. . . Here, all of the claims against the Defendant Officers are contingent on the claim that they used excessive force against Mr. Hanna. If there was no excessive force, Mr. Hanna did not suffer an injury to his constitutional rights. If Mr. Hanna did not suffer an injury to his constitutional rights, then there is no constitutional harm that the Municipal Defendants could be held liable for. Therefore, Plaintiffs' claims against Municipal Defendants are wholly contingent on the excessive force claim against Defendant Officers. If the Monell claims are bifurcated and the Defendant Officers prevail, the time and expense involved in litigating the Monell claims will be saved. The liability issues in this case therefore favor bifurcating the Monell claims. . . . As the Court explained when discussing the certification, Monell claims are most often bifurcated in this district when a case is rooted in allegations of excessive force. Plaintiffs' cases to the contrary are not on point and do not reflect the current jurisprudence of this District, where decisions to deny a motion to bifurcate rarely involve excessive force claims. [collecting cases] The Monell discovery burdens in this case are significant and bifurcation is likely to allow some or all of the parties to avoid those burdens. If Monell discovery and litigation is never reached, bifurcation will also serve judicial economy. . .Because the Monell claims in this case are entirely dependent on whether Defendant Officers violated Mr. Hanna's constitutional rights, and because the City has submitted a certification of entry of judgment against itself if a finder of fact or the court on dispositive motion determines that they did so, resolution of the claims against Defendant Officers will obviate the need to litigate the Monell claims against Municipal Defendants. It is also apparent that, at this stage, the Monell discovery will be a significant burden and that avoiding, or at least delaying, such discovery will serve both convenience and judicial economy. Together, this weighs in favor of the Municipal Defendants' motion to bifurcate and stay discovery on the Monell claims, and is enough for the Court to grant the motion to bifurcate. . . . Plaintiffs argue that there are non-economic interests at stake that can only be served by litigating the Monell claims, and that their suit is not merely about money damages. This Court recognizes that a plaintiff may feel a greater sense of personal satisfaction in a verdict that holds a municipality directly liable for the conduct at issue. However, Plaintiffs here seek only money damages, and bifurcation will not impede their ability to recover fully with a proper showing of constitutional injury. Since the City will be paying any compensatory damages, the City may feel an incentive to change. . . Plaintiffs are also reminded that bifurcation is not dismissal. They may choose to pursue the Monell claims, if there is anything more to pursue, after the claims against Defendant Officers are resolved."); Castillo v. City of Chicago No. 11 C 7359, 2012 WL 1658350, at *1-6 (N.D. Ill. May 11, 2012) ("If one of the individual defendants is found to have violated Castillo's constitutional rights, the City offers to stipulate to entry of judgment against it for compensatory damages and reasonable attorney's fees. The City's offer applies whether the violation is determined by the court or by a jury and irrespective of whether the individual defendants successfully assert a qualified immunity defense. If Castillo fails to establish a constitutional violation by one of the individual defendants, the City argues he has no Monell claim because a constitutional violation is a necessary predicate to the City's liability. In support of its argument, the City cites Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796, 799 (1986) (finding excessive force claim not actionable against a municipality based on the conduct of one of its officers where the jury concluded the officer inflicted no constitutional harm). The City contends bifurcation under either scenario serves judicial economy by allowing the parties to avoid burdensome discovery and a lengthy trial associated with Castillo's Monell claim. Castillo counters that bifurcation would lead to duplication of effort and unnecessary complexity. . . . The City contends its offer to stipulate to entry of judgment against it if Castillo succeeds against one of the individual defendants on his § 1983 claims also means there is a significant likelihood that bifurcation will fully resolve the case without summary judgment or a lengthier, more complex trial on the Monell issues. Castillo counters two trials will be necessary if the case is bifurcated. In support of his argument, Castillo cites Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Department, 604 F.3d 293 (7th Cir.2010). In Thomas, the Seventh Circuit considered whether Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796 (1986) established a firm rule requiring a showing of individual officer liability under § 1983 before a municipal liability claim could succeed. . . The Thomas court concluded that the actual rule in Heller was much narrower: '[A] municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.'. . To determine whether a municipality's liability depends on the liability of its officers, courts must look to the nature of the constitutional violation, the theory of municipal liability, and the defenses set forth. . . Because Thomas involved allegations of deliberate indifference, the court held a jury verdict finding against liability on the part of the individual municipal employees was not inconsistent with a verdict that the municipality was liable. . . A claim of deliberate indifference requires a showing that an official acted with a sufficiently culpable state of mind. . . This involves a two-part inquiry to determine whether the official had subjective knowledge of the risk to the plaintiff's health and also disregarded that risk. . . The jury 'could have found that the [municipal employees] were not deliberately indifferent to Smith's medical needs, but simply could not respond adequately because of well-documented breakdowns in the County's policies....'. . . Neither Castillo nor the City directly address whether the holding in Thomas applies to this case. Nevertheless, the court will review each of the Thomas elements in turn. . . . Castillo's claims of unreasonable seizure and false arrest/unlawful detention must be brought under the Fourth Amendment because they arise in the context of an arrest by individual police officers. Therefore, the majority of Castillo's claims against the Individual defendants are governed by a standard of objective reasonableness. . . Whereas the individual officers in Thomas could possibly rely on municipal polices and practices to negate the element of intent, here the subjective state of mind of the individual defendants is irrelevant to establishing liability. Municipal liability arising in the context of an arrest depends on a determination that one or more municipal employees violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . . The first Thomas element suggests the City's liability depends on a finding that individual police officers violated Castillo's constitutional rights. . . . Castillo alleges several theories of municipal liability, including the City's failure to adequately train, supervise, and control its police officers. There can be no municipal liability in a failure to train case without an underlying violation by a municipal employee. . . If his § 1983 claims against the individual defendants fail, so do his failure to train allegations against the City. Accordingly, this theory of municipal liability is inextricably linked with claims of liability against the individual defendants. The second Thomas element suggests not all of Castillo's claims against the City are independent of those against the individual defendants. Looking to Thomas' third factor, the individual defendants have all asserted qualified immunity as an affirmative defense. Castillo argues the defense raises the possibility that he could proceed against the City under Monell even if the individual defendants are not liable for their alleged § 1983 violations. The City does not dispute this, but counters the issue is moot because it will consent to municipal liability if any of the individual defendants violated Castillo's constitutional rights, even if they prevail based on qualified immunity. . . .[T]he City's stipulation explicitly states the City will pay Monell damages if a constitutional violation is determined either by the finder of fact or on a motion for summary judgment. . . If the issue of the individual defendants' liability is determined on a motion for summary judgment, a jury verdict may not be required at all. The court finds that Castillo's suit does not satisfy any of the Thomas elements. There is no doubt that including the § 1983 claims against the City would add greater length and complexity to trial than if the suit were to proceed against the individual officers alone. . .Similarly, the burdens of Monell discovery are also substantial. The realistic potential to avoid these dual burdens serves the interests of judicial economy and weighs in favor of bifurcation. . . . The City argues bifurcation is necessary to prevent undue prejudice that would result from a single trial. . . . Without making relevancy or admissibility determinations at this juncture, the possibility of unlawful seizures by other Chicago police officers raises legitimate concerns about the individual defendants' ability to distinguish their own alleged unconstitutional acts from those of non-party officers. This concern warrants a finding that some prejudice could result absent bifurcation of the Monell claims. . . . Castillo can identify no substantive defect with the stipulation itself. If he establishes a constitutional injury, the City's stipulation requires payment of compensatory damages and reasonable attorney's fees regardless of qualified immunity. The stipulation permits Castillo to recover damages from the City without the need for a trial . . . Further, the stipulation does not bar him from asserting Monell claims should he fail to establish individual liability and a valid theory of liability remains against the City. The balance of the equities favors bifurcation."); Parker v. Banner, No. 05 C 6378, 2007 WL 898090, at *2, *5, *6 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 22, 2007) ("In other cases, I have postponed consideration (including discovery) of Monell claims against the City. In this case, Plaintiff offers an extensively briefed motion contending that my decisions are in error, so I will re-examine the issue. . . . In short, Plaintiff has not cited authority critical of the idea that discovery of Monell claims should come after discovery for other claims. Most of the cases Plaintiff cites severed the Monell count. The two judges who did not sever simply reserved the decision for later. . . . In simple terms, if you just want a trial court to say that the City was wrong, you have not presented a case or controversy to that court. . . . The policy claims in this case are legitimate matters of public concern, over which there is already public debate. I do not think Plaintiff argues that Monell discovery is necessary in bringing claims of police abuse to the public consciousness. When an Alderman, the Chairman of the Committee on Police and Fire of the Chicago City Council, states there is 'an environment where police officers ... have ample reason to believe that they will not be held accountable even in instances of egregious misconduct,' as Plaintiff quotes, it is difficult to believe that City policies, customs and practices are not already under scrutiny. Given a choice between having a court hear a single case or having a legislature conduct a hearing (free from ordinary evidentiary constraints) in order to decide whether and how to change policy, practice or custom, the choice ought to be made in favor of leaving it to the legislature. It is the job of the City Council to deal with citywide policies and practices. The court sits to remedy any particular act by a city employee which violates the Constitution, and it will do so regardless of what the City Council may choose to do. Here that remedy would be a damage award which is being paid by the City. That award is a good reason for it to change policies that are unconstitutional. In the absence of claims for equitable relief, and in addition to damages, Plaintiff wants a piece of paper saying that the City acts unconstitutionally. I do not know exactly why he wants that paper, but securing a verdict or opinion for the sole purpose of having those words does not create a case or controversy within the meaning of Article III of the Constitution. All of this is why I will postpone, and perhaps preclude, the extensive Monell discovery requested in this case. That discovery may inflict needless, wasteful expense of time and money upon the parties and the court. I would also be inclined to sever the trial of any individuals from a trial of the City. If Plaintiff loses against the officers, the case is over. If Plaintiff prevails, then he can decide whether it is worth pursuing his claim against the City. If he is entitled to try for additional nominal damages, then he clearly has a right to pursue them. The mandate of 'case or controversy' only requires that something concrete be at stake − a dollar will do. Defendant's motion to postpone Monell discovery . . . and conditionally sever the trial of the City from the trial of the officers is granted."); Clarett v. Suroviak, No. 09 C 6918, 2011 WL 37838, at *2, *3 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 3, 2011) ("Bifurcation in this case would appear to provide benefits in terms of economy. Clarett has propounded a significant amount of Monell discovery in the form of document requests and interrogatories. Yet if the defendants are able to demonstrate that there was no constitutional violation of Clarett's rights by the individual officers, then there likely would be no basis for Monell liability. Although Clarett cites Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Dep't, 604 F.3d 293 (7th Cir.2010), for the proposition that a municipality may sometimes be found liable even if individual officers are not, she does not explain how such an outcome in this case could avoid inconsistent verdicts. From a review of the complaint, the Village's liability appears to depend upon establishing that one of the individual defendants violated Clarett's rights. Because the Village has agreed to concede its own liability if one of the officers is found liable, a verdict for Clarett would obviate the need for further litigation. There is one significant remaining problem with bifurcation. At this point, the Village has asserted an affirmative defense of qualified immunity. If the individual defendants are able to convince a jury that immunity is warranted in this case, then there would still be a need for a second, duplicative trial as to the Village's liability. The court will follow Judge Darrah's example in Lopez and deny defendants' request to bifurcate at this time. However, the court grants defendants' request to stay discovery as to Clarett's Monell claim. . . After completing discovery on the claims against the individual officers, the parties may be in a position to resolve the case through settlement or summary judgment motions. If so, then the parties will have saved considerable efforts. Clarett's response brief makes no argument why moving forward now with Monell discovery would be important in the particular circumstances of this case."); Grant v. City of Chicago, No. 04 C 2612, 2006 WL 328265, at *1, *3 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 10, 2006) ("In this case brought under the Civil Rights Act of 1871, 42 U.S.C. § 1983, Tammy Faye Grant, the plaintiff administrator of the estate of her son, Cornelius Ware, has alleged that four Chicago police officers violated Ware's constitutional rights in effecting an arrest by using excessive force that caused his death. Plaintiff alleges that at the time he was shot, Ware was unarmed and holding his hands up in a gesture of surrender. Plaintiff also has sued the City of Chicago, alleging that the City has a practice of excusing officers' wrongful use of deadly force by unquestioningly accepting standard but sometimes false assertions that the victim had either pointed a weapon at the officer or attempted to grab the officer's weapon so as to create a defense of justifiable use of force. . . . Although the City denies that the officers acted pursuant to any policy or custom of the City, it has moved to bar the trial of the Monell claim by waiving its right to demand proof and stipulating to entry of judgment against the City for any award of damages imposed on the officer defendants. [footnote omitted] The City argues that because the case against it stands or falls on the case against the officers, and because proof of policy and custom cannot add anything to plaintiff's damages, there is no case or controversy between plaintiff and the City. . . . In the final analysis, the plaintiff gains nothing in her pocket from a judgment against the City; neither do her attorneys. There is no case or controversy. The court acknowledges that unconstitutional municipal conduct is more likely to elude justice as a result of decisions like this, but it does not see a principled basis to deny the City's motion.").

For cases where bifurcation has been denied, see Grant v. Lockett, No. 19-1558, 2021 WL 5816245, at *1 (2d Cir. Dec. 8, 2021) (not reported) ("We have not . . . mechanically required bifurcation in cases featuring claims of both municipal and individual liability. On the contrary, we have recognized that the decision whether to bifurcate a trial is committed to the 'sound discretion' of the district court. . . Here, the district court permissibly rejected Defendants' contention that bifurcation would promote convenience and efficiency in light of the relationship between Plaintiffs' individual and municipal liability claims. It also reasonably rejected Defendants' contention that they would be prejudiced by the introduction of evidence relevant only to Plaintiffs' claim against the City, given its ability to mitigate prejudice via curative instructions and an appropriate jury charge. The risk of prejudice of which Defendants complained was of the type that could 'be cured with proper instructions, and juries are presumed to follow their instructions[.]'. . . The district court therefore did not abuse its discretion."); Hankins v. Wheeler, No. 21-1129, 2024 WL 4903917, at *2 (E.D. La. Nov. 27, 2024) ("Here, whether an underlying constitutional violation occurred in the present case is dependent upon whether the officers had reasonable suspicion to make the stop, which the Fifth Circuit has concluded is shrouded in facts and must be decided by a jury. If the Court were to bifurcate Plaintiff's claims into two separate trials, the trial against the officers present at the scene would proceed first, and the jury would necessarily have to make a finding as to the existence of a constitutional violation to reach a verdict. The first jury's finding on the existence of a constitutional violation would then presumably inform the second jury's decision in the trial against the supervisors and entities. However, this approach becomes problematic when one considers how inextricably intertwined Plaintiff's claims are with one another. For instance, bifurcation will require the parties here to put forth the same evidence establishing a constitutional violation at both trials: at the first to assess the reasonableness of the officers' actions and at the second to assess the supervisors' and entities' culpability for the actions taken by those same officers. The duplication of this evidence required at both trials indicates the inefficiency of this approach and militates in favor of trying these claims together. Additionally, the Court is concerned that bifurcation in this case may result in undue prejudice. Two different juries analyzing essentially the same evidence in slightly different contexts could breed confusion and result in key differences of interpretation regarding the facts of the case. Accordingly, the Court finds that the more prudent approach is to try these issues all at once before a single jury to avoid the waste of judicial resources and prejudice to the parties."); Tupea v. Kline, No. 2:23CV240, 2024 WL 2874288, at *2-3, *6 (E.D. Va. June 7, 2024) ("[A] government employee defendant can violate a plaintiff's constitutional right without liability, if that right was not 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged conduct. . . Even so, Monell liability may attach in that situation due to the employee's underlying constitutional violation, but the absence of a clearly established right precludes individual liability under qualified immunity. . . In sum, Defendant Wyche could be liable under Monell even if Kline is not liable under § 1983. Therefore, bifurcating the case to decide Kline's § 1983 liability first in a separate trial would not necessarily be more efficient than deciding Kline's § 1983 liability and Wyche's Monell liability in the same trial. . . Admittedly, the Tserkis court decided to bifurcate even after considering this interplay between Monell liability and qualified immunity. . . But in that case, bifurcation could also make discovery more efficient, which is not the case here as explained above. Further, bifurcation in the instant case would likely prejudice Plaintiff because it is more onerous, and expensive, to litigate two jury trials than one. Holding two trials could also inconvenience witnesses who may have to duplicate testimony.

Finally, holding two trials uses more judicial resources. Consequently, judicial and litigation economy does not warrant bifurcating Plaintiff's claims. . . . In sum, although Defendant Kline's personnel record is prejudicial to him, that prejudice does not merit bifurcating the claims against Kline from the Monell claim against Wyche, as one claim ultimately relates to the other. Limiting instructions will more efficiently address any prejudice and ensure that Kline receives a fair trial on the claims against him and that Wyche likewise receives a fair trial on the Monell claim."); Cummings v. The GEO Group, Inc., No. 3:23CV327 (RCY), 2024 WL 330572, at *7 (E.D. Va. Jan. 29, 2024) ("Here, Plaintiff sets forth a single cause of action pertaining to Defendant's alleged policy and custom of understaffing. . . In other words, Plaintiff lodges only a Monell claim against Defendant. No individual defendants are named in the Complaint, and while some allegations pertain to the actions of individual actors employed by Defendant, the 'overwhelming thrust of the factual allegations ... focus on the broader context of how GEO's ... culture and business model has ... lead[ ] directly the injuries suffered by Plaintiff.'. . Applying the principles outlined above to these circumstances reveals that this case is ill-suited for bifurcation. . . .Preliminarily, the Court notes that Defendant is indeed subject to Monell liability. As outlined above, Monell liability has been extended to private entities operating under color of state law. . . Here, Defendant is operating under color of state law, insofar as it contracts with VDOC, a state entity, to operate prisons—a power that is 'traditionally the exclusive prerogative of the State.'. . Moreover, Plaintiff's allegations comply with the strictures of Monell and its progeny, insofar as Plaintiff alleges both (1) the existence of an unconstitutional policy or custom—understaffing—and (2) that said unconstitutional policy or custom caused his injuries. . .Therefore, the only issue in front of the Court is whether bifurcation is appropriate here. In support of its Motion to Bifurcate, Defendant argues that 'plaintiff has not named as a party a specific individual that violated his constitutional rights. However, [Plaintiff's] allegations ... implicate particularized actions and omissions on the part of individuals such that the first prong of individual liability is a necessary part of Plaintiff's proof to proceed on his Monell claim.'. .. Per Defendant, these are 'fact-specific allegations of violations of Plaintiff's constitutional rights that require proof necessary prior to proceeding on Plaintiff's Monell claim[ ].'. . Defendant continues by arguing that '[g]iven the breadth of Plaintiff's Monell allegations, ... the scope and magnitude of Monell-related discovery will be substantial' and necessarily delay trial. . . As such, Defendant argues that bifurcating trial and staying discovery on the Monell claim 'would allow the Court to set an expedited trial date on the underlying claims under the normal time constraints of the Court, rather than entertaining a request for extended discovery period and a later trial date on all claims combined.'. .Plaintiff responds first that 'the overwhelming thrust of the factual allegations in the Complaint are not centered around the actions of particular individuals, but rather focus on the broader context of how GEO's profit-drive corporate culture and business model has infected its operations nationally and ... at LVCC, leading directly to [Plaintiff's] injuries.'. . Plaintiff then argues that under such circumstances, 'a Monell claim does not have to be tethered to specific individual liability' as Defendant argues. . .This is because '[r]ather than condemning particular individual conduct, the Complaint ... alleges that the unconstitutional conditions at LVCC derived from who was not there due to [Defendant's] policy of understaffing.'. . According to Plaintiff, '[t]his case is, therefore, uniquely about [Defendant's] policy that allowed "gangs to virtually ruin the institution." The Court should not allow [Defendant] to pass the buck to individuals—without adequate corporate support, staffing, or funding—who happened to work there.'. .Ultimately, the Court is not convinced that bifurcation is necessary here. Plainly, the instant allegations do not require Plaintiff to first establish that an individual defendant is liable for violating Plaintiff's rights before Monell liability may be imposed. That is because 'a finding of no liability on the part of the individual ... actors can co-exist with a finding of liability on the part of [Defendant].'. . Plaintiff's sole contention is that Defendant's policy or custom of understaffing caused his injuries. By its very language, this allegation does not implicate individual actors. And in fact, the thrust of Plaintiff's Complaint is that the lack of individual actors working for Defendant is what caused his injuries. Under such circumstances, a finding of liability on behalf of individual actors is not a prerequisite for a finding of liability as to Defendant. . . Defendant's additional argument that Plaintiff must first prove he suffered a constitutional violation generally before he can proceed on his Monell claim is similarly misguided. . . Simply, it is near impossible—and certainly impractical—to effectively split the two issues in the way Defendant requests. Plaintiff can only prove his Monell claim by establishing the existence of an unconstitutional policy or custom and causally connecting said policy or custom to the harm he ultimately suffered. . . And because Plaintiff asserts only a Monell claim, he needs evidence of both the alleged unconstitutional policy and custom and its specific connection to his injury to prove his case. . .In view of the above, it is clear bifurcation is not strictly necessary—nor appropriate—under these circumstance—i.e., a Monell claim only alleging understaffing in violation of the Eighth Amendment. That said, the Court must still consider the discretionary factors outlined in Rule 42(b) to determine whether bifurcation is nevertheless appropriate. . . . The Court is simply not persuaded that either bifurcation or a stay of discovery on Monell-related issues is warranted—or feasible—in this matter. Preliminarily, Defendant's request that the Court bifurcate Plaintiff's Monell claim against it is essentially impossible to do, insofar as Plaintiff only alleges a Monell claim. Put another way, there is nothing to bifurcate. . . And to the extent bifurcation and a stay of discovery would be feasible, practical considerations weigh against bifurcation and a stay of discovery. The issues Defendant seeks to bifurcate are inextricably intertwined with one another, and discovery will inevitably overlap. . . Further, if the Court did split the matter (and stay discovery) as Defendant requests, it seems just as likely that discovery disputes will arise as to what exactly constitutes permissible versus impermissible discovery. . . At bottom, while Monell claims are generally 'good candidates for bifurcation,'. . . this matter represents an exception insofar as Plaintiff does not allege—and his claim does not depend on—the violation of his constitutional rights by any one individual actor. . . Accordingly, bifurcation of this matter is unnecessary and impractical. Moreover, the Court is not persuaded that the relevant considerations (i.e., efficiency, convenience, or to avoid prejudice) favor bifurcation."); Cruz v. Guevara, No. 23 C 4268, 2023 WL 8934940, at *4–5, *8-14 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 27, 2023) ("By consenting to liability for compensatory damages, the City would foreclose the possibility of Section 1983 plaintiffs having to litigate further to obtain their monetary compensation when officers are found liable. If getting compensated upon a determination of liability is in effect guaranteed, the City posits that no Monell litigation is necessary because plaintiffs will obtain nothing for it. Below we address this argument by considering whether the Court is prepared to find that this Plaintiff truly does take nothing from a judgment against the City under Monell, assuming as we must that a Monell judgment does not result in his receiving further monetary compensation beyond nominal damages. Preliminarily, we acknowledge that district courts have bifurcated Section 1983 actions (and thus stayed Monell discovery) where the City has consented to its liability for compensatory damages against the individuals, under the theory that the consent-to-liability agreement renders a plaintiff's Monell claim a superfluous exercise that is a drain on the plaintiff as well. . . Referring to how bifurcation can relieve Section 1983 plaintiffs of the burden of litigating Monell claims where doing so will not bring them more monetary compensation, the City calls bifurcation 'no small benefit to Plaintiff.'. .Plaintiff's response to the City's expressed concern for his Monell litigation burdens is clear enough: 'Thank you very much, but no thanks at all.'. . . Plaintiff further explains, in his opposition to the Bifurcation Motion, that he has two goals in this litigation: (1) being compensated for his alleged injuries, and (2) having the City 'acknowledge the horrific pattern of violence, torture, perjury, fabricated and withheld evidence that he and others have suffered.'. . Plaintiff's confirmation that he wants a judgment against the City, aside from monetary compensation, for the purpose of holding the City accountable for its alleged unconstitutional policies and practices, distinguishes this case from those on which the City primarily relies for the notion that the City's limited consent to liability for compensatory damages against the Individual Defendants counsels decisively in favor of bifurcation. . . . The City's limited consent to liability for the Individual Defendants is not a consent to Monell liability. Nominal damages under Monell remain as a remedy against the City if Plaintiff obtains compensatory damage awards against the Individual Defendants, no matter if the City has agreed to pay those damages. And in failing to grasp the availability of a nominal damages award, the City has not accounted for the value a nominal Monell judgment may have for Plaintiff and his stated interest in changing what he says is a systemic pattern and practice of abusing criminal suspects and procuring repeated wrongful murder convictions for some 40 years in Chicago. Or, at least, the City invites the Court to value those interests at zero. This we decline to do. . . . Swanigan I envisioned multiple circumstances in which Monell liability might not overlap with individual officer liability, such as cases with 'factually distinct' Monell claims that thus were not precluded by a defense verdict on the individual claims, or cases in which plaintiffs might seek 'an injunction against future constitutional violations or some other equitable remedy, and he may be willing to invest the time and effort needed to prove his entitlement to that relief.'. . In those sorts of cases, the Seventh Circuit said in Swanigan I, plaintiffs should be entitled to try to prove their Monell claims, as such claims may have 'remedial import' beyond the money damages claims. Id., citing David F. Hamilton, The Importance and Overuse of Policy and Custom Claims: A View From One Trench, 48 DePaul L. Rev. 723, 734–35 (1999) ("Hamilton"). . . . In the 24 years since the Judge Hamilton article, many allegations have swirled around certain Chicago police detectives, including Defendant Guevara, whose criminal investigations have led to no less than 40 – and that is a big number – persons being exonerated of the grave offense of murder in Cook County in the past six years, according to an undisputed assertion by Plaintiff. . . In other Section 1983 cases related to these exonerations, Defendant Guevara has invoked his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination rather than testify. . . The Court takes not much of a leap in concluding that Plaintiff's Monell claim is one of these important Monell claims that Judge Hamilton saw as worth closer judicial consideration on bifurcation motions. In undertaking that closer examination, we are not prepared to second-guess Plaintiff's assertions about the significance of his Monell claims and thus the importance of his ability to discover and litigate them just as any other plaintiff might litigate other significant claims, unfettered by bifurcation and the delays it imposes on Monell discovery. Likewise, we also find ourselves reluctant to speculate that deterrent effects from liability judgments against cities under Monell will be so minimal (or so comparatively less than compensatory damage awards against individual officers where the City pays the awards) that judges should pay little or no heed to a plaintiff's stated interest – as in this case, for example – in obtaining a Monell judgment intended to force an acknowledgement of past unconstitutional municipal practices. . . . The City's Limited Consent in this case removes all doubt that the City will pay any compensatory damages, but it does not operate to render 'fruitless' the Monell facet of this litigation amid its independent value. . . In view of the availability and possible public import of nominal damages on Plaintiff's Monell claim, we follow Cadiz in declining to foist a Monell discovery stay on this unwilling Plaintiff where bifurcating or staying discovery on the Monell claims risks substantially the deprivation of a Monell merits determination. . . . In addition, the Court is not prepared to join in the City's assumption that Plaintiff's Monell claims will necessarily fail if he does not prevail against the Individual Defendants. The City has stated correctly the legal rule for what happens to Section 1983 Monell claims if a plaintiff does not prove constitutional torts by the individual officers. In City of Los Angeles v. Heller, 475 U.S. 796, 799 (1986), the Supreme Court held that municipal liability is contingent on officer liability. But our court of appeals has noted a narrow exception to the rule in Heller where the Monell claim is factually distinct from the claims against the individual officers. See Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Dep't, 604 F.3d 293, 305 (7th Cir. 2009) ("a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict"). The possibility that Plaintiff may retain a Monell claim factually distinct from the claims against the individual officers weighs against staying Monell discovery in this case. . . . This Court does not question that the volume of the Monell discovery will be very substantial, but that situation is not of this Plaintiff's making. The City takes this Plaintiff as it finds him, and he is alleging a widespread and longstanding set of policies involving Defendant Guevara and other officers at Area 5, implicating numerous other murder exonerations. The Court will not order a discovery stay that stifles the unwilling Plaintiff's litigation of his Monell claims simply because those claims – and the discovery that will come with them – are, in a word, big. If that were the rule, Monell discovery categorically could not proceed in Section 1983 cases alleging the most significant and far-reaching forms of Monell liability. That would be a perverse result. . . . Here, the City's collection, in its briefing on the Bifurcation Motion, of wrongful conviction cases in this district involving Defendant Guevara only confirms that the City as of this writing has undertaken or is undertaking substantial Monell discovery in several Guevera Section 1983 matters. The City's list includes Maysonet and at least seven other matters in which, according to the City, courts either denied bifurcation or phased the Monell discovery by calling for it to be addressed after non-Monell fact discovery, without formally staying it. . . From all this, we must conclude that the City has substantial experience in searching for and producing the species of Monell discovery that Plaintiff is likely to seek in this matter. And that lessens the City's burden. We thus conclude, in our case-specific analysis, that by virtue of Monell discovery having proceeded in multiple other Guevara-related lawsuits, the City's burden in producing Monell discovery in this case is not as great as how the City describes it in the Bifurcation Motion. The progress of Monell discovery in other Guevara cases such as Maysonet suggests strongly to the Court that producing this discovery will not be the insurmountable hurdle that the City has described."); Pearce v. City of Portland, No. 3:22-CV-00518-HZ, 2023 WL 2182468, at *2-4 (D. Or. Feb. 21, 2023) ("In the Ninth Circuit, 'bifurcation is the exception rather than the rule of normal trial procedure.'. . The moving party has the burden of proving that bifurcation is appropriate. . . . As was the case in De Anda, Plaintiff here alleges that along with the other individual Defendants, Defendant Dobson participated in and was directly responsible for the act that caused Plaintiff's constitutional injury. Thus, the Court finds no benefit to a separate proceeding on the claims against Defendant Dobson. Defendants' motion to bifurcate discovery and litigation on the claims against Defendant Dobson from the claims against the other individual Defendants is denied. . . . [I]f Plaintiff suffered no constitutional violation at the hands of the individual Defendants, the City cannot be found liable under Monell. . . For this reason, Defendants argue that in the interest of efficiency and judicial economy, Plaintiffs claims against the individual Defendants should be tried first. . . . But Defendants' argument fails for two reasons. First, Defendants ignore the converse situation. If Plaintiff succeeds on his claims against the individual Defendants, significantly more time and judicial resources would be expended litigating the related municipal liability claims in a separate, subsequent proceeding. . . As here, where evidence of individual defendants actions and what a city's policies allow may overlap, 'a judicial efficiency argument does not support bifurcation[.]'. . Second, Defendants erroneously assume that a judgment in favor of the individual Defendants necessarily equates to a finding that Plaintiff suffered no constitutional violation. The individual Defendants may be found to have caused a constitutional injury to Plaintiff but still be shielded from liability through qualified immunity. . . Thus, even if Plaintiff does not prevail on his claims against the individual Defendants, he could potentially still proceed with his claim against the City. And because the issues of individual liability and municipal liability are intertwined and not easily separable in this case, bifurcation would not promote efficiency or preserve judicial economy. . . . Thus, bifurcation is not warranted at this time. As Plaintiff concedes, Defendants' argument in favor of bifurcation 'would likely benefit from further discovery and argument at a later date.'. . The Court agrees. Defendants are not precluded from raising these issues and seeking bifurcation of the proceedings after discovery has been completed and dispositive motions have been resolved."); Fleming v. City of New York, No. 18CV4866GBDJW, 2023 WL 1861223, at *2–3 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 9, 2023) ("There is competing caselaw regarding whether an action should be bifurcated due to Monell claims. On the one hand, some courts have bifurcated discovery until individual defendant liability has been established. [citing cases] On the other hand, courts in this District have held that Monell claims do not necessarily warrant bifurcation. 'For municipal liability to attach, the jury need only find that Plaintiff was the "victim of a federal tort committed by persons for whose conduct the municipality can be responsible."'. . 'The law does not require the jury to find any of the named defendants liable. Rather municipal liability can exist "even in the absence of individual liability" so long as "the injuries complained of are not solely attributable to the actions of named individual defendants."'. . In Small, the Court held that its decision not to bifurcate the trial was not erroneous.

Defendant's 'liability was not "derivative of the individual defendants' liability" because the injuries complained of were not solely attributable to the acts or omissions of the individual [d]efendants.'. . The Court finds the reasoning in Small to be particularly convincing here, where the City's liability is similarly not based solely on the acts or omissions of the individually named defendants. Plaintiff asserts Monell claims against the City for 'longstanding customs, policies, and practices of using and condoning or turning a blind eye to the use of excessive force against detainees on Rikers Island, ignoring and systematically failing to enforce DOC guidelines, including those relating to the use of force by correctional officers.' . . Therefore, the City may be subject to Monell liability even if Plaintiff cannot establish individual defendant liability, whether that be due to individual defendant qualified immunity, an untimely suit against the individual defendants, or because plaintiff settled with or abandoned the suit against individual defendants. . . In her Second Amended Complaint, Plaintiff alleges there was a June 8 Assault involving a claim of excessive force by defendant Williams as well as John Does 1-6. . . Plaintiff alleges that John Does 11-14 failed to follow DOC protocol to refer Patrick to Mental Health Services. . . The Second Amended Complaint alleges an October 20 Assault involving excessive force by John Does 21-26 as well. . . Therefore, the City's Monell liability does not turn solely on the conduct or liability of the individually named defendants but rather on others for whose conduct the City may be held responsible. Any concern regarding the relevance, proportionality, burden, and delay of Plaintiff's requested Monell discovery will be addressed by the Court through case and discovery management. Further, jury confusion can be avoided with appropriate instructions and jury charges. . . Therefore, bifurcation of discovery is unwarranted. Defendants may renew their request for bifurcation of summary judgment and/or trial at a later point. However, the Court notes it is unconvinced by the City Defendants' present arguments."); Trexler v. City of Belvidere, No. 20 CV 50113, 2021 WL 493039, at *3, *6 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 10, 2021) ("In this case, the constitutional violations alleged are an unconstitutional seizure claim and an excessive force claim. The complaint states that Defendant Parker's actions 'were done pursuant to, and as a result of, one or more of the above de facto policies, practices and customs' of Defendant City of Belvidere. . . The underlying claims are premised on Defendant Parker's actions in part but are also based on the presence of the practices, policies, and customs, which include 'failing to adequately train, supervise and discipline police officers' in areas such as use of excessive force. . . The allegations in the complaint overlap with, but may still be distinct from, the Monell allegations, given the early stage of litigation. . . and that Defendant Parker has asserted a qualified immunity defense. . . Additionally, the City's citation of Sallenger is not applicable because, in that case, qualified immunity had already been denied and a jury had found the defendant officers not liable. . . Based on this analysis, the Court finds it premature to conclude that Plaintiff must succeed on his claims against Defendant Parker before the City can be held liable. Therefore, bifurcation is not warranted on this basis. . . . The Court concludes that the City's motion to bifurcate Plaintiff's Monell claim and stay discovery are not in accordance with Rule 42(b)'s considerations of convenience, economy, expedition, and prejudice. The potential for bifurcation or a stay to serve the interests of judicial economy and avoid unfair prejudice is speculative at this point in the litigation, especially when weighed against the interests of and prejudice to Plaintiff as the non-moving party."); Rodriguez v. City of Chicago, No. 18-CV-7951, 2019 WL 6877598, at *2–5

(N.D. Ill. Dec. 17, 2019) ("The magistrate judge explained that Plaintiff ' "has a profound interest in pursuing his claims with an eye towards institutional reform," and "a judgment naming the City itself and holding it responsible for its policies may have a greater deterrent effect than a judgment against a police officer that is paid by the City."'. . Numerous courts have recognized the importance of weighing such non-monetary considerations in the bifurcation analysis. [collecting cases] Although some courts in this district have found that the City's willingness to consent to a judgment against it for compensatory damages serves as an adequate deterrent, . . . others have found 'such stipulations insufficient to justify bifurcation, noting that the plaintiff is entitled to be the master of her own complaint and pursue claims even if they have a minimal pecuniary reward.'. . Courts have reasoned that there are valid non-economic reasons for pursuing a Monell action 'even if she has already won a judgment against individual officers and the municipality has consented to judgment.'. . . Further, courts in this district have taken issue with similar consents as offering little, if any, deterrent effect where, as here, the proposed consent expressly denies any wrongdoing on the part of the City. . . .Plaintiff is the master of his own complaint, and failure to pursue a consent decree or injunctive relief in this case does not foreclose the possibility that he still has significant non-monetary incentives for pursuing a Monell claim. Also, even though the policies at issue are 25 years old, the City has not demonstrated that all of the policies at issue have been meaningfully reformed such that a finding of Monell liability in this case would have no impact on institutional reform or deterrence. Accordingly, there is no clear error in the magistrate judge's finding that Plaintiff's 'profound' non-economic incentives for pursing his Monell claim weigh in favor of denying bifurcation. . . .The magistrate judge's finding that prejudice to the Plaintiff outweighed any burden of responding to Monell related discovery requests is also not clearly erroneous. . . . The Court does not find clear error in the Judge Cox's reasoning. As Plaintiff points out, much Monell discovery including written policies and training manuals, Rule 30(b)(6) testimony, employee records, and samples of homicide and or CR files have or will be produced in other cases involving a similar group of Chicago Police Officers including Rivera v. Chicago, No. 12c4428 (N.D. Ill); Fields v. Chicago, No. 10c1168 (N.D. Ill.); Ryes v. Guevara, et al, No. 18c1028 (N.D. Ill); Gomez, No. 18c335 (N.D. Ill); Reyes & Solache v. Guevara, Nos. 18 18c1028 & 18c2312 (N.D. Ill.); Almodovar v. Guevara, Nos. 18c2341 & 18c2701 (N.D. Ill); Sierra v. Guevara, No. 18c3029 (N.D. Ill.); Maysonet v. Guevara, No. 18c2342 (N.D.Ill). (Dkt. 61 at 11–12). . . . Many courts have not been persuaded by a defendant's general assertions about the high costs of Monell discovery. . . . Courts in this district have cautioned against bifurcating a Monell claim where, as here, the proposed consent to compensatory damages explicitly denies liability on the part of the City, noting that such a consent 'attempts to circumvent the public policy goals of Monell claims by insulating the City from litigation and accepting responsibility if their practices and policies result in constitutional injuries.'. .Similarly, the Court is not persuaded by the City's assertion that the magistrate judge's finding of the possible need for two separate trials is 'contrary to law.' The City argues that there is no possibility of a second trial if the Individual Defendants are not found liable because 'the Supreme Court and Seventh Circuit have consistently held, there can be no Monell liability without a finding of a constitutional violation by at least one individual defendant officer, especially in a case such as the present one.'. . However, in Thomas, the Seventh Circuit held that 'a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.'. . Plaintiff argues that the Thomas exception applies in this case because his complaint specifically pleads that 'police officers placed "discoverable reports, memos and other information in files that were maintained solely at the police department" and that pursuant to the City custom and practice, such files were withheld from prosecutors and criminal defendants.'. . Plaintiff explains that 'a Monell verdict reflecting that the City's file-keeping system prevented disclosure of exculpatory investigative materials to Plaintiff would be consistent with a verdict that no individual Defendant bore personal responsibility for evidence suppression.'. .Courts in this district have recognized that under similar facts, Monell liability against the City would not necessarily be dependent on a finding of liability of the individual officers."); Tate on behalf of Booth v. City of Chicago, No. 18 C 07439, 2019 WL 2173802, at *4–6 (N.D. Ill. May 20, 2019) ("The Defendants contend that 'unless Plaintiffs prove an underlying constitutional violation against the individual Defendant Officers, the City cannot be held liable.' However, that is not a bright line rule. According to the Seventh Circuit, 'a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.' Thomas v. Cook Cty. Sherrif's Dep't, 604 F.3d 293, 305 (7th Cir. 2010). To determine whether the findings would be inconsistent, the Court must 'look to the nature of the constitutional violation, the theory of municipal liability, and the defenses set forth.'. . . The Court first turns to the nature of the constitutional violations and theories of liability asserted. The Plaintiffs' complaint alleges constitutional claims for unlawful search and false arrest pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 on behalf of all the Plaintiffs. The complaint also alleges a Monell claim for use of excessive force on behalf of the Minor Plaintiffs. The complaint is atypical in that there is no accompanying claim against the individual officers for use of excessive force. Given that structure, there is no possibility for inconsistent verdicts, as there is no count other than the Monell claim that is predicated on excessive force. . . Therefore, the claims involved do not necessitate the conclusion that liability as to the City and not to the individual officers would be inconsistent. Additionally, the Court needs to consider the defenses set forth by the parties, including the asserted defense of qualified immunity. In cases where qualified immunity is available, the jury could find the City liable for Monell violations despite the individual officers being shielded from liability. . . Divergent findings between the individual officers and the City are not necessarily inconsistent of one another. Therefore, the Minor Plaintiffs' asserted Monell claim may proceed independent of a finding on the individual officers' liability. Accordingly, bifurcation would not serve the interests of judicial economy on this ground, as the claim could be adjudicated regardless of the outcome in the trial against the individual officers. . . . Although the Court would normally only reach this stage of the inquiry if it found that bifurcation would avoid prejudice to a party or increase judicial economy, the Court sees it fit to explain the prejudice the Minor Plaintiffs would face if their Monell claim was bifurcated. The Defendants moved to bifurcate the Monell claim in this case and stay all related discovery and trial until the resolution of the claims against the individual officers. In effect, this motion serves to prevent an adjudication of the Monell claim's merits regardless of the outcome of the first trial. Cadiz, 2007 WL 4293976, at *1. As the Court held in Cadiz: The City argues that if plaintiff does not establish Section 1983 liability against the officers, then there can be no Monell claim…. The City further suggests that even if plaintiff does establish Section 1983 liability against the officers, trial of the Monell claim will be unnecessary (and thus should not proceed) because it can provide plaintiff with no additional compensatory damages. Id. Essentially, the Defendants are asserting the same arguments here to achieve a de facto dismissal of the Monell claim by way of bifurcation. This would undoubtedly prejudice the Minor Plaintiffs in their efforts to hold the City accountable for its continued use of excessive force against young children. Echoing the holding in Cadiz, this Court does 'not believe that the City should be allowed to deprive a plaintiff of a merits determination of a Monell claim by the expedient of agreeing to pay a judgment against its officers that the City may be statutorily or contractually obligated to pay anyway.' . . The Minor Plaintiffs have a profound interest in pursuing their claims with an eye toward institutional reform. As the Supreme Court has avowed, '[Section 1983] is designed to provide compensation for injuries arising from the violation of legal duties, and thereby, of course, to deter future violations.'. . As this District has recognized, a judgment naming the city itself and holding it responsible for its policies may have a greater deterrent effect than a judgment against a police officer that is paid by the city. . . The City should not be allowed to strip the Minor Plaintiffs of this opportunity, and as such, must confront the merits of the Monell claim. . . For the aforementioned reasons, the Court denies the Defendants' motion to bifurcate. It is so ordered."); Love v. City of Chicago, No. 18 C 2742, 2019 WL 339591, at *5–6 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 28, 2019) ("[T]he City argues that bifurcation furthers judicial economy by allowing it to avoid burdensome discovery and litigation costs that may be unnecessary if Love cannot establish an underlying constitutional violation. Typically, a plaintiff cannot prevail on a Monell claim without first establishing an underlying constitutional violation. . . But a Monell claim may proceed against a municipality even without its officers being held liable unless doing so would create an inconsistent verdict. . . Here, Love argues that her Monell claim does not depend on the use of excessive force and so she need not first establish an underlying constitutional violation. . . The determination of this question, however, does not dispose of the bifurcation issue because, as discussed above, Love also pursues a state law claim based on some of the same City policies and practices. The City has not moved to bifurcate the state law independent claims against the City, meaning that discovery and litigation involving the same conduct would proceed even if the Court bifurcated the Monell claim and stayed related discovery. For the same reason, the Court discounts the City's arguments of potentially burdensome and unnecessary discovery. Love indicates that the City has already turned over documents concerning its policies and procedures, with Monell-related information exchanged even before the removal of this case to federal court. The City's disclosures of potential witnesses also significantly overlap with those of the Defendant Officers, suggesting bifurcation could be inefficient and require deposing the same individuals twice. And, at least at this point, Love has tailored her additional Monell-related discovery to previous incidents involving the Defendant Officers and complaints or charges arising from City police officers planting evidence or receiving self-inflicted wounds. This discovery overlaps with that needed by Love on her state law claims against the City, meaning that bifurcation could result in additional complexity and confusion over what discovery can proceed. . . To the extent the City finds Love's Monell discovery requests overly broad or unduly burdensome, after engaging in the required meet and confer process, the parties can seek the Court's assistance in tailoring the requests. As for prejudice, the Court finds the City's concerns premature at this stage, particularly where the City does not contend that the independent state law claims against it would cause similar prejudice. The Court cannot determine the evidence the parties intend to introduce at trial, making it difficult to assess the potential prejudice the Defendant Officers and the City would face if the individual and municipal liability claims proceeded to trial together. . . Additionally, the Court does not find the City's concerns of potential prejudice to Love proper, where Love is the master of her complaint and has chosen to pursue both individual and municipal liability claims. . . The Court has at its disposal means to address potential prejudice at trial, including through the use of limiting instructions, but it would also consider a renewed motion to bifurcate prior to trial based on specific evidence the parties intend to present on the individual and municipal liability claims. . . Finally, the City argues that bifurcation and entry of the Limited Consent would save Love the burden of litigating a Monell claim while still allowing her to obtain the same judgment for compensatory damages. Although bifurcation and the Limited Consent would not affect Love's recovery of compensatory damages, the Court finds this reason does not on its own warrant bifurcation. Non-economic reasons exist for Love to separately pursue her Monell-related claims, and she should have the ability to test those claims by presenting evidence that the City's policies and procedures violated Derek's constitutional rights. . . Having considered the relevant factors, the Court does not find bifurcation of the Monell claims warranted at this time."); Rodriguez v. City of Chicago, No. 17 CV 7248, 2018 WL 3474538, at *2-4 (N.D. Ill. July 19, 2018) ("In recent years there has been 'a growing body of precedent in this district for both granting and denying bifurcation in § 1983 cases.'. . This body of precedent shows that determining whether to allow bifurcation must be done on a case-by-case basis, looking at the specific facts and claims presented. . . In arguing that bifurcation best serves the interests of judicial economy the City alludes to the idea that a plaintiff in most cases cannot prevail on a Monell claim without first establishing that the individual officers named in the complaint violated her constitutional rights, and that bifurcation may allow the parties to bypass expensive and time-consuming discovery and trial relating to the City's policies and practices. But nowhere in its brief does the City develop any argument as to why the complaint in this case supports a conclusion that individual liability is a predicate to the Monell claim. . . A Monell claim allows a plaintiff to recover relief under Section 1983 against a municipality if it has a widespread or well-settled practice or custom that is responsible for or the moving force behind a constitutional violation. . . Although in many cases a Monell claim may hinge on a showing that individual officers are liable for a constitutional violation, 'a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.'. . The Seventh Circuit has laid out three factors that courts should consider in determining whether the municipality's liability is dependent on the claims against its officers: 'the nature of the constitutional violation, the theory of municipal liability, and the defenses set forth.'. . The City has made no attempt in its motion to address the Thomas factors, and those factors do not clearly fall in its favor with respect to Rodriguez's Monell claim. As for the nature of the alleged constitutional violation and theory of municipal liability, courts in this circuit most commonly find bifurcation is favored in the excessive force context, where the municipality's liability clearly hinges on whether the individual officers in fact engaged in excessive force. . . But in other contexts, such as where there are allegations of false police reports, the claims may be based both on officers' individual actions and also on underlying policies, and a factual overlap between the two does not necessarily mean that the officers' actions are a predicate to Monell liability. . . Here Rodriguez alleges not only that Defendant Officers retaliated and conspired against her for seeking a criminal investigation against Officer Doe, but also that the retaliation was a natural consequence of the City's widespread policies, practices, and customs, and 'was devised, approved and carried out by individuals with final policymaking authority with respect to the actions taken, including but not limited to, lodging an IPRA investigation against' Rodriguez. . . She also alleges that in furtherance of the alleged code of silence, the City, 'by and through its agents and employees within the [CPD], and IPRA, individually and jointly failed and/or attempted to prevent or suppress the disclosure of the identity of [Officer Doe].'. . Based on these allegations, it is not at all clear that the City's liability hinges on a finding that Defendant Officers committed the constitutional violations Rodriguez attributes to them. Nor does the third factor, the defenses set forth, weigh in favor of bifurcation here, because Defendant Officers have asserted qualified immunity as an affirmative defense. . . In the presence of that defense Defendant Officers might not be liable based on qualified immunity even if they are found to have engaged in constitutional violations, and so bifurcation would not necessarily avoid a second trial on the Monell claim should Defendant Officers be found immune. . . The City asserts that because it is willing to consent to a judgment against it for compensatory damages if the finder of fact determines that the individual defendants violated Rodriguez's constitutional rights even if they are immune from judgment, that stipulation 'waives qualified immunity' and would 'practically end the litigation' without having to proceed on the Monell claim. . . Although some courts in this circuit have been swayed by these stipulations, which the City seems to propose fairly routinely, . . . others have found such stipulations insufficient to justify bifurcation, noting that the plaintiff is entitled to be the master of her own complaint and pursue claims even if they have a minimal pecuniary reward . . . . That is because there are 'legitimate non-economic motivators to pursue a Monell claim against the City,' including deterring future misconduct and shining a light on unconstitutional policies through a judgment finding the City liable based on its policies, practices, or customs. . . A proposed consent judgment is particularly ill-designed to have any deterrent effect where, as here, it expressly denies any wrongdoing on the City's part. . . Turning to the City's efficiency argument, it argues that the breadth of Rodriguez's Monell claim justifies bifurcation because litigating that claim would create a heavy discovery burden, expanding the scope of discovery to the production of 'hundreds of thousands of pages of documents,' intrusive depositions of high-ranking officials, and otherwise unnecessary expert discovery, with the result that 'the scope of this discovery will be colossal.'. . This court recognizes that discovery with respect to the Monell claim will inevitably be broader than discovery limited to the claims against the individual officers and may increase the amount of work that goes into litigating the case on all sides, . . but that broader scope does not necessarily translates to an undue burden[.] . . And courts in this circuit have been skeptical of the City's speculative assertions about the high costs of Monell discovery. . . The City's argument also overlooks the risk that bifurcating the claims could add unnecessary complexity to the discovery process by instigating disputes over whether discovery requests fall within the scope of the individual claims or bleed over into the Monell claim. . . Moreover, to the extent that Monell discovery becomes overly burdensome, the court can tailor discovery as needed based on appropriate motions. . . For these reasons, and especially because the City has not developed any argument to persuade the court that a verdict for Defendant Officers and against the City would be inconsistent, . . the court is not persuaded that bypassing the Monell claim would create efficiencies. Finally, with respect to bifurcation at least, the City argues that trying all the claims together 'will severely prejudice all defendants' because evidence regarding the City's policies and the actions of other CPD officers could invite the jury to find Defendant Officers guilty by association. . . But at this point in the litigation, before discovery has fleshed out the evidence in support of the claims against Defendants, it is premature to determine whether a joint trial would actually cause unfair prejudice. . . Defendants are free to re-raise this issue at the close of discovery should the case proceed to trial and if they believe the potential prejudice cannot be addressed through the proper use of limiting instructions. . . In the meantime, the City's conclusory assertions of prejudice are insufficient to warrant bifurcation."); Bonds v. City of Chicago, No. 16-CV-5112, 2018 WL 1316720, at *3-6 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 14, 2018) ("Bifurcation of Monell issues in § 1983 actions frequently expedites the disposition of the case, since the resolution of the claims against the individual officers may end the entire case (either because no infringement of plaintiff's constitutional rights is established or because the plaintiff is able to settle the case in a way that persuades him not to go further), after less complex discovery and a less complex trial. . . . There are considerations that militate against bifurcation, however. There are circumstances where resolution of the claims against the individual officers does not eliminate the need for a trial of the Monell claim. . . And if, after discovery and a trial on the individual claims, it is necessary to begin discovery again and try the Monell claim, the result of the bifurcation will be a longer and more complex road to the case's disposition, including a second trial that is largely repetitive of the first. Moreover, there are non-economic benefits that flow from discovery (as well as a possible trial) of the Monell claim. Chiefly, an airing of the Monell claim through discovery assures transparency, and if problems in the City's policies and practices are revealed through discovery or trial, the likelihood of deterring future misconduct is significantly enhanced. . . As is explained below, these non-economic benefits and the particular circumstances of this case lead the court to deny the motion to bifurcate at this stage. As the parties acknowledge, this case is something of a unicorn because, unlike the vast majority of § 1983 excessive-force actions, this case does not, and cannot, involve any claims against the individual officers involved in Harris' shooting. This mitigates two risks of bifurcation—the risk that the officers' qualified immunity defenses will not resolve the Monell claims, and the risk that the municipality will not concede the point after the first phase and litigate whether an officer acted in the course and scope of employment. . . On the other hand, bifurcation here will not reap the ordinary benefit of avoiding potential prejudice to the individual officers of airing Monell issues in a single trial. . . The absence of individual officers also decreases the likelihood that the first phase will eliminate the need for further discovery and litigation on Monell issues. . . .[T]he City proposes a first phase limited to the 'facts and circumstances' of the night of the shooting. But Bonds has demonstrated that questions of causation raised by her Monell claims are highly enmeshed with the facts of what happened on the night of the shooting. . . She explains that her § 1983 theories implicate the City's alleged failure to implement the CIT [Crisis Intervention Training] program; the alleged knowledge of the officers present that their use of force would not be seriously scrutinized; and their alleged knowledge that fellow officers would not report their conduct. . . Each of those issues requires exploring, at a minimum, what individual officers had known about the CIT program and previous use-of-force incidents. A § 1983 plaintiff who sues a municipality based on its employee's conduct usually must show that the employee violated the constitution. . . But in some circumstances, 'a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.'. . .Without a verdict for or against individual officers in the first phase, there is nothing with which a verdict on Bonds' Monell claims can conflict. . . In the absence of any contrary authority cited by the City (which bears the burden of persuasion, . . . the court is not sufficiently persuaded that the proposed bifurcation has a good chance of avoiding Monell discovery or simplifying the issues. Bifurcation instead seems likely to delay the inevitable, because, in short, Bonds' Monell claims embrace theories that what the officers on the scene knew about the CIT program and the other alleged policies and customs is deeply enmeshed with the objective inquiry under the Fourth Amendment. . . This makes the parties' debates over the likely burden of Monell discovery and motion practice under the proposal somewhat secondary. . . .The City also makes a remarkable offer in its motion to bifurcate. If the motion is granted, the City offers to 'forego filing any dispositive motion until a jury' has decided the factual question presented in the proposed first phase (though it reserves the right to move for summary judgment based on the timeliness of this suit). . . .The City makes a proposal for disentangling discovery in the two phases that inadvertently demonstrates how difficult separating them would be. Pointing out that the City has disclosed over 100 witnesses with knowledge of the facts of the shooting, Bonds argues that she would be put to the expense of deposing many of them in both phases. . . The City responds by proposing an exception to the phases: let Bonds pose Monell-related questions to those witnesses. . . Without documentary discovery and one or more Rule 30(b)(6) depositions on Monell issues, Bonds' counsel would be at a serious disadvantage when questioning City personnel about matters relevant to her Monell claims. The City suggests no way of preventing Monell issues from bleeding completely into the first phase under its scheme. And lastly, but by no means least, the sheer number of witnesses involved counsels against bifurcation because '[d]iscovery in this case will be substantial with or without discovery into the Monell claim.'. . . Finally, the City argues that bifurcation will 'avoid[ ] prejudicing the jury against the officers involved in [the] incident.'. . This argument, as the court understands it, concerns the potential prejudice from the presentation of Monell issues, which evidence may include other use-of-force incidents and alleged misconduct, at a consolidated trial. But again, no individual officers will be defendants in any trial here, with or without bifurcation. . . .While bifurcation is appropriate in many § 1983 cases, this one is exceptional. There are no individual officers to prejudice with a joint trial or overwhelm with tangential discovery. For the reasons stated, the City has not persuaded the court that the efficiency of a consolidated trial outweighs the potential prejudice to the litigants. . . The City's motion to bifurcate. . . is therefore denied."); Estate of Loury by Hudson v. City of Chicago, No. 16-CV-04452, 2017 WL 1425594, at *3-5 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 20, 2017) ("The Court's reasoning in McIntosh is directly applicable in this case. Here, like in McIntosh, the City has offered to consent to an entry of judgment and argues that bifurcation will potentially save substantial time and effort because addressing the liability of the individual officers first may prevent the need for discovery and a trial on the Monell claims. Like in McIntosh, however, the individual officers have asserted immunity defenses, . . . and thus, it is premature to assume 'that there can be no municipal liability in the absence of underlying individual liability.'. . It is possible that a jury could find the Defendant Officers immune and not individually liable, while also finding that Plaintiff's constitutional rights were indeed violated and that the City's policies caused the harm. If the Court were to grant bifurcation and this situation comes to fruition, where Plaintiff's Monell claim is ultimately addressed on the merits after the completion of discovery and a trial of the other claims, bifurcation would in fact 'add unnecessary complexity and confusion,'. . . and 'create additional costs and inefficiencies ... without achieving any offsetting benefit.'. . Even if bifurcation does not result in two separate trials, the Court is still not persuaded, at least at this stage, that it will result in increased judicial economy, cost savings, and efficiency. Given the factual overlap between the Monell claims and the constitutional claims, a stay of Monell discovery will likely result in continual discovery disputes between the parties about whether Plaintiff's discovery requests invoke her Monell claim or her other claims. As several courts in this district have noted, forcing a court to resolve constant disputes about discovery requests' connection to Monell liability can introduce additional confusion to a matter and make litigation less efficient. . . Ultimately, at this early stage in litigation, any determination of judicial economy favoring bifurcation is speculative at best. Plaintiff has represented that her Monell discovery requests are narrowly tailored and not a fishing expedition, and while Defendants will certainly have to respond to broader Monell-related requests in unitary discovery, to the extent that Defendants find Plaintiff's Monell discovery requests 'overly broad or imposing undue burden and expense, the parties can seek assistance from the Court to tailor the requests as necessary after making independent good faith attempts to do so.'. . . Defendants next argue that bifurcation will avoid the strong likelihood of undue prejudice to the City or the Officer Defendants because if all the claims are tried together, the jury will be likely to impugn the Officer Defendants with the negative reports about the City while also associating the City with the alleged actions of the Officer Defendants. Plaintiff responds that Defendants' concerns about potential prejudice are premature and any potential prejudice can be cured through instructions to the jury and evidentiary challenges. The Court agrees. . . . In McIntosh, this Court rejected the City's nearly identical argument that, due its agreement to indemnify the officers and consent to an entry of judgment on the Monell claim, bifurcation would not prejudice the plaintiff because she would still receive complete compensatory damages if she won her suit against the individual officers. . . The Court explained that there were legitimate non-economic motivators to pursue a Monell claim against the City. . . A judgment against the City, for example, could be a 'catalyst for change' that encouraged the City to reform the practices that led to constitutional violations. . . Other courts have similarly found that, even if there are no financial benefits to maintaining a Monell action, there are other critical reasons the plaintiff may wish to win a judgment against a municipality on her Monell claim, even if she has already won a judgment against individual officers and the municipality has consented to judgment. . . Additionally, the Court is not persuaded that the DOJ Report and the City's agreement to work with the DOJ on reforming CPD will result in sufficient reforms such that plaintiffs need not pursue Monell claims against the City. As Plaintiff notes in response, there is no consent decree in place requiring the City or CPD to reform its policies and practices. Also, recent public reports suggest that the DOJ may not pursue any reforms of CPD. See, e.g., John Byrne et al., Concerns Mount Over Chicago Cop Reform as Sessions Vows to 'Pull

Back', Chi. Trib., Mar. 1, 2017 (discussing DOJ's decision to pull back on reform of police departments). Given this uncertainty, Plaintiff should not be denied the opportunity to seek to deter future official misconduct through her Monell claim. In sum, Plaintiff has other important objectives—most notably, deterrence and reform— that would be furthered by a judgment holding the City liable for the Defendant Officers' alleged misconduct. As this Court stated in McIntosh, '[a] judgment against a municipality can be a catalyst for change, because it not only holds that entity responsible for its actions and inactions, but also can encourage the municipality to reform the patterns and practices that led to constitutional violations, as well as alert the municipality and its citizenry to the issue.'. . Accordingly, the Court finds that bifurcation and staying discovery is not warranted at this time. The potential for bifurcation to serve the interests of judicial economy or prevent unfair prejudice is speculative at best, especially when weighed against Plaintiff's legitimate interests in obtaining a Monell judgment against the City and the fact that Plaintiff is the master of her complaint."); Coleman v. City of Peoria, No. 115CV01100SLDTSH, 2016 WL 5497363, at *2–6 (C.D. Ill. Sept. 27, 2016) ("Defendant asks that the constitutional claim against the City asserted in Count 1 be severed from the rest of the claims, and proceedings on that claim stayed while litigation proceeds on the other claims. . . Defendants argue that, while Coleman brings federal constitutional claims against individual officer defendants and against the City, the claim against the City cannot succeed unless Coleman first succeeds in showing that at least one individual defendant violated his constitutional rights. . . Since all individual defendants are indemnified by the City, the reasoning goes, Coleman will not get any more or better recovery by proceeding with the claim against the City, and is not any more likely to succeed on that claim than on the claims against the individuals, since success on at least one of those claims is a predicate of success on the claim against the City. The City thus urges that the claim against it is redundant and inefficient; the costs, both to the City in supplying discovery on the claim and to the Court in supervising that discovery, are asserted to be significant. . . Additionally, Defendants argue that if the claim against the City is tried at the same time as those against the individual defendants, prejudice may accrue to the individuals if evidence of the City's hypothetically many other misdeeds is presented to a jury alongside the officers' case. . . Coleman responds that his constitutional claim against the City is not redundant because he could conceivably fail to recover against the individual defendants, who have raised the defense of qualified immunity, but could then still be entitled to recover from the City. . . . He also argues that the age and nature of the conspiracy alleged create the possibility that the City might be found liable without any individual defendant ever being found liable . . . . Coleman further argues that the discovery he seeks against the city is not so burdensome as the City suggests. . . And Coleman contends that the claimed prejudice that might accrue to the individual defendants is too speculative to weigh in favor of separate trials. . . A plaintiff bringing a Monell claim against a city often cannot succeed without showing that at least one individual city employee violated his constitutional rights. This is so even though municipal entities cannot be vicariously liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for the constitutional torts of their employees, but rather can only be liable for harms of a constitutional dimension caused by their policies, customs, or practices. . . The injury to a plaintiff for which a municipal entity becomes liable under Monell usually has to be inflicted by a person, to whom liability under § 1983 usually also accrues. If, in such a case, all individual defendants are found not to have

inflicted an injury of constitutional dimension against the plaintiff, then the plaintiff was not harmed at all, and suit against the municipality will be unavailing; by the same token, since municipalities are required by law to indemnify their employees against such suits, recovery against an individual defendant will be just as extensive as recovery against the municipal defendant, and the claim against the latter equally unnecessary to make the plaintiff whole. . . In most cases, therefore, the values identified in Rule 42(b)—of convenience, expeditiousness, and economy—work strongly in favor of separating and staying the Monell claims. . . However, in some civil-rights cases, a plaintiff alleges harm traceable to the policies of a municipality for which no individual defendant is liable, either because no such defendants are ultimately found to be named, or because no defendant is individually liable for the harm nevertheless worked by the policy. See, e.g., Thomas v. Cook Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 604 F.3d 293, 305 (7th Cir. 2010) (explaining that although plaintiff's decedent died of meningitis while in the care of a the defendant county's jail, the county alone could be liable under § 1983 for its deficient policies even where no individual defendant was liable, so long as there was no "inconsistency" in the verdicts rendered). In other cases, individual defendants may have violated a plaintiff's civil rights, but be themselves shielded from suit by the doctrine of qualified immunity, while their municipal employer enjoys no such protection. . . Here, Defendants' argument that a verdict for the individual officer defendants would be inconsistent with a verdict against the city fails for at least two obvious reasons, observed in detail in Plaintiff's briefing. . . First, the individual officers have asserted qualified immunity as an affirmative defense, . . . and, unlike in other cases where the defense is raised, there is reason to think it likely that Coleman might succeed in showing violations of his rights, but be foiled by the doctrine as against the individual defendants. Qualified immunity is an absolute immunity to suit enjoyed by government officials who violate someone's constitutional rights, but do so in a way that 'could reasonably have been thought consistent with the rights they are alleged to have violated.'. . . Here, the defendant officers are alleged to have pressured or deceived witnesses in an unconstitutional manner at least three times, although the facts alleged also suggest that more such acts might emerge in discovery. The defendant officers have indicated that they intend to assert the defense of qualified immunity and argue that their acts were not contrary to clearly established law. It is unclear at this phase which officers are alleged to have participated in which portions of the conspiracy to implicate Coleman at which times, and what roles each may have played. Moreover, the legal standard surrounding impermissible lineup and photographic identifications is fact-intensive, and police routinely argue, sometimes with success, that they should be protected by the doctrine of qualified immunity for potential civil rights violations resulting from such lineups. . . While it is unlikely that a police officer would enjoy qualified immunity for deliberately attempting to frame a defendant via a manufactured lineup or photo, . . . the facts alleged are murkier here, and it is conceivable, as Coleman suggests, that at least some of the officers involved in the alleged activities might have engaged in activities pursuant to policy or followed orders that violated Coleman's rights in a way that a reasonable officer would not necessarily understand to violate Coleman's rights. These officers could enjoy the protection of qualified immunity, rendering dismissal of claims against them, alongside a judgment against the City on Monell grounds, not 'inconsistent' with each other. . . There is a more than nontrivial chance that qualified immunity would prevent Coleman from recovering against anyone other than the City. This militates against the separation of claims under Rule 42(b). . .The second major reason why separation is inappropriate at this phase of the proceedings is the unusual complexity and age of this case. Part of the reason Coleman may have difficulty recovering against the principle alleged perpetrators of the misconduct in this matter is that the alleged ringleader is unavailable for deposition or other examination because he is deceased. The more minor players are not only more likely to be able to avail themselves of qualified immunity defenses, they are less likely to be found to have violated Coleman's rights—less likely than Rabe, and less likely than they themselves would have been at an earlier date, because of the perishability of human memory. The age of the case has caused at least one (Anderson) to testify that he has no recollection of the actions he is alleged to have taken, and to rely instead on reference to the policies and practices of his employment. . . As particular facts have staled or receded from the memories of the principles, the claims against them as individuals have become less susceptible of proof, rendering the Monell claim relatively more viable and attractive to Coleman, relying as it does not on a requirement that any of the particular defendants be able to be shown to have had a certain state of mind at a particular time, or have taken particular actions, but rather on a broader showing that as a result of the City's policies and procedures, Coleman was deprived of his right to due process of law. As explained above, cases where a discrete and recent act of individual misconduct is alleged tend to require a plaintiff to succeed against an individual municipal employee to succeed against the city. This is less true the more time passes, the more complex and diffuse the misconduct alleged is, and the more participants are alleged to have been involved in different capacities. And while the discovery on the Monell claim will undoubtedly add expense and time to the discovery, Coleman argues convincingly that there is significant overlap between the discovery sought against the individual defendants and against the City. . . This Monell claim is not a good candidate for separation and stay because it would not be convenient, expeditious, or economical in light of the specific facts at issue. . . Finally, Defendants argue that prejudice would accrue to the individual officer defendants if the claims against them were tried alongside evidence of the City's other bad behavior. . . Defendants argue that '[p]resenting evidence to the jury regarding a [city-wide] policy, practice or custom involving multiple improper police actions poses a danger of undue prejudice to the defendant officers by creating the perception that the police department routinely acts improperly, even if the officers acted properly [.]'. . The reasoning is puzzling. Evidence supporting the Monell claim would, indeed, have to be evidence tending to show a city-wide policy or practice conducing to police misbehavior. This would be relevant to the actions of the defendant officers, who would, assuredly, claim to have acted in conformity with sanctioned department policies and practices. Defendant municipalities are not people, and the actions of their employees in conformity with a policy tending to produce unconstitutional results is not forbidden propensity evidence pursuant to Federal Rule of Evidence 404(b) (something like this appears to be Defendants' unsupported drift). On the contrary, if the 'perception' is fairly created that the department 'routinely acts improperly,' this routine action, for the reasons just explained, can and should be considered by a jury weighing whether these particular defendant officers acted improperly."); Rockett v. Renth, No. 14-CV-687-DRH, 2016 WL 913262, at *3-4 (S.D. Ill. Mar. 9, 2016) ("[A]n adverse finding as to the plaintiffs' individual claims does not necessarily dispose of the Monell claims against the City and Burns. See Thomas, 604 F.3d 293.

In a situation where a claim addresses the customary practice as to how the police department trains its officers and disciplines its officers who were shown to have used excessive force, bifurcation may not be warranted. Even when a plaintiff loses his claim against a police officer based on a qualified immunity defense, he may still recover against the municipality if he can prove a constitutional deprivation caused by a municipal policy or custom. In this situation, bifurcation will not avoid a second trial, and that second Monell trial would surely contain duplicative evidence and testimony related to the trial of the claims against the individual officer, while still falling within the parameters of Thomas. Furthermore, Renth, as an individual defendant, asserts a qualified immunity defense. Defendants argue that that since Renth's likelihood of prevailing on the qualified immunity defense is low, his defense would not prevent bifurcation. However, this argument is unpersuasive. As plaintiffs note, the defendants must believe this defense has some merit, or they would not have raised it in their answer (Doc. 19). In addition, there is no guarantee that severance would avoid the need for two trials. Renth has not offered to waive the defense of qualified immunity; he simply states that his likelihood of success is low regarding the defense. If the Monell claims will be tried, then bifurcation of the Monell claims and a stay of discovery at this point will prove to be inefficient because it will require that Monell discovery be conducted at a later date. Such a stay would in fact delay the resolution of all of the plaintiffs' claims. Plaintiffs argue that the defendants exaggerate the burden of Monell discovery in this matter, and that bifurcation would unnecessarily complicate the discovery process. Plaintiffs contend that bifurcation would be inconvenient and inefficient due to the overlap of evidence that is relevant to both the Monell claims and the individual claims against Renth. The Court recognizes that allowing the Monell discovery to proceed inevitably will increase the scope and cost of discovery. However, a stay of Monell discovery does not necessarily eliminate discovery disputes. A stay of Monell discovery may give rise to arguments about whether the plaintiff's discovery requests relate to their Monell claims or to their individual claims against Defendant Renth. Therefore, bifurcation of discovery would inevitably lead to more litigation about where the line between permissible discovery and deferred discovery should be drawn, and it would create inefficiencies relating to the overlapping testimony and need for multiple depositions. To the extent that the plaintiff's Monell discovery requests are overly broad or would impose an undue burden or expense, the Court may tailor the plaintiffs' discovery requests, if necessary. The Court believes this process is better suited to promote judicial economy opposed to staying entirely all Monell discovery at this time. As such, the benefits of potentially avoiding the additional scope of Monell discovery in this case are not sufficient to outweigh the costs and burden that would be incurred through bifurcation. Therefore, it is clear that bifurcation in this matter would fail to aid in the resolution of this case or promote judicial economy. . . .In support of defendants' second argument, the defendants claim that Renth will likely suffer undue prejudice if bifurcation is denied. At this stage of the litigation, however, concerns about potential prejudice at trial are premature. Additionally, there is no reason to believe that the Court could not implement tactics such as limiting instructions, FEDERAL RULES OF EVIDENCE, and motions in limine, to mitigate potential prejudice that may arise at trial. . . In the end, the defendants have not made a clear showing of prejudice to Renth in the event that bifurcation is denied. Therefore, the Court denies the motions to bifurcate on the ground that whatever efficiencies may be gained by bifurcation are offset by the potential for confusion of issues and discovery, repetition of testimony, and increased inefficiency. Therefore, the defendants' motion to bifurcate must be denied."); Marshbanks v. City of Calumet City, No. 13 C 2978, 2015 WL 1234930, at *3-5 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 16, 2015) ("Citing to Los Angeles v. Heller, . . . Calumet City argues that to establish Monell liability under the circumstances, Plaintiff must prove not only that Defendant Officers deprived Chambers of his Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable searches and seizures, but also that the City's policies or customs were the moving force behind the alleged Fourth Amendment violations. Accordingly, Calumet City maintains that because municipal liability is contingent on the individual officers' liability, the Court should allow the parties to address the claims against the individual officers first. . . .In Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Dep't, 604 F.3d 293, 305 (7th Cir.2010), the Seventh Circuit rejected the argument that Heller requires individual officer liability before a municipality can ever be held liable for under Monell. Instead, the Seventh Circuit construed the Heller holding more narrowly, namely, 'a municipality can be held liable under Monell, even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict.' . . .In determining whether a municipality's liability is dependent on individual officers' conduct, the Thomas decision directs courts to look to certain factors, including 'the nature of the constitutional violation, the theory of municipal liability, and the defenses set forth.'. . Turning to these factors, the nature of the constitutional violation at issue is a Fourth Amendment excessive force claim and Plaintiff alleges that Calumet City is liable due to its failure to properly train, supervise, review, and discipline its police officers in the use of excessive and deadly force. Under these circumstances, Calumet City argues that 'if Marshbanks fails to prove that Defendant Officers violated Chambers' constitutional rights, then she will not be able to prove that the City is liable for any alleged constitutional deprivation.'. .In response, Plaintiff states that she would 'ordinarily' agree with this proposition, but explains: [H]ere there were three officers who discharged their weapons. Plaintiff believes she will be able to present credible evidence that the fatal shot was fired by Officer Laster because he was the only officer using a .40 caliber gun and the projectile recovered from Decedent's body was from a .40 caliber firearm. However, it is entirely possible that Defendants may argue to a trier of fact that Plaintiff failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that a particular officer used excessive force. For example, Officer Gerstner testified that he fired one shot at Decedent when he was a couple of feet from the fence and that Decedent's body did not react in a manner that would indicate Decedent was hit by the bullet. However, when asked to admit that the one shot fired by Officer Gerstner did not strike Decedent, Gerstner objected and asserted a lack of knowledge. It is clear that Defendants want to have it both ways. They want to say that they do not know who shot Archie [Chambers] and that if the officers were not found liable that the City would not be liable. This is precisely the case where there are two gunshot wounds out of the three total that cannot be traced to an officer and Defendants may argue that the .40 caliber bullet did not come from Officer Laster. Under those circumstances, it is possible to have a scenario that was addressed in Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Department, 604 F.3d 293, 305 (7th Cir.2009) (which held that a municipality may be held liable under Monell even when its officers are not, unless such a finding would create an inconsistent verdict). If Defendants are only going to argue that Officer Laster was justified in shooting Decedent off the fence when he was unarmed, then there is no issue, but if Defendants are going to argue that Plaintiff failed to identify the shooting officer, then the precedent in Thomas controls and Monell discovery should be allowed. . . .Calumet City does not meaningfully respond to Plaintiff's argument in its reply brief, but merely reiterates the arguments made in its opening memorandum. Calumet City, for example, does not deny that its theory of the case is that Plaintiff cannot prove who shot Chambers, therefore, no one is liable for the deprivation of his Fourth Amendment rights. By not recognizing the nuance of Plaintiff's arguments, Calumet City has not sufficiently explained how the nature of the constitutional violation and the theory of municipal liability necessitate bifurcation under the circumstances. Equally important, the individual Defendant Officers have asserted the affirmative defense of qualified immunity, which is significant to Court's analysis. As the Thomas decision explains–in the context of the facts in Heller –if the individual officer had asserted an affirmative defense, 'the jury might have found that the plaintiff's constitutional rights were indeed violated, but that the officer could not be held liable' because in 'that case, one can still argue that the City's policies caused the harm, even if the officer was not individually culpable.'. . The Seventh Circuit clarified that '[w]ithout any affirmative defenses, a verdict in favor of the officer necessarily meant that the jury did not believe the officer violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights' and because 'the City's liability was based on the officer's actions, it too was entitled to a verdict in its favor.'. . Here, because the individual Defendant Officers have asserted the affirmative defense of qualified immunity, Plaintiff has shown the possibility that holding Calumet City liable would not create an inconsistent verdict with a jury finding that Defendant Officers are not liable. . . Turning to the Rule 42(b) considerations, Calumet City argues that bifurcation will conserve judicial resources, including the need for extensive Monell discovery. As Plaintiff notes, however, the parties have conducted over twenty depositions in this matter, and, according to Plaintiff, some of deposition testimony reveals that certain Defendant Officers may not have adhered to the written general orders concerning the use of force and lethal force. Indeed, Calumet City admits in its opening brief that the parties have already completed extensive fact discovery in this matter. Furthermore, Plaintiff has indicated that Monell discovery could be conducted with the use of Rule 30(b)(6) witnesses and any witness who provides officer training. Therefore, Calumet City's argument that Monell discovery would require the parties to depose past and present Chiefs of Police, members of the Board of Police and Fire Commissioners, and possibly Calumet City's Mayor, is unavailing. Meanwhile, Plaintiff has propounded four interrogatories and numerous document requests related to Monell discovery. After reviewing this written discovery, the Court finds that it is not overly burdensome despite Calumet City's arguments to the contrary. Also, the parties are encouraged to work together during Monell discovery in the interests of curbing any burdensome tasks. In addition, Calumet City's judicial economy argument is not persuasive because under the circumstances, bifurcation would result in two trials that would most likely involve many of the same witnesses and evidence. . . Finally, Calumet City's argument that the evidence against Calumet City will prejudice Defendant Officers is best cured by proper jury instructions and pre-trial evidentiary challenges. Accordingly, Calumet City has failed in its burden of demonstrating that the Rule 42(b) factors weigh in favor of bifurcation. . .For these reasons, the Court, in its discretion, denies Calumet City's motion to bifurcate Plaintiff's Monell claim from the other claims in this lawsuit for discovery and trial purposes."); Awalt v. Marketti, No. 11 C 6142, 2012 WL 1161500, at *11-*14 & n.2 (N.D. Ill.

Apr. 9, 2012) ("Bifurcation motions, such as the instant Motion, have become routine in § 1983 litigation. . . The reasons for this are obvious-the expenses incurred in trying a case with Monell claims are usually much higher than without. . . . Although considerations of the cost of the defense is one concern to take into account, those considerations dissipate if it is determined that the parties may have to litigate the Monell claims irrespective of the bifurcation decision, and thus incur the costs nonetheless, just at a later date. It is unsurprising that there is a growing body of law within this District on the subject of Monell bifurcation. . . Having surveyed the cases, it is clear that the decision to grant or deny bifurcation is a heavily fact-intensive analysis, dependent upon the costs and benefits of bifurcation under the unique circumstances of each case. . . .The Court has looked at every decision in this District involving bifurcation of Monell claims from claims against individual defendants in § 1983 suits since the Seventh Circuit decided Thomas v. Cook County Sheriff's Dep't, 604 F.3d 293, 305 (7th Cir.2009). It is clear that the weight of authority holds that bifurcation is now heavily disfavored. [collecting cases] First, Defendants are simply wrong in their contention that in order to prevail on her Monell claim Mrs. Awalt must first succeed in proving that the individual Defendants violated Mr. Awalt's constitutional rights. [citing Thomas] . . . . The Defendant Medical Care Providers in this case may be found liable for violating § 1983 by maintaining an unconstitutional policy or practice even if none of the individual Grundy County Defendants are found liable under § 1983. . . . A plaintiff alleging a Monell claim can succeed against a municipality on that claim despite failing to demonstrate to a jury that a particular individual defendant is liable for the unconstitutional acts alleged, so long as the two results are compatible. . . This case presents a situation in which two such results would be entirely compatible. As the court noted in Thomas, a split verdict might result if a jury concluded that the individual officers were not deliberately indifferent to a prisoner's serious medical condition, but rather could not respond to his needs because of the policies in place at the jail. . . . Given the nature and purpose of Rule 42(b) and considering all of the fact and circumstances of the present case, bifurcation is unwarranted and unwise. The Court therefore declines to bifurcate and stay Mrs. Awalt's Monell claims against the Defendant Medical Care Providers."); Booker v. City of Chicago, No. 04 C 6371, 2006 WL 4071596, at *1, *2, *5, *6 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 15, 2006) (" The City of Chicago now presents the Court with a stipulation, waiving Mr. Booker's need to prove the remaining Monell elements in the event that he successfully demonstrates that the Individual Defendants violated his constitutional rights. The City agrees to entry of judgment against it for compensatory damages based upon these constitutional violations, if proven. The City claims that the stipulation moots Mr. Booker's Monell claim, because there is no longer a justiciable case or controversy. . . . The Court finds that, while a true offer of judgment might render Mr. Booker's Monell claim moot for lack of a case or controversy Under Article III of the Constitution, the Stipulation offered by the City presents a potential minefield of liability loopholes, rendering its promise of a stipulated judgment illusory. . . . This Court agrees with Judge Lefkow that a stipulation to judgment would moot Plaintiff's Monell claims, but further finds, like Judge Gottschall, that the procedurally anomalous stipulation offered here could potentially complicate, as opposed to streamline, these proceedings. . . . The City's briefs oversell what it actually offers in its Stipulation. In its Reply brief, the City argues that the Plaintiff's arguments against the Stipulation are misplaced, because the City is offering to submit to the entry of judgment against itself, and not merely to the indemnification of a judgment against the Individual Defendants. But the stipulation is not quite an agreement to have judgment entered against the City; instead it merely waives the City's right not to have liability imposed against it. . . Specifically, the Stipulation states that 'the City specifically waives its right under Monell v. New York City Dept. Of Social Services not to be held liable in damages under section 1983 without proof that the City, by its Apolicy, custom or practice,' and with the requisite degree of culpability, caused the alleged constitutional violation.' Notably, the Stipulation expressly denies such widespread, permanent 'policies, customs or practices,' and that the injuries were caused by a person with final policymaking authority. The Stipulation also retains the City's unidentified defenses, and permits the City to retain the right to alter or amend judgment. Next, the Stipulation limits the City's obligations in a potentially troubling way. The Stipulation states that 'the City agrees to entry of judgment ... if and only if the finder of fact in this case finds that the named individual defendants violated plaintiff's constitutional rights.' If Mr. Booker were to establish a constitutional violation on the part of an as of yet Unnamed Officer Defendant, or other City employee, the Stipulation does not clearly waive the City's right to dispute Monell liability. Absent a stipulation to specific elements, as opposed to a waiver of proof under certain circumstances, it is unclear how the district court should proceed in the event that the Individual Officers effectively assert qualified immunity, or if the Individual Officers settle with Mr. Booker. Would the district court be required to reopen discovery and litigate the Monell issue at that time? In Treece v. Hochstetler, 213 F.3d 360 (7th Cir.2000), a similar stipulation persuaded the district court to grant (and the appellate court to affirm) the bifurcation of the plaintiff's Monell claim. The procedurally anomalous submission is far less troubling under such circumstance, because the litigation is in no way hindered or delayed in the event that a dispute arises over the application or interpretation of the stipulation. In this case, however, accepting the stipulation results in either a bar on Monell discovery, if all goes smoothly, or an unplanned-for delay, if it does not.")

See also Estate of Elijah McClain v. City of Aurora, Colorado*,* No. 20-CV-02389-DDD-NRN*,* 2021 WL 307505, at *2 (D. Colo. Jan. 29, 2021) ("Defendants argue that staying discovery on Plaintiffs' Monell claims against the City of Aurora would further the interests of efficiency and judicial economy because '[t]he vast scope of Monell discovery could be rendered unnecessary by a finding by the Court or a jury that there was no underlying constitutional violation.' Judge Christine M. Arguello recently rejected an identical argument in Estate of Melvin by & through Melvin v. City of Colorado Springs, Colorado, No. 20-cv-00991-CMA-KMT, 2021 WL 50872 (D. Colo. Jan. 5, 2021). After noting that bifurcating discovery in these types of cases 'is uncommon in this jurisdiction,' Judge Arguello reasons that permitting bifurcation 'would allow this case to languish on the Court's docket, potentially for years, and would be inconsistent with the Court's obligation to oversee "the just, speedy, and inexpensive determination of every action and proceeding."'. . She also states that bifurcating discovery would 'merely substitute some discovery disputes for others,' and that 'generic arguments concerning the cost of discovery on Plaintiff's Monell claims would apply in any Section 1983 case involving individual and municipal liability claims.'. . Judge Arguello found that bifurcating and staying discovery would prejudice the plaintiff who, like Plaintiffs' [sic] here, alleged grave constitutional violations and had an interest in expeditiously proceeding with discovery. . . The Court finds this reasoning persuasive and sound. Bifurcating discovery would necessarily entail a lengthy delay in the case's resolution and therefore prejudice Plaintiffs and undermine the Court's ability to efficiently manage its docket. Bifurcation of discovery would also likely result in wasteful and unnecessary disputes regarding what discovery relates to the individual claims as opposed to the Monell claims. These burdens outweigh the largely speculative menace of excessive discovery identified by Defendants in their motion. Moreover, Defendants' contention that an underlying constitutional violation by one of the individual Defendants is required in order to impose municipal liability on the City of Aurora is not an accurate reflection of the law. It is true that 'the general rule...is that there must be a constitutional violation, not just an unconstitutional policy, for a municipality to be held liable.' Crowson v. Washington Cty. Utah, 983 F.3d 1166, 1191 (10th Cir. 2020) (citing Trigalet v. City of Tulsa, 239 F.3d 1150 (10th Cir. 2001)). However, sometimes the municipal policy devolves responsibility across multiple officers. In those situations, the policies may be unconstitutional precisely because they fail to ensure that any single officer is positioned to prevent the constitutional violation. Where the sum of multiple officers' actions taken pursuant to municipal policy results in a constitutional violation, the municipality may be directly liable. That is, the municipality may not escape liability by acting through twenty hands rather than two. . . Therefore, the resolution of Plaintiffs' claims against the individual Defendants in the individual Defendants' favor does not necessarily foreclose a finding of municipal liability against the City of Aurora. This also weighs against bifurcating discovery."); Tanner v. City of Waukegan, No. 10 C 1645, 2011 WL 686867, at *3, *5 -*7 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 16, 2011) ("Thomas concluded that Heller does not mean that a plaintiff can never succeed on a Monell claim against a municipality without first showing that an officer is liable to him for violating his rights under § 1983. . . . [T]he Seventh Circuit set forth three factors to consider in determining whether a municipality's liability depends on the actions of its officers: (1) the nature of the constitutional violation that the plaintiff alleges; (2) the theory of municipal liability that supports the Monell claim; and, (3) the defenses that the individual defendants have asserted. . . . The Seventh Circuit has been clear since Thomas was issued, however, that in a failure-to-train case 'a municipality cannot be liable under Monell when there is no underlying constitutional violation by a municipal employee.' [citing Sallenger v. City of Springfield, Ill.] It is not the case, therefore, that all of Mr. Tanner's claims against the City are independent of those asserted against the individual defendants; if his § 1983 claims against the individual defendants fail, his failure-to-train allegations against the City will also fail under Sallenger. As a result, this aspect of Mr. Tanner's Monell liability theory does not accord with the second of the Thomas elements. . . . Here, The individual defendants have asserted the affirmative defense of qualified immunity,. . . thereby raising the concern in Thomas that Mr. Tanner could proceed against the City for Monell damages even if the officers are not liable for their alleged § 1983 violations. Several factors, nevertheless, lead the Court to conclude that the qualified immunity defense does not warrant bifurcation under the facts presented here. . . . [T]he Court agrees with Elrod that qualified immunity does not, in itself, necessarily require the bifurcation of Monell claims in all cases. The City takes this argument further by contending that the qualified immunity issue is also distinguishable from the discussion in Thomas on other grounds. Unlike in that case, the City has stipulated to pay Monell damages if a finder of fact concludes that the individual defendants violated Mr. Tanner's constitutional rights. . . . In the absence of any argument in the response brief as to why such a result would violate Thomas, the Court finds that Mr. Tanner has not demonstrated that he satisfies any of the three Thomas elements. Although the City has been largely silent on these issues, it has chosen to focus on the primary concerns of Rule 42(b), the avoidance of prejudice and the parties' convenience. . .As explained more fully below, the Court finds such arguments persuasive under the facts of this case."); Almaraz v. Haleas, 602 F.Supp.2d 920, 925, 926 (N.D. Ill. 2008) ("Plaintiff contends that, even if the City is liable based on the stipulation and a finding of liability against an individual defendant, plaintiff would still want to pursue his Monell claim so there is no economy in bifurcating the case. In that circumstance, however, plaintiff would not have a basis for continuing to pursue his Monell claim. Plaintiff contends he would still want a finding specifically on his Monell claim as a means of preventing future violations by the City. That a liability finding against the City specifically based on Monell would be a greater deterrent than a judgment of liability based on the stipulation is a questionable assumption. But even assuming it is a greater deterrent, plaintiff has no right to seek relief preventing future violations. Just as plaintiff would lack standing if he sought injunctive relief, . . . it is inappropriate to allow him to pursue a particular theory solely based on its possible deterrent value when all the actual relief he can be entitled to receive has already been determined. Also, any moral or psychic satisfaction that plaintiff may derive from also showing the City would be liable based on Monell is not even a form of relief, . . . let alone relief that plaintiff may continue to seek after all possible compensatory relief has been granted. It is true that plaintiff could be entitled to nominal damages even if he can show no compensatory damages resulting from a violation of his constitutional rights. . . But Monell is not proof of a constitutional violation. The constitutional violation alleged by plaintiff is false arrest. If it is proven that Haleas falsely arrested plaintiff, then the City stipulates that it is liable for such violations as well and plaintiff is entitled to appropriate damages for being falsely arrested. Monell would only be an alternative means of holding the City liable for the false arrest and would not increase or decrease the damages − nominal or compensatory − that plaintiff is entitled to receive for his injuries."); Cruz v. City of Chicago, No. 08 C 2087, 2008 WL 5244616, at *2, *3 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 16, 2008) ("The spate of bifurcation motions and the willingness of many judges to grant them stems in large part from the recognition that, in many (perhaps most) instances, 'claims of municipal liability require an extensive amount of work on the part of plaintiff's attorneys and experts, and an extraordinary amount of money must be spent in order to prepare and prove them.'. . . In addition, because of state law and the City's frequent practice of offering to stipulate to judgment being entered against it and to pay compensatory damages and reasonable attorneys' fees in the event of a judgment against the individual defendant officer(s) on the plaintiff's constitutional claims, . . . judges in this district have questioned why Section 1983 plaintiffs would 'want or need to proceed any further' after resolution of their claims against the individual officer defendants. . . . On the other side of the ledger, the Court notes that judges in this district have echoed Plaintiffs' concerns about delay of the case and possible prejudice to Plaintiffs from that delay. The Court also recognizes that Plaintiffs have the right to select the claims that they wish to pursue, and that even if pursuing a Monell claim may have minimal pecuniary reward, the potential to deter future official misconduct is itself 'a proper object of our system of tort liability.'. . . After consideration of the arguments of the parties and the pertinent authorities, the Court is persuaded that, on balance, bifurcation of Plaintiffs' Monell claim under Rule 42(b) and a stay at least as to 'purely Monell' discovery are warranted in the circumstances of this case. . . . Plaintiffs raise concerns about certain aspects of the stipulation that the Court believes merit discussion and clarification. To the extent that the stipulation can be said to suffer from potential vagueness or ambiguity, the Court finds the recent opinion by Judge Hart in Almaraz − considering a stipulation offered in support of a motion to bifurcate in another case involving the City and Officer Haleas − to be highly instructive. Both here and in Almaraz the stipulations refer to liability findings by 'the finder of fact.' See Almaraz, 2008 WL 4868635, at *3. This Court adopts the clarification made by Judge Hart − namely that '[t]he terms of the stipulation will also be applied if an individual is held liable on a motion for summary judgment or any other court procedure not involving a finder of fact .' Id. The Court also recognizes the 'exception' noted by Judge Hart for 'liability based on a settlement to which the City is not a party, or a non-court procedure such as arbitration or mediation unless the City agrees to be bound by such proceedings.' Id. The Court also notes a discrepancy between the proposed stipulation, which omits any discussion of attorneys' fees, and Defendants' reply brief, which acknowledges up front (at 1) that the City will pay any 'reasonable attorneys' fees' awarded to Plaintiffs. In view of that acknowledgment, the Court directs the City to revise the stipulation to track paragraph 3 of the stipulation in Almaraz, which includes the language 'and, to the extent allowed by the Court, reasonable attorneys fees pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1988.' Id. at *2. Finally, as Judge Hart recently stated, any remaining ambiguities in the document 'would be resolved against the City as the drafter' and 'construed in light of the understanding that the City was attempting to avoid litigating Monell issues and instead concede liability if one of its employees is liable.' Id."); Berardi v. Village of Sauget, Ill., No. 05-898-CJP, 2008 WL 5221091, at *3 (S.D. Ill Dec. 12, 2008) ("The Court finds the chance for prejudice to the defendants particularly problematic in this case. Confusion of the evidence and the two distinct bases for liability and damages seems unavoidable, where plaintiff intends to present evidence of 12 disputed incidents involving defendant Donahey. Trying the two causes of action together invites the jury to unfairly find defendant Donahey liable due to a virtual tidal wave of evidence of other acts. Plaintiff argues that bifurcation will unfairly prejudice him with respect to the valuation of his damages. Plaintiff fears that if the damages issue is presented to the jury in the Donahey trial, the jury may conclude Donahey is liable to pay any judgment out of his own pocket and the award would be low − which plaintiff asserts cannot be adequately remedied with a jury instruction. That argument is speculative, and plaintiff ignores the equal possibility that the jury will assume Donahey is indemnified in some manner, causing an inflation of any award. The jury's speculation in either direction is not necessarily dependent upon the defendants being tried together. Furthermore, the use of jury instructions to make clear the appropriate parameters of the jury's considerations is preferable and surely more effective than merely trying the two defendants together. With respect to compensatory damages, it appears that Donahey would be indemnified by statute (745 ILCS 10/9-102), but the scope and applicability of the Village's insurance policy is not known to the Court, and may be dependent upon whether there is an award of punitive damages. In any event, the Court does not perceive any unfair prejudice to plaintiff in trying the two defendants separately. Rather, the risk of confusion between the liability of the two defendants again favors bifurcation.As noted above, questions regarding indemnification and insurance remain. Plaintiff's request for an opportunity to be heard further on how and when the damages will be submitted to the jury is well taken. The parties should raise these issues at the final pretrial conference, if not before then. Neither plaintiff nor the defendants argue that bifurcation would impact their rights under the Seventh Amendment. Because each defendant would still be entitled to trial by jury if there is bifurcation, no one's Seventh Amendment right to trial by jury would be prejudiced. Both causes of action are distinct and fact-specific, and all factual issues will be tried by a jury."); Elrod v. City of Chicago, 2007 WL 3241352, at 1-8 (N.D.Ill. Nov. 1, 2007) ("The issue of whether to bifurcate a Monell claim from the discovery and trial of the underlying constitutional tort claim (and the related state law claims) is one that has been addressed by a number of courts in this district. Some judges have exercised their discretion in favor of bifurcating the Monell claims from the other claims. . . Other judges have refused to bifurcate Monell claims. . . Some of the judges denying motions to bifurcate indicated a willingness to revisit the issue again later or deferred discovery on the Monell claims until after the completion of fact discovery on the other claims. . . . Defendants' primary argument is that bifurcation should be ordered because a trial on the Monell claims will not be necessary, and therefore, discovery on those claims can be dispensed with. . . . A fundamental issue here is whether the City's proffered Stipulation makes such additional proof, and the related discovery, unnecessary.To start, if Plaintiffs cannot prove that Yerke violated their constitutional rights, their Monell claims against the City will fail as a matter of law, and the litigation will be over without the need for a trial on the Monell claims. If Plaintiffs prove that Yerke violated their constitutional rights, they are not entitled to recover any *additiona*l compensatory damages from the City because of their Monell claims. . . . Here, the City has offered to stipulate to the entry of judgment against it for any compensatory damages awarded against Yerke or any other City employee as a result of a finding of a constitutional violation as alleged by Plaintiffs. . . Thus, if Plaintiffs establish a constitutional injury, the City's Stipulation requires the City to pay any award of compensatory damages without Plaintiffs' proving the Monell prerequisites to the City's liability, in other words, without any trial on Plaintiffs' Monell claims. The Stipulation is not an admission of liability that the City's policies or practices caused Plaintiffs' injuries; on the contrary, the City denies in its Stipulation that it 'has any "policies, customs or practices" that cause constitutional deprivation' or that 'caused the alleged violations that would give rise to liability under section 1983.'. . However, significantly, the City is not merely waiving Plaintiffs' need to prove certain elements required in a Monell claim, it is agreeing to 'entry of judgment against the City for compensatory damages' if the finder of fact finds that 'any City employee violated plaintiffs' constitutional rights as alleged in their Complaints.' . . The City's submission of similar stipulations has been cited as justifying bifurcation orders in several cases. . . . Although Yerke has pleaded the defense of qualified immunity in this case, . . . the likelihood of a defendant prevailing on that defense in the context of an excessive force claim has not been a persuasive argument against bifurcation. . . . In summary, there is no doubt that including the Monell claims pleaded by Plaintiffs would add to the length and complexity of the trials of this case. If the Monell claims are omitted, the trial of the remaining claims 'is likely to be shorter, and perhaps significantly shorter, than a trial also involving Monell claims.'. . To the extent that a successful Monell claim serves to ensure payment of the damages to Plaintiffs, that goal is achieved by the Stipulation. Thus, bifurcation under the condition of the proposed Stipulation would promote the goals of judicial economy, expediency, and convenience. . . . While some courts have considered the potential prejudice to the individual defendant in granting motions to bifurcate, . . . other courts have noted that such prejudice can be cured by limiting instructions. . . . The City's argument could, in theory, apply to virtually every case that involved both individual liability and Monell policy claims, because the nature of a Monell claim requires evidence that goes beyond the actions of the individual defendant. Generally, the issue of avoiding prejudice at trial is better addressed by application of the Rules of Evidence, rulings in limine, and limiting instructions. This argument is not, in itself, a persuasive reason for bifurcation. . . . Plaintiffs raise one final argument to be considered, namely, that there are non-economic benefits to suing a municipality which may be less likely to occur when a plaintiff pursues only the individual officer in a § 1983 case. Plaintiffs here intend to prove that the City's system for investigating and disciplining shootings is so 'thoroughly broken' that officers can act 'virtually guaranteed of impunity, a climate that encourages the sorts of abuses alleged here.'. . Plaintiffs argue that the goal of deterrence will be lost if they cannot pursue their Monell claims against the City, and argue that it is important for them to hold all parties accountable, especially the City. . . There is no doubt that holding municipalities to account for constitutional violations resulting from the municipality's policies, customs or practices is an important goal of § 1983. . . .In its Stipulation here, the City agrees to be liable for any constitutional violation committed by its employees, even without proof that the violation is the result of a policy, custom or practice. Plaintiffs argue that more than mere monetary liability is necessary to deter unconstitutional acts that have their root in the City's policies, customs and practices. Several courts have opined that a judgment against a police officer (even one paid for by the municipality) may be less likely to prompt the municipality to act to prevent future violations than a judgment naming the municipality itself as responsible based on its policies and customs. . . Other courts conclude that an obligation to pay the judgment is sufficient deterrent. . . It is important to remember that bifurcation does not mean dismissal of the Monell claims. Plaintiffs retain the right to discover and try their Monell claims. Bifurcation in this case means structuring the process to facilitate a more economical and efficient process of discovering the merits of the underlying § 1983 claim, at the conclusion of which the parties will have the opportunity to consider possible settlement or go to trial on the underlying claim, without having incurred the expense of discovery relating to the Monell claims. If settlement is not reached and the trial results in a verdict for one or both of the Plaintiffs, the Plaintiffs reserve their right to discover and try the Monell claims. The City's Stipulation does not eliminate that right.").

A lengthy discussion of bifurcation and the court's reasons for denying it are set out in Cadiz v. Kruger, 2007 WL 4293976, at *1, *2, 5-11 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 29, 2007) ("In this case, plaintiff asserts a direct Section 1983 claim against the City under Monell, alleging that the defendant officers' unlawful search and seizure and use of excessive force were caused, in part, by various customs, policies and practices of the City (Count III). The City has filed a motion to bifurcate the Monell claim from the rest of the case, and to stay discovery and trial of the Monell claim (doc. # 78). By this motion, the City seeks to put completely on hold the discovery and adjudication of the Monell claim until resolution of the Section 1983 claims against the individual officers . . . In fact, the City's motion seeks far more than this. The City's goal in filing this motion is to prevent any merits adjudication of the Monell claim, whatever the outcome of the Section 1983 claims against the individual defendants. The City argues that if plaintiff does not establish Section 1983 liability against the officers, then there can be no Monell claim . . . , a proposition that is well settled. . . The City further suggests that even if plaintiff does establish Section 1983 liability against the officers, trial of the Monell claim will be unnecessary (and thus should not proceed) because it can provide plaintiff with no additional compensatory damages . . . . The City's motion here is not novel, but rather is one that the City has made (under various labels) in a number of cases within this district during the past several years. As each side has pointed out . . . , there is no shortage of authority within this district both granting and denying motions by the City to bifurcate Monell claims. See also Elrod v. City of Chicago, 06 C 2505 & 07 C 203, 2007 WL 3241352, * 1 and nn. 2-3 (N.D.Ill. Nov. 1, 2007) (collecting cases). While (as we discuss below) some of these decisions reflect certain philosophical views about the value of Monell claims, these decisions in the main reflect a case-specific assessment of the benefits and detriments of bifurcation. That much is evident from the fact that the same judges have both granted and denied requests by the City of Chicago to bifurcate the discovery and/or trial of Monell claims from other claims. . . .In this case, the City argues that placing the discovery and trial of the Monell claim on hold will advance the interests of all the parties and of the judicial system because: (1) the City will be protected from 'potentially unnecessary litigation expenses'; (2) the individual defendants will be protected from 'undue prejudice'; (3) the plaintiff's interest in 'expediting trial of his constitutional claims' against the individual defendants will be protected, 'without foreclosing unnecessarily the opportunity to establish the City's liability on the Monell claims'; and (4) the Court's interest will be served by promoting judicial economy . . . We examine each of these arguments in turn. . . . . [A] stay of Monell discovery will achieve cost savings only if one assumes that the parties are never required to go back and conduct Monell discovery at some later date. In a case where Monell discovery would overwhelm an otherwise small case, it might be prudent to indulge that assumption because, if the assumption proved correct, the benefits of deferring that discovery would be substantial. But, this is not such a case. Discovery in this case will be substantial with or without discovery into the Monell claim. And, if the Monell claim is ultimately addressed on the merits, the City's proposal to defer discovery and trial of the Monell claim until after the individual claims are decided would create additional costs and inefficiencies (which we discuss below) without achieving any offsetting benefit. Thus, we read the City's argument to be that the benefits of deferring Monell discovery would not be speculative, because the Monell claim never will be addressed on the merits. . . Accepting that proposition would require that we make one of two other assumptions. We could assume that plaintiff will fail to establish a Section 1983 claim against one or more officer defendants. The City's motion does not speak at all to the merits of the individual Section 1983 claim or explain why we should predict the failure of plaintiff's individual claims, and thus we have no reason to conclude that plaintiff's individual Section 1983 claims will fail. . . Failing that assumption, we would have to assume that even if plaintiff succeeds on the his individual Section 1983 claims, the Monell claim will never be allowed to proceed because it can add no compensatory relief to that victory. As we explain below, that is not an assumption we are willing to make. To summarize, we are not persuaded that, given the overall scope of the case, the burden and cost of Monell discovery is as great as the City urges; or that the benefits to be achieved by deferring Monell discovery are as certain as the City suggests; or that, on the facts of this case, those benefits would significantly outweigh the inefficiencies that would result from pursuing phased discovery. We therefore do not find that the City's understandable desire to defer, and potentially avoid, the cost of Monell discovery weighs heavily in favor of the bifurcation that the City seeks here. . . . There are circumstances in which bifurcation of the trial of individual and Monell claims is appropriate. But, at this stage, we cannot tell if this is such a case. Monell discovery has not yet been fully produced. Thus, 'neither the parties nor the Court has the least idea what evidence actually would be offered at trial on the Monell claim or just how prejudicial that evidence might actually be to the officers.' . . . Without that information, the Court cannot evaluate the extent of prejudice that might be created by a unitary trial, or the effectiveness of measures short of bifurcation, or whether the threat of unfair prejudice outweighs the inefficiencies of proceeding in two trials (which, as we discuss below, would be substantial under the City's bifurcation proposal). For these reasons, we conclude that the claim of unfair prejudice to the individual defendants does not weigh in favor of the City's motion for bifurcation. . . . Plaintiff had the choice of pleading only individual claims, or to additionally plead a Monell claim. Plaintiff opted for the latter course, thus making a choice that many plaintiffs eschew. Many (indeed, in our observation, most) plaintiffs plead excessive force or other claims of alleged police misconduct without adding Monell claims. That is no doubt because litigating a Monell claim imposes burdens on a plaintiff as well as on the City. By being prepared to litigate the Monell claim vigorously (including by expending the resources to retain experts on the Monell claim), plaintiff has signaled that she believes the Monell claim is important to her case. If some delay in the commencement of trial were to result from the presence of a Monell claim, that is a detriment that plaintiff apparently is prepared to endure in order to have the chance to prove her Monell claim. Thus, while in some cases there may be good and compelling reasons for bifurcating Monell and non-Monell claims, protecting the interests of a plaintiff who wishes to simultaneously pursue both is not one of them. . . . The City urges that all proceedings on the Monell claim be stayed until after resolution of the Section 1983 claims against the individual defendants. Under the City's proposal, the Monell claim would not be ready for trial (if it survived the summary judgment motion that the City views as inevitable) at the time the individual claims go to trial. As a result, if plaintiff were to prevail on one or more of those claims at trial, then the trial of the Monell claim could not commence before the same jury. Rather, we would have to restart the discovery process; subject certain witnesses who already were deposed on the individual claims to an additional deposition on the Monell claim; go through summary judgment on the Monell claim; and then, if the Monell claim goes to trial, empanel an entirely new jury to hear it. The second jury will not have heard the underlying evidence concerning the individual claims. We envision many disputes about how much evidence from the first trial may be rehashed before the new jury, with the result that there likely will be at least some repetition of evidence that would have been unnecessary − even with a bifurcated trial − if both phases had occurred before the same jury. None of this would advance the goals of efficiency and judicial economy. Thus, on the record before the Court at this time, we conclude that these considerations do not weigh in favor of the City's bifurcation proposal. . . . Finally, we turn to the proposition that lies at the heart of the City's motion, which we have identified but not yet fully addressed: the proposition that plaintiff's Monell claim should never be addressed on the merits, even if plaintiff establishes her Section 1983 claims against the individual officers. We have no doubt that this is the true goal of the City's motion, as the City admitted before even filing the motion . . . . The City states that it has a statutory and contractual obligation to indemnify the defendant officers for any judgment against them, because there is no dispute that they were acting within the scope of their employment during their encounter with Michael Cadiz . . . The statutory obligation arises from 745 ILCS 10/9-102, which authorizes a municipality to pay tort judgments of compensatory damages, attorneys' fees and costs against its public officials for acts within the scope of their employment. . . The City does not identify the source of its contractual obligation to indemnify, but we presume it is based on the collective bargaining agreement. The City argues that in light of its obligation to pay a judgment against the officer defendants under Section 1983 , proceeding thereafter on a Monell claim would be pointless because plaintiff cannot recover any additional compensatory damages even if she prevailed against the City on that claim. . . . That is where the City's analysis ends. The City does not say that its obligation to pay a judgment against the officer defendants renders the Monell claim moot, thereby eliminating any case or controversy. Nor does the City argue that having achieved a monetary award on the individual Section 1983 claims, plaintiff has no further legal interest in the Monell claim and thus lacks standing to pursue it. And, indeed, we do not believe such an argument would have merit. While success in establishing a constitutional claim against the officers is essential to establishing a Monell claim, the Supreme Court has made clear that this alone is not enough to prove a Monell claim. A municipality's liability under Monell is not merely derivative of the liability of its employees, but rather stems from the municipality's maintenance of policies, practices or customs that contribute to the unconstitutional conduct of its employees. . . A Monell claim thus seeks not merely to vindicate the right of a plaintiff to be free from unconstitutional conduct by municipal employees, but rather to vindicate the independent right of a plaintiff to be free of municipal policies, practices or customs that foster such conduct. When (as here) a plaintiff claims the violation of a constitutional right as a result of a municipality's policies, practices or customs, that claim creates a separate case or controversy from the claims against the individual officers that the plaintiff has standing to pursue. That separate constitutional claim is not legally extinguished merely because the plaintiff obtains full economic recovery through the claim against the individual officers. . . . A plaintiff who succeeds on a Monell claim may not recover compensatory damages in excess of those awarded on the individual Section 1983 claims, . . . but we see no bar to the plaintiff recovering nominal damages ($1.00) since no additional compensatory damages cannot be proven. . . . Unable to argue that plaintiff's Monell claim would be legally mooted out by the City's payment of a judgment against the officer defendants, the City's argument boils down to one of expedience: that neither the City nor the judicial system should have to spend the time or resources litigating Monell claims that have so little economic value. Implicit in that argument is the proposition that there are no non-economic benefits to Monell claims that should weigh into the equation. The case law reflects disagreement about the validity of that proposition. Some courts have pointed out that successful Monell actions may have the benefit of deterring future official misconduct, which is 'a proper object of our system of tort liability.' . . . A recent decision out of this district has rejected this deterrence rationale. In Parker, the court expressed doubt that the

Amato court 'would have contended that an award of $1.00 would alert any city or its citizenry to the issue of police misconduct.' . . . We decline to speculate as to what effect, if any, a finding that the City maintained unconstitutional policies, practices or customs would have on City policymakers. We understand the point of view, expressed in Parker, that payment of large awards on Section 1983 judgments against individual officers should provide ample motivation to identify and change any policies, practices or customs that may contribute to unconstitutional conduct and damage awards (or settlements) that create a strain on City coffers. On the other hand, we also understand how one might reasonably conclude, as did the Amato court, that a jury verdict that police misconduct stemmed from unconstitutional municipal policies, practices or customs could provide a greater incentive for change than the payment of a damages award that the City then could chalk up to aberrational conduct by a rogue officer. We have no evidence one way or the other about the 'incentive' value of payment of money damages as opposed to findings of Monell liability in leading to changes in any unconstitutional municipal policies. It is difficult to envision the real-life laboratory setting in which that question could be studied and answered in any reliable way. To the extent that Monell claims might have a salutary effect in changing municipal policies that are unconstitutional, the City's request for bifurcation and ultimate extinguishment of Monell claims would render that possible benefit a dead letter. Accepting the City's request for bifurcation would ignore the fact that a plaintiff who succeeds in proving unconstitutional policies, practices or customs has achieved a significant victory 'not for himself alone but also as a private attorney general, vindicating a policy that Congress considered of the highest importance ...' City of Riverside v. Rivera, 477 U.S. 561, 577 (1986). On the other hand, there also may be benefits that accrue to the City from defeating a Monell claim, and thus vindicating the constitutionality of its polices, practices and customs. If accepted, the City's bifurcation strategy would allow it to avoid the merits of virtually any Monell claim alleging police misconduct. . . One may argue that this is not significantly different than the City avoiding a Monell claim by settling the case. However, we see a major difference. A settlement is a mutual agreement through which a plaintiff accepts a sum of money to forego litigating the Monell claim, but also to avoid the risk of losing that claim after expending substantial resources in the effort to prove it. In some cases, there may be a serious question about scope of employment (unlike here) and thus about the City's obligation to indemnify. That, in turn, could create a serious question about the collectability of any judgment and fee award that a plaintiff may obtain. In that circumstance, a plaintiff may be willing to agree to drop a Monell claim in exchange for a stipulation by the City to pay a judgment against the officer defendants, trading the possibility of succeeding on a Monell claim (and the risk of losing that claim after spending substantial time and money on it) for the certainty of collectability if the plaintiff succeeds on the individual claims. . . . By contrast, the City proposal would foist upon an unwilling plaintiff the elimination of her Monell claim. We do not believe that the City should be allowed to deprive a plaintiff of a merits determination of a Monell claim by the expedient of agreeing to pay a judgment against its officers that the City may be statutorily or contractually obligated to pay anyway. . . . For the foregoing reasons, we deny defendant's motion to bifurcate Section 1983 claims and stay discovery and trial on those claims (doc. # 78). In so doing, we express no view as to the merits of plaintiff's Monell claim, and do not rule on the scope of the Monell discovery that plaintiff may obtain. We simply hold that: (1) plaintiff has a right to pursue his Monell claim notwithstanding the City's willingness to pay any judgment against the officers on the individual Section 1983 claims, and (2) the City has not demonstrated that the bifurcation it seeks is warranted on the facts of this case. Upon a more complete record, we later can revisit the question of whether bifurcation of the trial of the individual and Monell claims (in a proceeding before the same jury) is appropriate.").

See also Kuri v. Folino, No. 13-CV-01653, 2019 WL 4201567, at *19–20 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 5, 2019) ("Early on in the litigation, one of the previously assigned judges granted an agreed motion to bifurcate Kuri's claims against the City and stay discovery and trial pending resolution of the claims against the individual defendants. . . Kuri argues that he should now be allowed to pursue his 'independent, non-derivative' claims against the City under Monell v. Department of Social Services of New York, 436 U.S. 658 (1978). . .The City opposes the motion and counters that 'there is no remaining case or controversy.'. . The City is correct. Kuri cannot recover anything from the City above what he is able to recover against Folino and McDermott. . . Also, an Illinois statute requires municipalities to indemnify their employees for compensatory damages awarded in tort judgments. . . The Seventh Circuit has held that, under this statute, a plaintiff may seek a judgment against a municipality requiring it to indemnify the officer. Wilson v. City of Chicago, 120 F.3d 681, 684–85 (7th Cir. 1997). So, there is no question that the City will pay the compensatory damages award if it is affirmed. In other words, Kuri is virtually certain to collect his compensatory damages award of $4 million against Folino and McDermott (and, eventually, the attorneys' fees) pending any appeals. Indeed, the Court has already entered judgment on the compensatory damages award against the City for those claims on which Kuri was successful. . . Since Kuri is not able to collect anything in addition to that, regardless of any Monell claims, and since he has not brought claims against the City for injunctive relief, there is no live case or controversy against the City on which Kuri can move forward. The Court has no subject-matter jurisdiction over Kuri's Monell claims. The motion is denied, though it is without prejudice if the City somehow disclaims payment on the compensatory damages award."); Schoolcraft v. City of New York, 133 F.Supp.3d 563, 571 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("City Defendants request bifurcation in the interests of efficiency and to avoid prejudice, which they contend would result if a jury were presented extensive evidence of prior bad conduct. . . Plaintiff convincingly argues that there will be significant overlap between the evidence he will offer in support of his Monell claims and in support of the other claims that survived summary judgment. . . Consequently, efficiency considerations do not favor bifurcation. Moreover, the substantial prejudice which City Defendants contend will result from permitting the jury to hear evidence regarding quotas or the blue wall of silence, . . . will be adequately mitigated through the ubiquitous and efficacious means of limiting instructions, jury charges and limiting instructions. Consequently, the motion to bifurcate is denied."); Estate of McIntosh v. City of Chicago, No. 15 C 1920, 2015 WL 5164080, at *7-10 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 2, 2015) ("The underlying claims are, in part, premised on the actions of the individual defendants, but are also based on the presence of policies, practices and customs which include 'the failure to properly train and supervise Chicago police officers with regards to discharging their weapons at civilians, particularly at young Black men.'. . Plaintiff's constitutional claim alleging unconstitutional seizure and failure to intervene and eluding to excessive force and due process violations, although somewhat inartfully pled, . . .refers to various constitutional violations that factually overlap with, but may still be distinct from, the Monell allegations. The mere presence of factual overlap, however, does not mandate that the verdict on liability becomes a necessary predicate, dictating the verdict of Plaintiff's Monell claim. At this early stage of litigation, prior to depositions of any individual defendants and the production of policy and training documents, it is premature to unequivocally state that there can be no municipal liability in the absence of underlying individual liability. Based on the parties' current positions, however, it is plausible to understand a situation in which differing verdicts of these claims would be compatible–namely based on the Defendants' assertion of immunity. Individual public employees are entitled, where applicable, to the defense of qualified immunity, . . . but municipalities are not. . . Indeed, all Defendants have answered and asserted various forms of immunity from liability–qualified immunity and state-law immunity. . . As such, bifurcation may not avoid a second trial if the officers are immune, and that second trial (of the Monell claim) would likely duplicate the first trial against the individual officers. . . In addition, because of the early stage at which Defendants brought this motion, it is premature to speculate on the full breadth of discovery necessary for the constitutional violation and Monell claims or on the complexity of a trial over these claims. The factual overlap already apparent between them, however, warrants preservation of duplicating resources by a mutual discovery process related to these claims prior to trial. Indeed, rather than simplifying the discovery process over the course of this litigation, bifurcation at this stage may add unnecessary complexity and confusion. Without reference to any specific concern in Plaintiff's discovery requests, Defendants generally argue that the discovery process will be 'colossal', unduly burdensome, and 'will encompass a significant period of time predating the incident underlying this lawsuit and will involve the systemic policies and practices of the City during the relevant time period, including the Chicago Police Department's Bureau of Internal Affairs, the Personnel Division, the Police Board, the Independent Police Review Authority, and the City Council oversight activity of these municipal entities.'. . Plaintiff responds that Monell discovery will be 'straight forward and manageable' and 'categorized and finite' since the requested documents have likely been produced in other litigations and 'are compiled by the [I.P.R.A.] within their investigation files into each "officer involved shooting."'. . Keeping Plaintiff's representations in mind, a denial of bifurcation at this point surely requires Defendants to disclose documents and likely submit to depositions related to various policies and procedures that were maintained and followed at and around the time of McIntosh's shooting. To the extent, however, that Defendants find Plaintiff's Monell discovery requests overly broad or imposing undue burden and expense, the parties can seek assistance from the Court to tailor the requests as necessary after making independent good faith attempts to do so. . . Accordingly, the early stage of litigation makes a clear determination of judicial economy favoring bifurcation in this case speculative at best and when weighed against the fact that the plaintiff is the master of her complaint, Defendants speculative assertions of the potentially high costs associated with bringing a claim for municipal liability do not sway the Court's consideration. . . . The Court recognizes, however, that factual overlap exists between Plaintiff's Monell claim and the Defendant Officers' individual liability based on unconstitutional seizure, use of deadly force, and failure to intervene. The Court further recognizes that progression of discovery will define the factual contours in this case and may indicate that a liability determination against Defendant Officers is in fact a necessary predicate for establishing the Monell claim. Plaintiff's Monell claim is ultimately based on the injury resulting from McIntosh's shooting and death–a single incident that occurred between identified parties, namely, McIntosh and Defendant Officers. Because Monell claims carry a heavy burden of discovery and proof, the Court finds that while bifurcation of trial and stay in discovery of the Monell claim is not warranted at this early stage, a sequential assignment in the discovery process is. In particular, because a single incident between identifiable parties underlies this case, prioritization of the discovery surrounding that incident is beneficial. Accordingly, the Court directs the parties to defer discovery on the Monell claim until after the completion of fact discovery on the claims against Defendant Officers. . .While not foreclosing the opportunity for Plaintiff to further develop her case against the individual Defendant Officers through Monell discovery relating to the Defendant City's policies, practices and procedures, this sequential movement of the discovery process will prioritize the claims of a smaller and more manageable dispute between the parties. To the extent that dispute encourages or results in a more narrow focus to the claims against Defendants or even potentially disposes of any portion of the case by agreement, the purposes of Rule 42(b) will have been served. . . For the forgoing reasons, the Court grants in part and denies in part Defendant Officers' partial motion to dismiss. The Court further denies Defendant City's motion to bifurcate Plaintiff's Monell claims and stay discovery and trial on those claims pending resolution of the claims against Defendant Officers, without prejudice to a renewed motion for bifurcation of trial after discovery is completed."); Costantino v. City of Atl. City, No. CIV. 13-6667 RBK/JS, 2015 WL 1609693, at *10-11 (D.N.J. Apr. 10, 2015) ("To the extent Atlantic City wants to bifurcate the case the proposal is also rejected. It makes no sense to first try the case against the defendant police officers and then only if a liability verdict is returned does plaintiff get additional Monell discovery. This would substantially delay the ultimate resolution of the case and would require duplicative discovery. In fact, the Court previously denied a request to bifurcate a similar case. In D'Arrigo v. Gloucester City, C.A. No. 04–5967(JBS), 2007 WL 4440222 (D.N.J. Dec. 17, 2007), the plaintiff brought a § 1983 excessive force case against the Gloucester City Municipal Police Department and individual police officers. Before trial Gloucester City moved to bifurcate the Monell claim from the case against the individual defendants Gloucester City argued prejudice would result from a joint trial. It also argued efficacy and judicial economy would result from bifurcation. Like this case the Court soundly rejected the proposal. . . . It is not unusual in § 1983 cases for plaintiffs to pursue claims against individual defendants while at the same time pursuing a Monell claim against a municipality. This case presents no unusual or special circumstances that justify bifurcation. If [the] Court granted bifurcation in this case, it would in essence be agreeing that as a matter of routine bifurcation should be granted in cases of this type. This practice is not permitted. . . .The Court recognizes that there are cases around the country that grant bifurcation of Monell claims. . . This is not surprising because '[s]ince the decision whether to bifurcate requires a fact-intensive analysis left to the sound discretion of the court, based on the facts in a specific case, different courts are bound to rule that bifurcation is appropriate.'. . Nevertheless, substantial authority exists to deny bifurcation motions. . . Notably, Atlantic City has not cited a single New Jersey District Court police § 1983 case where bifurcation was granted, including the scores of cases where it was a named defendant. The Court is not surprised by the fact that there is no applicable New Jersey precedent and not one Atlantic City case where bifurcation was ordered. The Court has no intention of breaking this streak."); Bell v. City of Chicago, No. 09 C 4537, 2010 WL 432310, at *3, *4 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 3, 2010) ("In Thomas, the Seventh Circuit has provided guidance relating to bifurcation, but the City has argued that Thomas may be 'factually and legally distinguishable' from Heller and that '[o]n its face, Thomas seems at odds with Heller....' (Reply 4). . . . The City has not explained why a verdict in favor of Parker and against the City would be an inconsistent verdict in this case, as contemplated by Thomas. In addition, we note that although the City cites several district court decisions in which the courts allowed bifurcation, (Mot.5-6), such rulings were made before the Seventh Circuit provided relevant guidance in Thomas. Further, all of the time and effort that the City proposes will be saved in discovery, trial preparations, and trial time is purely speculative. If we were to follow the City's proposed schedule, there might be a need for two rounds of discovery, two trials to prepare for, and two trials that would include much redundant evidence. Such a result would excessively prolong this case and would not serve judicial economy. Bell also points out that there are over a dozen similar cases brought against Parker and the City pending in the Northern District of Illinois, and the same law firms represent Defendants in the cases. Bell also contends, and the City concedes, that Monell discovery is already underway in at least one of the other cases brought against Parker in which the judge had denied a similar request to stay discovery on the Monell issues. ("ns.5); (Reply 6). The City should therefore already have much of the necessary discovery for this case. Thus, judicial economy can be served by conducting Monell discovery along with discovery relating to the individual liability claim. To allow this and other cases to proceed to trial on the individual liability claim only to potentially begin anew with the municipal liability claim would not serve the efficient administration of the judicial system. In regards to the City's argument that Parker will be somehow prejudiced by being tried with the City, there is insufficient evidence to show that such prejudice will result or that even if there was potential prejudice that limiting instructions could not cure. In addition, the City mentions a possibility of policies and customs being raised that are not connected to Parker, but the City's concerns as to prejudice are purely speculative. The efficiency factor favors a single trial in this case. Therefore, after considering all of the circumstances in this particular case, we deny the motion to bifurcate."); Bradley v. City of Chicago, No. 09 C 4538, 2010 WL 432313 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 3, 2010) (same as Bell); Shannon v. Koehler, 673 F.Supp.2d 758, 770 (N.D. Iowa 2009) (reversing Federal Magistrate Judge's order to bifurcate where court found that separate trials would not increase efficiency and would waste judicial resources); Duggan v. The Village of New Albany, No. 2:08-cv-814, 2009 WL 2132622, * 3, *4 (S.D. Ohio July 10, 2009) (discussing cases and denying defendants' motion to bifurcate and stay discovery against the Village); Wilson v. City of Chicago, No. 07 C 1682, 2008 WL 4874148, at 1-3 (N.D. Ill. July 24, 2008) ("It is now common practice for the City to ask − and for Courts to allow − a delay in the assessment of the challenged municipal policy until alter the plaintiff proves the officers inflicted a constitutional injury. [citing cases] Here, however, the City goes well beyond asking for a mere delay in the examination of its training policies. The City has agreed to the entry of judgment against it for compensatory damages and attorney fees if the Court finds that the responding officers violated Wilson's constitutional rights. . . This stipulation − coupled with the motion to bifurcate − will short circuit any discovery into the City's training procedures regarding mentally ill detainees. The purpose of bifurcation, however, is not to spare the City the embarrassment of litigating potential training deficiencies. The City argues it has nothing to hide, and simply seeks bifurcation in order to avoid the overwhelming burden associated with Monell discovery. The City's concerns, however, are misguided. . . . Wilson's Complaint does not present a run-of-the-mill failure to train allegation. Indeed, Wilson alleges that the City is deficient in a very specific area: training police to deal with mentally ill persons. The Court is confident that Wilson's Monell claim is narrowly tailored enough that discovery on these issues will not be a significant burden. Wilson's son was diagnosed with schizophrenia and died during an altercation with the police. Wilson now seeks to uncover the details of how the City trains its officers to interact with people like her son. There is no reason to believe Wilson's Monell discovery will be a fishing expedition to unearth hidden claims in order to hit the § 1983 jackpot. Wilson asserts an additional reason why consideration of her claim should not be delayed via bifurcation: a successful Monell claim can expose detrimental municipal polices, thus providing an important social benefit. In response, the City contends Wilson's Monell claim − even if successful − would have little to no meaningful impact because she only seeks monetary damages. The City's argument is unpersuasive. . . . Simply put, the fact that a plaintiff seeks monetary relief will not preclude a successful Monell claim from conferring 'non-economic benefits' such as deterring police misconduct or shining the light on detrimental municipal policies. The City makes one last argument: the Court should exercise judicial restraint and allow the legislative branch to effectuate change in municipal policy, not individual litigants. In particular, the City asserts Section 1983 does not grant courts 'a roving commission to root out and correct whatever municipal transgression they might discover' and that the Court's only task is 'to adjudicate discrete disputes.' . . The Court appreciates the City's concerns. But, a separation of powers argument has no applicability to this case. Lynette Wilson's mentally ill son was killed during an incident with the police. The three responding officers admit they had not been trained to handle mentally ill detainees . . . The Court did not 'rove' the City looking for a plaintiff to challenge police training procedures. Wilson came to the Court with a specific grievance regarding a specific policy in a discrete area; and where a plaintiff brings such a claim − and the allegations are narrowly tailored and would not cause an undue burden during discovery − the Court will not allow bifurcation to be used as a tool for obfuscation. . . . The Court finds that the prejudice, efficiency and economy rationales do not weigh in favor of bifurcation. The City is correct, in most cases, Monell claims add substantial time and expense. But, there is no rule or case law requiring bifurcation of all Monell claims. Thus, the decision is left to the sound discretion of the Court. . . Here, Wilson's Monell claim is narrowly tailored and aimed at an exceedingly specific area of police procedure. If the City has no desire to discuss or litigate its policies in this area, then the proper tack is to pursue settlement, not move for bifurcation."); McCoy v. City of New York, No. CV 07-4143(RJD)(JO), 2008 WL 3884388, at 1-3 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 13, 2008) ("Courts often assess the factors of convenience and judicial economy together. In cases involving claims against both individual defendants and municipal entities, the argument routinely advanced for bifurcation is that separate trials 'could lead to an earlier and less costly disposition.'. . The basis for that argument is that finding that the plaintiff failed to establish liability on the part of any municipal employee would normally preclude a finding of liability against the municipality itself under

Monell; as a result, a bifurcated trial of the claims against the individual defendants might, depending on the outcome, dispose of the entire case. . . This argument in favor of bifurcation glosses over an important fact: 'under Monell municipal liability for constitutional injuries may be found to exist even in the absence of individual liability....' Barrett v. Orange County Human Rights Comm'n, 194 F.3d 341, 350 (2d Cir.1999). Such an outcome can be the result of a jury's determination that the individual defendants violated the plaintiff's rights but enjoy qualified immunity , or of a finding that the plaintiff's injuries are not solely attributable to the actions of the named individual defendants. . . Therefore it is simply not an inevitability that a bifurcated trial will promote judicial economy or convenience, even if the individual defendants escape liability in the first trial. Courts that grant bifurcation to avoid prejudice have expressed a concern about the potential unfairness to individual defendants in a joint trial that includes evidence relevant only to the Monell claims. . . .The defendants base their motion for bifurcation on 'optimis[m]' that the individual named defendants will prevail at the summary judgment stage, and the municipal claims will therefore be dismissed. . . To the extent the defendants therefore implicitly argue that bifurcation is warranted for purposes of convenience and judicial economy, I disagree for two reasons. First, the individual defendants have asserted a qualified immunity defense. . . .I find more persuasive the decisions of courts that deny bifurcation where an individual defendant asserts a defense of qualified immunity that, if successful, would not obviate trial of the Monell claim. . . . Second − although of lesser persuasive value in my view − it is unclear from the face of the Complaint whether the injuries that McCoy alleges are solely attributable to the actions of the named individual defendants. . . . There is thus a real possibility that bifurcation will not obviate the need for a trial of McCoy's Monell claims even if the individual defendants avoid liability. . . If the defendants seek bifurcation to avoid trial prejudice to the named individual officers, they have not said so or explained the basis for any such concern. . . . Should that circumstance change after discovery is completed, the defendants will of course be free to renew their motion on the basis of such new information. In short, the defendants have offered no convincing argument that the bifurcation they seek will advance the interests of the parties' convenience, judicial economy, or the avoidance of unfair prejudice to any party. I therefore deny the motion for bifurcation. I further deny the motion to stay discovery related to the Monell claims. I would reach that result even if I were to grant bifurcation, so as to preserve the ability of the assigned district judge to conduct both phases of a bifurcated trial before the same jury."); Jeanty v. County of Orange, 379 F.Supp.2d 533, 549, 550 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) ("Defendants contend that severance of the excessive force claims against the individual defendants from the policy and practice claims against the County is warranted because plaintiff's excessive force claim 'involve[s] different witnesses, different factual circumstances, different claimed uses of force, different claimed injuries, different correctional officer defendants involved, and different claimed incident dates' from the alleged excessive force claims which would be presented by other witnesses to establish plaintiff's Monell claim. . . Defendants further maintain that failure to sever the claims would result in prejudice to the individual defendants because the proposed witnesses on the Monell claim will be testifying about incidents of alleged excessive force in which the individual defendants had no part. . . Additionally, defendants acknowledge that plaintiff has alleged claims based upon the same general facts and theories of law, but contend that this alone is insufficient to require the claims against the individual defendants and the County to be tried together. . . Plaintiff, however, contends that severing his claims against the individual defendants from his claims against the County, or holding separate trials, 'would waste judicial resources and further delay resolution of plaintiff's claims.' . . Although we agree with defendants that the individual defendants may be prejudiced [footnote omitted] by the testimony of witnesses in support of the Monell claim, we believe any such prejudice could be cured by 'carefully crafted' limiting instructions. . . .[S]everance of the claims or separate trials would not further convenience or be conducive to 'expedition and economy;' rather, it would require the Court to try two cases that are essentially the same except for additional evidence which might be presented in support of plaintiff's Monell claim. Such a result, would clearly not further Rule 42(b)'s goals of efficiency and convenience."); Rosa v. Town of East Hartford, No. 3:00CV1367 ("HN), 2005 WL 752206, at *4, *5 (D.Conn. Mar. 31, 2005) (not reported) ("Defendants move to bifurcate the Monell claim from Rosa's other claims on the grounds that separate trials would avoid prejudice to the defendant officers and ensure judicial efficiency. Rosa asserts that bifurcation is not necessary and will hamper his ability to present an effective case. The court agrees. Under Fed.R.Civ.P. 42(b), district courts have broad discretion to try issues and claims separately in order to 'further convenience, avoid prejudice, or promote efficiency.' . . In particular, 'bifurcation may be appropriate where, for example, the litigation of the first issue might eliminate the need to litigate the second issue ... or where one party will be prejudiced by evidence presented against another party[.]' . . Even though bifurcation is not unusual, it nonetheless remains the exception rather than the rule. . . In the present case, bifurcation is not necessary either to avoid prejudice to the defendants or to further convenience. Defendants' concern that evidence Rosa will introduce in support of his Monell claim will prejudice the individual officers is exaggerated. Any spillover prejudice to the individual officers that may be caused by the admission of Rule 404(b) evidence to establish the Monell claim could be cured by limiting instructions. Moreover, contrary to defendants' assertion, the presence of the Monell claim in this action does not create an order of proof that favors bifurcation. That is, the mere fact that the jury might return a verdict on Rosa's § 1983 claim in favor of the police officers and thereby avoid its consideration of the Monell claim does not compel bifurcation. There are far less burdensome ways to deal with that situation, including use of a special verdict form, a well-adapted jury charge, and carefully crafted limiting instructions. Contrary to defendants' assertions, separate trials would not be efficient and would inconvenience the court, the jury, and the plaintiff. Accordingly, defendants' motion to bifurcate is denied."); Green v. Baca, 226 F.R.D. 624, 633 (C.D. Cal. 2005) ("As plaintiff notes, cases in which courts have bifurcated whether there has been an underlying constitutional violation from Monell liability for trial have all involved claims against individual officers as well as against the municipality. Bifurcation is appropriate in such a situation to protect the individual officer defendants from the prejudice that might result if a jury heard evidence regarding the municipal defendant's allegedly unconstitutional policies. . . .Here, where there are no claims against any officers in their individual capacities, . . .such concerns are not present.").

16. Use of Public Reports and Experts to Establish Custom or Policy of Deliberate Indifference

City of Canton addresses only failure to train but most courts have applied the same standard to claims of failure to supervise or discipline. See, e.g., Consolo v. George, 835 F. Supp. 49, 51 n.1 (D. Mass. 1993).

Plaintiffs may be aided in their attempt to establish a policy or custom of inadequate supervision or discipline, tantamount to deliberate indifference, by the existence of reports made pursuant to governmental or public investigations of police misconduct.

In Gentile v. County of Suffolk, 926 F.2d 142 (2d Cir. 1991), plaintiffs alleged police and prosecutorial misconduct involving a cover-up of police actions during the incident involving plaintiffs, as well as malicious prosecution of plaintiffs following the incident. Plaintiffs' claim against the County was based on a custom or pattern of inadequate investigation and discipline of officers involved in incidents of misconduct, which custom or pattern caused the violation of plaintiffs' rights.

The Second Circuit affirmed the jury's verdict against the County and the district court's denial of a j.n.o.v. The court found no error in Judge Weinstein's decision to admit into evidence selected portions of a report by a state investigatory commission concerned with past misconduct of the County Police Department and the District Attorney's Office.

The court noted that under Fed. Rule Evid. 803(8) (C), government investigatory reports are presumed to be admissible and the party opposing the admission of the report has the burden of going forward with "negative factors" that would outweigh the presumption of admissibility. Furthermore, the presumption of admissibility "extends not merely to factual determinations in the narrow sense, but also to conclusions or opinions that are based upon factual investigation." 926 F.2d at 148.

See also Ricciuti v. N.Y.C. Transit Authority, 941 F.2d 119 (2d Cir. 1991) (amended complaint, summarizing three reports relating to arrest practices of Transit Authority, was sufficient to state a claim against the Authority based on a policy or custom of inadequate training and supervision, whether or not reports would be admissible in evidence).

Judge Kearse suggested that the reports relied on by the plaintiffs might avoid any hearsay problem if they were offered, not for the truth of the matters stated therein, but rather for the purpose of proving notice on the part of the Authority of repeated failures to investigate charges of excessive force used by police officers. Id. at 123.

See also Stucker v. Louisville Metro Government, No. 23-5214, 2024 WL 2135407, at *12-13 (6th Cir. May 13, 2024) (not published) ("This court may take judicial notice of public records outside the record on appeal. . . And we 'must take judicial notice if a party requests it and the court is supplied with the necessary information.'. . The DOJ Report may be judicially noticed under FRE 201(b)(2) because its sources 'cannot reasonably be questioned.' Under our authority to take judicial notice and our caselaw determining that such reports may be relevant to proving a policy or custom under a Monell claim, see, e.g., Simpkins v. Boyd Cnty. Fiscal Ct., No. 21-5477, 2022 WL 17748619 (6th Cir. Sept. 2, 2022), we take judicial notice of the Report and address it below.The DOJ opened its investigation of the LMPD on April 26, 2021, following the March 13, 2020 shooting of Breonna Taylor. The DOJ's investigation included obtaining from the LMPD information and evidence dating back to 2016, relying on on-site tours and visits, interviews, extensive document review (including internal affairs and incident report filings, among others), and the review of 'thousands of hours of body-worn camera footage.' The DOJ Report was grounded in data that is relevant to this case. One of the investigative focuses of the DOJ Report was 'whether LMPD engages in unlawful search warrant practices,' and the Report 'sought to identify the root causes of any violations.'. . Like the Heintze Report, the DOJ Report found that LMPD routinely failed to complete risk matrix assessments, record warrant executions, wear body cameras or turn body cameras on, and review warrant executions after-the-fact. . . Relevant to this case, the DOJ Report explains: 'As a matter of best practices, LMPD supervisors should—but do not—ensure that probable cause exists before LMPD seeks a search warrant. When probable cause exists, supervisors should—but do not—ensure that the warrant applications that officers draft set out the facts supporting probable cause.'. . In addition to these findings, the DOJ Report contained pages of incident examples and discussion of LMPD's practices. . . The DOJ Report also includes a section titled 'The inadequacies of LMPD's warrant applications are caused by poor supervision and oversight.'. . In its Executive Summary, the Report states: 'Failures of leadership and accountability have allowed unlawful conduct to continue unchecked. Even when city and police leaders announced solutions, they failed to follow through. In LMPD, officer misconduct too often goes unnoticed and unaddressed. At times, LMPD leaders have endorsed and defended unlawful conduct.'. . Ultimately, the Report found that 'LMPD engages in a pattern or practice of seeking search warrants in ways that deprive individuals of their rights under the Fourth Amendment.'. . In sum, the Stuckers have presented evidence raising questions about the LMPD's deliberate indifference through the Heintze Report, Troutman's testimony, and the data and specific facts contained in the 2023 DOJ Report. Because the district court did not have the Report when it previously rejected Plaintiffs' Monell claim, we vacate the district court's decision on this issue and remand for the district court to consider in the first instance whether the evidence, including the 2023 DOJ Report, creates a dispute of material fact as to LMPD's deliberate indifference and whether LMPD has met its burden to qualify for 'judgment as a matter of law'. . . . For a Monell claim to succeed, the Stuckers must prove both a constitutional violation and municipal responsibility. The district court has not yet had an opportunity to consider inadequate training or acquiescence in light of the 2023 DOJ Report and our finding of constitutional violations. We therefore vacate Part E of the district court's order and remand for the district court to address the Stuckers' theories of municipal responsibility in light of this opinion and the record evidence, including the DOJ Report."); Stockton v. Milwaukee County, 44 F.4th 605, 617-18 (7th Cir. 2022) ("Stockton posits Armor and Milwaukee County's failure to maintain adequate medical staffing levels and process sick call slips amounted to a widespread practice that caused MCJ medical providers to neglect to respond to Madden's October 25, 2016 sick call slip, thus depriving him of constitutionally adequate medical care. To establish deliberate indifference to the purportedly unconstitutional effects of a widespread practice, Stockton must point to other inmates injured by that practice. . . Absent multiple injuries, Stockton cannot supply adequate evidence from which a jury could reasonably find Armor and Milwaukee County would '"conclude that the plainly obvious consequences"' of the practice 'would result in the deprivation of a federally protected right,' as is required to establish deliberate indifference. . . Stockton does not point to evidence that other inmates were similarly harmed and leans, instead, upon Madden's single, isolated experience. Here, Stockton relies almost exclusively upon the Shansky reports. The parties dispute the propriety of relying upon these reports. Although the district court did not rule upon their admissibility, we have repeatedly held such reports are inadmissible hearsay and thus their contents cannot be offered for the truth of the matter asserted. . . Consequently, we cannot look to the Shansky reports as evidence for the truth of what happened to other inmates. Moreover, even were the Shansky reports fully admissible for the truth of the matter asserted (a finding we do not make here), they still do not adequately support a claim for Monell liability. True, the Shansky reports portray the MCJ as persistently struggling to maintain adequate medical staffing levels and appropriately respond to inmate sick call slips. Yet the Shansky reports do not connect this purported municipal practice to any inmate injury. The Shansky reports document three deaths between May 2016 and November 2016. Although Shansky notes inadequate medical staffing levels during this period, he does not attribute any of these deaths, or any serious medical injury, to problems with medical staffing or sick call slip processing."); Daniel v. Cook County, 833 F.3d 728, 730, 742-43 (7th Cir. 2016) ("In this appeal we address a specific piece of evidence that has divided the judges of the Northern District of Illinois. In a number of cases, including this one, plaintiffs have asserted that medical care at the Cook County Jail falls below constitutional standards as a matter of official policy, custom, or practice. The evidence question is whether such plaintiffs may use as evidence the 2008 findings from a U.S. Department of Justice investigation of health care at the Jail. The investigation found systemic flaws in the Jail's scheduling, record-keeping, and grievance procedures that produced health care below the minimal requirements of the United States Constitution. If those findings are admissible for the truth of the matters asserted, they go a long way toward meeting a plaintiff's burden of proving an unconstitutional custom, policy, or practice under Monell v. Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658, 694–95 (1978). The Department of Justice Report is hearsay if used to assert the truth of its contents, and the district court held that the Report was not admissible to prove the truth of its findings. But we conclude it should be admitted under the hearsay exception for civil cases in Federal Rule of Evidence 803(8)(A)(iii) for factual findings from legally authorized investigations. The district court granted summary judgment for defendants because the plaintiff had not offered evidence of an unconstitutional official custom, policy, or practice. We determine that he has offered sufficient evidence on summary judgment, and we therefore reverse and remand. . . . There is a close fit between the factual and legal issues in a Monell claim based on a jail or prison's health care failings and this Report. As noted above, a plaintiff cannot ultimately prove a Monell claim at trial based on only his own case or even a handful of others. He must show systemic failings that reflect official deliberate indifference to the serious health needs of inmates. That is intended to be a demanding standard, and it is difficult, time-consuming, and expensive for most private plaintiffs to meet. Yet such systemic failings are exactly what the Department of Justice experts were looking for and found in Cook County. Compared to other forms of evidence of the overall quality of the jail's health care system, the Department of Justice Report seems likely to deserve considerable weight. The Report is not conclusive, of course. The defendants are entitled to a full opportunity to rebut it. But in litigating the constitutional adequacy of the Jail's health care, this Report would seem to provide a thorough and reasonably trustworthy starting point. It would be difficult to replicate through ordinary processes of litigating individual private cases. There may be individual circumstances that might justify exclusion of the Report, perhaps because it is no longer sufficiently timely or does not fit sufficiently well the issues in a particular case. But the general presumption of admissibility in the text of Rule 803(8) has considerable force. . . . Accordingly, the Department of Justice Report should be admitted for the truth of its substance under Rule 803(8). The 2010 Agreed Order and Shansky Report are inadmissible hearsay to the extent they are offered to prove the truth of the statements they contain, but they may be admissible to show that the defendants were on notice of their contents, or perhaps for other purposes."); Blair v. City of Pomona, 223 F.3d 1074, 1081 (9th Cir. 2000) ("The thorough examination of police practices in Los Angeles after the beating of Rodney King by uniformed police officers described the officers' 'code of silence' as consisting in a single rule: 'an officer does not provide adverse information against a fellow officer.' Report of the Independent Commission on the Los Angeles Police Department 168 (1991) (the Christopher Commission Report). According to the Christopher Commission, all police officers adhere to this rule, even good ones. It is a formidable barrier to the investigation of complaints about the police. . . The Commission cited instances where officers were officially punished for breaking the code. . . We take judicial notice of the report."); Montiel v. City of Los Angeles, 2 F.3d 335, 341 (9th Cir. 1993) ("The district court should have presumed the Christopher Commission Report was trustworthy and, . . . shifted the burden of establishing its untrustworthiness to the City."); Fabian v. City of New York, No. 16-CV-5296-GHW, 2018 WL 2138619, at *7-10 (S.D.N.Y. May 9, 2018) ("The Second Circuit has yet to address the question of whether the 2015 OIG [Office of the Inspector General] Report by itself is sufficient evidence of a failure to train under Monell. Although courts in this district have evaluated arguments premised on this report in connection with Monell claims, most have done so at the pleading stage. . . While the parties dispute whether this case should be controlled by Marlin, which found that allegations based on the OIG Report were sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss, or Boddie, which concluded otherwise, the issue at this stage of litigation is not whether the OIG Report pleads sufficient facts to allow the case to move forward. The question is instead whether the report by itself provides sufficient evidence to demonstrate a dispute of material fact that should be decided by a jury. The Court concludes that on this record, the report is insufficient to create a genuine dispute of material fact in connection with Plaintiffs' Monell claim. Assuming for purposes of this motion that the 207 substantiated allegations of excessive force provided the City with notice of excessive force within the NYPD, the report does not establish that the City was deliberately indifferent to any related training deficiencies. Quite the opposite—the report suggests that any deficiencies were not 'so obvious' or 'so likely to result in a deprivation of federal rights' that the City's failure to correct the deficiencies could constitute deliberate indifference. . .

The report's introduction describes the total number of substantiated force allegations, 207, as 'a notably modest number, given the size of the NYPD, and a positive indication of the NYPD's restraint.'. . The report also explains that the total number of substantiated allegations represents a mere two percent of the approximately 10,000 complaints of force lodged with the CCRB between 2010 and 2014. . . Thus, the number of substantiated uses of unlawful force during those years was very small relative to the size of the police force and the number of unsubstantiated complaints. At the time of the alleged use of force here, this report had not been published. Therefore, the report itself is not evidence that any link suggested by the report between the small number of substantiated complaints and the deficient training programs was obvious to the City when, or before, Plaintiffs were pulled over and removed from their truck. Even if the City had been on notice of the deficient use-of-force training program and the deficiency's likelihood to lead to unlawful use of force, summary judgment is still appropriate because Plaintiffs point to no evidence of the causal link between that deficient training and the violations alleged here. . . In both their complaint and their opposition, Plaintiffs state in conclusory fashion that the City's failure to train directly and proximately caused the alleged excessive force used against them. . . However, they point to no record evidence in support of causation. Therefore, to conclude that the OIG Report creates a genuine dispute of fact, the Court must make the inferential leap that, but for the City's failure to properly train its police officers, the alleged constitutional violations would have not occurred. At this stage, the Court must draw all reasonable inferences in favor of Plaintiffs as the non-moving party. . . However, based on its own review of the record, the Court is unwilling to make the unreasonable jump required to find evidence of causation. . . . Plaintiffs simply have not developed evidence of the causal connection between any deliberate indifference by the City from 2010 to 2014 and the incidents that occurred here. . . .Were liability to be imposed on the City on the sole basis of a report prepared by a municipal agency—and in this case, a report that was commissioned in an effort to improve policing—any plaintiff with a claim arising during or after the period covered by the report could prove municipal liability. Agencies would be discouraged from self-evaluation and proactive improvement programs, and the end result would be the very thing that Section 1983 plaintiffs seek to curb, the City's asserted failure to autocorrect. More than this internal report card is needed to hold the City liable here."); Simpson v. Ferry, 202 F.Supp.3d 444, 451 (E.D. Pa. 2016) ("Ultimately, the applicability of the DOJ Report with respect to assessing the plausibility of a Monell claim appears to call for a fact-intensive inquiry based upon the unique circumstances presented in each case. As multiple other courts have recognized, certain findings and conclusions within the Report appear to contemplate all use of force concepts and training initiatives within the PPD, not just lethal force. Given this scope of the DOJ Report, the weight of authority cited above, and the additional reasons supporting consideration of the Report (discussed supra), I will consider those limited portions of the DOJ Report to which Plaintiff expressly cites in his Second Amended Complaint, and which pertain to excessive force. . . . The alleged misconduct at issue in the case before me, and the municipal custom for which Plaintiff seeks to impose liability upon the City, turns exclusively on whether or not the Defendant officers used excessive force—not lethal force. Therefore, in assessing the plausibility of Plaintiff's Monell claim, I will disregard those portions of the DOJ Report and Second Amended Complaint that specifically address shootings by PPD officers."); Pipitone v. City of New York, 57 F. Supp. 3d 173, 191, 193-94 (E.D.N.Y. 2014) ("Here, the Mollen Report provides powerful evidence that there was a custom and practice within the police department of tolerating corruption to avoid bad publicity. It characterizes this custom as persistent, widespread, and emanating 'from top commanders, including the police commissioner.'. . The Mollen Report thus provides evidence that is sufficient to allow a jury to conclude that the supervisory and disciplinary failures described therein constituted a municipal policy for Monell purposes and that the City's handling of the Eppolito matter was reflective of that policy. . . . The Mollen Commission report provides an additional basis to find deliberate indifference at the highest levels of the NYPD. It describes a conscious desire among the 'top brass' of the NYPD, including Commissioner Ward, to avoid disclosing corruption or disciplining corrupt officers in order to protect the NYPD's reputation. Based on the report, a jury could reasonably conclude that Ward and other high-level officials were deliberately indifferent to this widespread and persistent practice of tolerating police corruption. In sum, the flawed 1985 disciplinary process and the attitudes and practices described in the Mollen Commission report provide separate grounds upon which a jury might find deliberate indifference. They also reinforce each other. The failure to discipline Eppolito in 1985 can be viewed as evidence of the systemic failure to address corruption that was described in the Mollen Report. And in turn, the Mollen Report suggests a motive for why Ward failed to take action against Eppolito in 1985—his desire to avoid bad press—and thus might also be viewed as evidence of deliberate indifference with respect to that specific disciplinary decision."); Pelzer v. City of Philadelphia, No. 07-38, 2009 WL 2776493, at *14 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 31, 2009) ("The plaintiff has produced evidence highlighting problems with the Academy training program. The IAO [Integrity and Accountability Office] report clearly states that the current training system was inadequate at best. Ceisler, IAO Report at 61. A more negative assessment characterizes the training program as offering 'virtually no training in foot pursuits.' Id. at 62. More concrete examples of officer decision-making are evident in the report. While gathering the data and facts for her report, Judge Ceisler [former director of IAO] spoke with Philadelphia police officers and commanders and presented them with certain case studies where officers engaged in pursuit and made decision ultimately increasing the otherwise preventable risks of death or serious bodily injury. Id. at 61. When she asked these individuals what they thought of the case study officer's decisions, many of them approved of the officer's tactics, which violated basic safety principles. Id. As a result, the report suggests that 'officers and supervisors are not adequately trained or given clear direction on the appropriate response to situations.' Id. A reasonable jury could conclude the City ignored a serious and apparent risk resulting from a failure to institute policies addressing deficiencies in existing practices. As the IAO report stated, 'In several cases, where suspects were killed and officers were seriously wounded, the officers took these questionable actions in situations where no crimes had been committed, where no innocent persons were in danger, or where officers had no legal basis for initiating a search or arrest in the first place.' Id. at 60. This suggests that even assuming the current use-of-force training is sufficient, it has not been enough to prevent the initial tactical decisions that later placed the officers in situations unnecessarily increasing the danger to all parties. . .Though this evidence falls short of indicating a pattern of constitutional violations, a reasonable jury could find there was a known need for a new policy to counter the emotion-driven aspects of a pursuit, especially when an officer's decisions can directly increase or decrease the threat of imminent death or serious bodily injury."); Rodriguez v. California Highway Patrol, 89 F. Supp.2d 1131, 1144 (N.D. Cal. 2000) ("Defendants also move to strike references to the report issued by California's Joint Legislative Task Force on Government Oversight on September 29, 1999, regarding alleged racial profiling in Operation Pipeline. Defendants argue that the Task Force report does not relate to this case. However, the Task Force report discusses in detail alleged racial profiling by Defendants and forms part of the factual predicate for Plaintiffs' claim that racial profiling is present here."); Yanez v. City of New York, 29 F. Supp.2d 100, 112 & n.6 (E.D.N.Y. 1998) ("Here, the connection between the Mollen Commission's findings, and the events in the instant case are too remote for me to allow these Monell claims to proceed. Yanez tries to use the Mollen report to bolster his Monell claims that there was a constructive acquiescence by defendants' superiors to a 'custom' of allowing lower level officers to hide all of their colleagues wrongs. However, plaintiff has not adequately explained the connection between the alleged plot among these police officers and the 'blue wall of silence' described in the Mollen report. While the Mollen Commission found that there was a practice of officers defending each other against charges of corruption, the link in this instance is tenuous at best. If plaintiff's argument is believed, then I would have to equate the serious, criminal behavior described in the Mollen Report, such as retaliation against officers who reported bribe taking, with the behavior of these officers. Taken to its logical conclusion, plaintiff's argument would allow use of the Mollen report to defeat summary judgment in almost any claim of police wrongdoing involving more than one officer. Based upon the record before me, the Monell claims cannot proceed with only the Mollen report as evidence of practice or custom by the NYPD of allowing these wrongful acts. . . . Even if I allowed the Monell claims to continue, plaintiff would be unable to prove these claims at trial, since the Mollen report would probably be inadmissible evidence. See, e.g., Jackson v. City of New York, 93-CV-174, slip op., (E.D.N.Y. Apr. 24, 1996)(rejecting admission of the Mollen report at trial for the purpose of proving Monell claims.)."); Domenech v. City of New York, 919 F. Supp. 702, 711 (S.D.N.Y. 1996) ("The Mollen Commission Report did indeed find a culture of retaliation against those reporting criminal corruption within the NYPD, and some testimony was presented to suggest the existence of a "Blue Wall of Silence" within the Department. Even construing the Mollen Commission Report in its most favorable light, however, no reasonable finder of fact could deem it to demonstrate a culture of retaliation for non-criminal activity such as discrimination complaints so pervasive as to constitute a custom or usage amounting to tacit NYPD policy."); Ariza v. City of New York, No. CV-93-5287 (CPS), 1996 WL 118535, *5 (E.D.N.Y. March 7, 1996) (not reported) ("The municipal defendants attempt to distinguish the evidence contained within the Mollen Commission report by arguing that the report does not suggest that the code of silence exists to repress officers from exercising their first amendment rights to speak out against the preferential treatment afforded some religious or ethnic groups at the expense of others. [footnote omitted] The defendants concede, however, that the code exists to prevent other officers from reporting corruption or dishonesty by fellow officers. Regardless of how the municipal defendants wish to construe the instant alleged action, the inference that such a practice, if true, is both dishonest and violative of 'official' police policy cannot be avoided. The principle behind the 'blue wall of silence' is that officers will suffer recrimination for breaking ranks and subjecting police conduct to public scrutiny. That is exactly the scenario plaintiff alleges here, and he has produced enough evidence such that summary judgment for the defendants is not appropriate."); Britton v. Maloney, 901 F. Supp. 444, 452 (D. Mass. 1995) ("Plaintiffs have not simply imagined that there might be systematically flawed policies and customs behind the incidents of which they complain. Their allegations of unconstitutional policies are based largely on the conclusions of the so-called "St. Clair Report", an independent review of the Boston Police Department conducted at the request of Mayor Flynn. In addition, plaintiffs cite to numerous newspaper articles which suggest other, similar, incidents of misconduct by members of the DCU, and to a list of allegations made to the Massachusetts Attorney General's office concerning allegedly unlawful searches conducted by the Boston Police Department. Although neither the report nor the newspapers articles nor the allegations made to the Attorney General are admissible evidence in this case, they do indicate that plaintiffs' allegations are more than speculative fantasies.").

See also Shaw v. City of New York, No. 95 CIV. 9325 AJP, 1997 WL 187352, 7-10 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 15, 1997) (not reported) (collecting cases on admissibility of Mollen Commission Report).

In Berry v. City of Detroit, 25 F.3d 1342 (6th Cir. 1994), the court of appeals reversed a jury verdict against the City, and criticized, at great length and in great detail, the use of expert testimony in that case on the matter of deliberate indifference in failing to discipline police officers. The court concluded:

> Plaintiff's evidence was insufficient to enable a reasonable juror to conclude that the City was deliberately indifferent to the rights of its inhabitants. Finally, the jury never found that the alleged failure to discipline properly constituted 'deliberate indifference.' They never reached this conclusion because they never were asked this question. The only question on the verdict form relating to discipline reads as follows:
>
> V.
>
> We, the jury, on the § 1983 federal Civil Rights claim against the City of Detroit for failing to adequately discipline its police officers for the improper use of deadly force find for:
>
> X The Estate of Lee Floyd Berry, Jr.
>
> _____ City of Detroit
>
> Nowhere did the jury conclude in its answers to the verdict form's written interrogatories that the failure to discipline constituted 'deliberate indifference.' Nor was the question of proximate cause put to the jury in any of the verdict form questions. All of this amplifies the error in allowing plaintiff's expert to testify that the failure to discipline constituted 'deliberate indifference.'

25 F.3d at 1355. Accord Bradley v. City of Ferndale, 148 F. App'x 499, 04-1474, 2005 WL 2173780, at *6 (6th Cir. Sept. 8, 2005) ("It is the responsibility of the court, not testifying witnesses, to define legal terms.' . . Therefore, while the expert may give his opinion as to whether the defendant's actions complied with Ferndale's internal procedures, he may not testify that the violations of these policies proved that the defendants acted with deliberate indifference to Bradley's suicidal tendencies."); West by and through Norris v. Waymire, 114 F.3d 646, 652 (7th Cir. 1997) ("The affidavit of the plaintiff's expert, a professor of criminal justice, while admissible to show that the Town had been negligent in its supervision of Waymire, was not admissible to show that this negligence constituted a municipal policy of refusing to protect teenage girls from the sexual depredations of the Town's police officers − a legal conclusion that an expert witness is not allowed to draw, . . . and an erroneous legal conclusion to boot, as well as (maybe because) one that exceeded the expert's professional competence, which was limited to describing sound professional standards and identifying departures from them.").

See also United States v. Brown, 871 F.3d 532, 537-39 (7th Cir. 2017) ("[W]e reasoned in Thompson v. City of Chicago that a police officer's violation of departmental policy is 'completely immaterial [on] the question ... whether a violation of the federal constitution has been established.'. . . Thompson involved an excessive-force claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, the civil analogue of § 242. We affirmed the district court's exclusion of the Chicago Police Department's use-of-force orders. . . We also affirmed the court's exclusion of expert testimony from a police sergeant who would have offered an opinion about the reasonableness of the officer's conduct based in part on the use-of-force orders. . . Despite its strong language, Thompson should not be understood as establishing a rule that evidence of police policy or procedure will never be relevant to the objective-reasonableness inquiry. We recently clarified that expert testimony concerning police policy is not categorically barred. . . Even though jurors can understand the concept of reasonableness, in some cases they may not fully grasp particular techniques or equipment used by police officers in the field. In those instances an expert's specialized knowledge can 'help the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue,' as Rule 702 requires. FED. R. EVID. 702(a). Expert testimony of this type may be relevant in cases where specialized knowledge of law-enforcement custom or training would assist the jury in understanding the facts or resolving the contested issue. For example, if it's standard practice across the country to train officers to handle a given situation in a particular way, expert testimony about that training might aid a jury tasked with evaluating the conduct of an officer in that specific situation. The legal standard contemplates a reasonable officer, not a reasonable person, so it may be useful in a particular case to know how officers typically act in like cases. . . Evidence of purely localized police procedure is less likely to be helpful than nationally or widely used policy. The jury's task is to determine how a reasonable officer would act in the circumstances, not how an officer in a particular local police department would act. The level of factual complexity in the case may also bear on the relevance of expert testimony about police practices or protocols. In many cases evaluating an officer's conduct will draw primarily on the jury's collective common sense. The everyday experience of lay jurors fully equips them to answer the reasonableness question when a case involves 'facts that people of common understanding can easily comprehend.'. . The jury's common experience will suffice, for example, when 'police use[ ] their bare hands in making an arrest, the most primitive form of force.'. . But when 'some-thing peculiar about law enforcement (e.g., the tools they use or the circumstances they face) informs the issues to be decided by the finder of fact,' a juror's everyday experience may not be enough to effectively assess reasonableness. . . If a case involves 'a gun, a slapjack, mace, or some other tool, ... the jury may start to ask itself: what is mace? what is an officer's training on using a gun? how much damage can a slapjack do?'. . . Importantly, a per se rule against expert testimony about police policy or procedure is particularly inappropriate in criminal cases. Brown stood accused of violating § 242, which penalizes the willful deprivation of another's federal right under color of law. The statute codifies a specific-intent crime; though the officer need not 'have been thinking in constitutional terms,' he can be convicted under § 242 only if he 'is aware that what he does is precisely that which the statute forbids.'. . It might be less likely that an officer knew that his actions would deprive another of a federal right if those actions fell entirely within widely used standardized training or practice. . . . Though it's not correct to read Thompson as establishing a per se rule of exclusion, the judge appropriately exercised her discretion in excluding the expert's testimony here. To repeat, the judge receives 'special deference' in making these determinations, and her decision will be upheld unless 'no reasonable person could take [her] view' of the matter. . . That deference is more than enough to carry the day. This case provides a textbook example of easily comprehensible facts. Brown was indicted for punching and kicking Howard. He didn't use a sophisticated tool or technique; he hit a motionless man in the face with his fist and continued to beat and kick him before placing him under arrest. An expert's explanation of the Chicago Police Department's Use of Force Model would have added nothing that the jurors could not ascertain on their own by viewing the surveillance videotape and applying their everyday experience and common sense. And as the district judge concluded, the admission of Farrell's testimony may have induced the jurors to defer to his conclusion rather than drawing their own. . . Accordingly, the judge did not abuse her discretion in excluding Farrell's expert testimony about departmental use-of-force standards."); Parker v. Gerrish, 547 F.3d 1, 9 (1st Cir. 2008) ("The use of expert testimony is permissible in assisting the jury in evaluating claims of excessive force. . . . Here, the facts and circumstances identified in Jennings and Graham support the jury's conclusion that Gerrish's use of the Taser was not reasonable under the circumstances. First, the seriousness of the offense weighs in favor of Parker. Though driving while intoxicated is a serious offense, it does not present a risk of danger to the arresting officer that is presented when an officer confronts a suspect engaged in an offense like robbery or assault. . . . .As to the second Graham factor, the jury could reasonably have concluded that Parker did not pose an immediate threat to the safety of the officers. . . . Finally, as explained above, a jury could have found that Parker was not actively resisting or attempting to flee."); Thomas v. City of Chattanooga, 398 F.3d 426, 431, 432 (6th Cir. 2005) ("The Supreme Court has held that the principles articulated in Daubert . . . apply to 'all expert testimony,' although the lower courts have flexibility in the application of the factors, because it may not make sense to apply some of the Daubert factors, such as the rate of error analysis, to non-scientific testimony. . . In this case, appellants believe that because we are dealing with non-scientific testimony, Davidson may rely solely on his experience to explain the conclusion he drew from the number of complaints filed against the Police Department, rather than having to explain to the court why and how he came to those conclusions. An expert may certainly rely on his experience in making conclusions, particularly in this context where an expert is asked to opine about police behavior. . . We need not doubt whether Davidson is qualified to assess police operations. Indeed, Davidson's curriculum vitae suggests that his long career in the fields of criminal justice, the law, and education have all related to police training and operations. However, being an expert does not lessen the burden one has in rebutting a motion for summary judgment. . . . [I]n this case, because Davidson's affidavits provide no rationale for his conclusions, appellants are asking that we take their expert's 'word for it.' We cannot. Davidson himself stated that 'there's no bright line or rule' regarding how many complaints would be excessive, suggesting that an expert would need to conduct a more qualitative analysis. However, Davidson did not conduct such an analysis, and instead, in his deposition he merely mentioned a few cases where the courts have let the jury determine whether the municipality had an unwritten illegal policy. Even then, Davidson offered no qualitative analysis of those cases and how they were similar to the present case. Therefore, Davidson's conclusion, that the Police Department must have an unwritten policy of condoning excessive force because of the mere number of complaints previously filed against it, is insufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact on which a jury could reasonably find that such a policy exists."); Johnson v. Hawe, 388 F.3d 676, 686 (9th Cir. 2004) (amended opinion on denial of reh'g) ("The district court rejected Johnson's municipal liability claim under Monell. . .on the basis that Johnson 'had set forth no evidence to support the establishment of a policy or custom' which the Chief followed in arresting Johnson. This ruling is incorrect because Johnson submitted the declaration of law enforcement expert Alan H. Baxter. Baxter opined that the Sequim Police Department's 'self-training' program, which assigned responsibility to the individual officer for keeping abreast of recent court decisions involving law enforcement, amounted to a 'failure to train' Sequim police officers about enforcement of suspected violations of the Privacy Act. . . . In light of the many Washington cases addressing enforcement of the Privacy Act by public officers performing official duties, Johnson's evidence creates at least a genuine issue as to whether 'self-training' in this context amounted to deliberate indifference."); Garrett v. Athens-Clarke County, 378 F.3d 1274, 1279,1280(11th Cir. 2004) ("Plaintiff first argues that fettering Irby was excessive force because the fettering posed a high potential of death, but plaintiff does not point us to competent evidentiary support for that argument. And in our review of the expert medical testimony in this case, we have found no statement quantifying − or even attempting to quantify − the risk of death posed by fettering. No competent evidence in this case supports the view that death or serious injury is a likely consequence of fettering a person as Irby was fettered. . . . Plaintiff does offer expert police testimony and additional materials in an effort to show that a reasonable officer would have known that fettering has a high risk of death for certain persons. But that evidence presumes that fettering is a dangerous practice: that evidence does not − and cannot − establish that fettering in fact poses a high potential for death or serious bodily injury. Unlike the risk of death from firearms, the risk associated with fettering is not of such common knowledge that we could notice − without expert medical testimony − that fettering does indeed pose a high risk of death. Without expert medical testimony quantifying to some degree the risk of death or serious bodily injury, plaintiff cannot establish that fettering under the circumstances in this case posed a high risk of death. Therefore, we conclude that plaintiff's first argument on excessive force fails for lack of sufficient evidence.' (footnotes omitted)); Carr v. Castle, 337 F.3d 1221, 1230 (10th Cir. 2003) ("Carr's expert Dr. George Kirkham ("Kirkham") concluded that 'prudent well-trained officers would have realized that Mr. Carr was an emotionally disturbed person, and thus should be approached in as cautious and non-confrontational manner as possible. Instead Officers Bowen and Castle closed the distance between themselves and Mr. Carr, with weapons drawn and shouting commands at him.' But the fact that someone with the opportunity to prepare an expert report at leisure opines that well-trained officers would have performed differently under pressure does not rise to the legal standard of deliberate indifference on the part of the City, for Carr fails to point to any evidence placing the City on actual or constructive notice that the asserted failures to train were substantially certain to result in a constitutional violation."); Boncher v. Brown County, 272 F.3d 484, 486, 487 (7th Cir. 2001) ("The risk is claimed to have been particularly acute here because there had been five suicides in the Brown County jail in the five years preceding Boncher's suicide. According to the plaintiffs' expert, Lindsay Hayes, a criminologist who specializes in the study of jail suicide, this number of suicides was unusually high. He is a reputable criminologist, but in this case, as in two others we've discovered . . . his evidence was useless and should have been excluded under the Daubert standard. . . It is not the number of suicides that is a meaningful index of suicide risk and therefore of governmental responsibility, . . . but the suicide rate, . . . and it is not even the rate by itself, but rather the rate relative to the 'background' suicide rate in the relevant free population (the population of the area from which the jail draws its inmates) and to the rate in other jails. No evidence was presented that would have enabled an estimate of any of these rates − not even the population of Brown County was put into the record. Hayes admitted at his deposition that he had neither conducted nor consulted any studies that would have enabled him to compare the Brown County jail suicide rate with that of the free population in the county or that of other jails."); Conner v. Travis County, 209 F.3d 794, 798 (5th Cir. 2000) ("[T]he Conners' showing of a need to train was premised on the testimony of their expert witness, who claimed, without citing underlying data, that detainees with stroke symptoms would present themselves so frequently that County staff should be trained to recognize them. By itself this is unpersuasive. We have previously noted that plaintiffs generally cannot show deliberate indifference through the opinion of only a single expert . . . ."); Snyder v. Trepagnier, 142 F.3d 791, 799 (5th Cir. 1998) ("[W]e have emphasized that, when seeking to prove a municipality's malevolent motive, plaintiffs must introduce more evidence than merely the opinion of an expert witness."), cert. dism'd, 119 S. Ct. 1493 (1999); Trent v. Hawkins County, 1997 WL 35574, No. 96-5025, at *4 (6th Cir. Jan. 29, 1997) (unpublished), where the court made the following observations:

> Dr. Kirkham does not explain the basis for his conclusion that a lack of acceptable training was the proximate cause of the officers' 'reckless' conduct, however, and his affidavit fails to demonstrate that a need for better training was so obvious, and the inadequacy of the training received by the officers so likely to result in violations of constitutional rights, that the policymakers of Hawkins County could reasonably be said to have been 'deliberately indifferent' to the need. * * * * From the vantage point of the policymakers, the somewhat rudimentary tutelage that Sgt.

> Depew and other alumni of the Tennessee Law Enforcement Academy received in 'Handling Abnormal People' did not appear to have caused any difficulty in the past. It is undisputed that every month the Sheriff's Department performed 'many' emergency committals of persons suspected of being mentally ill − yet never before had a serious problem arisen. And so lacking in 'obviousness' was the need for more intensive training that no such training was required by Tennessee law, nor was it offered by the state law enforcement academy. If, under the facts presented here, a jury could be allowed to find the policymakers guilty of 'deliberate indifference' on the strength of Dr. Kirkham's affidavit, virtually any perceived deficiency in training could result in liability in virtually any excessive-use-of-force case, it seems to us. Such a broadening of governmental liability would clearly be inconsistent with the Supreme Court's opinion in City of Canton.

See also Lee v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville and Davidson County, 596 F.Supp.2d 1101, 1119-20 (M.D. Tenn. 2009), aff'd in part on other grounds, 432 F. App'x 435 (6th Cir. 2011) ("The Sixth Circuit has explored the standards that the district courts should use in evaluating whether so-called 'police practices' experts should be allowed to testify at trial. . . In Champion, in discussing experts who opine on police practices and procedures, the Sixth Circuit clarified Berry, noting that, if the proffered expert had 'specialized knowledge' and 'specific expertise about police activities' with 'experience on the subject of criminology or police actions' such that the proffered expert could opine on 'discrete aspect[s] of police practices [such as] excessive force, based on particularized knowledge about the area,' then the testimony would likely be permissible, particularly if it was supported by strong experiential or educational credentials. . . In sum, the court stated that 'the proper actions of individual officers in one discrete situation' is an appropriate field for expert testimony, so long as the expert has sufficient credentials and the testimony will assist the trier of fact."); Hutchison v. Cutliffe, 2004 WL 5524566, at *2-3 (D. Me. 2004) ("Reiter is clearly highly qualified to hold opinions about police use of force and his expert report contains information about police practices and procedures, including the'so-called' use of force/control/subject resistance matrix, continuum or graphic' that involves the type of specialized knowledge one attributes to an 'expert.' It seems to me that the dispute in this case centers on the question of whether Reiter's testimony is such as will assist the trier of fact in understanding or determining a fact in issue. Specifically, the trier of fact must determine if Cutliffe's use of force was reasonable under the totality of the circumstances test of Graham v. Connor, . . . the Supreme Court case that will ultimately guide the court's legal instructions to the jury. In this case, the jury's factual determination of reasonableness is further complicated by the court's own analysis of qualified immunity that will involve a similar, but different test of reasonableness applied to the same set of facts as determined by the jury. . . Clearly the jury's primary role in this case will be to determine what happened behind the closed door. Once those facts are established, if the court determines Cutliffe is not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law, then the jury's factual assessment of the reasonableness of the degree of force becomes the ultimate issue in the case. That being said, it seems to me that Reiter's testimony could provide some admissible assistance in determining the subsidiary facts that will ultimately guide the resolution of this case. I agree with Cutliffe's argument that Reiter should not be allowed to opine about the ultimate reasonableness of the degree of force applied. This is so not because the reasonableness of the degree of force is the ultimate factual determination in the case, but because, as Cutliffe says, 'once a jury decides which set of facts it believes, it will be within their ability as lay persons to decide whether the use of force was reasonable or not.' . . . In the present case, where the facts are very much disputed, an expert's opinion and knowledge could conceivably help the jury determine the underlying facts, even though it would not aid the jury's understanding of the ultimate fact. Hutchison cites four areas where he contends Reiter's testimony could aid the jury. . . . I believe all four of these areas could conceivably provide the jury with information that would assist them in determining which version of events was more likely true than not. For that reason Reiter should not be precluded from testifying, although his proffered testimony about the 'reasonableness' of Cutliffe's actions should be excluded because his opinion on that score depends upon nothing more than a regurgitation of Hutchison's version of the events and his personal conclusion about the reasonableness of Cutliffe's responses.").

See also Estate of Brown v. Thomas, 771 F.3d 1001, 1005-06 (7th Cir. 2014) ("[Expert] Gaut's report severely criticizing the County's search policy might, if admissible (compare Florek v. Village of Mundelein, 649 F.3d 594, 601–03 (7th Cir.2011)), entitle the estate to a trial, were it not for a fatal procedural error by its lawyer: failing to authenticate Gaut's expert report. It was filed with the district court but could not be admitted into evidence without an affidavit attesting to its truthfulness. Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(e)(3); Fed.R.Evid. 901(a); Scott v. Edinburg, 346 F.3d 752, 759–60 and n. 7 (7th Cir.2003). There was no affidavit. Nor did the plaintiff's lawyer cite Gaut's report in opposing the defendants' motion for summary judgment. On appeal he made the convoluted argument that it was the defendants' burden to depose Gaut and that having failed to do that they admitted that everything in his report was true. Not so. Deposing a witness is optional. Anyway the report could not be used to oppose summary judgment because it was inadmissible. Without the report there is insufficient evidence to justify imposing liability on the County.").

D. Liability Based on Conduct of Policymaking Officials Attributed to Governmental Entity

Under Monell, government liability attaches when the constitutional injury results from the implementation or "execution of a government's policy or custom, whether made by its lawmakers or by those whose edicts or acts may fairly be said to represent official policy . . . ." 436 U.S. at 694 (emphasis added).

Since Monell, the Court has struggled with the questions left open by that decision. In subsequent cases, there have been attempts to provide clarification on the important issues of (1) whose "edicts or acts," beyond those of the official lawmakers, may be attributed to the government, and (2) which "edicts or acts" will constitute "policy."

1. In Pembaur v. City of Cincinnati, 475 U.S. 469 (1986), a majority of the Court held that a single decision by an official with policymaking authority in a given area could constitute official policy and be attributed to the government itself under certain circumstances. Thus, in Pembaur, the County could be held liable for a single decision by a County prosecutor which authorized an unconstitutional entry into the plaintiff's clinic. See, e.g., Hampton Co. Nat. Sur., LLC v. Tunica County, Miss., 543 F.3d 221, 227 (5th Cir. 2008) ("As to this Sheriff's policy role in the liability analysis, this Circuit has already held 'Sheriffs in Mississippi are final policymakers with respect to all law enforcement decisions made within their counties.' . . Determining which bonding companies were authorized to write bonds at the Tunica County jail logically is part of that law enforcement authority. The Sheriff's decision to deny the Plaintiffs the right to issue bonds is the kind of single decision by the relevant policymaker that can be the basis of liability."); Welch v. Ciampa, 542 F.3d 927, 942 (1st Cir. 2008) ("We are bound by Pembaur and conclude that a single decision by a final policymaker can result in municipal liability. Here, the parties agree that Ciampa, as Chief of Police, is the final policymaking official with respect to the reappointment of specialists. Accepting the parties' representations as true, liability can be imposed on the Town for Ciampa's decision not to reappoint Welch if that decision violated Welch's constitutional rights. Hence, summary judgment for the Town must be reversed."); Bruce v. Beary, 498 F.3d 1232, 1249 (11th Cir. 2007) ("With respect to the failure to return Bruce's property to him after appeal, despite the state court order to do so, we emphasize that even a single decision by its policymaker may subject the county to liability for a constitutional violation. . . As the final decision-maker in the Sheriff's Department, . . . the Sheriff had the responsibility to see that Bruce's property was returned − all of it. As such, the district court erroneously held that Bruce is required to demonstrate that the Sheriff had some policy of retention in order to establish a constitutional violation.").; Brooks v. Rothe, 2007 WL 3203761, at *7 (E.D. Mich. Oct. 31, 2007) ("Here, the uncontested facts show that final decision makers, the chief of police and the county prosecutor, Defendants Bodis and Gaertner, reached a decision and then directed its execution. Based on the police report, Defendant Bodis consulted with Defendant Gaertner, who advised that Defendant Rothe enter the shelter and arrest Plaintiff. Consequently, under Pembaur, Defendants city and county can be held liable for the consequences of their decision makers' directive. Thus, the claim against Defendant city and Defendant county remains.").

But see Stockley v. Joyce, 963 F.3d 809, 823-24 (8th Cir. 2020) ("[W]e did not reach the question of whether Joyce's charging decision resulted in a constitutional deprivation because we determined that she was absolutely immune for such conduct. Because 'the absolute immunity of its policymakers does not shield a city from liability for its policies[,]'. . we must now decide whether Joyce's decision to terminate the FIU investigation and charge Stockley constitutes municipal policy. A municipality may be subject to § 1983 liability if an 'action pursuant to official municipal policy of some nature caused a constitutional tort.'. . 'Although a single unconstitutional act may not always suffice to support a claim of municipal liability, an unconstitutional governmental policy could be inferred from a single decision taken by the highest officials responsible for setting policy in that area of the government's business.'. . A policy is 'a deliberate choice to follow a course of action [ ] made from among various alternatives by the official or officials responsible for establishing final policy with respect to the subject matter in question.'. . This Court has a held that a policy is 'a deliberate choice of a guiding principle or procedure made by the municipal official who has final authority regarding such matters.'. . Here, Stockley alleges Joyce implemented a policy of terminating a legitimate investigation to cover up her own misrepresentation about Stockley's guilt and to charge him with first-degree murder. However, Joyce's decision to terminate the FIU investigation and charge Stockley was not a 'guiding principle or procedure.' Instead, it was an individual charging decision based upon a particular set of facts supported by arguable probable cause. . . Thus, this conduct does not constitute municipal policy. . . Accordingly, we conclude the district court properly dismissed the Monell claim against the City."); J.H. v. Williamson County, Tennessee, 951 F.3d 709, 721-22 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Williamson County does not contend that it is eligible for judicial or quasi-judicial immunity—rather, it correctly argues that no basis for municipal liability remains after the court order on December 9, 2013, because Judge Guffee is not a policymaker whose decisions can create municipal liability. This conforms with our precedent. We have held that the 'alleged unconstitutional actions taken by a juvenile court judge are not "policies" of the county for which liability could attach under Monell'; instead, Judge Guffee's order that J.H. remain in segregation was a 'judicial decision[ ]' that was only 'reviewable on appeal to the Tennessee appellate courts.'. . Nor could Adgent's or McMahan's adherence to that order create municipal liability because neither retained final policymaking authority regarding whether to segregate J.H. after the order was issued. . . We therefore affirm the district court on this claim."); Teesdale v. City of Chicago, 690 F.3d 829, 833-37 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Despite the complicated factual and procedural background, the issue before us on appeal is simple: Does the City's legal argument made in its July 2009 TRO response constitute an official policy under Monell that gives rise to § 1983 municipal liability? We hold that it does not. A mere legal position, without anything more, is insufficient to constitute an official policy. . . . The plaintiffs argue that a legal argument or a litigation position taken by a municipality can, by itself, constitute an official policy. But there is little case law in support of this position. . . .Pembaur is easily distinguishable from our case. In Pembaur, the Supreme Court deferred to a previous determination that the final decisionmaker, the County Prosecutor, had the authority to establish county policy. . . Here, there is no indication that the City's attorneys who argued before the district court are final decisionmakers on behalf of the City. Certainly, the City's attorneys have the authority to represent the City in court and to make arguments on behalf of the City as its legal counsel, but that is not the same as being 'responsible for establishing final policy with respect to the subject matter in question.' . . In addition, in Pembaur, the final decisionmaker made a definite choice to pursue a course of action, and in doing so, violated the petitioner's constitutional rights. In the case before us, the City's counsel made an incorrect legal argument in a responsive brief. This argument was made one day after the motion for a TRO was filed, and two days after the plaintiffs filed their case against the City. Giving the City the benefit of the doubt, perhaps this litigation position was taken quickly, without adequate preparation, and without a full understanding of the facts and circumstances of the case. . . When the City filed its response, there was no evidence that the City had ever arrested anyone or otherwise acted according to this purported policy. And as the district court held, the City did not have an unconstitutional official policy during Pastor Teesdale's arrest in 2008. But based on the language recited in the City's 2009 response to the plaintiffs' motion for a TRO, the district court concluded that, as of 2009, there was an official policy of the City that threatened the plaintiffs' future First Amendment rights. We can understand how the district court was misled by the City's persistence in maintaining its errant position, but it was a mistake for the district court to assume that the City's legal argument was a statement of official City policy that would be applied in the future. Unlike the facts of Pembaur, the City did not deliberately choose 'a course of action ... from among various alternatives,'. . . and then pursue it. Instead, the City's counsel made a legal argument in opposition to the plaintiffs' assertions that the City was liable under § 1983. Admittedly, this legal argument was deficient and counsel overstated the City's case. But even so, based on Pembaur, we hold that the City's improper legal argument is insufficient to constitute an official City policy that establishes municipal liability under § 1983. . . .Besides the City's misguided litigation position, there exists no law, ordinance, code provision, or permitting requirement or regulation that the plaintiffs can identify that they might be found in violation of, and there are no previous instances of arrests or some other customary City practice that portends the future violation of the plaintiffs' rights. There is only the legal argument made by the City, which the City explicitly renounced during the oral argument. The plaintiffs took this renunciation as a reason to argue that the case was moot—but in actuality, it demonstrates the weakness of the plaintiffs' position and the fact that a mere legal argument is too insubstantial to form the basis of municipal liability. Recall that under Pembaur, an official municipal policy is a deliberate choice to follow a course of action from among various alternatives made by officials with final policymaking authority and possibly giving rise to liability. It would be very unusual for an official municipal policy to be quickly changed by a lawyer who concedes during the course of litigation that the legal argument he is presenting is without merit when, for example, he is challenged on it by a judge. . . .A mere legal pleading or a litigating position, with nothing more, is insufficient to constitute an official policy under Monell. Without such an official policy, these plaintiffs do not have standing to obtain the declaratory judgment. The plaintiffs' motion to dismiss the appeal as moot is Denied, the judgment of the district court is Vacated, and the case is Remanded for dismissal on jurisdictional grounds based on lack of standing."); Crosby v. Pickaway County General Health Dist., 303 F. App'x 251, 2008 WL 5169159, at *7, *8 (6th Cir. Dec. 8, 2008) ("Long's role in this matter is clearly different from that of the prosecutor in Pembaur . There, the prosecutor instructed the police to take action; here the Board decided to take action and asked the prosecutor for advice on how it could best execute its decision. Our circuit has not directly addressed the distinction between an attorney's role in creating policy and in giving legal advice, but the Fifth Circuit has examined the issue, concluding that these roles are distinct and that only the former role may give rise to municipal liability. [citing Bennett v. Slidell, 728 F.2d 762, 769 (5th Cir.1984) (en banc)] Ohio law clearly distinguishes between the role of the County Prosecutor and that of the Health District. Under Ohio law, 'the prosecuting attorney of the county constituting all or a major part of such district shall act as the legal advisor of the board of health.' Ohio Rev.Code ' 3709.33. It is the Health District (acting through the Board of Health), however, that makes the ultimate decision to grant or deny sewage permits. Ohio Rev.Code ' 3718.02(")(3)(d)(5). Regardless of whether the Board listened to the advice of county officials such as the County Prosecutor or County Engineer, the record displays no evidence that the Health District abdicated its ultimate decisionmaking authority or handed over such authority to the County, its Commissioners, or any other county employee. As such, neither the County, its Commissioners, nor any other county employee can be the source of any official policy that resulted in the suspension or denial of Appellants' sewage permits. The district court was therefore correct to grant summary judgment to these defendants, and we accordingly affirm the district court's decision and order on this point.").

In Jones v. Wellham, 104 F.3d 620, 625 (4th Cir. 1997), the court noted:

> Critically, Pembaur dealt only with a "policy" decision by a municipal official that directly commanded a constitutional violation . . . (Fourth Amendment search). Its specific holding did not, therefore, touch official "acts or edicts" that, though not themselves unconstitutional, hence not the immediate cause of constitutional injury, might be shown to have caused a constitutional violation by others. That, of course is the factual situation presented in the case at issue, and for Pembaur's theory of municipal liability to apply here, it must be considered to reach such decisions as well as those directly commanding or effecting constitutional violations. We have not, apparently, ever directly addressed that issue, though we have, of course, applied Pembaur to single policy decisions that were themselves unconstitutional, hence were the immediate causes of constitutional violations. See, e.g., Hall v. Marion Sch. Dist. No. 2, 31 F.3d 183 (4th Cir.1994) (unconstitutional firing by school board). Other circuits have, however, simply assumed Pembaur's application to single policy maker decisions which though not themselves unconstitutional were the ultimate causes of constitutional violations.
>
> Because the Supreme Court recently has granted certiorari in Bryan County v. Brown . . . to consider issues that may touch upon whether Pembaur applies at all to such situations, we will reserve decision on that threshold question and simply assume for purposes of this case that, in otherwise appropriate circumstances, Pembaur's single-decision principle can apply to single policy maker decisions not themselves unconstitutional, such as those of Chief Frye here in issue. In making that assumption, we also assume (as did the district court) that in applying Pembaur to this type situation, the imposition of municipal liability would require . . . proof of deliberate indifference of the decision maker to the possible consequences of his decision, hence a "conscious choice" of the course of action taken, . . . and a close causal connection between the decision and the ultimate constitutional injury inflicted.

Justice Brennan, writing for a plurality in Pembaur, concluded that "[m]unicipal liability attaches only where the decisionmaker possesses final authority to establish municipal policy with respect to the action ordered." 475 U.S. at 483. Whether an official possesses policymaking authority with respect to particular matters will be determined by state law. Id. Policymaking authority may be bestowed by legislative enactment or may be delegated by an official possessing such authority under state law. Id.

Justice White, wrote separately to make clear his position (concurred in by Justice O'Connor) that a decision of a policymaking official could not result in municipal liability if that decision were contrary to controlling federal, state or local law. Id. at 485-87 (White, J., concurring). See, e.g., Pineiro v. Gemme, 937 F.Supp.2d 161, 175 (D. Mass. 2013) ("Although in certain circumstances the single act of an official with final policymaking authority, such as the Chief, can subject the municipality to liability, such a determination is not always warranted. . . . In the absence of evidence to the contrary, the Court is compelled to conclude that Chief Gemme's licensing decision with regard to plaintiff's application did not itself constitute a 'policy' of the City of Worcester within the meaning of § 1983 and Monell. . . Accordingly—and regardless of whether plaintiff has a legitimate claim concerning the chief's decision as to the particular restrictions placed on his license to carry—the general policy of placing some restriction(s) on new licenses did not 'directly cause' a violation of his constitutional rights. Accordingly, the City of Worcester may not be found liable under Monell."). Since the law was not settled at the time of the County prosecutor's action in Pembaur, the decision of the policymaking official would constitute the official policy for Monell purposes.

Justice Powell (joined by Burger, C.J., and Rehnquist, J.) dissented, criticizing the Court for its focus upon the "status of the decisionmaker" rather than "the nature of the decision reached ... and ... the process by which the decision was reached." Id. at 492-502. See also Collins v. Stasiuk, 56 F. Supp.2d 344, 345 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) (" While [defendants] may well have had final authority to make an individual personnel decision concerning plaintiff (who was himself a relatively high-ranking official at DEP), the hiring, promotion, demotion or termination of a single individual is NOT a 'municipal policy.'. . .The decision to fire one man, for whatever reason, is neither a course or method of action to help guide and determine present and future decisions nor a high-level overall plan. It is a singular act, applicable to one individual, in the unique circumstances of his case. It is, in short, a personnel decision and nothing more. It is hard to imagine any decision that falls farther outside the common understanding of the word 'policy.' Of course, an individual personnel decision carried out by a final policymaker pursuant to a definite course or method of action that was designed to guide future decision making, or in furtherance of some governmental body's high-level overall plan, would qualify for the Monell exception. But not every personnel decision made by a senior policymaker falls into that category.").

See also Carlson v. Fewins, 801 F.3d 668, 675-77 (6th Cir. 2015) ("The choice to call for granola bars but not a warrant appears to have been driven by the Sheriff's misunderstanding of the Fourth Amendment. '[I]nconvenience to the officers and some slight delay ... are never very convincing reasons ... to bypass the constitutional [warrant] requirement.'. . Fewins's approach—choosing not to even request a warrant because he thought a misdemeanor arrest warrant would not have been 'handy' or 'put [the Team] in a better bargaining spot'—misses the point entirely. Judicial warrants are not intended to blindly facilitate whatever course of action a sheriff prefers. They are required by the Fourth Amendment 'so that an objective mind might weigh the need to invade th[e] privacy [of the home] in order to enforce the law.'. . The Fourth Amendment thus protects people from the power of the state by requiring judicial preapproval, time permitting, of intrusive or forceful entrances and seizures. . .Instead of giving a sheriff the discretion to decide whether to seek a warrant from a neutral judicial officer based on how helpful the warrant would be to the sheriff, '[t]he point of the Fourth Amendment' is to vest the discretion to approve or deny an officer's plan to seize a person or search a house in a 'neutral and detached magistrate.'. . The warrant requirement is relaxed when an emergency situation makes it unreasonable to delay long enough to seek one, not when—as Fewins suggests here—a warrant simply would not have been particularly useful in the field. The facts available at summary judgment raise an inference that the Team had the time—and thus the constitutional obligation—to get a warrant from a judge before entering Carlson's house with tear gas and surveillance equipment. . . .The Estate's evidence suggests that in the split second of their choosing and without a warrant of any kind, the Team decided to end hours of tense, quiet waiting by taking the precise action that Carlson had described as 'the start of the war.' A jury could find the totality of the circumstances made this unreasonable, not just with 20/20 hindsight, but from the perspective of any reasonable person responsible for rendering aid to an armed and obviously emotionally disturbed person and that no immediate danger exigency excused the various warrantless actions taken against Carlson while he was taking refuge in his home. In a situation such as this, where various inferences are possible, the courts have decided that the reasonableness of police conduct should be decided by a jury. We therefore reverse the district court's order dismissing the counts against the county and the supervising officers and remand the case so a jury may decide whether the defendants' various warrantless seizures and searches during a standoff that began with requests to save Carlson's life and ended with a sniper shooting him dead were reasonable. We express no position on the merits of the alternative defenses pretermitted by the district court's erroneous conclusion that exigent circumstances excused the warrant requirement—i.e., whether municipal liability attaches to the choices made by Fewins and Drzewiecki.")

2. In City of St. Louis v. Praprotnik, 485 U.S. 112 (1988), the Court made another attempt "to determin[e] when isolated decisions by municipal officials or employees may expose the municipality itself to liability under [section] 1983." 485 U.S. at 113. Seven Justices (J. Kennedy did not participate; J. Stevens dissented) joined in reversing a decision by the Eighth Circuit which had found the City liable for the transfer and layoff of a city architect in violation of his First Amendment rights.

The Court of Appeals had allowed the plaintiff to attribute to the City adverse personnel decisions made by the plaintiff's supervisors where such decisions were considered "final" in the sense that they were not subject to de novo review by higher-ranking officials. 798 F.2d 1168, 1173-75 (8th Cir. 1986).

Justice O'Connor reinforced the principle articulated in Pembaur, that state law will be used to determine who are policymaking officials. 485 U.S. at 124. Furthermore, the plurality makes clear its position that the question of who is a policymaking official is one of law, for the court to decide by reference to state law, not one of fact to be submitted to a jury. Id.

In Praprotnik, the relevant law was found in the St. Louis City Charter, which gave policymaking authority in matters of personnel to the mayor, aldermen and Civil Service Commission. Id. at 126.

See also Segler v. City of Detroit, No. 23-1897, 2024 WL 5135735, at *6 (6th Cir. Dec. 17, 2024) ("We long ago recognized that Detroit's City Charter vests its Board of Police Commissioners with the authority to set the Detroit Police Department's general policies. Berry v. City of Detroit, 25 F.3d 1342, 1345 (6th Cir. 1994). The Chief of Police, by contrast, has the authority to run the department in conformity with these policies and to recommend amendments to the Board. . . These provisions of Detroit's City Charter remain in place today. . . Segler identifies no state or local law that gave Craig the unreviewable power to set the policies governing when officers may notify the media about 'people of interest' during a criminal investigation. . . Nor does Segler identify any informal custom delegating this policymaking authority to the Chief of Police. . . Segler's evidence thus fails to create a genuine issue of material fact over whether Craig had 'final policymaking authority' over this general activity. . . Segler responds that Craig (not the Board) chose the specific 'policy' to label him a person of interest. . . But we have repeatedly made clear that an official's 'discretion' to make a specific decision pursuant to a general policy does not qualify as final policymaking authority. . . For example, just because a city's policies gave an officer 'discretion' in how to proceed with an investigation does not mean that the officer had general policymaking power over investigations. . . And just because a city's policies gave a shift commander the 'authority to make limited decisions concerning inmate medical care' does not mean that the commander had general policymaking authority over that care. . . This case follows the same path. Even if the Board's policies gave Craig 'discretion' over whether to identify Segler as a person of interest, this fact does not show that Craig exercised general policymaking power over the general activity of communicating with the media."); Gustilo v. Hennepin Healthcare System, Inc., 122 F.4th 1012, 1018-19 (8th Cir. 2024) ("Municipal liability under § 1983 attaches when a municipal official possessing final authority with respect to the action makes 'a deliberate choice to follow a course of action ... from among various alternatives.'. . When a subordinate makes a decision that is subject to review, and the municipality's authorized policymakers approve the subordinate's decision 'and the basis for it,' their ratification is 'chargeable to the municipality because their decision is final.'. . The identification of final policymakers is a question of law to be decided before a case is submitted to the jury; ratification is a question of fact for the jury. . . Here, the parties do not dispute that the HHS Board was the final policy maker that approved the subordinate MEC's decision to demote Dr. Gustilo. They dispute whether the Board also approved the basis of the MEC's decision, which included consideration of her Facebook posts, the allegedly protected speech. The district court granted summary judgment dismissing this § 1983 claim. While municipal policymakers can create municipal liability by 'ratifying the actions of a subordinate,' the court acknowledged, 'Gustilo fails to create a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether the HHS Board considered her Facebook posts in making its decision to demote her.'. . On appeal, Dr. Gustilo argues the court erred in finding no material fact dispute regarding the ratification issue. She argues there is substantial evidence in the summary judgment record that the Board approved the MEC decision and the basis for that decision. She points to Dr. Hilden's Rule 30(b)(6) deposition, where he testified that 'the board of directors approved [the MEC's decision] in a roll call vote,' including the basis for that decision. HHS responds that, as Dr. Hilden testified, 'the basis [of the MEC decision] was laid out ... in the [Hilden Memo] we gave to the board of directors ... in five bullet points;' the Hilden Memo did not reference or list Gustilo's Facebook posts as a basis for her demotion; there is no evidence the Board received anything besides the Hilden Memo prior to the meeting; and there is no evidence that Board members considered Gustilo's posts when voting to approve the MEC's decision to demote Dr. Gustilo. Though there is record support for HHS's contention, the difficulty, as we see it, is that ratification is an issue of fact for a jury if there is a material fact dispute. The district court concluded that Dr. Gustilo's evidence did not raise a material fact dispute. The court noted, '[e]ven where there is evidence in the record that members of a board serving as the final decision-maker knew about the plaintiff's at-issue speech, this Court has found such knowledge alone insufficient to imply that the plaintiff's speech was the basis for the decision,' citing its earlier, highly relevant decision in Benner v. St. Paul Public Schools, I.S.D. #625, 380 F. Supp. 3d 869, 908-09 (D. Minn. 2019. . . But Benner was an interlocutory order granting in part defendants' motion for summary judgment, an order that was subject to reconsideration by the district court as that case progressed, and subject to appellate review if incorporated in a final order or judgment. Here, on a summary judgment record, the fact-based ratification issue is open to question. As previously noted, the second of Dr. Hilden's five 'bullet points' almost certainly referred to issues raised in Dr. Gustilo's Facebook posts. Dr. Hilden's Packet made clear that the Department OBGYN physicians had repeatedly complained about the media posts and Dr. Gustilo's aggressively pursuing those issues at work. Moreover, the district court did not acknowledge, and may not have been aware, that two members of the Board were also members of the MEC and therefore knew from the Hilden Packet that media posts were a significant part of what was viewed as Dr. Gustilo's leadership failures, even though the Hilden Memo carefully avoided any specific mention of the media posts. Thus, the summary judgment record does not support the district court's conclusion that, '[r]egardless of whether the MEC considered Gustilo's Facebook posts, Gustilo fails to create a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether the HHS Board considered her Facebook posts in making its decision to demote her.'. . We conclude that ratification is a fact issue that cannot be decided as a matter of law on this summary judgment record. Therefore, we must remand for further consideration of ratification and other legal issues, beginning with whether Dr. Gustilo's Facebook posts are protected speech, and perhaps the development of a full record if the ratification and other issues require a trial."); Jones v. Clark County, Kentucky, 959 F.3d 748, 762-63 (6th Cir. 2020) ("In City of St. Louis v. Praprotnik, 485 U.S. 112, 108 S.Ct. 915, 99 L.Ed.2d 107 (1988), the Supreme Court held that when a plaintiff alleges that an unconstitutional municipal policy is evinced by a single decision by a municipal official, 'only those municipal officials who have "final policymaking authority" may by their actions subject the government to § 1983 liability' and that state law determines whether a municipal official has 'final policymaking authority.'. . This Court has distinguished 'between "policymaking" authority, which entails a certain amount of discretion to choose among various plausible alternatives, and "factfinding" authority, which involves assessing the fixed realities of a situation' and held as a result that a coroner's authority to make factual findings regarding a person's cause of death was not policy-making. . .Jones has established a genuine issue as to the 'prerequisite ... unconstitutional conduct' by a subordinate—Murray—to support a claim of supervisory liability against Sheriff Perdue. . . However, no genuine dispute of material fact remains over whether Perdue, through municipal policy, custom or official action, acted unconstitutionally. Jones has not set forth any facts indicating that Perdue authorized or participated in Murray's arguably unlawful conduct. As in Gregory, the record, at the most, indicates that Perdue failed to review Murray's work, not that Perdue lacked 'a reasonable system' to review subordinates work generally. . .Similarly, Plaintiff has failed to demonstrate a genuine dispute as to any material fact regarding Clark County's liability in this matter. On appeal, Jones argues only that 'a county can be liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 when it tolerates a custom or practice which causes a constitutional violation' and that 'Murray's power was so absolute, and he was given such free rein over the lives and liberty of people like Jones, that his acts and omissions could fairly be characterized as those of a person to whom the County and its Sheriff had delegated final decision-making authority, and for which they can be properly held liable.'. .His first argument fails because Jones has failed to allege the existence of a 'custom or practice' in Clark County that would warrant a claim of supervisory liability in this suit. He vaguely references 'the lives and liberty of people like Jones,' but his brief provides no further argument or evidence of repeated violations akin to the one against Jones—be they malicious prosecutions generally or those involving child pornography. Even looking at the facts in the light most favorable to Jones, there is nothing in the record or raised in his brief that defeats summary judgment for the County. His second argument, that the County vested Murray with the authority to make municipal policy, fails because Jones has not demonstrated with any argument or facts present in the record that state or local law vested Murray with the authority to make county policy. Arguably Perdue granted Murray significant discretion in his investigations, but that cannot be considered 'policy' for the purposes of § 1983. There is no evidence that Murray attempted to institutionalize any of his allegedly unconstitutional actions as policy or undertook them in conformity with a pre-existing policy. Like the coroner in Jorg, Murray was 'assessing the fixed realities of a situation' and finding facts in the course of his police work, not setting policy. . . As such, liability for the County cannot attach. Jones' argument that Murray lacked sufficient training to investigate internet crimes such that Perdue and Clark County 'can reasonably be said to have been deliberately indifferent to the need' for greater training fails as well. . . Jones simply asserts that a lack of training made it likely enough for a constitutional violation to occur that the supervisory Defendants can be held liable. . . But he does not identify any evidence regarding Murray's training. And the record shows that Murray had at least been trained on the fact that an IP address could be hacked."); Soltesz v. Rushmore Plaza Civic Ctr., 847 F.3d 941, 947-48 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Turning to the claims in this case, the Civic Center contends that no legally sufficient evidentiary basis exists to support the jury verdict. Whether an official possessed final policymaking authority, the Center continues, is a question of law. The district court thus erred in submitting the question to the jury. The Civic Center raised this very issue three times to the district court; the court denied the motion every time. The Civic Center, therefore, has preserved the issue for appellate review. . . We agree with the Civic Center: no legally sufficient evidentiary basis exists to impose liability on a municipality for the decisions of a final policymaker when the district court fails to identify that policymaker.

The district court must identify the final policymaker as a matter of law before the claims reach the jury. . . Even if the plaintiff proceeds on a theory of delegation or ratification, the court must identify the final policymaker. . . Failing to do so raises the risk of respondeat superior liability—a risk we cannot tolerate. For § 1983 liability to attach, the jury must find the decision of a final policymaker caused the constitutional deprivation. . . If the jury is not instructed as to who the final policymaker is, it cannot find that the decision of a final policymaker caused any constitutional deprivation. A verdict imposing municipal liability on the decision of a final policymaker, when the jury receives no instruction on the final policymaker's identity, cannot be affirmed. . . We must therefore vacate the jury verdict. . . .A final policymaker may have deprived Soltesz of his constitutional rights in this case. But if Soltesz wishes to bring his claims to a jury, the district court must identify the final policymaker in accordance with South Dakota state law and local Rapid City ordinances. We therefore reverse the district court's ruling on the Civic Center's renewed motion for JMOL, vacate the jury's verdict, and remand for a new trial."); Milligan-Hitt v. Board of Trustees of Sheridan County School Dist. No. 2, 523 F.3d 1219, 1223-29 (10th Cir. 2008) ("Because the Sheridan County School District had no official policy of sexual-orientation discrimination, these plaintiffs must show that their rights were violated by one of the district's final policymakers. . .Although the board made the final decision not to hire Ms. Milligan-Hitt and Ms. Roberts, the plaintiffs contend that final policymaking authority over the hiring decisions was delegated to the superintendent, who exercised it in an intentionally discriminatory manner. The plaintiffs do not contend that the hiring committees themselves were discriminatory, apart from any involvement from the superintendent. The district court treated the superintendent's policymaking authority as a question of fact and presented it to the jury, which concluded that Mr. Dougherty was the final policymaker of the district. . . We must reverse this judgment because the question of Mr. Dougherty's final policymaking authority is a question of law, which should not have gone to the jury. The district court should have concluded that as a matter of law, Mr. Dougherty did not make district hiring policy. . . . Under Wyoming law, the Board of Trustees is vested with the authority to make personnel decisions. The statute governing school trustees gives them the power to '[e]mploy and determine the salaries and duties of' superintendents, principals, teachers, and all other school personnel. . . The plaintiffs do not dispute this, but argue that because the school board did not adequately supervise Mr. Dougherty, it delegated this authority to him and gave him the school board's status as final policymaker. In light of the legal − not factual − nature of the municipal liability inquiry, however, we are interested only in delegations of legal power, not in whether the board's actual exercise of its power of review was sufficiently aggressive. . .With this in mind, we conclude that the board's delegation of administrative power to the superintendent did not turn him into the final policymaker. The school board has adopted a policy entitled 'Board/Superintendent Relationship' explicitly delegating 'its executive powers' to the school superintendent. . . . The ultimate authority to hire employees and to decide what rules govern hiring is retained by the board. The superintendent's power to recommend is simply a component of the board's hiring power, not a separate source of district policy − indeed, the recommendation power has meaning only within the hiring system run by the board. Thus, any complaint about the superintendent's failure to properly recommend candidates to the board belongs in a suit against him personally, not the district. Alternatively, the plaintiffs complain that in practice the board's supervision of the superintendent's role in the hiring process was so deferential that he was functionally unreviewed. But this appears to confuse the legal question of the locus of final decisionmaking authority with the factual question of how aggressively or independently the board tends to exercise the power it has. . . . Regardless of whether plaintiffs are right that the board did not aggressively supervise Mr. Dougherty's decisions, the board had the authority to do so. Whether it used it or not, that authority makes the board, not the superintendent, the proper target in a municipal liability suit. To hold otherwise and attempt to dig into the details of the board's supervisory activities in this case would be to make the '[un]justified ... assump[tion] that municipal policymaking authority lies somewhere other than where the applicable law purports to put it.'. . That would subject school boards to 'capricious' review by federal juries for every municipal squabble."); Arendale v. City of Memphis, 519 F.3d 587, 602 & n.12 (6th Cir. 2008) ("[I]it is clear that the City may be held liable for the final decision of Chief Wright. Although the Memphis City Charter allows a disciplined City employee who is suspended for more than ten days to appeal this decision to the Civil Service Commission, neither the charter nor the city code provides an appeal beyond the MPD when a police officer receives a suspension of ten days or less. . . . Although Plaintiff failed to include the MPD's policy manual in the record, 'whether a particular official has final policymaking authority is a question of state law,' and thus must be determined by a judge. . . Because the question of whether an official has final policy making authority is a question of law, this Court is no more constrained by the record than it is forbidden to cite a Supreme Court case not relied upon by the parties. . . . As the Appeal Authority, Chief Wright has final decision making power within the Memphis Police Department. . . Furthermore, as neither the Memphis Charter nor the Memphis City Code provide for further review of Plaintiff's suspension, Chief Wright had 'final policy making authority' with respect to Plaintiff's disciplinary charge. . . Accordingly, insofar as Plaintiff's suspension was unconstitutional, the City may be held liable under § 1983 for the final disciplinary decision of Chief Wright."); Lytle v. Doyle, 326 F.3d 463, 472 (4th Cir. 2003) ("The Norfolk City Charter provides that the City Manager, acting as the director of public safety, is in charge of the police department. All orders, rules, and regulations applicable to the entire police department must be approved by the City Manager. The City Manager is therefore clearly the final policymaker for purposes of § 1983 liability. Some policies for the police department, so called standard operating procedures, may be approved by the Chief of Police rather that the City Manager. At most, then, the Chief of Police could be considered a final policymaker for the police department. And no one lower in rank than the Chief of Police is authorized to issue any written directives."); Jeffes v. Barnes, 208 F.3d 49, 57, 58, 60, 61 (2d Cir. 2000) ("In sum, the question of whether a given official is the municipality's final policymaking official in a given area is a matter of law to be decided by the court. Where a plaintiff relies not on a formally declared or ratified policy, but rather on the theory that the conduct of a given official represents official policy, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to establish that element as a matter of law. We thus reject plaintiffs' contention that the district court erred in imposing that burden on them; and we turn to the question of whether, as to the particular area at issue here, the burden was met. . . . The principal area in question in this suit involves the duties and obligations of the sheriff's staff members toward each other with respect to their exercise of First Amendment rights in breach of the Jail's code of silence. The following review of New York State ("State") law leads us to the conclusion that the Schenectady County sheriff was the County's final policymaker with respect to most of the conduct that plaintiffs challenge. . . . In sum, State law requires that the Schenectady County sheriff be elected; County law provides that elected officials are not subject to supervision or control by the County's chief executive officer; there is only routine civil service supervision over the sheriff's appointments; State law places the sheriff in charge of the Jail; and the County's chief executive officer, advised by the County's attorneys, treats the sheriff, insofar as Jail operations are concerned, as "autonomous." . . . . The County has pointed us to no provision of State or local law that requires a sheriff to answer to any other entity in the management of his jail staff with respect to the existence or enforcement of a code of silence. We conclude that Sheriff Barnes was, as a matter of law, the County's final policymaking official with respect to the conduct of his staff members toward fellow officers who exercise their First Amendment rights to speak publicly or to inform government investigators of their co-workers' wrongdoing."); Dotson v. Chester, 937 F.2d 920 (4th Cir. 1991) (court examines state law and county code to find Sheriff final policymaker as to operation of county jail).

See also Patel v. Hall, 849 F.3d 970, 979-80 (10th Cir. 2017) ("While we are sympathetic to Plaintiff's concerns about the difficulties of proving who is a final policymaker in a small town with an informally run government, we are not persuaded it would be appropriate or prudent for us to depart from our usual summary judgment and municipal-liability standards in this case, especially in light of the fact that Plaintiff did not even raise this argument until his reply brief. The evidence Plaintiff presented of Officer Hall's position in the police department is both limited and ambiguous, and we are not persuaded that a jury could reasonably find Officer Hall to have final policymaking authority for the Town of Basin based simply on the facts that (1) he was placed temporarily 'in charge' of the police department for the short period of time before the new chief took office and (2) he was described as the acting chief of police by some people. We therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of Officer Hall on Plaintiff's official-capacity claims."); Wilson v. City of Boston, 421 F.3d 45, 59, 60 (1st Cir. 2005) ("Not every police operation is a municipal policy; Wilson has the burden of establishing that this particular operation was City policy. She argues that Operation Goodwin was City policy because it was (1) a large operation involving arrest warrants from all over Boston, (2) commanded by a high-ranking officer, and (3) videotaped for national distribution. Those facts, however, do not make it an official City policy. Wilson offers no evidence that Dunford − then a captain assigned to a station in Dorchester, subject to the hierarchical supervision of a Deputy Superintendent, Superintendent, and Police Commissioner − had the authority to set municipal policy for the City of Boston. We therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment for the City."); Barry v. New York City Police Department, No. 01 Civ.10627 CBM, 2004 WL 758299, at *15 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 7, 2004) ("While it seems likely, therefore, that the Police Commissioner bore final policymaking authority in the areas implicated by the adverse acts taken against plaintiff, and that he would have to have ordered or ratified the adverse acts in question, or at least known that Mullane, Reiss, and Fox had a retaliatory motive for carrying them out, the court needs more information about the power and authority of the police officers in question beyond the information provided by the parties before it can make a final determination as a matter of law."); Stein v. Janos, 269 F. Supp.2d 256, 261 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) ("I cannot determine who had final authority to make policy concerning Stein's employment for the Village of Tarrytown, because, as usual, neither party has briefed the issue − not defendants as movants and not plaintiff in rebuttal. Common sense suggests that either the Mayor, Village Trustees, or Village Administrator is likely to have such authority − if not, there would appear to be a gaping hole in the Village's administrative organization. But I cannot make decisions in a vacuum. The Village's motion for summary judgment is denied without prejudice; when someone bothers to direct me to the appropriate law (at trial), I will address it.").

The plurality also underscored the importance of "finality" to the concept of policymaking and reiterated the distinction set out in Pembaur between authority to make final policy and authority to make discretionary decisions. "When an official's discretionary decisions are constrained by policies not of that official's making, those policies, rather than the subordinate's departures from them, are the act of the municipality." Id. at 127.

See, e.g., Monacelli v. City of Dallas, Texas, No. 24-10067, 2024 WL 4692025, at *3 (5th Cir. Nov. 6, 2024) (not reported) (Wiener, J., concurring) ("I concur in the majority's analysis and in the judgment, and I write separately to address an issue on appeal that the majority does not discuss. Monacelli's first issue on appeal is whether the district court properly rejected his contention that the Dallas city council had delegated policymaking authority to the Dallas Police Chief. Both parties spend a considerable amount of briefing on this issue and I write separately only to acknowledge and dispense with this issue. Monacelli rests his Monell claims on the theory that the Dallas Police Department (DPD) General Orders issued by the Police Chief are official policies by a policymaker. Unfortunately for Monacelli, this contention is foreclosed in this circuit, and it is settled law that the Dallas city council is the policymaking authority at issue. . . .I would thus expressly hold that the district court did not err in rejecting Monacelli's delegation theory and his § 1983 claims that rely on this contention fail for this reason alone."); Anderson v. Harris County, 98 F.4th 641, 645-46 (5th Cir. 2024) ("Although Plaintiffs have alleged that Diaz had complete control over employment decisions for Precinct Two, . . . they have not alleged or argued that he made employment decisions for the entire county, nor could they. Accordingly, Diaz, as a constable of a single precinct, is not a final policymaker for Harris County. . . . Plaintiffs alternatively argue that Harris County is liable for Diaz's employment decisions under a delegation or rubber-stamp theory. Both theories fail in this case. First, Plaintiffs improperly rely on Harris County v. Nagel for its delegation theory. . . In Nagel, the court held that a constable was a policymaker for the county because the Commissioners Court delegated authority to him. . . But there, the Commissioners Court delegated authority over mental-health warrants in the entire county to the constable of a single precinct. . . Plaintiffs here have neither alleged nor argued that Diaz received authority over more than his own precinct. We have previously rejected the extension of Nagel to employment decisions for individual precincts, and we do so here. . . .Because Harris County did not delegate authority to hire and fire to Diaz over the entire county, Plaintiffs' delegation theory fails. Second, Plaintiffs assert that Harris County is liable because the

Commissioners Court rubber stamped Diaz's decisions by accepting them without question. We have not applied a theory that merely failing to disagree with something a constable did (without any allegation that the Commissioners Court knew the details) allows for a rubber-stamp theory of municipal liability. Rather, we have held a plaintiff may establish municipal liability through a ratification theory. See Young v. Bd. of Supervisors, 927 F.3d 898, 903 (5th Cir. 2019) ("If the authorized policymakers approve a subordinate's decision and the basis for it, their ratification would be chargeable to the municipality because their decision is final." (emphasis added) (quotation omitted)). There are certainly no pleadings of such action. . . .More importantly, Plaintiffs have not alleged that the county maintained a policy authorizing constables to condition employment on campaign contributions. Nor have Plaintiffs alleged that the Commissioners Court had any knowledge of Diaz's employment decisions on that basis, let alone alleged that the Commissioners Court approved Diaz's decisions and his unconstitutional basis for them. Under Plaintiffs' alleged facts, Diaz's actions were based on his own policy (that he likely hid from the Commissioners Court)—not the policy of Harris County. Plaintiffs' claims are thus more appropriately directed at Diaz alone. . . In sum, Plaintiffs have not alleged sufficient facts to plausibly show Harris County adopted a policy that violated their First Amendment rights. Accordingly, Plaintiffs' assertion of municipal liability fails."); Felts v. Green, 91 F.4th 938, 943-44 (8th Cir. 2024) ("The Board's President has far more policymaking authority than the St. Louis County police superintendent—held to have final policymaking authority because he 'was the highest ranking police official in St. Louis County; was responsible for the entire department; and was responsible for drafting and approving many of the department's general orders.'. . Reed not only possessed greater authority but also faced less oversight. The voters elected Reed, while an administrative board appointed the police superintendent. . . The superintendent was removable by a majority vote of that board. . . Reed completely controlled the office of the President of the Board of Aldermen—removable only by a recall vote, the same procedure as for the mayor (the "chief executive officer of the city"). . . When Reed blocked Felts on Twitter, he executed a final municipal policy in his area of the City's business, the office of the President of the Board of Aldermen. Generally, the making of '"[a]n unconstitutional governmental policy can be inferred from a single decision taken by the highest official responsible for setting policy in that area of the government's business."'. . Regardless, while in office, Reed blocked at least five other specific individuals from his account who criticized him as an elected official. Reed's decision to block Felts was a deliberate choice of a guiding principle and procedure to silence online critics. . . . Reed made a deliberate choice to block Felts among various alternatives—ignoring the tweet, muting her account, replying from the account, replying from a pseudonymous "burner" account, or replying from a personal account not administered under color of law as an official governmental account. The City contends that though Reed had discretion to block Felts on Twitter, he did not have authority to make final policy about who the city of St. Louis blocks on Twitter. By the unique powers that the City charter grants the Board's President, he has authority to establish the final social media policy for the office of the President of the Board of Aldermen. The City's Department of Personnel's Social Media Policy did not apply to Reed or to his staff. No other City social media policy applied to him. Reed was free to make final policy in his area of the City's business, which he did by blocking critics, including Felts. . . Reed's choice to block

Felts on a government account was unilateral, unreviewable, and not subject to other policies. He created municipal policy in his area of the City's business. Because of the unique power of the President of the Board of Aldermen, Reed exercised final policymaking authority when he blocked Felts. The City of St. Louis is liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983."); Doe v. Burleson County, Texas, 86 F.4th 172, 176-79 (5th Cir. 2023) ("Burleson County, as a municipality, is only liable for the actions of its employees when an official policy or custom causes the plaintiff's injury. . . Accordingly, to succeed on a Monell claim, a plaintiff must show 'that (1) an official policy (2) promulgated by the municipal policymaker (3) was the moving force behind the violation of a constitutional right.'. . In some cases, where there may not be an express policy or custom in place to satisfy the first element of a Monell claim, the plaintiff can instead allege that the action of a single 'policymaker' caused the injury. . . . 'A final policymaker is one that has the responsibility for making law or setting policy in any given area of a local government's business'—in other words, 'one that decides the goals for a particular city function and devises the means of achieving those goals.'. . . Accordingly, Doe's claim against Burleson County turns on whether Sutherland possessed final policymaking authority under Texas law for the actions in question. . . . The question, then, is whether the factual scenario here involves an area in which Sutherland 'alone' had the final say over policymaking. The answer is clear: despite his position as County Judge, Sutherland lacked the requisite policymaking authority to hold Burleson County liable for his alleged sexual misconduct. . . . Besides there being no 'policy' to shoehorn Doe's allegations into, it is hard to imagine that Sutherland would be considered the 'ultimate repository of county power' if he engages in independent, private sexual assault against another. . . . Doe's claim seems to sound instead in respondeat superior, but this is an impermissible theory upon which to base a Monell claim. . . Ultimately, this is a square-peg-round-hole case: Doe simply cannot make the facts fit the theory of liability. In sum, the broad ability to make decisions (along with the rest of the commissioner's court) for the county's business generally is distinguishable from Sutherland's personal responsibility for his alleged sexual misconduct against an employee of the County Attorney's Office. . . Not only is there no Texas law delegating authority to county judges to establish personnel policies in various offices, there is also a complete lack of connection between Sutherland's own alleged misconduct and official policymaking under Monell. . . Doe fails to establish that Sutherland had the requisite final policymaking authority to hold Burleson County liable for his actions here, regardless of his general ability to make decisions regarding county business. Thus, the district court correctly dismissed Doe's Section 1983 claim against Burleson County."); Guerra v. Castillo, 82 F.4th 278, 290-91 (5th Cir. 2023) ("In its motion to dismiss below, the City produced parts of the city charter to argue that 'all powers of the City of Alamo [are] vested in [its] Board of Commissioners' and that neither the Chief of Police nor the City Manager has policymaking authority. It also argued, in further briefing, that Guerra failed to 'identify any facts to establish the City ever delegated policymaking authority to Castillo.'In reply, Guerra reproduced the same parts of the city charter, bolding the phrase '[The Board] may pass any ordinances they may desire delegating any part of their authority and duties to any other person, offices or employee, not inconsistent with the Constitution or laws of the State of Texas.' Art. III § 6. But he mentioned no ordinance that delegated that authority. Instead, he reproduced a section of the city charter stating, '[t]he chief of police shall be the chief administrative officer of the department of police,' and '[t]he chief of police shall be responsible for the administration of the police department.'. . The above does not allow this court to plausibly infer that Castillo had 'more' than either 'complete discretionary authority [ ]or the unreviewability of such authority,' as Zarnow requires. . . Next, Guerra argues that Ozuna, the City Manager, had policymaking authority under Monell. . . Guerra's complaint noted that he was terminated in a letter from Ozuna. The complaint also claims that Guerra's counsel had requested an administrative hearing from Ozuna 'to discuss the false allegations against Plaintiff that had wrongfully resulted in his dismissal[,] but the hearing was never provided.' Once again, Guerra's complaint does not identify facts that allow this court to plausibly infer that Ozuna had both complete or unreviewable discretionary authority and also 'more.'. . Therefore, we AFFIRM the district court's dismissal of the City under 12(b)(6)."); St. Maron Properties, L.L.C. v. City of Houston, 78 F.4th 754, 760-61 (5th Cir. 2023) ("[Plaintiffs'] allegations establish that the Mayor and City Council made the deliberate decision to use City services to get an injunction based on false information, and then use that injunction to justify entering and modifying Plaintiffs' properties. . . . The Mayor and City Council are final policymakers for the purpose of Monell liability. The Houston Charter makes it clear that '[t]he governing body of the City of Houston, Texas, shall be the City Council,' and that it shall be composed of the Mayor and ... Council Members.'. . . Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that the Mayor and City Council directed and ratified the unconstitutional actions of City departments, and the Houston Charter makes clear the Mayor and City Council have policymaking authority. These allegations are sufficient to establish an official policymaker under Monell."); G.S. on behalf of S.S. v. Penn-Trafford School District, No. 20-3281, 2023 WL 4486667, at *3–4 (3d Cir. July 12, 2023) (not reported) ("Under Pennsylvania law, a school board may be the final policymaker with respect to some actions, while the school superintendent may be the final policymaker with regard to other actions. . . The inquiry into whether Harris acted as a policymaker when he agreed to review S.S.'s suspension is resolved by identifying the final policymaker regarding suspensions in Pennsylvania high schools. Section 12.6 of the Pennsylvania Administrative Code. . . governs exclusions from school. It states that suspensions of one to ten school days 'may be given by the principal or person in charge of the public school.'. . The Pennsylvania School Code provides that district superintendents have final discretion to determine the appropriateness of three-day suspensions. . . Another section of the School Code provides that a superintendent supervises all matters relating to discipline and holds final authority on such matters. . . Pennsylvania statutes thus support the conclusion that Harris possesses final authority over student suspensions. In Andrews v. City of Philadelphia, we explained that in circumstances such as these, where officials without policymaking authority allegedly violate a plaintiff's constitutional rights, a municipality can be held liable only if the final policymaker either acquiesced in the subordinate's decisions or delegated authority to him or her. . . Here, Defendants acknowledge that Harris is the final policymaker, but they argue that 'the only allegations involving Harris are that he met with [G.S.] and refused to remove S.S.'s suspension."[35] But G.S. does not only allege that Harris met with her and refused to remove S.S.'s suspension. She also alleges that Harris told her that he would (1) review the suspension, and (2) contact her after he and Inglese reached a decision. As we have explained, G.S. alleges that Inglese explicitly relied on S.S's protected conduct to justify her suspension (which Harris apparently reviewed). Once again construing these allegations in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, we conclude that the complaint sufficiently pleads that Harris knowingly acquiesced to the justification Inglese communicated to G.S. If so, Harris's ratification may be chargeable to the School District because his decision regarding S.S.'s suspension was final."); Friend v. Gasparino, 61 F.4th 77, 94-95 (2d Cir. 2023) ("As in Agosto, in this case Friend 'points to no state authority' indicating that Gasparino has 'final responsibility under state law for making policy.'. . The Connecticut law governing the duties of law enforcement officers in setting the terms and conditions of release of arrestees says nothing to indicate that a single patrol sergeant may set bail policy for the municipality. . .The statute contemplates only that individual decisions—including releasing an arrestee with a promise to appear—are within the authority of the police chief or his or her designees. . . That is insufficient to establish that the City vested Gasparino with the 'authority to set final, municipality-wide policy.'. . . Friend adduced testimony that, in practice, desk supervisors routinely permit lower-ranking patrol sergeants such as Gasparino to set bonds as a matter of 'general[ ] defer[ence]' to the patrol sergeant's 'more intimate knowledge of the person that was arrested, and what brought them there.'. . Friend argues that the authority to make policy was thereby devolved, and a 'well-settled custom' empowered Gasparino to make municipal policy when he set Friend's bail. . . Yet even if there were a 'well-settled custom' of 'general[ ] defer[ence]' to the patrol sergeant's bail determinations, that would at most establish that the City '[went] along with discretionary decisions made by its subordinates.'. . Such acquiescence 'is not a delegation ... of the authority to make policy.'. .In this case, Gasparino was not the final decisionmaker because his decision was subject to review by the bail commissioner, who in fact reversed that decision. And even focusing on the period in which Friend awaited the bail commissioner's review, Friend's Monell claim fails for the additional reason that Gasparino was not a final policymaker. Were we to 'equat[e] a final decisionmaker with a final policymaker,' we 'would effectively impose respondeat superior liability—making the municipality liable for the conduct of its employees—in violation of Monell.'. . For these reasons, we affirm the judgment of the district court with respect to Counts Four and Five."); Chabad Chayil, Inc. v. School Bd. of Miami-Dade County, Fla., 48 F.4th 1222, 1229-30 (11th Cir. 2022) ("Here, Chabad alleges (1) that Superintendent Carvalho's 'single ... decision' to prevent it from using MDCPS's facilities for its after-school programs violated its constitutional rights and (2) that Superintendent Carvalho had the requisite 'final policymaking authority' over school-facility usage. . . With respect to the latter issue, Chabad's complaint says only that Carvalho was 'responsible for the administration and management of MDCPS as set out in Fla. Stat. § 1001.51 and [was] a final decision maker of MDCPS.' . . Neither that conclusory assertion nor the embedded statutory citation is sufficient to show that Carvalho had final policymaking authority over school-facility usage. The standard that governs the Monell issue here is straightforward and uncontroversial: '[T]his Court's decisions have consistently recognized and given effect to the principle that a municipal official does not have final policymaking authority over a particular subject matter when that official's decisions are subject to meaningful administrative review.' Morro v. City of Birmingham, 117 F.3d 508, 514 (11th Cir. 1997) (collecting cases). The question, therefore, is whether, as Chabad asserts, Carvalho had 'unreviewable' authority over school property. . . Chabad offers no support for that conclusory assertion, and we can find none in the applicable Florida law. To the contrary, whatever property-related policymaking authority a school superintendent has is subject to the school board's 'meaningful' review—and, accordingly, that it is not 'final' for Monell purposes. . . . Nearly everything in Chapter 1001 of the Florida Statutes undermines Chabad's contention that Superintendent Carvalho has Monell-qualifying 'final policymaking authority.'"); Novak v. City of Parma, Ohio, 33 F.4th 296, 309 (6th Cir. 2022), cert. denied, 143 S. Ct. 773 (2023) ("Novak argues that Parma's Law Director, Timothy Dobeck, set the City's official policy when he determined that Riley and Connor had probable cause to continue investigating Novak. And he contends that because Dobeck had the final say over the City's legal opinions, his advice to the officers set Parma's policy on the matter. . . But by Novak's lights, every city prosecutor would 'set policy' for the municipality several times a day, every time he assessed probable cause. And that cannot be the case. This argument also overstates Dobeck's role in both municipal decisionmaking and Novak's alleged violations. The Supreme Court in Pembaur was careful to distinguish mere 'advice' from 'orders.'. . And here, neither Dobeck nor the officers considered his probable-cause determination an order to keep investigating Novak. . . Yet even if Dobeck had made the final municipal determination that the officers had probable cause to arrest Novak, the judges' independent determinations eliminate the causal connection. . . For both of these reasons, Novak's authorized-action theory fails."); Edelstein v. City of Brownsville, No. 20-40211, 2021 WL 4096581, at *4 (5th Cir. Sept. 8, 2021) (not reported) ("Plaintiffs offer two theories why the final policymakers are the City Commissioners instead. Both have been foreclosed by our precedents. First, Plaintiffs appear to argue that the Commissioners' general oversight over the Manager makes them the final policymakers on hiring. It is true that the Manager is 'responsible to the city commission for the proper administration of all affairs of the city in his charge.'. . We have previously held, however, that '[t]he mere existence of oversight ... is not enough' to make an official a final policymaker. . . Instead, that official's oversight must relate to 'the precise action' at issue in the litigation. . . Here, because the Commissioners are forbidden from 'dictat[ing] the appointment' of Municipal Judges 'in any manner,' they cannot overturn the precise action of the Manager's hiring decisions. . . Their general authority over the Manager thus does not make them policymakers vis-à-vis those hiring decisions. Plaintiffs' oversight theory fails. Second, Plaintiffs appear to argue that the Commissioners are the final policymakers here because the Manager complied with their instructions to hire only men. But according to our caselaw, it is the formal allocation of power—not the way power is exercised 'in practice'—that matters for municipal liability under Section 1983. . . Analyzing the issue any differently would disregard the Supreme Court's instructions to 'respect the decisions, embodied in state and local law, that allocate policymaking authority among particular individuals and bodies.'. . It would also permit municipalities to be held liable under Section 1983 on what would operate in practice as a respondeat superior theory—something the Supreme Court has repeatedly forbidden. . . Hence, both the Supreme Court and our court 'have explicitly rejected the concept of de facto authority' like the one advanced in this case. . . That means that the City's final policymaker is still the Manager, even if the Commissioners exercised 'personal sway' over him. . . Plaintiffs' command theory thus fails, and the district court therefore properly dismissed their Equal Protection claim."); Agosto v. New York City Dep't of Education, 982 F.3d 86, 91-92, 98-101 (2d Cir. 2020) ("Agosto's Monell claim against the Department of Education fails because he has not identified a municipal policy that allegedly caused a constitutional violation. Agosto seeks Monell liability solely on the theory that Ureña's acts set final policy for the Department of Education. The Supreme Court has explained that a single official can create Monell liability only if state law provides that official with authority to set final, municipality-wide policy in the relevant area. No state law conferred such power on Ureña, who was one of hundreds of principals within the Department of Education subject to the chancellor's regulations and to statutory authorities regarding teacher discipline and evaluations. Agosto's claim boils down to the theory that Ureña was a final policymaker because his decisions with respect to Agosto were essentially unreviewable. But the Supreme Court has rejected the concept of de facto policymaking authority, which erroneously conflates a final decisionmaker (which Ureña may have been) with a final policymaker (which Ureña was not). . . .Agosto points to no state authority indicating that a New York City school principal has final 'responsib[ility] under state law for making policy' in any 'area of the [Department of Education's] business' at issue in this case, . . . such that his 'edicts or acts' would be considered to 'represent official policy' for the entire municipality[.]. . .To the contrary, New York State law establishes that New York City school principals such as Ureña are '[s]ubject to the regulations of the chancellor,' N.Y. Educ. Law § 2590-i, who possesses expansive powers to make policy for and to otherwise govern New York City schools[.] . . . As relevant here, the chancellor has authority to make 'a final determination' when teachers appeal poor ratings, . . . and to resolve formal disciplinary proceedings brought against teachers and staff, including the power to terminate their employment[.] . . . Because state law invests the chancellor with such authority, New York's highest court has held that 'the city board [of education] and the Chancellor are responsible for policy having city-wide impact.'. . Accordingly, state law provides 'that there is a[ ] final policymaker other than [Principal Ureña] with respect to' the areas of municipal business for which Agosto claims Ureña was setting policy. . . . Agosto has apparently settled on the theory that Ureña's disciplinary letters and negative evaluations were unreviewable by higher-level officials within the Department of Education, making Ureña the de facto final municipal policymaker on those specific matters involving Agosto. Even assuming that Ureña's actions were unreviewable, Agosto's claim still fails because the Supreme Court has rejected the 'concept of "de facto final policymaking authority."'. . A municipality's 'going along with discretionary decisions made by [its] subordinates ... is not a delegation to them of the authority to make policy.'. . Agosto must demonstrate that 'through its deliberate conduct, the municipality was the "moving force" behind the injury alleged,' . . . but he has demonstrated no such deliberate conduct by the municipality here. The only deliberate actor was Ureña. Moreover, by equating a final decisionmaker with a final policymaker, Agosto's approach would effectively impose respondeat superior liability—making the municipality liable for the conduct of its employees—in violation of Monell itself. . . Agosto responds that even if Ureña were not the final municipal policymaker for teacher discipline and evaluations, he was the final policymaker at least for his own 'discriminatory and harassing behavior towards Mr. Agosto.'. . .But by erroneously equating a principal's final decisions with a municipality's final policies, those cases make the same mistake as Agosto. We do not believe that approach is consistent with Monell and accordingly decline to adopt it. Such an approach would risk imposing Monell liability for almost every action a principal takes. . . Our conclusion that a New York City principal does not have municipal policymaking authority for Monell purposes here finds additional support in this court's decision in Hurdle v. Board of Education of City of New York, 113 F. App'x 423 (2d Cir. 2004). That case is especially instructive because we held that a New York City superintendent's final decision to transfer a principal did not set municipal policy. . . . Hurdle involved a superintendent—an official who outranks a principal such as Ureña—but this court explained that even when the official 'is the apex of a bureaucracy,' that merely 'makes the decision "final" but does not forge a link between "finality" and "policy."'. . The ability to make a final transfer decision for one particular employee 'does not establish that [the official] had the authority to set the policy authorizing involuntary employee transfers' for the entire municipality. . . The same is true here. Even assuming Ureña's discipline, evaluations, and harassing behavior were final decisions, those acts did not set final municipal policy because Ureña lacked policymaking authority under state law. Because Agosto's Monell claim rests on his erroneous theory that Ureña was a final policymaker for the New York City Department of Education, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to the Department on Agosto's § 1983 claim."); Porter v. City of Philadelphia, 975 F.3d 374, 384-85 (3d Cir. 2020) ("To the extent the District Court suggests that the City is liable for Chew's individual decision-making, we cannot agree. His unendorsed actions, without more, did not become municipal policy or give rise to municipal liability under Monell. There is no evidence to suggest that municipal decision-makers were aware of Chew's inconsistent implementation of the no-comment policy or that Chew had previously used force to enforce it with the tacit approval of policymakers. . . To the contrary, trial testimony indicates that the Sheriff's Office's policy was to ask people who tried to make announcements to sit down and, if they did not comply, to escort them out of the hall. . . Furthermore, one Sheriff's Office clerk testified that the violent response was something he '[had] never [seen] ... before' at a sheriff's sale and agreed that it was 'out of character of the normal conduct of business.'. .While the District Court found that the deputies approached Porter 'at the request of Chew'. . . and that 'Chew apparently asked for such a response,'. . . the fact that Chew apparently had the authority to direct the deputies to stop Porter from speaking does not make his decision to do so City policy. 'The fact that a particular official ... has discretion in the exercise of particular functions does not, without more, give rise to municipal liability based on an exercise of that discretion.'. . Rather, "[t]he official must also be responsible for establishing final government policy respecting such activity before the municipality can be held liable.'. . Thus, we cannot conclude that Chew's unofficial determination of how and when the policy was to be enforced, in contravention of the City's clear and nondiscriminatory policy prohibiting all comments, gives rise to liability under Monell."); Tlapanco v. Elges, 969 F.3d 638, 658 (6th Cir. 2020) ("Whether an individual is a final policymaker for purposes of § 1983 liability is a question of state or local law, and a showing of policymaking authority typically requires specific evidence that the official's decisions were not subject to review or that the official could set policy related to broad goals. . . Tlapanco has not demonstrated that state or local law vested McCabe with the authority to make county policy nor that McCabe's 'decisions are final and unreviewable and are not constrained by the official policies of superior officials.'. . Tlapanco's exclusive reliance on McCabe's deposition testimony regarding his second-in-command duties within OCSO is insufficient to satisfy his burden to provide evidence that McCabe had final policymaking authority to establish particular search and seizure practices for Oakland County. The district court properly granted summary judgment to Oakland County on Tlapanco's municipal liability claim."); Thompson v. District of Columbia (Thompson IV), 967 F.3d 804, 813-17 (D.C. Cir. 2020) ("[T]he record in this case shows that King was acting as a final policymaker on behalf of the District when he made 'the types of Lottery personnel decisions that led to Thompson's constructive termination' without notice or a pre-termination hearing. . . The District empowered King to make the final policy judgments for developing and carrying out the reduction in force at the Lottery Board, and he used that authority to take the personnel measures that constructively terminated Thompson without due process. His relevant personnel decisions were (i) unconstrained 'by policies enacted by others,' and (ii) unreviewable by any other authorized policymaker. . . So the District is liable for them under Monell. . . .We spilled a great deal of ink in Thompson III on King's authority under the reduction-in-force statute as it relates to Monell liability. . . . The District's failure to back up its contention that it had an 'established policy' in 1996 of mandating pre-transfer notice under the CMPA if the transfer resulted in a constructive termination closes the door on its argument that King was simply a rogue tortfeasor. . . Because the record in this case demonstrates that King had the sole and unreviewable authority to make the series of personnel decisions, including the transfer, that together amounted to Thompson's constructive termination without due process, he was a final policymaker for the District within the meaning of Monell. For that reason, the district court is directed to enter summary judgment in favor of Michelle Thompson on the question of Monell liability. . . .As a matter of law, King acted as a final policymaker when he took the series of personnel actions that resulted in Thompson's constructive termination without due process. That means that the District of Columbia is responsible for the wrong. We direct the district court to enter summary judgment for Michelle Thompson on the question of Monell liability, and we remand for further proceedings to determine the amount of damages owed, consistent with this opinion."); Longoria Next Friend of M.L. v. San Benito Indep. Consol. Sch. Dist., 942 F.3d 258, 271-72 (5th Cir. 2019) ("A municipality can be held liable only when it delegates policymaking authority, not when it delegates decisionmaking authority. . . Plaintiffs argue that Sanchez exercised policymaking authority when he rendered a final decision on M.L.'s dismissal from the cheerleading team, but the 'finality of an official's action does not ... automatically lend it the character of a policy[.]'. . . The Supreme Court's cases 'sharply distinguish[ ] between decisionmakers and final policymakers.'. . Without additional allegations that demonstrate Sanchez possessed delegated policymaking authority, plaintiffs fail to state a claim for municipal liability. Thus, we affirm the district court's dismissal of this claim."); Burke v. Regalado, 935 F.3d 960, 1001 (10th Cir. 2019) ("For substantially the same reasons that we find sufficient evidence of supervisory liability, a reasonable jury also could find official capacity liability. See Larez v. City of Los Angeles, 946 F.2d 630, 646-47 (9th Cir. 1991) (relying on evidence of a police chief's inadequate investigation of officers' use of force to support liability for the chief in his individual and official capacities). Sheriff Glanz—then the Tulsa County official charged with managing the jail—furthered a 'policy or custom,'. . . of deficient medical care at the jail characterized by inadequate training, understaffing, and chronic delays. A reasonable jury could find his continuous neglect of these problems 'was the moving force behind the injury alleged.'. . And as explained above, Sheriff Glanz acted with deliberate indifference toward the risk that the policy or custom of providing inadequate medical care would result in an injury like Mr. Williams's."); Webb v. Town of St. Joseph, 925 F.3d 209, 215-20 (5th Cir. 2019) ("The Webbs argue that St. Joseph's liability is grounded in the actions of two officials, the Town Attorney and Mayor Brown. We address in turn whether each is a 'final policymaker' whose one-time actions could generate municipal liability. . . .In sum, the Webbs argue that this falls into the narrow range of cases where municipal liability can stem from individual, one-off decisions by an authorized policymaker. They have not shown that the Town Attorney was a final policymaker for these purposes, and therefore have not shown that St. Joseph should be liable as a municipality for his discretionary decisions. It is possible that affirmative decisions made by the Mayor, rather than the Town Attorney, could have generated municipal liability. The only affirmative decision by Mayor Brown that the Webbs have adequately substantiated, however, was his initial decision to take efforts to collect on the—at that time, final—judgment. With our focus substantially narrowed, we therefore turn to whether this decision was the 'moving force' behind a violation of a constitutional right. . . . After establishing a sufficiently official municipal policy promulgated by an authorized policymaker, a plaintiff must then show that the policy was the 'moving force' behind the constitutional violation. . . This requires showing either that the policy itself was unconstitutional. . . or that it was adopted with deliberate indifference to the 'known or obvious fact that such constitutional violations would result.' . . As we have explained, the only potential municipal policy that could ground the Webbs' claim against St. Joseph arises from Mayor Brown's alleged decision, as a final policymaker, to initially begin undertaking efforts to collect on the judgment. . . . A common thread running throughout the Supreme Court's and our own caselaw on municipal liability is that such liability 'is limited to action for which the municipality is actually responsible.'. . The Webbs have painted a picture of poor decisions and bureaucratic dysfunction—but they have not established that St. Joseph policy was the moving force behind the violation of any constitutional right. We therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to St. Joseph on the Webbs' § 1983 claim."); Lopez v. Gibson, 770 F. App'x 982, 992-93 (11th Cir. 2019) ("An official is not a final policymaker where his decisions are subject to 'meaningful administrative review.'. . Generally, the existence of a reviewing body suffices to find that an official whose decisions are subject to review was not a final policymaker. . .This Court has found meaningful administrative review where there was review by a Career Service Council with the authority to order reinstatement or otherwise amend, alter, sustain, or reverse the decision of the employer. . . Also, this Court has found meaningful administrative review where there was review by a Civil Service Board with power to reverse an employer's termination decision. . . However, a plaintiff can attempt to demonstrate that the reviewing body's administrative review is not meaningful, such that the official should be considered the final policymaker. . . To succeed in such an argument, the plaintiff needs to show that the reviewing body has defective procedures, merely 'rubber stamps' the official's decision, or ratifies the official's decision and improper motive. . . It is the plaintiff's burden to show that the official is a final policymaker. . . If the defendant is not a final policymaker, the plaintiff's § 1983 claim fails against a defendant in his official capacity. . . The dispositive issue in this appeal is whether Sheriff Gibson is a final policymaker with respect to employment demotions of employees working for the Osceola County Sheriff's Office. . . . On appeal, Plaintiff Lopez argues that in 2017 Sheriff Gibson in his official capacity was the final policymaker because he had absolute authority over Lopez's demotion. Lopez contends that Sheriff Gibson has absolute authority over the deputies and the interpretation and application of the Sheriff's Office's policies. He argues that the Appeals Board did not establish any government policy or determine the constitutionality of Sheriff Gibson's interpretation of the conduct policies. Plaintiff Lopez acknowledges that the Sheriff's Office's Standards of Conduct prohibit publicly criticizing the Sheriff's Office, where such speech is defamatory, obscene, unlawful, undermines the effectiveness of the Sheriff's Office, interferes with the maintenance of discipline, or is made with reckless disregard for truth or falsity. Lopez does not challenge the constitutionality of the conduct standards vel non. Rather, Lopez contends that Sheriff Gibson should not have applied the existing standards to his conduct and demoted him because it was protected political speech. We need not address whether Lopez's posts on his 'community cop' page on Facebook were protected speech or not because Sheriff Gibson was not the final policymaker in regards to Lopez's demotion in any event. As the district court concluded, Sheriff Gibson was not the final policymaker with respect to Lopez's demotion because Florida law specifically delegated that authority to the Career Service Appeals Board. . . As recounted above, the Appeals Board had the power to review and reverse the Sheriff's discipline, and the Sheriff was bound by the Appeals Board's decision. . . Further, Sheriff Gibson's demotion of Lopez was subject to meaningful administrative review by the Appeals Board, which heard witnesses, deliberated, and issued its own fact findings and decision. . . The district court thus did not err in concluding that Sheriff Gibson in his official capacity was not the final policymaker as to Lopez's demotion."); Cherry Knoll, L.L.C. v. Jones, 922 F.3d 309, 317-18 (5th Cir. 2019) ("Cherry Knoll's well-pleaded factual allegations make it plausible that the City Council made the deliberate decision in 2014 to file the Subdivision Plats over Cherry Knoll's objection and to use the filed plats as leverage in its land-acquisition effort. These allegations satisfy the standard for official municipal policy under Pembaur, and the district court erred in finding otherwise."); Davison v. Randall, 912 F.3d 666, 689-90 (4th Cir. 2019) ("Here, Davison failed to put forward evidence establishing that Randall was a final municipal policymaker with regard to her banning of Davison from the Chair's Facebook Page. On the contrary, record evidence establishes that the Loudoun Board retained authority to establish municipal policy with respect to social media pages, as it adopted a social media policy governing the County's official social media pages. Davison concedes as much, arguing that the Loudoun Board 'neglected ... to extend its written guidelines to Board members' official pages.'. . But that argument presupposes that the Loudoun Board—not Randall—had authority to establish municipal policy with respect 'to Board members' official pages.' Davison nevertheless argues that the Loudoun Board 'implicitly' delegated its final policymaking authority to Randall by not addressing individual Loudoun Board members' official pages in its social media policy. Davison is correct that delegation of final policy making authority may be 'implied from a continued course of knowing acquiescence by the governing body in the exercise of policymaking authority by an agency or official.'. . But Davison identifies no evidence that the Loudoun Board knew of the Chair's Facebook Page, let alone that it 'aquiesce[d]' in Randall's administration of the page and banning of Davison, in particular. On the contrary, the district court found that Randall made a one-off, 'unilateral decision to ban [Davison] in the heat of the moment, and reconsidered soon thereafter,'. . . before the Loudoun Board had a chance to learn of her action. In such circumstances, the district court did not reversibly err in rejecting Davison's official capacity claim."); Barone v. City of Springfield, Oregon, 902 F.3d 1091, 1107-09 (9th Cir. 2018) ("We conclude that the City Manager possessed final policymaking authority, and that there is a triable issue of material fact whether the City Manager delegated his final policymaking authority over employee discipline in the Department to Chief Doney. A municipal policy may arise where a government 'chooses a course of action tailored to a particular situation' that is 'not intended to control decisions in later situations.'. . . The course of action must be 'made from among various alternatives by the official ... responsible for establishing final policy' on the subject matter in question. . . Therefore, we look to whether the individual had final policymaking authority 'in a particular area, or on a particular issue.'. . Oregon law provides that '[t]he powers of the city shall be vested in the [city] council.'. . In turn, the City of Springfield Charter, governing the city council, delegates to the City Manager the authority to 'prescribe rules governing the non-discriminatory recruitment, selection, promotion, compensation, transfer, demotion, suspension, layoff and dismissal of City employees.' The City Charter does not delegate any authority to the Chief of Police. Barone argues that the City Manager was not the final policymaker by reading the City Charter in an unduly narrow fashion. She contends that the City Charter did not grant the City Manager the sole authority over personnel decisions, but rather the authority only to more broadly 'prescribe rules' about personnel decisions. This argument is unconvincing. . . . [T]he City Charter delegated the pertinent final policymaking authority to the City Manager. . . The final policymaker is the individual who had authority in the particular area where the constitutional violation occurred. . . In this case, the relevant area of policymaking is employee discipline because the constitutional violation was requiring Barone to sign the amended Agreement in order to keep her position at the Department. This decision was within the purview of the City Manager under the City Charter—requiring Barone to sign the amended Agreement was a 'rule[ ] governing' her 'suspension, layoff and dismissal.' The City Charter therefore delegated final policymaking authority to the City Manager. Because the City Charter delegated final policymaking authority to the City Manager, we now consider whether he delegated final policymaking authority over employee discipline in the Department to Chief Doney. Appellees liken this case to Gillette v. Delmore, wherein we concluded that a fire chief's decision to discipline a fire fighter did not trigger Monell liability because the city charter 'grant[ed] authority to make City employment policy only to the City Manager and the City Council.'. . The fire chief possessed 'the discretionary authority to hire and fire employees,' but this authority was 'not sufficient to establish a basis for municipal liability.'. . Appellees argue that, similar to the fire chief in Gillette, Chief Doney possessed only discretionary authority. We disagree. The plaintiff in Gillette failed to provide evidence that the City Manager delegated final policymaking authority to the fire chief. . . In contrast, the record before us contains evidence that the City Manager delegated his final policymaking authority over employee discipline in the Department to Chief Doney. For example, Chief Doney conceded that 'the buck stops' with him '[w]ithin the department'; Director Utecht admitted that 'whatever decision [Chief Doney] made, the city manager would support in this case'; and the City Manager testified that he had 'no role' in the decision to fire or discipline Barone. These statements create a triable issue of material fact about who possessed final policymaking authority on employee discipline for the Department. Because there is a genuine issue of material fact about whether the City Manager delegated final policymaking authority to Chief Doney, the district court erred in granting summary judgment in favor of the City. If the City Manager delegated the relevant authority to Chief Doney, the City would be liable under Monell for Chief Doney's decision to require Barone to sign the amended Agreement. We therefore reverse and remand for consideration of whether the City can be held liable for Chief Doney's conduct for the reasons herein noted."); Hunter v. Town of Mocksville, N. Carolina, 897 F.3d 538, 555-61 (4th Cir. 2018) ("In concluding that neither Cook nor Bralley was a final policymaker of the Town with regard to the termination of Plaintiffs, the district court looked only to state law—specifically, North Carolina General Statute Section 160A-164, which vests the Mocksville Town Board with discretion to 'adopt or provide' personnel policies for Town employees. . . This was error. Read alone, the state statute does vest authority in the Town Board to make personnel decisions. However, as the Town concedes, . . when determining whether a local official possesses final policymaking authority, the Supreme Court has directed courts to look to 'the relevant legal materials, including state and local positive law[.]' [citing Jett] And the relevant local positive law in this case makes clear that the Town delegated to Bralley final and unconstrained policymaking authority with regard to the challenged actions at issue. . . . Here, the Town Board has exercised its statutory authority not to adopt its own policies or regulations governing the specific terms of its employees' employment. In particular, the Town Board 'does not have a written personnel policy.'. . Nor does the Town Board have any formal grievance procedure or any 'other requirement which requires the Town to provide an employee in a potential discharge situation with pre-discharge procedural due process ... or post-discharge procedural due process.'. . [U]nder the ordinance's plain language, the Town Board delegated to Bralley, as Town Manager, its statutory authority to set personnel policy for the Town. In particular, the ordinance confers on Bralley unconstrained authority to define nearly all terms of employment for Town personnel, including all matters related to Plaintiffs' hiring, supervision, and discharge. . . . Bralley wielded such authority—free of any constraints on her discretion—when she terminated Plaintiffs in violation of the First Amendment. The Town did not constrain Bralley's authority; indeed, the Town conceded that it has long since repealed all personnel policies that may have constrained Bralley's authority while declining to promulgate new ones. Moreover, the Town concedes that it maintained no formal review process for evaluating Bralley's termination decisions. In light of these concessions and the Town Board's express delegation of final policymaking authority to Bralley, we conclude that the circumstances surrounding Bralley's decision to terminate Plaintiffs present all the hallmarks of a final policymaker wielding her authority. . . .Indeed, our sister circuits have held that municipal officials constitute final policymakers in materially indistinguishable circumstances. [collecting cases] To hold otherwise would insulate the Town from liability in virtually every case—a result contrary to the principles underlying Section 1983. If a municipality, like the Town, could expressly delegate to a municipal official the unfettered authority to make all employment decisions (excepting the award of 'fringe benefits') without constraining whatsoever the official's exercise of that authority, then that municipality would have the ability to effectuate employment policy without incurring the risk of liability for any unconstitutional policies the official may effect on its behalf. . . . If Bralley is not the final policymaker for the Town with respect to personnel policy, and the Town has no personnel policies on the books, then who is the final policymaker? And whose policies have governed the employment relationship between the Town and its employees for the past several decades? To hold that Bralley is not a final policymaker with regard to the termination of Plaintiffs would, in effect, mean that the Town had no policymakers with regard to those personnel decisions, because the Town Board has delegated final policymaking authority to Bralley, does not routinely review personnel decisions made by Bralley, and has not maintained any personnel policies for at least three decades. . . Such a conclusion would sanction and encourage 'egregious attempts by local governments to insulate themselves from liability for unconstitutional policies[.]'. . This cannot be so. . . . Here, the Town Board chose to confer on Bralley unfettered final policymaking authority with respect to almost all personnel matters—including terminations. . . The Town made no effort to constrain or limit that delegation. And, as a matter of custom, Bralley exercised that delegated authority without oversight by the Board. Accordingly, the Town Board's 'unexercised ultimate authority' to rescind its ordinance conferring such authority does not undermine our conclusion that Bralley constituted a final policymaker of the Town with regard to the conduct at issue—the unlawful termination of Plaintiffs. . . .Finally, although we hold that Bralley, as Town Manager, was a final municipal policymaker with regard to the conduct at issue, we agree with the district court's conclusion that Cook, as Police Chief, was not. In particular, we find that Justice Brennan's hypothetical in Pembaur illustrates precisely why Bralley is a final policymaker for the Town with respect to establishing personnel policies, and why Cook is not: Because the Town Board 'delegated its power to establish final employment policy to the [Town Manager], the [Town Manager's] decisions ... represent [Town] policy and could give rise to municipal liability.'. . And here the record is replete with evidence demonstrating that Cook's personnel decisions were always subject to review by Bralley. . . Plaintiffs concede as much in their briefs. . . Accordingly, we conclude that Cook was not a final policymaker for the Town with respect to personnel policy."); Southern Atlantic Companies, LLC v. School Bd. of Orange County, Florida, No. 16-15446, 2017 WL 2569905, at *3–4 (11th Cir. June 14, 2017) (not published) ('Southern Atlantic maintains that, pursuant to a longstanding Board practice, the general counsel possessed final authority to settle litigation under $50,000, 'as well as other "ministerial functions" like assigning [a] [b]ond.'. . Southern Atlantic asserts that, because the fees and costs sought against the bond totaled less than $50,000, Mr. Rodriguez had final policymaking authority over the alleged unconstitutional actions. Assuming that the general counsel's alleged decision-making authority over settlements and assignments was so 'permanent and well settled as to constitute a "custom or usage" with the force of law,'. . . Southern Atlantic's argument fails because his authority is not plenipotentiary. And that is a problem for Southern Atlantic because, as the district court explained, our precedent makes it clear that a government employee is a final policymaker 'only if his decisions have legal effect without further action by the governing body'—in this case, the Board—'and if the governing body lacks the power to reverse the member or employee's decision.'. . None of the record evidence cited by Southern Atlantic indicates that the School Board lacked the authority to override the general counsel's litigation decisions. To the contrary, the testimony cited by Southern Atlantic, . . . shows that the Board was responsible for setting policy . . . and at all times retained the authority to micromanage litigation and overrule the general counsel's decisions[.] . . . It therefore does not matter that the Board generally did not review the general counsel's litigation decisions. What matters is that the Board could have intervened in the decision-making process and, as the entity vested with final policymaking authority, decided the matter. . . The alleged custom, even as characterized by Southern Atlantic, did not prevent the Board from intervening and overriding the general counsel's decisions, so it remained the final policymaker."); Thompson v. Shock, 852 F.3d 786 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Our review of Arkansas law and the policies promulgated by Faulkner County reveal that Sheriff Shock did not act as a final policymaker in the employment decisions of the Faulkner County Sheriff's Office because employment decisions made by Sheriff Shock were subject to review by the quorum court. We therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to Sheriff Shock in his official capacity."); Vogt v. City of Hays, 844 F.3d 1235, 1251-52 (10th Cir. 2017), cert. dismissed, 138 S. Ct. 1683 (2018) ("Mr. Vogt pleaded facts indicating that the Hays police chief was a final policymaker on the requirements for police employees. This inquiry turns on whether the Hays police chief had authority to establish official policy on discipline of employees within the police department. . . To make this determination, we consider whether the police chief's decisions were constrained by general policies enacted by others, whether the decisions were reviewable by others, and whether the decisions were within the police chief's authority. . .The complaint alleges that the Hays police chief had final policymaking authority for the police department. There is nothing in the complaint to suggest that his decisions were subject to further review up the chain-of-command. Hays argues that final policymaking authority rested with the City Manager and City Commission rather than the Police Chief. For this argument, Hays points to municipal ordinances stating that the city commission must hire a city manager, who appoints the police chief and administers city business. But the city ordinances do not specify who bears ultimate responsibility for discipline of police officers like Mr. Vogt. . . . Under Dill and Flanagan, we conclude that Mr. Vogt has adequately pleaded final policymaking authority on the part of the Hays police chief. As in Dill and Flanagan, the city has pointed to general supervisory responsibilities of the city manager. But there is nothing in the municipal ordinances suggesting that the city manager plays a meaningful role in disciplinary decisions within the police department. The absence of such provisions is fatal at this stage, where we must view all of the allegations and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of Mr. Vogt. See Dias v. City and Cty. of Denver, 567 F.3d 1169, 1178 (10th Cir. 2009). As a result, we conclude that Mr. Vogt has adequately pleaded final policymaking authority on the part of the Hays police chief."); Liverman v. City of Petersburg, 844 F.3d 400, 413 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Here the fact that Dixon serves 'under the direction and control of the city manager' does not necessarily establish that he lacked final authority to promulgate the policy whose validity has been successfully challenged herein. We must therefore remand to the district court to undertake a more particularized inquiry into whether Chief Dixon possessed final authority to set policies on the parameters of speech on the part of those law enforcement officers under his command. If so, the City may also be held liable for the injuries that were caused by the applications of that policy."); Bolderson v. City of Wentzville, 840 F.3d 982, 985-86 (8th Cir. 2016) ("The applicable Wentzville ordinance shows unquestionably that the city administrator is not the final municipal authority for present purposes: The ordinance provides that '[t]he City Administrator shall be the chief administrative assistant to the Mayor, and shall have general superintending control of the administration and management of the government business, officers and employees of the City, subject to the direction and supervision of the Mayor.'. . That the city administrator is deemed an 'administrative assistant to the Mayor' who acts 'subject to the direction and supervision of the Mayor' shows that it is the mayor—not the city administrator—who has ultimate authority to hire and fire employees. We note further that we have adopted the distinction between final policymakers and final decisionmakers that a Supreme Court plurality drew in Pembaur: The fact that 'a particular official—even a policymaking official—has discretion in the exercise of particular functions does not, without more, give rise to municipal liability based on an exercise of that discretion.'. . So possessing 'discretion to hire and fire does not necessarily include responsibility for establishing related policy.'. . Therefore, the city administrator's power to hire and fire employees, assuming that power existed here, could not transform him into a policymaker. Bolderson also contends that the mayor's delegation of authority to the city administrator to address Bolderson's criticisms and the mayor's alleged tacit approval of the city administrator's decision to terminate her establishes municipal liability. We disagree again, because, as a plurality of the Supreme Court stated in City of St. Louis v. Praprotnik, 485 U.S. 112, 130 (1988), 'Simply going along with discretionary decisions made by one's subordinates ... is not a delegation to them of the authority to make policy.'. . Bolderson therefore has not shown that the mayor's delegation of authority or tacit approval of the city administrator's decision was the moving force behind her termination. . . In fact, Bolderson says that the city administrator was the sole decisionmaker with regard to her termination. Without a showing that the mayor played a more active role in Bolderson's termination, she cannot demonstrate that the city is liable; otherwise the city could be liable solely as an employer of an alleged tortfeasor."); Thompson v. District of Columbia (Thompson III), 832 F.3d 339, 347-51 (D.C. Cir. 2016) ("The District asserts that, even if Thompson was denied due process, Monell v. Department of Social Services, 436 U.S. 658 (1978), shields the city from liability for his termination. . . Here, the District contends that King was not a final policymaker for the District's personnel decisions. According to the District, King possessed the same authority as the hypothetical Sheriff—i.e., even though King, as the Executive Director of the Lottery, had discretion to hire and fire individual employees, the Lottery Board maintained final authority over both King and his personnel decisions. In support, the District points to a provision of the city code that gave the Board authority to direct and supervise King's employment of others at the Lottery. . . According to the District, this provision cabined King's power to make personnel decisions by subjecting his decisions to oversight from the Board. Further, the District urges that the provision constrained King's discretion by requiring him to comply with the Comprehensive Merit Personnel Act (CMPA), which required that a career civil servant receive notice and a hearing before termination. The District argues that it cannot be subject to liability for King's deviation from that official municipal policy, because, in the Supreme Court's terms, the official 'polic[y], rather than the subordinate's departures from [it], [is] the act of the municipality.'. . If our analysis were constrained to a single provision in the city code, the District's argument would be more persuasive than it is. Looking at this provision in tandem with other parts of the code, we conclude there is significant reason to believe that King was a final policymaker with regard to the types of Lottery personnel decisions that led to Thompson's constructive termination. We have already recognized that King had 'absolute discretion "to identify positions for abolishment"' for the purposes of the reduction in force at the time of

Thompson's constructive termination. . . The D.C. Code further provided that King would 'make a final determination that a position within the [Lottery] is to be abolished.'. . Moreover, the record is replete with evidence that King exercised his authority over personnel matters without any control by other District officials. . . . Nor is it clear that other policies restricted King's ability to terminate Thompson, such that those policies, 'rather than the subordinate's departures from them,' were the act of the municipality. As Executive Director of the Lottery, King was the designated 'personnel authority' for all Lottery employees except himself and the Deputy Director. . . This meant that King was at least empowered to implement 'rules and regulations' governing Lottery personnel matters. . . In fact, the code presumed that he would also issue rules, regulations, and standards pursuant to this authority. . . Moreover, the District fails to point to evidence in the city's laws that might indicate that the Board ever exercised any of its authority to constrain King's policymaking by passing its own personnel policies to 'direct' him. . . At the time of Thompson's termination, King's personnel policies also seem to have been removed from the ordinary rules of oversight that the District points to as evidence that the Board maintained the ability to direct and supervise King's personnel decisions. . . . Because neither party has fully briefed the impact of these provisions on the Monell analysis, however, we remand this issue to the district court for it to consider in the first instance. On remand, Thompson may also present his alternative arguments for the District's liability under Monell—e.g., that the District had developed a 'policy or practice' of unconstitutional terminations at the Lottery."); Kristofek v. Village of Orland Hills, 832 F.3d 785, 799-800 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Here, Scully lacked the requisite independent authority to fire officers. As a part-time Village police officer, Kristofek was subject to a one-year probationary period that was to end in September 2012—approximately five months after he was fired. . . Although Village Code permitted Scully to fire officers within this probationary period, the power to do so was subject to the Village Administrator's consent. . .The decision to terminate Kristofek's employment was made in accordance with § 35.019. It is uncontested that Scully and Daly (the Village Administrator) met to discuss Kristofek shortly before he was terminated. Scully testified that he 'recommended' that Kristofek be terminated, and that Daly agreed (assuming Kristofek subsequently confirmed his official-misconduct statements). Daly not only confirmed this account, but also testified that he had 'always' been advised about employee terminations before they occurred. In addition, shortly after he terminated Kristofek in person, Scully sent a memo to Daly confirming that the termination had occurred. Such an action appears to us unnecessary if Scully had actually had the final say. So Kristofek has failed to show that a genuine factual issue exists regarding Scully's ability to unilaterally fire police officers. Kristofek argues that even if Scully needed Daly's approval to terminate Kristofek, Daly consented 'with full knowledge Scully was terminating Kristofek for his speech regarding corruption.' Monell liability, he claims, would attach on this basis alone. Kristofek may be referencing the 'ratification' theory, under which a plaintiff 'must allege that a municipal official with final policymaking authority approved the subordinate's decision and the basis for it.'. . Even if we assume Daly believed that Kristofek should have been fired in retaliation for his speech, the ratification theory does not help Kristofek. As a threshold matter, Kristofek does not state or even imply that Daly possessed final authority to set firing policy. So the ratification theory fails on that ground alone. Instead, Kristofek contends that Scully possessed this authority. But that claim lacks support under Illinois law. The Village police department's policies and procedures manual directs the police chief to 'plan, organize, staff, direct, and control the personnel and resources of the Department.' The references to 'staff[ing]' and to 'control[ling] the personnel,' according to Kristofek, demonstrate that Scully possessed policymaking authority regarding officer firing. But this overlooks the fact that the Village Board is tasked with approving the policies and procedures by which police officers were bound. . . So, while Scully may have exercised authority over the enforcement of the policies and procedures the Village Board approved—particularly if they did not involve hiring and firing—he did not possess final authority over policy creation."); Groden v. City of Dallas , Texas, 826 F.3d 280, 282, 286 (5th Cir. 2016) ("[F]or purposes of Rule 12(b)(6), we hold that a plaintiff is not required to single out the specific policymaker in his complaint; instead, a plaintiff need only plead facts that show that the defendant or defendants acted pursuant to a specific official policy, which was promulgated or ratified by the legally authorized policymaker. Here, the statutorily authorized policymaker is the Dallas city council. Groden pled sufficient facts to show that the city council promulgated or ratified the illegal-arrest policy and thus that this policy was attributable to the city of Dallas. . . . In Bolton, we held that under Texas law, the final policymaker for the city of Dallas is the Dallas city council. Bolton, 541 F.3d at 550 (citing Texas Local Gov't Code Ann. § 25.029). Thus, to show that the city of Dallas acted unconstitutionally, Groden must show that the city council promulgated or ratified an unconstitutional policy. Accordingly, we now face a single question: whether Groden pled facts that, read in the light most favorable to him, show that the city council promulgated or ratified the challenged policy. We conclude that he did. Groden alleged that the city 'publicly announced a new policy' of cracking down on vendors in Dealey Plaza and that the city's official 'spokesman,' Vincent Golbeck, 'gave media interviews describing the new policy.' The allegation that an official city spokesperson announced an official city policy allows for a reasonable pleading inference that this crackdown policy was attributable to an official policy made by the policymaker of the city (i.e., the city council). As noted above, Groden alleges further that this crackdown policy authorized the illegal arrests of individuals for engaging in annoying speech. Accordingly, Groden has pled sufficient facts to suggest, for the purpose of a 12(b)(6) motion, that the city council promulgated or ratified the crackdown policy of which he complains."); Miller v. City of St. Paul, 823 F.3d 503, 507 (8th Cir. 2016) ("While Miller points out that commander Englund was responsible for drafting the security plan—which he asserts incorporates IFM's [Irish Fair of Minnesota] policy—he has not alleged any facts showing that she was 'responsible for establishing final government policy respecting such activity,' a prerequisite to municipal liability under § 1983. . . Nor has he alleged any 'facts showing that policymaking officials had notice of or authorized [Englund]'s conduct' which could give rise to municipal liability. . . We therefore affirm the dismissal of his claims against the city, its police chief, and Englund in her official capacity."); Advanced Tech. Bldg. Sols., L.L.C. v. City of Jackson, Miss., 817 F.3d 163, 166-69 (5th Cir. 2016) ("[B]y ATBS's own admission, the city council holds the power of the purse. The obvious conclusion is that the city is likewise the final policymaker for funding decisions. It is true that the mayor can veto council resolutions (and every ordinance passed by the council must be submitted to the mayor for approval or rejection); nevertheless, the council can override a veto, thus giving the council ultimate say. . . Because the council has the right of final review, it is the final policymaker. This conclusion is consistent with cases in which we have found reviewability by another political body 'relevant to showing that an official is not a final policymaker.'. . .Thus, in multiple cases, we have affirmed that officials are not final policymakers when a supervisory board has the authority to accept or reject their decisions. . . .We reaffirm our conclusion in Gelin, which was also stated in Bolton: Review procedures are relevant to show that someone 'is not a final policymaker.'. . .[H]ere there is no doubt that the city council, which is responsible for approving the issuance of bonds, has final policymaking power with respect to funding decisions, notwithstanding any role the mayor may play in negotiating individual development projects and bringing them to the council's attention. Thus, the mayor's ability to stop a project at lower levels of governance is irrelevant for purposes of liability. Indeed, even if the council lacked the ability to review the mayor's decisions in regard to individual projects, given the council's power over the budget, it is still unlikely that the mayor could be considered the final policymaker in regard to city funding."); Bible Believers v. Wayne Cnty., Mich., 805 F.3d 228, 260-61 (6th Cir. 2016) (en banc), cert. denied, 136 S. Ct. 2013 (2016) ("We conclude that Wayne County Corporation Counsel's involvement in drafting a letter to the Bible Believers, and in sanctioning the Deputy Chiefs' decision to remove the Bible Believers from the Festival, easily resolves the matter of municipal liability. . . .[W]ith respect to a single decision, municipal liability is appropriate 'where the decisionmaker possesses final authority to establish policy with respect to the action ordered.'. . Corporation Counsel informed the Bible Believers by way of letter that 'under state law and local ordinances, individuals can be held criminally accountable for conduct which has the tendency to incite riotous behavior or otherwise disturb the peace.' Then the Deputy Chiefs consulted Corporation Counsel at the Festival to confirm that they could threaten the Bible Believers with arrest for disorderly conduct because the Bible Believers speech had attracted an unruly crowd of teenagers. As discussed at length, speech cannot be proscribed simply because it has a 'tendency' to cause unrest or because people reacted violently in response to the speech. . .Corporation Counsel's misstatement of the law in a letter may not constitute an official policy, but her direction and authorization for the Deputy Chiefs to threaten the Bible Believers with arrest based on the prevailing circumstances is certainly an action for which she 'possesse[d] final authority to establish municipal policy.'. . The relevant facts in this case bearing on municipal liability are substantially similar to the facts of Pembaur. . . Therefore, Wayne County is liable."); McDonald v. Wise, 769 F.3d 1202, 1216 (10th Cir. 2014) ("Defendants deny municipal liability primarily based on their theory that the district court correctly held Mr. McDonald was not deprived of a property or liberty interest. They do not dispute that Mayor Hancock was the final policy maker with respect to the termination of city employees, including Mr. McDonald, which is in accordance with the city charter provisions we referenced above. The City is therefore liable if the Mayor deprived Mr. McDonald of his liberty interest without due process."); Singletary v. D.C., 766 F.3d 66, 74 (D.C. Cir. 2014) ("In these circumstances, the decision to revoke Singletary's parole based on evidence falling short of constitutional standards was not 'the action of a policy maker within the government.'. . The Mayor possessed authority to establish rules governing the Board's proceedings, subject to disapproval by the D.C. Council; but there is no suggestion or allegation that the Board acted under direction of any such rule when it revoked Singletary's parole based on unreliable evidence. It is true that the Board possessed authority to render final revocation decisions in individual cases. . . But such discretion is insufficient to create municipal liability unless the decisionmaker had been granted final policymaking authority under D.C. law in the area of parole revocation. . . . Such authority was lacking here. Neither the Board as a whole nor the three-member quorum that revoked Singletary's parole was authorized to promulgate general rules or other policies. And while the Mayor delegated his rulemaking authority to the Chairperson, we have no reason to suppose that the Chairperson's rulemaking authority was subject to approval by the Board. The Chairperson, moreover, did not promulgate any pertinent rule for review by the D.C. Council. Even if the mere participation of the Chairperson in an individual revocation decision could suffice to constitute action by a District policymaker for purposes of municipal liability—an issue we do not reach—the Chairperson was not one of the three voting Board members in Singletary's case. The Board thus was 'constrained by policies not of [its] making,' and its decision to 'depart[ ]' from those policies by revoking Singletary's parole based on unreliable hearsay was not an 'act of the municipality' for purposes of § 1983. . . .We therefore hold that the District was entitled to summary judgment on the question of its liability. This court previously held that Singletary suffered a violation of his constitutional rights when the Board revoked his parole based on evidence lacking adequate indicia of reliability. He served a lengthy period in confinement pending the resolution of that constitutional claim. The issue we now confront, however, is the distinct one of whether 'a custom or policy of the [District] caused the violation' of his constitutional rights for purposes of attributing the violation to the District. . . Answering that question in the negative, we vacate the judgment of the district court and remand for proceedings consistent with this opinion."); Carter v. City of Melbourne, Fla., 731 F.3d 1161, 1167, 1168 (11th Cir. 2013) ("Initially, we disagree with the City that that the fact that the collective bargaining agreement gave Carter the right to appeal a disciplinary or personnel decision to an independent arbitrator means that the underlying decision is nonfinal for purposes of Monell liability. An independent arbitrator, who is not otherwise an employee of the city, is not vested with final policymaking authority for the city. What our precedents mean by meaningful administrative review is plainly review by a municipal official's superiors. An independent arbitrator's review of a decision by a city employee does not constitute a 'review by the municipality's authorized policymakers,'. . . and the underlying decision reviewed by the arbitrator would be final for the purposes of municipal liability (so long as there are no other forms of meaningful review of the decision by city policymakers). As the Ninth Circuit explained, '[t]hat someone outside of the [municipal government] may reverse the ... official's decision does not mean that the official does not speak for the [municipality] when he or she initially makes that decision."'Lytle v. Carl, 382 F.3d 978, 986 (9th Cir.2004). Indeed, if the City's position were correct, then an arbitrator's ability to resolve a dispute or even a federal court's jurisdiction to hear employment-related claims, pursuant to Title VII or 42 U.S.C. § 1983, would amount to an additional layer of meaningful review, and there would be no such thing as a final policymaker for a municipality. Municipalities could effectively insulate themselves from any liability under a final-policymaker theory simply by providing for arbitration. We nevertheless conclude that the district court correctly concluded that Carter failed to establish that any of the personnel, internal affairs, or disciplinary decisions about which he complains was made by a final policymaker for the City such that municipal liability attached. Carter failed to present any evidence that Dr. Schluckebier made the decision to fire him or ratified the decision once made by his subordinates. Carter presented nothing more than conclusory allegations at the summary judgment stage, and those unsupported allegations do not suffice to create a triable issue of fact. . . As a result, Carter's Monell claims must fail."); Kristofek v. Village of Orland Hills, 712 F.3d 979, 987, 988 (7th Cir. 2013) (Kristofek I) ("We find that Kristofek has stated, albeit barely, a plausible claim that Scully had at least de facto authority to set policy for hiring and firing. The complaint suggests Scully was fully in charge of the police department and that his firing decisions were not reviewed. . . The picture painted by the complaint, which includes Scully's angry reaction to Kristofek's speech, 'suggests that [Scully] had the unfettered discretion to hire and fire whomever he pleased.'. . see also Gschwind, 692 F.3d at 848 (school board permitted principals to "make evaluation and employment decisions as they see fit," making the principal a final policymaker). And it is plausible that Scully essentially had a de facto policy that anyone who made noise about political corruption or favoritism would be fired, especially when he equated 'speaking to other persons about the circumstances of the arrest of the driver' as a breach of trust against Scully, and then suggested that he could not work with anyone whom he could not trust. By firing Kristofek and escorting him out of the building in front of his co-workers, many of whom were well aware of Kristofek's speech, Scully made it clear to his staff that anyone else who complained about the November 2010 incident (or any other incident involving political favoritism) would meet a similar fate. Two other officers involved in the incident have left the force since that time. . . . At oral argument, Orland Hills suggested that the Village Board never formally delegated to Scully the authority to set policy in regards to hiring and firing, rather only to make final hiring and firing decisions. But even if it were appropriate to consider this fact outside the pleadings on a motion to dismiss, that fact alone does not necessarily preclude, or render implausible, the fact that Scully essentially had de facto authority to set hiring and firing policy 'without as much as a whisper' from the Village Board. . . Kristofek has thus adequately stated a claim against the Village at this early stage. Orland Hills will, of course, have an opportunity to show through evidence that it has not violated Kristofek's constitutional rights."); Gschwind v. Heiden, 692 F.3d 844, 847, 848 (7th Cir. 2012) ("In Illinois the school board is the ultimate policymaking body with regard to personnel decisions. . . The school district's superintendent, although the highest official of the school district, is not a member of the board and does not have the ultimate responsibility for such decisions. . . The superintendent authorized the principal to fire Gschwind, and the board approved that decision. When Gschwind complained to the superintendent about the decision of the principal and assistant principal to force him to resign, the superintendent replied that 'it was the policy of the school district and the Board of Education to allow principals and assistant principals to make evaluation and employment decisions as they see fit with respect to the teachers they supervise and for the school district and the Board of Education to follow these decisions and recommendations.' This was evidence of a policy of the school district of condoning unconstitutional terminations, since principals and assistant principals might 'see fit' to fire teachers on unconstitutional grounds."); Milestone v. City of Monroe, Wis., 665 F.3d 774, 778, 781 (7th Cir. 2011) ("We agree that the Senior Center director and the Senior Citizens Board were not the City's final policymakers for purposes of enforcing the Code of Conduct. Under state and local law, Milestone had the right to ask the Monroe Common Council to overturn the expulsion order, and her failure to do so precludes municipal liability under Monell

to the extent that the claimed constitutional violations stem from the imposition of the ban. This result does not impose a requirement of exhaustion of administrative remedies under § 1983, but follows from the Common Council's role as the relevant policymaker for the sanction imposed on Milestone. . . .In by-passing the Common Council, Milestone deprived the City's final policymaker of the opportunity to review the acts of municipal subordinates, including their compliance with city policy and even the wisdom of city policy itself."); Delia v. City of Rialto, 621 F.3d 1069, 1083 (9th Cir. 2010) ("The facts here mirror the Pembaur illustration. Chief Wells clearly had supervisory and final decisionmaking authority over the City's Fire Department. In that capacity, he signed the order requiring Delia to produce the rolls of insulation. The record, however, is devoid of any evidence that Chief Wells's authority included responsibility for establishing final departmental policy. To the contrary, the City's Code of Ordinances places policymaking authority for the fire department in the exclusive hands of the city council. . . Thus, only the city council's decisions would provide a basis for city liability."); Zarnow ex rel. Estate of Zarnow v. City Of Wichita Falls Tex., 614 F.3d 161, 167, 168, 170 (5th Cir. 2010) ("There is a fine distinction between a policymaker and a decisionmaker. . . The fact that an official's decisions are final is insufficient to demonstrate policymaker status. . .Relying on Article 12, the City insists that the City Manager has supervisory authority over the police chief. This type of review of the police chief's actions demonstrates, the City argues, that he is not a final policymaker. . . The nature of the administrative oversight is important in determining 'policymaker' status. An official may be a policymaker even if a separate governing body retains some powers. . . . Although the City offered evidence that the City Council periodically authorized the creation of various police task forces, those resolutions have little to do with police policy. There is no evidence that the City Council has ever commented authoritatively on the internal procedures of the department. Consequently, the administrative review process in place here does not conclusively demonstrate that Chief Coughlin is not a policymaker. Still, we have maintained that 'neither complete discretionary authority nor the unreviewability of such authority automatically results in municipal liability. There must be more.' Bolton v. City of Dallas, Tex., 541 F.3d 545, 551 (5th Cir.2008). We agree with the district court that the General Orders promulgated by the police chief sufficed to be the 'more' that is needed to prove policymaking authority in these circumstances. On this evidence, the chief of police is the sole official responsible for internal police policy. Others have only marginal involvement with the internal procedures of the police force. The alleged constitutional violation arose from a peculiar interpretation of a 'plain view' procedure, which was employed only during police activities. Although no General Order was ever entered regarding this policy, it appears that the police chief would have been authorized to speak on the City's behalf if such a policy was created. Accordingly, we hold that the City impliedly delegated its policymaking authority to the chief of police. . . . Here, there was no deliberate indifference. [Chief] Coughlin shared the errant view of the doctrine which caused Zarnow's constitutional deprivation. Negligent misinformation is insufficient to establish supervisory liability. . . Similarly, there is no evidence that Coughlin's failure to supervise the search rose above the level of negligent inaction."); Valle v. City of Houston, 613 F.3d 536, 543, 544 (5th Cir. 2010) ("The Valles contend that when a decision is made under GO 600-05 and SOP 200/1.01 about how to handle a special threat situation, the person who makes that decision is 'making policy for the specific arrest' because the designated decisionmaker is exercising authority delegated by the chief of police who is the final policymaker for arrest decisions. Although GO 600-05 and SOP 200/1.01 confer decisionmaking or operational command authority on Captain Williams, it does not follow that Captain Williams, or another person to whom such authority is delegated, acts in a policymaking capacity. Captain Williams was afforded a certain measure of discretion in carrying out the City's policy. . . . Assuming that Captain Williams was delegated some level of decisionmaking authority, GO 600-05 and SOP 200/1.01 constrained his authority and set forth the range of choices which he could make in a given situation. The fact that Captain Williams made the final decision in this situation does not mean that he was setting City policy regarding the making of arrests. . . Nor does the fact that Captain Williams's decision violated Esparza's right to be free of an unconstitutional seizure elevate his decision to one attributable to the municipality. . . Although Captain Williams's decision to order entry into the home was arguably the 'moving force' behind the constitutional violations that resulted in Esparza's death, because his decision was not a decision by a final policymaker of the City, the City cannot be liable. Thus, the district court properly granted summary judgment on the Valles' municipal liability claim against the City."); Wragg v. Village of Thornton, 604 F.3d 464, 469-70 (7th Cir. 2010) ("Although the board of trustees had final power to appoint and remove appointed officers, 65 Ill. Comp. Stat. 5/3.1-30-5, 35-10, there remains an issue of fact as to whether only President Swan had final power to retain appointed officers he had not removed. Swan's decision to retain Klaczak by not removing him was solely within his authority, 65 Ill. Comp. Stat. 5/3.1-35-10, and not subject to meaningful review. Id. So whether Swan had the final power to retain Klaczak turns on whether his non-removal of Klaczak was constrained by any policy made by others. . . We cannot tell from the record whether Swan was so constrained by the Village's policy against sexual harassment. . . The policy states that those found to be offenders will face 'appropriate disciplinary action,' not necessarily removal. . . Moreover, the Village does not argue that the policy required Swan to actively investigate Klaczak's behavior in lieu of retaining him. Nor can we tell from the written policy whether the duty to investigate fell on Swan or some other official(s) or whether such a duty was triggered by the information Swan received. . . If the Village's sexual harassment policy imposed a duty on Swan to investigate Klaczak after receiving the information he had learned, then the policy's enactor, the board of trustees, was the Village's final policymaker on the decision to retain Klaczak. If it imposed no such duty, Swan was thus unconstrained, so he was the final policymaker. . . In any event, Wragg's claim fails. Wragg presents no evidence from which a reasonable jury could find that either the board of trustees or Swan knew that maintaining Klaczak in employment would pose a 'substantial risk' of a constitutional violation. . . . As to the board of trustees, we agree with the district court that there can be no municipal liability for the isolated acts of only one member of a multi-member board. . . Wragg presents evidence relevant to the knowledge only of one trustee, and makes no effort to impute knowledge of Klaczak's prior misbehavior to a quorum of the board. Such evidence is insufficient to find inaction by the board giving rise to the Village's liability. As to Swan, no reasonable jury could find that he acted with such knowledgeable, deliberate indifference that the Village could be liable for his inaction. Swan encountered various storm warnings about Klaczak, but none sufficiently alerted Swan such that Klaczak's propensity to molest minors could be found 'known or obvious' to him. . . . The Village is not liable for retaining Klaczak because: (1) a quorum of the Village's board of trustees had no knowledge of his prior sexual misconduct; and (2) even if the Village's policy against sexual harassment lacked the teeth to constrain President Swan such that he wielded the Village's ultimate power to retain Klaczak, Wragg presented insufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to find that Swan knew that retaining Klaczak posed a substantial risk to Wragg. Swan might have acted negligently, but Wragg presented insufficient evidence to find that he acted more culpably as is required to find liability against the Village."); Doe v. School Bd. of Broward County, Fla., 604 F.3d 1248, 1264, 1265 (11th Cir. 2010) ("Determining the persons or bodies that have final policymaking authority for the defendant is a matter of state law to be determined by the trial judge and not the jury. . . Doe argues that Dr. Melita has final policymaking authority because the School Board delegated Dr. Melita the discretion to develop disciplinary guidelines and procedures for conducting personnel misconduct investigations. Doe also argues that Principal Scavella is a final policymaker for the School Board because he had the discretion under these procedures to make the initial decision whether or not to investigate a student complaint. This authority, though representing a vesting of discretion in both Melita and Scavella, is insufficient to imbue them with final policymaking authority for purposes of § 1983 municipal liability. . . . Doe has not shown that Melita's and Scavella's decisions are not subject to meaningful administrative review. . . . Because the Superintendent had the authority to veto [Melita's] recommendation, this decision was 'subject to meaningful administrative review' under Scala, and Melita was not a final policymaker that can subject the School Board to § 1983 municipal liability. . . .Scavella's authority to make a mere recommendation to a superior, which that superior is free to accept or reject, does not equate to the final authority to make School Board policy. Therefore, the School Board may not be subjected to municipal liability under § 1983 for the single acts of Principal Scavella."); Brammer-Hoelter v. Twin Peaks Charter Academy, 602 F.3d 1175, 1190 (10th Cir. 2010) ("In this case, Colorado law, the charter contract, the Academy's bylaws, and the administrator's employment contract all make clear the Academy Board was the sole final policymaker on school matters and all of Dr. Marlatt's decisions were legally constrained by Board policies. Thus, Dr. Marlatt was not a final policymaker for the Academy. . . .Therefore, the Academy will only be subject to municipal liability if the record supports the conclusion the Academy Board delegated authority to Dr. Marlatt to make decisions on these matters, subject to the Board's final review and approval, and the Board ratified her decisions and the basis for them. . . . We are not persuaded that Dr. Marlatt's non-specific testimony that every act she took in dealing with the teachers was authorized by the Board is sufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the Board ratified the directives she denies giving, and no other evidence in the record suggests the Board ratified Dr. Marlatt's directives. We therefore conclude the summary judgment record does not demonstrate a basis for holding the Academy liable under § 1983 on Plaintiffs' prior restraint claim."); Darchak v. City of Chicago Bd. of Educ., 580 F.3d 662, 630 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Under the delegation theory, the person or entity with final policymaking authority must delegate the power to make policy, not simply the power to make decisions. . . . Again, policymaking is broader than decisionmaking; the Board's failure to review one personnel recommendation does not mean that the Board systematically allows Acevedo to set policy on employment decisions or to make final decisions without Board review. . . . Nor did the Board's decision to adopt Acevedo's recommendation without review constitute a ratification of Acevedo's action. . . . The Board approved Acevedo's decision not to renew Darchak's contract, but no evidence demonstrates that the Board was aware of any potential retaliatory basis for the nonrenewal."); Waters v. City of Chicago, 580 F.3d 575, 581, 583 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Waters asserts that the City is subject to § 1983 liability because Commissioner Rice had final policymaking authority for the City for employment matters. State or local law determines whether a person has policymaking authority for purposes of § 1983. . . The Chicago City Council is the City's legislative body with the authority to adopt rules regarding employment policy. The City Council has delegated the authority to promulgate personnel rules to the Commissioner of Human Resources. Chi., Ill. Municipal Code ' 2-74-050. As a result, both the City Council and Commissioner of Human Resources may be considered final policymakers for the City in the area of employment. The Commissioner of Human Resources did exercise his authority and promulgated the City's Personnel Rules. Waters does not dispute any of these points. Instead, he asserts that the Personnel Rules delegate rule making authority over employment matters to department heads. . . . The Commissioner of Human Resources did not delegate the authority to develop employment policy to department heads. While Commissioner Rice had the authority to make the final decision whether to terminate Waters' employment, her decision was constrained by the Personnel Rules. Her decision also was subject to review by the Personnel Board and the Law and Personnel Departments for compliance with City personnel and employment policies. Therefore, Commissioner Rice did not have final authority to make employment policy for the City."); Valentino v. Village Of South Chicago Heights, 575 F.3d 664, 677, 678 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Defendants do not point to any laws, statutes, or ordinances which place policy setting authority in the hands of the Village's board of trustees. To the contrary, all the evidence suggests that Mayor Owen had the unfettered discretion to hire and fire whomever he pleased. . . . Therefore, it is clear to us that Mayor Owen is the de facto policymaker for the Village with regard to personnel decisions in his office."); Ford v. County of Grand Traverse, 535 F.3d 483, 496-99 (6th Cir. 2008) ("We recognize that Sheriff Hall's trial testimony is in substantial tension with the plain language of the County's written policy, requiring that corrections officers must 'contact' the medical staff when an inmate claims a need for medication. But Hall testified that he had policymaking authority and that he had the responsibility to 'review and tweak [written policies], where needed.' The County has never challenged Ford's assertion that Hall has final policymaking authority for the jail, and there exists no evidence in the record to suggest otherwise. . . . We therefore conclude that a reasonable juror could find that Sheriff Hall's interpretation represented the County's policy with respect to weekend medical treatment and that, when viewed in the light most favorable to Ford, the County's policy permitted jail officials to 'contact' medical staff by simply leaving a medical form in the nurse's inbox, even though this means that the nurse might not see the form until up to 48 hours later. . . . We believe that, when viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Ford, a reasonable jury could conclude that there was a direct causal link between the County's policy and the injuries that Ford suffered from her seizure and resulting fall. . . . As a final matter, we feel constrained to note that the County has missed the mark on appeal by focusing on the alleged lack of a causal link between the County's policy and Ford's injuries. A more promising defense would have been to challenge whether there was a direct causal link between the County's policy and an injury of constitutional magnitude suffered by Ford. . . . [A]lthough we conclude that there is sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to find that the County's policy caused Ford's injuries, we are much less certain that the policy in question meets the stringent standard of deliberate indifference required to establish municipal liability in the first instance. . .In short, the County abandoned its strongest argument − that the County's policy did not constitute deliberate indifference to Ford's serious medical needs. . . The County instead chose to rest its appeal on the alleged lack of a causal link between its policy and Ford's injuries. But the jury found otherwise, and we decline to disrupt the jury's verdict in the present case."); Harper v. City of Los Angeles, 533 F.3d 1010, 1025, 1026 (9th Cir. 2008) ("The jury reasonably could have concluded that Chief Parks' telephonic statements to District Attorney Garcetti, in which Parks expressed confidence in Perez and pressured Garcetti to file criminal charges without a complete or fully corroborated investigation, were indicative of an official policy whereby the City 'impliedly or tacitly authorized, approved, or encouraged illegal conduct by its police officers.' . . Indeed, the Task Force's chain-of-command reported regularly to Parks and the jury was entitled to believe that Chief Parks' expressions as the official policymaker accurately reflected the direction and quality of the Task Force investigation, which was to ready cases for the filing of charges as quickly as possible, with or without probable cause. . . . The jury also could have supported their determination of an official policy from the failure of Parks to take any remedial steps after the officers were acquitted on all charges related to the Lobos arrest and it became clear that the Task Force investigation was flawed. . . .[T]he jury could have reasonably concluded that this was not a case where Task Force investigators deviated from the official policy, but rather one in which the policy was effectively carried out. . . . There is substantial evidence to support the jury's verdict. . .Chief Parks and the Task Force were instrumental in causing legal proceedings against the Officers and the Task Force's policy of readying cases for the filing of charges as quickly as possible, with or without probable cause had the patently foreseeable consequence of causing the Officers' arrest without probable cause. The unconstitutional policy at issue and the particular injury alleged are not only 'closely related,' City of Canton v. Harris, 489 U.S. 378, 391 (1989), they are cause and effect."); Davison v. City of Minneapolis, Minn., 490 F.3d 648, 661 (8th Cir. 2007) ("Our review of the Minneapolis Charter and Code of Ordinances reveals that the Fire Chief has not been delegated final policymaking authority regarding employment practices for the Fire Department. Rather, it reveals that the City Coordinator and Civil Service Commission are vested with final policymaking authority regarding employment practices for the entire city, including the Fire Department."); Hill v. Borough of Kutztown, 455 F.3d 225, 246 (3d Cir. 2006) ("Here, Hill alleges that Marino constructively discharged him. As Hill points out, as a matter of state law, no government employee or body is permitted to constructively discharge an employee by making his working environment intolerable. As we discussed, however, Hill has alleged that the Mayor had the power to constructively discharge him, though he (Marino) lacked the power as Mayor to fire him outright. Moreover, Marino's constructive discharge of Hill was final in the sense that it was not reviewable by any other person or any other body or agency in the Borough. That is, there was no one 'above' the Mayor who had the power to curtail his conduct or prevent him from harassing Hill to the point where Hill had no alternative but to leave his position . . . In this sense, Marino was a final policy-maker for the purpose of constructively discharging Hill.");

Gelin v. Housing Authority of News Orleans, 456 F.3d 525, 527, 528 (5th Cir. 2006) ("The parties have not identified, through citations to state or local law, the entity or individual with final policymaking authority for HANO personnel matters. They both assume that the HANO Board of Commissioners ("Board") had such policymaking authority, but disagree as to whether the Board delegated that authority to Lamberg. We have remanded in similar cases to allow the parties to fully brief the sources of state law. . .We find remand unnecessary here because the evidence of 'custom or usage' provided by the parties − including deposition testimony, personnel manual provisions, and affidavits − establish that Lamberg, at least, did not wield such policymaking authority for the agency. Lamberg was the administrative receiver responsible for the 'day to day operations of HANO.'. . The Board also designated her the 'appointing authority,' with the power to terminate an employee on the agency's behalf. The evidence indicates that these positions do not have an inherent policymaking function. . . . Lamberg may have wielded decisionmaking authority; her position alone, however, did not bestow any final policymaking authority"); McGreevy v. Stroup, 413 F.3d 359, 368, 369 (3d Cir. 2005) ("The fact that the Pennsylvania Code provides that the school board is the final policymaker regarding dismissal of employees does not mean that a school board action is a prerequisite for imposition of liability on the District. . . . In this case, defendants argued, and the District Court agreed, that under Kneipp the School Board is the final policymaker because the Board would have had the power to review McGreevy's rating if she had appealed. We disagree. McGreevy did not appeal to the School Board with respect to her 40 rating, and she was not required to take such an appeal under either the Pennsylvania statute or § 1983. There is no exhaustion requirement under § 1983. . . Absent an appeal, the School Board has no input with respect to an employee's rating. In such cases, the superintendent has final unreviewable authority to issue employment ratings, an authority he can, and did in this case, delegate to the principal. . . . A reasonable jury could find that the 40 rating given to McGreevy by the principal and adopted by the Superintendent was in retaliation for the exercise of her First Amendment rights. If the jury so found, the District would be subject to liability."); Bennett v. City of Eastpointe, 410 F.3d 810, 816, 819(6th Cir. 2005) ("The plaintiffs claim that they were subjected to racial discrimination when they crossed Eight Mile Road into Eastpointe. Against the backdrop of each individual Fourteenth Amendment claim is reference to the 'DeWeese Memorandum.' This memorandum was drafted by Eastpointe's current Chief of Police, Fred DeWeese, following a meeting he had with Charles King, Sr., the plaintiff and next friend to his minor-son-plaintiffs in King. In that memo, distributed only to the city manager, DeWeese wrote that when he was a Lieutenant, '[f]rom May of 1995 to August of 95 .... I was assigned as a Shift Commander on the Afternoon Shift .... My instructions to the officers were to investigate any black youths riding through our subdivisions .... I would expect that our officers would investigate younger black males riding bicycles.' . . . . Here, the plaintiffs rely on the DeWeese Memorandum as the policy that wrought the constitutional violations upon them. For the plaintiffs to prevail, therefore, they must demonstrate that DeWeese had policymaking authority. The plaintiffs have failed, however, to account for the fact that at the time of the instructions, now-Chief of Police DeWeese was simply a lieutenant, and not a policy-making official. . . The plaintiffs argue that when DeWeese became Chief of Police, he did not rescind his earlier instructions, and therefore the Memorandum became city policy. We decline to adopt such a broad reading of the

Memorandum without any evidence to support the assertion. The Memorandum, though arguably discriminatory, was only memorializing prior and limited instructions, made to four or five officers under his command on an afternoon shift. There is no evidence whatsoever, that after becoming Chief of Police, DeWeese renewed these instructions or that they motivated the conduct of the officers, who were not on the afternoon shift, years later. In sum, we hold that the DeWeese Memorandum did not constitute official city policy and therefore affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the City of Eastpointe."); Miller v. Calhoun County, 408 F.3d 803, 816-18 (6th Cir. 2005) ("In the final equation, Miller bases her argument entirely on the circumstances surrounding her brother's death, but a single act may establish municipal liability only where the actor is a municipal 'policymaker'" . . . .Miller argues that Dr. Ismailoglu was a municipal policymaker, and that in holding to the contrary, the District Court focused exclusively on the County's written policies while ignoring de facto customs and practices. Accordingly, Miller does not appear to dispute the District Court's finding that state law confers final policymaking authority for county jails on the sheriff and jail administrator. Rather, Miller's position on appeal is that the sheriff and jail administrator 'delegated de facto decision-making to the shift commander and on-call doctor.' . . . Miller's argument with respect to Dr. Ismailoglu suffers from the same deficiencies as her argument with respect to Lindsay. In particular, Miller does not differentiate between policymaking and 'mere authority to exercise discretion.'. . . . A policymaker's decisions 'are final and unreviewable and are not constrained by the official policies of superior officials.' . . Miller makes no argument and advances no evidence that Dr. Ismailoglu possessed authority to set broad goals with respect to the medical treatment of inmates at the Correctional Facility. To the contrary, the record reflects that Dr. Ismailoglu contracted to provide on-site services for approximately eight hours per week, and to be on call 24 hours a day. . . .The record leaves no doubt that de facto policymaking authority resided with the sheriff, not with Dr. Ismailoglu."); Monistere v. City of Memphis, 115 F. App'x 845, 2004 WL 2913348, at *5 & n.6, *6 (6th Cir. Dec. 17, 2004) ("Although the City Code arguably establishes that the Director of Police Services has the final policymaking authority for all police department activities, this Court need not end its inquiry here. As we stated in Feliciano v. City of Cleveland, 988 F.2d 649, 655 (6th Cir.1993), in order to determine whether final authority to make municipal policy is vested in a particular official, it is imperative that we examine the applicable state law, including 'statutes, ordinances, and regulations,' as well as 'less formal sources of law, such as local practice and custom.' Notwithstanding the operative language within the Code, this Court concludes that there is sufficient evidence to demonstrate that Embrey had the requisite policymaking authority inasmuch as he had been delegated the authority to control his own investigations. While there were no written procedures which govern these investigations, the Executive Commander of the ISB testified that it was the 'unwritten manner' of her unit to allow the lead investigator to have full control over the conduct of an investigation. Embrey also opined that, although his challenged directive relating to the removal of the officers' clothing was not specifically addressed in the police manual, it was his belief that he, as the lead investigator, had the authority to order the strip search. . . . The City also argues that Embrey did not have final policymaking authority. . . . Contrary to the City's position on this issue, the facts presented during the trial demonstrate that Embrey did not merely exercise discretion but rather acted as a final policymaker within the context of this case. During the trial, Embrey testified that, in his capacity as the lead investigator, he had the right to make decisions regarding his investigation of Monistere and Jones. His decision was final. There is no evidence in this record that he received any direction from his supervisors until after the strip search had been completed. Pilot neither reviewed nor challenged his decision-making authority. In fact, Embrey testified that she rarely intervened in his investigations. Furthermore, there is no evidence that Embrey was constrained by the City's 'unwritten' policy which governed internal investigations because it was the practice within the Police Department to give unfettered discretion to its ISB members. In sum, the record clearly supports the conclusion that Embrey's decision was (1) final, (2) not reviewable, and (3) unconstrained by the existing policies and practices of his supervisory officers. It is our judgment that, when applying the standards of Feliciano, Embrey was delegated final policymaking authority which is sufficient to impose municipal liability upon the City under § 1983. . . .Thus, when evaluating the evidence in the light most favorable to Monistere and Jones, this Court concludes that the City's policy of allowing its sergeants unfettered discretion to conduct administrative investigations directly caused the constitutional deprivations that were suffered by these two officers. For the reasons that are stated above, this Court affirms the district court's denial of the City's motion for judgment as a matter of law. . . . . Since this Court finds that Embrey was delegated final policymaking authority with respect to the conduct of ISB investigations, it need not determine whether the City ratified Embrey's conduct."); Lytle v. Carl, 382 F.3d 978, 985, 986 (9th Cir. 2004) ("The District argues that because Lytle could have filed grievances under the collective bargaining agreement, which would ultimately be subject to review by an arbitrator from the American Arbitration Association, Goldman was not a final policymaker with respect to any decision that could have been the proper subject of a grievance. The first step of the grievance procedure is for an employee to file a grievance with her immediate supervisor and with Goldman, as the 'Assistant Superintendent, Administrative Operations and Staff Relations,' or with his designee. The second step involves filing a grievance with Goldman or his designee and meeting with Goldman to discuss the issue. The third step is to submit the grievance to a neutral outside arbitrator. The District's argument mistakes the meaning of 'final policymaker' and the role of an independent arbitrator. The arbitrator does not work for the District. In determining who was a final policymaker for the District, we focus on whether the official's decisions were subject to review by the District's authorized policymakers. . . . That someone outside of the District may reverse the District official's decision does not mean that the official does not speak for the District when he or she initially makes that decision . . . The delegation of final policymaking authority by the Board in this case distinguishes it from cases in which we and other circuits have found school superintendents and other officials to lack final policymaking authority."); Rivera v. Houston Independent School District,349 F.3d 244, 248 (5th Cir. 2003) (School Board is the Aone and only policymaker for HISD."); Quinn v. Monroe County, 330 F.3d 1320, 1326-28 (11th Cir. 2003) ("Because the Career Service Council has the power to reverse any termination decision made by Roberts, he is not a final policymaker with respect to termination decisions at the library. . . . Although County Administrator Roberts was not the 'final policymaker ' with respect to Quinn's termination, he was clearly the official 'decisionmaker ' with respect to her termination. The district court did not distinguish between these two concepts. The 'final policymaker' inquiry addresses who takes actions that may cause the municipality (here, Defendant Monroe County) to be held liable for a custom or policy. The 'decisionmaker' inquiry addresses who has the power to make official decisions and, thus, be held individually liable. . . . The district court's conflation of the "final policymaker" and "decisionmaker" inquiries would lead to untenable legal consequences. Under such a theory, a city manager could intentionally discriminate by terminating an employee without fear of liability so long as, at some point, the decision was reviewed by an unbiased board. While such a manager should not be able to create municipal liability when violating official policy, he should not be able to elude individual liability for his own unlawful actions. The district court erred by concluding to the contrary."); Tharling v. City of Port Lavaca, 329 F.3d 422, 427 (5th Cir. 2003) (local law requiring approval of City Council for employment decisions made by City Manager rendered City Council the final policymaker); Laverdure v. County of Montgomery, 324 F.3d 123, 126 (3d Cir. 2003) ("LaVerdure argues that the District Court's holding that Marino was immune under ' 8546, which turns on whether he is a policymaker, is inconsistent with the Court's holding that he was not a policymaker for § 1983 purposes. We perceive no inconsistency. Sections 1983 and 8546 are different statutes, one state and one federal, and they define 'policymaker' differently. To be a policymaker for § 1983 purposes, an official must have final policymaking authority. By contrast, to have ' 8546 immunity, one need only be a policymaker."); Miranda v. Clark County, Nevada, 319 F.3d 465, 469, 470 (9th Cir. 2003) (en banc) ("We thus conclude that Harris was acting on behalf of Clark County in determining how the overall resources of the [Public Defender's] office were to be spent, and he qualifies as a state actor for purposes of § 1983. . . . Here, according to the plaintiff, if the criminal defendant appeared on the basis of the polygraph test to be guilty, the office sharply curtailed the quality of the representation by limiting the investigatory and legal resources provided. The policy, while falling short of complete denial of counsel, is a policy of deliberate indifference to the requirement that every criminal defendant receive adequate representation, regardless of innocence or guilt."); Gernetzke v. Kenosha Unified School District No. 1, 274 F.3d 464, 468, 469 (7th Cir. 2001) ("It doesn't matter what form the action of the responsible authority that injures the plaintiff takes. It might be an ordinance, a regulation, an executive policy, or an executive act (such as firing the plaintiff). The question is whether the promulgator, or the actor, as the case may be − in other words, the decisionmaker − was at the apex of authority for the action in question. . . . . The bearing of delegation on the principle of Monell turns out to be critical in this case. The final decisionmaking authority of the school district is lodged in the district's school board, but the board has promulgated regulations that delegate the administration of the five high schools in the school district to the principal of each school. This delegation, the plaintiffs argue, makes the principal the final decisionmaker so far as the mural and the request to be allowed to distribute literature are concerned. That cannot be right. It would collapse direct and derivative liability. Every public employee, including the policeman on the beat and the teacher in the public school, exercises authority ultimately delegated to him or her by their public employer's supreme governing organs. A police officer has authority to arrest, and that authority is 'final' in the practical sense that he doesn't have to consult anyone before making an arrest; likewise a teacher does not have to consult anyone before flunking a student. That is a perfectly good use of the word 'final' in ordinary conversation but it does not fit the cases; for if a police department or a school district were liable for employees' actions that it authorized but did not direct, we would be back in the world of respondeat superior. To avoid this the cases limit municipal liability under section 1983 to situations in which the official who commits the alleged violation of the plaintiff's rights has authority that is final in the special sense that there is no higher authority. . . . Delegation is not direction; authorization is not command; permission does not constitute the permittee the final policymaking authority. . . . The plaintiffs argue that ratification occurred here when after they brought this suit the school board refused to direct the principal of their school to alter his response to their demand. The argument if accepted would convert every public employee's action that a plaintiff wished to challenge into the action of the employer. . . . Deliberate inaction might be convincing evidence of delegation of final decisionmaking authority, or of ratification, . . . but there is no evidence of that here."); Seamons v. Snow, 206 F.3d 1021, 1029 (10th Cir. 2000) ("In this case, the record indicates that Coach Snow, and only Coach Snow, was vested by the school district with the authority to make final decisions regarding membership on the Sky View football team. . . Because of this delegation of authority, the school district can be held liable for Coach Snow's actions on team membership."); Robinson v. Balog, 160 F.3d 183, 190 (4th Cir. 1998) ("The fact that Balog had the power to choose whom to hire, promote, discharge, and transfer within the department he directed simply cannot establish that he had the broader authority to craft municipal policy."); Ware v. Jackson County, 150 F.3d 873, 886 (8th Cir. 1998) ("The County argues that, because Megerman's decisions were subject to review and at times were reviewed by both the County Executive and the Director of Administration, he is not a final policymaker. The County asserts that Megerman merely possessed discretionary authority that was constrained by policies of the County. . . . [W]e hold that the district court correctly identified Megerman as a final policymaker on JCDC personnel matters on the following bases: Megerman's position as director of the JCDC which has approximately 262 employees; his authority to promulgate JCDC policy, which sets forth, among other things, the rules of conduct for JCDC personnel; his authority to implement such policy; his exclusive handling of the disciplinary actions in this case; and the absence of a proven mechanism through which the Jackson County Executive and the Merit System Committee can review his decisions not to discipline officers or fully investigate allegations of misconduct."); Brady v. Fort Bend County, 145 F.3d 691, 700, 702 (5th Cir. 1998) ("Sheriffs under Texas law are unlike the hypothetical sheriff discussed in Pembaur because a Texas sheriff is not merely granted 'discretion to hire and fire employees' by the commissioners court. . . Rather, the Texas legislature has vested sheriffs with such discretion, and the sheriff's exercise of that discretion is unreviewable by any other official or governmental body in the county. Texas sheriffs therefore exercise final policymaking authority with respect to the determination of how to fill employment positions in the county sheriff's department. . . . [T]he fact that under Texas law, no other official or governmental entity of the county exerts any control over the sheriff's discretion in filling available deputy positions is what indicates that the sheriff constitutes the county's final policymaker in this area."); Adkins v. Board of Education of Magoffin County, 982 F.2d 952, 959 (6th Cir. 1993) ("The fact that a person who has authority only to recommend, and whose recommendations can be implemented only upon subsequent approval by a governing body, decides to make no recommendation does not convert the recommender into a final policymaker.").

See also Sims v. City of Madisonville, 894 F.3d 632, 638-41 (5th Cir. 2018) ("[I]n overruling the short-lived regime of Saucier v. Katz, . . . which required courts to first address the underlying constitutional question, Pearson recognized it would still 'often [be] advantageous' to follow the two-step order. . . Doing so is 'beneficial' here for reasons the Supreme Court recognized. . . This is the fourth time in three years that an appeal has presented the question whether someone who is not a final decisionmaker can be liable for First Amendment retaliation. [citing cases] Continuing to resolve the question at the clearly established step means the law will never get established. . . Addressing the first-step liability question is 'especially valuable with respect to questions that do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable.'. . That is the case here. First Amendment retaliation claims do not arise in criminal litigation (as, for example, a Fourth Amendment claim often would), and this issue of individual liability would not arise in other civil suits, such as those against a municipality, in which qualified immunity does not apply. Because this is a question unique to section 1983 First Amendment claims brought against individual defendants, we conclude that clarifying the liability question is important to provide guidance to public employees who may find themselves on either side of the "v" in these lawsuits that can raise important issues of whether employees who challenge corrupt governmental practices are protected in exercising First Amendment rights. In our recent decision resolving this question on 'clearly established' grounds, we recognized the tension in our caselaw on whether only final decisionmakers can be individually liable for First Amendment retaliation claims. . . . If an individual defendant's animus against a coworker's exercise of First Amendment rights is a link in the causal chain that leads to a plaintiff's firing, the individual may be liable even if she is not the final decisionmaker. . . . In light of Jett and the consensus view of other courts of appeals that individual liability is just a matter of causation, why did uncertainty develop in our circuit on this point? Beattie v. Madison County School District, 254 F.3d 595 (5th Cir. 2001), unwittingly planted the seeds of confusion that later sprouted on this issue. . . . [T]he focus of the appeal was on the question of municipal liability, which attaches only if final decisionmakers are liable. . . The unconstitutional motives of the principal and superintendent who recommended the termination were not attributed to the school board that made the final decision because the board did not know about the plaintiff's First Amendment activity. . . Not recognizing that Beattie was only confronting Monell liability, a later case involving individual defendants read Beattie for the principle that 'only final decision-makers may be held liable for First Amendment retaliation employment discrimination under § 1983.' Johnson v. Louisiana, 369 F.3d 826, 831 (5th Cir. 2004). In reversing a verdict against a supervisor who retaliated against a subordinate for complaining about sexual harassment, Johnson ignored Jett's contrary and precedential position that an individual is liable for First Amendment retaliation if her unlawful conduct is a link in the causal chain that resulted in the plaintiff's firing. Some cases have followed Johnson's categorical view that only final decisionmakers can be liable for First Amendment retaliation. . . . Other cases following Beattie and Johnson have imposed a causation standard that is more stringent than Jett's 'but-for' standard for nonfinal decisionmakers. . . They have done so because they, like Sims, have mistakenly characterized the question as whether the nondecisionmaker can be liable under a cat's paw theory of imputed liability. That turns cat's paw liability on its head, and is another example of relying on the law of employer liability for a question of employee liability. As 'cat's paw' liability arose under Title VII in which only employers can be liable, it is not about the liability of individual employees. . . It is instead about whether the employers who are subject to Title VII liability can be held liable by imputing to those entities the unlawful motives of employees who are not final decisionmakers. . . Unlike Title VII, section 1983 applies to individuals. So the question is not whether the metaphorical paw (the City) is liable for carrying out the ill-motivated actions of the metaphorical cat (Covington); it is whether the cat itself can be liable for having unlawful motives that caused the firing. That individual liability turns on traditional tort principles of whether the particular act was a 'causal link' in the termination. . . Beattie, Johnson, and subsequent cases thus inadvertently created the uncertainty we have recognized in this area. We now provide the overdue clarification. Because it is at odds with our earlier holding in Jett, Johnson's absolute bar on First Amendment liability for those who are not final decisionmakers is not binding. Nor are the imputation principles of cat's paw liability applicable to an effort to hold a nondecisionmaker liable. Jett's 'causal link' standard sets the causation requirement for a suit against an individual defendant with retaliatory motives who does not make the final employment decision. Although today's decision clarifying that Jett controls means the law will no longer be 'unsettled' in this area, . . . it provides no recourse to Sims. That is because of the second part of the qualified immunity inquiry, which requires a plaintiff to show that any violation of rights was clearly established at the time the conduct occurred. . . When Sims was terminated in July 2012 the inconsistency in our law on whether First Amendment liability can attach to a public official who did not make the final employment decision had not been resolved. Indeed, three years after that Culbertson recognized the tension in affirming a grant of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds in favor of a defendant who made a recommendation to fire the plaintiff but did not have the authority to make the ultimate decision. . . If judges have mixed up principles of individual and municipal liability in this area and failed to recognize Jett as the controlling decision, law enforcement officials should not be expected to have a more nuanced understanding of section 1983 law. We therefore agree with the district court's holding that Sims's claim is foreclosed by Culbertson on immunity grounds."); Paterek v. Vill. of Armada, Mich., 801 F.3d 630, 651 (6th Cir. 2015) ("Defendants assert that Delecke cannot be held liable because he did not directly cause the injuries. Delecke had no authority to issue tickets, initiate lawsuits, or grant a time-constrained COO. However, the record evidence plainly indicates that Delecke directed LeMieux to undertake the adverse actions at issue. Whether Delecke had ultimate decision-making authority is not dispositive, because LeMieux simply 'acted as the conduit [for Delecke's] prejudice—his cat's paw.' Kelly v. Warren Cnty. Bd. Of Comm'rs, 396 F. App'x 246, 255 (6th Cir.2010); Bobo v. United Parcel Serv., Inc., 665 F.3d 741, 756 (6th Cir.2012) ("[T]he 'cat's paw' theory ... refers to a situation in which 'a biased [official], who lacks decision-making power, influences the unbiased decision-maker to [take] an adverse [enforcement action].'" (citation omitted)). In this case, LeMieux testified that he issued the tickets (and forwarded the tickets for prosecution) on Delecke's say so. Delecke, for that reason, is the responsible party.").

See also English v. City of Milwaukee, No. 19-CV-0781-BHL, 2022 WL 3354746, at *14 (E.D. Wis. Aug. 12, 2022) ("Here, McGowan and English point to nothing beyond their own

arrests on a single night. Under Seventh Circuit law, this is insufficient. . . Thus, Plaintiffs' attempt to impose Monell liability based on a theory of a widespread practice or custom fails. Plaintiffs do not rely solely on the 'widespread custom or practice' theory, however. Their alternate Monell theory is based on allegations that the City adopted an unconstitutional policy through the conduct of high-level actors—Chief Flynn and Asst. Chief Harpole—on August 30, 2016. . . A police superintendent or a chief of police can be considered a person with final policymaking authority when that person is 'at the apex of authority for the action in question.'. . With respect to this theory, Plaintiffs have pointed to sufficient evidence to get past summary judgment. The record shows that Chief Flynn made the decision to carry out the disperse-and-arrest action in Sherman Park, and that Asst. Chief Harpole provided the 'highest level of direct supervision' in operationalizing that decision. . . Chief Flynn emailed Mayor Barrett's chief of staff that '[a] two week mourning period will be deemed enough,'. . . suggesting he intended even peaceful observers and passersby to be removed from Sherman Park. While the evidence is more conflicting concerning Harpole's instructions, officers may have believed they were to make random arrests of anyone who even hesitated to leave so that everyone would clear out. . . Given this record, a reasonable jury could conclude that Flynn and Harpole enacted and executed a policy that caused constitutional violations. This is sufficient for a jury to impose Monell liability on the City."); Oliver v. Gusman, No. CV 18-7845, 2020 WL 1303493, at *7–8 (E.D. La. Mar. 19, 2020) ("Defendant Gusman argues that, despite his title, he was not the final policymaker at the time Plaintiff was attacked pursuant to a 'Stipulated Order for Appointment of Independent Jail Compliance Director' in Jones v. Gusman, No. 12-859, ECF No. 1082 (E.D. La. June 21, 2016). . . The Stipulated Order provides that the Compliance Director has 'final authority to operate the Orleans Parish Jail ("OJC") and all jail facilities, including authority over the entire prisoner population in the custody of the Orleans Parish Sheriff's Office.'. . It gives the Compliance Director 'final authority to review, investigate, and take corrective action regarding OPSO policies, procedures, and practices that are related to the Consent Judgment,' and 'final authority to direct specific actions to attain or improve compliance levels, or remedy compliance errors, regarding all portions of the Consent Judgment, including but not limited to...changes to Jail policies or standard operating procedures or practices.'. . Plaintiff argues that Gusman is the final policymaker because he retains authority over the Compliance Director in several respects. The Stipulated Order first provides that '[t]he Compliance Director shall seek advice and/or approval from the Sheriff regarding all decisions that materially impact compliance with the Consent Judgment, unless doing so would cause unreasonable delay.'. . The Stipulated Order also gives Sheriff Gusman limited authority to appoint the Compliance Director and approval authority over the initial remedial plan the Compliance Director would submit to the court. . . '[T]he identification of policymaking officials is a question of state law.'. . Louisiana law provides that the sheriff is the final policymaker for a parish jail. . . The Stipulated Order is not state law; it is an order issued by a federal district court at the request of the parties in an action where plaintiffs alleged violations of their federal constitutional rights. . . A close reading of the Stipulated Order reveals that the Compliance Director's authority is limited to implementing the Consent Judgment. . . . Here, the Compliance Director's decisions are constrained by the Consent Judgment, . . . which was agreed to by Sheriff Gusman. While it is true that the Compliance Director is not subordinate to Sheriff

Gusman, . . . he is generally required to 'seek advice and/or approval' from him[.] . . Thus, the Compliance Director derives his authority from Sheriff Gusman or, to put it another way, the Stipulated Order acts as a delegation of authority to the Compliance Director. . . . Further, the Moving Defendants have not cited to any case where a court found that Sheriff Gusman was not the final policymaker for OPSO due to the appointment of the Compliance Director. . . . Accordingly, the Court finds that Plaintiff has adequately alleged that Sheriff Gusman was the final policymaker for OPSO at the time he was attacked.") [In alternative, court finds that both Sheriff and Compliance Director were final policymakers]; Bledsoe v. Ferry County, Washington, No. 2:19-CV-227-RMP, 2020 WL 376611, at *8–9 (E.D. Wash. Jan. 23, 2020) ("Ms. Bledsoe alleges that the Commission decided to seek her prosecution because of her political ideas and speech. She alleges that the County Commissioners, who make up the County's legislative body, acted together to censor her and to direct her prosecution. . . Defendants argue that the County Commissioners were not final policymakers with respect to their actions against Ms. Bledsoe. Therefore, those actions cannot be attributed to the County. . . The Court must therefore decide whether the Plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to support a reasonable inference that the Commissioners were acting as policymakers when requesting, and allegedly directing, Ms. Bledsoe's prosecution. As the Supreme Court has explained, even one decision by a properly constituted legislative body 'unquestionably constitutes an act of official government policy.'. . Additionally, as Ms. Bledsoe points out, Washington law provides that the Commission shall, 'Have the care of the county property ... and in the name of the county prosecute and defend all actions for and against the county ....'. . . Defendants have not pointed to state law indicating that the Commissioners' actions were meaningfully constrained by a superior, or that their decisions with respect to Ms. Bledsoe would be reviewed by a superior policymaking official. By arguing that the County Commissioners were not acting in their role as final policymakers, Defendants seem to suggest that the Prosecuting Attorney's Office had final policymaking authority with respect to the charges brought against Ms. Bledsoe. Therefore, the Court examines the relationship between the Prosecuting Attorney's Office and the County Commissioners' Office in Ferry County. Upon turning to Washington state law, the Court found few cases that illustrate the relationship between prosecuting attorneys' offices and county commissioners' offices in Washington. However, in State ex rel. Banks v. Drummond, the Washington State Supreme Court discussed the relationship between the prosecuting attorney and the county commission briefly. . . It appears from Banks that the county commissioners' office exercises control over the prosecuting attorney's office through governance of the office's size and budget. . . . The Washington State Supreme Court's discussion in Banks indicates that Defendants in this case have the ability to set, or at least influence significantly, policy in the Prosecuting Attorney's Office. Moreover, Washington law dictates that the prosecuting attorney in each county is the 'legal advisor of the legislative authority' who gives 'his or her written opinion when required by the legislative authority,' and who prosecutes 'all criminal and civil actions in which the state or the county may be a party.'. . Therefore, Washington law indicates that the prosecuting attorney in each county, at least to some extent, answers to the legislative authority, the County Commission. The Court notes that the issue of final policymaking authority, and the relationship between the Prosecuting Attorney's Office and Ferry County Commissioners' Office, was not thoroughly briefed.

However, given this Court's review of Washington state law and Ms. Bledsoe's Complaint, the Court finds that Ms. Bledsoe has alleged sufficient facts to demonstrate that the County Commissioners were policymaking officials, whose actions may constitute County policy pursuant to Monell in this matter. Therefore, Ms. Bledsoe's Monell claim against the County survives Defendants' Motion to Dismiss."); Harper v. Flores, No. 18 CV 6822, 2019 WL 6033597, at *7-8 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 14, 2019) ("[T]he Channahon defendants argue that the Harers fail to state a Monell claim against the Town of Channahon. For Channahon to be liable, the alleged denial of access must have been caused by: (1) an official policy; (2) a widespread and well-settled practice or custom; or (3) an official with final policy-making authority. . . The Harers state a Monell claim under option three. Whether an official has final policy-making authority depends on state law. . . Under state law, the Channahon Chief of Police has final policy-making authority. According to Channahon's municipal code, the Chief of Police is 'the chief executive officer of the Police Department.'. . The Chief has the duty to 'direct, manage, supervise and control all activities and officers and employees of the Police Department.'. . The Chief also has the duty to 'prescribe and enforce such rules, regulations, orders, instructions and directives as may be necessary and convenient to carry out the provisions of the ordinances of the village and the laws of the state and the United States.'. . These duties give the Chief of Police final policy-making authority over officers and crime investigations. If, as the Harers allege, Channahon's Chief of Police—Shane Casey—led Bogart and McClellan in an investigation designed to conceal the truth about Samantha's death, Casey deprived the Harers of their right to access the courts. Because Casey had final policy-making authority to lead that investigation, his alleged acts—if proven—would subject the Town of Channahon to Monell liability."); Molloy v. Acero Charter Schools, Inc., No. 19 C 785, 2019 WL 5101503, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 10, 2019) ("The complaint alleges that 'Sweazy possessed and was delegated final policymaking authority for personnel issues arising within the Santiago School,'. . .; that Acero (through Sweazy) fired Molloy in retaliation for protected speech, . . . ; and that Acero ratified Sweazy's conduct in so doing[.] . . Those allegations suffice at the pleading stage to state a Monell claim against Acero under a 'final policymaker' theory. . . In pressing the contrary result, Acero argues that a provision of the Illinois School Code, 105 ILCS 5/10-21.4a, divests school principals of personnel-related policymaking authority, and instead vests such power exclusively in the school board. . . Acero's argument fails because 105 ILCS 5/10-21.4a does not govern charter schools like the Santiago School. . . Rather, a charter school principal's authority is governed by the charter school's board or other governing body (here, Acero) consistent with the school's charter. . . The complaint alleges facts suggesting that Acero's governing body administered and governed Santiago School in a manner that granted Sweazy final policymaking authority over personnel decisions like Molloy's termination. . .Absent any argument that Acero's charter rendered that delegation impossible, Molloy's Monell claim against Acero survives dismissal under a 'final policymaker' theory."); Spainhoward v. White Cty., Tennessee, No. 2:18-CV-00015, 2019 WL 6468583, at *14–15 (M.D. Tenn. Feb. 1, 2019) ("The Supreme Court has instructed that it is the 'court's task ... to identify those officials or governmental bodies who speak with final policymaking authority' for the municipal entity whose action is alleged to have caused the constitutional violation at issue. . . In Tennessee, a county sheriff is a municipal policymaker as to law enforcement decisions. . . Spainhoward alleges that

Shoupe, acting as 'the ultimate authority on creation, implementation and enforcement of [law enforcement] policy for White County, 'affirmatively ordered the officers present to act in a fashion that violated the federal constitutional rights of citizens, including specifically [Dial],' when, upon hearing the deputies were attempting to use PIT maneuver, 'he communicated to instead use deadly force ... solely to prevent damage to patrol cars.'. . As discussed above, the video exhibit demonstrates that the radio dispatcher stated, 'per 59 [Sheriff Shoupe], take him out by any means necessary including deadly force.' The Court concludes that the Complaint sufficiently alleges that Shoupe, as the final policymaker directing the law enforcement officers involved in the pursuit, made a deliberate choice to follow a course of action from among various alternatives – that is, to issue a blanket order authorizing the use of deadly force to 'take out' Dial – and that he did so without regard for evolving circumstances and driven by a fleeting desire to preserve police property. In other words, she alleges that Shoupe authorized the use of deadly force for improper reasons and in disregard of what else might occur during the pursuit that could affect the legality of the use of deadly force. . . The Complaint further alleges that, despite Dial being pushed off the roadway by Deputy Young in a PIT maneuver and not posing an immediate safety threat to West or others, West (who had unholstered his weapon upon hearing Shoupe's authorization) immediately began firing at Dial 'because he was ordered to do so by' Shoupe . . . and, thus, Shoupe's authorization 'actually caused' the eventual injuries to Dial. Therefore, because Spainhoward alleges that Dial was deprived of his constitutional rights by Shoupe in his role as final policymaker for the Sheriff's Office, municipal liability could attach to White County. . . Accordingly, dismissal of this claim is not appropriate."); Fogle v. Sokol, No. 2:17CV194, 2018 WL 6831137, at *15 (W.D. Pa. Dec. 28, 2018) ("Plaintiff has averred that there was an affirmative County policy established by DA Olson's actions and it was to manufacture evidence where there was otherwise a complete lack of it to support the adopted theory of the case. It is averred as fact that DA Olson made the investigative decision to utilize hypnosis to sure-up what was an otherwise incredible account by an individual whom was unreliable and untrustworthy. It further is alleged as fact that several other techniques known to be unconstitutional or to produce unreliable results were employed at the direction or at least with the knowledge and acquiescence of DA Olson to produce evidence that would support the incredible account of an individual whom everyone involved had reason to believe lacked reliability and/or credibility. Of course, prosecutors have a duty to refrain from improper methods calculated to produce a wrongful conviction.'. . And both the Supreme Court and our Court of Appeals have recognized that engaging in investigative activities such as providing legal advice or guidance to law enforcement during the course of an investigation falls within a district attorney's administrative or managerial functions. . . When a district attorney engages in investigative activities he or she acts as the chief law enforcement officer for the county. And when those activities involve the implementation of techniques or undertakings which are designed to fabricate evidence, a policy that garners constitutional concern has been adopted by a county policymaker with final authority on the matter. And this is so even if it is only in a single case. . . Under these circumstances the county may be understood to be bound by the conduct of the district attorney for the purposes of a motion to dismiss. . . Plaintiff has alleged facts that plausibly set forth the adoption of a policy that was geared toward generating evidence in a manner that violated plaintiff's rights to due process. The policy was implemented by the individual who had final policymaking authority for the County in the undertakings in question. Facts supporting the inference that discovery will reveal evidence to support a finding that the policy caused plaintiff's wrongful conviction have been alleged. Consequently, Defendant County of Indiana's motion to dismiss this count must be denied."); Boston Executive Helicopters, LLC v. Town of Norwood, No. CV 15-13647-RGS, 2017 WL 5195867, at *7 (D. Mass. Nov. 9, 2017) ("Massachusetts law requires that a plaintiff 'offer in evidence local city ordinances pertaining to the [individual's] position of authority within the city's hierarchy,' or some other 'evidence of custom or usage having the force of law' which is sufficient to establish that that a given defendant was a final policy-maker. . .The court has little difficulty concluding that BEH has met its burden of demonstrating that NAC [Norwood Airport Commission] qualifies as the final decision-making authority within the Town of Norwood with respect to the claims at issue. The parties agree that the NAC is an 'agency of the Town [of Norwood] established as the operating authority of the Airport.'. . The Commission was established pursuant to Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 90, § 51E, which provides that '[i]n any city or town in which an airport is established ... there shall be established a board consisting of an odd number of members ... which shall have the custody, care, and management of the municipal airport.' NAC's responsibility for the promulgation and enforcement of regulations and minimum standards comes from Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 90, § 51J, which requires that that an airport commission 'adopt rules and regulations for the use of municipal airports' and that such regulations 'shall conform to and be consistent with the laws of the commonwealth.' NAC is also delegated the responsibility of compliance with federal law as a condition of receiving federal funds. . . Finally, while the Norwood Town Board of Selectmen appoint the individual NAC members, as defendants concede, the 'Board of Selectmen otherwise has no role in the governance of the Commission' and 'has no role in the day-to-day affairs or operations' of the airport. . . From this, it is clear that the members of the Commission constitute 'the highest officials responsible for setting policy in [this particular] area of the government's business[.]' Thus, BEH may proceed in its suit against the Town and the remaining NAC Commissioners in their official capacities 'under the "single-decision/act" exception to Monell's policy or planning rule.'"); Gersbacher v. City of New York, No. 1:14-CV-7600-GHW, 2017 WL 4402538, at *15–17 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 2, 2017) ("Gersbacher seeks to establish municipal liability by arguing that Chief Esposito and Lieutenant Albano were 'final municipal policymakers,'. . . whose decision to remove tarps in Zuccotti Park on September 20, 2011, resulted in the various alleged constitutional violations. The Court is unpersuaded. Before a municipality's liability can be implicated, there must have been a violation of the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . Because the only surviving claim asserted by Gersbacher is that of excessive force premised on a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights, Gersbacher must point to evidence that Chief Esposito and Lieutenant Albano were involved in either the decision to apply such force, or its actual application. . . Gersbacher points to no evidence in the record to support the conclusion that either Chief Esposito or Lieutenant Albano were involved in any force used in the course of his arrest such that their actions could form the basis for Monell liability. Nor is there evidence in the record that either official made a decision related to the amount of force to be used in the event of an arrest. The record indicates that Chief Esposito gave orders related to the removal of tarps in the park. . . It is silent, however, as to Chief Esposito's physical location and actions during Gersbacher's arrest. The record is equally silent as to the whereabouts and activities of Lieutenant Albano at that time. Accordingly, the Court cannot conclude that either official made a decision or took a course of action that led to any excessive force against Gersbacher. . . . Even if Chief Esposito or Lieutenant Albano were involved in arresting and using force on Gersbacher, there is insufficient evidence to conclude that either officer had sufficient authority to give rise to municipal liability. Where the contention is not that the defendants' actions were taken pursuant to a formal policy but rather that they were taken or caused by an official whose decisions represent official policy, the court must determine whether that official had final policymaking authority in the particular area involved. . . . Whether the official in question had final policymaking authority is a legal question, which is to be answered on the basis of state law. . . . The determination of whether the official is a final policymaker under state law is 'to be resolved by the trial judge before the case is submitted to the jury.'. . . Defendants contend that the Commissioner of the NYPD is the sole 'final policymaker' for that department. . . . For his part, Gersbacher points to no legislative enactment or other provision of state law that makes either Chief Esposito or Lieutenant Albano the individual with 'final policymaking authority' over the amount of force to be used in effectuating arrests. Nor does he point to any delegation by the Police Commissioner to Chief Esposito or Lieutenant Albano of the authority to make such policy. Instead, to show that Chief Esposito was a final policymaker, Gersbacher relies only on evidence that Chief Esposito was the individual within the department who gave the order to remove the tarps in the park on September 20, 2011. . .That Chief Esposito has the word 'Chief' in his title, or that he ordered the removal of the tarps on September 20, 2011, do not make him a 'final policymaker' for the City as a matter of law. . . . Gersbacher's argument that Lieutenant Albano is a final policymaker because he testified that he was a policymaker during his deposition is also unconvincing. Whether or not an officer has sufficient authority to constitute a final policymaker is determined as a matter of law, not by the relevant officer's self-regard. The City Charter grants authority for 'the execution of ... the rules and regulations of the department' to the Commissioner alone. . . Gersbacher points to no evidence on which the Court could conclude as a matter of law that Chief Esposito or Lieutenant Albano were delegated final policymaking authority in the area of officers' use of force. . . Accordingly, Gersbacher's Monell claim is dismissed."); T.S. v. Twentieth Century Fox Television, No. 16 C 8303, 2017 WL 1425596, at *7-9 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 20, 2017) ("Plaintiffs agree that the Eleventh Amendment generally affords Chief Judge Evans immunity from suit. Nevertheless, Plaintiffs seek to establish that the Chief Judge's Office is liable because operation of the JTDC is a county function—as opposed to the Chief Judge's actions taken pursuant to his state-officer judicial powers. In support of their argument, Plaintiffs point to the Illinois County Shelter Care and Detention Home Act ("Detention Home Act"), which allows counties in Illinois to create and operate juvenile detention centers. . .In response, the Chief Judge's Office maintains that Chief Judge Evans' actual function under the Detention Home Act is limited because the Act merely gives the Chief Judge power to 'appoint an administrator to serve as Superintendent,' as well as other 'necessary personnel' to administer the JTDC, along with direct control of the JTDC's budget. . . Accordingly, the Chief Judge's Office argues that—even if administration under the Detention Home Act is a county function—Defendant Superintendent Dixon is the individual with administrative authority over the JTDC pursuant to the Act. . . At this stage of the proceedings—and in light of the transition of administrators during the relevant time period—whether Superintendent Dixon had administrative authority over the JTDC during the relevant time period and was the governmental official who gave the Fox Defendants permission to film Empire at the JTDC is not as clear-cut as the Chief Judge's Office suggests. . . To give context, in 2007, the State of Illinois enacted legislation that transferred the administration of the JTDC from Cook County's executive branch (Board of Commissioners) to the Chief Judge's Office allowing the Chief Judge to appoint and remove administrators to run the JTDC. . .The Chief Judge appointed Superintendent Dixon as JTDC Superintendent in May 2015—one month before the filming of Empire began. . . Prior to May 2015, Transitional Administrator Earl Dunlap was tasked with running the JTDC. . . Also, in the First Amended Complaint, Plaintiffs allege that the Chief Judge Timothy Evans knew about and approved the filming of Empire at the JTDC, as well as the facility's consequent lockdown, and that the lockdown occurred during the high-profile transition in which the Chief Judge's Office took administrative control of the JTDC. . . Plaintiffs further assert that despite Superintendent Dixon's experience in the field of juvenile corrections, he had just become the JTDC's Superintendent prior to the Empire filming raising a reasonable inference that the filming was done with Chief Judge Evans' approval. . . Under these circumstances and allegations, whether someone in the Chief Judge's Office, the Chief Judge, Superintendent Dixon, and/or Transitional Administrator Dunlap was the relevant administrator and/or decision-maker regarding the Fox Defendants filming Empire at the JTDC remains unclear. In short, the parties' legal arguments concerning immunity are muddied by this change in administration, as well as Plaintiffs' allegations that the Chief Judge's Office was exercising county administrative authority—not judicial authority. Until the parties take discovery to determine which final policy decision-maker allowed the Fox Defendants to film Empire at the JTDC, the Chief Judge's Office remains a Defendant to this lawsuit. . . .Plaintiffs seek to establish Monell liability pursuant to the deliberate act of the individual with the 'final policy-making authority' in relation to the administration of the JTDC and the decision to allow the Fox Defendants to film Empire there. . . To do so, they allege that Superintendent Dixon, Chief Judge Evans, and/or someone in the Chief Judge's Office knew about and approved the filming of Empire at the JTDC, and the facility's consequent lockdowns. . . Although it is undisputed that the Detention Home Act gives the Chief Judge the power to 'appoint an administrator to serve as Superintendent' and that the Chief Judge appointed Superintendent Dixon in May 2015, as discussed above, it is unclear who made the decision to allow the Fox Defendants to film episodes of Empire at the JTDC. As such, viewing Plaintiffs' allegations as true and all reasonable inferences in their favor, they have sufficiently stated a claim for Monell liability under Iqbal and Twombly based on a final policy-maker's decision. . . Once the parties conduct discovery and uncover who made the final policy decision to allow the Fox Defendants to film Empire at the JTDC, Plaintiffs can narrow their claims. Moreover, although Cook County argues that Plaintiffs have pleaded themselves out of court because they allege that Chief Judge Evans was the decision-maker with final policy-making authority, Plaintiffs have also set forth sufficient allegations that Superintendent Dixon may have also been a final policy decision-maker, and, at this procedural posture, the Court is required to view the allegations and all reasonable inferences in Plaintiffs' favor. . . These allegations include Superintendent Dixon's significant background and experience in the field of juvenile corrections, that he allegedly entered into the agreement with the other Defendants to permit the crews to film Empire at the JTDC, and that he aided the Fox Defendants in filming Empire while acting in the scope of his employment. . .The Court therefore denies Defendants Cook County's, Superintendent Dixon's and Chief Judge's Office's motions to dismiss Plaintiffs' Monell liability claim."); Doe v. Bradshaw, 203 F.Supp.3d 168, 182 (D. Mass. 2016) ("The acts of Bradshaw and other school officials are not sufficient to constitute a policy or custom giving rise to municipal liability in this case. Specific acts can constitute such a municipal policy when made by officials with 'final policymaking authority.'. . Whether an official has final policymaking authority is a matter of state law. . .That said, even full discretion to act on a particular matter is insufficient to constitute final policymaking authority; only a complete delegation of authority to an official suffices. . . Thus, if an official's decisions are 'constrained by policies not of that official's making' or 'subject to review by the municipality's authorized policymakers,' those decisions are not chargeable to the municipality under § 1983. . . In Massachusetts, the School Committee has final policymaking authority over educational policies. . . The allegedly unconstitutional acts here, however, were performed by school officials, rather than the Committee. Such acts cannot subject the Town to liability without more. Even Superintendent Bradshaw, who possessed significant powers of unilateral action, did not have final policymaking authority over the matters in question. As a matter of policy, the School Committee was informed of and reviewed all hiring decisions, for example, although it only directly made personnel decisions for a small number of positions and did not do so for Weixler's job. As to serious disciplinary matters, Bradshaw routinely reported the allegations made against Weixler and the findings of the school's internal investigations to the Committee. While there is evidence making clear that the Committee generally left personnel issues to Bradshaw and her staff, on the high-stakes issue of how to respond to allegations of abuse, the Committee retained at least some responsibility for ultimate oversight and had not fully delegated the issue to Bradshaw. More importantly, state law requires school committees to 'establish educational goals and policies,' Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 71 § 37, while requiring superintendents to 'manage the system in a fashion consistent with state law and the policy determinations of that school committee,' Mass. Gen. Laws c. 71 § 59. . . State law thus declares the school committee to be the final policymaking body on educational issues. Only the School Committee's own acts, therefore, can subject the Town itself to § 1983 liability."); Ores v. Village of Dolton, 152 F.Supp.3d 1069, 1090-91 (N.D. Ill. 2015) ("Even though the Court has already decided that Chief Jones did not commit a procedural due process violation, and even though that liability would be a necessary premise for Monell liability against the Village of Dolton, the Court will address (again, for the sake of completeness) the parties' remaining arguments on Dolton's liability. The Court grants Dolton's motion for summary judgment on municipal liability for the separate reason that Chief Jones was not a final policymaker, for Monell purposes, for the imposed suspension. . . . In this case, Chief Jones was not a final policymaker because his actions were constrained by the Board, as explained earlier in the Opinion. . . . Thus, Chief Jones 'is not the final policymaker regarding employee discipline and discharge, nor does he shape the employment policy for the Department.'. . This is a separate and independent ground for concluding that there is no municipal liability against Dolton."); T.E. v. Pine Bush Cent. Sch. Dist., 58 F. Supp. 3d 332, 372-76 (S.D.N.Y. 2014) ("Plaintiffs argue that

Steinberg was a final policymaker within the District, with the authority to 'ensure[ ] students [were] free from harassment and bullying,' and that the principals, including Fisch and Boyle, were final policymakers because the Board delegated disciplinary matters to their discretion. . . Under New York law, however, the Superintendent does not have the authority to 'promulgate or otherwise create rules, regulations, or policies of his own.'. . Instead, he has the 'power to enforce all provisions of law and all rules and regulations relating to the management of the schools and other educational, social and recreational activities under the direction of the board of education.'. . There is nothing, in turn, to indicate that principals have rule-making or policymaking authority with respect to discipline under New York law. Rather, New York law provides that the Board of Education 'shall have power, and it shall be its duty ... [t]o establish such rules and regulations concerning the order and discipline of the schools ... as [it] may deem necessary to secure the best educational results.'. .Moreover, although the Board has the power to delegate its authority, . . . Plaintiffs do not point to any 'formally declared or ratified policy' that supports the Board's delegation of its rule-making authority to prevent student-on-student harassment. . .These principles notwithstanding, courts in the Second Circuit are split as to whether a principal may qualify as a final policymaker for purposes of Monell liability. [collecting cases] . . . . To support their claim that Steinberg and the principals are final policymakers with respect to how and when to impose discipline or address bullying and harassment in their schools, Plaintiffs rely on Steinberg's testimony that he was the 'person that's in charge of most of the daily operations of the district.'. . Further, Fisch testified that he had authority to decide what discipline was appropriate for certain misconduct. . . Some courts in the Second Circuit have held that similar evidence was enough to suggest that principals have final policymaking authority for Monell purposes. [collecting cases] This Court concludes, however, that here Plaintiffs have failed to establish, 'as a matter of law,' that Steinberg or the principals are 'final policymakers' with respect to ensuring that students are free from anti-Semitism and bullying. . . Instead, evidence in the record reveals that Steinberg and the principals had discretion to determine when to investigate bullying and harassment and how to respond to the behavior. The Second Circuit has 'explicitly rejected the view that mere exercise of discretion [is] sufficient to establish municipal liability.'. . Moreover, the record here confirms that the Board had final policymaking authority with respect to discipline. . . . Accordingly, because New York Law provides that the Board, not Steinberg or the principals, has the power to 'establish ... rules and regulations concerning the order and discipline of the schools,' N.Y. Educ. Law § 1709, Plaintiffs point to no formal delegation of the Board's policymaking authority to Steinberg or the principals, and the record demonstrates that the Board has policymaking and oversight authority with respect to the District's disciplinary policies, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs have failed to carry their burden to establish that Steinberg and the principals are 'final policymakers' as a matter of law."); Meagher v. Andover Sch. Comm., No. CIV.A. 13-11307-JGD, 2015 WL 1442517, at *21-22 (D. Mass. Mar. 31, 2015) ("This court finds that the municipal defendants are liable because McGrath was the ultimate decision-maker vis-à-vis the decision to terminate Meagher's employment. Therefore, Meagher is entitled to judgment as a matter of law on her claims against those defendants. . . . In order to determine whether McGrath had 'final policymaking authority' with respect to Meagher's termination, it is necessary to look to state and local law. . . Under the Massachusetts Education

Reform Act of 1993, 'the ultimate responsibility' for hiring, firing and demoting public school teachers 'resides ... with the superintendents themselves[.]' Ciccarelli v. Sch. Dep't of Lowell, 70 Mass.App.Ct. 787, 792, 877 N.E.2d 609, 615 (2007). See also Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 71, § 42 ('A principal may dismiss or demote any teacher or other person assigned full-time to the school, subject to the review and approval of the superintendent' (emphasis added)); Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 71, § 59B ('Principals employed under this section shall be responsible, consistent with district personnel policies and budgetary restrictions and subject to the approval of the superintendent, for hiring all teachers' (emphasis added)). Accordingly, McGrath was the final decisionmaker with respect to Meagher's dismissal, and the municipal defendants are liable for the violation of Meagher's constitutional rights."); P.A. v. City of New York, 44 F.Supp.3d 287, ___ (E.D.N.Y. 2014) ("Though my conclusion that the individual defendants did not act unlawfully by removing PA precludes the imposition of municipal liability, I write to explain my view that plaintiffs' theory of municipal liability also lacks support in the legal precedents on which it is based. Furthermore, if I am mistaken about the merits decision on the officers' conduct, and the officers are protected only by qualified immunity, the following reasoning explains why the City would still not be liable. . .As alleged against the City, the plaintiffs must demonstrate that the challenged actions represented official policy or custom. PA's principal argument in favor of Monell liability is that even if the decision to remove PA was not the result of an oft-repeated, officially promulgated policy or practice of the City, it was nonetheless made by sufficiently high-ranking officials that the acts must be attributed to the City as official action. This form of Monell liability was first articulated by the Supreme Court in Pembaur v. City of Cincinnati, 475 U.S. 469 (1986), where the Court held that a municipality could be liable even for a single decision made by a government official, as long as the decision was 'properly made by that government's authorized decisionmakers,' since such an act 'surely represents an act of official government "policy" as that term is commonly understood.'. . . Here, the plaintiffs identify Reinaldo Gibbs, the Child Protective Manager on the case, who made the decision to remove PA on an emergency basis. As a matter of written City policy, '[o]nly the CPM in charge of the case is the decision-maker for each emergency custody decision.'. . .I conclude that Gibbs was not a 'policymaker' within the meaning of the cases interpreting Pembaur, nor was his decision one of 'policy,' so the City cannot be held responsible under § 1983 for his actions. As my starting point, I note that Pembaur did not intend to turn every exercise of discretion by a higher-ranking municipal official into an act attributable to the municipality . . . . [T]he plaintiffs have not alleged that Gibbs, though empowered to exercise discretion over the final emergency removal decision, was also the official who made City policy about the circumstances under which such decisions would be made, the factors that would go into them, and so forth. This case is therefore similar to a line of cases in which courts have held that allegedly discriminatory employment decisions were not attributable to municipalities because the final decisionmakers did not also set employment policy."); McGrath v. Town of Sandwich, 22 F.Supp.3d 58, 66, 67 (D. Mass. 2014) ("In some instances, a municipality may be held liable for an unconstitutional policy based upon a single decision by a policymaker. . .Here, Ty's claim that Superintendent Canfield 'pre-approved' the decision to withhold evidence from Ty constitutes such a policy decision. Moreover, for the purposes of Ty's suspension, Superintendent Canfield was the final policymaker because the SHS Student Handbook did not permit a student who was suspended for ten days or fewer to appeal that decision to the School Committee."); Snyder v. Smith, 7 F.Supp.3d 842, 869 (S.D. Ind. 2014) ("The only time . . . that a single action suffices to establish a municipal policy is when the action is taken by a person with 'final decision-making authority.'. . In her response to this motion, Plaintiff argues that because Mayor McBarnes is such a figure, evidence of his conduct satisfies Monell. As discussed previously, however, Mayor McBarnes is not vested by Indiana law with such authority over the affairs of the city police department. Indiana law controls this question, and it provides that the chief of police, not mayor, is the final decision-making authority with respect to law enforcement policy. . . In the state's second- and third-class cities such as Frankfort, control over personnel matters in police and fire departments, by contrast, is vested in the city's Safety Board; specifically, the Safety Board has authority to 'adopt rules for the government and discipline of the police and fire departments' and to 'adopt general and special orders to the police and fire departments through the chiefs of the departments.'. . The Mayor of Frankfort is thus a final decision-maker with respect to neither law enforcement policy nor police discipline and personnel matters. . . Whatever he said to the Snyders and subsequently did or failed to do, his words and actions on one occasion do not suffice to show that the Mayor of Frankfort 'adopted a policy of knowing about police misconduct and refusing to do anything about it.'. . The municipal liability claim against the City under Section 1983 thus fails."); Doe v. Town of Stoughton, No. 12–10467–PBS, 2013 WL 6498959, *3, *4 (D. Mass. Dec. 10, 2013) ("The Town asserts that in Massachusetts, a School Committee acts as the body with final policymaking authority, and that not even a district superintendent counts as a policymaker under state law. . . As one Massachusetts Superior Court judge summarized these statutes in the context of a school-based civil rights action, 'In short, the school committee makes policy; the school superintendent and principals implement those policies.'. . Federal district courts have split on whether a superintendent counts as a policymaker under Massachusetts state law. [comparing cases] Here, the assistant principal and school guidance counselors addressed the ongoing peer harassment alleged by Plaintiff, and not Stoughton school committee members. Regardless of whether a superintendent can act as a final policymaker under state law, it is clear that an assistant principal or guidance counselor is not one. Further, the record evidences no pattern or practice giving rise to liability under § 1983. Therefore, Plaintiff has not satisfied the Monell standard for municipal liability for constitutional violations."); Ejchorszt v. Daigle, No. 3:02CV1350(CFD), 2007 WL 879132, at 3-5 (D. Conn. Mar. 21, 2007) ("Ejchorszt argues that Norwich is liable for Daigle's conduct because it delegated policymaking authority to Daigle for the liquor investigation program, and that, through Daigle, Norwich established a policy or custom of exploiting volunteers. . . . Daigle's decisions cannot be viewed as final because he was still subject to overall supervision by his superiors. Daigle's decisions were at all times subject to review by several layers within his chain of command. Further, Daigle was subject to department policy that was not of his own making. Indeed, after his conduct came to light Daigle was investigated and discharged for violating official policy including the department's strip search policy, the police code and canon of ethics, and for inappropriate use of his official position. . . . It would seem that tactical decisions by unit leaders on operational aspects of law enforcement would not ordinarily confer policymaker status on those unit leaders. . . . Accordingly, Ejchorszt has failed to establish that Daigle was a final policymaker for Norwich concerning the liquor law enforcement program."); Stearns-Groseclose v. Chelan County Sheriff's Dep't., No. CV-04-0312-RHW, 2006 WL 195788, at *22 (E.D. Wash. Jan. 17, 2006) (". . . Sheriff Harum and other Washington county sheriffs are the official policymakers for law enforcement and peace officer training, but not for hiring and personnel decisions. That function falls with the Civil Service Commission. Because Sheriff Harum was not the official policymaker for Chelan County regarding hiring decision, but was instead allegedly acting outside and contrary to County policy, municipal liability cannot be imputed to Chelan County for his actions. . . .Sheriff Harum was not the official policymaker of Chelan County for hiring decisions at CCSO, so his decision that Plaintiff failed her background investigation was not a municipal action by the County, let alone deliberate conduct. Moreover, Plaintiff has not established that the County Civil Service Commission 'ratified' Sheriff Harum's decision that Plaintiff failed her background investigation."); Cacciatore v. County of Bergen, No. Civ.02-1404 WGB, 2005 WL 3588489, at *5 (D.N.J. Dec. 30, 2005) ("It is clear under New Jersey law that the Sheriff has the authority to make employment decisions in his office, including hiring, firing and promoting employees. . . .The Sheriff's power pertaining to employees, however, is not beyond review. . . . Plaintiffs maintain that Defendants effectively have decreased Plaintiffs' compensation by transferring them into positions where they do not receive overtime, refusing to offer overtime and forcing them to take compensatory time in lieu of overtime because Plaintiffs refused to provide campaign contributions. The Court finds that the Sheriff's employment decisions regarding these matters are not 'final and unreviewable' to make him a policymaker for the County."); Raphael v. County of Nassau, 387 F.Supp.2d 127, 132 (E.D.N.Y. 2005) ("Even if Sergeant Mulcahy may have been the ranking officer on the scene and thus may have had some decision-making authority over the conduct of the other officers, the mere exercise of discretion is insufficient to establish municipal liability. See Anthony v. City of New York, 339 F.3d 129, 139 (2d Cir.2003); Jeffes v. Barnes, 208 F.3d 49, 57 (2d Cir.2000). Moreover, the Second Circuit, in the Anthony case, specifically rejected the argument that a Sergeant's orders on the scene constitute official municipal policy. . . Thus the court finds as a matter of law that Sergeant Mulcahy was not a policymaker for purposes of § 1983 municipal liability."); Reed v. City of Lavonia, 390 F.Supp.2d 1347, 1365 (M.D. Ga. 2005) ("Here, Reed seeks to impose liability upon the City of Lavonia for Chief Shirley's actions in hiring and retaining Officer Masionet. Reed argues that Masionet's previous employment history provided Shirley with actual and constructive knowledge Masionet was predisposed to using excessive force during arrests and that Shirley further failed to properly discipline, and thereby negligently retained, Masionet after he was hired − despite disciplinary infractions committed. It is not disputed, however, that the City of Lavonia's Employee Handbook and the Police Department's Policy and Procedures Manual both provide that all disciplinary action taken against City employees is subject to review through a City Grievance Procedure. Thus, apparently, any decisions made by Chief Shirley with respect to disciplinary action taken (or not taken) against Officer Masionet were subject to 'meaningful administrative' review as contemplated by the Eleventh Circuit in Scala. It is further undisputed that, pursuant to the Charter for the City of Lavonia, 'all non-department head employees are hired and fired by the City Council of the City of Lavonia, Georgia.' Plaintiffs even concede that 'the mayor and city counsel had authority to review [Shirley's] disciplinary and hiring decisions.'. . In light of these undisputed facts, this Court must find that, as a matter of law, Chief Shirley may not be considered a 'policymaker possessing the final authority to establish policy' with respect to the hiring, discipline, and retention of his officers. Obviously, the City allows Chief Shirley to make these hiring and disciplinary decisions on a daily basis; yet, as discussed above, this fact alone would not make Shirley the 'final authority' on such decisions. 'The delegation of policymaking authority requires more than a showing of mere discretion or decisionmaking authority on the part of the delegee.' . . Here, because the City undisputedly retains the power to review Chief Shirley's exercise of discretion in hiring and disciplining his officers, Shirley may not be considered 'policymaker possessing the final authority' on such matters, so as to permit the imposition of municipal liability under § 1983."); Panaderia La Diana, Inc. v. Salt Lake City Corp., 342 F.Supp.2d 1013, 1037, 1038 (D. Utah 2004) ("In sum, the defendants do not dispute that the search warrant was executed according to standard operating procedure for a Category C warrant; or in other words, according to the policy of the City. Moreover, the final decision to execute the warrant as a Category C warrant was made by Carroll Mayes, who himself testified that he was the tactical commander who had 'overall control' of the operation. As such, Officer Mayes appears to be a person with final policy-making authority on the matters at issue here. The court therefore holds, as a matter of law, that the decision on how to execute the warrant was made by persons with final policy-making authority. This is a question for the court, not the jury. The court also holds that there is a genuine issue of material fact as to whether a City policy or procedure led to the alleged constitutional violations. . . . Once those officials who have the power to make official policy on a particular issue have been identified, it is for the jury to determine whether their decisions have caused the deprivation of rights at issue by policies which affirmatively command that it occur ... or by acquiescence in a longstanding practice or custom which constitutes the 'standard operating procedure' of the local government. In sum, a reasonable jury could find that the City is liable for alleged constitutional violations occurring during the raid.' [footnotes omitted]); Schroeder v. Maumee Bd. of Educ., 296 F.Supp.2d 869, 875, 876 (N.D. Ohio 2003) ("Defendants argue that the Board of Education had a sexual harassment policy and states that '[o]bviously, the policy of the Board of Education was to eliminate sexual harassment in all forms.' . . However, it is not necessarily dispositive under Monell that the Board had a general policy prohibiting sexual harassment. As the Sixth Circuit explained in Meyers v. City of Cincinnati, 14 F.3d 1115 (6th Cir.1994), it does not matter if the municipality in question has a general policy disfavoring an action taken by a municipal policy-maker, because 'it is plain that municipal liability may be imposed for a single decision by municipal policy-makers under appropriate circumstances.' . . In the instant case, if the decision to ignore harassment and abuse of plaintiff 'was made by the government's authorized decisionmakers the [Board] is responsible.' [citing Meyers] . . . Plaintiff, however, offers no evidence that Defendants Conroy and Wilson were authorized decision makers for the Board of Education or that the Board is 'actually responsible' for their actions. . . Certainly, Conroy and Wilson, as Principal and Assistant Principal of Gateway, were responsible for implementing policies and customs at their school, but it does not appear that their alleged deliberate indifference to plaintiff's complaints of harassment and physical violence represented the policy or custom of the Board of Education. Plaintiff offers no evidence that the Board of Education knew about, condoned, or was deliberately indifferent to Conroy's and Wilson's alleged discriminatory treatment of plaintiff."); Engelleiter v. Brevard County Sheriff's Dep't., 290 F.Supp.2d 1300, 1314 (M.D. Fla. 2003) ("Engelleiter has not proved a 'policy or custom' based on treatment decisions by the Brevard County Sheriff's Office or the nurses at the Detention Center. Nothing in the record shows that Brevard County has made its nurses into 'policy-makers' who possess final authority to establish municipal policy for the Brevard County Sheriff's Office with respect to the care of pretrial detainees. Indeed, Engelleiter has not proved that policymaking authority has been delegated to any nurse. A doctor's delegation of authority to a nurse to exercise nursing discretion is hardly sufficient to give the nurse policy- making authority. Indeed, it would be a severe stretch of the term 'policy or custom' to find that each nurse establishes a 'policy or custom' for the Brevard County Sheriff's Office every time she administers insulin to a detainee. . . . The delegation of nursing care to nurses is very different from asking nurses to establish public policy for a Sheriff's Office. The delegation of policymaking authority described in Monell requires delegation such that the subordinate's discretionary decisions are not constrained by official policies, and are not subject to review. Engelleiter has not proved that the nurses at the Brevard County Detention Center were free to ignore the official policies of the Brevard County Sheriff's Office, and were free from review or supervision by the responsible doctor. Engelleiter has submitted absolutely no medical opinion or proof that such a delegation of routine nursing tasks is in any way contrary to the express policy of the Brevard County Sheriff's Office that every inmate receive quality medical care throughout his incarceration and never be denied needed medical care."); Lewis v. City of Boston, No. CIV.A.00-11548-DPW, 2002 WL 523910, at *10 (D. Mass. March 29, 2002) (not reported) ("I find that the decisions in question − to eliminate the Music Director position and not to hire Lewis as Roland Hayes director − are fairly characterized as municipal actions for which the city itself is liable. It was the City of Boston as employer, and not any particular individual, that eliminated the position of Music Director. The decision was made as part of the budgetary process and constituted a deliberate policy determination with respect to the structure of the music education program in the public schools. Moreover, the decision was made by the City's education policymakers − the superintendent, the deputy superintendent, and the head of the curriculum department − who together act as the municipality itself with respect to issues of education. Thus, the City was the moving force behind the decision and the degree of culpability possessed by these individual policymakers can be attributed to the City itself."); Hill v. New York City Bd. of Ed., 808 F. Supp. 141, 151 (E.D.N.Y. 1992) ("Although Director of Pupil Transportation had discretion to decertify drivers, he did not have authority to set policies relating to such decertification; since he "was empowered to act only within the parameters of certain policies set by the Chancellor of the Board of Education and the Board itself," he was not a final policymaker.)

For a subordinate's decision to be attributable to the government entity, "the authorized policymakers [must] approve [the] decision and the basis for it. . . .[s]imply going along with discretionary decisions made by one's subordinates . . . is not a delegation to them of authority to make policy." 485 U.S. at 129-30.

Compare Franklin v. City of Charlotte, 64 F.4th 519, 536-37 (4th Cir. 2023) ("Under Mrs. Franklin's theory, the City Manager's 'conscious, deliberate choice to approve of the shooting [as] justified under the City's policy on use of deadly force ... subjects the City to liability.'. . She maintains that the district court erred by imposing a causation requirement because the Supreme Court, in Praprotnik, 'expressly modified Monell to allow for liability by ratification by a final policymaker of the act and the basis for it.'. . However, Praprotnik did no such thing. Praprotnik involved a St. Louis city employee who was transferred from one city department to another by agreement of the directors of the departments, and then was eventually laid off by the director of the second department. . . The employee brought a § 1983 suit against the city, alleging that the city took these actions in retaliation for his successful appeal of an earlier suspension, in violation of his First Amendment rights. . . A plurality of the Supreme Court held that a municipality can be held liable for a single constitutional violation by a subordinate when an individual with policymaking authority approves the subordinate's action. . . Applying that test to the facts, the plurality determined that the employee failed to demonstrate that any of the directors possessed the final policymaking authority necessary for municipal liability. . . And its conclusion that the directors were not policymakers ended the case and mooted any discussion of causation. Nothing in that decision suggests that it abandoned the requirement that a municipal policy caused the alleged constitutional injury. Indeed, Praprotnik acknowledged that a municipality cannot properly be held liable unless the 'injury was inflicted by [its] "lawmakers or by those whose edicts or acts may fairly be said to represent official policy."'. . Here, the parties do not dispute that the City Manager was the final decisionmaker in the review of use of force complaints against CMPD officers under the City's ordinance. Nor is it disputed that the City Manager exercised that authority and declared that Officer Kerl acted in conformity with CMPD's use-of-force policy and applicable law in killing Franklin. But there is a key distinction between this case and those in which a city policymaker may be liable for ratifying an action. A city employee who suffers an adverse employment action that is later ratified by a city policymaker may trace his or her injury back to that ratification. Repealing the ratification potentially could restore the employee back to the pre-injury status quo. But unlike in Praprotnik, Franklin's death is not traceable to a subordinate's decision that may be approved as final by a city policymaker. Rather, as the district court concluded, 'the City Manager's post-facto approval of an internal shooting investigation cannot possibly have caused the constitutional violation.'. .. Reversing the City Manager's decision cannot undo what is done. Therefore, we affirm the district court's holding that the City is not liable under § 1983 for Officer Kerl's shooting of Franklin.") with Starbuck v. Williamsburg James City County School Bd., 28 F.4th 529, 533-36 (4th Cir. 2022) ("[U]nder Virginia law, the School Board has final policymaking authority over short-term suspensions. This means that the School Board's actions regarding student suspensions can serve as 'policies' for the purpose of municipal liability under Monell. Moreover, when a final policymaker has the authority to review the decision of a subordinate, its approval of that allegedly unconstitutional decision can also give rise to liability under Section 1983. . . Under this theory of liability, if the School Board ratified the suspension of a student by subordinates, the School Board would be liable for any deprivation of constitutional rights caused by that suspension. Imposing liability on a municipality for its ratification of the acts of subordinates accords with the purpose of municipal liability under Section 1983. That is, it holds municipalities accountable for the 'action[s] for which the municipality is actually responsible.'. . Thus, ratification liability critically differs from respondeat superior liability, the latter of which is impermissible under Monell. . . Ratification liability does not hold a municipality liable for the actions of subordinate officials; rather, it holds the municipality liable for its own decision to uphold the actions of subordinates. . . . The School Board's approval of a suspension allegedly imposed to punish assertedly protected speech is a decision of a body with final policymaking authority. Monell teaches that such a decision gives rise to the School Board's potential liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.").

See also Saunders v. Town of Hull, 874 F.3d 324, 331 (1st Cir. 2017) ("Saunders can point to no evidence linking the Board to Billings's purported retaliatory motive, aside from Billings's single statement: 'Town Hall has my back.' Saunders did not depose any Board members to obtain information to substantiate his claim. Nor does he proffer any communications suggesting that the Board members were aware of—let alone expressly approved of—Billings's motive. . . There is nothing in the record, aside from Saunders's own suspicions to suggest that the Board did not simply 'go[ ] along' with Billings's decision or 'mere[ly] fail[ ] to investigate' why he did not affirmatively recommend that the Board promote Saunders to the vacant sergeant position. . . As such, the district court correctly held that Saunders failed to raise a genuine dispute as to whether the Board members 'ratified' Billings's alleged retaliation under Praprotnik."); Howell v. Town of Ball, 827 F.3d 515, 527-28 (5th Cir. 2016) ("The town of Ball does not dispute that the Board was the 'official policy maker' for the purposes of municipal liability. Nor can Ball credibly dispute that Howell has offered some evidence suggesting that Police Chief Caldwell harbored retaliatory animus. Thus, the dispositive question is simply whether retaliatory animus is also chargeable to the Board itself. In other words, we must consider whether Howell has offered some evidence establishing that his involvement in the FBI investigation motivated the Board's approval of Caldwell's recommendation that Howell be fired. This motive can be established by offering evidence that the Board itself harbored retaliatory animus, or that it ratified both Caldwell's recommendation for discharge and the retaliatory animus backing it. See, e.g., Culbertson, 790 F.3d at 621 ("If a final policymaker approves a subordinate's recommendation and also the subordinate's reasoning, that approval is considered a ratification chargeable to the municipality."); see also Beattie v. Madison Cty. Sch. Dist., 254 F.3d 595, 603 (5th Cir. 2001) (stating that a plaintiff "must impute [a subordinate's] allegedly improper motives to the board by demonstrating that the board approved both [the subordinate's] decision and the basis for it"). Our review of the evidence demonstrates a genuine dispute of fact regarding whether Howell's protected activity was a motivating factor in the Board's decision to adopt Caldwell's recommendation. First, the Board had knowledge of Caldwell's retaliatory motive when it approved the recommendation to fire Howell. Howell asserts in his deposition that, when given an opportunity to speak at the hearing, he told the Board that he considered his discharge to be an act of 'revenge.' Although this statement, standing alone, may be too vague to confer upon the Board knowledge of Caldwell's retaliatory motive, the Board defendants' own depositions suggest that Howell's statement was actually more detailed. More importantly, the Board understood Howell's statement to mean that he was being fired for assisting in the FBI investigation. . . The Board, however, did not inquire further into this allegation; instead the Board reflexively accepted Caldwell's recommendation with no further ado. A jury reasonably could infer the Board's ratification of Caldwell's retaliatory animus from its cursory approval of Caldwell's recommendation that Howell be fired, as the Board, acting as the official policy maker, reflexively approved Howell's discharge with awareness of the alleged retaliatory motive behind it. . . Howell, however, also offers further evidence suggesting the Board's liability. Specifically, Howell has submitted deposition testimony from Vernon Altenberger, a Ball resident who frequently socialized with town officials. Altenberger asserts that he overheard one member of the Board, Alderman Giddings, admit to several townspeople that Howell was fired because he wore a wire for the FBI investigation. Other members of the Board may dispute Giddings's assessment of the Board's rationale for firing Howell; nevertheless, this admission is sufficient here to create a genuine dispute of fact over the motivating factor in the Board's decision. Accordingly, we vacate the district court's summary judgment for the town of Ball and remand for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion."); Fennell v. Marion Indep. Sch. Dist., 804 F.3d 398, 413 (5th Cir. 2015)("As Plaintiffs admit, the final policymaker here is the Marion ISD Board of Trustees, which has 'exclusive policymaking authority under Texas law.'. . Here, the record shows that the grievances at issue were not presented to the Board until May 2012, after all the incidents described above occurred. Although the record indicates that some of the incidents were reported to Marion ISD administrators and the interim superintendent, those individuals have not been delegated policymaking authority under Texas law. . . Thus, even assuming the alleged customs, policies, and failures to train existed among Marion ISD employees, '[t]here is no evidence that the Board knew of this behavior or condoned it.'. . In particular, while the Board may have known about three of the incidents prior to the May 2012 Board meeting, . . . those alone are not sufficient to show the board had knowledge of any discriminatory custom. . . Moreover, the Board had previously implemented official policies prohibiting racial discrimination, bullying, and harassment. . . And after the parking lot noose incident, Marion ISD instituted additional anti-discrimination and anti-harassment training facilitated by the DOJ and provided by an unaffiliated organization. . . The district court therefore did not err in granting summary judgment as to the claim against Marion ISD under § 1983."); Culbertson v. Lykos, 790 F.3d 608, 621-22 (5th Cir. 2015) ("The decision-maker on non-renewal of the Contract was the Harris County Commissioners Court. That 'court' is actually the principal governing body for a Texas county. . . It is comprised of four commissioners elected from districts and a county judge elected countywide. . . The Commissioners Court may contract for law enforcement services. . . It also approves the budget for the county and may make changes in a proposed budget as it finds warranted by the facts and law. . . Neither party disputes that the Commissioners Court is a final policymaker for Harris County in the area of contracting and budgeting. . . . Under the theory of ratification, it is not enough that the Commissioners Court approved Palmer's and Lykos's recommendation. A plaintiff 'must impute [the defendant's] allegedly improper motives to the board by demonstrating that the board approved both [the defendant's] decision and the basis for it.'. . . A plausible claim has been stated that the Commissioners knew about the reasons for Lykos's and Palmer's recommendations, and it then ratified them, i.e., it approved the recommendation and the reasoning. Whether evidence developed through discovery or otherwise would support the allegations against the County is unknown."); Ellins v. City of Sierra Madre, 710 F.3d 1049, 1066, 1067 (9th Cir. 2013) ("Whether an official is a policymaker for Monell purposes is a question governed by state law. . . California state law permits municipalities to enact regulations creating a 'city manager' form of governance. . . The City of Sierra Madre has enacted such regulations. . . The City has delegated to the city manager the 'authority to control, order, and give directions to all heads of departments and to subordinate officers and employees of the city....' Sierra Madre Mun.Code § 2.08.070(B) (2000). More specifically, it is the city manager's duty to 'appoint, discipline, remove, promote, and demote any and all officers and employees of the city except the city clerk, city treasurer, or city attorney....'. . . The Sierra Madre Personnel Rules and Regulations further reinforce these provisions by expressly charging the city manager with administering the City's personnel rules. These local ordinances and regulations establish that city manager Elaine Aguilar, not Diaz, possesses final policymaking authority over police employment decisions. Although it is undisputed that Aguilar approved Diaz's decision to delay signing Ellins's P.O.S.T. application, Ellins does not allege that Aguilar knew that the decision was in retaliation for protected speech or that she ratified the decision despite such knowledge. . . Ellins has thus failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether his alleged injury is attributable to the City of Sierra Madre's policymaker."); Gillette v. Delmore, 979 F.2d 1342, 1348 (9th Cir. 1992) (mere inaction does not amount to "ratification"); Cepero v. Gillespie, No. 211CV01421JADNJK, 2020 WL 6173503, at *10 (D. Nev. Oct. 21, 2020) ("Finally, Cepero cannot make out a Monell claim based on a ratification theory. He asserts that 'there has been ratification' because the supervisors failed 'to investigate allegations of use of force.'. . But the relevant question for ratification under Monell is not whether a supervisor investigated the injury-producing conduct but whether a policymaker approves the unconstitutional decision. . . Cepero does not present evidence that LVMPD knew and approved the use of excessive force, so he cannot state a Monell claim based on ratification. LVMPD is therefore entitled to summary judgment in its favor on Cepero's Monell claim."); Tubar v. Clift, No. C05-1154-JCC, 2008 WL 5142932, at *7 (W.D. Wash. Dec. 5, 2008) ("Viewed in Plaintiff's favor, the evidence sufficiently establishes that Chief Crawford ratified the alleged unconstitutional conduct when, after reviewing the internal investigation and just like on prior occasions, he expressly approved of and officially endorsed Officer Clift's actions. Because Chief Crawford had final policymaking authority and ratified Officer Clift's use of deadly force, Plaintiff has sufficiently established ratification to avoid summary judgment on municipal liability for his constitutional claims.").

But see Kujawski v. Bd. Of Commissioners of Bartholomew County, 183 F.3d 734, 739, 740 n.4 (7th Cir. 1999) ("[T]he County relies on the well established principle that the mere unreviewed discretion to make hiring and firing decisions does not amount to policymaking authority. There must be a delegation of authority to set policy for hiring and firing, not a delegation of only the final authority to hire and fire. . . We confirm the validity of this principle. Nevertheless, reviewing this record in the context of a summary judgment motion, we believe that there remains a genuine issue of fact as to whether the Board had, as a matter of custom, delegated final policymaking authority to Parker with respect to community corrections employees. . . . The Supreme Court has made it clear that, in examining delegation issues, we must take into account both state positive law and state custom that has the force of law. . . A municipal body ought not be able to avoid its constitutional responsibilities by delegating, in violation of state law, its responsibilities."); Chew v. Gates, 27 F.3d 1432, 1445 (9th Cir. 1994) ("A city cannot escape liability for the consequences of established and ongoing departmental policy regarding the use of force simply by permitting such basic policy decisions to be made by lower level officials who are not ordinarily considered policymakers. Los Angeles could not, for example, distance itself from policy regarding the use of firearms by de facto delegating the formulation of firearms policy to the commander of the police academy. So too here: if the city in fact permitted departmental policy regarding the use of canine force to be designed and implemented at lower levels of the department, a jury could, and should, nevertheless find that the policy constituted an established municipal 'custom or usage' regarding the use of police dogs for which the city is responsible."); Myers v. City of Cincinnati, 14 F.3d 1115, 1118 (6th Cir. 1994) ("A municipality may not escape Monell liability . . . by simply delegating decisionmaking authority to a subordinate official and thereafter studiously refusing to review his unconstitutional action on the merits. That the Commission reached a final conclusion distinguishes this case from Praprotnik, in which the local Civil Service Commission stayed any action on the plaintiff's complaint pending the outcome of federal litigation on the matter."); Bowler v. Town of Hudson, 514 F.Supp.2d 168, 184 (D. Mass. 2007) ("Plaintiffs contend that their § 1983 claims trigger Monell liability because the Hudson School Committee adopted policy 1701 (club posters may not include URL's) in July of 2005 in response to the poster controversy. Plaintiffs contend that these policy adoptions constitute ratification of the school's censorship and that municipal liability should therefore attach. . . . Here, the adoption of policies forbidding any web addresses from being listed on posters is, without more, insufficient evidence that the School Committee was ratifying the unconstitutional decision of the principal to censor the posters in violation of the students' First Amendment rights. However, there is also evidence that Superintendent Berman had knowledge of the unconstitutional censorship and ratified it on arguably unconstitutional grounds. Accordingly, summary judgment with respect to the municipality must be DENIED."); Albright v. City of New Orleans, Nos. Civ.A. 96-0679, 97-2523, 2001 WL 725354, at *10 (E.D.La. June 26, 2001) (not reported) ("While the Court's research revealed no case that discussed Monell liability in a context like that of this case, the Court is of the opinion that Superintendent Pennington's decision to rely fully and unquestioningly upon the recommendations of others cannot serve to shelter the City from the liability it would otherwise surely face. Notwithstanding that the deputy chiefs' actions cannot be imputed to Superintendent Pennington for purposes of personal liability, for purposes of Monell liability, the Court finds that the acts of the deputy chiefs may be fairly considered as those of Superintendent Pennington rendering the City liable under section 1983.").

Some courts have held that if plaintiff is relying on Praprotnik's "ratification" theory for attributing liability to the municipality, such ratification must precede the subordinate's unconstitutional conduct. See, e.g., Burgess v. Fischer, 735 F.3d 462, 479 (6th Cir. 2013) ("In the instant case, Fischer did not order the takedown, nor do Plaintiffs assert that a course of action selected by Fischer was the moving force behind Burgess' injury. Fischer's after-the-fact approval of the investigation, which did not itself cause or continue a harm against Burgess, was insufficient to establish the Monell claim. . . Such an outcome would effectively make the Board liable on the basis of respondeat superior, which is specifically prohibited by Monell. . . In sum, even assuming there was an underlying constitutional violation, we affirm the dismissal of the Monell claim because Plaintiffs have failed to set forth sufficient facts to establish an unconstitutional custom or policy."); Thomas v. Roberts, 261 F.3d 1160, 1174, 1175 (11th Cir. 2001) ("Because the District had no opportunity to ratify the decision to search the children before the searches occurred, the students' reliance on Praprotnik to support their claim that the District ratified the unconstitutional conduct is misplaced."), opinion reinstated and supplemented by Thomas v. Roberts, 323 F.3d 950 (11th Cir. 2003); Bjelland v. City and County of Denver, No. 1:22-CV-01338-SKC-SBP, 2024 WL 4165428, at *8 (D. Colo. Sept. 12, 2024) ("[T]he 'Tenth Circuit has instructed that '[f]ailing to adequately...punish does not count as ratification.' Cousik v. City & Cnty. of Denver, No. 22-CV-01213-NYW-KAS, 2024 WL 896755, at *15 (D. Colo. Mar. 1, 2024) (citing Lynch v. Bd. of Cnty. Comm'rs of Muskogee Cnty., 786 F. App'x 774, 787 (10th Cir. 2019). Rather, 'the final decisionmakers' approval must precede the violative action.' Huff v. City of Aurora, No. 21-cv-02715-RMR-NRN, 2022 WL 4131438, at *12 (D. Colo. Sept. 12, 2022) (emphasis added). Here, from the Court's review of the record, the undisputed evidence shows that all of Plaintiffs' evidence (and argument) regarding ratification and a failure to discipline occurred after the relevant events. Plaintiffs have not cited any evidence of failures to discipline that preceded the protests. Consequently, they may not proceed on this theory of ratification and summary judgment is warranted insofar as this theory is concerned."); Ratlieff v. City of Fort Lauderdale, 748 F.Supp.3d 1202, ____ (S.D. Fla. 2024) ("As already noted, all agree that Defendant Maglione was an official FLPD policymaker on May 31, 2020. Accordingly, for Ratlieff's ratification theory to survive summary judgment, she must show that, after viewing the record in the light most favorable to her, Maglione approved the subordinate(s) decision(s) that led to Ratlieff's alleged First Amendment violations, as well as the basis for the decision(s). . . Ratlieff has failed to create a genuine dispute of material fact as to her ratification theory for two reasons. First, the Court's review of the factual record confirms that Maglione was informed of the decision to deploy less-lethals at around 6:54 p.m.—after they had already been deployed—and further, that his decision was based on the representation that less-lethals were needed to support officer rescue. . .While Ratlieff maintains the officer rescue was a pretextual reason for FLPD's deployment of less-lethals, she has adduced no evidence to contest this justification as relayed to Chief Maglione to secure his approval after less-lethal deployment had already occurred. . . And because all agree that Maglione was not present at the Intersection at any point from the time less-lethals were first deployed until the time Ratlieff was gassed and struck, there is no way he could ratify this decision based upon any basis other than what his subordinates relayed to him. If subordinates intentionally lie or unintentionally mischaracterize the situation on the ground to gain final policymaker approval for an unconstitutional action, a final policymaker cannot be said to have actually ratified the violation for purposes of establishing Monell liability. Second, Ratlieff has not presented any evidence that Chief Maglione continued approving the deployment of less-lethals from 7:01 p.m. to 7:07 p.m., a period during which all agree that Officer Hayes was no longer in need of rescue. And since this is also the period during which all agree Ratlieff's alleged First Amendment violations occurred, she has failed to demonstrate a genuine dispute of material fact that Maglione ratified the specific subordinate actions that led to her claimed First Amendment violations."); Hysell v. Thorp, 2009 WL 262426, at *23 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 2, 2009) ("[I]t cannot be said that the failure to conduct a meaningful investigation into Plaintiff's complaint was the cause of his constitutional injury. Once an individual's rights have been violated, a subsequent failure to conduct a meaningful investigation cannot logically be the 'moving force' behind the alleged constitutional deprivation. . . For these reasons, the Court finds in favor of Sheriff Thorp on Plaintiff's claim concerning the alleged failure to investigate his complaint."); Mitchell v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:03CV2179, 2005 WL 2233226, at *5 (N.D. Ohio Sept. 12, 2005) ("In the instant case, Plaintiff was interviewed by an OPS individual within two weeks of filing the Complaint form. During the interview, the Plaintiff described the treatment she received from the officers while she was incarcerated, and the officers that were involved. It is undisputed that the OPS then conducted an investigation in which only some of the officers described by the Plaintiff were sent forms to fill out describing the events. Surprisingly, Sergeant Kennedy, the officer in charge of the First District jail where Plaintiff was incarcerated, was not sent a form to fill out, and furthermore, was not even questioned regarding Plaintiff's allegations. Once the investigation was finished, no further action was taken against the officers. The Plaintiff argues that the OPS decision and its inadequate investigation were final actions by a policymaker. Plaintiff is wrong on this point. The City Charter of Cleveland, reveals that the OPS is 'under the general direction' of the Chief of Police who is, in turn, under the direction of the Director of Public Safety. . . . . It is the Director of Public Safety to whom final policymaking authority has been delegated with respect to police matters, including the investigation of allegations of misconduct. . . Given this fact, the Plaintiff must establish that the Director of Public Safety ratified the OPS's actions before she can establish that the City is liable for those actions. . . .To survive summary judgment on this issue, therefore, Plaintiff must offer proof that the official charged with making final policymaking authority regarding police behavior (i.e., the Director of Public Safety) expressly approved the OPS decision. Plaintiff has failed to do so. . . . Even if Plaintiff could prove that the OPS had final policymaking authority in the area of investigations, or that the Director of Public Safety ratified the OPS's actions in this case, moreover, she would still have to prove that the OPS decision was a 'moving force' behind her constitutional violation. . . Here, the violation she alleges arises from her improper treatment while incarcerated. OPS's investigation occurred after-the-fact. Plaintiff has neither alleged nor offered evidence establishing that past OPS investigations or no-fault decisions somehow inspired the officers in this case to act inappropriately, or without fear of reprisal. Indeed, Plaintiff has offered no evidence that the OPS ever investigated complaints regarding jail personnel in the past. Absent this causal link, no claim of municipal liability could lie."); Gainor v. Douglas County, 59 F. Supp.2d 1259, 1293 (N.D. Ga. 1999) ("A post hoc approval of an action already taken could not possibly be the motivating force for causing the action to be taken. . . Thus, in order to impose liability under a ratification based theory, it is necessary to show prior ratification of the policy giving rise to the action alleged to have violated the plaintiff's federal rights, such that the ratification of that policy could be said to be the moving force behind the alleged constitutional violation."); Looney v. City of Wilmington, Del., 723 F. Supp. 1025 (D. Del. 1989) (Supreme Court's emphasis on element of causation in municipal liability cases, leads to conclusion that ratification must occur prior to employee acts).

While Justice Brennan agreed that the supervisors involved possessed no policymaking authority that could be attributed to the City, he disagreed with the plurality on certain key principles of attribution. For Justice Brennan, state law should serve as the "appropriate starting point" in the determination of who is a policymaking official, "but ultimately the factfinder must determine where such policymaking authority actually resides . . . . " 485 U.S. at 143 (Brennan, J., concurring).

Justice Brennan was concerned about the cases that would fall through the "gaping hole" created by the plurality's attribution rules. There would be no government liability in the case of an isolated unconstitutional act by an official who was delegated de facto final policymaking authority, but who was not identified under formal state law as a policymaker. Id. at 144.

Justice Brennan also criticized the plurality for the adoption of a "mechanical 'finality' test," which would preclude the finding of "final" policymaking authority whenever an official's decisions "are subject to some form of review − however limited." 485 U.S. at 147.

See, e.g., Bannum, Inc. v. City of Fort Lauderdale, 901 F.2d 989, 998-999 (11th Cir. 1990) (decision to abrogate previously issued occupational license and to prohibit continued use of property for community treatment center became official city decision when Board of Adjustment, highest city policymaking body as to zoning matters, affirmed decision of Code Enforcement Board); Carr v. Town of Dewey Beach, 730 F. Supp. 591, 608 (D. Del. 1990) (while Building Inspector and Mayor could issue stop work orders, their actions could not be considered final where, according to Town Charter, Board of Adjustment could hear appeals from any orders).

Justice Brennan would allow a jury to decide whether, despite the availability of some form of review, an official's decision "is in effect the final municipal pronouncement on the subject." 485 U.S. at 145.

See also Campion, Barrow & Associates, Inc. v. City of Springfield, Ill., 559 F.3d 765, 769, 770 (7th Cir. 2009) ("We do not exclude the possibility that the kind of power-sharing arrangement that Campion postulates might exist in some circumstances, either de jure or de facto. But Campion has not brought forward any evidence that would permit a finding that this was the way Springfield was handling its psychological testing contract. First, the law is against him. Under Illinois law, only the City Council could authorize the agreement to change the contract from one provider to another. . . Any contract over the amount of $15,000 must be approved by the City Council. . . Notably, Mayor Davlin did not act unilaterally when he set about changing the contract from Campion to Detrick. Instead, he sought the City Council's consent, implying that he did not have the ability to act by himself. Campion responds that the Detrick contract was not complete until Davlin signed it, but even that is not quite accurate. Under the municipal code, if the mayor refuses to sign an ordinance (effectively vetoing it), the ordinance can be passed again by two-thirds of all aldermen holding office. After that vote (which was exceeded here, incidentally), the new rule or, as here, testing arrangement, takes effect. Campion introduced no evidence tending to show that this was not the real process followed by the Council, either in this particular case or as a rule. He thus cannot prevail on the theory that there was an established municipal custom giving the mayor the de facto power to handle matters like this unilaterally or to impose his wishes on the Council and use it as a rubber stamp."); Abbott v. Village of Winthrop Harbor, 205 F.3d 976, 982 (7th Cir. 2000) ("[T]he District Court determined that Miller had final policymaking authority to connect the 3868 line into the 911 system. Relying on a local ordinance which gives the police chief the authority to 'make or describe such rules and regulations for the internal operation of the police department as he sees fit and proper,' the Judge found that the decision to connect the 3868 line to the 911 recording system affected the internal operation of the police department, and was not something that the chief needed to have approved by other Village authorities. The Court cited as support the fact that on neither occasion, either when connecting or disconnecting the 3868 line to the 911 recorder, did Miller seek the Board's approval. The Judge also was persuaded by Miller's testimony that, pursuant to his authority to run the police department, he made decisions on all matters except personnel and the budget. These facts, however, have little to do with where the law places the authority for the decision. . . . Here, the Illinois legislature has placed the final policymaking authority with the ETSB [Emergency Telephone System Board], not with the police chief. . . . [W]e find that the final policymaking authority to authorize the connection of a telephone line to the 911 system rested with the ETSB and not the police chief. Although the police chief may have sweeping powers to conduct his department as he sees fit, those powers are limited, in this case by the Illinois Commerce Commission's and the ETSB's authority to regulate the content of Winthrop Harbor's 911 emergency system."); Ashby v. Isle of Wight County School Board, 354 F.Supp.2d 616, 628, 629 (E.D. Va. 2004) ("Defendant argues that Plaintiff did not follow the proper procedure for raising a complaint to the school board level, in that Plaintiff never asked for Owen's decision to be overturned, did not file a formal appeal, and did not request three days in advance to be placed on the agenda. . .Even if Plaintiff did satisfy the procedural requirements for appealing Owen's decision, Plaintiff did not seek resolution by official action of the Board. The Board acts through votes. The opinions of the individual members of the Board, even as given at a meeting of the Board, do not constitute the opinion of the Board, itself. For the Court to find that there was Board ratification of Principal Owen's actions, there must have been some cognizable action taken by the official body that is the school board. Plaintiff has not provided any evidence that the Board took any action on this matter. The Board did not participate with Owen in reviewing the lyrics to Plaintiff's song or any other student presentation for the graduation. Plaintiff's airing of grievances before the board members is not enough to satisfy the requirements of ratification. While it might be clear how the Board would have voted had it done so, the fact that the Board did not act is the determining factor in this analysis. Any concern that the Board might avoid liability by refusing to vote in such instances is adequately addressed by the 'custom and usage' portion of the Praprotnik analysis. The Board's repeated tacit approval of such actions would rise to the level of policy through custom and usage. As noted above, Plaintiff has not shown any facts that would support a finding of a custom or usage in the school district. Defendant did not ratify the decision and basis of Principal Owen's decision, therefore no policy has been made for the school district. To hold Defendant liable under § 1983 in this case would be to do so on a theory of respondeat superior, which is clearly not permissible at law").

3. In Jett v. Dallas Independent School District, 491 U.S. 701 (1989), a former athletic director/head football coach at a public high school sued the principal and school district under sections 1981 and 1983, claiming loss of his position due to his race and his exercise of First Amendment rights.

The Fifth Circuit upheld the finding of liability as to the principal, concluding there was sufficient evidence from which the jury could find that he had discriminated against the plaintiff on account of race and in violation of plaintiff's First Amendment rights. 798 F.2d 748, 756-58 (5th Cir. 1986).

As to the school district, however, the court determined there was insufficient evidence of any wrongful motivation on the part of the superintendent whose conduct was being attributed to the school district. Thus, even if the superintendent "had the requisite policymaking authority," there was no wrongful conduct to be attributed to the school district. Id. at 760.

In addition, the jury instruction as to municipal liability was found deficient "because it did not state that the city could be bound by the principal or superintendent only if he was delegated policymaking authority (or if he participated in a well settled custom that fairly represented official policy and actual or constructive knowledge of the custom was attributable to the governing body or an official delegated policymaking authority)." Id. at 759.

In affirming the Fifth Circuit's determination that the jury instruction was manifest error, the Supreme Court referred to the principles to be applied in deciding whether either the principal or superintendent could be considered a "policymaker" whose acts or edicts might be attributed to the school district.

The Court reaffirmed the view that the identification of final policymaking authority is a question of state law. The majority rejected any role for the jury in this identification process, stressing that this is "a legal question to be resolved by the trial judge before the case is submitted to the jury." Id. at 737. The Court also noted that the "relevant legal materials" to be reviewed by the trial judge in identifying official policymakers included "'custom or usage' having the force of law." Id.

See, e.g., Atkinson v. City of Mountain View, Mo., 709 F.3d 1201, 1214, 1215, 1216 (8th Cir. 2013) ("Whether Sanders exercised final policymaking authority for the city is 'a question of state law.'. . We recognize that some language in one of our previous cases may have suggested a role for juries in identifying municipal policymakers. See Copeland, 613 F.3d at 882 ("The district court rejected [the] claims for municipal liability because no reasonable juror could find that (1) [the police chief] was the 'final policy-maker' [or] (2) the city delegated final authority to [the police chief].... We agree." (emphasis added)). To the extent this language implied the identity of a municipality's final policymaker was a question of fact for the jury, it was inconsistent with our earlier cases, see, e.g., Ware v. Jackson Cnty., Mo., 150 F.3d 873, 885 (8th Cir.1998); Angarita v. St. Louis Cnty., 981 F.2d 1537, 1547 (8th Cir.1992), and the Supreme Court's decision in Jett, 491

U.S. at 737, id. at 738 (Scalia, J., concurring). . . .It is 'the trial judge'—not the jury—who 'must identify those officials ... who speak with final policymaking authority for the local government.'. . Only after the judge identifies an official as a final policymaker is it appropriate 'for the jury to determine whether [that official's] "decisions have caused the deprivation of rights at issue by policies which affirmatively command that it occur."'. . The interpretation of Jett we adopted in Angarita is consistent with the interpretations adopted by every other circuit . . . and the Supreme Court in its later decisions, see, e.g., McMillian v. Monroe Cnty., Ala., 520 U.S. 781, 784–85 (1997). In accordance with Jett and Angarita, we consult two key sources to determine whether the district court correctly held that Sanders was not a final policymaker: (1) 'state and local positive law' and (2) state and local '"custom or usage" having the force of law.'. . First, as a matter of Missouri positive law, Sanders was not a 'final policymaker' for the city. See Copeland, 613 F.3d at 882 ('Under Missouri state law, the mayor and the board of aldermen of a [Fourth Class City] are the final policymakers for the "good government of the city [and] the preservation of peace and good order."'. . . .Second, Atkinson's argument that the city had a custom of delegating final policymaking power to Sanders is unsupported by any evidence in the record. On the contrary, the record evidence indicates the city's mayor and board of aldermen retained final policymaking power over Sanders, the police department, and the department's official policies. Because the identity of the city's final law enforcement policymaker is a legal question, Atkinson's argument that 'the evidence is sufficient to support a jury finding that ... Sanders was the policymaker for the City' entirely misses the mark. Having 'review[ed] the relevant legal materials,' Jett, 491 U.S. at 737, we agree with the district court that Atkinson cannot establish Sanders was—as a matter of Missouri law—a final policymaker for the city."); Gros v. City of Grand Prarie (Gros III), 181 F.3d 613, 616, 617 (5th Cir. 1999) ("To the extent that the district court relied upon a presumption concerning the locus of final policymaking authority in the City of Grand Prairie instead of looking to state law as the sole determinant, we find that it erred. . . . It was. . . incumbent upon the district court to consider state and local positive law as well as evidence of the City's customs and usages in determining which City officials or bodies had final policymaking authority over the policies at issue in this case. We also disagree with the district court's assertion that even if Chief Crum did not possess final policymaking authority as a matter of state law, Gros and Sikes could nonetheless survive summary judgment if there was an issue of material fact whether Crum had been delegated final policymaking authority. In Jett, . . . the Supreme Court established that whether an official has been delegated final policymaking authority is a question of law for the judge, not of fact for the jury."); Robinson v. City of Sikeston, Missouri, No. 1:19CV41 RLW, 2020 WL 588606, at *10 (E.D. Mo. Feb. 6, 2020) ("The Court finds that the issue of whether Juden should be considered a final policymaker for the City is not properly before the Court in a motion to dismiss. It is clear that the question is one of law for courts to decide. . . . Here, the record has not been developed to know whether the city counsel delegated final policymaking to Juden. The Court also notes that Copeland and Atkinson concerned fourth class cities and not third class cities like Sikeston. This difference may not ultimately be significant for the final resolution of this case as the statutory structures seem similar; however, the Court does not decide the issue now. At this stage of the litigation, the Court finds Robinson has alleged sufficient facts to plausibly state claims against the City under applicable § 1983 precedent.

Accordingly, the City's motion to dismiss is denied as to the federal claims."); Logan v. Sycamore Community School Bd. of Educ., No. 1:09–CV–00885, 2012 WL 2011037, at *6, *7 (S.D. Ohio June 5, 2012) ("Plaintiffs have submitted sufficient facts for this Court to deny summary judgment on the Section 1983 claim. Specifically, Plaintiffs assert deprivation of Logan's constitutional right to equal protection by treating her complaints of harassment differently from the complaints of others (doc. 98). In addition, Plaintiffs allege Principal Davis is the final policymaker for implementing the sexual harassment policy at SHS and his actions in implementing the policy bind the Board (doc. 98). The Court has determined that there are material facts in dispute regarding whether a final policymaker executed a policy that resulted in the deprivation of Logan's rights, including questions of which school officials were aware of the harassment, which preclude granting Defendant's motion for summary judgment on this claim."); Hailey v. City of Camden, Civil No. 01-3967 (JBS/JS), 2009 WL 1228492, at *15-*17 (D.N.J. April 29, 2009) ("It is the role of the trial judge to determine, guided by final policymaker jurisprudence and consistent with state law, who was the final policymaker and whether his actions in this case could be ascribed to the City. . . That determination was not made, the error was not harmless, and it requires a new trial. . . .As with Plaintiffs' failure to promote claims, in the event Plaintiff again seeks to pursue municipal liability of Defendant City of Camden under 42 U.S.C. § 1981 and 1983, the determination of the identity and nature of the policymaker responsible for a hostile work environment within the Fire Department can only be made through a new trial, when this Court will be able to weigh the evidence, make credibility determinations, and ultimately decide the issue with the assistance of all counsel (who are by now well-acquainted with the legal principles governing this issue)."); Miller v. Kennard, 74 F. Supp.2d 1050, 1063, 1065 (D. Utah 1999) ("During discovery, Salt Lake County admitted that 'Sheriff Kennard is Salt Lake County's final policy maker regarding employment decisions in the [Sheriff's Office],' and that 'the Sheriff is a policy maker regarding transfers....' . . . . While the admission provides factual evidence supporting Miller's argument that Kennard is a policy maker, the ultimate determination of Kennard's status is a question of law to be determined by the court. . . . Since neither Utah law nor the Merit Commission policies submitted by Salt Lake County, on their face, demonstrate that Kennard is restricted in his ability to transfer or investigate officers or that these decisions are subject to meaningful review, the court cannot determine, as a matter of law, whether or not Kennard is a policy maker in these areas. The court will determine the question of Kennard's policy maker status at trial after a full presentation of the relevant evidence."); Mirelez v. Bay City Independent School Dist., 992 F. Supp. 916, 919 (S.D. Tex. 1998) ("Under Texas law, final policy-making authority of an independent school district generally rests with the district's Board of Trustees. . . Understanding the general rule, the Court notes that this case presents a unique situation in which the summary judgment evidence overwhelmingly reveals that the District's Board of Trustees expressly delegated final policy-making authority to the District superintendent.").

But see Pindak v. Dart, 125 F.Supp.3d 720, 758 (N.D. Ill. 2015) ("Finally, Plaintiffs may proceed under a final policymaker approach. That approach imposes Monell liability where 'the constitutional injury was caused by a person with final policymaking authority.'. . Plaintiffs contend that Tee Coleman, the Security Manager for Securitas, caused Plaintiffs to be removed from the Plaza by communicating to his employees that panhandlers were unwanted. To establish that Coleman is a final policymaker, Plaintiffs must do more than show that he 'has decisionmaking authority, even unreviewed authority' over a particular decision. . . Ball v. City of Indianapolis, 760 F.3d 636, 643 (7th Cir.2014). Rather, '[a] municipality must have delegated authority to the individual to make policy on its behalf.'. . When considering a municipal or state entity, '[t]he determination of whether a person has policymaking authority is a question of state law, and is to be decided by the court,' usually by reference to 'laws, statutes, or ordinances,' which delegate authority to a particular employee. . .As the Seventh Circuit has noted, this standard can be difficult to apply in the context of private contractors . . . . Tee Coleman may be the apex of authority within Securitas, but Securitas responds that Coleman reports to MBRE's Security Director. Accordingly, Securitas maintains it is MBRE that has final authority over the security policies for the building. . . This conflicting evidence creates a dispute of fact regarding whether Tee Coleman has final policymaking authority. Plaintiffs will be free to present evidence supporting an inference that he had final policymaking authority to the jury."); Hernandez v. Cook Cnty. Sheriff's Office, 07 C 855, 2014 WL 3805734, *6 (N.D. Ill. July 31, 2014) ("Whether a particular official is a policymaker can be a question of fact for a jury. . . Here, there is at least a question of fact as to whether the investigation into, and discipline of, Plaintiffs' conduct was caused by 'an official with final policymaking authority.' Michno, Davis, and Bailey have testified that Kaufmann stated that the investigation and discipline was politically motivated. Kaufmann was the Director of Internal Affairs for the DOC and he signed the forms de-deputizing Plaintiffs, firing Davis and Bailey, and suspending Hernandez. Furthermore, Defendants admit that 'Sheriff Sheahan testified that Chief Kaufmann was not required to report to him in any investigation.'. . Based on this evidence, a reasonable juror could conclude that Kaufmann was a policymaker for purposes of the investigation into the jail break because he had the power to both initiate the investigation into Plaintiffs' conduct and to discipline them for it. Thus, summary judgment in Defendants' favor on the issue of the Sheriff's Office's liability for any violation of Plaintiffs' civil rights is not warranted.").

Compare Ricketts v. City of Columbia, 856 F. Supp. 1337, 1344 (W.D. Mo. 1993) ("At trial, plaintiffs produced no evidence which identified the final policymaker for the defendant on these matters . . . . Plaintiffs merely assumed the final policymaker (whoever it was) had actual or constructive knowledge of the de facto policy to treat domestic disputes less seriously. In this regard, the jury instruction identifying the chief of police as the final policymaker was in error. The court implicitly took judicial notice that the chief of police was the city's final policymaker. The court had no authority to do so." footnotes omitted), aff'd on other grounds, 36 F.3d 775 (8th Cir. 1994) with Nichols v. City of Jackson, 848 F. Supp. 718, 726 (S.D. Miss. 1994) ("[A]lthough plaintiff has failed to identify the state law which grants the fire chief policymaking authority, the court has determined that it exists.").

See also Wardell v. City of Chicago, No. 98 C 8002, 2001 WL 1345960, at *4 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 31, 2001) (not reported) ("[P]laintiffs ignore the uncontradicted case law of the Seventh Circuit that has consistently held that police superintendents are never policymakers for the purpose of assigning municipal liability. [citing Latuszkin and Auriemma] Instead, only the City Council and Chicago Police Board are imbued with authority to make policy for the City of Chicago Police department."); Comfort v. Town of Pittsfield, 924 F. Supp. 1219, 1234-35 (D. Me. 1996) ("While Comfort's pleadings lack both specificity and focus, he nonetheless provides sufficient evidence to cast Chief Lawrence as a policymaker for the purposes of summary judgment. Comfort raises factual issues as to whether Chief Lawrence 'had complete authority and control over the hiring, training and supervision of police officers at the Pittsfield Police Department.' . . . . If Chief Lawrence's decisions were not reviewable by other Pittsfield Officials, a jury could infer that his decisions were attributable to the town itself. The law saddles Pittsfield with the burden of demonstrating the absence of any genuine issues of material fact at summary judgment. The Town has failed in this responsibility. Plaintiff's evidence . . . raises factual disputes as to the constitutionality of Chief Lawrence's policies, and questions remain as to his status as a policymaker.").

Jett also noted that once the court has identified the policymakers in the given area, "it is for the jury to determine whether their decisions have caused the deprivation of rights at issue by policies which affirmatively command that it occur . . . or by acquiescence in a longstanding practice or custom which constitutes the 'standard operating procedure' of the local governmental entity." 491 U.S. at 737 (emphasis original). See, e.g., Dean v. Cty. of Gage, Neb., 807 F.3d 931, 942-43 (8th Cir. 2015) ("The county 'may only be held liable for constitutional violations which result from a policy or custom of the municipality.'. . It is for the jury to determine whether Sheriff DeWitt's decisions 'caused the deprivation of rights at issue by policies which affirmatively command that it occur.'. . The district court erroneously dismissed the claim against the county believing that 'the plaintiffs failed to present evidence of an official policy, unofficial custom, or a deliberately indifferent failure to train or supervise that could create liability.' To the contrary, the plaintiffs introduced evidence that Sheriff DeWitt made decisions about the investigations in this case. . . . It is for the jury to decide if these decisions (and others) by Sheriff DeWitt constituted Gage County policy that caused the deprivation of rights here.")

NOTE: On remand, the Court of Appeals held "that Superintendent Wright may have been delegated the final decision in the cases of protested individual employee transfers does not mean that he had or had been delegated the status of policymaker, much less final policymaker, respecting employee transfers." Jett v. Dallas Independent School District, 7 F.3d 1241, 1246 (5th Cir. 1993).

In Morro v. City of Birmingham, 117 F.3d 508, 515, 516 & n.3 (11th Cir. 1997), the court made the following observations:

> Based on the City's governing regulations and evidence of its actual practices, it seems that local law makes the Jefferson County Personnel Board, and not the police chief, the final policymaker with respect to police dismissals, demotions, or suspensions. If the City had preserved that issue for trial in the district court, and > thus for our review on appeal, we have little doubt that the City would be entitled to escape the judgment against it on that basis. However, as the district court noted in its memorandum opinion, the City failed to identify its potentially available Monell defense as an issue at the pretrial conference or to obtain a modification of the pretrial order to permit it to raise the issue later in the proceedings.

>
> [W]e cannot say that the district court abused its discretion by failing to modify the pretrial order to accommodate presentation of the Monell defense at the late stage of the case at which the City chose to press it. That is particularly so in view of the fact that the City successfully convinced the district court to exclude Morro's pattern and practice witnesses on grounds of relevancy and then stood silent in the face of the district court's observation that the City had conceded at the pretrial conference that the Chief was a final policymaker.
>
> We note that the City's failure to preserve its Monell defense for trial is not excused by the fact that. . . the issue of final policymaker status is a legal question for the court, not the jury. Counsel may waive the right to have an issue decided by failing to identify the issue to the court at the pretrial conference, regardless of whether the issue is a legal or factual one.

4. Illustrative Lower Federal Court Cases

The perception that the Supreme Court failed to provide clear guidelines on attribution is illustrated vividly by two Eighth Circuit opinions following Praprotnik. In Praprotnik, on remand, 879 F.2d 1573 (8th Cir. 1989), the panel could not agree on who had final policymaking authority. While the majority concluded that under the City's charter, "[o]nly the Civil Service Commission had final policymaking authority for that area of the city's business," id. at 1576, Chief Judge Lay would have held that Praprotnik's layoff "resulted from the actions of an improperly motivated final policymaker-the mayor." Id. at 1581.

See also Browning-Ferris Industries v. City of Maryland Heights, 747 F. Supp. 1340, 1345 (E.D. Mo. 1990) ("Attempts to define the extent of liability in cases before the Supreme Court have met with only mixed results . . . on the crucial question of exactly when municipal liability attaches under § 1983.").

In Williams v. Butler, 863 F.2d 1398 (8th Cir. 1988) (en banc), cert. denied, 492 U.S. 906 (1989), the Eighth Circuit affirmed, for the third time, a decision of the federal district court holding the City of Little Rock liable for the unconstitutional discharge of a municipal court clerk by a municipal judge. The judgment of the en banc court had been twice vacated and remanded by the Supreme Court, once in light of Pembaur and once in light of Praprotnik.

With five judges dissenting, the majority in Williams found that under state law, there had been an "absolute delegation of authority" to the municipal judge "[r]egarding employment matters in his court"; he was exercising final policymaking authoriposty when he hired and fired court clerks. Id. at 1402.

The dissent took the position that, while the municipal judge had final decision-making authority with respect to hiring and firing court clerks, he did not possess final policymaking authority in the "employment field." Id. at 1405 (Gibson, J., dissenting).

See also Hamilton v. City of Hayti, Missouri, 948 F.3d 921, 929 (8th Cir. 2020) ("Hamilton further appeals the dismissal of his § 1983 damage claim against the City of Hayti because Judge Ragland's 'unconstitutional bond practice is fairly attributable to the City of Hayti.' He argues that bond practices adopted by Judge Ragland, an elected city official, violated the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments because indigent defendants 'received jail sentences simply because of their lack of financial resources and inability to pay.' The district court dismissed this claim because Judge Ragland's decision to impose a cash-only bond as a condition of Hamilton's pretrial release was a judicial decision subject to review by a higher court, . . . not a policy decision of the City. In Monell, the Supreme Court held that a municipality may not be held liable under § 1983 for the constitutional violations of its employees on a theory of respondeat superior, but may be liable if 'the action that is alleged to be unconstitutional implements or executes a policy statement, ordinance, regulation, or decision officially adopted and promulgated by that [municipality's] officers.'. . Municipal liability 'may be imposed for a single decision by municipal policymakers' who possess 'final authority to establish municipal policy with respect to the action ordered.'. . Under Missouri law, municipal courts are divisions of circuit courts that are state entities. . . If a municipal court judge sets an 'excessive' condition for release, the person accused may file an application in the circuit court, which can 'make an order setting or modifying conditions for the release.'. . Judge Ragland's judicial order establishing a bond schedule was not a City of Hayti policy. . . And the setting of Hamilton's bond in his arrest warrant was a judicial act subject to review or reversal by higher state courts. Therefore, we agree with the district court that neither the adoption of the bond schedule nor the setting of Hamilton's bond was a final decision by a municipal policymaker establishing municipal policy with respect to the action ordered."); Granda v. City of St. Louis, 472 F.3d 565, 569 (8th Cir. 2007) ("Granda asserts that a city can also be held liable for the decision of a municipal judge, relying on Williams v. Butler, 863 F.2d 1398. That case involved the administrative decision of a municipal judge to terminate his law clerks, rather than a judicial decision that is subject to review or reversal by higher state courts. . . Granda's argument that the city is liable because the other municipal judges should have prevented her incarceration is unavailing. The municipal court is a division of the state circuit court, and review of a judge's decisions is to be sought in that court. Judge Sullivan's decision to release the minor was a judicial act in recognition of a lack of jurisdiction, and Judge Walsh reassigned Judge Turner after she succeeded her as administrative judge pursuant to the local rules of the 22nd judicial circuit court. Judge Turner's order was a judicial decision made in a case that came before her on a court docket, and Granda does not appeal the district court's holding that the judge was entitled to judicial immunity. Granda fails to cite a single case where a municipality has been held liable for such a decision. We conclude that the judicial order incarcerating Granda was not a final policy decision of a type creating municipal liability under § 1983.").

In Davis v. Mason County, 927 F.2d 1473 (9th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 112 S. Ct. 275 (1991), there was similar disagreement as to the question of whether a county sheriff was the final policymaker of the County as to the "matter" in issue. While the majority considered the "matter" to be one of training in law enforcement practices, as to which the sheriff would have final authority, id. at 1480-81, the dissent saw the "matter" as a more general one of personnel administration, over which the Civil Service Commission had final policymaking authority. Id. at 1491.

See also Gillette v. Delmore, 979 F.2d 1342, 1350 (9th Cir. 1992) (Fire Chief's discretionary authority to hire and fire employees did not make him final policymaker with respect to City's employment policy); Spina v. Forest Preserve of Cook County, No. 98 C 1393, 2001 WL 1491524, at *7 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 23, 2001) (not reported) ("In this case, however, the Chief's ability to hire and fire employees has little bearing on the issue of whether he was a policymaker with respect to the administration of the Department's sexual harassment policy. It is the administration of the sexual harassment policy − or lack thereofthat allegedly caused Officer Spina's injury, not the exercise of authority to hire or fire. Because the evidence demonstrates that the Chief of Police has the authority to investigate and discipline accused harassers, and otherwise set policy with regard to the Department's stance on sexual harassment, the Chief of Police is a policymaker for purposes of this case.").

Comment: The dispute between the majority and the dissent in Williams does not reflect disagreement as to the authority of the judge to make the employment decision made or the finality of the decision. Rather, the disagreement seems to turn on the question of when "a decision," even by a final policymaker, is tantamount to "a policy." That this is the real source of contention is apparent from the dissent's acknowledgement that "[e]ven if Butler had somehow been given authority to make employment policy for the City, the facts in this case do not support a conclusion that Butler's vengeful and self-motivated decision to fire Williams actually created employment policy for the City." 863 F.2d at 1409.

See also Wooten v. Logan, No. 02-5753, 2004 WL 68541, at *3 (6th Cir. Jan. 14, 2004) (unpublished) ("On appeal, Wooten renews her argument that, under Pembaur, the County is liable for Logan's conduct. Though opaque, Wooten's argument appears to proceed as follows: (1) as sheriff, Logan was the County's final policymaker with regard to the enforcement of the law: (2) Logan was able to detain and rape Wooten only 'because he was the sheriff of Pickett County' and had access to 'the instruments of his power-his patrol car, his blue lights, his uniform, his badge'; and, therefore, (3) the County is liable for Logan's actions. Fatally, Wooten has not demonstrated that Logan's conduct represented the 'official policy' of the County, as she has not shown that Logan was acting in a policymaking capacity when he detained and assaulted her. Logan conspired with a non-employee to commit a felonious act, and his conduct cannot conceivably be characterized as exercising a power to set policy. Moreover, though he allegedly used his 'blue lights and police lights' to pull over Dale's car, and utilized his 'uniform, badge, and gun' to effectuate the rape, Logan acted in the guise of a patrol officer making a traffic stop-not as chief law enforcement officer. . . . Given these alleged facts, Wooten can state a claim against the County only if every 'law enforcement' activity (e.g., stop, arrest, etc.) by a sheriff (or other chief law enforcement official)-whether a matter of official business or a misuse of power to advance a private agenda-represents the 'official policy' of the local government. Such a rule would contravene Pembaur's attempt 'to distinguish acts of the municipality from acts of employees of the municipality.' . . . and would institute the doctrine of respondeat superior. Accordingly. Logan's conduct cannot represent 'official policy,' and the County is not liable for Logan's conduct."); Lankford v. City of Hobart, 73 F.3d 283, 287 (10th Cir. 1996) (Relying on Starrett to conclude that the City could not be held liable for its police chief's "private, rather than public, acts of sexual harassment."); Mansfield Apartment Owners Association v. City of Mansfield, 988 F.2d 1469, 1475 (6th Cir. 1993) ("[T]he City is not liable for the conduct of its non-policymaking employees who act contrary to the policies of the City."); Manor Healthcare Corp. v. Lomelo, 929 F.2d 633, 638 (11th Cir. 1991) (Mayor was not executing municipal policy when he acted contrary to controlling law regarding bribery and extortion); Starrett v. Wadley, 876 F.2d 808, 819-20 (10th Cir. 1989) (where County official had power to establish final policy as to hiring and firing personnel in his department, such decisions would be attributable to the County; official's acts of sexual harassment, however, were "private rather than official acts" and the County would not be liable for them unless so widespread and pervasive so as to establish a "custom" in official's department); Carrero v. New York City Housing Authority, 890 F.2d 569, 576-77 (2d Cir. 1989) (although supervisor could be individually liable for sexual harassment, his actions could not be attributed to Housing Authority policy, particularly where entity's stated policies were expressly non-discriminatory.); Van Domelen v. Menominee County, 935 F. Supp. 918, 923-24 (W.D. Mich. 1996) ("Holding a county liable for any and all unconstitutional acts committed by a person with final policy-making authority would simply reinstate the doctrine of respondeat superior with respect to § 1983, a position which has been flatly rejected by the Supreme Court. . . . Defendant Gurosh's alleged actions were not taken within his role as a policy making official, but were rather isolated acts taken in a private capacity which cannot be attributed to the county."); Spratlin v. Montgomery County, Maryland, 772 F. Supp. 1545, 1553 (D. Md. 1990) ("Liability of the municipality itself does not automatically attach to every decision made by a municipal officer charged with policymaking authority."), aff'd, 941 F.2d 1207 (4th Cir. 1991) (Table).

But see Howard v. Town of Jonesville, 935 F. Supp. 855, 860 (W.D. La. 1996) (concluding that municipal liability might be found where "plaintiff has alleged that the Town of Jonesville's ultimate policymaker, the Mayor himself, engaged in acts of sexual harassment and discrimination.").

An important decision addressing the question of "what it means to be a municipal 'policymaker'" is Auriemma v. Rice, 957 F.2d 397 (7th Cir. 1992). Plaintiffs in Auriemma asserted liability against the City of Chicago based on racially discriminatory promotion and demotion decisions made by the Superintendent of Police in Chicago. Judge Easterbrook concluded

> [t]hat a particular agent is the apex of a bureaucracy makes the decision 'final' but does not forge a link between 'finality' and 'policy' . . . . Unless today's decision ought to govern tomorrow's case under a law or a custom with the force of law, it cannot be said to carry out the municipality's policy . . . . Liability for unauthorized acts is personal; to hold the municipality liable . . . the agent's action must implement rather than frustrate the government's policy.

977 F.2d at 400.

See also McClelland v. Katy Independent School District, 63 F.4th 996, 1011-12 (5th Cir. 2023) ("The district court correctly concluded that the KISD Board cannot be held liable vicariously for the individual Defendants-Appellees' actions. Monell instructs district courts to examine whether the policymaker either adopted an injury-causing policy or delegated the authority to adopt such a policy. . . The policy at issue here is the ACC [Athletic Code of Conduct], a copy of which was attached to McClelland's complaint. McClelland did not allege facts demonstrating that the KISD Board had ratified the ACC, and the ACC itself does not indicate that it was ratified by the Board. In fact, the ACC appears to distinguish itself from 'the board-approved Discipline Management Plan and Student Code of Conduct.' McClelland has also failed to show that KISD's signature on its October 4, 2019 announcement constituted ratification or delegation. That announcement simply stated that a student would face consequences pursuant to the ACC and the Katy ISD Discipline Management Student Code of Conduct. McClelland did not allege any other facts that show the KISD Board had delegated policymaking authority to the individual Defendants-Appellees in connection with the disciplinary action. Therefore, McClelland has not shown that the KISD Board promulgated a policy that caused injury, so the KISD Board cannot be held liable for violations of McClelland's free speech under Monell."); Orduno v. Pietrzak, 932 F.3d 710, 717-18 (8th Cir. 2019) ("Orduno suggests that Pietrzak, as police chief, was a policymaker for the City, and that his own actions were thus tantamount to unlawful conduct by the City. . . Assuming without deciding that a plaintiff under the DPPA may pursue a claim for municipal liability based on the Monell standards that govern municipal liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, Pietrzak's clandestine use of the database still cannot 'fairly be said to represent official policy.'. . Pietrzak admitted that the six obtainments within the limitations period 'were not for any use in carrying out any law enforcement, governmental, judicial or litigation-related function.' He accessed the database for personal reasons, not under the auspices of official policymaking authority, so his actions did not represent a policy of the City. . . The district court thus properly refused to entertain direct liability against the City."); San Geronimo Caribe Project, Inc. v. Acevedo-Vila, 687 F.3d 465, 493 (1st Cir. 2012) (en banc) ("SGCP also makes no argument that the Parratt–Hudson doctrine should apply differently simply because the Governor is a high-ranking official. If that is the intended argument, we reject it. Nothing in Parratt, Hudson, Zinermon, or this circuit's case law states that there is an exception for high-ranking state officials to the usual method of determining whether an action is random or unauthorized. In this, we join the views of two other circuits on the matter. [citing cases] To the extent the Second Circuit has adopted such a distinction, we decline to follow it. . . Nor is it clear that the Second Circuit would apply its doctrine here because the Governor, both as a matter of fact and of law, was not the ultimate decision-maker nor did he have the final authority to suspend permits. Simply because an official is high-ranking does not mean that the official's actions are automatically placed outside the scope of Parratt–Hudson, so long as those officials are bound by statutory limits on their authority under state law. As a result, the Parratt–Hudson doctrine applies to bar SGCP's claim against the Governor, and the procedural due process claim against the Governor was properly dismissed."); Roe v. City of Waterbury, 542 F.3d 31, 40, 41 (2d Cir. 2008) ("Giordano had no authority to make policy authorizing, condoning, or promoting the sexual abuse of children. Regardless of what broad powers he had as a mayor, the state of Connecticut has made the policy (and the laws) prohibiting such conduct. . . . A finding of municipal liability in this case would amount to a finding of respondeat superior and would be an unwarranted expansion of the single-act rule set forth in Pembaur. It would also conflate the color of law inquiry with the official policy inquiry. An official acts within his official policymaking capacity when he acts in accordance with the responsibility delegated him under state law for making policy in that area of the municipality's business. . .An official acts wholly outside his official policymaking capacity when he misuses his power to advance a purely personal agenda. Here, Giordano acted neither pursuant to nor within the authority delegated to him when he committed the acts of sexual abuse. . . . Although we ruled that Giordano was acting under color of law when he molested the Plaintiffs, the claims here fail under the 'official policy' element."); Bolton v. City of Dallas, Tex., 541 F.3d 545, 551 (5th Cir. 2008) ("Chapter XII, ' 5, of the Charter − the relevant local law quoted earlier − prohibits the specific action taken by Benavides. Thus, absent some contrary custom not shown here, Benavides's action clearly does not represent final policy with respect to the removal of city officials like Bolton. It is the Charter that announces the City's policy in this regard. . . . There is no argument that Benavides was generally free to disregard the Charter, . . . or that the City had a custom of permitting such disregard. And Bolton has not shown that Benavides was vested with policymaking authority such that municipal liability should attach despite the existence of a contrary city policy. . . Benavides was therefore not the final policymaker with respect to his decision to terminate Bolton and municipal liability cannot attach to that decision."); Thomas v. Roberts, 261 F.3d 1160, 1172, 1173 (11th Cir. 2001) ("Although Roberts was provided with the discretion to order searches within the school, she had no authority to alter the District's explicit policy that searches could not be conducted absent reasonable suspicion. . . . In this case, . . . it is irrelevant that Roberts's decision was not subject to review because it was contrary to the District's official written policy. . . When an official's exercise of her discretionary duties is 'constrained by policies not of that official's making, those policies, rather than the subordinate's departures from them, are the act of the [local government].' [citing Praprotnik] Roberts's decision to search the children without reasonable suspicion therefore cannot be said to fairly represent the District's policy."), opinion reinstated and supplemented by Thomas v. Roberts, 323 F.3d 950 (11th Cir. 2003).

See also Logan v. City of Evanston, No. 20 C 1323, 2020 WL 6020487, at *6–7 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 12, 2020) ("The defendants argue that Cook lacked policymaking authority with respect to the matters at issue because the Evanston City Code only authorizes him to administer and enforce the City's affairs and policies. The defendants' second argument is that like the Chicago superintendent of police in Auriemma v. City of Chicago, 957 F.3d 397 (7th Cir. 1992), Cook 'violated rather than implemented the policy' of the municipality when he published the plaintiffs' information. . .The Court disagrees. First, the plaintiffs have alleged sufficient facts to make it plausible that Cook, unlike the Chicago police superintendent in Auriemma, 'retains complete authority over how criminal investigations are conducted' and that he is therefore a 'final policymaker.'. . At this point it is too early to say definitively whether Cook qualifies in this regard, because the answer 'may turn on' factual questions regarding the extent of Cook's policymaking authority. . . But the plaintiffs' allegations are sufficient to clear the plausibility threshold. The Court notes, in this regard, that there is no question that a chief of police may be a final policymaker in appropriate circumstances. . . The defendants also contend that Cook's actions cannot be characterized as the policy of the City of Evanston because he violated the City's policies prohibiting, among other things, making personal copies of recordings created while on duty or while acting in one's official capacity, duplicating or distributing such recordings, sharing law enforcement information via social media, and releasing protected information. In Auriemma, the Seventh Circuit explained that '[l]iability for unauthorized acts is personal; to hold the municipality liable, Monell tells us, the agent's actions must implement rather than frustrate the government's policy.'. .Defendants' reliance on Auriemma is unavailing, at least at the motion to dismiss stage. In Auriemma, the Seventh Circuit found that city ordinances banned race discrimination in the Chicago police department and therefore expressly banned the superintendent's discriminatory conduct. . . In this case, the defendants have not pointed to any Evanston ordinance that limits Cook's authority in conducting police investigations. Although Cook's conduct may have violated the Evanston City Code, a statement issued by Cook himself indicated that his actions occurred 'during the course of a criminal investigation,' which is 'within the realm of the authority granted to the police chief.'. . Finally, Judge Ripple's concurrence in Auriemma indicates that the Seventh Circuit's opinion did not foreclose the possibility that the superintendent in that case could have been considered a policymaker on other facts. . . In this case, the plaintiffs plausibly allege that 'no ordinance constrained [Cook]' as it pertained to his alleged role as a policymaker in Evanston police investigations. Vodak v. City of Chicago, 639 F.3d 738, 748-49 (7th Cir. 2011). For these reasons, the City of Evanston is not entitled to dismissal of the plaintiffs' Monell claims under Rule 12(b)(6)[.]"); Myers v. Delaware County, Ohio, No. 2:07-cv-844, 2008 WL 4862512, at *13 (S.D. Ohio Nov. 7, 2008) ("In the Court's view, because Defendants' discretionary decision to issue the press release was contrary to established county policies that forbid the sheriff from making public comments on a pending investigation, and because Defendants acted contrary to the legal advice of the county prosecutor, the conduct in question cannot be attributable to Delaware County regardless of whether Defendants were the final policymakers with respect to matters of law enforcement. The Court therefore finds that the County Defendants are entitled to judgment on the pleadings with respect to Plaintiff's substantive due process claim."); Miller v. City of East Orange, 509 F.Supp.2d 452, 458, 459 (D.N.J. 2007)

("[T]he fact that Grimes is a policymaker for some purposes, does not mean that all acts committed by Grimes fall within the scope of his final decision-making authority and are City 'policy.' . . . The question is whether when Chief Grimes intentionally lied before the grand jury he was making 'policy' for the City of East Orange. The isolated incident at issue is an intentional tort and a criminal violation of New Jersey law, N.J.S.A 2C:28-1; N.J.S.A. 2C:228-2. It is an act for which, if proven, Chief Grimes could be criminally prosecuted in state court. While neither side has put forth any municipal or state laws setting out the limits of the policymaking authority granted to the East Orange Police Chief, clearly that authority includes an implicit limitation to abide by state and federal law. When Chief Grimes committed this criminal act and lied before the grand jury, he was acting outside the scope of his policymaking authority for the City. Since his act cannot be considered City policy, the City of East Orange is not liable for his conduct."); Beal v. City of Chicago, No. 04 C 2039, 2007 WL 1029364, at *14 (N.D. Ill. Mar. 30, 2007) ("Unlike the practices of a municipality's lower-level employees, the single act of high-level policy maker can render a local government liable under § 1983. . . . Plaintiffs contend that the Command Personnel had policymaking authority. Whether an official has 'final policymaking authority' over a certain issue is a question answered by state or local law. Generally speaking, the City Council and Police Board set municipal policy for the CPD. . . Plaintiffs have not identified any authority for CPD's Command Personnel to 'countermand the statutes regulating the department' or adopt rules for the conduct of the department. . . Accordingly, to the extent that Command Personnel or Officers operated contrary to the express policy and practice of the City, no municipal liability is created."); Kohler v. City of Wapakoneta, 381 F.Supp.2d 692, 712 (N.D. Ohio 2005) ("Kohler cannot show that Harrison had authority to establish a municipal policy that her bathroom activity would be tape recorded for his own, personal use. Harrison's unauthorized, private action frustrated, rather than implemented the City's stated policy regarding appropriate activity in the workplace. His action was not taken in the course of any official function, as were the individual acts found to represent municipal policy in the Sixth Circuit cases Kohler cites. [citing Monistere and O'Brien] Additionally, as soon as the City's officials learned about Harrison's actions, they decided to suspend him, accepted his resignation when it was proffered, and referred the matter to the state for investigation. Harrison's acts were therefore not 'final and unreviewable' and were subject to the City's superior official policies. Kohler cannot maintain her claim that Harrison's acts rose to the level of official policy."); Travis v. The Village of Dobbs Ferry, 355 F.Supp.2d 740, 755 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) ("Chief Longworth, Lt. Gelardi and Det. Bailey violated their own policy by strip searching plaintiff. Since Monell claims are predicated on illegal activity committed pursuant to a policy or practice, no Monell claim can lie against the Village for a strip search that violated policy. Nor does the fact that Chief Longworth − the Police Department's highest policy-maker − authorized the search make it 'pursuant to policy.' While even one action by a chief policy maker can constitute a 'policy' for Monell purposes, . . . not every action of a chief policy maker automatically becomes 'policy' for Monell purposes. This case is the paradigmatic example of that proposition. Longworth had already made a policy concerning strip searches. He then violated his own policy by authorizing a strip search in the absence of reasonable suspicion to believe that Travis was carrying contraband. The only other way Dobbs Ferry could be held liable is if plaintiff adduced evidence showing that the Dobbs Ferry Police Department routinely strip searches individuals without reasonable suspicion of contraband carriage. But there is no such evidence in the record. Indeed, there is no evidence in the record before me about any strip search except the strip search of plaintiff. That puts this case squarely in the category of cases where we are dealing with a single incident of unconstitutional activity that is not attributable to an existing, unconstitutional municipal policy. . . The fact that it is a particularly outrageous incident does not make the Village liable for it − though it may make the offending officers liable to plaintiff in punitive damages."); Zoch v. City of Chicago, 1997 WL 89231, *43 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 4, 1997) (not reported) ("In Auriemma, the Seventh Circuit held that the Superintendent of the CPD was not the final municipal 'policymaker' in the context of the plaintiffs' racial and political discrimination claims under § 1983 in that case. . . In particular, the Seventh Circuit in Auriemma reasoned that since the Superintendent of the CPD did not have the power to countermand City ordinances which unequivocally banned racial and political discrimination, he was not the final municipal policymaker in the context of the plaintiffs' claims. . . Similarly, in the instant case, Rodriguez does not have the power to countermand the municipal ordinance which unequivocally bans gender discrimination or the City's official policy against harassing employees because of the person's First Amendment conduct.").

But see San Geronimo Caribe Project, Inc. v. Acevedo-Vila, 687 F.3d 465, 497 (1st Cir. 2012) (en banc) (Lipez, J., concurring) ("Even under a broad construction of the principle espoused in Parratt and Hudson,. . . actions undertaken by a governor in his or her official capacity should be attributed to the State. . . . With respect to the Governor, however, I think it is plainly unacceptable to say that his conduct, albeit improper under Commonwealth law, was 'unauthorized' in the Parratt–Hudson sense, regardless of whether one prefers the Legalist or Governmental model. The Governor is the chief of state and, as such, his official acts are always those of 'the State.' At a minimum, Monroe must mean that a viable section 1983 procedural due process claim will arise if the Governor sets in motion the denial of procedural protections to an individual entitled to predeprivation process."); Vodak v. City of Chicago, 639 F.3d 738, 746-48 (7th Cir. 2011) ("The district court dismissed the City of Chicago as a defendant on the ground that it did not participate in the unlawful arrests. For reasons based on what scholars agree are historical misreadings (which are not uncommon when judges play historian), . . . the Supreme Court has held that municipalities are not liable for the torts of their employees under the strict-liability doctrine of respondeat superior, as private employers are. . . A person who wants to impose liability on a municipality for a constitutional tort must show that the tort was committed (that is, authorized or directed) at the policymaking level of government − by the city council, for example, rather than by the police officer who made an illegal arrest. . . The City makes the extravagant claim that the only officials whose tortious conduct can ever impose liability on it are the members of the City Council acting through their ordinances. The City denies that the Council has delegated authority to make policy to any official of the City's government. Not even acts of the Mayor are acts of the City, it contends; they are merely acts of an errant employee. However that may be, the only rule governing policies and procedures regarding mass arrests is Chicago Police Department General Order 02-11 (Nov. 1, 2002), issued in the name of the City's Superintendent of Police pursuant to a provision of the Chicago Municipal Code stating that 'the superintendent shall be responsible for the general management and control of the police department and shall have full and complete authority to administer the department in a manner consistent with the ordinances of the city, the laws of the state, and the rules and regulations of the police board.' § 2-84-040. The City Council can enact ordinances that constrain the Superintendent's authority to make mass arrests in demonstration situations, but it hasn't done so, and thus it has allowed him to be sole policymaker in relation to the events at issue in this case. He alone makes policy for demonstrations that get out of hand. His possession of this policymaking authority is consistent with Illinois state law as well as with the City's ordinances. . . . All that matters in this case is that Chicago's police superintendent has sole responsibility to make policy regarding control of demonstrations. He was in his headquarters throughout the March 20, 2003, demonstration, not only monitoring it but also approving the decisions of his subordinates, specifically their decisions to shield Michigan Avenue from the marchers and to make the mass arrests of the people trapped on Chicago Avenue. The superintendent was the City, so far as the demonstration and arrests were concerned. . . .The City argues, on the authority of our decision in Auriemma v. Rice. . . that the police superintendent doesn't have authority to make policy for dealing with demonstrations and mass arrests because he is required to act in conformity with the ordinances enacted by the City Council. But no ordinance constrained him."); Simmons v. Uintah Health Care Special Dist., 506 F.3d 1281, 1283-87 (10th Cir. 2007) ("[W]hile municipalities are rightly held liable for those actions taken by employees in conformance with official policy, this is hardly the only basis available for assigning municipal liability. Municipalities are equally answerable for actions undertaken by their final policymakers, whether or not those actions conform to their own preexisting rules. Were the law otherwise, a municipality's leaders would have the very strange incentive to flout their own policies. Or perhaps even enact policies with the deliberate purpose of disregarding them. While the law is often subtle and sometimes complex, it is rarely so unreasonable. . . . The district court's primary holding turns on a question of law − namely, whether the District may be held liable only for actions by its employees in compliance with official policy − and thus requires de novo review in this court. We are in full accord with the District that actions taken by employees in compliance with official policy or custom are one way to establish liability on the part of a municipality. . . . We part ways with the District and the district court, however, when it comes to the question whether showing compliance with a preexisting policy or longstanding custom is the only way to demonstrate that an action is properly viewed as the municipality's own. While Monell found liability on the basis of an 'official policy as the moving force of the constitutional violation,' 436 U.S. at 694, it fell to the Court in Pembaur to establish that actions taken by a municipality's final policymakers also represent acts of 'official policy' giving rise to municipal liability. . . . Accordingly, a municipality is responsible for both actions taken by subordinate employees in conformance with preexisting official policies or customs and actions taken by final policymakers, whose conduct can be no less described as the 'official policy' of a municipality. This must include even actions by final policymakers taken in defiance of a policy or custom that they themselves adopted. . . Were the rule of law different, we would invite irrational results. Holding municipalities immune from liability whenever their final policymakers disregard their own written policies would serve to encourage city leaders to flout such rules. Policymakers, like the members of the Board before us, would have little reason to abide by their own mandates, like the

RIF policy, and indeed an incentive to adopt and then proceed deliberately to ignore them. Such a rule of law would thus serve to undermine rather than enhance Section 1983's purposes. Actions taken by a municipality's final policymakers, even in contravention of their own written policies, are fairly attributable to the municipality and can give rise to liability."); Spalding v. City of Chicago, 24 F.Supp.3d 765, 774-75 (N.D. Ill. 2014) ("Unlike the situation in Auriemma, Plaintiffs do not allege that Kirby, Rivera, and Roti frustrated any particular City policy. Rather, citing Vodak v. City of Chicago, 639 F.3d 738 (7th Cir.2011), Plaintiffs submit that, 'so far as the retaliatory acts against Plaintiffs were concerned,' Kirby, Rivera, and Roti were the City's policymakers. . . In Vodak, the Seventh Circuit explained that the relevant question under Monell turns not on a general inquiry into the governmental hierarchy, but rather on an examination of whether an individual municipal officer 'was at the apex of authority for the action in question.'. . . Vodak distinguished Auriemma on the ground that no ordinance constrained the Superintendent's authority to make policy regarding demonstrations and mass arrests, while in Auriemma there was an ordinance that constrained and in fact eliminated the Superintendent's ability to take the action in question (making employment decisions based on race and politics). . . As in Vodak, the actions challenged here are not submitted by either side to have been restricted or prohibited by City ordinance. Defendants retort that this does not matter because Auriemma holds that the City Council is the sole policymaker with respect to all employment decisions. . . That greatly overreads Auriemma, which holds only that the City Council is the sole policymaker with respect to the particular employment decisions challenged in that case—those based on considerations (race and politics) made unlawful by ordinance. . . Accordingly, the Monell claim survives dismissal.")

See also Greensboro Professional Fire Fighters Ass'n., Local 3157 v. City of Greensboro, 64 F.3d 962, 965-66 (4th Cir. 1995) ("While it is true that Fire Chief Jones had the authority to select particular individuals for promotion and even to design the procedures governing promotions within his department, this authority did not include responsibility for establishing substantive personnel policy governing the exercise of his authority. His power to appoint and to establish procedures for making appointments was always subject to the parameters established by the City. Appellants confuse the authority to make final policy with the authority to make final implementing decisions."); Lawshe v. Simpson, 16 F.3d 1475, 1484 (7th Cir. 1994) (Gary Health Department Board's termination of plaintiff without due process did not constitute municipal policy where Board's discretion in this area was subordinated to Mayor's policy.); Martineau v. Kurland, 36 F. Supp.2d 39, 43 (D. Mass. 1999) ("[A]uthority to hire and fire in itself does not carry with it the authority to create an employment policy of retaliating against employee exercise of free speech."); Izquierdo v. Sills, 68 F. Supp.2d 392, 408, 409 (D.Del. 1999) ("Izquierdo does not contend that Pratcher acted pursuant to official municipal policy; rather, he contends Pratcher acted pursuant to rules other than those established by the written policies. Thus, if Pratcher were the official policymaker with respect to the areas cited by Izquierdo, the actions and patterns to which Izquierdo points would be official policies of the municipality. However, Izquierdo has not shown Pratcher had final policymaking authority with respect to any aspect of the alleged activities. . . . Thus any actions he allegedly took in contravention of the language of the Manual did not establish a new municipal policy but would be contrary to the written policy.");

McMillan v. City of Chicago, No. 92 C 3746, 1993 WL 462835, *1 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 9, 1993) (not reported) ("Neither Mayor Daley nor Commissioner Carr set policy regarding dismissals or reclassifications of job titles in Chicago. At most, they are alleged to have wielded final authority over the decisions to reclassify and dismiss [plaintiff]. If, in making these decisions, Mayor Daley and Commissioner Carr discriminated on account of politics or in retaliation, Mayor Daley and Commissioner Carr are accountable as individuals for violating not implementing the policy of Chicago."); Rubeck v. Sheriff of Wabash County, 824 F. Supp. 1291, 1301 (N.D. Ind. 1993) ("[S]omeone with executive authority whose actions fly in the face of state or local law is not a policymaker under Monell and its progeny.").

See also Evans v. City of Chicago, No. 04C3570, 2006 WL 463041, at *14, *15 (N.D. Ill. Jan. 6, 2006)("The City argues that Plaintiff has no competent evidence to support the alleged municipal policy of systematically suppressing Brady material or of framing innocent people and securing false criminal convictions through witness coercion and evidence fabrication. Specifically, the City relies on the Muncipal Code of Chicago, the City of Chicago's Department of Police Rules and Regulations, and training bulletins that were effective in 1976 to demonstrate that the City's express policies contradict Plaintiff's allegations. The CPD Rules and Regulations prohibited police officers from failing to report promptly any information regarding any crime or unlawful action. The inference is that police officers therefore were forbidden from sequestering information or evidence in so-called street files, rather than immediately reporting it through official CPD channels. Police officers thus were likewise forbidden to pursue and secure false criminal convictions. The Standards of Conduct in the CPD Rules and Regulations expressly forbade making a false written or oral report. . . According to the City, there was no evidence that its policymaking authorities knew or should have known of any policy or practice of suppressing exculpatory material or framing innocent people. Plaintiff asserts that the customs or practices of maintaining 'street files' and fabricating evidence to secure false convictions was so wide-spread, of such long-standing, and so well-known throughout the Department that it rose to the level of official policy. Multiple court decisions in this District and the Seventh Circuit have noted that evidence of the street files practice has been clearly established. . . . . Evidence that the CPD had a practice of maintaining street files in 1982 may be suggestive of a similar practice in 1976. This Court notes that the Seventh Circuit has stated that '[t]he Superintendent of Police in Chicago had no power to countermand the statutes regulating the operation of the department.'[citing Auriemma] The difference between countermanding a statute and issuing general orders pertaining to daily operations remains an open question, however, not amenable to summary judgment. Neither party has adduced evidence clearly showing what authority the Superintendent or supervisory staff at CPD had over implementing mandates from City Council. Plaintiff has raised questions about the apparent discrepancy between official CPD policy and actual CPD practice with respect to case file creation and maintenance, which the City has failed to address in more than conclusory fashion. Whether CPD followed its official policy − and what that policy specifically meant to the Department − is a key issue in the instant litigation and, based on the evidence before the court at this point, not an issue that can be resolved as a matter of law.").

But see Wooten v. Logan, No. 02-5753, 2004 WL 68541, at *4 (6th Cir. Jan. 14, 2004) (Moore, J., dissenting) (unpublished) ("That Logan committed the alleged assault himself makes no difference; the chief law- enforcement officer of Pickett County, Tennessee, is alleged to have ratified a policy of using the power of law enforcement to effectuate rape, and the County should be responsible for such a policy."); Bennett v. Pippin, 74 F.3d 578, 586 & n.5 (5th Cir. 1996) ("In this case, the Sheriff's actions were those of the County because his relationship with [Plaintiff] grew out of the attempted murder investigation and because. . . he used his authority over the investigation to coerce sex with her. The fact that rape is not a legitimate law enforcement goal does not prevent the Sheriff's act from falling within his law enforcement function. . . . Under the Archer County power structure, no one had state law authority to contest the Sheriff's use of his power to place himself in a position to rape [Plaintiff]."); Gonzalez v. Ysleta Independent School District, 996 F.2d 745, 754 (5th Cir. 1993) ("[T]he existence of a well-established, officially-adopted policy will not insulate the municipality from liability where the policy-maker herself departs from these formal rules. [cite omitted] The Board of Trustees' conscious decision to transfer [teacher] rather than remove him from the classroom or report the incident to the Department of Human Resources − the response its past practice might have portended and its own sexual abuse policy would seem to have required − plainly constitutes a 'policy' attributable to the school district."); Culberson v. Doan, 125 F. Supp.2d 252, 276 (S.D. Ohio 2000) ("[T]his Court finds Chief Payton is the policymaker for the Village of Blanchester regarding his duties as the municipality's top law enforcement officer and any official actions representing deliberate indifference, a policy or a custom that is promulgated by him, is held to be a policy or custom of the Village of Blanchester, for which liability can be imposed on it."); Corp. of Pres. of Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints v. Environmental Protection Commission of Hillsborough County, 837 F. Supp. 413, 417 (M.D. Fla. 1993) ("Although [defendant's] action may have only been a one-time deviation from the written rules by which the EPC operates, such deviation could amount to agency policy. . . .").

Compare Whitson v. Board of County Commissioners of County of Sedgwick, 106 F.4th 1063, 1066-72 (10th Cir. 2024) ("The central question before us is whether a final policymaker's assault of a county prisoner in the course of carrying out official duties for which he was charged with setting policy subjects the municipal defendants to liability. We answer yes. A municipal government is not liable for every constitutional violation by one of its officers or employees. Although a municipality is a 'person' subject to suit under § 1983 for constitutional violations, it 'cannot be held liable solely because it employs a tortfeasor—or, in other words, a municipality cannot be held liable under § 1983 on a respondeat superior theory.'. . Rather, a municipality is responsible only for (1) actions taken by subordinate employees in conformity with preexisting official policies or customs and (2) actions taken by final policymakers, whose conduct 'can be no less described as the official policy of a municipality.'. . . A municipality is an artificial person. But in certain respects it can be identified with the final policymakers who have authority to control its actions. As we understand controlling precedent, when an official takes action over which he or she has final policymaking authority, the policymaker is the municipality, so it is fair to impose liability on that entity for that action. . . . Sheriff Hanna was the final policymaker for the municipal defendants with respect to the care of county prisoners, including their transportation. By Colorado statute the sheriff 'shall have charge and custody of the jails of the county, and of the prisoners in the jails, and shall supervise them himself or herself or through a deputy or jailer.'. . Hanna's actions with respect to prisoner Biggs were undoubtedly within the scope of activities for which he was to set policy. Our conclusion in this case finds strong support in the decisions by other circuits. Those decisions have repeatedly held that a policymaker need not be motivated by legitimate policy goals for conduct to fall within final policymaking authority. [court discusses decisions] [W]e see no support for the proposition that conduct by a policymaking official that would otherwise lead to municipal liability cannot be attributed to the municipality when the official acts for purely personal reasons. The Supreme Court has spoken forcefully on the issue, saying, 'proof that a municipality's legislative body or authorized decisionmaker has intentionally deprived a plaintiff of a federally protected right necessarily establishes that the municipality acted culpably. Similarly, the conclusion that the action taken or directed by the municipality or its authorized decisionmaker itself violates federal law will also determine that the municipal action was the moving force behind the injury of which the plaintiff complains.'. . A rule under which a municipality could escape liability whenever a policymaker motivated by purely personal considerations violates constitutional mandates would 'serve to undermine rather than enhance Section 1983's purposes.'. . The factual context presented by this case is quite different from the contexts of the cases offered to dispute municipal liability. Here the victim was in the custody of the official and the official was statutorily charged with supervising the victim's care. . . In this circumstance, we see no escape from the conclusion that Sheriff Hanna possessed 'final authority to establish municipal policy with respect to the action ordered.'. . Indeed, he had not only the authority, but the responsibility, to set policy with respect to the treatment of prisoners in his custody. A few words about the dissent. It suggests that it is bad policy to expose a municipality to what could be enormous liability for actions by policymakers who are motivated solely to achieve personal gratification without any intent to serve the municipality's interest. It therefore rejects the appellate decision holding a municipality liable for sexual assaults by a sheriff. And it appears to distinguish the other out-of-circuit decisions cited above in support of our approach on the ground that the misconduct may not have been motivated just by the desire for self-gratification (perhaps because conduct motivated solely by personal reasons is not considered within the scope of employment). But the misconduct in those cases may well have been motivated by purely personal concerns—for example, did the sheriff fabricate evidence because of a personal vendetta against the defendant or did the alderman infringe the free-speech rights of a constituent only to protect his personal reputation—and, more importantly, the opinions in those cases did not address motive, presumably because the motive was irrelevant. If liability depends on whether there is a possible 'proper' motivation for the official's action, the likely unseemly consequence is that the only victims who cannot obtain relief from a municipality for a policymaker's misconduct are victims of sexual assault, for which there could never be a legitimate motive. Would that be such good policy? In any event, the theory of municipal liability we are imposing is hardly a stranger to the law and is fully consistent with Monell. Monell rejected respondeat superior liability for municipalities. . . . [W]hen the policymaker is the alter ego of the municipality, liability is appropriate, regardless of the miscreant's motives or whether the conduct was within the scope of employment. The Supreme Court has recognized this narrow basis of liability outside of respondeat superior. . . . This does not mean that a municipality is liable for all misconduct by a sheriff. If Hanna had raped a customer at a bar after work, there would likely be no municipal liability. As explained above, the sheriff must have final policymaking authority with respect to the actions taken. . . Given that Hanna raped a prisoner in his custody while transporting the prisoner to another jail, that requirement was undoubtedly satisfied.") with Whitson v. Board of County Commissioners of County of Sedgwick, 106 F.4th 1063, 1073-75, 1079 (10th Cir. 2024) (Phillips, J., dissenting) ("I would affirm the district court's dismissal of the claims against Sedgwick County because Sheriff Hanna did not act as a final policymaker in his decision to sexually abuse Ms. Biggs. I agree with the district court's conclusion that Sheriff Hanna advanced a purely personal agenda in committing the sexual assault and acted outside his authorized law-enforcement 'realm' of setting policy for the transportation of prisoners. . . As the district court put it so well, sexual assault 'is not within the policymaking authority a county sheriff has.'. . . [I]f Bennett were a Tenth Circuit case, it might well control the present case. But as an out-of-circuit case, Bennett must earn its way into our caselaw by its persuasive value. For me, Bennett hasn't earned its place. Other circuits have rejected it, and we should too. I agree with the cases below criticizing Bennett and declining to follow it. . . . In my view, the district court got it right by concluding that 'the transportation of prisoners is within the realm of the county sheriff's policymaking authority' but that the municipality defendants 'are not being sued because Mr. Hanna transported Ms. Biggs; they are being sued because he sexually assaulted her. That is not within the policymaking authority a county sheriff has.'. . The district court did not err by concluding that Sheriff Hanna's actions were 'wholly outside' his authority and lawful realm because he 'misuse[d] his power to advance a purely personal agenda.'. . For these reasons I respectfully dissent and would affirm the district court's order granting the motion to dismiss the claims against Sedgwick County. I disagree with the majority opinion's holding that the sheriff can create a municipal policy with his one-time, illegal, and secret act of sexually assaulting a detainee by interrupting a detainee's jail transport and improperly taking her inside his home to commit a sexual assault. With that as our circuit's new rule, I see no way for a municipality to do anything but write checks—strict liability for the municipality despite its legal inability to constrain a rogue sheriff determined to gratify his sexual desires.")

See also Putnam v. Town of Saugus, 365 F.Supp.2d 151, 189-93 (D. Mass. 2005) ("Despite the appointment authority given to the Town Manager, one could argue that it is not final authority under Praprotnik because the Town Manager is constrained by polices not of his or her making. . . That is, because the Town Manager's appointment authority must be exercised based on 'merit and fitness alone,' one could argue that the Town Manager's disregard of that directive is not the Town's final policy but a subordinate's departure from it. . . In Praprotnik, the plurality addressed this point in response to Justice Brennan's concern that a municipal charter's inclusion of 'merit and fitness' language would effectively insulate the municipality from liability. . . The plurality denied that assertion and observed that refusals to abide by a 'merit and fitness' standard could help to show that a municipality's policies were in reality, different from those in the charter. . . This seems to suggest that a 'merit and fitness' standard would not preclude a finding of final policymaking authority in the official to whom that standard applies, if that policy is frequently disregarded. . . One could then argue that Vasapolli's single alleged departure from the 'merit and fitness' policy is insufficient. This reasoning, however, is contradicted by other portions of the plurality's opinion which suggest that a 'merit and fitness' standard does not automatically preclude a finding of final policymaking authority. The town charter involved in Praprotnik required appointment decisions as well as 'all measures for the control and regulation of employment' be 'on the sole basis of merit and fitness.' . . Despite its recognition that the mayor was constrained by the directives of the charter, the plurality acknowledged that 'one would have to conclude' that the mayor's policy decisions would be 'attributable to the city itself' so long as applicable law does not make the mayor's decisions reviewable by the municipality's civil service commission. . . Thus, the 'merit and fitness' provision did not automatically preclude a ruling of the mayor had final policymaking authority. . . Rather, the civil service commission must have the power to enforce the 'merit and fitness' provision by reviewing the mayor's decisions in order to prevent such a finding. . . Thus, the plurality's reasoning appears internally contradictory. One portion of the opinion implies that a 'merit and fitness' standard preempts a finding of final authority, . . . while another part suggests it does not so long as the official's decisions are not subject to review by other municipal policymakers. . . One way that this apparent inconsistency can be resolved is through a closer examination of Praprotnik's reasoning. Such an examination suggests that the two-step framework for determining final policymaking authority may not have been intended to apply to those policymakers who are legislatively authorized to act but only to those subordinate officials to whom the legislatively empowered decision-makers have delegated their authority. . . . This Court is mindful of the fact that this interpretation has the unusual effect of according different legal significance to the same legislative language depending on the person to whom it is applied. That is, as applied to the official who is legislatively empowered, it does not prevent a ruling that the individual has final policymaking authority; as applied to a subordinate to whom that policymaker delegates her authority, however, it precludes a ruling that the subordinate has final authority. This interpretation, however, avoids reading Praprotnik as internally contradictory, a far more unusual result. Moreover, this understanding is better able to comply with the policy underlying municipal liability which seeks to hold the municipality accountable for the conduct of those whose acts may fairly be said to be those of the municipality. . . When a local government official's decisions are unreviewable within the governing structure, those decisions may fairly be said to represent official as well as final policy because within that official's sphere of discretion, she is the vessel through which the municipality acts. . . That authorizing legislation requires an official to make her decisions based on 'merit and fitness alone' makes her authority no less final when that official herself is the sole determiner of whether that standard has been met.. . . When a subordinate has only delegated authority, her acts are not as obviously attributable to the municipality. Presumably, if a subordinate failed to adhere to a 'merit and fitness' standard, the delegating official could easily rescind that authority. Conversely, limiting the scope of a legislatively authorized official's authority would require the more cumbersome process of either amending or repealing the authorizing legislation. Because a subordinate's authority can be more readily taken back, her departures from required standards are not as easily characterized as those of the municipality. . . . . Similar to the issue of Praprotnik's precedential force, whether its method for determining final policymaking authority applies equally to 'authorized' decision-makers and 'subordinates' is no doubt crucial to the ultimate resolution of this case. At this stage, however, this Court need not determine those issues conclusively. As mentioned above, even if Praprotnik is governing precedent and even if its framework applies beyond instances of delegation, Praprotnik does not foreclose a finding that the Saugus Town Manager has final policymaking authority so as to warrant summary judgment. It is sufficient that Praprotnik can be read to hold that a 'merit and fitness' standard does not by itself cut off an official's final policymaking authority. . . Under this interpretation of Praprotnik, foreclosure of final policymaking authority also requires an official's decisions to be reviewable by separate municipal officials.. . Because there has been no indication that the Town Manager's appointment decisions are subject to review by other municipal officials such as the Board of Selectmen, summary judgment is not appropriate. The record includes only a portion of the Saugus Town Charter. Within that portion the charter grants the Town Manager broad authority to 'supervise and direct' the police department's administration. . . The Town Manager is specifically empowered to make personnel decisions including the appointment of police chief. . . Thus far, there has been no indication that other provisions of the charter (or any other source of law) subject the Town Manager's personnel decisions to any type of review within the municipality. To the contrary, the record evidence discussed above indicates the autonomy the Town Manager enjoys in making these decisions. Moreover, the Town has not refuted Putnam's claim that the Town Manager has final policymaking authority and neither party has addressed the requirements of that element. . . Accordingly, given the evidence in the record, this Court finds that the absence of final policymaking authority has not been established as matter of law.").

Note that even where a plaintiff is unsuccessful in making out municipal liability based on a final policymaker theory, on grounds that the policy was contrary to some formal municipal law or ordinance, plaintiff may still successfully plead government liability by alleging a "persistent and widespread practice which was inconsistent with any such announced policy of the city." Wetzel v. Hoffman, 928 F.2d 376, 378 (11th Cir. 1991). Accord, K.M. v. School Bd. of Lee County Florida, No. 03-12358, 2005 WL 2475729, at *4 (11th Cir. Oct. 7, 2005) (not published) ("Because Florida law identifies the School Board as the policymaker for the School District, a single decision by the Board may constitute School Board policy, even if not phrased as a formal policy statement. . . If, before a decision becomes final, the School Board ratified the decision of a subordinate who did not have final policymaking authority, the Board will be liable for that decision. . . The School Board will also be responsible for multiple acts by subordinates that constitute a custom, if that custom caused the plaintiff's injury. . . A custom is a practice that has not received official approval, but is 'so settled and permanent that it takes on the force of the law.'"); Auriemma, supra, 957 F.2d at 399 ("[E]ven executive action in the teeth of municipal law could be called policy . . . . A practice undertaken by the executive power and suffered by the legislative power may be said to reflect a custom with the force of legislation."); Dirksen v. City of Springfield, 842 F. Supp. 1117, 1123-34 (C.D. Ill. 1994) ("[E]ven though Springfield and the Springfield Police Department had regulations to combat sexual harassment, Plaintiff's allegations suggest that it was the custom or practice of the top officials at the Springfield Police Department to circumvent these regulations."); Lopez v. Shines, No. 93 C 1243, 1993 WL 437450, *3 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 27, 1993) (not reported) ("[W]hen a city's legislature condones unconstitutional personnel practices of an official, the official's acts regarding the condoned subject matter may constitute the city's policy.... because such acts are permitted, or, . . . encouraged."). Indeed, in Mandel v. Doe, 888 F.2d 783 (11th Cir. 1989), the court read Jett as requiring the examination of "not only the relevant positive law, including ordinances, rules and regulations, but also the relevant customs and practices having the force of law." Id. at 793. The court affirmed the district judge's conclusion that the deliberate indifference of a physician's assistant could be attributed to the County, where it was shown that "[a]lthough it was initially contemplated that the physician's assistant would be supervised by a medical doctor, the evidence revealed that a custom and practice developed so that the policy was that [the physician's assistant] was authorized to function without any supervision or review at all." Id. at 794.

See also Manor Healthcare Corp. v. Lomelo, 929 F.2d 633, 638 (11th Cir. 1991) (In rejecting liability of City, court considered whether City had developed custom or practice of allowing mayor to function without any supervision or review as to zoning matters).

In Wulf v. City of Wichita, 883 F.2d 842 (10th Cir. 1989), a former police officer brought a § 1983 action against the city, city manager and chief of police, claiming that his employment was terminated in violation of his first amendment rights. The chief of police had testified that he had been given "carte blanche" authority as to hiring and firing of police officers.

The court affirmed the finding of individual liability on the part of the police chief, where his recommendation of plaintiff's termination was unlawfully motivated, but rejected a finding of municipal liability where the city manager retained the power to make the "actual and ultimate decision" to fire the plaintiff and where the city manager's decision was not unlawfully motivated, and "therefore did not amount to approval of the impermissible basis. . . for [the chief's] decision." Id. at 868.

The court felt compelled to reach this result by Monell, which rejects municipal liability on a respondeat superior basis, and Praprotnik, which "directs us to look only at where statutory policymaking authority lies, rather than where de facto authority may reside. Thus, a subordinate who wields considerable actual power, yet who lacks the legal power to terminate an employee, may, in the circumstances of this case, be liable, while the City is not." Id. at 869.

See also Feliciano v. City of Cleveland, 988 F.2d 649, 656 (6th Cir. 1993) ("Although the plaintiffs have shown that Cleveland chiefs of police have issued policy statements on drug use and drug testing, the plaintiffs have not produced evidence to show that there exists a custom with the force of law that makes the chief of police the final policymaking official with respect to the drug testing of police."); Payung v. Williamson, 747 F. Supp. 705, 709 (M.D. Ga. 1990) (Mayor was not final policymaker as to decision to terminate fire chief, when all employment decisions were subject to review by City Council); Herhold v. City of Chicago, 723 F. Supp. 20, 33 (N.D.

Ill. 1989) (refusing to consider "realities of municipal decisionmaking," court looked only to state positive law for the vesting of final policymaking authority).

In Flanagan v. Munger, 890 F.2d 1557, 1567 (10th Cir. 1989), a police chief's reprimand of officers for selling or renting sexually explicit videotapes from a video store in which they had a partial ownership interest, was held to violate the officers' First Amendment rights. Although the Court of Appeals affirmed summary judgment for the police chief on qualified immunity grounds, summary judgment in favor of the City was reversed.

The City argued that it had not delegated final disciplinary authority to the Chief because the City Manager had "general management and supervision of all matters relating to the police department, its subordinate officers and employees." Id. at 1568 Furthermore, the City argued that the Chief was not the final policymaker as to disciplinary matters because his authority was always reviewable by the City Manager and City Council. Id.

The court found that, although the City Manager had general management and supervision powers, the Chief was directly responsible for discipline and supervision over the Department. Id. The court was equally unpersuaded by the City's "reviewability" argument. "Although the City argues that departmental decisions may ultimately be reviewed by the City Manager or City Council, for all intents and purposes the Chief's discipline decisions are final, and any meaningful administrative review is illusory." Id. at 1569. See also Sivulich-Boddy v. Clearfield City, 365 F.Supp.2d 1174, 1185 (D. Utah 2005)(" Under Tenth Circuit case law, even if Sparks' actions were subject to review by a committee, facts discovered during this litigation could demonstrate that he has sufficient decision making authority.").

In Ware v. Unified School District No. 492, 902 F.2d 815, 818 (10th Cir. 1990), the court concluded that evidence that the school board had delegated policymaking authority to the superintendent was no longer significant after Jett's directive to identify the final decisionmaker by consulting local positive law, custom or usage.

Ware was distinguished from Flanagan, where the government admitted delegation of final policymaking authority to the Chief of Police, a provision of the relevant municipal code gave direct authority to the Chief as to disciplinary matters, and discipline decisions of the Chief were unreviewable.

See also Randle v. City of Aurora, 69 F.3d 441, 448 (10th Cir. 1995) ("[W]e can identify three elements that help determine whether an individual is a 'final policymaker': (1) whether the official is meaningfully constrained 'by policies not of that official's own making;' (2) whether the official's decision are final − i.e., are they subject to any meaningful review; and (3) whether the policy decision purportedly made by the official is within the realm of the official's grant of authority." (citations omitted)).

In Worsham v. City of Pasadena, 881 F.2d 1336 (5th Cir. 1989), plaintiff was suspended from his job as construction-site inspector by the Mayor. Although the plaintiff was successful in his appeal to the City Council, and was reinstated within one month of his suspension, plaintiff brought a § 1983 action against the city and other defendants, claiming his constitutional rights were violated by the suspension. Following a complicated procedural path, see id. at 1336, the case was finally heard by the Fifth Circuit on the propriety of a 12(b) (6) dismissal of the claim against the only defendant left, the City of Pasadena.The majority of the panel, relying on the plurality opinion in Praprotnik, concluded that "meaningful review by the City Council indicate[d] that the city officials who discharged Worsham were not . . . final policymakers." Id. at 1340-41.

See also Gros v. City of Grand Prairie, No. Civ.A. 3:96-CV-2897, 2000 WL 1842421, at *3 (N.D. Tex. Dec. 12, 2000) (not reported) ("The record shows that although the City Manager delegated certain duties to the Police Chief, he maintained responsibility for setting policy for the Police Department. . . Accordingly, the court holds as a matter of law that Chief Crum did not exercise policymaking authority for the City, at least in any respect that would permit plaintiffs' to recover against the City on the claims at issue in this case. Because plaintiffs have not identified any other potential policymaker who participated in the violations of their constitutional rights, the court holds that the City is not liable under § 1983."); Smith v. City of Holland Board of Public Works, 102 F. Supp.2d 422, 427 (W.D. Mich. 2000) ("Morawski had authority to hire and fire BPW employees, those decisions were reviewed by no one at the BPW or the City, and those decisions were not constrained by any mandatory City employment policy. As such, the Court concludes that Morawski possessed official policymaking authority for the BPW and the City. As such, neither the BPW nor Morawski in his official capacity are protected from liability by Monell."); Vincent v. City of Talledega, 980 F. Supp. 410, 418 (N.D. Ala. 1997) ("If there is a review board with the power to take another look at the decision, the employee can forget suing the city under § 1983. Whether the review board agrees or disagrees with the discipline meted out makes no difference. Of course, the employee could undertake the Herculean task of suing the city and its review board, challenging the motivation of the board under Pembaur and Praprotnik as the city's ultimate policymaker. But, having to prove that a quasi-judicial body had a proscribed motive for its deliberative decision does not sound like something that would induce a smart lawyer to jump to the ready. A personnel board does not make an inviting target for alleged constitutional torts. The net effect will be to eliminate § 1983 liability for municipalities, because those cities that don't have a personnel board will establish one. As a practical matter, it will be impossible to prove to a jury that a personnel board that affirms an adverse employment decision did not believe the initiating municipal official's always available, legitimate, articulated non-discriminatory reason for his decision, although the very same jury may have laughed at the articulated reason if expressed on the stand by the municipal official himself.").

In Worsham, Judge Goldberg noted the division of the Court in Praprotnik on the method of identifying final policymakers, contrasting Justice Brennan's "fact-specific views" with Justice O'Connor's "positive law orientation." Id. at 1343. Judge Goldberg then looked to Jett and concluded:

> Jett clarifies that the Praprotnik plurality uses the phrase 'custom or usage' in two contexts in the municipal liability area. First, the plurality uses the phrase . . . in its original meaning: that a city policy giving rise to liability, although not authorized by written law, may exist in the form of a custom, usage or practice having the force of law . . . . In this regard, the focus is upon whether a custom, usage or practice by formally nonpolicymaking officials . . . allows a factfinder to infer that the city's policymakers have acquiesced in such conduct so as to give rise to municipal liability.
>
> The Praprotnik plurality also uses the phrase 'custom or usage' in a transformative manner as a method of proof. By proving a 'custom or usage,' a plaintiff may demonstrate as a matter of fact that an official is invested with final policymaking authority. This method of proof concerns the official's status, which implicates the basis for municipal liability in the executive context addressed in both Praprotnik and Pembaur.

881 F.2d at 1343 (Goldberg, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

Thus, by invoking "custom or usage" as a manner of proof, a plaintiff may be able to avoid Praprotnik's "gaping hole" if plaintiff can demonstrate that, even in the face of contrary positive law, formal policymakers have in fact delegated final policymaking authority to formal nonpolicymakers. Where such a delegation is made out, "the city may be liable for the delegatee's act on a single occasion that violates federal law." Id. at 1344.

Finally, Judge Goldberg noted that Jett does empower the judge to resolve issues of fact as part of the court's initial inquiry. "Jett thus envisions a role for the trial judge in this context similar ... to the role a judge plays in determining admissibility of certain evidence, or whether a matter is of public concern in the First Amendment context." Id.

See also Riddick v. School Board of the City of Portsmouth, 238 F.3d 518, 527, 528 (4th Cir. 2000) (Luttig, J., dissenting) ("In this case, the majority's (and the district court's) inquiry into who could be deemed a policymaker begins and ends with a determination that the School Board never formally delegated its statutorily-conferred final review authority over disciplinary decisions. Based upon this determination of the absence of formal delegation, and this determination alone, the majority concludes that the School Board cannot be liable for the actions of its subordinate employees. However, such is to pretermit the inquiry. For, as explained, even if a governmental entity with final policymaking authority has technically retained its formal policymaking authority, it may yet be liable if, through a custom or practice of acquiescence in the decisions of its subordinates, it has effectively delegated its authority to those subordinates. [citing Jett and Praprotnik] Were it otherwise, a municipality could essentially insulate itself from all liability merely by vesting ultimate review authority in its governing body, while at the same time surrendering all effective authority to its subordinate officials. . . Most assuredly, this was not congressional intent in enacting section 1983, nor would I so constrict that provision, the very purpose of which is to ensure accountability for official denial of constitutional right."); O'Brien v. City of Grand Rapids, 23 F.3d 990, 1005 (6th Cir. 1994) ("[O]n the record before us, it is not enough for the city to attempt to negate the official character of the policy in question by pointing to some obscure charter provision that identifies the supervisor of the department whose conduct gave rise to the suit. If there is a genuine issue in dispute, we must not only look at the provisions of the charter, but also must examine the knowledge and actions of these persons in the development of the policies."); Bouman v. Block, 940 F.2d 1211 (9th Cir. 1991) (question of delegation of authority to make employment policy decisions involves unresolved issues of fact).

5. Note on McMillian v. Monroe County

An official may be a state official for some purposes and a local government official for others. In McMillian v. Monroe County, 520 U.S. 781 (1997), a five member majority of the Supreme Court affirmed the decision of the Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit that a County Sheriff in Alabama is not a final policymaker for the County in the area of law enforcement, because Counties have no law enforcement authority under state law. Id. at 786.

The Court in McMillian noted that > the question is not whether Sheriff Tate acts for Alabama or Monroe County in some categorical, 'all or nothing' manner. Our cases on the liability of local governments under § 1983 instruct us to ask whether governmental officials are final policymakers for the local government in a particular area, or on a particular issue. . . . Thus, we are not seeking to make a characterization of Alabama sheriffs that will hold true for every type of official action they engage in. We simply ask whether Sheriff Tate represents the State or the county when he acts in a law enforcement capacity.

520 U.S. at 785, 786. The Court found the following factors insufficient to tip the balance in favor of the petitioners: (1) the sheriff's salary is paid out of the county treasury; (2) the county provides the sheriff with equipment, including cruisers; (3) the sheriff's jurisdiction is limited to the borders of his county; and (4) the sheriff is elected locally by the voters in his county. Id. at 791.

In dissent, Justice Ginsburg wrote:

> A sheriff locally elected, paid, and equipped, who autonomously sets and implements law enforcement policies operative within the geographic confines of a county, is ordinarily just what he seems to be: a county official. . . . The Court does not appear to question that an Alabama sheriff may still be a county policymaker for some purposes, such as hiring the county's chief jailor. . . . And, as the Court acknowledges, under its approach sheriffs may be policymakers for certain purposes in some States and not in others. . . The Court's opinion does not > call into question the numerous Court of Appeals decisions, some of them decades old, ranking sheriffs as county, not state, policymakers.

Id. at 804, 805 (Ginsburg, J., joined by Stevens, Souter, and Breyer, JJ., dissenting).

See generally Karen M. Blum, Support Your ~~Local~~ Sheriff: Suing Sheriffs Under Section 1983, 34 Stet. L. Rev. 623 (Spring 2005).

6. Post-McMillian Cases by Circuit:

FIRST CIRCUIT

Massachusetts

Doan v. Bergeron, No. 15-CV-11725-IT, 2016 WL 5346935, at *3–5 (D. Mass. Sept. 23, 2016) ("Doan argues that only the contracts with the Sheriff's Office were transferred, and that the contract enlisting the services of "CPS at the Bristol County House of Correction was explicitly between CPS and Bristol County. This argument is unavailing. As the contract itself shows, the signatures of the Bristol County Commissioners were pro forma; the responsibilities of monitoring CPS lay with the Bristol County Sheriff's Office, . . . as the Bristol County Sheriff's Office was responsible for administering the medical treatment provided at the Bristol County House of Correction. The monitoring of CPS was thus one such 'responsibilit[y] of the office of' the Sheriff of Bristol County that was transferred to the state. . . .The failure to train and supervise Count against Bristol County must be dismissed. . . .As recounted above, Chapter 61 of the Acts of 2009 transferred the 'office [ ] of the ... Bristol... county sheriff [ ] ... to the [C]ommonwealth' of Massachusetts and stated that all functions and responsibilities of the Sheriff's Office were transferred to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. . . The Act further provided that 'all employees of the office of a transferred sheriff [were] transferred to that transferred sheriff as employees of the [C]ommonwealth.'. . Because of such language, it 'is well established that "modern Massachusetts Sheriff's Departments [are] arms of the state entitled to sovereign immunity."'. . Thus, '[d]espite its municipal title,' the Bristol County Sheriff's Office 'is controlled directly by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and all employees ... are employees of the Commonwealth.'. . Accordingly, the Bristol County Sheriff's Office is a state agency, and Hodgson and Borges are state officials, entitled to the sovereign immunity that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts enjoys.")

Morgan v. Middlesex Sheriff's Office, CA 14-10659-IT, 2014 WL 4104173, *4 (D. Mass. Aug. 13, 2014) ("To the extent Morgan brings this action against the Middlesex Sheriff's Office, the complaint fails to state a claim for relief. The Eleventh Amendment of the United States Constitution generally is recognized as a bar to suits in federal courts against a State, its departments and its agencies, unless the State has consented to suit or Congress has overridden the State's immunity. . .The Middlesex Sheriff's Office became a state agency in 1999 when the government of Middlesex County was abolished along with several other counties. . .Under the Eleventh Amendment, 'an arm of the state government ... enjoys Eleventh Amendment immunity from suits for money damages brought in federal court, absent consent, waiver, or the like.'. .Here, the Middlesex Sheriff's Office is an 'arm' of the Commonwealth and, as such, Eleventh Amendment state sovereign immunity prohibits an individual damages suit against a nonconsenting state in federal court. . . . Thus, plaintiff's claim against the Middlesex Sheriff's Office is subject to dismissal." footnotes omitted)

Canales v. Gatnuzis, 979 F.Supp.2d 164, 171 (D. Mass. 2013) ("On January 1, 2010, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts assumed control of the Suffolk County Sheriff's Department. . . The Sheriff's Department and its employees, acting in their official capacities, are therefore to be treated as the Commonwealth itself for purposes of this suit. Consequently, the claims in Count V must be dismissed against the Sheriff's Department and Defendants Cabral and Horgan to the extent they were acting in their official capacities and against Defendant Gatzunis.")

Broner v. Flynn, 311 F.Supp.2d 227, 233 (D. Mass. 2004) ("Effective July 1, 1998, the government of Worcester County was abolished. Effective September 1, 1998, the Sheriff of Worcester County, who was then and continues to be, John M. Flynn, became an officer and employee of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and all of the 'functions, duties and responsibilities for the operation and management of' the WCJHC were transferred to the Commonwealth. Mass. Gen. Laws ch. 34(B), '' 1, 12 (2004). Therefore, a Section 1983 suit against Sheriff Flynn in his official capacity is deemed to be a suit against the Commonwealth. Since a state is not a 'person' for purposes, all claims against Sheriff Flynn in his official capacity are barred.").

New Hampshire

Ramsay v. McCormack, No. CIV. 98-408-JD, 1999 WL 814366, at *6 (D.N.H. June 29, 1999) (not reported) ("The court concludes that New Hampshire Supreme Court precedent concerning the authority of the attorney general, establishing the county attorney as the deputy of the attorney general in local criminal proceedings, its expansive interpretation of section 7:11, and the second clause of section 7:6 which broadly states 'the attorney general shall enforce the criminal laws of the state,' compels the conclusion that the county attorney functions under the authority of the attorney general in criminal prosecution in the district courts. Therefore, the court rules that in fulfilling his criminal prosecutorial duties, the county attorney acts pursuant to authority vested by state law in the attorney general and under the control of the attorney general, and does not function as a final policy maker for the county. Moreover, it has previously been determined by this court that county attorneys, when fulfilling their criminal prosecutorial duties under the direction and control of the attorney general, do not act as final policymakers for section 1983 liability purposes.").

SECOND CIRCUIT

New York

Bellamy v. City of New York, 914 F.3d 727, 756-61 (2d Cir. 2019) ("Bellamy proffers two theories of Monell liability: (i) the prosecution failed to disclose the full relocation benefits Sanchez received from the QCDA's office, a Brady violation that was caused by a deliberate information barrier imposed by the QCDA that purposefully kept prosecutors unaware of the full benefits received by witnesses in its witness protection program ("WPP"); and (ii) ADA Guy's improper summation was a due process violation caused by the QCDA office's failure to discipline summation misconduct. . . The City challenges Bellamy's Monell claims on two general grounds: (i) the City is not responsible as a matter of law under Monell for the alleged policies of the QCDA; and (ii) regardless, Bellamy did not sufficiently establish underlying due process violations to withstand summary judgment. . . We disagree with both contentions and vacate the district court's dismissal of Bellamy's Monell claims. . . . The City argues that it cannot be held liable as a matter of law for any constitutional harms inflicted by the alleged policies of the QCDA's office that give rise to Bellamy's Monell claims because those were not policies for which the City is responsible. The district court agreed, but we do not. Monell liability attaches only where an infringement of constitutional rights is caused by a local government policy. . . In searching for the proper local government that is subject to liability on a given Monell claim we look for 'those official or governmental bodies who speak with final policymaking authority ... concerning the action alleged to have caused the particular ... violation at issue.'. . The issue for us is thus whether the City of New York is the 'final policymaking authority' in relation to the alleged QCDA policies at issue here: the WPP information barrier and the failure to discipline summation misconduct. The City argues, as the district court concluded, that pursuant to Van de Kamp v. Goldstein, 555 U.S. 335 (2009), the challenged conduct of the QCDA's office is necessarily a function of state policies, and therefore the City may not be subject to Monell liability as a matter of law. We think this argument overextends Van de Kamp, a case assessing the distinct doctrine of prosecutorial immunity, and that our controlling precedent plainly establishes that the City may be held liable under Monell for the alleged QCDA policies at issue. On numerous occasions we have been called upon to assess how plaintiffs may pursue claims under Monell that allege that policies of prosecutors' offices led to infringements of their constitutional rights. To adequately explain why we conclude that the City is a proper defendant with respect to Bellamy's Monell claims here, a brief review of these cases will be helpful. [court engages in discussion of cases] Because we have never doubted the rule stemming from the line of cases extending from Gentile and Walker to Myers, we have been consistent in holding that the actions of county prosecutors in New York are generally controlled by municipal policymakers for purposes of Monell, with a narrow exception emanating from Baez being the decision of whether, and on what charges, to prosecute. Thus, in this case, the rule from these cases requires the conclusion that the conduct Bellamy challenges is a result of municipal rather than state policymaking. The City does not dispute this reasoning based on our precedents, informed along the way by the Court's decision in McMillian. The City's sole contention is that our Walker line of cases was implicitly abrogated by the Supreme Court's 2009 decision in Van de Kamp, 'requir[ing] a different boundary between prosecutorial and administrative functions than the one [we have] previously set forth.'. . We disagree. . . . Although Van de Kamp said nothing about Monell or municipal liability, the City argues that Van de Kamp affects how Monell claims can proceed against prosecutors' offices specifically. Its argument is as follows. In the Walker line of cases, we concluded that inherently prosecutorial functions (i.e., decisions whether to prosecute) are controlled by state policies for purposes of Monell, and other functions of the prosecutor are controlled by municipal policies. For example, in Baez, the act of indicting based on a misread grand jury verdict form was inherently prosecutorial and therefore a state function, but, in Walker, the failure to train on Brady obligations related to the district attorney's management of the office, and we therefore concluded that was a municipal function. Consequently, the argument goes, our Monell cases have drawn separate circles around 'prosecutorial' and 'managerial' functions, with the former circle being state-controlled functions and the latter municipally-controlled ones. The argument then goes that although our cases have narrowed the 'prosecutorial' circle such that it includes only the prosecutor's decision to bring charges, Van de Kamp expanded the circle of prosecutorial functions to include a failure to train on Brady obligations (which, the City argues, is akin to Bellamy's arguments here). Thus, the argument concludes, because Bellamy's claims pertain to conduct that now falls within the 'prosecutorial' circle, and New York concludes 'prosecutorial' conduct is a state function, the conduct supporting Bellamy's Monell claims must be a state rather than a municipal function. We are unpersuaded. The key flaw in the City's argument is its unsupported assumption that the circle demarcating what is a 'prosecutorial' function for purposes of prosecutorial immunity is necessarily the same as the circle New York has chosen to demarcate state versus local prosecutorial functions. But, the legal question of when immunity should attach is an entirely separate inquiry from which state entity is a final policymaker for Monell. This was the reasoning adopted in Goldstein v. City of Long Beach, 715 F.3d 750 (9th Cir. 2013), the lower court decision that followed the Supreme Court's remand in Van de Kamp. Although the Court had rejected plaintiff's individual claims, the Ninth Circuit was left to evaluate plaintiff's remaining Monell claims. The defendants argued on remand, as the City does here, that 'Van de Kamp determines the outcome' of the Monell claims. . .The Ninth Circuit rejected the argument because 'inquiries of prosecutorial immunity and state or local policymaking ... are separate.'. . . We agree. In contrast to the immunity inquiry, Monell addresses not whether certain functions can open individuals to liability, but simply which governmental entity (the state or the municipality) is responsible for a given function. And as we have discussed, the Supreme Court has left no doubt that state law, not federal law, is responsible for demarcating that division of responsibility. The McMillian court was worried about imposing 'a uniform, national characterization' of state actors, concerned that 'such a blunderbuss approach would ignore a crucial axiom of our government: the States have wide authority to set up their state and local governments as they wish.'. . Consequently, the responsible entity for purposes of Monell liability must be ascertained by looking at how the relevant state elects to allocate responsibilities between itself and its subdivisions. . .The City's contention, if adopted, would turn McMillian on its head: it would require courts assessing Monell claims that challenge the conduct of prosecutors to consider the way in which the federal system chooses to immunize prosecutors in determining which functions are state functions and which are local ones. Stated differently, under the City's formulation, we would no longer be looking to the intricacies of state law to decide a Monell claim against a prosecutor's office, as we did in Myers (at the express direction of McMillian), but would instead look to Van de Kamp, a decision exclusively assessing federal common law and federal policy. . . Such a course would adversely affect state reliance interests as well: New York appellate courts have expressly affirmed our conclusions as to the content of New York law in Walker and Myers. See Ramos, 285 A.D.2d at 303 (concluding as 'firmly grounded in New York law,' the conclusion from Gentile, Walker, and Myers that 'where prosecutors, pursuant to policy or custom, conceal exculpatory evidence and commit other wrongs in order to secure a conviction, liability rests with the county (or for New York City's constituent counties, the City)'); Johnson v. Kings Cnty. Dist. Atty's Office, 308 A.D.2d 278, 295–96 (2d Dep't 2003) (same). Thus we conclude, consistent with our precedent, that the City is the proper policymaking authority for purposes of Bellamy's Monell claims.")

Jeffes v. Barnes, 208 F.3d 49, 57, 58, 60, 61 (2d Cir. 2000) ("In sum, the question of whether a given official is the municipality's final policymaking official in a given area is a matter of law to be decided by the court. Where a plaintiff relies not on a formally declared or ratified policy, but rather on the theory that the conduct of a given official represents official policy, it is incumbent on the plaintiff to establish that element as a matter of law. We thus reject plaintiffs' contention that the district court erred in imposing that burden on them; and we turn to the question of whether, as to the particular area at issue here, the burden was met. . . . The principal area in question in this suit involves the duties and obligations of the sheriff's staff members toward each other with respect to their exercise of First Amendment rights in breach of the Jail's code of silence. The following review of New York State ("State") law leads us to the conclusion that the Schenectady County sheriff was the County's final policymaker with respect to most of the conduct that plaintiffs challenge. . . . In sum, State law requires that the Schenectady County sheriff be elected; County law provides that elected officials are not subject to supervision or control by the County's chief executive officer; there is only routine civil service supervision over the sheriff's appointments; State law places the sheriff in charge of the Jail; and the County's chief executive officer, advised by the County's attorneys, treats the sheriff, insofar as Jail operations are concerned, as "autonomous." . . . . The County has pointed us to no provision of State or local law that requires a sheriff to answer to any other entity in the management of his jail staff with respect to the existence or enforcement of a code of silence. We conclude that Sheriff Barnes was, as a matter of law, the County's final policymaking official with respect to the conduct of his staff members toward fellow officers who exercise their First Amendment rights to speak publicly or to inform government investigators of their co-workers' wrongdoing.").

Walker v. City of New York, 974 F.2d 293, 301 (2d Cir. 1992) (explaining that when prosecuting a criminal matter, a district attorney represents the State not the county, but that in managing the district attorney's office, the district attorney acts as a county policymaker).

Howard v. City of Rochester, No. 23-CV-6561-FPG, 2025 WL 860306, at *6 (W.D.N.Y. Mar. 19, 2025) (" 'Where a district attorney acts as the manager of the district attorney's office, the district attorney acts as a county policymaker' Walker v. City of New York, 974 F.2d 293, 301 (2d Cir. 1992) (district attorney's office not immune from municipal liability under Monell for managerial functions, such as a 'decision not to supervise or train ADAs on Brady' issues).")

Newson v. City of New York, No. 16CV6773ILGJO, 2019 WL 3997466, at *3 n.6 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 23, 2019) ("The City argues that the Supreme Court's decision in Van de Kamp v. Goldstein, 555 U.S. 335 (2009) precludes a municipality from being held liable for its prosecutors' decisions concerning the disclosure of exculpatory or impeachment evidence. . . The Second Circuit rejected this precise argument in Bellamy, 914 F.3d at 759-760, which was decided after briefing was concluded on this motion. As the Second Circuit noted, 'Van de Kamp said nothing about Monell or municipal liability' and simply held that prosecutorial immunity extends to individual supervisors who 'fail[ ] to train or supervise their prosecutors to prevent violations of the duty to disclose impeachment material.'")

Case v. Anderson, No. 16 CIV. 983 (NSR), 2017 WL 3701863, at *19-20 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 25, 2017) ("Here, Plaintiff alleges municipality liability on that basis that a municipal 'custom, policy, or usage can be inferred from evidence of deliberate indifference of supervisory officials,' here the Sheriff, 'to such abuses.'. . . . Thus, the Court must determine whether, on the basis of Plaintiff's allegations, the Sheriff can be considered a final policymaker concerning the treatment of detainees at the County jail and the County therefore may be potentially liable for his actions based on the situation Mr. Pankey confronted. . . As Plaintiff alleges the Sheriff has control over the policies at the jail . . . , which is supported by New York law, see N.Y. Corr. Law § 500-c ("the sheriff of each county shall have custody of the county jail of such county"), the Court can infer at this stage that the Sheriff is indeed a final policymaker. The required 'nexus' between 'the sheriff's actions and his job functions' can also plausibly be inferred since the alleged deprivations occurred during a standard intake at the jail. . . Moreover, given Plaintiff's allegations that the Sheriff was directly involved in transferring Mr. Pankey from the Town Court to the County Jail, . . . his knowledge of Mr. Pankey's mental health issues, and his supervision of the County Deputies once Mr. Pankey was held on the warrant, Plaintiff plausibly alleges the Sheriff should have had enough awareness of these issues that it represents 'a failure by policymakers to provide adequate training or supervision to subordinates to such an extent that it amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of those who come into contact with the municipal employees.'. . . Plaintiff's additional conclusory arguments, however, that the Sheriff implemented, e.g., a fiscally-driven policy to avoid placing guards on 24-hour watch . . . , fail to plausibly allege either the existence of a municipal policy or the Sheriff's involvement. Therefore, at this stage, Plaintiff plausibly, though only barely, states a claim against the County. . . The Court agrees with the County that 'as [Plaintiff's] claim against [Sheriff Anderson falls, so falls [the] claim against the County.'. . Whether the Sheriff's personal involvement and notice of Mr. Pankey's condition will be borne out by the record is a question for either summary judgment or trial, which will necessarily impact the claim against the County.

Bailey v. City of New York, 79 F.Supp.3d 424, 453-54 (E.D.N.Y. 2015) ("For purposes of determining Monell liability, the relationship between the City of New York and district attorneys was explored in Jones v. City of N.Y., 988 F.Supp.2d 305 (E.D.N.Y.2013). Jones concluded that the City of New York is not responsible for the training policies or practices of the District Attorney regarding prosecutorial conduct, including the failure to train ADAs not to suppress exculpatory evidence in criminal proceedings. . . But a 'long and persistent history of feckless training and discipline practices [by a district attorney] ... might give rise to municipal liability.'. . A decision by a district attorney not to train assistants in their legal duty to avoid violating constitutional rights rises to an official government policy for section 1983 purposes only if the failure to train amounts to '"deliberate indifference to the rights of persons with whom the untrained employees come into contact."'. . Three requirements must be met before a district attorney's failure to train or supervise will be considered to amount to deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of citizens. . .The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit described these requirements as follows: First, the plaintiff must show that a [district attorney] knows ... that her employees will confront a given situation....Second, the plaintiff must show that the situation either presents the employee with a difficult choice of the sort that training or supervision will make less difficult or that there is a history of employees mishandling the situation.... Finally, the plaintiff must show that the wrong choice by the [district attorney] employee will frequently cause the deprivation of a citizen's constitutional rights. . . .It is anomalous that under Monell and New York law, while the City has no control over what happens in the District Attorney's office respecting prosecutions, it must pay the bill if the prosecutor violates Monell. . . Even if the District Attorney's office had a pattern or practice of disclosing Brady material at the eleventh hour, or allowed such a pattern or practice to develop knowingly, it is unfair and a 'Catch–22' situation for the City to be held liable. . . Given the materials submitted by plaintiff suggesting a possible pattern and practice by the District Attorney of Kings County in violation of the Constitution, the Monell issue cannot be swept under the rug. . . The fact that a new district attorney has been elected by voters, while possibly of political significance, does not bear on the constitutional issue central to this case. . . It is the pattern and practice at the time before the election of a new district attorney of Kings County when events relevant to the present cases were taking place that controls. While discovery on the Monell claim is still pending, defendants' motion for summary judgment regarding plaintiff's municipal liability claim is denied.") Norton v. Town of Brookhaven, 33 F.Supp.3d 215, 243-44 (E.D.N.Y. 2014) ("To the extent the Plaintiff argues that the alleged current practices of the District Attorney is administrative in nature and not related to his prosecutorial function, the Supreme Court has examined, in an immunity context, the issue of supervisory liability and failure to adequately train within the office of a prosecutor, and has held that matters of supervision and training with the prosecutor's basic trial advocacy duties will be considered prosecutorial in nature and not administrative. . . .Here, although the County does not seek to avoid declaratory relief on the grounds of absolute prosecutorial immunity, the Court nonetheless finds that such relief is inappropriate under Van de Kamp. In the Court's view, the Plaintiff's allegation that the District Attorney delegates the prosecution of petty Town offenses to the Town Attorney, without sufficient oversight, is simply another way of claiming that the District Attorney has failed to adequately supervise or train those attorneys in their basic trial advocacy duties. As the practice the Plaintiff challenges is directly related to the District Attorney's discretion to prosecute, the County cannot be held to dictate such policies. Accordingly, the Plaintiff's request for declaratory relief against the County is denied and the Second Amended Complaint as against the County is dismissed in its entirety. . . . Here, the Second Amended Complaint alleges that the acts by Quinlan, Moran and Biscardi were acts of policymakers . . . . [T]he Court finds that the Plaintiff has set forth sufficient allegations to support Monell liability against the Town. The Brookhaven Defendants argue that, in the event this Court grants absolute immunity to the Individual Defendants, the Monell claims must be dismissed. However, ' "municipalities have no immunity from damages for liability flowing from their constitutional violations."'. . Thus, the Brookhaven Defendants' arguments, which 'reflect[ ] a misunderstanding of the relationship between the liability of individual actors and municipal liability for purposes of Monell,' should be rejected.")

Jones v. City of New York, 988 F.Supp.2d 305, 315-17 (E.D.N.Y. 2013) ("Walker left unexplained the basis for its assumption that the City of New York is the municipal entity for which the Kings County District Attorney is the policymaker when deciding training policies regarding legal responsibilities of ADAs in their prosecutorial functions. Given the District Attorney's absolute independence with respect to decisions on procedures in prosecuting criminal cases, it seems strange to hold the City responsible for prosecutorial policy choices made by the district attorney. The effect of treating a district attorney as a City policymaker in these situations is to hold the City or county liable for policies made by a district attorney when no officer or agency of the City, including the Mayor, exercises any authority to control the decision. . .Yet, although Walker does not spell them out, peculiarities in New York law require this puzzling result. Under New York State law the Office of the District Attorney does not itself have a legal existence separate from the District Attorney. . . The Kings County District Attorney's Office cannot, as such, be the governmental unit liable for a Monell claim based on a problematic policy or custom within the Office. The City of New York, by contrast, is a legally distinct, suable municipal entity. It is also the local governmental unit responsible for paying the salaries of the county district attorneys and for any judgments against them or their ADAs. . . Corporation Counsel for the City of New York represents the District Attorney in Section 1983 suits because it is the City office that represents the entity that will ultimately pay damages. . .The peculiar, but necessary, consequence is that the City is a proper municipal party in interest in a Monell claim based on policies or customs independently set and executed by the district attorney. Although district attorneys are New York constitutional officers, not employees of the City, in many circumstances they are considered 'local' rather than 'state' officers. . . In some 'managerial' situations it is, accordingly, appropriate to treat district attorneys as municipal policymakers. . . With respect to building management, maintenance decisions, or discrimination against employees, for example, the district attorney can be considered a municipal actor. The case at bar does not deal with such an administrative municipal policy or custom. The plaintiff here alleged prosecutorial misconduct resulted from the failure of the Kings County District Attorney to properly train its assistants not to suppress exculpatory evidence in criminal prosecutions. The Supreme Court's post-Walker decision in Van de Kamp v. Goldstein, 555 U.S. 335 (2009), establishes that the training provided by a district attorney's office to its prosecutors concerning the proper disclosure of exculpatory or impeachment material is a prosecutorial function entitled to absolute prosecutorial immunity. In Van de Kamp, the Supreme Court acknowledged that there are administrative acts performed by a prosecutor which are not entitled to absolute prosecutorial immunity, such as 'workplace hiring, payroll administration, the maintenance of physical facilities, and the like,' but it found that training concerning disclosure obligations in advance of trial—though sometimes characterized as 'administrative'—is sufficiently prosecutorial in nature to warrant the application of absolute prosecutorial immunity. . . Tasks directly connected with the prosecutor's basic trial advocacy and prosecutorial duties—including Brady decisions—should under Van de Kamp be treated as 'prosecutorial conduct.'. . Here, the function at issue is the training of ADAs in the proper disclosure of exculpatory DNA evidence. This function is inextricably connected with prosecution of criminal cases. It involves 'legal knowledge and the exercise of related discretion.'. . It is prosecutorial in nature. There is no long and persistent history of feckless training and discipline practices regarding personnel that might give rise to municipal liability. . . The City of New York is not a liable party because the instant case does not deal with what can be categorized as municipal policies or customs. The fact that the City would pay any damages assessed against a District Attorney or ADA does not change this conclusion.")

Allen v. Schiff, 908 F.Supp.2d 451, 466 (S.D.N.Y. 2012) ("[Sheriff] Schiff had final policymaking authority on drug testing Department employees, and his decision to have PS observe the Test established County policy. Therefore, the County may be liable, under Monell, for that policy.")

Vermont

Huminski v. Corsones, 396 F.3d 53, 70-73 (2d Cir. 2005) (as amended on rehearing) ("Whether a defendant is a state or local official depends on whether the defendant represented a state or a local government entity when engaged in the events at issue. [citing McMillian] To answer that question here, we must determine, inter alia, whether it was the State of Vermont or Rutland County that controlled Elrick in his involvement in the events leading up to and culminating in his serving Huminski with the trespass notices. . . . We agree with the district court that an analysis of the relevant factors indicates that Sheriff Elrick was a state official with regard to his involvement in the events related to the issuance of the trespass notices. The Rutland County Sheriff's Department, for whom Elrick was employed, had a contract with the State of Vermont through the Vermont Court Administrator's Office to manage security at the Rutland District Court. We think that Elrick was acting as a state official while doing so and when he played a role in the issuance and service of the trespass notices. First, when Elrick was performing the contract, he was acting as a supervisory policymaker for the State of Vermont, irrespective of what his status was when he performed his other duties as a sheriff. Second, it is undisputed that Elrick acted as a state official when he signed the May 27 Notice as the agent of the Commissioner, himself a state official. Third, although it is not necessary to decide the broader issue, we think that in light of the statutory structure under which Elrick acted, he was likely a state official when he was performing his general duties for the sheriff's department, particularly when he was acting pursuant to state law, as he was with respect to the Huminski incident. State statute establishes the most important factor in this inquiry, see McMillian, 520 U.S. at 790: Elrick had the authority to investigate and enforce the State of Vermont's criminal law in Rutland County. He was therefore acting for the state when he engaged in the behavior that is at issue here. It follows that Elrick is immune in his official capacity from suit for retrospective relief. Because Elrick is entitled to sovereign immunity, we also affirm the district court's holding that the Rutland County Sheriff's Department is similarly immune.' [footnotes omitted])

Poleo-Keefe v. Bergeron, No. 2:06-CV-221, 2008 WL 3992636, at *3 (D. Vt. Aug. 28, 2008) ("While Vermont sheriffs have been held to be state actors in other cases, their roles as state actors have been limited to law enforcement and security duties. . . Sheriff Bergeron's supervisory duties here were different in nature from his law enforcement duties. He was not performing the traditional state role of keeping the peace; rather, he was acting as a employee supervisor. . . .Therefore, Sheriff Bergeron acted as a County official and sovereign immunity does not apply.")

THIRD CIRCUIT

New Jersey

Johnson v. Duncan, 719 F. App'x 144 (3d Cir. 2017) ("Hudson County and its Sheriff's Department are agents of the state of New Jersey for Eleventh Amendment purposes and therefore not amenable to suit in federal court, see Wright v. State, 778 A.2d 443 (N.J. 2001). . . Accordingly, we uphold the sua sponte dismissal of the complaint in its entirety as to Hudson County and its Sheriff's Department and defendants Duncan and Bernouy to the extent that they were sued in their official capacities.")

Estate of Lagano v. Bergen Cnty. Prosecutor's Office, 769 F.3d 850, 856 (3d Cir. 2014) ("These allegations support a reasonable inference that neither Mordaga nor the BCPO acted within their classic investigatory and prosecutorial functions with respect to the state-created danger claim advanced by the Estate. Accordingly, the District Court erred in holding that the amended complaint alleged that the BCPO and Mordaga acted exclusively in classic law enforcement and investigative functions so as to make them part of the State and thus not amenable to suit under §§ 1983 and 1985. Even if the amended complaint could not be viewed as alleging conduct outside classic law enforcement and investigative functions, the dismissal as to Mordaga was incorrect for an additional reason. Mordaga is sued not only in his official capacity, but also in his personal capacity. . . Accordingly, he most certainly is amenable to suit as a 'person' under §§ 1983 and 1985. [citing Hafer]")

Estate of Lagano v. Bergen Cnty. Prosecutor's Office, 769 F.3d 850, 857-58 (3d Cir. 2014) ("Sovereign immunity extends to state agencies and state officers, 'as long as the state is the real party in interest.'. . It does not extend to counties and municipalities. . . To determine whether the state is the real party in interest, this Court considers three factors: (1) whether the money to pay for the judgment would come from the state; (2) the status of the agency under state law; and (3) what degree of autonomy the agency has. Fitchik, 873 F.2d at 659. Rather than applying Fitchik to the facts alleged by the Estate to reach the conclusion that the BCPO was entitled to Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity, the District Court relied solely on our decision in Coleman. The District Court's reading of Coleman is erroneous. First, Coleman never mentions Fitchik. And second, Coleman does not address Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity. Instead, Coleman focuses on the question of what entities and public officials may be regarded as arms and officials of the State for the purpose of determining whether the named entity and public official are to be regarded as 'persons' subject to suit under § 1983. The District Court's analysis improperly conflates the jurisprudence interpreting the term 'person' in the context of § 1983 with the concept of Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity. Although the existence of Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity was a factor considered by the Supreme Court in Will, the two concepts are analytically distinct. . . Appellees point to our unpublished decision in Beightler v. Office of Essex Cnty. Prosecutor, 342 Fed.Appx. 829, 832 (3d Cir.2009) (per curiam), which stated that Coleman 'essentially analyzed the same factors presented in Fitchik,' as support for the District Court's conclusion that the Fitchik factors are met any time a court finds that county prosecutors act as arms of the state by performing classic law enforcement functions. However, we are not bound or persuaded by Beightler's statement that the Fitchik inquiry is satisfied whenever a county prosecutor engages in classic prosecutorial functions. We therefore conclude that Fitchik provides the proper framework for analyzing Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity as it applies to county prosecutors, and on remand the District Court must apply Fitchik to determine whether the BCPO is entitled to Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity in this case.")

Coleman v. Kaye, 87 F.3d 1491, 1499-1506 (3d Cir.1996) (for § 1983 purposes, New Jersey county prosecutor made policy for county when refusing to promote investigator).

Evans v. City of Newark, No. CV1400120KMMAH, 2016 WL 2742862, at *9-10 (D.N.J. May 10, 2016) ("As stated above, the State and its employees are not 'persons' under § 1983 or the NJCRA. It follows that, if ECPO and its employees (sued in their official capacities) were acting as an arm of the State when performing the acts of which Evans complains, then they are not 'persons' amenable to suit. If acting as local, county officials, however, they may be amenable to suit as 'persons.' See Lagano, 769 F.3d at 855. As the preceding paragraph implies, New Jersey county prosecutors' offices sit uneasily astride the division between State and local entities. Sometimes they act in one capacity, and sometimes in the other . . . .To simplify a bit, the prosecutor's staffing and administrative functions flow from the County. Thus, Coleman held that, when dealing with personnel matters, a county prosecutor's office acted in its administrative capacity as part of county government. It therefore was a 'person' which could be sued under § 1983 for employment-related discrimination. . . As to enforcement of the criminal law, however, the county prosecutor acts as a State official. The prosecutor is a gubernatorially-appointed official of the State of New Jersey, pursuant to the State Constitution, who acts under the oversight of the State Attorney General. . . Thus, where a county prosecutor and his detectives conducted an allegedly illegal search, they acted as part of the State government, because their conduct arose from their 'investigation of criminal activity.'. . When performing such law enforcement functions, prosecutors act as State officials, and therefore are not 'persons' amenable to suit under § 1983. . . Here, the misconduct alleged against the ECPO defendants in their official capacities arises from their law enforcement and prosecutorial functions. For example, the investigators are alleged to have introduced 'fabricated' evidence for the purpose of obtaining an arrest warrant or indictment. . . The prosecutors are alleged to have presented to the grand jury evidence that was false and incomplete, in that it omitted exculpatory facts and credulously relied on the testimony of a 'convicted felon.'. . In performing those acts, the ECPO defendants were discharging essential prosecutorial functions; it follows that they were then acting as an arm of the State. ECPO, as well as the individual ECPO defendants insofar as they are sued in their official capacities, are not 'persons' under § 1983 or the NJCRA. The motion to dismiss all § 1983 and NJCRA claims asserted in Counts 1-5 against the ECPO, and against the ECPO defendants in their official capacities, is therefore granted.")

Adams v. City of Atlantic City, No. 13–7133 (JBS/AMD), 2014 WL 2094090, *3-*5, *10 (D.N.J. May 20, 2014) ("Plaintiff concedes that ACPO employees 'were acting in their law enforcement/investigatory capacity when they carried out a policy and practice of failing to conduct meaningful investigations of civilian complaints against Atlantic City Police officers ... and when they failed to supervise and/or discipline said police officers.'. . However, Plaintiff contends that his claim against the County is that the 'the Atlantic County Prosecutor's Office, Investigative Unit has adopted an official policy or custom ... of failing to investigate citizen complaints of police abuse and failing to supervise or discipline officers against whom legitimate complaints of misconduct have been lodged.'. . Plaintiff argues that the County can be held liable for policies or practices at the ACPO. . . In reply, the County argues that it 'is not the policy-maker with regard to law enforcement functions of the Prosecutor's Office.'. . The County contends that the New Jersey Attorney General 'is charged with supervising County Prosecutors in all law enforcement matters,' and if the ACPO 'had a policy of failing to investigate complaints, the municipality of Atlantic County would have no discretion to interfere with those decisions.'. . . Plaintiff concedes that the employees were acting in a law enforcement or investigatory capacity at all relevant times, and, therefore, under New Jersey law, the employees were acting as agents of the state. . . .The Court also agrees that the County is not responsible for, or capable of enacting, policies relating to law enforcement activities at the ACPO. . . . The ACPO is a constitutionally established office, with county prosecutors nominated and appointed by the Governor. . . The New Jersey Attorney General is responsible for supervising the ACPO's law enforcement activities, and, by statute, may supersede the county prosecutor for the purpose of prosecuting all criminal business of the state in that county. . . .Plaintiff concedes that the ACPO employees were acting in a 'law enforcement/investigatory capacity when they carried out [the] policy and practice' at issue here. It follows that the alleged policy itself—concerning investigations of civilian complaints against police officers—relates to the 'law enforcement/investigatory' duties of the ACPO. Indeed, the alleged policy or practice does not relate to the kinds of administrative duties at the prosecutor's office for which counties may be held liable. . . The state, via the Attorney General, is responsible for the law enforcement policies at the ACPO, and therefore, the County is not a proper defendant to claims related to policies concerning the investigation of citizen complaints. Plaintiff's claim against the County for alleged illegal policy or practice will be dismissed with prejudice. Courts likewise have held that 'training and supervisory activities are prosecutorial functions,' and therefore the responsibility of the state, not the county. . . Plaintiff's claims against the County premised on a policy related to the supervision of police officers, or the failure to train and supervise police officers, are dismissed with prejudice. . . .Here, as previously discussed, the ACPO is a hybrid entity that acts on behalf of, and under the supervision of, the state when its prosecutors act in a law enforcement or investigatory capacity. Plaintiff concedes that the ACPO Defendants were acting in a law enforcement or investigatory capacity. Defendants further represent, without objection by Plaintiff, that the 'State of New Jersey has agreed to defend and indemnify these moving Defendants since they are employees of the Atlantic County Prosecutor's Office.'. . All factors favor holding that the ACPO was acting as an arm of the state, and therefore, without any indication that the state waived immunity in this case, the Court will dismiss with prejudice all claims against the ACPO Defendants in their official capacities.")

Hailey v. City of Camden, Civil No. 01-3967 (JBS/JS), 2009 WL 1228492, at *12, *13, *15 (D.N.J. Apr. 29, 2009) ("Both Plaintiffs and Defendants offer Norton Bonaparte, as the Business Administrator for Camden, as the final policymaker for the City on employment matters. . . . Defendants agree that Mr. Bonaparte was responsible, but argue that the City cannot be held liable for his conduct because he was a State of New Jersey employee over whom they had no control. As previously discussed, the final policymaking official must be considered to be acting as a municipal official rather than a state official in order for municipal liability to attach. . .Rather than look to labeling, the key question is whether the State, rather than the municipality, controlled the official when he was performing the particular function that is alleged to have resulted in an injury under Sections 1981 and 1983. . . .As discussed, under New Jersey law, absent actual exertion of control by the State, the Business Administrator of Camden is most definitely a municipal employee when performing all his functions. . . The mere existence of the State's authority to appoint and remove does not prove that it chose to exercise that authority through Mr. Bonaparte or, in particular, with regards to promotions to the rank of Deputy Chief in the Department of Fire. As the court in Kenny observed, all local governments are generally subject to control of the state. . . If the mere prospect of control by the state were sufficient, this would vitiate municipal liability in every instance. . . .It is the role of the trial judge to determine, guided by final policymaker jurisprudence and consistent with state law, who was the final policymaker and whether his actions in this case could be ascribed to the City. . . That determination was not made, the error was not harmless, and it requires a new trial.")

Pennsylvania

Benn v. First Judicial District of Pennsylvania, 426 F.3d 233, 240, 241 (3d Cir. 2005) ("Benn recognizes that neither cities nor counties partake of Pennsylvania's Eleventh Amendment immunity. He thus argues that the Judicial District is 'merely a local entity undeserving of the protection of the Eleventh Amendment,' . . . and notes that his paycheck was issued by the City of Philadelphia; the union to which he belonged negotiated its contracts with the City; he was required to live within Philadelphia city limits; and the car he was given for work assignments was owned by the City. . . . We noted in Callahan that the statutory funding scheme for state courts places considerable financial responsibility for the operation of the courts onto the counties. . . . What is significant in County of Allegheny, for the issue before us, is that under the Pennsylvania Supreme Court's interpretation of the state constitution, the Judicial District and its counterparts are state entities. That they are locally funded may be problematic for a variety of reasons, but it does not transform them into local entities for Eleventh Amendment purposes. Nor is it decisive of the Judicial District's entitlement to immunity that the City may have an agreement for indemnification with the Judicial District, as Benn asserts. That question was decisively answered by the Supreme Court in Doe, where the Court stated, '[t]he Eleventh Amendment protects the State from the risk of adverse judgments even though the State may be indemnified by a third party.'. . The Pennsylvania constitution envisions a unified state judicial system, of which the Judicial District is an integral component. From a holistic analysis of the Judicial District's relationship with the state, it is undeniable that Pennsylvania is the real party in interest in Benn's suit and would be subjected to both indignity and an impermissible risk of legal liability if the suit were allowed to proceed. We agree with the District Court that the Judicial District has Eleventh Amendment immunity which functions as an absolute bar to Benn's ADA claim. We therefore will affirm the order granting summary judgment.").

Carter v. City of Philadelphia, 181 F.3d 339, 352 (3d Cir. 1999) (observing that other courts have noted the hybrid nature of the district attorney's office and concluding that "[t]he recurring theme that emerges from these cases is that county or municipal law enforcement officials may be State officials when they prosecute crimes or otherwise carry out policies established by the State, but serve as local policy makers when they manage or administer their own offices.").

Kitko v. Young, No. 3:10–189, 2012 WL 1969228, at *4 (W.D. Pa. May 31, 2012) ("In Pennsylvania, a district attorney acts as an agent of the county (and hence can be considered a county policymaker) when he or she 'engages in purely administrative tasks unrelated to prosecutorial functions.'. . However, 'when a local government official acts as a state policymaker, the local government cannot be responsible for the actions which constitute state, and not local, government policy.'. . The Third Circuit has made clear that when a district attorney or prosecutor participates in the search warrant process, his or her involvement is properly classified as 'an investigatory and prosecutorial function in which he acts as a state official'—not a local one. . . Accordingly, because count six relates to District Attorney Shaw's approval of the search warrant, Shaw cannot be classified as a 'policymaker' for § 1983 purposes, as he was acting within his prosecutorial function, which does not provide him with local policymaking authority. And absent such authority on the part of Shaw, Clearfield County cannot be held liable under § 1983 for his approval of the warrant.")

N.N. v. Tunkhannock Area School Dist., 801 F.Supp.2d 312, 313, 317-19 (M.D. Pa. July 8, 2011) ("This case presents the question of whether an action alleging an unreasonable search and seizure of a student's cell phone containing images protected by the First Amendment states a claim for equitable relief against county officials and a claim for damages against the county. . . . The defendants argue that because Skumanick was acting in his role as prosecutor, he was acting as an agent of the state and not the county. Thus, they argue that the county cannot be liable for his actions. . . . District attorneys act as agents of the state when they "execut[ing] their sworn duties to enforce the law by making use of all the tools lawfully available to them to combat crime."

Coleman, 87 F.3d 1491, 1499 (3d Cir.1996). When a district attorney, however, engages in purely administrative tasks unrelated to prosecutorial functions, he or she 'in effect acts on behalf of the county that is the situs of his or her office.'. . . When the function involves 'local policies relating to training, supervision and discipline,' it is properly characterized as administrative, but when it involves 'decisions about whether and how to prosecute violations of state law,' it is prosecutorial. . . Here, the plaintiff argues that Skumanick acted as a county policymaker by directing the searching of N.N.'s phone; the downloading, printing, and disseminating of N.N.'s photographs; and the interrogation and coercing of N.N. to sign a statement. N.N. argues that these actions constituted policies of improper investigation. The complaint additionally alleges that Skumanick made a policy of 'fail[ing] to require or provide appropriate in-service training or re-training of officers who were known to have improperly investigated' the school's reports of indecent images on student cell phones. The plaintiff further disclaims seeking liability based on the charging decision. The plaintiff argues that searching for evidence and training subordinates in proper search procedures do not qualify as prosecutorial acts. . . . Buckley's immunity analysis, however, is not applicable here, because the question before the Court is not whether Skumanick's actions were so closely tied to the judicial phase of criminal proceedings as to render him absolutely immune from money damages. Rather, the inquiry is whether Skumanick was acting as a policymaker for the state, in which case the county cannot be liable. In threatening prosecution against N.N., Skumanick was acting as a policymaker for the state, and no liability can attach to the county for this action. However, the plaintiff pins liability on a failure to train and supervise. . . . Thus, insofar as N.N. seeks to impose liability on the county for a failure to train related to the investigation of N.N. (as opposed to her prosecution), the claim survives dismissal. . . . Because the plaintiff has alleged liability on the basis of improper training related to investigation, she has properly pleaded a claim of municipal liability under Monell against the county. The motion for judgment in the county's favor on the grounds that Skumanick was making policy for the state will be denied.")

Wallace v. Powell, Nos. 3:09-cv-286, 3:09-cv-0291, 3:09-cv-0357, 3:09-cv-0630, 2010 WL 785253, at *6 (M.D. Pa. Mar. 1, 2010) ("In many capacities the district attorney is indeed the 'chief law enforcement officer' for Luzerne County. But after examining Pennsylvania law and in light of the Supreme Court's recent decision in Van de Kamp, I find that in making direct prosecutorial decisions in the courtroom, and in training subordinates to do the same, a district attorney is a state actor. Plaintiffs' proposed amendments with respect to Luzerne County fail to allege decisions by a final policy-maker for the municipality, and therefore, are futile.").

Jakomas v. McFalls, 229 F. Supp.2d 412, 430 (W.D. Pa. 2002) ("We have no difficulty deciding, under Pennsylvania law, that Judge McFalls was not acting as a policymaker for the County when he discharged his staff. Judge McFalls' authority to hire, supervise, and discharge his personal employees came from the Pennsylvania Supreme Court. It did not − and could not − come from the County because the County has no policymaking authority over the Pennsylvania courts.").

Williams v. Fedor, 69 F. Supp.2d 649, 660, 663 (M.D. Pa. 1999) ("As in McMillian, there is some evidence in this case to support the proposition that a Pennsylvania district attorney is a county policy maker when engaged in his law enforcement capacity. Indeed, the constitutional designation of the Pennsylvania district attorney as a county officer is a factor not present in McMillian that supports Williams' position. But that factor does not tip the scales in Williams' favor. The historical foundation for the office of district attorney − serving as a replacement for state deputy attorneys' general, with the obligation to perform the duties that had been performed by those deputy attorney's general − coupled with the district attorneys' subordinate relationship to the state's chief law enforcement officer, the Attorney General, compel the conclusion that when engaged in his or her 'basic function − enforcement of the Commonwealth's penal statutes,' . . . a district attorney in Pennsylvania represents the interests of the Commonwealth and not the County. . . . [But] when the focus of the plaintiff's civil rights claims are on the administration of the district attorney's office, the district attorney is regarded as an official of the county so that the county may be held liable where the facts establish a failure to train or supervise that evidences a deliberate indifference to the rights of the plaintiff."), aff'd, 211 F.3d 1263 (3d Cir. 2000).

Morgan v. Rossi, No. Civ. A. 96-1536, 1998175604, 9-12 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 15, 1998) (not reported) ("The parties agree that Rossi has 'final policymaking authority' with respect to his decisions regarding the employment of his deputies. The parties, however, disagree about whether he is a policymaker for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania or for Lehigh County. . . . The question here is whether sheriffs in Pennsylvania act as county or state officials when they decide to dismiss deputies. In contrast to the Alabama Constitution, the Pennsylvania Constitution explicitly states that sheriffs are county officers. . . . Sheriffs and deputies are County employees paid by the County, and the sheriff's office (i.e., equipment, staffing, etc.) is also funded by the County. Sheriffs are elected locally and their jurisdiction is limited to the County in which they serve. . . . As to the actual hiring and firing of individual deputies, neither the Commonwealth nor the County have much input or control over the sheriff's decisions. Both the State and the County, however, have provisions concerning the employment of deputies. . . . [W]hile there are State and County provisions related to the hiring of deputies, there are no such provisions constraining sheriffs' discretion in dismissing deputy sheriffs. . . . After balancing the respective roles of Lehigh County and the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in Rossi's decision to dismiss plaintiffs, as required by McMillian, I conclude that Rossi was acting as a policymaker for the County rather than the Commonwealth. The Pennsylvania Constitution explicitly lists sheriffs as County officials, and they act within their respective counties and on behalf of the County in all respects. They are elected by the County's citizens, and it is those citizens who pay their salaries, buy their patrol cars and fund their offices. In addition, it is the governing body of Lehigh County − the Board of Commissioners − which decides how many deputies are required and what their salaries will be. By contrast, the Commonwealth's connection to Sheriff Rossi is remote, and it has no proactive supervisory role whatsoever. The County contends that because it has no control over the sheriff's decision to dismiss deputies and because it had no policy about dismissing political opponents it cannot be held liable. This argument, however, misinterprets the teaching of McMillian. In McMillian, Alabama did not have a policy of intimidating witnesses or suppressing exculpatory evidence and it had no control over the sheriff's murder investigation, yet the Count concluded that the Monroe County Sheriff was a State policymaker. McMillian does not ask whether either the County or the State has a policy that plaintiff claims violated his constitutional rights or whether the County or State had control over the action alleged to have violated plaintiff's constitutional rights. Rather, it asks whether the policymaker's actions that are alleged to form the basis for plaintiff's claim are more fairly attributable to the State or to the County based on state law. I conclude, based on my review of Pennsylvania law, that Rossi's dismissal of plaintiffs is more fairly described as an action on behalf of the County rather than the State.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Maryland [decision by Delaware Supreme Court]]

Kent County v. Shepherd, 713 A.2d 290, 294, 295 (Del. 1998) (In accordance with McMillian, we have analyzed the law of Maryland with regard of the facts of this case. In Rucker v. Harford County, [558 A.2d 399, 405 (1989)] the highest court in the State of Maryland held unequivocally, as a matter of Maryland law, that county sheriffs and deputy sheriffs who are engaged in law enforcement activities are 'officials and/or employees of the State of Maryland,' rather than the county. . . . We have concluded that, under Maryland law, the State of Maryland alone is vicariously responsible for Kent County Deputy Sheriff Knapp's negligent conduct because it occurred during the course of his law enforcement duties, while he was operating a motor vehicle within the State of Delaware.")

Maryland [federal]

Holloman v. Markowski, 661 F. App'x 797, 800 (4th Cir. 2016), cert. denied, 137 S. Ct. 1342 (2017) (Holloman's allegations are too speculative to state a plausible claim for municipal liability. We thus affirm without reaching the City's argument that the police department is a state, not city, agency.")

Lane v. Anderson, 660 F. App'x 185, 197-98 & n.6 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Here, we conclude that, as a matter of Maryland law, Sheriff Anderson is not a final policymaker for Baltimore City. State law, rather than the local government, provides Sheriff Anderson with his power. See Md. Const. art. IV, § 44 (stating that the sheriff 'in each county and in Baltimore City' shall 'exercise such powers and perform such duties as now are or may hereafter be fixed by law'); Prince George's County v. Aluisi, 731 A.2d 888, 894 (Md. 1999) (explaining that, pursuant to the Maryland Constitution, 'the duties of the sheriffs are those prescribed by the common law, the enactments of the General Assembly, and the rules of the Court of Appeals'). Moreover, the Court of Appeals of Maryland has explained that the duties of sheriffs 'are determined by state law, not locally enacted ordinances.' Aluisi, 731 A.2d at 895. And here, the Charter of Baltimore City does not include the sheriff's department as a principal agency of Baltimore City, or more generally, even reference the sheriff's position or the sheriff's department within its provisions. . .With respect to a sheriff's personnel decision-making authority, state law establishes the authority for hiring and discipline, including termination processes. . . . Further, although state law does not conclusively establish the state's liability for a judgment against Sheriff Anderson in a § 1983 claim, it indicates that, in a tort claim brought pursuant to state law, the state, as opposed to Baltimore City, would cover a judgment against the sheriff based on his personnel decisions. See generally Md. Code Ann., State Fin. & Proc. § 9-108 (providing that, pursuant to the Maryland Tort Claims Act, the state of Maryland, and not Baltimore City, is liable for tort claims against a sheriff for those claims relating to "personnel and other administrative activities"); Rucker, 558 A.2d at 401 (though not deciding whether sheriffs were state or local employees for federal purposes, which was not before the court, holding sheriffs are state personnel pursuant to the Maryland Tort Claims Act -- and thus the state bore responsibility for judgments). This suggests that personnel decisions do not create local municipal liability and are not paid by the local government entity. . . In sum, we hold that Sheriff Anderson did not act as a Baltimore City policymaker when making employment and personnel decisions. Accordingly, Appellant's Monell claim was properly dismissed. . . .We note that our resolution of the Monell liability issue does not resolve the Eleventh Amendment immunity question that the district court will consider on remand.")

Dotson v. Chester, 937 F.2d 920 (4th Cir. 1991) (accepting plaintiff's argument that even if Sheriff was state officer in certain capacities, he was final policymaker for county when operating county jail).

Open Justice Baltimore v. Baltimore City Law Department, No. CV ELH-22-1901, 2023 WL 5153654, at *19–21 (D. Md. Aug. 10, 2023) ("Generally, § 1983 suits against a State for money damages are barred by the sovereign immunity embodied in the Eleventh Amendment. See Quern v. Jordan, 440 U.S. 332, 345 (1979). And, since 1867, the BPD has been regarded as a State agency under Maryland law, at least for some purposes. Mayor & City Council of Balt. v. Clark, 404 Md. 13, 23, 944 A.2d 1122, 1128 (2008); Beca v. City of Baltimore, 279 Md. 177, 180-81, 367 A.2d 478, 480 (1977). To that end, PUB. LOCAL LAWS OF MD. ("PLL"), Art. 4, § 16-2(a) (2021) states: "The Police Department of Baltimore City is hereby constituted and established as an agency and instrumentality of the State of Maryland." In Clark, for example, the Maryland high court said, 404 Md. at 28, 944 A.2d at 1131: '[N]otwithstanding the Mayor's role in appointing and removing the City's Police Commissioner, the Baltimore City Police Department is a state agency.'. . Nevertheless, the weight of authority in this District generally holds that, for purposes of § 1983, the BPD is a municipal entity, not protected by sovereign immunity. [collecting cases] Therefore, as a municipal entity, the BPD is subject to suit under § 1983.")

Burley v. Baltimore Police Department, No. CV ELH-18-1743, 2019 WL 4325295, at *28-29 (D. Md. Sept. 12, 2019) ("The question here is whether BPD is a State agency or a local one for purposes of § 1983. To determine whether an entity is sufficiently connected to a state for purposes of immunity, the Fourth Circuit has articulated a nonexclusive list of four factors to be considered: (1) whether the state will pay a judgment against the defendant entity; (2) ' "whether the entity exercises a significant degree of autonomy from the state,"' (3) ' "whether [the entity] is involved with local versus statewide concerns,"' and (4) ' "how [the entity] is treated as a matter of state law."'. . As indicated, BPD argues that it is not subject to liability with respect to plaintiffs' Monell and indemnification claims. . . . To my knowledge, the Fourth Circuit has not directly addressed this issue. In Wiley v. Mayor and City Council of Baltimore, 48 F.3d 773 (4th Cir. 1996), the Court assumed that in a § 1983 action, the BPD 'may be held accountable....' . . . However, numerous decisions in this District have said that the BPD is not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity in regard to a claim under § 1983. [collecting cases] Accordingly, plaintiffs' § 1983 claims may proceed against BPD. At this juncture, however, the issue of BPD's duty to indemnify is premature.")

Burgess v. Baltimore Police Dep't, No. CV RDB-15-0834, 2016 WL 795975, at *5-6 (D. Md. Mar. 1, 2016) ("A prerequisite for any Monell claim. . . is that the targeted entity control the offending actors. In Estate of Anderson, et al. v. Strohman, et al., 6. F. Supp. 3d 639, 644-45 (D. Md. 2014), this Court concluded that BPD officers are not employees of the City, nor did the City possess sufficient control of the officers. As the BPD is a state agency, the City simply does not exert legal control over the BPD within the ambit of Section 1983. Id. Earlier opinions of this Court had reached the opposite conclusion. See, e.g., Brown v. Tshamba, Civ. A. No. RDB-11-0609, 2011 WL 2935037 (D. Md. July 18, 2011); Humbert v. O'Malley, Civ. A. No. WDQ-11-0440, 2011 WL 6019689 (D. Md. Nov. 29, 2011); Mason v. Mayor & City Council of Baltimore, Civ. A. No. HAR-95-0041, 1995 WL 168037 (D. Md. Mar. 24, 1995); Wilcher v. Curley, 519 F. Supp. 1 (D. Md. 1980). Nevertheless, recent opinions of this Court since Anderson have held that the City does not sufficiently control the BPD for purposes of Section 1983. See, e.g., Holloman v. Rawlings-Blake, et al., Civ. A. No. CCB-14-1516, 2014 WL 7146974, at *4 (D. Md. Dec. 12, 2014); Dale v. Mayor and City Council of Baltimore City, et al., Civ. A. No. WDQ-14-2152, 2015 WL 5521815, at *3-4 (D. Md. Sept. 15, 2015). The United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit has still yet to address this precise question.[6] [fn6: The question of whether the City sufficiently controls BPD for purposes of Monell liability is pending on appeal before the Fourth Circuit in Holloman v. Markowski, et al., Case No. 15-1878 (4th Cir. Aug. 6, 2015). Preliminary briefing has concluded, but the Fourth Circuit has yet to schedule oral argument or issue any ruling on the merits or otherwise.] . . . Accordingly, this Court recognizes the weight of precedent concluding that the City of Baltimore does not exert sufficient control for purposes of Monell liability under Section 1983. Baltimore police officers are state employees free from the City's control. The City sets no policy nor practices for the BPD. While Plaintiff's proffered links between the City and the BPD—for example, the reports made by the Police Commissioner to the City, and the Mayor's recent firing of former Commissioner Anthony Batts—may demonstrate some relationship between the two entities, he has failed to demonstrate any connection between these examples and § 1983 liability. Plaintiff's assertions simply fail to overcome clear Maryland law separating the two entities. Accordingly, the City may not be held liable for the actions of the BPD, the Officer Defendants, or Van Gelder. Plaintiff's claims are thus dismissed with prejudice as to the City.")

Jackson v. Pena, 28 F.Supp.3d 423, 428 (D. Md. 2014) ("As the Court of Appeals of Maryland has noted 'consistent[ly] and unequivocal[ly],' the Baltimore Police Department is an agency of state government, not of Baltimore City. See Mayor & City Council of Balt. v. Clark, 944 A.2d 1122, 1128–30 (Md.2008). Accordingly, Maryland courts have held that the Baltimore Police Department is not an agent of Baltimore City, id., nor is Baltimore City the employer of Baltimore City police officers for tort liability purposes. . . Federal courts have repeatedly hewed to this principle, finding that Baltimore City does not exert sufficient control over the Baltimore Police Department to be held liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. See, e.g., Gray v. Kern, Civ. No. WMN–13–2270, 2014 WL 61311, at *10 (D. Md. Jan. 7, 2014); Bradley v. Balt. Police Dep't, 887 F.Supp.2d 642, 646–49 (D.Md.2012).")

Murphy-Taylor v. Hofmann, 968 F.Supp. 693, 743 (D. Md. 2013) ("This case is not analogous to Dotson; it does not involve delegation by a county to a sheriff of the governance of a particular operation that has historically been a county function, such as management of a county jail. Rather, it involves the working environment within the Sheriff's Office and personnel decisions regarding deputy sheriffs made by the Sheriff and his senior staff. As discussed in connection with the Title VII claims, the County retains some control over personnel matters with respect to deputy sheriffs, such as benefits, leave, and establishment of various policies concerning the conditions of employment. In particular, many provisions of the County's Human Resources Ordinance apply to deputy sheriffs. But, this does not indicate that the Sheriff is a County policymaker with respect to such matters. To the contrary, it indicates that the County itself retains policymaking authority within those areas.")

Paulone v. City of Frederick, No. ELH-09-2007, 2011 WL 1675237, at *11-14 (D. Md. May 3, 2011) ("For purposes of civil liability, Maryland courts ordinarily treat sheriffs as state officials. [collecting cases] Moreover, this Court has consistently taken the view that Maryland sheriffs are State, not county, actors. [collecting cases] In Dotson v. Chester, 937 F.2d 920 (4th Cir.1991), however, the Fourth Circuit upheld liability of a Maryland county for a judgment against a sheriff. Dotson involved an action brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 by inmates regarding conditions of confinement at the county jail in Dorchester County, Maryland (which, like Frederick County here, is subject to the county commissioner form of government). . . . Although plaintiff does not cite Dotson, she argues that the County is liable for ADA violations at the detention center because 'the obligation imposed by Title II of the ADA to ensure effective communication is not a law enforcement issue.'. . She contends that ADA compliance 'is an obligation of all departments of government, not only law enforcement, just like bookkeeping standards or facility maintenance.'. . While Dotson suggests that, in some circumstances, a Maryland sheriff's operation of a county detention center may give rise to county liability under § 1983, Dotson is distinguishable from this case in several important respects. First, Dotson did not concern identification of the proper nominal defendant in a claim based on county detention center management. Rather, the county sheriff was the defendant in Dotson, and the plaintiffs had obtained a judgment against him; the question before the Court was whether they could garnish county funds to satisfy that judgment. Here, the parties appear to agree that the County will ultimately be responsible to pay any judgment based on an ADA violation at the detention center. . . But, they disagree as to whether the State or the County is the proper defendant, an issue Dotson does not address. Second, and perhaps more important, Dotson was a § 1983 case, while this case arises under the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act. . . . Therefore, the task of the appellate court in Dotson was to determine whether, under the Supreme Court's Monell doctrine, the county had vested with the sheriff the 'final policymaking authority' regarding the county jail. . . In contrast, public entities are liable under principles of respondeat superior for their employees' violations of the ADA and Rehabilitation Act. . . . Accordingly, the 'final policymaking authority' analysis applied in Dotson under § 1983 is inapt in the ADA and Rehabilitation Act context. . . For the foregoing reasons, I conclude that, because the Sheriff and his deputies who operate the detention center are State employees, the State is the proper defendant for plaintiff's claims regarding her treatment at the detention center. It follows that the County is entitled to summary judgment as to plaintiff's ADA claim (Count III) and her Rehabilitation Act claim (Count IV).")

Rossignol v. Voorhaar, 321 F.Supp.2d 642, 650, 651 (D. Md. May 5, 2004) ("Both Plaintiff and the County Defendants agree that for purposes of a Monell analysis, Sheriff Voorhaar is the final policymaker concerning law enforcement in St. Mary's County. The County Defendants assert, however, that Sheriff Voorhaar and Deputy Alioto are state, not county, officers. See Md.Code Ann., State Gov't § 12-101(a)(6) (defining county sheriffs and deputy sheriffs as state personnel for purposes of the Maryland Tort Claims Act). If the Court were to agree, then the § 1983 claims against Voorhaar and Alioto in their official capacities would be barred by Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . . In concluding that the Monroe County sheriff was a state official when acting in his law enforcement capacity, the Supreme Court minimized the importance of state law provisions establishing that: (1) the sheriff's salary was paid out of the county treasury; (2) the county provided the sheriff with materials and reimbursed him for reasonable expenses; (3) the sheriff's jurisdiction was limited to the county's borders; and (4) the sheriff was elected by county voters. . . In contrast, heavy emphasis was placed on the fact that state officials maintained a degree of control over the Alabama sheriffs while the counties, lacking any law enforcement powers of their own, could not 'instruct the sheriff how to ferret out crime, how to arrest a criminal, or how to secure evidence of a crime.'. . Finally, the McMillian Court had the benefit of a persuasive Alabama Supreme Court opinion considering similar issues which held that sheriffs were state officers. . . Here, Maryland county sheriffs are also designated state constitutional officials for purposes of state law, Md. Const. art. IV § 44, with their salaries set by the state rather than the individual counties. . . Maryland's highest court has previously engaged in a detailed analysis of Maryland's Constitution and Code to conclude that a sheriff and his deputies are state employees. Rucker v. Harford County, 316 Md. 275 (1989). The same factors pointing toward the sheriff's status as a county official (compensation from country treasury, limitations on some aspects of their jurisdiction, election by county voters, etc.) may be present, but have already been all but discounted by the Supreme Court. The major difference propounded by Plaintiff between McMillian and the instant case is that St. Mary's County retains a degree of law enforcement power through its ability 'to provide for the appointment of county police and to prescribe their duties and fix their compensation.' . . This unexercised authority, however, does nothing to change the County's basic impotence to 'directly abridge the functions and duties of a sheriff under the common law and enactments of the General Assembly.' Rucker, 316 Md. at 288. Instead, direct control over the sheriff in St. Mary's and other Maryland counties remains solidly with the State General Assembly and the judiciary. . . Accordingly, this Court concludes that the St. Mary's County Sheriff and his Deputies are state officials when acting in their law enforcement capacities.").

McCauley v. Doe, No. Civ. L-02-684, 2002 WL 32325676, at *4 (D. Md. July 12, 2002) (not reported) ("Defendant Frederick County Sheriff's Office moves to dismiss on the grounds that it is not an entity capable of being sued. Suit must be filed against an entity capable of being sued. Fed.R.Civ.P. 17(b). The capacity of a governmental entity to sue or be sued is determined in accordance with the laws under which it is organized. Id. Maryland law did not establish an entity known as the 'Frederick County Sheriff's Office' that is capable of being sued. See Boyer v. State, 323 Md. 558, 594 A.2d 121, 128 n. 9 (1991). Accordingly, McCauley's suit against the Frederick County Sheriff's Office cannot be maintained and is hereby DISMISSED."), aff'd., 56 F. App'x 616, 2003 WL 932480 (4th Cir. March 10, 2003).

Kennedy v. Widdowson, 804 F. Supp. 737, 741, 742 (D. Md. 1992) ("Several federal courts have stated that a sheriff may be considered as a state or local official depending on whether his challenged actions arise out of his traditional law enforcement functions, which are considered statewide in nature." (citing cases)).

North Carolina [state]

Boyd v. Robeson County, 621 S.E.2d 1 (N.C. App. 2005) (impugning reasoning of Buchanan and holding Athat a North Carolina sheriff is a 'person' subject to suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.")

Buchanan v. Hight, 515 S.E.2d 225, 229 (N.C.App. 1999) (Sheriff acting within his statutory authority in terminating employees was a "state official," not a "person" who could be sued for money damages under § 1983).

North Carolina [federal]

Henderson Amusement, Inc. v. Good, No. 01-2462, 2003 WL 932463, at *5 (4th Cir. Mar. 10, 2003) (unpublished) ("Because we conclude that Henderson Amusement's § 1983 claim against Sheriff Good in his personal capacity fails because Henderson Amusement has not adequately alleged the deprivation of a constitutional right, it follows that the complaint does not state a claim against the sheriff in his official capacity. We therefore do not reach the issue of whether the Eleventh Amendment bars the claim against Sheriff Good in his official capacity.")

Cash v. Granville County Bd. of Educ., 242 F.3d 219, 226, 227 (4th Cir. 2001) ("[W]e conclude that upon our consideration of each of the factors identified for determining whether a governmental entity is an arm of the State and therefore one of the United States within the meaning of the Eleventh Amendment, the Granville County Board of Education appears much more akin to a county in North Carolina than to an arm of the State. . . . . In reaching our conclusion in this case, we continue to follow our jurisprudence, as stated in Harter, Gray, Bockes, and Ram Ditta, and in doing so, we believe that we are faithfully applying the relevant Eleventh Amendment jurisprudence announced by the Supreme Court in Regents, Hess, Lake Country Estates, and Mt. Healthy. We therefore reject the district court's view that the Supreme Court's recent decisions in Regents and McMillian overruled our decisions in Harter, Gray, Bockes, and Ram Ditta.").

Carter v. Barker, 225 F.3d 653 (Table), 2000 WL 1008794, at *6 (4th Cir. 2000) (indicating that Harter v. Vernon, 101 F.3d 334 (4th Cir. 1996), holding North Carolina sheriff sued in official capacity is not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity, is still good law after McMillian).

Knight v. Vernon, 214 F.3d 544, 552, 553 (4th Cir. 2000) ("North Carolina law vests the sheriff, not the county, with authority over the personnel decisions of his office. Although the county board of commissioners may fix the number of salaried employees within the sheriff's office, the sheriff 'has the exclusive right' under N.C. Gen.Stat. ' 153A-103 (1998) 'to hire, discharge, and supervise the employees in his office.' North Carolina courts interpret this statute to preclude county liability for personnel decisions made by sheriffs. . . . Because Sheriff Vernon, and not Rockingham County, had exclusive responsibility for discharging Ms. Knight, the district court properly granted summary judgment for the county on the § 1983 claims.").

Worrell v. Bedsole, 110 F.3d 62 (Table), No. 95-2816, 1997 WL 153830, *5 (4th Cir. Apr. 3, 1997) ("In North Carolina, the Office of Sheriff is a legal entity separate and distinct from the Board of County Commissioners because a sheriff is elected by the people, not employed by the county. N.C. Gen.Stat. ' 162-1. The sheriff, not the county, has final policymaking authority over the personnel decisions in his office. [cites omitted] N.C. Gen.Stat. ' 153A-103 provides that each elected sheriff 'has the exclusive right to hire, discharge, and supervise the employees in his office.' This authority may not be delegated to another person or entity. N.C. Gen.Stat. ' 162-24. We agree with the district court's conclusion that 'Bedsole's final policy-making authority over his personnel decisions in the Sheriff's Department is his alone and is not attributable to Cumberland County.'").

Engleman v. Cumberland County, No. 5:12–cv–00147–FL, 2013 WL 157065, *5, *6 (E.D.N.C. Jan. 13, 2013) ("Plaintiff's allegations of a failure by the county to train, supervise, or discipline the deputy defendants are insufficient to establish liability against the county, because it has no policymaking authority over the sheriff's department. . . Under North Carolina law, 'the sheriff, not the county encompassing his jurisdiction, has final policymaking authority over hiring, supervising, and discharging personnel in the sheriff's office.'. . Furthermore, the Supreme Court has rejected plaintiff's argument that the funding of a sheriff's department by a county necessarily equates to control over the sheriff's department. . . Plaintiff has alleged no facts on which liability could be attributed to the county. Accordingly, the claims against the county will be dismissed.").

Parker v. Bladen County, No. 7:08-CV-69-D, 2008 WL 2597654, at 2-4 & n.2 (E.D.N.C. June 27, 2008) ("Data downloaded from the officers' tasers indicated that the officers triggered their tasers a total of 38 times. . . Additionally, the officers had recently been certified to use the tasers, and use of their tasers upon Cook was the first time any of the officers had used the tasers in a non-training situation. . . . Defendants Bladen County and the Bladen County Sheriff's Department move to dismiss the complaint against them pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). . . . Under North Carolina law, sheriffs have substantial independence from county government. Sheriffs are directly elected, hold office for four-year terms, and are not employed by the Board of County Commissioners. . . Each elected sheriff 'has the exclusive right to hire, discharge, and supervise the employees in his office.' . . The sheriff may not delegate this authority to another person or entity. . . Thus, under North Carolina law, the sheriff, not the county encompassing his jurisdiction, has final policymaking authority over hiring, supervising, and discharging personnel in the sheriff's office. . . . In other words, under North Carolina law, a sheriff's deputy 'is an employee of the sheriff, not the county,' . . . and 'the control of employees hired by the sheriff is vested exclusively in the sheriff.'. . Here, plaintiff alleges that Sergeant Edwards and Deputies Nelson and Smith of the Bladen County Sheriff's Department used excessive force in attempting to detain Cook. Plaintiff also alleges that Sheriff Bunn, Bladen County, and the Bladen County Sheriff's Department failed to train and supervise these employees and acted negligently and in violation of Cook's constitutional rights in failing to have a policy on the use of tasers. These allegations are employment- and training related, and constitute personnel decisions or other law enforcement polices over which the Bladen County Sheriff (not Bladen County) maintains exclusive authority. . . That authority (and any resulting liability) is not attributable to Bladen County. . . Accordingly, defendants' motion to dismiss the amended complaint as to Bladen County is granted. . . . Plaintiff's reliance on Flood v. Hardy, 868 F.Supp. 809 (E.D.N.C.1994), which in turn relies on Dotson v. Chester, 937 F.2d 920 (4th Cir.1991), is misplaced. Dotson and Flood held that where a county sheriff serves as the final county policymaker for operating the county-funded county jail, the county may be liable under section 1983. .v.vThis case, of course, is distinguishable. See, e.g., Harter v. Vernon, 953 F.Supp. 685, 693 & n. 8 (M.D.N.C.) (drawing distinction between county sheriff's policymaking authority over running a county-funded county jail and sheriff's policymaking authority over employment decisions within the sheriff's office), aff'd, 101 F.3d 334 (4th Cir.1996).")

Blair v. County of Davidson, No. 1:05CV00011, 2006 WL 1367420, at *7, *12, *13 (M.D.N.C. May 10, 2006) ("Under state law, it is the sheriff, not the county, that has final decision making authority over the law enforcement policies and personnel of his office, and the sheriff's deputies 'are appointed by and act for the sheriff, who alone is responsible for their conduct.' . . In addition, under North Carolina law, the sheriff has exclusive custody and control of the jail in his county. . . In the present case, all of Plaintiff's allegations relate to alleged conduct by the Sheriff or his Detention Officers while Plaintiff was in their custody at the Davidson County Detention Center. Neither the Sheriff nor his Detention Officers report to the County or County Manager Hyatt, and Plaintiff has not alleged any unconstitutional policy or conduct by the County or County Manager Hyatt. Therefore, the Motion to Dismiss as to Davidson County and County Manager Hyatt will be granted, and all of the claims against Davidson County and County Manager Hyatt will be dismissed. . . . In the present case, Plaintiff brings claims against Sheriff Hedrick in his official capacity based on, inter alia, his failure to adequately supervise and train his Detention Officers and failure to prevent known constitutional violations. As noted above, North Carolina law establishes that the Sheriff is the sole law-enforcement policymaker for the county, and no other individuals have policy-making or training authority over the Sheriff or his deputies. . . Thus, Sheriff Hedrick, as the Sheriff, is the responsible policymaker who could be held liable for adopting unconstitutional policies or for failing to adopt proper policies or training if that failure amounts to deliberate indifference to the rights of citizens. In this case, viewing the allegations in the Complaint in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, and taking the allegations in the Complaint as a whole, Plaintiff appears to allege that Sheriff Hedrick inadequately trained his deputies and sanctioned unconstitutional conduct with deliberate indifference to the rights of citizens, particularly with regard to the use of tasers and the use of strip searches. Plaintiff also alleges that Sheriff Hedrick was aware of the constitutional violations and refused to prevent them. It will be Plaintiff's burden to establish that this was actually the case, but, at this stage in the litigation, the Court concludes that Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged official capacity claims against Sheriff Hedrick, and those claims will not be dismissed. . . . Finally, with respect to the claims for punitive damages, the Sheriff's Office Defendants contend that Plaintiff's claims for punitive damages should be dismissed because punitive damages are not available from an official capacity or municipal defendant, such as the Sheriff's Office. Defendants also note that under state law, punitive damages may not be awarded against a municipality absent statutory authorization. Having reviewed these contentions, the Court finds that Plaintiff may not recover punitive damages on her 'official capacity' claims, because those claims are analogous to a claim against a municipality or other local government unit, for which punitive damages are not available.").

Davis v. Durham Mental Health Developmental Disabilities Substance Abuse Area Authority, 320 F.Supp.2d 378, 398 n.16 (M.D.N.C. 2004) (In holding was not an arm of the state for Eleventh Amendment purposes, the court observed Athat after the United States Supreme Court's decisions in Regents of Univ. of Cal. v. Doe, 519 U.S. 425, 117 S.Ct. 900, 137 L.Ed.2d 55 (1997), and McMillian v. Monroe County, 520 U.S. 781, 117 S.Ct. 1734, 138 L.Ed.2d 1 (1997), several district courts in this circuit suggested that the impact of a judgment on a State's treasury is no longer the dominant factor in determining Eleventh Amendment immunity. See, e.g., Conlin v. Southwestern Cmty. College, No. 2:99CV247-C, 2001 WL 1019918, at *1 (W.D.N.C. Jan. 24, 2001); Sampson v. Maynor, No. 7:99- CV-51-F (E.D.N.C. Oct. 6, 1999). In Cash v. Granville County Board of Education, however, this circuit's court of appeals expressly rejected the district courts' interpretation of Regents and McMillian and held that the impact of a judgment on a State treasury is still the dominant factor in determining Eleventh Amendment immunity. 242 F.3d 219, 223- 24 (4th Cir.2001).").

Layman v. Alexander, 294 F.Supp.2d 784, 791, 792 (W.D.N.C. 2003) ("While the undersigned has held previously, and remains convinced, that the creation of the office of sheriff and the historical role of the sheriff in North Carolina in the exercise of his duties of governance and the enforcement of state law is more properly considered an office of the State of North Carolina, entitled to all of the privileges and immunities bestowed upon any office of the State, see, e.g., Henderson Amusement, Inc. v. Good, 172 F.Supp.2d 751 (W.D.N.C.2001), aff'd, 59 F. App'x 536, 2003 WL 932463 (4th Cir.2003), as explained in two recent decisions, see Harmon v. Buchanan, No. 1:00cv28 (W.D.N.C. Aug. 27, 2003); Jones v. Buchanan, No. 1:00cv27 (W.D.N.C. Oct. 9, 2003), the Fourth Circuit held in 1996 and has since reaffirmed that 'the Eleventh Amendment does not bar a suit against a North Carolina sheriff in his official capacity,' Harter v. Vernon, 101 F.3d 334, 343 (4th Cir.1996); see also Cash v. Granville County Bd. of Educ., 242 F.3d 219, 227 (4th Cir.2001). In light of the Fourth Circuit's decision in Harter and its clear and unequivocal reaffirmation of its Harter decision − both its analysis and its judgment − in Cash, this Court is bound to adhere to that decision and, therefore, concludes that North Carolina sheriffs are not entitled to immunity under the Eleventh Amendment, but rather, are subject to suit in federal court.").

North Carolina ex rel Wellington v. Antonelli, No. 1:01CV01088, 2002 WL 31875504, at *3 (M.D.N.C. Dec. 20, 2002) (not reported) ("Where a local government does not have final authority over a particular policy carried out by a sheriff, it cannot be held liable under § 1983 for alleged constitutional violations committed by the sheriff or his deputies. . . Because Guilford County did not have final policymaking authority in the area of law enforcement, it cannot be held liable for the conduct of Sheriff Barnes or Deputies Antonelli and Caliendo.").

Gantt v. Whitaker, 203 F. Supp.2d 503, 508, 509 (M.D. N.C. 2002) ("Defendants also raise the defense of sovereign immunity to the claim against Whitaker, asserting that North Carolina sheriffs are state officials and consequently immune from suit under the Eleventh Amendment. In support of this argument, Defendants offer the recently-decided case of Henderson Amusement, Inc. v. Good, 172 F.Supp.2d 751 (W.D.N.C.2001). While the Henderson Amusement court did grant immunity to a North Carolina sheriff, see id. at 763, it did so in spite of clear Fourth Circuit precedent affirming that North Carolina sheriffs are local, not state, officials and lack Eleventh Amendment immunity. See Harter v. Vernon, 101 F.3d 334, 343 (4th Cir.1996). The Henderson Amusement court justified its departure from this controlling precedent by citing two post-Harter Supreme Court decisions which it argued have overruled the immunity analysis employed by the Court of Appeals in Harter. [FN3] However, after examining these Supreme Court decisions in a subsequent case, Cash v. Granville County Bd. of Educ., 242 F.3d 219 (4th Cir.2001), the Fourth Circuit reaffirmed the validity of Harter in no uncertain terms. . . . Therefore, in accordance with these controlling authorities, the court hereby finds that Sheriff Whitaker, as a local official, is not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity from Plaintiff's official capacity § 1983 claim."), aff'd on other grounds, 57 F. App'x 141, 2003 WL 152856 (4th Cir. Jan. 23, 2003) (unpublished).

Henderson Amusement, Inc. v. Good, 172 F. Supp.2d 751, 763 (W.D.N.C. 2001) ("As this court can discern, a decisional rift is growing between state and federal courts in North Carolina in Section 1983 actions, which are actionable in either forum. The potential for inconsistency is most real in such circumstances, inasmuch as federal and state courts share Section 1983 jurisdiction. . . The difficulty arises when on one side of the street (in federal court) a Section 1983 claim against a sheriff is viable, while on the other side (in state court) it is not. Compounding this problem, there is no method in North Carolina for a federal court to certify an issue of state law (whether a sheriff is considered by the state to be a state official) so that a federal forum can determine the ultimate federal issue (whether eleventh-amendment immunity can be extended to such official). With due deference and the utmost respect for decisions which have reached opposite conclusions in this district, see Olvera v. Edmundson, supra, and Ramsey v. Schauble, 141 F.Supp.2d 584 (W .D.N.C.2001) (Horn, M.J.), and based upon all the information and precedent available to this court, including the decision of the Supreme Court in McMillian, this court finds that the Section 1983 official-capacity claim lodged against the sheriff is not viable, inasmuch as it is a suit against the State of North Carolina, which enjoys eleventh-amendment immunity."), aff'd on other grounds, Henderson Amusement, Inc. v. Good, No. 01-2462, 2003 WL 932463, at *5 (4th Cir. Mar. 10, 2003) (unpublished).

Harmon v. Buchanan, 164 F. Supp.2d 649, 656 (W.D.N.C. 2001) ("The court notes a growing dichotomy between federal and state jurisprudence in North Carolina concerning the role of a sheriff − the state courts find, with little explanation, that a sheriff and his deputies are state officials who enjoy the state's eleventh-amendment immunity in Section 1983 actions; however, federal courts, with much explanation, find that they are local officials, who enjoy no immunity. The parties have indicated to the court that they do not wish to enter the fray on such issue. The undersigned is on the record in a number of cases as finding that a North Carolina sheriff is, by mandate of the North Carolina Constitution, which has its origin in English common law, a representative of the state who is now elected locally. The dichotomy that is growing between the federal and state courts in North Carolina could lead to a lessening in the confidence of the judiciary for one reason − federal and state courts have concurrent jurisdiction over Section 1983 actions, and, as it now stands, a plaintiff cannot bring an action in state court against a sheriff under Section 1983, but can walk across the street and do so in the federal forum. Such issue needs resolution by either the highest state court or by legislative action. This court, therefore, does not reach such issue.' [footnotes omitted]).

Wilkerson v. Hester, 114 F. Supp.2d 446, 464, 465 (W.D.N.C. 2000) ("Based upon all the information and law available, including the decision of the Supreme Court in McMillian, the undersigned must recommend that the official-capacity claims lodged against the sheriff and his deputy be dismissed, inasmuch as a suit against a North Carolina sheriff and/or his deputy is a suit against the State of North Carolina, which enjoys eleventh- amendment immunity.").

Little v. Smith, 114 F. Supp.2d 437, 446 (W.D.N.C. 2000) ("In North Carolina, the Office of Sheriff is a legal entity, established by the state constitution and state statutes, separate and distinct from the Board of County Commissioners because a sheriff is elected by the people, not employed by the county. . . The sheriff, not the county, has final policymaking authority over the personnel decisions in his office. . . . [I]t is Sheriff Sellers, not Anson County, who has the final decision making authority over law enforcement policies of his office. Indeed, Anson County does not have the power to exercise supervision or control over the law enforcement officers who work for the sheriff who 'are appointed by and act for the sheriff, who alone is responsible for their conduct.' .

. . . In short, Anson County has no authority to control law enforcement policies of the Anson County Sheriff's Office or to control its personnel.").

Flood v. Hardy, 868 F. Supp. 809, 812-13 (E.D.N.C. 1994)("[T]he parties in this action do not dispute that the Sheriff has . . . final policymaking authority. Thus the only question in dispute is whether the Sheriff's policymaking decisions can be imputed to the County. According to the Dotson court, where state law makes a county sheriff the final policymaker, with regard to some particular aspect of county operation, his actions can serve to bind the county. [cite omitted] In North Carolina, where the Sheriff is given exclusive control over the supervision of his employees, including deputies and jailers, the Sheriff may bind the county by his actions. The defendant asserts that since the Sheriff is an elected official, the County cannot be bound by his decisions. This assertion is without merit. The fact that the Sheriff is an elected official does not exonerate the County.").

South Carolina

Wall v. Sloan, 135 F.3d 771 (Table), 1998 WL 54938, *1 (4th Cir. Feb. 11, 1998) ("[A] South Carolina sheriff such as Sloan is a state official and therefore is not subject to suit for monetary damages in his official capacity. . . . Wall primarily contends on appeal that because he seeks monetary relief from the county rather than the state, Sloan should not be entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. We find this claim unavailing. While the extent of the state treasury's liability is the main consideration in determining immunity, a party cannot file suit under § 1983 and specifically seek money from the county and not the state in an effort to circumvent an official's entitlement to Eleventh Amendment protection. An individual who brings a § 1983 action under these circumstances cannot choose which entity will satisfy any resulting judgment. Accordingly, the district court properly concluded that Sloan is a state official entitled to immunity in his official capacity.").

Landrum v. Spartanburg County, No. 7:10-cv-00007-JMC, 2011 WL 3652291, at *4 (D.S.C. Aug. 18, 2011) ("The South Carolina Supreme Court, United States District Court for the District of South Carolina, and the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit have all held that South Carolina sheriffs and deputy sheriffs are state officials. . . .Therefore, when sued pursuant to 42 U.S.C § 1983 in their official capacities, sheriffs are not 'persons' amenable to suit.")

Millmine v. County of Lexington, No. 3:09-1644-CMC, 2011 WL 182875, at *5 (D.S.C. Jan. 20, 2011) ("In South Carolina, a sheriff's department is an agency of the state, not a department under the control of the county. . . As an agency of the state, the Lexington County Sheriff's Department is immune from suit under the Eleventh Amendment. . . . It is well settled, in both South Carolina law and Federal law regarding 42 U.S.C. § 1983 litigation, that a Sheriff in South Carolina is an arm of the State and as such enjoys Eleventh Amendment Immunity in Federal Court when sued in his official capacity. . . .As a result, Sheriff Metts is considered an arm of the State and is entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity in his official capacity.")

Virginia

Bland v. Roberts, 730 F.3d 368, 390, 391 (4th Cir. 2013) ("Because reinstatement is a form of prospective relief, the refusal to provide that relief when it is requested can constitute an ongoing violation of federal law such that the Ex Parte Young exception applies. . . Plaintiffs are therefore correct that the Sheriff is not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity to the extent that they seek reinstatement. . . As we have explained, however, to the extent that the claims seek monetary relief, they are claims against an arm of the State. . . Thus, to the extent that the claims seek monetary relief against the Sheriff [of the City of Hampton, Virginia] in his official capacity, the district court correctly ruled that the Sheriff is entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity.")

Grayson v. Peed, 195 F.3d 692, 697 (4th Cir. 1999) ("[T]here can be no county liability here because under Virginia law Fairfax County has no control over the internal administration of the ADC [Adult Detention Center]. . . Rather, the State Board of Corrections tells Sheriff Peed what he has to do in running the jail, and the State Department of Criminal Justice Services tells the Sheriff what he must do to train his employees. . . As the county has no control over policy within the jail, it bears no concomitant responsibility.").

Bockes v. Fields, 999 F.2d 788, 791 (4th Cir. 1993) ("In Virginia, neither the County nor the local boards have authority to set 'general goals and programs' for social services personnel; that authority is reserved for the State Board. . . . the Grayson County Board enjoyed its discretion to fire [plaintiff] at the prerogative of and within the constraints imposed by the Commonwealth. Such bounded, state-conferred discretion is not the 'policymaking authority' for which a county may be held responsible under § 1983.").

Strickler v. Waters, 989 F.2d 1375, 1390 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 393 (1993) ("The City of Portsmouth is not liable under section 1983 for the actions of its Sheriff in the administration of its jail, because under the law of Virginia those actions do not embody an official policy of the City of Portsmouth. That the city apparently is charged with keeping the jail 'in good order' in no way alters this conclusion. The cited statute at most obligates the city to provide for the jail's physical plant, not to oversee the activities within.").

Zemedagegehu v. Arthur, No. 1:15CV57 JCC/MSN, 2015 WL 1930539, at *5-6 (E.D. Va. Apr. 28, 2015) ("First, under the Virginia Code, local Sheriffs are solely responsible for running the locality's jail. Plaintiff alleges the State Defendants, in their policy-setting role, had constructive knowledge of the deficient accommodations and aids available to deaf detainees in local jails throughout the Commonwealth of Virginia. . . On a Rule 12(b)(6) motion the Court assumes this allegation to be true. Regardless, '[t]he primary responsibility for application of [the Board's] standards shall be with the sheriff or chief executive officer of the jail or lockup.' 6 Va. Admin. Code § 15–40–20; see also Va.Code § 53.1–116.2 ('The sheriff of each county or city shall be the keeper of the jail thereof[.]'). Admittedly, the State Defendants are responsible for setting policies and auditing correctional facilities for compliance with those policies. But the Board and the VDOC do not apply or enforce these policies in local jails as Plaintiff alleges. As a matter of Virginia law, that responsibility resides only with the Sheriff. Instead, state correctional facilities, i.e. state prisons or penitentiaries, house convicted offenders sentenced to a year or more of incarceration and are 'operated by the Department of Corrections[.]' Va.Code § 53.1–1. The Virginia Code expressly distinguishes between state correctional facilities (Chapter 2 under Title 53.1) and local correctional facilities like the jail (Chapter 3 under Title 53.1). Compare Va.Code § 51.1–18 through § 53.1–67.8, with Va.Code § 53.1–68 through 53.1–133.10. Second, the State Defendants do not supervise the Sheriff in the manner contemplated under the prima facie case of supervisory liability. While the Virginia Code does provide the Board with certain enforcement mechanisms to ensure compliance with standards and policies, the mechanisms are indirect and do not give the Board direct supervisory authority over sheriffs or the operation of the local jail. For one, Sheriffs are not employees of the Commonwealth of Virginia and thus not subject to supervision by Virginia agencies. . . Instead, Virginia sheriffs are independent constitutional officers who are responsible only to the voters . . . As the manager of the jail, the Sheriff is also responsible for the sheriff deputies who work in the jail. . . The Board can indirectly affect the operation of the jail, but not to the degree required for supervisory liability to attach. For instance, the Board may prohibit confinement and require transfer of prisoners in substandard jails. Va.Code § 53.1–69. But only the local circuit court can directly penalize the Sheriff for failure to properly operate the jail. . . Additionally, under the Virginia Code, the Board can file a lawsuit against the Sheriff for failure to comply with any requirements set by the Board. . . Notably, however, the Virginia Code does not provide any other enforcement mechanism, and if the circuit court deems the complaint 'justified, it shall enter an order directing the State Compensation Board to withhold approval of payment of any further salary to the sheriff ... until there has been compliance with specified requirements of the Board.'. . In short, while there are indirect enforcement mechanisms available to the Board and local circuit court to ensure the local jail's compliance with standards and requirements, as a matter of Virginia law, these statutory provisions do not establish the 'affirmative causal link' necessary between the State Defendants and the particular constitutional injury suffered by Plaintiff for supervisory liability to attach. Stated differently, by way of analogy, under Virginia law, assuming the other elements were satisfied, the Sheriff herself could theoretically be liable for any inaction related to her deputies who she directly manages under a theory of supervisory liability. See Va.Code § 53.1–68. But the relationship between the State Defendants and the operation of local correctional facilities throughout Virginia is indirect and insufficient as a matter of law. Ultimately, Plaintiff's claims against the State Defendants cannot survive given his inability to establish 'an affirmative causal link between the supervisor's [State Defendants'] inaction and the harm suffered by the plaintiff.'. . Therefore, the Court will grant the State Defendants motion to dismiss and dismiss this matter with prejudice as to them. This result does not totally prevent Plaintiff's potential recovery, because as discussed below, both counts will remain against the Sheriff in her official capacity as keeper of the jail.")

Lavender v. City of Roanoke Sheriff's Office, 826 F.Supp.2d 928, 933 n.3 (W.D. Va. 2011) (noting that "there is considerable authority holding that the 11th Amendment precludes § 1983 official capacity suits against Virginia sheriffs because they are state, not local, officials." [collecting cases])

Smith v. McCarthy, NO. CIV.A.3:08CV00036, 2009 WL 50022, 12 (W.D. Va. Jan 7, 2009) ("In the first instance, the complaint seeks to bring claims against the Nelson Defendants in their official capacities as deputies (and then-Sheriff) of the Nelson County Sheriffs Department. The Nelson Defendants are officers of the Nelson County Sheriff's Department, which is a political subdivision of the Commonwealth of Virginia. As such, a suit against them in their official capacities is a suit against the Commonwealth itself; thus, the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over Plaintiffs' money damages claim.").

Willis v. Oakes, No. 2:06CV00015, 2006 WL 1589600, at *2 (W.D. Va. June 9, 2006) ("In Virginia, contrary to the plaintiffs' assertions, it is well-established that sheriffs are state officers. Thus, a suit against a sheriff or his deputies in their official capacities is a suit against the state itself. . . . Likewise, the plaintiffs' claims against Wise County are barred. . . . Under Virginia law, sheriffs are independent constitutional officers whose duties and authorities are controlled by statute and who serve independently of the municipal government. . . . Accordingly, a county cannot be held liable for a sheriff's actions.")

Brown v. Mitchell, 308 F.Supp.2d 682, 698 & n.19 (E.D. Va. 2004) ("[A]s a constitutional officer, a Virginia sheriff is separate and distinct from the municipal or local government in which she may operate. . . . The question then becomes what are Mitchell's statutory powers, obligations, and duties respecting the Jail. To begin, it appears that the design, the construction, and apparently the structural maintenance of local jails in Virginia are the responsibilities of local governments − in this case, the City. . . . In other words, those responsibilities are not statutorily allocated to the sheriff. By statute, however, the sheriff is 'the keeper of the local jail, and the legal custodian of those who are lawfully confined in it.' . . . Thus, 'the final policymaking decision maker in the [daily] operation of the jail' is the sheriff. . . . It is worth noting that even though a Virginia sheriff is a state employee, in the sheriff's operation of a local jail, 'the [locality] may be liable for [the sheriff's] policies where they violate constitutional standards.'"). The court, later in the opinion notes that AWhether, under the decision in May v. Newhart, 822 F.Supp. 1233 (E.D.Va.1993), the potential liability under Count I is that of the Sheriff or the City must await further factual development.' 308 F.Supp.2d 682, 701 n.22 (E.D. Va. 2004).

Hussein v. Miller, 232 F. Supp.2d 653, 655 (E.D. Va. 2002) ("Upon consideration of the parties' pleadings, the relevant provisions of the Virginia Code and the Virginia Constitution, and binding case law, the Court holds that the Commissioner of the Revenue for the City of Falls Church is protected by sovereign immunity from claims against him in an official capacity, because any adverse judgment against the Commissioner would be paid in full by the State treasury, and because Commissioners of Revenue are not local officers; rather they are constitutional officers. As such, claims against constitutional officers are essentially claims against the Commonwealth of Virginia, and the Commonwealth has not waived Eleventh Amendment immunity.").

Keathley v. Vitale, 866 F. Supp. 272, 276 (E.D. Va. 1994) ("[W]hile [plaintiff] does provide a lengthy list of state statutes which demonstrate a relationship between local municipalities in Virginia and their respective sheriff departments, he offers no specific provisions of the Virginia Code which would support his contention that the hiring and firing of VBSD employees should be attributed to Virginia Beach . . . . Plaintiff proffers no authority to support the proposition that the electoral process is a sufficient basis upon which to attribute Drew's acts with respect to employment decisions to Virginia Beach. [footnote omitted] . . . . In essence, [Plaintiff] asks that this Court create a vast "elected official" exception to Monell. We decline any such expansion.").

Olivo v. Mapp, 838 F. Supp. 259, 261 (E.D. Va. 1993) ("[T]he employment practices of a sheriff do not involve the exercise of any policymaking authority on behalf of a locality.").

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Louisiana

Cozzo v. Tangipahoa-Parish Council-President Government, 279 F.3d 273, 281-83 (5th Cir. 2002) (concluding Sheriff in Louisiana is not an Aarm of the state' and not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity).

Burge v. Parish of St. Tammany, 187 F.3d 452, 470 (5th Cir. 1999) (Burge III) ("Considering the Louisiana constitutional and statutory law and tort cases, we conclude that, in a suit against a district attorney in his official capacity under § 1983 for constitutional torts caused by the district attorney's policies regarding the acquisition, security, and disclosure of Brady material, a victory for the plaintiff imposes liability on the district attorney's office as an independent local entity. Accordingly, a district attorney cannot be held personally liable in an 'official capacity' suit, and any judgment against a district attorney in his official capacity must be recovered from his liability insurer or the public funds controlled by him or his successor in office.").

Hebert v. Maxwell, No. CV-03-1739-A, 2005 WL 2429174, at *4 (W.D. La. Sept. 30, 2005) ("A sheriff's office is not a state agency under Louisiana state law. La. R.S. 13:5102. Rather, it is a political subdivision. La. R.S. 13:5102. Further, the Sheriff is an 'autonomous local government official separate and apart from the parish he serves.'. . Therefore, a suit against a sheriff is not a suit against the state, but a suit against a political subdivision, the sheriff's office. Because of the unusual treatment given to sheriffs and sheriffs' offices under Louisiana law, when a sheriff is sued in his official capacity, the judgment can only be recovered from the sheriff's liability insurer or the public funds controlled by the sheriff. . . The state of Louisiana is not liable for any damages arising from a sheriff's actions taken within the scope of his official duties. La. R.S. 42:1441. Additionally, a sheriff sued in his official capacity is not personally liable for any damages assessed.").

Porche v. St. Tammany Parish Sheriff's Office, 67 F. Supp.2d 631, 634, 636 (E.D. La. 1999) ("This case calls upon the court to assess whether the sheriffs of Louisiana are arms of the state and thereby entitled to the protection of the Eleventh Amendment. Courts in several other states have resolved this issue with mixed results. [collecting cases] . . . . [A] sheriff in Louisiana may not be properly characterized as an arm of the state and, therefore, the Eleventh Amendment affords a sheriff in Louisiana no protection against being sued.”).

Mississippi

Waltman v. Payne, 535 F.3d 342, 350 (5th Cir. 2008) (“The district court failed to recognize the single-incident exception to the general rule: a single decision by an individual with ‘final policy-making authority’ can in certain instances be grounds for liability under § 1983. . . In Mississippi, sheriffs are final policymakers for their respective department’s law enforcement decisions made within their counties.”).

Hamilton v. Stafford, No. 1:96CV265- S-D, 1997 WL 786768, at *1 (N.D. Miss. Nov. 26, 1997) (not reported) (“The holding in McMillian is quite narrow and limited to Alabama sheriffs, as pointed out in the majority opinion, . . . and indeed, does not even apply to Alabama sheriffs in every instance. . . . In light of the narrow holding in McMillian, the validity of prior decisions within the Fifth Circuit regarding Mississippi sheriffs and their status as county officials under section 1983 remain unaffected. . . . Indeed, every court outside of the Eleventh Circuit to address the issue has determined that sheriffs, other than those in Alabama, remain county officials for section 1983 purposes.”).

Texas

Arnone v. County of Dallas County, Texas, 29 F.4th 262, 268-72 (5th Cir. 2022) (“Applying McMillian and Daves, the district attorney acted as a state—not county—policymaker in promulgating or acquiescing to the polygraph policy. . . Relevant Texas law inescapably points that way. And Arnone offers no persuasive counterargument. . .To begin, the Texas Constitution supports that the district attorney acts for the state. It provides the Legislature—a state entity—with a direct role in regulating both the scope of prosecutorial duties and compensation for district attorneys. . . That is like the sheriff in McMillian where the Legislature had a role in determining both the scope of the sheriff’s duties and his compensation. . . .Texas law therefore points one way in this case: district attorneys act for the state when they decide to seek revocation of probation or deferred adjudication. A policy governing when to exercise that power in the future—whether because of a polygraph result, or not—is inextricably linked to that use of state power, just like it was in Daves. Therefore, the Dallas County district attorney acted as a state policymaker when he decided or acquiesced to the polygraph policy in this case. . . . At end, then, Dallas County’s district attorney may very well be elected only by its voters. He may hold sway only in Dallas County. And he may even have complete dominion over the internal policies and procedures used within his office. But on these facts, the Dallas County district attorney acted for the state—not county—when he promulgated or acquiesced to the polygraph policy. Consequently, there isn’t a county policymaker to support Arnone’s Monell claim. Therefore, the district court properly dismissed it.”)

Robinson v. Hunt County, Texas, 921 F.3d 440, 448-49 (5th Cir. 2019) ("Robinson contends that Sheriff Meeks has final policymaking authority over the HCSO Facebook page. Hunt County maintains that the Hunt County Commissioners' Court is the relevant final policymaker. '[I]n Texas, the county sheriff is the county's final policymaker in the area of law enforcement, not by virtue of delegation by the county's governing body but, rather, by virtue of the office to which the sheriff has been elected.'. . Thus, the sheriff's 'actions are as much the actions of the county as the actions of th[e] [county] commissioners.'. . The decision to create a Facebook page falls squarely within the sheriff's power to '"define objectives and choose the means of achieving them" without county supervision.'. . The HCSO Facebook page is described as 'the official Hunt County Sheriff's Office Facebook page,' not as a page for Hunt County generally. It includes contact information for the Sheriff's Office and advises users to dial 911 if they experience an emergency or need police assistance. The HCSO Facebook page also invites input and comments regarding the Sheriff's Office. Hunt County's argument that the Commissioners' Court has not delegated social media authority to Sheriff Meeks is unavailing. The sheriff's authority over the HCSO Facebook page derives from his elected position, 'not by virtue of delegation by the county's governing body.'. . Accordingly, Sheriff Meeks is the final policymaker with regard to the HCSO Facebook page.")

Culbertson v. Lykos, 790 F.3d 608, 623-25 (5th Cir. 2015) ("[W]e are directed to no authority to support that the DA should be considered a state official and not one for the County. The plaintiffs have cited an opinion of this court that held a county potentially responsible for the conduct of the district attorney for the county. See Turner v. Upton Cnty., 915 F.2d 133, 138 (5th Cir.1990). The district covered by that prosecutor included more than one county, but we still held the defendant county potentially liable. . . The issue of whether the district attorney was a county or state official was not discussed and may not have been raised. Still, Turner is authority for the proposition that a county can be responsible under Section 1983 for the actions of its district attorney. We will follow Turner. The County can be responsible for actions of a final policymaker who has 'the responsibility for making law or setting policy in any given area of a local government's business.'. . . The plaintiffs argue that Lykos's retaliatory actions 'relate to her administrative and managerial duties' and thus 'implicate her role as a final policymaker.' In the complaint, the policy is described as one 'of retaliation for the exercise of lawful rights.' It should go without saying that no state statute or County directive in any form has given district attorneys authority to retaliate against individuals for exercising their First Amendment rights. Still, we have held that improper conduct by a policymaker can be a policy. In a Section 1983 action, the plaintiff sued a county for the alleged conspiracy of the sheriff and district attorney to subject her to a 'sham' trial. Turner, 915 F.2d at 134. We held that the '[t]he sheriff's and the district attorney's alleged participation in the conspiracy, if proven, will suffice to impose liability on the county.'. . In doing so, we held that the sheriff was a final policymaker for the county in the area of 'preserving the peace in his jurisdiction and arresting all offenders.'. . We did not hold that the district attorney was a final policymaker for any relevant function but held he was a possible co-conspirator for which the county might be liable. . . In this case, a possible area of policy-making responsibility for a district attorney is to determine what witnesses to use in prosecutions. Arguably, then, Lykos was a final policymaker for purposes of a retaliation campaign to keep public employee or contractor witnesses who testified in an unsatisfactory way from being used in the future. The complaint alleges that the DA's Office decided no longer to use either plaintiff as witnesses. That possible injury—no longer being able to testify—is not the injury we have held is relevant here. Instead, it was the County's failure to renew the Lone Star Contract and the plaintiffs' consequent loss of their employment. Lykos quite clearly was not the final policymaker on that decision. If she were, no campaign would have been necessary to convince the Commissioners Court of anything. The plaintiffs have not stated a claim against Harris County based on Lykos's actions in her official capacity, as they have not alleged sufficient facts to show Lykos is a final policymaker as to the policy at issue.")

Williams v. Kaufman County, 352 F.3d 994, 1013, 1014 (5th Cir. 2003) ("We have. . . held that sheriffs in Texas are final policymakers in the area of law enforcement. Therefore, it is clear that the County can be held liable for Harris's intentional conduct, to the extent it constitutes the 'moving force' behind the alleged injury. Harris testified that he is the final policymaker for law enforcement matters in the County. Harris and others have testified as well that both the strip search and lengthy detention of the plaintiffs were conducted according to the Sheriff Department's unwritten policy for executing 'hazardous' warrants. As a result, Harris's actions as policymaker were undeniably the moving force behind, and the direct cause of, the violation of plaintiffs' constitutional rights, thereby establishing the County's municipal liability. Finally, we note that the County has not expressly contested its municipal liability, but rather argued only that it is not liable for actions that do not amount to constitutional violations, a truism that none contests.' [footnotes omitted]).

Skelton v. Camp, 234 F.3d 292, 296 (5th Cir. 2000) (concluding that in removal proceeding, alderman represented the municipality, not the State of Texas).

Brady v. Fort Bend County, 145 F.3d 691, 700, 702 (5th Cir. 1998) ("Sheriffs under Texas law are unlike the hypothetical sheriff discussed in Pembaur because a Texas sheriff is not merely granted 'discretion to hire and fire employees' by the commissioners court. . . Rather, the Texas legislature has vested sheriffs with such discretion, and the sheriff's exercise of that discretion is unreviewable by any other official or governmental body in the county. Texas sheriffs therefore exercise final policymaking authority with respect to the determination of how to fill employment positions in the county sheriff's department. . . . [T]he fact that under Texas law, no other official or governmental entity of the county exerts any control over the sheriff's discretion in filling available deputy positions is what indicates that the sheriff constitutes the county's final policymaker in this area.").

Roach v. Bandera County, No. Civ.A.SA-02-CA-106XR, 2004 WL 1304952, at *9 (W.D. Tex. June 9, 2004) ("To the extent that the defendants sued in their official capacities assert immunity under the Eleventh Amendment, the Court concludes that the County and the Sheriff's Department are not arms of the state and thus are not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity from suit. . .

.Sheriff MacMillan is the County's official policymaker with regard to county-related law enforcement. . . Thus, the County can be held liable for MacMillan's intentional conduct, to the extent it constitutes the 'moving force' behind the alleged injury. . . However, Plaintiff has offered no summary judgment evidence regarding any conduct or policy by Sheriff MacMillan, much less any conduct that was a moving force behind his injuries. Accordingly, summary judgment for Bandera County and the Bandera County Sheriff's Department is granted.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Kentucky

Johnson v. Karnes, 398 F.3d 868, 877 (6th Cir. 2005)("A suit against Sheriff Karnes in his official capacity is permissible under § 1983, and is equivalent to a suit against the entity on whose behalf he acts − Franklin County.'[footnote omitted]).

Johnson v. Fink, No. 1:99-CV-35-R, 1999 WL 33603131, at *3 (W.D. Ky. Sept. 17, 1999) (not reported) ("Whether a public employee is a state or county government official is a matter of federal law, informed by provisions of state law involving sheriffs. . . The Court should look at several factors, including 'how state law defines the entity, what degree of control the state maintains over the entity, where funds for the entity are derived, and who is responsible for judgment against the entity.' . . Analyzing these factors, the Court concludes that the sheriffs act as local government officials rather than acting as an arm of the state in their daily operations. The Kentucky Constitution defines sheriffs as county officials. . . The sheriffs are elected by county residents. They act autonomously with little or no state oversight. The sheriffs' autonomy from the county does not preclude county liability. . . Because sheriffs receive most of their funding from the county and its residents, . . . the county presumably will bear financial responsibility for the judgment. . . . There is no evidence that a judgment would be paid from the state treasury. Furthermore, the sheriffs are not defended by attorneys from the state. Kentucky sheriffs are county officials. However, the particular actions at issue are attributable to the state, and thus, the sheriffs were acting as state officials when they were executing the search warrant. 'Where county officials are sued simply for complying with state mandates that afford no discretion, they act as an arm of the state.' Brotherton at 566. In this case, the sheriffs' deputies were executing a search warrant signed by a state judge which stated 'you are commanded to make immediate search of the premises.' . . By acting under the direct order of a state court, the sheriffs and their deputies in this case were acting as state officials. . . Since the deputies were acting as arms of the state, they are entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity in their official capacities.").

Michigan

Beck v. Haik, 234 F.3d 1267, 2000 WL 1597942, at *4 (6th Cir. Oct. 17, 2000) (Table) ("As a matter of well-settled Michigan law, Sheriff Haik's policies are those of the County.").

Wentzel v. Allegan County Jail, No. 1:13–cv–81, 2013 WL 1442360, *3, *4 (W.D. Mich. Apr. 9, 2013) ("In matters pertaining to the conditions of the jail and to the operation of the deputies, the sheriff is the policymaker for the county. Mich. Comp. Laws § 51.75 (sheriff has the 'charge and custody' of the jails in his county); Mich. Comp. Laws § 51.281 (sheriff prescribes rules and regulations for conduct of prisoners); Mich. Comp. Laws § 51.70 (sheriff may appoint deputies and revoke appointments at any time); Kroes v. Smith, 540 F.Supp. 1295, 1298 (E.D.Mich.1982) (the sheriff of 'a given county is the only official with direct control over the duties, responsibilities, and methods of operation of deputy sheriffs' and thus, the sheriff 'establishes the policies and customs described in Monell'). Thus, the Court will look to the allegations in Plaintiff's complaint to determine whether Plaintiff has alleged that the sheriff of Allegan County has established a policy or custom which caused Plaintiff to be deprived of a constitutional right. Plaintiff's action fails at this first step because his allegations have not identified a policy or custom that is the source of his injuries. Thus, he fails to state a claim against Allegan County. As a result, he fails to state a claim altogether.")

Bergeron v. Fischer, No. 02-10298-BC, 2004 WL 350577, at *5 (E.D. Mich. Feb. 19, 2004) (not reported) ("The plaintiff here alleges that defendant Fischer, in his official capacity as sheriff of Iosco County and in his individual capacity, was deliberately indifferent to his needs as a diabetic, and that he 'almost died as a result thereof because of the acts and omissions of the jail Booking Officer, and indirectly as the result of Fischer's inaction.'. . The plaintiff also alleges that Fischer failed to enforce county jail policies regarding medical treatment for prisoners and failed to properly supervise his jail staff. . . As the magistrate judge correctly stated, in an official-capacity suit against a local governmental official, the real party in interest is not the named official but the local government entity of which the official is an agent. . . Therefore, the claims asserted against Fischer in his official capacity are duplicative of the claims asserted against Iosco County and these claims will be dismissed. The Court also agrees with the magistrate judge that Fischer is entitled to summary judgment on the claims brought against him in his individual capacity. Fischer has submitted an affidavit in which he avers that not only was he not present at the Iosco County Jail on December 27, 2000, the day the plaintiff arrived, he was not even the county sheriff on that date.").

HRSS, Inc. v. Wayne County Treasurer, 279 F. Supp.2d 846, 857, 858 (E.D. Mich. 2003) ("The Sixth Circuit has looked at several factors to determine whether a local government and its officials acted as arms of the state, and are thus entitled to sovereign immunity from § 1983 claims. . . .These factors include: 'how state law defines the entity, what degree of control the state maintains over the entity, where funds for the entity are derived, and who is responsible for judgment against the entity.' . . The most important factor is whether the county or the state would be financially liable for any judgment that could result from the suit. . . Analyzing the above factors, the court finds that the County, including its Treasurer and Sheriff, acted as a local government in this case rather than an arm of the state. First, under the Michigan Constitution, the Sheriff and Treasurer are treated as elected officials for the county. . . Further, the Sheriff and Treasurer are to hold their principal offices in the county seat. . . Thus, Michigan law clearly contemplates that the county Sheriff and Treasurer are to be treated as local, rather than state, officials. Second, there is no evidence that the state maintained control over the Sheriff or Treasurer. Although the foreclosure sales are governed by state law, the Sheriff and Treasurer still can act autonomously under the law, just as any other local official that is bound and/or guided by state law. Further, as discussed above, state law is silent with respect to the interest earned on overbid surpluses. Thus, the county officials were not required by the statute to retain the interest. Third, the county pays the salary of the Sheriff and Treasurer from the county treasury. . . Finally, and most importantly, the county will presumably bear financial responsibility for any judgment that may result in this case. Inasmuch as the above factors weigh against treating the County or its officials as arms of the state, Defendants will not be granted sovereign immunity.").

Ohio

Crabbs v. Scott (Crabbs I), 786 F.3d 426, 429-31 (6th Cir. 2015) ("At first blush, then, this case looks easy. Sheriff Scott is an officer of the county, not the State, and accordingly he may not invoke the State's sovereign immunity. But law-enforcement officers sometimes wear multiple hats, acting on behalf of the county and the State. In that setting—today's setting—the immunity question is not whether the officer acts for the State or county 'in some categorical, "all or nothing" manner.'. . Immunity hinges on whether the officer represents the State in the 'particular area' or on the 'particular issue' in question. . . And that depends on how state and local law treat the officer in that setting. . . Relevant factors include: (1) the State's potential liability for a judgment; (2) how state statutes and courts refer to the officer; (3) who appoints the officer; (4) who pays the officer; (5) the degree of state control over the officer; and (6) whether the functions involved fall within the traditional purview of state or local government. . . . Measured by these six factors, Sheriff Scott acted as a county, not a state, official in this instance.
One: The county, not the State, would satisfy any judgment against the sheriff in this case, as the parties agree.
Two: Ohio law classifies county sheriffs as 'county officials' and 'employees.' Ohio Rev.Code §§ 301.28(A)(3), 2744.01; see Thurlow v. Bd. of Comm'rs of Guernsey Cnty., 91 N.E. 193, 194 (Ohio 1910).
Three: The voters of each county elect their own sheriff. Ohio Rev.Code § 311.01(A).
Four: Each county, not the State, pays the salary of its sheriffs and funds their offices. Id. §§ 325.01, 311.06.
Five: Each county board has 'final authority' over the sheriff's budget, State ex rel. Trussell v. Meigs Cnty. Bd. of Comm'rs, 800 N.E.2d 381, 386 (Ohio Ct.App.2003), and the sheriff serves as the county's 'chief law enforcement officer' with jurisdiction 'coextensive with' the county's borders, In re Sulzmann, 183 N.E. 531, 532 (Ohio 1932).
Six: A sheriff's law enforcement duties at common law represented local functions. See 70 Am.Jur.2d Sheriffs, Police, & Constables § 2. To be sure, the governor can initiate removal proceedings against the sheriff and issue some orders to him, Ohio Rev.Code §§ 3.08, 107.04, but that does not outweigh the rest of Ohio law and its treatment of sheriffs as local officials. Nothing in the Ohio Constitution says anything to the contrary. Cf. McMillian, 520 U.S. at 787–89. All of this explains why Ohio county sheriffs generally are treated as county policymakers. . . And all of this explains why official-capacity lawsuits against the Franklin County Sheriff challenging his law-enforcement and jail-maintenance policies normally proceed as suits against the county itself. . . Sheriff Scott tries to fend off this general rule and the application of these considerations by arguing that, for purposes of DNA collection, he serves as an officer of the State. Why? Because state law—in this case, § 2901.07—controls his DNA-collection policies. 'Where county officials are sued simply for complying with state mandates that afford no discretion,' he adds, 'they act as an arm of the State' under the Eleventh Amendment. Brotherton v. Cleveland, 173 F.3d 552, 566 (6th Cir.1999); see also, e.g., Vives v. City of N.Y., 524 F.3d 346, 353 (2d Cir.2008) (asking 'whether the City had a meaningful choice' of action under state law); Richman v. Sheahan, 270 F.3d 430, 440 (7th Cir.2001) (treating sheriff as county officer because there was 'no state policy directing the sheriff's actions'). The sheriff is right in one respect but not in another. He is right that sovereign immunity would bar this lawsuit if state law required him to take the actions he took. See Gottfried v. Med. Planning Servs., Inc., 280 F.3d 684, 692–93 (6th Cir.2002); Brotherton, 173 F.3d at 565. But he is wrong to claim that state law required him to swab Crabbs' cheek after his acquittal. '[T]he essential question is the degree of discretion possessed by the official ... implementing the contested policy.' Cady v. Arenac Cnty., 574 F.3d 334, 343 (6th Cir.2009). If Sheriff Scott's policies 'mechanically adopt and enforce' Ohio's DNA-collection law, he may invoke the State's sovereign immunity to deflect Crabbs' suit. . . If not, the State's sovereign immunity offers him no refuge. Scott's application of his DNA-collection policy to Crabbs does not flow inevitably from § 2901.07. For even if Ohio law permitted collecting Crabbs' DNA, a point we need not decide, § 2901.07 did not require it in his case for two independent reasons. For one reason, Crabbs' March 2012 arrest for violating the conditions of his bond—the only one occurring after mandatory collection of DNA from arrestees began in July 2011—was not an arrest 'for a felony offense.' . . .For another reason, no State law required Sheriff Scott to hold Crabbs for a cheek swab after the jury acquitted him. . . .In no way, then, did Sheriff Scott's DNA-collection and ID-hold policies 'mechanically adopt and enforce' Ohio law. . . Because Scott 'could have opted to act differently, ... he did not act as an arm of Ohio when he formulated and implemented the contested polic[ies].'. . That does not make those policies unconstitutional or otherwise illegal, to be clear. But it does leave the sheriff in his normal capacity as a county officer.")

D'Ambrosio v. Marino, 747 F.3d 378, 386 (6th Cir. 2014) ("D'Ambrosio first asserts that prosecutor Marino was a 'policymaking official' of Cuyahoga County, such that the county may be liable for the decisions that Marino made with respect to D'Ambrosio's prosecution. . . But this court has previously held that Ohio prosecutors act as arms of the state—not of a municipality—when prosecuting state criminal charges, meaning that their 'actions in prosecuting the charge ... [may] not be attributed to the [municipality].'. . Because he was acting as an agent of the state when prosecuting D'Ambrosio, Marino's conduct cannot have established a county policy, unconstitutional or otherwise.")

Petty v. County of Franklin, Ohio, 478 F.3d 341, 347 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Unlike a county sheriff's office, the sheriff himself may be considered a proper legal entity for purposes of suit under § 1983. In fact, that is exactly what the district court did in allowing Petty's suit against Sheriff Karnes to proceed at least to the summary judgment stage. There is no merit, therefore, to Petty's argument that the Franklin County Sheriff's Office be implicated as a separate legal entity in this suit. See also Batchik v. Summit County Sheriff's Dep't, No. 13783, 1989 WL 26084, at * 1 (Ohio Ct.App. Mar. 15, 1989) (unreported) (noting that the Summit County Sheriff, but not the Summit County Sheriff's Department, was an entity capable of being sued).")

Loy v. Sexton, No. 04-3971, 2005 WL 1285705, at *2 (6th Cir. May 23, 2005) (unpublished) ([U]nlike Marchese, 758 F.2d at 188, where we held that a sheriff, sued in his official capacity, had 'a duty to both know and act,' Sexton is being sued here in his individual capacity. . . Indeed, the Loys could not sue Sexton in his official capacity for money damages. See Will v. Mich. Dep't of State Police, 491 U.S. 58, 71, 109 S.Ct. 2304, 2312, 105 L.Ed.2d 45, 58 (1989) (holding that state employees acting in their official capacities are insulated from liability for money damages). Accordingly, the Loys' claim against Sexton based on ratification fails.").

Brown v. Karnes, No. 2:05-CV-555, 2005 WL 2230206, at *3 (S.D. Ohio Sept. 13, 2005) (not reported) ("Ohio courts have determined that '[u]nder Ohio law, a county sheriff's office is not a legal entity that is capable of being sued .' [citing cases] The Court finds that Defendants have correctly stated the law and that dismissal of Plaintiff's § 1983 claim against the Franklin County Sheriff's Office is appropriate.").

Tennessee [state]

Spurlock v. Sumner County, 42 S.W.3d 75, 80, 81 (Tenn. 2001) ("Because we find the legislature's statutory grant of law enforcement authority to the sheriff to be of limited significance, we conclude that this argument fails to outweigh the support found in the Tennessee Constitution, case law, and statutes in favor of the proposition that a sheriff acts as a county officer when enforcing the state's laws.")

Tennessee [federal]

Harness v. Anderson County, Tennessee, No. 21-5710, 2023 WL 4482371, at *3–4 (6th Cir. July 12, 2023) (not reported) ("In Crabbs, an Ohio sheriff acted as a county official in the domain of law enforcement and jail management because the county would cover a judgment against the sheriff; Ohio law deemed county sheriffs county officials; county voters chose sheriffs; counties paid sheriffs and funded their offices; county boards had final authority over the sheriff's budget; and '[a] sheriff's law enforcement duties at common law represented local functions.'. .There is no dispute that Jones exercised final decision-making authority over personnel matters for the clerk's office. The district court found that Jones exercised final authority, . . . and the county conceded as much when arguing before this court[.] . . . Further, the county's former human-resources director testified that Jones opted out of the county's sexual-harassment policy and so

Jones's policies were 'all that mattered' for his office. . . Accordingly, the question is whether, with regard to personnel matters, Jones acted as a county or state official. If the former, Jones is a final policymaker for the county, and Harness's § 1983 suit can proceed; if the latter, he is a policymaker for the state. We conclude that Jones acted as a county official in the context of personnel management for the circuit-court clerk's office. Most importantly, the Tennessee Supreme Court has already held that circuit-court clerks are county officials and reached this conclusion based on characteristics that Jones shares. State ex rel. Webster v. La Bonte, 597 S.W.2d 893, 894 (Tenn. 1980). Specifically, the state court found that several factors mattered: 'who pays the officer's salary; who pays the expenses incurred by the office; who is entitled to any fees collected by the office; whether there was legislative intent that the office have jurisdiction outside the county; and whether the "overall duties are applicable to the people of the county alone."'. . . Comparing that case with this one, just as was true for the circuit-court clerk in La Bonte, the county pays Jones's salary and his office's expenses, the county is entitled to his office's fees, and his position is confined to the county. . . Accordingly, La Bonte strongly suggests that Jones acted as a county official. . . Tennessee's statutes point in the same direction. Under Tennessee law, circuit-court clerks are listed as county officials, . . . and must work with counties to adopt workplace policies[.] . . . This framework shows that, under state law, Jones acted as a county official because he was both listed as a county official and tasked with developing workplace policies for county employees, subject to county oversight.")

Buchanan v. Williams, 434 F.Supp.2d 521, 531 (M.D. Tenn. 2006) ("Under Tennessee law, the county sheriff has the statutory duty to '[e]xecute and return according to law, the process and orders of the courts of record of this state and of officers of competent authority, with due diligence, when delivered to the Sheriff for that purpose.'. . Yet, this authority extends to execute writs 'within the county.' . . Any legal liability arising out of a deputy sheriff's performance of his duties is legally attributable to the County. Tenn.Code Ann. ' 8-8- 302. . . As applied here, the writ of execution was issued to the Smith County Sheriff's Department. Williams, as a deputy sheriff, executed the writ and his subsequent seizure of Plaintiff's automobile and its contents was an act for the County. Thus, the Court concludes that under state law, Williams' acts were the acts of Smith County and qualify him as the County's decisionmaker in this instance. This single act of a sheriff is sufficient to represent a decision of the County under federal law.").

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Illinois [State]

Carver v. Sheriff of La Salle County, 787 N.E.2d 127, 515, 516, 522 (Ill. 2003) ("[P]ursuant to section 9-102 of the Tort Immunity Act, a county sheriff, in his or her official capacity, is vested by the General Assembly with the authority to settle litigation filed against the sheriff's office and to direct the office to pay that settlement. However, the dilemma noted by the Seventh Circuit in its opinion in Carver II remains: although the sheriff has authority to settle claims filed against the sheriff's office pursuant to section 9-102, the statute is silent with respect to the specific mechanism for funding the judgment. As stated, although the office of sheriff is constitutionally created (Ill. Const.1970, art. VII, ‘ 4(c)), and the sheriff is an independently elected county officer, the county sheriff lacks the authority to levy taxes or establish a budget. Instead, the General Assembly has determined that the sheriff’s office is to be financed by public funds appropriated to it by the county board. See 55 ILCS 5/4-6003 (West 2000); 55 ILC§ 5/5-1106 (West 2000). We conclude that, under this statutory scheme, the county is obligated to provide funds to the county sheriff to pay official capacity judgments entered against the sheriff’s office. . . . For the foregoing reasons, we answer the question certified to us by the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit as follows: we hold that under Illinois law a sheriff, in his or her official capacity, has the authority to settle and compromise claims brought against the sheriff’s office. Because the office of the sheriff is funded by the county, the county is therefore required to pay a judgment entered against a sheriff’s office in an official capacity. We further hold that this conclusion is not affected by whether the case was settled or litigated.”).

Alencastro v. Sheahan, 698 N.E.2d 1095, 1099, 1100 (Ill.App. 1998) (sheriff acts as an arm of the State of Illinois when engaged in nondiscretionary execution of court order for possession)

Illinois [Federal]

Mercado v. Dart, 604 F.3d 360, 364-66 (7th Cir. 2010) (“The Sheriff of Cook County, a local official, is not ‘the state’ for the purpose of either Illinois or federal law, and therefore the Sheriff is a ‘person’ as § 1983 uses that word. . . The Sheriff’s contrary argument proceeds in two steps: first, he contends that Illinois law requires all sheriffs to conduct strip searches of all inmates arriving at county jails; second, he maintains that any local official whose conduct is dictated by state law is ‘the state’ to the extent of that obligation. It follows, the Sheriff concludes, that he is not a ‘person’ under Will (or, in his own language, that he has ‘eleventh amendment immunity”). Neither premise of this syllogism is sound. . . . Plaintiffs have not contended in this suit that the Jail’s practice of conducting strip searches of detainees first entering the jail violates either the federal Constitution or Illinois law. Rather the plaintiffs contend, and the jury found, that the manner of the search is unreasonable and thus violates the fourth amendment as well as § 701.40(f). No matter how favorably to the Sheriff subsection (f) is read, it does not compel him or his staff to perform any of the acts − such as having large numbers of detainees drop their pants simultaneously to raucous hooting and taunts from guards of both sexes − that have led to this litigation and the jury’s verdict. . . . The Sheriff may be confused by the fact that some public officials in Illinois serve in dual capacities. Each county has a State’s Attorney. That official is ‘the state’ when representing the state (all criminal prosecutions are brought in the state’s name) and ‘the county’ when representing the county (which he serves as its lawyer in civil suits). See National Casualty Co. v. McFatridge, No. 09-1497 (7th Cir. Apr.28, 2010), slip op. 12-14 (discussing this dual-capacity status). But it does not follow from the fact that one person may be an official of two different public entities that every person who is subject to state or federal law is ‘the sovereign’ whose law he obeys. A sheriff in Illinois may perform some tasks on behalf of the state − so we assumed in Scott v. O’Grady, 975 F.2d 366 (7th Cir.1992) − but when running the county jail he is a county official. DeGenova v. Sheriff of DuPage County, 209 F.3d 973, 976-77 (7th Cir.2000); see also Ill. Const. Art. VII § 4(c); People ex rel. Davis v. Nellis, 249 Ill. 12, 21, 94 N.E. 165, 169 (1911). That some rules for the conduct of county officials (and private citizens) are set by a state does not make that person 'the state' for the purpose of § 1983, the eleventh amendment, or doctrines of sovereign immunity. Status of an entity as 'the state' depends on the organization chart and not on whose law supplies the substantive rule or who pays the judgments. See Regents of University of California v. Doe, 519 U.S. 425, 117 S.Ct. 900, 137 L.Ed.2d 55 (1997). . . . The Sheriff is responsible for his own policies − and as a state actor (but not himself 'the state") for any unconstitutional policies that Illinois has directed him to implement.")

DeGenova v. Sheriff of DuPage County, 209 F.3d 973, 975-77 (7th Cir. 2000) ("In Franklin, we concluded that the Sheriff is not a State agent when he performs general law enforcement duties. But we have also recognized that sometimes the Sheriff may act on behalf of the State, as when he executes a judicial Writ of Assistance. Scott, 975 F.2d at 371. Here, we must decide whether the Sheriff is an officer for the State or a local entity when he manages the jail. . . . Illinois sheriffs have final policymaking authority over jail operations. . . . Illinois statutes make it clear . . . that when the Sheriff manages the jail, he is a county officer. . . . The Sheriff . . . argues that because we have held that Illinois sheriffs are not county employees, by default they must be agents of the State. We rejected this argument in Franklin, and do so again today. . . . In conclusion, since Illinois sheriffs are county officers when they manage the jail, the Eleventh Amendment does not bar this official capacity suit.").

Franklin v. Zaruba, 150 F.3d 682, 684-86 (7th Cir. 1998) ("The Sheriff asserted Eleventh Amendment immunity, which the district court refused to grant on the basis that sheriffs in Illinois are county officials, not state officials. The sole issue in this appeal is whether Sheriff Doria was acting as an agent of the state, in which case the Eleventh Amendment would bar the plaintiff's suit, or as the agent of some other governmental entity, in which case the Eleventh Amendment does not apply. . . . We have previously held that sheriffs in Illinois are county officials and therefore generally do not receive immunity under the Eleventh Amendment. . . . Eleventh Amendment immunity will extend to county sheriffs, however, when the sheriff (although a county officer) exercises duties on behalf of the state. . . . In this case, however, the Sheriff does not argue that the deputies who exercised custody over the plaintiffs were executing a state judicial order or performing any similar function for the state that would render them state agents for the limited purposes of that action. Nor does the Sheriff argue that formulating policies to govern the conduct of deputies in their law enforcement functions is an action on behalf of the state akin to enforcing a judicial writ. Rather, the Sheriff contests the general proposition established by Scott that sheriffs in Illinois are county officers, not state officers, when performing law enforcement functions. . . . There are numerous differences between the law of Alabama and the law of Illinois, and we point to one that is particularly significant in distinguishing Alabama sheriffs from their Illinois counterparts: the treatment of those officials under the relevant state constitutions, as interpreted by the respective state supreme courts. . . . Indeed, as we noted in Scott, . . . a sheriff's status as a county officer is explicitly stated in the Illinois constitution. . . One wrinkle in this analysis is that the Illinois Supreme Court, like the Alabama Supreme Court in Parker v. Amerson, has held that counties may not be held liable under respondeat superior for the actions of their sheriffs even though Illinois sheriffs are county officers. See Moy, 203 Ill. Dec. 776, 640 N.E.2d at 931. According to the defendant, if sheriffs in Illinois are not agents of the county for purposes of holding the county liable under respondeat superior, then sheriffs must therefore be agents of the state. This argument overlooks a crucial third possibility that we have found to be dispositive in other cases − namely, that the sheriff is an agent of the county sheriff's department, an independently-elected office that is not subject to the control of the county in most respects. . . . Admittedly, sheriffs occupy a somewhat unique position under Illinois law. As Moy indicates, sheriffs are agents of the county, but they are separate from the county boards to such a degree that the county boards cannot be held liable for their actions under respondeat superior. Furthermore, as Ryan held, the lack of identity between the county sheriff's department and the general county government indicates that § 1983 suits against sheriffs in their official capacities are in reality suits against the county sheriff's department rather than the county board. Although the relationship between county boards and county sheriffs is a complicated one, the relevant feature of that relationship for purposes of this case is the lack of any suggestion that the sheriff is an agent of the state in performing general law enforcement duties.").

Ryan v. County of DuPage, 45 F.3d 1090, 1092 (7th Cir. 1995) (although sheriff was policymaker for the county sheriff's office, county was properly dismissed because "Illinois sheriffs are independently elected officials not subject to the control of the county.").

McGrath v. Gillis, 44 F.3d 567, 572 (7th Cir. 1995) ("Employees of the state government are not transformed into county employees simply because the county government participates in budgeting and paying of their salaries. . . . that State's Attorneys are elected for and perform their duties within one county does not suggest that they are county employees.").

Ruehman v. Sheahan, 34 F.3d 525, 529 (7th Cir. 1994) ("Sheriff Sheahan contends that in designing and implementing the SPWA system [computer warrant-tracking system] he is equally an agent of Illinois. Well, would holding him liable for errors in the design and operation of the warrant-tracking system interfere with state policy (as opposed to county policy)? . . . . A county agency, under the president of the county board, specified the design of SPWA. The system, then, is designed and supervised from top to bottom by the Sheriff and the county government. State law requires the Sheriff to arrest the right people but says nothing about how he should do it. Design and auditing decisions have been left entirely to him. He could junk SPWA tomorrow, or alter its every detail, without thwarting any state policy or law . . . . It follows that in designing and implementing SPWA the Sheriff is not acting as the State of Illinois.").

Scott v. O'Grady, 975 F.2d 366, 371 (7th Cir. 1992) ("[W]hen a county sheriff in Illinois performs his duties as the principal executive officer or chief law enforcement officer of the county, he acts as a county official and does not get the benefit of the Eleventh Amendment. But this conclusion does not end our inquiry. . . . The county sheriff acts as an arm of the Illinois state judicial system in executing Writs of Assistance and other state court orders. When fulfilling this statutory duty, the sheriff and his deputies must be deemed state officials for the purposes of Eleventh Amendment immunity.").

Herrington for the Estate of Strahan v. Bradford, No. 3:20-CV-00938-NJR, 2023 WL 6276041, at *3 (S.D. Ill. Sept. 26, 2023) ("To the extent that Lakin argues he is the improper party for this suit, he is wrong. It is true that under Illinois law, county sheriffs are agents of the county sheriff's department, not the county itself. Moy v. County of Cook, 640 N.E. 2d 926, 929-31 (Ill. 1994). As such, a county cannot be held vicariously liable for a sheriff's conduct, because a traditional employer-employee relationship does not exist between a sheriff and a county. Id. Because the county funds the office of the sheriff, however, the county is required to pay a judgment entered against a sheriff's office in an official capacity. Carver v. Sheriff of LaSalle County, 787 N.E.2d 127, 129 (Ill. 2003). Accordingly, a county is a necessary party in any suit seeking damages from an independently elected county officer in an official capacity. Carver v. Sheriff of LaSalle County, Illinois, 324 F.3d 947, 948 (7th Cir. 2003). To the extent that Herrington seeks damages from Lakin in his official capacity, Madison County is a necessary party only for purposes of indemnification and would need to be added. Even so, Lakin remains an appropriate subject of Herrington's complaint.")

Bergquist v. Milazzo, No. 18-CV-3619, 2020 WL 757902, at *5 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 14, 2020) ("Plaintiff seeks to hold Cook County liable under Monell based upon its purported policies, practices, and customs that led to her alleged constitutional deprivations in this case. But in Illinois, the Cook County Sheriff's Office bears the responsibility to appoint and hire deputies and act as custodian of the county courthouse. . . As a result, no liability can attach to Cook County in this case under Monell; the county simply lacks the authority to establish and implement any policies regarding the training or performance by the employees of the Cook County Sheriff's Office. . . In light of the foregoing, this Court dismisses all substantive claims against Cook County. But Cook County remains a necessary party to this for one reason: under Illinois law, it must indemnify the Cook County Sheriff's Office for any official capacity claims. . . Because, as discussed below, Plaintiff sufficiently pleads a Monell claim against the Cook County Sheriff's Office at this stage of the case, County County remains in this suit solely as a necessary party for potential indemnification purposes.")

Moore v. Sheahan, No. 06 C 5443, 2007 WL 461320, at *3, *4 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 8, 2007) ("Moore seeks to hold Cook County liable under § 1983 as the public employer of Sheahan and the John Doe Sheriffs. However, Sheahan is independently elected and his office is not under the control of the Cook County Board of Commissioners. . . Cook County does not control Sheahan or his department, and because it has no authority to train or set policies for the department, it cannot be liable for the Cook County sheriffs' alleged constitutional wrongs. However, Cook County cannot entirely escape involvement in this lawsuit. The Seventh Circuit has held that, because under state law counties must pay damages or settlements entered into or levied against sheriffs' offices, a county in Illinois is a necessary party in any suit seeking damages from an independently elected county officer in an official capacity. . . Accordingly, although Cook County is not directly liable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, we cannot dismiss it from this lawsuit.”).

Knapp v. County of Jefferson, Ill., No. 06-cv-4028-JPG, 2006 WL 1663740, at *3 (S.D. Ill. June 13, 2006) (“As a matter of law, a sheriff in Illinois is not a policymaker for the county in which he works, so his decisions cannot be construed as decisions by the county that could subject the county to liability under Monell. . . . The Jefferson County Sheriff’s Department, however, is a different story. First, because Mulch is a final policymaker for the Jefferson County Sheriff’s Department, . . .the Jefferson County Sheriff’s Department can be liable under Monell for Mulch’s personal involvement discussed in the prior section of this order. Knapp has also alleged a set of facts under which he could prove that the Jefferson County Sheriff’s Department had a policy or custom of not adequately investigating officers before hiring them and not adequately training and supervising them once they were hired. Such failures can amount to a constitutional violation. . . Thus, Knapp has stated a claim against the Jefferson County Sheriff’s Department.”).

Wallace v. Masterson, 345 F.Supp.2d 917, 925-27 (N.D. Ill. 2004) (“The question in this case, then, is whether the Carver cases mandate that the County must pay for a tort judgment entered against Masterson for which the Sheriff is directed to pay by ‘ 9-102 or is found vicariously liable under the doctrine respondeat superior. If so, the County is a necessary party to the litigation and should not be dismissed from the suit. Defendants seek to distinguish the case at bar from the Carver cases because, rather than suing the Sheriff in his official capacity directly, Plaintiff sues Masterson in his personal capacity, seeking compensation by the Sheriff and the County under principles of indirect liability. Ultimately, . . . Plaintiff’s argument that Carver should apply to this case prevails. Plaintiff urges the Court to apply Carver because a suit or theory imposing liability on the Sheriff for Masterson’s actions (whether under ‘ 9-102 or through respondeat superior as to the Sheriff) cannot be anything other than a suit or liability against the Sheriff in his official capacity. . . . . Once one concludes that Count V seeks recovery against the Sheriff in his official capacity, the Court cannot, with principle, distinguish Carver. The Illinois Supreme Court explicitly held that ‘ 9-102 operates to require the county to pay for judgments entered against a sheriff in his official capacity. Indeed, other courts in this district have already held that Carver applies to respondeat superior suits against a sheriff. . . .[T]o the extent that Cook County remains in the lawsuit only for the purpose of paying any judgment that may be entered against the Sheriff in his official capacity, the Court grants the County’s request that it not be subject to discovery.”).

Cooper v. Office of the Sheriff of Will County, 333 F.Supp.2d 728, 736, 737 (N.D. Ill. 2004) (“Defendants argue that although Will County may be a named defendant because it has a financial interest in the outcome of the judgment, it cannot be held liable for respondeat superior liability arising from claims against the Sheriff’s Office or the Deputies. Defendants are correct that Will County is a proper defendant in the instant suit. In an answer to a certified question from the Seventh Circuit, the Illinois Supreme Court determined that, ‘[b]ecause the office of the sheriff is funded by the county, the county is therefore required to pay a judgment entered against a sheriff’s office in an official capacity.’ [citing Carver I] After the court’s ruling, the Seventh Circuit additionally noted that the Supreme Court of Illinois' answer 'implie[d] an additional point of federal law: that a county in Illinois is a necessary party in any suit seeking damages from an independently elected county officer (sheriff, assessor, clerk of court, and so on) in an official capacity.'. . Based on Carver I, Will County will be obligated to provide funds to pay any judgments that may be entered against the Sheriff's Office. Because Will County has a financial interest in the outcome of the litigation, it is a necessary party to the litigation and must not be dismissed. . . . Although Will County must be a named party, it cannot be liable for claims against the Sheriff's Office on the basis of the respondeat superior doctrine, however.")

McRoy v. Sheahan, No. 03 C 4718, 2004 WL 1375527, at *6 (N.D. Ill. June 17, 2004) ("Under Illinois law, sheriffs are classified as county officials, and when the sheriff 'performs his duties as the principal executive officer or chief law enforcement officer of the county.' he is a suable entity under § 1983.").

Fairley v. Andrews, 300 F.Supp.2d 660, 669, 670 (N.D. Ill. 2004) ("The Cook County Jail, and the Cook County Department of Corrections, are solely under the supervision and control of the Sheriff of Cook County. . . The Sheriff is an independently-elected constitutional officer who answers only to the electorate, not to the Cook County Board of Commissioners. . . . Thus, we find that Thompson remains controlling Seventh Circuit law and hold that Cook County cannot be directly liable because it has no authority over the Cook County Sheriff or his deputies.").

Horstman v. County of Dupage, 284 F.Supp.2d 1125, 1130 (N.D. Ill. 2003) ("Mr. Horstman alleges that his injuries came about because the sheriff and state's attorney followed a policy of harassing and arresting law-abiding gun owners. However, even if true, this would not render the county liable. While a sheriff is a county officer, a 'county is given no authority to control the office of the sheriff,' and the Illinois Supreme Court has ruled that the status of sheriffs in relation to their counties is analogous to that of an independent contractor. Moy v. County of Cook, 640 N.E.2d 926, 929 (Ill.1994). The Seventh Circuit has explicitly ruled that Illinois counties are not liable for their sheriffs' actions under Monell, stating that 'Illinois sheriffs are independently elected officials not subject to the control of the county.' [citing Ryan v. County of DuPage]").

Potochney v. Doe, No. 02 C 1484, 2002 WL 31628214, at *2 & n.3 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 21, 2002) (not reported) ("Plaintiffs allege that the County had a policy of failing to train (deputy) sheriffs. This argument fails to state a claim against the County because the Seventh Circuit has ruled that in most circumstances Illinois sheriffs, while agents of the county for which they work, are independently elected officials not subject to a county's respective control. . . . While there may be an argument for liability against the County, the court declines to construct it for the plaintiffs. Rather, it applies the established principle that the Sheriff's Department is a separate entity from the County for purposes of § 1983.").

DeGenova v. Sheriff of Dupage County, No. 97 C 7208, 2001 WL 1345991, at *8 n.8 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 31, 2001) (not reported) ("Plaintiff sues the Sheriff of DuPage County (Richard P. Doria was the sheriff at the time of the incidents in question) in his official capacity. Claims against government officers in their official capacities are actually claims against the government entity for which they work. . . Thus, a suit against the Sheriff of DuPage County in his official capacity is a suit against the Sheriff's Office. Defendant argues, however, that plaintiff cannot sue the Sheriff's Office because it is not a suable entity. As pointed out by plaintiff, though, the Seventh Circuit already held in this case that 'the Sheriff's office has a legal existence separate from the county and the State, and is thus a suable entity.' DeGenova v. Sheriff of DuPage County, 209 F.3d 973, 977 n. 2 (7th Cir.2000) . . . Defendant apparently confuses the Seventh Circuit's recognition that Illinois courts have not yet decided whether a judgment against the Sheriff's Office is collectible (which is a matter of first impression for Illinois courts), see id., with whether the entity is suable. The question of whether a judgment is collectible has been certified to the Illinois Supreme Court. See Carver v. Sheriff of LaSalle County, Illinois, 243 F.3d 379, 386 (7th Cir.2001).")

Stewart v. Rouse, No. 97 C 8141, 1999 WL 102774, at *7 (N.D. Ill. Feb. 22, 1999) (not reported) ("Together, Ruehman and McCurdy indicate that the Eleventh Amendment does not shield the sheriff from liability where a deputy exercising discretion in the execution of a state court warrant exceeds the scope of delegated state authority.")

Buckley v. County of DuPage, No. 88 C 1939, 1997 WL 587594, *5, *6 & n.4 (N.D. Ill. Sept. 17, 1997) (not reported) ("Given that sheriffs are the final policymakers for their counties with respect to their law enforcement functions, the next question is for whom is the sheriff the final policymaker − the state, the county, or the office of the sheriff? Stated differently, may an Illinois county be liable under § 1983 for actions of its sheriff? Two decisions of the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals have concluded that they cannot. See Ryan v. County of DuPage, 45 F.3d 1090, 1092 (7th Cir.1995) (holding that county was properly dismissed from § 1983 complaint because it was not responsible for complained-of conduct of sheriff's employees); Thompson v. Duke, 882 F.2d 1180, 1187 (7th Cir.1989) (holding that plaintiff could not maintain § 1983 action against Cook County for policies, practices, and customs of Sheriff of Cook County related to Cook County Jail), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 929, 110 S.Ct. 2167, 109 L.Ed.2d 496 (1990). . . . [A]fter consideration of the Supreme Court's recent decision in McMillian v. Monroe County, Ala., __ U.S. __, 117 S.Ct. 1734, 138 L.Ed.2d 1 (1997), the court concludes that the question of whether an Illinois sheriff is the final policymaker for the county must be subjected to a more searching analysis than was apparently applied in Ryan and Thompson. . . . In McMillian, it was undisputed that the sheriff was a 'policymaker' for purposes of § 1983; the question before the Court was whether he was a policymaker for the State of Alabama or for Monroe County. Based on an examination of Alabama law, the Court concluded that the sheriff represented the State of Alabama and was not a policymaker for the county. . . . Applying the McMillian Court's analysis to Illinois' treatment of the office of county sheriff, the court concludes that Illinois' sheriffs are county officials and that counties are therefore liable for the actions of those sheriffs and their departments. . . . While the court cannot say that Illinois counties exercise a great deal of control over county sheriffs, they clearly exercise more control over county sheriffs than do counties in Alabama. Moreover, the fact that the County Board has little or no direct control over an Illinois sheriff underscores the latter's role as final policymaker on law enforcement issues. It provides little help on answering the corollary question as to whether he is the final policymaker for the County or for some other entity. The overall organization of the county system in Illinois suggests that sheriffs, as county officials, make policy for the county and not for the State nor simply for their own departments. For these reasons, the court concludes that, based on Illinois law, a sheriff is the final policymaker (on law enforcement issues) for the county in which she is elected. . . . The court reads McMillian to hold that the proper analysis relates to whether the State or the County is the entity liable for the complained-of acts of the Sheriff, and not whether an independent third party (i.e., the Sheriff) is the proper Monell defendant.").

Woodget v. Cook County Department of Corrections, No. 94 C 3410, 1994 WL 695453, *5 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 10, 1994) (not reported) ("In Ruehman v. Village of Palos Park,. . . the court noted that, as the clerk of a circuit court is defined by state law as being an employee of the state, a damages suit against the Clerk of the Circuit Court in her official capacity is essentially a suit against the state despite the fact that Cook County may be required to pay any liability incurred. As the state is not a person suable under § 1983, [cite omitted], the Ruehman court concluded that the plaintiff's damages claim against the Circuit Court Clerk was not permitted. . . Given the reasoning of Ruehman, this Court grants Defendants' Motion to Dismiss the § 1983 claim for damages against Defendant Pucinski in her official capacity.").

Indiana

Kinder v. Marion County Prosecutor's Office, No. 24-1952, 2025 WL 914342, at *4–6 (7th Cir. Mar. 26, 2025) ("Our court held in Jones that an Indiana county prosecutor served as a state official, and was thus not a 'person' under § 1983, when 'prosecuting criminal cases.'. . But because the evaluation is not 'categorical,'. . Jones does not necessarily resolve the issue here: Whether the prosecutor's office in its employment function is also an arm of the state. An initial matter requires clarification. Kinder argues Jones is distinguishable because she has not sued Mears in his 'official capacity,' but rather the MCPO 'as an employer.' But even as an employer, the MCPO acts in its 'official capacity.' Jones dealt with a suit against a prosecutor in his official capacity, yet the Supreme Court has held that 'an official-capacity suit is ... to be treated as a suit against the entity.'. . Accordingly, the lawsuit in Jones was against both the prosecutor in his official capacity and the prosecutor's office as an entity. Turning back to the question of the 'person' who can be sued under § 1983, Jones dealt extensively with the Indiana laws creating the prosecutor's office. We provide a brief summary here. Prosecutors are constitutional officials, 'removable only by way of impeachment.'. . . No state laws govern the MCPO's employment decisions per se. But Indiana law does contain a requirement for counties to finance prosecutors' offices as to employment. Counties must pay the salaries for non-state-salaried prosecutors, 'investigators, [and] clerical assistance,' as well as other expenses 'necessary for the proper discharge of the duties imposed by law' on the elected prosecutors. . . Kinder's strongest argument is that there is financial interdependence between some of the office's employees and the county, as only the prosecutor and certain deputy prosecutors are paid by the state. . . The remaining employees are paid by the county. But there are two reasons why Kinder's argument does not require us to treat the office as a county instrumentality. First, the Supreme Court did not find the factor of county funding determinative in McMillian, where the county was responsible for paying the sheriff's salary. . . Payment from the county did not 'tip the balance' away from the sheriff being a state official because the county did not have 'the discretion to refuse payment completely.' . . In McMillian, Alabama had a funding scheme similar to that here, where the county could not refuse funds below what was 'reasonably necessary' to the sheriff's operations. . . In Indiana, counties may be compelled to remit payment if they are found to have withheld funds below a 'necessary' level. . . Because Indiana law ensures that counties cannot deny prosecutors' offices necessary funds, counties lack 'control over' the offices. . . Albeit in a different context, the Indiana Supreme Court has held that probation officers, even though paid from county treasuries, qualify as state employees. . . These decisions support the conclusion that the MCPO is not excluded from being an arm of the state solely because it receives some county funding. Second, in Regents the Supreme Court instructed that when evaluating financial interdependence, courts must consider whether any money judgment 'would be enforceable against the State.'. . Many courts, including ours, have placed special emphasis on this factor. . . Indeed, the Eleventh Circuit has recognized that 'the presence of a state treasury drain alone may trigger Eleventh Amendment immunity and make consideration of the other factors unnecessary.'. . Indiana law provides for just such a drain from the state treasury. The state will 'pay the expenses incurred by' a prosecutor for an action that arises from making or performing 'a decision, a duty, an obligation, a privilege, or a responsibility of the prosecuting attorney's office.'. . These 'expenses' include all costs related to litigation—attorney's fees, judgment or settlement amounts, and costs. . . As the Southern District of Indiana has noted, this indemnification obligation 'draws no distinction between' suits 'based on prosecution of a criminal case' and those 'based on [employment] decisions.'. . So, even though Marion County pays the salaries of some of the MCPO's employees, a significant financial interdependence exists between that prosecutor's office and the State of Indiana. After considering the many laws creating the prosecutor's office, as well as the financial interdependence between that office and the state, we conclude that for Kinder's claim, the MCPO is an arm of the state. It is therefore not a suable "person" under § 1983. We emphasize two additional points. This holding does not, as Kinder argues, 'open[ ] the door for all 91 prosecutors' office[s] in Indiana' to racially discriminate with no recourse available to plaintiffs. Congress may by statute abrogate states' Eleventh Amendment immunity, as it did via Title VII. . . Also, this decision was made more straightforward by the state's indemnifying county prosecutors for all actions taken within the scope of employment. Based on our review of the caselaw and other state statutes, this indemnification is rare—even for Indiana officials. See Ind. Code § 36-1-17-3 (establishing that local government officials may be eligible for reimbursement from the county, not the state, and only when proceedings terminate in the official's favor). We offer no opinion on whether a county prosecutor's office would enjoy immunity from a § 1983 claim alleging discriminatory employment practices absent this broad indemnification obligation.") Kujawski v. Bd. Of Commissioners of Bartholomew County, 183 F.3d 734, 738 (7th Cir. 1999) ("[W]hen Officer Parker promulgated a policy about the confiscation of weapons from those detained at home, he was acting on authority delegated by the court which is part of the state government. By contrast, here, we must focus on Officer Parker's decisions relating to the employment of community corrections officers. Because the County has personnel authority over community corrections officers, we believe that the district court concluded correctly that, when Officer Parker made employment decisions concerning these employees, he acted as a decisionmaker for the County.").

Luck v. Rovenstine, 168 F.3d 323, 326 (7th Cir. 1999) ("We first address Luck's claim that Sheriff Rovenstine may be liable in his official capacity for the violation of Luck's constitutional rights. This is, in essence, a claim against the office of sheriff rather than a claim against Sheriff Rovenstine himself, and we therefore understand the claim to be directed against the county. . . . Indiana Code ' 36-2-13-5(a) provides without further qualification that it is the sheriff's duty to take care of the jail and its prisoners. Thus, the sheriff's actions are not subject to any further scrutiny or ratification by the county, and the sheriff serves as the county's official decision-maker in matters involving the county jail.")

McCurdy v. Sheriff of Madison County, 128 F.3d 1144, 1145-46 (7th Cir. 1997) ("[T]he sheriff was acting as the agent of the state court system, which is, of course, a part of the state for purposes of the Eleventh Amendment. The warrant was issued by a state court, and merely served by the sheriff. It could as well have been served by a bailiff or other court employee, for the sheriff's duty to serve the warrant was mandatory. . . so the county was not interposed as a decision-making body between the state and him. Lancaster v. Monroe County, 116 F.3d 1419, 1429-30 (11th Cir. 1997). As an agent of the state, though not an employee, the sheriff's office . . . was a part of state government rather than county government when serving the state court's warrant. . . . The added wrinkle here, however, is that by delaying the service of the arrest warrant for so long, the sheriff's office may have exceeded the scope of its delegated state authority, may have ceased, therefore, to be an arm of the state . . . . If that is what happened here, this suit would probably be against the deputy in his personal capacity; but it would be (also or instead) against the sheriff in his official capacity if the deputy had been acting pursuant to a policy of the sheriff. . . Conceivably, therefore, if improbably, the delay in serving the warrant on McCurdy was pursuant to official policy, and if so he would have an official-capacity suit that was not barred by the Eleventh Amendment.").

Argandona v. Lake County Sheriff's Department, No. 2:06 cv 259, 2007 WL 518799, at *5, *6 (N.D. Ind. Feb. 13, 2007) ("The court concludes that the Lake County Sheriff's Department, when acting in its law enforcement capacity, is neither an arm of the State nor a mere extension of Lake County. Rather, the Department is a separate municipal entity and subject to suit under § 1983. . . . In his response to Lake County's Motion to Dismiss, Argandona admits that Lake County is not liable for the actions of the Sheriff's Department. Rather, he argues that Lake County is a necessary party because it is responsible for paying any judgment awarded to the plaintiff pursuant to I.C. § 34-13-4-1. Argandona makes the argument without reference to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 19 or any case applying the rule regarding necessary parties. The section of the Indiana Code cited by Argandona does not create obligations that require Lake County to remain a defendant in this matter. The section states in pertinent part that when a public employee is subject to civil liability, 'the governmental entity ... shall ... pay any judgment ... if ... the governing body of the political subdivision ... determines that paying the judgment ... is in the best interests of the governmental entity.' I.C. § 34-13-4-1 (2006) This section, formerly I.C. § 34-4-16.7-1, makes the grant of indemnity voluntary on the part of the governmental entity. . . Argandona's reliance on this statute is misplaced. First, the application of the statute regards only the indemnification of an individual employee. The liability that may arise from Mikulich in his official capacity, or any liability otherwise placed on the Sheriff's Department, is outside the scope of this provision. In addition, the statute requires that a decision to indemnify an employee must be made by the 'governing body of the political subdivision.' I.C. § 34-13-4-1(2) As the court already has discussed, the Sheriff's Department is a separate entity. Any decision to indemnify Mikulich under this provision necessarily would be made by the governing body of the Sheriff's Department. Further, the provision regards indemnity for acts or omissions that violate the 'civil rights laws of the United States.' The statute creates no apparent obligation on any political subdivision to indemnify Mikulich from liability he may face under Argandona's state law claims. This indemnity, similar to that described under I .C. § 34-13-4-1, is a product of the Indiana Tort Claims Act and also leaves indemnity to the discretion of the governmental entity. . . Not only do these statutes have limited application to this matter, there is no evidence in the record that Lake County has agreed to indemnification. Because Argandona has admitted there is no other basis for leaving Lake County in this case, the county's motion to dismiss is GRANTED.")

Bibbs v. Newman, 997 F. Supp. 1174, 1176, 1181 (S.D. Ind. 1998) ("[W]hen an Indiana prosecuting attorney makes employment decisions concerning deputy prosecuting attorneys, the prosecuting attorney acts as a state official for purposes of the Eleventh Amendment to the United States Constitution and 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . . In Indiana, a prosecuting attorney does not exercise county power and does not answer to county authorities except for seeking 'necessary' funds to operate the office. Weighing against the limited significance of the county appropriations for office operations are the prosecuting attorney's role as a state official under the state constitution, as well as the significant fact that any judgment in a lawsuit against a prosecutor would be paid by the State of Indiana. The decision to hire or fire a deputy prosecuting attorney is more of a state action than a county action. Although it is clear that a prosecuting attorney in Indiana does not act as a county official in this situation, it might be possible to argue that the prosecuting attorney holds neither a state nor a county office, but acts as a 'circuit official' for the relevant judicial circuit. A political subdivision cannot invoke a state's sovereign immunity under the Eleventh Amendment. A political subdivision, however, maintains a status independent of the state and generally has the power to levy taxes, pay judgments, and issue bonds. . . A judicial circuit in Indiana has none of these attributes. Plaintiff therefore cannot avoid the Eleventh Amendment problem here by treating the prosecutor as a 'circuit' official.").

Wisconsin

Aleman v. Milwaukee County, 35 F. Supp.2d 710, 717 n.7, 721 (E.D. Wis. 1999) ("The court notes that Judge Adelman of this district court, in a well- reasoned opinion, recently addressed the issue of Wisconsin sheriffs' immunity under the Eleventh Amendment. See Abraham v. Piechowski, 13 F.Supp.2d 870 (E.D.Wis.1998). While this court concurs in much of Judge Adelman's reasoning, the sheriff's functions at issue here are distinct from those in Abraham, and thus require a separate analysis. . . . If plaintiffs prove their damages, Milwaukee County will have to pick up the Sheriff's share of the judgment. The County Defendants have not presented the court with any evidence that the State of Wisconsin may incur any financial liability for a judgment against the Sheriff. Accordingly, the court finds that the Sheriff is not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity for the claims in this action").

Abraham v. Piechowski, 13 F. Supp.2d 870, 871-79 (E.D. Wis. 1998) (concluding that "in view of Wisconsin constitutional and statutory changes, the Seventh Circuit's last pronouncement on the issue [in Soderbeck v. Burnett County, Wis., 821 F.2d 446 (7th Cir.1987) (Soderbeck II)] [no longer] has continuing force[,]" and "that when sheriffs perform law enforcement functions they represent the county not the state, and that sovereign immunity, therefore, does not bar this lawsuit.").

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Arkansas

Evans v. City of Helena-West Helena, Arkansas, 912 F.3d 1145, 1146-47 (8th Cir. 2019) ("The district court's other rationale—that the clerk is a state government official whose actions are not attributable to the City—is more complicated. Whether the clerk acts on behalf of the State, the City, or the County depends on the definition of the clerk's official functions under relevant state law. McMillian v. Monroe County, 520 U.S. 781, 786, 117 S.Ct. 1734, 138 L.Ed.2d 1 (1997); Dean v. County of Gage, 807 F.3d 931, 942 (8th Cir. 2015). The City defends the district court's conclusion based on Amendment 80 to the Arkansas Constitution. That Amendment, effective in 2001, vests the judicial power in the 'Judicial Department of state government, consisting of a Supreme Court and other courts established by this Constitution.' Ark. Const. amend. 80, § 1. Another section provides that 'District Courts are established as the trial courts of limited jurisdiction.' Id. § 7(A). The City maintains that because the Phillips County District Court was part of the judicial department of state government, and the clerk was appointed by a judge of the district court, the clerk's actions against Evans were attributable to the State, not to the City. Amendment 80, however, was not fully implemented immediately as to the Phillips County District Court. The Amendment granted the General Assembly 'the power to establish jurisdiction of all courts ... and the power to establish judicial circuits and districts and the number of judges for Circuit Courts and District Courts.'. . Although the legislature provided in 2003 that Phillips County would have a district court with elected judges, . . . the judges were not state employees. As of 2008, the 'structure of limited jurisdiction courts consist[ed] of a combination of full-time and part-time district and city courts funded by city and county governments[.]' Ark. Code Ann.

§ 16-17-1101(2) (West 2008). The General Assembly then established 'a pilot program that create[d] a limited number of state-funded pilot state district court judgeships,'. . . but Phillips County was not included. . . Judges outside the pilot program, like those in Phillips County, continued to be employees of the cities or counties, or both, that they served. . . It was not until 2017, after the events alleged in Evans's complaint, that Phillips County was one of several counties that were 'reorganized as state district courts and served by a state district court judge.'. . . Until then, Phillips County was among those counties that were 'served by local district courts.'. . . During the relevant period, state law gave cities and counties authority to set salaries for the district court clerk, . . and the complaint alleges that employees of the court were hired by the City and paid by the City, with salaries accounted for in the City's annual budget. The district court resolved the case on a motion to dismiss, so the record has not been developed with respect to the clerk's duties and responsibilities, the source of the clerk's pay, or the degree of control that state or local officials, respectively, exercised over the clerk. . . At this stage of the proceeding, however, we conclude that the complaint states at least a plausible claim that the clerk was a city official at the time of the alleged wrongdoing, in which case the City could be accountable for actions of the clerk that establish or carry out an unconstitutional policy or custom of the municipality. We therefore conclude that the case should not have been dismissed for failure to state a claim on the grounds specified by the district court. We express no view on whether the complaint otherwise is sufficient to state a claim against the City.")

Iowa

Shepard v. Wapello County, 303 F.Supp.2d 1004, 1017, 1018 (S.D. Iowa 2003) ("The Sheriff's statutory authority over the removal of sheriff's department employees, the comprehensive policies adopted by Sheriff Kirkendall with respect to the retention, discipline and discharge of employees of his department, and the testimony of Supervisor Parker and Sheriff Kirkendall establish that the Sheriff was the final policy maker for his department with respect to the discharge of employees. Consequently the retaliatory discharge in violation of Shepard's rights under the First Amendment was, in light of the jury's answer to the special interrogatory, the policy of Wapello County subjecting it to § 1983 liability for the decision.").

Minnesota

Butler v. Fletcher, 465 F.3d 340, 342 (8th Cir. 2006) ("Butler sued Sheriff Fletcher in his official capacity, so in essence, this is a suit against Ramsey County. 'A county is liable [under § 1983] if an action or policy itself violated federal law, or if the action or policy was lawful on its face but led an employee to violate a plaintiff's rights and was taken with deliberate indifference as to its known or obvious consequences.'").

St. James v. City of Minneapolis, No. 05-2348 (DWF/JJG), 2006 WL 2591016, at *3, *4 (D. Minn. June 13, 2006) ("Whether HCAO's prosecutorial decisions represent official County policy for § 1983 purposes is a question of first impression in the District of Minnesota and Eighth Circuit. . . . Applying the McMillian framework to the facts of this case, the Court finds that the Hennepin County Attorney, when acting in its prosecutorial role, is a state actor and not a local government entity subject to § 1983 liability. The office of the county attorney, although identified as a county office by statute, functions as an arm of the state when prosecuting felonies. Minnesota law supports this conclusion. . . . The prosecutorial role of the county attorney, which is independent from the county board, outweighs the fact that the county pays the salaries of the county attorney's employees. Additionally, the fact that the Minnesota constitution does not identify HCAO as a member of the executive department is not determinative of whether county attorneys are state actors when prosecuting cases. The Minnesota Supreme Court has held that the obligation of the county attorney to prosecute criminal cases does, indeed, arise from the Minnesota Constitution.").

Nebraska

Dean v. Cty. of Gage, Neb., 807 F.3d 931, 942 (8th Cir. 2015) ("A comparison of Nebraska and Alabama law demonstrates that Nebraska sheriffs make policy on behalf of their counties. In McMillian, the Court examined three compelling authorities: (1) the Alabama constitution lists sheriffs as members of the state executive branch; (2) 'authority to impeach sheriffs was moved from the county courts to the State Supreme Court,' and (3) the Alabama Supreme Court has held that 'tort claims brought against sheriffs based on their official acts ... constitute suits against the State, not suits against the sheriff's county.'. . Nebraska law differs from Alabama law in each area. Neither the Nebraska constitution nor its statutes list sheriffs as members of its executive branch. . . Unlike Alabama, Nebraska district courts have authority to remove county officers, including sheriffs. . . Finally, the Nebraska Supreme Court has held a county liable for the negligent and intentional torts of its sheriff. . . Other Nebraska laws indicate that sheriffs represent the county when acting in a law enforcement capacity. A sheriff is a county officer. . .A sheriff's salary is set by the county board. . . The county provides the sheriff's office with equipment. . . The registered voters elect the county sheriff and may recall the sheriff from office. . . True, some statutes show state influence. For example, sheriffs are required to train in the Nebraska Law Enforcement Training Center. . . Sheriffs 'shall attend upon the district court' and must 'execute or serve all writs and process issued by any county court.'. . The State also empowers sheriffs to act beyond the boundaries of their counties in some circumstances. . . Nowhere has the Nebraska legislature given other county officers the authority to enact policies on criminal investigation and arrests. . . However, based on the McMillian factors, Sheriff DeWitt represents the county in the area of law enforcement investigations and arrests.")

Poor Bear v. Nesbitt, 300 F.Supp.2d 904, 916, 917 (D. Neb. 2004) ("Nebraska law does not grant authority to counties or county sheriffs like Robbins to set policy regarding apprehension of individuals who violate the state's criminal laws. Neb.Rev.Stat. Ann. '' 23-103 to -145, 23-1701 to -1737 (LexisNexis 1999 & Cum Supp.2003). To the contrary, county sheriffs like defendant Robbins are bound by state law to exercise only those powers and duties 'conferred and imposed upon him or her by other statutes and by the common law,' including the duty to 'apprehend, on view or warrant, and bring to the court all felons and disturbers and violators of the criminal laws of this state, to suppress all riots, affrays, and unlawful assemblies which may come to his or her knowledge, and generally to keep the peace in his or her proper city.' Neb.Rev.Stat. Ann. '' 23-1701.02 & 23-1701.03. See also Neb.Rev.Stat. Ann. ' 23-1710 (sheriff has duty to preserve peace, ferret out crime, apprehend and arrest all criminals, secure evidence of crimes committed, present evidence to county attorney and grand jury, and file informations 'against all persons who he knows, or has reason to believe, have violated the laws of the state.") In this case, Poor Bear essentially alleges that Robbins violated Poor Bear's constitutional rights when Robbins participated in issuing an order preventing Poor Bear and others from engaging in a protest march down the main street of Whiteclay after having observed violence and destruction during a similar protest just a week earlier, apprehending Poor Bear when he violated such order, and pursuing prosecution for violation of the order, yet failing to zealously pursue crimes that have been committed against the Lakota people. The policies Sheriff Robbins is charged with carrying out − keeping peace, apprehending and arresting violators of the law, and pursuing prosecution of those who have violated state law − are set by the state legislature, and the implementation of these policies by a municipal official does not constitute formulation by a final policy-making body sufficient to impose liability upon the municipality. . . . In short, a 'county sheriff acts pursuant to state-enacted restrictions in enforcing the criminal laws of Nebraska and is not himself a policy maker for the county for which he is sheriff.' Branting v. Schneiderheinz, 1996 WL 580457, at *3 (D.Neb.1996). Accordingly, I shall grant defendant Robbins' motion to dismiss the causes of action asserted against him for failure to state a claim.").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Arizona [state]

Flanders v. Maricopa County, 54 P.3d 837, 847 (Ariz.App.Div. 2002) ("The Sheriff set the conditions of Flanders' confinement by establishing policies in his role as chief administrator for County jails. That the Sheriff may also be individually liable for conditions he established at this facility does not negate the County's liability for his actions as the person who exercises the County's governmental authority. . . .Because the judgment against the Sheriff was for constitutional violations committed in his official capacity, the County is liable as a matter of law. . .Such a judgment imposes liability upon the public entity that the official represents, whether or not that entity is joined as a party, provided the public entity received notice and an opportunity to respond.")

Arizona [federal]

Taylor v. County of Pima, 913 F.3d 930, 937-39 (9th Cir. 2019) (Graber, J., concurring) ("Plaintiff Louis Taylor has asserted claims against the County under Monell v. Department of Social Services, . . . which requires proof of a policy, practice, or custom by the County. He asserts that the actions of certain government officials amounted to a practice or custom by the County. The County's sole argument on appeal is that the relevant officials were, in fact, working on behalf of the State, so the County cannot be liable. The Supreme Court has recognized the viability of that argument: if the relevant officials were working on behalf of the State, then any practice or custom was a State practice or custom, not a municipal practice or custom. McMillian v. Monroe County, 520 U.S. 781, 117 S.Ct. 1734, 138 L.Ed.2d 1 (1997). But that argument does not bear on whether the municipality has Eleventh Amendment immunity. Proof that the relevant officials did not work for the municipality defeats the plaintiff's case but by virtue of an ordinary failure to prove an element of a claim—here, the existence of a municipal policy, practice, or custom. If the defendant municipality is correct that the relevant official was a State official, then the plaintiff has failed to state a claim against the municipality. Eleventh Amendment immunity plays no role. . . . Not surprisingly, our cases, too, describe this doctrine in terms of whether the municipality was the actor, rather than in terms of sovereign immunity and the Eleventh Amendment. [collecting cases] . . . .Applying Swint, other circuit courts have held, unambiguously, that '[w]hen a county appeals asserting that a sheriff is not a county policymaker under § 1983, that presents a defense to liability issue for the county over which we do not have interlocutory jurisdiction.'. . Applying Swint's rule here, we lack jurisdiction over the County's interlocutory appeal because the County argues solely that the relevant officials were not County policymakers. Our decision in Cortez overlooked this fundamental jurisdictional defect. Cortez, like this case, was an interlocutory appeal by a county from the denial of Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . We stated, correctly, that we had jurisdiction over the denial of Eleventh Amendment immunity, but we then reached the issue whether the sheriff acted on behalf of the county or the state, incorrectly characterizing that issue as pertaining to the Eleventh Amendment. . . We did not cite Swint. Accordingly, the rule in our circuit, unlike the rule in every other circuit, is that interlocutory appeals may be taken from a district court's rejection of a municipality's argument that the relevant government officials acted on behalf of the State and not the municipality. We plainly erred in Cortez. In an appropriate case, we should undo this error in our en banc capacity.")

Melendres v. Maricopa County, 897 F.3d 1217, 1223 (9th Cir. 2018), cert. denied, 140 S. Ct. 96 (2019) ("We turn now to the County's contention that it is not a proper party to this action because MCSO and its sheriff do not act on behalf of the County. We have already—thrice—rejected this argument. In Melendres II, we substituted the County as a defendant in this action in the place of MCSO, relying on a state court case holding that MCSO lacked separate legal status from the County. . . In Melendres III, we elaborated on the County's liability for MCSO's actions. We explained that 'under the Supreme Court's decisions interpreting 42 U.S.C. § 1983, "if the sheriff's actions constitute county policy, then the county is liable for them."'. . Applying this rule, we concluded, 'Arizona state law makes clear' that the MCSO sheriff's 'law-enforcement acts' constitute County policy because he has 'final policymaking authority.'. . We recently revisited the issue again, holding that the sheriff acts as a final policymaker for the County on law-enforcement matters. United States v. County of Maricopa, 889 F.3d 648, 651 (9th Cir. 2018). Our prior decisions are binding on us now. . . The County is a proper party to this action.")

United States v. County of Maricopa, Arizona, 889 F.3d 648, 650-53 (9th Cir. 2018) ("Throughout the proceedings below, the County argued that it too should be dismissed as a defendant, on two different grounds. First, the County argued that when a sheriff in Arizona adopts policies relating to law-enforcement matters, such as the traffic-stop policies at issue here, he does not act as a policymaker for the county. He instead acts as a policymaker for his own office, or perhaps for the State. The County contended that, because Arpaio's policies were not policies of the County, it could not be held liable for the constitutional violations caused by execution of them. Second, the County argued that, even if Arpaio acted as a policymaker for the County, neither Title VI nor 34 U.S.C. § 12601 permits a local government to be held liable for the actions of its policymakers. The district court rejected both of the County's arguments. The court then granted the United States' motion for summary judgment with respect to claims predicated on the traffic-stop policies found unlawful in Melendres. The court held that the County was barred by the doctrine of issue preclusion from relitigating the issues decided in the Melendres action, which by that point had reached final judgment. The County does not contest that if the Melendres findings are binding here, they establish violations of Title VI and § 12601. On appeal, Maricopa County advances three arguments: (1) Arpaio did not act as a final policymaker for the County; (2) neither Title VI nor § 12601 renders the County liable for the actions of its policymakers; and (3) the County is not bound by the Melendres findings. We address each of these arguments in turn. . . .We have already rejected Maricopa County's first argument—that Arpaio was not a final policymaker for the County. In Melendres v. Maricopa County, 815 F.3d 645 (9th Cir. 2016) (Melendres III), we noted that 'Arizona state law makes clear that Sheriff Arpaio's law-enforcement acts constitute Maricopa County policy since he "has final policymaking authority."'. . . Because that determination was arguably dicta, we have conducted our own analysis of the issue, and we reach the same conclusion. To determine whether Arpaio acted as a final policymaker for the County, we consult Arizona's Constitution and statutes, and the court decisions interpreting them. . . Those sources confirm that, with respect to law-enforcement matters, sheriffs in Arizona act as final policymakers for their respective counties. . . . It is true that sheriffs in Arizona are independently elected and that a county board of supervisors does not exercise complete control over a sheriff's actions. Nonetheless, 'the weight of the evidence' strongly supports the conclusion that sheriffs in Arizona act as final policymakers for their respective counties on law-enforcement matters. . . Because the traffic-stop policies at issue fall within the scope of a sheriff's law-enforcement duties, we conclude that Arpaio acted as a final policymaker for Maricopa County when he instituted those policies. . . .Maricopa County next argues that, even if Arpaio acted as the County's final policymaker, neither Title VI nor 34 U.S.C. § 12601 permits the County to be held liable for his acts. Whether either statute authorizes policymaker liability is an issue of first impression. We conclude, informed by precedent governing the liability of local governments under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, that both statutes authorize policymaker liability. . . .In short, Maricopa County is liable for violations of Title VI and § 12601 stemming from its own official policies. As discussed above, when Arpaio adopted the racially discriminatory traffic-stop policies at issue, he acted as a final policymaker for the County. Those policies were therefore the County's own, and the district court correctly held the County liable for the violations of Title VI and § 12601 caused by those policies.")

California [state]

Venegas v. County of Los Angeles, 11 Cal.Rptr.3d 692, 717, 723 (2004) (Werdegar, J., concurring and dissenting) ("Today's decision creates a direct conflict between this court and the federal Court of Appeals on the immunity of California sheriffs from liability on a federal cause of action. [citing Brewster v. Shasta County, 275 F.3d 803 (9th Cir.2001)] Both positions have some support in precedent and logic, suggesting that the anomaly of conflicting decisions is likely to endure until resolved by a higher authority. Although dependent on an understanding of sheriffs' functions under state law, immunity from section 1983 liability is of course a federal question. . . The conflict created today can, therefore, be resolved effectively only by the United States Supreme Court. . . .[T]he disputed point is the relevance and weight, under federal law, to be given a particular aspect of state law defining the relationship of California sheriffs to the state and county governments. Until this question is resolved, federal district courts in California will be required to follow one rule, permitting section 1983 suits against sheriffs' departments, while California superior courts will be required to follow the opposite rule, prohibiting such actions. I urge the United States Supreme Court to consider removing this anomaly by deciding the underlying issue of federal law.")

Venegas v. County of Los Angeles, 11 Cal.Rptr.3d 692, 716 (2004) (Kennard, J., concurring and dissenting) ("Because the Ninth Circuit considers California sheriffs performing law enforcement functions to be county officers, the majority's contrary conclusion here creates a split that results in immunizing sheriffs from section 1983 liability in actions brought in state court while exposing them to liability in identical actions filed in federal court. This effectively drives California civil rights plaintiffs with actions against a county sheriff out of our court system and into federal court. To ensure uniformity in the enforcement of federal civil rights law in both state and federal courts in California, the United States Supreme Court should decide which view is correct.")

Chiaramonte v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, B243215, 2014 WL 4678955, *7, *8 (Cal. Ct. App. Sept. 22, 2014) ("No California case. . . has held that the sheriff acts on behalf of the state in the provision of medical care to inmates of the county jail. Unlike assigning inmates to cells or buildings in the jail, segregating them for security reasons, or determining whether to release them, providing medical care to inmates does not necessarily involve a law enforcement function. . . No case has held that everything the sheriff does in operating the jails qualifies as conduct on behalf of the state. To the contrary, the determination of whether a particular government official acts for the state or the county ' "does not require an 'all-or-nothing' categorization applying to every type of conduct in which the official may engage. Rather, the issue is whether the official is a local policymaker with regard to the particular action alleged to have deprived the plaintiff of civil rights."'. . .Chiaramonte claims that the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department performed three particular functions or actions, pursuant to policies, that violated section 1983. Chiaramonte alleges that the sheriff's department (1) failed to respond promptly to a medical emergency, (2) did not have a doctor or emergency medical care professional at or near the jail in which he was incarcerated, and (3) employed a (far away) 'Medical Officer of the Day' who had a history of abandoning and ignoring inmates who needed medical attention. We agree with the County that the first claim, regarding the timeliness of the response to Chiaramonte's medical condition, involves law enforcement activity similar to Bougere and Peters, because the County submitted evidence that the response time is related to jail, inmate, and staff security. For example, Young, a custody assistant on duty during Chiaramonte's medical emergency, stated that he needs to 'call for deputy back-up, before entering the dorm ... for safety and security reasons,' and that he must wait until 'sufficient custody personnel arrive[s]' before it is safe to enter the dorm. Kim stated that the jail must provide her with a security escort and also secure the infirmary before she can respond to a 'man down' emergency in the dormitory. Deputy Torres, who was working the evening shift, stated that if it is necessary to enter a cell containing other inmates to reach a 'man down,' he must wait for back-up deputies to arrive before entering the cell 'for safety and security reasons.' Thus, policies like the one in this case that affect the time it takes to respond to a medical emergency unquestionably relate to law enforcement activities of the sheriff, and under Venegas, Bougere, and Peters government officials implementing and executing those policies are entitled to immunity. In contrast, Chiaramonte's second claim, the decision whether and when to have a doctor on the jail premises, does not involve the kind of law enforcement activities that the Venegas, Bougere, and Peters courts found were actions taken on behalf of the state. In the 'particular action' at issue in this case, the sheriff's department was not investigating criminal activity (Venegas), assisting in the prosecution of crimes (Pitts), maintaining security in the jail (Bougere), or ensuring the safety of the public (Peters). The sheriff's department was performing the administrative function of scheduling doctors. The only evidence the County submitted in its motion for summary judgment of why there was no doctor at the jail when Chiaramonte required medical attention was the statement by Dr. Julian Wallace, the Chief Physician of the Sheriff's Department's Medical Services Bureau, that the jail where Chiaramonte was incarcerated had doctors at the facility clinic Monday through Friday from 6:30 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. but not after that. Such a scheduling decision seems reasonable, but it is a scheduling decision, not a law enforcement one. Indeed, the scheduling of doctor shifts at the jail is closer to the employment decision or 'administrative function arguably unrelated to the prosecution of state criminal law violations' that the Supreme Court in Pitts suggested was not an action on behalf of the state. . .The County asserts that '[t]here is no authority whatsoever for the County Board of Supervisors to dictate the policies within the jail regarding medical care, including staffing of medical personnel, for the prisoners or to otherwise control the operation of the jail in this regard.' Penal Code section 4015, subdivision (a), however, provides: 'The board of supervisors shall provide the sheriff with necessary food, clothing, and bedding, for those prisoners, which shall be of a quality and quantity at least equal to the minimum standards and requirements prescribed by the Board of Corrections for the feeding, clothing, and care of prisoners in all county, city and other local jails and detention facilities.' Chiaramonte also cites to Government Code sections 29602['[t]he expenses necessarily incurred in the support of persons charged with or convicted of a crime and committed to the county jail ... are county charges'] and 25351 [board of supervisors has the power to construct, expand, and repair jails]. As the court recognized in Board of Supervisors v. Superior Court (1995) 33 Cal.App.4th 1724, Penal Code section 4015, subdivision (a), and Government Code section 29602, as well as 'other statutes[,] establish the duty of the board of supervisors to provide the sheriff with necessities for prisoners.'. . Although this is a close case, the facts and circumstances here do not justify an extension of Eleventh Amendment immunity to all of Chiaramonte's claims. Because on this record at least one of Chiaramonte's claims is not subject to Eleventh Amendment immunity, the County was not entitled to summary adjudication of his cause of action under section 1983.")

Pierce v. San Mateo Cnty. Sheriff's Dep't, 181 Cal. Rptr. 3d 816 (Ct. App. 2014) ("In sum, the California Supreme Court's decision in Venegas is significant and binding on lower California courts with respect to its holding that county sheriffs are arms of the state while performing state law enforcement activities for purposes of damages liability under section 1983. Its immunity dicta, however, should be left to fade into history. In this case, the holding of Venegas and the United States Supreme Court's decision in Will, conclusively establish that, as to the law enforcement actions alleged, the San Mateo County Sheriff's Department is not a 'person' under section 1983 and therefore not subject to a suit for damages under that federal statutory provision. . . Accordingly, the County's demurrer on behalf of the Sheriff's Department was correctly sustained without leave to amend.")

California [federal]

Buffin v. California, 23 F.4th 951, 962-65 & n.7 (9th Cir. 2022) ("Here, the San Francisco County Sheriff was charged by state law with enforcing a state-mandated bail regime. We must resolve whether the Sheriff was a state or local official for the purposes of this claim. To do so, we must first home in on the challenged actions the Sheriff took. County officials like the Sheriff can act as county or state officials, depending on the particular context. . . For such officials who 'serve two masters,' we examine whether 'the particular acts the official is alleged to have committed fall within the range of his state or county functions.'. . As the district court explained in great depth when it ruled on the County and Sheriff's motions to dismiss, California's statutory bail regime enlisted the County Sheriff and compelled her to set bail in line with a state-created bail schedule. California law permits a sheriff to set bail using only a bail schedule set by the state court; she must set bail at the amount listed in that document. . . Moreover, the Sheriff has no discretion over when to release or hold a pre-trial detainee. If the detainee makes bail, the Sheriff must release her; if not, the Sheriff must keep her in jail pending her court proceedings. . . The district court viewed the State as the Sheriff's master as she set bail under the state-mandated bail schedule. The court therefore concluded that the Sheriff 'act[ed] on behalf of the State' when setting bail. . . Thus, 'the Sheriff [wa]s the actor responsible for enforcing the challenged state law in San Francisco,'. . . and the State was 'the relevant actor when the Sheriff detains a person who does not pay bail[.]'. . Given that unchallenged ruling, the district court did not err in concluding that the Sheriff in her official capacity acted as the State's agent for the purposes of assessing attorney's fees. . . For when a state statutory regime comprehensively 'directs the actions of an official, as here, the officer, be he state or local, is acting as a state official,' i.e., a state agent. . . In other words, instead of exercising control over the Sheriff by signing her paycheck, the State here used its plenary power over the structure of California's government to enlist the Sheriff and command her to do its bidding when she set bail using a bail schedule. The State may make that choice. But in doing so, the State makes the Sheriff a state official in this context, and so bears responsibility for the unconstitutional actions it mandated she take. . . Despite the State's protest, no further factual information was necessary to establish that the Sheriff acted as an agent of the State. California's own bail law—'the official policy of the State,'. . .—was all the evidence the district court needed. The other provisions of California law generally 'labeling' sheriffs 'as local officials' cannot overcome the fact that—in this particular context—the Sheriff acted for the State. . . Indeed, any other conclusion at the attorney's fees stage would have led to an untenable dissonance with the district court's earlier Eleventh Amendment holding. The district court had noted that the Sheriff was 'entitled to immunity from suit for money damages under the Eleventh Amendment.'. . But the Sheriff could possess that immunity only if she was being sued in her official capacity as a state official. For in an official-capacity suit, a defendant can claim only those 'forms of sovereign immunity that the entity' she represents 'may possess, such as the Eleventh Amendment[.]'. . And only a state, its arms and instrumentalities, and its officials (when sued in their official capacities) enjoy that kind of immunity; the county does not. . . In other words, here the Sheriff's successful assertion of Eleventh Amendment immunity was a telltale sign that she was being sued as a state official—i.e., an agent of the State—in her official capacity. . . That principle also sinks the State's main line of attack in this case. The State's argument that the district court 'conflated the Sheriff's entitlement to immunity as a "state actor" with respect to damages, with the Sheriff's purported status as an agent of the State' entirely misunderstands the import of an official-capacity defendant successfully invoking Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . Indeed, we struggle to imagine a situation where an official-capacity defendant, entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity from monetary relief, would not be an agent of the State and thus a state official. Thus, the district court correctly found that the Sheriff acted as a state official for the purposes of this action, subjecting the State to liability for attorney's fees under § 1988. . . Nor will we reverse the district court's award of attorney's fees because the State's attorneys did not represent the Sheriff throughout this case. Whether a county employee is a state or local official turns on what capacity he acts in when he enforces an unconstitutional law or policy—not which legal office represents him in court. . . And it was the Office of the Attorney General that chose not to represent the Sheriff or to intervene to defend the state bail laws—despite knowing the Sheriff's position that the laws were unconstitutional. . . . Despite the State's apprehension, our holding here does not mean that the State will need 'to intervene to defend the [S]tate's interests every time a local official is sued for purportedly enforcing state law.'. . We simply affirm that a county official who enjoys Eleventh Amendment damages immunity and acts as a discretion-less instrument of the State is a state official. If plaintiffs prove that such an official acted unconstitutionally at the State's command—as the Sheriff did here—the State can face § 1988 fees liability. . . .Given our reasoning here, we need not determine what bearing, if any, the 'state policymaker' test under McMillian has on sovereign immunity inquiries under the Eleventh Amendment or on determinations of whether an official-capacity suit targets a state official or a local official. This case does not raise, and we do not here decide, whether an official-capacity suit against a hypothetical 'state policymaker' under McMillian who is not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity from monetary relief would constitute an official-capacity suit against a 'state official.'. . To the extent the McMillian merits inquiry plays any role, the district court's ruling on that issue would only further buttress our conclusion that the Sheriff was a state official.")

Sandoval v. County of Sonoma, 599 F. App'x 673, 674 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Defendants also assert that they are not subject to suit under § 1983 because county sheriffs act as state, rather than county, officials when enforcing the California Vehicle Code. In Brewster v. Shasta County, 275 F.3d 803 (9th Cir.2001), we held that 'California sheriffs are county actors when investigating crime.'. . Three years later, in Venegas v. County of Los Angeles, 87 P.3d 1 (Cal.2004), the California Supreme Court disagreed. Despite these conflicting holdings, interpretation of federal statutes such as § 1983 is a matter of federal law, not state law. . . As we clarified in [Streit], Venegas 'does not constitute "an intervening decision on controlling state law" that would authorize, let alone require, us to overrule a prior decision.'. . There is no material difference between the criminal investigations at issue in Brewster and the California Vehicle Code enforcement actions alleged to be unconstitutional in this suit. The district court correctly denied defendants' motion to dismiss.")

Jackson v. Barnes, 749 F.3d 755, 765, 766 & n.5 (9th Cir. 2014) ("In short, state case law is helpful to the extent that it aids in our understanding of various state constitutional and statutory provisions. Often, as here, some provisions suggest that the actor in question may be a state official, while others suggest that he may be a county official. Once these provisions have been construed by state courts, we must consider them as a whole, and determine under federal law whether an official is a state or county official. State case law does not control our decision; rather, the ultimate decision we must make is one of federal law. . . .Ultimately, the Venegas court is clear that its disagreement with Brewster is with Brewster's conclusion that the provisions that suggest that a California sheriff is a county official outweigh the provisions that suggest that a California sheriff is a state official. The Venegas court reaches the opposite conclusion. . . . As Justice Werdegar notes in her concurring and dissenting opinion, the "disputed point" between Brewster and Venegas 'is the relevance and weight, under federal law, to be given a particular aspect of state law defining the relationship of California sheriffs to the state and county governments.'. . We are under no obligation, however, to 'blindly accept [the California Supreme Court's] balancing of the different provisions of state law in determining liability under § 1983.'. . Rather, the proper balance of these various provisions is a question of federal law. . . Because Venegas disagrees with Brewster on a matter of federal law, it does not constitute 'an intervening decision on controlling state law' that would authorize, let alone require, us to overrule a prior decision. . . Thus, we follow our decision in Brewster: a sheriff's department is a county actor when it investigates crime. Therefore, the Sheriff's Department is subject to suit under § 1983 for Jackson's claim that it violated his Fifth Amendment rights in the course of its investigative activities. . . . The overwhelming majority of district court decisions involving California sheriff's departments have continued to follow Brewster after Venegas. In fact, it appears that only three out of approximately thirty cases to have directly addressed this issue have followed Venegas. The three were all unpublished decisions in the Northern District of California, and a subsequent, published opinion in that district rejected their holdings. See Mateos–Sandoval v. Cnty. of Sonoma, 942 F.Supp.2d 890, 902 (N.D.Cal.2013). The views expressed in the Northern District's published opinion are uniformly joined by the courts of the Central, Eastern, and Southern Districts of California. [collecting cases]. . . .In conclusion, we hold that Jackson has properly pleaded a claim of Monell liability against the Sheriff's Department, and that the Sheriff's Department is subject to suit under § 1983 for its investigative activities. Therefore, we reverse the district court's dismissal of this claim.")

Jackson v. Barnes, 749 F.3d 755, 767 (9th Cir. 2014) ("With respect to the Ventura County District Attorney's Office, Jackson alleges, in effect, that the District Attorney's Office is liable for Murphy's unlawful prosecutorial conduct. The District Attorney's Office, however, acts as a state office with regard to actions taken in its prosecutorial capacity, and is not subject to suit under § 1983.")

Goldstein v. City of Long Beach, 715 F.3d 750, 751-53, 755-62 (9th Cir. 2013), cert. denied by County of Los Angeles v. Goldstein, 134 S. Ct. 906 (2014) ("We consider in this case whether a district attorney acts as a local or a state official when establishing policy and training related to the use of jailhouse informants. We find that, as to the policies at issue here, the district attorney was acting as a final policymaker for the County of Los Angeles. We thus reverse the district court's grant of the motion for judgment on the pleadings and remand the case. . . . [T]he [Supreme] Court held that the Los Angeles County district attorney and chief deputy district attorney were absolutely immune from Goldstein's claims that the prosecution failed to disclose impeachment material due to a failure to properly train prosecutors, failed to properly supervise prosecutors, and failed to establish an information system containing potential impeachment material about informants. . .On remand, the district court entered judgment in favor of Los Angeles County district attorney John Van de Kamp and chief deputy district attorney Curt Livesay. . . As to the County of Los Angeles' motion for judgment on the pleadings, the district court explained that this Court has not had occasion to address the claims at issue here, but 'reluctantly concluded' that the district attorney acts on behalf of the state, rather than the county, in setting policy related to jailhouse informants 'in light of Weiner [v. San Diego County, 210 F.3d 1025 (9th Cir.2000)] and the two decisions of [the Northern District of California] construing it.' Therefore, the district court granted the County of Los Angeles' motion for judgment on the pleadings. . . . Here, all parties agree that the district attorney is the relevant policymaker. Thus, the viability of Goldstein's claim turns on whether the Los Angeles District Attorney acted here as a policymaker for the state or for the county. This determination is made on a function-by-function approach by analyzing under state law the organizational structure and control over the district attorney. . . .Based on our analysis of the relevant California constitutional and statutory provisions, we conclude that California district attorneys act as local policymakers when adopting and implementing internal policies and procedures related to the use of jailhouse informants. . . . The county's obligation to defend and indemnify the district attorney in an action for damages is a 'crucial factor [that] weighs heavily[.]' Streit v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 236 F .3d 552, 562 (9th Cir.2001) (citation omitted). In McMillian, the Court explained that the state's responsibility for judgments against the sheriff was 'critical' for the case and 'strong evidence in favor of the ... conclusion that sheriffs act on behalf of the State.' McMillian, 520 U.S. at 789. [court reviews state constitutional and statutory provisions] Taking all of these provisions together, it is clear that the district attorney acts on behalf of the state when conducting prosecutions, but that the local administrative policies challenged by Goldstein are distinct from the prosecutorial act. Most significant is the contrast between the steps that were taken in Alabama to increase the state's control over the sheriff in McMillian and the contrary California trend to categorize district attorneys as county officials; the fact that '[t]he board of supervisors shall supervise the official conduct of all county officers,' Cal. Gov.Code § 25303; and the fact that the county must defend and indemnify the district attorney in an action for damages, which the Supreme Court deemed 'critical' in McMillian, 520 U.S. at 789; see Cal. Gov.Code §§ 815.2, 825. Even taking into account the control and supervisory powers of the Attorney General, the Los Angeles County District Attorney represents the county when establishing administrative policies and training related to the general operation of the district attorney's office, including the establishment of an index containing information regarding the use of jailhouse informants. . . . The County's contention that the Supreme Court's conclusion in Van de Kamp determines the outcome of this case is incorrect. Though the inquiries of prosecutorial immunity and state or local policymaking may be related, they are separate. The prosecutorial immunity inquiry focuses on 'policy considerations which compel civil immunity,' Imbler v. Pachtman, 424 U.S. 409, 429 (1976), and is a federal question that will have a consistent answer nationwide. See Howlett v. Rose, 496 U.S. 356, 383 (1990). The state-local determination under Section 1983, although also a federal question ultimately, depends on a careful and thorough analysis of state constitutional and statutory provisions, and will vary 'from region to region, and from State to State.' McMillian v. Monroe Cnty., 520 U.S. 781, 795 (1997). In Van de Kamp, the Supreme Court did not look to or examine California law, but focused on common-law traditions and policy implications in determining that the district attorney was entitled to absolute immunity. The County similarly asserts, without citation, that California law conflates the two analyses: district attorneys act as State officials in the same instances that they are protected by absolute prosecutorial immunity. However, the California Supreme Court has explained that it is incorrect to 'assume [ ] that the functions for which a prosecutor may obtain absolute, as opposed to qualified, immunity parallel those for which a district attorney represents the state, as opposed to the county.' Pitts, 949 P.2d at 935. '[T]hese are in fact separate inquiries.' Id.; see also Pembaur v. City of Cincinnati, 475 U.S. 469, 474 n.2 (1986) (holding county liable for prosecutor's actions after petitioner had conceded that prosecutor was absolutely immune). Contrary to the County's argument, our decision in Weiner has no bearing on this case. In Weiner, we held that a 'district attorney act[s] on behalf of the state, not the county, in deciding to prosecute' a person for a crime, but acknowledged that 'this is not to say that district attorneys in California are state officers for all purposes. To the contrary, California law suggests that a district attorney is a county officer for some purposes.' Weiner, 210 F.3d at 1026, 1031. . . .Similarly, the County is incorrect that we are bound by the California Supreme Court's determination in Pitts that the district attorney acts on behalf of the state for some purposes. Though we must look at the relevant state law and state courts' characterizations of that law, the final determination under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 is a federal law statutory interpretation question; no deference is due to the ultimate conclusion of the California court that the provisions, taken as a whole, indicate the district attorney was a state actor under Section 1983 for any particular function. . . . Nonetheless, we need not disrupt the California Supreme Court's conclusion because Pitts addressed a district attorney function different than the one we confront today. In Pitts, the California Supreme Court concluded that 'the district attorney represents the state, not the county, when preparing to prosecute and when prosecuting crimes, and when establishing policy and training employees in these areas.' . . The California Supreme Court analyzed the provisions of the California Constitution and the statutes discussed above, and based on these considerations, it concluded that 'when preparing to prosecute and when prosecuting criminal violations of state law, a district attorney represents the state and is not a policymaker for the county.'. .That determination is not implicated by Goldstein's claims. . . .In Pitts, child witnesses were coerced into testifying falsely that the defendants, their acquaintances or relatives, had sexually abused them. . . Coerced testimony from the alleged victim of a crime is inextricably linked to the prosecution of that crime. The function at issue here, on the other hand, is distinguishable from the question confronted by the California Supreme Court because Goldstein challenges administrative policy and accompanying training, rather than prosecutorial training and policy. Goldstein's challenge focuses on the failure to create an index that includes information about benefits provided to jailhouse informants and other previous knowledge about the informants' reliability, and the failure to train prosecutors to use that index. Goldstein alleges that it was the lack of an index that allowed Fink to lie about the benefits he received for testifying against Goldstein, prevented prosecutors in Goldstein's case from knowing Fink's history, and prevented Goldstein's counsel from impeaching Fink. The conduct at issue here does not involve prosecutorial strategy, but rather administrative oversight of systems used to help prosecutors comply with their constitutional duties. . . .In sum, we conclude that the policies challenged by Goldstein are distinct from the acts the district attorney undertakes on behalf of the state. Even taking into account the control and supervisory powers of the Attorney General, the Los Angeles County District Attorney represents the county when establishing policy and training related to the use of jailhouse informants. Therefore, a cause of action may lie against the County under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. We reverse the judgment of the district court.") Ceballos v. Garcetti, 361 F.3d 1168, 1182, 1183 (9th Cir. 2004) ("Ordinarily, an official designated as an official of a county − as is the District Attorney of the County of Los Angeles − is a county official for all purposes. Some officials, however, serve two masters. Among them are California's 58 district attorneys: While these officers are elected by and for the counties, they prosecute cases on behalf of the state. In such mixed circumstances, we determine whether the officer is a state or a county official by examining state law to determine whether the particular acts the official is alleged to have committed fall within the range of his state or county functions. [citing McMillian] The California Supreme Court has held that a district attorney is a state official when he acts as a public prosecutor, while in other functions he acts on behalf of the county . . . . Whether the District Attorney acted on behalf of the county or the state thus turns on whether the personnel actions alleged by Ceballos are part of the District Attorney's prosecutorial functions or whether he was performing administrative or other non-prosecutorial duties. The California courts have not defined the precise characteristics that distinguish a district attorney's prosecutorial function from his other functions. As Bishop Paiute Tribe noted, however, a similar issue as to whether a prosecutor was acting in his prosecutorial capacity, as opposed to an administrative or investigative capacity, arises in determining whether he is entitled to absolute or qualified immunity under § 1983; we may look for guidance to cases addressing that issue. . . . The individual defendants, including Garcetti, do not seek dismissal on the basis of absolute immunity for the acts they allegedly took against Ceballos. Instead, they seek qualified immunity, implicitly acknowledging that the actions were not prosecutorial, but administrative. In sum, the District Attorney's Office and its thenhead, Garcetti, were carrying out their county functions when they allegedly engaged in the retaliatory acts Ceballos describes. Garcetti is, therefore, not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity, and thus the County may not seek summary adjudication on the ground that he was acting on behalf of the state."), rev'd on other grounds and remanded, 126 S. Ct. 1951 (2006).

Cortez v. County of Los Angeles, 294 F.3d 1186, 1191 (9th Cir. 2002) ("Brewster and Bishop Paiute Tribe demonstrate that California sheriffs are final policymakers for the county not only when managing the local jail, but also when performing some law enforcement functions. Therefore, even if we characterized the Sheriff's actions as taken in his law enforcement capacity to keep the peace, we could conclude that the County is subject to § 1983 liability for his actions. However, as previously discussed, we find that the Sheriff was acting in his administrative capacity, rather than as a law enforcement officer. Specifically, we find that the Sheriff's actions were taken pursuant to his policy of segregating inmates identified as gang members, which he established pursuant to his authority as the administrator of the county jail and custodian of the inmates within it. Accordingly, the County can be held liable for his decision to keep Avalos in the gang unit of the jail.").

Bishop Paiute Tribe v. County of Inyo, 291 F.3d 549, 564-66 (9th Cir. 2002) ("[T]o allow the Attorney General's supervisory role to be dispositive on the issue of whether a law enforcement officer acts as a state official would prove too much. The California Constitution grants the Attorney General supervisory authority over all 'other law enforcement officers as may be designated by law.' CAL. CONST. art. V, ' 13. Under this provision, if taken to its logical extreme, all local law enforcement agencies in California would be immune from prosecution for civil rights violation, thereby rendering meaningless the decision in Monell, which preserves § 1983 actions against local governments. . . . Whether a district attorney engages in prosecutorial conduct when obtaining and executing a search warrant has not been addressed by this Circuit in the context of whether a district attorney is a state or county officer. However, the Ninth Circuit has addressed whether this constitutes prosecutorial conduct as opposed to investigatory conduct in the context of a prosecutor's absolute versus qualified immunity. By analogy, these cases inform our decision . . . . Relying on Fletcher and Buckley, and recognizing the significant factual distinctions between this case and Pitts, we find that the District Attorney was engaging in investigatory, and not prosecutorial, acts when he obtained and executed a search warrant over the Tribe. This conclusion compels our finding that the District Attorney acted as a county officer when obtaining and executing a search warrant against the Tribe. . . . [In addition] we conclude that the Sheriff acted as a county officer when obtaining and executing a search warrant against the Tribe."), vacated and remanded, 123 S. Ct. 1887 (2003).

Brewster v. Shasta County, 275 F.3d 803, 807, 808 (9th Cir. 2001) ("It requires little extension of Streit for us to conclude that the Shasta County Sheriff acts for the County, not the state, when investigating crime in the county. . . .[T]he fact that the state legislature has determined that all county officials are to be indemnified by the county government − including the sheriff and the sheriff's department employees, and without exception for their crime investigation functions − indicates that the sheriff is considered a county actor. Further, unlike in McMillian, where Alabama sheriffs were required to attend all courts in the state, California sheriffs are required to attend only those courts within their respective counties. . . . We also note that unlike in McMillian, in which the Alabama Constitution made a county sheriff subject to impeachment on the authority of the Alabama Supreme Court, not the county, . . . impeachment proceedings against a California county sheriff, as with other county officials, are initiated by a county grand jury, and the sheriff is not included among those officials identified in the California Constitution as subject to impeachment by the state Legislature . . . While this factor may be of somewhat limited weight because a state court appoints the prosecutor to conduct the impeachment proceedings, . . . it nonetheless weighs toward the conclusion that the sheriff acts for the county when investigating crime as well as when administering the jails.").

Streit v. County of Los Angeles, 236 F.3d 552, 564, 565 (9th Cir. 2001) (" Upon examining the precise function at issue in conjunction with the state constitution, codes, and case law, we conclude that the LASD [Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department] acts as the final policymaker for the county when administering the County's release policy and not in its state law enforcement capacity. We therefore affirm the district court's holding that the LASD, when functioning as the administrator of the local jail, is a County actor, and that the County may therefore be subject to liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.").

Weiner v. San Diego County, 210 F.3d 1025, 1030, 1031 (9th Cir. 2000) ("Balancing the foregoing constitutional and statutory factors leads us toward the conclusion that under California law a county district attorney acts as a state official when deciding whether to prosecute an individual. The fact that California statutory law lists district attorneys as county officers is not dispositive because, as discussed in McMillian, the function of the district attorney, including who can control the district attorney's conduct is the issue. . . . [T]he only significant differences between California law applicable in this case and Alabama law applicable in McMillian are that under California law the county sets the district attorney's salary and the district attorney can be removed from office in a fashion similar to other county employees. These differences are not sufficient to produce a result in this case different from the result in McMillian. . . . Although a California district attorney is a state officer when deciding whether to prosecute an individual, this is not to say that district attorneys in California are state officers for all purposes. To the contrary, California law suggests that a district attorney is a county officer for some purposes.").

Shilling v. County of San Diego, No. 3:24-CV-01047-CAB-DDL, 2024 WL 5145969, at *4 (S.D. Cal. Dec. 17, 2024) ("Plaintiff has not raised a single case where a court applied then-Mitchell or now Kohn to determine whether a county sheriff, or similar officer, as a policymaker, represented the county or state. Indeed, the Ninth Circuit actually applied McMillian, not Mitchell, in Brewster v. Shasta County when it considered whether a county sheriff represented the state or county when investigating crime. . . As such, the Court is persuaded that, limited to this inquiry concerning whether a county sheriff as a policymaker represents the county or state in a given function, McMillian's continued use and application is proper. Plaintiff challenged Defendant Martinez, in her official capacity, and her CCW policy, alleging it violated the Second Amendment. . . The Court thus finds that McMillian, which Scocca relied upon, provides the appropriate and applicable analytical framework in this case, not Kohn.")

Puckett v. County of Sacramento, No. 2:22-CV-00350-KJM-DB, 2023 WL 2432919, at *9–10 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 9, 2023) ("Plaintiff alleges the Sacramento District Attorney's Office has a policy of 'selectively withholding exculpatory evidence relevant to criminal prosecutions from defense teams' and 'failing to hold prosecutors accountable' for the ensuing Brady violations. . . Thus, plaintiff asserts Monell liability against this Office under the same two theories: (1) pervasive customs and policies and (2) failure to train or discipline. The court must first decide if, under each liability theory, the Office acted as an arm of the state or county. Agencies acting as arms of the state are immune from § 1983 claims in federal and state court. . . The status of a District Attorney's Office depends on 'whether the particular acts the official is alleged to have committed fall within the range of his state or county functions.'. . The Ninth Circuit has held that in California, 'prosecutorial functions' are classified as state actions, while 'administrative or other non–prosecutorial duties' are classified as county actions. . . In Goldstein, a District Attorney Office's failure to systematically track informant reliability was an administrative failure and not a prosecutorial action. . . The California Supreme Court has drawn a similar distinction, see Pitts v. Cnty. of Kern, 17 Cal. 4th 340, 363 (1998) (labeling prosecutor's preparation to prosecute and 'oversight of policies formulated and training conducted in connection with' prosecution as prosecutorial functions). First, plaintiff argues the prosecutor's allegedly pervasive policy encouraging or tolerating Brady violations was an administrative decision, akin to the decision in Goldstein. . . . As delineated in Goldstein, the question here is whether the conduct is part of a prosecutorial strategy or rather properly characterized as 'administrative oversight.'. . Plaintiff's allegations that the Office encouraged or tolerated Brady violations is a 'polic[y] or training relating to prosecutorial functions' and is not properly characterized as an administrative action removed from the prosecutorial fray. . . Thus, the district attorney acts on behalf of the state and plaintiff is barred from bringing this Monell claim. Second, plaintiff argues Goldstein supports his position that the district attorney's failure to discipline prosecutors who committed Brady violations was administrative and thus the Office acted as an arm of the county. Here, this court agrees. A failure to discipline can expose a failure in oversight and administration. . . Unlike the direct commission of a Brady violation, a failure to discipline is not tied directly to 'prosecutorial strategy' but is reflective of administrative policies and oversight of employees. . . In failing to discipline, the District Attorney's Office acted as an arm of the county and is subject to Monell liability. . . . Defendants argue plaintiff has not pointed to specific evidence or circumstances in which defendants have failed to discipline prosecutors, or any concrete examples of specific Brady violations. . . As explained above, however, plaintiff at this stage cannot be faulted because defendants refuse to search their files or produce detailed information. In showing 46 potential claims over a specific period of time, plaintiff has demonstrated his allegations are sufficiently 'plausible' and therefore defeats the motion to dismiss in this respect.")

Welchen v. County of Sacramento, No. 2:16-CV-00185-TLN-DB, 2018 WL 5617222, at *6-8 (E.D. Cal. Oct. 26, 2018) ("Neither Streit nor Cortez apply to the facts at hand. The Bail Law is a state law, and the Bail Schedule is set by the Sacramento County Superior Court. . . As such, the Bail Law is not a sheriff-established policy that might be considered an administrative action like the policies at issue in Streit or Cortez. . . .Moreover, district courts within this circuit have determined that California Sheriffs act as representatives of the state, and not a county, when enforcing state laws, including the Bail Law. . . . Despite Plaintiff's argument that Ninth Circuit precedent bars a finding that the Sheriff is a state actor, Plaintiff's Ninth Circuit cases are distinguishable from the instant case. Further, federal district courts determined sheriffs act on behalf of the state when they are detaining an individual based on court orders. . . Similarly, the Sheriff implements the Bail Law according to the Sacramento County Superior Court's Bail Schedule because he is tasked to do so under state law. . . Thus, the Court determines that Ninth Circuit precedent does not preclude a finding that the Sheriff is a state actor. . . .Despite its title, the Sacramento County Superior Court is an arm of the State. . . . [A]fter carefully analyzing the Bail Law, in Buffin, the court determined that 'the Sheriff lacks discretion to release the arrested person outside the bounds of the statute.'. . . As in McNeely, where the court found that Cal. Pen. Code § 4004 requires sheriffs to detain arrestees 'until legally discharged,' here, the Sheriff similarly does not have discretion when implementing the Bail Law. . . For these reasons, the Court finds that the Sheriff acts on behalf of the state in implementing the Bail Law. Accordingly, the Eleventh Amendment shields the Sheriff from suit for money damages. However, based on the Ex Parte Young exception to sovereign immunity, Plaintiff may seek declaratory or injunctive relief against the Sheriff for allegedly unconstitutional conduct related to the Bail Law. . . . Because the Court has determined that the Sheriff acts on behalf of the state on this issue, the County is not liable for the Sheriff's implementation of the Bail Law.")

Samaan v. County of Sacramento, No. 216CV00789KJMCKD, 2018 WL 4908171, at *6 (E.D. Cal. Oct. 10, 2018) ("This court is not the first to consider whether a California sheriff is an agent of the state or county in the CCW [concealed weapon] licensing arena. In Scocca v. Smith, the district court applied the McMillian framework in an equal protection challenge to a Sheriff's issuance of CCW permits and determined that the county was 'not an appropriate defendant' because '[the] Sheriff [ ], when making her decisions on granting or denying CCW licenses, acts as a representative of the state of California, and not of the County.'. . .Having considered the California statutory scheme governing the CCW permitting process, this court agrees with the Scocca court's sound reasoning and conclusion. Samaan provides no cogent argument to the contrary.")

Branch v. Cty. of San Diego, No. 15-CV-2336 AJB KSC, 2018 WL 1942260, at *5 (S.D. Cal. Apr. 25, 2018) ("Who constitutes the final policymaker on a specific issue is governed by California law. . . . California legal precedent holds that Sheriffs act under State authority when carrying out law enforcement operations. [collecting cases] Based on this persuasive precedence, the Court finds that affecting an arrest is undoubtedly a law enforcement duty, and one which California law entrusts to Sheriffs. . . Here, when Ward arrested Branch, he was acting as a State law enforcement officer carrying out a State law enforcement function. The final policymaker regarding use of force when affecting an arrest is the Sheriff, as head of the law enforcement department entrusted by State law to affect arrests. A brief examination of the San Diego County Sheriff's Department's Policy & Procedure Manual section 1.2 indicates that '[o]nly the Sheriff may approve Departmental policies and procedures.'. . Thus, Branch's Monell claim cannot succeed against Ward, as state officers are immune from Monell liability.")

Nelson v. County of Sacramento, 926 F.Supp.2d 1159, 1167-69 (E.D. Cal. 2013) ("This District has . . . steadfastly maintained its adherence to Brewster, finding a sheriff is a local actor when investigating crime or running a jail. . .The Eastern District is not alone in its continuing adherence to Brewster. [citing Smith v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 535 F.Supp.2d 1033 (C.D.Cal.2008)] Both the Eastern and Central District of California have repeatedly rejected Defendants' arguments, and this Court does the same now. Next, Defendants attempt to distinguish the Ninth Circuit line of cases finding that sheriffs are local actors. Defendants argue that those cases dealt with investigatory duties, while this case involves policies and training methods with regard to the use of force, arrests and the prosecution of criminal activities. . . Defendants' argument finds a hint of support in dicta from two Eastern District cases— Vega and Rainwater. . .However, Defendants' argument fails for two reasons. First, both Vega and Rainwater distinguish Venegas based on the hypothetical that if Venegas controlled, it still would be distinguishable. Venegas does not control, and dicta dealing in hypotheticals does not change that. Second, while Brewster's holding addressed crime investigations, its reasoning was not so limited. Brewster noted that county boards of supervisors have authority over the 'law enforcement conduct.'. . Furthermore, Brewster mentioned that the county controlled the sheriff's salary and would be liable for monetary damages under § 1983 in California. . . These three factors also weigh in favor of finding the sheriff to be a local actor when implementing and overseeing arrest policies. As Brewster concluded, 'our own court has long assumed that sheriffs act on behalf of the county, even when investigating crime.'. . Crime investigation is but one aspect of a sheriff's 'law enforcement conduct' that falls under the local actor umbrella. . . Defendants cannot point to a single Ninth Circuit or Eastern District of California decision finding a sheriff to be a state actor when it comes to implementing policies regarding arrests and the use of force. . . . This Court finds Jones to be a local actor who is not immune from a § 1983 suit for purposes of this case.")

Ismail v. County of Orange, 917 F.Supp.2d 1060, 1070, 1071 & n.8 (C.D. Cal. 2012) ("Ordinarily, an official designated as an official of a county—as is the District Attorney of the County of Los Angeles—is a county official for all purposes. Some officials, however, serve two masters. Among them are California's 58 district attorneys: While these officers are elected by and for the counties, they prosecute cases on behalf of the state. In such mixed circumstances, we determine whether the officer is a state or a county official by examining state law to determine whether the particular acts the official is alleged to have committed fall within the range of his state or county functions.

. .The California Supreme Court has held that a district attorney is a state official when he acts as a public prosecutor. . . That means that claims against the Deputy D.A. in her official capacity, with regard to acts and omissions by her while acting as a public prosecutor, constitute claims against the State of California. This is significant because States and arms of the State possess immunity from suits authorized by federal law. . . . . Contrast Webb v. Sloan, 330 F.3d 1158, 1163–66 (9th Cir.2003) (holding that municipality could be held liable under section 1983 for actions of its deputy district attorneys, because those officials were acting as final policymakers for the municipality, under Nevada state law, in deciding whether to prosecute the section 1983 plaintiff); Streit v. County of Los Angeles, 236 F.3d 552, 555–56 (9th Cir.2001) ("Because we conclude that the LASD [Los Angeles Sheriff's Department], when implementing its policy of conducting prisoner release records checks, acts for the County in its capacity as administrator of the Los Angeles County jails, we hold both the LASD and the County are subject to liability under section 1983.")."), aff'd by Ismail v. County of Orange, 676 F. App'x 690 (9th Cir. 2017).

Nelson v. County of Sacramento, No. 2:12–cv–02040–MCE–GGH., 2013 WL 708541, 7 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 26, 2013) ("Defendants cannot point to a single Ninth Circuit or Eastern District of California decision finding a sheriff to be a state actor when it comes to implementing policies regarding arrests and the use of force. Furthermore, in the same brief in which Defendants argue Jones is a state actor, they also assert the Sheriff's Department and the County are redundant parties. . . It is contradictory, if not disingenuous, to argue the County and the Sheriff's Department are redundant parties, but that the head of the Sheriff's Department is a state actor, not a local actor for the County. In any event, Defendants' arguments fail. This Court finds Jones to be a local actor who is not immune from a § 1983 suit for purposes of this case.")

Mateos-Sandoval v. County of Sonoma, 942 F.Supp.2d 890, 899-902 (N.D. Cal. 2013) ("The more difficult question is whether Sheriff Freitas should be considered part of the state for sovereign immunity purposes—Defendants contend that he should, and Plaintiffs that he should not. Plaintiffs' allegations against Sheriff Freitas, broadly writ, relate to the setting of policy and procedures governing the county's investigation of vehicle code violations and enforcement of the vehicle code. In Brewster v. Shasta County, the Ninth Circuit held that California sheriffs act on behalf of the county, not the state, when they investigate crimes, and are therefore not immune from suit under the doctrine of state sovereign immunity. . . Subsequently, in Venegas, the California Supreme Court, expressly disagreeing with the Ninth Circuit's analysis and holding in Brewster, held that 'California sheriffs act as state officers while performing state law enforcement duties such as investigating possible criminal activity.'. . Since Venegas, a division has arisen between district courts within the Circuit about which rule to apply. Many district courts have continued to apply the Ninth Circuit rule, holding that sheriffs performing law enforcement functions are county officers. [collecting cases] Others, however, have applied Venegas and held that sheriffs performing law enforcement functions are officers of the state and therefore immune from suit. [collecting cases] The courts that have continued to apply the Ninth Circuit rule have reasoned that municipal liability under § 1983 is a question of federal law, and that, despite what the California Supreme Court may have said, they remain bound by Brewster. . .The determination whether an official acts on behalf of a state or a county is 'dependant on the definition of the official's functions under relevant state law.'. . This does not mean, however, that federal courts are bound by state court interpretations of state law in this context. In determining whether a local officer or entity is performing a state function, a federal court must conduct its own independent analysis of state law. . . In Brewster, the Ninth Circuit conducted an analysis of California state law and concluded that California sheriffs act on behalf of the county, not the state, when performing law enforcement functions. . . The court based this conclusion on the following factors: money judgments against sheriffs are satisfied out of county, not state, funds; 'the California Constitution clearly identifies the sheriff as a county officer'; 'California sheriffs are elected county officers'; 'California sheriffs are only obligated to attend courts within their respective counties'; impeachment proceedings against a sheriff are initiated by a county grand jury; county boards of supervisors exercise authority over the sheriff; and the funding for California sheriffs' departments, including funding for the enforcement of state criminal laws, comes from the county, not the state. . . The dissenters in Venegas also concluded, based on the same provisions, that sheriffs act on behalf of counties, not the state, when they enforce state law. . .Venegas does not provide a basis upon which this Court may reach a conclusion that is contrary to the Ninth Circuit's holding in Brewster. There is no indication that the Ninth Circuit's opinion in Brewster turned on California decisional law; in fact, the Brewster court considered and rejected the reasoning of the California cases upon which the majority in Venegas based its analysis. . . The Ninth Circuit, sitting en banc, recently re-affirmed the rule that a published decision of a Ninth Circuit panel must be followed by panels and district courts within the Circuit 'unless and until overruled by a body competent to do so.'. . This Court lacks that particular competence, and therefore denies the motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' official-capacity claims against Sheriff Freitas.")

Bailey v. Clarke, No. 12–CV–1100–IEG (KSC), 2013 WL 6720628, *3, *4 (S.D. Cal. Dec. 21, 2012) ("Defendant Gore also asserts that, in his official capacity as San Diego County Sheriff, he constitutes a state actor and is thus immune from liability under the Eleventh Amendment. . . . Defendant Gore's purported Eleventh Amendment immunity depends on whether, in his official capacity as San Diego County Sheriff, he acts [as] a state or county representative. In McMillian v. Monroe County, the United States Supreme Court addressed a similar situation involving a sheriff in Alabama, and instructed that in determining whether a government official is representative of a state or local entity, a court should consider the actual function of the government official as well as pertinent state law, which, though not dispositive, will often provide useful guidance. . . . The Ninth Circuit, in Brewster v. Shasta County, applied McMillian to a case arising in California and held that sheriffs in California are employees of their local county, not the state. . . Two years after that Ninth Circuit ruling, the California Supreme Court, in Venegas v. County of Los Angeles, expressly rejected Brewster as wrongly decided and reached the opposite conclusion, finding sheriffs in California to be state actors. . . In light of *McMillian'*s instruction that state law often provides useful guidance, district courts in California are split; some courts following Ninth Circuit authority per Brewster, some courts following the more recent California Supreme Court ruling in Venegas. . . . Though the United States Supreme Court held that this 'inquiry is dependent on an analysis of state law,' the Court also explicitly termed it a 'federal question [that] can be answered only after considering [ ] provisions of state law.'. . Moreover, the Ninth Circuit has subsequently emphasized the federal nature of § 1983 claims, regardless of California interpretation. . . Accordingly, although the question of whether sheriffs are state or local actors must be informed by state law, it ultimately remains a federal, not state, question for purposes of precedential authority. . . As such, the Ninth Circuit's holding in Brewster, rather than the California Supreme Court's contrary holding in Venegas, controls here. Under controlling Ninth Circuit precedent, Sheriff Gore, in his official capacity, represents the county of San Diego, not the State of California, and therefore is not immune here under the Eleventh Amendment.")

Scocca v. Smith, 912 F.Supp.2d 875, 881-84 (N.D. Cal. 2012) ("Since McMillian, courts have had to address whether, under the law of a particular state, a sheriff represents the state or the county in a variety of different functions, including but not limited to law enforcement. Notably, the Ninth Circuit and the California Supreme Court have reached conflicting conclusions as to whether, under California law, a sheriff represents the state or county when he or she investigates a crime. In Brewster v. Shasta County, 275 F.3d 803 (9th Cir.2001), the Ninth Circuit held that a sheriff is a representative of the county; in Venegas v. County of Los Angeles, 32 Cal.4th 820, 11 Cal.Rptr.3d 692, 87 P.3d 1 (2004), the California Supreme Court held that a sheriff is a representative of the state. . . . Brewster and Venegas, of course, have limited application in the instant case because, here, the Court is not evaluating whether the sheriff acts as an agent of the state or the county when he or she investigates a crime. Rather, the Court is considering whether the sheriff acts as an agent of the state or county when he or she acts as the CCW [license to carry a concealed weapon] licensing authority. . . The Court thus looks to the general analytical framework provided by McMillian in deciding this issue— i.e., how does state law treat a sheriff, in particular, when acting as a CCW licensor? . . . . What the Court finds most instructive are the provisions in the California Penal Code that deal with CCW licensing. Notably, these provisions do not suggest that the county board of supervisors or other county administrator (other than the sheriff) exercises control or oversight over CCW licensing. This stands in contrast to the situation in Streit v. County of Los Angeles, 236 F.3d 552, 561 (9th Cir.2001) where the court concluded that a sheriff acts for the county and not the state when overseeing and managing a local jail, not only because, e.g., the sheriff is designated a county officer under the California Constitution but also because '[t]he counties retain the power to transfer control of a county jail from the sheriff to a county-created department of corrections, suggesting that the counties actually control and operate the jails, and not the state via the sheriffs.' (Emphasis added.) Rather, the relevant code provisions in the case at bar clearly delineate a role for the state with respect to administration and oversight. . . . Accordingly, the Court agrees with Defendants that Santa Clara County is not an appropriate defendant in this action because Sheriff Smith, when making her decisions on granting or denying CCW licenses, acts as a representative of the state of California, and not of the County.")

Rainwater v. McGinniss, No. 2:11–cv–0030 GGH P, 2012 WL 3308894, *18-*20 (E.D. Cal. 2012 Aug. 13, 2012) ("As the court finds that the defendant in this case, the Sheriff, exercises final policymaking authority regarding the holding of SVP inmates at SCMJ, the determinative question before the court is whether the defendant acts for the county or the state in adopting and implementing such policies. As set forth below, binding circuit precedent compels the conclusion that the defendant acts for the county in setting policy regarding house SVP inmates that are held at SCMJ. Accordingly, the Eleventh Amendment does not immunize the defendant from liability in this action. The Ninth Circuit has twice applied the principles articulated in McMillian to the management of county jails by California sheriffs, and in each of these cases it held that the sheriffs are county (not state) actors under § 1983. See Streit v. County of Los Angeles, 236 F.3d 552, 561 (9th Cir.2001) (the sheriff acts on behalf of the county in "the oversight and management of the local jail"); Cortez v. County of Los Angeles, 294 F.3d 1186, 1191 (9th Cir.2002) ("We ... hold that the County is subject to § 1983 liability for the Sheriff's actions taken here pursuant to his role as administrator of the county jail."). . . . Defendant relies on the California Supreme Court's decision in Venegas v. County of Los Angeles, 32 Cal.4th 820, 831 (2004), and the California Court of Appeal's decision in County of Los Angeles v. Superior Court, 68 Cal.App. 4th 1166, 1174 (1998) in urging this court to reach a contrary result. . . . Federal case law governs the issue of whether the sheriff is a state or county actor under § 1983. . . . Moreover, even if Venegas were binding authority, it is inapplicable to the present case. Venegas held that the sheriff acts on behalf of the state "while performing state law enforcement duties such as investigating possible criminal activity." 32 Cal.4th at 839. Because Venegas involved an unreasonable search and seizure claim, which arose during the sheriff's performance of a core law-enforcement function, it is wholly dissimilar to the instant case and the housing conditions in the jail. Therefore, the defendant is not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity.")

Rojas v. Sonoma County, No. C–11–1358 EMC, 2011 WL 5024551, at *4 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 21, 2011) ("In the wake of Brewster and Venegas, California district courts have split on whether a sheriff represents the state or the county when conducting a law enforcement investigation. . . In this instant case, however, the Court need not address this split in authority because here, the actual function of the governmental official that the Court is examining is not Deputy Clark's investigatory services but rather his role in providing courtroom security services. Thus, Brewster and Venegas have limited relevance. McMillian remains the critical case. As noted above, under McMillian, to determine whether a governmental official should be considered a representative of either a state or a local entity, a court must consider the actual function of the governmental official, and state law will often provide guidance on this matter. In their papers and at oral argument, Defendants pointed out that, under California Government Code § 77200, the state has sole responsibility for the funding of court operations and, under § 72115, court-related services that were formerly provided by marshals are now provided by sheriffs. . . Therefore, state law establishes that sheriffs − and thus deputies as well − function as representatives of the state and not the county when providing courtroom security services. Mr. Rojas has not pointed to any state law or, for that matter, any other authority to the contrary. In the absence of any such authority, the Court concludes that Defendants have adequately established that Deputy Clark, in providing courtroom security services, was acting as a representative of the state, and not Sonoma County, and therefore, a suit against Deputy Clark in his official capacity amounts to a suit against the state, which is barred by the Eleventh Amendment.")

Fontana v. Alpine County, No. 2:10-CV-00710 JAM-KJN, 2010 WL 3834823, at *4 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 30, 2010) ("This Court will follow the Ninth Circuit and other district court precedents and find that when investigating crimes, sheriffs are county actors who are not protected by Eleventh Amendment immunity.")

Prescott v. County of Stanislaus, No. 1:10-CV-00592-OWW-GSA, 2010 WL 3783950, at *6, *10 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 27, 2010) ("To the extent the conduct at issue in this case constitutes 'law enforcement' duties, the court is bound by Ninth Circuit precedent, specifically, Brewster v. County of Shasta, 275 F.3d 803. Venegas does not overrule Ninth Circuit precedent on this issue. Well-established Supreme Court and Ninth Circuit precedent make clear that federal not state law is supreme on issues of federal law. Until the Ninth Circuit readdresses the issue and abrogates Brewster, such authority is controlling. Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiffs' federal civil rights claims on the grounds that Sheriff Christianson is immune because he acts on behalf of the State of California is DENIED.")

Pruitt v. County of Sacramento, No. CIV. 2:10-0416 WBS KJN, 2010 WL 3717302, at *1, *2 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 15, 2010) ("Defendants argue that the California Supreme Court's decision in Venegas v. County of Los Angeles, 32 Cal4th 820 (2004) overrules Brewster. The decisions of the California Supreme Court are entitled to due deference. It is well established, however, that 'the question of municipal liability under section 1983 is one of federal law.'. . . On questions of federal law, this court is bound by the decisions of the Ninth Circuit. The Ninth Circuit has not departed from its analysis in Brewster since Venegas was decided. District courts in this Circuit have uniformly since Venegas continued to follow Brewster. [collecting cases] For the foregoing reasons, neither Sheriff John McGinness nor the County of Sacramento are entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity for the conduct allegedly based upon his policies.")

Committee for Immigrant Rights of Sonoma County v. County of Sonoma, No. C 08-4220 RS, 2010 WL 2465030, at *3 (N.D. Cal. June 11, 2010) ("Although prior Ninth Circuit precedent did not treat sheriffs as state officers for purposes of that constitutional provision, the California Supreme Court has since concluded that sheriffs are state officers in circumstances like these. Venegas v. County of Los Angeles, 32 Cal.4th 820 (2004). While some district courts have continued to follow prior circuit law, the more persuasive analysis is that even though the Court need not 'blindly accept' the Venegas decision, it represents the correct statement of the function of California sheriffs.")

Lopez v. Youngblood, No. 1:07cv0474 DLB, 2009 WL 909812, at*21 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 31, 2009) ("The Venegas decision does not overturn Ninth Circuit precedent on this issue regarding a federal statute and does not control on issues of federal law. . . This Court is bound by Ninth Circuit precedent and declines to hold that the Kern County Sheriffs were acting on behalf of the State of California."). [certified for interlocutory appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b), see Lopez v. Youngblood, 2009 WL 2062883 (E.D. Cal. July 15, 2009), but case settled]

Vega v. County of Yolo, No. 2:09-cv-00574-MCE-KJM, 2009 WL 1993522, at *3 (C.D. Cal. July 8, 2009) (following Ninth Circuit precedent and finding Sheriff is final policymaker for county in adopting and implementing medical policies at county jail).

Miller v. Butte County, No. 2:06-CV-0489 JAM KJM, 2008 WL 4287665, at *4 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 17, 2008) ("To the extent Defendants urge this Court to follow Venegas instead of Ninth Circuit precedent, the Court declines to do so. Federal, not state law, controls the ultimate issue of whether California sheriff's are subject to liability under § 1983. Accordingly, because under Ninth Circuit precedent Sheriff Reniff was acting on behalf of the County with respect to Miller's incarceration at the Butte County Jail, the County is subject to § 1983 liability for his actions.").

Galati v. County of San Mateo, 2008 WL 1886033, at *6 (N.D.Cal. 2008) ("[O]n this issue of federal law, the Court is bound by the decision of the Ninth Circuit in Brewster. Thus, the Court will not grant summary judgment on Plaintiff's claims against the County of San Mateo, the San Mateo County Sheriff's Department or the current and former Sheriffs of San Mateo County, in their official capacities, on the basis of Eleventh Amendment immunity.")

Armstrong v. Siskiyou County Sheriff's Dept., No. CIV-S-07-1046 GEB GGH PS, 2008 WL 686888, at *6 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 13, 2008) ("Notwithstanding their reliance on Venegas, defendants acknowledge the Ninth Circuit earlier reached the opposite conclusion in Brewster v. Shasta County, 275 F.3d 803 (9th Cir.2001), which held that California sheriffs, their departments and deputies, act on behalf of the county when investigating crimes and enforcing state criminal statutes. . . . Defendants' argument that Venegas should control because decided after Brewster is without merit. Although the Ninth Circuit has not revisited this matter since Venegas, it is clear that federal claims must be ruled by federal law, i.e., that Brewster must control in this federal § 1983 action, thus rendering the Siskiyou County Sheriff's Department, its Sheriff and deputies, county actors without Eleventh Amendment immunity.").

Womack v. County of Amador, No. Civ. S-02-1063 RRB DAD, 2008 WL 669811, at *6, *7 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 7, 2008) ("In the present case, the County argues that it is immune from liability under the Eleventh Amendment on the basis that in California, a district attorney and his investigators act on behalf of the state rather than the county when engaged in investigating crime. Womack, for his part, maintains that the County is not immune from liability under the Eleventh Amendment because, under Ninth Circuit precedent, a district attorney (as a policymaker for the County with respect to obtaining and executing warrants) and/or his deputies and investigators (policymakers through delegation) act on behalf of the county rather than the state when investigating crime. Because the County does not dispute that the District Attorney has final policymaking authority over obtaining and executing warrants, . . . the County's § 1983 liability, turns, in part, on whether district attorneys and their investigators, when investigating crime, act on behalf of the state (which would immunize the County from § 1983 liability), or on behalf of the county (which would subject the County to § 1983 liability). Presently, as noted by the parties, there is a split in authority between the Ninth Circuit and the California Supreme Court with respect to whether a district attorney acts on behalf of the state or the county when investigating crime. . . . Following Bishop, the California Supreme Court clarified its holding in Pitts by explaining that a district attorney represents the state, and is not considered a policymaker for the county, when prosecuting crimes and when preparing to prosecute crimes, including investigating crimes in advance of prosecution. . . . In Pitts, Bishop and Venegas, both the Ninth Circuit and the California Supreme Court applied the analytical framework set forth in McMillian, but nonetheless reached conflicting conclusions. Thus, the question becomes which analysis the court should follow. In the present case, the court finds the Ninth Circuit's reasoning in Bishop to be persuasive. . . Although the Ninth Circuit's McMillian analysis in Bishop pre-dated the California Supreme Court's analysis in Venegas, and therefore lacked the benefit of the analysis by the state's highest court, ultimately the holding in Venegas is only binding on state courts because the ultimate issue-whether or not California district attorney's are subject to liability under § 1983 when investigating crime-is a question of federal law even though it requires the application of some principles of state law to resolve it. . . Thus, while Venegas and Pitts are relevant in this court's 'analysis of state law' as required by McMillian, these cases do not overturn the Ninth Circuit's reasoning in Bishop on the ultimate question under the federal statute. Accordingly, until Bishop is overturned by a panel of the Ninth Circuit or the United States Supreme Court, the Ninth Circuit's reasoning in Bishop is persuasive authority for this court. Therefore, because the Ninth Circuit in Bishop squarely addressed the issue of whether a district attorney acts on behalf of the state rather than the county when investigating crimes, and concluded, after applying the McMillian analytical framework, that a district attorney acts for the county when engaging in investigatory acts, . . . the court concludes that the district attorneys and the district attorney investigator in this action are not immune from liability under the Eleventh Amendment and the doctrine of sovereign immunity for their acts in connection with obtaining and executing the search warrants at issue. . . As such, the County is not immune from § 1983 liability.")

Brown v. County of Kern, 2008 WL 544565, at *12 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 26, 2008) ("The Venegas decision does not overturn Ninth Circuit precedent on this issue regarding a federal statute and does not control on issues of federal law. . . . Until the Ninth Circuit addresses this issue and abrogates the Brewster decision, this Court is bound by Ninth Circuit precedent.").

McNeely v. County of Sacramento, 2008 WL 489893, *4-5 (E.D. Cal. Feb. 20, 2008) ("Whether or not local officials, like Sheriff Blanas, act for the locality of the state in a particular area or on a particular issue depends on an analysis of state law. . . California law deems elected sheriffs as state actors with respect to their law enforcement activities. [citing Venegas]While the Ninth Circuit has treated the sheriff as a county actor where his administrative or investigative responsibilities are under scrutiny, those cases are distinguishable from the present case, which concerns conduct arising from simply detaining Plaintiff in jail pending the outcome of ongoing criminal proceedings in Sacramento and Placer Counties. . . . Here, there can be no question that Sheriff Blanas, as well as Sheriff Bonner, were acting in accordance with both facially valid warrants as well as duly authorized criminal proceedings instituted by the District Attorneys of their respective counties and pending before their courts. . . . It follows that both Defendants Blanas and Bonner are entitled to immunity, in their official capacities as Sheriffs of Sacramento County and Placer County, with respect to the issues raised by Plaintiff's lawsuit with regard to his incarceration. Moreover, because the Court has determined that those issues arise from the sheriffs' status as state, rather than county actors, neither the County of Sacramento or the County of Placer are proper parties to this lawsuit.")

Smith v. County of Los Angeles, 535 F.Supp.2d 1033, 1035-38 (C.D.Cal. 2008) ("On several occasions, after examining California constitutional and statutory authority, the Ninth Circuit has held that 'the Sheriff acts for the County' and not the State when he performs his functions of 'oversight and management of the local jail.'[citing Streit and Cortez] Oversight and management of a local jail, with respect specifically to the promulgation and application of policies regarding inmate medical care, are the practices challenged in this case. As this Court is bound by Ninth Circuit precedent, these holdings should end the inquiry. Defendant argues, however, that an intervening California Supreme Court decision reveals that the Ninth Circuit's interpretation of California law was incorrect. In Venegas v. County of Los Angeles, 32 Cal.4th 820, 839 (2004), the California Supreme Court held that 'California sheriffs act as state officers while performing state law enforcement duties such as investigating possible criminal activity.'. . . Venegas misconstrued federal constitutional law. Contrary to Defendant's contention, the question of whether the sheriff is a county or state official is not purely one of state law. Rather, at bottom the question is one of federal law regarding the meaning Eleventh Amendment immunity and section 1983. . . . In elucidating the standard for Eleventh Amendment immunity from section 1983 suits, the Supreme Court has emphasized that a State's financial liability for county torts is a critical factor in justifying an extension of the immunity to a county sheriff. . . . The importance of financial liability as an indicator supporting immunity is confirmed by a string of United States Supreme Court cases holding that protecting the state coffers is of paramount importance in the immunity analysis. . . . As a matter of federal law, this Court finds that California's lack of liability for county torts is dispositive, and rejects the Venegas opinion's contrary holding. . . . Accordingly, the Court finds that, under the correct federal framework, even after Venegas, California law reveals that sheriffs are county − not state − representatives. . . . There are practical as well as legal reasons for the California Supreme Court to reconsider Venegas. A State that claims Eleventh Amendment immunity for county officials may well reap what it sows. If sheriffs and their departments are state actors, then by all logic the state, not the county, should absorb the liability relating to these cases. In California, public entities . . . are often responsible through respondeat superior liability for actions which could otherwise be charged as federal constitutional violations. There are many such cases. . . . Because Venegas misapplied federal law, the Court declines to follow its holding and finds instead that Plaintiffs' claims are not barred by the Eleventh Amendment. In so holding, the Court urges the California Supreme Court to reconsider Venegas to conform with the federal standard.").

Brockmeier v. Solano County Sheriff's Dep't., No. CIV-S-05-2090 MCE EFB PS, 2006 WL 3760276, at *5, *6, *9, *10 (E.D. Cal. Dec. 18, 2006) ("Defendants have identified Solano County Sheriff Stanton as having final policymaking authority over the actions at issue. . . Plaintiff does not dispute that contention. Thus, the issue of the county's section 1983 liability turns on whether the sheriff, when investigating crimes in that role as policymaker, acts on behalf of the state (which would immunize the county from section 1983 liability) or on behalf of the county (which would subject the county to section 1983 liability). While the question appears to have an intuitively obvious answer, the Ninth Circuit and the California Supreme Court have squarely addressed this issue and their decisions are in direct conflict. . . . In California, the issue of whether a sheriff is a state or county actor is less clear than in Alabama. There are several provisions, both under the California constitution and the California code, that lend themselves to dueling interpretations under the analytical framework established in McMillian. This is evidenced by the California Supreme Court's recent decision in Venegas, which directly conflicts with the Ninth Circuit's interpretation of California law in Brewster. The question reduces to which forum's law controls here. The Ninth Circuit's interpretation pre-dated the California Supreme Court's analysis in Venegas. Thus, it lacked the benefit of the analysis by the state's highest court on what superficially appears to be a question of state law. Although the holding in Venegas might be viewed as dispositive state law under McMillian, the decision concerns an issue that is ultimately federal in nature. That is, the ultimate issue is whether or not California sheriffs are subject to liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 when executing their law enforcement duties. This is an ultimate question of federal law even though it requires the application of some principles of state law to resolve it. . . . Thus, while Venegas is relevant in this court's 'analysis of state law' as required by McMillian, it does not overturn Ninth Circuit precedent on the ultimate question under the federal statute. Unless overturned by a panel of the Ninth Circuit or the United States Supreme Court, the Ninth Circuit's holding in Brewster binds this court. Furthermore, an independent analysis of the issue reveals that the Brewster decision reflects a stricter adherence to the McMillian framework than the Venegas decision, whose holding is based largely on two state court decisions that the Brewster court rejected. . . . Even though the Ninth Circuit has yet to reexamine the issue of a California sheriff's official capacity for purposes of section 1983 liability in light of Venegas, this court finds that Brewster is still controlling within the Ninth Circuit. Therefore, the court declines to follow the holding in Walker v. County of Santa Clara, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 42118 (N.D.Cal. Sept. 30, 2005), as defendants request. . . . This court has duly considered the Venegas decision, but finds that it does not militate in favor of a decision contrary to the holding in Brewster. . . . Accordingly, this court finds Brewster controlling on the issue of whether California sheriffs are subject to section 1983 liability. Consistent with the holding in that case, the court finds that the Solano County Sheriff's Department acts on behalf of the county when investigating crimes, and that the county is therefore subject to section 1983 liability.").

Faulkner v. County of Kern, No. 1:04-CV-05964 OWWTAG, 2006 WL 1795107, at *15, *16 (E.D. Cal. June 28, 2006) ("The County argues that it cannot be liable for the allegedly unlawful official acts of those Defendants who are County Sheriffs, because, according to the County, County Sheriffs in California act on behalf of the State, not the County when investigating crime. The County's defense is based on a recent California Supreme Court case, Venegas v. County of Los Angeles, 32 Cal.4th 820, 11 Cal.Rptr.3d 692, 87 P.3d 1 (2004), which examined whether a county sheriff acted as an agent of the state when conducting a criminal investigation. The Venegas court examined applicable provisions of the California Constitution, several relevant California statutes, and prior California cases to reach the conclusion that 'sheriffs act on behalf of the state when performing law enforcement duties.' Application of this seemingly straightforward holding is complicated by the fact that Ninth Circuit decisions do not follow and squarely contradict Venegas. . . . Weiner cautions against the blind acceptance of the Venegas holding, given the existence of a contrary Ninth Circuit rule in Brewster, which is binding upon this court. . . .For purposes of this section 1983 case, a federal claim brought in a federal court within the Ninth Circuit, the County of Kern may be liable for the law enforcement-related acts of Sheriff Sparks. It remains to be determined, however, whether any official capacity claim against him (i.e., against the County) survives summary judgment.").

Walker v. County of Santa Clara, No. C 04-02211 RMW, 2005 WL 2437037, at *4 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 30, 2005) ("Plaintiffs contend that the Ninth Circuit's holding in Brewster v. Shasta County controls, and therefore that the sheriff, when investigating crime, acts as a final policymaker for the County when investigating crime within the County. . . Defendants counter that Venegas v. County of Los Angeles is controlling. . . In Venegas, the California Supreme Court expressly disagreed with the Ninth Circuit's decision in Brewster, and held that 'California sheriffs act as state officers while performing state law enforcement duties such as investigating possible criminal activity.'. . Thus, there appears to be a split of authority. . . . Here, the Ninth Circuit's decision in Brewster is directly at odds with the California Supreme Court's subsequent holding in Venegas that California sheriffs are state officers while performing law enforcement duties, and although this court need not 'blindly accept' the Venegas court's decision, . . . the California Supreme Court's decision comports with this court's understanding of the function of California sheriffs.").

Thomas v. Baca, No. CV 04-008448 DDP, 2005 WL 1030247, at *3, *4 (C.D. Cal. May 2, 2005) (not reported) ("The supervisors first argue that the Sheriff is a state actor under California law, and that he is thus removed from the supervisory authority of the County Board. They rely on a line of California cases culminating with Venegas v. County of Los Angeles, 32 Cal.4th 820, 11 Cal.Rptr.3d 692, 87 P.3d 1 (2004). In Venegas, the California Supreme Court held that, for § 1983 purposes, the Los Angeles County Sheriff is a state actor protected by the Eleventh Amendment when he acts in his law enforcement capacity. . . While this is contrary to prior Ninth Circuit holdings that a California county sheriff acts on behalf of the county, see, e.g., Brewster v. Shasta County, 275 F.3d 803 (9th Cir.2001), the supervisors point out that those federal court holdings were decided without the benefit of the California Supreme Court's decision in Venegas. The framework for determining whether an official qualifies for Eleventh Amendment immunity in § 1983 claims was set forth by the United States Supreme Court in McMillian v. Monroe County, Alabama. . . . First, a court should 'ask whether governmental officials are final policymakers for the local government in a particular area, or on a particular issue.' . . Second, the actual function of a governmental official, in a particular area, depends 'on the definition of the official's functions under relevant state law.' . . While state law serves as valuable evidence for this determination, federal courts need not blindly accept the California Supreme Court's 'balancing of the different provisions of state law in determining liability under § 1983.' Weiner v. San Diego County, 210

F.3d 1025, 1029 (9th Cir.2000). McMillian instructs that state law cannot 'answer the question for us by, for example, simply labeling as a state official an official who clearly makes county policy.' . . The federal analysis of state law to determine § 1983 liability includes an inquiry into the 'state's constitution, statutes, and case law.' . . Therefore, this Court is not bound by the California Supreme Court's recent interpretation of state law regarding § 1983 liability. However, as relevant case law, it is an important part of the analysis. McMillian requires courts to inquire 'whether governmental officials are final policymakers for the local government in a particular area or on a particular issue.'. . McMillian 'clearly instructs' that resolution of whether a sheriff acts as a state or county official depends on an 'analysis of the precise function at issue.' . . Applying the McMillian analysis, the Ninth Circuit held that when administering the county's policy for release from local jails, the Los Angeles County Sheriff acts as an official for the county. '[E]ven if we view the function more broadly as the oversight and management of the local jail, we are compelled to agree with the district court that the Sheriff acts for the County in this management function.' Streit v. County of Los Angeles, 236 F.3d 552, 561 (9th Cir.2001). While the California Supreme Court arrived at a different answer in Venegas, that case involved a search of the plaintiffs' home and vehicle, acts which clearly fall within the Sheriff's law enforcement authority. The facts in the instant case involve the Sheriff's release and housing practices at the county jails. Given this, the Court finds Brewster and Streit controlling, the Sheriff is not a state actor for purposes of this § 1983 suit, and the supervisors cannot preclude the plaintiffs' theory of liability with this argument.").

Green v. Baca, 306 F.Supp.2d 903, 907 n.31 (C.D. Cal. 2004) ("Because a state is not amenable to suit under § 1983, an official acting pursuant to a policy of the state government cannot be held liable under the statute. . . The Ninth Circuit has held that, in exercising control of the county jail, the Sheriff acts as an official policy-maker for the County of Los Angeles, not for the state of California. [citing Streit and Cortez] The California Court of Appeal has reached a contrary result, concluding that the sheriff is not a 'person' under § 1983 because he acts as a state officer in exercising responsibility over the jail. [citing County of Los Angeles v. Superior Court, 68 Cal.App.4th 1166, 1176, 80 Cal.Rptr.2d 860 (1998)] The court, however, is bound by the Ninth Circuit's interpretation.").

Benas v. Baca, No. CV-00-11507 LGB (SHX*)*, 2001 WL 485168, at *7 (C.D. Cal. April 23, 2001) (not reported) ("While case law in this area is inconsistent, the Ninth Circuit, both before and after McMillian, has found a California sheriff to be a local law enforcement agent, and therefore subject to section 1983 liability.").

Montana

Eggar v. City of Livingston, 40 F.3d 312, 315 (9th Cir. 1994) ("Officials can act on behalf of more than one government entity. [cite omitted] That [municipal judge] allegedly performed his duty to advise indigents of their rights in a way that makes a mockery of those rights does not make that duty administrative. The Judge's failure to follow state law or federal constitutional law does not transform his 'cattle-call' method of counseling into municipal policymaking. As state law makes clear, the Judge's obligation to address the rights of defendants arises from his membership in the state judiciary. It is lamentable, but irrelevant, that he failed miserably to meet this obligation under both state and federal standards: he simply is not a municipal decision maker in this context.").

Nevada

Botello v. Gammick, 413 F.3d 971, 979 (9th Cir. 2005) ("[T]he County claims that under Nevada law, when Gammick made the decision not to prosecute cases initiated by Botello, he was acting as a policymaker on behalf of the state and not the County. The County's argument is unavailing in two respects. First, it is foreclosed by our holding in Webb v. Sloan that, under Nevada law, 'principal district attorneys are final policymakers for the municipality with respect to the conduct of criminal prosecutions.'. . Accordingly, Gammick was a policymaker for the County when he decided not to prosecute Botello's cases. Second, Botello alleges that other than adopting the nonprosecution policy, Gammick's conduct was administrative, not judicial, in nature. The County offers no argument to rebut the proposition that a district attorney acting in his administrative and investigative capacity is a County policy-maker.").

Webb v. Sloan, 330 F.3d 1158, 1165, 1166 (9th Cir. 2003) ("Nevada district attorneys are final policymakers in the particular area or particular issue relevant here: the decision to continue to imprison and to prosecute. The state attorney general exercises supervisory power over county district attorneys, but this does not remove final policymaking authority even from principal district attorneys. . . . Both this court and the Nevada Supreme Court, however, have emphasized the discretionary and permissive nature of that [supervisory power]. . . . and in the absence of any evidence in the record that the attorney general in fact ever exercises that supervisory power, we hold that principal district attorneys are final policymakers for the municipality with respect to the conduct of criminal prosecutions. . . . [T]he Nevada legislature confers the same final policymaking authority on deputy district attorneys. . . . Because of the distinctions between Nevada's deputy district attorneys and the Hawaiian deputy prosecutors in Christie, Christie does not control the outcome of this case. The district court correctly held that deputy district attorneys in Nevada are final policymakers whose actions can be the acts of the municipality for the purposes of attaching liability under § 1983.").

Pellerin v. Nevada County, No. CIV S 12–665 KJM CKD, 2013 WL 1284341, *3, *4 (E.D. Cal. Mar. 28, 2013) ("Defendants assert Eleventh Amendment immunity for the District Attorney's office and defendants Weston and Francis, to the extent they are sued in their official capacities as deputy district attorneys. Defendant makes no claim of immunity for either the Sheriff's Department or King as the individually named Sheriff's deputy. In the absence of the state's consent to suit, the Eleventh Amendment bars suits for damages against states, state agencies, and state officials acting in their official capacities. . . In Weiner v. San Diego County, 210 F.3d 1025 (9th Cir.2000), the Ninth Circuit explored the application of McMillian v. Monroe County, Ala., 520 U.S. 781, 117 S.Ct. 1734, 138 L.Ed.2d 1 (1997) to the question whether a California district attorney was a state or county official for purposes of county liability under Monell v. Dept. of Social Servs., 436 U.S. 658, 98 S.Ct. 2018, 56 L.Ed.2d 611 (1978). Recognizing that the question is of one of federal law, but yet was intimately bound up with state law, the court examined California's constitutional and statutory provisions and held that 'a California district attorney is a state officer when deciding whether to prosecute an individual.'. . The Ninth Circuit has relied on Weiner in concluding that prosecutors 'act as state officials, and so possess Eleventh Amendment immunity, when acting in [their] prosecutorial capacity.'. . Defendants Francis and Weston, sued in their official capacity for failing to review the exculpatory evidence on the Flip video camera, are immune from suit. To the extent plaintiff argues that the District Attorney's office itself is liable, his claim also fails, as the office is deemed to be a state agency when involved in prosecutorial activities. . . Finally, the County is also immune. . . . Because members of the District Attorney's office were state officials for purposes of prosecutorial decisions, they cannot be deemed to be policy makers for the County.")

Oregon

Kleinman v.Multnomah County, No. 03-1723-KI, 2004 WL 2359959, at *5 (D. Ore. Oct. 15, 2004) ("In Bishop, the Circuit analyzed the California constitution, statutes and case law to determine whether the Inyo County District Attorney was a state or a county official. The court concluded that the district attorney is a county officer when doing certain activities. Notwithstanding the Ninth Circuit's ultimate conclusion in the case, there are several differences between California law and Oregon law that support defendants' position. For example, the California constitution and statutes designate district attorneys as local government officials. . .California district attorneys may not be removed by the legislature, as other California officials are. . . California law gives the counties the authority to supervise the district attorneys' conduct and the use of public funds. . . Under California law, the county sets the salaries for district attorneys. . .These factors cut the other way in Oregon. Plaintiff argues that the court must recognize the dual nature of the district attorneys' offices in both state and county affairs in Oregon and consider the nature of the suit here. Plaintiff contends that the District Attorney's Office in this case is being sued not for prosecutorial functions, but instead in its administrative role of supervising and training county employees. In other words, plaintiff argues that he brings claims against the District Attorney's office in its 'county capacity.' There is some validity to plaintiff's point in that the case law on state immunity and prosecutorial immunity often focuses on the acts at issue, not just on the entity being sued. However, I believe this argument is quite strained under Oregon law, particularly given the lack of authority for this proposition. I conclude that the Multnomah County District Attorney's Office is a state entity. As such, it is entitled to sovereign immunity. Defendants' motion to dismiss is granted and the Multnomah County District Attorney's Office is dismissed from this action. . . . If the District Attorney's office is deemed a state entity, plaintiff cannot sustain a claim for damages against District Attorney Schrunk in his official capacity.")

Washington [state]

Whatcom County v. State of Washington, 993 P.2d 273, 277, 278, 280 (Wash.App.Div. 2000) (involves county prosecutor, but relevant) ("The McMillian and Pitts decisions provide us with guidance in determining whether the State or the County is responsible for Graham's defense and indemnification. However, there are two notable differences between those cases and the case at bar. First, in McMillian and Pitts, the issue was whether counties could be held liable under § 1983 for the actions of certain government officials. Thus, the question of whether the officials acted with 'final policymaking authority' was relevant to the decision. Here, we are not concerned with the ultimate question of which government entity (if any) is liable for Graham's acts, but only with the narrow issue of whether Graham is a state officer or employee entitled to a state defense and indemnification. Second, in McMillian and Pitts, the question of how to properly characterize the officials' functions was not at issue. However, in this case the parties disagree sharply on whether Graham's actions constituted 'advice to a county official' or 'prosecution under state law.' . . . We conclude that (1) Graham was 'prosecuting state law' when he advised Weisenburger that Monroe could be released from jail, and, (2) county prosecutors in Washington represent the State, not their counties, when prosecuting violations of state law. Thus, we hold that Graham is a 'state officer' or 'state employee' employee" under RCW 4.92.060, .070, .075, and .130, entitling him to defense and indemnification from the State. . . . Lastly, we note that Graham should not be deprived of state defense and indemnification merely because there may be questions as to which state fund should be used for that purpose.")

TENTH CIRCUIT

Colorado

Gonzales v. Martinez, 403 F.3d 1179, 1182 n.7 (10th Cir. 2005) ("Curiously, neither the district court nor defendants have challenged Ms. Gonzales' designating 'Huerfano County' as defendant. Under Colo.Rev.Stat. § 30-11-105, 'the name in which the county shall sue or be sued shall be, "The board of county commissioners of the county of ....."' This statutory provision provides the exclusive method by which jurisdiction over a county can be obtained. An action attempted to be brought under any other designation is a nullity, and no valid judgment can enter in such a case.' . . Were we to overlook this jurisdictional flaw, we are still guided by Bristol v. Bd. of County Comm'rs of Clear Creek, 312 F.3d 1213, 1215 (10th Cir.2002) (under the Colorado constitution, the County Sheriff is a distinct position, separate from the Board of County Commissioners). The only claims Plaintiff made against the County were based on a faulty premise. She asserted the County owed her a duty 'to employ competent law enforcement officers and to supervise the conduct of its sheriff and Chief Jail Administrator.' That is not a valid premise under Colorado law. . . Had Plaintiff claimed the Sheriff set official policy of the County or was following policy established by the County in the operation of the jail, we might have to reach a different conclusion. See id. at 1221 ("counties can be held liable for the misdeeds of Sheriffs and their employees when the Sheriff is held to set 'official policy' for the county."). Yet, whether because of the plain language of the statute or the Plaintiff's failure to state a valid claim, the action cannot lie against Huerfano County.").

Bristol v. Bd. of Cnty. Commis. of Cnty. of Clear Creek, 312 F.3d 1213, 1221 (10th Cir.2002) (listing cases where the "acts of the Sheriff were held to set the 'official policy' of the County, thus making the County liable under § 1983 for the Sheriff's unconstitutional actions and those of the Sheriff's employees.").

Chavez v. Board of County Commissioners of Lake County, No. 18-CV-3249-WJM-NYW, 2019 WL 5790129, at *7-9 (D. Colo. Nov. 6, 2019) ("Lower courts have nonetheless cited Bristol or Gonzales, or both, for the notion that county sheriffs in Colorado set policy for the county, so the proper defendant in a § 1983 action based on the sheriff's policies is the board of county commissioners. . . . The Court agrees that if a Colorado sheriff is a final policymaker for the entire 'body corporate and politic' known as 'the county,' Colo. Rev. Stat. § 30-11-101(1), then the county may be held liable in a § 1983/Monell lawsuit for an injury inflicted by an unconstitutional sheriff-made policy. However, no authority of which the Court is aware has analyzed whether Colorado law makes Colorado sheriffs policymakers over the entity dubbed 'the county.' Rather, the relevant cases all trace back to Bristol's dicta concerning the 'suggest[ion]' of extra-circuit authority about the relationship of the sheriffs at issue to their counties. . . The Court thus turns to an examination of relevant Colorado law. . . . [W]hen a Monell claim is based on a sheriff-made policy, any distinction between suing the sheriff's office versus suing the county becomes purely theoretical, because the county will pay regardless. . . . The Court recognizes that, by the time of summary judgment and/or trial, Plaintiffs will need to explain clearly the policy at issue and the policymaker(s) to whom the policy is attributable. Even if the County would be responsible for paying any judgment regardless, the Court and the parties cannot evaluate the relevance and probative value of the evidence without knowing Plaintiffs' precise theory. At this stage however, no such evaluations are needed.").

Kansas

Couser v. Gay, 959 F.3d 1018, 1025 n.8, 1026, 1030-31 (10th Cir. 2020) ("Most circuit courts to address the issue have concluded that a sheriff acting in a law enforcement function is a county actor. See, e.g., Williams v. Kaufman Cty., 352 F.3d 994, 1013-14 (5th Cir. 2003) (Texas sheriffs); Crabbs v. Scott, 786 F.3d 426, 429 (6th Cir. 2015) (Ohio sheriffs); Franklin v. Zaruba, 150 F.3d 682, 685 (7th Cir. 1998) (Illinois sheriffs); Dean v. Cty. of Gage, Neb., 807 F.3d 931, 942 (8th Cir. 2015) (Nebraska sheriffs); Brewster v. Shasta Cty., 275 F.3d 803, 811 (9th Cir. 2001) (California sheriffs); Abusaid v. Hillsborough Cty. Bd. of Cty. Comm'rs, 405 F.3d 1298, 1304-05 (11th Cir. 2005) (Florida sheriffs); but see Grech v. Clayton Cty., 335 F.3d 1326, 1327 (11th Cir. 2003) (en banc) (Georgia sheriffs acting in a law enforcement function are state actors). . . .We hold that Sheriff Gay, acting in his law enforcement capacity, is a county actor under Kansas law and thus not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . . To determine whether the district court properly held that Sheriff Gay was a county actor not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity, we apply the four factors from Steadfast. . . For each factor, we also compare the Kansas sheriff to the Alabama sheriff that the McMillian Court deemed a state official. . . . All four factors support finding that Kansas sheriffs are county actors: (1) Kansas law lists sheriffs under county officer provisions; (2) Kansas sheriffs have substantial autonomy from the state in their law enforcement functions compared to their Alabama counterparts; (3) the county controls the sheriff's salary and books; and (4) the sheriff is primarily concerned with local affairs. . . . All four factors point in the same direction. The 'weight of the evidence is strongly on the side' of finding that Kansas sheriffs, when executing their law enforcement duties, represent their counties, not the State of Kansas.")

Seifert v. Unified Gov't of Wyandotte Cnty./Kansas City, 779 F.3d 1141, 1159 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Here, it appears that the actions of Sheriff Ash, in his position as the final policymaker for the Wyandotte County Sheriff's Department, represent the official policy of the Unified Government and subject it to potential liability. See Kan. Stat. Ann. §§ 19–805 (West 2008) (sheriff is responsible for conduct of undersheriff and deputies); Bd. of Cnty. Comm'rs v. Nielander, 62 P.3d 247, 251 (Kan.2003) ("[T]he sheriff is a state officer whose duties, powers, and obligations derive directly from the legislature and are coextensive with the county board."). Plaintiff argues as much, and the Unified Government offers no argument in response. We therefore need not consider whether the actions of Ash and Roland were in conformity with preexisting official policies or customs. The summary judgment for the Unified Government on the § 1983 claim must be set aside.")

Nielander v. The Board Of County Com'rs, 582 F.3d 1155, 1170 (10th Cir. 2009) ("Though we are doubtful that a prosecutor is a policymaker merely because he has discretion in deciding who to prosecute, we need not decide the issue because, regardless, Attorney Spurney is not a municipal policymaker. As noted above, in Kansas, county attorneys are officials of the state, not the county. . . Attorney Spurney admits that the County has no authority over how he exercises his law enforcement duties; his discretionary authority does not derive from Republic County, but from the state. . . Thus, the county attorney's actions cannot be attributable to the Board of County Commissioners under a municipal liability theory.").

Wilson v. Sedgwick County Bd. of County Com's, No. 05-1210-MLB, 2006 WL 2850326, at *4 (D. Kan. Oct. 3, 2006) ("It is clear therefore, that only the sheriff, not the commissioners, has the power to set policy and train under Kansas law. . . Thus, plaintiff's claim against defendant based on an execution of policy by defendant that allegedly caused his injuries must fail. Defendant had no authority to make such a policy.").

Gaston v. Ploeger, 399 F.Supp.2d 1211, 1224, 1225 (D. Kan. 2005) ("In conjunction with these allegations, Plaintiff contends the Commissioners are responsible for the funding of the Brown County Jail and its operations, and thus it is incumbent upon the Commissioners to see that the facilities and funding are proper to provide an environment where the inmates of the Brown County Jail are safe and secure. . .Relying on these allegations and contentions, Plaintiff ultimately argues the Commissioners failed to provide adequate funding for the Brown County Jail as demonstrated by the fact that on the day Belden committed suicide, the sole corrections officer at the Brown County Jail was by himself and thus unable to take appropriate action in removing the paper barrier from Belden's cell window for approximately two hours. The Court is not persuaded by Plaintiff's argument. As a preliminary matter, Plaintiff's reliance on K.S.A. 19-1919 to impose section 1983 liability on the County Commissioners is misplaced. This Kansas statute is simply the funding mechanism for the state's county jails. There is no evidence to demonstrate that the responsibility for funding includes any authority for the running of jails or that the County Commissioners have any connection with the operation of the jail other than with respect to funding. Simply put, Plaintiff identifies no evidence connecting the Brown County Commissioners with Belden's suicide or with any policy bearing on his suicide. Because Plaintiff fails to identify a legal or factual basis for imposing section 1983 liability on the Brown County Commissioners, the Court will enter summary judgment in favor of these Defendants in their official capacity on Plaintiff's section 1983 claims. . . . [T]he Court finds the suit against Shoemaker in his official capacity as Brown County Sheriff must be construed to be a suit against the governing body of Brown County: the Brown County Commissioners. Because the Court already has determined that there is no legal or factual basis for imposing section 1983 liability on the Brown County Commissioners, the Court similarly will enter judgment on Plaintiff's section 1983 claim in favor of Defendant Shoemaker in his official capacity as Sheriff of Brown County.").

Lowery v. County of Riley, No. 04-3101-JTM, 2005 WL 1242376, at 7-9 (D. Kan. May 25, 2005) (not reported) ("Although consolidated into one entity, the RCPD [Riley County Police Department] maintains some of the hallmarks of a city or county law enforcement department. Prior to the consolidation, the RCPD was three separate institutions − the Riley County Sheriff's Office, the Manhattan, Kansas Police Department and the Ogden County Police Department. By state statute, the individual sheriffs and deputies sheriff were relieved of all their powers and authorities, and these powers were vested in the RCPD and its director. . . In essence, the RCPD is the equivalent of a sheriff's department, and the director serves in a capacity commensurate with a sheriff. Since the director stands in the shoes of the sheriff, he or she assumes the sheriff's powers and responsibilities, which by implication includes the power to be sued. See Sparks v. Reno County Sheriff's Department, No. 04-3034, 2004 WL 1664007, at *4 (D.Kan. Jan. 26, 2004) (noting that a sheriff is an entity that is subject to suit though the Reno County Sheriff's Department was not subject to suit). Although the RCPD is a subordinate entity to the Law Board, the RCPD director has the implied power to sue based on his freedom to control and supervise the RCPD agents. As a result, plaintiff may not bring suit against the RCPD as a separate legal entity, thought it may bring suit against the director, who serves in a capacity equivalent to a sheriff. In the alternative, plaintiff argues that the RCPD is an unincorporated association that may be sued under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 17(b). Since the court has already found that the RCPD is a subordinate agency to the Law Board, the RCPD is more appropriately classified as part of a greater municipal entity. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 17(b) is not applicable here. . . . The Law Board and RCPD have complimentary roles, though structured hierarchically. As already noted, the Law Board is responsible for the adoption of rules and regulations. Yet, the RCPD 'shall be under the exclusive supervision and control of the director and no member of the agency shall interfere by individual action with the operation of the department or the conduct of any of the officers or other personnel of such department.'. . Although largely autonomous, the director is responsible to the agency for providing police protection 'in conformance with rules and regulations adopted by such agency.' . . The statutory structure simultaneously creates both autonomy and accountability in the RCPD. While the Law Board may create the official policy, the RCPD director has exclusive supervision and control of its members and directs the customs and practices of the RCPD. The interrelation creates potential Monell liability for both the Law Board and the RCPD.").

Schroeder v. Kochanowski, 311 F.Supp.2d 1241, 1250 n.23 (D. Kan. 2004) ("The Court disagrees with the Saline County defendants' argument that a county sheriff is a 'state official' and thus plaintiff's claim is barred by the Eleventh Amendment. Defendants fail to cite, nor was the Court able to find, Tenth Circuit cases holding that a county sheriff was a state official.")

Wishom v. Hill, No. Civ.A. 01-3035-KHV, 2004 WL 303571, at *5 (D. Kan. Feb. 13, 2004) ("Defendants admit that plaintiff may sue former Sheriff Hill and current Sheriff Steed, but correctly note that plaintiff may not sue the SCDF because it is a subordinate governmental agency. Fuguate v. Unified Gov't of Wyandotte County/Kan. City, Kan., 161 F.Supp.2d 1261, 1266 (D.Kan.2001) (absent specific statue, subordinate governmental agencies lack capacity to sue or be sued); Wright v. Wyandotte County Sheriff's Dep't, 963 F.Supp. 1029, 1034 (D.Kan.1997) (county sheriff's department is agency of county and not capable of being sued); Murphy v. City of Topeka, 6 Kan.App.2d 488, 491, 630 P.2d 186, 190 (1981) (absent express statutory or ordinance authority, agency does not have capacity to sue or be sued). The SCDF lacks the capacity to sue or be sued. The Court therefore sustains defendants' motion for summary judgment as to plaintiff's claims against the SCDF.")

Wishom v. Hill, No. Civ.A. 01-3035-KHV, 2004 WL 303571, at *8, *9 (D. Kan. Feb. 13, 2004) ("In seeking summary judgment on plaintiff's official capacity claims, defendant argues that at the time of plaintiff's arrest, the county had a policy and practice which afforded detainees a probable cause hearing within 48 hours of incarceration, as required by McLaughlin, 500 U.S. 44. As stated above, however, liability may also arise from the act of an ultimate county decision-maker. Pembaur, 475 U.S. at 480. Plaintiff's official capacity claims can therefore survive summary judgment if he can show a genuine issue of material fact that an ultimate county decision-maker caused the violation of his right to be free from unconstitutional detention under the Fourth Amendment. Under Kansas law, the sheriff is responsible for taking care of the jail of his county and its prisoners. K.S.A ' 19-811. He therefore serves as an ultimate county decision-maker in matters involving the county jail. . . . To prevail on his official capacity claim, plaintiff must show a genuine issue of material fact whether Sheriff Hill caused him to be detained without a probable cause hearing. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, a reasonable jury could so find. As stated above, the record indicates that Sheriff Hill incarcerated plaintiff for six days without a probable cause hearing or bond.").

Oklahoma

Layton v. Board of County Com'rs of Oklahoma County, 2013 WL 925807, *6 (10th Cir. Mar. 12, 2013) (not reported) ("A 'suit against [the Sheriff] in his official capacity as sheriff is the equivalent of a suit against [the] County.' Lopez v. LeMaster, 172 F.3d 756, 762 (10th Cir.1999); see also Myers v. Okla. Cnty. Bd. of Cnty. Comm'rs, 151 F.3d 1313, 1316 n. 2 (10th Cir.1998). Thus, we apply the same analysis to Appellants' suit against Sheriff Whetsel in his official capacity as we do to their suit against the County.")

Reid v. Hamby, 124 F.3d 217 (Table), 1997 WL 537909, at *5 n.1, *6 (10th Cir. Sept. 2, 1997) ("We conclude, even under the McMillian standard, that an Oklahoma sheriff is the policymaker for his county for law enforcement purposes. . . .We now hold that an Oklahoma 'sheriff's department' is not a proper entity for purposes of a § 1983 suit.").

Winton v. Bd of Commissioners of Tulsa County, 88 F. Supp.2d 1247, 1268 (N.D. Okla. 2000) ("The Court finds that there is evidence in the record from which a reasonable jury could conclude that the County's action or inaction in response to the risk of harm present in the Jail was not reasonable. . . . There is evidence in the record from which a jury could conclude that the only practical way for the County to have significantly abated the risk of violence at the Jail was to build a new facility. There is also evidence in the record that the County was hampered in its efforts to build a new jail by the voters of Tulsa County, who refused to pass bond issues prior to September 1995. While the Court recognizes the plight of the County, '[t]he lack of funding is no excuse for depriving inmates of their constitutional rights.' Ramos, 639 F.2d at 573, n. 19 (citing several cases). The voters of Tulsa County had a choice. The County could pay on the front end to protect the constitutional rights of inmates by building a new jail, or the County could pay on the back end by satisfying judgments in meritorious civil rights actions based on unconstitutional conditions at the Jail. Until a new jail was built in 1999, the voters in Tulsa County had necessarily chosen the second of these options as the County's response to violence at the Jail. . . . A reasonable jury could find that the County's inaction or ineffective action was the moving force behind the conditions at the Jail which caused or permitted a serious risk of inmate harm to exist in the Jail. A jury could find that overcrowding, under-staffing, lack of adequate inmate supervision, lack of inmate segregation and classification, lack of inmate exercise time, dormitory-style housing, all of which existed over a long period of time, were all de facto policies of inaction by the County which created and or contributed to the conditions which created a serious risk of harm in the Jail.").

Buchanan v. Bd. of County Commissioners of Muskogee County, No. CV-05-356-JHP, 2006 WL 1705257, at *4 (E.D. Okla. June 16, 2006) ("It is well settled in Oklahoma that the Board of County Commissioners and the Sheriff's office operate autonomously. . . Where the Board does not − and indeed, cannot − enact or enforce law enforcement policy, it cannot be held liable for violations of such policy.").

Beers v. Ballard, No. 04-CV-0860-CVE SAJ, 2005 WL 3578131, at *6 (N.D. Okla. Dec. 29, 2005) ("In his official capacity, Sheriff Ballard represents Washington County. See Meade [v. Grubbs, 841 F.2d 1512 (10th Cir.1988)] , 841 F.2d at 1529. It is well-settled law that a municipal entity, such as Sheriff Ballard in his official capacity, may be held responsible 'when execution of a government's policy or custom, whether made by its lawmakers or by those whose edicts or acts may fairly be said to represent official policy, inflicts the injury.'").

Utah

Chilcoat v. San Juan County, 41 F.4th 1196, 1216 (10th Cir. 2022) ("Here, the district court correctly looked to Utah law and relied on section 17-18a-401 of the Utah Code to conclude Prosecutor Laws acted for the State. On appeal, Ms. Chilcoat generally contends Prosecutor Laws acted for the County, but she fails to meaningfully challenge the district court's reliance on section 17-18a-401. . . This statute provides that a public prosecutor 'conduct[s], on behalf of the state, all prosecutions for a public offense committed within a county.' . . But a public prosecutor 'conduct[s], on behalf of the county, all prosecutions for a public offense in violation of a county criminal ordinance.'. . Under Utah law, whether Prosecutor Laws acted for the state or the county depends on what crime he prosecutes: If the crime violates a county criminal ordinance, then Prosecutor Laws prosecutes on behalf of the county. But if the crime violates the state criminal code, then he prosecutes on behalf of the state. Prosecutor Laws made the allegedly false statements while prosecuting Ms. Chilcoat for Retaliation against a Witness, Victim, or Informant—a felony under Utah law. . . Thus, the district court correctly determined Prosecutor Laws acted on behalf of the State under section 17-18a-401, and on that basis, properly dismissed Ms. Chilcoat's municipal liability claim.")

McCubbin v. Weber County, No. 1:15-CV-132, 2017 WL 3394593, at *14–15 (D. Utah Aug. 7, 2017) ("Weber County pursued and obtained a nuisance injunction in its own name that was exclusively enforceable in a specific zone within Weber County and that criminalized many otherwise lawful behaviors. Weber County served the injunction and maintained a gang database pursuant to its own allegedly unlawful policy or practice. In this case, Weber County 'appears much more akin to a county' in Utah than an arm of the state. Cash v. Granville Cty. Bd. of Educ., 242 F.3d 219, 226 (4th Cir. 2001) (finding county board of education was not an arm of the state and denying the county board sovereign immunity). As the McMillian Court suggested, many courts have concluded, after reviewing the relevant state law and function at issue, that district attorneys, sheriffs, and other local officials are not state officials. . . Furthermore, one court in this district has previously concluded that a Utah county attorney is not a state officer under Utah law. Allison v. Utah Cty. Corp., 335 F. Supp. 2d 1310, 1316–17 (D. Utah 2004) (holding that, based on its analysis of Utah law relating to the county attorney position, a county attorney was "properly classified as a county officer, rather than a state officer. . . This court has found no Utah case squarely addressing the issue, but finds persuasive Allison's conclusion that a Utah county attorney is not a state officer, at least for the actions identified in this case. The court declines to construe Mr. Allred's prosecutorial acts in this case so broadly as to convert the serving and enforcing of a County-obtained nuisance injunction as action on behalf of the state—particularly where Weber County points to no Utah statute or Utah-specific case law suggesting otherwise. . . . In sum, the court rejects Weber County's motion to dismiss this action on grounds of Eleventh Amendment, prosecutorial, or quasi-judicial immunity.")

Wyoming

Ginest v. Bd. of County Commissioners of Carbon County, 333 F.Supp.2d 1190, 1195 (D. Wyo. 2004) ("Carbon County is a named defendant in this action for two reasons. First, although the Board's role regarding the jail is quite limited, it has fiscal obligations under state law to adequately fund the jail. . . In addition, Carbon County is a proper defendant whenever one of its policymakers, such as its sheriff, is alleged to have engaged in unconstitutional activity for which the county would bear responsibility. . . . In the present case, the sheriff of Carbon County is such a policymaker, and he is empowered to establish policies that are binding on the County. The Court persists in its conclusion that the Carbon County Board of Commissioners is a proper defendant in this action.")

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Alabama

Melton v. Abston, 841 F.3d 1207, 1234-35 (11th Cir. 2016) ("It is well established in this Circuit that Alabama sheriffs and their deputies are state officials and are absolutely immune from suit as an officer of the state under the Eleventh Amendment. . . Consequently, we conclude that Sheriff Abston and the deputy defendants are immune from suit under the Eleventh Amendment for Melton's claims brought against them in their official capacity as state officials. We decline, however, to extend sovereign immunity to Nurse Ray with respect to the claims brought against her in her official capacity. Unlike the other defendants, Nurse Ray is not a sheriff or a deputy. Rather, Nurse Ray is a nurse at Pickens County Jail and was responsible for carrying out 'limited objectives and defined duties,' including 'verifying the various medications prescribed for inmates ... checking does, reviewing inmate medical complaints, responding to minor medical calls, and referring more serious medical calls to a physician.'. . Unlike Sheriff Abston and the defendant deputies, Nurse Ray's actions taken in the scope of her employment do not inherently constitute actions against the state. The Alabama Supreme Court has previously declined to extend sovereign immunity to a jailor, noting that a jailor is not a proper extension of the Sheriff's position because a jailor cannot undertake every act that the sheriff could perform. . . The Alabama Supreme Court has likewise noted that none of its decisions have extended the state immunity afforded a sheriff to any sheriff's employees other than a deputy sheriff. . . We therefore find that Nurse Ray, as an employee of a county jail, does not qualify as an extension of the sheriff for purposes of sovereign immunity. Finally, we note that Alabama officials who have sovereign immunity when sued in their official capacities are not entitled to sovereign immunity when they are sued in their individual capacities under Section 1983. . . As the Supreme Court has held, 'state officials, sued in their individual capacities, are "persons" within the meaning of § 1983. The Eleventh Amendment does not bar such suits, nor are state officers absolutely immune from personal liability under § 1983 solely by virtue of the "official" nature of their acts.'. . Based on this clear precedent, we conclude that Sheriff Abston, the deputy defendants, and Nurse Ray are not entitled to sovereign immunity with respect to the claims brought against them in their individual capacities.")

Turquitt v. Jefferson County, 137 F.3d 1285, 1288, 1291 (11th Cir. 1998) (en banc) ("Alabama law provides that it is the sheriff who has the duty to ensure that inmates do not come to harm, to develop a policy of controlling inmate violence, and to staff the jail with appropriately trained jailors. . .Because the parties agree that the sheriff possesses the authority to make final policy with respect to these actions, the contested issue is whether the sheriff functions as the County's policymaker when he takes those actions. Our answer to this question turns on state law, including state and local positive law, as well as custom and usage having the force of law. . . . Our review of Alabama law persuades us that an Alabama sheriff acts exclusively for the state rather than for the county in operating a county jail. . . . Parker is not in accord with controlling § 1983 jurisprudence, and we hereby overrule that decision, and any subsequent decisions following it, insofar as they held that Alabama sheriffs in their daily operation of county jails act as policymakers for the county.").

McClure v. Houston County, 306 F.Supp.2d 1160, 1163, 1166 (M.D. Ala. 2003) ("[T]he specific question in this case is whether the Houston County Sheriff and the Sheriff's Department are 'policymakers' for Houston County in the area of hiring, training, and supervising deputy sheriffs. Under Alabama law, sheriffs are state, and not county, officers. . . . McClure argues that, before granting summary judgment on Eleventh Amendment grounds, the court must determine whether the state or county would pay any damages awarded in this case. See Carr v. City of Florence, 916 F.2d 1521, 1527 (11th Cir.1990) (Clark, J., specially concurring). Even if the court were to find McClure's legal argument persuasive, however, summary judgment in Sheriff Glover's favor would still be appropriate because McClure has not offered any evidence to show that Houston County, and not the State, would be liable for any judgment against Sheriff Glover.").

Florida [state]

Jenne v. Maranto, 825 So.2d 409, 416 (Fla.App. 2002) ("Florida is divided into political subdivisions, the several Counties, and the Sheriff is a constitutional officer in each County. Art. VIII, § 1(a), (d), Fla. Const. The Counties are political subdivisions but they are not the State itself. The Florida Constitution names the Sheriff as a county official, not as an official of the State. Art. VIII, § 1(d), Fla. Const. Although the Sheriff performs many functions–e.g., the Sheriff is responsible for serving process within the County -his budget is made up by the County from taxes levied only within the County. Moreover, the Sheriff is authorized to purchase liability insurance for, among other things, 'claims arising out of the performance of the duties of the Sheriff....' Thus any money judgment in this case will be paid from the local county budget or by insurance purchased therefrom by the Sheriff. On balance therefore the Sheriff is an official of local government, rather than an arm of the State. We thus hold for purposes of this case that Sheriff

Jenne is not an arm of the State and is not entitled to claim the constitutional immunity protected by the Eleventh Amendment.' footnotes omitted)

Florida [federal]

Freyre v. Chronister, 910 F.3d 1371, 1381-85 (11th Cir. 2018) ("[O]ur question is not simply whether HCSO acts as an arm of the state generally, but whether it does so when performing child-protective investigations under the Grant Agreement with DCF. . . The first Manders factor asks us to determine how state law defines the defendant entity. Two bodies of state law are relevant here: state law concerning the status of the entity generally, and state law concerning the specific function the entity performs in the instant case. . . .Notwithstanding a Florida sheriff's presumptive status as a county officer, we have also held out the possibility that '[w]hen carrying out some ... functions, the sheriff may well be acting as an arm of the state.'. . In contrast to Abusaid—where the sheriff was enforcing a county ordinance—here HCSO is carrying out state policy. Specifically, HCSO contracted to perform child-protective investigations for DCF, a state agency entitled to sovereign immunity. . . . When HCSO sheltered and transferred MAF, it was acting pursuant to this Grant Agreement. Thus, the question we must answer is whether, under state law, the relationship created by the Grant Agreement between DCF and HCSO weighs in favor of classifying the latter as an arm of the state. . . . While the label of 'independent contractor' serves as persuasive evidence that HCSO did not act as an agent of the state under Florida law, it is not dispositive. . . .In addition to the label, . . the Grant Agreement explains that 'the Grantee [HCSO] shall be considered by the Grantor [DCF] as agent of the Grantor for the sole and limited purpose of receiving information obtained from or concerning applicants and recipients of public assistance programs.'. . As if it were concerned that labeling HCSO an independent contractor wouldn't be enough, the Grant Agreement goes out of its way to circumscribe the function in which HCSO serves as an agent of DCF. And notably, the function at issue in this case—child-protective investigations—does not fall into this narrow exception to HCSO's general status as an independent contractor. . . As Sheriff Chronister points out, the Grant Agreement states that HCSO 'may, during the performance of this grant, assert any privileges and immunities which are available as a result of the Grantee performing the state functions required by Chapter 39, F.S., and this Grant Agreement.' Sheriff Chronister attaches much significance to this language. . . But in our estimation, this language simply leaves intact whatever 'privileges and immunities' HCSO might have as a result of performing under the Grant Agreement. Whether there are any such privileges or immunities in the first place is a question we, interpreting the Grant Agreement under Florida law and the law of our Circuit, must decide. All in all, we conclude that this first factor weighs against arm-of-the-state status. . . . The second factor requires us to look at the degree of control the state exercises over the entity generally as well as with respect to the specific function at issue. . . .Considering both the autonomy that the Grant Agreement affords HCSO and the control the state exerts through state-set standards and reporting requirements, we conclude that this factor is neutral. . . .Although Florida sheriff's offices are generally funded entirely by county taxes, . . . DCF provides all funding for child-protective investigations, and Freyre does not contest this. Thus, this factor weighs in favor of arm-of-the-state status. . . .Th[e] final factor, the most important of the Manders calculus, . . asks us to determine whether the state treasury would be burdened by a judgment against HCSO in this matter. . . .[W]e conclude that a judgment against HCSO would not be satisfied with state funds and that this factor weighs against arm-of-the-state status. While this case presents an especially close call, we ultimately conclude that HCSO does not act as an arm of the state when conducting child-protective investigations pursuant to the specific Grant Agreement between HCSO and DCF.")

Stanley v. Israel, 843 F.3d 920, 921-22, 924-26, 931 (11th Cir. 2016) ("This case arises from the Broward County Sheriff's potential liability under § 1983 for failing to rehire a former deputy allegedly due to his political loyalties and in violation of his First Amendment rights. Broward County has expressly designated its sheriff as its CCO; thus, at issue in this case is the basic question whether a Florida county sheriff, acting in his capacity as chief correctional officer in the hiring and firing of his deputies, is an arm of the state entitled to the benefit of the state's Eleventh Amendment immunity from suit in federal court. After careful review, and having the benefit of oral argument, we conclude that a Florida sheriff is not an arm of the state when acting in this capacity. We, therefore, reverse the district court's grant of summary judgment for the Sheriff and remand to the district court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. . . . We have never addressed the precise question at issue in this case, but a trio of cases -- Manders, Abusaid, and Pellitteri -- bears heavily on our decision. . . .In Hufford v. Rodgers, 912 F.2d 1338 (11th Cir. 1990), a panel of this Court held that 'the Eleventh Amendment does not protect Florida sheriffs from liability under section 1983.'. . Cases involving Florida sheriffs after Hufford have uniformly followed that decision and have entertained § 1983 suits against sheriffs in various situations. [collecting cases] . . . .Hufford and its pre-Manders progeny did not undertake the function-by-function analysis mandated by McMillian and Manders. This Court's lone post-Manders case addressing Florida sheriffs is Abusaid, which determined that a Florida county sheriff does not act as an arm of the state when enforcing a county ordinance. . . . Abusaid did not address the function at issue in this case -- the hiring and firing of deputies while acting in the capacity of chief correctional officer. The closest we have come to addressing that precise function is in Pellitteri. In that case, this Court determined that a Georgia sheriff acts as an arm of the state when hiring and firing his deputies. . . .With these cases in mind, we apply the Manders analysis to a Florida sheriff acting in his capacity as Chief Correctional Officer (CCO) in the hiring and firing of deputies. Because the overall weight of the factors tips on the side of county status, we conclude that a Florida sheriff acting in this capacity is not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . .While the issue of state or county control is a close question, and we commend the district court for the care with which it undertook this analysis, we conclude that the four Manders factors taken in concert ultimately indicate that a Florida sheriff is not an arm of the state when he is acting in his capacity of CCO in the hiring and firing of his deputies.")

Abusaid v. Hillsborough County Bd. of County Commissioners, 405 F.3d 1298, 1304 (11th Cir. 2005) (Florida sheriff acts for county and is not arm of the state when enforcing a county ordinance)

Cook v. Sheriff of Monroe County, 402 F.3d 1092, 1115 (11th Cir. 2005) ("When, as here, the defendant is the county sheriff, the suit is effectively an action against the governmental entity he represents − in this case, Monroe County.").

Brown v. Neumann, 188 F.3d 1289, 1290 n.2 (11th Cir. 1999) ("We recognize that our decisions have not been entirely consistent on whether the relevant entity in an official-capacity suit against a sheriff in Florida is the County or the Sheriff's Department (as a unit operating autonomously from the County). Compare Lucas v. O'Loughlin, 831 F.2d 232, 235 (11th Cir.1987) (County). . . with Wright v. Sheppard, 919 F.2d 665, 674 (11th Cir.1990) (implying that the Sheriff's Department would be the relevant entity). We do not address this point because our holding today is that whatever the relevant entity was, it is not liable under Monell.").

Hufford v. Rodgers, 912 F.2d 1338, 1341-42 (11th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 111 S. Ct. 1312 (1991) (suit against Florida sheriff not barred by Eleventh Amendment because the Florida state constitution designates the sheriff as a county officer and the sheriff's budget, salary and any judgment against him is paid by the county).

Dream Defenders v. DeSantis, No. 4:21CV191-MW/MAF, 2021 WL 4099437, at *13 (N.D. Fla. Sept. 9, 2021) ("Hufford is no longer controlling after the Eleventh Circuit's en banc decision in Manders v. Lee, 338 F.3d 1304 (11th Cir. 2003) and the Supreme Court's related decision in McMillian v. Monroe County, 520 U.S. 781, 117 S.Ct. 1734, 138 L.Ed.2d 1 (1997). Upon review of Defendant Tony's response and the arguments presented at the telephonic hearing with respect to this point, this Court reaffirms that Defendant Sheriffs are properly before this Court as 'state officials' with respect to their state-law function to enforce Florida's anti-riot laws. . . As discussed at the hearing, Florida sheriffs are required by Florida law to command, 'in the name of the state,' that unlawful assemblies are to disperse. . . Indeed, no other crime in Florida is subject to such statewide concern. . . For these reasons, and those set out in this Court's Order on the Motions to Dismiss, this Court concludes that Florida sheriffs act as state officials when enforcing Florida's anti-riot laws, dispersing riots under section 870.04, and quelling riots pursuant to their state-law duty under section 30.15(1)(f).")

Holder v. Gualtieri, No. 8:14-CV-3052-T-33TGW, 2016 WL 1721405, at *10 (M.D. Fla. Apr. 29, 2016) ("The Sheriff comes forward with no evidence suggesting that a judgment would be paid out of the state treasury. And, as explained above, the Legislature left intact the Sheriff's local autonomy when it shifted 'the entire responsibility' for child protective investigations in Pinellas County to the Sheriff. Fla. Stat. § 39.3065(1). As a result of that blanket transfer of responsibility, it is the Sheriff's dignity – not that of DCF or the state – that is threatened by a lawsuit in federal court. The Court therefore concludes that the Sheriff is not an 'arm of the state' for the particular function at issue, and he is not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity.")

Wilds v. Seminole County, No. 6:12–cv–1806–Orl–37KRS, 2013 WL 1611334, *1 & n.1 (M.D. Fla. Apr. 15, 2013) ("The parties now jointly move for reconsideration of that part of the Order, bringing to the Court's attention the fact that the County was never intended to be named as a defendant in this lawsuit and that inclusion of the County in the style of the case was an error. . . Unbeknownst to the Court, the parties also agreed that Plaintiffs' counsel would 'drop any reference to Seminole County' in the amended complaint. . . Given this stipulation, the Court declines to reach a determination on the open issue of the propriety of a § 1983 suit against a Florida charter county for the actions of a sheriff who is arguably an independent constitutional officer over whom the county exercises little to no control. . . Therefore, the portion of the Order finding that the County is the relevant defendant and directing Plaintiffs to refile the amended complaint against only the County rather than the Sheriff . . . is due to be vacated. . . . Though the Sheriff relies on McMillian v. Monroe County, 520 U.S. 781, 117 S.Ct. 1734, 138 L.Ed.2d 1 (1997), and Grech v. Clayton County, 335 F.3d 1326 (11th Cir.2003), the Court notes that those cases are not dispositive of this particular question on these facts. . . McMillian was decided under Alabama law, 520 U.S. at 786, and Grech under Georgia law, 335 F.3d at 1329. The Court finds that the issue has not been definitively decided under Florida law and more specifically, under Florida law as applied to the charter of Seminole County. Grech, interpreting McMillian, was decided by a fractured plurality. . .which reached a very narrow holding: that the activities of that particular county sheriff in the specific area of maintaining criminal warrants for Georgia's state database did not constitute final policymaking for Clayton County. . . Whether Sheriff Eslinger, in adopting and enforcing policies in the area of training, supervision, and discipline of deputies for the use of excessive force, was acting under the control of Seminole County such that it could be liable under Monell for those activities is a question no longer squarely presented in the instant case due to the parties' stipulation. Nor has this precise question been considered in this District. . . Therefore, resolution of this issue remains for another day.")

Ramirez v. Hillsborough County Sheriff's Office, No. 8:10-cv-1819-T-23TBM, 2011 WL 976380, at *1, *2 (M.D. Fla. Mar. 18, 2011) ("Hillsborough County Sheriff David Gee − and not the 'Hillsborough County Sheriff's Office' − is the proper party to an action against the Sheriff. . . The Sheriff, a human being and not an 'office,' is properly sued in his own name but in his official capacity. Accordingly, the conclusion of this order directs the plaintiffs to correctly identify the Sheriff in an amended complaint and to omit the 'Hillsborough County Sheriff's Office'.")

Gray v. Kohl, 568 F.Supp.2d 1378, 1393 & n.3, 1394 (S.D. Fla. 2008) ("A Deputy or Officer in one of Florida's county Sheriff departments does not constitute a final policymaking authority for the county because he does not stand in the shoes of the Sheriff and is under the chain of command of the Sheriff. . . Therefore, a discretionary act by a Deputy or Officer, of which the County Sheriff does not know about, ratify or consent to, cannot constitute a final policy of the county. . . Here, there is no evidence that Sheriff Roth directed Officer Perez to arrest the individuals handing out Bibles, or that Sheriff Roth knew about or consented to the arrests beforehand. In the absence of any such knowledge by Sheriff Roth, the arrests were a purely discretionary act of Officer Perez, and any chilling of Plaintiff's First Amendment rights must also be attributed to Officer Perez. As such, Officer Perez's decision to enforce the School Safety Zone Statute against the individuals handing out bibles does not constitute a policy of Monroe County. . . . The holding in Abusaid that a County Sheriff enforcing a county statute is not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity applies with equal force to a County Sheriff enforcing a state statute. Abusaid's application of the four-factor test in Hufford leaves no room for distinguishing between a County Sheriff's enforcement of a county versus a state statute. . . . However, Officer Perez's arrest of the Gideons could become an act attributable to the County if the arrests were ratified by Sheriff Roth after the fact. If an authorized policymaker ratifies a subordinate's decision and the reasons for making the decision, the decision is chargeable to the municipality. . . . Here, there is no evidence that Sheriff Roth, the final policymaking authority in matters of law enforcement for Monroe County , ratified Officer Perez's arrests of the Gideons based on the fact that they were distributing Bibles within the school safety zone. When Sheriff Roth was asked if he thought that handing out Bibles in the school safety zone constitutes 'legitimate business,' he responded that as long as traffic was not disrupted and there were no other safety issues, handing out Bibles would be 'legitimate business.'. . Hence, Monroe County cannot be said to have a policy of arresting citizens handing out Bibles within a school safety zone.").

Jones ex rel. Albert v. Lamberti, No. 07-60839-CIV, 2008 WL 4070293, at *5 (S.D. Fla. Aug. 28, 2008) ("The Sheriff is the final policymaker for the operation of the jails. The County does not control the Sheriff with respect to this function; therefore, the County cannot be liable under § 1983.").

Jeffries v. Sullivan, No. 3:06cv344/MCR/MD, 2008 WL 703818, at *21 (N.D. Fla. Mar. 12, 2008) ("In summary, all four factors yield the conclusion that neither the Escambia County Sheriff nor PHS acts as an arm of the state in providing health care services to county jail inmates.")

White v. Polk County, No. 8:04-cv-1227-T-26EAJ, 2006 WL 1063336, at *4, *5 (M.D. Fla. Apr. 21, 2006) ("Generally, as set forth in great detail in Abusaid, Florida law gives sheriffs great independence and counties retain the 'substantial discretion over how to utilize that office' including the constitutional grant of power to the county to decide to abolish the office of sheriff if so desired. . . . If the sheriff, however, is carrying out any one of the enumerated functions listed under section 30.15 of the Florida Statutes, then the sheriff may be acting as an arm of the state, but '[t]he key question is not what arrest and force powers sheriffs have, but for whom sheriffs exercise that power.' . . A review of section 30.15 reveals that the sheriff acts on behalf of the county when executing process of county courts and the board of county commissioners and when maintaining 'the peace in their counties.'. . Nothing in section 30.15 or any other provision of Florida law dictates that the training and supervising of deputies falls under a function required by the state, as opposed to the county. Thus, the actions complained of in this case do not fall under the category of law enforcement for the state, but rather fall under the category of policymaking for the county. . . . Having considered all four factors as dictated by Abusaid, the Court concludes at this juncture, that the Sheriff was about the business of the county government in the alleged inadequate training and supervision of his deputies with respect to pursuits, or 'surveillance' if that be the case. In other words, the aspects of policies regarding training and supervision may be considered more along the lines of local, administrative duties as opposed to broad state duties of law enforcement.").

Parilla v. Eslinger, No. 6:05-CV-850-ORL, 2005 WL 3288760, at *8, *9 (M.D.Fla. Dec. 5, 2005) ("The Plaintiffs allege that the County 'has delegated the management and operations of the Jail where the wrongs complained of herein occurred to the Defendant Sheriff of Seminole County.' . . Apparently in response to this alleged delegation, the County complains that the Sheriff is an independent constitutional officer, that he, his deputies, and the corrections officials at the Jail are not employees of the County, and that the County cannot be held responsible for their actions. However, the statutes cited by the County − which mostly deal with the Sheriff's authority to run his office and oversee his deputies − do nothing to establish that the Seminole County Sheriff is 'independent' of Seminole County, at least insofar as it comes to operation of the Seminole County Jail. The County also cites to a Supreme Court decision that found that an Alabama county was not liable under Section 1983 for the actions of the county sheriff. . . . However, McMillian was decided on the basis of various provisions of Alabama law, such as a constitutional provision stating that '[t]he executive department shall consist of a governor, lieutenant governor, attorney-general, state auditor, secretary of state, state treasurer, superintendent of education, commissioner of agriculture and industries, and a sheriff for each county.' . . The County points to no similar constitutional or statutory provisions, instead simply reciting that 'under Florida's statutory framework, the Sheriff is a Constitutionally independent officer who acts independent of the County.'. . This is not sufficient. Moreover, a statutory provision cited by the County at the hearing in this matter − Florida Statute § 951.061 − suggests that Eslinger represents the County in regard to jail operations. The statute provides that a county commission may adopt an ordinance designating the sheriff to be the chief correctional officer of the county correctional system, . . .after which the sheriff would operate and maintain the county's jails. Fla. Stat. § 951.061(1). The statute strongly suggests that, at least in regard to jail operations, a Florida sheriff acts as a county decisionmaker, and his decisions therefore establish the County's policy for purposes of Section 1983. Even in the absence of this statute, however, the County has not shown that, as a matter of law, it cannot be held liable for the actions of the Individual Defendants in operating the Jail.")

Samarco v. Neumann, 44 F. Supp.2d 1276, 1287 (S.D. Fla. 1999) ("In light of Florida statutory authority, which designates county sheriffs as independent constitutional officials, the Court finds that Sheriff Neumann, as the county's chief law enforcement officer, was the final policymaker for matters concerning the Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office. . . Thus, acts of Sheriff Neumann found violative of § 1983 are capable of imputing liability upon the Palm Beach County Sheriff's Office.").

Georgia (state)

Nichols v. Prather, 650 S.E.2d 380, 384, 385 (Ga. App. 2007) ("The appellants argue that, pursuant to Brown and the Eleventh Circuit cases, Georgia's sheriffs are always state actors, not county actors. Brown and the federal cases are inapplicable to the instant case, however, because they involved the issue of immunity from liability for a sheriff's violations of the federal civil rights statute, 42 USC § 1983 . In contrast, this case involves the sheriff's liability under the doctrine of respondeat superior for his deputy's negligence under Georgia's tort laws, as well as the county's liability under an agency theory. Further, contrary to the appellants' arguments, the cases upon which they rely do not hold that Georgia's sheriffs are always state officers, but stand for the proposition that, depending on the circumstances, sheriffs may be deemed state agents for the purpose of determining liability for constitutional violations under § 1983 . None of the cases hold that Georgia's sheriffs and their employees are 'state officer[s] or employee[s]' under the GTCA. Instead, under the plain language of the Georgia Constitution and the GTCA, sheriffs are county officials, not state officers or employees.")

Brown v. Dorsey, 625 S.E.2d 16, 20-23 (Ga. App.2005) ("No Georgia appellate court has squarely addressed the issue of whether the sheriff acts with final policymaking authority for the county or for the state in the context of a § 1983 action. However, in Grech v. Clayton County. . . an exhaustive 6-6 plurality opinion, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals held that although Ga. Const. of 1983, Art. IX, Sec. I, Par. III(a)- (b) designates the sheriff as a 'county officer,' the same paragraph grants the state legislature the exclusive authority to establish and control a sheriff's powers, duties, qualifications, and minimum salary. . . The court also noted that in interpreting this constitutional provision, the Georgia Supreme Court has stated that '[t]he sheriff is an elected, constitutional officer; he is subject to the charge of the General Assembly and is not an employee of the county commission.' . . .Although Grech is not binding precedent, we find its reasoning very persuasive. Moreover, the Georgia Supreme Court has recently reaffirmed that '[t]he sheriff is an elected constitutional county officer and not an employee of the county commission.'. . . Nevertheless, the question of whether the sheriff has final policymaking authority for the County for § 1983 purposes must be examined in light of the particular function at issue. . . We thus reexamine the allegations in the complaint. Mrs. Brown asserts that Dorsey was the final policymaker for the county in matters concerning the use of deadly force by sheriff's department personnel, the direction and control of deputies and jailors, and the direction, control, and use of sheriff's department materials, equipment and resources. But, as noted above, the County has no control over the sheriff's department personnel, including its deputies and jailors. Therefore, the County cannot be held liable under § 1983 for Dorsey's use of those personnel in connection with his heinous plot to kill Derwin Brown. Finally, even though the County commission approves the sheriff's budget, . . .and the sheriff has the duty to preserve county property from injury or waste, . . . the county cannot control how the sheriff spends the budget. . . In the absence of the ability to control the funds after they have been allocated, the County cannot be held liable for the sheriff's use of departmental resources to commit a § 1983 violation. It follows that the trial court did not err in dismissing the County as a party to Mrs. Brown's action for the reason that Dorsey was not a final policymaker for the County when he used departmental personnel and resources to kill her husband.. . . We agree with the dissent in Pembaur v. City of Cincinnati that the majority's reasoning in that decision is circular. . . Pembaur seems to hold that policy is what policymakers make and that policymakers are those who have the authority to make policy; therefore, any decision made by a policymaker is a policy. . . In the case at bar, Mrs. Brown argues that Dorsey was a policymaker for the County and, therefore, his ad hoc decision to murder his rival was a policy of the County. We would reject Mrs. Brown's assertion and affirm on this ground the trial court's dismissal of the claims against the County, but Pembaur is binding precedent and is squarely on point. . . . Because Sheriff Dorsey had final authority to make policy regarding the use of deadly force by his subordinates, we are prevented by Pembaur from affirming the dismissal on the ground that Dorsey's decision to murder Brown was one discrete decision and not a policy. As argued by the dissent in Pembaur, that controlling federal precedent in effect imposes respondeat superior liability on local governments for the intentional acts of 'a certain category of employees, i.e., those with final authority to make policy.'. . If Dorsey had had the final authority to make policy on behalf of the County, then the pleadings filed by Mrs. Brown, including the amended complaint, would be sufficient to withstand a motion to dismiss brought by the County. . . However, as explained in Division 1 infra, Dorsey was a policymaker for the state and not for the County with regard to the particular functions at issue. For that reason, the trial court properly dismissed the claims against the County.")

Georgia (federal)

Myrick v. Fulton County, Georgia, 69 F.4th 1277, 1295-96 (11th Cir. 2023) ("Manders does not speak directly to whether Sheriff Jackson acted as an 'arm of the state' with respect to the provision of medical care, but its discussion of the structure of the sheriff's office, generally speaking, is still instructive. The State still controls, trains, and disciplines the sheriff's office. Our discussion of the third and fourth Manders factors apply with equal force here. The third factor tilts in favor of immunity because some state money goes to the sheriff's office, and a state mandate requires the county to fund the sheriff's budget but prohibits the county from dictating how the sheriff spends those funds. . .The fourth factor does not point in either direction—counties are not responsible for adverse judgments against the sheriff in his official capacity, and no state law requires the state to pay those judgments either. . . *Manders'*s discussion of the first and second factors is not directly applicable to the provision of medical care. We address them now. With respect to the second factor, control, Georgia courts have interpreted O.C.G.A. § 42-4-4(a)(2) as 'giving sheriffs exclusive control vis-à-vis the county over choosing vendors for medical care.'. . . Finally, we consider the first factor—how Georgia state law defines the entity. Manders clearly stated that in addition to performing common law duties to enforce the law and preserve the peace on behalf of the State, the sheriff's office 'perform[s] specific statutory duties, directly assigned by the State.'. . One such statutory duty assigned by the state is furnishing medical aid. . . Further, in Lake v. Skelton we discussed O.C.G.A. § 42-5-2, according to which it is 'the responsibility of the governmental unit, subdivision, or agency having the physical custody of an inmate to maintain the inmate, furnishing him food, clothing, and any needed medical and hospital attention.'. . We stated that Georgia law clearly required the sheriff to 'take ... custody of the jail and the bodies of such persons as are confined therein.'. . This meant that the sheriff, not the county, was the governmental unit with custody of the inmates. . . Thus 'Section 42-5-2 support[ed the] conclusion that Georgia imposes food-service responsibilities directly on the sheriff as part of his custodial duties.'. . If, under § 42-5-2, the sheriff wears a 'state hat' with respect to food-service responsibilities, that same provision must lead to the conclusion that the sheriff wears a 'state hat' with respect to the provision of medical care as well. Indeed, our holding in Lake that the sheriff was an arm of the state with respect to providing food relied at least in part on the idea that, under Georgia law, the sheriff was an arm of the state with respect to providing medical care. . . As in Manders and Lake, the first three factors here weigh in favor of immunity. The fourth factor does not defeat it. Altogether, we conclude that Sheriff Jackson acted as an 'arm of the state' and is entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity with respect to the particular function of providing medical care. The District Court correctly dismissed the claims against Sheriff Jackson in his official capacity.")

Andrews v. Biggers, 996 F.3d 1235, 1235-36 (11th Cir. 2021) ("Oqueshia Andrews alleges that Douglas County Sheriff's Deputy Carmel Biggers fondled her, kissed her, and watched her shower, all without her consent, when she was an inmate in the county jail. According to Andrews, the reason Biggers, who is male, could do those things is that Douglas County Sheriff Tim Pounds operates the jail with a policy that allows 'cross-gender supervision of inmates without reasonable safeguards in place.' Andrews sued Pounds in his official capacity under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, and the district court granted Pounds' motion to dismiss, concluding that under Purcell ex rel. Estate of Morgan v. Toombs County, 400 F.3d 1313 (11th Cir. 2005), Pounds was due Eleventh Amendment immunity because he acts as an arm of the State 'when promulgating policies and procedures governing conditions of confinement' at the county jail. . . Andrews concedes, as she must, that Purcell 'control[s] the outcome of this case because both cases relate to the function of jail operations' and that the district court was 'bound by precedent' to follow it. Since Georgia law as it relates to sheriffs' duties and control has not meaningfully changed since we issued Purcell, we agree. But Andrews wants Purcell overruled and our Court 'to revisit the factors discussed' in Manders v. Lee, . . . the decision on which Purcell relies and which she recognizes 'runs contrary to her position.' She believes Manders 'misapplies' to Georgia sheriffs the Supreme Court's analysis in McMillian v. Monroe County, 520 U.S. 781 (1997). Of course, we as a panel cannot overrule Manders or Purcell. . . . Those principles apply as strongly, if not more so, where the earlier precedent is an en banc decision.")

Andrews v. Biggers, 996 F.3d 1235, 1236 (11th Cir. 2021) (Wilson, J., concurring) ("I concur in today's decision because Purcell ex rel. Estate of Morgan v. Toombs County, 400 F.3d 1313 (11th Cir. 2005), is binding precedent that controls the outcome of this case. I write separately, however, to express my view that Manders v. Lee, 338 F.3d 1304 (11th Cir. 2003) (en banc)—which Purcell relies on—was incorrectly decided. Judge Anderson and Judge Barkett wrote compelling dissents in Manders, both of which I joined. I continue to agree with their criticism of the Manders majority. Nonetheless, under our prior-precedent rule, we are bound to follow Manders and its progeny unless it 'is overruled en banc or by the Supreme Court.'. . . For this reason alone, I concur.")

Andrews v. Biggers, 996 F.3d 1235, 1236-37, 1242-43 (11th Cir. 2021) (Rosenbaum, J., concurring) ("I concur in the panel's decision to affirm the district court's decision to dismiss Andrews's claim against Sheriff Pounds because he is entitled to sovereign immunity under binding case law. . . I write separately to explain why this Court should reevaluate this case law en banc, and in particular, our decision in Purcell. Under the concept of Eleventh Amendment state sovereign immunity, our decisions in Manders and Purcell effectively insulate local governments in Georgia from liability in federal court when county sheriffs violate citizens' constitutional rights. For example, here, Douglas County is protected from liability even though, assuming the truth of Andrews's allegations, a Douglas County deputy sheriff engaged in a pattern and practice of sexually harassing and assaulting women incarcerated in Douglas County Jail. These are horrific and disturbing allegations, but under our precedent, the victims have no recourse against what is, in reality, the local government entity overseeing the county jail. Our case law rests on misinterpretations of Georgia law and the Supreme Court's state sovereign-immunity precedent. My disagreement with this line of cases is not unusual; the sheer number and length of the dissents in these cases attest to that fact. . . Today, I join this chorus of voices raising concerns about our sovereign-immunity doctrine with respect to Georgia sheriffs. In this concurrence, I seek to reiterate some of my colleagues' fundamental concerns with our reasoning in Manders and Purcell. I also explain why our decision in Purcell conflicts with Manders and should be abrogated regardless of whether we reconsider the ultimate holding in Manders. . . . Even if we ultimately decline to rethink our reasoning and holding in Manders, we should still review our holding in Purcell—the case the district court relied on here—because Purcell is itself inconsistent with our holding in Manders. Manders holds that the 'arm of the state' analysis must 'focus on the nature of the particular function at issue' in the case. . . And Manders is clear that the particular function should not be framed 'too broad[ly].' . . . But where Manders takes a scalpel, Purcell uses a meat axe. Instead of tailoring the analysis to the precise function at issue—the prevention of inmate-on-inmate violence—Purcell broadly declares that sheriffs function as an 'arm of the state' 'when promulgating policies and procedures governing the conditions of confinement' at county jails. . . That 'categorical all or nothing' definition of the function at issue directly contradicts our prior holding in Manders. To make matters worse, Purcell's broad definition of the function at issue drastically expands the scope of our limited holding in Manders—that sheriffs are an 'arm of the state' when they establish use-of-force policy at county jails. . . But Purcell reads Manders's holding to mean that sheriffs are always an 'arm of the state' when they create and enforce 'policies and procedures governing the conditions of confinement' at county jails. . . This expansion of Manders's holding forecloses any case against a Georgia sheriff regarding the operation of county jails, even though Manders explicitly rejects that categorical approach. To stay true to our holding in Manders, then, at the very least, we should reconsider Purcell's holding that sheriffs act as an 'arm of the state' for any function related to the county jail. Rather, we should drill down on the specific function at issue in each case and determine, based on the four Manders factors, whether the sheriff is acting as an 'arm of the state' for that particular function. . . It is time for us to reevaluate our decision in Manders. Our holding in that case rests on a misinterpretation of Georgia law and our Eleventh Amendment immunity precedent. And even if we do not revisit Manders, we should reconsider our overly broad holding in Purcell that sheriffs are immune from all suits 'when promulgating policies and procedures governing conditions of confinement' at the county jail. . . That holding—a drastic expansion of our holding in Manders—precludes on the basis of state immunity all those incarcerated in Georgia county jails from vindicating their rights in federal courts. Our decision in this case only further proves that fact. I respectfully urge the Court to reconsider these cases.")

Lake v. Skelton, 871 F.3d 1340, 1341-44 (11th Cir. 2017) (William Pryor, J., joined by Black, J., respecting the denial of rehearing en banc) ("On appeal, the panel considered only the narrow question whether the sovereign immunity of Georgia extends to Skelton when he is sued in his official capacity for decisions made about the provision of food to inmates. On that question, the panel reversed. . . .Contrary to our colleague's assertions, Manders did not decide whether Georgia sheriffs are entitled to sovereign immunity when performing functions other than establishing and implementing force policies. . . .When presented with that question, our panel faithfully applied our precedent. We weighed the four arm-of-the-state factors as dictated by Manders and concluded that Georgia sheriffs act as arms of the state when they make decisions about the provision of food. Our colleague argues that the panel incorrectly applied the factors and that its decision was not dictated by precedent. . . . [O]ur colleague misstates the impact of the panel opinion when she contends that it will 'bar[ ] suit against sheriffs for virtually any way they violate a jail inmate's rights—from the use of force to the denial of medical care.'. . As a threshold matter, the panel addressed only the provision of food. The panel did not decide whether the sheriff is entitled to sovereign immunity when he provides medical care, and a review of Georgia law might lead to a different result in a case about the provision of medical care. The panel opinion also addressed only a suit seeking money damages for a decision made by a deputy sheriff in his official capacity. It did not address suits against sheriffs or their deputies in their individual capacities. . . And it does not prevent inmates from seeking injunctive relief against sheriffs or their deputies in their official capacities. . . .Because the panel opinion is correct, we agree with the decision not to rehear this appeal en banc.")

Lake v. Skelton, 871 F.3d 1340, 1345-49, 1353-55 (11th Cir. 2017) (11th Cir. Sept. 28, 2017) (Martin, J., dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) ("The Manders court took great pains to limit its holding to the particular use-of-force function at issue in that case, and to distinguish that function from the duty to provide basic necessities. . . . Despite this Court's repeated observation in Manders that arm-of-the-state status would not be given to a sheriff who failed to give food or the other necessities listed in § 42-5-2, the panel for Mr. Lake's case held that county sheriffs are entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity in precisely this circumstance. . . .[T]he panel deemed the human being who county voters elect to be their sheriff to be a 'governmental unit,' as that term is used in the statute. Having recrafted the statute in this way, the panel said § 42-5-2 'imposes directly on the sheriff' the 'responsibility ... of providing food to inmates,'. . . and since the panel had already designated the sheriff an officer of the state, it said feeding inmates and the other necessities required by § 42-5-2 are now state functions. So it was by this route the panel arrived at its decision that the first Manders factor weighs in favor of granting arm-of-the-state status. . . . Because the Georgia courts have held that § 42-5-2 imposes the duty of furnishing basic necessities (including food) on the county, the function of providing food to inmates is one that the sheriff carries out on the county's behalf, not the state's. . . . I do not quarrel with this Court's ruling in Manders. My criticism of the Lake panel opinion embraces the holding of Manders and demonstrates how the Lake opinion flies in the face of what this Court said in Manders. But beyond what is wrong with the panel's analysis of each of the four Manders factors, there is another, more fundamental flaw that runs throughout the panel opinion, and that flawed reasoning seems to have begun in the Manders opinion. I had therefore hoped that, if this Court undertook to consider Mr. Lake's case en banc, we could have also addressed this flawed logic that first appeared in Manders. The Lake panel repeatedly emphasizes as weighing in favor of arm-of-the state status that the sheriff is 'independent from [the] [c]ounty.'. . The argument goes like this: because the sheriff is independent from the county, the sheriff must be an arm of the state. This mistaken premise, which (again) first appeared in Manders, . . . took hold in the Lake panel decision. I had hoped that this mistaken premise would not become a permanent fixture of this Circuit's arm-of-the-state jurisprudence. It is true that the sheriff, as an 'elective county office[r],' occupies a constitutional office that is largely independent from other county governing authority. . . But the county governing authority—which is the county's legislative body and is known as the board of county commissioners— is 'not the only institution that acts for the county.'. . Not unlike the federal government's separation of powers among coequal branches, Georgia law creates a separation of powers at the county level: the sheriff is an executive officer of the county, and his authority is largely independent of the county's legislative body. . . 'Thus, the sheriff's independence from the county commission should be interpreted not as independence from the county, but rather as independent authority to act for the county with respect to the functions entrusted his office.'. . .In any event, the panel's focus on the fact that the sheriff is largely independent of the county governing authority gives no aid in the relevant Eleventh Amendment inquiry. The Eleventh Amendment inquiry is about whether the state controls the sheriff and is financially responsible for his actions. . . Wherever the sheriff stands within the hierarchy of county control, it is clear that the state exercises essentially no control over his feeding inmates. The state does not fund the provision of food. The state is not financially responsible for an adverse judgment against the sheriff. There is therefore no legal basis for Georgia county sheriffs to be accorded the state's sovereign immunity when they fail to give food to inmates at the county jail. . . . When Manders granted Georgia sheriffs Eleventh Amendment immunity for claims arising out of use-of-force policies in county jails, this Court was careful to narrowly cabin the scope of that immunity. The words this Court used in Manders reflected an understanding of what a serious thing it is to expand a doctrine that blocks a whole class of people from vindicating their federal rights in federal court. Every time we expand the list of sheriff's functions that are immune from suit, we impact tens of thousands of people who are detained in county jails across the state of Georgia. . . Most of these people have not yet been convicted of any crime and are presumed innocent. . . Yet even in the face of this Court's express admonitions in Manders, the Lake panel opinion bars suit against sheriffs for virtually any way they violate a jail inmate's rights—from the use of force to the denial of medical care. If a faithful application of this Court's and the Supreme Court's precedents required this result, I would accept it and move on. But because neither this circuit's precedent nor that of the Supreme Court supports this broad grant of immunity to Georgia county sheriffs, I respectfully dissent.")

Lake v. Skelton, 840 F.3d 1334, 1336-44 (11th Cir. 2016), reh'g en banc denied, 871 F.3d 1340 (11th Cir. 2017) ("We conclude that the sovereign immunity of Georgia extends to a deputy sheriff who denies a dietary request of an inmate in a county jail. We reverse the denial of summary judgment against Lake's claims for damages and remand with an instruction to enter judgment for Skelton on those claims. . . .The Cobb County Sheriff derives his powers from the State and, with the exception of funding, is largely independent of the county. Although this framework informs our analysis by providing evidence of 'the governmental structure of [the sheriff's] office vis-à-vis the State,'. . . all we need to decide today is whether Major Skelton acted as an arm of the State in the function of providing food to inmates. . . .The factors from Manders weigh in favor of immunity for Major Skelton. The first three factors—definition in state law, control under state law, and the source of funds—favor immunity. And the fourth factor—responsibility for judgments—'does not defeat immunity.'. . .With respect to county jails, section 42-5-2 imposes two separate duties: the county must fund the provision of medical care, and the sheriff must select an appropriate provider and ensure that inmates receive care when necessary. . . Our dissenting colleague argues that the Georgia Court of Appeals has long construed section 42-5-2 to impose a duty on counties, not sheriffs, to provide medical care. . . He reads sections 42-5-2 and 42-4-32 'harmoniously' to mean that 'the sheriff acts on behalf of the county' when providing food to inmates. . . We respectfully disagree. The Georgia Court of Appeals has never construed section 42-5-2 to mean that a sheriff acts on behalf of the county when he provides medical care. Instead, the Georgia Court of Appeals, like we do, distinguishes between the duty imposed by section 42-5-2 on a county to fund medical care and the duty of a sheriff to provide medical care. . . .Section 42-5-2 regulates both the furnishing of 'food' and the furnishing of 'needed medical and hospital attention,'. . . and we draw the same distinction regarding food that the Georgia Supreme Court and the Georgia Court of Appeals have drawn regarding medical care. Although the Georgia Code may not be a model of clarity when it comes to allocating responsibility in the context of corrections, we conclude that the duty to feed inmates—including the denial of an inmate's dietary request—is not delegated by the county but instead is 'directly assigned by the state.'. . .A deputy's functions are derived from the sheriff's functions, so the deputy's performance of this function is also a state function. Georgia law allows sheriffs 'in their discretion to appoint one or more deputies.'. . . Deputies are employees of the sheriff, and only the sheriff can hire deputies. . .Although the sheriff may place his deputies under a county civil-service system, it is his choice whether to do so. . . And the sheriff trains and supervises deputies. . . Because the sheriff wears a 'state hat,'. . . when he denies an inmate's dietary request, and because a deputy receives all of his powers and obligations with respect to feeding inmates from the sheriff, we conclude that a deputy also wears a 'state hat' when he denies an inmate's dietary request. . . .We acknowledge that we reserved judgment in Manders about a 'case of feeding ... inmates, which necessarily occur[s] within the jail.'. . . But we also observed that Georgia law 'regulates the preparation, service, and number of meals,' which we called 'evidence of how the duties of sheriffs in Georgia are governed by the State and not by county governing bodies.'. . To the extent that our dissenting colleague suggests that this appeal should be decided based on 'the Eleventh Amendment's twin reasons for being,'. . . we can only say that we are bound by the test of the en banc majority in Manders, not the dissent. . . And under the test announced in Manders, Major Skelton is entitled to immunity.")

Lake v. Skelton, 840 F.3d 1334, 1345-51 (11th Cir. 2016) (Parker, J., dissenting), reh'g en banc denied, 871 F.3d 1340 (11th Cir. 2017) ("[T]he majority holds that a Georgia deputy sheriff acts on behalf of the State and is thus immune from liability for failing to provide food to inmates in the county jail. The majority reaches that conclusion based largely on its view that § 42-5-2 does not impose a duty on the counties, even though, as Manders recognized, the Georgia Court of Appeals has construed the statute to do just that. The majority then proceeds to an inappropriate application of the Manders factors while losing sight of the principal purpose behind the Eleventh Amendment – not implicated here – of protecting the State's purse from federal-court judgments absent consent to suit. The result is a decision that significantly expands the reach of sovereign immunity and will leave Georgia counties unanswerable for constitutional violations predicated on their failure to provide food or any of the other necessities required by § 42-5-2. Because I believe that such an outcome is neither correct as a matter of law nor wise, I respectfully dissent. . . .The Georgia Court of Appeals has construed § 42-5-2 to impose a responsibility on counties to provide food, clothing, and medical care to inmates in the county jail, which makes sense only if the counties are the 'governmental units' upon whom that responsibility falls. Because I see no basis to conclude that the Georgia Supreme Court would interpret the statute differently, we are bound by the Court of Appeals's construction. . . .In sum, because the task of providing food to inmates in the county's physical custody is assigned by statute to the county and is generally limited to the county jail, and because the alternative sources of state law do not clearly indicate that the sheriff acts for the State, I would hold that state law defines the function of providing food to inmates in the county's custody as a county function. Accordingly, I would find that the first factor weighs heavily against immunity. . . .To recapitulate, the first Manders factor weighs heavily against immunity. The third and possibly fourth point in the same direction. And while the second factor favors immunity, it is of limited relevance where the factors conflict. I would accordingly hold that a Georgia deputy sheriff is not entitled to immunity for failing to provide food to inmates in the county jail. This should come as little surprise, given the Manders court's repeated observation that the provision of food, clothing, and medical care are materially different for purposes of immunity from the force policy functions. . . .To the extent that the Manders factors are not conclusive, however, 'the Eleventh Amendment's twin reasons for being remain our prime guide,'. . . and they too weigh against immunity. The first factor is to ensure that we do not offend Georgia's dignity as a sovereign by allowing sheriffs to be sued in federal courts. Id. As noted, the Georgia Court of Appeals has held that a county is responsible for the sheriff's failure to comply with § 42-5-2 because the sheriff acts on the county's behalf, i.e., as an arm of the county. . . Indeed, while the Georgia courts have said that a county cannot be held liable for violating § 42-5-2 because the statute does not waive sovereign immunity as a matter of state law, they have added that 'this does not mean that plaintiffs seeking recourse based on allegations that a government denied or provided inadequate medical treatment to an inmate are necessarily without recourse because such claims may in some circumstances state a cause of action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.'. . Thus, not only do we not offend Georgia's dignity by permitting suit in these circumstances, Georgia expects that § 1983 liability would be available to hold sheriffs and counties accountable. 'It would be every bit as much an affront to [Georgia's] dignity' to ignore those decisions and conclude that the sheriff and his deputies act for the State and are immune from liability for such actions. . .The second purpose of immunity, which is the 'most important,' is to prevent federal-court judgments that would necessarily be paid out of the State's treasury absent consent to suit. . . As Manders recognized, a federal judgment would have no direct impact on Georgia's treasury because it would be paid out of the budget of the sheriff's office, which as previously noted, comes from the county funds. . .While this fact does not necessarily defeat immunity, . . . it certainly weighs against it[.] . . . And even if an indirect impact on the State treasury could theoretically support immunity, which is questionable, . . . that impact is too remote and speculative here because it is the counties who ultimately bear the responsibility for ensuring that the sheriff is adequately funded to perform his duties. . . Both purposes, then, weigh against immunity. For all of these reasons, I would hold that a Georgia deputy sheriff is not entitled to immunity from liability for failing to provide food to inmates at the county jail, and I would affirm the decision of the district court. I therefore respectfully dissent.") Pellitteri v. Prine, 776 F.3d 777, 779-83 (11th Cir. 2015) ("[W]e do not ask whether a sheriff in Georgia acts as an 'arm of the State' generally. Rather, we must determine whether Sheriff Prine acts as an 'arm of the State' when exercising his power to hire and fire his deputies. . . .Admittedly, we stated in Keene that 'sheriffs are largely independent from the State when they make personnel decisions.' 477 F. App'x at 578. We arrived at this conclusion by observing that sheriffs alone have great discretion in choosing who to appoint as their deputies. Id. Based in part on this autonomy—both from the State and the county—we concluded that sheriffs do not act as an 'arm of the State' when exercising their discretion to hire and fire deputies. . .Upon further review, however, we believe that this conclusion in Keene was mistaken on two fronts. First, the State of Georgia has in fact exercised a great deal of control over the hiring and firing of deputy sheriffs, especially through the certification process for peace officers. . . . And even after meeting all of these requirements, a potential deputy sheriff must still successfully complete an academy entrance examination administered by the State before he or she can be certified to serve in a sheriff's office as a deputy. . . These threshold requirements for serving as a peace officer in Georgia significantly limit a sheriff's discretion when hiring potential deputies. The Georgia legislature has also enacted laws creating a Peace Officer Standards and Training Council to discipline peace officers—including deputy sheriffs—for misconduct. . . This Council has the power to administer reprimands and limit, suspend, or revoke a peace officer's certification. . . Thus, the Council can functionally terminate a deputy sheriff's ability to perform his or her duties, which significantly restricts a sheriff's discretion in personnel matters. Finally, as we mentioned in Manders, Georgia's governor also has broad investigation and suspension powers to discipline a sheriff for misconduct. . . These disciplinary powers can be used to check sheriffs when they abuse their appointment or removal powers. Based on these facts, we conclude that Sheriff Prine's power to hire and fire his deputies is subject to a significant amount of oversight by the State. Second, our conclusion in Keene was also flawed because it strayed from the 'key question' of the Manders function-by-function inquiry, which 'is not what ... powers sheriffs have, but for whom sheriffs exercise that power.'. . While it may be true that sheriffs alone are authorized to appoint their deputies, O.C.G.A. § 15–16–23, they do not exercise that authority for themselves. Rather, sheriffs select deputies to assist them in executing their own duties, which have been delegated to them by the State. . . .The third factor in the Eleventh Amendment analysis is where the entity derives its funds. In Keene, we found that this factor weighed against immunity because the '[c]ounty is clearly the principal source of funding for the Sheriff's Office, including for personnel expenditures.'. . Here again, we recognize that our prior unpublished opinion is inconsistent with this Court's published precedent. In Manders, we observed that each county in Georgia bears the major burden of providing funds to the sheriff's office, including the salaries of the sheriff and his deputies. . . We did not find this fact to be dispositive, however, because it is the State that mandates that counties set a budget for the sheriff's office. . . More important, although each county sets the total budget for the sheriff's office, it cannot dictate how the sheriff spends those funds. . . . Fourth and finally, we consider 'who is responsible for judgments against the entity.'. . The Supreme Court has emphasized that the 'impetus' for the Eleventh Amendment was the 'prevention of federal-court judgments that must be paid out of a State's treasury.'. . As a result, we have stated that 'the presence of a state treasury drain alone may trigger Eleventh Amendment immunity and make consideration of the other factors unnecessary.'. . On this factor, we agree with this Court's conclusion in Keene and Manders that the financial independence afforded the sheriff's office 'creates something of a lacuna' because neither the State nor the County will be required to directly pay for any adverse judgment against the Sheriff's office. . . Rather, any adverse judgment against Sheriff Prine will be paid out of the budget of the Lowndes County Sheriff's Office, which is composed of both County and State funds. . . Nevertheless, to the extent that the state treasury will be spared here from paying any adverse judgment, this factor weighs in favor of denying immunity. . . .As in Manders, the first three factors here weigh in favor of immunity, while the fourth factor weighs against immunity. On balance, we conclude that Sheriff Prine enjoys Eleventh Amendment immunity against Ms. Pellitteri's wrongful termination claims brought against him in his official capacity under § 1983 and the ADA. We reverse the District Court's denial of Sheriff Prine's motion to dismiss and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Gary v. Modena, No. 05-16973, 2006 WL 3741364, at *11 (11th Cir. Nov. 21, 2006) ("While the Georgia Constitution does indicate that a Sheriff occupies a separate constitutional office in the state's governmental hierarchy, Ga. CONST. art. IX, § 2, and that the Georgia legislature alone controls the Sheriff's Office, Ga. CONST. art IX, § 1, P 3(a)(b), Georgia statute requires that governmental units provide medical care to all inmates in their physical custody. O.C.G.A. § 42-5-2 (2006) . . . . Georgia statute imposes the same affirmative duty upon sheriffs, requiring that the sheriff take custody of all inmates in the jail of his county, O.C.G.A. § 42-4-4(a)(1) (2006), and furnish them with medical aid, heat and blankets, to be reimbursed if necessary from the county treasury. O.C.G.A. § 42-4-4(a)(2) (2006). Given that county governments have a statutory obligation to provide inmates in county jails with access to medical care, Bibb County cannot avoid liability under § 1983 simply by arguing that the Sheriff is subject to the exclusive control of the state. See Manders, 338 F.3d 1323 n. 43. If Gary could show that Bibb County implemented a policy which promoted deliberate indifference to the medical care of inmates, and that the policy caused Butts death, she could hold the County liable, and we stress the word 'if.' Gary has failed to articulate a County policy that promoted deliberate indifference, and as we have noted previously, she has not provided any evidence from which we could infer that Deputy Hilliard failed to note an obviously serious medical condition on Butts' screening form and that this omission led to Butts' death. Accordingly, we affirm the district court's decision to award Bibb County summary judgment.").

Purcell ex rel. Estate of Morgan v. Toombs County, 400 F.3d 1313, 1325 (11th Cir. 2005) ("Although we declined to determine that a Georgia sheriff wears a 'state hat' for all functions, we decided that a sheriff's 'authority and duty to administer the jail in his jurisdiction flows from the State, not [the] County.'. . Thus Manders controls our determination here; Sheriff Kight functions as an arm of the State − not of Toombs County − when promulgating policies and procedures governing conditions of confinement at the Toombs County Jail. Accordingly, even if Purcell had established a constitutional violation, Sheriff Kight would be entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity from suit in his official capacity.").

Manders v. Lee, 338 F.3d 1304, 1328 & n.54 (11th Cir. 2003) (en banc) ("Having applied the Eleventh Amendment factors, we conclude that Sheriff Peterson in his official capacity is an arm of the State, not Clinch County, in establishing use-of-force policy at the jail and in training and disciplining his deputies in that regard.[footnote omitted] Therefore, Sheriff Peterson is entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity in this case. [footnote omitted] We need not answer, and do not answer, today whether Sheriff Peterson wears a 'state hat' for any other functions he performs. . . . It has been suggested that the sheriff's office is an independent, constitutional, elected office that is neither the State nor the county. . . Throughout this litigation the parties have briefed and framed the legal issue in this case solely as whether Sheriff Peterson in his official capacity acts on behalf of the State or Clinch County in the context of the Eleventh Amendment. Thus, we decide that controversy. No other issue is before us. In addition, while we agree that the sheriff's office is independent from and not controlled by the county, we conclude today only that the sheriff acts for the State in performing the particular functions at issue in this case.").

Manders v. Lee, 338 F.3d 1304, 1331, 1332 (11th Cir. 2003) (en banc) (Anderson, J., joined by Tjoflat, Birch and Wilson, J.J., dissenting)("I submit that the proper question is whether the sheriff has carried his burden of proving that he is an arm of the state. In other words, the issue is not the state versus the county; rather, the issue is whether the sheriff is an arm of the state vel non. The mere fact that the sheriff is not the policymaker for the county commission, is not controlled by the county commission, and the fact that the county has no respondeat superior liability for judgments against the sheriff, do not, either singly or in combination, go very far toward establishing that a Georgia sheriff is an arm of the state. The Seventh Circuit recognized this in Franklin v. Zaruba, 150 F.3d 682 (7 th Cir.1998).").

Manders v. Lee, 338 F.3d 1304, 1347, 1348 (11th Cir. 2003) (en banc) (Barkett, J., joined by Tjoflat, Birch and Wilson, J.J., and joined in part by Anderson, J.)("In this case, each of the factors we normally apply to determine whether a defendant is entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity weighs against extending such protection to Sheriff Peterson. Georgia law clearly defines Sheriff Peterson as a county officer and jails as county institutions; the state's corrections authorities exercise no control over Sheriff Peterson in his operation of the county jail; Clinch County appropriates Sheriff Peterson's operating budget and pays for the jail's construction and upkeep; and there is no indication that a judgment against Sheriff Peterson would operate against the state of Georgia. . . . A correct reading of Georgia law shows that county sheriffs operate county jails for the counties in which they serve. In every sense, a suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against a county sheriff alleging mistreatment in a county jail is a suit against a local government. The Eleventh Amendment, which protects states, is inapplicable, and the decision of the district court should therefore be affirmed.").

Grech v. Clayton County, Georgia, 335 F.3d 1326, 1331, 1332, 1347 & n.46 (11th Cir. 2003) (en banc) (plurality opinion) ("[T]he appropriate § 1983 inquiry under federal law is whether defendant Clayton County, under Georgia law, has control over the Sheriff in his law enforcement function, particularly for the entry and validation of warrants on the CJIS systems and the training and supervision of his employees in that regard. . . . In Georgia, a county has no authority and control over the sheriff's law enforcement function. Clayton County does not, and cannot, direct the Sheriff how to arrest a criminal, how to hire, train, supervise, or discipline his deputies, what polices to adopt, or how to operate his office, much less how to record criminal information on, or remove it from, the CJIS systems involved in this case. Instead, the sheriff acts on behalf of the State in his function as a law enforcement officer and keeper of the peace in general and in relation to the CJIS systems in particular. . . . Judge Anderson's concurring opinion more narrowly concludes that as 'to the particular function at issue in this case, the Sheriff is acting on behalf of the state, and thus ... Clayton County is not liable in this case.' . . Because no opinion obtained a majority of the Court, 'the holding of the Court may be viewed as that position taken by those Members who concurred in the judgments on the narrowest grounds.'").

Lange v. Houston County, Georgia, 499 F. Supp. 3d 1258 (M.D. Ga. 2020), reconsideration denied, No. 5:19-CV-392 (MTT), 2020 WL 7634054 (M.D. Ga. Dec. 22, 2020) ("[T]he Court turns to the narrow question posed by the Sheriff's Office—whether, based on the allegations of the amended complaint, it has established that it acts as an arm of the state when it provides healthcare benefits to its employees. Although the Eleventh Circuit's significant 'arm of the state' cases have involved Sheriff's Offices, none of those decisions has addressed anything remotely related to that narrow function. Nonetheless, the Sheriff's Office argues that those decisions provide the answer here. It argues that Eleventh Circuit precedent necessarily establishes that any personnel decision by the Sheriff's Office is taken as an arm of the state. . . The first Manders factor, how state law defines the entity, supports a finding of sovereign immunity. As the Eleventh Circuit has noted, 'sheriffs in Georgia derive their power and duties from the State, are controlled [as to certain functions] by the State, and counties cannot, and do not, delegate any law enforcement power or duties to sheriffs.'. . As the Court in Manders stressed, under Georgia law, the Sheriff's Office and the County are independent, separate entities. . . The first factor supports a finding that the Sheriff's Office was acting as an arm of the state. . .As for control, the second factor, the Sheriff's Office has failed to demonstrate that the State exercises any control over the provision of healthcare benefits. Instead, it argues that the State exercises control over peace officer training and certification. . . Though it is true that the State's authority to train and discipline supports a finding that the Sheriff's Office is an arm of the state for purposes of hiring and firing deputies, provision of healthcare benefits to employees is a different function. So although '[a sheriff's] power to hire and fire his deputies is subject to a significant amount of oversight by the State,' nothing in the briefs or record indicates that the Sheriff's Office's provision of benefits to employees is subject to similar oversight. . . Rather, looking to the allegations in the complaint, it appears the Sheriff's Office, not the State, maintains full control over the healthcare benefits it provides its employees. Exercising that control, it delegated the provision of health benefits to the County. But nowhere in the complaint, or even in the Sheriff's Office's brief, is there any indication that the State had any control over the Plan or over employee benefits more generally. Accordingly, looking only to the facts alleged, that factor supports a finding that the Sheriff's Office was not acting as an arm of the state when it performed the function of providing healthcare benefits to its employees. As to the third factor, source of funding, 'each county in Georgia bears the major burden of providing funds to the sheriff's office, including the salaries of the sheriff and his deputies.'. . However, the Eleventh Circuit has held that this factor does not weigh against immunity because (1) state law requires counties to fund sheriff's offices and (2) counties cannot dictate how the funds are spent. . . Similarly, the County here cannot dictate how the Sheriff's Office spends its funds. Accordingly, this factor does not weigh for or against immunity. Fourth, the Court considers monetary liability for a potential judgment against the Sheriff's Office. In Georgia, as a general matter, 'neither the State nor the County will be required to directly pay for any adverse judgment against the Sheriff's office.'. . Typically, therefore, this factor weighs against immunity. . . Here, however, it arguably weighs against immunity even more strongly: not only will the State treasury be unaffected, but also the County may be responsible for an adverse judgment. After all, it is the County's Plan, and Lange alleges the County made the decision to exclude coverage for her needed surgery. . . . In sum, under Eleventh Circuit law, the first factor supports a conclusion that the Sheriff's Office was acting as an arm of the state, the second and fourth support a conclusion that it was not acting as an arm of the state, and the third does not support either conclusion. Looking only to the facts alleged in the complaint, the Sheriff's Office has failed to carry its burden of showing it was acting as an arm of the state.")

Brooks v. Wilkinson Cty., Georgia, No. 5:17-CV-00033-TES, 2019 WL 2236267, at *6 (M.D. Ga. May 23, 2019) ("The Court agrees with the court in Palmer that it was probably unnecessary for it to conduct its own Manders analysis in light of Lake, and, in an effort to avoid reinventing the wheel (particularly a wheel as well made as Palmer), the Court will rest its decision on the proposition that 'because the provision of medical care cannot be distinguished from the provision of food for Eleventh Amendment purposes, Lake [ ] requires a finding of immunity in this case.'. . Thus, the Court finds that, under Georgia law, a sheriff acts as an arm of the state when he provides medical care to inmates in a county jail and is therefore entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. Consequently, Defendant Chatman is entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity in this case.")

Palmer v. Correct Care Solutions, LLC., No. 4:17-CV-102 (CDL), 2017 WL 6028467, at *1-4 (M.D. Ga. Dec. 5, 2017) ("The undersigned previously rejected the notion that neither the county nor the county sheriff could be liable for money damages arising from the failure to provide constitutionally mandated medical care to a county detainee in a county jail. See Youngs v.

Johnson, No. 4:06-CV-19 (CDL), 2008 WL 4816731, at *7-*8 (M.D. Ga. Oct. 30, 2008). But the Eleventh Circuit has laid additional bricks in the 'immunity wall' since the Court rendered that decision, and in light of recent Eleventh Circuit precedent, it appears that the Eleventh Amendment blocks a detainee from vindicating his federal constitutional rights against a Georgia sheriff under such circumstances. See Lake v. Skelton (Lake I), 840 F.3d 1334, 1339-42, reh'g denied 871 F.3d 1340 (2017) (en banc) (holding that a Georgia sheriff acts as an arm of the state when he provides food to county detainees in a county jail). . . Although the Eleventh Circuit has not yet held that a Georgia sheriff is protected by the Eleventh Amendment for his failure to provide constitutionally mandated medical care to county jail detainees, a constitutional claim arising from the failure to provide food, which the Eleventh Circuit held in Lake I cannot be asserted against a Georgia sheriff in his official capacity in federal court because of the Eleventh Amendment, appears indistinguishable for Eleventh Amendment purposes from a claim arising from the failure to provide medical care. . . .Palmer makes a compelling argument that the Eleventh Amendment was never intended to shield a county sheriff and his officers from liability arising from their failure to provide adequate, constitutionally mandated medical care to those persons entrusted to their care. But Eleventh Amendment precedent in this Circuit has evolved to provide an almost insurmountable wall protecting Georgia sheriffs sued in their official capacities for violating the federal constitutional rights of county jail detainees. Whether that precedent is well-reasoned is of no concern to this Court; the Court is duty bound to apply it. Based on that precedent, this Court must find that the sheriff and his jail commander are entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity on Palmer's official capacity claims. . . .Determining whether a county sheriff is a state official would seem to be a rather straightforward inquiry. But we have learned that it is not enough that the sheriff is the 'Sheriff of Muscogee County' or that his law enforcement responsibilities are restricted primarily to the geographic boundaries of the county which he serves. It appears to matter little that he is in charge of the county jail and that this jail is funded by the county taxpayers. In fact, recent precedent suggests that it is not terribly important that the county sheriff's budget is funded by the taxpayers who reside within the county in which the sheriff serves and who elect the county sheriff. Such facts are brushed aside as the product of superficial analysis that must yield, of course, to one of those 'sophisticated' multipart balancing tests loved by law professors and appellate judges. . . . Bound by the holding in Lake I and constrained by its rationale, this Court can find no distinction for Eleventh Amendment purposes between a county sheriff feeding county detainees in a county jail and a county sheriff taking care of the medical needs of those same county detainees in that same county jail. Thus, with reservations as to whether this analysis reaches the proper constitutional result but with no hesitation that it is required by current binding precedent in this Circuit, the Court finds that the sheriff and his commander are entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity here. It is likely sufficient to rest today's holding on a simple proposition: because the provision of medical care cannot be distinguished from the provision of food for Eleventh Amendment purposes, Lake I requires a finding of immunity in this case. But for the sake of thoroughness, the Court performs the four part balancing test established by Manders as elucidated by Lake I.")

Vandiver v. Meriwether County, Georgia, No. 3:17-CV-114-TCB, 2018 WL 3744363, at *5–7 (N.D. Ga. Aug. 7, 2018) ("[A]t the outset, it is fairly well settled that Georgia district attorneys are state, not county, officials when exercising discretion in prosecutorial decisions. . . There is, however, a wrinkle in this case that was not present in Owens. The district attorney here was not enforcing state law. He was instead attempting to enforce county ordinances, allegedly at the behest of the County. This distinction could arguably compel a different outcome than Owens, i.e., that he was acting on behalf of the County. That is except for the fact that when he sought to enforce the ordinance he did so by state indictment, rather than by citation or accusation in the name of the County. The proceedings in the Meriwether Superior Court make clear that the indictment and subsequent proceedings were done in the name of the State of Georgia. . . While the County may have referred the violations to the district attorney, when he drew up the indictment he put on his State of Georgia hat and proceeded in his capacity as an officer of the State. The Court acknowledges that it appears to be somewhat unusual for a Georgia district attorney to enforce a county ordinance (especially by indictment). But it is not clear that such an act is totally foreclosed to the office of district attorney. It is possible that he had some authority to attempt to enforce a county ordinance by virtue of his state office, rather than simply as an instrumentality of the County. Under Georgia law, 'a prosecution for the violation of a city ordinance is a quasi-criminal action....'. . . And a municipality only exercises its authority to enforce a violation of its own ordinances by powers delegated to it by the State. . . As averred, it appears that the district attorney, on behalf of the State, purported to exercise the State's inceptive law-enforcement power to prosecute a violation of its political subdivision's ordinance. . . And though a proceeding by indictment was foreclosed here by O.C.G.A. § 15-10-62—even by the district attorney—this blunder was effected through exercise of state, rather than county, authority. This conclusion is necessary in light of the Eleventh Circuit's instruction that resolving the issue of final policymaking authority requires a determination as to who is the ultimate repository of county power with respect to the allegedly unlawful action. Vandiver argues that the district attorney was appointed as the County's agent to enforce the county ordinances under O.C.G.A. § 15-10-62(a), and was therefore the ultimate repository of County authority with respect this act. But once again, the complaint shows that the district attorney drew up the indictment in the name of the State. And the power to draw up indictments is vested in the district attorney by state law. . . Thus, the district attorney was not acting as the ultimate repository of County authority when he pursued Vandiver by indictment. The Court finds further support for this holding in the Eleventh Circuit's decision in Turquitt, which overruled a previous opinion in Parker v. Williams, 862 F.2d 1471 (11th Cir. 1989). Parker held a county liable for injuries to an inmate caused by an Alabama chief jailer because the jail was operated in partnership with the county and the sheriffs. Like Georgia, Alabama sheriffs are generally considered state actors. . . The Eleventh Circuit found that Parker was wrongly decided in part because the county government had no authority to control the actions of the sheriff that hired the abusive jailer. Turquitt reiterated that a 'local government "must have power in an area in order to be held liable for an official's acts in that area."'. . Upon review of Alabama law, the court concluded that the county defendant in Parker had no power over the administration of the jail; rather, its power extended only to 'maintaining the jail's physical plant and providing operational funding.'. . This not only affected the policy or custom issue, but it also defeated Monell causation because 'a local government can only be liable under § 1983 for injuries which the government itself caused and causation necessarily implies control.'. . Similarly, the County here has no inherent power over the district attorney when he draws up an indictment in the name of the State. Rather, this function is performed pursuant to his state-derived power, and he is responsible to the State in his performance.")

McDaniel v. Yearwood, No. 2:11–CV–00165–RWS, 2012 WL 526078, at *8 (N.D. Ga. Feb. 16, 2012) ("In sum, Barrow County cannot be held liable under Section 1983 for any violation of Plaintiff's constitutional rights that may have occurred as a result of Plaintiff's arrest. In conducting arrests, Georgia sheriffs and their deputies act on behalf of the state, not the county. Having concluded that the actors in this case were not county policymakers, the Court need not analyze the separate question of whether they acted pursuant to a county policy or custom. Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claims for unreasonable seizure and malicious prosecution against Barrow County therefore fail. . . .The Court finds it to be a closer question whether Sheriff Smith acted as a state or county policymaker when he denied Plaintiff medical treatment, and thus whether county liability under Section 1983 properly may be predicated on this conduct. Ultimately, however, the Court declines to reach this issue given its conclusion, explained below, that Plaintiff has failed to make a sufficient showing that Sheriff Smith was acting pursuant to an official county policy or custom.")

Keene v. Prine, No. 7:09-cv-141(HL), 2011 WL 2493120, at *10, *11 (M.D. Ga. June 22, 2011) ("All four factors weigh in favor of finding that Sheriff Prine is an arm of the State in relation to making employment decisions for his office. The Court therefore concludes that the claims against Sheriff Prine in his official capacity constitute claims against the State of Georgia. . . . Sheriff Prine is entitled to immunity, in his official capacity, from any § 1983, FMLA, ADEA, or ADA monetary award. The Plaintiffs' Title VII claims for damages may proceed against Sheriff Prine in his official capacity because Title VII is not barred by the Eleventh Amendment. There is one exception. The Plaintiffs' claims for prospective injunctive relief against Sheriff Prine in his official capacity are not barred by the Eleventh Amendment.")

Cassells v. Hill, No. 1:07-CV-2755-TCB, 2010 WL 4616573, at *17 (N.D. Ga. Nov. 8, 2010) ("Considering the significant power given to a Georgia sheriff by the state to operate his office and manage his employees independently of the county, the Court is persuaded that a sheriff acts as an arm of the state when promulgating policies regarding the manner in which employees share internal information with the media or other outside sources.")

Robinson v. Houston County, No. 5:09-CV-156 (CAR), 2010 WL 2464901, at *8 (M.D. Ga. June 14, 2010) ("The Sheriff was the final policymaker, and, as discussed supra, the Sheriff acted as an arm of the State, not the county, when he implemented polices to screen, monitor, and protect suicidal detainees. Thus, Houston County cannot be liable for the Sheriff's polices at issue.").

Riley v. Harris County Sheriff's Dept., No. 4:08-CV-62 (CDL), 2009 WL 5216914, at *3 n.6, *4 (M.D. Ga. Dec. 29, 2009) ("Even if Plaintiff's claims against Williamson were construed as official capacity claims such that they are considered claims against his employer, the Harris County Sheriff, the sheriff would be entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. It is well settled that Eleventh Amendment immunity bars suits brought in federal court when an 'arm of the State' is sued. Manders v. Lee , 338 F.3d 1304, 1308 (11th Cir.2003)(en banc). A Georgia sheriff is considered an 'arm of the state' in discharging his law enforcement functions, such as detaining and arresting suspects.").

Ashley v. Chafin, Civil No. 7:07-cv-177(HL), 2009 WL 3074732, at *13 (M.D. Ga. Sept. 23, 2009) ("This Court finds that all four factors weigh in favor of finding Sheriff Chafin is an arm of the State in relation to making employment decisions for the Sheriff Office. . . Therefore, the Brooks County Sheriff's Office is entitled to sovereign immunity from any Section 1983 monetary award for the purposes of this case.").

Boyd v. Nichols, No. 7:08-cv-26 (HL), 2009 WL 1285958, a *7, *8 (M.D. Ga. May 5, 2009) ("It is Boyd's position that Defendant Brogdon's duty to assume responsibility for her safety and well being while in custody, which would require him to protect her from his employees and to train his employees, is analogous to the duty to provide medical care as discussed in Dukes. Like the sheriff in Dukes, Boyd contends that Defendant Brogdon should not be considered an 'arm of the State.'. . . There are a number of Georgia state statutes which refer to a sheriff as providing county functions when providing medical necessities to inmates. . . Those statutes led the Dukes court to find that the sheriff was not an 'arm of the State' for the particular function of providing medical care. Boyd has not directed the Court to any similar state statutes applicable to this particular function of Defendant Brogdon. Boyd is ultimately complaining about policies implemented by Defendant Brogdon. In her view, his policy of failing to train jailers, policy of understaffing the Jail, and policy of allowing male jailers to handle female inmates without any supervision led to the violation of her rights. The Eleventh Circuit has held on a number of occasions that sheriffs were entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity as an 'arm of the State' in executing the function of establishing various policies. [citing Manders and Purcell] . . . . Thus, when Defendant Brogdon administers the Jail through his policies, he is doing so as an 'arm of the State.' Accordingly, Defendant Brogdon is entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity from suit in his official capacity.").

Youngs v. Johnson, No. 4:06-CV-19 (CDL), 2008 WL 4816731, at *6 n.7 (M.D. Ga. Oct. 30, 2008) ("Plaintiff contends that the Muscogee County Sheriff traded his state hat for a county hat in the operation of the jail when he along with the County entered into an agreement in 1999 with the United States Department of Justice regarding conditions at MCJ. . . The Agreement provides that the 'City/County' shall, inter alia, 'develop and implement[ ] appropriate, comprehensive policies and procedures for Jail Operations.'. . Plaintiff argues that this provision establishes that the Sheriff is an 'arm of the county' because the agreement provides Muscogee County with the authority and obligation to promulgate jail policies and procedures-a function that is normally reserved to the Sheriff acting under powers derived directly from the State. However, the Agreement also provides that the Sheriff in his official capacity is primarily responsible for developing MCJ policies and procedures. . . The Court finds that the Sheriff has not, through this Agreement, sufficiently relinquished to Muscogee County his state-derived authority for the operation of the jail to the extent that he loses his Eleventh Amendment immunity.") Youngs v. Johnson, No. 4:06-CV-19 (CDL), 2008 WL 4816731, at 6-8 (M.D. Ga. Oct. 30, 2008) ("Sheriff Johnson contends that he is also entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity as to Plaintiff's § 1983 claim regarding the diagnosis and treatment of Plaintiff's injury. The Eleventh Circuit has not addressed whether a Georgia sheriff wears a 'state hat' or a 'county hat' when providing medical services to county jail inmates. . . The Sheriff suggests that he wears a state for all functions at the jail. The Eleventh Circuit, however, has declined to find that a Georgia sheriff wears a 'state hat' for all functions. Therefore, it does not follow that just because the Sheriff acts as an arm of the State with respect to the placement and classification of inmates, he automatically also acts as an arm of the State with respect to the provision of medical care. Instead, the Court reads Manders to require it to analyze the four Manders factors to determine whether Sheriff Johnson is entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity as to Plaintiff's § 1983 claim regarding the provision of medical care. . . . Although the sheriff's obligation to provide county inmates with medical services is directly derived from the State, the provision of medical care is directly delegated through the county entity. '[I]t shall be the responsibility of the governmental unit, subdivision, or agency having the physical custody of an inmate to maintain the inmate, furnishing him food, clothing, and any needed medical and hospital attention[.]' O.C.G.A. ' 42-5-2(a) . . . . Thus, because the provision of medical care is directly delegated through the county entity, the Court concludes that the first factor favors a finding that the provision of medical care in county jails is a county function. . . . The second factor in the Eleventh Amendment analysis examines where Georgia law vests control. . . . Because of the county's direct involvement in and responsibility for providing medical care for county jail inmates, the Court concludes that this factor also weighs in favor of finding that the provision of medical care in county jails is a county function. . . . The third factor in the Eleventh Amendment analysis is the source of the entity's funds. The Eleventh Circuit, in Manders, noted that State funds were involved in the particular function of force policy in county jails because the State provided funding for training of sheriffs, funded the Governor's disciplinary procedure over sheriffs, and paid for certain state offenders assigned to the county jails under the sheriff's supervision. . . However, in this case, examining the particular function of the provision of medical care in county jails, O.C.G.A. ' 42-5-2(a) provides that the county has an obligation to provide funding for jail necessities. Although the Eleventh Circuit, in Manders, found that this statute was not dispositive on the issue of force policy, it stressed the fact that the case did not involve medical care. . . Therefore, given this caveat and the clear language of O.C.G.A. ' 42-5-2, the Court concludes that this factor weighs in favor of a finding that the provision of medical care to county jail inmates is a county function. . . . The final factor in the Eleventh Amendment analysis is determining who is responsible for judgments against the entity. In Manders, the Eleventh Circuit determined that 'although the State and the county are not required to pay an adverse judgment against the sheriff, both county and state funds indirectly are implicated.' . . The Eleventh Circuit, however, determined that this factor did not defeat immunity presumably because the first three factors weighed in favor of immunity. . . Here, however, the first three factors weigh heavily in favor of finding that the sheriff is an arm of the county. Thus, the Court finds that the fourth factor does not defeat a finding that the sheriff is an arm of the county when providing medical care to inmates in county jails. Because the Court finds that the sheriff is an arm of the county in providing medical care in a county jail, Sheriff Johnson is not entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . Therefore, the Court denies his motion for summary judgment as to Plaintiff's § 1983 inadequate medical care claim.").

Youngs v. Johnson, No. 4:06-CV-19 (CDL), 2008 WL 4816731, at *9 (M.D. Ga. Oct. 30, 2008) ("As explained in the Court's previous Eleventh Amendment discussion, the relationship between the County and the Sheriff regarding inmate medical care is different from their relationship regarding inmate classification and placement. Although the Sheriff may be the 'final decisionmaker' at the jail for all aspects of the jail operation, he acts on behalf of the County when making decisions regarding medical care for the county inmates. Under Georgia law, the provision of medical care to county inmates is a county function. The County can certainly delegate that function to the Sheriff, which the record establishes was done here, but when it does so, it does not relinquish its ultimate responsibility for that function. The Sheriff simply becomes the final policymaker for the County regarding the promulgation of appropriate policies and procedures for providing adequate medical care to inmates at the county jail. . . Therefore, Muscogee County is not entitled to summary judgment as to Plaintiff's § 1983 inadequate medical care claim.")

Mia Luna, Inc. v. Hill, No. 1:08-CV-585-TWT, 2008 WL 4002964, at *2, *4 (N.D. Ga. Aug. 22, 2008) ("This case, although it also involves roadblocks, differs because the Plaintiff alleges that the Defendant is not exercising authority derived from the state. The Georgia Constitution forbids any county from exercising the power of police protection within a municipality except by contract with that municipality. . . .The Plaintiff claims that the Defendant Hill has no such contract with the City of Forest Park − and therefore no written consent − allowing his department to conduct law enforcement activities in Forest Park. . . . I fail to see how the narrow holding of Manders does not compel immunity in this case. The Manders court cautioned against categorically granting Georgia sheriffs Eleventh Amendment immunity in their official capacities. In application, the analysis in Manders is so strong it forces a logical conclusion that Eleventh Amendment immunity almost automatically attaches for a Georgia sheriff (even where that sheriff's actions were allegedly ultra vires).").

Rylee v. Chapman, No. 2:06-CV-0158-RWS, 2008 WL 3538559, at *6 (N.D. Ga. Aug. 11, 2008) ("[T]he Court concludes that Sheriff Chapman acted as an arm of the State of Georgia − and not Banks County − in both his capacity as a law enforcement officer enacting policies applicable to Plaintiff's arrest and in his capacity as an administrator of the Banks County Jail.").

Bennett v. Chatham County Sheriff's Dept., 2008 WL 628908, at *5 n.2 (S.D. Ga. Mar. 5, 2008) ("Though the Court hesitates to hold that sheriffs and their employees always act as arms of the state, it is clear that in the context of employment decisions sheriffs and their employees are state officers.").

Lewis v. Wilcox, 2007 WL 3102189, at *9 (M.D. Ga. Oct. 23, 2007) ("[T]his Court finds that Defendant Chapman was acting as an 'arm of the State' when promulgating use-of-force and seizure policies in the context of ordinary law enforcement. States, and arms of States, are not 'persons' who can be sued under § 1983. . . . Moreover, while it appears that the Eleventh Circuit has not confirmed that deputy sheriffs in Georgia are immune from suit under Eleventh Amendment principles, a line of district court cases has 'determined that when a sheriff is acting as an arm of the state, his deputies are also entitled to Eleventh Amendment Immunity.'")

Hooks v. Brogdon, 2007 WL 2904009, at *2 (M.D. Ga .Sept. 29, 2007) ("The Northern District of Georgia's decision in Dukes, as well as the Eleventh Circuit's decision in Manders, suggest that in providing medical care for jail inmates, a sheriff acts as an arm of the county. . . Therefore, insofar as Plaintiff brings this action against Sheriff Brogdon in his official capacity as Sheriff of Lanier County, Plaintiff must allege and establish that the alleged deprivations resulted from a custom or policy set by Lanier County. . . In making the determination of whether the deprivation resulted from a County's custom or policy, the Eleventh Circuit has held that a single act may be county policy if the action is performed by a county official who is 'the final policymaker ... with respect to the subject matter in question.'. . To determine whether an official is the 'final policymaker,' the court should look to the relevant positive law, including ordinances, rules, and regulations, as well as the relevant customs and practices having the force of law. . . Here, it is clear that under Georgia law Sheriff Brogdon was the final policymaker with respect to providing medical care to inmates at Lanier County Jail.")

Slaughter v. Dooly County, 2007 WL 2908648, at *6, *7 (M.D.Ga. Sept. 28, 2007) ("Here, Plaintiff contends the deprivation of her constitutional rights arising from her placement in the restraint chair was caused by the Jail's official Restraint Chair Policy. However, Dooly County neither adopted nor was permitted to adopt or implement policies concerning use of force or the restraint chair. Dooly County is constitutionally and legally prohibited from performing these law enforcement functions that are specifically delineated by Georgia law as duties of the sheriff . . . . Georgia sheriffs, when acting in the areas of law enforcement, duties in the courts, and corrections, are "state actors," not "county actors." . . Plaintiff also contends Dooly County violated her constitutional rights by failing to provide training and supervision to jail officials. . . . Because Plaintiff's claims against Dooly County involve the corrections/detentions function of the office of the sheriff , which are state, not county, functions, Plaintiff's § 1983 direct liability claims against Dooly County fail. . . . Plaintiff's claims that the County is liable for Plaintiff's inadequate medical treatment during her incarceration must also fail. The provision of medical treatment to inmates and detainees is a function of the sheriffs, not counties. . . . Because the sheriff's " authority and duty to administer the jail in his jurisdiction flows from the State, not [the] County," the County cannot be liable for Plaintiff's claim that she was provided inadequate medical treatment.")

Kicklighter v. Herrin, 2007 WL 2248089, at *8 (S.D.Ga. July 31, 2007) ("The Manders decision only considered the narrow function of 'establishing use-of-force policy at the jail,' and the Eleventh Circuit explicitly declined to decide whether county sheriffs are arms of the state for any of their other specific duties. . . The Eleventh Circuit has not extended Manders to all sheriff functions. . . The Georgia Constitution designates the sheriff as a 'county officer,' and the Georgia Supreme Court has held that a county sheriff is a separate constitutional entity. . . Therefore, without clear guidance from the Eleventh Circuit, this Court is unwilling to extend Manders and hold that a Georgia Sheriff is an 'arm of the state' for the general law enforcement functions at issue in this case.")

Morgan v. Fulton County Sheriff's Dept., 2007 WL 1810217, at *6 (N.D. Ga. June 21, 2007) ([T]he court cannot simply assume that because a county sheriff acts as an arm of the State with respect to conditions of confinement at the jail, he necessarily acts as an arm of the State with respect to the provision of medical care at the jail as well. Indeed, the Manders court took great pains to limit its holding to the particular functions at issue in that case and to distinguish those functions from the provision of medical care . . . . In looking at the test set out in Manders, two district courts have determined that a Georgia sheriff acts as an arm of the county in providing medical care to inmates. See Dukes v. Georgia, 428 F.Supp.2d 1298, 1319-22 (N.D.Ga., 2006) (Forrester J.); Green v. Glynn County, 2006 WL 156873, *3 (S.D.Ga. Jan. 16, 2006) ("laimo, J.). As a sheriff acts as an arm of the county in providing medical care to inmates, his deputies are also arms of the county with regard to medical care claims. Therefore, the court finds that Defendant King is not immune to suit in his official capacity under the Eleventh Amendment with regard to Plaintiff's medical care claim.").

United States v. Terrell County, No. 1:04-CV-76 (WLS 2006 WL 2850069, at *8 n.1 & n.3 (M.D. Ga. Sept. 30, 2006) ("Both sets of Defendants have illustrated the unique position that Georgia Counties and Sheriffs find themselves in when it comes to enforcing federal constitutional rights. According to the Eleventh Circuit, the two are separate distinct entities under state law and have no overlapping control over the actions of the other. . . It is argued by the Defendants that the result is that the County cannot enforce policy over the Sheriff and the Sheriff cannot secure funding, and neither takes responsibility for any alleged constitutional violations of the County Jail. The Court notes, however, that the Eleventh Circuit confined the Manders decision, and its progeny. It specifically limited the decision/holding to the issue of Eleventh Amendment immunity in the context of Sheriffs being sued for the alleged specific unconstitutional misconduct directed towards an individual or small group usually involving one incident. The Manders' court pointed out that it was not deciding the broader question of liability between a Sheriff and County when it came to certain issues such as jail conditions. Neither is the question specifically before the Court at this time, nor does this Court intimate or decide how or if Manders will effect [sic] such a question. . . . While funding of the Jail and control of policy are legitimate issues raised by all of the parties, Bowens ignores his responsibilities as Sheriff and Jailor of Terrell County. See O.C.G.A. '' 42-4-1 through 42-4-71 (statutory duties of sheriff as it relates to jails). For example, the Sheriff is responsible for staffing the jail in a manner to ensure the safety of the inmates. If he concludes it takes a POST certified officer to open a cell door, then he must adjust the scheduling of his POST officers to be on duty at the jail at all times. As argued correctly by the Government, there is no excuse for an inmate to suffer serious harm because the jailor on duty was not authorized to open a cell door to provide assistance. The Government's statement of facts contains a plethora of examples where Bowens could have exercised his duties irrespective of funding issues. . . . Accordingly, the Court finds that the Government has carried its burden of proof of showing (1) the existence of objectively serious and dangerous conditions; (2) that both sets of Defendants (Bowens and TCBOC) have subjective knowledge of these substantial risks to the inmates; and (3) that both sets of Defendants have disregarded these risks in more than a negligent manner. As such, the Court finds that there is no genuine issue of material fact concerning whether the conditions at the Terrell County Jail are unconstitutional and the Government is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Therefore, the Government's motion for summary judgment for violation of the inmates' rights to be free from serious risks of harm while incarcerated at the Terrell County Jail (Doc. No. 46) is GRANTED. The Court by separate order, shall issue instructions to the parties concerning further proceedings, briefing and hearing on the issues of: (1) the Sheriff's and/or the TCBOC's liability or responsibility for the unconstitutional conduct; (2) the proper remedy; and (3) if necessary, the Sheriff's and/or the TOBOC responsibilities in implementing the Court's remedy, other subsequent necessary orders or appropriate relief.").

Scruggs v. Lee, No. 7:05-cv-95(HL), 2006 WL 2850427, *4, *5 (M.D. Ga. Sept. 30, 2006) ("In this case, Scruggs has not brought a challenge to the use-of-force policies at the Clinch County jail. Thus, the conclusion in Manders − that Sheriff Peterson was entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity − is not directly applicable to this case. Nevertheless, in the Court's view, the same result obtains. Scruggs contends that law enforcement officials violated his rights when they unlawfully seized him at the roadblock, subjected him to a search without a warrant or probable cause and then unlawfully arrested and detained him without due process of the law. These allegations implicate Sheriff Peterson's policies concerning the execution of roadblocks, the use of canine units, and the arrest and booking procedures employed by his deputies at the scene and at the jail. This Court finds that the establishment of policies regarding each of these activities were undertaken by the Sheriff in his capacity as an arm of the state. . . . While the decision in Manders does not conclusively compel this Court to find that Sheriff Peterson was acting as an arm of the state in implementing policies pertaining to roadblocks, canine units, searches, seizures, arrests, and detention, it appears to the Court that the policies at issue here flow from the powers granted to sheriffs under state law, rather than from any authority or control derived from Clinch County. Beginning with the policies that led to the initiation of the roadblock and concluding with the policies that resulted in Scruggs' continued detention following his arrest, Sheriff Peterson was acting as an arm of the state. Accordingly, as to any claims against Sheriff Peterson in his official capacity stemming from these activities, he would be entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity.").

Beaulah v. Muscogee County Sheriff's Deputies, 447 F.Supp.2d 1342, 1356 (M.D. Ga. 2006) ("Plaintiffs have pointed to no evidence suggesting that the sheriff's law enforcement power is controlled by the Columbus Consolidated Government − or any entity other than the State − simply because the sheriff entered into an agreement to participate in a multi-jurisdictional task force or because some of his deputies were assigned to work on that task force. Moreover, there is no evidence that, in joining Metro, the sheriff was delegated law enforcement powers or duties beyond those delegated to him by the State. Rather, the record establishes that Metro provides a framework for exercising the sheriff's State-delegated law enforcement powers and duties in cooperation with law enforcement officers from other jurisdictions, who are deputized as Muscogee County deputy sheriffs. For these reasons, there is nothing in the record to distinguish this case from Manders and Mladek. Based upon the rationale of Manders and Mladek, the Court finds the Muscogee County sheriff's deputies were wearing a 'state hat' when they stopped the Yukon and detained its occupants. Therefore, the sheriff and his deputies are considered to be arms of the state and are thus entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity in this case.").

Redding v. Tuggle, No. 1:05-cv-2899-WSD, 2006 WL 2166726, at 6-8 (N.D. Ga. July 31, 2006) ("In the instant case, Clayton County's § 1983 liability under federal law hinges on whether under state law Clayton County wields control over the sheriff and CCSO in their employment decision-making functions. . . The Court finds it does not. The Georgia Constitution has established the sheriff and CCSO as independent of the County itself. Structurally, the sheriff's office is not a division or subunit of the county in which it resides or of that county's governing body. . . .Although another provision, ' 36-1-21, allows sheriffs to place their employees under the county civil service system, such a placement does not vest the county with such control over the employment decisions of the sheriff's office as to incur municipal liability. . . . Indeed, civil service rules do not authorize Clayton County to hire, fire, or discipline employees. . . . Absent control over the employment decisions of the sheriff or CCSO, Clayton County cannot be said to be responsible for those decisions and actions and cannot be held liable under § 1983. Plaintiffs, nonetheless, argue that Clayton County is an indispensable party to this lawsuit, because a judgment against the sheriff would make the County financially liable. . . Georgia courts have concluded, however, that 'counties are not liable for, and not required to give sheriffs money to pay judgments against sheriffs in civil rights actions.' Grech, 335 F.3d at 1138 (citing Wayne County Bd. of Comm'rs v.. Warren, 223 S.E.2d 133, 134 (Ga.1976) . . . In Warren, the Georgia Supreme Court explained the county was not liable for the payment of a civil rights violation judgment against a county sheriff, because by state statute '[a] county is not liable to suit for any cause of action unless made so by statute.'. . The Georgia Supreme Court concluded that 'there is no duty of the county to furnish the sheriff with money to settle a civil rights judgment against him.' Id. Accordingly, Plaintiffs have failed to show that Clayton County is an indispensable party.").

Bell v. Houston County, Ga., No. 5:04-CV-390 (DF), 2006 WL 1804582, at *12 & n.14 (M.D. Ga. June 27, 2006) ("Consistent with the reasoning of Manders, the Court concludes that Sheriff Talton acts as an 'arm of the State' when he promulgates and administers the jail's intake procedures. . . . This Court has determined that, under the reasoning of Manders, Talton would be considered an 'arm of the State' for purposes of the Eleventh Amendment. Thus, Bell's official-capacity claim against Talton is in reality a claim against the State of Georgia, which, under the authority of Will, is not a 'person' within the meaning of § 1983 and is therefore not subject to suit for an alleged violation of the statute. . . . The Eleventh Circuit has never held that Georgia deputy sheriffs or jail officials are 'arms of the State' for Eleventh Amendment purposes, but the reasoning underlying Carr and Lancaster − that deputies and jailers should be viewed as such because the elected sheriff (himself an 'arm of the state") has the power to hire them, fire them, discipline them, and otherwise control their job duties − would appear to apply with equal force in Georgia, given the Eleventh Circuit's discussion in Manders about the relationship between Georgia sheriffs and their deputies.").

Dukes v. State of Georgia, No. Civ.A. 1:03-CV-0406J, 2006 WL 839403, at *18 (N.D. Ga. Mar. 30, 2006) ("Here, unlike the situation in Manders, the court finds that as to a sheriff's duty to provide medical necessities to inmates, the first three factors do not suggest that he is acting as an arm of the state. This court's application of all four factors used to determine if an entity is an 'arm of the state' for Eleventh Amendment purposes, coupled with the Manders court's strong reservations regarding medical necessity cases, lead this court to conclude that Defendant Yeager was not acting as an 'arm of the state' when caring for the medical needs of Plaintiff. Therefore, the sheriff is not entitled to sovereign immunity in his official capacity.")

Sanders v. Langley, No. 1:03-CV-1631-WSD, 2006 WL 826399, at *9, *10 (N.D. Ga. Mar. 29, 2006) ("The Individual Defendants argue dismissal of Plaintiff's claims against Defendant Langley in his official capacity is warranted because, as in Manders and Purcell, his claims are based on Defendant Langley's and his deputies' exercise of their law enforcement authority derived from the State of Georgia, not Carroll County. . . With respect to Plaintiff's allegations concerning overcrowding at the Carroll County Jail and his physical assault at the hands of other inmates, the Court agrees. This claim relates to conditions of confinement at the Carroll County Jail. In performing his duties related to conditions of confinement at the jail, Defendant Langley acted as an arm of the State, not of Carroll County. Accordingly, Plaintiff's claim against Defendant Langley in his official capacity regarding conditions of confinement at the jail are barred by the Eleventh Amendment. With respect to Plaintiff's claim for deliberate indifference to serious medical needs, however, the Court is not persuaded that Defendant Langley is entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . . [A]t least one court has addressed this precise issue under Manders and determined that a Georgia sheriff acts as an arm of the county in providing medical care to pre-trial detainees and training jail deputies with respect to medical care. [citing Green v. Glynn County]In view of the incomplete record before the Court regarding the four factors identified in Manders, and the existing case law adverse to the Individual Defendants' position, the Court cannot conclude that Eleventh Amendment immunity bars Plaintiff's Section 1983 claim against Defendant Langley for deliberate indifference to serious medical needs.").

Green v. Glynn County, No. Civ.A. CV201-52, 2006 WL 156873, at *3 (S.D. Ga. Jan. 19, 2006)("Glynn County contends that the relevant inquiry is control and urges the Court to extend the holdings in Grech and Manders to the administering of medical care to pretrial detainees. Were the court to adopt the position urged by Glynn County, however, a county sheriff would wear a 'state hat' when performing virtually all functions. Such a position is not supported by the Eleventh Circuit decisions. The Manders court specifically rejected this position in noting that it 'need not, and d[id] not, decide today whether Georgia sheriffs wear a Astate hat' for Eleventh Amendment purposes for all of the many specific duties assigned directly by the State.' . . . The Eleventh Circuit's en banc decision in Manders and the Supreme Court's related decision in McMillian make clear that the arm of the state determination must be made on a function-by-function basis. . . The relevant 'function' in the instant case is the duty to provide medical care to pretrial detainees and train jail personnel in that regard. Although the sheriff has a duty to provide an inmate with access to medical aid pursuant to O.C.G.A. § 42-4-4, ' O.C.G.A. § 42-5- 2(a) imposes the duty and the cost for medical care of inmates in the custody of a county upon the county.'. . Thus, as recognized by the Manders decision, the function in the instant case is distinguishable from the law enforcement functions at issue in Grech and Manders. In light of the county's statutory obligation with regard to providing medical care to inmates in the custody of the county, the Court concludes that, unlike the functions in Grech and Manders, Sheriff Bennett was acting on behalf of Glynn County with regard to providing medical care to pretrial detainees and training to jail personnel in regard to such care.").

Young v. Graham, No. CV 304-066, 2005 WL 2237634, at *7 (S.D. Ga. Aug. 11, 2005) (concluding Athat the Sheriff of Dodge County acts as an agent of the State in establishing and implementing policy and procedure respecting pretrial detention and conditions of confinement. Thus, Sheriff Lawton in his official capacity is entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity.").

2025 Emery Highway, L.L.C. v. Bibb County, Georgia, 377 F.Supp.2d 1310, 1360, 1361 (M.D. Ga. 2005) (In this suit, Sheriff Modena is named as a defendant solely in his official capacity; as such, all claims against Sheriff Modena are in actuality claims against the Bibb County Sheriff's Office. . . Such claims would not necessarily implicate Bibb County; in many instances, a county sheriff is deemed to actually be acting as an arm of the State. . . Moreover, in Manders, the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals held that a county sheriff is entitled to Eleventh Amendment sovereign immunity when sued in his official capacity for acting as an 'arm of the state.' . . Here, evidence before the Court suggests that Sheriff's Modena's decision to conduct the raid and warrantless search of Club Exotica's premises arose not out of his duty to enforce the County's ordinances but out of his power to enforce state law. . . All dancers arrested were in fact charged with violations of the Georgia criminal code; none were issued ordinance citations. . . . This indicates that Sheriff Modena may have been acting as an 'arm of the State' rather than an agent of the County at the time the raid and search were conducted and that he and the State would therefore be entitled to immunity for claims arising out this conduct.").

Bunyon v. Burke County, 306 F.Supp.2d 1240, 1251-55 (S.D. Ga. 2004) ("Even if Burke County may be directly liable for its practice of failing to bring detainees before a judicial officer within three days and of not accepting bail from detainees in violation of Bunyon's constitutional rights, it may be immune from suit under the Eleventh Amendment for Sheriff Coursey's and his deputies' actions. . . . In this case, the relevant inquiry is whether Sheriff Coursey and his deputies and jailers were acting as agents of the State in establishing and implementing bail and release procedures for inmates being held on charges pending in a municipality . . . .Whether a defendant is an 'arm of the state' is determined by examining his or her function in a particular context. Id. This entails analyzing four factors: 1) how state law defines the entity; 2) what degree of control the state maintains over the entity; 3) where the entity derives its funds; and 4) who is responsible for judgments against the entity. Id. (citations omitted). After a lengthy review of these factors, the Eleventh Circuit has recently held that Georgia sheriffs act as 'state officers' in a variety of functions. Id. In this case, the relevant inquiry is whether Sheriff Coursey and his deputies and jailers were acting as agents of the State in establishing and implementing bail and release procedures for inmates being held on charges pending in a municipality. . . . Based on the fact that Sheriff Coursey's authority over inmates such as Bunyon flow from the State and not Burke County, and those functions and duties pertain chiefly to affairs of the State, see Manders, 338 F.3d at 1319 n. 35, I conclude that this first factor weighs strongly in favor of Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . . Because of Georgia's direct control over Sheriff Coursey's duty to accept bail and bring a detainee before a judicial officer within seventy-two hours, and Burke County's total lack thereof, this control factor weighs heavily in favor of Eleventh Amendment immunity. . . . In this case, Bunyon was not a convicted state offender, so state funds would not have been directly involved. Instead, he was a pre-trial offender and detained pursuant to an agreement with the City of Midville whereby Midville paid Burke County a per diem rate for his incarceration. . . . As Burke County has failed to show whether it actually spent any of its own funds on Bunyon's incarceration, as mandated by the state, I am hesitant to find any state involvement as it pertains to this aspect of the Manders analysis. . . . The final factor in the Eleventh Amendment analysis is the source of funds that will pay any adverse judgment against Sheriff Coursey or his deputies in their official capacities. . . . Apparently, Sheriff Coursey would have to pay any adverse judgment out of the sheriff's office budget, and as a result, both county and state funds would be implicated by an adverse judgment. Sheriff Coursey would need an increased budget from the county for his office and an increased daily per diem rate for convicted detainees held in the Burke County Jail from Georgia. . . When faced with this dual county/state obligation, the Eleventh Circuit noted that the State's sovereignty and integrity are affected when lawsuits interfere with a state function, and therefore, 'at a minimum, the liability-for-adverse-judgment factor does not defeat [Sheriff Coursey's] immunity claim.'. . . Although not a bright line decision, weighing all of the factors discussed above, I find that Sheriff Coursey is entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. His authority over Bunyon flowed directly from the state, his functions and duties pertained chiefly to affairs of the state, and the state directly controlled his duty to accept bail and release prisoners within seventy-two hours of arrest. That the state may not have provided funds for Bunyon's incarceration and may not provide much money for a judgment against him does not preclude this finding. Sheriff Coursey, in his official capacity, was acting as an arm of the state in establishing bail and release policies at the jail, and is therefore entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. Like Sheriff Coursey, his deputies are also entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. Although Manders involved only the immunity of the Sheriff in his official capacity, its factors are similarly applicable to deputy sheriffs as well. . . . Based upon the foregoing, Sheriff Coursey and his deputies are entitled to Eleventh Amendment immunity. Even if Burke County is directly liable for its unconstitutional policy and practice of denying bail and release to detainees, it is not liable for any constitutional violations related to these policies committed by Sheriff Coursey and the other Burke County defendants.")

Bunyon v. Burke County, 285 F.Supp.2d 1310, 1328, 1329 & n.12 (S.D. Ga. 2003) ("Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 17 states, in pertinent part, the following: (b) Capacity to Sue or Be Sued. The capacity of an individual, other than one acting in a representative capacity, to sue or be sued should be determined by the law of the individual's domicile. The capacity of a corporation to sue or be sued shall be determined by the law under which it was organized. In all other cases capacity to sue or be sued shall be determined by the law of the state in which the district court is held.... Fed.R.Civ.P. 17(b). In Georgia Insurers Insolvency Pool v. Elbert County, 368 S.E.2d 500 (Ga.1988), the Georgia Supreme Court set forth the following explanation of which entities could sue and be sued in Georgia courts: '[T]his court [has] said, in every suit there must be a legal entity as the real plaintiff and the real defendant. This state recognizes only three classes as legal entities, namely: (1) natural persons; (2) an artificial person (a corporation); and (3) such quasi-artificial persons as the law recognizes as being capable to sue.' Georgia Insurers Insolvency Pool, 368 S.E.2d at 502 (quoting Cravey v. Southeastern Underwriters Ass'n, 105 S.E.2d 497, 500 (Ga.1958)). The Eleventh Circuit has advised that '[s]heriff's departments and police departments are not usually considered legal entities subject to suit....' Dean v. Barber, 951 F.2d 1210, 1214 (11th Cir.1992). In Shelby v. City of Atlanta, the Northern District of Georgia stated that a claim could not be brought against a police department: Plaintiff cannot state a claim against the City of Atlanta Police Department because the Department is not a proper party defendant. The Department is an integral part of the City of Atlanta government and is merely the vehicle through which the City government fulfills its policing functions. For this reason, the Department is not an entity subject to suit and plaintiff's claim against it is hereby dismissed. . .Based upon Georgia law and cases from this circuit, the Court can find no basis for allowing Plaintiff to sue the Midville Police Department. Therefore, it is DISMISSED. . . . . The Court dismissed the Burke County Sheriff's Department on June 6, 2002 because it is not a legal entity amenable to suit.").

Mladek v. Day, 293 F.Supp.2d 1297, 1304 (M.D. Ga. 2003) ("The Eleventh Circuit has recently held in a divided decision that Georgia sheriffs and their deputies are entitled to official immunity under the Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution for claims arising from their use of 'force policies' in the operation of county jails. Manders v. Lee, 338 F.3d 1304 (11th Cir.2003). The Eleventh Circuit's ruling, however, is clearly not limited to the operation of jails. Based upon an exhaustive review of Georgia law, the Eleventh Circuit found that Georgia sheriffs act as 'state officers' in a variety of functions and when they 'wear these state hats,' they are entitled to official immunity. The Eleventh Circuit explained that the proper inquiry is whether the Sheriff (or his deputy) acted for the state in the particular function at issue in the case. Id. at 1308-09. Although the precise function at issue in Manders was the implementation of a force policy in the operation of a county jail, the Eleventh Circuit made it clear that it found no distinction between that function and the law enforcement function performed by sheriffs when they arrest citizens for violations of the law. Id. at 1310, 1313. Therefore, the Court finds in this case that, based upon the rationale of Manders, Defendant Day was wearing a 'state hat' at the time of Mr. Mladek's arrest and subsequent detention. The Court further finds that, insofar as Plaintiffs allege that Sheriff Yarbrough is liable for the manner in which Mr. Mladek was treated by Deputy Day, Sheriff Yarbrough was likewise wearing a 'state hat.' Therefore, both Day and Yarbrough are entitled to official immunity under the Eleventh Amendment for any claims brought against them in their official capacity. Moreover, the Court finds that Walton County is likewise entitled to such immunity based upon the rationale expressed in Manders. 338 F.3d at 1308-09. Accordingly, Defendant Walton County's motion to dismiss Plaintiff Michael Mladek's Fourth Amendment claim against it is granted. Plaintiff Michael Mladek's Fourth Amendment claims against Deputy Day and Sheriff Yarbrough in their official capacities are likewise dismissed.").

Neville v. Classic Gardens, 141 F. Supp.2d 1377, 1382 (S.D. Ga. 2001) ("Engaging in a prosecutorial function is the act of a State, not a county, official. . . . Accordingly, Neville's claims against Higgins in her official capacity, and thus, the county, face dismissal.").

Frazier v. Smith, 12 F. Supp.2d 1362, 1369 (S.D. Ga. 1998) ("Under Georgia law, sheriffs are vested with ultimate authority in employment decisions. . . . There is no evidence before the Court to support the conclusion that Sheriff Smith is an agent of Camden County, or that the County ultimately is liable for his misconduct. Construing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the actions brought against Sheriff Smith, in his official capacity, and the Camden County Board of Commissioners are not redundant, and both should proceed.").

IV. GOVERNMENT LIABILITY FOR VIOLATIONS OF DUE PROCESS: THE IMPACT OF DESHANEY ON SUBSTANTIVE DUE PROCESS CLAIMS AND ZINERMON ON PROCEDURAL DUE PROCESS CLAIMS

The § 1983 remedy is available, whether against an individual or the governmental entity, only when a person acting under color of state law causes another person to be deprived of a federal right secured by the Constitution or laws of the United States. Very often, the most difficult part of a plaintiff's case will be pleading and proving the requisite underlying constitutional violation.

This section surveys two areas where plaintiffs' underlying constitutional claims are based on violations of substantive or procedural due process, where assertions of government liability are common and where the Supreme Court has been active in recent years in defining the content and scope of the underlying right.

A. Liability Based on Failure to Provide Protective Services

While it is generally"s settled that there is no constitutional duty on the part of the state to protect members of the public at large from crime, see Martinez v. California, 444 U.S. 277, 284-85 (1980), there has been considerable disagreement among the lower federal courts as to whether and when a duty to protect may arise by virtue of a "special relationship," outside of the custodial context, between the state and a particular individual or group.

1. DeShaney v. Winnebago County Dept. of Social Services

In DeShaney v. Winnebago County Dept. of Social Services, 489 U.S. 189, 109 S. Ct. 998 (1989), a majority of the Supreme Court held that nothing in the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment creates an affirmative duty on the part of the state to "protect the life liberty, and property of its citizens against invasion by private actors." 109 S. Ct. at 1003. The Court concluded that "[a]s a general matter,... a State's failure to protect an individual against private violence simply does not constitute a violation of the Due Process Clause." Id. at 1004. See also Vielma v. Gruler, No. 18-15162, 2020 WL 1672778, at *4 (11th Cir. Apr. 6, 2020) (not reported) ("Here, Plaintiffs claim that the injured and murdered victims' Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process rights were violated when, upon hearing the gunshots, Officer Gruler failed to immediately reenter the club to attempt to disarm or shoot Mateen. . . . As the district court correctly observed, Plaintiff's entire claim against Officer Gruler boils down to an argument that the Due Process Clause imposes an affirmative duty on police officers to protect individuals from private acts of violence. But that is precisely the argument that the Supreme Court rejected in DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services, which held that, outside the custodial context, . . . 'a State's failure to protect an individual against private violence simply does not constitute a violation of the Due Process Clause.'"); Bennett, ex rel. Irvine v. City of Philadelphia, 499 F.3d 281, 289, 290 (3rd Cir. 2007) ("If a municipality, state or other public body is to be liable under the Constitution for harm caused by private parties to persons not in custody, the liability would be unlimited. There is no legal doctrine that supports imposition of such liability. Without legislative activity, we are not prepared to hold that a city that fails to respond promptly to a 911 call must pay for the harm that befalls the caller as a result of the failure. The fact is that most 911 calls are answered, that the police use their best efforts in many cases, and that they prevent egregious harm. We have less personal experience with DHS but are willing to assume, for this purpose, that this is also true of DHS social workers, notwithstanding the well-publicized cases of failures in that connection. However, it is not the role of the courts, certainly not the federal courts, to rectify the failures that do happen. That is the responsibility of the citizens of the body politic, who elect the leaders of the executive branch of the respective city, state or municipality. If the public raises its voice and demands accountability, and is willing to use the ballot to support those demands, then change and improvement can and will occur. Unfortunately, it will be too late for Porchia Bennett."); Aracena v. Gruler, No. 618CV932ORL40KRS, 2018 WL 5961040, at *5 (M.D. Fla. Nov. 14, 2018) ("[I]t is clear that Count I against Officer Gruler cannot survive. Since this entire circumstance begins and ends with a private actor, Officer Gruler cannot be sued for violating Plaintiff's due process rights. Indeed, Count I boils down to a claim that Gruler initially absconded and then failed to protect Plaintiff after the attack began. . . . Officer Gruler's failure to protect Plaintiff 'against private violence simply does not constitute a violation of the Due Process Clause.'. . The Pulse shooting was a spontaneous act of violence carried out by 'a thug with no regard for human life.'. . With this, Plaintiff's substantive due process claims fail.")

Chief Justice Rehnquist, writing for the majority in DeShaney, expressly rejected the argument "that once the State learns that a third party poses a special danger to an identified victim, and indicates its willingness to protect the victim against that danger, a 'special relationship' arises between State and victim, giving rise to an affirmative duty, enforceable through the Due Process Clause, to render adequate protection." 109 S.Ct. at 1004 n.4.

DeShaney may be read narrowly to limit any affirmative duty to protect to situations in which "the State takes a person into its custody and holds him there against his will . . . . [t]he affirmative duty to protect aris[ing] not from the State's knowledge of the individual's predicament or from its expressions of intent to help him, but from the limitation which it has imposed on his freedom to act on his own behalf." Id. at 1005. See,e.g., Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307 (1982) (substantive due process component of Fourteenth Amendment Due Process Clause imposes duty on state to provide for safety and medical needs of involuntarily committed mental patients); Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97 (1976) (state has constitutional duty to provide adequate medical care to incarcerated prisoners). See also Petersen v. Johnson, 57 F.4th 225, 236 (5th Cir. 2023) ("Petersen committed suicide two days after he was released from custody. Because he was no longer in the state's custody, the 'special relationship' had ended, and the Wellpath Defendants owed him no duty of care. [citing Walton, Coscia, and Collignon] Consequently, the Plaintiffs cannot state a plausible claim under § 1983, and their §§ 1983 and 1985 claims against the Wellpath Defendants were properly dismissed."); Coscia v. Town of Pembroke, Mass., 659 F.3d 37, 39, 40 (1st Cir. 2011) ("Like the district judge, we have been apprised of no case recognizing due process liability for suicide based on police conduct except for death during custody, and the defendants have cited one case comparable to this one that found no liability for the reason that the suicide occurred after release. The district court nonetheless decided that a liability claim had been pleaded adequately despite the non-custodial death because a causal relationship (in fact and law) had been plausibly stated between the failure to furnish medical care during the temporary custody and the self-destructive act the next morning. . . . We agree with the district judge that the pleadings raise no claim that the treatment by the police gave rise to a suicidal inclination on the decedent's part when he would otherwise have had none, and nothing in the complaint suggests even in a conclusory way that his self-destructive tendency was intensified by state action, or that anything done or omitted by the police weakened any instinct for self-preservation and made him more dangerous to himself. The causation alleged is not that the absence of medical attention during custody was in any way creative of suicidal vulnerability by working a change in him for the worse, but consists rather of a failure to prevent the consequence of his preexisting suicidal disposition, a failure to intervene in a way that would change him, or his circumstances, for the better in the period after his release. We think this claim of causation leads to a liability beyond what due process imposes, for although the existing law does recognize a custodial duty to take some preventive action, its rationale does not extend official protective responsibility as far as the plaintiff would take it. . . . With the restoration of the detainee's liberty, then, the legal chain of preventive (as distinct from state-created) causation must be taken to have ended. We accordingly hold that in the absence of a risk of harm created or intensified by state action there is no due process liability for harm suffered by a prior detainee after release from custody in circumstances that do not effectively extend any state impediment to exercising self-help or to receiving whatever aid by others may normally be available."); Carver v. City of Cincinnati, 474 F.3d 283, 286 (6th Cir. 2007) ("The mere fact that the police exercise control over an environment is alone insufficient to demonstrate that a person is seized. . . . Here, there was no physical restraint over Carver by the officers, nor did the officers direct any actions toward him. Carver's incapacity, like that of the plaintiff in Jackson, was self-induced. The officers did not place a restraint on Carver's personal liberty when they secured the area to conduct an investigation into the death of Smith-Sandusky. Perhaps the officers had probable cause to restrain Carver if they had wanted, but that is not what happened. The custody exception is inapplicable because the officers never restrained Carver's personal liberty in any fashion."); Jackson v. Schultz, 429 F.3d 586, 590, 591 (6th Cir. 2005) ("It is not a constitutional violation for a state actor to render incompetent medical assistance or fail to rescue those in need. . . . The 'custody exception' does not apply because the decedent was never in custody. The 'custody exception' triggers a constitutional duty to provide adequate medical care to incarcerated prisoners, those involuntarily committed to mental institutions, foster children, pre-trial detainees, and those under 'other similar restraint of personal liberty.'. . . The overarching prerequisite for custody is an affirmative act by the state that restrains the ability of an individual to act on his own behalf.. . The district court improperly held that moving an unconscious patient into an ambulance is custody. This court's precedent has made clear that DeShaney's concept of custody does not extend this far. This court has never held that one merely placed in an ambulance is in custody. . . . Decedent's liberty was 'constrained' by his incapacity, and his incapacity was in no way caused by the defendants. In sum, no set of facts consistent with the allegations shows that the EMTs did anything to restrain the decedent's liberty. Thus, no set of facts consistent with the allegations supports a finding that the EMTs took decedent into custody. Based on the facts alleged, there is no constitutional violation under the custody exception."); Hamilton v. Cannon, 80 F.3d 1525, 1531 n.5 (11th Cir. 1996) ("This Court and others have extended the state custody exception beyond actual incarceration or involuntary institutionalization only when there is some kind of physical restraint by the state that triggers an affirmative constitutional duty of care and protection."); Smith v. Myers, No. 94-3605, 1995 WL 521158, *5 (6th Cir. Sept. 1, 1995) (unpublished) ("[T]his Circuit has held that the state's duty to protect any particular citizen arises only where a 'special relationship' exists between the state and that citizen. [cites omitted] Thus far, we have determined that a 'special relationship' exists only where the state legally restricts the liberty of a person, such as when the state incarcerates someone or involuntary commits a person to a healthcare facility."); Foy v. City of Berea, 58 F.3d 227, 231 (6th Cir. 1995) ("When the state limits an individual's ability to care for himself by, for example, incarceration in a prison or involuntary confinement in a mental hospital, the Constitution does impose an affirmative duty of care and protection. There is no such affirmative duty, however, absent such restraint."); Garrett v. Gilless, 47 F.3d 1168 (Table), 1995 WL 16810, *1 (6th Cir. Jan. 17, 1995) (holding defendants had no duty to provide police protection to victim of domestic violence and her children in absence of special relationship); Pinder v. Johnson, 54 F.3d 1169, 1175 (4th Cir. 1995) (en banc) ("Some sort of confinement of the injured party − incarceration, institutionalization, or the like − is needed to trigger the affirmative duty . . . This Court has consistently read DeShaney to require a custodial context before any affirmative duty can arise under the Due Process Clause."); Lovins v. Lee, 53 F.3d 1208, 1210 (11th Cir. 1995) ("Attempting to escape the clear language of DeShaney, plaintiff argues that this case fits within the "special relationship" exception to the general rule that the Due Process Clause does not entitle a citizen to be protected from violence at the hands of non-governmental actors. Unfortunately for plaintiff, that exception is limited to circumstances in which there is a special relationship between the government and the victim of violence or mistreatment, a circumstance that is lacking in the present case. Examples of special relationship cases include those involving incarcerated prisoners and involuntarily committed mental patients."); Souza v. Pina, 53 F.3d 423, 426 (1st Cir. 1995) ("Absent the kind of custodial relationship apparently contemplated by the Court [in DeShaney], the Due Process Clause does not require the state to protect citizens from 'private violence' in whatever form, including suicide."); Ying Jing Gan v. City of New York, 996 F.2d 522, 534-35 (2d Cir. 1993) (complainant who agreed to identify suspects was owed no duty of protection by City); Nobles v. Brown, 980 F.2d 730 (6th Cir. 1992) (Table) ("[T]he people of Michigan are free to create a system under which the state and its officials would be subjected to liability for failure to accord prison guards reasonable protection against harms inflicted by dangerous prisoners. This court, however, is not free to create such a system by turning the Due Process Clause into a Michigan Tort Claims Act."); Salazar v. City of Chicago, 940 F.2d 233, 237 (7th Cir. 1991) (government has no constitutional duty to provide competent rescue services to people not in its custody); Piechowicz v. U.S., 885 F.2d 1207, 1215 (4th Cir. 1989) (federal witnesses murdered by hired killer were owed no duty of protection under Fifth Amendment substantive due process where witnesses were not "in custody" of United States); de Jesus Benavides v. Santos, 883 F.2d 385, 388 (5th Cir. 1989) (affirmative duty to protect a prisoner arises from State's restraint on individual's liberty; prison guard injured by prisoner is owed no constitutional duty by the State to protection from inmates' violence); Beltran v. City of El Paso, 367 F.3d 299, 307 (5th Cir.2004) ("Beltran argues that by encouraging Sonye to stay in the bathroom and telling her that the police were on the way, Amador became the custodian of Sonye's safety. This argument falls outside of the special relationships described by the Supreme Court, which are limited to cases concerning 'incarceration, institutionalization, or other similar restraint of personal liberty.'. . In this case, Amador offered advice to Sonye, but she did not affirmatively place Sonye in custody by restraining her in the bathroom."); Clarke v. Sweeney, 312 F.Supp.2d 277, 296 (D. Conn. 2004) ("As with the state created danger exception to DeShaney, the contours of the special relationship exception are not well defined. However, it would not seem to apply when a fact witness to a crime that has already been committed voluntarily approaches the police and makes a statement, and then a subpoena is issued for that witness-even if the police provide the witness with visible police protection that is later withdrawn. Such a circumstance does not constitute a situation where the 'state restrains an individual's freedom to act to protect himself or herself through a restraint on that individual's personal liberty.' Thus, even looking at the facts in a light most favorable to Clarke, the special relationship exception to DeShaney is also inapplicable here."); Miller v. Hubbard, No. NA 022-133-C H/H, 2004 WL 392957, at *5 (S.D. Ind. Feb. 17, 2004) ("In the briefing on the court's order to show cause on the claims against the shooting victim − Officer Dexter − and in the briefing on this summary judgment motion, plaintiff has not yet identified any case law providing support for finding either

(1) that jail officials owe a constitutional duty to inmates to prevent them from escaping, or (2) that jail officials have a constitutional duty to prevent escaped prisoners from committing suicide. In general, there is no constitutional duty on the part of the state to protect someone from private violence. . . The Supreme Court in DeShaney recognized an exception to this general rule in situations where the state has custody or is 'restraining the individual's freedom to act on his own behalf,' which can trigger a duty to provide for the individual's safety. . But in this case, Miller did not die while he was in custody. He shot himself after shooting Officer Dexter and escaping from custody. No state officials restrained his individual freedom to act when he pulled the trigger."); Ramirez v. City of Chicago, 82 F. Supp.2d 836, 839 (N.D. Ill. 1999) ("The paramedics cite DeShaney . . . for the proposition that there is no federal constitutional duty of care where the plaintiff is not in custody or control of the state actor. The paramedics argue that because Mr. Ramirez was not in their custody but that of the Chicago Police Department, they did not 'suddenly acquire a duty to treat a man who was not in their custody,' an argument of breathtaking cynicism. I agree with the plaintiffs, however, that the paramedics, public employees who were dispatched specifically to aid Mr. Ramirez, 'suddenly acquired' a constitutional obligation to aid him when the police defendants, also public employees, took him into custody on behalf of the City of Chicago, and he was injured in the process. Chicago Fire Department paramedics have a duty to aid persons who are injured while in custody of the Chicago Police, or indeed, the Cook County Sheriff or the Illinois State Police. State action cannot be diluted by being dispersed over several departments.").

See also Lipscomb v. Simmons, 962 F.2d 1374, 1379 (9th Cir. 1992) (en banc) ("In our view, custody cases such as DeShaney and Youngberg stand for the proposition that the government has an affirmative obligation to facilitate the exercise of constitutional rights by those in its custody only when the circumstances of the custodial relationship directly prevent individual exercise of those rights."); Harris v. District of Columbia, 932 F.2d 10 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (suggesting that plaintiff who died of drug overdose while in police custody was owed no constitutional duty by police to refrain from deliberate indifference to his medical needs, where plaintiff "had not been formally committed, either by conviction, involuntary commitment, or arrest, to the charge of the District. . . .").

In Shaw by Strain v. Strackhouse, 920 F.2d 1135 (3d Cir. 1990), a profoundly retarded resident of a state mental institution, brought a § 1983 action against state employees, asserting a failure to protect him from abuse and sexual assault. On appeals from a grant of summary judgment in favor of defendants, the Third Circuit addressed the standard of care owed by state officials to those in their custody, and determined that the standard might vary depending upon the nature of the physical custody involved. Id. at 1144.

The court concluded that while a deliberate indifference standard governed the liability of the nonprofessional employee-defendants, "the Youngberg professional judgment standard should have been applied to the primary care professionals, supervisors and administrators named as defendants." Id. at 1139.

In the court's opinion, professional judgment is a relatively deferential standard which, like recklessness and gross negligence, would fall somewhere between simple negligence and intentional misconduct. Id. at 1146. The plaintiff's burden is somewhat greater when trying to establish deliberate indifference than when trying to establish a failure to exercise professional judgment. Id. at 1150. But see Collignon v. Milwaukee County, 163 F.3d 982, 988-89 (7th Cir. 1998) (comparing deliberate indifference and professional judgment standards, concluding that "[i]n the context of a claim for inadequate medical care, the professional judgment standard requires essentially the same analysis as the Eighth Amendment standard."). See also Mitchell v. Kallas, 895 F.3d 492, 501 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Dr. Kallas claimed that DOC had an unwritten rule that an inmate may start hormone therapy only if she has six months left on her sentence, and he denied her request on that basis. He later explained in an affidavit that this period was intended to allow time to figure out the proper hormone dosage while monitoring both physical and psychological side effects. The first problem is that this requirement appears nowhere in DOC's written policy on gender dysphoria. This conspicuous absence from DOC's freshly-minted policy raises the factual question whether DOC actually had such a practice. Moreover, the question remains whether Dr. Kallas and the Committee exercised medical judgment in applying the policy to Mitchell's request. Neither professional disagreement nor medical malpractice constitutes deliberate indifference. . . Thus, if the trier of fact finds that there was such a policy and that Dr. Kallas and the Committee had a medical basis for deciding not to start Mitchell's hormone treatments, then Dr. Kallas will not be liable. If the factfinder alternatively concludes that there was no such policy, or that Dr. Kallas failed to assess whether application of the policy was appropriate in Mitchell's case, then it would follow that he did not exercise his medical judgment and was deliberately indifferent. 'The denial of hormone therapy based on a blanket rule, rather than an individualized medical determination, constitutes deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth Amendment.'"); Battista v. Clarke, 645 F.3d 449, 453-55 (1st Cir. 2011) ("Both the Farmer and Youngberg tests leave ample room for professional judgment, constraints presented by the institutional setting, and the need to give latitude to administrators who have to make difficult trade-offs as to risks and resources. . . . It has been fifteen years since Battista first asked for treatment, and for ten years, health professionals have been recommending hormone therapy as a necessary part of the treatment. When during the delay Battista sought to mutilate herself, the Department could be said to have known that Battista was in 'substantial risk of serious harm.'. . But the question remains whether the withholding of hormone therapy was 'wanton' or outside the bounds of 'reasonable professional judgement.' Medical 'need' in real life is an elastic term: security considerations also matter at prisons or civil counterparts, and administrators have to balance conflicting demands. The known risk of harm is not conclusive: so long as the balancing judgments are within the realm of reason and made in good faith, the officials' actions are not 'deliberate indifference,'. . .or beyond 'reasonable professional' limits. . . . Here, despite much early resistance, . . . hormone therapy for GID is now provided in some cases in Massachusetts prisons. The defendants point to this to establish their good faith; Battista, to show that providing her the therapy would be consistent with security needs. Both positions are overstated. Hormone therapy has not been welcomed by the Department, but both the Treatment Center's internal environment and Battista herself arguably presented added risks. . . .In the end, there is enough in this record to support the district court's conclusion that 'deliberate indifference' has been established − or an unreasonable professional judgment exercised − even though it does not rest on any established sinister motive or 'purpose' to do harm. Rather, the Department's action is undercut by a composite of delays, poor explanations, missteps, changes in position and rigidities − common enough in bureaucratic regimes but here taken to an extreme. This, at least, is how the district court saw it, and it had a reasonable basis for that judgment.).

Compare Doe 4 by and through Lopez v. Shenandoah Valley Juvenile Center Comm'n, 985 F.3d 327, 339-44 (4th Cir. 2020) ("Appellants urge us to apply Youngberg's standard of professional judgment. In Youngberg, the Supreme Court considered the Fourteenth Amendment protections guaranteed to a mentally disabled person involuntarily committed to a state institution. The plaintiff claimed that the institution failed to provide safe conditions of confinement, unduly restricted his physical freedom, and failed to adequately train him in necessary skills. . . Youngberg held that 'liability may be imposed only when the decision by the professional' represents a 'substantial departure from accepted professional judgment.'. . In Patten, this Court applied the Youngberg standard to an involuntarily committed psychiatric patient's claim of inadequate medical care. We concluded that there are 'sufficient differences' between 'pre-trial detainees' and 'involuntarily committed psychiatric patients' to justify the application of Youngberg's professional judgment standard for the latter. [court sets out differences] Applying the same analysis, we hold that the Youngberg standard governs this case. The statutory and regulatory scheme governing unaccompanied children expressly states that these children are held to give them care. . . .The Commission argues that this Court should (as the trial court did) apply the standard of deliberate indifference used when considering claims of inadequate medical care raised by pretrial detainees. . . Under this standard, a plaintiff must prove: (1) that the detainee had an objectively serious medical need; and (2) that the official subjectively knew of the need and disregarded it. . . The Commission further argues that Patten's reasoning counsels against applying Youngberg here. First, the Commission claims that children are placed in SVJC primarily for security reasons, not for treatment. . . But this argument presents a false binary. In Youngberg, the plaintiff was likewise institutionalized because his mother could not 'control his violence.'. . Yet, the need to institutionalize the plaintiff for security reasons did not undermine the fact that he also needed to be committed for treatment. The Supreme Court explained that 'the purpose of respondent's commitment was to provide reasonable care and safety'—making plain that the two purposes are not mutually exclusive. . . . Next, the Commission argues that Youngberg does not apply because SVJC is a juvenile detention center, not a hospital or therapeutic setting. . . But the nature of the facility is not dispositive. In Matherly v. Andrews, we applied the Youngberg standard to a person involuntarily committed to a prison for a program designed to treat his dangerousness as a sexual offender. . . The nature of the facility is secondary to the reason a person is confined in it. . . . Finally, the Commission asks this Court to follow other circuits that have treated immigrant detainees as equivalent to pretrial detainees, applying the deliberate indifference standard. . . But those cases all dealt with adults detained for enforcement proceedings such as removal. . . None dealt with unaccompanied immigrant children, whom the Government holds for the purpose of providing care. . . Notably, neither the Commission nor the district court grapple with the fact that this case is about children. The Supreme Court has long recognized that children are psychologically and developmentally different from adults, so much so that in the context of sentencing, 'children are constitutionally different.'. . . Accordingly, we hold that a facility caring for an unaccompanied child fails to provide a constitutionally adequate level of mental health care if it substantially departs from accepted professional standards. To be clear, this standard requires more than negligence. . . . The evidence must show 'such a substantial departure from accepted professional judgment, practice, or standards as to demonstrate that the person responsible actually did not base the decision on such a judgment.'. . Under this standard, courts do not determine the 'correct' or 'most appropriate' medical decision. . . 'Instead, the proper inquiry is whether the decision was so completely out of professional bounds as to make it explicable only as an arbitrary, nonprofessional one.'. . By applying this standard, a court 'defers to the necessarily subjective aspects of the decisional process of institutional medical professionals and accords those decisions the presumption of validity due them.'. . Nonetheless, a decision earns this deference only if it reflects an actual exercise of medical judgment. . . We have not yet explained the precise difference between the standards of professional judgment and deliberate indifference. . . But one difference between the two standards is that Youngberg does not require proof of subjective intent. . . Thus, the standard of professional judgment presents a lower standard of culpability compared to the Eighth Amendment standard for deliberate indifference. . . . To apply Youngberg to a claim of inadequate medical care, then, a court must do more than determine that some treatment has been provided—it must determine whether the treatment provided is adequate to address a person's needs under a relevant standard of professional judgment.") with Doe 4 by and through Lopez v. Shenandoah Valley Juvenile Center Comm'n, 985 F.3d 327, 347-48, 351-52 (4th Cir. 2020) (Wilkinson, J., dissenting) ("We judges should stick to what we are good at: applying precedent, interpreting statutes, and exercising traditional equitable powers. Today's case features an invitation to try our hand at institutional governance and to do something we are utterly unqualified to do—determine what constitutes acceptable mental health care. I respect the majority's sincere and humane concerns. But it is staring at a host of unintended consequences. And under what rock is hidden its holding's relationship to law, I have no idea. . . . By adopting the more intrusive professional judgment standard, the majority also creates a circuit split. See A.M. v. Luzerne Cty. Med. Ctr., 372 F.3d 572, 579 (3d Cir. 2004). After discussing the realities of the institutional context and recognizing the need for deference, the Third Circuit adopted a deliberate indifference standard for claims by juvenile detainees. . . Under this standard, only reckless disregard of a serious medical need is actionable. . . . Other courts have likewise concluded that the deliberate indifference test governs claims of inadequate medical care by juveniles detained for non-rehabilitative purposes. The majority begrudgingly acknowledges that the weight of out-of-circuit authority is against it, failing to cite a single case finding the professional judgment standard applicable in a similar case. . . For example, recognizing that substantive due process doctrine has traditionally been cabined to bar only behavior that 'shocks the conscience,' the Third Circuit has adopted the deliberate indifference test to evaluate claims by juvenile detainees. . . By concluding otherwise the majority, as noted, needlessly creates a circuit split.")

See also Davis v. Wessel, 792 F.3d 793, 797-802 (7th Cir. 2015) ("Wessel and Lay argue that they are entitled to a new trial because the district court erroneously instructed the jury on the elements necessary for Davis to prevail, and this error caused them prejudice. They contend that the court's instructions allowed the jury to hold them liable without any finding of intent. Before the district court, they primarily advocated for the intent standard governing Eighth Amendment claims, and they proposed jury instructions stating that liability depended on the jury finding that Wessel and Lay acted 'maliciously and sadistically' to harm Davis. . . Davis objected to their proposed instructions on the basis that such intent was not required to prove his claims, and the district court agreed with Davis.). . . . We think it should have been adequately clear to Wessel and Lay at trial that they were defending against due process claims of 'freedom from unreasonable restraints,' as recognized by Youngberg, 457 U.S. at 321. . . .In Davis's case, if the jury believed that the guards simply did not consider the issue of whether to remove Davis's hand restraints before he used the restroom, then the guards cannot be liable under the Due Process Clause. For example, the jury may have disbelieved Davis's uncorroborated testimony that he requested that the restraints be removed while he was in the courtroom and just prior to using the restroom. Or the jury may have believed the guards' testimony indicating that they would never laugh at a detainee using the restroom and they thought a detainee such as Davis could successfully navigate the restroom process with the restraints attached. In either case, the jury may have nonetheless awarded compensatory damages based upon the district court's instruction because they thought making a relatively old, frail, and diminutive detainee such as Davis use the restroom in hand restraints 'was excessive in relation to [legitimate security] purposes.' Indeed, this scenario would explain the jury's decision to award a relatively small amount of compensatory damages while declining to award any punitive damages; the latter decision indicates that the jury did not find that either guard's conduct was, in the words of the punitive damages instruction, 'malicious or in reckless disregard of Plaintiff's rights.' In short, the jury may well have found Wessel and Lay liable for being negligent or making an accidental mistake, and that is constitutionally insufficient. . . We find that the district court's elements instruction failed to properly state the law. No other instruction clarified the issue or otherwise rectified the error. And as we have discussed, Wessel and Lay were prejudiced because the jury was likely to have been misled or confused. A new trial is required. . . In an effort to salvage the verdict, Davis argues that Wessel and Lay have failed to preserve any argument regarding any intent standard other than the Eighth Amendment's 'malicious and sadistic' standard. . . . Throughout the case (including on appeal), Wessel and Lay argued that the Eighth Amendment's 'malicious and sadistic' intent standard should apply. However, they also argued to the district court during the instructions conference, 'in any event, both the Seventh Circuit and U.S. Supreme Court ha [ve] consistently required mens rea of some sort.' In their motion for new trial, they said the district court's instructions 'allowed the jury to return a verdict for Plaintiff without a finding of mens rea.' In both instances, they called the district court's attention to the Supreme Court's decision in Lewis. It is clear that Wessel and Lay consistently advocated for some level of intent to be shown, which is the same argument raised on appeal. We find that Wessel and Lay adequately preserved their objections regarding the lack of any intent requirement in the district court's jury instructions."); Lanman v. Hinson, 529 F.3d 673, 681, 682, 684 (6th Cir. 2008) ("The Fourth Amendment is inapplicable here because defendants did not 'seize' Lanman when they bodily restrained him. By requesting voluntary admission to Kalamazoo Psychiatric Hospital, Lanman consented to defendants providing him medical treatment. Defendants physically restrained Lanman to prevent him from harming himself or others and to administer medication to calm him down. . . . We find that the appropriate source for Lanman's excessive force claim is the Fourteenth Amendment, which provides him, as a patient of a state care institution, with the constitutional right recognized in Youngberg to freedom from undue bodily restraint in the course of his treatment. Basing this right in substantive due process, rather than the Fourth Amendment, allows for balancing the individual's liberty interest against the State's asserted reasons for restraining the individual's liberty while in its care. It also gives proper deference to the decisions of institutional professionals concerning medical treatment. . . . While the actions of professional decisionmakers, defined as 'person[s] competent, whether by education training or experience, to make the particular decision at issue,' Youngberg, 457 U.S. at 323 n. 30, are held to this professional judgment standard, the defendant resident care aides are non-professional employees and are held only to a deliberate indifference standard."); Estate of Porter by Nelson v. State of Illinois, 36 F.3d 684, 688 (7th Cir. 1994) ("In determining whether an involuntarily committed patient's right to reasonable safety has been violated, courts may only 'make certain that professional judgment in fact was exercised.'"); Yvonne L. v. New Mexico Department of Human Services, 959 F.2d 883, 893-94 (10th Cir. 1992) (adopting professional judgment standard, rather than deliberate indifference, in foster care setting); Clark v. Donahue, 885 F. Supp. 1164, 1168 (S.D. Ind. 1995) (finding the reasoning of Shaw by Strain to be persuasive, holding nonprofessional employees subject to deliberate indifference standard); Wendy H. v. City of Philadelphia, 849 F. Supp. 367, 368-69 (E.D. Pa. 1994) (holding minimum standards of "professional judgment" as "standard of care owed to a child in foster care by a city worker responsible for supervising the foster home placement and welfare of the child . . . ."). Accord K.H. v. Morgan, 914 F.2d 846 (7th Cir. 1990); T.M. by and through Cox v. Carson, 93 F. Supp.2d 1179, 1187 (D. Wyo. 2000).

2. "Getting Around" DeShaney

Plaintiffs have been successful in avoiding dismissals under DeShaney where the case has been presented as one of the following: (a) "special relationship" or custody case, (b) "state-created-danger" case, (c) entitlement case, or (d) equal protection case.

(a) "special relationship" or custody cases

In Horton v. Flenory, 889 F.2d 454 (3d Cir. 1989), plaintiff's decedent died as a result of a severe beating administered by the owner of a private club who was investigating a burglary of the club. The City of New Kensington had an official, written "hands-off" policy with respect to incidents occurring in private clubs. Id. at 456. The owner of the club in question was an ex-police officer. He called the police in connection with the reported burglary. The officer who responded ignored pleas of the employee/suspect to provide protection from the club owner, indicating to both the club owner and the employee that the owner was free to conduct and continue his interrogation. Id. at 458. The suspect was beaten to death.

The Court of Appeals affirmed the judgment denying defendants' motion for a j.n.o.v., reasoning that when the police officer affirmed the right of the club owner to detain and question the suspect, the interrogation became "custodial." Furthermore, through the city's delegation of traditional police functions to a private actor, the club owner could be viewed as a state actor.

Thus, the court concluded that when the state is involved, as either a custodian or as an actor, DeShaney is not controlling. Id. at 457. Accord Nishiyama v. Dickson County, 814 F.2d 277 (6th Cir. 1987) (prisoner allowed to operate police vehicle unsupervised was clothed with state authority and became de facto state actor). See also Sanders v. Bd. Of County Commissioners of Jefferson County, 192 F. Supp.2d 1094, 1119 (D. Colo. 2001) ("Based on Plaintiff's complaint, it is reasonable to infer that from approximately 12:30 p.m. to 4:00 p.m., the Command Defendants acted affirmatively to restrain the freedom of the occupants of Science Room 3, including Dave Sanders, to act on their own behalf. Thus, pursuant to DeShaney and Armijo, the Command Defendants entered into a special relationship with Dave Sanders during that time giving rise to a constitutional duty to protect and provide care. Therefore, I conclude Ms. Sanders has properly asserted in Claim Two a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment right to substantive due process under the special relationship doctrine."); Culberson v. Doan, 125 F. Supp.2d 252, 270 (S.D. Ohio 2000) ("If Plaintiffs' facts are viewed in a favorable light, it is also reasonable to conclude that, because Chief Payton had 'complete control' of the potential crime scene, he also had 'constructive and functional' possession, control or custody of Carrie's body. By potentially abandoning that control, custody or possession to her murderer and the Baker Family, we conclude that Chief Payton's actions may have violated Plaintiffs' substantive due process.").

See also Sexton v. Cernuto, 18 F.4th 177, 186-92 (6th Cir. 2021) ("Our cases analyzing whether a special relationship exists do not squarely address whether a work program for probationers is custodial in a way that could create such relationships. . . . The work program, however, placed far more restrictions on Sexton's liberty and her ability to care for herself than did the compulsory education laws or involuntary medical care that this court has previously analyzed. Through the probation work program, the state retained authority to physically confine Sexton, even if her liberty as a probationer was greater than that she would have had in prison. That Sexton could leave the work program at the end of the day is not dispositive. . . . The Redford court ordered Sexton to participate in the work program. The program placed further restrictions on her personal liberty: cell phone use was prohibited; she was required to attend the program, wear a yellow vest, and follow Dunn's and Cernuto's orders; she was ordered to ride in state-owned vehicles; and she was taken to and from various worksites. Underlying these restrictions was the threat of incarceration should disobedience be found to violate her probation. These restrictions are sufficient to show a state 'threat of force,'. . . and a restraint on Sexton's ability to provide for her own reasonable safety[.] . . . Looking to DeShaney, the restrictions on Sexton's physical movement and personal liberty during her time in the work program were sufficient to create a special relationship between Cernuto and Sexton. . . . Cernuto concludes with the argument that 'the "special relationship" exception has traditionally been used to impose constitutional liability on the State for the actions of a private party.' He asserts that even if he had a duty to Sexton through a special relationship, that duty to protect applies only to private acts of violence, not those of a state actor like Dunn. Cernuto points to language in our opinions specifying that the DeShaney exceptions are a means to hold public officials liable 'for private acts of violence.'. . The district court, however, correctly analyzed this private acts issue only in the context of the state created danger exception to DeShaney, explaining that while '[i]t is not clear why the distinction between state and private actors exists in the Sixth Circuit,' it was nevertheless necessary to find the state created danger exception inapplicable on that ground. . . Cernuto's argument that the special relationship exception is also limited to protecting against private acts of violence would require an extension of our case law. As shown by the district court's analysis, it is our line of cases on the state created danger exception—not the special relationship exception—that includes the requirement that the state must expose the plaintiff 'to private acts of violence.' . . First, case law provides reasons not to apply this distinction to the special relationship exception. Enforcing the distinction between state and private actors does not necessarily follow from DeShaney. There, the question before the Court was whether state entities or agents had an obligation to protect a child from an abusive parent. . . The Court did not address violence from a state actor because the violence in that case was by a parent, not a state actor. . . And although DeShaney analyzed the duty to protect against private acts of violence, its holding includes the much broader proposition that 'when the State takes a person into its custody and holds him there against his will, the Constitution imposes upon it a corresponding duty to assume some responsibility for his safety.'. . To require that the violence complained of be private would significantly diminish this responsibility. Second, the special relationship exception and the state created danger exception arise from different relationships, and that difference supports treating the two exceptions as distinct. The state created danger exception, as the Second Circuit has explained, 'arises from the relationship between the state and the private assailant.'. . In contrast, the special relationship exception, by definition, concerns the 'relationship between the state and a particular victim.'. . Paying greater attention to whether the harm arose from a state or private actor in the special relationship analysis would, therefore, introduce a distinction unrelated to the relationship from which the state obligation arises. In keeping with this logic, we have thus far limited the discussion of this apparent distinction between state and private violence to the state created danger exception. . . Analyses of the duty to protect arising from special relationships do not appear to evaluate any public-private harm distinction, and Cernuto points to no cases in which this court or any other has explicitly held that the special relationship exception cannot apply when a state actor is the source of the victim's injury. In evaluating the exceptions to the general rule against a duty to protect, existing precedent and the rationale upon which such cases are based do not support extending the 'private violence' requirement to the special relationship exception. Because the work program placed significant limits on Sexton's personal liberties, she had a special relationship with Cernuto. Therefore, Cernuto had a duty to protect Sexton from harm while she was participating in the work program. When viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Sexton, a reasonable jury could find that Cernuto failed to protect Sexton from the sexual assaults. The district court did not err in reaching this conclusion. . . As Stemler indicates, it was clearly established that given Cernuto's degree of control over Sexton, he had a duty to protect her from harm.")

Some courts have linked the affirmative duty to protect to a requirement that the plaintiff be involuntarily in custody. See, e.g., Brown v. City of New York, 786 F. App'x 289, ___ (2d Cir. 2019) ("Brown failed to allege facts showing that Defendants deprived Brown of her liberty. Brown argues that the Defendants established a special relationship by mandating that homeless individuals, like Brown, enter a shelter during inclement weather. New York State laws and regulations, however, do not require clients to remain in homeless shelters. While they require the City to take steps to move individuals into shelters, the City cannot force individuals to stay. . . . Furthermore, once Brown elected to remain in a homeless shelter, she was required to abide by the shelter rules; she cannot establish a special relationship by claiming that the shelter's rules were too restrictive. Second, Brown's reliance on Soc'y for Good Will is unpersuasive. That case -- decided five years before the Supreme Court decided DeShaney -- is not applicable here. In two decisions following Soc'y for Good Will, this Court has distinguished that case and clarified the due process rights protected after DeShaney. . . Therefore, this Court has generally 'focused on involuntary custody' in analyzing the special relationship exception. . . Because Brown failed to allege facts showing she was involuntarily held in custody, Brown failed to establish a special relationship."); Campbell v. State of Washington Dept. of Social and Health Services, 671 F.3d 837, 843-47 (9th Cir. 2011) ("Campbell alleges that SOLA careworkers took four affirmative acts, each of which 'imposed on [Justine's] freedom to act [for herself],' DeShaney, 489 U.S. at 200, and converted her voluntary custody into involuntary custody. These liberty-restricting acts were SOLA's (1) placing locks on the doors of Justine's home to control her ability to leave; (2) maintaining control over which SOLA home Justine lived in after 1995; (3) maintaining control over Justine's transportation, diet, and wardrobe; and (4) maintaining control over how and when Justine bathed. Even accepting Campbell's version of the facts, these state actions did not convert Justine's voluntary custody into involuntary custody. . . . As the district court noted, what Campbell alleges were Defendants' liberty-restraining acts were merely part of SOLA's efforts to 'ensure[ ] Justine's day-to-day safety and care.' The state's performance of the very acts for which an individual voluntarily enters state care does not transform the custodial relationship into an involuntary one. For similar reasons, we reject Campbell's argument that Justine's mental abilities rendered her under the control of the state. . . . Accordingly, we hold that no special relationship had been created here and that the special relationship exception does not allow Defendants to be held liable under § 1983. . . . Our decisions in Patel and Johnson and the Supreme Court's decision in DeShaney compel the outcome here. Although Defendant Pate was the SOLA manager responsible for coordinating Justine's care, including the annual updating of Justine's PSP, and Defendants Mitchell and McGenty were responsible for monitoring Justine on a daily basis, none of them acted affirmatively to place Justine in the way of a danger they had created. . . . Accordingly, we hold that Defendants did not create the situation − Justine's impairments or her routine bath − that resulted in Justine's death. Their acts were not affirmative acts akin to those found in cases where we recognized a state-created danger."); U.S. v. Tennessee, 615 F.3d 646,

655 (6th Cir. 2010) ("The State argues that the original judgment is no longer good law in the wake of DeShaney and its progeny, which the State maintains has been significantly clarified over time. Specifically, the State maintains that a circuit split existed in the early 1990s regarding whether states owed Youngberg rights to residents that resided voluntarily in their care. But, the State argues that these circuits have now reached a consensus that states do not owe Youngberg rights to MR residents who have been voluntarily placed into state care by a parent or other legal representative. It further asserts that every published circuit court decision to consider this matter post-DeShaney has determined that involuntary confinement is required to implicate residents' Youngberg rights. . . In making this claim, however, the State misconstrues the relevant question before this court. Our Rufo analysis is limited to whether the State can meet its initial burden of pointing to 'new court decisions or statutes that make legal what once had been illegal.' . . Although the parties dispute the holding and relevance of each of these cases, they all agree that these cases are not rulings of the Supreme Court or the Sixth Circuit. In fact, a published decision of this circuit has recently stated that the Sixth Circuit has not weighed in on this purported circuit split: 'At this time, we do not need to decide whether the State owes the same affirmative constitutional duties of care and protection to its voluntarily admitted residents as it owes to its involuntarily committed residents under Youngberg.' Lanman v. Hinson, 529 F.3d 673, 681 n. 1 (6th Cir.2008). Likewise, the Supreme Court has not squarely addressed this issue. Therefore, although these cases from other circuits could potentially be persuasive if this case were before us in another context, they cannot, either individually or collectively, satisfy the State's initial burden."); Lanman v. Hinson, 529 F.3d 673, 682 n.1(6th Cir. 2008) ("The district court found the involuntariness argument determinative by reading DeShaney to mean that the Constitution only imposes a duty on the State to assume responsibility for the safety of an individual when it has 'take[n] a person into its custody and holds him there against his will.'. . But DeShaney decided only that the State is not responsible for the actions of third-party private actors against individuals unless it had imposed restraints on the individuals' liberty to render them unable to care for themselves. . . . This is unlike the present case in which Plaintiff alleges that the State, through the affirmative acts of Defendants, infringed on Lanman's substantive due process right in freedom from undue restraint while in the State's custody. His status as voluntary or involuntary is irrelevant as to his constitutional right to be free from the State depriving him of liberty without due process. At this time, we do not need to decide whether the State owes the same affirmative constitutional duties of care and protection to its voluntarily admitted residents as it owes to its involuntarily committed residents under Youngberg. In an unpublished disposition, however, a panel of this Court held that because the plaintiff had been voluntarily admitted to the state mental hospital, the State's constitutional duty to protect those it renders helpless by confinement was not triggered. Higgs v. Latham, No. 91-5273, 1991 WL 21646, at *4 (6th Cir. Oct. 24, 1991) (unpublished). Our sister circuits are split on this issue."); Torisky ex rel. Torisky v. Schweiker, 446 F.3d 438, 445, 446-48 (3d Cir. 2006) ("In the instant case, the District Court erred in concluding that the voluntary nature of one's custody and continued confinement does not impact the availability of the rights to care and protection mandated by Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307 (1982). Youngberg dealt with an involuntarily committed inmate, and Fialkowski holds that the same principles do not apply to individuals who are free to leave state custody 'if they wish[

].'. . . We conclude that appellants go too far, however, when they insist that a court commitment to state custody is a necessary characteristic of a deprivation of liberty sufficient to trigger Youngberg's protections. . . . The existing case law supports the District Court's approach of looking beyond the label of an individual's confinement to ascertain whether the state has deprived an individual of liberty in such a way as to trigger Youngberg's protections. . . . Count V of the complaint alleges that each plaintiff was in state custody and was injured physically and psychologically in the course, and as a result, of a transfer to an inappropriate institution. It further alleges that the plaintiffs were separated from their guardians and loved ones by a police blockade, and were transferred '[a]gainst their will,' and that '[p]hysical and psychological force was utilized by state employees ... in the course of the transfer.'. . . We conclude that plaintiffs may be able to prove facts consistent with these allegations that would establish a deprivation of liberty and a violation of Youngberg's duty of care and protection."); Christiansen v. City of Tulsa, 332 F.3d 1270, 1281(10th Cir. 2005) ("[T]he TPD's quarantine neither involuntarily restrained Christiansen nor limited his freedom to act on his own behalf. Thus, no special relationship or attendant affirmative duty to protect Christiansen arose under Armijo and Uhlrig."); DeAnzona v. City and County of Denver, 222 F.3d 1229, 1234 (10th Cir. 2000) ("A plaintiff must show involuntary restraint by the government to have a claim under a special relationship theory, if there is no custodial relationship there can be no constitutional duty."); Santamorena v. Georgia Military College, 147 F.3d 1337, 1341 & n.10 (11th Cir. 1998) (noting in context of qualified immunity that "some preexisting case law may have particularly suggested to Defendants (or to be more precise, to every reasonable school official standing in Defendants' place) that no duty would arise in a voluntary situation, despite representations by Defendants that protection would be provided." Also noting that "only restraints of freedom imposed by the State, not by a student's parents, can give rise to a constitutional duty requiring the State to protect that student."); Randolph v. Cervantes, 130 F.3d 727, 730-31 (5th Cir. 1997) ("[T]he mere fact that Randolph's mental condition may have made her functionally dependant on Pine Belt and Cervantes does not transform her voluntary tenancy at Pine Hill Apartments into an involuntary confinement creating a 'special relationship.'. . In this case, the defendants never took the affirmative step of restraining Randolph's liberty so that she was rendered unable to care for herself, and the defendants never held her involuntarily or against her will. Accordingly, a 'special relationship' did not exist between Randolph and the defendants."); Suffolk Parents of Handicapped Adult v. Wingate, 101 F.3d 818, 824 (2d Cir. 1996) ("In sum, the plaintiffs here, like the plaintiffs in Brooks, are not involuntarily institutionalized. The plaintiffs here have no entitlement under New York law to TCF funding from either Suffolk County or the State Defendants. . . Nor can they claim any such entitlement from any of the defendants under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment."); Brooks v. Giuliani, 84 F.3d 1454, 1466-67 (2d Cir. 1996) ("Plaintiffs here are under no state-imposed restraint. The whole effort of the guardians, here and in state court, has been to prolong the involvement of the City and the State in the funding of institutional placements as to which the City and the State have washed their hands. DeShaney therefore subverts the district court's conclusion that the State Defendants had assumed "by word and by deed," . . . a duty to provide plaintiffs a smooth and orderly transition to in-state care, including continuous full funding of out-of-state care prior to their transfer. DeShaney flatly rejected as the sole ground for a due process right an expressed intent to provide assistance, or even a failed initiative to do so. . . . Therefore, the injunction cannot be premised on a duty to 'exercise professional judgment' under Youngberg and Society for Good Will, because there is no such duty here.); Walton v. Alexander, 44 F.3d 1297, 1304 (5th Cir. 1995) (en banc) ("Recurring throughout [the] cases that we have decided since DeShaney is the iteration of the principle that if the person claiming the right of state protection is voluntarily within the care or custody of a state agency, he has no substantive due process right to the state's protection from harm inflicted by third party non-state actors. We thus conclude that DeShaney stands for the proposition that the state creates a "special relationship" with a person only when the person is involuntarily taken into state custody and held against his will through the affirmative power of the state . . . ."); Wilson v. Formigoni, 42 F.3d 1060, 1067 (7th Cir. 1994) (Wilson does not complain that she was held at [Mental Health Center] against her will, and thus cannot maintain that the state did not do enough to ensure her safety while she was committed there."); Monahan v. Dorchester Counseling Center, Inc., 961 F.2d 987, 993 (1st Cir. 1992) ("Because the state did not commit [plaintiff] involuntarily, it did not take an 'affirmative act' of restraining his liberty, an act which may trigger a corresponding duty to assume special responsibility for his protection."); Higgs v. Latham, 946 F.2d 895 (6th Cir. 1991) (text in WESTLAW) (If district court was correct in concluding that plaintiff was a voluntary patient at state hospital, then she had no constitutionally based right of action against any defendants under § 1983); Fialkowski v. Greenwich Home for Children, Inc., 921 F.2d 459, 465 (3d Cir. 1990) (state acquires an affirmative duty under the Fourteenth Amendment to provide safe conditions only where mentally retarded person is taken into custody without his consent); Milburn v. Anne Arundel County Dept. of Social Services, 871 F.2d 474, 476-78 (4th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 850 (1989) (where child was voluntarily placed by parents in a foster home, court found DeShaney directly controlling; state had no constitutional duty to protect child against private violence); Colbert v. District of Columbia, 5 F.Supp.3d 44, (D.D.C. 2013) ("While puzzled by the finding in Harris that an incapacitated person, in handcuffs and held in a police van, was not 'involuntarily' in police custody, this Court is bound by D.C. Circuit precedent. In light of Butera, which recently relied on Harris and its very narrow construction of 'custody,' this Court is bound to a narrow interpretation of 'custody' for the purpose of triggering a constitutional duty of care. Therefore, in line with the First, Second, Third, Fifth, and Ninth Circuits and their interpretation of the Supreme Court's decision in DeShaney, this Court finds that only involuntary commitment triggers the District's constitutional duty of care to protect an individual from harm caused by non-state actors. The facts alleged here—that KC was a 'ward' of the District, that she was intellectually disabled, unable to attend to her own daily needs, and encouraged to have nonconsensual sex with other residents and men she met on a one time basis—do not assert that she was involuntarily committed to District custody, giving rise to a constitutional to prevent harm to her from third persons. The Court is mindful that whether KC's confinement was voluntary or involuntary is question of fact, not of formality. . . Further, a commitment that was initially voluntary 'may, over time, take on the character of an involuntary one.'. .The threshold question in the present case is whether KC was committed to the custody of the District voluntarily or involuntarily. . . Ms. Colbert alleges that KC was a 'ward' but does not assert facts sufficient to show that KC was 'involuntarily' committed to the custody of the District. Count VI, alleging a constitutional violation under § 1983, will be dismissed without prejudice."); Estate of Emmons v. Peet, 950 F. Supp. 15, 18, 19 (D.Me. 1996) ("For Emmons to have had the substantive due process right to receive adequate medical care ... he must have been an involuntary patient at AMHI who would have been barred from leaving AMHI upon request. . . . The Court is aware of the fact that there may be some circumstances when a patient is labeled voluntary for administrative purposes but is in fact involuntary by virtue of his inability to leave the hospital upon request. Plaintiffs, however, have not raised sufficient facts from which a reasonable factfinder could determine that Emmons was not free to leave AMHI upon request."); Bushey v. Derboven, 946 F. Supp. 96, 99 (D.Me. 1996) ("The sole fact that Dobson was admitted ostensibly as a voluntary patient on the admission form is not determinative. The voluntary or involuntary status of the patient must be determined by the underlying facts. The admission form, in and of itself, is not determinative. Consequently, Dobson may have had the substantive due process right to receive adequate medical care under Youngberg and DeShaney."); K.L. v. Edgar, 941 F. Supp. 706, 716 (N.D. Ill. 1996) ("When the state discharges patients, it gives up its custody of them. At that point, the state's obligations under Youngberg to provide plaintiffs with safe conditions of confinement and freedom from unnecessary bodily restraints end. Moreover, simply because the state once provided plaintiffs with shelter and care does not bind it always to provide them with shelter and care."); Duval v. Cabinet for Human Resources, 920 F. Supp. 111, 114 (E.D. Ky. 1996) ("In contrast to the constitutional protection afforded to individuals who are involuntarily committed to a state mental health facility, patients who have voluntarily placed themselves in such a facility are not afforded the substantive limits on state action set by the Eighth Amendment and the Due Process Clause."); Martin v. Voinovich, 840 F. Supp. 1175, 1207 (S.D. Ohio 1993) (In a class action brought on behalf of people in Ohio with mental retardation or other developmental disabilities, the court concluded "that only those members of the plaintiffs' class who are involuntarily institutionalized may assert a Youngberg claim."); Rogers v. City of Port Huron, 833 F. Supp. 1212, 1217 (E.D. Mich. 1993) ("[I]f a person's attendance at an event or area is voluntary, ... , and that person was not physically placed there by the state, the person cannot be considered to be in 'functional custody.'"); Jordan v. State of Texas, 738 F. Supp. 258, 259 (M.D. Tenn. 1990) (mentally retarded child, voluntarily committed to state institution, had no substantive due process right to safe conditions).

See also Johnson v. Rimmer, 936 F.3d 695, 707 n.44 (7th Cir. 2019) ("Dr. Macherey and Nurse George argue that we need not consider whether the evidence establishes the special relationship exception to DeShaney's general rule. According to Dr. Macherey and Nurse George, Mr. Johnson voluntarily committed himself to MHC and, therefore, the special relationship exception is inapplicable here. Courts generally agree that individuals who voluntarily admit themselves to a state-run mental health facility do not have substantive due process rights simply because they are in the state's custody. . . We have not addressed directly the extent to which the voluntariness of one's committal to the state's custody bears on due process rights under DeShaney. Like the district court, we do not need to determine whether a voluntary commitment can be de facto involuntary for the purposes of the Due Process Clause or whether Mr. Johnson's commitment was functionally involuntary. As we will discuss later, even if Mr.

Johnson has due process rights under the special relationship exception, he cannot show that Dr. Macherey and Nurse George deprived him of those rights."); Kennedy v. Schafer, 71 F.3d 292, 294 (8th Cir. 1995) ("[W]e agree with the District Court that defendants are entitled to the defense of qualified immunity if Kathleen is properly classified as a voluntary patient. We need not and do not decide whether Parwatikar's holding in favor of voluntary patients' due-process rights remains good law. We do decide that an action for damages brought by a voluntary patient is subject to a qualified-immunity defense." Case remanded for determination of whether patient's voluntary status had become "involuntary" prior to her suicide). Kennedy was distinguished by the court in Shelton v. Arkansas Dept. of Human Services, 677 F.3d 837, 842, 843 (8th Cir. 2012) ("[A]pplying Kennedy to the present facts, we may assume without deciding that the governing Arkansas statutes could operate like the Missouri statutes in Kennedy and, in limited situations, serve to convert a patient from voluntary status to involuntary status. We may also assume without deciding that the underlying facts could support a substantive due process claim in the event there existed a constitutional-level duty of care. . . Even making these assumptions, Appellant's case fails on three independent grounds. First, because no duty could have arisen prior to the defendants' discovery of Brenda, and because Brenda was wholly incapacitated prior to that time solely by her own actions, it is factually incorrect to assert that, after defendants found Brenda unconscious in her room, she posed some sort of additional risk of self harm. . . .Second, we are simply unwilling to extend Kennedy into the context of split-second, emergency-care decisionmaking as urged by Appellant. . . .Finally, even if we were to view the present case as a potentially reasonable setting for the expansion of Kennedy, no such rule could have been deemed 'clearly established' at the time of the events alleged in the complaint. . . As such, all defendants would be entitled to qualified immunity on the federal constitutional claims.")

But see Charles v. Orange County, 925 F.3d 73, 80-85 (2d Cir. 2019) ("Plaintiffs filed a complaint . . . on July 12, 2016, asserting violations of the Fourteenth Amendment. They claim that substantive due process requires that civil detainees be afforded adequate medical care during their detention, and that their medical care should have included discharge planning, because of their serious mental illnesses. They allege that discharge planning is regarded by medical and psychological professionals as an essential part of mental health care, especially in institutional settings, where it is necessary to mitigate the risks of interrupted treatment while patients transition from treatment within the institution to other sources of treatment. Plaintiffs contend that by failing to provide them with discharge planning, Defendants were deliberately indifferent to the risk that Plaintiffs would relapse upon release and face mental decompensation and other serious health consequences. On January 30, 2017, Defendants moved to dismiss the entire Complaint for failure to state a claim. Defendants argued that there is no established substantive due process right to the post-release measures inherent in discharge plans. On their view, the government's duty of care ends the instant the inmate walks through the prison gates and into the civilian world, because that is when the inmate's ability to secure medication or care on his own behalf is restored. . . . Because the district court construed Plaintiffs' allegations as regarding deliberate indifference to post-custody medical care, rather than deliberate indifference to needed in-custody medical care, the district court applied the wrong standard in determining whether Plaintiffs adequately pled a

Fourteenth Amendment violation. We therefore vacate the district court's dismissal of the Complaint and remand for further proceedings. . . . Plaintiffs argue that the deprivation of care that they allege in fact occurred during their detention, because discharge planning occurs before release from custody. Their argument is consistent with the Complaint, which clearly purports to allege an in-custody deprivation of care. Whether Plaintiffs' claim for deprivation of discharge planning, which negatively affected them after their release from custody, can be considered a claim for in-custody deprivation of care is an important question in this case. This distinction matters because the duties state actors owe to individuals differ depending on whether the complainant was in the state's custody. As a general matter, the state is under no constitutional duty to provide substantive services to free persons within its borders. . . But when a person is involuntarily held in state custody, and thus wholly dependent upon the state, the state takes on an affirmative duty to provide for his or her 'safety and general well-being.'. . This 'special relationship exception' imposes a duty on the state in recognition of 'the limitation which [the state] has imposed on [the person's] freedom to act on his own behalf.'. . . When the state is deliberately indifferent to the medical needs of a person it has taken into custody, it violates the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment. . . The Supreme Court subsequently extended the protections for prisoners established in Estelle to civil detainees under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, reasoning that persons in civil detention deserve at least as much protection as those who are criminally incarcerated. . . The Ninth Circuit has extended the reasoning of Estelle and DeShaney beyond the moment of release from custody, holding in Wakefield v. Thompson, 177 F.3d 1160, 1164 (9th Cir. 1999), that the state owes an affirmative duty to provide an outgoing prisoner requiring medication with a 'supply sufficient to ensure that he has that medication available during the period of time reasonably necessary to permit him to consult a doctor and obtain a new supply.' The Ninth Circuit based this holding on a matter of common sense: 'that a prisoner's ability to secure medication "on his own behalf" is not necessarily restored the instant he walks through the prison gates and into the civilian world.'. . This Court, however, has never held that the state's duties to an inmate or detainee extend beyond their release. . . . Plaintiffs' theory raises a legal question of first impression in this Circuit: whether a claim of constitutional entitlement to discharge planning, the alleged inadequacy of which causes post-release harm, can be considered a claim to in-custody care cognizable under the 'special relationship' exception. Discharge planning is fundamentally different from other measures or types of care to which detainees may be entitled while in custody, in that its entire purpose is to prevent post-release harm. Given the reality that the tangible harm Plaintiffs suffered was a direct result of their lack of medication and medical records after release from custody, the District Court understandably construed the Complaint as asserting 'a right to post-release measures inherent in discharge planning.'. . Nevertheless, discharge planning is not so different from other measures the state takes in providing care to those in its custody as to be categorically beyond the reach of the 'special relationship' exception. If discharge planning is to occur at all, it must, by definition, occur prior to release from custody. Whether the three components of discharge planning that Plaintiffs identify are an 'essential part' of mental healthcare, as Plaintiffs allege, is a factual matter that may be proven at a later stage of litigation by expert testimony. If discharge planning is essential to providing care for mentally ill individuals, the rationale for the 'special relationship'

exception applies to this need no less than the need for other types of care. . . . In this case, furthermore, it cannot be said that when the County released Plaintiffs, it 'placed [them] in no worse position than that in which [they] would have been had it not acted at all ...'. . . That the harmful consequences of a lack of discharge planning occur after release from custody does not remove discharge planning from the purview of the 'special relationship' exception. . . . Thus, taking Plaintiffs' allegations as true and drawing all reasonable inferences in their favor, we find that Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that discharge planning is an essential part of in-custody care. We conclude that despite the forward-looking nature of discharge planning, a claim for damages caused by the lack of it can be considered a claim for deprivation of in-custody care for purposes of the 'special relationship' exception. It will be for Plaintiffs to prove to a fact-finder, on remand, that the care they complain of is the type that should have been provided to them during their detention."); Harvey v. D.C., 798 F.3d 1042, 1051 (D.C. Cir. 2015) ("[T]he District argues that once Suggs left Forest Haven and moved into a private home, it was no longer in a special relationship with him. It argues that while living in the group home operated by Symbral, Suggs was in the 'least restrictive conditions necessary to achieve the purposes of habilitation,' D.C.Code § 7–1305.03, such that it no longer deprived Suggs of his liberty in a manner giving rise to a special relationship. We disagree. . . . [T]he fact that Suggs was held in the least restrictive setting does not negate the involuntary nature of his commitment or the District's duty under Youngberg to ensure he received adequate medical care."); Campbell v. State of Washington Dept. of Social and Health Services, 671 F.3d 837, 848-51 (9th Cir. 2011) (B. Fletcher, J., dissenting) ("By ordering Justine to take a bath without direct supervision, defendants McGenty and Mitchell committed an affirmative act that increased Justine's likelihood of succumbing to the dangers inherent in her physical condition. . . . Simply put, Justine would not have been in the bath unsupervised at the moment of her death had defendants not ordered her to be there. . . Given that state employees instructed Justine to take a bath and then failed to take even basic precautions necessary to mitigate the risk, the danger creation exception applies. . . . Theoretically, Justine's participation in SOLA was voluntary. . . . But even if initial enrollment in SOLA was voluntary, a jury could conclude that Justine's participation in SOLA became de facto involuntary. . . .A reasonable jury could conclude that Justine was in involuntary custody because the state (1) advocated for and arranged the SOLA placement while Justine was a ward of the state; (2) monitored and controlled every aspect of Justine's daily life; (3) prevented Justine from leaving SOLA; and (4) failed to inform Justine of her ability to terminate her custodial relationship. Because a jury could reasonably conclude that the state exercised involuntary custody over Justine, the trial court should not have concluded that there was no special relationship and no affirmative obligation to protect Justine's constitutional rights."); Smith v. District of Columbia, 413 F.3d 86, 94-97 (D.C. Cir. 2005) ("For starters, the District's legal custody over Tron is a good indicator that it had a duty to look after him. Because the District, rather than Tron's family, had primary legal control over him, the District had legal responsibility for his daily care. . . The District downplays the significance of this point, but our case law recognizes the relevance of formal indicia in assessing whether custody attaches for DeShaney purposes. . . . Just as important, the District's control over Tron restrained his liberty against his will. An adjudicated delinquent placed at ESA by a restrictive court order, Tron had to participate in the program. To be sure, Tron had more freedom than a prisoner − subject to ESA rules, he could come and go, and take ESA-approved weekend home visits. ESA's failure to crack down on Tron's curfew violations also left him with a longer leash than he was formally entitled to under the program's rules. But such flexibility hardly amounts to freedom from state restraints. Tron had to live at Queenstown Apartments. He had no choice. He risked punishment, including the possibility of returning to Oak Hill, when he failed to obey ESA restrictions on how and where he spent his time. . . . [W]here the government assumes full responsibility for a child by stripping control from the family and placing the child in a government-controlled setting, the government has a duty not to treat the child with deliberate indifference. . . . [W]e see no reason to treat Tron differently because he was a juvenile delinquent rather than a foster child. . . . Unhappy with the foster-child analogy, the District urges us to look instead to decisions holding that public schoolchildren, despite compulsory education laws, are not in state custody for DeShaney purposes. . . . At least on the surface, we see some tension between the foster care and public school cases. Both involve state constriction of a child's liberty − the child must live with the foster parents and the child must receive schooling − yet only the former triggers DeShaney custody. Courts have typically distinguished these cases by treating the custody analysis as an all-or-nothing inquiry: the government has either assumed primary responsibility for controlling and caring for a child (and thus, as in the foster care context, the child is always in government custody) or it has assumed only limited responsibilities for parts of the day (and thus, as in the school cases, the child is never in government custody). . . . But we need not explore the ins and outs of this issue. . . . The District served as Tron's legal custodian and primary caregiver. It placed him in a program that constrained his liberty by limiting, among other things, where he lived and what he could do. Indeed, Tron was murdered while subject to these constraints − at Queenstown Apartments, at night, and during curfew. For DeShaney purposes, then, Tron remained in District custody, and if the District was indeed deliberately indifferent to his welfare in a way that led to his murder, then the District committed a constitutional violation − the issue to which we now turn."); Camp v. Gregory, 67 F.3d 1286, 1296 (7th Cir. 1995) ("We are unwilling to decree that simply because Camp, as opposed to the state, initiated the transfer of guardianship, under no set of facts could a state official be liable for a subsequent deprivation of due process."); Walton v. Alexander, 44 F.3d 1297, 1308-09 (5th Cir. 1995) (Parker, Robert. M., J., joined by Politz, C.J., and Stewart, J., concurring specially) ("The majority's holding that custody must be 'involuntary' and 'against [a person's] will' is so restrictive that it precludes any type of custody short of incarceration or institutionalization giving rise to the duty of protection. In effect, the majority has confined the duty of protection to the circumstances found in Estelle and Youngberg. Such a narrow application of this duty clearly was not contemplated in DeShaney. . . .The question is not so much how the individual got into state custody, but to what extent the State exercises dominion and control over that individual."); Johnson v. Grinberg, No. Civ.A. 98CV10662-RGS, 1999 WL 1072645, at *5 (D. Mass. July 2, 1999) (not reported) ("Whether or not Johnson was a custodial patient at the time of the alleged assault is a matter of some significance. . . . Johnson argues that under DeShaney and Zinermon . . . the DMH was constitutionally obligated to tend to her medical needs. . . . The problem with the argument is plaintiff's misconception (shared by defendants) that the question of custody is in some way definitively answered by an inquiry into Johnson's competence. The one is not necessarily a function of the other. A person may be incompetent and not necessarily in custody, or in custody and be perfectly competent. Here plaintiff may well have been in custody, or its functional equivalent, whatever form she signed. But this is not an issue that can be decided by her competency alone (although it is certainly relevant)."); Buffington v. Baltimore County, Maryland, 913 F.2d 113, 119 (4th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 111 S. Ct. 1106 (1991) (refusing to find that affirmative duty owed to someone in custody turns on either the reason for taking custody or on whether a state or private actor brought the need for custody to the state's attention); McMahon v. Tompkins County, No. 95-CV-1134(RSP/GJD), 1998 WL 187421, *3 (N.D.N.Y. Apr. 14, 1998) (unreported) ("Unlike the situation in DeShaney, where the abused child was always in the care of the biological parent, the Department removed the Payne girls from their biological parents' home and controlled their access to their biological parents. While in foster care, the Payne girls had a constitutional right to protection from harm. . . Defendants attempt to avoid this outcome by arguing that the Payne girls were not involuntarily placed in foster care because their court-appointed attorney requested their placement in foster care. . . I reject this argument. To reach the result advocated by defendants would create an alarming precedent in which children involuntarily placed in foster care would be entitled to the full panoply of due process rights, while those voluntarily placed would not. This result is neither acceptable nor constitutionally sound."); Brown, by Brown v. Kennedy Kreiger Institute, 997 F. Supp. 661, 668 (D.Md. 1998) ("It is specious to suggest that Jake, who is severely mentally retarded, could walk out of a KKI home on his own at any time. Moreover, even if Jake could be considered to be technically a 'voluntary' resident of KKI's homes, the jury could reasonably find from the evidence that because of his incompetence, he was a 'de facto involuntary' resident."); Miracle v. Spooner, 978 F. Supp. 1161, 1169-70 (N.D. Ga. 1997) ("Without the protection of the state, a child who is in foster care is at the mercy of the foster parents whether or not its natural parents consented to the placement of the child into foster care. From the child's point of view, foster care will always constitute involuntary custody because the state does not give the child an alternative to the foster home the state has chosen. Accordingly, the Court finds that the state's duty of care recognized in Taylor applies in this case notwithstanding the parents's consent to placement of the children into foster care."); Ringuette v. City of Fall River, 888 F. Supp. 258, 268 (D. Mass. 1995) ("This court concludes that the state has a duty under the constitution to protect persons who are taken into protective custody because of incapacitation and who lack the capacity to give knowing, intelligent and voluntary consent to protective custody."); Connecticut Traumatic Brain Injury Ass'n v. Hogan, 161 F.R.D. 8, 10 (D. Conn. 1995) ("The issue is not whether individuals placed in state institutions are within the custody of the State, but once there, with the state in complete control of the environment, whether "voluntarily" placed patients are constitutionally entitled to a level of basic rights. . . . Deshaney does not address a situation, as here, in which the State has agreed to provide care for completely dependent individuals. Once the State has accepted this responsibility, and the individual is physically in state custody, it has also agreed to provide an environment that is consistent with and does not transgress the individuals' basic rights. . . . The mechanism which brought the individuals to the various facilities, whether considered "voluntary" or "involuntary," is not controlling; 'in either case they are entitled to safe conditions and freedom from undue restraint.' [cite omitted]"); Clark v. Donahue, 885 F. Supp. 1159, 1162 (S.D. Ind.

1995) (recognizing that several courts have held that "institutionalization which originated voluntarily may at some point involve restraint of personal liberty sufficient to trigger the protections of the due process clause."); McNamara v. Dukakis, 1990 WL 235439 (D. Mass. Dec. 27, 1990) (not reported) (court refused to treat outpatient recipients of mental health care as in "constructive custody," viewed those in community residences as comparable to state-placed foster children, and accepted expert testimony as to the status of "unconditional voluntary patients," suggesting "little practical difference between voluntarily and involuntarily committed patients as to their ability to act on their own behalf.").

See also Campbell v. Washington, No. C08-0983-JCC, 2009 WL 2985481, at *5 (W.D. Wash. Sept. 14, 2009) ([Collecting cases from circuits] "On balance, these cases suggest that, depending on the facts and circumstances of the case, a voluntarily committed patient can become a de facto involuntary patient if her freedom was − or, in some circuits, could have been − curtailed by the power of the State. . . . The State only acquires an affirmative constitutional obligation to provide a safe environment to a developmentally disabled individual when the State prevents that individual from leaving its custody. Justine was neither barred from leaving, nor is there any evidence to suggest that she could have been so barred under Washington law. Involuntary detention in a residential treatment facility is generally prohibited in this state. . . . Plaintiff has presented no evidence, and indeed has not argued, that the state could have involuntarily committed her under Washington law."); Estate of Cassara v. State of Illinois, 853 F. Supp. 273, 279 (N.D. Ill. 1994) ("[T]his court holds that voluntary institutionalization may involve a restraint of personal liberty sufficient to trigger the due process clause. . . . The right to leave . . . does not guaranty the power to leave."); United States v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 832 F. Supp. 122, 125 (E.D. Pa. 1993) ("[T]his court rejects defendants' argument that voluntarily confined patients are not entitled to the constitutional right to treatment and care by virtue of the 'voluntariness' of their initial confinement. Where there is an instance of state-propounded curtailment of liberty, due process standards must be upheld. In this case, the constitutional right to treatment or habilitation extends to both involuntarily and voluntarily confined residents alike."); Halderman v. Pennhurst State School and Hospital, 834 F. Supp. 757, 761-62 (E.D. Pa. 1993) (DeShaney supported finding that residents of Pennhurst were involuntary where "the Commonwealth defendants had affirmatively acted in accepting the residents ... and in depriving them of their constitutional right to minimally adequate habilitation....").

At least two circuits have suggested that the concept of "in custody" for DeShaney purposes of triggering an affirmative duty to protect entails more than a "simple criminal arrest." See Gladden v. Richbourg, 759 F.3d 960, 965 (8th Cir. 2014) ("Police officers have a constitutional duty to ensure the safety and well-being of those in their custody. . . 'Custody' in this context must be something more than an individual's reasonable belief that he is not free to leave, as is the case under the Fourth Amendment. See Estate of Stevens v. City of Green Bay, 105 F.3d 1169, 1175 (7th Cir.1997). Rather, custody is effected for purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment only when the state 'so restrains an individual's liberty that it renders him unable to care for himself.'. .Gladden's brief ride in the back of Richbourg's squad car does not satisfy this high standard.");

Estate of Stevens v. City of Green Bay, 105 F.3d 1169, 1175 (7th Cir. 1997) ("In this case, the district court, magistrate judge, and the estate assumed, without citation to authority, that Fourth Amendment criminal case law correctly elucidates the phrase 'in custody.' Given the authority expressly relied upon by the Supreme Court when it recognized this constitutional duty, we are not at all sure this is correct. The Supreme Court's express rationale in DeShaney for recognizing a constitutional duty does not match the circumstances of a simple criminal arrest . . . . This rationale on its face requires more than a person riding in the back seat of an unlocked police car for a few minutes."). See also Schoenfield v. City of Toledo, 223 F.Supp.2d 925, 930 (N.D. Ohio 2002) ("In the instant action, decedent did not come to harm through Defendants' actions. This is not an instance in which the Defendants selected an individual from the public at large and placed him in a position of danger. Defendants did not place decedent at the K Mart or at the hotel room. Defendants did not release decedent into greater harm than that in which they found him, nor was decedent in detention, characterized as 'custody' or otherwise, when he committed suicide. The harm to decedent, while perhaps identifiable by Defendants, was not created by Defendants. Nor was decedent's liberty constrained by Defendants so as to eviscerate his own freedom of choice or ability to care for himself. Ultimately, Plaintiff's attempt to characterize the instant investigatory traffic stop as a type of 'custody' giving rise to the alleged constitutional rights and/or obligations of medical care, hospitalization, incarceration, and/or continued detention is unpersuasive in light of DeShaney and the Supreme Court's repeated reluctance to further 'expand the concept of substantive due process.'").

But see Williams for the Estate of Burns v. City of Georgetown, Ky., No. 18-6182, 2019 WL 2244719, at * (6th Cir. May 24, 2019) (not reported) (Merritt, J., dissenting) ("I agree that the officers did not act with 'deliberate indifference' to Burns' medical needs during the roadside stop of his vehicle because they called paramedics to the scene, but I part ways with the majority about whether plaintiff has adequately alleged that defendants were 'deliberately indifferent' to Burns' welfare when they left him alone at night at a McDonald's in a strange city knowing that he appeared impaired in some way. The complaint adequately alleges that their decision led to Burns wandering out in the roadway and getting killed by a passing vehicle. When the police take an individual into custody—into their control—substantive due process prevents them from intentionally or recklessly injuring the individual, whether that individual has been temporarily seized by an officer or is more permanently housed in a prison. . . Where an arrestee suffers injury at the hands of a private party while detained by the state, 'a constitutional claim arises when the injury occurred as a result of the state's deliberate indifference to the risk of such an injury.'. . Under these principles, the relevant question that should be examined is whether Burns was so obviously impaired when in the officers' custody that the officers acted with deliberate indifference in leaving him unsupervised in the middle of the night in a strange town to await a ride home. Instead, the question the majority asks is whether Burns was safer before the state action than he was after it. . . This is not the correct question because it sets up a false equivalency—as though the police had only a binary choice between putting him back in his car to drive home or bringing him to the McDonald's. Multiple other options were available, including taking Burns into custody to await a family member. The question also reveals the weakness in the argument because the comparison essentially concedes that the officers likely believed that Burns was too impaired to drive. . . . Taken in the light most favorable to plaintiff, the allegations could support a finding that Burns was in a 'custodial relationship' with officers when he was killed, and his death was caused by the officers' deliberate indifference to his medical condition and their decision to drop him off alone at the McDonald's. A number of factual questions exist about the officers' states of mind that evening, and their knowledge of what happened to Burns that led to his death on a highway miles away from where he was pulled over several hours previously. Even under the circumstances of this case as we know them now, at the motion-to-dismiss stage, a jury could find that the officers increased the risk of harm faced by Burns. The complaint alleges sufficient information to demonstrate that the officers assumed a custodial duty to Burns to avoid acting with deliberate indifference to his safety to survive a motion to dismiss. The law is sufficiently established that a reasonable officer would know not to leave an impaired person alone at night in a strange place. Plaintiff could discover evidence that at least creates a question of fact as to whether the officers violated this duty by acting with deliberate indifference when they dropped Burns off at McDonald's in a strange town late at night. At bottom, this is a case about responsible police action. Once police are involved, they cannot act with indifference to the welfare of the person before them."); Family Serv. Ass'n ex rel. Coil v. Wells Twp., 783 F.3d 600, 606 (6th Cir. 2015) ("The record in this case permits a reasonable inference of deliberate indifference. Officer Kamerer took Coil into custody. He then left him facedown, pepper-sprayed and handcuffed, in the middle of a lane open to traffic. Why he felt the need to leave him in the middle of the street in such a state is difficult to fathom. The area was dark. Coil wore dark clothing. Kamerer had not turned his police car's regular or flashing lights on. If Coil remained there for any appreciable amount of time, the risk that Coil might get struck by a passing car was painfully obvious. And the 911 dispatch recordings show a two-minute gap between when Kamerer radioed that he had both men 'chemically restrained' and when he called for an ambulance, which occurred 'immediately' after the car struck him and Coil. . . During that window Kamerer faced no threat, and common experience and common sense suggested a strong likelihood that a car might pass—and its driver would not be able to see Coil."); Jacobs v. Ramirez, 400 F.3d 105, 107 (2d Cir. 2005) ("Having agreed to parole Jacobs to the home to which he sought to be paroled, the state assumed the very limited duty of ensuring that it did not require him to remain in a place that turned out, at least according to his allegations, to be uninhabitable. Because we think that Jacobs has stated a claim under Section 1983 with respect to the state's decision to parole him to allegedly unsuitable housing and its alleged refusal to allow him to move, we reverse the district court's dismissal of that portion of his complaint and remand this case for further proceedings with respect thereto."); Davis v. Brady, 143 F.3d 1021, 1027 (6th Cir. 1998) ("When a plaintiff alleges that state actors violated substantive due process by placing him at risk of harm from a third party, he must demonstrate, first, that the defendants owed him a duty not to subject him to danger and, second, that the defendants violated this duty by exhibiting deliberate indifference to the plaintiff's well-being. In this case, the taking of Davis into custody triggered the defendant officers' duty to protect Davis. There is sufficient evidence in the record to demonstrate that the defendant officers violated this duty when they exhibited deliberate indifference to Davis's well-being by abandoning him, in his inebriated state, on an unfamiliar, dark, and busy highway."); Stemler v. City of

Florence, 126 F.3d 856, 868 (6th Cir. 1997) ("In the present case, Black was rendered unable to protect herself by virtue of both the threat of arrest and her physical placement in the truck by the officers. Unlike Foy, Black never had the opportunity to make a voluntary choice to continue driving with Kritis beyond the span of time that the police had in effect ordered her to do so; her fatal accident occurred about five minutes after the truck left the police stop. Furthermore, unlike Walton, Black was in the custody of the defendant officers in the sense that they had affirmatively acted to deprive her of her liberty, rather than merely negligently refused to act to protect her. . . In sum, neither Foy nor Walton did anything to alter the clear and simple rule that state actors owe a duty of care to those individuals of whom they deprive their liberty, and a reasonable jury could conclude that the officers had deprived Black of her liberty by placing her in the truck or by threatening her with an arrest that would have been unwarranted under Kentucky law.").

Compare Cheeks v. Belmar, 80 F.4th 872, 875 & n.5, 876-79 (8th Cir. 2023) ("Cheeks asserts Officers Maloy and Jakob breached their duty to stop and attempt to render aid in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[5] [fn.5: While there are cases analyzing police pursuits under substantive due process, neither party briefed a substantive due process claim.] . . . . While the crash itself was not captured on video, Cheeks presented testimony from Lorenzo Johnson who said he witnessed the officers' car bump the side of Neil's car, which caused Neil's car to go into a spin. The district court relied partly on this testimony of contact between vehicles to conclude '[a] reasonable juror could find, based on circumstantial evidence ... that [the officers] had actual knowledge of Neil's serious medical need and disregarded it.' We do not have jurisdiction to second-guess this determination. . . Officers Maloy and Jakob suggest we do have jurisdiction to disturb the conclusion because the video recording 'blatantly contradicts' the eyewitness testimony. . . . [T]his exception is not applicable here. The video did not record the accident itself, instead capturing a few moments of the pursuit just prior to the crash. Because the crash itself occurs off screen, Cheeks's contention that Officers Maloy and Jakob performed a PIT maneuver is not so 'blatantly contradicted by the record ... that no reasonable jury could believe it[.]'. .Nonetheless, the officers argue—again for the first time on appeal—that even assuming such contact between the two vehicles, this does not constitute custody as the term is defined in Gladden. We disagree. When the state limits an individual's 'freedom to act on his own behalf,'. . . by intentionally conducting a maneuver that causes a vehicle to spin out and collide with a tree, the duty arises 'to provide medical care to persons ... who have been injured while being apprehended by the police.'. . Case law in the context of Fourth Amendment claims supports our conclusion. [discussing Hodari D., Brower, Scott. . . So, in the Fourth Amendment context, a seizure arises if a police officer intentionally causes a crash to end a police chase whereas no seizure occurs if there is simply an accidental crash. The officers have offered no reason the same would not be true under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . As discussed above, it is clearly established that a custodial relationship is formed when law enforcement officers limit an individual's 'freedom to act on his own behalf.'. .This is a 'general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law' that can be applied 'with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question' today. . . If law enforcement officers intentionally force a suspect to crash his car to facilitate the end of a pursuit, the suspect no longer has the liberty 'to care for himself.'. . When the state limits an individual's 'freedom to act on his own behalf,'. . . by purposely causing a car accident, a clearly established duty arises 'to provide medical care to persons ... who have been injured while being apprehended by the police.'. . The state of the law gave the officers fair warning that failing to render aid or call for medical assistance for an accident they caused was unconstitutional. Cheeks does not argue that the officers simply delayed calling for medical assistance. Instead, she argues the officers never called for medical assistance—thus denying medical aid altogether. In such cases, where no medical aid was provided, there is no need to provide evidence demonstrating the detrimental effect of the lack of aid. . . Because the officers failed to render any aid, rather than simply delaying in providing it, our precedent does not require Cheeks to demonstrate the detrimental effect of the lack of aid. Thus, we agree with the district court that, viewed in the light most favorable to Cheeks, she has shown a clearly established constitutional violation.") with Cheeks v. Belmar, 80 F.4th 872, 879-80 (8th Cir. 2023) (Stras, J., dissenting) ("Not every tort is a constitutional violation. . . . As the court recognizes, the Constitution only creates a duty to aid once officers 'take[ ] a person into ... custody and hold[ ] him there against his will.'. . But I could not locate a single case, much less a 'robust consensus' of them, that extends it to someone they have seized by force but have not taken into custody. . . We can debate whether we should extend it to cover this situation, but no officer would be 'on notice' that the Constitution does. . . Qualified immunity applies in just these circumstances. . . The court, on the other hand, thinks it is 'obvious' that Neil was in custody. . . In its view, 'rendering [Neil] unable to care for himself' was enough. . . The problem with relying on 'general' rules is that they often fail to 'answer the specific and particularized question[s]' that arise in other situations. . . Here, the question is whether something short of custody creates a duty to aid. Gladden, the case that allegedly established the duty, never answered that question. It involved an alcoholic who voluntarily accepted a ride from officers and died of hypothermia several hours later. . . We held that, on those facts, there was no Fourth Amendment seizure, much less the "something more" required for custody. . . Gladden simply could not have answered the 'specific and particularized question' presented in this case. . . No seizure meant no holding on whether it created a duty to aid. . . . As the Supreme Court has often reminded us, defeating qualified immunity requires a constitutional rule that was 'clearly established,' not just 'suggested by ... precedent.'").

See also Lehre v. Artfitch, No. 2:22-CV-105, 2023 WL 5663072, at *4–5 (W.D. Mich. Sept. 1, 2023) ("Even if Plaintiff could establish a genuine issue of material fact on the question of custody, Plaintiff had not met his burden to show that the law was clearly established that, on these or similar facts, a passenger is considered 'in custody' for the purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment such that an officer would have notice of a duty to provide medical care. The Court adopts the portion of the Report and Recommendation dismissing Plaintiff's Fourteenth Amendment deliberate indifference to medical needs. Plaintiff has not demonstrated the existence of clearly established law concerning the custody requirement for this claim. . . .Plaintiff has not established that the officers placed Troy in a more dangerous situation than they found him. Literally, the officers kept Troy exactly where they found him. They did not abandon Troy on the side of a highway; Artfitch stayed with Troy until his family arrived. Troy and his brother were not on the way to the hospital such that the traffic stop prevented Troy from getting to the hospital for medical attention. In addition, Plaintiff's theory for the state-created danger claim confuses and conflates the deliberate indifference cases and the state-created danger cases. The state-created danger line of cases imposes a constitutional duty on officers upon the termination of a custodial relationship. . . In these situations, plaintiffs seek to hold government agents liable for injuries that occur when the individual is no longer in custody. Plaintiff's state-created danger claim fails for one of two reasons. If the Court accepts Plaintiff's allegations, the officers never abandoned Troy and he always remained in their custody. Alternatively, as the Court found above, Troy was never in the officers' custody for the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment. Plaintiff has not identified any clearly-established law that would support this unique state-created danger claim where the danger arose because the officers kept Troy in their custody. The Court adopts the portion of the Report and Recommendation dismissing Plaintiff's Fourteenth Amendment claim for state-created danger. Plaintiff has not demonstrated a genuine issue of material fact that Defendants' actions placed Troy in greater danger than they found him. And, Plaintiff has not demonstrated that the clearly established law concerning state-created danger extends to a situation where the danger arises during the interaction between the officers and the individual.")

Smith v. City of Greensboro, No. 1:19CV386, 2020 WL 1452114, at *15 (M.D.N.C. Mar. 25, 2020) ("Here, the complaint's allegations show that Smith's personal liberty was sufficiently restrained during the relevant time period to place him in 'custody.' Although he was not under arrest, . . . Smith lay prone on the ground, hands and feet tied together behind his back, with at least four officers and both paramedics surrounding him[.] . . Simply put, Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged that Smith was in 'custody,' as 'an affirmative act by the state'—tackling him to the ground and restraining him with a hobble—completely extinguished his ability to 'act on his own behalf.'. .In a related argument, the Paramedics contend that, even if Smith was in 'custody,' they were under no affirmative duty to provide him with medical care because he was in the Officer's custody, not theirs. . . The Court is not moved by this reasoning. According to the complaint, the Paramedics were the sole government medical team dispatched to aid Smith. . . There may be some instances in which the jurisdictional differences between Guilford County and the City of Greensboro matter with respect to a duty to intervene. However, in this case, where it appears that the Officers themselves called upon the Paramedics to render medical care, any distinction between the two governmental employers becomes much less meaningful. . . The pleadings sufficiently allege that Smith was in custody, and that the Paramedics were the government employees called upon to provide medical care during that time. That they worked for the county, rather than the city, is unimportant.")

(i) public school cases

Some courts have used a functional custody rationale to justify the imposition of a constitutional duty to protect upon school officials.

See e.g., Martin v. Brame, No. 96-5526, 1997 WL 163533 (6th Cir. Apr. 7, 1997) (unpublished) (assuming, without deciding, that child in residential school for the deaf was owed an affirmative duty of protection from sexual assault by other student, but affirming grant of summary judgment for defendants because of lack of any facts from which jury could find deliberate indifference on part of school officials); Nabozny v. Podlesny, 92 F.3d 446, 459 n.13 (7th Cir. 1996) ("[I]n some cases schools arguably serve as temporary custodians of children, limiting parent's ability to care for children, or children's ability to care for themselves. . . . It may be, therefore, that in some cases a school is in a custodial relationship with its students."); Johnson v. Dallas Independent School District, 38 F.3d 198, 208 (5th Cir. 1994) (Goldberg, J., dissenting) ("DeShaney does not foreclose the possibility of some obligation to protect students from violence in public schools."); Walton v. City of Southfield, 995 F.2d 1331, 1337 (6th Cir. 1993) ("Although DeShaney focuses on conditions during incarceration, an 'other similar restraint' is not necessarily limited to incarceration. The Supreme Court found a deprivation of personal security in a non-incarceration context in Ingraham v. Wright [cite omitted], where the Court held that while in school, junior high school students had a protected liberty interest in personal security. [cite omitted] However, Ingraham may turn on the fact that public school students are compelled by state law to attend school and are not permitted to withdraw from situations posing the risk of personal injury."); Black v. Indiana Area School District, 985 F.2d 707, 715 (3d Cir. 1993) (Scirica, J., concurring) ("Denying these § 1983 claims . . . ignores the practical realities of this case-the necessity for small school districts to contract out bus service, the reliance of families in rural areas upon school buses, and the defenselessness of young girls riding a school bus. When claims like these fall through the cracks, § 1983 seems less than the powerful tool to vindicate constitutional rights it was designed to be."); Maldonado v. Josey, 975 F.2d 727, 735 (10th Cir. 1992) (Seymour, J., concurring) ("In my judgment, the Fourteenth Amendment requires that we recognize some affirmative duty on the part of public school teachers to protect students who are in the total care of the school during the period of their compulsory attendance."), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1266 (1993); D.R. v. Middle Bucks Area Vocational Technical School, 972 F.2d 1364, 1377 (3d Cir. 1992) (Sloviter, C.J., dissenting) ("I would hold, that the state compulsion that students attend school, the status of most students as minors whose judgment is not fully mature, the discretion extended by the state to schools to control student behavior, and the pervasive control exercised by the schools over their students during the period of time they are in school, combine to create the type of special relationship which imposes a constitutional duty on the schools to protect the liberty interests of students while they are in the state's functional custody."), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1045 (1993); ., Lichtler v. County of Orange, 813 F. Supp. 1054, 1056 (S.D.N.Y. 1993) ("A state imposing compulsory attendance upon school children must take reasonable steps to protect those required to attend from foreseeable risks of personal injury or death."); Pagano by Pagano v. Massapequa Public Schools, 714 F. Supp. 641, 642-43 (E.D.N.Y. 1989) (elementary school students required to attend school were owed some duty of care by defendants to prevent physical and verbal abuse by other students).

See also Johnson v. Dallas Independent School District, 38 F.3d 198, 203 n.7 (5th Cir. 1994):

> The argument against holding that public schools have 'custody,' at least for some purposes of protecting their physical well-being, appears to derive less from logic than from a pragmatic desire to limit their legal liability. As has been shown, students must attend school and may not leave without permission. To say that student attendance is voluntary because parents may elect to home-school their children or send them to a private school is lamentably, for most parents, a myth. [cite omitted] To intimate that parents retain effective responsibility for their children's well-being when the school alone makes critical decisions regarding student safety and discipline is inaccurate. To suggest that parents somehow are in a better position than the schools to protect their children from the ravages of weapons smuggled onto campus during the school day is cruelly irrational. To hope that students who are unarmed can protect themselves from the depredation of armed criminals in their midst is ridiculous. That parents yield so much of their children's care into the hands of public school officials may well be argued to place upon the officials an obligation to protect students at least from certain kinds of foreseeably dangerous harm during regular school hours. The author of this opinion dissented in Doe v. Taylor ISD, [cite omitted]. In suggesting that the 'special relationship' theory of DeShaney may logically apply to public schools governed by compulsory attendance laws, I do not retreat from my reticence to expand the scope of constitutional claims, yet I feel compelled to observe the deficiencies of governing circuit caselaw.

Morrow v. Balaski, 719 F.3d 160, 188, 202 (3d Cir. 2013) (en banc) (Fuentes, J., with whom Judges Jordan, Vanaskie, and Nygaard join, and with whom Judge Ambro joins as to part I, dissenting) ("Reconsidering the coercive power that the State exercises over students, and the ways in which the State may restrict a student and his or her parents' ability to protect that student from harm, we would conclude, like Judge Becker in Middle Bucks, that a special relationship may exist under certain narrow circumstances. . . .It cannot be denied that schools both create and regulate the conditions to which students are subject during the school day. When a State interrupts even temporarily the provision of care by a parent to a child, steps into the shoes of that parent, and restricts the ability of the child to defend herself from a specific threat, the State ought to be seen as incurring a narrow, concomitant responsibility to act as one would expect the child's parents to act: to protect the child from that danger. The School's explicit refusal to do so should give us more pause than it does today. Moreover, when a school official chooses not to remove a student who has committed violent acts against another student, despite policies that call for such removal, that official has surely placed the victim in a worse position than if the disciplinary policy had run its ordinary course. And when a school creates an atmosphere in which serious violence is tolerated and brings no consequence, it acts in a manner that renders all students more vulnerable."); Doe ex rel Magee v. Covington County School Dist. ex rel Keys, 675 F.3d 849, 886 (5th Cir. 2012) (en banc) (Weiner, J., joined by Dennis, J., dissenting) ("Any case involving the rape of a child is, of course, a terrible one, so why is this case so shocking? Part of the special horror of this case is the appalling way in which Jane's parents' state-mandated trust in public school officials for the care and safety of their very young child was rewarded. In a case such as this, in which the alleged actions of state officials 'shock the conscience,'. . . the proper remedy is not merely to compensate the victim in tort, but, additionally, to compensate all of us with a constitutional remedy under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, which is intended 'to deter state actors from using the badge of their authority to deprive individuals of their federally guaranteed rights and to provide relief to victims if such deterrence fails.'").

Note the dicta in Justice Scalia's opinion in Vernonia School District 47J v. Acton, 115 S. Ct. 2386, 2392 (U.S. 1995):

> While we do not, of course, suggest that public schools as a general matter have such a degree of control over children as to give rise to a constitutional 'duty to protect,' see [DeShaney], we have acknowledged that for many purposes 'school authorities ac[t] in loco parentis,' [cite omitted], with the power and indeed the duty to 'inculcate the habits and manners of civility.'

See also Doucette v. Jacobs, 106 F.4th 156, 172, 175 (1st Cir. 2024) ("The determination as to whether conduct 'shocks the conscience' is 'necessarily fact-specific and unique to the particular circumstances.'. . '[W]here government officials must act in haste,' for instance, only actions 'undertaken maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm' will suffice. . . On the other hand, '[w]here actual deliberation on the part of a governmental defendant is practical,' 'deliberate indifference' can constitute 'conscience-shocking activity.'. . To establish deliberate indifference, the plaintiff must show 'at a bare minimum,' that the defendant 'actually knew of a substantial risk of serious harm' but 'disregarded that risk.'. . We have acknowledged that schools may have a duty under the Due Process Clause to protect students when faced with specific known hazards or perils, particularly when it comes to students who are 'manifestly unable to look after themselves,' such as 'very young children.'. . We cautioned, however, that to shock the conscience, only a case with truly 'pungent' or 'outrageous' facts could support a constitutional claim that a school acted with deliberate indifference…Accordingly, in Hasenfus we declined to hold a school liable under the Due Process Clause for a high school student's suicide attempt at school after a teacher harshly reprimanded her and sent her to an unsupervised location, finding that these unfortunate facts exhibited no conscious disregard of a known risk to the student, or that the teacher 'acted maliciously to cause harm.'. . . In short, because a reasonable jury could not conclude from this summary judgment record that GPS was so deliberately indifferent to B.D.'s health that it shocks the conscience, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment to GPS on the Doucettes' § 1983 claim."); Hasenfus v. LaJeunesse, 175 F.3d 68, 72 (1st Cir. 1999) ("[W]e are loath to conclude now and forever that inaction by a school toward a pupil could never give rise to a due process violation. From a commonsense vantage, Jamie is not just like a prisoner in custody who may be owed broad (but far from absolute) 'duty to protect.' But neither is she just like the young child in DeShaney who was at home in his father's custody and merely subject to visits by busy social workers who neglected to intervene. For limited purposes and for a portion of the day, students are entrusted by their parents to control and supervision of teachers in situations where − at least as to very young children − they are manifestly unable to look after themselves. Thus, when Vernonia says that the schools do not 'as a general matter' have a constitutional 'duty to protect,' perhaps in narrow circumstances there might be a 'specific' duty. . . . Yet even if we assume arguendo that in narrow circumstances the Supreme Court might find a due process obligation of the school or school employees to render aid to a student in peril − and Vernonia invites some caution − it would require pungent facts. The basic due process constraint, where substance and not procedure is involved, is against behavior so extreme as to 'shock the conscience.' . . . Outside of a few narrow categories, like the safeguarding of prisoners who have been wholly disabled from self-protection, this means conduct that is truly outrageous, uncivilized, and intolerable. . . . The outcome here would be no different under the more plaintiff-friendly standard developed in prison cases. Even under this standard, courts have been very reluctant to find prison guards liable for failing to prevent suicides unless confronted with specific imminent threats."); Morgan v. Town of Lexington, MA, 823 F.3d 737, 744 (1st Cir. 2016) (" An alleged failure of the school to be effective in stopping bullying by other students is not action by the state to create or increase the danger. These routine acts of school discipline, truancy enforcement, and administrator-parent conferences are not the vehicle for a substantive due process constitutional claim. . . . Moreover, viewing these acts as inaction does not help Morgan's argument. See Hasenfus, 175 F.3d at 72. The alleged acts in Morgan's complaints here simply do not approach the threshold of a state-created danger. . . See Rivera, 402 F.3d at 35 (collecting this circuit's cases finding no actionable set of facts). As such, Morgan's claim fails."); Thomas v. Town of Chelmsford, 267 F.Supp.3d 279, ___ (D. Mass. 2017) ("In short, the First Circuit has suggested that a public school may have an affirmative duty to protect a student in narrow circumstances where the school has actual knowledge that the student is in clear, obvious, and present peril. Even allowing for that narrow exception, the Camp Robindel incident does not qualify. The plaintiffs argue that the school was negligent in leaving students unsupervised when it knew that students had been bullied at previous camps, and it knew that Matthew had previously been bullied by particular students who were also at the camp. But the Camp Robindel incident was not a situation in which school officials knew that students were physically violating Matthew with a broomstick and yet failed to intervene—a situation that might fall into the narrow exception that the First Circuit described in Hasenfus. The school's knowledge of the possibility that Matthew might be subjected to more minor levels of bullying (such as urinating in his cleats without his knowledge) falls short of what is necessary to establish a DeShaney 'special relationship' affirmative constitutional duty on the school."); Morgan v. Driscoll, No. CIV.A. 9810766RWZ, 2002 WL 15695, at *4 (D. Mass. Jan.3, 2002) (not reported) ("The vast majority of federal courts have held that schools do not maintain a sufficiently 'custodial special relationship' with their students to give rise to a duty to protect them against injury from third parties. . . While the First Circuit has been disinclined to accept this broad notion that schools have no duty to protect students from the harmful acts of third parties, it has nonetheless recognized that a school has no general duty to protect students, and might only have a 'specific duty' to protect a student in situations where inaction and failure to protect the student would be 'truly outrageous, uncivilized, and intolerable' under the circumstances.' [citing Hasenfus v. LaJeunesse]); Willhauck v. Town of Mansfield, 164 F. Supp.2d 127, 133 (D. Mass. 2001) (noting that "[t]he First Circuit has yet to establish a firm rule. It has, however, expressed its reluctance to follow its sister circuits in holding without qualification that public schools owe their students no constitutional duty to protect.").

See also MGJ, et al. v. School District Of Philadelphia, No. CV 17-318, 2017 WL 2277276, at *9 (E.D. Pa. May 25, 2017) ("In the school context, students' freedom of movement is subject to the control of school officials. In exercising this authority to control student movement, school officials are reasonably expected to place students in situations where they will not be subject to obvious dangers. This is the status quo. District employees Ms. Lynch, Ms. Langston, and Ms. Roseman allegedly disrupted this status quo by placing MGJ in the same room as her known assailant. These defendants knew MGJ endured sexual harassment in the past at the hands of the assailant. . . They placed MGJ in the same room with the assailant, without adequate supervision, despite knowing the assailant had sexually harassed MGJ in the past. In this context, allowing MGJ to be in the same room as her assailant without supervision is akin to allowing a student to leave the school with a stranger. These allegations are sufficient to show the individual District Defendants affirmatively misused their authority to control student movement. MGJ accordingly pleads a violation of her constitutional right to support her failure to train or supervise claim.")

The majority view rejects the functional custody approach in school cases. See, e.g., L.S., ex rel. Hernandez v. Peterson, 982 F.3d 1323, 1329-30 (11th Cir. 2020) ("Ordinarily there are no custodial relationships in the public-school system, even if officials are aware of potential dangers or have expressed an intent to provide aid on school grounds. . . The students' efforts to avoid this rule are unavailing. They argue that even if there is no custodial relationship 'as a general matter,'. . . their appeal presents an exception. . . But Nix forecloses that argument. . . And even if we could contemplate exceptions, there is no reason to do so here. The students identify just one fact that differentiates this appeal from our precedents—the presence of armed school-safety officers—but the students fail to explain how the presence of these officers converts a non-custodial relationship into a custodial one. The officers' presence on school grounds, whether by itself or in combination with truancy and compulsory attendance laws, does not restrain students' freedom to act in a way that is comparable to incarceration or institutional confinement. . . Because the students were not in custody at school, they were not in a custodial relationship with the officials."); Doe v. Columbia-Brazoria ISD, 855 F.3d 681, 688-89 (5th Cir. 2017) ("In this case, Doe's claim does not arise from the abuse itself because no state actor committed it. . . Instead, there must have been some specific and actionable deficiency on the part of the District that allowed the abuse to occur. . . The case from which the special-relationship requirement was drawn stated that 'nothing in the language of the Due Process Clause itself requires the State to protect the life, liberty, and property of its citizens against invasion by private actors.'. . A complainant and the state have that relationship only 'when the State takes a person into its custody and holds him there against his will[.]'. . . The relationship exists 'when the state incarcerates a prisoner,' 'involuntarily commits someone to an institution,' or places a child in foster care. . . Notably, 'a public school does not have a special relationship with a student that would require the school to protect the student from harm at the hands of a private actor.'. . . .[I]n Covington, we declined to adopt the exception as the law of this Circuit. . . Subsequent panels have 'repeatedly noted' the unavailability of the theory. . . Finally, Doe failed to analyze the theory in a meaningful way in his opening brief. The argument is thus forfeited. . In summary, Doe's claims are not based on the private conduct of his assailant but on the District's shortcomings in monitoring the students, training the teachers, and establishing a reporting system for sexual assault. '[A] State's failure to protect an individual against private violence simply does not constitute a violation of the Due Process Clause.'. . . That leaves Doe with only the special-relationship theory, having forfeited the possibility of a state-created-danger argument. There was no special relationship between the plaintiff and the state. Doe has thus failed to prove a constitutional violation. The Section 1983 claims were properly dismissed."); K.B. v. Waddle, 764 F.3d 821, 824 (8th Cir. 2014) ("K.B. was not in state custody when she voluntarily participated in the Center's after-school program. There is no evidence that K.B. or S.H. were even under the supervision of any of the officials or their agencies at the time of the assault at the public pool."); Morrow v. Balaski, 719 F.3d 160, 170, 171 (3d Cir. 2013) (en banc) ("[E]very other Circuit Court of Appeals that has considered this issue in a precedential opinion has rejected the argument that a special relationship generally exists between public schools and their students. [collecting cases] Accordingly, the Supreme Court's dictum in Vernonia as well as the consensus from our sister Circuit Courts of Appeals both reinforce our conclusion that public schools, as a general matter, do not have a constitutional duty to protect students from private actors. We know of nothing that has occurred in the twenty years since we decided Middle Bucks that would undermine this conclusion. . . . In holding that public schools do not generally have a constitutional duty to protect students from private actors and that the allegations here are not sufficient to establish a special relationship, we do not foreclose the possibility of a special relationship arising between a particular school and particular students under certain unique and narrow circumstances. However, any such circumstances must be so significant as to forge a different kind of relationship between a student and a school than that which is inherent in the discretion afforded school administrators as part of the school's traditional in loco parentis authority or compulsory attendance laws."); Doe ex rel Magee v. Covington County School Dist. ex rel Keys, 675 F.3d 849, 857-66 (5th Cir. 2012) (en banc) ("We reaffirm, then, decades of binding precedent: a public school does not have a DeShaney special relationship with its students requiring the school to ensure the students' safety from private actors. Public schools do not take students into custody and hold them there against their will in the same way that a state takes prisoners, involuntarily committed mental health patients, and foster children into its custody. . . Without a special relationship, a public school has no constitutional duty to ensure that its students are safe from private violence. That is not to say that schools have absolutely no duty to ensure that students are safe during the school day. Schools may have such a duty by virtue of a state's tort or other laws. However, '[s]ection 1983 imposes liability for violations of rights protected by the Constitution, not for violations of duties of care arising out of tort law.'. . . No matter the age of the child, parents are the primary providers of food, clothing, shelter, medical care, and reasonable safety for their minor children. Thus, school children are returned to their parents' care at the end of each day, and are able to seek assistance from their families on a daily basis, unlike those who are incarcerated or involuntarily committed. . . . Because we find no special relationship, we do not address whether the school's alleged actions in releasing Jane to Keyes amounted to 'deliberate indifference.'. . . Without a special relationship, the school had no constitutional duty to protect Jane from private actors such as Keyes, and the question of its alleged deliberate indifference is simply immaterial. Having concluded that the school had no special relationship with Jane that imposed on the school a constitutional duty to protect her from private harm, we now turn to the Does' remaining theories of liability. . . . We decline to use this en banc opportunity to adopt the state-created danger theory in this case because the allegations would not support such a theory. . . . We conclude that the Does' allegations do not support a claim under the state-created danger theory, even if that theory were viable in this circuit."); Patel v. Kent School Dist., 648 F.3d 965, 973, 974 (9th Cir. 2011) ("Although we have not yet applied DeShaney to the context of compulsory school attendance, every one of our sister circuits to consider the issue has rejected Patel's argument. At least seven circuits have held that compulsory school attendance alone is insufficient to invoke the special-relationship exception. [collecting cases] Our sister circuits have reasoned that, unlike incarceration or institutionalization, compulsory school attendance does not restrict a student's liberty such that neither the student nor the parents can attend to the student's basic needs. . . Even when school attendance is mandatory, the parents − not the state − remain the student's primary caretakers. . . Going a step further, most of these circuits have expressly held that combining in loco parentis duties with compulsory school attendance still does not create a 'special relationship.'. . These decisions have emphasized that a state-law obligation does not necessarily create a duty of care under the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . Applying this bedrock principle, our sister circuits uniformly hold that requiring school attendance does not sufficiently restrict a student's liberty under DeShaney to transform the school's in loco parentis duties into a constitutional obligation. . . . To the extent Patel argues we should distinguish this case because the IEP obligated KHS to guard against A.H.'s special vulnerabilities, DeShaney suggests otherwise. . . . [W]hile the IEP may significantly strengthen Patel's state-law negligence claims, it does not give rise to a constitutional duty."); Lee v. Pine Bluff School District, 472 F.3d 1026, 1031 (8th Cir. 2007) ("As with compulsory public school attendance in Dorothy J., we cannot say that voluntary participation in an out-of-town extracurricular activity is analogous to confinement in a prison or mental institution, such that the Constitution imposes on state officials an affirmative duty to care for individuals who are participating in the event."); Priester v. Lowndes County, 354 F.3d 414, 422 (5th Cir.2004) ("[B]ecause no special relationship exists between a school district and its students during a school-sponsored football practice held outside of the time during which students are required to attend school for non-voluntary activities, the district court did not err in finding no requisite state action under section 1983."); Nix v. Franklin County School District, 311 F.3d 1373, 1378 (11th Cir. 2002) ("From the cases just discussed, two principles emerge: (1) generally, those individuals not in state custody will have no due-process claim for unsafe conditions; and (2) specifically, in a classroom setting, courts have not allowed due-process liability for deliberate indifference, and, moreover, will only allow recovery for intentional conduct under limited circumstances. Examining the Nixes' case in light of those concepts, we conclude that allegations of 'deliberate indifference' do not, in this fact situation, 'shock the conscience' in a way that gives rise to a due-process violation."); Shrum v. Kluck, 249 F.3d 773, 781 (8th Cir. 2001) ("[S]chool districts are not susceptible to this state-created danger theory of § 1983 liability, because there is no constitutional duty of care for school districts, as 'state-mandated school attendance does not entail so restrictive a custodial relationship as to impose a duty upon the state.' Dorothy J. v. Little Rock Sch. Dist., 7 F.3d 729, 732 (8th Cir.1993). Consequently, public schools do not have a duty to protect schoolchildren from private violence."); DeAnzona v. City and County of Denver, 222 F.3d 1229, 1234 (10th Cir. 2000) ("The Tenth Circuit has held repeatedly that because schools do not provide for a child's basic needs, schoolchildren do not have a special relationship with the government. . . . Where the parents are still the primary care givers for the child there is no special relationship and no due process violation."); Soper v. Hoben, 195 F.3d 845, 853 (6th Cir. 1999) (no special relationship created by compulsory school attendance); Wyke v. Polk County School Board, 129 F.3d 560, 569 (11th Cir. 1997) ("Wyke first submits that, because Shawn was a minor child in the custody of the school pursuant to Florida's compulsory school attendance laws, the school had a constitutional duty to protect him from harming himself. We explicitly reject that contention. Compulsory school attendance laws alone are not a 'restraint of personal liberty' sufficient to give rise to an affirmative duty of protection."); Doe v. Hillsboro Independent School District, 113 F.3d 1412, 1415 (5th Cir. 1997) (en banc) ("We join every circuit court that has considered the issue in holding that compulsory school attendance, in Texas to attend seven hours of programmed education on each school day, does not create the custodial relationship envisioned by DeShaney. The restrictions imposed by attendance laws upon students and their parents are not analogous to the restraints of prisons and mental institutions. The custody is intermittent and the student returns home each day. Parents remain the primary source for the basic needs of their children."); Doe v. Claiborne County, 103 F.3d 495, 510 (6th Cir. 1996) ("Although, clearly, a school system has an unmistakable duty to create and maintain a safe environment for its students as a matter of common law, its in loco parentis status or a state's compulsory attendance laws do not sufficiently 'restrain' students to raise a school's common law obligation to the rank of a constitutional duty."); Nabozny v. Podlesny, 92 F.3d 458-59 (7th Cir. 1996) ("However untenable it may be to suggest that under the Fourteenth Amendment a state can force a student to attend a school when school officials know that the student will be placed at risk of bodily harm, our court has concluded that local school administrations have no affirmative substantive due process duty to protect students."); Seamons v. Snow, 84 F.3d 1226, 1236 (10th Cir. 1996) ("Compulsory attendance laws for public schools . . . do not create an affirmative constitutional duty to protect students from the private actions of third parties while they attend school. . . . The school district in this case did not limit Brian's freedom to act on his own behalf, and therefore, no special relationship arose triggering a constitutional obligation to protect Brian from other students."); Sargi v. Kent City Board of Education, 70 F.3d 907, 911 (6th Cir. 1995) ("Although we have not addressed the question of whether compulsory attendance laws create a special relationship between school districts and their students that gives rise to an affirmative duty on the part of the school district to protect its students, a number of other circuits have held that they do not in the factual situations they have reviewed. [citing cases] . . . . We find that the reasons given in these cases for the absence of such a duty in the classroom where school attendance is mandatory are even more compelling in the context of a student's presence on a school bus. While on the school bus, decedent was even less affected by state restraints than she was in school. . . . Therefore, we hold that there was no special relationship between decedent and the school district that gave rise to a constitutional duty on the part of the Board to protect her from the consequences of a seizure while she was on the school bus. We do not hold that school districts have no duty of protection of students in other situations not before us. The nature and extent of such duties will have to be decided case by case."); Wright v. Lovin, 32 F.3d 538, 540 (11th Cir. 1994) ("To date, every federal circuit court of appeal to address the question of whether compulsory school attendance laws create the necessary custodial relationship between school and student to give rise to a constitutional duty to protect students from harm by non-state actors has rejected the existence of any such duty. [citing cases] . . . . Because Daniel's attendance at summer school was voluntary and not compulsory, we need not, and do not, decide whether mandatory school attendance laws impose a constitutional duty on schools to protect students from injury by third parties. However, we find that the reasons given by our sister circuits for the absence of such a duty when school attendance is mandatory are even more compelling when school attendance is voluntary. Therefore, we hold that Daniel's voluntary school attendance did not create a custodial relationship between himself and the school sufficient to give rise to a constitutional duty of protection."); Graham v. Independent School District, 22 F.3d 991, 994 (10th Cir. 1994) ("[W]e have clearly held compulsory school attendance laws do not spawn an affirmative duty to protect under the Fourteenth Amendment. [footnote omitted] Nonetheless, plaintiffs urge Maldonado's holding does not foreclose the existence of a constitutional tort where a student is the victim of a foreseeable assault. . . . We hold foreseeability cannot create an affirmative duty to protect when plaintiff remains unable to allege a custodial relationship."); Dorothy J. v. Little Rock School District, 7 F.3d 729, 732 (8th Cir. 1993) (agreeing with Third, Seventh and Tenth Circuits that "state-mandated school attendance does not entail so restrictive a custodial relationship as to impose upon the State the same duty to protect it owes to prison inmates . . . or to the involuntarily institutionalized."); Black v. Indiana Area School District, 985 F.2d 707, 714 (3d Cir. 1993) (where neither state compulsory attendance law nor any other state rule required children to ride school bus driven by private independent contractor, and where plaintiffs were not deprived of any avenue of assistance that would have been available absent state involvement, School Superintendent had no affirmative duty to protect six, seven and eight year old girls from acts of sexual molestation committed by bus driver.); Maldonado v. Josey, 975 F.2d 727, 732 (10th Cir. 1992) ("compulsory attendance laws do not create an affirmative constitutional duty to protect students from the private actions of third parties while they attend school."), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1266 (1993); D.R. v. Middle Bucks Area Vocational Technical School, 972 F.2d 1364, 1372 (3d Cir. 1992) (en banc) ("[T]he school defendants' authority over D.R. during the school day cannot be said to create the type of physical custody necessary to bring it within the special relationship noted in DeShaney . . . ."), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1045 (1993); J.O. v. Alton Community Unit School Dist. 11, 909 F.2d 267, 272-73 (7th Cir. 1990) ("School children are not like mental patients and prisoners such that the state has an affirmative duty to protect them.").

See also Lansberry, on behalf of Estate of W.J.L. v. Altoona Area School Dist., 356 F.Supp.3d 486, ___ & n.12 (W.D. Pa. 2018) ("Courts within the Third Circuit have confronted Monell claims in the context of student-on-student school bullying and have consistently found that the plaintiffs failed to allege the violation of a constitutional right.

[collecting cases] The Third Circuit has held that there was no constitutional violation where a plaintiff brought a Monell claim against a school district for failing to prevent student-on-student bullying. . . . In Morrow, the Third Circuit held that 'public schools, as a general matter, do not have a constitutional duty to protect students from private actors,' including other students. . . Although Morrow did not involve a Monell claim, the Third Circuit in Bridges [ex rel. D.B. v. Scranton Sch. Dist., 644 F. App'x 172 (3d Cir. 2016)] held that its en banc decision in Morrow precluded the plaintiffs in Bridges from pleading the requisite constitutional violation. . . . Courts within other circuits have reached the same conclusion when dealing with Monell claims involving student-on-student bullying. [collecting cases] In these cases, courts have found that school officials did not violate the students' right to bodily integrity under the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution by failing to prevent student-on-student bullying or violence.[12] [fn. 12: During the Court's research on Monell claims in the school bullying context, the Court only uncovered two district court decisions where a Monell claim was allowed to proceed based on a school's alleged violation of a student's constitutional right to bodily integrity by failing to prevent student-on-student bullying. See Lewis v. Blue Springs Sch. Dist., No 4:17-cv-538, 2017 WL 5011893 (W.D. Mo. Nov. 2, 2017); T.Y. v. Shawnee Mission Sch. Dist. USD 512, No. 17-2589-DDC-GEB, 2018 WL 2722501, at *10 (D. Kan. June 6, 2018) (citing Lewis). In Lewis, the court found that the school was on notice of a bullying problem and that the school district 'failed to properly train its employees in effective ways to respond to and prevent bullying.'. . The court in Lewis also noted that 'empirical research has shown for the past 20 years that severe, ongoing, targeted bullying in schools is pervasive and routinely results in clinical depression, suicidal thoughts, and suicide among its targeted victims. Anti-bullying policies and law, when complied with, have been proven to reduce and prevent such bullying.'. . The court there ultimately concluded that the school's 'failure to train and supervise ... deprived [the student] of his rights, including his right to bodily integrity, to be secure and to be left alone, to his life, and his rights to substantive due process.'. . The Court firstly notes that the Eighth Circuit, in which the Western District of Missouri lies, has a different standard for failure-to-train Monell claims. Second, the Court notes that the court in Lewis did not thoroughly analyze the underlying constitutional violation before allowing the student-plaintiff's Monell claim to proceed. The same distinctions apply to the T.Y. case.] Put differently, the cases are in agreement that students do not have a constitutional right to be free from bullying and harassment from other students. Here, the Court is obligated to reach the same conclusion — Lansberry's Second Amended Complaint does not sufficiently allege the violation of a constitutional right. Lansberry only alleges that AASD officials were deliberately indifferent to W.J.L.'s right to bodily integrity by failing to prevent other students from bullying W.J.L. The Court recognizes that the bullying W.J.L. was subjected to at AASD was appalling and that it created a truly dreadful experience for W.J.L. at Altoona Junior High School. The Court further recognizes that school bullying is a pervasive problem nationally and the possibility that bullying might eventually result, as it did here, in tragic harm to the bullied student. And finally, the Court recognizes that AASD officials have consistently failed to stop bullying and therefore allowed a toxic bullying environment to flourish. If that situation was recognized as a constitutional violation then the ruling of this Court would be contrary to the result of this case. However, harm caused by student-on-student bullying is not a constitutional harm that Monell protects against. Regardless their obligations under school policy and the common sense proposition and public expectation that school officials should keep students safe from known risks, AASD officials had no recognized constitutional obligation to protect W.J.L. from his peers. The Fourteenth Amendment right to bodily integrity protects individuals against harm caused by state actors, and not harm caused by third parties. Here, Lansberry does not allege that AASD officials directly violated W.J.L.'s right to bodily integrity. Rather, Lansberry alleges that AASD officials failed to prevent third parties — W.J.L.'s classmates— from violating W.J.L.'s right to bodily integrity. And while the persistent bullying ultimately resulted in W.J.L.'s deciding to take his own life, Lansberry does not allege that any AASD official played a direct role in this tragic decision, or that any AASD official had notice that W.J.L. planned to harm himself. Therefore, AASD officials' failure to intervene before W.J.L.'s suicide does not establish that those same officials violated W.J.L.'s constitutional right to bodily integrity by failing to protect W.J.L. from bullying at school. Moreover, because at least some of the bullying occurred after school and through electronic means, it is not clear that AASD officials would have been able to prevent the bullying completely, even if they had exercised extreme diligence in enforcing Altoona Junior High School's anti-bullying policy. Lansberry alleges that a portion of the bullying occurred 'off school property while on his walk to his Father's residence and through social media.'. . In his investigation, Detective Worling found messages where other students at Altoona Junior High School sent harassing messages to W.J.L.'s iPhone and iPad. . . These messages could have been sent to W.J.L.'s iPhone and iPad after school hours. Thus, it is not clear that AASD officials could have completely prevented the W.J.L.'s bullying, and the harm that it ultimately caused, even if they had aggressively enforced the school's anti-bullying policies. Accordingly, the Court is obligated to find that Lansberry does not sufficiently allege the violation of a constitutional right. The Court is sensitive to the tragic situation that the Lansberry family has been forced to endure and strongly condemns the repeated failure of AASD officials to prevent bullying in the time leading up to W.J.L.'s death. The Court also believes that bullied students and their families should have some recourse against school officials who fail to create a safe learning environment and repeatedly fail to protect students from known dangers. However, prior case law does not allow bullied students and their families to hold school officials accountable through constitutional litigation in the federal courts. . . Therefore, the Court is obligated to dismiss Lansberry's Monell claim."); L.S. v. Peterson, No. 18-CV-61577, 2018 WL 6573124, at *5 (S.D. Fla. Dec. 13, 2018) ("Plaintiffs suggest that the essential nature of a public school's role and control over its students requires that schools provide protection and safety for their students. However, the suggestion that school attendance equates to the level of custody implicating a constitutional obligation to protect has been expressly rejected by the Eleventh Circuit. . . .Therefore, even assuming that Defendants intentionally disregarded warnings about Cruz, Plaintiffs' § 1983 claim fails because they cannot assert the violation of a constitutional right. See Aracena v. Gruler, --- F. Supp. 3d ---, 2018 WL 5961040, at *5 (M.D. Fla. Nov. 14, 2018) (finding no due process rights implicated in officer's response to Pulse nightclub shooting because the entire circumstance began and ended with a private actor)."); Pope v. Trotwood-Madison City School District Bd of Educ., 162 F.Supp.2d 803, 810 (S.D. Ohio 2001) ("[T]he Court concludes that the facts alleged in the Plaintiff's Complaint fail to demonstrate a violation of Lamar Pope's substantive due process rights. Lamar Pope was not deprived of his liberty when he voluntarily elected to play basketball during the open-gym tryout. Consequently, the Fourteenth Amendment did not impose upon the Defendants an obligation to assure his safety. . . . Pope's status as a student does nothing to change this conclusion."); Oldham v. Cincinnati Public Schools, 118 F. Supp.2d 867, 875 (S.D. Ohio 2000) ("Although, clearly a school system has an unmistakable duty to create and maintain a safe environment for its students as a matter of common law, its in loco parentis status or a State's compulsory attendance laws do not sufficiently 'restrain' students in a manner that would raise a school's common law obligation to the rank of a constitutional duty toward its students.").

See also Stevens v. Umsted, 131 F.3d 697, 702-03 (7th Cir. 1997) ("Since DeShaney, we have found several situations that entail a degree of restraint on an individual's personal liberty that make them sufficiently similar to the situations of incarceration and institutionalization, thereby creating a constitutional duty to protect. . . .In reliance on K.H., through Murphy, and Camp, Stevens argues that Umsted had a constitutional duty to protect Bradley because he was in state custody or because the state exercised 'de facto custody' over him. However, Bradley's situation is distinguishable from these cases. First and foremost, Bradley was not taken into custody by the state. Quite the contrary, he was voluntarily admitted to the ISVI [Illinois School for the Visually Impaired], either on the application of his school district or directly by his parents, but in either instance it was with the signed consent of his parents. Additionally, the state never became the legal guardian of Bradley, and his father retained legal custody of him. . . Although Bradley could not have packed his bags and left the school on his own volition, Stevens, as Bradley's parent and guardian, could have requested that Bradley be discharged at any time. . . . [W]e need not decide the relevancy of voluntariness in this case, because the state did not have custody of Bradley. Therefore, as Bradley was not in state custody, the complaint fails to allege facts sufficient to outline the existence of a state duty to protect him from private actors under the 'custody' exception as outlined in DeShaney and its progeny."); Walton v. Alexander, 44 F.3d 1297, 1305 (5th Cir. 1995) (en banc) (where attendance at school was voluntary and there was a right to leave at will, child's "status as a resident student [did not place] him within the narrow class of persons who are entitled to claim from the state a constitutional duty of protection from harm at the hands of private parties."); Spivey v. Elliott, 29 F.3d 1522, 1525 (11th Cir. 1994) (finding duty owed to eight-year-old, hearing impaired residential student in Georgia School of the Deaf; "It is plaintiff's status as a residential student that distinguishes his circumstance from that of the student-plaintiffs in [other cited cases]. Each of those cases involved a day school situation where the students attended school for a set number of hours and returned home to the supervision of their parents and the protection of their homes at the end of the day. Thus, it was still the children's parents who had ultimate control of their basic needs on a daily basis. [Plaintiff] could not go home at the end of the day. [Plaintiff] had only the State upon which to rely for his food, shelter, and safety during the school week."), opinion withdrawn, 41 F.3d 1497, 1499 (11th Cir. 1995) ("[I]n the interest of efficiency and collegiality on this Court, where there are differing views as to the substantive right, this panel has chosen to withdraw all of its prior opinion which relates to whether the complaint alleges a constitutional right so that the opinion will serve as no precedent on that issue. The opinion is fully reaffirmed, however, on the holding that there was no constitutional duty clearly established at the time of the sexual assault, so the defendant officials were properly entitled to qualified immunity."); Johnson v. Dallas Independent School District, 38 F.3d 198, 203 (5th Cir. 1994) ("While a persuasive argument can be made for applying a DeShaney 'special relationship' in some measure to public school students who are forced by compulsory education laws to attend school and have no choice among public schools, even under such a legal regime the appellant's claim would not succeed. Andrew Gaston's death is attributable to the fortuity that an armed, violent non-student trespassed on campus. There can be no liability of state actors for this random criminal act unless the fourteenth amendment were to make the schools virtual guarantors of student safety − a rule never yet adopted even for those in society, such as prisoners or the mentally ill or handicapped, who are the beneficiaries of a 'special relationship' with the state.").

See also Doe ex rel Magee v. Covington County School Dist. ex rel Keys, 675 F.3d 849, 874, 875 (5th Cir. 2012) (en banc) (Higgenson, J., concurring in the judgment) ("To summarize, Section 1983 should be construed literally. Literal application of Section 1983 would narrow only to government custody the DeShaney 'special relationship' theory of actionable inaction, as explicitly stated by the late Chief Justice Rehnquist, and literal application of Section 1983 would reduce only to statutory elements the amorphous 'state-created danger' theory we have not endorsed. At the same time, literal application of Section 1983 would (1) acknowledge that the statute protects not just against government persons who subject citizens to a constitutional deprivation but also against government persons who cause citizens to be subjected to such deprivations; (2) avoid government persons (courts) from immunizing other government persons (state or local officials) from liability for wrongdoing which electors, through Congress, have made actionable and which non-government persons (jurors) should resolve; and (3) would apply Section 1983's syntax to comprehend the rare but tragic set of grey zone cases where government persons, intentionally or recklessly or through deliberate indifference, cause, consistent with Martinez, a victim to be subjected by a third person to a rights deprivation. Having made the above statutory observation—urging narrowed liability on extra-statutory theories emanating from dicta in DeShaney, but recognizing liability for government persons who non-negligently cause in time and circumstance citizens to be subjected to constitutional injury actually inflicted by others—I nonetheless conclude that the instant complaint, put alongside the plain language of Section 1983, is not congruent enough to survive summary dismissal. Instead of setting forth a facially plausible charge of government recklessness or indifference or intentionality in the release of Jane that caused her to be subjected to her injury, the complaint's preliminary statement (paragraph 1), statement of facts (paragraphs 2–7), and above all its '[b]ut for' allegation in its 'action for deprivation of civil rights' (paragraphs 20–25), focus exclusively on the opposite, namely the education defendants' alleged policy of inaction, giving school officials who check out children discretion to verify or not to verify the identification of receiving adults. That contention describes liability non-causally, which is the extra-statutory theory of liability recognized by the Supreme Court to apply only in custodial settings.")

See also Levin v. Harleston, 966 F.2d 85, 90 (2d Cir. 1992) (City College had no constitutional duty to protect Professor from student disruptions and demonstrations); Philadelphia Police and Fire Association for Handicapped Children v. City of Philadelphia, 874 F.2d 156, 166-168 (3d Cir. 1989) (rejecting argument that mentally retarded persons living at home were in "constructive custody" of state and therefore owed an affirmative duty of care under substantive due process); Was v. Young, 796 F. Supp. 1041 (E.D. Mich. 1992) (functional custody concept did not apply to plaintiffs who were attacked by private citizens when they attended fireworks display co-sponsored by City).

See also Stoneking v. Bradford Area School District, 882 F.2d 720, 723 (3d Cir. 1989) (Stoneking II) (op. on remand), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 1044 (1990) ("Arguably, our earlier discussion noting that 'students are in what may be viewed as functional custody of the school authorities' during their presence at school because they are required to attend under Pennsylvania law...is not inconsistent with the DeShaney opinion.").

The court in Stoneking II recognized, however, that the situation in that case was very different from DeShaney because the injury (sexual molestation) to the plaintiff resulted from the conduct of a state employee, not a private actor. Id. at 724. See also Doxtator v. O'Brien, 39 F.4th 852, 867 (7th Cir. 2022) ("In sum, the Estate ignores the nuances of Deshaney and its outgrowth of exceptions. The Estate attempts to frame the 'state-created danger' exception as a claim unto itself and extracts the applicable elements from their context, copying them into its brief as if they make out a free-standing claim. But Deshaney was limited to private acts of harm. Exceptions to Deshaney's holding thus also apply only to instances involving private acts of harm. This case involves harm carried out by public law enforcement officers, and therefore Deshaney and the exceptions thereto are wholly inapposite. We therefore affirm the lower court's entry of summary judgment on the Estate's state-created danger claim."); Rhodes v. Michigan, 10 F.4th 665, 684 (6th Cir. 2021) ("We agree with the district court that the state-created-danger doctrine does not apply where a state actor directly causes the plaintiff's asserted injury. . . Applying the state-created-danger doctrine in cases like this one, where a state actor directly causes the plaintiff's injury, would divorce the doctrine from its precedential roots. . . . [T]he state-created-danger doctrine tells us when a state actor can be held accountable for harms caused by some external force but does not provide a vehicle for the plaintiff to hold state actors accountable for injuries suffered as a direct result of state action. . . Because Rhodes is seeking to hold Jones and McPherson accountable for their actions that directly caused her injuries, her state-created-danger claim must fail."); Lanman v. Hinson, 529 F.3d 673, 682-83 (6th Cir. 2008) ("The district court relied on DeShaney . . .for the proposition that it was the involuntary nature of the individual's confinement that invoked the Fourteenth Amendment's protections in Youngberg and Terrance. . . .Therefore, it held, because Lanman voluntarily committed himself to Kalamazoo Regional Psychiatric Hospital ("KPH") by signing an admission application, and was theoretically free to leave at any time, he was not owed any duties under the Fourteenth Amendment. We disagree. DeShaney does not address a situation in which the State itself, by the affirmative acts of its agents, infringes on an individual's constitutionally protected liberty interests. The Court in DeShaney recognized that the protections of the Due Process Clause may be triggered when the State affirmatively acts and subjects an involuntarily confined individual to deprivations of liberty which are not among those generally authorized by his confinement. . . Likewise, the Due Process Clause would protect a voluntarily confined individual from deprivations of liberty by state actors that exceed those authorized by his consent to treatment. The mechanism which brought the individuals to the various facilities, whether considered 'voluntary' or 'involuntary,' is not controlling; in either case they are entitled to freedom from undue restraint at the hands of the State under the Fourteenth Amendment.").

See also Doe v. Taylor Independent School District, 15 F. 3d 443, 454 (5th Cir. 1994) (en banc) ("A supervisory school official can be held personally liable for a subordinate's violation of an elementary or secondary school student's constitutional right to bodily integrity in physical sexual abuse cases if the plaintiff establishes that: (1) the defendant learned of facts or a pattern of inappropriate sexual behavior by a subordinate pointing plainly toward the conclusion that the subordinate was sexually abusing the student; and (2) the defendant demonstrated deliberate indifference toward the constitutional rights of the student by failing to take action that was obviously necessary to prevent or stop the abuse; and (3) such failure caused a constitutional injury to the student."), cert. denied, 115 S. Ct. 70 (1994); C.M. v. Southeast Delco School District, 828 F. Supp. 1179, 1189 (E.D. Pa. 1993) ("[T]he affirmative-duty line should be drawn at state action. That is, in light of Stoneking and D.R., DeShaney stands only for the proposition that states have no affirmative duty to protect people from private actors, rather than the broader proposition that states have no duty to protect people from actors who are the state's own."); Waechter v. School District No. 14-030, 773 F. Supp. 1005, 1009 & n.5 (W.D. Mich. 1991) (child was in custodial relationship with teacher).

But see Doe v. Rains County Independent School District, 66 F.3d 1402, 1410 (5th Cir. 1995) ("That a supervisory school official may be held liable under § 1983 for breaching his state-law duty to stop or prevent child abuse thus does not compel the conclusion that a nonsupervisory teacher is responsible for breaching a state-law duty to report the abuse."). Accord Doe v. Claiborne County, 103 F.3d 495, 512 (6th Cir. 1996) (concluding that "to state a claim for a failure to act when the alleged wrongdoer is not a supervisory government official, a plaintiff must separately establish the 'color of law' requirement of section 1983 by identifying some cognizable duty that state or federal law imposes upon the alleged 'enactor.' In the absence of a duty there is no section 1983 liability because the failure to act cannot be said to have occurred under color of law.").

See also Torres-Rivera v. O'Neill-Cancel, 406 F.3d 43, 51 (1st Cir. 2005) ("As Martinez explains, the DeShaney substantive due process rule . . . does not apply where it is an on-duty police officer acting under color of law whose violence causes the injury."); Martinez-Rodriguez v. Colon-Pizarro, 54 F.3d 980, 986 (1st Cir. 1995) ("[W]hen an on-duty police officer witnesses violence, the existence vel non of a constitutional duty to intervene will most often hinge on whether he is witnessing private violence or violence attributable to state action."), cert. denied, 116 S.Ct. 515 (1995); D.T. by M.T. v. Independent School District No. 16, 894 F.2d 1176, 1192 (10th Cir. 1990)(School District not liable for child molestation committed by teacher, where teacher not acting under color of state law), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 879 (1990); Doe v. Sabine Parish School Board, 24 F. Supp.2d 655, 664 (W.D. La. 1998) ("[A] district court should be reluctant when addressing sensitive constitutional issues to read appellate decisions in an overly broad fashion. The language in Becerra and the Doe v. Hillsboro concurrence should, accordingly, be limited to the facts of those cases to the extent that they are controlling law. Both cases involved situations where the school employed an abuser who just happened to not be engaged in state action at the actual moment of the abuse. Subjecting school officials to liability for deliberate indifference to the acts of its employees, whether committed on or off duty, is at least one step away from subjecting officials to liability for failure to supervise purely private persons who harm a student.").

(ii) foster care cases

The Court in DeShaney expressed no view on whether an affirmative duty to protect might arise in the situation where a state removes a child from "free society" and places him in a foster home. The majority acknowledged that such a situation might be "sufficiently analogous to incarceration or institutionalization to give rise to an affirmative duty to protect." Id. at 1006 n.9.

See e.g., Hunt v. Montano, 39 F.th 1270, 1282 (10th Cir. 2022) ("We agree with the district court that Montano and Griffin behaved in a manner that shocks the judicial conscience consistent with our earlier cases. Accepting the allegations in the complaint as true, Montano and Griffin licensed Crownover—and Montano circumvented CYFD protocols to permit Barreras, T.B., and F.B. to be repeatedly placed in her care—despite her history of crime, past dangerous relationships, financial situation, alcohol and drug problems, and record of physical abuse against a child in her care. They knew Crownover's home lacked necessary beds and bedding but never followed up to make sure she purchased some before providing care. They allowed Crownover to care for the children even as CYFD investigated reports of abuse by Crownover against T.B. and F.B. The notes hastily entered after Barreras's death suggest a shocking degree of malfeasance when compared with the condition of the home in December 2017. Montano and Griffin consciously placed the children in a perilous environment and ignored signs of continued danger and abuse as time went on. Because of their conduct, toddlers T.B. and F.B. suffered physical abuse and lost their infant sister. Barreras lost her life. The 'cumulative impression' of the conduct in this case is dismal and damning. . . The effects were devastating. The children's representatives have plausibly alleged that Montano and Griffin are responsible. If the allegations in the complaint are substantiated, their actions shock our conscience enough to impose liability under the special relationship doctrine."); Estate of Place v. Anderson, No. 19-1269, 2022 WL 1467645, at *5–6 (10th Cir. May 10, 2022) (not reported) ("We have explicitly recognized that foster children have a substantive due process right to protection while in foster care. . . Thus, 'foster care is recognized as one of the custodial relationships that creates a special relationship.'. . This special relationship 'triggers a continuing duty which is subsequently violated if a state official "knew of the asserted danger to [a foster child] or failed to exercise professional judgment with respect thereto, ... and if an affirmative link to the injuries [the child] suffered can be shown.'". . But we require more than a state official's mere failure to exercise professional judgment. . . The abdication of her professional duty must be sufficient to shock the conscience. . . We have defined 'conduct that shocks the judicial conscience' as 'deliberate government action that is "arbitrary" and "unrestrained by the established principles of private right and distributive justice."'. . . Indeed, Defendants' behavior must be 'egregious and outrageous.'. . We consider Defendants' 'conduct as a whole'—'both action and inaction'—in assessing whether that behavior is conscience shocking. . . In evaluating substantive due process claims in this context, we consider: '(1) the general need for restraint; (2) the concern that § 1983 not replace state tort law; and (3) the need for deference to local policy decisions impacting public safety.'. . Rather than precisely define the boundaries of conscience-shocking behavior, we have left them to 'evolve over time.'. . We have established, however, that conscience shocking behavior 'requires a high level of outrageousness, because the Supreme Court has specifically admonished that a substantive due process violation requires more than an ordinary tort.'. . Thus, 'liability for negligently inflicted harm is categorically beneath the threshold of constitutional due process.'"); Tamas v. Department of Social & Health Services, 630 F.3d 833, 844-46 (9th Cir. 2010) ("[P]rior to Fabregas' adoption of Monica, various Appellants affirmatively created the particular danger that exposed Monica to harm. Despite referrals reporting Fabregas' physical and sexual abuse, Kleinhein, Loeffler and Drake approved Fabregas' foster-care licenses, paving the way for Fabregas to continue abusing Monica after her adoption. The state's approval of Monica's foster care and adoption by Fabregas created a danger of molestation that Monica would not have faced had the state adequately protected her as a result of the referrals. . . .Therefore, we conclude that Monica's liberty interest continued after her adoption under the danger-creation exception to the general rule that state actors are not liable for failure to protect members of the public. . . . In the specific context of cases involving foster care, the Fifth, Sixth, and Eighth Circuits have held that deliberate indifference is established if an 'official [was] both aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exist[ed] and [the official] ... also dr[e]w the inference.' [citing cases] . . . . The Second, Third, Fourth, Seventh, Tenth, and Eleventh Circuits have each phrased the deliberate indifference test along the same lines. [citing cases] We are persuaded by our precedent and cases from other circuits analyzing the issue, that the deliberate indifference standard, as applied to foster children, requires a showing of an objectively substantial risk of harm and a showing that the officials were subjectively aware of facts from which an inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm existed and that either the official actually drew that inference or that a reasonable official would have been compelled to draw that inference. . . We also conclude that the subjective component may be inferred 'from the fact that the risk of harm is obvious.'"); Doe ex rel. Johnson v. South Carolina Dept. of Social Services, 597 F.3d 163, 175-77 (4th Cir. 2010) ("We now hold that when a state involuntarily removes a child from her home, thereby taking the child into its custody and care, the state has taken an affirmative act to restrain the child's liberty, triggering the protections of the Due Process Clause and imposing 'some responsibility for [the child's] safety and general well-being.'. . Such responsibility, in turn, includes a duty not to make a foster care placement that is deliberately indifferent to the child's right to personal safety and security. . . . [U]nlike the children in DeShaney, Milburn and Weller, Jane was clearly within the custody and control of the state social services department when foster care placement decisions were made. Accordingly, the state officials responsible for those decisions had a corresponding duty to refrain from placing her in a known, dangerous environment in deliberate indifference to her right to personal safety and security. We affirm the grant of summary judgment, however, under the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry. Although our precedents do not foreclose a foster child's claim that her substantive due process right to personal safety and security is violated by a foster care placement made in deliberate indifference to a known danger, such a right was not clearly established in this circuit at the time Thompson made her placement decisions regarding Jane. In determining whether there has been a violation of a constitutional right, we must identify the right 'at a high level of particularity.'. . . Here, when the placement decisions were made, there was no authority from the Supreme Court or this circuit that would have put Thompson on fair notice that her actions violated Jane's substantive due process rights. On the contrary, given the precedents that did exist in our circuit on the issue of affirmative state protection of foster children, we think it quite reasonable for jurists and officials to have believed that we would have answered the DeShaney question in the negative and foreclosed the existence of such a right. In sum, because it would not have been apparent to a reasonable social worker in Thompson's position that her actions violated the Fourteenth Amendment, she is entitled to qualified immunity."); Burton v. Richmond, 370 F.3d 723, 728 (8th Cir. 2004) ("Here, DFS never had custody of the plaintiffs, nor can it fairly be said that DFS had control of them. Nor did defendants have a duty to protect plaintiffs under the state-created danger theory. The danger in this case − the placement in the Huffman home − was created by Rhonda and Jean's agreement as to the best custodial arrangement for the family. Neither DFS nor the individual defendants took an active role in creating this placement; they merely helped the family get recognition from the juvenile court of the changed custodial arrangement. The placement was made by the court upon recommendation from the juvenile officer and did not result directly from any action taken by either appellant. Recommending to the juvenile officer the placement agreed to by the plaintiffs' aunt and grandmother was not sufficient to create a duty to protect the children while in the placement."); Nicini v. Morra, 212 F.3d 798, 807, 808 (3d Cir. 2000) ("After DeShaney, many of our sister courts of appeals held that foster children have a substantive due process right to be free from harm at the hands of state-regulated foster parents. [citing cases] These courts have accepted the analogy between persons the state places in foster care and those it incarcerates or institutionalizes. . . .We have suggested, although never directly held, that state actors owe a duty to children placed in foster care. . . . We now hold that when the state places a child in state-regulated foster care, the state has entered into a special relationship with that child which imposes upon it certain affirmative duties. The failure to perform such duties can give rise, under sufficiently culpable circumstances, to liability under section 1983."); Doe v. New York City Dept. of Soc. Services, 649 F.2d 134, 141-42 (2d Cir. 1981), cert. denied sub. nom. Catholic Home Bureau v. Doe, 464 U.S. 864 (1983); Taylor by and through Walker v. Ledbetter, 818 F.2d 791, 797 (11th Cir. 1987) (en banc), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1065 (1989) (affirmative duty under substantive due process to provide protection and supervision created by virtue of "special relationship" between state and child placed in foster home).

See also D.C. by Cabelka v. County of San Diego, No. 18-CV-13-WQH-MSB, 2020 WL 1674583, at *12, *14 (S.D. Cal. Apr. 6, 2020) ("The Court has determined that the Minor Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged that the Social Worker Defendants violated the Minor Plaintiffs' substantive due process rights at this stage in the proceedings. 'It is beyond dispute' that at the time of the Social Worker Defendants' alleged conduct, 'state officials could be held liable where they affirmatively and with deliberate indifference placed an individual in danger she would not otherwise have faced.'"); R.F.J. v. Florida Department of Children and Families, No. 3:15-CV-1184-J-32JBT, 2019 WL 3207334, at *4–7 (M.D. Fla. July 16, 2019) ("Brady and Perry argue that substantive due process is not implicated here because the children were not in foster care. . . They advocate a bright line rule that whenever the state places a child with a relative without first taking custody, the Fourteenth Amendment is not implicated. It follows, according to Brady and Perry, that because the children were never taken into state custody, Brady and Perry could not have violated their rights. . . The Court is unpersuaded. Children do not need to be placed into foster care for a constitutional duty to arise—it is sufficient if the state affirmatively places the children with a person of the state's choosing and restrains the children's freedom to act on their own behalf. . . Thus, Brady and Perry's claim that Swearingen, the grandmother, was 'in no sense a state actor,'. . . is inapposite. Although, Swearingen was not a state actor in the same way a licensed foster parent might be, she was nonetheless the 'person[ ] the state ha[d] chosen' to care for the children. . . If state officials affirmatively act to remove children and place them with an individual the state officials have chosen, they cannot avoid their obligation to ensure reasonably safe living conditions simply because the person chosen is not a state-licensed foster parent. . . . Of course, young children cannot provide food, clothes, or shelter for themselves. Thus, a reasonable government official might ask: under what circumstances does placing young children with relatives restrict the children's freedom to act on their own behalf? The answer is when the state chooses someone different to care for the children. Here, the children's parents left them with Peoples and Woods. Had Brady and Perry allowed Peoples and Woods to continue to care for the children, there likely would be no state action— DeShaney would control. But that is not what happened. Instead, Brady exerted his power on behalf of the state and 'directed placement of the Children with Swearingen at a new location.'. . This action imposed on the state the obligation to ensure the children's reasonable safety. . . .Unlike, the county's actions in DeShaney, Brady and Perry's actions put the children in a worse position than if they had not acted at all. . . Thus, taking the facts alleged in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the children had a constitutional right to be placed in reasonably safe living conditions."); Ray v. Foltz, 354 F.Supp.2d 1309, 1319, 1320, 1322, 1323 (M.D. Fla. 2005) ("In summary, Plaintiffs allege that Foltz (along with Defendants Deborah Jones and Corley)knowing that the Cumberbatches had not completed the required training or the extensive application process, knowing that Mrs. Cumberbatch was secretive and unwilling to allow open conversations between the Department and her own children, knowing that no investigation had been done to support a conclusion that the home was safe for foster children, and knowing that the Cumberbatches had been twice reported to the Florida Abuse Hotline-recommended the Cumberbatch home be licensed for one child, and thereafter, upon placement of four foster children in the home within days of licensure, sought a waiver of the licensed capacity restrictions. After placement of R.M., Foltz allegedly became aware that a Department employee described Mrs. Cumberbatch as 'one of the worst parents we have' and removed a child from the home; yet, he took no action and engaged in no investigation. Further, despite the knowledge that the home was far overcapacity, Foltz failed to perform required overcapacity visits. It is clear to this Court that such allegations. taken as true, state a claim for deliberately failing to learn of the significant risk of serious harm to R.M. that was created when Foltz recommended the rubber-stamped licensure of the Cumberbatch home and re-licensure of the Joyner home and when Foltz ignored subsequent signs that the homes were unsafe. . . . Defendants point to these allegations and seemingly argue that they are insufficient because at the most they establish a failure to follow Department procedures and guidelines. The Court does not share in Defendants' interpretation. Instead, these allegations concern Defendants' decision to rubber-stamp a family for licensure without engaging in any meaningful investigation as to the safety of the home. This Court refuses to find that by performing no investigation of foster parents and merely issuing licenses to them, Department employees can successfully insulate themselves from liability by asserting that they were unaware of the dangerousness of a situation. In essence, Plaintiffs allege that Deborah Jones and Corley actively and deliberately chose not to learn of the risk of abuse. The fact that this is evidenced by their failure to follow Department guidelines and rules does not necessitate a finding that such failures are insufficient to support a § 1983 claim. Instead, the Court believes that the Eleventh Circuit's comments in Ray concerning failures of Department employees to follow procedures as being insufficient to state a § 1983 claim apply when a plaintiff attempts to argue that such failures result in a per se constitutional violation and a § 1983 claim. . . Such is not what Plaintiffs allege. Instead, the failures to follow procedures are merely evidence of their intention to ignore the dangers associated with placing children in a given home. This Court finds that a knowing failure to investigate a prospective foster home (or continue to monitor), if proven, evidences a deliberate indifference to the welfare of a child on the part of the responsible Department official, and the resulting injury must be actionable. Any other finding entirely eviscerates the mission of foster placements- to ensure the safety of children- and the constitutional protections afforded foster children."); T.M. by and through Cox v. Carson, 93 F. Supp.2d 1179, 1187 (D. Wyo. 2000) ("The Supreme Court decision in Youngberg, our decision in Milonas [v. Williams, 691 F.2d 931 (10th Cir.1982)], and the Second Circuit decision in Doe all were decided before August 1985. We are convinced that these cases clearly alerted persons in the positions of defendants that children in the custody of a state had a constitutional right to be reasonably safe from harm; and that if the persons responsible place children in a foster home or institution that they know or suspect to be dangerous to the children they incur liability if the harm occurs.").

The Fifth Circuit has recognized that a "special relationship" is created when the state removes a child from her natural home and places her under state supervision. Griffith v. Johnston, 899 F.2d 1427, 1439 (5th Cir. 1990) (en banc), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 1040 (1990). Likewise, the Sixth Circuit has held that "due process extends the right to be free from the infliction of unnecessary harm to children in state-regulated foster homes." Meador v. Cabinet for Human Resources, 902 F.2d 474, 476 (6th Cir. 1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 867 (1990). Because qualified immunity was not raised in the court below, the Court of Appeals did not address the question in Meador. See also Reed v. Knox County Dep't of Human Services, 968 F. Supp. 1212, 1217 (S.D. Ohio 1997) (noting "circumstances of a foster child who is in the custody of the state differ from those of a child who is in the custody of its natural parents.").

In Eugene D. By and Through Olivia D. v. Karman, 889 F.2d 701 (6th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 496 U.S. 931 (1990), plaintiff claimed that social workers were deliberately indifferent to serious medical and developmental needs of a child placed in a state-licensed foster home. The court disposed of the case on qualified immunity grounds since, at the time of the challenged conduct, it was not clearly established that the state had an affirmative duty to protect children placed in state-licensed foster homes. Id. at 711.

In Doe v. Bobbitt, 881 F.2d 510 (7th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 495 U.S. 956 (1990), the Seventh Circuit reversed a denial of summary judgment for the defendant on the grounds of qualified immunity. The question was whether it was clearly established in 1984, the time of the challenged conduct, that state officials would violate a child's constitutional rights by placing that child in a foster home where the child would be at risk of violence by private individuals.

The court concluded that in 1984, only the Second Circuit had recognized such a constitutional right, See Doe, supra, and that "the decision in Doe depended upon an absolutely novel analogy between incarceration and placement in a foster home, an analogy that has yet to be endorsed by either the Supreme Court or the Seventh Circuit." Id. at 511-12.

In K.H. v. Morgan, 914 F.2d 846 (7th Cir. 1990), the court cited both Doe v. New York City Dept. of Social Services, supra, and Milburn, infra, approvingly and distinguished Bobbitt as a case where custody was awarded to a relative. Id. at 852-53. See also S.S., by and through Jervis v. McMullen, 225 F.3d 960, 962, 963 (8th Cir. 2000) (en banc) ("[I]n returning S.S. to her father, the state did not increase the danger of significant harm to S.S.: It merely placed her back into the situation from which it had originally retrieved her. . . . In other words, the complaint contains no allegations that would justify a conclusion that by returning S.S. to her father the state created greater risks to her than the ones to which she was originally exposed. . . . We are mindful that drawing a distinction between exposing a child to a dangerous environment and returning her to an equally dangerous one may seem to some to be gratuitous. . . . While the state did do something here, or at least in the present procedural posture we assume that it did, in the peculiar circumstances of this case the state's act is the same as if it had done nothing.").

But see Reed v. Palmer, 906 F.3d 540, 551-53 (7th Cir. 2018) ("Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged their constitutional rights were violated at Copper Lake when they were placed in isolation 'without justification.' On the face of plaintiffs' complaints alone, Palmer has not shown he is entitled to qualified immunity. This case involves the added wrinkle that plaintiffs were housed in Wisconsin, not in Iowa. In other words, Palmer was not one of the Copper Lake officials placing plaintiffs in isolation. Rather, plaintiffs allege Palmer only contracted with Wisconsin to send juveniles to Copper Lake and later 'received' and 'monitored' reports regarding the juveniles sent there. According to the district court, this made the claims against Palmer 'completely different' from other cases where the defendants 'actually controlled and operated the institution in which the abuse had occurred and "oversaw the use of the isolation cells in which [the] plaintiff was confined."'. . In the district court's view, no law clearly establishes what the Constitution requires of an official in Palmer's unique posture. Palmer's additional degree of separation is a distinguishing feature of this litigation, but at the motion to dismiss stage, our conclusion does not change. Under DeShaney v. Winnebago County Department of Social Services, it is clearly established that the Due Process Clause 'forbids the State itself to deprive individuals of life, liberty, or property without "due process of law,"' but does not 'impose an affirmative obligation on the State to ensure that those interests do not come to harm through other means.'. . It is equally established, however, that an exception to the DeShaney principle arises 'if the state has a "special relationship" with a person, that is, if the state has custody of a person, thus cutting off alternate avenues of aid.'. . In such cases, the State 'assumes at least a rudimentary duty of safekeeping.'. .On multiple occasions, we have applied the 'special relationship' exception to cases where 'the State removes a child from her natural parents.'. . Thus, 'once a state removes a child from her parents' custody,' it assumes a duty of safekeeping' due to the restraints it places on the liberty of the child. . . Such a duty is violated when the State 'place[s] a child in custody with foster parents it knows are incompetent or dangerous.'. . This case differs from Berman and Waubanascum; plaintiffs were placed at an out-of-state institution, not a private foster care home. Nevertheless, in K.H., we defined the relevant constitutional right as 'the right of a child in state custody not to be handed over by state officers to a foster parent or other custodian, private or public whom the state knows or suspects to be a child abuser.'. . This language encompasses Palmer's alleged role here. . . Allegations against Palmer are not limited to his role in signing the contract that led to plaintiffs' placement at Copper Lake: Plaintiffs further allege that Palmer retained custody and received reports detailing their excessive isolation, yet took no steps to remove them from the facility and was deliberately indifferent in doing so. The district court critiqued plaintiffs' failure to 'provide any details' about the reports Palmer allegedly received or what his alleged monitoring entailed. However, as noted above, plaintiffs do not need to provide such details to cross the 'plausibility' threshold at this stage: they need only include enough facts in their complaint 'to present a story that holds together.'. . Construing the well-pleaded facts and reasonable inferences in plaintiffs' favor, as we must, it can be reasonably inferred that Palmer had custody of plaintiffs while they were at Copper Lake and that he had the knowledge, responsibility, and influence to request removal of plaintiffs from the facility."); T.D. v. Patton, 868 F.3d 1209, 1212-13 (10th Cir. 2017) ("We agree with the district court that Ms. Patton violated T.D.'s substantive due process right by knowingly placing T.D. in a position of danger and knowingly increasing T.D.'s vulnerability to danger. . . She recommended to the juvenile court that T.D. be placed and remain in Mr. Duerson's temporary custody despite her admitted concerns about T.D.'s safety in the home, her knowledge of Mr. Duerson's criminal history that included a conviction for attempted sexual assault against a minor in his care, and notice of evidence that Mr. Duerson was potentially abusing T.D. She failed to inform the juvenile court about her concerns and knowledge of Mr. Duerson's criminal history and made her affirmative recommendations out of fear of being fired. . . . Ms. Patton acted recklessly and in conscious disregard of a known and substantial risk that T.D. would suffer serious, immediate, and proximate harm in his father's home. Her conduct, taken as a whole, shocks the conscience and thus amounts to a substantive due process violation under the Fourteenth Amendment. Based on the facts and legal determination in this court's Currier decision, a reasonable official in Ms. Patton's shoes would have understood she was violating T.D.'s constitutional rights. In both Currier and here, county social workers removed children from their mothers' homes and placed them in their fathers' homes, where the children were abused. The social workers in both cases failed to alert the juvenile court of relevant facts undermining the fathers' fitness as caretakers and recommended that the fathers assume custody of the children—despite being on notice that the fathers' homes were places of danger. And, in both cases, the social workers failed to investigate whether the fathers were abusing their children, despite being on notice of evidence suggesting abuse. Ms. Patton's conduct sufficiently resembles the conduct we held unconstitutional in Currier such that a reasonable official in her position would have known that her actions violated T.D.'s clearly established right. She was therefore not entitled to qualified immunity."); Currier v. Doran, 242 F.3d 905, 919 (10th Cir. 2001) ("When the state affirmatively acts to remove a child from the custody of one parent and then places the child with another parent, DeShaney does not foreclose constitutional liability."); Ford v. Johnson, 899 F. Supp. 227, 233 (W.D. Pa. 1995) ("The fact that the child is placed with a parent as opposed to a foster parent should not change the standards by which social agencies and their employees conduct their investigations."). Compare Estate of B.I.C. v. Gillen, 761 F.3d 1099, 1107 (10th Cir. 2014) ("Like Sentell in Currier, Defendant did not place Brook with Mr. Coons and Ms. Wells, so she had no duty to rescue Brook from that custody. The estate argues that this inaction amounted to action because it was motivated by ill-will. But Currier does not support this argument, and the estate cites no authority for the proposition that inaction can be treated as action because of the nonactor's ill-will.").

In K.H., the court denied qualified immunity to the extent the complaint asserted a "prima facie right not to be placed with a foster parent who the state's caseworkers and supervisors know or suspect is likely to abuse or neglect the foster child." 914 F.2d at 853. The court noted the limitations of the right it was recognizing as clearly established by Youngberg. Child welfare workers and their supervisors face damages liability under § 1983, "[o]nly if without justification based either on financial constraints or on considerations of professional judgment," they place children with foster parents known to be dangerous or unfit." Id. at 854.

See also P.C. v. McLaughlin, 913 F.2d 1033, 1043 (2d Cir. 1990) (recognizing that good-faith immunity will bar liability in action for damages against government professional in personal capacity if professional was unable to meet normal professional standards as a result of budgetary constraints); Taahira W. v. Travis, 908 F. Supp. 533, 543 (N.D. Ill. 1995) ("[T]he court holds that a plaintiff may survive a motion to dismiss where she sufficiently pleads that a state official, charged with an affirmative duty to provide for the care of a foster child, is personally liable for abusing professional judgment when placing a ward into a known or suspected abusive foster environment.").

While Judges Posner and Wood refused to recognize as clearly established "the distinct right not to be shifted among foster homes 'too frequently'," 914 F.2d at 853, Judge Coffey would have held that Youngberg, supra, clearly established an obligation on the part of the state to exercise reasonable professional judgment in the placement, care and supervision of children who are in the state's custody. Id. at 854-55, 865 (Coffey, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

The Seventh Circuit has recognized that "when a DCFS caseworker places a child in a home knowing that his caretaker cannot provide reasonable supervision, and the failure to provide that degree of supervision and care results in injury to the child outside of the home, it might be appropriate . . . for the caseworker to be held liable for a deprivation of liberty." Camp v. Gregory, 67 F.3d 1286, 1297 (7th Cir. 1995).

The court stressed that liability would be confined to "a very narrow range of cases." Id. at *12. Liability would be appropriate only where (1) the caseworker failed to exercise bona fide professional judgment, (2) the caretaker failed to exercise a reasonable degree of supervision, (3) the resulting injury was foreseeable to the caseworker, and (4) there was a sufficient causal link between the lack of reasonable supervision and the resulting injury. Id.

See also Lewis v. Anderson, 308 F.3d 768, 773, 775, 776 (7th Cir. 2002) ("The standard articulated in K.H. does not take the next step and impose some kind of duty of inquiry in these cases. If we are to follow K.H., therefore, the DHSS officials cannot be held liable on the basis of facts they did not actually know or suspect, even if they might have learned about disqualifying information if they had conducted a more thorough inquiry. In order to survive summary judgment, the plaintiffs needed to put forth a case that the DHSS defendants actually knew of or suspected the existence of child abuse in the prospective adoptive family. . . . If state actors are to be held liable for the abuse perpetrated by a screened foster parent, under K.H. the plaintiffs must present evidence that the state officials knew or suspected that abuse was occurring or likely.").

Compare Forrester v. Bass, 397 F.3d 1047, 1058 (8th Cir. 2005) ("Even if Forrester could establish a sufficient causal connection between state action and the ensuing private acts of violence, his substantive due process claims still must fail because Forrester cannot demonstrate the requisite degree of offensive conduct or deliberate disregard by Johnson and Rosa necessary to establish substantive due process violations. . . The dreadful abuse suffered by the Bass children was egregious. But private parties, not state actors, inflicted the severe physical abuse that killed Larry and Gary. While we do not condone any official negligence contributing to this tragic case, we conclude Johnson and Rosa did not engage in official conduct so egregious or outrageous as to shock the contemporary conscience. . . The record does not portray Johnson as an apathetic or dilatory social worker who saw and ignored wanton child abuse. Based upon what transpired inside the Bass home on August 17, 1999, Johnson's failure to conduct an investigation, to contact law enforcement, and to verify the whereabouts of the boys, while erroneous, and maybe naive in retrospect, cannot be considered conscience-shocking.") with J.H. v. Johnson, 346 F.3d 788, 792, 793 (7th Cir. 2003) ("The standard set forth in K.H. and Lewis differs from the 'deliberate indifference' standard only in the sense that it can be satisfied by proof of a state actor's knowledge or suspicion of the risk of harm, rather than just knowledge. Both standards are subjective. Though we have described the burden of proof for plaintiffs asserting § 1983 claims against state child welfare employees as 'stringent' and acknowledged that often the underlying facts of cases like this 'portray a sad course of events,' we nevertheless continue to require plaintiffs to demonstrate that the individual defendants had specific 'knowledge or suspicion' of the risk of sexual abuse facing the children in order to hold defendants liable under § 1983. . . . The plaintiffs vigorously argue that the appropriate standard for analyzing this case is the 'professional judgment' standard as articulated in Youngberg v. Romeo . . . . A bonafide professional judgment may shield the state's caseworkers and supervisors who acted despite knowledge of a risky placement from liability, but whether such a professional judgment was exercised is not the threshold determination. Knowledge or suspicion that a foster parent is a probable child abuser remains the legal yardstick for measuring the culpability of state actors in § 1983 cases like this one.").

In Yvonne L. v. New Mexico Department of Human Services, 959 F.2d 883, 893 (10th Cir. 1992), the court, in denying qualified immunity to the defendant officials, determined that it was clearly established in 1985 that "children in the custody of a state had a constitutional right to be reasonably safe from harm; and that if the persons responsible place children in a foster home or institution that they know or suspect to be dangerous to the children they incur liability if the harm occurs." See also Schwartz v. Booker, 702 F.3d 573, 581-83, 585 (10th Cir. 2012) ("Booker and Peagler present two distinct, but similar, arguments as support for their assertion that the special relationship doctrine does not presently apply: First, they argue that neither of them personally participated in the placement of Chandler and, therefore, did not deprive Chandler of his liberty; and, second, they argue that only JCDHS had a special relationship with Chandler because it was the state agency that initially placed Chandler in Jon Phillips's home. . . .[T]the legal framework for this doctrine does not support limiting the scope of the special relationship doctrine to only those individuals involved in a child's initial placement. In similar custodial relationships, such as involuntary commitment, a state actor's liability for violation of a patient's constitutional right does not turn on whether she participated in the actual confinement or placement of the individual in the institution. . . . Booker and Peagler urge that a placement-participation requirement is necessary to prevent imposition of 'reverse respondeat superior' liability on all state DHS employees. Again, they miss the point. The special relationship between the State and the foster child is a necessary predicate to imposition of liability under this doctrine, but is not sufficient to establish liability. Before any state official may be held liable, her conduct must satisfy the elements outlined in Yvonne L.: She must have known of the asserted danger or failed to exercise professional judgment and such conduct must have a causal connection to the ultimate injury incurred; moreover, her conduct must shock the conscience. . . .This involuntary, custodial relationship with the State imposes a continuing constitutional duty on state custodial officials to safeguard individuals in the State's care. Consequently, we are persuaded that plaintiffs sufficiently pled a custodial relationship between the State and Chandler to potentially hold Booker and Peagler individually liable under the special relationship doctrine.").

But see Matthews v. Bergdorf, 889 F.3d 1136, 1146-47 (10th Cir. 2018) ("[A] child while in Oklahoma foster care has the 'special relationship' with the State necessary to give rise to an antecedent duty on the part of the State to protect him or her. But a child alleged to be adopted, living with an adult pursuant to a guardianship, or 'just living' with an adult is not in the custody of the State and, unlike a foster child, does not have a special relationship with the State. An adopted child is in the custody of his or her adoptive parents. Similarly, a child living in Oklahoma pursuant to a court-ordered guardianship is in the custody of his or her guardian. . . . Lastly, we need cite no authority for the proposition that a child 'just living' with an adult is not in the State's custody. Under none of the latter three scenarios does the Constitution permit us to say that ODHS caseworkers may be held responsible pursuant to the special relationship exception for harm the Matthews inflicted upon their victims. Rather, the special relationship exception has no application in these situations, and so far as the exception is concerned, the Fourteenth Amendment has nothing to say about the caseworkers' liability."); Gutteridge v. Oklahoma, 878 F.3d 1233, 1239, 1241, 1246 (10th Cir. 2018) ("[A]s the district court pointed out, it appears this court requires more than a state official's mere failure to exercise professional judgment; instead, to sustain a claim under the special-relationship doctrine, a plaintiff must demonstrate that the defendant 'abdicated her professional duty sufficient to shock the conscience.'. . Here, the district court concluded that the individual defendants were '[no] more than negligent' in placing D.C. with LeBarre. . . And it reasoned that they were 'at most reckless or negligent' in their dealings with Funk. . . Thus, the district court ruled, the individual defendants' conduct doesn't 'shock the conscience' and therefore can't form the basis of a special-relationship claim. . . . Taken together, Johnson, J.W., and Schwartz indicate that a plaintiff must separately demonstrate the conscience-shocking nature of a defendant's conduct in order to mount a successful special-relationship claim. We remain bound by these decisions. . . Accordingly, we hold that the district court didn't err in requiring Gutteridge to show both that (1) the individual defendants failed to exercise professional judgment; and (2) their actions shock the conscience. . . . The facts of this case are undeniably tragic. But we cannot say the individual defendants' conduct—even assuming it amounts to an abdication of professional duty—is so 'outrageous[ ]' as to be 'truly conscience shocking.' Schwartz, 702 F.3d at 586 (quoting Armijo, 159 F.3d at 1262). Accordingly, we agree with the district court that the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. And we therefore affirm its order granting summary judgment to them on Gutteridge's § 1983 claim."); Dahn v. Amedei, 867 F.3d 1178, 1186-91 & n.12 (10th Cir. 2017) ("The question here is whether a foster child in the custody of one state can, after being placed by a private adoption agency with a foster father in a different state, establish a special custodial relationship with that second state when the second state takes on the duties to investigate evidence suggesting abuse. . . . We decide here only whether Dahn can show that his special relationship with Amedei and Cramer was clearly established under existing law. . . . We do not resolve whether Dahn established a special relationship with Amedei and Cramer; we address only whether that relationship was clearly established under existing precedent. Even if Dahn had a special custodial relationship with Amedei and Cramer—employees of Colorado—Schwartz doesn't clearly establish this relationship based on our facts. Here, Dahn was in Oklahoma's custody up until his adoption. The district court extended Schwartz in finding that Dahn sufficiently alleged a special relationship with Amedei and Cramer.[8] [Fn 8 Because we conclude under the facts of this case that clearly established law did not create a special relationship between Dahn and the caseworkers, we need not and do not address the remaining factors of his claim. For this reason, we do not comment on whether Amedei and Cramer violated Dahn's constitutional rights under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause by failing to exercise their professional judgment.] Whether or not he was correct to do so, the law up to that point did not clearly establish the requisite special relationship. In Schwartz, a young foster child, Chandler, died at the hands of his abusive foster family. . . Chandler's biological parents alleged under § 1983 that employees of the Denver County Department of Human Services (DCDHS) violated, among other laws, Chandler's Fourteenth Amendment substantive-due-process rights. . . The employees claimed that they had no special relationship with Chandler because a different county had placed him in foster care. . . We concluded that the special-relationship doctrine extends beyond the employees in the county that initially placed a child in foster care and reaches county employees actually exercising custody over the child. . . .We also noted that even though the Jefferson County Department of Human Services (JCDHS) initially placed Chandler into foster care, its doing so made him dependent on the state for his basic human needs, not just that one department. . . .Here, Dahn asks us to affirm the district court's extension of Schwartz to his claim and hold that even though Oklahoma placed him in foster care and Adoption Alliance monitored his placement, Colorado exercised custody over him because he lived there and because Colorado employees investigated his school's suspected-abuse reports. . . . [T]he second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis determines the outcome of this case. Schwartz is the closest case to ours, but no court has extended it so far. In certain circumstances, it would be reasonable and even logical to extend the special-relationship doctrine across state lines as well as county lines, as in Schwartz, but our case law doesn't clearly establish this extension. . . . Here, Oklahoma and Colorado are two separate sovereigns. So, Amedei and Cramer argue, it is not enough that Dahn was a ward of a state. To overcome qualified immunity and survive their motion to dismiss, Dahn had to allege sufficient facts to show that he had a special relationship with the state whose employees he alleged knew of the danger to him or failed to exercise professional judgment. We can't deem it clearly established under Schwartz that a state employee's investigating reports of abuse of a child is enough to create a special custodial relationship with that child. . . .Though DeShaney is factually distinct from Dahn's case, it illustrates that the Supreme Court is wary of finding a special relationship whenever a social worker responds to child-abuse reports. So DeShaney supports the conclusion that the law doesn't clearly permit extending the special-relationship doctrine to Dahn's circumstances—at least not yet. In sum, the special-relationship doctrine extends beyond just those actors who placed Dahn in Lovato's custody; it includes all state officials in the state with whom he had a special relationship. But, for now, the law doesn't clearly extend constitutional liability under the special-relationship doctrine to employees of a state that didn't deprive Dahn of his liberty or supply his basic needs, even though they were social workers in the county where he resided. . . We note, however, that Amedei and Cramer owed some duty to Dahn, and this duty might very well expose them to tort liability. . . .Schwartz would not notify Amedei and Cramer that their failure to protect Dahn under the factual circumstances of this case would violate Dahn's Fourteenth Amendment substantive-due-process rights under the special-relationship doctrine. Thus, even accepting all of Dahn's factual allegations as true, Dahn presents no clearly established law creating a special, custodial relationship between him and Colorado or its employees, and therefore the district court should have awarded Amedei and Cramer qualified immunity on Dahn's special-relationship claims against them.[12] [fn12: Because we conclude, based on this case's facts, that Dahn has failed to show clearly established law creating a special relationship between him, Amedei and Cramer, we decline to address whether the special-relationship doctrine could ever cross state borders. We also decline to address the other element of such claims, which is whether Amedei and Cramer acted in an unprofessional and conscience-shocking manner.]")

See also Angela R. v. Clinton, 999 F.2d 320, 323-24 (8th Cir. 1993) (observing that "class members who are foster children in the State's custody have stronger constitutional claims than abused or neglected children who have not been placed in foster care."); Norfleet v. Arkansas Department of Human Services, 989 F.2d 289, 293 (8th Cir. 1993) ("Cases from this and other circuits clearly demonstrate that imprisonment is not the only custodial relationship in which the state must safeguard an individual's civil rights. In foster care, a child loses his freedom and ability to make decisions about his own welfare, and must rely on the state to take care of his needs." (footnote omitted)); Eric L. v. Bird, 848 F. Supp. 303, 307 (D.N.H. 1994) ("This court finds persuasive the principles adopted in other circuits extending Youngberg to the foster care context.").

But see D.W. v. Rogers, 113 F.3d 1214, 1218 (11th Cir. 1997) ("Our recent decision in Wooten . . . indicates that the state's affirmative obligation to render services to an individual depends not on whether the state has legal custody of that person, but on whether the state has physically confined or restrained the person."); White v. Chambliss, 112 F.3d 731, 737 (4th Cir. 1997) ("Nothing in Milburn limited its application to situations where parents had voluntarily placed their children in foster care, and Milburn was not interpreted as being so limited in subsequent Fourth Circuit cases. . . . Given the state of this circuit's law on the issue and the absence of controlling Supreme Court authority, we cannot say that a right to affirmative state protection for children placed in foster care was clearly established at the time of Keena's death."); Wooten v. Campbell, 49 F.3d 696, 699-701 (11th Cir. 1995) (finding no "substantive due process right is implicated where a public agency is awarded legal custody of a child, but does not control that child's physical custody except to arrange court-ordered visitation with the non-custodial parent."); A.S., by and through Blalock v. Tellus, 22 F. Supp.2d 1217, 1221 (D. Kan. 1998) ("This case lies somewhere between DeShaney and Yvonne L. In this case, the state had legal custody of the plaintiff, but physical custody remained with her mother. The questions before the court, then, are whether this situation constitutes a special relationship entitling A.S. to state protection from harm by third parties and, if so, whether this right was clearly established in 1988 and 1989, when the alleged abuse occurred, so as to defeat the defense of qualified immunity. The court concludes that legal custody without physical custody is insufficient to create a 'special relationship.'. . . This court agrees with the court's analysis in Wooten. The Tenth Circuit has stressed that it is the state's taking and holding a person against her will which creates a special relationship. . . In that situation, the person is not able to care for her own needs or, in the case of a child, the state prevents the parent from taking care of the child's needs. However, where the state merely has legal custody, the parent who retains physical custody has the power to protect the child from harm."); Cooper by and through Cotturo v. Montgomery County Office of Children and Youth, No. 93-3137, 1993 WL 477084, *6 (E.D. Pa. Nov. 16, 1993) (not reported) (foster child's "death caused by being fatally hit by a pick up truck eleventh months after being placed in her foster home is too remote a consequence of any action OCY took or did not take to find OCY liable. . . .").

In L.J. by and through Darr v. Massinga, 838 F.2d 118 (4th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 1018 (1989), a pre-DeShaney case, present and former foster children brought a § 1983 action, claiming that as a result of maladministration of Maryland's federally-funded foster care program, they were subjected to physical and sexual abuse and medical neglect.

The court avoided decision on the issue of whether there is a constitutional duty to protect and supervise with respect to children placed in foster homes. Instead, the court disposed of the case by holding that the Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980 imposes supervisory duties on states administering the program, and that the plaintiffs had federal statutory rights which could be enforced under section 1983. Id. at 122-23.

But see Suter v. Artist M., 112 S. Ct. 1360 (1992) (provision of Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980 which requires "reasonable efforts . . . be made (") prior to the placement of a child in foster care, to prevent or eliminate the need for removal of the child from his home, and (B) to make it possible for the child to return to his home . . . ." does not create a right enforceable under the Act itself or through section 1983.).

NOTE: Congress responded to Suter by passing an amendment to the Social Security Act which provides that in all pending and future actions > brought to enforce a provision of the Social Security Act, such provision is not to be deemed unenforceable because of its inclusion in a section of the Act requiring a State plan or specifying the required contents of a State plan. This section is not intended to limit or expand the grounds for determining the availability of private actions to enforce State plan requirements other than by overturning any such grounds applied in Suter v. Artist M. . . . but not applied in prior Supreme Court decisions respecting such enforceability; provided, however, that this section is not intended to alter the holding in Suter v. Artist M. that section 471(a)(15) [42 U.S.C. § 671(a)(15)] of the Act is not enforceable in a private right of action.

42 U.S.C. 1320a-2 (amended October 20, 1994).

Thus, while the holding of Suter with respect to the "reasonable efforts" provision remains good law with respect to the particular provision of the statute involved in that case, "the amendment overrules the general theory in Suter that the only private right of action available under a statute requiring a state plan is an action against the state for not having that plan." Jeanine B. v. Thompson, 877 F. Supp. 1268, 1283 (E.D. Wis. 1995). See also Henry A v. Willden, 2012 WL 1561030 (9th Cir. May 4, 2012). But see White v. Chambliss, 112 F.3d 731, 739 (4th Cir. 1997) (holding that "Suter thus forecloses the argument that section 671(a)(10) of the AACWA provides the source for an enforceable right through section 1983.").

(iii) public housing/workplace

In Dawson v. Milwaukee, 930 F.2d 1283 (7th Cir. 1991), Judge Easterbrook rejected plaintiff's argument that his presence in publicly subsidized housing was the functional equivalent of being in custody, thereby creating a constitutional duty on the part of the Housing Authority to protect him from harm at the hands of private actors. In refusing to equate "subsidy with custody," Judge Easterbrook relied on pre-DeShaney precedent from the Seventh Circuit holding that the due process clause does not guarantee safety in the public workplace. Id. at 1285. Accord Washington v. District of Columbia, 802 F.2d 1478 (D.C. Cir. 1986); McClary v. O'Hare, 786 F.2d 83 (2d Cir. 1986); Rankin v. Wichita Falls, 762 F.2d 444 (5th Cir. 1985). See also D.M. ex rel. Ray v. Philadelphia Hous. Auth., 613 F. App'x 187, 190-91 (3d Cir. 2015) ("While the PHA subsidized the Property and was allegedly 'aware of the dangers that [Plaintiff] faced ..., it played no part in their creation, nor did it do anything to render [Plaintiff] any more vulnerable to them.' DeShaney, 489 U.S. at 201. In short, Plaintiff's allegations fail to show 'that [the PHA] created the danger' Plaintiff faced while living in the Property."); Henry v. City of Erie, 728 F.3d 275, 285, 286 & n.9 (3d Cir. 2013) ("Although the cause of the fire is not known at this stage of the litigation, plaintiffs do not allege that defendants caused the fire or increased the apartment's susceptibility to fire. Nor do plaintiffs contend that defendants failed to install a smoke detector and a fire escape on the third floor of Richardson's apartment. Plaintiffs' allegations against defendants are a step further removed: plaintiffs contend that defendants should have compelled or induced the landlord/owners to install a fire escape and smoke detector (or induced Richardson to live elsewhere), either by not approving the apartment for the Section 8 housing program and/or by terminating the subsidy payments that allowed Richardson to continue to live there. Unfortunately for plaintiffs, their reasoning proves too much. Plaintiffs' complaint makes clear it was the owners' responsibility—not defendants'—to install a smoke detector and fire escape. The regulations cited by plaintiffs confirm the owner is required to maintain the unit in accordance with the Housing Quality Standards. . . Assuming, as we must, that a smoke detector and fire escape could have prevented decedents' deaths, the responsibility (and capability) to install these safety features did not rest with defendants. . . .Under our state-created danger jurisprudence, we cannot find that defendants' failings amount to a state-created danger. We decline to expand the state-created danger doctrine—a narrow exception to the general rule that the state has no duty to protect its citizens from private harms—to embrace this case. . . . We are not aware of a case in which a circuit court extended liability under the state-created danger doctrine to licensing-type activities. Nor have plaintiffs cited such a case. . . . Accordingly, we will reverse the order of the District Court denying qualified immunity to Horan and Angelotti and remand for proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

The Supreme Court has held that "the Due Process Clause does not impose an independent federal obligation upon municipalities to provide certain minimal levels of safety and security in the workplace . . . ." Collins v. City of Harker Heights, Tex., 112 S. Ct. 1061, 1071 (1992).

See also Callahan v. North Carolina Dep't of Public Safety, 18 F.4th 142, 147-49 (4th Cir. 2021) ("Since Pinder, 'we have never issued a published opinion recognizing a successful state-created danger claim.'. . In the cases that have followed, we have repeatedly recognized 'the state-created danger doctrine is narrowly drawn, and the bar for what constitutes an "affirmative act" is high.'. . . According to the complaint, '[d]efendants' actions in placing Sergeant Callahan in a dangerous situation with inadequate staffing based on lack of trained and experienced officers to support her consciously disregarded a substantial and great risk of serious harm which was obvious, apparent, and grave.' . . Callahan adds that '[d]efendants were also aware of, or should have been aware of, the imminent threat posed by Inmate Wissink.'. . Callahan argues that these allegations satisfy the pleading requirement for a state-created danger claim. He insists he has alleged the affirmative acts that our precedent requires. More specifically, Callahan argues that the defendants knew about the risks, 'had an affirmative duty to avoid them, and instead affirmatively acted to keep Inmate Wissink [in Callahan's unit] while assigning too few and untrained staff.'. . He also contends that he alleged that the '[d]efendants affirmatively sent Sgt. Callahan, and her coworkers, into [that unit] on April 27 with full knowledge' of two risks—the risk posed by Wissink and the risk of understaffing and improper training. . . According to Callahan, these are affirmative acts that, if accepted as true, would give rise to a state-created danger claim. Callahan's argument, however, misses the point. The question is not how Callahan characterizes the allegations. It is not enough to reframe a failure to protect against a danger into an affirmative act. As we noted in Doe, 'inaction can often be artfully recharacterized as "action,"' but we must 'resist the temptation to inject this alternate framework into omission cases.'. . The critical questions are: What is the pertinent danger, and did the state create it? Callahan's allegations make clear that the danger was Wissink, and none of the defendants created that danger. The staffing and training decisions may reflect a failure to adequately respond to the danger posed by Wissink. But under our precedent, such failures do not support a state-created danger claim. They are neither the 'immediate interactions' with the plaintiff called for in Doe nor the 'direct cause' of the injuries required by Graves. These choices are simply too far down the causal chain of events to result in liability under the Due Process Clause. And without allegations that, if accepted as true, meet these legal requirements, the complaint does not plausibly state a § 1983 substantive due process claim under the state-created danger theory. The Due Process Clause does not convert state-law tort claims into constitutional violations actionable under § 1983. Our precedent is clear: Callahan's allegations do not plausibly state a claim for a state-created danger. . . This case involves tragic circumstances, but it does not involve a due process violation. Callahan failed to meet the pleading requirements for a substantive due process claim. 'In cases like this, it is always easy to second-guess. Tragic circumstances only sharpen our hindsight, and it is tempting to express our sense of outrage at the failure' of the prison staff to protect Sergeant Callahan from a dangerous inmate. . . However, to hold that Callahan's allegations amount to a plausible substantive due process claim would go against our precedent and constitutionalize a state tort claim. That we refuse to do.");

Rhodes v. Michigan, 10 F.4th 665, 686 (6th Cir. 2021) (Thapar, J., dissenting in part) ("No one disputes that Kelly Rhodes was seriously injured. And the record suggests the defendants were at fault. That is why we have state tort law—so people can recover for the injuries they suffer at someone else's hand. And recover Rhodes did: She settled her state tort claims for $50,000 in damages plus the ability to obtain reimbursements for medical expenses related to her head injury. Yet the majority holds that Rhodes's status as an inmate entitles her to special rights. The majority finds this entitlement in the Eighth Amendment's Punishments Clause. But the Eighth Amendment is not a glorified tort statue. Ramirez v. Guadarrama, 2 F.4th 506, 512 (5th Cir. 2021) (Oldham, J., concurring in the denial of rehearing en banc). Nor is it a 'National Code of Prison Regulation.'. . . To make out a claim of unconstitutional punishment based on prison conditions, Rhodes needed to show—at a minimum—that the state exposed her to compulsory, involuntary danger. She can't clear this bar because she voluntarily worked in the laundry detail. . . . By reviving Rhodes's Eighth Amendment claim, the majority stretches the Punishments Clause beyond precedent and far beyond its original meaning. Because precedent and history agree that Rhodes's accident was not a punishment, I dissent in part."); Nelson v. City of Chicago, 992 F.3d 599, 605 (7th Cir. 2021) ("Here, the danger was created by an armed robber, not by the government, so it is not covered by the doctrine. . . Under the state-created-danger theory, whether Sergeant Bucki was deliberately indifferent to risks to Officer Nelson is irrelevant. 'Disregarding a known risk to a public employee does not violate the Constitution whether or not the risk comes to pass.' [collecting cases brought by public employees asserting state-created-danger claims]"); Russett v. State of Arizona, No. 17-15709, 2020 WL 236767, at *2 (9th Cir. Jan. 15, 2020) (not reported) ("Although Appellees underscore that the plaintiff in Grubbs was employed by a correctional facility, she was employed as a nurse, not a corrections officer. This distinction is key because, unlike nurses, the primary responsibility of corrections officers is to constantly supervise and closely interact with violent inmates. Further, this court emphasized in Grubbs that the defendants led the plaintiff 'to believe that she would not be required to work alone with violent sex offenders.'. . Neither this court nor the Supreme Court has ever held that a prison employee whose essential duties involve monitoring inmates can assert a substantive due process claim when he is assaulted by an inmate he was tasked with supervising. We have never before recognized a state-created danger cause of action on facts analogous to the ones asserted by Appellees. Thus, it was not clearly established that Appellants' conduct of assigning corrections officers to work with inmates under dangerous conditions would have violated Appellees' due process rights and we reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity."); In re U.S. Office of Personnel Management Data Security Breach Litigation, 928 F.3d 42, 75 (D.C. Cir. 2019) ("Like the sanitation worker in Collins—and the prison guards in Williams and Washington—NTEU [National Treasury Employees Union] Plaintiffs 'voluntarily' sought and 'accepted' an 'offer of [government] employment.' Collins, 503 U.S. at 128. In doing so, they voluntarily submitted personal information 'as part of a background investigation.'. . In no sense, then, did the government compel NTEU Plaintiffs to seek government employment; it therefore bore no constitutional duty under the Due Process Clause to protect them from the risks associated with applying for such positions. With no triggering deprivation of liberty or property to speak of, there arose no constitutional governmental duty to 'provide [NTEU Plaintiffs] with certain minimal levels of safety and security,' Collins, 503 U.S. at 127—physical or digital."); Kulkay v. Roy, 847 F.3d 637, 645 ("[T]he absence of safety equipment or procedures and an awareness of similar injuries fail to show the Faribault officials were deliberately indifferent to the risk of harm posed to Kulkay by the beam saw. Moreover, we join other circuits in concluding that state and federal safety regulations do not establish a standard for Eighth Amendment violations. See, e.g., Franklin v. Kan. Dep't of Corr., 160 F. App'x 730, 736 (10th Cir. 2005) (unpublished); French v. Owens, 777 F.2d 1250, 1257 (7th Cir. 1985). The mere existence of state and federal safety regulations does not charge prison officials with knowledge of potentially unsafe conditions in their facility. The Faribault officials' actions as to potential safety precautions in the workshop at most amount to negligence. But mere negligence is insufficient to state a claim under the Eighth Amendment. Cruel and unusual punishment does not result whenever a prison official may be to blame for an inmate's injuries."); Pauluk v. Savage, 836 F.3d 1117, 1118-19, 1123-26 (9th Cir. 2016) ("This case lies at the intersection of two lines of authority—on the one hand, the state-created danger doctrine under which constitutional due process claims may be brought; on the other, the Supreme Court's decision in Collins v. City of Harker Heights, 503 U.S. 115 (1992), declining to find a general due process right to a safe workplace. We hold that Collins does not bar Plaintiffs' due process claim. Plaintiffs have stated a claim under the state-created danger doctrine, notwithstanding the fact that the danger at issue is a physical condition in the workplace. However, we reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment as to Wojcik and Savage, on the ground that the due process right asserted by Plaintiffs was not clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . The threshold question before us is whether Plaintiffs' claim under the state-created danger doctrine is foreclosed by Collins. We conclude that it is not. . . .Other courts agree that Collins does not foreclose application of the state-created danger exception in workplace safety cases. . . . To prevail on a state-created danger due process claim, a plaintiff must show more than merely a failure to create or maintain a safe work environment. First, a plaintiff must show that the state engaged in 'affirmative conduct' that placed him or her in danger. . . .Second, the state actor must have acted with 'deliberate indifference' to a 'known or obvious danger.'. . .Plaintiffs' evidence, if true, satisfies both elements of a state-created danger claim. First, Pauluk's 2003 transfer back to Shadow Lane was 'affirmative' conduct. Pauluk clearly did not want to return to Shadow Lane and was transferred 'involuntarily.' There is sufficient evidence in the record that either or both Wojcik and Savage were sufficiently involved in the decision to transfer that a reasonable jury could conclude they should bear some responsibility for that transfer. . . .Second, construing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, Wojcik and Savage acted with deliberate indifference in exposing Pauluk to a known and obvious danger. Plaintiffs presented evidence that Wojcik and Savage were both aware of the CCHD's long and tortured history of pervasive mold problems in multiple buildings, including the Shadow Lane facility. . . .The core question in this appeal is whether Collins bars the application of the state-created danger doctrine in cases where the danger is a physical condition in the workplace. Because Wood did not involve a dangerous workplace, it does not speak to this question. Grubbs I presents a closer analogy to this case. However, as recounted above, the danger in Grubbs I was a human actor who posed a known threat. In contrast, Pauluk was not harmed by a human agent, but rather by a physical condition in the building where he worked. This case is factually very similar to Collins, where, as here, the danger was a physical danger in the workplace. For the reasons given above, we conclude that Plaintiffs have stated a claim despite the fact that Pauluk's injury was caused by physical conditions in the workplace. But, because the Supreme Court in Collins declined to find a due process violation in a case with very similar facts, we cannot say that Wojcik and Savage were 'on notice' that their conduct was unlawful under clearly established law."); Pauluk v. Savage, 836 F.3d 1117, 1126 (9th Cir. 2016) (Murgia, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I fully agree with the opinion's analysis as to the scope of this court's jurisdiction to review the district court's denial of summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds, and with its conclusion that the district court erred in denying qualified immunity to Wojcik and Savage. However, even accepting as true the plaintiffs' version of events, see Behrens v. Pelletier, 516 U.S. 299, 313 (1996), I respectfully disagree that the plaintiffs have presented a cognizable claim that Wojcik and Savage affirmatively acted with deliberate indifference to Pauluk's substantive due process rights under the state-created danger doctrine."); Pauluk v. Savage, 836 F.3d 1117, 1132-34 (9th Cir. 2016) (Noonan, J., dissenting) ("Today, the majority holds that the state-created danger doctrine—a theory of constitutional harm whose contours have been 'clearly established' by at least nine published opinions of this court over the course of two decades—is no longer sufficiently 'clear' in light of a single case which addresses an unrelated legal theory. I respectfully dissent. . . .No basis exists to distinguish this case from Wood, Kennedy, or any other published opinion of this court upholding the applicability of the state-created danger doctrine. I would affirm the district court's denial of summary judgment. I therefore concur with the majority's conclusion that, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, they have shown a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment under the state created danger doctrine. . . .Pauluk's case therefore presents the precise facts that the Collins Court deemed were inapplicable to its analysis and holding. Accordingly, Collins does not counsel against affirming the district court here. Indeed, the majority appears to concede that Collins is distinguishable, but concludes that even assuming Pauluk has stated a constitutional violation, the factual circumstances of this case are simply too similar to the facts of Collins for the defendants to have been ' "on notice" that their conduct was unlawful under clearly established law.'. . The law governing the state-created danger doctrine is 'clearly established' by the controlling precedent discussed above such that 'any reasonable official in [defendants'] shoes would have understood that [they were] violating it.' City & Cty. of S.F. v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765 (2015) (citations omitted). Indeed, in light of these cases, the constitutional question has been 'placed...beyond debate.'. . A case which presents some factual similarities but lacks any legal nexus to the state-created danger doctrine cannot revive that debate, nor can it serve to convolute what this court has defined with pellucid clarity. Collins does not control here. Accordingly, I dissent.").

See also Herrera v. Los Angeles Unified School District, 18 F.4th 1156, 1160-62 (9th Cir. 2021) ("Because Erick was not detained at the time of his death and his parents' § 1983 claim arises out of Lopez's alleged failure to protect their son, their claim is a non-detainee failure-to-protect claim. We therefore apply a purely subjective standard, consistent with our precedent, requiring the plaintiff to show that the state actor recognized an unreasonable risk and actually intended to expose the plaintiff to such risk. . . Two justifications could be raised in favor or applying a purely subjective standard in failure-to-protect claims brought by non-detained plaintiffs, but neither is persuasive. First, failure-to-protect claims do not include the kind of affirmative action involved in an excessive force claim. But this is also the case for detainee failure-to-protect claims, to which we apply the objective standard. . . Second, the government does not have an obligation to provide food, medical care, and safety to those not in its custody. Even so, Castro's 'significant reasons' to extend the objective standard apply regardless of that obligation. . . Absent our precedent in Dent, Martinez, and Pauluk, we may have been inclined to interpret Kingsley and Castro to require Plaintiffs to show (1) that Lopez made an intentional decision to allow Erick to be exposed to the risk posed by the pool without Lopez's supervision, and (2) it was objectively unreasonable to expose Erick to that risk. This formulation of the failure-to-protect test would mirror the logic of Kingsley and Castro, which looks to whether the defendant intended the physical consequences of his actions and applies the objective deliberate indifference standard only to evaluate whether the action taken, considering what was known to the defendant at the time, was reasonable. . . But because, post-Kingsley and post-Castro, we have continued to apply a purely subjective deliberate indifference test to non-detainee failure-to-protect claims, we also do so here. . . . Plaintiffs provide no evidence that Lopez knew of an immediate threat to Erick after he watched him enter the locker room area. Even assuming Lopez knew that Erick had asthma and could not swim, and lost sight of Erick while he was in the pool earlier that afternoon, the parties agree that Lopez saw Erick enter the locker room area. Like the teacher in Patel, Lopez waited outside the locker room to protect Erick's privacy and foster his independence. It was during that time, when Lopez could not have subjectively expected any immediate danger, that Erick drowned. Under our deliberate indifference analysis, Plaintiffs must proffer facts suggesting that Lopez subjectively recognized the relevant risk that Erick could drown while in the pool area. . . Plaintiffs failed to do so: Lopez had no 'actual knowledge or willful blindness of impending harm,'. . . because he believed that Erick was still in the locker room. He was subjectively unaware that Erick was exposed to the dangers of the pool and therefore cannot be liable for his death."); Estate of Her v. Hoeppner, 939 F.3d 872, 876-77 (7th Cir. 2019) ("In the end, the Estate's argument boils down to the remarkable assertion that a municipal swimming pond is by its nature a state-created danger. That proposition, if adopted, would turn every tort injury at a public pond or pool into a constitutional violation. Federal constitutional claims involving public playgrounds and practice fields wouldn't be far behind. Indeed, the Estate's preferred result 'would potentially set up a federal question whenever an accident happens during activities sponsored by the state.' Waybright v. Frederick County, 528 F.3d 199, 208 (4th Cir. 2008). But the Fourteenth Amendment doesn't displace state tort law by transforming accidents at public facilities into federal constitutional claims. . .Perhaps aware that its broad position is untenable, the Estate falls back on a narrower argument that the defendants increased a danger to Swannie. But this theory is no stronger because there's no evidence that the defendants actively 'did something that turned a potential danger into an actual one.'. . The Estate argues that the City failed to take proper safety precautions, like dredging the bottom of the pond, and the lifeguards failed to comply with the park's 'mandatory' rules involving small children. And it emphasizes evidence that the pond was especially crowded on the afternoon in question, and at one point a lifeguard admitting to being 'overwhelmed' by the number of swimmers. But we've explained that DeShaney draws an 'essential distinction between endangering and failing to protect.'. . The former may amount to a constitutional violation if other facts are present; the latter is simple negligence. . . . That Swannie slipped beneath the surface without being noticed by anyone—lifeguard, family member, or anybody else at the pond—reflects the heartbreaking reality of childhood drownings. But it's not evidence that the defendants took affirmative steps that created or increased a danger to Swannie.The Estate's difficulty articulating a theory of the case that might situate this claim within the law of state-created dangers reflects the fundamental problem with its position: this is at most a negligence claim."); Hernandez v. Ridley, 734 F.3d 1254, 1262 & n.6 (10th Cir. 2013) ("By seeking to impose liability on Ridley and Henderson, Hernandez is asking us to be the 'Monday morning quarterback' with respect to requiring Duit to perform according to the contract. It is beyond our charge to second-guess 'a rational decision making process that takes account of competing social, political, and economic forces.'. . Here, those forces are nearly palpable. At a minimum, consideration must be given to safety of the public and construction crews, project costs, inconvenience to the travelling public, and the need to assure adequate traffic flow during construction. We focus particularly on the last consideration, adequate traffic flow during construction, because it so dramatically illustrates the need for judicial restraint. The increased dangers of night driving are generally known, as are the increased risks presented as traffic volumes increase, particularly in confined areas. But actually balancing the relative risks and benefits is a challenging task, going well beyond what is generally known or assumed, particularly when even more considerations are in play. A critic's post hoc analysis is no substitute for real time rational decisions. . . . Although Ridley and Henderson were not Jose Jr. and Salvador's direct employers, Hernandez's allegations are akin to claims made against government employers alleging a right to work in a reasonably safe environment. But the Supreme Court has declined to extend substantive due process protection to safe working conditions."); Slaughter v. Mayor and City Council of Baltimore, 682 F.3d 317, 322, 323 (4th Cir. 2012) ("[I]n the voluntary employment context, the plaintiffs have not alleged arbitrary (in the constitutional sense) or conscience-shocking conduct because they did not assert that the Fire Department intended to harm Wilson, as would be necessary to establish a substantive due process violation. . . .It is true that in this case, as it was in Waybright, the Baltimore City Fire Department created the danger. But this fact does not satisfy any element of the standard that the Supreme Court has articulated for showing a substantive due process violation with respect to a government employee. . . For these reasons, we hold that the Baltimore City Fire Department's constitutional liability in this case turns on whether it intended to harm the new recruits."); Slaughter v. Mayor and City Council of Baltimore, 682 F.3d 317, 326 (4th Cir. 2012) (Wynn, J., concurring in the result) ("Following Collins and Waybright, I agree with affirming the district court's decision to dismiss on the narrow grounds that there is no duty on municipalities to 'provide certain minimal levels of safety and security in the workplace,' Collins, 503 U .S. at 130, that 'failure to train or to warn ... employees [is] not arbitrary in a constitutional sense,' id., and that, as a result, the petitioner's factual allegations are not 'arbitrary' or 'shocking to the conscience' in a 'constitutional sense.'. . But, in affirming the district court, we should also recognize that government employees are not categorically excluded from claiming deliberate indifference as a basis for Due Process claims."); Fields v. Abbott, 652 F.3d 886, 891-94 (8th Cir. 2011) ("In this case, the Miller County individual defendants acted under circumstances in which actual deliberation was arguably practicable because of Fields's allegations that (1) they had been made aware, based on her previous injuries from the same drunk-tank door, that the door was dangerous, and (2) they were previously informed that the jail was understaffed. . .We will thus apply that standard here. In this case, the district court concluded that whether the Miller County individual defendants' conduct is conscience shocking 'is a close question,' but ultimately held that a reasonable jury could find that they acted with conscience-shocking deliberate indifference. . . . Here, none of the Miller County individual defendants made any representations to Fields regarding the types of inmates that she would be dealing with or the safety of her workplace. And unlike L.W., Fields was aware of the potentially dangerous conditions to which she was subject because she had previously complained about, among other things, both the interior handle on the drunk-tank door and the understaffing of the jail. The conduct that Fields complains of here is simply not comparable to the defendants' conscience-shocking actions in Grubbs. . . . In this case, Fields asserts that the Miller County individual defendants knew of the dangers that the jail posed, but even with that knowledge neglected to make the jail safer. She alleges that several deficiencies at the jail led to her injuries, including its understaffing, the interior-mounted door handle, an alleged failure to follow the procedures for classifying inmates, an alleged lack of training, and the jail's acceptance of inmates from other counties. Fields argues that the Miller County individual defendants 'were aware of facts from which an inference might have been drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm existed.'. . True enough, Sheriff Abbott testified at his deposition that he knew that the Miller County Jail was understaffed and that he was aware that Fields had complained about the interior-mounted door handle. But even if we assume, as we must for present purposes, that all of the Miller County individual defendants were aware of the facts from which an inference about the jail's possible dangers could be drawn, Fields has presented insufficient evidence to 'show that any of [these defendants] actually drew such an inference.'. . Fields, after all, was equally aware of the two most potentially dangerous conditions-the jail's understaffing and the interior-mounted door handle-and the Miller County individual defendants would have had no reason to believe that Fields would not take these conditions into account in her interactions with the inmates. Moreover, there is no proof in the record that the conditions that Fields complains of were so inherently dangerous that the injuries she sustained were highly likely to occur. . . .This evidence, taken in the light most favorable to Fields, might cause a jury to find that Sheriff Abbott was grossly negligent in failing to address the staffing concerns associated with the jail and in not removing the interior-mounted door handle. Even gross negligence, however, cannot support a § 1983 claim alleging a violation of the Due Process Clause. . . . Because we conclude that the Miller County individual defendants did not violate Fields's substantive due process rights, we need not address the other prong of the qualified-immunity analysis; namely, whether the substantive due process right that Fields asserts was clearly established when the events in this case took place."); Hunt v. Sycamore Community School Dist. Bd. of Educ., 542 F.3d 529, 537, 538, 543, 544 (6th Cir. 2008) ("While it has not proved impossible for government employees to establish arbitrariness of their employer, such claims have, for the most part, not succeeded in this Circuit. In a state-created danger case in which public employees prevailed against their employer, we determined that police had a due process claim against the City for endangering them by releasing information that would make it easier for third persons to harm them. [citing Kallstrom] In contrast, in other cases in which the harm to a government employee was inflicted by third persons, we have held that there was no state-created danger. . . . We believe the more exact standard, announced in Lewellen, is that in order to succeed on a § 1983 claim in a non-custodial setting, a plaintiff must prove either intentional injury or 'arbitrary conduct intentionally designed to punish someone − e.g., giving a worker a particularly dangerous assignment in retaliation for a political speech ... or because of his or her gender.' Or, as stated in Stemler, . . .a plaintiff must prove 'conscience shocking' behavior. . . . Our review of Lewis and our own substantive due process cases indicates that where the governmental actor does not intentionally harm the victim or invidiously discriminate against him, conduct endangering the victim will not shock the conscience if the victim has voluntarily undertaken public employment involving the kind of risk at issue and the risk results from the governmental actor's attempt to carry out its mandatory duties to the public. This holds true even where the governmental actor is not forced to act in a crisis, but has time to deliberate. In order to comply with the Individuals with Disabilities Education Act, the school district is, of course, obliged to provide a free appropriate public education to children with disabilities, 20 U.S.C. § 1412(a)(1)."); Waybright v. Frederick County, MD, 528 F.3d 199, 207, 208 (4th Cir. 2008) ("Here, plaintiffs argue, the training session should qualify as a state-created danger because a state actor, Coombe, 'used his authority to create an opportunity for danger that otherwise would not have existed,' and thereby knowingly put Waybright in harm's way. . .To apply the state-created danger theory in this context, however, would run afoul of the Supreme Court's unanimous decision in Collins, . . . which held that due process does not impose a duty on municipalities to provide their employees with a safe workplace or warn them against risks of harm (though state tort law may). The case is right on point, for plaintiffs' state-created danger claim, in essence, is that Coombe created an unsafe workplace that caused a prospective employee harm. And while we recognize that Collins involved a municipal rather than an individual defendant, the case speaks decisively to the situation here. . . . by finding a state-created danger here, we might well inject federal authority into public school playground incidents, football (or even ballet) practice sessions, and class field trips, not to mention training sessions for government jobs that require some degree of physical fitness."); Lombardi v. Whitman, 485 F.3d 73, 79, 80, 82, 83 (2d Cir. 2007) ("[T]o the extent the plaintiffs here allege that the defendants had an affirmative duty to prevent them from suffering exposure to environmental contaminants, their claims must fail. They cannot rely on the EPA's failure to instruct workers to wear particular equipment, its failure to explain the exact limitations of its knowledge of the health effects of the airborne substances that were present, or its failure to explain the limitations of its testing technologies. But the complaint goes further; it alleges that defendants' affirmative assurances that the air in Lower Manhattan was safe to breathe created a false sense of security that induced site workers to forgo protective measures, thereby creating a danger where otherwise one would not have existed.. . . . The plaintiffs allege no 'special relationship' between them and federal officials. . . They plead that their reliance on the government's misrepresentations induced them to forgo available safeguards, and thus characterize the harm as a state created danger. . . . . The plaintiffs do not allege that the defendants acted with an evil intent to harm; but they argue that the defendants' deliberate indifference shocks the conscience because the defendants made their decisions in an 'unhurried' fashion with 'hours, days, weeks and even months to contemplate, deliberate, discuss and decide what to do and say about the health hazards posed to thousands of people who were coming onto and working at Ground Zero.' . . . . The decisions alleged were made by the defendants over a period of time rather than in the rush of a car chase; but the decisions cannot on that account be fairly characterized as 'unhurried' or leisured. . . . Accepting as we must the allegation that the defendants made the wrong decision by disclosing information they knew to be inaccurate, and that this had tragic consequences for the plaintiffs, we conclude that a poor choice made by an executive official between or among the harms risked by the available options is not conscience-shocking merely because for some persons it resulted in grave consequences that a correct decision could have avoided. . . . When great harm is likely to befall someone no matter what a government official does, the allocation of risk may be a burden on the conscience of the one who must make such decisions, but does not shock the contemporary conscience. . . . These principles apply notwithstanding the great service rendered by those who repaired New York, the heroism of those who entered the site when it was unstable and on fire, and the serious health consequences that are plausibly alleged in the complaint. . . . Because the conduct at issue here does not shock the conscience, there was no constitutional violation. We therefore need not decide whether the conduct alleged violated law that was then clearly established, or whether any special factors counsel hesitation in the recognition of a Bivens action against the defendants."); Witkowski v. Milwaukee County, 480 F.3d 511, 513, 514 (7th Cir. 2007) ("[S]omeone who chooses to enter a snake pit or a lion's den for compensation cannot complain. Powerful evidence shows that higher wages compensate people whose jobs are risky. . . That evidence is not what undercuts Witkowski's claim, however; what is dispositive against him is the fact that he is a volunteer rather than a conscript. The state did not force him into a position of danger.This is not to say that public employees are beyond the Constitution's protection. Suppose Witkowski had alleged that Milwaukee County exposed him to extra risks because he had campaigned against the County's political leaders or because of his race. Such allegations would state a legally sufficient claim under the first amendment or the equal protection clause of the fourteenth. . . That is not Witkowski's theory, however. He invokes only the due process cause, the domain of Collins, DeShaney, and Walker. Allowing Ball into court without the stunbelt imperiled everyone there: judge, jurors, and spectators were at more risk than Witkowski, who could have protected himself (and everyone else) had he kept control of his weapon. All Witkowski meant by alleging that Gunn and Halstead acted intentionally or recklessly is that they knew about Ball's willingness and desire to wreak havoc, not that they had some ulterior motive for wanting Witkowski dead or wounded. Disregarding a known risk to a public employee does not violate the Constitution whether or not the risk comes to pass."); Kaucher v. County of Bucks, 455 F.3d 418, 435, 436 (3d Cir. 2006) ("The Kauchers have not alleged an affirmative, culpable act on the part of defendants sufficient to implicate the state created danger doctrine. Nor have they alleged conscience-shocking conduct on the part of defendants that could transform a workplace safety claim into a substantive due process claim. At base, the Kauchers contend defendants failed to provide a working environment free from risk of infection − a claim precluded by Collins. . . .We conclude the Kauchers' claims relate to a failure to remedy conditions at the jail. The Kauchers allege defendants failed to prevent MRSA from spreading through the jail, took insufficient action to protect the jail's corrections officers from contracting an infection, and failed to warn and educate corrections officers in infection prevention. Despite their attempts to characterize defendants' actions as affirmatively creating dangerous conditions, they allege a failure to act to prevent dangerous conditions. Under Collins, this claim must fail."); Estate of Phillips v. District of Columbia,455 F.3d 397, 407, 408 (D.C. Cir. 2006) ("As in Washington, Edwards's deliberate indifference may have increased the Firefighters' exposure to risk, but the risk itself − injury or death suffered in a fire − is inherent in their profession. As both Washington and FOP make clear, the District is not constitutionally obliged by the Due Process Clause to protect public employees from inherent job-related risks. . . . The Firefighters point to a recent case of ours, Smith v. District of Columbia, 413 F.3d 86 (D.C.Cir.2005), as a holding counter to our bright-line application of the custody requirement. . . . Emphasizing the Smith victim's relative freedom of movement yet restricted place of residence (similar to the restraints the D.C.Code provisions allegedly placed on them), the Firefighters claim that Smith supports their contention that a heightened obligation can exist absent custody. But in Smith we found that the District had a heightened obligation because its in loco parentis status significantly restrained the victim's liberty. . . . The restrictions on his liberty − imposed on him by the District − are plainly distinguishable from those restrictions the D.C.Code imposes on the Firefighters' liberty − restrictions voluntarily assumed by the Firefighters as conditions of employment by the Department."); Moore v. Guthrie, 438 F.3d 1036, 1042, 1043 (10th Cir. 2006) (10th Cir. 2006) ("We have identified the 'classic' danger creation case to be Wood v. Ostrander, 879 F.2d 583 (9th Cir.1989), where police officers impounded the plaintiff's car and abandoned her in the middle of the night in a high crime area where she was raped. . . This is a narrow exception, . . . which applies only when a state actor 'affirmatively acts to create, or increases a plaintiff's vulnerability to, danger from private violence,' Currier v. Doran, 242 F.3d 905, 923 (10th Cir.2001). It does not apply when the injury occurs due to the action of another state actor. In the instant case, since Plaintiff was injured by a Simunition bullet fired by a fellow police officer and not a private third party, the danger creation doctrine is inapplicable. Plaintiff also contends that he has sufficiently pleaded a violation of his right to bodily integrity under the 'special relationship' doctrine. The special relationship doctrine is another exception to the general principle that government actors are not responsible for private acts of violence. . . As just discussed, however, because this case does not involve a private act of violence by a third party, this theory is also inapplicable to the facts alleged by Plaintiff. More importantly, we have specifically held that the special relationship doctrine is not triggered in an employment relationship, which is presumed consensual. . . Last, it should be noted that, even if either the danger creation or special relationship theory were applicable, it would not relieve Plaintiff of his duty to allege actions that shock the conscience. As required under the second prong to defeat a qualified immunity defense, Plaintiff argues that his violated right was clearly established at the time of his injury. . . . Although Plaintiff does not need to find a case with an identical factual situation, he still must show legal authority which makes it 'apparent' that 'in the light of pre-existing law' a reasonable official, in Chief Guthrie's position, would have known that having police officers wear riot helmets rather than Simunition face masks would violate their substantive due process right of bodily integrity. . . First, as discussed earlier, the Supreme Court has only recognized a right to bodily integrity under the Fourteenth Amendment in very limited circumstances, not including working in a safe environment. Second, courts have declined to find a violation of substantive due process in circumstances similar to, or more shocking than, that alleged by Plaintiff. Therefore, we cannot say that it was clearly established that Chief Guthrie and the City of Evans violated Plaintiff's constitutional right to bodily integrity by requiring him to wear his riot helmet during training."); Young v. City of Providence, 404 F.3d 4, 27 (1st Cir. 2005) ("The district court is correct in saying that the issue is not whether Cornel's death was caused by his own lack of proper training in identifying himself or otherwise in conducting himself while off-duty. . . Collins establishes that a city worker has no constitutional right at all to adequate training; thus, there can be no independent claim of constitutional violation separate from Solitro's use of excessive force."); Fraternal Order of Police Department of Corrections Labor Committee v. Williams, 375 F.3d 1141, 1144 & n.3, 1145 (D.C. Cir. 2004)(relying on Collins to reject Union's claim that its members have "a substantive due process right that would compel the District ... to hire additional employees to staff the [D.C.] Jail in order to address what, they assert, is an unreasonably dangerous workplace."); McKinney v. Irving Independent School District, 309 F.3d 308, 314 (5th Cir. 2002) ("As the district court recognized, there is no doubt that the McKinneys described a dangerous working environment in their pleadings-that of uncontrolled and disruptive special-education students on a moving school bus in heavy traffic. They do not, however, allege any facts showing that defendants took any affirmative action to increase the risk over the dangers inherent in this working environment. . . . McKinney faced nothing more than the ordinary risks of driving the school bus that transported the special-education students to and from Gilbert. The McKinneys' real complaint is that defendants did not take an affirmative step, namely, provide a bus monitor to supervise the students or other safeguards for McKinney's protection while driving the bus. We hold that the due process clause did not require that defendants place a monitor on the school bus."); Sperle v. Michigan Dep't of Corrections, 297 F.3d 483, 492-93 (6th Cir. 2002) ("The key factor in custodial environments and other situations where deliberate indifference renders state actors liable for substantive due process violations is the ability of the officials to consider their actions in an unhurried, deliberative manner. . . . Tammy Sperle worked in a 'custodial setting,' an environment where the defendants had the opportunity to design the security precautions at the HVMF and to respond to any general dangers that existed. We therefore conclude that the 'deliberate-indifference' standard is an appropriate one for evaluating her § 1983 claim. . . . Even if the individual defendants could have made the working conditions safer for Tammy Sperle by providing PPDs to school building employees, adding extra security guards, or insuring greater supervision of Herndon, they did not act in an arbitrary manner that 'shocks the conscience' or that indicates any intent to injure her. . . . Our conclusion does not change when we apply the deliberate-indifference standard. 'Deliberate indifference has been equated with subjective recklessness, and requires the § 1983 plaintiff to show that the state official knows of and disregards an excessive risk to [the victim's] health or safety.'"); White v. Lemacks, 183 F.3d 1253, 1257 (11th Cir. 1999) ("Collins makes it clear that the fact a government employee would risk losing her job if she did not submit to unsafe job conditions does not convert a voluntary employment relationship into a custodial relationship, and therefore does not entitle the employee to constitutional protection from workplace hazards, one of which can be harm caused by third parties. . . . Thus, Collins directly conflicts with and overrules the part of Cornelius [v. Town of Highland Lake, 880 F.2d 348 (11th Cir. 1989)] holding that a government employment relationship, in and of itself, is a 'special relationship' giving rise to a constitutional duty to protect individuals from harm by third parties. As a result, the part of Cornelius adopting, or perpetuating, a 'special relationship' doctrine that guarantees government employees constitutional protection from unreasonable risks of harm in the workplace is no longer good law."); Wallace v. Adkins, 115 F.3d 427, 429 (7th Cir. 1997) ("Unlike a prisoner, a person involuntarily committed to a mental institution, or a child placed by state authorities in a foster home, Wallace was free to walk out the door any time he wanted. This may seem to pose a harsh choice for prison guards, but the consequences of the opposite rule for prison administration generally would be even more unacceptable. . . . We therefore hold that prison guards ordered to stay at their posts are not in the kind of custodial setting required to create a special relationship for 14th Amendment substantive due process purposes."); Liebson v. New Mexico Corrections Dep't, 73 F.3d 274, 276 (10th Cir. 1996) (librarian assigned to provide library services to inmates housed in maximum security unit of the New Mexico State Penitentiary was not in state's custody or held against her will; employment relationship was "completely voluntary."); Skinner v. City of Miami, 62 F.3d 344, 348 n.2 (11th Cir. 1995) (in case involving hazing incident by firefighters, court determined that the "record does not support the dissent's implication that the City committed any deliberate acts to injure [plaintiff]. At most, the evidence suggests that certain fire department officials knew that hazing incidents had occurred at some points in the past. This, however, falls short of demonstrating that the City violated a substantive constitutional right."); Lewellen v. Metropolitan Government of Nashville, 34 F.3d 345 (6th Cir. 1994) (workman accidentally injured on school construction project has no substantive due process claim); Figueroa v. United States, 7 F.3d 1405, 1413 (9th Cir. 1993) ("While we acknowledge that a broader understanding of deprivation of liberty may have emerged later . . .in 1987 there was no clearly established constitutional right not to be placed in a position of danger by a government employer absent some sort of governmental restriction on an individual's physical freedom to act to avert potential harm."); Walls v. City of Detroit, 993 F.2d 1548 (6th Cir. 1993) (Table, Text in Westlaw) ("Plaintiff's artful attempt to recast his complaint in terms distinguishable from City of Harker Heights is unavailing, because it misunderstands one of the central tenets of the Supreme Court's holding in that case: the Constitution does not guarantee police officers and other municipal employees a workplace free of unreasonable risks of harm."); Searles v. SEPTA, 990 F.2d 789, 792 (3d Cir. 1993) (rejecting plaintiff's argument "that the Constitution imposes a duty on a municipal transit authority to provide its passengers with minimal levels of safety and security during transportation."); Golthy v. Alabama, 287 F.Supp.2d 1259, 1265, 1266 (M.D. Ala. 2003) ("The court has been pointed to no, and is not aware of any, cases which stand for the proposition that either equal protection or § 1981 impose a duty in the employment relationship to protect from threats of violence by third parties.. . . The Plaintiff in this case is not asserting. . .that the Individual Defendants violated Freddie Golthy Jr.'s rights because they allowed for the creation of a racially hostile environment which impacted the terms and conditions of his employment. Instead, they are asserting that the Individual Defendants violated Freddie Golthy Jr.'s rights because they did not prevent a racially-based assault. Under DeShaney and White, such conduct by the Individual Defendants does not violate the constitution."); Pahler v. City of Wilkes-Barre, 207 F. Supp.2d 341, 349, 351 (M.D. Pa. 2001) ("Regardless of the degree of culpability that should be applied, the defendants contend that the 'state created danger' theory does not apply to law enforcement officers who are injured while performing duties associated with their employment. . . The court agrees. . . . Drawing on the legal principles set forth in Collins, Rutherford, and Hartman, it is concluded that the 'state created danger' theory, arising out of the substantive due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, is inapplicable to law enforcement personnel who are injured during the course of their employment."), aff'd , 31 F. App'x 69, 71 (3d Cir. Mar. 12, 2002) (on grounds that even if state created danger doctrine applied to police officers injured on job, conduct of defendants could not be shown to be Aconscience-shocking"); Cerka v. Salt Lake County, 988 F. Supp. 1420, 1424 (D. Utah 1997) ("In the case at bar. . . defendants did not increase plaintiff's vulnerability to the jail's conditions by misrepresenting the risks in the jail. To the contrary, plaintiff and other employees were advised of the Health Department's concerns about the jail's potential sewer and air problems and possible health threats. In addition, unlike L.W., plaintiff is not attempting to recover damages for injuries resulting from actions of a third party. . . . [W]e are not confronted with an intentional government act deliberately calculated to injure plaintiff. The Supreme Court has consistently held that due process is only violated by intentional acts of government officials, not by negligence or carelessness. . . . Based on the principles of Collins, Lewellen, Daniels, and Uhlrig this Court holds that plaintiff does not have a substantive life, liberty, or property due process claim. There is no constitutionally protected interest in a safe work environment under Collins and its progeny."), aff'd, 172 F.3d 878 (10th Cir. 1999); Rutherford v. City of Newport News, 919 F. Supp. 885, 895 (E.D. Va. 1996) (rejecting claim "that police officials owe an affirmative duty, based on the Constitution, to ensure that police officers dispatched on dangerous operations are specially trained, fully prepared, and adequately supported in undertaking such a mission."), aff'd, 107 F.3d 867 (Table), (4th Cir. 1997); Hartman v. Bachert, 880 F. Supp. 342, 351-52 (E.D. Pa. 1995) (state has no constitutional obligation to protect deputy sheriff from dangers inherent in occupation).

See also Benzman v. Whitman, 523 F.3d 119, 127, 128 (2d Cir. 2008) ("We recently ruled that a claim similar to the Plaintiffs' did not allege the denial of a right to substantive due process. See Lombardi v. Whitman, 485 F.3d 73 (2d Cir.2007). The claim in Lombardi was brought against Whitman by emergency responders to the ground zero site in the immediate aftermath of the terrorist attack and by workers at the site in the weeks thereafter. Like the Plaintiffs here, they claimed that many of the same statements at issue here violated their right to substantive due process by assuring them that it was safe to work at the site where they were subject to the same dangers from contaminated air alleged in the pending case. We rejected the claim, primarily on the ground that, absent an allegation of intent to harm, a viable substantive due process violation could not be asserted against government officials, who, in the aftermath of an unprecedented disaster, were obliged to make operational decisions in a context where they were subject to competing considerations. . . The Plaintiffs here seek to distinguish Lombardi on the ground that the considerations favoring prompt appearance at ground zero by first responders and other workers in order to minimize loss of life and injury and to clear debris find no analogue in the decision of Whitman to assure area residents that it was safe to return. We agree that the considerations weighing upon Government officials in the two cases differ. While it was obviously important to have the Lombardi plaintiffs at ground zero promptly even if health risks would be encountered, the balance of competing governmental interests faced in reassuring people that it was safe to return to their homes and offices was materially different from that faced in Lombardi. A flaw in the Plaintiffs' claim, however, is that, from the face of their complaint, it is apparent that Whitman did face a choice between competing considerations, although not the stark choice between telling a deliberate falsehood about health risks and issuing an accurate warning about them. As the Complaint alleges, quoting a report from the EPA's Office of Inspector General, the White House Council on Environmental Quality ("CEQ") ' Ainfluenced, through the collaboration process, the information that EPA communicated to the public through its early press releases when it convinced EPA to add reassuring statements and delete cautionary ones.''. . The realistic choice for Whitman was either to accept the White House guidance and reassure the public or disregard the CEQ's views in communicating with the public. A choice of that sort implicates precisely the competing governmental considerations that Lombardi recognized would preclude a valid claim of denial of substantive due process in the absence of an allegation that the Government official acted with intent to harm. Moreover, although the reasons to encourage the return of workers to the site promptly were undoubtedly weightier than any concern to encourage the return of residents to homes and offices, Whitman was subject to an array of competing considerations of the sort identified in Lombardi. . . Whether or not Whitman's resolution of such competing considerations was wise, indeed, even if her agency's overall performance was as deficient as the Plaintiffs allege, she has not engaged in conduct that 'shocks the conscience' in the sense necessary to create constitutional liability for damages to thousands of people under the substantive component of the Due Process Clause.").

But see Polanco v. Diaz, 76 F.4th 918, 926-27, 929 (9th Cir. 2023), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 2520 (2024) ("The transfer of 122 inmates from CIM to San Quentin was plainly affirmative conduct, as was the decision to house the transferred inmates in open-air cells and have them share facilities with the general San Quentin population. And the transfer placed Polanco in a much more dangerous position than he was in before. Prior to the transfer, there were no known cases of COVID-19 at San Quentin; after the transfer, there were many. That harm was foreseeable, because Defendants transferred inmates from a prison experiencing an active COVID-19 outbreak to a prison that had managed to avoid such an outbreak—and did so without properly testing or screening the transferred inmates for COVID-19, revising the plan when inmates fell ill on the buses, or quarantining the inmates upon their arrival. The allegations paint a clear picture: San Quentin had managed to keep COVID-19 out, but Defendants brought it in. . .So too was the danger 'particularized.' Affirmative state action that exposes a broad swath of the public to 'generalized dangers' cannot support a state-created-danger claim. . . But a danger can be 'particularized' even if it is directed toward a group rather than an individual. . .The danger here falls into the latter category because the transfer exposed a 'discrete and identifiable group'—prison guards and inmates at San Quentin—to the dangers of COVID-19. . . Finally, the danger to which Polanco was exposed was sufficiently severe to raise constitutional concerns. Although our precedent has not elaborated on the level of harm required to sustain a state-created-danger claim, it has been implicit in our cases that not any risk will do—the harm must be severe enough to constitute a 'danger.'. . We do not attempt to delimit here the range of harms that count, but we are confident that exposure to COVID-19, at least in a pre-vaccine world, does. . . .We are sympathetic to the competing priorities that public officials had to navigate during the early days of the COVID-19 pandemic. But the specific tradeoff that Defendants invoke here is incompatible with the Complaint. Taking Plaintiffs' allegations as true and drawing reasonable inferences in their favor, as we must at this stage of the proceedings, properly testing and screening the inmates before the transfer would have made the transfer safer for both San Quentin employees and the transferred inmates. Quarantining the transferred inmates, too, would have benefitted all parties. And when it comes to masks and tests, the Complaint expressly alleges that there was no such tradeoff, asserting that masks and other personal protective equipment were "easily obtainable" and highlighting two separate occasions on which Defendants turned down labs' offers to provide COVID-19 testing at San Quentin, at least one of which offered to do so for free. On the face of the Complaint, there is no room for Defendants' version of the events. We therefore hold that Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged that Defendants acted with deliberate indifference toward the health and safety of San Quentin employees, including Polanco, satisfying the second prong of the state-created-danger claim."); Hawkins v. Holloway, 316 F.3d 777, 787 (8th Cir. 2003) ("The Supreme Court recognized in Collins v. City of Harker Heights that substantive due process does not protect municipal employees from the unreasonable risk of harm in the workplace. . . But the sheriff's alleged conduct cannot be characterized as an unreasonable risk incident to one's service as an employee in a sheriff's department. Instead, the facts demonstrate that the sheriff deliberately abused his power by threatening deadly force as a means of oppressing those employed in his department, thus elevating his conduct to the arbitrary and conscience shocking behavior prohibited by substantive due process."); Sherwood v. Oklahoma County, No. 01-6194, 2002 WL 1472197, at *6 (10th Cir. July 10, 2002) (not published) ("Concern about Plaintiff's and the inmates' welfare was not only possible, but one would think obligatory, given Defendants' position of authority over Plaintiff and the undisputed information given to Defendants about the serious safety and health hazards posed by the planned painting. Hence, the facts and circumstances presented to the Court evidence the possibility that a reasonable jury could find Defendants' behavior was egregious, outrageous and recklessly indifferent to the serious consequences imposed on Plaintiff. . . . With time to make an unhurried judgment and with accurate information outlining the applicable regulations and attendant risks and dangers involved with the proposed painting operation, Defendants placed their desire to paint old vehicles . . . over the health, safety, and welfare of Plaintiff. Such arbitrary action pursued without any reasonable justification makes the Defendants' deliberate indifference to the rights, health and welfare of the Plaintiff actionable."); Eddy v. Virgin Islands Water and Power Authority, 256 F.3d 204, 212, 213 (3rd Cir. 2001) ("Unlike the defendants, we do not read this passage or anything else in Collins to mean that the plaintiff in that case would not have stated a substantive due process claim if she had alleged conduct on the part of the city that satisfied the demanding shocks the conscience test. Rather, we understand Collins to mean that the allegations in that case did not rise to the conscience-shocking level and that the Due Process Clause does not reach a public employer's ordinary breach of its duty of care relative to its employees."); Jensen v. City of Oxnard, 145 F.3d 1078, 1083-84 (9th Cir. 1998) ("Employing Collins, Oxnard argues that Officer Jensen could not have had any of his rights violated because he was injured while performing his duties as a police officer. We reject this argument and Oxnard's attempt to turn this into a safe workplace case. Although this case is similar to the safe workplace cases in that they both concern individuals who 'voluntarily accepted ... an offer of employment,'... this case is different in one significant way − the nature of the injury alleged.... While the safe workplace cases concern the failure of the state adequately to train, prepare, or protect government employees from non-state actors, this case involves the allegedly intentional or reckless acts of a government employee directed against another government employee."); Briscoe v. Potter, 355 F.Supp.2d 30, 44-47 (D.D.C. 2004) ("[T]aking the allegations in Plaintiffs' complaint as true, Defendants did not simply 'stand by and do nothing' once it became known that the Brentwood facility was contaminated with anthrax. Defendants are alleged to have engaged in a series of actions which intentionally misled Plaintiffs into believing the facility was safe and prevented them from acting to preserve their own safety. Giving Plaintiffs the benefit of crediting the complaint allegations and all reasonable inferences therefrom, they have sufficiently alleged that Defendants took the requisite affirmative actions to trigger liability under the State Endangerment Theory to withstand dismissal on the pleadings . . .If the facts are as alleged, the conduct of USPS managers would appear commendable for their dedication to getting the mail out but deplorable for not recognizing the potential human risk involved. Just as in Butera and Phillips, these alleged actions demonstrated a gross disregard for a dangerous situation in which 'actual deliberation [was] practical.' . . It is alleged that Defendants 'had been put on notice of the serious consequences that could result' from Plaintiffs' exposure to anthrax yet, despite such knowledge, Defendants engaged in a campaign of misinformation designed to keep the employees at work. . . . The Court therefore finds that Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged that Defendants' conduct amounted to deliberate indifference, which violated their substantive due-process rights under the State Endangerment theory. . . . Defendants' reliance on cases such as Collins and Washington to support their proposition that 'the Astate endangerment' theory of Butera cannot be applied to the plaintiffs' allegations concerning a federal workplace,' . . . is misguided. . . . Unlike the plaintiffs in Washington,. . .Plaintiffs here are not seeking constitutional redress based on Defendants' failure to protect them from a hazard that was 'inherent' in their occupation. While it is true that Defendants did not force Plaintiffs to become postal workers, potential exposure to anthrax is not a danger that one would reasonably anticipate when accepting employment at a post office. . . Although the Washington court severely limited the extent to which government employers can be held constitutionally liable for injuries sustained by their employees, the Supreme Court's subsequent decision in Collins flatly rejected the notion that a government employee can never assert a substantive due-process claim against the government. . . Thus, the Court finds that the relevant case law does not preclude Plaintiffs' substantive due-process claims under the State-Endangerment theory.").

In Uhlrig v. Harder, 64 F.3d 567 (10th Cir.1995), a therapist at a state mental hospital was killed by a criminally insane patient who, because of budgetary constraints, was housed with the general population. The court held that to state a claim for damages based on a state-created danger in the workplace:

> Plaintiff must demonstrate that (1) Uhlrig was a member of a limited and specifically definable group; (2) Defendants' conduct put Uhlrig and the other members of that group at substantial risk of serious, immediate and proximate harm; (3) the risk was obvious or known; (4) Defendants acted recklessly in conscious disregard of that risk; and (5) such conduct, when viewed in total, is conscience shocking.

64 F.3d at 574. See also Estate of Johnson v. Weber, 785 F.3d 267, 273 (8th Cir. 2015) ("The murder perpetrated on Ronald Johnson shocks the conscience of this Court; however, the record does not demonstrate it was deliberate indifference to not consider Robert and Berget extremely dangerous before the murder of Ronald Johnson. We need not decide whether allowing an extremely dangerous inmate to reside in general population with the opportunity to murder shocks the conscience, because the histories of Robert and Berget do not support deliberate indifference in failing to consider them highly dangerous. Even with vague notice of a planned escape attempt, the defendants were not deliberately indifferent in failing to place Robert and Berget in maximum security. No prior escape attempts included violence and none had been successful after 1987."); Martinez v. Uphoff, 265 F.3d 1130 (10th Cir. 2001) (rejecting state-created danger theory in case where prison guard was killed by escaping inmates); Poe v. Wyandotte County, No. 99-2273-JWL, 2002 WL 57257, at *8 (D.Kan. Jan. 9, 2002) (not reported) (Reviewing Tenth Circuit cases involving employees in prison context and concluding A*Liebson, Maine* and Martinez illustrate that generalized claims pertaining to unsatisfactory work conditions will not suffice for a danger creation theory claim because they do not meet the shock the conscience standard.")

See also L.W. v. Grubbs (L.W. II), 92 F.3d 894, 900 (9th Cir. 1996):

> We conclude that in order to establish Section 1983 liability in an action against a state official for an injury to a prison employee caused by an inmate, the plaintiff must show that the state official participated in creating a dangerous condition, and acted with deliberate indifference to the known or obvious danger in subjecting the plaintiff to it. Only if the state official was deliberately indifferent does the analysis then proceed further to decide whether the conduct amounts to a constitutional violation. We have not added a requirement that the conscience of the federal judiciary be shocked by deliberate indifference, because the use of such subjective epithets as "gross" "reckless" and "shocking" sheds more heat than light on the thought processes courts must undertake in cases of this kind. Deliberate indifference to a known, or so obvious as to imply knowledge of, danger, by a supervisor who participated in creating the danger, is enough. Less is not enough.

b. state-created-danger cases

In Archie v. City of Racine, 847 F.2d 1211 (7th Cir. 1988) (en banc), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1065 (1989), a pre-DeShaney decision, the Seventh Circuit concluded that there is no constitutional duty under the due process clause to provide effective rescue services. 847 F.2d at 1220. The court expressly rejected the concept of a constitutional duty flowing from some sort of "special relationship" outside of the custodial context, and carefully set out the contexts in which the state might be found to have a duty to protect under the Due Process Clause.

"When the state puts a person in danger, the Due Process Clause requires the state to protect him to the extent of ameliorating the incremental risk. When the state cuts off sources of private aid, it must provide replacement protection." Id. at 1223, distinguishing White v. Rochford, 592 F.2d 381, 382-84 (7th Cir. 1979) (police had affirmative duty to protect children left abandoned in car on busy freeway after police arrested children's uncle).

See Bowers v. DeVito, 686 F.2d 616, 618 (7th Cir. 1982) ("If the state puts a man in a position of danger from private persons and then fails to protect him... it is as much an active tortfeasor as if it had thrown him into a snake pit.").

Compare Murguia v. Langdon, 73 F.4th 1103, 1104, 1109-18 (9th Cir. 2023) (Bumatay, J., joined by Callahan, Ikuta, and R. Nelson, JJ., dissenting from denial of reh'g en banc), cert. denied sub nom County of Tulare v. Murguia, No. 23-270 (U.S Jan. 8, 2024) ("[T]he state-created danger exception finds no support in the text of the Constitution, the historical understanding of the 'due process of law,' or even Supreme Court precedent. And as the Court recently emphasized, we should be reluctant to recognize rights not mentioned in the Constitution to 'guard against the natural human tendency to confuse what [the Fourteenth] Amendment protects with our own ardent views about the liberty that Americans should enjoy.' Dobbs v. Jackson Women's Health Org., —– U.S. ——–, 142 S. Ct. 2228, 2247, 213 L.Ed.2d 545 (2022). As such, at least one circuit has questioned the legitimacy of this recent-vintage right. See Fisher v. Moore, 62 F.4th 912, 913 (5th Cir. 2023) (declining to adopt state-created danger doctrine because of the Supreme Court's 'forceful pronouncements signaling unease with implied rights not deeply rooted in our Nation's history and tradition'). And given its opaque origins, the doctrine has also caused a split among the other circuits about how to apply it. . . . Whatever the wisdom of the state-created danger doctrine, three related concerns arise from its origin and application. First, we should be wary of recognizing a new constitutional right from such an uncertain source. Second, given the lack of a textual and historical mooring, we should be careful before extending it. From its beginnings in DeShaney to Murguia today, the doctrine has evolved along a course of repeated expansion—so much so that the Constitution now is the 'font of tort law' the Court has told us to avoid. . . Third, the circuit courts have varied wildly on how to apply the doctrine. With just a couple of lines from DeShaney to go on, circuit courts have—predictably—come up with diverging tests for determining when the exception applies. [Dissent sets out tests applied by each circuit] Of course, these varying tests for the same exception are no surprise when you consider the legal foundation on which they rest. A two-sentence aside in a single opinion is not a lot to go on. But like Dr. Frankenstein, courts have cobbled together bits and pieces of standards from other contexts to try to breathe new life into substantive due process after DeShaney. . . And like his monster, the state-created danger exception roams menacingly among our circuit courts and is often difficult to comprehend. We should have done our part to contain this creation. . . . To summarize: plaintiffs can't just point to any affirmative act to state a due process claim; they must point to 'the State's affirmative act of restraining the individual's freedom to act on his own behalf to 'trigger[ ] the protections of the Due Process Clause..'. . Only then can we say that there was some 'arbitrary exercise of the powers of government.'. . . Following this limitation would keep federal courts from turning constitutional law into tort law—something the Supreme Court has made clear that we should not do. . .With the proper understanding of the state-created danger exception in mind, we may now turn back to Murguia's claims. While Murguia experienced unspeakable tragedy, under the proper due process analysis, his state-created danger claims against Sergeant Garcia, Torres, Deputy Lewis, and Sergeant Cerda should have been dismissed. . . . We should have seized this opportunity to correct our longstanding errors in applying the state-created danger doctrine. We could have put ourselves back on track with Supreme Court precedent and our Constitution's text. And the solution is a narrow and straightforward one—holding that only affirmative acts that cause the 'deprivation of liberty' may suffice for a state-created danger claim. It is regrettable that our court has declined to take this textual approach.") with Fisher v. Moore, 73 F.4th 367, 375 (5th Cir. 2023) (Wiener, J., concurring), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 569 (2024) ("I concur in the well-written and well-reasoned opinion written by my colleague, Judge Willett, joined by Chief Judge Richman. Although we are bound by this court's precedent, I disagree with its refusal to rehear this case en banc and join the ten other circuits that have now adopted the state-created danger cause of action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, thereby permitting individuals to sue state actors for damages resulting from their acts or failures to act. I am convinced that it is well past time for this circuit to be dragged screaming into the 21st century by joining all of the other circuits that have now recognized the state-created danger cause of action. It is well past time for this circuit to be dragged screaming into the 21st century by joining all those other circuits that have now unanimously recognized the state-created danger cause of action. I acknowledge that we could only do so by taking this case en banc, but we have yet again failed to do so. The extreme and uncontested facts of this case presented an excellent opportunity for us to join those other circuits. As a senior judge, I could and did participate on the three-judge panel that heard and decided this case. And as a senior judge, I could have participated as a voting member of the en banc court if this case had been reheard en banc. But, as a senior judge, I could not call for an en banc poll or vote in the one that was called for by an active judge of this court. The horrific facts of this case, as reported by Judge Willett in his opinion for this panel, presented an ideal vehicle for this circuit's consideration of joining the ten other circuits that have unanimously recognized the state-created danger cause of action. If we had reheard this case en banc, the parties would have had the opportunity to brief and argue whether the facts alleged in the instant complaint state a plausible claim against school officials for student-on-student violence, and to distinguish the adverse authorities. I saw this case as the perfect vehicle for our circuit to rehear this case en banc and join the other ten circuits that have now recognized the state-created danger cause of action in § 1983 claims against state actors. This is why I respectfully concur.) and Fisher v. Moore, 73 F.4th 367, 375-76 (5th Cir. 2023) (Higginson, Douglas, Stewart, Elrod, Haynes, Graves, JJ., dissenting from denial of rehearing en banc), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 569 (2024) ("This case yet again squarely presents the question of whether a plaintiff may state a claim under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 where a state actor 'created or knew of a dangerous situation and affirmatively placed the plaintiff in that situation.'. . For over a decade, our court has refused to answer. . . To date, ten other circuits have recognized this 'state-created danger doctrine.'. . Our indecision is a disservice to injured plaintiffs who are forced to litigate in endless uncertainty about their federal rights. And if this circuit is inclined to disagree with all others, then our delay is blocking percolation, which 'allows a period of exploratory consideration and experimentation by lower courts before the Supreme Court ends the process with a nationally binding rule.'. . Litigants should continue asking this court to decide the state-created danger issue, confident that we will act as a 'responsible agent[ ] in the process of development of national law.'. . Indeed, a future panel could assume this responsibility. . . Because our refusal to take on the mantle here only serves to perpetuate uncertainty, we respectfully dissent from the denial of rehearing en banc.").

The state-created-danger basis for finding a duty to protect on the part of the state appears to remain intact after Deshaney. See, e.g., Murguia v. Langdon, 61 F.4th 1096, 1108-17 (9th Cir. 2023), pet. for reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, 73 F.4th 1103 (9th Cir. 2023), cert. denied sub nom County of Tulare v. Murguia, No. 23-270 (U.S Jan. 8, 2024) ("Neither Johnson nor Preschooler II held that the failure to comply with a legally required duty, without more, can give rise to a substantive due process claim. Indeed, such a conclusion is foreclosed by DeShaney. In keeping with our well-established case law, we make clear that the only two exceptions to the general rule against failure-to-act liability for § 1983 claims presently recognized by this court are the special-relationship exception and the state-created danger exception. . . .The case law demonstrates that 'custody' for the purposes of the special-relationship exception is a restriction on the plaintiff's liberty that limits the ability of the plaintiff (or the plaintiff's parents) to meet the plaintiff's basic needs (e.g., incarceration, institutionalization, foster care). . . Here, Individual Defendants never formally took the twins into custody; the twins remained with Langdon at all times, and the twins were not institutionalized or placed in foster care. . . The special-relationship exception therefore does not apply in this case. . . . This court and other circuits have applied the state-created danger exception in situations where an officer abandoned the plaintiff in a dangerous situation, separated the plaintiff from a third-party who may have offered assistance, or prevented other individuals from rendering assistance to the plaintiff. . . .Under this case law, if Lewis and Cerda had left the ten-month-old twins alone with Langdon in her dangerous and unstable condition, such conduct would almost certainly have constituted affirmative action enhancing a risk of physical harm to the twins. . . . Given that Lewis and Cerda merely replaced one competent adult—Jose—with another competent adult—Rosa, we are not convinced that 'the officers left the [twins] in a situation that was more dangerous than the one in which they found [them].'. .However, Plaintiffs should have the opportunity to amend their complaint because we cannot say amendment would be futile given their vague allegations and because the district court applied the incorrect 'custody' standard. . . .Plaintiffs have adequately stated their § 1983 claims against TPD Sergeant Garcia under the state-created danger exception. Plaintiffs argue that Garcia increased the risk of physical harm to the twins by arranging a room for them at a motel, transporting Langdon and the twins from Lighthouse to the motel, and leaving them there. We agree. When Garcia left Langdon and the twins at the motel, he removed them from the supervision of the

Lighthouse staff and rendered the twins more vulnerable to physical injury by Langdon as a result of their isolation with her. . . . We conclude that the complaint adequately alleges Garcia knew Langdon's mental health crisis posed a serious risk of physical harm to the twins but nonetheless disregarded this risk and left the twins in a situation that was more dangerous than how he found them. . . . Given the allegations that Torres knew about Langdon's history of abuse—including abuse of her own son—we conclude that the complaint alleges Torres was aware of the obvious risk of harm Langdon presented to the twins. . . . Making all reasonable inferences in favor of Plaintiffs, the FAC alleges that Torres knew about Langdon's history of violence and mental illness, including multiple specific instances of physical violence against her own family members, including her son. A reasonable jury could find that Torres was aware of the risk that Langdon would physically harm the twins and nevertheless lied to Garcia about Langdon's background, and in doing so ignored the consequences of her actions. Our conclusion is bolstered by the young age and utter defenselessness of the ten-month-old twins."); Mears v. Connolly, 24 F.4th 880, 884-86 (3d Cir. 2022) ("The District Court found that Nurse Oglesby had not affirmatively acted to create a danger and that June had not suffered 'foreseeable and fairly direct' harm as a result. . . . On both points, it erred. By leaving the room during June's visit, Nurse Oglesby may have facilitated Brenden's assault. . . . Nurse Oglesby was the head of Brenden's nursing team. While under her care, his mental health had 'deteriorated significantly,' and he had 'bec[o]me progressively more psychotic.'. . Just three days before June's visit, he was 'acting bizarrely' and attacked another patient. . . These facts would have put her on notice of the serious threat Brenden posed to his mother. Indeed, she repeatedly complained to June about Brenden's behavior.The District Court found otherwise because Brenden had not attacked June before. But that focus is too narrow. . . . Nurse Oglesby's behavior resembles that of police officers who stopped a drunk couple, separated them, and then let the wife wander off alone. Kneipp v. Tedder, 95 F.3d 1199, 1209 (3d Cir. 1996). It was a cold January night, just above freezing. . . The wife fell, was knocked out, and froze. . . The police, we held, had acted affirmatively and 'made [her] more vulnerable to harm.'. . Nurse Oglesby's conduct had a similar effect on June. Nurse Oglesby assumed care but then withdrew it, leaving June alone in a more dangerous position. . .Our holding is narrow. If June had knowingly agreed to an unsupervised visit, the result would likely be different. But on the facts alleged, Nurse Oglesby's departure deprived her of the freedom to avoid an unsupervised visit or to take other precautions. June has thus pleaded an affirmative act that put her in danger. . .June does not plead that Dr. Young took any affirmative act; his assurances do not count. But Nurse Oglesby may be liable for putting June in danger by withdrawing her supervision. So we will reverse in part and remand to let the District Court finish analyzing the other elements of June's state-created-danger claim against Nurse Oglesby."); Irish v. Fowler (Irish II), 979 F.3d 65, 67, 73-76 (1st Cir. 2020), cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 74 (2021) ("In this opinion, we hold on these facts that a viable substantive due process state-created danger claim has been presented against two Maine State Police ("MSP") officers, and that it was error to grant the officers qualified immunity. Under the state-created danger substantive due process doctrine, officers may be held liable for failing to protect plaintiffs from danger created or enhanced by their affirmative acts. In doing so, we for the first time join nine other circuits in holding such a theory of substantive due process liability is viable. . . . The circuits that recognize the doctrine uniformly require that the defendant affirmatively acted to create or exacerbate a danger to a specific individual or class of people. . . Each circuit requires that the defendant's acts be highly culpable and go beyond mere negligence. . . The plaintiff also must show a causal connection between the defendant's acts and the harm. . . This circuit has repeatedly outlined the core elements of the state-created danger doctrine as they have been articulated in other circuits. This court has stated that in order to be liable under the state-created danger doctrine, the defendant must 'affirmatively act[ ] to increase the threat to an individual of third-party private harm.'. . A government official must actually have created or escalated the danger to the plaintiff and the plaintiff cannot have 'voluntarily assume[d] those risks.'. . The danger cannot be 'to the general public,' it must be 'specific' in some 'meaningful sense' to the plaintiff. . . The official's acts must cause the plaintiff's injury. . . The defendant's actions must 'shock the conscience,' and where a state actor had the 'opportunity to reflect and make reasoned and rational decisions, deliberately indifferent behavior may suffice to "shock the conscience."'. . To show deliberate indifference, the plaintiff 'must, at a bare minimum, demonstrate that [the defendant] actually knew of a substantial risk of serious harm ... and disregarded that risk.'. . In evaluating whether the defendant's actions shocked the conscience, we also consider whether the defendants violated state law or proper police procedures and training. . . .We now state the necessary components for the viability of such a claim. In order to make out a state-created danger claim in the First Circuit, the plaintiff must establish:

(1) that a state actor or state actors affirmatively acted to create or enhance a danger to the plaintiff;

(2) that the act or acts created or enhanced a danger specific to the plaintiff and distinct from the danger to the general public;

(3) that the act or acts caused the plaintiff's harm; and

(4) that the state actor's conduct, when viewed in total, shocks the conscience.

(i) Where officials have the opportunity to make unhurried judgments, deliberate indifference may shock the conscience, particularly where the state official performs multiple acts of indifference to a rising risk of acute and severe danger. To show deliberate indifference, the plaintiff must, at a bare minimum, demonstrate that the defendant actually knew of a substantial risk of serious harm and disregarded that risk.

(ii) Where state actors must act in a matter of seconds or minutes, a higher level of culpability is required. . . . The defendants next argue that the officers' violations of state law and MSP policy cannot serve as the basis of a state-created danger claim. That is not the plaintiffs' argument. The plaintiffs' argument is that these violations are, at the very least, relevant to determining the conscience-shocking nature of the defendants' conduct and the qualified immunity inquiry. The plaintiffs' position is well based on our prior opinions of which the defendant officers had notice."); Lipman v. Budish, 974 F.3d 726, 742, 746-47 (6th Cir. 2020) ("In this case, Plaintiffs say that their claims fit within both of DeShaney's exceptions, and so the county and its employees should be held responsible for the events leading to Ta'Naejah's death. First, they argue that the county had custody over Ta'Naejah, both during her hospitalization and in the month immediately before she died. Second, even if the county did not have custody over Ta'Naejah, the caseworkers' decision to repeatedly interview her in the presence of Crump and Owens significantly increased her risk of abuse, and so their claims can proceed under the state-created danger doctrine. Plaintiffs arguments about the custody exception fail. Even assuming that Ta'Naejah was ever in state custody during the period at issue in the complaint, her injuries all occurred outside of that custody when she was returned to Crump and Owens, and under DeShaney itself, the act of returning a child to her earlier situation of parental custody cannot give rise to constitutional liability. But Plaintiffs' state-created danger argument is better supported by our case law. Drawing all reasonable inferences in their favor, the decision to repeatedly interview Ta'Naejah in front of her abusers was an affirmative act that increased her risk of private violence, and so can support a claim under the Due Process Clause. Because multiple caseworkers all interviewed Ta'Naejah in the presence of her abusers, and because the right to avoid state-created danger is clearly established in this circuit, Plaintiffs have successfully pleaded a Monell claim against the county based on a custom of constitutional violations, and the individual caseworkers are not entitled to qualified immunity at the current stage of this case. . . . That interviewing Ta'Naejah in front of her alleged abusers and asking about the source of her injuries increased her risk of further abuse is . . . a reasonable inference. Not only is this plausible (or at least not implausible) from a common-sense perspective, . . . but this belief is reflected in the state's and county's written policies prohibiting such interviews wherever possible[.] . . Defendants do not argue that the risk to Ta'Naejah was not increased by their actions. Instead, they say that the requirement to privately interview Ta'Naejah cannot give rise to a constitutional duty, and even if it could, the state-created danger exception does not extend to cases where the state only created a motive for private violence, as opposed to a heightened means for violence. For the reasons that follow, both of these arguments fail. First, the fact that a duty exists under state law or regulations does not mean it cannot simultaneously exist under the Constitution. At a fundamental level, the right at issue here is the right articulated in Youngberg and before: the right to personal security, perhaps the pinnacle of an individual's interests in life and liberty. . . Such a right is separate and apart from any state regulation or policy, and the adoption of such a policy—reflecting the importance of these interests—cannot serve to demote them from constitutional status. . . . At bottom, the type of state-created danger alleged by Plaintiffs is highly analogous to the danger in Kallstrom and Nelson: the state took some action that increased the chances that a private actor would cause the plaintiff harm. This is enough to show an affirmative act under the doctrine. To be sure, Defendants may ultimately prevail on this issue at summary judgment or at trial, such as by showing that there was no feasible alternative to interviewing Ta'Naejah in Crump's and Owens's presence, or by showing that her risk was not increased when compared to not interviewing Ta'Naejah at all. But taking the allegations in the complaint as true, and drawing all reasonable inferences in Plaintiffs' favor, compels the conclusion that Plaintiffs have adequately alleged a claim based on state-created danger, and the district court erred in finding otherwise."); Hernandez v. City of San Jose, 897 F.3d 1125, 1134, 1138-39 (9th Cir. 2018) ("Just as in Wood, Penilla, Munger, and Kennedy, on the facts alleged, the Officers' affirmative acts created a danger the Rally Attendees otherwise would not have faced. Being attacked by anti-Trump protesters was only a possibility when the Attendees arrived at the Rally. The Officers greatly increased that risk of violence when they shepherded and directed the Attendees towards the unruly mob waiting outside the Convention Center. . . . Here, the Attendees allege the Officers shepherded them into a violent crowd of protesters and actively prevented them from reaching safety. The Officers continued to implement this plan even while witnessing the violence firsthand, and even though they knew the mob had attacked Trump supporters at the Convention Center earlier that evening, and that similar, violent encounters had occurred in other cities. Viewed in the light most favorable to the Attendees, these allegations establish 'with obvious clarity' that the Officers increased the danger to the Attendees and acted with deliberate indifference to that danger, pursuant to the state-created danger doctrine. . . We therefore hold 'that the operative complaint alleges facts that allow us "to draw the reasonable inference that the [Officers are] liable for the misconduct alleged,"'. . and that the district court properly denied the Officers qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings.); Matthews v. Bergdorf, 889 F.3d 1136, 1152-53 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Plaintiffs state a cause of action against caseworkers Feather and Schraad-Dahn under the state-created danger exception. This leaves us with the question of whether the law surrounding the state-created danger exception as applied to the alleged facts was clearly established at the time of the two caseworkers' purported malfeasance. To show the law was clearly established, 'the plaintiff does not have to show the specific action at issue had been held unlawful;' rather the alleged unlawful 'conduct must have been apparent in light of preexisting law.'. . In 2001, we held a state caseworker could be held liable under the state-created danger exception for instructing a mother to stop making abuse allegations against the children's father. . . We reasoned that by actively discouraging the mother from reporting suspected wrongdoing, the caseworker increased the children's vulnerability to their father's abuse. . .We see little distinction between the affirmative act of instructing an individual to cease reporting evidence of abuse as occurred in Currier and the affirmative act of warning an individual so that the latter might cover up evidence of abuse as alleged here. . . Both acts effectively impede access to protective services, and perhaps additional sources of assistance, otherwise available to the victims. . . After we decided Currier in 2001, the law was well established in the Tenth Circuit such that a reasonable caseworker cognizant of the law would have understood the following: A caseworker's affirmative actions allegedly designed to shield and protect the Matthews in light of repeated child abuse and neglect referrals could give rise to constitutional liability under the state-created danger exception. Thus, the district court properly denied caseworker Feather's and Schraad-Dahn's defense of qualified immunity on this particular claim. For the reasons stated, however, the district court erred in denying the remaining named caseworkers qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' state-created danger claims. . . . Today we have pronounced no new law; we have done nothing more than apply binding precedent. To allow Plaintiff's complaint to proceed on claims that have no basis in constitutional jurisprudence would thwart the aims of qualified immunity and impose excessive discovery costs on Defendants absent legal justification."); Nelson v. City of Madison Heights, 845 F.3d 695, 701-03 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Officer Wolowiec suggests that it was Hilliard's decision to continue to engage in prostitution that led to her demise. However, a reasonable jury could find that Hilliard's prostitution was merely the means by which her murderers chose to lure her, not an act that led to her death. Further, a reasonable jury could find that Officer Wolowiec's act of disclosing Hillard's name to the drug dealer's companion 'substantially increas[ed] the likelihood that a private actor would deprive' her of her liberty interest in personal security. . . The district court in this case relied on Kallstrom to determine that summary judgment was inappropriate. In Kallstrom, the city released private information from undercover police officers' files, including, inter alia, addresses, family members' information, and social security numbers, to a criminal defense attorney who then shared it with his clients who were violent gang members. . . This court held that 'while the state generally does not shoulder an affirmative duty to protect its citizens from private acts of violence, it may not cause or greatly increase the risk of harm to its citizens without due process of law through its own affirmative acts.'. .Additionally, we stated: '[l]iability under the state-created-danger theory is predicated upon affirmative acts by the state which either create or increase the risk that an individual will be exposed to private acts of violence.'. . 'However, because many state activities have the potential to increase an individual's risk of harm, we require plaintiffs alleging a constitutional tort under § 1983 to show "special danger" in the absence of a special relationship between the state and either the victim or the private tortfeaser.'. . 'The victim faces "special danger" where the state's actions place the victim specifically at risk, as distinguished from a risk that affects the public at large.'. . "The state must have known or clearly should have known that its actions specifically endangered an individual.". . (emphasis added). In Kallstrom, this court held that the state's actions of disclosing the undercover officers' information placed them and their family members in 'special danger' by substantially increasing the likelihood that a private actor would deprive them of their liberty interest in personal security. . . We reasoned that, '[a]nonymity is essential to the safety of undercover officers' investigating gang activity, 'especially where the gang has demonstrated a propensity for violence.'. . Similarly, Officer Wolowiec's act of disclosing Hilliard's identity to the very individual the state was supposed to protect that identity from placed Hilliard in special danger by increasing the likelihood that the private actor would deprive her of her liberty interest in personal security. . . .Like the district court, we must view the evidence in the light most favorable to Nelson. Doing so requires the conclusion that Officer Wolowiec acted with deliberate indifference when he disclosed Hilliard's identity. The evidence shows that neither he nor Hilliard knew much about Raqib other than he was a drug dealer. The evidence also reflects that Officer Wolowiec believed that Raqib could be dangerous because he removed Hilliard from the room in case Raqib showed up. The evidence shows no necessity for Officer Wolowiec to disclose Hilliard's identity during the thirty-minute window between the traffic stop and the disclosure of Hilliard's identity to Clark. Thus, a reasonable jury could find that Officer Wolowiec acted with deliberate indifference when he told Raqib's companion that Hilliard set up Raqib. Accordingly, the district court properly denied Officer Wolowiec's summary judgment motion because a reasonable jury could find that, under the state created danger theory of liability, he engaged in affirmative acts that increased Hilliard's risk of exposure to private acts of violence, which deprived Hilliard of her clearly established Due Process right to personal security and bodily integrity."); L.R. v. School District of Philadelphia, 836 F.3d 235, 244-47 (3d Cir. 2016) ("The state is responsible for the safety of very young children unable to care for themselves. Indeed, it is a responsibility the state undertakes when young children are left in its care. When Littlejohn surrendered that responsibility by releasing Jane to an unidentified adult, thereby terminating her access to the school's care, he affirmatively misused his authority just as culpably as the officers in Kneipp misused theirs. . . .The Fifth Circuit [in Doe ex rel Magee v. Covington County School District] concluded that, even assuming it recognized a state-created danger theory (to date it has not officially adopted this doctrine), the allegations failed because the complaint did 'not allege that the school knew about an immediate danger to [the student's] safety.'. . By contrast, we are comfortable concluding that Littlejohn's conduct in releasing Jane to an adult who failed to identify herself demonstrated a 'conscious disregard of a substantial risk of serious harm.'"); King ex rel. King v. East St. Louis School Dist. 189, 496 F.3d 812, 817, 818 (7th Cir. 2007) ("A fair reading of the decisions of this circuit and those of our sister circuits governing the state-created danger doctrine reveal the following three principles that must govern our analysis. . . First, in order for the Due Process Clause to impose upon a state the duty to protect its citizens, the state, by its affirmative acts, must create or increase a danger faced by an individual. . . . Second, the failure on the part of the state to protect an individual from such a danger must be the proximate cause of the injury to the individual. . . Third, because the right to protection against state-created dangers is derived from the substantive component of the Due Process Clause, the state's failure to protect the individual must shock the conscience."); Kennedy v. City of Ridgefield, 439 F.3d 1055, 1065 (9th Cir. 2006) ("Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Kennedy, we find that, if accepted as true, they are sufficient to establish that Shields acted deliberately and indifferently to the danger he was creating. Kennedy warned Shields repeatedly about Burns and requested that Shields notify her first so she could protect her family. With knowledge of Burns's propensity for violence and of Kennedy's fear, and despite his promise to Kennedy to the contrary, Shields nevertheless notified Burns first. . . . Then, after notifying Burns, Shields allegedly reassured the visibly frightened Kennedy of increased security which was either never provided or plainly ineffective. Given the danger created by Shields that the Kennedys faced, we find such alleged, capricious behavior sufficient evidence of deliberate indifference."), reh'g en banc denied, 440 F.3d 1091 (9th Cir. 2006); Pena v. DePrisco, 432 F.3d 98, 108-12 (2d Cir. 2005) ("We have been joined by a majority of our sister circuits in recognizing that a state created danger can be the basis of a substantive due process violation, . . . but in various courts the term 'state created danger' can refer to a wide range of disparate fact patterns. For example, courts have used the 'state created danger' label to describe the state's duty to protect a person from private violence when the state itself has placed that person at risk. . . . This sort of state-created-danger case seems to rely on the existence of a special relationship between the state and the victim. Some courts have, indeed, incorporated the 'special relationship' criterion as a prerequisite to liability. . . We, by contrast, treat special relationships and state created dangers as separate and distinct theories of liability. . . . Our distinction between these categories of cases suggests that 'special relationship' liability arises from the relationship between the state and a particular victim, whereas 'state created danger' liability arises from the relationship between the state and the private assailant. To paraphrase Bowers, . . . the police officers in Dwares did not bring the victim to the snakes; they let loose the snakes upon the victim. In applying our 'state created danger' principle, we have sought to tread a fine line between conduct that is 'passive' as in DeShaney and that which is 'affirmative' as in Dwares. . . . It is clear from the cases, we think, that to the extent that the plaintiffs allege merely that the individual defendants failed to intercede on the day of the accident, their complaints do not involve sufficient affirmative acts to violate substantive due process rights. Similarly, to the extent that the plaintiffs allege that Grey's supervisors 'stood by and did nothing' to punish Grey's previous misconduct, we think those allegations are also inadequate to state a substantive due process claim. . . A failure to interfere when misconduct takes place, and no more, is not sufficient to amount to a state created danger. . . . As the plaintiffs' counsel recognized at oral argument before us, the key question is whether the individual defendants told, or otherwise communicated to, Officer Grey that he could drink excessively and drive while intoxicated without fear of punishment. The plaintiffs argue that a reasonable factfinder could infer that the defendants' behavior constituted an implicit prior assurance to Grey that he could drink and drive with impunity. We agree that to the extent that fellow police officers and some supervisors participated in or condoned Grey's behavior, and even − in Healy's case − invited Grey to drive after drinking heavily, it could be inferred by a reasonable juror that those defendants, by their actions, implicitly but affirmatively condoned Grey's behavior and indicated to Grey that he would not be disciplined for his conduct. . . . We conclude that when, as the plaintiffs allege, state officials communicate to a private person that he or she will not be arrested, punished, or otherwise interfered with while engaging in misconduct that is likely to endanger the life, liberty or property of others, those officials can be held liable under section 1983 for injury caused by the misconduct under Dwares. This is so even though none of the defendants are alleged to have communicated the approval explicitly. . . We emphasize that the type of claim we understand the plaintiffs to assert is based on more than a failure to prevent misbehavior and to reprimand or punish the miscreants. The plaintiffs assert that prior assurances of impunity were actually, albeit implicitly, communicated."); Caldwell v. City of Louisville, No. 03-5342, 2004 WL 2829026, at *8, *9 (6th Cir. Dec. 9, 2004) (not published) ("Under the circumstances which have been placed upon the record, it is our judgment that Christy Caldwell can succeed in establishing that Lett was deliberately indifferent to the risks and dangers that her daughter faced during the mid-months of 2002. The record establishes that the County Attorney called Lett immediately after the State court reissued a warrant for Mills' arrest on September 13th. Her refusal to act upon the warrant and the City's existing internal law enforcement practices and policies resulted in a six day delay in its execution. In refusing to act upon the arrest warrant, Lett demonstrated neither mere negligence nor an actual intent to bring about a specific harm upon Rebecca. Thus, her culpability would appear to fall within the 'middle range,' and require this Court to determine if she was deliberately indifferent under the circumstances. Clearly, Lett had several days in which to fully consider and reflect upon her decision not to serve the warrant on Mills. The evidence also indicates that she was aware of facts from which a reasonable inference could be drawn that Rebecca faced a substantial risk of serious harm. The evidence also suggests that Lett's failure or refusal to process the warrant in a timely manner stemmed from an animus toward Rebecca who had (1) refused to provide the LPD authorities with any semblance of cooperation in dealing with a potentially dangerous situation, and (2) filed allegations of police misconduct against her. In the face of a real danger about which Lett knew or should have known, her adamant refusal to serve the warrant or have it served upon Mills by another law enforcement official clearly equates to the kind of deliberate indifference which is forbidden by the Constitution. Having found the existence of a 'State-created danger' and of deliberate indifference by a State actor, we conclude that Christy Caldwell has asserted a viable claim for a violation of her daughter's constitutional right to substantive due process."); Kneipp v. Tedder, 95 F.3d 1199, 1208 (3d Cir. 1996) ("In the 1995 case of Mark v. Borough of Hatboro, . . .we suggested a test for applying the state-created danger theory. We found that cases predicating constitutional liability on a state-created danger theory have four common elements: 1) the harm ultimately caused was foreseeable and fairly direct; (2) the state actor acted in willful disregard for the safety of the plaintiff; (3) there existed some relationship between the state and the plaintiff; (4) the state actors used their authority to create an opportunity that otherwise would not have existed for the third party's crime to occur. 51 F.3d at 1152."); Bank of Illinois v. Over, 65 F.3d 76, 78 (7th Cir. 1995) ("If the defendants' employees knowingly placed Heather in a position of danger, they would not be shielded from liability by the decision in DeShaney. All that DeShaney and the cases following it . . . hold is that the Constitution does not impose a legally enforceable duty on state officers to protect people from private violence. If the officers are complicit in the violence, they are liable."); Losinski v. County of Trempealeau, 946 F.2d 544 (7th Cir. 1991) ("The essence of the Court's exception in DeShaney is state creation of dangers faced or involuntary subjection to known risks."); Ayala v. Mohave County, Ariz., No. CV-07-8105-PHX-NVW, 2008 WL 4849963, at *4, *5, *7 (D. Ariz. Nov. 7, 2008) ("To conclude that Shamblin's danger was of his own making would require one to ignore several of the most salient facts in this case. Shamblin did not choose to walk along the highway in complete darkness; he repeatedly pleaded with the Officers for a ride. Nor was his walking on the pavement a volitional act; it was dark, he was heavily drunk, and it was a long way to town. A reasonable inference is that conditions in the dirt on the side of the road were so unfavorable or difficult to discern in the dark that he was naturally impelled to the surer footing of the roadway. Construing the facts and drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Ayala, a reasonable juror could conclude that the Officers' actions, not Shamblin's independent choices, exposed him to a danger that he otherwise would not have faced. . . . The evidence can support a jury verdict that the Officers were deliberately indifferent to the known or obvious consequences of their actions − a collision that killed Shamblin. . . . No reasonable officer would believe that the law permits the abandonment of a person known to have been drinking along the shoulder of an extremely dark highway, miles from the next safe haven. The Officers are not immune from this suit."); Was v. Young, 796 F. Supp. 1041, 1048 (E.D. Mich. 1992) ("Although DeShaney made clear that there is no general special relationship doctrine, . . . some lower federal courts have held the state accountable for a victim's injuries even though the victim was not in state custody, where the state has created a danger to the victim."); Matican v. City of New York, 424 F.Supp.2d 497, 505, 506 (E.D.N.Y. 2006) ("In Pena, the Second Circuit noted in dicta that '[o]ur distinction between [the two exceptions to DeShaney] suggests that "special relationship" liability arises from the relationship between the state and a particular victim, whereas Astate created danger' liability arises from the relationship between the state and the private assailant,' 432 F.3d at 109; here, there is no evidence of a relationship between the officers and Delvalle. The Court, however, takes this aspect of Pena simply as a passing recognition that many of the circuit's prior state-created danger cases involved a connection between the governmental actor and the private assailant. The Court does not read Pena as establishing such a relationship as a sine qua non of state-created danger liability; governmental actors may put an individual in harm's way even in the absence of a connection to a private assailant, and the present case is an example. . . Thus, that there is no evidence of a relationship between the defendants and Delvalle is of no consequence. Another aspect of Pena provides more significant guidance. Pena reiterates that the state-created danger exception applies only when the governmental actor's conduct can be fairly characterized as 'affirmative,' as opposed to 'passive. . . . If Matican claimed only that the officers had failed to follow up on, and apprise him of, Delvalle's violent nature and release from jail, his claim would fall squarely on the 'passive' side of the line. . . Matican's claims are not so limited, however; he also claims that the officers executed the sting operation in such a way that Delvalle learned that Matican had set him up. Such conduct falls on the 'affirmative' side of the line because, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Matican, it 'assisted in creating or increasing the danger to the victim.'. . . Although the officers' handling of the sting operation can be considered a state-created danger, it does not rise to the level of a substantive due-process violation because, even taking the facts in the light most favorable to Matican, their conduct does not 'shock the conscience.' There is no indication that the officers intentionally exposed Matican to Delvalle's assault. Moreover, although the officers had time to plan the operation, it cannot be concluded that they were deliberately indifferent to Matican's safety in making those plans.").

Compare Welch v. City of Biddeford, 12 F.4th 70, 75-77 (1st Cir. 2021) ("The plaintiffs present several arguments that various acts taken by Officers Wolterbeek and Dexter were affirmative acts that enhanced the danger to them. . . We affirm the district court's decision that Officer Wolterbeek took no affirmative act that enhanced the danger to the plaintiffs. We see no evidence in the record that any of Officer Wolterbeek's actions increased any danger to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs also do not explain how any of Officer Wolterbeek's actions, on their own, could give rise to a state-created danger claim. Officers are not liable under § 1983 for the actions of other officers. . . As to Officer Dexter, we are disinclined given the changes in the law to ourselves decide the merits of the substantive due process claim. As previously stated, the parties did not have the benefit of Irish II in conducting their discovery and presenting evidence in this case. Nor did the district court have the benefit of that opinion, which clarified this circuit's law and now must be applied. Irish II is pertinent in at least three important senses and all three lead us to conclude that a remand is appropriate here. . . . First, Irish II established that the first prong of the state-created danger claim is whether a state actor's affirmative act 'created or enhanced' a danger to the plaintiffs. . . Without the benefit of our decision, the district court held, contrary to Irish II, that under the state-created danger doctrine an affirmative act must 'greatly' enhance the danger to the plaintiffs, rather than simply 'enhance' the danger. . . Second, Irish II recognized that, '[w]here officials have the opportunity to make unhurried judgments, deliberate indifference may shock the conscience, particularly where the state official performs multiple acts of indifference to a rising risk of acute and severe danger.'. . This holding may bear on both the parties' argument and the district court's analysis. Finally, Irish II established the relevance of state and national policing policies to the state-created danger analysis. It explained that '[a] defendant's adherence to proper police procedure bears on all prongs of the qualified immunity analysis,' including whether an officer's conduct shocked the conscience and whether a reasonable officer 'would have believed that his conduct violated the Constitution.'. . The parties have presented little evidence as to police standards and training in handling disputes between neighbors or landlords and tenants. . . Such evidence may well be important to the disposition of the case. For example, officers are sometimes required to do more than Officer Dexter did here when credible death threats are made in a domestic violence context. . . There may be an analogous duty in cases such as this one. We make no determination as to whether the plaintiffs may prevail on any of the prongs of the Irish II state-created danger test. Indeed, it would be premature to reach the 'shocks the conscience' prong, as we here address only the district court's error in evaluating the danger-enhancing prong. Nor do we suggest that an officer leaving the scene on different facts would amount to or contribute to an affirmative act that created or enhanced the danger to others. Our narrow decision to remand, however, is consonant with the rulings of other federal courts in state-created danger cases. . . . In these circumstances, it is fairer to all concerned to remand to the district court in light of this opinion. This decision makes no new law and does not expand the state-created danger doctrine; it is simply a remand for consideration of the factors identified above. We make no factual findings, and our holding is based on legal error under Irish II. The district court may in its discretion permit additional discovery in light of the clarification provided by Irish II. The district court should address on remand whether Officer Dexter is entitled to qualified immunity and may choose to address the second step of the qualified immunity inquiry before addressing whether Officer Dexter violated the plaintiffs' substantive due process rights under the state-created danger doctrine.") with Welch v. City of Biddeford, 12 F.4th 70, 78-81 (1st Cir. 2021) (Kayatta, J., dissenting) ("A layperson reading the facts of this case as portrayed in the majority opinion could easily conclude that as a matter of good police practice, Officer Dexter should have arrested Pak for criminal threatening (assuming that he could discount Johnson's statement that he felt harassed, but not really threatened). . . And if the people of Maine wish to render law enforcement officers personally liable for failing to make arrests in situations like this one, they may so provide as a matter of state law. . . As the Supreme Court has made clear, however, an officer's failure to arrest does not violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. . . . By vacating the judgment, the majority suggests that perhaps a jury could hold Officer Dexter liable -- not for failing to arrest, but for affirmatively doing something that increased the likelihood that Pak would kill. But this 'state-created danger' exception only works if what the officer did, other than failing to arrest Pak, is 'so egregious, so outrageous, that it may fairly be said to shock the contemporary conscience.'. . . By vacating the judgment, the majority suggests that perhaps a jury could hold Officer Dexter liable -- not for failing to arrest, but for affirmatively doing something that increased the likelihood that Pak would kill. But this 'state-created danger' exception only works if what the officer did, other than failing to arrest Pak, is 'so egregious, so outrageous, that it may fairly be said to shock the contemporary conscience.'. . . Aside from detailing certain facts, such as Officer Dexter's failure to arrest, that could potentially support a negligence suit but not a federal claim, the majority never really says what specific facts might be found on remand and how those facts could change the result of the district court's opinion. To the contrary, my colleagues seem to hold their own opinion with pinched noses and at arm's length. So why remand a case that we already know can go nowhere under current legal standards, creating false hope for the plaintiffs? The majority cites two justifications. First, the majority alleges that Irish v. Fowler . . . supposedly 'clarified this circuit's law.' But the whole point of Irish II was that the law regarding the state-created danger doctrine was already so 'clearly established' that qualified immunity was inapplicable. . . Second, the majority notes that in describing the exception for state-created dangers, the district court asked whether Officer Dexter's actions 'greatly increas[ed] the danger' rather than whether they 'enhanc[ed] the danger.' But this difference in terminology could only matter if a jury could reasonably find that Officer Dexter engaged in affirmative conduct that both enhanced the danger and was shocking to the conscience. And as I have explained, even the majority avoids saying that Dexter's conduct could be found to have shocked the conscience. If, on remand, the district court reads the majority opinion carefully, it will note that the opinion does not actually preclude the district court from rewording its summary of the applicable enhancement standard and re-entering its order of dismissal. Should the district court so proceed, perhaps no great harm will be done, even if nothing is gained beyond a display of understandable sympathy for the victims. But there is a chance that courts -- including the district court -- will read the majority opinion otherwise. They might sensibly think that no appellate court would remand this case unless, on the present record, it thought that a judgment for plaintiffs was somehow possible. And litigants or potential litigants in other cases in which officers fail to arrest someone will cite this case as watering down the 'shock the conscience' test to a form of relabeled negligence. Such an outcome is contrary to existing law. As the Supreme Court said in DeShaney: 'The most that can be said of the state functionaries in this case is that they stood by and did nothing when suspicious circumstances dictated a more active role for them. In defense of them it must also be said that had they moved too soon to [act], they likely would have been met with charges of improper [behavior], charges based on the same Due Process Clause that forms the basis for the present charge of failure to provide adequate protection.'. . The same point applies here. I must therefore respectfully dissent. Officer Dexter took no affirmative act that could conceivably be said to shock the conscience as that standard is defined in Lewis. And whether he should be held personally liable for not doing more is not a concern of the Due Process Clause.")

See also Patrick v. Great Valley School Dist., 296 F. App'x 258, ___ (3rd Cir. 2008) ("Coach Brown's decision to match Rosenberg with a much heavier teammate for live wrestling did not occur in a time-constrained or 'hyperpressurized' environment, and thus culpability should be assessed under the deliberate indifference standard. According to wrestling expert Ken Chertow's testimony, the pairing of Rosenberg, a young and inexperienced wrestler, with a much heavier partner for live wrestling amounted to an unreasonably dangerous practice. Plaintiffs have also introduced evidence suggesting that, despite the risks, Coach Brown matched Rosenberg with his heavier teammate because he wanted to provide the heavier wrestler with a practice partner and there were no wrestlers of comparable weight present at the practice at issue. Finally, Plaintiffs presented evidence that Coach Brown engaged in similar conduct on more than one occasion, providing, at the very least, circumstantial evidence of deliberate indifference. . . .Without deciding the issue, we hold that a rational jury could find that Coach Brown's conduct exhibited a level of culpability that shocks the conscience. Because the District Court rested its holding solely on Plaintiffs' failure to satisfy the culpability element of their state-created danger claim, we need not reach the question of whether Plaintiffs have raised a genuine issue of material fact with respect to the remaining three elements."); Rivas v. City of Passaic, 365 F.3d 181, 202, 203 (3d Cir. 2004) (Ambro, J., concurring in part) ("Judge Garth has noted the most important of the recent modifications to the Kneipp test, which involved its second prong: in light of the Supreme Court's decision in County of Sacramento v. Lewis . . . a state actor will be liable only for conduct that 'shocks the conscience'; it is no longer enough that she or he has acted in 'willful disregard' of the plaintiff's safety. . . This modification, however, is not the only one. In Morse v. Lower Merion

School District, 132 F.3d 902 (3d Cir.1997), we reconsidered the third prong of the Kneipp test and suggested that there may be a 'relationship' between the state and the plaintiff merely because the plaintiff was a foreseeable victim, either individually or as a member of a discrete class. . . Moreover, we have written 'third party' out of the fourth prong of the test. We recently noted, 'The fourth element's reference to a 'third party's crime' arises from the doctrine's origin as an exception to the general rule that the state does not have a general affirmative obligation to protect its citizens from the violent acts of private individuals. The courts, however, have not limited the doctrine to cases where third parties caused the harm....' Estate of Smith v. Marasco, 318 F.3d 497, 506 (3d Cir.2003) . . . . In light of these substantial modifications to the Kneipp test, Kneipp as shorthand is a misnomer. To be sure, Judge Garth has mentioned the relevant refinements and considered this case by reference to the adapted rubric. I nonetheless believe that continuing to cite the Kneipp test as 'good law,' as Judge Garth does, minimizes the extent to which the law of state-created danger in our Circuit has changed. And while the changes to the third and fourth prongs have expanded the state-created danger doctrine, the substitution of 'shocks the conscience' for 'willful disregard' is a significant limitation. In this context, our continued adherence to Kneipp, if only in name, colors plaintiffs' perception of their burden and tempts them to allege constitutional violations where none exist."); L.W. v. Grubbs* (L.W. I), 974 F.2d 119, 120-21 (9th Cir. 1992) (plaintiff, a registered nurse, stated a constitutional claim against defendant correctional officers, where defendants knew inmate was violent sex offender, likely to assault plaintiff if alone with her, yet defendants intentionally assigned inmate to work alone with plaintiff in clinic), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 2442 (1993).

See also Estate of Morcho v. Borough, No. CV 22-3245, 2024 WL 21940, at *4 (E.D. Pa. Jan. 2, 2024) ("Here, it is undisputed that Plaintiffs have alleged facts to substantiate that Shawn was in the physical custody of the state at the time of his death. Notwithstanding, Defendants have pointed to no authority, and this Court is unaware of any such authority, that precludes a plaintiff from pursuing a § 1983 claim under the state-created danger theory for harm suffered while in the physical custody of the state.[3] [fn. 3: The Individual Defendants argue that the state-created danger theory is not applicable in a case such as this where the harm was ultimately the result of a suicide. Courts in this circuit, however, have considered § 1983 claims asserted under the state-created danger theory in cases where the harm was the result of a suicide.] Accordingly, this Court will address Plaintiffs' § 1983 claims against the Individual Defendants under both the state-created danger theory and the deliberate indifference theory."); Martinez v. City of Clovis, 943 F.3d 1260, 1270, 1272-77 (9th Cir. 2019) ("'Even in difficult cases, our court tends "to address both prongs of qualified immunity where the 'two-step procedure promotes the development of constitutional precedent' in an area where this court's guidance is ... needed."'. . Because guidance is necessary to promote the development of constitutional precedent in this area, we elect to begin with the first part of the qualified immunity inquiry. . . . [T]he record . . . reveals that Hershberger told Pennington about Martinez's testimony relating to his prior abuse, and also stated that Martinez was not 'the right girl' for him. A reasonable jury could find that Hershberger's disclosure provoked Pennington, and that her disparaging comments emboldened Pennington to believe that he could further abuse Martinez, including by retaliating against her for her testimony, with impunity. The causal link between Hershberger's affirmative conduct and the abuse Martinez suffered that night is supported by Martinez's testimony that Pennington asked Martinez what she had told the officer while he was hitting her. That Martinez was already in danger from Pennington does not obviate a state-created danger when the state actor enhanced the risks. . . Because a reasonable jury could infer that Martinez was placed in greater danger after Hershberger disclosed Martinez's complaint and made comments to Pennington that conveyed contempt for Martinez, the first requirement of the state-created danger doctrine is satisfied. . . . .Viewing the record in the light most favorable to Martinez, a jury could reasonably find that Sanders's positive remarks about the Penningtons placed Martinez in greater danger. The positive remarks were communicated against the backdrop that Sanders knew that Pennington was an officer and that there was probable cause to arrest. . . which the jury could infer Pennington, as a police officer, understood. A reasonable jury could find that Pennington felt emboldened to continue his abuse with impunity. In fact, the following day, Pennington abused Martinez yet again. Under these circumstances, the first requirement of the state-created danger doctrine is satisfied. . . . Given the foreseeability of future domestic abuse here, a reasonable jury could find that disclosing a report of abuse while engaging in disparaging small talk with Pennington, and/or positively remarking on his family while ordering other officers not to make an arrest despite the presence of probable cause, constitutes deliberate indifference to a known or obvious danger. . .That Pennington was already under investigation by the Clovis PD for allegations of abuse against an ex-girlfriend also suggests that future abuse was a known or obvious danger. By ignoring the risk created by Pennington's violent tendencies, the officers acted with deliberate indifference toward the risk of future abuse. We hold that a reasonable jury could find that Hershberger and Sanders violated Martinez's due process right to liberty by affirmatively increasing the known and obvious danger Martinez faced. . . .We next turn to the question whether, at the time of the challenged conduct, the law was sufficiently well defined that every reasonable officer in the officers' shoes would have known that their conduct violated Martinez's right to due process. We conclude it was not. Qualified immunity therefore applies. . . . .To deny immunity, we must conclude that every reasonable official would have understood, beyond debate, that the conduct was a violation of a constitutional right. . . We begin by looking to binding precedent from the Supreme Court or our court. . . Without binding precedent, 'we look to whatever decisional law is available ... including decisions of state courts, other circuits, and district courts.'. . The precedent must be ' "controlling'—from the Ninth Circuit or the Supreme Court—or otherwise be embraced by a "consensus" of courts outside the relevant jurisdiction.'. . . Without binding precedent from our court or the Supreme Court, we may look to decisions from the other circuits. . . But we cannot rely on Okin, because it has not been 'embraced by a "consensus" of courts.'. . Notably, the Seventh Circuit has stated that Okin may be 'in tension with' DeShaney and the Supreme Court's decision in Town of Castle Rock v. Gonzales[.] . . In light of this muddled legal terrain, we cannot hold that 'every reasonable official would have understood ... beyond debate,' that the officers' conduct here violated Martinez's right to due process. . .Hershberger and Sanders are entitled to qualified immunity because the due process right conferred in the context before us was not clearly established. Although the application of the state-created danger doctrine to this context was not apparent to every reasonable officer at the time the conduct occurred, we now establish the contours of the due process protections afforded victims of domestic violence in situations like this one. . . Significantly, 'it is the facts' of this case 'that clearly establish what the law is' going forward. . .We hold today that the state-created danger doctrine applies when an officer reveals a domestic violence complaint made in confidence to an abuser while simultaneously making disparaging comments about the victim in a manner that reasonably emboldens the abuser to continue abusing the victim with impunity. Similarly, we hold that the state-created danger doctrine applies when an officer praises an abuser in the abuser's presence after the abuser has been protected from arrest, in a manner that communicates to the abuser that the abuser may continue abusing the victim with impunity. . . Going forward, the law in this circuit will be clearly established that such conduct is unconstitutional.")

See also Estate of Sanchez v. City of Saginaw, No. 1:20-CV-11684, 2023 WL 4092468, at *9–11 (E.D. Mich. June 20, 2023) ("Seeking qualified immunity, Defendants rely on Koulta v. Merciez, 477 F.3d 442 –44 (6th Cir. 2007). But Koulta is confined to a negligent police officer who (1) instructed a person who drove drunk and was sitting in a car to leave the area and (2) did not investigate a possible DUI that no evidence or person prompted him to investigate. . .Such negligence is distinct from the reasonably inferable deliberate indifference in this case, which would undoubtedly be an affirmative act for purposes of proving a state-created danger. . . Here, the record reasonably suggests Defendants 'affirmatively encouraged, emboldened, or enabled' Rudy to drive drunk. . . After Rudy informed Defendants he had consumed alcohol, they allegedly threatened to impound his car if he did not drive the group home. . . Then Rudy not only requested Defendants to follow him home but also voluntarily consented to a search of the Malibu, which contained an open bottle of vodka. . . But Defendants declined Rudy's offer, refusing even to glance inside the Malibu, . . . despite their 'responsibility,' as they referred to it, 'to get as much information as possible[.]'. . . Another key difference is that Defendants here ordered the deceased Plaintiffs to enter a car with a drunk driver. Indeed, Babinski said he 'expected the[group] to drive home,'. . . even though Rudy suggested he could not drive, asked for assistance, expressed fear of arrest, and stopped the car due to his reckless driving before the officers ordered him back into it[.] . . Arguably then, as Rudy testified, 'the circumstances changed with the contact with the officers.'. .Based on those affirmative acts, Defendants were deliberately indifferent by consciously disregarding a known risk. . . Since Rudy was outside the Malibu when the group was arguably forced into this intoxicated expedition, Defendants at least recreated the danger. . . . If this case does not present a question of fact concerning whether an officer may be liable under the Due Process Clause for the 'decision to permit someone he knows to have been drinking to continue driving without administering a breathalyzer,'. . . then, apart from police begging people to drive drunk, no case ever will. True, Defendants did not provide a fully equipped, clearly marked patrol car to a felon or ignore reports of him pulling people over. . . Nor did they buy Rudy drinks or hand him the keys to the car. . . But they did much more than nothing when nothing was asked. . . They located a drunk driver and his family outside a parked car with the engine off and ordered him to drive them all home after he expressed discomfort with the decision—even threatening to impound the car if he did not do so. In this way, the officers arguably took a deliberate action under color of state law, leaving Plaintiffs vulnerable to death. . . In conclusion, this case presents a question of fact with respect to whether police officers are liable under the Due Process Clause for ignoring a known drunk driver's reluctance to drive and ordering him and his passengers to enter, to start, and to drive the vehicle home. Because Rudy Sanchez was outside the car, informed the officers he was intoxicated, expressed concerns about driving, asked the officers to follow him home, volunteered for a search, and repeatedly said he believed he was going to jail—where the officers heard all that, refused to investigate, and threatened to impound his car if he did not get in the car and drive drunk—this case falls on the '[ ]action side of the line.'. .For those reasons, it is for the jury to decide whether Defendants were deliberately indifferent to the danger Rudy posed to his passengers and are thus responsible for the wrongful deaths of Lindsey Drake and baby Amiliana. But that is not the end of the analysis. [jury would also have to decide "whether Defendants were the sole proximate cause of the deaths[.]"]); Huber v. Beth, 654 F.Supp.3d 777, ___ (E.D. Wis. 2023) ("The complaint alleges that the law-enforcement defendants increased the danger to protestors such as Huber while cutting off avenues of self-help. According to the complaint, before Rittenhouse killed Huber, Huber and the other protestors were demonstrating in the city park located at 56th and Sheridan, where they were safe from the armed individuals, who had congregated near 60th and Sheridan—four blocks south of the park. The commanders of the law-enforcement presence at the scene of the demonstration then decided to disperse the protest by 'funneling' the demonstrators south on Sheridan Road, in the direction of the armed individuals. . . Such funneling forced the protestors into a 'confined area' with the armed individuals, including defendant Rittenhouse. . . The allegation of forcing protestors into a confined area with the armed individuals creates a reasonable inference that protestors could not disperse without passing through the area patrolled by the armed individuals and that, once they were in that area, their ability to flee was limited. Due to law enforcement's having observed the armed individuals' location earlier in the evening, it is reasonable to infer that the commanders would have known that the armed individuals had gathered near 60th and Sheridan. Further, because Sheriff Beth and Chief Miskinis are alleged to have known that the armed individuals had expressed intentions to harm protestors, it is reasonable to infer that the commanders knew that they were creating a dangerous situation by forcing the protestors and armed individuals to confront each other in a confined area. The risk that members of these antagonistic groups would engage in violence was high, and once violence erupted it would be difficult for protestors to escape or otherwise protect themselves. This was the situation in the moments before Rittenhouse used his rifle. Once the protestors were in the confined area, Rittenhouse encountered Rosenbaum and shot him dead. Witnesses yelled that Rittenhouse had just shot someone, which caused Huber and others to pursue Rittenhouse and attempt to disarm him so that he could not hurt others in the confined area. . . Rittenhouse then killed Huber and wounded Grosskreutz. These acts of violence were a foreseeable result of the defendants' decision to create an explosive situation by forcing protestors into a confined area with hostile armed individuals. . . . The police conduct alleged in the present case . . . involved placing citizens into a dangerous situation and disabling their ability to protect themselves from private violence. Again, the protestors were safe before the police forced them south on Sheridan, into a confined area with armed individuals who were antagonistic and had expressed the intent to use their rifles on protestors. The protestors had no apparent means of protecting themselves from the armed individuals, and, as alleged in the complaint, their ability to flee was limited. Moreover, the complaint alleges that the law-enforcement officers on the street did not protect protestors from the dangerous situation they created. . . Accordingly, I conclude that the complaint states a claim for a due-process violation based on state-created danger."); Seidle v. Neptune Township, No. CV174428MASLHG, 2021 WL 1720867, at *10-11 (D.N.J. May 1, 2021) ("[T]he Court notes that the Prosecutor Defendants and the Neptune Township Police Department officials are differently situated. In its previous opinion, the Court held that 'the Neptune Defendants allowing Seidle to retain his weapon did not put Tamara in a worse situation than had they not acted at all.' . . In the Motion now before the Court, however, the question is whether Plaintiffs have plausibly alleged that the Prosecutor Defendants' decision to rearm Seidle with his service weapon placed Tamara in a more vulnerable position than if they had not acted to rearm him. The latter allegation against the Prosecutor Defendants, who were the ultimate decision makers as to whether Seidle would be rearmed, constitutes an affirmative act. The former allegation against Neptune Township Police Department officials is a failure to act that does not allege a state created danger claim. . . Construing the facts alleged in the TAC as true and in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have adequately alleged that the Prosecutor Defendants affirmatively used [their] authority in a way that created a danger to the citizen or that rendered the citizen more vulnerable to danger than had the state not acted at all. . . . In light of Seidle's alleged history of domestic violence, excessive force complaints, and psychological issues, Plaintiffs' allegation that the Prosecutor Defendants placed Tamara in a worse position than if they had not acted to rearm Seidle is plausible. Accordingly, Plaintiffs are entitled to discovery on their state-created danger claim."); Alcis v. Sch. Dist. of Philadelphia, No. CV 16-1684, 2016 WL 7209938, at *5–6 (E.D. Pa. Dec. 13, 2016) ("The Court concludes that Ms. Furley's action in taking Alain and Benjamin to the bathroom was an affirmative use of her authority that created a danger to Alain. While the setting in this case is a middle school, not a kindergarten classroom such as in L.R., plaintiffs allege that, like the students in L.R., Alain and Benjamin were restricted in their movement outside of the classroom—they went to the bathroom under the supervision of a teacher. . . Like the teacher in L.R., Ms. Furley had the authority to supervise students on trips to the bathroom, and she used this authority to escort Alain and Benjamin to the bathroom at the same time while she remained outside, rather than requiring that only one student use the bathroom at a time. Ms. Furley's actions are distinguishable from those of the school officials in Morrow v. Balaski, 719 F.3d 160 (3d Cir. 2013), and Brown v. School District of Philadelphia, 456 Fed. Appx. 88 (3d Cir. 2011), two cases cited by defendants in support of their Motion. . . In Morrow, two students sued the school district under § 1983 for failing to protect them from harassment and physical assault by another student. . . The Third Circuit found that the school district was not liable for permitting the student accused of harassment to return to school after a suspension—despite contrary school policy—because allowing the return was 'passive inaction' rather than an affirmative act. . .In Brown, the Third Circuit similarly found no affirmative act by the school district where a special-education student was not provided with one-on-one supervision as promised and the student was sexually assaulted by other students at school. . . In each case, school officials did not intervene to change the environment encountered by the plaintiff students. . . Plaintiffs do not allege that Ms. Furley violated Alain's constitutional rights by not intervening during the assault; rather, plaintiffs allege that by escorting the two boys to the bathroom together, and allowing them to be in the bathroom together and unsupervised, Ms. Furley created the situation in which Alain was exposed to harm. Because plaintiffs have alleged facts to support each element of a state-created danger claim, the Court concludes that plaintiffs have sufficiently pled that a constitutional violation occurred, the first requirement for a Monell claim. The Court need not determine whether qualified immunity would apply to Ms. Furley because she is not a party to this case."); Kingsmill v. Szewczak, 117 F. Supp. 3d 657 (E.D. Pa. 2015) ("Although the parties did not identify, and we were unable to locate, a case with a cognate claim and a constellation of factual averments, this is the type of case where the alleged conduct is outrageous enough, and the broad contours of the constitutional right sufficiently well-known, that Officer Szewczak was on notice that his conduct violated Kingsmill's constitutional rights. Officer Szewczak lured Kingsmill away from a physical altercation, engaged him in conversation, and then watched as Brown hit Kingsmill in the face with a steel pipe. Officer Szewczak reacted by telling Brown to flee the scene, declining to make a police report, and refusing to render assistance to the injured Kingsmill. . .Qualified immunity protects 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . . Although this particular scenario does not appear to have been considered by our Court of Appeals, the conduct alleged is not the type qualified immunity protects. Any reasonable officer at the time of this incident—February 9, 2014—would have known that he had a duty not to place an individual at greater risk of injury from a physical assault by hailing him away from the altercation and then declining to intervene. A reasonable officer would have known that he had a duty not to command such an individual to comply with a directive, so that compliance would increase the risk of harm to him. This is not a case where the 'most that can be said of the state functionaries in this case is that they stood by and did nothing when ... circumstances dictated a more active role for them.'. . . Officer Szewczak exercised his authority to command Kingsmill to disengage from a physical altercation, and, as a result of Kingsmill's compliance, Brown was able to attack him from behind. Officer Szewczak's failure to warn Kingsmill that Brown was approaching from behind might appear more akin to the inaction that prior courts have found insufficient to ground liability under a state-created danger theory. But Officer Szewczak did not just fail to warn: his initial hail and interference with the assault in this circumstance placed Kingsmill at risk of additional serious injury. After placing Kingsmill in greater danger than he had been before, the officer did not bother to warn him of Brown's oncoming assault. Nor is this a case where the exercise of a state actor's discretion did not increase the danger. . . To be sure, Officer Szewczak was not obligated to protect either Kingsmill or Brown, and his knowledge of their altercation was not sufficient to create an affirmative duty to act. But once Officer Szewczak chose to call Kingsmill to his patrol car, and chose to continue their conversation despite Brown's approach, pipe in hand, he put Kingsmill in greater danger of the assault from Brown. . . . Officer Szewczak may not have placed Kingsmill in the physical confrontation with Brown, but observing Kingsmill in such a snake pit, he made it worse by hailing him and commanding him to disengage, leaving him vulnerable to Brown's attack from behind. Such conduct is sufficiently outrageous that a reasonable officer would have known that doing so could violate Kingsmill's constitutional rights. We find that Kingsmill's right to be free from state-created danger in this particular factual circumstance was clearly established when this incident took place in February of 2014, when this incident took place. Officer Szewczak is therefore not entitled to qualified immunity."); Moeck v. Pleasant Valley Sch. Dist., 983 F. Supp. 2d 516, 528 (M.D. Pa. 2013) ("With regard to the four factors necessary to establish a state-created danger, the defendants only challenge one. They assert that the Defendant Getz's actions did not shock the conscience. We disagree. A factfinder could find that Getz acted in such a manner as to shock the conscience. He set up this wrestling practice with a large student, known to lose his temper, with someone who was seventy pounds lighter. He cajoled the plaintiff to continue wrestling the student who outweighed him by seventy pounds even after plaintiff was initially injured. Such conduct may shock the conscience. Accordingly, we find that the plaintiff has made sufficient allegations to support the state-created danger claim against Defendant Getz.").

But see Franz v. Oxford Community School District, No. 23-1483, 2025 WL 865070, at *3 (6th Cir. Mar. 20, 2025) ("At the outset, we agree with the district court that two of the putative acts at issue here cannot support liability. First, the plaintiffs argue that the defendants created a danger when, after the meeting in the office, they returned E.C.'s backpack to him and sent him back to class. But those actions put the plaintiffs 'in no worse position' than the one in which they would have been had the defendants 'not acted at all.'. . E.C. had a backpack containing a gun before the meeting, and afterward he had the same backpack containing the same gun. (To avoid any misimpression: nothing in the record here supports an inference that the defendants knew the gun was in the backpack.) Thus, for purposes of this theory, the act of returning the backpack to E.C. did 'not satisfy the state-action requirement' because merely 'returning someone to the same dangers that existed' before is not enough. . . . The primary question here, instead, is whether Hopkins' warning to E.C.'s parents—that he would call Child Protective Services if they did not get help for their son within 48 hours—satisfied the elements of this theory. The district court thought that warning (made in E.C.'s presence) was an affirmative act because it 'increased the risk that a mentally unstable teenager' would harm other students. . . One could debate that point; but less debatable, in our view, is whether that warning was 'so outrageous' as to violate due process. When—as was likely the case here—a state official can reflect before he acts, he violates due process when he perceives a 'substantial risk of serious harm' and then responds to it in 'a manner demonstrating reckless or callous indifference' toward the plaintiff's rights. . . Here, the defendants' actions (as alleged in the complaint) show they perceived a serious risk: they summoned E.C.'s parents for an urgent meeting, insisted that he receive counseling within 48 hours, and said they would call Child Protective Services if he did not. (We again set to one side whether the risk they perceived was the risk that materialized.) But those same actions show that Hopkins and Ejak displayed the opposite of callous indifference toward the risk they perceived. That is especially true of the very act on which the plaintiffs would ground liability: namely, Hopkins' demand that E.C.'s parents get him counseling within 48 hours. Hopkins made that demand to mitigate risk, not to increase it; and his demand was indisputably made for 'a legitimate governmental purpose,' which all but excludes a finding that it was 'conscience shocking.'. . True, as the plaintiffs emphasize, this case comes to us on the pleadings rather than on summary judgment. But even taking their alleged facts as true, we see nothing in this record that supports an inference that Hopkins or Ejak took any action that shocks the conscience. In substance the plaintiffs' claims sound in tort, not in federal constitutional law. Thus, in these cases, their claims must be dismissed."); Sacramento Homeless Union v. City of Sacramento, 115 F.4th 1149, 1154-55 (9th Cir. 2024) (Nelson, J., with whom Bumatay, J., and Vandyke, J., join, respecting the denial of rehearing on banc) ("As several judges on our court have noted, the 'state-created danger exception' requires a 'deprivation of liberty.'. . In other words, a constitutional violation occurs only when the state uses its monopoly on physical force to coerce an individual's actions. . . The lawful clearing of encampments does not rise to that level of constitutional deprivation. And by straying from the Fourteenth Amendment's original meaning, the district court turned the Fourteenth Amendment into just another 'font of tort law.'. . The Supreme Court has repeatedly stressed that the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause 'does not transform every tort committed by a state actor into a constitutional violation.'. . This case is a prime example of how we have interpreted the Clause to do just that. In cases such as Murguia v. Langdon, 61 F.4th 1096, and Kennedy, 439 F.3d 1055, we have strayed far from an original understanding of the Fourteenth Amendment. Even when bound by precedent, however, such precedent that is not in accordance with original understanding should not be expanded. . . Thus, in future cases, district courts in our circuit should reorient their decisions in this area to a more faithful reading of the original meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . In sum, the panel's decision does not comply with our court's precedent on mootness. And the district court's injunction was issued in error under our precedent and ignores the original public meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment. But our en banc power is meant to allow 'for more effective judicial administration.'. . Here, en banc review—with its considerable expenditure of time and resources—is better reserved for a subsequent case. I hope that future cases correct this course, and further corrective measures, like en banc review, are not necessary."); Fisher v. Moore, 73 F.4th 367, 371-75 (5th Cir. 2023) (denying reh'g en banc and amending opinion), cert. denied, 144 S. Ct. 569 (2024) ("Appellants contend that as of November 2019, when the events took place, it was not clearly established that plaintiffs have a right to be free from state-created dangers. Appellants are correct. The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment provides that '[n]o State shall ... deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.'. . 'The Due Process Clause ... does not, as a general matter, require the government to protect its citizens from the acts of private actors.'. . We have recognized just one exception to this general rule: 'when [a] "special relationship" between the individual and the state imposes upon the state a constitutional duty to protect that individual from known threats of harm by private actors.'. . However, 'a number of our sister circuits have adopted a "state-created danger" exception to the general rule, under which a state actor who knowingly places a citizen in danger may be accountable for the foreseeable injuries that result.'. . M.F. brings her due process claim against Appellants only under the second exception, the state-created danger theory. The problem for M.F. is that 'the Fifth Circuit has never recognized th[e] "state-created-danger" exception.'. . In our published, and thus binding, caselaw, '[w]e have repeatedly declined to recognize the state-created danger doctrine.'. . For this reason, M.F. 'ha[s] not demonstrated a clearly established substantive due process right on the facts [she] allege[s].'. .The district court thus erred in denying qualified immunity to Appellants. Even though we repeat today that the state-created danger doctrine is not clearly established in our circuit, to our knowledge we have not categorically ruled out the doctrine either; we have merely declined to adopt this particular theory of liability. To be sure, we have suggested what elements any such theory would include—should we ever adopt it, of course. For example, on one occasion, we indicated that a state-created danger theory would require 'a plaintiff [to] show [1] the defendants used their authority to create a dangerous environment for the plaintiff and [2] that the defendants acted with deliberate indifference to the plight of the plaintiff.'. .We also stated that the defendant '"must have used their authority to create an opportunity that would not otherwise have existed for the third party's crime to occur."'. . Nonetheless, as we have held time and again, the right to be free from state-created danger is not clearly established in this circuit. We acknowledge that, as of November 2019, a majority of our sister circuits had adopted the state-created danger theory of liability in one form or another. . .And, as M.F. points out, sometimes a 'robust "consensus of persuasive authority"' may suffice to clearly establish a constitutional right. . . But even putting aside our binding precedent that the doctrine is not clearly established in our circuit, our cases foreclose this specific line of reasoning as well. As we have held, 'the mere fact that a large number of courts had recognized the existence of a right to be free from state-created danger in some circumstances ... is insufficient to clearly establish' the theory of liability in our circuit. . . 'We reasoned that, despite widespread acceptance of the [state-created danger] doctrine [in other circuits], the circuits were not unanimous in [the doctrine's] "contours" or its application.'. . We therefore reject M.F.'s argument that out-of-circuit precedent clearly established her substantive due process right to be free from state-created danger. . . Finally, M.F. suggests that '[t]his is the case the Court has been waiting for,' and she invites us to—finally—adopt the state-created danger theory of § 1983 liability. We are reluctant to do so. . . . The facts giving rise to this lawsuit are unquestionably horrific. And Title IX may well provide M.F. a remedy. But § 1983 does not, as the Supreme Court's qualified-immunity doctrine "protects government officials 'from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known."'. . Our precedent has repeatedly declined to adopt the state-created danger doctrine. And a right never established cannot be one clearly established. As we recently put it, 'A claim that we have expressly not recognized is the antithesis of a clearly established one.'"); Murguia v. Langdon, 61 F.4th 1096, 1120, 1122-26 (9th Cir. 2023) (Ikuta, J., dissenting), pet. for reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, 73 F.4th 1103 (9th Cir. July 18, 2023), cert. denied sub nom County of Tulare v. Murguia, 144 S. Ct. 553 (2024) ("Tragic consequences may flow from negligence, mistakes of judgment, and the failure to provide safety and security to those who need it, as the case before us sadly shows. But victims of such lapses must pursue redress through tort law, because these mistakes do not rise to the level of egregious abuse of government power that violates citizens' constitutional rights. Here, the majority loses sight of the fundamental principles of substantive due process and instead turns the Fourteenth Amendment into a 'font of tort law,'. . . contrary to Supreme Court direction. Therefore, I respectfully dissent. . . .[O]ur cases have generally reflected the Court's principles that the state-created danger doctrine applies only when an injury is caused by a state's abuse of its executive power undertaken with the intent to injure someone in a 'way unjustifiable by any government interest,'. . . not when the injury is the result of mere negligence. The majority of our cases applying the doctrine involved state officials who abused the power entrusted to them as officers of the state by intentionally putting a person in harm's way. . . .We have likewise applied our doctrine when the harm is caused by a third party, but only when state officials exercised their authority to force an individual into a dangerous situation where injury by the third party was foreseeable. . . .At the furthest reach of this doctrine, we have extended liability to state officials who abused their state authority by intentionally acting in a way they knew would provoke a third party to injure the plaintiff. . . .Today the majority jettisons even these meager limits on our state-created danger doctrine. Contrary to Supreme Court precedent (and our own), the majority finds a substantive due process violation despite the absence of any abuse of power entrusted to the state. Instead, the majority holds that plaintiffs can state a claim for a violation of their due process rights based solely on negligence and mistake, exactly what the Supreme Court has told us not to do. . . . In short, the majority makes three mistakes that conflict with the Supreme Court's doctrine and, in doing so, finally tears our state-created danger doctrine clear of its moorings. First, the majority opinion finds a substantive due process violation in the absence of any abusive exercise of state authority. This is directly contrary to the Supreme Court's rulings that the substantive due process doctrine 'was intended to prevent government from abusing its power, or employing it as an instrument of oppression,'. . . and absent the 'affirmative abuse of power' by the state, there is no substantive due process violation[.] . .Second, the majority opinion indicates that officials may be liable for failing to take affirmative actions to protect children from a dangerous parent. But, as DeShaney held, that failure to protect is not an egregious abuse of state-assigned power. . . Moreover, DeShaney made clear that the state has 'no constitutional duty to protect [a child] against his [parent's] violence,' and therefore the 'failure to do so—though calamitous in hindsight—simply does not constitute a violation of the Due Process Clause.'. .Finally, the majority imposes liability for substantive due process violations when the plaintiffs' allegations amount to mere negligence. But 'liability for negligently inflicted harm is categorically beneath the threshold of constitutional due process.'. .The majority's expansion of our state-created danger doctrine into the realm of tort law conflicts with Supreme Court precedent and is out of step even with our broad state-created danger doctrine. Because the majority erroneously erodes '[t]he guarantee of due process' into a 'guarantee [of] due care,'. . . I respectfully dissent."); Sinclair v. City of Seattle, 61 F.4th 674, 679-84 (9th Cir. 2023) ("Although Sinclair brings this action to vindicate an alleged deprivation of her own right, . . . her theory of liability is a derivative of her son's underlying right: She alleges that the City violated her right to the companionship of her son by violating his right to be free from state-created danger. . . . On the record alleged here, where the official conduct follows an opportunity for actual deliberation, that standard is met by a showing that the defendant acted with deliberate indifference. . . Thus, to make out a successful claim under the state created danger doctrine, a plaintiff must allege facts sufficient to establish that the defendant acted 'with "deliberate indifference" to a "known or obvious danger."'. . . Sinclair has properly alleged that the City was deliberately indifferent to the dangers of CHOP [Capitol Hill Occupied Protest], but not deliberately indifferent in its response to Anderson's ensuing injuries or in the provision of medical care to him. . . . For a plaintiff to prevail on a state-created danger claim, the government must 'affirmatively create[ ] an actual, particularized danger [that the plaintiff] would not otherwise have faced.'. . Sinclair's allegations support a conclusion that the City created an actual danger, but not a particularized one. . .Accepting Sinclair's allegations as true, Sinclair shows that the City affirmatively created the actual danger Anderson—and by extension Sinclair—faced. Most relevant, Sinclair alleges that the City (1) left behind barriers the CHOP occupiers used to block streets off from general traffic and emergency responders; (2) provided portable toilets, lighting, and other support to the occupiers that allowed the lawless violence to persist; and (3) lured visitors to CHOP with promises of safety and a block-party atmosphere. Construing these allegations in the light most favorable to Sinclair, it is plausible that these actions, combined with the City's withdrawal of law enforcement from CHOP, incubated a more lawless and violent environment compared to the status quo. Sinclair argues that '[h]ad the City not provided barricades and other material support to CHOP .... people like [Anderson]'s murderer would not have been emboldened to undertake in criminal activity.' Her allegations, if proven, support that conclusion. . . . Here, Sinclair alleges more than the sort of police withdrawal to alleviate escalating violence that we considered in Johnson. She alleges the City affirmatively provided traffic barriers, lighting, and toilets to encourage the occupation, and portrayed CHOP as a fun, peaceful, cop-free protest, which further incited lawlessness in the area but nonetheless attracted Anderson to CHOP. Sinclair also alleges that the City support for CHOP extended for about a month after it became clear that the City's policies were fostering greater unchecked violence. The City's actions were thus deliberate and not passive or neutral as in Johnson. Sinclair's allegations against the City go further and support the inference that the City's actions increased the level of danger CHOP posed to Anderson above the counterfactual baseline level of danger that would have existed without its intervention: It was the City's creation of an opportunity for uncontrolled lawlessness, not just the City's failure to intervene, that endangered Anderson's, and by extension Sinclair's, rights. . . While Sinclair adequately alleges that the City created, or at least significantly contributed to, the danger her son faced, she fails to allege that the danger was sufficiently particularized to support a § 1983 claim. . . . [A]ny danger the City created or contributed to by enabling the CHOP zone affected all CHOP visitors equally; the danger was not specifically directed at Sinclair or Anderson. That is, the dangers that Anderson faced as a result of the City ignoring the lawlessness and crime occurring in CHOP were the same as anyone else; the City did not create a danger that posed a specific risk to Sinclair. . . . Here, Sinclair fails to allege that the City had any previous interactions with her son, directed any actions toward him, or even knew of her son's existence until he was killed. Instead, she 'alleged that the City left all visitors to CHOP in a much more dangerous position than it found them in.' Even construed in the light most favorable to Sinclair, her allegations demonstrate that the City-created danger was a generalized danger experienced by all those members of the public who chose to visit the CHOP zone. . . .Sinclair points out that in Huffman v. County of Los Angeles, we noted that it is an open question in our circuit whether a plaintiff can bring a state-created danger claim when the danger was not particularized to a specific, known individual. . . She argues that as long as the state-created danger was particularized, a plaintiff may bring a claim even if the individual harmed was an undifferentiated member of the public. And here, she says that the City created the particularized danger of lawlessness. Only one court, the Seventh Circuit, has held that the state-created danger need not be particular to a known plaintiff. . . . We need not definitively resolve whether to adopt the Seventh Circuit's minority rule showcased in Reed because it would not change the result. Here, the alleged dangers in CHOP were of unchecked lawlessness and rampant crime affecting everyone. . . . But the dangers alleged are neither specific, nor immediate, nor of limited range or duration. And Anderson's shooting was not as directly or necessarily correlated to the danger posed by uncontrolled lawlessness as a drunk-driving victim's injuries are to the danger of letting an intoxicated person get behind the wheel. Indeed, Anderson's encounter with Long, with whom he had 'a history of antagonism,' is a significant chink in the causal chain. In sum, while the City created an actual danger of increased crime, that danger was not specific to Anderson or Sinclair. . . Thus, Sinclair's § 1983 claim fails. The City's conduct here was egregious. But because the City's actions were not directed toward Anderson and did not otherwise expose him to a specific risk, the connection between Sinclair's alleged injuries and the City's affirmative actions is too remote to support a § 1983 claim. It is at the ballot box, then, that Sinclair and other Seattleites must hold the City accountable for their deliberately indifferent actions."); Burns-Fisher v. Romero-Lehrer, 57 F.4th 421, 425-26 (4th Cir. 2023) ("Even if Appellee did sufficiently allege that her constitutional rights were violated, we conclude that reversal is still required because Appellee has not demonstrated that it was clearly established at the time of the incident that she had a constitutional right to be protected from a student who was known to have a violent history. 'To determine whether a right was clearly established, we typically ask whether, when the defendant violated the right, there existed either controlling authority—such as a published opinion of this Court—or a robust consensus of persuasive authority, that would have given the defendants fair warning that their conduct was wrongful.'. . In Turner v. Thomas, 930 F.3d 640 (4th Cir. 2019) and Callahan v. N.C. Dep't of Pub. Safety, 18 F.4th 142 (4th Cir. 2021), we emphasized that since Pinder v. Johnson, 54 F.3d 1169, 1174 (4th Cir. 1995), 'we have never issued a published opinion recognizing a successful state-created danger claim.'. . Notably, while we acknowledged in Pinder that '[a]t some point on the spectrum between action and inaction, the state's conduct may implicate it in the harm caused,'. . . we nevertheless determined that the defendant was entitled to qualified immunity[.] . . In doing so, we stated that at the time of the incident in question, it was not clearly established that the defendant police officer had an affirmative duty to protect citizens from the actions of a third party. . . This case fits neatly within our jurisprudence on state-created danger claims. As in Pinder, Turner, and Callahan, the injury here was, at best, indirectly caused by Appellant's failure to protect Appellee from TB. . . And as in those cases, we had not made clear at the time of the incident in this case that a defendant's failure to adequately respond to a potentially dangerous situation gives rise to an actionable constitutional claim under the state-created danger doctrine. Because it was not clearly established at the time of the incident that a defendant's failure to act gives rise to a state-created danger claim, we conclude that Appellant is entitled to qualified immunity."); Barefield v. Hillman, No. 20-6002, 2021 WL 3079693, at *3-4 (6th Cir. July 21, 2021) (not reported) ("Barefield alleged claims under both the 'special relationship' and 'state-created-danger' exceptions, but only the latter is at issue in this appeal. . . . In finding that the state's 'affirmative act' of placing T.H. into a Level 1 foster home instead of a Level 3 facility increased the risk that T.H. would be harmed by a third party, the district court analyzed whether T.H. would have been safer at a Level 3 facility than a Level 1 foster home. Under our precedents, this is not the appropriate comparison; rather, the proper comparison is with T.H.'s position before state intervention. . . . Under Cartwright, the relevant question is whether T.H. was safer before state intervention than after it—not whether he was safer in one state foster-care placement than another. Thus, the district court should have asked whether T.H. was safer from the risks of gang violence before he was placed into state custody, when he was living with his mother, than when he was living in Welbeck's foster home. Or, alternatively, whether he was safer when he was at large after escaping the VYA than he was in Welbeck's foster home. Either way, Barefield's claim falls short. Barefield does not argue that T.H. was safer in her custody (or living on the streets while at large) than in state custody, and indeed alleges that when T.H. was living with her, he often 'ran away for extended periods of time and associated with gang members.'. . Barefield also does not dispute that T.H. was originally placed into state custody because a court found him to be dependent and neglected. Under these facts, no reasonable juror could find that T.H. was safer before he was in state custody or when he was at large after escaping the VYA than he was in Welbeck's Level 1 foster home. . . Accordingly, there is no genuine issue of fact regarding whether an affirmative act of the state created or increased the risk that T.H. would be harmed by gang violence. . . Barefield responds that the state has a heightened duty to prevent harm to foster children, which includes a duty to ensure that they are prevented from doing harm to themselves, and that T.H. was effectively in DCS custody the entire time. . . One of our sister circuits held that the state may be liable for a substantive-due-process violation if it places a child into a foster home that it knows is unable to adequately supervise the child. Camp v. Gregory, 67 F.3d 1286 (7th Cir. 1995). But Camp analogized the state's duty to ensure a foster parent is capable of adequately supervising a child to the state's duty to ensure a child will not be harmed by state foster parents. See id. at 1293–97. And we have held that the well-established line of cases dealing with abusive foster homes falls under the special-relationship exception to DeShaney and not the state-created-danger exception. . . Barefield's arguments in this regard are therefore not pertinent to a state-created-danger claim."); Jane Doe v. Jackson Local Sch. Dist. Bd. of Educ., 954 F.3d 925, 932-37 (6th Cir. 2020) ("We have. . . carved out an exception to DeShaney's rule that a state has no constitutional duty to protect individuals who are not in its custody. When rejecting the due-process claim, DeShaney described the case's facts as follows: 'While the State may have been aware of the dangers that Joshua faced in the free world, it played no part in their creation, nor did it do anything to render him any more vulnerable to them.'. . We have used this sentence to adopt a 'state-created-danger theory' of substantive due process, and have gradually molded that theory into a three-part test. . . An official must initially take an 'affirmative act ... that either create[s] or increase[s] the risk that the plaintiff [will] be exposed to private acts of violence.'. . Next, this risk of private harm must rise to the level of a 'special danger' to a specific victim that exceeds the general risk of harm the public faces from the private actor. . . Last, when exacerbating this risk of harm, the official must act with a sufficiently culpable mental state. . . We can resolve this case on the third 'culpability' element alone. Our decisions have described this element in different ways. Sometimes we have said that a public official either 'must have known or clearly should have known that [the official's] actions specifically endangered an individual.'. . Other times we have said that a public official must have 'acted with the requisite culpability to establish a substantive due process violation[.]'. . .Which test applies? The latter one more accurately articulates current law. . . . Since Lewis, we have recognized that the culpability standard that applies to state actors who indirectly allow a private party to inflict harm should not be lower than the culpability standard that applies to state actors who directly inflict that harm themselves. . . . Our court has imported this deliberate-indifference standard into the state-created-danger context, at least when officials have '"the opportunity for reflection and unhurried judgments.”’. . The standard has two parts. An official must ‘be aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists, and he must also draw the inference.’. . ‘Having drawn the inference,’ the official next must ‘act or fail to act in a manner demonstrating “reckless or callous indifference” toward the individual’s rights.’. . .Measured against these standards, the Does have not created a genuine dispute of material fact over the culpability element of our state-created-danger test. . . .As will often be the case in retrospect, Waltman and Singleton also could have done more when implementing this discipline. Singleton could have ensured that C.T. stayed in his assigned seat. And Waltman could have followed up with Singleton about the discipline. At most, however, the failure to take these additional precautions suggests negligence, which falls well short of establishing the required ‘callous disregard for the safety’ of Minor Doe. . . . While C.T.’s sexual assault of Minor Doe undoubtedly shocks the conscience, the school employees’ responses to C.T.’s earlier actions do not. And it is their conduct that is at issue here.”); Cook v. Hopkins, 795 F. App’x 906, ___ (5th Cir. 2019) (“It’s true that Deanna might have a viable claim for violation of her due process rights if this circuit recognized the ‘state-created danger theory,’ which can make the state liable under § 1983 if ‘it created or exacerbated the danger’ of private violence against an individual. . . Plaintiffs rely heavily on an out-of-circuit opinion, Okin v. Village of Cornwall-on-Hudson Police Department, in which the Second Circuit held that the state-created danger theory gave rise to a substantive due process violation where ‘police conduct ... encourage[d] a private citizen to engage in domestic violence, by fostering the belief that his intentionally violent behavior [would] not be confronted by arrest, punishment, or police interference.’. . But, as the district court explained, this circuit does not recognize the state-created danger theory, and we decline to do so today, despite Plaintiffs’ urging that ‘[t]his is that case.’. . In sum, the district court did not err in dismissing Plaintiffs’ due process claims against Defendants.”); Turner v. Thomas, 930 F.3d 640, 644-47 (4th Cir. 2019) (“Before us is Turner’s claim that Thomas and Flaherty violated his substantive due process rights by ordering officers at the rally not to intervene in violence among protesters. In general, a defendant’s mere failure to act does not give rise to liability for a due process violation. . . Turner seeks to avoid that rule by invoking the state-created danger exception, under which state actors may be liable for failing to protect injured parties from dangers which the state actors either created or enhanced. . . But it was not clearly established at the time of the rally that failing to intervene in violence among the protesters would violate any particular protester’s due process rights. Accordingly, we agree with the district court that Thomas and Flaherty are entitled to qualified immunity, and we affirm the dismissal of Turner’s complaint. . . . [W]e must determine whether, at the time of the rally, there existed legal authority giving Thomas and Flaherty fair warning that ordering officers not to intervene in violence among protesters would implicate the state-created danger doctrine and amount to a violation of protesters’ due process rights. . . . Following Pinder’s narrow reading of the state-created danger doctrine, we have never issued a published opinion recognizing a successful state-created danger claim. Rather, our precedent on the issue has emphasized the doctrine’s limited reach and the exactingness of the affirmative-conduct standard. . . . Against this background, we conclude that it was not clearly established at the time of the rally that ordering officers not to intervene in private violence between protesters was an affirmative act within the meaning of the state-created danger doctrine. Our precedent sets an exactingly high bar for what constitutes affirmative conduct sufficient to invoke the state-created danger doctrine. Turner has put forth no facts suggesting that a stand-down order crosses the line from inaction to action when the state conduct in Pinder and Doe did not. Acting under Pinder's teaching that state actors may not be held liable for 'st[anding] by and d[oing] nothing when suspicious circumstances dictated a more active role for them,' Thomas and Flaherty could have reasonably concluded that a stand-down order violated no constitutional right. . . Accordingly, Turner has not alleged a violation of clearly established law, and Thomas and Flaherty are entitled to qualified immunity."); Matthews v. Bergdorf, 889 F.3d 1136, 1150 (10th Cir. 2018) ("[T]he state-created danger exception has no application if Plaintiffs' claims are based on the mere failure of ODHS caseworkers to respond to a referral by removing Plaintiffs from the Matthews' home and placing them in a safe environment. Such claims of inaction, no matter how prolific, are 'insufficient as a matter of law to result in liability' under the state-created danger exception. . . A state-created danger necessarily involves affirmative conduct on the part of a state actor in placing a plaintiff in danger of private violence. . .In addition to adequately pleading affirmative conduct and private violence as part and parcel of any claim arising under the state-created danger exception, a plaintiff must also adequately allege the following: (1) the state actor created the danger or increased the plaintiff's vulnerability to the danger in some way, (2) plaintiff was a member of a limited and specifically definable group, (3) the state actor's conduct put plaintiff at substantial risk of serious, immediate, and proximate harm, (4) the risk was obvious or known, (5) the state actor acted recklessly in conscious disregard of the risk, and (6) such conduct, when viewed in total, was conscience shocking."); Wilson-Trattner v. Campbell, 863 F.3d 589, 594-96 (7th Cir. 2017) ("[E]ven if the appellees' failure to intervene ultimately increased the danger to Wilson-Trattner by indirectly emboldening Roeger to continue to mistreat her, that would not distinguish her case from DeShaney. There state officials did not remove a child from an abuser's care despite numerous obvious indications of abuse over a period of about two years. . . The abuse accordingly continued unabated, ultimately resulting in severe brain damage to the child. . .The Supreme Court nevertheless concluded that the inaction of state officials was insufficient to support a claim under the state-created danger doctrine. . . That holding is equally applicable here. The Supreme Court subsequently reaffirmed this principle in Town of Castle Rock v. Gonzales, in which it held that there is no due process right to have another arrested for one's own protection. . . . In sum, we find no evidence that any of the appellees created or increased a danger to Wilson-Trattner. Mere indifference or inaction in the face of private violence cannot support a substantive due process claim under DeShaney and Castle Rock. Further, Wilson-Trattner's theory that Hancock County officers increased a danger to her by implicitly condoning violence against her is both questionable in light of DeShaney and Castle Rock and unsupported by the facts. As such, the district court correctly granted summary judgment on the Plaintiff's substantive due process claim."); Enger v. Arnold, 862 F.3d 571, 576 (6th Cir. 2017) ("T.F.'s death was a tragedy. Although we are appalled by the sinister acts that led to his death, it was Engler's role, as T.F.'s representative, to present us with all of the facts that support his constitutional claim against Arnold. Plaintiffs who seek to hold state officials constitutionally liable on a 'failure-to-protect' claim face a high burden under DeShaney. . . Engler's complaint falls far short. An assertion of a failure to act does not support a state-created-danger theory, and we may not presume facts not presented. . . Because Engler's complaint fails to state sufficient facts to support his substantive due-process claim, we affirm the district court's dismissal of this claim."); Estate of Reat v. Rodriguez, 824 F.3d 960, 964-67 (10th Cir. 2016) (amending and superceding opinion on den'l of reh'g en banc) ("Because there are cases where we can more readily decide the law was not clearly established before reaching the more difficult question of whether there has been a constitutional violation, we may exercise discretion in deciding which prong to address first. . . This is such a case. . . .At the most general level, the parties agree that the state-created danger doctrine is clearly established in this circuit. . . .Though the elements of the state-created danger test are clearly established, it also must be clear to which fact scenarios and government actors we apply the test, and what types of conduct are 'conscience shocking' under the sixth factor. . . .Here, Reat's Estate alleges Rodriguez violated the Fourteenth Amendment by knowingly sending the victims, who had called 911 to report an assault, back into the path of their armed attackers. It contends Rodriguez knew the attackers last had been seen speeding northward on Sheridan Boulevard only minutes earlier, yet he instructed Pal to stop on that road. He then told Pal to pull over and activate his hazard lights at a location nineteen blocks north of the place of the assault. Even after Rodriguez knew the attackers had brandished a gun, he did not suggest that Pal relocate to a less conspicuous place, nor did he send police protection. The district court held 'these factual allegations, accepted as true, are sufficiently shocking to the conscience to state a plausible claim for violation of plaintiffs' substantive due process rights under the state-created danger theory.'. . For a number of reasons, we conclude Rodriguez's conduct does not violate the clearly defined contours of the state-created danger doctrine. First, Reat's Estate cannot point to a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case involving misconduct by 911 operators. . . . In all of [the] cases where we found it appropriate to apply the doctrine of state-created danger, the victims were unable to care for themselves or had had limitations imposed on their freedom by state actors. . . .Rodriguez is unlike any of the defendants in our state-created danger cases. Rodriguez was not a police officer, firefighter, or other similar first responder. . . As a 911 operator, he was not present at the scene of the attack, nor could he take physical action in response to the unfolding event. He did not impose any limitation on Reat's freedom to act. Rodriguez merely informed the victims, however incompetently, that to get help from the police, they would have to return to Denver. It cannot be said that any of Rodriguez's actions, as foolish as they were, 'limited in some way the liberty of a citizen to act on his own behalf.' . . Furthermore, Reat is unlike the victims in other state-created danger cases. He was not in the custody of the state in the way that prisoners are, and thus was not deprived in that manner of his freedom to act. Unlike children in school or under the care of social workers, Reat and his companions were not incapable of acting in their own interest at the time of the shooting. Though the state-created danger doctrine itself may be clearly established, it is far from clear that it applies to Rodriguez's conduct in this particular situation. In sum, all cases cited by Reat's Estate 'are simply too factually distinct to speak clearly to the specific circumstances here.' Mullenix, 136 S. Ct. at 312. No reasonable 911 operator could have known that these actions would have resulted in liability under the Fourteenth Amendment."), cert. denied, 137 S. Ct. 1434 (2017); Montgomery v. City of Ames, 829 F.3d 968, 973 (8th Cir. 2016) ("Montgomery has not established that McPherson or employees of the Center created a new danger to Montgomery or increased the danger that Bailey posed to Montgomery, because the danger to Montgomery existed before Bailey resided at the Center and would have continued to exist thereafter. Allowing Bailey to visit the Hy-Vee did not create a greater risk to Montgomery than what she would have faced if Bailey had never been assigned to the Center in the first place. . . That Bailey was able to leave the Center during the evening of September 28 simply placed Montgomery back in the same situation that she occupied before Bailey was in custody or resided at the halfway house. Montgomery was not an institutionalized person to whom the State owed a duty, cf. Youngberg v. Romeo, 457 U.S. 307, 317 (1982), and the Supreme Court has rejected the notion that a State has an affirmative duty, enforceable through the Due Process Clause, to protect an identified victim when it knows that a person in custody poses a special danger to that victim. . . Montgomery has not presented evidence comparable to the allegations in Wells v. Walker, 852 F.2d 368, 371 (8th Cir. 1988), where state officials took action under state law to provide post-release transportation for a prisoner, used a citizen's store as the closest commercial transportation pick-up point, and thus affirmatively placed the citizen in a 'unique, confrontational encounter' with a person known to have exhibited violent propensities."); Stiles ex rel. D.S. v. Grainger Cty., Tenn., 819 F.3d 834, 855 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Most of the actions Plaintiffs identify are not affirmative acts. Failing to punish students, failing to enforce the law, failing to enforce school policy, and failing to refer assaults to McGinnis are plainly omissions rather than affirmative acts. As for the remaining actions Plaintiffs cite—blaming DS and Stiles, and misleading Plaintiffs to believe Defendants would help DS—Plaintiffs offer no explanation or evidence of how these actions increased DS's exposure to peer harassment. At most, these acts returned DS to a preexisting situation of danger. Nothing suggests DS 'was safer before' Defendants' accusatory statements and promises to help him than he was afterwards. . . As a result, Plaintiffs' due process claim cannot prevail under a state-created danger theory."); Doe v. Rosa, 795 F.3d 429, 439, 442 (4th Cir. 2015) ("Under the narrow limits set by DeShaney and Pinder, to establish § 1983 liability based on a state-created danger theory, a plaintiff must show that the state actor created or increased the risk of private danger, and did so directly through affirmative acts, not merely through inaction or omission. Put another way, 'state actors may not disclaim liability when they themselves throw others to the lions,' but that does not 'entitle persons who rely on promises of aid to some greater degree of protection from lions at large.'. . . Given the clear rule under DeShaney and Pinder, we conclude that the Does cannot make a § 1983 state-created danger claim against Rosa. As the district court found in granting summary judgment, the Does' claim fails because they 'cannot demonstrate that [Rosa] created or substantially enhanced the danger which resulted in [their] tragic abuse at the hands of ReVille.'. . ReVille began abusing the Does in 2005 and 2006, two years before Rosa could have been aware through the Camper Doe complaint that he was a pedophile. Quite simply, Rosa 'could not have created a danger that already existed.'. .Nor did Rosa create or increase the risk of the Does' abuse specifically during the early summer months of 2007, as the Does posit. As horrific as the abuse of the Does by ReVille was, nothing transpired between them and ReVille in the summer of 2007 that had not been ongoing for two years unrelated to any action by Rosa. As DeShaney makes clear, allowing continued exposure to an existing danger by failing to intervene is not the equivalent of creating or increasing the risk of that danger. . . .For the foregoing reasons, the state-created danger doctrine does not impose liability on Rosa for ReVille's ongoing abuse of the Does. While Rosa's undisputed failure to act brought dishonor to him and The Citadel, it did not create a constitutional cause of action. . . Rosa's alleged conduct neither created nor increased the danger ReVille already posed to the Does, and in any event, did not constitute cognizable affirmative acts with respect to ReVille's abuse of the Does."); Doe v. Vill. of Arlington Heights, 782 F.3d 911, 918 (7th Cir. 2015) ("This case is not sufficiently similar to those cases in which we have applied the state-created danger exception; it is more like Windle and cases in which the exception was inapplicable. Del Boccio did not create the danger to Doe, nor did he do anything to make the danger to her worse. When he left Doe with the three young males, he left her just as he found her, 'plac [ing] [her] in no worse position than that in which [s]he would have been had [he] not acted at all.'. . Not even the allegations that Del Boccio called off Officer Spoerry (or falsely reported to dispatch that the subjects were gone) created or increased the danger to Doe. Had Del Boccio not called off Officer Spoerry or falsely reported to dispatch, we have no way of knowing what would have happened. Officer Spoerry might have failed at protecting Doe. . .This contrasts with Ross v. United States, 910 F.2d 1422, 1424–25 (7th Cir.1990), where competent rescuers were on the scene with rescue equipment and ready to begin their efforts to rescue a drowning boy when the police arrived and ordered them to cease their efforts because county policy prohibited civilian rescue attempts. A sheriff's deputy advised the rescuers that he would arrest them upon their entry into the water and even placed his boat so as to prevent their dive. . . About thirty minutes after the boy had fallen into the water, the authorized divers arrived and pulled him out of the water. . . He died the next day. . . We held that plaintiff sufficiently alleged a constitutional injury. . . Significantly, in Ross the chances of a successful rescue were high, and there was a direct connection between the deputy's actions and the boy's drowning. Here, we can only speculate whether Del Boccio made Doe worse off, whether by calling off Officer Spoerry or falsely reporting to dispatch. This is not a case in which Doe was safe, or even considerably safer, before Del Boccio acted. His alleged conduct did not turn a potential danger into an actual one; Doe was in actual danger already. Therefore, Del Boccio had no constitutional duty to protect her. But even if calling off Officer Spoerry violated Doe's constitutional rights, it was not clearly established and Del Boccio nonetheless would be entitled to qualified immunity."); Estate of Lance v. Lewisville Independent School Dist., 743 F.3d 982, 1001, 1002 (5th Cir. 2014) ("The en banc court in Covington also recognized that 'we have never explicitly adopted the state-created danger theory,' and 'decline[d] to use th[e] en banc opportunity to adopt the state-created danger theory in this case because the allegations would not support such a theory.'. . Nevertheless, the en banc court applied the state-created danger framework to plaintiffs' claim and concluded that plaintiffs' 'allegations do not support a claim under the state-created danger theory, even if that theory were viable in this circuit.'. . In light of Covington's express decision not to recognize the state-created danger theory our court has repeatedly noted its unavailability . . .Taking the view most favorable to the Lances-assuming that state-created danger is a viable theory-the evidence does not create a genuine issue of material fact."); Estate of C.A. v. Castro, 547 F. App'x 621, 626, 627 (5th Cir. 2013) ("The Agwuokes ask this court to use this case to expressly adopt the state-created danger theory of liability, claiming it 'is a natural extension of both the text and purpose of Section 1983 and of Supreme Court precedent. And this is the appropriate case to adopt it.' But 'this Court has consistently refused to adopt the state-created danger theory.'. . Contrary to the Agwuokes' assertion, the district court did not hold that the state-created danger doctrine was 'not viable' in the Fifth Circuit. Rather, it evaluated the doctrine, noted that the circuit has yet to adopt the theory, and concluded that 'the present case would not appear to provide the right vehicle for the Fifth Circuit to adopt the state-created danger doctrine' because '[t]he plaintiffs would fail to satisfy one or more of the necessary elements suggested in Covington.' We agree. Even assuming this court recognized the theory of liability, the Agwuokes failed to raise a question of material fact on each element of a § 1983 claim against HISD premised on the state-created danger theory of liability. . . . The Agwuokes fail to establish that C.A. was a known victim, and thus do not make out a prima facie case under the state-created danger theory of liability. As a result, we follow the lead of the en banc court in Covington and 'decline to use this ... opportunity to adopt the state-created danger theory in this case because the allegations would not support such a theory.'"); Morrow v. Balaski, 719 F.3d 160, 178 (3d Cir. 2013) (en banc) ("We are not persuaded by the Morrows' argument that the Defendants affirmatively created or enhanced a danger to Brittany and Emily by suspending Anderson and then allowing her to return to school when the suspension ended. . . .While the Morrows make much of the fact that Defendants' failure to expel Anderson after she was adjudicated 'guilty of a crime' may have been contrary to a school policy mandating expulsion in such circumstances, we decline to hold that a school's alleged failure to enforce a disciplinary policy is equivalent to an affirmative act under the circumstances here."); Slade v. Board of School Directors of City of Milwaukee, 702 F.3d 1027, 1033 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Some cases say or assume that due process is violated in a case in which the state endangers a person only if the state's action 'shocks the conscience.'. . . It's not a very illuminating expression, and we don't know what it adds to recklessness. Reckless indifference to a child's safety would doubtless shock the conscience, but County of Sacramento v. Lewis . . . says that negligence doesn't. References to 'shocks the conscience' illustrate the tendency of some courts to 'complexify' analysis in this class of cases needlessly, as it seems to us. We have already indicated our unhappiness with the use of 'affirmative act' and 'shocks the conscience' as touchstones of liability. Neither are we happy with the suggestion in Phillips v. County of Allegheny . . . —a suggestion in tension with County of Sacramento v. Lewis—that due process can be violated by 'gross negligence or arbitrariness that indeed shocks the conscience.'. . And we get little out of the test suggested for cases of this sort in Currier v. Doran . . . (and earlier Tenth Circuit cases on which it relies) . . . . Shouldn't it be enough to say that it violates the due process clause for a government employee acting within the scope of his employment to commit a reckless act that by gratuitously endangering a person results in an injury to that person? Are there not virtues in simplicity, even in law? With our simple formula (which incidentally dispenses with the jargony term 'deliberate indifference'), all that remains in doubt is the choice between the civil and criminal standards of recklessness—between the known versus the merely obvious risk—but that difference as we have said has little practical significance in a litigation and none in this litigation."); Cutlip v. City of Toledo, No. 10–4350, 2012 WL 2580818, at *7-*9 (6th Cir. July 5, 2012) (not reported) ("[A] situation where the victim committed suicide does not fit neatly into the state-created-danger doctrine. . . This Circuit has never found liability under the state-created-danger doctrine where the victim committed suicide, and indeed, although a number of courts have considered the state-created-danger doctrine within the context of suicide, the primary cases that have found or seriously entertained liability have involved the suicide of minors where school officials or police were in some way responsible. . . Nearly all cases that considered the state-created-danger doctrine in the context of suicide have rejected liability on the merits, finding in most cases that the municipality did not create the danger—i.e., the self-destructive impulse—through an affirmative act, and in the balance of cases that the state agents did not act with deliberate indifference or in a way that shocked the conscience. . .The rarity of Deshaney liability for suicides can be partially attributed to the high standard of proof in state-created-danger cases, but it is also uniquely difficult to assign constitutional liability to the government when the non-custodial victim harms himself. As a general principle, people cannot violate their own constitutional rights, and where a person makes a free and affirmative choice to end his life, the responsibility for his actions remains with him. That a state official somehow contributed to a person's decision to commit suicide does not transform the victim into the state's agent of his own destruction. . .Given that the Supreme Court 'has always been reluctant to expand the concept of substantive due process because guideposts for responsible decision making in this unchartered area are scarce and open-ended,' the 'doctrine of judicial self-restraint' cautions us not to automatically extend the state-created-danger exception to suicide, particularly because the Supreme Court has been largely silent on this doctrine. . .Despite our reservations about the applicability of the state-created-danger doctrine to suicide cases, because there is some question in this case about whether Rocky intentionally committed suicide or whether he involuntarily pulled the trigger after the police detonated the flash-bang device, we will accept Cutlip's version of this factual dispute and proceed to apply the state-created-danger doctrine to determine whether the City can be liable under § 1983. In order to show a constitutional violation pursuant to the state-created-danger doctrine, we must find each of the following elements: (1) an affirmative act by the state which either created or increased the risk that the plaintiff would be exposed to an act of violence by a third party; (2) a special danger to the plaintiff wherein the state's actions placed the plaintiff specifically at risk, as distinguished from a risk that affects the public at large; and (3) the state knew or should have known that its actions specifically endangered the plaintiff. Estate of Smithers v. City of Flint, 602 F.3d 758, 763 (6th Cir.2010) (citing Reynolds, 438 F.3d at 690). The only prong at issue is whether an 'affirmative act' by the police officers increased the risk that Rocky would kill himself; there is no debate that Rocky was specifically at risk and that the police officers knew that he was at risk. Crucially, the police officers' affirmative acts must be made with deliberate indifference, which this Circuit has 'equated with subjective recklessness.'. . . The one affirmative action identified by Cutlip that could have legitimately increased the danger to Rocky was detonating the flash-bang device and initiating the forced entry into Rocky's bedroom. But the record does not support a finding of deliberate indifference on the part of the police officers. . . . Because we do not find any genuine, material, disputed issue of fact and because the police did not display conscious indifference to Rocky's life, we believe that summary judgment is appropriate in this case. The police did not violate Rocky's constitutional rights, and without an underlying constitutional violation, the City is not liable under § 1983."); Gray v. University of Colorado Hosp. Authority, 672 F.3d 909, 927-30 (10th Cir. 2012) ("We conclude our analysis of Plaintiffs' danger creation claim by pointing out its most glaring defect. We have observed throughout this opinion that a precondition to our application of the state-created danger theory is an act of 'private violence.' Quite simply, the complaint does not allege this indispensable precondition. Instead, the complaint alleges that the immediate or direct cause of decedent's death was negligence on the part of state actors. . . .The state-created danger theory indulges the legal fiction that an act of private violence may deprive the victim of this constitutional guarantee. Before the fiction may operate, however, a state actor must create the danger or render the victim more vulnerable to the danger that occasions the deprivation of life, liberty, or property. The danger that the state actor creates or enhances must be differentiated from the harm that the private party inflicts. Under the state-created danger theory, a constitutional deprivation is dependent on a private act that deprives the victim of life, liberty, or property, even though private action itself is never cognizable under § 1983. The state actor's affirmative act creating the danger or rendering the victim more vulnerable to it does not constitute a constitutional deprivation. The Due Process Clause does not provide an individual the right to be free from state-created dangers in a vacuum. This is because 'an increased risk is not itself a deprivation of life, liberty, or property.'. . A 'would-be' victim who averts the danger, and thus the harm, may not claim the denial of a constitutional right to be free from state-created dangers. That would be nonsensical. Although the State may incur a constitutional duty to protect the victim from harm its conduct has rendered more likely, the victim has suffered no constitutional deprivation if the victim is not harmed. . . .But not just any private act will suffice. The private act must be a violent one. . . . The view that a private party must act with some degree of deliberateness before a victim's harm is actionable under the state-created danger theory is sound. This is because the harm associated with a negligent act is never constitutionally cognizable under the Due Process Clause. . . . Reason dictates that if state actors are not answerable under § 1983 for their own negligent acts, they are not answerable under § 1983 where a private party's underlying negligent act is directly responsible for the harm. The rationale is simple: The victim has not suffered a constitutional deprivation in either case. . . . Plaintiffs' complaint plainly alleges that those individuals in the EMU responsible for monitoring decedent were 'employees and/or agents' of Defendant hospital acting 'under color of state law.' Plaintiffs' complaint also plainly alleges those individuals are responsible for 'negligently causing' decedent's death. A precondition to our application of the state-created danger theory is 'private violence.' The conduct Plaintiffs allege to be directly responsible for decedent's death is neither private nor violent. Accordingly, because the state-created danger theory of constitutional liability has no role to play in a proper resolution of Plaintiffs' grievance, the judgment of the district court is AFFIRMED."); Estate of Smithers ex rel. Norris v. City of Flint, 602 F.3d 758, 764 (6th Cir. 2010) ("Plaintiffs here argue that the officers engaged in an affirmative act that created a danger when they released Washington from custody on the trespassing charge rather than holding her at least overnight on a domestic violence charge, creating an illusion of safety for plaintiffs. They suggest that the officers' decision to release Washington operated as an approval of her threats. However, while this action may have been ill-advised, the officers' failure to hold Washington did not constitute an affirmative act. The officers exercised their discretion in arresting Washington for trespassing, rather than for domestic violence, for which they are protected under Castle Rock. Thus, the officers' first affirmative act had the effect of protecting Washington's eventual victims, at least for a short period of time. Their second affirmative act, releasing Washington from custody, did not 'create'" or 'increase' the danger to plaintiffs. The officers did not require or encourage plaintiffs to remain in the unlocked house or suggest that Washington would be held for 20 hours so as to imply that plaintiffs would be safe. Their actions did not constitute an approval of Washington's threats any more than the return of the children in DeShaney or Bukowski encouraged that those children should be further harmed. As in those cases, these events were tragic; however, the officers' actions could not have been interpreted by a reasonable juror to have created or increased the danger to plaintiffs."); Sandage v. Board of Com'rs of Vanderburgh County, 548 F.3d 595, 599, 600 (7th Cir. 2008) ("The first principle is thus the key one, and its requirement of 'affirmative acts' distinguishes our case from Monfils. We add only that 'create or increase' must not be interpreted so broadly as to erase the essential distinction between endangering and failing to protect. If all that were required was a causal relation between inaction and harm, the rule of DeShaney would be undone, . . . since, had it not been for the state's inaction in DeShaney, there would have been no injury. The three cases that the opinion in King cites for the proposition that the state must by its 'affirmative acts ... create or increase' the danger to the victim − Windle v. City of Marion, 321 F.3d 658 (7th Cir.2003); Bright v. Westmoreland County, 443 F.3d 276 (3d Cir.2006), and Monfils − are either cases, like this one, of inaction by law enforcement personnel (Windle and Bright), so that there was no liability, or a case (Monfils) in which law enforcement personnel were responsible for the danger. When courts speak of the state's 'increasing' the danger of private violence, they mean the state did something that turned a potential danger into an actual one, rather than that it just stood by and did nothing to prevent private violence. That was Monfils; it is not this case; and after Castle Rock a broken promise − the essential act of which both the plaintiff in that case and the present plaintiffs complain (though there was more in Monfils − the handing over of the tape to the murderer) − may very well not be enough."); Walter v. Pike County, Pa., 544 F.3d 182, 195, 196 (3d Cir. 2008) ("If a state-created danger claim cannot be predicated on a failure to arrest, neither can it be predicated on a failure to provide protection. . . . And if an assurance of well-being despite the presence of a threat is not a sufficiently affirmative act, neither is the mere failure to warn of a threat. . . . Here, the District Court held that a jury could reasonably find that the defendants affirmatively used their authority in 2001, by 'allowing Michael Walter to become involved in eliciting a confession from Joseph Stacy,' . . . and could reasonably find that the defendants were deliberately indifferent in 2002 in their 'failure to warn the Walter family of Joseph Stacy's menacing behavior....'. . . But for the reasons we have articulated above, these findings would not amount to a constitutional violation-they would not establish that the defendants committed a culpable act, only that they acted in 2001 and then, months later, shocked the conscience through inaction."); Barber v. Overton, 496 F.3d 449, 456, 457 (6th Cir. 2007) ("We belabor the discussion of Kallstrom to emphasize what it did not do: It did not create a broad right protecting plaintiffs' personal information. Rather, Kallstrom created a narrowly tailored right, limited to circumstances where the information disclosed was particularly sensitive and the persons to whom it was disclosed were particularly dangerous vis-a-vis the plaintiffs. We cannot conclude that social security numbers and birth dates are tantamount to the sensitive information disclosed in Kallstrom. The court's careful footnote in that case, instructing the district court on remand, should put that to rest. If mere disclosure of social security numbers were sufficient then there was no need for the remand. In addition, Kallstrom did not restrict any private information from disclosure to anyone in any circumstances, but rather only certain restricted information when the plaintiffs had a reason to fear retaliation from persons to whom it was disclosed. In light of our narrow reading of the substantive due process right to non-disclosure privacy, we conclude that the release of the social security numbers was not sensitive enough nor the threat of retaliation apparent enough to warrant constitutional protection here. . . First, scary though it may be, the diligent miscreant who wishes to exact vengeance can locate a person with limited information. Plaintiffs' names, general whereabouts (near the IMAX facility), and approximate ages were already known to these prisoners. While the social security numbers and birth dates might have pinpointed the residence of a particular plaintiff, there are other methods of learning where persons reside; several hours in a car or several telephone calls might well provide the very same information. Voter registration records, county property records, and a plethora of other publically available sources exist through which persons can discover the residency of an individual and prisoners' accomplices have as ready access to them as any other citizen. The plaintiffs do not allege that this information allowed the prisoners to discover information that they would have been unable to otherwise. Therefore, this information does not rise to the level of sensitivity we found constitutionally significant in Kallstrom."); Draw v. City of Lincoln Park, 491 F.3d 550, 554, 556 (6th Cir. 2007) ("As an initial matter, we first consider whether the instant case is distinguishable from our decision in Jones because the Plaintiffs-Appellants' claim here is predicated on a different theory of liability. As noted above, the Plaintiffs-Appellants say that the district court erred in failing to evaluate their § 1983 claim under a 'direct injury' theory of liability rather than according to the 'state created danger' doctrine. . . . Here, the defendant officers' conduct was irresponsible. However, no evidence in the record indicates the officers intended to cause any harm through their actions or otherwise acted in a manner sufficient to transform wrongful behavior into unconstitutional conduct. . . . Here, even if the Court construes the defendant officers' conduct as conspiratorial, there is no evidence that the goal of the purported conspiracy − the facilitation of an illegal drag race − was in and of itself unconstitutional. Although violative of Michigan law, drag racing does not implicate constitutional concerns. Second, the Plaintiffs-Appellants' direct-injury argument ignores the fact that otherwise impermissible police conduct must truly be extraordinary in nature to qualify as 'conscience shocking.' . . . Here, the defendant officers stupidly encouraged third parties to engage in tortious conduct. Without question, such conduct showed incredibly poor judgment. However, the conduct in question does not meet the high threshold set out in Lewis. Accordingly, we find that the Plaintiffs-Appellants' claims are unsupportable under a direct-injury theory of liability."); Ye v. United States, 484 F.3d 634, 639-41 (3d Cir. 2007) ("The three necessary conditions to satisfy the fourth element of a state-created danger claim are that: (1) a state actor exercised his or her authority, (2) the state actor took an affirmative action, and (3) this act created a danger to the citizen or rendered the citizen more vulnerable to danger than if the state had not acted at all. . . . Dr. Kim argues that an assurance or misrepresentation, without more, cannot constitute an 'affirmative' act for purposes of the state-created danger inquiry. This Court has never expressly addressed this issue. We hold that a mere assurance cannot form the basis of a state-created danger claim. . . .Although the DeShaney Court did not hold that words alone could not rise to the level of affirmative act that works a deprivation of liberty, the Supreme Court did provide two examples, incarceration and institutionalization, to guide our analysis. Ye cannot prevail unless Dr. Kim's misrepresentation that Ye had 'nothing to worry about and that he [was] fine' falls into the third category of a 'restraint of personal liberty' that is 'similar' to incarceration or institutionalization. DeShaney did not conclusively answer this question, nor was the Court focused on state-created liability, giving much greater consideration to circumstances that would give rise to the special relationship exception. However, the Court made clear that a 'deprivation of liberty' is a bedrock requirement of state liability under the substantive due process clause. Ye's claim places before us the question of whether a mere assurance can constitute an affirmative act that invaded Ye's personal liberty. We implicitly rejected this argument in Bright and do so expressly now."); Koulta v. Merciez, 477 F.3d 442, 446, 447 (6th Cir. 2007) ("The officers' failure to administer a breathalyzer test (or otherwise to determine the extent of Lucero's drinking) before ordering her to leave the property may well have been negligent, but it did not 'create' or 'increase' the danger − of Lucero drinking and driving − that pre-dated their arrival on the scene. . . . In the final analysis, Lucero's admitted proclivity to drink and drive that evening placed Koulta (and other people using the roadways) in as much danger before the officers arrived as afterwards. And much as the officers were in a position to head off the tragedy that materialized minutes later, a reality (and memory) that no court decision will eliminate, their conduct was no more an affirmative risk-creating act than the conduct of the officers in DeShaney (who returned an abused child to the custody of his abusive father) or *Bukowsk*i (who returned a mentally disabled girl to the stranger who had been sexually abusing her).[distinguishing Pena v. DePrisco, 432 F.3d 98 (2d Cir.2005) and Reed v. Gardner, 986 F.2d 1122 (7th Cir.1993)]"); Johnson v. City of Seattle, 474 F.3d 634, 641 (9th Cir. 2007) ("In contrast to the plaintiffs in Wood, Penilla, Munger, Grubbs and Kennedy, the Pioneer Square Plaintiffs have failed to offer evidence that the Defendants engaged in affirmative conduct that enhanced the dangers the Pioneer Square Plaintiffs exposed themselves to by participating in the Mardi Gras celebration. The decision to switch from a more aggressive operation plan to a more passive one was not affirmative conduct that placed the Pioneer Square Plaintiffs in danger, because it did not place them in any worse position than they would have been in had the police not come up with any operational plan whatsoever. . . . [T]he fact that the police at one point had an operational plan that might have more effectively controlled the crowds at Pioneer Square does not mean that an alteration to this plan was affirmative conduct that placed the Pioneer Square Plaintiffs in danger. The police did not communicate anything about their plans to the Pioneer Square Plaintiffs prior to the incident. Even if proved not the most effective means to combat the violent conduct of private parties, the more passive operational plan that the police ultimately implemented did not violate substantive due process because it 'placed [the Pioneer Square Plaintiffs] in no worse position than that in which [they] would have been had [the Defendants] not acted at all.'"); Carver v. City of Cincinnati, 474 F.3d 283, 286, 287 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Here, the officers removed everyone from the apartment and they controlled the keys to the apartment. It has not been suggested that anyone tried to enter the apartment to render aid to Carver. Nor has it been established that anyone, whether it be the officers or the people removed from the apartment, knew of Carver's need for assistance. Therefore, there is no 'evidence that any private rescue was available or attempted.'. . The officers' act of closing off the apartment to conduct an investigation into the death of Smith-Sandusky did nothing in and of itself to increase the risk of harm to Carver. No allegation has been made that Carver died while the officers were inside the apartment with him. The fact that Carver died from an apparent self-induced drug overdose is tragic. This tragedy, however, does not allow us to usurp Supreme Court precedent that the officers were under no general duty to render aid to Carver. . . In the absence of any allegation that a private rescue was attempted, the officers did not commit a constitutional violation by securing the apartment and leaving Carver lying on the couch."); Tanner v. County of Lenawee, 452 F.3d 472, 478, 479 (6th Cir. 2006) (state-created-danger exception has never been extended to cover situations where the police simply respond to the scene of a 911 call); Bright v. Westmoreland County, 443 F.3d 276, 283, 284 (3d Cir. 2006) ("We conclude that the state cannot 'create danger' giving rise to substantive due process liability by failing to more expeditiously seek someone's detention, by expressing an intention to seek such detention without doing so, or by taking note of a probation violation without taking steps to promptly secure the revocation of the probationer's probation."); Jones v. Reynolds, 438 F.3d 685, 688, 691, 694, 698, 699 (6th Cir. 2006) ("Because the officers did not have custody of Denise Jones at the time of the accident, because the officers' actions did not place Denise Jones in any more danger than she voluntarily undertook before they arrived and because the officers' participation in this tragedy did not specially place Denise Jones at any more risk than the 150-300 people attending the drag race, all relevant precedent requires us to uphold the judgment of the district court summarily rejecting this constitutional claim. . . . Nothing in the record indicates that the race would not have proceeded if the officers had never arrived at the scene. And nothing in the record indicates that the officers made Jones 'more vulnerable' to the risk that she had already undertaken by voluntarily choosing to watch the race. . . . Even if an officer bet on the drag race, as one spectator alleges, and even if the officers played rap music for 15 minutes rather than 2 minutes, as other spectators allege, that does not change matters. While such conduct certainly would not have discouraged the participants from proceeding with the race, it also cannot be said that it placed the drivers or spectators in greater danger than if the police had never arrived. As deeply regrettable and ultimately tragic as the officers' actions were, no evidence suggests that their conduct altered the risk of harm to Denise Jones. . . . Faced with these kinds of assertions, it is tempting to say that they satisfy the 'state created danger' doctrine. But, to do so, we would have to say that the doctrine covers conduct it does not − that it covers state action that does not create or increase the risk of danger to the victim and that it applies to state action that does not specifically increase the risk of danger to a discrete individual or group of individuals. And even were we to move the doctrine in these directions, that would not advance this claim because the very act of modifying these rules would defeat plaintiff's obligation to show that the officers violated 'clearly established' law. While we decline to extend the doctrine in this case, nothing in our decision prevents future litigants from arguing what the plaintiff has not argued here − that the alleged actions of the officers converted the private misconduct of the drivers into public misconduct and in the process converted this claim into a direct-injury constitutional claim under the Lewis, as opposed to DeShaney, line of cases."); May v. Franklin County Commissioners, 437 F.3d 579, 585, 586 (6th Cir. 2006) ("In both Cartwright v. City of Marine City and Bukowski v. City of Akron, we discussed the 'Catch-22' that these sorts of scenarios can create for police officers, where they face a danger of potential liability whether they take action to attempt a rescue or they fail to do so. . . Franklin County would undoubtedly face legal and moral objections, and rightly so, if its Comm Center personnel had failed to dispatch an officer to Kirk's apartment after her repeated calls to 911.

May's proposition that appellees violated Kirk's constitutional rights by sending a police cruiser in response to her 911 calls for help is unsettling, and we decline to interpret the Due Process Clause in such a manner as to discourage law enforcement officers from responding to requests for assistance. May has not produced any evidence that Franklin County's dispatch of police to Kirk's apartment created or increased the risk that Moss would harm Kirk. We therefore affirm the district court's conclusion that the dispatch is not an affirmative act under Kallstrom. . . .The inability of the Franklin County authorities to prevent Kirk's murder despite her numerous 911 calls to their emergency call center is deeply troubling. May has produced persuasive evidence that appellees failed to follow their established procedure for domestic violence calls when fielding Kirk's first 911 call, and that appellees may also have underestimated the urgency of Kirk's situation during the second 911 call. Had appellees attempted to obtain more information from Kirk during her phone calls to 911, it is possible that their attempt to intervene would have been more aggressive, and the tragic events of that night might have unfolded differently. While appellees' actions in response to Kirk's calls for assistance may not be faultless, none of appellees' actions directly increased Kirk's vulnerability to danger or placed her in harm's way. . . May has been unable to show that any of appellees' actions constitute affirmative acts as Kallstrom requires to sustain her state-created-danger claim."); McQueen v. Beecher Community Schools, 433 F.3d 460, 464-66 (6th Cir. 2006) ("Every regional court of appeals, including this one, has walked through the door left open by the Court and recognized the state-created-danger theory of constitutional liability under § 1983. . . In Kallstrom, we recognized the state-created-danger theory of due process liability and laid out three important requirements: an affirmative act that creates or increases the risk, a special danger to the victim as distinguished from the public at large, and the requisite degree of state culpability. . . Although we have sometimes assumed the affirmative-act-plus-risk-creation requirement to be satisfied, . . . Kallstrom remains the only time we have explicitly held it to be met. . . . We have not previously considered whether it constitutes an affirmative-act-plus-risk-creation under Kallstrom for a teacher to leave students − and more pertinently, the student who ultimately causes the injury − unsupervised. . . The decisions reviewed above, however, provide enough guidance to conclude that Judd's leaving Smith and several of his classmates unsupervised in the classroom was not an affirmative act that created or increased the risk for purposes of Kallstrom. The cases most applicable to the situation here are those in which the state officials performed some act, . . .but we held that there was no affirmative act that created or increased the risk because the victim would have been in about the same or even greater danger even if the state officials had done nothing. . . .[J]ust as the plaintiffs in Cartwright and Bukowski would have faced at least the same danger if the police had not acted, Doe would have faced the danger of Smith drawing his gun and firing at her even if Judd had not acted (i.e., if Judd had remained in the classroom at all relevant times); Jackson v. Schultz, 429 F.3d 586, 591, 592 (6th Cir. 2005) ("Even liberally construing Jackson's allegations, she has also not pled sufficient facts to show a constitutional violation based on the 'stated-created danger' exception. . . . Jackson . . .does not state a constitutional claim that the EMTs hindered third party aid. . . . The EMTs did not discourage others from entering the ambulance. All evidence indicates decedent was free to leave (or be removed from) the ambulance. Furthermore, there is no evidence that any private rescue was available or attempted. No set of facts consistent with the allegations shows that the

EMTs interfered with private aid. Thus, Jackson does not allege sufficient facts to support a claim for a constitutional violation based on cutting off private aid."); Cartwright v. City of Marine City, 336 F.3d 487, 493 (6th Cir. 2003) ("The facts of this case indicate, at most, a failure to act; they do not rise to the level of affirmative acts which created or increased the risk that the plaintiff would be exposed to an act of violence by a third party. Defendant officers took plaintiff from a place of great danger: the shoulder of a dark, foggy, two-lane highway. They placed him in a place of lesser danger: the parking lot of an open convenience store, where telephones, restrooms, and food and drink were available to him. . . . The question is not whether the victim was safer during the state action, but whether he was safer before the state action than he was after it."); Bukowski v. City of Akron, 326 F.3d 702, 709 (6th Cir. 2003) ("It seems difficult to characterize the actions of the officials as affirmative acts within the meaning of DeShaney. The officials arguably did nothing to increase Bukowski's vulnerability to danger. They merely returned her at her request to Hall's residence, where they originally had found her. The Bukowskis argue that the police did not merely refuse to act: instead of simply allowing her to leave the police station, they affirmatively acted by returning her to Hall's residence. Whether or not the defendants 'acted' may be a difficult question in the abstract, but DeShaney makes clear that the acts of the officials here clearly fall on the inaction side of the line. Although in DeShaney the state returned Joshua to the ultimate aggressor, the DeShaney Court explicitly rejected the idea that such acts met the state-action requirement. . . . Examining the quality of governmental involvement here, it is apparent that the government was no more involved in making Bukowski more vulnerable to private violence than it was in DeShaney − in both cases, the government was merely returning a person to a situation with a preexisting danger."); Hernandez v. City of Goshen, 324 F.3d 535, 539 (7th Cir. 2003) ("In this case, the pleadings allege that the Goshen police department learned from Nu-Wood plant manager Greg Oswald's phone call that employee Robert Wissman threatened to do bodily harm to Nu-Wood employees, and that Oswald knew Wissman had access to guns. No other evidence of the City's knowledge or involvement with the situation at Nu-Wood appears on the face of the complaint. This is even less information about the specific danger facing Hernandez and Garza than the police had in Windle or the social workers had in DeShaney, and we therefore do not find that the City, through its police department's decision not to investigate the phoned-in threat, created or increased the danger faced by the Plaintiffs and their fellow Nu-Wood employees that day."); Windle v. City of Marion, 321 F.3d 658, 662, 663 (7th Cir. 2003) ("In focusing exclusively on whether the police acted affirmatively, Appellant fails to grasp that she has to establish that the police failed to protect her from a danger they created or made worse. She confuses the inert failure to protect with the proactive creation or exacerbation of danger. In this case the police did nothing to create a danger, nor did they do anything to make worse any danger Chaunce already faced. . . . If the police had never overheard the conversation, and had never been involved at all, the danger faced by Chaunce would likely have been the same or perhaps worse. The police did not place Chaunce in the custody of Rigsbee, and they did nothing to assist Rigsbee. They just failed to intervene until Raymer thought that matters had reached a crisis. This case is indistinguishable from DeShaney where the Supreme Court concluded that no constitutional violation had occurred when state actors who may have been aware that a child was being abused by his father did nothing to protect the child. . . . Appellant has not included in this suit a claim against Rigsbee, who as a teacher could also be considered a state actor. Rigsbee's status as a potential state actor does however raise one important question regarding the duties of the Marion Police. In certain cases liability under § 1983 may exist when one state actor fails to intervene to prevent another state actor from causing direct harm to a victim. Yang v. Hardin, 37 F.3d 282, 285 (7th Cir.1994). Just such a case can exist when one law enforcement officer has reason to know 'that any constitutional violation has been committed by [another] law enforcement official; and the officer had a realistic opportunity to intervene to prevent the harm from occurring.' Id. Liability under this theory is certainly not limited to the context of a police officer's relationship with other officers in her department; but on the other hand the rule is not so broad as to place a responsibility on every government employee to intervene in the acts of all other government employees. In the instant case there appears no particular governmental connection between Rigsbee and the Marion Police. Appellant has not alleged that the Marion Police have any authority over teachers that they do not have over any other citizen of Marion or that they share any joint responsibility with school officials. To be sure, we are not today deciding a case where an employee of one government entity failed to intervene to prevent harm by an employee of another entity where the two entities shared, in practice, some relationship. Against the background of this case, Yang does not apply."); Brown v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania Dept. of Health Emergency Medical Services Training Institute, 318 F.3d 473, 478 (3d Cir. 2003) ("We have not decided whether the Due Process Clause requires states to provide adequate or competent rescue services when they have chosen to undertake these services. Other appellate courts addressing this question have held that states have no constitutional obligation to provide competent rescue services. [citing cases] We agree with the reasoning of these decisions and join these Circuits in holding that there is no federal constitutional right to rescue services, competent or otherwise. Moreover, because the Due Process Clause does not require the State to provide rescue services, it follows that we cannot interpret that clause so as to place an affirmative obligation on the State to provide competent rescue services if it chooses to provide them."); Ruiz v. McDonnell, 299 F.3d 1173, 1183 (10th Cir. 2002) ("Here, the crux of Ms. Ruiz's claim is that J.R. suffered injuries of constitutional proportions because the State Defendants improperly licensed Tender Heart after failing to conduct an investigation into the facility. However, we do not view the mere licensure of Tender Heart as constituting the requisite affirmative conduct necessary to state a viable § 1983 claim. Specifically, the improper licensure did not impose an immediate threat of harm. Rather, it presented a threat of an indefinite range and duration. Moreover, the licensure affected the public at large; it was not aimed at J.R. or Ms. Ruiz directly. Unlike the direct placement of a child into an abusive home, the mere licensure of Tender Heart was not an act directed at J.R. which, in and of itself, placed J.R. in danger. For those reasons, we conclude that Ms. Ruiz has failed to allege any affirmative conduct on the part of the State Defendants that created or increased the danger to J.R."); White v. Lemacks, 183 F.3d 1253, 1259 (11th Cir. 1999) ("[T]he 'special relationship' and 'special danger' doctrines applied in our decision in Cornelius [v. Town of Highland Lake, 880 F.2d 348 (11th Cir. 1989)] are no longer good law, having been superseded by the standard employed by the Supreme Court in Collins. Under Collins, state and local government officials violate the substantive due process rights of individuals not in custody only when those officials cause harm by engaging in conduct that is 'arbitrary, or conscience shocking, in a constitutional sense,' and that standard is to be

